* " We cannot take leave of this remarkable session, without observing, that if the leaders of the commons had no other motives for their measures, than the necessity of espousing the cause of religion, of making an abandoned court feel the weight and efficacy of parliament, and providing for the security of the subject; it ought to be acknowledged, that they had done their best to answer all those valuable ends: and if, on the other hand, they began to entertain any thoughts of making reprisals on the court, for their ill designs on them, that they had approved themselves to be as thorough politicians in the one case, as patriots in the other: for, by the separate peace with the Dutch, they had reason to think they had effectually divided England from France; by withholding the Supply, and breaking the Army in England, and laying a foundation for doing the same in Scotland, they disabled the king from making use of force; and the Habeas Corpus Bill was both a wise and popular expedient to put the liberty of the subject out of the power of the crown." Ralph.

tinued against Holland; and a sensible decay of trade was foreseen, in case a rupture should ensue with that kingdom. The prospect of this loss contributed very much to increase the national aversion to the present war, and to enliven the joy for its conclusion. There was in the French service a great body of English, to the number of ten thousand men, who had acquired honour in every action, and had greatly contributed to the successes of Lewis. These troops, Charles said, he was bound by treaty not to recal; but he obliged himself to the States by a secret article not to allow them to be recruited. His partiality to France* prevented a strict execution of this engagement.—If we consider the projects of the famous Cabal, it will appear hard to determine whether the end which those ministers pursued were more blameable and pernicious, or the means by which they were to effect it, more impolitic and imprudent. Though they might talk only of recovering or fixing the king's authority; their intention could be no other than that of making him absolute: since it was not possible to regain or maintain, in opposition to the people, any of those powers of the crown abolished by late law or custom, without subduing the people, and rendering the royal prerogative entirely uncontrollable. Against such a scheme, they might foresee, that every part of the nation would declare themselves, not only the old parliamentary faction, which, though they kept not in a body, were still numerous; but even the greatest royalists, who were indeed attached to monarchy, but desired to see it limited and restrained by law. It had appeared, that the present parliament, though elected during the greatest prevalence of the royal party, was yet tenacious of popular privileges, and retained a considerable jealousy of the crown, even before they had received any just ground of suspicion. The guards, therefore, together with a small army, new levied, and undisciplined, and composed too of Englishmen, were almost the only domestic resources which the king could depend on in the prosecution of these dangerous counsels.—The assistance of the French king was, no doubt, deemed by the Cabal, a considerable support in the schemes which they were forming; but it is not easily conceived, that they should imagine themselves capable of directing and employing an associate of so domineering a character. They ought justly to have suspected that it would be the sole intention of Lewis, as it evidently was his interest, to raise incurable jealousies between the king and his people; and that he saw how much a steady uniform government in this island, whether free or absolute, would form invincible barriers to his ambition. Should his assistance be demanded;

if he sent a small supply, it would serve only to enrage the people, and render the breach altogether irreparable; if he furnished a great force, sufficient to subdue the nation, there was little reason to trust his generosity, with regard to the use which he would make of this advantage.—In all its other parts the plan of the Cabal, it must be confessed, appears equally absurd and incongruous. If the war with Holland were attended with great success, and involved the subjection of the republic; such an accession of force must fall to Lewis, not to Charles: and what hopes afterwards of resisting by the greatest unanimity so mighty a monarch? How dangerous, or rather how ruinous, to depend upon his assistance against domestic discontents? If the Dutch by their own vigour, and the assistance of allies, were able to defend themselves, and could bring the war to an equality, the French arms would be so employed abroad, that no considerable reinforcement could thence be expected to second the king's enterprises in England. And might not the project of over-awing or subduing the people be esteemed, of itself, sufficiently odious, without the aggravation of sacrificing that state, which they regarded as their best ally, and with which, on many accounts, they were desirous of maintaining the greatest concord and strictest confederacy? Whatever views likewise might be entertained of promoting by these measures the catholic religion, they could only tend to render all the other schemes abortive, and make them fall with inevitable ruin upon the projectors. The catholic religion, indeed, where it is established, is better fitted than the protestant for supporting an absolute monarchy; but would any man have thought of it as the means of acquiring arbitrary authority in England, where it was more detested than even slavery itself?—It must be allowed, that the difficulties, and even inconsistencies, attending the schemes of the Cabal, are so numerous and obvious, that one feels at first an inclination to deny the reality of those schemes, and to suppose them entirely the chimeras of calumny and faction. But the utter impossibility of accounting, by any other hypothesis, for those strange measures embraced by the court, as well as for the numerous circumstances which accompanied them, obliges us to acknowledge (though there remains no direct evidence of it) that a formal plan was laid for changing the religion, and subverting the constitution, of England, and that the king and the ministry were in reality conspirators against the people. What is most probable in human affairs, is not always true; and a very minute circumstance, overlooked in our speculations, serves often to explain events, which may seem the most surprising and unaccountable. Though the king possessed penetration and a sound judgment, his capacity was chiefly fitted for smaller matters, and the ordinary occurrences of life; nor had he application enough to carry his view to distant consequences, or to digest and adjust any plan of political operations. As he scarcely ever thought twice on any one subject, every appearance of advantage was apt to seduce him; and when he found his way obstructed by unlooked for difficulties, he readily turned aside into the first path, where he expected more to gratify the natural indulgence of his disposition. To this versatility or pliancy of genius, he himself was inclined to trust; and he thought, that after trying an experiment of enlarging his authority, and altering the national religion, he could easily, if it failed, return into the ordinary channel of government. But the suspicions of the people, though they burst not forth at once, were by this attempt rendered altogether incurable; and the more they reflected on the circumstances attending it, the more resentment and jealousy were they apt to entertain. They observed, that the king never had any favourite; that he was never governed by his ministers, scarcely even by his mistresses; and that he himself was the chief spring of all public counsels. Whatever appearance, therefore, of a change might be assumed, they still suspected, that the same project was secretly in agitation; and they deemed no precaution too great to secure them against the pernicious consequences of such measures.—The king, sensible of this jealousy, was inclined thenceforth not to trust his people, of whom he had even before entertained a great diffidence; and, though obliged to make a separate peace, he still kept up connexions with the French monarch. He apologized for deserting his ally, by representing to him all the real undissembled difficulties under which he laboured; and Lewis, with the greatest complaisance and good humour, admitted the validity of his excuses. The duke likewise, conscious that his principles and conduct had rendered him still more obnoxious to the people, maintained on his own account a separate correspondence with the French court, and entered into particular connexions with Lewis, which these princes dignified with the name of friendship. The duke had only in view to secure his succession, and favour the catholics: and it must be acknowledged to his praise, that, though his schemes were, in some particulars, dangerous to the people, they gave the king no just ground of jealousy. A dutiful subject, and an affectionate brother, he knew no other rule of conduct than obedience; and the same unlimited submission which afterwards, when king, he exacted of his people, he was ever willing, before he ascended the throne, to pay to his sovereign.—As the king was at peace with all the world, and almost the only prince in Europe placed in that agreeable situation, he thought proper to offer his mediation to the contending powers, in order to compose their differences. France, willing to negotiate under so favourable a mediator, readily accepted of Charles's offer; but it was apprehended, that, for a like reason, the allies would be inclined to refuse it. In order to give a sanction to his new measures, the king invited Temple from his retreat, and appointed him ambassador to the States. That wise minister, reflecting on the unhappy issue of his former undertakings, and the fatal turn of counsels which had occasioned it, resolved, before he embarked anew, to acquaint himself, as far as possible, with the real intentions of the king, in those popular measures which he seemed again to have adopted. After blaming the dangerous schemes of the Cabal, which Charles was desirous to excuse, he told his majesty very plainly, that he would find it extremely difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to introduce into England the same system of government and religion which was established in France: that the universal bent of the nation was against both; and it required ages to change the genius and sentiments of a people: that many, who were at bottom indifferent in matters of religion, would yet oppose all alterations on that head; because they considered, that nothing but force of arms could subdue the reluctance of the people against Popery; after which, they knew, there could be no security for civil liberty: that in France every circumstance had long been adjusted to that system of government, and tended to its establishment and support: that the commonalty, being poor and dispirited, were of no account; the nobility, engaged by the prospect or possession of numerous offices, civil and military, were entirely attached to the court; the ecclesiastics, retained by like motives, added the sanction of religion to the principles of civil policy: that in England a great part of the landed property belonged either to the yeomanry or middling gentry; the king had few offices to bestow; and could not himself even subsist, much less maintain an army, except by the voluntary supplies of his parliament: that if he had an army on foot, yet if composed of Englishmen, they would never be prevailed on to promote ends which the people so much feared and hated: that the Roman Catholics in England were not the hundredth part of the nation, and in Scotland not the two hundredth; and it seemed against all common sense to hope, by one part, to govern ninety-nine, who were of contrary sentiments and dispositions: and that foreign troops, if few, would tend only to inflame hatred and discontent; and how to raise and bring over at once, or to maintain many, it was very difficult to imagine. To these reasonings Temple added the authority of Gourville, a Frenchman, for whom he knew the king had entertained a great esteem: "A king of England," said Gourville, "who will be 'the man of his people,' is the greatest king in the world: but if he will be any thing more, he is nothing at all." The king heard, at first, this discourse with some impatience; but being a dextrous dissembler, he seemed moved at last, and; laying his hand on Temple's, said, with an appearing cordiality, "And I will be the man of my people."—Temple, when he went abroad, soon found that the scheme of meditating a peace was likely to prove abortive. The allies, besides their jealousy of the king's mediation, expressed a great ardour for the continuance of war. Holland had stipulated with Spain never to come to an accommodation, till all things in Flanders were restored to the condition in which they had been left by the Pyrenean treaty. The emperor had high pretensions in Alsace; and as the greater part of the empire joined in the alliance, it was hoped that France, so much over-matched in force, would soon be obliged to submit to the terms demanded of her. The Dutch, indeed, oppressed by heavy taxes, as well as checked in their commerce, were desirous of peace; and had few or no claims of their own to retard it: but they could not in gratitude, or even in good policy, abandon allies, to whose protection they had so lately been indebted for their safety. The prince of Orange likewise, who had great influence in their councils, was all on fire for military fame, and was well pleased to be at the head of armies, from which such mighty successes were expected. Under various pretences, he eluded, during the whole campaign, the meeting with Temple; and after the troops were sent into winter quarters, he told that minister, in his first audience, that till greater impression were made on France, reasonable terms could not be hoped for; and it were therefore vain to negotiate.—The success of the campaign had not answered expectation. The prince of Orange, with a superior army, was opposed in Flanders to the prince of Condé, and had hoped to penetrate into France by that quarter, where the frontier was then very feeble. After long endeavouring, though in vain, to bring Condé to a battle, he rashly exposed, at Senefé, a wing of his army; and that active prince failed not at once to see and to seize the advantage. But this imprudence of the prince of Orange was amply compensated by his behaviour in that obstinate and bloody action which ensued. He rallied his dismayed troops; he led them to the charge; he pushed the veteran and martial troops of France; and he obliged the prince of Condé, notwithstanding his age and character, to exert greater efforts, and to risque his person more than in any action, where, even during the heat of youth, he had ever commanded. After sun-set, the action was continued by the light of the moon; and it was darkness at last, not the weariness of the combatants, which put an end to the contest, and left the victory undecided. "The prince of Orange," said Condé, with candour and generosity, "has acted, in every thing, like an old captain, except venturing his life too like a young soldier." Oudenarde was afterwards invested by the prince of Orange; but he was obliged, by the Imperial and Spanish generals, to raise the siege on the approach of the enemy. He afterwards besieged and took Grave; and at the beginning of winter, the allied armies broke up, with great discontent and complaints on all sides.—The allies were not more successful in other places.

Lewis, in a few weeks, reconquered Franche-comté. In Alsace, Turenne displayed, against a much superior enemy, all that military skill, which had long rendered him the most renowned captain of his age and nation. By a sudden and forced march, he attacked and beat at Sinsheim the duke of Lorraine and Caprara, general of the Imperialists. Seventy thousand Germans poured into Alsace, and took up their quarters in that province. Turenne, who had retired in Lorraine, returned unexpectedly upon them. He attacked and defeated a body of the enemy at Mulhausen. He chased from Colmar the elector of Brandenburg, who commanded the German troops. He gained a new advantage at Turckheim. And having dislodged all the allies, he obliged them to repossess the Rhine, full of shame for their multiplied defeats, and still more, of anger and complaints against each other.—In England, all these events were considered by the people with great anxiety and concern; though the king and his ministers affected great indifference with regard to them. Considerable alterations were about this time made in the English ministry. Buckingham was dismissed, who had long, by his wit and entertaining humour, possessed the king's favour. Arlington, now chamberlain, and Danby the treasurer, possessed chiefly the king's confidence. Great hatred and jealousy took place between these ministers; and public affairs were somewhat disturbed by their quarrels. But Danby daily gained ground with his master: and Arlington declined in the same proportion. Danby was a frugal minister; and, by his application and industry, he brought the revenue into tolerable order. He endeavoured so to conduct himself as to give offence to no party; and the consequence was, that he was able entirely to please none. He was a declared enemy to the French alliance; but never possessed authority enough to overcome the prepossessions which the duke retained towards it. It must be ascribed to the prevalence of that interest, aided by money remitted from Paris, that the parliament was assembled so late this year; lest they should attempt to engage the king in measures against France, during the ensuing campaign. They met not till the 13th of April 1675."

THIRTEENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session. April 13, 1675. This day both houses met, after a recess of nearly fourteen months; when the king opened the session with the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; The principal end of my calling you now is, to know what you think may be yet wanting to the securing of Religion and Property, and to give myself the satisfaction of having used the utmost of my endeavours to procure and settle a right and lasting understanding between us; for, I must tell you, I find the contrary so much in-boured, and that the pernicious designs of ill men have taken so much place under specious pretences, that it is high time to be watchful in preventing their contrivances; of which it is not the least, that they would, by all the means they can devise, make it unpracticable any longer to continue this present parliament: for that reason, I confess, I cannot think such have any good meaning to me; and therefore, when I consider how much the greatest part of this parliament has, either themselves, or fathers, given me testimony of their affections and loyalty, I should be extreme loath to oblige those enemies, by parting with such friends; and they may be assured, that none shall be able to recommend themselves to me by any other way than their good services.—I have done as much as on my part was possible, to extinguish the Fears and Jealousies of Popery, and will leave nothing undone that may shew the world my zeal for the Protestant Religion as it is established in the Church of England, from which I will never depart.—I must needs recommend to you the condition of the Fleet, which I am not able to put into that state it ought to be; and which will require so much time to repair and build, that I should be sorry to see this summer (and consequently a whole year) lost, without providing for it.—The season of the year will not admit any long session; nor would I have called you now, but in hopes to do something that may give content to all my subjects, and lay before you the consideration of the Fleet; for I intend to meet you again at winter.—In the mean time, I earnestly recommend to you all such a temper and moderation in your proceedings, as may tend to unite us all in counsel and affection, and disappoint the expectation of those who hope only by violent and irregular motions to prevent the bringing of this session to a happy conclusion. The rest I leave to the Lord Keeper.”

The Lord Keeper Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper spake as followeth:

“My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; The solemnity of this day's appearance is equal to the weight and importance of the occasion. The matters to be treated of deserve no less than an assembly of the three estates, and a full concourse of all the wise and excellent persons who bear a part in this great council, and do constitute and complete this high and honourable court.—The king hath called you, at this time, to examine and concur with him in the best expedients for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, for securing the establishment of it by a due execution of the laws, for providing for the safety of the kingdom, and for the improvement of its honour and reputation; and withal, in order to these ends, and above all the rest, to unite the hearts of his parliament and people to himself, by all the emanations of grace and goodness that from a great and generous prince can be expected.—To all which the king is pleased to add, the consideration of your Liberties and Properties; and while he does so, you may be sure, that he who is so careful of your rights will be mindful of his own too; for he that does justice to all, can never be wanting to himself.—These points are such, as though they be but mentioned by the king, though they are but only touched, as I may say, by his golden sceptre, yet this royal declaration of himself, joined to what he hath already done, doth not only raise all our hopes, but carries in itself so evident an assurance, and is stamped by so sacred an authority, that there remains no place for doubting, nothing can be added to the efficacy of it.—His maj. begins with the consideration of Religion. He sees it is the first thing in all your thoughts; and you cannot but see that it hath been, and still is, the first and principal part of his care.—His maj. hath considered Religion, first, in general, as it is Protestant, and stands in opposition to Popery; and upon this account it is that he hath awakened all the laws against the papists: there is not one statute extant in all the volume of our laws, but his maj. hath now put in a way of taking its full course against them; and upon this account also it is, that, in a League lately renewed with a Protestant crown, his maj. hath made it one article of that League, That there shall be a mutual defence of the Protestant Religion.—His maj. hath considered Religion again more particularly, as it is the Protestant religion established by law in the Church of England: he sees, that as such, it is not only best suited to the monarchy, and most likely to defend it, but most able to defend itself against the enemies of all reformation; and therefore upon this account it is, that his majesty, with equal and impartial justice, hath revived all the laws against Dissenters and Non-conformists, but not with equal severity; for the laws against the Papists are edged, and the execution of them quickened, by new rewards proposed to the informers; those against Dissenters are left to that strength which they have already. Both these, and all other laws whatsoever, are always understood to be subject to the pleasure of a parliament, which may alter, amend, or explain themselves, as they see cause, and according unto public convenience.—For, when we consider Religion in Parliament, we are supposed to consider it as a parliament should do, and as parliaments in all ages have done; that is, as it is a part of our laws, a part, and a necessary part, of our government: for, as it works upon the conscience, as it is an inward principle of the Divine Life by which good men do govern all their actions, the state hath nothing to do with it, it is a thing which belongs to another kind of commission than that by which we sit here.—Now, as it relates to Government, it is somewhat an unpleasant observation, to see how slow many inferior magistrates are in the discharge of this part of their duty, which refers to the safety of the Church against the enemies on both sides of it, the Papists and the Dissenters: for this is that which opens mens mouths to object against the laws themselves; this is that which encourages offenders to dispute that authority which they should obey, and to judge those laws by which they ought to be judged. They have found a way to make even justice itself criminal, by giving it a hard name, and calling it persecution.—To what a strange kind of perplexity do men labour to reduce this government: if the law against Recusants be not executed, the Church of England is abandoned; if they be, all sorts of recusants complain of persecution, as if the abandoning of the Church of England were not in some sense a persecution too.—Let us suppose that possible, which the piety and goodness of the king hath made next to impossible: but let it be for once supposed, that the Church of England were forsaken, her authority made insignificant, her government precarious; suppose her disarmed of all those laws by which she is guarded, denied all aid from the civil magistrate, and that none were obliged to obey her commands but those that have a mind to it! Would not this turn a national church into nothing else but a tolerated sect or party in the nation? would it not take away all appearance of Establishment from it? would it not drive the Church into the wilderness again, where she should be sure to find herself encompassed with all sorts of enemies, if at least she could find herself, at all, in the midst of so many tolerations?—Seeing then no way can be taken, but one side or other will either call or think it persecution, the choice is not difficult; it is better to have a strict rule than none at all, better to make the law that rule than to leave every man to be a law and a rule unto himself.—Happy is that government when men complain of the strict execution of the laws, especially when a parliament is sitting which can take the truest measures, and where the wisdom of the nation is to judge of the interest of it.—In the next place, the king hath thought fit to direct your considerations upon the safety and honour of the state; both which are then best provided for, when we keep up the strength and reputation of our Fleet.—So the Roman state thought, when (as the orator tells us) they decreed, Non solum praesidii, sed etiam ornandi imperii causa navigandum esse.—It is not altogether the natural decay of Shipping, no, nor the accidents of war, that have lessened our Fleet, though something may be attributed to both these; but our fleet seems rather to be weakened for the present, by being out grown, and out-built by our neighbours.—Now, as the times of youth and health are best employed in providing against the incommodities and inconveniences of sickness and old age; so there cannot be a better use made of times of peace, than to provide for times of war; there cannot be a greater security against your enemies, than to be always in a posture ready to receive them.—Fleets may secure you abroad, but good laws are necessary to preserve you at home. Nothing recommends the present age unto posterity so much as the wisdom and the temper of the laws that are made in it; for all succeeding ages judge of our laws, as we do of our ancestors, by the true and unerring rule of experience.—In making of laws, therefore, it will import us to consider, That too many laws are a snare, too few are a weakness in the government; too gentle are seldom obeyed, too severe are as seldom executed; and sanguinary laws are, for the most part, either the cause or the effect of a distemper in the state.—To establish this state, there seems not to need many new laws: some will always be wanting; and though all that is wanting should not now be finished, yet whatever shall remain unfinished, may be perfected in winter; at which time, we have a gracious intimation from his majesty, that we shall meet again.—But, lest your greater and weightier affairs should make you pass by things of lesser moment, it may not be amiss to put you in mind to provide against the Excess of new Buildings near London and Westminster: it is a growing mischief, which nothing but a new law can put a stop to; a mischief which for a long time hath depopulated the country, and now begins to depopulate the city too, by leaving a great part of it uninhabited.—Yet, that you may not only entertain yourselves with careful and provident thoughts for the future, be pleased a little to consider and rejoice in the happiness of our present estate.—If we look upon the state of things abroad, we shall find ourselves in such circumstances, that it were great impiety not to acknowledge those mercies which, by a rare felicity, have distinguished us from our now miserable neighbours.—Wars and confusions cover the face of the rest of the Christian world; while we have no other part in all these afflictions but that of a Christian compassion. We are newly gotten out of an expensive war, and gotten out of it upon terms more honourable than ever. The whole world is now in peace with us, all ports are open to us, and we exercise a free and uninterrupted traffic through the Ocean; and we are reaping the fruits of all this peace, by a daily improvement of our Trade, and in the increase of our Shipping and Navigation. Our constitution seems to be so vigorous and so strong, that nothing can disorder it but ourselves. No influences of the stars, no configurations of the heavens, are to be feared, so long as these two houses stand in a good disposition to each other, and both of them in a happy conjunction with their lord and sovereign. Why should we doubt it? Never was discord more unseasonable. A difference in matters of the Church would gratify the enemies of our religion, and do them more service than the best of their auxiliaries. A difference in matters of state would gratify our enemies too, the enemies of our peace, the enemies of this parliament; even all those, both at home and abroad, that hope to see, and practise to bring about, new changes and revolutions in the government.—They understand well enough that the best health may be destroyed by too much care of it; an anxious scrupulous care, a care that is always tampering, a care that labours so long to purge all ill humours out of the body, that at last it leaves neither good blood nor spirits behind. In like manner, there are two symptoms which are dangerous in every state, and of which the historian hath long since given us warning. One is, when men do 'Quieta movere,' when they stir those things or questions which are and ought to be in peace; and, like unskilful architects, think to mend the building by removing all the materials which are not placed as they would have them.—Another is, 'Cum res parvæ magnis motibus aguntur,' when things that are not of the greatest moment are agitated with the greatest heat, and as much weight is laid upon a new, and not always very necessary proposition, as if the whole sum of affairs depended upon it.—Who doth not see that there are in all governments difficulties more than enough, though they meet with no intestine divisions; difficulties of such a nature, that the united endeavours of the state can hardly struggle with? But, after all is done that can be, they will still remain insuperable.—This is that which makes the crowns of princes, when they are worn by the clearest and the noblest title, and supported with the mightiest aids, yet at the best but wreaths of glorious thorns. He that would go about to add to the cares and solitudes of his prince; does what in him lies to make those thorns pierce deeper and sit closer to the royal diadem than ever they did before.—No zeal can excuse it; for, as there may be a religious zeal, a zeal for God which is not according to knowledge, so there may be a state zeal, a zeal for the public which is not according to prudence, at least not according to the degree of prudence which the same men have when they are not under the transport of such a fervent passion.—Hath it not been a strange mistake in some general councils, and a mistake which is fatal at this day to the peace of the Christian Church, that in most of their canons and sanctions they have more considered whom they should oppose, than what they should establish? And may it not prove a piece of as ill conduct in any secular assembly, to pursue good ends by violent means, and, in the heat of that pursuit, to choose rather to lose that good they might have compassed, than to fall short of any of those good ends which they have once proposed unto themselves?—My Lords and Gentlemen; The king is far, infinitely far, from fearing any excess of this kind here. He knows too well the wisdom, the honour, and the loyalty, of this great assembly, to apprehend any kind of error, either in your judgments or your affections. He does not only find himself safe, but he thinks himself armed too, while he is attended with such a nobility, such a gentry, as this. You that were able to raise the king's affairs when they were in their lowest and most deplored condition, will surely be able to keep them from any relapse. You that were able to make this government take root again, will surely be able to preserve it in a growing and a flourishing estate. Such pilots need not fear a storm. If you could, this consideration alone were enough to support you, 'That you carry Caesar and his fortunes: you serve a prince, in whose preservation miracles are become familiar; a prince, in whose style Dei Gratia seems not to be written by a vulgar pen, but by the arm of Omnipotence itself.—Raise up then, by your example, the hearts and hopes of all those whom ill men have wrought upon to such a degree, as to cast them into a sadnets, and into a despondency, which is most unreasonable. What the Romans scorned to do after the Battle of Cannæ, what the Venetians never did when they had lost all their terra firma, that men are now taught to think a virtue, and the sign of a wise and good man, desperare de Republica; and all this in a time of as much justice and peace at home, as good laws for the security of religion and liberty, as good execution of those laws, as great plenty of trade and commerce abroad, and as likely a conjuncture of affairs for the continuance of these blessings to us, as ever nation prospered under. Confirm the faith then of those that are made weak, by shewing them the steadfastness of your belief. Give the king the hearts of all his subjects, by making him a present of yours. Then will the king esteem himself a richer prince than if he were possessed of all the treasures of the east. Then, though this session should close in a few weeks, yet it may be perpetual, for the fruit it shall produce, and for the commemoration that will follow it. Then will this year be a true year of jubilee; and we shall have nothing left to wish or pray for in this world, but the blessed continuance of his majesty's long and happy reign over us."

The first step the house took after this, was to vote; 'Their humble and hearty Thanks to his majesty for his gracious promises and assurances, explained in his said Speech, to preserve and maintain us in the Established Religion, and our Properties according to law, and for calling us together at this time for that purpose.' Which being presented to the king in a full body in the Banqueting-House; his majesty returned this gracious Answer, 'That he had of great confidence in his house of commons; and that the said house may be confident that he would always preferre them in the Established Religion, and in their Liberties and Properties.'

April 10. Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty for the speedy recalling of all his subjects home out of the French king's service, and for hindering any more from going over into that service, for the future."

Debate on the Bill for restraint of Building near London.] April 20. A Bill for restraint of Building, ~~London~~ and Inhabitations, near to the cities of London and Westminster, was read the first time.

Mr. Waller. The law favours buildings. If you build with another man's brick or timber, the law gives you damage for it, but not the brick and timber. Again, it is said 'that these buildings make poverty.' We are undone in the country, without building—And yet not build at all. The relief of the poor ruins the nation—By the late Act they are hunted like foxes out of parishes, and whither must they go but where there are houses? We shall shortly have no lands to live upon, to relieve them, the charge of many parishes in the country is so great.

Mr. Sawyer. The Act for settlement of the poor, does, indeed, thrust all people out of the country to London. This Bill remedies the matter: by this increase of building, in a while the people will come into such disorder as to destroy the buildings themselves.

*Mr. Child. Sixty years experience has made it evident, in fact, that rents have increased the more for building-houses. London has more inhabitants than before the Fire: the circumstance must be subservient to the center.

Mr. Jones. If increase of buildings makes the houses in London of better value, it is a great paradox. Where is the demonstration? Is it because rents fall every day? but if this bill be so much against law as to give right away, is against it.

Sir Nich. Pedley. It is said that the buildings are not a nuisance at common law. In Q. Eliz.'s time, they were judged a nuisance, and in king James's time. Not by statute. But when a thing grows too big and inconvenient, it is a nuisance. The builders have been pardoned by Act, but for the future would prevent it.

Resolved, "That this Bill be withdrawn, and that a Committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a new Bill, upon the debates of the house, to restrain the farther increase of building near the cities of London and Westminster, and to remedy the inconveniencies occasioned thereby."

Debate on sir John Prettyman's Case: he being a Member and detained Prisoner in the King's Bench. Sir John Prettyman's Case, he being a member, and detained prisoner in the King's Bench, upon execution, was reported by sir Thomas Meres.

Mr. Sawyer. Whether this case be of the nature of privilege, or upon being outlawed before his election, is the question. To the law of parliament the case of privileging belongs. But as to reason, no prescriptions show that ever it was done. Prorogations are of the nature of several parliaments, and privilege commences as if it were a new parliament, 13 Hen. viii. And in Plowden's Commentaries 79, being of the same nature with those cases of judgment and execution in time of prorogation. No injury can, by privilege, be done to an innocent person; your subsequent privilege cannot do wrong to another, a third person. Should it do so, the inconveniencies were great. In effect, by allowing privilege in this case, you make 'privilege of prorogation' equal to 'privilege of adjournment.' If you deliver a man in execution, it is against what the law has vested the party in, and he loses also all the charges he has been at. There are judgments in the Case—31 Hen. vi. The Speaker^o was then taken in execution, in time of prorogation. It was debated and referred to the judges, and reported by them to be according to law of parliament, judged in the house of lords. It was then ruled that the Speaker should not be discharged; and the commons thereupon chose a new Speaker. It may be objected, That this was a judgment given by the lords: but it is answered; the lords were then the proper judges of it, but the judgment was confirmed by the commons. Many cases that may be instanced, were in the time of privilege, when wrong was done by the aggressor. To what purpose has the house, at any time, debated limitation of time of privilege, if out of the time you deliver the party? Martin's case 28 Eliz. There was then a case when a member was taken within '14 days' on a prorogation, which was then the time of privilege. But about '20 days,' upon report of Ferrer's case, it divided the house in opinion, whether a time should be asserted, or not, for privilege, or defined. The first question was, Whether the house would assert a time? It was resolved 'No; but a convenient time.' The next question was, Whether Martin was taken in that convenient time? 'Yea.' But whether the party should be punished, because the case was doubtful, was the great objection. There is the same reason for the one as the other, that the member might attend the house without disturbance. Before any person sits, he has privilege. The true reason why the person in execution should not be delivered, as the case is stated, is that the party should not be left remediless. 1 K. James, sir Robert Shirley was in execution in the feet four days. There was a Habeas Corpus granted to bring him to the bar. It was then declared there should be a bill, for the jailors and sheriff's indemnity. It provides that he may be taken again, after the session is over, 'after parliament.' No punishment for procuring such an arrest as that is.

Sir John Birkenhead would know whether Prettyman is in execution for a debt owing to any of your members. That may alter something of his case.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. In case of a peer's eldest son arrested in execution for debt, if his father should die, and he become a peer, he shall not come out of prison. And will you set up your privileges higher than where privilege is born with a man, and yet he cannot be taken out of execution? Take heed what ye do.

* Afterwards Sir Jonah.

* Thorpe. See vol. i. p. 391.

Sir Rd. Temple. All the ancient precedents, before the statute of 1st. James, will not be of any great use in this business. Formerly the house had power of punishing the prosecutor that put the party in prison, but had no power to release the party. Thorpe's case was a distinction between a debt to the king, and one to the subject, and yet has been over-ruled since. All precedents before 1 k. James, are out of the case. The preamble of the act is general and universal. Sawyer mistakes the case, for by this statute 'when privilege shall cease, the party shall be in execution again, all proceedings remaining as they were before,' and so persons concerned not be put to any new trouble of process. Would have one instance, let a member's taking be when it will, that ever he was detained, the parliament sitting. It is said, the party has an interest in the prisoner; so has the public likewise, and before the party had any, and you will not send a new writ, to chuse another in his stead. The case is of great weight, and he would not subject the keepers of prisons to any action of escape, but believes that persons taken in prorogation have been delivered out. The reason is the same whether the party is attached, the parliament sitting, or not.

Col. Strangways. We grant privilege in an adjournment. This case is privilege in prorogation. The privilege continues while he is a parliament-man. Upon delivering him, the parliament sitting, the sheriff is cleared by the statute of 1 k. James. By suffering him to be detained, you deprive a county, or a borough, of a representative.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is a tender argument to speak against the privilege of this house. Parliaments now are of longer continuance than formerly: and therefore it is an argument not to extend them more than formerly. The member's (Prettyman) council quoted no precedents in the case to the committee. But something so applicable from the bar of the 'case of a peer's son' that he thinks we have no reason to extend our privileges more than they do. No man will doubt but that there is such a sleeping of privilege in prorogation, which, if awaked, must have power, not only to stop, but to reverse the course of law, or the next step to it, if it rises. If a member be enlarged by privilege, it is restrained to those cases where, by that privilege, he might be before the statute. You may say, that he may serve the execution again when the parliament is dismissed: but can the party catch him? He that took him before was innocent, and he must catch him. It may be he has nothing responsible for the debt, neither goods, nor lands, and nothing but his person to be had, and this privilege is during the whole parliament. What may be the consequence of this? You would have often remedied buying of places in elections; this privilege will be a temptation to do it still, all debts being paid by privilege. This may tend to sending hither the most unfit men in England, and to put men upon breaking to be here. Let us not give occasion to people abroad to say we are rather extending than straitening our privileges, and never explaining them. Considering especially, that men, by death of witnesses, (our privileges being longer now than formerly) may lose their lands, as well as their debts, and therefore would not agree with the committee to send for Prettyman out of custody.

Mr. Swynfin agrees with the latter part of Coventry's speech, 'That titles and estates may be lost by death of witnesses, when privilege continues long,' and 'that it may be an invitation to bad men to come into parliament.' So that if any act of compassion to the subject could be made, to suspend privilege in some cases, would be glad of it: but in this case of Prettyman's, believes it a right, and that when a member is chosen, the town and the house have a right to that privilege. It is granted that any member, during sitting, has privilege; but here is the question, Whether a member taken in execution out of privilege has the same right of being released out of prison, as in privilege? If it be allowed, how will it be answered upon an original writ out of time? If you make precedents in one case, you must do it in another. The objection of 'a peer's son,' spoken of, is not this case; his father living when he was in execution, he had no title to the peerage, but this man has. The lords cannot make him a new title. The reason of privilege is the public service of the house and place he serves for, But one objection.—'Privilege is just such a thing as is found by precedent, and we have but one precedent that gives light, and that is Thorpe's case, the Speaker.' If this precedent had been since that statute of 1 k. James, no answer could be given to it; but it was before. But how appears it that there were no more precedents in the case? The reports are short; it appears not plainly that such as have been imprisoned were in time of privilege, but clear that they were delivered, the parliament sitting, which then sat not long, and this case before us could not then arise. For as to the proviso in that act to save the officers harmless, it may be out of privilege as well as in.

Mr. Sacheverell thinks not this case so different from Thorpe's case as is imagined, nor that of a peer's son so different: a peer serves for himself. If this releasing the person to attend here were to debar a man of his debt, would be against it. If his estate be not capable to make restitution, and he have neither land nor goods, it seems an act of malice to keep him from hence.

Sir Thos. Meres. If a man must be detained upon execution, though not mere process, 10, 20, 30 useful members may be taken out, to the destruction of parliaments.

Sir Rob. Howard finds that we have nothing to resort unto in this business as a clear precedent.

Mt. Serj. Crook. Did he think that this was 'lex et consuetudo parliamenti,' would not speak against it. He thought this case of Thorpe a settled and quiet case long. He was Speaker, and taken in execution, and a new one was chosen, before the statute of 1 k. James. If once a member taken in execution, were let out, or escaped, he was never to be taken again upon the same execution. It is urged that the kingdom loses a member; you will allow breach of the peace above any privilege of parliament: the keeping the peace, the very being of the kingdom; there is no super-sedeas against execution, the very life of the law. Not 'morando, eundo, redeundo, lex Parliamenti,' being the usage of parliament. In so great a case as this, he doubts himself, is what he delivers, this place being the best school, and must learn here. Before 1 k. James, the person in execution being delivered, the sheriff brought his action against the jailor, and it was a crime and incapacity to take him again. Would not agree with the committee.

Col. Titus. It is no argument that you should take away this privilege, because it is inconvenient. Are there not greater conveniences that balance the inconveniences? You may be deprived of many members of parliament. Men may be clapped up that are against a bill to be presented here. Better far a mischief on particulars, than an inconvenience in general.

Resolved, on a division 143 to 67, "That sir John Prettyman be delivered out of the custody of the Marshal of the King's Bench, by sending the Serjeant at Arms attending on this house, with the mace, to bring him to the service of this house."

Dr. Burnet's Examination respecting the Duke of Lauderdale, reported.] April 31. Mr. Powle reports Dr. Burnet's* Examination at the Committee appointed for the Address about the Duke of Lauderdale's removal: viz. "On the 27th last, Dr. Burnet was, by Mr. Secretary Coventry, ordered, in the king's name, to go 12 miles out of town. The occasion was from some words Burnet should say to a peer, which were by him denied; whereupon Burnet petitioned the king, but was, by the secretary, ordered 12 miles† out of town; speaking with the secretary again, he told him 'that the king's pleasure was changed from the 12 miles, to forbid him the Court.' Since, the duke of Lauderdale, in company of the archbishop of St Andrews, and the bishop of Salisbury, said 'he would push the punishment farther.' That, in 1672, he attended the duke of Lauderdale, at Holy-wood House, to intercede for some conventiclers, his kindred, and told him 'he feared if the security was great against them now in the Dutch war, there might be rebellion.' The duke of Lauderdale replied 'he could wish that those rogues would rebel, that he might send for some Irish Papists to suppress them.' As to the matter of the Scotch army, he is free to speak of what others were present at, as well as himself; but what passed between the Duke of Lauderdale and himself, desired to be excused till the utmost extremity."

Address for the Removal of the Duke of Lauderdale.] April 23. The commons agreed upon the following Address to the king, for the removal of the Duke of Lauderdale:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, with humble thankfulness, acknowledge your majesty's care for the safety of your people, in calling us together at this time to consult of the best means for the preservation of our religion and properties; and though we have great cause to rest assured of the continuance of your majesty's gracious disposition towards us, yet we find, upon a serious examination of the state of this kingdom, that there are great jealousies risen from some late proceedings, in the hearts of your subjects, that some persons, in great employment under your majesty, have fomented designs contrary to the interest both of your maj. and your people, intending to deprive us of our ancient rights and liberties, that thereby they might the more easily introduce the Popish religion, and an arbitrary form of government over us, to the ruin and destruction of the whole kingdom.—Amongst those who are at present employed under your majesty, we have just reason to accuse, for a promoter of such designs, the duke of Lauderdale, lately created earl of Guilford; because we have had it testified in our house, by several of our members, that in the hearing before the council, of the case of Mr. Peuystone Whalley, who had committed Mr. John James, contrary to your majesty's Declaration of the 15th of March, 1671, he, the said duke did openly affirm, in the presence of your maj. sitting in council, and before divers of your subjects then attending there, 'That your majesty's Edicts ought to be obeyed, for your majesty's Edicts are equal with laws, and ought to be observed in the first place,' thereby, as much as in him lay, justifying the said Declaration, and the proceedings thereupon, and declaring his inclination to arbitrary counsels in terror of your good people.—And we are farther confirmed in this opinion by two late Acts of parliament, of a very strange and dangerous nature, which we have observed amongst the printed statutes of the Kingdom of Scotland; the first whereof was in the third session of the first parliament, held there under your majesty, c. 25. And the other in your majesty's 2nd parliament, c. 3. The like whereof have never passed since the union of the crowns, and are directly contrary to the intention of an Act passed here in the 4th of king James, for the better abolition of all memory of hostility, and the dependencies between England and Scotland, and for the repressing of occasions of discords and disorders in time to come; and of a like Act, passed about the same time in the kingdom of Scotland, by force of which said late acts there is a Militia settled in that kingdom of 80,000 foot, and 3000 horse, who are obliged to be in readiness to march into any part of this kingdom for any service 'wherein your majesty's honour, authority, and greatness, may be concerned, and are to obey such orders and directions as they shall from time to time receive from the privy council there.' By colour of which general words we conceive this realm may be liable to be invaded, under any pretence whatsoever. And this hath been done, as we apprehend, principally by the procurement of the said duke, he having, all the time of those transactions, been principally secretary of the said kingdom, and chiefly entrusted with the administration of affairs of state there; and himself commissioner for holding the parliament at the time of passing the latter of the said acts, whereby the providing of the said horse and foot is effectually imposed upon the said kingdom, and this extraordinary power vested in the privy council there: and we conceive we have just reason to apprehend the ill consequences of so great and unusual a power, especially while the affairs of that kingdom are managed by the said duke, who hath manifested himself a person of such pernicious principles.—We do therefore, in all humility, implore your sacred majesty, considering how universal a fame and clamour of the said misdemeanours runneth openly through all your realm, That for the ease of the hearts of your people, who are possessed with extreme grief and sorrow to see your maj. thus abused, and the kingdom endangered, that your maj. would graciously be pleased to remove the said duke from all his employments, and from your majesty's presence and councils for ever; as being a person obnoxious and dangerous to the government."

Dr. Burnet's Examination respecting the Duke.] Lord Carendish informed the house of one Hamilton who held a Thesis at Leyden, of a strange nature, against the present government, 'De Aerario publicæ necessitatibus,' for which the duke of Lauderdale procured him to be knighted, and he was presented with 500*l.* for it; and had an office given him of secretary of the inspections in Ireland: would have Dr. Burnet called in, who is at the door, and interrogated about it.

Sir Nich. Carew. An arbitrary duke may cause Dr. Burnet to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, when we are up, for informing us: therefore, as we may punish Dr. Burnet, if he refuses to speak his knowledge of what we shall ask him, so desires the house may protect him, if he rightly informs them.

Mr. Vaughan. Dr. Burnet comes under as high an obligation before us, next an oath, that can be: you cannot indeed extort a question from him, but you may punish him for refusing to answer what you shall interrogate him.

Sir Nich. Carew would have him told the power you have.

Sir Tho. Lee moves that you mention the words that fell from him at the committee who drew the Address for Removal of the duke of Lauderdale, which are the occasion of his being sent for hither.

Dr. Burnet was brought to the bar. Then the Speaker admonished him, That he was sent for to speak his knowledge to what he should be interrogated. He then was asked about the words which fell from him at the committee, and told the power the house had to punish him, if he refused to answer, or prevaricated.

Dr. Burnet then said 'That when he was sent for to the committee he told them, what others knew as well as himself he would declare, but humbly begged pardon if he did not inform the committee what passed in private discourse betwixt himself and the duke; there having been some difference between him and the duke, it might be thought done in revenge: I would willingly prevent ill things: but, with all humbleness in the world, begs pardon of the house for his silence, and submits it to the sense of the house.'—Then the Speaker asked his knowledge about sir Robert Hamilton's Thesis at Leyden, 'De Aerario publicæ necessitatibus.' Burnet said, 'he had not read it till within these eight days.' And withdrew.

Sir Nich. Carew. You have heard Burnet's answer, and desires the opinion of the house to his declaring the discourse betwixt him and the duke of Lauderdale: he believes it to be something of a high nature: would call him in to declare what he knows, which, if he refuses, would send him to the Tower.

Sir John Hamner. It is an ill precedent for a man to be put upon declaring private discourse: would not have him sent for in.

Sir Wm. Hickman. This is not a private matter: it concerns the public, and would have him sent for in.

Mr. Sacheverell fears that Burnet comes a fishing to know whether you will have any from him. If the matter he knows be dangerous, he ought to reveal it; if not, he is in no danger, and of which you are to judge.

Mr. Vaughan. The common safety is the cause. Counsellors reveal their secrets in their closets, not in the streets. 'That it is not for Burnet's honour to say what he knows,' is no argument, when he seemed to insinuate something more he had to say: for the danger of the discourse betwixt him and the duke he is no judge of.

Dr. Burnet then was again called in. And the Speaker told him, 'That the house was not at all satisfied with his answer, but believes he knows something important that fell from this lord, which, if he concealed, he must expect to be proceeded against accordingly.'

Dr. Burnet then said, "He shall always pay obedience to the authority of this house, as becomes him. He never heard the duke of Lauderdale say 'That he intended to bring the Scotch army into England,' but the duke once asked him, 'Whether he thought Scotland would assist the king, if he needed them, about supporting the Declaration?' To which he indefinitely answered, 'He thought they would not.' The duke replied, 'He thought they would, and that they would bring a great many with them.' This discourse passed betwixt them the first Saturday in Sept. 1673, in the duke's dressing room, at the Gatehouse, in Whitehall.—He withdrew.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Burnet tells us, this was the substance of his discourse with the duke; but would have him called in to inform them the circumstances likewise, which will much enlighten the thing.

Mr. Vaughan would know whether he came casually to the duke, or was sent for by him.

Col. Strangways would have him asked, what Declaration he means?

Sir Eliah Harcoy would have him asked, what he does know as to other matters?

Mr. Garroway. About that time he came over out of Scotland, you were about the Declaration: if you have a mind to the thread of all the counsellors that advised this Declaration, possibly he may give you some light: would know of him whether he was sent for, or whether this was an accidental discourse.

Sir Rob. Howard would have repented to him what he has already said, that he may explain himself farther.

The Clerk, who was ordered to form what Dr. Burnet had given an account of at the bar, did read it to him, which Burnet did avow, and is as follows: "That coming into England, out of Scotland, the first Saturday in Sept. 1673, he went to visit the duke of Lauderdale, at his lodgings, over the Gatehouse in Whitehall, where the duke and he discoursed of the affairs of this nation, and of Scotland, and particularly concerning the proceedings of parliament touching the Declaration for suspending penal laws, in matters ecclesiastical, and being afterwards asked, 'Whether if Scotland being called in to assist the king in supporting the said declaration, they would assist him or not?' he answered 'He thought they would not.' But the duke replied, 'He believed that they would, and that their coming into England would bring a great many.' That the duke asking him of the affairs of Scotland, he answered, 'The people of Scotland, that were at such a distance, could not imagine what to think of the king's Speech, and what was afterwards done concerning the Declaration.' Whereto the duke replied 'They have all forsaken the king except myself and lord Clifford.'"

* The Bishop's own account of this affair is as follows: "The house of commons fell upon duke Lauderdale, and those who knew what had passed between him and me, moved that I should be examined before a committee. I was brought before them. I told them how I had been commanded out of town. But though that was illegal, yet since it had been let fall, it was not insisted on. I was next examined concerning his design of arming the Irish Papists. I said, 'I, as well as others, had heard him say, He wished the Presbyterians in Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE LORD TREASURER DANNY.

April 26. Mr. Russel said, He was glad to hear, on Saturday last, an account that the Irish Papists to cut their throats.' I was next examined concerning the design of bringing a Scottish army into England. I desired to be excused as to what had passed in private discourse, to which I thought I was not bound to answer, unless it were high treason. They pressed me long; and I would give them no other answer; so they all concluded that I knew great matters; and reported this specially to the house. Upon that I was sent for, and brought before the house. I stood upon it as I had done at the committee, 'That I was not bound to answer; that nothing had passed that was high treason, and as to all other things, I did not think myself bound to discover them.' I said farther, I knew duke Lauderdale was apt to say things in a heat, which he did not intend to do; and since he had used myself so ill, I thought myself the more obliged not to say any thing that looked like revenge for what I had met with from him.' I was brought four times to the bar. At last I was told, the house thought they had a right to examine into every thing that concerned the safety of the nation, as well as into matters of treason: and they looked on me as bound to satisfy them. Otherwise they would make me feel the weight of their heavy displeasure, as one who concealed what they thought was necessary to be known.' Upon this I yielded, and gave an account of the discourse formerly mentioned†. They laid great weight on this, and renewed their address against duke Lauderdale."

† At vol. i. p. 355 of his History, where it is thus related, "At my coming to court, duke Lauderdale took me into his closet, and asked me the state of Scotland. I upon that gave a very punctual and true account of it. He seemed to think that I aggravated matters, and asked me, 'If the king should need an army from Scotland to tame those in England, whether that might be depended on?' I told him 'certainly not.' The commons in the southern parts were all presbyterians, and the nobility thought they had been ill used and were generally discontented, and only waited for an occasion to show it.' He said 'he was of another mind: the hope of the spoil of England would fetch them all in.' I answered, 'The king was ruined if ever he trusted to that.' And I added, 'That with relation to other more indifferent persons, who might be otherwise ready enough to push their fortunes without any anxious enquiries into the grounds they went on, yet even these would not trust the king, since he had so lately said, he would stick to his Declaration, and yet had so soon after given it up.' He said 'Hinc illæ lachrymæ: but the king was forsaken in that matter, for none stuck to him but lord Clifford and himself.' And then he set himself into a fit of railing at lord Shaftsbury."

Nary was in so good a condition; but thinks all we give is too little when the Treasury is managed to set up private men and their heirs. The earl of Danby has acted in it in a high and arbitrary manner, and disposed of the treasure as he pleased: and has publicly declared at the Treasury 'that a new proclamation is as good as an old law,' moves, 'that he may be removed from the king and his employments,' and that an Impeachment be drawn against him.

Sir S. Barnardiston has no malice against this lord, but if the king be well served, he cares not by whom. He has Articles to present the house against him for his ill management of the treasury, and his arbitrary proceedings in it.

The Speaker. The nature of the Articles must be first opened, before delivered by the orders of the house.

Sir S. Barnardiston opens them. They contain many miscarriages in the management of the Treasury. And that he should there say, 'that a new proclamation is better than an old law,' causing a person to be banished that prosecuted, &c. And his arbitrary proceedings in the marriage of his second son to Mrs. Hyde.

Mr. Powle always had, and still has, an unwillingness to accuse great men, it looking like faction; they being more exposed in their actions than other men, are thereby more liable to exception; what he does is out of discharge of his duty here: is not for removing of one man to mend the prospect of another: all things are managed in the Exchequer by him by colourable and fictitious practices: the Exchequer constitutions are very excellent; all things managed there must be by persons sworn, and are equally liable to the king's debts, as if persons that acknowledged a statute staple: the checks and controuls there are perpetual evidence of what is done, no money being paid or received, but a record is kept of it: but this Lord Treasurer has removed the money into other hands, that thereby no record may be kept of it: by this means the money is got into private hands, without record for it in the Exchequer: by this means, no enquiry, either for the king or the subject, can be made, what becomes of the money. Formerly the trade crept in by small sums, which made way for greater; but now by whole sums, tallies by anticipation entered; but he has gone farther: such a patent he has obtained for his office as no age yet ever saw, and hopes no future age ever will see. There is a patent granted for the customs, but he passes it to another to keep it in his hands, till his order for disposing of it, the better to invest himself in them. The patent for the excise makes the account to be passed in the Exchequer, or else where. In the preamble of that patent it is said to be done by the advice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (sir John Duncombe, (who at present is not here) but doubts not he will truly acquaint you whether by his advice. The taking these two great branches of the revenue, is like a steward who takes all the domains into his own hands, and leaves the lord of the manor a few tenements: by this way of farming, he takes all he can into his hands, and disposes of it how he pleases. Here have been extraordinary advances upon these farms, besides the ordinary revenue spent: but is the fleet repaired, or debts paid, or stores laid in? All this spent without applying any thing to that use: the patents are on record, and may be seen by any body: the punishment of one great officer of state, in such cases as these, is better than any laws you can make: first, let us settle the king at home, and then let us look abroad: and he will undertake the proof of these Articles himself rather than they shall go without.

Mr. Garroway sees the Charge against the Lord Treasurer wherein he is concerned in several things, viz. 'The precharging the revenue of the customs with sums of money,' but he that sees what is transmitted to the Exchequer from thence, will not find that Article against the Lord Treasurer so considerable: except some pensions, does not know any thing charged on the Exchequer account, viz. prince Rupert's pension, the bed-chamber men's, and the allowance to the commissioners of the customs. On his cognizance, knows no more: but whether the house will take cognizance of proceedings in the Exchequer, where the Lord Treasurer of England is so trusted, and when he has consulted with the king's counsel in the drawing his patent; will you let no man sit easily in his employments? When you consider his power, he has a vast one by law: and he would see the patents, before you make his actions crimes: when you come to see whether this patent was surreptitiously gotten, and whether sir John Duncombe knows of this patent, then you will be better informed to give your judgments. For that charge of the Lord Treasurer's saying, 'a new proclamation is better than an old law,' remembers the charge against lord chief justice Keeling about Magna Charta. If interlocutory discourses may be wrested, there is an end of all conversation. For the charge about 'banishing the man mentioned,' he knows the Lord Treasurer's tenderness so much in his actions, that when the commissioners of the customs had turned out a man that had an office in the customs, for 'misdemeanour, they were to justify it before the Lord Treasurer. For the charge 'of the marriage of his second son to Mrs. Hyde,' he has heard discourses, but knows nothing of it. If there be any thing in it, it is cognizable at law, and why should we take up the cudgels for another man, without that man's petitioning us about it? If he can have no redress at law, let him come hither: would have the patents seen here, before you proceed any farther.

Sir Rd. Temple. In all cases, he has observed the Treasurer to take the best advice he could, and has made the law his rule in all things within his observation. The customs were never so little charged as in this Lord Treasurer's time. For the other charges against him, which are not public, we do not the nation service in charging these little things, which have more sound than substance: would appoint another day for viewing the patent, and farther examination of the matter.

Sir Nich. Curew. Agrees not with Temple's motion for another day, he would not have any criminal made innocent here, nor innocent, criminal: would have the Articles read, one by one, and so receive them or reject them, as they shall be made out.

Sir John Coventry has an honour for this great lord, but has it for no man that would alter the government: the Articles are new to him, but doubts not but in due time they will be made good, and that some members will make them every one good. If you find matter in them, punish him, if not, clear him.

Lord Cavendish hears few say that the Articles are not a ground of Impeachment against this lord: it may be the first article is doubtful in law.

Mr. Vaughan. At the first sight, these Articles are of a high nature: he thinks the persons that have undertaken them, have a liard part to manage, and it has been ill fortune to accuse men in this house, since to accuse is to strengthen court parties: for the Articles read, men must give their opinions of them with their judgments, and must come with all their judgments.

Mr. King would take time to consider of these Articles, and not proceed hastily upon them: he has known great good the Lord Treasurer has done: he has paid off the navy and army: these Articles are high, and should be well considered of.

Earl of Ogle moves to put off the debate for two or three days: is sure that no such thing as is alleged the Lord Treasurer should say about the proclamation, was ever said in the council.

Sir Tho. Meres. Here are Articles brought you, and men undertake to prove them. This was thought sufficient to impeach in lord Clarendon's case: but now people are disproving them before they are proved: at this rate, every man will be acquitted that shall be accused: joins with Vaughan's motion, 'That whoever is next bring the Articles as these are,' and he will go to the lords bar with them: putting the thing off to another day, is but a bye way to lose time, to destroy it: let the patents be brought hither to-morrow.

Sir Courtney Poole speaks to the method of proceeding. This is a great crime, and a great man: supposes that those gentlemen that brought them in, know how to prove them, and are prepared to do it; and that others that are not, may have time to consider of them: moves it.

Mr. Powle. He has no intention to engage you in a hasty vote; but he thought these alleged, great crimes: would have a day appointed to consider, and the patents brought, and let the officers of the exchequer compare them with former grants: if they be found legal, shall comply as much as any man

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Many things must go to the making a man so criminal as fit for notice in this house; they ought to be great. Sometimes a minister of state, in favour, carries things higher than other men have done in their place: would not have the house engaged in that which they may not go fairly off from.

Sir Tho. Lee. There must be divers questions before you come to impeachment. He would do nothing to draw an ill precedent upon this house, for any man's sake. All agree that the impeachment when passed, must be carried to the lords bar, and you are at your liberty for your method of proceeding: members undertake the proof of the Articles, and will not you accept them? Then comes the whole question, Whether upon the proofs you have matter to proceed to impeachment? This way you must go, and have always done, unless you will lose all method of proceeding: the man is equal to him, in all respects.

Sir Cha. Harbord. If there be no such thing as these Articles, you give a wrong judgment: he has had the honour to serve the king under seven or eight Lord Treasurers, and by the duty of his place he is to advise with all things relating to the revenue: he has endeavoured all his time to save the Treasury, but sees he cannot do it: so far as he has been acquainted with the Lord Treasurer he has not found his understanding defective in it; and has wondered at it, that a young man, and a country gentleman, should understand it so soon. In this business would go as faithfully and as truly as any man: as he has charity for the gentleman that brought in these Articles, so he knows many of these things to be otherwise: would have you view the state of the revenue first, and, if proper, then would enter into the merits of the cause: he can disprove many of these things alleged.

Mr. Garroway. He thinks it for the interest of the Treasurer that you should proceed in the articles: but would wave that article 'of the Treasury,' till the patents are viewed, and would have that done to-morrow.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. You cannot do a greater right to the Treasurer and your own justice than to proceed: he cannot give his judgment that any of the Articles are criminal, though proved: the proceedings of the Treasury must be compared with former times: you are not ripe for the thing now; therefore moves for Friday.

Sir Cha. Wheeler doubts not but as common fame leads this matter, it will be considered on the right hand as well as on the left; he believes the Treasury will appear as well to-morrow as the navy did the other day: would lose no time: he hears it said 'that things come to be disproved before they are proved; when one side says, 'money is paid,' the other 'not paid,' no wonder; he believes there is not one penny paid out of the Exchequer, but by order: if commissions have ran, legally and fairly, higher than formerly, if one Lord Treasurer by commission has more power given him by his patent than ordinary, it is not illegal.

Sir Edmund Jennings would have no time lost, and is confident that if the noble lord concerned was here present, he would be of that mind: would postpone that first Article, and proceed to the rest, and doubts not but the lord, upon examination of the whole matter, will rather deserve the thanks of the house for his good management of the Treasury, than their accusation.

Col. Titus. If the Treasurer has offended, it must be in the male-administration of his place in the revenue, and until you inspect that, would defer the consideration of the Articles.

Col. Birch. If any thing had been done amiss in the excise, would have been so faithful a servant to the Treasurer as to have told him of it before he told the house: that the Treasury is gone is certain, but as to the Treasurer's being in fault, hopes he will come out purified like gold: if the Treasurer was here present, believes he would not have this business go over: remembers that in lord Clarendon's case, before he gave his consent to impeach him, he would have the Articles proved; and if they are not so now, he will be of the same mind he was of then: would have them read, head by head, and would have some light into them presently.

Mr. Sachsewell moves, as to the method of your proceeding: you must first judge whether these Articles are criminal, abstractedly proved, and, though so judged, you must consider, whether they are such as you will proceed upon.

Sir Robert Howard. You must consider whether the thing done be that, or no, and those, crimes, or no: then your time is to give judgment, whether the things done are these crimes, or no.

Mr. Attorney Montagu. Strange that he should be so conversant in the Exchequer, and yet know not the least of this charge: for the patents, they must be seen, and for the charge of the proclamation, &c. no man walks by rule of law in his place more than this lord Treasurer: would have some short time appointed for the proof of the Articles.—After further debate, the house agreed to proceed in the business to-morrow.

Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Danby.] April 27. The Articles against the Lord Treasurer Danby, were this day delivered, more fully drawn up, by sir S. Barnardiston, and were as follows:

A Charge or Impeachment against Thomas earl of Danby, Lord High Treasurer of England; containing several Offences, Crimes, and Misdemeanors of a very high nature.

I. "That the said earl hath overthrown and violated the ancient course and constitution of the Exchequer, by perverting the method of receipts, payments, and accounts, contrary to law; whereby the king's revenue is put into confusion, and a wasteful way of expence; to the destruction of his majesty's credit; and exposing his majesty's treasure and revenue to private bargains and corruptions; and hath ingrossed into his own hands, the sole power of disposing almost all the king's revenue; laying aside the chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer, and other officers: whereby the usual and safe government of his majesty's affairs relating to his revenue, and all checks and comptrolls are avoided.—II. That, a suit of law being intended about the Marriage of the daughter of sir Tho. Hyde, the said earl caused one Mr. Brandly, a principal witness in the said case, to be arrested by an extraordinary warrant from one of the secretaries of state; and to be kept for some time in close custody; during which time the agents of the said earl did labour the said Mr. B. by threatenings and promises of reward, not to declare the truth: and at midnight he was brought, and examined before his majesty, upon oath; where the said earl was present, and assisting: whereupon the said Mr. B. did, by the means aforesaid, deliver in a testimony, contrary to his own knowledge, and against his conscience; he being then in duress: by which illegal practices his maj. was highly abused, the parties concerned in the said law suit greatly prejudiced, and the truth suppressed, to the manifest obstruction of justice: and all this was done with an intent to procure the said heiress to be married to the second son of the said earl.—III. That the earl hath received very great sums of money, besides the ordinary revenue, which have been wastefully spent, and far greater sums than ever issued for secret service, without account; the king's debts remaining unpaid, the stores unfurnished, and the navy unrepaired, to the discredit and hazard of the king and kingdom.—IV. That the said earl hath violated the rights and properties of the people, by stopping without authority, their legal payments, due in the exchequer.—V. That though the office of Lord High Treasurer of England is always very full of great and necessary employments, yet the said earl hath also assumed to himself the management of the Irish affairs, which were in precedent times dispatched always by the secretaries, and passed in council; thereby interrupting the said secretary's office; and neglecting his own; and subtly enabling himself, the better to convert a very great sum of money out of the Irish revenues, to his own private advantage.—VI. That the said earl hath procured great gifts and grants from the crown, whilst under great debts, by warrants countersigned by himself.—VII. That about the 4th of Dec. 1674, at the hearing of a cause in the Treasury-Chamber, some Acts of parliament, now in force, were urged against a Proclamation, and contrary to what his lordship aimed at; whereupon the said earl, in contempt of the law, uttered this arbitrary expression, 'That a new Proclamation is better than an old Act'; several of his majesty's subjects being present: and, upon his lordship's report to the privy council, the person in question, being a foreigner, and not obeying such proclamation, but pursuing his right at law, was banished the kingdom."

Resolved, &c. "That as to the Charge presented against Thomas earl of Danby lord high treasurer of England, this house will proceed head by head; and hear such proofs, instances, and circumstances relating to each Article, as are requisite to an Impeachment."

The Impeachment dropped.] On the 27th and 30th of this month, and the 3rd of May, the house heard severally Evidence and examined Witnesses; and, upon the question put on each Article, "Whether any fit matter doth appear in the Examination of this Article to impeach the Lord Treasurer?" They were all passed in the negative. *

Debate on the Bill to incapacitate Parliament-men from taking Places.] April 29. A Bill was read the second time to incapacitate persons from taking any Offices of benefit, who are Parliament men, during parliament, and if any such persons be chosen, that election to be void. But the borough, or county, may choose the same person again, and that election stand good.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. He supposes 100 persons in this house that would lay down their lives for their country. It may be, some few persons in this house are prisoners in the King's Bench. But this is an extraordinary case: persons that have been with the king in banishment, and they, at the king's return, for want, could not buy places of advantage, whilst other men that staid at home grew rich: would have posts come upon particular men, and let it be laid on every man's door, but rather would have it got upon honour: this Bill is a great reflection upon us all, and, without cause, it creates a perfect incapacity in a man to serve his prince, and country, at one time. After all the inconveniencies he has had these 30 years, thinks he should be highly tempted if he take an office: that gentlemen should have places of 4 or 5,000*l.* per. ann. and those that have been ruined have none! Why should not those have offices that have suffered, as well as others? Consider the temptations of being disloyal in the late times. The king may be willing to give a man an office (and he is a great man that would refuse it)—A man that has done ill, that the king might not remove that office to a Parliament man, that has done well, and deserves it: strange that the king should be so confined! No age wherein men were of greater loyalty than this, and now, for a few Parliament men that have offices, to cast a reflection upon the whole assembly!

* "Whether the Charge against the Lord Treasurer was held frivolous or malicious, whether sufficient proof was wanting to make it good, or whether he had more friends in the house than his royal master, on examining the foundation, the whole building fell to the ground. It must be owned our lights fail us in this matter. Bp. Burnet contents himself with saying, 'The majority were for him.' Marvell is express, 'That he got off by high bribing.' Nothing is easier to be said, nothing is harder to be proved." Ralph.

Sir Rob. Holt. This Bill is in direct terms, that no man that serves the king shall be capable of being a Parliament man.

Sir Tho. Lee is a great enemy to garbling the house, as he has heard some say this Bill is. It only leaves it to a man's choice, to stay here, or go home, and that when he has an office. There are many changes in 10 or 12 years, when a parliament sits so long. Men are altered in some capacity or other. This Bill relates to no man's office now in being; knows not but that Parliament-men may be compelled to be sheriffs; though, indeed, in time of privilege it is true we may not go into the county to attend, yet knows not when in prorogation you may not be compelled to it. For the reason he has heard from Wheeler, this Bill will make the king look that popular names may not be an inducement to chuse officers from hence, and so may not be deceived.

Sir Courtney Poole. This Bill is a garbling the parliament, and a new modelling the government, from a monarchy into a commonwealth.

Col. Strangways observes that few are in office, that formerly have served the king: neutral persons most. The guards are mercenary, and therefore dangerous. He that has endured all the heat of the day, would have him receive his penny too, but is for no more. Would not have those shut the door after them that have offices. Never was poor price, not kingdom, abused as ours is. No mariners paid, and yet those that bought their debentures at 4 and 5*s.* per pound, presently paid. For the danger he incurs and his service, he deserves an office. (For office of profit he desires none.) As for the office of sheriff, no man will desire it, unless for Yorkshire. Would have all that have offices leave them, and be chosen to them again; and the king have liberty to remove them, and take them again: as that of Parliament-man in this Bill.

Mr. Sec. Coventry would willingly quit his office, if it hinders him from serving the king and his country here. Justices of the peace, and the office of deputy-lieutenants require attendance in the country, though those offices are excepted in the Bill. Would not for any office, or place whatsoever, but discharge his conscience here. Some hardships will arise in this Bill upon men: Dimmock, Champion to the king by descent, must not be chosen a parliament man. That any thing should force a man to a new election, that forfeits it not, is very hard; whereas, by parity of reason, if his office incapacitates a man once, it should incapacitate him again. Any man may enter into a bond to his corporation, of 1,000*l.* when he takes an office, after being chosen Parliament-man, to be forfeited. Is not your grace frequently sent for the gentlemen of the long robe, into the Hall to attend your service? You are pleased to make use of the privy counsellors to carry your messages to the king. Formerly they had cushions to sit on, but were thrown out of doors, and must they be thrown out of doors too? This Bill is not consistent with the government, and he would lay it by.

Mr. Vaughan. Though we are loyal, yet there have been parties in the parliaments, court, and country; and, in many things, have desired to advise with their country, before they give consent. Men have varied in their principles, and it is natural for men to do so. Where an office is inconsistent with the service of the country in the person that has it, it is reasonable that place should chuse another person, and where that place has no jealousy to think they shall not be well served, it is for the honour of the person to be chosen again. Moves for commitment of the bill.

Serj. Maynard. If you make a law against such bribes as are given to come into a place to serve here, you would do full as much as by this bill.

Col. Titus. Never had any place at court, but what he has had these 25 years. Weighing all circumstances, he is against commitment of the bill: there are reasons against the right of the subject: no reason why any man, but a fool or a knave, should be incapacitated to sit here. This is some invasion of the king's prerogative. If the king thinks a man qualified for an office, that is as much as to say 'You will not trust him that the country trusts.' You may hereby put the king upon a necessity of putting unfit men into offices. Suppose an admiral at sea, either this man must not go to sea, or you turn him out for serving his country. These splendid and extraordinary things never yet did good. After the Long Parliament had passed the Self-denying Ordinance, they never did deny themselves any thing.

Sir Wm. Coventry differs from sir Thomas Meres in his motion for adjourning the debate. The hand that did it (himself) will stand, with all submission, to the judgment of the house in its determination, with the same heart he brought it in with. The Bill does not provide that great officers shall not serve the king. Those that have offices may be the safer in them, and those that have no places shall not get them from them that have. The old way was, men were chosen into parliament, after they had been privy counsellors, and hopes so still, to be the better able to serve the country, and place they are chosen for. You are told 'it is hard for an admiral;' and 'that the Bill is not large enough for the militia officers,' which may be answered: and all the others are no objections for throwing out the bill. We have served here a great while, and, it may be, his corporation would not chuse him again because he has no office, that another may serve them better: consider what may be the consequence. If qualifications change—and not only absence may make us ignorant of the affairs of the place we serve for, but our presence here may do it to the office also. Edicts may meet with a stop in the parliament of Paris, in their verification, but seldom a defeat. This case, without this bill, may be so here. In 13 Edw. iii, a writ was prayed that none of that parliament should be viscount, (sheriff) or other minister, and so it went out. Here is no injury to the person by this bill; if he have no mind to the penalty of being chosen again, if he have an office, he may chuse what he will do. Whatsoever fate you give the bill, he does highly acquiesce in your judgment, and believes, if the bill does not pass, it may revive in future parliaments.

Sir Henry Ford. We find, by experience, that offices may be hurtful in parliament-time, but we find that popularity has done much more hurt.

Mr. Finch. Those, possibly, may speak to the sense, though not the acceptance of the house: the consequence of this bill is, that the service of the crown is incompatible with that here; when you consider a man so that he has betrayed one trust, to accept of another, he will come to his corporation, to be chosen again with an ill grace. We are not to pull feathers thus from the king. There was a time when we had wages for our service in parliament. If no suspicion upon a man then, why must an officer be suspected now that he gets by it? If thought necessary that he should have an estate that is chosen a parliament-man, by increasing it he is the better qualified; having the better stake, and the more reason to support his property. In that writ mentioned of Edw. iii, there is a clause, 'that no lawyer should be chosen a parliament man.' The character of that parliament was, 'Indoctum Parliamentum.' And lord Coke observes, 'that not one good law was made in that parliament.' And if we should now say no lawyer, nor officer, should be a parliament-man, it is in effect to say, no person that understands the business of the nation shall be. For business of the country, gentlemen may have experience, but for affairs of state they must be informed from officers of state—Self-denial, is not so plausible an argument for this bill. If the king knows not able men here, where shall he send, hue and cry, after them in the country? The consequence will be, you must have all officers of State out of the Lords house.

Sir Wm. Coventry sees that the sense of the house is against the Bill; and whether 'rejected' or 'not ingrossed' he the question, is indifferent; but the country would think better of it, if the question were 'not ingrossed' than 'rejected.'—The Bill on a division was rejected, 145 to 113.

May 5. Resolved, "That an Address be presented to his majesty that he would be pleased to issue forth his Proclamation for the speedy Recalling those his subjects that are now in the service of the French king, and for the preventing any more from going over into that service."

Resolved, "That a farther Address be presented to his majesty concerning the duke of Lauderdale:" (the question for adjourning being carried in the negative,) 119 to 99.

The King's Answer to the Address against the Duke of Lauderdale.] May 7. Mr. Secretary Williamson* acquainted the house, That, having received their commands, to know his majesty's pleasure when he would be attended with a farther Address concerning the duke of Lauderdale; that his maj. had been acquainted with it: but before that he received the order of the house to know his majesty's pleasure, his majesty had given direction for an Answer to the first Address, which he delivered in writing, and the same was read as follows:

"C. R. His maj. has considered of the Address against the duke of Lauderdale, and the Reasons accompanying it. As to the acts of parliament, mentioned to have been passed in Scotland, his maj. observes; that the first of those acts was in the year 1663; which was long before the duke of Lauderdale was his majesty's commissioner in that kingdom: the latter was in pursuance of the former. As to the words, by the time of Mr. Penistone Whaley's case, his maj. perceives, that if they had been spoken, they must have been spoken before the last act of General Pardon: and his maj. being sensible how great a satisfaction and security the inviolable preservation of the former act of indemnity and oblivion has been to all his subjects, cannot but apprehend the dangerous consequences of inquiring into any thing that has been pardoned by an act of General Pardon, lest the example of that might give men cause to fear their security under the first Act of Oblivion."

The King's Answer to the Address for recalling the English Forces.] May 8. Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered the King's Answer to the Address about recalling the English Forces out of France; which was as follows:

* "In a letter from sir Wm. Temple to his father, dated March 27, 1674, notice is taken of a bargain, which had been made between lord Arlington and sir Joseph Williamson, for the Secretary's place: the latter was to give 6000*l.* for it, and the former was to resign it, as soon as lord St. Albans should be willing to part with the Chamberlain's Staff, for which lord Arlington had agreed to pay him 10,000*l.* On the 1st of Sept. this bargain was executed; and on the 14th, the public was informed by the Gazette (No. 420.) that those two removes were made 'in recompence of the long and faithful services of sir Joseph Williamson, as a clerk of the council; and of lord Arlington, as secretary of state.'" Ralph.

"C. R. His majesty having received an Address from the house of commons, concerning the Recalling such of his subjects as are soldiers in the French king's service, hath thought fit to return this Answer: That such troops of his subjects as were in the most Christian king's service, before the last treaty made with the States General of the United Provinces, and were not, by that, to be recalled, as they are at present become considerable in their numbers, so his majesty conceiveth that they cannot be recalled without derogation to his honour and dignity, and prejudice to the peace he now enjoyeth, and hath publicly professed to maintain with all his neighbours. But as to the prohibiting the going over of any more, his maj. will renew his Proclamation, and use all other effectual means both to forbid and hinder it."

The farther consideration of his majesty's Answer was adjourned to the 10th.

Debate on the King's Answer.] May 10. The house proceeded to take the above Answer into consideration.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Here is an Answer from the king: desires that what is said upon it may not be thought to reflect upon the king, but on the authors of this Answer. He thinks it a very ill one; so highly prejudicial to the people, and destructive to the king! Would clear the matter of fact: the Answer is, 'Such of his subjects in the most Christian king's service.' It is no unusual thing to call him 'the French king' in parliament; but he rests not upon that. Would be informed, whether by the late peace we made with Holland, the king is left free, and at full liberty, to keep these men actually in that king's service. How contrary would it be to his honour, if against no treaty, nor article (fettered) to recal them! Under that Proclamation mentioned, all this mischief is grown. The number of English forces there is now great; 8000 men at least. The duke of Monmouth's regiment, and the Irish, go a great way in the number, besides the Scotch. Great numbers going into France is no breach of the treaty; but into Holland, is a breach. Would have that cleared. If we thank the king for this Message, we do it for sending men over into France.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. That treaty does not command the forces to stay; but it is enough to tell you, that by that treaty the king is not obliged to recal those troops. It is no error to call the k. of France 'the most Christian King,' as all the world besides call him. He tells you, on his reputation, by all he knows, there are not above 2000 of these forces in all. The king, besides, tells you of his Proclamation, and 'will use all other effectual means to prevent more going over.' Is this such an abuse to the nation, and such a horrid thing? This is an advice to the king, in a thing he is entrusted with. This is not to be murmured at, but thanked for, to give you such an Answer, against his prerogative. Do you believe that the king, in making peace with Holland, did write no respectful letter to the king of France? And just at that hour of the king's mediation of peace, and ambassadors for it, to do such a partial act as to recal these men! Shall he be considerable neither on one side, nor the other, nor in mediatorship? Suppose the king was resolved to do it; it is not proper now. Cannot he keep a word, or a promise? What, if the king make a promise, and the h. of commons break it, of what value will it be for the future? If you desire a farther explanation of this Answer, you may. But he thinks it a great condescension in the king, as it is already.

Mr. Garroway observes many things to be debated, peace and war. The thing is lodged and he will not break into it, nor meddle with it. We are not ready yet for a conclusion of our opinions to this Answer. If we open the matter of fact, see how we contribute to France's greatness. The king's honour, crown, and dignity are concerned in it. If the Low Countries and Flanders should be conquered, knows not what our condition will be. We know of no obligation to the numbers of men in France, and so can say nothing to the recal of them. Moves to have the king's Answer debated in a Grand Committee.

Sir Tho. Littleton seconds the motion, to come the better to the right understanding of the matter. Coventry has yielded the matter, that no treaty does impose the staying of these forces on the king. If any thing falls from him, out of zeal to his country, desires pardon; but if we let those things go, we give the greatest blow both to our country and the confederates imaginable.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. What he said was, 'the Treaty of Holland obliged it not.'

Sir Tho. Clarges conceives, that where the king is dishonoured, and there is a contempt of his Proclamation, and a violation of his honour, we are concerned. The Message tells you, that 'the king has sent out his Proclamation to forbid all;' but, by letters from the ports, we are informed that recruits go frequently over into France, 3 James, ch. 31. 'No officer can go into any foreign service without taking the oaths of allegiance.' At Dover that has not been done; they go over as if they were to be instructed in the Popish religion, to our destruction; and by that law mentioned, 'bonds are to be entered into, and oaths (and all returned into the Exchequer) to practise nothing against that oath.' This going over is to the dishonour of the king, and danger of religion.

Col. Birch sees many that speak, crave grants of allowance: he has most need of any, and hopes he shall not be denied them: is for a Grand Committee: if this thing be well done hardly any thing else can be ill done. He agrees that war and peace are in the king's hand; but he thinks that in this business of the peace with Holland, the king asked the advice of this house. You are embarked in it, and the miscarriage will be the fault of this house: would not quarrel with any of our neighbours, but especially not with the great prince on the other side the water; but better now than at another time: while the people are under dissatisfactions, he knows no other way to satisfy them but in this house, and so way here, but in a Grand Committee.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. A peace there was advised in this house, but not this peace: the terms the king made himself, and he would not have Birch tell you what the articles are, or should be.

Sir Ch. Wheeler observes, that great things are brought into this house, and still prove but matter of enquiry. For the term of 'the French king' spoken of, when we have wars we say so of him, and what have we got by it? In all foreign affairs they come up to the title of 'the British king' with us. Of these men in the French service, he looks upon the Scotch guards as a thing particular to their nation, who have been in France sixty years at least in that capacity; the rest are the duke of Monmouth's regiment, and sir George Hamilton's; col. Churchill's regiment being reformed into the duke of Monmouth's (sometimes we are forced to be quit of the Irish, and now we must recal them.) He cannot inform himself, any way, of above 1000 horse: when you have made all these means to prevent their going over, idle fellows will go. [He was taken down to Order.]

The Speaker. It is disorderly to take a man down, before you know what he will say,

Sir Ch. Wheeler goes on. You can stop them no more than you can the exportation of wool: here came over German and French gentlemen of the horse, to buy horses; and there goes over, at least, a man to three horses; and so, many men under that pretence steal over. If there be not above 8000, how is the honour of the nation exposed! He fears the honour of the nation as much as another, but would have a reason for his fears.

Lord Cavendish. It is said 'there are not above 2000 English and Irish.' It is strange there should be no more. They won two battles for the French, the last summer, by their own confession, and are a number to do the like this summer: would go into a grand committee.

Sir Edw. Jennings. The king tells you, 'he will use all effectual means for preventing the going over of more men into France.' If that be so good an Answer, return thanks for that part of the Answer; and, when that is done, go into a grand committee to consider the rest.

Sir Tho. Meres. What part of the king's Answer will require a farther Address to the king, will be the subject-matter of the grand committee's debate. It may be, Thanks to his maj. will be a part; we know not: sees it contended, 'that the forces in France, before the Treaty, are not obliged to be recalled;' but the objection must be thoroughly understood at the committee. No man can say that there is any thing in our Address contrary to any treaty.

Mr. Waller. He has formerly seen how dear our meddling with peace and war has proved to us. We have no light nor measure at all in such things. All that comes to the king is from his own and foreign ambassadors. These enquiries have been very fatal and costly to us. The house, in the last Treaty with Holland, gave advice; and the king asked it. Now it falls out properly, to see how that advice has been infringed; followed, or not followed. It is the nation's glory to have the king the mediator of peace, and Christian commiseration requires it. The thing is of great weight, and would go into a grand committee.

Sir John Ernly. Since you have had a question firsted, and seconded, 'for Thanks for that part of the king's Speech, of his effectual care to prevent the going over of more forces,' you ought to put it.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Here are two questions; one, the main question, about Thanks, &c. and the other, for going into a Grand Committee. If the matter be opened, doubts not but the whole Answer will require your Thanks. Supposes the thing may be done in the house, as well as in the Grand Committee. He is but young in it, and leaves that question as you please.

Mr. Poole. To the first part of your Address you have a denial; to the second you have no Answer at all. There are several forces gone over since the Address: but men being sent away, and the thing depending, would therefore have it go to a grand committee.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. He has heard the king say, 'Have not the ports a standing order, to stop persons? Must he send them one every week?'

Mr. Hale. There are few in number, indeed, of these forces left, because they are most killed: he knows he saw upon the road 80 in a company: They laud at Boulogne, and will not laud at Calais, because in view of the packet-boats: the duke of Monmouth's regiment is recruited by these men, and Turenne's army had been lost without them; and it is said in France, 'they set the crown upon the king of France's head.' He has lately had opportunity to know it in France.

Mr. Vaughan. Your vote cannot make that to be, which naturally is not, viz. 'Thanks for the Answer, and that it is satisfactory.' Possibly there may be a league in the case, and the king's honour concerned; and when we come freely to debate it, in a Grand Committee, we lay aside all these considerations.

The House then resolved into a Grand Committee; sir Charles Harbord in the Chair.

Mr. Garroway. This is one of the serious-est businesses that ever was in the house: would do nothing in it, to involve the nation in a war; but it staggers him to hear the king's obligation named; but yet what that obligation is, not spoken of. Whether it be a treaty, or no; for what time, or on what condition, if declared, we may avoid that rock of a war. All we have told us is but a pennyworth of news in the Gazette every week. Sometimes we know things that they do not tell us. Let them set us up some marks whereby we shall not touch upon the king's honour, and they will be good guides to us for our debate. The king of France is ready to overrun us all, if his conquests go on.

Sir Rd. Temple. If the Proclamation recalls not these forces, he would go as far in a Bill in it as may be. Proposes a farther Address to the king, 'to recall all persons gone over since the Holland peace.'

Mr. Sec. Williamson. How difficult is it to meddle, or come to any resolutions, in things where the facts are not known? He is not to answer for the king France's violences and oppressions. It is said he took Treves for his convenience only, and on intercession of letters, to break the neutrality of that place, he took that town himself into his possession. As soon as that spark fell upon the Palatinate, the king offered a mediation at Cologne. Some matters are such in these affairs as cannot be laid open unto you. He thinks that the king will do more than he says. It is our great interest to balance the matter with Holland. He is as jealous of the successes of France as any man; and if this alliance be made with Holland and Denmark, and they strengthened by sea and land, we ought to think of that balance. When the peace shall be made, it is our interest to have it go through the king's hands. You were told of an exception, at Vienna, against our mediation; but he hears no such thing. Give this matter the best end you can, it will hazard our mediation. France has paid Sweden, though but a stander-by, and neutral; and whilst we show such a partiality as this recalling the forces will be, it will put the French king upon providing for himself, as not trusting our mediation. He fears that declaring ourselves so generally as is proposed in the recalling these forces, and being not obliged to it by the treaty of Holland, may be a just exception against our mediation, and may encourage France forsaking us in the general treaty of peace; they discovering we are declaring partialities, and so will reject us.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The second sort of men are gone into France, since the Holland peace: the first are wholly omitted in the Answer: doubts that the last part of the king's Answer is intricate. It is a general prohibition, but that is no part of our Address. The king tells you, 'He will take any farther way to prevent their going over.' If taken in a general sense, he is not satisfied that, it is an Answer to our Address. As to that of the old men there, he says that there was no Article to the contrary, but that the king might recal them: easy to make a secret article—No man to go into France or Holland—But the going into France is so public, the private article is now as public. How know we what promises have passed from the king about these forces? he knows of none, nor is willing to believe any; being only spoken of by way of supposition: Williamson said, 'We, not knowing the intimacy of things, might be deceived.' But it is as certain, that the French king has taken Treves for his convenience, as that he has made this war for his glory. And farther, he tells you, 'That the business of the Palatinate happened through the neglect of the interposition of the king of England.' Is sorry to hear the authority of the king of England was employed to hinder the elector: he might not have been so over-run—It is said, 'this recalling, &c. would prejudice our mediation.' Is one of those who understands not how the mediation can stand to the good of England. He apprehends that the king, without the assistance of the parliament, could not carry a war on against Holland: and is afraid that the authority and figure the king has in his neutrality would be made use of for the French advantage; therefore desires the king may now be put out of that capacity of mediation, to make the king of France a terror to all Christendom. To continue France in all these acquisitions, and secured in all, or the greatest part. The confederates wasted, and the French army maintained in the bowels of the confederates country, scarce reparable in this age. If the confederacy be dissolved before the French be recalled back to France again, the most ruinous thing in the world! when once the confederates dissolve, and France in this high posture, fears that the confederacy is never to be renewed to the end of the world. He speaks like an ordinary man; you have his good will. It is a plain thing; he sees no good we can have when the confederates are broken, and we strive to put the French king into that formidable condition, that we should be afraid to anger him now, what will it be to anger him then, when the confederates are broken? he must have Dover, because he is angry with us, and over-run us at last, as he has done others. Exceptions being taken by Mr. Ser. Coventry [what fell from him, thus explains himself.] the king not to be in such a mediation as to have the king of France a terror to all the world.

* Sir Joseph Williamson himself was one of the Plenipotentiaries.

Mr. Garroway. If we were off from France, all the world would put us upon being mediators.

Col. Birck. Littleton's words were, 'such mediation as may make the king of France a terror to all Christendom.'

Sir Tho. Lee. The words are to be written own, that to eternity the world may know what the opinion of this house was.

Col. Titus. It belongs to the gentleman to explain himself. 'As if the king should be so considerable as not to be mediator.' If any interpret the words so, the gentleman must explain himself; and he has done it, and sees no reason why the words should be set down.

Sir Wm. Coventry begs leave to pass by what has passed, as a parenthesis, and proceed to the business. It is good news to him that the balance of France was so near being made by these forces. When France first made an inroad into Holland, how long was it before there was any thing to look her in the face! France sees, by that, the danger of letting the confederates come together. When disunited and peace, no such thing as balance. That no predominant power be a terror to the rest, is our true balance between France and Spain. He wishes that the dust was a little shaken from the balance in the matter. He has not heard that mediations have been of such a value as to leave out the aid of a kingdom for them. He does not think that this withdrawing the forces would make us improper for being mediator, for some times mediations may help to obstruct peace as well as make peace. Many others are admitted for mediators as well as we. He has heard of the state of Venice, and the pope, and respects are seldom refused when offered as mediation: fears that the prevalency of France will spoil our markets more than any thing. When she has got peace, we are like to have a hard market. We can buy our wines but of one chapman then, but if France be brought low, you have choice of chapmen for any wares she can carry to market. Will offer something to the matter of recalling these forces. Does not conceive it possible to have these forces back, or prevent others going over, unless it be before Holland have peace with France. It was intended by the king and his ministers, that no more should go over; yet they do. As long as regiments and officers are there, it is his interest to have them recruited, to keep the troops up to such a degree. The root will draw nourishment as long as it grows in your garden, and to destroy it you must pluck it up. When the thing is rightly considered, hopes the king will have other thoughts. There appears no treaty between France and Holland, and is confident that there is none. We have no treaty yet finished with Holland to establish commerce, and believes we would not send subjects to assist the king of France, to make him greater, until that be settled. It is a probability, that after France has made peace, and ever shall be in a condition to reckon with us, they will do it, for making peace without them, as well as for withdrawing men away now. It is not ordinary for princes to be bound up thus; the honour of a prince, at home, is the maintenance of his subjects; and, abroad, not mistaking his interest. Did the king intimate he was to send no more forces? if the French king has used means to draw men over, he has cancelled all obligations to the contrary; therefore he hopes; that there is nothing in the whole matter but what we may have a gracious Answer to ; and is for the Address, for recall of the forces.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. All the long discourses here have been, 'Whether we shall go to war with France, or no.' As to the comparison of the 'plant in a garden,' the best answer to experience is experience. There is not one English pair of colours in Holland, and yet more men gone over into Holland, by thrice the number, than into France. These are things that cannot be avoided. A man of honour breaks not his word with any man, but much less where he is most obliged. If there should be any such agreement of no more acceptance of our troops, 'the eagles will go where the carcass is,' where money is. More of our men have come over to Holland from the French army than we have sent into France. Should the world take notice of any unanimity betwixt you and the king, let all men lay their hands upon their hearts, and declare, whether the king can recal these forces with his honour.

Col. Birch. England is of that spirit, rather to desire to know the worst of a danger, than stay till to-morrow for it. You are told of 'secret engagements that may prostrate the honour of the king.' In this case here is an end of your debate. Either we must debate thus, or consider how the interest of the nation is. The king cannot miscarry when he goes into this bottom. There are 90 in a 100 against France, all England over. You may make war with France with the money he overbalances you in your trade, which you get, like bees, by industry : remembers that if you had not only made peace with the Dutch, but told the king of France why you did it, you had not now debated this matter here. If you will not adjourn the debate, put the question.

Mr. Sawyer. Whenever you demand right you stick to it. As on the imprisonment of one of your members, there is either cause shown for it, or else you deliver him. You have made Address upon Address for him, and if not released you adjourn, as in lord Arundel's case, in the lords house.* Where an Address for a thing is matter of advice only, and not of right, you have always acquiesced in the king's Answer. If it be a demand of right, he is for adhering ; but it being pure matter of advice, and the king tells you positively, 'he cannot do it with his honour,' where will it end if the king should deny you? And you cannot force the matter upon him, but leave him at his liberty : he appeals to precedents in this kind.

* See vol. ii. p. 125. This was in 1626, when the earl of Arundel was committed to the Tower for being too severe in language on lord Spencer, concerning the marriage of his eldest son, Henry, lord Maltravers, to the lady Eliz. Stuart, eldest daughter to the duke of Lenox ; which, it was alleged, was done contrary to the king's consent and knowledge, he having designed her for lord Lorn. When the parliament met, the lords, being discontented, presented several petitions to the king, to preserve the privilege of parliament, and, no cause of his commitment being expressed, at length refused to sit, until he was restored to them ; which was ordered accordingly, in about three months. See Collins's Peerage, vol. i. p. 139.

Mr. Vaughan finds now the whole stress of the business to be 'the king's honour.' 'If all national contracts are broken, no nation will trust us.' It is so amongst common men : but after you find leagues have been destructive, it has been the prudence of princes, (who may err like other men) to recall such leagues. When a peace shall be made, you expose these men to be knocked on the head ; and when wounded, they have been knocked on the head to make room for the French. If you allow them to be there, you may be put to pay them before long : therefore would recall them.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Inspect records, and you will find whenever a king has told you, 'he could not concede a thing with his honour,' that you never have farther pressed him to it.

Sir Edw. Dering would, in this great affair, take the deliberation of one whole night to consider of it, and would now adjourn the debate.

Disorder on the Division.] The question being put, "Whether a farther Address should be made to the king for Recall of his subjects now in the service of the French king," the grand committee thereupon divided ; and the tellers, viz. sir Trevor Williams, and sir John Hanmer, appointed by the chairman, sir Charles Harbord, differing in their account of the Yeas and Noes, some called, 'Tell again,' others, 'Report ;' on which great disorder began ; gentlemen rising from their places and mingling in the pit ; hot and provoking discourses and gestures passed on both sides, especially betwixt lord Cavendish and sir John Hanmer. Some said, that lord Cavendish's sword was half drawn out, but prevented by Mr. Russel, who kept close to him. Others said, that lord Cavendish spit in sir John Hanmer's face, but that was only eagerness of speech, and so some might accidentally fly from him. But it was visible to all that sir James Smith, setting his arms on his side, did, in a rude manner, make through the crowd, and jostled several, and came up to the table, where yet more hot discourses passed between him and lord Cavendish, Mr. Stockdale, Mr. Sacheverell, and several others ; Mr. Stockdale and some others, setting their feet upon the mace, which lay below the table, in the usual place at grand committee. This disorder continued near half an hour, the standers by, on the upper benches, expecting very fatal consequences, especially when the young gallants, as Mr. Thyne, Mr. Newport, and several others, leaped over the seats to join lord Cavendish. But the Speaker, very opportunely and prudently, rising from his seat near the bar, in a resolute and slow pace, made his three respects through the crowd, and took the chair. The mace was still retained by the said gentlemen, but, at last, being forcibly laid upon the table, all the disorder ceased, and the gentlemen went to their places. The Speaker, being sat, spoke to this purpose, "That to bring the house into order again, he took the Chair, though not according to Order." Some gentlemen, as Mr. Sacheverell, and others, excepted against his coming into the Chair, but the doing it was generally approved, as the only expedient to suppress the disorder.—Then

Sir Tho. Lee, approving of the Speaker's taking the Chair, though not according to Order, moved, That there might be an engagement passed upon the honour of every member, standing up in his place, to proceed no farther in any thing that had happened in the unfortunate disorder at the Grand Committee, fearing that, as soon as the house had risen, the thing might be recriminated, and ill consequences ensue thereupon.—Which was seconded by several, and agreed to. So every member, standing up in his place, did consent accordingly; then particularly,

Col. Somerset For declared that some warm expressions had passed between him and sir Rob. Thomas, but, upon command of the house, he would give his honour to proceed no farther thereupon.—Sir John Hanmer did the same, but named nobody. So the house adjourned to the next day.

May 11. The house resumed the further consideration of his majesty's Answer. The question being propounded, that a further Address be presented to his majesty, for Recalling all his subjects that are in the service of the French king; the question being put, that the word 'all' do stand in the question:

The house divided. For the yeas, 172; for the noes, 173. And so it passed in the negative.—The question being put, That a further Address be presented to his majesty; It was resolved in the affirmative.

Debate on receiving no more Bills.] May 17. Mr. Eyre wishes the digestive faculty of this house answerable to the hands that feed it, that we might dispatch what business now may be brought before us; but because we have much upon our hands, and the time we are to sit probably not very long, moves 'That no other Bills may be received, but what are already before us, or which may come from the lords.'

* Grey.—There is no mention of this disturbance in the Journal; all that is there said is, 'Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.' But a writer, who was, probably, present at it, gives us the following account. "One day upon a dispute of telling the numbers upon a division, both parties grew so hot, that all order was lost; the members ran in confusion up to the table, grievously affronted one by the other, every man's hand upon his hilt, and all ready to decide the question by the sword. But when the tumult was loudest, the Speaker had the honour to restore the peace, by maintaining the dignity of the Chair, after that of the house was gone, and obliging every man to stand up in his place and engage his honour not to resent any thing of that day's proceedings." Marvell.

Sir Joha Coventry. We have yet neither removed Privy Counsellor, nor broken the French league, since we sat. Would have members stay here, and attend their duty, and not go down these holidays; and seconds Eyre's motion.

Sir Tho. Lee thirds the motion. :

Sir Joseph Tredenham would never tie up our hands from other business. He never knew a precedent of it. He being interrupted by many saying 'No, No,' said, He would be answered by reason, and not by noise.

Sir Nich. Carew has known this, that is now moved for, done almost every session, and would have it so now; especially because the business of religion may not be interrupted.

Sir Rob. Carr has known when no private business might be brought in, to interrupt the public; but he never knew such an order made as is moved for. It is very extraordinary to exclude public business, which may be of dangerous consequence: would, therefore, exclude private business only.

Sir Tho. Meres. Anciently this motion was parliamentary, when parliaments sat a shorter time than now: no new petitions were to be brought in. You cannot have a more advantageous thing to the bills before you. Let such as will go down see what is before you that no new matter may be started.

Sir Henry Ford is glad to see the house so unanimous for Bills in your hands, but is not for this question: will you preclude yourselves from taking any more bills? What occasion can you tell but you must have more bills? You were told, not long since, your being depends on the Address about the French forces; and will you shut up your hands against all possible cases whatsoever?

Mr. Vaughan. We are but passing a vote, not making a law for it. If we were, would then be of Ford's opinion: constantly parliaments have set a time for receiving petitions, when parliaments were shorter than they are now. The king has pointed out to us Religion, and Property, and Safety. We have let others in, and that out, by new business; and is the more for it, by what he has heard abroad of our sudden recess. Therefore moves, 'that all Bills we are not already possessed of, or may come from the lords, may be excluded.'

Sir Ch. Wheeler should not have been against the motion, had you said, 'till the Bills before you were finished, no new bills should be brought in.' If the king adjourns us not yet, or we sit six months, will you sit still, and do nothing? The precedents of 1641 and 1642, may be brought up an 100 years hence, like the 19 Propositions: are we not masters of our own sense and resolutions? The vote is altogether needless.

Sir Tho. Lee moves to order. After the motion firsted, and seconded, to tell you of 'adjourning,' and 'the 19 Propositions in 1641 and 1642!' Would have no resolutions.

Sir Tho. Meres. We abominate the actions of 1641 and 1642, as much as Wheeler; though he is not so old as Wheeler, our ancestors have suffered as well as he; abominates 'the 19 Propositions' as much as he, or any man.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. To say, positively, not to receive any thing from the king, we know not how such a thing may be. He has no foresight of any thing that may come from the king. The thing is too much unprecedented, and, whenever done, it ought to be with great deliberation. Pray God, our difference with the lords may he happily composed! He should hate himself, if he did not desire it. It is not easy to see an accommodation with the lords, but by a Bill, and possibly more natural for us. We are not yet prepared for matter for so good a bill, but the long robe may adjust your privileges and is sure it would be prejudicial to your reputation, should such a bill come from the lords. Why should our hands be bound? We are in a profound and safe peace, by God's providence: who knows but there may be a necessity of the very safety of the government, by loss of battles abroad, and other contingencies? Would not presume upon God's providence, so much as this vote will.

Mr. Stuyfva. The motion is, 'That no new Bill be received, other than what shall come from the lords.' What is moved hinders no bills from the lords. If any thing should be extraordinary, as the miscarriage of a battle, mentioned, you are secured by the Vote not excluding Bills from the lords, and you are free: but here is your danger, a custom of receiving new bills almost every morning. So many bills make your committees diverted; and scarce a new bill, but the committee is called from the attendance of the former bills. He has observed of this parliament, that there were never more explanatory bills. This motion is not to tie up your hands, but not to stretch them so, that business may fall from you by grasping more; having already several bills, that cannot pass this session, of great importance, and like to have long debates. There may be an emergency, and it is supposed only. If you take more bills upon you, you cannot pass many before you. It is a reasonable motion.

Sir Francis Drake. If this difference between the lords and us be accommodated by Bill, Westminster-Hall must judge our privileges, which, he hopes, he shall never see. They say abroad, that the king of France will not go into the field till this parliament be up, and for that reason he would not lengthen the session.

Sir Tho. Clarges. It is a necessary motion, not to exclude any thing from the lords, and is for the motion.

Col. Titus. It is reason, that the bills before you should not be obstructed, till they shall have their doom; possibly something as necessary may happen as any thing already before you: It is answered, 'it may then come from the lords?' Supposing the lords have such notice, they may make such a vote likewise. It may be of dangerous consequence.

Mr. Hale. Considering the time of the year, and the little yet done, must leave other gentlemen to find a reason for it, he cannot hope to do it, how to be dispatched. He fears a thin house, this festival calling people out of town; and if a motion should be for a million of money, here would be few to maintain the battle.

Sir John Birkenhead. Suppose the king should send us an Act of Indemnity, he should be loth to lose his share of it: will you tie your hands against receiving it? A gentleman said, 'he heard the king of France will not take the field till we rise;' therefore he would sit on. The thing has an ill aspect: he would have precedents for it.

Sir John Talbot. You are offered arguments for this motion, which are strong reasons against it, 'Members going out of town.' Is, therefore, against the motion, because it will keep members here: but would have the word 'private' added to 'Bill.'

Sir Edw. Dering. This is an unusual vote proposed; would see one such vote that ever passed: remembers only something like it, when our days were numbered. He usually gives his negative to what he understands not: would willingly have some consideration of it. If it be a good vote, it is a good one two days hence; and would adjourn the debate to Wednesday.

Mr. Popple. This vote proposed does not so oblige, but, that, if any extraordinary thing come to pass, we may revoke it. Had we put Popery, Property, and the Fleet, in any way, we might have come to such a vote, in obedience to the king's Speech. What can be done by bills is already before us; to admit more, is but to incur them those. This seems to him to be perfectly the state of the question, whether we shall do any thing, or no? Therefore he concurs with the motion.

Mr. Pepys. The little he has to say, is, to join with Powle about the Navy. How far Religion and Property are secured, he knows not, because he has not seen the bills. In his humble apprehensions, the navy is not provided for. He takes his rise from the bill for appropriating the Customs; if what he said the other day be true and he can make it out, that there is yet no provision made out for it. If 400,000*l.* be no superfluity, to make this fleet of yours equal to what it should be with your neighbours—plainly, in view, it is necessary, indispensibly: to the value of the bill, then, have you complied with the king's Speech? For all this is but necessary to keep the fleet as it is.

Mr. Harwood is sorry the crown of England has gone so far backward, as France has gone forward. We hear of the ill condition of the navy, but not of the good. If we ought to be afraid of the French, by sea, or land, why do we suffer our men to stay there? As to the navy, so considerable to us, when our wooden walls are down, every one may come at us. The French having so admirable navies, and we so poor ones—Which might have been otherwise, if all the money given to that purpose had been so spent. If that which you have appropriated to the navy will not do, you may think farther of it, when you meet again. He concurs with the motion.

Mr. Sauger. Here is a great debate. For fear of confusion on one side, and surprise on the other, moves to have no more bills brought in, after the first day of the next term. It is for the interest of the king to finish those before you; and he would have a convenient time set, for bringing in any more. The surprise of the passing the bill for the Fee-Farm Rent—great defect followed. A convenient time set to limit the bringing in of Bills would save the doubts on both sides.

Mr. Fiach *. We ought not to put the question, to prejudice any other business; we have not yet proceeded sufficiently for that. We are not to exclude Property, by petitions from private persons, that cannot have remedy in another place. He has received many particular papers; he calls them so, because delivered to him by particular men. Trade respects property. The motion about trade, for planting flax in England, is public, because it saves 800,000*l.* a year for coarse cloth, brought from beyond the sea. Religion ought to have the first place in your thoughts; but he moves that last, to rest it in your thoughts the better. The last session, you considered of Indulgence; and because we are safe on the shore, shall we have no consideration for them who struggle with the tide? Whatever the case be, it is charity and prudence to think on them, so considerable a part of the nation; and would not have them in despair.

Mr. Sec. Coventry would have this word added to the question, not foreseeing what great occasions might come; for extraordinary occasions alter all orders; therefore would have the words, 'unless upon extraordinary occasion,' added to the question.

Sir Tho. Meres. Writing the question is the * Son to the Lord Keeper. He succeeded to the earldom of Nottingham on his father's death in 1682, as he did to that of Winchelsea in 1729, a few months before he died. In the reigns of king William and queen Anne he was Secretary of State, and in king George the 1st's, Lord President of the Council. Burnet, speaking of his conduct at the Revolution, says, "That he had great credit with the whole church party, for he was a man possessed with their notions, and was grave and virtuous in the course of his life. He had some knowledge of the law, and of the records of parliament, and was a copious speaker."

best service for the house; they are the very words proposed by the first man that moved it.

Mr. Swynfin rises to speak to the words, 'extraordinary occasion,' proposed to be added to the question. 'If the extraordinary occasion be from abroad or at home,' must be meant, which this house has no prospect of now. It will be private interpretation in this case; it will occasion, no man knows how many motions and interpretations, a man's own way, and give interruptions to your business, and he is therefore against the words being added to the question. Of two inconveniences, the greatest is to be avoided: if any man thinks that, by it, he has excluded all extraordinary things, the house is the judge of that only.

Sir Rd. Temple thinks you sufficiently armed against these 'extraordinary occasions.' Your vote itself will give you liberty sufficient. It is only a trial, whether any man will offer you any thing extraordinary, or not.

Mr. Hopkins remembers that the last tax was, 'for the king's extraordinary occasions.'

Sir Wm. Coventry. He has the less to say, because his sense is already expressed: the word 'extraordinary' is not only useless but dangerous; as if the house, without those words, was not masters of their own orders. Should be loth that it binded us up so as not to alter it, either on some great victory obtained, or new occurrences.

Sir Tho. Meres. Whenever a necessity comes, that is for our advantage, or the nation's, it will over-rule all orders: believes that no-body that urged the question intended those words.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The word 'necessity' is always avoided in this house; and would have it so now.

The word 'extraordinary' in the question, was then rejected, 169 to 121. And the main question "That no Bill be brought in, or received, but such as are already ordered to be brought in, or shall be sent down from the lords, until after the recess mentioned in his majesty's Speech," was passed.

The famous Non-Resisting Test brought into the House of Lords *.] While the commons were thus employed "the grand push" says Mr. Ralph † "was made in the house of lords, to disarm disaffection and republicanism, according to the royalists; or, according to the patriots, to extinguish the last spark of English

* After the session broke up, a Pamphlet, entitled, "A Letter from a person of Quality to his Friend in the Country, giving an account of the Debates and Resolutions in the House of Lords, in April and May 1675, concerning a bill entitled, 'A Bill to prevent the dangers which may arise from persons disaffected to the Government,'" was published by the celebrated Mr. Locke, who drew it up at the desire of the earl of Shaftsbury. It will be found at length in the Appendix to the present volume, No. V. † Vol. i. p. 170.

liberty. The expedient which was to facilitate this mighty event, and which was the joint product of all the subtilty that the schools, the bar, or the court, could furnish, was contained in the following oath: 'I A.B. do declare, that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up Arms against the king; and that I do abhor that traitorous position, of taking up arms, by his authority, against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commission: and I do swear, that I will not, at any time, endeavour the alteration of the government, either in Church or State. So help me God.'—The person who had the honour of being the first mover for the court, upon this great occasion, was the earl of Lindsey, lord great chamberlain. One party, who had for their mouth the Lord Keeper, called it 'a moderate Security to the Church and Crown.' The other declared, 'That no conveyance could ever, in more compendious or binding terms, have drawn a dissettlement of the whole birthright of England.'—The penalty which the peers became liable to, on refusing this Oath, being incapacity to sit and vote in their own house, the first stage of opposition to it arose from the peculiar rights of the peerage; and all objections on that head being over-ruled by the major vote, 24 lords entered their protest; in which they gave it as their opinion, that the privilege they had of sitting and voting in parliament was an honour they had by birth, and a right so inherent in them, and inseparable from them, as that nothing could take it away, but what, by the law of the land, must, withal, take away their lives and corrupt their blood.—After five days debate, the Bill was committed; but not without another Protest; in which it was urged, that the bill struck at the very root of government, since it took away all freedom of votes and debates: for he that swore never to 'alter' parted with all his legislative power at once, and became perjured by endeavouring to 'amend.'—The majority were so incensed at this second Protest, that some thoughts were entertained of sending the 12 peers who signed it to the Tower: but the lord Holles desiring leave of the house to add his name to it, that he might have the honour to suffer with them, they did not think proper to carry their resentment so far, but contented themselves with voting, That the Reasons given in the said Protest did reflect upon the honour of the house, and were of dangerous consequence: which Vote was also protested against by 21 of their lordships, as a great discountenancing of the very liberty of protesting.—To take off the edge of so fierce an opposition, the penalty of forfeiting their seats in parliament, by refusing the Oath, was taken off by order of the house; and, by another order, a Proviso was added, to secure the freedom of parliamentary proceedings: but the house still persisting to subject every member to the first enacting-clause of the Bill, whereby an oath was to be imposed on them, as members of either house, and at the same time refusing to admit of a proviso inserted in a late Act for 'preventing Dangers that might happen from Popish Recusants;' whereby the privilege of every peer, and all their privileges, would be as fully secured from this act, as the other; a fourth Protestation was entered, which was signed by 16 peers, who thought these latter proceedings of the house inconsistent with their two former orders.—During the course of the debate on the privileges of parliament, the earl of Bolingbroke observing, that, though the proviso left the business within doors free, the Oath took away all private converse without, on matters of state, even with one another; the lord keeper, the lord treasurer, and the duke of Lauderdale, told the committee, in plain terms, That they intended to prevent caballing, and conspiracies against the government; and they knew no reason why any of the king's officers should consult with parliament-men, about parliament-business; and particularly mentioned those of the army, treasury, and navy: and when the marquis of Winchester proposed an additional Oath, That every man should swear to vote according to his opinion and conscience, independent of threats, or promises, rewards or expectations, the lord keeper made no scruple to declare, in a very fine speech, that it was an useless oath; for all gifts, places, and offices, were likeliest to come from the king: and no member of parliament, in either house, could do too much for the king, or be too much on his side: and that men might, lawfully and worthily, have in their prospect such offices and benefits from him.—Proceeding to those extravagant words in the Oath, 'or against those commissioned by him,' the house fell into yet greater heats; the opposing lords making no difficulty to declare, That if whatever is by the king's commission be not opposed by the king's authority, then a standing army is law, whenever the king pleases. This was illustrated in the following free manner: if, in suit with a great favourite, a man recovers house and land, and by course of law, be put into possession by the sheriff, and afterwards a warrant is obtained, by the interest of the person, to command some soldiers of the standing army to take the possession, and deliver it back; in such case, the man in possession may justify the defending himself, and killing those who shall violently endeavour to enter the house; yet the party whose house is invaded takes up arms by the king's authority against those who are commissioned by him. And it is the same case, if the soldiers had been commissioned to defend the house against the sheriff, when he first endeavoured to take the possession according to law; neither could any order or commission of the king put a stop to the sheriff, if he had done his duty, in raising the whole force of that county to put the law in execution; neither can the court, from whom that order proceeds, (if they observe their oath and duty) put any stop to the execution of the law in such a case, by any command or commission from the king whatsoever; nay, all the Guards* and Standing-Forces in England cannot be secured by any commission from being a direct riot, and unlawful assembly, unless in time of open war and rebellion. And it is not out of the way to suppose, that if any king hereafter, contrary to the Petition of Right, demand and levy money by privy seal, or otherwise, and cause soldiers to enter and distrain for such-like illegal Taxes, that, in such a case, any man may by law defend his house against them; and yet this is of the same nature with the former, and against the words of the Declaration. And these being called 'remote' instances by the Lord Keeper, the earl of Salisbury replied, That they would not hereafter prove so, when this Declaration had made the practice of them justifiable.—The next thing in course was the Oath itself: against which the following objection lay so plain and so strong, at the very entrance, viz. That there was no care taken of the doctrine, but only of the Discipline, of the Church; or, in other words, of its power and dominion. No papist would scruple to take an oath for the maintenance of episcopacy: and though, by the re-establishment of the Popish religion, the king would lose his supremacy, the bishops would be secure of their mitres, and all the trappings of wealth and power they were enriched and adorned with. This consideration, which was urged in its full force, compelled the advocates for the Oath to give it a new bias: and, accordingly, the next day, it was introduced again in these words: 'I do swear, that I will not endeavour to alter the Protestant religion, or the government of either Church or State.' By this the ministers, and their godfathers the bishops, thought, they had saved all; and now began to call their Oath a security for the Protestant Religion, and the only good preservative against Popery, in case the throne should be filled by a Popish prince: in which their confidence was not a little wondered at, since it was notorious, that till now they had no such point in view; that they had been shamed into this addition, by the debates of the preceding day; and that some of the bishops had made their court to some of the Catholic lords† by saying, 'That care had been taken it might be such an Oath as

' might not bear upon them.'—When the Clause relating to the Church came under deliberation, it was observed, That it was not agreeable to the king's crown and dignity to have his subjects sworn to the government of the Church equally as to himself: that it was necessary to understand thoroughly what this ecclesiastical system was, which the subject was to swear allegiance to: and the bishops alleging, That the priesthood, and its powers, were derived from Christ, but the licence to exercise those powers from the civil magistrate, it was replied, That it was a dangerous thing to secure, by oath or act of parl. those in the exercise of an authority and power in the king's country, and over his subjects, which being received, as they urged, from Christ himself, could not be altered nor limited by the king's laws: that this was directly to set the mitre above the crown: and that this Oath was the greatest attempt that had been made against the king's Supremacy since the Restoration.—And as to swearing not to make any Alterations in the state, it was said, That such an Oath overthrew all parliaments, and left them capable of nothing but giving money: For the very business of parliaments was Alterations, either by adding or taking away some part of the executive power in church or state. Besides, it was well asked, What kind of government must that be, which men must swear not to endeavour to alter, upon any alteration of times, emergency of affairs; nor variations of human things whatever? Would it not be requisite, that such a government should be communicated by God himself, visibly appearing, or denouncing his immediate presence, by an exertion of all the wonders of omnipotence?—The Penalty of the Bill was considered in the last place; and was made different, according to the different qualifications of the persons: all that were, or should be, privy counsellors, justices of the peace, or possessors of any beneficial office, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, were to take the Oath when summoned, upon pain of forfeiting 500*l.* and being made incapable of bearing office: and though the members of either house were not subject to incapacity, they were to the 500*l.* penalty: nay, it was moved, that those who did not come up and sit as members should be obliged to take the oath, or liable to the penalty till they did so: and it was at last carried, that every (sitting) member should either swear, or pay 500*l.* every parliament: the opposing lords however took up several hours in shewing the many hardships of this Clause; especially as it affected all the members of the house of commons, and all the acting justices in England; the first of whom had it not in their power to be unchosen; nor the last, to be left out of the commission, before the act came in force (which was to have been the 1st of Sept. following) and both thereby became subject to an imposition that neither of them thought of, when they undertook their respective services: they likewise remonstrated, that the lords themselves were subjected by it to the meanest condition of mankind, if they could not enjoy their birthright, without being enforced to swear to every fancy of the present times, which appeared to be the most variable in our story; since, but 3 years before this, all was liberty and indulgence; and now nothing would serve but rigid conformity. To all this no reply was made, nor attempted to be made: numbers were made to sanctify what reason could not be made to countenance; and, on putting the question, it appeared, that Magna Charta itself was of no force against a majority."

* An Army had, as yet, received no sanction from the legislature.

† These lords in a body joined the opposition on this occasion; which, according to Mr. North, they were induced to do by the earl of Shaftsbury's dinning in their ears; "That the Test tended to deprive peers of their right of sitting and voting in the house of lords; which was a right so sacrosanct, and radically inherent in the peerage, as was not to be temerated on any account whatsoever; and that, if this Act passed, the next would be to turn them out of the house."

The Test carried by the Lords.] "Thus, after 16 or 17 days debates, it appeared, that it was not the fault of minister or bishop, that the people of England were not 'declared' into a new government, more absolute and arbitrary than the Oath of Allegiance, or the old law, knew; and then 'sworn' to obey, what they had been compelled to set up. In contracts where both parties are to be gainers, there is no fear of nonperformance of either side: the king admitted the bishops to share with him in the allegiance of his people; and the bishops, by way of consideration, gave them up to the will and pleasure of the king. Nothing can be urged in excuse of a scheme, at once so treacherous, and so wicked as this, but the apprehensions of the court, that the opposite faction were forming designs upon the constitution, as ruinous in the opposite extreme: but these were at that time, apprehensions only; at least, not one fact had been proved to justify them: and if the case had been otherwise, why should the iniquities of the fathers be visited on their children? Why should a whole nation be enslaved, because a few malignants turmoiled the public for their own private advantage?—The laws in being were very sufficient to guard the crown against any violence from the people, as long as they were suffered to operate equally between the people and the crown; but they would not authorize oppression, which was the thing in pursuit: now, it is only in case of oppression, when law itself is set aside, that the right of resistance has been contended for, as the last resort of a free people: and we shall find in the course of this history, even the very bishops themselves refusing to express their Abhorrence of an open invasion, when they found their own possessions in danger. Fundamentals ought to be held sacred on both sides: but if a government sets aside the laws, the governed may do the same: let the subject, however, always remember, that if he draws his sword under whatever provocations, even at a time of day when the doctrine of Passive Obedience has been ever so long and so effectually exploded, by deeds as well as words, it must be at his own peril; and that he will find the great statute of treasons has more power to condemn, than Magna Charta to absolve him.—To return: We left the court-party in possession of their darling Test, though somewhat purged by the fiery trial it had undergone: for now it was conceived, as follows: 'I, A. B. do declare, that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up Arms against the king: and I do abhor the traitorous position of taking Arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, according to law, in time of rebellion and war, and acting in pursuance of such commission. I, A. B. do swear, that I will not endeavour any Alteration of the Protestant religion, now established by law in the church of England; nor will I endeavour any Alteration in the government in church or state, as it is by law established.'—Nothing therefore remained, but to send it down to the commons, and to prepare it a favourable reception, and speedy passage.* According to the seeming temper of that house, the business before them, and their manifest distrust of the court, this appeared to be no easy task: and it might be rather presumed, that they would have rejected it at the first reading, than inclined to strengthen such a king and such a ministry, with such a law. But according to sir John Reresby, who took his † seat as a member this session, the two parties were so equal, that neither durst stand the issue of a question: we have evidence left us, that they had their relentings in the case of the lord treasurer: and in any affair where the Church was concerned, there was great reason to fear they would make no difficulty to abandon the people. It is therefore reasonable to conclude, that lord Shaftsbury, and those who were deepest in the secrets of the Opposition,

* Andrew Marvell in his "Growth of Popery," speaking of this remarkable contest, says, "It was, I think, the greatest, which had perhaps ever been in parliament; wherein those lords that were against this Oath, being assured of their own loyalty and merit, stood up now for the English liberties, with the same genius, virtue, and courage, that their noble ancestors had formerly defended the Great Charter of England, but with so much greater commendation, in that they had here a fairer field, and the more civil way of decision: they fought it out, under all the disadvantages imaginable: they were overlaid by numbers: the noise of the house, like the wind was against them; and, if not the Sun, the Fire-side (the king generally stood there) was always in their faces: nor being so few, could they, as their adversaries, withdraw to refresh themselves in a whole day's engagement: yet never was there a clearer demonstration, how dull a thing is human eloquence, and greatness how little, when the bright truth discovers all things in their proper colours and dimensions, and, shining, shoots its beams through all their fallacies."

† On the country interest, it may be presumed; for he gives us to understand, that he was introduced by the lords Russel and Cavendish.

thought it more advisable to prevent its finding its way into that house, than to run the risque of its passing through." A quarrel, however, which ensued between the two houses, prevented the passing of all the Bills during the present session.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, ON AN APPEAL BEING BROUGHT IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, BY DR. SHIRLEY, AGAINST SIR JOHN FAGG, AND OTHERS THEIR MEMBERS.*

Sir John Fagg's Complaint.] May 4. Sir John Fagg, bart. this day informing the house, that he was summoned to appear to a Petition in the house of lords, a Committee was thereupon appointed to search for Precedents to that purpose.

May 5. Resolved, 'That a Message be sent to the lords to acquaint them that this house hath received information, that there is a Petition of Appeal depending before them, at the suit of Thomas Shirley esq. against sir John Fagg, a member of this house; to which Petition he is, by order of the house of lords, directed to answer on Friday next: and to desire the lords to have a regard to the privileges of this house: and that sir Trevor Williams do go up with the Message to the lords.'

* "A quarrel which ensued between the two houses, prevented the passing of every bill projected during the present session. One Dr. Shirley, being cast in a law-suit before chancery against sir John Fagg, a member of the house of commons, preferred a petition of appeal to the house of peers. The lords received it, and summoned Fagg to appear before them. He complained to the lower house, who espoused his cause. They not only maintained, that no member of their house could be summoned before the peers: they also asserted, that the upper house could receive no appeals from any court of equity; a pretension which extremely retrenched the jurisdiction of the peers, and which was contrary to the practice that had prevailed during this whole century. The commons send Shirley to prison; the lords assert their powers. Conferences are tried; but no accommodation ensues. Four lawyers are sent to the Tower by the commons, for transgressing the orders of the house, and pleading in this cause before the peers. The peers denominate this arbitrary commitment a breach of the great charter, and order the lieutenant of the Tower to release the prisoners: he declines obedience: they apply to the king, and desire him to punish the lieutenant for his contempt. The king summons both houses; exhorts them to unanimity: and informs them, that the present quarrel had arisen from the contrivance of his and their enemies, who expected by that means to force a dissolution of the parliament. His advice has no effect: the commons continue as violent as ever; and the king, finding that no business could be finished, at last prorogued the parliament." Hume.

Vol. IV.

Sir Trevor Williams reports, That he had attended the lords with the Message of this house, concerning sir John Fagg; and the lords will return an Answer by messengers of their own.

May 7. A Message from the lords by sir Wm. Beverham and sir Samuel Clarke.—"Mr. Speaker, the lords have considered of the Message received from the house of commons, concerning Privilege in the Case of sir John Fagg, and do return this Answer, That the house of commons need not doubt, but that the lords will have a regard to the privilege of the house of commons, as they have of their own."

May 8. A Committee was appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what Entries are therein made against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, and to report the same.

May 12. Resolved, That Dr. Tho. Shirley be sent for in custody, to answer his Breach of the Privileges of this house, in prosecuting a suit by Petition of Appeal in the lords house, against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, during the session and privilege of parliament.—And a Committee is also to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what hath been done in like cases; and the said sir John Fagg is ordered not to proceed, or make any Answer to the said Appeal, without the licence of this house.

Sir T. Lee's Report from the Lords Journals.]

May 14. Sir Tho. Lee reports from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the house of lords, and the Entries therein, in the Case between Dr. Tho. Shirley and sir John Fagg, a member of this house, that the committee had perused the Journals of the lords house, and found the Entries to be as follow: "April, the 30th. Tho. Shirley, esq. presented a Petition to the lords." Ordered, 'That the said sir John Fagg may have a copy of the said Petition and put in his Answer thereunto in writing, on the 7th of May next, if he thinks fit.'—May, the 5th. 'The Commons send a Message by sir Trevor Williams: The knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons, in parliament assembled, have been informed, that there is a Petition of Appeal depending before their lordships, at the suit of Tho. Shirley esq. against sir John Fagg a member of their house; to which Petition he is, by their lordships order, directed to answer, on Friday next, and desire their lordships to take care of their privileges.'—Answer. 'That this house have considered of their Message, and will send an Answer by messengers of their own.'—Ordered, 'That the Committee for Privileges do meet this afternoon to consider of the Messages received from the house of commons this day, concerning Tho. Shirley esq. and sir John Fagg, a member of the house, and search precedents in the case, and report to the house to-morrow morning.'—May 6th. The earl of Berks reported, 'That the Committee of Privileges having met and considered of what was referred to them, in the Case between Tho. Shirley esq. and sir John Fagg, a member of the house of commons, and a Message from the house of commons thereupon; have ordered him to report, that the Committee have found that the house did refer the business of Mr. Hale and Mr. Slingsby, upon the like Message of the house of commons, to the Committee of Privileges; who did report to the house, that it is the undoubted Right of the lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament, Appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either house be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land; and the house did agree with the committee therein: and thereupon the Committee do humbly offer to their lordships, upon this occasion, to take the same course, and to insist upon their just Rights in this particular, which their lordships will be pleased to signify to the house of commons, in such manner as they shall think fit.—The house agreed with the Committee in this Declaration, and ordered the same to be entered into the Journal-Book of this house as their Declaration, viz. 'That it is the undoubted Right of the lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament, Appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either house be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land.'—Then it was moved that the former Answer sent to the house of commons in the Case of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, might be given now to the house of commons, in this Case of sir John Fagg; and that the Declaration and Report, agreed to this day, might be added to it.—The Declaration aforesaid was read, and the question being put, Whether this shall be as a part of the Answer to be given to the house of commons? It was resolved in the negative.—The Answer returned formerly to the house of commons, in the Case of Mr. Slingsby, and Mr. Hale, was in these words: 'That the house of commons need not doubt but that their lordships will have a regard to the Privileges of the house of commons, as they have of their own.'—The question being put, Whether this Answer shall be now returned to the Message from the house of commons? It was resolved in the affirmative.—May 7th, it was sent accordingly.—May 7. 'Whereas this day was appointed for sir John Fagg to put in an Answer to the Petition and Appeal of Tho. Shirley, esq. depending in this house, if he thought fit; the said sir John Fagg appearing personally this day at the bar, and desiring longer time to put in an Answer thereunto: It is thereupon ordered that the said sir John Fagg hath hereby further time given him for putting in his Answer, till the 12th day of this instant May.'—Sir John Fagg put in his Answer to the Petition of Mr. Shirley.

Resolution thereon.] A debate arising thereupon, touching the Privilege of their house, Resolved, &c. "That the Appeal, brought by Dr. Shirley in the house of lords against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, and the proceedings thereupon, is a Breach of the undoubted Rights and Privileges of this house."

The house being informed, that the Warrant of this house for taking of the said Dr. Shirley into custody, was forcibly taken away and detained from the serjeant at arms his deputy, attending this house, by the lord Mohun: and the serjeant's deputy being called in and examined as to the matter of fact, gave this testimony: "That he found Dr. Shirley in the inner lobby of the house of lords, and that he came to him and desired to speak with him, and acquainted him, that he had a Warrant from the house of commons to apprehend him, and desired to know whether he could shew him any reason to excuse him, that he might not serve the warrant on him: and that he likewise told him, that he would not execute the warrant on him in that place, but desired of him that he would go along with him freely; and that in case he would not, he would take his opportunity in another place. And that the said lord Mohun coming in, in the mean time, required him to shew his warrant; which he producing, the lord Mohun laid hands on it, and held it so fast, that it was in danger of being torn; and that therefore he was forced to part with it, and desiring to have it again, the lord Mohun refused it, but carried the warrant into the house of lords. That Dr. Shirley afterwards refused to go along with him, saying, that he was not then his prisoner; and that, several persons interposing, the doctor escaped from him;" and a debate arising thereupon,

Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords to complain of lord Mohun, for forcibly taking away and detaining the Warrant of this house, from the deputy serjeant at arms, for taking of Dr. Shirley in custody; and to demand the justice of the lords house against the said lord Mohun. And that the lord Antram do go up to the lords with the Message."

Dr. Shirley ordered into Custody.] Ordered, "That Mr. Speaker do issue forth a new warrant to the serjeant at arms attending this house, for apprehending Dr. Tho. Shirley, to answer his Breach of Privilege, for prosecuting a suit by Petition of Appeal in the lords house against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, during the session and privilege of parliament."

Lord Antram's Report from the Lords.] May 15. The Lord Antram reports from the lords, that he had, in obedience to the commands of this house, attended the lords, and delivered the Message concerning the lord Mohun's taking away, and detaining the Warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, and that the lords had returned this Answer: "Gentlemen of the house of commons, The lords have considered of your Message, and of the Complaint therein; and they return you this Answer, that they find the lord Mohun hath done nothing but what is according to his duty."

Dr. Shirley's Appeal voted a Breach of Privilege.] The house then resumed the debate of the matter concerning the Privileges of this house; and the matter being debated; Resolved, "That the Appeal, brought by Dr. Shirley in the house of lords against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, and the proceedings thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of the house of commons; and therefore the commons desire, that there be no farther proceedings in that cause before their lordships."

Ordered, That, a conference be desired with the lords concerning the Privileges of this house, in the Case of sir John Fagg; and that sir Tho. Lee do go up to the Lords to desire a Conference.

A Message from the lords by sir Mondeford Bramston, and sir Wm. Glascock. "Mr. Speaker, We are commanded to let this house know that the lords spiritual and temporal, assembled in parliament, having received a warrant, signed Edw. Seymour, which they have appointed us to shew you and desire to know whether it be a Warrant ordered by this house."—The matter of the Message being debated, the question being put, that the word 'unparliamentary' be part of the Answer to the lords Message, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the messengers be called in, and that this answer be returned, 'that this house will consider of the message.' The messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker does acquaint them, that the house will consider of the Message.

Resolved, "That the Message last received from the house of lords, is an unparliamentary message. That a Conference be desired to be had with the lords, upon the subject matter of the last Message: That it be referred to Mr. Garraway, &c. to draw up Reasons to be offered at the said Conference."

Then the house being informed that there is a cause upon an Appeal brought up by sir Nich. Stoughton, against Mr. Onslow, a member of this house, appointed to be heard at the bar of the lords house; Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords to acquaint them, that this house has received information, that there is a Cause upon an Appeal brought by sir Nich. Stoughton against Mr. Onslow a member of this house, appointed to be heard at the bar of the house, on Monday next; and to desire their lordships to have regard to the privileges of this house, and that sir Rd. Temple do go up with the Message to the lords."— Ordered, "That Mr. Onslow do not appear any farther in the prosecution of the Appeal brought against him by sir Nich. Stoughton, in the house of lords: That sir Nich. Stoughton be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house, to answer his Breach of Privilege in prosecuting a suit in the house of lords against Arthur Onslow, esq; a member of this house, during the session and privilege of parliament."

Resolved, "That whosoever shall appear at the bar of the house of lords, to prosecute any suit against any member of this house, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the Rights and Privileges of this house."

Sir Tho. Lee's report from the Committee.]

May 17. Sir Tho. Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to draw up Reasons for the Conference to be had with the lords, Reasons agreed by the committee; which are as follow, viz. "For that the Message is by way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the house of commons in a Case concerning the Privilege of a member of that house, of which they are proper judges. For that the matter of the Message carries in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the house of commons. For that the matter of the Message doth highly reflect upon the whole house of commons, in their lordships questioning that house concerning their own orders; which they have the more reason to apprehend, because, the day before this Message was brought to them, the warrant was owned by the complaint of the house of commons to their lordships that the same was taken and detained from a servant of theirs, by a peer; which imports, that the question in that Message could not be for information only, and so tends to interrupt that mutual good correspondency, which ought to be preserved inviolably between the two houses of parliament."

May 18. Sir Rd. Temple reports from the lords, that he had attended their lordships, according to the command of this house, with the Message in the Case of Mr. Onslow, to which the lords returned an Answer, which being in writing, was delivered at the clerks table, and read, as followeth: "The lords do declare, That it is the undoubted Right of the lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament, Appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either house be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land: and from this Right, and the exercise thereof, their lordships will not depart."

The matter of the lords Answer being debated, Resolved, "That it is the undoubted privilege of this house, that none of their members be summoned to attend the house of lords, during the sitting or privilege of parliament. That a Conference be desired with the lords, upon the privileges of this house, contained in the lords Answer to the message of this house, in the Case of Mr. Onslow."

Reasons to be offer'd to the Lords at the Conference.]

May 20. Sir Tho. Lee reports, from the committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be offered at the Conference to be had with the lords upon the Privileges of this house, contained in the lords Answer to the last Message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow; which Reasons were twice read, and, with some alterations at the clerk's table, agreed to, as follow: 1. "That, by the laws and usage of parliament, Privilege of Parliament belongs to every member of the house of commons, in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace; which hath often been declared in parliament, without any exception of Appeals before the lords. 2. That the reason of that Privilege is, that the members of the house of commons may freely attend the public affairs of that house, without disturbance or interruption, which doth extend as well to Appeals before the house of peers, as to proceedings in other courts. 3. That, by the constant course and usage of parliament, no member of the house of commons can attend the house of lords, without the especial leave of that house first obtained, much less be summoned or compelled so to do. 4. If the lords shall proceed to hear and determine any Appeal, where the party neither can, nor ought to attend, such proceedings would be contrary to the rules of justice. 5. That the not determining of an Appeal against a member of the house of commons, is not a failure of justice, but only a suspension of proceedings in a particular case, during the continuance of that parliament which is but temporary. 6. That in case it were a failure of justice, it is not to be remedied by the house of lords alone, but it may be by act of parliament."

The Lords Reasons.] Mr. Powle reports, from the Conference had with the lords upon the subject matter of the former Conference, concerning the Warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, That the lords had returned an Answer to the Reasons of this house, delivered at the former Conference, and are as follows: "The lords have appointed this Conference, upon the subject matter of the last conference, and have commanded us to give these Answers to the Reasons and other matters then delivered by the house of commons. To the first question, the lords conceive that the most natural way of being informed, is by way of question; and seeing a Paper here, which did reflect upon the privileges of the lords house, their lordships would not proceed upon it, till they were assured it was owned by the house of commons: but the lords had no occasion at that time, nor do they now think fit, to enter into the debate of the house of commons being, or not being proper judges in the case concerning the Privilege of a member of that house; their lordships necessary consideration, upon sight of that paper, being only how far the h. of commons ordering (if that paper were theirs) the apprehension of Dr. Shirley, for prosecuting his Appeal before the lords, did trench upon their lordships both privilege and undoubted right of judicature, in the consequence of it, excepting all the members of both houses from the judicature of this the highest court of the kingdom; which would cause a failure of that supreme justice, not administrable in any other court, and which their lordships will never admit. As to the 2nd Reason, the lords answer, That they do not apprehend how the matter of this Message is any reflection upon the Speaker of the house of commons. To the 3d Reason, The lords cannot imagine how it can be apprehended in the least to reflect upon the h. of commons, for the h. of peers, upon a Paper produced to their lordships, in form of a Warrant of that house, whereof doubt was made among the lords, whether any such thing had been ordered by that house, to enquire of the commons whether such warrant was ordered there or no? And, without such liberty used by the lords, it will be very hard for their lordships to be rightly informed, so as to preserve a good correspondence between the two houses, which their lordships shall endeavour; or to know when warrants, in the name of that house, are true or pretended: and it is so ungrounded an apprehension, that their lordships intended any reflection in asking that question, and not taking notice in their Message of the Complaint of the h. of commons owning that warrant, that the lords had sent their Message concerning that Paper, to the h. of commons, before the lords had received the said commons complaint.—But their lordships have great cause to except against the unjust and strained reflection of that house upon their lordships, in asserting that the question in the lords Message could not be for information, as we affirm, but tending to interrupt the mutual correspondence between the two houses; which we deny, and had not the least thought of.—The lords have further commanded us to say, that they doubt not but the h. of commons, when they have received what we have delivered at this conference, will be sensible of their error, in calling our Message strange, unusual, or unparliamentary. Though we cannot but take notice, that their Answer to our Message, that they would consider it, was the first of that kind that we can find to have come from that house."

The Lords Reasons voted unsatisfactory.] The question being put, Whether the house be satisfied with the Reasons delivered by the lords at the last Conference? it passed in the negative.—Resolved, That a free conference be desired with the lords upon the matter delivered at the last Conference; and that the former managers do attend, and manage the free conference.

Sir T. Lee's Report from the Committee.] May 28. Sir Tho. Lee reports, from the committee to whom it was referred to draw up Reasons to be offered at a Conference to be had with the lords, upon the subject matter of their Answer to the last Message of this house, in the Case of Mr. Onslow, several Reasons agreed by the said committee: which were severally agreed unto, and are as follow; "For that the commons desired a Conference upon their Privileges concerned by the lords Answer to a Message sent to the lords the 18th of May, in the Case of Mr. Onslow; their lordships have not agreed to any conference in the case of Mr. Onslow, but have only agreed to a conference concerning their Privileges in general, without reference to the Case of the said Mr. Onslow; which was the only subject matter of the desired conference.—The limitation in the lords agreement to a conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the conference that may any way concern their lordships judicature, is in effect a denial of any conference at all, upon the subject on which it was desired: which ought not to be; the judicature which their lordships claim in Appeals against a member of the h. of commons, and the privilege of that house, being in that case so involved, that there can be no conference upon the latter, without some way touching upon the former. That this manner of agreeing to a conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings betwixt the two houses of parliament, in coming to conference, and doth seem to place a power in the managers of such conferences to judge whether such provisos be broken or not, and accordingly to proceed, or break off the conference upon their own judgments."

May 31. A Message from the lords by sir Mondford Brampton, and sir Wm. Beverham: "Mr. Speaker, The lords have commanded us to acquaint you, that they desire a Conference presently in the Painted-Chamber, with the h. of commons, upon their not coming to the Conference desired by them, on Thursday last, and by the lords appointed to be at ten o'clock in the Painted-Chamber, on Friday the 28th inst."—The messengers being withdrawn, and the Message debated, a present conference upon the question was agreed.

Sir John Trevor reports, from the Conference, that the lords had declared the intent of this conference, to the effect following, viz. "That the lords have appointed this conference, out of that constant desire and resolution they have to continue a fair correspondence between the two houses; which is of the essence of parliamentary proceedings. For this end their lordships have commanded us to tell you, that they cannot but take notice of the h. of commons failing to be, on Friday last, at a conference desired by themselves and appointed by the lords at 10 o'clock in the Painted-Chamber. That they conceive it tends to an interruption of all parliamentary Proceedings, and to evade the right of the lords to appoint time and place for a conference."

Ordered, That it be referred to the former committee, who are appointed to draw up Reasons, to be offered at a Conference to be had with the lords upon the subject matter of their Answer, to the Message of this house, in the Case of Mr. Onslow, to consider of the matter delivered by the lords at the last conference; and to prepare and draw up farther Reasons, to be offered at another conference. And Mr. Serjeant Maynard, and Mr. Sawyer, are to take notice to attend the same.

June 1. Sir Tho. Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the house of lords, and to see what proceedings have been entered, in the Case of Mr. Dalmahoy, and Mr. Onslow, that they had inspected the Lords Journals as to the Case of Mr. Dalmahoy, and collected what proceedings had been in that Case; but had no opportunity or time yet to do it in the Case of Mr. Onslow: which proceedings being reported, were read, and delivered in at the Clerk's-table; and are as follow, viz. "April 19, 1675;

"The Appeal brought by Crispe and Crispe, complaining against a decree in chancery made, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is recited to be one of the petitioners; Cranbourne and Bowyer are ordered to put in an Answer, and Dalmahoy if he please.—May 18. Ordered, That this house will hear counsel at the bar, upon the Petition and Appeal of sir Nich. Crispe, and others, against the lady viscountess Cranbourne, the lady Anne Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. and their Answer thereunto, depending in this house on Wednesday the 19th inst. whereof the petitioners are to cause timely notice to be given to the said defendants, or their agents in the said case, for that purpose.—May 19. Whereas sir Nich. Crispe, bart. having an Appeal depending in this house, against the lady Cranbourne, lady Bowyer, and Tho. Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the house of commons; hath prayed that counsel may be assigned him to plead his cause upon the said Appeal, and hath named counsel for that purpose: it is ordered that sir John Churchill, serj. Peck, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, named by the said sir Nich. Crispe, be, and are hereby appointed to open, and manage the said cause, on the part and behalf of the said sir Nich. Crispe; on the 27th of this instant May; and at such other times, as it shall be depending in this house.—Upon reading the Petition of sir Nich. Crispe, bart. Tho. Crispe, and John Crispe, esqrs. shewing; that having an Appeal depending in this house against Tho. Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the house of commons, and others; they are in danger of being arrested by an Order of the h. of commons; and therefore pray the protection of this house, that they may have liberty to prosecute their said Appeal with freedom: it is thereupon ordered, that sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. or any of them, their or any of their counsel, agents or solicitors, or such other person or persons as they shall employ, in prosecuting the said Appeal before this house, be, and are hereby privileged, and protected accordingly by this house, until the matter upon the Appeal be determined by their lordships. And all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise molesting, the said sir Nich. Crispe, &c. upon any pretence whatsoever, during the time prefixed, as they or such of them will answer the contrary to this house.—May 26. The Cause between sir Nich. Crispe, &c. plaintiffs, and Tho. Dalmahoy, esq. defendant, appointed to be heard the 27th, was ordered to be heard the 28th.—May 27. Upon reading the Petition of sir Nich. Crispe, complaining, that the counsel assigned him by this house, to plead his cause at the bar, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is one of the defendants, do refuse to plead for him in this case, in regard of a Vote of the house of commons; sir Nich. Crispe was called in, and testified, that he shewed the Order of this house to serjeant Peck, serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter. Whereupon it is Ordered, That, whereas sir John Churchill, serj. Peck, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were, by order of this house, dated on the 19th inst. assigned to be of counsel for sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Tho. Crispe, in their Cause depending in this house, against Tho. Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the h. of commons, and other defendants, at such time as the said Cause shall be appointed to be pleaded at the bar of this house; and having appointed to hear the said cause, by counsel on both sides, to-morrow at three in the afternoon; It is this day Ordered, That the said sir John Churchill, serj. Peck, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, be, and are hereby required, to appear at the bar of this house, to-morrow, at three in the afternoon, as counsel to plead in said Cause, on the behalf of the said sir Nich. Crispe, John Crispe, and Tho. Crispe, as they will answer the contrary to this house.—May 28. Counsel heard at the bar on both parts, upon the Petition and Appeal of sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. and the Answer of Diana viscountess Cranbourne, &c. and Tho. Dalmahoy, esq. put in thereunto concerning a decree in chancery: Resolved, That the Petition and Decree be dismissed.*

“The same day, the house heard the counsel of sir Nich. Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, upon their Petition and Appeal depending in this house; and also the counsel of the lady Bowyer, and Mr. Dalmahoy, upon their Answer thereunto; and, after a serious consideration thereof, the question being put, whether this Petition and Appeal shall be dismissed this house? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Proceedings against several Barristers for pleading before the Lords in Breach of an Order of the Commons.] June 1. Mr. serj. Pemberton, sir John Churchill, Mr. Serj. Peck, and Mr. Porter, attending at the door, in obedience to the order of the house of commons; and being severally called in, Mr. Speaker did severally acquaint them, that they were summoned to give an account to the house, of their appearing as Council at the bar of the house of lords, in the prosecution of a Cause depending upon an Appeal, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy, a member of this house, is concerned, in the manifest Breach of the Order of this house; and giving up, as much as in them lies, the rights and privileges of the commons of England: and they having answered and made their excuses to the effect following: “That they had no notice of the Order or Vots of this house, but what they had heard in common discourse abroad; and because they conceived Mr. Dalmahoy, a member of this house, might be concerned, they refused several times to appear as council, or to accept their fees; but being assigned of council for sir Nicholas Crispe, and an Order of the house of lords being served on them to attend at their peril, and that then attending, and Mr. Dalmahoy having put in his Answer in the lords house, and not insisting on his privilege afterwards, and the council for lady Bowyer, who was the principal party concerned, denying to be of council for Mr. Dalmahoy, they conceived they might safely appear as council without breach of the Order, or invading the rights and privileges of this house, which was not intended by them; and sir John Churchill, by way of farther excuse for himself, said, that he had witnesses ready to prove that Mr. Dalmahoy was willing and desirous to have the business go forward.

They are ordered into Custody.] And the said Mr. serj. Pemberton, sir John Churchill, Mr. serj. Peck, and Mr. Porter, did all of them humbly submit themselves to the pleasure of the house, if they had in any thing misbehaved themselves; and being withdrawn, and the matter debated, the question being put, That serj. Pemberton be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house. It was resolved in the affirmative. Ordered, That serj. Pemberton, sir John Churchill, Mr. serj. Peck, and Cha. Porter, esq. be taken into custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house*.

Other Reasons to be offered to the Lords.] June 2. Ordered, That sir Rd. Temple, Mr. Vaughan, and sir Thomas Lee do withdraw, and attend the Reasons upon the debates of the house: which was done and the Reasons agreed to are as follow: “The house of commons do agree with the lords, that conferences between the two houses, are essential to parliamentary proceedings, when they are agreed in the usual and parliamentary way; but the manner of the lords agreement to the Conference, to have been on Friday the 28th of May, in the Painted-Chamber, with limitation and proviso, did necessitate the house of commons to forbear to meet at that conference, and gave the first interruption to parliamentary proceedings, in conferences between the two houses.—For that the Conference desired by the commons, was upon their Privileges, concerned in the Answer of the lords to a Message of the house of commons, sent to the lords the 17th of May, in the Case of Mr. Onslow; to the which the lords did not agree, but did only agree to a conference concerning their Privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow; which was the only subject matter of the desired conference. The limitation in the lords agreement to a conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the conference that may any ways concern the lords judicature, is in effect a denial of any conference at all, upon the subject upon which it was desired; which ought not to be. The judicature which the lords claim in appeals against a member of the house of commons, and the privilege of that house in that case, is so involved, that no conference can be upon the matter, without some way touching the former. That this manner of agreeing to a conference, with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings between the two houses, in coming to conferences; and both seem to place a power in the managers of such conferences, to judge whether such provisos be broken or not, and accordingly to proceed or break off the conference upon their own judgments.—The house of commons doubt not, but that, when the lords have considered of what is delivered at this Conference, the good correspondence which the lords express they desire to continue between the two houses (which the commons are also no less careful to maintain) will induce them to remove the present interruption of coming to conferences; and therefore to agree to the conference, as it was desired by the house of commons, upon the privileges of their house, concerned in the lords Answer to the Message of the house of commons, in the Case of Mr. Onslow: That the particular limitation, that nothing be offered at the Conference, that may any way concern the judicature of the lords, appears unreasonable; for that their lordships judicature in parliament is circumscribed by the laws of the land, as to their proceedings and judgments; and is, as well as all other courts, subjected to parliament.”

* “During the debate upon this Resolution, some ladies were in the gallery, peeping over the gentlemen’s shoulders. The Speaker spying them, called out, ‘What Borough do those ladies serve for?’ to which Mr. Wm. Coventry replied, ‘They serve for the Speaker’s Chamber!’ Sir Tho. Littleton said, ‘The Speaker might mistake them for gentlemen with fine sleeves, dressed like ladies.’ Says the Speaker, ‘I am sure I saw petticoats.’” Grey.

The Lords Replies.] June 3. Mr. Vaughan reports, That the lord privy seal did manage the Conference, and had delivered the intent and occasion of the Conference; which Mr. Vaughan did report to the house, to the effect following: “The lords to take notice of the house of commons their ordering into custody of their serjeant, Mr. serj. Peck, sit John Churchill, Mr. serj. Pemberton, and Mr. serj. Porter, counsellors at law; assigned by their lordships to be of counsel in an Appeal heard at their lordships bar, in the case of sir Nich. Crispe, against the lady Bowyer, Mr. Dalmahoy, and others; the lords in parliament, where his majesty is highest in his royal estate, and where the last resort of judging upon writs of error, and appeals in equity, in all causes and over all persons, is undoubtedly fixed, and permanently lodged. It is an unexampled usurpation and breach of privilege against the house of peers, that their orders or judgments should be disputed, or endeavoured to be controlled, or the execution thereof obstructed by the lower house of parliament; who are no court, nor have authority to administer an oath, or give any judgment.—It is a transcendent invasion on the right and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws, which have provided, that no freeman shall be imprisoned or otherwise restrained of his liberty, but by due process of law.—This tends to the subversion of the government of the kingdom, and to the introducing of arbitrariness and disorder.—Because it is the nature of an injunction from the lower house, (who have no authority or power of judicature over inferior subjects, much less over the king and lords) against the orders and judgments of the supreme court.—We are farther commanded to acquaint you, that the lords have, therefore, out of that justice which they are dispensers of against oppression and breach of laws, by judgment of this court, set at liberty, by the gentleman usher of the black rod, all the said serjeants and counsellors; and prohibited the lieutenant of the tower, and all other keepers of prisons and goalers, and all persons whatsoever, from arresting and imprisoning, detaining, or otherwise molesting, or charging the said gentlemen, or any of them in this case: and if any person, of what degree soever, shall presume to the contrary, their lordships will exercise the authority with them entrusted for putting the laws in execution. And we are farther commanded to read to you a roll of parliament in the 1st year of the reign of king Hen. ivth, whereof we have brought the original with us.”

And a debate arising thereupon; resolved, That a Conference be desired with the lords upon the subject matter of the last Conference; and that these members following be appointed to prepare and draw up Reasons upon the debates of the house, to be offered at the conference.—Ordered, That the officer, in whose custody is the Record of the 1st of Hen. ivth, mentioned at the conference with the lords, do attend the committee appointed to draw up Reasons for another conference this afternoon.

Ordered, That no member of this house do attend the lords house, upon any summons from the lords, without leave of the house.

The Thanks of the House given to the Speaker for causing serj. Pemberton to be seized in Westminster-hall.] June 4. Ordered, “That the Thanks of the house be returned to Mr. Speaker, for causing Mr. Serj. Pemberton, formerly committed by order of this house to the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house, for Breach of Privilege, to be seized and taken into custody in Westminster-hall, for his breach of privilege.”

The four Barristers seized and sent to the Tower.] The house being informed, that sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. C. Porter, who were ordered to be taken into custody of the serj. at arms attending this house, are now in Westminster-hall; Ordered, That the serjeant at arms now attending this house, do go with his mace into Westminster-hall, and do execute the Order of this house and the Warrant of Mr. Speaker thereupon, for seizing and bringing in custody Mr. serj. Peck, sir John Churchill and Mr. Ch. Porter, for their breach of the privilege of this house.—The serjeant returning, gave an account, that he had executed the Order of this house and Mr. Speaker's Warrant thereupon, and had brought the said Mr. serj. Peck, sir John Churchill and Mr. Ch. Porter, in custody, into the Speaker's Chamber.—The question being put that sir John Churchill, Mr. serj. Peck, Mr. serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Ch. Porter be sent to the Tower, for their breach of privilege and contempt of the authority of this house? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That John Popham, esq. the now serjeant at arms attending this house, be protected against all persons that shall any ways molest or hinder him from executing his office.

Other Reasons to be offered the Lords.] Sir Tho. Lee reports from the Committee, the Reasons agreed to be offered at the Conference to be had with the lords, upon the matters delivered at the last conference, which were twice read, and agreed to, as follows: "Your lordships having desired the last Conference, upon matters of high importance, concerning the dignity of the king, and the safety of the government, the commons did not expect to hear from your lordships at that conference, things so contrary to, and inconsistent with, the matter upon which the said conference was desired, as were then delivered by your lordships. It was much below the expectation of the commons, that, after a representation of your lordships Message, of matters of so high importance, the particular upon which the conference was grounded, should be only the commitment of four lawyers to the custody of their own serjeant at arms, for a manifest violation of the privileges of their house. But the commons were much more surprized, when your lordships had introduced the conference with an assurance, that it was in order to a good correspondency between the two houses, that your lordships should immediately assume a power to judge the orders of the h. of commons for imprisonment of Mr. serj. Pemberton, Mr. serj. Peck, sir John Churchill, and Mr. Ch. Porter to be illegal and arbitrary: and the execution thereof a great indignity to the king's majesty; with many other high reflections upon the h. of commons, throughout the whole conference: whereby your lordships have condemned the whole h. of commons as criminal, which is without precedent or example, or any ground or reason so to do.—It is not against the king's dignity for the h. of commons to punish by imprisonment, a commoner that is guilty of violating their privileges, that being according to the known laws and customs of parliament, and the right of their privileges declared by the king's royal predecessors in former parliaments, and by himself in this.—But your lds. claiming to be the supreme court, and that his maj. is highest in his royal estate in the court of judicature there, is a diminution of the dignity of the king, who is highest in his royal estate in full parliament; and is derogatory to the authority of the whole parliament, by appropriating it to yourselves. The commons did not by this imprisonment infringe any privileges of the h. of peers, but only defend and maintain their own: on the other side, your lordships do highly intrench upon the rights and privileges of the h. of commons, by denying them to be a court or to have any authority or power of judicature; which, if admitted, will leave them without any power or authority to preserve themselves.—As to what your lordships call a transcendent invasion of the rights and liberties of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws; the h. of commons presume that your lordships know that neither the Great Charter, Petition of Right, or any other laws, do take away the law and custom of parliament, or of either house of parliament, or else your lordships have very much forgotten the Great Charter, and those other laws, in the several judgments your lordships have passed upon the king's subjects in cases of privilege. But the commons cannot find by Magna Charta, or by any law or ancient custom of parliament, that your lordships have any jurisdiction in cases of Appeal from the courts of equity.—We are farther commanded to acquaint you, that the enlargement of those persons in prison by order of the h. of commons, by the gentleman-usher of the black rod, and the prohibition which threatens all officers and other persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them; is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges of the h. of commons: and they have, therefore, caused them to be retaken into the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house, and have committed them to the Tower.—As for the Parliament-Roll of the 1st Hen. 1th, caused to be read by your lordships at the last Conference, but not applied; the commons apprehend it doth not concern the case in question: for that this record was made upon occasion of judgments given by the lords, to depose and imprison their lawful king; to which the commons were not willing to be made parties. And therefore the commons conceive it will not be for the honour of your lordships to make farther use of that Record.—But we are commanded to read your lordships the Parliament-Roll of 4 Edw. iii. N. 6, which if your lordships please to consider, they doubt not but your lordships will find occasion to apply it to the present purpose."

Ordered, That the Thanks of the house be given to the Speaker, for his care in issuing the Warrant for retaking the persons committed yesterday into custody.

The Serjeant at Arms was then ordered to be sent to the Tower; and the other serjeant at arms attending, was ordered to apprehend him for betraying his trust, in not executing his office, in bringing the persons committed yesterday to his custody, to the bar of the house.—An address was ordered to be prepared to be presented to his majesty, to desire a new Serjeant at Arms to attend the house.

June 5. Mr. Sec. Coventry acquainted the house, that it was his majesty's desire, that the house would adjourn till 4 in the afternoon, and that both houses should at that time attend him in the banqueting-house at White-hall.—A debate arising touching the Removal of John Popham esq. serjeant at arms in ordinary, attending the house yesterday, the farther debate thereof was adjourned till 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and then the house adjourned till 4 in the afternoon.

The King's Speech to both Houses at the Banqueting House] June 5. p. m. The commons met, and went in a body to his majesty at White-hall; and the house of lords being also present, his majesty made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; You may remember, that, at the meeting of this session, I told you no endeavour would be wanting to make the continuance of this parliament unpracticable. I am sorry that experience hath so quickly shewed you the truth of what I then said; but I hope you are well convinced, that the intent of all these contrivances is only to procure a Dissolution. I confess, I look upon it as a most malicious design of those who are enemies to me and the Church of England; and, were the contrivers known, I should not doubt but the dislike of their practices would alone be a means of bringing the houses to a good understanding; * but, since I cannot prescribe any way how to arrive to the discovery of it, I must tell you plainly my opinion, that the means to come to any composure between yourselves, cannot be without admitting of such free Conferences, as may convince one another by the Reasons then offered; or enable me to judge rightly of the differences, when all hath been said on both sides which the matter will afford: for I am not to suffer these differences to grow to disorders in the whole kingdom, if I can prevent it; and I am sure my judgment shall always be impartial between my two houses of parliament. But I must let you know, that whilst you are in debate about your Privileges, I will not suffer my own to be invaded. I have nothing more to say to you at this time, but to desire, as I did when we met first, that you would yet consider, and not suffer ill men's designs to hinder the sessions from a happy conclusion."

The house of lords presented an Address to his majesty, to remove the lieutenant of the

* Burnet affirms, "That lord Shaftsbury acknowledged himself to be the 'contriver,' but that others assured him, the thing happened of course." Marvell acknowledging, very candidly, the lords supremacy, in point of judicature, gives it as his opinion, "That the commons did not embark in earnest in that affair, but that some crafty members blew the coals, to prevent the Text's coming amongst them."

VOL. IV.

Tower; whereupon the lord treasurer reported his majesty's Answer, viz. "That his majesty hath considered the circumstances of the matter, and is not satisfied how with justice he can remove him."

The commons then took into consideration his majesty's Speech, and resolved, nem con, That the humble Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for the gracious expressions in his Speech this day made to both houses of parliament; and such members of this house as are of his majesty's privy council are desired to present the humble thanks of this house to his majesty.

Resolved, "That it doth not appear to this house, that any member thereof hath either contrived or promoted the Difference between the two houses of parliament; or, in asserting the Rights of the commons of England, and the Privileges of this house, hath done any thing inconsistent with his duty, or the trust reposed in him." And then adjourned to June 7.

June 7. The house resolved, That what serj. Popham did in retaking the four lawyers into his custody, and conducting them to the Tower of London, was in pursuance of his duty, and by the order of the house; and the farther debate concerning the said serjeant at arms was adjourned till Wednesday.

A copy of an Order from the house of lords for the hearing counsel in the Case of sir John Fagg, a member of this house, to-morrow morning, was then read and debated: and resolved, That as to the Case of Appeal brought against sir John Fagg in the house of lords, he shall have the protection and assistance of this house.

Resolved, nem con, "That if any person or persons shall be aiding or assisting in putting in execution any Sentence or Judgment that shall be given by the house of lords, upon the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, such person or persons shall be adjudged and taken to be betrayers of the rights and liberties of the commons of England, and the privileges of this house, and shall be proceeded against accordingly."

Ordered, That these Votes be made public, by setting them up in Westminster-hall, and in the lobby of this house, and the clerk of the house to take care to see it done.

June 7, p. m. The commons proceeded in the farther consideration of effectual means for the preservation of their Rights and Privileges, and resolved, 1. "That no person, committed by Order or Warrant of this house, for breach of the Privileges or contempt of the authority of the house, ought to be discharged during this session of parliament, without the Order or Warrant of this house. 2. That the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, in receiving and detaining in custody sir John Churchill, serj. Peck, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, hath performed his duty according to law; and for his so doing he shall have the assistance and protection of this house. 3. That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in case he hath, or shall receive any writ, warrant, order, or command, to remove or deliver any person or persons committed to his charge, for breach of the privileges, or contempt of the authority of the h. of commons, by order or warrant of the house, shall not make any return thereof, or yield any obedience thereto, before he hath first acquainted the house therewith, and received their order and direction how to proceed therein.—Ordered, That these Resolutions be immediately sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and then the house adjourned.

June 8. A Message was sent to the lords to remind them of the last conference; upon the subject matter delivered by the lords at the last conference.

Sir John Robinson informing the house, that he had received the four lawyers committed to his custody by this house, and denied to deliver them to the gentleman-usher of the black-rod; and that he was served last night with four writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring the said four lawyers before the king and his parliament at Westminster this morning, and craved the advice of the house what to do therein: Ordered, That the Thanks of the house do be given to the said sir John Robinson for his behaviour therein, and Mr. Speaker intimated to him, that he should forbear to return the said Writs of Habeas Corpus, which were read and debated; and the farther debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow morning, and a committee appointed to search the Lords Journals, to see what hath been done in the case of the four lawyers, the Writs of Habeas Corpus, and Mr. serjeant Popham, and to search for Precedents on the Writs of Habeas Corpus; and adjourned.

June 9. Sir Tho. Clarges reports, from the Committee to whom it was referred to search for Precedents touching Writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable in parliament; That the committee had found several precedents of Writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in parliament, and had considered of them: and that the Committee thereupon had agreed upon four Resolves to be presented to the house, which were severally agreed to, as follow: Resolved, nem. con. 1. "That no commoners of England committed by the Order or Warrant of the house of commons, for Breach of Privilege or contempt of the authority of the said house, ought, without order of the house, to be, by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, or any other authority whatsoever, made to appear and answer, or receive any determination in the house of peers, during that session of parliament wherein such persons were so committed. 2. That the Order of the house of peers, for the issuing out the Writs of Habeas Corpus concerning Mr. serj. Pemberton, Mr. serj. Peck, sir John Churchill, and Mr. Ch. Porter, is insufficient and illegal; for that it is general, and expresses no particular cause of privilege, and commands the king's great seal to be put to writs not returnable before the said house of peers. 3. That the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with these Resolutions, to the end that the said Writs of Habeas Corpus be superseded, as contrary to law and the privileges of this house. 4. That a Message be sent to the lords, to acquaint their lordships, that Mr. serj. Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Ch. Porter, were committed by order and warrant of this house, for manifest breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this house."

Ordered, That col. Birch do go up to the lords with a message, that a Conference is desired upon the subject matter of the last Conference.

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.] June 9. The king came to the house of peers, and made the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I think I have given sufficient evidence to the world, that I have not been wanting on my part, in my endeavours to procure the full satisfaction of all my subjects, in the matters both of Religion and Property: I have not only invited you to those considerations at our first meeting, but I have been careful through this whole session, that no concern of my own should divert you from them.—Besides, as I had only designed the matter of it to be the procuring of good laws, so for the gaining of them, I have already waited much longer than I intended; and should have been contented still to have continued my expectation, had there any hopes remained of a good conclusion. But I must confess, the ill designs of our enemies have been too prevalent against those good ones I had proposed to myself, in behalf of my people; and those unhappy differences between my two houses are grown to such a height, that I find no possible means of putting an end to them but by a prorogation. It is with great unwillingness that I make use of this expedient, having always inteded an adjournment, for the preservation of such Bills as were unfinished. But my hopes are, that, by this means, the present occasion of differences being taken away, you will be so careful hereafter of the public as not to seek new ones, nor to revive the old. I intend to meet you here again in winter, and have directed my Lord-Keeper to prorogue you till the 13th day of October next."

FOURTEENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on Opening the Session.
Oct. 13. Both houses met, according to prorogation*; and the king opened the session with the following Speech:

* In the APPENDIX to the present volume, No. VI. will be found a Tract intitled "A Letter from a Parliament-man to his Friend, concerning the Proceedings of the House of Commons, this last Session, begun the 13th of Oct. 1675," written by the earl of Shaftsbury.

"My lords and gentlemen; I meet you now with more than usual concern for the event of this session; and I know it is but what may reasonably be expected from that care I owe to the preservation of the government. The causes of the last prorogation, as I, for my part, do not desire to remember, so I hope no man else will, unless it be to learn from thence, how to avoid the like occasions for the future: and I pray consider how fatal the consequence may be, and how little benefit is like to redound to the people by it. However, if any thing of that kind shall arise, I desire you would defer those debates, till you have brought such public Bills to perfection as may conduce to the good and safety of the kingdom; and particularly I recommend to you, whatever may tend to the security of the Protestant Religion, as it is now established in the Church of England.—I must likewise desire your assistance in some Supplies, as well to take off the anticipations which are upon my Revenue, as for building of ships; and though the war has been the great cause of these anticipations, yet I find, by a late account I have taken of my expences, that I have not been altogether so good a husband, as I might have been, and as I resolve to be for the future: although, at the same time, I have had the satisfaction to find, that I have been far from such an extravagancy in my own expence, as some would have the world believe. I am not ignorant, that there are many who would prevent the kindness of my parliament to me at this time; but I as well know that your affections have never failed me: and you may remember, it is now above three years since I have asked you any thing for my own use. The rest I refer to my Lord Keeper."

The Lord Keeper Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Keeper made the following Speech:

"My Lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons. The causes of this present assembly, and the reasons which have moved his majesty to command your attendance upon him at this time, are of the highest importance. The king resolves to enter into terms of the strictest correspondence and endearment with his parliament, to take your counsel in his most weighty affairs: to impart all his cares to you; to acquaint you with all his wants and necessities: to offer you all that can be yet wanting to make you enjoy yourselves; to establish a right understanding between himself and his three estates, and between the estates themselves; to redress all your just complaints, and to put all his subjects at ease, as far as in him lies, and can consist with the honour and safety of the government. And, having made all these advances, he doubts not but you will behave yourselves like those that deserve to be called the king's friends, and that you will put him at ease too. There is no cause why any fears of religion or liberty should divert you: for his maj. hath so often recommended to you the considerations of Religion, so very often desired you to assist him in his care and protection of it, That the Defender of the Faith is become the advocate of it too, and hath left all those without excuse who still remain under any kind of doubts or fears. Again, the care of your Civil Rights and Liberties hath been so much his majesty's, that the more you reflect upon these concerns, the more you will find yourselves obliged to acknowledge his majesty's tenderness of you, and indulgence to you. Search your own annals, the annals of those times you account most happy, you will scarce find one year without an example of something more severe, and more extraordinary, than a whole reign hath yet produced. Peruse the histories of foreign nations, and you shall find statues and altars to have been erected to the memories of those princes, whose best virtues never arrived to half that moderation, which we live to see and enjoy. No king did ever meet a parliament with juster cause of confidence in their affections: and therefore his maj. will not suffer himself to doubt, but relies firmly upon it, that you never will forsake him, when he is under any kind of difficulties. He doth assure himself that you will now think fit to provide for his honour and your own safety, by helping him to pay some part of his Debts, and to make his Navy as great and as considerable, as it ought to be. For the greatness of the king, is the greatness and safety of his people. The springs and rivers which pay tribute to the ocean, do not lessen, but preserve themselves by that contribution. It is impossible that those affections that piety and allegiance first planted, which persecution could not abate, which the gracious influences of his majesty's happy government have hitherto increased, should now appear to wither and decay: but then the best indication of the heart is by the hand. And because it is of infinite moment to the king's affairs that there should be a cheerful concurrence to his Supplies, there let hand and heart both join in the oblation, for that will make it a sacrifice well pleasing indeed.—My Lords and Gentlemen; The happiness of this present age, and the fate and fortune of the next too, is very much in your hands, and at this time; all that you would desire to settle and improve; all that you would wish to secure and transmit to your posterities, may now be accomplished. Would you raise the due estimation and reverence of the Church of England to its just height? Would you provide for the safety and establishment of it? Do there want any laws to secure the peace and quiet of the state? Would you enrich and adorn this kingdom, by providing for the extent and improvement of Trade, by introducing new and useful Manufactures, and by encouraging those we have already? Would you prevent all frauds and perjuries, all delays and abuses in the administration of justice? Would you preserve a famous city from being depopulated by the suburbs? Would you restrain the excess of those new Buildings which begin to swarm with inhabitants unknown? All your Petitions of this kind will be grateful to the king; and you may with ease effect all these and much more which your great wisdoms will suggest to you. A little time will serve to make many excellent laws, and to give you the honour to be the Repairers of all our Breaches; so as that time be wholly employed upon the public, and not taken up by such considerations as are less meritorious. If therefore there be any, without doors, that labour to disunite your counsels, or to render them ineffectual; if they can hope that the occasions for this may arise from some Differences within yourselves, or hope by those differences to disguise their own dissatisfactions to your good proceedings; it is in your power to defeat those hopes, to pull off this disguise, and to secure a happy conclusion of this meeting, by studying to preserve a good correspondence, and by a careful avoiding all such questions as are apt to engender strife. And, if ever there were a time, when the gravity of the council, the wisdom, and good temper of a parliament, were necessary to support that government which only can support these assemblies, certainly this is the hour. You see with what zeal the king hath recommended to you a good Agreement between yourselves, and that he doth it with all the care and compassion, all the earnestness and importunity, fit for so great a prince to express, who would be very sorry that any such misfortune as your disagreement should either deprive him of your advice and assistance, or his people of those good laws which he is ready to grant you. There is no other way our enemies can think of, by which it is possible for this session to miscarry; for Fears and Jealousies cannot enter here, calumnies and slanders will find no place amongst wise and good men. They that use these arts abroad, will quickly be discredited, when the world shall see the generous effects of your confidence. Men will despair of attempting any disturbance in the state, when they see every step that tends that way, serves only to give you fresh occasions to testify your loyalty and your zeal. You have all the reason in the world to make men see this; for you have the same monarchy to assert, the same church to defend, the same interests of nobility and gentry to maintain, the same excellent king to contend for, and the same enemies to contend against.—And now, my Lords and Gentlemen, since the whole session of parliament is, in the judgment and construction of our law, but as one day, let us all endeavour that the morning of it, the first entrance upon it, may be with such fair and auspicious circumstances as may give the whole kingdom an assurance of a bright and cheerful day. Let no ill humours gather into clouds to darken or obscure it, for this day is a critical day, and more depends upon that judgment of our affairs which will be made by it, than can easily be imagined. It imports us therefore to take care that no part of this time be lost; let every precious minute of this day be spent in receiving such acts of grace and goodness as are ready to flow from the king, and in making such retributions for them as may become the grateful hearts of the best of subjects to the best of kings. So shall this day become a day of disappointment and discomfort to our enemies, but to us and all good men a glorious day, a day of triumph and deliverance, a memorable and joyful day to this present, and to all future generations.*

Debate on the King's Speech.] The king's and lord keeper's Speeches being ended, the house of commons came down, and sat some time, looking on one another in a profound silence, till at length sir Thomas Meres broke silence and said, 'He was sorry to see the house, as it were, in an amazement, and was afraid it might prove ominous, and therefore prayed the Speaker to acquaint the house with the substance of the king's speech.'—The Speaker excused himself for that, not daring to rely so much upon his memory. It was then moved, that some Bill might be read, and sir Tho. Littleton desired it might be that of the last session, 'for appropriating the Customs to the use of the fleet.' But the Speaker objected against that, because it was indorsed on the backside, and not fair written, and he had no brief of it. Upon which sir Nich. Carew told him, he had a Bill which was not indorsed, but fair written, of which he had a brief. It was a Bill, to incapacitate any Papist to sit in either house of parliament, without taking the Test in the late Act against Popery, &c.* It was read accordingly, and ordered a 2d reading sine die. After this, Mr. Sec. Williamson brought in the king's Speech, which was read, and thereupon a motion was made, 'That Thanks might be given to his majesty for his gracious care of the Protestant religion.' To which Mr. Secretary Coventry answered, 'That it would not be decent to separate one part of the king's Speech from the other.' Upon which some disputes did arise for a time, till it was moved, that the consideration of the Speech might be adjourned till Monday, which was agreed to, provided the house might be adjourned till that time, which was accorded; each party hoping for strong recruits.*

Mr. Howard's Letter found in St. James's Park.] Before the house adjourned, there happened a passage, which requires something to be said antecedently to make it the better understood.—In one of the actions between the Germans and the French, after Turenne's death, col. John Howard, brother to the earl of Carlisle, amongst many Englishmen, was killed, which being told for news in St. James's Park, it was reported, that lord Cavendish, and sir T. Meres, being together, when they heard it, should say, 'That they were well enough served, and that they wished that never any Englishman might fare better, who was to serve abroad against a vote of parliament.' Upon which, a paper, that called lord Cavendish and sir Tho. Meres, 'incendiaries,' with other such language, was given about, subscribed 'Thomas Howard, of Richmond and Carlisle.' This paper was brought into the house by sir Trevor Williams, who informed the house, 'that it was found the night before in St. James's Park, by his servant, and given unto him, who finding two honourable members shamefully traduced in it, could not but acquaint them with it,' and having no opportunity before this morning, showed it to the members concerned in the house. Upon which lord Cavendish, seeming much surprized at it, went out of the house in heat, which was the beginning of the thing. Mr. Russel then acquainted the house, 'that he saw some disorder in that lord, and, being afraid of the consequence, desired he might be commanded not to go out.' Sir Trevor then told the aforesaid story, and the paper was read, viz.:

"Sir; The last severity upon Roman Catholics having forbid me the ambition to any place or pretension at court, and the severe usage of the gout making me unfit to appear in any company, but where I am well acquainted; besides a most sensible loss of my poor brother John, killed at Strasbourg, I resolved not only to retire in person, but thought, from all temptations this world could give me, and to spend the rest of my days with such domestic and private content, as a man of those principles, and some sense, might hope for, in an honourable retreat. But it happens by a certain, though unjust and malicious accident, that I am awakened from the quiet and repose I hoped for, and find myself engaged by the nearest ties of friendship and honour, (obligations I have always esteemed dearer than my life) to let some unworthy and base people see that I am yet alive. Not long since, in St. James's Park, lord Cavendish and sir Thomas Meres, two bold and busy members, upon the news of the French retreat over the Rhine, where many English were reported to be killed, (which, amongst all honest men, was much regretted) these barbarous incendiaries, with a most plausible temper of such worthy patriots, openly declared, 'that it was but a just end for such as went against any vote of parliament.' With all respect to that hon. house, that cankered and malicious saying will neither deserve the thanks of that house, (it being false as to my brother, who went by his majesty's command, at the head of his company, before that vote was in force) nor the approbation of any man out of it. I will not trouble myself, nor others, to let you see, by any exact character, how these two worthy and unbiassed Senators ought to be credited. Next October will produce such effects of their care and capacities of securing property and religion in a Christian and humane way, that I believe I shall be called to the bar, to answer their slanders, as I presume they will call them; yet I doubt they will not, for though an ill orator, I shall most certainly prove what I write. As for any other way of revenge, I do not anyway apprehend it; for men that are given to spit blood, seldom draw it. Sir, I have troubled you too long with my just resentments, but knowing the share you have always taken in my concerns, I must beg of you, that you will in St. James's Park, at the Mall, disperse these copies, it being all the way that is left to do right to the dead; and, to assure you, that I will not do you the ill office of dispersing a libel, I will sign the copies with all my titles. T. HOWARD, of Richmond and Carlisle." From Ashtead in Surry, Aug. 30, 1675. ●

Lord Cavendish and sir Tho. Meres were enjoined not to prosecute any quarrel against Mr. Howard, or to send or accept any challenge in order thereto, without acquainting the house.

Oct. 18. Resolved, "That sir Trevor Williams, sir Anth. Irby, sir Tho. Littleton, sir Ch. Harbord, and Mr. Crouch, be appointed to go to Mr. Howard, who, by reason of his indisposition of the gout, could not attend the house, to know of him whether he will own the aforesaid paper."

Debate on the King's Debts; Anticipations of the Revenue, and Supply.] Sir Philip Musgrave moves to proceed in the matter of Supply and Religion, mentioned in the king's Speech, and to appoint a day for each of them.

Sir Edw. Dering seconds the motion, and hopes for as full a concurrence from every gentleman, as from him. Religion is the honour of the nation, and has always been the care of this house. Little progress was made the last session, by reason of the Difference with the lords; but would begin now early, that we may ripen things to perfection before we rise. Another thing, as properly under our cognizance as Popery, is, regulating mens manners, very worthy of our consideration. Under that notion of religion, it may be done. We want censores morum, as well as inquisitors of faith: thinks, that else we cannot see Religion prosper. Our dominion of the sea is magni nominis umbra, without strength there—It is not prudent to trust the nation long to the French army's going into winter quarters.

Sir John Holland. The king is pleased to desire a Supply; we are all here to speak our minds freely, and hopes we shall with that modesty which becomes us, and desires to be heard out with patience and favour. He is no honest man, that loves not the king, the government, and the nation. If we consider, that, after such supplies, never given before, (Edw. iii. who reigned above 50 years, never had near this king's Supply), now to have every branch of the Revenue anticipated; and not only that, but Debts so great, to the ruin of the people; and, besides, the king's wants so great, as to be forced to break the credit of the Bachequer, to the ruin of widows, orphans, and numerous other people, as it puts so great a damage upon our English manufactures: he will go no farther, for instance, than his own county, the city of Norwich—These are necessary to the king's sovereignty, and preservation of trade—The fleet neglected, and his nearest and most powerful neighbours so armed—The French, by over-balance of our trade—When you were told, the last meeting, that the French commodities imported, over-balance to the value of 900,000*l.* and though London is not very sensible of this, yet the country, from whence supply must come, is impoverished by it. The Chimney-money and Excise, brought hither, and the nobility's expences, increase the consumption here, and hinder the money will come. By this means, the country, in some places, is drained of money, and, by reason of the cheapness of all commodities, farms are cast into gentlemen's hands, and no hopes of remedy on their parts; and the farmers come here, and set up taverns, and alehouses, and keep lodgings, and there are no hopes of their return back into the country. The humour of the yeomanry is changed; the youth are not bred up as they used to be. This, in short, is our condition; and yet, for the king's necessity, as well as our safety, the king must have supply; else the people cannot be protected; but, if the charge of the government be greater than the people can bear, the government cannot stand, though supported by arms. But, should it be so endeavoured, it cannot be long endured by the temper of the English nation. Would to God he could say, this was not our condition! There is a necessity that it must be said. He cannot but think himself bound in conscience to take this opportunity to say, that the charge of the government is greater than the nation can bear—Cannot but say, the expences of the Court may be reduced; especially the matters of the Treasury may be better managed. The truth is, the prodigal and excessive way of living now, was unknown to our forefathers, who kept hospitality. It is a leprosy that has almost overspread the nation. Hears an unusual discontent, and want will put men upon desperate resolutions, and from that arose those unhappy times we had.—This may bring us again into the unhappy hands we were in; and we shall be an easy prey and conquest to whoever will over-run us—Was, am, and ever will be, for the due rights of this house, and against the peers encroachments; would not give, and, he hopes, the house will not be ready to take, new occasion of difference. Upon the whole, moves to enter into a present consideration of an humble Petition to the king, with the lords concurrence, in which, in all dutiful, modest, and loyal manner we may represent to him 'the present poverty of the nation, together with the mischiefs of unseasonable prorogations; and that we be continued without prorogation, until we have dispatched Bills for the security of Religion and Property; and then declare, that we will give Supply to provide shipping and stores, to be equal, if not stronger than our neighbours.'

Sir Tho. Lee. When he considers the old course of parliament, what has been moved is not the usual way: upon your books, a motion being made for a Supply, the house went into a Grand Committee; therefore moves for it to-morrow.

Sir Rob. Carr seconds the motion for to-morrow, to consider Anticipations and Supply.

Sir Tho. Meres would have that ancient Order, which Lee mentioned, read. When that Order is lost, the house of commons is lost. If there be occasion for Supply, let us see it at a grand committee.

Mr. Neale has heard, that the Lord Treasurer has brought the State of the Revenue into the Council.* Would see that here, to be your guide the better, in what you are to do: and moves, that all the money may be employed to the use we give it, on penalty of treason.

The Order mentioned was read, viz. "That a motion being made for a Supply, is not presently to be entered upon, in the house, but the consideration referred to a committee of the whole house."

Mr. Sackerevell is willing to take Anticipations upon the Customs, and the King's Debts, into consideration, as soon as may be: to be plain, he believes there is no need of a Supply, when things shall be well considered.

Sir Tho. Meres sees there is no occasion of a Supply as plain as the sun that shines, and believes he can make it out: no man has yet made a direct motion but Holland, which is a conditional one, and a very good one; so that a committee cannot go upon it, without being first moved by some-body.

Mr. Secretary Coventry moved it.

Sir John Ernly must inform the house, that we want a squadron of ships, and 30 at least, of 1st, 2nd, and 3rd rates; therefore seconds Coventry, for Supply for building of Ships.

* "All this time, the principal business at Whitehall had been to inspect the Revenue, and to put the Disbursements on such a footing, that the growing frugality of the house of commons might the less affect both king and minister for the time to come. By a Paper of the Lord Treasurer's dated Sept. 29, 1675, and presented to the Council Oct. 8, it appears, that the annual Disbursements amounted to 1,387,770*l.* the Revenue to 1,358,000*l.* which was clogged with Anticipations, to the value of 866,954*l.*; and yet by a general Account of all the Receipts and Issues in the Exchequer, it farther appears, that between the 30th of June 1673, and the 25th of June 1675, 4,529,649*l.* &c. had been received, and 4,526,945*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* discharged. This scrutiny gave rise to a Scheme of Retrenchments, by which an annual saving was to be made of 250,000*l.* On the other hand, all imaginable expedients were put in practice, to make the Exchequer rise higher than ever; insomuch, that even the smallest branches were not forgotten: and particular orders were sent from the Lord Treasurer to the several officers, to know exactly what their yearly value was; how the same arose; how charged; how accounted for; and how far it was improvable." Ralph.

Resolved, "That this house will to-morrow, resolve into a Grand Committee, to take into consideration that part of his majesty's Speech, which relates to a Supply for taking off Anticipations upon his majesty's Revenue, and building more ships."

Mr. Howard's Answer to the Committee reported.] Oct. 19. Sir T. Littleton, and the rest of the gentlemen mentioned, who were sent to Mr. Howard, reported, That, in obedience to the order of the house, they went to Mr. Howard, to demand of him, whether he signed, or owned, the Paper then produced to him? Who replied, 'Gentlemen, being informed of some displeasure of the house of commons (for whom I always had, and ever shall have, a most dutiful regard) I doubt, that, if I should give any Answer to your Message, being a person unexperienced in such affairs, I might give occasion of their displeasure; and therefore I must beg your pardon; and I must answer only to what can be proved against me; and, in the mean time, I do now again, as I did, before Mr. Collingwood, to the Speaker, promise, upon my word and honour, not to question any person for any thing relating thereunto.'

Debate thereon.] Mr. Sacheverell moves to have him committed to the Tower.

Mr. Powle. For a private gentleman to vilify your members with the terms of 'unworthy, biassed senators, barbarous incendiaries, busy members!' If men without doors may do this it takes away liberty of speech. Former times have had nothing like it; only in queen Eliz.'s time, Arthur Hall, who was a member, (his gentleman none) for publishing a libellous book, called 'Opera Tenebrarum,' was called to the bar, and giving no satisfactory answer, was committed to the Tower, and fined 500*l.* and not to return thence until he had given satisfaction; and hopes this gentleman will be so punished.

Mr. Mallet would put the thing in a way of proof, since Howard puts it upon you: there is another precedent, of Withers the poet, which, if true, does us justice: he requires it, and would vindicate the members reflected on.

'The Speaker knows not when you have sent for a man in custody, upon no other ground than what is before you.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. If the gentleman refused to appear, and you had the proofs before you, then it would be proper to send for him in custody. He would have a better answer had it yet given; but sending for in custody is a kind of punishment before proof.

Sir Ch. Harbord. The offence is yet neither proved nor confessed: would have a day's time; and if he cannot come, he may be brought hither, before you commit him.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Knows the gentleman, and has a value for him; but nobody will deny this to be a breach of privilege. To the purpose: a man, you suppose, has broken your privilege, and he keeps his bed, and you send for him, and he will not tell you whether he has broken your privilege or no. You send for men, upon presumption of breach of privilege. If the gentleman cannot come to attend you, he may remain in custody of the serjeant. It has been a hundred times done in breach of privilege only.

Sir John Ernly looks upon committing Howard as a pre-judging him, it not appearing to be his act: sending for him in custody is a punishing him: would you have a man confess a thing against himself? Go in the common way; send for him, but not in custody.

Sir Rob. Howard is as much for the honour of the house as any man, although related to this gentleman. When you send for him, and he appears, and you censure him, he will abide by that censure.

Sir John Birkenhead. You send for people in custody, when afraid of an escape. He is a prisoner before you send for him, by his lameness of the gout: when a felon is upon his trial, he must speak with his shackles off, at as much ease as may be. The loss of his brother, whom he loved more than his own life, might make him utter, it may be, something he should not.

Lord Cavendish. The words, the paper says, he should say of col. John Howard (whom he knew not) are, 'That it was a just judgment he was killed;' which was a foolish thing; and he will not own saying of a foolish thing. But possibly he might say, 'He was sorry this gentleman should die fighting against the interest of his country.' If he said it not then, he does now say it.

Sir Tho. Meres. As to saying, 'he was sorry that an Englishman should die in that cause,' he is sorry for it; and it was always the thought of his heart, and is still so.

Sir Tho. Lee had always a respect for this gentleman; but it is not what respect you show the gentleman, but how this matter will stand upon your Journal to posterity. Every paper, read by order in the house, must be entered; and for sending an answer not direct to a paper of so great reflection, what will appear upon your books but sending a committee of yours? (which, by the way, was a mistake to a man that has offended you.) For your honour, you must send for him; and nothing else moves him to speak in it.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Whenever a mistake arises amongst persons of honour, all quarrels cease. This here arises upon such a thing; and no question but Howard will retract what is grounded upon a mistake. If this be so, an end may be put to this matter. He is persuaded that Howard had not the least intent to reflect on the house; because, when gentlemen fall out, they invent and take up names and words provoking, though not true; therefore would have Howard asked, whether he had the least thought of reflection on the house.

Mr. Stockdale would not have Howard fore-judged, but let him have a day for notice to appear.

Sir Nich. Carew is sensible of the gentleman's infirmity, the gout; it is his own. Has known him long to be an honourable person; and hopes, as to this matter, he will be innocent: would have a day appointed for his appearance.

Ordered, "That Mr. Howard be sent to, to attend this house on this day seven-night."

Sir Nich. Carew. Be the Paper whose it will, it is a scandalous paper; and moves to have it burnt.

Sir The. Littleton. If the Paper be burnt, we shall not have it here to prove it. Would not have it burnt till the whole thing be over.

Mr. Garraway. Until you declare it a breach of privilege, what will you send for Howard for? Therefore moves to have it voted a scandalous paper, and a breach of privilege.

Col. Birch. The Paper might be read, before you put the question; but not upon an adjourned debate.

The Speaker. The Paper was once read, and needs not be read again.—The Letter was then read as above.

Sir Tho. Meres. If he speaks not, he may be thought to yield to the report of the letter. He has had papers, long before this, thrown into his house, and has been so far from giving you the trouble, that he has not so much as spoken of them; but, as to this Paper, it was handed to him in the house, and he showed it to lord Cavendish.

Further Debate on the King's Debts, Anticipations of the Revenue, and Supply.] The house went into a grand committee on the king's Speech: sir Cha. Harbord in the chair.

Sir Tho. Meres. Your first business is, taking the Anticipations upon the Customs into consideration. Pray let us see what they are.

Mr. Sacheverell. If there be such Anticipations, they are either Occasioned by the war, or voluntarily. If voluntarily, he believes, nobody will take them off. Birch said once, '4*l.* per head, per month, might defray the navy charge;' and Pepys said, 'it cost not so much.' Suppose the fleet consisted of 100 sail, and 49 ships of attendance, and, according to Pepy's list, 30,000 men, it will not come, for 4 months, to 800,000*l.* We all know the tax-prices, &c. and we in peace, 1,700,000 or 1,800,000*l.* And if this cannot defray the charge of 9,300,000*l.* leaves you to judge. Now, let the managers of the Navy show how they have expended 1,700,000*l.* and they say something.

Mr. Walter. Hears something said, that makes him stand up, for the honour of king and people. There is no other trust in the government than where the law makes it. The king has it; and if we supply, or not supply, we have our trust. Sees there is much stress laid upon that part of the king's Speech relating to Anticipations. The king says, "There has been ill husbandry, besides what fell out in the war." And the king must take it upon him. But Bracton says, 'the king cannot err'—'Ill management!' between the wisdom of the king, and direction of the law, you may know where the fault is. We believed, when the king was called back, that the law was come again. Pray let not the Standing Army be brought under that consideration of Anticipations. The king speaks of the government; he owns his care of it; and no government can be more advantageous to him than this. It is a monarchy. The king governs by law. Let us look back to the evils we had, in order to prevent more. There was Loan, and Ship-money, and extremes begat extremes. The house would then give no money. Let the king rely upon the parliament; we have settled the crown and the government. It is strange that we have sat so many years, and given so much money, and are still called upon for Supply. The lords may give Supply with their own money, but we give the peoples; we are their proxies. The king takes his measures, by the parliament, and he doubt not but that all the commons will supply for the government; but giving at this rate that we have done: we shall be 'a branch of the revenue.' They will 'anticipate' us too. But, let the officers say what they will, we will not make these mismanagements the king's error. It is better it should fall upon us than the king. We give public money, and must see that it goes to public use. Tell your money, fix it to public ends, and take order against occasions of this nature for the future. We cannot live at the expence of Spain, that has the Indies; or France, who has so many millions of revenue. Let us look to our government, fleet, and trade. It is the advice that the oldest parliament-man among you can give you; and so, God bless you!

Sir Tho. Lee expected to have known what occasion there is for asking money for these Anticipations, or what they would ask. If gentlemen knew, they would have told us before now. He expects it.

Sir Rob. Howard. If it be expected that he should give you an account of what belongs to his office, he is ready to do it. As to former Anticipations, he shall wave them, but shall tell you how late Anticipations have been struck upon money growing out of the revenue. If you please to know this, you shall. He believes; in tallies, not satisfied, there is not much exceeding, 800,000*l.* value; some of this charge, about 80,000*l.* is growing out. Tallies, not satisfied, 800,000*l.* value; some other charges to the bankers, as a year's interest; with that prospect, the whole may be a million; by which charge the Excise is wholly taken up; not above 5 or 6,000*l.* will remain, at the most. He has nothing to tell you, but the king's condition, and will make all this appear indisputably, if you please, in writing; and if he does not now explain himself, he will do it fully.

Sir Tho. Meres. Expences, we see, are more and more, and things worse and worse; and no occasion of Supply. There is no end in giving, to take off these Anticipations, and we cannot in conscience do it. Our ancestors gave not their money so away, because they would be bountiful. The people give us no such authority. The defray of all public charges, and the king's living, may be made out sufficiently by the revenue. But the charge of the government is not supportable, at this rate.

Lord Cavendish. If this be admitted a supposition, then we must satisfy all debts. The people have trusted us with their money, and Magna Charta is not to be given up, with their money, and liberty, into a bottomless pit. Moves for the question, 'Whether an Aid shall be granted for taking off these Anticipations from the king's revenue.'

Sir John Duncombe. It is hard to calculate the charge of an expensive war, till the end of it. Howard has told you all the particulars of Anticipations, clearly and faithfully, and with the most, he believes the sum to be between 7 and 800,000*l.* You know the constitution of the government; when it has war, it comes to you for aid. The king tells you he was engaged in a war, and over-run his measures in it: he is so much in debt, that he knows not whither to go but to you; he knows it is hard to come by, and you have been often asked; but if the king be at ease; you are all at ease. If the crown be in debt, it is a misfortune to the creditors, and many people besides. It has not cost so much money, in any three kings reigns, as this war has been: this is the king's condition, as it appears to him: would not put extremities to work, as it is a dangerous thing.

Mr. Sacheverell would have Duncombe explain what he means by 'putting extremities to work.'

Sir John Duncombe. Means, by 'putting extremities to work,' making the crown, and them that depend upon it, uneasy.

Mr. Powle is sorry to hear any thing laid upon the king in this business; he thinks him to have the least part in it. Had he those counsellors and officers constantly to represent to him the state of his Revenue, it would not be thus. But some officers may find private advantages out of public necessities. The war was carried on before without any Anticipations; and, since that, many great sums have been received; as the prize-money, French and Dutch money, and advances on the excise, and hearth-money, and now two years of peace, and then three fourths of this tax to come in. No fleet, and hardly necessary repairs upon the ships in harbour, and the debt yet more, not less. Is not this a sum to astonish every body, in time of peace? What will become of us in a foreign war, if this expence be in peace? fears that the Church-revenue may go in time of war. He believes the Revenue so great already, that, in a short time, these Anticipations may wear off. Supply is, in this case, but to increase 'ill husbandry.' As to the Navy, believes that due consideration, in time, may be had of it; and, when we are free of these Anticipations, we may go on more cheerfully with the other.

VOL. IV.

Mr. Sec. Conentry. A considerable charge of the Revenue is left out; the foot army, the ten regiments. He, as in a double capacity, as servant to the king, and member of the house, has informed himself, as well as he can, in these things. Redressing of Grievances, and giving Supply, is the business both of court and country. The point before us is, whether we shall first go upon Supply, or enquire into Mis-managements. It is easier for the king to redress a Grievance, than for the people to give a tax. It is necessary now to lay open the state of the kingdom; it will be too late to think on it on Monday, if you pass your vote against taking off the Anticipations to-day. By the last intelligence, the French had 55 sail of ships at sea, and we 7, and so far out of repair, as not in 2 or 3 months to be repairable. The trade and peace of Europe is ours now; and a short time may show that we are upon the precipice of the most inevitable ruin that ever was. It is an unsafe condition we are in, when no longer safe than whilst our neighbour pleases. Suppose Articles concluded at Nimeguen,—that hour peace is made with France there, marshal Montmorency, an old, and considerably experienced officer, may land 30,000 men in England. He may draw them out of Maestricht, and the rest of the garrisons of Flanders, being all full, and may march with what army he pleases, 40,000 men lither, if he pleases. If you cannot oppose him at sea, our condition is desperate. If men be faulty, let them answer it that manage it, and consider, whether time else will not be lost, for consideration of the Navy. When you have done this, for the present, agree with the king for a certain revenue for the Navy, for the future. Let us not make our faith so much upon what may be showed us, as upon what is already showed us. If it be not meant to maintain ships, when you have them, and whenever God shall bless you and the king with a right understanding, and leave all you would have, without a navy—Your vote can furnish the king with credit; but, without it, neither your hearts nor your prayers can build ships. Suppose a town on fire, and a man steal the buckets, he deserves to be hanged, but believes the magistrates will not resolve, therefore, never to buy more buckets.

