

LIFE OF Sir Walter Scott

BY
J. G. LOCKHART

With Prefatory Letter

BY
J. R. HOPE SCOTT

ILLUSTRATED

NEW YORK
Thomas M. Crowell & Co.
PUBLISHERS

WALTER SCOTT. (1808)
Painted by Sir H. Raeburn.

My dear Grandstone,

Although our friendship has endured for many years and has survived great changes, it is not on account of my affection for you that I have desired to connect these lines with your name. It is because from you, more than from any one else to whom alive, I have received assurances of that strong and deep admiration of Wallace Scott, both as an author and as a man, which I have long felt myself, and which I heartily agree with you in wishing to extend and to perpetuate. On my part, such a desire might on other grounds be natural; on yours, it can only spring from the conviction which I know you entertain, that both the writings and the personal history of that extraordinary man, while affording entertainment of the purest kind, and supplying stores of information which can nowhere else be so pleasantly acquired, bear in them a great deal which no student of human nature ought to neglect, and which also which those who engage in the struggle of life with high purposes — men who are prepared to work earnestly, and to endure noble — cannot part with without loss.

This, then, is my object in addressing you. I wish, after the manner of my profession, to call the best witness I can find, and by the weight alike of your authority and of your example to revive and strengthen a taste which, to the no small discredit of a generation, and that not the least educated, of our modern society, appears to stand encouragement.

It was in the autumn of 1868, when you were on the eve of a great enterprise, and with care and labour enough on your hands to weigh down a spirit which possessed less of Scott's own energy, that you wrote to me:

"With great delight, and under fascination, I have been recalling (in mind) much ground familiar to you, and have been upon a number

It was at that time too that you concluded a letter on the absorbing topics of the day, by saying:—

“I wish I had time to write about the ‘Life of Scott.’ I may be wrong, but I am vaguely under the impression that it has never had a really wide circulation.¹ If so, it is the saddest pity: and I should greatly like (without any censure on its present length) to see published an abbreviation of it.”

To the suggestion made in the last extract, I paid, as I was bound to do, immediate attention; but, misled, not by your intimation, but by some from other quarters, I began by supposing that what the public needed was a wholly new work; and being unable to attempt this myself, and, at the same time, being jealous of intrusting it to less reverent, even though more skillful, hands, I found it difficult to proceed.

One eminent man, to whom I proposed the work contained all the qualifications which I could desire, but his own pursuits prevented him from undertaking it; and, after his refusal, the prospect of a new Life, such as alone I could have wished to see published, became gradually more uncertain.

But while thus engaged, I learnt, with great surprise, how little Lockhart's own abridgment of the larger Life, published in 1848, and here reprinted, was known, even among professed admirers of Scott. The charms of the original work appear to have hindered its progress from the first, and to have justified Lockhart's unwillingness to undertake it.² I found that it was unknown to you, and that the able writer of an article which appeared in the Quarterly Review of January 1868, seemed also to have been ignorant of it, for he refers to the “veil of mystery” which Lockhart had thrown over the story of Scott's first and unsuccessful love, and which, while denying its necessity, he declines to withdraw; yet in this abridgment the names of the lady and of her eventual husband are both fully given (p. 49).

This circumstance, and a further consideration of the subject, led me to abandon altogether the idea of a new Life. Lockhart had a personal familiarity with his subject, and the command of a mass of materials such as cannot fall to the share of any other writer; and therefore, even if his mode of dealing with his subject were less admirable than it confessedly is, his larger work would, of necessity, form the foundation of any fresh attempt. But when we examine work, and observe the skill of its construction, its wisdom, and the glow of feeling which pervades it, the same is inevitable that any effort, worthy of the name, must take the form of a review or of an abridgment of the great work of itself.

¹ Between 1887 and 1886 there were sold, of all the editions, 23,900 copies. Between 1856 and 1871, only 1900.

² See the preface to this volume.

As regards a review, the Quarterly has not, in a few years, and, in the article above mentioned, nearly as many as it could, and, for a good abridgment, conditions are very favorable to any one but the author himself, as properly put.

Work of art in writing is subject to the same laws as sculpture or in architecture. Those who seek to represent form, must, above all things, study its proportions, and its construction equal over all its parts. But in the case of a review there are no mechanical appliances, as there are in painting or architecture, for varying the scale, and there is no other difficulty in catching the leading principle of the design, and establishing the starting point for the process which is to follow. An abridgment by the author himself would be, indeed, the only true abridgment of what he does, and of his work; and I deem it a very fortunate thing that such a one overcame Lockhart's repugnance to the task.

It is, then, are my reasons for proposing to the public, as the all the easier means of studying the life of the author, the only one that reprint to which this letter is prefixed. Not so it will be in my mind, that it is the work of one who judged it desirable, not rather to extend; for, though many of those for whom I wrote have passed, or are passing, from the scene and thereby private interest which attended Scott's manifold relations with every class of his contemporaries must by degrees decrease, still the reason why Scott's personal history should not be too generalised, and an abstract notion be substituted for the real of Keble, himself a true admirer of Scott, seeks to redeem our minds by telling them that simple means for attaining to Christian perfection, he found in life which it is most difficult to observe, whether in the pursuit of holiness or in the exercise of natural gifts. His knowledge of man, what was remarkable was the sustained and continuous force of his character. It is to be traced in the smallest things as well as in the greatest, in his daily habits as much as in his public actions, in his fancies and follies as well as in his best and worst doings. Everywhere we find the same power of imagination, and the same energy of will; and though it has been said that "no man is a hero to his valet de chambre," I am satisfied that Scott's most familiar attendant never doubted his greatness, or looked upon him with less respect than those who judged him as he stood forth amidst the homage of the world.

"The trivial round, the common task"

In dealing with such a character, it is hardly necessary to say that the omission of details becomes, after a certain point, a serious injury to the truth of the whole portrait; and if any man should object that this volume is not short enough, I should be tempted to answer, that if he reads by foot-rule, he had better not think of studying, in any shape, the life of Walter Scott.

But besides the reduction of bulk, by which eighty-four chapters have been compressed into eighteen, this edition has other claims upon attention. The larger Life, which was first published in seven volumes in 1837-8, was succeeded by one in ten volumes in 1839, and by another in one volume, with double columns, in 1842; but though both the latter were entered at Stationers' Hall as new editions "with alterations," and did, in fact, each differ, in some respects, from the original edition, and from each other, yet Lockhart did not think the changes worthy of a public notice, and the preface of the edition of 1837-8 was published, unaltered, with the two later editions. But the preface of the abridgment of 1848 intimates changes arising from later information, and the book itself more than bears out this promise. Time and death had been at work in the interval, and to these causes we owe some alterations and additions of interest. One of these I have already mentioned, and I cannot refrain from recommending to special notice the touching memorials of Scott's two sons, Walter and Charles, which occur towards the conclusion of this volume.

Those who read them will see new proofs of that depth and tenderness of feeling which Lockhart, in daily life, so often hid under an almost fierce reserve, and will be able to form some idea—though, after all, it can be but a very faint one—of what he suffered on the death of his surviving son.

They may imagine too how much he was spared by dying before his only daughter—that daughter whose singular likeness to her her must have continually recalled to him both the features and character of her of whom he wrote.

She whom I may now sadly record as, next to Sir Walter himself, chief ornament and delight at all these simple meetings—she to me I owed my own place in them—Scott's eldest daughter, the only one of all his children who, in countenance, mind, and manners, most resembled himself, and who indeed was as like him in all things as a benevolent woman can ever be to a great man deeply tried and engaged in the struggles and perplexities of active life—she too is no more.

As regards the preparation of this reprint, I have not been able to do what I had proposed. It was my intention to have revised the text, and to have added notes, but, as the time which I had destined for this work drew near, it pleased God suddenly to stay my hand, and so to occupy my thoughts that even this easy task became impossible to me. With the exception, therefore, of the change of form from two volumes to one, and of the addition² of a short and melancholy notice, which it seemed impossible to withhold, this narrative is set forth as Lockhart left it; and since I am sure that I could not have added to its substantial interest without unduly increasing its length, I feel but little regret that my intention failed.

And now, my dear Gladstone, I've eulogued. You have already occupied a noble place in the history of your country, and, though there is one great subject on which we differ, I am able heartily to desire that your future career may be as distinguished as your past. But as it is only too certain that the highest honours of statesmanship can neither be won nor held without exertions which are full of peril to those who make them, I will add the further wish, that you may long retain, as safeguards to your health, your happiness, and your usefulness, that fresh and versatile spirit, and that strong sense of duty, the true and the beautiful, which have caused you to be addressed on this occasion by

Your affectionate friend,

JAMES R. HOPE SCOTT.

RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE,

&c. &c.

¹ See Chapter IV. of the large biography. Who but Lockhart himself would have dared insert this passage in the monumental records of the (now) times which occur at p. 220 in abridgment?

² See the footnote to page 227.

PREFACE

The closing pages of this book will explain the transaction from which it sprang. When in May 1847 the publisher of Sir Walter's Works proposed to take to himself the whole remaining Copyright in them, he stipulated that I should prepare an abridgment of Memoirs of the Author, originally comprised in seven volumes, since reprinted in various forms. If I had been to consult my feelings, I should have been more willing to produce an enlarged edition for the interest of Sir Walter's history, I think, even liberally, in its minute details—especially in the details set down himself in his Letters and Diaries—and, of course, after the lapse of years, more copious use might be made of these materials with offence or indelicacy. Mr. Cadell, however, considered that a book of smaller bulk, embracing only what may be called more strictly narrative, might be acceptable to certain classes of readers—and the manner in which this gentleman had throughout conducted himself towards Sir Walter, his family, and his memory—together with other circumstances on which it is not necessary to say more—overcame my reluctance.

It will be understood that whenever the narrative now given at all differs from that of the larger book, I have been endeavouring to justify it by letters recently communicated.

J. G. LOCKHART.

1850, 4th August 1849

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
CHILDHOOD OF SIR WALTER SCOTT'S EARLY YEARS, WRITTEN BY HIMSELF	1

CHAPTER II.

Entry into the Bar — Early Friendships and Pursuits — Excursions to the Highlands and Border — Light-Horse Volunteers — Dis- appointment in Love — Publication of Ballads after Bürger. 1792-1797	44
--	----

CHAPTER III.

Entry into the English Lakes — Miss Carpenter — Marriage — Lass- wade Cottage — Original Ballads — Monk Lewis — Goetz of Berlichingen — John Leyden — James Hogg — James Ballan- tine — Sheriffship of Wolkirk — Publication of the Minstrelsy of the Border. 1797-1803	75
---	----

CHAPTER IV.

Contributions to the Edinburgh Review — Wordsworth — Hogg — Sir Tristram — Removal to Ashendiel — Mungo Park — Publica- tion of the Lay of the Last Minstrel — Partnership with James Ballantyne — Visit to London — Appointment as Clerk of Ses- sion. 1804-1806	108
---	-----

CHAPTER V.

London — Edition of Dryden, &c. — Morrill — Domestic Life — Quarrel with Constable & Co. — John Ballantyne started as a Publisher — The Quarterly Review begun. 1806-1809	150
---	-----

CHAPTER VI.

London — Theatrical Anecdotes — Byron's Satire — The Lady of the Lake — Excursion to the Hebrides — Vision of Don Roderick — Byron — Davy — Crabbe — Purchase of Abbotsford, 1809-1812	189
--	-----

CHAPTER VII.

Publication of Rokeby and the Bridal of Triermain — Commercial Difficulties — Reconciliation with Constable — Death of Weber — Voyage to the Shetland, Orkney, and Hebridean Islands — Publication of the Life and Works of Swift — and of Waverley, 1812-1814	210
--	-----

CHAPTER VIII.

Publication of the Lord of the Isles and Guy Mannering — Meeting with Byron — Carlton House Dinner — Excursion to Paris — Publication of the Field of Waterloo — Paul's Letters — The Antiquary — Harold the Dauntless — and the first Tales of my Landlord, 1815-1816	240
--	-----

CHAPTER IX.

