My dear friend.

I am sure we shall agree that, in the present state of feeling existing in your country against England, it is desirable that no mistakes in matters of fact should be permitted to aggravate any existing prejudices. You will therefore not object, I am confident, to my pointing out to you an extraordinary statement in the Liberator of Aug<sup>t</sup>. 25, which cannot but mislead those of your readers, who do not know better about the whole theory & spirit of the political institutions of England. It is for you to judge how to set the matter right.

In the article on Mr Bright's reply to Mr. Rosebuck, (first page,) the writer emphatically one of the people, is the most effective of English Parliamentary speakers; but, because he has sprung from the industrial classes, he has not the most remote chance of being invited, even should his liberal principles triumph, to form part of any Administration in England."

" Mr. John Bright,

Says
So the writer really unaware that Mr Cobden, Mr Bright's twin brother in politics, & precisely his equal in ability, has been invited & urged to take a seat in the Cabinet? Does the writer not know that the Peeles were cotton-spinners, & Canning's mother an actress, & Lord Chancellor Eldon's father a humble coal-seller? If these should be supposed out-of-the-way cases, what does the writer think of our present government, in which there are at this moment six members at least of an origin as level with Mr.
Bright's as can well be? These are Mr Gladstone, Mr T. Milner Gibson, the Lord Chancellor, Mr Cardwell, Sir R. Peel (going back to his grandfather), Mr Gutt, & Mr Stanfield.
It is the very characteristic of our polity that it leaves the political career open to desert; & every successive Administration contains a proof that birth has nothing whatever to do with qualification for office. - Neither have sectarian considerations, in Mr Bright's case or any other. If he is <sup>an</sup> Quaker, one member of the present government is a Wesleyan, & another a Unitarian.

Your writer seems to regard oratorical power as a main qualification for office. But it is not so. It is a very great convenience; but by no means a requisite. In point of fact, there are only Lord Palmerston <sup>a</sup> Viscount Cranfield, Mr Gladstone <sup>in</sup> in the government who are remarkable as speakers; & where can a worse be found than Lord Russell?

Is your writer unaware of the censure visited upon Lord Derby for having once publicly said that Mr Bright could never be in the Cabinet? It was considered an unconstitutional declaration, as the administration is constitutionally open to all the citizens. It was not of Mr Bright's birth that Lord Derby was thinking when he said that: but of some better grounds.

The reasons why Mr Bright's political career is a failure, & why he has nothing more to expect, are his disqualifications for statesmanship. Of these the most prominent are his want of political knowledge, & his want of patriotism. His narrowness of mind, his ~~baseless~~ political views, his passionate prejudices, & his habit of reckless statement have prevented his gathering any political force, & will always leave him solitary. His really fine oratory has no effect whatever in counterbalancing such disqualifications; & it is anything but a matter of regret that it has not.

When your countrymen speak of "the governing classes" of England, it usually comes out that they are thinking of the aristocracy by birth: but this is a serious mistake.

It is true that in this country a man cannot step into office unprepared & unprovided. It is requisite that a statesman should have a mind cultivated, & a life devoted to the most arduous of human pursuits. In short, statesmanlike qualities are here requisite to statesmanship: but there is no distinction between men who prove themselves fit.
A man born in a garret has as much right to the premiership as one born in a mansion; whereas, on the other hand, a seat in the Cabinet has been offered to Mr.
Cobden, & never will be offered to Mr. Bright, (Starting as they did from the same point, & in the same track) simply because the one is qualified for the function of governing, & the other not. I hope this matter is clear to you, my dear friend, & that you will make it clear to others. I hope this, because it is the gravest posse disadvantage here to every good American cause when such essential misapprehensions as the above can be pointed to for censure, ridicule or mere surprise."

I am with cordial wishes, & good hopes for your special cause, your old friend A. Martineau.