Sir Tho. Meres. Be the Anticipations what they will, he shall give his vote to pay none. Has observed, that if once we begin to tumble papers over, we are wearied out, and give money, and leave the question. It is said, 'do not make councils desperate; therefore give money; but, he says, therefore give no money. At Christmas 1671, such desperate councils followed giving money, that he has no mind to mention them, repeal of no less than 30 laws by the Declaration, a standing Army, the Exchequer stopped up, and a War without advice of parliament, and the Triple League broken, and a League with France made; and, if you give no more money, you will have no more desperate councils; for these were upon your giving money; therefore now would give none.

Mr. Sawyer. When, we gave formerly, our judgments governed our wills. As for the desperate counsellors, they were those who were protected by your pardons. Some were laid aside, and some are laid in the dust. Shall we say, desperate counsellors contracted these debts? and shall we leave things desperate? now, whether the king, by his good husbandry, can pay off these debts? if the government be not maintained, it must drop, one time or another. Would farther enquire, whether possibly there is a way to take these Anticipations off. Would have these matters first inspected, before the question.

Sir Wm. Coventry will apply himself singly to matters of Anticipation. This is the first time any thing has been asked for this matter. The last time we met, it was not big enough for an aid. It must be nursed up to be big enough to be paid; but it is free for us all to speak here. He can never concur, that this debt, contracted by a war, against the opinion of this house, should be preferred before that which widows and orphans call for. We passed once assignments, especially to pay debts; and were there nothing but this in it, can never prefer this of Anticipations, until the house think themselves rich enough. These men that lent upon the customs, &c. had warning enough, by the Bankers precaution, and let them take it, in God's name. This has had the provision of the house already, but it is diverted and gone. Remembers what Clifford said; 'you shall have a fleet; you shall have no more of debts.' Nothing was said then, that the revenue was not able to bear the charge of the government. But it was improper to call for the account; and had it been proper for you, it would have been brought, and they would have been armed for it, over and over. There is something mentioned, as to the peace abroad (God preserve our own!) which would be the greatest misfortune that could befall us. It is happy for us, that they abroad spend their strength upon one another, if it be so great as is said. But this should not make him give up the game: believes that our neighbours are not so stupid as to give France leave to over-run us. But when we compare kingdom with kingdom, and nation with nation, they have no bowels, and are to have no bowels. Friendship has failed, and always will fail: and it is not the interest of Holland to let France be master of England. France, who has long made love to Flanders, comes only to see Dunkirk, and to fortify it. That king sees that the Dutch have a great fleet, and, believes, not to defend the Hague: but then it is the interest of Holland to support Flanders: says France, 'England is engaged, I will break the Triple League;' and for this they have hazarded their all. This digression is only to show you, that, if peace was made, we need not give up the game; and the rest of the princes would think it their interest to hinder such an accession as England to the crown of France. But this business of Anticipations seems to have influence on that very thing: if apprehensions that the Confederates are weak, it may induce a peace. What we do here can be no secret; they know our votes, and see we incline more to them than the French; but the Confederates apprehend the king's ministers more inclined to the French. Does England judge amiss of this? The Confederates will so; they hear the king is clearing his revenue, and we fear he will declare against us, having more men, in the armies against us, than for us. Therefore he is against taking off the Anticipations by a Supply.

Sir John Duncombe proffers a state of the expences, and the incomes of the revenue. —But they would not be received.

Col. Birch. Whenever the house has been upon matters of money, he has been thought to be too forward. It may be, he thinks so too. Could never have believed to have heard that these Anticipations have risen from a war, which this house had no opinion of. Not only without the consent of the house begun at first, but even against the opinion of our ancestors. We are now not only out of the Triple League, but out of all league. In one session, Thanks were given to the king for this League; and, in another, we were to give money to pay for the breaking it. If 90 of a 100, nay, 99, should bear him say, that, so pay these Anticipations, is for the interest of the country (and he is acquainted in three or four counties) they would call him he knows not what. Therefore is against Supply.

Mr. Vaughan. When you have passed your Vote, the counsel will prove good counsel, and the war a good war. When so many millions have been given, he lies in amazement how money can be called for: and now that we are forced to pay Subsidies, at our doors, to poor families ruined by the Exchequer, stands in amazement at the motion.

Sir Tho. Meres will not say, at the rate of vain expences, how to make the revenue good, notwithstanding the payment of these Anticipations, but believes it may be done.

Sir Edw. Dering takes the Anticipations, at least, to be 700,000*l.* and yet finds we are going into a Vote against taking them off. Is of opinion there were dangerous counsels; he never stood up to defend any of them, nor ever will. Those counsels and counsellors are laid aside. As for danger of Popery, the Protestant Religion was never more protected. Let us shut our hands until we open our eyes. A voluntary engagement of the Revenue may be justifiable; the officers will subject the Revenue to enquiry. Would have the paper that Duncombe offered, received; and adjourn the farther debate to Thursday.

Sir Tho. Littleton. We are not told how much of these Anticipations is for service to come, or what is already paid; so believes it not such a bug-bear as it is represented. As for the great stop of the Exchequer, though done in time of war, no reason why in time of peace. Now the continuation is without privy seal, or order of the privy council; though formerly it was otherwise. As for Popery, there was a Proclamation, but sees not that matter at all mended. At this time, few men doubt the intention to make peace, to fetch off the French with flying colours, and to dissolve the present confederacy. These are the present counsels, and if they be desperate, would not make the last counsels worse than the first.

The Commons refuse a Supply for the taking off the Anticipations upon the Revenue.] The house having resumed, sir Ch. Harbord reported from the committee of the whole house, That they had taken that part of his majesty's Speech into consideration, which relates to a Supply for taking off the Anticipations upon his Revenue; and had agreed (172 to 165) a Vote to be reported to the house; and humbly moved from the said committee, that the house would again resolve into a committee of the whole house on Friday next, to consider the other part of his maj.'s Speech relating to a Supply for building more ships. Which Vote of the committee was as followeth; viz. "That it is the opinion of the committee, not to grant his majesty any Supply for the taking off the Anticipations upon his majesty's Revenue."—Resolved, "That this house doth agree with the committee, that it is the opinion of this house, not to grant his majesty any Supply for the taking off the Anticipations upon his majesty's Revenue."^o

* "When the king's Speech came under consideration, a demand was made on one side, and allowed as reasonable on the other, of a scrutiny into those Debts and Charges, which the people were called upon to make good: the result of which was, that it appeared, the expence of the late two years war with the Dutch amounted, in the whole, to 2,040,000*l.* and that the money given by parliament; what arose from the Customs, which ought to have been appropriated; what was gained by prizes; and the 600,000 Patroons given by the Dutch; at least amounted to 3,040,000*l.* Whence it was inferred, that, instead of the king's being run almost a million in debt by the war, as those who took upon them to answer for the court alledged, he might have been a million in pocket. It was, upon these principles, farther observed, that, by the illegal stop of the Exchequer payments, the whole of the Revenue, as well as the Customs before-mentioned, came clear into the exchequer, and was more than sufficient to answer all the reasonable expences of the crown; those of the government not much exceeding 700,000*l.* per ann. whereas the clear income of the Revenue amounted to at least 1,600,000*l.* From the whole it was more than insinuated, that the Debts of the crown arose rather from the extravagancies of the court, than the necessities of the government: and some under-

Debate on Lord Cavendish's posting Mr. Howard.] Oct. 20. Information was given the house, that lord Cavendish had caused a Paper to be posted up at Whitehall-Gate, and Westminster-hall, by his footman, to this effect "That, Thomas Howard who subscribed the Letter, was a coward." It was said, that the occasion of this was from some reports that lord Cavendish had heard, that Mr. Howard should say, "That his lordship knew of the Letter some time before the parliament met, and did not call Mr. Howard to an account for it."

Mr. Sacheverell complained on lord Cavendish's behalf, but the compiler* could not well hear him.

Mr. Secretary Williamson gave this account. He was commanded by the king to cause the earl marshal to enquire into the business. Mr. Frowde, son to sir Philip Frowde, was said to have taken down the said posted-up Paper, who was not to be found. He came to him, and he asked him, whether he had any quarrel with lord Cavendish? He confessed the taking down the paper, but denied the words he should say of lord Cavendish, &c. Then Williamson told him, he was commanded by the king, not to farther engage lord Cavendish. Frowde said, 'he had no quarrel with lord Cavendish, and what he did was out of respect to him.'

Sir Tho. Lee. If this gentleman had no quarrel with lord Cavendish, perhaps that lord may have with him. In this kind of paper-war, he fears family quarrels; therefore would have some gentlemen propose a way to extricate you out of the thing.

Mr. Swynfin. The honour of the house is to be preferred before any particular member.

took to demonstrate, that, by an honest and careful management, both his majesty's Expences might be sufficiently supplied, and his Debts discharged, out of his present Revenue, in the course of a few years: adding, that no parliament was obliged to pay the king's debts, by taxing the subject: that such precedents were dangerous, and might be fatal: for if once a house of commons grew over-prodgal, and a court but moderately frugal, the parliaments of England would become as insignificant as those of France. Either these facts and considerations had such weight with the house, or the majority, contrary to the opinion that is generally entertained of them, were so little under the influence of the court, that they resolved not to grant any Supply to his majesty for the taking off the Anticipations of his Revenue. In comparison with the lavishness and extravagancies of later times, these things have all the air of patriotism and public spirit; but if Mr. North, and all the other writers on the side of the prerogative deserve any credit, we are to conclude, that this excess of many do not arise from any tenderness to the public, but a settled resolution to distress the king." Ralph. * Mr. Grey.

When quarrels may arise from persons to families, knows no way to prevent it, but by laying hands on them both. In the mean time, would have an engagement of no farther proceeding in the matter from this noble lord.

Mr. Vaughan. In this case, it is regular to send to the lord keeper, to take security of them both for quiet deportment.

Mr. Garraway. You have declared the Paper to be scandalous, and fears it a little too hasty to put the thing to another way of decision. Moves, that, though you have appointed a day for Mr. Howard's appearance, it may be a shorter day, lest it should reflect, in consequence, on every individual man in the house, and the whole house.

Sir Ch. Harbord thinks that what Frowde did was a very safe thing, and he not to blame. Believes that no man dares attack a member: Frowde has engaged, and Howard also, who will be here to-morrow. If you will have him come, he will, though he should die at the door.

The Speaker. All will bear him witness how tender he is of the honour of the house. The best way to secure your members is, not to suffer them to do injuries; and he must acquaint you with what he knows. He knows that lord Cavendish posted Mr. Howard for a coward.

Col. Birch. By how much the more lord Cavendish is esteemed here, you cannot do a better thing than showing justice. To come rightly to the bottom, the house must know what the Paper contains. Do right within doors, and you will stop wrong the better without doors.

Sir. Philip Warwick, notwithstanding his great respect to lord Cavendish, yet would not have you adjourn, till some order be taken in it.

Mr. Cheney. Would confine lord Cavendish, in the mean time.

Mr. Bertue would send for Frowde, to see the Paper, and then would know whether lord Cavendish owns it, before you proceed; as you did with Mr. Howard.

Mr. Stockdale. Perhaps neither Howard nor Cavendish owns the Papers.

Mr. Swayne. It is as plain as any thing can be; you need not put the question to lord Cavendish; but the matter is, what you should do for your own honour to prevent quarrels.

Col. Birch. Is of opinion that lord C. has done a great fault, being enjoined by the house to do nothing of tendency to farther quarrel.

Sir Edw. Baynton. Lord Cavendish has heard the debate. Would have the Speaker ask him, whether he has any thing to say to it, and then withdraw.

Mr. Garraway would preserve your privilege to the loss of his hand. Would have it understood that this commitment is not in order to lord C.'s coming to the bar on his knees.

Mr. Powle. The commitment of your member is not for his confinement, but security, therefore would have him confined till farther order.

Mr. Vaughan. Commitment is not for his security, but punishment.

Mr. Garraway. His commitment then must be solely for breach of Privilege, and on no other account.

Mr. Boscawen. You may proceed without asking lord Cavendish, whether he has any thing to say. He may possibly say something to his own prejudice.

Col. Titus. Any man that knows his conversation, knows his obligations to lord C.'s family. He believes if lord C. had any thing to say, he would have done it before now, being present at the debate. Having said nothing in his own justification, and having proceeded in what he did after your order, therefore would have him committed.

Sir Tho. Lee. The foundations of the house you are not masters of, to dispense with, as reading of a bill three times. You must ask lord C. what he has to say for himself.

Mr. Garraway. He is not obliged to make any answer, if you ask him. But, in voting him to commitment, without asking him, you take away the greatest liberty you have.

Sir Rob. Carr. Since lord C. has been present at the debate, you have broken your order, as much as you can already; therefore would not ask him any questions.

Mr. Sawyer. In all this debate, you are upon matter of enquiry only, and then the member may be present to give you information of fact, but when you give an opinion, he must withdraw. Some members have told you of a Paper, but none that lord C. wrote it.

Sir John Ernly. Your member is at liberty to answer, or not. Possibly his answer may be as much as his life may be worth.

The Speaker then said to lord Cavendish, "The house has been informed that you have broken the privilege of the house, and would know what you have to say before you withdraw."

Lord Cavendish. He shall ever have great respect to the privilege of this house, and shall be satisfied with what the house shall determine concerning him.—And withdrew.

Col. Birch. If any man has any thing to say, why this lord should not be secured, let him speak; and, in the next place, Where? He moves for the Tower.

Mr. Garraway. In Howard's case you sent to him, to know whether he owned the paper, or no; who returned you a dissatisfactory answer; in the mean time, you obliged this lord not to proceed in the business. You are informed that he has set up a Paper; you have asked him what he has to say; he has given you no answer; therefore for that would send him to the Tower.

Mr. Sawyer. Sir John Fagg was sent to the Tower, for proceeding in the lords house, after this house had possessed themselves of his business. And for lord C. to proceed, whilst the matter was depending in this house, is a breach of Privilege.

Sir Eliab Harrey. Lord C. has not broken promise, for that lasted not till Monday, but the matter being under the house's cognizance is the thing.

Sir Tho. Meres. Breach of order is of large sense in privilege, but it is a less word than breach of privilege, and would have it run so in the commitment.

Mr. Sacheverell. Would have the commitment 'for being charged with the Paper, and giving the house no satisfactory answer.'

The Order was read, viz. "That lord Cavendish and sir Tho. Meres be enjoined not to prosecute any quarrel against Mr. Howard, or to lend, or accept, any challenge in order thereto, without acquainting the house."

Col. Titus. Lord C. in having said nothing for himself, satisfies him, that he put up the Paper, and in that he has broken the Order of the house, and for that would have him committed to the Tower.

Ordered, "That lord Cavendish be sent to the Tower for his breach of the privilege of this house in prosecuting a quarrel against Mr. Howard, whilst the matter was depending before the house; and that the Speaker do issue out his warrant to the serjeant to convey lord Cavendish to the Tower, and deliver him to the lieutenant, there to remain till farther orders."

Oct. 22. In a grand committee on the building more Ships; sir Ch. Harboard in the chair. Resolved, "That it is the opinion of the committee, that 20 Ships of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Rate, shall be built with all convenient speed," which was agreed to by the house.

This day, Lord Cavendish having sent a Petition to the house, acknowledging his Breach of Privilege, and craving pardon, was ordered to be discharged from his imprisonment in the Tower.

Oct. 23. Resolved, 1. "That it is the opinion of the committee, that all the Forces that are, or shall be, in the service of the French king, contrary to his majesty's late Proclamation, shall be taken to be contemners of his majesty's royal authority, and opposers of the interest of their country 2. That the lords concurrence be desired to this Vote. 3. That a Bill be brought in to enforce the Proclamation with penalties."

Debate on lord Cavendish's being challenged.]

Oct. 25. Mr. Howe complains, that whilst we are about the nation's business, we should be subjected to Challenges. He hears that lord Cavendish has been challenged.

Mr. Russel gives an account of his suspicion of some such thing, by Mr. Francis Newport's coming to lord Cavendish's house, on Sunday morning last; which occasioned him to find out lord C. and not to leave him till he had acquainted the duke of Ormond with it, who told the king of it, and Mr. Newport was secured.

Sir John Coventry. It seems, there is great encouragement from great persons to affront this lord. The quarrel is not against lord C. but the whole house. Some course must be taken, or we shall be hector'd by every life-guard-man, and be obliged to fight him. Is informed that a lawyer of the Temple should say, 'It is a pretty story this of lord C. and Mr. Howard; the lord had the Paper 3 weeks before the sitting of the parliament, and complained only at the opening of the parliament, to hinder the king's business.' (And named him,) Mr. Sawyer, of this house, who said it, in a coffee house, to sir Tho. Eastcourt, a member, in the hearing of one Mr. Bradbury, a lawyer, and Philips, a stationer near Temple-Bar.

Mr. Sawyer finds that he is the person that, you are informed, should have said something of lord C. He was asked by lord C. about it, and told him he said no such words: but some accidental discourse, he said, was rumoured about town, that the Paper was abroad a month before the parliament sat. He never said the words alleged: but will tell you something: since that some persons have been abroad, to enquire and raise an accusation against him. As for that 'of hindering the king's business,' he never said it; nor could it be the consequence of any thing he said.

Sir Philip Harcourt desires that Mr. Bradbury may be summoned, to hear what he can say.

Sir Tho. Lee would not have you enquire into coffee-house discourse. Your member plainly denies it, and you can have no advantage by farther enquiry. But if any such thing as a Challenge be, it is fit for your enquiry, and the person that did it should be made a severe example of. The king and you have made enquiry, and any body that dares to concern himself is worthy your farther enquiry. Yourselves are more concerned than lord C. and would have severe enquiry into it.

The Speaker. Has not yet heard that the house has been informed that there was a challenge. Mr. Russel only told you of the presumption of a quarrel.

Lord Cavendish. Mr. Newport was with him on Sunday morning, but cannot say he brought him a challenge.

Mr. Howe. The king sent to secure Mr. Newport, and no question but there was a challenge.

Mr. Hale. Lord C. is not forward, nor willing, to tell you of a challenge. His own inclination possibly may induce him that way.

The Speaker would have it referred to the committee of privileges.

Sir Rd. Temple. It is hard to put it upon lord C. whether he had a challenge sent him, or not.

Sir Tho. Littleton moves that, by reason Mr. Howard is to be here to-morrow, you would have Mr. Newport here also.

Sir Nich. Carew is not for delays. More challenges may be sent us at this rate.

Sir Scroope Howe would have Mr. Atkins sent for also, who is concerned in the challenge.

Ordered, "That Mr. Newport and Mr. Atkins be summoned forthwith to attend the house."

Col. Birch. Calling any thing in question that the house has done, is calling the honour and dignity of the house in question. When the house punished lord Cavendish—and any man to question what you have done, is high presumption, and would consider it.

Sir Tho. Lee expected that Birch would have concluded his premises, with some remedy for these things. Desires he would tell you.

Col. Birch. Though some body else is more fit for it than he, yet he shall move, 'That whoever shall call in question what this house does, shall be punished as disturbers of the peace of the nation, and privilege of parliament.'

Mr. Garroway. The laws already are severe, and he would be upon even terms with such kind of men as life-guard-men, that if we defend ourselves against such as have no estates, we may not forfeit ours that have.

Sir Tho. Carges. As it is proposed, it is too general. Lord C. having done something in breach of privilege of this house, and been punished for it, we ought to do equally with the rest. We are trustees for the people of England; their honour and fortune are in our hands; and for persons to undertake to censure us, would have their punishment more particular.

Mr. Waller. They that will fight against king, lords, and commons, (against law) will fight with any of us. In France there are edicts against Duels, but that will stand with arbitrary government only. Would have a committee named to prevent this present mischief.

Mr. Swynfin. What the Speaker repeated was not to the question proposed. It is a vain thing to put a question, that any man without doors shall not speak against what we do. It is out of question. No man doubts it. But what you are to do in the matter before you, betwixt lord C. and Mr. Howard, to prevent farther quarrels, in this business, highly reflective upon the house. As yet you have had no answer from Mr. Howard, and in the interval you hear every day of Challenges. You are to do all you can to put a stop to these things.

Mr. Williams. There being an assault made upon a member, it is necessary that some provision should be made against promotion of such assaults. Sees no law more for members than other men. In such provocations as these, would have one.

Some members retired to draw up an Order according to the debate, which was posted up at Westminster-hall gate, and the Inns of Court, and was as follows: "Forasmuch as this house, being informed of certain Papers, containing provoking language, posted up by the lord Cavendish, a member of this house, did inflict a punishment upon him, by committing him to the Tower; and whereas they are informed, that, notwithstanding such their care and justice, some persons have presumed to call the said business in question; and, from occasion or pretence of those papers, to give out threatening words, or send Challenges, or provoking papers, to the said members of this house, or others, to be communicated to him; this house doth declare, that if any person whatsoever shall begin or prosecute any quarrel upon that account, or upon any matter or thing any way relating thereto, he shall be esteemed a disturber of the public peace, and a contemner of the justice and privilege of this house; and shall be proceeded against accordingly."

Mr. Williams proposes, that if any person fight a Duel, he be reckoned incapable of pardon.

Sir Wm. Coventry. A gentleman said, 'That the king had taken notice of it, and the persons were under confinement.' Finds lord C. here: would know what engagement he has made to the king.

Mr. Howe. The message from the king to lord C. was, 'That he should not send nor receive any challenge from Mr. Howard, nor any man else.'

Sir Wm. Coventry. If this came from the king, believes it will not fail of its success. What he rises for, was to prevent what he hopes is prevented, and if so, the king to have thanks from you for his care of our member, and to implore his farther protection.

Sir Rd. Temple. The great occasion of Duels is, that the law gives not remedy proportionable to injuries received. In France a strict course is taken to repair men in their honour, wherein the law is defective: as it is in some things men highly esteem, as affrontive words.

Ordered, "That a Bill be brought in to prevent Duels, and provocations to Duels."

Debate on the State of the Nation—A Dissolution proposed.] In a grand committee on the State of the Nation, sir John Trevor in the chair:

Sir Tho. Meres would have you consider the impiety and corruption of manners, and the protestant religion established by law. Next, rents falling. This is not new matter, but records extant; it is a parliamentary way. The poverty of the nation, and how to increase its riches, is always one head, in considering the State of the Nation: prevent a consumption and general fears of the nation: wounds are not to be cured without being searched: if they are skinned over only, and not searched, they break out into blotches and boils. God give a blessing to what you are about!

Sir Harbottle Grimston knows not how he shall please other men, but would have one ingredient: an application to the king to set a period to this parliament, and to allow us some time to pass bills now on the anvil, for the good of the nation. But would not bound the king. There is a great mischief in the length of this parliament, as if there were no parliament. A Standing Parliament is as inconvenient as a Standing Army. Would address the king, &c.

Sir John Birkenhead. God Almighty has put a period to half of the first men of this parliament, by removes and death. Hopes he shall never see a Rump again. But when he sees sons and brothers of those, who were undone by the Rebellion, and paid so dear, for loyalty, put and thrust out to have a new set, he declares he is afraid of a Dissolution, because God is his witness, he is afraid the next will be worse. [Laughed at.] Would have gentlemen consider the new and the old. The kingdom so weak, is it time to make it weaker by dissolution of this parliament? Cannot but think that the end of this parliament will be the beginning of confusion.

Sir Tho. Lee cannot think the matter moved proper at this time. Is one of those that think this parliament may have good effect. Perhaps he is one of those that hope better of this parliament than, it may be, of the rest that come after. Would have one gentleman from our side of the house that can say, rents are improved, that has no other way of support. Sees no other cause that wool sells not, though after the rot, unless that money is crept into a few hands, and then you must expect rents to fall every day. And money is a commodity, as well as other things, and the engrossment of it into one hand governs trade. Would make some representation of your poverty, and why you comply not now, and likewise the sums we have given the king this parliament: tells the story of lord treasurer Salisbury's showing king James a great heap of money he had given away, &c. By his skill a great deal of money was saved. If you show the king what you have given (he fears the remembrance of it is out of mind) as a reason why money runs not round, hopes that will give full satisfaction in our non-compliance with his desires. Hopes the effect may be, that trade may be bettered, and money circulate, that we may be better able to give for the future. Is afraid, by the sums that are asked, that the king sees not how poor we are in the country, but how rich in other places. Would have him advised by the poor as well as the rich.

Mr. Williams looks into titles of Acts under that of 'aid.' Finds the preambles and arguments still to be 'necessity.' The same thing, though in other phrases. But what is become of all this money? Possibly accounts may have been kept, but he has seen none. Were it possible to give as much as has been given, may we not be told still 'that the king is not in case, and there is a necessity, and if the king be not supplied, extremities must be used?' This frightens him. So he would be gladly sold, when there will be an end of Anticipations; when, of giving. What account can be given to the country? It is said that rivers run into the sea, but that ebbs and flows, but this of giving money flows and never ebbs. In his country, they are selling bread to buy bacon, but fears that, at this rate, we shall be reduced to water. As we have given without measure, so we have without method. In the rolls of H. iv. Grievances precede Aid, but at the opening a session now, Money is the thing asked, and we have done it without computation. 1st James, there was a solemn protestation in parliament, 'that they could not give Supply, till a commutation for Grievances, and to go home and consult their electors whether they deserved Supply;' but now we give without that. It is said, 'prepare your grievances.' But it is not a commutation; by that protestation the king is obliged by his coronation oath. We are not obliged to give money for it. Observes it was said the other day, 'We are not to give money of courtesy; it is matter of right.' At this rate, the commons will be in the condition of deans and chapters; a congé d'elire their bishop, for form's sake only, sent for and asked. Finds not, in all this parliament, money denied when asked, and now, in 14 years time, it may be a precedent upon us for futurity and posterity; therefore let us deny it now, for precedent's sake. The king is willing to enter into a strict correspondence with us, and will relieve our necessities; as he tells us his wants, so we are to tell him the necessity of the country. Our duty to the king is to remove the country's fears and jealousies. Let us leave some records behind us, that we are true representatives of the people.

Sir Lionel Jenkins. To the representation spoken of, 1st James. It was after the ancient manner. Legal and illegal grievances. There were two rises for it. The one was wardship, the other purveyance, which were both grounded in law. A representation is to move and persuade, and why should the king be moved and persuaded to what he tells us he will do? Had bills been denied, and infrequency of parliaments: but when the king can say, the parliament is continued, and no public bills, to which the king has said, le roi s'avisera, knows not any need of such representation, when the king is before hand with us. Would have Williams show what decay of trade, or religion, has been represented to the king, and not redressed. The parliament never did it, but when there was a clear obstruction; therefore would have representation.

Mr. Sacheverell. The question is, whether you will make a representation of the present State of the Nation to the king, or no. Would now know what you will debate this matter for, if not to represent it to the king. It is said no such thing has been done before, but takes it plainly to lay before the king, the reason of impiety and atheism, and leave it with him, and how poor the nation is, and how we came into it, and leave it with him to amend it. Will tell you precedents that have been. 50 E. iii. Where the commons tell the king;

'They had given him so much, and, if well managed, he had been the richest king in the world. 25. E. i. 'By reason of such impositions they were brought to that poverty, that they could give no more.' And conclude, 'These have brought poverty on the king,' and then left it to the king, as he would do now. If any gentleman thinks there is no such thing as prophaneness and impiety in the government, and if, he thinks not so much money is drawn into France from us, let him give his negative, and he will give his affirmative.

The Speaker is of opinion, that what is preferred deserves your consideration. When he considers the bills provided for Religion and Trade, ready to be reported, he cannot but think them worth consideration. To bills for Religion he concurs, but to make Religion by remonstrances is of most dangerous consequence. Could not believe that, after so long sitting in parliament and no public bills returned with le roi s'avisera: thinks there is no necessity of a remonstrance, which is in the nature of appeal to the people. Whoever will tell the people they are not well governed, he fears that people will give them too favourable an audience. The reformed, meek, humble men were the disturbers of the nation, in the last age, and he fears are so now. How low, how humbly, how dutifully they represented! it was they that acted all the villainies of the former age, and fears they are active for the disturbance of this. If the subject was violated of his right, and justice was but an empty name, then there was some countenance for such a thing. Could wish that the prudence of those gentlemen that had indemnity, would pardon the slips and failings of the government, and those occasioned by the necessity of the times. If all this while we had represented the undoing men for their loyalty, if we had so represented this. But since it is our misfortune to have omitted it, let us not now conclude that all was well done before the Act of Indemnity. That being slipt, let us not take this representation up at such a time, when it will be fatal, and tend to our destruction. There is a strict conjunction between the Fanatic and Papist, to dissolve this parliament, and wonders at that motion from a person who has had so little a share in the attendance of the house*. But when this parliament shall be dissolved, he fears the shaking both of church and state. Thinks a representation destructive to us and the government, and would have it laid aside.

Sir Tho. Meres looks upon Grimstone's motion, as from an ancient man, with St. Paul's 'cupio dissolvi,' and believes many abroad gape after it. The question urged of a representation of the state of the kingdom, he thinks to be the sense of the house: bills are preparing, but to some points there cannot be any; but if bills could be in every one, yet would rather have this representation. He slights all harsh expressions, in comparison of doing good. Five or six times bills have been cut to pieces by prorogations. We are tired with hearing them read. In this representation he is content of the king's grace and favour. The frequent prorogations destroy all we can do by bill. This way of representation will remedy it. He has read that of 1 James, seven, eight, or nine material subjects that concern the State of the Nation—As privilege was mixed with them, excellent lessons for Englishmen to learn! if that method had been taken and followed, it was impossible to have made a rebellion. But it was the breaking parliaments: would not lose the word—calm we are now, and in good temper, but if let alone till some grow angry, it may be much worse. That of 1 James is a good precedent, and would follow it. This parliament has an instance of it; on this very head of religion, 5 years ago, you discoursed the danger of Popery, the cause and remedies: remedies are, where the cause is not, in the king: we are the eyes of the king, and present to him were the canker is, and he remedies it.

Sir Wm. Coventry wonders at this debate, and thinks it out of the way. It is not yet the subject matter of debate. Thinks, that, as Grinstone is not seconded in his motion, so the thing will go off—Meres quoted St. Paul for it, and so it may pass. He was not so very young, but can remember the calamities of the late times, and is not a little troubled at what fell from the Speaker, 'That if this parliament be dissolved, it will be the ruin of the nation.' The king's government sure stands on better foundations, the laws and loyalty of his subjects: and the miseries of the late times, for a man's own sake, as well as his loyalty, he would prevent. It is wholly unnatural now to make a representation, because it is not the matter before you. If you were upon Grievances, and if the matters arise where there is no law, then it would be proper for a Bill. But where bills are already, we send messages to quicken them, as those of Popery, and Trade, and another thing not by bill, but we represent by Declaration. We represented to the king what the law was, and desired it should be so no more. If slips be in the government, would not do it merely to represent them, but to remedy them. If administration has not followed the law, we should represent it to the king. But would first consider the matter, before you think of a representation.

Sir Tho. Lee is one of those who would represent to the king the present condition of the kingdom, but was none of those 'meek and humble reformers'; though he is one of those that would not shut the doors to such a representation. Did never think that all advices from hence were appeals to the people. Knows not how else the ill management of his counsellors shall be represented to him. Though things have been made an ill use of, yet anciently they have been good. A fine way to shut up all the gates of the court, and the king never to know when he is ill advised! Would not have every little slip of the government represented, but only when the king cannot know the mismanagements of his government by any other way, but representation: and therefore would have it now.

Sir John Duncombe fears that the defect of supporting the Church is in ourselves; not in this house; but among themselves. Some of them, he will not say, have too much, but many have nothing at all. Many places are so unprovided, that the parson must work for his living, and, at this rate, the Church will fall of itself. Ill use is made even of the power of the Church; it does the Church no good. Not for the ends intended by the ecclesiastical courts; speaks not to oppose them, or to lessen the authority of the Church: thinks it worthy your thoughts to open the doors to some men. These are his humble thoughts.

Mr. Garraway thinks that we run out of method. The order of the house is 'for the committee to consider the State of the Nation'; desires that, in this case, we may go on clearly and not kindle it up. If all can be remedied by Bill, let it go; what cannot, let us in all humble duty represent to the king. Let us hear what all these motions are, and then you may consider whether provided for already, and recommend it to the committee to have bills in hand.

Sir Rd. Temple. This motion will bring all into confusion. Under the general head of Religion descend to particulars: insist not upon what the law has already provided for, but what it has not. Scandalous livings will make scandalous ministers. Would consider Pluralities, and such Churchmen as are above their callings, and come only to collect their duties. The king of France has wounded the Protestants more by this way than any: and especially moves to consider the scandal of Pluralities.

Sir Philip Mulgrave would not have 'debauchery and prophaneness' represented in the State of the Nation.

Sir Tho. Meres. If we are ashamed to represent it, let us say so, and try it by a question. Thinks the thing is recommended to the committee, by order, to be the first head of the matter under consideration.

Sir Tho. Clarges. How can we see such a profusion of treasure as we have had, and not tell the king of it? (called to Order) Is Representation such a terrible word not to be mentioned? Knows no way of acquainting the king, but by representation.

Mr. Mallet. 'The promiscuous use of women'—would have that considered, for they betray the counsels of the nation.

Mr. Vaughan. Some sort of men have had the confidence to represent the State of the Nation to the king, and very wrongly. We complained, in the late times, of decimations, and have not we had the Bank violated, and persons against oaths brought up to the Council-table? Nothing has been wanting, except taking the king's head off. Not 'the humble' but 'the proud,' reformed the government, to usurp it. And thinks that these are causes of Representation, and can say more hereafter.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of the committee, that Atheism and Debauchery be one branch of the consideration of this committee to be redressed."

Mr. Howard committed to the Tower.] Oct. 26. Mr. Howard, according to Order, attended at the door of the house. Being called in, he was allowed a chair, without the bar, because of his lameness of the gout. Then the Speaker delivered himself thus. "The occasion of your coming hither is a scandalous Paper, which the house has more than a common presumption was dispersed by your order, and subscribed by you. The house would know, whether the paper was signed by you, or dispersed by your order?" The Paper was brought to Mr. Howard by the clerk. Then Mr. Howard thus spoke:

"My respect always has been to this hon. house, and I hope you will excuse me from giving any answer to a thing of this nature, not knowing who charges me with the writing it. As to the resentment of my dead brother, I believe any man who had lost so dear a friend, as well as a brother, might be provoked to some passion. I will not excuse myself: I cannot equally bear such a loss. I am the more concerned, because I knew my brother so much an Englishman, as to go with the sense of the Votes of this house, so far as he understood them. I have met with a Paper very extraordinary, but, because it doth not immediately touch me, shall offer it to your better consideration. I shall always owe respect to this hon. house, as becomes me, and hope I have not done any thing to incur your displeasure; but if so unhappy as to rest under it, shall humbly submit to any punishment. I find the Paper so extraordinary a one, that I think fit to offer it to the house."

The Speaker. Have you any thing farther to say concerning the Paper?

Mr. Howard. Let any man prove that it is my hand.—He withdrew.

Mr. Stockdale. He has so far owned the Paper, as to submit to your justice. They are words of high nature, and dangerous: would have him sent to the Tower, but, being a worthy gentleman, not to come upon his knees.

Mr. Williams. Howard has been asked, if concerned in the Paper: he has had as fair proceedings as may be. He was examined first by a committee, and did not answer the thing at all. Has had a long time to consider of an answer. An express confession could not be expected. He has behaved himself modestly. He, in a manner, owned the provocation that might make a man so express himself. The other day, when the Paper that was posted up was debated, your member, (lord Cavendish) was present and sat mute; he denied not the thing: and now it is the same thing in this gentleman. He has, in a manner, stood mute: would have him committed to the Tower.

Mr. Streete. Before you proceed to sentence, would read Mr. Howard's Paper. Possibly it may guide your judgment in the Paper.

Mr. Mallet. He has as much as confessed the matter, and it concerns not only these persons, but the Protestants in general.

Sir John Knight. It is fit you should read the Paper.

Col. Birch. Somewhat like 'Did you do this, or not,' was asked him. He answered. Knows not how to reconcile this Paper, he offers, and that he is accused of: the Paper may be part of his defence.

Sir Tho. Lee. Consider what the flames are, and what water you have thrown on them. He fears that the Paper may be yet worse. Had the Paper been his own, you might have read it; and now you ask him about the scandalous paper, he tells you 'he has met with a Paper of an extraordinary nature.' Now the question is, whether such a Paper shall be read, before he opens what it is.

Serj. Maynard. The Paper he offers you is not relating to his offence. Knows not what you may imagine in reading it, unless to bear news.

Mr. Sawyer. If the gentleman had opened the contents of the Paper, then the house might have judged whether concerned or not: we may have a ballad read else.

Mr. Sawyer. You must, upon sentence, pronounce guilty, or not. He was called in to know, whether he owned the Paper or not. At common law he is a mute. If the person denies it, then go to proofs; if he does not deny it, it is fair to put the question, whether he be the author of the scandalous Paper, and he must give his affirmative to it.

Sir Rd. Temple has much respect to this gentleman, but seeing he cannot excuse himself, neither will he do so. There is a suspicion that he was the promoter of the Paper, but since he has neither denied nor confessed it, but in a manner excuses it, neither can he excuse him: would have him sent to the Tower.

Col. Birch agrees with Sawyer, that, if Howard deny it, we are put upon proving it; if not, it is taken pro confesso, a constant Order—It is contrary to Order for the Speaker to discourse with any person. If the house thinks him worthy to be heard, so must the Speaker. Could not the Speaker require him to open the Paper, for then you had opportunity to let him know the justice of the house in condemning the Paper? The least that can be done for the honour of the kingdom is to send him to the Tower.

Mr. Sawyer. The house is to judge of their own evidence. It is of dangerous consequence for people without doors to be judges. Therefore he believes Howard to be the promoter and disperser of the Paper.

Mr. Sec. Coventry would give judgment in this as if all the world heard your evidence. Now, whether Howard be the author, is the matter of fact. But to say 'The thing appears, because a man denies it not,' is not for your honour.

Resolved, "That it is the judgment of this house, that Mr. Howard is the author, promoter, and disperser of the scandalous Paper." Ordered, That he be committed to the Tower.

Debate on lodging the Money for the Ships in the Chamber of London, instead of the Exchequer.] Sir Nich. Carew moves that the money to be raised for building the Ships you have voted, be put into the Chamber of London, and not be issued out thence without an order from the lord mayor, and common council, to be the more certainly applied to the use of the fleet.

Mr. Sacheverell is the rather for the motion, because the money formerly was not to put to the use of the Fleet, which it was given for.

Sir Tho. Meres. We cannot trust the Exchequer, and therefore would have the money put into the Chamber of London.

Mr. Garroway. This is not the first time of his jealousy, because not the first time obligations have not been made good. If this money is to go for ships, is as free as any man to appropriate it.

Sir Wm. Coventry would have satisfaction how this money shall be used; which may make gentlemen more satisfied in giving. The new imposition upon wines were given only to pay the king's debts, and here we had not only general assurance, but the particular undertaking of lord Clifford, and yet that money was turned to a revenue, and no debt paid. Notwithstanding all the engagements to the contrary, yet the Exchequer was stopped, and there is a more easy pretence of stopping the money there by the king's ministers, which cannot be in the Chamber of London. And therefore would obviate one objection, that the stop of the Exchequer was only for the king's revenue. Has heard it said, that, at the time sir John Bank's money was lent to the exchequer, upon the act of parliament, it was refused him, when he called for it, by sir Robert Long. Banks desired his friends he brought with him to witness that, his money was demanded and stopped, against law. Long persisted in not paying him, but, upon consideration, found it not fit to break the act, upon so small a sum. This shows you that money lent, upon the security of the act of parliament, has been near stopping in the exchequer. Therefore would have the committee consider this with liberty, if they have it not already.

Sir John Duncanson. What can there be of jealousy that ships should not be built? It is impossible for any man to think it. The money must build ships.

Col. Birch. Ill use may be made hereafter of what you have already done. Would have the people believe that this money is lodged securely. Few tons of timber are yet ready, and what you do must be speedy. Is sorry the proverb, 'sure as Exchequer' is gone. Hopes it may come again. If any man employed in building these ships ask for his money, and it is in the exchequer, who will meddle? The king has told you, 'He will be a better husband.' It is for us to chalk him out the way.

Mr. Secretary Williamson. Moves to enter into the matter, without umbrage. The thing we are doing is to bring a question, whether we shall do it, or not. Enter not here into particulars, but you may give general instructions to the committee.

Mr. Vaughan. Though not jealous of his wife's honour, yet should you, or any one, come out of her chamber in drawers, he must be jealous. The Exchequer has done no good in this; by experience we have found it.

Sir Tho. Meres. Will any man place his money where he has been so often deceived? The law was professed for it, and trusted the Exchequer with it. Some say, 'punish the officers;' but we have not hearts to punish, we are too good natured. He foresees they will not be punished by the house, and knows of no where else, where they will be punished.

Mr. Love. If you expect this money to be well employed, you must put it into the city's, or some secure hands, or you are never like to have it rightly employed.

Sir Ch. Harbord. The Exchequer has failed, and there is nothing worse for the government than the failure of it. The morning after the stop of the Exchequer was made, sir Robert Long told him of it. He believed it not. He told Long, was it his case, he would rather lose his life, or office, than suffer it; for an action of the case might be brought against him for the money. Thinks the Chamber of London the best security. You must have public, or private, security. The Chamber has great helps to make good what they do, and you are safe in their hands, and the act will bind them beyond all seals they can make.

Sir Wm. Buxton. It is not what I know, but what the people think. If the people believe not the money will be paid, the people will not trust where they think they shall not be paid. The Chamber of London is good credit.

Sir George Downing. You are the restorers of the government, but this about the Chamber of London, is setting up a new government. What was done to stop the Exchequer, was by order of council, and by the great seal, not orders of the Exchequer. That place that gives accounts most sure and constantly, is the best place. Money was paid into London at the beginning of the rebellion, and dreads every thing that may have its likeness. Would devise from Hell to say, 'destroy the Exchequer, and take this way,' which is one of the best securities.—With it you destroy property. The Exchequer is one of the fundamental pillars of monarchy, the easiest and the cheapest. In 1660, money was paid into the Chamber of London, not yet accounted for, for disbanding the army, and no man can ever find out how it can be accounted for, nor ever will. Had it been in the Exchequer, it might. Shall it be said, we put it into such hands, nay vote it into such hands? Some are not enough that the Exchequer is not to be trusted; when that trust is gone, the government is gone. Has any thing been misplaced in the Exchequer? Mend it. Resolve that the money be appropriated, and refer it to the committee to make it effectual.

Sir Nich. Carew. He is concerned because he made the motion. Would have it known that he is no gainer by the wars. He is the poorer, and some others within these walls the richer, but sees we are now all Cavaliers. [Reflective.]

Sir Tho. Meres. One reflection begets another. The Speaker should have taken Downing down for reflection. If he (the Speaker) will not give us leave to answer reflections we will take it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry will not decide which of the offices, the Exchequer or the Chamber, may be the most easily governed. As to the Chamber, the placing of the money there imports a treasurer. Hopes never to see that day, for the parliament to have one treasurer, and the king another. He knows what will follow. Weigh it well, whether you cannot have as good security from the Exchequer as from the Chamber of London.

Sir Henry Capel has a favourable opinion of the City of London, but sees no need of so great caution in placing this money. It looks like some mistrust, for this one time to trust this one sum in the city's hands. The better London performs this trust, the more danger there will be for future sums to be lodged there. Fears it will come to this, Who will trust the city, and who will trust the king, here, whom we ought to trust?

Mr. Waller. If he had his own natural inclination and desire, he would have taken this occasion to reform the Exchequer, which for ought he sees, breaks loose from all acts of parliament, when the king, lords, and commons made orders assignable, and they are worth nothing, which would make farthings current money.

Mr. Pepys would have been silent, if what he intends to say in this business was not entirely new, or if so proper for any body to say as himself. Of all hands, he knows this money will be most properly in the king's single hand, and none else; but bonds may be put upon the lord treasurer's hands, and other officers, and the king's hand is the safest on this occasion. A retrospection of the ill management you have found in the navy, gives this jealousy now. Is the state of the fleet worse than when the king came in? No. In quality, rate, burthens, and force, men, and guns; it is in better. Let any man offer a contradiction, that it is not the best fleet the kingdom ever knew. There are 83 sail, great and small, more than in all his royal predecessors; and he has built more ships in 14 years, in burthen and value, of that fleet, notwithstanding the war.—The most beautiful are the king's own growth and building. It is said 'of late they have been neglected;' but there have been more ships built since 1670, than in any 5 years from any time backward. Another justice, next to the king, he must do the lord treasurer. More ships have been built in this lord treasurer's time, than in any ten of his predecessors. All this said, why will you not trust the king? He has the honour of a near attendance upon the king, by his office; none of his subjects have so many thoughts, or take more pains in the navy, than this master of ours.

The question being put, "Whether the Money to be raised for the Ships should be lodged in the Chamber of London," it passed in the negative, 171 to 160.

Debate on a new Test against Members receiving Bribes for their Votes.] Oct. 27. Exceptions being taken at some words which fell from sir John Hotham, by sir Philip Musgrave, Sir Tho. Clarges said, He would not have the authority of the Chair degraded. The words are to be set down and agreed.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. He has his liberty to take his exceptions at what was spoken by Hotham, as other gentlemen have theirs, viz. 'That Members have been drawn from us, and the sums we have given have been employed to that purpose.'

Sir Nich. Carew would have a committee appointed to enquire into these things, and clear your members from aspersions.

Sir John Hotham explained himself, 'That the revenue is collected by several of the members, and by it they are withdrawn from their service here.'

Sir John Knight would know 'what members' are drawn away from us.

Mr. Garraway knows no-body reflected upon, (Knight saying 'we' and 'us') unless he be the number, and has employment.

Mr. Stockdale. It is an excellent motion, to purge ourselves by a Test; and would have a committee to consider of it.

Sir John Coventry. Possibly, though the nation be poor, yet there may be talk of guineas: would have us purged of it. Members have had letters sent them from officers of the court, some time before this session, to hasten their coming up: would have that enquired into.

Sir John Hotham would know who has received such letters.

Sir Chs. Wheeler. It is hard for us to recover surmises, and suspicions, without doors: telling the Yeas and Noes, who they are, may be of ill consequence abroad; and whenever you are pleased to appoint such a Test shall be very willing.

Sir Tho. Meres. 'We' and 'us' are very good English words. We are agreed, as to appropriation of this money. Why should we lose the first person plural! But where it is applied to parties, there we may have exception. Your question is, for such a Test as is proposed. The thing is talked of without doors, and some such Test would be very reasonable. The last session, there was some such thing, and was proceeded on, very forward. Now is ready to think, that guineas are raised in their price: knows nothing, but believes these to be idle things; but would take off the report.

Mr. Williams has not seen these Letters spoken of. Perhaps they were sent by the king's command. They are illegal, and not justifiable: would have these letters produced, and you may then judge, whether they are justifiable or no.

Sir John Coventry. If letters are not justified, they ought to be corrected; and would have the letters produced.

Sir Winston Churchill. There can be no greater infamy than this Test, in casting reflection, suspicion, and self-condemnation: would rather pass a vote, that such reporters without doors, if taken, shall be severely punished.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is said, 'there could be no greater reflection upon the house, than this Test. He knows one greater reflection; that is, refusing such a test. The last time we met, enquiry was made into 5000 guineas, but no report of it was made from the committee. It is impossible to silence men's reports, or to keep secret what is said in this house; and all such reports are equally disadvantageous to us all. The thing being cut off by prorogation, if not revived now, the people will think the majority of the house afraid of that Test. Grimstone's motion * was not thought reasonable, but nothing can tend to a Dissolution of this parliament, like the people's ill opinion of us, and then to be no more useful to the government, is an obloquy upon us, and we become abominable in the eyes of the people, though not parliaments in general—An herb, John, in the pottage. But when this Test comes thus far into debate and is rejected, what may be the consequence of it? Therefore is for the Test.

Sir Tho. Lee. Reports of guineas come up and down so generally, that he cannot tell who here heard it reported, that he is one of those who has had them. If he had any, he has taken pains for them; he has attended the service very closely.

Sir Ch. Harbord. If any have had, they have ill deserved them.

Lord Cavendish. If we lose the opinion of the people, we can neither serve the king, nor the country: would have one word added to the question: 'For the committee to enquire both after Letters and Money:' and letters have been received.

Sir John Coventry seconds the Motion; for he believes that both letters and money have been received.

Sir John Hanmer would have the committee

enquire as well who have had manors, as letters and money.

Col. Birch. We say in the country, that if a man intends to pay well, when he borrows money, he gives a bill, or a bond, or any thing else. Is mighty glad to find this debate. Thinks we are not in a capacity to give money to build these ships, unless this Test be done. He finds no reason in the world against it, therefore would direct the committee in it.

Sir Edm. Jennings would have every man declare what he has by offices, or any other way, and refund. The king has had much money of his, and if he has any of the king's, shall willingly refund it.

Sir Henry Puckering. What does that look like? Impeaching. Perhaps you may find half the house concerned in the giving motion. This neither becomes your prudence nor gratitude: these little things, to rip up into little offices! The king is a liberal prince, who rewards services.

Sir Henry Capel is sorry to differ from him, having served the crown: but is there any thing so dear in the world as the honour of this parliament? Wonders, when things are so spoken of abroad: moves, of all things in the world, to put this question.

Sir John Hotham differs from Jennings. Yourself, Mr. Speaker, have had good things from the king, and have deserved them. The labourer is worthy of his hire; and he would not have the question of refunding.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. He that has betrayed his trust, and his honour, in taking money, will be so wise as to deny it, for his honour.

Sir Wm. Coventry. As you put the question, Mr. Speaker, it is taken for granted that the house has swallowed it. But he would have the Test, for members to purge themselves from having received.

Col. Titus supposes it is the intention of the enquiry, 'That if any man, &c.' upon report that several members were corrupted. The last session you made an Order, and he would do the same thing now.

Sir Tho. Lee. The last session, there was particular complaint of a lawyer.

The paper of the Test the last session was read, and referred to a committee. The committee was instructed to enquire what Members have had Guineas, Promises, Rewards, or Letters, to corrupt their Votes*.

* "A suspicion prevailing in the house of commons, that a party could not uniformly and steadily oppose every vote and every motion that leaned to the popular side, and as uniformly and steadily forward and support every motion and vote that was calculated to favour the court, unless they were under some influence, which was inconsistent with their trust, the following Test was introduced and entered in their Books, though it does not appear to have been administered to this day: 'I A. B. do protest before God and this house of parliament, that, directly nor indirectly, neither I,

Debate on Letters sent to particular Members in order to secure their Votes.] The house was informed of certain Letters sent to particular members, to summon them to give their attendance upon the service of this house:

Sir Hen. Goodrick thinks that his family has served the king faithfully, and wonders that he has not received a letter, as well as his neighbours. He thinks himself slighted in not being thought so well worthy. Would have the secretaries of state inform you, who they sent letters to, and by whose direction.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The secretaries may reveal or not reveal it, as they have orders from their master. If they are unlawful, ignorance has led them into a fault, for obeying the king's particular command. His ignorance, if so, has betrayed him and his brother secretary. These Letters are not guilty of the inconvenience, mentioned, of making faction. Goodrick would have the committee to know, why not to one man as well as to another? Shall any man ask the king, why not to one man as well as to another? If for any such ill intention, as is mentioned, the style would be accordingly. Is sure from his conscience there is no reason to imagine surprize by it. A Cambridge scholar was asked, why he wore but one spur? He replied, 'That if his horse went on one side, he would be hanged if the other side would be left behind.' In case of surprizal, private orders might have gone, not thus publicly sending to gentlemen's houses.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Neither he nor his brother are ashamed, nor ought to be, of these letters. They came from no ill intention nor distinguishing end. There was a report that the house would not meet; several came to him to know. The king commanded him to

'nor any for my use, to my knowledge, have, since the 1st day of Jan. 1672, had, or received any sum or sums of money, by ways of impress, gift, loan, or otherwise, from the king's majesty, or any other person, by his majesty's order, direction or knowledge, or by authority derived from his said majesty, or any pardon, discharge or respite of any money due to his said majesty, upon account of any grant, pension, gratuity, or reward, or any promise of any such office, place or command, of or from his majesty, or out of any money, treasure or estate of or belonging to his majesty, or of, from, or by, any foreign ambassador or minister, or of, or from, or by any appointment, or with the knowledge of his majesty, or any of them, otherwise than what I have now in writing faithfully discovered, and delivered to this house, which I have subscribed with my name; neither do I know of any such gift, grant, or promise so given or made since the said time to any other member of this house, but what I have also inserted in the said writings; nor have I given my Vote in parliament for any reward or promise whatever. So help me God," Ralph.

assume all his friends and acquaintance, that they should meet, and so discountenance this report. There was no distinction in these Letters amongst such as were of his conversation. Believes generally that these gentlemen might promiscuously acquaint their neighbours, that there might be a full house.

Sir Tho. Mores. There being a report that these Letters were sent, he cannot believe the king in the least concerned in this matter, nor the worthy secretaries. He has heard of an order of council; but reminds you that the council cannot meddle with mæum and tuum: He heard they have done it, by reference, thereby terrifying causes fit for Westminster-hall: but much more they are not to meddle with matters of parliament. If then they have so mistaken the common law of parliaments, it is good law for the country. Not good to engage a fourth part, and leave the other three disengaged; and for the story, 'the horse and one spur' spoken of, if the literate and illiterate had been upon one horse, they would have come together.

Col. Birch. It is absolutely necessary to sit here on an equal foot. Never knew any thing of this nature not gone to the bottom of, that had good effect. Until this matter appears bare and naked, there will be jealousies. Therefore moves 'that the king may be moved to give leave that the Secretaries may produce these Letters, to see wherein they differ,' and believes this would give satisfaction.

Sir Wm. Coventry thinks there is a difference in the nature of the Letters, by the authority of the king, and that of the secretaries. There is a difference betwixt a private man's letter to a judge, and a privy seal or great seal sent him about a cause. Thinks these Letters strange and unequal. The ancient way was to give such notifications by proclamation. When parliaments have been assembled, and not many members come up, and not full, they have adjourned for some time. But if any man was declared governor of a town, or a captain, these employments were a dispensation to his attendance here. If other differences be made, it is a great reflection upon the house. These people principally refer to us for their liberty and money, and the king recommends Religion and Money to us in his speech, and he remembers not but when any bill has been depending concerning religion, against popery, that he has been as forward and zealous as any man—possibly not so forward in money. He is at a stand, having had no Letters as well as other men, but for the motion of 'sending to the king to have leave to inspect the secretaries books,' he is against it. You may attain your end another way, by representing the inconveniences of such Letters, from the inequality of it, for his majesty's service, and to prevent it for the future.

Mr. Walker. If to find a fault in this matter, a committee is very good for it. But there is a fault some-where, in not giving advice to the king about these letters. Privy seals are forbidden to walk abroad for money, as they have done formerly: they should not meddle with the private purse, nor the public purse. Writs call us bitter ad consulendum, but he perceives these letters are ad dandum.

Col. Titus perceives by this, and many other experiments, that many things are too fine and subtle for his gross apprehension. Just before this session of parliament, the king seemed to be wonderfully enamoured with a parliament man; and would see them here with the first. There may be an inconvenience in sending these Letters to country juries; they may be imposed upon and frightened; but persons here having too much integrity to be imposed upon, it is not to be imagined.

Resolved, "That his majesty be humbly moved, that the Members of this house may be summoned to give their attendance on the service of the house by Proclamations only."

Debate on St. Germain's Assault on Luzancy.
Nov. 8. Mr. Russel. Coming through the Hall to day, he heard of a priest, one St. Germain, who forced one Mr. Luzancy (in company with an English jesuit, who spoke broken French,) a minister of the French Church, with a dagger in his hand, (threatening to stab him on refusal) to sign a Paper of recantation, containing many seditious things, and that the nation would turn to Popery, &c. *

* "About this time, an accident happened, which not only renewed the cry against Popery, but raised it louder than ever. One Luzancy, who from a French Jesuit became a convert to the Church of England, preaching in the French Church in the Savoy, took occasion to inveigh with great bitterness against the errors of the Church of Rome; and afterwards printed his sermon. This alarmed the Papists, and particularly one Dr. Burnet, otherwise called Father St. Germain, a Jesuit and confessor to the duchess of York, who finding him alone in his chamber, and having posted three men at his door, threatened to murder him if he did not make satisfaction for the injury, and speedily return to France. The man thus awed and terrified, not only promised faithfully whatever was required of him, but signed a formal retraction, in order to get his liberty. But no sooner was he safe and free, than he went to Dr. Brevall, another converted Jesuit, and told him the whole story: the doctor communicated it to sir John Beresby, and sir John to the house of commons, who immediately took fire upon it, appointed a committee to examine the matter, and ordered Beresby to produce Luzancy the next day; who confirmed all; adding, moreover, the following particulars: That the said St. Germain, in several conferences with him, had attested, that the king was a Roman Catholic in his heart, that the court was endeavouring to get a Liberty of Conscience for the Roman Catholics; and, that granted, in two years, most of the English would acknowledge the Pope; that he knew the king's intention concerning reli-

Sir Henry Goodrick has little to add, but matter of fact, the thing has been so well related by Russel. But thinks it his duty to take care that no discouragement be put upon persons that turn from Popery to our religion. M. Luzancy, is as learned a man, as any that has turned to our religion. The priest, St. Germain, belongs to the dutchess of York, and so gives an account of the matter. He had the account from Dr. Brevall.

Sir Rob. Southwell. That night the council met, and lord Holles was summoned to attend, and he believes the king has the matter under his particular cognizance.

Sir Philip Musgrave. This is so great an affront to the Church, that, if nothing be done in it, the Church will grow low in esteem. Pray proceed with all expedition in it.

Sir Ch. Harbord. This goes beyond all precedents, to persuade, not only with arguments, but poignards! he never heard the like way before. Moves that the chief justice may issue out a general warrant to take him 'ubi-cumque fuerit in Angliâ,' to be indicted for the king's honour, justice, and safety.

Sir John Birkenhead. He values the thing the more, because Luzancy, by coming over to our Church, has done great hurt to the Church of Rome. He has written against it. But this St. Germain is a Frenchman, and not within the statute of 3 James—Insinuating by poignards, and daggers, as the story goes, to renounce God, and then stab him, to be revenged both of body and soul! these strangers to come in this manner to the king's subjects! The king has taken cognizance of it, you are told, and believes you will have an effect of it suddenly. If not, do what you please.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The fact is a violence offered to this convert, M. Luzancy. On gion, and that he was sure his majesty would approve of all he should do in that matter; that he laughed at the parliament, as being only a wave, that had but a little time; and said, that nobody was more welcome at court, or had greater intrigues with the nobility than he; that it was good, sometimes, to force people to Heaven; and that there were an infinite number of Priests and Jesuits in London, who did God a very great service.—When all these particulars, which Luzancy offered to attest upon oath, had been reported to the house, lord Cavendish called upon sir John Reresby to give an account of some other things which he had heard from Luzancy: one was, that two French Protestants, being merchants of great substance and credit, had been threatened by certain papists, that if they were not less severe upon the Romanists, they would ere long see the Protestant blood flow in London streets. A committee was appointed to enquire into the truth of this matter; and Luzancy being summoned, gave evidence to the very self same effect, and gave it under his own hand. The parties he had his information from, being sent for, appeared also, and de-

Thursday the king sent for him, to the lords house; the king had a Paper in his hand, given him by lord Holles, relating the violence offered this Luzancy, on the fourth of Oct. last, (and so gives an account of the Paper.) The king sent to have Luzancy examined, and the parties were warned to be at the Council at five of the clock. At seven Luzancy comes, and was examined upon oath: the next day he promised to bring his witnesses. When he was examined upon oath, the bishop of Oxford went to hear the examination. The king was presented with the examiners in the afternoon, and, if it could be, he gave order for a special council, but it sat not, and this day there is a council extraordinary for the thing.

Sir Tho. Clarges. For ought he perceives, here is a failure of justice. Would know whether the Secretary, when he had this information, did send a warrant to attach St. Germain.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. He sent a messenger to attach this St. Germain, but he was not to be found. He gave his Papers to the king: he had his direction, and obeyed it.

Sir Tho. Meres. There is a motion made to apprehend these two priests, and he seconds it.

Mr. Attorney Montagu. The king, as you are informed, has taken early notice of it, and as much as can be done. But it will be very ill if we do not something in it. Moves that two of our members may go to the Lord Chief Justice for a warrant to apprehend them forthwith.

Col. Sandys. The Priest has done you a kindness. The nation is full of them, and would have a warrant to search for all Priests and Jesuits in general.

Resolved, "That the Lord Chief Justice be desired forthwith to issue his warrant in par-clared such threats to have been used towards them by some French Papists; but, to what cause it was owing, is uncertain; they gave in only such names as were of persons either absent, or of no estimation; so that little came of this business. But these and other such informations, concerning the height and insolence of the Papists, did so exasperate the house, that many motions were made to humble them. Some were for a speedy confinement of them to the country, others for banishment, and some again for disarming them, and the like. His majesty also was pleased to issue his royal Proclamation, Nov. 10, signifying, that he had taken Luzancy into his royal protection; setting forth St. Germain's offence; offering 500*l.* reward for the apprehending of him; commanding all constables, &c. to use their best endeavours to that end; and declaring, that whoever harboured him should be proceeded against with severity. This affair shewed the necessity of an Union among Protestants; and, accordingly a door of hope was once more opened to the Dissenters; leave having been given, in both houses, for the introduction of a Bill in their favour." Ralph.

ticular to apprehend those Jesuits, and another to search for and apprehend all Priests and Jesuits whatsoever.

Debate on the regulating the Election of Members to serve in Parliament.] Nov. 18. Sir Henry Ford. In the Long Parliament the Court of Stannaries was taken away, because if the plaintiff brought a vexatious suit, and was cast, he paid no costs.

Mr. Garraway. There is a short way to remedy these excesses, without taking away civil hospitality, viz. 'that the person to be chosen shall have an estate in the proper county.'

Serj. Maynard. By law, every man that serves here, must have his wages from the county or borough he serves for, but now, generally, there are none taken. This bribing men by drink is a lay simony: 'electiones fiant libere.' What do men give hogs drink for? To be carried on the shoulders of drunken fellows? Thinks it a good limitation, 'that none be capacitated to be chosen, but such as have estates, or reside, in the county.' Exclude them that have no estates from being trusted in what they give; who, to serve a turn, will be made free of the borough, and it may be, never live nor trade in the borough hereafter.

Sir John Bramstone. Before you give directions to the committee for a Bill to regulate Elections, you will, in the first place, not exclude so great a county as Essex, if you alter the law: but three boroughs and two knights in the county: before you give a restraint, make us even with other counties. In Oliver's time there were 16. Before you alter the law, would make the distribution more equal.

Sir Rob. Carr. There are but 12 for the county of Lincoln. Would have no man a knight of the shire, that has not an estate in the county he serves for; but for a burgess; if his estate be in another county, would have him serve for a borough.

Mr. Boscawen. It is looked on as a privilege of their county (Cornwall) to have so many to serve in parliament, but strangers are chosen that look not after the county. It may be, Yorkshire has as many as Devon and Cornwall, and anciently the boroughs petitioned to be discharged from sending burgesses, for the charge it put them to for wages; but the world is so altered now, that some forget for what place they serve.

Mr. Vaughan. A man is obliged, in justice and gratitude, to serve the interest of the place and county he serves for. It is the same thing as if a man had no estate at all, if he have none in the county or borough.

Sir Edw. Dering. If they have estates in any other county, as in law they may be chosen, so they may in reason also. Would leave both the expence and the qualification to the committee.

Sir Rd. Temple. Anciently there was no vote in a borough, but by burgage tenure, borough-houses: we come now to freemen, and salesmen, scotters and lotters, but such only had voice as were able to maintain the charge of their burgesses. Would tie up elections to such as have estates to answer their actions to the place they serve for. Would not have one chosen that has not an estate of 500*l.* per ann. And restrain all charges, and expences, that elections may be free.

Mr. Williams. By statute of Hen. vi. the county is to chuse by freeholders, and the cities by citizens and burgesses: electors, and elected also. There is another statute, 'that elections shall be freely and indifferently made, notwithstanding letters, &c.' which he has felt to his cost.

Mr. Swynfin. You are on a good subject, and it deserves consideration. You have had several things moved, almost impossible to come to effect. It was never before thought of to make rules for boroughs, but to leave men to stand upon their ancient privileges. Some boroughs, by prescription, have a settled right by law. In some there is no burgage tenure: would therefore avoid these large considerations. If you make a general Vote, there will be as much doubt on the interpretation, and be as full of dispute when it comes to be applied, as now. If you go about it, it is as much as to say you will have a bill that shall never come to effect. But there is one thing: that exorbitant corruption, amounting to no less than bribery: and it is better to allow to give 1000*l.* than to expend it so disorderly. It makes the very parliament have reflections upon it; therefore would have a Bill to restrain this giving or spending money before the election be made.

Tho. Meres. As good make a coat for the moon, as alter the manner of elections; we have one Burgess sits here upon one point, and another upon another. Doubts that what we are about to do is impracticable. Those who wish not the parliament well, impute these things as a scandal to us. Therefore something should be done against drinking and bribery, and would have the Committee directed in it.

The following form of a Vote or Order of the house was then read, and referred to.—N. B. The Committee of Privileges passed it, with a few alterations, the day before the session ended.* Statute of 7 Hen. iv. was read, at the committee, viz. "The Election of Members to serve in Parliament, shall be freely and indifferently made, notwithstanding any prayer or commandment to the contrary."

Resolved, "That if any person, or persons, hereafter to be elected, in a place for to sit and serve in the house of commons, for any county, city, town, port, or borough, after the test, or issuing out the writ of election, upon the calling or summoning of any parliament hereafter, or after any such place becomes vacant hereafter, in the time of parliament, shall by himself, or any other in his behalf, or, at his charge, at any time, before the day of his election, give any person or persons, having voice in any such elections, any meat or drink, exceeding in their true value 5*l.* in the whole, in any place or places, but in his own dwelling-house or habitation, being the usual place of his abode for twelve months last past, or shall, before such election be made and declared, make any other present, gift, or reward, or any promise, obligation, or engagement, to do the same, either to any such person or persons in particular, or to any such county, city, town, port, or borough, in general, or to, or for, the use of them, or any of them, every such entertainment, present, gift, reward, promise, obligation, or engagement, being truly proved, is and shall be a sufficient ground, cause, and matter to make every such election void, as to the person so offending, and to render the person so elected incapable to sit in parliament, by such election, and hereof the committee of elections and privileges is appointed to take especial notice and care, and to act and determine matters coming before them accordingly."

Debate on Sir E. Jennings, a Member, being made High Sheriff of the County of York. Nov. 16. The house being informed, That sir Edmund Jennings, a Member of this house, is made High Sheriff of the County of York, a debate arose thereupon :

Sir Nich. Carew. If a Sheriff of a County plead privilege, he may obstruct the justice of that whole county, and no man can have remedy against him. Would have you vote, that it is a breach of privilege to be made a Sheriff, &c. thereby withdrawing his attendance from his service here.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. If there be a voluntary acceptance of the office, what breach of privilege is it? You have never exercised your authority against absent members. A hundred men of the house are away, and why you should fall upon one member, and not all the rest that are absent, knows no reason.

Mr. Waller. It is something to want half our knights of the shire. About 40 years ago there was made sheriff a great father of the law, sir Edw. Coke, because he should not help us here. One was made Sheriff,* and sat here, and was fined in the Star-Chamber for going out of his county: they cannot sit here because they cannot come out of their county. They may make the Speaker sheriff.

Sir Rob. Carr. He thinks the king has not broken your privilege, though possibly it is construed so without doors. Sheriffs have sat in parliament. If you make an address to the king for prevention of it for the future, he gives his consent.

Mr. Sacheverell. The law stands expressly, that the Sheriff is to be nominated, at such a time, in the exchequer. In the next place, all actions brought against a sheriff are personal, for the money he receives, and his executors are not liable to make account. A sheriff shall receive all monies upon executions, &c. and the parliament sits, he pleads his privilege, and cannot be brought to account. Would therefore address the king to supersede this writ, and vote this a breach of Privilege.

Mr. Wilde. There are three names sent to the king from the Exchequer, and he sets aside, and chuses, whom he pleases. Put the case that there should be a new parliament; a sheriff in one county may be chosen in another. But it seems, when it serves one turn, it is one thing, and then another: because this parliament has lasted 15 years, shall it continue 15 more? This parliament is made such a precedent, that we are like to have no more so long again.

Sir Wm. Coventry speaks out of no prejudice to this gentleman that is appointed sheriff for Yorkshire. Hears it said, 'that precedents, if there have been any, not taken notice of, do not fortify the right;' but, if at any time, would now make an end of them. Would now address only to claim our right, and no more. It is said, 'the gentleman is willing to accept the office,' and must we therefore give away our privilege? Fagg's case, he thought good in the lords house, and therefore he appeared there, but you sent him to the Tower for breach of your privilege. It is said often here, that we cannot give away the privilege of any man; the reason given, 'about executions &c.' convinces him. The king enters not into a nice disquisition of their being parliament men: if one be made, 50 may be made, and so 50 settled in the country, and he need not tell you how 50 votes would have carried things as they are not now carried. This of pricking members Sheriffs, and the letters sent to gentlemen, may tend all to the same end. So it concerns the parliament, that you leave not the gap open, to root up all your privileges. Whether the parliament be longer or shorter, there will be so many absent, Sheriffs—And when the parliament set to work about any thing, it is quickly done. From these considerations, moves that you will prevent this for the future, not barely by a petition, but your right annexed to it. If you address the king only by petition, it may possibly not be granted, and so your right be precluded for ever.

Mr. Sawyer. It is strange, at this time of the day, to declare this a breach of privilege; it has been practised in all times. Must all your members be turned off that are in such offices? Though they are bound to attend their offices, yet they are bound to attend the kingdom in the first place.

Mr. Vaughan. Sawyer argues very well, but his reasons must be well fortified to argue against privilege of parliament. But by being sheriff, a man must be in two places at one time, and you fine him here for his absence.

Sir Ch. Harbord. It is no breach of privilege at all, the thing has been usually done, and always so done. He thinks it true that no member can be absent without leave of the house. Suppose the sheriff should put the king's money into his own purse, the consequence is, the king indicts the party. The king makes a man sheriff, and he is then chosen a parliament-man, and he cannot attend the business of the county to pay the money according to his writs—And persons escape—He thinks it a wise and a good counsel, that for the time to come this be not drawn into precedent, and to move the king so.

Mr. Streete. It is the resolution of the judges, that this law mentioned does not deprive the king of his sovereign power, but only eases him of the trouble and labour. The day after All-souls, the king may prick sheriffs without them. Queen Eliz. king James, and the late king, have pricked sheriffs. It was not the opinion of the house in the case of sir Edw. Coke. Look on your own books, and you will find, in that case, the opinion of the house 'that a Sheriff of one county may be elected to serve for another, and the sheriff of his county may be returned for a borough in the same county,' and some now sit so. It was never thought but a sheriff may be here, and it disables him not to attend his service. There are 4 of your members that have served, this parliament, for that county we now debate.

Sir Tho. Meres. Coke's case was nothing to this now in debate, and to clear that repeats the question—'Care of our Privileges.' The making a member of this house sheriff is a breach of the privilege of this house. This case comes not up to the other. This case is, the house sitting, to make a member sheriff of a county; and all that is said against it is, 'That we have some sit here that have been sheriffs of that county.' But if the thing has been once or twice done, and therefore must be a precedent, then, by the same reason, the lords may try your members, because it has been once or twice done. It is said, 'That it is as fit members should be sheriffs, as justices of the peace.' If that be the case, we may all be made sheriffs. If it be as equal to make us sheriffs as justices, perhaps 40 or 50 may be made sheriffs hereafter.

Sir Winston Churchill agrees to the inconvenience of it, but thinks it not a breach of privilege. Put the case that another man's cattle make a trespass upon him, and eat up his grass, but if the gaps or gates be left open, it is his fault. This is no trespass, but our fault. Before you vote it a breach of privilege, would be satisfied whether the king taking somewhat that is not his right—To prick a sheriff—If that be not the point, it has respect to your member only. In his case, he should think it hard and reflective that he only should be the man excepted. Not a Yorkshire gentleman has yet offered any thing against it.

Col. Birch is afraid to speak to you in this matter, lest, if any gentleman should say here we fly in the king's face, he may tell the king so. He can never believe that the same men were called up in three parliaments in Edw. iiiid's time, (In H. iv's time lawyers were excluded.) But it is said, Why a breach of privilege at this time, and in this case, and never so before? He is apt to think that things have been done here that will never be done again. Such sums, he believes, any man would be laughed at, that should move for them again. Would do the thing easily: it cannot reflect upon the king, and is far from thinking on a minister of state.

Sir George Downing. This is a breach of privilege, and the party concerned makes no complaint. It is taken up by other gentlemen, and not the party concerned. You are going to vote, That making a member sheriff is a breach of privilege, and you never saw any thing to the contrary, but that he might, &c. There is no question yet stated. Some say, 'The king has broken the privilege,' without any farther ceremony. Shall not a committee first examine it? In far less things than this we go by steps. Let records be searched first. He will else never vote it. He will have his tongue out of his head before he will do it.

Sir Henry Capel rather would not have this gentleman made a precedent, but he thinks himself beholden to him for being the occasion of this debate. If the question be of privilege, he must give his vote for it.

Mr. Bennet. As to trespass spoken of, it is time now to mend the hedge, and shut up the gate. He hopes Jennings will not suffer so much by it, there will be found somebody to officiate it, and he to have the best share of the profits: and that we are so fond of him, we will not part with him.

Sir Edward Dering. Let the gentleman concerned look to that, before he takes the office upon him. The danger of making one sheriff that is a member, and the consequence of making many, is but a remote reason, and weighs not with him. We have had three or four members sheriffs of that county, and no complaint made of it. The deputy-sheriffs do give security for performance of the office. In all cases, would have the king treated with all reverence, and in this most tenderly: would, therefore, only address the king, 'That, for the future, no Member of the house be made Sheriff.'

Sir Tho. Littleton. By this means we strike off half our privileges; for writs of privilege a man can only have when the suit is begun. It is moved to temper the business: is sorry for the member concerned, for whom he has a respect; but, if you proceed no farther than an Address to the king, 'That it shall be so no more for the future,' you give up the cause. For he has observed, that when a thing has been voted to be no precedent, for the future, it proves often to be a precedent to do the same thing again.

Sir Henry Goodrick hears it said, 'that few, or none, of Jennings's countrymen are concerned in this matter.' Though he has been silent in the thing out of modesty, is concerned as a reflection on his person, and reputation, which he would have so saved, as that the house may attain their end—We all conclude for proceeding, by way of Address to the king, and would have it in as home terms as you can impart. Pricking of members sheriffs, you find an encroachment on privilege: moves therefore that the Address to the king be 'not to prick any Member that serves for county, city, or borough.'

The Speaker, upon some disorder said, If any man have a privilege to be disorderly, let me know it. Then he proposed the question, viz. "That it is a breach of Privilege for any Member to be made Sheriff, &c. during continuance of parliament."

Mr. Sackville moves that the lord keeper be sent to, to supersede Jennings's commission of sheriff.

The main question was then put, and passed, 157 to 101. And a Committee was appointed to consider of a proper way of superseding the Commission, and discharging the Sheriff from his office.

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech for a Toleration.] About this time the unusual activity of the Papists, and the discoveries which had been made by Coleman's Letters, gave the hint to both houses to be more moderate in their proceedings with respect to Protestant Dissenters.—In that of the Lords, especially,

The Duke of Buckingham thus expressed himself in favour of a Toleration: "My lords; There is a thing called liberty, which (whatsoever some men may think) is, that the people of England are fondest of; it is that they will never part with; and is that his majesty in his Speech has promised us to take a particular care of. This, my lords, in my opinion, can never be done without giving an Indulgence to all Protestant Dissenters. It is certainly a very uneasy kind of life to any man, that has either Christian charity, humanity, or goodness, to see his fellow-subjects daily abused, deprived of their liberties and birth-rights, and miserably thrown out of their possessions and freeholds, only because they cannot agree with others in some opinions and niceties of religion, which their consciences will not give them leave to consent to; and which, even by the confession of those who would impose upon them, are no ways necessary to salvation. But, my lords, besides this, and all that may be said upon it, in order to the improvement of our trade, and increase of the wealth, strength, and greatness of this nation, (which, with your leave, I shall presume to discourse of some other time) there is, methinks, in this notion of persecution a very gross mistake, both as to the point of government, and the point of Religion. There is so as to the point of Government, because it makes every man's safety depend on the wrong place; not upon governors, or a man's living well towards the civil government established by law, but upon his being transported with zeal for every opinion, that is held by those that have power in the Church that is in fashion; and I conceive it is a mistake in Religion, because it is positively against the express doctrine and example of Jesus Christ. Nay, my lords, as to our Protestant Religion, there is something in it yet worse; for we protestants maintain, that none of those opinions, which Christians differ about, are infallible; and therefore it is in us somewhat an inexcusable conception, that men ought to be deprived of their inheritance, and all the certain conveniences and advantages of life, because they will not agree with us in our uncertain opinions of religion. My humble motion therefore to your lordships, is, that you would give leave to bring in a Bill of Indulgence to all Protestant Dissenters. I know very well that every peer of this realm hath a right to bring into parliament any bill he conceives to be useful to this nation: but I thought it more respectful to your lordships to ask your leave before; but I cannot think the doing of it will be any prejudice to the bill, because I am confident the reason, the prudence, and the charitableness of it, will be able to justify it to this house, and the whole world." Accordingly, the house gave his grace leave to bring in a Bill to that purpose.

Dispute between the two Houses on Dr. Shirley's Appeal, revived.] But while this, and several other Bills were depending, the unfortunate Contest was revived between the two houses, concerning Dr. Shirley and sir John Fagg, the former having continued his process against the latter; and the lords themselves adhered to their first hearing of his appeal. Upon which the commons proceeded as follows:

Nov. 13. An Order from the lords to hear sir John Fagg's Cause to-morrow morning, was this day read in the commons and debated, and the farther debate thereof adjourned till Monday.

Nov. 15. The house resolved, That the prosecuting Appeals in the lords house, by Dr. Shirley against sir John Fagg, a member of this house, is a Breach of the Privileges of this house; and that the said sir John Fagg do not make any defence at the lords bar, in the said Appeal; and the farther debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Nov. 18. Sir John Fagg's business was resumed, and it was resolved that a Conference be desired of the lords for avoiding Differences between the two houses.

* "Some thought that the king had consented to the renewal of this Appeal-dispute, as disliking the warm proceedings of both houses; of which opinion was Marvell. Others believed that the lords of the country interest had persuaded the doctor thereto, with a view thereby to kindle such a flame between the two houses, as should oblige the king either to prorogue or dissolve them; the said lords apprehending that if this parliament should sit much longer, the majority might be gained over by places and money, so as to become quite obsequious to the court; and this, Seville lord Halifax, then in the interest of lord Shaftsbury, his uncle, told sir John Reresby was his opinion." Ralph.

Nov. 19. Sir Wm. Coventry reports from the Committee, to whom it was referred, to prepare and draw up Reasons to be offered at the conference to be desired with the lords, for avoiding the occasions of reviving the Differences between the two houses; and a Paper of Reasons agreed by the said committee to be reported to the house, being read, and the same agreed to, is as followeth:—"His majesty having recommended to us, at the opening of this session, the avoiding this Difference, if possible; and if it could not be prevented, that then we should defer these debates till we had brought such public Bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the kingdom: the common esteem it a great misfortune, that, contrary to that most excellent advice, the proceedings in the Appeal, brought the last session against sir John Fagg, by Mr. Shirley, have been renewed, and a day set for hearing the Cause; and therefore the commons have judged it the best way, before they enter into the argument of defence of their rights in this matter, to propose to your lordships, the putting off the proceedings in that matter for some short time; that so they may according to his majesty's advice, give a dispatch to some Bills now before them, of great Importance to the king and kingdom; which being finished, the commons will be ready to give your lordships such Reasons against those proceedings, and in defence of their rights, as we hope may satisfy your lordships, that no such proceedings ought to have been."

Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords, to desire a Conference, to preserve the good correspondence between the two houses."

Resolved "That whosoever shall prosecute any Appeal before the lords, against any commoner of England, from any court of equity, shall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and privileges of the commons of England; and shall be proceeded against accordingly: and the Resolution ordered to be affixed in the lobby, Westminster-Hall-gate, and all Inns of Court and Chancery."

Nov. 20. Ordered, "That Dr. Shirley be taken into custody by the serjeant at arms attending this house, as also sir Nich. Stanton, for serving Mr. Onslow with an Order to attend the lords;" and then the house adjourned to the 22nd.

Lord Shaftsbury's remarkable Speech thereon.

The proceedings of the commons on this occasion threw the lords into a flame. Upon the debate for appointing a day for the hearing Dr. Shirley's Cause, among many other warm speeches,

The Earl of Shaftsbury expressed himself as follows: "My lords; Our all is at stake, and therefore you must give me leave to speak freely before we part with it. My lord bishop of Salisbury is of opinion, 'That we should rather appoint a day to consider what to do upon the petition, than to appoint a day of hearing;' and my lord keeper, for I may name them at a committee of the whole house, tells us in very eloquent and studied language, 'That he will propose us a way, far less liable to exception, and much less offensive and injurious to our own privileges, than that of appointing a day of hearing.' And I beseech your lordships, did you not, after all these fine words, expect some admirable proposal? but it ended in this, 'That your lordships should appoint a day, nay, a very long day, to consider what you would do in it:' and my lord hath undertaken to convince you, that this is your only course by several undeniable reasons; the first of which is, 'That it is against your judicature to have this Cause, which is not proper, before us, nor ought to be relieved by us.' To this, my lords, give me leave to answer, that I did not expect from a man professing the law, that after an Answer by order of the court was put in, and a day had been appointed for hearing, which by some accident was set aside; and the plaintiff moving for a second day to be assigned, that ever, without hearing council on both sides, the court did enter into the merits of the cause. And if your lordships should do it here, in a case attended with the circumstances this is, it would not only be an apparent injustice, but a plain subterfuge, to avoid a point you durst not maintain.—But my lord's second reason speaks the matter more clearly; for that is, 'Because it is a doubtful case, whether the commons have not privilege,' and therefore my lord would have you 'to appoint a farther, and very long day to consider of it:' which in plain English is, that you conceive it on second thoughts a doubtful case; for so your appointing a day to consider will do; and that for no other reason, but because my lord keeper thinks it so; which, I hope, will not be a reason to prevail with your lordships; since we cannot yet, by experience, tell that his lordship is capable of thinking your lordships in the right, in any manner against the judgment of the house of commons, it is so hard a thing, even for the ablest of men, to change ill habits.—But my lord's third reason is the most admirable of all, which he stiles unanswerable; viz. 'That your lordships are all convinced in your own consciences, that this (if prosecuted) will cause a breach.' I beseech your lordships, consider whether this argument, thus applied, would not overthrow the law of nature, and all the laws of property and right in the world: for it is an argument, and a very good one, that you should not stand or insist on claims, where you have not a clear right, or where the question is not of consequence and moment, in a matter that may produce a dangerous, and pernicious breach, between relations; persons, or bodies politic, joined in interest and high concerns together. So, on the other hand, if the obstinacy of the party in the wrong shall be made an unanswerable argument for the other party to recede, and give up his just rights, how long shall the people keep their liberties or the princes or governors of the world their prerogatives? How long shall the husband maintain his dominion, or any man his property, from his friends or his neighbours obstinacy? But, my lords, when I hear my lord keeper open so eloquently the fatal consequences of a breach, I cannot forbear to fall into some admiration how it comes to pass, that (if the consequences be so fatal) the king's ministers in the house of commons, of which there are several that are of the Cabinet, and, have daily resort to his majesty, and have the direction and trust of his affairs; I say, that none of these should press these consequences there, or give the least stop to the career of that house in this business; but that all the Votes concerning this affair, nay, even that very Vote, 'That no Appeal from any court of equity is cognizable by the house of lords,' should pass nem. con. And yet all the great ministers with us here, the bishops and other lords of greatest dependance on the court, contend this point, as if it were pro aris & focis. I hear his maj. in Scotland hath been pleased to declare against Appeals in parliament: I cannot much blame the court, if they think (the lord-keeper and the judges being of the king's naming, and in his power to change) that the justice of the nation is safe enough; and I, my lords, may think so too, during this king's time, though I hear Scotland, not without reason, complains already. Yet how future princes may use this power, and how judges may be made out of men of ability or integrity, but men of relation and dependance, and who will do what they are commanded; and all men's causes come to be judged, and estates disposed on, as great men at court please.—My Lords, the constitution of our government hath provided better for us; and I can never believe so wise a body as the house of commons will prove that foolish woman, who plucks down her house with her hands.—My Lords, I must presume in the next place to say something to what was offered by my lord bishop of Salisbury, a man of great learning and abilities, and always versed in a stronger and closer way of reasoning, than the business of that noble lord I answered before did accustom him to; and that rev. prelate had stated the matter very fair upon two heads. The 1st, 'Whether the hearing of Causes and Appeals, and, especially in this point where the members have privilege, be so material to us, that it ought not to give way to the reason of state, of greater affairs that pressed us at that time?' The 2nd was, 'If this business be of that moment, yet whether the appointing a day to consider of this petition would prove of that consequence and prejudice to your cause?'—My Lords, to these give me leave in the first place to say, that this matter is no less than your whole judicature; and your judicature is the life and soul of the dignity of the peerage in England; you will quickly grow burthensome, if you grow useless; you have now the greatest and most useful end of parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new laws, but to redress grievances, and to maintain the old land marks. The h. of commons business is to complain, your lordships to redress, not only the complaints from them, that are the eyes of the nation, but all other particular persons that address to you. A land may groan under a multitude of laws, and I believe ours does; and when laws grow so multiplied, they prove oftener snares than directions and security to the people. I look upon it as the ignorance and weakness of the latter age, if not worse, the effect of the designs of ill men, that it is grown a general opinion, that where there is not a particular direction in some act of parliament, the law is defective; as if the common law had not provided much better, shorter, and plainer for the peace and quiet of the nation, than intricate, long, perplexed statutes do; which has made work for the lawyers, given power to the judges, lessened your lordship's power, and in a good measure unhinged the security of the people.—My lord bishop tells us, 'That your whole judicature is not in question, but only the privilege of the house of commons, of their members not appearing at your bar.' My lords, were it no more, yet that, for justice and the people's sake, you ought not to part with: how far a privilege of the house of commons, their servants, and those they own, doth extend, Westminster-Hall may with grief tell your lordships. And the same privilege of their members being not sued, must be allowed by your lordships as well; and what a failure of justice this would prove, whilst they are lords for life, and you for inheritance, let the world judge: for my part, I am willing to come to a Conference, whenever the dispute shall begin again; and dare undertake to your lordships, that they have neither precedent, reason, nor any justifiable pretence to shew against us; and therefore, my lords, if you part with this undoubted right merely for asking, where will the asking stop? And, my lords, we are sure it doth not stop here, for they have already, nem. con. voted against your lordships power of Appeals from any court of equity: so that you may plainly see where this caution and reason of state means to stop; not one jot short of laying your whole judicature aside; for the same reason of passing the king's money, of not interrupting good laws, and whatever else, must of necessity avoid all breach upon what score soever: thus your lordships plainly see the Breach will be as well made upon your judicature in general, as upon this; so that when your lordships have appointed a day, a very long day, for to consider whether Dr. Shirley's Cause be not too hot to handle; and when you have done the same for sir Nich. Stanton, whose Petition I hear is coming in, your lordships must proceed to a Vote, to lay all private business aside for 6 weeks; for that phrase of private business hath obtained upon this last age, upon that which is your most public duty and business, namely, the administration of justice. And I can tell your lordships, besides the reason that leads to it, that I have some intelligence of the designing such a Vote; for on the second day of your sitting, at the rising of the lords house, there came a gentleman into the lobby, belonging to a very great person, and asked in very great haste, 'Are the lords up? Have they passed the Vote?' And being asked, 'What Vote?' He answered, 'The Vote of no private business for 6 weeks.'—My Lords, if this be your business, see where you are; if we are to postpone our judicature, for fear of offending the h. of commons, for 6 weeks, that they, in the interim, may pass the Money, and other acceptable Bills that his maj. thinks of importance. Are so many wise men in the h. of commons to be laid asleep, and to pass all these acceptable things; and when they have done, to let us be let loose upon them?—Will they not remember this, next time there is want of Money? Or may not they rather be assured by those ministers that are amongst them, and go on so unanimously with them, that the king is on their side in this controversy? And when the public businesses are over, our time will be too short to make a breach, or vindicate ourselves in the matter. And then I beg your lordships, where are you, if after you have asserted but the last session your Right of Judicature, so highly, even in this point; and after the h. of commons had gone so high against you on the other hand, as to post up their Declaration and Remonstrances on Westminster-Hall doors; the very next session after you postpone the very same causes; and not only those, but all judicatures whatsoever? I beseech your lordships, will not this prove a fatal precedent and confession against yourselves? It is a maxim, and a rational one amongst the lawyers, 'That one precedent where the case hath been contested, is worth a thousand where there hath been no contest.' My lords, in saying this, I humbly suppose I have given a sufficient answer to my lord bishop's second question; 'Whether the appointing a day to consider what you will do with this Petition, be of that consequence to your right?' For it is a plain confession, that it is a doubtful case, and that infinitely stronger than if it were a new thing to you, never heard of before; for it is the very same case, and the very same thing desired in that case, that you formerly ordered, and so strongly asserted; so that, upon time, and all the deliberation imaginable, you declare yourselves to become doubtful, and you put yourselves out of your own hands, into that power that you have no reason to believe on your side in this question.—My Lords, I have all the duty imaginable to his majesty, and shall with all submission, give way to any thing he should think of importance to his affairs: but in this point it is to alter the constitution of the government, if you are asked to lay this aside; and there is no reason of state can be an argument to your lordships to turn yourselves out of that interest you have in the constitution of the government; it is not solely your concern that you maintain yourselves in it, but it is the concern of the poorest man in England, that you keep your station; it is your lordships concern, and that so highly, that I will be bold to say, the king can give none of you a requital or recompence for it. What are empty titles? What is present power, or riches, and a great estate, wherein I have no firm or fixed property? It is the constitution of the government, and maintaining it, that secures your lordships and every man else in what he hath; the poorest lord, if birth-right of the peerage be maintained, has a fair prospect before him for himself or his posterity; but the greatest title, with the greatest present power and riches, is but a mean creature, and maintains those in absolute monarchies no otherwise than by servile and low flatteries, and upon uncertain terms.—My Lords, it is not only your interest, but the interest of the nation, that you maintain your rights; for let the h. of commons and gentry of England think what they please, there is no prince that ever governed without nobility or an army; if you will not have one, you must have the other, or the monarchy cannot long support, or keep itself from tumbling into a democratical republic. Your lordships and the people have the same cause, and the same enemies. My lords, would you be in favour with the king? it is a very ill way to it, to put yourselves out of a future capacity, to be considerable in his service: I do not find in story, or in modern experience, but that it is better, and a man is much more regarded, that is still in a capacity and opportunity to serve, than he that hath wholly deprived himself of all for his prince's service. And I therefore declare, that I will serve my prince as a peer, but will not destroy the peerage to serve him.—My Lords, I have heard of twenty foolish models and expedients to secure the justice of the nation, and yet to take this right from your lordships, as the king by his commission appointing commoners to hear Appeals; or that the 12 judges should be the persons, or that persons should be appointed by act of parliament, which are all not only to take away your lordships just right, that ought not to be altered any more than any other part of the government, but are in themselves, when well weighed, ridiculous: I must deal freely with your lordships, these things could never have risen in men's minds, but that there has been some kind of provocation that has given the first rise to it. Pray, my lords, forgive me, if on this occasion I put you in mind of Committees Dinners, and the scandal of it, those doves of ladies that attended all causes; it was come to that pass, that men even hired, or borrowed of their friends, handsome sisters or daughters to deliver their Petitions: but yet for all this, I must say, that your judgments have been sacred unless in one or two Causes; and those we owe most to that bench from whence we now apprehend the most danger.—There is one thing I had almost forgot to speak to, 'which is the conjecture of time, the hinges upon which our reason of state turns; and to that, my lords, give me leave to say, if this be not a time of leisure for you to vindicate your privileges, you must never expect one. I could almost say, that the harmony, good agreement, and accord that is to be prayed for at most other times, may be fatal to us now; we owe the peace of these last two years, and the disengagement from the French interest, to the two houses differing from the sense and opinion of Whitehall, so at this time the thing in the world this nation hath most reason to apprehend is a general peace, which cannot now happen without very advantageous terms to the French, and disadvantageous to the house of Austria. We are the king's great counsellors, and if so, have right to differ, and give contrary counsels to those few that are nearest about him: I fear they would advance a general peace, I am sure I would advise against it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wish, nothing from you may add weight and reputation to those councils, which would assist the French. No money for Ships, nor preparations you can make, nor personal assurances our prince can have, can secure us from the French, if they are at leisure. He is grown the most potent of us all at sea: he has built 24 ships this last year, and has 30 more in number than we; besides the advantage, that our ships are all out of order, and his so exquisitely provided for, that every ship has its particular storehouse. It is incredible the money he hath, and is bestowing in making harbours; he makes nature itself give way to the vastness of his expence; and, after all this, shall a prince so wise, so intent upon his affairs, be thought to make all these preparations to sail over land, and fall on the back of Hungary, and batter the walls of Kaminitz? or is it possible he should oversee his interest in seizing of Ireland, a thing so feasible to him, if he be master of the seas, as he certainly now is; and which, when attained, gives him all the Southern, Mediterranean, East and West India trade, and renders him, both by situation, and excellent harbours, perpetual master of the seas, without dispute?—My Lords, to conclude this point, I fear the court of England is greatly mistaken in it, and I do not wish them the reputation of the concurrence of the kingdom; and this out of the most sincere loyalty to his majesty, and love to my nation.—My Lords, I have but one thing more to trouble you with, and that, peradventure, is a consideration of the greatest weight and concern, both to your lordships, and the whole nation. I have often seen in this house, that the arguments with strongest reason, and most convincing to the lay-lords in general, have not had the same effect upon the bishop's bench; but that they have unanimously gone against us in matters, that many of us have thought essential and undoubted rights: and I consider, that it is not possible, that men of great learning, piety, and reason, as their lordships are, should not have the same care of doing right, and the same conviction of what is right, upon clear reason offered, that other your lordships have. And therefore, my lords, I must necessarily think we differ in principles, and then it is very easy to apprehend, what is the clearest sense to men of my principles, may not at all persuade or affect the conscience of the best men of a different one. I put your lordships the case plainly as it is now before us. My principle is, 'That the king is king by law, and by the same law that the poor man enjoys his cottage;' and so it becomes the concern of every man in England, that has but his liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmost, the king in all his rights and prerogatives. My principle is also, 'That the lords house, and the judicature and rights belonging to it, are an essential part of the government, and established by the same law;' the king governing and administering justice by his house of lords, and advising with both his houses of parliament in all important matters, is the government I own, am born under, and am obliged to. If ever there should happen in future ages (which, God forbid) a king governing by an army, without his parliament, it is a government I own not, am not obliged to, nor was born under. According to this principle, every honest man that holds it, must endeavour equally to preserve the frame of the government, in all the parts of it, and cannot satisfy his conscience to give up the lords house for the service of the crown, or to take away the just rights and privileges of the house of commons, to please the lords. But there is another principle got into the world, my lords, that hath not been long there; for abp. Laud was the first author that I remember of it; and I cannot find that the Jesuits, or indeed the Popish clergy have ever owned it, but some of the episcopal clergy of our British Isles; and withal, as it is new, so it is the most dangerous, destructive doctrine to our government and law, that ever was. It is the first of the Canons published by the Convocation, 1640, 'That Monarchy is of divine Right.' This doctrine was then preached up, and maintained by Sibthorp, Manwaring, and others, and of later years, by a Book published by Dr. Sanderson, bishop of Lincoln, under the name of abp. Usher; and how much it is spread amongst our dignified clergy, is very easily known. We all agree, that the king and his government is to be obeyed for conscience sake; and that the divine precepts require, not only here, but in all parts of the world, obedience to lawful governors. But that this family are our kings, and this particular frame of government is our lawful constitution, and obliges us, is owing only to the particular laws of our country. This Laudean doctrine was the root that produced the Bill of Test, last session; and some very perplexed Oaths, that are of the same nature with that, and yet imposed by several acts this parliament.—In a word, if this doctrine be true, our Magna Charta is of no use, our laws are but rules amongst ourselves during the king's pleasure. Monarchy, if of Divine Right, cannot be bounded or limited by human laws; nay, what is more, cannot bind itself: and all our claims of Right by the law, or constitution of the government, all the jurisdiction and privilege of this house, all the rights and privileges of the house of commons, all the properties and liberties of the people, are to give way not only to the interest, but the will and pleasure of the crown. And the best and worthiest of men, holding this principle, must vote to deliver up all we have, not only when reasons of state and the separate interest of the crown require it, but when the will and pleasure of the king is known, and would have it so. For that must be, to a man of that principle, the only rule and measure of right and justice. Therefore, my lords, you see how necessary it is, that all our principles be known; and how fatal to us all it is, that this principle should be suffered to spread any farther.—My Lords, to conclude, your lordships have seen of what consequence this matter is to you, and that the appointing a day to consider, is no less than declaring yourselves doubtful, upon second and deliberate thoughts, that you put yourselves out of your own hands, into more than a moral probability of having this session made a precedent against you. You see your duty to yourselves and the people; and that it is really not the interest of the house of commons, but may be the inclination of the court, that you lose the power of Appeals: but I beg our house may not be felo de se, but that your lordships would take in this affair, the only course to preserve yourselves, and appoint a day, this day three weeks, for the hearing Dr. Shirley's Cause, which is my humble motion."

Protest on appointing a day for hearing Dr. Shirley's Cause.] The debate being over, and the house being resumed, the question was put, Whether the 20th of Nov. shall be the day appointed for the hearing of the Cause between Dr. Shirley and sir John Fagg? It was resolved in the Affirmative.—Before the putting the said question, leave being demanded and given to such lords as thought fit (if the same were carried in the affirmative) to enter their Protestation and Dissent; accordingly this Protestation is entered against the said Vote, for the Reasons following:

1. "Because it seems contrary to the use and practice of this high court (which gives example to all other courts) upon a bare Petition of the plaintiff Dr. Shirley, in a cause depending last session, and discontinued by prorogation, to appoint a day for hearing of the cause before the defendant is so much as summoned, or appears in Court, or to be alive. 2. The defendant, by the rules of this court, having liberty upon summons to make a new Answer, as sir Jeremy Whitchcott was admitted, after summons, to do last session in Darrel's Cause against him, discontinued by prorogation, or to mend his Answer, or to plead, as he shall see cause, is deprived of this and other benefits of law, by appointing a day of hearing without these essential forms. 3. It appears, by the plaintiff's own shewing in his Petition, that his case against a purchaser is not relievable in equity; and therefore ought to be dismissed without putting the parties to a further charge. 4. It appears, by his own shewing, and the defendant sir John Fagg's Plea, that he comes hither per saltum, and ought to attend judgment in the inferior courts, if his case is relievable, and not to appeal to the highest court, till either injustice is done him below, or erroneous judgment given against him, and relief denied him upon review. 5. The danger of this precedent is so universal, that it shakes all the purchasers of England. ANGLESEA."

Nov. 20. Dr. Shirley appeared at the bar of the house of lords, and his council, Mr. Wallop, appearing, who would have excused himself, but was ordered to appear again on Monday morning next, to plead the Cause; and the other two council (one being in the country, and the other sick) were excused: and the said Dr. Shirley, sir Nich. Stanton, and Mr. Wallop, were ordered to have the protection of the house: and upon debate of the commons Vote made yesterday, it was Ordered, "That the Paper posted up in several places, signed by William Goldbro, Cler. Dom. Com. against the Judicature of the house of peers, in Cases of Appeals from Courts of Equity, is illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the dissolution of the government."

Debate in the House of Lords on a Motion for an Address to the King to dissolve the Parliament.] Upon consideration of the said Vote of the commons, it was proposed by lord Mohun, to Address his majesty to dissolve the Parliament. This gave rise to a vehement debate,* "in the course of which," says Mr. Ralph, "all imaginable arguments, that could either influence court or country, were made use of to procure an affirmative: the king was flattered with the hopes, or rather bribed with the promise, of a large sum to pay his Debts: and the Church received the warmest assurances, that, though Protestant Dissenters should find some favour and ease, her lands and dignities would be safe: and, on the popular side of the question, the conduct of the present house of commons was exposed with as much severity, as if the nation had not one true representative. From the length of time which the purse of the people had been in their hands, and the free use they had made of it, it was urged, that they were become 'more than lords.' They were charged with having violated the ancient rules of parliament, by not admitting the right of the lords to reduce their grants. They were reproached for having several times rejected, with scorn, a Bill for the more fair and equal Trial of the Peers. It was said, seriously, that they had never met without exciting the greatest apprehensions in all sober and wise men, and ironically, that it was owing to the goodness of the prince, and the virtue of the members, that honours, offices, pensions; money, employments and gifts, had not been bestowed and accepted as a consideration for reducing the government to the model of France, Denmark, &c. where the will and pleasure of the prince had taken place of the laws. It was added, 'How easily this may be done in future ages, under such princes, and such an house of commons as may happen, if 'long and continued parliaments,' be allowed for law, may be made some measure of judging by this; where, though the prince had no design, and the members of the house of commons have shewed so great candour and self-denial, yet the best observers are apt to think, that we owe it to the strong and opposite factions at court, that many things of great alterations have not passed.—It was also observed, that in former times when parliaments were short and frequent, the members constantly received their Wages, both from their counties and boroughs; many of the poorer boroughs petitioned to be excused from sending members, as not being able to bear their charge, and were so: laws were made in favour of the gentry, that corporations should compel none but the freemen of their own town to serve for them; nay, that in all the ancient returns of writs for knights of the shires, their sureties for their appearance were returned with them. But that now the case was so altered, that 1500*l.* and 2000*l.* and lately 7000*l.* was a price that men paid to be entrusted. That it was to be hoped the charity of those worthy persons, and their zeal for the public interest, had induced them to be at this expence: but that it were better to be otherwise, there being a scurvy English Proverb, 'That men that buy dear, cannot live by selling cheap.'—The debate continued till 8 o'clock, when it passed in the negative by two voices. Content, 48; not content, 50. At the head of the lords who were for the Address, appeared the duke of York, who by his conduct on this occasion has given much credit to the Politics in Mr. Coleman's Historical Letter to Father le Chaise. His royal highness, however, was not followed by the whole body of Catholic peers; for some of them divided against him, and in particular, the celebrated earl of Bristol, so often mentioned in the beginning of this reign. The Lists on this division were remarkable in several respects, but in nothing more, than to see the names of Buckingham, Shaftsbury, Essex, Wharton, Holles, Townsend, &c. follow in train, after that of the presumptive heir, whom they so soon after, with so much violence, endeavoured to set aside.—But though they joined in the measure, it was with very different views: the Duke wanted to get rid of this house of commons, because of their zeal against the catholics; and in hope, that, by a confederacy with the other nonconformists, such a change might be made in the representative part of the legislature, as might pave the way for a general toleration: the rest, because the two parties approached too near an equality; because the condescensions of the king, or the practices of his ministers, might, in a day's time, take the game out of their hands, and put the lurch upon them.

* In the APPENDIX to the present volume, No. VII, will be found a curious Tract written by the Earl of Shaftsbury, entitled "The Debate or Arguments for Dissolving this present Parliament and the calling frequent and new Parliaments. As they were delivered in the House of Lords, Nov. 20, 1675."

Protest against rejecting the Address for dissolving the Parliament.] Upon the rejection of this Address, the following Protest was entered:

"We whose names are underwritten, peers of this realm, having proposed that an humble Address might be made to his majesty from this house, that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve this parliament; and the house having carried the Vote in the negative: for the justification of our loyal intentions towards his majesty's service, and of our true respect and deference to this hon. house, and to shew that we have no sinister or indirect ends in this our humble proposal, do with all humility herein set forth the Grounds and Reasons why we were of opinion that the said humble Address should have been made: 1. We do humbly conceive, that it is according to the ancient laws and statutes of this realm, that there should be frequent and new parliaments; and that the practice of several hundred years hath been accordingly. 2. It seems not reasonable, that any particular number of men should for many years engross so great a trust of the people, as to be their representatives in the house of commons; and that all other the gentry and the members of corporations of the same degree and quality with them should be so long excluded: neither, as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the government, that the counties, cities, and boroughs, should be confined for so long a time to such members as they have once chosen to serve for them; the mutual correspondence and interest of those who choose and are chosen admitting great variations in length of time. 3. The long continuance of any such as are intrusted for others, and who have so great a power over the purse of the nation, must, in our humble opinion, naturally endanger the producing of Factions and Parties, and the carrying on of particular interests and designs, rather than the public good.—And we are the more confirmed in our desires for the said humble Address, by reason of this unhappy Breach fallen out betwixt the two houses, of which the house of peers hath not given the least occasion; they having done nothing but what their ancestors and predecessors have in all times done, and what is according to their duty, and for the interest of the people, that they should do; which notwithstanding, the house of commons have proceeded in such an unprecedented and extraordinary way, that it is in our humble opinion become altogether impracticable for the two houses, as the case stands, jointly to pursue those great and good ends for which they were called. For these Reasons, we do enter this our Protestation against, and Dissent unto, the said Vote: Buckingham, Shaftsbury, Dorset, Newport, Westmoreland, P. Wharton, Delamer, Grey de Rolleston, Salisbury, Mohun, Stamford, H. Sandys, Howard E. of Berks, Clarendon, Townshend, J. Bridgewater, F. Fauconberg, Halifax, Winchester, Yarmouth, Chesterfield, William Petre."

The Parliament prorogued for 15 Months.] The above were all the lords who were in the house early enough to set their names, before the king came to prorogue the parliament; which he did to the 15th of February twelvemonth.

Principal Occurrences during the long Recess—Coffee Houses suppressed by Proclamation—Congress of Nimeguen—Campaign of 1676—Uncertain Conduct of the King.] "Soon after the prorogation," says Mr. Hume, "there passed an incident, which in itself is trivial, but tends strongly to mark the genius of the English government, and of Charles's administration, during this period. The liberty of the constitution, and the variety as well as violence of the parties, had begotten a propensity for political conversation; and as the Coffee-Houses in particular were the scenes, where the conduct of the king and the ministry was canvassed with great freedom, a proclamation was issued to suppress these places of rendezvous. Such an act of power, during former reigns, would have been grounded entirely on the prerogative; and before the accession of the house of Stuart, no scruple would have been entertained with regard to that exercise of authority. But Charles, finding doubts to arise upon this proclamation, had recourse to the judges, who supplied him with a chicane, and that too a frivolous one, by which he might justify his proceedings. The law, which settled the excise, enacted, that licenses for retailing liquors might be refused to such as could not find security for payment of the duties. But coffee was not a liquor subjected to excise; and even this power of refusing licenses was very limited, and could not reasonably be extended beyond the intention of the act. The king therefore, observing the people to be much dissatisfied, yielded to a petition of the coffee-men, who promised for the future to restrain all seditious discourse in their houses; and the proclamation was recalled.—This campaign proved more fortunate to the confederates than any other during the whole war. The French took the field in Flanders with a numerous army; and Lewis himself served as a volunteer under the prince of Condé. But notwithstanding his great preparations, he could gain no advantages but the taking of Huy and Limbourg, places of small consequence. The prince of Orange, with a considerable army, opposed him in all his motions; and neither side was willing, without a visible advantage, to hazard a general action, which might be attended either with the entire loss of Flanders on one hand, or the invasion of France on the other. Lewis, tired of so unactive a campaign, returned to Versailles; and the whole summer passed in the Low Countries without any memorable event.—The French, who, twelve years before, had scarcely a ship of war in any of their harbours, had raised themselves, by means of perseverance and policy, to be, in their present force, though not in their resources, the first maritime power in Europe. The Dutch, while in alliance with them against England, had supplied them with several vessels, and had taught them the rudiments of the difficult art of ship-building. The English next, when in alliance with them against Holland, instructed them in the method of fighting their ships, and of preserving order in naval engagements. Lewis availed himself of every opportunity to aggrandise his people, while Charles, sunk in indolence and pleasure, neglected all the noble arts of government; or it at any time he roused himself from his lethargy, that industry, by reason of the unhappy projects which he embraced, was often more pernicious to the public than his inactivity itself. He was as anxious to promote the naval power of France, as if the safety of his crown had depended on it; and many of the plans executed in that kingdom, were first, it is said, digested and corrected by him.—The successes of the allies had been considerable the last campaign; but the Spaniards and Imperialists well knew, that France was not yet sufficiently broken, nor willing to submit to the terms which they resolved to impose upon her. Though they could not refuse the king's mediation, and Nimeguen, after many difficulties, was at last fixed on as the place of congress; yet, under one pretence or other, they still delayed sending their ambassadors, and no progress was made in the negotiation. Lord Berkely, sir Wm. Temple, and sir Lionel Jenkins, were the English ministers at Nimeguen. The Dutch, who were impatient for peace, soon appeared: Lewis, who hoped to divide the allies, and who knew that he himself could neither be seduced nor forced into a disadvantageous peace, sent ambassadors: the Swedes, who hoped to recover by treaty what they had lost by arms, were also forward to negotiate. But as these powers could not proceed of themselves to settle terms, the congress, hitherto, served merely as an amusement to the public.—It was by the events of the campaign, not the conferences among the negotiators, that the articles of peace were to be determined. The Spanish towns, ill fortified and worse defended, made but a feeble resistance to Lewis; who, by laying up magazines during the winter, was able to take the field early in the spring, before the forage could be found in the open country. In the month of April he laid siege to Condé, and took it by storm in four days, having sent the duke of Orleans to besiege Bouchaine, a small but important fortress, he posted himself so advantageously with his main army, as to hinder the confederates from relieving it, or fighting without disadvantage. The prince of Orange, in spite of the difficulties of the season, and the want of provisions, came in sight of the French army; but his industry served to no other purpose than to render him spectator of the surrender of Bouchaine. Both armies stood in awe of each other, and were unwilling to hazard an action, which might be attended with the most important consequences. Lewis, though he wanted not personal courage, was little enterprising in the field; and being resolved this campaign to rest contented with the advantages which he had so early obtained, he thought proper to intrust his army to marshal Schomberg, and retired himself to Versailles. After his departure, the prince of Orange laid siege to Maastricht; but meeting with an obstinate resistance, he was obliged, on the approach of Schomberg, who in the mean time had taken Aire, to raise the siege. He was incapable of yielding to adversity, or bending under misfortunes: but he began to foresee, that, by the negligence and errors of his allies, the war in Flanders must necessarily have a very unfortunate issue.—On the Upper Rhine, Philippsbourg was taken by the Imperialists. In Pomerania, the Swedes were so unsuccessful against the Danes and Brandenburgers, that they seemed to be losing apace all those possessions, which, with so much valour and good fortune, they had acquired in Germany.—About the beginning of winter, the Congress of Nimeguen was pretty full, and the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and Spain, two powers strictly conjoined by blood and alliance, at last appeared. The Dutch had threatened, if they absented themselves any longer, to proceed to a separate treaty with France. In the conferences and negotiations, the dispositions of the parties became every day more apparent.—The Hollanders, loaded with debts and harassed with taxes, were desirous of putting an end to a war; in which, besides the disadvantages attending all leagues, the weakness of the Spaniards, the divisions and delays of the Germans, prognosticated nothing but disgrace and misfortune. Their commerce languished; and what gave them still greater anxiety, the commerce of England, by reason of her neutrality, flourished extremely; and they were apprehensive, lest advantages, once lost, would never thoroughly be regained. They had themselves no farther motive for continuing the war, than to secure a good frontier to Flanders; but gratitude to their allies still engaged them to try whether another campaign might procure a peace, which would give general satisfaction. The prince of Orange, urged by motives of honour, of ambition, and of animosity against France, endeavoured to keep them steady to this resolution.—The Spaniards, not to mention the other incurable weaknesses into which their monarchy was fallen, were distracted with domestic dissensions between the parties of the queen regent and don John, natural brother to their young sovereign. Though unable of themselves to defend Flanders, they were resolute not to conclude a peace, which would leave it exposed to every assault or inroad; and while this made the most magnificent promises to the States, their real trust was in the protection of England. They saw that, if that small but important territory were once subdued by France, the Hollanders, exposed to so terrible a power, would fall into dependence, and would endeavour, by submissions, to ward off that destruction to which a war, in the heart of their state, must necessarily expose them. They believed that Lewis, sensible how much greater advantages he might reap from the alliance than from the subjection of the republic, which must scatter its people and depress its commerce, would be satisfied with very moderate conditions, and would turn his enterprises against his other neighbours. They thought it impossible but the people and the parliament of England, foreseeing these obvious consequences, must at last force the king to take part in the affairs of the continent, in which their interests were so deeply concerned. And they trusted, that even the king himself, on the approach of so great a danger, must open his eyes, and sacrifice his prejudices in favour of France, to the safety of his own dominions.—But Charles here found himself entangled in such opposite motives and engagements, as he had not resolution enough to break, or patience to unravel. On the one hand, he always regarded his alliance with France as a sure resource in case of any commotions among his own subjects; and whatever schemes he might still retain for enlarging his authority, or altering the established religion, it was from that quarter alone he could expect assistance. He had actually in secret sold his neutrality to France, and he received remittances of a million of livres a-year, which was afterwards increased to two millions; a considerable supply in the present embarrassed state of his revenue. And he dreaded lest the parliament should treat him as they had formerly done his father; and after they had engaged him in a war on the continent, should take advantage of his necessities, and make him purchase supplies by sacrificing his prerogative and abandoning his ministers.—On the other hand, the cries of his people and parliament, seconded by Danby, Arlington, and most of his ministers, incited him to take part with the allies, and to correct the unequal balance of power in Europe. He might apprehend danger from opposing such earnest desires: he might hope for large supplies if he concurred with them: And however inglorious and indolent his disposition, the renown of acting as arbiter of Europe would probably at intervals rouse him from his lethargy, and move him to support the high character with which he stood invested.—It is worthy of observation, that, during this period, the king was, by every one, abroad and at home, by France and by the allies, allowed to be the undisputed arbiter of Europe; and no terms of peace, which he would have prescribed, could have been refused by either party. Though France afterwards found means to resist the same alliance, joined with England, yet was she then obliged to make such violent efforts as quite exhausted her; and it was the utmost necessity which pushed her to find resources, far surpassing her own expectations. Charles was sensible, that so long as the war continued abroad, he should never enjoy ease at home, from the impatience and importunity of his subjects; yet could he not resolve to impose a peace by openly joining himself with either party. Terms advantageous to the allies must lose him the friendship of France: the contrary would enrage his parliament. Between these views, he perpetually fluctuated; and from his conduct, it is observable, that a careless, remiss disposition, agitated by opposite motives, is capable of as great inconsistencies as are incident even to the greatest imbecility and folly."

FIFTEENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] Feb. 15, 1676-7. The Parliament met according to prorogation, after a recess of nearly 15 months, when the king opened the session with the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have called you together again, after a long prorogation, that you might have an opportunity to repair the misfortunes of the last session, and to recover and restore the right use and end of parliaments. The time I have given you to recollect yourselves in, and to consider whether those differences tend which have been so unhappily managed and improved between you, is enough to leave you without all excuse, if ever you fall into the like again. I am now resolved to let the world see, that it shall not be my fault, if they be not made happy by the consultations in parliament. For I declare myself very plainly to you, that I come prepared to give you all the satisfaction and security in the great concerns of the Protestant Religion, as it is established in the Church of England, that shall reasonably be asked, or can consist with Christian prudence. And I declare myself as freely, that I am ready to gratify you in a further securing of your Liberty and Property (if you can think you want it) by as many good laws as you shall propose, and as can consist with the safety of the government; without which, there will neither be liberty nor property left to any man.—Having thus plainly told you what I am ready to do for you, I shall deal as plainly with you again, and tell you what it is I do expect from you. First, I do expect and require from you, that all occasions of Difference between the two houses be carefully avoided; for else, they who have no hopes to prevent your good resolutions, will hope, by this reserve, to hinder them from taking any effect. And let all men judge who is most for arbitrary government, they that foment such Differences as tend to dissolve all parliaments; or I, that would preserve this and all parliaments from being made useless by such dissensions. In the next place, I desire you to consider the necessity of building more Ships, and how much all our safeties are concerned in it. And since the additional Revenue of Excise will shortly expire, you that know me to be under a great burden of Debts, and how hard a shift I am making to pay them off as fast as I can, I hope, will never deny me the continuance of this revenue, and some reasonable Supply to make my condition more easy.—And that you may be satisfied how impossible it is (whatever some men think) to support the government with less than the present Revenue, you may at any time see the yearly established Charge; by which it will appear, that the constant and unavoidable charge being paid, there will remain no overplus towards the discharging those contingencies which may happen in all kingdoms, and which have been a considerable charge to me this last year. To conclude: I do recommend to you the peace of the kingdom, in the careful prevention of all differences; the safety of the kingdom, in providing for some greater strength at sea; and the prosperity of the kingdom, in assisting the necessary charge and support of the government. And if any of these good ends should happen to be disappointed; I call God and men to witness this day, that the misfortune of that disappointment shall not lie at my doors. The rest I refer to the Chancellor."

The Lord Chancellor Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor spake as followeth:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the house of commons; By the most gracious pleasure of the king, you are here again assembled to hold another session of this parliament, wherein the king expects your advice and your assistance; your advice in matters of the highest deliberation, your assistance in matters of extreme and pressing difficulty. Your deliberations will chiefly be exercised about those things which do belong unto your peace, the peace of the Church and the peace of the State; two considerations of so close a connection between themselves, that in the very original writ of summons, by virtue of which you still sit here, they are jointly recommended to your counsel and your care. The peace of the Church is harder to preserve than the peace of the State; for they that desire innovations in the State most commonly begin the attempt upon the Church. And by this means it comes to pass that the peace of the Church is so often disturbed, not only by those poor mistaken souls who deserve to be pitied, but by malicious and designing men who deserve to be punished. And while things continue in this estate, it cannot be avoided, but that the laws which are necessary to restrain the malicious must and will sometimes disquiet and wound those that are weak. What Remedies are fit for this disease; whether the fault be in the laws or in the men, in the men that should obey, or in the men that should execute; whether the cure be a work of time and patience, or of zeal and diligence; or whether any new expedient can be found, to secure the ship from that storm which the swelling of two contrary tides seems to threaten; is wholly left to your advice. The king hath called you for that end, and doubts not but your counsels will be such as shall tend to safety and to establishment. The peace of the State requires as much of your care and vigilance too, our peace at home, and our peace abroad. As for that abroad, we are at this time, blessed be God for his mercy to us, and blessed be the king for his care of us, in perfect peace with all the nations upon earth; such a peace as makes us the envy of the Christian world, and hath enabled us to do ourselves right against the Infidels; such a peace as brings with it all the fruits of peace, and deserves not only our prayers for the continuance of it, but our best and most watchful care that nothing may be done on our part to give it an interruption. But then we must consider again, that our peace abroad will not subsist any longer than while we do maintain our peace at home; for, without this, no kingdom can be able to act in its full strength; and without that, the friendship or enmity or any nation ceases to be considerable to its neighbours.—Now it is a great and a dangerous mistake in those who think the peace at home is well enough preserved, so long as the sword is not drawn; whereas, in truth, nothing deserves the name of peace, but unity; such an unity as flows from an unshaken trust and confidence between the king and his people; from a due reverence and obedience to his laws and to his government; from a religious and an awful care, not to remove the ancient landmarks, not to disturb those constitutions which time and public convenience hath settled; from a zeal to preserve the whole frame and order of the government upon the old foundations; and from a perfect detestation and abhorrence of all such as are given to change: whatever falls short of this, falls short of peace too.—If therefore there be any endeavours to renew, nay, if there be not all the endeavours that can be to extinguish, the memory of all former provocations and offences, and the occasions of the like for the future; if there be such divisions as begets great thoughts of heart; shall we call this peace, because it is not war, or because men do not yet take the field? As well we may call it health, when there is a dangerous fermentation in the blood and spirits, because the patient hath not yet taken his bed. And yet, as evident as it is that all we have or hope for depends upon the preservation of our peace and unity at home, as certain it is that no care to preserve it will be wanting here.—Nevertheless it remains still to be wished, that even this very point were no part of those difficulties we are now to struggle with; for there are many more, which without your aid and your assistance can never be overcome. One is, the weakness of our Fleet: for strength and weakness can no otherwise be judged of than by comparison; and by this measure we may truly judge our fleet to be less considerable than it was, because ours stands at a stay, while our neighbours round about us are improved. This is an affair wherein no time would be lost; because, whenever we set about it, it will take up some considerable time before it can be finished.—Another weight there is, which lies very heavy upon the Revenue; and that is, the Debts which incumber it. Justice and honour oblige the king not to forsake those who have assisted with their estates in the defence of the public. And although the necessary issues of his revenue, in the many new and chargeable emergencies of state, did for a while postpone their satisfaction, yet his maj. hath now gone very far in it, and hath provided for the security and payment of an immense sum, with such difficulties as none but a just and generous prince would ever have undergone.—And now, should the rest of his revenue fail, or fail to be unladen in some degree, the inconvenience to the public and the insecurity of all our affairs would quickly be too manifest.—One difficulty more there is, without which all the rest were none; and that is, the strange diffidence and distrust, which, like a general infection, begins to spread itself into almost all the corners of the land. Much of this arises from the artifice of ill men, who create and nourish all the suspicions which they can devise; but the cure of it lies perfectly in your hands: for all this will presently vanish, as soon as men shall see your acquiescence, and the fruits of it, in a cheerful concurrence with his maj. to all those good and public ends which he hath now so earnestly recommended to you. It would be somewhat strange, and without all example in story, that a nation should be twice ruined, twice undone, by the self-same way and means the same Fears and Jealousies. Would any man, that doth but give himself leave to think, refuse to enjoy and take comfort in the blessings that are present, only for fear of future changes and alterations? Surely it is enough for any kingdom, and more than most kingdoms in the world can boast of, to have their affairs brought into such a condition, that they may in all human probability, and unless it be their own default, continue for a long time safe and happy. Future contingencies are not capable of any certain prospect; a security beyond that of human probability no nation ever did, or ever shall, attain to. If a kingdom be guarded by nature against all dangers from without, and then will rely too much upon what nature hath done for them; if a kingdom be warned and cautioned against all dangers from within by former experiences, and then will either forget or make no use of those experiences; if a kingdom be powerful in shipping and navigation, and then see their neighbours endeavouring to overpower them that way, without being solicitous enough to augment and reinforce their own naval strength; if a kingdom be happy in the frequent assemblies of their great councils, where all that is grievous may be redressed, and all that is wanting may be enacted, and then will render those councils useless and impracticable, by continuing endless distractions: who can wonder if their affairs should begin to be less prosperous; when otherwise, humanly speaking, and in all common probability, their condition would have been out of the reach of fortune, and their security in a manner impregnable?—My Lords and Gentlemen; If the presaging malice of our enemies should pretend to foretel any such fate as this to befall us, the wisdom and the magnanimity of this great council will quickly be too hard for all their auguries. The honour and the loyalty of this august and venerable assembly will leave no kind of room for any such divinations. You that have the happiness to live under so excellent a monarchy, so admirable a constitution, and temper of government; you that remember what the want of this government cost us, and the miserable desolations which attended it; have all the motives, and are under all the obligations, that can be, to secure and advance the interest of it.—The king on his part meets you with so open and so full a heart, and is so absolutely resolved and determined to do all that in him lies to glad the hearts of his people, that it must be the strangest infelicity in the world, if either he or his subjects should meet with any disappointments here. For the king hath no desires but what are public; no ends or aims which terminate in himself. All his endeavours are so entirely bent upon the welfare of all his dominions, that he doth not think any man a good subject, who doth not heartily love his country; and therefore let no man pass for a good patriot, who doth not as heartily love and serve his prince. Private men, indeed, are subject to be misled by private interests, and may entertain some vain and slender hopes of surviving the misfortunes of the public: but a prince is sure to fall with it; and therefore can never have any interest divided from it. To live and die with the king, is the highest profession a subject can make; and sometimes it is a profession only, and no more: but in a king it is an absolute necessity, it is a fate inevitable, that he must live and die with his people. Away then with all the vain imaginations of those who labour to infuse a misbelief of the government! away with those ill-meant distinctions between the Court and the Country, between the natural and the politic capacity! and let all who go about to persuade others that these are two several interests, have a care of that precipice to which such principles may lead them: for the first men that ever began to distinguish of their duty never left off, till they had quite distinguished themselves out of all their allegiance. My Lords and Gentlemen; The king hath so long had, and still retains, such honourable thoughts of these assemblies, that we ought to make it one great part of our business to deserve the continuance of his majesty's grace and good opinion. Let no contention then come near this place but that of a noble emulation, who shall serve his country best, by well serving of the king: let no passion enter here, but that of a pious zeal to lay hold upon all opportunities of promoting the honour and service of the crown, till our enemies despair of ever profiting by any disorders amongst us. And let all who pray for the long life and prosperity of the king add their endeavours to their prayers; and study to prolong his sacred life, by giving him all the joys of heart which can arise from the demonstrations of the lively and the warm affections of his people.*

* "What the king had said so well, the Lord Chancellor, as usual, spoiled by straining to do it better; and, had not the Lord Treasurer used a far more effectual way of persuasion with the commons, there had been the same danger of the ill success of this meeting, as of those before. Concerning his lordship's Applications to Members, sir John Reresby has left us the following Memorial; which, whether it contains the whole truth, or not, let the understanding and impartial reader judge: Having kept my Christmas in the country, I no sooner returned to London, than my Lord Treasurer sent to speak with me. I waited on him therefore, and found him very open in his discourse upon several subjects, but for the most part lamenting that his countrymen would not allow him an opportunity to be of service to them with the king, and making many protestations that the jealousies of those who called themselves of the Country Party, were entirely groundless and without foundation: that to his certain knowledge, the king meant no other than to preserve the religion and government by law established; and, upon the whole, wished that neither himself or his posterity might prosper, if he did not speak what he really believed: that if the government was in any danger, it was most from those who pretended such a mighty zeal for it; but who under that pretence were endeavouring to create such discontents between the king and the nation, as might produce confusion in the end; and intreated me to be careful how I embarked myself with that sort of people. My reply was, That I hoped I was not one to be wilfully misled: that I should have no rule to go by in that house but my reason and conscience, and that so I could be of no particular faction or party: that as much as I yet understood of the duty of a member of the house of commons at this time, suggested to me a moderation between the two extremes, and to have an equal regard for the prerogative of the king and the liberty of the subject. True it is, till now, that Debate in the House of Lords on the Question, Whether the Parliament was not dissolved by the Prorogation of 15 Months &c. Instead of entering upon business, as usual, a Question was started in each house, Whether they had any Right to enter upon business at all? in short, Whether they were a Parliament?

the Treasurer used such solemn asseverations, with regard to the king's good intention, and pretty clearly convinced me that some of the chiefs of the Country Party had most at heart their own private interest, whatever they asserted in favour and defence of the public, that I had great notions of the truth and sincerity of the Country Party." p. 36. 37. And again, p. 43. "The session had gone on smoothly and sedately enough in both houses; my Lord Treasurer having so ordered it, that the King's Party increas'd rather than the other; but it was much feared, that some Votes were obtained more by purchase than affection." Ralph.

* This long Prorogation of fifteen months occasioned at that time much disquiet, and produced the following Arguments, which it has been thought proper to annex. It does not appear who was the author.

The Question is, Whether a Prorogation of the Parliament extended beyond twelve months, be not, in construction of law, dissolution?

"It seems evidently that the law cannot intend one thing, and, at the same time, permit another to be legal, which destroys its own purpose and intent. Wherefore if there be laws in force which intend and require the yearly sitting of parliament, the law cannot admit of Prorogation exceeding the compass of a year, for that were to make the law felō de se and to divest itself of capacity to take effect, or to be executed, since during a prorogation, which is legal, no other parliament can be called. The law cannot contradict itself, and if it requires the sitting of a parliament within a year, then the not sitting of a parliament within a year, must be contrary to law; and so a prorogation above a year, must be illegal. But if a prorogation beyond a year be illegal, it follows that it is no prorogation, but a discontinuance, or dissolution, of such parliament, so prorogued, in the same manner as an illegal commission is no commission. For since parliaments sit by the king's writ, and since the force and power of those writs must have a legal continuance, to keep and preserve the parliament in being, (as appears in the case of adjournments) therefore when a prorogation ceases to be legal, the legal continuance of the parliament also ceases, and so there is a discontinuance, viz. a dissolution. I think that we may take it for granted, that if these laws of Edw. iii. which require the annual calling of parliaments, be still in force, then a prorogation exceeding the compass is a discontinuance, or dissolution. It remains, therefore, to see whether those

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech on that Occasion.] As soon as the commons were withdrawn, and a Bill offered to be read, the duke of Buckingham rose up and desired to be heard first; which request being complied with, he moved "That this house would consider, whether this Parliament be not dissolved, laws of Edw. iii. be still in force, and that they are so, appears, because they have not yet been repealed by any subsequent act of parliament.—We need not much insist upon the act 16 Cha. i. for triennial parliaments, because that act is repealed by Cha. ii. but we may affirm that that act of Cha. i. does no way repeal the laws of Edw. iii. but it rather puts the king upon a necessity of executing that trust in a reasonable time, which was incumbent upon him by the laws of Edw. iii. And this, perhaps was done (though in a way indecent to the crown) because former kings had not well executed their trust, in calling parliaments accordingly; and here, by the way, we may observe the different manner of the law, towards the king, and towards the subject, for when the law requires any thing to be done, by the subject, it commonly annexes a penalty for the not doing of it, but when the law requires the king to do any thing, (in respect to his majesty) it is without a penalty, and in the nature of a trust; but yet the law requires the performance of the thing enacted equally from them both.—The act then in force concerning this matter of calling parliaments is the 16th Cha. ii. which, in the first place, repeals that of Cha. i. and, by the way, gives us a very good precedent, showing how an act of parliament ought to be repealed. In the next place it recites, and (we may say) confirms the laws of E. iii. in these words. 'And, because, by the ancient laws and statutes of this realm, made in the reign of K. Edw. iii. parliaments are to be held very often, &c.' Here we are to observe that by the present tense 'are' these laws of Edw. iii. are affirmed still to be laws, for had the parliament intended or understood those laws to be repealed, they would certainly have said 'were,' and not 'are to be held' &c. This seems to be a judgment in the case, and a judgment of the highest nature; for who can presume to say those are no laws, which the parliament calls 'the ancient laws and statutes of this realm?'—This alone is evident against all that can be said to prove that the Edward's laws, by a long disuse, were obsolete, and antiquated; but, for farther satisfaction, it is answered, that a law, or trust imposed by a law, is not therefore abrogated, because it is not broken, or not executed. How often has Magna Charta been broken since it was made, yet that does not at all invalidate the force of it, no more than the not affixing a penalty to a law does make the law less binding; since no penalty, nor constraint neither, is affixed to Magna Charta; besides, it may be said, that no prescription lies against the whole kingdom, any more than against the king, and because the Prorogation of this parliament for 15 Months is contrary to the statutes of 4 Ed. iii. and 36 Ed. iii." After which the duke of Buckingham made the following extraordinary Speech :

" My lords; I have often troubled your lordships with my discourse in this house; but I confess I never did it with more trouble to myself, than I do at this time, for I scarce know where I should begin, or what I have to say to your lordships: on the one side, I am afraid of being thought an unquiet and pragmatical that in the general maxims, ' Nullum tempus occurrit regi nec ecclesie,' and under the word ' regi, respublica' is also included. Since in a government, especially monarchical, and essentially free, the head is never to be taken without the body, nor the body without the head; because that either, separately taken, would be a monster. So that prescription only lies against particular persons, or communities. And, lastly, against the plea of prescription it is answered, that although these laws of E. iii. have not been duly executed to save a prescription against them, yet parliaments have ever since been sitting much within the compass of 60 years, and every sitting of parliament is an executing in part that trust which the law of E. iii. imposed upon the king. Else, in the case of a yearly rent, demanded upon an ancient deed produced in court, if it be proved, that the rent has been often paid within memory, though not duly and yearly, the rent will be still due in law, and no prescription will lie against it.—It may be objected, that, according to the maxims, ' Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant,' the last part of this act of Cha. ii. wherein it is enacted, ' that parliaments shall be held at least every three years,' is contrary to those of E. iii. which say ' that parliaments shall be called yearly,' and therefore repeals them. Now to this the answer is plain; that there is no contrariety in all those laws, because all of them, at once, may be executed. For if the king shall call parliaments yearly, the act of Cha. ii. is no less exempted than the acts of E. iii. Besides, this last part of the act of Cha. ii. is not exemptable, nor does it take effect till after the expiration of this present parliament, which clearly appears in the very letter of the act, wherein the word ' hereafter,' in the enacting part of that law, has a reference to the subsequent words, ' within three years from and after the determination of this present parliament.'—We shall close this discourse with these three short observations. 1. That no parliament, that is not antecedently so, can make itself a parliament by vote, for every thing must be before it can act, and nothing can be the cause of itself. 2. That nothing can be more prejudicial to the king and kingdom than to have a convention under the name of a parliament. 3. That a matter of such high importance ought not to be left dubious when it may be made certain." • man; for, in this age, every man that cannot bear every thing, is called unquiet; and he that does ask questions, for which we ought to be concerned, is looked upon as pragmatical. On the other side, I am more afraid of being thought a dishonest man; and of all men, I am most afraid of being thought so by myself; for every one is the best judge of the integrity of his own intentions; and though it does not always follow, that he is pragmatical whom others take to be so, yet this never fails to be Reasons to prove the last Prorogation of the Parliament to be illegal.

" It is a fundamental and unquestionable maxim in the law of England, that the kings of England are so bound by all statutes made for the public good, that every command, order, or direction of them, contrary to the substance, scope, or intent of any such statute, is void and null in law.—But the last prorogation of parliament is an order, or direction, of the king's, contrary to two statutes, the one in the 4th, the other in the 36th of Ed. iii. made for the greatest and chiefest common good; namely, the maintenance of our laws, and the redress of mischiefs and grievances which daily happen; for they both do positively appoint the meeting of parliament once within a year, and the king, by this last prorogation of parliament, has, contrary to both these statutes, ordered the parliament not to meet within a year, but some months after.—Wherefore this last prorogation of parliament is void and null in law, and, consequently the parliament is at an end, because the parliament cannot meet by virtue of a prorogation, which is void and null in law, and because that by the essential forms of parliamentary proceedings, the parliament having been dismissed without any legal prorogation, or adjournment, there is an impossibility of its meeting at any other time.—This ought to be seriously considered of by every Englishman, and whether, if any of the members of the parliament, begun the 8th Day of May, 1661, should act by virtue of this Order of the king's, or prorogation, they do not admit and justify that particular Order of the king, though contrary to an act of parliament, of what importance soever, is yet, notwithstanding, good in law, and thereby allow of what would at once subvert the whole ancient government of England by law. For if a particular Order of the king's, upon this present occasion, about the assembly of a parliament, contrary to the intent of two laws, enacted for the maintenance of all the statutes of this realm, can be in force against those two laws; then a particular Order of the King's, upon some other occasion, about the raising of moneys, contrary to the intent of the act de tallagio non concedendo, and another against the taking away of any man's liberty, estate, or life, contrary to the intent of Magna Charta, must also be in force against those two other laws."

true, that he is most certainly a knave who takes himself to be so. Nobody is answerable for more understanding than God Almighty has given him; and therefore, though I should be in the wrong, if I tell your lordships truly and plainly what I am really convinced of, I shall behave myself like an honest man: for it is my duty, as long as I have the honour to sit in this house, to hide nothing from your lordships, which I think may concern his majesty's service, your lordships interest, or the good and quiet of the people of England.—The question, in my opinion, which now lies before your lordships, is not what we are to do, but whether at this time we can do any thing as a parliament; it being very clear to me that the parliament is dissolved: and if, in this opinion, I have the misfortune to be mistaken, I have another misfortune joined to it; for I desire to maintain the argument with all the judges and lawyers in England, and leave it afterwards to your lordships to decide whether I am in the right or no. This, my lords, I speak not out of arrogance, but in my own justification, because if I were not thoroughly convinced that what I have now to urge, is grounded upon the fundamental laws of England, and that the not pressing it at this time might prove to be of a most dangerous consequence, both to his maj. and the whole nation, I should have been loth to start a notion, which perhaps may not be very agreeable to some people. And yet, my lords, when I consider where I am, whom I now speak to, and what was spoken in this place about the time of the Prorogation, I can hardly believe what I have to say will be distasteful to your lordships.—I remember very well, how your lordships were then displeas'd with the house of commons; and I remember too as well, what reasons they gave to you to be so. It is not so long since, but that I suppose your lordships may call to mind, that, after several odd passages between us, your lordships were so incens'd, that a motion was made here for an Address to his majesty, about the Dissolution of this Parliament (p. 802.); and though it fail'd of being carried in the affirmative by two or three voices, yet this in the debate was remarkable, that it prevail'd with much the major part of your lordships that were here present; and was only overpowered by the Proxies of those lords who never heard the arguments. What change there has been since, either in their behaviour, or in the state of our affairs, that should make your lordships change your opinion, I have not yet heard. And therefore if I can make it appear (as I presume I shall) that by law the parliament is dissolved, I presume your lordships ought not to be offend'd at me for it.—I have often wonder'd, how it should come to pass that this house of commons, in which there are so many honest, and so many worthy gentlemen, should yet be less respectful to your lordships, as certainly they have been, than any house of commons that were ever chosen in England; and yet if the matter be a little enquir'd into, the reason of it will plainly appear. For, my lords, the very nature of the house of commons is chang'd; they do not think now that they are an assembly that are to return to their own homes and become private men again (as by the laws of the land, and the antient constitution of parliaments they ought to be) but they look upon themselves as a standing senate, and as a number of men pick'd out to be legislators for the rest of their lives. And if that be the case, my lords, they have reason to believe themselves our equals. But, my lords, it is a dangerous thing to try new experiments in a government: men do not foresee the ill consequences that must happen, when they go about to alter those essential parts of it upon which the whole frame depends, as now in our case, the customs and constitutions of parliament: for all governments are artificial things, and every part of them has a dependence one upon another. And with them, as with clocks and watches, if you should put great wheels in the place of little ones, and little ones in the place of great ones, all the movements would stand still: so that we cannot alter any one part of a government without prejudicing the motions of the whole.—If this, my lords, were well considered, people would be more cautious how they went out of the old, honest, English way and method of proceeding. But it is not my business to find fault, and therefore, if your lordships will give me leave, I shall go on to shew you why, in my opinion, we are at this time no parliament. The ground of this opinion of mine is taken from the antient and unquestionable statutes of this realm; and give me leave to tell your lordships, by the way, that statutes are not like women, for they are not one jot the worse for being old. The first statute that I shall take notice of, is that in the 4th of Ed. v. iii. c. 14. thus set down in the printed book: item, 'It is accorded that a Parliament shall be holden every year once, and more often, if need be.' Now, though these words are as plain as a pike staff, and no man living, that is not a scholar, could possibly mistake the meaning of them, yet the grammarians of those days did make a shift to explain, that the words, 'if need be' did relate as well to the words 'every year once,' as to the words 'more often'; and so by this grammatical whimsey of theirs have made this statute to signify just nothing at all. For this reason, my lords, in the 30th of the same king's reign, a new act of parliament was made, in which those unfortunate words, 'if need be,' are left out, and that act of parliament relating to Magna Charta, and other statutes, made for the public good. Item, 'For maintenance of these Articles and Statutes, and the Redress of divers Mischiefs and Grievances, which daily happen, a Parliament shall be holden every year,' as at other time was ordained by another statute. Here now, my lords, there is not left the least colour or shadow for mistake, for it is plainly declared, that the kings of England must call a parliament once within a year; and the reasons why they are bound to do so, are as plainly set down, namely, 'for the maintenance of Magna Charta, and other statutes of the same importance, and for preventing the mischiefs and grievances which daily happen.'—The question then remaineth, Whether these statutes have been since repealed by any other statutes or no? The only statutes I ever heard mentioned for that, are the two Triennial Bills, the one made in the last king's, and the other in this king's reign. The Triennial bill, in the last king's reign, was made for the confirmation of the two above-mentioned statutes of Edw. iii. for parliaments having been omitted to be called every year according to those statutes, a statute was made in the last king's reign to this purpose, 'That if the king should fail of calling a parliament, according to the statutes of Edw. iii.' then the third year the people should meet of themselves, without any writs at all, and chuse their parliament-men. This way of the people's chusing their parliament of themselves, being thought disrespectful to the king, a statute was made in this last parliament, which repealed the Triennial bill; and after the repealing Clause (which took notice only of the Triennial bill made in the last king's reign) there was in this statute a paragraph to this purpose: 'That because, by the antient statutes of the realm, made in the reign of Edw. iii. parliaments are to be held very often, it should be enacted, that within 3 years after the determination of that present parliament, parliaments should not be discontinued above 3 years at most, and be holden oftener if need required.' There have been several half kind of arguments drawn out of these Triennial bills, against the statutes of Edw. iii. which I confess I could never remember, nor indeed those that urged them to me ever durst own: for they always laid their faults upon some body else, like ugly, foolish children, whom, because of their deformity and want of wit, the parents are ashamed of, and so turn them out on the parish.—But, my lords, let the arguments be what they will, I have this short Answer to all that can be wrested out of these Triennial bills, 'That the first Triennial bill was repealed, before the matter now disputed of was in question; and the last Triennial bill will not be in force till the question be decided, that is, till the parliament is dissolved.' The whole matter, my lords, is reduced to this short dilemma; either the kings of England are bound by the acts above-mentioned of Edw. iii. or else the whole government of England by parliaments, and by the laws above, is absolutely at an end: for if the kings of England have power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate an Act made for the maintenance of Magna Charta, they have also power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate Magna Charta itself; and if they have power, by an order of theirs, to invalidate the statute itself, de Tollagio non concedendo, then they may not only, without the help of a parliament, raise money when they please, but also take away any man's estate when they please, and deprive every one of his liberty, or life, as they please.—This, my lords, I think, is a power that no judge or lawyer will pretend the kings of England to have; and yet this power must be allowed them, or else we that are met here this day cannot act as a parliament: for we are now met by virtue of the last Prorogation, and that prorogation is an order of the king's, point-blank contrary to the two acts of Edw. iii. for the acts say, 'That a parliament shall be holden once within a year,' and the prorogation saith, 'A parliament shall not be held within a year, but some months after;' and this (I conceive) is a plain contradiction, and consequently that the prorogation is void. Now, if we cannot act as a parliament, by virtue of the last prorogation, I beseech your lordships, by virtue of what else can we act? shall we act by virtue of the king's proclamation? pray, my lords, how so? is a Proclamation of more force than a Prorogation? or if a thing that hath been ordered the first time be not valid, doth the ordering it the second time make it good in law? I have heard, indeed, 'That two negatives make an affirmative;' but I never heard before, 'that two nothings ever made any thing.'—Well, but how then are we met? is it by our own adjournment? I suppose no body has the confidence to say that: which way then is it? do we meet by accident? That, I think, may be granted, but an accidental meeting can no more make a parliament, than accidental clapping a crown upon a man's head can make a king. There is a great deal of ceremony required to give a matter of that moment a legal sanction. The laws have reposed so great a trust, and so great a power in the hands of a parliament, that every circumstance relating to the manner of their electing, meeting, and proceeding, is looked after with the nicest circumspection imaginable. For this reason the king's writs about the summons of parliament are to be issued out verbatim, according to the form prescribed by the law, or else that parliament is void and null. For the same reason, if a parliament summoned by the king's writ, do not meet the very same day that it is summoned to meet upon, that parliament is void and null. And, by the same reason, if parliaments be not legally adjourned, de die in diem, those parliaments must be also void and null.—Oh! but some say, There is nothing in the two acts of Edw. iii. to take away the king's power of prorogation, and therefore the prorogation is good. My lords, under favour, this is a very gross mistake; for, pray examine the words of the act: the act says, 'A parliament shall be holden once a year;' now to whom can these words be directed, but to them who are to call a parliament? And who are they but the kings of England? It is very true, this does not take away the king's power of prorogating parliaments, but it most certainly limits it to be within a year. Well, then; but it is said again, if that prorogation be null and void, then things are just as they were before, and therefore the parliament is still in being. My lords, I confess, there would be some weight in this, but for one thing, which is, that not one word of it is true: for if, when the king had prorogued us, we had taken no notice of the prorogation, there is an impossibility of our meeting and acting any other way. One may as properly say, that a man that is killed by assault is still alive, because he was killed unlawfully, as that the parliament is still alive, because the prorogation was unlawful. The next argument that those are reduced to, who would maintain this to be yet a parliament, is, that the parliament is prorogued sine die, and therefore the king may call them again by proclamation. In the first part of this proposition I shall not only agree with them, but also do them the favour to prove, that it is so in the eye of the law, which I never heard they have yet done; for the statutes say, 'That a parliament shall be holden once in a year;' and the prorogation having put them off till a day without the year, and consequently excepted against by the law, that day, in the eye of the law, is no day at all, that is, sine die; and the prorogation might as well have put them off till so many months after dooms-day; and then, I think, no body would have doubted, but that had been a very sufficient dissolution.—Besides, my lords, I shall desire your lordships to take notice, that, in former times, the usual way of dissolving parliaments was to dismiss them sine die; for the king, when he dissolved them, used to say no more, but that he desired them to go home, till he sent for them again, which is a dismissal sine die. Now if there were 40 ways of dissolving parliaments, if I can prove this parliament has been dissolved by any one of them, I suppose there is no great need of the other 39. Another thing, which they much insist upon, is, that they have found out a precedent in queen Elizabeth's time, when a parliament was once prorogued three days beyond a year: in which I cannot chuse but observe, that it is a very great confirmation of the value and esteem all people ever had of the forementioned acts of Edw. iii. since from that time to this, there can 'but one precedent be found for the proroguing a parliament above a year,' and that was but for 3 days neither. Besides, my lords, this precedent is not of a very odd kind of nature; for it was in time of a very great plague, when every body, of a sudden, was forced to run away one from another; and so being in haste, had not leisure to calculate well the time of the prorogation, though the appointing it to be within 3 days of the year is an argument to me, that their design was to keep within the bounds of the acts of parliament. And if the mistake had been taken notice of in queen Elizabeth's time, I make no question but she would have given a lawful remedy.—Now, I beseech your lordships, what more can be drawn from the shewing this precedent, but only that because once upon a time a thing was done illegally, therefore your lordships should do so again now; though my lords, under favour, ours is a very different case from theirs; for this precedent they mention was never taken notice of, and all lawyers will tell you, that a precedent that passes sub silentio, is of no validity at all, and will never be admitted in any judicial court where it is pleaded. Nay, judge Vaughan says, in his reports, 'That in cases which depend upon fundamental principles, for which demonstrations may be drawn, millions of precedents 'are to no purpose.' Oh! but, say they, you must think prudentially of the inconveniencies which will follow upon it: for if this be allowed, all those acts which were made in that session of parliament will be then void. Whether that be so or no, I shall not now examine; but this I will pretend to say, that no man ought to pass for a prudential person, who only takes notice of the inconveniencies of one side. It is the part of a wise man to examine the inconveniencies of both sides, to weigh which are the greatest, and to be sure to avoid them: and, my lords, to that kind of examination I willingly submit this cause, for I presume it will be easy for your lordships to judge which of these two will be of the most dangerous consequence to the nation; either to allow that the statutes made in that particular session, in queen Eliz.'s time, are void, (which may easily be confirmed by a lawful parliament) or to lay it down for maxim, 'That the kings of England, by a particular Order of theirs, have power to break all the laws of England when they please.'—And, my lords, with all the duty we owe to his majesty, it is no disrespect to him to say, that his maj. is bound up by the laws of England; for the great king of Heaven and Earth, God Almighty himself, is bound by his own decrees: and what is an act of parliament, but a decree of the king, made in the most solemn manner it is possible for him to make it, that is, with the consent of the lords and commons? It is plain then, in my opinion, that we are no more a parliament; and I humbly conceive, your lordships ought to give God thanks for it, since it has thus pleased him, by his providence, to take you out of a condition wherein you must have been entirely useless to his majesty, to yourselves, and the whole nation: for, I do beseech your lordships, if nothing of this I have urged were true, what honourable excuse could we find for our acting again with the h. of commons? Except we could pretend such an exquisite art of forgetfulness, as to avoid calling to mind all that passed between us the last session; and unless we could have also a faculty of teaching the same art to the whole nation. What opinion could they have of us, if it should happen, that the very same men, who were so earnest the last session for having the house of commons dissolved, when there was no question of their lawful sitting, should be now willing to join with them again, when without question they are dissolved? Nothing can be more dangerous to a king or a people, than that the laws should be made by an assembly, of which there can be a doubt, whether they have a power to make laws or no; and it would be in us inexcusable, if we should overlook this danger, since there is for it so easy a remedy, which the law requires, and which all the nation longs for.—The calling a new parliament it is, that only can put his majesty into a possibility of receiving Supplies; that can secure your lordships the honour of sitting in this house like peers, and your being serviceable to your king and country; and that can restore to all the people of England, their undoubted rights of chusing men frequently to represent their grievances in parliament; without this, all we can do would be in vain; the nation may languish a while, but must perish at last: we should become a burthen to ourselves, and a prey to our neighbours.—My motion therefore to your lordships shall be, That we humbly address ourselves to his majesty, and beg of him, for his own sake, as well as for the people's sake, to give us speedily a New Parliament; that so we may unanimously, before it is too late, use our utmost endeavours for his majesty's service, and for the safety, the welfare, and the glory of the English Nation.*

The Answers to this extraordinary Speech* were, "That those Acts have not been so understood, nor hath the usage been to regulate the holding of parliaments upon that foot, ever since the laws were made; and it is a rule of law that ancient statutes are to be construed by the general usage. That the words, 'if need be,' go as well to the 'holding every year,' as to the 'more often;' and, repenting them accordingly, it runs thus: 'a parliament shall be holden every year, if need be, or more often, if need be;' and the king is judge of the need. That it is ridiculous to say the parliament is sine die, when a day stands appointed by the prorogation. And, if the king were by law obliged to hold a parliament every year, and doth it not, but seldomer; it may be construed a misgovernment, or grievance, to be redressed in the ordinary way, by petition, but not to vacate future parliaments, and their acts. And, farther (what is not argumentative, but express) the time of parliamentary vacation is altered by later laws; as the before-quoted Triennial Act Car. i. and 16 Car. ii. which repeals the other. It is thereby enacted, 'That, hereafter, the sitting and holding of parliaments shall not be intermitted, or deferred, above 3 years;' which amounts to an allowance of a vacation not exceeding 3 years. That parliament had then been continued above 4 years: and this question, if it should turn upon the reasoning on the other side, would avoid all the acts of parliament made after the year expired; which would make strange work with the laws of this and other parliaments.

The Duke's Speech supported by the Lords Shaftsbury, Salisbury, and Wharton.] The duke's Speech was thought so bold and shocking, by the lords in the ministry, that one of them moved that the duke might be called to the bar: but the earl of Shaftsbury, who was fully prepared, opposed this motion, as improper and extravagant; and did with great courage and sharpness of application, second and enforce the duke of Buckingham's argument; and the earl of Salisbury and the lord Wharton fell in briskly on the same side. While one of them was speaking, the duke took a pen and wrote the following Syllogism "It is a maxim in the law of England, that the kings of England are bound up by all the statutes made pro bono publico; that every order or direction of theirs, contrary to the scope and full intent of any such statute, is void and null in law: but the last prorogation of the parliament was an order of the king's, contrary to an act of king Edw. iii. made for the greatest common good, viz. the maintenance of all the statutes of England, and for the prevention of the mischiefs and grievances which daily happen: Ergo, the last Prorogation of parliament is void and null in law." after which he appealed to the Bishops, whether it was not a true Syllogism; and to the Judges, whether the propositions were not true in law.

The four Lords ordered to the Tower.] The debates arose to that height, that all the four lords were ordered to be sent to the Tower, for contempt of the authority and being of the present parliament, there to remain during the pleasure of his majesty and the house of peers. In the mean time the duke of Buckingham took the opportunity of slipping out of the house, while the lord Anglesey was arguing against the committing them. The house finding he had withdrawn himself, were in a rage, and designed to address the king for a Proclamation against him; but the duke foreseeing the event, would not give them so much trouble, and appearing the next day in his place, the court lords immediately cried out, 'To the Bar!' But his grace, who could readily turn any thing serious into jest, and extricate himself out of any difficulties, rose up, and said, 'He begged their lordships pardon for retiring the night before: that they very well knew the exact oeconomy he kept in his family, and perceiving their lordships intended he should be some time in another place, he only went home to set his house in order, and was now come to submit to their lordships pleasure,' which was to send him to the Tower, after the earls of Shaftsbury and Salisbury, and the lord Wharton*.

* "The duke desired he might have his servants to wait on him, and the first he named was his cook; which the king resented highly, as carrying in it an insinuation of the worst sort. The earl of Shaftsbury made the same demand. But lord Wharton did not ask for his cook. Three of the lords lay in the Tower for some months; but they were set at liberty on their petitioning the king. Lord Shaftsbury would not petition." Burnet.

The lords, further to shew their resentment, ordered one Dr. Cary to be brought to the bar of the house, and to be questioned, concerning a Book he had carried to the press, treating of the illegality of the Prorogation; and because he would not satisfy them in some interrogatories, they fined him 1,000*l.* for his contempt, and kept him close prisoner till the payment of the money.—Nor did they stop here, but made an order, “That the serjeant at arms attending that house should take into his custody Aaron Smith, and bring him to the bar of the house, there to answer for speaking certain dangerous and seditious words against the being of this present Parliament.” And Mr. Smith having upon this absconded, they immediately presented their humble desires to his majesty, “That he would by his royal proclamation strictly charge and command, that the utmost and most effectual endeavours should be used for apprehending the person of the said Aaron Smith, and bring him before the said house of peers (if the parliament should be sitting at the time of his apprehension) or in case the parliament should not be then sitting, before one of his majesty’s principal secretaries of state, to the intent that the said Aaron Smith might be secured, in order to his appearance before the house of peers, to answer for his said offence.” To which his majesty complied by a proclamation issued out two or three days after the parliament broke up. And it is believed, the more effectually to chastise him and other like offenders, that the parliament was this year continued by adjournments rather than by prorogation, as was most commonly practised.

Debate in the Commons on the long Prorogation.] Feb. 15. Mr. Sec. Williamson said, When the king’s Speech has been read, it has usually some place given it; and would have it considered the first thing after reading a Bill.

Sir Tho. Lee cares not how soon the king’s Speech is taken into consideration, but would not lose the method and order of parliament. You always begin with reading a Bill. The king’s Speech is usually about Supply, and that ought to be the last thing considered here. He takes this occasion to put in a claim to method. He is transported with the king’s Speech as much any man; but would keep method.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Nobody opposes the consideration of the king’s Speech, but because of custom of respect. As the king speaks to us, so we to him, without compliment. There are all things in the king’s Speech that can be spoken of in this house, Religion and Property, &c. Would look upon the genus before the species: supposes thanks to the king, with due consideration of his Speech, very proper.

Sir John Mallet. Mr. Speaker; since we were last in this place, there having been much discourse abroad, and some considerable doubts concerning our coming hither again, it is my duty (having always had as true loyalty and affection to his majesty’s service, as any within these walls, or nation, hath or cau have) humbly to offer my advice in this matter of so great weight and moment. That I conceive, before we enter upon any other business, it will be the best way for removing the doubts, which are, or may hereafter, arise, concerning this last prorogation; without letting so tender a matter remain under any doubt or question, and also that it will be the safest and speediest way for satisfying his majesty, with satisfaction to all his people, and that they may be assured of such good laws as shall be made (for his maj. is so gracious, as he accounts as great satisfaction to himself, to give us the good laws we desire of him, as to receive the Supply we shall give him) humbly to present our desires to his majesty, ‘that he will be pleased to dissolve this, and very quickly call another parliament.’ For I verily believe, whatsoever he would have in this, may more conveniently, in a very short time, be had, and done in another parliament. Sir, I could present you with several reasons for it, but I humbly crave leave to forbear mentioning them till you please to admit of this my humble motion.*

Sir Philip Monckton. No man is more rejoiced to see you here, than he is. It would be a great satisfaction to the nation to have the two Acts of Edw. iii. about annual Parliaments, cleared; and moves it.

Sir John Morton. Would do all things regularly. Would first read a bill, and then consider the king’s Speech.

Sir Tho. Meres. Though forms seem but little things, yet they are of great consequence. He will thank the king as much as any man. When a Bill is read, then we are fit for any motion.

Lord Cavendish. The motion is of no light nature, since we are told it is a doubt, all over the nation, whether the Prorogation be legal: thinks it not for our credit to pass it over without a question. Though the doubt may easily be removed, yet it is fit to be removed. We are told of two Acts of Edw. iii. and this Prorogation is contrary to them. Desires, that, since these acts are known, we may see how far these acts limit the king in his Prorogation. Moves for a question, Whether the two Acts mentioned be repealed, or not.

Mr. Sec. Coventry moves to order. If you admit that question, you may lay down your mace, you are no more a parliament. Who shall dissolve it? Who shall end it? We have nothing to do here.

Lord Cavendish desires to explain himself. Moves to order; to clear a doubt. There are books printed of an odd nature. Moves only to know, Whether those two Acts, mentioned, are in force against the king’s prerogative.

Serj. Maynard. The question determines what you cannot determine, viz. That you are an unlawful assembly. The question will be, Whether, as a parliament, you cannot dissolve yourselves. No question, Whether those laws are in force, or not, can be put; for you read the very question as a parliament.

Sir Hurbottle Grimstone, (Master of the Rolls.) If we appear here in either capacity, by the proclamation, or by the king's writ, it does not therefore follow, that because we appear, we are a parliament. [Being called upon to look towards the Chair, when he spoke, he said, 'He had almost forgot the Chair, it was so long since he saw it.'] If by freedom of debate we may obviate doubts, which have troubled worthy and learned men, why should we not? He denies Maynard's logic, 'That the king's proclamation will justify our assembly,' though we had no more to show for it on the table. This may be a question somewhere else, as well as here, and would remove moot points and doubts in succeeding parliaments.

Mr. Sacheverell doubts not but we are as much a parliament, as at our last prorogation, and believes that gentlemen, upon debate of it, will be as fully satisfied in the matter as he is. He looks upon this prorogation as illegal, but yet that it is a good parliament still, and that we properly stand upon an adjournment. Would look back to the time those statutes mentioned were made in, and you shall see then Prorogations and Adjournments were all one, and for hundreds of years they went on to the same business they left, without beginning again as we have done in adjournments in later times. There have been prorogations before the parliament had once met, and for some reasons, as the king being detained by business, that he could not in person open this parliament, or for want of a full appearance of members, put off to a longer day. In E. i. E. iii. E. iv. it runs thus. 'Sic Dom. Rex adjournavit et prorogavit,' &c. And he takes this to be an adjournment. Adjournment is the act of the two houses, prorogation of the king only; and so by adjournment, your business remains where it did.

Sir Rob. Howard. You are upon the most dangerous debate that may be, and from which no good consequence can arise. If we meet upon an adjournment now, then all privileges of members stand good, and you lay all people by the heels that have arrested any of your members. If you debate upon deducible arguments, you set the town at work, and enter the lists, at the coffee-houses. If you run once to countenance great things by deducible arguments, you shake laws and mighty things. Moves to lay aside this dangerous debate.

Mr. Sawyer. You ought to begin the session with reading a Bill, and you meet in no capacity but as a parliament, not as a Convention. Your vote will not mar nor mend the matter. There have been books written about this question. He hopes you will not give countenance to such libels, that say, 'we are traitors in meeting, and acting as a parliament.'

* "It is remarkable" says Mr. Marvell, "that shortly after, upon occasion of a discourse among the commons concerning Libels and Pamphlets, first one member of them stood up, and, in the face of their house, said, 'That it was affirmed to him, by a person that might be spoke with, that there were among them '30, 40, 50, God knows how many, outlawed.' Another thereupon rose, and told them, 'It was reported too, that there were divers of the members Papists: a third, 'That a multitude of them were bribed, and Pensioners.' And yet all this was patiently hushed up by their house, and digested, being, it seems, a thing of that nature which there was no reply to."

Under the head of BRIBERY, the same Author gives us the following dreadful particulars:

"It is too notorious to be concealed, that near a third part of the house have beneficial Offices under his majesty, in the privy council, the army, the navy, the law, the household, the revenue both in England and Ireland, or in attendance on his majesty's person. These are all of them indeed to be esteemed gentlemen of honour, but more or less according to the quality of their several employments under his majesty; and it is to be presumed that they brought along with them some honour of their own into his service at first, to set up with. Nor is it fit that such an assembly should be destitute of them to inform the commons of his majesty's affairs, and communicate his counsels, so that they do not by irregular procuring of elections in places where they have no proper interest, thrust out the gentlemen that have, and thereby disturb the several counties; nor that they crowd into the house in numbers beyond modesty, and which instead of giving a temper to their deliberations, may seem to affect the predominance.—Yet common discretion would teach them not to seek after, and ingross such different trusts in those bordering interests of the king and country, where from the people they have no legal advantage, but so much may be gained by betraying them. How improper would it seem for a privy counsellor, if in the house of commons he should not justify the most arbitrary proceedings of the Council Table, represent affairs of state with another face, defend any misgovernment, patronize the greatest offenders against the kingdom, even though they were too his own particular enemies, and extend the supposed prerogative on all occasions, to the detriment of the subject's certain and due liberties? What self-denial were it in the learned council at law, did they not vindicate the misdemeanours of the Judges, perplex all remedies against the corruptions and encroachment of Courts of Judicature, word all acts towards the advantage of their own profession, palliate unlawful elections, ex-

* Speaker of the parliament that restored the King. He died in 1684, aged 82.

The Speaker. The session is not begun till a bill be read; it is the ancient Order, and if so, your question is, Whether you will break that Order, or not.

Mr. Garraway thinks we may safely read the Bill, and yet the debate may be reserved. He tenuate and advocate public crimes, where the criminal may prove considerable, step into the Chair of a Money bill, and pen the Clauses so dubiously, that they may be interpretable in Westminster-hall beyond the house's intention, mislead the house, not only in point of law, but even in matter of fact, without any respect to veracity but all to his own further promotion? What Soldier in pay but might think himself fit to be cashiered, should he oppose the increase of Standing Forces, the depression of Civil Authority, or the levying of Money by whatsoever means, or in what quantity? Or who of them ought not to 'abhor that traitorous position, of taking Arms by the king's authority against those that are commissioned by him in pursuance of such commission?' What Officer of the Navy, but takes himself under obligation to magnify the expence, extol the management, conceal the neglect, increase the debts, and press the necessity of rigging and unrigging it to the house in the same moment, and representing it all at once in a good and a bad condition? Should any member of parliament and of the exchequer omit to transform the Accounts, conceal the Issues, heighten the Anticipations, and in despite of himself oblige whosoever chance to be the lord treasurer; might not his Reversioner (sir Robert Howard) justly expect to be put into present possession of the office? Who, that is either concerned in the Customs, or of their brethren of the Excise, can with any decency refuse, if they do not invent all further impositions upon merchandize, navigation, or our own domestic growth and consumption: and if the charge be but temporary, to perpetuate it? Hence it came, that, instead of relieving the crown by the good old and certain way of Subsidies, wherein nothing was to be got by the house of commons, they devised this foreign course of Revenue, to the great grievance and double charge of the people, that so many of the members might be gratified in the farms or commissions.—But to conclude this digression: Whatsoever other Offices have been set up for the use of the members, or have been extinguished upon occasion, should they have failed at a question, did not they deserve to be turned out? Were not all the Votes, as it were in fee farm, of those that were intrusted with the sale? Must not Surinam be a sufficient cause of quarrel with Holland, to any Commissioner of the Plantations? Or who would have denied money to continue the War with Holland, when he were a Commissioner of Prizes, of Sick and Wounded, or transporting the English, or of starving the Dutch prisoners? How much greater then would the hardship be for those of his majesty's household, or is one who believes this as good a parliament as when we first sat. Though yet he is not very fond of it neither.

Col. Birch does not see you can go on in safety under a prorogation. One gentleman, tells you, 'of books and pamphlets abroad on who attend upon his royal person, to forget by any chance vote, or in being absent from the house, that they are his domestic servants? Or that all those of the capacity abovementioned are to be looked upon as a distinct body under another discipline; and whatsoever sin they may commit in the house of commons against the national interest, they take themselves to be justified by their circumstances; their hearts indeed are, they say, with the country; and one of them (Hervey, vice chamberlain) had the boldness to tell his majesty, 'That he was come from voting in the house against his Conscience.'—And yet these gentlemen being full, and already in employment, are more good-natured and less dangerous to the public, than those that are hungry and out of office, who may by probable computation make another third part of this house of commons. Those are such as having observed by what steps, or rather leaps and strides, others of their house have ascended into the highest places of the kingdom, do, upon measuring their own birth, estates, parts, and merit, think themselves as well and better qualified in all respects as their former companions. They are generally men, who by speaking against the French, inveighing against the debauches of court, talking of the ill management of the Revenue, and such popular flourishes, have cheated the countries into electing them; and when they come up, if they can speak in the house, they make a faint attack or two upon some great minister of state, and perhaps relieve some other that is in danger of parliament, to make themselves either way considerable.—In matters of Money they seem at first difficult, but having been discoursed with in private, they are set right, and begin to understand it better themselves, and to convert their brethren; for they are all of them to be bought and sold; only their number makes them cheaper, and each of them doth so overvalue himself, that sometimes they outstand or let slip their own market.—It is not to be imagined, how small things in this case, even members of great estates, will stoop at; and most of them will do as much for hopes, as others for fruit; but if their patience be tired out, they grow at last mutinous and revolt to the country, till some better occasion offer. Among these are some men of the best understanding, were they of equal integrity, who affect to ingross all business, to be able to quash any good motion by parliamentary skill, unless themselves be the authors, and to be the leading men of the house, and for their natural lives to continue so. But these are men that have been once fooled, most of them, and discovered, and slighted at court; so that till some turn of state shall set them in their adversaries place, they look sullen, make big motions, and contrive specious Bills for the subject; yet only wait the opportunity to be the instruments of the same counsels, which they oppose in others.—There is a third part still remaining, but as contrary in themselves as light and darkness; those are either the worst, or the best of men; the first are most profligate persons that have neither estates, consciences, nor good manners, yet are therefore picked out as the necessary men, and whose votes will go furthest: the Charges of their Elections are defrayed, whatever they amount to; tables are kept for them at Whitehall, and through Westminster, that they may be ready at hand, within call of a question: all of them are received into pension, and know their pay-day which they never fail of: insomuch that a great officer (the Lord Treasurer) was pleased to say, 'That they came about him like so many jack-daws for cheese, at the end of every session.' If they be not in parliament, they must be in prison; and as they are protected themselves, by privilege, so they sell their protections to others, to the obstruction so many years together of the law of the land, and the public justice; for these it is that the long and frequent Adjournments are calculated; but all, whether the Court or the monopolizers of the Country party, or those that profane the title of Old Cavaliers, do equally, though upon differing reasons, like death, apprehend a Dissolution. But notwithstanding these, there is an handful of salt, a sparkle of soul, that hath hitherto preserved this gross body from putrefaction; some gentlemen that are constant, inviolable, indeed Englishmen, such as are above hopes or fears, or dissimulation, that can neither flatter nor betray their king or country; but being consious of their own loyalty and integrity, proceed through good and bad report, to acquit themselves in their duty to God, their prince, and their nation; although so small a scantling in number, that men can scarce reckon of them more than a quorum; insomuch that it is less difficult to conceive how fire was first brought to light in the world, than how any good thing could ever be produced out of an house of commons so constituted; unless, as that is imagined to have come from the rushing of trees, or battering of rocks together, by accident, so these by their clashing with one another, have struck out an useful effect from so unlikely causes. But whatsoever casual good hath been wrought at any time by the assimilation of ambitious, factious, and disappointed members, to the little, but solid, and unbiassed, party, the more frequent ill effects and consequences of so unequal a law by sitting as in a prorogation,' and would be provided against this, not knowing what this may overturn hereafter.

Mr. Harwood. Discourse of people abroad is a great thing, and not to be slighted: we are not safe from the law taking hold upon us.

mixture, so long continued,' are demonstrable and apparent. For while scarce any man comes thither with respect to the public service, but in design to make and raise his fortune, it is not to be exprest the debauchery and lewdness, which upon occasion of Elections to parliament, are now grown habitual throughout the nation. So that the vice and the expence are risen to such a prodigious height, that few sober men can endure to stand to be chosen on such conditions. From whence also arise feuds and perpetual animosities, over most of the counties and corporations, while gentlemen of worth, spirit, and ancient estates and dependances, see themselves overpowered in their own neighbourhood, by the drunkenness and bribery of their competitors. But if, nevertheless, any worthy person chance to carry the election, some mercenary or corrupt sheriff makes a double return; and so the cause is handed to the Committee of Elections, who ask no better, but are ready to adopt his adversary into the house if he be not legitimate: and if the gentleman aggrieved seek his remedy against the sheriff, in Westminster-hall, and the proofs be so palpable that the King's Bench cannot invent how to do him injustice, yet the major part of the twelve judges, shall, upon better consideration, vacate the Sheriff's Fine, and reverse the judgment; but those of them that dare dissent from their brethren are in danger to be turned off the bench, without any cause assigned. While men therefore care not thus how they get into the h. of commons, neither can it be expected that they should make any conscience of what they do there; but they are only intent how to reimburse themselves (if their elections were at their own charge) or how to bargain their Votes for a Place or a Pension. They list themselves straightways into some Court-faction; and it is as well known among them, to what lord each of them retains, as when formerly they wore coats and badges. By this long haunting so together they are grown too so familiar among themselves, that all reverence of their own assembly is lost; that they live together, not like parliament-men, but like so many goodfellows, met together in a public house, to make merrry. And, which is yet worse, being so thoroughly acquainted, they understand their Number and Party; so that the use of so public a council is frustrated; there is no place for deliberation, no persuading by reason; but they can see one another's votes through both throats and cravats, before they hear them.—Where the cards are so well known, they are only fit for a cheat, and no fair gamester but would throw them under the table. Hereby it is, that their house hath lost all the ancient

No man has the impudence to break the king's prorogation, and yet he would not part with the people's liberty.

Sir Ch. Harbord. All parliaments are in being till dissolved by death of the king, or by word of his mouth. There have been several prorogations of 15 months.

Mr. Russel is no great reader of statutes, and therefore is no competent judge of those mentioned, but since it is a question, whether they be in force, or no, men must be satisfied. Therefore he moves for an Address to the king, That we may (to put all things out of doubt) be dissolved.

Sir Rd. Temple. Because the legality of our meeting is questioned by libels without doors, must we therefore make it a question within doors? Heretofore, at the opening a session, the Speaker chose some Bill to be read, that would probably take up least debate; and would punish those who have dispersed these libels.

Sir John Coventry would have the house, in the least of our actions, express our loyalty. He believes this to be a parliament, and as good as ever it was, but hopes we sit not by proclamation-law. He plainly sees we have sat so long that the people are weary of us; and seconds the motion for an Address to the king to dissolve us.

Mr. Williams is of opinion, that the parliament is in being, but whether by prorogation or adjournment, is the question. He is against reading that Bill, because it will stop the mouths of gentlemen in the debate, and by it we must admit ourselves to meet now under a prorogation, and, for the like reason, is for reading the other bill, and reserving the farther debate. He hears discourses abroad that we are dissolved by this long prorogation. We cannot constitute ourselves a parliament, if we be none; but by our solemn debates, with weight and authority; and, being conscious of their own guilt and weakness, dare not adventure, as heretofore, the impeaching of any man before the Lords, for the most heinous crimes of state, and the most public misdemeanors; upon which confidence it is that the conspirators have so long presumed, and gone unpunished. For although the conspirators have sometimes (that this house might appear still necessary to the people, and to make the money more glib) yielded, that even their own names should be named among them, and grievances be talked of, yet, at the same time, they have been so prevalent, as to hinder any effect; and, if the house has emancipated itself beyond instructions, then by chastizing them with Prorogations, frightening them with Dissolution, comforting them with long, frequent, and reasonable Adjournments; now by suspending or diminishing their Pensions, then again by increasing them; sometimes by a scorn, otherwhiles by a favour, there hath a way been found to reduce them again under discipline."

reason, we may, in some measure, satisfy the world. Therefore moves for the Bill to be read a 2nd time.

Sir George Reeves offers a bill 'for regulating Elections of Members of Parliament,' ordered to be brought in the last session.—Which was read accordingly, and ordered a 2nd reading.

Sir Tho. Meres. A Bill is now read, and, before it, the king's Speech was read; doubts not of hearts full of thanks for the king's gracious expressions in his Speech: no man doubts but the matters of it are of great weight, and we should have, at least, two or three days time to consider it; therefore moves for Tuesday to take it into consideration.

Mr. Neale thinks Tuesday a great while to defer the consideration of the king's Speech, considering you give him no thanks for it in the mean time. Moves for Monday, and no business to intervene, no, not privilege, till the safety of the nation be provided for.

Resolved, "That the king's Speech be taken into consideration on Tuesday."

Feb. 17. The debate was resumed, and the question being propounded, That the house do proceed to name their Grand Committee, it was carried 193 to 142.

Debate on Sir T. Strickland's Conviction of Popery.] Feb. 19. The house having been informed of sir Tho. Strickland's conviction of Recusancy, and been moved for a writ to be issued out to chuse a knight for Westmorland, in his stead, Ordered the record of his Conviction to be brought in by the clerk of the crown: and

The Speaker informed the house, That, by the record, it appears that he stood convicted of Recusancy, according to the form of the statute, but whether he be the same sir Tho. Strickland, member of the house, appears not.

Sir Win. Coventry has known this gentleman many years before he sat here. For common respect, especially for one who has sat so long amongst us, would give him some time, though not by way of summons. It may else possibly be an inconvenience to his fortune; but if he come not, in some reasonable time, to give an account of himself, would send out a new writ, to chuse another member in his stead; but would do it without summons to him.

Mr. Powle. We cannot be too careful, when we are about to expel a member, especially when we remember that a minor part has once expelled a major in the Long Parliament. This gentleman may be convicted, and possibly know nothing of it. As for summoning of him, and that attested here at the bar, there can be no inconvenience; for he may absent himself, and you may take it pro confesso; and go solemnly to summoning him, and, if he appear not, then send a new writ to elect a member in his stead.

Sir Tho. Meres. It is properly no 'summons,' but 'notice,' to give the thing a more easy word.

Mr. Whorwood is as tender as any man for this gentleman, but thinks such scruples strange. He is fortunate that he has escaped this enquiry so long, and sat here without expulsion: would therefore have a summons plainly sent to him, and if thereupon he comes not, he wishes him gone.

Sir John Birkenhead. Strickland has taken the oath of Allegiance and Supremacy here, at his first admission, and the former he will take, and the lords are not obliged to the other.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is strange that Birkenhead should proffer you any thing against law. Both oaths are to be taken here.

The Speaker was ordered to give Sir Tho. Strickland notice by letter accordingly.

∴ *Supply of 600,000*l.* voted.*] Feb. 21. Sir Rd. Temple reported from the Committee of the whole house; That it is the opinion of the committee, that a Supply be given to his majesty for the Building of Ships not exceeding 600,000*l.*; to which the house agreed.

Debate on the Bill to encourage the planting of Hemp and Flax.] March 1. A Bill to encourage the planting and sowing of Hemp and Flax was read the 2nd time.

Sir Tho. Mampesson. The bill is not practicable. Some lands cannot bear hemp.

Mr. Sacheverell would have the committee consider what countries the bill will be proper for. It is for ours, and would commit it.

Col. Birch. He brought the Bill in. In a body natural, if all the blood be brought up into the head, there will follow a dissolution. All the money is brought to London, and little left in the country but clipped and worn money. If it be so in fact, what will England come to in a short time? The country is almost depopulated for want of employment, and the people will follow employment. Employment is either from husbandry or trade. Want of people has forced the farmer to thrash himself. He cannot keep servants, corn is so cheap; and when it is got, there is nobody to eat it, and yet when we reap it, there is 18*d.* or 2*s.* a day for workmen, so few are there to be got. He is far from thinking this bill to be a present advantage to the nation this year: but where land is proper for it, in most towns some is sown. This is the end of this bill; if it pass, not one poor person will be in England that will not work. This half acre (enjoined in the Bill) is as much as most of the poor of a parish can dress. A poor woman that can get 3*d.* a day will work, but you have not work for them without such a bill, not for one in ten: 20*s.* worth of linen takes up more hands to make it, than ten pounds-worth of woollen. Though there is a statute to set the poor to work, it rather increases the poor, than tends to a diminution. They allow them money weekly. If wool should fail, this would set the poor to work. You pay 150,000*l.* per ann. for foreign linnens: possibly, you may clap some of the money to be raised upon it. Possibly, you may employ all the poor, and whether you will continue this expensive trade of linen, and be pestered with poor for a year or two's inconveniences on gentlemen's lands, till this be settled, leaves it to you.

Mr. Swynfin thinks it a great confidence in Birch to teach all gentlemen and farmers in England how to husband their land. If there be any profit in planting hemp and flax, there needs no law to compel men to it, but that of necessity, all ways else failing. Flax and hemp are no strangers here. The sowing of it goes out, because people make no profit of it. If it were for their advantage, men would turn all their lands to it. Birch tells you, 'he has sown none these 7 years, though he has land fit for it.' He believes he can make no profit of it. Is it imaginable this can take any effect? By experience, we find, flax is at so low a rate that they sow it no more, and persons will pay a penalty rather than do it, and so the act may be an universal penalty. It may possibly breed some surveyors, and make officers break their oaths. How can he swear to so many acres? Can this then help the poor, or the farmers, who, by this law, must groan under the penalties? This bill is, upon a supposition only, to put all husbandmen upon new experiments. Let us have no more trouble with this bill, to hinder us from greater affairs.

Sir George Downing believes that for French linen there goes alone 500,000*l.* per ann. besides other linen. He is for the bill, but utterly against the imposing the half acre in a 100 acres to be planted with hemp and flax under a penalty. He knows a hundred parishes that have not one acre fit for it. Would move for planting olives, oranges, or pomegranates, as practicable as this. Hemp and flax can only be planted on mellow ground. You may as well plant Canary wine, under as specious pretences, as hemp and flax. By this bill, we bring in a law to wipe away all covenants and jointures, &c. nay, to plough up old pasture, and meadows, and perhaps in 20 years no grass will come up again. Consider what this charitable pretence of relieving the poor has been. But so much tax upon your lands.

Sir Wm. Coventry desires that encouragement may be given to the planting hemp and flax. But the only material objection is, the compulsory parts of the bill. They are not usually well executed; men hearses go not along with it. He would have the committee think of an inducement and encouragement to do it, as well as compulsion.—The Bill was ordered to be committed.

Complaint against the Clerk.] Sir Tho. Lee finds no Order for the business of the day, for the house to go into a Grand Committee for Grievances; and, he believes, no Order will be entered for the future, but what shall be acceptable to the Clerk.

Mr. Garroway moves for a new Clerk, this clerk having several times abused us; and would have him removed.

Sir Wm. Hickman. The clerk has served you so very often, and at this time he puts gentlemen into committees whom he knows to be in Lancashire.

Mr. Sacheverell thinks, if you let this pass, you may as well burn all your Journals. He has been one of the Committee for inspecting the Journals, and has had a Report ready in his hand these 4 sessions. In the session of 1672, the sense of the house was declared so, and entered otherwise. He moves for a new clerk, and that the king may be desired it. The two first pages of that session may much call in question the privilege and right of this house.

Col. Birch is for a new clerk. He has heard complaints of him these 7 years, of these miscarriages. When Birkenhead says, 'Rolls and Records,' he tells you they are so of his knowledge, and not one print agrees with the Rolls in matter and form. He takes thus the law to be. If any printed Act agrees not with the Record, a person tried may appeal to the Record, whether the law be so or not. Judge then the danger of false entering things in our books.

The Order for the day not being entered into the Journal by the Clerk, the consideration of Grievances was adjourned to Saturday next; and a Committee was appointed to inspect the Journal of the year 1672, and to examine and report the matter of the entry.

Debate on Dr. Cary's Commitment by the Lords.] March 2. Lord Cavendish moved to consider of the manner of Dr. Cary's Commitment to the Tower by the lords, &c.* And produced a copy of the lords Order of commitment.

Sir Tho. Clarges moves that a Committee may be appointed to search the Lords Journal, to state the matter of fact; the king having particularly recommended it to the lords care, not to occasion any difference between them and the commons.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Dr. Cary is committed for bringing a libel to the press, which maintains 'that you sit wrongfully and have no right to sit as a parliament.' Whether this be not cognizable by the lords, as well as you, is the question. He has refused to give any satisfaction to the lords from whom he had the libel, and so they have committed him for libelling them, as you would have had cognizance, if he had violated or struck any lord or member.

Sir Tho. Lee fears that the lords will en-

* "One Dr. Cary was brought to the bar of the house of lords, and questioned concerning a MS. treating of the illegality of the Prorogation, which he had carried to the press; and because he declined answering such questions as were put to him, and took sanctuary in the laws, which oblige no man to accuse himself, they fined him 1000*l.* and sent him close prisoner to the Tower till it was paid. That the lords, who had made so free with their own privileges, by submitting the liberty of four of their body at once to the pleasure of his majesty, should make thus free with both the liberty and property of a commoner, is perhaps scarce to be wondered at." Ralph.

croach precedents upon you; possibly the thing moved for is too early. But crimes against the government are not to be immediately punished in parliament for the law is open.

Mr. Sacheverell. For the seasonableness of the motion he will not speak, but the thing being come before you, the matter is, how to get off from it. §1 and 22 R. ii. a statute was made to rule that power, just as the lords do now exercise it, to prevent taking off commoners heads at their pleasure. This was the ground of all your first difference with the lords; they taking a cause originally before them. If the power of the lords be to examine a commoner against himself, and to condemn him for not answering, he knows not what condition we all are in. He would therefore have the matter looked into, and if it appear to be as it is represented, would proceed in it; and moves for some persons to be appointed to search the lords Journal.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If this house, and the lords house, can find no way to punish such seditious libellers, you may be pulled out of your Chair; and as they brought the late king to the block, at this rate they may do this also. And moves to proceed no farther in this thing, and the lords punishment of Dr. Cary is just.

Mr. Williams. He hears this thing of the lords commitment of Cary justified from the bar, before we know what it is. Moves to have Erny's paper read.

Sir Wm. Coventry was ever before for a moderate course with the lords. We are told how terrible the meddling with this matter might be, but he knows not the terror of it in the enquiry. Would have you proceed to the business of the day, and inform yourselves better in this matter.

Mr. Powls has seen a copy of this Order from the lords, for the commitment of Dr. Cary. It seems a matter of that weight, that, at least, as it is put, it deserves mature consideration. If this be so, no commoner of England but is at the lords mercy. This came not criminally yet before the lords; but they take it originally. Whether Dr. Cary be criminal is not the question; but the manner of his condemnation. What a man says against the government in particular is not cognizable in the lords house, any more than in another place. This is a crime no more particularly affixed to the lords than to this house. The lords examine him, and require him to accuse himself, or somebody else. By this means, any thing in the king's behalf may be proceeded upon in the lords house. In this he would show that we are only upon the defensive part, and that we seek no occasion of difference with the lords. It is our desire that the precedent of §1 R. ii. may be prevented. This is so tender a point, that he would not let it go without a day to consider it farther; and would not have the world think the house so cold in so great a matter.

Mr. Sawyer. Shall any member here undertake to know what the lords do? You have only the bare information of this matter before you of one member of this house, and no more. He is much afraid to give countenance to things of this nature. One book now abroad concerns us. It calls us 'traitors and rebels for meeting as a parliament,' and either house may enquire into such incendiaries. You passed the same sentence upon Mr. Howard, the last session; he would not say he did or did not write the letter, and you took it, pro confesso, and committed him to the Tower.*

Lord Cavendish. If this be a crime against the government, as is alledged, he would know whether the lords can judge it without a jury.

Mr. Sawyer. Invading our privileges, is invading the government, and such matters may be tried in either house, and this matter more especially in the lords house. Other courts may be timorous. In point of law you punish no man but as he offends against the government.

Sir Wm. Coventry will not contend matter of law with Sawyer, but would enter his claim, that we do not take ourselves to be part of the government, for then the government is no monarchy. We are only a part of the legislature; and would enter his claim against any such doctrine to be delivered here.

Mr. Sawyer. Explains himself. He acknowledges judgment and legislature, &c.

Sir Wm. Coventry takes the government to be as much, and more the ministerial part, as the legislature.

The Speaker. No cognizance can be taken of the lords proceedings unless they come regularly before you. It is the first instance of this kind. You judge them in their judicature of what is not before you. You may do it to any part of their judicature, as well as this. You may else raise what you cannot lay. But he is always for the privilege of this house.

Sir Tho. Lee remembers one man (Fitton) punished by the lords for making application to this house. It is a proper and regular way, and this matter may be brought before you by information of a member, as well as by petition from the party grieved. The question is not about the crime, but whether Dr. Cary be regularly brought to punishment. Here a man is committed without impeachment; you are the jury, and all men ought to be tried per pares. He thinks this properly represented to you, and would farther consider of it.

Sir H. Goodrick. In this matter we are under so great a restraint, that he knows not how we shall deliver ourselves. The eyes and prayers of the country are that we may have no difference with the lords. But when he considers the cries of the people, and the king's advice to us, in his Speech, not to entertain differences with the lords, and that it is not a time of day to do it, they that press this, he declares, are no friends to the good of the nation: explains what he has said, and will make it good. But submits it to the judgment of the house, and farther, whoever proceeds so is no friend to the nation. He has thought of it, and hopes to make it good.

Lord Cavendish. Is sorry to hear so great a reflection from Goodrick upon all gentlemen concerned in this debate, and upon himself who brought the debate in. No gentlemen that debated this but are as good 'friends to the nation,' and would not proceed, as little as Goodrick, to a difference with the lords; and must say, That from Goodrick was an indiscreet expression. He was taken down to Order.

Col. Birch. By order of the house, the words whereby lord Cavendish was offended must be written down, and asserted. Thinks that Goodrick said, 'they that press this business are no friends to the nation.'

Sir Philip Harcourt. The business is of a great nature, and he would have you, Mr. Speaker, declare, by order, whether the words are not to be asserted, and written down, before any explanation be admitted of them.

Mr. Garroway. Goodrick owned his words, and brought them to his own explanation. Your order is, 'those words that gave exception ought to be written down,' and you debate whether those words were said, or not. He believes Goodrick will so explain himself as to give you satisfaction.

Serj. Maynard apprehends the words were very bad, but let them be what they will, if you go to censure the person for the words, they must be written down. It was his own case twice, long ago, but he had liberty first to explain himself: for a man may sometimes outgo himself, and it may be every man's case.

Sir H. Goodrick. He is ready to give satisfaction to the house, and every particular member. He intended no reflection upon any gentleman. His words were: 'He that promoted this difference betwixt the lords and us was an enemy to the nation.' That was his intention, whatever were his words.

Sir Tho. Meres doubts that the words were otherwise, but would have them accepted as the gentlemen says he intended them. He would have us all bear with one another. We have always borne with the interpretation of the man that spoke the words, and without doubt, 'he is no friend to the nation, that promotes differences between the lords, and us.' But to go on, he believes that lord Cavendish brings the Order for Dr. Cary's commitment, by the lords, regularly before you; it is by the very same method as you went in sir John Fagg's case. You were informed of it by a member then, and no otherwise, and the farther consideration thereof was adjourned till Monday. To-morrow is the day appointed to consider of grievances; and this is the greatest. No man here, he believes, values Dr. Cary in prison, neither the man nor the punishment; but the manner of laying the punishment is what we have reason to except against. This is not the privilege of a particular lord.

Lord Cavendish called Meres to Order, viz. That Goodrick meant particularly what he said to reflect upon himself, and not generally speaking.

Sir Wm. Coventry. What he heard Goodrick speak was, 'That they are no friends to the nation that promote a difference between the lords and us.' We have great reason, in these cases, to give grains of allowance to one another. In ancient times but a few persons spoke in the house, and their speeches were readily penned. The powder and shot was ready made up in cartridges; ready cut and dried, and a man had then time to think; but now we speak on a sudden, and therefore would have some grains of allowance given.

Lord *Burleigh thinks that Goodrick's words particularly reflected upon lord Cavendish,† and would have them set down.

Sir Henry Goodrick. He should speak much against both his obligations and judgment, if he intended lord Cavendish, in what he said, or any other gentleman, in particular.

Sir Tho. Meres is glad that an end is made of this matter, as to lord Cavendish, who, he thinks, has satisfaction from Goodrick. But he would consider the manner of this judgment (upon Dr. Cary) of the lords, on a commoner. We ought to have as great and as good a privilege as the lords, but would not go on this, without being extremely clear, and perhaps we may find out more privilege than we know of already. Will press no question, but that the matter stands fair for another consideration.

Serj. Maynard. If there be public breaches on the liberty of the people, it is not strange to enquire into them. He fears this commitment of Dr. Cary has raised more dust than can be laid. He must come into a court where he may be indicted, and no man must be accused but by writ 'from some of the king's courts.' It will be one question, Whether Dr. Cary has offended before the parliament sat, or since; in or out of parliament? if a man be brought here for words spoken against this house, will not you commit him? if a man contemns any court, that court may fine any man. If the matter will hold you may go on, else it is a very ill thing to contend in this matter. If he be committed for contempt of an order, see what it is; and then consider whether you will go through or not.