Serious Illness — Laidlaw settled at Kaeside, and the Fergussons at Huntley Burn — New House begun — Washington Irving — Publication of Rob Roy — and the Heart of Mid-Lothian — Scott in Edinburgh, 1817-1818	282
--	-----

CHAPTER X.

Sketches of Abbotsford — Illness and Domestic Afflictions — The Bride of Lammermoor — The Legend of Montrose — Ivanhoe, 1818-1819	319
---	-----

CHAPTER XI.

Scott's Baronetcy — Portrait by Lawrence and Bust by Chantrey — Presidency of the Royal Society of Edinburgh — Hospitalities and Sports at Abbotsford — Publication of The Monastery — The Abbot — and Kenilworth, 1820	356
---	-----

CHAPTER VII

Death of John Hallantyne and William Frothing (George IV) at Edinburgh. Visits of Mr. Constable and Miss Ferguson. Reminiscences by Mr. Adolphus. Publication of Life of the Novelist. Hallantyne. The Pirate. The Life of George IV. Journal of the Peak. Quentin Durand. and Life of George IV. Well. 1821-1823. 207

CHAPTER VIII

Publication of Biographical Memoirs of the Right Honourable Captain Scott. Constable's Miscellaneous Works. Life of Napoleon begun. Tales of the Grandfather published. Tour in Ireland. Visit to Warrington. Mission at Edinburgh. Memories of Earl among the H-keepers. 1824-1825. 221

CHAPTER IX

Death of the Hon. of Constable and Hallantyne. Death of Emily Scott. Publication of Warrington. Journal of the Grandfather. Paris. Publication of Life of Napoleon. 1825-1827. 237

CHAPTER X

Death of Constable. Correspondence with the Magazine. Life of the Duke of Durham. Publication of the Characters of the Grandfather and Tales of a Grandfather. Religion. Memories of Earl. Journal of Perth. Anne of Geierstein. Illustrations of Geography. Death of Thomas Paine. 1827-1829. 253

CHAPTER XI

Publication of The Ayrshire Tragedy, Letters on the Emancipation, Tales on the History of France, &c. Agri-Physical Dictionary. Retirement from the Court of Rome. Journal of a Tour. and of Additional Bank described. Journal of the Duke begun. Death of George IV. Political Economy. Journal of the Epistle of Malagrowth. Speech on Reform in Edinburgh. 1830-1831. 267

CHAPTER XVII.

Apoplectic Paralysis — Miss Ferrier — Election Scenes at Jedburgh and Selkirk — Castle Dangerous begun — Excursion to Douglasdale — Visits of Captain Burns and Wordsworth — Departure from Abbotsford — London — Voyage in the Barham — Malta — Naples — Rome — Notes by Mrs. Davy, Sir W. Gell, and Mr. E. Cheney — Publication of the last Tales of my Landlord. 1831-1832

CHAPTER XVIII.

Return to England — Seizure at Nimeguen — Jermyn Street, London — Edinburgh — Abbotsford — Death and Funeral of Scott in September 1832 — His Character — Monuments to his Memory — Pictures, Busts, and Statues

INDIX

ILLUSTRATIONS

of Sir Walter Scott	100
Scott, surnamed "Beardie," Great-grandfather of Sir Walter Scott	100
er Scott	101
Scott, Writer to the Signet, Father of Sir Walter Scott	101
therford, Mother of Sir Walter Scott	102
Scott at the Age of Six	103
H	104
Scott, 1808. Painted by Sir H. Raeburn	104
rine. From a photograph	106
Abney. From a photograph	210
Lockhart, Eldest Daughter of Sir Walter Scott	350
r Scott. From the Marble Bust by Sir F. Chantrel	350
Library at Abbotsford	364
d. From a photograph	434
l, Second Daughter of Sir Walter Scott	492
Abney, from the East	493
. From a photograph	510
ry. From a photograph	510
Abney and Scott's Tomb. From a photograph	520

LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT

CHAPTER I

MEMOIR OF HIS EARLY YEARS, FROM HIS BIRTH TO HIS DEPARTURE

Edinburgh, August 21st, 1771.

My present age has demonstrated a desire to read for a page, literary anecdotes and private history, that may be useful to others, and which I have engaged to a country lawyer, the friend of the public, to translate into English. I have a share of gratitude to the printer, who has printed this book, and as I am to our friends that he should be so well satisfied with my hopes, but my parents, and some others, I can not have permitted, without any circumstances, to give me, as the permission of translating a few lines, and to translate, do not merit the name of a friend, and a friend of my life. That, should you, before you publish this, as my usual custom, the printer may be so well satisfied with my work, that they are entitled to know of an individual who has thought to their amusement.

On the lines of some parts a most beautiful account, however doubtless be desired, and few persons can be said with much profit as the Memoirs of James O'Connell, or of Mr. W. Were I conscious of anything peculiar in my own character which would render such a description necessary or useful, I would be ready to consent to it, as I would with my body to discontinue, if the opportunity should favor me out the subject and the manner of writing, and I would be glad to see the history of thinking and writing, as well as such in society, were they long before I had attained, or pretended to, any particular reputation, and as I pretended, to not mean to say that my success in literature has been and can be entirely in society much above my birth and original genius, I have been ready to consent to the same, as I have been to a certain measure, knowledge of the world, to which some will when acquired, no remarkable change upon either, it is hardly to be expected that much information can be derived from minutely investigating frailties, follies, or vices, not very different in number or degree from those of other men in my situation. As I have not been blessed with the talents of Burns or Chatterton, I have been happily exempted from the influence of their violent passions, exasperated by the struggle of feelings which rose up against the unjust decrees of fortune. Yet, although I cannot tell of difficulties vanquished, and distance of rank annihilated by the strength of genius, those who shall hereafter read this little Memoir may find in it some hints to be improved, for the regulation of their own minds, or the training those of others.

Every Scottishman has a pedigree. It is a national prerogative, as unalienable as his pride and his poverty. My birth was neither distinguished nor sordid. According to the prejudices of my country, it was esteemed gentle, as I was connected, though remotely, with ancient families both by my father's and mother's side. My father's grandfather was Walter Scott, well known in Teviotdale by the surname of Beardie. He was the second son of Walter Scott, first Laird of Raeburn, who was third son of Sir William Scott, and the grandson of Walter Scott, commonly called in tradition Auld Watt of Harden. I am therefore lineally descended from that ancient chieftain, whose name I have made to ring in many a ditty, and from his fair dame, the Flower of Yarrow — no bad genealogy for a Border minstrel.¹ Beardie, my great-grandfather aforesaid, derived his cognomen from a venerable beard, which he wore unblemished by razor or scissors, in token of his regret for the banished dynasty of Stuart. It would have been well that his zeal had stopped there. But he educated Scotchmen are early trained, that prevents them from being much dazzled by this species of elevation. A man who to good nature adds the general rudiments of good breeding, provided he rest contented with a simple and unaffected manner of behaving and expressing himself, will never be ridiculous in the best society, and, so far as his talents and information permit, may be an agreeable part of the company. I have therefore never felt much elevated, nor did I experience any violent change in situation, by the passport which my poetical character afforded me into higher company than my birth warranted. — 1826.

¹[In whom the male representation of the old Scotts of Buccleuch is now vested, there is great dispute among heraldic writers, — some upholding the claim of Lord Napier, the male heir of the Scotts of Thirl-estane, — others that of Lord Polwarth, head of what was always considered, in point of importance, the second family of the clan, viz., the Scotts of Harden, originally designed Scotts of Sinton. Of his ancestors of this branch, Sir Walter has recorded many anecdotes in the notes to

DR. JOHN W. WALKER, M.D., F.R.S., F.R.C.S., F.R.C.P.
Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Royal College of Surgeons.

took arms, and distinguished in their cause, until he lost all he had in the world, and, as I have heard, not a narrow rank of being changed, had it not been for the interference of Anne, Duchess of Devonshire and Marquis of Newcastle. He and another brother, William Mordaunt of Kent, a great grand uncle, was killed about the year of 1645, in a duel with Richard of Clifton, grand father of the present Mark Throckmole of Clifton. The fight was so wild, as was the fashion of the time, in a field that he took a wound from the catastrophe the River of Mersey.
 He was then sent to Spain, and was being a captive when he was taken by the Barbary. He died by one, of course, Isabel of England, as the old Scottish phrase called him. That is, a daughter of his infant nephew, father of the present Walter Mordaunt of Kent. He also managed the estate of Marktown, though may be related to that family by his mother, Isabel Mordaunt. I suppose he had some allowance for his care in other ways, as he was the person that had the fortune which he carried home to a Miss Ansell of Silvercote, in the west, who was married to some of my father's wood to rich women, as they say in the country side of Hylthorpe. He died was a man of good learning, and a friend of Dr. Hearn, to whom his portrait is probably made him acceptable. They had a boy or two, who lived in Hylthorpe, in which the conversation is said to have been distinguished in Latin.

The History of the Life of the Last Minister, and elsewhere. In 1712, he was elected to the remarkable circumstances of two of his sons, and his death, and his death, both equally distinguished by the city of London, in the year of 1712, and his death in the year of 1712.

It is here observed, and is proved to be so that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 It is here observed, and is proved to be so
 that the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.

That, if the last Minister, and elsewhere, has been with the last Minister, and elsewhere, has been of Hylthorpe, the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.

The death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 The death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 The death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.
 The death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.

He was the last Minister, and elsewhere, has been of Hylthorpe, the death of the last Minister, and elsewhere.

He left three sons. The eldest, Walter, had a family, of which any that now remain have been long settled in America:—the male heirs are long since extinct. The third was William, father of James Scott, well known in India as one of the original settlers of Prince of Wales island. The second, Robert Scott, was my grandfather. He was originally bred to the sea; but, being shipwrecked near Dundee in his trial-voyage, he took such a sincere dislike to that element, that he could not be persuaded to a second attempt. This occasioned a quarrel between him and his father, who left him to shift for himself. Robert was one of those active spirits to whom this was no misfortune. He turned Whig upon the spot, and fairly abjured his father's politics, and his learned poverty. His chief and relative, Mr. Scott of Harden, gave him a lease of the farm of Sandy-Knowe, comprehending the rocks in the centre of which Smailholm or Sandy-Knowe Tower is situated. He took for his shepherd an old man called Hogg, who willingly lent him, out of respect to his family, his whole savings, about £30, to stock the new farm. With this sum, which it seems was at the time sufficient for the purpose, the master and servant set off to purchase a stock of sheep at Whitsun-Tryste, a fair held on a hill near Wooler in Northumberland. The old shepherd went carefully from drove to drove, till he found a hirsell likely to answer their purpose, and then returned to tell his master to come up and conclude the bargain. But what was his surprise to see him galloping a mettled hunter about the race-course, and to find he had expended the whole stock in this extraordinary purchase!—Moses's bargain of green spectacles did not strike more dismay into the Vicar of Wakefield's family, than my grandfather's rashness into the poor old shepherd. The thing, however, was irretrievable, and they returned without the sheep. In the course of a few days, however, my grandfather, who was one of the best horsemen of his time, attended John Scott of Harden's hounds on this same horse, and displayed him to such advantage that he sold him for double the original price. The farm was now stocked in earnest; and the rest of my grandfather's career was that of successful industry. He was one of the first who were active in the cattle trade, afterwards carried to such extent between the Highlands of Scotland and the leading counties in England, and by his droving transactions acquired a considerable sum of money. He was a man of middle stature, extremely active, quick, keen, and fiery in his temper, stubbornly honest, and so distinguished for his skill in country matters, that he was the general referee in all

W. S. T. B. 1780

W. S. T. B. 1780

ints of dispute which occurred in the neighbourhood. His th being admitted as gentle, gave him access to the best society in the county, and his dexterity in country sports, rticularly hunting, made him an acceptable companion in the ld as well as at the table.¹

Robert Scott of Sandy-Knowe married, in 1728, Barbara Haliburton, daughter of Thomas Haliburton of Newmains, an cient and respectable family in Berwickshire. Among other rimonial possessions, they enjoyed the part of Dryburgh, w the property of the Earl of Buchan, comprehending the ns of the Abbey. My granduncle, Robert Haliburton, having male heirs, this estate, as well as the representation of the mily, would have devolved upon my father, and indeed Old ewmains had settled it upon him; but this was prevented by e misfortunes of my granduncle, a weak silly man, who en-ged in trade, for which he had neither stock nor talents, and ame bankrupt. The ancient patrimony was sold for a trifle out £3000), and my father, who might have purchased it th ease, was dissuaded by my grandfather, who at that time ieved a more advantageous purchase might have been made some lands which Raeburn thought of selling. And thus e have nothing left of Dryburgh, although my father's aternal inheritance, but the right of stretching our bones ere mine may perhaps be laid ere any eye but my own ances over these pages.

Walter Scott, my father, was born in 1729, and educated to e profession of a Writer to the Signet. He was the eldest a large family, several of whom I shall have occasion to ention with a tribute of sincere gratitude. My father was a ngular instance of a man rising to eminence in a profession r which nature had in some degree unfitted him. He had ded a turn for labour, and a pleasure in analysing the struse feudal doctrines connected with conveyancing, which ould probably have rendered him unrivalled in the line of a pecial pleader, had there been such a profession in Scotland;
ut in the actual business of the profession which he embraced, that sharp and intuitive perception which is necessary in iving bargains for himself and others, in availing himself of e wants, necessities, caprices, and follies of some, and guard-g against the knavery and malice of others, Uncle Toby himlf could not have conducted himself with more simplicity than

¹ The present Lord Haddington, and other gentlemen conversant with e south country, remember my grandfather well. He was a fine alert ure, and wore a jockey cap over his grey hair. — 1826.

my father. Most attorneys have been suspected, more or less justly, of making their own fortune at the expense of their clients — my father's fate was to vindicate his calling from the stain in one instance, for in many cases his clients contrived to ease him of considerable sums. Many worshipful and be-knighted names occur to my memory, who did him the honour to run in his debt to the amount of thousands, and to pay him with a lawsuit, or a commission of bankruptcy, as the case happened. But they are gone to a different accounting, and it would be ungenerous to visit their disgrace upon their descendants. My father was wont also to give openings, to those who were pleased to take them, to pick a quarrel with him. He had a zeal for his clients which was almost ludicrous: far from coldly discharging the duties of his employment towards them, he thought for them, felt for their honour as for his own, and rather risked obliging them than neglecting anything to which he conceived their duty bound them. If there was an old mother or aunt to be maintained, he was, I am afraid, too apt to administer to their necessities from what the young heir had destined exclusively to his pleasures. This ready discharge of obligations which the Civilians tell us are only natural and not legal, did not, I fear, recommend him to his employers. Yet his practice was, at one period of his life, very extensive. He understood his business theoretically, and was early introduced to it by a partnership with George Chalmers, Writer to the Signet, under whom he had served his apprenticeship.

His person and face were uncommonly handsome, with an expression of sweetness of temper, which was not fallacious; his manners were rather formal, but full of genuine kindness, especially when exercising the duties of hospitality. His general habits were not only temperate, but severely abstemious; but upon a festival occasion, there were few whom a moderate glass of wine exhilarated to such a lively degree. His religion, in which he was devoutly sincere, was Calvinism of the strictest kind, and his favourite study related to church history. I suspect the good old man was often engaged with Knox and Spottiswoode's folios, when, immured in his solitary room, he was supposed to be immersed in professional researches. In his political principles he was a steady friend to freedom, with a bias, however, to the monarchical part of our constitution, which he considered as peculiarly exposed to danger during the later years of his life. He had much of ancient Scottish prejudice respecting the forms of marriages, funerals, christenings, and so forth, and was always vexed at any neglect of

ANNE RUTHERFORD.
Mother of Sir Walter Scott.

etiquette upon such occasions. As his education had not been upon an enlarged plan, it could not be expected that he should be an enlightened scholar, but he had not passed through a busy life without observation; and his remarks upon times and manners often exhibited strong traits of practical though untaught philosophy. Let me conclude this sketch, which I am unconscious of having overcharged, with a few lines written by the late Mrs. Cockburn¹ upon the subject. They made one among a set of poetical characters which were given as toasts among a few friends, and we must hold them to contain a striking likeness, since the original was recognised so soon as they were read aloud:—

“ To a thing that’s uncommon — a youth of discretion,
 Who, though vastly handsome, despises flirtation :
 To the friend in affliction, the heart of affection,
 Who may hear the last trump without dread of detection.”

In April 1758, my father married Anne Rutherford, eldest daughter of Dr. John Rutherford, professor of medicine in the University of Edinburgh. He was one of those pupils of Boerhaave, to whom the school of medicine in our northern metropolis owes its rise, and a man distinguished for professional talent, for lively wit, and for literary acquirements. Dr. Rutherford was twice married. His first wife, of whom my mother is the sole surviving child, was a daughter of Sir John Swinton of Swinton, a family which produced many distinguished warriors during the middle ages, and which, for antiquity and honourable alliances, may rank with any in Britain. My grandfather’s second wife was Miss Mackay, by whom he had a second family, of whom are now (1808) alive, Dr. Daniel Rutherford, professor of botany in the University of Edinburgh, and Misses Janet and Christian Rutherford, amiable and accomplished women.

My father and mother had a very numerous family, no fewer, I believe, than twelve children, of whom many were highly promising, though only five survived very early youth. My eldest brother Robert was bred in the King’s service, and was in most of Rodney’s battles. His temper was bold and haughty, and to me was often checkered with what I felt to be capricious tyranny. In other respects I loved him much, for he had a strong turn for literature, read poetry with taste and judgment, and composed verses himself, which had gained him great applause among his messmates. Witness the following elegy upon the supposed loss of the vessel, composed the night before Rodney's celebrated battle of April the 12th, 1782. It alludes to the various amusements of his mess: —

¹ Mrs. Cockburn (born Miss Rutherford of Fairnalie) was the authoress of the beautiful song —

“ I have seen the smiling Of fortune beguiling.”

“ No more the geese shall cackle on the poop,
 No more the bagpipe through the orlop sound,
 No more the midshipmen, a jovial group,
 Shall toast the girls, and push the bottle round.
 In death's dark road at anchor fast they stay,
 Till Heaven's loud signal shall in thunder roar;
 Then starting up, all hands shall quick obey,
 Sheet home the topsail, and with speed unmoor.”

Robert sung agreeably — (a virtue which was never seen in me) — understood the mechanical arts, and when in good humour, could regale us with many a tale of bold adventure and narrow escapes. When in bad humour, however, he gave us a practical taste of what was then man-of-war's discipline, and kicked and cuffed without mercy. I have often thought how he might have distinguished himself had he continued in the navy until the present times, so glorious for nautical exploit. But the peace of 1783 cut off all hopes of promotion for those who had not great interest; and some disgust which his proud spirit had taken at harsh usage from a superior officer, combined to throw poor Robert into the East India Company's service, for which his habits were ill adapted. He made two voyages to the East, and died a victim to the climate.

John Scott, my second brother, is about three years older than me. He addicted himself to the military service, and is now brevet-major in the 73d regiment.¹

I had an only sister, Anne Scott, who seemed to be from her cradle the butt for mischance to shoot arrows at. Her childhood was marked by perilous escapes from the most extraordinary accidents. Among others, I remember an iron-railed door leading into the area in the centre of George's Square being closed by the wind, while her fingers were betwixt the hasp and staple. Her hand was thus locked in, and must have been smashed to pieces, had not the bones of her fingers been remarkably slight and thin. As it was, the hand was cruelly mangled. On another occasion, she was nearly drowned in a pond, or old quarry-hole, in what was then called Brown's Park, on the south side of the square. But the most unfortunate accident, and which, though it happened while she was only six years old, proved the remote cause of her death, was her cap accidentally taking fire. The child was alone in the room, and before assistance could be obtained, her head was dreadfully scorched. After a lingering and dangerous illness, she recovered — but never to enjoy perfect health. The slightest cold occasioned swellings in her face, and other indications of a delicate constitution. At length [in 1801], poor Anne was taken ill, and died after a very short interval. Her temper, like that of her brothers, was peculiar, and in her, perhaps, it shewed more odd, from the habits of indulgence which her nervous illness had formed. But she was at heart an affectionate and kind girl, neither void of talent nor of feeling, though living in an ideal world which she had framed to herself by the force of imagination. Anne was my junior by about a year.

¹ He was this year made major of the second battalion by the kind intercession of Mr. Canning at the War-Office — 1809. He retired from the army, and kept house with my mother. His health was totally broken, and he died, yet a young man, on 8th May 1816. — 1826.

A year lower in the list was my brother Thomas Scott, who is still alive.¹

Last, and most unfortunate of our family, was my youngest brother, Daniel. With the same aversion to labour, or rather, I should say, the same determined indolence that marked us all, he had neither the vivacity of intellect which supplies the want of diligence, nor the pride which renders the most detested labour better than dependence or contempt. His career was as unfortunate as might be augured from such an unhappy combination; and, after various unsuccessful attempts to establish himself in life, he died on his return from the West Indies, in July 1806.

Having premised so much of my family, I return to my own story. I was born, as I believe, on the 15th August

¹ Poor Tom, a man of infinite humour and excellent parts, pursued for some time my father's profession; but he was unfortunate, from engaging in speculations respecting farms and matters out of the line of his proper business. He afterwards became paymaster of the 70th regiment, and died in Canada. Tom married Elizabeth, a daughter of the family of M'Culloch of Ardwell, an ancient Galwegian stock, by whom he left a son, Walter Scott, now second lieutenant of Engineers in the East India Company's service, Bombay — and three daughters, Jessie, married to Lieutenant-Colonel Huxley; 2, Anne; 3, Eliza — the two last still unmarried. — 1826.

ly desirous to return to Edinburgh, and to my mother's point of her remaining where she was, her constant hatred at just me, as the cause of her being driven to my knowledge. This rose, I suppose, to a sort of obstinacy in, for she refused to quit Vernon Williams, the house, that she had carried me up to the country, and, with a strong temptation of the Devil, to cut me out with a scissor, and bury me in the night. As she was the guardian of my person, and took care that no one should not be subject to any farther temptations, she was concerned. She was dismissed, of course, and I have become afterwards a lunatic.

The epistle prefixed to the 9th canto of Macmillan, contains a description of the infant poet's feelings amidst the masonry and associations of the Tower and Sandy Knowe.

"It was a barren scene and wild Where no soul e'er dwelt, nor e'er had child." &c. &c.

are still, 1839. Living in that night, with a little more than the domestic service of Sandy Knowe, when the name of it was father in the third year of his age. One of them, John Dwyer, sets his coming well, and that "he was a sweet tempered fellow, going with all about the house." He was very good natured, and used to carry him about on their backs and to the stage, and to be strong leg (quick) at the uptake, and soon learn to read and write, and mark as well as any of them." His great pleasure in me was society of the "aged hind" recorded in the epistle of "Sandy Knowe," called, from the most dignified part of his dress, the "bow-belle," who had the chief superintendance of the flock we used upon "the velvet tufts of hoar-frost green." If the child saw in morning, he could not be satisfied unless the old man would stride on his shoulder, and take him to keep him company as he hit his charge.

"Here was gentle impulse given By the green hill and the blue heaven."

bow-belle blew a particular note on his whistle, which sets feet to servants in the house below when the little boy wanted to be gone again. He told his friend, Mr. Whose of Hutches's when a summer day in his old age among these well remembered that he delighted to roll about on the grass and lay down by the flock, and that "the sort of fellowship he then formed with and lambs had impressed his mind with a degree of affectionate towards them which had lasted throughout life." There is a his having been forgotten one day among the bow-belle when a storm came on; and his aunt, suddenly recollecting his situation, sing out to bring him home, is said to have found him lying on clapping his hands at the lightning, and crying out, "Stanny" at every flash. Et.]