Mr. Garraway. If Dr. Cary be committed for contempt indefinite, and we desire to know the cause from the lords, and they tell you it is for a breach of their privilege, then there is an end of it. The king, in what he said of avoiding controversy with the lords, never intended thereby to cut you off from your just privileges. No man will think so irreverently of the king. And you, Mr. Speaker, may go out of the chair without any question, in this matter, and he will move it again when we are better informed.*

Debate on a Bill to repeal the Statute of Wages to Members of Parliament.] March 3. Sir Harbottle Grimstone, (Master of the Rolls) moved, that he might have leave to bring in a Bill for the Indemnifying the Counties, Cities and Boroughs from paying any Wages now due to Members that serve in Parliament, and desired it might be in particular for Colchester, the place he serves for. For a writ had gone down from sir John Shaw, (his fellow burgesses) to receive his wages for service done in parliament.†

Mr. Williams. The statute of limitations will cut off all the Wages, but of the last six years. He is against removing old land marks, what is an evidence betwixt man and man, electors and elected, he would not remove. He is not for imposing any thing upon corporations; he will trust his own corporation, but not every little borough. The Wages will not be due for a whole year, but for the days only that we sit here. He would trust the generosity of the members, in this of their Wages, and not have a bill for it. He has already released his wages.

Mr. Powle. The statute of limitations cuts not off a debt, but from six years after it is due; and this is not due till the parliament is ended, and therefore not cut off by that statute. Williams says, 'That wages are not due but for the days you sit here.' But for those that come from Cumberland, and such remote places, they have had sometimes 14 days allowed them, and to all the members, morando, redeundo, eundo. And if wages be demanded accordingly, it will ruin many poor boroughs. We are now estimated to have sat in this parliament 3000 days, which will be 600*l.* and the question is, whether Wages are not due in prorogations, as well as adjournments. For the ill use that may be made of this, when this parliament is at an end, he would have wages cut off. For debts, when they are grown old, are very heavy when paid, and consider how we load them now by this tax we have granted. But he would have this discharge of Wages for no more than what is already incurred, and not forward.

Mr. Sawyer. You have been offered the statute of limitations. That of Wages is not an action, but in the nature of a judicial writ, unto which the statute of limitation is not to be pleaded, being matter of record. Some wages have been already paid, and some persons are but lately come in. But he looks upon it for

* There is no mention of this debate in the Journal.

† Andrew Marvell, who was member for Kingston upon Hull, is said to have been the last who received these wages.

* Son of the earl of Exeter, to which title he succeeded, on his father's death, in 1687. He died in France in 1700; the honour of the house, that, where wages have not been received, we may imitate the statute of limitations; excepting the two last years.

Mr. Boscawen knows not why Sawyer, that has been here but two years, should give away his wages that has been here 16 years. It is generally promised at elections, in boroughs, to serve freely, and why an act should not be to confirm those promises, he knows not. He thinks it worthy your consideration to put the boroughs out of fear. For hereafter they will chuse their own burgesses, blue aprons, and gentlemen no more.

Mr. Finch is not for this bill, though thus magnified to you. All Wages are limited to eundo, morando, redeundo, and expressly limited by the writ to levy it. By 6 H. viii. 'No person that departs from parliament without leave of the Speaker and house, entered first into the Journal, shall have his Wages.' And Prynne's Register of Writs goes so far as to prove attendance here every day—but by this bill you take away from every gentleman an opportunity of obliging his corporation.

Sir Wm. Thompson intimated, that the city of London paid Wages formerly. He has received no wages, though the city is able to pay them.

Mr. Loss. He never received any Wages from the city, nor demanded any, because he thinks he never deserved any at their hands.—A Bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly.

Sir Tho. Strickland expelled.] March 6. Sir Tho. Strickland sent a Letter to the Speaker, in answer to the notice which the Speaker had sent him by Order of the house, (p. 835) by way of excuse for his non-attendance in parliament, &c.

Resolved, "That whereas it doth appear to this house, that sir Tho. Strickland, a member of this house, is convicted upon record of Popish Recusancy, that he be from henceforth disabled from being any longer a member of this house." And a new writ was ordered for Westmoreland.

Debate on the Bill to repeal the Statute of Wages to Members of Parliament, resumed.] March 13. The Bill for releasing the Counties, &c. from all Wages due to Members, &c. was read the first time.

Mr. Powle. Now there is so great an arrear run into by boroughs to their burgesses, that the payment will be inconvenient to many, and will ruin some; and may have such an influence that if the borough will not make such a man an officer, or chuse such a man member, &c. they will see them for Wages, and so they may be subjected to particular persons.

Sir John Birkenhead. It is dishonourable in the house to do this, when no petition is sent from any borough to desire it, representing it as prejudicial to them. Let them that desire it have that self-denying ordinance; boroughs complaining not of it. The best remedy for the fears of the boroughs is, for every man to forgive the Wages they owe him. The loss of wages is the only punishment the law has made for the absence of parliament-men from their attendance. He fears there is a worse end in it, that men should be posted who are against the bill. We may, by the next post, oblige our boroughs, by a letter, to release wages, without this bill, and, he supposes that unless we demand wages by a writ, after the session is over, we cannot have it.

Sir Tho. Meres. There is a jealousy that you will take wages, if you throw the bill out, and it will be very ill taken by those you represent.

Mr. Crouch. He never received wages for the place he serves for, and never will: but the bill is not fit to pass. Will you take away any man's land? Why will you take away his wages?

Sir Philip Warwick moves that as many gentlemen as will may release their wages.

Sir Rd. Temple. It is a reflection on the house, to discharge the wages by law; but he would have it a free-will offering.

Mr. Sayres. If you think of casting this bill out, then he would have a bill brought in to make a law that Wages shall be taken. He is sure, now the thing is here in question, it will put such an awe upon corporations, for fear of having wages called for, who never thought of it before, that he thinks it a point of honesty in the house to declare they will not call for wages from the corporations, who else would be so universally deceived in so much expectation they should not pay wages. If we should now lay aside this bill, it would be scarce honourable, or honest. These 80 or 100 years wages have been scarce received, and now, that, for 14 years and upwards, members have not called for any, this is an intimation between man and man that they will never call for it. As if no rent has been paid for 80 years, and now we will fall on with all that weight. It is an implied promise, that they will not be called for, and that they are forgiven; and the throwing out the bill will revive a jealousy that they will be demanded. That which obliges corporations, in this, must oblige as the king's act, by act of grace, by taking away the punishment of penal laws. You would take it as a danger, if asked and denied.

Sir Tho. Lee knows not how long the parliament will last, and he knows not how his executors will deal with the borough he serves for, when he is dead; and therefore he is for the bill.

Mr. Waller. By this bill, we ask the lords leave to be bountiful to the people; by making it a law, we do it. We have ordered money for the servants here that attend us: he had rather forty times give it to the boroughs; than ask the lords leave. Some in the house are so poor, and some of the boroughs, so rich, that to force men not to take Wages would not be equal justice.

Address to the King on the Growth of the power of France.] March 15. Both houses presented the following Address to his majesty:

"May it please your majesty; we your majesty most loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the knights, citizens, and burghes, in parliament assembled, find ourselves obliged, in duty and faithfulness to your majesty, and in discharge of the trust reposed in us by those whom we represent, most humbly to offer to your majesty's serious consideration, That the winds of your majesty's people are much disquieted, with the manifest danger arising to your majesty's kingdoms by the Growth and Power of the French king, especially by the acquisitions already made, and the further progress likely to be made by him, in the Spanish Netherlands; in the preservation and security whereof, we humbly conceive, the interest of your maj. and the safety of your people are highly concerned. And therefore we most humbly beseech your maj. to take the same into your royal care and to strengthen yourself with such stricter alliances as may secure your majesty's kingdoms, and preserve and secure the said Netherlands, and thereby quiet the minds of your majesty's people."

The King's Answer.] To the above Address the king gave the following Answer: "That he is of the same opinion with his two houses of parliament, that the conservation of Flanders is of great importance to England; and that therefore he assured them, that he will take all the care for the preservation of Flanders that can possibly consist with the peace and safety of the kingdom."

Debate on Mr. Harrington's Commitment by the Council.] March 16. Mr. Sacheverell presented a Petition, subscribed 'John Harrington's'. The warrant of Commitment on

* "One Mr. Harrington, the son of a Cavalier who had suffered much in the royal cause, while the house was sitting, happened to meet with two Scotchmen, returned from abroad, who complained, that they had been pressed out of Scotland into the French king's service; and that there were several hundreds of their countrymen, as well as themselves, who had been fossed from their houses, wives and families, bound together; and so, like galley-slaves, secured in the public gaols; their friends and relations not being suffered to come near them; and from thence put on shipboard, and transported into the service of France, contrary to the Addresses of parliament, his majesty's Answers therunto, proclamation thereupon, and, what is of more authority than all, the privilege of nature itself; that exempts every man alike, from being forced into a danger, in which he has no concern.—Mr. Harrington was touched with their case, and thinking himself happy in an opportunity that bid fair to put a stop to those supplies which were sent almost daily to France, brought these Scotchmen to several members of parliament, to whom they evidenced the back side of the Petition was read, viz. 'You are to take into your custody John Harrington, for suspicious practices, &c.'

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The ground of this the same things: his view was to have them examined at the bar of the house, when time should serve; and, in the mean while, fearing that endeavours might be used to corrupt them, he carried them to a master in Chancery, who took their depositions upon oath.—This was scarce done, before he was seized by a messenger, carried before the king and council, and accused of suborning those Scotchmen to disturb his majesty's government. While under examination, he was not well treated by the lord chancellor (these are his own words) and extremely ill by the lord treasurer; and, upon the issue, was committed close prisoner to the Tower (the cause assigned in the warrant being for Subornation of Perjury, tending to the defamation of his maj. and his government; and for contemptuously declaring, he would not answer his majesty any question, which his majesty, or his privy council, should ask him); debarred the use of pen and ink, the access of his friends, confined in such a place over the Tower ditch, as threw him into a dangerous sickness; and denied the assistance of either physician or divine: after all this, he made a hard shift to get a Petition presented to the house of commons; which produced an order for his being brought before the house; before whom he gave a clear account of the whole matter, and of his behaviour at the council-board.—But of the two Scots soldiers, the one made himself perjured, without being suborned by Harrington; denying, or misrepresenting to the house, what he had sworn formerly: and the other, the honestest fellow it seems of the two, only absented. However, divers members of that house attested voluntarily, that the soldiers had affirmed the same thing to them: and indeed the truth of that matter became notorious, by several other soldiers that came over afterwards, and by further account from Scotland. Mr. Harrington also carried himself towards the house with so much modesty, that it seemed inseparable from him; so that a disposition appeared in the members to have concerned themselves for his liberty; when Mr. Secretary Williamson stood up, having been a principal instrument in committing him, and, because the other crimes rather deserved thanks and commendation, and the warrant would not justify itself, he insisted upon his strange demeanour towards his majesty; deciphered his very looks, says Mr. Marvell; and but that his majesty and the house remained still living flesh and blood, it might have been imagined, by his discourse, that Mr. Harrington had the head of a Gorgon. But this story so wrought with, and amazed the commons, that the prisoner found no redress, but might thank God that he escaped again into close prison." Ralph.

proceeding against Harrington was, an Oath by one Harriot, Lemnon, and Murray, Scotchmen, at the instigation of Fonseca, (the Spanish ambassador's secretary) who had engaged Harriot, &c. to the utmost disturbance of the government, to create jealousy between the king and this house, clandestinely seeking out informations from Scotland. Harriot he found out, and examined him upon oath. The purport was this: Harriot was one of the 500 men carried into Ostend, by one of their frigates, where he was not willing to serve, but was put in mind, that if he would pass into England, he should have his liberty. He got an address to Fonseca, and this Harrington was to have the care of him, and gave him money; but took care to ask him about men pressed in Scotland, and other transactions there, and took notes; which Harrington transcribed fair, and took him to a master in chancery, where he swore to that paper, though he never read it. But he said to the master in chancery 'he had read it,' but to him (Williamson) he deposed otherwise. This fellow said, 'he swore not conjointly what the other deposed, but for himself only, and not to the cutting off ears.' Says Harrington, 'I will get money for you to go thither: that will be good news to duke Hamilton.' This practice was so indirect, and by Harrington's carriage at the council, he appeared to be the most grown young man in his impudence, and he believes, in his loyalty: he stands committed for contempt: he used that style, that air, and mien to the king, as 'it may be so:' 'I will answer you no more' and the king said, 'I will ask you no more.' and for this he was committed by the lords of the Council's order.

Mr. Garraway rises not up to justify Harrington's deportment to the king, but he has heard that the last day the committee of grievances sat, these people waited at the door to tell you what they petition now, and, he believes, Williamson will tell you what is become of Harriot, &c. now not to be found; taken out of his lodgings: would ask Williamson about the commitment being brought hither to give evidence.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. He never saw him, since the deposition in his house. Harrington said to Harriot, 'go off; what you have said may cost you your own ears.'

Sir Tho. Lee. Williamson tells you of 'oath made of seditious practices.' Harrington brought them to be examined about men pressed, contrary to the king's proclamation. Harriot informed a master in chancery of it upon oath, and was not committed for contempt of the king. See now, the crime is to go to a master in chancery, before the king, and he is committed to a messenger before he was brought to the king, and there as a criminal, and asked questions, and he would not inform against himself. This, it seems, is 'unmannerly' and 'sedition.' No wonder we have so little account of Miscarriages, when things are thus managed in Council.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. His commitment was for going where he ought not to go, in matters of state, to give information, which belongs not to a master in chancery to examine. He should have come to those whom he ought. He wants breeding indeed, the best part of breeding, that of the mind, but for the other, he is a well fashioned man.

Lord Cavendish is far from excusing any man that has failed in good manners to the king; but he hears nothing alleged against his deportment at the lords of the Council 'but his looks, air, and mien.' Nothing apparent against him, but that he is unwilling to answer against himself. Williamson said, 'he was committed for carrying men to depose before a master in chancery, in matters of state, before he came to the king's council,' which he might justify, the parliament sitting; especially apprehending that some of the king's council are highly guilty of what we are about to remedy.

Sir Francis Winnington. He attended the Council when Harrington was brought. He observes, that the weight of exception is put upon it; that he was committed that so he might be prevented coming here to inform you. If he knows the matter of fact, it is his duty to acquaint you with it. Harrington, with another, was summoned to attend the Council, and came. Harrington was fairly asked questions about disturbances of the government, and what he knew of such a man. That no man is brought thither to accuse himself, is their rule; but to ask if he knew such a man, and what is become of him. Any man that owes allegiance to the king, ought not to refuse answering there. He looked not like an uneducated rustic man. No man behaves himself with more humanity than the king. But he never saw any gentleman more rude to another; throwing his head about—These were only questions concerning other persons, asked fairly by my lord chancellor. And he answered, 'Ask what questions you will, I will answer you none.' Those common questions that he was asked, no man will deny to another. The Privy-Council may do what a court-leet may, quia male se gessit. It is a common thing to commit upon rude deportment; and his commitment was, because he was of an ill behaviour before his prince—the law allows reverence to the king. He being present when this passed, he thought it his duty to acquaint you with it.

Mr. Williams stands not up to vindicate ill behaviour, but the rights of our liberties. He expected some particular certain cause from the great minister (Williamson) of this man's commitment: he finds only suspicion of seditious practices: so general an allowance is not to be admitted. Men are not to be imprisoned upon notions. If he were committed on the account of seditious practices, this is not the manner. No man is imprisoned but by 'lex terræ et judicium parium suorum'; by the king's writ, not by verbal commandment from the king's ministers. He does complain, and is in great fear of arbitrary proceedings. This way of commitment has been usual, but no authority for it by statute or common law: but many complaints of it. 'The King's presence!' How far that may in trench upon the liberty of the subject, ought to be examined. He doubts. It is said, 'He was judged by his eye and mien.' Every man has not bonne mine. Persons ought not to be committed for that in that place.

Sir Wm. Coventry fears that the business before you, the more you handle it, will run the more into your fingers. He could heartily wish the respecting part to the king declined, as it is not to be handled without pricking your fingers. Liberty is a tender thing, and may concern himself as well as another man. A secretary of state may call a man before him, and if he refuses to answer, he may put him in custody; and when he has him, the king may have notice of it; but the crime of the Chancery-Affidavit, and the disrespect to the king intervening, he is committed for that. It seems, Harrington is in custody, and if he be of any use to you he will not be refused, if you send for him to know what is become of Harriot; but as to the disrespect-part, he would leave that.

Sir Henry Capel. This is an unhappy debate, and he desires we may be rid of it as soon as we can. He would preserve a good correspondence with the king, and seconds the motion, to be tender to meddle with this person. If a common justice of the peace may commit him in this case, much more the council board. We are gone and lost for ever, if we pay not respect to our prince, and if ever to any prince, to this. We know the tenderness of his nature: he would send for Harrington, and interrogate him what you please, as to the other business.

Mr. Vaughan. No man that understands his duty to his prince, but will say that Harrington's gesture deserves censure. Remember your own stations: when your laws are contemned, justice is violated, and expected to be relieved at a committee of grievances; and if a person be so used that comes hither, you must enquire into it. He would adjourn the business to to-morrow, and let the Petitioner come then to the bar to give you an account of the grievance.

Col. Birch. If we slumber over this day's work, we shall never remedy it again. Such things as these come bye ways: but this shall not fright him: but the warrant of commitment must tell you what this is. Williamson ought to have secured the person that gave information, as well as have committed Harrington.

Mr. Sacheverell loves plain English, and hopes other gentlemen do so too. As this case seems to him, if this be allowed, there needs neither Star-chamber, nor oath, ex officio—Not only the Council table but the lords house commit for 'Contempt,' (A very brave word!) He asks whether any commitment can be without specifying special matter of crime, and not mere contempt? Would know, how Harrington stands committed? Whether upon the 1st, 2nd, or 3rd Commitment? In the 1st, the lords of the Council charge crime—aggravate that to misbehaviour, and that holds water, and they commit him to the Tower. Suppose all the case be true of misdemeanor, he asks, Whether for misdemeanor a man may be committed close prisoner? And whether they are not to take bail, if it be tendered? He would have them speak out, and then he will tell you more what he has to say.

Serj. Maynard. Harrington may be brought to the bar, if he desires it. He may be indicted or bailed. The countess of Shrewsbury complained to the Council-table, that the lady Arabella was treating with foreign ministers. The lady Arabella refused to answer. By the advice of the judges (at common law) she was committed, and it was no new thing. Ed. 1. A clerk forged a fine; the lord chancellor examined him; he was convicted, but removed to the exchequer, and there tried, and was convicted. Some matters of state must be looked after, in another manner than the common way: he cannot but justify the Secretary's warrant-general, 'for misbehaviour.' But that about 'pressing the men in Scotland, he does not.

Lord Coventish moves for this other person, Harriot, to be brought likewise.

Mr. Sec. Williamson said, on his honour and sincerity, he knew not where he was, nor where to find him.

Mr. Harrington was ordered to be brought to the bar to-morrow.

March 17. The debate was resumed.

Sir F. Winnington humbly conceives the jurisdiction of the council to be this: the case may happen, that they may commit a person to custody: if he be notailable, he may be committed till delivered by due course of law: the magistrate cannot force bail. 17 Cha. i. reports it not as to this man, but to all: the council cannot punish the estate, or the person, in giving bail. He is to have an indictment, or information, preferred against him, and he pleads to it.

Sir Tho. Lee. Winnington tells you plainly, 'That the Lords of the Council may commit a man;' but it must be in order to trial, not punishment. The matter stands now avowed by the deputy constable of the Tower, that Harrington stands committed close prisoner in the Tower: what greater hardship can he have? it takes away preparation for his defence, if on suggestion only; and that it is so close, no man can come to him. He may be sent beyond the sea, or put to torture, and if the warden of the tower keeps counsel, the man can have no remedy. He moves, therefore, that complaint may be made to the king, for keeping this person a close prisoner, and desire redress.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The king (and for weighty considerations) commanded verbally the constable of the Tower to keep Harrington close prisoner. This young fellow, for many months, and some years, has held correspondence with persons, (and there is reason to commit him to the Tower) and goes deep to subvert the whole government. The thing is laid on this side the sea, and beyond foreign ministers are concerned. This is one of their instruments who meddled with public matters. He questions, 'whether this be a parliament, or no parliament?' he holds, 'That rebellion must be against the three states, and not against any one of them.' This has been said by this man, and good witness of it. He said, 'That those hanged at Charing-Cross were hanged by the opinion of 12 men only.' The servants of these lords, now in the Tower, enquired for this man, and whether they might have access to him? he leaves you to judge, if that be our interest and concern, when he meddled with foreign ministers, which every man abominates.

Sir Tho. Lee never saw the man, nor knows any relation of his. But he moves not for his sake, but for those we represent. He shall go as far as any man to impeach him, if accused; but would not punish the worst of men (that may concern the innocentest most) without accusation. Let not the nature of the man take you off from that which may concern any man.

Sir John Ernly. If the king cannot do this, (imprison, &c.) his government is a straw. Every man then may talk, or preach any thing. He would be a king of clouts, if this cannot be.

The Speaker. He stands committed for contempt, &c. and by the king's verbal order to the constable, he is kept close prisoner. The warrant runs thus: 'To take into your custody Mr. Harrington for subornation of perjury, and stirring sedition in the government, and contempt of the king in council.'

Sir Wm. Coventry thinks it against law to restrain the person close prisoner, without warrant for so doing; and he thinks the constable to blame in it, and not the king: else how shall he come to have his Habeas Corpus? He desires you would declare that it ought not to be so now, nor for the future. Certainly the observation of our law deserves a sheet of paper for a warrant; if it be not worth that, it is very little worth. If the constable had desired it, the king would not have denied it; and it is his fault. For the future, if such commitments be, in God's name, let them be in writing; and he hopes you will discountenance this.

Mr. Harrington was then call in to the bar, where he spoke thus: "I am sensible of the honour the house has done me on this occasion, in receiving my Petition, and permitting me to come to make it out. It is my opinion, and I hope I am not in an error, that the liberty of being tried 'per judicium parium suorum' is the undoubted right of the subjects of England. Parliaments are called for urgent and weighty affairs, concerning the king and defence of the state, and against the mischiefs which daily happen. These are the proper subjects of debate; and it is proper for the members of this house to apply themselves to subjects, and they to you, on occasions of this nature. I am come to fling myself upon the protection of this house, and I hope for it. I met with some Scotchmen, who came from Ostend, taken by the Spaniards, pressed out of Scotland, &c. and I did what I thought was my duty. I acquainted several members of the house, that they could make it appear, how they were pressed for the French service in Scotland, after the king's Proclamation, &c. They did agree that I had reason and justice in such an application: one of them, Redcastle, a preacher, and a favourite of the duke of Lauderdale, was offered 20*l.* (it was an inconsiderable sum for a man of his quality) to forbear giving in evidence, &c. I took in writing what the Scotchman informed me, and carried it to sir John Coell, a master in chancery, where the Scotchman made affidavit of what I had written. The next day, I was committed to a messenger, for dangerous and seditious practices, where I was kept in durance, with one Lemmon, and Mr. Murray. When I was brought before the king and council, the lord treasurer acquainted the king, 'That this was a whipter, and a dangerous fellow to the king and government.' The chancellor asked me several questions, 'Whether I knew Harriot?' The treasurer said, 'I told you what he was; he will give you no direct answer.' I was asked, 'Whether I went with Harriot to a master in chancery, and who that master was?' I said, 'Possibly his name might be Coell.' The chancellor was studying more questions; but I desired him 'to think of no more questions, for I was resolved to give no answer; but, being come thither accused, I would answer according to law.' But this was construed a contempt, and, though for nothing else, I suffered imprisonment. My father and grandfather were particular servants to the king, and I owe obedience to the king, and hope, for the particular actions I am accused of, to be justified by the parliament, and submit myself to his majesty. I have given you as just an account of the matter as I can. From the Council I was sent close prisoner to the Tower, and forbid pen, ink, and paper. I was locked up, and no person admitted to me, but the person of the house where I was kept was civil to me. I had what meat I would, but was not suffered to walk upon the leads. I do not desire bail, but the benefit of the law."—He then withdrew.

Col. Birch. Harrington tells you, 'That for doing his duty as a commoner of England, and for privilege of this house, going to a master in chancery, &c. he was clapped up close prisoner.' He would have the Affidavit made before the master in chancery, annexed to the Petition, read.

The Speaker. There was no affidavit annexed to the Petition, and you (Birch) cannot make affidavit of it.

Col. Birch. He would not make affidavit, lest he mistake, as the Speaker did in declaration of the law about Petitions.

The Speaker. He mistook only the fore part of the law for the latter; and he hopes his mistake will never cost the house so much as Birch's has done [in something relating to a Tax-bill.]

Col. Birch. Whatever his mistake has cost the house, he is sure the marks were not upon the bags—[meaning that the Speaker had lost money at play, and the king's marks were upon the bags he sent the money in, being the Navy-bags.]

Harriot the Scotchman, and Murray, were next called to the bar and examined. After which, Mr. Harrington was dismissed, and the farther debate of the thing was left, sine die.*

Debate on a Bill for securing the Protestant Religion, by educating the Children of the Royal Family therein. March 20. Sir Harbottle Grimstone. He has heard of this bill,† and liked the report of it well, but never read it. He finds, that it intends 'securing the Protestant Religion, &c.' but he would not, under pretence of providing against Popery, do things against the legal and monarchical power of the kings of England. He wonders that it passed the lords house, and made no more noise than it has done. He thinks there is a vizard upon the face of this

* "That the commons, who are the express guardians of the people, and who had so lately taken arbitrary commitments, by his majesty and the privy council, into their consideration, in order to make a better provision for their security, should all at once grow so negligent of their trust, as to suffer any one individual to apply to them in vain for protection and deliverance, can never be wondered at enough; and yet the session before us produces an instance [the above] remarkable enough, on all accounts, to challenge a place in the History of England." Ralph.

† "This bill was called by one party, 'A Bill against Popery;' and, by the other, 'A Popish Bill.' It was of the Janus kind; for under the pretence of educating the Children of the Crown in the Protestant Religion, it admitted the kings of England to be successively Papists. They were, indeed, required to make a Declaration upon Oath, 'That they did not believe in transubstantiation;' but if they refused it, they might. And all they were to pay for this licence was, the parting with so much of their power as regarded the filling all ecclesiastical vacancies, (but such as were in the gift of the lord chancellor) which were then to devolve to the bishops, under certain limitations, as expressed in the bill itself; (to be found in Marvell's Growth of Popery) so that, in effect, this bill was no better than a compromise between the Church and the Duke, by which the latter passed a sort of fine to the former for being of what religion he pleased." Ralph.

bill; and he hopes every gentleman here will give his helping hand to pull it off; and then we shall see the spots on the face of this fair bill. In the last session, the lords were very busy in framing a Test for people to take, to secure the government, &c. which miscarried; now here is a Test provided for the king, and no man has less cause to be suspected.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. This is the first time of reading this bill, and it is of an extraordinary nature; and because the case is extraordinary, therefore it is an argument for a 2nd reading. The purport of it is this: 'That should the misfortune befall the kingdom of a prince of the Romish religion, that then you may endeavour to preserve the Protestant religion as one man. By what means, to have a Protestant clergy, three are to be presented to the king, by the bishops, to fill up vacancies; and the king is to take one.' If that objection be valid, 'That this is out of our power to do,' it is no purpose to make any laws. Though this bill comes not up to the whole of the cure, yet this house and the lords may make it up. Though the Church of England be in a body of professors of the Protestant religion, yet to be taught they must be sent; and whilst we have Protestant teachers, he hopes we shall be so ourselves. It is said, 'this Bill is to raise a faction between the laity and the clergy.' He thinks this Test proper to be given by such persons as may be supposed uncorrupt and untainted in religion.

Mr. Vaughan. We owe a natural allegiance to the king, as well as a political. He thinks this bill will be an unfortunate stain upon the nation. The king was once deprived of this kingdom by arms, and that was by the power of some few persons. But now this bill will do it by law, which is the sense of the whole nation. The laws since H. viii. contended to settle the supremacy on the crown, that you would now take away. Shall the king give this power away, and lodge it in the ecclesiastics? When the king once passes this into a law, he divests himself of his right, and puts it into the bishops.

Mr. Fiach. This bill is for the security of the Protestant religion, and though this will not totally do it, yet it will go a good way towards it. The popish lords and papists abroad are against it, and therefore he is for it. He thinks it strange, that so many gentlemen, eminent for the profession of the Protestant religion, should concur with the Papists against this bill; but they apprehend encroachments on royal prerogative. This is not a total deprivation of the king's disposing of ecclesiastical promotions; but what he may take off when he pleases.

Serj. Maynard. The general end of the bill is, to keep us a Protestant clergy. No man can withstand that. But, to throw out the bill for what he has heard, amazes him to hear it. We must not think ourselves secured against all accidents of Popery, if we may not suppose a change. There is no mention in scripture, but where a true king, true religion. It is said, 'This changes the king's prerogative.' If it should fall out to manacle the king's prerogative, we shall not, and the king may not, be short-sighted in that, before he passes it.—The Bill was ordered to be read a second time.

Mr. Hatcher's Petition was, upon the Question, rejected.

March 27. The Bill from the lords for educating the Children of the Royal Family in the Protestant Religion, &c. was read the second time. The house sat some time very silent, whereupon,

Mr. Sec. Williamson said, this bill is of great weight, by the silence in the house. He remembers, at the first reading, a remark upon one part of it: for the education of the children, it was thought the time was too narrow, 'from 7 to 14 years of age.' He thinks it reasonable to enlarge it, and moves that it may go to a committee for amendment, at least for that.

Mr. Mallet. In this bill there are interlineations, and figures, which is unparliamentary. He is against the commitment of the bill: it will blow up the government, it states an interregnum and an oligarchy. It is now a thesis amongst some churchmen, that the king is not king but by their magical unction. He knows not what the bill is—no interregnum can be by law—it sets up nine mitres above the crown—Monstrum horrendum!

Mr. Vaughan. The king by this bill is made capable of error; and if once an offence be sheltered under error of the king, you may seek impeachments elsewhere than in the house of commons. He finds not the great rights amongst the bishops, which the Romanists say—If Popery come in, they and their books must burn together. It is said, 'The king's children are to be taught the Lord's Prayer, &c. and the rudiments of religion;' but as parrots, &c. 'Liberavi animam meam.' The bill is fatal to the crown, and so little in it to be retained, and so much to be rejected that he would throw it out.

Mr. Marvell wonders to see this bill so ready to be committed, that the consequence may be no likelihood of the king's consent. But it is an ill thing, and let us be rid of it as soon as we can. He could have wished it had perished at the first reading rather than have been revived by a second. He is sorry the matter has occasioned so much mirth. He thinks there was never so solemn and sad an occasion, as this bill before you; but he is glad the house is returned into that temper, which the gravity of the matter requires. The bill seems very unreasonable; the beginning is of two things not of mature consideration. First, it supposes 'the death' of the king. It might have had a more modest word to have disguised it from the imagination ('Demise.') Secondly, it supposes 'that possibly the crown may devolve on a Popish government;' which ought not to be supposed easily and readily. God be thanked for the king's age and constitution of body! The king is not in a declining age; and if we intermeddle in things of this consequence, we are not to look into it so early, as if it was the king's last will and testament. The law makes it treason, 'to imagine the death of the king that is'—A word more in it—The true and proper sense is not to imagine the king's death—His age may confirm you in no danger suddenly of the consequences of the bill, but as for that of 'a Popish Successor,' he hopes it is a matter remote in the event, and would not precipitate that evil, no, not in a supposition. For some reason, without doubt, this matter has been thought of in the house of lords, and next to the king living, he would cast as little umbrage on the successor, as might be. There is none yet in sight, but whose minds are in the hands of God, 'who turns them like the rivers 'of water.' Whilst there is time there is life, and whilst life, time for information, and the nearer the prospect is to the crown, information of judgment will be much easier. When God 'takes him on high and shows him the glory of the world, and tells him, 'All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me,' he thinks these will be no temptation. Those who change for conscience-sake will have so much self-denial, that the crown will not make them alter the thing. It is unreasonable; it may be proper some other time, but not now. This bill is a great invasion on prerogative: to whom ever God shall dispose the kingdom, it is entire to the king. He does not love to reflect on the persons of those who represent the Protestant religion—(the bishops.) But it is said, 'This invasion is not made by the prelates; they were but passive in it.' But he will not speak of such reverend persons, with any thing of severe reflection, but will only suppose this power of the bishops given to any other order of men; to nine physicians, and they administer the Test to the king. Having altered the property of the persons, to speak with a little more freedom, he knows no body of men, if the parliament please, but may do it as well as they. The College of Physicians have a charter from the king, and are his sworn servants; let these come to the king to administer the Oath. It is a pretty experiment. Just a trial, whether the loadstone will attract the iron, or the iron the loadstone. Who can think that any body of men, that must depend upon the king, &c.? Which way, think you, it draws? We have seen (and he hopes we shall never see it again) in Henry VIII's Edw. vi.'s, queen Mary's, and queen Elizabeth's time, all sorts ready to turn, one, one way, another, another. It is appointed by the bill, 'that the bishops should wait upon the king at Whitehall, &c.' He thinks not but physicians may be thought by a Popish king, as proper a cure for his soul, as bishops. The chevalier de Menevictette, physician to the Great Turk, was by him made Patriarch of Antioch. He thinks this power not fit to be lodged in any sort of persons whatsoever. Whatever prince

God gives us, we must trust him. Let us not, in prevention of future things so remote, take that immoderate care in this bill. Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof. Here is pricking of bishops, as if pricking sheriffs. If the king does not, they must. Here bishops make bishops; (as inherent a right to the crown as any think possible.) He desires, that, during this king's reign, we may apply ourselves to preserve the people in the Protestant Religion, not only in the profession of it, but that men may live up to it, in morality and virtue of religion, and then you establish men against the temptation of Popery, and a prince that may be popishly affected. If we do not practise upon ourselves, all these Oaths and Tests are of no use; they are but phantoms. The bill has a very good title, and a good intention, but nothing but the title is urged to be of the least validity. This puts him in mind of a private bill: you would not countenance the pretence of 'no people to make compact for themselves.' It is said, 'the bishops promoted not the bill, but they were under fear, in the lords house*.' Promotions make some men much better, and it is power that makes Popery: So great a power assembled upon such a body of men! The bill he spoke of, pretended, that the dean and chapter of Durham would have benefit by a ballast shore to be erected at Yarrow-Sleake, on Newcastle side. Says one, 'it will narrow the river.' Says another, 'it will widen it.' It was then said, 'that gentlemen love not to play tricks with navigation' much less should the nation play tricks with religion. But whether this bill will prevent Popery, or not, this will secure the promotions of the bishops; it will make them certain. He is not used to speak here, and therefore speaks with abruptness. Closes all with his motion that the bill may have the same fate others have moved for, 'not to be committed.'

Serj. Maynard. Nothing is more desirable than the end of this bill, but to the means to attain that end, he knows not how far he can consent, or whether at all. But he is not for desperate remedies. He would not have any thing propounded prejudicial to the crown. He has some difficulties upon him, but would commit the bill.—The Bill was then committed, 127 to 88.†

* This gentleman, in his Growth of Popery, expresses himself thus: "That the bishops were either the contrivers or promoters of this bill, is a scandalous falsehood, and devised by the authors to throw the odium off from themselves upon the clergy, and (the bills that aimed at the ruin of the Church of England having miscarried) to compass the same end by this defamation. A sufficient warning to the Clergy how to be intrigued with the statements for the future!"

† "This notorious Bill," as Marvell calls it, after being committed, died of neglect, the committee either disdain, or not daring publicly, to enter upon it." Ralph.

Debate on Mr. Andrew Marvell's striking Sir Philip Harcourt.] March 29. Mr. Marvell, coming up the house to his place, stumbling at sir Philip Harcourt's foot, in recovering himself, seemed to give sir Philip a box on the ear. The Speaker acquainting the house, 'That he saw a box on the ear given, and it was his duty to inform the house of it,' this debate ensued.*

Mr. Marvell. What passed was through great acquaintance and familiarity betwixt us. He neither gave him an affront, nor intended him any. But the Speaker cast a severe reflection upon him yesterday, when he was out of the house, and he hopes that, as the Speaker keeps us in order, he will keep himself in order for the future.

Sir John Ernly. What the Speaker said yesterday, was in Marvell's vindication. If these two gentlemen are friends already, he would not make them friends, and would let the matter go no farther.

Sir Job. Charlton is sorry a thing of this nature has happened, and no more sense of it. You in the Chair, and a stroke struck! Marvell deserves for his reflection on you, Mr. Speaker, to be called in question. You cannot do right to the house, unless you question it; and moves to have Marvell sent to the Tower.

The Speaker. I saw a blow on one side, and a stroke on the other.

Sir Philip Harcourt. Marvell had some kind of a stumble, and mine was only a thrust; and the thing was accidental.

Sir H. Goodrick. The persons have declared the thing to be accidental, but if done in jest, not fit to be done here. He believes it an accident, and hopes the house thinks so too.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. This does appear, that the action for that time was in some heat. He cannot excuse Marvell who made a very severe reflection on the Speaker, and since it is so enquired, whether you have done your duty, he would have Marvell withdraw, that you may consider of it.

Col. Sandys. Marvell has given you trouble, and instead of excusing himself, reflects upon the Speaker: a strange confidence, if not an impudence!

Mr. Marvell. Has so great a respect to the privilege, order, and decency, of the house, that he is content to be a sacrifice for it. As to the casualty that happened, he saw a seat empty, and going to sit in it, his friend put him by, in a jocular manner, and what he did was of the same nature. So much familiarity has ever been between them, that there was no heat in the thing. He is sorry he gave an offence to the house. He seldom speaks to the house, and if he commit an error, in the manner of his speech, being not so well tuned, he hopes it is not an offence. Whether out, or in the house, he has a respect to the Speaker. But he has been informed, that the

* There is no mention of this in the Journal.

Speaker resumed something he had said, with reflection. He did not think fit to complain of Mr. Seymour to Mr. Speaker. He believes, that is not reflective. He desires to comport himself with all respect to the house. This passage with Harcourt was a perfect casualty, and if you think fit, he will withdraw, and sacrifice himself to the censure of the house.

Sir Henry Capel. The blow given Harcourt was with his hat; the Speaker cast his eye upon both of them, and both respected him. He would not aggravate the thing. Marvell submits, and he would have you leave the thing as it is.

Sir Robert Holmes saw the whole action. Marvell flung about three or four times with his hat, and then gave Harcourt a box on the ear.

Sir Henry Capel desires, now that his honour is concerned, that Holmes may explain, whether he saw not Marvell with his hat only give Harcourt the stroke 'at that time.' Possibly, 'at another time' it might be.

The Speaker. Both Holmes and Capel are in the right. But Marvell struck Harcourt so home, that his fist, as well as his hat, hit him.

Sir R. Howard hopes the house will not have Harcourt say, he received a blow, when he has not. He thinks what has been said by them both sufficient.

Mr. Garraway hopes, that, by the debate, we shall not make the thing greater than it is. Would have them both reprimanded for it.

Mr. Sec. Williamson submits the honour of the house to the house. Would have them made friends, and give that necessary assurance to the house, and he, for his part, remains satisfied.

Sir Tho. Meres. By our long sitting together, we lose, by our familiarity and acquaintance, the decencies of the house. He has seen 500 in the house, and people very orderly; not so much as to read a letter, or set up a foot. One could scarce know any body in the house, but him that spoke. He would have the Speaker declare that order ought to be kept; but as to that gentleman (Marvell) to rest satisfied.

Address to the King concerning Alliances. Sir John Trevor reported the Address to his majesty, which is as follows:

"We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the knights, citizens, and burgeses, in parliament assembled, do, with unspeakable joy and comfort, present our humble thanks to your majesty, for your majesty's gracious acceptance of our late Address, and that your maj. was pleased, in your princely wisdom, to express your concurrence in opinion with your two houses, in reference to the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands: and we do, with most earnest and repeated desires, implore your majesty, that you would be pleased to take timely care to prevent those dangers that may arise to these kingdoms, by the great power of the French king, and the progress he daily makes in those Netherlands, and other places: and therefore that your maj. would not defer the entering into such Alliances as may attain those ends. And in case it shall happen that in pursuance of such alliances, your maj. shall be engaged in a war with the French king, we hold ourselves obliged, and do, with all humility and cheerfulness, assure your majesty, that your most loyal subjects shall always be ready, upon the signification thereof in parliament, fully, and from time to time, to assist your maj. with such Aids and Supplies, as, by the divine assistance, may enable your majesty to prosecute the same with success. All which we do most humbly offer your majesty as the unanimous sense and desire of the whole nation."

Debate on the Address. Sir John Eraly. You are already in Alliances defensive, and farther alliances must be war, and so you will expose yourselves to depredations of the French at sea, upon your merchant-ships, and give the French a million by putting the king upon this Address. He declares, that the king's entering into farther Alliances is a war.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The question is, whether this addition of 'farther Alliances' in this Address be a repetition, or to make the former address more effectual? the middle period of your paper is quite other matter, which was laid by, and set aside by the house. 'To preserve the Netherlands from the growing power of France, and to enter into stricter Alliances for that purpose.' He begs leave only to observe that exception for a question, and to leave it out.

Sir Tho. Meres. This Address is not good sense if it has not reference to the former, and the king cannot but think of the former. We are told, 'That stricter Alliances import war;' but if any thing saves Flanders, it will be 'stricter Alliances;' and he doubts not but that the parliament having resolved it, it will be of weight. He will not say what alliances the king should enter into, but doubts not but they will be good when made.

Mr. Vaughan. Is not our men going into France as much a declaration of war, as the motion of sending money into Germany? He would agree to the Address.

Mr. Powle expects no farther Answer from the king. The design of the house is to give the king thanks for what he thinks so. This goes no farther than the other Address, and extends not the thing at all. It is said, that this will incense the French king into a present war with us; but this only enables the king for a present war, if there shall be occasion. When the world knows that the king and his people are together, he is as formidable as any king; and he would agree to the Address.

Col. Birch was not at the drawing up of this address, and therefore it is not a brag of his own, to be fond of it. He takes the Address to be good. The king said, 'He agreed with the opinion of the house of commons,' and you thank the king for agreeing with your opinion, and you desire him 'not to defer entering into Alliances, &c.' It has been said, 'This puts a force upon the king, presently to do it.' But this shows the opinion of the house, and their zeal in it. 'From time to time' we will stand by the king. He never saw, but when things came on untedly, it was the likeliest way to be quiet. What has this great man on the other side of the water done? the jealousies he has sown between the king and his people have given him that confidence. It is said, 'That ships are not ready, and therefore such a declaration of the king, as we desire in the Address, is improper.' But he believes that the danger was as much for want of ships 18 months since, as now, when we would have given money for ships, and it was not accepted. Now, or never, is the time to let the king of France see, that breaches are made up between the king and his people.

The Address was agreed to by the house; the question for its being recommitted being carried in the negative, 131 to 122.

Debate on the Bill for preserving the Protestant Religion.] April 4. A Bill from the lords was read, entitled, 'An Act for preserving of the Protestant Religion, and the more effectual conviction and prosecution of Popish Recusants.*'

Mr. Sachverell. This bill from the lords is a toleration of Popery, and puts but 19d. a Sunday difference betwixt the best Protestant, and severest Papist. The lords sent us a Bill lately, wherein they thought fit to transfer the king's Supremacy into other hands; † to take it away, unless the king undergo a Test, &c. By this bill, the parliament may be chosen Papists, for the sheriffs and mayors may be so too: though Catholics may not, and are under an incapacity, yet another person, their deputy, may, who may set aside all but Romanists. It sets aside all the laws against Popery, but the Act for the Test; and any man may act three months without a test; and your work may be done in that time. The bill intends to put Protestant Recusants into a worse condition than the Popish: by express words in the bill, he is subject to all the penalties the Popish are. The laws have declared Priests and Jesuits dangerous to the government, and yet they shall not suffer death, &c. He fears not the danger of this bill, in this king's time, but, hereafter, one inclinable to Popery will not execute the Priests and Jesuits. This bill is a bare toleration of Popery, and he would throw it out. †

* "This bill, with a most plausible title, had a most pernicious tendency. It had an easy and undisputed passage through the house of lords, but from the commons it met with very different treatment." Ralph.

† The Bill for educating the children of the Royal Family, &c. See p. 853.

‡ "No sooner was it read, than a Member rose up, and, in a short speech, unmasked it so effectually, that a second moved, 'that it might not only be thrown out, but with some particular mark of infamy.' The question be-

Mr. Garroway is glad to see, that the zeal of the house will embrace nothing of this nature. We may, by it, see the influence of the Popish lords in their house. He rises to second the motion.

Mr. Williams desires that the question upon the bill may not be put suddenly. He would see any gentleman, that will speak for the bill.

Lord Obrien desires that something of the bill may be retained, which is the title of the bill only: something, as a mark, that you throw not out barely 'a Bill of Popery.'

Sir Tho. Meres. If you throw out this bill, then read your own Bill of Popery: would observe, two years, and above, to pass most things in this bill. Your bill is firm, and strong, and good. These in the lords bill are slight, and good for nothing: to destroy all your laws against Popery, in one bill! Whatever is good in this bill, is in yours; and this is to chock all you did good in that. Posterity will be fully satisfied of it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry would not, by too quick a severity, lay aside this bill. To throw this bill out, and immediately to send up your own to the lords, is not the way to have it pass; the Popish lords sitting in that house. He hopes that, in time, so great jealousies may pass over; but it is a great encouragement to the Catholics, for such a body to stand by them, and the king of France's provocation; therefore would not throw the bill out.

Sir Tho. Lee has reason to believe, that our sharp bill against Popery will be rejected by the lords, because we have rejected theirs of Toleration. Lord Clarendon's bill of banishment passed in two or three days, and yet was laid by, as this is moved to be. He fears that this may have the same fate, and would throw it out.

Sir John Mallet hopes gentlemen will not wonder, if his zeal against this bill be not equal to others, in throwing it out. This bill has a disarming the Recusants in it. He likes the clause of educating their children; but, as for repealing the Statute of Mortmain, he likes not that.

Sir Harbottle Grimston. On the bill from the lords for establishing of Protestant Ministers in England, lately sent us down, when he differed from the lords judgment, he suspected his own. He believes gentlemen design mending this bill, to attain the end; but when it comes back, it will prove an unsavoury thing, stuck with a primrose. He would lay it aside. We are told of 'the danger that we may pass in a thin house, as we did the Sale of the Fee-farm Rents.' It is not possible to be imagined, that a bill of this nature could come from the lords, to repeal all the laws against Popery. If our laws were executed, there ing called for, a third demanded, 'That they would stay a while, to see whether there was any man to be found hardy enough to speak one word for it.' Which no man presumed to do." Ralph.

would not have been this growth of Popery; and he fears the danger will be greater. As for 'breeding the children of Papists,' we have laws in force for that; they ought not to have the education of them; that is already provided for. He wishes a law would be sent us from the lords, that the good laws we have already may be put in execution. Is this the way to prevent Popery? We may as soon make a good fan out of a pig's tail, as a good bill out of this.

Sir John Hanmer. Our David against this Goliath; our bill against the lords bill. Ours will go up to the lords triumphant in throwing out this, and warm your party in the lords house.

Sir Wm. Coventry will only say this one little thing, that the readiness of the house of commons to throw a bill out, without debate, is not usual: this bill being, seemingly, only to feel our pulse for a Toleration. He is not afraid of the success of our bill with the lords. When the nation sees the zeal of this house against Popery, it will put courage into magistrates, to put the laws in execution. Would nor give it the countenance of a debate but throw it out.

Mr. Sacheverell would have something on our books, not only of the title of the Bill, but something that it meant a Toleration of Popery.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The bill has so good a title, that it would be a reflection upon us to cast it out, upon our books: but he would cause some entry to be made, 'That finding, upon reading the bill, that it repealed many laws against Popery, we have thrown it out.'

The Speaker proposes this to be upon your books, viz. 'That a bill coming from the lords, so entitled, was rejected at the first reading.' That is the ordinary way of entry. But if you please to let it be thus, viz. 'The house, upon reading and opening the bill, sent from the lords, entitled, &c. finding it much otherwise, have rejected it.'

Mr. Waller. If we enter it so, this will teach the lords to make notes upon our bills. If we do this, it will remain upon record. Would have you content yourselves with a nem. con. in throwing out the bill, and have it so entered.

Sir John Trevor. When we send such a bill up to the lords, he would have the lords do so by us.

Resolved, "That the Entry be made as the Speaker proposed, viz. Upon reading the said bill, and opening the substance thereof to the house, it appeared to be much different from the title; and thereupon the house, nem. con. rejected the same.*—The house then read, the

* "It was rejected, with this censure added in the Journal; 'Because the body of the Bill was contrary to the Title.' A method of proceeding so totally different from the stated rules of intercourse between the two houses, that nothing but the crimes of the bill could have rendered it excusable." Ralph.

3rd time, their own Bill for suppressing the Growth of Popery; and sent it up to the lords for their concurrence.

The King's Message for an Adjournment. April 11. Mr. Sec. Williamson delivered to the house the following Message from his majesty:

"C. R. His majesty, having considered your last Address, and finding some late alteration in the affairs abroad, thinks it necessary to put you in mind, that the only way to prevent the danger which may arise to these kingdoms, must be, by putting his majesty timely in condition to make such fitting preparations, as may enable him to do what may be most for the security of them. And if, for this reason, you shall desire to sit any longer time, the king is content you adjourn now, before Easter, and meet again suddenly after, to ripen this matter, and to perfect some of the most necessary Bills now depending."

Debate thereon. Mr. Sec. Williamson. He said, 'adjourn;' but the king means, by short adjournments, to Oct. to have the parliament within call, upon emergencies.

Lord Cavendish. The king, in his Message, does signify 'an alteration in affairs;' but not what, nor what influence it has had, or change upon his council. When he does, we shall do what the king can desire of us, upon this occasion. Till then, we are not ripe for the matter.

Mr. Stockdale. 'To sit after Easter to ripen things;' that is, in plain English, to grant Money.

Mr. Stanhope. It is not possible that any reasonable time can dispatch the bills depending before us; and the king may suffer, by the Commissioners not putting the act for the Tax in execution, by their stay here, and 500 of us being reduced to 140. It is not parliamentary, nor safe, to sit with so few; and he would move the king for a recess for some longer time.

Mr. Sec. Williamson knows not whether he did express himself clear enough. He said, 'The king intended a recess by adjournment;' and though the king means not so as to sit to Oct. yet, by short adjournments, to meet as occasion should require.

Mr. Powle cannot concur with the motion, to meet again after Easter. The session already has been a great labour to us, and our occasions require our presence; and he desires to have no other meeting, for few will attend it, being gone into the country. On the other side, this Message from the king respects our Address, concerning the French king's Greatness. If the king has entered into Alliance, and if he declared them, he would assist the king to support them. As for the other bills they may keep till Oct. by adjournment. He would not have the house make an Address to the king, as if we affect sitting. But he believes, if there be occasion for us to meet, we will be ready to come up, upon reasonable summons.

Sir Tho. Lee. What with the writing, and the verbal Message delivered by sec. Williamson, it puts him to a stand. If there be a necessity for taking arms immediately, then there may be a proclamation to call up your members. He would have the Message farther explained.

Col. Birch cannot make the Messages agree with one another. He remembers our Address; and, to be clear, would have this Message, by word of mouth by the secretary, entered, with that on paper, into our books, as an explanation of it. Adjournment must be with a house; and the Message says, we are to do no business. If it be cleared, that no business is to be done, then we may sit more quietly at home.

Sir John Ernly. There was not an apprehension of the loss of Flanders, till this repulse of the prince of Orange at the battle of Montcassel. Reparation now will not be seasonably asked. The king has neither stores, nor money, nor ships: 20 or 30 privateers may easily burn all our ships, and master the Channel.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The Message does not speak to press you to any thing; but it lays before you the king's condition, and that he will take his measures according to the proportion that you will help him. Your Address is, 'That you will stand by him in such Alliances as he shall make, &c.' But what if the king make alliances with one hand, and offend with the other, and be not provided with defence! a man would have his servant go a journey, but will not have him engage in it, till he be provided with boots and horses, &c. Make what use of it you please.

Sir Edm. Jennings would request from the king an adjournment, for some short time, to perfect the bills depending; that the world may not say, we have passed the Money-Bills, and no more. He would have something entered on the Journal, that there may be nothing reflecting upon us, as passing Money-Bills, and no more.

Mr. Hopkins. Are we assured that that servant whom Coventry spoke of would go that journey, when he has boots and horse provided him?

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Would it be wisdom in the king to tell you what journey he would go, or that he would go a journey, without being provided for it?

Mr. Boscawen would not have us address the king to meet soon again, upon account of the bills. It seems, it is not a fit time, or place, to tell you if any thing be done, as to your Address, here. If the king intends to give an Answer to the Address, then we may meet, but not as to the Bills; and he would address the king accordingly.

Sir Philip Warwick. It is the king's great wisdom, that he gives you no more light, in his Answer to your Address. It looks like a night-piece, under that shade which is fitting for it. If we will give no Supplies, till the king make such engagements, &c. we put him upon hardships; and if we vote farther engagements to supply him, he knows not how the country will take it.

Sir Henry Capel. When the king sends us word 'that there is an Alteration of affairs,' he would take some notice of it in our books, with some Resolution upon it. He would pass a vote, 'That, because the king is convinced, by the defeat of the prince of Orange, that he should make Alliances, &c.' And therefore this Vote is pursuant to our former Addresses.

Sir Henry Ford knows not what farther security we can give the king, in this case, than we have done. He would address, 'That we humbly accept of the king's intimation of a short Adjournment.' For our preservation, if our house was on fire, we would give some, to save all.

Sir John Hotham knows it his duty never to suspect the king; but has reason to suspect elsewhere. The Address before was, 'That we hold ourselves obliged in prosecuting such Alliances, &c. to assist the king.' If gentlemen would speak clear out, neither his estate nor person should be spared, whilst he has a drop of blood, or a penny in his purse, to support them.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The king doubts not the constancy of this house. The king of Spain has good Alliances. The Hollander is firm to him, and he has great engagements. Valenciennes and St. Omers are taken, and were not provided for, and yet no failing in the Alliances. You will come too late, 'with lives and fortunes,' if you engage the king in a war, before he be provided for it. The king is, let us consider, whether we be safe at home, before we go abroad: that we be provided with stores and necessaries.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The matter is, the king seems to think that affairs are so altered abroad, that it is necessary we should be stricter in the matter we desired of him. He seems to intimate, that he is not in a condition to do what we desire of him, and expects something from us, according to our promise, in the Addresses, 'to aid and assist him.' Now the question is, How far we should go forwarder? If we were not at the end of a session, he would never stick at it. But moving for a tax, now gentlemen are gone down, and after an intimation from the king, 'that we should rise suddenly,' there is so much consequence in such a surprize, that he will never move you to it. We hear abroad, with both ears, of the prince of Orange's ill success; but he hopes your Address has heartened the confederates; and, the king complying, he would be loth the thing should fall flat in our hands. He would be loth the French counsellors should say to the king, 'They that advised you, shrink and slacken their hands.' He would not therefore strengthen those French counsellors—Would not be thought so pusillanimous a nation, that, when, three weeks ago, we addressed the king, on this success of the French, we should shrink from it. The more the danger is, it is ten times more necessary that you should do something; and it is never too late, till all be gone. He is raw and imperfect in what to move; but wishes, from his soul, this Message had been sent 3 days ago. You have given the king Money for 30 Ships, and that cannot be laid out for that purpose under 3 years. He hears it talked of, 'that Oct. may be soon enough to meet again.' But the day before to-morrow is not soon enough. You are in danger of being lost before Oct. If it concur with the rules of the house, he would make no scruple to move, 'That the king may have power to make use of some part of that Money, with our promise to reimburse it again, upon this occasion.' The king seems to be willing we should sit after Easter, that we may be witnesses, in a short time, how far he has gone in our Addresses; and hopes he meant to ripen that matter, that you may be witnesses he has done his utmost. He desires we may adjourn before Easter, with this reservation, 'That, if the king see cause sooner than Oct. he may call us by proclamation, at 20 days notice, to give him farther aid.' A little of that already given may help him and the confederates. A little money may go a great way: but he will not go farther than 200,000*l*.

Sir Tho. Lee. As for the motion of 200,000*l*. it is not possible to be done; for you must have a prorogation for altering the day in the Tax-bill; as it may be of dangerous consequence for the lords to do it. The king may destroy your Adjournment by proclamation. He is informed there must be a special act of parliament for doing it, viz. for calling that parliament in the interval of adjournment.

Sir Eliab Harvey. Is our Fleet, that we have given money to let out, and the Excise, a secret to the king of France? And is not that making war? Can the Fleet go incognito? He would have nothing said of secrecy. If occasion be, we may meet particularly on that account, and none else.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is said, 'We should meet after Easter, in relation to Public Bills;' but he is against it, unless, withal, the Money-Bills may lie on the table. He speaks against the offer of any Public Bills whatever. We are embarrassed in foreign business, and all for want of confidence, lest the money should be for some ill intent, and not have the direct fruit of it. If, on the other hand, we show coldness or tergiversation in the house, it is the ruin of us all. He is in suspense what to do, and how. He could have wished the paper from the king had been sent sooner. He shall, for the present, move, 'to consider the thing farther to-morrow morning.' The Paper has been considered, and well weighed, by the king's council; he would do so too here; and hopes we shall do like Englishmen.—The farther debate was adjourned till to-morrow.

April 12. After having resumed the adjourned debate on the king's Message, it was resolved, "That a Clause be added to the Bill for continuing the additional Duty of Excise, to enable his majesty to borrow 200,000*l*. at 7 per cent.

Resolved also, "That the Thanks of this house be presented to his majesty, for laying before them his majesty's sense of the posture of affairs abroad; and to let his majesty know, that, in order to his majesty's Preparations, in pursuance of the Address of this house, for the Safety of the Kingdom, they have provided a security of 200,000*l*. And that whatsoever of that sum shall be expended accordingly, shall be by them reimbursed: and whensoever the posture of his majesty's affairs shall require their attendance in parliament, they will be ready to aid and assist him, as the nature of his majesty's Affairs shall require." And a Committee was appointed to draw up an Address, pursuant to the said Vote."

The Commons' further Address respecting Alliances.] April 13. Sir John Trevor reported the Address, which was read, and agreed to by the house, and is as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, with great satisfaction of mind, observe the regard your majesty is pleased to express to our former Addresses, by intimating to us the late Alteration in Affairs abroad; and do return our most humble Thanks for your majesty's gracious offer made to us thereupon, in your last Message. And having taken a serious deliberation of the same, and of the Preparations your majesty hath therein intimated to us, were fitting to be made, in order to these public ends, we have, for the present, provided a security in a Bill for an additional Duty of Excise, upon which your majesty may raise the sum of 200,000*l*. And if your maj. shall think fit to call us together again, for this purpose, in some short time after Easter, by any public signification of your majesty's pleasure commanding our attendance, we shall, at our next meeting, not only be ready to reimburse your majesty what sums of money shall be expended upon such extraordinary Preparations, as shall be made in pursuance of our former Addresses; but shall likewise, with most cheerful hearts, proceed both then, and at all other times, to furnish your maj. with so large proportions of Assistances and Supplies, upon this occasion, as may give your majesty, and the whole world, an ample testimony of our loyalty and affection to your majesty's service; and may enable your majesty, by the help of Almighty God, to maintain such stricter Alliances, as you shall have entered into, against all opposition whatsoever."

The King's Answer.] April 16. Mr. Sec. Williamson delivered the following Message from his majesty:

"C. R. His majesty, having considered the Answer of this house to his last Message, about enabling him to make fitting Preparations for the security of these kingdoms, finds by it, That they have only enabled him to borrow 200,000*l.* upon a Fund given him for other uses: his majesty desires, therefore, the house should know, and hopes they will always believe of him, that not only that Fund, but any other within his power, shall be engaged to the utmost for preservation of his kingdoms.—But as his majesty's condition is, (which, he doubts not, but is as well known to this house as to himself) he must tell them plainly, that, without a sum of 600,000*l.* or credit for such a sum upon new Funds, it will not be possible for him to speak or act those things which should answer the ends of their several Addresses, without exposing the kingdoms to much greater dangers.—His majesty does farther acquaint them, that, having done his part, and laid the true state of things before them, he will not be wanting to use the best means for the safety of his people, which his present condition is capable of.”

Another Address from the Commons.] The Commons fell into an immediate consideration of an Answer to the above Message, and after a short debate, agreed to the following Address:

“May it please your majesty; Your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons, in this present parliament assembled, having considered your majesty's last Message, and the gracious expressions therein contained, for employing your whole Revenue, at any time to raise Money for the preservation of your majesty's kingdoms, do find great cause to return our most humble Thanks for the same; and to desire your maj. to rest assured, that you shall find as much duty and affection in us, as can be expressed by a most loyal people to a most gracious sovereign. And whereas your maj. is pleased to signify to us, ‘That the sum of 200,000*l.* is not sufficient, without farther Supplies, to enable your maj. to speak and act those things which are desired by your people,’ we humbly take leave to acquaint your majesty, that, many of our members being (upon an expectation of Adjournment before Easter) gone into their several countries, we cannot think it parliamentary, in their absence, to take upon us the granting of Money; but do therefore desire your maj. to be pleased, that this house may adjourn itself for such short time (before the sum of 200,000*l.* can be expended) as your maj. shall think fit; and, by your royal proclamation, command the attendance of all our members at the day of meeting: by which time, we hope your maj. may have so formed your affairs, and fixed your Alliances, in pursuance of our former Addresses, that your maj. may be graciously pleased to impart them to us in parliament.—And we no ways doubt, but, at our next assembling, your maj. will not only meet with a compliance in the Supply your maj. desires, but with all such assistances, as the posture of your affairs shall require: in confidence whereof, we hope your maj. will be encouraged in the mean time to speak and act such things, as your maj. shall judge necessary for attaining those great ends we have formerly represented to your majesty*.

The Parliament adjourned.] The king had no sooner received this Address, but finding the Money Bills ready, the same evening, he came suddenly to the house of peers, and being seated on his throne with the usual solemnity, he sent for the commons, and gave his royal assent to the several Bills presented to him. After which the Lord Chancellor, by his majesty's command, acquainted the two houses, that they had leave to adjourn themselves till the 21st of May next.

The Parliament meet.] May 21. The parliament met, according to his majesty's proclamation. The king made no Speech, but ordered one of the Secretaries to acquaint the house of commons, “That he would have them consider the substance of his last Message as soon as they could; for that he intended a recess very suddenly.”

Debate on the King's Message respecting Alliances.] It was then moved, that the king's last Message be read.

Mr. Sacheverell. He has not heard the Message, for he was not here when the Address was made; but, if he understands it right, the Message seems to be, and he hopes it is, ‘for Alliances, &c.’ that when we came back, we might see our Money laid out; before we came hither again. Before we come to a question, several things are to be taken into consideration; as, whether the nation may be preserved by peace, before we think of war; and how far either is for England's interest? And, if gentlemen enter into debate, what our interest is, then it is time to speak, whether to give, or not; and how much. He would know, what Alliances we have made since we met last, and whether the Money be laid out according to your intention.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If Alliances are made, or not made, they are not to be talked of in public. The king has Alliances with Spain, Denmark, Sweden, and many others. He would know what Sacheverell means.

Mr. Sacheverell. If the case stands there, he would know what new Alliances have been made. He thinks the nation may be preserved without expence of blood, or treasure. He proposes, fairly and calmly, that the thing may be opened, and that we may take the safest and surest way for the nation, either by peace or war. Unless such Alliances are made as we addressed for, it is in vain to make war, and run into hazard with potent neighhours, as we did before, when we wanted alliances. He moves, that we may go into a committee of the whole house, for the more free and full debate of the thing; and that it may be scanned where our interest lies. As to France's growing greatness, it being greater than is consistent with the interest of England, he would know how he came by that power, that, as he has it, he may be reduced back again. As to his number of shipping, his purse is too big for us; and if an Alliance with Holland be not secured, we can never combat both their fleets. It is the interest of Holland to be ready to join with us, and we with them; and, if joined, France can never come up to us, in number or force; and so we may preserve the Netherlands. He would have the house go into a grand committee, fairly and calmly to debate of Alliances; and if, that way will not do, he will go what way you please.

* “If Don Bernard de Solinas, the Spanish minister at London is to be depended on, the king was so angry with these Addresses against France, that he called the authors of them, ‘A Company of Rogues.’ It appears in sir Wm. Temple's Memoirs, that Don Bernard made no secret of this story to his friends in the house of commons; which his majesty so highly resented, that he ordered him to depart the kingdom within certain days.” Ralph.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. He is not against the motion, if the thing were not already done. We are off of that 'of Alliances.' It has been already debated, and addressed to the king, and a return of Answer upon it; and the matter is gone beyond debating. The last return from the king to your Address, was, 'He would do what you advised him; and without such a sum of money, or credit for it, he could not speak nor act the request of your Addresses.' This being a continuation of parliament, Sacheverell's motion is over entirely. The question is, plainly and nakedly, What will you do? in matter of Alliances, the king tells you, 'He cannot act nor speak of it, without being farther in a condition of owning it abroad.' And the thing can admit of no other Answer than is already given by the king.

Sir Wm. Coventry hopes no time has been lost, since we met last; and hopes that what we then desired is done, though not told us in what manner. He finds himself to have the same inclinations he had before, and has ever since persisted in them, and hopes he shall never waver. The thing is rightly stated. To enquire what Alliances we have entered into, since we met last, is not our question; or whether peace be properly Alliances; but our present purpose is, whether the Alliances, that require the assistance of the house to maintain them, are proportionable to our ends in our Address; and if they appear to be so, he will then not be wanting to support them. It has been said, 'The matter requires more time to finish, than this intermission of 5 weeks.' But our first Address was a longer time before than since the recess. He has heard, that the Triple Alliance was made in 5 days, when Holland had peace, and no more need of our alliance than France had. Can any man think that Holland requires your Alliance less now, than when they were in peace? he cannot imagine it hard, in time of war, to admit of a confederate, the Triple Alliance being done in 5 days. The king's ministers know their time best; therefore we mentioned no time for our access; and, by the time we met, we expected Alliances to be made; and we needed not have met, if Alliances were not fit to be declared, nor ripe to be told us; being not fit to alarm our neighbours, but so that all may enter into the war together; for it is feared it should alarm France. If it were in his choice, he would rather have him alarmed in summer than in winter, when his armies are in the field, and employed. In winter, the French king has no other employment. Is it a less alarm to give money to support Alliances, than to declare war? if Alliances are not made, we are come too soon. Perhaps a post or two may ripen Alliances fit for imparting; and moves to adjourn to Thursday.

Sir John Ernly hears it said, 'If we are entered into war, we know what to give.' The king tells you, 'he cannot stir one step farther without 600,000*l.*' He wishes that Alliances might be made without blood; but he understands them not. With Spain you cannot make one step farther than is upon you already, but what must produce blood. That step is a war. He comes not here to ask money, but we cannot be insensible of our own weakness. We want ships and stores, and the king has used all his credit, but cannot get any thing from the city, but doubtful answers from the lord mayor. There are 42 ships ready, and there are 30 more preparing; and if all you have given had been in ready money, there could not have been taken a better course: all 30 ready in 12 weeks; and stores, as far as credit will go, are taken care for; and if, in this case you are in at this present time, you will go farther, you must assist the king.—Whereas gentlemen say, You are, as to ships, in as good a posture as you were a year ago, he knows that ships are forced to beg press-warrants, by reason of many seamen being gone out, having no other employment than in merchant-ships.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The king says, 'without a Fund of 600,000*l.* he cannot act nor speak, &c.' And we cannot farther urge the thing, unless we give the king a reason for what we advise. It is the happiness of the kingdom, that the king either by reason brings us to his opinion, or we bring him to ours in this thing.

Mr. Mallet. All we do is insignificant, if we know not what Alliances are made. The king may 'act and speak' out, if he pleases; and we may have assurance mutual, that it is to support the Protestant cause.

Sir Tho. Littleton remembers, Grotius says, in his book 'De Jure Belli et Pacis,' on the causes of making war, 'If a prince makes extraordinary preparations, or any thing tending to it, it is not only a just cause for his neighbouring prince to arm, for jealousy of his safety, but, unless he desists that preparation, to make war upon him.' The use he makes of it is this; that the king of France has a vigilant council, and a watchful eye upon the king, and our Messages to him, and his Answers, and on the king's demand of 600,000*l.* When this was on foot, it is not to be imagined but that this expostulation being made, either the French ministers are told, that this is not against France, or are left doubtful where it is intended. Why, then, is this darkness to the king's subjects, when the matter is clear to the king of France one way or the other?—The further debate was then adjourned to the 23d.

The King's Speech to the Commons at Whitehall, respecting Alliances.] May 23. The king sent for the commons to Whitehall, and made the following Speech:

"Gentlemen; I have sent for you hither, that I might prevent those mistakes and distrusts which I find some are ready to make, as if I had called you together only to get Money from you for other uses than you would have it employed.—I do assure you, upon the word of a king, that you shall not repent any trust you repose in me, for the safety of my kingdoms; and I desire you to believe, I would not break my credit with you.—But as I have already told you, That it will not be possible for me to speak or act those things, which should answer the ends of your several Addresses, without exposing my kingdoms to much greater dangers; so I declare to you again, that I will neither hazard my own safety, nor yours, until I be in a better condition than I am able to put myself, both to defend my subjects, and offend my enemies.—I do farther assure you, that I have not lost one day since your last meeting, in doing all I can for our defence; and I tell you plainly, it shall be your fault, and not mine, if our security be not sufficiently provided for."

Debate on the King's Speech.] As soon as the commons returned to their house they proceeded to take the king's Speech into consideration.

Sir Edw. Bainton. Here are two things before you, Money and Alliances. He is so much dissatisfied that we did precipitately enter into Money, that, he believes, if it had not been done, you would have had Alliances before now. He is for Alliances, but not upon implicit faith. No one man is certain of every thing. The French ambassadors were civilly treated; and, they say, had a good desert at parting, when they were lately here. There is a truce proposed at Nimegueu; and we have a potent neighbour upon us. He would have us go into a grand committee; not because one, two, or three may speak twice, but not

* "Had the word of a king never been forfeited, it is reasonable to suppose, that, upon this great occasion, it would have been taken: or, if all appearances had not been utterly irreconcilable with these professions, those who contended so warmly for the end, must have granted the means. But, as the case was, opposition was not only countenanced but applauded; and the majority, both of the parliament and people, acted as if there was more reason to dread the designs of their own monarch, than even of his brother of France." Ralph.

precipitately to jump into Money. He would be informed by freedom of debate, which, by order of parliament, is not to be restrained in a committee to speak but once. For Alliances, in the first place; and what Alliances are to be entered into, that the whole kingdom, as one man, may be against him that shall advise the contrary. He means 'this house.'

Sir Tho. Meres. Bainton said not a word of war, in what he said. 'If any single man dare advise Alliances, contrary to this house, the whole body of the nation, 'as one man,' may be against him.' As they are against you, you must be against them; and if we may not say so, farewell all! But he will give words to the question: he would have it be, 'to go into a grand committee, to consider of an Answer to the king's Speech.'

Sir Philip Warwick. Let us make Alliances among ourselves. When we are debating them abroad, let us not quarrel with ourselves. He would rather quench the flame, than increase it. Bainton's words were, 'rise, as one man, against him that should advise the contrary.' The words are sounding a trumpet of war; words not fit to be said here. What will the world think of us, to fall so particularly into a diffident Answer to the king's Speech? Though we are his great council, we are not his directors. He has been at his master's elbow (the late king) when the hatchet was almost at his head: He would leave off these heats, and would have that caution, that the committee may proceed with confidence in the king.

Sir Tho. Littleton observes some exception taken at what fell from Bainton. He would therefore go into a grand committee, for more freedom of debate. But since Warwick called it 'a trumpet of sedition in Bainton's mouth,' which words can have no other explanation than 'Rebellion,' (which words Bainton did not say) he desires an explanation from Warwick: he would therefore, for more freedom of debate, go into a grand committee.

The house then resolved into a Grand Committee, on the king's Speech. Sir John Trevor took the chair.

Sir Eliab Harney moves, 'That we may enter into an Alliance, offensive and defensive, with the States of Holland.'

Sir Robert Howard. War is not a necessary consequence of Alliances. Trusting the king, or not trusting the king, is a word of a strange nature: will not be put to it, trust or not trust. No man can bring it up so strictly. He speaks this upon grounds that are deep, and not strange. Some, he hears, say, 'Alliances may produce a war;' and some say, 'must produce a war.' To put the king upon Alliances with the Dutch—Is that all? One is slow-paced necessity, and another a quick suspicion. Consideration is best for every body; and he would adjourn to Friday.

Sir John Hotham ever thought it fit for us to 'abate the pride, assuage the malice, and confound the devices' of the king of France. Plainly, he desires, as Harvey has moved, 'That we may make an Address to the king, to make a league, offensive and defensive, with the States of Holland, against the king of France.'

Mr. Sec. Coventry hears a proposition made, that he never heard of before, 'To enter into a league, offensive and defensive,' without any treaty ever made; and another gentleman moves 'for a league to be made with the confederates.' You will never see a precedent of any such vote.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Some are jealous, as if the king does call for Money for other ends than you desire. The king tells you, 'That, in the interim of your parting, he has not lost one day in doing what you have desired.' He takes notice of one motion 'for a league with Holland, offensive and defensive,' and another 'with the Confederates, &c.' He knows not how this can be made any part of the king's Speech. It is a great goodness, that the king has so graciously answered us; and let us not go farther than becomes this loyal house of commons; that we may expect to be gratified in a thing we strain not too much. Under 600,000*l.* the king can do nothing; and that is the naked thing before you, and proper for your consideration.

Mr. Sacherevell. The honour of the house is always to be preserved, and the good opinion of the king and people; and it will be so, to go by the same steps as when you were here last: to tell the king what Alliances you mean. In delay there will be danger, and the season of the year will be spent. When the king imparts those Alliances to us, then we may assist him in the support of them.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Can the king make you any other Answer than what he has done already? There is no proper question before you, but, how to enable the king to enter into Alliances.

Sir Tho. Meres is not for a negative. The house has already declared how Money may be had; 'by declaring Alliances.' But it has been answered twice, 'No; Alliances cannot be declared till we give Money.' He would know what we are called together for now, by proclamation. He conceives we are now here to give an Answer to the king's Speech when we were here last.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. When you rose last, you were not a sufficient number to answer for the whole kingdom; therefore you then were adjourned. So that you are at a stand, till you enable the king 'to act and speak,' as he tells you.

Sir Tho. Meres believes, the king will be convinced by our reasons. We were, when we met last, willing to give the king credit, till 900,000*l.* was expended, in maintaining the Alliances we desired. And by this time we expected Alliances should be told us. But he finds not one step of Alliances made.

Mr. Sacherevell would gladly have shown him how they can employ 600,000*l.* in making such Alliances. Whilst this Alliance is making, do they think to be ready by winter, and fight in the spring, and let Flanders be lost, and then be put to get it again? Is this the meaning? Give 600,000*l.* to be in the hands of that Council, which broke the Triple League, and greatedren France! What instance can be given, that those gentlemen have changed their principles? Men are still sent out of Ireland and Scotland, and arms out of the stores in England; and they persuade the king, that nothing can be done without 600,000*l.* Let them not dally with us, and put us off thus with fair promises, as they have done. When peace was made with Holland, we desired it exclusive to France. It was said then, 'trust the king;' and you were deceived then: will you be deceived twice? Let them own Alliances, and we are for them. If not, he would not give them a penny.

Mr. Williams. What has been said to us in speech, discourse, or message, is not to be looked upon as the king's. He gives them their true weight; they are the product of councils. Therefore he would begin where we ought, from whence it comes. We agree, in the main, for the safety of the kingdom. In some measure, the king is of our opinion. The thing we are to do, is to stop the power of France, which intimidates every man. We have addressed, but, it seems, too generally about Alliances. But let us be against the Growth and Power of France, this day, or never. And he will give all he has to defend us, expressly in opposition to the French greatness; either for an Alliance with Holland, or the Confederates. Till then, he will not give a penny.

Mr. Mallet. King James was said to be 'the Solomon of his age.' Our king is heir to his virtues. There is something more recorded of Solomon; he fell to strange Counsels by strange women. And we cannot repose any confidence in the king, if he puts his counsel into 'strange women.' If they be left, God will bless his Counsels.

Sir Tho. Meres. There are but two ways, either to defend ourselves from France, or comply with him. When we are afraid of a man, we either get his good-will, or take away his power. There are but these two ways. He would fain let his good-will alone a year or two longer.

Lord Cavendish hears it called 'the king's Speech,' though he thinks it rather the product of ill counsel: 600,000*l.* is demanded to enter into and declare Alliances, because the king, by chance, may be engaged into a war. It is an ill precedent to charge the people, because the king may have a war; they may be so charged for the future. If the consequence of such Alliances must be a war, it is better now the French hands are full, and no danger of invasion, if the king makes those Alliances that we would now make. He hears 'great diffculty in making these Alliances; and 'not to be done without a great sum of money.' The parliament said, 'they will support alliances' and since we met, nothing has been done in pursuance of our Address, for stopping the growing Greatness of France. There is a great deal of Money asked; and how it may influence our counsels, he examines not; but he expected Alliances against we met. He moves now, 'That we may make Alliances with Holland and Spain.'

Mr. Sec. Williamson is glad to see us come towards some end. We have had many pauses. If the king's hands are not to be trusted with the Money, clear that. But that question carried, that is moved for, viz. 'An address to the king,' is but calling for another question, and is not to the point in question before you. If you distrust putting the Money into the hands of those who have so little satisfied you already; then it is proper to remove those who have had it in management, before you can go into any Alliance. It has been said, 'That there are some who would be as glad of a refusal, as of our giving money;' he would have no such reflections here. He knows no such persons. But hitherto this motion is an untrodden path; and he would not come by precipitation to that first, but have it well thought of first.

Sir Tho. Meres. Can it be imagined but that the question of Money will have a negative? therefore press it not.

Col. Birch. It has been said, 'We have had several pauses.' But he will set the cart on wheels, if he can, whilst he is here. But if 'there have been pauses,' it is because you find no Alliances made. Is any thing clearer, than that, if the king would but make the Alliances we desire, we would not only give that sum, but more? he would have us adjourn from 3 days to 3 days, till it be done; and he will move it. Chuse whether you will take his counsel, or not. Your safety depends upon this question, What to be done, and when? every gentleman says, 'he would have Alliances made against the king of France.' If ever, the time is now to declare. If gentlemen can show him that we are in inevitable danger, and cannot resist the king of France, then they say something. But, in six weeks time, he will find a way to raise a million of money, upon occasion of these Alliances. He thinks that nothing under heaven can hinder raising the Money, if these Alliances were entered into; and what can hinder the alliances? in short, there is no money to be had without alliances; and, till then, we have no security of our lives or religion. He is for ready money, and this may easily be done. Your extravagances will raise this money. He mistrusts not the king's ministers, and would have this great action wipe away their miscarriages. He hopes they will over-strive and over-do one another, as we shall do; and would appoint a committee, 'to draw up Reasons for an Alliance with Holland and Spain.'

Mr. Sawyer. As long as that door of France is open, our wealth will creep out at it, and their religion will come in. War and peace are in the king's breast; but he never found it successful but when with the concurrence of the parliament. The king has told you, 'That, till something be done to enable him to enter into Alliances, he cannot move farther than he has done already.' But he admits your advice. In the Palatinate war, in king James' time, the commons advice was not taken in time, and their hearts were dead, when afterwards their advice was called for. But he sees not why there should be a competition between the king and this house. Whilst we go on in preparing your money, Alliances may be preparing and finished. But he hears it said, 'This is a hardship put upon the king; the Hollanders and Spaniards will stand more upon terms, by our forwardness;' but you may be ready to alter your opinion, upon occasion. He would have the thing to be doing, whilst you are sitting, and would have them go hand in hand.

Sir Wm. Coventry. Our interest is to keep Holland fast to us, upon whom the danger is great, and our assistance from them may be great also. It is our good fortune that the house is not all of one opinion, so that truth may come better out by argument. Ernly said, 'our declaring to desire union will make Holland and France readier to agree.' But if any thing make them agree, the being tired out, and not seeing those, who are equally concerned, give them help, he is afraid, will make them agree. It may cause a despondency in them. If he was of the states of Holland, he could not find one word to say of safety for them, to continue the greatness of the king of France. 'We have tried the people of England,' they may justly say, 'but they do nothing.' But if they think themselves unable to help themselves, and persons concerned do it not, they must shift as well as they can. When the danger had not pressed them so near, and Flanders was a better bulwark to them than now, the consideration of this made De Wit, who loved not England, join with us against the greatness of France. Shall we think that the prince of Orange, at the head of their affairs, will have less success than De Wit had? and can we expect but that, if we give them help, considering all circumstances, France's progress in his conquests may be stopped? if we continue to neglect this, what can secure Holland? is it dangerous to provoke France, now Holland is his enemy? will it not be much more when they are both friends? France gave warrants for fishing to Holland, and that joined them. As for preparations, there need not six millions to keep the French out, by fortifications. He found Papers and Lists in Sir Robert Long's office, of Fleets and estimates, in the Scotch war, in the late king's time; it seemed to him, as if things were managed then on purpose to ruin that good king. He was advised to set out second rate ships against Scotland, and the king had got a good sum of money by the lord treasurer Juxon's means; some of it was spent on the Army, but much on a great Fleet: great ships to catch small Scotch vessels; lobsters to catch hares. If therefore we go about to stop France's progress by a war, 600,000*l.* would not make necessary preparations. In our mutual league with Holland, we wish them to bear the brunt. A provision of 40 ships of a side, he thinks, would keep France pretty well in order; and for these 40 ships being kept out a whole year, 600,000*l.* will do that whole year's business. There needs little charge in embassies; a good-will will do that cheap. He would clear that suspicion out of the way, of falling upon ministers; we know, there has been little effect of that. But he hopes, whether there be faults or errors (he knows none unless that to subvert our religion) the king has passed a general pardon, and he hopes every gentleman will give them oblivion in his own heart, if they will redeem what is past, by their good department in this great business.

Mr. Vaughan has heard, that the lords of the council have sent to the body of the City to borrow Money.

Sir Nick. Carew. It is said, that the lord mayor and the city would not lend the king any money, because they could not do it upon a security that was already another's; for the Excise was anticipated, and farmed out.

Sir Tho. Clarges. As for Money borrowed of the city, the aldermen say, that it is the usual and ordinary way to be done by the common-council, and not by 20 particular men, (the aldermen;) but he believes there is no anticipation upon the additional duty of excise; for nobody would take tallies of anticipation upon a security not yet begun.

After further debate, it was resolved, 1. "That an humble Address be made to the king, that his majesty would be pleased to enter into a League, offensive and defensive, with the States General of the United Provinces; and to make such other Alliances with such other of the Confederates as his majesty shall think fit, against the Growth and Power of the French king, and for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands." [To which there was not a negative but Mr. Secretary Williamson.] 2. "That a Committee be appointed to draw up the Address, with Reasons why this house cannot comply with his majesty's Speech, until such Alliances be entered into; and farther showing the necessity of the speedy making of such Alliances; and when such Alliances are made, giving his majesty assurances of speedy and cheerful Supplies, from time to time, for the supporting and maintaining those Alliances."

The Commons' Address to the King, declining a further Supply till his Majesty's Alliances are made known. May 25. Sir John Trevor reported the said Address, which was read as follows:

"May it please your most excellent majesty;

Your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons, in parliament assembled, having taken into their serious consideration your majesty's most gracious Speech, do beseech your maj. to believe it is a great affliction to them, to find themselves obliged, at present, to decline the granting your majesty the Supply that your maj. is pleased to demand; conceiving it is not agreeable to the usage of parliament, to grant Supplies for the maintenance of Wars and Alliances, before they are signified in parliament; which the two wars against the States of the United Provinces, since your majesty's happy Restoration, and the League made with them in Jan. 1668, for Preservation of the Spanish Netherlands, sufficiently prove, without troubling your maj. with instances of greater antiquity. From which usage if we should depart, the precedent might be of dangerous consequence in future times; though your majesty's goodness gives us great security during your majesty's reign; which we beseech God long to continue.—This consideration prompted us, in our last Address to your maj. before our late recess, humbly to intention to your maj. our hopes, that, before our meeting again, your majesty's Alliances might be so fixed, as that your maj. might be graciously pleased to impart them to us in parliament; that so our earnest desires of supplying your maj. for prosecuting those great ends we had humbly laid before your majesty, might meet with no impediment or obstruction; being highly sensible of the necessity of supporting as well as making the Alliances humbly desired in our former Addresses; and which we still conceive so important to the safety of your maj. and your kingdoms, that we cannot, without unfaithfulness to your majesty, and those we represent, omit, upon all occasions, humbly to beseech your majesty, as we now do, to enter into a League, offensive and defensive, with the States General of the United Provinces, against the Growth and Power of the French king, and for the Preservation of the Spanish Netherlands; and to make such other Alliances with such other of the Confederates as your maj. shall think fit and useful to that end. In doing which, that no time may be lost; we humbly offer to your majesty these Reasons for the expediting it: 1. That, if the entering into such Alliances should draw on a War with the French king, it would be least detrimental to your majesty's subjects at this time of the year; they having, now, fewest effects within the dominions of the French king. 2. That though we have great reason to believe the power of the French king to be dangerous to your maj. and your kingdoms, when he shall be at more leisure to molest us; yet, we conceive, the many enemies he hath to deal with at present, together with the situation of your maj.'s kingdoms, the unanimity of your people in this cause, the care your maj. hath been pleased to take of your ordinary Guard for the Sea; together with the credit provided by the late Act, entitled 'An Act for an additional Excise for three years, make the entering into and declaring Alliances very safe; until we may, in a regular way, give your maj. such farther Supplies, as may enable your maj. to support your Alliances, and defend your kingdoms. 3. Because of the great danger and charge which must of necessity fall upon your majesty's kingdoms, if through want of that timely encouragement and assistance (which your majesty's joining with the States of the United Provinces, and other the Confederates, would give them) the said states, or any other considerable part of the Confederates, should this next winter, or sooner, make a peace or truce with the French king (the prevention whereof hitherto must be acknowledged to be a singular effect of God's goodness to us;) which if it should happen, your maj. must afterwards be necessitated with fewer, perhaps with no alliances or assistances, to withstand the power of the French king, which hath so long and so successfully contended with so many and potent adversaries; and, whilst he continues his over-balancing greatness, must always be dangerous to his neighbours, since he would be able to oppress any one confederate before the rest could get together and be in so good a posture of opposing him as they now are, being jointly engaged in a war. And if he should be so successful as to make a peace, or disunite the present confederation against him, it is much to be feared whether it would be possible ever to re-unite it; at least, it would be a work of so much time and difficulty, as would leave your majesty's kingdoms exposed to much misery and danger.—Having thus discharged our duty, in laying before your maj. the dangers threatening your majesty, and your kingdoms, and the only remedy we can think of for preventing it, and securing and quieting the minds of your majesty's people, with some few of those Reasons which have moved us to this, and our former Addresses, on this subject; we most humbly beseech your maj. to take this matter into your most serious consideration; and to take such resolutions, as may not leave it in the power of any neighbouring prince to rob your people of that happiness which they enjoy under your majesty's gracious government; beseeching your maj. to rest confident and assured, that, when your maj. shall be pleased to declare such Alliances in parliament, we shall hold ourselves obliged, not only by our promises and assurances given, and now with great unanimity renewed in a full house, but by the zeal and desires of those whom we represent, and by the interest of all our safeties, most cheerfully to give your maj. from time to time such speedy supplies and assistances, as may fully and plentifully answer the occasions; and, by God's blessing, preserve your majesty's honour, and the safety of your people. All which is most humbly submitted to your majesty's great wisdom.

Debate on the Address.] Mr. Sec. Coventry.
This Address is to the king, to stop the great and over-balancing power of the French king, &c. He hopes it will not be interpreted ill-will to this Address, when the means desired may attain your end. The king has returned you an Answer, declaring consent to the substance of the thing you desire, 'but cannot speak nor act a step farther till you enable him.' This is the main question upon which the whole depends. Unless you come to the king, or the king to you, the danger that you apprehend may remain, and the people lose their remedy against their fears and apprehensions of the power of the king of France. Enquire what the reason is, why we should persuade the king to desert: he finds but one; it is, you will grant no Money till Alliances be declared. He asks then, whether, you have not given 200,000*l.* upon the Excise, towards this Alliance? And he thinks this a precedent; and that is the only argument; which does destroy itself. The king is furnished with another argument, if by way of precedent—'To tell the king the manner of his Alliances, offensive and defensive, &c.' The king may tell you, 'there was never such a precedent, as to tell the king terms of Leagues, offensive and defensive.' Very little is wanting, but sending the king a Treaty ready-made; the king made the Triple Alliance, not from any motion of this house; it was his own. This is another thing, you tell the king, 'Whether he be in a condition or not, you will have him do it.' He knows it may be answered from the nature of the writ of summons of parliament; but that is 'ad consulendum et deliberandum de quibusdam arduis regni negotiis,' not 'omnibus, &c.' The nation is concerned in this; but when formerly the house of commons desired queen Eliz. to marry, you know what she said; 'If you name the person whom I am to marry, it is unsufferable.' But, in your case, to nominate terms to the king, he thinks not proper for you. Does any man think that the king will go about to make Alliances against the growth and over-balancing power of France, and leave out Holland? It cannot be imagined. Consider another thing in this Address, in point of decorum; he has all the apprehensions of the greatness of France that you have, to the utmost, but you come and declare the house of Austria averse to a peace; but they never yet published it at Nineguen. What kind of figure will you have of your sovereign, who sends to mediate, and has the secret depositions of all princes, and you put him upon this overt declaration, 'For preservation of Flanders from the king of France, &c?' The king, and all the world, cannot but understand your meaning, and it is needless to particularize either. He would have you therefore comply with the king, or give him stronger Reasons why you will not.

Sir John Birkenhead. Here are precedents in this Address, that he never saw before; he would have the points of it read, one by one.—Several called out, 'Agree! agree!'

Sir Ch. Wheeler. We are called upon, he hears, 'to agree,' but would be sorry, without some farther consideration, to agree. The paper reported, has three parts, 1. The Address, &c. 2. The Reasons why we cannot comply with the king, &c. 3. Assurances of Supply, if the king will make Alliances, &c. The Reasons which are short, he expected longer, for they are no more than what we gave before; they ought to arise from the debate of Wednesday. Few were given in the last debate, and he expected some more at the private committee. Of that kind, there is one short one: 'A precedent of the Palatinate war.' Those of late time, not troubled with ancient. 'That of the Dutch war formerly.' He would have it derived from history, ancient and prophane, how the people can be entitled to the consideration of war and peace: it never belonged to the commons of England. When the king engages us in a war, he knows how we are to pray and petition, but this Address seems to extend farther than our province extends to. By this Address, the war is declared. Perhaps you may come into a war, and then he shall declare himself farther; but he is not for an Alliance with the Dutchmen. We are the greatest people at arms in the world, and we must trust all to the conduct of a Dutch army! He looks for popular arguments: we have soundly paid for a Dutch war. As to the last point of 'Assurances of Supply, &c.' he takes that to be the short of what we have said already. We say, 'We will do it liberally and largely.' But what is that? Some gentlemen say, 'some privateers and a squadron of ships for the present;' and some are of another opinion. But this Address, as it is penned, is not large enough, or else we take the conduct of the war upon us, from the beginning to the end.—There was a great cry, 'Agree! agree!'

Mr. Sec. Williamson says, he 'agrees' as far in the end of the Address as any gentleman does, but he fears that the success will show, that this way will not do it. He cannot but think this a new thing, and that it will be far from acknowledging the king's condescension; and that we encroach upon his prerogative. Let men be ever so hasty, yet if this Paper-Address must go to the king, he yet thinks some parts of it must be mended. The king tells you, 'He must have preparatives;' and you must show precedents why preparations have not been granted, before particular Alliances have been declared. Why must Alliances, offensive and defensive, be the matter of the Address? The people cannot consider it; that is proper only for the royal breast. 'Defensive' consideration is more proper for the people. He never knew an 'offensive' league declared here before. You are told, 'That the parliament advised the Palatinate War.' There is nothing too great for this house, but he never knew any thing done of this nature, but the house was first called up to it. They were called to consult of the Palatinate war, and of the late Dutch war. If there be no precedent of it, and if but one, he begs of gentlemen to consider what reception this Address will have, though from the best and kindest of princes, from such a house of commons. You desire freedom of speech and privilege of parliament. The king has but few prerogatives, as coining money, and making peace and war, and they are as land marks, and are known; they are but few, and a curse is upon him that removes them. You are told of the Alliances that saved Holland, &c. He will not compare those with the fears upon you at present; but in queen Eliz.'s time, before she could be brought to a league offensive and defensive with them, we had two cautionary towns, and a fort, put into our hands. You, by this hasty Address, are cut off from all hopes of any such caution from them. He has acquitted himself, as his allegiance and duty to this house obliges him, and he knows not what to advise you. But would have Reasons as strong in the thing as may be, before you go to the king with this Address.

Mr. Neale is for these Alliances, and therefore would not put the king upon hardships: he would know whether this is not an intrenchment upon the king's prerogative, to advise him where to make leagues offensive and defensive.—There was another great cry, 'Agree, agree.'

Sir Jonathan Trelawney. To cry 'agree, agree,' savours to him like Club-Law. You will never offer at precedents that the worst of times did never attempt.

Sir Tho. Meres. What has been said comes not home to this Address. When there is occasion, he shall answer those points alleged, 'of the unprecedentness of it.' But as for 'naming the States of the United Provinces,' in this Address, it was the Vote of the house, spoken to seventeen times, and but few negatives to it, and he wonders that it should be called 'Club-Law.'

Sir John Ernly agrees to the end of the Address, but he cannot fully to the means. He must put you in mind, that it does so clash with the prerogative of the crown, that he cannot agree to it. If he thinks there is no more difference than the word 'Holland,' and saying only 'such Alliances against France,' he hopes the king will agree to it. If the people desired a parliament, if they asked a day and place for its meeting, he believes it would not be granted. Refers it to your consideration, if the thing be asked in a way not fit to be granted, whether it is not probable it will be denied. It is directing the crown to make this league.

Sir Rob. Carr would not have any intrenching on the king's prerogative, in this Address. He would leave out 'a league with Holland, offensive and defensive.' Those words may give offence; and he would not give his Vote to that which may retard the thing, and would have it so amended as to be acceptable to the king.

Sir Tho. Lee. To the Orders of the house.

He appeals whether ever, when any committee was ordered expressly to bring in a thing, that thing, being voted to be part of the Address, shall again be put to the question?

The Speaker. You read a Bill thrice, and nothing is brought into the committee, but must be debated again.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The good intention and necessity of this Address will carry so much weight with it, that he hopes it will have acceptance from the king. The committee you appointed to draw it had not done their duty, if they had not gone according to the sense of the house. We have made many and many Addresses to the king, and there has been some reason for it: because we have not been rightly understood. There seemed to be general moderation, moved by some gentlemen in the Address, without naming particular Alliances; but that being not acceptable to the house, this is made more particular, to clear our meaning. A reason was given why we should supply the king, without naming Alliances, that we urge not usually in parliament; our own act was quoted against our affirmation, viz. 'The credit we gave the king upon the Excise, at our last meeting, before Alliances were spoken of.' But yet there is no precedent spoken of, when Money has been given for a war or alliances before they have been declared in parliament. It has been the constant usage of the crown to signify it in parliament, which gave such confidence in the commons, that it never doubted of the commons supply. He then read a passage of the king's Speech formerly about the Triple Alliance, viz. 'The Fleet had began something, but if not speedily supported by Alliances, he should want means to go on;' which shows that the constant method of parliament is, that Alliances have always been declared in parliament, and then Supply has been granted to support those Alliances. There was more said then for the first Dutch war; the second was signified in parliament, and owned by them so far, that they gave Money to maintain it. If methods of parliament be an obstacle to this Address, he thinks that is cleared. He would be 'fortiter in re, et suaviter in modo,' and he thinks the Address is so, and would agree to it.

Sir Rd. Temple. This of pressing the king to declare Alliances, and advising them by parliament, is no rule of parliament, and a dangerous precedent. He agrees to move the king 'To make farther Alliances;' and then you will have attained your end. It is not for the interest of the nation, for the king to name Alliances, which will give them opportunity to ask higher terms.

Col. Birch thinks the Paper is penned with as much modesty and duty as can be. If there be other Reasons to make the Alliances more particular, he would have them forboren. Our main business is, that the Religion and the interest of the nation be supported.

Mr. Sachsewell. The question is now, Whether we shall again put these Alliances into the same hands, to keep you off from such Alliances as you address for; and whether the king shall be advised by his privy council, and not by parliament. You give him advice, and submit it to him; and the privy council daily practise the contrary. It is said, 'That this is a breach of the king's prerogative.' We move him to a League with Holland, &c. and it is no breach at all of his prerogative, it seems, in the Council, to move him to a war. Our whole security depends upon a League with Holland against France, without whom we are never able to contend with him. All Counsel tends to make Alliances. And you are left wholly single to contend against that powerful prince.

Mr. Sec. Coventry is not afraid of any counsel he has ever given the king; as a privy counsellor he has taken his oath, and as a parliament-man, he has his opinion; and he is of opinion, that the king is not obliged to follow either his privy council, or parliament, if his opinion and reason be against it. Hen. iv. sent to his parliament for their advice concerning peace and war: they referred it to the king, and his council, and declared, 'They had nothing to do with it.' He hopes you will not do a thing to prejudice the thing you intend to do. He may probably be let into this prince's door when he scrapes,* but not when he knocks. Perhaps he shall be kept out. To deal in the rougher way with our prince is not the means to make him incline to your opinion. If any man is persuaded that he is wanting in his duty, if he name not 'Holland' in the Address, then it cannot be left out. The general way is more regular and decent, and he moves to leave out 'Holland.'

Sir Tho. Lee. If there be irregularity or indecency in this expression of 'Holland,' he is far from its being in the Address. But this is far from 'a knock at the Prince's door,' and cannot be gathered from the expressions in the Address. It is but advice and persuasion only. It is hard that the house shall not declare their opinion. The first occasion, perhaps, to get out of our misery, is to know how we came into it. The first step to it was our conjunction with France, against Holland; the first step we got out of it by was to make a separate Peace with Holland; but we find that the bare going out of it had not the effect we desired. What next? Is it not reasonable, that, if we still had kept that Alliance, we had suppressed Holland totally? Is it not the same thing now? Perhaps some greater advice is requisite. If it be a single question, he knows not what the consequences may be, in leaving it out, now it is put in. It is but plainly and barely showing your opinion, that you are not safe without an universal agreement with the Confederates. Flanders could not be preserved by a defensive Alliance in the Triple League, and therefore it is dangerous to leave 'Holland' out.

* The custom of the Court.

Lord Cavendish. There is the greatest mischief that can be, for Holland to make a separate peace with France. The danger is not great with Spain, therefore to prevent that, we specify an Alliance with Holland.

Mr. Powle. The sum of the debate is leaving Holland out of the Address. Though he did not expect to meet with this opposition, yet, upon recollection, he can show precedents wherein the king has been advised to particular Alliances. In the 18th of k. James, the parliament advised him to break the Match with Spain, and to make a war, and they then advised stricter Alliances with the States of Holland. In E. iii, R. ii, H. v, the parliament advised to make a League with the emperor, and it was signed and ratified in parliament. He will not wave these precedents, but he speaks these a little timorously, having not lately perused them. As for the argument of 'these Addresses being against the prerogative,' kings have always laboured to invite this house to peace and war, because their judgment did import Supply, and they could not excuse giving money to support it, where they had advised it. Our necessity of affairs brought us once to another course, but if there were new precedents, new dangers must create new precedents, and a new way. But let any man show him a precedent, that we ever assisted a neighbour too potent for us already. Would have a precedent shown him, where, after a representation in parliament of the greatness of the French king, still sending men to his assistance has been continued, and they were not ill received at court, when they returned home. He knows not what reason we have to leave Holland out of the Address, unless we have no intention to have Alliance with them at all. It is for the crown's advantage, and this is far from intrenching upon the prerogative. Carew told you, 'There were more reasons for this Address than were expressed;' and they were, why should we not trust the king? It is not fit to give them; but if they be pressed too much, he must give them. Though he will not say, 'We are not to trust the king,' yet he will say, 'We are not to trust counsellors.'

Mr. Williams. When the king and council shall see the opinion of the house for an Alliance with Holland, he believes it will remove counsellors, or stop the mouths of them.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. King James called for an opinion, in his Speech, from the house. He invited them to it, and the lords, that opened that parliament, said, 'The Temple of Janus must be opened, which has been long shut.' If that be the case, he has reason to doubt that the obstacle in the manner may hinder the matter of the Address. The king asked your advice in the separate peace with Holland mentioned, but that is not the case. You are told, 'We would have it, because general Alliances may do no good, and not produce change of counsellors.' But what effect, do you think, this will have, when such exceptions are taken at it, as are likely to frustrate the end? Do you mean to treat so as not to leave your prince any latitude, but that he must grant, or not grant?

Mr. Harbord would ask a question: Is there no danger of our religion and property, but from France? And then when France is in peace, this startles him, that these Alliances may not be pursued. England is not safe, but by Alliance with Holland. Suppose there should be peace, the government of Flanders cannot support itself. To suppose the Spanish Netherlands, and Lorrain restored; Brisac destroyed; Alsace and Maestrich restored; would you then be safe? No more than now; because the French hands are full hands, and money makes power. The French hath both. But suppose all these places lost by the French, yet they abstract one million sterling from us yearly, in trade, and he will govern your councils every where. There is nothing to keep him from hence, but making him poor, and who can help you to do it, but the dutch? Make a law to prohibit French trade; you need no wine, and few of his commodities; and France will grow poor, and we shall grow rich, and if you send no forces into France, and support Holland, the first hour you do this, your money will increase; and then we can put the king at ease, and pay his debts; and never till then.

Mr. Mallet. When the king is here, he is in his imperial seat; but when in his other council, he is in his ministerial.

On a division, 182 were for the Address, and 142 against it. About forty or fifty members were in the Speaker's chamber, and Court of Requests, &c. who gave no voices at all. The Question was, for leaving out the words 'offensive and defensive, with the States of the United Provinces.'

Ordered, That the Secretaries of State, and Privy Counsellors of the house, be desired to know his majesty's pleasure, when he will be pleased to be attended with the Address.

May 26. His majesty appointed the house to attend him with their Address, at 3 in the afternoon, and the house being acquainted with the king's commands, they only passed the Bill for recalling his majesty's subjects out of the French king's Service, and ordered it to be carried up to the lords, with an express Order to their messengers to put the lords in mind of their Bill of Popery, which lay before their lordships. And so adjourned presently after ten o'clock till two in the afternoon, and then met and attended the king in the Banqueting House with their Address. To which his majesty, after hearing it read by the Speaker, said, "That the contents of it were long, and the matter of importance; and that he would take it into his consideration, and, with all convenient speed, return an Answer to it."

The King's Answer to the Address. May 28. The house being met, the Speaker acquainted them with what the king had said to them, upon their Address, on Saturday; and immediately Mr. Secretary Coventry told the Speaker, That the king commanded the house to attend him presently in the Banqueting House at Whitehall. Upon which the house went accordingly.

Some members rising from their seats, and going to the door, before the Speaker had reported the king's command, viz. Mr. John Grey, member for Leicester, and sir Wm. Blacket, member for Newcastle upon Tyne, the Speaker reprimanded them in this manner: "The burgesses of Newcastle and Leicester are in great haste to be gone, before the king's Message is reported, as if they went to get places at a show, or a play."*

The King spoke as follows. "Gentlemen; Could I have been silent, I would rather have chosen to be so, than to call to mind things so unfit for you to meddle with, as are contained in some part of your Address; wherein you have entrenched upon so undoubted a right of the crown, that I am confident it will appear in no age (when the sword was not drawn) that the prerogative of making peace and war hath been so dangerously invaded. You do not content yourselves with desiring me to enter into such Leagues, as may be for the safety of the kingdom, but you tell me what sort of Leagues they must be, and with whom: and, as your Address is worded, it is more liable to be understood to be by your leave, than your request, that I should make such other Alliances as I please with other of the Confederates.—Should I suffer this fundamental power of making peace and war to be so far invaded (though but once) as to have the manner and circumstances of Leagues prescribed to me by parliament, it is plain, that no prince, or state, would any longer believe, that the sovereignty of England rests in the crown; nor could I think myself to signify any more to foreign princes than the empty sound of a king. Wherefore you may rest assured, that no condition shall make me depart from, or lessen, so essential a part of the monarchy: and I am willing to believe so well of this house of commons, that I am confident these ill consequences are not intended by you.—These are, in short, the reasons why I can by no means approve of your Address. And yet, though you have declined to grant me that Supply, which is so necessary to the ends of it, I do again declare to you, that, as I have done all that lay in my power, since your last meeting, so I will still apply myself, by all means I can, to let the world see my care both for the security and satisfaction of my people; although it may not be with those advantages to them, which, by your assistance, I might have procured.—† I would have you return to your house, and I require that you immediately adjourn to the 16th of July next; but I do not intend you shall sit till winter, unless there should happen any

* Grey.

† This last paragraph is not in the Speech, as inserted in the Journal, but only 'his majesty's pleasure for adjournment was afterwards signified by the Speaker.'

urgent occasions, in which case you shall have notice by proclamation."

The Parliament adjourned.] The commons then returned to their own house, where the Speaker reported the King's Speech as above.

Mr. Powle standing up to speak, the Speaker interrupted him, and said, 'I must hear no man speak, uow the king's pleasure of adjourning the house is signified.'

Sir Tho. Lee. The act of adjourning the house cannot be yours, Mr. Speaker, but the act of the house; and no question can be put, when a gentleman stands up to speak. Pray, let us keep methods, however.

The Speaker. When there is a command from the crown to adjourn, we are not to dispute about it, but to obey, and adjourn. After a command of this kind, there remains nothing for you to do but to execute it. Unless any man can show me a precedent to the contrary, you will put a hardship upon me to do otherwise.

And so the Speaker adjourned the house to the 16th of July next, without naming place, or hour, and suddenly sprung out of the chair. Many called him again to the Chair, some cried 'stop the Mace upon the table.' Others would have put him again into the chair, or some body else. But the Speaker was soon surrounded by several of his party, and the Mace secured, and he went away with it before him, but not without reproachful speeches; as bidding him 'remember Lord Finch's case, of the like nature.'—And That he should be called to an account for it*. Upon the in-

* "The members returned to the house, several of them rose up probably to express their sense of this cavalier treatment, but were overborne by the Speaker, who took upon him to play the dictator too, by insisting vehemently, that, after the king had required the house to adjourn, there was no more liberty of speech: this being, however, contested, and those who had stood up, demanding still to be heard, the Speaker had the confidence, without any question put, and of his own motion, to pronounce the house adjourned; and therewithal stepped down on the middle of the floor, leaving the members astonished at so flagrant a violation of their inherent privileges." Marvell.

"They had also the additional mortification to see this chiding Speech of the king's made public in the Gazette † of the next day, being the first which had ever appeared in that paper, to point them out, both to their own, and all other nations, as refractory, disobedient subjects, who had lost all respect to majesty: care being at the same time taken to suppress even the written copies of the proceedings of the house, that nothing might appear in their justification." Ralph.

† Upon this occasion, Marvell adds: "Thus were they well rewarded for their itch of perpetual sitting and of acting; the parliament being grown to that height of contempt, as to be gazetted among run-away-servants, lap-dogs, strayed horses, and highway-robbers."

stant of the Speaker's going out of the Chair, lord Cavendish proffered to show some precedents of debates after the king's signification of Adjournment; as at that meeting soon after Chatham business, when an Address was voted to the king for disbanding the new raised forces.*

The Parliament adjourned a second time.] July 16. The parliament met in pursuance of the late adjournment, and were again adjourned by the king's command, till the 3rd of December; though some of them seemed dissatisfied with the manner of this, as much as they were with the late adjournment. In particular,

Lord Cavendish moved, that the house might see the Journal by what order, and in what method, they were adjourned last.

Mr. Williams seconded the motion.

But some cried out 'Adjourn, Adjourn,' others called for the question. But the Speaker told them, 'That he had received Orders from the king, by Mr. Secretary Coventry, to adjourn the house till the 3rd of Dec.' and pronounced the house adjourned accordingly.

Principal Occurrences during the Recess—
Marriage of the Prince of Orange with the lady Mary—Plan of Peace—Negotiations.]
"It is certain," says Mr. Hume, "that this was the critical moment, when the king both might with ease have preserved the balance of power in Europe, which it has since cost this island great expence of blood and treasure to restore, and might by perseverance have at last regained, in some tolerable measure, after all past errors, the confidence of his people. This opportunity being neglected, the wound became incurable; and notwithstanding his momentary appearances of vigour against France and popery, and their momentary inclinations to rely on his faith; he was still believed to be at bottom engaged in the same interests, and they soon elapsed into distrust and jealousy. The secret memoirs of this reign, which have since been published, prove beyond a doubt, that the king had at this time concerted measures with France, and had no intention to enter into a war in favour of the allies. He had entertained no view, therefore, even when he pawned his 'royal word' to his people, than to procure a grant of money; and he trusted, that, while he eluded their expectations, he could not afterwards want pretences for palliating his conduct.—Negotiations meanwhile were carried on between France and Holland, and an eventual treaty was concluded; that is, all their differences were adjusted, provided they could afterwards satisfy their allies on both sides. This work, though in appearance difficult, seemed to be extremely forwarded, by farther bad successes on the part of the confederates, and by the great impatience of the Hollanders; when a new event happened, which promised a more prosperous issue to the quarrel with France, and revived the hopes of all the English, who understood the interests of their country.—The king saw, with regret, the violent discontents which prevailed in the nation, and which seemed every day to augment upon him. Desirous by his natural temper to be easy himself, and to make every body else easy, he sought expedients to appease those murmurs, which, as they were very disagreeable for the present, might in their consequences prove extremely dangerous. He knew that, during the late war with Holland, the malcontents at home had made applications to the prince of Orange; and if he continued still to neglect the prince's interests, and to thwart the inclinations of his own people, he apprehended lest their common complaints should cement a lasting union between them. He saw that the religion of the duke inspired the nation with dismal apprehensions; and though he had obliged his brother to allow the young princesses to be educated in the protestant faith, something farther, he thought, was necessary, in order to satisfy the nation. He entertained, therefore, proposals for marrying the prince of Orange to the lady Mary, the elder princess, and heir apparent to the crown (for the duke had no male issue), and he hoped, by so tempting an offer, to engage him entirely in his interests. A peace he proposed to make; such as would satisfy France, and still preserve his connections with that crown: and he intended to sanctify it by the approbation of the prince, whom he found to be extremely revered in England, and respected throughout Europe. All the reasons for this alliance were seconded by the solicitations of Danby, and also of Temple, who was at that time in England: and Charles at last granted permission to the prince, when the campaign should be over, to pay him a visit.—The king very graciously received his nephew at Newmarket. He would have entered immediately upon business; but the prince desired first to be acquainted with the lady Mary: and he declared, that, contrary to the usual sentiments of persons of his rank, he placed a great part of happiness in domestic satisfaction, and would not, upon any consideration of interest or politics, match himself with a person disagreeable to him. He was introduced to the princess, whom he found in the bloom of youth, and extremely amiable both in her person and her behaviour. The king now thought that he had a double tie upon him, and might safely expect his compliance with every proposal: he was surprised to find the prince decline all discourse of business, and refuse to concert any terms for the general peace, till his marriage should be finished. He foresaw, he said, from the situation of affairs, that his allies were likely to have hard terms; and he never would expose himself to the reproach of having sacrificed their interests to promote his own purposes. Charles still believed, notwithstanding the cold, severe manner of the prince, that he would abate of this rigid punctilio of honour; and he protracted

the time, hoping, by his own insinuation and address, as well as by the allurements of love and ambition, to win him to compliance. One day, Temple found the prince in very bad humour, repenting that he had ever come to England, and resolute in a few days to leave it: but before he went, the king, he said, must chuse the terms on which they should hereafter live together: he was sure it must be like the greatest friends or the greatest enemies: and he desired Temple to inform his master next morning of these intentions. Charles was struck with this menace, and foresaw how the prince's departure would be interpreted by the people. He resolved, therefore, immediately to yield with a good grace; and having paid a compliment to his nephew's honesty, he told Temple, that the marriage was concluded, and desired him to inform the duke of it, as of an affair already resolved on. The duke seemed surprised; but yielded a prompt obedience: which, he said, was his constant maxim to whatever he found to be the king's pleasure. (23d Oct.) No measure, during this reign, gave such general satisfaction. All parties strove who should most applaud it. And even Arlington, who had been kept out of the secret, told the prince, 'That some things, good in themselves, were spoiled by the manner of doing them, as some things bad were mended by it; but he would confess, that this was a thing so good in itself, that the manner of doing it could not spoil it.'—This marriage was a great surprise to Lewis, who, accustomed to govern every thing in the English court, now found so important a step taken, not only without his consent, but without his knowledge or participation. A conjunction of England with the allies, and a vigorous war in opposition to French ambition, were the consequences immediately expected, both abroad and at home: but to check these sanguine hopes, the king, a few days after the marriage, prolonged the adjournment of the parliament from the third of December to the fourth of April. This term was too late for granting supplies, or making preparations for war; and could be chosen by the king for no other reason, than as an argument to France for his consent to the marriage. It appears also, that Charles secretly received from Lewis the sum of 2,000,000 of livres on account of this important service.—The king, however, entered into consultations with the prince, together with Danby and Temple, concerning the terms which it would be proper to require of France. After some debate, it was agreed, that France should restore Lorraine to the duke; with Tournay, Valenciennes, Condé, Aeth, Charleroi, Courtray, Oudenarde, and Binche, to Spain, in order to form a good frontier for the Low Countries. The prince insisted Franche-comté should likewise be restored; and Charles thought, that, because he had patrimonial estates of great value in that province, and deemed his property more secure in the hands of Spain, he was engaged by such views to be obstinate in that point: but the prince declared, that to procure but one good town to the Spaniards in Flanders, he would willingly relinquish all those possessions. As the king still insisted on the impossibility of wresting Franche-comté from Lewis, the prince was obliged to acquiesce.—Notwithstanding this concession to France, the projected peace was favourable to the allies; and it was a sufficient indication of vigour in the king, that he had given his assent to it. He further agreed to send over a minister instantly to Paris, in order to propose these terms. This minister was to enter into no treaty: he was to allow but two days for the acceptance or refusal of the terms: upon the expiration of these, he was presently to return: and in case of refusal, the king promised to enter immediately into the confederacy. To carry so imperious a message, and so little expected from the English court, Temple was the person pitched on, whose declared aversion to the French interest was not likely to make him fail of vigour and promptitude in the execution of his commission.—But Charles next day felt a relenting in this assumed vigour. Instead of Temple he dispatched the earl of Feversham, a creature of the duke's and a Frenchman by birth: and he said, that the message being harsh in itself, it was needless to aggravate it by a disagreeable messenger. The prince left London; and the king, at his departure, assured him that he never would abate in the least point of the scheme concerted, and would enter into war with Lewis, if he rejected it.—Lewis received the message with seeming gentleness and complacency. He told Feversham, that the king of England well knew that he might always be master of the peace; but some of the towns in Flanders it seemed very hard to demand, especially Tournay, upon whose fortifications such immense sums had been expended: he would therefore take some short time to consider of an answer. Feversham said, that he was limited to two days stay: but when that time was elapsed, he was prevailed on to remain some few days longer; and he came away at last without any positive answer. Lewis said, that he hoped his brother would not break with him for one or two towns; and with regard to them too, he would send orders to his ambassador at London to treat with the king himself. Charles was softened by the softness of France; and the blow was thus artfully eluded. The French ambassador, Barillon, owned at last, that he had orders to yield all except Tournay, and even to treat about some equivalent for that fortress, if the king absolutely insisted upon it. The prince was gone, who had given spirit to the English court; and the negotiation began to draw out into messages and returns from Paris.—By intervals, however, the king could rouse himself, and show still some firmness and resolution. Finding that affairs were not likely to come to any conclusion with France, he summoned, notwithstanding the long adjournment, the parliament on the 15th of Jan.

an unusual measure, and capable of giving alarm to the French court. Temple was sent for to the council, and the king told him, that he intended he should go to Holland, in order to form a treaty of alliance with the States; and that the purpose of it should be, like the triple league, to force both France and Spain to accept of the terms proposed. Temple was sorry to find this act of vigour qualified by such a regard to France, and by such an appearance of indifference and neutrality between the parties. He told the king, that the resolution agreed on, was to begin the war in conjunction with all the confederates, in case of no direct and immediate answer from France; that this measure would satisfy the prince, the allies, and the people of England; advantages which could not be expected from such an alliance with Holland alone; that France would be disobliged, and Spain likewise; nor would the Dutch be satisfied with such a faint imitation of the triple league, a measure concerted when they were equally at peace with both parties. For these reasons, Temple declined the employment; and Lawrence Hyde, second son of chancellor Clarendon, was sent in his place.—(1678.) The prince of Orange could not regard without contempt such symptoms of weakness and vigour conjoined in the English counsels. He was resolved, however, to make the best of a measure which he did not approve; and as Spain secretly consented that her ally should form a league, which was seemingly directed against her as well as France, but which was to fall only on the latter, the States concluded the treaty in the terms proposed by the king.*

Dec. 3. The house met, when Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered the following Message from his majesty, which was read by the Speaker:

“C. R. His majesty, having giving notice by his Proclamation, that he intended the houses should be adjourned till the 4th of April,* hath

* “Before the meeting appointed for the 3d of Dec. his majesty’s Proclamation was issued, signifying ‘that he expected not the members attendance, but that those of them about town should adjourn themselves till the 4th of April, 1678.’ These words, ‘that the house may adjourn themselves’ were very well received by those of the commons who imagined themselves thereby restored to their right, after Mr. Speaker Seymour’s invasion: when, in reversal of this, (he probably desiring to retain a jurisdiction that he had twice usurped, and to add this flower to the crown, of his own planting) Mr. Secretary Coventry delivered a written Message from his majesty, on the 3d of Dec. of a contrary effect, though not of the same validity with the Proclamation, viz. ‘That the houses should be adjourned only to the 15th of Jan. 1677;’ which as soon as read, Mr. Seymour would not give leave to a worthy member, offering, to speak; but abruptly, now the third time, of his own authority, adjourned them without putting the question; though sir John now, for weighty considerations, thought fit to meet with both houses sooner; and therefore his pleasure is, that this house be adjourned to the 15th day of Jan. next.”—The house adjourned accordingly.

Jan. 15. 1677-8. The house being met, his majesty sent the following Message by Mr. Secretary Coventry, which was read by the Speaker:

“C. R. His majesty hath matters of very great importance to communicate to both houses, in order to the satisfaction of their late Addresses, for the preservation of Flanders. But it so happening that matters are not yet so ripe, as within a few days they will be, therefore his majesty’s pleasure is, that this house be immediately adjourned till Monday, the 28th of this instant January.”*

Several members proffered to speak, but the Speaker would not suffer them, but adjourned the house.

The King’s Speech to both Houses.] Jan. 28. This day his majesty came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons, made this remarkable Speech:

“My lords and gentlemen; When we parted last, I told you, that before we met again, I would do that which should be to your satisfaction: I have accordingly made such Alliances with Holland, as are for the preservation of Flanders; and which cannot fail of that end, unless prevented either by the want of due Finch, for once doing so, (3 Ch.) was accused of high treason. This only can be said perhaps in his excuse, That whereas that in 3 Ch. was a parliament legally constituted, Mr. Seymour did here do as a sheriff that disperses a riotous assembly. In this manner they were kicked from adjournment to adjournment, as from one stair down to another; and when they were at the bottom, kicked up again, having no mind yet to go out of doors.” Marvell.

* One reason for this adjournment was, to know if the Spaniards would comply with a demand that the king had made of Ostend, and Portmahon, for the accommodation of his ships and troops, and which Mr. Godolphin was in this interval soliciting at Brussels: and another is given by the lord treasurer Danby in a Letter to Mr. Montagu ambassador at Paris dated Jan. 17, viz. ‘To see if any expedient for the peace could be found out in that time.’ Ralph.

“It appears however from sir Wm. Temple. that the true reason of this Adjournment was to have time to receive the news of a League with Holland, which was signed Jan. 16, but being properly defensive, to prevent the king of France from pursuing his conquests in the Netherlands, it was very far from answering the desires of the parliament. The king believed, nevertheless, that this league would be capable to impose upon them; and therefore deferred their meeting to receive the news of its conclusion.” Rapin.

assistances to support those Alliances, or by the small regard the Spaniards themselves must have to their own preservation.—The first of these I cannot suspect, by reason of your repeated engagements to maintain them; and I know you are so wise as to consider, that a war, which must be the necessary consequence of them, ought neither to be prosecuted by halves, nor to want such assurances of perseverance as may give me encouragement to pursue it. Besides, it will not be less necessary to let our enemies have such a prospect of our resolutions, as may let them see certainly that we shall not be weary of our arms, till Christendom be restored to such a peace as shall not be in the power of any prince alone to disturb.—I do acknowledge to you, that I have used all the means possible, by a mediation, to have procured an honourable and safe peace for Christendom; knowing how preferable such a peace would have been to any war, and especially to this kingdom, which must necessarily own the vast benefits it has received by peace, whilst its neighbours only have yet smarted by the war: but, finding it no longer to be hoped for by fair means, it shall not be my fault, if that be not obtained by force, which cannot be had otherwise.—For this reason I have recalled my troops from France; and have considered, that although the Dutch shall do their parts, we cannot have less on ours than 90 sail of capital ships constantly maintained, nor less than 30 or 40,000 land men (with their dependencies) to be employed upon our Fleets and elsewhere. And because there shall be no fear of misemploying what you shall give to these uses, I am contented that such Money be appropriated to those ends as strictly as you can desire. I have given testimony enough of my care in that kind, by the progress I have made in building the new ships; wherein, for the making them more useful, I have directed such larger dimensions, as will cost me above 100,000*l.* more than the act allows. I have gone as far as I could, in repairing the old Fleet, and in buying of necessary Stores for the Navy and Ordnance; and in this, and other provisions for better securing both my foreign plantations and the islands nearer home, I have expended a great deal more than the 200,000*l.* you enabled me to borrow upon the Excise, although I have not found such a credit as I expected upon that security. I have borne the Charge both of a rebellion in Virginia, and a new war with Algiers. I stand engaged to the prince of Orange for my niece's portion*: and I shall not be able to maintain my constant necessary Establishments, unless the new Impost upon Wines, &c. be continued to me, which would otherwise turn only to their profit to whom we least intend it.—I hope these things will need little recommendation to you, when you consider your promises in some and the necessity of the rest. And to let you see that I have not only employed my time and treasure for your safety, but done all I could to remove all sorts of jealousies, I have married my niece to the prince of Orange, by which I hope I have given full satisfaction that I shall never suffer his interest to be ruined, if I can be assisted as I ought to be to preserve them.—Having done all this, I expect from you a plentiful Supply, suitable to such great occasions; whereon depends not only the honour, but (for aught I know) the being of an English nation, which will not be saved by finding faults afterwards, but may be prevented by avoiding the chief fault of doing weakly and by halves what can only be hoped from a vigorous and thorough prosecution of what we undertake.—These considerations are of the greatest importance that ever concerned this kingdom; and therefore I would have you enter immediately upon them, without suffering any other business whatsoever to divert you from bringing them to good resolutions.”

Resolved, nem. con. “That the king's Speech be taken into consideration to-morrow.”

Debate on the irregular Adjournments of the House by the Speaker. Mr. Sacheverell. I was unwilling to give interruption to this business, as long as I see the way before me, and now we have done the king right, it is time to right ourselves upon you, Mr. Speaker. I was present when you adjourned the house twice,* and you would not suffer any gentleman to speak. Because I would reduce things to a certainty, and leave no umbrage betwixt the king and us, of his majesty's power of adjourning us, I will state the case betwixt the house and you, Mr. Speaker. It seems you will undertake to be bigger than the house, and, contrary to four known rights of the house, will undertake to violate them upon your own authority. I have drawn up the heads of them, and I offer them, not as an impeachment, but a charge, and I offer them to be read, the substance whereof is, ‘That it is the standing Order and undoubted right of the house, that the house be not adjourned by the Speaker, but by consent of the house, and not by the Speaker only.’ And ‘that when any gentleman stands up to speak, the person is not to be silenced, unless the house over-rule him.’ But you, Mr. Speaker, contrary to your duty, after several members stood up to speak, would not suffer them to go on, and, though you acknowledged kingdom. Wherever the news spread, joy accompanied it. It was looked upon as a deliverance from the French, and no man, at that time, dreaded any other slavery.” Ralph.

It was celebrated November the fourth, the prince's birth day. The prince's portion was 40,000*l.*

* See p. 890.

* “The Prince of Orange arrived in England Oct. 9, 1677. On the 24th, the match between his highness, and lady Mary, the duke of York's daughter, was declared at the committee, on the morrow to the council, which was, upon that occasion, extraordinarily assembled, and in the next Gazette to the whole the right of Adjournment to be in the house, yet you hindered the house from proceeding in their debates.

Sir John Ernly. If I thought that the crown was not concerned in these Adjournments, and had a right to command it, and the only business was chastising the Speaker for not doing his duty, I should be for maintaining my right as much as any man. But if there be a Message from the king, sent by one of the secretaries, to adjourn, or the king sends for the house by the black rod, and signifies his pleasure of adjournment, it is the undoubted right of the king, and you are, according to his pleasure signified, to adjourn immediately. Mr. Sacheverell stood up to speak, and you obeyed the king's Order, and the house universally called out 'Adjourn! adjourn!' and it was done accordingly. Though it is the undoubted right of every member to speak, yet if the universal cry be to adjourn, you do it every day, 'till to-morrow 8 o'clock,' though gentlemen stand up to speak.

Sir Rob. Carr. It has been the general sense of the house to-day, that no interruption be given to the consideration of the king's Speech. I move that a time may be taken for the consideration of this matter of adjourning the house by the Speaker, &c. and I believe the Speaker will submit to the house, if he cannot satisfy the house therein.

Lord Cavendish. It did not appear to me, that, in the adjournment of the house, in May last, it was the opinion of the house to adjourn. Here is a charge against the Speaker, and, according to order of the house, if a charge be brought against a member, it ought to be read. It is a business of so great importance, that you are not fit to sit in the chair whilst it is debating, it concerning yourself. The gentleman that brought it in, has laid it upon the table, and I would have it read.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. Are we not imposed upon to have that Paper thrown upon the table, without the consent of the house by a vote? The charge is, Whether you can adjourn the house? But the adjournment was the king's adjournment, and I desire to have it fairly stated, and the king's Message for adjournment read. But supposing it was not the king's adjournment, the thing is done every day, and you take the sense of the house by the noise of the house calling 'adjourn! adjourn!' Three parts in four of the house, in May last, were for adjourning, and your declaration of it was good, till excepted against. When the king sends to adjourn, the question is between the king and us, and not between the Speaker and us. Therefore I move that a day may be set apart to debate this thing, that gentlemen may be ready to speak to it. The whole world will know this debate to-day, and will be apt to say, Why did not the house debate the great business in the king's Speech? They put that off always for weighty considerations, and now (they will say) 'The commons fall into other matters.'

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I am sorry for this debate, without making a compliment to you, Mr. Speaker, or any other. The matter in question is concerning the charge delivered in by Sacheverell, and I will speak only to what can be the issue of the debate of it in this house. The king's power of adjourning the house is denied by no man. The question is then, de modo only. If you put the king upon other ways of adjournment of the house, than by the Speaker, there is disadvantage on the other side. The consequence will be delay of your proceedings; and the French king's advantages are so great in this conjuncture, that if we should be left alone, we are no equal match for him. He is now upon his campaign, and if the Confederates hearts fail, by our delay, and the king of France takes two or three more important places, he may quickly end his campaign, before the Spaniards begin theirs. This debate will draw many circumstances along with it. And, whilst we come to our privileges, we shall, I hope, be tender of the king's prerogative. In the 19th of king James, there was a jealousy, in the parliament, of the power of the Spanish ambassador, Gondamar, at court, concerning the Spanish Match, then depending. The house of commons sent a very rough Message then to the king, and the king did adjourn the parliament by writ. The commons sent to the lords, 'that they could not adjourn unless the writ was read in their house,' and they entered a protestation into their books accordingly. King James was offended at it, and sent for the Journal, and in the privy council tore out the protestation with his own hands. I desire only to show you, by this, how great jealousy and discontent it occasioned betwixt the king and the commons. A year and a half after, the king called a parliament, and altered his councils about the Spanish Match, and told the parliament how he was abused by Spain, and made other complaints about breaking the Treaty of the Match, and of war in the Palatinate. Did the commons then go back to all those things of privilege about their adjournment of their house? No; they went on to the matter of the Palatinate war. They were not a body of men too easy to give up their privileges and the liberties of their country, but they laid them aside for that time, and entertained themselves about the Palatinate. At the Diet of Ratisbon, the electors themselves met. The elector of Mentz was their Speaker. The duke of Lunenburg sent his credentials to the bishop of Cologne, by his secretaries; but being no elector, he was not received by his deputation; for the Diet said, 'he must come himself, for they would not receive them.' Upon which, Lunenburg made his protest, that nothing should stand good to oblige him in that Diet, which occasioned a great disorder and delay in the proceedings of that Diet. I speak this so much from the bottom of my heart, that I think these delays, which this debate will occasion, extremely dangerous; and, I vow to God, though

I hate murder, yet I had rather be guilty of 20 murders than hinder our proceedings now; * and I would be guilty of all the cruelties of Alsace rather than hinder our progress in this great conjuncture. Therefore I humbly move that this debate be laid aside.

Sir Henry Capel. There is nothing of so great importance as to keep ourselves, in a body, of one sense. What will be the end of this, if you enter into the debate to-day of this difference? What will the consequence be? Naturally it will be to see precedents of adjournments of the house, and a committee must sit, and you have tacitly implied, that no committees shall sit, because you have ordered to-morrow for the consideration of the king's Speech, and some time must be to think of it. I am for the setting this thing of Adjournment right, and believe it will corroborate us in what we shall do. When we parted last, we addressed the king to enter into Alliances with the Dutch, &c. to prevent the growth of the power of France. When we were adjourned, if the king had sent for us, and told us his pleasure, I believe nothing else would have intervened.

Mr. Garroway. I am sorry to hear some honourable persons put so great stress upon two days time. We have been 14 days in town; and when our liberties are concerned, and this matter of money must go abroad, for reputation's sake, I would willingly have had time to consider, whether we shall be undone by peace or war. If this great affair had been taken in time, according to our reiterated advices, something might have been done. But still we are put off to the last moment. A Paper is now offered, and I am sorry it is a Charge against yourself, Mr. Speaker. I mean clearly, as the gentleman said who brought in the Paper, the point of adjournment is not betwixt the king and us, but betwixt you and us. Therefore put a question to lodge it fairly, before we adjourn the debate. I think, that, if it appear to be your encroaching upon the house, it may be of as ill consequence as the war with France; if your power encroach upon us more than ever was intended you. If you will put the question, Whether the Paper shall be read, and adjourn the consideration of it to Thursday, I am well contented.

Sir Rd. Temple. For order sake, I would not have the question put for the reading the Paper given in by Sacheverell. It is a Charge and no Impeachment, against the Speaker. I never saw any thing of this nature before. If the gentleman that brought it in will recall it, and give it in as an Impeachment, it is another thing. The question about this matter of adjourning the house will necessarily arise betwixt the king and the house. The giving in the Paper is not regular; and no person can go about to make that the Speaker's case, which is wholly the king's.

Mr. Powle. He that delivered this Paper in, did well to make a difference in the case betwixt the king's and the Speaker's adjournment of the house. In the king's Speech, in the Gazette of the 28th of May, 1677, his majesty directed himself to the 'Gentlemen of the House,' and not to 'Mr. Speaker.' How has the Speaker then the authority of adjourning the house? If this be admitted, I need not tell you how dangerous the consequence would be. The former practice of adjournment was, that the king did do it in the lords house, and we were called up to that bar. The king may grant away a manor under his signet, but Westminster-hall will void that grant, being not under the great seal. If we do not preserve form, we shall lose substance. The question is plainly, by what authority you assume to yourself to do what the king commands us to do? I am sorry to have seen us on a precipice, and that that should be an argument against us of losing no time in preventing the growing greatness of the French king, which might have been prevented, in a great measure, had our advice been taken in time. The fault is somewhere. I never yet saw a pocket-order of adjourning the house admitted, and the whole liberty of the house is concerned. By the same reason that you adjourned the house, you may put by any question. It is in vain to think of conquests abroad, when we lose our liberty at home. Suppose to-morrow we come to a question in this great affair; we have adjourned, you may adjourn the house to Friday, and prevent the question. The gentleman that brought in the Paper, does not call it an Impeachment, because it is not to be sent up to the lords. He calls it a Charge, because we have liberty to judge of the misdemeanors of our own members. By word of mouth, or in writing, the Charge may be given in. Let the Paper be read, and admitted, and then adjourn the debate of it, if you please.

The Speaker. What is charged within doors, by word of mouth, against any member, or what is charged without doors, is at the election of the gentleman that brings it, to take his own method. I assure you, I sit uneasily till I answer to any thing relating to this Charge. As many artifices have been used as may be, to report me to have spoken what I never did, and to have done what I never did. But, I hope, no discourses will make impression upon the house, of things neither said nor done. I have received many undeserved favours from the house, which I acknowledge with all thankfulness. My coming to this place at first was as unexpected as your displeasure in what I did. Whatever my proceedings were in adjourning the house, when duly considered, the house, I believe, will see nothing in them inconsistent with the Order of the house. That power, which is lodged in the

* "Coventry in some heat said, 'The king was engaged, and he would rather be guilty of the murder of 40 men than do any thing to retard the progress of the war.' The oddness of the expression made it often to be objected afterwards to him." Burnet.

Chair, is not to be dislodged until the house dislodge it. When the king commands an Adjournment, it is the house's right to adjourn themselves. But, I say, the house has always exercised adjournment in that method I did it. The reason is, because, in executing the king's commands, the house goes out of the ordinary method. The king seems not to doubt any obedience in the house; which, putting a question for adjournment, after the king's command signified, will do. I desire to have your Order for what I shall do. There was never any debate, but once, of Adjournment, and then it was about executing a commission of adjournment not directed to the house; and I ought to continue in the practice of what I have done, till you have altered it; else I should commit a greater offence than I am now charged with. Matter of form is only the case. If I have the honour to serve you, I must observe the same method I have done, till you order it otherwise.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You state not the case right. When any doubt, or question, arises about a thing, it is otherwise than when the thing goes off fairly by consent. This adjourning the house has been usurped by you, more than by any Speaker before you; and gentlemen stand up to speak, and you adjourn the house, and will not hear them; and you adjourn. He who was Speaker before you, would not patter out of the Chair with that precipitancy. He would sit till eight or nine o'clock at night, as long as any gentleman would speak. If the opinion of the Speaker must be the sense of the house, the ships and men the king speaks of may be doubled. It is our birth-right to speak; and we are not so much as a part of a parliament, if that be lost. Many worthy men, who are the king's servants, went on fast for Money; but when Privilege was but mentioned, all was laid aside. The then Attorney General, (Finch) now lord chancellor, when the king's Declaration, &c. was excepted against here, and the king told us, 'he would not have the Declaration touched upon,' did worthily give his opinion of it. Though his zeal, at that time, was great for money; yet he laid all that aside, and did bravely defend it at a conference. If it had been so in the Declaration, &c. freedom of speech had gone off; and if we cannot debate things with freedom, all is gone. The black rod knocked the last session, and then we must go to attend the king. 'But hold, (said you, Mr. Speaker) we cannot stir without the Money-Bill;' and the Money-Bill was sent down to you from the lords, before you would go up. The king may adjourn us in person, or by his commission. 1 Ch. i. there was a commission of adjournment sent to the lords house, and it was signified to the commons; but the commons answered, 'if the commission be sent down to their house, they would consider of it.' It was then debated, though under the broad seal; which is above all Paper commands. And the house was set in order first. And must you assume to yourself to adjourn without debate? 'to adjourn immediately' is with a salvo jure, that we may sit that day to set the house in order. 19 James, there was a kind of Protestation before the house adjourned; and when the king razed the Protestation out of the Journal, there was no privilege lost. The Adjournment is only obeyed here, where we have freedom of speech. When any exception is taken at words that fall from a gentleman, they are to be put into writing, and you snapped us off by your usurpation; so that there was no time to debate the exception we had against it. I move it, because it lies hard upon my heart; for, without this freedom, we are no house of commons; and I would have the Paper read.

The Speaker. I sent up for the Tax-bill, and the bill was actually brought down before the black rod knocked at the door. The 11th of July, 1 Ch. i. the house desired the lords to join with them in an Address to the king for a Recess; a commission accordingly was sent to the lords house by the king. The lords sent to the commons, to come up to their house to hear the commission read; the commons returned, 'That they would send Answer by messengers of their own.' The commission was sent down to the commons, and they did adjourn themselves to Oxford. Their adjournment was by the king's command; and so is this complained of now; and I will put upon that the issue of the cause. In all the Journals, I cannot find, that, when the king commanded an immediate Adjournment, the house proceeded in one tittle of business.

Mr. Sacheverell. If any such thing as a commission, &c. had been, I had done you, Mr. Speaker, much wrong in complaining. But I have precedents to show, when the matter comes to be debated, that the course of parliament is quite otherwise.

Mr. Waller. The gentleman that spoke last tells you of precedents, &c. but I have sat here 50 years, and never saw the matter done as you, Mr. Speaker, speak of. There is a confusion in the debate, whether the matter in question be betwixt the Speaker and us, or the king and us. When a man speaks against his duty, or we speak against one another, or the king, the words are stated, and the person is to withdraw. You, Mr. Speaker, bring us precedents overgrown with weeds. I believe the matter must be stated betwixt the king and us, or else 'the trumpet will give an uncertain sound.' No tribunal can judge of the privilege of this house but itself. I will tell you the practice for 50 years here. The king, without doubt, has the sole power of calling and suspending the states of the kingdom. But if the king should descend so low as to come to us, and adjourn us, I never knew but that we complied with the king. For writs to supply defects of members, a committee has been sent to desire leave of the king to sit on. And when the king would have prorogued, the house has interposed to sit on. Besides, we have obscured our own light by our own fault. We should have called the Speaker to the chair again. We send the Speaker to the chair, when we chuse him, to show you that you are 'in potestate Senatus,' both in the chair, and out of it. The measure of our obedience to the king in all things is law; and I move that a committee may be appointed to recover our ancient right. We say, 'hear the chair;' but no body says, 'obey the chair.' I would have precedents searched betwixt the crown and us, that we may not play a lesson before we tune the instrument.

Mr. Williams. There is no such matter as prerogative in the case. The king's Message was, 'That the house should adjourn itself.' The question is between the Speaker and the house, whether you have not imposed upon the house, by adjourning, without their consent by a question. You have declared the right to be in the house, and yet you have done the contrary. When a member stood up to speak, you silenced him, and would not suffer him to go on. The Paper delivered in at the table ought to be read presently. You, Mr. Speaker, have repeated this adjournment, without a question, or consent of the house; four times over. The privileges of the house are, by course of parliament, first to be considered; and there can be no greater privilege than this of freedom of speech. I have heard and read of propositions to bridle parliaments, and they were censured in the Star-Chamber. This action of yours, Mr. Speaker, is gagging the parliament; and you, by skipping out of the chair, prevented speaking in parliament. I desire the Paper delivered in may be read.

Sir Tho. Lee. We are all out of the way in matter of order. Here is a Paper tendered, and called for to be read; and it is moved below to be adjourned to Thursday; and now the debate is entered into, which is moved to be on Thursday. Your proper question is, first, Whether the Paper proposed to be read, shall be now read; and the next question, Whether Thursday shall be appointed to debate the manner of your adjourning the house.

Sir Rob. Thomas. Mr. Speaker, you have gone about to answer the Paper, before the house was possessed of it.

Lord Cavendish. The Speaker put us first out of order, by answering the Paper before it was read. I doubt not but precedents are to the contrary of what you, Mr. Speaker, pretend. In this parliament there have been several to the contrary, and you yourself was of a contrary opinion formerly to what you are of now. I desire the Paper may be read; and when that is done, I will give reasons why this debate should not be adjourned, but proceeded in now.

Sir Tho. Meres. The debate is, whether the Paper shall be read, or no. My opinion is, that all forms in this house ought to be cautiously preserved, else we destroy the commons of England. Whenever you search into this matter, I believe you will find there have been mistakes. I know that the matter lies in a short compass. When the king commands us to adjourn, may we not bring it to a question? If our books show it, and that we divided upon that question, the matter in question is out of doors. But by no means would I have this debate adjourned, to lose it. Men may let it alone now, and take it up another time, to do mischief in unquiet times. As for laying it by as a troublesome thing, it may be laid asleep to trouble you more. Near precedents of things are better than those of an hundred years since. If you think fit, let seven or eight gentlemen search books for precedents, else you may be put to it on Thursday.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. I look upon the thing particularly as between the house and the crown, and not the Speaker; I move for Thursday to debate it.

Col. Birch. Whether the matter be betwixt the house and the Speaker, or the crown and the house, it is of absolute necessity to be determined. If it had been determined in May last, we had not been troubled with it now, to lose our time. I remember the precedent of the Tax-bill, that Clarges mentioned, &c. It is for the service of the crown and us, in uniting us; and I would have this thing set right. If the hanks be good, the channel will go right. I would have such steps made in this as would give it dispatch. The question the Speaker put is a fair question, viz. Whether the Paper delivered at the table shall be read. I would have that put to the question; but I would have any one show me a precedent, whether a Paper given in at the table, and not then read, was read ever after. Then if any gentleman be of opinion not to have the Paper read, and be of opinion to adjourn to Thursday, and in the mean time would have you search Precedents, you will lose Thursday. Read the Paper now, and after that search Precedents.

The Question being put for reading the Paper now, it passed in the negative.—Ordered, "That this debate of the irregular Adjournment of the house, by the Speaker, be adjourned till Thursday."

The session opened with an unexpected strain of loyalty,* for before the House had

* "The Constitution of the present house of commons, that had sat near 17 years, was now more manifestly grown into two Parties, which were called by the name of the Court and the Country: the former were grown numerous, by a practice introduced about five years before this time, by the lord-treasurer Clifford, of downright buying off one man after another, as they could make the bargain. The Country Party still continued the majority and retained more credit upon the corruption of others, and their profession of adherence to the true interests of the nation, especially in points of France and Popery: where these came in question, many of the Court Party voted with those of the country, who then carried all before them; but whenever the court appeared considered any part of his majesty's Speech, having sat on part of the 30th of Jan. the Anniversary Fast, upon the motion of lord O'Brian, whose son had lately married the Lord-Treasurer's daughter, they voted, "The sum of 70,000*l.* for a solemn Funeral of his late majesty king Charles i. and to erect a Monument for the said prince of glorious memory; the said sum to be raised by a two months tax, to begin at the expiration of the present tax for building Ships."

The Commons Address of Thanks to the King.]

The house next proceeded to take the king's Speech into consideration, and in return presented the following Address to his majesty at Whitehall :

"We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do in all duty and gratitude render our most humble Thanks to your most sacred maj. for the great care your maj. hath expressed for the preservation and encouragement of the Protestant Religion, by concluding a Marriage between the lady Mary, your majesty's niece, and the prince of Orange, being a prince professing the same religion with us, and engaged in arms for the defence of the common cause of Christendom : for the promoting of which we do, in all humility, and with the highest zeal to your majesty's honour, and the safety of your people, beseech your maj. not to admit of any Treaty of Peace, whereby the French king shall be left in the possession of any larger dominions and territories, or of any greater power than what he retained by the Pyrenean Treaty; less than which, we conceive, cannot secure your majesty's kingdoms, and the rest of Europe, from the growth and power of the said king, but that he alone may be able to disturb the peace thereof, whensoever he is minded to attempt it; the places reserved by that treaty to the king of Spain in the Netherlands being advantageous, as well by the vicinity of some important towns and garrisons to the kingdom of France, as by the extent of the territory. And we do most humbly desire that, in all treaties, articles and confederations, in order to the obtaining that end, your maj. would be pleased to provide that none of the parties that shall join with your maj. in making war for that purpose, may lay down their arms, or depart from their Alliances, till the said king be reduced at least to the said Treaty : and we do farther desire, as one of the most effectual means to attain those ends, that it may be agreed between your maj. and the Confederates, that neither ourselves nor any of them shall hold any commerce or trade with the to fall in with the true interests of the nation, especially in those two points, then many of the Country Party, meaning fairly, fell in with the court, and carried the Votes, as they soon did upon the king's pretence to grow bold with France, and resolve upon a war, if the peace was refused." Echard.

French king, or his subjects, during such war; and that no commodity of the growth, product, or manufacture of France, or of any of the territories or dominions of the French king, be admitted to be brought into your majesty's, or any of their countries and dominions, either by land or sea, or to be sold within the same; but that they be seized and destroyed wheresoever they be found, and days to be limited for the same, in as short time as the nature of such affairs will permit: and that in all treaties, articles, and confederations, made in order to or for the prosecution of such war, it may be agreed and declared, that no vessel of any nation whatsoever shall be permitted to enter into or come out of the ports of France, but that the ship and men shall be seized, and the goods destroyed.—We do therefore most humbly desire your maj. to proceed in making such Alliances and Confederations as shall be necessary for the attaining those ends; and though we believe your maj. can never doubt of the affections of your people, yet, upon this occasion, we do, with all alacrity, and with one unanimous consent, renew our former promises and engagements, beseeching your maj. to rest confidently assured of our perseverance in the prosecution of the said war; and that when your maj. shall please to impart such Alliances and Confederations to us in parliament, we shall, upon all occasions, give your majesty such ready assistances and supports as may, by the blessing of God, bring the said war to a happy conclusion."

Debate on Sir Solomon Swale's Recusancy.]

Feb. 1. Sir Wm. Smith complained of sir Solomon Swale's being convicted for Popish Recusancy, upon record, in the county of Middlesex.

Mr. Sacheverell. I would have you see the record of conviction. The most innocent of mankind may be convicted of Recusancy by surprize, but the law gives men time to set themselves free from their conviction by conformity. It is my opinion to have the record of his conviction sent for, and time allowed him to attend you here. I would not hastily turn this gentleman out of the house for recusancy, unless it be certainly known whether he be convicted or not.

The Speaker reads the Record. By this Conviction, any dissenter in opinion may be convicted, as sir Solomon Swale is, it being 'for not coming to his parish Church.'

Mr. Powle. I like not gentlemen bringing records hither, but I would have you command the officer to bring the record; and then you proceed as you think fit.

Sir Ch. Harbord. It is not for the honour of the house, whilst we make laws against Popery, to suffer a member convicted of recusancy to sit amongst us, and suffer it here. But when such a thing is represented to you, you can do no less than examine it, and send for Swale to appear, and there will be no surprize at all, as you formerly did in the case of sir Tho. Strickland.—The officer was ordered to attend with the Record on Monday.

Debate on the frequent and irregular granting of Paper Protections.] The Speaker. Pursuant to the Order of the house, I have sent out an order to supersede all Paper Protections. I find about 100 in London and Middlesex.

Mr. Powle. This, of Protections, is another abuse that these long sessions of parliament produce. We are adjourned from day to day without doing business, and privilege continues long. Formerly, when there was an end of the session, there was an end of the privilege and protections. I hope we shall now do our business, and be prorogued, and so have an end of these protections.

Sir Courtney Poole moves for a search, all England over, that gentlemen may answer, in their places, whether they have granted out any protections under their hand.

Sir Tho. Lee. It has always been the custom of parliament, than we can protect no more than our menial servants. But that which frights people from complaining is your not declaring how far privilege extends. If you make publication, 'That men may arrest persons, notwithstanding Paper Protections;' that will remedy the thing, and men may be safe, and the law may go forward.

Mr. Garroway. I hear the lords are before hand with us in this of Protections; they have registered, and numbered their menial servants. If you find gentlemen have extraordinary numbers, you may find out the abuse, and vindicate your honours in it.

Col. Wanklyn expelled for granting an improper Protection.] A Petition was presented from Mrs Cottington, complaining 'that col. Wanklyn, a member of the house, protected Mr. Cottington, her husband, as his menial servant, against her hearing a cause depending between her and her husband, about the validity of their marriage at Turin in Italy, (she being of that country) and humbly desiring the favour of the house, that the said Protection may be withdrawn.

The Speaker. Col. Wanklyn was with me about it, and he promised me that he would withdraw the Protection.

Col. Wanklyn. I did withdraw the Protection, according to my promise; but the bishop of Lincoln said, 'That Mr. Cottington had received a sentence in the court of arches against the law of God, and that the gentleman was under a hard censure;' and so I granted him my Protection, but revoked it on Thursday last.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. This gentleman, Cottington, it seems, is protected by your member, because he thinks he has a righteous cause, and the judges in the ecclesiastical court think he has a wrong cause. If you give your members leave to protect persons against judgments and sentences, when they think the judges are in the wrong, the house of commons will be a great place.

Col. Wanklyn. I do aver that Mr. Cottington was my servant, and had done me very acceptable service.

Sir John Birkenhead. Whenever a day of hearing came, then Mr. Cottington had his protection from col. Wanklyn ready. The judge of the spiritual court sent to col. Wanklyn, and I spoke to him six times about it, and he promised me to revoke the Protection. Then he certified his Protection, and a public notary entered it, 'recalled,' and soon after col. Wanklyn revoked his revocation. Let him prove Mr. Cottington to be his menial servant. A man of Mr. Cottington's estate to be his servant! let him give it under his hand, that now he is his menial servant.

The Speaker reads an old Order Sir Edw. Turner made when he was Speaker: viz. Resolved, That all Protections and written certificates under the hand of any member of this house, be void, and called in according to law; and that menial servants be protected only, according to law; and that this Order be printed and published.

Sir Tho. Lee. This case, complained of, is only a particular instance of a member; therefore you are to proceed upon it, when the member that offends has made his defence in his place, and judge it. Then you may make a general Order as to Protections.

Sir R. Sawyer. Col. Wanklyn signed a protection, which is filed in the exchequer, directed, 'to all mayors, bailiffs, sheriffs, &c' in as high a style as a proclamation, neither to stir hand nor foot, and threatening what penalty would ensue for breaking his privilege.

Mr. Waller. One example against an offender of this nature has done more than all your talk and orders. In king James's time, it was proved, that one made these Protections and sold them, and he was turned out of the house for it. This was done when parliaments were short; much more ought it to be severely punished now parliaments are long. The Romans had a Justitium that stood still for a time, but now for justice to stand still 17 or 18 years, is not a thing to be suffered; and I would have col. Wanklyn answer this giving Protections.

Col. Wanklyn. As to this Protection that Sawyer speaks of, it is concerning Dry Hill in Kent. We had a verdict for it, and judgment; and by a writ of possession, we were legally put into it, and we ought not to be disseized. In the Exchequer there was a bill of discovery; the bill was answered, and, upon a trial, we had legal possession, and I will satisfy the committee of privileges farther in it, if you please to refer it to them.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Wanklyn was never in the cause, nor heard of in it, before the writ of possession.

Col. Wanklyn. Jones has a good title to Dry Hill; he has had a verdict. In time of war, Jones was my quarter-master, and went often to make his claim, but, because he was of the king's party, in these times, could not have his legal course, for his right. I have a concern in it of 300*l.* which I lent Jones, and he has given these lands in security for it; and I am concerned for supporting the title, and have been so all along.

Mr. Williams. The writ of possession was awarded to Jones, for Dry Hill in Kent. Jones was the lessor, and the feigned lessee delivered the possession to the sheriff, and possession was taken accordingly. He alleged, that the writ with the possession, was unduly obtained; therefore the lord chief justice awarded the party to be put out of possession, and restitution to be made. Complaint was made of the under-sheriff for not doing it, and it appeared that he durst not do it, because there was a protection from your member, Wanklyn, to Jones. Wanklyn himself was in court, and, upon a motion that there being privilege in the case, proceedings might stop, the feigned person, Jones, assigns his title over to Wanklyn 3 or 4 days within term. The court was so far satisfied of the abuse, that the court did order the under-sheriff, at his peril, to satisfy the court of the execution of the writ by Saturday; but the writ was not executed. The Protection Wanklyn gave Jones was read in court, and it was directed, 'To all officers, &c.' in very positive words, 'not to dare to disturb the possession, because of privilege.' The court was abundantly satisfied, but out of respect to privilege of parliament, they gave farther time for the execution of the writ; and this day, under colour of this protection, a motion was made in court; and I advised Wanklyn to withdraw his Protection. I would have right done in this matter for your honour.

Mr. Sacheverell. Whether the title was transferred to Wanklyn before the controversy, and before the writ of restitution was granted, is the question; and I would have Wanklyn asked, whether he was present in court, when the rule of court was given? I would have him asked that question by the Speaker.

Sir Cha. Harbord. Ask him, when the conveyance was made, and upon what consideration?

Col. Wanklyn. Jones was legally in possession of the estate before I granted him my protection. [He withdrew.]

Mr. Hale. This suit of Jones has been always reputed a vexatious suit, and no man that knows Jones will trust him for any thing; he is not worth a groat, nor has been for these 20 years. Such a man as Wanklyn, that is guilty of what has been made appear to you, is not fit to keep us company; and I humbly move that he may be turned out of the house.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. That which concerns us to consider is, whether a member be legally in possession of an estate, and whether his debt upon it be a legal and true debt, and the estate fairly transferred to him; and whether he would defend himself in his possession by privilege. We have privilege because we cannot attend two services, the law, and here. Let Wanklyn fairly prove the debt, from Jones, and that the estate was transferred to him, in consideration of that debt, and then you may judge the matter.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The case is for granting Protection to support a litigious title; thereby laying the honour of the house at stake, for his private advantage. As for the Protection of Cottington, a man of 1,000*l.* a year, to keep him as a menial servant! And that protection to Jones, so high-penned a protection! You must remove the scandal from the house, and not suffer him to sit here.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The question is about turning out this member. I hope the thing will be well weighed, before you turn him out. There is the honour of the house in the case and the compassion of those that suffer. But I would go by such steps, as may consist with justice. It has been said, it matters not what the title is. If he had given maintenance to a litigious title, or had assumed an interest where he has none, then I abominate it. But all order, rule, and practice of granting protections has been overlooked in the house; and this man is an unfortunate man, that he must fall for two errors. There may be many looked into, and in case that be the meaning of your Order for turning men out of the house, I know not where it will stop. There is a great difference in punishment between a mulct on the purse, and hanging; and seeing you will not go through with the business, where you find it, pray consider well of this case.

Sir Courtney Pople. This gentleman has been a gallant man, but now he is in poverty. I would make him an example, but no farther than asking the pardon of the house upon his knees. But as for turning him out of the house, I know not where that will end.

Mr. Sacheverell. To buy a title, pendente lite, is highly criminal in law. The getting this very writ of possession was a bad practice, and I hope this house will never protect such a man in what he has done, and I would have him turned out of the house.

Mr. Finch. It is not the protection of menial servants, which we call Paper Protections; that is the particular privilege of every member. This is a great offence of Wanklyn's, if he made use of his privilege, as is said, pendente lite. But Wanklyn had not the title, till he saw Jones in possession. I would not condemn Wanklyn before we know the case thoroughly. I would refer it to the committee. I fear it will be as foul as it is represented. The ancient custom was, that a member came into the court of chancery, and, upon oath, declared the person to be his menial servant, and it was there recorded, but no Paper Protections were anciently. The thing itself is cruel, and the length of this parliament aggravates it. It is not proper to expel your member, unless you do the same justice to all in the same case with him. It may be the case of 10, 20, or 30 members and some of your worthiest members. I would have a vote posted up, to show your dislike of these Protections; and then, if any member transgress it, let him be expelled the house; and I should readily give my consent to it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The gentleman that spoke last desires you would not proceed to expel col. Wanklyn till you have made a public declaration, how far you will punish members that give Protections, as this gentleman has done. In the case of one of your members, Mr. John Ashburnham, you made no declaration that you would punish him, &c. Your Journal said only, 'That he had dishonoured the house.' There was no law against his taking that bribe of 500*l.* from the merchants, about soliciting the king concerning the French wines. He was a worthy gentleman, and yet you expelled him the house. He was no judge, and you judged that taking a bribe. For the honour of the house, either do justice upon col. Wanklyn, or expunge that sentence against Mr. Ashburnham out of the Journal, if you pardon this.

Mr. Solicitor Winnington. I am unwilling to stand up, because I know something of this matter. Finch says, 'he hopes you will not proceed against Wanklyn, till you know what the offence is.' I hope no man here will do what col. Wanklyn has confessed. You asked Wanklyn, 'whether Mr. Cottington was his menial servant?' He answered you, 'That Cottington had an ill sentence in the court of delegates, and he did protect him from it; but that he did afterwards revoke it.' What he has done is a great scandal upon the house; and Wanklyn's confession of it makes me take it for truth. Finch tells you, 'it may fall out to be the case of many worthy members.' But I cannot call them so. If any are guilty of such crimes, I am sorry they should represent here, to bind me and my posterity in the weighty affairs of the kingdom. If the matter charged upon Wanklyn were questionable, or doubtful, it were another thing; but the matter is so plain, that it admits no dispute. The measure lies only in the mercy of this house to the gentleman, and, in that, I would go as high as any man.

Mr. Waller. Mr. Ashburnham's case was hard, and very dangerous. I have seen 20 members, in a morning put out of the house. Some have disputed that power in the house. Some say, 'Wanklyn has been a soldier, and a commander, and therefore perhaps the lawyers are against him.' I would, for the future, go by some Order about Protections, as has been mentioned. The gentleman has been in employment for the king, and for this offence I would reprove him at the bar only.

Mr. May. I discoursed with col. Wanklyn about these Protections, and told him, I wondered he would protect a servant that he never had. I told him, I feared his doom would be to be turned out of the house, and it is my opinion he should be turned out of the house.

The question proposed was, "That col. Wanklyn has dishonoured the house, in granting Protections to Mr. Cottington, and Mr. Jones, not his menial servants."

Mr. Garroxy. I would not have you make more points upon what you do. Judge it in particulars, but do not assign it in the question.

Mr. Powle. I would not have expulsions out of the house too large, I would have the question 'contrary to justice, and the honour of the house.'

Sir Rd. Temple. I will be no advocate for the person, nor his case. But I would have the thing done, as your predecessors have done; never without particular cause assigned upon your books. If you make the case general, it will never be a justification to you to posterity. To protect a gentleman of 2000*l.* a year, for a man's menial servant, is an extraordinary thing. That servant rather kept his master than the master him. I would go as high in this censure as any man, but would be uniform in it. If any member has protected any person that is not his servant, he deserves your censure, but not so highly as in this case. I would have the case such as you may measure your justice by to posterity.

Sir Ch. Harbord. This offence is not only contrary to an Order of the house, but to the ancient order, constitution, and justice of the house. That sentence you passed upon Mr. Ashburnham, was for taking 500*l.* of the merchants, for service he had done them to the king, in a matter depending in this house. For this gentleman's punishment, I would give it him only in a reproof at the bar; and hereafter the house may take the matter of such Protections, as he has granted, into consideration. But for the first offender of this nature, I am utterly against having him expelled the house.

Sir Tho. Dolman. I would have this gentleman that has offended sent prisoner to the Tower, and that you make a standing Order, for the future, against offences of this nature.

Resolved, 1. "That granting Paper Protections to persons not menial servants of members of this house, is against the justice and honour of the house. 2. That col. Wanklyn is guilty of granting Paper Protections, against the justice and honour of this house."

Mr. Sec. Williamson. This is but altogether to make a judicial sentence against the man, and this is a judicial cutting off a man from us; and therefore let us do all that may be, for clearing the justice of the house in particular; and that the nature of the crime may appear, I would have Jones and Cottington, and some of the persons he has protected, named in the vote. It is the first time that ever a capital judgment was applied to that fact, that had not a precedent in law for it. Therefore in order to make it a just and honourable sentence, you must say that every dishonour of the house should be punished with expulsion, which is a cutting off your member from us. Therefore I would not do it, in this case, without naming the persons, and 'that col. Wanklyn, for granting Protections to Cottington and Jones, not being his menial servants, hath violated the justice and honour of the house.' Thus I would have your vote.

Resolved, "That col. Wanklyn, for granting such Protections shall be expelled the house."

Mr. Sec. Coveentry. You have said, in your former Order, about Protections, 'That they are against law.' This is a greater offence done by this gentleman than that of Mr. Ashburnham's taking 500*l*.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. It was said, 'If you begin not with this gentleman, you will never begin.' Therefore I would go on with punishing other offenders of this nature; but, as this case is put, I cannot give my consent to expel him.

Col. Birch. I hear the case of this gentleman distinguished from other cases, and I have heard that of protecting menial servants disputed. As the question is penned in your paper, nothing appears on your paper, 'that he has protected persons not his menial servants according to law;' but only expressed 'menial servants.' But I would not have this house, in their zeal to punish this gentleman, make such a slip as never to be recalled. I would have it referred to a Committee.

The three Votes passed. On the last the house divided, 140 to 109.

The Speaker informed the house, that col. Wanklyn ought to receive his sentence on his knees.

Col. Titus. When pardons are read in courts of justice, the pardoned persons hear them read on their knees. But no man, condemned to be hanged, receives his sentence on his knees. The sentence ought to be received standing. I have given my vote against the gentleman, because I could not give it for him.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Wanklyn is none of you now; he is cut off from you, and therefore it is not proper to bring him on his knees to receive his sentence.

Col. Wanklyn, was brought to the bar, the mace by him, to receive his Sentence of expulsion, standing.

The Speaker. Col. Wanklyn, I am commanded by the house to pass sentence upon you, for the dishonour you have done the house in granting Protections. Your sentence is hard, and my task harder, who am to pronounce it. If you had taken my advice in private, you had not come to this disgrace in public. The house thinks it a great blemish to them, that Protections should be granted to persons who are not their menial servants, and you are in a great measure guilty of that crime. Mr. Cottington has brought the greatest misfortune upon you imaginable, to be the occasion of your being cut off from this glorious body. I am commanded to tell you, that you are expelled the house for what you have done, and the house has done you a favour that you receive not your sentence on your knees.

Col. Wanklyn, after the sentence was passed upon him, was conveyed to the door by the serjeant with his mace. He received his sentence and went away weeping.

The King's Answer to the Commons' Address of Thanks.] Feb. 4. Mr. Secretary Coveentry delivered the king's Answer to the last Address, which was read by the Speaker, as follows.

"C. R. His majesty hath received and perused the late Address of this house, and thereunto returneth this Answer:—He is not a little surprized to find so much inserted there of what should not be, and so little of what should. In the first place, his majesty's Speech was to both houses jointly; and, the matter being of so public a concern, it is certainly very convenient the return to that Speech should be made jointly. For to receive several Addresses, and possibly very different, cannot but administer matter of distraction to his counsels, and consequently to the affairs of the nation. Nor is the house of peers reasonably to be left out in transacting those things which at last must needs pass by them.—In the next place, he observes in the Address of this house of the 20th of May last, you invite his majesty to 'a league offensive and defensive with Holland, against the growth and power of the French king, and for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands;' and, upon his declaration of such Alliances, you assure his majesty of 'such speedy Assurances and Supplies, as may fully and plentifully answer the occasions.' His majesty hath made accordingly the Alliances offensive and defensive with Holland, and declared it to you in parliament; so his part is performed. But, as to that of this house for Supplies, though he asked it in his Speech, you give no answer, nor the least hint of affording him any thing to support the Treaties he hath made. Only the old promises are put to new conditions; and so he may be used to eternity, should he seem satisfied with such proceedings.—You are not to think that either his majesty, or the States General, being to embark in so great a design, would deprive themselves of the other so considerable Alliances. Some ministers of the most concerned princes have known and approved his Treaty with the States General; and, that he hath not formally concluded one with them, the reason is, that the distance of the places the princes concerned reside in would not give time to perfect so many Treaties, to be ratified in places so remote; and, laying well the foundation in Holland, there could not be much doubt of their consent, for whose interest that Treaty is made. But nothing can delay, or indeed disappoint these treaties, more than the failing of this house to support these his maj. hath made. He must acquit his credit there, and see his word shall be maintained, before he can engage it elsewhere a-fresh.—In his majesty's Answer to the Address of this house of the 20th of May, he told you how highly he was offended at that great invasion of his prerogative: but you take no notice of it, but, on the contrary, add to your former ill conduct; new invasions, equally offensive to his majesty's authority, as contrary to his, and, he thinks, most other men's judgments.—This house desires his maj. to oblige his Confederates never to consent to a peace, but upon condition the most Christian king be reduced to the Pyrenean Treaty at least. A determination sitting only for God Almighty! For none can tell what will be fitting conditions for a peace, but he that can certainly foretell the events of the war.—You advise his majesty to enjoin not only his allies, but all the world, not to let a ship of theirs go to, or come from France, upon pain of loss of goods, capture of ships and men, not excepting either ally, prince, or ambassador, (if amongst them:) he doth not believe that ever any assembly of men gave so great and public a provocation to the whole world, without either having provided, or so much as considered how to provide, one ship, one regiment, or one penny towards justifying it, (at least as far as you have acquainted him.) However, to show how willing his maj. is to give all reasonable satisfaction to this house, how unreasonable soever the propositions made him are, he doth again repeat to you what he said on the 22th past, 'That if, by your assistance, he may be put into arms sufficient for such a work, his majesty will not be weary of them till Christendom be restored to such a peace, as it shall not be in the power of any prince alone to disturb.'—This is, in the consequence of it, as much as a prince that values his word can say to you: and he is such a one. But to say he will make no other peace, than such a particular peace, whether able or not able, whether abandoned by his allies or not, is not to be said upon solemn engagement, because not certainly to be performed.—In sum, gentlemen, the right of making and managing war and peace is in his maj.; and if you think he will depart from any part of that right, you are mistaken. The reins of government are in his hands; and he hath the same resolution and concern to preserve them there, as he hath to preserve his own person; and he keeps both for his people's protection, and safety; and will employ them so as far as he can. If this house encourage his maj. to go farther in Alliances, by supplying him in maintaining those he hath made, his care and utmost endeavours will be employed for you. If this house doth intend this, it must be speedy. The time and conjuncture afford not leisure to counsel long; and therefore his maj. desireth that, without farther loss of time, you apply yourselves to the consideration of that Supply; for from thence he must take his measures."

Debate on the King's Answer.] Mr. Sec. Country. The king has showed you, in his Answer to your Address, his dissatisfaction in passing upon what belongs to him. He omits no care at all for the public, for all that, and endeavours to give you satisfaction, he tells you, 'he hath made Alliances, offensive and defensive, with Holland.' But it is in vain to make new Treaties, when we are put back to old ones. 'If the king has arms sufficient,' he tells you in his Answer, 'he will not be weary of them till he has restored Christendom to such a peace, &c.' No body but God

Almighty can tell the event of the war. Would not the affront you received at Catham, in firing your ships, have augmented, if, after that, you had voted never to lay down your arms, till you had revenged yourselves? And yet now you would make peace, and have the Pyrenean Treaty calculated purely between the French and the Spaniards, and no part of Europe else concerned in it; no, not Holland. When the king of Spain, or any of that league comes into a war, the king is a party in the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and by that you are not obliged to the Pyrenean Treaty. Now the king finds France go on to conquer Flanders. The case stands thus; here is great advantage to the Confederates by your sitting; we hear of nothing done, though great preparations have been made by the French in Alsace and in Flanders, and the Confederates are in a low and sad condition; but by the addition of the king's strength, they may hold up their heads, unless this Treaty with Holland be ruined by you; and then you will quickly hear very fatal news in the consequence. Allow that the project sent to France should be accepted, and that those conditions are not so great as you would have had, yet you will have the guarantee of the Confederates.—That peace the king of France has by the king of England; not that England makes that peace, but that he consents to it. If the king agrees not to it, of consequence the king of England is left alone. If the king be not helped, can he make it alone? If the king be left out, what kind of peace the king of France will give you alone, I leave you to think. I desire you to have assurance, that what the king can do, he will do. If his arms are weak, he can do nothing. If it were lawful for me to show you letters that I can produce, all the house would be of my mind. One cheerful vote will end all this.

Lord O'Brien. In that Address to his majesty (in May) we pointed at 'Alliances with the States General, and other Alliances, and for support of them his majesty might rest assured, we would assist him.' These Alliances, he tells you, he has made, the consequence whereof is war; and have you not brought him into a war? When monarchies insult and conquer, the subjects may have conditions, but the monarchs never. Therefore, without delay, I would go into a committee of the whole house, to consider of a Supply for the king to support these Alliances.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The king's Message is large, and consists of many parts. There are many expressions in it that grieve me. If we have given just offence to his majesty, in our Address, and former precedents, instruct us, and we ought to be sorry. Whatever we do, it becomes us, in duty, to give the king satisfaction, and be ashamed, and ask his pardon and forgiveness. Preparatory to that, I would have the king's Paper considered to-morrow. I am not satisfied that the Alliances mentioned are made according to our former Addresses. Formerly, upon our Addresses, we have had satisfaction, and have given Supply thereupon. In all former Alliances there was a quota expressed for Lorraine, Spain, Holland, &c. This 40,000 men and 90 ships, in the king's Speech, is a doubt to me, what quota Holland must come up to. Formerly we saw all before us—And when we know what our parts are to bear, in this confederacy, or whether we are to bear the whole burden of the war, then it is time to talk of aids to support the war.

Mr. Mallet. One false step made by this parliament in this great affair, and England is lost for ever. What is done in it, I would have done with true light and good understanding, and I am for the consideration of it tomorrow.

Col. Birch. I have such a difficulty upon my spirits, as I never had since I was born. As the union of the house, in our last Address, gave me great rejoicing, so dividing of opinion, in this matter, makes me tremble. A right understanding amongst ourselves will prevent the greatness of the king of France, above all things. We were all of a mind, the other day, in the Address, and I wonder it is not so now. Surely it is for some great reason, and I would know what reason. Whatsoever we resolve of, I would not have a negative.

Sir George Downing. I have seen sadder days here than Birch speaks of, which he knows as well as I; but let that pass. I hope there will be no cause of division amongst us, and that, in what we do, we shall have no negative. I saw the other day the meaning was good to engage the kingdom in the Pyrenean Treaty: but that treaty was never brought to the table. I saw the meaning was good, and therefore I said nothing. The thing is wholly mistaken; the king's Speech is entire. After you have voted Supply, the rest is gradual, and you may go by steps. Consider, is France to be dallied with? Threaten him, and not dare to strike him? We may be stricken before we are ready strike. When I consider what has been called, 'the grievances of French counsels amongst us,' they are departed, since the time the prince of Orange a protestant prince, was married to the heir of the crown; and now we demur in going into a grand committee.

Mr. Powle. If I could be satisfied that we are wholly departed from French counsels, I would not be backward to go into a grand committee, to consider his majesty's Message. But these four years, Addresses have been made to prevent the growing greatness of the French, and the ministers declare against him, and yet France grows great under these counsels. I fear some inclination is still amongst the ministers to France, and they have brought us to the brink of ruin. And we may lay all considerations aside, if we suffer this;—ever by urgent necessity to be driven from Religion and Property. The apple of contention in the king's Message is as if the house had no interest to concern themselves in war and peace. If we look not to the interest of this house, it is in vain to think of any thing abroad. The king may make war and peace, and the house may advise war and peace; and this might have been done sooner, if you, Mr. Speaker, had not leaped out of the chair, and would not suffer gentlemen to speak, but adjourned the house. I can show precedents out of my small store, that the constant practice of the house has been otherwise. Now we are told, 'that here is a league offensive and defensive made with Holland, for preservation of Flanders.' And Money is called for to maintain that Treaty, and we know not one word of it. Must we be kept thus in the dark! When an Aid was desired in parliament for supporting the Triple Alliance, Mr. Secretary Morris opened every particular of it to the house. In the last war with the Dutch, the king offered to show us all the League with France. We are told in the king's Paper, 'he has communicated this Treaty to several of his Allies, and they approved it;' and why must we only be kept in the dark, who are called upon for money to support it? We have not brought Christendom into this danger; therefore we should not be alone to bring it out. I would see this Treaty, and then will support it as far as any man. I would adjourn the house now, that in the mean time the honourable persons who may know our desires, may come better instructed to inform us farther.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. It is moved, that the debate be adjourned to see how things stand, as to the Alliances his majesty hath entered into. And not to enter into the matter, unless the house go into a grand committee. But because something has been spoken, as to the king's ministers, I will answer. I will say, I know not the alliances, allies, nor the quota. For the terms we are upon, as much has been said as is fit to tell you. The king has spoken it out. It is a League with Holland, offensive and defensive, and that is spoken out; and after this is known, I take war to be declared, and that our neighbour, the French king, is at liberty, by the law of God and man, to take advantage upon us, when the king has so said to his people. Those Alliances are made, that you asked for, and which the nation longed for, and groaned for, and it is a cause for the French king to enter into war with us, and to seize our merchants. Let God and the world judge now, should this thing rest here, where the fault lies. This is, in sum, to answer, all intermediate doubts of what Alliances are produced by the king; and there is a great difference between what you ask of the king to do, and what the king does of himself. The thanks of this house did not go to the Alliances the king told you he had entered into, and that is a great arrear of thanks. I move that the house will go now into a grand committee.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I find it insisted upon, that we should see the Treaty. I ask this only, why is not this Treaty published in Holland, as well as here? Showing it, or not showing it, depends upon the nature of the treaty. Showing the treaty is when the king pleases, but it is not always to be showed upon demand. If 40 precedents of showing treaties in this house, be better than 500 to the contrary, I leave it to you. If the condition be of part of a treaty to be published at the parliament of Paris, or here, it must be by both parties so agreed. There may be things in the treaty not fit to be communicated to 500 men.

Mr. Jones. I am sorry we are compared to the parliament of Paris, or the States of Holland. I am but raw in the matter of the king's Message, and would fully consider of it. If there be reason for it, I should supply the king to support the Alliances, but I doubt surprize in it, it is so hastily moved for.

Lord Cavendish. The honourable person at the bar put it to you, 'that this Treaty was not fit to be communicated to 500.' But I think it very fit to be communicated to 500 that must give Supply to maintain it. By the great delays of counsels, wherein we are kept in a dark mist, I cannot but suspect that, if we blindly give Supply, without knowing for what, it will be too late to consider any thing. All agree we owe so much respect to the king as to consider of his Message, besides the importance of the thing. Therefore I would have to-morrow for it.

Mr. Solicitor Winnington. I rejoice at the unanimity of the house, in preventing the growing greatness of the French king, that he may not destroy us. I observe that the present question is about the time of consideration, not of the Supply itself: to delay it till to-morrow will seem some dissatisfaction to the king. I find still we are unanimous for Supply, to suppress the greatness of the French king. Delay will look as if there were not full satisfaction in every man, in the king's Speech. The nature of the Alliances is not, indeed, set out by the king. Peace and war, it was never doubted, was the authority of the crown to determine. But all instruments of Treaties of that nature, in the Crown Office, show that the king makes peace and war for the people's good, and parliaments are to give assistance to the king's good intention. Though kings resolved it, yet parliaments voided it.

Sir Tho. Meres. If this treaty, that the king's ministers tell us of, be so good and desired by the confederates, and we may not see it, it may be good for them, and not for us. However, if we must be urged, upon our words, to stand by his majesty in these Alliances, pray let it be upon our own terms, for we never promised the supporting them, but upon our own terms; and let us see whether the Treaty be good for us. I have read the king's answer to our last Address, I see nothing new in it. I thought we should have seen Alliances. We said, in our Address to the king, 'No, unless Alliances were imparted to us.' I would willingly hear a new thing said. It is past over in silence that we have a right to the defence of England. Though I would not move an angry point, yet I must say, that it is the call of our writ; by it, you are 'to consult of such arduous and difficult affairs as shall fall before you.' You have a right then to discourse it, and you have a right to pay for it. We have always spoke for it. There is not a step we have made but is all wrong, if we have not a right to the defence of the nation. Our ancestors have protested to their right of this. Your privileges are, never the less, for burning the Journals of this house; your right is good.

Mr. Finch. When we are told that the king has given us a bone of dissension, in his Message, it is no wonder if we have one here in the house, and are told of French councils. The king has married his niece to the prince of Orange—I would know what those steps are so spoken of, 'still towards French councils,' that occasion these dissensions amongst us. I would let the world know the reason why we apprehend French councils. If we have suffered damage by the ministers delay in concluding these Alliances, we ought not to increase jealousies, by letting it be longer in their hands, but dispatch it. A sharp sword must do now what a cudgel might have done formerly; and, by the same reason, it will cost more hereafter, if we delay it now. We have been told by some gentlemen that they would see the particulars of these Treaties. To that it has been answered, how inconsistent would that be in so great an assembly! There was a time, (and I hope there will never be such another) when the king and lords were put out of the government, and the commons only retained. Yet they thought not themselves fit to manage affairs of state; but made a council of state for that purpose. I would not abase the prerogative in this great affair, now so useful to our safety as well as the king's honour. But it is said, 'That other princes know these Treaties, and we must not.' To that I answer, they are a supreme power, and we are not. We are told likewise, 'That there are many precedents that the king has anciently advised with his parliament, in Treaties.' But we need not ancient precedents for that; the king has communicated his to you now; and now that our neighbour's house is on fire, and it is coming to our own, a punctilio of Order of our house may stop the affairs of all Christendom. There is no force in Christendom able to withstand the French. The hazard of the war is great, and the expence is as certain. We are unfit to partake the prerogative with the king, though he may please in his grace and favour sometimes to descend to us. Do you expect the thanks of the country for delay? their rage, rather, and the discontent of Christendom; and I hope, the Order of the house will never obstruct this great affair.

Mr. Sachevell. I know not what answer to give, but I know what mind the country are of. They will not be pleased if we thrust a sum of money blindly into those hands that have so ill managed affairs. It is but to strengthen the hands of those who have ill managed things for the interest of the nation. They, by virtue of their places, may reconcile themselves to the king, which I cannot, being a private person; but I must, in public, ask those gentlemen, when the house has branded them for doing wrong, when ever the house has sat down tamely under it? the same influence from these men has branded the parliament, to make it odious. As to the king's prerogative, we have done it wrong in nothing, and such as persuade the king that we have done so, deserve not to have the management of this great affair. How should those counsellors see this now, that have gone 7 years another way? four years together the parliament addressed Hen. vii. about the loss of Britany. They gave a Supply for it, and they trusted the ministers, and as long as they gave nothing was done, and when Britany was lost, much about the 3d of Dec. just at that time, the king, council, and chanceller, all moved the parliament for a Supply, or all was lost. In Edw. ivth's time, he desired to make his Will, for he would go over to succour Burgundy*. And he went over when all was lost. The great men about the king had pensions then from the king of France, on record in the parliament of Paris, for life, all but the lord Hastings, lord chamberlain, who would give no acquittance for it. When Hen. vii. was first moved by the duke of Britany for assistance, the king of France sent to him to sit still. His council advised him to mediate a peace, and they mediated so long till all the dukedom of Britany was gone—12 Edw. iv. The ministers pursued this practice. A war, and an alliance was made with the duke of Burgundy, in all haste, and, when that was done, the ministers found it a fine game to receive pensions from the French, and raise money at home, and always were in haste, and they must have money from the parliament for this war to save Burgundy from the French; but all Burgundy was lost by it. What end can our ministers now have in not showing us these articles, but their being conscious to themselves who made the French Alliance, that they are faulty? the very same steps are taken now as were then, in all things, but taking pensions. The king's prerogative of making peace and war, is always allowed, as I will vouch, when there is an entire compliance between the king and parliament, and no division, as in 6 Edw. iii. The king called a parliament for a particular end, to consider of the French affairs; they met on Monday, and adjourned to Thursday, without taking any intimation from the king. They advised him to consider of the affairs of Scotland and Ireland, though they were not at all recommended to them. The commons advised by themselves, and the bishops and lords by themselves, and it was called 'a new advice.' The commons desired prerogative, because all their members were not come up—they met, and the commons gave by themselves, and the lords by themselves. I can never pass by that; nor ever will give a penny of money till the Treaties are produced.

Sir John Ernley. Misfortunes of a later date did arise, more lately, by a difference between the lords and commons. I have heard to day such language of 'French councils and French money,' as I never heard before. Where any such are to be found, let them be hanged, and the money melted, and put down their throats. The king has done in the Alliance more than you ask, and has given the best security in nature. He has chosen the best alliances, and it is at your door to have them supported. Can it be thought you can have help, if this alliance be not embraced? shall Spain, or the confederates help you? are you told of this war, and will you not enter into it? this war will not keep cold. The French may seize your money now in their kingdom, and your Leeward Islands. Is your house on fire, and will you not quench it, but run to enquire who made it, by thus exclaiming against privy-counsellors? go into a grand committee to consider of supporting these alliances, the best course you can take.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If you will allow these discourses, there is the same freedom for me, as for Sacheverell. It is 'evil counsel,' I am sure, to defer aiding the king to supply these Alliances, and it is as desperate counsel as France can give. If there be any traitor in the king's councils, let him be found out.

Mr. Sacheverell. I desire to explain myself. The distance of the place from me to these gentlemen, that have taken exception at what I said, might make me misapprehended. They apprehended, 'that I seemed to charge the present council with taking French money.' I said, 'there are all the steps now taken as in the precedent I mentioned, except taking pensions.'

Sir Edw. Boynton. Did I think that putting off the consideration of the king's Message till to-morrow would retard the main business, I should not be for it. To be unanimous, is more than in the time of to-day, or to-morrow. Presently to go into the great business! I doubt much that we are in the dark, as much as when we came out of the country. I am as still. Formerly, upon great occasions, when Aids were demanded, we went down to consult our country, and had nothing but a day's time to consider the matter; that we must lay into money, from managing our country affairs! Whip a vote for two millions in the Dutch war, for Ships, and we never have been strong at sea, since; such temptation that money gave to be profuse. Pray let the consideration be to-morrow.

The question for resolving into a Grand Committee, to consider of his majesty's Supply, was then carried, 193 to 151.

Feb. 5. The house is a grand committee on the Supply, came to this Resolution, "That the house doth agree with the committee, that a Supply be given to his majesty for the support of his present Alliances made with the States General of the United Provinces, for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands, and lessening the power of France."

Feb. 6. Resolved, "That 90 ships are necessary for the support of his majesty's present Alliances," &c. Which was agreed to by the house.

Further Debate on the Speaker's irregular Adjournments of the House.] Feb. 9. The debate on the Speaker's Adjournments of the House was resumed.

The Speaker. After the king's command of adjournment of the house, I declared the house (as I thought was my duty) adjourned accordingly.

Sir Tho. Charges. Lord Coke, in his Institutes, speaks at large of Adjournments of parliaments; where he declares the house of commons to be a court, and says, 'that adjournment of the house is not the single act of any one person, but of the whole court. Prorogations and adjournments were formerly convertible terms (as he tells you) but altered since. That of adjournment is always by general consent of the house, and if any one scruple arises, the Speaker cannot adjourn till it be removed, and the method is so in both houses of parliament.' I did enquire whether the lord chancellor, in the house of lords, did ask the lords pleasure, whether they would adjourn? and he had it in direction from the lords to adjourn. And in one of the late adjournments, the lords had a writ of error recorded before they adjourned. The lord chancellor is a man of great experience, and learned in parliament affairs, and would not do contrary to the lords commands, which he received. Now, whether will you read those records, which, you say, Mr. Speaker, will satisfy us in your proceedings? I would either have it done, or refer them to a committee to examine the authenticity and weight of them. And I move that the lawyers may be sent for from Westminster Hall, as is usual in such cases. There is one learned gentleman has studied the point, and may be of great help to us.

Sir John Ernley. I hear this house called 'a court' but we are no judicature, we cannot give an oath, our clerk is but 'Saberclericus.' The lords clerk is 'Clericus Parliamentum.' Full parliament is 'a Court.'

The Speaker. I had not all my precedents when this matter was last touched upon. I have since searched farther; and it is the doctrine I have learned from my predecessors, that when the king commands an adjournment of the house, it is your duty to obey it without any matter intervening; and till you declare the contrary, I shall continue to do what I have done formerly. If it be your pleasure, I shall open the nature of the thing, and leave it to your consideration.

Sir Phil. Warwick. A thing you would not have debated I will not begin to debate, since it is the king's authority. Consider the nature of the thing, whether the king cannot adjourn this house at his pleasure; and, after that, whether you can enter into any debate. I would see precedents of the thing, as has been moved, and those Records, the Speaker says, he has, to justify himself in what he has done.

Sir Tho. Meres. I observe, that when a troublesome matter comes before the house, and is once put off, it is seldom taken up again. But now we are come to our day, and we begin to debate it, I will wholly waive the present debate of the king's prerogative. This matter of adjourning the house is a question very requisite to be determined, which way soever it be, and I would by no means have you let it go, but settle it. I desire that those who are conversant in things of this nature, may be sent for, to attend, and the mace sent to call them up. And, I hope, in an hour or two, to find it a very clear case. Prorogation is not the point in question, and if you debate what is convenient, there will be no end of that; but let us go upon custom of parliament, which is the easiest way, and the matter will be quickly decided.

The Gentlemen of the Long Robe were sent for by the mace.

Mr. Powle. I allow the king's prerogative to call, adjourn, and prorogue parliaments. The question is not that, but the manner of exercising that power. That being premised, I conceive this is the right, and ought to be, of the house, adjourning themselves. Calling and dissolving parliaments is an act relating to the government of the nation; but adjourning the house, from time to time, relates to the affairs of the house, and is lodged in the house; and ought not to be communicated to the king, but by the mouth of the Speaker. It is a power always to reside in the house, who knew best how their affairs stand, and may be very inconvenient if in the king. The way of doing it by the king, is either by himself in person, in pleno parlamento, or it is done by commission, or writ, under the great seal, and no private message by the secretary or message under the signet is of authority, to adjourn us, unless, in pleno parlamento, as I have said. The king cannot call a parliament under his signet, nor any other way but by his writ, under the great seal. Though the house does take notice of Messages from the king, yet we are not bound by them. It has been said 'we are a court;' but the powers are diminished since the two houses separated themselves: though I can bring several precedents that we are a court of record. I take the lords house, and the commons to be but one court in judgment of law; and that is the high court of parliament. It must follow then, that the king must adjourn the whole court; either he must take the whole, or leave the whole, as in the courts of Westminster. If the king should adjourn the house of commons, and leave the lords sitting, or the lords, and leave the commons sitting (their actings mutually relating to each other as to the legislature) it would breed a confusion; and no man knows how far the lords court would extend itself upon lives and estates. Little now is left farther to be said; for if the power of adjournments be not in the crown, it cannot be in the Chair. The Speaker is called 'the mouth and tongue of the house,' which speaks the conceptions of the mind. Not that he is to make those conceptions, but pronounce what he has in command from the house. Lenthal, the Speaker, (upon an occasion known to most) told the late king 'He had neither tongue, eyes, nor ears, but what the house gave him*.' And having said all this, I think I have showed you some kind of reason for my assertion, that it is the right of the house to adjourn themselves. Now how this matter of Adjournment has been in practice; I am not so well versed in precedents, as other gentlemen. I have a book in my hand, of all the main precedents in Rushworth's Collections, which I shall rather make use of than those in particular cabinets. In 3 Charles, the king sent a Message to the house, not to adjourn the house for the Easter holidays, which by reason of the departure of many members they intended to do, but to continue sitting †. Sir Rob. Philips excepted first against this Message of non-recess, and took notice that in the 12th and 18th of king James, upon the like intimation, the house resolved that it was in their power to adjourn, or sit, and moved for a committee to consider thereof, and of our right herein, and to make a declaration; and accordingly it was appointed. And resolved, that it being now yielded unto, in obedience to his majesty, it might not turn to prejudice in time to come. Sir R. Philips and sir Edw. Coke both urged then, that the business of the house is always done by the house itself. Coke then cited a case of a Corrody, &c. The king sends his writ for a Corrody to an abbot, for a vallet; if it be ex rogatu, though the abbot yields to it, it binds not, but if without it, the abbot is charged by such a pension, for life of the vallet. So Coke desired that the Adjournment of the house might be entered upon the books, 'Ex rogatu, non ex mandato, Regis.'

The Speaker then asked Mr. Powle, Whether the Records, he had recited agreed with the original?