It is here at Sandy-Knowe, in the residence of my paternal grandfather, already mentioned, that I have the first consciousness of existence; and I recollect distinctly that my situation and appearance were a little whimsical. Among the odd remedies required to aid my lameness, some one had recommended, that so often as a sheep was killed for the use of the family, I should be stripped, and swathed up in the skin, warm as it was flayed from the carcase of the animal. In this Tar-tar-like habiliment I well remember lying upon the floor of the little parlour in the farm-house, while my grandfather, a venerable old man with white hair, used every excitement to make me try to crawl. I also distinctly remember the late Sir George MacDougal of Mackerstoun, father of the present Sir Henry Hay MacDougal, joining in this kindly attempt. He was, (God knows how,) a relation of ours, and I still recollect him in his old-fashioned military habit (he had been colonel of the Greys), with a small cocked hat, deeply laced, an embroidered scarlet waistcoat, and a light-coloured coat, with milk-white locks tied in a military fashion, kneeling on the ground before me, and dragging his watch along the carpet to induce me to follow it. The benevolent old soldier and the infant wrapped in his sheepskin would have afforded an odd group to uninterested spectators. This must have happened about my third year, for Sir George MacDougal and my grandfather both died shortly after that period.

My grandmother continued for some years to take charge of the farm, assisted by my father's second brother, Mr. Thomas Scott, who resided at Crailing, as factor or land steward for Mr. Scott of Damesfield, then proprietor of that estate.⁷ This was during the heat of the American war, and I remember being as anxious on my uncle's weekly visits (for we heard news at no other time) to hear of the defeat of Washington,

¹ He was a second-cousin of my grandfather's. Isabel MacDougal, wife of Walter, the first Laird of Raeburn, and mother of Walter Scott, called Beardslee, was grandaunt, I take it, to the late Sir George MacDougal. There was always great friendship between us and the Mackerstoun family. It singularly happened, that at the burial of the late Sir Henry MacDougal, my cousin William Scott, younger of Raeburn, and I myself, were the nearest blood-relations present, although our connexion was of so old a date, and ranked as pall-bearers accordingly. . . 1826.

² My uncle afterwards resided at Elliston, and then took from Mr. Cornelius Elliot the estate of Woollee. Finally he retired to Monklaw, in the neighbourhood of Jedburgh, where he died, 1823, at the advanced age of ninety years, and in full possession of his faculties. It was a fine thing to hear him talk over the change of the country which he had witnessed. — 1826.

I had had some deep and personal cause of antipathy to I know not how this was combined with a very strong prejudice in favour of the Stuart family, which I had originally derived from the songs and tales of the Jacobites. This political propensity was deeply confirmed by the stories in my hearing of the cruelties exercised in the executions at Carlisle, and in the Highlands, after the battle of Culloden. Two or two of our own distant relations had fallen on that occasion, and I remember of detesting the name of Cumberland with more than infant hatred. Mr. Curle, farmer at Cullin, husband of one of my aunts, had been present at their execution; and it was probably from him that I first heard the tragic tales which made so great an impression on me. From local information, which I conceive had some share in forming my future taste and pursuits, I derived from the old songs and tales which then formed the amusement of a retired country family. My grandmother, in whose youth the old stories of depredations were matter of recent tradition, used to tell me many a tale of Watt of Harden, Wight Willie of Aikland, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead, and other heroes — heroes who were all of the persuasion and calling of Robin Hood and Little John. A more recent hero, but not of less note, was the celebrated Diel of Littledean, whom she well remembered, as he had married her mother's sister. Of this extraordinary person I learned many a story, grave and gay, comic and warlike. Two or three old books which lay in the parlour were explored for my amusement in the tedious days of my childhood. Automathes, and Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany, were my favourites, although at a later period an odd volume of Josephus's Wars of the Jews divided my partiality.

A kind and affectionate aunt, Miss Janet Scott, whose memory will ever be dear to me, used to read these works to me with admirable patience, until I could repeat long passages by heart. The ballad of Hardyknute I was early master of, to the great annoyance of almost our only visitor, the worthy parson of the parish, Dr. Duncan, who had not patience to have a sober chat interrupted by my shouting forth this ballad.

It methinks I now see his tall thin emaciated figure, his hands clasped in gambadoes, and his face of a length that might have rivalled the Knight of La Mancha's, and hear him exclaim, "One may as well speak in the mouth of a cannon as in that child's." With this little acidity, which was natural to him, he was a most excellent and benevolent man, a gentleman in every feeling, and altogether different from those of his order who cringe at the tables of the gentry, or domineer and riot at those of the yeomanry. In his youth he had been chaplain in the family of Lord Marchmont. I had seen Pope — and could talk familiarly of many characters who had survived the Augustan age of Queen Anne. Though valetudinary, he lived to be nearly ninety, and to welcome to Scotland his son, Colonel William Duncan, who, with the highest character for military and civil merit, had made a considerable fortune in India. In [1795], a few days before his death, I paid him a visit, to inquire after his health. I found him emaciated to the last degree, wrapped in a tartan night gown, and employed with all the activity of health and youth in correcting a history of the Revolution, which he intended should be given to the public when he was no more. He read me several passages with a voice naturally strong, and which the feelings of an author then raised above the depression of age and declining health. I begged him to spare this fatigue, which could not but injure his health. His answer was remarkable. "I know," he said, "that I cannot survive a fortnight — and what signifies an exertion that can at worst only accelerate my death a few days?" I marvelled at the composure of this reply, for his appearance sufficiently vouched the truth of his prophecy, and rode home to my uncle's (then my abode), musing what there could be in the spirit of authorship that could inspire its votaries with the courage of martyrs. He died within less than the period he assigned — with which event I close my digression.

I was in my fourth year when my father was advised that the Bath waters might be of some advantage to my lameness. My affectionate aunt, although such a journey promised to a person of her retired habits anything but pleasure or amusement, undertook as readily to accompany me to the wells of Bladud, as if she had expected all the delight that ever the prospect of a watering-place held out to its most impatient visitants. My health was by this time a good deal confirmed by the country air, and the influence of that imperceptible and unfatiguing exercise to which the good sense of my grandfather had subjected me; for when the day was fine, I was usually carried out and laid down beside the old shepherd, among the crags or rocks round which he fed his sheep. The impatience of a child soon inclined me to struggle with my infirmity, and I began by degrees to stand, to walk, and to run. Although the limb affected was much shrunk and contracted, my general health, which was of more importance, was much strengthened by being frequently in the open air; and, in a word, I who in a city had probably been condemned to hopeless and helpless decrepitude, was now a healthy, high-spirited, and, my lameness apart, a sturdy child — non sine diis animosus infans.

We went to London by sea, and it may gratify the curiosity of minute biographers to learn that our voyage was performed on the Duchess of Buccleuch, Captain Beatson, master. At London we made a short stay, and saw some of the common shows exhibited to strangers. When, twenty-five years afterwards, I visited the Tower of London and Westminster Abbey, I was astonished to find how accurate my recollections of these celebrated places of visitation proved to be, and I have ever since trusted more implicitly to my juvenile reminiscences. At Bath, where I lived about a year, I went through all the usual discipline of the pump-room and baths, but I believe without the least advantage to my lameness. During my residence at Bath, I acquired the rudiments of reading at a day-school, kept by an old dame near our lodgings, and I had never a more regular teacher, although I think I did not attend her a quarter of a year. An occasional lesson from my aunt supplied the rest. Afterwards, when grown a big boy, I had a few lessons from Mr. Stalker of Edinburgh, and finally from the Rev. Mr. Cleeve. But I never acquired a just pronunciation, nor could I read with much propriety.

In other respects my residence at Bath is marked by very pleasing recollections. The venerable John Home, author of Douglas, was then at the watering-place, and paid much attention to my aunt and to me. His wife, who has survived him, was then an invalid, and used to take the air in her carriage on the Downs, when I was often invited to accompany her. But the most delightful recollections of Bath are dated after the arrival of my uncle, Captain Robert Scott, who introduced me to all the little amusements which suited my age, and above all, to the theatre. The play was As You Like It; and the itchery of the whole scene is alive in my mind at this moment. I made, I believe, noise more than enough, and remember being so much scandalised at the quarrel between Orlando and his brother in the first scene, that I screamed out, "A'n't they brothers?"¹ A few weeks' residence at home convinced me, who had till then been an only child in the house of my grandfather, that a quarrel between brothers was a very natural event.

¹ [See Scott's Review of the Life of John Kemble, Miscell. Prose, vol. xx, p. 154. — Ed.]

The other circumstances I recollect of my residence in Bath are but trifling, yet I never recall them without a feeling of pleasure. The beauties of the parade (which of them I know not), with the river of Avon winding around it, and the lowing of the cattle from the opposite hills, are warm in my recollection, and are only rivalled by the splendours of a toy shop somewhere near the Orange Grove. I had acquired, I know not by what means, a kind of superstitious terror for statuary of all kinds. No ancient Iconoclast or modern Calvinist could have looked on the outside of the Abbey church (if I mistake not, the principal church at Bath is so called) with more horror than the image of Jacob's Ladder, with all its angels, presented to my infant eye. My uncle effectually combated my terrors, and formally introduced me to a statue of Neptune, which perhaps still keeps guard at the side of the Avon, where a pleasure boat crosses to Spring Gardens.

After being a year at Bath, I returned first to Edinburgh, and afterwards for a season to Sandy-Knowe; -- and thus the time whiled away till about my eighth year, when it was thought sea-bathing might be of service to my lameness.

For this purpose, still under my aunt's protection, I remained some weeks at Prestonpans; a circumstance not worth mentioning, excepting to record my juvenile intimacy with an old military veteran, Dalgetty by name, who had pitched his tent in that little village, after all his campaigns, subsisting upon an ensign's half-pay, though called by courtesy a Captain. As this old gentleman, who had been in all the German wars, found very few to listen to his tales of military feats, he formed a sort of alliance with me, and I used invariably to attend him for the pleasure of hearing those communications. Sometimes our conversation turned on the American war, which was then raging. It was about the time of Burgoyne's unfortunate expedition, to which my Captain and I augured different conclusions. Somebody had showed me a map of North America, and, struck with the rugged appearance of the country, and the quantity of lakes, I expressed some doubts on the subject of the General's arriving safely at the end of his journey, which were very indignantly refuted by the Captain. The news of the Saratoga disaster, while it gave me a little triumph, rather shook my intimacy with the veteran.¹

¹ Besides this veteran, I found another ally at Prestonpans, in the person of George Constable, an old friend of my father's, educated to the law, but retired upon his independent property, and generally residing near Dundee. He had many of those peculiarities of temper which

From Prestonpans I was transported back to my father's house in George's Square,¹ which continued to be my most established place of residence, until my marriage in 1797. I felt the change

long afterwards I tried to develop in the character of Jonathan Oldbuck. It is very odd, that though I am unconscious of anything in which I strictly copied the manners of my old friend, the resemblance was nevertheless detected by George Chalmers, Esq., solicitor, London, an old friend, both of my father and Mr. Constable, and who affirmed to my late friend, Lord Kinnedder, that I must needs be the author of The Antiquary, since he recognised the portrait of George Constable. But my friend George was not so decided an enemy to womankind as his representative Monkbarons. On the contrary, I rather suspect that he had a tendresse for my aunt Jenny, who even then was a most beautiful woman, though somewhat advanced in life. To the close of her life, she had the finest eyes and teeth I ever saw, and though she could be sufficiently sharp when she had a mind, her general behaviour was genteel and ladylike. However this might be, I derived a great deal of curious information from George Constable, both at this early period, and afterwards. He was constantly philandering about my aunt, and of course very kind to me. He was the first person who told me about Falstaff and Hotspur, and other characters in Shakspeare. What idea I annexed to them I know not, but I must have annexed some, for I remember quite well being interested on the subject. Indeed, I rather suspect that children derive impulses of a powerful and important kind in hearing things which they cannot entirely comprehend; and therefore, that to write down to children's understanding is a mistake: set them on the scent, and let them puzzle it out. To return to George Constable: I knew him well at a much later period. He used always to dine at my father's house of a Sunday, and was authorised to turn the conversation out of the austere and Calvinistic tone, which it usually maintained on that day, upon subjects of history or auld langsyne. He remembered the forty-five, and told many excellent stories, all with a strong dash of a peculiar caustic humour.

George's sworn ally as a brother antiquary was John Davidson, then keeper of the Signet; and I remember his flattering and compelling me to go to dine there. A writer's apprentice with the Keeper of the Signet, whose least officer kept us in order!—It was an awful event. Thither, however, I went with some secret expectation of a scantling of good claret. Mr. D. had a son whose taste inclined him to the army, to which his father, who had designed him for the bar, gave a most unwilling consent. He was at this time a young officer, and he and I, leaving the two seniors to proceed in their chat as they pleased, never once opened our mouths either to them or each other. The Pragmatic Sanction happened unfortunately to become the theme of their conversation, when Constable said in jest, "Now, John, I'll wad you a plack that neither of these two lads ever heard of the Pragmatic Sanction."—"Not heard of the Pragmatic Sanction!" said John Davidson; "I would like to see that;" and with a voice of thunder, he asked his son the fatal question. As young D. modestly allowed he knew nothing about it, his father drove him from the table in a rage, and I absconded during the confusion; nor could Constable ever bring me back again to his friend Davidson's.—1826.

¹ [No. 25.]

from being a single indulged brat, to becoming a member of a large family, very severely; for under the gentle government of my kind grandmother, who was meekness itself, and of my aunt, who, though of an higher temper, was exceedingly attached to me, I had acquired a degree of licence which could not be permitted in a large family. I had sense enough, however, to bend my temper to my new circumstances; but such was the agony which I internally experienced, that I have guarded against nothing more in the education of my own family, than against their acquiring habits of self-willed caprice and domination. I found much consolation during this period of mortification, in the partiality of my mother. She joined to a light and happy temper of mind a strong turn to study poetry and works of imagination. She was sincerely devout, but her religion was, as became her sex, of a cast less austere than my father's. Still, the discipline of the Presbyterian Sabbath was severely strict, and I think injudiciously so. Although Bunyan's Pilgrim, Gesner's Death of Abel, Rowe's Letters, and one or two other books, which, for that reason, I still have a favour for, were admitted to relieve the gloom of one dull sermon succeeding to another — there was far too much tedium annexed to the duties of the day; and in the end it did none of us any good.

My week-day tasks were more agreeable. My lameness and my solitary habits had made me a tolerable reader, and my hours of leisure were usually spent in reading aloud to my mother Pope's translation of Homer, which, excepting a few traditionary ballads, and the songs in Allan Ramsay's Evergreen, was the first poetry which I perused. My mother had good natural taste and great feeling: she used to make me pause upon those passages which expressed generous and worthy sentiments, and if she could not divert me from those which were descriptive of battle and tumult, she contrived at least to divide my attention between them. My own enthusiasm, however, was chiefly awakened by the wonderful and the terrible — the common taste of children, but in which I have remained a child even unto this day. I got by heart, not as a task, but almost without intending it, the passages with which I was most pleased, and used to recite them aloud, both when alone and to others — more willingly, however, in my hours of solitude, for I had observed some auditors smile, and I dreaded ridicule at that time of life more than I have ever done since.

In [1778] I was sent to the second class of the Grammar School, or High School of Edinburgh, then taught by Mr. Luke Fraser, a good Latin scholar and a very worthy man. Though received, with my brothers, in private, lessons of Latin from Mr. James French, now a minister of the Kirk of Scotland. I was nevertheless rather behind the class in which I was placed, both in years and in progress. This was a real disadvantage, and one to which a boy of lively temper and talents ought to be as little exposed as one who might be less expected to keep up his lee-way, as it is called. The situation has the unfortunate effect of reconciling a boy of the former character (as in a posthumous work I may claim for my own) to hold a subordinate station among his class-fellows — to which he would otherwise affix disgrace. There is also, from the constitution of the High School, a certain danger not sufficiently attended to. The boys take precedence in their places, as they are seated, according to their merit, and it requires a long while, generally, before even a clever boy, if he falls behind the class, gets out into one for which he is not quite ready, can force his way into the situation which his abilities really entitle him to. But, in the meanwhile, he is necessarily led to be the associate and companion of those inferior spirits with whom he is placed; for the system of precedence, though it does not prevent the general intercourse among the boys, has nevertheless the effect of throwing them into clubs and coteries, according to the vicinity of the seats they hold. A boy of good talents, if he is placed even for a time among his inferiors, especially if he has also his elders, learns to participate in their pursuits and objects of ambition, which are usually very distinct from the objects of acquisition of learning; and it will be well if he does not allow himself to state them in that indifference which is contented with passing over a lesson so as to avoid punishment, without affecting superiority or aiming at reward. It was probably owing to this circumstance, that, although at a more advanced period of life I have enjoyed considerable facility in acquiring languages, I did not make any great figure at the High School — at least, any exertions which I made were desultory and were to be depended on.¹

WALTER SCOTT, 1844. THE MOON.

My class contained some very excellent scholars. The first was James Buchan, who retained his honoured place, without a day's interval, all the while we were at the school. He was afterwards at the head of the medical faculty in Egypt, and in exposing himself to the plague infection, while visiting the hospitals there, displayed the same well-

story of Green-brecks, and other passages in the General Preface to the Verley Novels, afford some curious glimpses of High School life in those days. — Ed.]

regulated and gentle, yet determined perseverance, which placed him most worthily at the head of his school-fellows, while many lads of livelier parts and dispositions held an inferior station. The next best scholars (sed longo intervallo) were my friend David Douglas, the heir and élève of the celebrated Adam Smith, and James Hope, now a Writer to the Signet, both since well known and distinguished in their departments of the law. As for myself, I glanced like a meteor from one end of the class to the other, and commonly disgusted my kind master as much by negligence and frivolity, as I occasionally pleased him by flashes of intellect and talent. Among my companions, my good-nature and a flow of ready imagination rendered me very popular. Boys are uncommonly just in their feelings, and at least equally generous. My lameness, and the efforts which I made to supply that disadvantage, by making up in address what I wanted in activity, engaged the latter principle in my favour; and in the winter play hours, when hard exercise was impossible, my tales used to assemble an admiring audience round Lucky Brown's fireside, and happy was he that could sit next to the inexhaustible narrator. I was also, though often negligent of my own task, always ready to assist my friends; and hence I had a little party of staunch partisans and adherents, stout of hand and heart, though somewhat dull of head—the very tools for raising a hero to eminence. So, on the whole, I made a brighter figure in the yards than in the class.¹

My father did not trust our education solely to our High School lessons. We had a tutor at home [Mr. James Mitchell], a young man of an excellent disposition, and a laborious student. He was bred to the Kirk, but unfortunately took such a very strong turn to fanaticism, that he afterwards resigned an excellent living in a seaport town, merely because he could not persuade the mariners of the guilt of setting sail of a Sabbath,—in which, by the by, he was less likely to be successful, as, cæteris paribus, sailors, from an opinion that it is a fortunate omen, always choose to weigh anchor on that

¹ I read not long since, in that authentic record called the Percy Anecdotes, that I had been educated at Musselburgh school, where I had been distinguished as an absolute dunce; only Dr. Blair, seeing farther into the mill-stone, had pronounced there was fire in it. I never was at Musselburgh school in my life, and though I have met Dr. Blair at my father's and elsewhere, I never had the good fortune to attract his notice, to my knowledge. Lastly, I was never a dunce, nor thought to be so, but an incorrigibly idle imp, who was always longing to do something else than what was enjoined him. — 1826.

ay. The calibre of this young man's understanding may be judged of by this anecdote; but in other respects, he was a faithful and active instructor; and from him chiefly I learned writing and arithmetic. I repeated to him my French lessons, and studied with him my themes in the classics, but not classically. I also acquired, by disputing with him (for this was readily permitted), some knowledge of school-divinity and church-history, and a great acquaintance in particular with the old books describing the early history of the Church of Scotland, the wars and sufferings of the Covenanters, and so forth. I was with a head on fire for chivalry, was a Cavalier; my friend was a Roundhead: I was a Tory, and he was a Whig. I hated Presbyterians, and admired Montrose with his victorious Highlanders; he liked the Presbyterian Ulysses, the dark and polite Argyle: so that we never wanted subjects of dispute; but our disputes were always amicable. In all these tenets there was no real conviction on my part, arising out of acquaintance with the views or principles of either party; nor had my antagonist address enough to turn the debate on such topics. I took up my politics at that period, as King Charles II. did his religion, from an idea that the Cavalier creed was the more gentlemanlike persuasion of the two.

After having been three years under Mr. Fraser, our class was, in the usual routine of the school, turned over to Dr. Adam, the Rector. It was from this respectable man that I first learned the value of the knowledge I had hitherto considered only as a burdensome task. It was the fashion to remain two years at his class, where we read Cæsar, and Livy, and Sallust, in prose; Virgil, Horace, and Terence, in verse. I had by this time mastered, in some degree, the difficulties of the language, and began to be sensible of its beauties. This was really gathering grapes from thistles; nor shall I soon forget the swelling of my little pride when the Rector pronounced, that though many of my school-fellows understood the Latin better, Gualterus Scott was behind few in following and enjoying the author's meaning. Thus encouraged, I distinguished myself by some attempts at poetical versions from Horace and Virgil.¹ Dr. Adam used to invite his scholars

¹ [One of these little pieces, written in a weak boyish scrawl, within the dotted marks still visible, had been carefully preserved by his mother; it was folded up in a cover inscribed by the old lady — "My Walter's first Essay, 1782."

"In awful ruins Ætna thunders nigh,
And sends in pitchy whirlwinds to the sky

to such essays, but never made them tasks. I gained some distinction upon these occasions, and the Rector in future took much notice of me; and his judicious mixture of censure and praise went far to counterbalance my habits of indolence and inattention. I saw I was expected to do well, and I was piqued in honour to vindicate my master's favourable opinion. I climbed, therefore, to the first term; and, though I never made a first-rate Latinist, my school fellow, and what was of more consequence, I myself, considered that I had a character for learning to maintain. Dr. Adam, to whom I owed so much, never failed to remind me of my obligations, when I had made some figure in the literary world. He was, indeed, deeply imbued with that fortunate vanity which alone could induce a man who has arms to pare and burn a man, to submit to the yet more toilsome task of cultivating youth. As Catholics confide in the imputed righteousness of their saints, so did the good old Doctor plume himself upon the success of his scholars in life, all of which he never failed (and often justly) to claim as the creation, or at least the fruits, of his early instructions. He remembered the fate of every boy at his school during the fifty years he had superintended it, and always traced their success or misfortunes entirely to their attention or negligence when under his care. His "noisy mansion," which to others would have been a melancholy bedlam, was the pride of his heart; and the only fatigues he felt, amidst din and tumult, and the necessity of reading themes, hearing lessons, and maintaining some degree of order at the same time, were relieved by comparing himself to Cæsar, who could dictate to three secretaries at once; — so ready is vanity to lighten the labours of duty.

It is a pity that a man so learned, so admirably adapted for his station, so useful, so simple, so easily contented, should have had other subjects of mortification. But the magistrates of Edinburgh, not knowing the treasure they possessed in Dr. Adam, encouraged a savage fellow, called Nicol, one of the underminers, in insulting his person and authority. This man was an excellent classical scholar, and an admirable con-

Black clouds of smoke, which, still as they aspire,
From their dark sides there burst the glowing fire;
At other times huge balls of fire are toss'd,
That lick the stars, and in the smoke are lost;
Sometimes the mount, with vast convulsive torn,
Emits huge rocks, which instantly are borne
With loud explosions to the starry skies,
The stones made liquid as the huge mass flies,
Then back again with greater weight recolla,
While Ætna thundering from the bottom boils." [E.]

vivial humourist (which latter quality recommends him). The friendship of Burns, but worthless, drunken, and infatuated, earned to the boys under his charge. He carried his feud against the Rector within an inch of a quarrel, and for his violence and knocked him down in the dark. The French who betrays the still less rival obtained in the town council, and the latter, in consequence, which for some time closed poor Adam's day, passed his time fine. When the French Revolution broke out, all parties ran high in approving or condemning it, the Doctor indignantly joined the former. His was very natural, for his old ideas of existing governments were derived from the experience of the town council of Edinburgh, it must be admitted they scarce needed comparison with the free states of Rome and Greece, from which he borrowed his opinions concerning republics. His want of caution in speaking on the political topics of the day lost him the respect of the boys, several of whom were accustomed to hear very different opinions on these matters in the bosom of their families. This, however, which was long after my time, passed away with other heats of the period, and the Doctor continued his labours till about a year since, when he was struck with palsy while teaching his class. He survived a few days, but becoming delirious before his dissolution, conceived he was still in school, and after some expressions of applause or reproof, he said, "But it grows dark—the bell may dismist," and instantly expired.