Mr. Powle answered; Those in private hands agreed with Rushworth, and proceeded. In the 18th of king James I, the king had a mind to adjourn the house by commission: some then checked it in the house, for they found the commission was not directed to them; and therefore took no notice of it, but adjourned themselves. The next thing I shall mention is the strongest case of all, though not in all respects; and that is the case of lord Finch. The declaration, and causes of dissolving that parliament, which he was Speaker of, and the whole matter is in print, which sufficiently justifies me in the precedent. The 23d. of Feb.* the king sent to the house of commons to adjourn themselves for ten days. (The house was then in a Grand Committee. The Speaker signified the king's pleasure, and asked leave of the house to attend the king as he had commanded him; they gave him leave. The Speaker then delivered the king's command of adjourning the house, without a question, or admitting any farther speeches. Sir John Elliot then presented the house a Remonstrance against the lord treasurer Weston, to be read. The Speaker then leaped out of the chair, (as you, Mr. Speaker, have several times done) but offered not to adjourn the house, but would not suffer any man to proceed, and refused to put questions, and alleged he had the king's command for it: for had he supposed himself in that power, he needed not to have refused to put questions but might have adjourned the house without a question. Then a long time intermitted till that parliament, called 'the three weeks Parliament,' met. And although an intermission of 19 years, and Finch was removed into the lords house, yet the thing was revived, and debated. The short parliament was much better than that which succeeded, for the house then consisted of learned and worthy men, and therefore I lay the more weight upon it. And if the king had complied with that parliament, much of the misfortunes which afterwards happened, might have been prevented, in all human probability. The Vote they then made, was 'That the Speaker (sir John Finch) refusing to put a question, being thereunto required, or to adjourn the house upon any command whatsoever, without the consent and approbation of the house itself, are breaches and violations which highly impeach the privilege of parliament.' When the king had made a verbal command of adjournment, and signified it, and no adjournment shall be made; I dare venture the cause upon that issue. The Long Parliament came after, and lord Finch was impeached the 27th of Dec. Whilst the house was in debate upon the Impeachment, lord Finch asked leave of the house, and obtained it, to make his defence, and made the Speech in the printed paper.† This was done very early in that parliament, before any disturbances began, and, without question, that was an assembly of knowing and learned men. And his adjournment of the house by the king's command was voted a crime, and was the second Article in his Impeachment. For the Speaker to forbid a man to speak, is an offence of a high nature. For if that Speaker could have pretended power of adjournment, he might have done it, without forbidding gentlemen to speak. The lord keeper made this apology for himself, amongst several others in print, at large, 'humbly to beseech you all to consider that if it had been any man's case, as it was his, between the displeasure of a gracious king, and the ill opinion of an honourable assembly, he beseeched them to lay all together, lay his first actions with the last, and he would submit to the honourable construction of the house.' Now, for a more recent precedent, you will find in the king's two printed Speeches in the Convention, (though that was no parliament) yet one very like it. The king sent to the commons, when they had passed the Act of Oblivion, to adjourn themselves; and the king, in his speech, then did direct them to adjourn. The king could not think he had it in his power, he might else have as well done it then himself. In 1670, the king tells the commons, 'because they had been a long time from home, he was content they should adjourn themselves.' Oct. 26, 1677, The king in his Speech, says 'he intends the house of peers may, and the commons may adjourn themselves.' Whoever advised the king to do that, took it not for the king's prerogative to adjourn the house, but for the house to adjourn itself; and so it would have been the last time, if the house had been let alone by the Speaker. The house of lords has a Roll of Record of their standing Orders, and amongst them there is one 'That the chancellor shall not adjourn the house without Order from the house.' You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that motions were made for printing your Speech, and it was debated, and all that, after the king had signified his pleasure of adjournment of the house. This is all that I have to say in this matter. I have only opened it to give occasion to the gentlemen of the long robe to inform you farther, that the thing may be set right.

Mr. Sacheverell. This debate began first upon a charge in writing that I, some time since, delivered against the Speaker, (p. 898). The question now before us is not betwixt the house and the crown, in matter of Adjournment, but betwixt the Speaker and us. I have sought writings and records, to justify the right of the house in this matter. I am willing to part with that Charge I brought in, and since the house has waved it, I shall do so too; and will acquiesce in what the house shall determine.

Sir Tho. Meres. As Powle has mentioned the constitution of parliament in precedents from 60 years downwards, I would yet come lower. He said, 'As the lords have thought good not to be under that difficulty of adjournment by the chancellor, so we may be set out of it also by the Speaker, and may declare that the house is not to be adjourned without their own consent.' If the point be so put down upon your books, our day of debate upon this matter is ended, and the thing rests quiet. Every act here is by the consent of the house, two ways: it is had either upon the question, or by common consent. If entered, 'Ordered, upon the Question,' then it has been a debate. If the thing pass by common consent, it is entered, 'Ordered, only. So for Adjournment, if no question of it be made, then it is very frequent for the chair to order it upon the universal cry, 'adjourn, adjourn.' But if the Speaker be moved for a question, he cannot deny it. The thing itself is sufficiently declared when no man contradicts it. Generally the thing is thus entered by skilful clerks; possibly new clerks may do otherwise; yet they should not. The 20th of Dec. 1661, after the house was called up by the black rod to attend the king, who signified his pleasure of adjournment, the house came down, and resolved upon matters to be done at their next meeting, after that adjournment was signified. The king's pleasure of adjournment does but signify that day; but so that no minutes must be spent to set your house in order, cannot be the intention. As if a member should be beaten, coming from the lords house hither, will you not consider that breach of privilege? When the king signifies his pleasure of adjournment, it is not to be refused, and no parliament will ever refuse adjourning. In 1661, the adjournment was entered into the books, upon the question put, and the house adjourned, &c. by the consent of the house, which the entering the question plainly shows. In 1668, after the king's pleasure signified of adjournment, the house adjourned itself; though it was not entered 'by a question,' yet it is 'by Order,' which implies consent. The 1st of April, 2 Ch. i. the king desired the house would adjourn, and they debated the reason of it, and they divided upon the question, though it was carried as the king would have it; and the Speaker adjourned the house accordingly. These precedents are all plain upon your books. What I say is for the interest of king and parliament, and I would have the question easily wound up, as the lords have done, viz. 'That the house is not to be adjourned by the Speaker without their own consent.'

Mr. Mallet. The great minister of state, the earl of Clarendon, once attempted to have all powers involved upon a committee of lords and commons, upon pretence of a Plot, which was plainly for setting up a Standing Army; and what the king did was by the instigation of that minister. I desire, that the Order moved for, which the lords have made, may be a standing Order, and as perpetual as that of the Medes and Persians.

The Speaker. I have taken out of the Journal Books what I shall represent to you, in this matter of Adjournments, and leave it to your consideration. Prorogations and adjournments may be done by the great seal, the king absent, by commissioners; and, by the king present, 'ex mandato regis.' Adjournments from day to day are sometimes by the desire of the king, and sometimes by the desire of the house. That of adjournment by commission is a prerogation to some uses, though not to all, all bills remaining in statu quo, &c. and all committees ceasing, and privilege also. If the king be present at the adjournment, it is then catered into the book, 'ex mandato domini regis.' In Edw. i's time, the commons desired to consult their country upon an Aid demanded, before they granted it, and they were adjourned by the king. When that king was absent, they were adjourned by the queen, and the chancellor, and all bills were left, in statu quo. But not committees. No entry is made, in the lords Journals, of the houses adjourning themselves from Edw. vi's time, and from Hen. viii's time, to the end of the Long Parliament by a question. No entry is made of the commons adjournment, unless when the king commanded the adjournment, as in the case now before you. In king James's time, the ordinary adjournments, from day to day, were not entered into the Journal. That of the 12th James was not a parliament, for nothing was done in it; no bills passed. But in that Journal there are no footsteps of this matter. In the 13th James, all the king's adjournments were made by commission, and then the king signified his pleasure of the intended adjournment. The commons were dissatisfied with it, and desired to sit some time longer, till the bills before them were brought to some perfection; the commons sent a Message to the lords, to join with them in a Petition to the king for leave to sit longer, and the lords refused to join with them, and declared, 'that the adjourning, calling, and dissolving parliaments was the sole right of the crown.' But, at a conference afterwards, they acquainted the commons, 'that, by this Adjournment, the king had declared to them, that the Bills depending in each house should not be cut off by the adjournment;' and the commons rested satisfied. But king James told the commons, in harsh terms, his dislike of their proceedings, and commended the duty of the lords. The commission then for adjourning the parliament the commons avoided reading in their house, because not directed to them, but they obeyed the king's pleasure in adjourning, though not by that commission; and several adjournments afterwards succeeded one another. But it is noted in that Journal, 'That a motion being offered for writs to issue out to supply vacancies, the house refused to make any Order in it, being to adjourn, and would hear no motion that day.' I speak this to show that no question was ever put, nor business ever done, after the king's pleasure of adjournment was signified. 1st Ch. i. the lords sent to the commons to come up to the lords house, to hear the king's commission of Adjournment read. The commons sent the lords this Answer to their message, 'That it was according to ancient precedents, that the house of commons always adjourned themselves.' Now the question was only, whether the commons should be adjourned in the lords house, or here; and the commons then adjourned to Oxford to the 1st of August. 3rd. Ch. i. the Speaker brings a Message from the king, to require the house to make no farther proceedings in business, and that the house should adjourn all committees; and the house was adjourned accordingly. A Message was sent from the lords, to signify 'that the king gave leave to the houses to sit a few days longer, to perfect the Petition of Right, and the Bill of Subsidies, and that they might go hand in hand.' I speak this to declare Adjournment, by commission, to be in the nature of prorogation. 5th Ch. i. Feb. 25. A Remonstrance was prepared by some members, after an adjournment of that day to the 2nd of March, which being proposed, sir John Finch, the then Speaker, said, 'He had a command from the king to adjourn the house to the 10th of March,' and put no question of adjournment, and refused to put any question. Mr. Sec. Coke delivered the Message of the house adjourning on the 25th of Feb. till the 2nd of March, and the Speaker adjourned the house accordingly, without a question, or particular command from the house. The house being met according to that adjournment, some called to the Speaker to put the question about the protestation, or remonstrance. He refused to put the question, and proffered to go out of the Chair, and the riot thereupon followed. The Little Parliament, in 1640, was not a parliament in law, having done no act. Though a parliament met not till ten years after, they fell into examination of the breach of privilege the last day of the sitting of the former parliament, by the Speaker. The matter of fact was stated, and the house came to a resolution in this vote, 'That the Speaker, (sir John Finch) refusing to put a question, being thereunto required, or to adjourn the house upon any command whatsoever, without the consent and approbation of the house itself, are breaches and violations which highly impeach the privileges of parliament.' I observe, that the house was then possessed of a debate, and the Speaker refused to put a question, and that was the thing complained of, and the particular article relates to nothing else, but the matter of fact depending in the house; and I make no question, nor ever did, that when the king commands an adjournment, it is the act of the house, and the Speaker can do no otherwise. But this always has been the form of doing it, when the king commands you to adjourn, and it is because you receive the king's command, and execute it after another kind of method than other things are done. The king sent a Message to the house, by the attorney general, and a question arose how the Message should be received: the attorney was ordered to come to the bar, and the Speaker and the house to be bare during the time of the delivery of the message, that no disrespect should be given to the king's command. No man that is not a member, but is called into the house by a question. But it was never known that a question was ever put for calling in the black rod, the king's messenger. We met here, upon an adjournment, and there was a motion for a writ to be issued out to fill up a vacancy, and you ordered no question to be put, the black rod knocking at the door. I say all this to show, that, in receiving the king's command, and executing it, it is not done as in other cases. For adjournment, upon the king's command, there is never any question put, because the obedience to it is never doubted, and where there is no room for a doubt, there is none for a question. 'The king commands the house to adjourn, and they will not.'—There is no precedent of any such thing. A gentleman did rise up to speak, when I adjourned the house, and all the house called out, 'Adjourn! adjourn!' and none 'Not adjourn.' I think I did then what I ought to do, in adjourning the house, and shall do it again, till I am otherwise ordered by the house.

Lord Cavendish If you had not adjourned the house the last time, the next question would have been, to put another in your place. I was at the first against bringing a charge against the Speaker, but I desire that the privilege of the house may be asserted. I thought, Mr. Speaker, you yourself was once of another opinion. In the last April adjournment, when the house came from the lords, a gentleman moved, 'That the Speaker might print his speech, which he made at the lords bar.' You, Mr. Speaker, did not say then, 'That no man could speak after the king's pleasure of adjournment was signified.' You made a modest reply, but said not, 'That no man could then make a motion.'

The Speaker. Mr. Secretary Coke presented the Remonstrance to the king, 2 Ch. i. and the king said, 'he would consider of it.' But there was no command then that the house should adjourn.

Sir Tho. Meres. The king in his proclamation says, 'The house may adjourn themselves.'

Mr. Poole. That precedent you mention, Mr. Speaker, of 2 Ch. i. shows no difference then between the Speaker and the house about Adjournment; you seeming to put by the blow, by that precedent. Had the Speaker then adjourned the house, there had been no room to call for the question. But take the Vote in sir John Finch's case, it is one thing what is done ill de jure and another out of respect to the king; and in that I would go as far as any man. But for the Speaker to adjourn the house de jure, may be dangerous to the very government. If you will observe that declaration for dissolving the parliament of 5 Ch. i. it tells you the Speaker took the command, &c. from the king, and he cannot do it by a verbal command, which does not imply that the king cannot do it by commission. The king made his command of Adjournment, in May last, to the house, and not to you, Mr. Speaker; and that I insist upon.

Mr. Waller. I like the question proposed very well, viz. 'That the house is not to be adjourned by the Speaker, without their consent.'

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Though this is not immediately the king's prerogative, yet it stands upon the confines of it. This point must not be upon matter of convenience, but perfectly upon matter of fact. We have heard precedents from learned gentlemen, and from yourself, Mr. Speaker, there are many, but if the question be rightly stated, and one word taken into it, viz. 'immediately,' no one precedent comes up to it. But when the king's pleasure is signified of an 'immediate' adjournment, nothing intervened of debate in the house, and it was not executed by a question. The whole hinge of the thing depends upon that single word. It is no doubt nor question, but that Adjournment is the single act of the house, but no business is to intervene before the adjournment. It appears by all precedents, when ever the king has signified his pleasure of adjournment, the house has done as the king directed, nothing intervening. I hope, that, as this is the authority of the crown, you will not make an order to take any of that power away, therefore, in order to the question, it may pass, so as it may not be construed hereafter to take the power out of the crown; that adjournment may not stand in opposition to prorogation, and not leave the government lame and impotent, in whatever emergency may occur.

Mr. Waller. In the word 'immediately' the king is extremely concerned, and more than the house, and I see not, without this question, how the king can be obeyed. If the Adjournment is 'immediately' to be made upon the king's command, then it is to be done sine medio. But yet the message of Adjournment was not sent to the Speaker, but to us, to adjourn ourselves so that if the Speaker does it, without direction from the house, we cannot obey the king, and I say it for the king's sake. The schoolineu say, 'God cannot make a thing to be and not to be at the same time.' This freedom of speech here could never be taken away. If a man be speaking, and the Speaker will not hear him, this is not to hear the house speak. The house is adjourned either by general consent, no man opposing, or in order to it, by a question, and if we cannot speak after signification of the king's pleasure of adjournment, we have no way left of complying with the king's desires. Plainly, in a prorogation of the parliament in the lords house, the lord keeper says, 'My lords and gentlemen, it is the king's pleasure to prorogue this parliament;' but then we are nothing but passive; we are not so in an adjournment. Great bodies must be moved with great majesty. In the act of recognition of the king's title, in king James's time, one bishop gave a great No to it, and it had like to have cost him his life. That instance given by the Speaker, of the black rod knocking at the door, is a perfect mistake, for in that we are perfectly passive. We were called by the king to dissolve us, in the Little Parliament before the Long Parliament. The king calls us to the lords house, and we must go. But in this of a command to the house to adjourn, the king bids us to be active, and shall we disobey him? As to the word 'immediately,' it is a new word, and if new words should throw away old privileges, we shall never want new words, and we shall want old privileges. In this question we are now in for all we are worth, and should it go to the people's ears that we that represent them, are all shrunk into the Chair, and that the Speaker only represents the commons of England, they would not think themselves secure of their lives and fortunes, and would very hardly raise the money you intend. If the Speaker be bigger than us, what bulwark are we of the lives and fortunes of them that sent us hither? You, Mr. Speaker, may be mistaken, and so may the house too, and I would willingly pass it by as to the crime in the Speaker, and put the other question of securing our privileges.

Mr. Finch. I conceive that when the king is in parliament, in person, or by commission, he may adjourn us, and that, to all intents and purposes, in some sense, is a prerogative; but I think the king cannot adjourn this house alone, without the adjournment of the lords also. For every commission of adjournment, or done by himself, in his royal person, is in law a prerogative, and all business ceases. 14 queen Eliz. the commons were sent for to the lords house, where the 'Custos Sigilli privati' adjourned the parliament, and you will find the adjournment entered from May to June. But though 'Custos Sigilli privati ex mandato Domine Regine adjournavit Parliamentum,' I cannot conclude from thence, that, because the king cannot call a parliament by the privy seal, yet by single command the lord chancellor, or lord keeper, &c. may not adjourn the house. From the reason of the thing done, it is your duty to obey the command, and it is no way derogatory to your privileges. If a question be put for an adjournment, it is no adjournment, till the Speaker pronounces it. You cannot adjourn yourselves above an ordinary time, without the king's leave. We are called by the king's writ, and should we adjourn the house for a week, or a month, and the lords do not adjourn, the confusion would be great; and to prevent it, our obedience to the king's command is necessary. Therefore in the king's printed Speeches, the king gives us leave, he directs it, and his consent to it infers that the king's leave is necessary. When sir John Finch refused to put the question, for reading the Remonstrance against the lord treasurer Weston, he was held in his chair, and how could he adjourn the house when held in his chair? the present debate is upon this point; whether, after the king's Message to command us to adjourn, we can proceed to debate any business? I believe we cannot. To that objected of 'a member's being beaten in his return from the lords house,' I thus answer: if adjournment be but one day in law, when the house meets again they may redress that violation of privilege. Suppose the king sends a Message to the house to adjourn at such a time, and in confidence of that adjournment, gentlemen go into the country, will you put it into the power of any numbers of gentlemen about the town to keep on debates, and proceed in business? if so, it will always necessitate the king to prorogations, and not adjournments, and so cut off all bills and business depending, and at your next meeting you must begin all again.

Serj. Maynard. I am sorry to hear things put in this debate neither for the advantage of the crown, nor this house. By the debate, the matter is thus: the king's pleasure of adjournment, being signified to the house, the house must immediately adjourn, without proceeding farther in any business whatsoever. I have attended all the precedents the Speaker has cited, with great care, diligence, and fidelity. I find not, in any proceedings, after king James, this case put into the books in terminis. But we speak not now of the king's power of adjourning and proroguing the parliament, which is always done by record by the great seal, or done in the lords house, by the king in person, where it is entered as a record. The power of pronouncing the Adjournment is certainly not in the Speaker. If it were so, black may be made white, and white black. May not the house, in great humility, after the king has signified his pleasure of adjournment offer him reasons for sitting a longer time? and how can you do that, if adjournment must be made 'immediately' upon signification of the king's pleasure? there is no way of adjourning or dissolving the house but by record. I am bound, as I am the king's serjeant, by oath, to maintain the prerogative, and I am under another obligation here, as a member of this house, to maintain your privileges, which I will do with my tongue. If this be, shall the house be adjourned, and not adjourned? shall the Speaker do it, and the house not do it? when the king opens a parliament, what does the Speaker first crave? liberty of speech. The king calls us, by writ, 'Nobiscum consulendum,' and how can treating be without speaking? the case may be of such an importance, after adjournment signified, as to induce an humble Address to the king from the house; and how can that be done, if the house cannot speak? I have heard say, in former times (though not in so good ones) 'What if the Speaker have a dormant Message to adjourn the house?' I am obliged to speak what I have done, come what will come of it. If the whole house conclude the thing, there is no wrong done. I have sat here in several tormenting debates, and never so unnecessary as when started between the king's prerogative, and the people's liberty, which I take not to be the true state of the question before you.

Mr. Solicitor Winnington. I am obliged to maintain the king's prerogative by the place I hold, and the privileges of this house as a member of it. I will first state that which we all agree to, and then that wherein we differ. The king's prerogative is undeniable, of adjourning, proroguing, and dissolving of parliaments. The lords house is a court of record, as to writs of error, &c. This house is no out of record, because it can give no oath, but I am unwilling to say what this house cannot do. The present case is a tenderness about our privileges. All are satisfied that the debate concerning ourselves is not worth the while. As to the king's power of Adjournment, &c. he may do it in person, and by commission; and that adjournment will be to our disadvantage, as many learned men say, it amounts to a prorogation, and so you may lose the advantage you now enjoy by adjourning yourselves, by the king's command. I find the matter thus stands upwards of 50 or 60 years. It is hard to find any adjournment by the king's command, but always by the great seal, by commission under the broad seal, not by way of message, the king speaking then by record. This adjournment by message is for expedition sake. Though several ages may differ in form, yet the rule of right is still the same. Many times a message of adjournment sent by sign manual only, to prevent the ceremony and state which (being done under the great seal, in the lords house,) it would occasion. The king's pleasure under his sign manual, is represented as a 'Summum jus,' and to be obeyed as a matter sent by the great seal, for in half an hour's time the great seal may be had to do it. I find that Mr. Valler puts great weight upon liberty of speech, and says, 'Would you have the house melt their privileges into the Speaker's chair?' It is possible you may not adjourn upon the king's command, but it is probable you will, because the king in a short time may compell it. If this question be put, that has been proposed, it must be for some good end, or to some purpose. No ancient parliament-man can say that ever such a question was proposed. I fear it will prevent good correspondence betwixt the king and us. To say that the parliament is willing to sit some days longer than the king has signified they should, looks as if we would take a liberty to do what the king could not have done, and so the consequence must be the adjournment by the great seal, (and not by message) or the king in person. Therefore I press for a good correspondence, that we may always comply with the king's message for Adjournment, having always done so. As for sir John Finch's case, should the speaker say, 'he had a Message from the king, and he would adjourn the house,' or say 'That he had a private command from the king to do so,' there would be no end of that. But when the king sends a Message for Adjournment, under his sign manual, when was it ever denied? All that I propose is that jealousies may be laid aside betwixt the king and parliament. The manner of the king's proceedings in these cases is not as between man and man; which makes many a plausible argument in this case fall to the ground. The thing was never contradicted, and we argue but for what is not tanti. It looks as if there was a difference betwixt the king and parliament, and I would have no question put upon it.

Mr. Williams. Though I have not a gown on with tufts, [reflecting upon the Solicitor's gown,] and am in no office of the crown, yet I am bound as much by my allegiance to preserve the prerogative of the crown, as if I had. It is agreed on all hands, that the king may adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve parliaments. So there needs no dispute of adjournment and prorogation; it is well understood, so that the king cannot adjourn one house, and suffer the other to sit. Every step the king makes in an adjournment, is matter of record. The king may adjourn the terms, but it must be in form regularly, by writ under the great seal, read in the court sitting, and then the adjournment is pronounced, and nothing can be done afterwards. But this is still by matter of record. But consent is implied by it, express or tacit. That which provoked gentlemen at these last adjournments was, that several gentlemen stood up to speak, and the Speaker would not hear them speak. I am for the question.

Col. Birch. Those that spoke most to the point have industriously avoided the sore place, relating to the king's power. But if this matter perpetually must be a difference, the argument goes the other way. It was told us, upon making our last Address to the king, 'That there was no such thing ever done, but when swords were drawn;' but we might then have showed precedents of such an Address, if they had been required. Had we then presented the king with these precedents, to clear ourselves in that matter, we possibly might not have had such a Message at last. Suppose any gentleman can tell us of any exploit of the French king, and an adjournment is commanded, must we not debate it? The word of 'adjourning immediately' has been used but twice in my time; and I am always jealous of a new word. Must the king and kingdom be in danger, and we not debate it? No doctrine can be more dangerous to create a misunderstanding betwixt the king and us. I have heard here, formerly, that the lords and we sat together, and one adjournment, or prorogation, served the turn for us both. If the lords cannot be adjourned without their own consent, (as, it seems, they have entered it into their books) and if we may be adjourned without our consents, then there is a clear alteration of the government. We cannot be supposed to disobey the king's command, but if it be to save the king and kingdom may we not debate it? I would not have the lords and us upon two bottoms in this matter.

Sir Philip Warwick. I believe it not intended, but this may prove insidiosus questio; this has made me in my heart against this question. The lords did never, in any age, refuse to adjourn, when the king signified his pleasure to them by a minister of state. It can never be found that the lords denied it. I would avoid the question, and adjourn the house.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I am glad that this debate is separated from your own person, Mr.

Speaker. If the debate has held so long, it is some excuse to the Speaker, that it was a doubtful case. The king who calls us hither by record, sends us not away but by record. If the king required so immediate an adjournment after signification of his pleasure, as some gentlemen would have it, we needed not have come hither, but it might have been done in the Banqueting-House. That point of the king's power of adjourning the house is out of doors, and yielded on all hands. But I hope the king has never had, nor will have occasion to suspect the obedience of this house to his commands. Those kind of adjournments from day to day, and time for eating, and drinking, and keeping holidays, are as ancient as ever since parliaments have sat. But it must be understood, that the house has that power cum grano salis. We cannot adjourn for any long time. The point then is, that the act of adjourning is purely the act of the house, when done here. That we must obey the king is clear, but how this obedience is to be performed is the question. If by the pronouncement of the Speaker alone, without direction from the house, it is dangerous to the whole constitution of parliament. If after 12 of the clock no new business is to be started (which is an Order, and the Speaker has the house on his side) and the Speaker rises up to adjourn, and will hear no man speak, though the matter be of ever so great an importance, or the consequence extraordinary, surely you would not suffer it. Any inconvenience of refusing an adjournment, when commanded by the king, is answered by a gentleman of the long robe, viz. 'The king in half an hour may do it, by commission under the great seal.' Suppose an Act of Recognition should pass, or the taking the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, the question must be put three times, according to order; and can any man imagine there will be a negative? There will be terrible inconveniences, if it be the other way. Some gentleman may rise to speak, not to hinder nor oppose the command of adjournment, but if heard speak, would have moved for the adjournment. It is a fundamental rule of the house, 'that the house cannot be concluded in any thing as long as any gentleman stands up to speak.' That respect is had to the gentleman that stands up, to suppose, that possibly he may say something to give you new light into the matter coming to the question, so as to change the whole thing. It is not known what a gentleman will say, till he speaks. But if the Speaker will not give leave to the house to vindicate their obedience, here is such a power taken from you, that the Speaker, by the same reason, may take the thanks to himself that the whole house deserves for their obedience to the king's commands. I desire that the question may be put.

Mr. Waller. 'Abusus juris non tollit jus.' Much more the imagination of it does not. I would willingly have these shackles from our heels, before we go about to defend our neighhours. This is not the way to have a good understanding betwixt the king and us. Will the Speaker make children of us in the Adjournment? They are asked, 'Will you be baptized into this faith?' But not without god-fathers. The king says, 'we shall adjourn ourselves,' and the Speaker does it.

The house was then adjourned, on a division, 131 to 121, but not the debate, and no question was passed upon the matter of the debate.

Debate on a Supply for carrying on the War with France.] Feb. 13. The house went into a grand committee of Supply.

Sir George Downing. You have voted that the house will give the king a Supply, to support his Alliances. Now the question is, what is to be given to carry on 90 sail of ships, and 30,000 landmen. This being so, charge so much, (that that lies before you is not a mere speculation,) for what time you will make provision for this charge. I wish our end may be obtained by a peace, but I would as little get into a bad peace, as any man here. If now we go away, and provide not for the whole charge, and come back again for the remainder, will that be done like provident men? I would provide for the whole charge of the thing. Christmas seems a more rational time to calculate to, for then the measures of princes are changed for the following year, and it is not prudent to run into arrear till then.

Mr. Waller. I look upon union betwixt the king and his people to be of as much consequence, as the sum to be given; therefore, for God's sake, let us lay aside all distrust of the king. The rule of the government is for us to assist, and the king to make peace and war: let us rely upon him, and I hope for good success. I hope that tomb we have voted to be erected for the late king will bury all the jealousies betwixt the king and us.—There was a great silence for some time.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Whilst we sit still and say nothing, you must do something in the Chair, or we shall do nothing; you must either come to a question, as the Estimates are given in, or go upon a sum in gross. I have said something to day, and on other occasions, for the king's Supply to maintain his alliances, and the king would not have it, at present, nor will more be taken than in reason shall be seen necessary to keep this great force on foot, but till you may meet again. But a less sum (to the ensnaring the hand that takes it) than the king can comfortably proceed, and go on with in this great thing, I hope you will not think of. If there be such a lethargy upon men, they must be waked. The sun shines, sets, and rises, and things go on, as if we were careless, and understand it not. If this war must cost us so much per mensem, the first day's journey is always the longest, and if you consider so much for the months forward, let some gentleman come to a sum by the months, or a gross sum upon the months, as you shall see cause for it hereafter.

Mr. Powle. I wonder not, at the silence of the committee, if every man is in the dark as well as I. I am so much in the dark, that I see not whether we shall have war or peace. The completion of affairs seems rather inclined to peace; and I see not the end of the war, by what fell from the honourable persons the other day, only in making this war to impose peace upon the world. If that be so, the question is, who is our enemy? If the confederates refuse to join with us in it, for ought I know, we shall have war against them. If that matter be not clear, I know not what to give. The honourable persons know what is spent, and is likely to be spent. If they will charge themselves on their reputations; that it will be such a war as will please us, then I would give to maintain it. But I think there seems some flagging in what was formerly told us. When that is cleared, I shall be as ready as any man to give Supply.

Sir Thomas Meres. I hear it complained, 'That nothing is said in this matter of Supply, &c.' You were told of 500,000*l.* as a motion. If the nation be in war, and at stake, no doubt but those here will go through stich with it. And I doubt not but that some will do it. But to show frankness, and discharge my conscience, if it shall be a war to purpose, (but, as it is said, in case of refusal of the French to give towns, it may be a peace for Holland) because I will not spend your time idly, if we give 500,000*l.* in case there be war, we give to purpose.

Mr. Garraway. I hear it said, That there is no proposition made, &c. but we have sat so long, and if the danger be so great as is told us now, gentlemen should have told us of it sooner, and we would have named a sum. We have made the French king an idol, and we must worship him, and he must scourge us. If 250,000*l.* be too little if we have war, if it be peace it is every penny too much.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I aver to you that we are not a hair's breadth towards a peace with France, and the king has not consented to a cessation of arms, nor any thing.

Sir Henry Capel. I would not give such a sum as may make a peace, and pin the basket there. Till we have a war, let us give in some proportion to the noise abroad. I move therefore to cut the thing in the middle. 600,000*l.* may happen to be intended, when 500,000*l.* was moved for and a million moved for. Therefore I move for 800,000*l.*

Col. Birch. I would have a word put into the question, viz. 'For maintaining a war against the French king.' I believe the money will be for a war, or kept for some other use. It is too great a thing to be jested with, and you cannot be looked in the face, if it be not done according to the bill.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The purport of those words is no more than what is understood to be the sense of the words and intention of the order you sit by. Though I take not the words to be of a different sense, and I am not against them, yet you must go to the house for leave for the addition of them to the question. 'To enter into a war with the French king,' is no more than 'to support the alliances.' If the words be insisted upon, we must go to the house for power to add them to the question.

Sir Tho. Clarges. It is not fit to have the words in the question, 'to support Alliances with the States General,' because you are told that the Treaty is not yet confirmed, and it is strange to have it in an act of parliament.

The Speaker. I think it will consist with your order, though it be not in the words of your order. If you will give me leave to take notice of the order of your proceedings, the debates have been upon two sums, &c. I could have wished you had proceeded in another method. In this there is but one way of raising this. When several sums are proposed, and those, debated, the least sum is first put to the question; and then the other sum likewise in competition with the greater sum. So then the competition in the debate is between 600,000*l.* and a million. The other sum of 800,000*l.* interloped. I am never for so great a sum as will fright the people, nor so little a sum as is not to be depended upon by our allies. Shall the ships and men be raised in earnest? That will cost 3 millions, and you give but 600,000*l.* The king has made those Alliances upon our actual engagement and assurances of assisting him only, and, after a computation of so much, you come on with 600,000*l.* There would be no difficulty in this, if the question was betwixt the king and the people only; but others are to take measures too by it, and if you lessen it, they must seek it elsewhere. No man that hears me but will say, that it is an unnatural step to lower the king of France by distrust amongst ourselves. Distrust is a weed apt to grow here, and those, not under the duty we are will despise him; and therefore I never think it will proceed from this house. The greatest consent has been to a million, and will the king part with this duty and loyalty for a million? The king must never look you in the face again upon this cheat, that no particular man would go about to get money by. I will say nothing of the willingness of the nation to lend money, so bit by public faith, but they would caution such a sum of money as to make your coming again necessary. I would have this his act, not ours, not the result of his necessity but your duty, and not to perpetuate ourselves. We must trust the king, and you injure your question by sticking on it so long, and therefore I would have you put it.

Sir Tho. Meres. I affirm it to be order, that, if several sums be put to the question, you must put the least sum first, and so on; but if gentlemen would put 700,000*l.* afterwards, I do not say that question must be put. If I may have leave, I will say a short word to matter of trust. We may be trusted by the seamen. Foreigners may trust us; they have no cause to distrust us: betwixt the king and us it is the most valuable and worthy thing. I recommend it to the ministers, that, when the king has said it, though in a little matter, I am glad it is thought of such a value, and I hope no man thinks much to hear me, but if this has not been so formerly, it is none of our fault. I shall never lay it to the king. I could instance in three points they are ill plants. I shall not mention them. I could rather wish there was no appropriation of this money for ships. I should be rather glad of it. Trust is the best and noblest jewel of the crown.

Mr. Mallet. I agree not with the Speaker, that a sum, having been named, may be waved, and not put to the question. As to all other parts of the Speaker's discourse, in florid language, he says, 'Alliances are made;' but yet there is no discovery of them; but by woeful experience we have found vast deviations of money, and that makes me more cautious. I will say no more.—The question being put for 600,000*l.* it passed in the negative. The question for 800,000*l.* passed also in the negative.

Resolved, "That the sum of one Million be raised, for enabling his majesty to enter into an actual War against the French king." Which was agreed to by the house.

Debate on raising the Million—Tax upon New Buildings.] Feb. 19. In a grand committee on the Supply, on the manner of raising the Million, &c. A motion was made to lay part of the Tax upon New Buildings, &c.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would know what new foundations have been since 1672. Lately, upon trial at law, lord chief justice Hale did declare it legal to build, where foundations were laid. And why may not a man make the best of his own land?

Sir Tho. Littleton. You eased London, and laid the tax upon Middlesex, by reason of these New Buildings; and so they are taxed already.

Sir Nick. Peasley. New Buildings were declared general nuisances in king James's time. They would in time make London too big for the whole body. You may well give a year's value upon them towards this charge.

Mr. Garroway. Young gentlemen, come lately into the house, flatter themselves that this may save their land in this tax. It is now 16 years experience that when we come to result, the thing, I believe, will be upon land; and that is ready calculated for you.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. These New Buildings are one of the banes of the country; they draw away all your tenants, and must not these lands supply your present occasion by way of penalty? Buildings may give something, &c. Those that hire them pay dear, and those that buy them. The owners having made profit of them, to the nation's injury, ought to bear some part of the burden. To lay not more upon land than what will come in upon land, is a necessary caution for this great work.

Serj. Maynard. The question is, where you will lay this tax. A certain sum is most certain to be raised, and most equal. Ever since I have known the law, and practised at the King's Bench, I never knew any general, but this of New Building declared a nuisance. Building itself is no nuisance, but it being an inconvenience to the civil government, is the greatest nuisance that ever was. Though the court of Star-Chamber in some things was a grievance to the nation, and the king could not make a thing unlawful to be lawful by prerogative, yet the Star-Chamber construed the increase of New Buildings to be a contempt, to do an unlawful thing, when there was a proclamation to the contrary.

Col. Birch. If I were sure we should have no war, I would charge land without any more ado. But if gentlemen have a clear sight in this great matter, there is nothing to make you low and contemptible to your enemies, but charging your land. If once you make a concurrent tax upon land, the French king will not be afraid of what you can do. I am for charging land, when we come shoulder to shoulder with the enemy. Till then it will be but vain to charge land. In the body politic it is as in the body natural. If the money does not circulate, all will fly to the head, like the blood, and kill presently. If those at the helm do not consider to bring the blood round again, the many consequences will be fatal. If you lay this tax upon land, the first six months perhaps may come in, but the second six months will sink a third part of the value of the land; and cattle and corn will give nothing. I would have this seriously thought of; there can never be war, if this money be raised by land-tax. I take this as before you; let New Buildings go as the least of evils; keep the tax from lands. I was here in a Convention in 1654, about paying some debts contracted for the navy. (I never saw so many wise men together.) And then it was said, and said again, 'that New Buildings were nuisances,' when all was fair green fields at St. James's.

Mr. Solicitor Winnington. I stand up, in the main, to ease land. But I think there is a mistake in this of new buildings, &c. It is the interest of the house to establish the durable interest of the nation, the freeholder. This debate is charging new buildings, and the reason in the debate is, 'that they are a common nuisance.' Though I am not of the coil, yet I will presume to offer my reasons. A common nuisance is not dispensible but by act of parliament, and is 'a detriment to all the king's subjects.' 27 Eliz. 'No buildings were to be within such a distance of London whatsoever.' But that was but for a number of years. I never knew a nuisance enacted perpetual, but that of exportation of leather, and importation of Irish cattle. When the act was expired, notice was taken of the contempt of it, against a proclamation. When Essex-House was to be pulled down, the society of the Middle Temple thought it an inconvenience. They had the best counsel they could get, but were forced to sit down with as good a composition as they could get. The first cause I ever was of was that between lord Clare, and Clement's Inn. Now they are not a nuisance. Yet there is reason why they should be charged. I think, a very young man may remember the increase of buildings about London. Nothing decays rents in the country like new buildings about London. Labourers in the country, at 6d. and 8d. a day, come here, and turn coachmen and footmen, and get a little house, and live lazily; and in the country the farmer is constrained to pay 16 or 18d. a day through the fewness of workmen, and therefore can pay less rent. They will leave the country for better wages. Sumptuous houses are a great invitation to gentlemen of quality, and their wives, to come to London, where they live better, and more at their ease and content, than with a greater number of servants and expence in the country.

Mr. Garraway. I look upon this tax as unjust, and therefore I am against it. I am taxed to the utmost in the country. If you will say, 'Tax them at the rate of the city of London by reason of their trade, but if for their monies because they have built houses,' I know not, but by the same reason, you will tax all men that have raised estates since the king came in and had nothing before, as if they were Rosicrucian Knights that had got the Powder of Projection.

The first question was put, "Whether one half of the full yearly value should be charged upon all the Buildings erected upon new foundations, without the city of London, and within the weekly Bills of Mortality, since 1630, except such as were demolished by the late fire;" which passed in the negative. The second question, "Whether upon Buildings, &c. since 1640;" passed also in the negative. The third question, "Whether upon Buildings, &c. since 1656;" passed in the affirmative, and was agreed to by the house.

Debate on the Re-assumption of Crown Lands.] Feb. 20. In a grand committee on the Supply—On the Re-assumption of Crown-Lands.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. The duke of Buckingham had 30,000*l.* a year of the crown-lands granted to his father, &c.

Serj. Maynard. King Ch. i. granted many lands to the city of London. Those that bought these lands were so wise as not to keep them. Consider from what time you will make this Re-assumption. That is one consideration. As to tenants that have bought those lands, will you make a distinction of service? Some have done great services for the crown, and have had those lands for a reward: and have not those that purchased been invited by you? 80,000*l.* a year was sold, by act of this parliament, of the king's Fee Farm Rents. If you shall undo the owners of these lands, without any way of consideration, it will be very hard.

Sir Tho. Mompesson. To put this in a method, will take more time than you have to spare. There is a stronger consideration for this of Re-assumption, &c. than the other of New Buildings, and I would have some consideration of that.

Col. Birch. They were chiefly rents bought in the late king's time: but I can show forty times the value now upon improved value. What has been disposed of by act of parliament cannot be touched, and I lay that aside, and it is not considerable in comparison of the others. Kings rarely come to parliament to enter into war: formerly they entered first into war, and then came to the parliament for aid to maintain it. I have heard from serj. Maynard, 'That acts of parliament confirm sales, &c. from such a time;' but none from the 1st of James. Now to make an Act of Re-assumption, from so long a time, would make an earthquake. We have found that deans and chapters' lands were sacred; they were restored, &c. I had bought some, but now I have none: the crown lands are in so many hands now, that it is not practicable to re-assume them, from 1st king James; and not one part in ten is alienated for the tenth part of the value. If you please to put those lands, at a two years value, towards this tax, with a non obstante, where there is an act of parliament for confirmation of them, I think it reasonable.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Either these men that have these crown lands came lawfully by them, or unlawfully. It is not fair dealing to take from the king, &c. and confirm it to parties: if they are lawfully seized of these lands, I know not why they should be taxed for them.

Sir Tho. Meres. Those that have got on a sudden into great wealth and rents, I would have taxed.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think it as great a crime to take away the support of the crown, as to do a thing against the government, like that of New Buildings. The state of the case is quite altered. The king, at his coming in, was possessed of a great quantity of land: I think, of 150,000*l.* per annum. This, together with Excises, and 1,200,000*l.*: and then the solicitor, general Finch said, 'it was all you had to give, and all the king could ask of you;' and since that, the king has had the Chimney Act. An estimate was then brought into the house, it seems for no other purpose than for people to beg them, and the other revenues. And now the king 'cannot speak nor act, &c.' because all the Revenue is gone away. These are arguments why you always must give, and it always must be begged. These lands cannot be given without act of parliament, but re-assuming entirely is a great consideration; but this is only to take from them that have got it, out of what you have paid. Put the question then, 'Whether these lands shall bear any part of the tax;' and how much, is an after consideration.

Mr. Sacheverell. I think these revenues are not to be alienated on any terms, and if gentlemen look upon the grants as good, I am not for charging them to confirm them by it. If you intend to re-assume all the crown revenue, not granted by act of parliament, I am for it. But I would have an act also, to make it penal for the future to obtain such grants, and to make the crown lands unalienable for the future: I am for that.

Sir John Knight. Some would willingly give three years purchase to have these lands confirmed to them, and I would have them re-assumed that they may ease us in the burden of our taxes. In Cornwall there is 30,000*l.* a year of old rents, 100,000*l.* per annum. That is gone out of the crown, which was for the safety of it. You will find 30 several acts of parliament, in former kings times, for Re-assumption of the Crown Lands, and I would have it so now.

Sir Tho. Meres. I would not, by taxing those who have these grants in the crown lands, make a worse or a better title, but leave them in statu quo. I desire to take some profit of them now, and some another time. They may well contribute, for all their lands ought to go to the crown; but by this Act I would have them neither make a better nor worse step than before.

Mr. Williams. This charge you lay upon them is in respect of the profits they have already received. They have intruded into the king's possessions, therefore you do well to right the crown.

Mr. Finch. I am against the question, as it is stated. But neither myself nor any relation I have, has the least interest, direct nor indirect; not one foot of these lands I have, or am likely to have, and so I have no interest in the question, and may speak with the more freedom to it, because I am impartial. The king has an absolute right to these lands; he may sell, or give them—it is said, 'They have been given to deceivers, and obruders. And this will confirm them—and the only intent 'to strengthen some letters patents.' If those letters patents are good already, they need no act to confirm them. Purchasers since 1660 have alienated those lands, by indefeasible title, and paid a consideration. Shall these pay for reversions that never have received the profits?

Sir Edmund Wyndham. Since this of Re-assumption, &c. has been started, I would have something done; people else will sell them, and then you cannot touch them again, when you meet. Therefore I would charge them now.

Sir Gilbert Gerrard. I would go farther than England: I would have the lands given away in Ireland re-assumed, and am ready to give my vote to the question.

Mr. Powle. This debate seems to me as if you had given so much the other day, that now you go a hunting where to find it. What may pass for good grants in Westminster-Hall, may yet be judged otherwise here. To take away the 'patrimonium sanctum,' was always esteemed a crime, and punished no where but here; legislatively, by acts of Re-assumption. But then they have come with fresh pursuit after them. Parliaments may have intervened. Formerly it has been upon a hot scent. Something of crime there is in it; but not such as to make the intruder punishable in Westminster-Hall. When multitudes offend, general punishment is not thought convenient in government. When the king came in, how many hundred thousand pounds were pardoned, which the crown had a right to! But when it is so populously concerned, viz. the whole government, it would do well that they paid a year's value, and that we confirm their titles. If you will go to a total Re-assumption of these lands, you will destroy thousands of families; and, I hope, by putting a year's value upon them, to have some account of them. In the late Convention, there was a question, that satisfaction should be made by the purchasers of the king's lands. It was then undertaken, that the king might have 100,000*l.* a year, and the purchasers be satisfied for what they had paid for the lands. There are not many hundred pounds a year of that left now in the crown. Now, if you will go back to king James's time, antiquity of possession does make a kind of right. There is always a distinction between the ancient patrimony of the crown, and lands which have fallen to the crown by escheats. That is a casual revenue, which the king has to give for reward of services done him. A year's value of lands given from the crown, from 1660, and a half year's value of lands given, &c. from king James's time, I shall agree to.

Mr. Waller. I have heard that all lands were first in the crown, as in Domesday book. Land-tax is a Re-assumption; we give back to the crown what came out of it. I cannot imagine how, if the common law cannot secure a man, an act of parliament should. Many men talk of Non obstante's, &c. The common law of England is of a second nature, a custom. I think, an act of parliament is no better than the common law, and I wonder at it, that, in king Stephen's great wars, there was not one tax laid upon the people. The reason was, because land was so in the crown; but at last land coming so out of the crown into the common hands, they grew considerable. There may be extremities in all things. What a world of land would have come to the crown, if the Act of Oblivion, that sacred act, had not been made! I would have a committee to consider of such restrictions in this matter as may be equitable and just, and I shall approve of it.

Mr. Garroway. In this matter, I would stir nothing that may be any occasion of discontent from the people to the crown, as this may do. It may be of dangerous consequence, and I would be tender in it.

Sir Ch. Harbord. I have, both before and since I was the king's servant, endeavoured to prevent grants of the Crown Lands. But when they are passed, I would not have the king less just nor honest than another man. You would not pass them by act of parliament, by charging them as has been moved. There are two sorts of alienations of the Crown-Land, either by gifts and grants, or sales. In case of gifts and grants, you have confirmed some by acts, &c. And they are good grants in law. If you can in justice improve the crown-land, you may. But make justice equal, not to undo a million of persons. There were mighty grants formerly to the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Somerset. They were mighty things. Lord Dunbar had mighty things. All these were alienated to purchasers, freeholders, and the law cannot dispossess them. I would go no farther than those grants, &c. from 1660. But still that will not do your business in what these may bear. I would futerely ease land, but for the present this will raise you little or nothing.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Excepting two grants to the duke of Albemarle and the earl of Sandwich, I think there are no grants sold or given of the crown-lands that will in any measure do any thing. Grants that have reserved the old rents, I suppose, you intend not to meddle with. I believe they come not to above 10 or 15,000*l.* per annum, and to brand them criminal!—As the king has rewarded those who have suffered for him, will you let them who have bought and sold bishops lands, &c. go free? Will you let them alone? Whether are you going to raise 10, or 12,000*l.*? So small a thing! There are two sorts of patrimony of the crown. The ancient patrimony of the crown, and casual attainders and escheats. Escheats may be granted away. The ancient patrimony, &c. is of above 400 years, and it is a great difficulty to bring that back to memory. When the Conquest was, all lands were in the crown. And in the wars of York and Lancaster, the next succeeding king called all in question. When a weak prince had granted away the crown-lands, those sales have been called in question. And an act of such oppression as this will be cannot pass without some reflection upon us, who for some few instances of rewards, that the crown has given to persons of desert, &c. What is law, is law every where. When I consider how little this will raise, and what reflection it will be upon the government, I am against it. That casual revenue of escheats is kept separate in the exchequer from the rest of the revenue. I think it fit not to stir this matter, at this time of day.

Sir Rd. Temple. To say that no revenue of the crown is alienable, is strange; and if all the forfeitures in England were to be still in the crown, it would have all England in time. Ancient Domesne in the crown was never alienable. The late king Charles, out of a worthy resolution to pay his father's debts, sold some of the crown-lands, and, perhaps, he was deceived in the value. But since this king's time, you will find little alienated. You are now to consider, if it be reason to charge crown-land, sold since 1660, to be taxed distinctly from other lands. The king's revenue in 1660, then stated, was a great work. All that was done then was, not that the crown-lands should not be alienated, but that leases should be let upon improved value, and your Address to the king was accordingly. So that revenue made up, with the rest, 1,200,000*l.* a year. But I fear you will not find the moiety of the improved value reserved, upon leasing those lands. If you intend to see and examine that revenue, it will be a great trouble, and not to be done. Till I hear why these lands should be taxed more than others, I cannot give my consent. I would have you go on funds that you can raise money upon.

Sir Ch. Harbord. The king has granted me four manors of 400*l.* per annum each, not a farthing profit to me, as long as the queen lives. [This sir Charles said, upon Mr. Goring's alleging he had Crown-Lands given him.] As I have saved the crown 80,000*l.* at a time, I desired only a mark of my service, and that is all.

Sir Tho. Meres. Where the king's Revenue is alienated, I would have all that out, where-soever it is.

The Speaker. This debate must end in a question. I am one of those that welcome all propositions that have a tendency to ease lands. That of the New Buildings, which you voted yesterday, if of as great a value as apprehended at first, may do something towards easing land, but this to-day will do less than nothing from a retrospect to 1660 only. I desire gentlemen to consider the bottom this stands upon, and the charge upon that alienation. The whole is not above 100,000*l.* a year, and some is disposed of by act of parliament. Some to the duke of Albemarle, and to the earl of Sandwich for his early repentance. Several lands, by act of parliament, have been commuted. Cast your thoughts a little, and remember that never any king came into his kingdom with such a debt of bounty as the king had to reward. Though their interest was given up for the public peace, yet some compensation they might expect of their lost fortunes, for preservation of the government; and you now lay upon them a charge for that loyalty. If you lay the charge on these gentlemen, it is unjust; if on the purchasers, it is so too. It will raise nothing, or worse than nothing, I would lay this debate aside.

Upon a division, &c. the Reassumption was laid aside*.

Feb. 29. Resolved, "That part of the million to be raised to enable his majesty to enter into an actual War against the French king, shall be raised by a Poll-Bill." And a bill was ordered in accordingly†.

* This being in the committee is not mentioned in the Journal.

† The heads of this Bill were as follows: "All debts and ready money were taxed together with all persons exercising any public

*Debate on the State of the Nation—War with France—Removal of Evil Counsellors, &c.] March 14. Sir Gilbert Gerrard. The office, place, or employment, or receiving any pensions or stipends from his majesty; all judges, serjeants at law, counsellors, attorneys, solicitors, and scriveners; all advocates, proctors, and public notaries; and all persons practising the art of physic; all servants receiving wages; all persons other than such as receive alms of the parish, and their children under 16 years; all dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, barons, and their eldest sons; all baronets, knights of the bath, and knights bachelors; all esquires, or reputed esquires; all gentlemen, and reputed gentlemen; all widows according to the dignity of their husbands; every gentleman having an estate of 300*l.* all the dignified clergy; all persons holding two or more benefices with cure of souls, amounting together to the clear yearly value of 120*l.* all merchants, strangers, and Jews; all doctors of divinity, law, and physic, except doctors of divinity which have no ecclesiastical benefice; all merchants trading in the port of London, and not being free of the city; all merchants and others using any trade or manual occupation, and holding a house of 30*l.* per annum within the city of London, and bills of mortality; and all members of the East India and Guinea companies, for their share in the joint stocks of the two said companies."

* The commons, however, resolved that a day should be appointed to consider of the State of the Kingdom with respect to Popery. "And three days afterwards," says sir John Reresby, "my lord treasurer sent for several members of the house, and me among others, to the treasury chamber. His lordship there told us, it became all good subjects, to withstand all such motions and proceedings, which tended only to perplex the minds of men, and disturb the public tranquillity; in short, to raise jealousies of the government. The duke also among other things told me, it would be to disurm all Popish Recusants which he thought a ridiculous thing."

"We are farther told by sir John Reresby, that, on this day, several speeches were made in the house, full fraught with jealousies and fears; and particularly with regard to the Army at this time levying, as if it was rather intended to erect absolute monarchy at home, than infest the enemy abroad. Complaints were also made of evil counsel, and counsellors; but nobody was named. It is reasonable to think that the immediate business of the day, was the farther consideration of the Supply, the far greatest part of which was still unprovided for; but the wayward disposition of the house inclined them to postpone the means, though they contended as warmly as ever for the end; making it a point to have the court at their mercy, rather than submit themselves and the nation to the mercy of the court. The debate was long, and gave rise to king has had unhappy counsels. I will not exasperate matters, nor ravel into counsels. I will only say, that if the advice of the parliament had been taken, we had not been in this condition. The strength of the French king, both by sea and land, is far beyond his neighbours. He has, at this time, no less than 100,000 fighting men under his banners. I am sorry we have neglected the Militia of the nation so long as we have done. Now things are mainly at the stake, and they might preserve us. Our out-works are already taken, the Spanish Netherlands, and, I fear, the French army is so great, that the prince of Orange cannot make head against it, and the worst of all is, we have jealousies amongst ourselves. Unless their be balsam to heal us, we are in a sad condition. I hope the wisdom of the house will resolve on such things as may give us cure; and I hope the lords, who are part of the government, will consider the State of the Nation as well as we. I will not sit down therefore without a motion, viz. "That we may humbly move his majesty to declare War against the French king." The consequence whereof will be the bringing in our allies, and we will venture our hearts and lives, and our purses will be open like Englishmen; and I hope for good success.

Lord Russel.* The gentleman that spoke an Address containing the advice of the house, that the king would declare war with France. It was also stiffly contended for, that a part of this Address should be to intreat the king to put away those evil counsellors from about him, who had advised him to adjourn the parliament in May last, and thereby prevented a war with France all this time. But this being put to the question, it was carried in the negative by five votes only: and, whereas, the king had before reprimanded them for giving their Advice, without the concurrence of the lords, they resolved to remove that caviil by calling upon them to join in it: but whatever endeavours were used for that purpose, their lordships suffered the Address to lye before them, if not without notice, at least without answer." Ralph.

* Son of the earl of Bedford, who for his inviolable attachment to the Protestant Religion, by warmly promoting the Bill of Exclusion (as will appear hereafter), being tried and condemned for a pretended conspiracy against the king, was beheaded in Lincoln's Inn Fields, on July 21, 1683. Bishop Burnet's character of him is as follows: "Lord Russel was a man of great candour, and of a general reputation; universally beloved and trusted; of a generous and obliging temper. He had given such proofs of an undaunted courage, and of an unshaken firmness, that I never knew any man have so entire a credit in the nation as he had. He quickly got out of some of the disorders into which the court had drawn him, and ever after that his life was unblemished in all respects. He had, from his first education, an last, has made a good motion. I hope in time we shall justify ourselves from the aspersion that we did not give Money sooner. I would set the saddle on the right horse, and I move that we may go into a committee of the whole house, to consider of the sad and deplorable condition we are in, and the apprehensions we are under of Popery, and a Standing Army; and that we may consider of some way to save ourselves from ruin.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I have been always as jealous of the greatness of France, as any man. There are already 48 companies of foot, sent over into Flanders: but what advantage shall we have more by a sudden declaring of war against the French king, before we are prepared? We have more merchant ships out, at this time, than any other nation. And this sudden Declaration will but give occasion to the king of France to fall upon us, before we are provided. What is it you can do by it? You are in treaties now, and will you overrun your allies? I would do as the Romans, who made Declarations of war jointly with their allies. That one thing I would know; what advantage we can have immediately to declare war, before we are in a posture for it? War will be declared, when we are ready for it; but if you advise the king as is moved, consider well what you have to do.

Sir John Hotham. I will not talk now like a Sophister, but like an Englishman. If our advice had been taken, which we gave honestly and worthily, things had not been at this pass. I am not worthy to sit here, if I do not second that noble lord's very worthy motion of going into a grand committee to consider the deplorable condition we are in.

Sir Nich. Carew. Coventry would know, why we are so hasty to enter into war. If we really declare war, we animate the confederates. If we go into a grand committee, I hope we inclination to favour the Nonconformists, and wished the laws could have been made easier to them, or they more pliant to the law. He was a slow man, and of little discourse: but he had a true judgment, when he considered things at his own leisure. His understanding was not defective: but his virtues were so eminent, that they would have more than balanced real defects, if any had been found in the other." His father was created by king William and queen Mary, marquis of Tavistock, and duke of Bedford, and among other reasons for conferring those honours, "This was not the least, that he was father to lord Russel, the ornament of his age, whose great merits it was not enough to transmit, by history, to posterity, but they were willing to record them in their royal patent, to remain in the family, as a monument consecrated to his consummate virtue, whose name could never be forgot so long as men preserved any esteem for sanctity of manners, greatness of mind, and a love to their country, constant even to death." See the Patent.

shall find out the instruments of our long prerogations, and French counsels, as if they had been pensioners to the French king. Then the confederates will see that we are in good earnest. Let us enquire if we have not the same Counsels and Counsellors that we had before, and clear ourselves, and set the saddle on the right horse.

Sir Philip Monckton. I did not complain of my imprisonment in the Tower: I desired no man to complain of it. Neither shall I complain of my lord chancellor's putting me upon a recognizance. I will not complain of the king to his people: I would not be thought a man of petulancy, or a malecontent. It is said 'it is not now time to declare war.' Just at the beginning of these times, the late king was persuaded by his council that all was quiet in Scotland, and he never knew the Scotch army was marching, till they were upon the borders. I concur therefore with the motion for the house to go into a grand committee.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. It is moved, 'That you enquire into the king's Counsels.' I am old enough to remember that the enquiry into evil Counsellors began the late war, took off lord Strafford's head, and was followed by such an effusion of blood that I hope the like will never be again. I fear the consequence of this enquiry. I will not trouble you with old stories: if any person has any thing to say against Counsellors, he may now; but to go into a grand committee to set up a si quis, and make a noise abroad—if any gentleman will name persons, he may do it here.

Mr. Vaughan. Converse with persons without doors and within, and you will find dangers proclaimed at home and abroad. So sad an effect cannot be without ill causes. According to Wheeler's argument, let the consequence be ever so ill, of evil Counsellors, you must not examine them, because it had once ill-effect; and so the nation will never have remedy. I think we must see how we came into these misfortunes, before we get out of them.

Sir John Ernly. If I thought we were in jest, as some do, in this great affair of war, I would say nothing. The king is in actual war with the king of France, and will go, as far in it as you will enable him. He has at present no money, nor credit. I will say nothing to excuse any man. Let every tub stand upon its own bottom. I have a clear heart; our house is on fire, and will you not quench it, but enquire who set it on fire? I see no fruit of this proceeding you are upon, but confusion and misery.

Lord Cavendish. I am not of the opinion, 'that we are in jest.' I think some have been in good earnest. I would go into a grand committee, that we may enquire whether we shall go into a war, or no; for we are in the dark.

Sir Philip Warwick. I would rather that you took this matter moved into consideration to-morrow, than press it to day. I have feared this greatness of the French king these 40 years; and in my last master's time, they had great correspondence in court, and found casements to look in at. If we apprehend our army's terrors to ourselves (and I have seen war to the ruin of the nation, and destruction of the prince) I have not a word distracted enough to express it. I am as willing (like Balaam's Ass) to crush my master's foot, when an angel stands in the way, as any body; but I am not for this question now.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, to consider the State of the Nation, and to present Remedies to prevent the Dangers thereof.' The question being put for making the Removal of those who had advised his majesty to the Answer of the Address in May last, from his Councils, part of the Address, it passed in the negative, 135 to 130, and a committee was ordered to draw up the Address.

Sir John Trevor afterwards reported from the said Committee, That they had taken the matter into their consideration; and had agreed to a vote: and the Vote being delivered in at the clerk's table, and twice read; was, upon the question, agreed; and is as follows. Resolved, &c. "That an Address be presented to the king, humbly to advise his majesty, That his majesty, to quiet the minds of his loyal subjects, and to encourage the princes and states confederated against the French king, will be graciously pleased, immediately to declare, proclaim, and enter into an actual War against the French king; and to give his majesty assurance, that this house will constantly stand by, and aid his majesty in the prosecution thereof, with plentiful supplies and assistances: and that his majesty be graciously pleased to recall his ambassadors from France and Nimeguen; and to send home the French king's ambassador."

The Commons' Address of Advice, that the King would declare War against France. March 15. The said Address was reported, and is as follows:

"We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, in all duty and faithfulness to your majesty's service, humbly present your maj. with this our Advice: that for the satisfying the minds of your good subjects, who are much disquieted with the apprehensions of the dangers arising to this kingdom from the growth and power of the French king; and for the encouragement of the princes and states confederated against him; your maj. would graciously be pleased immediately to declare, proclaim, and enter into an actual War against the said French king: for the prosecution whereof, as we have already passed a Bill of Supply, which only wants your royal assent, so we desire your maj. to rest constantly assured that we will from time to time proceed to stand by, and aid your maj. with such plentiful supplies and assistances, as your majesty's occasions for so royal an undertaking shall require. And because your majesty's endeavours, by way of mediation, have not produced those good effects your maj. intended, we do most humbly beseech your majesty, that you would graciously be pleased to recall your ambassadors from Nimeguen and France and to cause the French ambassador to depart from hence; that your maj. being publicly disengaged from acting as a mediator, or upon such terms and conditions as were then proposed, your maj. may enter into the war to no other end than that the said French king may be reduced into such a condition, as he may be no longer terrible to your majesty's subjects; and that Christendom may be restored to such a peace, as may not be in the power of the said king to disturb."

The Address was, upon the question, agreed to by the house. And it was resolved, That the concurrence of the lords be desired there-to. The Address was sent up accordingly, but it never proceeded further.

March 18. Resolved, "That such members as are of his majesty's privy council, do acquaint his majesty, that there is a Bill of Aid passed both houses, and ready for his royal assent."

March 19. Mr. Sec. Coventry delivered to the house the following Answer from his majesty:

"C. R. His majesty hath received the notice sent him by this house, that the Poll-Bill was now ready for the royal assent; which his maj. was well pleased to hear, and resolves to pass it to-morrow. His maj. desires this house to dispatch the rest of the Supply promised him, with all expedition. The sea and land preparations run great danger of being disappointed, if these supplies be retarded: and it would be a satisfaction to his maj. to hear from this house, that no more time should be lost in a work so necessary for the safety and reputation of the nation, as the finishing those supplies."

A Short Recess. March 20. On a Message from the king, the house went up to attend his maj. in the house of lords; where he gave his assent to the Poll-Bill, &c. and made the following Speech;

"My lords, and gentlemen; I am so zealous for the good of the nation, that it shall be your fault, and not mine; if all be not done as should be, for the honour and safety of it: and I must tell you, there must be no time lost."

March 26. The house addressed the king for a short Recess; to which his majesty agreed, and appointed them to adjourn to April 11.

Sir Robert Sawyer chosen Speaker. April 11. The house being met, Mr. Hen. Seymour, one of his majesty's bedchamber, and uncle to Mr. Seymour, the present Speaker, acquainted the house, That he had received information by a Letter by appointment from Mr. Speaker, who at present is at his house in the country in the interval of the sitting of the house; that he was there suddenly seized with a sickness and distemper, so violently, that he was confined to his bed, and not able to write himself; but so soon as it should please God to restore him, he would return to their service. And Mr. Secretary Coventry acquainting the house, That his majesty had received advertisement, that Mr. Speaker laboured under so great an indisposition of health that he could not possibly, for a long time, attend the service of the house; and to the end the public affairs might receive no delay; his majesty gave leave to the house to chuse a new Speaker; and to present him to his majesty on Monday next: and the house being satisfied, that, by reason of the Speaker's great indisposition, uncertainty of return: and in order to public affairs, it was very necessary a new Speaker should be chosen: thereupon Mr. Sec. Coventry proposed, and recommended, sir Robert Sawyer as a person fit, for his ability and learning, to be Speaker. And sir Robert Sawyer standing up, and making a speech to excuse and disable himself; and some other person being in nomination; and a debate arising; and a question demanded to be put, Whether sir Robert should be chosen Speaker or not; and who should put that question; a precedent was then produced out of the Journal of 1. Jac. where the clerk of the house, in like case with this, did, by direction of the house, make and put the question; and the present clerk being now directed and demanded so to do; and the mace not being in the house; he did humbly leave it to their consideration, whether it could be so regularly done, till the mace were brought into the house: and upon some debate had, it was thought fit, and the mace was, by their command, brought in by the serjeant, and laid under the table: and the house then again directed the clerk to make, and put the question: which he did, pursuant to the former precedent; viz. 'All that will have sir Robert Sawyer Speaker, say, yea.' Which being carried in the affirmative, by such the greater number of voices, without any division of the house, sir Robert was thereupon conducted to the chair by Mr. Sec. Coventry and Mr. Sec. Williamson: and being there placed, and the mace then upon the table; after some pause, he stood up, and made a gratulatory speech to the house for their favour and respect to him; desiring their leave to intercede with his majesty to excuse him from undertaking so great and difficult an employment; which, by reason of his indisposition of body, and want of experience, he conceived himself not able to perform: but, if his excuse should not be admitted, he would serve them with all integrity, to the utmost of his capacity and ability: and desired the help and assistance of the members, who had been long versed and experienced in the proceedings of the house. And the house, having upon the question, ordered the clerk to enter upon the manner of chusing the Speaker; without proceeding to any other business.

The King proposes an Adjournment.] April 15. The house, on a Message from the king, attended him in the house of lords, where the Speaker elect was approved and allowed of by his majesty. Being returned, the Speaker, having taken the chair, acquainted the house, That it was his majesty's pleasure that both houses should adjourn themselves till the 29th.; and that the reason of such Adjournment was to this effect: "That the Dutch ambassador had not at present full instructions; and that the affairs concerning the Alliances were not yet so ripe, or fit to be imparted to both houses as it was expected they might have been upon the last adjournment."

Debate on the proposed Adjournment.] Several motions were made, after this signification of the king's pleasure of Adjournment, as it were to gain that point, controverted in the former Speaker's time, upon this new Speaker: as that of bringing in sir W. Killigrew's Bill: another by sir Edw. Jennings relating to the Durham Election, and that the Committee of Elections might be adjourned, by Order, to prevent witnesses coming up, &c. But because the point might be thoroughly gained, the house fell into the following debate.

Col. Birch. I have been at many choices of Speaker's and am heartily sorry for the loss of Mr. Seymour. Though I have an honour for you, Mr. Speaker, (Sawyer) I hope Seymour may be well enough to come again to the chair, I must take notice that the Speaker ought to report the four things the king usually grants the Speaker, which he requests in behalf of the house, &c. I hoped not for a fortnight's adjournment; I feared it; but seeing that it is the king's pleasure, I humbly submit to it.

Sir Tho. Meres. This adjournment for a fortnight is hard. When we desired it for three weeks, it was not granted. The last recess, there were 18 private bills passed, and no public bills; and this fortnight might have been for public bills, and the Popery matter is upon the anvil, and adjourned to this afternoon by order, and by order we may sit, but we cannot go through with it to day. Therefore I would send to the king, before the lords rise, that he may be moved to let us sit. These are things which concern the nation vitally, to be done, and I would have something done of the concern of the nation.

Mr. Sacheverell. As I stand informed, our Message to the king was, 'to adjourn to as long a time as his occasions would permit. And now his great occasion is not ready for you, I suppose this adjournment to be an Answer to your Message. The king's occasion is not fit. But I doubt not, but if you signify to the king, that you have public business in your eye, which may come on till his great affairs are ready, he will give you leave to sit, And I move to desire the lords to concur with you in still sitting, That of Popery is so necessary to be considered, that it looks as necessary as the Army itself. I fear there is Money in this Adjournment, and I move that the lords concurrence may be desired.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. We are to adjourn

presently, upon signification of the king's pleasure, and I do not remember that, when the king has signified it, this was ever done before, unless in the Long Parliament.

Sir Tho. Lee. (Upon some calling to adjourn) Gentlemen know me too well to sit down, because they call 'Adjourn.' In king Charles's time, what is moved was not so unusual a thing moved as Coventry says. It was done twice. Country gentlemen's affairs will call upon them. We shall better understand who counselled the king to this, about midsummer, than now; and if there is nothing to be done, but giving Money, then it is very well argued for adjournment now. But I am sure it is for the king's service, that things depending should be pursued. And because the lords are not up, I would put the question.

Mr. Williams. It is said by Coventry, 'There is no precedent of this but in the Long Parliament.' In, the Journal you will find that, 2 or 3 Ch. is an Address was made to the king to prolong the time of sitting of the house; and the king granted it in some part. Something, surely, we may proceed upon for the public, as Popery, &c. without meddling at all with the affairs of the war. If what was represented at our last sitting, relating to Popery be true, for this very purpose I would address the king, that we may sit to examine this matter, it being so much for the safety of Religion.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. I can easily pardon the resentment of country gentlemen for their disappointment by this adjournment. But the king has not known this change of his mind four days. Saturday was the last day he despaired of keeping his mind in this matter. The king had it in his mind to alleviate and soften this disappointment, by speaking to you himself. We ought certainly to clear this matter of Popery, and time may be for that. Some complaints have been of this, and this afternoon something may be done. My reading is little, and my experience less, in the nature of this motion of an Address to the king for sitting a longer time. In the 18th of king James, there was something of this kind, but the lords did refuse to join with this house. I am extremely sorry that this happens in such a conjuncture, when there is need of all possible harmony. This is a disappointment that puts as much trouble upon the king, as upon any gentleman here. But I hope, by the time you meet again, the king will be able to finish the matter, so as to lay it open to you. For the king cannot make them certain. For the present, they are as bad as bad can be. But I hope gentlemen will excuse the disappointment, and adjourn.

Mr. Vaughan. This is matter of that fatality that I fear it will take up all your time, and none will be left for the concerns of the king and kingdom. It is an ill thing for us to go back into the country, and they to tell us, 'we must go again to make War, and give Money.' There is a precedent of addressing for farther time, in the 9th and 13th of king James, and I doubt not but you will have the same return from this king that you had from king James.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. (They called out, 'He had spoke, spoke') No man can say I have spoke, when I stand up to explain myself. I have read that precedent of king James: the commons did represent to the king, 'That the time was not sufficient between the holidays, &c. to do the business before them, &c. But when the king has declared his pleasure for a speedy adjournment, the house never proceeded any farther.'

Mr. Powle. I will only tell you what amazes me extremely. On the 28th of Jan. the king told you, 'He had made Leagues with Holland, &c.' And Williamson tells you, 'Things are as bad as bad can be.' I would know how that comes about?

Mr. Sec. Williamson. It is better to have things upon certainty than uncertainty. There was a treaty, and is a treaty. Now we have made it with Holland, and come to the rest of the allies, Holland flies off from us; and that made me say, 'things were as bad as bad can be.'

Sir John Coventry. These kind of adjournments are very strange things, and this proceeds from your counsels to raise men against Magna Charta, and set up Popery. No man can bear this. If the king thinks we are not fit to serve him, I desire he may be moved for a new parliament, and new counsellors.

Sir Tho. Lee. The matter being so, that the lords are up, it is in vain to address the king. I shall observe, that now there is an alteration from former times; for then all the study was to make parliaments meet and rise with complacency; but now it is quite otherwise. That is all the observation I will now make, and let us adjourn.

Sir John Hotham. Since it is concluded that the lords are up, we lose time to debate farther; only before we adjourn, I would remind you that, about a fortnight ago, there was a committee appointed to send the lords Reasons for present declaring War against the French, &c. I desire this, that we may not enter into a war merely because there are jealousies, &c. but that the Reasons may be obvious. I move that, seeing the house is of a mind for their Religion, a committee may sit in this interval to prepare those Reasons, about Popery, &c. that the nation may see that we come for something besides gratifying particular people.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I think, Hotham has made you a good motion. It was said 'that it was a Long Parliament precedent to have a committee sit in the interval of sitting, &c.' We still have a recourse to that topic; but the lords have sat upon several businesses, besides the trial of lord Pembroke; and it is dangerous for one house to sit, and not the other. A committee to sit, is not so dangerous, and we may have a committee to sit, if the lords sit.

Sir Gilbert Gerrard. There are such a multitude of Papists, and strangers, of all nations, that I would have a committee to sit, and draw up Reasons of our apprehensions of Popery, in this interval; and the house to be called over on Tuesday come fortnight.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If there be any doubt of a committee sitting in a recess of adjournment, there are divers precedents of it; and there is no doubt but they may sit.

Ordered, "That the Committee appointed to draw up Reasons for the Conference to be had with the Lords, concerning the danger the Nation is in by the Growth of Popery, do sit during the interval of the sitting of the house, to perfect the matters referred to them."

The Lord Chancellor Finch's Speech, demanding the Advice of both Houses relative to a League Offensive and Defensive with Holland. April 29. The commons attended the king in the house of peers, where the Lord Chancellor, by his majesty's command, made the following speech to both houses:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; His majesty, having made a League offensive and defensive with Holland, and endeavoured to improve that league by entering into further and more general Alliances for the prosecution of the war, hath nevertheless thought fit, before he make his last step, to take the further Advice of both his houses of parliament, and resolves to govern himself by it. And to the end his parliament may be able to give a clear and certain judgment in this matter, his maj. hath commanded that the present State and Condition of Affairs should be fully and plainly opened to you. And this I shall do in a few words:—The first Address to his majesty from both houses was upon the 16th of March, 1676, wherein the dangerous Growth of the French monarchy being observed, and the conquests made in Flanders, together with the ill consequences arising from thence, his majesty is desired to strengthen himself by such stricter Alliances as may secure his own kingdoms and preserve the Spanish Netherlands. But this Address did neither desire, nor seem to intend, that his majesty should so suddenly and so abruptly depart from his figure of mediator, as immediately to become a party in the war, before any such Alliances were made. For this Address was followed with several other Addresses from the commons, in the months of March, April, and May following; all of them pressing his majesty to hasten this entering into such Alliances; and one of them particularly pointing at a League Offensive and Defensive with the States General.—And in truth, as no Alliances could well be made till we had consulted with Holland, so no entry could be made upon any alliance with Holland until the mind of the prince of Orange were perfectly known; for upon him would depend much of that certainty and secrecy, which was absolutely necessary to bring such a treaty to perfection: but the prince was in so great a hurry of business, and such a heat of action, that no time could possibly be found all that summer to enter upon this Treaty.—And yet, that no time might be lost, his majesty did all he could at home, to fit and prepare himself for such an alliance when the time should come: he repairs his old Fleet, buys in necessary stores for the Navy and Ordnance; and in this and other provisions for better securing his foreign Plantations and Islands nearer home, expended a great deal more than the 200,000*l.* which he was enabled to borrow upon the Excise; and if he could have then prevailed to have had the 600,000*l.* completed as he desired, the expense of that in other stores and provisions, both for land and sea, would by this time have given an universal content and satisfaction.—Nor did his majesty rest here; but he continued still, during all the rest of that summer, to make all the steps he could towards an Alliance with Holland: to this end he did, in the month of June, send for his ambassador sir Wm. Temple to come to him from Nimeguen, in order to his being employed to negotiate with the prince of Orange, touching those measures which were necessary to be taken for the common safety; but the prince's continual action caused it to be deferred: and yet, in August following, the king appoints his ambassador Mr. Hyde to wait upon the prince, and to know of him what course he thought best to be taken as things then stood; and to desire him, that he would either write his own mind, or send some person hither instructed with it, or come himself. The prince was pleased to chuse the latter.—By that conversation with his highness, his majesty quickly understood to what a low estate the affairs of Holland were reduced, and in what great disorder the rest of the Confederates were; they in Flanders totally desponding, and the people in Holland being violent for a peace; so that there seemed to be no other remedy or expedient left, but for his majesty to try whether a peace could be obtained upon reasonable conditions.—This being the main and principal point to which the king had all that year been earnestly solicited by the States, that is to say, in the months of Jan. May, and Sept. last, just before the prince came over; and his majesty had reason to believe that such endeavours would be grateful to the States, and took thereby an opportunity to engage the States, that, in case of refusal, they should enter into such an Alliance with his majesty, as might enable him to obtain his desires by force of arms; for his majesty did well perceive, that the States of Holland, whom he had so long found weary of the war, would never enter into any alliance with his majesty for the prosecution of this war without a prospect of a peace.—And, to convince the world that his majesty was resolved to espouse the interests of the States General to the uttermost, his majesty (who could not but see that the happiness and prosperity of the prince did very much depend upon the quiet and repose of those countries) did, in the time of their most pressing dangers, give his own niece in Marriage to the prince; which act alone was enough to extinguish the fears of all at home, and raise the hopes of all that were abroad. And with this assurance, and this evidence of the king's good intentions to the States, the prince returned.—And now, to the end it might be known whether his most Christian majesty would consent to such conditions of peace as might be grateful to the States, and that such measures might be taken as were fit, in case of refusal, conditions were prepared, and sent to Paris by the earl of Feversham in Nov. last; and in Dec. following, the earl returns with an Answer very dissatisfactory.—This ill answer being returned, the king his majesty hastened the meeting of the parliament, and proceeded to close up the Treaty with the States General for obtaining of those conditions by force of arms, which could not be obtained by fair means. And this is the League Offensive and Defensive made with Holland, and concluded in the beginning of Jan. last, which his maj. is graciously pleased may be communicated to the parliament, if they shall desire to see it.—And his maj. at the same time, and for the fuller satisfaction of his parl. and the better securing of his kingdoms in all events, did further take care to conclude another perpetual Defensive Treaty with the States General.—In execution of the Offensive and Defensive League, his maj. sent to the States, to have the number of forces by sea and land adjusted, and did agree what his own quota by sea should be, and sent over some forces into Flanders; and had sent more, but some difficulties were made on that side, which his majesty for the friendship's sake which he hath with them does not think fit to remember.—The next thing absolutely necessary to be done was, to have one common alliance for all parties to enter into, for the carrying on of the war, by disposing the several stations of the joint forces, by the general prohibition of commerce, and by providing against all possibilities of any separate peace.—For which causes, his majesty appoints his own commissioners to meet and treat with the foreign ministers: but, to the king's great disappointment, it appeared that the Dutch ambassador had no power to treat, which made the other ministers refuse to enter upon any discourse: and therefore, to obtain these powers to be sent, his majesty, besides the repeated and pressing instances of his own ambassador in Holland, was pleased to write himself to the states very earnestly in this matter.—At last, powers come; but then the ambassador wants Instructions, so that nothing at all could be concluded touching those points which were most essential and necessary to be settled between us, and which the king hath never ceased to press for to this very day. But hitherto the king finds, what he always feared, that the Dutch are making haste to get out of the war; and are so far from disposing themselves to enter into any new alliance for the more vigorous prosecution of it, that whether they will persevere in the League Offensive and Defensive which they have made with the king, or to what degree they will act if they should persevere, depends upon very many and very great uncertainties: for they are at this very time entered upon considerations of accepting such a peace as the Most Christian king hath thought fit to offer lately at Nimeguen, though it be without his majesty's consent or privity, and contrary to that league by which they stand obliged to him to prosecute the war, till a much better peace can be obtained.—To prevent this, the king hath sent an express, on purpose to know what they intend by this manner of proceeding, and to dissuade them from it, by letting them see that this will be as ill a peace for themselves and the rest of Christendom as their enemies could wish.—But the king as yet can receive no other account from them, but complaints of their great poverty, and utter inability to be at any further charge in carrying on the war. And the king is informed, by his ambassador, that they intend to send over an envoy extraordinary to his majesty, to beg his maj. to accept of these Propositions, to excuse themselves for this, upon the general impatience of their people. This is the state of the case; and thus it stands at this day between us and Holland, from whom we have little hopes now, that they should ever so far enter into this new and common Alliance as to make it quadrupartite. And now, upon the whole matter, the king demands your Advice, what may be fit for him to do in this difficult conjuncture; and resolves to pursue it: and therefore desires you to take this matter into your most speedy and most serious considerations.*

Ordered by the commons, "That the members of this house, that are of the privy council do desire his majesty, that he will be pleased to communicate to this house all such Leagues and Treaties as are mentioned in the Chancellor's Speech, or relating thereunto."

Reasons of the Growth of Popery.] The house then resumed the consideration of the State of the Kingdom, with regard to Popery, and received and approved the following REASONS, to be offered at a Conference to be had with the Lords, concerning the Danger the Nation is in by the growth of Popery.

"The house of commons, taking into serious

* "No doubt, if ever his majesty was in earnest provoked against France, it was now; when they had not only belied him in their Declaration, all over Europe, but trided with him in his Money Treaty. We are therefore to give so much the more attention to the scope of the lord Chancellor's Speech, which is very imperfectly touched on by Mr. Echard, and totally suppressed by Rapin, and every other historian. It is remarkable too, that Mr. North, when correcting the omissions of bishop Kennet, either overlooked it, or had no intelligence of this remarkable Speech." Ralph.

consideration the Dangers arising to this kingdom, from the restless endeavours of priests and jesuits, and other popish recusants, to subvert the true religion planted amongst us, and to reduce us again under the bondage of the Romish superstition and idolatry: and finding how great boldness they have assumed to themselves from the great remissness and connivency of his majesty's officers and ministers of justice, both civil and ecclesiastical; whereby so many good and necessary laws, heretofore made against them, have not of late times been put in any effectual execution: they do therefore think it requisite to apply some Remedy to this growing evil, especially at this time, wherein the unity of affections, and the mutual confidence between his maj. and his people does so much conduce to the preservation of the whole kingdom: and because they have found by experience, that all those applications they have formerly made upon this subject have not produced any effects answerable to their expectations; they have endeavoured to discover the Causes and Grounds thereof; which they conceive are principally these.—The difficulty to convict popish priests, by proving their Ordination by authority derived from the see of Rome, makes them more confident to appear in public, and perform their offices and functions without fear of punishment.—That Justices of peace are discouraged, because several of those that have been forward in executing the laws against papists, in such counties where they do most abound, have been turned out of commission, without any apparent cause; whilst others, suspected to be popishly inclined, have been continued in commission, or put in de novo.—That, in several counties, many protestant dissenters have been indicted, under the notion of popish recusants; and the penalties of the law levied upon such protestant dissenters; when the papists there have been either totally, or for the most part, discharged.—That the papists do evade the penalties of the law, by making over their estates by secret trusts, and fraudulent conveyances; and receive the profits of them to their own use and benefit.—Whereas in former times considerable sums of money were raised for the forfeitures of popish recusants, that now, by the remissness of some, and discouragement of others of his majesty's officers and ministers of justice, little or nothing is levied upon them, or likely to be levied hereafter, unless the care thereof be committed to particular commissioners in the several counties; and the money arising thence applied to some public use, for the advancement of the protestant religion; which may encourage persons to see it executed.—That persons are not discouraged to breed up their children, or to suffer them to be bred up in the popish religion; because they are as capable of inheriting the estates of their parents and relations, as any other of his majesty's protestant subjects.—The commons do therefore most earnestly desire your lordships to consider of the Dangers and sad Consequences that may befall this kingdom, by the spreading of that religion amongst us; and seriously and cordially to join with them, in removing these and all other impediments which obstruct the course of justice, and the due execution of the laws, either by expediting those Remedies which have been offered by them to your lordships, or by proposing such other as may be more effectual: and that this may be done with all expedition; because the commons cannot think it suitable to their trust, to consent to lay any further charge upon the people, how urgent soever the occasion be that require it, till their minds be satisfied, that all care and diligence is used to secure the kingdom, and prevent the dangers that may arise from the prevalency and countenance that is given to that party, by some more effectual course than hath been already provided.*

Debate on some Words that fell from Mr. Goring.] May 3. During the debate on the Treaties,

Mr. Goring said, 'I have heard many gentlemen on this side of the house make many complaints against the ministers of state for mismanagement: I desire they will first give a Test, that they do not desire to creep into their places; or that they may give security, that they will act better, if they come into their places. For my part, I see no ill these have done.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I would have that gentleman explain himself. He speaks of 'gentlemen on this side of the house having a Test.' They desire not to come into another man's office. I desire that Goring, who seems to like and know these counsels so well, will tell you who were against them.

Col. Birch. I was in hopes that Goring would have said something to have allayed this matter. When gentlemen, in this nick of time, and this vast business in hand, have such an affront cast upon that side of the house (though I was not on that side) it may be next on this side. Gentlemen must not say, as some did, 'No, no,' as if they were laughing in a play-house. I would have the house lay aside all debates, till they have satisfaction in this point.

Sir Henry Capel. I would not let these words pass, but write them down, and then afterwards proceed upon them.—The Words were then asserted, as Goring spoke them before.

Mr. Goring thus explained himself. I meant by what I said no particular person; and I am sorry if I gave the house offence.

* Sir W. Temple charges sir Tho. Clarges with having been the author of 'this peevish vote,' as he calls it, in spleen to the lord treasurer. He adds, 'it is certain no Vote could ever have passed more unhappily, or in such a counter season.' And again, 'in short, there was such a fatal and mutual distrust, both in the court and parliament, that it was very hard to fall into any sound measures between them.'

There was some debate whether his Explanation was satisfactory.—Sir Tho. Meres recriminating something that Goring had said, the other day, of the Committee of Popery,

Sir John Talbot said, If we call a gentleman to account for things said the other day, why may not the king call members hereafter to account for what they have said here? I will not justify what Goring has said, but I believe his excuse is satisfactory. I am for his withdrawing, but would have a question for it. I could not bear the misfortune to be under the displeasure of the nation. I think it is a misfortune. We must bear with one another, and not be extreme to mark what is done amiss.

Sir Tho. Meres. When Talbot condemns me for recriminating, and tells you of another thing likewise of this nature that he disliked, it is not orderly. I urged it not at all to the gentleman's prejudice, but to remind the Speaker and the house of the too great frequency of these things.

Sir Rob. Howard. I hear it said, 'It is a punishment and disgrace to withdraw.' If there be a disputable election depending, the gentlemen concerned must withdraw, and no man will say it is a punishment. I am on this side of the house, and I myself am in an office. This side is the major part of the house, and, for ought I know, here is a reflection on the whole house. The thing was ill done, and Goring tells you, 'he has liked all that the ministers have done,' when the commons of England have not liked it. For the indiscretion he has asked your pardon, and I heartily desire the house would give it him.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. These things are incident to any man, but should all things be taken notice of in great debates, business would never go on.

Sir Tho. Lee. There is more in this than in all the matter of the debate; but it must be a precedent for the future. Where the words are once written down, you cannot show me a precedent in the Journal that a question has been put for withdrawing; but it is done by direction of the Chair. I would not have it a precedent for future parliaments.

Sir Geo. Downing. So long as a gentleman will speak to it, he is not to withdraw. The gentleman is well descended, and but young in years and experience; and I desire the thing may go over.

The Speaker. If it be insisted upon, whether the house be satisfied, &c. he must withdraw.

Sir Tho. Meres. You state the question well, and then you go off from it. If the house be satisfied, there is no need then of withdrawing. You cannot let him be here present when the question is put. He may then vote to it, and it may come to a question, and therefore he must withdraw.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The words are stated and agreed, and the next thing is to consider the crime, and it is a most natural thing that the gentleman should not be present at the debate of this supposition of a crime.

Mr. Goring then said; 'I am sorry I have given the house occasion of this dispute, but since I find that my company is troublesome to the house, I will withdraw without a question.' And he withdrew.

Sir Tho. Meres. Alderman Foote said some words in the passing the Militia act, which gave offence; he had acknowledged the words, and was called in to his place, and the house admitted his excuse, 'that he was sorry he had given occasion of offence, &c.'

Sir Chris. Musgrave. As it was a great offence that Goring has committed, so he has given the house satisfaction by asking their pardon. I think it is satisfactory, and I would have you pardon him.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Alderman Foote was judged to have his reprimand on his knees at the bar; but in this I would not go so far. This gentleman (Goring) sat a great while in his place, smiling and laughing. (Some say, it is his custom.) One said, 'his words were not so black as those he reflected on.' It is an odd way this of excusing. The young gentleman is forward and zealous, but I would have no more said to him, but an admonition in his place to forbear the like for the future.

Mr. Powle. The words that fell from the gentleman were spoken immediately after what I had said; but I declare, that you may pass it over; and as Goring desires, 'there may be a Test against Offices,' so I desire there may be a Test against receiving Pensions.

Mr. Howe. I am glad to hear the word 'Pensions.' We are named to be the greatest rogues and villains, and it is said commonly, 'we are the greatest in nature, and that we take Money to betray our country.' I would have some committee to draw up a Test, about persons that receive Pensions.

Mr. Boscawen. You are to ask Goring no more questions, but to reprimand him in his place, and no more.

Mr. Goring being come to his place, The Speaker said, "The house has considered your words, Mr. Goring, and, as they are displeased with your words, so they are pleased with your submission; and I admonish you to forbear the like for the future."

Vote and Address respecting the Treaties.] May 4. After several days debate on the Treaties, the following Resolution was carried in the affirmative, 166 to 150. Resolved, "That the League offensive and defensive with the States General of the United Provinces, with the Articles relating thereunto, are not pursuant to the Addresses of this house, nor consistent with the good and safety of the kingdom."

It was next resolved, "That it is the opinion of this house, that his majesty be humbly advised, and desired forthwith to enter into the present Alliances and Confederations with the Emperor and the king of Spain, and the States General of the United Provinces, for the vigorous carrying on of the present War against the French king and for the good and safety of his majesty's kingdoms; and particularly, that effectual endeavours be used for continuing the States General in the present Confederation; and that it be agreed by all the parties confederate to prohibit all trade between their subjects and countries, and France, and all other the dominions of the French king: and that no Commodities of France, or any of the dominions of the French king, be imported into their countries, from any place whatsoever: and also, that all endeavours be used to invite all other princes and states into the said Confederation: and that no truce, or peace, be made with the French king, by his majesty, or any of the Confederates, without general consent first had therein."

Mr. Seymour re-chosen Speaker.] May 6. The commons being met, and sir Robert Sawyer, the present Speaker, being indisposed in his health, and having last night sent a Letter to the clerk of the house to be communicated to the house: which letter, being read by the clerk to the house, is as followeth:

"Mr. Goldesbrough; My long sitting the two last days, especially yesterday, hath so disabled me to attend my service in the chair of the hon. house of commons, that I can not longer attend it, without apparent hazard of shortening my life. I find myself already under great pain, and reduced to great weakness of body; from whence I apprehend severe fits of the stone. I have endeavoured this day, by physic, to prevent them, to the end I might be able to come to the house to-morrow; but my pain and weakness rather increase upon me this evening: so that there will be a necessity for me to enter into a course of physic; and I know it will be some time before I can possibly be restored to a competent measure of strength to attend that service. No person should be readier to serve the house than myself, would the constitution of my body give me leave: but it is too apparent it will not; and therefore I do humbly beg of the hon. members of that house, that they would not only excuse me for my non-attendance to-morrow, but discharge me from that duty they have commanded me to; and that they would please to pitch upon some person in my room, more fit for that employment. I do assure you, that in case it should please God in few days to restore me to strength enough to return to that Chair, yet I am assured that, without an extraordinary providence, I should in a few days after impair it by that service. Pray present my humble service, with this my humble and hearty excuse, to the hon. members of the house of commons; and you will oblige, your friend and servant, ROBERT SAWYER. Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, May 5. 78."

After the reading of which Letter, Mr. Sec. Williamson acquainted the house, that his majesty had also received intimation from the Speaker, to the same effect: and to the end the public may receive no delay, his majesty did give leave to the house to chuse another Speaker. And it having pleased God to restore Mr. Edward Seymour, the former Speaker, to his health again; and he being present in the house; Mr. Sec. Williamson did thereupon propose him to the house, as the fittest person, both for his ability, and long experience for that service: of which the house was so sensible and satisfied, that Mr. Seymour was unanimously called upon to the chair; and was afterwards approved of by his majesty.

The King's Answer to the Vote and Address.] Mr. Sec. Williamson acquainted the house, That the persons appointed to attend his majesty with the Votes of this house, of the 4th, did yesterday wait upon his majesty, and presented the said Votes to his majesty; and did desire his majesty's excuse, that they were not presented to him in the usual form: and that his majesty's Answer was, That he would consider of it, and return an Answer: and that he had accordingly received an Answer from his majesty, as followeth:

"G. R. His majesty having been acquainted with the Votes of this house, of the 4th instant, was very much surpris'd, both with the matter and form of them: but if his majesty had had exception to neither, yet his majesty, having asked the Advice of both houses, does not think fit to give any answer to any thing of that nature, till he hath a concurrent Advice from both houses."

An Address voted to remove Evil Counsellors.] May 7. The house resolved on a division of 154 to 139, "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove those Counsellors who advised the Answers to the Addresses of the 26th of May, or 31st of January last, or either of them."

Address against the Duke of Lauderdale.] It was next resolved, on a division, 137 to 92, "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the duke of Lauderdale from his presence and councils;" and a committee was ordered to draw it up.

May 10. Mr. Powle read the Address for the second time, and the question being put whether the house should proceed on the said Address, it passed in the affirmative: Noes 174, Yeas 176. The house divided on the fourth and sixth paragraphs, the first of which was carried by six, and the last by three voices. The Address was as follows:

"We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, in all duty and thankfulness, acknowledge your majesty's great grace and favour, in demanding our Advice upon the State of your majesty's Affairs in this present juncture, wherein your majesty's honour and the safety of the kingdom is so nearly concerned: according to which command of your majesty, we did immediately enter into consideration of what was imparted to us by your majesty's order; and after serious examination and weighing of the matter, we did resolve upon an Advice, which, because of the urgency of affairs, and the expedition they required, we did present in that form that was not usual in a matter of so great importance, and which we then directed to excuse to your majesty, upon that consideration.—And because we apprehended that the dangers were so imminent, that the delay of the least time might be of great prejudice to your majesty's service, and the safety of the kingdom after so much time already lost, we thought it necessary to apply immediately to your majesty by ourselves; which, in matters of this nature, is wholly in the choice of this house, and hath been frequently practised by us. And because these occasions are so pressing upon your majesty, and the whole kingdom so deeply sensible thereof, we most humbly beseech your majesty to communicate to us the resolutions your majesty has taken upon our said Advice, that thereby these imminent dangers may be timely prevented.—And whereas the commons conceive, that the present inconveniences and dangers, under which the kingdoms now lies, might have been either totally or in a great measure, prevented, if your majesty had accepted of that Advice, which, in all humility and faithfulness, we presented to your majesty on the 26th of May last, and which we re-iterated to your majesty on the 31st of Jan. ensuing; the refusing of which Advice, and dismissing of the parliament in May last, was the occasion of those ill consequences, which have since succeeded both at home and abroad; all which hath arisen from those misrepresentations of our proceedings, which have been suggested to your majesty, by some particular persons, in a clandestine way, without the participation and advice (as we conceive) of the Council-board; as though we had invaded your majesty's prerogative of making peace and war; whereas we did only offer our humble Advice in matters wherein the safety of the kingdom was concerned; which is a right was never yet questioned in the times of your royal predecessors, and without which your majesty can never be safe. Upon which grounds your majesty was induced to give us such Answers to those two Addresses, rejecting our Advice, as thereby your majesty's good subjects have been infinitely discouraged, and the state of your majesty's affairs reduced to a most deplorable condition: we do therefore most humbly desire, that, for the good and safety of this kingdom, and the satisfaction of your subjects, your majesty would be graciously pleased to remove those Counsellors, who advised the Answers to our Addresses of the 26th of May, and the 31st of Jan. last or either of them: And we do farther most humbly desire your majesty favourably to accept this our humble Petition and Address, as proceeding from hearts entirely devoted to your majesty's service; and that as we have never yet failed of giving testimonies of our affection and loyalty to your majesty's person, and government, so your majesty may rest confidently assured that we shall never be wanting to support your majesty's greatness and interest, whilst your majesty relies upon our counsels; which can have no other end than what sincerely tends thereunto, notwithstanding any sinister or self-interested endeavours to make impressions on your majesty to the contrary."

After this Address had been read, a motion was made to adjourn the house, which was over-ruled on a division; Yeas 150. Noes 156. A motion was then made and agreed to, "That the matter of the Address concerning the duke of Lauderdale be added to the Address this day agreed, in these words following: 'And we farther humbly beseech your majesty, That the duke of Lauderdale may be removed from your councils and presence'."

The King's Verbal Message to quicken the Supply.] May 11. Early, when the house was thin, by surprise, Mr. Secretary Williamson moved the house to supply the king with Money, Ships, &c. on a verbal Message from his majesty, "That the Charge was so great, that he must be forced to lay up several of the great Ships, already provided, and to disband many of the Forces newly raised, if he were not speedily supplied."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Mallet. I desire that the message may be sent into Westminster Hall, and the Court of Requests, for your members to attend.

Mr. Boscawen. I wonder that Money should be moved for before we have an Answer from the king to our Address. I would know of the hon. person that moved it, whether we are like to have peace, or war; for hitherto we are dealt with like children. By my consent, not a penny of money till we are plainly dealt with.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Gentlemen ask, whether we shall have war, or not? If the thing must have its issue by the way and manner we have proposed, we can expect little. The Dutch ministry were in great trouble at our proceedings yesterday. I pacified them as well as I could, but upon the whole they feared some things that passed here would have that effect. I say, they desire to go deeper with you, and go higher. I told you formerly how peremptory they were: Van Leven, is another sort of man, than Van Beunegen. It is so far from true, that they would be brought over to the French Alliance as the other was, that they would be brought to carry on the war: as for these two towns, the prince declared, he knew his uncle's mind; comparing things together, he could make conjecture: but whether it be peace, or war, Spain must be paid: and fear not to be outdone in the Supply: that nothing may be in the king's hand: and I would this day be upon it.

* It appears by the Journal, that lord Obispo and sir Tho. Chicbly were this day ordered into the custody of the serjeant at arms, for a quarrel that had happened between them as a quarrel of the house, in which blows were given.
† Grey.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I wonder that gentlemen will move you against a Vote of the house, 'for securing Religion, &c. before you go upon any other matter.' We now are in ready way for Money; but Popery, a bill of a half a dozen sheets, has lain with the lords 12 months: Till we be rid of those Counsels, that have so misled us, we have nothing to give the king. Common fame says, that some gentlemen have been turned out of their places, for their voting, and just upon their voting against the ministers. [Mr. Saville, &c.] A man that comes out of a room where one is killed, with a knife bloody, the Jury will find guilty, when no other man appears to have done the fact.

Mr. Goring. I would know, how that gentleman knows they are turned out of their places, for giving their votes here.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I said Common fame says so.

Sir Cha. Wheeler. He said, 'we are reduced to slavery.' I would have those words written down.

Sir John Hotham. More than common fame will make that out. That you are very near slavery is more than common fame. If these pranks go on, we shall be 'reduced to slavery.'

Sir Tho. Meres. It is said, 'That members are turned out of their places for giving their votes here.' I know not for what other reason they are turned out. I would have some other cause assigned, if they know it. 'Just upon such an occasion they are turned out; one may make a probable conjecture though no demonstration, of it; and as the consequence, if the house be used to it, it will lose its liberty and freedom; and what makes people free but liberty to give their votes here?'

The Speaker. If it be insisted upon, 'That the words spoken gave exceptions,' before you go on in the debate, they must be written down.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I would have the words written down. Clarges gave a comparison of a Jury that would find it murder in the person that came out of a house, with a bloody wife, &c. and no other cause appear.' I would have the words written down.

Sir Tho. Lee. If my worthy friend, Wheeler, had known what his soldiers had done in Southwark, he would not have been so forward this.

Mr. Garroway. These gentlemen, that would have the words written down, would it be so forward, if they heard of what I shall tell you: what those soldiers are, and what they have done. Then you will judge whether it is fit to give Money to support them in their marriage. I would, in this unlucky juncture, do any thing for your service. Let gentlemen go on in the report, and wave this motion. If you will go on, let the words the gentleman spoke be asserted in writing, and do what you please upon them.—The thing went off.

The Speaker reported the substance of the king's Message by Sec. Williamson, viz. "That, by reason of the Expence and Charge his majesty has been, at for equipping and furnishing his Navy, and raising soldiers, &c. he desires that the house would immediately enter into consideration of a Supply for him; for his majesty must either disband the men, or pay them."*

Mr. Garroway. Pray let us be plain and see; for, as things are, we can make no judgment of them. Let us know our Answer from the king to our Address; and do like reasonable men. They have had great time to consider; we have had none. Pray let this Message alone till Monday. We know not why we should disband these forces, or keep them up, for we know nothing of war, or peace. Whatever we do, will else be by chance; it may be very well, or very ill. I would therefore consider of it.

Mr. Powle. There is one word in the king's Message which I take notice of, the word 'immediately.' To enter into the debate, I will always show as much respect to the king's Message, as any man: but I think that word 'immediately' over-rules the debate, and intrenches upon the privileges of this house. I am sorry those about the king will impose these things upon his majesty. It will be time to take up this debate, when our Grievances are redressed, and our Address answered. And then, giving Money ought to be the last thing considered. Why was the Army so hastily raised? Which was no good sign of good intention to the public. Let those about the king set things right and straight. Till then it is too raw and fresh to go upon Money. And I would let fall the debate now, and go upon other business.

Sir John Ernly: You must disband these men that are raised, or pay them. If it be a war, these men are ready for you, and I am glad we are in so much readiness towards it. I am no more for a standing army than any gentleman here; but I would give the king some resolution of his Message. If we consider it not now, that we would do it some other time. You cannot leave it thus, without great dissatisfaction to the nation.

Col. Birch. This was a work of darkness, from the beginning. We gave Money for what we see now not a word of it true: a bargain performed on the one side, and not on the other. We were told, 'that we must trust the king with the Treaties, because the thing could not be well discovered to us.' No doubt but the king knows the bottom of all this, and if he disband the men, and discharge the Ships, he knows why he does it. But still we have no Answer to making of Leagues, that we advised. If the king enter into this league, we shall see all the quotas of the Confederates; but will any man give Money till he knows for what? But I find it is still designed for a peace with the French king, and whenever you leave that king with 100 sail of ships, and 100,000 men, you are in a worse condition than any war can make you. Upon the whole, this is like a question, that a man cannot tell whether to give his affirmative or negative to. Therefore, I would not adjourn it, but let it fall.

* In the Journal, the words are the same with those in the Secretary's first Speech. The former part of the Message was, 'That his majesty had appointed 4 o'clock in the afternoon for their attending him with the Address.'

Mr. Sacheverell. I wish I could see a bottom to go upon: that which I insist upon is, not to give Money in time of war, to wheedle us into a peace; and next, I will not give money upon false suggestions. I would not put any marks upon this Message, but let that fall. If we see they will go into a war, I will be as ready as any man to give money; but seeing all this is for a peace, Clarges's words might be admitted.

Sir Edm. Jennings. The king cannot give an Answer to your Address, till he has an Answer to the Message he sent us to-day. Common fame says, we talk of war: yet we can go little towards it without Supply. Can an army be raised one day, and sent over into Flanders another? Unless the king be supplied, he cannot proceed.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I differ in opinion from those gentlemen that thought it too hasty to raise the army; for else it would have been undisciplined; and I am for Money to maintain the war. But why should we proceed now we have no light to go by? Will any man be satisfied to give money for war, when we see nothing but a face of peace? 100,000*l.* would disband this army. And if we should give a small sum of Money, the Confederates will leave you. If you stay till all Flanders be gone, you will do as king James did in the Palatinate war, treat, and treat, till all was gone, and no body to treat with him. If people urge us upon Money now, it must be answered in the negative; which I would not give the king. If the war really be, he must be a madman who will not give Money; and if it be a peace, no Englishman will be for keeping up the army. Till we have more light, we know not what to say, and I would decline a negative upon the king which all our souls abhor.

Col. Titus. There is a Vote already against this question. And, in short, by this question, either we give our money we know not why, or else we put a negative upon the king; neither of which I would do; and therefore I would not have the question put.

Mr. Pepys. When I promised that the Ships should be ready, by the 30th of May, it was upon the supposition of Money for the 90 ships proposed by the king, and voted by you, their sizes, and rates; and I doubt not by that time to have 90 ships; and if they fall short, it will be only from the failing of the Streights ships coming home, and those but two. I would have Clarges's harsh words explained, viz. 'cheated of another sum of Money.' There has not been one penny of it spent, but towards a war with the French king. If there has been 'a cheat,' it is on the king's side, who has debarred himself of all of it. Peace itself is war with France. Peaceful counsels and warlike preparations cannot subsist. Supplies are not in your hands, to have them when you please. This is the time of the year to send to the Baltic for stores, and this is the time for that Supply.

Sir Rob. Howard. Pepys here speaks rather like an admiral than a secretary, 'I' and 'we.' I wish he knows half so much of the navy as he pretends. Now the king of France is greater at sea than we, with all the preparations that are pretended. I hear the name of the king so often used, that I am sorry for it. We that are against their opinion, are as much for the king's service as they.

Mr. Boscawen. I know not the ground of asking Money, now we are halting between two opinions; peace and war. If we were in a grand committee, to consider of giving Money upon proposals, the debate would be more proper. But I would adjourn the house, that the honourable person who brought the Message for Money, &c. may be free to tell you whether we are to be in peace, or war.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think it well moved to adjourn the house now, because the house is put upon difficulties that the house was never upon before. You have had an Answer of 'surprising,' only, and no more. I would have you severely punish those who misrepresent you to the king; it is absolutely necessary. When things come clearly before you, it will be hard to be excused, that an Army should be raised, and no war. I wonder gentlemen will say, 'you expect management of the war, &c.' If, as some have put it, the nation is at as much charge in peace as war, I am therefore for war. If you become not fatal to them that endeavoured to ruin you, they may be fatal to undo you.

Sir Henry Capel. If the question pass to the negative, then it will be a disrespect to the king, and, in effect, a negative to Money; and the French-king will make his advantage of it. If this be carried in the affirmative, by two or three voices, the consequence will be Money coming heavily on. If we disband the Army, there must be Money. I hope the king will take care of a good peace, and if we have so, we shall stand by him in either.

Mr. Garroway. Perhaps they will disband a few men troublesome to them, and leave the rest to be troublesome to us. And that I fear of the peace. In 9th Hen. iv. you will find it in the record, it is against your privileges and you will have it made out, 'That none of your debates are to be disclosed.' If the king be told the thing; it may be left indefinite and I would adjourn.

Mr. Vaughan. If all the delusions of the last session were forgotten, then this may have been moved; but now we have the same stories repeated, and more would rejoice against giving Money than for it; because they would heighten still the king's displeasure against you. These proceedings are a brand upon the ministers, and I would have them pay for it.

Col. Birch. This Message must plainly be a late result. Whoever put the house upon this question, could not expect a smooth Answer; they could not but expect a negative on this of Money. Some of the king's council are good, and I am apt to believe some are bad; and you have said so. There are twins in the womb. If you adjourn till Monday, there is the same snare still, if we have no more light, neither Peace nor War.—The previous question for adjourning the debate passed in the negative, 178 to 177.

The King's angry Answer to this Address.] May 11. p. m. The house attended the king with the Address, to which his majesty was pleased immediately to return this Answer:

"This Address is so extravagant, that I am not willing speedily to give it the Answer it deserves."

The King makes a Speech to the Lords, and prorogues the Parliament.] May 13. His majesty prorogued the parliament till May 23. Before the commons were sent for up to the lords house, by the black rod, the king spoke thus to the lords:

"My lords; I have received an Address of such a nature from the house of commons, as I cannot but resent very highly, from the ill consequences I have lived to see from such Addresses. I intend therefore to prorogue them for some short time, in hopes they will consider better what they ought to do at their return. I have chosen to tell this to you first, because I would have you know I am very well satisfied with the dutiful behaviour of this house, and you will by that time be more enabled to give me your Advice."

SIXTEENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] May 23. The parliament met again, when the king opened the session with the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; When I met you last, I asked your Advice upon the great conjunctures abroad. What return you gentlemen of the house of commons made me, and whether it was suitable to the end I intended (which was the saving of Flanders), I leave it to yourselves, in cold blood, to consider. Since I asked your Advice, the conjunctures abroad and our distempers (which influenced them so much) have driven things violently on towards a peace; and where they will end, I cannot tell; but will say this only to you, that I am resolved, as far as I am able, to save Flanders, either by a war or a peace, which way soever I shall find most conducing towards it; and that must be judged by circumstances, as they play from abroad. For my own part, I should think, being armed, were as necessary to make peace, as war; and therefore, if I were able, would keep up my army, and my navy at sea, for some time, till a peace were concluded, if that must be; but, because that will depend upon your Supplies, I leave it to you to consider whether to provide for their subsistence so long; or for their disbanding sooner, and to take care, in either case, not to discourage or use ill so many worthy gentlemen and brave men, who came to offer their lives and service to their country upon this occasion; and in pursuit of your own Advices and Resolutions. I must put you likewise in mind of a branch of my Revenue, which is now expiring; and of another greater, which is cut off by a Clause in the Poll Bill; as also of the 200,000*l.* taken up upon the credit of the Excise at your request. And I desire your Resolutions may be speedy, because the present necessity requires it. And I shall consent to any reasonable Bills you offer me for the good and safety of the nation.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I shall say no more, but only to assure you (whatsoever some ill men would have believed) I never had any intentions but of good to you and my people, nor ever shall; but will do all that I can for your safety and ease, as far as yourselves will suffer me. And since these are my resolutions, I desire you will not drive me into extremity, which must end ill both for you and me, and (which is worst of all) for the nation, which we ought all to have equal care of; therefore I desire we may prevent any disorders or mischiefs that may befall them by our disagreement; and in case they do, I shall leave it to God Almighty to judge between us, who is the occasion of it.—One thing more I have to add; and that is, to let you know, That I will never more suffer the course and method of passing laws to be changed; and that if several matters shall ever again be tacked together in one bill; that bill shall certainly be lost, let the importance of it be never so great. The rest I leave to my Lord Chancellor."

The Lord Chancellor Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor made this Speech following:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; That which remains to be said by his majesty's command will fall under these considerations; the present State of Christendom in reference to a general peace, then the influence that peace is like to have upon us; and the necessity of returning to some better kind of intelligence amongst ourselves than we had when we parted last.—The advances which have been made abroad towards a peace, though they may have been hastened by some late occurrences, yet they were long since meditated and prepared there; for when the States

General did perceive, that though they had strained themselves to the utmost, and exceeded all the proportions which by their Treaty they were bound to furnish, yet the Spaniards failed them in every point, not only in the Subsidies they were obliged to pay, but in the very strength and forces they stood engaged to set out; insomuch that all their towns and garrisons were so far from being in any tolerable posture to receive an enemy, that they remained as perfectly defenceless as if they were intended to be abandoned; the States resolved to seek all the occasions they could of coming out of the war and to lay hold on the first that should offer itself.—To this end, they did all the last year solicit his maj. to endeavour a peace; and they would then have taken such a peace as now they seek. But his maj. thought he had done great service to the Christian world, when he had gained two points upon them; first, to model and concert with him the Terms and Articles of a better peace; and then, in prospect of that peace (and without which it could never have been gained), to enter into a League Offensive and Defensive with his majesty, to obtain that peace by force, if it could not be had otherwise.—And while things stood upon this foot, and some preparations were making towards it, there was no small hopes of putting a considerable stop to the Growth of the Power of France.—For though the Dutch were still inclined to accept of peace, and were hearkening after the French Propositions at Nimeguen; yet such were his majesty's resolutions to hold them to their league, and so constant were all his refusals to hearken to such a peace, or to have any part in it, that they must of necessity at last have been obliged to continue in the war some way or other.—But when once it was heard abroad, that this league, which was the only thing by which his majesty could oblige the States, had been so ill understood at home, as to meet with some very unfitting and very undeserved reflections; as soon as it had taken air, and they understood that there was a resolution to give no money until satisfaction given in matters of religion, which in all countries are the longest debates that can be entered upon, and at this time above all others should least have been stirred; and when at last the king had received an address which they took to be of such a nature as was never seen or heard of before in any state or kingdom in the world, and had proceeded so far as to express his resentment of it!—Then they concluded with themselves, that it was in vain to rely any longer upon England, for England was no longer itself: then all sides began to wish for peace, even Spain as well as Holland; and if the cessation which is endeavoured to be made in order to it take effect, as in all likelihood it will, we may conclude that the peace will soon follow.—The influence such a peace will have upon our affairs is fitter for meditation than discourse; only this is evident, that, by the preparations we have made for war, and the prohibitions we have made of trade, we have given no small provocations to a mighty king, who may be at leisure enough to resent them if he please. And therefore it will import us so to strengthen ourselves, both at home and abroad, that it may not be found a cheap or easy thing to put an affront upon us.—The first step in order to this is, to preserve a state of peace and unity at home, which is now more necessary than ever: he that fomenteth divisions now, does more mischief to his country than a foreign enemy can do, and disarms it in a time when all the hands and all the hearts we have are but enough to defend us.—No fears of arbitrary government can justify, no zeal to religion can sanctify, such a proceeding.—It hath been so stale a project to undermine the government, by accusing it of endeavouring to introduce popery and tyranny, that a man would wonder to see it taken up again.—Have we forgotten that religion and liberty were never truly lost, till they were made a handle and pretence for sedition? Are we so ill historians as not to remember when prelacy was called popery, and monarchy tyranny; when the property of nobility and gentry was held to be destructive of liberty; and that it was a dangerous thing for men to have any sense of their duty and allegiance?—Do we know all this, and suffer men without doors to hope by our divisions to arrive at the same times again? Can we endure to see men break the act of oblivion every day, by reviving the memory of forgotten crimes in new practices?—If fears and jealousies can ever become wise and good men, it is only then when there is danger of a relapse. No caution can be too great against the returns of that fatal distemper from which we have been so lately recovered, especially when some symptoms of it begin again to appear in printed libels, and in several parts of the nation.—It might perhaps be worth our while to consider, whether we do not bring some kind of scandal upon the Protestant religion, when we seem so far to distrust the truth and power of it; that, after so many laws that have been passed to guard it, after all the miraculous deliverances from the attempts which have been made against it, we should still be afraid of its continuance.—It is, no doubt, a duty which we owe to God and to ourselves, to the present age, and to posterity, to improve the opportunities God gives us of fencing our vineyard, and making the hedge about it as strong as we can. And the king hath commanded me to tell you, that he is ready to concur with us in any thing of this kind, which shall be found wanting, and which the Christian prudence and justice of a parliament can propose as expedient.—But why then do we suffer those abroad to complain of the dangers of religion, who complain only for complaining sake? Hath not the late act made it impossible, absolutely impossible, for the most concealed Papist that is, to get into any kind of employment? And did ever any law, since the reformation, give us so great a security as this?—As little cause there is to be jealous of our liberties and properties; nor do they believe themselves, who pretend to be afraid of either.—Can there be a greater evidence of the moderation of a prince, and his tenderness of the subjects, than to suffer, as he does every day, so much licentious and malicious talk to pass unpunished. If there be not one instance to be found in a whose reign of a man that hath suffered against law, and but very few examples of those that have suffered by it, shall we endure them that dare say, in coffee-houses, and in other public places, that the nation is enslaved?—Let it be lawful to provoke and challenge the most discontented and the most unsatisfied spirit in the kingdom, to shew that time, if he can, since the world began, and this nation was first inhabited, wherein there were fewer grievances, or less cause of complaint, than there is at this present; nay, give him scope enough, and let him search all ages, and all places of the world, and tell us, if he can, when and where was ever found a happier people than we are at this day.—And if malice itself ought to blush when it makes this comparison, what strange ingratitude both to God and man are they guilty of, who behave themselves so, as if they could be ill at ease under so temperate a government?—My Lords and Gentlemen; The king will not suffer himself to believe it possible that you should ever forsake him, when any difficulties or distresses are near him; and therefore he doth with great assurance expect your care to preserve him in the affections of his people, as well as your concurrence to his present Supplies.—The forces which have been raised, and the ships which have been set out by your advice, have been at a vast charge; and yet it will be no small expence to disband them again, and to pay them till they be disbanded.—That two hundred thousand pounds which was borrowed at your request remains as a debt upon the king, unless you acquit yourselves of the obligation which lies upon you to pay it.—That branch of the revenue which expires next month will leave the crown in great want, if it be not continued; and yet the continuance of it will not prove so considerable a support as it ought to be; for the Poll Bill hath extinguished the duty upon French wines, and all other customs arising upon trade with France; and it is worthy of the care of a parliament, to make this up some other way, that so his majesty may see and know that nothing can be lost by trusting his parliament.—But the king hath so far expressed himself this day, that it is evident the manner of your proceedings is to him as considerable as the matter; and that he will not accept a good bill, how valuable soever it may be, unless it come to him in the old and decent method of parliaments.—The late way of tacking together several independent and incoherent matters in one bill, seems to alter the whole frame and constitution of parliaments, and consequently of the government itself.—It takes away the king's negative voice in a manner, and forces him to take all or none, when sometimes one part of the bill may be as dangerous for the kingdom as the other is necessary.—It takes away the negative voice of the house of peers too by the same consequence; and disinherits the lords of that honour they were born to, the liberty of debating and judging what is good for the kingdom.—It looks like a kind of defamation of the government, and seems to suppose the king and house of lords to be so ill affected to the public, that a good bill cannot carry itself through by the strength of its own reason and justice, unless it be helped forward by being tacked to another bill that will be favoured.—It does at last give up the greatest share of legislature to the commons, and by consequences the chief power of judging what laws are best for the kingdom.—And yet it is a privilege that may be made use of against the commons, as well as by them; for, if this method hold, what can hinder the lords at one time or other from taking advantage of a bill very grateful to the commons, and much desired by them, to tack a new clause to it; of some foreign matter, which shall not be altogether so grateful, nor so much desired; and then the commons must take all or none too.—Thus every good bill shall be dearly bought at last; and one chief end of calling parliaments, the making of good laws, shall be wholly frustrated and disappointed; and all this by departing from that method which the wisdom of our ancestors prescribed on purpose to prevent and exclude such inconveniences. These innovations the king resolves to abolish; and hath commanded me to say to you, 'State super vias antiquas.'—My Lords and Gentlemen; There never did, there never can again, so much depend upon the happy success of any one meeting, as there does upon this.—If this session do not repair the misfortunes, and amend the faults of the last, it will look like a fatality upon the nation. If we do not now strengthen the hands of the government, and shame the enemies of it, by banishing all manner of distrust, we shall be in danger to become, not only the most miserable, but the most unpitied nation under Heaven.—Let not the whippers, or evil surmises, of those who lie in wait to deceive, make any man the unhappy occasion of endangering the safety of the government, by mistrusting it. He whose house is destroyed by fire, would find but little consolation in saying the fire did not begin by his means; but it will be matter of perpetual anguish and vexation of heart to remember, that it was in his power to have extinguished it. Let the world now see, that your zeal to preserve the government is the same it was when you were ready to die for its restoration; and know, it is an act as meritorious, and an act of as great duty and loyalty to stand between the king, and all these practices of libelers which tend to create a misunderstanding between him and his parliament, as it is to fight for him in a day of battle. Embellish the history of this parliament, by shewing us the healing virtue of this session. So shall your service be acceptable to the king, who never forgets any thing but injuries; so shall you recommend yourselves to posterity, by transmitting to them the same peace and happiness you are trusted with. And the God of peace and unity prosper all your consultations to the honour and happiness of the king, and the joy and comfort of all his good subjects."

Vote for an Address to the King to declare War against France.] May 25. A motion was made for an address to the king, to know whether we shall have Peace, or War. After a long debate, a motion was made, to adjourn; which was carried in the affirmative, Yeas, 195. Noes, 176.

May 27. The commons agreed to the following Vote, which was sent to the king by the members of the privy council; "Resolved, That this house, taking into consideration the state of his majesty's affairs, and the great charge and burden that his majesty and the nation lies under by the Army now in being, are humbly of opinion, that if his majesty pleases to enter into a War against the French king, this house is, and always will be, ready to support and assist him in that war: but if otherwise, then they will proceed to the consideration of providing for the speedy disbanding of the Army."

The King's Answer.] May 28. Mr. Sec. Coventry delivered to the house the king's Answer to yesterday's Vote, as follows:

"C. R. His majesty having perused the Vote of this house of the 27th hath thought fit to return this Answer; That the most Christian king hath made such offers for a Cessation, till the 27th of July, as his majesty does not only believe will be accepted, but does also verily believe will end in a general peace: yet since that is not certain, his maj. does by no means think it prudent to dismiss either fleet or army before that time; nor does he think it can add much to the charge; because the raising the money, and paying them off, would take as long a time as that, although the speediest disbanding that is possible were intended. That, in the mean time, his majesty desires that some Supply may be provided for their subsistence; that as hitherto they have been the most orderly Army that ever were together, they may be encouraged to continue so. That there is another thing which presses his maj. with very great inconveniences in his domestic affairs; which is the want of the 200,000*l.* you promised to repay him at your next meeting after: and which does affect that whole branch of his revenue, by having a fifth part taken out of every payment, which should be applied to the necessary uses of his household: he does therefore desire you will immediately apply yourselves to the repayment of that money to him."

On the receipt of this Message the house resolved; "That it is the opinion of this house, that all the Forces that have been raised since the 29th of Sep. last, except those which have been sent to the Plantations, be forthwith paid off and disbanded."

Debate on an Affidavit annexed to an Election Petition from Aldborough.] Sir Tho. Littleton. I have a Petition concerning Aldborough.* There is annexed to it an Affidavit, which is rather a work of supererogation, but what will not vitiate the Petition.

Sir Rd. Temple. We are not to receive Affidavits here. I would have it struck out.

The Speaker. If the Affidavit be fired to the Petition, if you receive the Affidavit you receive the Petition.

Sir John Talbot. If a member can aver, that he knows the hands that have subscribed the Petition, or if any without doors will aver it, you may receive the Petition. But you cannot receive an Affidavit of the subscription of the Petition.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I know the hands very well.

Sir Tho. Meres. Sir Wm. Wentworth undertakes that Mr. Wentworth will prosecute the Petition, and I would have the Petition read, but not the Affidavit.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The matter of the Petition becomes already very burthensome to the corporation. The other day a petition was delivered, and it was a question whether it was not signed all by one man's hand; now here is an Affidavit of the subscriptions sent with the petition, by the mistaken zeal of the gentleman. If we are not impowered to receive Affidavits here, it is no affidavit, and you may receive it. If they lapse any more time in their petition, they may be nonsuited again, as they have been twice already, and so their business is done for this parliament. I would therefore have the clerk read the Petition, and connive at the Affidavit.

The Speaker. If you will put the sitting member (sir John Resesby) to these unnecessary disturbances, and admit every irregularity, &c.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would publish rules, that all persons must come from all parts of England to avow Petitions, and so weary men out, that the mayors and bailiffs will chuse you all the parliament-men. The case of sir James Langham, for Northampton. He was first chosen by the commonalty, and secondly by the mayor and aldermen, and thirdly by both, and yet he missed it at last. There was something of a communion-table in the case.

Mr. Poole. Whilst we are gratifying a particular gentleman, let us not lose an essential privilege; that whenever a member avers the Petition, you never refuse it. Sir Wm. Wentworth tells you, he knows the hands, and un-

* This was a Petition of several of the burghers, setting forth, "That sir John Resesby had procured himself to be returned for that borough, though he was not duly elected."

dertakes they will prosecute the petition. If any member presents a petition to abuse you, and the petitioners will not avow the petition, it is in your power to punish that member, and send him to the Tower. A member has sat here four years, and the petitioners say he has sat wrongfully. Let us not begin new customs to hinder complaints of people coming to us. Let the petition be read, but not the Affidavit.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. By this Petition, the town complains of one that sits, that is not a representative of them, as a grievance. It must be owned by somebody, and I would have it now.

Sir Edm. Jennings. Since the Petition is insisted upon, I must say something, that I otherwise would not: I believe it to be fictitious. That letter could not come to Mr. Wentworth till Sunday morning, and he lives 20 or 30 miles from Aldborough, and sending to and again that Affidavit, which was made at Wakefield on Monday, and this is 26 miles farther, how it is possible this Affidavit could be made in such a time, I leave you to consider.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is no compliment to your member to be the hander of a fictitious Petition to you. I presume the member has had caution. If it be fictitious, I wonder gentlemen should call for adjourning, and not enquire into it: every scrivener may else put these slurs upon you, and by calling it fictitious, and not proving it, the corporation may be slurred out of their right too. I would therefore refer the enquiry into it to the committee of privileges.

The question being put, That the Petition be read, it passed in the affirmative, 139 to 115, and the Clerk was ordered to blot out the Affidavit. The Petition was referred to the committee of privileges.

May 31. Resolved, "That a Supply be granted to the king towards the paying and disbanding of all the Forces raised since the 29th of Sept. last."

A Supply given to disband the Army by a certain Day. June 4. The commons voted 200,000*l.* to be raised by a monthly tax, in six months, after the Land-tax, then in being, should be expired; with an appropriating clause, that this should be for disbanding the Army by the end of the present June: they also voted 200,000*l.* towards defraying the Expenses of the Fleet; and seemed inclinable to throw in such another sum for the king's extraordinary occasions.

A Message from the King to prolong that term. June 7. His majesty sent them another Message, signifying "That his mind was still the same with what he delivered in his Speech the 23d of May last, viz. That the Army and Fleet ought to be kept up till the expected peace be concluded: and he further recommended to their consideration, whether it were not dishonourable for him to recall his Forces in Flanders, from those towns which he had taken into his protection, before they could provide themselves of other succours."

Resolution to admit no further Motions for new Supplies. The reason assigned in this Message was irresistible; and produced a Resolution to extend the time, as to the Forces in Flanders, till the 27th of July: but shortly after, viz. the 15th, as if an apprehension began to prevail, that the house was falling back into its old complaisance, it was moved, "That, after the Tuesday following, which was the 18th, no motions should be made for any new Supplies of Money, till after the next recess;" and carried in the affirmative: the courtiers losing the previous question by six, and the question itself by 9 voices: 314 members being present at the first division, and 317 at the last.

Debate on sir S. Swale's Conviction of Popery. June 8. Sir Solomon Swale sent the Speaker a letter to excuse his attendance on the house, by reason of a quartan ague, that had reduced him to great weakness. He desired to be heard by his counsel, at the bar, by reason of his unwarrantable prosecution to conviction of Popery, at the sessions at the Old Bailey.

Mr. Williams. Dismembering a member is a very tender point. It is suggested that Swale is a convicted Recusant. The question before you is, not whether he be convicted, or not convicted, of recusancy, but whether he be truly convicted or not in the exchequer, or king's bench; and till it be voided there, it is a legal conviction. That a Popish Recusant cannot be a member, you have determined in sir Tho. Strickland's case.

Sir Wm. Coventry. It is said to be done by matter of record, which is always credited here. If a man come with the record of his return, he sits here by that record, and you can hear no counsel in Swale's case. No man sits here upon a false return, till first the Record be mended: and because you have not the trial of conviction of a member before you, the law has made this of recusancy easy. For he may be taken off, by his conformity. The Test of the new Act is not required to take off conviction, for that is only for offices. If he takes the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and conforms to the Church, &c. that is easily taken off. But to have counsel, in a thing that is not judgeable here; I would not have you meddle with it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would have the officers of the exchequer acquaint you how the thing stands, as to Swale's conviction. Suppose a member, after he is chosen, &c. takes not the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and be petitions you to sit here, without taking them. I would have the officers of the exchequer bring you the record of the process.

The clerk of the crown brought in the Record of the Conviction at the Old Bailey, but this gave no satisfaction, and so the Exchequer officers were called for, but were not at the door.

The Speaker. The method here of Swale may be the case of any member. There needs nothing more to convict a Popish Recusant than not being at his parish church, &c. for the space of a month, without reasonable excuse, when perhaps he goes to another church elsewhere. Therefore pray be very tender in this.

Sir John Trevor. The matter has been depending these nine months, and how easily might Swale have reconciled himself in that time! Pray give not countenance to a papist to sit in the house.

The Officers of the Exchequer were ordered to attend on Monday next, with the Record of Conviction.

The question being put, "That there remains an obligation upon this house to repay his majesty the 200,000*l.* charged on the credit of the Act for additional Excise," it passed in the affirmative, 177 to 102.

Debate on a Standing Army.] June 11. The house, according to order, took into consideration his majesty's Message.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The Speaker ought to have read the king's Message, and not the clerk.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I have observed, that the king's Message, always, at the first reading, is read by the Speaker, but if read again, by the clerk. The Speaker reads it the first time, and we are all uncovered; the clerk the second time, and we are all covered.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The question is, Whether you will go into a committee with instructions relating to the Bill, or Whether you will go upon the Message, in the house? The parting with your Forces before the peace be beyond doubt or certainty of the possibility of a war, may be of ill consequence. I will beg leave to acquaint you with one thing that happened. On Sunday they had a new Memorial of the danger of the Confederates disbanding. Now whether you will proceed in the house, or by way of instruction to the committee, along with the Bill, is to be considered.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. In this interim, the Confederates have time to come in and accept of the peace. It may prove a dead child; it may be abortive; it is a thing that depends upon other men; a little time will tell you; but till then, I am not able to say any thing.

Mr. Powel. I see not, either from the state of affairs at home or abroad, that a Standing Army is a convenient thing for us, especially for home. We are told, 'we are in the state of mediators, indifferent between both parties; and neither to assist the king.' We hear of great jealousies the Dutch government has of us; and if so, they care not to see our Army on the other side of the water; and the Spaniards are jealous of us, as to France; and if we are in no condition to make war with the French, and that we cannot, &c. I would willingly make peace with them. If they be not your friends, prevent them from being your enemies. These new Forces may engage us in new broils, and we shall have nobody to assist us. As for giving advice in this case, I know not what to say, we having been so sharply reprimanded for it already. For my share of it, as to the protection of the king of Spain, remembering that when we advised the king about a French war, we were checked for it, therefore I move to answer the king's Message, 'that we leave it to him.' And if there may be any clause in the Bill, to continue the Forces in Flanders, that are there, I am not against it.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. It is not intended to keep those Forces up. But this is what we have been wishing and advising this year; and it is offered, for their sakes, to keep those men on foot only in Flanders, till a peace be settled. And their interest for so much is ours.

Mr. Garroway. If Holland and Spain have accepted of peace, then we are out of doors. They have taken care of themselves, and where is the dishonour, and where is the inconvenience, of recalling those Forces out of Flanders? If the peace be a good peace, why do not we come into it? If bad, why do we not protest against it? It is a strange intricate thing, that such and such a thing may happen, therefore we must keep up an Army. If you recall them out of Flanders, they and these here may be disbanded. The cessation of arms may be for three years. I would know whether we are under an obligation to keep the Army up for three years. I see nothing new before us, therefore, according to the first advice, you may very well go on with the Bill for disbanding the Army.

Col. Birch. Keep up the Army for fear of the king of France, and keep it up for ever. To my capacity, we are still in the same darkness as when we first raised this Army. If we had more clearness and plainness, the thing would succeed much better. It is pressed to know on which side we fall, and where is our benefit, by the peace? To which I hear not one word of answer. What do we get? What is our advantage? The cui bono? I doubt not, the honourable persons, if they please, could tell you. Shall we hire merchant ships and fire-ships for nothing? The war was intended against France, but, instead of that, this is to make war against ourselves, by the great charge. It cannot be thought that this is undertaken for Sweden, &c. Every man knows these great ships must do something before the 10th of Aug. for it is not safe to keep them longer out*. If it be for our fears of France, &c. that will never be at an end, and those fears will be hotter and hotter upon us, and the king of France cannot disband his army. He must keep his people in order. Either we have assurance with the Confederates, or with France. Having no more light

*It may not be amiss to observe here, that navigation is now so much improved, that the largest ships (larger than any that were built in those days) are able to keep the sea all the winter.

I know nothing you can farther do, than to proceed upon the Bill for disbanding.

Lord Cavendish. Could the king of France ever have had a more glorious peace than this, his Army we have raised has augmented his glory. It is too much to keep up these ministers, who have so much abused the nation, and be army both. Therefore I would disband the army.

Mr. Bennet. I am more afraid of French ministers than a standing Army.—He then told a story, reflecting upon lord treasurer Danby. When he was in France last, being to fight with a French marquis, he desired an English gentleman to be his second, who came in great haste to do him that service from Rouen. When the gentleman came, &c. he told him, 'He had killed the marquis in a rencounter the day before.' But soon after, the gentleman going to court saw the marquis there, &c. He made his comparison of raising the Army, to Danby's killing the marquis. The story occasioned much mirth in the house, and afterwards some libels.]

Sir John Hotham. I differ from Littleton, as I think those forces went into Flanders in time of peace, and not of war. If gentlemen had foreseen peace, no man would have been obliged to have raised them. But these forces in Flanders may be a nest-egg, &c. and since we have no war, and they have been raised by tricks and deceits upon you here, I would not have them kept up by tricks and deceits that we understand not.

Mr. Vaughan. The crown of England is established by laws; and had it not been so, King John's resignation to the pope had been void. If any man is so hardy as to advise the king to govern by a standing Army, he would overturn law; and it is against the government of the nation. The king has his Peace Committee, and the Militia, to oppose invasion and rebellion; and he may raise arms for defence of an alliance. These are all the ends to answer just government, and I believe the king will do no otherwise. But the keeping this Army up, is certainly in terrorem populi; and the laws abhor all arms but legal arms. These forces are upon free quarter, and if you let them stand against law, you will have little use of law—when their strength is above law. The longer you keep them here, the longer you must pay for them, and so you give up the liberties of the people you represent. You must keep them one hour longer, without giving up the people you represent.

Mr. Swayne. The account we can give of the money that has been raised is, that it has been totally lost, for the end we gave it. As a man can give no other account to him that trusts him with his money, but 'that he was deceived, and outwitted,' will it not make a man careful in the rest of his reckonings? Especially, at a committee, something may arise out of it, to bring in some new motion; but I would sit from day to day, till we have finished the bill.

Mr. Sacheverell. This is a strange debate, such as I never heard before, and, so far as reason assigned, we must renounce what we have passed upon a solemn debate. Let gentlemen remember what was spoken the other day, when, the last of June was proposed for disbanding, &c. It was said, 'the forces abroad could not be paid under a month's time.' And if that averment be true, we are under an impossibility of doing it. It looks as if an essay is made upon us, in time of peace, how we shall admit a Standing Army by consent. The same argument may be used, one, two, or three months hence. If it be for the honour of the king, &c. that is as good a reason as for the Army in Scotland. No man can think these forces are kept up for the safety of Flanders. At a month's end you may be told, that the cessation will be for three months more, and as good a reason for the precedent then, as now. Is it that we should increase jealousies in Holland, and they leap into the king of France's arms? therefore I can never give consent to one day's enlargement of the time of disbanding the army.

Mr. Powle. I move for an accommodation, as to those forces that are beyond the sea. That the question may be, 'whether the time shall be enlarged for disbanding the forces raised since the 29th of September last, not exceeding the 27th of July?'

The first question being put, 'That the time be enlarged for disbanding the forces that have been raised since the 29th of Sep. last, not exceeding the 27th of July,' it passed in the negative, 167 to 164.

The second question, 'That the time shall be enlarged for disbanding the forces now beyond the sea only, not exceeding the 27th of July,' passed in the affirmative, 172 to 166.

This was as instructions to the committee.

Debate on the Bill for hindering Papists to sit in Parliament.] June 12. A Bill for hindering Papists to sit in either house of parliament without taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the Test against Transubstantiation, was read the 2nd time.

Sir John Trevor. I would no more speak against this bill, than for idolatry. But it is a vain thing to send this bill up to the lords. It has been three times sent up already, and you have had no dispatch of it, there are so many lord papists in that house. There runs an opinion without doors, that it makes a disinclination to pass this bill. But if the lords will not pay their duty to the king, and renounce those treasonable positions, they are not fit to sit there. I wish this bill may look forward, that you let not every tree be there to bear fruit, &c. The statute of queen Elizabeth, 'That the members of the house of commons shall take the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, forasmuch as the queen is already satisfied with the duty and loyalty of the lords temporal, they shall sit without taking the Oaths, &c.' And because of this statute of the 5th of the queen, and there are so many popish lords, they will throw it out of their house. Therefore I would have the bill look forward that no lords shall sit there, for the future, either by descent, or be called by writ, that shall not take the Oaths prescribed in the bill for the better suppression of popery.

Sir Tho. Littleton. If this bill will not pass, no bill that you can ever make against Popery can hold. Trevor's argument is, as if a man were ready to die of an acute distemper, and a physician should give him a remedy to operate 7 years hence. I have heard that the lords, in former bills for educating the children of Popish parents in the Protestant religion, called it 'the greatest inhumanity in the world.' Like Turks, that take away children of tribute from the Christians, the sharpest thing in the world! They had rather you would hang them. But this bill breaks no bones, it is consistent with the rules of the government, and it is reasonable that they should be excluded from part of the legislature, &c. It carries no cruelty in it. It is a fair and a just bill, and if it pass not the lords house, it will be the fault of the commons, for we may make it pass if we please.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. I am sorry to hear any arguments for jealousies and apprehensions that this bill should not pass the lords house. Look upon our neighbours; see what they have done in France and Holland. In queen Eliz.'s time, the Protestants were favoured in France; their judges and parliament were mixed with them; they called it 'Chambre mixpartie.' But since that, in France, &c. they have made laws so severe against them, as to root them quite out; and surely it is as wise for us, as for that great monarch, to be tender of our religion. Holland is full of sects, but they suffer no religion in the government but Calvinistical. If we cannot support our religion, it is a wonder we should be contrary to all the world.

Col. Birch. I believe, verily, popery to be idolatry; but I had rather you would look forward than backward, and not let popery grow up to a tree in the education of their children. It has been such a practice in France in either party; if parents have been Catholics, their children have been taken away to be educated. The reason of this bill may turn against us another time. At such a jump, to turn so many lords and commons out of parliament! You know what I mean by this, should religion be changed. And I would give no countenance to any thing that looks like that.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. I desire our government may be preserved as we have found it. Let those that come after us struggle as well as we, without these extreme and violent ways. Cannot a lord that is not a Protestant, give a vote whether leather shall be transported, as well as a commoner? Saying 'it is in our power to make the bill pass,' is an innovation as well as all the rest. We may save ourselves from the growth of Popery, in punishing those that go off from us. The danger is, we know not what may be hereafter. I believe the Catholic Religion is idolatry. Bread in substance, transformed and transmuted into the body of our Saviour, &c. is intrinsic idolatry. As for that, spoken of, about 'their courts of justice in France and Holland,' no measure can be taken betwixt them and us. But I can name a Protestant now, a counsellor of the parliament of Rouen. He is sir Wm. Scott's son. So that holds not that is alleged.

Mr. Powle. I cannot be of Wheeler's opinion, 'to leave the kingdom as we found it.' That is, never to mend it. Had your predecessors been of that opinion, we had Popery long since established. I think the bill is very well calculated for this time. It meddles with nothing but keeping Papiats out of the government. I wish that the Protestants, all the world over, had no more severe treatment than to be excluded out of the government. They are men so obnoxious to the penalty of the law, that they have not freedom of votes; and I am against any man's sitting here, that has not that freedom. As for the children, &c. I think that a cruelty to take away your child to have him damned, as that way in Turkey, &c. which is the worst sort of the Christian slavery. As for passing of this bill, there is much of it in our power. Within 12 months we have given great sums; and if we part with our money, and have not some good bills, it is in vain to sit here.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I desire to explain myself. This is called by Wheeler an innovation. But we know it was the ancient course of parliament to have Grievances redressed, before Money was given. But the 'innovation' is to give money first, before grievances are redressed.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. I know a lord lieutenant and a colonel that are Papiats still. [He was called to name them; but the question was put, and carried for committing the Bill.]

Debate on the Speaker's proposing sir Tho. Meres for sitting up late. June 15. On the Speakers touching upon sir Tho. Meres, by way of reproof, for sitting up so late at night that he came not timely in the morning to make his Report from the Committee of Privileges, Sir Tho. Meres said, It is not true, that I sat up so late last night.

Several took exceptions at his reply to the Speaker.

Sir John Hotham. I think both the Speaker and Meres were to blame, for what they said I would have the thing rest, and go no farther. I have respect for them both.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I would have Meres explain himself in this, as one gentleman would do to another.

The Speaker. If I said 'that Meres sat up late last night,' I hope it is no crime to say so. What is said to the Speaker, is said to you all; and if you will put it up, I will.

Sir Tho. Meres. It is the first occasion I have given to mispend your time, these 18 years. I grant I might have said it in the words, 'it is not so.' If there was heat in you, or me, I am sorry for it. But I must say I did not sit up late, for I was not well, and so went home late. When the house declares the words not fit to be said, I will say so too. Upon the whole matter, I desire I may not be the occasion of mispending the time of the house.

Sir John Ernly. Though Birch tells you, 'That among friends such words may pass,' yet it is the way to lose friendship by such words. I think Meres has asked the pardon of the house, and I would pass it over.

Sir Tho. Meres. So many of the words as are applicable to the Order of the house, I am sorry for. But for the other, of the reflection, hereafter instead of saying 'it is not true,' I must say 'it is not so.'

Sir Tho. Littleton. If the words had been said without a provocation, the house would have been warm upon it; but you, Mr. Speaker, gave the occasion. And I desire there may be forbearing on all hands for the future. If we have liberty to debate fairly without provocation, you, Mr. Speaker, will have no reflection upon you.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. As to the measure of the words 'true, or false,' in common conversation the words are not allowed to one another. I should much wonder if Meres should make a difficulty of asking your pardon, and that of the house, for what he said in heat. And I think it reasonable he should do it.

Mr. Sacheverell. I was not here, when the words past betwixt the Speaker and Meres. Though I would have the thing laid aside, yet not without some declaration; for till then, if any man says any thing of me that is not true, I shall tell him 'it is not true.'

Mr. Garroway. I hope the Speaker will not pretend to so absolute a command over the house as to say sharp things, and no man be permitted to reply upon him. The custom of the words 'it is not true' is more sharp than they are in their own nature.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I will say something to the words I heard; they were 'I hope you will speak truth whilst you are in the Chair.'

Mr. Goring. I am not against putting these words up here, if we may have liberty to demand satisfaction without doors. To which,

Sir John Hotham replied; I like the motion well, if we were all upon the same foot, and if there might be no pardons so easily obtained, &c.

Sir Tho. Meres. If it may be acceptable to the house, I will speak. [His friends cried, 'No! No!']

Mr. Garroway. If you, Mr. Speaker, will not own the words that Meres supposed you said, Meres will quickly explain himself in the thing, and there is an end of it.

Sir Tho. Meres. I say it over again, I am sorry for your expence of time. I own the thing was sudden, and without any sort of ill-nature. I own all that, and that we have been long acquainted and familiar. And I apply my being sorry, as you apprehend it.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I am unwilling to speak, till I have heard the Speaker's and Meres's words perfect. The less we repeat the words of exceptions on both sides, the better. Meres saying 'his words were mistaken' goes a great way towards satisfaction. Some gentlemen seem to think that Meres saying 'he was sorry, &c.' was not applied the right way; but it seemed to me then that he applied the word 'sorry' right. I would have it passed over. It looks like an ill omen abroad, that here has been more clashing at words this session, than in seven, eight, or ten sessions before. But I hope the Speaker has had his full satisfaction, and I will proceed no farther in it.

Sir Tho. Meres. Most certainly Coventry has repeated my sense, and I own what I said to be his.—And so the thing went off.

The King's Speech, demanding an Additional Revenue of 300,000l. per Ann.] June 18. The king went to the house of peers, and made the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; I know very well that the season of the year requires this session should be short; and that, both for my health and your occasions, we may all have liberty to go into the country by the middle of the next month at farthest. I think it a matter of yet more importance, that we part not only fairly but kindly too, and in perfect confidence one of another; since nothing else can render us either safe and easy at home, or considered so far abroad as this crown has ever been, and is now more necessary than ever, both for the safety of christendom and our own: therefore I shall at this time open my heart freely to you, in some points that nearest concern both you and me; and hope you will consider them so, because I am sure our interest ought not to be divided; and for me they never shall. I told you at the opening of this session, how violently things abroad were driving on towards a peace, and that I could not tell where they would end; but that I was resolved to save Flanders, either by a war or a peace; in which I am still fixed, as in the greatest foreign interest of this nation. I must now tell you, that things seem already to have determined in a peace, at least Spain and Holland; who have so far accepted the terms offered by France, that my ambassador at Nimègue writes me word, he expected to be called upon to sign by the last of this month. My part in it will be not only of a mediator, but to give my guaranty to it, which the Confederates will call upon me for, and I am resolved to give in the strongest manner they themselves will desire, and I am able. How far this will go, I cannot tell; but they send me word already, that unless England and Holland will both join in the charge of maintaining Flanders, even after the peace, the Spaniards will not be in condition of supporting it alone, and must fall into other measures. On the other side, they think France will be left so great, that nothing abroad can treat with them hereafter upon an equal foot, without the hopes of being supported by this crown; and, to this end, I am sure, it will be necessary not only to keep our navies constantly strong at sea, but to leave the world in some assurance of our being well united at home, and thereby in as great an opinion of our conduct hereafter as they are already of our force. Upon this occasion, I cannot but say, that though, after our joint resolutions of a war, and the Supplies you have given towards it, you may think the peace an ill bargain, because it will cost you money, yet perhaps you will not believe it so, if you consider that by it so great a part of Flanders is like to be saved; whereas, without the paces we made towards war, there is nothing so certain as that the whole of it would have been absolutely lost this campaign, if not by this very time; and I believe you would give much greater sums than this will cost you, rather than the single town of Ostend should be in the French hands, and 40 of their men of war in so good an haven over against the river's mouth. Besides, both you and I (as we are true Englishmen) cannot but be pleased, and understand the importance of that reputation we have gained abroad, by having in 40 days raised an Army of near 30,000 men, and prepared a navy of 90 ships, which would have been now ready at sea, if we had gone into a war. Now, my lords and gentlemen, I know that in so great conjunctures you desire that I should keep the honour of my crowns, and look to your safety, by some balance in the affairs abroad; and I should be very glad I were able to do it: but I do not see how it will be possible for me, even in a time of peace, with a revenue so impaired as mine is by my debts long since contracted, and the present Anticipations, and at the best so disproportioned, not only to that of the kings my neighbours, but even to that of the United Provinces themselves (though of no larger extent than two or three of our counties): therefore, as I said I would open my heart freely to you, so I must tell you, that if you would see me able in any kind to influence the great conjunctures abroad, wherein the honour and safety of the nation are so much concerned, and wherein the turns are sometimes so short as not to give me leave to call in time either for your advice or assistances; if you would have me able but to pursue such a war as this of Algiers with honour, and at the same time keep such fleets about our own coasts, as may give our neighbours the respect for us that have been always paid this crown; if you would have me pass any part of my life in ease or quiet, and all the rest of it in perfect confidence and kindness with you and all succeeding parliaments; you must find a way of settling for my life, not only my Revenue, and the additional Duties as they were at Christmas last, but of adding to them, upon some new funds, 300,000*l.* a year: upon which, I shall consent that an Act may pass, for appropriating 500,000*l.* a year to the constant maintenance of the Navy and Ordnance, which I take to be the greatest safety and interest of these kingdoms; and I will at the same time (as I do now) assure you, that I shall not only, this or any other session of parliament, consent to such reasonable and Public Bills as you shall offer me, but shall employ my whole life to advance the true and public good and safety of my people, and endeavour, while I live, that none else shall ever be able to do them harm. I did not in my last Speech mention the 40,000*l.* I am engaged to pay to the prince of Orange for my niece's portion, because I had recommended it to you so lately before; but, the first payment being already due, and demanded by him, I must again put you in mind of it, and desire you will enable me to keep my word with him."

Debate on the King's Speech.] Mr. Mallet. Here are gracious expressions in his majesty's Speech, and if it fall out in the event as well as in the expression, it will be very well. I see we have peace, &c. and, in some measure, from counsels here. As for the guarantee, &c. I know not how it is made out to us. Yet we may give good Thanks 'for the gracious expressions in his majesty's Speech.'

Mr. Sec. Williamson. The king's Speech has matter of great weight in it. I suppose it is the order of parliament to set apart a time for the consideration of it. And in the mean time, to give his majesty Thanks, 'for the gracious expressions in his Speech.'

Sir Robert Thomas. I move that Williamson may carry the Thanks.

Lord Cavendish. (In ridicule) I move that Mallet, who firsted, and Williamson, who seconded the motion, may carry the Thanks to the king.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. I have no other exception to it, but that the thing is extraordinary. I desire, that, in the circumstances you do the Message, you would not lose the merits of it.

[Usually the Privy Counsellors carry the Message. Mallet was not one.]

Sir George Hungerford. At the latter end of a session, now we are going into the country, this demand of the king's is the most extraordinary thing that ever was done.

Lord Cavendish. All members are alike here, and as good as a privy councillor to carry a Message to the king. These two persons moved for, have been firsted and seconded; and put it to the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I remember an Address of this house to the king, 'for wearing of English manufactures in the court, by his majesty's example, &c.' sent by sir Ch. Harbord, who was no privy councillor. This is an answer to what is urged, 'that none but privy counsellors carry Messages to the king.'

Sir Tho. Lee. As to what is said of 'Messages by privy counsellors only, &c.' that is calling them only by their names. They go as a committee only from the house. If the custom has been that privy counsellors propose Speakers, and they are chosen, it does not therefore follow that privy counsellors chuse them. What you will do is one thing, and what you ought to do is another.

Sir Edm. Jennings. This is a reflection upon the whole house.

Sir Tho. Meres. The question is, Whether you will add any to the privy counsellors, as you have done upon other Messages. I have been added twice or thrice myself for onc. But for sending the king Thanks, I remember none that have carried the Message but privy counsellors.

Ordered "That the Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for his gracious expressions in his Speech."

Mr. Garroway. If the privy counsellors, or the house go in a body, I am not against it.

Mr. Bennet. When this is over, I would enquire who it is that advised the king to demand so great a sum of us, and a Revenue that the nation is not able to bear. But I am as willing to give Thanks for the gracious expressions in his majesty's Speech as any man.

Mr. Garroway. Here are a great many points to be observed in the king's Speech. I think you have but little money to give. I remember, the present lord chancellor, when he was in this house, upon the making the king's Revenue 1,200,000*l.* a year, said, 'We had given all we had to give.' We have paid dear now for talking of a war with France, and our answer to this demand is, 'that it is beyond our abilities; we have it not to give.' I would first know where this 300,000*l.* is to be had, to make up the Revenue, &c? I would know where, or what it is? I know no such thing. I cannot imagine how so much as to think of it. I have heard it said, 'That the Revenue should never be so big as to destroy amity betwixt the king and us;' and, 'that it is fit for us to keep something always in reserve to present his majesty with.' This looks to me, of a strange nature, as if the house of commons were never to come here more. I know not how to comply with it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would do all things with decency. You have made an Order, 'that no more motions for Money shall be made this session.' And if any gentleman can show a reason why you should retract your Order, and consider the king's Speech, he says something to the purpose.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Increasing the king's Revenue 300,000*l.* per ann. ought to be directly from a motion arising from the king's Speech in the house, before you go into a grand committee.

The Speaker. The reason of it is, the house avoids a question upon any thing of Money in the king's Speech, but it must arise from a motion in the house, referred to a grand committee to consider, &c.

Mr. Swynfin. I desire, we may not make day longer delay, but come to some resolution to-day, whether you will consider the several things in the king's Speech, or not. I am sorry the motion is made to us now from the king, and am sorry we can give the country so little account of what we have done already. We have complied with all things at the opening of the session, and it is a most unusual thing to have new demands for Money at the latter end of a session. I know not any precedent before of it. At the opening of the session, there was Money given for an Army by land, and a Navy by sea, for a French War. And all the latter part of the session has been spent in raising a great charge on the kingdom, for disbanding that Army; and it will lie very hard upon the people.

Sir John Knight. Consider the poverty of the nation, and fall of rents; it is impossible we should grant what is desired. Here are Pensions upon the Revenue, and we must still supply it. I would have an act of parliament to annul them all. At this rate we shall be Normans, and wear wooden shoes. I move, therefore, 'That there be no farther addition to the Crown Revenue, but that the Revenue may be better managed.' Which will sufficiently do the business of the crown without addition.

Lord Cavendish. There is no slavery like that under a form of law. This is so formidable a demand, in the king's Speech, that the first impression I can make of it is, to remove those who advised the king to demand it. 'The king would be at ease, if his Revenue was,' and as long as these ministers manage it, he never will; and I would have them removed. Our liberality has brought upon us the fears of Popery and arbitrary power. I would not have our sleeps disturbed with this demand in the king's Speech; and whilst the house is full, I would see an end of these demands.

Sir Francis Drake. Our Saviour was followed by a great many for the leaves, and so was the king's father. Great sums are asked. Is it from without us, or within us? Let us, however, get these men removed from the throne, that have endeavoured to break trust and confidence betwixt the king and us. They are uneasy with a parliament, and would have such a Revenue granted the king, that they may have no more. No Englishman can give this money demanded; and I would give none.

Mr. Booth. It is said 'that the Revenue cannot maintain the charge of the government.' If it be not enough, it is because there are so many privy seals; they are so numerous, and the Revenue is so ill managed; and it is very hard that the nation should supply the defects of ill management. The Speech tells you, 'That the Revenue is not so great as that of other princes.' If it was as great as that of France, I fear it would be to make the king as absolute as the king of France. As to the princess of Orange's Portion, I hope we shall not pay all the portions the king engages for. I hear there are great expenses in lodging as Whitehall, [the dutchess of Portsmouth.] Still for more expences. I move, therefore, 'That we may give no farther addition to the king's Revenue.'

Sir Tho. Meres enumerates the king's Revenue, and the charges upon the people, now amounting to about two millions; and here is a request of 300,000*l.* for the king's life, which, at seven years value, amounts to two millions! Pray put a question whether you shall set a day for this motion. And I pray you will give a negative question. I will give a negative.

Mr. Sacheverell. There is more in this question than in any I ever heard, since I sat here. The States of France gave the king power to raise money upon extraordinary occasions, 'till their next meeting,' and they never met more. This sum is asked 'because of the Algiers war,' and another reason is, 'the king will give you 500,000*l.* per annum for the Fleet.' And we gave 700,000*l.* per ann. for it in the Customs. Those that move you now for a Supply, I believe, intend not to perpetuate it upon your land. Trade is already overcharged, and where will they have it? Home Excise; that way has lost them their liberty in France. Just as the calculation was made for the war, and disbanding the Army, and the Revenue demanded is calculated for an army of 20,000 men. I would ask any gentleman, whether he would make the Revenue so big, as there should be no use of a parliament for supplying the king? And whether ever the ministers will call a parliament again, should you grant such a Revenue as is asked? Consider this too; when we are upon any good laws, we are prorogued, and can do nothing but give Money. I will trust the ministers no more; and will give my negative to increasing the Revenue 300,000*l.* more.

Mr. Powle. I take this increase of the Revenue to import no less than the change of the government. Either we shall not need parliaments any more, by good husbandry of the crown, or else the crown must still have Aids, and the nation be not able to bear it. In the Revenue now, there are all the marks of superfluity; as Pensions on the Customs, and other branches of the Revenue, besides 80,000*l.* paid out of the exchequer for secret service, within these few months. And I have seen accounts in the Secretary's Papers, for Intelligence, &c. that come not near up to that sum. Now, we are required to inspect the Revenue, &c. a most unreasonable thing, at the latter end of a session! I know not how this Revenue can be granted, but upon a Home-Excise; and then what use can there be of so much revenue, but for keeping up the Army? I would have all men consider this question, of increasing the Revenue 300,000*l.* for the whole fate of Parliaments depends upon it.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. Unless you acquiesce in the reason of giving this Revenue, I would never press the house beyond their temper. I am willing that, for this time, the thing be laid aside.

Mr. Vaughan. By Williamson's argument, since the house does not willingly entertain the motion now, &c. that is to say, it may be taken up again. Some are dissolving this bond betwixt the king and his people, by this. I could not think that there was so much guilt in any person in the kingdom, to make such efforts. You have had strange judgments in the Exchequer chamber, in the case of Bernardiston and Soames. Such Judges may be prepared for judgments against you in the Exchequer-chamber for what you do here, when these doors are shut. Vassalages hereafter will not be confined to particular tenures, but this will be throughout the whole nation. I have seen men rise from nothing, within these walls. And when they are task-masters within these walls, they are task-masters to ruin the nation, with raising themselves. You have but one more addition to your misfortune, and that is, to give this 300,000*l.* increase to the Revenue. And I will give my negative to it.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I rise only to speak to the previous question. It is become a very parliamentary thing, but a word sometimes slips into it, that wakes a doubt. The word 'now' being not put in it, it may be a fortnight, or a month hence; but if you please to have out the word 'now,' then the question will be, 'Whether you will consider of the motion of increasing the Revenue 300,000*l.* per ann.'

Sir Job Charlton. I move that you will let the officers of the treasury time to make out, whether the government cannot be supported without this addition to the Revenue. The king denies you no bills you present him, only 'le Roi s'avisera.' And I would not have you do any indecent thing to the king. [He was laughed at.]

The Commons refuse the King an Additional Revenue.] The question being put, "That the house will go into a grand committee, to consider of the motion for raising 300,000*l.* per annum, for an additional Revenue to the king," it passed in the negative, without a division.*

Debate on Members receiving Pensions.] Sir Wm. Coventry said, I take ourselves to be useful, not to say necessary, to the government, and till those scandals are taken away from us, mentioned in a book, of receiving pensions for our votes (which, it seems, has been thought fit to be amongst the advertisements in the Gazette, and a reward promised to the discoverer of the Author or Publisher); † I say, since this is made public, till this scandal be taken away, we cannot serve the nation

* "It was said, 'That there was a demand for a Revenue, which would furnish the Court so well; that there would be no more need of parliaments.' The Court party thought such a gift as this would make them useless, so the thing was, upon one debate, rejected without a division." Burnet.

as we ought. 'Money,' Solomon says, 'will blind the eyes of the wise.' If a man be in poverty, he need not be ashamed of his majesty's bounty. I say, he need not be ashamed of the bounty of his prince. But that man, whoever he be, that goes about to corrupt members of parliament for their votes, be he ever so great, should be ashamed of it. If a man be so base as to receive 500*l.* for his vote here, he, in time, will raise it up to 1500*l.* And that trick will be spoiled at last. If a man has been so transported by any pressures, let not the reputation of all your members lie under scandals; else the very laws you make will not meet with that cheerful obedience they ought to have. I hope, therefore, that this house will do something in vindication of themselves, the thing now being made Gazette-matter, in the face of the whole world. I am not a man prepared to prescribe you a method to purge yourselves; but now that the jealousy has got so much strength as to be in print, and since it deserves the notice of the government, which has put it in print, seeing the ill fame of it has gotten abroad, I would have the good fame of our endeavouring to detect it get abroad likewise.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The Auditor of the Receipts of the Privy Seals can inform you, what money has been issued out since May 1677, upon extraordinary occasions.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. Whoever attempts the enslaving, and making the legislative power subservient to any particular subject, is guilty of the greatest crime that can be. Therefore I will explain myself thus. I would have every gentleman of the house come to the table, and protest that he has received no reward for any thing he has done in parliament, or for giving his vote. Or if any gentleman be in employment in the government, and has been put out of his place for giving his vote here according to his conscience, or has been threatened, this is a great crime. And I would have it as comprehensive as you can.

Whereupon several proposed these following Tests, &c. as they stood inclined to one party, or the other.

1. "Whether any members have received money to give their Votes, &c.? 2. Whether any members have been turned out of their places for giving their Votes, &c.? 3. Whether any members are guilty of Popery, and come not to the Sacrament, &c.? 4. Whether any members have been dealing with, or conversing with foreign ministers, or receiving money from them, to forward any business relating to parliament? 5. Whether any members have received money for giving counsel for any Bills depending in the house? 6. If any committees have received gratuities? 7. If any members have solicited voices in any business depending in parliament? 8. If any members have offered their service to any great persons to vote in parliament, and have been refused? 9. If any members have received money for granting Protections, &c.?"

10. If any have kept public tables for Members, and at whose charges, &c.? 11. How many members sit in the house out-lawed, before judgment as well as after? 12. Enquiry to be made of those who go to Conventicles. 13. That a Test be given for discovery of the libel of the Catalogue of the Pensioners names, &c. who was the Author of it, and who promoted the dispersing, &c.?"

Of all these Articles it was proposed that every Member should purge himself; and a Vote passed accordingly, viz. Resolved, &c. "That an Account be taken, of what Pensions have been charged upon the Revenue; and what Privy Seals have issued for Secret Service, since May 1677: and that there be a Test concerning Bribery of Members for giving their Votes: and concerning Popery, and taking the Sacrament: and concerning conversing with foreign Ministers, or transacting with them, in relation to the proceedings of this house; and receiving money from them: and concerning such as have received any Money, as counsel for any bill depending in the house, or any reward for being chairman of a committee: and concerning such as have solicited for voices, in any cause depending before the house: and concerning such as have offered their service to great persons to give their Vote in parliament, and have been refused: and concerning such as keep public Tables; and at whose charge; and concerning such as have taken Money for granting Protections: and that inquiry be made, how many members are outlawed, as well before as after judgment: and that there be an inquiry made of such members as have gone to Conventicles or mass." But after it was thought that all was done and settled, and the house was about to rise, so many went away before a committee was appointed to draw up the said Tests, that the Court Party took advantage to put the question, Whether a Committee should be named, or no, which was carried in the negative, 100 to 86, and so the thing ended*.

Complaint against the Clerk.] June 19. Complaint was made, by several members, of the Clerk's non Entry of the Enquiries yesterday, concerning Moneys issued out by privy seals, and that he deserved to be turned out of his place for his misdemeanor.

The Speaker. You meddle with what you have nothing to do with, in displacing the Clerk, he being a patent officer.

Mr. Hampden. The clerk assistant is your own officer, and you may put him out, and displace him, upon misdemeanor.

Mr. Goldsborough, the clerk, was ordered to give an account of the pasting of the leaves together, in the Journal of the year 1663, and defacing it. The other allegation against the clerk, of the not entering yesterday's Order perfectly, was passed over with some reflection on the clerk; and he was ordered to perfect the Journal.

* Grey.

Sir Solomon Swale expelled.] A Letter was sent from sir Solomon Swale to the Speaker, to excuse his receiving the Sacrament* till Sunday sevensnight, being prevented the last Sunday, by reason there was no Sacrament at St. Martin's Church, and after next Sunday come sevensnight he hopes to be here to give his attendance.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. This is a mere trick; for Swale hopes by that time you will be up, and no farther enquiry be made after him. But I will take care to inform you of this trick.

Mr. Williams. A certificate of his repairing to divine service, and hearing it orderly, is a fair inducement to the Diocegan to certify. For the Order is nothing about receiving the Sacrament, only 'his conformity,' 3 James. And his 'allegation about receiving the Sacrament' is an insignificant thing, to delay time only.

The Speaker reads the Statute. 'He is to repair to his parish church where is the most of his abiding; and his receiving the Sacrament there shall undo the indictment.'

Lord Gorges. If Swale would have conformed he might have conformed in all this time, and it is a contempt of your Order.

Sir Tho. Meres. Since Swale has had two or three admonitions, for these five months last past that you have sat, and he has been convicted a year and a half, there's no farther forbearance can be, but you must do something with him.

Mr. Daniel Finch. The not receiving the Sacrament does not disable Swale from sitting in parliament, but the not taking the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. I move, that, if before Monday he receive not the Sacrament, and take not the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, he shall not be permitted to sit here; and that a writ be sent out to chuse another member to serve in his place.

Sir Robert Sawyer. A Popish Recusant convict cannot come near the king's person, and, à fortiori, he cannot be of the great council of the nation. Whoever disables himself (as this case of Swale's is) from his attendance in parliament, you ought to discharge. And now you have fears and jealousies of Popery, to let such a man be one of you, that wilfully stands out of the church! You cannot answer it. I hope you will discharge him.

Then this question was put, and carried, viz. "That whereas it appears to the house, that sir Solomon Swale is convicted of Popish Recusancy; and having been divers times called upon by this house to signify his conformity to the Church of England, which he hath not done, in pursuance to a peremptory order of this house; ordered, That the said sir S. Swale be discharged from the service of this house; and that a new writ be issued out for the choice of another member to serve in his place, for the Borough of Aldborough, in the county of York."

* By an Order of June 10, he had been required to bring a Certificate by this day, of his conformity to the church of England.

The King's Message for continuing the Army longer on foot.] June 20. The Lord Treasurer, by his majesty's command, acquainted the lords, "That his majesty did yesterday receive a letter from his ambassador at Nine-guen, sir Lionel Jenkins, dated the 15th of June, which gave him an account, that the French ambassadors had declared to the Dutch ambassadors there, that they would not void any one of the places they held in the Spanish Netherlands, till Sweden be effectually restored to the places taken from them; no, notwithstanding that the peace was already signed and ratified between them. That upon this is arisen a difficulty on the side of the Spaniards, whether they will accept of the French conditions. That M. Beverning, one of the States ambassadors there, had thereupon earnestly enquired of him, whether the Army of England was presently to be disbanded; because nobody could tell what end things would come to; for if France will keep all the places in the Netherlands filled with their troops, it is in vain that the States have taken so much pains about their Barrier; for they will have none, when all is done. And the said M. Beverning was very anxious, till he did hear out of England, that the Army might not yet be disbanded.—That the Imperial ministers had been to visit him that day; and that their principal business was to learn what they could from him, in what state our Army was, things being in this doubtful condition."

The above was the same day communicated to the Commons, at a conference, and the lords delivered them a copy of the Message. The commons, after the conference, had some debate upon the said Message, but did nothing thereupon; but Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords, to remind them of the Bill for disbanning the Army."

The house then went into a committee of the whole house, and Resolved, "That the new imposts on Wines and Vinegar be granted to his majesty for three years, from the 1st of Aug. next, upon such Wines and Vinegar as may now be legally imported."

The question being put, "That the sum of 200,000*l.* which was borrowed on the credit of the Excise, shall be charged on the Bill for impost on Wines," it passed in the negative, 179 to 168.

Vote on the Supply.] June 21. Resolved, "That a Supply, not exceeding 414,000*l.* shall be granted to his majesty, for paying of the extraordinary charge of the Navy and Ordnance; and for paying the princess of Orange's Portion; and for the repayment of the 200,000*l.* borrowed upon the credit of the additional Excise. And that the people be charged with no more money this session of parliament."

Controversy between the Houses.] June 22. The lords believing it impossible to disband the Army by the day the commons named it the Bill, changed the last of June to the 27th of July, for that part of the Army in England; and for those abroad, they changed the time from the 24th of July to the 24th of August. And the Bill, with these amendments, being returned to the commons this day, they were on debate, disagreed to by the house.

June 25. The commons at a conference gave several reasons for their not agreeing with the lords in the above Amendments. The main one was, 'It being a Bill of Money, they cannot allow their lordships any manner of power, to add, or diminish, to, or from it, &c.' And they offered a Proviso, by way of expedient.

The same day several ways were proposed for raising the said sum of 414,000*l.* as upon Buildings erected since 1656, upon new foundations, within ten miles of London, but this was rejected, 117 to 88; by the old way of Subsidy, &c. but at last it was concluded by Land Tax. The house grew so thin, that, upon a division for adjourning the debate the Ayes were but 73, and the Noes 71.

June 26. The lords, at a Conference, gave several reasons for insisting on their Amendments to the Bill of disbanding, and for rejecting the Proviso offered by the commons. But to all the amendments but one the commons disagreed, and adhered to their proviso.

June 28. The lords voted that they adhered to their Amendments, and disagreed to the Proviso. And the commons voted à contra.

Vote on the Commons' Right of granting Money.] July 3. The commons resolved, "That all Aids and Supplies to his majesty in parliament, are the sole Gift of the commons; and all Bills for the granting of any such Aids and Supplies ought to begin with the commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the commons to direct, limit, and appoint, in such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such Grants; which ought not to be changed by the house of lords."

The Money Bill passed.] The same day the commons resolved, "That provision be made in the Bill now depending, for raising 414,000*l.* for raising 406,462*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for disbanding the Army; and that they be tacked together to be ingrossed in the same Bill." And this expedient ended the controversy between the lords and commons, about the lords alteration of the times of disbanding the Army, &c. in the Bill the commons sent up. And the former bill of disbanding the Army was laid aside.

July 8. The grand Money Bill passed, and was entitled 'An Act for granting a Supply to his majesty of 619,388*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* for disbanding the Army, and other uses.'

The Parliament prorogued.] July 15. The house attended his majesty in the house of peers, where the royal assent was given to the Money Bill, and eight others; after which the Lord Chancellor made the following Speech:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; His majesty doth very graciously accept the service you have done him this session; and is as well pleased with your worthy and dutiful carriage towards him, as with the noble and liberal present you have made him.—He doth now consider, that some recess is necessary for your health and refreshment after all your labours; and he would be glad it might be for some longer time than his affairs at present will admit: for his majesty doth not know how soon he may be engaged in a war; and when he shall be so, he is sure that he can by no means want the counsel and assistance of his parliament; and therefore he hath resolved, never to put off this parliament too far from him.—For this cause, his maj. hath resolved to keep his parliament always in view, by making several, but very short, prorogations of it; but with an intention, however, that the parliament shall not sit till towards winter, unless his majesty's pressing and important occasions shall call for your advice sooner; and if they do so, his majesty will be sure to give timely notice thereof by his proclamation, to the end there may be a full appearance.—At this present, his majesty's pleasure is, to prorogue this parliament no further than till the first of August next; and this parliament is prorogued until the 1st of August next ensuing.*"

Aug. 1. Both houses met, and were farther prorogued to August 29th; from thence to October 1st; and from thence to October 21.

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES DURING THE RECESS—THE POPIISH PLOT—OATES'S NARRATIVE—COLEMAN'S LETTERS—GODFREY'S MURDER.] "The English nation," says Mr. Hume, "ever since the fatal league with France, had entertained violent jealousies against the court; and the subsequent measures adopted by the king, had tended more to increase than cure the general prejudices. Some mysterious design was still suspected in every enterprise and profession: arbitrary power and popery were apprehended as the scope of all projects: each breath or rumour made the people start with anxiety: their enemies, they thought, were in their very bosom, and had gotten possession of their sovereign's confidence. While in this timorous, jealous disposition, the cry of a Plot all on a sudden struck their ears: they were awakened from their slumber; and like men affrightened and in the dark, took every figure for a spectre. The terror of each man became the source of terror to another. And an universal panic being diffused, reason and argument, and common sense, and common humanity, lost all influence over them. From this disposition of men's minds we are to account for the progress of the POPISH PLOT, and the credit given to it; an event, which would otherwise appear prodigious and altogether inexplicable.—On the 12th of August, one Kirby, a chemist, accosted the king, as he was walking in the park: 'Sir,' said he, 'keep within the company: your enemies have a design upon your life; and you may be shot in this very walk.' Being asked the reason of these strange speeches, he said, that two men, called Grove and Pickering, had engaged to shoot the king, and sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, to poison him. This intelligence, he added, had been communicated to him by doctor Tongue; whom, if permitted, he would introduce to his majesty. Tongue was a divine of the church of England; a man active, restless, full of projects, void of understanding. He brought papers to the king, which contained information of a plot, and were digested into forty-three articles. The king, not having leisure to peruse them, sent them to the treasurer, Danby, and ordered the two informers to lay the business before that minister. Tongue confessed to Danby, that he himself had not drawn the papers, that they had been secretly thrust under his door and that, though he suspected, he did not certainly know, who was the author. After a few days he returned, and told the treasurer, that his suspicions, he found, were just; and that the author of the intelligence, whom he had met twice or thrice in the street, had acknowledged the whole matter, and had given him a more particular account of the conspiracy, but desired that his name might be concealed, being apprehensive lest the papists should murder him.—The information was renewed with regard to Grove's and Pickering's intentions of shooting the king; and Tongue even pretended, that, at a particular time, they were to set out for Windsor with that intention. Orders were given for arresting them, as soon as they should appear in that place: but though this alarm was more than once renewed, some frivolous reasons were still found by Tongue, for their having delayed the journey. And the king concluded, both from these evasions, and from the mysterious, artificial manner of communicating the intelligence, that the whole was an imposture.—Tongue came next to the treasurer, and told him, that a packet of letters, written by jesuits concerned in the plot, was that night to be put into the post-house for Windsor, directed to Bennifield, a jesuit, confessor to the duke. When this intelligence was conveyed to the king, he replied, that the packet mentioned had a few hours before been brought to the duke by Bennifield; who said, that he suspected some bad design upon him, that the letters seemed to contain matters of a dangerous import, and that he knew them not to be the hand-writing of the persons whose names were subscribed to them. This incident still further confirmed the king in his incredulity.—The matter had probably slept for ever, had it not been for the anxiety of the duke; who, hearing that priests and jesuits, and even his own confessor, had been accused, was desirous that a thorough inquiry should be made by the council into the pretended conspiracy. Kirby and Tongue were inquired after, and were now found to be living in close connection with Titus Oates, the person who was said to have conveyed the first intelligence to Tongue. Oates affirmed, that he had fallen under suspicion with the jesuits; that he had received three blows with a stick, and a box on the ear from the provincial of that order, for revealing their conspiracy: and that, over-hearing them speak of their intentions to punish him more severely, he had withdrawn, and concealed himself. This man, in whose breast was lodged a secret, involving the fate of kings and kingdoms, was allowed to remain in such necessity, that Kirby was obliged to supply him with daily bread; and it was a joyful surprise to him, when he heard that the council was at last disposed to take some notice of his intelligence. But as he expected more encouragement from the public, than from the king or his ministers, he thought proper, before he was presented to the council, to go with his two companions to sir Edmondshury Godfrey, a noted and active justice of peace, and to give evidence before him of all the articles of the conspiracy.—The wonderful intelligence, which Oates conveyed both to Godfrey and the council, and afterwards to the parliament, was to this purpose.—The pope, he said, on examining the matter in the congregation de propaganda, had found himself entitled to the possession of England and Ireland on account of the heresy of prince and people, and had accordingly assumed the sovereignty of these kingdoms. This supreme power he had thought proper to delegate to the society of jesuits; and de Oliva, general of that order, in consequence of the papal grant, had exerted every act of regal authority, and particularly had supplied, by commissions under the seal of the society, all the chief offices, both civil and military. Lord Arundel was created chancellor, lord Powis treasurer, sir William Godolphin privy seal, Coleman secretary of state, Langhorne attorney general, lord Bellasis general of the papal army, lord Peters lieutenant-general, lord Stafford paymaster; and inferior commissions, signed by the provincial of the jesuits, were distributed all over England. All the dignities too of the church were filled, and many of them with Spaniards and other foreigners. The provincial had held a consult of the jesuits under his authority; where the king, whom they opprobriously called the Black Bastard, was solemnly tried and condemned as a heretic; and a resolution taken to put him to death. Father Shree (for so this great plotter and informer called father la Chaise, the noted confessor of the French king) had consigned in London ten thousand pounds to be paid to any man who should merit it by this assassination. A Spanish provincial had expressed like liberality

* "Thus ended the 16th session of this parliament; and thus England saw herself engaged in an expence of 600,000*l.* to pay an Army and Fleet, which certainly had not been prepared to make war with France, or for the security of England." Rapin.

the prior of the Benedictines was willing to go the length of six thousand : the Dominicans approved of the action ; but pleaded poverty. Ten thousand pounds had been offered to sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, who demanded fifteen thousand, as a reward for so great a service : his demand was complied with ; and five thousand had been paid him by advance. Lest this means should fail, four Irish ruffians had been hired by the Jesuits at the rate of twenty guineas a-piece, to stab the king at Windsor ; and Coleman, secretary to the late dutchess of York, had given the messenger, who carried them orders, a guinea to quicken his diligence. Grove and Pickering were also employed to shoot the king with silver bullets : the former was to receive the sum of fifteen hundred pounds ; the latter, being a pious man, was to be rewarded with thirty thousand masses, which, estimating masses at a shilling a-piece, amounted to a like value. Pickering would have executed his purpose, had not the flint at one time dropped out of his pistol, at another time the priming. Coniers, the Jesuit, had bought a knife at the price of ten shillings, which he thought was not dear, considering the purpose for which he intended it, to wit, stabbing the king. Letters of subscription were circulated among the catholics all over England to raise a sum for the same purpose. No less than fifty Jesuits had met in May last at the White-horse tavern, where it was unanimously agreed to put the king to death. This synod did afterwards, for more convenience, divide themselves into many lesser cabals or companies ; and Oates was employed to carry notes and letters from one to another, all tending to the same end, of murdering the king. He even carried, from one company to another, a paper, in which they formally expressed their resolution of executing that deed ; and it was regularly subscribed by all of them. A wager of a hundred pounds was laid, and stakes made, that the king should eat no more Christmas pyes. In short, it was determined, to use the expression of a Jesuit, that if he would not become R. C. (Roman Catholic) he should no longer be C. R. (Charles Rex). The great fire of London had been the work of the Jesuits, who had employed eighty or eighty-six persons for that purpose, and had expended seven hundred fire-balls ; but they had a good return for their money, for they had been able to pilfer goods from the fire to the value of fourteen thousand pounds : the Jesuits had also raised another fire on St. Margaret's Hill, whence they had stolen goods to the value of two thousand pounds : another at Southwark : and it was determined in like manner to burn all the chief cities in England. A paper model was already framed for the firing of London ; the stations were regularly marked out, where the several fires were to commence ; and the whole plan of operations was so concerted, that precautions were taken by the Jesuits to vary their measures ; according to the variation of the wind. Fire-balls were familiarly called among them Teuxbury mustard pills ; and were said to contain a notable biting sauce. In the great fire, it had been determined to murder the king ; but he had displayed such diligence and humanity in extinguishing the flames, that even the Jesuits relented, and spared his life. Besides these assassinations and fires ; insurrections, rebellions, and massacres, were projected by that religious order in all the three kingdoms. There were twenty thousand catholics in London, who would rise in four and twenty hours, or less ; and Jennison, a Jesuit, said, that they might easily cut the throats of a hundred thousand protestants. Eight thousand catholics had agreed to take arms in Scotland. Ormond was to be murdered by four Jesuits ; a general massacre of the Irish protestants was concerted ; and forty thousand black bills were already provided for that purpose. Coleman had remitted two hundred thousand pounds to promote the rebellion in Ireland ; and the French king was to land a great army in that island. Poole, who wrote the Synopsis, was particularly marked out for assassination ; as was also Dr. Stillingfleet, a controversial writer against the papists. Burnet tells us, that Oates paid him the same compliment. After all this havoc, the crown was to be offered to the duke, but on the following conditions ; that he receive it as a gift from the pope ; that he confirm all the papal commissions for offices and employments ; that he ratify all past transactions, by pardoning the incendiaries, and the murderers of his brother and of the people ; and that he consent to the utter extirpation of the protestant religion. If he refuse these conditions, he himself was immediately to be poisoned or assassinated, 'To pot James must go ;' according to the expression ascribed by Oates to the Jesuits.—Oates, the informer of this dreadful plot, was himself the most infamous of mankind. He was the son of an anabaptist preacher, chaplain to colonel Pride ; but having taken orders in the church, he had been settled in a small living by the duke of Norfolk. He had been indicted for perjury ; and by some means had escaped. He was afterwards a chaplain on board the fleet ; whence he had been dismissed on complaint of some unnatural practices, not fit to be named. He then became a convert to the catholics ; but he afterwards boasted, that his conversion was a mere pretence, in order to get into their secrets and to betray them. He was sent over to the Jesuits' college at St. Omer's, and though above thirty years of age, he there lived some time among the students. He was dispatched on an errand to Spain ; and thence returned to St. Omer's ; where the Jesuits, heartily tired of their convert, at last dismissed him, from their seminary. It is likely, that, from resentment of this usage, as well as from want and indignance, he was induced, in combination with Tongue, to contrive that plot, of which he accused the catholics.—This abandoned man, when examined before the council, betrayed his impostures in such a manner, as would have utterly discredited the most consistent story, and the most reputable evidence. While in Spain, he had been carried, he said, to don John, who promised great assistance to the execution of the catholic designs. The king asked him, what sort of a man don John was: he answered, a tall lean man; directly contrary to truth, as the king well knew. He totally mistook the situation of the Jesuits' college at Paris. Though he pretended great intimacies with Coleman, he knew him not, when placed very near him; and had no other excuse than that his sight was bad in candle-light. He fell into like mistakes with regard to Wakeman.—Notwithstanding these objections, great attention was paid to Oates's evidence, and the plot became very soon the subject of conversation, and even the object of terror to the people. The violent animosity, which had been excited against the catholics in general, made the public swallow the grossest absurdities when they accompanied an accusation of those religionists: and the more diabolical any contrivance appeared, the better it suited the tremendous idea entertained of a Jesuit. Danby likewise, who stood in opposition to the French and catholic interest at court, was willing to encourage every story, which might serve to discredit that party. By his suggestion, when a warrant was signed for arresting Coleman, there was inserted a clause for seizing his papers; a circumstance attended with the most important consequences. Coleman partly on his own account, partly by orders from the duke, had been engaged in a correspondence with father la Chaise, with the pope's nuncio at Brussels, and with other catholics abroad; and being himself a fiery zealot, busy and sanguine, the expressions in his letters often betrayed great violence and indiscretion. His correspondence, during the years 1674, 1675, and part of 1676,* was seized, and contained many extraordinary passages. In particular he said to la Chaise, 'We have here a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the utter subduing of a pestilent heresy, which has a long time domineered over a great part of this northern world. There were never such hopes of success, since the days of queen Mary, as now in our days. God has given us a prince,' meaning the duke, 'who is become (may I say a miracle) zealous of being the author and instrument of so glorious a work; but the opposition we are sure to meet with is also like to be great: so that it imports us to get all the aid and assistance we can.' In another letter he said, 'I can scarce believe myself awake, or the thing real, when I think of a prince in such an age as we live in, converted to such a degree of zeal and piety, as not to regard any thing in the world in comparison of God's Almighty glory, the salvation of his own soul, and the conversion of our poor kingdom.' In other passages the interests of the crown of England, those of the French king, and those of the catholic religion, are spoken of as inseparable. The duke is also said to have connected his interests unalterably with those of Lewis. The king himself, he affirms, is always inclined to favour the catholics, when he may do it without hazard. 'Money,' Coleman adds, 'cannot fail of persuading the king to any thing. There is nothing it cannot make him do, were it ever so much to his prejudice. It has such an absolute power over him, that he cannot resist it. Logic, built upon money, has in our court more powerful charms than any other sort of argument.' For these reasons, he proposed to father la Chaise, that the French king should remit the sum of 300,000*l.* on condition that the parliament be dissolved; a measure to which, he affirmed, the king was, of himself, sufficiently inclined, were it not for his hopes of obtaining money from that assembly. The parliament, he said, had already constrained the king to make peace with Holland, contrary to the interests of the catholic religion, of his most christian majesty: and if they should meet again, they would surely engage him farther, even to the making of war against France. It appears also from the same letters, that the assembling of the parliament so late as April in the year 1675, had been procured by the intrigues of the catholic and French party, who thereby intended to shake the Dutch and their confederates, that they could expect no assistance from England.—When the contents of these letters were publicly known, they diffused the panic, with which the nation began already to be seized on account of the popish plot. Men reasoned more from their fears and their passions than from the evidence before them. It is certain, that the restless and enterprising spirit of the catholic church, particularly of the Jesuits, merits attention, and is, in some degree, dangerous to every other communion. Such zeal of proselytism actuates that sect, that its missionaries have penetrated into every nation of the globe; and, in one sense, there is a POPISH PLOT perpetually carrying on against all states, protestant, pagan, and mahometan. It is likewise very probable, that the conversion of the duke, and the favour of the king, had inspired the catholic priests with new hopes of recovering in these islands their lost dominion, and gave fresh vigour to that intemperate zeal by which they are commonly actuated.—Their first aim was to obtain a toleration; and such was the evidence, they believed, of their theological tenets, that, could they but procure entire liberty, they must infallibly in time open the eyes of the people. After they had converted considerable numbers, they might be enabled, they hoped, to reinstate themselves in full authority, and entirely to suppress that heresy, with which the kingdom had so long been affected. Though these dangers to the protestant religion were distant, it was justly the object of great concern to find that the heir of the crown was so blinded with bigotry, and so deeply engaged in foreign interest: and that the king himself had been prevailed on, from low interest, to hearken to his dangerous insinuations. Very bad consequences might ensue from such perverse habits and attachments: nor could the nation and parliament guard against them with too anxious a precaution. But that the Roman pontiff could hope to assume the sovereignty of these kingdoms; a project which, even during the darkness of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, would have appeared chimerical: that he should delegate this authority to the Jesuits; that order in the Romish Church, which was the most hated; that a massacre could be attempted of the protestants, who surpassed the catholics a hundred fold, and were invested with the whole authority of the state: that the king himself was to be assassinated, and even the duke, the only support of their party: these were such absurdities as no human testimony was sufficient to prove; much less the evidence of one man, who was noted for infamy, and who could not keep himself every moment from falling into the grossest inconsistencies. Did such intelligence deserve even so much attention as to be refuted, it would appear, that Coleman's letters were sufficient alone to destroy all its credit. For how could so long a train of correspondence be carried on, by a man so much trusted by the party; and yet no traces of insurrections, if really intended, of fires, massacres, assassinations, invasions, be ever discovered in any single passage of these letters? But all such reflections, and many more, equally obvious, were vainly employed against that general prepossession with which the nation was seized. Oates's plot and Coleman's were universally confounded together: and the evidence of the latter being unquestionable, the belief of the former, aided by the passions of hatred and of terror, took possession of the whole people.—There was danger, however, lest time might open the eyes of the public (17th Oct.); when the murder of Godfrey completed the general delusion, and rendered the prejudices of the nation absolutely incurable. This magistrate had been missing some days; and after much search, and many surmises, his body was found lying in a ditch at Primrose-hill: the marks of strangling were thought to appear about his neck, and some contusions on his breast: his own sword was sticking in the body; but as no considerable quantity of blood ensued on drawing it, it was concluded, that it had been thrust in after his death, and that he had not killed himself: he had rings on his fingers, and money in his pocket: it was therefore inferred, that he had not fallen into the hands of robbers. Without farther reasoning, the cry rose, that he had been assassinated by the papists, on account of his taking Oates's evidence. This clamour was quickly propagated, and met with universal belief. The panic spread itself on every side with infinite rapidity; and all men, astonished with fear, and animated with rage, saw in Godfrey's fate all the horrible designs ascribed to the catholics; and no farther doubt remained of Oates's veracity. The voice of the nation united against that hated sect; and, notwithstanding that the bloody conspiracy was supposed to be now detected, men could scarcely be persuaded that their lives were yet in safety. Each hour teemed with new rumours and surmises. Invasions from abroad, insurrections at home, even private murders and poisonings, were apprehended. To deny the reality of the plot, was to be an accomplice: to hesitate was criminal: Royalist, Republican; Churchman, Sectary; Courtier, Patriot; all parties concurred in the illusion. The city prepared for its defence, as if the enemy were at its gates: the chains and posts were put up: and it was a noted saying at that time of sir Thomas Playr, the chamberlain, that, were it not for these precautions, all the citizens might rise next morning with their throats cut.—In order to propagate the popular frenzy, several artifices were employed. The dead body of Godfrey was carried into the city, attended by vast multitudes. It was publicly exposed in the streets, and viewed by all ranks of men; and every one, who saw it, went away inflamed, as well by the mutual contagion of sentiments, as by the dismal spectacle itself. The funeral pomp was celebrated with great parade. The corpse was conducted through the chief streets of the city: seventy-two clergymen marched before: above a thousand persons of distinction followed after: and at the funeral-sermon two able bodied divines mounted the pulpit, and stood on each side of the preacher, lest, in paying the last duties to this unhappy magistrate, he should, before the whole people, be murdered by the papists.—In this disposition of the nation, reason could no more be heard than a whisper in the midst of the most violent hurricane. Even at present, Godfrey's murder can scarcely, upon any system, be rationally accounted for. That he was assassinated by the catholics seems utterly improbable. These religionists could not be engaged to commit that crime from policy, in order to deter other magistrates from acting against them. Godfrey's fate was no-wise capable of producing that effect, unless it were publicly known that the catholics were his murderers: an opinion which, it was easy to foresee, must prove the ruin of their party. Besides, how many magistrates, during more than a century, had acted in the most violent manner against the catholics, without its being ever suspected that any one had been cut off by assassination? Such jealous times as the present, were surely ill fitted for beginning these dangerous experiments. Shall we therefore say, that the catholics were pushed on, not by policy, but by blind revenge against Godfrey? But Godfrey had given them little or no occasion of offence in taking Oates's evidence. His part was merely an act of form, belonging to his office; nor could he, or any man in his station, possibly refuse it. In the rest of his conduct, he lived on good terms with the catholics, and was far from distinguishing himself by his severity against that sect. It is even certain, that he had contracted an intimacy with Coleman, and took care to inform his friend of the danger to which, by reason of Oates's evidence, he was at present exposed.—There are some writers, who finding it impossible to account for Godfrey's murder by the machinations of the catholics, have recourse to the opposite supposition. They lay hold of that obvious presumption, that those commit the crime who reap advantage by it; and they affirm that it was Shaftesbury, and the heads of the popular party, who perpetrated that deed, in order to throw the odium of it on the papists. If this supposition be received, it must also be admitted, that the whole plot was the contrivance of those politicians; and that Oates acted altogether under their direction. But it appears that Oates, dreading probably the opposition of powerful enemies, had very anxiously acquitted the duke, Danby, Ormond, and all the ministry; persons who were certainly the most obnoxious to the popular leaders. Besides, the whole texture of the plot contains such low absurdity, that it is impossible to have been the invention of any man of sense or education. It is true, the more monstrous and horrible the conspiracy, the better was it fitted to terrify, and thence to convince, the populace: but this effect, we may safely say, no one could beforehand have expected; and a fool was in this case more likely to succeed than a wise man. Had Shaftesbury laid the plan of a popish conspiracy, he had probably rendered it moderate, consistent, credible; and, on that very account, had never met with the prodigious success, with which Oates's tremendous fictions were attended.—We must, therefore, be contented to remain for ever ignorant of the actors in Godfrey's murder; and only pronounce in general, that that event, in all likelihood, had no connection, one way or other, with the popish plot. Any man, especially so active a magistrate as Godfrey, might, in such a city as London, have many enemies, of whom his friends and family had no suspicion. He was a melancholy man; and there is some reason, notwithstanding the pretended appearances to the contrary, to suspect that he fell by his own hands. The affair was never examined with tranquillity, or even with common sense, during the time; and it is impossible for us, at this distance, certainly to account for it.—No one doubted but the papists had assassinated Godfrey; but still the particular actors were unknown. A proclamation was issued by the king, offering a pardon and a reward of five hundred pounds to any one who should discover them. As it was afterwards surmised, that the terror of a like assassination would prevent discovery, a new proclamation was issued, providing absolute protection to any one who should reveal the secret. Thus were indemnity, money, and security, offered to the fairest bidder: and no one needed to fear, during the present fury of the people, that his evidence would undergo too severe a scrutiny. While the nation was in this ferment, the parliament was assembled."

SEVENTEENTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session. Oct. 21. The parliament met, and his majesty opened the session with the following Speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I have thought the time very long since we parted last; and would not have deferred your meeting by so many prorogations, if I could well have met you sooner. The part which I have had this summer in the preservation of our neighbours, and the well-securing what was left of Flanders, is sufficiently known and acknowledged by all that are abroad: and though for this cause I have been obliged to keep up my troops (without which our neighbours had absolutely despaired); yet both the honour and interest of the nation have been so far improved by it, that I am confident no man here would repine at it, or think the money raised for their disbanded to have been ill employed in their continuance; and I do assure you, I am so much more out of purse for the service, that I do expect you should supply it.—How far it may be necessary (considering the present state of Christendom) to reduce the land and sea forces, or to what degree, is worthy of all our serious considerations.—I now intend to acquaint you (as I shall always do with any thing that concerns me), that I have been informed of a Design against my person by the Jesuits;* of which I shall forbear any opinion,

* It may be proper briefly to repeat, that on Sept. 28, Titus Oates had given information, before the Council, of many discourses he had heard among the Jesuits, of their design to kill the king, naming persons, places, and times almost without number; upon which many Jesuits were seized that night and the next day; and in particular, having accused Coleman, the Duke's Secretary, of a strict correspondence with Father le Chaise, the French king's Confessor, adding, 'that he was acquainted with all their designs,' Coleman was immediately apprehended, and from his letters, which were seized and examined, the story gained great confirmation. Add to this, that sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, an eminent Justice of Peace, who had attested Oates's Depositions, was found, on Oct. 17, with his own sword thrust through his body, in a ditch near Primrose-hill, in the way to Hampstead, having been missing ever since the 12th. And as it had been taken for granted that Coleman's Papers confirmed every thing that Oates had sworn, so it was no sooner known that Godfrey was lest I may seem to say too much, or too little: but I will leave the matter to the law;* and, in the mean time, will take as much care as I can to prevent all manner of practices by that sort of men, and of others too, who have been tampering in a high degree by foreigners, and contriving how to introduce Popery amongst us.—I shall conclude with the recommending to you my other concerns. I have been under great disappointments by the defect of the Poll Bill. My Revenue is under great Anticipations, and at the best was never equal to the constant and necessary expence of the government, whereof I intend to have the whole state laid before you; and require you to look into it, and consider of it with that duty and affection which I am sure I shall always find from you.—The rest I leave to the Chancellor.”

The Lord Chancellor Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor made the following Speech:

“ My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; How much the king relies upon the advice and assistance of his parliament, how necessary he accounts it to him, and how safe he thinks himself in it, is evident by this, that he hath not suffered you all this year to be out of his reach; but hath continued you from time to time, by a succession of little and short prorogations; and without all peradventure we had sooner met, if it had been possible for us to take right measures here, without a full knowledge of the state and condition of our neighbours.—The close and period of the last Session is very memorable; for it may seem perhaps to some to have ended with very different, if not contrary, counsels and supplies, tending both to war and peace; but yet they who look more nearly into the matter shall find, that this uncertainty proceeded not from any unsteadiness at home, killed, than by the general voice the Papists were charged with the murder; for the discovery of which a reward of 500*l.* was offered by Proclamation on October 20, the day before the parliament reassembled.

“ The king, knowing the disaffection of the commons, was resolved, if possible, to prevent this affair from coming before them: he feared, very justly, that they would examine into the bottom of this Plot, and, under a pretence of taking care of his person, discover many things which were yet to be concealed. For this purpose he expressly commanded the earl of Danby not to acquaint the two houses with what had passed through his hands, and resolved so to order it, that every thing concerning the Plot should be left to the law, in the belief that it would be much easier for him to manage the Judges than the parliament. But the earl of Danby broke all his measures, by communicating, the very first day, Oates's Narrative to the commons. The king was highly provoked with a procedure so contrary to his orders and designs, and gave him a severe reprimand; but the thing was without remedy.”

but from the mutability of affairs abroad, every week almost producing several and contrary appearances.—The same incertainties of counsels and events abroad continued for the most part of the summer. One while the parties, exhausted by the war, seemed to be willing to accept any peace their enemies would give; and there wanted not those among them who made use of the impatience of their people to necessitate them to it.—Another while the performance of the conditions offered became so doubted, and was at last explained in a manner so vastly different from the first proposals, that despair begot new resolutions of continuing the war.—In the midst of these miserable perplexities and confusions, his maj. was daily solicited, with the highest importunities and the most earnest supplications that were possible, not to disband the troops he had raised; and not only so, but that he would still continue to send over more and more of his troops, and to augment the forces which he had already abroad. They did as good as tell him plainly, That it was from the reputation of his alliance, that any overtures of peace had been made at all; and that it was from the continuance of his arms that any fair performance could be expected.—They prayed his maj. to consider, That if he thought it expedient to obtain some kind of respite, or breathing-time, for the Spanish Netherlands, or to secure any kind of frontier or barrier between them and their too powerful neighbours; all this, and more, very much more, perhaps no less than the safety of Christendom, would entirely depend upon his majesty's preserving himself in that considerable posture both by sea and land wherein he then was.—There was no resisting such repeated intercessions; and though his maj. saw well enough that his complying with these desires would engage him in an expence far beyond what he was then provided for, yet he could not possibly decline the charge, nor refuse to undergo the difficulties. And now, whatever the cost of all this may amount to, yet neither his maj. nor his people will have any cause to repeat it, when they shall consider, that it hath already produced such great and good effects to his majesty's allies, and so much honour to the whole nation; that whatsoever is saved of Flanders, is now acknowledged by all the world to be wholly due to his majesty's interposition.—And though the peace, which since hath followed, be very far from such a peace as his maj. could have wished, yet it is such a peace as his neighbours were resolved to have. No obligations they lay under to insist upon a better peace, no conjunction with his majesty, no, nor the offers to declare war on their behalfs if they desired it, could prevail with them, or keep them from being wrought upon by the ill arts of those who first raised unreasonable jealousies amongst them, and then caused them to precipitate themselves into a peace.—Thus you see at once, not only the necessity which his majesty had to continue his troops in pay, but likewise the benefits and advantages which have come of it.—Let no man wonder then, if the Money given toward this Disbanding have been applied toward the payment of the Army, as far as it would go: there needs no excuse for that which was inevitable. The provision which was made for paying off the Army went no further than till the last of June for part, and the last of August for the rest: but the Fleet was provided for only till the 5th of June; so that the continuation of the Fleet and Army from that time was wholly upon his majesty's charge.—And as this was an expence so absolutely necessary to our own interest, in the preservation of our neighbours; that his maj. could not with any honour or safety to himself have avoided it: so the service which hath been done by this means to a great part of Christendom is so universally acknowledged, that you cannot but be well pleased to have your share in the honour of it, and will be willing to defray the rest of the charge, which hath far exceeded all that was given by that Act.—And his maj. hath found himself in greater straits than he could have imagined, by the unexpected deficiency of the Poll Bill; for whereas it was made a fund of credit for 300,000*l.* besides a further credit for Stores, the product of that Act hath fallen so strangely short of what the parliament expected from it, that it hath not raised that sum of money, by a great deal, which was allowed to be borrowed upon it; and by this means, they who have furnished Stores upon the credit of that Act will be in danger to be very great losers, unless you are pleased to take some care of them.—Thus you have shortly an Account of what hath been doing Abroad, and the Charge of it: it is now high time to look a little nearer Home; and surely, in that state of things to which they are now reduced, it is visible and plain enough what must be our business for the time to come. First, we must look to ourselves, and provide for our own safety; for that which the Confederates acknowledge with thanks, we may be sure hath a quite different resentment in other places. And, in order to this, care must be taken so to strengthen ourselves, both at home and abroad, that they who see us in a firm and well-settled estate may have no hopes to surprize, nor any temptation to make an attempt upon us.—And herein it will be necessary to take notice of what his maj. recommended to you, and to weigh very well the importance of reducing the Sea and Land Forces, and the consequences which may attend such a reduction; for, this be assured, that nothing in the world would more gratify our enemies, than to see us afraid of maintaining ourselves in a posture of defence, which is the only posture they are afraid to find us in.—And that the fears of Popery may not too much disquiet you, be pleased to consider, that you have one security more; since that which was always the interest of his majesty's honour and conscience is now become the interest of his person too, to protect the Protestant Religion, and to prevent the swarming of Seminary Priests; for his maj. hath told you, that he hath lately received information of Designs against his own life by the Jesuits; and though he doth in no sort prejudice the persons accused, yet the strict enquiry into this matter hath been a means to discover so many other unwarrantable practices of theirs, that his maj. hath reason to look to them.—Nor are these kind of men the only factors for Rome; but there are found among the laity also some, who have made themselves agitators to promote the interests of a foreign religion, who meddle with matters of state and parliament, and carry on their pernicious designs by a most dangerous correspondence with foreign nations.—What kind of process the proof will bear, and to how high a degree the extent and nature of these crimes will rise, is under consideration, and will be fully left to the course of law.—In the next place, let us carefully avoid all Differences amongst ourselves, all manner of clashing about Jurisdictions, and all disputes of such a nature as can never end in any accommodation; for this is still what our enemies would wish, who would be glad to see us ruined, without their being at the charge of it.—And therefore we must now above all other times labour to shew the world the most effectual significations of our loyalty and duty that we are able to express; for nothing in the world can more discourage our enemies, as on the contrary nothing does or can so ripen a nation for destruction, as to be observed to distrust their own government. Be pleased then now to take occasion to manifest such a zeal for the government, as to look into the state of that Revenue which should support the constant and necessary Charge of it, and to see that it be made equal to it. There are many motives to oblige us to this inspection. First, you see, the king expects it; and then again you cannot but see that nothing is, or can be, of a more public consideration, than to support the dignity of the crown, which is in truth the dignity of the nation; besides, it is unsafe, as well as dishonourable, that the king's Revenue should fall short of his most necessary and most unavoidable Expences.—And, if upon a due examination, it shall be made appear to you, that though there had been no diminution of the Customs, yet no thift or conduct in the world could ever make the Revenue able to answer the certain Charge of the government, much less to discharge those Anticipations which be heavy upon it; how can it be possible for it to supply those contingencies which happen even in times of peace, and which can never be brought under any regulation or establishment?—You may be sure, a great and generous prince would be glad, by good managery, to have wherewithal to exercise his royal bounty. But our neighbours have found a way to prevent all that: for their vast preparations put his maj. upon a vast expence, to preserve himself and us.—My Lords and Gentlemen; You now find the king involved in difficulties as great, and without your assistance as insuperable, as ever any government did labour under. And yet his maj. doth not think that there need many words to bespeak your zeal and industry in his service; for the things themselves now speak, and speak aloud. The public and the private interest do both persuade the same things; and are, and ought to be, mighty in persuasion. If the honour and safety of your country, and, which is next to that, the concerns of your own families and posterities, cannot awaken your utmost care to preserve that govt. which only can preserve you and yours, all other discourses will be to no purpose. There can be no difficulties at all to them who take delight in serving of the king and their country, and love the occasions of shewing it. Such are all here: but though the king have had for many years a large and full experience of your duty, yet there never was a time like this to try your affections. There is so strange a concurrence of ill accidents at this time, that it is not to be wondered at, if some very honest and good men begin to have troubled and thoughtful hearts; yet that which is infinitely to be lamented is, that malicious men too begin to work upon this occasion, and are in no small hopes to raise a storm that nothing shall be able to allay. If you can rescue the king's affairs from such a tempest as this; if you can weather this storm, and steer the vessel into harbour; if you can find a way to quiet the apprehensions of those who mean well, without being carried away by the passions of others who mean ill; if you can prevent the designs of those without doors, who study nothing else but how to distract your counsels, and to disturb all your proceedings: then you will have performed as great and as seasonable a piece of service to the king, as ever he stood in need of.—And when the world shall see, that nothing hath been able to disappoint the king of the assistance he had reason to hope from this session, but that there is a right understanding between the king and his parliament, and that again strengthened and increased by new evidences of your duty and affection, and raised above all possibility of being interrupted; then shall the king be possessed of that true glory, which others vainly pursue, the glory of reigning in the hearts of his people; then shall the people be possessed of as much felicity as this world is capable of; and you shall have the perpetual honour and satisfaction of having been the means to procure so much solid and lasting good to your country, as the establishment of the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom, and consequently of all his majesty's dominions.”

Address of both Houses for a solemn Fast.]

The first Resolves of the house of commons were, That a committee be appointed to consider of Ways and Means for the preservation of his majesty's person: That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, for removing Popish Recusants from London; and that a Committee be appointed to enquire into Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Murder; as likewise into the Plot. The same day the house agreed with the lords in an Address to his majesty, to appoint a solemn Fast; which was to the following effect: “That Information had been given of a horrible Design against his sacred life, and being very sensible of the fatal consequences of such an attempt, and of the dangers of the subversion of the Protestant Religion and government of this realm, they humbly beseech his majesty, that a solemn day of Fasting and Humiliation may be appointed, to implore the mercy and protection of Almighty God to his majesty's royal person, and in him to all his loyal subjects; and to pray that God will bring to light, more and more, all secret machinations against his majesty and the whole kingdom.” All which was accordingly done by Proclamation dated the 25th of October, requiring, that Wednesday the 13th of November should be kept for a general Fast. On the 24th both Houses again agreed on another Address, and,

Address concerning Popish Recusants.] Oct. 26. Both houses presented the following Address to the king:

“We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, having taken into our serious consideration the bloody and traitorous Designs of Popish Recusants, against your majesty's sacred person and government, and the Protestant Religion, wherewith your maj. hath been graciously pleased to acquaint us: for the preventing whereof, we do most humbly beseech your majesty, that your maj. would be graciously pleased, by your royal proclamation, to command all and every person and persons being Popish Recusants, or so reputed, forthwith, under pain of your majesty's highest displeasure, and severe execution of the law against them, to depart and retire, themselves and their families, from your royal palaces of Whitehall, Somerset-house, St. James's, the cities of London and Westminster, and from all other places within ten miles of the same. And that no such person or persons, do, at any time hereafter, repair or return to your majesty's said palaces, or the said cities, or either of them; or within ten miles of the same, other than householders, being tradesmen exercising some trade or manual occupation, and settled for 12 months last past in houses of their own, and not having an habitation elsewhere, giving in their own names, and the names of all other persons in their families to the two next justices of the peace: and that it may be inserted in the said proclamation, that, immediately after the day limited for their departure, the constables, church-wardens, and other the parish officers, go from house to house in their several parishes, hamlets, constaberies and divisions, respectively; and there to take an Account of the names and surnames of all such persons as are Popish Recusants or suspected so to be, as well householders, as lodgers and servants; and to carry a List of their names to the two next justices of the peace, who are to be thereby required and enjoined to send for them, and every of them; and to tender to them and every of them the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; and to commit to prison, till the next succeeding session of the peace, all such persons as shall refuse the said Oaths; and at the said session, to proceed against them according to law: and that your maj. will be pleased to direct commissions forthwith to be issued under the great seal of England, to all Justices within the Cities of London and Westminster, and within ten miles of the same, to authorize and require them, or any two of them, to administer the said Oaths accordingly. And that your maj. would farther please to command that no Warrant or Licence be granted by the lords of your maj.'s Privy-Council, or otherwise than at the Council-Board, to be signed by six lords of the privy council, whereof the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer or principal secretary of state to be one, for the stay, return, or repair of any such person or persons, in, or to any of the said places, till some more effectual law be passed for preventing the said Popish Conspiracies, and for the preservation of your majesty's sacred person, and the religion and government by law established; for which, we your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects will always employ our utmost endeavours and daily prayers. [The same day and the next, Mr. Oates,* Mr. Michael Godfrey, and Mr. Mulys, having given in certain Information to the house, (who on this occasion sent for Lord chief justice Scroggs from off the bench to sign certain Warrants) concerning the Plot, and the Death of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, the following Clause was added to the Address.] And whereas the safety and preservation of your majesty's most sacred Person, is of so great a consequence and concernment to the Protestant Religion, and to all your subjects; we do farther most humbly beseech your majesty to command the lord chamberlain and all other officers of your majesty's household, to take a strict care that no unknown or suspicious persons may have access near your majesty's person: and that your maj. will likewise please to command the lord mayor, and the lieutenancy of London, during the session of parliament, and likewise, the lord-lieutenants of Middlesex and Surrey, to appoint such guards of the Trained-Bands in Middlesex, Westminster and Southwark, and other places adjacent, as shall be thought necessary."

* "Titus Oates was the son of an Anabaptist teacher, who afterwards conformed, and got into orders, and took a benefice, as this his son did. He was proud and ill natured, haughty, but ignorant. He had been complained of for some very indecent expressions concerning the mysteries of the Christian Religion. He was once presented for perjury. But he got to be a chaplain in one of the king's ships, from which he was dismissed upon complaint of some unnatural practices." Burnet.

To which his majesty was pleased to reply to this purpose: "That you shall have the effect of your desires, and that he would give speedy orders for putting the same in execution."

The house then proceeded to scrutinize farther into the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, as likewise into the particulars of the Popish Plot; and ordered their Speaker to wait upon his majesty, and communicate to him the Informations the house had received of the dangers that his majesty and the nation lay under. To which his majesty was pleased to return: "That he acknowledged the great care of the house for the preservation of his person and government, &c."

A Bill passed to disable Papists from sitting in Parliament.] The following days, the house was almost wholly employed in examining Witnesses and Papers relating to the Plot, in the unravelling of which they testified a very extraordinary zeal; and Oct. 28, to prevent mischief in the interval, passed a Bill to disable Papists from sitting in either house of parliament.

Report of Coleman's Examination.] They likewise appointed a committee to examine Mr. Coleman, in Newgate, of which Mr. Sacheverell was chairman; who reported on the 30th, "That the prisoner Coleman denied any Design against either the king's life or authority, or that he ever knew or heard of any commissions to raise an army. That he likewise denied, that he ever designed or endeavoured to change the established Religion, or introduce Popery; but confesses, he did attempt to get this parliament dissolved, in order to procure liberty of conscience, which he thought they would never grant. In order to which, he solicited 300,000*l.* from France; adding, that there were not three men in England acquainted with his Designs, or Correspondence; of which the duke of York was one, who, he believes, communicated them to lord Arundel of Wardour.—That he farther confessed, that his first Correspondence in France, was by certain Letters he had addressed to sir Wm. Throckmorton, by which means he commenced a second with la Ferrier, on whose death, he sent three or four Letters to la Chaise. That he had also confessed a Correspondence with the Pope's Nuncio at Brussels, which was occasioned by a Proposal from the Pope, to furnish the king with a great sum of money, provided the Catholics here might receive proportionable favour.—That upon this, he was dispatched by the duke of York to Brussels to the said neu-cio, for a farther explanation of that proposal: who then disowned that he had any authority from the court of Rome to make it; but that he had made it as a private man; offering however, his services at his return to bring it about: that notwithstanding, he had not corresponded with him for three or four years.—That the Cypher, with the provincial's mark, was that used between him and father St. Germain: that he used no Cypher to the provincial: that he used another Cypher to Rowigny's secretary, but not in public concerns.—And being then asked, Whether he knew of any other sum proposed or treated on, he answered: That he believed there was, to keep the king from joining the confederates, but could not affirm that any had been paid."

Mr. Wright, a Member, examined and acquitted.] Oct. 31. Mr. Robert Wright, a member, was accused by the Speaker, of having corresponded with Coleman: on which he was examined by the house, and his Papers searched; but acquitted with honour.

Mr. Coleman's Letters were then read; of which three were entered in the Journals by Order of the House, viz. one from Mr. Coleman to father le Chaise, a second to the same, and a third from le Chaise, acknowledging the receipt of the two former.*

Resolution of the Commons with regard to the Plot.] Upon the Evidence already arisen with regard to the Plot, the house came to a Resolution, and appointed a committee to prepare matters for a conference with the lords upon it; who, the next day, Nov. 1. by sir Robert Sawyer, their chairman, delivered in their Report as follows: "That the house of commons, after examination of several persons, Papers, many of which his majesty did acquaint the house had been communicated to your lordships, and deliberate consideration had thereupon, came to this unanimous Resolution: Resolved, 'That, upon the Evidence, that has already appeared to the house, that this house is of opinion, that there hath been and still is a damnable and hellish Plot, contrived and carry'd on by popish recusants, for the assassinating and murdering the king, and for subverting the government, and rooting out and destroying the Protestant Religion;' The house of commons, being very sensible of the imminent danger both the king and kingdom are in, do think it their duty to acquaint your lordships therewith, and do pray your lordships will be pleased to take it into your serious consideration, what Remedies are fit and suitable to be applied for the preserving the king's person and government; to which the commons shall readily concur, as they doubt not of your lordships concurrence to such Remedies as have, or shall be by them proposed to your lordships for effecting this great end."

A Conference thereon.] These Reasons being agreed to by the house, a Conference was immediately desired and obtained; an account of which was, in the afternoon of the same day, delivered to the house from the committee, by sir Tho. Meres, viz. That my lord Chancellor managed the Conference, and that what was delivered, was as follows: "The lords have considered the Votes of the house of commons, communicated to them at the conference, and have most readily and unanimously concurred with them in it, nem. con. And their lordships are very glad to see that zeal which the commons have shewed upon this occasion, and do fully concur with them: that the most speedy and serious consideration of both houses is necessary for preventing these imminent dangers. In order whereunto, their lordships have resolved to sit die in diem, forenoon and afternoon, and desire the house of commons would do so too. And when their lordships shall have well considered of it, and proper Remedies for these dangers, they will be ready to communicate them to the commons, and will also take in good part, whatever shall be communicated to them by the commons; and will suffer nothing to be wanting on their parts, which may preserve a good correspondence between both houses, which is absolutely necessary to the safety of the king and kingdom."

Nov. 2. It was ordered, that Mr. Speaker do address his majesty from the house, That Mr. Coleman may be pardoned on a full discovery, and that otherwise, neither pardon nor reprieve might be granted him; to both which requests, his majesty was pleased the same day to accord. It was likewise ordered, that Mr. Speaker should signify what had passed to Mr. Coleman in Newgate, who replied: "That he was very sensible of the miserableness of his condition; for that he knew there was enough already known to take away his life, and that he did not know enough to save it."

Debate on a Motion for removing the Duke of York.] Nov. 4. Lord Russel moved to address the king, That the duke of York might withdraw himself from the king's person and councils.

Mr. Booth seconded the motion.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. We ought to have no consideration of persons, when the king and the government are concerned, though the thing ought to be done with all the decency that is possible. It might move some gentlemen, methinks, as it has done me, that his royal highness has desired the king that he may remove from his councils; therefore I hope you will not press that farther. Consider the consequence, when one house addresses the king for one thing, and the lords for another, and they neither are of the opinion of the king. An Address is a temporary declaration, and for the present, and I think this Address not good for the present. The king has sent his Proclamation for Catholics to go out of town: why will you talk of sending the duke to them, when they are sent from him? You ought to use a decorum, for fear precedents may be made use of upon light occasions. The Letters of Coleman's penning tell you of 'providing a place for him in France, &c.' Consider what it will be to send the heir of the crown to the king of France. I go along with lord Russel, that the king is not safe, and we ought by all ways and means to secure the king's person. Your advice is good for the king's guards to be near him; but shall he have them every step he takes, to be weary of them? As long as it is the Catholics' interest to plot the king's death the Jesuits will make it their conscience. . Make a law to secure the king's person, and that will cease.

Mr. Bennet. I like that law Coventry mentions; but till such a law be made, I am for the motion of removing the duke, &c. because before that law may pass, the influence of the duke, being near the king, may hinder it.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. I know that nothing can lie in the balance with the government, religion, and the king's person; yet this must bear proportionable respect to him who has exposed his person for the honour of the nation. I confess, if nothing but removing the duke would do, were he yet nearer the king, were he his son, I should be for it. His mixing in the king's affairs with the king may give presumption of jealousy and suspicion. The duke, as we have been told, has prevented our asking his being removed out of the king's councils. The other part is, Whether his personal absence will be the cure, and the only cure of our fears. It is impossible to put them any where, but there may be a communication by letters or secondary hands. To have no influence where there is tenderness of nature and affection, betwixt the two brothers! This will not remedy the thing. I think nothing will provoke the duke to a resentment in his own person; but this is a cutting of him from the stock: this Plot when represented to posterity! Such a villainous design to precipitate and hasten nature, to bring the duke to the crown, by murdering the king? This is a villainy never to be forgotten: there is a time in nature when the duke has his time to be upon the throne, (pray God make it safe!) The fears are these; if possible, by any kind of foresight, that when that comes, the heir of the crown may not disturb Religion, or the Government; the other, to keep off violent hands that would hasten the king's death. Now, it is apprehended that the removal of the duke leaves you at full ease and security, that you may act for the safety of Religion and the king's person. But how far is this from helping you! I see it rather endangers a desperation of that party. Though the whole party be in such a despair, they would seek hell to bring about their designs. Where should the duke be removed? Is not the king in less danger by having the duke in his eye, when he sees all company and addresses that are made to him? The duke would not be suffered to attempt the least hair of the king's head. No countries are to be trusted with the duke, in this case, and it cuts off no possibility of a degree of the duke's influence upon the king, if at a distance, as when he is in the same room. I have sat here, with trouble for Popery, several sessions, but I never suspected this horrible Plot, &c. and what was done at every meeting, principally aims at it. And I agree with lord Russel's motion. Humanly what you can do may come too late: but these will be violences that are needless, and let every man lay his hand upon his heart, and God direct us all!

Col. Birch. I agree, that if this session will not establish the Protestant Religion, and secure the king's person, it will never be to any purpose to do more. Williamson tells us, 'that, by reason of the rising Sun, Popery comes on;' and, it may be, you may have a majority here; and, by what I heard from the two Secretaries, I think what is moved is absolutely necessary. Observe Coleman's Papers, and let every man answer to God, and his own conscience, whether this motion is not necessary. If I was one near his highness, I honour him so much, that I would advise him to retire, &c. till the nation was secured in their fears. As for the laws that Coventry moved, we may all stand still, and have our throats cut whilst they are making; but till laws are made to begin in the next king's time, that, whoever he is, he may not be able to destroy the Protestant Religion, nor our Property, we can never be safe.

Mr. Solicitor Warrington. I think we are in as great difficulty in this debate, as ever we or our forefathers were. I stand obliged to the duke above all persons, though I have declared myself for the Protestant Religion; so that I am to do two things, not to show ingratitude to the duke, and yet to shew myself for the Protestant Religion. I find that all gentlemen that speak in this case are of one mind for the Protestant Religion; not one division, nor opposition; we differ in mediums, but are unanimous in the end. But I confess the thing you are upon has not that import to do you good, as it has to do you prejudice. As to what has been moved to-day by the honourable lord Russel; I believe, had he known what he did of the duke in the lords house, the motion had not been made; but seeing it is for the Protestant Religion, I would not have it receive a baffle. After the happy conjunction with the lords in all things relating to the Plot, the house then began to think of the obstructions the duke might make to their proceedings. I will not say that the duke is a Papist, but I believe it. The lords thought, if the duke was removed things would go on. The duke has complied and satisfied the lords. I say, such an Address as this may occasion a dissimulation, I mean a dissention, between the two houses, and it may divide us; which if so, I look upon the Protestant Religion to be gone. You make an Address different from the sense of the lords house: the commons would, by this Address, banish the duke, one of the house of peers. It is a judgment in law against him, and shall the king's brother be in a worse capacity than the meanest subject? Is it imaginable that the king will do it, when he has the authority of the house of lords, to back him? And would you have the king put so severe a punishment on the duke as the law allows not? You cannot expect that the king will comply with it.

Sir Tho. Meres. This last discourse weighs with me; the Solicitor and I shall find these Bills, &c. obstructed, and then we shall be both of a mind, that the king may be addressed to, to remove the duke, &c. Have not all our bills hitherto been obstructed? It will be objected (he tells you) 'That to take a lord from parliament will be a hard thing;' but if you do not a great and difficult thing, you will never save yourselves: as to indifference, methinks if there be a God and Salvation among us: the Papists take Scripture from us; they take sense from us in transubstantiation, and communion in both kinds; Popery sets up another government, imperium in imperio; it is against the interest of the nation; and as it is, it carries away our coin out of the kingdom, and if it be settled, much more. If the thing be tolerable, let us hear why; if intolerable, pray let us do this. We changed religion pretty well in Hen. viii's time, and Edw. vi. and in queen Mary's time all the clergy turned popish except about 160. About 40 years ago the church was in its height; and then we had changes in the late times of rebellion, and now we have a church of England again if we can keep it. We are a mutable people, and the Papists number is great. We see an Army of 20,000 men listed in the Plot; I am really afraid then, when such a day comes, that two-thirds of the nation will stand neuter, and so but one third part will engage for the Protestant Religion. They will save their stakes. After all, I end where I began. Let any gentleman show me that there will be no solicitations to hinder the passing of our laws, and that there will not be a proviso put in, that the execution of it will not be worth a halfpenny; let any man show me, that unless you do something that is substantial and difficult, you do nothing. We know not what the lords have done as to the duke, and we cannot take notice of it. We are satisfied, both lords and commons, that there is a Plot; let us do our part. If this be not done, farewell any attempts to preserve the Protestant Religion!

Mr. Fisck. I fear the unanimity of the lords with us will be interrupted by this Address, and I cannot be for the removal of the duke. I hope and expect gentlemen will not think my opinion is for partiality, and my reasons are, that nothing is to be done to impeach the succession; and if the motion tends to that end, every man will be afraid of those means. One unkindness begets another, and if we think this prince not fit to be near the throne,

&c. this being so fatal a consequence, let us avoid this first step—it is pretended, 'that the removal of the duke, &c. is the only means to facilitate the passing the laws we shall make,' but if by his presence he can obstruct those laws, how much more can he obstruct the Address! Meres says, 'that not one good law has passed, by the duke's influence upon the king;' but I will tell you one; the Test upon all that bear Office, &c. I believe the designs of the Papists, &c. and I believe they leave nothing unattempted to destroy the Protestant Religion. If the duke's interest be so great, why should you press the thing you may reasonably think you cannot accomplish? Therefore I move to lay aside the motion.

Mr. Laurence Hyde. It is objected, 'that the laws now passing may not pass, by the duke's influence.' I think I have ground to say, that any laws now in agitation, or others that may be prepared for the security of the Protestant Religion, will not be opposed by the duke. The two sons of the martyred king, the only surviving sons, now to be torn from one another by such a parliament as this! I speak for the king, and not for the duke. I move against the Address.

Lord Cavendish. I fully agree that we provide for the safety of the king, religion, and our liberties, by good laws. But it sticks with me. I know not whether those laws will pass, till the obstruction be removed. The same reason I had before, that the duke is the obstruction, &c. will make me think so still, and take away all encouragements from our enemies, and therefore I am against the continuance of a standing Army; for it is easier with it, than without it, to change the government. I have an extreme veneration for the duke, for I think the duke had not the least hand in the Plot. I think his loyalty to his brother is without example; but his being next of blood to the succession of the crown, and what encouragement that may give the Papists, to take away the king. If I had the honour to be near the duke, I would advise him to withdraw. It has been said, 'that the duke has declared, in the lords house, that he will do it.' But we cannot take notice of what is said in the lords house. Since we have been making laws against Popery, the duke has still been in the councils. It is said, 'the duke may still influence the king by letters;' but surely not so easily as by his presence. I think we cannot answer our duty to the king, nor our country, if we do not address.

Sir Robert Sawyer. For the duke to depart from that Religion his father signed with his blood! I can assign no other cause for this dismal attempt that has been discovered, but the hopes the Papists have of the duke's religion. The preservation of the present prince, and the establishment of the government, is the great consideration; and I never knew it denied by the supreme council; but certainly we are to deal with a great prince, and therefore we are to make as wise steps, as may be, in it. The effect of my motion is this; the encouragement the Recusants have taken, from his royal highness's change of his religion, has been the cause of these bellish attempts against the king, the government, and religion. When that is destroyed, you will see another kind of government. I would therefore have an Address to the king, to acquaint him, 'That, his royal brother being a Papist, is the cause of all this confidence in the Papists, and that the king be humbly desired to prevail with his brother to declare, in open parliament, whether he be a Papist, or not.'

Sir Nich. Carew. I fully concur with Sawyer, at the beginning of his speech, 'That the opinion the Papists have of his royal highness coming to the crown, is the cause of all their insolencies;' and that is the reason why I would have this Address, &c. made now, that his royal highness, by his presence, may not hinder the laws against Popery, you are about now; for hereafter, all the laws you can make will be to little purpose. When the Papists see they have such advocates for them, what will they not attempt? Sink under this Address, and farewell all; the safety of the king's person, our religion, and government!

Mr. Waller. I think gentlemen speak their hearts in this debate. I think him a Papist in his heart, that gives an Aye, or a No, in this matter, that has not the thoughts in him of preservation of the king's person, religion, and government. The duke not only was abroad in the Protestant Religion, but his father was of it too. I have studied the Protestant Religion, and I believe that Christ founded the religion we profess, at his first coming into the world; and I hope Christ will find it here at his second coming. I would let this debate alone. There may be more danger in removing the duke, than in letting him alone. Some of the brothers of France went away in discontent to Brussels, and they said then, 'that Brussels did breed the children of France;' but they were all glad in France when they came back again. Absalom asked his father leave to go out of his court, and you know what followed. At court the duke will keep none but good company, abroad Catholics. I would pause upon this motion. I am not satisfied whether to give my Aye, or No, to this question, yet; therefore I move that you would consider of it.

Mr. Harwood. He that moves to defer this question one minute longer, I believe him to be an enemy to his king and country.

The Speaker interrupted him, and said, 'Such conclusions as these are uncharitable, and wonderfully unparliamentary.'

Mr. Harwood goes on. The weight of the thing has so transported me, that I hope gentlemen, not of my opinion, will pardon me. I respect the duke as duke; but as he is a Papist, let every man lay his hand upon his heart, whether his being a Papist has not given encouragement to the Plot, &c. The duke has houses in the country, and loves fox-hunting;

I would have him retire to some of them, to be out of the influence of these damned Jesuits. I am his friend, and out of good intention I would have him out of occasion of doing ill.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I take this to be the greatest debate that ever was in parliament. Here is on the one side our Religion and Liberties concerned; and the duke on the other. But I believe this had never been, if the duke had not been a Papist. He is a good, wise, and virtuous prince, but that which grieves me is, that his goodness is made use of by the Papists. When that unhappy stroke is struck, that the Papists intended, he is king; and are not we all concerned to prevent that stroke? We see that the Protestant Religion has been attempted for some years. Address upon address has been made against Popery and the French interest; and the duke had engaged for the French interest against Holland and the Netherlands; one the bulwark of our religion, the other of our safety from the French greatness; and it is but eight months ago (as appears by Coleman's Letters) that the duke's eyes have been opened; but the duke's locks are cut by the Papists. One great Plot has taken; the duke is turned Papist. The king is king, and the duke is but a subject, and I would have the duke stay his time to come to the Succession. Act after act has been made to secure religion, and this act, now sent up to the lords, the duke may hinder. The two brothers have parted formerly; one was at York, the other at Salisbury, in the plague-time; and, God be thanked! they came together again. I am told of five or six and thirty Papists, the other night, in the withdrawing-room; and this still will be more if not prevented. I see several of the house that eat the king's bread, that are his servants; I hope they will be for the preservation of the king's person; for so long as the duke is about the court, Papists will flock thither; therefore pray put the question for the Address.

Sir John Ernley. As Coleman's Papers tell you of the duke's compliance to dissolve the parliament, so they tell you of money that has been given for that purpose. I would know to whom this money has been paid? I hope all Coleman's Papers are not evidence, though Mr. Oates's is, who cleared the duke in the matter of the Plot. As to liberty of conscience, you know who are for that. He that is above water will hold him down that is under. The duke's hand and seal have been counterfeited. Consider what you do. If you turn the duke thus away, you put him at the head of 20,000 men, and then it will be much more in his power to do you hurt. The Address may be granted, or refused; if granted, yet there may be correspondence betwixt such relations; and, if not granted, possibly you will be discontented. Therefore you know not what this day's debate may produce in the duke, by a voluntary removal of himself from the king. Therefore I would consider longer of the matter.

Sir George Downing. You begin with punishment, before examination. Do not do that to the king's brother, which you would not have done to another. We once named a great person here, to be removed from the king, &c. and no crime was assigned against him. Another time there was a crime named, and no person, and you had effect accordingly in those Addresses. These wicked men in the Plot will expose themselves to your justice, and you may meet with them; but, at this time, lay by this Address, that will touch the lords too near.

Serj. Maynard. Two things are propounded; sequestration of the duke from the king's council, and sequestration of him from the king's person. He has of himself abstained from being admiral of England, and exercises that office as to the Plantations only; and he has promised in the lords house to absent himself from the king's councils. I should be loth, after such a concurrence amongst ourselves and the lords, to give any occasion of discord betwixt the lords and us. Suppose you vote to sequester the duke from the king's person; this Address, as it is no law, works nothing. You make no confinement of him by sequestration from the king's person. But I would not lose all this debate. The duke has promised he will retire, &c. He may dispense with that promise; the Vote of sequestration may do you hurt. The Address, &c. is not punishment for a crime. The Address is a prudent caution, and, I fear, if made, and not granted, this will discourage people abroad in this way of proceeding. I think verily, the great encouragement of the papists is from the duke. The Council of Lateran, and 4 or 5 councils agree, 'that killing of kings that are hereticks, is meritorious.' I will not go far into that matter; but in case there should be a division between the two houses upon this, it will put a great discouragement upon people as to the prosecution of the Plot, and in their fears of popery.

Sir Philip Warwick. I believe popery is a confederacy against God, and against the kingdom. I believe, if this horrid Plot had come to effect, it might have converted the duke to our religion. He is our king in presumptive succession, and let us use him like such a one.

Sir Henry Capel. The duke has made the advance to the parliament by his behaviour, in informing the lords he will retire. Let us not cast him out of our arms. It is entirely necessary that we be unanimous. If we once divide, we give him all the advantage against us imaginable. I have great respect for his person. His father, with my father^e, suffered in the Rebellion; but if I cannot separate my interest from his person, I must divide from him. We all agree as to making such laws, that, should the duke be king, it might not be in his power to prejudice the protestant religion. I move, therefore, not to lose the fruit of this debate; and as you have been told, he has removed himself from the king's councils, you may agree to that; and as for removing him from the king's person, adjourn that debate to another time.

Col. Titus. There are ways to make things look tragical. We are told of 'tearing the duke from the king;' but that is not the question, but 'Whether the duke shall withdraw from the king's person, for some time, till some laws are passed, which we fear he may obstruct.' If I suspected that my father would set my house on fire, I would take the brand out of his hand, but I would not cut his throat; and if he, that is at the helm, would run the ship upon a rock, I would take him from it.

Mr. Sacheverell. If this be so tender a matter, I wonder, now the safety of the kingdom is in danger, we should put it off for two or three days. I have read a little in the law, but I would have the gentlemen of the long robe tell me, whether any degree or quality whatsoever, of any subject, can patronize any correspondence with the king's enemies? or whether the king and the parliament may not dispose of the succession of the crown? and whether it be not pramunire to say the contrary? let them resolve this question, whether there has not been a male-management? if not in the king's ministers for some years past, let them name the persons who have had the influence over affairs. But as to the point of the Address, I am not satisfied whether it be our interest; but if it be, I will go higher and higher.

The debate was adjourned to the 8th.

Nov. 8. Sir John Coventry. We talk here of Popery, and the heir of the crown protects papists. I move for the business of the day, about removing the duke. There are papists now walking about the court of requests.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. I know not what that gentleman would have. There is all the care taken imaginable to clear the court of papists, night and day, by the council. One man drops a letter in an entry at Whitehall as a papist, another as a protestant, and takes liberty to impute any crimes to any man or woman whatsoever. I know not what can be more done than is done already.

Mr. Sec. Williamson. When it shall please God (as in the course of nature) that we lose the king, you may be fortified with such laws as may be for yours and his safety. The king, I may say, will say something to you of this nature to-morrow.

Sir Tho. Mores. I think those papists walking in the Hall is a contempt of the king's proclamation. It is no great matter for them to go ten miles out of town. If you do not something immediately, you will show remissness. Suppose the case had not been a papist, but a fanatic; he would have been otherwise used. This ought, this very hour, to be punished, or we cannot sit here with honour or safety.

Sir Wm. Hickman. If the papists intend mischief, they will strike presently; therefore, as Meres has moved, I would not be baffled in the proclamation, but take present remedy to secure yourselves from these mens attempts. You cannot else be safe.

The debate was again adjourned to the 14th. Coleman's farther Examination.] Sir Henry Capel reported from the Committee, appointed to examine Mr. Coleman in Newgate, "That the said Coleman received of M. Rouvigny 300*l.* and of M. Courtin, * 360*l.* for intelligence of every day's debates in parliament, and for keeping a good table. That he received last session of M. Barillon* 2500*l.* to be distributed among members of parliament, which he had converted to his own use: that M. Barrillon had, on the occasion, pointed at several members; and that he had told M. Barillon, he had complied with his Instructions. That, at the end of the last session, he received of M. Barrillon 260*l.* more for Parliament Intelligence. That M. Rouvigny, believing the parliament was inflamed by the Confederates against France, did therefore encourage him to pursue a Correspondence with members: to render which more effectual, he did treat with St. Germain, about a sum of crowns to be disposed of amongst them. That none of that money was received: that he entered no foreign Letters in his books, after his correspondence with le Chaise ceased: that he was to receive 30,000*l.* on procuring a security for the Banker's Debt, which was afterwards reduced to 7000*l.* in silver, and 5000 guineas: of which he received but the moiety of the silver only. And that this contract made between himself and sir Robert Viner, Alderman Bakewell, and Mr. Whitehall, was verbal only. Signed Edward Coleman."

The King's Speech to both Houses, relating to the Succession.] Nov. 9. The king went to the house of peers, and made the following speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am so very sensible of the great and extraordinary care you have already taken, and still continue to shew for the safety and preservation of my person in these times of danger, that I could not satisfy myself without coming hither on purpose to give you all my most hearty thanks for it. Nor do I think it enough to give you my thanks only, but I hold myself obliged to let you see withal, that I do as much study your preservation too as I can possibly; and that I am as ready to join with you in all the ways and means that may establish a firm security of the Protestant Religion, as your own hearts can wish: And this not only during my time, of which I am sure you have no fear, but in future ages, even to the end of the world. And therefore I am come to assure you, that whatsoever Bills you shall present, to be passed into laws, to make you safe in the reign of my Successor, (so they tend not to impeach the Right of Succession, nor the descent of the crown in the true line; and so as they restrain not my power, nor the just rights of any Protestant Successor,) shall find from me a ready concurrence. And I desire you withal, to think of some more effectual means for the conviction of Popish Recusants, and to expedite your councils as fast as you can, that the world may see our unanimity; and that I may have an opportunity of shewing you how ready I am to do any thing, that may give comfort and satisfaction to such dutiful and loyal subjects."

Nov. 9: p. m. The commons went to the banquetting-house at Whitehall, and, by their Speaker, returned his majesty their humble and hearty Thanks, for his most gracious Speech: To which his majesty was pleased to give this Answer: "Gentlemen, It shall always be my study to preserve the Protestant Religion, and to advance and support the interest of my people."

Bedlow's Narrative.] Nov. 10. Mr. W. Bedlow * gave the commons an account concerning the Murder of sir E. Godfrey, as also concerning the Plot. Then Bedlow read a narrative, which he had presented to the lords †. All

* "This Wm. Bedlow had formerly been a servant to lord Bellasis, afterwards an ensign in Flanders. About Michaelmas 1674 he was sent for over by Harcourt, recommended by the English abbess at Dunkirk, and so by degrees became acquainted with the Jesuits, and was at last generally employed as an agent for them, and sent frequently with letter's into foreign parts." Hist. of the Plot, p. 127.

Burnet says, "Bedlow had led a very vicious life; he had gone by many false names, by which he had cheated many persons. He had gone over many parts of France and Spain, as a man of quality, and he had made a shift to live on his wits, or rather by his cheats. He was apprehended at Bristol, by his own desire, and brought to London, Nov. 6, where a guard was immediately assigned him for his security, and a pension for his subsistence, with a lodging at Whitehall." Rapin.

† "In regard to the murder of Godfrey, he swore before the two secretaries (Nov. 7.) in presence of his majesty, 'That it was committed in Somerset-house, by Walsh and Le Phaire, Jesuits, and two laymen;' at the same time declaring also upon oath, 'That he could say nothing at all as to the plot that was then in question.' But, on the very next day, being brought before the lords, by the king's directions, to give the same account he had done the evening before to his majesty, (that is to say, concerning the Murder of Godfrey) he all at once made a transition to the Plot, 'that two of the persons he had named as the murderers, viz. Walsh and Le Phaire, had informed him, that the lord Bellasis had a commission to command forces in the north, the earl of Powis in South Wales, and that lord Arundel of Wardour had a commission to grant commissions to whom he pleased; that Coleman was a great agitator in the designs against the

the Information he then gave at the bar, relating to the Plot, is fully mentioned in the Trials of the Murderers of sir E. Godfrey, and others of the Traitors.

Address for tendering the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to his Majesty's Servants.] Nov. 12. The commons resolved, "That, there being an accusation of High-Treason against sir Wm. Godolphin, his majesty's ambassador in Spain; an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to desire him to call him home, to answer the accusation." To which his majesty was pleased to answer, "That he had already ordered his letters of revocation: and that he had a person in his eye, who he designed should succeed him in that service." And on the same day the commons presented another Address to his majesty, praying, "That a special commission may be issued forth, for tendering the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all the servants of his majesty and royal highness; and to all other persons (except his majesty's Portugal servants) residing within the palaces of Whitehall, St. James's and Somerset house, and all other his majesty's houses; and that there may be likewise special commissions issued forth, for tendering the said Oaths to all persons residing within the two Serjeants Inns, all the Inns of Court, and Inns of Chancery."

The King's Answer.] To which his majesty returned an Answer in writing two days after: "That as to all his majesty's own Servants, all the servants of his royal highness, all other persons residing in Whitehall, St. James's, Somerset-house, or any other of his majesty's houses, except the menial servants of the queen and dutchess; as also all persons within either of the Serjeants Inns, or any of the Inns of Court, or Chancery, his majesty grants it. But as to the queen's menial servants, who are so very inconsiderable in their number, and within the Articles of marriage, his majesty does not think it fit. And his maj. cannot but take notice, that in a late Address from the house of peers, the menial servants of the queen and dutchess are excepted; and his majesty hopes that this house will proceed with the same moderation as to that particular."

Another Address to the same effect.] This Answer not being thought satisfactory, on the 15th the house proceeded to another Address, in which they humbly advise his majesty, and renew their desires, that the persons excepted in his majesty's message may be comprehended in the same commission; for which they do, king; that he asking them, 'Why he had not been sooner let into the secret concerning the king's death,'—they answered, 'None were permitted to know it, but such as lord Bellasis nominated.' Here he stopped short, desiring time to put his whole Narrative in writing, which he said he had begun. And being asked 'if he knew Titus Oates?' answered in the negative, without any reservation." Ralph.

in all duty, lay before his majesty the Reasons following. "1. For the quieting of the minds of your majesty's good Protestant subjects, who have more than ordinary care and solicitude for the safety of your majesty's person, by reason of the notorious conspiracy of the Popish Party at this time, even against the life of your sacred majesty. 2. By your majesty's Proclamation, set forth upon the Address of both houses, for banishing Popish Recusants ten miles from London, there is no such restriction. 3. The discouragement it would be to this kingdom, to see so great a neglect; and the occasions that Papists would take to say from thence, that all our fears were groundless. 4. It is too great a countenance to the dangerous factions which are already come to that height, that it renders all manner of discouragement on that side necessary. 5. It is against the laws and statutes of the realm; which, as they are preserved and maintained by your majesty's authority, so we assure ourselves, you will not suffer them to be thus violated by your family and royal presence, upon the account of Popish Recusants."

Mr. Secretary Williamson sent to the Tower.] Nov. 18. The commons being informed, that there were several Commissions to Popish Recusants, and Warrants also that they should be mustered, notwithstanding they had not taken the Oaths, and subscribed the Declaration, according to the act of parliament, and that they were countersigned by sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State; the notice of this raised such a heat in the house, that they immediately sent sir Joseph, as a member of their house, to the Tower.

The King releases him.] This much offended the king, who the next day sent for the house of commons to attend him in the Banqueting-House, where, in a speech to them, he told them plainly, "That though they had committed his servant without acquainting him: yet he intended to deal more freely with them, and acquaint them with his intentions, to release his Secretary:" which accordingly he did that very day.

An Address to the King that he might not be discharged.] Upon which the commons immediately drew up an Address to his majesty to present to him these Reasons of their proceedings, in the commitment of sir Joseph Williamson, as a member of their house, viz. "1. That divers Commissions were granted to Popish Officers, and countersigned by the said sir Joseph, and delivered out in Oct. last, since the meeting of this house, and discovery of the present Popish Conspiracy. 2. Divers Warrants have also been produced before us, of Dispensations, contrary to law, for Popish officers to continue in their commands, and to be passed in muster, notwithstanding they have not taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and received the blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the act of parliament in that behalf: all which said warrants were likewise countersigned by the said air Joseph; which being complained of to us, and confessed by the said air Joseph, we your majesty's most dutiful subjects, having the immediate consideration before us, of the imminent danger of your majesty's person, the safety whereof is above all things most dear, and likewise the dangers from Popish Plots, so nearly threatening the peace and safety of your majesty's government, and the Protestant Religion, were humbly of opinion, we could not discharge our duty to your majesty and the whole kingdom, without the committing the said sir Joseph; and therefore most humbly desire, That he may not be discharged by your majesty. And we do farther most humbly desire your majesty, to recal all Commissions granted to all Papists within the kingdom of England and Ireland, or any other of your majesty's dominions and territories."

Debate on the Lords Proviso in the Popery Bill, exempting the Duke of York. [Nov. 21. The lords sent down the Bill for disabling Papists to sit in either house of parliament, &c. with some Amendments, and a Proviso, exempting the duke of York from taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the Declaration, &c.

Sir Rob. Markham. I am glad that the lords have sent us the Bill again, and am not sorry for the Proviso in it, exempting the duke, &c. If the duke's relation to the Crown be considered, there is a difference between him and other subjects, and I move you to pass the Proviso.

Sir John Ernly. This was a salva conscientia to myself. I make a difference betwixt this peer (the duke) and all the rest. The lords have made a great step in this bill, that they have exempted no other persons; and I cannot but say there is great reason why this person should not be comprehended in the common calamity with the rest. If the duke should be banished, or removed (he is out of the king's councils already) from the king's person, in the circumstances he is in, whether would it be better, to be removed, or continue in the king's eye, to be observed? Foreign aid, we see, has been treating for with the French king by Coleman. If the Jesuitical party should despair, and fall upon any person, I know not the consequence. I fear not what can come to us, if the duke be amongst us. But I think in conscience, that if we banish the Papists, and have the duke under the king's eye, there will be no danger. There is but this one person exempted by the lords, &c. and no great danger of him but what is in your power to remedy.

Sir Winston Churchill. Upon this disadvantage, when I hear so loud a cry, 'To the Question,' I should not speak, but to discharge my conscience. Though I think not to prevail, when I heard so loud a cry against what I am moving. The lords are so near the government, that they see more than we. They have not so slight stakes as to oversee their game. I think that the monarchy of England is concerned in this. Consider the consequence, if you reject this Proviso. How far will you force so great a prince to declare? You will give your adversaries great advantage. Suppose the duke takes not the Oaths. All that do not take them, &c. will you make them Papists? There were some at your bar that were Quakers, who would not take them; will you drive all that herd of swine into the sea of Rome at once? If those that sit in parliament must take them, those out of parliament must too. [And so he sat down abruptly.]

Sir C. Wheeler. I agree to the Proviso. If the duke be in a capacity to sit in the lords house, then the debate you have adjourned, about removing the duke from the king's presence and councils, you cannot proceed in. If the duke remains in the lords house, he cannot singly and solely, on his own vote, stop any bill there, and this very bill has passed that you favoured so much.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. You have the greatest matter before you that ever was in this house. The danger of disturbance of Religion, is one of the most pernicious apprehensions imaginable. If this prince should go into another place, it must cost you a Standing Army to bring him home again. These things to be done upon the heir of the crown were never before. It was in the power of queen Mary to see queen Elizabeth, and of Edward with to see queen Mary. Suppose the king on his death-bed; must he not see the duke, to give any order about the affairs of the kingdom? It is a hardship not to be offered to a condemned person. You are losing this bill, by casting out the lords' Proviso. And these Popish peers sit in the lords' house. You lose that thing too, and it cannot be remedied, and the lords will carry any other provision you shall make against Popery. Deny it to be in the king's power to see his brother, and he him, and the consequence will be fatal.

Sir Edm. Jennings. You have not yet made any steps towards the safety of the kingdom. The head-ach coming from an ill stomach, to cut off the hair and apply oils to the head will do no good, when the way is to cleanse the stomach. It is not removing Popish lords out of the house, nor banishing Priests and Jesuits, nor removing the duke from the king; but it must be removing Papists from the nation.

Sir Allen Apsley. When the house is all of a mind, as to the duke's valour and exposing himself for the honour of the nation, we cannot, without ingratitude, throw out this Proviso.

Sir John Henner. If you throw out this Proviso, you endanger the nation. You know what you have done in rejecting the duke's servants. You had better impeach the duke than throw out this Proviso, and take him from his brother. Keep him here, and you may breathe the wholesome doctrines of the Church of England into him.

Sir Jonathan Trelawney. The consequences may be so fatal, if you throw out this Proviso, that I am for agreeing with the lords in it. The scope of the bill is not only to suppress persons that may propagate the growth of Popery, but to break their future hopes. This before you is of the greatest moment and concernment, that ever came before a house of parliament. I speak sincerely; by throwing out this Proviso, give you not the greatest advantage to the Papists to drive the duke into Popish hands? Should that day come, of the king's death, what disobligation do you put upon the duke! For God's sake accept the Proviso.

Those against the Proviso sat silent.

Earl of Ancram. This debate looks as if it was not upon good ground and reason, but a resolved business. Nobody opens his mouth to answer any thing that is said, but only to call for the Question. If so, put it to the common fate of Aye and No. I think this is a subject for another man's brains and tongue better than mine. But pray consider; the duke is the king's only brother, the son of that martyr who died for his religion. The duke is said to be 'but a subject;' but he is another kind of subject than lord Carrington (lately secured about the Plot) It is said, 'the duke is not heir apparent;' but I am sure he is apparent heir. Generations to come will curse this day's work; therefore pray consider of it.

Sir Wm. Killgrew. I dread taking the duke from the king—(and weeps.)

Sir John Birkenhead. In Henry vi. th's time, when all the peers were sworn to the Great Charter, and not to take up the difference between the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Warwick, the 'make-king,'* 'propter celsitudinem et excellentiam Domini principis,' he was not obliged to take the oath—to make a law that the king shall not go to his brother, I understand not; it is the same thing as that his brother shall not come to him. Do you think the king will give his consent to this bill, to restrain himself thus? Cannot the king go to see Mr. Coleman, if he will? And not go see us brother! You here will make a law, that he duke shall be removed from the king's presence. Whither shall he go? Into the country? Or will you force him beyond sea? If he was a pusillanimous prince, of weak capacity; but he is one of the most magnanimous princes in the world. He renounced the French interest, that used his brother ill in his exile: drive him into French hands! I speak in the presence of God, I think, if you pass this proviso it will be the greatest means to get in to our religion. For God's sake pass this proviso.

Sir George Downing. I am one of those that will agree to this Proviso, and I will give you my reason for it, for my own justification. I had rather have half a loaf than no bread. I say not that the duke is a Papist; I know nothing of that; but if he be a Papist, I had rather he sat alone in the lords house, than with all the Popish lords. Next consider, whether it is not better in prudence, for the good of the kingdom, that the duke sit in the house of York [He meant 'the House of Lords.'] I had rather have him amongst Protestants than Papists, in the heap of Papists. It is better in prudence to endeavour to keep him amongst us, than to thrust him amongst others: the duke is a person to be led and not driven, to be won and not to be frightened, to be persuaded and not compelled.

* "The earl of Warwick had the honour of storing Henry vi. to the throne, after having deposed him, and of pulling down Edw. iv. who had been raised entirely by his means; therefore he was commonly called 'The king-maker.'" Rapin.

Sir Tho. Higgins. Let gentlemen, who are so earnest against this Proviso consider, should the duke think himself disobliged, and go beyond the sea, and the French king support him with 100,000 men; could a greater blow be given to the Protestant Religion?

Sir Rd. Temple. Would you break all the wheels of this design, is it not better to keep the duke here alone with us? That is the way to make him ours: Wherever the duke goes, his title to the crown goes along with him. The matter of Popery will go on, the duke absent, better than when the king sees all things. If you will take off all the wheels of this pernicious design, make the duke yours, and keep him with you.

Sir Edw. Dering. The dignity of the persons makes the greatness of the thing. If we disagree with the lords in this Proviso, and leave it out, and the king give not his consent to the bill, your bill must fall, or run a great hazard. I would agree, &c. and when that is done, move the king to give an immediate consent to the bill. You have then but one Popish peer in the lords house, (if the duke be one.) You may have great advantage in other bills of Popery, by getting this.

Mr. Waller. I am much perplexed in this business. The debate of removing the duke, has been adjourned several days, and always put off, but now blown in by a side-wind. Still the debate has been put off; that was some sign you would lay it aside. I am sorry for the Proviso, I wish we had had the bill without it. But you expound that which I never understood, that the duke, by it, should be removed from the presence of his brother. From my experience abroad, and what I have read at home, I have ever observed, that princes of the duke's magnitude are like fire out of the chimney, and put in the middle of a room; it makes a great blaze, but sets all on fire. Edw. iv. did not agree with his cousin the duke of Hereford. The princes of the blood in France are generally of a different opinion with the ministers of state: they went away, but the king did all he could to get them to court again. When the Civil Wars were in France, Hen. iii. sent for the king of Navarre to marry his sister to be a help to him. David himself was a holy and a good man, but Absalom would not stay at court. David was afraid of his life, for his servants ran away from him to Absalom, as Jonathan told him. Foreign princes will make use of the discontents—'mullis utile bellum.' This removal of the duke is of vast consequence. Gentlemen are in earnest against Popery. If I thought this Proviso was not, I would be against it. There are laws against Papists. This will make them shuffle again, and the Papists can have no hope but by disorder or despair. By union in one vote, when we were at Peace amongst ourselves, we gave Spain a kingdom, viz. Sicily. What can we not do if we have glory at home, and peace abroad? I would lay aside this Proviso, as the most dangerous thing in the world.

Sir Tho. Meres. On one side, the reason against the Proviso is, prudence and safety. On the other, civility, gratitude, and compliment. I would be on the civil side, were not the safety of the nation concerned. No doubt but sir E. Godfrey was civil to go to Somerset House, &c. and he was civil to Mr. Coleman to compare notes with him: but he lost his life by it. I think that the bill, as we sent it up to the lords, names not the duke; and I would avoid naming him in the proviso. The lords name him. I am afraid to name him so, as if possibly he may be a rebel, as if possibly a Papist. This Bill names him not. I had rather this bill had never been brought into the house, than that this Proviso should name the duke. I name him not so, but if the Proviso will name him so, it is a beginning of Toleration. I am against the Proviso for the duke's sake.

Sir Philip Warwick. At the beginning of the Long Parliament, no moderation could be had between the king's prerogative and the subjects liberty. Nothing was more unjust, nothing more unfortunate. I would rather consider that a Popish successor may not be, but a Protestant of our religion.

Sir Henry Capel. It is said by Warwick, 'no moderation could be had in the Long Parliament,' but it was neither imprisonment of the members, though that broke into laws and liberties, it was not the violation of property by illegal taxes, but it was the unhappy head of Popery which brought that disorder in, and possibly shed the blood I came of—(his father, lord Capel.) Since the king's Restoration, Popery has played in court, in our negotiations of war and peace, of setting up ministers and taking them down; and God knows where it will end. I have a representation as other men have; wife and children, and all is at stake. Will not this startle a great man? I hope it will. Weré it not for hope, the heart would break. I hope yet that this great prince will come into our Church. But will you, by admitting this Proviso, have all our tongues tied, and by law declare the duke a Papist? Shall this be done by a law? If it must come from us, this is not the time. If once I can separate the duke's interest from his person, I would serve him. Press down that Popish interest more and more by law, and when the duke is naked, and clear from Popish interest, then it is time to offer our services to him. It is in his hands to save this whole nation, but I will never allow an argument, as this Proviso implies, that a peer shall do any thing against his country. When he is naked and alone, I will serve him, and he may serve himself.

Sir Wm. Cozentry. A gentleman on the other side of the house has said one word that has awakened me. In point of gratitude, I need not tell you my obligations to the duke.* I will not deny a great deal of what has to-day been denied. The danger of the Proviso is only reasons from the presumption of the goodness of this Prince's disposition. I shall say but one word, though, I apprehend, not any thing I can say can prevail in this matter. Consider whether this prince has not been useful to you. Whether he has not made a greater step to the Protestant Religion, by marrying his daughter to the prince of Orange, which had his concurrence. From that instance, he is so far from danger, that he has been a help to us: this is the reason why I am for the Proviso.

Several cried out, "Coleman's Letters. Coleman's Letters."

Sir Rob. Howard. Capel's father would have fought for the crown, whatever devil had raised the storm against it. This Proviso is a single disposing of a person for the security of the nation. Excluding the duke from the presence of the king, is it meant eternally? (It is granted he may stay 30 days, &c. by warrant from the privy council.) What will hold of all you have done, if the crown come to him? What will become of you, if an exasperated prince come to govern, though not of so great a spirit as the duke? I, in my extremity, would scorn to do an act so low, that I would not have disdained to do in my prosperity. The proposition of doing good by this, &c. is to do nothing, for it is but the shape of a thing, and not the thing itself. He is not a man in ordinary condition of other peers. He is separate from other subjects, and by a title. The duke sees no Catholic lords come to the house of peers more. He sees he is separated from them by this Proviso; and will a man in his condition, preserved by a parliament, put himself upon mischief? Will that be his gratitude, think you? We all respect his person, and may hope, that, when he sees his own temper so different from us, he will embrace that bent which he will never find in the popish religion. He is safe, when others are rejected, he is preserved, and may return more useful to the king and us.

Lord Caendish. I cannot agree to the duke's being declared a Papist by act of parliament, till I hear the lords Reasons for the Proviso. If we agree to the Proviso, we cannot hear the lords Reasons. Possibly I may be convinced by the lords, but I am not by any thing I have heard yet.

* He had been his Secretary.

The Proviso was agreed to, 158 to 156*.

Resolved, "That Reasons be drawn up to be offered at a conference for not agreeing with the lords in their 2nd and 3rd Amendments, &c." relating to the Servants of the Queen and Dutchess of York.

Debate on sir J. Trelawney's calling Mr. Ash a Rascal.] A breach of the peace happening in the house, between sir Jonathan Trelawney and Mr. Ash :

The Speaker said, I know not who was the author, or occasion, of this disturbance, but be my relation ever so near to them,† I must tell you who they are that have given blows in the house: they are sir Jonathan Trelawney and Mr. Wm. Ash.

Mr. Williams. I saw something that passed betwixt these two gentlemen. I am sorry I saw what I did see. There was such a case once in Westminster-Hall, and it puzzled the Judges. I am sorry for this case, now we are securing the nation by the Militia, that the peace should be broken amongst ourselves. What has passed looks like an unhappy omen.

Sir Jonathan Trelawney. I rise up the earlier to speak, because I wish this had been in another place; but perhaps in a more sacred place than this, if any man should call me 'rascal,' I should call him 'rebel,' and give him a box on the ear. The cause of the quarrel that happened was this. Col. Birch was saying, 'lose this question (about the Proviso) and he would move for a general toleration.' 'No,' said I, 'I never was for that.' And Ash said, 'I am not for Popery.' Said I, 'Nor I for Presbytery.' I came to Ash, and told him 'he must explain his words.' Said Ash, 'I am no more a Presbyterian than you are a Papist.' Upon which I said, 'Ash was a rascal,' and I struck him, and should have done it any where; but I am sensible it was in heat, and I humbly ask the pardon of the house for it.

Sir Wm. Harbord. He has behaved himself like a man of honour. I must say this, I saw Trelawney strike a stroke.

Sir Wm. Portman. Here has been a just account given of the thing. I pray God there be no ill consequence of it.

Mr Sacheverell. I have a great respect for

* "The duke spoke on this proviso in the house of lords with great earnestness, and with tears in his eyes. He said 'he was now to cast himself on their favour in the greatest concern he could have in this world.' He spoke much of 'his duty to the king, and of his zeal for the nation,' and solemnly protested, 'that, whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own soul; and that no effect of it should ever appear in the government.' The Proviso was carried for him by a few voices. And, contrary to all mens expectations, it passed in the house of commons." Burnet.

† Mr. Ash and the Speaker married two sisters, and sir Jonathan Trelawney married the Speaker's aunt.

the two gentlemen, but more for the preservation of the peace of your councils. If you put up this, and make not an example, you do not justice to yourselves.

Lord Cavendish. I allow both the gentlemen to be in the fault extremely. There can be no excuse made for ill language, nor blows, here, but you must make distinction. You ought, in your censure, to go first on the aggressor, who has done so great a fault contrary to the peace at this time. You can do no less than send him to the Tower, and expell him the house.

Mr. Williams. By the Orders of the house, if you debate the censure they ought to withdraw.

The Speaker. If you go on in the debate, they must withdraw.

Mr. Ash. You have a relation from the gentleman, which is, in a great measure, true. I hope you will allow that the provocation was great. I do acknowledge I have done a great fault, and I humbly ask the pardon of the house.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. There can be no debate who shall be punished, or who not, till they are both withdrawn.

Sir Tho. Meres. Who provoked, or who followed the provocation must be an after debate. But neither of them ought to sit; it will be voting in one another's case.

Sir Tho. Lee, upon the Speaker's motion, 'That both of them should be in custody of the serjeant,' said, You must commit them before judgment be passed upon them, and then they ought to come upon their knees to the bar, before they be discharged.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It is not an equal way of proceeding. The Speaker says, only, 'in safe custody.' It may be others think they do not deserve commitment at all, or one to be committed to the serjeant, the other to the Tower.

The Speaker. There is nothing more equal than to put them both in the same condition, and to order it upon your Books, 'that it is for security, till the house consider how to proceed.'

Ordered, "That sir Jonathan Trelawney and Mr. Ash be secured by the serjeant at arms, for having committed a breach of the peace in the house, until the matter be examined and determined by the house."

Lord Cavendish. I move, that Trelawney, as being the aggressor in this breach of the peace, may be expelled the house.

Mr. Booth. Trelawney came to Ash and reflected upon his family for being Presbyterians and rebels. You can do no less than send him to the Tower, and expell him the house.

Mr. Bennet. When I consider the noise without doors, and how your members are reflected on for what they do here: and that when I had the ill luck to displease the court, they said, 'there goes such a rogue, he is for a commonwealth?' and when families are reflected upon, notwithstanding an act of indemnity and pardon, what will be the end of all this! Though I can justify myself from all this. My father and grandfather were for the king, yet I have heard myself called 'fanatic,' where I durst not answer again. Whoever calls a man 'rebel' here deserves to be expelled the house, and I would have but that one punishment for Trelawney.

Sir John Tallbot. Your first question must be 'whether Trelawney was the first aggressor.'

Sir Ch. Wheeler. He that strikes again, makes himself his own judge. Both have broken your order. [He was mistaken, and out, and so sat down.]

Sir Rob. Dallington. It was my chance to be by, when the difference happened between these two gentlemen. Col. Birch said, 'he was an old soldier, and was for making a safe retreat, and the best way now was for a bill of Toleration.' Trelawney said, 'I am not for tolerating presbytery.' 'Nor I,' says Ash, 'for popery.' And this was all the provocation that Ash gave to Trelawney.

Sir Tho. Meres. Trelawney names 'presbytery' first, and strikes first; pray determine that, and then come to the rest.

Earl of Ancram. Where the honour of the house is concerned, I will speak my mind freely. I will not come to the provocation, but the action. It is one way to do an act out of the house, and another in. A blow struck in the house of commons is a blow struck at all the commons of England; all are struck, and it may go farther. Private persons must not wound all the commons of England. I leave it to you.

Mr. Williams. I hope you will not make your own court less than Westminster-Hall. I would punish Trelawney by expelling him the house.

Sir John Ernly. I move 'that Trelawney may be sent to the Tower, and then that you will consider what to do with Ash.—I would not consider the provocation on one side or the other. We saw the blows, but heard not the words. Both struck, and pray send them both to the Tower.'

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If you expel Trelawney, you take away the freehold of them that sent him hither. The law considers mediums, when things are done with intention and in cold blood. I would know, what a gentleman should do, in such a case as this. But the fact is done; put therefore such a question, as you have examples and precedents of. Send them both to the Tower.

The Speaker. I must do right to the house. The first question moved for was, 'whether Trelawney should be expelled the house.'

The previous question for expelling Trelawney passed in the negative, 130 to 110.

Sir J. Trelawney sent to the Tower. [The Speaker. I will make you a motion, 'that sir J. Trelawney may be sent to the Tower, there to remain during this session.' The person of Mr. Ash is nearest in relation to me, and I would be nearest in my service to him. But pray regard your own honour, regard yourselves.

Sir Tho. Meres. What you have moved is most worthy, and I am for it.

Resolved, "That sir Jonathan Trelawney be sent to the Tower, there to remain during this session of parliament."

Mr. Ash reprimanded. [Mr. Williams. Where the law acquits him, I suppose you will not condemn him, here. It being true that Trelawney said the words, you have punished Mr. Ash by commitment to the serjeant. It is true, a man may strike in his own defence; it is lawful. It is plain, the first provocation was from Trelawney. What happened from Ash is justifiable in law.]

Serj. Gregory. I hope you will not punish a man that has committed no fault. If the second blow appears to be in Ash's own defence, the law, upon an action brought, makes him not guilty. He had worse words than 'rascal' given him, before he gave any. Ash being guilty of no crime, I hope you will inflict no punishment.

Sir John Birkenhead. I wonder that a man should take the sword out of the magistratt's hand, and that should be no crime, and the long robe should say 'it is no offence.' The blow was given in the king's house, and, by the Saxon law, it was death, and, by a continuando, 23 Hen. viii. drawing of blood. Let Ash be punished by you, lest he have greater punishment.

Serj. Gregory. The affront was not given to the walls of the house, but to the Speaker, sitting in the chair of the house.

Sir John Birkenhead. By the 28th Hen. viii. if a man strikes in an integral part of the king's palace, he might as well strike in the king's bed-chamber.

Earl of Ancram. I have known that misfortune of words, amongst brave men. Words may make reparation for words: but blows are for a dog, and not a quarrel to be taken up. Here has been a blow given in the house of commons. A man that sits here should have his understanding so far about him, that a word should not bring him so in passion, as it would do in another place. Truly I think Mr. Ash pardonable in this case; and I would have him reprimanded only in his place.

Which being ordered, Mr. Ash was called in.

The Speaker. Mr. Ash, the house has considered the disorder you committed, and the provocation that was given you. They have a tenderness for every gentleman that is a member; therefore they have thought fit to proceed tenderly with you, only. When you make the house judge, &c. you make yourself no way justifiable, but by extraordinary provocation and passion. And you are to proceed no farther in this quarrel with sir J. Trelawney, and the house requires you to declare it.

Mr. Ash. I acknowledge that I have committed a great fault, but there was a great provocation to it. And I shall humbly acquiesce in the determination of the house. I shall proceed no farther in the matter, and I acknowledge the great favour of the house.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I move for the same engagement from Trelawney; for else, when the session is ended, there may be disorders, and he not in your power to punish. And I move that the Speaker require him in obedience to your commands, not to pursue the quarrel. And I believe he will give obedience to it.—It was ordered accordingly.

The King's third Speech to both Houses.] Nov. 25. The king made the following Speech to both houses :

"My lords and gentlemen; I told you in the beginning of this session, how much I had been obliged to keep up my Forces in Flanders: That without it our neighbours had absolutely despaired, and by this means, whatever has been saved of Flanders, is acknowledged to be wholly due to my interposition. And I shewed you withal, that I had been forced to employ that Money which had been raised for the disbanding those troops, in the continuance of them together; and not only so, but that I had been much more out of purse for that service; a service by which the honour and interest of the nation have been so much improved, that as I am confident no man would repine at it, so I did not doubt but you would all be willing to supply it. I have now undergone this expence so long, that I find it absolutely impossible to support the charge any longer; and did therefore think of putting an end to that charge, by recalling my troops with all possible speed, who are already exposed to the utmost want and misery, being without any prospect of farther pay or subsistence. But whilst I was about to do this, I have been importuned by the Spanish ministers to continue them a little longer, until the ratifications of the peace be exchanged; without which, all that hath been hitherto saved in Flanders, will inevitably fall into the hands of their enemies. And now, between this importunity to keep up those troops, and my own inability to pay them any longer, I find myself in great difficulties what to resolve. If you do not think that the public safety may require the continuance, I do wish as heartily as any man, that for the public ease, they may be speedily disbanded, and paid off. I have thought fit thus to lay the matter before you; and having acquitted myself to all the world, by asking your advice and assistance, I desire it may be speedy, and without any manner of delay."

The Commons resolve to disband the Army.] Nov. 27. The commons proceeded to the consideration of the state of the nation, in relation to the Army; and resolved, nem. con. "That it is necessary for the safety of his majesty's person, and preservation of the peace of the government, that all the forces that have been raised since the 29th Sept. 1677, and all others that since that time have been brought over from beyond seas from foreign service, be forthwith disbanded." And farther in these words resolved, "It is the humble opinion and desire of the house, that the Forces which are now in Flanders, may be immediately called over, in order to their disbanding."

An Address to remove the Queen from Court.] Nov. 28. Mr. Sec. Coventry acquainted the house, that the Vote with relation to the disbanding the Army, had been presented to his majesty; which being a matter of great moment, he would consult and advise with his house of lords, before he would give an Answer. After which, Mr. Oates having delivered certain Informations to the house against the Queen*, the following address was immediately prepared, and ordered to the lords for their concurrence :

"We your majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the and commons in parliament assembled, having received Information, by several witnesses, of a most desperate and traiterous Design and Confederacy against the life of your most sacred majesty, wherein, to their great astonishment, the Queen is particularly charged, and accused; in discharge of our allegiance, and out of our affection and care for the preservation of your majesty's sacred person, and, consequently, of the whole kingdom, do most humbly beseech your majesty that the Queen, and all her family, and all papists, or reputed or suspected papists, be forthwith removed from your majesty's court at White-hall."

* "It was a known thing that his majesty was not over fond of his consort; and it was generally believed that he would have been glad of another, as well for the sake of issue, as variety. Here then was the fairest opportunity imaginable laid before him, to do what he was thought to desire most: A charge of high treason, brought home to her majesty's life by an overt-act, and supported by a brace of witnesses (Oates and Bedlow;) and all this at a time when the people were so exasperated against the presumptive heir, that any expedient, of any kind, to set him aside, would have met with a hearty welcome. But to the king's honour it ought to be remembered, that, instead of embracing it, he attended to the depositions with indignation; and was heard to say, 'They think I have a mind to a new wife; but, for all that, I will not see an innocent woman abused.' Certain it is, that, upon this occasion, he caused Oates to be clapped up in close confinement, his papers to be seized, his servants to be dismissed, and nobody to be admitted to converse with him, unless one of the clerks of the council was present." Ralph.

Oates had, in the same manner, charged the Queen upon oath before Mr. sec. Coventry, Nov. 24; which he also confirmed upon oath, the next day, before the king and council. Bedlow was before the council on the 27th. On which day Coleman was tried and convicted, on the evidence of Oates and Bedlow and his own letters. He was executed Dec. 3, and died without any confession.

Quarrel between the Lords Pembroke and Dorset.] This day, the lords being informed of a Quarrel which happened lately betwixt the earls of Pembroke and Dorset, It is ordered, that the gentleman usher of the black rod do give notice to the earl of Pembroke, that he attend this house presently; and that Mr. Lloyd and the footman be summoned to appear presently, to give this house an account thereof. In the mean time, the earl of Dorset gave the house an account, That on Wednesday last, late at night, the earl of Pembroke sent one Mr. Lloyd, who told him that the earl of Pembroke desired of him to speak with him at Mr. Locket's house: the earl of Dorset asked, whether the earl of Pembroke was sober; and was answered, yes; and when his lordship came, he found the earl of Pembroke in a low room; who told him, 'That he had done him an injury, therefore he would fight him:' the earl of Dorset asked him 'Where, and when?' The earl of Pembroke told him, 'Now in this room;' and then laid violent hands upon him; and the earl of Pembroke's footman took away his sword from his side; but Mr. Lloyd closed in and parted them, and so his lordship got loose from him.—The earl of Pembroke being come, standing in his place, the lord chancellor told him what an account the earl of Dorset had given to the house: the earl of Pembroke said, 'He remembered no such thing;' but confessed, 'he desired to speak with the earl of Dorset about business, and had no intent of fighting; and that the earl of Dorset had two men with him; and that his own servant took his sword away.' The house directed the earl of Dorset to relate again, in the presence of the earl of Pembroke, what passed betwixt them; then both these lords withdrew themselves.—The house taking this business into consideration, and how much the honour of this house was concerned therein, made the Order following: "For the better preservation of the peace, and preventing any mischiefs which may happen between the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset, It is ordered, That the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset be and are hereby confined to their respective houses or lodgings, till farther orders; and that they, or either of them, send not any message, or write to the other, during this confinement."—The next day they were both released on an intimation by the duke of Bucks that the Quarrel was made up.

Misunderstanding between the Marquis of Winton and the E. of Clarendon.] The same day the earl of Clarendon, being speaking in the debate the house was in concerning Titus Oates, took notice, that the marquis of Winton said, 'he lies, he lies;' of which words the house required the marq. of Winton to give an account: the marquis denied not the words, but begged the pardon of the house, that he was talking of other things whilst the house was in debate; and he said, he did not intend the words against the earl of Clarendon, and if he have offended the house he was sorry for it, and begged pardon for it.—Ordered, "That the marquis of Winton and the earl of Clarendon do not go out of the house until the house be adjourned." After which, the house laid their commands upon them not to carry their resentments any farther, concerning the business which happened that day.

The King refuses to pass the Militia Bill even for half an hour.] Nov. 30. The king came to the house and gave the royal assent to the Test-Bill against Popery, called 'An Act for the more effectual preserving the King's Person,' &c. of which he pleaded the merit, to excuse himself from passing the Militia-Bill, presented at the same time; which, he said, put the Militia for so many days out of his power, and that was what he would not comply with, though but for half an hour."

Address resolved on the State and Danger of the Nation.] Dec. 2. The commons ordered, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, containing a representation of the present State, and Dangers of this Nation, to be grounded on the following Heads, viz. 1. On the Misrepresentation of the Proceedings of this house. 2. On the dangers that have and may arise from private Advices, contrary to the advice of parliament. The house divided on this Article, and it was carried in the affirmative, Yeas 138, Noes 114. 3. On the great Danger the Nation lies under from the Growth of Popery. 4. On the Danger that may arise to his majesty and the kingdom, by the non-observation of the laws, that have been made for the preservation of the peace and safety of the king and kingdom*."

The King's Message concerning the Militia Bill.] Mr. Sec. Coventry delivered the following Message from his majesty:

"C. R. His majesty, to prevent all misunderstandings, that may arise from his not passing the late bill of the Militia, is pleased to declare, that he will readily assent to any bill of that kind, which shall be tendered to him, for the public security of the kingdom by the Militia, so as the whole power of calling, continuing, or not continuing of them together, during the time limited, be left to his majesty to do therein as he shall find it to be most expedient for the public safety."

Resolved, "That a committee be appointed,

* This says sir J. Kersey, p. 73, 'aimed at my Lord Treasurer, and some others of the Cabinet Council. This was carried by two-and-twenty votes, and even some of the courtiers were for it; whence it was by some surmised, that the duke, being no longer in council, was grown jealous of the Treasurer, and had a mind he should be removed. It was now said the duke had been persuaded (but unjustly) that his lordship endeavoured to insinuate into the king, that there was something of probability in the accusation against the queen, purely that he might hearken to a divorce, and marry another, more likely to bring children to the crown.'

to inspect precedents touching the methods and proceedings of parliament in passing of Bills; and to enquire, Whether, according to the methods of parliament, a Bill may be brought in, for making the Militia more useful; and to report their opinion to the house."

Five Popish Lords impeached, and committed to the Tower.] Dec. 5. The commons impeached the lord Arundel of Wardour, the earl of Powis, the lord visc. Stafford, the lord Petre, and the lord Bellasis, of High Treason, and other crimes and misdemeanours.—The Lord Chief Justice had in Oct. issued out his warrant for apprehending the said lords at the instance of the commons; which the lords being informed of by the said Chief Justice, they committed the said lords to the Tower by an Order of their own.*

A Supply granted for disbanding the Army.] Dec. 16. The house resolved, "That the Bill for granting a Supply to his majesty, for paying off, and Disbanding the Forces, &c. should pass; and that it should be entitled, 'An Act for granting a Supply to his majesty, of 206,462*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for the effectual Paying off, and Disbanding the Forces raised, or brought over from foreign parts, into this kingdom, since September 29, 1677."

A committee was then appointed, instantly to wait upon the king with this vote, who, upon their return, informed the house, That they had been to wait upon his majesty, according to order, who had sent them word out of the house of lords, that he was at that time very busy, and that his majesty had rather they would attend him at Whitehall, when the house was up.

Sir Jonathan Trelawney, prisoner in the Tower, (see p. 1048.) petitioned the house for leave to go into the country for recovery of his health; which was granted.

The King's Message informing the Commons that he had ordered Mr. Montagu's (a member) Papers to be seized.] Sir John Ernly, chancellor of the exchequer, acquainted the house, That he was commanded by the king to deliver this Message. "That his majesty having received Information, that his late Ambassador in France, Mr. Montagu †, a member of this house, had held several private Conferences

* The accusation against these lords was, upon the evidence of Titus Oates, for accepting commissions from the Pope. See Burnet, vol. 1. p. 430.

† Son of lord Montagu of Boughton, to which title he succeeded (on his father's death) in 1683: he was afterwards, for his eminent services, created by king William earl, and by queen Anne duke, of Montagu. He had been twice ambassador to the court of France, and in the house of commons was as zealous in promoting the Bill of Exclusion, as he was in the house of lords in forwarding the Revolution; soon after which he was appointed Master of the Great Wardrobe. He died in 1708.

with the pope's nuncio there, has, to the end that he may discover the truth of the matter, given order for the seizing Mr. Montagu's Papers*."

Debate thereon.] Serj. Maynard. I wish the like proceedings had been in other cases. Coleman had time to sort his Papers, and this diligence would have prevented it. I would let this matter alone awhile. The charge of corresponding with the pope's nuncio, borders upon treason very near; at least looks that way. Quicquid necessitas cogit, defendit. Correspondence of this nature sometimes may be justifiable.

Sir Tho. Lee. This is a high charge against your member. I would hear him in his place. Because he is a member he is not exempt from crimes.

Mr. Powle. No man can defend an ambassador's having correspondencies, or conferences, with the pope's nuncio. Montagu is a member of parliament; and it is an old rule, that, in treason, no private man, nor member's person, can be seized, before the accusation be given in upon oath: if not, any member may be taken from parliament. I would know, whether any legal information has been given against your member. This was a fatal case in the last king's time, of seizing members and their papers. I hope never to see the like again. If a great minister has a quarrel against a gentleman, and one go and tell the king a story of him to his prejudice, and his papers thereupon must be seized, I know not whether that will go. In the first place, I would be instructed from Ernly, whether there be any legal information against your member? and, if there be not, then you may consider what to do.

Mr. Hampden. I would have the notice from the king, by the honourable person, written down, as the very words delivered by him, by the clerk.

Sir John Ernly.] I said, 'the king had com-

* "The earl of Danby had broke with Montagu, but knowing what Letters he had wrote to him, and with what secrets he had trusted him, was apprehensive Montagu might accuse him; so he resolved to prevent him. Jenkins, who was then at Nimeguen, wrote over (according to a direction sent him, as was believed) 'that he understood Montagu had been in a secret correspondence, and in dangerous practices, with the pope's nuncio at Paris.' Montagu, it seems, had made use of him, and given him money, which he loved, for such secrets as he could draw from him. Upon Jenkins's letter the king sent the above Message. This was a device of lord Danby's, to find his own letters, and destroy them; and then to let the prosecution fall. But Montagu understood the arts of a court too well to be easily catched, and had put a box, in which those letters were, in sure hands, out of the way. A great debate arose upon this matter in the house of commons." Burnet.

manded me to let you know, that he having received information from abroad, that Mr. Montagu, his late ambassador, contrary to his Instructions, had held private Conferences with the pope's nuncio, he had caused his Papers to be seized, to the end that he may discover the matter.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am glad to hear that the ambassador had Instructions not to correspond with the pope's nuncio. I am very glad to hear it indeed, (jeeringly.) Sir Wm. Godolphin, the Spanish ambassador, is accused of high treason by Mr. Oates, and yet we hear nothing of him. Montagu's instructions will appear in the secretary's minutes. I would have Ernly answer, whether this Information be upon oath?

Sir John Ernly. I have told you what the king has commanded me; but I cannot be free to say farther, without leave. I do not say 'contrary to any Instructions,' but 'without any Instructions,' from his majesty.

Sir Wm. Coventry. The whole business will turn upon this hinge. The devil is as bad as the broth he is boiled in, the proverb is. Some of us, it may be, have sons at Rome, and they have kissed the pope's toe, and may be guilty of treason for that. I would have that explained.

Mr. Powle. I shall acquaint you from Mr. Montagu, that he will deliver all his own Papers himself; else papers for his own private defence may be embezzled. He will resign them to any hand this house shall appoint.

Mr. Bennet. If his Papers are seized, papers may be put into his cabinet, as well as taken out, to his great prejudice.

Mr. Powle. Five or six gentlemen, from Whitehall, have seized all the passages to Mr. Montagu's house, and his lady has sent him a letter of it.

Col. Birch. This is a mighty mystery, and the greatest business I have heard here. I should be very loth to make a wrong step in it here. I have always taken it for granted, that no member's Papers can be seized. I know not what haste they are in, in this matter, nor where it will end. Forty more members papers may be seized, at this rate, and the house garbled; and then the game is up. You have Information from Ernly of the thing, &c. and you may have as good information as this, against another member. The kingdom of France is in secretary Coventry's province; and I would have members to go to his office, to search the minutes for ambassador Montagu's Instructions, when he was sent into France.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would, in this matter, make tender steps. I see there is no harm in making an Address to the king about it, 'That he may let the house know whether there is any Information upon oath against Mr. Montagu.' If there be such information as the law warrants, I would sit down under it; if not, I would look to our privileges.

Col. Titus. If there be no Information upon oath, then it is a breach of privilege.

Sir Wm. Coventry. If we address the king, to know whether the Information be upon oath, it will so turn the thing upon us, that we shall know it. I agree with Birkenhead, that it is a great fault in an ambassador, an omission to give the king an account of public transactions that have passed through his hands. It may be through forgetfulness; but unpardonable, if the king calls for it, and the person does not give it. I have been abroad myself in popish countries, and may have conversed with nuncios. I have had the king's pardon, and my share in the last act of indemnity. An ambassador has nothing for his justification, but his papers; and his neck may go for it, if he has not his papers to justify himself. I should be loth to have my papers seized, though but for matter of reputation. I had rather have my shirt, than my papers, taken from me. Montagu desires only sorting of his papers, and that he may mark them, and he will deliver them to such as you shall approve of, and that he may mark them, and set them in order, to make his defence the better. Otherwise any minister, employed in foreign negotiations, is in a desperate condition.

Mr. Powle. I would not have his Papers tumbled and tossed about, before you know whether the Information against him be upon oath. The ministers heretofore answered for ill actions in the government, but now they put them all upon the king.

Mr. Vaughan. If Papers are seized at this rate, a great many of your members papers may be seized, because some men are guilty of high treason.

The Speaker. The thing is of great moment, and the king has told you why he has caused the Papers to be seized; and Montagu has told you, 'he has received a letter from his lady, that his house is guarded, &c.' but they are not to be seized till Montagu comes to his house to sort the papers. You concern not yourselves in matters of state, but matters of privilege. 'Till you know that his charge is not upon oath, you ought to believe that the matter is upon oath. It is a nice thing, and I know the stress and consequence of it. It may be, I know the thing and matter of it. And if no-body is more capable to advise than myself, I would have you expect the issue.

Mr. Powle. What I moved is, because the thing yet is in possibility of recall. It is plain that his Papers are sent to be seized. The rights and privileges of parliament are the greatest strength and security of the king and the nation. I think it a very dutiful way to know what the thing is. Therefore you cannot go a better than to send to the king, &c. before we rise.

Mr. Williams. If you adjourn, you submit your privilege to the king's pleasure. I cannot give my opinion, whether it is a breach of privilege, or not, till you have the thing entirely before you. I would know what this Information is against your member. I know, by the aw of England, there is no distinction of state reason, felony, or breach of the peace, against which there is no privilege. It is not every reach of the peace that a member may be seized upon, &c. where there is no more required than security, &c.—And he ought to have the privilege of an Englishman. He that will be ridden shall be ridden. Therefore I would address, &c.

Sir Rob. Howard. Suppose you go to the king, and say, 'What is it you know of Montagu?' That is too early, and yet your member as his house seized. In this there is difficulty every way. It seems, a reference is made by Montagu to see whether the charge be true in his Papers. Shall your member forbear, and give up his Papers? That you will not do. Your member has offered to give up his Papers, and to mark them, that they may be no injury to him. Therefore I would have some of your members accompany Montagu, that he may sort his Papers.

Col. Titus. If the Information be upon oath, and it be neither felony, treason, nor breach of the peace, your privilege is violated. With this Message moved for, I would have no other, viz. 'Of what nature this conference with the pope's nuncio was.'

Sir John Knight. Conferences have been held at Whitehall with Father Patrick, and Father Howard, and other priests. I would have that enquired into likewise.

Sir Tho. Meres. Whoever has had private conference with the pope's nuncio, now in the Tower, I would seize all their Papers, near and all—of whom I will tell you to-morrow; some of their Papers, upon what I say, will be laid aside. Let it go where it will; let the subject-matter against Montagu be seen, if proved true; that this may not be a precedent upon this house for the future. I would therefore beseech the king to suspend any farther proceeding upon Montagu, till this house be satisfied whether the Information be given upon oath; and whether the subject of that conference was treason.

Sir Wm. Coventry. I am against the whole thing; either sending to the king to know what the crimes are, or whether upon oath, believe there are persons that put the king upon this (as I believe it done by advice) and I believe it is not treason he is charged with, because they have not seized Mr. Montagu's person, as well as his Papers, which was the properest thing to be done. He may be guilty, or may be innocent; possibly the thing will be put farther. But to take away his armour that must defend him, a little thrust will destroy him. The very law gives him his Papers to justify himself by, not only for his commissions but omissions. His Papers to be delivered out of his hands clearly away, is a very dangerous thing. I would be glad to hear something from Montagu himself. It has been proposed, 'that some of the members may go with him to sort his Papers.' If there be any Papers relating to the pope's nuncio, they may be copied out, and Montagu may keep the originals and the rest of the Papers.

Sir John Ernly. Montagu knows something of the nature. In all these cases there are warrants of the same nature. You may send for the warrant, and you will find these Papers are to be seized before reasonable evidence, and that the Papers be so scheduled, as that the gentleman may have no prejudice.

Sir Tho. Lec. The Papers being seized by the king's warrant, may be looked upon as in the king's actual possession. By the king's order so much appears, that persons are at Montagu's house, &c. This is your tenderness to them that have advised the king to this, or some others, that may hereafter, that you may avoid all occasion of offence. You are told of a conference with the pope's nuncio, that he has had. Therefore the Papers were ordered to be seized, to know the truth of the matter. Then it seems, those Papers are seized to see whether those Informations are treason, or no; therefore in this you go the most moderate way. The consequence will be, you will see your member tried, and sit still till it be done; and no matter how soon you see Montagu guilty or not guilty. And so there will be nothing upon your Books to hurt parliaments in eternal consequence. Therefore I would have this Message sent to the king, to prevent declaring what your privileges are in this matter.

Mr. Powle. You are past that consideration. Now the question is, Whether you will go with this second part. It is not so decent to go often to the king. You are not yet ripe to desire the king to desist proceeding, for you know not what the thing is yet, and that may be quickly done, when you know.

Mr. Harbord was sent to Mr. Montagu's house to inform the house of the proceedings, &c. who gave this account: "That, by order of council, Montagu's cabinets were seized, but were not to be opened till Montagu was present. And that they were taken away, and set in a chamber near the council chamber."

Mr. Montagu. I believe, that the seizing my cabinets and Papers was to get into their hands some Letters of great consequence, that I have to produce, of the designs of a Great Minister of State.*

Mr. Harbord. This has been intended 3 or 4 days, but, I believe, they have missed of their aims; and I would not for 40,000*l.* they had those Papers. And, freely, this was my great inducement to stir so much to make Mr. Montagu a member of this house. In due time

* See the last Note.

† "Mr. Montagu aspiring to the office of Secretary of State, took it very ill that the Treasurer had engaged to bring in sir Wm. Temple. Mr. Montagu was the Treasurer's most dangerous enemy, because he had private Letters in his hands from that minister; and though he could not divulge them without great injury to the king, this gave him no uneasiness, because resolving to throw himself you will see what those Papers are. They will open your eyes, and though too late to cure the evil, yet they will tell you who to proceed against, as the authors of our misfortunes. I desire that some persons of honour and worth may be present at the opening these Cabinets, lest some of these Letters should be there. For they are of the greatest consequence that ever you saw.

Mr. Bennet. The sum the gentleman speaks of, 40,000*l.*, is a great deal of money. But pray let these Papers be forth-coming for your use. As for the breach of our privileges, &c. this thing was thrown in to blind us. I know my share of transactions too, and you shall in time know of it.

Sir Gilbert Gerrard. This business is of great consequence, and I hope may save us. I would address the king, 'That these Cabinets may not be opened, but may be produced here to-morrow, that we may proceed upon them.'

Col. Titus. To seize Papers thus is very illegal. Any man's may be seized at this rate. I look upon this as one of the wisest actions the ministers have done. Were I one of them, right or wrong I would have seized Montagu's Papers. I second the motion, 'That the Papers, &c. may be produced here to-morrow.' And then I believe you will see why those Papers were seized.

Sir Nick. Carew. I would sit on, and let the Papers in Montagu's hands be brought now, and if they concern any man, under his majesty himself, I would prosecute the thing now. I know not whether we shall be here to-morrow morning, or no. It may be, we shall be all clapped up by to-morrow. Let Montagu therefore be commanded to bring in his Papers now, before you rise.

*Sir John Lowther. For ought I know, Montagu may be served as sir E. Godfrey was; therefore I would not have him go out of the house for the Papers. He knows by what practices these negotiations with France have been done. I am of opinion that we shall not sit here to-morrow. I move therefore to have the Papers sent for now.

Sir Henry Capel. I second that motion. We know what practices have been in the late times, &c. how Papers of members have been seized. The king has power on his subjects, into the party against the court, which was most prevalent in the parliament, he knew he should be protected even against the king himself. To this end he got himself elected member for Northampton, and suddenly leaving Paris without the king's consent or knowledge, came to London, and took his seat in the house." Rapin.

* Created lord visc. Lonsdale by king William, in 1696, having been very instrumental in the Revolution, by securing the city of Carlisle, and bringing over the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland. He was also in that reign vice-chamberlain of the household, lord privy seal, &c. and died in 1700, aged 45.

but it is according to law. I wondered at the proceeding of the Sheriff of Northamptonshire at Montagu's election; but now it is all out; we know the reason of it. He may give us much light into transactions. Lowther has awakened you with the case of Godfrey, which is of great importance. I know not what may become of us to-morrow; therefore I would have Montagu's Papers brought to-night.

Lord Cavendish. I believe, it will appear by those Papers, that the war with France was pretended, for the sake of an Army, and that a great man carried on the interest of an Army and Popery; and Montagu gives you the convenience of this discovery. I move therefore, 'That he bring the Papers in as soon as can be.'

Col. Titus. I suppose Montagu has those Papers in his custody; else neither he nor his friends would have informed you of them. I would therefore have some members go with him to fetch them.

Lord Russell. Montagu has imparted some of the contents of those Papers to me; and I was required by him not to impart them to any body; but now it is no secret. Montagu cannot come at the originals, for the present, but he has a copy of them.

Lord Danby's Letters produced.] Mr. Harbord and some others were ordered (Mr. Montagu having acquainted the house that he had in his custody some Papers which concern the Peace of the Government) to receive directions from Mr. Montagu where to find those Papers. The house sat till the gentlemen returned with Mr. Montagu's Papers. Then Mr. Harbord reported, 'That they had repaired to the place where Mr. Montagu directed them, and had brought the Box of Papers which he mentioned; but that the key is carried to Whitehall, locked up in the Cabinets; and that they have sent for a smith to break it open.' Mr. Montagu went up to sort the Papers.

Mr. Montagu. I am sorry that so great a minister has brought this guilt upon himself. It was my intention (making reflections upon your apprehension of a standing Army) to have acquainted Mr. sec. Coventry with the Papers. I will now only tell you, that the king has been as much deluded as the Dutch or Spain; and you have been deluded too by this great minister. This I should not have done, out of duty and respect to the king, but by command of the house.

The Box being ordered to be opened, Mr. Montagu selected and presented to the house two Letters, which were read by the Speaker, the one dated Jan. 16, 1677-8; the other March 25, 1678. The principal matter therein is contained in these words: "In case the conditions of peace shall be accepted, the king expects to have six millions of livres (300,000*l.*) yearly, for 3 years, from the time that this agreement shall be signed between his majesty and the king of France; because it will be 2 or 3 years before he can hope to find his parliament in humour to give him supplies, after your having made any peace with France, &c." Subscribed "DARBY." "To the Secretary you must not mention one syllable of the money." [At the bottom of this Letter were these words: "THIS LETTER IS WRIT BY MY ORDER. * C. R.*"]

Debate thereon.] Mr. Bennet. I wonder the house sits so silent when they see themselves sold for six millions of livres to the French. Some things come home to treason in construction. I would have the lawyers tell you, whether this you have heard be not worthy impeaching the Treasurer of Treason. Now we see who has played all this game; who has repeated all the sharp Answers to our Addresses, and raised an Army for no war. You know now who passes by the secretaries of state. I would impeach the Treasurer of high treason.

Mr. Williams. Will any member aver this to be the Treasurer's letter?

Mr. Montagu. I conceive it to be the Treasurer's hand. I have had several letters from him of the same hand.

Mr. Williams. If this be his Letter, there cannot be a more constructive Treason than is contained in it. You have heard of Religion and Property apprehended in danger, in several speeches. But when your laws are contemned by a Great Minister, and they miscarry and are laid dead—(A great cry of the house, 'Name him, name him.') The letters name the person sufficiently. Nothing ought to be imputed to the king, but this man, unless he clears himself upon somebody else, must take this crime upon him. This project of peace is what you have prophesied all along. This agrees with Coleman's Letters, this great engine Money. Now when this great person is on this point to make parliaments useless, it is Treason. And the parliament may declare a treason, without making any. For any minister to destroy a confederacy, and to make the king a pensioner to France, I would impeach him of Treason.

Mr. Harbord. I hope now gentlemen's eyes are open, by the design on foot to destroy the government and our liberties. I believe, if the house will command Mr. Montagu, he will tell you more now. But I would not press it now upon him, because poisoning and stabbing are in use. Therefore I would not examine him farther now, but let him reserve himself till the matter comes to trial before the lords. As to the danger of the king's person, there is something much more extraordinary. But I will not name him yet. The thing has taken wind. A witness has been taken off with 300*l.* and denies his hand. I protest, I am afraid that the king will be murdered every night. A peer, and an intimate of this earl's, said, 'There would be a change in the government in a year.' He has poisons both liquid and in powders. But I would ask Montagu no more questions now, but have an Impeachment drawn up, and I doubt not but this great man will have condign punishment, when the matter comes before the lords.

* "These last words made very much for Mr. secretary Coventry; since now it appeared that he was not trusted with these ill practices." Burnet.

Sir Henry Goodrick. We now come upon Impeachment of a noble peer, who deserves well of the nation, and I assure you, has promoted the protestant religion, and has honour for the government. I put Harbord upon it, that all the evidence against him may be produced, and make it out who converses with this nobleman, that has 'the poisons' he mentions. For the king's security, I would have the persons named.

Mr. Bennet. I accuse my Lord Treasurer of High Treason, and I will bring other matters against him.

Sir John Hammer. The king's life is concerned, and I cannot sit still when I hear 'poison' spoken of. I would find this poisoner out; else he betrays the nation and the king.

Mr. Harbord. If you please, I will tell Mr. sec. Coventry who it is; but I assure you, it is told the king already.

Sir John Knight. This Army was raised for a French war, and so many hundred thousand pounds given for that purpose, and yet we had no war! Money given to disband the Army, and that not done! The popish Plot discovered at that time! And all runs parallel. Take such evil counsellors from the king, that have done these things, and he, and his posterity, and we all shall flourish: else we shall be destroyed.

Sir Edm. Jennings. As to the matter in the Lord Treasurer's letter, thus I will state the question: 'Whether there be matter in that Letter to ground an Impeachment against this lord.' As to the other thing, "of poisoning," the king's person is so nearly concerned, that I would have the person known for the king's sake, and all our own sakes. If not, then let us adjourn.

Mr. Harbord. If I was not well satisfied that the king had known of it, I would have found means to acquaint the king. But the design of moving this is to divert the question. The design I had, in not naming the person, was, that it might be impossible for the person to avoid being taken off, since the king knows it already, and a member knows the thing, and I have seen the things. But the party fell off from his evidence. The king knows it, and if you will know him too, I am not afraid to name him. He had the poison, and tried it upon dogs with good success. The first thing I said was, 'Does the king know of it?' He told me 'he did, and he had been offered a sum of money to conceal it.' There has been 200,000*l.* in 13 months paid out of the exchequer, for secret service; and vast sums of money diverted out of the course of payment in the exchequer.

Col. Titus. I find it a hard matter, and very dangerous, to accuse a Treasurer. The righteous or unrighteous mammon makes friends. There has been 197,000*l.* issued out of the 200,000*l.* we gave, by one person that is a member. This lord had once an Impeachment against him upon an illegal patent. First, we could get no witnesses, &c. And all we got by it, was to vote, 'That this patent was not illegal.' Never any thing prospered in his ministry. There is not a penny of money in the exchequer, and I am sure he is Treasurer. Now whether this lord, with the interest of France, has not carried on his own? When the king of Spain was in the circumstances the king of France now is, if Walsingham and Burleigh, instead of supporting H. iv. of France, had supported the League, and made the king of Spain greater than he was, (who was ten times too great for us,) had not they been good counsellors for Philip ii. and ill counsellors for queen Elizabeth? It was said by Philip de Comines, 'That all king Lewis of France's ministers did ride upon one horse.' Now we were told of 'a war,' and 'an actual war with France,' an army was raised for it, and a shameful peace made up with France. And the Lord Treasurer thinks he deserves six millions of livres for doing it; and so no occasion for the parliament to meet in 3 years. The Lord Treasurer, it seems, was of one opinion; the parliament and the law of another. His crime is great, and tends to the subversion of the nation, and so it is, when the king shall have no parliaments: Some fear the Treasurer, and some love him; I do neither, and would impeach him.

Mr. John Ernly. Titus tells you, 'That nothing has prospered under the Lord Treasurer's ministry.' He has paid, I am sure, a great part of the debt of two millions upon the exchequer. As for his ministry, pray God send we have no worse French counsellors! And if we had war then, God knows what would have become of us. If this lord has hatched these councils, France is not for him. But I am the most mistaken, if he has not been opposite to France. Now for the Letter that speaks of the Money; if it had been ten times as much, I could have wished it with France. As for the peace, it was made by the Confederates, and not the king. The Confederates have, all along, importuned the king not to lay aside the Army, for all Flanders would be lost. I am as little for an Army as any man; and am for having it disbanded, if the king had money to pay them off. Does not this Letter come by way of recrimination? It is necessary to see Mr. Montagu's Answer to this Letter. I would have the lawyers debate it, before you come to this matter as a charge against this lord; barely given you by recrimination. The king's safety is concerned; and I desire, that the person that should have poisoned him, be named. You cannot absolve yourselves from it.

Mr. Cha. Bertie. I affirm that my Lord Treasurer paid 600,000*l.* of old arrears out of the Exchequer. And I appeal to the Speaker's Office in the Navy. So in this he has not squandered the Treasury in secret service.

Mr. Montagu. My Lord Treasurer has my Answer to his Letter. And let him, if he please, produce a copy of that letter, and you find, that if my advice had been followed, the army had not been raised, and a better peace made. And I aver, that the French king offered our king some money, and more towus, than when we were in conjunction with France. 'I find my Lord Treasurer has so much the sweet of being treasurer of England, that he would be treasurer of France too.' This the king of France said, and so would treat no longer. I was for peace, because I saw no intention of our ministers for war, and so would have had no army. I brought the conditions so far as that the French should deliver Valenciennes and Conde to the Spaniards; but better conditions than now they have; far after the army was raised, they were for peace. If I have done ill in this, impeach me for it.

In the other Letter which was read, subscribed "Danby," were the following passages: "Your intelligence concerning M. Rouvigny has not been the least of your favours. For my part I will contribute to the friendship of the two kings. We depend upon an Adjournment of 13 days, to see if there can be any expedient for the peace in that time. And the effect of that Adjournment has been, that every body apprehended peace, &c."

Lord Dumbtain*. Montagu, in his discourse in France, has given the nation great commendations. I have heard him say, 'the house of commons had a company of loggerheads and boobies in it.' For what my father is accused of, if proved, I would not spare him nor pardon him more than the greatest rascal that had done me the most injury.

Mr. Peregrine Bertie. Put the question first, about "poisoning the king."

Sir Henry Capel. I have no article against any man, but only from my observations of the government. We have sat here all seasons of the year to no purpose. I have something to say, let it fall where it will; and I will serve no man here, but my king and my country. We that are of common understanding, know not foreign notions, nor mysteries of state at home. If Religion, the Government and Property be safe, we sit down and enjoy what we have, and thank God for it. If foreign negotiations have been prosperous, let it be spoken of. Has the Protestant Religion gone forward? I would gladly know, whether the Exchequer is in good order as we have been told. I know what sums we have given; but if it be not in such order, are we to sit still? Does not France increase upon us? We were no sooner got out of the War with Holland, but assistances of men were sent into France to reuten the French king. We can get no bills of Popery passed. These last four or five years, we have had nothing but Prorogations and Adjournments of the parliament, without doing any thing to purpose. If we had lived well with this great man, and not made the vote the last session, 'That till the Tax, &c. expired, and the Protestant Religion secured, and all Ministers, &c. removed, we could give no more Money, &c.' But the king as been persuaded that a prince must depend upon a party, and he is told that we proceeded in 1641 and 1642. Is any thing more clear than the concurrence of the Letters, that have been produced you by Montagu, with Coleman's Papers? This minister has let the French grow upon us, and let our king take money from him, to lay aside his people; this has been Danby's advice. If the gentlemen of the long robe will say this is Treason, I say so, and shall think this a ground to impeach him.

* The Lord Treasurer's son; called up to the house of lords in 1690, by the title of lord Kiveton. He succeeded to the dukedom of Leeds (on his father's death) in 1712, distinguished himself in the sea-service, being vice admiral of the red, and died in 1789, aged 71.

Mr. Solicitor Winnington. Before I meddle with the Treasurer's Letters, I will speak to the point of declaratory Treason. I have a wife and children, and some estate, and loyalty to my prince, and I hope to leave it to my posterity. In this matter I shall deliver my opinion, and I fear no man alive, let it fall where it will. By 25 E. iii. declaratory Treason, is only in parliament, where those things shall be declared Treason, for the Judges to proceed upon, and no other. I will put you a familiar example: the killing of John Imperial, the Genoa ambassador, was declared Treason. It was treason at common law before, but after that statute they had recourse to parliament for the same crime, and they declared it so. It has been the wisdom of parliament to keep the power of declaring Treason in themselves, to bridle great men, who by friendship and authority, may avoid justice. Since I came into this house, which is about three years since, I have been present at several Addresses, &c. and I would not show unkindness, in the post I am in, to my superior officer. If a member does undertake to prove an Article, &c. though it be but probable, it is a ground for a grand jury to find the bill, (and in Impeachments you are of that nature,) but the judgment is still in the lords. If any subject impeach any man, it is our duty to receive it, as a grand jury. But gentlemen put a hard thing on the long robe, in this case. The Treasurer, in his Letters to Mr. Montagu, says, 'He must not communicate it to the Secretary of State. He must not know of the six millions of livres yearly, &c. that so there may be no need of a parliament.' If this be given as a case to a lawyer, and if this be to destroy parliament, and the fundamental laws of the kingdom; if there be concomitant evidence that the thing was done with intention; if you have power of declaratory Treason, and do not declare this to be treason, you will declare nothing. I have heard Montagu say he has more Letters to produce. Suppose you should vote not to impeach the Treasurer upon these Letters; the common people will say, 'Have not the house impeached him?' How can any member look the world in the face? finding that this is in order to trial, and in order to impeachment. The Lord Treasurer is my superior, but if you pass by this, you may have more such Letters and such practices. There have been other matters alleged against this lord, as diverting the Money, &c. from the usual course of payment in the Exchequer, &c. This is but a small matter in comparison of Treason: but such as have done these things, the parliament has either broken their backs, or they have ran for it. As for giving Money to Members, to vote in this house, he will have the shame of it, and I hope it will be seen by the vote this night, that no man has received any money. Certainly these things are not so mean as to be put off. Without probable evidence, you have no ground of accusation. As for conviction, that is to be done in another place. And I am for impeaching him.

Mr. Sacheverell. I have observed the debate; and I take notice that no fault is found out that it is too forward. No man denies these Letters to be the Treasurer's, and yet gentlemen say, 'There is no matter of charge in them against him.' I have not been a man much for shifting hands in the ministry: I see all that come after are as bad as those that went before. By way of defence of the Treasurer, it is said, 'That he found much debt upon the crown, and has paid off a great deal.' It is true. But there was 1,250,000*l.* granted to the king, &c. before he came in to be Treasurer, but he received a great share of it. I would not now charge him singly upon these Letters, but upon the whole pursuance of the thing: he shows you, that, as the rest of the ministers have done great kindness to France, he will do nothing to break that friendship. When we had given a great sum of money for a war with France, then he takes Coleman's way. And it was a great sum of money for England to pay. Give money hastily and no war, and there will be no need of a parliament. This is the only difference; Pensions are not now matter of record. It seems by the Treasurer's Letter, that it is the king's ease to have no parliament. Hereafter let us keep our purses, and we shall have good ministers in time. And let us remember we shall not then have ministers to prorogue us at their pleasure, at the same time that the king was told that war was necessary; and that he might have had a better peace, and an Army was raised, to the great charge of the nation. Let gentlemen give their No to the Impeachment, I will give my Aye to it.

Mr. Vaughan. I envy no man's greatness nor fortune that lessens not his prince's. From the grounds of this Letter of the Treasurer, on the 20th of March, the king passed an Act for a war with France, and an Army was raised accordingly. This Letter is dated the 26th of March, to stipulate peace with the French. And is this matter of recrimination by Montagu, as is said? You give money for an actual war, and the Treasurer stipulates for a peace, and the ministers make peace. The Papists would have a dissolution of the parliament, and these men make it useless. I know very little difference in it. King John's ministers made him a pensioner to the Pope, and it is as great a crime to make our king pensioner to the French king. I am therefore for impeaching the Treasurer.

The question being put, "That there is matter sufficient in these Letters, &c. to impeach Thomas earl of Danby;" the previous question was put and carried, 179 to 116. The main question was then carried in the affirmative, and a committee was appointed to prepare and draw up Articles of Impeachment.*

Resolved, "That Mr. Speaker shall not, at any time, adjourn the house, without a question first put if it be insisted upon. And that this be entered in the Journals as a Standing Order of the house."

Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Danby.] Dec. 21. Mr. Williams reported the Articles of Impeachments against the Lord Treasurer Danby, as followeth:

Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other High Crimes, Misdemeanors, and Offences, against Thomas earl of Danby, Lord High-Treasurer of England.

I. "That he hath traiterously encroached to himself regal power, by treating in matters of Peace and War with foreign princes and ambassadors, and giving Instructions to his majesty's ambassadors abroad, without communicating the same to the secretaries of state, and the rest of his majesty's Council; and against the express declaration of his majesty and his parliament; thereby intending to defeat and overthrow the provisions which had been deliberately made by his maj. and his parliament, for the safety and preservation of his majesty's kingdoms and dominions.—II. That he hath

* "The next day the Lord Treasurer sent Mr. Montagu's Letters of the 11th and 18th of Jan. likewise before quoted; the first giving notice of young Rouvigny's Journey to England, and his practices among the malcontents: and the last, among other things, mentioning old Rouvigny's maxim, That they (the French) must first diminish the Lord Treasurer's credit, before they could do any good in England. These Letters, his lordship himself affirms, the house of commons would not permit to be read: but John Kearsby affirms the contrary, in his Memoirs, as doth also one of his lordship's own Apologists; and even the Journals of the House of commons. But if they were read, they had no weight: Mr. Montagu had all the favour usually shewn to those who impeach their accomplices, and was thought to act so meritoriously in the discovery, that no body cared to reflect that he himself was the chief promoter of the guilt." Ralph.

traiterously endeavoured to subvert the ancient and well-established Form of Government in this kingdom; and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical way of government. And the better to effect this his purpose, he did design the Raising of an Army, upon pretence of a War against the French king; and then to continue the same as a Standing Army within this kingdom: and an army being so raised, and no war ensuing, an act of parliament having passed to pay off and disbend the same, and a great sum of money being granted for that end, he did continue the army contrary to the said act, and misemployed the said money given for disbanding, to the continuance thereof; and issued out of his majesty's revenue divers great sums of money for the said purpose; and wilfully neglected to take security from the paymaster of the Army, as the said act required; whereby the said law is eluded, and the army is yet continued, to the great danger and unnecessary charge of his maj. and the whole kingdom.—III. That he, traiterously intending and designing to alienate the hearts and affections of his majesty's good subjects from his royal person and government, and to hinder the Meeting of Parliaments, and to deprive his sacred maj. of their safe and wholesome councils, and thereby to alter the constitution of the government of this kingdom, did propose and negotiate a Peace for the French king, upon terms disadvantageous to the interest of his maj. and his kingdoms: for the doing whereof he did endeavour to procure a great sum of money from the French king, for enabling of him to carry on and maintain his said traiterous designs and purposes to the hazard of his majesty's person and government.—IV. That he is possibly affected; and hath traiterously concealed, after he had notice, the late horrid and bloody Plot and Conspiracy contrived by the Papists against his majesty's person and government; and hath suppressed the evidence, and reproachfully discountenanced the king's witnesses in the discovery of it, in favour of popery; immediately tending to the destruction of the king's sacred person, and the subversion of the Protestant religion.—V. That he hath wasted the king's Treasure by issuing out of his majesty's Exchequer, and several branches of his revenue, for unnecessary Pensions and Secret Services, to the value of £51,602*l.* within two years: and that he hath wholly directed, out of the known method and government of the Exchequer, one whole branch of his majesty's Revenue to private uses, without any account to be made of it to his majesty in the exchequer, contrary to the express act of parliament which granted the same: and he hath removed two of his majesty's commissioners of that part of the revenue, for refusing to consent to such his unwarrantable actings therein, and to advance money upon that branch of the revenue, for private uses.—VI. That he hath by indirect means procured from his majesty for himself, divers considerable Gifts and Graces of inheritance of the ancient Revenue of the crown, even contrary to acts of parliament”

On reading the first Article a second time, the question was put, that the Articles be committed, which passed in the negative, Yeas 137, Noes 179. The house divided next on a motion for Candles, which passed in the affirmative, Yeas 165, Noes 115. The house again divided on a motion to leave out the word ‘traitorously’ in the first Article, which passed in the negative, Noes 179, Yeas 141. On a Resolution that lord Danby should be impeached on the above-recited Articles, a motion was made to adjourn, but over-ruled, Yeas 143, Noes 170. The last division during this grand debate, was on a motion whether the said lord should be impeached, on the 4th Article, and it was carried in the affirmative, Yeas 143, Noes 119*.

The Earl of Danby’s vindicating Speech in the House of Lords.] Dec. 23. The commons carried up the Impeachment to the lords. Upon the reading of which, a motion being made for his lordship to withdraw, it was over-ruled by a majority of 20; after which, his lordship rose up and made a formal Speech in his own vindication, in substance as follows:

“My Lords; I know this is not the time for me to enter regularly upon my Defence, because I know your lordships will first order me a copy of my Charge, and appoint me a time for my vindication; when I doubt not to do it to the full satisfaction of your lordships, and all the world. In the mean time I will only beg leave to observe to your lordships, that those Articles in this Charge which seem to have any thing of Treason in them, have their Answer so obvious, that there is very little in them, which may not be answered by many others, as well as myself, and some of them by every man in the kingdom. The 1st, which is the assuming of Regal Power, I confess, I do not understand; having never in my life done any thing of great moment, either at home, or relating to foreign matters, for which I have not always had his majesty’s command. And though I am far from having been the most cautious man in taking care of my own security, (which perhaps my great innocence hath been the cause of,) yet I have not been so wanting of common prudence, as in the most material things not to have had his majesty’s orders and directions under his own hand, and particularly for the letters now made use of against me. The 2d, I think, does scarce need my giving any Answer to; it being obvious, that the Army was no more raised by me, than by every lord in this house: and whoever is in that station which I hold, must certainly be a fool, to desire any thing which creates a want of Money, especially so great a one, as the Charge of an Army must necessarily and immediately produce. And so for one part of the Article concerning the Pay-Master of the Army, it is in fact otherwise; for security from the pay-master has been taken in the sum of 400,000*l.* The 3d, is of the same nature with the first, and comes from the same foundation, which is, what a gentleman hath thought fit to produce to the house of commons. I will not now censure his actions, I think it will do enough for itself; I will only say, that though I take it for one of the greatest misfortunes which can befall a man, to lie under such a Charge of the house of commons, yet I would much sooner chuse to be under that unhappiness, than under his circumstances. The 4th Article is not only false in every part of it, but it is not possible to believe it true, without my being the greatest fool on earth, as well as the blackest villain. For were I capable of such wickedness, yet the more wicked any man is, the more he is carried to his own interest; and is it possible any thing under heaven can agree less with my interest, than the destruction of this king? Can I possibly hope to be better than I am? And is it not apparent, that there is not one man living, whose happiness depends so much as mine upon the preservation of his person? My lords, I know there is not one man in the world, that can in his heart think me guilty of that part of the Article, if I should say nothing to it. But, besides, I was so far from concealing this hellish Plot, that it is notoriously known, his majesty sent me the first notice of it, together with 43 Heads of the Information, before I knew a syllable of it from any body else: and it hath been owned at the bar of the house of commons by him, from whom only I had the intelligence, ‘That he had all the encouragement and dispatch from me, that I could give him.’ Besides, when it was disclosed to the Council board, he told some of the clerks of the council, as he had done me divers times before, ‘That it would have been much better, and more would have been discovered, if it had been longer kept private.’ Besides this, I had the fortune to be particularly instrumental in seizing Mr. Coleinan’s Papers, without which care, there had not one of them appeared; and consequently, the best and most material evidence which is yet of the Plot, had been wholly wanting. And certainly this is the first time that any man was accused to be the concealer of that Plot, whereof he hath been the principal means of procuring the discovery. For that part of the Article that says, I am ‘popishly affected,’ I thank God, that the contrary is so well known to all the world, that even some of those that voted against me, did own their knowledge of the falsity of that allegation; and I hope I have, through my whole life, given so good testimony of my religion, both in my own family, and by my services to the Church, whenever it hath laid in my power, that I shall not need much vindication in that particular: and I hope your lordships will forgive me my weakness, in telling you, that I have a younger son in the house of commons, whom I shall love the better as long as I live, for moving to have that part of the Article to stand against me, 'That by that pattern it might appear, with what sort of zeal the whole hath been carried on to my prejudice.'—The fifth Article will, upon examination, appear to be as ill gounded as any of the rest; and I am sorry I am able to give one reason; which is, That I have known no treasure in my time to waste, having entered upon an empty Treasury, and never seen one farthing given to his majesty, in almost six years, that hath not been appropriated to particular uses, and strictly so applied by me, as the acts have directed. And there hath not been one of those Aids, which, instead of giving the king money, hath not cost him more out of his own purse to the same uses, as doth appear by the larger dimensions of the new ships, and so in other things: Inasmuch, that I take upon me the vanity to say, that, by the payments I have made to the navy and seamen beyond former times; the paying off the greatest part of the debt which was stopped in the Exchequer before my time, by my punctuality in the course of payments, and by other things which I am able to shew, I doubt not to appear meritorious, instead of being criminal upon that Article.—As to the 6th Article, which mentions my 'great gettings,' I cannot deny but that I serve a master, whose goodness and bounty hath been a great deal more to me than I have deserved, and to whom I can never pay gratitude enough by all the services of my life. But when the particulars of those gettings shall appear, it will be found very contrary to what is suggested abroad; and that, in near six years time in this great place, I have not got half that, which many others have got in lesser places in half that time. And from the examination of this, which I desire may be seen, there will arise matter to accuse my prudence, in not having done for my family what justly I might; but nothing to arraign my honour, my conscience, or my faithful service to the crown.—My Lords, If my obedience to the king shall not be my crime, I think nothing else will stick upon me from these Articles: for my own heart flatters me to believe, that I have done nothing but as a Protestant, and a faithful servant, both to my king and country. Nay, I am as confident, as that now I speak, that, had I been either a Papist, or friend to the French, I had not been now accused. For I have reason to believe, that the principal informer of the house of commons hath been assisted by the French advice to this accusation; and if that gentleman were as just to produce all he knows for me, as he hath been malicious to shew what may be liable to misconstruction against me, or rather against the king, as indeed it is, no man could vindicate me more than himself; under whose hand I have to shew, 'how great an enemy to France I am thought; how much I might have been otherwise; and what he himself might have had for getting me to take it.' But I do not wonder this gentleman will do me no right, when he does not think fit to do it to his majesty, upon whom chiefly this matter doth reflect: though he knows, as will appear under his hand, 'That the greatest invitations to his majesty for having money from France, have been made by himself; that, if his majesty would have been tempted for money, he might have sold towns for as much as if they had been his own, and the money have been conveyed as privately as he pleased; that his majesty might have made Matches with France, if he would have consented to have given them towns;' and yet, that the king hath always scorned to yield the meanest village, that was not agreed to by the Spaniard and Hollander. That gentleman hath often pretended 'how much his own interest in France was diminished, only by being thought my friend.' And, besides divers other instances, I have under his hand to shew the malice of the French court against me, I sent two of his Letters to the house of commons, which shew how M. Rouvigny was sent hither on purpose to ruin me; which, I am well assured, at this time, they would rather see, than of any one man in England. Besides what that gentleman could say of this kind, if he pleased, I hope his majesty will give me leave, in my defence, to say in his presence, and in the hearing of divers lords, with whom I have the honour to sit in the committee of foreign Affairs, that which, were it not true, his majesty must think me the impudentest and worst of men, to affirm before him, That, ever since I had the honour to serve his majesty, to this day, I have delivered it as my constant opinion, 'That France was the worst interest his majesty could embrace; and that they were the nation in the world from whom, I did believe, he ought to apprehend the greatest danger; and who have both his person and government under the last degree of contempt: For which reason alone, were there no other, I would never advise his majesty to trust to their friendship.—'

The Lords debate Whether the Impeachment should be received as an Impeachment of High Treason? [When the earl had ended his Speech, a great debate arose, on the question, Whether the Impeachment should be received as an Impeachment of High Treason only, because the commons had added the word High Treason in it? It was said, the utmost that could be made of it, was to suppose it true. But even in that case, they must needs say plainly, that it was not within the Statute. To this it was answered, That the house of commons that brought up the Impeachment, were to be heard to two points, viz. to the nature of the crime; and the trial of it. But the lords could not take upon them to judge of either of these, till they heard what the commons could offer to support the Charge: They were bound therefore to receive the Charge, and to proceed according to the rules of parliament, which was to commit the person, so impeached, and then give a short day for his trial. So it would soon be over, if the commons could not prove the matter charged to be High Treason.

The Earl of Carnarvon's remarkable Speech thereon. The debate* was carried on with much heat on both sides, and, among the speakers on this occasion, was the earl of Carnarvon, a lord who is said never to have spoken before in that house; who, having been heated with wine, and more excited to display his abilities by the duke of Buckingham, (who meant no favour to the Treasurer, but only ridicule) was resolved, before he went up, to speak upon any subject that should offer itself. Accordingly he stood up, and delivered himself to this effect:

"My Lords; I understand but little of Latin, but a good deal of English, and not a little of the English history, from which I have learnt the mischiefs of such kind of prosecutions as these, and the ill fate of the prosecutors. I could bring many instances, and those very antient; but, my lords, I shall go no farther back than the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign: at which time the earl of Essex was run down by sir Walter Rawleigh. My lord Bacon, he ran down sir Walter Rawleigh, and your lordships know what became of my lord Bacon. The duke of Buckingham, he ran down my lord Bacon, and your lordships know what happened to the duke of Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford, ran down the duke of Buckingham, and you all know what became of him. Sir Harry Vane, he ran down the earl of Strafford, and your lordships know what became of sir Harry Vane. Chancellor Hyde, he ran down sir Harry Vane, and your lordships know what became of the chancellor. Sir Thomas Osborne, now earl of Danby, ran down Chancellor Hyde; but what will become of the earl of Danby, your lordships best can tell. But let me see that man that dare run the earl of Danby down, and we shall soon see what will become of him."

This being pronounced with a remarkable humour and tone, the duke of Buckingham, both surprised and disappointed, after his way, cried out, 'The man is inspired! and claret has done the business.'—The majority, however, was against the commitment; "upon which it was visible," says Dr. Burnet, "that the commons would have complained, that the lords denied them justice. So there was no hope of making up the matter; and upon that the parliament was first prorogued and then dissolved."

* "And here I cannot but take notice, that the king observing the lord Stafford to be very violent in the house against the lord Danby, (which, it seems, took birth from a personal pique to him, for obstructing a pension he had from the crown) told me, He wondered at it much, seeing his father came to the unfortunate end he did, by the very self-same method of procedure." Sir John Reresby.

Vol. IV.

The King prorogues the Parliament.] Dec. 30. His majesty, in the house of lords, spoke as follows to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; It is with great unwillingness that I come this day to tell you, I intend to prorogue you. I think all of you are witnesses that I have been ill used; the particulars of it I intend to acquaint you with at a more convenient time. In the mean time, I do assure you, that I will immediately enter upon the disbanding of the Army, and let all the world see, that there is nothing that I intend but for the good of the kingdom, and for the safety of Religion. I will likewise prosecute this Plot, and find out who are the instruments in it: and I shall take all the care which lies in my power, for the security of religion, and the maintenance of it, as it is now established. I have no more to say to you at this time, but leave the rest to my Lord Chancellor to prorogue you*."

Then the lord chancellor said, "His majesty hath commanded this parliament to be prorogued to the 4th of Feb. next, and this parliament is accordingly prorogued to the 4th of Feb. next."

The Long Parliament dissolved.] On the 24th of Jan. 1678-9, the parliament was dissolved by Proclamation†. And in the same

* "Immediately after the prorogation, Mr. Secretary Williamson resigned the seals, which were delivered by the king to the earl of Sunderland, though he had given hopes of the place to sir Wm. Temple, then ambassador in Holland, and had called him over for that purpose. But Temple, at his arrival, found the post filled, the earl of Sunderland having paid Williamson 6000*l.* and 500 guineas, which Temple was not able or willing to give. Shortly after, the king dismissed the earl of Dauby, and put the Treasury into commission." Rapin.

Sir Wm. Temple, in his Memoirs, contradicts what Rapin asserts: he says, "That the king sent for him over from the Hague, where he was ambassador, to take possession of the office of secretary of state in the room of secretary Coventry; but on his arrival he declined the accepting it, though greatly pressed by the king, representing to his majesty how necessary it was for him to have one of the secretaries in the house of commons, (where it had been usual to have them both) and that consequently it was very unfit for him to enter upon that office before he got into the house, which was attempted, and failed."

† "Some think this parliament was dissolved, on purpose to protect the Popish Lords in the Tower, and divert, if possible, the noise of the Popish Plot; or else to cover the duke of York from the resentment of the commons, and the general indignation of the people." Kennet.

proclamation notice was given of his majesty's intentions of calling another parliament to meet the 6th of March following.

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES AFTER THE DISSOLUTION—TRIAL OF COLEMAN AND IRELAND—NEW ELECTIONS—DUKE OF MONMOUTH—DUKE OF YORK RETIRES TO BRUSSELS.]

"Thus came to a period a parliament," says Mr. Hume, "which had sitted during the whole course of this reign, one year excepted. Its conclusion was very different from its commencement. Being elected during the joy and festivity of the restoration, it consisted almost entirely of royalists; who were disposed to support the crown by all the liberality which the habits of that age would permit. Alarmed by the alliance with France, they gradually withdrew their confidence from the king; and finding him still to persevere in a foreign interest, they proceeded to discover symptoms of the most refractory and most jealous disposition. The popish plot pushed them beyond all bounds of moderation; and before their dissolution, they seemed to be treading fast in the footsteps of the last long parliament, on whose conduct they threw at first such violent blame. In all their variations, they had still followed the opinions and prejudices of the nation; and ever seemed to be more governed by humour and party-views than by public interest, and more by public interest than by any corrupt or private influence. During the sitting of the parliament, and after its prorogation and dissolution, the trials of the pretended criminals were carried on; and the courts of judicature, places which, if possible, ought to be kept more pure from injustice than even national assemblies themselves, were strongly infected with the same party-rage and bigoted prejudices. Coleman, the most obnoxious of the conspirators, was first brought to his trial. His letters were produced against him. They contained, as he himself confessed, much indiscretion: but, unless so far as it is illegal to be a zealous catholic, they seemed to prove nothing criminal, much less treasonable, against him. Oates and Bedloe deposed, that he had received a commission, signed by the superior of the Jesuits, to be papal secretary of state, and had consented to the poisoning, shooting, and stabbing of the king: he had even, according to Oates's deposition, advanced a guinea to promote those bloody purposes. These wild stories were confounded with the projects contained in his letters; and Coleman received sentence of death. The sentence was soon after executed upon him. He suffered with calmness and constancy, and to the last persisted in the strongest protestations of his innocence. Coleman's execution was succeeded by the trial of father Ireland: who, it is pretended, had signed, together with fifty Jesuits, the great resolution of murdering the king. Grove and Pickering, who had undertaken to shoot him, were tried at the same time. The only witnesses against the prisoners were still Oates and Bedloe. Ireland affirmed, that he was in Staffordshire all the month of August last, a time when Oates's evidence made him in London. He proved his assertion by good evidence, and would have proved it by undoubted, had he not, most iniquitously, been debarred, while in prison, from all use of pen, ink, and paper, and denied the liberty of sending for witnesses. All these men, before their arraignment, were condemned in the opinion of the judges, jury, and spectators; and to be a Jesuit, or even a catholic, was of itself a sufficient proof of guilt. The chief justice, in particular, gave sanction to all the narrow prejudices and bigoted fury of the populace. Instead of being counsel for the prisoners, as his office required, he pleaded the cause against them, brow-beat their witnesses, and on every occasion represented their guilt as certain and uncontroverted. He even went so far as publicly to affirm, that the papists had not the same principles which protestants have, and therefore were not entitled to that common credence, which the principles and practices of the latter call for. And when the jury brought in their verdict against the prisoners, he said, 'You have done, gentlemen, like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good protestants: and now much good may they 30,000 masses do them.' Alluding to the masses by which Pickering was to be rewarded for murdering the king. All these unhappy men went to execution, protesting their innocence; a circumstance which made no impression on the spectators. (1679. 14th Jan.) The opinion, that the Jesuits allowed of lies and mental reservations for promoting a good cause, was at this time so universally received, that no credit was given to testimony delivered either by that order, or by any of their disciples. It was forgotten, that all the conspirators engaged in the gun-powder treason, and Garnet the Jesuit, among the rest, had freely on the scaffold made confession of their guilt. Though Bedloe had given information of Godfrey's murder, he still remained a single evidence against the persons accused; and all the allurements of profit and honour, had not hitherto tempted any one to confirm the testimony of that informer. At last, means were found to complete the legal evidence. One France, a silversmith, and a catholic, had been accused by Bedloe of being an accomplice in the murder; and upon his denial had been thrown into prison, loaded with heavy irons, and confined to the condemned hole, a place cold, dark, and full of nastiness. Such rigours were supposed to be exercised by orders from the secret committee of lords, particularly Shaftesbury and Buckingham; who, in examining the prisoners, usually employed (as it is said, and indeed sufficiently proved) threatenings and promises, rigour and indulgence, and every art under pretence of extorting the truth from them. France had not courage to resist, but confessed himself an accomplice in Godfrey's murder. Being asked concerning the plot, he also thought proper to be acquainted with it, and conveyed some intelligence to the council. Among other absurd circumstances, he said, that one le Fevre bought a second-hand sword of him; because he knew not, as he said, what times were at hand: and France expressing some concern for poor tradesmen if such times came, le Fevre replied, that it would be better for tradesmen if the catholic religion were restored: and particularly, that there would be more church work for silversmiths. All this information with regard to the plot, as well as the murder of Godfrey, France solemnly retracted, both before the king and the secret committee: but being again thrown into prison, he was induced, by new terrors and new sufferings, to confirm his first information, and was now produced as a sufficient evidence. Hill, Green, and Berry, were tried for Godfrey's murder; all of them men of low stations. Hill was servant to a physician: the other two belonged to the popish chapel at Somerset-house. It is needless to run over the particulars of a long trial, it will be sufficient to say, that Bedloe's evidence and France's, were in many circumstances totally irreconcilable; that both of them laboured under unsurmountable difficulties, not to say gross absurdities; and that they were invalidated by contrary evidence, which is altogether convincing. But all was in vain: the prisoners were condemned and executed (Feb. 21st and 28th). They all denied their guilt at their execution; and as Berry died a protestant, this circumstance was regarded as very considerable: but, instead of its giving some check to the general credulity of the people, men were only surprised, that a protestant could be induced at his death, to persist in so manifest a falsehood.—As the army could neither be kept up, nor disbanded, without money, the king, how little hopes soever he could entertain of more compliance, found himself obliged to summons a new parliament. The blood, already shed on account of the popish plot, instead of satiating the people, served only as an incentive to their fury; and each conviction of a criminal was hitherto regarded as a new proof of those horrible designs imputed to the papists. This election is perhaps the first in England which, since the commencement of the monarchy, had been carried on by a violent contest between the parties, and where the court interested itself, to a high degree, in the choice of the national representatives. But all its efforts were fruitless, in opposition to the torrent of prejudices which prevailed. Religion, liberty, property, even the lives of men were now supposed to be at stake; and no security, it was thought, except in a vigilant parliament, could be found against the impious and bloody conspirators. Were there any part of the nation, to which the ferment, occasioned by the popish plot, had not as yet propagated itself; the new elections, by interesting the whole people in public concerns, tended to diffuse it into the remotest corner; and the consternation, universally excited, proved an excellent engine for influencing the electors. All the zealots of the former parliament were re-chosen: new ones were added: the presbyterians, in particular, being transported with the most inveterate antipathy against popery, were very active and very successful in the elections. That party, it is said, first began at this time the abuse of splitting their freshholds, in order to multiply votes and electors. By accounts, which came from every part of England, it was concluded, that the new representatives would, if possible, exceed the old in their refractory opposition to the court, and furious persecution of the catholics.—The king was alarmed, when he saw so dreadful a tempest arise from such small and unaccountable beginnings. His life, if Oates and Bedloe's information were true, had been aimed at by the catholics: even the duke's was in danger: the higher, therefore, the rage mounted against popery, the more should the nation have been reconciled to these princes, in whom, it appeared, the church of Rome reposed no confidence. But there is a sophistry which attends all the passions; especially those into which the populace enter. Men gave credit to the informers, so far as concerned the guilt of the catholics: but they still retained their old suspicions, that these religionists were secretly favoured by the king, and had obtained the most entire ascendant over his brother. Charles had too much penetration not to see the danger, to which the succession, and even his own crown and dignity, now stood exposed. A numerous party, he found, was formed against him; on the one hand, composed of a populace, so credulous from prejudice, so blinded with religious antipathy, as implicitly to believe the most palpable absurdities; and conducted, on the other hand, by leaders so little scrupulous, as to endeavor, by encouraging perjury, subornation, lies, impostures, and even by shedding innocent blood, to gratify their own furious ambition, and subvert all legal authority. Roused from his lethargy by so imminent a peril, he began to exert that vigour of mind, of which, on great occasions, he was not destitute; and without quitting in appearance his usual facility of temper, he collected an industry, firmness, and vigilance, of which he was believed altogether incapable. These qualities, joined to dexterity and prudence, conducted him happily through the many shoals which surrounded him; and he was at last able to make the storm fall on the heads of those who had blindly raised, or artfully conducted it.—One chief step which the king took towards gratifying and appeasing his people and parliament, was, desiring the duke to withdraw beyond sea, that no farther suspicion might remain of the influence of popish counsels. The duke readily complied; but first required an order for that purpose, signed by the king; lest his absenting himself should be interpreted as a proof of fear or of guilt. He also desired, that his brother should satisfy him, as well as the public, by a declaration of the illegitimacy of the duke of Monmouth.—James duke of Monmouth was the king's natural son by Lucy Walters, and born about ten years before the restoration. He possessed all the qualities which could engage the affections of the populace; a distinguished valour, an affable address, a thoughtless generosity, a graceful person. He rose still higher in the public favour, by reason of the universal hatred to which the duke, on account of his religion, was exposed. Monmouth's capacity was mean; his temper pliant: so that, notwithstanding his great popularity, he had never been dangerous, had he not implicitly resigned himself to the guidance of Shaftesbury, a man of such a restless temper, such subtle wit, and such abandoned principles. That daring politician had flattered Monmouth with the hopes of succeeding to the crown. The story of a contract of marriage, passed between the king and Monmouth's mother, and secretly kept in a certain black box, had been industriously spread abroad, and was greedily received by the multitude. As the horrors of popery still pressed harder on them, they might be induced, either to adopt that fiction, as they had already done many others more incredible, or to commit open violation on the right of succession. And it would not be difficult, it was hoped, to persuade the king, who was extremely fond of his son, to give him the preference above a brother, who, by his imprudent bigotry, had involved him in such inextricable difficulties. But Charles, in order to cut off all such expectations, as well as to remove the duke's apprehensions, took care in full council to make a declaration of Monmouth's illegitimacy, and to deny all promise of marriage with his mother. The duke, being gratified in so reasonable a request, willingly complied with the king's desire, and retired to Brussels."

His majesty opened the Session with the following Speech to both houses:

“ My lords and gentlemen; I meet you here with the most earnest desire that man can have to unite the minds of all my subjects, both to me, and to one another. And I resolve it shall be your faults, if the success be not suitable to my desires. I have done many great things already in order to that end; as, the Exclusion of the Popish Lords from their seats in parliament; the execution of several men, both upon the score of the Plot, and of the Murder of sir Edmondberry Godfrey: and it is apparent that I have not been idle in prosecuting the discovery of both, as much further as hath been possible in so short a time.—I have disbanded as much of the Army as I could get money to do; and I am ready to dishand the rest, so soon as you shall reimburse what they have cost me, and will enable me to pay off the remainder: and, above all, I have commanded my Brother to absent himself from me, because I would not leave the most malicious men room to say, I had not removed all causes which could be pretended to influence me towards Popish Counsels.—Besides that end of union which I aim at (and which I wish could be extended to Protestants abroad, as well as at home), I propose, by this last great step I have made, to discern whether Protestant Religion and the peace of the kingdom be as truly aimed at by others, as they are really intended by me; for, if they be, you will employ your time upon the great concerns of the nation, and not be drawn to promote private animosities, under pretences of the public; your proceedings will be calm and peaceable, in order to those good ends I have recommended to you; and you will curb the motions of any unruly spirits, which would endeavour to disturb them. I hope there will be none such amongst you; because there can be no man, that must not see how fatal differences amongst ourselves are like to be at this time, both at home and abroad.—I shall not cease my endeavours daily to find out what more I can, both of the Plot and Murder of sir Edmondberry Godfrey; and shall desire the assistance of both my houses in that work.—I have not been wanting to give orders for putting all the present laws in execution against

Papists; and I am ready to join in the making such further laws as may be necessary for securing of the kingdom against Popery.—I must desire your assistance also in Supplies, both for disbanning the Army (as I have already told you) and for paying that part of the Fleet which hath been provided for by parliament but till the 5th of June last; as also that Debt for Stores which was occasioned by the Poll Bill's falling short of the sum which that act gave credit for.—I must necessarily recommend to you likewise the discharging of those Anticipations which are upon my Revenue, and which I have commanded to be laid before you; and I have just cause to desire such an increase of the revenue itself, as might make it equal to my necessary expences: but, by reason of those other Supplies which are absolutely necessary at this time, I am contented to struggle with that difficulty a while longer; expecting for the present, only to have the additional duties upon Customs and Excise to be prolonged to me; and that you will some way make up the loss I sustain by the prohibition of French Wines and Brandy, which turns only to my prejudice, and to the great advantage of the French.—I must needs put you in mind, how necessary it will be to have a good strength at sea this summer, since our neighbours are making naval preparations; and, notwithstanding the great difficulties I labour under, I have taken such care as will prevent any danger which can threaten us, if your parts be performed in time. And I do heartily recommend to you, that such a constant establishment might be made for the Navy as might make this kingdom not only safe, but formidable; which can never be whilst there remains not enough besides to pay the necessary Charges of the crown.—I will conclude, as I begun, with my earnest desires to have this an healing parliament; and I do give you this assurance, that I will with my life defend, both the Protestant Religion and the laws of this kingdom; and I do expect from you, to be defended from the calumny, as well as danger, of those worst of men, who endeavour to render me and my government odious to my people. The rest I leave to the Lord Chancellor.”

The Lord Chancellor Finch's Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor spake as followeth:

“ My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the house of commons; You are here assembled, by virtue of his majesty's most gracious writs of summons, to hold a parliament; the great, the wise, and the powerful council of this kingdom. From the wisdom of this council, the king is sure, he shall receive the best advice; from the duty and loyalty of this assembly, he can never want a cheerful assistance: and the king resolves to meet you all with so much grace and goodness, that he hopes this parliament shall end in no disappointment of any, but our enemies.—It may seem strange perhaps to some, that his majesty, who had so long and large an experience of the duty of the last parliament, should now, and in this present conjuncture, think fit to call a new one. But the king hath so equal a confidence in the affections of all his good subjects, that he intends to be acquainted with them all, and to have many and frequent consultations with them; and hopes by this means to attain, first, a true and right understanding of the desires of his people; and, next to that, to be rightly understood by them.—The considerations which are now to be laid before you, are as urgent and as weighty as ever were yet offered to any parliament, or indeed ever can be: so great and so surprizing have been our dangers at home, so formidable are the appearances of danger from abroad, that the most united councils, the most sedate and the calmest temper, together with the most dutiful and zealous affections that a parliament can shew, are all become absolutely and indispensably necessary for our preservation. At home we had need look about us; for his majesty's royal person hath been in danger, by a Conspiracy against his sacred life, maliciously contrived, and industriously carried on, by those Seminary Priests and Jesuits, and their adherents, who think themselves under some obligation of conscience to effect it; and, having vowed the subversion of the true religion amongst us, find no way so likely to compass it, as to wound us in the head, and to kill the defender of the faith.—His maj. wanted not sufficient evidence of his zeal for our religion, without this testimony from his enemies, who were about to sacrifice him for it: but it hath ever been the practice of those votaries, first, to murder the fame of princes, and then their persons; first, to slander them to their people, as if they favoured Papists, and then to assassinate them for being too zealous Protestants. And thus, by all the ways and means which our law calls treason, and their divinity calls merit and martyrdom, they are trying to set up the dominion and the supremacy of the Pope, as if the dignity of his triple crown could never be sufficiently advanced, unless these three kingdoms were added unto him, and all brought back again under that yoke, which neither we nor our fore-fathers were able to bear.—The inquiry into this Conspiracy hath been closely pursued, and the lords of the council have been careful to prosecute the discovery, ever since the rising of the last parliament; and the king doth now recommend it to you to perfect: more evidence hath been already found out, and more malefactors discovered, some in hold, some fled: justices of peace have been quickened in the execution of their duty, the negligent have been reprov'd and punished, the diligent encouraged, and assisted in doubtful cases by the opinions of the Judges; active and faithful messengers have been sent into all the corners of the kingdom where there was any hope of service to be done. The very prisons have been searched, to see whether any had fled thither to hide themselves there, and under pretence of debt to escape the pursuit: and if any have desired leave to go beyond sea, they have first given security not to go to Rome, nor send their children to be bred in any Foreign seminaries, and then they have been obliged to give in a List of all their menial servants, and those servants too have been examined upon oath; and order is given that they be again examined at the ports, and make oath they are the same persons were examined above: so that all possible care hath been taken that no malefactors might escape us in disguise. And though the Priests themselves do not keep the confessions of their proselytes more secret than these keep the injunctions of their priests, yet enough hath appeared to bring some capital offenders to public justice, and to convict them of the crime: some of the traitors have been executed; several priests have been arrested and imprisoned; all are hiding themselves, and lurking in secret corners like the Sons of Darkness. The murderers of sir Edmondberry Godfrey have been condemned, and suffered death; some Papists have banished themselves out of the kingdom; others are imprisoned for not taking the oaths; all are prosecuted towards conviction; and the very shame and reproach which attends such abominable practices hath covered so many faces with new and strange confusions, that it hath proved a powerful argument for their conversion; nor is it to be wondered at that they could no longer believe all that to be Gospel which their priests taught them, when they saw the way and means of introducing it was so far from being Evangelical.—In a word, so universal is that despair to which the Papists are now reduced, that they have no other hopes left but this, that we may chance to overdo our own business; and by being too far transported with the fears of Popery, neglect the opportunities we now have of making sober and lasting provisions against it.—And it is not to be doubted, but that it would infinitely gratify the Papists in the revenge they wish for this discovery, if they could see us distracted with jealousies incurable, and distrusting the government to such a degree as should weaken all that reverence by which it stands: for then the Plot would not be altogether without effect; but those whom they could not destroy by their conspiracy, they should have the satisfaction to see ruining themselves after the discovery; so that, though we had escaped that desolation which they intended to have brought upon us, nothing could save us from that destruction which we should bring upon ourselves.—But their expectations of this are as vain, as their other designs were wicked; for his maj. hath already begun to let them see with what severity he intends to proceed against them. He hath passed a law to disable all the nobility and gentry of that faction ever to sit in parliament; and, not content with that, he did offer to the last parliament, and does again renew the same offer to this parliament, to pass any further laws against Popery which shall be desired, so as the same extend not to the dimpution of his own prerogative, nor to alter the descent of the crown in the right line, nor to defeat the succession. He hath refused the Petition of the lords, who, during the interval of parliament, desired to be brought to their trial; and, after so long an imprisonment, might reasonably enough have expected it: but his maj. thought it fitter to reserve them to a more public and conspicuous trial in parliament; for which cause, their trial ought now to be hastened, for it is high time there should be some period put to the imprisonment of the lords.—But that which the king hath been pleased to mention to you this morning surpasses all the rest, and is sufficient of itself alone to discharge all those fears of Popish influences which many good men had too far entertained: for now, you see, his maj. of his own accord hath done that which would have been very difficult for you to ask, and hath deprived himself of the conversation of his royal and only Brother, by commanding him to depart the kingdom; to which command his. r. h. hath paid a most humble and most entire submission and obedience. This separation was attended with a more than ordinary sorrow on both sides. But he that for your sakes could part with such a brother and such a friend, you may be sure, hath now no favourites but his people. Since, therefore, his maj. hath shewn so much readiness to concur with, and in a manner to prevent, the desires of his parliament, it is a miserable refuge our enemies trust to, when they hope to see our zeal outrun our discretion, and that we ourselves should become the unhappy occasion of making our own councils abortive.—Not only the care of the State, but the care we ought to have of the Church too, will preserve us from all errors of this kind: for, as there neither is, nor hath been these 1500 years a purer Church than ours, so it is for the sake of this poor Church alone that the State hath been so much disturbed: it is her truth and peace, her decency and order, which they labour to undermine, and pursue with so restless a malice; and, since they do so, it will be necessary for us to distinguish between Popish and other Recusants, between them that would destroy the whole flock, and them that only wander from it: and among the many good laws you shall think fit to provide, it may not be amiss to think of some better remedy for regulating the press, from whence there daily steal forth Popish Catechisms, Psalters, and Books of Controversy. And it may be another good fruit of such a law, to hinder schismatical and seditious Libels too; for certainly it were much better for us to make such laws as will prevent offences, rather than such as serve only to punish the offenders.—From the dangers which we know at home, and have already in a great measure overcome, be pleased to carry your considerations abroad, and weigh the dangers which may come from thence. We all see and know the posture of our neighhours; and that, the general peace of Europe being once made, there must needs be great fleets and armies unemployed, and ready for an occasion. And it is as visible that some of our neighbours are so wasted by the war, that they are unable to give us any help, if we should stand in need of it. And when we consider withal the afflicted condition of the Protestants abroad, we may be sure that every calamity they suffer is in some measure a weakening of the Protestant interest, and looks as if it were intended to make way for a general extirpation.—These dangers would not be so considerable as they are, if the present wants of the crown were not too well known. The king doth not intend to press you at this time with the full consideration of them all; for, as the king cannot hope in any one session to do all that may be good for his people, so neither doth he expect from them all that may be necessary for himself; but hopes the good understanding between him and his people shall be for ever maintained, by a perpetual reciprocation of grace and favour on his part, and duty and affection on yours.—That which doth most press the king at present is, the want of that treasure which he hath exhausted by going as far as he could in the disbanded of his Army; which is very much, but not fully done. The Charge of a great Fleet at sea, now ready to be paid off after a long service, and the necessity of setting out another this summer; the defects of the Poll Bill, which fell short of that sum which was allowed to be borrowed upon it, and by that means hath deceived those who did furnish stores upon the credit of that Act, unless you relieve them; together with the continuation of some additional Duties of Custom and Excise; and it were much to be wished, that, since the Revenue at the best was always short of the necessary charge of the government, a way may be found to take off those Debts and Anticipations, and to supply that Diminution of the Customs which makes it much narrower than it was.—My Lords and Gentlemen; There are so many things to do, and so little time to do them in, that there ought not to be one minute lost. The season of the year is not yet so far advanced, as to make it too late to set out a Fleet this summer; for most of the Preparations are ready, if we go about it with that diligence which is requisite: and therefore it doth infinitely import us all to husband time.—The best way of doing this will be, to avoid all long and tedious consultations, which sometimes do as much harm as ill resolutions; and above all, to take heed of such questions and debates as tend to raise heat, or may create any kind of disturbance; nor does any thing in the world so much contribute to dispatch, as a quiet and orderly proceeding; for they who are in haste and attempt to do all their business at once, most commonly hinder themselves from bringing any thing to perfection.—You have now an opportunity of doing great things for the king and kingdom, and it deserves your utmost care to make a right use of it; for it is not in the power of a parliament to recover a lost opportunity, or to restore themselves again to the same circumstances, or the same condition, which they had once a power to have improved.—Would you secure Religion at home, and strengthen it from abroad, by uniting the interests of all the Protestants in Europe? this is the time. Would you let the Christian world see the king in a condition able to protect those who shall adhere to him, or depend upon him? this is the time. Would you extinguish all our Fears and Jealousies? Would you lay aside all private animosities, and give them up to the quiet and repose of the public? This is the time. Would you lay the foundations of a lasting peace, and secure the Church and State against all the future machinations of our Enemies? this is the time.—My Lords and Gentlemen; the present face of things, and the state wherein we now are, is so well known and understood abroad, that the whole world is in great expectation of those resolutions which shall be taken here. The results of this council seem to be decisive of the fate of these kingdoms for many ages; and are like to determine us either to happiness or misery of a very long duration. We use to say, and say truly, That the king, when seated in parliament, is then in the fulness of his majesty and power, and shines forth with the brightest lustre: let no exhalations from beneath darken or obscure it. Foreign nations say, and say truly, That a king of England, in conjunction with his parliament, is as great and dreadful a prince as any in Europe. Shew them the sight they are afraid of: and, since they have laid it down for a maxim in their politics, That England can never be destroyed but by itself, and that it is in vain to make any attempt upon this nation, until they be in some great disorder and confusion among themselves; make the ambitious despair betimes; and establish so perfect an intelligence between all the parts of this great body, that there may be but one heart and one soul among us.—And let us all pray, That He who hath once more miraculously delivered the king, the church, and the state, would be pleased still to continue His divine protection, and give us thankful and obedient hearts. And when we have offered up those hearts to God, let us in the next place offer them again to the king, and lay them down at the footstool of His throne: that so the king may see himself safe in your councils, rich in your affections, victorious by your arms, and raised to such a height by your loyalty and courage, that you may have the honour of making him the greatest king, and he the glory of making you the happiest people. I have but one thing more in command; and that is to the gentlemen of the house of commons: That they proceed immediately to the choice of a Speaker; whom his maj. will expect to be presented to him here at three of the clock to morrow in the afternoon.

Mr. Seymour chosen Speaker.] After most of the members had taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy before the lords commissioners, in the inward court of wards, they chose Mr. Seymour^a, Speaker, with little or no contest, and he was led to the chair by sir Tho. Lee and Mr. Hampden. [He hung back, and acted his unwillingness very well †.] He then spoke to the house to this effect: “No satisfaction could be greater to me than the honour thus freely and unanimously to be called to the chair: and as you have been so obliging to me, so I will be careful that your favour tend not to the prejudice of your service. My errors are so many arguments to excuse me from this employment, because I see so many persons judgments fall into such mistakes as lead them into errors, by too favourable an opinion of me. I have been master of much better health than I now enjoy, so that I cannot attend your service as I ought. These considerations, I hope, will induce you to proceed to another choice, that your service may be better performed. Dangers threaten religion and the state by the horrid Plot. Do not gratify your enemies by stumbling at the threshold, in your choice of me. But since you are pleased to sequester your judgments, in this choice, give me leave to present my excuse to the king, and I hope the king will have no cause to disagree with you in any thing but your choice of me.”

The Speaker's Speech to the King.] March 7. The Speaker thus chosen, the commons went up to the lords bar to present him to his majesty, where Mr. Seymour spoke to this effect: “May it please your majesty, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, in obedience to your majesty's command, have made choice of a Speaker, and have unanimously chosen me: and now I am come hither for your majesty's approbation, which if your majesty please to grant, I shall do them and you the best service I can.”

The Speaker rejected by the King.] The lord chancellor made this Answer: “Mr. Seymour, The approbation which is given by his majesty to the choice of a Speaker, would not be thought such a favour as it is and ought to be received, if his maj. were not at liberty to deny as well to grant it. It is an essential prerogative of the king to refuse, as well as approve of, a Speaker. This is a matter which by mistake may be liable to misrepresentation, as if the king did dislike the persons that chose, or the person chosen. As to the first, there can be no doubt. They are old representatives of his people, whom he hath a desire to meet; and

* “Seymour and lord Danby had fallen into some quarrellings, both being very proud and violent in their tempers. Seymour, had in the last session, struck in with such heat against popery, that he was become popular upon it. So he managed the matter in this new parliament that, though the court named Meres, yet he was chosen Speaker.” Burnet.

† Grey.

there can be no doubt of the latter; nor has his maj. any reason to dislike you, having had great experience of your ability and service. But the king is the best judge of men and things. He knows when and where to employ. He thinks fit to reserve you for other service, and to ease you of this. It is his majesty's pleasure to discharge this choice; and accordingly, by his majesty's command, I do discharge you of this place you are chosen for; and in his majesty's name command the house of commons to make another choice, and command them to attend here to-morrow at 11 o'clock *.

Debate thereon.] The commons then came back to their house; where

Sir John Ernly said, I shall propose a gentleman of experience, and without exception, sir Thomas Meres.

Mr. Sacheverell. I take it to be a great misfortune, that, after a house had made choice of a Speaker, the king, by any information, to promote and carry on the designs of particular persons, should gratify them, rather than this house in their choice of Seymour. And I am the rather induced to believe it, because no exceptions have been made against Seymour in the Chancellor's Speech. But if it be proved that the king has always granted, and never denied the choice, I suppose the thing will be given up. There is but one precedent of the king's denial, and that was in the case of Thorp. It is strange that this house must be made a second. I see many worthy faces that were not here the last parliament: and therefore I shall say, it is very hard, there having, for an 100 years together, never been so much as one excuse made by a Speaker chosen by the commons, nor one allowance or disallowance made in parliament, that it should be so now. It was usually excused by compliment, and this parliament has complimented itself out of its right. But I would not lose a hair's breadth of the king's right, nor the subjects. They are enemies to the nation, that, at this time, throw a bone betwixt the king and us. After all this danger and distraction we are in, must this house be made the next precedent? I move, 'that the clerk may put the question for adjourning the house till to-morrow,' and in the interim the records may be searched for precedents in this matter, and then we may inform the king how much this manner of proceeding is to his prejudice and yours.

* Concerning this transaction Ferguson writes as follows: "There being a council that night, and notice coming that Mr. Seymour was chosen, the Treasurer persuaded the king from accepting him, to shew his prerogative right of rejecting; so that the next day, when the house came to present their Speaker, he was rejected; but the house having some intimation that he would be rejected, ordered him, or he himself resolved, not to make the commons formal apology of insufficiency, at the lords bar, but instead thereof he roundly told the king, 'That he was unanimously chosen, by the suffrages of all the commons of England, to be their Speaker; and that he was resolved to serve his majesty in that station, to the utmost of his power.' So that the Chancellor, who had orders to accept of his excuses, now had not a word to say: at last, upon deliberating and whispering, he recollected himself, and told the house," &c. Growth of Popery, part ii. p. 235.

Mr. Williams. This is now a question of right. I am sorry that our time, at the beginning of a session, should be thus lost, by the starting this question. Here is a worthy person named, sir Tho. Meres, and we named and presented to the king a worthy one too. The commons have been without a Speaker, nor was their having a Speaker originally from the crown, but by the commons. Till Hen. iv's time, not one precedent of presenting a Speaker, &c. The chancellor tells us, 'That the king's favour may not turn to his prejudice, &c.' This being put to a question of right, we must stand upon our right. There is no reason from the electors or the elected, why he should be rejected; therefore I adhere to Mr. Seymour.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I desire to inform the house, because there are a great many new members that were not of the last parliament; that we have power of adjourning ourselves by the clerk. In time of sickness of the Speaker, it has been done from day to day. Gentlemen, our lives and liberties are preserved by this house, and the privileges of it are inheritable to us. I must inform you, that Mr. Seymour attended the king yesterday, and he acquainted his majesty with the unanimous choice of him to be the Speaker, 'and that he hoped to have the king's good liking.' The king said, 'he liked very well the choice.' If so, this alteration of the king's mind must be from evil-disposed people about the king, who would create discontent between the king and his people. The king said once, 'he would have no favourites but the commons of England.' If you will not think fit to cause Mr. Seymour to declare what the king said to him, I acquiesce. But I move that you will adjourn.

Mr. Gurruway. I am one that have sat here long, and have seen great miscarriages, prorogations, and dissolutions. I am not afraid of it now, and I hope no man else here is afraid of it. I would not give the king offence, but not part with one hair of our right. If you will not stand to it here you will have a great many things put upon you. I am satisfied that we could not fix upon a fitter person for Speaker than Mr. Seymour; he is a privy counsellor, treasurer of the navy, and has done the king very good service here, which makes me wonder he should not be approved of by the king. I thought we could not have obliged the king more. The king said, 'he would have no favourite but his people.' And thus to have your Speaker rejected, what will you think of it! Pray, gentlemen, let us sleep upon it, and let the clerk put the question for adjourning till to-morrow.

Sir Tho. Lee. I see it is the universal opinion to adjourn, therefore I shall say but a little. Before the prorogation, information was given the house of the danger of the king's person, and the house addressed the king, 'to have a care of his person, &c.' The Answer was, 'the king was then busy, but we should have an account of our Message;' but for 3 weeks we heard nothing, and we were prorogued. I take notice only how things grow by degrees. We came up to this parliament with great joy, and expectation of doing good, and now we are thus interrupted! This being our condition, and we having precedents plain in the case for us, I would adjourn till to-morrow, and then make a Representation of the thing to the king.

Col. Birch. I am heartily sorry this has happened. This is an unlucky stumble at the threshold, before we get into the house. I came hither with an intention (God is my witness) to make this a 'healing parliament.' I have always heard here, that it is the undoubted right of this house to chuse their Speaker, &c. I have reason to believe Mr. Seymour very proper for the employment, and that he would be acceptable to his majesty; but he that did this with the king may do more. I would adjourn till to-morrow, and make a Representation of our right to the king.

Mr. Powle. This gives me apprehension that there is some person too near the king, who is afraid of this parliament. I have observed that, of late, those things of the greatest moment are done without any council at all; done in a corner. As for the prorogation and the dissolution of the last parliament, there was not one word of the advice of the privy council in it. I fear no advice was asked, but given for supporting the designs of private men. I have ever taken the record to be, that no man was ever refused being Speaker when presented to the king, but for some disability of body; as in sir John Popham's case, who desired to be excused from that service by reason of disability of body from wounds he had received in the wars, 28 Hen. vi. And lately sir Job Charlton, not being able to endure the employment, by reason of disability of body. But nothing of this can be objected against Mr. Seymour. Must any private person inform the king of his unfitness, without any cause assigned? I know not what may come of it. Corruption, in the former parliament, was complained of for private malice, but I doubt not but gentlemen come to this with clear thoughts. I do protest before God, that I think the greatness of the nation is under the privileges of this house. A people can never heartily support that government that does not protect them. A slavish people can never heartily support the government. Those that come after us, here, if we are dissolved upon this point, will speak the same language. I fear not dissolution. Let us adjourn till to-morrow, and consult our own hearts what is fit to be done.—Then the Clerk put the Question for adjourning.

March 8. Sir Tho. Lee. It is now 11 of the clock, and it is necessary we propose what to do before the black rod comes; whether you will do something previous; whether you will acquaint the king what we suffer for want of a Speaker; or whether you will propose somebody to say something at the lords bar to the king? I move you to consider which you will do.

Sir Harbottle Grimstone. I second that gentleman. Some of the Long Robe, I believe, have taken pains to search for precedents. My eyes are not good, and I am infirm, and not able to search. But thus much I shall say to the rational part. The question is, Whether the king's approbation of a Speaker is the substance and essence of the matter? For my part I never took it to be so. When you wait upon the king with your Speaker, he is your Speaker so soon as you have chosen him, and you may lay the mace upon the table. When you go up with the Speaker to the lords house, you go up to tell the king that, according to his direction, you have chosen a Speaker. It has been a thing of course to give the king notice of the person you have chosen, that he may know him; and we stand by, and give the Speaker leave modestly to deny, and exercise his oratory. If the king's approbation must be the essence of your choice, if you part with this, you part with all. Shall we not have the liberty to chuse our own servant, fit to do our own work? Other people would destroy our work, if we part with that which must enable us to do the work of them that trusted us and sent us hither. If any one man may be imposed upon us, who will not do our work, it may be he will put what question he pleases, and tire you out. This I have seen done. I would ask any man, who has influence upon this action, now we have chosen a Speaker, that he should be refused? Whoever broke the last parliament, without the desire of this house, or the advice of the privy council, that man or men, that broke that parliament, will break this too, to the utter undoing of the nation. Our time is short, if you please to think of it. If Seymour be not in the lords house (as it is said he is) or if he be in the country; if the person be in the country and not here, that we shall choose, then let us set up another to rule for him till he comes, as in the absence of a knight of the shire that is chosen. Mr. Seymour is a person of great experience for the place, and he is the fittest to go on where you left off; but he being not here, let somebody sit in his chair to represent his person, till he comes. And then we will offer our Reasons to the king, why we cannot recede from our first election.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I was glad yesterday to find that moderation in this great matter. Though we were then satisfied in our right, yet, by this night's consideration, gentlemen have looked over precedents. But though one of the long robe be more proper for Speaker, yet there are precedents of others that have been in that place. I find anciently that the commons have chosen their Speaker without presenting him to the king for approbation. Some have made excuses to the king, and some none (1 Hen. iv.) and 7 Hen. viii. he was presented before the ordinary privileges were asked. But it is notorious that all these things were our birthrights before. But if this argument be used against our right, because, in respect to the king, we make a formality of the king's approbation, all our rights will fall with that. This matter before us is that which all the commons of England have a right to, and I hope we shall not impair those rights that they have entrusted to us. R. ii. sir John Cheyney was chosen Speaker, and went up to the king, &c. to be confirmed. The next day he fell sick, and desired the house to chuse another, and they chose Dorwood, and notified it to the king that they had chosen him. Popham was chosen 28 Hen. vi. (a troublesome time.) He was sick and unable to perform the office, and the commons had leave granted to chuse another. But there are upon record many Speakers that have been chosen, and were ready to serve, without making any excuse. It is a strange thing that we should hear nothing of this for 200 years, and now the kingdom is in danger, that this parliament should have an interruption. I hope that in the consideration of this matter, we shall take such steps as are worthy of the great trust reposed in us.

Mr. Sacheverell. This matter is of great importance, and therefore we ought to take wary steps in it to the king, that those who advised him to this, may have no colour against us. The first question stands thus, 'Whether a Speaker chosen stands good to the service of the house, before he has the king's approbation?' The second question is, 'If the king can reject a Speaker, chosen by the house, and qualified?' If that be so, there is an end of your business. 1st James, after sir R. Philips was chosen Speaker by the commons, he sent out warrants for writs, as Speaker, without the king's approbation of him; and I can tell many more precedents. But perhaps we may have papers pinned upon our backs, as the former parliament had, and be sent home. I move, that we may have some persons nominated, of eminence about the king (though not privy counsellors, for they have not the sole privilege of carrying our Messages) humbly to acquaint the king, 'That the matter delivered by my Lord Chancellor, in his name, is of so great importance, that we desire some farther time to consider of it.' And then, no doubt, but we shall acquaint ourselves as we ought to do. I move that sir Robert Carr, the Chancellor of the Duchy, may go with the Message; and I doubt not but we shall make out our rights with all duty to the king.

Sir R. Carr. I humbly move you, that the privy counsellors may carry the Message. I was one, but I am not now. I hope you will dispense with me. There are none of the council here now, but I suppose they will be here.

Mr. Sacheverell. If you stay for the privy counsellors, the black rod will come to call you up. We have sent those to attend the king formerly who were no privy counsellors, and I would have Carr for one now.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I would know, whether ever the house made an Address to the king when they had no Speaker? I would have Sacheverell inform the house, whether there be any precedent of that.

Sir W. Portman. There is no precedent of a Speaker presented to the king by the house, that has been rejected: and let us make a precedent of addressing the king without a Speaker.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I would have any man cite a precedent, whether ever any Address was made to the king without a Speaker? [He spoke it roughly, and several younger gentlemen called aloud, 'To the Bar.']

Mr. Vaughan. Something must be done; and in this case we must create a precedent prime impressionis. Was there ever any precedent that so many met together and did nothing? It is fit to make a precedent, when such a body of men are met together, and do nothing. I move you to make an Address to the king.

Sir Eliab Harvey. Our time is but short, and pray let us not mispend it. I will name another to go to the king with Carr, lord Russel.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I conceive your proper question is, 'Whether an Address shall be made to the king for some longer time, &c.?' And when that is over, then you are to nominate persons to attend the king; and I shall name a third.

Mr. Poole. I would have the question be, 'That an application shall be made to the king that the matter delivered by the Lord Chancellor yesterday is of such great importance relating to the Speaker, that we desire some time to consider of it.'

The Commons apply to the King.] The Message was this: "That the matter delivered by the Lord Chancellor yesterday is of such great importance, that this house cannot immediately come to a Resolution therein; therefore do humbly desire that his majesty would graciously be pleased to grant some farther time to take the matter into consideration." — Ordered, "That lord Russel, lord Cavendish, sir Henry Capel, and sir Rob. Carr, do attend his majesty with this Message."

The King's Answer.] Being returned, Lord Russel reported, That, according to command, they have attended the king, and his majesty was pleased to make this Answer to the Message, viz. "I have considered your message, and do consent to a farther time for you to consider, till Tuesday next: and as I would not have my prerogative encroached upon, so I would not encroach upon your privilege; if a third person cannot be found out for an expedient in the mean time."

Debate thereon.] Serj. Streete. When the difference was between the lords and commons, in the case of sir S. Barnardiston, which you laboured under, the king found out an expedient. That being the case, I will presume to name a third person for Speaker. (But he was not suffered.)

Mr. Garroway. You have had a gracious Answer from the king. If in this time we have not lessened his prerogative in what we have done, we may consider farther of it; and as long as the king has given us time, I would certainly consider of it, and you may consider of it.

Mr. Williams. I wonder that now it should be proposed to name a third person, since the king has given you great time for deliberation. If you name a third person, you give up your right. I am as ready for Mr. Powle (named by Streete) as any man; but your Answer yesterday from the Chancellor was about rejecting your Speaker by the king's Prerogative. And will you sit down and give up your right for a compliment? If so, farewell chusing a Speaker for the future! Mr. Powle is a gentleman of great value; but let every man consider the right of the commons of England.

Sir John Knight. It is all one, if you name a second or third person; it is equally giving up your right to name a third or a second. Here were two in contest, and both were equally named. I move, therefore, that, as the king is pleased to give us till Tuesday next, to chuse some person, that we may draw a Petition to the king, to set out our right in chusing a Speaker.

Mr. Sacheverell. I am not for any question at this time; because many gentlemen know not what was said by the Chancellor to us yesterday. In this case, I would send to search the Lords Books, to know whether a refusal or dismissing our Speaker is there entered. And as the king has given you time, so I would make use of it to search the Lords Books for what the king has said by the Chancellor, to shape your Answer accordingly.

Mr. Williams. The very words were, 'That the choice of the Commons of their speaker was dismissed.'

Mr. Hampden. I went to look into the Lords Journal, and there is no entry made yet of any thing, but in the Minute-Book only; and what you do must be a debate grounded upon that.

So the house adjourned till the 10th by the clerk, as before.

The Search of the Lords' Journal reported.] March 10. Sir Tho. Lee. I am one of those whom you commanded to search the Lords' Journal, and, according to the order of the house, we went to the lords house, where we searched the Journal, but we found no Entry made, but, some Minutes of the Lord Chancellor's Speech in a Paper; but the lord chancellor had taken the paper to correct, and we should have them as soon as they were done.

Mr. Sacheverell. Seeing you can do nothing with these minutes, I would do something without them, and not sit still till the lords have adjourned till Tuesday. Though I am confident of our right, yet at this time I would give the least occasion of offence that might be; and proceed by such gentle steps as may give the king no cause of offence; nor those near the king, to possess him that we have done so. I would look a little back, yet put no question upon it. For this reason, I have taken some pains to look back how the house has proceeded in things of this nature; and of those, the gentlest proceedings. This is owned on all hands, that anciently the Speaker made no excuse, nor had the house order from the king to chuse a Speaker. 5 Rich. ii. and 2 Hen. iv. was the first excuse that was made. But I would take notice of one thing. Though, of late, Speakers, it is true, have made excuses, &c. yet it is as true, that the king has admitted them Speakers. But they have made none, but by leave of this house of commons. 1 James, out of the Journal: before the Speaker was approved by the king two or three days, the house not only made an Order to elect another Speaker instead of sir Francis Bacon, but in this session 1 James, the king was advised, 'That freedom of speech, and the use of the rest of the privileges of the house of commons, were ex gratia, and not ex debito;' and the king sent them a Letter, 'That he was satisfied with it.' But the commons addressed farther, by way of Representation, how the usage of parliament had been, in that matter, in an humble Petition, 'That their privileges might be continued by way of decency, but not to yield their right.' But as to the matter now before us, I would only state the case to the king, by way of Representation, 'how usage of parliament has been,' and wait his gracious Answer; and I doubt not but the king will see that he is wrongfully informed in the matter, and will give such an Answer as will satisfy the kingdom.

Mr. Hampden. The right of election of our Speaker no man can contradict. If the king has a right to chuse our Speaker, it had been most proper when we were before the king. But there is no distinction of privy counsellors from others in the house, that their presence is necessary when a Speaker is chosen, or that they must propose him; unless they make a distinction of themselves. You have now chosen a gentleman for your Speaker unanimously; one whom you thought qualified for the employment, and who, you had reason to think, would have been acceptable to the king. But if privy counsellors must propose a Speaker, and necessarily be present at the choice, there be no privy counsellors of the house, by that consequence you must have no Speaker. But the Chancellor said 'The king had made employment for him.' Surely that was an extraordinary excuse, for a member of parliament ought not to be employed elsewhere. I hope that in this matter you will make such a Representation to the king, as may have a favourable Answer, and so you may be let into the service of the king and kingdom; and I would have some gentlemen withdraw and pen it.

Sir John Ernly. You have an undoubted right of election of your Speaker. It was hinted here, and confirmed by practice, 'That no man was ever named here for Speaker by the secretaries of state, or the privy counsellors, in the king's name;' for the choice is in the commons, and it is undoubted that the refusal of a Speaker, when chosen, is of right in the king.

Mr. Goring. Some worthy persons have taken pains to search precedents. I would know, whether any person but a privy counsellor usually proposes a Speaker? And then the king, without doubt, knows before-hand who the Speaker is. I have heard gentlemen formerly allege it, as an exception against Mr. Seymour, that he was a privy counsellor, and therefore excepted against him for being Speaker.

Sir John Cloberry. I am glad to see the house in so excellent a temper to hear a debate of as great a concernment as can come before you. 1. It is said, 'That the Speaker ought to be presented by some of the privy council,' but I take it to be the right of every member to present whom he pleases. 2. 'Whether it be our undoubted right?' That is undubitable, the modification of the choice. It has been asserted by the Master of the Rolls, and he is pleased to call the presenting of a Speaker to the king 'a compliment only;' which doctrine, if true, then we have a consummate Speaker; as in materia prima there is a capacity of receiving various forms. The choice of the Speaker is our undoubted right, but the manner totally and integrally in our choice. I will begin with Mr. Seymour, who sat in the chair but a while; he made a modest excuse, and then said, 'The house cannot make a Speaker but by the king's approbation, and he hoped that would be the only thing the king would leny this house.' Then, as soon as the king's negative came down upon Mr. Seymour, it was thought an infringement of your privileges. There were never any such precedents as for us to adhere to our first choice. In Hen. vi. th's time, the Speaker was refused, at his own request (Popham.) The law is tendered of treating a difference between the king and his people, and it may be the king will not deny any law you advise him, only under this modification, 'That he has employment for Mr. Seymour.' The ceremony of excusing was omitted by Mr. Seymour. Now you will reduce the king to such a strait, as either to give up his Prerogative, or discontent his people. I will not say that we have power in this matter; but that we have right is not yet proved. I had rather give my eyes, hands, and head, than part with this power, if it be your right; but if it be a flower of the Crown, I would rather die than take it away. A blot is no blot till it be hit. Therefore I move, that the thing may be thoroughly debated, and see our own title to it, and not carry a doughbaked representation to the king, that we cannot maintain.

[Soon after sir John Cloberry had made an end of his speech, some merrily-disposed gentlemen sent a Note from hand to hand about the house, sealed up, with this superscription: "To the right honourable lord Cloberio, baron Dough-baked, earl Consummation and Modification, marquis of Materia Prima, Frank Danby."*]

Sir Harbottle Grimstone. Something fell from Cloberry that does a little concern me, of a word slipped from me, 'That the presenting the Speaker to the king was a compliment, &c.' I spoke what I meant, viz. 'That the choice of a Speaker is an act done by the house, and there needed nothing more to be done.' When we are called by the authority of the king's writ, surely it is to do some work, and I believe there never was more work to do than now. Nothing but an act of omnipotence can carry us through it. We carry the Speaker up to the lords bar, to let the king know whom we have made choice of; and he is as much accomplished to do our work, to collect debates for a question, that every man may say Aye or No, clearly to the question, as if he was presented to the king, &c. It is not how things will be construed elsewhere, but naturally here. When I had the honour to serve here as Speaker, in the Convention, [1660] (though the king called it a parliament, it has not had since so great a reputation,) I was then weak in my health; but thus much I remember, that when we were in debates, before the king came hither, I was commanded to wait upon the king with the submission of the house, and after I had been at the lords bar, &c. we had occasion to carry up votes. If ever the Speaker had made excuse, and presented himself for the king's approbation, the transport of joy for the king's coming might have put us upon it. Mr. Wm. Pierpont took exceptions at what I then said at the lords bar, viz. 'That I had not full order for what I said, and was too lavish of my tongue.' If a Speaker, carried up to the lords house, as Mr. Seymour was, and though he excused not the accepting of the employment, yet said, 'He stood for the king's approbation,' which he was not instructed to do, he might well be reprimanded. I am willing to comply with any expedient in this matter; but I would not part with our right.

Serj. Maynard. Gentlemen, I will tell you what I have observed in my time. Cloberry did well to distribute what he had to discourse of; but it is not now seasonable to make a formal determination of the thing. When I heard the question first, I thought it out of all question, but it is not so clear and satisfactory to me, though I am the king's serjeant, and so sworn to maintain the king's prerogative: 'Hannibal ad portas, Catilina intra mœnia.' In Haman's conspiracy against the Jews, Ahasuerus gave them liberty to speak for themselves, and Haman was hanged upon the same gallows he had prepared for Mordecai. But as to the point in question, I had a clear opinion, led by my lord Coke, of 200 years practice, that in that time there was no such thing as a public Speaker till 15 Edw. iii. He said so, but I find it not. 5 R. ii. there was a presentment of a Speaker. I do but observe this, though I do not make any conclusion on one side or other. Sometimes it is found that the Speaker goes up to the lords house, and exercises his oratory in excusing himself, and sometimes not: but never that the Speaker desired the king's approbation, anciently. This Speaker, Seymour, after you have chosen him, makes his excuse, and you refuse it, and he goes up to the king and makes it, and carries his excuse to another place. This is a breach of your privilege. That of sir John Popham was a real excuse, and there was a necessity to constitute another Speaker, for it is impossible that a body of this nature can be without a Speaker.

Ordered, "That an humble Representation be made to his majesty, in the matter relating to the Speaker contained in the Lord Chancellor's Speech."

The Commons' Representation to the King.] March 11. Mr. Powle reported the Representation to the king as follows:

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, with all obedience, return your majesty most hearty thanks for the favourable reception and gracious Answer your majesty was pleased to return to our late Message, wherein your maj. was pleased not only to allow us longer time to deliberate of what was delivered to us by the Lord Chancellor, relating to the Choice of a Speaker, but likewise to express so great a care not to infringe our privileges: and we desire your majesty to believe, that no subjects ever had a more tender regard, than ourselves, of the rights of your majesty, and your royal prerogative; which we shall always acknowledge to be vested in the crown, for the benefit and protection of your people. And therefore, for the clearing all doubts that may arise in your royal mind, upon this occasion now before us, we crave leave humbly to represent to your majesty, that it is the undoubted right of the commons to have the free election of one of their members to be their Speaker, and to perform the service of the house, and that the Speaker, so elected, and presented, according to custom, hath, by the constant practice of all former ages, been continued Speaker, and executed that employment, unless such persons have been excused for some corporal disease, which hath been alleged by themselves, or some others in their behalf, in full parliament. According to this usage, Mr. Edward Seymour was unanimously chosen, upon the consideration of his great abilities and sufficiency for that place, of which we had large experience in the last parliament, and was presented by us to your majesty as a person we conceived would every way be most acceptable to your maj.'s royal judgment. This being the true state of the case, we do in all humility lay it before your majesty's view, hoping that your maj. upon due consideration of former precedents, will rest satisfied with our proceedings, and will not think fit to deprive us of so necessary a member, by employing him in any other service; but to give us such a gracious Answer, as your majesty and your royal predecessors have always done heretofore, upon the like occasions; that so we may, without more loss of time, proceed to the dispatch of those important affairs, for which we were called hither, wherein we doubt not but we shall so behave ourselves, as to give an ample testimony to the whole world of our duty and affection to your majesty's service, and of our care of the peace and prosperity of your kingdoms."

The King's Answer.] To this Representation the king immediately gave this short Answer:

"Gentlemen; All this is but loss of time: and therefore I command you to go back to your house, and do as I have directed you."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Sacheverell. I never knew before that such a Representation was 'loss of time.' I took this Representation to be as modest and dutiful as could be. Divers Representations have been formerly made to his majesty, upon several occasions, and I did expect that we should have such an Answer to this; and we might reasonably expect a gracious answer as formerly, there being nothing but duty in it. But the gentlemen that gave us this answer, would not let the king give us a direct answer, because it would be under examination here. Therefore they have taken this course. It seems, they think it 'loss of time' to inform his majesty of the state of the case about a Speaker. But I would address the king again. In the case of the Declaration, some time since, we did not make one Address, but three, and had some rougher Answers from his majesty than this. Let us justify it to the world, that we have done nothing, but in all duty to maintain our rights. And I move, that we may address the king, that he would please to take our Representation into farther consideration, and give us a gracious Answer.

Lord Cuvendish. I am not of opinion that this interruption proceeds from the same counsels, &c. The last dissolved parliament was uneasy to them; and in this, here are too many men of quality and estates to diminish the rights of the crown. On the one side, I do not fear this will break this parliament; and on the other side, I would not gratify the designs of ill men. It is most proper for us now to consider, whether this thing will admit an expedient. The Speaker may be made a lord, a judge, or an ambassador; and that ends the dispute. Whereas some men fancy that the Speaker is not made without the king's approbation; if so, we give up our right. Till the king approves, or rejects, it is his choice of the Speaker, and not ours. I would have some gentlemen propose whether there may not be an expedient in this case.

Mr. Bennet. This is playing at French hot-cockles. I would not, in this, gratify the designs of ill men, who have thrown this bone amongst us. This is to back and mount the colt with a snaffle, and then to bring him on to a bit and curb. This great assembly is not to be bought nor sold, but, I fear, the last was. It is an expedient, that Mr. Seymour comes not to the house; his absence is an expedient; but still assert your right. I would not have him that is named by the privy council, (Meres) but some other.

Sir Tho. Lee. I never took that for an expedient, that was a total quitting of your right. I think, time is precious; but I do not think that if this matter be not quieted, the parliament will be dissolved. I have seen Answers from the king much blacker than this. This case is of a very great nature, and if once things of this kind come to be refined by distinctions in debate, we may refine away the greatest privileges we have. One parliament called so soon after another has not been for some time. That called in 1640 sat but three weeks, and the king repented half an hour after he had dissolved it, and then another was called; and there is no danger to the kingdom though we are sent away. And wherein does a new parliament differ? They are the people still in another parliament, and I hope no man will be alarmed with that. I wonder not that Mr. Seymour is absent; he knows not what place to sit in, without displeasing the king. The king answers your Representation, 'that this is losing time,' and there is nothing remaining upon your hooks whom you have chosen for Speaker (for till you are qualified by the Tests you can enter nothing;) but it is entered upon the Lords Books, 'That your choice of Mr. Seymour is discharged, and you are directed to choose another man.' And what privilege will you gain by an expedient? When the practice has been always with you of choosing, you will get no reputation by an expedient. I would address the king again in this, and hope for success.

Mr. Vaughan. Your question is not now, whether you shall insist upon Mr. Seymour for Speaker, &c. but your being called hither to consult 'de arduis regni negotiis.' When your privileges are invaded, what way have you to do what you came hither for? I speak now because the parliament is ruining. Perhaps our prince is misinformed, and he does not look upon our paper, nor consider it. Whatever you do afterwards, press your paper now; but at the beginning of a parliament, do not give up your right.

Vol. IV.

Mr. Williams. This is no 'loss of time,' but will be 'loss of right,' if you insist not upon your privileges. And plainly, if the right be with us, shall we sit still, and let it be invaded? And you, in parliament, give away the right of parliament? Acquiesce in your right, one way or other, and have a fair question for it, and part not with it so easily.

Col. Birch. I speak at this time under some disorder and great fear. This matter before us requires as great and serious consideration as any thing that has happened in my time. When the last parliament left things, many things concerning the gentlemen in the Tower were undiscovered; and many were under the fear of it.—This is so plain a thing, that scarce a man but will be descanting upon this point. Undoubtedly your Speaker is chosen, and ought not to be rejected without cause shown why; but those are not true consequences, 'That the king may, by the same reason, refuse all Speakers and Bills too.' I desire to do that here, that, if any mischief follows upon it, we may answer it. We have shown our opinion of Mr. Seymour, and have stuck to him as long as we could. It seems, the king has occasion for him, and you may choose a third person; whoever does this, I am apt to think, will do more. I desire none will prejudge. Greater things than this must be debated. Whoever threw in the bone, the king will see that we step over this to oblige him. I hope he will let us go currently in our business. The king's Answer to me looks as if something was resolved on, and then I doubt whether we are able to answer to God and those that sent us hither, in the result, if we too much insist upon our right. In the choice of a third person, it loses not our liberty, but, I believe, gains a step.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. I was never reduced to so great a strait how to give my opinion, as I am now. Did I think this was giving up your rights, I would be the last man that should give my consent to it. I think the king has power to deny his approbation of a Speaker. Suppose it should so fall out that any parliament should make choice of a Speaker to-day, and that gentleman should be so unhappy as to wound any man, and that man be in danger of his life, and the king should say, 'I am informed of such a thing? or that the Speaker you had chosen had had a hand in this Conspiracy of the Papists:—he was taken down to Order by Sir Harbottle Grimstone. Really we are in great disorder, as to Arguments, on both sides. The point in debate is the king's approbation and reprobation of a Speaker chosen. As well give it up and monstrari digitis. The Speaker we have chosen, Mr. Seymour, has declared his abilities; and some Speakers may so spoil a question that you may never do any business. If the king has such a prerogative, that the king may say 'no' to our choice, it may serve a turn to knock another Speaker down as well as this, and so we shall become utterly useless to the intent we were sent hither for. In this great strait, if an expedient could be found out, if we could make our claim on record, as well as the king's refusal on the Lords Books; but that appears there, and ours does not, and is no where for us. As this now stands, were there not something else in the case, we would easily part with it. It is a great advantage for the king to set up his throne in the hearts of his people. There will be great difficulty in an expedient in this matter; and that must be with great patience and kindness to hear one another. If the king pleases to call Mr. Seymour to the lords house, all is free and at liberty, and we may proceed to the choice of another, and our privileges will be safe. But since we are between two rocks, it becomes prudent men to go where the least danger is. But I know not what to propose.

Sir Edw. Dering. I am not so superstitious that, because we stumbled at the threshold, we should leave off our journey: and I hope we shall be at our journey's end. I hoped, that, after two or three days, and the consideration of the merits of the person, and our choice, the king would have admitted Mr. Seymour. But seeing he does not, I would proceed to another choice. There is no precedent directly in the case, of our power. In this doubtful case, I would consider in prudence what is to be done. All know our dissatisfactions at home, and that we have a powerful enemy abroad. We have a restless faction at home of Papists. We are in a very bad and helpless condition. Suppose the king should dissolve this parliament, upon this point, and call another, it will be a discouragement to gentlemen to come again; and if there be no other consequence of our pains than to sit but a week, gentlemen will not be ambitious of that trust. Consider, whether we can answer it to the country, if we break upon this point. If it be said, 'That if the king refuses one Speaker, he may refuse 500, and has not refused any, these hundreds of years,' that is a strange inference. I think it the best expedient to chuse a third person.

Mr. Garroway. I am not much frightened, nor much invited to sit, since I find, at the beginning, what entertainment you are likely to have at the latter end of the parliament. We are only unhappy that the king does not consider our Representation. Let us try the king whether he will or no, for one day. I would not yield up our right, and, I believe, the king will find out an expedient, and neither infringe your liberty nor his own prerogative. I have known whole sessions defeated in a day, by a prorogation; and if this be done, by the same counsel it may be again. I pray that, with all duty imaginable, the king may be farther addressed in the matter; and if he will not give us an Answer, then I would put the question of our right.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This point of prerogative, that has stuck these hundreds of years, will raise that other scruple to break you. There is great difference betwixt matters of grace and matters of right. This of chusing our Speaker, is so much of the essence of parliament, that we cannot part with it. When was any Speaker, that was presented, ever refused? If nothing of that be, but absolute power in the king; suppose five or six Subsidies should be demanded, and you make application to the king, and represent, 'That the commons are poor and cannot raise them all,' and the king should answer, 'Go your ways, consider what I have said, and raise them.' I am afraid that, when you have chosen your Speaker, and that is over, still you will have blocks and interpositions in the way, and ill counsellors will be encouraged to advise yet worse. The same Answer may be given to our three requests of Freedom of Speech, &c. If my borough that I serve for should ask me, 'Why we did not chuse another Speaker?' I will answer, 'Because I will not part with their right.' I advise, therefore, that we do as was done in the former king's time, in the Petition of Right; that we apply to the king for a better Answer to our Representation.

Serj. Maynard. This is not a question to put the ruin of a nation upon. The last parliament, pursuing things with zeal and truth, yet were dissolved. I could not have believed it. I believe that gentlemen have in this matter spoken their hearts, and I believe I shall speak mine too. What is your evidence for this right that you pretend to? From R. ii.'s and Hen. iv.'s time, there has been no denial of the Speaker that you have chosen. Because it has not been denied, cannot it be denied? why do you let the Speaker excuse himself at the lords bar, and not accept his excuse here: if a man can show the fruits of his ancient possession, though his evidence be lost, yet that goes a great way. It is said, 'by this we shall lose our privilege, and Speakers may be rejected without end.' It cannot be presumed that our Speakers will be rejected till one be got for the turn; that will be too gross. We come here for the good of the king's crown, and the government, and posterity, as well as for our own present good. If we demand just laws of the king, he grants or rejects them, and it is matter of grace, and not of right; and that is a greater prerogative than rejecting or accepting a Speaker. That which astonishes me is, we have dangers at home and abroad. This matter of right is not clear to me. But it is clear that we shall be ruined by a breach with the king.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. I think it a good expedient to chuse a third person for Speaker, and I think it not fit to represent to the king what he has twice denied us. The king's negative power is as much as chusing a Speaker.