From Dr. Adam's class I should, according to the usual custom, have proceeded immediately to college. But fortunately, I was not yet to lose, by a total dismission from constraint, the acquaintance with the Latin which I had acquired. My health had become rather delicate from rapid growth, and my father was easily persuaded to allow me to spend half a year at home with my kind aunt, Miss Janet Scott, whose inmate I again became. It was hardly worth mentioning that I had frequently visited her during our short vacations.

At this time she resided in a small house, situated very pleasantly in a large garden, to the eastward of the churchyard of Kelso, which extended down to the Tweed. It was then my father's property, from whom it was afterwards purchased by my uncle. My grandmother was now dead, and the aunt's only companion, besides an old maid servant, was my cousin, Miss Barbara Scott, now Mrs. Meik. My time was here left entirely to my own disposal excepting for about four hours in the day, when I was expected to attend the sabbath school of the village. The teacher, at that time, was Mr. Lancelot Whale, an excellent classical scholar, a humourist, and a worthy man. He had a supreme antipathy to the puns which his very uncommon name frequently gave rise to; insomuch, that he made his son spell the word Wale, which only occasioned the young man being nicknamed the Prince of Wales by the military mess to which he belonged. As for Whale, senior, the least allusion to Jonah, or the terming him an odd fish, or any similar quibble, was sure to put him beside himself. In point of knowledge and taste, he was far too good for the situation he held, which only required that he should give his scholars a rough foundation in the Latin language. My time with him, though short, was spent greatly to my advantage and his gratification. He was glad to escape to Persius and Tacitus from the eternal Rudiments and Cornelius Nepos; and as perusing these authors with one who began to understand them was to him a labour of love, I made considerable progress under his instructions. I suspect, indeed, that some of the time dedicated to me was withdrawn from the instruction of his more regular scholars; but I was as grateful as I could. I acted as usher, and heard the inferior classes, and I spouted the speech of Galgacus at the public examination, which did not make the less impression on the audience that few of them probably understood one word of it.

In the meanwhile my acquaintance with English literature was gradually extending itself. In the intervals of my school hours I had always perused with avidity such books of history or poetry or voyages and travels as chance presented to me—not forgetting the usual, or rather ten times the usual, quantity of fairy tales, eastern stories, romances, &c. These studies were totally unregulated and undirected. My tutor thought it almost a sin to open a profane play or poem; and my mother, besides that she might be in some degree trammelled by the religious scruples which he suggested, had no longer the opportunity to hear me read poetry as formerly. I found, however, in her dressing-room (where I slept at one time) some odd volumes of Shakspeare, nor can I easily forget the rapture with which I sate up in my shirt reading them by the light of a fire in her apartment, until the bustle of the family rising from supper warned me it was time to creep back to my bed, where I was supposed to have been safely deposited since nine o'clock. Chance, however, threw in my way a poetical preceptor. This was no other than the excellent and benevolent Dr. Blacklock, well known at that time as a literary character. I know not how I attracted his attention, and that of some of young men who boarded in his family; but so it was that I became a frequent and favoured guest. The kind old man led me to the stores of his library, and through his recommendation I became intimate with Ossian and Spenser. I was delighted with both, yet I think chiefly with the latter poet. The tawdry repetitions of the Ossianic phraseology disgusted me rather sooner than might have been expected from my age. Spenser I could have read for ever. Too young to trouble myself about the allegory, I considered all the knights and dragons and giants in their outward and exoteric sense, and God only knows how delighted I was to find myself in such society. As I had always a wonderful facility in retaining in my memory whatever verses pleased me, the quantity of Spenser's stanzas which I could repeat was really marvellous. This memory of mine was a very fickle ally, and has through the whole life acted merely upon its own capricious motion, and that it has enabled me to adopt old Beattie of Meikledale's answer, when complimented by a certain reverend divine on the strength of the same faculty:—"No, sir," answered the Borderer, "I have no command of my memory. It only retains what hits my fancy, and probably, sir, if you were to talk to me for two hours, I would not be able when you ceased to remember a word you had been saying." My memory was precisely of the same kind: it seldom failed to preserve tenaciously a favourite passage of poetry, a play-house ballad, or, above all, a Border-raid ballad; but names, dates, and the other technicalities of history, escaped me in a most melancholy degree. The philosophy of history, a much more important subject, was also a sealed book at this period of my life, but I gradually assembled much of what was strikingly picturesque in historical narrative; and when, in riper years, I attended more to the deduction of general principles, I was furnished with a powerful host of examples in illustration of them. I was, in short, like an ignorant gamester, who picks up a good hand until he knew how to play it.

At the High School, therefore, with a great quantity of miscellaneous information, ill arranged, indeed, and collected without system, yet deeply impressed upon my mind; readily accessible by my power of connexion and memory, and gilded, if I may be permitted to say so, by a vivid and active imagination. If my studies were not under any direction at Edinburgh, in the country, it may be well imagined, they were less so. A respectable subscription library, a circulating library of ancient and modern books, and some private book-shelves, were open to my random personal, and I waded into the stream like a blind man into a ford, without the power of searching my way, unless by groping for it. My appetite for books was as ample and indiscriminating as it was indefatigable, and I since have had too frequently reason to repent that few ever read so much, and to so little purpose.

Among the valuable acquisitions I made about this time, was an acquaintance with Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, through the flat medium of Mr. Hoole's translation. But above all, I then first became acquainted with Bishop Percy's Reliques of Ancient Poetry. As I had been from infancy devoted to legendary lore of this nature, and only reluctantly withdrew my attention, from the scarcity of materials and the rudeness of those which I possessed, it may be imagined, but cannot be described, with what delight I saw pieces of the same kind which had amused my childhood, and still continued in secret the Delilahs of my imagination, considered as the subject of sober research, grave commentary, and apt illustration, by an editor who showed his poetical genius was capable of emulating the best qualities of what his pious labour preserved. I remember well the spot where I read these volumes for the first time. It was beneath a huge platanus-tree, in the ruins of what had been intended for an old-fashioned arbour in the garden I have mentioned. The summer-day sped onward so fast, that notwithstanding the sharp appetite of thirteen, I forgot the hour of dinner, was sought for with anxiety, and was still found entranced in my intellectual banquet. To read and to remember was in this instance the same thing, and henceforth I overwhelmed my school-fellows, and all who would hearken to me, with tragical recitations from the ballads of Bishop Percy. The first time, too, I could scrape a few shillings together, which were not common occurrences with me, I bought unto myself a copy of these beloved volumes; nor do I believe I ever read a book half so frequently, or with half the enthusiasm. About this period also I became acquainted with the works of Richardson, and those of Mackenzie—(whom in later years I became entitled to call my friend)—with Fielding, Smollet, and some others of our best novelists.

To this period also I can trace distinctly the awaking of that delightful feeling for the beauties of natural objects which has never since deserted me. The neighbourhood of Kebo, the most beautiful, if not the most romantic village in Scotland, is eminently calculated to awaken these ideas. It presents

s, not only grand in themselves, but generally in their situation. The mountains of the Pyrenees, the Alps, the Apennines, both renowned in antiquity and in modern times.

The more distant countries of Russia, the Kingdom of Prussia, and the Kingdom of Poland, which have been the theatre of the vicissitudes of ancient barbarism, are the seats of the most magnificent and the most fertile of the European soil. I have not, indeed, and no one has ever, till now, given me a more prominent description, that I could have wished, of the nature, extent, and pleasurable effects of the most fertile soil, which I have written much, and have spent many years, in endeavouring for the pencil than the pen. The mountains, which I have described as predominating in the most fertile, are situated upon and ornamented themselves with a few mountains of the landscape, ascending, and the history, or traditional legends connected with many of them, are my admiration a sort of intense region, the beauties of which at times made my heart beat, and I regret at this time the loss of natural beauty, as compared with condensed with ancient ruins, or remains of antiquity, or splendour, because with me an abstract expression, if circumstances had permitted, I would have been enabled by travelling over half the globe.

I recalled to Edinburgh about the year 1800, that I had been put at once to the Hanoverian class, under Mr. Hill's first Greek class, taught by Mr. Dalzell. The professor's remarks of discipline very loose, and the application of students - for he was a good natured man, as we call a scholar - he had not the art of exciting our attention as liking. This was a dangerous character with whom one who relied labour as little as I did, and as one of his class I speedily lost much of what I had learned of Adam and Whale. At the Greek class, I might have a better figure, for Professor Dalzell maintained a great authority, and was not only himself an admirer, but was always deeply interested in the progress of students. But here lay the villainy. Almost all my school-fellows had left the High School at the same time with me, and had acquired a smattering of Greek before their departure. I, alas! had none, and finding myself far inferior to my fellow students, I could hit upon no better mode of making my equality than by professing my contempt for the Greek, and my resolution not to learn it. A youth who stood himself an excellent Greek scholar, saw my negligence and folly with pain, instead of contempt. He came to call on me in George's Square, and pointed out in the strongest terms the silliness of the conduct I had adopted, told me I was distinguished by the name of the Greek Blockhead, and exhorted me to redeem my reputation while it was called to day. My stubborn pride received this advice with sulky civility; the birth of my Mentor (whose name was Archibald, the son of an inn-keeper) did not, as I thought in my folly, authorise him to intrude upon me his advice. The other was not sharp-sighted, or his consciousness of a generous intention overcame his resentment. He offered me his daily and nightly assistance, and pledged himself to bring me forward with the foremost of my class. I felt some twinges of conscience, but they were unable to prevail over my pride and self-conceit. The poor lad left me more in sorrow than in anger, nor did we ever meet again. All hopes of my progress in the Greek were now over; insomuch that when we were required to write essays on the authors we had studied, I had the audacity to produce a composition in which I weighed Homer against Aristo, and pronounced him wanting in the balance. I supported this heresy by a profusion of bad reading and flimsy argument. The wrath of the Professor was extreme, while at the same time he could not suppress his surprise at the quantity of out of the way knowledge which I displayed. He pronounced upon me the severe sentence — that dunce I was, and dunce was to remain — which, however, my excellent and learned friend lived to revoke over a bottle of Burgundy, at our literary Club at Fort une's, of which he was a distinguished member.

Meanwhile, as if to eradicate my slightest tincture of Greek, I fell ill during the middle of Mr. Dalzell's second class, and migrated a second time to Kelso — where I again continued a long time reading what and how I pleased, and of course reading nothing but what afforded me immediate entertainment. The only thing which saved my mind from utter dissipation, was that turn for historical pursuit, which never abandoned me even at the idlest period. I had forsworn the Latin classes for no reason I know of, unless because they were akin to the Greek; but the occasional perusal of Buchanan's history, that of Mathew of Paris, and other monkish chronicles, kept up a kind of familiarity with the language even in its rudest state. But I forgot the very letters of the Greek alphabet; a loss never to be repaired, considering what that language is, and who they were who employed it in their compositions.

About this period — or soon afterwards — my father judged it proper I should study mathematics; a study upon which I entered with all the ardour of novelty. My tutor was an aged person, Dr. MacFait, who had in his time been distinguished as a teacher of this science. Age, however, and some domestic inconveniences, had diminished his pupils, and lessened his authority amongst the few who remained. I think, that had I been more fortunately placed for instruction, or had I had the spur of emulation, I might have made some progress in this science, of which, under the circumstances I have mentioned, I only acquired a very superficial smattering.

In other studies I was rather more fortunate. I made some progress in Ethics under Professor John Bruce, and was selected as one of his students whose progress he approved, to read an essay before Principal Robertson. I was farther instructed in Moral Philosophy at the class of Mr. Dugald Stewart, whose striking and impressive eloquence riveted the attention even of the most volatile student. To sum up my academical studies, I attended the class of History, then taught by the present Lord Woodhouselee, and, as far as I remember, no others, excepting those of the Civil and Municipal Law. So that, if my learning be flimsy and inaccurate, the reader must have some compassion even for an idle workman who had so narrow a foundation to build upon. If, however, it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages — let such a reader remember, that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhood the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth; that through every part of my literary career I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance; and that I would at this moment give half the reputation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if by doing so I could rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learning and science.

I imagine my father's reason for sending me to so few classes in the College, was a desire that I should apply myself particularly to my legal studies. He had not determined whether I should fill the situation of an Advocate or a Writer; but judiciously considering the technical knowledge of the latter to be useful at least, if not essential, to a barrister, he resolved I should serve the ordinary apprenticeship of five years to his own profession. I accordingly entered into indentures with my father about 1785-6, and entered upon the dry and barren wilderness of forms and conveyances.

I cannot reproach myself with being entirely an idle apprentice — far less, as the reader might reasonably have expected,

“A clerk foredoom'd my father's soul to cross.”

The drudgery, indeed, of the office I disliked, and the confinement I altogether detested; but I loved my father, and I felt the rational pride and pleasure of rendering myself useful to him. I was ambitious also; and among my companions in labour, the only way to gratify ambition was to labour hard and well. Other circumstances reconciled me in some measure to the confinement. The allowance for copy money furnished a little fund for the menus plaisirs of the circulating library and the Theatre; and this was no trifling incentive to labour. When actually at the oar, no man could pull it harder than I; and I remember writing upwards of 120 folio pages with no interval either for food or rest. Again, the hours of attendance on the office were lightened by the power of choosing my own books, and reading them in my own way, which often consisted in beginning at the middle or the end of a volume. A deceased friend, who was a fellow-apprentice with me, used often to express his surprise that, after such a hop-step-and-jump perusal, I knew as much of the book as he had been able to acquire from reading it in the usual manner. My desk usually contained a store of most miscellaneous volumes, especially works of fiction of every kind, which were my supreme delight. I might except novels, unless those of the better and higher class; for though I read many of them, yet it was with more selection than might have been expected. The whole Jenny and Jenny Jessamy tribe I abhorred; and it required the art of Burney, or the feeling of Mackenzie, to fix my attention upon a domestic tale. But all that was adventurous and romantic I devoured without much discrimination, and I really believe I have read as much nonsense of this class as any man now living. Everything which touched on knight-errantry was particularly acceptable to me, and I soon attempted to imitate what I so greatly admired. My efforts, however, were in the manner of the tale-teller, not of the bard.

My greatest intimate, from the days of my school-tide, was Mr. John Irving, now a Writer to the Signet.¹ We lived near each other, and by joint agreement were wont each of us, to compose a romance for the other's amusement. These romances, in which the martial and the satirical was always predominated, were rehearsed to each other, sitting at work, which were usually directed to the most solitary spots about Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Crags. We naturally sought each other for our recreation, in the nature of it had for me become. While my days were spent in this studious pursuit, which continued for two or three years, and had, I believe, no small effect in directing the turn of my imagination to the chivalrous and romantic in poetry and prose.

¹ [In speaking of the High School period, Mr. John Irving says: "He began early to collect old ballads, and as my mother could repeat a great many, he used to come and learn those she could recite to him. He used to get all the copies of these ballads he could, and select the best." These, no doubt, were among the germs of a collection of ballads in six little volumes, which, from the handwriting, had been begun at this early period, and which is still preserved at Abbotsford. And it appears, that at least as early a date must be ascribed to another collection of little humorous stories in prose, the Penny Chap-books, as they are called, still in high favour among the lower classes in Scotland, which stands on the

Meanwhile, the translation of Mr. Hoole having made me acquainted with Lavo and Aristo, I learned from his notes in the latter, that the Italian language contained a fund of romantic lore. A part of my earnings was dedicated to an Italian class which I attended twice a week, and rapidly acquired some proficiency. I had previously renounced and attended my knowledge of the French language, from the same principle of romantic research. Trepan's romances, the Bibliothèque Bleue, and Bibliothèque de Romans, were already familiar to me, and I now acquired similar intimacy with the works of Dante, Boccaccio, Pulci, and other eminent Italian authors. I fastened also, like a tiger, upon every collection of songs or romances which chance threw in my way, or which my scrutiny was able to discover on the dusty shelves of James Sibbald's circulating library in the Parliament Square. This collection, now dismantled and dispersed, contained at that time many rare and curious works, seldom found in such a collection. Mr. Sibbald himself, a man of rough manners but some taste and judgment, cultivated music and poetry, and in his shop I had a distant view of some literary characters, besides the privilege of ransacking the stores of old French and Italian books, which were in little demand among the bulk of his subscribers. Here I saw the unfortunate Andrew Marvell, author of Vinonia, and here, too, I saw at a distance, the boast of Scotland, Robert Burns. Of the latter I shall presently have occasion to speak more fully.

on shelf. In a letter of 1830, he states that he had found up things of this kind to the extent of several volumes, before he was ten years old. -- Ed.]

[“As for Burns,” he writes, “I may truly say, ‘Vergilium edidisti.’ I was a lad of fifteen in 1796-7, when he came first to Edinburgh, but had sense and feeling enough to be much interested in his

I am inadvertently led to confound dates while I talk of this remote period, for, as I have no notes, it is impossible for me to remember with accuracy the progress of studies, if they deserve the name, so irregular and miscellaneous.

But about the second year of my apprenticeship, my health, which from rapid growth and other causes, had been hitherto rather uncertain and delicate, was affected by the breaking of a blood-vessel. The regimen I had to undergo on this occasion was far from agreeable. It was spring, and the weather raw and cold, yet I was confined to bed with a single blanket, and bled and blistered till I scarcely had a pulse left. I had all the appetite of a growing boy, but was prohibited any sustenance beyond what was absolutely necessary for the support of poetry, and would have given the world to know him; but I had very little acquaintance with any literary people, and still less with the gentry of the west country, — the two sets that he most frequented. Mr. Thomas Grierson was at that time a clerk of my father's. He knew Burns, and promised to ask him to his boltings to dinner, but had no opportunity to keep his word, otherwise I might have seen more of this distinguished man. As it was, I saw him one day at the late venerable Professor Fergusson's, where there were several gentlemen of literary reputation, among whom I remember the celebrated Mr. Douglass Stewart. Of course we youngsters sat silent, looked and listened. The only thing I remember which was remarkable in Burns' manner, was the effect produced upon him by a print of Bunbury's, representing a soldier lying dead on the snow, his dog sitting in misery on the one side, on the other his widow, with a child in her arms. These lines were written beneath,

'Cold on Canadian hills, or Minden's plain,
Perhaps that parent wept her soldier slain;
Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolved in dew,
The big drops, mingling with the milk he drew,
Gave the sad presage of his future years,
The child of misery baptiz'd in tears.'

Burns seemed much affected by the print, or rather the ideas which it suggested to his mind. He actually shed tears. He asked whose the lines were, and it chanced that nobody but myself remembered that they occur in a half-forgotten poem of Langhorne's, called by the unpromising title of 'The Justice of the Peace.' I whispered my information to a friend present, who mentioned it to Burns, who rewarded me with a look and a word, which, though of mere civility, I then received, and still recollect, with very great pleasure. . . . His conversation expressed perfect self-confidence, without the slightest presumption. Among the men who were the most learned of their time and country, he expressed himself with perfect firmness, but without the least intrusive forwardness, and when he differed in opinion, he did not hesitate to express it firmly, yet at the same time with modesty. I do not remember any part of his conversation distinctly enough to be quoted, nor did I ever see him again, except in the street, where he did not recognise me, as I could not expect he should." — Letter to J. G. L. 1827.]

and that in vegetables alone. Above all with a strong disposition to talk, I was not permitted to open my mouth one or two old ladies who watched my words. But I once to console upon me, "Imaginary science with a staff." My only refuge was reading and playing at chess, romances and poetry, which I chiefly delighted in. I have added a study of history, especially ancient military events. I was encouraged in this latter study by a casual acquaintance with geography, and by the papers I had enjoyed while with Mr. MacLellan to read the more ordinary terms of fortification. While, however, I lay in this dreary and silent solitude, I felt a desire of illustrating the battles I read of by the childish art of arranging shells, sand, seeds, and pebbles, so as to represent encountering armies. Diminutive crosses were used to mimic artillery, and with the assistance of a carpenter, I contrived to model a fortress, which, of uncle Toby, represented whatever place happened to present in my imagination. I fought my way thro' Vertot's Knights of Malta—a book which, as it between history and romance, was exceedingly dear to me. Orme's interesting and beautiful History of India—a voluminous plan, aided by the clear and humane as explained by the author, rendered my imitative amusement peculiarly agreeable. Other moments of these weary weeks were spent in looking at Meadow Walks, by assistance of a combination of mirrors so arranged that, while lying in bed, I could see the march out to exercise, or any other incident which occurred on that promenade.

After one or two relapses, my constitution recovered the strength it had sustained, though for several months afterwards I was restricted to a severe vegetable diet. And I must say, that though I gained health under this necessary regimen, yet it was far from being agreeable to me, and I never felt before or since. A disposition to start at the slightest alarm—a want of decision in feeling and action—has not usually been my failing, an acute sensibility to trifling inconveniences—and an unnecessary apprehension of great misfortunes, rise to my memory as connected with the vegetable diet, although they may very possibly have been the result of the disorder, and not of the cure. He may, with this illness I bade farewell both to disease and medicine; for since that time, till the hour I am now writing, I have enjoyed a state of the most robust health, having only had to complain of occasional headaches or stomachic affections when I have been long without taking exercise, or have lived too convivially—the latter having been occasionally, though not habitually, the error of my youth, as the former has been of my advanced life.

¹ Home's Tragedy of Douglas

My frame gradually became hardened with my constitution, and being both tall and muscular, I was rather disfigured than disabled by my lameness. This personal disadvantage did not prevent me from taking much exercise on horseback, and making long journeys on foot, in the course of which I often walked from twenty to thirty miles a day. A distinct instance occurs to me. I remember walking with poor James Ramsay, my fellow-apprentice, now no more, and two other friends, to breakfast at Prestonpans. We spent the forenoon in visiting the ruins at Seton and the field of battle at Preston—dined at Prestonpans on tiled haddocks very sumptuously—drank half a bottle of port each, and returned in the evening. This could not be less than thirty miles, nor do I remember being at all fatigued upon the occasion.¹

These excursions on foot or horseback formed by far my most favourite amusement. I have all my life delighted in

¹ [If he is quite accurate in referring (Preface to Waverley Novels) his first acquaintance with the Highlands to his fifteenth year, this incident belongs to the first season of his apprenticeship. His father had, among a rather numerous list of Highland clients, Alexander Stewart of Invernahyle, an enthusiastic Jacobite, who had survived to recount, in secure and vigorous old age, his active experiences in the insurrection both of 1715 and 1745. He had, it appears, attracted Walter's attention and admiration at a very early date; for he speaks of having "seen him in arms," and heard him "exult in the prospect of drawing his claymore once more before he died," when Paul Jones threatened the descent on Edinburgh, which occurred in September 1779. The eager delight with which the young apprentice now listened to the tales of this fine old man's early days, produced an invitation to his residence among the mountains, and to this excursion he probably devoted the few weeks of an autumnal vacation—whether in 1786 or 1787, it is of no great consequence to ascertain. It was, however, to his allotted task of enforcing the execution of a legal instrument against some Macfarlanes, refractory tenants of Stewart of Appin, brother-in-law to Invernahyle, that Scott owed his introduction to the scenery of the Lady of the Lake. "An escort of a serjeant and six men," he says, "was obtained from a Highland Regiment lying in Stirling, and the author, then a writer's apprentice, equivalent to the honourable situation of an attorney's clerk, was invested with the superintendance of the expedition. The serjeant was absolutely a Highland Serjeant Kite, full of stories of Rob Roy and of himself, and a very good companion."—Introduction to Rob Roy.—Ed.]