Mr. Vaughan. What higher testimony can a subject have for all he has than records? I would not show the way here to cancel records. When we consider that 30 laws were broken by the Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, and money given for a Fleet, and we had no Fleet, money for an Army, and no war, what cannot we suppose? what remedy can we have, when the king will not so much as look upon our Petition, that has all our rights? the same counsel put him upon this. This is but beginning to ride a parliament. Languishing persons to take physic, not out of hopes to be cured, but to prolong their life some time. I fear that may be our case.

Col. Titus. There are not worse counsels than have been given by those about the king, and I expect no better from them. Nobody will deny that the choice of a Speaker is in the house. This matter is not of that last importance as to venture the kingdom upon it. If the king denies one or two Speakers, he may deny ten, till he have one to serve a turn: it is possible, but not probable. The words of the writ that calls us hither are, 'to consult de quibusdam arduis regni negotiis'—and all that is to give Money: an empty Exchequer, and a full house! will the king lose his Money, do you think, by putting by 40 Speakers? I would not have that argument pass, that if we chuse not another Speaker, we shall be dissolved. When once a parliament is so fond of their places, and so fearful of a dissolution, that parliament did never do any good. Gentlemen did not expect such an Answer from the king; but when I consider who was the counsellor of it, I wonder not at all at it. I move you to adjourn till to-morrow.—The debate was accordingly adjourned by the Clerk.

March 12. Sir John Cloberry moves, that the question may be put for the chusing another Speaker.

Mr. Trenchard. The king has no right to reject our Speaker, but ancient usage has been to the contrary. Consider the nature of the thing; if the case be doubtful, we ought to insist upon it. It is a great inconvenience to the house to have no Speaker; and more for the king; and where it is so, it ought to turn the scales. We are told of 'dangers abroad and at home.' But that is more to give warrant for us to give our rights away. Those persons who formerly have made misunderstandings betwixt the king and parliament, I see, will continue it: as yet you cannot honourably admit of an expedient. At present, you have humbly addressed the king by way of representation of your case; and the king has given you such an Answer as was never yet given to any house of commons. You expose the honour of the house to censure, if you give up your right upon such a slight answer. I would therefore address the king for a farther answer.

Sir Hugh Cholmondeley. As far as I can guess, this question is better to be left undetermined than determined. If the king can refuse a Speaker, he may refuse several. If the king has not liberty, &c. he cannot displace, upon excuse of infirmity. We had better begin anew, and leave it as it was. It was moved, 'That the king might cause nothing of this matter to be entered upon the Lords Journal.' I propose that way as most expedient.

Sir Harbottle Grimstone. It has been our work four or five days to find out an expedient in this matter, and we cannot. The king has been so advised, that we chuse any member but one; which is as much as to say, 'chuse whom you will but 20.' Except one, and except 20. It was a saying of king James, 'That when he called a parliament, he let down his prerogative to his people; but when he dissolved a parliament, he took it up again; not for his pleasure, but for his power.' If one Address will not do, I am for a second and a third to the king.

Sir John Reresby. If you put the king upon a dissolution of the parliament upon this point, though some gentlemen say, 'they do not fear it, because of the king's necessity for Money;' the king's necessity is his people's necessity; and if we have so little consideration of the king's necessity, the king may have as little as our's; therefore I move that you will nominate a third person.

Sir Thomas Exton. I shall not enter into the debate of the king's prerogative in this matter. I am not of opinion, that to wave it now is to give it up for ever. The city is on fire, and one comes and blows up my house, which is my right, but upon that extremity I wave it. No man will say that this is our right; and as the king has given up his right by our free choice of a Speaker, as he has directed you, it is no yielding the point.

Mr. Williams. Prerogative does and must consist, and the essence of it, as much in custom as any of our privileges. Now the business of the five days is to make a precedent in your house against yourselves as it were. Dr. Exton, who is in another orb of the law, would let your right sleep now, to resume * it another time. Now popery and foreign fears are upon us! I have ever observed, that prerogative once gained was never got back again, and our privileges lost are never restored. What will become of you when a popish successor comes, when in king Charles ii.'s time, the best of princes, you gave up this privilege? When you have the oppression of a tyrant upon you, and all ill counsels upon you, what will become of you? Now you have none to struggle with, but ill counsellors and a good prince. I will lay this as heavy upon counsellors as any man can lay it upon mas. I am as willing to heal as any man, but can you lay this aside with honour, having represented it already? He that made this question cannot want another to play with, and then you will be sent home maimed in your privileges, wounded in your body. This is gagging the commons of England, and like an Italian revenge, damning the soul first, and then killing the body. The Representation you have delivered, is very moderately penned; and will you receive this manner of answering? When you have presented an humble Petition, what sort of Answer do you receive? Do you not, by laying this aside, set up a worse precedent than you have had an Answer? I have that in my mind which I cannot so well express, but gentlemen may easily imagine. By good counsel, the king may heal all this, but it will never be in the power of the house of commons to retrieve it, if you give up your right.

The Commons' Second Representation to the King.] The commons then agreed upon the following humble Representation to his majesty:

“Most gracious sovereign: Whereas by the gracious Answer your maj. was pleased to give to our first Message in council, whereby your maj. was pleased to declare a resolution not to infringe our just rights and privileges, we, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal commons, were encouraged to make an humble Representation to your majesty upon the choice of our Speaker, which on Tuesday last was presented to your maj. by some of our members: we do, with great trouble and infinite sorrow, find by the report that was made to us, by those members at their return, that your maj. was pleased to give an immediate Answer to the same, without taking any farther consideration thereof; which, we are persuaded, if your maj. had done, what we then offered to your maj. would have so far prevailed upon your royal judgment, as to have given your maj. satisfaction, as to the reasonableness thereof, and preserved us in your majesty's favourable opinion of our proceedings: and since we do humbly conceive, that the occasion of this question hath arisen from your majesty's not being truly informed of the state of the case, we humbly beseech your maj. to take the said Representation into your farther consideration, and to give us such a gracious Answer, that we may be put into a capacity to manifest our readiness to enter into those consultations which necessarily tend to the preservation and welfare of your maj. and your kingdoms.”

The King's Answer.] To this Representation the king immediately gave this quick reply, “I will return you an Answer to-morrow.”

The King prorogues the Parliament for two days.] March 13. The commons being met, in expectation of his majesty's Answer, about 11 of the clock the king sent the black rod for them to attend him in the house of lords, which they did; where the Lord Chancellor said, “That it was his majesty's pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued to the 15th instant. And accordingly it is prorogued to that time.”

SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] March 15, 1678-9. The house met, according to the prorogation, when his majesty, in the lords house, spoke to this effect:

“My lords and gentlemen; Though this hath been a very short recess, yet there are some doubts whether you can take notice of what I said at the opening of this parliament, in point of form; therefore it is necessary that I recommend to you what I and my Lord Chancellor said to you the other day, as if we said it now. The rest I refer to the Lord Chancellor.”

The Lord Chancellor then spoke as follows:

“My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons; Since it hath pleased the king to refer you all to what he lately said at the opening of this parliament, it will concern us all to take it into our most serious thoughts, and to enter upon the matter therein recommended to us, that so we may proceed effectually in that great work for which we were called, without being diverted from it by any consideration whatsoever. For if this parliament succeed not well, if it do not quiet and compose the minds of all the people; it will be thought the most unaccountable thing in the world, considering the great preparations the king hath made for it, and those excellent dispositions of mind he brings towards it. Wherefore, that no time may be lost, his majesty commands you, gentlemen of the house of commons, to proceed immediately to your choice of a Speaker, and his maj. will expect that he be presented to him on Monday next.”

Serjeant Gregory chosen Speaker.] The commons then returned to their house to chuse their Speaker.

Lord Russell. Gentlemen, I hope the occasion of the late unhappy difference about the choice of our Speaker is removed by the prorogation. And I hope now that no ill persons, by tricks, can create a misunderstanding betwixt the king and his people, and hinder the happy effects of this session. And since the first step we are to make is to chuse a Speaker, I shall humbly recommend Mr. Serj. Gregory as a fit person.

Mr. Sacheverell. I stand not up to oppose the motion, but for what every honest gentleman ought to do. I blame no man that differs from me, or goes according to his judgment. I differ from those who think that this point of right, of chusing our Speaker, is now quiet, and I stand up only to give my reason for it, why I differ, and then I will withdraw. I differ, because that in honour we cannot leave Mr. Seymour, since he may suffer by being named Speaker by us. Next, if our right be not maintained, we have a precedent upon us. Next, if there be no expedient, then the motion is warrantable; but I know not of any.

Lord Cavendish. By the last prorogation, the king seemed rather to yield to us, by admitting that the point in difference could not be decided any other way. The king's denial of the Speaker that we chose is not entered into the lords Books. Therefore in respect to the affairs of the nation, let us chuse our Speaker, and I second the motion for serj. Gregory.

Serj. Gregory. I humbly thank you for your good opinion of me; but when I consider the weight of your debates, which require a person of the greatest experience and parts, my time of sitting here has not been above a year, and my experience so little that you may suffer in your affairs; and I come with the greatest disadvantage imaginable to succeed a person of so much experience. Pray consider of it and chuse a more experienced person.

Then lord Russel and lord Cavendish took him by the arms, and led him to the Chair; which he did not in the least resist.—On the 17th he was presented to the king, who without hesitation approved of the choice.

A committee of Secrecy appointed.] March 20. The commons resolved, "That a Committee of Secrecy be appointed to take Informations, and prepare Evidence, and draw up Articles against the lords that are impeached, and that are now in the Tower, and to take such farther Informations as shall be given, relating to the Plot and Conspiracy against his majesty and the government, and the Murder of sir E. Godfrey."

The Commons remind the Lords of the Impeachments against the E. of Danby.] They next resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords to put them in mind of the Impeachment of High-Treason, exhibited against Tho. earl of Danby, in the names of the commons of England, and to desire that he may be committed to safe custody."

Oates and Bedloe's Informations.] March 21. Dr. Tongue and Mr. Oates were called before the commons, to give in their Informations concerning the Plot, &c. and the latter gave in an Information, not only against the earl of Danby, but also against sir John Robinson, col. E. Sackville, and capt. H. Goring, all three members of the house of commons: which raised a new flame in that place.—Bedloe likewise delivered in his Information; upon which the house Resolved, "That an humble Address be made to his majesty, that the 500*l.* reward, promised by his proclamation for the discovery of the Murder of sir E. Godfrey, may be forthwith paid to Mr. Bedloe, who, this house is satisfied to be the first discoverer thereof: and that his majesty would farther be pleased to order, that the 20*l.* reward, for the discovery of every Priest, may be effectually paid to the Discoverers of them."—In another Address, they desired his majesty, That the care of Mr. Bedloe's Safety may be immediately recommended to his grace the duke of Monmouth." To which the king gave a present Answer: "That he would take immediate care for the payment of the 500*l.* and the 20*l.* they desired: that he had hitherto taken all the care he could of Mr. Bedloe, and that he knew how considerable his Evidence was, and that he would see hereafter that he should want for nothing, and that he would be responsible for him, whilst he remained in Whitehall; but that he could not be answerable for him when he went abroad."

The Plot voted to be real.] They next came to this Resolve, "The house doth declare, that they are fully satisfied by the Proofs they have heard, that there now is, and, for divers years last past, hath been, a horrid and treasonable Plot and Conspiracy, contrived and carried on by those of the Popish Religion, for the murdering his majesty's sacred person, and for subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient and well-established government of this kingdom." To this Vote they desired the concurrence of the lords, which was granted.

Message against the E. of Danby.] March 22. The commons ordered a Bill to be brought in, to secure the king and kingdom against the Danger and Growth of Popery. And being commanded, at the same time, to attend his majesty in the house of peers, the king spoke to them in favour of the earl of Danby: but returning to their house, they presently Resolved, "That a Message be immediately sent to the lords, to remind their lordships of the last Message sent them from this house, relating to Tho. earl of Danby; and to demand that he may be forthwith sequestered from parliament, and committed to safe custody." Upon this request the lords desired a Conference: but the commons returned answer, "That it was not agreeable to the usage and proceedings of parliament, for either house to send for a conference, without expressing the subject matter of it."—Upon a second Message, wherein the earl of Danby was mentioned, they met the lords in the Painted-Chamber, where the duke of Monmouth spoke as follows: "I am commanded by the lords to acquaint you, that their lordships, having taken into their consideration matters relating to the earl of Danby, together with what his maj. was pleased to say upon that subject, have ordered that a Bill be brought in, by which Tho. earl of Danby may be made for ever incapable of coming into his majesty's presence, and of all offices and employments, and of receiving any gifts or grants from the crown, and of sitting in the house of peers."

The King grants the Earl a Pardon.] In the mean time, the commons, hearing that the king had signed a Pardon for the earl, appointed a committee to repair to the several offices, (at neither of which no entry of it had been made) and particularly to the Lord Chancellor, to enquire into the manner of suing out that Pardon. Whereupon the Lord-Chancellor, (after premising, that he neither advised, drew, or altered it) informed the committee, "That the said Pardon was passed with the utmost privacy, at the desire of the earl, who gave this reason for it, That he did not intend to make use of it, but to stand upon his innocence, except false witnesses should be produced against him; and then he would make use of it at the last extremity. That he advised the earl to let the Pardon pass in the regular course; but, after consulting with the king, his maj. declared he was resolved to let it pass with all privacy: and, suddenly after, the king commanded the Lord-Chancellor to bring the seal from Whitehall, and, being there, he laid it upon the table; thereupon his majesty commanded the seal to be taken out of the bag, which his lordship was obliged to submit unto, it not being in his power to hinder it; and the king wrote his name upon the top of the parchment, and then directed to have it sealed: whereupon the person that usually carried the purse, affixed the seal to it." The Chancellor added, "That, at the very time of affixing the seal to the parchment, he did not look upon himself to have the custody of the seal."

The Commons resolve to demand Justice against him, and declare his Pardon illegal.] Upon reading this Report, the house fell into a violent heat and debate; and of those that spoke, we must not omit Mr. Powle's severe Speech, who naming the earl of Danby, proceeded thus: "The person to whom we owe the dangers and fears of the French king against us: the person to whom we owe the threats and severe Answers to those humble Addresses we made the last session of parliament: the person to whom we owe the ruin of this nation, and exhausting the king's Revenue: the person to whom we owe the expence of 200,000*l.* a year unaccounted for: the person to whom we owe the raising of a Standing-Army, to be kept up by the Receipt of six millions of livres yearly, for three years, to enslave us and our Religion: the person to whom we owe the late bone that was thrown in on the sitting of the last parliament, to hinder the good issue that might have come by their proceedings; who is now laying down his staff, and making up his accounts in the Treasury as he pleases, to enrich himself out of the spoils of the people, and so depart." At the conclusion of the debate, Resolved nem. con. "That a Message be sent to the lords to demand Justice, in the name of the commons of England, against Thomas earl of Danby; and that he may be immediately sequestered from parliament, and committed to safe custody." They likewise resolved, "That an humble Address be made to his majesty, representing the irregularity and illegality of the Pardon, mentioned by his majesty to be granted to the earl of Danby, and the dangerous consequence of granting Pardons to any persons that lie under an Impeachment of the commons of England."

The Earl of Danby makes his Escape.] March 25. The lords sent a Message to acquaint the commons, "That they had sent to apprehend the earl of Danby both to his house here in town, and to his house at Wimbledon; and that the gentleman usher of the black rod had returned their lordships Answer, that he could not be found." *

* "Though the gentleman usher reported, that the bird was flown, yet the contrary was true; for though his servants denied him, both at his house in town and at Wimbledon, sir John Reresby saw him come out of his closet at midnight, from a consultation with his intimates the 24th, which was the very day the

The Commons resolve to attain the Earl of Danby.] "Whereupon the commons ordered, 'That a bill be brought in to summon Tho. earl of Danby to render himself to justice by a certain day, to be therein limited; or in default thereof, to attain him.'

The Earl of Shaftsbury's Speech on the State of the Nation.] March 25. It was moved in the house of lords, "That inquiry may be made into the State of the Nation," upon which occasion,

The Earl of Shaftsbury made the following Speech: "My lords; You are appointing the consideration of the state of England, to be taken up in a committee of the whole house, some day next week. I do not know well how what I have to say may be received, for I never study either to make my court well, or to be popular; I always speak what I am commanded by the dictates of the Spirit within me.—There are some considerations abroad, that concern England so nearly, that without them you will come far short of safety and quiet at home: 'We have a little Sister, and she hath no Breasts; what shall we do for our sister in the day when she shall be spoken for? if she be a Wall, we will build on her a Palace of Silver; if she be a door, we will inclose her with Boards of Cedar.' We have several little sisters without breasts, the French protestant churches, the two kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland; the foreign protestants are a wall; the only wall and defence to England; upon it you may build palaces of silver, glorious palaces. The protection of the protestants abroad is the greatest power and security the crown of England can attain to, and which can only help us to give check to the growing greatness of France. Scotland and Ireland are two doors, either to let in good or mischief upon us; they are much weakened by the artifice of our cunning enemies, and we ought to inclose them with boards of cedar.—Popery and slavery, like two sisters, go hand in hand, and sometimes one goes first, sometimes the other; but whosoever the one enters, the other is always following close at hand.—In England, popery was to have brought in slavery; in Scotland, slavery went before, and popery was to follow.—I do not think your lordships, or the parliament, have jurisdiction there. It is a noble and ancient kingdom; they have an illustrious nobility, a gallant gentry, a learned clergy, and an understanding, worthy people: but yet, we cannot think of England as we ought, without reflecting on the condition they are in. They are under the same prince, and the influence of the same favourites and councils; when they are hardly dealt with, can we that are richer expect better usage? for it is certain that in all absolute governments, the poorest countries are always most favourably dealt with.—When the an-lords made the order for his commitment; and when he did disappear, it was only to take sanctuary at Whitehall." Ralph.

tient nobility and gentry there cannot enjoy their royalties, their shrievaldoms, and their stewardries, which they and their ancestors have possessed for several hundreds of years; (but that now they are enjoined by the lords of the council, to make deputations of their authorities to such as are their known enemies) can we enjoy our Magna Charta long under the same persons and administration of affairs? if the council-table there can imprison any nobleman or gentleman for several years, without bringing him to trial, or giving the least reason for what they do; can we expect the same men will preserve the liberty of the subject here?—I will acknowledge, I am not well versed in the particular laws of Scotland; but this I do know, that all the northern countries have, by their laws, an undoubted and inviolable right to their liberties and properties; yet Scotland hath outdone all the eastern and southern countries, in having their lives, liberties, and estates subjected to the arbitrary will and pleasure of those that govern. They have lately plundered and harassed the richest and wealthiest counties of that kingdom, and brought down the barbarous Highlanders to devour them; and all this without almost a colourable pretence to do it: nor can there be found a reason of state for what they have done; but that those wicked ministers designed to procure a rebellion at any rate, which, as they managed, was only prevented by the miraculous hand of God, or otherwise all the papists in England would have been armed, and the fairest opportunity given, in the just time for the execution of that wicked and bloody design the papists had; and it is not possible for any man that duly considers it, to think other, but that those ministers that acted that, were as guilty of the Plot, as any of the lords that are in question for it.—My lords, I am forced to speak this the plainer, because till the pressure be fully and clearly taken off from Scotland, it is not possible for me, or any thinking man to believe, that good is meant to us here.—We must still be upon our guard, apprehending that the principle is not changed at court; and that these men are still in place and authority, who have that influence upon the mind of our excellent prince, that he is not, nor cannot be that to us, that his own nature and goodness would incline him to.—I know your lordships can order nothing in this, but there are those that hear me can put a perfect cure to it; until that be done, the Scottish weed is like death in the pot, 'mors in olla;' but there is something too, now I consider, that most immediately concerns us; their act of 22,000 men to be ready to invade us upon all occasions. This, I hear, that the lords of the council there have treated as they do all other laws, and expounded it into a Standing-Army of 6000 men. I am sure we have reason and right to beseech the king that that Act may be better considered in the next parliament there. I shall say no more for Scotland, at this time; I am afraid your lordships will think I have said too much, having no concern there; but if a French nobleman should come to dwell in my house and family, I should think it concerned me to ask what he did in France? for if he were there a felon, a rogue, a plunderer, I should desire him to live elsewhere; and I hope your lordships will do the same thing for the nation, if you find the same cause.—My lords, give me leave to speak two or three words concerning our other sister, Ireland: thither, I hear, is sent Douglas's regiment, to secure us against the French. Besides, I am credibly informed, that the Papists have their arms restored, and the Protestants are not many of them yet recovered from being the respected party; the sea-towns, as well as the inland, are full of Papists: that kingdom cannot long continue in the English hands, if some better care be not taken of it. This is in your power, and there is nothing there, but is under your laws; therefore I beg that this kingdom at least may be taken into consideration, together with the state of England; for I am sure there can be no safety here, if these doors be not shut up and made sure."

Col. Sackville expelled.] This day, Ontes gave his testimony against col. Sackville, a Member of the house formerly mentioned, declaring that he said, "That they were sons of whores, who said there was a Plot, and that he was a lying rogue that said it." Whereupon the colonel was immediately sent to the Tower, and ordered to be expelled the house, with a Petition to the king to be made incapable of bearing any office. But in a short time, upon his submission, he was discharged from his imprisonment, but not restored to his seat.

A Conference about the Earl of Danby.] April 4. A conference was held between the two houses, in the Painted Chamber, concerning the Bill sent up against the earl of Danby; where the earl of Anglesey, lord Privy Seal, delivered himself to this effect, being the chief manager for the peers; "That the lords chose to deliver back this Bill by conference, rather than Message, to preserve a good understanding, and prevent debate and controversy between them. The lords observe, that the greatest affairs of the nation are at a stand, at a time of the greatest danger and difficulty that this kingdom ever laboured under; that the king hath always in his reign inclined to mercy and clemency to all his subjects: therefore to a king so merciful and compassionate, the first interruption of his clemency they did desire should not proceed from the two houses pressing the king to an act of the greatest severity; therefore they have passed the Bill with some amendments, which be delivered to them."—The commons were no way satisfied with the lords proceedings, therefore drew up Reasons against them, to be offered in another conference, which were as follow: "The addition of the title does shew, that the Amendments made by your lordships to the Bill do wholly alter the nature of it, and from a Bill of Attainder have converted it to a Bill of Banishment, which the commons cannot consent to for these Reasons: 1. That banishment is not the legal judgment in cases of High-Treason, and the earl of Danby being impeached by the commons of high-treason, and having fled from justice, hath hereby confessed the Charge, and therefore ought to have the judgment of high-treason for the punishment. 2. That banishment being not the punishment the law inflicts upon those crimes, the earl of Danby might make use of this remission of his sentence as an argument, that either the commons were distrustful of their proofs against him, or else that the crimes are not in themselves of so high a nature as treason. 3. That the example of this would be an encouragement to all persons that should be hereafter impeached by the commons, to withdraw themselves from justice, which they would be always ready to do, if not prevented by a commitment upon their Impeachment, and therefore hope to obtain a more favourable Sentence in a legislative way, than your lordships would be obliged to pass upon them in your judicial capacity."

An Address for a Proclamation to apprehend the Earl of Danby.] Upon the reading of this Paper, they immediately resolved, "That an Address be presented to his majesty that he would issue out his royal proclamation for apprehending of Tho. earl of Danby; and to command all ministers of justice to use diligence to apprehend him; and to forbid all subjects to harbour him; and to require all officers of the household to take care that no person suffer him to conceal himself in any of the king's palaces."

A second Conference on the Bill of Attainder.] On the same day, the commons had a second conference with the lords upon the same case, where the earl of Huntington managed for the house of peers, and what he delivered was to this effect: "The lords have desired this conference with the commons, not so much to argue and dispute, as to mitigate and reconcile: They have already observed, That the debates of this Bill have given too long, and too great an obstruction to public business; and therefore they desire you to believe, that that is the reason which hath chiefly prevailed with their lordships in a matter of this nature. And upon this ground it is, that if a way may be found to satisfy and secure the public fears, by doing less than the Bill you have proposed, the lords do not think it advisable to insist upon the utmost and most rigorous satisfaction to public justice, which might be demanded. To induce you to this compliance, the lords do acknowledge, that Banishment is so far from being the legal judgment in case of high treason, that it is not the legal judgment in any case whatsoever, since it can never be inflicted but by the legislative authority: But they see no reason why the legislative authority should always be bound to act to the utmost extent of its power; for there may be a prudential necessity sometimes of making abatements, and it might be of fatal consequence, if it should not be so. And the lords, to remove all jealousies of the precedents of this kind, do declare, that nothing which hath been done in the earl of Danby's case, shall ever be drawn into example for the time to come, and will so enter it upon their Journal. And thereupon their lordships insist upon their Amendments so far, as to exclude all Attainders; and do promise themselves the commons will in this point comply with their lordships, who do again assure them, That their Resolutions are grounded only upon their tenderness, and the consideration of the public."

A third and free Conference.] This being not satisfactory, a third and free conference was held two days after, in which the Lord Privy-Seal said: "That the house of commons might see by the present quick free Conference, which the lords desired, that their lordships did shew their willingness, by using all means possible, to reconcile both houses, and to come to such an understanding, as to pass the Bill with all expedition. He owned the cogency of the commons reasons, and therefore the lords were content to make the Bill absolute, without giving the lord Danby any day to appear, and the penalties to continue. He observed, that, by the passing of this Bill, he would not only be ruined, together with his family, but likewise those acquisitions which he got by the marriage into a noble family, would be lost. And if the commons would have any other penalties added to the Bill, their lordships would leave it to them, provided they run not to the absolute destruction of the lord impeached." He took notice, "That although reason and justice were of the commons side, yet in a legislative capacity, they were to consider circumstances with relation to the good of the public. That in this affair they had gained two great points; the first was, 'That Impeachments made by the commons in one parliament, continue from session to session, and parliament to parliament, notwithstanding prorogations or dissolutions:' the other point was, 'That in cases of Impeachment upon special matter shewn, if the modesty of the party impeached directs him not to withdraw, the lords admit that of right they order him to withdraw, and that afterwards he must be committed.' But without special matter alledged, he said, he did not know how many of their lordships might be picked out of the house of a sudden."

The earl of Shaftesbury, now in a way of preferment in court, declared, "They were as willing to be rid of the earl of Danby, as the commons; but he let them know, That the expression which was sent with Reasons from the lords the other day, namely, That the lords would not draw into example the proceedings of the earl of Danby, but would vacate them; they intended that to extend only to the points of not withdrawing and not committing. He likewise declared, That the way now proposed would be a means to have the Bill pass; for the commons might have other penalties if they would, as confiscation of estate, loss of honours, &c. Therefore he desired the commons to consider, that there were weighty Reasons, which were better understood than expressed, that proved it necessary for the good of the public, that this Bill should speedily pass."

The commons replied, "That they hoped their lordships did not think, they took it as if they had now gained any point; for the points, which their lordships mentioned as gained, were nothing but what was agreeable to the ancient course and methods of parliament."

The Bill of Attainder passes against him.] Then they delivered the Bill again to the lords, with their Amendments, with expression of hopes and desire of their concurrence with them, that justice may have its course, and the great affairs of parliament be no longer obstructed, by spending more time on him, who hath brought the kingdom into so sad a condition.—And thus they so immoveably adhered to their own Bill of Attainder, that, within two or three days time, the lords thought fit to pass the Bill, in which the 21st of April was appointed for the earl's surrendering himself to trial.

The Earl surrenders himself.] The earl finding himself reduced to this extremity, rather than risk the mischiefs that might happen to himself, or to the king, if he should refuse to pass the Bill, on the 15th of April surrendered himself to the usher of the black rod, which was signified to the commons the next day.

The five Popish Lords put in their Answers.] April 16. The house was informed by a Message from the lords, That all the five Peers, lately committed to the Tower, had brought their Answers to the Impeachments against them, in person, except the lord Bellasis. Upon which a debate arose, Whether the said lord Bellasis, having not in person delivered his Answer, was actually and legally arraigned? And a committee was ordered to inspect the Entries that had been made in the Lords Journals touching the appearance and arraignment of the five Lords, and give in their report the next day.

A Supply voted and appropriated.] The same day, the house resolved, "That a Supply be granted to his majesty of 206,462*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for the paying off and dismissing all the Forces then in arms, raised or brought over from foreign parts, to be raised by six months tax."—The next day, a Clause was ordered to be added to the said Resolution, to appropriate the Money to that use only, with penalties upon such persons as should divert the same: and, a motion being made, That the said Supply should be paid into the Exchequer, the house divided, and it passed in the Affirmative, Noes 131, Yeas 191.

Report of the Contents of the Lords Journals, relating to the five Popish Lords.]

April 17. The Report of the committee appointed to inspect the Lords Journals was delivered in by Mr. Hampden, in effect as follows: "That April 8, the lord Shaftsbury reported from the committee of privileges, That their lordships were of opinion, that the lords now prisoners, ought to be brought to the bar, and kneel there, and then stand up, and hear the Articles against them read. Which was ordered by the house accordingly; That April 9, the lords Powis, Stafford, Petre, and Arundel of Wardour did appear at the bar of the house, where they heard the Articles against them read, and were told, his majesty would appoint a lord high steward for their trials: That, then, the lords, having put in several requests, withdrew, and being called in again, were told by the lord-chancellor, That the house had ordered the several indictments brought against them by the grand jury, should be brought into that court by writ of certiorari, that their lordships should be allowed copies of the Articles against them, that till the 15th would be given them for their Answers, and farther time, in case any new Articles were alledged: with liberty to take out copies of records, journals, &c. That, then, they find notice taken, that lord Bellasis had not appeared at the bar. And that Tho. Plessington, and Robert Dent, being sworn, had attested that his lordship was so ill of the gout, that he could not turn in his bed without help: which reasonable excuse being allowed, the said Tho. Plessington, in behalf of his lordship, desired a copy of the Articles exhibited against his lordship, with council, &c. which particulars were all granted: That April 15 being appointed for the said lords to put in their Answers, they were ordered to be brought to the bar of the house, for that purpose, and that lord Bellasis was permitted to deliver in his Answer in writing."

The commons then ordered the Answers of the said lords to be inspected by the Committee of Secrecy: who were farther to consider the methods of proceeding upon Impeachments, and give in their Report accordingly.

The King's Speech to the Parliament, on declaring a new Privy-Council.] April 21. His majesty, by message, commanded the commons to attend him in the house of peers, where he expressed himself, as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I thought it requisite to acquaint you with what I have done now this day; which is, that I have established a new Privy Council, the constant number of which shall never exceed 30*. I have made choice of such persons as are worthy and able to advise me; and am resolved, in all my weighty and important affairs, next to the advice of my Great Council in parliament (which I shall very often consult with), to be advised by this Privy council. I could not make so great a change, without acquainting both houses of parliament. And I desire you all to apply yourselves heartily, as I shall do, to those things which are necessary for the good and safety of the kingdom, and that no time may be lost in it*.”

* “At last the king was prevailed upon to dismiss the Council, which was all made up of lord Danby’s creatures; and the chief men of both houses were brought into the new Council. This was carried with so much secrecy, that it was not so much as suspected, till the day before it was done.” Burnet.

“It does not appear that either house acknowledged the compliment of this speech by Address, which is now become almost a matter of course on much less considerable occasions, or even, that any such acknowledgment was moved for.” Ralph.

“The house of commons received it with most coldness, where the contrary was most expected, and the pretended knowers among them, who were not of the Council, pretended now to know nothing of it, to expect new revelations, to doubt it might be a new court-juggle, and to refer it to time to tell what it was in truth; in the mean time to suspend their judgments.” Temple.

“Sir William Temple had lately been recalled from his foreign employments; and the king, who, after the removal of Danby, had no one with whom he could so much as discourse with freedom of public affairs, was resolved, upon Coventry’s dismissal, to make him one of his secretaries of state. But that philosophical patriot, too little interested for the intrigues of a court, too full of spleen and delicacy for the noisy turbulence of popular assemblies, was alarmed at the universal discontent and jealousies which prevailed, and was determined to make his retreat, as soon as possible, from a scene which threatened such confusion. Meanwhile, he could not refuse the confidence with which his master honoured him; and he resolved to employ it to the public service. He represented to the king, that, as the jealousies of the nation were extreme, it was necessary to cure them by some new remedy, and to restore that mutual confidence, so requisite for the safety both of king and people: that to refuse every thing to the parliament in their present disposition, or to yield every thing, was equally dangerous to the constitution, as well as to public tranquillity: that if the king would introduce into his councils such men as enjoyed the confidence of his people, fewer concessions would probably be required; or if unreasonable demands were made, the king, under the sanction of such counsellors, might be enabled, with the greater safety, to refuse them: and that the heads of the popular party, being gratified with the king’s favour, would probably abate of that violence by which they endeavoured at present to pay court to the multitude. The king assented to these reasons; and, in concert with Temple, he laid the plan of a new privy-council, without whose advice he declared himself determined for the future to Report from the Committee, concerning the Answers of the five Popish Lords.] April 23. Sir John Trevor gave the following Report, from the Committee appointed to inspect the Answers of the five Lords, and the methods of proceeding upon Impeachments: “That it is the opinion of the committee, that the lord Bellasis being impeached of high-treason, cannot make any Answer but in person. That the several writings, put in by the lords Powis, Stafford, and Arundel of Wardour, are not Pleas, and Answers, but argumentative, evasive, and to which the commons neither can, or ought to reply: That, if the Answers of the said lords, as well as that of the lord Petre, were sufficient, proceedings ought to be stopt, till the lord Bellasis had also put in a sufficient Answer in person: That the commons do demand of the lords, that their lordships would forthwith order the said lords to put in their perfect Answers; or, in default thereof, that the commons may have justice against them.”

April 24. The said Report being approved of by the house, a Conference was desired with the lords, at which, the Answers of the five Peers were returned, together with the Reasons of the commons for their insufficiency: to which was added by Order that the house take no measure of importance. This council was to consist of thirty persons, and was never to exceed that number. Fifteen of the chief officers of the crown were to be continued, who, it was supposed, would adhere to the king, and, in case of any extremity, oppose the exorbitancies of faction. The other half of the council was to be composed, either of men of character, detached from the court, or of those who possessed chief credit in both houses. And the king, in filling up the names of his new council, was well pleased to find that the members, in land and offices, possessed to the amount of 300,000*l.* a year; a sum nearly equal to the whole property of the house of commons, against whose violence the new council was intended as a barrier to the throne. This experiment was tried, and seemed at first to give some satisfaction to the public. The earl of Essex, a nobleman of the popular party, son of that lord Capel who had been beheaded a little time after the late king, was created treasurer in the room of Danby: the earl of Sunderland, a man of intrigue and capacity, was made secretary of state: viscount Halifax, a fine genius, possessed of learning, eloquence, industry, but subject to inquietude, and fond of refinements, was admitted into the council. These three, together with Temple, who often joined them, though he kept himself more detached from public business, formed a kind of cabinet council, from which all affairs received their first digestion. Shaftsbury was made president of the council; contrary to the advice of Temple, who foretold the consequence of admitting a man of so dangerous a character into any part of the public administration.” Hume.

desired their lordships would appoint a short day for the said peers to put in their effectual Answers.—The 25th, the lords, by Message, acquainted the house, that the earl of Danby had put in his Plea, and the lord Bellasis his Answer, in person, at the bar of the lords; which said Plea, and Answer, the lords sent down at the same time, desiring they might be returned with all convenient speed.

The same day, the lords, by Message, acquainted the house, that the lords Stafford, Arundel of Wardour, and Powis, had that day retracted the former pleas, and put in others, which were sent down with a request, that they might be returned with all convenient speed.

Debate on the Duke of York's Succession to the Crown.] April 27, (Sunday). Several artifices were used to divert the business of this day, which was, 'To consider how to preserve the King's Person from the attempts and conspiracies of the Papists, &c.' by engaging the house into other debates. Which being apprehended, occasioned several loud cries, 'To the business of the day;' which was thus introduced by Mr. Harbord. Mr. Speaker, these several things started being off from your hands, I shall say something to the occasion of your meeting upon this extraordinary day. It is, 'for the security of the King's Person, and for the preservation of the Protestant religion established by law.' Nothing can be so fatal to our religion, and by consequence our laws and liberties, as the danger of the first. Should his maj. fall by any unhappy stroke, it would not be in our power to defend the Protestant religion long. The way to do it, is to take away those men that are likely to destroy him, which are the Papists. Many Catholics will now take the Oaths, and, under the notion of inhabitants, creep into houses. Now since the danger of the King's Person is so great, by reason of their villainous conspiracies, I move, that there may be an order for bringing in a Bill, to banish all Roman catholics from this city, &c. for some time, and I hope that, in the interim, we may make such laws as may put power into such hands as may preserve us.

Mr. Bennet. The duke of York has as much right to succeed his brother, if he die without heirs, (which God forbid!) as my son, has to inherit my estate after me. Therefore I desire that by some law we may have power to arm ourselves against him, if he would bring in Popery amongst us. If the king have a son then we are out of fear; but if a way cannot be found out that the king may have a son, then we are to go another way to work.

Sir John Knight. What will signify banishing the Papists out of town for four or five months, unless you secure a Protestant Succession? When idolatry was set up in Israel, then they were led away captive. What we aim at is only for posterity, and but for our souls; and this is a proper day for that consideration, that we may overcome those persons that would subvert our religion, which the very 'gates of Hell cannot prevail against.' I think it not safe to let the duke be out of the nation. I would address the king, therefore, to let him see how much it is for his interest to persuade the duke to be a Protestant, and to order the duke to return into England.

Sir Hugh Cholmondeley. I have a heart full of sorrow for the occasion of our meeting to-day. It is a sad supposition, that the presumptive heir of the crown should change our religion. The short question is, whether there is any safety for the crown, whilst the Papists wish the king dead. We can never be safe, till it be the Papists interest to have the king amongst the living, that their condition may be never the better for having a king of their own religion. Therefore till you make it the interest of the Catholics to wish the life of the king, you do nothing.

Sir Tho. Player. We are come to that pass now, that Protestants and Papists cannot live together in England; and whilst the Papists have a prospect of a Popish successor, they will never be quiet, but be always making attempts upon the king's person. What has been transacted lately by lord Danby, in having Money given from France that England might be governed without parliament, and so enslaved for ever? And this was done, during the duke's prevalency upon the ministers. Now, I move that you will chuse a Committee to examine all the Papers that can be had, relating to the duke, and to extract all things done by the duke, in setting up popery and arbitrary government, and report it to the house.

Mr. Bennet. If you will have the duke of York come to the crown, as other kings do, speak plain English. If you intend that, I will prepare to be a Papist.

Col. Birch. Are we come here to give money, for some few new men being put into the Privy Council; and shall we do such things as we have done before? I hope the king will not leave one of the Council that was at the giving such advice as we have had. I would not give a penny for such advice. I am the weakest in this great assembly, but on this point I cannot stay myself. I would support the government to the highest; but this pliantering and patching spoils all. It must not be the addition of four or five persons to the Council that will do it; it must be thoroughly done. When there are no reserves, and when the king fears nobody, when that is done, we shall answer the rest. Till you admit no claim to the crown, till there be an examination of the king's death in parliament, you may be safe. As for the duke of York, I can scarcely speak of him without tears. I hope he will come over to us; but I shall never desire to see that day he should be king without it. I have a kindness for the duke, but I have bowels of compassion for the kingdom too. I move therefore, 'That a Bill may be brought in, that at the fall of the king by any violent stroke

(which God forbid!) no person come to the crown of England till that be examined.'

Mr. Sacheverell. Now a Bill has been moved, pray make it effectual. It was moved, 'to banish the papists 20 miles from London, and every one of them not to stir 5 miles from home.'

Sir Fr. Russel. I move for an explanatory vote, 'That the duke of York is the occasion of all these jealousies of the papists;' and so have the lords concurrence to it, and then you will have some ground to go upon.

Lord Russel. I think we are but trifling hitherto. If we do not something relating to the succession, we must resolve, when we have a prince of the popish religion, to be papists, or burn. And I will do neither. We see now, by what is done under a protestant prince, what will be done under a popish. This is the deciding day betwixt both religions. I am transported, I confess, both with spiritual and temporal concerns. I have abbey-lands, but I protest before God and man, I could not be more against popery than I am, had I none. I despise such a ridiculous and nonsensical religion—A piece of wafer, broken betwixt a priest's fingers, to be our Saviour! And what becomes of it when eaten, and taken down, you know. The king, I believe, will do his part in this matter, if we do ours. In the last parliament, I moved something of this nature, which was not a house to do great things; but I hope this house will neither be bribed, corrupted, nor cajoled, nor feasted, into the giving up the grand concerns of our Religion and Property. Therefore I desire 'That a committee may be appointed to draw up a Bill to secure our Religion and Properties in case of a Popish Successor.'

Mr. Hampden. I shall humbly propose, that this may be the question, viz. "That the duke of York being a papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the Crown, have given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present Conspiracies and Designs of the Papists against the king, and the Protestant Religion."

Which Question passed nem. con.; and the lords concurrence was desired to it*.

April 28. The commons resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords, to desire their lordships to demand of the earl of Danby, Whether he will rely upon, and abide by the plea of his pardon."

The King's second Speech to both Houses relative to the Succession.] April 30. The king came to the house of peers, and made this short Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; The season of the year advancing so fast, I thought it necessary to put you in mind of three particulars:

* Mr. Sidney says, "That the lords gave their consent to it, with the addition of the word 'unwillingly;' that is to say, 'that the duke, being a papist, had made him unwillingly the occasion of this plot.'"

1. Prosecution of the Plot. 2. Disbanding of the Army. 3. Providing a Fleet for our common Security. And to shew you, that, whilst you are doing your parts, my thoughts have not been misemployed; but that it is my constant care to do every thing that may preserve your Religion, and secure it for the future in all events; I have commanded my Lord Chancellor to mention several Particulars, which I hope will be an evidence that in all things that concern the public Security I shall not follow your zeal, but lead it."

The Lord Chancellor's second Speech.] Then the Lord Chancellor spake as followeth:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons; That royal care which his majesty hath taken, for the general quiet and satisfaction of all his subjects, is now more evident; by these new and fresh instances of it which I have in command to open to you. His maj. hath considered with himself, that 'tis not enough that your Religion and Liberty is secure during his own reign; but he thinks, he owes it to his people, to do all that in him lies, that these blessings may be transmitted to your posterity, and so well secured to them, that no succession in after-ages may be able to work the least alteration.—And therefore his majesty, who hath often said in this place, 'That he is ready to consent to any laws of this kind, so as the same extend not to alter the descent of the crown in the right line, nor to defeat the Succession,' hath now commanded this to be further explained.—And, to the end it may never be in the power of any Papist, if the crown descend upon him, to make any change either in church or state, I am commanded to tell you, that his maj. is willing that provision may be made; first, to distinguish a Popish from a Protestant Successor; then, so to limit and to circumscribe the authority of a popish successor, in these cases following, that he may be disabled to do any harm.—First, in reference to the Church, his maj. is content, that care be taken, that all ecclesiastical and spiritual benefices and promotions, in the gift of the crown, may be conferred in such a manner, that we may be sure the incumbents shall always be of the most pious and learned protestants; and that no popish successor, while he continues so, may have any power to controul such presentments.—In reference to the State, and civil part of the government; as it is already provided, that no papist can sit in either house of parliament; so the king is pleased, that it be provided too, That there may never want a parliament, when the king shall happen to die; but that the parliament then in being may continue indissoluble for a competent time; or if there be no parliament in being, then the last parliament which was in being before that time may re-assemble, and sit a competent time, without any new summons or elections.—And as no Papist can by law hold any place of trust; so the king is content, that it may be further provided, That no lords or others of the privy council, no judges of the common law or in chancery, shall, at any time during the reign of any Popish Successor, be put in, or displaced, but by the authority of parliament; and that care also be taken, that none but sincere protestants may be justices of peace.—In reference to the military part, the king is willing, that no lord lieut. or deputy lieut. nor no officer in the navy, during the reign of any Popish Successor, be put in or removed, but either by authority of parliament, or of such persons as the parliament shall entrust with such authority.—'Tis hard to invent another restraint to be put upon a Popish Successor, considering how much the Revenue of the successor will depend upon consent of parliament, and how impossible it is to raise money without such consent: but yet, if any thing else can occur to the wisdom of the parliament, which may further secure Religion and Liberty against a Popish Successor, without defeating the Right of Succession itself, his maj. will most readily consent to it.—Thus watchful is the king for all your safeties: and if he could think of any thing else, that you do either want or wish, to make you happy; he would make it his business to effect it for you. God Almighty long continue this blessed union between the king and his parliament and people!"*

The Commons vote the Earl of Danby's Pardon illegal and void, and demand Judgment against him.] May 5. The commons resolved, "That it was the opinion of this house, that the pardon pleaded by the earl of Danby was illegal and void, and ought not to be allowed in bar of the Impeachment of the Commons of England." After which, Mr. Speaker, with the whole house, went up to the lords bar, and demanded Judgment against the earl in these words:

"My lords; the knights, citizens and burghesses, in parliament assembled, are come up to demand Judgment, in their own names, and the names of all the commons of England, against Tho. earl of Danby, who stands impeached by them before your lordships of High-Treason, and divers high Crimes and Misdemeanors; to which he has pleaded a Pardon: which Pardon the commons conceive to be illegal and void; and therefore they do demand Judgment of your lordships accordingly."†

* Bishop Burnet affirms, "That the duke was struck with the news of the king's concessions, when it reached him at Brussels, and that he (the bishop) saw a letter written by the dutchess the next post, in which she wrote, 'That as for all the high things that were said by their enemies, they looked for them, but that Speech of the Lord Chancellor's was a surprise, and a great mortification to them.'"

† "Nothing could be more artificial than the proceedings of the commons. It was manifest, that, in condemning the Pardon; they, in effect, condemned the man, and yet they seemed to leave the peers in full possession of their privilege of judgment. The lords, on the

The Commons' Address against the Duke of Lauderdale.] May 8. The following Address against the duke of Lauderdale was agreed to; with the Resolution that it should be presented by the whole house:

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons in parliament assembled, finding your majesty's kingdoms involved in imminent dangers, and great difficulties, by the evil designs and pernicious councils of some who have been, and are in high place, and trust and authority about your royal person; who, contrary to the duty of their places, by their arbitrary and destructive counsels, tending to the subversion of the Rights, Liberties and Properties of your subjects, and the alteration of the Protestant Religion established, have endeavoured to alienate the hearts of your loyal subjects, from your maj. and your government. Amongst whom we have just reason to accuse John duke of Lauderdale, for a chief promoter of such counsels; and more particularly for contriving and endeavouring to raise jealousies and misunderstandings between your majesty's kingdoms of England and Scotland; whereby hostilities might have ensued, and may arise, between both nations, if not prevented. Wherefore, we your majesty's loyal subjects, could not but be sensibly affected with trouble, to find such a person (notwithstanding the repeated Addresses of the last parliament) continued in your councils at this time, when the affairs of your kingdom require none to be put into such employments, but such as are of known abilities, interest and esteem, in the nation, without all suspicion of either mistaking or betraying the true interest of the kingdom, and consequently of advising your majesty ill. We do therefore most humbly beseech your most sacred majesty, for taking away the great jealousies, dissatisfactions, and fears among your good subjects, that your maj. will graciously be pleased to remove the duke of Lauderdale from your majesty's councils, in your kingdoms of England and Scotland, and from all offices, employments, and places of trust, and from your majesty's presence for ever."

To this the king only made this cold Reply: "That he would consider of it, and return an Answer."

May 9. The commons resolved, "That no Commoner whatsoever should presume to maintain the validity of the Pardon pleaded other hand, had their expedients and resources as well as the commons, and resolved not only to center the whole authority of decision in themselves, but to make sure of such a decision as should be favourable to the Prerogative. In order to which, they made an Order, the same day, 'That the house, on the morrow, would take into consideration, whether the lords spiritual were to give their Vote in judicature, in Cases of Blood, or upon Bill of Attainder,' as a preliminary to the demand of the Speaker, concerning the earl of Danby." Ralph.

by the earl of Danby, without the consent of this house; and that the persons so doing, shall be accounted betrayers of the liberties of the commons of England."

*Mr. Bertie examined, as to 252,467*l.* received by him for Secret Service.*] May 10. Mr. Bertie (entrusted by patent, with the disposal of 20,000*l.* per ann. Secret Service Money out of the Excise) was called in, and examined on several questions; and being withdrawn, it was resolved that the house was not satisfied with his Answers. After which, sir Robert Howard, auditor of the exchequer, informing the house that from Lady Day 1676, to March 26, 1679, 252,467*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* had been paid to the said Mr. Bertie for Secret Service; an Order was issued, "That Mr. Bertie be committed to the custody of the serjeant at arms, for his contempt to this house."

Debate on the Bill of Exclusion.] May 11. (Sunday.) The business of this day was, to take into consideration that part of the king's and the lord chancellor's Speech which relates to 'the best ways and means of preserving the Life of his sacred majesty, and of securing the Protestant Religion, both in the reign of his majesty and his successors.' Several interruptions happened to this day's proceedings, which seemed designed.* The debate was thus opened by

Mr. Bennet. Mr. Speaker, we have trifled away too much time to-day; pray, let us improve the rest, and do our duty. Seeing that the duke of York is gone out of the kingdom, that he may not bring Popery with him to be established at his return, I will make you a short motion, viz. 'To make an Address to the king, that the duke may not come over again without the consent of the king and the two houses of parliament; and that we will stick to the king with our lives and fortunes against him, or any of the popish party that shall attack us.'

Mr. Pilkington. I would humbly pray the king, 'That the duke may come over, that we may impeach him of High Treason.'

Sir John Knight. It is impossible that the Protestant religion should be preserved under a popish prince; as inconsistent as light and darkness. The king's coronation Oath is to maintain religion, and that is the Protestant religion. The king's subjects are bound by law to take the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance—Res nunquam moritur. How impatient are the Papists till the king be out of the way, that the Protestants may be destroyed. How is it possible that the kingdom should be satisfied under these oppositions so contrary? O Lord, what will the people say to us, if we do nothing? If the Pope gets his great toe into England, all his body will follow. Something must be done, but I dare not venture to propose what.

Mr. Dubois. The king offers us many gracious things in his Speech and somewhat more, viz. 'To secure the Protestant religion.' The king's life will be so much the more in danger, by how much the Papists think their case desperate. There is no way to defeat their execution of this Plot, like taking away their hopes; and unless, by some Vote, you determine the Succession, you will never put the Papists out of hopes of accomplishing their design.

Sir Geo. Hungerford. As long as the debt is heir to the crown, the kingdom is unsafe; and I believe that the queen will never be capable of children; for when she came into England she had something given her to be always a red-lettered woman. But something must be done.

Sir Tho. Player. I join with the motion that has been made for a Bill for an eternal banishment of the duke of York; but yet, that it might go farther, I would pursue the great end of our sitting to-day, to consult the safety of the king's person. This Bill will not set the king safe; therefore, besides the duke's Banishment, I propose, 'a Bill for excluding the duke of York by name, and all Papists whatsoever, from the crown of England.'

Col. Birch. If we can have no safety by a popish prince, it is your duty to take some resolution. Whilst the law of the militia is in being, which obliges a declaration, &c. we cannot fight against any commissioned by a popish Successor. When it is their interest to do a thing, the desperate Papists will do it, and till you change the Papists interest to keep the king alive, you do nothing.

Mr. Sec. Conewry. I think, the King's Person is to be considered how to be preserved, which is the proper consideration of the day, as well as the rest that has been moved, and to show the Papists, that it is not their interest to take the king away by violence; and what better way to do it than that proposal in the Chancellor's Speech, That the Papists may be in ten times a worse condition by doing it than they were before? If the Catholics be under a popish prince that cannot pardon them, they are in a worse condition than under a prince that can pardon them. The propositions I have heard moved to-day are the most raises to law and the property of the subject imaginable. Will any man give the duke less law than the worst felons have, to banish and disinherit him without so much as hearing him? The precedent will be the greatest inconvenience to ourselves in the world. Consider, the king is vigorous, in very good health, and but a year or two older than the duke; the king is not of such an age but that he may have children, and the duke is not so settled and grafted into the Romish religion, but that he may return to our religion again. Acts of parliament, we know, have not kept Succession out of the right line, but brought in blood and sword. Must you banish a young prince, and a young princess? He is now abroad, and may procure help to contend his title to the crown, to the end of the world; and no prince that ever

Mr. Hampden. For us to go about to tie a Popish Successor with laws for preservation of the Protestant Religion, is binding Sampson with withes; he will break them when he is awake. The duke is the presumptive heir of the crown, indeed; but if a man be likely to ruin the estate he may be heir to, we disinherit every day. But I find it a principle amongst a great many, 'That if the prince be great, it is no matter how low the people are, if his greatness be kept up.' I think that a prince is made for the good of the people, and where there is a Popish prince that may succeed, I think we ought to secure ourselves against that Succession. There is great inconvenience that may be assigned in every proposal I have heard to-day, but there is the least inconvenience in 'a Bill to exclude the duke from the crown,' and therefore I move for it.

Lord Cavendish. In all this debate, I see nothing certain but our danger; the remedies moved for are uncertain. A Bill of Banishment has been moved for the duke, but no man at this time will think it convenient for the duke to come into England, for he may come, and you cannot deny him to be heard by his counsel, before such a Bill pass. If you pass it, it may put him upon getting assistance from some foreign prince, and make a party here or in Ireland, and you ought to consult therefore the safest remedy, before the desperate. If you say, 'a Popish prince cannot be limited,' you may as well say, 'No law can keep the duke out.' I would therefore know first, whether what is proposed in the king's and chancellor's Speech may not go a great way in what you aim at. Consider therefore the safest ways, and if they will not do, then go the desperate.

Sir F. Winnington. I shall say a few words to this debate, though I must confess, I am the unfittest man to meddle in it, considering the relation I have had to this great prince, the duke of York. But when I consider, that the greatest thing in the world is at stake, I must argue to defend it. You have been told of doubts and fears from several hands, but have had no resolute motions. As they have been of different natures, so, if the house divide upon this great thing, you give the greatest blow to the protestant religion imaginable; therefore, whatever we do, let it be with unanimity, as Protestants, and I hope all here are so. Therefore I propose, that, in giving our opinions, all gentlemen that are not pleased to speak to the business, may have as visible actions as they that do. I think we are not ready for the main question, but I propose that we may consider the danger of the nation. It is easy to argue, that we are inevitably ruined if there be a popish Successor, but it is hard to say what will save us. The prospect of the duke's being a Papist has brought upon our hands enough to overwhelm us. The disease seems desperate. The five popish lords are in the Tower, on account of the plot, and another lord is there, though not under that name, yet centered on that bottom, and has made his greatness upon it. The lords in the Tower, if we divide upon this great thing, will think themselves saved; and now within a few days, they are to be tried. If what I shall say be not acceptable to the house, I protest I speak it not out of favour to the duke, but for the preservation of the Protestant cause. Now that this thing is brought on, let us do like honest men, and Protestants. If we divide upon the question, the Papists will have more encouragement than the duke ever gave them. Now we are steady, I would not lose one mite of advantage; therefore I would have the debate adjourned, and no question now put upon it, and go on upon it, as soon as the Lords in the Tower are tried, and no business whatsoever to be interposed; and when we are once come again to this debate, whoever is here may personally say, he owns or disowns the Resolution, and not leave it to a few gentlemen to debate and argue, and the rest to slip away, but that every man may have his share in it; and if we part with this debate, we do not wisely. If the Judges see the commons faint and tender in this matter, the Judges will be so too in judging this law, and the lords will shrink and be tender too. As this Bill will be hard for the duke, so it is hard for us to be deprived of our civil liberties, which will be at the power of a prince that governs as the pope shall give his determination. When popery is introduced, but for one prince's reign, the pope will dispose of the royal family as well as us; therefore when I speak against Popery, I speak for the royal family; and in speaking this, I speak for all good and virtuous men. If it be Exclusion, or Banishment, of the duke, let the Resolution be what it will, it is for our security.

Mr. Boscawen. I do not take this matter we are upon, but with all the circumstances that attend it, and then I take it for granted, that if there be any more probable means to preserve the protestant religion amongst us, than what have been proposed, I shall not differ at all. But if you consider the horrible Plot which has made the papists an irreconcilable party, and that a protestant king is in danger of his life, much more will religion be in danger when a papist comes to the crown. By being willows, and not oaks, men have kept their places at court; which makes me expect little effect from what has been proposed in relation to the king's and chancellor's Speeches. No confession of faith binds a man to any allegiance to a prince secluded the crown by law. As for Hen. iv. there was no law to seclude him from the crown, and he was but a private person, and the people ought not to have taken up arms against him. But where there is a law for it, they are betrayers of the protestant religion, if they do it not when in their power. We ought to consider the chancellor's first Speech, and not that last Speech. Now you have an opportunity to secure the protestant religion, do it; else, posterity will curse you in your graves. The whole protestant religion in Europe is struck at, in a Popish Succession in England. If the protestant religion keeps not up its head now, under a protestant king, it must be drowned under a popish. Suppose the succeeding prince should be a lunatic, as the king of Portugal was, and they had no way of securing the government, but by pretermittting him—Much more in our case, if the security of an act of parliament be as good as any security for the right of the crown. Queen Eliz. had no right to the crown, but by act of parliament, and she made it Præmunire, by law, for any man to hold the contrary, &c. and yet some gentlemen say, 'it is against law.' We must have a law to secure this law, else you will be infamous. I am clearly of opinion, that till we go against popery, beyond retreat, we shall have no happy days; and then, I hope, we may see happy days. But popery and French government are almost check-mate* with us. There is no probability of security the other way proposed. Would you have parliaments make laws without a prince? or would you have the government in conservators hands, such as we may confide in? That would look like a commonwealth, and I know no such great men that we can trust upon such an account; besides, they have no power, and will be insignificant. Making clergymen and justices of the peace will signify nothing. A troop of horse, and a file of musketeers, will easily turn us all out of doors. Let us know what we have to trust to. But the several proposals made to secure the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion (except this Bill proposed) look like gold, but are but leaf-gold when you touch them. Whatever becomes of us, let us preserve the protestant religion, and pray put the question for the bill.

After further debate, and some contest, for candles, or no candles, the Vote was carried in these words: Resolved, "That a Bill be brought in to disable the duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm." The house divided, those for the Bill went out, and those within soon removed from their seats, and would not be counted, but yielded the question. And a committee was appointed to draw it up.

The Commons resolve to stand by the King with their Lives and Fortunes.] Resolved, nem. con. "That in defence of the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion, this house doth declare, That they will stand by his majesty with their Lives and Fortunes; and that, if his majesty shall come by any violent death (which God forbid!) that they will revenge it to the utmost upon the papists." And an Address was ordered to be drawn up accordingly.

* A phrase at chess, implying that the game is lost, by the king's being in such a situation, that he cannot move, without being taken.

May 15. The Exclusion bill was called for and read the first time. It set forth, after the particulars of the execrable Conspiracy, "That the emissaries, priests and agents for the pope, had traitorously seduced James duke of York, presumptively heir to these crowns, to the communion of the church of Rome; and had induced him to enter into several negotiations with the pope, his cardinals and nuncios, for promoting the Romish Church and interest; and by his means and procurement, had advanced the power and greatness of the French king, to the manifest hazard of these kingdoms. That by descent of these crowns upon a papist, and by foreign alliances and assistance, they might be able to succeed in their wicked and villainous designs." Then, after another Preamble, they enacted to this effect: 1. "That the said James, duke of York, should be incapable of inheriting the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their dependencies; and of enjoying any of the titles, rights, prerogatives and revenues belonging to the said crowns. 2. That in case his majesty should happen to die, or resign his dominions, they should devolve to the person next in Succession, in the same manner as if the duke was dead. 3. That all acts of sovereignty and royalty that prince might then happen to perform, were not only declared void, but to be high-treason, and punishable as such. 4. That if any one, at any time whatsoever, should endeavour to bring the said duke into any of the fore-mentioned dominions, or correspond with him in order to make him inherit, he should be guilty of high treason. 5. That if the duke himself ever returned into any of these dominions, considering the mischiefs that must ensue, he should be looked upon as guilty of the same offence; and all persons were authorized and required, to seize upon and imprison him; and in case of resistance made by him or his adherents, to subdue them by force of arms."

May 21. The Bill was read a 2nd time. Upon which, the question being put, whether the Bill should be committed, the house divided, and the Yeas ordered to go forth, were 207, and the Noes who staid were but 128, the majority 79; and so the Bill was committed to a committee of the whole house: but the parliament being soon after prorogued, it proceeded no farther.

Debate on Money paid to Members by Sir Stephen Fox.] May 23. Sir Francis Drake. It is generally reported, that the last parliament had sold the nation; as if they came up to give Money to betray their public trust. I am of opinion that such were amongst us then. I would have the committee report what they are informed of it, though Bertie's book is not yet known.

Sir John Holman. If my name be there, I would have you know it.

Sir Nich. Carew. Though nothing can be got out of Mr. Bertie, yet the secret committee knows something. I know not how long we shall last; and I would have the world know it.

Mr. Sacheverell. The Committee will be able to produce several persons, who can prove Moneys paid. But you have a member within your walls, (if you will go to it in good earnest) that can discover to whom Money and Pensions were paid; and if he will not, he is not fit to be here. It is sir Stephen Fox, who, though he has delivered up the private Books, yet has several books that can discover it; his Ledger, and other books of Pensions, &c. before Bertie came in. I move you, that, if he will not give you an account, you will deal with him accordingly.

The house being informed of several sums of Money paid to some of the Members of the last parliament by sir Stephen Fox, and that he has Books of Accounts to evidence the same; ordered, "That he be immediately sent for to attend the house, and do bring with him all the Books, and Papers of Accounts, of any Money that he has paid to such Members, and others, for keeping public tables."

Sir Stephen Fox. 'I came but just now from my lodgings, by water, and I was told of the Order.' The Order was read to him. He proceeded, 'I know not whether I can do what you command me in any time. I have paid much Money for 'Secret Service,' but for these four years I have paid none. I have paid it as 'the King's Bounty,' and under such other titles, but not as 'Members of Parliament.' It is absolutely necessary that I have some time to peruse my Books.'

Mr. Williams. Your design is to have his Books, and you to judge whether the Pensions given, be 'the King's Bounty,' or to what other purpose.

Mr. Garraway. I would know, whether Fox kept the book of Secret Service apart, or mixed with other accounts. Formerly, when the Committee of Accounts was, sir Philip Warwick brought in 60,000*l.* pensions, and in a little book 'for Secret Service,' in one folio, there were fifty items of Money 'for Secret Service,' for members of the house.

Sir Stephen Fox. If your design be to know the Money 'for Secret Service,' I desire I may have time to ask leave, &c. When I was discharged, my Books were commanded from me.

Mr. Whorwood. I think it not fit that any person should ask leave to do his king and country service. I hope he will better consider of it. I hope this gentleman will be so ordered, that he must bring his Books hither. He has no dependence more upon that unfortunate person now under the obloquy of the nation.

Mr. Boscowen. Fox has acknowledged that he has such books. You have been told by a learned gentleman (Maynard) 'of corrupting the Fountain of Justice and Law.' If this place has been corrupted, it is God's great mercy that such a house had not delivered up the nation to arbitrary government. I will not stick to move you, if Fox will not do it, for a law to confiscate his estate, and to take off his head.

VOL. IV.

Sir Stephen Fox. This is an entire surprize to me. I have made a Book 'of Secret Service,' but I have delivered up my books; but I have other books. I was a great accountant, and this 'of Secret Service' is mixed with other accounts. What is meant is, time to ask leave to have those books I have delivered. It will give no satisfaction to the house to bring my Ledgers. They are great vast books. I desire that I may have time to ask leave to recover that book of 'Secret Service' I extracted out of the books. All that ever I paid in my life are in that book; but they are so intermixed, that you will have no satisfaction. What I desire, is leave. This, 'of Secret Service,' is of divers natures, and the Ledger is of several millions. That for Secret Service is mingled. When I delivered up my Books, that particularly 'of Secret Service' I delivered up likewise. I kept no transcript of the Account 'for Secret Service,' but it is within that Ledger. The Ledgers will not satisfy you, but if I can obtain leave, I will bring the Book, or extract of what is 'for Secret Service' out of the Ledger. It was my own care to keep an exact Account, to satisfy the master I serve. This was not an employment I desired. I never spoke, nor was adviser, but I was directly to issue out Money, as I was ordered. I hope to obtain leave to bring that book; but I would be understood that I have not that book.

Mr. Williams. Entries of Monies may be under disguised names, and so you are never the nearer. As for Fox, he fences with you; he is no Exchequer Officer, here are no footsteps of his payments. This is a cunning insinuation. Let him answer plainly, if the book he showed the king, be exactly what is entered into the Ledger Book?

Sir Stephen Fox. Nothing will satisfy the house but the Book 'of Secret Service;' the other is so mixed. I will endeavour to bring that book.

Mr. Garraway. Fox has given you a shifting answer, and no ways satisfactory. I would have his answer plainly, whether those in the Ledger be the same sums and circumstances?

Sir Nich. Carew. Ask Fox no more questions, but send some gentlemen to seize all his books and papers that he has, and to bring them hither.

Mr. Williams. If gentlemen will suppose this book to be with the rest, you may find it; but if in a dark and close hand, you will not find it. Ask him whether this book is in his hand, and let him declare it sincerely.

Sir Stephen Fox. This book lies not among my other books, but I delivered it up to lord Danby, but I will endeavour to bring this book. It lies in the king's closet, and I will obtain it, if I can; if not, I will bring you the best copy I can.—Being asked about the Acquittances, he answered, 'I certainly always took Acquittances, and they are with my books and papers at home.' I was not so careful as to enter the Receipts into books, but in loose papers. This business went on by degrees, 2 or 3000*l.* per ann. and I am not an accountant by law. But could I have foreseen so long an employment, I would have been more exact; but I have them in loose papers.

Sir John Hotham. Remember the place you are to go to (Whitehall) and make no Order to seize, nor search for Books or Papers, but take such as he will deliver to you. He knows your mind, and what is for your purpose; and if he will not deliver them, you may take an Order with him.

Mr. Williams. Whitehall may be a sanctuary for these concealments, but no place is sacred against your search. I would not have that pass for doctrine.

Sir John Hotham. If it be your Order to search, I will go as far in obeying it, as any man.

Mr. Swynfin. I would not use your power, till you have occasion for it. Spend no farther time, but let Hotham go.

Sir John Hotham. If Fox desire to speak with any body, or go from us, (in this nice point, I desire to understand you fully, and I will serve you fully,) whether are we to permit it, or not?

Sir Stephen Fox. My Cash-keeper and Book-keeper are gone to the Exchange; and if I am not so ready in it, you will excuse me, and have no ill thought of me, for I protest I never knew of this before.

Ordered, "That sir John Hotham, sir Rob. Peyton, and sir John Holman do accompany sir Stephen Fox to Whitehall, and that he do bring his Ledger Book, Cash Book, and Journal, and his Receipts for Money by him paid, 'for Secret Service;' and he is enjoined not to go out of the company of the said members, before they return to the house; and that no member do depart the service of this house, until sir Stephen Fox and the other members do return."

Report of the Committee appointed to seize sir S. Fox's Papers.] Sir John Hotham, and the rest, return from Whitehall, and report, That according to Order, they attended Fox to Whitehall. They were not half a quarter of an hour there, but Fox called his servants to bring such Books as they had in their custody, and sent for other servants that had the rest. Some great books were brought into the room; but whilst he sent for the Acquittances, the Lord Chamberlain (the earl of Arlington) came in, and spoke to Fox. Fox said, 'These gentlemen are some members of the house, and I shall not speak without their hearing.' My Lord Chamberlain said, 'I take notice that you are employed to search for Books and Papers, but you shall not take any away out of Whitehall.' I replied; 'some it seems, do make friends of the unrighteous Mammon.' Your lordship has quick information of what we came about, for our house-doors were shut.' My Lord Chamberlain saw the mistake, and would have debated some things, but I said, 'I was not sent to argue this, or that, but to obey my order.' (He had been so taught.) My Lord Chamberlain was very desirous to tell us why those Books were not to be taken out of Whitehall; but I said, 'let me have what your lordship would say in writing, and I will inform the house of it.' But what he said was, 'That he dared not consent that any Books should go out of Whitehall, without the king's orders, nor that we should inspect any Books, without the king's command.' I had forgot one thing that my Lord Chamberlain said, viz. 'I would not do any thing that should look like the displeasure of the house of commons; but I believe if the house address the king, they may have their desire.'

Several moved, "That Fox should tell the house, upon his memory, when, and what Monies he had paid to Members of the former parliament, and if the house find that he omits any thing wilfully, that they will take an Order with him."

Sir S. For. I hope the house will not lay this upon me, that no man could have imposed upon me. It is so easy a way to ask the king's leave for the Books, that I hope you will take that way. What you desire to know is 4 years ago, and I cannot charge my memory with it.

Mr. Sacheverell. I hope he can remember to acquaint the house, what he told the committee. He has named some gentlemen of the last parliament, whom he has paid Money to.

Ordered, "That sir S. Fox do, upon his memory, name to the house such Members of the last parliament as he paid Money to, for Secret Service."

Mr. Sacheverell. I desire to know of him, during the time he paid Money 'for Secret Service,' whether he canuot remember a name? If he cannot, I can.

The Speaker. Who did you pay Money to, of the Members of the last Parliament, 'for Secret Service?'

Sir S. For. These are hard circumstances I am under, either to disobey the house, or to divulge a secret by the king's command. I can name so few persons, that it will give no satisfaction to the house. I named none but what the committee named to me, and my memory is not good enough to repeat it. It may be, the persons may have an action against me. Upon my memory I cannot tell who I paid Money to 'for Secret Service,' and who upon other accounts. I humbly pray, that I may not be put to answer.

Mr. Williams. They that will be ridden shall be ridden—You have been strangely used at Whitehall. Let him withdraw, and then you will consider what to do with him.

Sir Rob. Howard. The list of all the Members, is a way proposed to do your business. Will you not assist your own Order, by letting him have a list to help his memory? If it be so great a thing as you apprehend, let not Fox pick and chuse whom he will to accuse.

Mr. Boscawen. For Fox to be the first accuser seems hard. But let the clerk read the list of the names of the last parliament, and Fox will be careful to tell you no untruth in those he shall name to have received Money, and not forfeit his reputation.

The clerk was ordered to read the names of the Members, one by one, in the catalogue, beginning with the Speaker, &c. Fox charged Mr. Seymour, Speaker, at the end of every session to have received 1500*l.* as Sir Edward Turner had received before him.

Mr. Seymour somewhat affrontively answered, I would have Fox answer you, whether I received any Money before I was Speaker? In the presence of God I speak it, I never directly nor indirectly, disposed of any Money 'for Secret Service.' I told the king, 'That my fortune was not sufficient for that service (of Speaker,) and I was paid the Money out of the exchequer; but that was so troublesome, I desired it might be paid another way; and it was the only favour lord Danby ever did me, to let me receive it out of the Money appointed 'for Secret Service.'

Sir Stephen Fox names the Pensioners.] Sir Stephen Fox. Neither clerk nor agent of mine, to my knowledge, paid any to Seymour. I might have paid some to counterfeit names I did not know. I paid

1. Sir Charles Wheeler 400*l.* per ann. upon the account of Secret Service. 2. Sir Jonathan Trelawney 4 or 500*l.* per ann. upon account of being put out of the employment of the Excise. 3. Robert Roberts, esq. 500*l.* per ann. upon account of Secret Service. 4. Sir Philip Howard upon account of a Farm he had of the Excise, 4 or 500*l.* per ann. 5. Sir Courtney Poole 1000*l.* per ann. upon account of Secret Service. 6. Sir Rd. Wiseman 400*l.* per ann. as the king's bounty. 7. Tho. King esq. had some money, but I know not how much. 8. Thomas Price, esq. 400*l.* per ann. 9. Herbert Westphaling, esq. 200*l.* per ann. 10. Humphry Cornwall, esq. 200*l.* per ann. 11. Sir John Barnaby 200*l.* per ann. 12. Sir Lionel Walden upon account of a Farm of the Excise, 300*l.* per ann. 13. Daniel Collingwood, esq. upon the same account, 2 or 300*l.* per ann. 14. Somerset Fox, esq. had a Pension paid out of the exchequer, but what I cannot remember. 15. Sir Job Charlton had 1000*l.* pension whilst he was Speaker. 16. Mr. Knowles 200*l.* per ann. upon account of the Excise. 17. Robert Philips, esq. had 300*l.* per ann. upon the Excise. 18. Randolph Egerton, esq. 4 or 500*l.* per ann. upon the Excise. 19. Sir George Reeves had several sums of 500*l.* paid him at a time. 20. Sir Tho. Woodcock had 200*l.* per ann. out of the Excise. 21. Henry Clerk, esq. of Wiltshire, ever since he was out of the prize commission, 400*l.* per ann. 22. Sir John Talbot 500*l.* per ann. upon account of 'Secret Service,' paid out of the Excise. 23. Sir Philip Monckton 300*l.* Pension out of the Excise. 24. Sir Gilbert Gerrard 300*l.* per ann. on account of his Farm in the Excise. 25. Mr. William Robinson 200*l.* per ann. 26. Mr. Edw. Progers 400*l.* per ann. 27. Col. Roger Whitley 300*l.* per. ann. on account of a Farm in the Excise*.

Report from the Committee of Secrecy relative to Money given to Members.] May 24. Sir Francis Winnington reports, from the Committee of Secrecy, Money given to Members of the Last Parliament, for Secret Service. "I have brought every particular information, and you shall see whether your members have any wrong. There was 20,000*l.* per ann. paid quarterly by the Commissioners of Excise, for Secret Service, to members, &c. mostly by Mr. Bertie, whereof no account was given to the Exchequer, but 'for Secret Service.' Bertie was examined at the committee, whether he paid any of the 20,000*l.* to members of parliament. He answered, 'That he had a privy seal to pay it without account, and he was not at liberty to tell how he disposed of the money, till he had the king's command.' Next, though sir Stephen Fox has taken a great deal of matter out of my hands, yet, there are some more than he has acquainted you with, who have received Money, viz. to sir Rd. Wiseman, and one Knight, which Wiseman paid, by a false name, each of them 400*l.* per ann. Mr. Roberts, at one or two payments, 500*l.* and Mr. Price 400*l.* Sir John Fowell at twice had 500*l.* of Fox. Poole, Talbot, and Wheeler, as before. Now that I have summed up the substance of other evidence from payments in Danby's time, there came in tallies of 20,000*l.* per annum, 'for Secret Service,' out of the Excise. Major Huntington and sir John James paid the money. Sometimes the money was paid before the quarter-day, and when tallies were struck, papers were delivered back. A Book of Names there was, to whom money was paid; and Bertie had an agent, who says, 'That after the Treasurer was impeached, about the 24th Dec. Bertie came in great haste to him for that Book with all Letters and Acquittances, and that book has many false names in it. And if he saw the book, he could tell what members were concerned, and under what head he stands.' The Book of 20,000*l.* was increased by Danby in his time, for formerly it was not above 12,000*l.* per ann. for Pensions. Farther, there was paid out of the Exchequer for Mr. Chiffins, who delivered about a 100 Acquittances to Bertie. Before the parliament did sit, there were greater sums paid, than at other times. The Paper the Committee took, &c. mentions other persons. Sir Joseph Tredenham had 500*l.* per ann. and Mr. Piercy Goring 300*l.* per ann. Sir Rob. Holt had several sums to maintain him in prison. Sir Wm. Glascott, and sir John Bramstone had several sums, but we could not discover the particulars. Wiseman, King, and Trelawney offered to sell their Pensions to the Commissioners of Excise, and did pretend, that they might have money before-hand, and the commissioners had a discount of 12 per cent."

* The above list is given by Mr. Grey. It is not inserted in the Journal.

Ordered, "That sir Rd. Wiseman and Mr. Knight be immediately sent for to attend this house."

Debate thereon.] Sir Tho. Charges. I move, that persons who have received any Money the last parliament, may be incapable of any trust in the government, and refund what they have had.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I found several witnesses very willing to make discoveries, but in reality they were threatened. I move, that there may be some way, or method, to know the bottom of this; whether you will call witnesses to the bar, or to the committee. Apply your remedy, when you know the disease. I do say, that if any man takes Money to sell his country, I would use the utmost power of punishment, that parliaments may not be lost.

Mr. Bennet. Here is good evidence against Mr. Bertie. If you have no farther account of this matter, proceed upon him. If you get the Book out of him, you have all. If not, make an example of him, and you will have the rest.

Sir John Trevor. If these Papers be left in the clerk's hand, a superior power may command them from him; therefore let them be in the hands of the chairman.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I would not be used as sir Edmundbury Godfrey was, whilst I have such Papers about me, as I have reported. Really, I believe the Papers are of that nature, that they ought to be in the custody of the house, and let the Speaker keep them.

Mr. Garraway. Enter them upon your Books, and they will be as safe as all the rest of your transactions.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I move that they may not be entered upon your Books, till gentlemen that are named have justified themselves. If you will enter upon their justification, I will now proceed to my own.

Mr. Bocawen. According to my observation, the Order of the house is, that immediately they be heard; and, in justice, do not enter it into the Journal till they be heard.

Sir Tho. Meres. Your question is, Whether the Papers shall be entered; but if these gentlemen named think the entry will be detrimental to them, it is but reasonable that they should be heard.

Sir Fr. Winnington. There are very honourable persons named. Some say 'enter the Papers.' But it is one of the hardest things in the world for a man to have papers entered upon him; it is a kind of passing judgment. The Votes will be sent all England over. Suppose those gentlemen of honour and quality vindicate themselves, you will tear your Book sure, and not suffer them to be upon Record.

Lord Cavendish. It will be no hardship upon them to have the Papers entered, for if they justify themselves, their innocence will be entered too.

Col. Titus. It is no crime at all to have money, nor pension, but to have it for an ill use. Therefore let every member concerned be heard in his place. He may justify himself.

Mr. Garraway. I am not against entering the Report. But before you give your judgment, hear your members in their place. This is parliamentary; and then they are to withdraw, and you judge whether you will acquit, or condemn them.

Sir John Tubot. I confess to you, I am afraid what I shall say always, but more now I am in confusion, and shall speak my thoughts very indigestedly. I beg I may speak more than once if I have occasion. This is a great crime of betraying a trust: though this day I am more unfortunate to be in suspicion. But I desire I may be distinguished when I know the integrity of my own heart. Yesterday this was mentioned, &c. and is got about the town, and my reputation is exposed to censure. Let every man lay his hand upon his heart. I say, with great assurance, that directly or indirectly I never took one shilling as a gift, or begging, from the time the king came in. I do disown any thing by way of 'Secret Service' to influence my vote here. I will submit myself to the censure of the law, to be tried by that law. I will submit it to any judicial way of proceeding. Give me leave to open this matter to you. I desire to justify myself, and to live no longer than I can do it. Some gentlemen, besides those, have been mentioned, their number not great. When the act passed for the Excise to be made a Revenue, when the king came in, it was thought an advantage to the Revenue, and ease to the country, for gentlemen to manage the Excise. For that clause was put into the act, to empower the king to let it for three years, that such contracts might be good in law, and another shall not proceed, but such as is recommended at the quarter sessions, and he shall have the refusal, and not to be let under the rate he refused it at. When the rate was put, we had the refusal, and this was my case: I paid the rent. At last lord Clifford, when the Farm was just going out, made a private contract, without our knowledge, and disposed of all those Farms to four or five other persons, without our knowledge. I will not censure lord Clifford, but I will say this, that the king's Revenue never was kept up, till it was in that method again. One of the farmers told me, 'That the Treasurer made a contract to other persons, and let us go, and offered 10,000*l.* a year more than they were to give, and advanced it at 6*l.* per cent. and no more, and so made the proposition better.' But he told us, the king was resolved, and wanted Money. (I think about this time the Triple League was broke.) I said to lord Clifford, 'That no man will turn out a tenant that pays his rent well: I hope the king will be no worse than other men.' Lord Clifford replied, 'The king intends not to use you ill, that have served him and his father well.' Upon this the king said, 'He would not put us upon hardships, but we should have some consideration for our Farm.' I appeal to sir Stephen Fox, whether I am not in the list of names of those to whom the king intended to give compensation for their Farms taken out of their hands; and I appeal to him, whether I had not the Pension under that consideration. But had it been a gift, or grant, and not under any consideration whatsoever, the king has employed me in several trusts; if I have changed my principles, or been guilty of the practices of any immorality, I beg that consideration, not to be exposed to that cruelty, not to be exposed to public censure.

Col. Whitley. I am one under that unfortunate list of Pensions. I was one of those in the recommendation of the country, for the farming the Excise. I had a covenant of 10,000*l.* from Dashwood not to supplant me. We fell into suit, and at last into an award, and till such time I never touched a penny of the money. I had in all 900*l.* which I received at several times. This is the true state of the case. If I did betray my country, I am not only fit to be turned out of the house, but out of the world. I have had money a long time due to me, and can get none of it. Be pleased to examine what relates to me as publickly as you please.

Sir Stephen Fox. I did distinguish carefully, of the lists of persons lately concerned in farming, &c. and in it, several members had pensions; and some had that were not members. Talbot was careful in expressing the reason in the receipt of the money. He would not receive it till he had it entire, and then received it, as a person lately concerned in the Excise.

Sir Philip Howard. If my case be distinct from others, I hope I shall be so judged. I am one of those to be considered under the head of 'Farmers of the Excise;' and I desire I may come under the head of those who came in upon a valuable consideration.

Mr. Harbord. This may well admit of a distinction, but not till you have farther heard the matter. If you find that the king's bounty went to one sort of parliament-men, and not to another, you may guess by that, for I could in the last parliament have told you how the question would go. If a pensioner went not well, slash he was put out of his pension.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. A Pension to betray one's country is a detestable thing to receive by any body, and I do utterly deny to have received any. I had the honour of the favour of my prince, and I had his favour when I made application for it. Avarice was never my humour. A gentleman having a small government called Cheade Castle, which lay nearer me, upon a reversionary patent, I was put upon it to get him to resign his government. He had 250*l.* and 250*l.* for quitting that Castle. I have had the honour here to be a zealous asserter of the Protestant religion, and in the country so too: As for my vote here, I gave it for Money, that the king should not supply his necessity by extraordinary means.

Sir Fr. Winnington. As for what Tredenham says of the nature of the Secret Committee, he need not reflect on the secret committee, but that it borders upon 'secret service,' I have heard that Tredenham has reported, 'That because he defended the duke of Lauderdale, I would be revenged of him.' As for this Castle, &c. when I was Solicitor General I passed a warrant, &c. but I appeal to him whether he told me of the 500*l.*? because he has given some sparring blows towards me, I desire he may name the person.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I desire that grace for my passion which I must allow for others. This putting me in the van of the Report of these gentlemen, does look like something of pointing at me. I have had considerable places offered me, but I would not have gentlemen turned out for me. As for this of Lauderdale, it is but a hearsay.

Sir Fr. Winnington. He dwindles this of Lauderdale to a flying report. There are thirty before him in the list, but had he been last you would have found him out.

Mr. Harbord. This is a hardship, that a private person should use one so, that has done you service. If Tredenham got a castle one way, Winnington lost one of the best places in England, (Solicitor General,) for doing his duty here, and I hope God will reward him.

Sir Henry Capel. It is no wonder, if the Committee of Secrecy go new ways to work, (as Tredenham alleged,) you must consider that never such new things were done before. Winnington has most dexterously and prudently made enquiry into this matter of the Pensioners, and it becomes you to be very severe to any man that makes such reflections. [Many called Tredenham to the Bar.]

Sir Tho. Clarges. What need you call for proof? Tredenham has confessed 'That he had 500*l.* to enable him to buy a Castle.' He called to Winnington, 'Prove it, prove it,' very peremptorily, and you ought to censure him.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I beg pardon for being too ready to give credit to a report, but when I consider the smallness of this matter of the Castle, which I did buy only for convenience of the situation near my estate, I submit to your censure, and beg your pardon. Pray consider how difficult it is for me to speak, I have had no time to prepare myself.

Sir Richard Wiseman at the bar.

The Speaker. The house is informed that you have disposed of several Pensions, of four times 400*l.* per ann. From whom did you receive the Money, and to whom did you pay it, and for what use?

Sir R. Wiseman. Those I received and paid I will give an account of in writing. I never employed it for a Mr. Knight, nor received it for Mr. Knight. I know one Knight, sir John Knight's son; when I saw him last, he was of the Temple; he had no transactions in the Money. I named him, because you, Mr. Speaker, named him.

The Speaker. Not long since, in the last session of parliament, you kept a good table; of whom had you the money to maintain it?

Wiseman. My Tenants gave me my money to keep my Table. I had no money from sir Stephen Fox, nor Mr. Bertie, nor by his order; nor from Mr. Chifinch, nor by his order. [This he spoke rudely and surlily. The Speaker asking him, 'Whether he had no Money for keeping a Table but from his tenants?' in a very peremptory manner he answered, 'No.'—He withdrew.

Sir Tho. Lee. This answer of Wiseman, and the manner of it, is not usual. If you allow this to any may at the bar, to give what he is asked in writing, you will lose your authority, and make an ill example for the future. If once you be put off with writing Answers to your questions at the bar, he will have counsel. You must tell him, 'He contemns the commons of England, if he makes no Answers to the questions you ask him.'

Wiseman again at the Bar.

The Speaker. The house is not satisfied that you shall give your Answer in writing. They require a direct Answer from you to what questions they shall ask you; I ask you, what annuity or pension you have received upon your account from the Excise, or any other person, for your particular, or use?

Wiseman. If I might have ever so much, I cannot tell you. I ask but a reasonable thing, to give my Answer in writing, and I will justify it by witnesses, and authentic testimony. But to a thing I am not prepared to answer, my reputation will be lost without reparation. I say not, I will not answer, but I will make a reasonable Answer, like a reasonable man.

To the Speaker's Questions.—Ans. I remember no sum whatsoever. I have received Money from the Excise, by a letter from Mr. Bertie. The last sum I received was five or six years ago. I cannot remember how much any of the sums were.

The Speaker. Did not you receive money in the name of a knight, or for one Mr. Knight?

—Ans. I received none of the king's money, for any other person, I aver it. I appointed nobody to do it. I never gave any money to pay bills for housekeeping, I stand upon it.—He withdrew.

Sir Stephen Fox. I did say Wiseman received 400*l.* per ann. from me, till Michaelmas 1675, and I did so at the committee. I said I could give no answer to Knight, but Wiseman could, and for him 400*l.* per ann. was paid, and three other persons more. I charge not Wiseman with receiving this always, but some of it to him I never failed to pay.

Wiseman again at the bar.

The Speaker. You have had time given you to consider the questions proposed. The house does expect a more direct Answer. This does so nearly concern you, that they expect you provided to give an answer, and therefore have sent for you down again, before they give their judgment.

Wiseman. I received no money from sir Stephen Fox, and I know nothing of 'secret service' received by the king's order. Give me time, and I will tell you the exact sums I received.

The Speaker. In this you are disproved by Fox, and if you will run the hazard of the displeasure of the house, you must expect what will follow.

Wiseman. I have told you, I remember not to have received 400*l.* per ann. from Fox. I cannot remember other sums. I persist in it, none by the king's order. So far as I am able, on the sudden, I will give you an account. When the Excise was let by lord Clifford, it was for 500,000*l.* per ann. Some friends put me upon it to farm the Excise. We gave 20,000*l.* per annum more, and 70,000*l.* advance money, for which service the king directed I should receive some money, but I remember not the particulars; there was but one contract. I acted by another party. I cannot tell whom. I do now remember the man, it was alderman Ford. I know not whether I received 7, 8, or 900*l.*

The Speaker. Did you receive any money from Mr. Bertie?

Wiseman stood mute some time, and then answered, 'I have not received any money from Mr. Bertie this year and a half. I had no order for continuance of my Pension out of the excise. That which the king gave me was annual, but I received it in a gross sum. I sold the annual pension the king gave me for 7, 8, or 900*l.* The pension was not granted me for life, but till the king declared otherwise. The assignment of the pension was made to the commissioners, or farmers; I believe it was assigned to major Huntington, Mr. Dawson, and sir John James.' This he spoke drawingly, and withdrew. The further consideration of the Report was adjourned to the 27th.

The Habeas Corpus Act passed.] May 26. Sir Robert Clayton was just giving an account of members who had Pensions out of the excise, upon consideration of their farms, when the black rod knocked at the door, and commanded the house to attend the king in the house of lords, where his majesty passed the Habeas Corpus Bill.*

* "The great, essential, and inestimable service done to the people of England, by this parliament, was in perfecting the Habeas Corpus Bill; which had been so long in agitation, and by which many wholesome provisions were made, to preserve the liberty of the subject from the invasions of the prerogative. Abuse of power, and the prevention of such abuses for the future, are the causes assigned in the preamble of the Bill for the enacting clauses it is composed of: The most material of which are, 1. To oblige all sheriffs, gaolers, ministers, or others, when served with a writ of Habeas Corpus, to obey it, within 3 days after the said service, by carrying up the body of the person therein named to the court, or judge, by whom

The Parliament dissolved.] After passing the said Bill, his majesty made this short speech to both houses :

“ My lords and gentlemen ; I was in great hopes that this session would have produced great good to the kingdom, and that it would have gone on unanimously for the good thereof. But to my great grief, I see there are such differences between the two houses, that I am afraid very ill effects will come of them. I know but one way of remedy for the present, assuring you, that, in the mean time, I shall show my sincerity with the same zeal I met you here. Therefore, my lord chancellor, I command you to do as I ordered you.”

His lordship accordingly prorogued the parliament to the 14th of August. But before that day, it was dissolved by proclamation .

the said writ was granted ; and before him to certify the true causes of his detainer and imprisonment, on the penalty of 100*l.* for the first offence, and 200*l.* and to be made incapable of holding his office, for the second : As also, under the like penalties, to grant the prisoner a true copy of the warrant of commitment and detainer, within six hours after demand. 2. To provide that no person shall be re-committed, for the same offence, after being enlarged by order of court, on the penalty of 500*l.* Also, 3. That if any judge, either in term-time, or vacation, refused any prisoner their Habeas Corpus, upon application, he should forfeit 500*l.* to the said prisoner. And 4. That no subject of this realm should be any longer liable to illegal imprisonments, in prisons beyond the seas.—Ferguson in his ‘Growth of Popery,’ with some bitterness, affirms, that this Bill met with great opposition from the lords ; that it gave rise to several conferences between the two houses ; and that, though it was far short of what it ought to have been, it was almost a miracle that their lordships suffered it to pass at all : And so much of truth there is in these assertions, that the committees of the two houses met several times upon it, without coming to any agreement ; insomuch that the completing of the Bill was put off to the last hour of the sessions ; and, even then, the commons were glad to admit of the lords’ Amendments, that they might have the merit, and their fellow-subjects the benefit, of so useful a law.” Ralph.

* Shortly after the Dissolution a singular pamphlet made its appearance, intitled, ‘An Appeal from the Country to the City, for the preservation of his majesty’s Person, Liberty, Property, and the Protestant Religion.’ For a copy of it see Appendix No. IX.

“ The impeachment of the five popish lords in the Tower, with that of the earl of Danby, was carried on with vigour. The power of this minister, and his credit with the king, rendered him extremely obnoxious to the popular leaders ; and the commons hoped that, if he were pushed to extremity, he would be obliged, in order to justify his own conduct, to

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES AFTER THE DISSOLUTION—STATE OF THE MINISTRY—MEAL-TUB PLOT—WHIG AND TORY.

“ The general affection,” says Mr. Hume, “ borne the king, appeared signally about this time. He fell sick at Windsor ; and had two or three fits of a fever, so violent as made his life be thought in danger. A general consternation seized all ranks of men, increased by the apprehensions entertained of his successor. In the present disposition of men’s minds, the king’s death, to use an expression of sir William Temple, was regarded as the end of the world. The mal-contented, it was feared, would proceed to extremities, and immediately kindle a civil war in the kingdom. Either their entire success, or entire failure, or even the balance and contest of parties, seemed all of them events equally fatal. The king’s chief counsellors therefore, Essex, Halifax, and Sunderland, who stood on bad terms with Shaftesbury and the popular party, advised him to send secretly for the duke, that, in case of any sinister accident, that prince might be ready to assert his right against the opposition which he was likely to meet with. When the duke arrived, he found his brother out of danger ; and it was agreed to conceal the invitation which he had received. (2d Sept.) His journey, however, was attended with important consequences. He prevailed on the king to disgrace Monmouth, whose projects were now known and avowed ; to deprive him of his command in the army ; and to send him beyond sea. He himself returned to Brussels ; but made a short stay in that place. He obtained leave to retire to Scotland, under pretence still of quieting the apprehensions of the English nation ; but in reality with a view of securing that kingdom in his interests. Though Essex and Halifax had concurred in the resolution of inviting over the duke, they soon found that they had not obtained his confidence, and that even the king, while he made use of their service, had no sincere regard for their persons. Essex in disgust resigned the treasury : Halifax retired to his country seat : Temple, despairing of any accommodation among such enraged parties, withdrew almost entirely to his books and his gardens. The king, who changed ministers as well as measures with great indifference, bestowed at this time the chief confidence on Hyde, Sunderland, and Godolphin. Hyde succeeded Essex in the treasury. All the king’s ministers, as well as himself, were extremely averse to the meeting of the new parliament, which they expected to find as refractory as any of the preceding. The elections had gone mostly in favour of the lay open the whole intrigue of the French alliance, which they suspected to contain a secret of the most dangerous nature. The king, on his part, apprehensive of the same consequences, and desirous to protect his minister, who was become criminal merely by obeying orders, employed his whole interest to support country party. The terrors of the plot had still a mighty influence over the populace; and the apprehensions of the duke's bigoted principles and arbitrary character weighed with men of sense and reflection. The king therefore resolved to prorogue the parliament, that he might try, whether time might allay those humours, which, by every other expedient, he had in vain attempted to mollify. In this measure he did not expect the concurrence of his council. He knew that those popular leaders, whom he had admitted, would zealously oppose a resolution, which disconcerted all their schemes; and that the royalists would not dare, by supporting it, to expose themselves to the vengeance of the parliament, when it should be assembled. These reasons obliged him to take this step entirely of himself; and he only declared his resolution in council. It is remarkable, that, though the king had made profession never to embrace any measure the validity of that pardon which had been granted him. The lords appointed a day for the examination of the question, and agreed to hear council on both sides: But the commons would not submit their pretensions to the discussion of argument and inquiry. They voted, that whoever should presume, without their leave, to maintain before the house of peers the validity of Danby's pardon, should be accounted a betrayer of the liberties of the English commons. And they made a demand, that the bishops, whom they knew to be devoted to the court, should be removed, not only when the trial of the earl should commence, but also when the validity of his pardon should be discussed. The bishops before the reformation had always enjoyed a seat in parliament: but so far were they anciently from regarding that dignity as a privilege, that they affected rather to form a separate order in the state, independent of the civil magistrate, and accountable only to the pope and to their own order. By the constitutions, however, of Clarendon, enacted during the reign of Henry ii. they were obliged to give their presence in parliament; but as the canon law prohibited them from assisting in capital trials, they were allowed in such cases the privilege of absenting themselves. A practice, which was at first voluntary, became afterwards a rule; and on the earl of Strafford's trial, the bishops, who would gladly have attended, and who were no longer bound by the canon law, were yet obliged to withdraw. It had been usual for them to enter a protest, asserting their right to sit; and this protest, being considered as a mere form, was always admitted and disregarded. But here was started a new question of no small importance. The commons, who were now enabled, by the violence of the people and the necessities of the crown, to make new acquisitions of powers and privileges, insisted that the bishops had no more title to vote in the question of the earl's pardon than in the impeachment itself. The bishops asserted that the without the advice of these counsellors, he had often broken that resolution, and had been necessitated, in affairs of the greatest consequence, to control their opinion. Many of them in disgust threw up about this time; particularly lord Russel, the most popular man in the nation, as well from the mildness and integrity of his character, as from his zealous attachment to the religion and liberties of his country. Though carried into some excesses, his intentions were ever esteemed upright; and being heir to the greatest fortune in the kingdom, as well as void of ambition, men believed that nothing but the last necessity could ever engage him to embrace any desperate measures. Shaftesbury, who was, in most particulars, of an opposite character, was removed by the king from the office of president of the council; and the earl of Radnor, a man who possessed whimsical talents and splenetic virtues, was substituted in his place. It was the pardon was merely a preliminary; and that, neither by the canon law nor the practice of parliament, were they ever obliged, in capital cases, to withdraw till the very commencement of the trial itself. If their absence was considered as a privilege, which was its real origin, it depended on their own choice, how far they would insist upon it. If regarded as a diminution of their right of peerage, such unfavourable customs ought never to be extended beyond the very circumstance established by them; and all arguments from a pretended parity of reason, were in that case of little or no authority. The house of lords were so much influenced by these reasons, that they admitted the bishops' right to vote, when the validity of the pardon should be examined. The commons insisted still on their withdrawing; and thus a quarrel being commenced between the two houses, the king, who expected nothing but fresh instances of violence from this parliament, began to entertain thoughts of laying hold of so favourable a pretence, and of finishing the session by a prorogation. While in this disposition, he was alarmed with sudden intelligence, that the house of commons was preparing a remonstrance, in order to inflame the nation still farther upon the favourite topics of the plot and of popery (27th May). He hastened, therefore, to execute his intention, even without consulting his new council, by whose advice he had promised to regulate his whole conduct. And thus were disappointed all the projects of the malcontents, who were extremely enraged at this vigorous measure of the king's. Shaftesbury publicly threatened that he would have the head of whoever had advised it. The parliament was soon after dissolved without advice of council; and writs were issued for a new parliament (10th July). The king was willing to try every means which gave a prospect of more compliance in his subjects; and in case of failure, the blame, he hoped, would lie on those whose obstinacy forced him to extremities." Hume.

favour and countenance of the parliament, which had chiefly encouraged the rumour of plots; but the nation had gotten so much into that vein of credulity, and every necessitous villain was so much incited by the success of Oates and Bedloe, that, even during the prorogation, the people were not allowed to remain in tranquillity. There was one Dangerfield, a fellow who had been burned in the hand for crimes, transported, whipped, pilloried four times, fined for cheats, out-lawed for felony, convicted of coining, and exposed to all the public infamy which the laws could inflict on the basest and most shameful enormities. The credulity of the people, and the humour of the times, enabled even this man to become a person of consequence. He was the author of a new incident, called the Meal-tub Plot, from the place where some papers, relating to it, were found. The bottom of this affair it is difficult, and not very material, to discover. It only appears, that Dangerfield, under pretence of betraying the conspiracies of the presbyterians, had been countenanced by some catholics of condition, and had even been admitted to the duke's presence and the king's: and that, under pretence of revealing new popish plots, he had obtained access to Shaftesbury, and some of the popular leaders. Which side he intended to cheat, is uncertain; or whether he did not rather mean to cheat both: but he soon found that the belief of the nation was more open to a popish than a presbyterian plot; and he resolved to strike in with the prevailing humour. Though no weight could be laid on his testimony, great clamour was raised; as if the court, by way of retaliation, had intended to load the presbyterians with the guilt of a false conspiracy. It must be confessed that the present period, by the prevalence and suspicion of such mean and ignoble arts on all sides, throws a great stain on the British annals. One of the most innocent artifices practised by party men at this time, was the additional ceremony, pomp and expence, with which a pope-burning was celebrated in London: (17th Nov.) The spectacle served to entertain, amuse, and inflame, the populace. The duke of Monmouth likewise came over without leave, and made a triumphant procession through many parts of the kingdom, extremely caressed and admired by the people. All these arts seemed requisite to support the general prejudices, during the long interval of parliament. Great endeavours were also used to obtain the king's consent for the meeting of that assembly. (1680.) Seventeen peers presented a petition to this purpose. Many of the corporations imitated the example. Notwithstanding several marks of displeasure, and even a menacing proclamation from the king, petitions came from all parts, earnestly insisting on a session of parliament. The danger of popery, and the terrors of the plot, were never forgotten in any of these addresses. Tumultuous petitioning was one of the chief artifices by which the malcontents in the last reign had attacked the crown: and though the manner of subscribing and delivering petitions was now somewhat regulated by act of parliament, the thing itself still remained; and was an admirable expedient for infesting the court, for spreading discontent, and for uniting the nation in any popular clamour. As the king found no law, by which he could punish those importunate, and, as he deemed them, undutiful solicitations, he was obliged to encounter them by popular applications of a contrary tendency. Wherever the church and court party prevailed, addresses were framed, containing expressions of the highest regard to his majesty, the most entire acquiescence in his wisdom, the most dutiful submission to his prerogative, and the deepest abhorrence of those who endeavoured to encroach upon it, by prescribing to him any time for assembling the parliament. Thus the nation came to be distinguished into Petitioners and Abhorrrers. Factions indeed were at this time extremely animated against each other. The very names, by which each party denominated its antagonist, discover the virulence and rancour which prevailed. For besides petitioner and abhorrrer, appellations which were soon forgotten, this year is remarkable for being the epoch of the well-known epithets of Whig and Tory, by which, and sometimes without any material difference, this island has been so long divided. The court party reproached their antagonists with their affinity to the fanatical conventiclers in Scotland, who were known by the name of Whigs: the country party found a resemblance between the courtiers and the popish banditti in Ireland, to whom the appellation of Tory was affixed. And after this manner, these foolish terms of reproach came into public and general use; and even at present seem not nearer their end than when they were first invented.—'As the kingdom was regularly and openly divided into two zealous parties, it was not difficult for the king to know, that the majority of the new house of commons was engaged in interests opposite to the court: but that he might leave no expedient untried, which could compose the unhappy differences among his subjects, he resolved at last, after a very long interval, to assemble the Parliament.'

FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF KING CHARLES II.

List of the House of Commons.] October 7, 1679. The New Parliament met, but was prorogued to the 17th, and then was adjourned to the 30th. SPEAKER—Serj. Williams.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
 Oct. 21, 1680. The king opened the session with the following Speech to both houses:

" My lords and gentlemen ; I have many particulars to open to you ; and because I dare not trust my memory with all that is requisite for me to mention, I shall read to you the particulars out of this paper ; viz. My lords and gentlemen, the several prorogations I have made have been very advantageous to our neighbours, and very useful to me ; for I have employed that time in making and perfecting an Alliance with the crown of Spain, suitable to that which I had before with the States of the United Provinces, and they also had with that of Spain, consisting of mutual obligations of succour and defence.—I have all the reason in the world to believe, that what was so much desired by former parliaments must needs be very grateful to you now ; for, though some perhaps may wish these measures had been taken sooner, yet no man can with reason think that it is now too late ; for they who desire to make these alliances, and they who desire to break them, shew themselves to be of another opinion.—And as these are the best measures that could be taken for the safety of England, and the repose of Christendom ; so they cannot fail to attain their end, and to spread and improve themselves farther, if our divisions at home do not render our friendship less considerable abroad.—To prevent these as much as may be ; I think fit to renew to you all the assurances which can be desired, that nothing shall be wanting on my part, to give you the fullest satisfaction your hearts can wish, for the security of the Protestant religion ; which I am fully resolved to maintain, against all the conspiracies of our enemies ; and to concur with you in any new Remedies which shall be proposed, that may consist with preserving the Succession of the crown in its due and legal course of descent.—And, in order to this, I do recommend to you, to pursue the further examination of the Plot, with a strict and an impartial enquiry. I do not think myself safe, nor you neither, till that matter be gone through with; and therefore it will be necessary that the Lords in the Tower be brought to their speedy Trial, that justice may be done.—I need not tell you what danger the city of Tangier is in, nor of what importance it is to us to preserve it: I have, with a mighty charge and expence, sent a very considerable relief thither: but constantly to maintain so great a force as that war will require, and to make those new works and fortifications without which the place will not long be tenable, amounts to so vast a sum, that without your support it will be impossible for me to undergo it. Therefore I lay the matter plainly before you, and desire your advice and assistance.—But that which I value above all the treasure in the world, and which I am sure will give me greater strength and reputation both at home and abroad than any treasure can do, is, a perfect union amongst ourselves.—Nothing but this can restore the kingdom to that strength and vigour which it seems to have lost; and raise us again to that consideration which England hath usually had. All Europe have their eyes upon this assembly; and think their own happiness or misery, as well as ours, will depend upon it. If we should be so unhappy as to fall into such a misunderstanding amongst ourselves as would render our friendship unsafe to trust to; it will not be wondered at, if our neighbours should begin to take new resolutions, and perhaps such as may be fatal to us. Let us therefore take care, that we do not gratify our enemies, and discourage our friends, by any unseasonable disputes. If any such do happen, the world will see it was no fault of mine; for I have done all that was possible for me to do, to keep you in peace while I live, and to leave you so when I die. But from so great prudence, and so good affections, as yours, I can fear nothing of this kind; but do rely upon you all, that you will use your best endeavours to bring this parliament to a good and happy conclusion.”

Mr Williams chosen Speaker.] After this Speech, the lord chancellor, by his majesty's command, directed the commons to return to their house, and to proceed to the Choice of a Speaker, when W. Williams, esq. was unanimously elected; and was approved the next day by his majesty.

Oct. 26. Mr. Dangerfield was brought to the bar of the commons, where he gave an account of the new Sham Plot, as it is printed in the Trials.*

* “Dangerfield, a subtle and dexterous man, who had gone through all the shapes and practices of roguery, and in particular was a false coiner, undertook now to coin a Plot for the ends of the Papists. He was in jail for debt; and was in an ill intrigue with one Cellier, a Popish midwife, who had a great share of wit, Debate on the Means of suppressing Popery, and preventing a Popish Successor.] Oct. 26. Lord Russel rose and said:—“Mr. Speaker; sir, seeing by God's providence, and his majesty's favour, we are here assembled, to consult and advise about the great affairs of the kingdom, I humbly conceive it will become us to begin first with that which is of most consequence to our king and country, and to take into consideration how to save the main, before we spend any time about particulars. Sir, I am of opinion, that the life of our king, the safety of our country and Protestant religion, are in great danger from Popery; and that either this parliament must suppress the power and growth of popery, or else that popery will soon destroy, not only parliaments, but all that is near and dear to us. And therefore I humbly move, that we may resolve to take into our consideration in the first place, how to suppress Popery, and to prevent a Popish Successor; without which all our endeavours about other matters will not signify any thing, and therefore this justly challengeth the precedency.

Sir Henry Capel. I stand up to second that and was abandoned to lewdness. She got him to be brought out of prison, and carried him to the countess of Powis, a zealous managing Papist. He, after he had laid matters with her, got into all companies, and mixed with the hottest men of the town, and studied to engage others with himself to swear, ‘That they had been invited to accept of commissions; and that a new form of government was to be set up. And that the king and the royal family were to be sent away.’ He was carried with this story first to the duke, and then to the king, and had a weekly allowance of money, and was very kindly used by many of that side; so that a whisper ran about town, that some extraordinary thing would quickly break out. Dangerfield having some correspondence with one col. Mansel, he made up a bundle of seditious but ill contrived Letters, and laid them in a dark corner of his room; and then some searchers were sent from the Custom-House to look for some forbidden goods, which they heard were in Mansel's chamber. There were no goods found, but as it was laid, they found that bundle of Letters; and upon that a great noise was made of a discovery. But upon enquiry it appeared the Letters were counterfeited, and the forger of them was suspected: so they searched into all Dangerfield's haunts, and in one of them they found a Paper that contained the scheme of this whole fiction, which, because it was found in a Meal Tub, came to be called the “MEAL-TUB PLOT.” Dangerfield was upon that clapped up, and he soon after confessed how the whole matter was laid and managed: In which it is very probable he mixed much of his own invention with truth, for he was a profligate liar. This was a great disgrace to the Popish party, and the king suffered much by the countenance he had given it.” Burnet.

motion, and to give some reasons, why I agree in it; not doubting but other persons will be of the same opinion, if they have the same sentiments of what influence the Popish party have had in the management of most of our affairs both at home and abroad, for many years last past; and how that party hath increased, and been encouraged. Sir, I remember, that, after his majesty's happy Restoration, it was thought convenient that an Act of Uniformity should pass, as the best law that could be invented, to secure the Church from the danger of Popery and Fanaticism, and accordingly it did pass in 1662; but in 1663, some, that then managed the great affairs of state, or at least had great interest with his majesty, were of another opinion: for they had prevailed with him to grant a Toleration and Indulgence, and to make a Declaration to that purpose. The parliament assembling soon after, thought it very strange, that in one year an Act of Uniformity should be the best way to preserve the Church, and that in the next year a Toleration and Indulgence: therefore, after a serious debate about it, in Feb. 1663, they made an Address to his majesty, humbly representing how it would reflect upon the wisdom of that parliament, to have such an Alteration made so soon; and that such proceedings, for aught they could foresee, would end in Popery. Upon which his majesty, out of his great goodness, stopped the issuing out of the said Toleration; hearkening rather to the advice of his parliament, than to any private counsellors. Sir, I cannot inform you who it was that gave that Advice to his majesty, nor certainly affirm they were popishly affected; but, if I may take the liberty to judge of a tree by its fruit, I have some reason to think so; because I find by Coleman's Letters, and other discoveries, that a Toleration and Indulgence should be one of the great engines they intended to use for the establishing of Popery in this nation. But the project thus failing at this time, they were forced to wait with patience until they could have another opportunity; employing in the mean time their diabolical counsels, in weakening the Protestant Interest, (in order to a general destruction of it) by engaging us in a war with Holland. In which the French acted the same part in the behalf of the Dutch, as they did afterwards in our behalf against them 1672; very fairly looking on both times, while we poor Protestants with great fury destroyed one the other. But this was not so strange, nor so plain as the dividing of our Fleet under the command of prince Rupert and gen. Monk, and the Design of destroying them as well as their Ships, and the rest of our navy royal at Chatham. And as they thus acted their part at sea, so they did not forget to do their best ashore; in April 1666, some persons that were then hanged, fairly confessed they had been treated with, and had treated with others, to burn the City of London in Sept. following, of which confession we then took as little notice, as we have of other discoveries against Papisis since: however, accordingly in Sept. 13,000 houses of the city of London were burnt; and those that were taken in carrying on that work generously discharged without any trial; and one papist, that confessed that himself and others did set the city on fire, was in great haste hanged, and so the business was hushed up as completely as the late great Plot is like to be now, branding Hlubert, that then made that confession, with madness; as now these last witnesses with perjury, sodomy, and what not. However, these businesses were not so carried, but his maj. discerned some of the intrigues of them, which made him alter his councils, and, contrary to the endeavours of that party, enter into new Alliances, by making up that excellent League, usually called the Triple League; which put a stop to these men's designs as to affairs abroad, but not to their designs here at home. For having obtained the Oxford Act. and some others against the Dissenters, great endeavours were used to have them; executed severely, in expectation that the Dissenters would soon be made weary of living quietly under them, and in the end be glad of a toleration; but the Dissenters deceived them, and submitted to the laws; insomuch that in 1670 to 1671, there was hardly a conventicle to be heard of in England; and might never have been more, if that party had not been afraid of a great disappointment thereby: wherefore to revive our divisions, and to bring in (as they hoped) their own religion, they employed all their force again to get a Toleration. I say they did it; because it cannot be imagined it could be from any Protestant interest; both church-men and dissenters publicly declaring their detestation of it. And in 1672, was obtained, printed, and published. After we had, in order to the carrying it on, broke that never to be forgotten Triple League, sacrificed our honour to the French, not only by making a strong Alliance with them, but by seizing the Dutch Suÿrna Fleet, and then afterwards proclaiming war with them. Which war continued in order to ruin us both; for the French proved but lookers-on at sea, (as they had done when engaged with the Dutch in 1665,) though great conquerors at land, especially of the Protestants in Germany and Holland. And as this Toleration was accompanied with these great alterations in affairs abroad, so it was backed, 1. With a great minister of state at the helm at home, who was so confident of the refusing Popery here, that he could not forbear to declare himself to be of that religion; I mean my lord treasurer Clifford: as also, 2. With a great Army at Blackheath, ready upon all occasions: and, 3. With the greatest violation on the Property of the subject, that ever happened in this nation, the seizing of one million and an half, or thereabout, in the Exchequer. All which indeed made our condition desperate, and, as many thought, past retrieve. But, Mr. Speaker, here again the goodness and wisdom of his maj. saved us refusing to follow such pernicious counsels; upon which Clifford not only lost his place, but his life too, breaking his heart (as is by most believed) to see himself so disappointed in this great design. And here, as we can never too much detest my lord Clifford, and such others, who contrived our ruin; so we can never sufficiently admire his majesty's royal care, in working out our security, by refusing to follow any advice that tended to those ends: And therefore, to the great disappointment of that party, at the request of the house of commons, at their next meeting, he recalled the said Toleration, disbanded the Army, and in convenient time made a peace with Holland. But though this party were thus defeated of their design, yet not so discouraged as to give it over. They changed their measures, but not their principles; and although they desisted from farther aiming at a Toleration, yet they no ways neglected pursuing a Reformation; but in order thereto, prosecuted a correspondence formerly begun for that purpose with the French king, and, by promising him considerable Supplies, to carry on the war he was then engaged in, secured themselves, as they thought, of his assistance for settling of Popery here. Accordingly, it is not unknown, what a party of men, what quantity of ammunition, and other necessaries for war, were sent to the French king, during the war he was then engaged in; and how it was done contrary to the advice of the parliament, and the solicitations of most of the princes in Europe, and true interest of England, to the astonishment of all good men; especially because it was contrary to his majesty's own Proclamation, and when the French had declared they made that war for Religion, endeavouring to force the Dutch to allow of Popish Churches. However, such was the strength of this Party, that this assistance was continued until the French king was willing to make a peace, and then who more instrumental than our ministers to effect it? Several ambassadors, and plenipotentiaries too, being sent as well to the court of Spain, as Germany and Holland, for that purpose. And at last, the Dutch being weary, and consumed with the War, they were persuaded to be willing for a Peace, and accordingly the 10th of Jan. 1676, entered into a Treaty with us for a general peace, to be accomplished by such ways and means as are therein prescribed. Which League was kept private for some time, and instead of any discovery thereof, about the end of Feb. following, (the parliament being then soon after to assemble) a great noise was made of entering into a war with France, it being concluded, that nothing like that would incline the parliament to give Money, nor the people freely to part with it, because it was the only way to extinguish those Fears they lay under, by reason of the growing greatness of France. At the meeting of the parliament, the project was set on foot with all the art and industry imaginable; and so far were the major part of the members persuaded of the reality thereof, that they were inclinable to give a great sum of Money for the carrying on of the war; but while they were in consultation about it, the League formerly mentioned, agreed at the Hague, was unluckily made (in some measure) public, and occasioned a great jealousy of the reality of the pretended war. And the greater, because upon an enquiry, they could not find there were any Alliances made to that purpose. And yet, notwithstanding this, and the great endeavours of some worthy members of that parliament, (now of this;) an Army of 30,000 men were raised, and a Tax of above 1,200,000*l.* was given. And then, instead of a War, a general Peace, according to that Treaty agreed with Holland, was presently made. By which that Party thought they had secured, not only the power of France, but the men and money here raised at home, to be made serviceable for their ends; there wanting nothing but a Popish king to perfect all these Designs. For which we have great reason to believe they had made all necessary preparation, as well by employing men and money, to find out wicked instruments to take away the king's life, as by providing one Cleypole to be a sacrifice, to make an atonement for the Act, and to cast the wickedness thereof on the Fanatics. To which purpose the said Cleypole was really imprisoned some time before in the Tower, upon the evidence of two witnesses, that he should say, that he and 200 more had engaged to kill the king, the next time he went to Newmarket. For which, in all probability, he had as really been hanged, if the breaking out of the Plot had not prevented their designs. Then was Cleypole, the next term after, publicly cleared at the King's-Bench bar, the witnesses appearing no more against him. Thus were we again reduced to a miserable condition; but it pleased God, by the discovery of the Plot by Dr. Oates, once more to save us; whose Evidence (he being but one witness) they thought at first to have out-braved; but some of them being so infatuated as to kill Justice Godfrey, and Coleman so unfortunate as to leave some of his important Papers in his house, notwithstanding the time he had to convey them away, it wrought so great a fermentation in the people, as that there was no remedy, but that the farther pursuit of the Plot must be again laid aside, and a fair face put upon things. And so accordingly, there was for a few months; but how, after Wakeman's Trial, things turned again, what endeavours have been since used to ridicule the Plot, to disparage the old witnesses, to discourage new ones, to set up Presbyterian Plots, and to increase our divisions, I suppose must be fresh in every man's memory here, and therefore I shall not offer to trouble you therewith.—But, sir, I cannot conclude without begging your patience, while I observe how things have been carried on in Scotland and Ireland, answerable to what was done here. In Ireland, the Papists are at least five to one in number to the Protestants, and may probably derive from their cradle an inclination to massacre them again: at least the Protestants have no security, but by having the militia, arms, and the command of towns and forts in their hands. But about the same time, or a little before that the Toleration came out here, in 1672, an Order went from hence, which, after a long preamble of the loyalty and affection of the Papists to his majesty, required the lord lieutenant and council to dispense with the Papists wearing of arms, and living in corporations, and a great many other things in their favour; of which there have been made such use, as that the Plot they was in as good readiness as that here: but how carried on, and how endeavours were there also used to stifle it, will appear when your leisure may permit you to examine those witnesses.—In Scotland, the government is quite altered, the use of parliaments in a manner abolished, and the power of that government lodged in a commissioner and council, a standing army of 22,000 men settled, all endeavours used to divide the Protestant Interest, and to encourage the Papists. By which we may conclude, that the same interest hath had a great hand in the management of affairs there also.—And, sir, may we not as well believe, that the world was at first made of atoms, or by chance, without the help of an Omnipotent Hand, as that these affairs in our little world have been thus carried on, so many years together, so contrary to our true interest, without some great original cause, by which the Popish Interest hath so far got the ascendant of the Protestant Interest, that, notwithstanding all his majesty's endeavours, things have been strangely over-ruled in favour of that Party; how and which way, his majesty's Declaration made in April 1679, is to me a great manifestation.—Sir, I hope the weight of the matter I have discoursed on, will plead my pardon with the house for having troubled you so long: I submit what I have said to your judgment, humbly desiring a favourable construction; and although I have said some things that are very strange, and other things grounded only on conjectures, yet I believe that no man will have just reason to doubt the probability of the truth, if they will but consider what a potent friend the Papists have had of James duke of York, and how emboldened by the hopes of having him for king. And as it is not to be doubted that they have had his assistance, so they have had the French ambassador's too; who, by his frequency at the Palace, had seemed rather one of the family and king's household, than a Foreign ambassador; and by his egress and regress to and from his majesty, rather a prime minister of state of this kingdom, than a counsellor to another prince. And the truth of all hath been so confirmed by Coleman's Letters, making the duke's Interest, the French Interest, and the Papists Interest so much one, and by the many witnesses that have come in about the Plot, that I think we may rather be at a loss for our remedy, than in doubt of our disease. And therefore, though I know the difficulties I may bring myself under, by having thus laid open some men's designs; yet seeing my king and country have called me to this service, I am resolved, that as my father lost his life for king Ch. i. so I will not be afraid to adventure mine for king Ch. ii. and that makes me expose myself in his service in this place.—Sir, I think (seeing things are thus) without neglecting our duty to our king and country, nay to our God too, we cannot defer endeavouring the securing the king's Person, and Protestant Religion, by all lawful means whatsoever; and therefore I second the motion that was made, that we may, in the first place, take into our consideration, how to suppress Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor; that so we may never return again to superstition, idolatry and slavery, but may always preserve that pure religion, to be the religion of this nation, for which so many of our fore-fathers have suffered martyrdom, I mean the Protestant Religion, as long as the Sun and Moon endure.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Sir, the Popish party have not only had a great influence on the management of our affairs, both foreign and domestic, while they could do it under a disguise; but notwithstanding the discovery of their whole Plot, have ever since gone on triumphant, as if they were not afraid of any opposition that can be made against them. Although the most part of Dr. Oates's Discovery was no news to most men; and the great Correspondence which Coleman had held with Foreign parts, had been generally observed for some years: yet what difficulties were there raised against believing of Oates's testimony, and against apprehending of Coleman's person, and seizing of his Papers; by which he had opportunity to carry away the most part, and by that means prevented a great deal of evidence, which we should otherways have had against that party; though by chance he left enough to hang himself. And as their power, or the respect which was borne them, appeared in this; so their great confidence in the never-to-be-forgotten death of sir E. Godfrey, which doubtless they accomplished, (as to conceal evidence, so to intimidate justices and others from doing their duty,) with great assurance, that those who did it should never have been brought to justice. And I must confess, we took a strange unheard-of way, either to do that, or prevent the going on of the Plot: for in Oct. after the Plot broke out, no less than 57 Commissions were discovered for raising soldiers, granted to several popish recusants, with warrants to muster without taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy or Test; countersigned by the then secretary of state. Of which the parliament taking notice, they were soon after dissolved, in the midst of the examination of the Plot. And the next that failed, though composed of true English gentlemen, as soon as they fell severe upon popery, had no better success; certainly, sir, not by the prevalency or advice of any true English protestants; and who then may be presumed to have given such advice, I leave to your judgment. These two parliaments being thus dissolved, a third was summoned, but was not permitted to sit, but, on the contrary, put off by several prorogations. At which the people being discontented, their Fears and Jealousies rising from the papists increasing, from which they knew they could not be effectually secured but by a parliament; several counties and cities joined in petitioning his maj. for a parliament. But it being foreseen that every thing but tended to make way for the meeting of parliaments, was dangerous, such was the influence of that party, as that they obtained a proclamation, penned I think by Coleman himself, or by somebody that had no more love to the protestant religion than he, forbidding petitioning as seditious and tumultuous. And that nothing should be wanting to shew their power, at length, by the endeavours of some great men, some credulous and ambitious men were drawn in to be Abhorers. Good God! where were these men's senses, that in a time when the nation was in such imminent danger, there should be any good protestant that should favour petitioning for a parliament? But I hope this house will have a time to speak with these gentlemen, and mark them with the reward they deserve. And now that it was found, that there were a good, easy sort of credulous people that might be wrought upon, it was thought high time to have a Counterplot that might swallow up that of the papists, and restore them to their former credit. How is this was carried on by good men and bad, am loth to particularize; but I cannot but observe, that Dangerfield had more money and encouragement given, while he was carrying on that Plot, than I could ever hear he hath had since the discovery of it. But though it is not strange, that the papists should be so wicked, as to contrive such a design, for the restoring of the Plot upon the protestants, though with the loss of so many honest men's lives, as was intended; yet it is strange to see how willing many protestants, especially of those of the best sort, were to believe it; and how little pleased with Dangerfield, for the great service he did in discovering that wicked Plot. So powerful and so lucky are the popish party, in sowing of animosities amongst us, tending to divide us, and so willing are we to entertain them to our destruction. And as the popish party have been very industrious in the contriving of Reports and Plots, to remove the ill reports they lie under, and have had a great influence in managing of parliamentary affairs; so we may presume they have had in the disengendering of justice, as may appear by considering what hath been done by our judges of late.

—At Wakeman's Trial, those persons who at former trials had been treated with that respect that is due to the king's evidence, and whose credit and reputation had stood clear without exception in all other trials, were now not only brow-beaten, but their evidence presented to the jury as doubtful, and not to be depended on; and so at all other trials of papists from that time forward. By which many of the greatest offenders were quitted and cleared as to the Plot, and those that were brought for defaming the king's evidence, and suborning witnesses in order thereto, very kindly treated, and discharged with easy sentences, especially if papists; but if protestants, though only for printing or vending some unlicensed Book, were imprisoned and largely fined. But I beg leave to particularize in the case of one Carr, who was indicted for printing a Weekly Intelligence, called, 'The Packet of Advice from Rome; or, the History of Popery.' This man had a strange knack of writing extraordinary well upon that subject, and the Paper was by most persons thought not only very ingenious, but also very useful at this time, for the information of the people, because it laid open very intelligibly the errors and cheats of that church. However, upon an Information given to the court of King's-Bench against this Carr, this Rule was made: 'Ordinatum est, quod liber intitulat, 'The Weekly Packet, &c. non ulterius imprimatur, vel publicetur, per aliquam personam quancunque. Per Cur.'—I think it amounts to little less than a total prohibition of printing any thing against popery.—The true English protestants being thus prevented of having parliaments to redress their Grievances, and to secure them against the fears of popery, as also from petitioning for parliaments, or writing for the protestant religion, they had recourse to their old way of presenting grievances by juries. But advice being given, that some great papists were concerned in the presentment, particularly the duke of York, the jury was dismissed in an extrajudicial manner, and so no remedy in the world allowed for poor protestants. What an unhappy star were we born under, that things should be thus carried against us, in the whole course of our government, whilst we have a wise protestant king over us? What may not be expected under a popish king, if it should be our misfortune to have any? And therefore, I think, sir, we ought to endeavour to prevent it, by consulting in the first place how to suppress popery, and prevent a popish successor, which is my humble motion.

Mr. Montagu. Sir, you have heard what an influence the Popish party hath had in the management of all our affairs of greatest importance, almost ever since his maj.'s happy Restoration; how the making of peace, or war, or foreign alliances, hath been over-ruled by that party, to the great danger of the nation, and Protestant Religion both at home and abroad: insomuch as it may be justly feared, that there is a general design to root out that religion from the face of the earth; which may not be difficult to be done, if by establishing Popery here, assistance to the Protestants abroad may be prevented; or by destroying the Protestants abroad (which are so many bulwarks to us) we should be left to resist alone. You have also heard how that party hath influenced the resolutions made touching parliaments and affairs here at home. The truth is, sir, that interest is crept into our court, and hath a great power in our councils; it is crept into our courts of justice, and hath a great command in our army, our navy, our forts, and our castles, and into all places upon which our security depends. And it is impossible it should be otherwise, as long as we have a Popish Successor, and that party the hopes of a Popish king. And I humbly conceive that it is very obvious, that as long as that party hath such a power, not only our religion, but the life of his majesty, and the whole government, is in danger. And therefore I think we cannot better comply with our duty to our king and country, than in resolving to use our utmost endeavours to extirpate Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor; and therefore I would desire you would be pleased to put the question.

Resolved, nem. con. "That it is the opinion of this house, that they ought to proceed effectually to suppress Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor."

Resolved, "That an Address be made to his majesty, declaring the Resolution of this house, to preserve and support the king's Person and Government, and the Protestant Religion at home and abroad."

Petitioning the King, voted to be the Right of the Subject.] Oct. 27. Sir Gilbert Gerrard.*

* "In the beginning of Jan. sir Gilbert Gerrard, and one Mr. Smith, accompanied by eight other gentlemen, presented a Petition to his majesty, for the sitting of the parliament, in the name of some thousands of his subjects, inhabitants of London, Westminster, and the places adjacent; but met with a very ungracious reception; his maj. declaring, 'That he looked upon himself to be the head of the government, and the only judge of what was fit to be done in such cases; and that he would do what he thought most for the good of himself and his people.' His majesty likewise expressed his concern to find one of sir G. Gerrard's name, and particularly sir Gilbert himself, in such a thing; and, when sir Gilbert would have replied, turned away in displeasure. But this mortifying reception did not deter others from treading the same path. They were now sensible, that the laws had no hold of them; and frowns they did not fear. Tho. Thynne, esq. accompanied by sir Walter St. John, and sir Edward Hungerford, presented a Petition in the name of the county of Wilts: sir Rob. Barrington, col. Mildmay, Mr. Honeywood, &c. another for Essex: and certain other gentlemen a third, for Berkshire. All were alike discountenanced: except that the king made a jest of the Berkshire application: whereas he treated that of Wilts as coming from a company of 'loose, disaffected people,'

Mr. Speaker, I crave leave to mind you of a great infringement which hath been made of the liberty of the subject, since the last session of parliament. Sir, many good Protestants thinking it very strange, that two parliaments should be dissolved, without doing any thing material against Popery, and a third so often prorogued in a time of such imminent danger; and foreseeing the ruin such delays might bring upon them, resolved to petition his majesty; and accordingly in several counties and corporations, Petitions, humbly praying his majesty to let the parliament sit, were drawn up, and signed by many thousands of good subjects, in a peaceable and quiet way, and delivered to his majesty by no greater number of persons than is allowed. But although this was conformable to law, and the duty of good subjects, considering what danger his majesty's person and the Protestant Religion was in, yet it was traduced to his majesty as seditious and tumultuous, and forbidden by a Proclamation, and great affronts and discouragements given to such, as either promoted or delivered the said Petitions; and at last several persons in many places were set up to declare at the assizes, and other public places, an Abhorrency and Detestation of such petitioning.

Mr. Sacheverell. Sir, I humbly conceive the subjects of England have an undoubted right to petition his majesty for the sitting of parliaments, and redressing of Grievances; and, that considering the circumstances we are under, we have no reason to lose it. If it should be our unhappiness to have a popish king, may be because it had not the sanction of the Grand Jury: and as to that of Essex, he took occasion to reproach col. Mildmay, though indirectly, with the mercy he had received by the Act of Oblivion; to which he added a caution, 'That such as had stood in need of that Act would do well, not to take such courses as might need another.' But, notwithstanding all this severity, still several other Petitions were presented, though from persons of less eminence; and, in particular, one from Taunton, as the king was coming out of the house of lords, the day he had in person declared to both houses his resolution to postpone the session; and his majesty asking the presenter, 'How he dared do that?' 'Sir,' said he, 'my name is DARE.' †

A most humorous description of the manner of procuring these Petitions is thus given by Mr. North, in his Examen, p. 342: "But, not be surrounded with popish counsellors, so as that poor Protestant subjects may be debarred of all other ways whatsoever of making known our complaints to him; and must we lose this too? Sir, I think it is so necessary, and material a privilege to the subject, as that we ought, without loss of time, to assert our rights to it: and therefore I humbly move you to make some Vote to that purpose.

† This person was a goldsmith of that town, and was selected to be made an example of: not for petitioning, though in spite of the Proclamation; that could not be done: but for speaking seditious words: for which he was first sent for up to Council, in custody; and afterwards prosecuted, and fined 500*l*. And the town of Taunton, profiting by his example, took occasion soon after, to disown his Petition publicly in the Gazette, No. 1501.

Sir F. Winnington. Sir, I am not only of opinion with that worthy member that spoke last, as to making a Vote for asserting the Right of the subject to petition their prince, but also for chastizing of those who have been so wicked and abominable as to traduce it and abhor it. And to that purpose, I think, sir, it will be convenient that we find out who advised or drew that Proclamation against it, and examine how a Petition that was made in Berkshire, was ordered to be taken off the file at a Quarter-Sessions, if worthy to be so called, for the effecting so great a work as this, it was necessary to institute a method of proceeding, and to retrench the laborious part as much as they could. And thus it was done: Petitions in form, as had been authentically prepared for the sake of the unlearned, were written, or, as I take it, printed upon parchments of a prescribed width, with large blanks underneath; and these were put into the hands of agitants and sub-agitants in the countries about, branching forth so nice as into hundreds, towns, and villages, if any thing populous, or affording confiding persons to negotiate. And these Agitators, being choice party-men, and well instructed, went to every free voter, and indeed every one, as they came in their way, demanding their hands to the Petition; and did it in such a manner, as a plain man knew not well whether it was lawful for him to refuse or no. And when this hand-tax was gathered, the parchment-petition was sent up to a select assembly or club, who had this administration in charge. And there the bead-roll of hands and marks was cut off the several Petitions out of one county, except one; and to that all the rest were glued. So there appeared a fair Petition, intituled, 'From all the Freeholders, &c.' And the roll being opened and extended, there appeared more shapes than ever dreams presented, looking as if they were alive, and, like insects, crawling about, or as the half-formed equivocal vermin in the mud of Nile; but looking closer, they all shewed themselves no other than hieroglyphics of clowns. And, rather than want a due number of these monsters, it was common for the Agitators, or their masters, to forge marks and names, as they would have, and so save a great deal of trotting about, without so much as seeing the parties, or caring whether they approved it or no. But, for certain, the work was carried on with such pragmatical impertinence and impetuosity, as well as insolence and scandal to the government, that words can scarce represent the true genius of the proceeding."

there being but four Justices of the Peace, and two of them such obscure persons as I cannot get their names. And also make some inspection into those Addresses that have been made against Petitioning, and by whom contrived, signed, or delivered. But this must be a work of time; for the present, I humbly move you to pass one Vote to assert the Right of the Subject to petition the king, another of censure on those persons that have traduced it, and to appoint a committee for your farther proceeding herein.

It was then Resolved, "1. That it is, and ever hath been, the undoubted Right of the Subjects of England to petition the king, for the calling and sitting of Parliaments, and redressing of Grievances. 2. That to traduce such Petitioning as a violation of duty, and to represent it to his majesty as tumultuous or seditious, is to betray the Liberty of the Subject, and contributes to the design of subverting the antient legal constitution of this kingdom, and introducing arbitrary power. 3. That a committee be appointed to enquire after all such Persons, that have offended against the Right of the Subject."

Col. Titus. Sir, I am very glad these Votes have past so unanimously; for Popery and Arbitrary Government can never be set up in this nation, if we could be sure of frequent parliaments. And therefore the asserting of the right of the subject in any thing which tends to that, may be of great use to this nation. But, sir, seeing you have taken this business into your consideration, I think we may do well to go a little farther with it, even at this time. I am informed some members of the house are guilty of having acted contrary to those Votes; and I am of opinion, that as they were not willing that we should sit here; so that we should be as willing not to have them sit amongst us. For, if it were a great crime in others, much more in those that were chosen to assert the rights and liberties of the people. It is very unlikely that men of such principles should make good parliament-men; and I think it will very well consist with the justice of the house, to begin with a reformation amongst ourselves; and therefore I humbly move we may first proceed against such. Being commanded to name such Members, he named sir Francis Withins, who not being in the house, was ordered to attend the next day.

Sir R. Cann expelled.] Oct. 28. It having been proved, That sir Robert Cann, a Member, had publicly declared, That there was no Popish-Plot, but a presbyterian plot: and having, in his Defence, uttered several reflecting words against sir J. Knight, another Member, who confirmed the Evidence against him, the said sir R. Cann was first ordered to the Tower, and then expelled the house.

Sir F. Withins expelled.] Oct. 29. The commons resolved, "That sir F. Withins, by promoting and presenting to his majesty an Address, expressing an Abhorrence to petition his majesty for the calling and sitting of parlinments, hath betrayed the undoubted rights of the subjects of England." They then Ordered, "That the said sir F. Withins be expelled the house, for this high crime. And, that he do receive his Sentence at the bar of this house, upon his knees, from Mr. Speaker," which was done accordingly.

The Votes first ordered to be printed.] Oct. 30. The house Resolved, for the first time, "That their Votes should be printed, being first perused and signed by the Speaker: and, that the Speaker nominate and appoint persons to print the same."

Votes against the Duke of York.] Nov. 2. Sir F. Winnington made a Report of what was found in the Lords Journal relating to the horrid Popish-Plot. Mr. Treby reported what by order of the secret committee he reported to the last parliament relating to the Popish-plot. After some debates thereupon, it was Resolved, "That the duke of York's being a Papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the Crown, hath given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present Designs and Conspiracies against the King and Protestant Religion." 2. "That, in defence of the King's Person and Government, and Protestant Religion, this house doth declare they will stand by his majesty with their Lives and Fortunes; and that if his majesty should come to any violent death, which God forbid, they will revenge it to the utmost on the Papists."

Debate on bringing in the Bill of Exclusion.] Col. Titus. Sir, I have observed from the Reports that have been read, and all the Evidence that I have heard about the Popish Plot, that it hath its original, as you have voted, from James duke of York; and it is not probable, in my opinion, that the popish interest can ever decline, as long as there is a Popish Successor, and they have such hopes of his coming to the crown; and therefore I humbly move you, that a Committee be appointed to draw up a Bill to disable James duke of York from inheriting the imperial Crown of this realm.

Lord Russel. Sir, if we consider the train of ill consequences that attend the having of a popish successor, and the certain miseries that must fall on this nation, if ever we should have a popish king; and how impossible the one, or improbable that the other can be prevented, but by disinheriting the duke of York; I think that as we cannot disagree, as to the sadness of our condition, so it will be hard to find out any other way to secure us; and therefore I second the motion.

Mr. Harbord. Sir; we shall do ill to be mealy-mouthed, when our throats are in such danger; therefore I will not be afraid to speak out, when speaking plain English is necessary to save our king and country. Have we not heard, and is it not apparently true, that peace and war, foreign alliances, meetings, dissolutions, and prorogations of parliaments, trials at Westminster-Hall, resolutions in council, and other things of importance, have been influenced by a popish party or interest? And can we, sir, imagine that these great things should be done by a less man than James duke of York; Hath not the examination of the Plot, in which the king's life and all our safeties is so much concerned, been kept off to admiration, and the witnesses discouraged even to despair? Have not counter-plots been set up, and carried on with a strong hand, and false witnesses in abundance, to destroy the true ones? From what cause can such strange, unheard of effects proceed, but from the power and influence of a Popish Successor? And we have no great reason to admire it, if we consider how usual it is for politicians to be given to flattery, and to be led by ambition, and how natural it is for courtiers and great ministers of state to worship the rising sun. And, sir, is it not easy to foresee what great miseries may come to this kingdom by such kind of managements? Can any man imagine, that, as long as there is a Popish Successor, there will not be a Popish Interest, and that by his assistance it shall not be strong enough to contest with the Protestant Interest? Or rather, have we not seen it for many years already? And how can it be otherways, as long as no office, small or great, is disposed of without his approbation; no, not so much as preferment in our Protestant Church? And I think, unless you can destroy that in which the interest centers, you will never destroy the interest itself.—Sir, I have no ill-will for the duke's person, but rather a great veneration, as he is descending from our past, and as brother to our present king. But I think it ought not to stand in competition with my duty to my king and country, which can never be safe as long as this interest is so predominate. And I think there is no other way to suppress it, but by going to the roots first: and therefore I agree in the motion that hath been made, for appointing a committee to bring in a Bill to disinherit James duke of York.

Mr. Garroway. Sir, I agree with those worthy members, that have spoke to this present business, that Popery hath for a long time had a great influence in the management of our affairs; and that the Protestant religion and government of the nation is much in danger thereby. But I hope that the prudence of this house may find out some expedient to secure the nation, more likely to be brought to perfection, than this of the Exclusion Bill. We all know that his maj. in his speech at the opening of the session, and formerly, hath declared, that he will consent to any thing you shall offer for the security of the Protestant religion; provided it consist with preserving the Succession in the due legal course of descent. As his maj. is gracious to us, so I know we are all willing to carry ourselves with all respect and duty to him; he offers you to consent to all other ways you can propose, but seems resolved not to consent to this way you are now upon. For my part, sir, I am more afraid of an army without a general, than of a general without an army; and therefore I think, that if, instead of ordering a committee to bring in a Bill for disinheriting of the duke, you bring in a Bill for banishing all the Papists out of the nation, and other bills for the having of frequent parliaments, and to secure good judges and justices, that so the laws you have already, as well as what more you may make, may be duly executed, it may do as well, and be more likely to have good success. And therefore I would humbly move you, that we may try these other ways, and not offer to put this hardship upon his majesty, seeing he hath declared against this Bill, lest, by displeasing his majesty, we should interrupt all other affairs, which at this time may be very unfortunate to this nation, and our neighbours too. The eyes of Christendom are upon the success of this meeting, and the peace, quietness, and honour of the nation much depends thereon; and therefore; if the going on with this Bill should occasion a breach, (which for several reasons I am much afraid of) it may prove one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall us. Sir, moderation in all things will always become this house, but especially in a business of so high a nature. The duke hath not yet been either heard or found guilty, how can we then answer the passing of so severe a sentence? We ought to be very careful in a business of this nature, that we do nothing but what we may be able to answer to the whole world. And therefore sir, I think that seeing his maj. hath declared, that he will not agree with us in this Bill, and other bills may be as effectual; I would humbly move you to think of some other way, and for that purpose to appoint a day to have it debated in a committee of the whole house.

Sir Henry Capel. I cannot agree with that worthy member that spoke last, and yet I have formerly given some proof that I have been for moderation, and, God willing, shall always be for it, when it may do good. In the two last parliaments I did so argue for moderation, that many of my friends told me, that I had deserted the true interest of my king and country; but as the loyalty which I pretend to derive from my birth, made me slight such surmises, so it shall always preponderate with me in all my actions. Sir, I am of opinion that this is a case, in which there is no room for moderation, if by moderation be meant the making of any other law for the security of our religion, because, according to the best judgment I can make, upon a full consideration of the matter, all other bills that can be desired without this Bill, will not prove effectual; but will leave us in that unhappy condition, of contesting with the influence of a Popish Successor, during the king's life, and the Power of a Popish king hereafter. Of what danger this may be to his majesty's person at present, and the Protestant Religion for the future, I leave to every one to judge. It hath been said, that take away the army, and you need not fear the general; but I say, that a general that hath the power of a king, will never want an army. And our condition is so bad, that I am afraid we shall not be safe, without being free of the general and army too; which I think, sir, as the case stands, we ought in prudence to do, or else I am afraid we shall give but a bad account to our country, of having done any thing to the purpose for the securing of our religion. And therefore I am of opinion you are under a necessity of having this Bill brought in.

Mr. Boscawen. How often I have been for expedients and moderation it is well known. But we are now come to that pass, that we must be either Papists or Protestants, one or other, and I see no expedient in the case. We know, when the Bill of Exclusion was brought in, the last parliament, it was of no long extent, and has the first, second, and third reading, and gentlemen may offer provisos if they please. But why should we go back to a committee after a Report made of the Letters, &c. and the Votes you have passed? Why we should go shorter than in the last parliament, I know not any reason.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Our difference, I find, is by notions only; to the manner, and not the thing. I would not vote one thing one day, and throw it down another. In our Vote the other day, about a Popish Successor, I did understand that the house was unanimous, and did think, that a person of the duke's principles was not fit to come to the crown, to destroy us (and it was the sense of that Vote.) When I speak of this great prince, whom I have a great respect for, and had once a relation to, I do it with great reluctance. I supposed it the true intent of the house, by that Vote, that you would not have a Popish Successor to the crown; and if that was the meaning of it, then your debate will be short, viz. Whether you will order a Bill to be brought in for that purpose, or whether you will go into a Grand Committee to consider of the means of preserving the king's Person and the Protestant Religion. You have made steady motions and gradations for this Bill already, and if your meaning is to debate over again your last Vote, that is irregular. If any man will stand up and say, 'That the Duke is not a Papist,' it will be a great comfort to us all here, and to all England. But the duke's being a Papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the crown, is the occasion of all our misfortunes. It is painful to me when I speak of this great prince, but there are degrees in things, and as my bowels yearn towards him, so they do likewise towards my wife and children. Seeing then that this Vote is already passed, and that the nation is in expectation from us for their security, and that I converse with men of consideration, you have put another kind of consideration into them. Pray do not throw out what you have already voted.

Col. Titus. I observe that the arguments that have been offered against the bringing in of this Bill, are founded on his majesty's Speech, and on a supposition that other bills may be as sufficient for our security, and more easily obtained, seeing his maj. hath so often declared, that he will not consent to the altering the Succession from its legal course of descent. Sir, the king calleth his parliament to give him advice, and they cannot therein be restrained, but may give any advice which they think may be necessary for the security of his person and government. And it hath oftentimes happened, that parliaments before now have many times offered such advice to the kings of this nation, as hath not been grateful to them at first, and yet, after mature deliberation, hath been well-received, and found absolutely necessary. When Clifford, or who else it was, had persuaded his maj. to grant a Toleration in 1672, and to tell the parliament in his Speech then made to them, that he would stand by it, and make it good; yet that house of commons finding it of dangerous consequence, and humbly offering such their Advice to his majesty, he was pleased, notwithstanding the said Speech, to cancel the said Toleration. And if he had not, as we are in a bad case now, so we might have been in a worse then. For aught I know, if that house of commons had been so great courtiers, as not to have concerned themselves in that Toleration, because of his majesty's Speech, the nation might have been ruined by Papists before this. And I think we are now under as great danger, and I hope we shall not be less courageous, nor true-hearted. If a man were sick of a pleurisy, and nothing could save his life but bleeding, would it not be strange if his physician, after having pretended that he is hearty for his cure, should allow him all other remedies but bleeding? Nothing like this can be presumed of his majesty, of whose wisdom and goodness we have had so great experience. And as to the second branch of the supposition, that other laws may secure us as well, I have not heard any arguments offered to make it good, and I must confess I cannot apprehend there can be any. I am sure the experience of former times shews us the contrary. It is plain from them, that Popish princes have not thought themselves bound by any laws against the interest of the Church; and our fore-fathers have found to their sorrow, that the strength of our laws were not sufficient to defend them against Popish tyrannies. For no prince of that religion ever yet thought himself bound to keep faith with Heretics. After queen Mary had seriously pledged her royal word to the Suffolk-men, to allow them their religion, by which they became the greatest instruments of putting the crown on her head; did she not in return put the crown of martyrdom on theirs? All other laws that you can propose in this case, must be grounded on some trust or fidelity that must be reposed in that party, for which no argument can be given, but that they never kept any faith with heretics, and therefore that we may do well to try what they will do. We are advised to be moderate, and I think we ought to be so; but I do not take moderation to be a prudent virtue in all cases that may happen. If I were fighting to save my life, and the lives of my wife and children, should I do it moderately? If I were riding on a road to save my throat from thieves, and I should be advised to ride moderately, lest I spoiled my horse, would not such advice seem strange at such a time? And so certainly would it be, if I were in a ship, (which may well be compared to a Commonwealth,) and it were sinking, would not the advice to pump moderately, for fear of a fever, seem strange? But, sir, I admire, seeing moderation is so much talked of, of late, and so much recommended, why there cannot be other objects found out, on whom to place it, as well as on the Papists. I know not why it should not be as agreeable to Christian charity, and more for the Protestant Interest at this time, because it may tend to union, to place it on the Protestant Dissenters, seeing we agree with most of them in points of faith, and only differ about a few ceremonies. The moderatest and meekest man that ever was, seeing an Egyptian struggling with an Israelite, slew the Egyptian; but at another time seeing an Israelite struggling with an Israelite, it is recorded in Holy Writ, he parted them, saying they were brethren. Of late many are at work to persuade us, that the Church hath no weapons but prayers and tears; this is a notion come up amongst us since the breaking out of the Plot, and, as far as I can observe, is only to hold good against Popery, for against Protestant Dissenters we have always had, and can still find, other weapons.

Mr. H—— made a speech reflecting on the duke and lord Clarendon, for making up the Match for the king, as if they did it because they foresaw that the queen would have no children, and particularly on the duke, for the loss of my lord Sandwich, for clearing of persons taken in the Fire of London, the death of sir Ed. Godfrey, &c.

Mr. Laurence Hyde. 'Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see a matter of so great importance managed in this house with so much bitterness on the one hand, and with so much jesting and mirth on the other; I think it is a serious thing we are about, and that more gravity would very well become, not only this house, but the subject of the debate also. It is to me very unpleasant, to hear a prince, that hath so well deserved of this nation, by fighting our battles, and so often appearing for us in war, so upbraided. I am apt to think he was far from being of opinion, the queen would have no children, and that he scorned any of those other actions that have been laid to his charge; and therefore to hear such things said, is a great provocation. But, being I know where I am, I will lay my hand upon my mouth. But I hope you will pardon me, if, to comply with the obligation of nature, I declare myself much concerned to see the ashes of my dear father thus raked out of the dust, and to hear his memory blasted by an affirmation which cannot be proved: because I am confident he was not guilty. He and his family suffered enough by his misfortunes, occasioned by dark interests and intrigues of state. Many think he was severely chastised while living; I am sorry to see that some others cannot spare him though dead. But, for my comfort, I have heard that he was a good Protestant, a good Chancellor, and that we have had worse ministers of state since. But I will not trouble you farther, but apply myself to the business under debate. I am of opinion, that the bringing in of this Bill will be a great hindrance to the business of the nation, and not attain your end. And also, I am concerned for the justice of the house; for though the duke deserve great mortifications, because he hath given so great a suspicion of his being inclined to that religion, and I believe doth not expect to come down to the crown, on such terms as formerly, but with such limitations as may secure the Protestant religion; yet I think it very hard on this house, to offer at so great a condemnation without hearing the person concerned, or having had any preceding process. For my own part, I make it a great question, whether it would be binding to him, or a great many other loyal persons of this nation; and if not, it may occasion hereafter a civil war. And without any just fear, or cause; for the king may very well out-live the duke, and then all that we are about would be unnecessary; and why should we, to prevent that which may never happen, attempt to do that which we can never answer, either to our king or country? I cannot apprehend that our case is so desperate, but that we may secure ourselves some other way, without overturning foundations. I cannot fear a general without an army. By adding ourselves of all other Papists, we may be safe, making such other laws to bind the duke, as may be necessary, by the name of James duke of York; which, and the small revenues which belong to the crown, without the assistance of parliaments, with such other laws as may be contrived, I humbly conceive may be sufficient for our security; and therefore it ought to be considered in a committee of the whole house, that such as are for these expedients, may have more freedom of debate.

Col. Titus. I must beg your leave to speak gain, being reflected on. I can assure you, sir, that what I have said upon this subject, is so far from proceeding from a merry, jolly humour, that it is rather from as great sorrow as ever my heart endured; being very sensible of the dangers we have undergone, and what miseries we may hereafter suffer, by means of the duke's being of this religion. I hope, sir, that offences that proceed from natural infirmities, will always find a favourable construction in this house. If that hon. member had but considered, that all men have not that good fortune to be born, with such a grave, majestic, sober aspect as that (let them say what they will, it looks serious and weighty) he would not have been offended at my discourse; but, sir, on the satisfaction of the house, that I am not a jest in this business, I do declare, that I should be very sorry to be thus jested with myself.

Sir J. Jenkins. Sir, the question that arises from this debate is, whether we had best proceed by an extremity, or by expedients. For I look on this Bill to be of the highest nature that ever was proposed in the house of commons, and the greatest extremity imaginable, which I humbly conceive we ought not to proceed to, until we have made some trial of expedients, which will be very useful. For it will give a great satisfaction, not only to his majesty, but to all other persons in general that are against this Bill, by which the world will see that we were very cautious, how we offered at such an extremity, and that we did not do it, until we had found all other ways and means whatsoever insufficient. I must confess, sir, I think such a Bill would be against law and conscience, and that nothing less than an army will be necessary to support it; and therefore I humbly move you, that we may debate this business in a committee.

Col. Birch. I admire to hear that hon. member make a doubt as to the legality of this Bill; certainly, sir, our legislative power is unbounded, and we may offer to the lords, and so to his majesty, what Bills we think good. And it can as little be doubted, that the legislative power of the nation, King, Lords, and Commons, should want a law to make laws; or that any laws should be against what laws they make; otherways they cannot be legally opposed. And as I think it cannot be against law, so neither against conscience, unless it could be made out, that we ought in conscience to bring in Popery. I should be very glad to hear any arguments to make good what hath been offered about expedients; but I am afraid, when they come to be examined to the bottom, they will be found very insufficient, and that we may as well think of catching a lion with a mouse-trap, as to secure ourselves against Popery by any laws without the Exclusion Bill. Have we not to do with a sort of people, that cannot be bound by any law or contract whatsoever? Much less can their words or promises be depended on. Are they not under all the obligations that can be offered, from the temptations of this life, as of that to come, not to keep faith with Heretics, but to break it when it may tend to the promoting of the Catholic cause? And if laws cannot bind other persons, much less will it princes that are of the Catholic religion? Did they ever keep any league or contract that was made with Protestants, longer than was necessary, in order to cut their throats? What use did the Papists make in Ireland of the favours granted them by king Ch. i.? Did they not make use of it to the destruction of the Protestants, by rising up in rebellious, and massacring 100,000? Sir, I see things go hard against Popery, I know not what to say to it, but I am afraid that if we should be so infatuated, as to let it creep on more and more upon us, and at last let it ascend the throne again, that we shall soon have the same miserable fortune our fore-fathers had in queen Mary's days, and be burnt in Smithfield for our indiscretion. Sir, we are upon a business of as great importance as ever was debated within these walls; for either we must suppress Popery, or be suppressed by it. For although that interest do not look so big as that of the Protestants, yet I plainly see, that it hath wrought like a mole under ground for a long time, and that it hath eaten into our bowels, and will soon come to the vital parts of the Protestant religion, and destroy it too, if great care be not taken, and that speedily. I hear some say, that our cares are needless at this time, because the king may outlive the duke; which is as much as to say, there is no need of laws against Popery, until we see whether we shall have occasion to make use of them, or no. But they do not tell us how we should be sure then to obtain them. I must confess such arguments are so far from weighing with me, as that they increase my fears, because it discovers a strange, easy, careless, indifferent humour among us Protestants. Must our lives, liberties, and religion depend upon 'may-be's?' I hope it is not come to that yet: I am sure it will not consist with the prudence of this assembly to leave it so, but rather to endeavour to settle this matter upon such a foundation, as may (with as much probability as human things are capable of) secure us. I am of opinion, that such an engine may be contrived, as should give such a whirle to the popish interest, as that it should never rise up against us again; I know of no difficulty but the same which happened to Archimedes, where to fix it. And I am not altogether at a loss for that neither; for so long as we have a good king, I will not despair. And, sir, I cannot fear any of those things that are objected against this Bill, that it is against law, and therefore will occasion a civil war: for my part I never will fear a civil war in favour of idolatry, especially when we have gotten a law on our side to defend our religion. Therefore I move you that the Bill may be brought in.

Sir Rob. Markham. If you intend to exclude the duke, I desire you will take the prince of Orange's children into consideration.

Mr. Bennet. Could any expedient be found out to preserve the protestant religion, I should be glad not to exclude the duke. In the last parliament, no expedient could be found out; and one reason for this Bill was the preservation of the king's life. The duke being looked upon as heir apparent to the crown, the king's life is still in danger; the papists, I believe, would still knock him on the head. This Bill will put it in our power to defend ourselves; and when the duke is once out, by law, from the Succession, no doubt but the parliament hereafter will keep him out. The taking away the general will leave the army alone. When a catholic king has places to bestow, and power, he will have temptation enough for ransacking the city of London to maintain an Army. And we sit patiently here for an expedient! Therefore I move for the Bill as before.

Sir Tho. Player. Sir, I have read in Scripture of one man dying for a nation, but never of three nations dying for one man; which is like to be our case. There hath been already so much said on this matter, and the reasons that have been given for bringing in of the Bill are so plain, that I should not have troubled you to have said any thing about it, but that I knew not how to have answered it to that great city (London) for which I serve, not to have appeared in this business, in which the protestant religion is so much concerned. But, sir, being I am up, I will beg leave to acquaint you, that I have been lately in company with a great many persons, where I have heard the duke cried up, and the king so slighted, that I must confess they made me afraid, they had thoughts of acting over here what was lately done in Portugal. Believe it, sir, many are very industrious to make an interest for the duke; if we should not use our endeavours to keep up the king's interest, and that of the protestant religion, I am afraid they will be encouraged to embroil us in blood before we are aware of it. I have no patience to think of sitting still, while my throat is cutting; and therefore I pray, sir, let us endeavour to have laws that may enable us to defend ourselves. And I know not how we can have any that are like to prove effectual, without this for excluding James duke of York; and therefore I humbly move it may be brought in.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. This is a business of great weight, and I desire the house may go into a grand committee. I am of opinion, that now we must free ourselves from popery, or submit to it. I wonder that expedients are now called for, when a man cannot do that in the house (where he can speak but once to a thing) which he may do at a grand committee. To extirpate the duke, and at the same time not to declare his Successor, will be strange, and you will make the thing perplexed. It is not orderly to proceed in the house. A grand committee will put you in a way to prepare Heads to draw up a Bill upon, which will be better digested there than can be in the house, without those restrictions and limitations. This you are upon, is no less than taking away a right, and you are told, 'It may endanger a Civil War, by putting the duke from his Succession to the crown of England;' which nevertheless cannot exclude him Scotland. And I should be glad to have the Borders secured, for my own concern, for I live near them.

Mr. Edw. Seymour. Sir, I have by many years experience observed, that it is very agreeable to the custom, prudence, and justice of this house, to debate all things very well before a question is put, but especially of great importance. It hath formerly been thought a great thing, and hard to be borne by some princes, that any thing relating to the prerogative of the crown should be debated any where but in the privy council; and I have observed, that former parliaments have done it with a great deal of tenderness. And if so, well may a Bill that tends to the alteration of the Succession sion, pretend to the right of having a full and fair debate, which I hope this solemn assembly will not deny; many being to take their resolutions from it in as great a point as ever was debated in a house of commons, for which we shall be answerable to our own consciences, as well as to our king and country. It is these great considerations make me trouble you at this time, otherwise I might haply have been silent, because I am one of those that have been shot at by wind-guns, which have prejudiced my reputation; and therefore, until I should have had an opportunity to vindicate myself, and to shew that I am an enemy both to popery and arbitrary government, I was more inclined to have been silent, and should not have troubled you, if the nature of this business had not laid on me a more than ordinary compulsion. I do not doubt but every one that sits here is willing to take notice of what arguments may be offered pro and con, it being the only way to pass a right judgment in this matter, which is very necessary, because what resolution you may take upon this debate, will be examined not only within his majesty's dominions, but by most princes and politicians in Europe. And therefore that you ground your resolution on such solid reason, that may endure the Test of a plenary examination, will be very necessary for the securing the credit of this house, of which I know you are very tender.—Sir, I must confess I am very much against the bringing in of this Bill; for I think it a very unfortunate thing, that, whereas his majesty hath prohibited but one thing only, we should so soon fall upon it. I do not see there is any cause, why we should fear popery so much, as to make us run into such an extreme. We are assured there can be no danger during his majesty's life; so, upon an impartial examination, we shall find there can be no great reason to fear it after his death, though the duke should outlive and succeed him, and be of that religion. Have we not had great experience of his love for this nation? Hath he not always quared his actions by the exactest rules of justice and moderation? Is there not a possibility of being of the church, and not of the court of Rome? Hath he not bred up his children in the protestant religion; and shewed a great respect for all persons of that profession? Would it not be a dangerous thing for him (I mean in point of interest) to offer at any such alteration of the religion established by law? Can any man imagine that it can be attempted, without great hazard of utterly destroying both himself and his family? And can so indiscreet an attempt be expected from a prince, so bounding in prudence and wisdom? But though we should resolve to have no moderation in our proceedings against papists, yet I hope we shall have some for ourselves. It cannot be imagined, that such a law will bind ill here in England, or any in Scotland; and it is disputed whether it will be binding in Ireland: so that in all probability it will not only divide us amongst ourselves, but the three kingdoms one from the other, and occasion a miserable civil war. For it cannot be imagined, that the duke will submit to it. And to disinherit him for his religion, is not only to act according to the popish principles, but to give cause for a war with all the catholic princes in Europe; and that must occasion a standing Army, from whom there will be more danger of popery and arbitrary government, than from a Popish Successor, or a popish king. Sir, it is very agreeable to the weight of the matter, and the usual proceedings of this house, that this business should be fully debated; and therefore I humbly move you it may be in a committee.

Sir Rd. Graham made a long discourse, shewing the dangers and miseries of a civil war, by a large account of those between York and Lancaster: That this Bill, if it should pass, would lay a foundation for such another: That it would not be binding either to Scotland or Ireland, and so consequently occasion a division between the three kingdoms, which had formerly been the occasion of wars and miseries, as well as our own divisions amongst ourselves. He then gave an historical account, to make out how fatal divisions had proved to other nations, and instanced in Theodosius, and others. That he thought it absolutely necessary, (if this Bill must be brought in,) to prevent a civil war, that the Successor should be named; which would need a great deal of consideration; and if to debate business of smaller importance, it is usual for the house to resolve itself into a committee, how could it be answered, that it should not be done in a business of so great importance, that so expedients might be offered and debated, with more freedom and satisfaction than it was possible they could be in the house.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. Sir, I am of opinion, that expedients in politics are like mountebank-tricks in physic; as the one does seldom good to bodies natural, so not the other to bodies politic. Government is a weighty thing, and cannot be supported nor preserved but by such pillars as have neither flaws nor cracks, and placed on a sure foundation. And I am afraid, that all expedients will be found to have far different qualifications. I cannot foresee how the excluding of one person, who hath a right to the Succession depending upon contingencies upon such an account as this, should occasion a civil war; but rather do think there is a great deal more danger, not only of a civil war, but of our religion and liberty too, if we should not do it, and so have a popish king. For I do believe, that such a king would soon have a popish council. For if there be 11 to 1 now for the interest of a Popish Successor, what may you not expect when you have a popish king? And should you not then soon have popish judges, justices, deputy-lieutenants, commanders at sea and land; nay, and popish bishops too. For if there be none put into those places now, that are for acting against a Popish Successor, well may we expect that none shall be put in then, but what are for a popish king. And therefore I am astonished to hear any man, that pretends to be a Protestant, argue, that in such a case we need not fear Popery; for it is indeed to argue for Popery, and must proceed from an opinion that the Protestant Interest is very low, and not able to bear up any longer against popery, or else that Protestants are credulous and inconsiderate, and may be brought to destroy themselves with their own hands. Must our religion and liberty have no security but what depends on the virtues and goodness of a prince, who will be in subjection to the Pope, and probably influenced by none but jesuits and such creatures? Will it seem strange that such a prince should compose his privy council of persons inclined to that religion; or that he should employ none others as judges, justices, sheriffs, or commanders in any place of trust either at land or sea? And can we think that by the many endeavours which will be used, that the common people will not be debauched, and either be misled, or made indifferent, in a little while? Is it not in the power of the king to nominate his counsellors, judges, sheriffs, commanders at sea and land? And can it be imagined, that he will not take care to nominate such as shall be for his turn? Certainly, sir, no man can imagine that the Protestant religion can long be preserved under such a king, but such as cannot or will not see at a distance, what a change such a scheme of government would soon produce, and how likely it is that it will be set up and practised, if ever we should have a Popish king. And as I do think that our religion never can be secured without this Bill, so I do not fear that it will occasion any civil war, or any division between this kingdom, Scotland or Ireland; but rather, I believe it will be a means to reconcile the Protestant interest, and to settle the government upon such a bottom as will prove invincible. In Scotland the major part of the people hate Popery as well as we, and so do the Protestants in Ireland; and therefore certainly it will be their interests to join with us against a common enemy, and not to divide. And whereas it hath been suggested, that this Bill will engage us in a war against all Catholic princes, I look upon it as a bugbear, and do believe that we shall gain many friends by being settled, as we may by having this Bill; because then we may be formidable to our enemies, and serviceable to our allies; but never without it. And, sir, this is not to disinherit a man for his religion, but because he hath rendered himself incapable to govern us, according to our laws, which, whether it proceed from his religion, or any thing else, is all one to us. His being incapable, is the ground for our proceedings, having no other way to preserve ourselves. Upon the whole matter, I do conclude, that a Popish king and a Protestant religion are irreconcilable, and have no reason to fear a civil war, so long as we have a law for our defence, and a Protestant king to head us; which we cannot expect without passing some such Bill as this under debate.

Mr. Daniel Finch. Sir, the business you are debating is of so high a nature, that I cannot tell how to speak to it, without fear and trembling. To go about to alter the Succession of the crown, must be of great concernment to all Englishmen, and therefore ought to be considered with a great deal of deliberation, for which the justice, prudence and usage of this house calls aloud, there never having been any business debated in this house, in which so much care was required. Sir, I am unsatisfied with myself, how we can in justice pass any such Bill as is proposed; for I never heard of any law, which made an opinion in religion a cause to be dispossessed of right: in former times it was not so, though there were princes and emperors that were apostates. And queen Elizabeth would not allow of putting any such thing in practice, but rather chose to proceed against Mary queen of Scots, according to the settled laws of the nation. This nation hath been so unfortunate as to cut off one king already, let us have a care how we cut off the right of another. There is a possibility that the duke may return to the Protestant religion, let us not exclude him from such temptations as may be convenient to reduce him. But, whatever should be your resolution at last, I humbly conceive there can be no reason given, why a business of this weight should not be debated in a committee, before you vote the bringing in of the Bill, that so the validity of such other expedients as may be proposed, may be examined, and the reasons for and against this Bill be digested as they ought to be. How shall we otherwise answer it to his majesty, who hath offered you every thing but this? If there were a motion made for a Bill to give Money, would it not probably be debated in a committee? By this bill we are going to give away the right of a crown, which I take to be more than Money; and therefore, I humbly move you that it may be farther debated in a committee.

Mr. Hugh Boscawen. Mr. Speaker, Have not the Papists always proceeded against the Protestants with a barbarity surmounting the worst of heathens? And must we be so mighty careful how we proceed to hinder them from ruling over us, as that we must stumble at every straw, and be afraid of every bush? A man that is in an house that is on fire, will leap out at a window, rather than be burnt. I do admire how any person, that doth know with what treachery and inhumanity the Papists behaved themselves in the massacres of Piedmont, Paris, and Ireland; their cruelties in queen Mary's days, lately on sir E. Godfrey, and what they had designed against the king, and all of us, can offer any thing to delay, much more to hinder what is so precisely necessary for the good of the king and kingdom; especially seeing in this we shall do nothing, but what may be justified by many laws and precedents. And if there were none, of which I know there are a great many that are liable to no objection; yet I take it, that the law of nature and self-preservation would afford us sufficient arguments. I think the sun is not more visible at noon-day, than that the Papists have a design to extirpate our religion; and that they have done great things in order thereto, even now while we live under the government of a Protestant king, by some invisible power that hath strangely acted its part in favour of that interest, in all our councils and resolutions in affairs of greatest importance; and it is as plain that this is so, because there is a Popish successor; and that their interest will never decline as long as there is such a successor, and the hope of a Popish king. And now, that by the watchful providence of God, these things have been made so plain to us; is it not strange, that any man should go about to persuade us to be so neglectful and inconsiderate, as to sit still and look on, while the Papists are putting their chains about our arms, and ropes about our necks? Which must be the consequence of permitting a Popish king to ascend the throne; against which there can be no law to secure us but this. In Edw. vi. th's and queen Mary's, and Elizabeth's days, was not the religion of the prince the religion of the nation? Did not most of the privy counsellors, and great ministers of state, and some bishops too, change with the times? Is it not customary for great men to insinuate and flatter their princes, by being of their religion? On what must we ground our hopes of security, in such a case? On nothing, sir, but on a civil war, which such a prince must certainly occasion. But I do not fear it from this Bill, but rather think it the only way to prevent it; not doubting but that there will be people enough that will give obedience to it, sufficient to execute the law on such as may be refractory, if any, which can only be Papists, and such as may be Popishly affected; the objections as to a civil war, and disobedience to this law, may as well be made against any other severe law that we may attempt to make against Papists: and must we therefore let them all alone? I hope we shall not be so inconsiderate; but as we have discovered that their weapons are near our throats, so we shall not acquiesce in any thing less than what may secure us; that so, if possible, we may not fall into the hands of such a bloody, merciless people; which must infallibly be the consequence of having a Popish king.

Mr. John Trenchard. Mr. Speaker, have not popish kings, as well in other countries as here, always brought in a popish religion? and have we any reason to suppose the like will not happen here, if ever we should have a king of that religion? Have we not undeniable proof, that the great thing designed, by endeavouring at a popish king, is the rooting heresy out of these three nations? And are not France and France engaged to give their assistance therein, as well as the great parties at home, not only of professed papists, but of some who profess themselves protestants, but are so but in masquerade? And do they not say, that they have so clenched and riveted their interest, as that God nor man cannot prevent their accomplishing their design? And shall we be so indiscreet, as to let it creep on thus upon us, and not endeavour to remedy ourselves? Let it never be said of this house of commons, that they were so stupidified or negligent of their duty to their country, or so indifferent in their religion, or preservation of their liberties, as to forget so great a concern. If, when we have done what we can, we should be conquered by force, or deceived by such little arts and tricks as may be used, a patient submission to God's providence must follow. But to be the occasion of our own destruction, by being supine and inconsiderate, will never be answered to posterity.

Resolved, "That a Bill be brought in, to disable the duke of York to inherit the imperial Crown of the Realm."

Nov. 4. The said Bill was read the first time.

Sir Leoline Jenkins.* I have spent much of my time in studying the laws of this land; and I pretend to know something of the laws of foreign countries: and, I have upon this occasion well-considered of them; but cannot find how we can justify the passing of this Bill, rather much against it. 1. I think it is contrary to natural justice, that we should proceed to condemnation, not only before conviction, but before we have heard the party, or examined any witnesses about him; I am sure, none in his defence. And to do this, by making a new law on purpose, when you have old laws in being, that have appointed a punishment to his crime, I humbly conceive, is very severe; and contrary to the usual proceedings of this house, and the birthright of every Englishman. 2. I think it is contrary to the principles of our religion, that we should dispossess a man of his right, because he differs in point of faith. For it is not agreed by all; that dominion is founded in grace. For my part, I think there is more of popery in this Bill, than there can possibly be in the nation without it; for none but papists, and Fifth-monarchy-men, did ever go about to disinherit men for their religion. 3. I am of opinion, that the kings of England have their right from God alone; and that no power on earth can deprive them of it. And I hope this house will not attempt to do any thing, which is so precisely contrary, not only to the law of

* "Jenkins, now made Secretary of State in Coventry's place, was the chief manager for the court. He was suspected of leaning to popery, though very unjustly; but he was set on every pinculo of the Church of England to superstition, and was a great assertor of the Divine Right of monarchy, and was for carrying the Prerogative high. All his speeches and arguments against the Exclusion were heard with indignation." Burnet.

God, but the law of the land too. For if this Bill should pass, it would change the essence of the monarchy, and make the crown elective. For, by the same reason that this parliament may disinherit this prince, for his religion, other parliaments may disinherit another, upon some other pretence which they may suggest; and so consequently, by such exclusions, elect whom they please. 4. It is against the oath of allegiance, taken in its own sense, without jesuitical evasions. For by binding all persons to the king, his heirs and successors, the duke, a presumptive heir, must be understood. And I am of opinion, it cannot be dispensed withal. Sir, I will be very cautious how I dispute the power of parliaments, I know the legislative power is very great, and it ought to be so. But yet I am of opinion, that parliaments cannot disinherit the heir of the crown; and that if such an Act should pass, it would be invalid in itself. And therefore I hope it will not seem strange, that I should offer my judgment against this Bill, while it is in debate; in which I think I do that which is my duty, as a member of this house. Henry iv. th of France was a protestant, his people most Papists, who used some endeavours to prevent his coming to the crown; but when they found they were not like to perfect their design, without occasioning a civil war, they desisted; concluding, that a civil war would probably bring on them more misery than a king of a different religion, and therefore submitted. Sir, I hope, we shall not permit our passion to guide us instead of reason; and therefore I humbly move you to throw out the Bill.

Mr. Ralph Montagu. Sir, the hon. member may understand very much of the laws of other countries, and foreign affairs; but I am apt to think, not much of the laws of this nation; or else he would not argue, that this is a popish Bill, when it is the only thing that can save his king, the kingdom, and the Protestant Religion; which I hope will never come to that extremity, as to need any thing that is popish to save it. For my part, I am so far from thinking that this Bill is so unreasonable as hath been argued, that I think this house of commons will get as much credit by passing of this Bill, as that in 1660 did, by passing that which brought home the king. For as the one restored him; so the other may preserve him, and nothing less.

Mr. John Hampden. Sir, I do not understand how it can be construed, because we go about to disinherit the duke, that therefore it trust be for his religion. For my part, I do approve of the Bill; but it is because the opinions and principles of the Papists tend to the alteration of the government and religion of this nation: and the introducing, instead thereof, of superstition and idolatry, and a foreign, arbitrary power: If it were not for that, I am apt to think, the duke's being a Papist would not be thought a sufficient cause for this house to spend time about this Bill. And I cannot see the danger of reducing the government to be elective by it; for why should we presume that any thing but the like cause should have the like effect? Though the Succession of the crown hath been formerly often changed by acts of parliament, yet hitherto it hath not made the crown elective; and why must we fear it now? Neither can I apprehend, that the passing of this Bill is contrary to natural justice: because we have not heard what the duke hath to say for himself. The precedents that might be offered to make out, that the parliaments have, when they thought good, condemned persons by bill, are numerous, and without any hearing too. But if there were none, to doubt the power of the legislative authority of the nation in that or any other case, is to suppose such a weakness in our government, so inconsistent with the prudence of our ancestors, and common reason, as cannot well be imagined. And I do not think we are about going to do any such strange thing neither, but what would be done in other countries upon the like occasion; but do believe, that if the dauphin of France, or the infant of Spain, were Protestants, and had, for nearly twenty years, together endeavoured the setting up of another interest and religion, contrary to the interest of those kings and the catholic religion; especially if such endeavours had been accompanied with such success as here, and those nations had been so often, by such means, reduced so near to ruin, as we have been, by divisions, tolerations, burnings, plots, and sham-plots at home, and by wars and foreign alliances, over-ruled in their favour abroad; but that they would have been more impatient than we have been for this remedy. And for my own part, I cannot but admire more at the long delay there hath been, in seeking out a remedy against this great evil, than at our offering at this Bill. For notwithstanding what hath been said, I cannot think our danger so remote or uncertain, as some would suppose it. Can the king be safe, as long as the Papists know that there is nothing but his life stands in their way, of having a king to their mind? Which is the only thing they want, to go on with their designs and to accomplish their expectations. Will it then be an easy thing to withstand such an enraged, barbarous people? The more false and unreasonable their religion is, the more cruelty will be necessary to establish it. Can it be imagined we shall not pay severely, for having shed so much blood of their martyrs, as they call them, and for having enjoyed their Holy-church-land so long? Or that they will not do all that they shall think necessary, to secure an entire and quiet possession to themselves? For my own part, I cannot imagine that the pride of these Church-men will be satisfied with any thing less, than an utter ruin and extirpation of us and our posterities. And I think that nothing can save us but this Exclusion Bill.

Resolved, "That the said Bill be read a 2d time on the 6th inst."

Nov. 6. The Bill was read a 2d time.

Sir Rd. Temple made several objections against the tenor of the Bill, as not answering the intention of the house; shewing how (if not altered) it would occasion an inter-regnum; and that the Clause for limiting the Exclusion to the person of the duke only, was not well drawn.

Sir Leoline Jenkins. In my humble opinion, the body and whole tenor of this Bill carries with it a great reflection on the whole English nation. For to suppose that one person is able to turn us about to Popery, is to suppose that we are either very imprudent, or irresolute, or that we have no great love to, but are rather very indifferent in our religion. And if we may thus disinherit the presumptive heir, not only the royal family, but the whole nation, will be subject, by such a precedent, to many inconveniencies. For by the same reasons the like may be done hereafter upon any other pretence. For, sir, though we know that this house is composed of persons that have a great veneration for the royal family; yet we know not what may happen hereafter: but, if some such Bill as this must pass, I humbly conceive there is a great necessity of naming a Successor, and not leave that in dispute, lest an inter-regnum, or civil war, happen thereupon.

Mr. Henry Booth.* I wish I could have been silent, and I wish there had not been an occasion for this day's debate: but since we are brought into this condition, it behoves every man to put it to his shoulders to support this tottering nation: and in this matter that is now before us, we ought to consider very well, for a great deal depends upon it, and therefore I hope that every gentleman will speak and vote as God shall put it into his heart, without any prejudice or prepossession. A Bill to exclude all Papists from the crown will produce a great many inconveniencies on both hands, because his r. h. being a Papist, it will set him aside: therefore we are to consider which is the lesser evil, and to chuse that. If the duke be excluded, you are told how unjust it is to take away his right from him: that the crown is his inheritance if he survive the king, and besides you provoke him and all the Papists in England to rise and cut our throats.—On the other hand, it is in plain, that when we shall have a Popish king, our religion and laws are not secure one moment, but are in continual danger. So that the case in short is this: Whether we shall sit still and put it to the venture of having a Popish Successor, then we must either submit our heads to the block, or fight and be rebels: or else to have a law that will justify us in the defending our religion and laws: in plain English, whether we would fight for or against the law. I think I have put it right; and now let every man make his choice, that loves either his God or his country.—As to the duke's right to the crown, I wish it were clearly known what sort of right it is he claims, and whence he derives it: he is not heir apparent, neither do I think that our law knows any such thing as an heir to the crown, but only as a Successor: and therefore the duke, nor any other whatever, can pretend the same title to the crown, as the son of a subject can to his father's estate after his decease; for with subjects they do not succeed but inherit. It is not so as to the crown, for there they succeed: and it is from a not rightly considering the word Heir, as it is a synonymous term with that of Successor, that has made so many to be deceived in the duke's title to the crown: for this word Heir to the Crown was not heard of till arbitrary power began to put forth. Before Wm. the Conqueror's time it would have been a senseless word, when the people set up and pulled down as they saw cause: and till queen Eliz. it was not much in fashion, when the crown was so frequently settled by act of parliament, and the next of blood so often set aside; when the son seldom followed his father into the throne, but either by election in the life-time of his father, or else by act of parliament. So that to make the duke either heir apparent or presumptive to the crown, it must be proved either by the constitution of the government, or by some law or act of parliament. If therefore he has a title to the crown, it is necessary to know what it is, and whence he has it; but if he has none, it is not unjust to pass the Bill, or any other where he shall be particularly named: but I will say no more of this, lest I may seem to be against kingly government, which I am not.—If the duke be excluded because he is a Papist, yet it is no justice: why will he be of that religion that the law endeavours to suppress? The subjects who are of that religion forfeit two parts in three of their estates, and shall any subject by reason of his quality be exempted from the law? I hope not; besides, if a subject forfeit two parts, it is reasonable that the next of blood, or any that is of that religion, should be excluded from the crown: because the law has prohibited all Papists from having any Office civil or military, because their principles are inconsistent with the government; and then how preposterous would it be to make him the Head of the Church, and the Preserver of our Laws and Liberties, whose Religion obliges him to ruin and destroy both? So that if the duke had not by his practices given us just causes to except against him, yet barely as he is a Papist he ought to be excluded: but when it is considered that he has held a correspondence with the Pope and the French king, to subvert our religion and laws, what protection can we expect from him if he be king? It is a senseless thing to imagine, that he will not disturb us in our religion and laws, seeing whilst he is a subject he is practising to destroy us and them: therefore for my part, I think we betray both our religion and laws if we do not pass this Bill.—There is one opinion which prevails much in the world, which as it is false, so it does a great deal of hurt, and that is this; that every government in the world was constituted by God himself: but that cannot be so; for it would follow, that God is unjust, which he cannot be. There neither is nor was any government of that sort but only that of the Jews; the rest of the world were left to themselves, to frame such a government as suited best their inclinations, and to make such rules and laws as they could best obey and be governed by.—Ours is compounded of an absolute Monarchy and a Commonwealth, and the original of it we have from the Saxons: but be it what it will, or whence it will, it is without question that the first original of our kings was, that the people found it for their advantage to set one over them, because of his wisdom, valour, and justice, and therefore they gave him several prerogatives above the rest of the people, that he might be the better able to govern and defend them: for there is none of the king's prerogatives, but are for the good of the nation if rightly employed. But it will be a strange conclusion to suppose, that the people obliged themselves to submit to the posterity of that man whom they first chose for their king because of his extraordinary endowments, let them be what they would, and never so unfit for the government: for the next of blood may be incapable of governing in several respects; suppose a fool or lunatic; by his principles, if he aim at arbitrary power; by his religion, if he be a Papist or a Heathen; or by his practices, before he comes to the crown, to destroy the religion and government by law established.—Now this I do not say, to argue that the election of the king is in the people, though, I think, much might be said in that case, neither is it now the question; but that which I speak for is, to prove that the next of blood has not so absolute an inherent right to the crown, but that he may for the good of the nation be set aside.—There is yet another inconvenience to allow the next of blood to have so absolute a right to the crown, because the possession of the crown takes away all disabilities, but only such as are by act of parliament; which being so, every king must thank his successor for every moment that he lives; if he kill him himself, he cannot be questioned for it, because as soon as the one is dead the other is king, for here the king never dies.—If therefore the next of blood has so absolute a right, the king is very unsafe: for though the duke be not inclined to shorten his brother's days, nay though he be averse to it, yet in obedience to the Pope and his Priests, it must be done either by himself or some other hand, and then how long may we expect his majesty's life?—If kings were good men, an absolute monarchy were the best government; but we see that they are subject to the same infirmities with other men, and therefore it is necessary to bound their power: and by reason that they are flesh and blood, and the nation is so apt to be bad by their example, I believe was that wherefore God was averse to let the Jews have a king; till they had kings, they never revolted so wholly from him: when their kings were good, they were obedient to him; but when they were idolatrous, then the people went mad of idols. I hope it is no regis ad exemplum that makes our nation so lewd and wicked at this day.

Sir Henry Ford. The king told us, in his Speech, 'That the eyes of all Europe were upon us.' This Bill is a thing of the greatest consequence. If you make a law, who shall not succeed to the crown, the regular way is next to declare who shall. I shall never think that dominion is founded in grace, or nature, but from a power ordained you know by whom: 'by me kings reign.' They say, no man is born with a crown on his head, or a saddle on his back. The end of this Bill is great, and I hope you will come to it by lawful means. I am as fond, as any man, of the Protestant religion; but I offer to your consideration, how far the legality of this Bill will be.

Sir Wm. Hickman. Here is nothing in the Bill that the crown may devolve to the next successor. Suppose that two Protestants lay claim to the crown; if they divide, they may let in Popery at the end of it. Princes often leave those things doubtful, but parliaments should leave them plain. I would have it left to the next right heir in succession.

Sir Nick. Carew. I would add a Clause to the Bill, to exclude all other Popish Successors.

Sir Tho. Lee. Perhaps there may rise a difficulty, who is a Popish Successor? Who must judge that?

Mr. Harbord. I have a great mind that this Bill should pass, and I approve of gentlemen's zeal for future security. I would have it provided in the Bill, 'That no king shall marry a Popish queen,' if we be so happy that this Bill should pass. It is from thence all our miseries come. I have been told, that we owe our misfortunes, of the duke's being perverted, to his mother; from her we derive that wound. If this Bill should exclude the duke's children from the crown, that are Protestant, I am against it; it is unjust.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Nothing is more natural, than in this Bill to declare a Successor. When you take off this prince from the succession, the danger is great, and much more without this clause of declaring who is to be the successor.

Col. Birch. Consider what we are doing: not only securing the Protestant Religion, but the king's life, and, I hope, long life; and till this Bill pass, it is the interest of every Papist to do, what I hope God will never permit. I remember the answer queen Eliz. gave the parliament, when they pressed her to declare her Successor; * a thing I would by no means have done at this time.

Mr. Daniel Finch. The excluding the duke will not give a right to the next heir, to take possession of the crown while the duke is living; and therefore unless you name a successor, it will either prove ineffectual, or cause a great disturbance in the nation, by an interregnum. And, sir, as this part of the Bill is too weak, so the other is too strong: for, as it is now penned, it may probably exclude all the duke's children, at leastwise leave it so, as that it may prove a great question, which I suppose you do not intend.

* Viz. "That the naming her Successor, would be digging a grave for her."

Col. Titus. Sir, I do not see how you can name a Successor, unless you can in the same act prohibit the queen from having of children, the king from marrying again, the duke from having sons, which would not be more preposterous, than the many provisos which otherwise the act would require, to secure such issue their right; which would probably make the remedy worse than the disease. And I think, sir, that in a case of this importance, you will be careful how you make laws, that shall be liable to so many difficulties and disputes. And therefore you had better rely on the old laws you have, than make new ones to perplex the case. And I do not see how the excluding of the duke only can any way infect the right which his children may have to the succession. And therefore I think there is no need of naming a Successor.

Sir Robert Howard. Sir, I tremble to hear so much discourse about the king's death, and naming him a successor; certainly the like was never known in any former age, but rather it has looked on as so dangerous a thing to be discoursed of, as that none durst attempt it, whatever the occasion were. Queen Eliz. concluded, that the naming a Successor to the crown, would be digging a grave for her; and therefore I hope we shall never go so far as to put it into an act. I am for shewing a great respect for the duke, and his children; but I think we are first bound in duty to the king; and therefore ought first to shew our respects to him. Some persons, in my poor opinion, have shewed so much zeal for the duke's interest, that I am afraid they have forgot their allegiance to the king. Can he ever be safe, as long as it is the interest of every Papist in England to kill him? Which it will be, as long as there is hopes of a Papist to succeed to the throne.

Resolved, "That the Bill be committed to a committee of the whole house: That it be an instruction to the said Committee, that the Exclusion in the said Bill do extend to the person of James duke of York only: That this house do resolve into a committee of the whole house on the 8th inst."

Nov. 8. The house resolved into a committee of the whole house, to proceed in the consideration of the Bill, to disable James duke of York, to inherit the Imperial Crowns of England and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging; and after many debates about several Amendments, and Clauses to be added, the Bill was agreed, and reported to the house.—Resolved, "That the said Bill, with the several Clauses and Amendments, be engrossed."

Message from the King relating to the Exclusion Bill.] Nov. 10. His majesty's Message to the house was read.

"His majesty desires this house; as well for the satisfaction of his people, as of himself, to expedite such matters as are depending before them, relating to Popery and the Plot; and would have them rest assured, that all Remedies they can tender to his majesty, conducting to these ends, shall be very acceptable to him; provided they be such as may consist with preserving the Succession of the Crown in its legal course of descent."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Boscawen. Sir, I look on all his majesty's Speeches to parliaments, and Messages to this house; to be acts of state, and the results of serious councils; and therefore the more deserving our consideration: but also I think we may in some respects look on them as we do on letters patent; or other grants in the king's name; if in them there be any thing against law, the lawyer or officer that drew them is answerable for it. So if his Speeches be the product of council, if there be any mistake in them, it must be imputed to the council, and we may and ought to conclude the king never said it, for he can do no wrong. I cannot, sir, but much admire what neglect of ours, as to Popery and the Plot, hath occasioned this message. Hath not most of our time been spent about examination of witnesses about the Plot, and in making inspections into the proceedings of the last parliaments as to their transactions about it, that so we may proceed upon such grounds as we ought? Hath there any day past, in which we have not done something as to the Plot and Popery, besides what we have done about the duke's Bill? Which alone is sufficient proof of our endeavours to discover the Plot and Popery, because it plainly appears that all the Plot centers in him, and that we can never prevent Popery, but by preventing that power to rule, which is derived from a Popish Successor, and the having of a Popish king. It is true, we have spent some time also, in asserting the right of the people to petition the king for parliaments, or other grievances; but I do not take that to be so remote to this affair; for can the Plot ever be searched to the bottom, or Popery prevented, as our case stands, but by parliaments? And seeing there were so many prorogations of this parliament, when there were occasions so urgent for their sitting, in order to search the Plot to the bottom, and to make laws against Popery, have we not great reason to believe, that it was from that party that such strange endeavours were used to prevent the meeting of parliaments, from which they know nothing but ruin can attend them? Do we not see, by Coleman's Letters, what contrivances they always had for to manage the meetings, sittings, prorogations, and dissolutions of parliaments? And why should we not believe they exercise the same arts still? Seeing it is plain that the dissolutions of the last two parliaments, and many prorogations of this, did not proceed from any Protestant interest; and therefore well may we conclude from whom. And for the same reason that they fear parliaments, have not the people reason to be fond of them, being the only legal way to redress Grievances? And could we have answered the neglecting of the asserting our rights in that particular? Sir, I think that, next to the duke's Bill, the asserting of the People's Right to petition, is the most necessary affair we could have spent our time about, in order to have the Plot examined to the bottom, by conveying to his majesty the desires of his people, to have parliaments sit in order thereto. And therefore I am jealous that the Advice given for this Message, doth proceed rather from a fear that we are doing too much, than from our doing too little against Popery. However, sir, seeing the Message comes in his majesty's name, let us, according to our duty, give all the compliance we can to it; and therefore I humbly move you, that a Message be sent to the lords, to desire them to appoint a day for the Trial of William visc. Stafford.

Mr. John Hampden. Sir, I cannot but observe, that his majesty in his Speech made to us at the opening of this session, recommended to us the Examination of the Plot, and the making laws for the security of the Protestant religion, which is not yet above 20 days ago. And therefore it is very strange, in my opinion, that we should so soon receive another Message to the same purpose, especially considering how we have spent our time ever since our meeting, in that which we have reason to think tends as much to the preventing of Popery, as any thing we could invent. The truth is, sir, I am fully persuaded, that the advice for this Message proceeds from the same men that advised the Dissolution of the two last parliaments, and the many prorogations of this; for though it may look like a contradiction, that going fast or going slow should tend to one and the same end, yet it doth so in this case: for by the dissolutions of those parliaments, and many prorogations of this, time was gotten for the disheartening of some witnesses, and tampering with others, and the death of the most material one; and now, by pressing upon this parliament to make great haste, other witnesses may be prevented from coming in, for which his maj. hath declared he will give two months time by his proclamation. So that it plainly appears, that the farther Examination of the Plot must be prevented some way, if they can do it; and that rather than fail, your endeavours to go to the bottom of the Plot shall be turned upon you, and made use of to their advantage. Sir, we are under great difficulties, and therefore we must be careful what we do. By the contents of this Message we may plainly see, that our enemies are at work to represent our proceedings ill to the king, that so if possible there may be some plausible pretence found out that may serve to gull the people, if they should procure a Dissolution. But I hope his maj. will not hearken to such advice; in order to prevent it, let us, until we have an opportunity to express our duty to him by actions, do it by words, to satisfy him, that we have spent most of our time in examining the Plot, and in contriving how to secure his person and government against the dangers arising from Popery; and to assure him, that we will lose no time till we have done what lies in our power in order thereto; and that we may without give some farther instance of our endeavours, let us vote that we will immediately proceed to the Trial of lord Stafford.

Mr. Harbord. Sir, I am well content to understand that part of the Speech, which recommends to us a speedy examination of the Plot, to proceed from his majesty's goodness, on a supposition that he is now more sensible than ever of the danger his person and government is in by papists. And I hope it is from that, and not from any other reason, that he hath been pleased to send us this Message so soon after his Speech, notwithstanding our endeavours as to the Plot and Popery. But, sir, what I am most concerned at, is the latter part of the speech, that about the Succession; for it looks like the difficulty that was put upon the Israelites, of making bricks without straw. For seeing all the discoveries about the Plot make it clearly out, that it all centers in the duke, and that all their hope is derived from a Popish Successor, and expectation of a popish king, how can we do any thing that can be effectual in pursuance of the first part of that proposition, without contradicting the latter, it being impossible to secure the protestant religion under such limitations? However, sir, I hope that none of these things will put the house out of that temper and moderation which becomes this place; for I hope that at last his maj. will either convince us, or be advised by us, that so we may come to a fair understanding, and this session have a happy conclusion. Let us be careful not to give our enemies any just advantage to misrepresent us: And then I hope all will do well at last, maugre all the endeavours of our back-friends. That we do vote that we will proceed to Trial of some of the lords, and appoint a committee to draw up an Address in answer to this Message, is, I conceive, what is necessary at this time.

Col. Titus. Sir, his majesty's Message is a tacit reprehension of this house, for not having done their duty, as to the Plot and Popery. And as well by this Message, as by his Speech at the opening of the session, he doth now seem much concerned, that the Examination of the Plot, and the securing of the nation against the danger of Popery, hath been so long deferred; for my part, I think he hath a great deal of reason for what he saith, and I am glad to hear it. For I hope he is now truly sensible what strange advice he followed in dissolving the last parliaments, and so often proroguing this; and that he will now permit the parliament to it, until they have done their duty in that particular. But, sir, though his majesty may now be very sensible of the miscarriages there have been in the management of this business already, yet I think we may not do amiss (secing his maj. hath given us this occasion) to particularise to him, how the Examination of the Plot, and the securing us against Popery, hath been prevented. Sir, was not the late Long Parliament, after the Plot broke out, in a fair way to have tried the Lords, and to have examined the Plot to the bottom? And did not the dissolution of them frustrate all their proceedings? Did not the next parliament fall upon the same subject, and were they not advanced very far towards it? And did not the prorogation and dissolution come, and make all void? Hath this parliament, though called to meet the 17th Oct. was 12 months, ever sat till now? And have they not ever since their meeting employed most of their time about the Plot and Popery? And can there lie any just complaints against us? The truth is, sir, it is plain to me, that if this Message proceeds from his majesty's own judgment, as I hope it doth, (for how can it be presumed that his maj. should not see how we proceed against the Plot and Popery as well as every body else?) or if it proceed from such counsel, as do really intend we should do something against Popery, then we may be permitted to sit until we have done something for the security of our religion, and good of our country; but, on the other side, if this Message do proceed from the same counsel that advised the dissolutions of the last parliaments, and many prorogations of this, then we may take it as a clear discovery, that there are persons at work to represent us ill to the king, and to find some such pretence for our dissolution, as may pass with the people; and such I take to be enemies both to the king and kingdom, and therefore hope you will take a time to find them out, and proceed against them as they deserve.

Sir Mr. Winnington. Sir, though I know that we are under an obligation from duty to make a good construction of all his majesty's Speeches and Messages to this house, yet because they generally do proceed from some advice and counsel taken on such occasions, therefore, I think, we may, without offence, when any thing is irreconcilable in them, attribute it to the ministers; though all that which is good, and agreeable to that wisdom and prudence which is inherent in his majesty, ought to be attributed to himself; and, as the case stands with us, I think only from him can it proceed. What is said in this Message, that neither his maj. nor the people can be satisfied, unless we expedite such matters as relate to the Plot, I believe it proceeds from his majesty's own genius, it being so agreeable to that love which he hath always professed for the protestant religion; but that tacit imputation that we have neglected the Examination of the Plot, and proceedings against Popery, appears to me like a kind of infatuation in those ministers that advised it. For, sir, is there any thing more obvious, than that this parliament have spent most of their time in matters relating to the Plot and Popery, and to make such laws as may prevent the coming in of Popery upon us? And did not both the last parliaments do the same, from the time the Plot broke out? And if I may take the liberty to prophesy, I am apt to think, that the next, and the next, will proceed in the same steps, until such laws be made as are precisely necessary for the hindering of Popery from coming in upon us: And I pray God it may not be a cause why we shall have no parliaments to sit and act for a while. But, sir, as this is plain, so to our grief it is, that there are those about the king in great power, who are against the Examination of the Plot to the bottom, or making laws against Popery. Hath not this appeared by the great endeavours that have been used to stifle the Plot; the menacing and discouraging of the true witnesses, and setting up and encouraging of false ones? I mean, by the great power that accompanied those endeavours; but above all, by the great authority and interest, which that party have shewed in the dissolution of the last two parliaments, (though as to the first I heartily forgive them) and the many prorogations of this. And must they now, after they have stopped or smothered all proceedings that tended to destroy Popery, for above two years, find fault that we have not brought all to perfection in two weeks? Sir, this looks like such a profound piece of policy, as that of killing Justice Godfrey. But I am not sorry that their politics run so low. Such a pretence as this can only pass with persons that have a mind to be deceived. I will never doubt the prudence of the major part of the nation in this particular, who know that the non-prosecution of the Plot is the great grievance which the nation groans under; and the making of such laws which may secure us against Popery, the greatest reason why they have so longed for a parliament, and adventured so much, as some did, in petitioning for one. And, sir, I think, that accordingly this house have not been wanting to do their duty therein; and therefore do believe that such representations to his maj. are made by such, as aim at the destruction of parliaments, and bringing in of Popery. But the better to prevent their taking any such advantage for the future, I could wish that we may not spend more mornings about Irish cattle, nor East-India trade, until the business of the Plot and Popery be more off our hands. But in order to satisfy his maj. of our obedience to his commands, I agree both for the committee, and Trial of the lord Stafford.

An Address voted.] Resolved, "That a committee be appointed, to draw up an humble Address to his majesty upon the debate of the house, in answer to his majesty's gracious Message."

Lord Stafford's Trial—resolved on.] Resolved

ed, "That this house will proceed in the prosecution of the Lords in the Tower, and will forthwith begin with Wm. visc. Stafford."

The Commons' Address, in Answer to the King's Message.] Nov. 11. Sir Wm. Jones* reported from the committee appointed to draw up an Address to his majesty, upon the debate of the house, in answer to his majesty's gracious Message; which being read, was agreed to by the house, as follows:

"We your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, having taken into our most serious consideration your majesty's gracious Message, brought unto us the 9th day of this inst. Nov. do with all thankfulness acknowledge your majesty's care and goodness, in inviting us to expedite such matters as are depending before us, relating to Popery and the Plot. And we do, in all humility, represent to your majesty, that we are fully convinced, that it is highly incumbent upon us, in discharge both of our duty to your majesty, and of that great trust reposed in us by those whom we represent, to endeavour, by the most speedy and effectual ways, the Suppression of Popery within this your kingdom, and the bringing to public justice all such as shall be found guilty of the horrid and damnable Popish Plot. And though the time of our sitting (abating what must necessarily be spent in the chusing and presenting a Speaker, appointing grand committees, and in taking the oaths and tests enjoined by act of parliament) hath not much exceeded a fortnight; yet we have in this time not only made a considerable progress in some things which to us seem, and (when presented to your maj. in a parliamentary way) will, we trust, appear to your maj. to be absolutely necessary for the safety of your majesty's person, the effectual Suppression of Popery, and the security of the religion, lives, and estates of your majesty's protestant subjects: but even in relation to the Trials of the five Lords impeached in parliament for the execrable Popish Plot, we have so far proceeded, as we doubt not but in a short time we shall be ready for the same. But we cannot (without being unfaithful to your majesty, and to our country, by whom we are entrusted) omit, upon this occasion, humbly to inform your majesty, That our difficulties, even as to these Trials, are much increased by the evil and destructive counsels of those persons who advised your majesty, first to the prorogation, and then to the dissolution of the last parliament, at a time when the commons had taken great pains about, and were prepared for those Trials. And by the like pernicious counsels of those who advised the many and long prorogations of the present parliament, before the same was permitted to sit; whereby some of the Evidence which was prepared in the last parliament, may possibly (during so great an interval) be forgotten or lost; and some persons, who might probably have come in as witnesses, are either dead, have been taken off, or may have been discouraged from giving their evidence. But of one mischievous consequence of those dangerous and unhappy counsels, we are certainly and sadly sensible, namely, that the testimony of a material witness against every one of those five Lords (and who could probably have discovered, and brought in much other evidence about the Plot in general, and those lords in particular) cannot now be given in vivo; for as much as that witness is unfortunately dead, between the calling and the sitting of this parliament. To prevent the like, or greater inconveniences for the future, we make it our most humble request to your most excellent majesty, that, as you tender the safety of your royal person, the security of your loyal subjects, and the preservation of the true protestant religion, you will not suffer yourself to be prevailed upon by the like counsels, to do any thing which may occasion, in consequence, (though we are assured never with your majesty's intention) either the deserting of a fall and perfect discovery and examination of this most wicked and detestable Plot, or the preventing the conspirators therein from being brought to speedy and exemplary justice and punishment. And we humbly beseech your maj. to rest assured, (notwithstanding any suggestions which may be made by persons, who, for their own wicked purposes, contrive to create a distrust in your majesty of your people,) that nothing is more in the desires, and shall be more the endeavours of us, your faithful and loyal commons, than the promoting and advancing of your majesty's true happiness and greatness."

Debate on the 3d Reading of the Exclusion Bill.] Mr. George Vernon. Sir, I hope this Address will satisfy his majesty, that this house hath not been negligent in the prosecution of the Plot and Popery, and that it will create in his majesty a good opinion of our proceedings, that so we may not meet with any interruption in the perfecting of those Bills which are necessary for the good of the king and kingdom, and may have the glory of having been instrumental in accomplishing that security which the nation so much desires in point of Religion, and in making his majesty's government not only more easy to him, but so formidable, as that he may become a terror to his enemies, and in a capacity to give assistance to his friends both at home and abroad; and, if possible, so reconcile all divisions, as that there may be no distinction but of Papists and Protestants, nor of that neither, if there could be a way found out to prevent it. For I know this house wants nothing but opportunity to express their loyalty to the king, and love to the Protestant Religion, and their country;

* "This Address was drawn up under the sanction of sir Wm. Jones, who was that very day introduced into the house, as also appointed of the Committee, and by them placed in the chair, out of a peculiar compliment." Ralph.

but I am afraid that all our endeavours will prove ineffectual, unless we can remove from his majesty all counsellors that advise him in favour of the Popish interest, and such as influence him in favour of that party. I do not mean little ones, but such as by experience we had found, have in the time of our greatest danger exercised a kind of uncontrollable power. The Witnesses which you have heard this day at the bar, as to the wicked Plot of the Papists in Ireland, and in what a dangerous condition the poor Protestants are there, how exceeded in numbers by their enemies, and deserted by their friends, added to the Evidence we have of the Plot in England, hath given to me a new prospect of the deplorable condition we are in; and therefore, although it be a little late in the day, seeing here is a full house, and of such persons as I believe will never think anything too much, that is so necessary for the good of their king and country; I hope you will not think it unseasonable, that I should now move you, that the ingrossed Bill, for disinherit James duke of York, be read.

The Bill, amended as the house had ordered, was then read, entitled, 'An Act for securing of the Protestant Religion, by disabling James duke of York to inherit the imperial Crown of England and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging.'

Sir Leoline Jenkins. Sir, this great business cannot be too well considered, before you come to a final resolution therein. I will not now offer you any prudential arguments against this Bill; because I did offer several at the last reading. But, sir, I would desire you to consider, that this prince is brother to our present king, and son to our late pious king Ch. I. for whose memory this nation hath a great veneration: that this prince is enriched with excellent endowments, which he hath employed in the service of this nation, by fighting our battles, and defending us from the oppression of our enemies; and is only guilty of this one crime, which, I hope, upon mature deliberation, will not deserve so great a condemnation. Sir, I knew it is usual for this house to proceed in affairs of less importance, with all the calmness, justice, and prudence, that can be imagined; and therefore I hope you will be careful how you deviate from those measures, in a business of this nature. I would once more remember you, that there are laws already for the punishment of the crimes he is accused of; and therefore humbly conceive, you ought not to chastise him, by making a new law; especially with that severity, which is, by this bill, now intended, before any hearing.—Sir, for my part, I have taken the oath of allegiance, and think myself therein bound to him, as heir, until it please God that his majesty have children. I know of no power on earth, that can dispense with my oath; and therefore I cannot (so much as by being silent) give my consent to this Bill, lest I therein wrong my conscience; seeing I have the honour to be a member of this house.—I do not doubt but most here have a great esteem for the Church of England, as members thereof: I could wish they would consider what a great blow this Bill will give to our religion, and to our Church. To disinherit a prince for no other cause, but for being of a different opinion in some points of faith, is, I think, quite contrary to the principles of the religion we profess, and also to the established laws of this land. And if such an act, when made, should be of any validity, I do conclude, that you will thereby change the constitution of this monarchy, and make it in a manner elective; and therefore I humbly move you, that the Bill may be thrown out.

Sir Rob. Markham. Sir, I think there ought to be a Proviso, That if the duke should turn Protestant, that then the Bill should be void, and he not excluded from his right; that so we may not leave him without some temptation to return to the Protestant Religion. And I think there ought to be a proviso, that in case the duke should have a son, after either of his daughters (if it should be their fortune) have ascended the throne, for the reserving of him a right. For there is a possibility, that if the duke should out-live the king, he may have a son, after that his daughters, by virtue of this act, may have taken the crown. I suppose, as there is no intent to chastise the daughters for the father's sake, so not the son; and therefore I humbly move you, that some proviso may be added, to secure him his Right, if any such thing should happen.

*Mr. Goodwin Wharton. I have not yet troubled you since I had the honour to be here, and should not at all upon any other matter. I know my own inabilities, in comparison of many abler and wiser men than myself, but I cannot be silent when I hear the justice of the house questioned. If those things be true which are suggested in the Bill, the duke has forfeited his life upon it. Passing this bill is in order to our security only, and therefore it is just. The duke has done his utmost endeavour to ruin this nation, and to destroy us all. It is said, 'that the duke has fought our battles;' but I think he did not when he fell asleep.† It was not fair in the duke to let our ships fight with the Dutch, and to suffer the French to stand still. At the great fire, when London was burnt, certain men were taken, actually firing houses, and delivered to the guards, who let them escape, and the officer that set them at liberty was afterwards one of his greatest favourites. It was a sign of a very ill principle in the duke, that, when the duke of Monmouth was sent into Scotland to suppress that Rebellion, it was thought amiss by the duke, that they were not all destroyed. I do not think that you will chuse a prince that will not speak truth, to inherit the crown. When Bedlow gave in his information of the murder of sir E. Godfrey, and accused one Le Phaire to have been one of the murderers, and one of the queen's servants, I heard the duke say to those about him, 'There was no such man in the world, nor about the queen.' And within three or four days after, there was a bond found under his hand. A prince not to speak truth! I cannot express what to call it. This is plain, that the duke did hinder the discovery of the Plot. Is such a prince fit to succeed? Never were worse things done, nor a worse man in betraying the French Protestants, by placing the French ambassador behind the hanging when he made some overtures—

Here lord Castleton interrupted him, to the Orders of the house. 'To hear a prince thus spoken of, I am not able to endure it!'

Mr. Wharton went on. It is not my business to make a speech, but what I know, and think to be real truth, ought to be taken notice of. But since these things are so odious, I will not touch any more upon them now. As for the prudential part of the Bill, an hon. person told you, 'he would not speak to it,' and he has kept his word very exactly. And whereas another member before him objected, 'That it was possible the Duke might turn Protestant,' I will only answer, that I do not think it possible, that any person that has been bred up in the Protestant Religion, and hath been weak enough (for so I must call it) to turn Papist, should ever after (in that respect) be wise enough to turn Protestant. And therefore, upon the whole matter, my motion is, That the Bill may pass.

Mr. Laurence Hyde. Sir, I do not know that any of the king's murderers were condemned without being heard; and must we deal thus with the brother of our king? It is such a severe way of proceeding, that I think we cannot answer it to the world; and therefore it would consist much better with the justice of the house, to impeach him, and try him in a formal way; and then cut off his head, if he deserve it. I will not offer to dispute the power of parliaments; but question whether this law, if made, would be good in itself. Some laws have a natural weakness with them. I think, that by which the old long parliament carried on their Rebellion, was judged afterward void in law; because there was a power given, which could not be taken from the crown. For aught I know, when you have made this law, it may have the same flaw in it; if not, I am confident there are a loyal party, which will never obey, but will think themselves bound, by their oath of allegiance and duty, to pay obedience to the duke, if ever he should come to be king, which must occasion a civil war. And, sir, I do not find that the proviso, that was ordered to be added for the security of the duke's children, is made strong enough to secure them, according to the debate of the house; it being liable to many objections; and the more, because the words, 'presumptive heir of the crown,' are industriously left out, though much insisted on when debated here in the house. Upon the whole matter, my humble motion is, that the Bill may be thrown out.

Sir Wm. Jones.^{*} Sir, I am very unfit to speak in this place, being a member but of yesterday, but I will rather adventure to draw a censure on myself, than be wanting to serve my country (seeing they have called me hither) in a business of so great importance, I think, as great as ever was debated in an house of commons. I can truly affirm, that I have a great respect for the duke; and therefore, as well for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, I am for this Bill. For I take it for granted, that it is impossible that a Papist should come to the possession and quiet enjoyment of this crown, without wading through a sea of blood, and occasioning such a war as may, for aught I know, shake the monarchical government of this nation, and thereby not only endanger himself, but his children too. For no man can foresee what may be the end of such a war, nor what miseries it may bring on the nation: but, in all probability, it may prove the deepest tragedy that ever was acted on this great theatre. For it cannot be imagined, that the great body of Protestants which are in this nation, will tamely submit to the Popish yoke, which they will see in time must be the consequence of submitting to a Popish king, without some struggling. And wars begun upon the score of religion are generally attended with more fatal and bloody consequences than other wars; and this may exceed all others that ever yet were made. And I see no way to prevent it, but by passing this Bill, which, so long as it excludes only him, and secures the crown to his children, is, I think, (as the case stands) the greatest kindness we can do him. Sir, I do much admire to hear some hon. and learned members say, that this Bill is against natural justice, because it condemns a man before he is heard; and that it is too severe a condemnation; that it is against the oath of allegiance and principles of our religion; that it will be a scandal to our Church, to exclude a man of his right, for his opinion in religion; that it is a law that will be void in itself, and that there are a loyal party which will never obey it; that it will make the crown elective, and occasion a civil war; and that the Proviso, as to the duke's children, is not strong enough, because the words, 'presumptive Heir,' is left out.—Sir, the first objection.

* This was the first time he spoke in parl. "Sir Wm. Jones, the late Attorney General, at his first entrance into the house, espoused the Bill with a warmth and vehemence which were not natural to him. And this person having the fame of being the greatest lawyer in England, and a very wise man; being also known to be very rich, and of a wary or rather timorous nature, made people generally conclude, that the thing was safe and certain, and would at last be agreed on all hands, whatever countenance was made at Court." Temple's Memoirs.—In the Appendix to the present volume, No. XV. will be found an excellent Tract written by this gentleman.

I think, is a great mistake; for this Bill is not intended as a condemnation to the duke, but a security to ourselves; and is so far from being against natural justice, that the passing of it is agreeable to the very foundation not only of natural justice, but natural religion too; the safety of the king and kingdom depending thereon, which, according to the rules of justice and religion, we are bound to use our endeavours to preserve, before any one man's interest. That about the oath of allegiance I do a little admire at; for it is the first time I ever heard that oath pleaded in favour of Popery. I have oftentimes had occasion to scan the meaning of that oath, but never found it extended to the successor during the king's life; and therefore no need of any dispensation in that point. And I cannot understand, how it can be any scandal as to our Church or Religion, if by Church be meant our Protestant Church. Can our Church, or churchmen, be scandalized because we endeavour to secure ourselves against Popery by all lawful means? I rather think the very supposition an high reflection on our churchmen, as rendering them willing to let in Popery, which I am confident they are not. As to what is said, that the law will be void in itself, and that there will be a loyal party that will never obey it, and that it will occasion a civil war; I must confess these are strange arguments to me: for, to doubt that the legislative power of the nation, king, lords and commons, cannot make laws that shall bind any, or all the subjects of this nation, is to suppose there is such a weakness in the government as must infallibly occasion its ruin. And therefore I am of opinion, that what laws you make in this case, will carry as much right and strength with them, not only now, but after the king's death, as any law whatsoever. And how then, can there be a loyal party that will not acquiesce therein, unless the word loyal have some other signification than I know of? I take it to be a distinction that can only be given to such as obey laws; and, I think, we need not doubt, but if once this law were passed, there would be Protestants enough, whose interest it will be to defend it, that would compel an obedience to it. And we have much more reason to fear a civil war without it, than with it; for if we can get this Bill, we may be thereby so united, and enabled to defend ourselves, as that the Popish party may never have the confidence to attempt us; but without it we shall not be in any capacity to defend ourselves; which above all things, may encourage a civil war. As to the Proviso, for securing the right to the duke's Children, if it be not strong enough, I am ready to give my vote it should be stronger; but I take it to be as full and comprehensive as can be made; at least, I take the leaving out the words, 'presumptive Heir to the crown,' to be no objection against it: for there is no such word in our Law-Books, nor no such term in treating of the Succession; and therefore I hope you will be careful how you make a precedent that case.—And, sir, as I do not find there is any weight in the arguments that have been made against this Bill; so I think, that if the preservation of our king, our government, our lives, and our religion, be things of moment, that there is much to be said for it. For although the malignity of men cannot deface his majesty's goodness; yet by assisting the Popish Faction, they have spoiled the beautiful face of the best government in the world, by breaking that good correspondence there ought to be between the king and his people; by dividing us in points of religion; and by being the cause of just Jealousies and Fears: by which his maj. is reduced to great difficulties and trouble, in the administration of his regal authority; and the credit, peace, and tranquillity of the nation almost irrecoverably lost. As to all which, the art of man cannot find out any remedy, as long as there is a Popish Successor and the fears of a Popish king; and therefore I humbly move you this Bill may pass.

Sir F. Winnington. Sir, the arguments that have been used against this Bill may be very excellent to lull us into a fatal security, by possessing us with opinions, that there is no need of taking so much care about popery; or that we ought not to oppose it; or that it will be to no purpose, because we have no power to hinder it. But I do not see what weight they have in them, grounded on any other consideration, to hinder the passing this Bill. Rather, for the same reason that such arguments as these are here offered against this Bill; and such endeavours used abroad to reconcile the people to have a better opinion of popery than formerly, I think we ought to be the more zealous for this bill; because nothing can give a greater encouragement and assistance to popery, than the growth of such opinions, nor prevent their design who are industrious to infuse them, than the passing of this Bill. Whoever will consider how this monarchy hath declined in grandeur, honour, and reputation abroad, by the destruction of our Navy in 1666, and the little appearance we have ever since made, of being formidable at sea; but above all, our ministers double-dealing in the making of Alliances, or performing of them, (in order to keep up our interest with France.) How from being umpire to all this part of the world, according to the advantage which we have by our situation, we are become the despicablest nation in Europe. How the government is weakened at home, not only by Fears and Jealousies, but by the debaucheries and divisions which have been promoted amongst our people; how narrowly we escaped ruin when the city of London was burnt, as well as when the Toleration came out, and the Army was at Black-Heath? as lately by the horrid Plot, if it had not been discovered; how there is nothing stands between us and death, but the king's life; and how all these dangers, past and present, do arise from Popery: and how impossible it is it should be otherwise, as long as there is a Popish Successor, we may justly admire there should be any arguments offered in this place to lessen our care for preventing the growth and power of Popery. I cannot tell how these learned members understand natural justice; but I am of that opinion, that self-preservation, and the preservation of our religion, and the life of our king, by all lawful ways, is very agreeable to natural justice. And I do admire to hear such a construction made of the oath of allegiance, that it binds all persons to the next heir, as well as to the king. For it is a most dangerous maxim, and may be of ill consequence, if over the next heir of the crown should make a rebellion; for he may thereby challenge allegiance from the people, as well as the king; which might be of pernicious consequence. And I do not see wherein our Church or Religion can be scandalized by this bill. For we do not disinherit this prince for his religion, but to save our own, and to prevent the manifest ruin of the nation. And therefore I think it is a kindness to the Church, above all acts whatsoever; because the only way to preserve it, I mean the Protestant Church. And those objections that have been made against the lawfulness and validity of this act, do not weigh with me; but, notwithstanding what hath been said, I do believe it will be as good in law, if once it be passed, and will be as well observed too, as any act whatsoever. The king hath his right from God, and, as supreme, is accountable to none; his person sacred, and, by our laws, can do no wrong. If we should give all these qualifications to a successor, as hath been, in some measure, insinuated, it would make a strange confusion in the government. Life itself, to which a man hath as much right, as any successor can pretend to have to the crown, is taken away upon some forfeitures for the public good. And as there may be a forfeiture for life, so there may be a forfeiture of a right to the Succession. And to doubt that there is not an unlimited, uncontrollable power, residing somewhere in all governments, to remedy the exigencies that may happen, is to suppose there is such a weakness in this, or any other government, as that it must fall when a powerful faction shall endeavour it. In this nation, this power is in the king, lords, and commons; and I hope they will make use of it to preserve the government upon this occasion. And I do not doubt, but if the Bill pass, all will obey it heartily, that wish well to the Protestant Religion.

Col. Legge. Though I am talked of abroad to be a papist, yet, I thank God, I am none. And for an instance that I am not any, I will not pay that respect to Peter's Chair, as to 'deny my master*.' Many laws have been made about the Succession of the crown, but none without blood and misery. My father was twice condemned to die for asserting the right of the crown, and I hope I shall never forsake it. There has been a talk in the world of another Successor than the duke, in a Black Box*; but if Pandora's Box must be opened, I would have it in my time, not in my childrens, that I may draw my sword to defend the right heir. Has any happiness ever come to princes, who came to the crown, and the lawful heir thus put by? After Edw. vi. Jane Grey was proclaimed, but it proved unfortunate to her. If my master the duke be popish, God's curse be on him that was the cause of it. I hope you will take a course, that misery may not fall on posterity. I have Church-Lands, and reason to apprehend Popery coming in as other men—I cannot recollect what I had farther to say; but this Bill will set us all together by the ears.

Sir H. Capel. Sir, I do observe, and am glad to see it, that all that have spoken in this business, pro or con, seem to agree, that we ought to do all we can to preserve the present government, and prevent a civil war; but we differ about the way: some think, that this Bill is the only way; and others are of a contrary opinion, I cannot tell, for what good reason. For there being nothing intended by this Bill, but the Exclusion of the duke only, in order to prevent the great danger we lie under, by reason of his great influence at court at present; and those we fear, if ever a Popish king should ascend the throne. There being nothing in the Bill that tends any way to prejudice the next heir, it cannot, in my poor opinion, weaken, much less tend to alter, the present government, or be any prejudice to the royal family, more than in the Exclusion of this one person intended by the Bill. From whom there can be no fear of a civil war; unless we should imagine, that the people of this nation, when they have a law, upon the observation and execution whereof their lives, liberties, and religion depend, they should be so great brutes as not to value themselves thereon; but rather embrace a blind, superstitious religion, and submit to all the slavery imaginable. We may as well think that, after the king's decease, the people will be willing to submit to the government, and pretended authority of the pope himself, though they should be never so well able to defend themselves. The worthy member that spoke last, did in a manner affirm, that all the precedents that have been mentioned, as to the Succession of the crown by act of par-

* "A report was industriously propagated, that a Marriage had been solemnized, or at least a contract had passed, between his majesty, while abroad, and Mrs. Walters otherwise Barlow, his grace of Moosmouth's mother; that the late bishop of Durham had consigned a writing in a Black Box, relating thereto, into the custody of sir Gilbert Gerrard, and that the said writing had been communicated to several persons of distinction, and had fully satisfied them that the fact was so." Ralph liament, have been accompanied with blood. If he would but take the pains to peruse the Histories of England, I think he would be of another opinion. But I am sure, none ever equalized the short reign of queen Mary. The barbarities which were exercised in her reign, by fire and faggot, may be put into the balance with all the inconveniencies that ever happened by any Exclusion Act. But, sir, if it had been so, which I utterly deny, it would not have signified much as to our case; for in those days, matter of right was always so confounded, (I mean, as to the understanding of the people) by the many arguments that were imposed on them by each party, that neither point of right, nor any consideration, as to any thing of interest, came fairly before them. Whether A. or B. should be king, was their only question, without being loaden with any difficulties; as to which the common and major part of the people in those days might probably be very indifferent. And yet, sir, upon a full examination it will be found, that most of those acts of parliament, touching the succession, had the effect they were designed for; and did serve as expedients, to prevent those miseries which were feared, and were the occasion of them. But, sir, the case will be now much otherwise, if ever you should be so unfortunate, as that the duke should out-live the king, and you should come to try the strength of this Exclusion Bill: for the question in this case will not be only whether A. which is excluded; or B. which is the next heir, shall, according to this act, be king; but whether it shall be a Papist or a Protestant. Upon which it will plainly appear, the safety of their estates, lives, and religion, doth depend. Sir, I have heard and read of strange things done by Popish miracles; and I must confess, I have seen much of it, even amongst many that pretend to be good Protestants, since the Plot broke out; I mean, as to their believing any thing against Popery. If some such omnipotent power should hereafter over-rule in such a conjunction, haply this Bill, if it should pass into an act, may be slighted and neglected; but otherwise I humbly conceive, it cannot be presumed, that the Protestants should omit to make use of it, to save themselves from popery and slavery, which would be the consequence thereof; and thereby not only prevent a civil war, but support the government established in the right line. The truth is, sir, the most material observation that I can make of the arguments against this Bill is, that it is thought too good for us; and that it may probably be effectual for the securing of the Protestant religion. And I am afraid, sir, that this is the fatal consideration that hath prevailed with some, to advise the king not to grant it. If we consider how all other laws, which have been hitherto made against the duke, have been defeated; we may, with some reason, fear the like success of all others that shall be made; unless you can do something that may tend to changing of the interest; which can never be done without this Bill.

Mr. Daniel Finch. Sir, I will not say, that acts of parliament cannot dispose of the Succession; because it was made treason, by a statute 13th Eliz. which I do not remember was ever repealed. But I will deny, that the kings of England rule by virtue of any statute-law, as was suggested; for their right is by so ancient a prescription, as that it may justly be said, to be from God alone; and that no power on earth ought to dispute it. And I am of opinion, that the Succession of the crown is inseparably annexed to proximity of blood; and therefore am not yet altered in my opinion, that if this Bill should pass into a law, it would be in itself invalid. Which, with what hath been already said, that we cannot in justice answer the inflicting of this severe condemnation without hearing the party concerned; and the improbability of ever attaining this bill, doth very much weigh with me for my opinion against this bill.

Mr. John Trenchard. Sir, I have hearkened to the objections that have been made against this Bill, which have not convinced me, that we want either a just cause, or a legal power, for the making of this Bill. If the Popish interest be grown too strong for the Protestant, then any of these arguments may serve; for force and power will supply the defect of them. Otherwise I think they have been so fully answered, as that there is no need more should be said about this matter; but I am sorry to see, that the Protestant Religion, and our lives and liberties, must have nothing to depend on, but the continuance of the king's life, and the good-nature of the Popish party afterward. And this, after such demonstration as we have of the interest of that party in France, Scotland, and Ireland, as well as here; and after a full direction of the growth of that interest, by means of the duke's; and of the endeavours that are used to possess the Protestants, with several opinions that will tend very much to the strengthening of it; and a clear discovery, that the Plot in favour of Popery goeth on as much as ever. It hath created in me an opinion, that Popery is too strong to be subdued by laws; and that, after this king's life, the Protestant religion must either be overcome by Popery, or defend itself by the sword. At least, I believe, that this is the design of some men now about the king; but I hope he will at last hearken to the advice of his parliament, and prevent the nation from falling into so miserable a condition. The objection made about the duke's son, if he should have any, after either of his daughters have taken possession of the government, may, in some measure, be made against the course of Succession observed in all kingdoms: If a king die, leaving a queen, the next heir is presently proclaimed, to prevent an inter-regnum; though there be a possibility of the queen's being with-child, to whom the right should, in the first place, belong. If any such should be born, such a settlement as is designed by this Bill may destroy the French and Popish interest, but can never be a gratification to them. Our ancestors, upon many occasions, settled and changed the Succession: of which he gave many instances, and concluded for the Bill.

The Exclusion Bill passed.] After which, it was resolved, That the said Bill do pass; and that the lord Russel do carry it up to the lords for their concurrence; which he did on the 15th.*

Proceedings against Lord Stafford renewed.] Nov. 12. The house resolved, that a Message be sent to the lords, to acquaint them with the Resolution of this house to proceed to the Trials of the Lords in the Tower, and forthwith begin with the lord Stafford, and to desire their lordships to appoint a convenient day for the Trial of the said viscount; and, likewise, that the lords in the Tower may be confined and kept from correspondence one with another, as usual in the like cases.—To which their lordships replied the same day, "That as to the confinement of the lords, they had already given orders as the house desired; and that as to the trial of the lord Stafford,

* "The Exclusion Bill was quickly brought up to the lords. The earls of Essex and Shaftsbury argued most for it; and the earl of Halifax was the champion on the other side. He gained great honour in the debate; and had a visible superiority to lord Shaftsbury in the opinion of the whole house: and that was to him triumph enough. In conclusion, the Bill was thrown out upon the first reading. The Country Party brought it nearer an equality than was imagined they could do, considering the king's earnestness in it, and that the whole bench of bishops, except three, was against it." Burnet.

"Till 11 o'clock at night the rage of altercation and the lust of superiority kept up the contest, the king being present all the while, and the whole house of commons attending, who had adjourned their own proceedings to indulge their curiosity in observing the progress and event of this." Ralph.

"This was one of the greatest days ever known in the house of lords, with regard to the importance of the business they had in hand, which concerned no less than the lineal Succession to the Crown. Great was the debate, and great were the speakers: the chief of those for the Bill was the earl of Shaftsbury; against it, lord Halifax. It was matter of surprize that the latter should appear at the head of an opposition to the former, when they were wont always to draw together; but the business in agitation was against lord Halifax's judgment, and therefore he opposed it with vigour; and being a man of the clearest head, finest wit, and fairest eloquence, he made so powerful a defence, that he alone, so all confessed, influenced the house, and persuaded them to throw out the Bill." Reresby.

The numbers on the division were 63 to 30. A Protest was entered on the occasion by lord Carew.

they had appointed Tuesday come fortnight for the said Trial."

Proceedings against sir G. Jefferies.] Nov. 13. Several citizens of London having before delivered in a petition against sir G. Jefferies*, the Recorder of the said city; and having made good their allegations before the committee appointed to enquire after persons who had offended against the right of the subject to petition, &c. the house resolved, "That the said sir G. Jefferies, by traducing and obstructing petitioning for the sitting of this parliament, hath betrayed the Rights of the Subject."—Ordered, "That an Address be made to his majesty, to remove sir G. Jefferies out of all public offices; and that the members for London do communicate the Vote of this house, relating to him, to the court of aldermen for the said city."

Debate on his Majesty's Message concerning Tangier.] Nov. 17. His majesty's Message about Tangier was read. "His majesty did, in his Speech at the opening of this session, desire the advice and Assistance of his parliament, in relation to Tangier: the condition and importance of the place obliges his majesty to put this house in mind again, that he relies upon them for the support of it; without which it cannot be much longer preserved. His majesty doth therefore very earnestly recommend Tangier again, to the due and speedy care and consideration of this house."—A long debate ensued, in the course of which

Sir Wm. Jones said, Sir, I am very sorry that the business of Supply for Tangier is now moved; because I take it to be a place of great importance, and that, as well for the honour of the nation, as benefit of trade, it ought to be preserved. But, sir, we have now things of greater importance to look after, of so pressing a nature, and of so dangerous consequence, if delayed, that we cannot answer, either to our king or our country, the preferring of this before it. It is a duty incumbent on us, to secure things at home, on which our all depends, before we enter into an expence of time about securing things abroad. If an enemy were but coming to invade us, it might be proper to fortify Dover-Castle, Portsmouth, or Plymouth, or any of our Port-Towns: but if an enemy were actually landed, it would be more proper to strengthen London, or other in-land cities or towns. I am afraid, sir, this is too much our case; I am afraid we have got an enemy within our bowels, and a great one too; and that it is high time to make preparation to oppose him. We have been already careless and inconsiderate too long; and shall we now go about Tangier, instead of continuing our endeavours about that? Tangier may be of great importance to trade; but I am afraid, hath not been so managed, as to be any security to the Protestant religion. The Portuguese, when they delivered it up, did covenant to have one popish church remain there, for the conveniency of some priests and friars, and others of that nation that were permitted to stay there; but it was then agreed, That their mortality should not be supplied, that so, after the decease of those persons, the said popish church might be demolished, or converted to a Protestant use: but I am well informed that it hath been otherwise managed; and that the Papists there are now more than ever. And was not my lord Bellasis, now a prisoner in the Tower for the Plot, governor of Tangier? And, I think some others of that religion; if not, I am sure the soldiers and commanders are most of that religion; which makes me conclude, it is a kind of nursery for popish soldiers; and haply for that reason, as much as for the advantage of trade, may the advice given his majesty, in reference to Tangier, proceed. But, sir, there is another consideration, which will make the debate of Tangier improper at this time; it must end in Money, and not a little sum neither, enough to raise an Army; which, although in time I doubt not but this house will be willing to advance, as far as his majesty's occasions shall require? yet I think, sir, we are not ready for it as yet. We must be better satisfied into whose hands it will go; whether to such persons as for the popish interest, or Protestant; that so we may not be afraid, that, instead of going to the support of Tangier, it should be employed to the destruction of the Protestant religion. When these things have been looked into, and secured, then it will be time to take care of Tangier, and of all other his majesty's dominions. In the mean time, our duty binds us to give his maj. all the satisfaction we can, as to our proceedings; and therefore I humbly move you, that a committee may be appointed to draw up an Address for that purpose.

* This over-bearing lawyer, being afterwards made Lord Chief Justice, &c. was notoriously distinguished in the succeeding annals of this and the following reign, for his arbitrary proceedings on the bench, and particularly for his cruelties in the West, after the duke of Monmouth's defeat in 1685. At the Revolution, being then Lord Chancellor, having disguised himself in a sailor's habit, in order to escape to Hamburg, he was accidentally discovered by the mob, and by the lord mayor sent to the Tower, where he soon ended his days under great misery and attention.

Mr. L. Hyde. Sir, every one that knows how advantageously Tangier is situated, to command the greatest thoroughfare of commerce in the world, and how by advantage of the mole, it is like to prove an excellent receptacle for our merchant ships, to further and secure them in their trading voyages into the streights, and for our men of war, when they may be employed in those parts, to check or oppose the Turks, or other enemies; how advantageous it is for carrying on a trade with Spain, in cases of extremity; and what hopes we have of opening a trade into Barbary that way, will, I suppose have reason to conclude, that it is a place of great importance, and not to be slighted. And I cannot believe that it is a nursery for popish soldiers, for it is well known under what a regulation our soldiers are, not only herein England, but Ireland too, of taking such oaths and tests as secures them to be Protestants.

Mr. John Hampden. Sir, among the rest of the regiments that have been sent to Tangier, I think there is my lord of Dunbarton's; haply that air might have changed them, but I am sure they were looked upon as rank Papists all the while they were here, and, I believe, in Ireland too. I have heard that one argument, that was lately given elsewhere against a Bill which we passed in this house, was, that the duke had all the Papists in England ready for his assistance; that his particular friends had the command of all the places of strength in this nation; that he had an Army of 22,000 men in Scotland at his command; that in Ireland the Papists were six to one for the Protestants; and that most of the princes of Christendom were combined for his assistance; add to this, that the government of Tangier is also at his command, and, I think, we shall have no great reason to give money as yet; I am very well satisfied, sir, that we ought, and must put a trust in the king; an argument much used in former parliaments, I do admire hath been so long forgotten in this. I am sensible too, that this nation cannot be happy, unless there be such an understanding between the king and his people, as that Money may be given. But, sir, how shall we be sure, that what Money we give shall ever go to the king? May it not be intercepted by the mighty power we have been speaking of? May it not be a great temptation for carrying on the Plot, especially as to that part of it that refers to his sacred life? If there were no other reason to be given but this, why we cannot at this time give money, I think it enough.

Col. Birch. Sir, I think we cannot answer to God nor man the giving of Money, until there be a great reformation all over the nation, as to persons in trust and command. Not but that there are very worthy men in several places; but I am afraid, no where without being overpowered by such who are for the duke's interest: and for my part, I desire to speak plain, I cannot make any distinction between the duke's interest and the popish interest. If there be any body that can split that hair, I wish he would do the house that service; for I take it to be a material point, and fit to be agreed some way. And if it be so, sir, can we give money, as long as there are 11 to 7 in some places certainly known, and all in others, and in places of great importance too? Sir, I am very sensible that this session can never be successful, nor the nation happy, unless we come to have so fair an understanding with his majesty, as that we may freely give him Money; which seeing it cannot be done with any security to the king or his government, as long as the great affairs of this nation are thus influenced, that there may be no just cause of having any imputation lie at our door, I agree in the motions that have been made for an Address.

Lord Russell. Sir, if ever there should happen in this nation any such change, as that I should not have liberty to live a protestant, I am resolved to die one; and therefore would not willingly have the hands of our enemies strengthened, as I suppose they would be, if we should give Money while we are sure it must go to the hands of the duke's creatures. Doth not the duke's interest endanger the king's life? And are not our lives and fortunes in danger to be swallowed up by his power? And shall we yet make them stronger by putting Money into their hands? No sir, they are too strong already; but whenever his maj. shall be pleased to free us of the danger of a Popish Successor, and remove, from his council and places of trust, all those that are for his interest, (because there can be no distinction made between the duke's interest and popish) then, sir, I will conclude, that what Money we shall give, will be disposed of according to his majesty's own royal pleasure, and for the true protestant interest. And I shall be ready to give all I have in the world, if his maj. should have occasion for it; but in the mean time I pray, sir, let us not endeavour to destroy ourselves by our own hands. If we may not be so happy as to better the condition of the nation, I pray, sir, let us not make it worse. And until the king shall be pleased to give us encouragement to express our duty and loyalty to him, by giving him Money, let us do it by making an Address.

Sir W. Temple. Sir, this debate hath more of weight in it, than the business of Tangier, I think. As affairs now stand, the most part of Christendom is concerned in it, I am sure all the protestants. And therefore I hope your patience will hold out, to have the whole circumstances of it fairly examined: For the arguments that have been offered in the consideration of this Message, have enlarged the debate farther than was at first intended, and have brought the whole State of the Nation in some measure before you, instead of that one particular business of Tangier; so that now what resolve you make will be a discovery of your inclinations, not only as to what you intend to do as to a Supply for Tangier, but as to giving Money for Alliances and all other occasions, upon which result, the good or bad success of this parliament doth depend. As to Tangier, I do agree with that worthy member that spoke before, that it is not of any great use to us upon the account of any advantage we shall make by it. But however, I think it is very well worth our keeping, because of the disadvantages we should receive by it, if it should fall into the hands either of the Turk, or Spaniard, but especially the French; who will not only be thereby enabled to fetter us, as to our trade in the Levant, but to curb also all other nations whatsoever, and be such an addition to the too great power he hath acquired, both by sea and land already, that I am of opinion, we ought to be very cautious how we weaken the security we now have that it shall not fall into his hands. But if the Mole and the Town could be blown into the air, or otherwise reduced into its first chaos, I think, considering the charge it will cost keeping, England would not be much the worse for it; but to move you to consider any thing about that, at this time, cannot be proper, because the Moors have so besieged it, that the first thing that must be done, whether in order to keep it, or destroy it, is, to beat them off, by some speedy supplies which must be presently sent, or else the town, according to the best information come from thence, is like to be lost. And, sir, I think this single consideration may be persuasive to move you to give some such Supply, as may be precisely necessary for the defence and protection of this place. A small sum of money, in comparison of what this house hath formerly given, may be sufficient to satisfy his majesty's expectation, and secure the place too. But I must confess, sir, it is not the consideration of Tangier that makes me press you to it; but the deplorable estate of the protestants abroad. Sir, I have had the honour to serve his maj. in some public employments, and by that means may be a little more sensible of the state of affairs in reference to our neighbours, than others may be, having not only had the advantage of information, but was under a necessity of using my best endeavours to get a true account of them. Sir, I am confident the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament; and not only the protestants abroad, but many Catholic countries, (who stand in fear of the power of France) do think themselves as much concerned in the success of this parliament, as this house, and will be as much perplexed to hear any ill news thereof. This, sir, as well as the necessities of our affairs at home, makes me trouble you at this time, to desire you to be careful what you do, that we may not occasion, in his maj. any dislike to this house. Whatever you do as to the business of Money for Tangier, I pray, sir, let there be no notice taken in your Address, of the lords having cast out your Bill; for we have no reason to think the king was any ways concerned therein. To throw out a Bill of so great importance, without a conference, was, in my humble opinion, very strange, and contrary to the usual proceedings of that house. But pray, sir, let it lie at their doors that did it, for the king could not be concerned in a parliamentary way. For by this means we may obviate all misunderstandings with his maj. about this affair, and I hope, create in him a good opinion of this house, upon which the welfare not only of this nation, but of Europe, doth much depend.—Sir, his maj. in his Message puts you in mind of giving Advice as well as Money. I think if we make that expression the ground of our Address, we may naturally graft very good things thereon, especially what may conduce to the preservation of a fair correspondence. Sir, though a king alone cannot save a kingdom, yet a king alone can do very much to ruin it: and though a parliament alone cannot save this kingdom, yet parliaments alone may do much to ruin it. And therefore we cannot be too circumspect in what we do. It is our fortune to sit here in a critical time, when not only the affairs of this nation, but the Protestant Religion abroad, need our continuance; and for the same reason we may justly fear, that there are those who endeavour to contrive the putting off this parliament. I pray, sir, let us not give them any advantage, and then I doubt not but his majesty's care and goodness will at last overcome all difficulties, and bring this session to a happy conclusion.

Mr. Edward Deering.] Sir, I think his majesty may easily send succour to Tangier without any great charge. Here are three or four regiments of soldiers about this town, which do rather hurt, than good to the nation; and therefore may very well be spared; and then that Money which pays them now here, may pay them there, and so I suppose there will be no need of money, save only for their transportation. I hope there will be great care taken in drawing this Address, that so our enemies may not have any ground to represent us as a stubborn parliament, that have no intention to give Money upon any terms whatsoever. I think, sir, we may be plain with his majesty, and give him as full assurance as ever any house of commons did, that when we have those things granted, which are unavoidably necessary for the preservation of our religion, that we will freely and heartily give money for the supply of his occasions; and I cannot but hope, that such fair proceedings will occasion a happy issue to this parliament. For it cannot be doubted, but that the king is very sensible, That he owes more to his people in general, than to any one man, be he brother, or any other relation; and that he cannot, without much trouble to himself, because of his coronation oath, longer permit that our laws and religion should be in such imminent danger. And therefore I hope that we shall not only have a fair correspondency continued, but also gracious compliance, in what we have desired for the effectual security of our religion, and therefore would desire you to put the question for a committee.

Resolved, "That a committee be appointed to draw up an Address to be presented to his majesty, upon the debate of the house, humbly representing to his majesty the dangerous State and Condition of the Kingdom, in answer to his majesty's Message."

Proceedings against the Earl of Halifax.] The same day, a debate arising in the house, on a motion for an Address to his majesty to remove George earl of Halifax from his maj.'s presence and councils for ever; and the question was put to adjourn the said debate, and passed in the Negative, Yeas, 95, Noes 219. After which the said Address was voted.

Nov. 20. This day, in the house of lords, the question being propounded, Whether there shall be a Committee appointed, in order to join with a committee of the commons, to debate matters concerning the State of the Kingdom? it was resolved in the affirmative.*

Articles of Impeachment against Edw. Seymour, Esq.] The same day, sir Gil. Gerrard acquainted the house, That he had Articles of Impeachment of High Crimes, Misdemeanours and Offences, against Edw. Seymour, esq. a Member, and Treasurer of the Navy; the contents of which were to the following effect:

I. "That whereas 584,978*l.* was appropriated by act of parliament for the building 30 Ships of War, and it was enacted that the Treasurer of the Navy should keep all Monies paid on that Account distinct and apart from all other monies, and should issue the same by warrant of the principal officers and commissioners of the Navy, to the said specified use, and to no other whatever: the said Edw. Seymour, being Treasurer of the Navy, contrary to his duty, had leant the sum of 90,000*l.* at 8 per cent. part of the sum above-mentioned, towards the support and continuance of the Army, after such time as by act of parliament the said Army ought to be disbanded; whereby the said two several Acts were eluded, and the said army was kept on foot, to the great disturbance, hazard, and danger of the peace and safety of this kingdom; and the nation was afterwards put to a new Charge of raising 200,000*l.* for the disbanding the said Army.

II. That whereas a Poll-Tax was granted to enable his majesty to enter into an actual War with France, and for the repayment of any such persons as should furnish his majesty with Money or Stores for that end: and whereas certain East-Land Merchants did supply great quantities of Naval Stores, on being assured that 40,000*l.* part of the Money raised by the said Act, was at that time actually in the hands of the said Edw. Seymour, which he likewise acknowledged, and did promise to pay the said Merchants in part of satisfaction for the said Stores; he the said Edward Seymour did issue out the said sum to the victuallers of the navy by way of advance for provisions not brought in, contrary to the meaning of the said Act, and of which the said merchants did complain in parliament. III. That the said Edw. Seymour being Treasurer of the Navy, and then, and still having a salary of 3000*l.* per ann. clear for the same, during the time he was Speaker for the late Long Parliament, did receive out of the Monies appointed for Secret Service the yearly sum of 9000*l.* over and above the said salary, which was constantly paid to him, as well during the intervals, as the sessions of parliaments; and particularly during the prorogation of 15 months. IV. That during the Dutch War, the said Edw. Seymour being one of the Commissioners of Prizes, did frau-dulently and unlawfully unlade a Prize-Ship, without order or authority, and did house the lading of the said ship, and lock up; and afterwards, without the presence of any store-keepers, did sell the same for Muscovado Sugars, and did account with his majesty for the same as such; when, in truth, the said ship was laden with cochineal, indigo, and other merchandizes of a great value."

Ordered, "That sir Edw. Seymour have a Copy of the said Articles; and that he do put in his Answer on the 25th."

Address to remove the Earl of Halifax.] Nov. 22. Mr. Trenchard reported the Address to his majesty to remove the earl of Halifax,* when a motion was made to re-commit the said Address, but it passed in the negative, Yeas 101, Noes 213. After which, it was agreed to by the house, as follows:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, &c. being deeply sensible of the manifold dangers and mischiefs that have been occasioned to your kingdom by the Dissolution of the last parliament, and by the frequent Prorogations of the present parliament, whereby the Papists have been greatly encouraged to carry on their wicked and damnable conspiracies against your royal person and government, and the Protestant Religion now established amongst us, have had many opportunities to contrive false and malicious Plots against the lives and honours of several of your loyal Protestant subjects; and having just reason to believe, that the said Dissolution was promoted by the evil and wicked councils of George earl of Halifax, do, therefore, most humbly pray your majesty, for the taking away all occasion of distrust and jealousies between your majesty and us your loyal commons; and that we may with greater cheerfulness, proceed to perfect those matters now before us, which tend to the safety and honour of your sacred person and government, and the preservation of the true Protestant Religion, both to ourselves and our posterity, That you would be graciously pleased to remove the said George earl of Halifax from your presence and councils for ever."

The King's Answer.] To this Address, his majesty sent the following Answer:

"C. R. His majesty, having received the Address of this house, relating to the earl of Halifax, has thought fit to return this Answer: That he conceives the said Address to be liable to several exceptions: but, having a great desire to preserve all possible good understanding with this house, be chuses to decline to enter into particulars, to avoid all occasions of dispute. He, therefore, thinks fit to tell them, That he doth not find the grounds in the Address of this house to be sufficient to induce him to remove the earl of Halifax. But he answers them at the same time, that whenever the house shall, in a due and regular course, prove any crime either against the said earl, or any other person, who either now is, or hereafter shall be in his council, he will leave him or them to their own legal defence, without interposing to protect them."

* Created marquis of Halifax in 1682, and soon after made Lord Privy Seal, and upon king James's accession appointed Lord President of the Council; but upon refusing to consent to the Repeal of the Test, he was dismissed from all his employments. In the Convention-Parliament he was chosen Speaker of the house of lords, and was again made Lord Privy Seal by king William, but being attacked in parliament in 1689, he quitted that post, and died in 1695.

Debate on discharging a Middlesex Grand Jury.] Nov. 28. Lord Russell. 'There are some persons at the door, who can give you an account of the illegal proceedings of my lord chief justice Scroggs, in discharging the Grand Jury of Middlesex.'—Whereupon, several of the Grand Jury were called in, and some other persons, who gave an account of the carriage of that matter, as will be at large recited in the Articles against the lord chief justice Scroggs.

Sir Wm. Jones. Sir, the preservation of the government in general, as well as our particular safeties, have a dependance upon the matter that is now before you; in which there are so many miscarriages so complicated, as there ariseth some difficulty how to examine them. I cannot but observe, how the Proclamation is here again mentioned; by which you may conclude there lieth a great weight on the people's right to petition by means thereof; and that the best way to remove it is, to send out the advisers and contrivers of that Proclamation, in order to proceed against them according to their deserts. Without which, what you have done in asserting the right of petitioning, will remain with some doubt; and those that advised the proclaiming to the people, that it is seditious to petition the king, without that chastisement they deserve. And therefore I humbly conceive, you will do well to consider of it as soon as you can. It is not strange, that the Proclamation shall be made use of with country gentlemen, to get Abhorers to petitioning; seeing the Judges themselves have made use of it to that purpose: they should have known, that though a Proclamation might be of great use, to intimate the observation of a law; yet it had never been used instead of a law. But yet I do not admire so much at this, as I do at the Discharge of the Grand-Jury, before they had finished their presentments. It tends so much to the subversion of the established laws of this land, that I dare pronounce that all the laws you have already, and all that you can make, will signify nothing against any great man, unless you can remedy it for the future. I observe, there were two reasons why the Grand Jury were so extra-judicially discharged; one, because they would otherwise have presented the duke of York for a Papist; the other, because they presented a Petition to be delivered to the king, for the sitting of the parliament; which they said it was not their business to deliver. Though I cannot but observe, how, upon other occasions, they did receive petitions, and delivered them to the king; and all the difference was, that those petitions so delivered, were against sittings of parliaments. The truth is, I cannot much condemn them for it; for if they were guilty of such crimes as the witnesses have this day given you information of, I think they had no reason to further petitions for the sitting of a parliament. But, sir, this business will need a farther information; and therefore I humbly pray it may be referred to a committee.

Sir Henry Capel. This matter is of the greatest moment. We are under the security of parliaments for redressing our grievances, and another, out of parliament, that the law have its course, that the Judges obstruct not the law. I observe that these Judges are grown omnipotent. 'They have done those things which they should have left undone.' This is very fine, that Judges, who must be upon the Bench, must be dropped at Whitehall, before they come to Westminster-Hall; and I know what law we must have, if they take instructions from those that advised the Proclamation against Petitioning. See the consequence; is it not as much as to say, that the Judges know all the grievances of the country, and the Judges must redress them, and we sit here but for form-sake? All misdemeanors, and what is amiss in the nation, the Judges must rectify. This is such a presumption, that they must answer it. If this be done in Westminster-Hall, how dare grand juries in the country represent any thing that is amiss? Suppose there should be an indictment of murdering a man's father or brother, &c. and the Judges take upon them to discharge the jury; this stops all justice; and the consequence will be, men will murder us, and we kill them again. I move, therefore, that you will proceed to punish the offender in this great matter, and remedy the miscarriage for the time to come.

Sir F. Winnington. Sir, I think we are come to the old times again, when the Judges pretended they had a rule of government, as well as a rule of law; and that they have acted accordingly. If they did never read Magna Charta, I think they are not fit to be Judges; if they had read Magna Charta, and do thus so contrary, they deserve a severe chastisement. To discharge Grand-Juries, of purpose to disappoint them of making their presentments, is to deprive the subject of the greatest benefit and security the law hath provided for them. If the Judges, instead of acting by law, shall be acted by their own ambition; and endeavour to get promotions, rather by worshipping the rising sun, than by doing justice, this nation will soon be reduced to a miserable condition. Suppose that after the discharge of this Grand-Jury, some person had offered to present some murder, treason, or other capital crime, for want of the Grand-Jury there would have been a failure of justice. As faults committed by Judges are of more dangerous consequence than others to the public; so there do not want precedents of severer chastisements for them, than for others. I humbly move you, first, to pass a Vote upon this business, of discharging Grand-Juries; and then to appoint a Committee to examine the Miscarriages of the Judges in Westminster-Hall, and to report the same with all speed to you.

Col. Titus. Sir, as it hath been observed, that this business hath some reference to the Proclamation; so I believe, there is something of the Plot in it too. And therefore I think if this Plot does not go on, it will have the worst luck that ever Plot had; seeing the Judges, as well as most other persons in public places, have given it as much assistance as they could. But whereas some have spoken ill of these Judges, I desire to speak well of them in one thing: I am confident they have herein shewed themselves grateful to their benefactors; for I do believe, that some of them were preferred to their places of purpose, because they should do what they have done. Laws of themselves are but dead letters; unless you can secure the execution, as well of those you have already, as of those you are now making, we shall spend our time to little purpose.

Mr. Sacheverel. Sir, the business of this debate is a great instance of our sick and languishing condition. As our ships, forts, and castles, are for securing us from the danger of our enemies from abroad, so our laws from our enemies at home; and if committed to such persons as will turn their strength upon us, are equally dangerous. Sir, we all know how the government of Scotland hath been quite altered since his majesty's Restoration, by some laws made there; pray let us have a care that ours be not altered, by the corrupt proceedings of Judges, lest we be reduced to the same weak condition of defending ourselves against Popery and arbitrary government here, that they are there. If Judges can thus prevent the penalties of the law, by discharging Grand-Juries before they have made their presentments, and can make laws by their rules of court, the government may soon be subverted; and therefore it is high time for this house to speak with those gentlemen. In former times several Judges have been impeached, and hanged too, for less crimes than these; and the reason was because they had broke the king's oath as well as their own. If what hath been said of some of these Judges be fully proved, they shall not want my Vote to inflict on them the same chastisement. The truth is, sir, I know not how the ill consequences we justly fear from judges can be prevented, as long as they are made durante bene-placito, and have such dependencies as they have. But this must be a work of time: in order to remedy our present Grievances, let us pass a Vote upon this business of discharging Grand-Juries; and that it may be penned as the case deserves.

Mr. H. Sidney, sir; I would beg leave to observe to you, because I think it may be necessary to be considered by your committee what an opinion was giving not long since by some of these Judges about Printing; which was, that printing of news might be prohibited by law; and accordingly a Proclamation issued out. I will not take on me to censure the opinion as illegal, but leave it to your farther consideration. But I remember there was a consultation held by the Judges a little before; and they gave their opinion, that they knew not of any way to prevent printing by law; because the act for that purpose was expired. Upon which, some Judges were put out, and new ones put in; and then this other opinion was given. These things are worthy of a serious examination. For if Treasurers may raise money by shutting up the Exchequer, borrowing of the bankers, or retrenchments; and the judges make new laws by an ill construction, or an ill execution of old ones: I conclude, that parliaments will soon be found useless; and the liberty of the people an inconvenience to the government. And therefore, I think, sir, you have been well moved to endeavour to pass your censure on some of these illegal proceedings by a vote.

Mr. Powle. Sir, in the front of Magna Charta it is said, 'nulli negabimus, nulli differemus justitiam'; we will defer, or deny justice to no man: to this the king is sworn, and with this the Judges are entrusted by their oaths. I admire what they can say for themselves; if they have not read this law, they are not fit to sit upon the bench: and if they have, I had almost said, they deserve to lose their heads.—The state of this poor nation is to be deplored, that in almost all ages, the Judges, who ought to be preservers of the laws, have endeavoured to destroy them: and that to please a Court-Faction, they have by treachery attempted to break the bonds asunder of Magna Charta, the great treasury of our peace. It was no sooner passed, but a chief justice (Hubert de Burg) in that day, persuades the king he was not bound by it; because he was under age when it was passed. But this sort of insolence the next parliament resented, to the ruin of the pernicious Chief Justice. In the time of Rd. ii. an unthinking dissolute prince, there were Judges that did insinuate into the king, that the parliament were only his creatures, and depended on his will, and not on the fundamental constitutions of the land: which treacherous advice proved the ruin of the king, and for which all those evil instruments were brought to justice. In his late majesty's time, his misfortunes were occasioned chiefly by corruptions of the long robe; his Judges, by an extra-judicial opinion, gave the king power to raise Money, upon any extraordinary occasion, without parliament; and made the king judge of such occasions: charity prompts me to think they thought this a service to the king; but the sad consequences of it may convince all mankind, that every illegal act weakens the royal interest; and to endeavour to introduce absolute dominion in these realms, is the worst of treasons: because whilst it bears the face of friendship to the king, and designs to be for his service, it never fails of the contrary effect.—The two great pillars of the government, are Parliaments and Juries; it is this gives us the title of free-born Englishmen: for my notion of free Englishmen is this, that they are ruled by laws of their own making, and tried by men of the same condition with themselves. The two great and undoubted privileges of the people, have been lately invaded by the Judges that now sit in Westminster-Hall; they have espoused Proclamations against law; they have discountenanced and opposed several legal acts, that tended to the sitting of this house; they have grasped the legislative power into their own hands, as in that instance of printing; the parliament was considering that matter, but they in the interim made their private opinion to be law, to supersede the judgment of this house. They have discharged Grand-Juries, on purpose to quell their presentments, and shelter great criminals from justice; and when juries have presented their opinion for the sitting of this parliament, they have in disdain thrown them at their feet, and told them they would be no messengers to carry such Petitions; and yet in a few days after, have encouraged all that would spit their venom against the government: they have served an ignorant and arbitrary faction, and been the messengers of Abhorrences to the king.—What we have now to do, is to load them with shame, who bid defiance to the law: they are guilty of crimes against nature, against the king, against their knowledge, and against posterity. The whole frame of nature doth loudly and daily petition to God their Creator; and kings, like God, may be addressed to in like manner, by petition, not command. They likewise knew it was lawful to petition: ignorance can be no plea, and their knowledge aggravates their crimes; the children unborn are bound to curse such proceedings, for it was not Petitioning, but parliaments they abhorred. The atheist pleads against a God, not that he disbelieves a deity, but would have it so. Treasurer and Beiknap were Judges too; their learning gave them honour, but their villainies made their exit by a rope. The end of my motion therefore is, that we may address warmly to our prince against them: let us settle a Committee to enquire into their crimes, and not fail of doing justice upon them that have perverted it; let us purge the fountain, and the streams will issue pure.

Resolved, 1. "That the discharging of a Grand Jury by any Judge, before the end of the Term, Assizes, or Sessions, while matters are under their consideration, and not presented, is arbitrary, illegal, destructive to public justice, a manifest violation of his Oath, and is a means to subvert the fundamental laws of this kingdom. 2. That a Committee be appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-Hall, and report the same, with their opinion thereon, to this house."

Impeachment ordered against Lord Chief Justice North.] Nov. 24. Mr. Attorney-General being called in, and examined touching the manner of issuing forth the Proclamation, styled, 'A Proclamation against tumultuous Petitioning;' and giving account to the house, that sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, was advising and assisting at the said drawing and passing the said Proclamation: it occasioned a debate, which terminated in the following Resolution: "That the Evidence this day given to this house against sir Francis North, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, is sufficient ground for this house to proceed upon an Impeachment against him for high Crimes and Misdemeanors;" and the heads of an Impeachment were ordered to be prepared accordingly.

Nov. 26. The house resumed the Impeachment of Mr. Seymour. Resolved nem. con. "That there was matter sufficient to impeach the said Mr. Seymour, on every Article exhibited against him; and ordered, that a committee be appointed to prepare the said Impeachment."

Trial of the Earl of Stafford.] Nov. 30. The commons proceeded to the Trial of the earl of Stafford; of which the following is an Abstract: The Managers for the commons, among whom were the most considerable lawyers in the house, as serj. Maynard, sir Wm. Jones, Mr. Treby, &c. opened the cause with great copiousness and eloquence: 'They began with the Plot in general, and laid open the malice, wickedness and horror of so dreadful, bloody and hellish a design: they strenuously insisted on the express positive oaths of the witnesses, upon whom the credit of the Plot chiefly depended: they expatiated upon Coleman's Letters, and others, clearly proving the designs and activity of the writers: they pressed home the execrable murder of sir E. Godfrey, charged upon the Papists, as well by the oaths of self-acknowledged partners in the fact, as by a Letter sent from London to Tixall, intimating this very murder the 3rd day after it was committed: they fully displayed the Sham-Plots and Counter-Contrivances, whereby the Papists would have suborned the king's evidence, and turned all the guilt upon his majesty's most loyal subjects: they urged the firing the City, the burning the Navy, the calling in French Armies, Wild-Irish, Spanish-Pilgrims, &c. They recapitulated the several Trials of Ireland, Whitebread, Langhorn, &c. and alleged the Votes of both houses declaring the Plot. To corroborate all which, they repeated the cruelties of queen Mary, the French and Irish Massacres, the Powder-Plot, &c. and they anatomized the wicked principles and practices of murdering, lying, equivocating, forswearing, faith-breaking, &c. imputed to the Papists as held by them lawful and meritorious. In sum, nothing was omitted, or neglected through the whole process, but the least circumstance fully enforced and advanced, with such art and acuteness, as well answered to so great a cause, prosecuted by so high an authority, before so illustrious judges, and so august an assembly.—Some Witnesses were first produced to prove the reality, or at least the probability, of the Plot in general; but chiefly three appeared against the lord in particular, namely, Dugdale, Oates, and Turberville, the last said to be both a profligate and an indigent person. 1. Dugdale swore, 'That at a certain Meeting held at Tixall in Staffordshire, about the end of Aug. or beginning of Sept. 1678, the lord Stafford, with lord Aston and others, did, in the presence of the witness, give his full consent to take away the king's life, and introduce the Popish Religion. That on the 10th or 21st of Sept. this lord sent for the witness to his chamber, while he was dressing; and turning his servants out, offered him 500*l.* for his charges and encouragement, to take away the king's life; and further told him, he should have free pardon of all his sins, and beainted; for the king had been excommunicated, and was likewise a traitor and a rebel, and an enemy to Jesus Christ.' 2. Oates swore, 'That in 1677, both in Spain, and at St. Omers, he saw several letters, signed Stafford, wherein his ldp. assured the Jesuits of his fidelity and zeal in promoting the Catholic Cause. That in 1678, being in London, his ldp. came to the chamber of father Fenwick, since executed, and there in his presence received a Commission from him, to be Pay-Master-General to the army: whereupon his ldp. said, he must of necessity go down into the country to take account how affairs stood there; and did not doubt but at his return, Grove should do the business. And, speaking of the king, he further added, He hath deceived us a great while, and we can bear no longer.' 3. Turberville gave an account, of disobliging his friends by leaving his friar's habit at Doway; and thereupon went into France, in 1675, where at Paris getting acquaintance with his ldp. he proposed to the witness a way, both to retrieve his credit with his friends, and make himself happy; and this was by taking away the life of the king, who was a heretic, and a rebel against God Almighty. That when he took leave of him, his ldp. appointed to meet him at London; but he soon after returned into France, not being willing to undertake the proposals, and was discountenanced by his friends, and reduced to poverty.—The accused lord in his Defence, alleged many things to invalidate the credit of the Plot, and particularly the Reputation of these three witnesses.—It would be too long to mention all the particulars of this Trial, which lasted a whole week, and in which great skill and dexterity was used by the managers to support the credit and reputation of the witnesses, among whom they believed there was no contrivance or confederacy. They argued, 'That they had made it plain and apparent in the beginning of the Trial, by the testimony of six witnesses, by the Declarations of both houses, by Coleman's Letters, by the Trial and conviction of other traitors, that there was a general design amongst the Papists, to introduce their religion, by raising of armies, murdering the king, and subverting the government. And as to his lordship's particular case, they had three witnesses, which sufficiently proved him guilty; and so expatiated upon the danger of Popish principles, &c. Sir William Jones exerted his skill and eloquence in a long speech, as much to prove the reality of the Plot, as the guilt of the prisoner; and thus especially argued: 'So that I think now none remain that do pretend not to believe it, but two sorts of persons; the one, those that were conspirators in it; and the other, those that wished it had succeeded, and do desire it may so still.' And by way of conclusion he said, 'The Evidence is so strong that I think it admits of no doubt; and the offences proved against my lord and the rest of his party are so foul, that they need no aggravation. The offences are against the king, against his sacred life, against the Protestant religion, nay against all Protestants. It is a design that appears with so dreadful a countenance to your lordships, to this great assembly, and to the whole nation, that it needs not any words I can use to make you apprehend. His lordship made two several pathetic speeches, besides his Answers to the witnesses, and in conclusion declared, in the presence of God, of his Angels, of their lordships, and all who heard him, that he was intirely innocent of what was laid to his charge; that he left it to their lordships to do justice, and with all submission resigned himself to them.

Dec. 6. The lords, by Message, acquainted the house, that they had appointed the next day to give judgment on lord Stafford; on which the house resolved nem. con. "That this house will then go, together with their Speaker, to the bar of the house of lords, to demand Judgment against the said lord."

Dec. 7. The commons resolved, "That the Managers of the Impeachment against the lord Stafford be empowered, in case the lords should, immediately after the fact found, proceed to Judgment, to insist upon it, that it is not parliamentary for their lordships to give judgment, until it be first demanded by this house."—Mr. Speaker then left the chair, and the committee of the commons were present at the court in Westminster-hall, when the peers found the said lord Guilty of High Treason. When the Lord Chancellor, now Lord High Steward, collecting the Votes, which were 55 guilty, 31 not guilty; the said High Steward pronounced lord Stafford guilty of High Treason, who replied, 'God's holy name be praised!' And then being asked, what he could say for himself, why Judgment of Death should not pass upon him, according to law? he added, 'My lord, I have very little to say; I confess I am surprized at it, for I did not expect it. But God's will be done; I will not murmur at it.

God forgive those who have falsely sworn against me!'

After which, the commons, with Mr. Speaker and the mace, went up to the bar of the house of lords, and, by Mr. Speaker, in the name of the commons in parliament, and of all the commons of England, demanded Judgment of High Treason.—The house then returned, and the lords by Message signified, that they were going presently to give the said Judgment.

The managing committee then went into Westminster-hall, and were present when the lords gave Judgment, &c.—At which time, the Lord High Steward made the following Speech, "That which remains now to be done, is very sad on my part; I have never given Sentence on any man, and I am very sorry I must begin with your lordship, a person of your quality and fortune, descended of noble ancestors, a great sufferer in the late times, obliged to the government for the moderation you had in the exercise of your religion; obliged to the king's father, and so much to this king: yet you have gone about not only to consult his death, but even the destroying of three whole nations, both of body and soul, as far as in you lay; of which you stand impeached by the commons, and have been found Guilty by the lords. There have been many and great conspiracies against the life of the king for the destroying of the government; and they have been carried on by consults, letters, and otherways; by the burning of London, and the death of sir E. Godfrey, the Plot hath been carried on abroad, at White-hall, and London, and your ldp. hath been concerned in them all, with a mixture of malice: You have called the king 'heretic,' and said, 'he was an enemy to God Almighty;' here the proverb is verified, 'Curse not the king, though in the inward chamber, for the birds of the air will reveal it.' It hath pleased God to leave you to yourself, and you have digged a pit, and fallen into it yourself. God never leaves any man until they leave themselves; think not still well of your religion, and let not blind guides mislead you; true repentance is never too late, and be not persuaded not to confess that sin in public, which you possibly have been absolved of in private: for whatsoever value you set on the prayers of them you call Heretics, yet I am sure, that both they that cleared you, and those that condemned you, are sorry for your condition. I will pray for your ldp.; and this is the last time I must call you my lord." And so he pronounced Sentence of Death against him, according to the usual form in case of High Treason.*

* Many writers, and in particular Mr. Worth and sir John Reresby, are of opinion, that this nobleman was selected by the commons to bear the sins of the whole five, on the presumption that he was least capable of defending himself, and that his very spirits, as well as his parts, would fail him, under the weight of such a prosecution. He was old and infirm, Sir Rob. Peyton expelled.] Dec. 14. It appearing to the house by the Report made at the bar, and by the Confession of sir Rob. Peyton (a Member) in his place, that the said sir Robert had negotiated with the duke of York, by the means of the earl of Peterborough, Mrs. Cellier, and Mr. Godfrey, at such time when they were turning the Popish Plot upon the protestants." Ordered, "That Sir Rob. Peyton be expelled the house, and that he be brought to the bar, and do receive the Censure of the house upon his knees." But not being to be found, the house afterwards ordered him to be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms.

Dec. 15. Sir Rob. Peyton appeared at the bar upon his knees, to receive the Sentence of Expulsion.

The Speaker. Sir Robert Peyton: It is a long time that you have had reputation in the world, and that you have served as knight of the shire for the county of Middlesex. Two parliaments, the last and this, your county made a free election of you; your county had a great opinion of you; and now you are in that condition, that you have appeared to the world the man you really were not. You have made a show, and have acted a part against Popery and arbitrary power, yet really and inwardly you have sought your own advantage, and not that of your country. It is manifest, by the report from the committee, and your own defence makes it clear. Many gentlemen here, whose eyes are in their heads, their tongues and eyes have moved as well as yours. You have sat betwixt the Devil and the Witch, Mr. Gadbury and Mrs. Cellier. The dark ways you have taken show your ill designs; your company and conductors show your errand. You are fallen from being an angel to be a devil. From the beginning, you sought your own interest. To set up a common-wealth, you had '90,000 men' to make your interest the stronger. You were bustling, like the wind, in this house, and in coffee-houses. Your county chose you to this place, not only for your interest, but for an example to other men, not with noise and thundering, but to behave yourself without vanity or ostentation. You are one of them that have played your own game and part; and that all men may take notice, you are a warning for all other members, and I hope there are none such. It shows that this parliament nauseates such members as you are. You are no longer a part of this noble body. How you will reconcile yourself to your country, is another consideration. You had been under confinement for above ten years; was turbulent by nature; had the popular tide against him; had the ablest and most zealous members of the house of commons for his prosecutors; a large and considerable body of his judges, the peers, were on the same side; and his majesty, though he pitied the victim, had not resolution enough to prevent the sacrifice." Ralph.

are discharged this house, and the custody of the serjeant, paying your fees*.

The King's Speech to both Houses on Alliance, and the State of Christendom.] This day his majesty made the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; At the opening of this parliament I did acquaint you with the Alliances I had made with Spain and Holland, as the best measures that could be taken for the safety of England, and the repose of christendom. But I told you withal, that if your friendship became unsafe to trust to, it would not be wondered at, if our neighbours should begin to take new resolutions, and perhaps such as might be fatal to us. I must now tell you, that our allies cannot but see how little has been done since this meeting, to encourage their dependance upon us. And I find by them that unless we can be so united at home, as to make our Alliance valuable to them, it will not be possible to hinder them from seeking some other refuge; and making such new friendships as will not be consistent with our safety. Consider that a neglect of this opportunity is never to be repaired.—I did likewise lay the matter plainly before you, touching the estate and condition of Tangier. I must now tell you again, that, if that place be thought worth the keeping, you must take such consideration of it, that it may be speedily supplied; it being impossible for me to preserve it, at an expence so far above my power.—I did promise you the fullest satisfaction your hearts could wish, for the security of the protestant religion; and to concur with you in any Remedies, which might consist with preserving the succession of the crown in its due and legal course of descent. I do again with the same reservations, renew the same promises to you; and being thus ready, on my part, to do all that can reasonably be expected from me; I should be glad to know from you, as soon as may be, how far I shall be assisted by you; and what it is you desire from me."

Resolved, "That this house will on Saturday next take into consideration his majesty's most gracious Speech."

Debate on Popery.] The house then resolv-

* Grey, "The Speaker performed his office in such coarse terms, and thereby so highly exasperated him, that the session was no sooner over, than he challenged him; but, instead of answering it, Mr. Williams, with more propriety than gallantry, made his complaint to the privy-council, and Sir Robert was, in consequence thereof, again committed to the Tower." Ralph.

Sir Robert took care to have the most offensive part of this Speech printed, under the following Title, "A Specimen of the rhetoric, candour, gravity, and ingenuity, of William Williams, Speaker to the late house of commons, at Westminster, in his Speech to sir Robert Peyton, when he expelled him that house."

ed into a grand committee, how to secure the kingdom against Popery and Arbitrary Government. Mr. Powle in the chair.

Lord Cavendish. Sir, when I consider the immunities and advantages we enjoy by the excellent composure of our government both in Church and State: how the king, as sovereign, enjoys all the prerogative that can be necessary to make him either great or happy; and the people all the liberty and privilege that can be pretended for their encouragement to be industrious, and for securing to themselves and posterities the enjoyment of what they get by their industry; how the doctrine of the church is void of idolatrous, superstitious opinions; and the government of tyranny, or absolute dominion: I cannot but admire that there should be any body amongst ourselves, that should aim at any alteration, and be the occasion of this day's debate. But, sir, it is too evident that such there are; and that they have made a great advance to effect their design, by many contrivances which they have pursued for a long course of years, according to the results and consultations held by Jesuits for that purpose: but above all, by converting to their religion James duke of York; the presumptive heir of the crown; and by engaging him to espouse their interest with that zeal and fervency, which usually attends new converts: especially when so great a glory is proposed, as the rooting a pestilent heresy out of three nations; and the saving of so many souls as would depend thereon. The sad effect of this conversion we have felt for many years, it having had the same operations in our body politic, as some sorts of lingering poison hath in bodies natural; made us sick and consumptive, by infecting and corrupting all the food and physic which hath been applied in order to preserve us from popery and slavery, worse than death itself. From this fatal act, the declination of the grandeur of this monarchy may be dated; and to the consequences thereof, its absolute ruin (if not timely prevented) will be hereafter attributed. This being our case, I could not but admire to see this house so long coming to consider this weighty point: insomuch, that, I began to persuade myself, that either our dangers were not so great as our discourses, upon some other occasions, had represented them, or that we were not in good earnest to endeavour any redress. It is true, when we consider what ill fortune we have had with our Bill, lately sent up to the lords, in having it thrown out in such a heat, without so much as a conference, (though whenever they shall consider of it in cool blood, they will find there can be no other way to secure the Protestant Religion) we may with some reason be discouraged. But I hope, sir, that, seeing our country have thought us worthy to be their representatives, we shall not be so easily daunted in what so nearly concerns them: but be as indefatigable in finding out ways for our preservation, as our enemies are to find out means for our destruction; hoping we shall not meet always so bad success in the house of lords: for though the too much kindness of some men, who pretended to be for the Bill, but underhand made a party against it, did this time operate as fatally, as enmity disguised in friendship useth to do; yet I hope that on another occasion we may have better success; not doubting but a great many lords, when they are persuaded that they shall not be able to find out any other way (as I hear they begin to despair they shall) to secure the Protestant Religion, that they will join with us in the same, or some other Bill to the same purpose: especially my good lords the bishops, who cannot be presumed to have made peace with Rome, but to be ready to die for the Protestant Religion; and therefore, doubtless, will not long stick at joining in a Bill to save it. But seeing that, according to the course of parliaments, we are not like to bring this to a trial for a long time, I am of opinion, we had best try something else; and although I know not what other act can be made to serve instead of that, but will either prove too weak, or too strong: yet seeing we are put upon it, we must try, that so we may not be represented as stubborn. And therefore I humbly move you, That a Bill may be brought in for the association of all his majesty's protestant subjects.

Mr. Ralph Montagu. Sir, great things are expected from this day's debate; and we could not well have entered into it sooner; it now comes more seasonable than it would have done before, because of the opportunities we have had to feel the pulse of affairs since the beginning of the session; and the time we have spent in asserting the Right of Petitioning, by which the essence of parliaments, and the foundation of the people's Liberties were struck at. And the Trial of my lords Stafford, and the Disinheriting-Bill could not possibly have been avoided. And as our labour hath not been lost in all, so I hope that at last we shall have some benefit of that spent about the Succession-Bill. For, as it was said at the passing of the Bill, that there were a loyal party that would never acquiesce in it; so I do believe, there is a true Protestant party that will never acquiesce in any thing less, than what may be sufficient for the security of their Religion; which, I am apt to believe, will end in that Bill. But in the mean time, that we may shew that we are not humorists, let us try what strength we can muster up to oppose these great enemies by some other laws; as when a house is on fire, we make use of buckets and tubs for casting of water, until the great engines can be got. But I would move you to be cautious what you do; for I am afraid that the design of putting you upon finding out expedients, is it not in order to have any thing done that may be effectual against Popery; but in order to have you offer at something that may purchase a disrepute on the house, and give your enemies an advantage to pursue their designs of breaking us, by alleging that you aim at laws that will overturn the government. For my part, I am fully persuaded, that this is the design of those that have put the king so often to declare against altering the Succession, and to recommend other ways; and that, offer at what you will, if it be any thing that is like to prove strong enough to secure us against popery, you will see the house put off before it comes to any perfection; and that in time it will be made use of to arraign the proceedings of parliament, and to persuade the people, that this house did attempt to alter the government by such and such bills; and so by degrees possess the people, that parliaments are either dangerous, or inconsistent with the government, that, if possible, they may be well content to be without them. Sir, I am afraid that the Popish Party are more serious in this design than we are aware of; and that, next to the great endeavours they have used for many years to keep up our divisions in points of Religion; the next great artifice which they depend on is, the infusing into the people the dislike of parliaments; for they well know, that Popery can never be established in this nation, as long as parliaments are permitted to sit and act. Therefore, though I know it is below a house of commons to mind every little discourse; yet I think, if we conclude, that this powerful party, amongst their many designs, have this for one, that we ought to counterminimize it as much as we can. We cannot well comprehend what a Bill of Association will be before it be drawn up, nor what difficulties may be found in the contriving of it; and therefore I think no great debate will be necessary about it, before such a Bill be brought in. And I believe it will be found more likely to be serviceable, in case the Papists be banished; and therefore I conceive, a Bill for banishment of all the considerable Papists out of England, may be very necessary: and if at the same time that we endeavour to secure ourselves against popery, we do not also do something to prevent arbitrary power, it will be to little purpose; for the one will be sure to have a hand to bring in the other; and I think nothing can prevent that, or rather both, better than frequent parliaments. And therefore I humbly move you, that a Bill for securing frequent Parliaments may be taken into your consideration.

Sir G. Hungerford. Sir, I think you are well advised, that the way to secure ourselves effectually against Popery, is to secure ourselves also against arbitrary government; and that the having of frequent parliaments is the best way to secure both; and therefore I think you may do well to move the house, that a Committee be appointed to inspect what old laws there are, for enforcing the sitting of frequent parliaments; that if they should be found deficient, some new laws may be made for that purpose. I do agree, that a Bill for banishing out of England the most considerable Papists, may do well; but I hope, sir, that if you banish the men, you will banish some women too; for I do believe, that some of that sex have been great instruments in bringing about our ruin. And if in time you will consider, how to prevent the royal family's marrying Popish women, it would be of great security for hereafter. For I am of opinion, that the late queen mother's zeal for her religion, was not only a great occasion (amongst many others) of the miseries that befel us in 41; but the great cause of all our miseries now, by perverting the duke from his religion, as is reported; and may reasonably be believed, if we conclude, that she had that motherly care for the salvation of her children, as other mothers usually have; for, according to her opinion, it was not to be obtained out of the pale of that Church: and no man can doubt, but that the Protestant interest hath been much prejudiced, by his majesty's marrying a princess of that religion: for we have plainly seen, since the discovery of the Plot, how some of the most material Jesuits, and Popish instruments, have sheltered themselves under her royal protection; and how they have helped to carry on the Plot, being so impudent, as to pretend they had her patronage, and by abusing her authority; but more especially by the duke's marrying the princess of Modena; because of her near relation to the Popes and Cardinals. All which was plainly foreseen by that parliament which met a little before that marriage in 1673, and therefore they made an Address to his majesty, representing the said ill consequences; desiring him not to permit it, because it would tend to the destruction of the Protestant Religion. But their endeavours were defeated by that party, as we may guess, seeing we find so much use of her name in Coleman's Letters; for well might they who have over-ruled in so many great affairs, as hath been instanced in this house, have an influence also in this, that so that party might not want so useful an instrument in so great a station; and so the parliament's Address miscarried; but that they had either a good judgment, or prophetic spirit, I hope will never miscarry, but remain upon record. And unless you believe, that these ladies are less compassionate than others usually are, how can it be otherwise, their principles considered? But, sir, I will not trouble you farther about it; but suppose it may be worth your consideration in due time. In the interim, I agree for the Bill of Banishment and Association too.

Mr. Wm. Harbord. Sir, it is not to be doubted, but that Popery and arbitrary government are so near of kin, that they cannot be separated; and therefore, if we destroy the one, we need not fear the destruction of the other. Before our late miserable wars, Popery was more in masquerade; and arbitrary power, the Loans, Monopolies, and Ship-money, more invisible; now Popery is more visible, except in the business of the Exchequer, which amounting to above one million of money, we may not admire we have not heard of more great things of that kind, since especially; being we know how averse the king is to hearken to such advice; but our fears of Popery are the stronger, because of the Popish Successor; and therefore I cannot but commend the policy of those who are tender in using arbitrary proceedings at this time, lest the fears and jealousies that might arise from both together should prove intolerable.—I must confess, sir, I am at a great loss what to offer to your consideration in this matter; for our danger is not only from the strength of the Popish party, but from the weakness of the Protestants by reason of the animosities which they sow amongst us, not only in points of religion, but of interest too. For of late they have not been content with carrying on the design of dividing the Churchmen and Fanatics, but of arraigning the last parliament as omnipotent and dangerous, for going about to disinherit the duke. They endeavour to divide the people in their opinions as to parliaments, and to render them incompatible with the government, that, so, if possible, they may keep the Protestant interest divided, and work them to destroy themselves, by engaging party against party, in hopes at last to have but one party to deal with, and to have an opportunity of gaining the weakest to their side by assurances of liberty of conscience, or otherways, which must certainly be the consequence of such a contest. And although I am very unwilling to detract from the merits of our churchmen, for whom I have a great veneration; yet I cannot but observe, how that ever since the Trial of Wakeman was over, but more about the time of the Presbyterian Plot, they preached up (especially in public assemblies) the danger of fanatics to be more than of Papists; and to disinherit the duke was against the law of God. Which said opinions, if they should be imbibed by the people, what will your Association-Bill signify, or any other law you can make against Popery? Sir, I do not mention these things to you without a great deal of regret; for I am well known to be a true friend of the church, and have (when I was thought worthy to be in commission) expressed myself a severe enemy to fanaticism. But however, I cannot but observe this strange contradiction, of pretending to keep out Popery, and yet at the same time to endeavour to divide the Protestant Interest, and to reserve a right to make a Papist king. I must confess, I am more distracted from the ill consequences I fear from such contrivances as these, than from the strength of the Papists themselves. They will certainly go on with their interest, as long as they are secure of such auxiliaries. These things must be considered in the drawing your Bill, that so the remedy you propose may be proportionable to your disease. For an Act of Association may be several ways evaded by such opinions as these, if they should grow amongst the people; and it will be an irreparable blow to the Protestant Interest to accept of such an expedient, if it should prove ineffectual. And therefore it ought to be so drawn, as may provide for all the contrivances of that party: for, sir, I cannot imagine that ever Popery will attempt to come into this nation bare-faced, but do expect that the design will always be carried on, as hitherto, under some disguise, either by a Toleration in favour of tender consciences, or in the name of churchmen, or a loyal party, for the defence of the church or government, to which some Presbyterian Plot would much conduce, and be an excellent pretence for raising of an Army, and apprehending or disarming of such persons as are most likely to oppose that interest. Unless you can change the interest at court, and remove these counsellors that are so much for the duke, I think you may justly fear all these stratagems, and that it will be impossible to contrive any Association-Bill that can provide against them. And therefore, that we may not spend our time in vain, I would humbly move you, sir, to go on with the Bill of Banishment, which is most likely to do you some service.

Col. Birch. Sir, I retain a good opinion of an Association-Bill, notwithstanding what hath been said, as to the weakness it may receive from our unhappy divisions in points of religion and interest, too much promoted by some of our clergy. For, sir, when I consider how the Laudean principles, as to raising of Money without parliaments in the late times, infected most of our clergy, so as that they not only preached up the king's absolute authority over men's properties, but branded with the title of rebels, and condemned to hell those that offered to argue against it: I do conclude, that it is usual for one or two bishops to give measures or directions to the rest of the bishops, and they to the clergy of their several dioceses: and that therefore the clergy derive their politics generally from one or two bishops in some great station. Yet, sir, when I remember how, after some little time, many of the clergy fell off, and would not follow such instructions; and how the people soon excused themselves from following the advice in such politics, and would not freely pay illegal taxes, notwithstanding all their endeavours; I am apt to think, sir, that as the people were not long then misled, so as to submit to lose their property, so they will not now to any thing that shall tend to the losing of their religion and property both. They will soon discover what is their interest, and how true interest will not lye. I have often told you within these walls they will soon apprehend that Popery will bring in slavery, and reduce them not only to an idolatrous superstitious religion, but to wear wooden shoes like the French, and to eat herbs like the Spaniard, because they will soon know that they shall not be long masters of any thing they have: and however they may be persuaded for a while, I am confident they will at last consult how to save their bacon. They will discern that the clergy may be good divines, but not so good politicians; and that there may be some difference in point of interest between them and the clergy, because clergymen may be in a possibility of being advanced by popery if they submit; but the laity under a probability of losing all, notwithstanding all submissions. Sir, I do not trouble you with this discourse out of a fear that our clergy will not shew themselves good Protestants; for I have that veneration for them, and opinion of them, as to believe that many of the bishops and clergy too would as soon die for the Protestant Religion as many persons in the nation. But I am jealous that there is some over-awing power got in amongst them, something answerable to that of a Popish Successor in the state; by whose means those Bills were so easily passed in the late Long Parliament, under a pretence that they were for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, which the commons then found, and any person that will now peruse them may find, would infallibly have brought in popery: and how, since the Plot, the danger of fanatics is cried up more than that of the Papists; and how tender they are in the point of a Popish Successor, or joining in any thing that is against him. But though these things make me jealous there is somebody that misleads them now in matters relating to Popery, as formerly in things relating to Property; yet I am of opinion that they will ere long see, that to stand up for the Interest of a Popish Successor, to have a Popish King, to weaken the Protestant interest, and speak ill of parliaments, is not the right way to preserve the Protestant Religion; but a plain contradiction, and an invention of Jesuits. And therefore, sir, I am for going on with the Association Bill.

Sir Wm. Hickman. Sir, I think you have been well moved, as well for the Association Bill as the Banishing-Bill. By the one, you will send your enemies out of the country; by the other be in a good condition to keep them out, which may go a great way to secure us.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I would banish all the Papists, lest they be like the court, in the Long Parliament; when they had taken off one active man from the interest of his country, another as considerable did start up. They take all the care to get the Protestant Papists into the administration of the government; they are encouraged, and true Protestants turned out. Next to Papists, I would consider to put out those popishly affected. When they are banished, next you may take into consideration how their estates shall be disposed of, and how to breed their children, and that the next heir be a Protestant. I would have a Bill to banish all considerable Papists, excepting no one man in England whatsoever.

Sir Nich. Carew. Sir, I am not against any of these Bills, because they may be all convenient for the present occasion; but if any man think that these Bills will do without the Succession Bill, I believe they will find themselves mistaken, for these Bills will signify nothing, unless you can remove your Popish Successor, and your Popish interest. These bills will not reach your Papists in masquerade, who will certainly continue as long as there is a Popish Successor, and make your Banishing-Bill, and Association-Bill too, as ineffectual as white paper. Let such as I could name to you have the command of the sea-ports, (as I suppose they will without my naming them) and in the lieutenantancy, and commission of the peace, and when the present heat is over, let the Papists come back when they will, they will have no cause to doubt having a kind reception. For you must not expect to have plain rustic country gentlemen in such commands, but well bred courtiers, and some good, easy, credulous gentlemen that will soon be persuaded there is no danger in Popery; and then of what use will your banishing or Association-Bill be? As long as the duke hath so many friends at court, (between whose interest and Popery I cannot hear there is any distinction) I think no laws that we can make against Popery will do us any good, because all the laws we have already have done us none. For the same arts and power that have hitherto defeated all your other laws, will also defeat what you are now about. And therefore, sir, I am of opinion we are not now acting like the true physicians of the nation, but like mountebanks. For the most we shall be able to do this way, is to patch and plaister up our sores, and have them hereafter break out incurable upon us. But if you are resolved to go on with these bills that have been proposed, I will not offer to oppose the sense of the committee, but would move you, (that we may not forget, or lose in the croud, that which at last, I believe, must be pursued, if ever you will do any thing for your religion) that in the first place you pass a vote, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that as long as the Papists have any hopes of the duke of York's succeeding the king, the King's Person, the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of the People, are in apparent danger.

Col. Titus. Sir, I have read that a great minister of state of Spain, gave this short advice to a friend of his that was coming ambassador into England; that he should not always aim at the best. I think it may be convenient for us to follow that advice; for if we should not have something for our security, before we get the best, I am afraid it may happen to us, as it did to a man whose house was beset with thieves; he was so long arming his servants, and appointing them their distinct quarters, that the thieves broke in, and caught them all unprovided. I pray God it may not be our case; though I am very sensible that none of these Bills can effectually do our business; for nothing can secure us against this party, but being free of their principles as well as of their persons; which I conclude will always remain in some persons amongst us, notwithstanding your banishing of Papists, as long as there is a Popish Successor. For I remember what a great man of Swedeland told me, that all laws they could make had never any effect against them, until they not only banished them out of their country, but secured the government in the hand of princes of their own religion ; and I am afraid, that nothing less than the same way will ever do our business here. For it is not so much the number of Papists, as their principles, and the danger of their getting the government into their hands, which we know they have been long aiming at, that may justly be feared, in which I am persuaded they will be so restless, as that we shall never be secure against them, unless we can banish their principles from court, as well as the people out of the country.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Sir, what my good friend that spoke last hath said, that we should get something, and not lose all, by aiming so earnestly at the best, is very well, if we were like to get any thing instead of it, that shall have the appearance of being serviceable in this case : but I have seen old parliament-men mistaken sometimes, and I am afraid that he will sooner see this parliament dissolved, than any thing granted that shall be material against Popery. And that the mentioning of these Bills shall afterwards arise in judgment against you ; however, I think we must adventure. What this Association-Bill may be, I cannot tell, until it be drawn ; but I see no opposition made to any of those Bills that have been proposed ; and I believe there is much business yet behind for this day, and that you will do well to husband your time, and put this business out of your hands, by putting the questions.

Sir Rd. Temple. Sir, you have been very well moved for the bringing in of such Bills as may tend as much to the security of the Protestant Religion, as any that can be offered. That of Banishment will certainly go a great way to destroy, not only their power, but their interest and principles too, and be a great disheartening to their party abroad. That interest will not then have so many engines to work with here, as now they have. And the Bill of Association will be necessary, that we may have a law to defend ourselves.

Resolved, " That it is the opinion of this Committee, that one means to suppress Popery is, that the house be moved that a Bill be brought in immediately, to banish all the considerable Papists out of the kingdom."

Mr. Ralph Montagu. Sir, by offering at the Exclusion Bill, we may conclude we have offended the duke ; by this Bill for Banishment, all the rest of the considerable Papists in England. As we have made many enemies, so it will be convenient, that we should endeavour to get some law to defend ourselves against their implacable designs. For which a Bill for an Association of all his majesty's Protestant Subjects may do well ; and therefore I pray that we may move the house to have it brought in.

Mr. Garroway. Sir, as we are sick of complicated diseases, though all have their original from one cause, seeing we cannot be permitted to cure that cause, we must think of many remedies to cure the many evils that sprout from

it. The Banishing of the Papists alone will not do it : and I am not willing to pass any judgment on the Association-Bill before I see it. But, sir, what fruit can you expect from your laws, unless you can secure good Judges in Westminster hall, and good men in commission in all other places ? Is there at this time a judge, a deputy-lieut. or a justice of peace in commission, that you can expect shall act against the duke ? Or if any such be in, are they for more than a colour ? Are they not over-powered by such as are for the duke's interest ? If this do not make all your laws invalid, by not executing them ; is there not an Army of about 10,000 men under the name of Guards ? And may not more be raised ? And what then will your laws signify ? Have we not already had some experience of this, when the Toleration came out in 1672, when there was that Army at Black-Heath, and Clifford had the management of the great affairs of state ? If the king had not then hearkened to the advice of his parliament, what would all the laws that were then in force against Papists have signified ? And may you not see the same again, if you do not take some care to prevent it ? What great difference between Clifford and some of our present great ministers, only that he had that weakness to declare himself to be a Papist, and these the discretion to keep the knowledge of their religion to themselves. But we see they manage things as much in favour of Popery, as ever Clifford did. Did not that Toleration, that Army, and that minister of state, repeal all your laws as effectually, as if they had never been made ? When I consider how the Triple-League was broke, after we had made laws for the keeping it, by giving near three millions ; how the Peace was made up at Nimeguen, after we had made an Act for an actual War with France, and given above a million for entering into it ; I will never believe that any law will be observed, make what you will, unless there be those about the king that may be for the keeping of it ; otherwise you shall have such judges, justices, deputy-lieutenants, and other commissioned officers, as will repeal your laws at pleasure. And therefore I could wish you would consider well, how you possess those that sent you here, with an opinion that they may depend upon such laws as these. And at the same time, sir, that you are consulting the destruction of the Papists, I think you may do well to endeavour the preservation of the Protestants. Is this a time for the Church-men and Dissenters to quarrel ? It is like two men riding upon a road, a highway-man coming to rob them, instead of uniting to defend themselves, they quarrel and disarm one the other, and so were both robbed. I pray God, this do not prove at last our case. For as that project of the Papists hath, since Wakeman's Trial, had strange success in dividing us ; so no doubt but it will at last come to disarming us too ; and how that will facilitate their conquest, may be easily calculated ? Is this a time to weaken the Protestant Interest, by tearing us in pieces by the execution of acts made against Papists? That man who can believe, that that is the way to preserve the Protestant Religion, or Protestant Church, is it to believe that St. Dennis walked many miles with his head under his arm, or any other Popish miracle whatsoever. And therefore I think you will do well to hasten the Bill for uniting of the Protestant Dissenters, that we may bring into the Church as many of them as is possible, and not longer be so infatuated as to gratify the Papists in that particular, by losing their business in destroying one another; but prevent them if possible by union, which will tend more to prevent Popery than all the Bills that have been proposed.

Mr. Paul Foley*. Sir, I have read in scripture, 'What king going to make war against another, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty?' I take the denial of the Bill of Exclusion to be a plain demonstration, that the popish party should not be deprived of a right to govern us; and it is not to be doubted, that having that right, they will be sure to make use of all the power they can back it with. That we may be the better able to judge, whether we can fortify ourselves sufficiently against such a right, and the power that will naturally follow it, I pray, sir, let us follow our Saviour's advice, and consult, whether with ten thousand we can meet twenty thousand.—When I consider how the Triple League was broke, and now all Alliances and transactions relating to peace and war have been since managed in favour of the French interest, contrary to the true interest of England, and the pressing importunities of foreign nations, as well as our own, I think we cannot but conclude that the duke's interest, the French interest, and Popish interest, are all one. And that the duke's or Popish interest have some great dependance on the French king, for his assistance in the settling of popery here. And no man can doubt this, but he that will not believe Coleman's Letters, or that here was a peace made at Nimeguen, in order to put him in the better condition. If the Jesuits do manage all the affairs of Europe, as is said, it may be justly feared, that the French king will improve this argument so, as to get Flanders, if not Holland too, before he perform his promise of giving them the expected assistance; which, being it will conduce to the destroying of the protestants abroad, as well as here, we may justly fear the Jesuits will never obstruct.—Besides the dependance which the papists may have of assistance from this mighty monarch, in Ireland they are five to one for the protestants, and amount to many hundred thousands, full of bloody revenge, derived from their ancestors, wanting nothing but arms, (which they may have from France in a night) to be enabled to massacre all the protestants in Ireland, and to be ready to be transported hither. How the Plot hath been carried on there in order to it; how endeavours have been there used to stifle and counterplot it; who commands all the English coast opposite to Ireland, we know; and how our forts and castles are provided, the examination of the governor of Chepstow-castle may inform you.—And that they may not want a strength to compel us on every side, is not the government of Scotland quite altered, by some acts made within these few years? Is it not become very arbitrary, parliaments in a manner laid aside, and the power invested in a privy-council? And is there not a Standing Army of 92,000 men, settled by act of parliament, with a Declaration, that they shall be ready to come into England upon any occasion? And is not the duke now there, managing the government of that kingdom, and army too, by putting his own creatures into the council and into the command of the army, and using all other ways imaginable to improve his interest there.—And may we not conclude, that in England there may be 100,000 papists fighting men, and that Portsmouth, Plymouth, Sheerness, Tilbury-Fort, and Hull, and all other places of importance, shall, when that interest shall think it convenient, be in the hands of persons they may confide in, as well as the command of the militia and fleet.—And what now, sir, can any man say is wanting, to enable this party to make a great contest with us, but a popish king to head them? And does any thing stand in their way for that, but his majesty's life? And is it not strange, that though we see things never so plain, there is no remedy for poor protestants? Can it be imagined, that if this party should once have a king on their side, endowed with a valourous spirit, and vowing revenge, spurred on with a fiery zeal, to get not only three crowns on earth, but the crown of glory in heaven, by rooting a pestilent heresy out of three nations; that they will neglect so great an opportunity for the establishing of popery here? And will not the divisions they carry on amongst us, as to churchmen and fanatics, Plot or no Plot, be very useful to them; but especially their arraignments of parliaments, and all that speak against popery, as 41 men, and enemies to the government, occasion a great weakness on our side? I think, sir, all this put together makes a great strength for that party, enough to bring us into misery, whatever the issue may be. I would now, sir, give you some account how the protestants may be able in such a case to defend themselves; but I protest, sir, I know not what defence they will be able to make legally. It is true, sir, as long as our good king lives, we may live in quiet; but things being thus, are not the papists under great temptations to go on with their old damnable design, or set up a new one for the destruction of the king? And if it should so happen, either by their wicked counsels, or naturally, I think there is no way left us to oppose this party, but by a rebellion; and therefore I think we may conclude, that our lives, liberties, and religion, are to terminate with the king's life.—I confess, sir, this is a melancholy discourse, but I am afraid too true; and that the more you consider of it, the more reason you will have to believe, that there is such a net spread to catch poor protestants, as cannot fail to do it effectually, whenever the Jesuits shall be pleased to draw it. And our condition looks the more dismal, because though king, lords, and commons have so often declared, that there hath been a damnable, execrable, devilish, hellish, abominable Plot, carried on by the papists, yet that all remedies against the like for the future must be denied us; I mean such as can signify any thing: And we must now again be exposed, as we were before the Plot broke out, to all their barbarities, having only weakened that party by executing about 20 old men; but strengthened them much more, by having discouraged all witnesses from ever revealing more of their plots, and by the discoveries they had made of the strength of their party, in the stifling of this Plot. And yet all will not open the eyes of some protestants, that so, if possible, we might be so happy as to lay our divisions aside, and join against the common enemy, without which we must certainly be ruined.—And if this be our case, and there be nothing wanting but a popish king to complete our misery, and the art of man cannot find out any way to secure us against a popish king, without the Exclusion Bill; is it not strange it should be rejected in the house of lords? I cannot believe that the Fathers of the Church should join in that, which must infallibly give opportunity for the tearing out the bowels of their mother, and destroying her for ever. If so, well may we lie down and cry 'We have nobody to help us but only thou, O God.'

* "The younger brother of one, who, from mean beginnings, had by iron-works raised one of the greatest estates that had been in England in one time. He was a learned, though not a practising, lawyer, and was a man of virtue and good principles, but morose and wilful; and he had the affectation of passing for a great patriot, by his constant finding fault with the government, and keeping up an ill-humour and a bad opinion of the court." Burnet.—He was twice chosen Speaker, and was uncle to the first lord Foley.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that as long as the Papists have any hopes of the duke of York's succeeding the king in the kingdom of England and Ireland, and dominions thereunto belonging, the king's person, the Protestant Religion, and the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of all his majesty's Protestant subjects, are in apparent danger of being destroyed."

Sir Gilbert Gerrard. Sir, I am of opinion the Popish Plot goeth on as much as ever, and the Papists are so proud of it, that they cannot forbear bragging of their hopes to see better days speedily. I think, sir, seeing we are not like for one while to have the Exclusion Bill, we shall appear neglectful of our duty, if we do not try what security can be contrived by an Association-Bill: and therefore I humbly pray, that the house may be moved to appoint a Committee, to draw up and bring in a Bill for associating all his majesty's Protestant subjects.

Sir Henry Capel. Sir, the reason why we are now in this debate, is because a negative is passed on our Bill for excluding the duke. It is strange, seeing the danger of the Protestant Religion is so great (if there be any intent to save it) that the only bill which could serve for that end should be thought too much. I am of opinion, that no other bills can do us any service (for it will be pretended they are all void, because made against the right and prerogative of your lawful king; without this Exclusion-Bill. Yet, seeing his majesty hath so often in his Speeches recommended the Security of the Protestant Religion by other ways, I think it is our duty to try what other laws can be made, though it be only to give the king and the world satisfaction, and to enable us the better to judge, whether such Speeches proceed from his majesty's goodness, or from evil counsel. I must confess, I am afraid, (seeing the duke's interest is now as great at court as ever, and that there are so many of the privy counsellors for him, as well as most others in places of trust and command) that they that advise the king to put in that limitation in all his Speeches, do know, that without that law there can be none made, that can prejudice the duke's interest, and so consequently not save the Protestant Religion, and therefore they advise it. For how can we reasonably presume otherwise, seeing his interest is so fixed as it is, and the wheel within the wheel continues, which hath been so often complained of. When I ponderate on the good things his majesty always doth, when he is pleased to exclude the corrupt politics, and advice of others, I cannot but lament afresh our great misfortune in having a Popish Successor, that should be able to create such an interest, as to hinder us from the good effect thereof.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Sir; the many discourses you have heard this day, touching the strength of the Popish Interest at home, and how combined with foreign power, doth not so much startle me, as to see, that all the strength, upon which the Protestant Party must depend for security, is put into the hands of persons who are for the duke's interest, which we have reason to understand to be the same with Popery; not a person being employed in any place of command or trust, that ever declared against that interest. If I be mistaken in what I say, I desire to be corrected; I speak according to the best information I could have, and I believe all here know, what an exact scrutiny there hath been often made in all countries and corporations, for the finding out of men that way inclined, or otherwise so qualified, as are not fit to make any opposition to the designs carried on by the popish party. And if by chance any is put in, not fettered either by opinion or interest to that party, upon the first appearance he is presently discharged, as if he were a traitor to his country. And now, after a long interval of parliaments, and more and more discoveries of the reality and danger of the Popish Plot, what remedies are we like to obtain this session? I am afraid very few or none; for I must confess, I am still of opinion, there can be none without the Exclusion-Bill, which the lords have thrown out without so much as a conference; and therefore I am afraid that what the witnesses have said they were told by several Jesuits, is true; That Popery was so clenched and riveted, that it did not lie in the power of God, nor man, to prevent the settling of it in this nation. And if we consider what an interest that party hath now at present, and how things are prepared to afford them a greater assistance hereafter; how a popish king, as well as our divisions and animosities, will contribute to it, though I hope, God will make them liars; yet I conclude, they have a great deal of reason to be very confident. And I see not how we can help ourselves, seeing there are so many ministers of state about the king, who are as a partition-wall between him and his people. I find in Coke's Reports, that when the nation was in apparent danger, the people might go directly to the king with their Grievances, and make their Complaints and Petitions known. I think we may do well to consult this text, and see if we can find out any better way than what we have tried already, to convey our humble Supplications to his royal person. In the mean time, I think you had not best to go off from the Bill of Association.

Mr. Leveson Gower. Sir, I would not discourage you from going on with these Bills; but I am afraid they will fall far short of the power and strength that will be necessary to root out an Interest that hath been above 100 years riveting itself by all arts and ways imaginable, and hath now fixt itself so near the throne. I must confess, I am afraid we are at labour in vain, and that this interest hath so clenched itself, (as the Jesuits term it) that it will break not only this parliament, but many more, if not all parliaments, and the Protestant Religion too. It is too weighty to be removed, or perverted, by such little Bills as these: no, sir, you will find, that nothing less than a firm union amongst all the Protestants in this nation can be sufficient to give any check to this interest. As long as there are amongst us so many persons, as know not rightly how to apply the dangers of the Church and State, nor the miseries of 1641, but will be led by Popish projectors, I am afraid such Bills as these will not do our business: because they will not destroy that footing which they have at court, nor strengthen the Protestant Interest, which must have its original from union. It is strange that none but those who are for the duke's interest should be the only persons thought fit to be in places of trust! It is so strange a way to preserve the Protestant Church and Religion, that it raiseth with me a doubt, Whether any such thing be designed. Such persons may be proper to manage affairs in favour of the Popish interest; but it is to be admired, that they, and they only, should be thought fit to be intrusted with the Protestant interest. I think it as hard for them to do it, as to serve two masters. It is not usual in other countries, to retain their enemies in the government, nor such as are friends to their enemies; and it is strange that we, of all other nations, should fall into this piece of policy. But, sir, for these reasons you may conclude, that, unless what laws you make be strong and well-penned, they will signify nothing against so powerful a party as you have to do with.

Sir Wm. Jones. Sir; seeing there is a negative passed upon the Bill we had contrived to secure us from these great dangers, I think we may do well to try if we can get any thing else. But I am persuaded if this Association-Bill be made as it should be, that we shall have no better success with it than we had with the Exclusion-Bill: for I am afraid, that though we are permitted to brandish our weapons, yet that we shall not be allowed to wound Popery; but rather do believe, that they who advised the throwing out of that Bill, will also do the same by this, or dissolve the house before it come to perfection: for this Bill must be much stronger than that in queen Eliz.'s days; that was for an Association only after her death, but I cannot tell if such a bill will secure us now, the circumstances we are under being very different. In queen Eliz.'s days, the privy counsellors were all for the queen's interest, and none for the successor's; now, most of the privy-counsellors are for the successor's, and few for the king's. Then the ministers unanimously agreed to keep out Popery, now we have too much reason to fear, there are many that are for bringing it in. In those days they all agreed to keep the Popish Successor in Scotland, now the major part agreed to keep the Successor here; all which must be considered in drawing up of the Bill.

An Association Bill voted.] Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the house be moved, that a Bill be brought in for an Association of all his majesty's Protestant subjects, for the safety of his majesty's person, the defence of the Protestant Religion, and the preservation of his majesty's Protestant subjects, against all invasions and oppositions: and for preventing the duke of York, or any other Papist, from succeeding to the crown."

Proceedings on Mr. Seymour's Impeachment.] Dec. 17. The commons ordered, "That Mr. Seymour be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms, for securing his forth-coming to answer the Impeachment of this house against him, until he shall have given security to this house, to answer to the said Impeachment; and that the serjeant at arms be empowered to receive security for the forth-coming of the said Mr. Seymour."

Votes to secure the Kingdom against Popery, &c.] The same day, the house resolved into a committee, farther to consider of ways and means to secure the kingdom against Popery and arbitrary Government; and after several debates, how ineffectual all laws would prove, without good Judges, Justices, and others in commission, that will execute them; and how frequent parliaments would conduce to have laws put duly in execution; 1. Resolved; "That it is the opinion of this house, that the house be moved, that a Bill be brought in, for the more effectual securing of the Meetings and Sittings of frequent Parliaments. 2. That this house do agree with the committee, that a Bill be brought in that the Judges hereafter to be made and appointed, may hold their Places and Salaries quamdiu se bene gesserint: and also to prevent the arbitrary proceedings of Judges. 3. That this house do agree with the committee, that a Bill be brought in, against illegal Exaction of Money upon the people, to make it High-Treason."

Debate on the King's Speech.] Dec. 18. His majesty's Speech, made to both houses on the 15th, was read.

Mr. John Hampden. Sir; the veneration that is due to all his majesty's Speeches doth require, that we should seriously debate them before we give any answer to them; but the circumstances we are under at this time challenge a more than ordinary consultation: for, by the tenor of the Speech, I conclude, that the success of this parliament depends upon our Answer to it; and consequently, the safety of the Protestant Religion, both at home and abroad. And therefore I think myself very unable to advise in this matter, and should not have attempted it, but that you have encouraged me by your leave to speak first. So that if I offer any thing amiss, those that come after will have opportunities to correct me. I would begin with the latter end of the Speech first; because that part of it is most likely to beget a fair understanding between his maj. and this house. But I cannot but observe, what great care is here again taken to preserve the Succession in the right line, as in all other his majesty's Speeches ever since the Plot broke out. I think more could not be done, though it were in behalf of the king's son, and a Protestant too. That limitation, and his majesty's offer of securing the Protestant Religion, (if by Succession in the right line be meant the duke) upon many debates in this house is found irreconcilable; and therefore must be imputed to those that have advised his maj. thereto. To preserve the right Succession in the duke, is to preserve something or nothing. The something must be no less than the crown, in case of his majesty's death; and so consequently the interest of the Popish party, who, after 100 years' endeavours to have a prince of their own religion, the indefatigable industry of the Jesuits to obtain it, and the loss of so much blood spent thereip, will, besides their principles and inclinations, lay on them great obligations, to make use of the opportunity to establish their religion again in this nation. So that I must confess, these reservations look to be like a perfect design to save the whole party, accompanied with a power and a pretence sufficient to enable them to accomplish their end. For to this the saving of the duke's right doth amount, and consequently the destruction of the Protestant Religion: which cannot be imagined to proceed from his majesty. In former times, the interest of no one man could ever bear up against the interest of the nation; now it seems, that the Religion, lives and liberties of all the people of this nation, nay, I may say, all the Protestants of the three nations, must be all lost, rather than one man be dispossessed of his right; though by his act he hath made himself incapable to enjoy it. Certainly there must be more intended by this than the saving of one man; it must be the saving of a party: and therefore, sir, I am afraid we are but where we were two years ago: for it is plain to me, that there is a certain fatal scheme, which hath been exactly pursued these 20 years, in order to destroy the Protestant Interest, and hath had a strange secret operation in the management of all our affairs; and although now and then some accidents have happened, that have occasioned some alteration for a time, as by his majesty's recalling the Toleration, some transactions of parliaments, the breaking out of the Plot, and his majesty's Toleration of his Council in 1679; yet I observe, that after a little while there is no change in the main; all returns to the old scheme, as if there were a certain infallible balance that did preponderate. We have had so much experience of his majesty's goodness and inclinations, that we cannot but conclude that there is still some such thing, as a wheel within a wheel; whether Jesuits, (for it is like them) or who, I cannot tell, nor how the government is influenced, that the protestants should not be able to obtain any thing for their security. But we may guess and justly fear, that it will never be otherwise, as long as there is a Popish Successor. The truth is, we have a hard task to serve our king and country in such a time as this is. We may expose ourselves to the rage of a powerful party; but, I am afraid, get little to secure ourselves against their revenge. We are under the same inequality as fair gamesters that meet with those that use false dice; and are like to have the same ill luck at last, unless his maj. should be pleased to consider, who stands up most for his government, and who plays fairest; and accordingly, change his councils.—It is not to be doubted but that, as well for the security of the nation at home, as of Flanders against the power of France, and the Protestant Religion abroad, we are under a necessity to make Alliances; and that they cannot be made nor supported without money. But did we not give above 2 millions for the preservation of the Triple

League? And were not the said 2 millions by the power of the French and Popish party employed to break it? Did we not a little while in give about a million and an half for an actual French war? And was there not presently a general peace made? Do not all foreign nations complain, that, notwithstanding all our treaties, pretences, and declarations, we have been only true to France? And what reason have we now to imagine, that if we would give Money for Leagues, that it would be employed otherwise than formerly? Is not the same scheme of government pursued still? Is not the French ambassador, and the French Roman too, as great at court as ever? And are not the duke's creatures the managers of all affairs? And if the duke's interest, the French interest; and the Popish interest, be all one, can you imagine, that your Money shall be employed to make any Alliances, that shall be for the advantage of the Protestant Religion? No, sir, though his maj. so intend it, yet the wheel within a wheel, which hath managed all other Alliances hitherto, will also manage these, and have the disposal of our Money too, and pervert it to our destruction. And, until things settle here at home on a true Protestant bottom, it cannot be imagined, that any foreign prince will depend on us, or make Alliances with us. And therefore as well for that, as because our Money may not probably be disposed of for any good end, it is in vain to treat of either Alliances or money. For, until the interest be changed at court, that so here may be a better understanding between the king and his people, it cannot produce any thing for our advantage.—I beg leave to add something about the latter part of the Speech, which doth a little comfort me, because I hope we may graft such an Answer thereupon, as may beget a right understanding with his majesty. I know this house is constituted of persons different from that of the Long Parliament, because of the many Pensioners that were in it; and that we need not now be afraid to talk of Money. I believe we all know, that without giving Money this session, the nation can never be happy, nor his majesty's government so formidable as it ought to be. And therefore I would humbly move you to appoint a committee, to draw up an Address to assure his majesty, that when his maj. shall be pleased to grant us such laws, as are necessary for the security of our Religion, which may be particularized in the address, that we will be ready to give him what Money his occasions may require, not only for the support of Tangier, and Alliances, but to enable him to have a good Fleet at sea, for the encouraging of Seamen, and security of Trade, and preservation of his dominions; that so we may shew we are ready to express our duty, as well by our acts as words.

Lord Russel. Sir, seeing it is so apparent that all our fears of Popery arise from, and center in the duke: and that is impossible the affairs of this nation should ever settle on a good Protestant bottom, as long as there is a Popish Successor, which cannot be prevented but by the Succession Bill: that there may be no ill construction made of our desires, I would humbly move you to offer to supply the king with what Money he may need for the support of Tangier and Alliances, upon his granting of the Succession Bill only, that so his maj. may have no reason to be diffident of us; not doubting, but that if we can once lay a foundation for a good correspondence, that his maj. will take so much content in it, beyond what he doth now enjoy, that to preserve it he will afterwards grant us what more Bills may be farther necessary for the security of the Protestant Religion. And therefore I am not for clogging this Address with any request for any thing more, than that one Bill.

Sir Wm. Jones. Sir, we have hitherto had so little success in our endeavours, that we may justly suspect, we are permitted to sit here, rather to destroy ourselves than to save our country. It is a matter of admiration to me, that those who have so often advised his majesty, to put this, and the former parliaments, upon finding out expedients for securing the Protestant Religion, without altering the Succession, should all this while find out none themselves; but still continue advising the king to put that upon us, which, after many debates, is found to be impossible. And that the king should always have at his elbow persons ready to remember him constantly to make this limitation, which, in all appearance, must tend to the final destruction of the Protestant Religion: and that there should be no body there to mind him of proposing some expedients to prevent it, only in general words, of which no use can be made. According to the opinion of three successive parliaments, the limitation in favour of the Popish interest is plain, intelligible, and practicable. I hope his majesty, against the next occasion, will require them that have so advised him, to make the expedients and other ways to secure the Protestant Religion, as plain and practicable, that so we may see if the security of the Protestant Religion be designed in good earnest by such advisers, which I cannot believe; because what they propose is, in my opinion, a contradiction in itself. Without the Exclusion Bill, there can be no expedient but what will leave us in that miserable condition, of having, first or last, a contest with our lawful king. And there can be no such thing as setting up a power to oppose him, but by putting a kind of supreme authority in the parliament; with a power to oppose, as well by making war as laws, which might prove the destruction of the monarchical government. The said trust or power (without the Exclusion-Bill) being not to be reposed in the next heir, or any single person, lest he should die before he come to have the power in him, or utterly refuse to act, if he should live to have a right, by virtue of such a settlement, to administer the government. In such a case, there would be no lawful power lodged any where else, to oppose such a king, and there must not be an Interregnum. By this short account you may see, what difficulties all expedients will be liable to; and may conclude, that those that advise the king to make this limitation, do intend it as an expedient to make the endeavours of parliaments ineffectual, and to bring in Popery. And if you had offered at such expedients as I have mentioned, as the last house of commons was arraigned for omnipotent and arbitrary, so would this with some worse character; as having attempted to destroy the monarchial government, that if possible the king and people might be put out of love with parliaments. But, sir, though it is plain, that things are thus out of order, yet let us not be wanting in our duty, but give such an Answer to his majesty, as may, if possible, create in him a good opinion of this house, and satisfy him of the necessity of the Bill of Exclusion; and that all other acts of grace will but serve to fatten us for the slaughter of our enemies.

Mr. Garroway. If you do not represent all your Grievances in this Address, as the condition of your giving Money, whatever you shall offer at afterwards will be looked upon as clamorous, and out of order. And therefore I would advise you, not to omit any one Grievance you expect any remedy in. And I am for enumerating all your Grievances, in the Address, which have been lately debated. And I do admire nobody takes notice of the Standing Army; which if not reduced to such a number as may be convenient for guards, and so limited, that they may not be increased, unless in case of a rebellion, or an invasion, all your laws may signify nothing. And I am not satisfied in the making such general offers of Money. For if you do, you will hear in time, that the Fleet needs one million; Alliances, as much more; and Tangier (though I think not worth keeping) little less.

Resolved, after further debate, "That a committee be appointed to prepare an humble Address to his majesty, upon the debate of the house, in answer to his majesty's Speech."

The Commons' Address, in Answer to the King's Speech.] Dec. 30. Mr. Hampden reported the Address; which was read and agreed to, as follows:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, having taken into our serious consideration your majesty's gracious Speech to both houses, on the 15th of this instant Dec. do, with all the grateful sense of faithful subjects and sincere Protestants, acknowledge your majesty's great goodness to us, in renewing the assurances you have been pleased to give us, of your readiness to concur with us in any means for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and your gracious invitation of us, to make our desires known to your majesty. But with grief of heart we cannot but observe, that to these princely offers, your majesty has been advised (by what secret enemies to your maj.

and your people, we know not) to annex a reservation, which, if insisted on in the instance to which alone it is applicable, will render all your majesty's other gracious inclinations of no effect or advantage to us. Your majesty is pleased thus to limit your promise of concurrence, in the Remedies which shall be proposed, that they may consist with preserving the Succession of the Crown in its due and legal course of descent. And we do humbly inform your maj. that no interruption of that descent has been endeavoured at by us, except only the descent upon the person of the duke of York, who, by the wicked instruments of the Church of Rome, has been manifestly perverted to their Religion. And we do humbly represent to your majesty, as the issue of our most deliberate thoughts and consultations, that for the Papists to have their hopes continued, that a prince of that religion should succeed in the throne of these kingdoms, is utterly inconsistent with the safety of your majesty's person, the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the prosperity, peace and welfare of your Protestant subjects.—That your majesty's sacred Life is in continual danger, under the prospect of a Popish Successor, is evident, not only from the principles of those devoted to the Church of Rome, which allow, that an heretical prince (and such they term all Protestant princes) excommunicated and deposed by the Pope, may be destroyed and murdered; but also from the testimonies given in the prosecution of the horrid Popish Plot, against divers traitors, attainted for designing to put those accursed principles into practice against your majesty.—From the expectation of this Succession, has the number of Papists in your majesty's dominions so much increased within these few years, and so many been prevailed with to desert the true Protestant Religion, that they might be prepared for the favours of a Popish prince, as soon as he should come to the possession of the crown; and while the same expectation lasts, many more will be in the same danger of being perverted.—This it is that has hardened the Papists of this kingdom, animated and confederated by their priests and Jesuits, to make a common cause, provide arms, make application to foreign princes, and solicit their aid, for imposing Popery upon us; and all this, even during your majesty's reign, and while your majesty's government and the laws were our protection.—It is your majesty's glory and true interest, to be the head and protector of all Protestants, as well abroad as at home: but if these desperate enemies, what Alliances can be made for the advantage of the Protestant Religion and Interest, which shall give confidence to your majesty's allies, to join so vigorously with your majesty, as the state of that interest in the world now requires, while they see this Protestant kingdom in so much danger of a Popish Successor! By whom, at the present, all their councils and actions may be eluded, as hitherto they have been; and by whom (if he should succeed) they are sure to are destroyed.—We have thus humbly laid before your majesty some of those great dangers and mischiefs, which evidently accompany the expectation of a Popish Successor. The certain and unspeakable evils which will come upon your majesty's Protestant subjects, and their posterity, if such a prince should inherit, be more also than we can well enumerate.—Our Religion, which is now so dangerously shaken, will then be totally overthrown; nothing will be left, or can be found to protect or defend it.—The execution of old laws must cease, and it will be vain to expect new ones. The most sacred obligations of contracts and omissions, (if any such should be given) that shall be judged to be against the interest of the Popish Religion, will be violated; as is undeniable, not only from argument and experience elsewhere, but from the sad experience of this nation once had on the like occasion. In the reign of such a prince, the Pope will be acknowledged supreme, (though the subjects of this kingdom have sworn the contrary) and all causes, either as spiritual, or in order to spiritual things, will be brought under his jurisdiction. The lives, liberties, and estates of all such Protestants, as value their souls and their religion more than their secular concerns, will be adjudged forfeited.—To all this we might add, that it appears in the discovery of the Plot, that foreign princes were invited to assist in securing the crown to the duke of York, with arguments from his great zeal to establish Popery, and to extirpate Protestants whom they call Heretics) out of his dominions; and such will expect performance accordingly.—We farther humbly beseech your majesty, in our great wisdom to consider, whether, in case the imperial crown of this Protestant kingdom should descend to the duke of York, the opposition which may possibly be made to his possessing it, may not only endanger the further descent in the royal line, but even monarchy itself.—For these reasons, we are most humble petitioners to your most sacred majesty, that, in tender consideration of your poor Protestant people, your majesty will be graciously pleased to depart from the reservation in your said Speech; and when a Bill shall be tendered to your maj. in a parliamentary way, to disable the duke of York from inheriting the crown, your majesty will give your royal assent thereto; and as necessary to fortify and defend the same, that your maj. will likewise be graciously pleased to assent to an Act, whereby your maj.'s Protestant subjects may be enabled to associate themselves for the defence of your maj.'s person, the Protestant religion, and the security of your kingdoms.—These requests we are constrained humbly to make to your majesty as of absolute necessity, for the safe and peaceable enjoyment of our Religion. Without these things, the alliances of England will not be valuable, nor the people encouraged to contribute to your majesty's service. As some farther means for the preservation both of our religion and property, we are humble suitors to your majesty, that from henceforth such persons only may be judges within the kingdom of England, and dominion of Wales, as are men of ability, integrity, and known affection to the protestant religion: And that they may hold both their offices and salaries, 'quamdiu se bene gesserint.' That (several deputy-lieutenants and justices of the peace fitly qualified for those employments, having been of late displaced, and others put in their room, who are men of arbitrary principles, and countenancers of papists and popery) such only may bear the office of a lord-lieutenant, as are persons of integrity and known affection to the protestant religion. That deputy-lieutenants, and justices of the peace, may be also so qualified, and may be moreover men of abilities, of estates and interest in their country. That none be employed as military officers, or officers in your majesty's fleet, but men of known experience, courage, and affection to the Protestant religion.—These our humble requests being obtained, we shall, on our part, be ready to assist your majesty for the preservation of Tangier; and for putting your majesty's fleet into such a condition, as it may preserve your majesty's Sovereignty of the Seas, and be for the defence of the nation.—If your majesty hath, or shall make any necessary Alliances for defence of the Protestant religion, and interest and security of this kingdom, this house will be ready to assist and stand by your majesty in the support of the same. After this our humble Answer to your majesty's gracious Speech, we hope no evil instruments whatsoever, shall be able to lessen your majesty's esteem of that fidelity and affection we bear to your majesty's service: but that your maj. will always retain, in your royal breast, that favourable opinion of us your loyal commons, that those other good Bills which we have now under consideration, conducing to the great ends we have before mentioned, as also all laws for the benefit and comfort of your people, which shall from time to time be tendered for your majesty's royal assent, shall find acceptance with your majesty.*

Debate on the Bill for uniting his Majesty's Protestant Subjects.] Dec. 21. A Bill was read for uniting his majesty's Protestant Subjects*.

Mr. Powle. Sir, it is not to be doubted but that the happiness of this nation, and safety of our religion, doth depend very much upon preserving the well-constituted government of the church; and that the government in the state will not long stand, if that be pulled down, to which, I am afraid, this Bill will contribute very much. Sir, it is well known, how, notwithstanding all the endeavours of his majesty,

* "This Bill was not introduced till towards the latter end of Dec. when the close of the session was in view. And hence it may be concluded that it was one of those parliamentary fire-works that are occasionally let off, only to make a noise and expire." Ralph.

as well in parliament as otherwise, all the acts that are in force against Dissenters, all the endeavours of the fathers of the church, there are a sort of men, and great numbers too, who will neither be advised nor over-ruled; but, under the pretence of conscience, break violently through all laws whatsoever, to the great disturbance both of church and state. And if you should give them more liberty, you will encourage them to go on with more boldness; and therefore I think it will be more convenient to have a law for forcing the Dissenters to yield to the church, and not to force the church to yield to them; and I think we are going quite the wrong way to do the nation good. And therefore I am against this Bill.

Mr. D.— Sir, I would not open my mouth in favour of this Bill, if I thought it would any ways prejudice the church, or church-government; but I believe it may have a quite contrary effect, and tend more for the preservation and safety of the church and church-government, than any bill whatsoever that could be contrived. We have a church-government settled by law, to which the major part of the people, like good christians and loyal subjects, give obedience; but it is our misfortune that there are in the nation a great many, who will not submit to this government, who may be divided under three heads: 1. The Papists, who differ from us in points of faith, and will not give any obedience but to the church of Rome: 2. Independents, Presbyterians, and some others, who agree in points of faith, and differ only in points of doctrine and ceremonies: 3. Quakers, who disagree not only in points of doctrine and ceremonies, but in points of faith, and are a head-strong sort of unreasonable people, that will not submit to any laws made about religion, but do give obedience to the civil magistrates upon all other occasions. The church of England-men are not only the greatest number, but have the government of their side. What laws to make, that may tend most to the preserving of it, is your business. It is in danger from the Papists on the one hand, and the rest of the Protestant dissenters on the other, who in some measure agree in their enmity and disrespect to the church, and therefore the more care ought to be taken for its preservation.—Having thus, sir, discovered the danger of the church in general, it will be necessary, in order to find out a Remedy, to discourse a little of the strength and interest of each party in particular.—Sir, the Papists are not the greatest number, but yet, in my opinion, upon several considerations, are most to be feared, because of their desperate principles, which make them bold and indefatigable, and the assistance they may have from Rome, France, and Ireland; but above all, from the great share they have in the management of the government, by the means of a popish successor, and the fear of their getting the government into their hands hereafter by having a popish king: which of itself hath been sufficient in former times to change the religion of this nation, and, as may justly be feared, may have the same effect again, unless the Protestants be well united. The Presbyterians, Independents, and all other Dissenters, may be more in number than the Papists, and may be willing enough to have the church-government altered, if not destroyed; yet, being they cannot have any succour from abroad, nor from the government here at home, I cannot see any great danger from them: for, it is not probable they shall ever have a king of their own opinion, nor a parliament, by the discovery they made of their strength in the last elections: for, according to the best calculation I can make, they could not bring one in 20, and therefore, because they have not such bloody, desperate principles as the Papists, and because we agree in points of faith, and so there is no such great danger from them as from the Papists, I think we have reason to conclude, that the church is most in danger from the Papists, and that therefore we ought to take care of them in the first place; and we cannot do that by any way more likely to prove effectual, than by some such Bill as this.

Mr. Finch. Sir, this Bill is intended for the preservation of the church, and I am of opinion, is the best Bill that can be made in order thereto, our circumstances considered: but I know not what effect it may have, because you are to deal with a stubborn sort of people, who in many things prefer their humour before reason, or their own safety, or the public good. But, sir, I think this is a very good time to try, whether they will be won by the cords of love or no, and the Bill will be very agreeable to that Christian charity which our church professes; and I hope that in a time of so imminent danger as we are in of a common enemy, they will consider their own safety, and the safety of the Protestant religion, and not longer keep aloof the unhappy divisions that are amongst us, on which the Papists ground their hopes. But rather, seeing the church doth so far condescend, as to dispense with the surplice, and those other things which they scruple at, that they will submit to the rest that is enjoined by law, that so we may unite against the common enemy: but if this Bill should not have this desired effect, but, on the contrary, notwithstanding this condescension, they should continue their animosities and disobedience to the church, I think still the church will gain very much hereby, and leave that party without excuse, and be a just cause for the making of more coercive laws.

After further debate, it was resolved, “That the said Bill be committed.” *

Queries relating to the Execution of Lord Stafford.] Dec. 23. Some Queries relating to the execution of Wm. late viscount Stafford, were offered to the house by the sheriffs of London and Middlesex. 1. "Whether the king, being neither judge nor party, can order the execution? 2. Whether the lords can award the execution? 3. Whether the king can dispense with any part of the execution? 4. If the king can dispense with some part of the execution, why not with all?"

* “The Bill was committed on the question, but afterwards dropped, no doubt on the same political principles which first made way for its admission; for though it was expedient to favour the non-conformists, it was not safe to wage war with the church.” Ralph.

Serj. Maynard. I cannot find fault with the king's mercy in remitting part of the sentence against this lord; but this question has arisen, I believe, that the lords and we may be at difference upon it. Either the Papists hope that, by it, this lord may be acquitted, or that we may so differ, that all business may be at a stand.

Sir Wm. Jones. I think that the proposal of this matter from the Sheriffs does not deserve blame, but thanks, and that they did well to apply themselves to this house. I have considered of it, and I think there is no reason to go to the lords about it; it will not prejudice us so much as some apprehend. The Impeachment is at our prosecution, and the Judgment at our suit. Death is the substance of the Judgment; the manner of it is but a circumstance. If a nobleman be judged to be hanged for felony, that he may be beheaded by the king's warrant lord Coke doubts; though the Judges argued that, in the case of lord Castlehaven, who was condemned to be hanged for burglary, and his Judgment was changed into beheading. The Judgment against a woman, for high-treason, is to be burnt; but we know frequently that they have been beheaded, as was Anne Bullen. I take it easy to show, that, if the substance be preserved, which is death, the circumstances may be varied. No man can show me an example of a nobleman that has been quartered for high-treason: they have been only beheaded. But now, what shall we do in this case? Shall we desire the lords to do what was never done before? By nature, Englishmen are not so severe; as if the substance could not be performed without the circumstances. What is then to be done? Either execution will be done by this writ, or by conference you will complain to the lords, that execution is not ordered according to Judgment, or that they have not done, in the upper house, what was never done before. To satisfy the Sheriffs, I would pass a vote, "That this house is content that Execution be done upon lord Stafford, by severing his head from his body."

Resolved, "That this house is content that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex do execute William late Viscount Stafford, by severing his head from his body only."

Report relating to the Proceedings of the Judges.] The same day, sir Rd. Corbet reported the resolves of the Committee appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-Hall, touching the Discharge of the Grand Jury in the King's-Bench. Upon which, the house resolved, new. con. 1. "That the discharging of the Grand Jury of the hundred of Oswaldston, in the county of Middlesex, by the Court of King's Bench, in Trinity Term last, before the last day of the Term, and before they had finished their Presentments, was arbitrary and illegal, destructive of public justice, a manifest violation of the paths of the Judges of that court, and a means to subvert the fundamental laws of this kingdom, and to introduce Popery. 2. That the Rule made by the Court of King's-bench in Trinity Term last, against printing of a Book called, 'The weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome,' is illegal and arbitrary, thereby usurping to themselves legislative power, to the great discouragement of the Protestants, and for the countenance of Popery. 3. That the Court of King's-bench, in the Imposition of Fines on Offenders of late years, have acted arbitrarily, illegally, and partially, favouring Papists, and Persons Popishly affected, and excessively oppressing his majesty's Protestant Subjects. 4. That the refusing sufficient Bail in these cases, wherein the persons committed were bailable by law, was illegal, and a high breach of the Liberties of the Subject. 5. That the said Expressions in the Charge given by the said baron Weston, were a scandal to the Reformation, and tending to raise discord between his maj. and his subjects, and to the subversion of the ancient constitution of parliaments, and of the government of this kingdom. 6. That the said Warrants are arbitrary and illegal."

Resolutions for the Impeachment of the said Judges.] Resolved, 1. "That sir Wm. Scroggs, knight, Chief Justice of the Court of King's-bench: 2. Sir Tho. Jones, one of the Justices of the said Court of King's-bench; and sir Rd. Weston, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, be impeached upon the said Report, and Resolutions of the House thereupon."

Ordered, "That the committee appointed to prepare an Impeachment against sir Fr. North, chief justice of the court of Common-Pleas, do prepare Impeachments against the said sir Wm. Scroggs, sir Tho. Jones, and sir Rd. Weston, upon the said Report and Resolutions."

*Debate on Mr. Sheridan's Habeas Corpus.] Dec. 30. Mr. Boscawen. Mr. Sheridan stands committed, as a judgment of the house, for breach of privilege. It seems to me, that his commitment does run on the hinge of an act of court in a criminal cause, which we may suppose in execution, where a Habeas Corpus does not lie, and he is not bailable, and they will not discharge him in a court of criminal causes. I think his commitment stands good, and you are to consider the privilege of the house..

* "There was a bold forward man, Sheridan, a native of Ireland, whom the commons committed, and he moved for his Habeas Corpus. Some of the Judges were afraid of the house, and slipt out of the way; but baron Weston had the courage to grant it." Burnet.

The Speaker. The thing, in fact, stands thus. Sheridan and Day were committed by your Order the 9th of Dec.; they were brought to the bar the same day, and ordered to continue in custody during the pleasure of the house, and no person to be admitted to come to him unless it were with necessaries. Then that order was mitigated, and you ordered him to be taken into custody. Then you ordered a committee to examine him and Wilson. The Act directs, 'That the Judges, within such a time, grant a Habeas Corpus, when desired, and they are required to bail where the Act gives that liberty.' Now the question is, Whether a Habeas Corpus lies in case of any of your Commitments, the parliament sitting? [And he reads the Act.] In the Act here is nothing relates to Parliament-Commitments. The 'Head-Court' is the King's-bench, and this seems not to relate to the parliament. This is a commitment of parliament, and if so, the Judges cannot grant a Habeas Corpus.

Serj. Maynard. You are going upon a sudden to give an opinion in a thing not thought of before. As I take it, his Habeas Corpus is granted: now, what is to be done in this case? I desire not to be concluded in any thing I shall now say, but I will tell you my apprehension; where shall he go to be bailed, but to this house? Your remedy for breach of your privilege is commitment, and no action can be brought against either the lords or commons. When you commit a man, you do not always express the cause; if the Judges bail him, he is gone, and there is an end of him.

Serj. Stringer. This is a matter of great concern. I would consider whether a Judge can deny a Habeas Corpus. By the Act, the jailor is to pay the penalty of 500*l.* upon affidavit; 'That he is refused the copy of his commitment.' So far a Judge may safely go. But the great point is, Whether the judge can discharge him. If so, farewell all the privileges of the commons! When the matter comes to a Habeas Corpus, the judges may be informed how he stands committed. It is said, 'That this Sheridan is a second Coleman,' and, if so, let him be hanged as he was. I would take time to consider this, and I believe the opinion of this house will go a great way with the Judges.

Sir Wm. Jones. Sir, the privileges of both houses are concerned in this business, and in that the very being of parliaments: and therefore we must be careful what we do in it. I have perused the Habeas Corpus bill, and do find, that there is not any thing in it that doth reach, or can be intended to reach to any commitment made by either house of parliament during session. The preamble of the Act, and all the parts of it, do confine the extent of the Act to cases bailable, and directs such courses for the execution of the act, as cannot be understood should relate to any commitment made by either house. This house is a court of itself, and part of the highest court in the nation, superior to those in Westminster-hall; and what laws this house joins in making, are to bind inferior courts, but cannot be understood to bind themselves as a court; that would prove not only dangerous, but destructive to the dignity of parliaments, and level them with the courts in Westminster-hall. Great care ought to be taken how you allow of restraints and limitations to the proceedings of both houses, being so great a part of the legislative power of the nation, lest thereby you should by degrees render them useless. A commitment of this house is always in nature of a judgment; and the act is only for cases bailable, which commitments upon judgments are not; at least commitments by this house were never yet allowed to be bailable; and I suppose you will never grant them so to be. Can it be imagined that this house, who represent all the commons of England, should not be entrusted with as much power for the preservation of their constitution, upon which the support of the government so much depends, as ordinary courts and officers are entrusted with, which are only designed for the welfare of particular persons. I am of opinion, that no act can deprive this house of that power which they have always exercised, of committing persons without bail, unless in express words it be so declared: nor of discharging upon bail, after committed. The same reasons which may be given for discharging such as are not committed for breach of privilege, if it be grounded on the act for the Habeas Corpus, will hold as strong for the discharging of persons committed for breach of privilege; and so consequently deprive this house of all its power and dignity, and make it insignificant. This is so plain and obvious, that all judges ought to know it; and I think it below you to make any resolve therein, but rather leave the judges to do otherwise at their peril, and let the debate fall without any question.

Sir F. Winnington. All I move for is this, 'That no entry be made upon your books for the present;' but upon the whole frame of the act, I see no Habeas Corpus lies upon a commitment of parliament.—No entry was made in the Journal, and it was adjourned to tomorrow.

Debate on Placemen and Pensioners in Parliament.] What followed the same day, related to Placemen and Pensioners sitting in Parliament; on which occasion

Sir Fr. Winnington expressed himself thus:—Sir, the last house of commons being sensible how narrowly this nation escaped being ruined by a sort of monsters called Pensioners, which sate in the late Long Parliament, had entered into a consideration how to prevent the like from coming into future parliaments; and in order thereto resolved, that they would severely chastise some of those that had been guilty, and make the best laws they could to prevent the like for the future: and for that purpose a Committee was appointed, of which Mr. Serjeant Gregory, now Judge Gregory.

was chairman: by which, many Papers relating to that affair came to his hands. Sir, I think a business of so great importance, that it never ought to be forgotten, nor the prosecution of it deferred. I have often heard, that England an never be destroyed but by itself: to have such parliaments was the most likely way that ever yet was invented. I remember a great lawyer said in this house, when it was elated in the last parliament, that it was reason; and he gave many learned arguments to make it out. Whether it be so or no, I will not now offer to debate; but I think, that for those that are the legislators of the nation to use Bribes to undermine the laws and government of this nation, that they ought to be chased as traitors. It was my fortune to sit here a little while in the Long Parliament; I did observe that all those that had Pensions, and most of those that had Offices, voted all of a side, as they were directed by some great officer, as exactly as if their business in this house had been to preserve their Pensions and Offices, and not to make laws for the good of them that sent them here. How such persons could any way be useful for the support of the government, by preserving a fair understanding between the king and his people, but on the contrary how dangerous to bring in arbitrary power and popery, I leave to every man's judgment. They were so far from being the true representatives of the people, that they were a distinct middle interest between the king and the people; and their chief business was to serve the end of some great minister of state, though never so opposite to the true interest of the nation. Sir, this business ought never to fall, though there should be never so many prorogations and dissolutions of parliaments, before any thing be done in it; I think it is the interest of the nation, that it should be prosecuted from parliament to parliament, as if there were an impeachment against them. And therefore, sir, I would humbly move you to send some members of this house to judge Gregory, for the Papers he hath taken in his custody relating to this affair, that so you may at a convenient time proceed farther herein, as you shall think good. And, sir, being there is a report that some of this house have now made a bargain at court for great offices in order to vitiate and corrupt their Votes in this house, which though but a project to cast a reflection on such members, however to satisfy the world, I pray, sir, let there be a Vote past, 'That no Member of this house shall accept of any Office under the crown, during such time as he continues a member.'

Mr. Harbord. So many artifices are used to asperse your members, against the public good, that I move that no person may have any place during the parliament without leave of the house, or else that he be incapable of being a parliament-man if he accept of it.

Col. Titus. As I came to the house this morning, I heard myself to be a great man, and that I had a place at court, and had so many compliments upon being a great minister, that I began to flatter myself that I was really so; but now I plainly discover that I have no such place at all. After you have so proceeded against sir Rob. Peyton for his truckling for a place, should I accept of a Pension, or a Place, it would be no wonder if I should be brought upon my knees, as he was. I never heard that man said to have kept a fort, for it was never assaulted. A woman with an ill face is seldom tempted. I protest, I never heard of any place till I came hither this morning. I met with another report, 'That I had been with the duchess of Portsmouth.' If any man can prove, whilst I was of the bed-chamber to his majesty, that ever I spoke a word to her, I will lie under all your accusations. I know not a better design, nor more dextrous, to carry on popery, than this of raising jealousies. Let me repeat that part of the litany, 'From envy, hatred, and malice, good Lord deliver us.' If my own actions will not justify me, my words never will. I think you have been regularly moved, 'That the Papers about the pensioners in sir Stephen Fox's hands may be reviewed.' If any man have no impediment for preferment, let him take it, but not be a parliament-man. If a man think himself qualified for a place, let him leave the parliament, and accept of the place. 'Lead us not into temptation,' we pray daily. The house will always have power over their members, and I move that they may have no employment during parliament.

Mr. Vaughan. There was something of this nature offered at in the Long Parliament, but it fell. Now I think this parliament consists of good men, able to maintain themselves. Prevent such ulcers in your own bowels. That Bill then offered provided, 'That upon acceptance of any such office, a new writ should issue out, to chuse another person.' I am not for gentlemen purging themselves. I believe them honest men.

Col. Titus. I have been congratulated for a great place, and I humbly desire Vaughan's leave to clear myself. I say that some of us were accused of Places, but not that Vaughan did.

Col. Birch. I have a place, and I had it before the Long Parliament was called, (I was one of the secluded members) and so I am before-hand. Though Vaughan has not gone much abroad, yet it is the talk of the town. I have sat in that corner amongst those gentlemen who have been talked of for Places, and had there been provender amongst them, I should have been crumpling with them. But now there are no such places or bargain made, to the shame of them that reported it. Some corrupt judges formerly had their skins stuffed with bay, for an example; I desire those Gentlemen-Pensioners, if there be any, may be stuffed with straw, and I am content. If they received Pensions in the Long Parliament, I have heard that all done in such a parliament is null and void; that it has been so formerly.

Mr. Garraway. I think, a Vote in this case will not do your business, nor answer your end. Therefore I am for a Bill.

Mr. Hampden. I am now for a Bill, but I would have a vote first, and thus far a vote will be obligatory to men of worth and honour: If any man will say that he is not obliged by that vote, let him. Pass such a vote first, 'That during parliament we may have no Places nor Pensions to the scandal of the house.'

Sir Wm. Jones. I like both the questions, both for a Vote, and a Bill, but I am sorry that you have no means to bring things to light about the Pensioners. Mr. Bertie is gone abroad, and I am afraid will not return till this parliament be up. When men do not act for such Places, in time the world will be undeceived, and let that pass. 'Places of Profit' will be a word too general in your question; they may have places in corporations; but I would add to the vote, 'Not to exclude your Members from the magistracy, as lord mayor or sheriff of London, &c. It may be convenient to have them members of parliament. I would have them only excluded Offices from court, and Places from his majesty.'

Col. Titus. Suppose his majesty should have occasion to send ambassadors, or admirals, it may be those are the ablest men for it. Suppose we should have a war, will you not let your members fight for you? The way to hinder a thing, is to clog it. Therefore pray pass the vote as it is moved.

Sir Tho. Lee. I had an office conferred upon me in parliament (commissioner-admiral), and got out of it out of parliament: my country habitation was of more satisfaction to me. No man knows what a man will be, but himself. I think you may leave out the words, 'Without leave of the house.' You will have no advantage by it.

Sir Fr. Winnington. What I moved this day, was not to vindicate the reputation of your members, but to prevent reflections without. I believe the people will be satisfied with any of your members having Places whom the house thinks well of.

Mr. Henry Booth. Sir; without doubt the last parliament had great matters in agitation, and the enquiry they made about the Pensioners of the preceding parliament was no small one, but rather one of the chief things they had in hand; for had they been permitted to have perfected that, it had been a good recompence for the disappointment which the nation sustained in their other expectations, by the sudden prorogation: and without all question, nothing is fitter for the thoughts of a parliament, than to take into consideration how to punish them that had proved the best, and had almost (if not altogether) ruined the nation; and how to prevent the like mischief for the future. The name of a Pensioner is very distasteful to every English spirit; and all those who were Pensioners I think are sufficiently despised by their countrymen: and therefore I will mention only two or three things that will lie at their doors, before I offer my advice what is to be done. Breach of trust is accounted the most infamous thing in the world, and this these men were guilty of to the highest degree; robbery and stealing our law punishes with death, and what deserve they who beggar and take away all that the nation has, under the pretence of disposing of the people's money for the honour and good of the king and kingdom? And if there were nothing more than this to be said, without doubt they deserve a high censure.—Besides the giving away such vast sums, without any colour or reasonable pretence; there is this great mischief will follow upon it: every man very well knows that it has put the king into an extraordinary way of expence: and therefore when he has not such great Supplies, it must of necessity bring the king into great want and need: and shall not only give him an ill opinion of all parliaments, that do not supply him so extravagantly, but perhaps put him to think of ways to get Money that otherwise would never have entered into his thoughts; so that whatever ill may happen of this sort, these Pensions are answerable for it.—Furthermore, they have laid us open to all our enemies; whoever will invade, may not doubt to subdue us: for they have taken from us the sinews of war, that is Money and Courage; all our money is gone, and they have exhausted the treasure of the nation, and when people are poor, their spirits are low, so that we are left without a defence; and who must we thank for bringing us into this despicable condition, but these gentlemen, who notwithstanding this had the face to stile themselves the king's friends, and all those who opposed their practices were factious and seditious. They had brought it to that pass, that debates could not be free; if a gentleman's tongue happen to lie a little awry in his mouth, presently he must be called to the bar; or if that would not do, whensoever any gentleman that had a true English spirit happened to say any thing that was bold, presently away to seek the king and tell him of it; and oftentimes more than the truth: and thus they endeavoured to beget an ill opinion in the king of his best subjects: and their practice was the more abominable, because their words and actions gave the occasion to force those smart expressions from the gentlemen that spoke them; for their honest hearts were fired with true zeal to their king and country, when they beheld the impudence and falseness of those Pensioners.—It is true we find that in or about the 10th of R. ii. it was endeavoured to get a corrupt parliament; for our English story says, that the king sent for the justices and sheriffs, and enjoined them to do their best, that none should be chosen knights and burgesses, but such as the king and his council should name; but we find it could not be effected.—The next that occurs to my thoughts is that in the 4th of Hen. iv. the parliament that was called at Coventry, named the Lay-Men's Parliament: for the sheriffs were appointed that none should be chosen knights or burgesses that had any skill in the laws of the land.—The next that I remember is that in Hen. vi. th's time, in 1449, or 50, when the duke of Suffolk was accused by the commons, and committed to the Tower; the king dissolved that parliament not far unlike our case of my lord Danby, but it differs in this, that Suffolk was committed to the Tower as of right he ought; but we were denied that justice against Danby; only Hen. vi. made the cases thus far even, that he set Suffolk at liberty after he had dissolved that parliament: soon after a parliament was called, wherein great care was taken in choosing of parliament men that should favour Suffolk; but they so far failed of their purpose, that his appearance at the parliament gave great distaste to the house of commons, and they were so far incensed, that they began the parliament with a fresh accusation against him and others; so that you may see that it was not in the power of the court to corrupt the house of commons.—In the time of Hen. viii. about the 20th of his reign, when the parliament was active against Pluralities and Non-residence, there was an Act passed to release to the king all such sums of money as he had borrowed at the loan, in the 15th of his reign; it is said that it was much opposed, but the reason that is given why it passed, is, because the house was mostly the king's servants; but it gave great disturbance to the nation: and this is the only case that I can remember that comes any thing near to our Pensioners; but we cannot find that they or any parliament took money to vote: so that we must conclude that there were never any Pensioners in parliament till this pack of blades were got together.—Therefore, sir, what will you do? Shall these men escape, shall they go free with their booty? Shall not the nation have vengeance on them, who had almost given up the government? It was they who had perverted the ends of parliaments: parliaments have been and are the great refuge of the nation, that which cures all its diseases, and heals its sores; but these men had made it a snare to the nation, and at best had brought it to be an engine to give money; if therefore these go away unpunished, we countenance what they have done, and make way to have Pensioners in every parliament; but far be any such thought from any man that sits within these walls: and having said this, I will in the next place humbly offer my thoughts what is to be done. In the first place I do propose, that every man of them shall on their knees confess their fault to all the commons, and that to be done at this bar one by one. Next, that as far as they are able, they refund all the money they have received for secret service. Our law will not allow a thief to keep what he has got by stealth, but of course orders restitution, and shall these proud robbers of the nation not restore their ill-gotten goods? And lastly, I do propose that they be voted incapable of serving in parliament for the future, or of enjoying any office civil or military; and order a Bill to be brought in to that purpose: for it is not fit, that they who were so false and unjust in that trust, should ever be trusted again: this, sir, is my opinion, but if the house shall incline to any other way, I shall readily comply, provided a sufficient mark of infamy be set on them, that the people may know who bought and who sold them.

Sir Wm. Jones. I would not have a question pass that cannot be well defended without doors. Shall the world say, 'you will make a vote (be the occasion ever so great, or the man ever so fit) that he must not accept of an office?' You will hardly find arguments against the unreasonableness of it. If you leave it in the power of your member to put himself out of office, then it is another thing. This parliament is not like to sit so long as to send members ambassadors out of it; besides, it would seem a very strange thing, that the house should ever mistrust itself so far, or has any gentleman so much authority as to persuade the house to it? I have put myself, and will, out of the possibility of it, and I desire the words may stand in the question.

Resolved, nem. con. "That no Member of this house shall accept of any Office, or Place of Profit, from the Crown, without the leave of this house: or any promise of any such Office, or Place of Profit, during such time as he shall continue a Member of this house; and that all offenders herein shall be expelled this house."

Mr. Booth's Speech for Parliaments and against Favourites.] About this time, Mr. Henry Booth, afterwards earl of Warrington, made the following Speech:

Sir, a king of England, at the head of his parliament, is in his full strength and power, and in his greatest splendor and glory: it is then that he can do great things, and without a parliament he is not very formidable. Therefore when kings leave off the use of parliaments, and rely upon the advice of particular favourites, they forsake their chiefest interest, they lay aside the staff that supports them, to lean upon a broken reed that will run into their hands; and this is proved by the example of former kings: what kings performed such enterprizes, and did such wonderful things, as those who still consulted their parliaments? And who had more the command of the people's purses than those kings who met the natives frequently in parliament? As witness Henry i. Edward i. Edward iii. Henry v. Henry viii. Q. Elizabeth; and what kings were so mean and obscure, despised by their neighbours, and abhorred by their subjects, as those who left off the use of parliaments and doted upon their favourites: as witness Will. ii. John, Henry iii. Edward ii. Richard ii. Henry vi. And I think it is undeniable that when the king leaves off parliaments, he forsakes his interest, he refuses the good and chuses the bad. I wish it could not be said that for two years last past, the use of parliaments has almost been laid aside: it is too true that parliaments have been delayed, and there is but a little between delaying and denying, and the first step to a denial is to delay: every man knows the great need we have had of a parliament these seventeen months, and why it has not met till now: it is very well known how earnestly it was desired by all good Protestants and true Englishmen, and what applications have been made to his majesty that it might sit; and it could not be obtained till now: and it is not to be forgotten how often it has been prorogued, and the notice that has been given to the nation of the several prorogations; the first time that we have heard of them was by the Gazette, in which is seldom any thing of truth, and then out comes a proclamation for a prorogation about a day or two before the day of meeting: when gentlemen have disposed their affairs that they may attend at the parliament, and possibly were on their journey towards London, upon the road they meet the news of the prorogation, (very good usage!) and there is nothing to be said in justification of such short notice, but that when his majesty by his proclamation had appointed a farther time for the meeting of the parliament, that in plain English no man must believe it would meet: for if gentlemen did believe it, they would prepare for it; and if they are prepared, it is but reasonable that sufficient notice should be given to prevent them: certainly they who advised the king in this matter, intended that none of his majesty's proclamations should have any credit: for his majesty put out several proclamations against Papists, and we see how they are regarded, not the least obedience yielded to them: and this giving of such short notice, was certainly done on purpose that those proclamations should neither be obeyed nor believed. Thus is the king abused, thus does he lose the hearts of the people, and thus is the nation abused: what will become of us when we cannot believe what his majesty says. Out of parliament the king cannot speak to his people in a more notable way than by proclamation, and as the matter is ordered, these are not regarded: in a subject nothing is more infamous, than to say of him, that his word is not to be relied on, he does not regard what he says: and therefore what villains are they, who by their advice, do bring the king but into the suspicion of it. This delaying of parliaments seems to portend the laying of parliaments aside; and if so, an army will follow: for the king must govern either by a parliament or an army, for one of them he must have; now the way to get rid of parliaments is this: first, although they meet sometimes, yet something must be started to hinder their success; or if that won't do, prorogue or dissolve them before any thing be finished: and thus parliaments will be made useless; and this being done, it will not be long before they become burdensome, and then away with them for good and all.—Kings only then grow out of conceit with parliaments, when their favourites are so overgrown, and their actions are so exorbitant, that they will not endure to be censured by a parliament: and therefore to save themselves, they persuade the king to keep off the parliament, though it be to his great hurt: for the last Trump at the Day of Judgment will not be more terrible to the world, than the sound of an approaching parliament is to unjust ministers and favourites.—That state is sick of a grievous distemper, when kings neglect their parliaments, and adhere to favourites, and certainly that woe is then fallen upon the nation, which Solomon denounces; for says he, 'Woe to that nation whose king is a child;' and without question he meant a child in understanding, and not in years. We have had in England kings who when they were children, by the help of a wise council, have governed very well: but after that they took matters into their own hands, it went very ill with England; as Rd. ii. Hen. vi. who whilst they were children, the government was steered aright; but their understanding not growing as fast as their years, they assumed the government before they were ready for it; and so managed matters, that it is better not to name them, than to reckon them in the catalogue of the kings.—And there is yet another reason why great favourites should advise against parliaments: kings that dote too much upon their favourites, do for the most part pick up mean men, people of no fortunes or estates, upon whom it is that they place their favour to so high a degree: and therefore it is for their interest to advise the king to govern by an Army, for if he prevails, then they are sure to have what heart can wish; or if he fail, yet they are but where they were, they had nothing, and they can lose nothing.—There is no man but very plainly sees, that there are people about his maj. who advise him to shake off the fetters of the laws, and to govern arbitrarily; and I wish that their advice has not prevailed for the most part; yet I think his majesty's own inclinations do not bend that way, for he seems to love quiet and ease, which no prince can have that rules by an Army: therefore, before we can expect that his maj. will come in to us, these people of arbitrary principles must be removed from his throne: for, whilst there are the same advisers, we must expect the same advice; whilst there are the same counsellors, we must expect the same results: and this alone will not do it, it is but the first step to our happiness; the principles or maxims of state must be removed, it is not taking away this or the other man, and putting in another to act by the same rules, that will cure our disease; but it is the change of principles that must do it.—You may remember in the last parliament the change that was made in the Privy Council, and Ministers, and upon the first news of it, I met with a gentleman that had a great servitor for White-Hall; says he, 'I hope now you are pleased, what can you expect more from his majesty?' I replied, I like it well; yet not so very well; for, said I, all is well that ends well, for all is not gold that glitters : I am not sure, that these men that are put out, have not left their principles behind them ; when those are gone, I shall like it very well.' The man was angry, and flung away, saying, you are hard to please ; and says I, you are easy, and so we parted.—And I pray you, how much wool have we had after all this cry, what benefit have we reaped by that change ? Do not we see, that unless they would act by the maxims of their predecessors, they must do nothing ; and therefore several did desire leave to go off ? Some of those worthy lords and gentlemen that did so are now in my eye, and I shall ever honour them for it : I cannot forget the promises made to the parliament at the same time, and how well they have been kept.—Therefore I think it is very plain, that till these principles are removed from White-Hall, that all our labour and pains will end in nothing : the way then as I conceive to do this, is to lay before his maj. the state of the case ; let us shew him how unable these men are to serve him, and how destructive to his interest it is to follow their advices ; and that he can be safe and great only by closing with his parliament.—Would his maj. be safe, alas, what can his creatures do ? Just nothing, they have no power, nor have they will farther than it serves for their own advantage : but his maj. is safe in his parliament, for it is the interest of every man in England to preserve and defend his majesty's governing by his parliament.—Does he want Money to make him easy ? I pray what can he expect from the caterpillars his favourites ? Their care is not how to serve him, but to make their own fortunes : but from his parliament he need not want very plentiful supplies, to preserve the honour of himself and the kingdom. Would he maintain his dominions and rights, what can his creatures do ? But when he closes with his parl. he can neither want the heads, hearts, nor purses of his people to serve him : so that whatever his maj. would have, it is only to be had by his parliament : for his favourites cannot in the least contribute to make him safe or honourable ; or whatever else a king may want or desire : all the use a king can have from his favourites, is to have stories and lies to set him at variance with his people. I hope when the case is laid before his majesty, that he will close with us ; but if his judgment is so prepossessed, that it will not convince him of his interest, then we must conclude, that it is with him as it was with Rehoboam, who forsook the council of the old men, and inclined to that of the young men, who counselled him to tell the people that his little finger should be thicker than his father's loins ; and I pray what was the effect of that bustling speech ? Why ten tribes were taken from him, and it was not his young men that could recover them for him again ; neither was it without a parliament that his maj. was brought into England ; I hope his maj. has not forgot it.—Let them advise what they will, but I am confident they will think on it a good while, before they will adventure to put those arbitrary councils into execution ; it will prove a hot matter to handle : for though I hope no man here will lift up his hand against his majesty, yet we may oppose any man that does seek to invade our properties : and for my own part, I will pistol any subject, be he the greatest in England, that shall endeavour to deprive me of my just right : let us do what we can to effect an union between the king and his people, and leave the success to God Almighty, and his will be done.

Articles of Impeachment against Lord Chief Justice Scroggs.] Jan. 5, 1680-1. Sir Rd. Corbet reported the Articles appointed to be drawn up against sir Wm. Scroggs, lord chief justice of the king's-bench, which were as follows :

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT OF High-Treason and other great Crimes and Misdemeanours against sir Wm. Scroggs, Chief Justice of the Court of King's-Bench, by the Commons in Parliament assembled, in their own name, and in the name of all the Commons of England.

I. "That he the said sir Wm. Scroggs, being then Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws, and the established Religion and government of this kingdom ; and, instead thereof, to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law : which he hath declared by divers traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions.—II. That the said sir Wm. Scroggs, in Trinity-term last, being then Chief Justice of the said Court, and having taken an oath duly to administer justice, according to the laws and statutes of this realm ; in pursuance of his said traitorous purposes, did, together with the rest of the said justices of the said court, several days before the end of the said term, in an arbitrary manner discharge the Grand Jury, which then served for the hundred of Oswaldston, in the county of Middlesex, before they had made their presentments, or had found several bills of indictment which were then before them ; whereof the said sir Wm. Scroggs was then fully informed, and that the same would be tendered to the court upon the last day of the said term ; which day then was, and, by the known course of the said court, hath always heretofore been given unto the said jury, for the delivering in of their Bills and Presentments : by which sudden and illegal discharge of the said jury, the course of justice was stopped maliciously and designedly, the presentments of many papists and other offenders were obstructed, and in particular a bill of indictment against James duke of York, for absenting himself from church, which was then before them, was prevented from being proceeded upon.—III. That whereas one Henry Carr had, for some time before, published every week a certain Book, intituled,

'The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; or, The History of Popery;' wherein the superstitions and cheats of the Church of Rome were from time to time exposed; he the said sir Wm. Scroggs, then Chief Justice of the Court of King's-Bench, together with the other judges of the said court, before any legal conviction of the said Carr of any crime, did, in the same Trinity-Term, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, make, and cause to be entered a certain Rule of that court, against the printing of the said book, in hæc verba: 'Dies Mercurii proxime post tres septimanas sanctæ Trinitatis, Anno 32 Car. ii. Regis. Ordinatum est quod liber intitulat, 'The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; or, the History of Popery,' non ulterius imprimatur vel publicetur per aliquam personam quamcunque. Per Cur.' And did cause the said Carr, and divers printers and other persons, to be served with the same; which said rule and other proceedings were most apparently contrary to all justice, in condemning not only what had been written, without hearing the parties, but also all that might for the future be written on that subject; a manifest countenancing of Popery, and discouragement of Protestants, and open invasion upon the right of the subject, and an encroaching and assuming to themselves a legislative power and authority.—IV. That the said sir Wm. Scroggs, since he was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench, hath, together with the other judges of the said court, most notoriously departed from all rules of justice and equality, in the imposition of Fines upon persons convicted of misdemeanors in the said court; and particularly in the term of Easter last past, did openly declare in the said court, in the case of one Jessop, who was convicted of publishing false news, and was then to be fined, that he would have regard to persons and their principles in imposing of Fines, and would set a fine of 500*l.* on one person for the same offence, for the which he would not fine another 100*l.* And according to his said unjust and arbitrary declaration, he the said sir Wm. Scroggs, together with the said other justices, did then impose a Fine of 100*l.* upon the said Jessop; although the said Jessop had, before that time, proved one Hewit to be convicted as author of the said false news. And afterwards in the same term did fine the said Hewit, upon his said conviction, only 5 marks. Nor hath the said sir Wm. Scroggs, together with the other judges of the said court, had any regard to the nature of the offences, or the ability of the persons, in the imposing of Fines; but have been manifestly partial and favourable to Papists, and persons affected to, and promoting the popish interest, in this time of imminent danger from them: and at the same time have most severely and grievously oppressed his majesty's protestant subjects, as will appear upon view of the several Records of Fines, set in the said court; by which arbitrary, unjust, and partial proceedings, many of his majesty's liege people have been ruined, and Popery countenanced under colour of justice; and all the mischiefs and excesses of the court of Star-Chamber, by act of parliament suppressed, have been again, in direct opposition to the said law, introduced.—V. That he, the said sir Wm. Scroggs, for the farther accomplishing of his said traitorous and wicked purposes, and designing to subject the persons, as well as the estates of his majesty's liege people, to his lawless will and pleasure, hath frequently refused to accept of Bail, though the same were sufficient, and legally tendered to him by many persons accused before him only of such crimes, for which by law bail ought to have been taken; and divers of the said persons being only accused of offences against himself; declaring at the same time, that he refused Bail, and committed them to goal, only to put them to charges; and using such furious threats as were to the terror of his majesty's subjects, and such scandalous expressions as were a dishonour to the government, and to the dignity of his office. And particularly, that he, the said sir W. Scroggs, did, in 1679, commit and detain in prison, in such unlawful manner, among others, Henry Carr, G. Broome, Edw. Berry, Benj. Harris, Fr. Smith, sen. Fr. Smith, jun. and Jane Curtis, citizens of London: which proceedings of the said sir W. Scroggs are a high breach of the liberty of the subject, destructive to the fundamental laws of this realm, contrary to the Petition of Right, and other statutes, and do manifestly tend to the introducing of arbitrary power.—VI. That the said sir W. Scroggs, in farther oppression of his majesty's liege people, hath, since his being made Chief Justice of the said Court of King's Bench, in an arbitrary manner granted divers General Warrants for attaching the persons, and seizing the goods of his majesty's subjects, not named or described particularly in the said warrants; by means whereof many of his majesty's subjects have been vexed, their houses entered into, and they themselves grievously oppressed contrary to law.—VII. Whereas there hath been a horrid and damnable Plot contrived and carried on by the Papists, for the murdering the king, the subversion of the laws and government of this kingdom, and for the destruction of the Protestant Religion in the same; all which the said sir W. Scroggs well knew, having himself not only tried, but given judgment against several of the offenders; nevertheless, the said sir W. Scroggs did, at divers times and places, as well sitting in court as otherwise, openly defame and scandalize several of the witnesses, who had proved the said treasons against divers of the conspirators, and had given evidence against divers other persons, who were then untried, and did endeavour to disparage their evidence, and take off their credit. Whereby, as much as in him lay, he did traitorously and wickedly suppress and stifle the discovery of the said Popish Plot, and encourage the conspirators to proceed in the same, to the great and apparent danger of his majesty's sacred life, and of the well-established government, and religion of this realm. VIII. When as the said sir W. Scroggs, being advanced to be Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, ought, by a sober, grave and virtuous conversation, to have given a good example to the king's liege people, and to demean himself answerable to the dignity of so eminent a station; yet he the said sir W. Scroggs, on the contrary, by his frequent and notorious excesses and debaucheries, and his prophane and atheistical discourses, doth daily affront Almighty God, dishonour his majesty, give countenance and encouragement to all manner of vice and wickedness, and bring the highest scandal on the public justice of the kingdom.—All which words, opinions and actions of the said sir W. Scroggs, were by him spoken and done, traitorously, wickedly, falsely and maliciously, to alienate the hearts of the king's subjects from his majesty, and to set a division between him and them; and to subvert the fundamental laws, and the established religion and government of this kingdom, and to introduce Popery, and an arbitrary and tyrannical government, contrary to his own knowledge, and the known laws of the realm of England. And thereby he, the said sir W. Scroggs, hath not only broken his own oath, but also, as far as in him lay, hath broken the king's oath to his people; whereof he, the said sir W. Scroggs, representing his maj. in so high an office of justice, had the custody: for which the said commons do impeach him the said sir W. Scroggs, of high-treason against our sovereign lord the king, and his crown and dignity, and other the high crimes and misdemeanours aforesaid.—And the said commons, by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir W. Scroggs, and also of replying to the Answer that he shall make thereunto, and of offering Proofs of the premises, or of any other Impeachments or Accusations that shall be by them exhibited against him, as the case shall (according to the course of parliament) require; do pray, that the said sir W. Scroggs may be put to answer to all and every the premises, and may be committed to safe custody; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials and judgments, may be upon him had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice, and the course of parliaments. Upon which, the house came to this Resolution:

Resolved, "That the said sir Wm. Scroggs be impeached upon the said Articles, and that they be ingrossed, and carried up to the lords, by my lord Cavendish."

Several other Judges ordered to be impeached. Ordered, "That the committee appointed to examine the proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-hall, and to prepare Impeachments against sir F. North, chief justice of the Common Pleas; sir Tho. Jones, one of the justices of the court of King's Bench; and sir

R. Weston, one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer, do bring in such Impeachments with all convenient speed."

But the parliament being soon after prorogued, this affair was dropped. However, the lord chief justice Scroggs was removed from his high station, and allowed a pension for life.

Resolution concerning the Irish Plot.] Jan. 6. Col. Birch made a Report of the Informations relating to the Irish Plot, and several Irish witnesses were examined. And a Message from the lords about the Irish Plot read: Resolved, "By the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That they do declare, that they are fully satisfied that there now is, and, for divers years last past, hath been a horrid and treasonable Plot contrived and carried on, by those of the Popish religion in Ireland, for massacring the English, and subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient established government of that kingdom; to which Resolution their lordships desire the concurrence of this house." Upon this, a debate ensued, after which, it was resolved, "That this house doth agree with the lords in the said Vote, with the addition of these words, 'That the duke of York's being a Papist, and the expectation of his coming to the crown, hath given the greatest countenance and encouragement thereto, as well as to the horrid Popish Plot in this kingdom of England.'"

The Earl of Tyrone impeached.] A motion being made and seconded, for the impeaching of the earl of Tyrone, Resolved, "That Rd. Poure, earl of Tyrone in the kingdom of Ireland, be impeached of High Treason." Ordered, "That the lord Dursly go up to the bar of the lords, and impeach him of High Treason in the name of this house, and of all the commons of England, and do pray that he may be committed to safe custody."

The King's Message refusing to pass a Bill of Exclusion.] Jan. 7. A Message from the king, was read, as follows:

"C. R. His majesty received the Address of this house, with all the disposition they could wish, to comply with their reasonable desires; but upon perusing it, he is sorry to see their thoughts so wholly fixed upon the Bill of Exclusion, as to determine that all other Remedies for the suppressing of Popery will be ineffectual: his majesty is confirmed in his opinion against that Bill, by the judgment of the house of lords, who rejected it. He therefore thinks, there remains nothing more for him to say, in Answer to the Address of this house, but to recommend to them, the consideration of all other means for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, in which they have no reason to doubt of his concurrence, whenever they shall be presented to him in a parliamentary way: and that they would consider the present state of the kingdom, as well as the condition of Christendom, in such a manner as may enable him to preserve Tangier, and secure his Alliances abroad, and the Peace and Settlement at home."

Debate on the King's Message.] Mr. H. Booth. Sir, his majesty is pleased to say in his Message, that he is confirmed in his opinion against the Exclusion-bill, by the judgment of the house of lords; and that he is sorry to see that this house hath such an opinion of it, as to conclude all other ways and means insufficient. He is also pleased to say, that we have no reason to doubt his concurrence, in any other means that shall tend to the preservation of the Protestant Religion, when presented to him in a parliamentary way, which I do not doubt but he will comply with, whenever he shall be pleased to follow the dictates of his own judgment. But so long as there are so many persons about him, who have publicly declared for the duke's interest, we have good reason to doubt, that we shall hardly obtain any thing for the security of the Protestant Religion. We well know how many in the house of lords came to their honours, and by whose interest; and it is not strange, that those that are as servants should obey their master; but it is strange, that those who have prevailed with the king to reject this Bill, if Protestants, should be so unconcerned in the welfare of the Protestant Religion, as not to offer what Expedients they have, to secure it any other way; especially seeing the last parliament, as well as this, found it a task too hard for them. But to reject the Bill which we propose, and to offer no other to serve instead thereof, though they have had two years time for consideration, is to me plain demonstration, that nothing must be had against popery. That these difficulties should be put upon us, and our dangers thus prolonged in favour of the duke, after such full evidence that the Plot centers all in him, and that the original of our miseries is from him, when the immediate safety of the king, and our lives and religion, is concerned on the other hand, is a plain discovery of the great power of the Popish interest, and of the low ebb of the Protestants, and that it is impossible that any thing can be granted us in favour of the Protestant Religion, as long as those that are so much for the duke's interest, are about the king. And therefore seeing we are not like to do any thing by Bill, that those that sent us here may see we have done what we can, let us make such Votes as may be serviceable to our country, viz. 1. That neither the king's Person nor Protestant Religion, can be secured any way without the Exclusion-Bill. 2. That we can give no Money, without endangering the king's Person and Protestant Religion, until we have that Bill. And, 3. That seeing Supplies for all public Money ought to come from this house, there being no other way to supply the king with the love of his people, as well as with Money, let us pass a Vote to prevent Anticipations on the Revenue and other Supplies. And because I believe things are come to a point, and that there are those that have advised the Dissolution of this parliament, and the nation can never be happy as long as we have such counsellors, let us, while we may, pass our censures on such persons; for only God knows when we shall be permitted to sit here again.

Lord Russell. It appears plainly by the king's Message, what interest is prevalent at court, the duke's creatures; which is so great, that little good can be effected. Where Popery is so countenanced, we can do little good. Nothing can save the nation but union betwixt the king and the parliament. We have done our parts to procure it; the parliament will never be undisposed to do it; but unfortunately some get betwixt the king and us, to frustrate our good intentions, and to promote the duke's interest, though to the king's destruction. We know who have advised the king to these things, and that he should not pass the Bill of Exclusion. Therefore I am of Booth's opinion, to stick to the Bill, as our only security, and to brand those that have hindered it from passing.

Mr. Montagu. Sir, the truth is, we committed a great error in the beginning of this session; when we went about to look into the Popish Plot, we went into the Tower, whereas we should have gone to the court; for it is plain, that the duke's friends which are there, do still carry on the Plot against the protestant religion, as much as ever the lord Bellasis, Powis, or any of those lords in the Tower did. And we may reasonably conclude by the little success we have had against popery this session, that until we can remove that interest from about the king, we take pains to no purpose.

Sir H. Capel. Sir, I am ready to agree in those Votes that were moved: For it appears plain to me, that we are not like to have any laws against popery: for the truth is, the popish interest is too strong for us. If there were any intent that we should have the protestant religion secured any other way, it is strange that those who advise the king to oppose our way, should not at the same time prevail with him to propose his. I am afraid that this advice proceeds from those that think the king or kingdom are not in danger of popery, because they are of opinion, that popery cannot hurt the king nor kingdom; for otherwise they might plainly see it is like to have a contest with us: and that it would be convenient it should be prevented, and be induced thereby to offer some expedient, if there be any. And as we may conclude ourselves an unhappy people upon these accounts, so also in that the house of lords, after they had spent so much time about Expedients, and found them insufficient, should afterwards reject this Bill, without any farther care how to preserve the protestant religion; at least, not by sending any thing to this house, though we have heard from them of Mr. Seymour's Articles, and some trivial matters. And also in that some worthy members, who have the honour to serve in great places about his majesty, and have opposed this Bill, seeing this house in this great dilemma, should not offer to do the nation and this house that kindness as to propose them. If there be any such worthy member that has any such Expedient, I hope he will stand up, and then I will presently sit down. [After a little pause, and nobody offering to stand up;] The truth is, Sir, every day doth more and more discover our danger, and demonstrate, that this of Expedients is put upon us, in hopes that we should have offered at some Bill; of which advantage might be taken, to represent us as persons not well affected to the government, that so, if possible, even the people, as well as the king, might be brought out of love with parliaments. I do remember, that after the great endeavours which some ministers of state had used to bribe the late Long Parliament, and had come so near to perfection, as that the nation was in a manner saved but by two or three votes, this Dissolution was much admired at; and it was most men's business to cast about to find out the reason of it: Amongst other things it was concluded, That if the popish interest had any hand in it (as believed) that it was out of hopes, that they should thereby have an opportunity to make the king out of love with all parliaments, and so occasion some difference between him and his people. The little success which the last parliament had, the improbability of this, and the stumbling-blocks that are laid for the next, make me afraid that the Long Parliament was dissolved for this reason: I have heard that the Jesuits have at this time a great stroke in the management of all the affairs of Europe, and that it is by their advice and assistance, that the king of France goeth on so triumphantly, because they design to make him universal monarch, and in order thereto are true to him, though false to all the world besides. How far we have contributed already to the king of France his greatness, and how this breaking off parliaments, and keeping this nation in this unsettled condition, may conduce to his taking of Flanders and Holland, and his other designs, all here may judge: And how it agrees with the report of the Jesuits having the management of all the affairs of Europe: And how this can be prevented, without the Exclusion Bill, is a paradox to me. For I do still conclude, that so long as there is a Popish Successor, there will be a popish interest, and that as long as there is a popish interest and fears of a popish king, the nation will be divided, and there will be constant fears and jealousies, not only here at home, but with our allies abroad; which will frustrate all endeavours to oppose the French designs, because there can be no confidence between the king and his people. And this makes me conclude, we are under great difficulties; if we give money, we have reason to fear it may be employed to our destruction; if we do not, if Flanders or Holland should be lost, great endeavours will be used to lay it at our doors, though we have given such hearty assurances to his majesty, of our readiness to supply him with money for the support of it. And how we shall extricate ourselves out of these difficulties, I know not. —Sir, I have troubled you the longer, and with the more earnestness, because I am doubtful whether I may ever have another opportunity to speak in this place. Things are so out of order, and such prevalent endeavours are used to unsettle them the more, that I am afraid, not only of our religion, but of the very government and being of the English nation: for if these things should occasion blood, while the French king is so powerful, he may easily have the casting voice; and without that, only God knows what may be the end of such confusions as some men endeavour to occasion. All projects of settling the affairs of this nation without parliaments, have hitherto proved unsuccessful, and been attended with ill consequences. I have a great deal of reason to be sensible of the miseries of 41, and therefore am sorry to see such dissolutions of parliaments without success. I am afraid there are projectors again a-foot, that are for altering the government, as to the use of parliaments: I judge so by their proceedings, because I am of opinion, that popery must destroy the use of parliaments, before it can be settled in this nation. Seeing we are not like to have any act pass this session that may do the nation any good, I think you have been well moved to do what service you can by your votes.

Mr. L. Hyde. Sir, it is not only very strange, but, if I be not mistaken, contrary to the custom of parliaments, that after the lords have passed a negative upon a bill, we should still press for it, and declare ourselves resolved not to be satisfied without it, though it be well known that the king doth also intend to pass his negative upon it; and that it cannot be had this session, unless his majesty be pleased to prorogue the house, of purpose to give an opportunity to go on with it again, which is very unlikely, if the contents of his Speeches and Messages be considered, seeing the lords have confirmed him in his opinion of it. And therefore I should think it were much better to follow his majesty's directions in his Message, and to try some other way, which would be a great confirmation of our readiness to obey his majesty, in following his advice, which, I believe, is the best way to prevent any farther disagreement, that so this parliament may have a happy conclusion.

Lord Cavendish. Sir, I am fully persuaded, that we cannot be secure, neither of our religion nor peace and quietness, without this Bill; yet seeing we are not like to have it at this time, I am for going on with those other bills that are afoot, that we may try if we can get them. Seeing we cannot do all the good we would, let us endeavour to do all the good we can. But I am ready to agree in the vote that was proposed, That it is the opinion of this house, that neither the king's person, nor Protestant religion can be secured any other way, provided it be not intended to bind the house from trying what may be done by other laws, lest advantage should be taken thereof to break this parliament, which I tremble to think of, because it will be attended with a great ruin to our affairs both abroad and at home.

Sir R. Markham. Sir, being the house is inclinable to hear of Expedients, I will crave leave to offer you one. In case the duke should outlive the king, I think, if by an act of parliament, the prince of Orange were appointed to administer the government jointly with him, with such powers and limitations as might be thought convenient upon a serious debate, it might give great satisfaction, and probably secure the Protestant religion. [Laughed at.]

Mr. Hampden. You seem, by the debate, to incline to think that no other way can secure us, but the Bill, and I am still of opinion, I could wish I could hear Expedients; but none were offered this parliament; what were offered was the last parliament. When we go to fight, we are offered a bean-straw instead of a sword to fight with. Nothing was offered the last parliament like an Expedient. You found all the laws in being, made by the wisdom of your ancestors for your safety, frustrated by the duke: this is no new thing since 1670; Have not all things been so? 2,500,000*l.* was given to make a brave war with the Dutch; the money was got, and the peace made, but the Dutch would not. But it had another effect; it helped to ruin a Protestant neighbour. And so many more sums. Have you not had great fruit of all this? Is not France brought very low? All laws are put in execution except those against popery, when it comes to the highest. What has been done in the interval of parliament? A few apprentices, for pulling down bawdy-houses, were hanged for treason. And this in the reign of a Protestant prince! What must we expect under a Popish prince? Will your laws be better preserved? Do you think to live in England and be protestants? It is so absurd a thing, no man can imagine it. But I do not know whether parliamentarily the king can take notice of the lords rejecting our Bill of excluding the duke. The proviso in the Long Parliament, to exempt the duke from the oaths and test, was so little rectified here (I thought it would have passed without contradiction) that it was carried but by two voices. And now the Plot has been these two years discovered, and we have been handling it, and making sport with it; but I believe we have had, and have a Plot, and we are in more danger than ever. Secure the Protestant religion, else all things besides will be ineffectual. I will say nothing more to the ministers; but if we admit any remedy, without the Bill of Exclusion, we expose the kingdom and the Protestant religion to ruin.

Sir Wm. Jones. Sir, you have had several propositions made you, and the way to come to some speedy resolution, is not to debate too many together, but to keep close to that to which most have spoken; which, if I be not mistaken, is that which relates to the duke's Bill, which some have opposed, because of the dificulties arising from the Bill, and would rather have you go into a committee, and treat of Expedients. But I think it below the gravity of the house to be put out of their method, unless some Expedients were proposed. But notwithstanding all the provocations that have been given, we cannot hear of any expedients, only one, which hardly deserves any farther consideration in a committee; because crowned heads or lovers, do not willingly allow of rivals, but will be uneasy till they be rid of them. And I am afraid all other expedients will be liable to as strong objections; and that therefore it is that they are not proposed, though they have been so often discoursed of. If any person would offer any, that had any appearance of giving satisfaction, I should be ready to give my voice for going into a committee to debate them. But I know not why the house should lose that time, without some expedient be first offered; and if there could be any expedients found out, which were likely, really and effectually to prejudice the duke's interest, why should not the same argument arise against them, as against the Exclusion Bill? Why would not any such bill be also against natural justice, the oath of allegiance, be a severe condemnation, and not good in law, but liable to occasion a civil war? For I am not apt to think this great contest is all about an empty name; and if not, then the same arguments will hold against any other Bill, that will be sufficient to keep him from the government, if some such bill or bills could be contrived, as against the Bill of Exclusion: but the truth is, there can be no other bill that can serve us in this case, because all other bills will leave us in that miserable condition of opposing our lawful king, and all opposition in such a case, would be liable to be construed a rebellion. All other bills in this case would be no more for the security of our religion, than a great many leases, releases, and other writings, are in many cases of estates, without fines and recoveries. However, I am against the vote that was proposed, That the duke's being a Papist hath rendered him incapable of the crown: for that were to take on us a legislative power; but let your question be, That it is the opinion of this house, that the king's person, and Protestant religion, cannot be secure without that Bill: that so the proceedings of the house may be justified, in demanding that Bill hereafter, though we should in the mean time go on with any other bills.

Mr. D. Finch. Sir, The question is at present, whether, seeing we cannot have this Bill, we shall not aim at something else, that so, if possible, we may prevent the breaking up of this parliament, without any effect, as to the great things they were summoned for, on which I cannot reflect without being much concerned; and I am afraid that it will be the consequence of persisting for this bill. I cannot be persuaded, notwithstanding all that hath been said, but that there are other Bills that may attain our end, or at least do us some good.

and we have no certain demonstration that this bill, if we should obtain it, will infallibly do what is desired. The act made in Eliz.'s days did not suppress that party totally: though the queen of Scots was cut off, yet that interest continued, and even to this day remains, and so it may probably though we could get this bill; and therefore why should we stand so much in our own light, as not to do what we can get? The Bill of Banishment may be of great use, and some bills to limit the power of such a prince, by putting the power in parliaments and privy counsellors; why should we lose all by being so eager for that we are never like to get? And therefore, I humbly conceive, we may do better to go on with such other bills as may be thought convenient, and not struggle nor persist for the obtaining of this.

Col. Birch. Sir, I am not for adventuring my life upon rhetoric, which is all I can find here is in the discourses that are made for expedients. We all know that a little thing altered the government in France, and reduced the people of that kingdom to slavery: may let us have a care that, for want of a little short act, we be not reduced to slavery and Popery too. Will not all the expedients that have been talked of, or can be imagined, save us to contest with our lawful prince, and that assistance which he is well assured of, not only from the Papists here, but in Ireland, and from France and Scotland, I am afraid, enough to make it a measuring cast? And is the Protestant interest so low, that though our dangers be so great, instead of a sword to defend ourselves, we must be content with a sheath?

I am not for cheating those that sent me here: I think it much more for the interest of the nation, that we should have no laws, than such as will but trepan us, by failing us like rotten crutches when we have occasion to depend on them; I had rather lose my life and my religion, because I were not able to defend them, than be fooled out of them by depending on such laws. I take it for granted, that seeing the Exclusion-bill is thought too much for us, and such great endeavours are used to preserve the strength and interest of that party, that we must either submit, or defend our religion by a sharp contest; and therefore I hope we shall not depend on laws that will tend to weaken us. I am confident, that if some ministers of state did not stand as clouds between the king and us, we should have redress. For how can we consist with his goodness or coronation-oath, but for the interest of one man, the bodies and souls of the rest of his subjects should be in such danger of perishing, as they are in case of his death, if a popish king should succeed, and such popish counsellors, judges, justices, and bishops too, as we had in queen Mary's days? For it cannot be doubted, but that those that will be so loyal as to bring him in, will be so loyal, as it will be called, to obey him in all things which may be for his interest.

And the same argument, which queen Mary used, will supply the defect of all laws, that the execution of all ecclesiastical laws may be suspended by force, but could never be repealed by the power of parliaments; and therefore commanded, that notwithstanding all laws to the contrary, they should be executed as in the beginning of her father's reign. The great endeavours that are used to ridicule the Plot, arraign parliaments, and divide the Protestant Interest, is a full confirmation to me, that the Plot goeth on as much as ever. And how can it be otherwise, unless we can get the king of our side, that so he may be more for us than he is for the duke, without which it is impossible that the Protestant Interest can stand long. In order to do something, I am ready to agree in the Votes that have been made.

Mr. G. V. (Probably Geo. Vernon.) Sir, it is clear to me, that all Expedients without this Bill cannot signify any thing for our defence against Popery. All our difficulty will be, to satisfy his majesty, that nothing else can save his people from the popish bondage. And if we could do that, I do not doubt but he will rather pass the Bill, than let three nations perish. The king doth now rely on the judgment of the lords in the matter, yet happily will find upon an information, that he hath no good ground so to do. For I believe, if he would ask the lords why they were of that opinion, many of them would tell him, because he was of that opinion, and because they were awed by his presence. And it is my opinion, there wants nothing but a conference to have an agreement with the lords; in the mean time, that they may have occasion to consider better of it, let us by a Vote declare our resolution to stick to the Bill.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. Sir, by the debate which you have had about Expedients, it plainly appears that the Popish Interest is so well fixed, that we are not like to obtain any thing against it, that will do us any good. And it is not strange, that we should meet with great opposition. For we may reasonably conclude, that those, who had the power to instil those principles into the royal family, have not been negligent to improve their interest, to secure those advantages they have long hoped for, and expected, from such a proselyte. And therefore those arguments which some worthy members have used, as to the improbability that ever a popish king should attempt to change our religion, as not consisting with his interest, are to me very preposterous, and a great demonstration of the influence of that party, in being able to broach such opinions, as are so useful to bring in that religion. For my part, I am of a different judgment, and do believe, that a popish head on a Protestant body, would be such a monster in nature, as would neither be fit to preserve, or be preserved; and that therefore it would as naturally follow, as night follows day, that either the head will change the body, or the body the head. Have we not already had sufficient experience, what a miserable thing it is for the king to be jealous of his people, or the people of their prince? Can it be imagined that there can be a popish king in this nation, without occasioning a constant noise of Plots and Popery, and that such reports, grounded on the king's inclinations, will not occasion such a fermentation in the people, as will end in misery? Or, if it should prove otherwise, that by such arts as may probably then be set on foot, the people should be lulled into a security? Can we think that the Papists, who have been so many ages at work for the opportunity, should not take advantage of that security, to fetter us with their popish bondage? We may as well think that they will all then turn Protestants, or be true to the Protestant Interest. No, sir, their great design of having a Popish Successor was in order to bring in Popery. And we may conclude, they will heartily and earnestly pursue it, whenever they shall have a popish king. And therefore, I think, it will never become the prudence of this house, to desist from endeavouring to get the Exclusion-Bill, which is the only remedy that can be in this case, that we may have a right to defend ourselves and our religion against a Popish Successor, without which, this nation will be in time ruined.

Sir F. Winnington. Sir, I have considered this Message with that duty and respect I ought; it doth so agree with all others which his maj. hath been pleased to send to this parliament, that I do believe that all proceed from the same council, and that our endeavours to prevail with his majesty, in that particular of changing councils, hath hitherto had no effect. The king is pleased to say, that he is confirmed in his opinion as to the Bill, by the house of lords having rejected it; I admire how the king should know it in a parliamentary way, so as to intimate so much to this house. Probably he might be present, as he hath generally been, ever since my lord Clifford had so great a share in the management of the affairs of this kingdom. And how things have gone there since, we all know. I do not doubt but his maj. takes that unparalleled trouble of attending there daily, chiefly for the good of the Protestant religion; but I cannot but observe, that it hath had little success. For, things, however, have gone with so much difficulty against the popish party, that it may be a question, whether his royal presence, or the influence of a Popish Successor were strongest. The Bill for Papists taking the Test, though accompanied with a great sum of money, passed with much difficulty, and so that for excluding the lords, and not without an exception as to his royal highness: and therefore we have no great reason to admire, that this about the Succession should be thrown out: and how can we expect it should be otherwise, as long as so many who sit there are in the possession of great places by the duke's means; and so many others who would come into great places, which cannot be had but by his means? And how this altogether makes an interest, may easily be imagined. Sir, I do not mention these things without regret; for I know my distance, and have a great veneration for the nobility of this land; and I know the lords have their freedom of voting, and that there are many sit in the lords house, who have all the qualifications necessary for that great station. But to see a Bill of this importance treated so contrary to the usual course of parliament, it is necessary that we should a little consider what may be the cause, in order to regulate our proceedings for the future: for if nothing must go in that house against the duke, I think the Protestant Religion is like to have little security from acts. If the duke had ever consulted the books writ by his grandfather or father, or their Declarations in matters of Religion, he would never have brought these difficulties upon his king and country. It is strange he should aim to get Heaven, by proceedings so contrary to what his father attested with his blood. But though he hath neglected to consult his interest, I hope we shall not neglect to consult ours, in pursuing this Bill, seeing there is no other remedy: though I am afraid it is a great work, and may break many parliaments, because it is so like to destroy all the Papists hopes of establishing their religion. However, I will not fear but, God granting the king life, it may be obtained at last; unless the project now a-foot, of representing parliaments as dangerous and useless, should prevent the meeting of any more: for even the old Band of Pensioners could slip their collars, when Popery came bare-faced before them. It is not to be admired, that, seeing the Jesuits have been 100 years at work to rivet their interest, by getting a prince of their religion, they should struggle hard to preserve it, that so they may have those blessed effects they expect from it, which the succession-Bill only can prevent. But it is strange, that, after such discoveries of the Plot here and in Ireland, and the certainty of our irrecoverable danger upon the king's death, that so many Protestants should be deluded by that party, and rather be led by artificial falsehoods, to their own destruction, than by naked truth, to join in that which only can save them. For Protestants to ridicule the Plot, and disparage the Witnesses, though their evidence is so confirmed, that a man may as well believe that bread may be made flesh by transubstantiation, as that the danger of our religion is not true, is as strange as to believe, that let the Papists carry on what Plots they will for the future, there will be ever any more discoveries made: but if there should, I am sure the witnesses will deserve the censure of being mad (as was passed on him that owned the burning of London) considering how those have been rewarded. It is plain to me, that, as the king was under great difficulties, arising from the solicitations and advices of private cabals, when he put out his Declaration in April 1679, so he is now, and that it will never be otherwise, until he take up the same Resolution again of following the Advice of his privy-council, and great council the parliament: till when, I expect no alteration of our affairs.

Sir L. Jenkins. Sir, I have hearkened with great attention to the debates you have had about this matter; and it is plain to me, that there can be no such thing as demonstration in this case, because this Exclusion Act, if obtained, may be liable to many objections, and probably not secure us. Why then, should we be so bent upon it, seeing the great difficulties of obtaining it are so visible? For my part, I think if it should pass, it would be void of itself, and be of no force at all: for which reason, and because we are not like to get it, it is strange to me, that no arguments will prevail to aim at some other things, that so we may get something, which must be better than to have this parliament be broken, for want of our taking what we may get. For supposing the worst, that we should not get any thing, that should be sufficient to prevent the duke's coming to the crown, yet we may get such laws as may be sufficient to secure our Religion, though he should come to it. And would it not be much better, to spend our time in making laws which may tend to that purpose, which we have reason to believe will be granted, than to spend our time in pursuing that we are not like to get? Some good laws added to what we have, and the number of people which we have in this nation Protestants, would in my opinion be an impregnable fence against Popery. And it is no such strange thing to have a prince of one religion and people of another. The late duke of Hanover was a Papist, yet lived in peace with his people, though Lutherans. The king of France, notwithstanding his greatness, permits a great proportion of his people to be Huguenots, and lives in peace with them. And seeing there is a great probability that we may do so too, and that we may have what laws we will, to secure our religion to us in such a case, why should we engage ourselves farther for the getting of an act, which the king and lords have both declared against, and will never be consented to by the king, as we may reasonably believe, because he hath often declared, that he thinks it an unlawful act, and that it is against his conscience?

Col. Titus. Sir; the great character this hon. member bears, the great employments he hath been in under his maj. abroad, as well as his education in the laws of this nation, do justly challenge, that what he saith, should be well weighed and considered, before any man should offer to contradict it. He is pleased to say, that this Act would be unlawful and invalid, if it should be obtained: and therefore, because we are not like to obtain it, and because the duke of Hanover, though a Papist, lived in peace with Lutherans, and the king of France with Huguenots, that we had better spend our time in contriving laws for the secuity of our Religion, if a Papist should come to the crown, which we may get; and not in contriving laws to keep him from the crown, which we are not like to have. If this be not in plain English, the sense of his discourse, I am willing to be corrected. But, sir, if it be, I do admire upon what foundation the first argument is grounded; I mean, that relating to the unlawfulness and invalidity of the Exclusion Bill. Was there ever any government in this world, that had not an unlimited power lodged somewhere? Or can it be possible that any government should stand, without such a power? And why such a power should not be allowed here, which is so essential for the support of the government, I think can only be in order (if I may say it without reflection) to have this government fall; and I am afraid even at this time, by this very business we are now debating. For it must be the consequence, of denying that the legislative power of the nation, king, lords, and commons, are not able to make the laws to prevent it. But as this opinion is strange, so are the politics drawn from the duke of Hanover, and king of France, to induce us to be willing to have a Popish king come to reign over us; when neither of the said examples come home to our case: but if they should, why must we be so willing to have a Popish king to govern us, as that we should be rather led by examples fetched so far from abroad, than by the miserable examples we had here in queen Mary's days; and by the undeniable arguments and reasons that have been offered to make out, that a Popish king will endeavour to bring in a Popish religion? And notwithstanding the example brought from France, I am afraid the French king is bound to assist the duke's interest therein; or otherways may be said of us, what the devil could not say of Job, that we have served him for nought, contrary to the true interest of England, these many years. But by these arguments, and all the king's Speeches and Messages, I plainly see, that this hon. member is in the right in one thing; that we struggle in vain to get any Act, that shall signify any thing to prevent the duke's coming to the crown: but that if you will aim at laws to secure your Religion after his coming to the crown, you may probably obtain them. If this be not plainly said, I think it is plainly inferred; for are not all his majesty's Speeches and Messages with an absolute prohibition as to any thing against the Succession? And I suppose will be as much understood against your Association Bill, or any other that tends to that purpose: and you may be sure, that when you come with any such, if so contrived as to signify any thing, that the same opposition shall be made to them as to the Exclusion Bill. For it is plain to me, that the king's offering to concur in any laws you shall propose for the securing of your Religion, compared with the other limitations, can only be so understood; which is a fair denial of all laws against Popery, at least those that advise it I the Penal Laws is at this time grievous to the subject, and a weakening to the Protestant Interest, and an encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the peace of this kingdom."

The Parliament dissolved.] The same day the king came to the house of peers, and prorogued the parliament to the 20th of Jan.; but dissolved it on the 18th, leaving 22 bills depending, and eight more that were ordered to be brought in, but never came to be debated.*

PRINCIPAL OCCURRENCES AFTER THE DISSOLUTION—LONDON PETITION—LONDON INSTRUCTIONS TO THEIR MEMBERS—PETITION AGAINST SITTING AT OXFORD.]

The prorogation being attended with some very extraordinary consequences, we cannot avoid laying some of the principal before our readers, as the most proper introduction to the meeting of the next. On the 13th of January, the lord-mayor of London, sir Patience Ward, with a court of common-council, ordered a Petition to be drawn up, and presented to the king, setting forth, "That whereas the parliament had convicted one of the five Popish lords in the Tower, and were about to convict the other four of high-treason; that they had impeached the chief justice Scroggs, and were about to impeach other judges; and all this in order to the preservation of his majesty's Life, the Protestant religion, and the government of England: that they were extremely surprized to see the parliament prorogued in the height of their business: that their only hopes were, that this was done only in order to bring such affairs about again as were necessary to the settling the nation. They therefore prayed, that his maj. would be pleased to let the parliament sit at the day appointed, and so continue till they had effected all the great affairs before them." To this effect was the Petition, which was further ordered to be delivered that night, or as soon as might be, by the lord-mayor, attended by the new recorder George Treby,

* "Though the king came privately to the house this day, the commons had a quarter of an hour's previous notice. In which short interval, in a loose and disorderly manner, they made a shift to pass the above extraordinary Resolves. They had not time to proceed any farther, if they had any farther matter to proceed upon. While the last Vote was yet passing, the usher of the black-rod came to the door, and ordered their attendance on his majesty. Those who are pleased to assume the venerable title of Patriots, have given large scope to their resentments against the king for this anti-constitutional proceeding; and those who value themselves as much on the glory of being Loyalists, have shed their gall as freely on the commons for their licentious Votes; and it may serve as a general key to the modern History of England, 'That parties have never so good a title to be believed as when they expose each other.' Ralph.

esq. and certain members 'of the court of aldermen, and common-council. But this farther provoked the king, and hastened his resolution of finally parting with his parliament. Accordingly, two days before the time of their meeting, he by Proclamation dissolved the present parliament: and in the same Proclamation, he declared his intention of calling another parliament to meet on the 21st of March next. But, being offended at the city of London, and hoping to meet with better success by a removal, he appointed Oxford to be the place of their meeting, where he had formerly, in the year 1665, found the most imaginable harmony in and between both houses. —When the elections came on, the temper of the nation was soon discovered by their choice; both parties were extremely busy; and the city of London set the first example to the rest of the kingdom by returning their old members Clayton, Player, Pilkington, and Love; to whom, as soon as the election was over, an extraordinary Paper was presented in the name of the citizens of London then assembled in common-hall, containing, "A return of their most hearty Thanks for their faithful and unwearied endeavours, in the two last parliaments, to search into and discover the depth of the Popish Plot, to preserve his majesty's royal person, the protestant religion, and the well-established government of this realm; to secure the meeting and sitting of frequent Parliaments, to assert our undoubted rights of petitioning, and to punish such as have betrayed those rights, to promote the long wished-for union of his majesty's protestant subjects, to repeal the 35th of Eliz. and the Corporation-act; and more especially for their assiduous endeavours in promoting the Bill of Exclusion of James duke of York." In fine, they concluded, "That being confidently assured, that they, the said Members for the City, will never consent to the granting any Money-Supply, till they have effectually secured them against Popery and Arbitrary Power, they resolved, by God's assistance, to stand by their said members, with their lives and fortunes." In the like manner were the former members of parliament again chosen, in most places in the kingdom; and in many, such like Papers of Addresses were presented to them, in their respective countries, as had been done to their members by the commonality of London. And the zeal was now so great, that, contrary to the custom of the members treating the country, now the country in most places treated them, or at least every man bore his own charge.—The greatest uneasiness and disappointment to the prevailing party in the elections, was the place of their meeting, Oxford, the distance of which might naturally cause a diminution of their power and influence. Therefore it was resolved by several of the nobility to draw up a formal Petition against that place; which was early delivered to the king by the earl of Essex himself, who introduced it by this following Speech: "May it please your majesty,

The lords here present, together with divers other peers of the realm, taking notice that by your late Proclamation, your maj. had declared an intention of calling a parliament at Oxford; and observing from history and records, how unfortunate many assemblies have been, when called at a place remote from the capital city; as particularly the congress in Hen. ii's time at Clarendon; three several parliaments at Oxford in Hen. iii's, and at Coventry in Hen. vi's time; with divers others which have proved very fatal to those kings, and have been followed with great mischief on the whole kingdom: And considering the present posture of affairs, the many jealousies and discontentments which are amongst the people, we have great cause to apprehend, that the consequences of a parliament now at Oxford may be as fatal to your maj. and the nation, as those others mentioned have been to the then reigning kings. And therefore we do conceive, that we cannot answer it to God, to your majesty, or to the people, if we, being peers of the realm, should not on so important an occasion humbly offer our Advice to your majesty; that, if possible, your maj. may be prevailed with to alter this (as we apprehend) unseasonable resolution. The Grounds and Reasons of our opinion are contained in this our Petition, which we humbly present to your majesty."—The Petition itself consisted of a recapitulation of the misfortunes attending the untimely prorogations, dissolutions, and discontinuations of parliaments of late, at a time when his majesty's person, and the whole nation, was in imminent danger from the papists: "And now at last his maj. had been prevailed to call another parliament at Oxford, where neither lords nor commons could be in safety, but would be daily exposed to the sword of the papists, and their adherents, of whom too many had crept into his majesty's guards: The liberty of speaking according to their consciences would be thereby destroyed, and the validity of their acts and proceedings left disputable: the straitness of the place no ways admitted of such a concourse of persons, as now followed every parliament; and the Witnesses which were necessary to give Evidence upon the Commons Impeachment, were unable to bear the charges of such a journey, and unwilling to trust themselves under the protection of a parliament, that was itself evidently under the power of guards and soldiers. In conclusion, they prayed that the parliament might, as usually, sit at Westminster, where they might consult and act with safety and freedom." This Petition was subscribed by 16 lords, viz. Monmouth, Kent, Huntington, Bedford, Salisbury, Clare, Stamford, Essex, Shaftsbury, Mordant, Evers, Paget, Grey, Herbert, Howard, and Delamer. The king gave no answer that we find, but frowned upon the deliverers of this Petition, and persisted in his resolution of holding the parliament at Oxford: whither the king repaired with a great train, March 14, as likewise the members to attend him.—Those for the city of

VOL. IV.

London came with a numerous body of well-armed horse, having ribbands in their hats, with these words woven in them, 'No Popery, No Slavery!' And many others of the members were attended in the like manner, as apprehending some extraordinary designs of the papists against them; so that at length, the manner of their assembling, (says Mr. Echard,) looked more like the rendezvous of a country-militia, than the regular meeting of a parliament.

FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTH AND LAST PARLIAMENT OF KING CHARLES II.

but whosoever shall calmly consider what offers I have formerly made, and what assurances I renewed to the last parl.: how I recommended nothing so much to them, as the Alliances I had made for preservation of the general peace in Christendom, and the farther examination of the Popish Plot, and how I desired their advice and assistance concerning the preservation of Tangier; and shall then reflect upon the strange, unsuitable returns made to such propositions, by men that were called together to consult; perhaps, may wonder more, that I had patience so long, than that at least I grew weary of their proceedings.—I have thought it necessary to say thus much to you, that I may not have any new occasion given me to remember more of the late Miscarriages: it is as much my interest, and it shall be as much my care as yours, to preserve the Liberty of the Subject; because the crown can never be safe when that is in danger: and I would have you likewise be convinced, that neither your liberties nor properties can subsist long, when the just rights and prerogatives of the crown are invaded, or the honour of the government brought low, and into disreputation.—I let you see, by my calling this parliament so soon, that no irregularities in parliament shall make me out of love with them; and by this means, offer you another opportunity of providing for our security here, by giving that countenance and protection to our neighbours and allies, which you cannot but know they expect from us, and extremely stand in need of at this instant; and at the same time give one evidence more, that I have not neglected my part, to give that general satisfaction and security which, by the blessing of God, may be attained, if you, on your parts, bring suitable dispositions towards it: and that the just care you ought to have of Religion, be not so managed and improved into unnecessary fears, as may be made a pretence for changing the foundation of the government. I hope the example of the ill success of former heats, will dispose you to a better temper, and not so much inveigh against what is past, as to consider what is best to be done in the present conjuncture. The farther prosecution of the Plot; the Trial of the Lords in the Tower; the providing a more speedy Conviction of Recusants; and, if it be practicable, the riding ourselves quite of that party, that have any considerable authority or interest amongst them, are things, though of the highest importance, that hardly need to be recommended to you, they are so obvious to every man's consideration, and so necessary for our security. But I must needs desire you, not to lay so much weight upon any one expedient against Popery, as to determine that all others are ineffectual: and, among all your cares for Religion, remember, that without the safety and dignity of the Monarchy, neither Religion nor Property can be preserved.—What I have formerly, and so often declared touching the Succession, I cannot depart from. But to re-

SPEAKER—Mr. Serjeant Williams.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
Both houses being met, the king made this Speech to them:

“ My lords and gentlemen; The unwarrantable proceedings of the last house of commons, were the occasion of my parting with the last parliament; for I, who will never use arbitrary government myself, am resolved not to suffer it in others. I am unwilling to mention particulars, because I am desirous to forget faults;

love all reasonable fears that may arise from the possibility of a Popish Successor's coming to the crown; if means can be found, that in such a case the administration of the government may remain in Protestants hands, I shall be ready to hearken to any such experiment, by which the Religion might be preserved, and the Monarchy not destroyed. I must therefore earnestly recommend to you, to provide for the Religion and Government together, with regard to one another, because they support each other: and let us be soited to home, that we may recover the esteem and consideration we used to have abroad. I conclude with this one advice to you, That the rules and measures of all your Votes may be well known and established laws of the land; which neither can, nor ought to be departed from, nor changed, but by act of parliament: and I may the more reasonably require, That you make the laws of the land your rule, because I am resolved they shall be mine."

William Williams, Esq. chosen Speaker.] Upon finishing this Speech, the lord-chancellor, by his majesty's command, directed the commons to return to their house, and to chuse a Speaker. Which they accordingly did, unanimously electing W. Williams, esq. who had been speaker in the last Parliament. When the commons presented him to his majesty, on the 2d, he made this Speech to the king:

"May it please your majesty, The knights, citizens and burgesses in parliament assembled, with duty and loyalty agreeable to themselves and the persons whom they represent, are in obedience to your royal pleasure, for disposing of themselves in that great assembly for your majesty's service, considered of a Speaker: and, to manifest to your majesty, and the world, That they are not inclinable to changes, have with one voice elected you their Speaker, having had the honour to serve your maj. and the commons in that trust, in the last parliament. With all humility I resume again, by their commands, to stand before your majesty, to receive your pleasure, with a head and heart full of loyalty to your sacred person; armed with a settled resolution, never to depart from your well-known, ancient and established government."

Though the king was not pleased with the speech, he thought fit by the lord-chancellor to approve of the election, in the usual form. Upon which the new Speaker made this former Speech: "Most gracious sovereign, natural allegiance commands loyalty to your maj. from every subject. Your singular grace and favour to me, in the last parliament, continued by the honour I have in this, add more than dutifulness and obedience to my loyalty. I am set in the first station of your commons for trust and quality; an high and slippery place! It requires a steady head, and a well-poised body in him that will stand firm here. Uprightness is the safe posture, and best policy, and shall be mine in this place, guarded, with this opinion, That your maesty's service in this trust, is one and the same with the service of your commons, and that they are no more to be divided than your crown and sceptre. They truly serve the crown and country, which shall be my care and industry, who make the safety of your sacred person, the defence and security of the Protestant religion, the support of your majesty's government, the maintenance of the laws, and preservation of the ancient constitutions of parliament, one and the same undivided interest, one and the same safety, one and the same inseparable security for yourself and people. These are the desires of all good men, but must be the effects of good councils. For the enabling of your majesty's Great Council now in parliament assembled, to complete this blessed establishment, with all humility I address to your majesty, in the name and on the behalf of the commons in parliament;

1. That we and our servants may be free in our persons and estates, from arrests, and other disturbances.
2. That in our debates, liberty and freedom of speech be allowed us.
3. That, as occasion shall require, your maj. will vouchsafe us access to your royal person.

I take leave to join this humble Petition for myself, That nothing by me, in weakness, or through inadvertency, said or done, may turn to the prejudice of the commons: and that my behaviour and proceedings may receive a benign and favourable interpretation with your gracious majesty."

Upon this, the Lord Chancellor, by command from his majesty, made this return to the Speaker: "Mr. Speaker, All your Petitions are fully and freely granted by his majesty, in as large and ample a manner, as ever any house of commons yet enjoyed them: the king is very sure, the wisdom of this house of commons will make as prudent an use of them, as any of your ancestors ever did. Your own particular Petition is grateful to the king too; because he knows you will be as careful to avoid mistakes, as his majesty is ready to forgive them. And now, Mr. Speaker, these preliminaries being thus over, the king desires you would hasten to the rest that are necessary to be dispatched, before we can enter into business; that so we may husband time, which is now more necessary than ever; and he hopes that this parliament will come to a very happy and prosperous conclusion: and that it may do so, God Almighty direct and prosper all your consultations."

Though the Speaker had not the good fortune to please the king, on this occasion; he was ordered the Thanks of the house, and desired to print his Speech.

Debate on printing the Votes.] March 24, Sir John Hotham. What I am about to move concerns us all. The last parliament, when you were moved to print your Votes, it was for the security of the nation, and you found it so; it prevented ill representations of us to the world by false copies of our Votes, and none doubted your honour in the care of it; and I am confident that this house will be no more ashamed of their actions than the last was. Printing our Votes will be for the honour of the king, and safety of the nation. I am confident, if it had been necessary, you would have had petitions from the parts I come from, that your actions might be made public. As I came hither, every body almost that I met upon the road cried, 'God bless you!' I move, therefore, 'That your Votes may be ordered to be printed, with the rest of your proceedings.' And I shall only add, that yourself has done so well in taking that care upon you the last parliament, that the house will desire you to continue them in the same method.

Sir Wm. Cowper. That which put me upon moving the printing your Votes, the last parliament, was false papers that went about, in former parliaments, of the votes and transactions of the house. Let men think what they please, the weight of England is the people, and the world will find, that they will sink Popery at last. Therefore I second the motion.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I beg pardon, if I consent not to the motion. Consider the gravity of this assembly; there is no great assembly in Christendom that does it. It is against the gravity of this assembly, and it is a sort of Appeal to the People. It is against your gravity, and I am against it.

Mr. Boscowen. If you had been a privy-council, then it were fit what you do should be kept secret; but your Journal-Books are open, and copies of your Votes in every coffee-house, and if you print them not, half votes will be dispersed, to your prejudice. This printing is like plain Englishmen, who are not ashamed of what they do, and the people you represent will have a true account of what you do. You may prevent publishing what parts of your transactions you will, and print the rest.

Mr. L. Gower. I find that those who write our votes and transactions, and send them all England over, are favoured, and I believe that no gentleman in the house will be against printing them, but Jenkins. I hope you will not be ashamed of what you do; therefore I am for printing your votes.

Colonel Mildmay. By experience we have found, that, when former parliaments have been prorogued or dissolved, they have been sent away with a Declaration against them. If our actions be naught, let the world judge of them; if they be good, let them have their virtue. It is fit that all Christendom should have notice of what you do, and posterity of what you have done; and I hope they will do as you do; therefore I am for printing the votes.

Sir Francis Warrington. Because what has been said by Jenkins is a single opinion, for he says, 'printing is an Appeal to the People,' I hope the house will take notice that printing our Votes is not contrary to law. But pray who sent us hither? The privy council is constituted by the king, but the house of commons is by the choice of the people. I think it not natural, nor rational, that the people, who sent us hither, should not be informed of our actions. In the Long Parliament it was a trade amongst clerks to write Votes, and it was then said, by a learned gentleman, 'That it was no offence to inform the people of Votes of parliament, &c. and they ought to have notice of them.' The Long Parliament were wise in their generation to conceal many things they did from the people; and the clerk, who dispersed the Votes, was sent away, and nothing done to him. The Popish party dread nothing more than printing what you do, and I dread that a man in Jenkins's post, (and such an accusation upon him, as is in the last parliament) should hold such a position, 'that printing your Votes was an Appeal to the People.'

Resolved, "That the Votes and Proceedings of this house be printed."

Mr. Harbord. Now you have passed this Vote, I would graft something upon it. I move, 'That the care of printing the Votes may be committed to the Speaker,' who so well acquitted himself in it the last parliament. —Which was ordered.

Debate on the Miscarriage of the Bill for Repeal of 35th Eliz.] Mr. Hopkins made a motion to enquire why the Bill of Repeal of a Statute of 35th Eliz. which, in the last parliament, had passed both houses, was not presented with the rest for the royal assent.

Mr. Hampden. I think the motion is to enquire after the slipping of that Act the last parliament, and not presenting it for the royal assent. For my own part, I look upon it as a breach of the constitution of the government. We are told that we are republicans, and would change the government: but such as are about to do so, it is a natural fear in them to be thought so, and they will cast it upon others. In a crowd, it is frequent for pick-pockets to cry out, 'Gentlemen, have a care of your pockets,' that they may be more safe themselves, and have the less suspicion upon them. I will not offer this to your consideration to-day, but move you to adjourn it till to-morrow.

Sir F. Warrington. I shall humbly put in this word. I doubt this matter will be too big for to-day; it is of great importance, and will not be forgotten. Be pleased to adjourn the debate of it. —Which was accordingly done.

Debate on bringing in the Bill of Exclusion.] Sir Nick. Carew. I move, That for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the king's Person, a Bill be brought in to prevent a Popish Successor, and in particular against James duke of York, the same Bill which passed the last parliament.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I must give my negative to this motion; and my reason why I do so, is, because the king has declared, in his Speech, 'That, as to the point of the Succession, he will not depart from what he has so often declared.' The king has given his vote against it; and therefore I must do so too.

Mr. L. Gower. The duke of York is in Scotland, and I hope the king will now come up to what he has said in his Speech. My liberty and property are dear to me, and I will support the king's prerogative too; and those people that are briars and thorns scratch you in your intentions against Popery; which, I see, we cannot prevent without this Bill.

Cbl. Birch. I am heartily glad to find that the zeal of the house still continues for the Protestant religion. My opinion is, that we cannot preserve the Protestant religion with a Popish successor to the crown, any more than water can be kept cold in a hot pot. But I would do it in all the decent ways to come at it. The king recommends to you, in his Speech, 'to look back to what he formerly said as to the Succession, &c.' If there be no other way to prevent Popery, my opinion is, that it will be more decent to our prince, and better for those who sent us hither, before the Bill be brought in, to give it the honour of a day, to consider of Expedients to save Religion, &c. for that I shall expect from some honourable persons; if none come, then you may proceed to this Bill with more honour; therefore appoint a day for consideration.

Sir John Ernly. I should not have troubled you but from what was spoken last. By all means just and lawful, we are to secure our religion and properties; we see the great attempts made upon us from Rome, and we must do something for our farther security. I will not speak of the former Bill against the duke, nor of the king's Speech; that give you latitude for Expedients, and I would not offer any if I thought they would not do as well as that Bill, which is but an Expedient; but because the king has declared against that Bill, and invited you to Expedients, I would not put that Bill any more to the hazard of rejection, but think of some Expedients.

Mr. Harbord. I can see no expedient to save religion, and preserve the king's person, but the Bill to exclude the duke, &c. All gentlemen, I believe, would be willing as to the manner, and save the matter, but when our prince is encompassed with all the duke's creatures, the duke's safety is because of their dependencies. The danger is not from Popery, but from the king's being encompassed with the duke's creatures. I would proceed in this matter with all decency; and since a day is moved for, pray let us have time to consider.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You are invited, by the king's gracious motion, to consider how to preserve Religion, &c. I desire that we may not now put a question for bringing in a Bill to exclude the duke, else properly we cannot consider any expedients for preservation of Religion.

Mr. Whorwood. They who advised the king's Speech, must answer for it. I think those about the king have done enough to ruin him and us. But I would have the king see, that we are so far from putting him upon that stress, that we would help him out. I think that Speech, which the king did read to us, had nothing of the king's in it. He is a better man, and a better protestant, than to do it of himself; therefore I would not put on a Resolution, here, as flat and as short as the king's Speech. The king has gone as far as this Resolution comes to, in his Declaration about Dissenters formerly, and yet he was persuaded to revoke it. If persons have been so prevalent about the king, as to put the king upon this Speech, let me see those persons so forward to bring the king into a thing, to help him out; if they do not, I hope the king will lay the blame at their doors, and not at ours. If they could have told us what Expedients were necessary, they would have put them in to the king's Speech, and the resolution-part, of 'not altering the Succession,' would have been left out. A little consideration, in this great matter, can do us no hurt, and will satisfy the people without doors. But if they about the king can find no Expedients, I hope he will lay them aside, and take their counsel no more.

Mr. Powle. Though I hear of Expedients abroad, yet I cannot conceive that a title or name can destroy the nature of expedients. But the king, in his speech, has held you out a handle, &c. and I would not give those about the king occasion to say, that this house is running into a breach with him.

Mr. Hampden. This is a matter of great weight, and I would adjourn it till to-morrow. As for the reason of proposing Expedients, I do not move to adjourn for that, for it is as little reason to me to expect any as it was the last parliament. That parliament gave reasons why no Expedients could be of any effect but this Bill of Exclusion, and that parliament saw enough of Expedients. There are a great many talked of abroad in the streets, and will not you hear Expedients? What can a man say less, with any modesty? But no man can say but that we are in danger, if the duke should come to the crown. But the question is, Whether you will put off this debate? Therefore I move, 'That the house will take into consideration the security of the Protestant Religion to-morrow.'

Sir Fr. Winington. When this Bill passed the last parliament, it was nem. con. and most of this parliament were of the last. As for 'Expedient,' it is a word mightily used, and talked of, and willingly embraced; but none have been proposed. Let this matter be re-assumed on Saturday, and so taken into consideration, to secure the Protestant Religion, and not to let any thing appear upon your Books, relating to Expedients, or preventing a Popish Successor.

Mr. Trenchard. I was much surprized at the king's Speech, considering your weighty reasons for the Bill, &c. the last parliament, and that the lords found no Expedients effectual for preservation of Religion; but that the king may see that what we do is out of a real sense of the danger we are in, &c. and not in contradiction to him, and when nothing is found effectual to save us, that we may justify ourselves in what we do, therefore I am for adjourning the debate.

Resolved, nem. con. 'That this house will, on Saturday the 26th, consider of means for the security of the Protestant Religion, and for the safety of the king's Person.'

Thanks voted to Counties and Boroughs, for electing their Members without Charge.] March 25. Mr. Swynfin. When there has been a general corruption, and all have not done their duty, you should distinguish and give Thanks to them that have. As you have done to officers for doing their duty in suppression of Popery, when through the corruption of the times, some have not done their duty. Nothing is more parliamentary than to return thanks to those who have freely, and without expence, chosen you Members, and I desire that these Members so elected should send their Thanks to those who chose them.

Which was ordered accordingly as follows: "It being represented to this house by several members, That many counties, cities, and boroughs, have freely, without Charge, elected many of the Members in this present parliament, according to the ancient constitution of elections of members to serve in parliament; wherefore this house doth give their Thanks to such counties, cities, and boroughs, for the said elections."

Parther Debate on the Loss of the Bill for Repeal of a Statute of 35 Eliz.] Sir Wm. Jones. This matter deserves material consideration, whether in respect of the loss of the Bill, or the shaking the very constitution of parliament. The bill that is lost, is of great moment, and of great use to secure the country, and perhaps their lives too, in the time of a Popish Successor. Those men that hindered the passing that bill had a prospect of that, and if it be sent up again, we are like to meet with great opposition. But be the bill what it will, the precedent is of the highest consequence. The king has his negative to all bills, but I never knew that the clerk of the parliament had a negative, if he laid it aside, or not. But consider, if we send up many good bills, if this be not searched into, we may be deprived of them. No man that knows law or history but can tell, that to bills grateful and popular the king gives his consent; but if this way be found out, that bills shall be thrown by, it may be hereafter said they were forgotten and laid by, and so we shall never know whether the king would pass them, or not. If this be suffered, it is vain to spend time here, and it will be a great matter to find time to redress it. I move, therefore, 'That a Message be sent to the lords, for a conference, that some way may be found out to give us satisfaction in this great matter.'

Mr. Boscawen. I do concur with Jones, that parliaments are prorogued and dissolved by the king, and now here is a new way found out to frustrate bills. The king cannot take one part of a bill and reject another, but gives a direct Answer to the whole. But to avoid that, this bill was never presented to the king; a thing never done before! I desire that we may send to the lords for a conference, to represent this innovation, and that a committee be appointed to draw up Reasons for the managers.

Mr. Garraway. I was a friend to this bill, and I agree in all things concerning the weight of it. The laying this bill aside is such a breach of the constitution of parliament, that it is in vain to pass any bill if this be not searched into. By the constitution of parliament all bills, but Money bills, after they have passed both houses, are deposited in the lords hands, and it is below you to look after the clerks for this bill. If the lords give you no answer for the loss of this bill, that is satisfactory, I would then send to them to know the reason why the bill was not tendered to his maj. with the other bills.

Sir Rob. Howard. I would have you search the lords Journals, and if you find no account of the bill there, then it will be time for us to go to the lords.

Sir Rd. Temple. I fully concur in the weight and consequence of this matter, and you are to take all the care that can be to secure it for the future. Never any thing of this nature was done before, but the Bill for the better observation of the Sabbath, in the late Long Parliament; it was left upon the table, at a conference, and stolen away. (see p. 285) It is not proper to take notice of this in a Message to the lords, because the miscarriage of this bill was in another parliament. The matter must go upon the desire of a conference, concerning the rights and privileges of both houses of parliament, and then you may appoint a committee to inform you of the progress of this matter.

Mr. Vaughan. I think the passing over the enquiry after the loss of the Bill of the Sabbath was the great occasion of the loss of this. Consider how many interruptions parliaments have had, of late, in the greatest business, by prorogations and dissolutions; and another way to gratify your enemies is to stifle your laws when they have a mind the people should have no benefit of them, though they have passed both houses.

Sir Henry Capel. The lords are the depositaries of all Bills, but those of Money; and without any other words, I would send for a conference, to know what is become of the Bill. I know of but three negatives to bills, but by this, there is a fourth; which will destroy the government.

Col. Tins. In things of this nature, it is the best way to observe old methods, and the best method to know one another's mind is by conference. I remember, the lords once sent to us for a conference, where they told us the house was falling on our heads. The lords sent us not a Message, 'That the Roof was falling and dangerous,' but they sent for a conference 'on a matter of great consequence;' therefore I would send to the lords for a conference 'about matters relating to the nation.'

Mr. Hampden. I would say this in the Message; 'That we desire a conference with their lordships concerning the Constitution of parliaments in matter of passing Bills.'

Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the lords, desiring a conference with their lordships in matters relating to the Constitution of parliaments in passing of Bills:" and a committee was appointed to prepare the subject-matter.

Debate on Fitzharris's Examination.] Sir Wm. Waller gave an account of the discovery of Fitzharris's Plot; and sir George Treby read his Examination.*

Sir J. Hartop moves it may be printed, for the world to see the devilish conspiracies of the Papists.

* "A few days before the king went to Oxford, Fitzharris, an Irish Papist, was taken up for framing a malicious and treasonable Libel against the king and his whole family. He had met with one Everard, who pretended to make discoveries, and, as was thought, had mixed a great deal of falshood with some truth; but he held himself in general terms, and did not descend to so many particulars as the witnesses had done. Fitzharris and he had been acquainted in France; so on that confidence he showed him his Libel; and he made an appointment to come to Everard's chamber, who thought he intended to trepan him, and so had placed witnesses to overhear all that passed. Fitzharris left the Libel with him, all writ in his own hand. Everard went with the paper, and with his witnesses, and informed against Fitzharris, who upon that was committed. But seeing the proof against him was like to be full, he said, 'the Libel was drawn by Everard, and only copied by himself.' But he had no sort of proof to support this. Cornish, the sheriff, going to see him, he desired he would bring him a justice of the peace; for he could make a great discovery of the Plot, far beyond all that was ever known. Cornish, in the simplicity of his heart, went and acquainted the king with this: for which he was much blamed; for it was said, by this means that discovery might have been stopped. But his going first with it to the court proved afterwards a great happiness both to himself and to many others. The secretaries and some privy-counsellors were, upon that, sent to examine Fitzharris; to whom he gave a long relation of a practice to kill the king, in which the duke was concerned, with many other particulars which need not be mentioned; for it was all a fiction. The secretaries came to him a second time to examine him farther: he boldly stood to all that he had said; and desired that some justices of the city might be brought to him. So Clayton and Treby went to him; and he made the same pretended discovery to them over again; and insinuated, that he was glad it was

VOL. IV.

Sir Wm. Jones. I like the motion well for printing Fitzharris's Examination.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. The scandalous Paper reflecting upon the king was read over to his maj. by Waller; whereupon I issued out warrants to apprehend Fitzharris, &c. and Waller saw the execution of them.

Sir Fr. Winnington. This is of great importance, and in it we ought to acquit ourselves like wise men. We, that come out of the country, hear that the treasonable Paper should have been sent to many gentlemen, and then they should have been seized upon as traitors in the conspiracy in this Plot. 'All is now at stake; therefore how long or short a time we are to sit here, (the trooper, Harrison, that was seized, said, 'We should have other guards at Oxford, than we had at Westminster,') let not our courage lessen. This being our case, let us go to the bottom of this business. It has been moved, 'That he should be sent for hither;' but we have experience, that, when once an accusation in parliament is against a man upon record, and in the greatest court in the kingdom made known, malefactors have not been cleared, and have not had justice; therefore I move, 'That you will take care that this man be impeached of High-Treason,' and, it may be, then he will tell you all.

Sir Rob. Clayton. When Mr. Recorder and myself examined Fitzharris in Newgate, he asked us, 'Whether he had said enough to save his life?' We told him, 'We thought not; but if he would ingenuously confess what counsel he had for drawing and modelling his treasonable Paper, and be ingenuous in the whole, we would take his farther Examination;' and wished him to consider of it. But, the next day after he promised he would, he was removed out of our reach to the Tower.

Fitzharris impeached.] Resolved, "That Edw. Fitzharris be impeached of High-Treason, in the name of all the commons of England; and that Mr. Secretary Jenkins do, to-morrow morning, go up, and impeach him at the bar of the lords house."

Debate on Mr. Sec. Jenkins refusing to carry up Fitzharris's Impeachment.] Mr. Sec. Jenkins. The sending me up with this Impeachment reflects upon his majesty, my master, in the character I bear under him; and I now in safe hands that would not stifle it. The king was highly offended with this, since it plainly showed a distrust of his ministers; and so Fitzharris was removed to the Tower; which the court resolved to make the prison for all offenders, till there should be sheriffs chosen more at the king's devotion. Yet the deposition made to Clayton and Treby was in all points the same that he had made to the Secretaries: so that there was no colour for the pretence afterwards put on this, as if they had practised on him." Burnet.

The Libel was entitled "The True Englishman, speaking plain English." It will be found in the Appendix No. XIII.

will not go on the Message.—A great cry, ‘To the Bar, To the Bar.’

Sir Tho. Lee. I would not have said one word, but that the very being of the parliament is in the case. It is to no end to sit here any longer, if this be suffered. Jenkins had no ground or reason to bring the king's name in question, nor was there any reflection upon his majesty, or Jenkins, in sending him with the Impeachment. But, for Jenkins to say, ‘Do what you will with me, I will not go with the Message!’ Let his words be first asserted, and read to you, before he explain them, according to the order of the house.

Sir Geo. Hungerford. I never heard such words uttered in parliament before, ‘That the whole house of commons should reflect upon the king in sending him with the Message,’ and ‘that he will not obey your commands.’ Pray call him to the bar.—At which there was a loud cry, ‘To the Bar.’

Mr. Trenchard. The house will grow contemptible to the extremest degree, at this rate. Such a thing was never before in parliament, that the whole house should reflect upon the king, and for him to say, ‘Do what you will with me, I will not go.’

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I said no such thing, ‘That the house reflected on the king,’ but ‘That I take it as a reflection upon the king, my master.’

His words were thus stated, ‘This Message had not been put upon me, but for the character I bear. I value not my life nor liberty; do what you will with me, I will not go.’

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I said ‘That this is put upon me, to my apprehension, for the character I bear; and do what you will with me, I will not go.’

Sir Wm. Jones. I am sorry to see any member behave himself at this rate. This confirms me in the opinion of the design some men have to depress the honour of this house. A Book has been written by a member of this house* (which, in time, I hope, you will consider of) ‘That the house of commons, in Hen. iii's time, sprung out of Rebellion.’ This goes on this day in the same method. Let a man be of what quality he will, if he be too big to carry your Message, he is too big to be your member, and not fit to be chosen for one. Thus to scorn the commands of the house, and to be too big for a messenger of the house of commons! Secretaries are sent on Messages every day, and is he too big for this, to accuse a person of the Popish Plot? If this be so, sit no longer here, but go home. His character is great, but he may be privy to things hid from us, possibly, by this extraordinary carriage. Is it come to that pass, for us to be dealt withal as none of our predecessors ever were before. If my brother, or son, dealt with the house thus, I would have him made an example; and, for aught I see, he provokes you more by his explanation; therefore pray go on.

* Dr. Brady, who served for the University of Cambridge.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I am ready, and I think myself as much obliged as any man, to obey the commands of the house. The office I have under his maj. excludes me not; but the thing I stand upon is, that the motion was carried on in ridicule. I have an honour for this, and ever have had for all houses of commons, but in this Message I must and will be excused.

Sir Hen. Capel. Ridicule is not a word proper for a house of commons: what is appointed by them is with all gravity, especially where the life of a man is concerned, as it is in an Impeachment. We are in an unfortunate age; now things come to light, more than we were before; that now it must be said, ‘Impeachments of treason strike at the king,’ and ‘the Bill of excluding the duke, &c. is levelled at the king.’ I am sorry it is said here, as well as in other places. This that we put upon Jenkins is an employment for the king's service, and he tells us, ‘It reflects upon the king, and he will not go.’ All the commons do will be reversed, if this must pass for doctrine, ‘That what we do reflects upon the king.’ But, sir, we are in a ship, and we have to do with the master, and he with us. If this gentleman would make any sort of excuse for himself, I would, for my share, pass it by; but he has not taken it off, but rather aggravated it. If he has nothing farther to say for himself, he must withdraw, and then I shall make a motion, for the honour of the house.

Sir Tho. Meres. I know no difference of any persons here; if Jenkins said, ‘I thought sending me with the Impeachment reflected on the king; and in case it be so, I will suffer any thing under that reflection,’ a man may be mistaken in his thoughts: But, as I take it, he said, ‘It was his thoughts that the Message was a reflection upon the king, and in that case he would suffer any thing rather than a reflection upon the king in the character he bears.’

Sir John Ernly, (after he had inspired Jenkins with a whisper, said,) It is an ill thing to stumble at the entrance. I do hope that Jenkins intended no disservice to the house, in what he said, but on a perfect mistake. I did apprehend, and so did some others, that he was put upon it, by the gentleman that moved it, in jest (Mr. Coningsby.) But be it in jest, or in earnest, he ought to obey your order; but every man cannot subdue his own heart. But I would know of Jenkins, whether, upon farther consideration, he will undertake this service, or no? I am the worst advocate in the world for an obstinate person; but I humbly offer it to your consideration to put the gentleman upon it, whether he will go, or no, before he withdraw.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. Since the house is so favourable as to hear me, I must say I did apprehend it a reflection upon the king, which was the reason why I refused the Message: but if I apprehend it a reflection upon the king my master, I am heartily sorry I should incur the displeasure of the house, and I hope you will pardon the freedom of the expression, of reflecupon the king. I had no other consideration whatsoever that induced me to say the words.

Mr. Fleetwood. I look upon this as so great reflection upon the house, from this gentleman, that he ought to come upon his knees, at a bar, to ask pardon.

Mr. Boswell. We are all subject to infirmitities. Seeing the thing is so, Jenkins could not apprehend any reflection upon the king in the Message, but he might upon himself. The king was a little smilingly moved; but since he has explained himself, I would have this passed by, as I should desire for myself, upon like occasion.

Lord Cavendish. The gentleman's fault is a great one; but after he has now begged the pardon of the house, and that he is ready to obey the order of the house, I am willing to pass it over. Though it be a great fault, yet it is too little to give occasion for a breach, at this time.

Mr. Sec. Jenkins. I am ready to obey the orders of the house, and I am very sorry that the words which fell from me, gave the house offence.—And so the thing passed over, and he carried the Message.

Col. Birch. For the discovery of this Plot of Fitzharris we ought all to give God thanks, next to the discovery of the Popish Plot. This is a great service to the nation, and it is not the first service that sir Win. Waller has done the nation. If ever the Thanks of the house were deserved, it is for this discovery; therefore I move, 'That he may have the Thanks of the house.' Ordered.

Farther Debate on bringing in the Bill of Exclusion. March 26. Sir Rob. Clayton. I must confess, I have been full of expectation for an Expedient, in some measure to secure the protestant religion, and the king's person, in case of a Popish Successor, and my expectation has been from those gentlemen who opposed the Bill for excluding the duke of York from the Succession of the Crown, and I can call that no otherwise than 'an expedient.' I have, in my weak judgment, weighed all the expedients I have heard of, both in the lords house, here, and abroad, but they seem all to be a breach of the constitution of the government, and will throw us all into confusion and disorder. I have heard, that it has been an ancient usage for the members to consult their counties, cities, and boroughs, in any other matter of weight, as well as in giving Money; and the practice was good, and we can discharge our trust no better, than to observe the directions of those that sent us hither. We, who represent the city of London, have received an Address from the body of that city in the matter of the Bill for excluding the duke of York. I could heartily wish that some expedient may be found out rather than that Bill; but if there be none, I must pursue my trust, and humbly move, 'That a Bill may be brought in to disable James duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown of this realm.'

Lord Russel. I have the same obligation upon me, from the county I serve for, as the gentleman who spoke before me. I have been long of opinion that nothing but excluding the duke can secure us. In the last parliament, we were of opinion, 'That the duke's being a Papist gave all this encouragement to the Plot.' Should he come to the crown, his power will be more, and every day we see the sad consequences of his power. I should be glad if any thing else but this Bill would secure us from Popery, but I know of nothing else that will.

Mr. Montagu. The security of the Protestant Religion, and the safety of the king's person, are things of so great weight, that we should not have stayed so long as this day, to take into consideration the Exclusion of the duke. I am sorry to hear of the king's giving us expedients to secure the Protestant Religion: I am sorry to hear that language. This is not to be used as an English parliament, but French, to be told in the king's Speech what we are to do, and what not. The greatest arbitrary power that can be used in England, is to cow a parliament, and, it may be, that was the design in bringing us hither. But he we called to York, or all England over, we shall, I believe, be the same men, both as we are here and were at Westminster, in our opinions. When lord Danby dissolved the Long Parliament, he said, 'He had spoiled the old ricks, and had taken away their false dice.' Soon after him started in new ministers of state, and they shuffle and cut the cards again, and will dissolve and prorogue parliaments, till they can get one for their turn; and in this condition we are. As for the Bill of disinheriting the duke, were my brother or my son like to ruin my family, I would disinherit them, and turn away servants that would ruin me. If the bishops and the counsellors had spoken plain English to the king, things would not have been in this condition, and they cannot answer deferring our security so long. But neither these Ministers of the Gospel have endeavoured the preservation of the Protestant Religion, nor the ministers of state the government, both acting against Religion, and the preservation of the king's person. And seeing no expedient can serve us, but the Bill for excluding the duke, therefore I move for it.

Mr. Hen. Coventry. Several gentlemen tell us, there is no expedient, but none tell us what is. All men believe, that the religion of the duke is as fatal a thing as can be to the nation. What does he deserve, then, who perverted him? Let us consider, then, in what depends upon this house, to proceed like men. If it be our opinion that excluding the duke be the best way, this house cannot do it alone. If we cannot have that best way, we are guilty to our country of the consequences, if we take none. Suppose a man be sick, and nothing must be taken by him but by the order of three physicians; the Jesuits powder is by two of them thought fit to be given him, but one is against it, and does the duty of his opinion; but because the other two do not agree to it, must the sick man take nothing? We are but one of the legislative power. I remember, in the Dutch war, several expedients were proposed to raise money, and the house, for the more freedom of debate, went into a grand committee: a man, whoever he be, that proposes an expedient, will desire leave to make good that expedient in a grand committee; but when it comes to that, if that man have no expedient, and loses your time, he will be trampled upon. A grand committee is most proper for this debate, and if it should happen which question should take place, if one be denied, the other may take place, but not any one to be put to exclude the rest, which, if you put a question for bringing in a Bill to exclude the duke, it will do. Let it be exclusion, limitation, or what it will, your order is general. Find out a way to secure us from Popery, and preserve the king's life, be it what it will. When men press on too fast, many times they tira their horses, and come late into their inn. Let a committee try expedients, else it is not consultare but dicere. I am of a contrary opinion, of debating this matter in the house, for this reason, and if gentlemen will do reasonably, the house should go into a grand committee.

Mr. Swynfin. You have had motions proposed for expedients, but there is not a word of expedients in the order of the day, and that answers it. The order is only, 'To consider of means for the security of the Protestant Religion, and for the safety of the king's person.' Those who were here present when the order was made, have left it free for a Bill, or any other thing, and therefore we are not tied to have bills, or to offer expedients against bills. As for the simile of 'the three physicians,' made by the hon. gent. that two were to administer nothing without the third, though one be for one thing, and another for another, yet if the case be such, that the two offer nothing but what is mortal to the patient, he ventures to his own disreputation, if he joins with them. However, in our case, the three physicians do not agree. We never saw any thing from the lords in answer to the Bill for excluding the duke, which they threw out, the last parliament. All the expedients have been to increase the fears of the kingdom, and to hasten our undoing; and when all was at stake, the parliament was dissolved, and that was an ill expedient. And those about the king who have come over to our opinion of the Bill, are all put away, and those about the king now are for expedients. The council of the Jesuits and all the Popish party have their end, by thus disappointing the kingdom; and the fears of the people are either that they must take up with a false security for their religion, as good as none, and so to impose Popery upon us that way, or to bring the kingdom into disorder; and when religion and the laws are at the duke's disposal, the kingdom will be in so great disorder, that the Protestants will not be able to enjoy themselves quietly; and no surer way for the Papists to effect their end. For the house to go into a grand committee, it is a motion of great weight; if you deny it, it will look as if you intended to precipitate, and deny free debate; if you accept it, you lie under delay, and who knows how long time we have to be together? If you were sure of your time to sit two, three, or four months, I would be willing to go into a grand committee; but as to the ill umbrage of refusing a committee, it is not like other cases. I would have an instance given me, if ever it was done in a thing of this weight. This matter in consideration to-day has been in two parliaments, and the whole kingdom is satisfied, that nothing but the Bill to exclude the duke can save us, and it was the opinion of the last parliament; what reason, therefore, is there to go into a grand committee for a thing so often debated? No man can deny, but that a grand committee, when there is something offered of an Expedient, is proper, to debate it with the more freedom: but to offer expedients generally, is as if the thing had never been consulted nor debated before. I never saw any expedient offered, but this of excluding the duke, and I never heard of any reason against the Bill, but 'set it aside, and think of Expedients.' Therefore I am for the Bill.

Mr. Leveson Gower. If any gentlemen have Expedients to preserve the Protestant Religion, without this Bill of Exclusion, they would do well to propose them, and they will deserve well of the house; and if they seem to them to give security, I should be glad to hear them.

Sir John Ernly. When the motion was first made for considering Expedients, I did then second it, because of the honour of the place I serve in. I did understand by the king's Speech, that there were Expedients. I am unwilling to determine the sense of any gentleman, who am myself of the weakest; but the motion was seconded, to go into a grand committee to consider Expedients; and if you please to do so, I then shall offer you something.

Mr. Bennet. Expedients that have been moved, already, are Jesuits powder for an ague; but our disease is a pleurisy, and we must let blood. Let the expedient go to what will do our business; and, it may be, you must have other expedients to fortify your Bill of Exclusion. I would have the house rightly understand, that those who are for going into a grand committee to consider expedients, are not for excluding the duke, and they who are not, are for it; and now put the question, if you please.

Sir Fr. Russel. A Bill for excluding the duke is a good expedient; let both that and others, as they are proffered, be considered.

Mr. Hampden. I must put you in mind that this Bill is no new nor strange thing; and now it is proposed to find out expedients to preserve the Protestant religion. Here is a way, by this Bill of Exclusion, that has passed two parliaments already; a way that had no reasonable objection against it; and a way rejected in gross by the lords, in the last parliament; but I doubt, if other expedients be tried, and they prove false, the Protestant religion will be endangered by it.

Sir John Ernly. If the house be of the mind not to go into a committee, I shall offer my little mite; and it is every man's duty to offer you his help. I doubt not but other men have expedients, and better than I have; but if you go not into a grand committee, I shall offer what I have. I do apprehend, that the Bill spoken of is a bar to the Succession of the duke, and to place the succession in the next heir. I humbly conceive, that, if you place the power of the government in a regency, and let the duke retain the name of king, it is no new thing. It has been done in Spain, France, and lately in Portugal, and God knows how soon it may be our case. If the administration be placed in a safe hand, that shall have no power to resign it, and shall have full power and authority, from the death of the king, to call again the last parliament that sat, and that that parliament shall have time to sit, to confirm this by parliament; if such a way can be contrived, I hope it may be done with safety.

Sir Nicholas Carew. This proposition is, 'That the government after the death of the king, may be in the hands of a regency.' I would be satisfied, if the duke will not submit to that, whether those who fight against him are not traitors by law?

Sir Wm. Pulleney. I think this, that has been proposed, is a matter of weight, and some expedient has been offered you, but I think as yet but a crude one. I can never imagine an effectual one. Ernly has told you, 'That this expedient, when drawn into better form, he hopes will satisfy.' It excludes the duke from the exercise of the government, and places the regency in the next successor, but the Bill for excluding the duke, &c. in the last parliament, left the Succession in the law. But pray consider what is a regency: A thing never heard of but in a prince in possession of the crown, in a minor, or a lunatic, but generally very unfortunate. But to talk of a regency in futuro, in condition and limitation of time, I never heard of before. This is an expedient that does not answer the king's Speech, nor your former Bill. By this expedient they make the king but a shadow, and divide the person from the power. Our law will not endure it to divide the person of the king from the power. Both the person and the power will be courted, and who that next heir will be, I know not. The king, in his Speech, leads you to consider expedients, but such as will consist with the safety and dignity of the monarchy. This expedient must be, to have two kings at the same time, one by law and another by right. In Portugal there has been some instance of this. That king was put into prison for some personal miscarriages, and his brother, the next heir, was made regent: but there is a vast difference betwixt these two cases; the king of Portugal was set aside for personal miscarriages, and not for being a Papist, and that was present, this to be. This expedient seems to me, to let the duke in, and then to make a question, Whether allegiance be due to him, or not? But I am afraid, that, unless we be true to those we serve, we shall deserve a just reproach; and by express directions of those I represent (Westminster) I am enjoined to adhere to the Bill of Exclusion. That Bill has been under the consideration of all the people of England, and perhaps of all the Protestants of Europe. All the wits of learned men have made their objections against it, and yet, notwithstanding, all the people are still of the same mind, that nothing but that Bill can save the Protestant religion; and now we run upon the most mishapen expedient, and, it may be, two or three years before we understand it: an expedient to have an operation no man knows when; of very little weight, unless it be improved by somebody!

Sir Tho. Littleton. We are flying at a great matter. All conclude, to fight against the duke, if he be king. God forbid! We have been told by three or four gentlemen, of directions they have from their principals to adhere to the Bill of Exclusion, and to be against all those things of Expedients. I would not have that way much cherished here. Those Addresses of the country are uncertain things, and no footsteps remain of any of those Papers from the countries. I take the meaning of that to be, to go down and consult their neighbours for direction what they shall do. I hear talk to-day of the parliaments of France, but this way is as dangerous; like the States of Holland, who are to consult with their principals before they resolve. It is a most unusual thing here, and of dangerous consequence. A regency has been proposed, to secure the administration of the government in Protestant hands, so as not to alter the constitution of the monarchy; and this alters the constitution of the monarchy the least imaginable, to have a regency in room of the king, and the monarchy goes on. We have had formerly a regent protector, call it what you please, in the nature of a protector, primus Consiliarius in the case of a minor king; but I propose not this. If you alter the government, I am against it; but here is offered a regent in place of a king, or a transferring the government. But it may be said, 'Where shall the duke be all this while?' That point is pretty well over. The lords, in the last parliament, proposed the banishing him 600 miles from England. The duke has an estate in England; he, as all men else do, loves it, and will not part with it by coming into England, against this law. But your Bill of Exclusion secludes the duke, and the crown then is to fall, as it does fall. What then will be the case? You must imagine either that his own daughter will take up arms against him, if he attempts to regain the crown, or somebody else will; and this will raise such an anger in the duke's mind, that where will the people shelter themselves? Not under the duke's daughter; they must naturally shelter themselves by running into arms. Cromwell's way to support himself in his usurpation was an army of 60,000 men. And he did do it, especially when his army was flushed with victory. And an army that has got power will keep it. The nation is not in the condition it was formerly, when great lords cherished their tenants, and by good leases could presently raise an army, and when they had accomplished what they designed, send them home again. But we are now in another way; raise an army, and they will think of their own interest how to keep themselves up. But if it fall out to be thus, your Bill will leave this very loose. As soon as this Bill of Regency shall pass, suppose the regency be established in the princess of Orange, and in case of her decease without issue, or issue in minority, then the lady Anne, the duke's other daughter, to be regent, and in the same law, commissioners to be forthwith sent to the prince and princess of Orange to take their oaths, that they will take upon them the execution of this Act, and that their oaths be recorded; you then are not left in that loose manner you will be by the Bill of Exclusion; and it is a far less matter for the princess to save a family, before misfortune come upon it, than to take the government upon her afterwards, in the height of trouble and disorder, which may ensue upon the Bill of Exclusion. But it may be said, 'what needs all this? It is just nothing but retaining the name of a king, in an exiled man.' But it is less violation for her, to govern in her father's name, than to have the kingdom given her, from him. It may be wondered why, in Portugal, when the king was to be removed from the government, there was a great debate amongst the three estates of that kingdom, (though they hold not proportion as they do here,) the commons were for don Pedro to be king; the nobility were for having him regent only; the ecclesiastics demurred: But at last both the ecclesiastics and the commons came over to the nobility: but Don Pedro stuck here, and would still leave his brother the title of king: he would leave nothing of shelter to force nature too far. I find that there are reserves in the king's Speech, if it be well observed. Another thing may be objected, which is, paying a difference to the crown for the sacredness of it, for the government's sake; and that looks like something; and how can we be secure, when it is treason to take up arms against the king? But the duke is like to be 500 miles off; and how came that law to be made, that the king and parliament may dispose of the Succession of the crown? It was then an opinion amongst lawyers, that the crown was unalienable: but when that law was made, for the king and parliament to dispose of the Succession of the crown, that opinion was damned under a penalty, though a standing maxim amongst lawyers. If so, this new Act of regency will be a warrant to what is proposed, as that was for the other. For my part, I have had the ill fortune to have the wind in my face; to be against the general opinion and stream of the world; and having had no share, for some time, in the government, I may speak my mind, possibly, more freely than they that have. It is a great crime to spy things too soon, which makes us apt to run from one extreme into another. I have proposed the best Expedient I can to preserve Religion, and quiet the minds of the people; but I am afraid, if we do nothing at all in this matter (I will grapple with neither of the Expedients) but if we do nothing, but let the thing lie loose, we shall gratify the Jesuits on the one hand, by our confusion, and the Commonwealth's men to shuffle again, on the other hand; and if you go into some medium, both these men will be undone.

Sir Wm. Jones. I have heard with great attention this very able and learned gentleman, and am really of opinion that if any better Expedient could have been proposed, he, as soon as any gentleman, would have proposed it; but I am amazed that so learned a gentleman should not see through this Expedient. That which I take for the Expedient is, 'That, should the duke come to the crown, he should retain the name only of king, and that the next heir, under the title of regent, or protector, should have the administration of the government.' Who does he mean by 'next heir?' For any thing I know, or believe, it may be the duke's daughter, but, it may be, the duke may have a son. Either I have a great cloud on my understanding, or this is very strange; if the duke shall have a son, and shall he at a day, a month, or a year old, be regent? Suppose the princess of Orange come over to be protector to this young regent, and she die, and leave a child (the prince of Orange has no right) that child must have a protector, and so there will be a protector of a protector. But we are told, 'That it is for nothing, but to keep up the greatness of the government, that makes them go from the Bill of excluding the duke to this Expedient.' But pray, is it so great and pleasing a thing to wear a crown, and have no authority nor power? Is it not much worse than to lose the actual crown and possession? But if this Expedient pass into a Bill, and the duke be banished 500 miles off, it must be out of England, and if the name of king will please him in civility, beyond sea he shall be king, and it is as much to his purpose beyond sea to be called king only, as here: and to tell us, 'That the forfeiture of his estate upon his return will keep him there;' he that will venture the loss of a kingdom for his religion, will his estate too, and that is but a weak tye. It is less evil or injustice to take away from him both the crown and power than to leave him of both but the name. If you allow the duke the name of king, it will imply a right; therefore that to be used as an argument, is strange. But why is this contention, and all this ado, I wonder, for an empty name? But I am afraid this kind of Expedient is a kind of Jesuits powder. I do not think that Littleton's opinion or interest is for the Jesuits; but wise men may overdo things sometimes. But if you do not exclude the duke's title by law, the duke is king still, and then learned lawyers will tell you, that, by the 1st Hen. vii. all incapacity is done away by his being king. If you take not away the descent of the crown upon the duke, and the duke has a title to be king, then without doubt, all incapacities fail. But if this can be made effectual, I am as willing to exclude the duke's power as name; but lawyers will tell you it cannot be done. But there is a great difference betwixt the one and the other. When the lady comes to be regent, not only nature, but conscience, will bid her 'give unto Cæsar his due,' being not incapacitated to succeed, and perhaps that text some of our divines will preach upon. They will say, 'That the parliament, by what they have done, do acknowledge the duke to have a good title.' But if he be king; as the parliament allows him to be, in name and right of descent, an argument like this in queen Mary's time had like to have restored to her the first-fruits and tenths. Another thing, perhaps, came from those men who first proposed the Expedient (I will not believe that it originally came from Littleton,) 'That if we had passed the Bill of Exclusion in the last parliament, it would not have been submitted to;' but if this Expedient pass into law, and the duke have a right to be king, and be kept from the administration of the government, I doubt whether I shall fight against him. The Papists will say, we have got a law to separate what is inseparable; and I would, were I as the duke, have such a Bill to perplex my opposers, rather than a clear one. Littleton tells us of 'an army to maintain the Exclusion, and that that army will not soon be laid down.' But why an army? People will be sure that the lady will let her father in, if he have title; but will the people be sure of their religion, if he have title and power too? If there must be an army to maintain the Bill of Exclusion, there must be four armies to maintain the Expedient. There has been a protector proposed, &c. not like that of Edw. vi. who was little more than our lord president of the council: but certainly they who proposed this Expedient, intended the same power in the regent to let the duke in as to keep him out. Therefore pray lay aside this consideration, and take up that of the Bill.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I think it fit that you should present Reasons to the king for passing this Bill for excluding the duke, I do think that the administration of the government has been in such hands, since the king came in, that, though the ministers have been shifted, yet the same principles of government remain to this day. The Triple League has been broken, and the Smyrna Fleet seized, before we had open war with Holland. The king of France made war with Holland for his glory, and our ministers, to get taxes from us to make the king absolute: such violations, as never were done, upon the rights of the people!—He was called to order by Mr. Vaughan. A question so extremely well spoken to as was the last, to be interrupted with any angry question, is not decent at this time. What the gentleman urges is a matter to be enquired into another time, though the gentleman, I believe, does it with a worthy intent. If any gentleman have any thing else to propose, of the matter now in debate, pray hear him.

Mr. Leveson Gower goes on. I intended, from what I said, to move you to present the king with reasons to pass the Bill of Exclusion. The shameful retrenchments in the king's family arise from the duke's creatures; and it is not safe for the king to part with any one of his ministers, unless he parts with them all. These that retrench the king's family, do it to get together a bank of money for a Popish Successor, and then will be their time to take away the king.

Sir Tho. Meres. I have heard this expedient debated with patience. This expedient has been well offered, and, I believe, mistaken by the gentleman that answered it. I must say, this is your question; your business is religion, and I have given as good testimony of sincerity to the Protestant religion, these 20 years, as any man has; and I have been for this Bill of Exclusion, and I am of opinion, that something must be done for the people, to quiet their fears of Popery. But for the point of law mentioned; if the law be such, that dominion must run with the name of king, that single reason is to carry the debate; but if they answer not to that, I am at an end. But, sure, those words that can disinherit a king may make this expedient law. I would not rise now to speak, if I thought that this Bill of Exclusion would pass the lords and the king. My grounds are but conjectures. The last parliament, I did believe that the Bill would pass, with greasing the wheels. Our condition of England is thus: we do need one another; the king and the people had need make use of parliaments to assist one another, to relieve us in the difficulties we are in. If the duke be king, he will need a parliament, and so will his people. In order to this, if there be any other expedient like this, though not the same, which no objection of law could destroy, if any gentleman would produce such a one, he would do the king and kingdom great service and advantage. In this necessity, we are like two great armies encamped upon two hills; and neither dares remove, not for their valour, but their reason: he that has the last loaf stays the longest, and necessity compells the other to go off. At last, it must be one side or other, or England will have the worst of it. But if none will venture, in point of law, to maintain the expedient, I am answered. If any gentleman could alter that Bill of Exclusion, that it may not be just the same as it was the last parliament, but have something of this expedient, I should like it; for this expedient is a Bill of Exclusion, and a strong one: if the duke were to chuse, he had rather have the first. I am for that nail that will drive, to do our business; and if gentlemen have other thoughts, pray so contrive it, that we may have one Bill or the other.

Mr. Harbord. All the expedients that I have yet heard have been like a cucumber; dress it, and then throw it away. This proposition of the expedient is either honest, or not. If it be honest, and without design, then all the dispute betwixt the king and us is, Whether the duke shall have a title to the crown? and I hope the king will rather gratify the nation than his brother, who has attempted the ruin both of it and him. If it be not honest, people about the king have done it to circumvent him, and will find ways, from day to day, to divert him from the advice of his people. Why was England so fond of Calais, but to have some footsteps in France? And so the duke's creatures are fond of this expedient, that the duke may still have a title to the crown, though the government be placed in a regency; and then all those gentlemen who depend upon the duke, if he comes to the crown, will change their measures, and show you of what religion they are.

Sir Fr. Winnington. As to the question, concerning the Bill of Excluding the duke; that that bill is lawful in conscience, no man will oppose, and after the great opposition it met with in the lords house, yet they agreed it lawful. So that we are not doing what wise men think unjust, and what jure divino is not unlawful, concurrentibus iis qui concurrere debent. Some gentlemen have told you, 'That their countries have given them intimations to press this Bill of Exclusion:' and Littleton has told you, 'It is dangerous to take instructions from the country.' But I say it is more so to take it from the court. Parliaments formerly, upon any weighty affair, stayed, and sent their members down to consult their countries. I am not subjected to what my country does propose. I have my trust to serve them here as well as I can. It is alleged, 'That consulting our country is like the states of Holland.' I am as much against a republic as he that fears it most, and I say, I know Littleton to be a man of that great reason, that if he go away satisfied with this day's debate, he will do all he can to satisfy the king in the post he is in. But to keep close to the question: it being allowed by law, that there may be an excision of the duke from the government, the next thing is to consider the expedient proposed of the regency. The same authority that makes a descent from the crown may modify it, and this was argued, to show that the regency would signify nothing in taking away the dignity of monarchy. Now the question is,

Which is most practicable, the regency or the exclusion? We lawyers are aptest to go on the strongest side, and to call every thing 'prerogative.' But I will put you a case that happened in king James's time; a sheriff had an exception in his commission, 'That he should not keep his county-court, but should have all other powers of his office;' but the judges resolved, 'That when once he had received his commission, and taken his oath, he was sheriff to all intents and purposes, and could not be deprived of keeping the county-courts.' Acts of parliament against common sense are void in themselves; to make a man king, and not suffer him to exercise kingly power, is a contradiction. Some clauses, in acts of parliament, have been flattering clauses, to satisfy the people, that they might not have the thing. This act of regency would be nonsense, and it would be said hereafter, 'That the house of commons were outwitted.' If the duke be king I owe him my obedience, and if he be king, and have no power to govern, he is king and no king. This I have urged the rather, to show that this of the Regency is no Expedient to save Religion; it blears the eyes of the people only, and is no solid security. To say, 'That the duke values his estate, and will not venture to come into England after the Act has banished him, for fear of forfeiting it,' as he loves his estate, so he loves a crown too, very well; therefore you need no farther to arm yourselves in point of conscience (that being yielded on all hands) but in point of reason. In the last parliament I did see, by the arguments of the Papists and the ministers, that without this Bill our ruin was irresistible. If the duke comes to the crown a Papist, he brings merum imperium along with him, and that made me fond of the Bill of Exclusion from the beginning. If by law the duke never was king, no case of conscience lies upon us in the matter. I shall only make this observation upon the king's Speech, wherein he says, 'If it be practicable to rid ourselves of the Popish party;' and next, 'If means can be found that, in case of a Popish Successor, the administration of the government may remain in Protestant hands;' so that we see the king doubts himself, and this, delivered by the king in great wisdom, is clipped off into this Expedient of Regency. You see, now we are come to Expedients, which the ministers have had two parliaments to consider of, what they are come to, and the proposition of the danger of a Popish Successor not at all lessened. We have no security in law by this Expedient: You take away no authority from the duke, should he be king. Therefore I hope the Bill of Exclusion will pass, and that reason, and not great offices, will take men off from a new con. I speak this as a dying man.

Mr. Booth. I have it in command from the county I have the honour to serve for (Cheshire), that they apprehend that no Expedient to preserve Religion, in case of a Popish

Successor, but makes the remedy worse than the disease, unless the Bill to exclude the duke from the Succession; and I have, as yet, heard no reason given by any man against it: but there is an aliquid latet. If the duke be not set aside, I am sure the government will be. Therefore I move for the Bill.

Sir Tho. Meres. What Bill soever we have, pray let us have the law on our sides, that, if the king should die, we may know whither to go. I think the king's Speech is penned as it ought to be penned, and should the king speak positively to what laws he would have, we are an Irish parliament, and not an English. But the king's words are tender words, and the thing lies fairly before you. If any thing of Expedient can be thought of to save Religion under a Popish Successor, not to destroy the monarchy; and if the next Expedient be not the best, pray refuse not the next to that.

Mr. Vaughan. You have had an Expedient offered of a Regency; pray consider what this Regency is. It is but the whole office of king, so place judges, constitute privy counsellors, call parliaments, make peace and war, &c. This they would take away, and reserve this empty name of king to the duke. This is perfectly to bring a war upon us, and for the duke to come in by conquest; and so farewell law, church, and all! The Regency must be supported by war, as well as the Bill of Exclusion. In 13th Eliz. the Crown could not be alienated but by king, lords, and commons, and then there was no successor named to keep king James in awe; and for the same reason, no Successor was named in the Bill of Exclusion the last parliament. Though we have been frightened by prorogations and dissolutions, it will not frighten them whose reasons go along with the Bill of Exclusion. I am for it because all men are for it, and have sent up the same parliament again; but if you lead the people into uncertainties, by such an Expedient as this of the Regency, both court and country will then be of a mind to lay aside parliaments, because they are become useless.

Sir Hen. Capel. By these conspiracies of the Papists, people's eyes are now enlightened, and, all the world over, they are an informed people. The Papists care not who is king, if he be a Papist. In the last parliament it was said, [by Hyde], 'There was a loyal party would stick to the duke, notwithstanding the Bill of Exclusion.' We see France has fallen upon the Protestant party there. The emperor has mastered them in Hungary, and what has been done in Bohemia, they say, broke the Prince Elector's heart. An universal design against the Protestant party—[The rest of his Speech was mostly what he had said in the last parliament.]

Col. Legge. I would not have spoken for the duty I owe my master, the duke of York, but for my duty to my country; and I own my obligation to the king for being the duke's servant; and farther, I am a Protestant, and was never out of England; and for the king's service my father bred me at sea. I know my own weakness in not having been bred to the law; but by enquiry I find, that the doctrine of deposing kings, and disposing of their kingdoms, is the damnable doctrine of the Church of Rome. In the 24th of Edw. iii. the king, I find, demanded advice of parliament in matters relating to the crown; the Answer of the whole parliament was, 'They could not advise any thing relating to the crown, nor of disinherit him to whom they were sworn.' The fundamental and common-law of England has made the duke, as heir, to come to the crown, if the king have no sons. Hen. iv. came to the crown by parliament, but laid his claim to it by descent from Hen. iii. and so it continued to Hen. vi. and then the parliament declared, that those acts were not binding, but unjust and invalid, and so the right heir came in. Hen. viii. had power to dispose of the crown by his last will and testament; and though Jane Grey baited her title by Religion, yet right took place in the Succession; and since that, there has been an Act of Restitution in king James, as lawfully and justly the right and next heir to the crown; and to beseech the king to accept of their allegiance to him and his posterity. I think our ancestors were sworn to king James and his posterity, as well as we. It is a great happiness that the two lines of York and Lancaster are united, which has spent so much noble and royal blood in the barons wars. We have had an attempt of turning the government into a republic; and who knows but that, if we put by the right of the duke to succeed, that may be attempted again; and the crown revenue being much upon the people's gift, it may the more easily turn us into a republic. In the late times, when my father was in prison, an eminent person then in power, discoursing with him, said, 'I have obliged you, and when the king comes in (as I believe he will do, first or last) pray be my friend, and think of what I say; when the king's party shall be again in the saddle, if once you divide amongst yourselves, farewell monarchy for ever!' If by a law you keep out the duke, what must follow? An Act of Association. I speak now for England and for my posterity, (I have seven children.) How will this look? The king's father was murdered, and you take his brother from him. Sure this can take no effect with the king, and the lords, to make it a law. I wish the duke many happy days, but, from my heart, I wish the king more than the duke. The king is a healthy man, and the duke is not. What I have said is not as I am the duke's servant, barely out of pique of honour, but that I would not do any thing to destroy my posterity.

Col. Birch. This is the day of England's distress, and not only of England, but upon this day's resolve depends the good fate of the Protestant religion all the world over. Except we expect a miracle from Heaven, nothing else can save the Protestant religion. I think, I said this many years ago, 'That Popish Matches would bring in Popery at last.' But as to what is said to point of law, 'That the law will be interpreted according to the strength that maintains it;' I doubt not but if you do your endeavours, this great matter in debate may be settled; but if we have nothing left but prayers and tears to help us, we are in a miserable condition. All government begins either by conquest or compact; but it is interest that must defend this Bill of Exclusion, and not an army. We are the army. I have a family as well as others; and as for setting up idolatry, rather than my children should breathe in such an air, I had rather they were buried. All the mischiefs in the world that may ensue upon this Bill of Exclusion have been ingenuously offered you by Legge; but if you quit this bill, pray sit down and take up a Popish Successor, and renounce the Protestant religion. I would break this popish interest, and it will be our interest to maintain this bill. If once this bill pass, and, as in queen Eliz.'s time, Protestants are put into places of trust, you may be sure of the good effects of your bill. Where 10 were of the mind for this Bill a twelve-month ago, there are an 100 now that will bleed for it. In plain English, let us show the world that the Protestant religion is dear to us, and that we have the law on our sides to maintain it.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I was mistaken by some gentlemen, therefore I desire to be rectified. I shall be very short, and tender of you, having sat long. It is objected 'the uncertainty this Expedient will lie under, if the duke have a son;' which is thus answered; 'That then the princesses respectively shall succeed in the regency;' which obviates an incurable absurdity in the former Bill of Exclusion. For if the duke have a son, the lady cannot descend from the throne. This Bill of Exclusion is so weak a thing, that it will require all the props imaginable to support it; and a train of consequences will follow. What you have been told of Scotland is worthy your consideration: if Scotland is not consenting, I know not how you will obviate that; I fear it may unite the Papists of England and France.

Mr. Bocazzen. Littleton may be convinced of the weakness of the Expedient by his own argument. For by so much the easier it is for the princess to descend from the Regency, so much the less is our security. And as for the objection of Scotland, the same interest which passes the Bill of Exclusion here, will do it in Scotland; and for Ireland there is no need of it. By the proposition of the Expedient, all commissions for sea, land, and the church must go from the regent in the duke's name; and if all dispatches, &c. must go under his name, there will be still no security, for the oaths of allegiance and supremacy must be taken to the duke; and if that he not a true proposition, 'That we are not to take up arms against the king, nor those commissioned by him,' I know not why it was by law obliged to be taken by all that execute the Militia; and if that be a true proposition, why must it be destroyed by this Expedient now? The thing lies loose to me. Methinks, this Expedient of the Regency seems to me as if a man that sat by the fire and burnt his shins, instead of removing himself farther off, should send for a mason to remove the chimney back farther from him. I have heard, that, if a man make a freehold lease to commence from the date thereof, it is void. It would be far more ingenious for gentlemen to say, 'That if you do pass the Bill of Exclusion, they will not be bound by it, but will have the duke to succeed;' and then I wish they would tell us what will save the Protestant religion. If the duke do come in, will gentlemen abuse either to turn Papists, or to be burnt or hanged? If this proposition would keep out popery, I would accept of it. I have no disrespect to the duke; but if I am to leap over a river, I had better have no staff than a broken one; and this Expedient is no security. If it must be in the power of the council and the regent to dispose of the public treasury, to make war and peace, pray where is the government? Where is the monarchy? Either they will be faithful and keep this law of regency, and the duke shall be king but by name, and so take away the soul of the government, or they will let the duke in to govern as king.

The debate thus ended, and this Vote passed, viz. "The house having taken into solemn debate and consideration, the means for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and for Safety of the King's Person, doth resolve, That a Bill be brought in to exclude James duke of York from inheriting the Imperial crowns of England and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging; and that a committee be appointed to draw up the said Bill."

A gentleman moved, 'That this Bill might also exclude all other Popish Successors.' To which

Mr. Hampden answered, He believed the gentleman made the motion with a good intent; but this is a Bill for the purpose only of the duke's Exclusion, and that for all other Popish Successors may be done in another Bill hereafter; for the way to lose a Bill is to clog it with too many things.

Debate on the Lords refusing to proceed upon Fitzharris's Impeachment. March 26. p. 28. The commons were informed, 'That the lords had refused to proceed upon the impeachment of the commons against Edw. Fitzharris; and had directed, That he should be proceeded against at the common law.' *

* "The Commons' Impeachment against Fitzharris was rejected by the lords upon a pretence with which the lord Nottingham furnished them. It was this: Edw. iii. had got some commoners, the six murderers of Edward ii. to be condemned by the lords, of which when the commons complained, an Order was made,

Sir Wm. Jones. In a matter so very plain and conspicuous, as the refusal of this Impeachment by the lords, I am unwilling to make unnecessary doubts. If indeed an inferior court had proceeded to Judgment in this matter of Fitzharris, then it might have been pleaded in or against the Impeachment of the commons. There was an indictment against the lords in the Tower, in the King's-bench, found upon record, and yet that was no impediment to their trial by the impeachment of the commons; but in this case of Fitzharris, here is no indictment or prosecution begun in any inferior court of law. We have a precedent fresh in memory of the Impeachment of a commoner at the lords bar, if the lords doubt that, which was of my lord chief justice Scroggs; so that we need not spend our time to search for precedents to maintain our right at a conference with the lords. Perhaps the Lords Journals are not yet made up into form; but some members have taken notes out of their minutes, and find that the lords have dismissed the Impeachment against Fitzharris, and left him to trial at common law, and have ordered it so by the lords spiritual as well as temporal; and in his case they have determined a great point, That the lords spiritual have power to judge in an Impeachment of capital matters, which we never own, nor ever shall, and here we are denied justice by those who have no right to vote it. In this the lords have done a double act of injustice. Seeing then that the lords have taken upon them to throw out this Impeachment, let us assert and declare our right of impeaching in capital causes, and that the lords have denied us justice in refusing the Impeachment against Fitzharris; and then, after having asserted our privilege, let us draw up our Reasons to maintain it, and make it part of our conference to show the lords, how unreasonable the lords actions have been in their proceedings.

Sir Fr. Winnington. If this refusal of the lords was an ordinary Impeachment of Monarchs, or the like, I should not press you in the matter; but this is not an ordinary consideration, but that which relates to our Religion and Property; and how the bishops come in to stife this Impeachment, let God and the world judge! I would know if there be an impeachment against a man from the commons, and no indictment upon record against him in the courts below, only the attorney-general told the lords, that the king gave him directions to prosecute Fitzharris, and there is no Record against him. If the lords vote, 'That the commons shall not impeach this man,' they may as well vote, That we shall not be Protestants. But yet we will be Protestants. I take this to be a new Plot against the Protestant Religion, and we impeach this man, and the lords fairly say, 'We will not hear it.' If this be the case, I desire you will come to some vote. You are willing to discover this Plot if you could. If the attorney-general had prepared the prosecution of Fitzharris, and, as Jones said, if the inferior courts had proceeded to judgment against him, then that judgment is pleaded in bar against an Impeachment. But if our time be short to be here (as I believe it is) pray do not delay discharging your part in this matter. If the house be satisfied in it, pray make a vote, to assert your own right. A little while ago, we knew, that the Judges of the King's-bench discharged the Grand Jury, whilst the indictment against the duke of York, for a Popish Recusant, was depending: this proceeding of the lords, in rejecting the Impeachment of Fitzharris, seems as if the house of lords intended to justify that proceeding of the Judges by their own. It is a just reflection of weakness to doubt in a plain matter. If no gentleman doubts of our right of impeaching, pray vote it so.

That no such thing should be done for the future.' Now, that related only to proceedings at the king's suit; but it could not be meant, that an Impeachment from the commons did not lie against a commoner. Judges, secretaries of state, and the lord keeper, were often commoners. So if this was good law, here was a certain method offered to the court, to be troubled no more with Impeachments, by employing only commoners. In short, the peers saw the design of this Impeachment, and were resolved not to receive it, and so made use of his colour to reject it." Burnet.

Sir Rob. Howard. I am glad we are off from one great thing, viz. the Exclusion of the duke. I cannot believe but that, in this matter of rejecting the Impeachment of Fitzharris, the lords have cause for what they do. In this matter, precedents you need not search; you have instances of very late date: but this of Fitzharris seems to me to be a more dangerous breath than usual, a breath fit to be stifled. There is something in this more than ordinary. If this be a sacred respect in the lords to the common trials of England by juries in the inferior courts, it is strange that, in the case of Skinner, the lords should contend with the commons about the trial of it, though an original cause. This refusal of the lords seems to me to be no great value of the law of England, but a value of Fitzharris to keep him from us. When I have seen, in all the speeches to-day relating to the Duke's Exclusion, that the duke goes not single, but all along associated with Popery—I have heard such excellent discourses to-day of that matter, that I am loth to mingle my weakness with them; but these are such counsels from the lords, that I believe hereafter the king will have no cause to thank the lords, or those that were the originals, for involving him in the fatality of them. They will make the traitorous Libel of Fitzharris the copy of their counsels. Dangerfield was a man reputed most infamous, yet if he would discover what he knew of that sham Presbyterian Plot, nothing of mercy was too big for him; but Fitzharris, a man of no infamy, must be hurried away from Newgate to the Tower, when he was disposed to confess the whole Plot to those gentlemen who examined him. Are you so lost, that there is no mercy left for the Protestant Religion? If the terror of his condition incline him to discover all, must he now be taken out of our hands? We hear of other things too; that the French ambassador had a hand in the contrivance of this Plot with him, and can that be enquired into by a common jury, who are to concern themselves in no more, than whether Fitzharris be guilty, or not guilty? I must confess, that with the carriage of this, I have enlarged my suspicion, and I must always expect unusual ways. We see that the worst of mankind has been pardoned, with all his villainies about him, upon an ingenuous confession; but what provocation has there been from Fitzharris, to be thus hurried away to trial at common-law in a disposition to confess all, and so be out of the reach of pardon, should that disposition continue upon him? But I am persuaded something depends upon this man, as well as upon the Bill we ordered to-day. When I saw the temper of the house, when Jenkins refused your Message (p. 1314) (and there was something in that too) that the house would make no breach upon it, and passed it over with great temper, that now we must lay down all prosecution of the Plot, and that the Protestant Religion shall have no mercy! Fitzharris may merit by his confession, where he may reasonably hope for the same intercession for his pardon, that much blacker offenders have obtained; but if his breath be stopped, I am sorry the people should have occasion to say, 'If it were not for the lords, the Protestant Religion might have been saved.' Therefore I move, that, in the wording of your Vote, you will not only say, 'That the lords rejection of this Impeachment is not only a subverting the constitution of parliament, but 'of the Protestant Religion' also; and I hope you will do this with the same calmness of mind that every man does wish that loves his religion.

Serj. Maynard. This damnable Popish Plot is still on foot in England, and I am sure in Ireland too; and what arts and crafts have been used to hide this Plot! It began with the murder of a magistrate (Godfrey,) then with perjury and false Subornation, and this of Fitzharris is a second part of that. We sent up an Impeachment to the lords against Fitzharris, and told the lords, 'That, in due time, we would bring up Articles against him,' and the lords refuse to try him. In effect, they make us no parliament. If we are the prosecutors, and they will not hear our accusation, their own lives, as well as ours, are concerned. This is a strange way of proceeding; the same day we impeach Fitzharris, they vote we shall not prosecute him: now, when all is at stake, we must not prosecute. If this be so, Holland must submit, and let the French run over all. This is a strange breach of privilege of parliament, and tends to the danger of the king's person, and the destruction of the Protestant Religion, and I hope you will vote it so.

Sir Tho. Player. I shall make you a motion, but first I shall say we have had a considerable discovery of the former Plot. I call it the old plot, but this of Fitzharris has been new upon us. This is still a confirmation of the intention of murdering the king, the duke consenting to destroy his own brother and our king. I have often heard it whispered, that the design of Madame's voyage to Dover was to promote the Popish Religion, but it is plain that Godfrey was murdered by the Papists, and that the army mustered on Black-heath was raised with intentions to destroy the protestants in Holland, and to awe the city of London. When Fitzharris gave intimation, that he would discover what he knew of this Plot, and that two or three hon. members of this house had examined him, this man was fetched the next day to Whitehall, and from thence hurried away to the Tower, and so we were deprived of all farther hopes of discovery from him. We now revive the information from an Impeachment, and now this man must not be brought hither to be tried: he must be tried in an inferior court, that his mouth may be stopped, and put out of capacity to discover. This being the case, I move, 'That if any judges, justices of the peace, juries, &c. shall proceed upon the Trial of this man, that you will vote them guilty of his murder, and betrayers of the rights of the commons of England.'

Resolutions in the Case of Fitzharris.] The house then resolved, 1. 'That it is the undoubted right of the commons, in parliament assembled, to impeach, before the lords in parliament, any peer or commoner for treason, or any other crime or misdemeanor; and that the refusal of the lords to proceed in parliament upon such Impeachment is a denial of justice, and a violation of the constitution of parliaments. 2. That, in the case of Edw. Fitzharris, who, by the commons, has been impeached for High-Treason, before the lords, with a declaration, 'That in convenient time they would bring up the Articles against him;' for the lords to resolve, 'That the said Edw. Fitzharris should be proceeded with according to the course of common-law,' and not by way of Impeachment in parliament, at this time, is a denial of justice, and a violation of the constitution of parliaments, and an obstruction to the farther discovery of the Popish Plot, and of great danger to his majesty's Person, and the Protestant Religion. 3. That for any inferior court to proceed against Edw. Fitzharris, or any other person lying under an Impeachment in parliament for the same crimes for which he or they stand impeached, is an high breach of the privilege of parliament.'

Protest relative to Fitzharris's Impeachment.] On the question being put in the house of lords, Whether Edw. Fitzharris shall be proceeded with according to the course of the Common Law, and not by way of Impeachment in parliament at this time? It was resolved in the affirmative. Before the putting of the above-aid question, leave was asked for entering Protests; which was granted.

“Dissentient; Because that in all ages it hath been an undoubted right of the commons to impeach before the lords any subject for reasons, or any crime whatsoever; and the reason is, because great offences, that influence the government, are most effectually determined in parliament. We cannot reject the Impeachment of the commons, because that suit or complaint can be determined no where else; or if the party impeached should be indicted at the King's bench, or in any other court, for the same offence, yet it is not the same suit; or an Impeachment is at the suit of the people, and they have an interest in it; but an indictment is at the suit of the king: for one and the same offence may entitle several persons to several suits; as, if a murder be committed, the king may indict at his suit; or the heir, or the wife of the party murdered, may bring an Appeal, and the king cannot release that appeal, nor his Indictment prevent the proceedings in the appeal, because the appeal is at the suit of the party, and he hath an interest in it.—It is, as we conceive, an absolute denial of justice, in regard (as it is said before) the same suit can be tried no where else: the house of peers, as to Impeachments, proceed by virtue of the judicial power, and not by their legislative; and as to that act, as a court of record, and can deny suitors (especially the commons of England) that bring legal complaints before them, no more than the justices of Westminster-Hall, or other courts, can deny any suit or criminal cause that is regularly commenced before them. Our law saith, in the person of the king, ‘Nulli negabimus justitiam,’ We will deny justice to no single person; yet here, as we apprehend, justice is denied to the whole body of the people. And this may be interpreted an exercising of an arbitrary power, and will, we fear, have influence upon the constitution of the English government, and be an encouragement to all inferior courts to exercise the same arbitrary power, by denying the presentments of grand juries, &c. for which at this time the chief justice stands impeached in the house of peers. This proceeding may misrepresent the house of peers to the king and people, especially at this time, and the more in the particular case of Edw. Fitzharris, who is publicly known to be concerned in vile and horrid treasons against his majesty, and a great conspirator in the Popish Plot to murder the king, and destroy and subvert the Protestant Religion. (Signed,) Kent, Shaftsbury, Macclesfield, Herbert, Sunderland, Essex, Crewe, Bedford, Stamford, Westmorland, Salisbury, P. Wharton, Mor-daunt, Grey, Paget, Cornwallis, Huntingdon, Clare, Monmouth, J. Lovelace.”

Debate on the first Reading of the Bill of Exclusion.] March 28. The Bill for excluding the duke of York, &c. was read the first time.

Sir Leoline Jenkins. This Bill before you is very extraordinary. There was never the like before in parliament. No bill was ever offered in parliament so much against the justice of the nation. Here is a great prince condemned before he is heard. Next, it is ex post facto very extraordinary, and against the justice of the nation; and not only so, but against the wisdom of the nation too; for it will introduce a change in the government. If the duke should try to cut this law with his sword, and he should overcome, the same power that can set aside this law will set aside all laws both of our Religion and Property; the power will be in the hands of a conqueror, and he will certainly change the government. This is against the religion of the nation. We ought to pay obedience to our governors, whether good or bad, be they ever so faulty or criminal. Heathen princes were obeyed by Christians in licitis et honestis. And we are ‘not to do evil that good may come of it,’ or for any prospect of good. One word more: this Bill is against the oaths of the nation, the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. We are bound by those oaths, in the eye of the law, to the duke, and I am consequentially sworn to him. Every oath is to be taken in the sense of the lawgiver; and if this bill pass into a law, who can dispense with me from that oath to the king? Possibly I am too tedious, and not willingly heard. This Bill is against our Religion, against the government and wisdom of the nation; and I hope you will throw it out. [Jenkins's argument being the same with that of the last parliament, which was then fully answered, passed off without notice.]

Mr. Bennet. Jenkins has moved to throw out this bill, and that he might be heard patiently. Nobody, it seems, seconds him; therefore pray let him go on, and second himself.

The Bill was ordered to be read a second time next day, in a full house.

Sir Wm. Jones. As to the Votes you passed on Saturday, upon occasion of the lords rejecting your Impeachment against Fitzharris, because there has been discourse of them in the town, and I believe will be, in time, in the nation, though what has been done will be made good, let us give all men satisfaction that we are in the right. Amongst our other misfortunes, in this place we are far from Records and Books, and so it will not be easy to prepare ourselves to argue this. But according to the little I have looked into this matter, I find that it is the undeniable right of the commons to bring Impeachments in parliament not only against lords but commoners; and Magna Charta says not only that Subjects shall be tried ‘per judicium parium suorum,’ but ‘per legem terræ.’ And Trial in Parliament is lex terræ. I have heard of a Record of 4. Ed. iii. where when a lord, the earl of March—

The Black-Rod knocked at the door, and gave notice that the king commanded the attendance of the house immediately in the house of lords.

The Parliament suddenly dissolved.] The house went up accordingly; where his majesty made a short Speech to this effect:

“ My lords and gentlemen; That all the world may see to what a point we are come, that we are not like to have a good end, when the divisions at the beginning are such: therefore, my Lord Chancellor, do as I have commanded you.”

Then the Lord Chancellor said; “ My lords and gentlemen; His majesty has commanded me to say, That it is his royal pleasure and will, that this parliament be dissolved: and this parliament is dissolved*.”

* “ By the steps which the commons had already made, the king saw what might be expected from them; so, very suddenly, and not very decently, he came to the house of lords, the crown being carried between his feet in a sedan: and he put on his robes in haste, without any previous notice, and called up the commons, and dissolved the parliament; and went with such haste to Windsor, that it looked as if he was afraid of the crowds that this meeting had brought to Oxford.” Burnet.

Ferguson asserts “ That the Conspirators (meaning the Court) having received intelligence that Fitzharris's wife and maid were come to Oxford, in order to discover what they knew, resolved to put a stop to the career of the commons early on Monday morning by a dissolution; which was resolved on late the night before, in the cabinet-council at Christ-Church.” Growth of Popery, part ii. p. 194.

And Mr. North gives the following detail both of the cause and manner of this extraordinary event: “ The commons complained, that the Convocation-House was too strait for them to sit and transact in; and, at their desire, orders were given for the immediate fitting up the Theatre for their use. The king concerned himself much about the disposition of it, viewed the design, gave his judgment, and came in person among the workmen; and particularly, on Saturday, March 26, 1681, I had the honour of seeing him there, and observed his taking notice of every thing. On Sunday next his maj. was pleased, especially towards the evening, to entertain himself and his court with discourse of the wonderful accommodations the house of commons would find in that place; and by his observations and descriptions showed how it was to be. All this while the spies and eves-droppers could find no symptom of a dissolution, but rather of the contrary, that the parliament was likely to make a long session of it. The next morning, which was Monday, the king came to the house of lords, as he was wont, in a chair, and another chair followed with the curtains drawn; but instead of a lord, as was thought to be in it, there were only the king's robes. Thus they went and sat down in a withdrawing room. When the robe-chair was opened, a gross mistake appeared, for the garter robes were put up instead of the robes of state: so the chair

SUMMARY OF THE REMAINING PART OF KING CHARLES II.'S REIGN.] This was the last Parliament called by Charles II.; though in a Declaration which he published, on the 8th of April, for satisfying his people, after reckoning up all the hard things that had been done in the three last parliaments, and setting forth their undutiful behaviour to himself in many instances, in conclusion, he assured them “ That nothing should ever alter his affection to the Protestant religion as established by law, nor his love to parliaments: for he would still have frequent parliaments*.”—Sir Francis Pemberton having succeeded Scroggs as Chief Justice, Fitzharris's Trial came on in Easter term. His Impeachment in parliament was over-ruled, the lords having thrown it out, and the proof was so full, that he was condemned. Upon this, seeing there was no hope, he charged lord Howard with being the author of the Libel, who was immediately sent to the Tower, and lay there till Michaelmas term, and then was discharged by the Habeas Corpus act; Fitzharris's wife and maid, who were the two witnesses against him, being so evidently forsworn, that the attorney-general withdrew the bill. Fitzharris was executed, and soon after Colledge, a joiner, charged, by Dugdals, Turberville, and others, with being concerned in a Protestant Plot to kill the king at Oxford. The grand jury at London refused to find the bill. Upon which he was carried to Oxford, and there was tried, condemned, and executed, denying to the last all that was sworn against him. In like manner, the earl of Shaftesbury, upon the evidence of the Irish witnesses, being sent to the Tower, the grand jury, to the great chagrin of the court, rejected the bill. A few days after, Turberville, being seized with the small pox, persisted in his last moments in avowing the truth of all that he had sworn both against lord Shaftesbury and lord Stafford; so that the last words of dying men being opposed to the last words of those that suffered, must leave the impartial over in the dark.—In Scotland, in 1682, the earl of Argyll, for refusing to take the Tests there enacted, without his own explanation, which he did not scruple unguardedly to avow, was immediately committed to Edinburgh castle, tried, and condemned, and had he not made his escape, would probably have suffered. The duke of York was now permitted to return to court, and seemed to have overcome all difficulties. And to remove all fears of future parliaments, the cities and boroughs of England were pre-must go back with an officer to bring the right. A lord happened to be in the room, who, upon this discovery, was stepping out (as they thought) to give the alarm: upon which, those with the king prevailed to continue his lordship in the room till the chair returned, and matters were fixed, and then he had his liberty.*

vailed on to surrender their charters, and take new ones, modeled as the court thought fit. The earl of Sunderland, who had been disgraced after the Exclusion Parliament, was restored, and lord Conway was made the other secretary*. And on the death of lord Nottingham, the seals were given to lord chief justice North, who was created lord Guilford. The city of London refusing to surrender its charter, judgment was given against it in the King's Bench.—The year 1683 will long be remembered for the fatal catastrophe of lord Russel and Algernon Sidney. That a rising was intended, and that lord Russel was present when it was discoursed of, cannot be denied; but that he was guilty of the treason alleged, of conspiring the king's death, or could have been condemned but by a packed jury and corrupt judges, is equally undeniable. In fact, the Bill of Exclusion was his death warrant. He was beheaded in Lincoln's Inn Fields in July. And the earl of Essex, for the same conspiracy, being sent to the Tower, was found in his room with his throat cut the very morning of his friend's trial. Col. Sidney was tried next, and upon the single evidence of lord Howard, added to an unfinished manuscript of his own writing, found in his closet, he also, by an unheard-of stretch of law, was condemned and executed. Need it be added, that he was one of the first that had moved for the Exclusion? Soon after this, the duke of Monmouth (who had made his escape) upon his confession was pardoned, but upon his recantation was again disgraced. Mr. Hampden, on lord Howard's evidence, was fined in the sum of 40,000*l.* (Feb. 6.) and Holloway, by the hopes of a pardon being induced to confess, and sir Tho. Armstrong, being seized in Holland (though the time of his coming in was not elapsed) were both executed. The earl of Danby and the popish lords were bailed, and Oates being prosecuted at the duke's suit for Scandalum Magnatum was fined 100,000*l.* To conclude, on Feb. 6, 1684-5, king Charles died, confirming on his death bed that attachment to popery of which he was suspected during his life.

JAMES II.

James II. proclaimed.] Immediately after the death of Charles II. such of the lords of the privy-council, together with such other of the lords spiritual and temporal as were in town, assembled together, to the number of above forty; and without hesitation signed an Instrument for proclaiming the duke of York and Albany king, by the name of James II. In which were those words; "We, the lords spiritual and temporal, assisted with those of his late majesty's privy-council, with numbers of other principal gentlemen of quality, with the lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens of London, do now, hereby, with one full voice and consent of tongue and heart, publish and proclaim, That the high and mighty prince James ii. is now, by the death of our late sovereign of happy memory, become our lawful, lineal, and rightful liege lord, &c. To whom we do acknowledge all faith and constant obedience, with all hearty and humble affection; beseeching God, 'by whom kings do reign,' to bless the royal king James ii. with a long and happy reign over us."

The King's first Speech in Council.] The same day, the new king made the following Speech to his privy-council, at whose request it was made public.

"My lords; Before I enter upon any other business, I think fit to say something to you. Since it hath pleased Almighty God to place me in this station, and I am now to succeed so good and gracious a king, as well as so kind a brother, I think it fit to declare to you, that I will endeavour to follow his example, and most especially in that of his great clemency and tenderness to his people. I have been reported to be a man for arbitrary power, but that is not the only story that has been made of me; and I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this government both in Church and State, as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the Church of England are for Monarchy, and the members of it have showed themselves good and loyal subjects; therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the king as great a monarch as I can wish; and as I shall never depart from the just right and prerogative of the crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defence of the nation, and I shall still go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just rights and liberties."

He likewise set forth a Proclamation signifying, "That all persons, who at the decease of the late King, were lawfully possessed of any office, whether civil or military, within the realms of England and Ireland, or any other of his dominions thereunto belonging, particularly all presidents, lieutenants, vice-presidents, justices of the peace, sheriffs, &c. should be continued in the said places and offices, as formerly they held and enjoyed the same, until the king's pleasure shall be further known. That all persons then in offices, of whatsoever degree or condition, shall not fail, every one according to his place, office, or charge, to proceed in the performance and execution of all duties thereunto belonging, as formerly appertained to them while the late king was living; and that all the king's subjects should be aiding and assisting to the command of the said officers and ministers in the performance of their respective offices and places, upon pain of the king's displeasure. Lastly, That all orders and directions made or given by the lords of the privy-council of the late king in his lifetime, should be obeyed and performed by all and every person, as it should or had been obeyed in the life of the late king."

After which, the late king was no sooner buried, but his royal brother acquainted the world, that he died a Roman-Catholic, and publicly appeared at mass himself. He, likewise, by another Proclamation, declared, "That he had thought fit to call a parliament speedily to be assembled, in which he made no doubt but care would be taken for settling a sufficient Revenue upon the crown, for the support of the government; the necessities of which, in the mean time, required that the Customs and Subsidies, and other Duties upon Merchandizes, should be continued to be collected, as in the time of his dearest brother lately deceased."

The Lord Keeper Guildford's Speech.] His majesty being come to the house of peers, commanded the black-rod to acquaint the house of commons, that it is his majesty's pleasure they attend him, immediately; who being come to the bar of the lords house, sir Francis North, baron of Guilford, and lord keeper of the great seal, having first received his majesty's pleasure, spake to this effect:

"My lords; and you the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the house of commons; I have it in command from his majesty, to let you know, that he will defer his speaking to you until the members of both houses have taken the oaths appointed at the beginning of every parliament, the doing whereof will require some time. When that is over, his maj. will come again, and declare his mind to you concerning the causes of his calling this parliament.—And it being necessary there should be first a Speaker of the house of commons; it is his majesty's pleasure, that the gentlemen of the house of commons go apart to the usual place, and do proceed to the choice of a fit person to be their Speaker; his maj. doth appoint four of the clock this afternoon, to have him presented here for his royal approbation."

Sir John Trevor chosen Speaker.] The commons being returned to their own house, lord Middleton named sir John Trevor, as a fit person for their Speaker, and one that would be acceptable to his majesty; whereupon the commons unanimously made choice of sir John, who took the Chair, and the house adjourned till 4 of the clock: when he went up to the bar of the house of peers, and was approved of by his majesty.

Twenty Lords introduced in one day.] The same day the following lords were introduced, and took their seats in the house, viz. Francis lord North, lord keeper of the great seal, Laurence earl of Rochester, George marq. of Halifax, James duke of Ormond, Henry duke of Beaufort, Edward earl of Litchfield, Daniel . of Nottingham, James e. of Abingdon, Edward of Gainsborough, Tho. e. of Plymouth, Ioratio, visc. Townsend, Tho. visc. Weymouth, Christ. visc. Hatton, Rd. lord Lumley, John lord Ossulston, George lord Dartmouth, Ralph lord Stawell, Sidney lord Godolphin, George lord Jeffreys, and John lord Churchill.

Proceedings in the Case of the Popish Lords.] The same day, the house of peers received the petitions of the Lords who had lain under an impeachment several years in the Tower, and been admitted to bail about a year ago, viz. the earl of Powis, the lord Arundel of Wardour, the lord Bellasis, and the earl of Danby: he last having made their personal appearances, in pursuance to their bail, and delivered their Petitions, the house entered into consideration of the hardship of their cases, and came to this question, Whether the Order of the 19th of March, 1678-9, be reversed and annulled as to their several impeachments? which passed in the affirmative.

Protest thereon.] Four lords only entered their Dissent, namely, Radnor, Anglesea, Clare, and Stamford, with these following Reasons: 1. "Because it doth, as we conceive, extrajudicially, and without a particular cause before us, endeavour an alteration in a judicial rule and order of the house, in the highest part of their power and judicature. 2. Because it shakes and lays aside an Order made and renewed upon long consideration and debate, report of committees of precedents and former resolutions, without permitting the same to be read, though called for by many of the peers, and against weighty reasons, as we conceive, appearing for the same, and contrary to the practice of former times. 3. Because it is inherent in every court of judicature to assert and preserve the former rules of proceedings before them, which therefore must be steady and certain, especially in this high court, that the subject, and all persons concerned, may know how to apply themselves for justice; the very Chancery, King's-bench, &c. having their settled rules, from which there is no variation."—However, two days after, the matter was brought to a conclusion by this following Order; "Whereas several Indictments were found at the sessions held at Westminster against Wm. earl of Powis, &c. which are since brought into this house by certiorari, pursuant to an Order of the 9th of April 1678; the house being this day informed, by Mr. Attorney General, That his maj. hath sent a warrant to him directed, to enter a noli prosequi upon the said Indictments: It is ordered, That his majesty's said attorney general may have recourse to the said indictments, in order to the entering a noli prosequi thereupon pursuant to his majesty's warrant: and it is further ordered, That the bail given in the court of king's bench, for the appearance of the said Wm. earl of Powis, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, be, and are hereby discharged.*

* "The upper house discussed, at the same time, the affair of the lords accused of high treason, and cancelled a rule of that house, which orders that the accusations entered by the lower house shall be in force from one parliament to another: this was done to perpetuate the accusations of the earl of Danby and the Catholic peers, who by this means would have always remained liable to condemnation upon the evidence given against them. They are now free from the accusation, and to prosecute them again would require both a fresh accusation and a fresh trial. This decision of the upper house repeals whatever was done respecting the pretended plot of the Catholics, which without it would have still subsisted. This is a very important matter in relation to his Britannic majesty. The earls of Devonshire, Anglesey, Clare, and Radnor opposed the measure, which only shewed their ill will." Barillon's Letters to the King of France. See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix, p. lxxvi.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.] May 22. His majesty opened the session with the following Speech to both houses :

" My lords and gentlemen ; After it pleased Almighty God to take to his mercy the late king my dearest brother, and to bring me to the peaceable possession of the throne of my ancestors, I immediately resolved to call a parliament, as the best means to settle every thing upon those foundations as may make my reign both easy and happy to you : towards which, I am disposed to contribute all that is fit for me to do.—What I said to my privy-council at my first coming therc, I am desirous to renew to you *, wherein I fully declare my opinion

* " The repetition of the words made use of in his first speech to the privy council, shews, that in the opinion of the court at least, they had been well chosen, and had answered their purpose ; and even the haughty language which was added, and was little less than a menace to parliament, if it should not comply with his wishes, was not, as it appears, unplesing to the party which at that time prevailed, since the revenue enjoyed by his predecessor was unanimously, and almost immediately, voted to him for life. It was not remarked, in public at least, that the king's threat of governing without parliament, was an unequivocal manifestation of his contempt of the law of the country, so distinctly established, though so ineffectually secured, by the statute of the 16th of Charles ii. for holding triennial parliaments. It is said, lord keeper Guildford had prepared a different speech for his majesty, but that this was preferred, as being the king's own words ; and, indeed that part of it in which he says that he must answer once for all, that the commons' giving such proportions as they might think convenient, would be a very improper way with him, bears, as well as some others, the most evident marks of its royal origin. It is to be observed, however, that in arguing for his demand, as he styles it, of revenue, he says, not that the parliament ought not, but that he must not suffer the well-being of the government depending upon such revenue, to be precarious ; whence it is evident, that he intended to have it understood, that, if the parliament did not grant, he purposed to levy a revenue without their consent. It is impossible that any degree of party spirit should so have blinded men, as to prevent them from perceiving, in this speech, a determination on the part of the king, to conduct his government upon the principles of absolute monarchy, and to those who were not so possessed with the love of royalty, which creates a kind of passionate affection for whoever happens to be the wearer of the crown, the vindictive manner in which he speaks of Argyle's invasion, might afford sufficient evidence of the temper in which his power would be administered. In that part of his speech he first betrays his personal feelings towards the unfortunate nobleman, whom, in his brother's reign, he had so cruelly and treacherously concerning the principles of the Church of England, whose members have shewed themselves so eminently loyal in the worst of times, in defence of my father, and support of my brother, of blessed memory ; that I will always take care to defend and support it. I will make it my endeavour to preserve this government both in Church and State, as it is now by law established ; and as I will never depart from the just rights and prerogatives of oppressed, by dwelling upon his being charged by Argyle with tyranny and usurpation, and then declares, that he will take the best care, not according to the usual phrases, to protect the loyal and well-disposed, and to restore tranquillity, but that the declaration of the factious and rebellious may meet with the reward it deserves ; thus marking out revenge and punishment as the consequences of victory, upon which he was most intent.—It is impossible, that in a house of commons, however composed, there should not have been many members who disapproved the principles of government announced in the speech, and who were justly alarmed at the temper in which it was conceived. But these, overpowered by numbers, and perhaps afraid of the imputation of being concerned in plots and insurrections, (an imputation which, if they had shewn any spirit of liberty, would most infallibly have been thrown upon them,) declined expressing their sentiments ; and, in the short session which followed, there was an almost uninterrupted unanimity in granting every demand, and acquiescing in every wish of the government. The revenue was granted, without any notice being taken of the illegal manner in which the king had levied it upon his own authority. Argyle was stigmatised as a traitor ; nor was any desire expressed to examine his declarations, one of which seemed to be purposely withheld from parliament. Upon the communication of the duke of Monmouth's landing in the west, that nobleman was immediately attainted by bill. The king's assurance was recognized as a sufficient security for the national religion ; and the liberty of the press was destroyed by the revival of the statute of the 13th and 14th of Charles ii. This last circumstance, important as it is, does not seem to have excited much attention at the time, which, considering the general principles then in fashion, is not surprising. That it should have been scarcely noticed by any historian, is more wonderful. It is true, however, that the terror inspired by the late prosecutions for libels, and the violent conduct of the courts upon such occasions, rendered a formal destruction of the liberty of the press a matter of less importance. So little does the magistracy, when it is inclined to act tyrannically, stand in need of tyrannical laws to effect its purpose. The bare silence and acquiescence of the legislature is, in such a case, fully sufficient to annihilate, practically speaking, every right and liberty of the subject." Fox's JAMES II. p. 148.

the crown, so I will never invade any man's property; and you may be sure, that having heretofore ventured my life in the defence of this nation, I will still go as far as any man in preserving it, in all its just rights and liberties; and having given you this assurance concerning the care I will have of your Religion and Property, which I have chose to do in the same words which I used at my first coming to the crown; the better to evidence to you, that I spoke them not by chance, and consequently that you may firmly rely upon a promise so solemnly made.—I cannot doubt that I shall fail of suitable returns from you, with all imaginable duty and kindness on your part, and particularly to what relates to the settling of my Revenue, and continuing it, during my life, as it was in the life-time of my brother. I might use many arguments to enforce this demand, for the benefit of Trade, the support of the Navy, the necessity of the Crown, and the well-being of the Government itself, which I most not suffer to be precarious; but I am confident, your own consideration of what is just and reasonable, will suggest to you whatsoever might be enlarged upon this occasion.—There is one popular argument which I foresee may be used against what I ask of you, from the inclination men have for frequent parliaments, which some may think would be the best security, by feeding me from time to time by such proportions as they shall think convenient; and this argument, it being the first time I speak to you from the throne, I will answer once for all, that this would be a very improper method to take with me, and that the best way to engage me to meet you often, is always to use me well.—I expect, therefore, that you will comply with me in what I have desired; and that you will do it speedily, that this may be a short session, and that we may meet again to all our satisfactions.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I must acquaint you that I have had news this morning from Scotland, that Argyle is landed in the West Highlands, with the men he brought with him from Holland;* that there are two Declarations published, one in the name of all those in arms, the other in his own; it would be too long for me to repeat the substance of them, it is sufficient to tell you, I am charged with usurpation and tyranny, the shorter of them I have directed to be forthwith communicated to you.—I will take the best care I can, that this Declaration of their own faction and rebellion may meet with the reward it deserves, and I will not doubt but you will be the more zealous to support the government, and give me my Revenue as I have desired it without delay."

* "The earl of Argyle, after having lived quiet in Friseland ever since the disappointment in 1683, resolved at last to go to his own country, where he hoped he could bring 5000 men together. Accordingly he landed with some of his country-men in Argyleshire, but the early notice the council had of his designs had spoiled his whole scheme; for they had brought in all the gentlemen of his country to Edinburgh, which saved them, though it helped on his ruin. Yet he got above 2500 men to come to him. But he lingered too long, hoping still to have brought more of his Highlanders together: so much time was lost. And all the country was summoned to come out against him. At last he crossed an arm of the sea, and landed in the Isle of Bute; where he spent 12 days more, till he had eat up that island, pretending still that he hoped to be joined by more of his Highlanders." Burnet.

Both Houses return Thanks to the King.]
The commons immediately resolved, nem. con. "That the most humble and hearty Thanks of this house be given to his majesty for his most gracious Speech, and that the lords' concurrence be desired thereto." To which the lords acceded.

The late King's Revenue granted for Life.]
Resolved, nem. con. "That the Revenue which was settled on his late majesty for his life be settled on his present majesty during his life."
—Ordered, That Mr. Solicitor do bring in a Bill for that purpose.*

* "As the grant of revenue was unanimous, so there does not appear to have been any thing which can justly be styled a debate upon it; though Hume employs several pages in giving the arguments which, he affirms, were actually made use of, and, as he gives us to understand, in the house of commons, for and against the question; arguments which, on both sides, seem to imply a considerable love of freedom, and jealousy of royal power, and are not wholly unmix'd even with some sentiments disrespectful to the king. Now I cannot find, either from tradition, or from contemporary writers, any ground to think, that, either the reasons which Hume has adduced, or indeed any other, were urg'd in opposition to the grant. The only speech made upon the occasion, seems to have been that of Mr. (afterwards sir Edward,) Seymour, who, though of the Tory party, a strenuous opposer of the Exclusion Bill, and in general, supposed to have been an approver, if not an adviser, of the tyrannical measures of the late reign, has the merit of having stood forward singly, to remind the house of what they owed to themselves and their constituents. He did not, however, directly oppose the grant, but stated, that the elections had been carried on under so much court influence, and in other respects so illegally, that it was the duty of the house first to ascertain, who were the legal members, before they proceeded to other business of importance. After having pressed this point, he observed, that, if ever it were necessary to adopt such an order of proceeding, it was more peculiarly so now, when the laws and religion of the nation were in evident peril; that the aversion of the English people to popery, and their attachment to the laws, were such, as to secure these blessings from destruction by any other

The Earl of Argyle's Declaration.] The earl of Middleton delivered a Paper from his majesty, entitled,

THE DECLARATION of Archibald earl of Argyle, Cowall and Campbel, Lorn, &c. Heretable Sheriff and Lieutenant of Argyle and Tarbet, and Heretable Justice General of the said Shires, and of the West Isles, and others; with his Orders to his Vassals and others in the said Shires, and under his jurisdiction, to concur for Defence of their Religion, their Lives and Liberties.

"I shall not mention my Case published in print in Latin and Dutch, and more at large in English, nor need I repeat the printed Declaration emitted by several noblemen and gentlemen, and others of both nations now in arms; but because the sufferings of me and my family are therein mentioned, I have thought fit to declare for myself, that as I go to arms with those that have appointed me to conduct them for no private or personal end, but only for those contained in the said Declaration, I have concorded with them and approved of instrumentality than that of parliament itself, which, however, might be easily accomplished, if there were once a parliament entirely dependant upon the persons who might harbour such designs; that it was already rumoured that the Test, and Habeas Corpus Acts, the two bulwarks of our religion and liberties, were to be repealed; that what he stated was so notorious as to need no proof. Having descanted with force and ability upon these, and other topics of a similar tendency, he urged his conclusion, that the question of royal revenue ought not to be the first business of the parliament. Whether, as Burnet thinks, because he was too proud to make any previous communication of his intentions, or that the strain of his argument was judged to be too bold for the times, this speech, whatever secret approbation it might excite, did not receive from any quarter either applause or support. Under these circumstances it was not thought necessary to answer him, and the grant was voted unanimously, without further discussion.—As Barillon, in the relation of parliamentary proceedings, transmitted by him to his court, in which he appears at this time to have been very exact, gives the same description of Seymour's speech and its effects, with Burnet, there can be little doubt but their account is correct. It will be found as well in this, as in many other instances, that an unfortunate inattention, on the part of the reverend historian, to forms, has made his veracity unjustly called in question. He speaks of Seymour's speech as if it had been a motion in the technical sense of the word, for enquiring into the elections, which had no effect. Now no traces remaining of such a motion, and, on the other hand, the elections having been at a subsequent period inquired into, Ralph almost pronounces the whole account to be erroneous; whereas their design, so I claim interest but in what I had before, the pretended forfeitures of my friends, and have sufficient right to.—And that I do freely, fully, and as a Christian forgive all personal injuries against my person and family, to all that shall not oppose, but join and concur with us in our present undertaking, for the mentioned reasons in the said Declaration. And hereby I oblige myself never to pursue them in judgment.—And I farther declare, that, obtaining the peaceable and quiet possession of what belonged to my father and myself before our pretended forfeitures, I shall satisfy all debts due from my father and myself, and as my faithfulness to his late majesty and his government hath sufficiently appeared to all unbiassed persons void of malice, so I do with grief acknowledge my former too much complying with, and conniving at the methods taken to bring us to the sad condition we are now in, though (God knows) never concurring in the design. I have now, with God's strength, suffered patiently my unjust sentence and banishment three years and a half, and have never offered to make any uproar or defence the only mistake consists in giving the name of motion to a suggestion, upon the question of a grant. It is whimsical enough, that it should be from the account of the French ambassador, that we are enabled to reconcile to the records, and to the forms of the English house of commons, a relation made by a distinguished member of the English house of lords. Sir John Reresby does indeed say, that among the gentlemen of the house of commons whom he accidentally met, they in general seemed willing to settle a handsome revenue upon the king, and to give him money; but whether their grant should be permanent, or only temporary, and to be renewed from time to time by parliament, that the nation might be often consulted, was the question. But besides the looseness of the expression, which may only mean that the point was questionable, it is to be observed, that he does not relate any of the arguments which were brought forward, even in the private conversations to which he refers; and when he afterwards gives an account of what passed in the house of commons, (where he was present,) he does not hint at any debate having taken place, but rather implies the contrary.—This misrepresentation of Mr. Hume's is of no small importance, inasmuch as, by intimating that such a question could be debated at all, and much more, that it was debated with the enlightened views, and bold topics of argument with which his genius has supplied him, he gives us a very false notion of the character of the parliament, and of the times which he is describing. It is not improbable, that if the arguments had been used, which this historian supposes, the utterer of them would have been expelled, or sent to the Tower; and it is certain, that he would not have been heard with any degree of attention, or even patience." Fox's JAMES II. p. 147.

ry arms, to disturb the peace, upon my private concerns. But the king being now dead, and he duke of York having taken off his masque, and having abandoned and invaded our Religion and Liberties, resolving to enter into the government, and exercising contrary to law, I think not only just, but my duty to God and my country, to use my utmost endeavours to oppose and repress his usurpation and tyranny. And therefore being assisted and furnished every nobly by several good Protestants, and invited, and accompanied by several of both nations to head them, I resolve, as God shall enable me, to use their assistance of all kinds towards the ends expressed in the said Declaration.—And I do hereby earnestly invite and oblige all honest Protestants, and particularly all my friends and blood relations to concur with us in the said Declaration. And as I have written several Letters, so having no other way fully to intimate my mind to others, I do hereby command all my vassals every where, and all within my several jurisdictions; with defensible men in their commands, to go to arms, and to join with us according to the said Declaration, as they will be answerable at their perils, and to obey the particular orders they shall receive from me, from time to time.”

The Commons resolve to stand by the King, with their Lives and Fortunes.] The commons resolved, nem. con. “That this house will stand by and assist his majesty with their Lives and Fortunes, against Archibald Campbel the pretended earl of Argyle and his adherents, and all rebels, and traitors, and all others whatsoever, that shall assist them or any of them.”

The King's Answer.] May 23, p. m. The house attended his majesty with the above Resolution, to which his majesty was pleased to make this Answer: viz.

“Gentlemen; I could expect no less from a house of commons so composed, as (God be thanked) you are: I rely on the assurances you have given me, which are the natural effects of Monarchical and Church of England men. I will stand by all such, and, so supported, have no reason to fear any rebels, or enemies I have or may have.”

Resolutions concerning Religion.] May 27. Sir T. Meres reports from the grand committee of Religion, That the committee, having taken the matters yesterday to them referred into their consideration, had agreed upon the two following Resolves; viz. 1. “That it be reported to the house, as the opinion of this grand committee, to assist and stand by his majesty, according to our duty and allegiance, or the support and defence of the Reformed Religion of the Church of England, as now by law established, with our lives and fortunes. 2. That the house be moved, from this grand committee, to make an humble Address to his majesty to publish his royal Proclamation for putting the laws in execution against all Dissenters whatsoever from the Church of England.” Both which, upon the previous question, being disagreed to by the house,

Resolved, nem. con. “That this house doth acquiesce, entirely rely, and rest wholly satisfied in his majesty's gracious Word, and repeated Declaration, to support and defend the Religion of the Church of England, as it is now by law established; which is dearer to us than our lives.”*

* “The unanimous vote for trusting the safety of religion to the king's declaration, passed not without observation; the rights of the church of England being the only point upon which, at this time, the parliament were in any degree jealous of the royal power. The committee of religion had voted unanimously, “That it is the opinion of the committee, that this house will stand by his majesty with their lives and fortunes, according to their bounden duty and allegiance, in defence of the reformed church of England, as it is now by law established; and that an humble address be presented to his majesty, to desire him to issue forth his royal proclamation, to cause the penal laws to be put in execution against all dissenters from the church of England whatsoever.” But upon the report of the house, the question of agreeing with the committee was evaded by a previous question, and the house, with equal unanimity, resolved, “That this house doth acquiesce, and entirely rely, and rest wholly satisfied, on his majesty's gracious word; and repeated declaration to support and defend the religion of the church of England, as it is now by law established, which is dearer to us than our lives.” Mr. Echard, and bishop Kennet, two writers of different principles, but both churchmen, assign, as the motive of this vote, the unwillingness of the party then prevalent in parliament, to adopt severe measures against the Protestant dissenters; but in this notion they are by means supported by the account, imperfect as it is, which sir John Reesby gives of the debate; for he makes no mention of tenderness towards dissenters, but states, as the chief argument against agreeing with the committee, that it might excite a jealousy of the king; and Barillon expressly says, that the first vote gave great offence to the king, still more to the queen, and that orders were, in consequence, issued to the court members of the house of commons, to devise some means to get rid of it. Indeed, the general circumstances of the times are decisive against the hypothesis of the two reverend historians; nor is it, as far as I know, adopted by any other historians. The probability seems to be, that the motion in the committee had been originally suggested by some Whig member, who could not, with prudence, speak his real sentiments openly, and who thought to embarrass the government, by touching upon a matter, where the union between the church party and the king, would be put to the severest test. The zeal of the Tories for persecution, made them at first give into the snare; but when, upon reflection, it occurred, that the involving of the Catholics in one common danger with

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Revenue Bill.] May 30. His majesty being on his throne, the lords being also in their robes; the gentleman usher had command to signify to the commons his majesty's pleasure, that they come presently, with their Speaker, to attend him; who, being come, said,

"Most gracious sovereign; We the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the commons, assembled in parliament, do now come in all duty to present to your maj. the Revenue you pleased to demand at the opening of this parliament; wherein we proceeded with as much speed as the forms of passing bills of that nature would admit.—We bring not with it any Bill for the Preservation or Security of our Religion, which is dearer to us than our lives: in that, we acquiesce, intirely rely, and rest wholly satisfied, in your majesty's gracious and sacred word, repeated declaration and assurance, to support and defend the Religion of the Church of England, as it is now by law established.—We present this Revenue to your majesty, without the addition of any conditional Appropriating or Tacking Clauses, &c.; and we humbly beseech your maj. to accept of it; and along with it our hearty prayers, that God Almighty would bless you with a long life, and happy reign to enjoy it."

The King's Speech thereupon.] After passing the said Bill, his majesty made this Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; I thank you very heartily for the Bill you have presented me this day; and I assure you, the readiness and cheerfulness that has attended the dispatch of it, is as acceptable to me as the bill itself. After so happy a beginning, you may believe, I would not call upon you unnecessarily for an extraordinary Supply. But, when I tell you, that the Stores of the Navy and Ordnance are extremely exhausted; that the Anticipations upon several branches of the Revenue are great and burthensome; that the Debts of the king my brother to his servants and family are such as deserve compassion; that the Rebellion in Scotland, without putting more weight upon it than it really deserves, must oblige me to a considerable expence extraordinary; I am sure, such considerations will move you to give me an Aid, to provide for those things, wherein the security, the ease, and the happiness of my government, are so much concerned: but, above all, I must recommend to you the care of the Navy, the strength and glory of this nation, that you will put it into such a condition, as may make us considered and respected abroad. I cannot express my concern upon this occasion more suitable to my own thoughts of it, than by assuring you I have a true English heart, as jealous of the honour of the nation as you can be. And I please myself with the the Protestant dissenters, must be displeasing to the king, they drew back without delay, and passed the most comprehensive vote of confidence, which James could desire." Fox's JAMES II. p. 151.

hopes, that, by God's blessing and your assistance, I may carry the reputation of it yet higher in the world, than ever it has been in the time of any of my ancestors. And as I will not call upon you for Supplies but when they are of public use and advantage; so I promise you, that what you give me upon such occasions shall be managed with good husbandry: and I will take care it shall be employed to the uses for which I ask them."

A Supply voted for the Navy.] A motion being made for a Supply, upon his majesty's Speech; the house, in a grand committee, Resolved, nem. con. 1. "That a Supply be given to his majesty towards the repairs of the Navy and Ordnance, and the Stores for the same; and for those other occasions in his majesty's Speech. 2. That, towards the said Supply, an Imposition to be laid on all Wines and Vinegar. 3. That the Imposition to be laid on Wines and Vinegar be the same that was laid thereon by an act of parliament, 23 Ch. ii. entitled, &c." Which being reported were agreed to by the house, and the Solicitor-General was ordered to prepare a Bill accordingly.

Bill to reverse Lord Stafford's Attainder.] June 3. The lords in a grand committee made some alterations in the title to a Bill for the reversing the Attainder of the lord visc. Stafford, a considerable Amendment in the Preamble, and a small Amendment in the enacting Clause, and then the Bill was engrossed: and the Reason of the Reversal was in these words; "Whereas it is now manifest, that the said Wm. late visc. Stafford, was innocent of the Treason laid to his Charge, and the Testimony whereby he was found guilty, was false: be it enacted, &c."

* "Rapin, Hume, and Ralph, observe upon this speech, that neither the generosity of the commons' grant, nor the confidence they expressed upon religious matters, could extort a kind word in favour of their religion. But this observation, whether meant as a reproach to him for his want of gracious feeling to a generous parliament, or as an oblique compliment to his sincerity, has no force in it. His majesty's speech was spoken immediately upon passing the bills which the Speaker presented, and he could not therefore take notice of the Speaker's words, unless he had spoken extempore; for the custom is not, nor I believe ever was, for the Speaker to give, beforehand, copies of addresses of this nature. James would not certainly have scrupled to repeat the assurances which he had so lately made in favour of the Protestant religion, as he did not scruple to talk of his true English heart, honour of the nation, &c. at a time when he was engaged with France; but the speech was prepared for an answer to a money bill, not for a question of the Protestant religion and church, and the false professions in it are adapted to what was supposed to be the only subject of it." Fox's JAMES II. p. 160.

Protest thereon.] But before the question was put for engrossing the Bill, the earls of Anglesea and Radnor, and two or three other lords, desired leave to enter their Dissents, for these Reasons; 1st, Because the assertion in the Bill of its 'being now manifest that the late visc. Stafford died innocent, and that the testimony on which he was convicted was false,' which are the sole grounds and reasons given to support the Bill, were destitute of all proof, warrant, or testimony, or matter of record before us. 2. That the Record of the king's-bench, read at the committee, concerning the conviction, last term, of one of the witnesses for perjury, in collateral points of proof, of no affinity to the lord Stafford's Trial, and given several years before, it is conceived can be no ground to invalidate the testimony upon which the said viscount was convicted, which could never legally be by one witness, and was in fact by the judgment of his peers, in the evidence of at least three. 3. It is conceived the said Judgment in the King's-bench was unprecedented, illegal and unwarranted, and highly derogatory to the honour, judicature and authority of this court, who have power to question and punish perjuries of witnesses before them, and ought not to be imposed upon by the judgments of inferior courts, or their Attainder of a peer invalidated by implication; and the Popish Plot so continued, pursued and punished by his late majesty and four parliaments, after public solemn devotion through the whole kingdom, by authority of Church and State, to be eluded, to the rraignment and scandal of the government; and only for the restoring of the family of one Popish lord. And all this, being without any matter judicially appearing before us to induce the same; and the records of the Trial not offered to be read, for the information of the court, before the passing of the bill. 4. For many other weighty Reasons offered and given by divers peers in the two days debate of this bill, both at the committee, and in the house."

The next day, the Bill was read a third time, and passed in the house of peers; but the fore-mentioned lords repeated their Protestations against it, and were seconded by the earls of Stamford and Clare, and the lord Eure, because the preamble of it was not amended, and no defect in point of law alledged as a reason for the reversal of the Attainder. But though the said Bill passed the lords, it was 'ropped' by the commons.*

* "The only matter in which the king's views were in any degree thwarted, was the reversal of lord Stafford's attainder, which, having passed the house of lords, not without opposition, was lost in the house of commons; a strong proof that the Popish plot was still the subject upon which the opposers of the court had most credit with the public. Mr. Hume, notwithstanding his just indignation at the condemnation of Stafford, and his general inclin-

Account of the Duke of Monmouth's landing.] June 13. The earl of Middleton acquainted the commons from his majesty, "That his majesty had this morning received advice, as well by Letter from the mayor of Lyme in Dorsetshire, as by two messengers come from thence, who had been examined upon oath at the Council Table, That the duke of Monmouth, with the late lord Grey, was landed in a hostile manner, with many men and arms; and had seized the port and guns, setting up a standard in the town, and were listing others."*

Resolutions thereupon.] And the said Letter being produced, and read to the house; and the said messengers being called in, and testifying the truth of the matter at the bar of the house;

Resolved, nem. con. "That the most humble and hearty Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for his gracious Message to this house communicating the landing of the duke of Monmouth; and that this house will stand by and assist his maj. with their Lives and Fortunes against the said James duke of Monmouth, his adherents and correspondents, and all re-tion to approve of royal politics, most unaccountably justifies the commons in their rejection of this bill, upon the principle of its being impolitic at that time to grant so full a justification of the Catholics, and to throw so foul an imputation upon the Protestants. Surely if there be one moral duty that is binding upon men in all times, places, and circumstances, and from which no supposed views of policy can excuse them, it is that of granting a full justification to the innocent; and such Mr. Hume considers the Catholics, and especially lord Stafford, to have been. The only rational way of accounting for this solitary instance of non-compliance on the part of the commons, is either to suppose that they still believed in the reality of the Popish Plot, and Stafford's guilt, or that the church party, which was uppermost, had such an antipathy to Popery, as indeed to every sect, whose tenets differed from theirs, that they deemed every thing lawful against its professors." Fox's JAMES II. p. 161.

* "As soon as lord Argyle sailed for Scotland, the duke of Monmouth set about his design with as much haste as possible, and was hurried into an ill-timed invasion. His whole company, with whom, after a prosperous course, he landed at Lyme in Dorsetshire, (on June 11) consisted but of 82 persons. Many of the country people came in to join him, but very few of the gentry. And he quickly found what it was to be at the head of undisciplined men, that knew nothing of war, and that were not to be used with rigour. His great error was, that he did not, in the first heat, venture on some hardy action, and then march either to Exeter or Bristol, where, as he would have found much wealth, so he would have gained some reputation by it. But he lingered in exercising his men, and stayed too long in the neighbourhood of Lyme." Burnet.

bels and traitors, and all others whatsoever that shall assist them, or any of them." And a committee was appointed to prepare the said Address.

Resolved, "That a Bill be brought in for Preservation of his majesty's Royal Person and government."*

Resolved "That a Bill be brought in for the Attainder of James duke of Monmouth of High Treason."

The Commons' Address to the King.] Mr. Solicitor-general Finch reports from the committee the following Address :

"We your majesty's most loyal subjects, the commons of England, in parliament assembled, do, with all duty, return our most humble and hearty Thanks for your majesty's gracious Message, communicated to us by the earl of Mid-

* "Further to manifest their servility to the king, as well as their hostility to every principle that could by implication be supposed to be connected with Monmouth or his cause, the house of commons passed a bill for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person, in which, after enacting that a written or verbal declaration of a treasonable intention should be tantamount to a treasonable act, they inserted two remarkable clauses, by one of which, to assert 'the legitimacy of Monmouth's birth'—by the other, 'to propose in parliament any alteration in the succession of the crown,' were made likewise high treason. We learn from Burnet, that the first part of this bill was strenuously and warmly debated, and that it was chiefly opposed by serjeant Maynard, whose arguments made some impression even at that time; but whether the serjeant was supported in his opposition, as the word 'chiefly' would lead us to imagine, or if supported, by whom, that historian does not mention; and unfortunately, neither of Maynard's speech itself, nor indeed of any opposition whatever to the bill, is there any other trace to be found. The crying injustice of the clause, which subjected a man to the pains of treason, merely for delivering his opinion upon a controverted fact, though he should do no act in consequence of such opinion, was not, as far as we are informed, objected to, or at all noticed, unless indeed the speech above alluded to, in which the Speaker is said to have descanted upon the general danger of making words treasonable, be supposed to have been applied to this clause, as well as to the former part of the bill. That the other clause should have passed without opposition, or even observation, must appear still more extraordinary, when we advert, not only to the nature of the clause itself, but to the circumstances of there being actually in the house, no inconsiderable number of members who had, in the former reign, repeatedly voted for the Exclusion Bill.—It is worthy of notice, however, that, while every principle of criminal jurisprudence, and every regard to the fundamental rights of the deliberative assemblies, which make part of the legislature of the nation, were thus shamelessly sacrificed to the eagerness which, at this disgraceful period, so generally prevailed, of manifesting loyalty, or rather abject servility to the sovereign, there still remained no small degree of tenderness for the interests and safety of the church of England, and a sentiment approaching to jealousy upon any matter which might endanger, even by the most remote consequences, or put any restriction upon her ministers. With this view, as one part of the bill did not relate to treasons only, but imposed new penalties upon such as should by writing, printing, preaching, or other speaking, attempt to bring the king or his government into hatred or contempt, there was a special proviso added, 'that the asserting, and maintaining by any writing, printing, preaching, or any other speaking, the doctrine, discipline, divine worship, or government of the church of England as it is now by law established, against Popery or any other different or dissenting opinions, is not intended, and shall not be interpreted, or construed to be any offence within the words or meaning of this act.' It cannot escape the reader, that only such attacks upon Popery as were made in favour of the doctrine and discipline of the church of England, and no other, were protected by this proviso, and consequently that, if there were any real occasion for such a guard, all Protestant dissenters who should write or speak against the Roman superstition, were wholly unprotected by it, and remained exposed to the danger, whatever it might be, from which the church was so anxious to exempt her supporters.—This bill passed the house of commons, and was sent up to the house of lords on the 30th of June. It was read a first time on that day, but the adjournment of both houses taking place on the 9th of July, it could not make any further progress at that time; and when the parliament met afterwards in autumn, there was no longer that passionate affection for the monarch, nor consequently that ardent zeal for servitude, which were necessary to make a law with such clauses and provisos, palatable or even endurable."

The King's Answer.] Which Address being agreed to by the house, and presented in the afternoon, his majesty was pleased to answer, "That he did thank this house for their loyal Address, and particularly for their care of his person; that he would venture his life in defence of his people, and for their peace; and he did not doubt, but, with God's blessing, and the assistance of his loyal subjects, to repel all traitors and rebels."

The D. of Monmouth's Declaration ordered to be burnt by the Common Hangman.] June 15. A traitorous Paper entitled, 'The Declaration of James duke of Monmouth, &c.*' being sent from the lords, with an Order which that house had made thereupon; and the said Paper and Order being read to the house, resolved, nem. con. "That this house doth agree with the lords; and that the said traitorous Paper be burnt by the hands of the common hangman accordingly."

A Bill for the Attainder of James duke of Monmouth of High Treason was read the first and second time, ingrossed, and read the third time, and sent up to the lords for their concurrence. †

A Supply Voted.] June 17. A motion being made for a Supply to be given to his maj. towards his present extraordinary expence for suppressing the Rebellion of the late duke of Monmouth, and the pretended earl of Argyle; Resolved, That a Supply be given to his majesty, &c.

The King's Message desiring a Supply.] June 18. The following Message from his majesty was delivered in writing, by the earl of Middleton.

"James R. His majesty judges it neces-

* "The duke of Monmouth's Manifesto was long and ill penned; full of much black and dull malice. It charged the king with the burning of London, the Popish Plot, Godfrey's murder, and the earl of Essex's death; and, to crown all, it was pretended; that the late king was poisoned by his orders. It was set forth, that the king's religion made him incapable of the crown; that three subsequent houses of commons had voted his exclusion: the taking away the old Charters, and the hard things done in the last reign, were laid to his charge; the elections of the present parliament were also set forth very odiously with great indecency of stile: the nation was also appealed to, when met in a free parliament, to judge of the duke's own pretensions; and all sort of liberty, both in spirituals and temporals, was promised to persons of all persuasions." Burnet.

† "The alarm of Monmouth's invasion was brought hot to London; where, upon the general report and belief of the thing, an Act of Attainder passed both houses in one day; some small opposition being made by the earl of Anglesea, because the evidence did not seem clear enough for so severe a sentence, which was grounded on the notoriety of the thing. The sum of 5000*l.* was set on his head." Ibid.

sary, for the good of his service, that the gentlemen of this house, (on whose loyalty and affection he depends, where-ever they are) should be present in their respective countries; and therefore designs there should be a recess in a very few days: but, because the Rebellion in the West will occasion an extraordinary expence, his maj. desires there may be a good fund of Credit provided for a present sum of money to answer the immediate charge his maj. must be at: and to the end none of the Bills now depending may be prejudiced, his maj. is pleased that this separation shall be an adjournment, and for some short time only."

£400,000. voted.] Resolved, "That a Supply not exceeding 400,000*l.* be given to his majesty for his present extraordinary occasions."

June 22. The earl of Middleton acquainted the house from his majesty, That the grand rebel, Argyle, is taken, and now in safe custody*.

Resolved, "That the most humble and hearty acknowledgment and thanks of this house be presented to his majesty, for his gracious communication to them of the taking of that arch-traitor the late earl of Argyle: which this house received with all imaginable joy and satisfaction."

The Parliament adjourned.] July 2. The commons attended his majesty in the house of lords, where the Lord Keeper declared his majesty's pleasure; "That both houses should forthwith severally adjourn themselves till the 4th day of August next. That his majesty doth not at present intend there shall be then a session; but that the session be carried on by farther adjournments, by such members as shall be about the town, till winter, unless in case of some emergency that shall require it: in which case or whensoever he shall intend a session, he will give timely notice by proclamation."—The house accordingly adjourned to August the 4th, and from thence, by his majesty's pleasure, it was farther adjourned to November the 9th. †

* "Argyle had left his arms in a castle, with such a guard as he could spare: but they were routed by a party of the king's forces. And with this he lost both heart and hope. And then, apprehending that all was gone, he put himself in a disguise, and had almost escaped: but he was taken. Thus was this Rebellion brought to a speedy end, with the effusion of very little blood. Nor was there much shed in the way of justice. Argyle was carried to Edinburgh, where he was executed, pitied by all. His death, being pursuant to the sentence passed three years before, was looked on as no better than murder." Burnet.

† "With the duke of Monmouth's Attainder the session of parliament ended; which was no small happiness to the nation, such a body of men being dismissed with doing so little hurt." Burnet.

The King's Speech at the Meeting of Parliament.] Nov. 9*. The parliament met, when his majesty in the house of lords made the

Soon after the rising of the parliament, the duke of Monmouth, having marched, from Lyme to Taunton, and from thence to Bridgewater, having in vain attempted Bath, and finding his men desert daily, resolved to attack the earl of Feversham (who was sent against him with the guards and regular troops) on the very first night of his encampment at Sedgmore, which was July 5, and had not his ill fate placed a battalion of Dumbarton's regiment in his way, he had in all probability surprized the king's army in their camp, and perhaps at that single blow decided the fate of England. As it was, he was entirely routed, having 3000 men killed on the spot, 1000 in the pursuit, and as many taken prisoners. Several parties being sent out after the duke, he was discovered, July 8, in a ditch, covered over with fern. He was brought to London, July 13, and two days after was beheaded on Tower-Hill. Lord Grey, who it was thought betrayed him, received a pardon, and was afterwards created by king William earl of Tankerville. The cruelties that followed, the legal massacres of Jefferies, and the military executions of Kirk, cannot be mentioned without horror.—“Such arbitrary principles had the court instilled into all its servants, that Feversham, immediately after the victory, hanged up above twenty prisoners; and was proceeding in his executions, when the bishop of Bath and Wells warned him, that these unhappy men were now by law entitled to a trial, and that their execution would be deemed a real murder. This remonstrance however did not stop the savage nature of colonel Kirke, a soldier of fortune, who had long served at Tangiers, and had contracted from his habitudes with the Moors, an inhumanity less known in European and in free countries. At his first entry into Bridgewater, he hanged nineteen without the least enquiry into the merits of their cause. As if to make sport with death, he ordered a certain number to be executed, while he and his company should drink to the king's health, or to the queen's, or to judge Jefferies's. Observing their feet to shake in the agonies of death, he cried that he would give them music to their dancing; and he immediately commanded the drums to beat and the trumpets to sound. By way of experiment, he ordered one man to be hung up three times, questioning him at every interval, whether he repented of his crime: but the man obstinately asserting, that, notwithstanding all the past, he would still willingly engage in the same cause, Kirke ordered him to be hung in chains. One story, commonly told of him, is memorable for the treachery, as well as barbarity which attended it. A young maid pleaded for the life of her brother, and hung herself at Kirke's feet, armed with all the charms, which beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could bestow upon her. The tyrant following Speech to both houses: which was afterwards read by the Speaker:

“My lords and gentlewen; After the storm was inflamed with desire, not softened into love or clemency. He promised to grant her request, provided that she, in her turn, would be equally compliant to him. The maid yielded to the conditions: but after she had passed the night with him, the wanton savage, next morning, showed her from the window her brother, the darling object for whom she had sacrificed her virtue, hanged on a gibbet, which he had secretly ordered to be there erected for his execution. Rage and despair and indignation took possession of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her senses.—All the inhabitants of that country, innocent as well as guilty, were exposed to the ravages of this barbarian. The soldiery were let loose to live on free quarter; and his own regiment, instructed by his example, and encouraged by his exhortations, distinguished themselves in a more particular manner by their outrages. By way of pleasantry he used to denominate them his lambs; an appellation, which was long remembered with horror in the west of England.—The cruel Jefferies succeeded after some interval; and showed the people, that the rigours of the law might equal, if not exceed, the ravages of military tyranny. This man, who wanted in cruelty, had already given a specimen of his character in many trials, where he had presided; and he now set out with a savage joy as to a full harvest of death and destruction. He began at Dorchester; and thirty rebels being arraigned, he exhorted them, but in vain, to save him, by their free confession, the trouble of trying them: and when twenty-nine were found guilty, he ordered them, as an additional punishment of their disobedience, to be led to immediate execution. Most of the other prisoners, terrified with this example, pleaded guilty; and no less than 292 received sentence at Dorchester. Of these 80 were executed. Exeter was the next stage of his cruelty: 243 were there tried, of whom a great number were condemned and executed. He also opened his commission at Taunton and Wells; and every where carried terror and astonishment along with him. The juries were so struck with his menaces, that they gave their verdict with precipitation, and many innocent persons were involved with the guilty. And on the whole, besides those butchered by the military commanders, 251 are computed to have fallen by the hands of justice. The whole country was strowed with the heads and limbs of traitors. Every village almost beheld the dead carcass of a wretched inhabitant. And all the rigours of justice, unabated by any appearance of clemency, were fully displayed to the people by the inhuman Jefferies.” Hume.

* “Now that the parliament is on the eve of meeting, they begin in London to talk about the matters that will be agitated in that assembly; it is difficult yet to judge of their success; that seemed to be coming upon us when we parted last, I am glad to meet you all again in so great peace and quietness; God Almighty be praised, by whose blessing that Rebellion was suppressed! But when we reflect, what an inconsiderable number of men began it, and how long they carried it on without any opposition, I hope every body will be convinced, that the Militia, which hath hitherto been so much depended on, is not sufficient for such occasions; and that there is nothing but a good force of well-disciplined troops in constant pay, that can defend us from such, as either at home or abroad, are disposed to disturb us: and in truth, my concern for the peace and quiet of my subjects, as well as for the safety of the government, made me think it necessary to increase the number to the proportion I have done: that I owed as well to the honour as the security of the nation; whose reputation was so infinitely exposed to all our

for although the greater number of the members seem well disposed towards his Britannic majesty, yet the Test and the Habeas Corpus acts are considered by all Englishmen as the bulwarks of the Protestant religion, and the privileges of the nation. The king hopes to succeed in obtaining their repeal; otherwise it would be a very imprudent step to attempt it, and then find himself obliged to dissolve the parliament without having procured from it what he considers necessary for the firm establishment of his authority. The restitution of the Catholic peers, and the confirmation of those officers in the army and the household, who are Catholics, will be a consequence of the repeal of the Test act. All this is considered of great importance; and almost all the English see with much concern that the royal authority is daily gaining fresh strength, and that the existing laws against the Catholic religion cannot be put in force under a king who publicly professes that religion.—Again, “All the schemes and plans are forming with regard to the parliament; it is certain that very important matters will come under discussion, of the issue of which no judgment can yet be formed. The king of England thinks he will succeed in obtaining the greater part of what he shall ask, and he seems very determined not to relax any thing in what he is desirous of procuring for the benefit of the Catholics and the strengthening of his authority. There is great distrust in the Protestant party; they well know that the future safety of the Protestant religion depends upon the measures of this session. The Catholics are not entirely agreed among themselves; the most skilful, and those who have the greatest share in the king's confidence, know that the present juncture is the most favourable one that can be hoped for, and that if they let it slip it may be long before such another occur. The Jesuits are of the same opinion, which certainly is the most just. But the opulent and settled Catholics are alarmed for the funeighbour, by having so evidently lain open to this late wretched attempt, that it is not to be repaired without keeping such a body of men on foot, that none may ever have the thought of finding us again so miserably unprovided.—It is for the support of this great charge, which is now more than double to what it was, that I ask your assistance in giving me a Supply answerable to the expences it brings along with it: and I cannot doubt, but what I have begun, so much for the honour and defence of the government, will be continued by you with all the cheerfulness and readiness that is requisite for a work of so great importance.—Let no man take exception, that these are some Officers in the Army not qualified, according to the late Tests, for their employments: the gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them well-known to me: and, having formerly served with me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their

ture, and apprehend a change which may ruin them; they are therefore willing to admit of every possible modification, and to be content with the most moderate advantages there may be a wish to grant, as the revocation of the penal laws, without insisting on a repeal of the Test act, which renders the Catholics incapable of holding any office or employment.—This party is supported by those who secretly favour the prince of Orange; and their advice would prevail, did not the others use every means in their power to convince the king of England, that if he does not seize the present opportunity, and carry into effect his designs respecting the Catholics and his own power, he will find greater obstacles arise daily. The king's disposition leads him to pursue a firm and vigorous conduct; the influence of those of his ministers who entertain the same sentiments appears to increase. The fate of the marquis of Halifax has alarmed those who wished to act with moderation, and adopt temperate measures. All this creates much cabal, both in the court and parliament. The king often speaks to me about what he wishes to do, and seems resolved to profit of the present juncture. He always tells me, that peace abroad is of the last necessity to him, and charges me to represent this to your majesty as decisive for the benefit of the Catholic religion. I confine myself within those limits prescribed to me by your majesty, and without busying myself to inspire him with any thing too violent, I strengthen the resolution he seems to have taken to profit of the present occasion. I will be assiduous to discover all that takes place, and to send your majesty as exact a detail as I can. There has not been for many years a more important session of parliament. I foresee even that many things will be treated of respecting the future, which was not expected. I will spare no pains to be well informed.” M. Barillon's Dispatches to the French King. See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix, p. cxxvi.

practice, I think them now fit to be employed under me: and I will deal plainly with you, that, after having had the benefit of their service in such a time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them, if there should be another Rebellion to make them necessary to me.*—I am afraid some men may be so wicked to hope and expect that a difference may happen between you and me upon this occasion: but when you consider what advantages have arisen to us in a few months, by the good understanding we have hitherto had; what wonderful effects it hath already produced in the change of the whole scene of affairs abroad, so much more to the honour of the nation, and the figure it ought to make in the world; and that nothing can hinder a farther progress in this way, to all our satisfactions, but Fears and Jealousies amongst ourselves; I will not apprehend that such a misfortune can befall us, as a division, or but a coldness, between me and you; nor that any thing can shake you in your steadiness and loyalty to me; who, by God's blessing, will ever make you returns of all kindness and protection, with a resolution to venture even my own life in the defence of the true interest of this kingdom."

Thanks voted by the Lords.] His majesty being withdrawn, the lords thought fit to debate, Whether they should give the king Thanks for his Speech or not? Some were for it, while others as warmly opposed it; but the marquis of Halifax, a man of a sharp satirical wit, said, by way of irony, 'They had now more reason than ever to give Thanks to his majesty, since he had dealt so plainly with them, and discovered what he would be at.' What he meant for a jest, was suddenly laid hold on by the courtiers for earnest, so the affirmative carried it, and an Address of Thanks was presented: to which his majesty returned this Answer:

The King's Answer.] "That he was very well satisfied that their lordships were well pleased with what he said; and that he would never offer any thing to their house; that he should not be convinced was for the good and true interest of the kingdom."

Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech, and on the Supply.] The earl of Middleton, a member of the house of commons, and one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, moved, "That the house would immediately return their Thanks to his majesty, for his most gracious Speech." After some debate, it was resolved, "That the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, on Thursday the 12th instant, to take into consideration his majesty's Speech."

Nov. 12. The house resolved itself into the said committee, Mr. solicitor Finch in the chair. The king's Speech was read.

* "Thus the king fell upon the two most unacceptable points that he could have found out; which were, a Standing Army, and a violation of the Act of the Test." Burnet.

The Earl of Middleton moved to have it considered by paragraphs.

Sir Winston Churchill. Some other than the Militia is necessary to be found: I move a Supply for the Army.

Lord Preston. We have lately had an unfortunate proof, how little we are to depend upon the Militia, and therefore sure we must all approve of his majesty's increasing the Forces to what they are. France is formidable, now Holland's forces are greatly increased, and we must be strong in proportion, for preservation of ourselves and Flanders, and toward that, the good harmony betwixt the king and this house hath greatly contributed. It has had two other great effects abroad. 1. The French king's Army last spring was marching towards Germany; Crequi was far advanced; but when the king of France heard the kindness of this house to the king, and the defeat of Monmouth, he recalled them. 2. The French and Spaniards had also a difference about Haye and Fonterabia: the French advanced their troops, and recalled them on this news. This is the noble effect of the harmony between the king and this house, who have (I hope) brought the same heart and loyalty they had the last time here. Hence we may conclude, these levies made by the king are just, reasonable, and necessary. And so let us vote a Supply, to answer his majesty's present occasions.

The Earl of Ranelagh. The question is, Whether a Supply, or not? I do not intend to arraign the Militia, but seeing a soldier is a trade, and must (as all other trades are) be learned, I will show you where the Militia has failed; viz. at Chatham; and in June last, when the late duke of Monmouth landed, and had but 83 men, and 300*l.* in money, who, in spite of the Militia, nay, in spite of such other force as the king could spare hence, brought it so far as he did. If the king of France had landed then, what would have become of us? I say, the Militia is not insignificant, but an additional force is necessary, and so a Supply that is answerable to it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If it shall appear to you, that the king's Revenue that he hath already, be sufficient to supply all the occasions, what then need we give him more? It is moved, That we should proceed by paragraphs. To come first to the Militia, who, let me tell you, did considerable service in the late Rebellion, and if a great nobleman of this kingdom had been supplied and assisted, it had soon been quelled. A confidence betwixt the king and his people is absolutely needful, let it come whence it will; our happiness consists in it. His majesty, on his first entrance on the crown, told us, 'he had been misrepresented, and that he would preserve the government in Church and State now established by law, and would maintain us in all our just Rights and Privileges.' Over-joyed at this, we ran hastily in to him; we gave four millions (reckoning what we added to him for life was worth) at once. The present Revenue is 1,900,000*l.* or two millions, yearly; the charge of the government (admitting this Army kept up) is but 1,300,000*l.* yearly: and pray let us not forget that there was a Bill of Exclusion debated in this house; I was here, and showed myself against it; the arguments for it were, "That we should, in case of a Popish Successor, have a Popish Army." You see the Act of the Test already broken, but pray remember what the late lord chancellor told you, when the late king (of blessed memory) passed that Act: the words were to this effect: 'By this Act you are provided against Popery, that no Papist can possibly creep into any employment.' I am afflicted greatly at this Breach of our Liberties, and seeing so great difference betwixt this Speech, and those heretofore made, cannot but believe this was by some other advice. This, struck at here, is our all, and I wonder there have been any men so desperate, as to take any employment not qualified for it; and I would therefore have the question, 'That a Standing Army is destructive to the country.'

Sir John Erny. The number of the standing forces is about 14 or 15,000 men, and they were about half so many before, and I conceive we are not safe without these forces to aid and help the Militia. I am not for laying aside the Militia, but I say, there is a necessity for a standing force. Half the charge of those forces, viz. about 300,000*l.* yearly, the whole being 600,000*l.* yearly, I conceive, is all we need to give for it: of that there remains 200,000*l.* unreceived of the 400,000*l.* given last, so the 200,000*l.* may go towards it, and the rest may be supplied by a tax on commodities as, for balancing of trade, may better be charged than not. I am for a Supply.

Sir Hugh Cholmondeley. I stand up for, and would not have the militia reflected on; it was very useful in the late Rebellion of Monmouth; it kept him from Bristol and Exeter, and is as good as any army we can raise against any at home.

Mr. Coningsby. I am for vindicating the Militia. There is just cause for a Supply, and I would give it, and reward the officers not qualified, or take them off some other way.

Mr. Ashburnham. I dread a Standing Army, but am for a Supply.

Mr. Waller. Kings, in old time, used to send, not only an account of their revenues, but of the charge they were going to be at, to the parliament, when they demanded aids. Hen. v. had but 56,000*l.* and queen Eliz. had 160,000*l.* and odd pounds, yearly. I am for a Bill for making the Militia useful, and would know, if we give money thus, whether it be not for setting up a Standing Army? I am for good Guards.

Sir Wm. Trumbull. The kingdom is guarded by law; we are now in perfect peace; the king is both feared and loved; an Army little needed; men justly afraid: that which made the last Rebellion as it was, the man that headed it was a favourite of the faction, and though he had got such a number, he was beaten by 1800 men only. I am against an Army.

Mr. Seymour. This last Rebellion has contributed to our future peace, and those engaged in it have sung their penitential psalm, and their punishment rejoiced at by all good persons. I do not commend the Militia, yet it is not to be rejected, but to be new modeled; and, for my part, I had rather pay double to these, [meaning for keeping up the Militia] from whom I fear nothing, than half so much to those, of whom I must ever be afraid; and, say what you will, it is a Standing Army. The last force preserved the peace, and was sufficient to do it, in the late king's time, and is now; all the profit and security of this nation is in our ships; and had there been the least ship in the Channel, it would have disappointed him. Supporting an Army is maintaining so many idle persons to lord it over the rest of the subjects. The king declared, 'That no soldiers should quarter in private houses;' but that they did; that they should pay for all things they took; but they paid nothing for almost all they took. And for Officers to be employed not taking the Tests, it is dispensing with all the laws at once; and if these men be good and kind, we know not whether it proceeds from their generosity, or principles: for we must remember, it is treason for any man to be reconciled to the Church of Rome; for the Pope, by law, is declared an enemy to this kingdom. A Supply given, as moved for, is a kind of an establishing an army by act of parliament; and when they have got the power into their hands, we are then to derive it from their courtesy; and therefore I would have the question be, 'That the safety of the kingdom doth not consist with a Standing force:' and this, it may be, will disappoint these persons, that make it their business this way, to make themselves useful.

Sir Tho. Clarges then moved for an Address.

Sir Tho. Meres. I am first for a Supply; that hinders not an Address: his majesty, in his Speech, only says, 'That the Militia is not sufficient.' The late Long Parliament always owned some force necessary: we are not to name the number, the king is best judge of that; a great soldier, and a good prince: I hear the number is 14 or 15,000; and I am for a Supply, and never saw, but money was always one part of the business of every parliament. There was a bitter spirit in the three last parliaments, not yet well allayed; and so I conclude a considerable force needful, besides the Militia. I call those raised, Guards, and would have a Supply given to support his majesty's extraordinary occasions. The Navy wants 6 or 800,000*l.* and I will give any reason for it; so a Supply may, without a negative, be given.

Serj. Maynard. There is already a law, that no man shall, on any occasion whatsoever, rise against the king: lord-lieutenants, and deputy-lieutenants, have power to disarm the disaffected: if you give thus a Supply, it is for an Army; and then, may not this Army be made of those that will not take the Test? Which act was not designed a punishment for the Papists, but a protection for ourselves; and giving this Money is for an Army: I am against it.

Sir Rd. Temple. I must concur with the king, that the Militia is not sufficient: I am for mending the Militia, and to make it such as the king and kingdom may confide in it; to trust to mercenary force alone is to give up all our liberties at once. If you provide a constant Supply to support them by setting up an Army, sir Tho. Meres has turned it into a Supply for the Navy. There is no country in the world, that has a law to set up an army. We have already made an ample Supply for the government. It is for kings to come to the house, from time to time, on extraordinary occasions; and if this army be provided for by law, they will never more come to this house. I am for giving for the extraordinary charge past. Armies are useful, when occasion is for them; but if you establish them, you can disband them no more. I am for a Supply, but not on this score of the Militia: there was not a company formed till 1588; and as soon as queen Eliz. had done with her army, she disbanded it. Armies have been fatal often to princes. The Army, in the late king's time, often turned out their leaders. I am for moving the house, for leave for a Bill to mend the Militia.

Sir Winston Churchill. The Beef-eaters, at this rate, may be called an Army.

Sir Tho. Hussey. The colonel may say what he will of the Beef-eaters, as he nicknames them; but they are established by act of parliament.

Mr. Seymour. I can make out, that the king's Revenue is sufficient to maintain the force on foot.

The question being put, "That a Supply be given to his majesty," Sir Tho. Clarges moved, "That the words, 'towards the support of the additional forces,' may be added: which was carried in the negative, 225 to 156; and then these votes passed:

Resolved, nem. con. "That a Supply be given to his majesty; and, that the house be moved to give leave to bring in a Bill to render the Militia more useful." Which were agreed to by the house.*

* "The discussion in the house of commons on the 22d (12th) of this month, was very warm, and attended with much debate. The court party, however, carried the grant of a supply. When the question for this was put, the opposition had the address to propose, in addition, the words, 'That these supplies should be for the keeping up of the army,' which would have caused it to be rejected by a majority of votes. But, through the Speaker, and some other members, the question was confined to a grant of the Supply, without specifying for what

Nov. 13. A motion being made, by the earl of Middleton, "That the house should proceed to the farther consideration of his majesty's Speech;" The house thereupon resolved itself into a committee of the whole house; and the previous question being then put, for the house to go on with the Supply, or proceed to the next Paragraph; the house divided. For proceeding to the Supply, 182. For proceeding to the next Paragraph, 185.

purpose, and it passed by a small majority: but the house, at the same time, came to a Resolution, to represent to his maj. that the true force of the kingdom consists in the militia, and that it would take every possible means to render this force efficient. This was a plain declaration that the commons will not allow of a regular standing army. Many of the members spoke with great vehemence against the army and the Catholic officers, and asserted that the king's speech was a contradiction of what he had said in the proceeding session, since in this he openly declares himself against the established laws which are the safeguard of the Protestant religion. Messrs. Seymour and Clarges spoke in very harsh terms. One Jenniss, a creature of the earl of Danby, and a new member, named Twisden, also spoke with much energy, and received great applause. All their speeches were directed against a standing army, and allowing of Catholic officers. One member said, he could not see that England made that great figure in Europe, which his majesty had talked of in his speech. To this lord Preston replied, that he knew, positively, your majesty would have attacked Spain, in some part or other, had not the king of England prevented it; and that you would not have been deterred from it, had you not thought that a rupture with Spain would have thrown England into the arms of your enemies. There were some other members, who maintained that the king of England only could stop the progress and increase of that power which makes all the others tremble, and that it is for the real interest of the English nation, that the king should be in a condition to oppose it, which cannot be done if he have not a sufficient force, always ready for service. This reasoning was indirectly combated by other members, who insisted that the true interests of Englishmen are to live in peace and tranquillity at home, with an assurance of their laws and property, as well as of their consciences in the exercise of their religion; and that when this should be the case, England would be of sufficient importance abroad. This discussion appeared so opposite to what his Britannic majesty could desire, that it has been already said that the parliament would be prorogued, or dissolved. Many meetings had taken place on the day preceding, in which the old members who are not in the present parliament gave instructions to the new representatives." Barillon's Dispatches. See FOX'S JAMES II. Appendix, p. cxxiii.

Resolved, "That it be an instruction to the grand committee, that the committee proceed first in the consideration of that Paragraph in his majesty's Speech, which next follows that of the Supply."^o

Nov. 14. An Address was moved in the Committee, by sir Edmund Jennings. Others moved the inconveniency of it, if not granted, and so to let it alone. Others, to have the Catholics, who had been so useful and well known to his majesty, named and compensated: Some seemed to doubt his majesty's compliance. Others, that it was not to be doubted, when addressed by such a house.

Mr. Solicitor Finch reports from the Grand Committee [instructed as above] that the committee had agreed upon the two following Resolutions, viz. 1. "That the house be moved, That a committee be appointed to prepare an humble Address to be presented to his majesty, humbly showing, that those Officers of the Army, who are not qualified for their Employments by the acts for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, cannot by law be capable of their Employments: and that it be part of the said Address, 'That his majesty would be pleased not to continue them in their Employments.' 2. That the house be moved to appoint a Committee to bring in a Bill to indemnify those persons unqualified, for the time past."—Which were agreed to by the house, with an Amendment in the first Resolve, by leaving out the words marked in Italics, and by adding, instead thereof, these words: 'That his majesty would be graciously pleased to give such directions, that no apprehensions or jealousies may remain in the hearts of his majesty's good and faithful subjects.'—And an Address was ordered to be prepared accordingly, and also a Bill to indemnify those persons unqualified.

* "The house met again on the 23d, (13th) when the proceedings were still more violent; and on the question whether they should discuss the grant of the supplies, or take the king's speech into consideration, the opposition carried the latter by a majority of three: this was occasioned by several persons attached to, or dependent upon the court, being absent, and from some of those present even voting with the opposition, among others, Mr. Fox, paymaster of the Forces, whose father is an officer in the household, and formerly had the post of paymaster, in which he gained a large fortune; a lieutenant in the horse-guards, of the name of Darcy, a person of rank, also voted with the opposition. The language of the different speakers was more violent than on the day preceding, against a Standing Army and the Catholic Officers; and it seemed to be the almost unanimous sentiment of the house that no money should be granted for the support of the army, and that no Catholic officers should be suffered to remain in it." Barillon's Dispatches; See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix, p. cxxxviii.

VOL. IV.

Resolved, "That it be an instruction to the said committee, That, in the preamble of the said Address, the humble and hearty thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for his great care in the Suppression of the late Rebellion."^o

The Commons' Address against Popish Officers.] Nov. 16. Mr. Solicitor Finch reports, That the committee appointed had drawn up an Address to his majesty; which was read, and agreed to, as follows:

"Most gracious sovereign; We your majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects, the commons, in parliament assembled, do in the first place (as in duty bound) return your maj. our most humble and hearty Thanks for your great care and conduct in suppressing the late Rebellion, which threatened the overthrow of this government both in Church and State, and the utter extirpation of our Religion as by law established, which is most dear unto us, and which your maj. hath been pleased to give us repeated assurances you will always defend and support; which with all grateful hearts we shall ever acknowledge.—We farther crave leave to acquaint your majesty, that we have, with all duty and readiness, taken into our consideration your majesty's gracious Speech to us: and as to that part of it, relating to the Officers in the Army, not qualified for their Employments, according to an act of parliament made in the 25th of the reign of your majesty's royal brother, entitled, 'An Act for preventing Dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants,' we do, out of our bounden duty, humbly represent unto your majesty, That those Officers cannot by law be capable of

* "The day before yesterday (the 24th) the house again met, to consider the king's speech. It was expected that there would be still greater warmth and animosity than there had been on the two preceding days; but there was much more temper and moderation than was looked for. There was scarcely any repetition of what had been before said; but yet the discussion was conducted with great firmness, and the house seemed fully resolved not to allow the king to employ Catholic officers, since it is directly contrary to the laws. Different expedients were suggested to reconcile this difficulty; that of allowing those who are already appointed to remain, and of obtaining a promise from the king, that he would make no further increase in their number, was rejected, and the house concluded with moving an address to his majesty, praying him to remove the suspicions and jealousy which the non-execution of the laws has created in the nation. The temper shewn in this last discussion is attributed to a fear of giving an occasion for the dissolution of parliament. Others say it was caused by a club of old members, who have secretly inspired a firmness and obstinacy, under an outward display of moderation." Barillon's Dispatches: See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix, p. cxxxiii.

their Employments; and that the Incapacities they bring upon themselves thereby, can no way be taken off but by an act of parliament. —Therefore, out of that great deference and duty we owe unto your majesty, who have been graciously pleased to take notice of their services to you, we are preparing a Bill to pass both houses for your royal assent, to indemnify them from the Penalties they have now incurred: and, because the continuing of them in their Employments may be taken to be a dispensing with that law without act of parliament, (the consequence of which is of the greatest concern to the rights of all your majesty's subjects, and to all the laws made for security of their religion) we therefore do most humbly beseech your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased to give such directions therein, that no apprehensions or jealousies may remain in the hearts of your majesty's good and faithful subjects."

A motion being made for going to the lords for their concurrence; some debated, 'That it would carry with it the greater weight, and be more likely to have good effect; and if the concurrence of the lords were asked, the Judges, in the lords house, would have an opportunity of speaking their opinion to it.' Others opposed it, 'for the lords having already given their Thanks to the king for his Speech, as being contented therewith, and that it would be more for the honour of the house of commons to address alone.' Those that were against the thing itself when it passed first, were for going to the lords for their concurrence. The house divided. For asking concurrence, 304. Against it, 216. So it passed in the negative.

Debate on the Supply, and the Way of raising it.] The house being resolved into a committee of the whole house, to consider of a Supply for his majesty; Mr. Solicitor took the chair.

Lord Campden moved 'for 200,000*l.* to be given to the king for a Supply, which, with 200,000*l.* confessed of what was given for suppressing the late Rebellion, makes 400,000*l.*' and was seconded.

Sir John Ernly. 1,200,000*l.* is needful, and such a sum has been given before in the same session, when there was an Address of this kind made to the late king.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We have this session already given Customs and Excises for his majesty's life: additional Duty on Wines eight years, 150,000*l.* yearly. Tax on Sugar and Tobacco, eight years, 200,000*l.* yearly. Tax on Linen and East-India Commodities, five years, 120,000*l.* yearly. In all, six millions. Let us give little now, to have opportunity to give more another time; for if we give too much now, we shall have nothing left to give; and if we proceed thus, what we have will be taken from us.

Sir Edm. Jennings. To give 1,200,000*l.* now, because such a sum has been given, is no argument; once 2,400,000*l.* was given here, and therefore should it be so now? 200,000*l.* with what is confessed to be in cash, makes 400,000*l.* and that will maintain the charge one year, and better; and giving all at once is doubting the affection of the people.

Lord Preston. You unanimously voted a Supply last night, and naming so little now is not so ingenuous a way of proceeding. We are told, six millions have been this session given; I would have you, gentlemen, take notice, the giving his maj. what the late king had, is but settling a Revenue that before was not sufficient for the support of the government; what was given besides, was part for the late king's servants, part for the Fleet and Stores, and part for suppressing the late Rebellion. To give so little now, is not to enable the king to defend and preserve us, which he has promised to do. I am for 1,200,000*l.*

The Earl of Ranelagh. The question is for 200,000*l.* or for 1,200,000*l.* What has been given in this matter already, ought not to be weighed at all; and what is called six millions, had all uses (when given) tacked to it. The Revenue his brother had, had uses enough, as the Wine and Vinegar act, rated at yearly 15,000*l.* for the Fleet, Stores, Ordnance, and Servants: The Sugar and Tobacco act, rated at yearly 200,000*l.* for the said Stores, Ordinary, and Fleet: and the additional duty on French linen and East-India commodities, rated at yearly 120,000*l.* for suppressing the late Rebellion. So there are uses for all that, and what is now given, must be taken for supporting the forces: and therefore I am for 1,200,000*l.*

Sir Winston Churchill. 200,000*l.* is much too little: Soldiers move not without pay. 'No Penny, No Paternoster.'

Mr. Ettrick moved for 700,000*l.* and mentioned to have it raised upon the new Buildings, which might produce 400,000*l.* and a Poll-Bill for the other 300,000*l.*

Mr. Waller. If I knew the king's Revenue were short, I would give as far as any man; but now we are going for this particular use, and if this 200,000*l.* will not do, how can we be sure that 1,200,000*l.* will? If we give too little now, hereafter, if we see occasion, we may give more; but if we now give too much, I do not see how we shall ever have it again, though I have heard of such a thing in queen Elizabeth's time. The king (reckoning what he had of his own into it) has 600,000*l.* yearly more than the late king had, and when there is need, I am for more, but now only 400,000*l.* and to raise that easy you will be put to it: how will you do it? If you lay it upon trade, that will make it revenue, and when once in the crown for some time, it will never get out again. I am for only 400,000*l.*

Lord Campden. If the king wants 200,000*l.* I would give him 200,000*l.* but I am for giving no more than he really wants.

Mr. Waller. We give, because we are asked. I am for the least sum, because for an army, and I would be rid of them as soon as I could; and am more now against it than I lately was, being satisfied that the country is weary of the oppression of the soldiers, weary of free quarters, plunder, and some felons, for which they have no complaint, no redress: and since I heard Mr. Blaitwayte tell us, how strict rules were prescribed them by the king, I find by their behaviour, the king cannot govern them himself; and then what will become of us?

Sir Willoughby Hickman. The Rebellion is suppressed, and the Army is urged to be small, but it is so thick of Officers, that by filling up the Troops, which is easily at any time done, increases their number to a third part more. I am for providing for them but one whole year only, and only for 400,000*l.*

Mr. Coningsby. I agree to the 400,000*l.* We owe besides a duty to our country, and are bound by that duty to leave our posterity as free in our liberties and properties as we can; and there being Officers now in the army, that have not taken the Test, greatly flatter my zeal for it, and make me esteem the Militia; of which if well modeled, and placed in mens hands of interest in their country, we are certain, and so is the king secure; for there is no such security of any man's loyalty, as a good estate. Reasons I have heard given against armies, that they debauched the manners of all the people, their wives, daughters, and servants. Men do not go to Church where they quarter, for fear mischief should be done in their absence. Plough-men and servants quit all country-employments to turn soldiers; and then a court-martial, in time of peace, is most terrible. In peace, justices of it, and the civil magistrate, ought to punish, if applied to. And what occasion then can be for them? Is it to suppress a rebellion in time of an invasion? All then will go towards that. Or is it to assist his allies? The house will give aid, when wanted, on that score. The Guards I am not against; those showed themselves useful in Venner's business, and the late Rebellion; I am not against them: I only speak of those that have been new raised.

Col. Ashton. I will tell you the use of these forces; they expected the rising of a great party, and were not these forces standing, to prevent a Rebellion, you would have one in a few days.

Mr. Blaitwayte. If any disorders have been committed, it is not yet too late to have them redressed; and martial law (if by that cleared) does not hinder proceeding at common law for the same thing: 400,000*l.* is not enough; no state near us, in proportion, but what exceeds this small number of men.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Seven millions of men in England; the strength of England consists in our marine, in which (for want of men) France can never equal us; their trade will not breed them; a ship of fifty tons will carry 100,000*l.* of their goods, linen and silks. Ours are bulky goods, and employ twenty times more, unless you (by burdening of trade) let them into the West-Indies. Armies are not manageable; commanders have been very often known to rebel: the measure of our Supply is our security. His majesty's Declaration says, 'If on complaint, the Officers give no redress, then complain to the king;' and so justice is balked by this hardship put upon the complainant.

*Sir Win. Trumbull moved to have it temporary from year to year.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Let it be, to enable his majesty to preserve us in peace at home, and to make his majesty formidable abroad, for 1,200,000*l.* as a Supply answerable to the loyalty of this house.

Sir Hugh Cholmondeley. This house was so forward to give last time, that the king's ministers gave their stop to it.

Sir John Werden. The use is to direct the quantum. I see a present necessity for continuing these Forces, till the Militia is made useful; I am for trying two years, and so for 400,000*l.* and so leave the door open for coming hither to give another time.

Sir Tho. Meres. The principle of the rebel party is never to repent. I am for 1,200,000*l.* and if so much be given, I would have you, gentlemen, to remember that the Fanatics are the cause of it.

Mr. Pepys. An island may be attacked, notwithstanding any fleet. Ours is much mended, a thousand men daily at work, ever since we gave money for it, and not one man in it an officer, that has not taken the Test.

Col. Ogletorph. New troops are not so good as old, and more subject to commit disorders, but will be less so, when they are longer under discipline. The king of France never sends troops to his Army, till they have been two or three years on foot in a garrison.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The Trained Bands at Newbury fight did brave things.

Then the question was, "That a sum, not exceeding 400,000*l.* should be given to the king. The previous question being put, it passed in the negative, 179 to 167. Then the question was put for 700,000*l.* and no more; which passed in the affirmative, 212 to 170.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, That a Supply of 700,000*l.* be given to his majesty, and no more." Which was agreed to by the house with an Amendment, by leaving out the words 'and no more,' and, instead thereof, inserting these words, 'not exceeding the sum.†'

* Afterwards Secretary of State to king William.

† "Yesterday, being Sunday, the house did not meet. To-day it considers the supplies. The general question is, whether the commons will grant them unconditionally, and content themselves with having shewn how much they abhor a regular standing army and the employment of Catholics, without insisting farther upon any previous satisfaction. If this be the case, the king will have obtained every thing

Nov. 17. The house resolved into a committee of the whole house, to consider the way of raising his majesty's Supply. Mr. North took the Chair.

Sir John Ernly. I move for an additional duty upon Wines to yield 400,000*l.* yearly; and other goods, &c. about 600,000*l.* yearly, which, with the continuance for some years of the late act of imposition on French linens, and East-India silks, &c. might make up the sum; and I propose this way, to avoid a land-tax. The goods I propose to be rated, are soap, pot-ashes, to pay 7½*d.* to treble; unwrought silks, deals, planks, and other boards, to double. Raisins and prunes 2*s.* per cent. to double. Iron, which now pays 7*s.* per cent. to double. Copperas 18*s.* per cent. to double. Oils to 8 or 10 per ton, pay now 30*s.* Drugs will bear two-thirds more than rated. Drugs and spices from Holland, salt, and all prohibited goods, 20*l.* per cent. And this, I hope, may do what is now intended to be raised at this time, supposing 4*l.* per ton on French wines.

Sir Dudley North moved much to the same effect, and enlarged on it, and said, The Book of Rates has been well considered, and these goods are capable of bearing the duties pro-essential; for the general discontent will not prevent him from keeping up his army, and having the means of paying it. This day's discussion will determine the length of the present session; for his majesty seems resolved not to relax in any thing; and his firmness astonishes those who thought that what had taken place in the house of commons, would have induced him to admit of some modifications, and not to persist in carrying in this session all that he desires.—From what I have the honour of sending to your majesty, you will see that the affairs of this country are greatly altered within these few days; some changes and ameliorations may take place in them: I know that money is employed to soften those most opposed to the court; but it is difficult to establish a perfect concert, and to remove entirely the great distrust which exists on all sides. The opposition party is that of the prince of Orange, whom a great number of persons secretly favour: there is even a division in the court; this I will explain to your majesty as clearly as I can, in the course of my letter. It seems to me, at the same time, that I have nothing to do in execution of the order contained in your last dispatch, but to take all possible care to obtain the fullest information, and to acquaint you exactly with what passes.—I have preserved a connexion with some of the leading persons in the preceding parliaments, and it would not be impossible to increase, if it were necessary, the divisions which seem to be rising. It would be for your majesty's interest, still to keep some persons dependent upon you; this might even, on certain occasions, be of use to the king of England, and the welfare of our reli-posed; but if the king took the 40*l.* per ton on French wines at 20,000*l.* yearly, he would be a loser by it.—Other gentlemen insisted on having French linen higher charged.

Mr. Neale. The pepper that is expended here, paying 1*d.* a pound, might pay one penny more, and so yield 70 or 80,000*l.* yearly; and that bullion, exported to the Indies, might bear 5*l.* per cent. and encourage the sending of other goods (in some measure) instead of it thither.

Sir Rd. Temple moved Subsidies, or Land-Tax; but the house inclining to what was first proposed, and it being consented to by the king's ministers, seemed contented with it; so it was voted, "That an Act for laying an Imposition on French linens, East-India goods, brandy, &c. should be continued for five years, from Midsummer 1690, and be given to his majesty as 400,000*l.*' And that an additional imposition of 4*l.* per ton be laid upon all French wines, on which to be raised 300,000*l.* which makes up the 700,000*l.*"—The time how long this 4*l.* per ton shall be laid, is not yet determined, an account being first to be brought from the custom-house books, of what number of tons are yearly imported: it was said, 100,000 tons; others affirmed, there were near double so gion. I see nothing urgent at present. Affairs seem, at this moment at least, to be taking of themselves that course which may be most advantageous to your majesty; it is, however, difficult to foresee the sudden changes and revolutions which happen in this country; and your majesty well knows that affairs are begun and terminated before there is time to receive fresh instructions.—The house of commons began this morning with reading the address which is to be presented to his majesty. I have been assured that it is conceived in very strong and positive terms against the Catholic officers; there was afterwards a motion for requesting the lords to join the commons in this Address; but it was rejected, and the court party prevailed. The supply was next taken into consideration; and after much debate, they agreed to grant 700,000*l.* at once. The king looked for 1,400,000*l.*; however, I believe he will not be dissatisfied, provided the sources from which it is to arise be secure, and the lower house do not insist upon the address which it is to present, as a previous condition: this is yet uncertain. We must wait till it is seen whether some incident may not happen to prevent the effect of the resolution which has been adopted. If the money affair can be entirely separated from the other things which are agitated, the king will gain his end, and may dispense with the parliament, at least for a considerable time. The earl of Sunderland has just told me that he does not think the king and the parliament can agree, because their respective wishes are in direct opposition to each other." Barillon's Dispatches: See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix, p. cxxiv.

many.—The house seemed to incline to 8 or 10 years, and that the duties already on it should still continue on the same time; which 4l. per ton, with the duty it already pays, is near 20l. per ton.

The King's Answer to the Address.] Nov. 18. The Speaker acquainted the house, That his majesty having been yesterday attended, in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, with the Address of thanks from this house for his great care and conduct in suppressing the late Rebellion, and likewise concerning the Officers of the Army not qualified for their Employments, he was graciously pleased to return an Answer, to the effect following:

"I did not expect such an Address from the house of commons, having so lately recommended to your consideration the great advantages a good understanding between us had produced in a very short time, and given you warning of Fears and Jealousies amongst ourselves.—I had reason to hope, that the reputation God hath blessed me within the world, would have created and confirmed a greater confidence in you of me, and of all that I say to you: but however you proceed on your part, I will be steady in all my promises I have made to you, and be very just to my word in this, and all my other Speeches."

Mr. Coke's offensive Speech.] The said Answer was read with all due reverence and respect, and there being a profound silence in the house for some time after it,

Mr. Wharton moved, 'That a day might be appointed to consider of his majesty's Answer to the late Address of this house;' and named Friday next.

Mr. Coke stood up and seconded that motion, and said 'I hope we are all Englishmen, and are not to be frightened out of our duty by a few high words.'

Lord Preston took present exceptions against the words, which, as is usual, were written down by the clerk, and Mr. Coke was called upon to explain.

Mr. Coke said, 'He intended no ill by it; and that he did not believe these the words. And that if he had said any thing that had given the house offence, he was sorry, and would ask them pardon for it.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. It is not enough to say these were not the words, but you are to say what the words were.

Mr. Coke. I do not make set speeches: I cannot repeat them; and if they did drop from me, I ask the king and your pardon.

So these being taken for granted to have been the Words, Mr. Coke, as the custom is in such cases, withdrew into the Speaker's chamber.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Not our own honour, but the king is concerned in this. I move, that he be brought to the bar, and there receive a reprimand from Mr. Speaker for it.

Sir Hugh Cholmondeley. He is a gentleman of great loyalty, never before of the house; I desire he may have what favour he can.

Mr. Ashburnham. It is a great reflection upon this house, if this be let pass.

Several spoke of his loyalty, but none to excuse him for this.

Lord Preston. Send him to the Tower!

Lord Middleton. The meaning of this seems like an incendiary. The Tower! This needs no aggravation. A reprimand for an offence to this house might do; but this does not end there; and it is a question whether it be in the power of the house to pass it by, the offence being given to the king as well as you: I am for calling him to the bar in the first place.

Resolved, "That Mr. John Coke, a member of this house, for his indecent and undutiful reflecting on the king and this house, be committed to the Tower." And the Speaker was ordered to issue his warrant accordingly.

Mr. Seymour. Now this is over I cannot but consent to those that moved for a day, to consider of his majesty's Answer, nor think myself as honest as I should be, if I now hold my tongue. And if we do take this matter into consideration, I doubt not but that we shall behave ourselves with that decency to his majesty, that we may hope for a more satisfactory Answer than as yet this seems to be to me.

Sir John Ernly. I hope that acquiescence that was this morning in this house, on reading his majesty's Answer, has ended this matter. I do think the king will do all that he promised, and am for resting there.

Sir Tho. Meres moved to adjourn, and said, 'He did not know what to say to it.'

Sir Tho. Clarges. For that very reason I move for a day to consider of it; and I do not think we show that respect we ought to do to the king, if we do not.

The Lords take the King's Speech into consideration.] "By this time," says Mr. Ralph, "the danger of the public grew so apparent that the Lords grew ashamed of their first days work; and even the Bishops put in for their share of merit, by moving, 'That a day might be appointed for taking the King's Speech into consideration.' Compton of London, was the right reverend father in God, who, on this occasion, stood forth (courageously, says Echard) as the mouth of the Bench. Alarmed at this unexpected attack, the courtiers endeavoured to stave it off, by urging, That having already given Thanks for the Speech, they had thereby adopted the sentiments contained in it; and precluded themselves from finding fault with any part of it. This plea was, however, rejected with indignation, and put an end, says bishop Burnet, to the compliment of giving Thanks for a Speech, when there was no special reason for it. The lords Halifax, Nottingham, and Mordaunt, were the chief speakers; for as to the Bishops, they acquiesced in what his lordship of London was pleased to say for them: and though the point before them was only for setting a day, many things, we are told, escaped in relation to the merits of the case: as, that the Test was now the best fence they had for their religion: if they gave up so great a point, all the rest would soon follow; and if the king, might by his authority, supersede such a law, fortified with so many clauses, and above all with that of an incapacity, it was in vain to think of law any more. The government would become arbitrary and absolute. All which, it seems, Jeffereys undertook to answer, and that in as haughty and arrogant a tone, as he had used himself to on the bench. But he was soon taught to know his place; and that frowns, and noise, and menaces would not pass for arguments there. Upon the whole, the court-party finding themselves out-numbered, as well as out-argued, were forced to give way; and it was agreed, that, on the 25th the Speech should be taken into consideration.*

The Parliament dissolved, after many Prorogations.] Nov. 30. The king, by the usher of the black-rod, commanded the commons to attend him in the house of peers, where his majesty was pleased, by the lord chancellor Jeffereys, for many weighty reasons to prorogue the parliament to February 10;† when it met,

* "The king," says sir John Reresby, "happened to be present, as he was generally constant in the house of lords, and was much concerned at the freedom that was used upon this subject: and in truth it gave great dissatisfaction, that the law, in this point, particularly, should be thus invaded and set at naught; and the very best of the king's friends, as well as his officers, whether civil or military, except such as were Popishly inclined, were strangely alarmed thereat, and expressed themselves with great freedom, wherever it happened to be the topic of their discourse."

† "The king saw, that both houses were now so fixed, that he could carry nothing in either of them, unless he would depart from his Speech, and let the Act of the Test take place: so he prorogued the parliament, and kept it by repeated prorogations still on foot for about a year and a half, but without holding a session." Burnet.

"The parliament was prorogued this morning to the 20th of February. From what took place in the house yesterday, the king of England saw clearly that the opposition were daily gaining strength, and that there would be much inconvenience in suffering them to remain longer together. I learn that the surprise was very great, and that there was no expectation that the parliament would be prorogued before the money bill was passed. Every measure that has been brought forward in the house, and not completed, is rendered null by the prorogation; and the grant of the supplies is, of course, entirely done away. There is no likelihood that this step can produce any other effect than that of increasing the discontent of those who are already irritated. This occasions a great alteration in the affairs of England. I will take all due care to transmit to your majesty an exact account of every thing, in order that I may receive your instructions and was farther prorogued to May 10, 1688, from thence to Nov. 22, from thence to Feb. 15, from thence to April 28, 1687, and from thence to Nov. 22, but before that day came the parliament was dissolved by Proclamation, dated July 2.

The King publishes a Declaration of Indulgence.] Previous to the Dissolution, namely, on the 4th of April 1687, the king published a Declaration of Indulgence,* setting forth "That there was nothing which his majesty so earnestly desired as to make his subjects happy, and to unite them to himself by inclination as well as duty, and that this could only be done by granting them the free exercise of their Religion, in addition to the perfect enjoyment of their Property, which had never been invaded by him, since his accession to the crown, and which should ever be preserved to them during his reign, as the truest methods of their peace and his glory." His majesty then proceeds to say in substance, "That though he could not but heartily wish, that all his subjects were members of the Catholic Church: yet he had always declared, That conscience ought not to be constrained, nor people forced in matters of mere Religion; that force was contrary to the interest of government, and never obtained the end for which it was employed: that this was become manifest by the experience of the four last reigns; and that this shewed the necessity of his present Declaration, which virtue of his royal prerogative, he had thought fit to issue forth, and which he made no doubt the two houses would concur with him in, when he should think it convenient for them to meet." Descending then to particulars, his majesty in the first place, declared, "That he would protect the archbishops, bishops, &c. of the Church of England in the free exercise of their Religion, as by law established, and in the quiet enjoyment of their possessions, without any molestation or disturbance whatsoever. 2. That the execution of all, and all manner of Penal Laws in matters Ecclesiastical, should be immediately suspended. 3. That he gave his free leave to all his loving subjects to serve God their own way either in public or private, provided they took special care that nothing was preached or taught among them tending to alienate the hearts of the people from his government. 4. That it was his command that no disturbance of any kind should be given to them, under pain of his displeasure, and of being proceeded against with the utmost severity. 5. That it was his royal will and pleasure, That the Oaths commonly called the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, as also the several Tests and Declarations mentioned in the acts of parliament of the 25th and 30th with respect to my future conduct." Barillon's Dispatches. See Fox's JAMES II. Appendix p. cxxxiv.

* For an Answer to this Declaration, written by the Marquis of Halifax, see Appendix No. XVII.

of Charles ii. should not for the future be required to be taken by any person, who was or should be employed in any place of trust: and, that it was his farther pleasure and intention, to grant his royal dispensations under the great seal to all persons so employed, who should not take the said Oaths. 6. That he did thereby give his free Pardon to all Nonconformists, Recusants, and other his loving subjects, for all crimes and things by them committed against the said Penal Laws: and that the pardon so given should be as good and effectual to all intents and purposes, as if every individual had been therein particularly named, or had received particular pardons under the great seal. And lastly, That he would maintain his loving subjects in all their properties and possessions, as well of Church and Abbey Lands, as any other."

On the 24th of August 1688, his majesty declared in Council that another parliament should be summoned to meet on the 27th of Nov. the Writs to bear date the 5th of Sept. but the said Writs were recalled or not issued, on the advice of the prince of Orange's designs. The violent attempts made during the remainder of this reign to introduce tyranny both in Church and State; the Judgments given for the Dispensing Power; the introduction of a Jesuit to the Council Board; the reception of the Pope's Nuncio; the sending an Ambassador to Rome; the attacks on both the Universities; the committing the Bishops to the Tower, &c. are all too well known to be here recited.

On the 10th of October 1688, the prince of Orange, who was now on the point of embarking his troops for this country, issued his first DECLARATION from the Hague: with which we shall commence our Fifth Volume.