g, though I have never observed that place to be a
 e. It was a property which I had not previously y me to alarm and excite my mind. We were it itself, had an appearance of a great and cany way of a great river, and a great usionably his fortitude and the fortitude of instance, a most excellent and a most out with Mr. Green, who was the General, Mr. White, the e Lake above H. and the into the F. I. We then day, and while we were casually noticed by William ical Pennamuk H. me, the John King, and I for their shown by the late Sir John Lower Lady Clerk. The
 the beauty of the place, and men, drowned all our amiable our companions, who and of our digestion, return erted no small alarm in my iver, they became as if r used to be patient to me was born to be a student was intended to mortally together disliked it. I was of thought of Antony's

"Jog on, jog on, the best path way,
 And merrily bent the way,
 A merry heart goes all the day,
 Your sad tires in a mill a" incipal object in these excursions was the pleasure of natic memory, or what afforded me at least equal he places which had been distinguished by remark-and events. The delight with which I recalled the course had general approbation, but I first found it procure sympathy with the interest I felt in the to me, the wandering over the field of Hancok the source of more exquisite pleasure than gazing celebrated landscape from the battlements of the castle. I do not by any means infer that I was dead to the feeling of picturesque scenery; on the contrary, few delighted more in its general effect. But I was unable with the eye of a painter to dissect the various parts of the scene, to comprehend how the one bore upon the other, to estimate the effect which various features of the view had in producing its leading and general effect. I have never, indeed, been capable of doing this with precision or nicety, though my latter studies have led me to amend and arrange my original ideas upon the subject. Even the humble ambition, which I long cherished, of making sketches of those places which interested me, from a defect of eye or of hand was totally ineffectual. After long study and many efforts, I was unable to apply the elements of perspective or of shade to the scene before me, and was obliged to relinquish in despair an art which I was most anxious to practise. But shew me an old castle or a field of battle, and I was at home at once, filled it with its combatants in their proper costume, and overwhelmed my hearers by the enthusiasm of my description. In crossing Magnus Moor, near St. Andrews, the spirit moved me to give a picture of the assassination of the Archbishop of St. Andrews to some fellow-travellers with whom I was accidentally associated, and one of them, though well acquainted with the story, protested my narrative had frightened away his night's sleep. I mention this to shew the distinction between a sense of the picturesque in action and in scenery. If I have since been able in poetry to trace with some success the principles of the latter, it has always been with reference to its general and leading features, or under some alliance with moral feeling; and even this proficiency has cost me study. — Meanwhile I endeavoured to make amends for my ignorance of drawing, by adopting a sort of technical memory respecting the scenes I visited. Wherever I went I cut a piece of a branch from a tree — these constituted what I called my log-book; and I intended to have a set of chessmen out of them, each having reference to the place where it was cut — as the kings from Falkland and Holy-Rood; the queens from Queen Mary's yew tree at Crookston; the bishops from abbeys or episcopal palaces; the knights from baronial residences; the rooks from royal fortresses; and the pawns generally from places worthy of historical note. But this whimsical design I never carried into execution.

With music it was even worse than with painting. My mother was anxious we should at least learn Psalmody, but the incurable defects of my voice and ear soon drove my teacher to despair.¹ It is only by long practice that I have acquired the power of selecting or distinguishing melodies; and although now few things delight or affect me more than a simple tune sung with feeling, yet I am sensible that even this pitch of musical taste has only been gained by attention and habit, and, as it were, by my feeling of the words being associated with the tune. I have therefore been usually unsuccessful in composing words to a tune, although my friend Dr. Clarke, and other musical composers, have sometimes been able to make a happy union between their music and my poetry.

In other points, however, I began to make some amends for the irregularity of my education. It is well known that in Edinburgh one great spur to emulation among youthful students is in those associations called literary societies, formed not only for the purpose of debate, but of composition. These undoubtedly have some disadvantages, where a bold, petulant, and disputatious temper happens to be combined with considerable information and talent. Still, however, in order to such a person being actually spoiled by his mixing in such debates, his talents must be of a very rare nature, or his effrontery must be proof to every species of assault; for there is generally, in a well-selected society of this nature, talent sufficient to meet the forwardest, and satire enough to penetrate the most undaunted. I am particularly obliged to this sort of club for introducing me about my seventeenth year into the society which at one time I had entirely dropped; for, from the time of my illness at college, I had had little or no intercourse with any of my class-companions, one or two only ex-

¹ The late Alexander Campbell, a warm-hearted man, and an enthusiast in Scottish music, which he sang most beautifully, had this ungrateful task imposed on him. He was a man of many accomplishments, but dashed with a bizarre of temper which made them useless to their proprietor. He wrote several books — as a Tour in Scotland, &c. ; — and he made an advantageous marriage, but fell nevertheless into distressed circumstances, which I had the pleasure of relieving, if I could not remove. His sense of gratitude was very strong, and shewed itself oddly in one respect. He would never allow that I had a bad ear; but contended, that if I did not understand music, it was because I did not choose to learn it. But when he attended us in George's Square, our neighbour, Lady Cumming, sent to beg the boys might not be all flogged precisely at the same hour, as, though she had no doubt the punishment was deserved, the noise of the concord was really dreadful. Robert was the only one of our family who could sing, though my father was musical, and a performer on the violoncello at the gentlemen's concerts. — 1826.

and a perception that soon ripened into fact and observation of character, rendered me an acceptable companion to many young men whose acquisitions in philosophy and science were infinitely superior to anything I could boast.

In the business of these societies — for I was a member of more than one successively — I cannot boast of having made any great figure. I never was a good speaker, unless upon some subject which strongly animated my feelings; and, as I was totally unaccustomed to composition, as well as to the art of generalising my ideas upon any subject, my literary essays were but very poor work. I never attempted them unless when compelled to do so by the regulations of the society, and then I was like the Lord of Castle Rackrent, who was obliged to cut down a tree to get a few faggots to boil the kettle; for the quantity of ponderous and miscellaneous knowledge which I really possessed on many subjects, was not easily condensed, or brought to bear upon the object I wished particularly to become master of. Yet there occurred opportunities when this odd lumber of my brain, especially that which was connected with the recondite parts of history, did me, as Hamlet says, “yeoman’s service.” My memory of events was like one of the large, old-fashioned stone-cannons of the Turks — very difficult to load well and discharge, but making a powerful effect when by good chance any object did come within range of its shot. Such fortunate opportunities of exploding with effect maintained my literary character among my companions, with whom I soon met with great indulgence and regard. The persons with whom I chiefly lived at this period of my youth were William Clerk, already mentioned; James Edmonstone, of Newton; George Abercromby; Adam Fergusson, son of the celebrated Professor Fergusson, and who combined the lightest and most airy temper with the best and kindest disposition; John Irving, already mentioned; the Honourable Thomas Douglas, now Earl of Selkirk; David Boyle,¹ — and two or three others, who sometimes plunged deeply into politics and metaphysics, and not unfrequently “doffed the world aside, and bid it pass.”

Looking back on these times, I cannot applaud in all respects the way in which our days were spent. There was too much idleness, and sometimes too much conviviality; but our hearts were warm, our minds honourably bent on knowledge literary distinction; and if I, certainly the least informed of the party, may be permitted to bear witness, we were not without the fair and creditable means of attaining the destination to which we aspired. In this respect I was naturally led to correct my former useless course of reading, for I felt myself greatly inferior to my companions in the capacity of philosophy and other branches of regular study. I laboured, without some success, to acquire at least such a quantity of knowledge as might enable me to maintain my rank in the conversation. In this I succeeded pretty well, but as I continued in it, as often since through my life, I incurred the disadvantage of my friends from the superficial nature of my acquisitions, which being, in the mercantile phrase, put up for society, very often proved flimsy in the texture, and thus the gifts of uncommonly retentive memory and acute powers of perception were sometimes detrimental to their possessor, by encouraging him to a presumptuous reliance upon them.

¹ Now Lord Justice-Clerk. — 1826.

[Scott was admitted into the most celebrated of the Edinburgh debating Societies, The Speculative, in January 1791. Soon after he was elected its librarian; and in the November following, he became secretary, treasurer, &c. all which appointments indicate the success of his careful habits of business, the fruit of his chamber school. The minutes kept in his hand writing attest the strict regularity of attention to the affairs of the club, but they show also, as do all his letters, a strange carelessness in spelling. His conversation and temper suited the asperities of debate, while his multifariousness, and the great labour with which he enlivened its display, made him more a favourite speaker than some whose powers of rhetoric were far above his. Mr. Francis Jeffrey, on the first night of his attendance at The Speculative, heard Scott read an essay on ballads, which so much interested a new member, that he requested to be introduced to him. Mr. Jeffrey called on him next evening, and found him "in a small room on the corner of his father's house in George's Square, surrounded with slings and shot," from which they adjourned to a tavern, and supped together. It was the commencement of an acquaintance, which by degrees ripened into friendship, between the two most distinguished men of letters in Edinburgh produced in their time. I may add here the idea of a Journal at early dawn, with which I am favoured by a letter of the 14th inst. Walter had soon begun to collect out of the way things of an antique and more books than shelves, a small painted cabinet or cabinet of drawers, Roman coins in it, and so forth. A claymore and two halberds were in him by old Invernahyle, mounted guard on a little point of brass table; and Houghton's Sauce was hooked up against the wall below. But I must explain Houghton's Sauce. Mrs. Scott's uncle was exceedingly excited one autumn by the regular appearance, at a certain hour every evening, of a certain chair, to deposit a person carefully wrapped up in a mantle, who was immediately ushered into her husband's parlour, and commonly remained with him there until long after the usual

Amidst these studies, and in this society, the time of my apprenticeship elapsed; and in 1790, or thereabouts, it became necessary that I should seriously consider to which department of the law I was to attach myself. My father behaved with the most parental kindness. He offered, if I preferred his own profession, immediately to take me into partnership with him, which, though his business was much diminished, still afforded me an immediate prospect of a handsome independence. But he did not disguise his wish that I should relinquish this situation to my younger brother, and embrace the more ambitious profession of the bar. I had little hesitation in making my choice — for I was never very fond of money; and in no other particular do the professions admit of a comparison. Besides, I knew and felt the inconveniences attached to that of a Writer; and I thought (like a young man) many of them were “ingenio non subounda meo.”¹ The appearance of personal dependence bed-time of this orderly family. Mr. Scott answered her repeated inquiries with a vagueness which irritated the lady's feelings more and more; until, at last, she could bear the thing no longer; but one evening, just as she heard the bell ring as for the stranger's chair to carry him off, she made her appearance within the forbidden parlour with a salver in her hand, observing, that she thought the gentlemen had sat so long, they would be the better of a dish of tea, and had ventured accordingly to bring some for their acceptance. The stranger, a person of distinguished appearance, and richly dressed, bowed to the lady, and accepted a cup; but her husband knit his brows, and refused very coldly to partake the refreshment. A moment afterwards the visitor withdrew — and Mr. Scott lifting up the window-sash, took the cup, which he had left empty on the table, and tossed it out upon the pavement. The lady exclaimed for her china, but was put to silence by her husband's saying, “I can forgive your little curiosity, madam, but you must pay the penalty. I may admit into my house, on a piece of business, persons wholly unworthy to be treated as guests by my wife. Neither lip of mine nor of mine comes after Mr. Murray of Broughton's.” This was the unhappy man who, after attending Prince Charles Stuart as his secretary throughout the greater part of his expedition, condescended to redeem his own life and fortune by bearing evidence against the noblest of his late master's adherents, when

“Pilled by gentle hearts Kilmarnock died
The brave, Balmerino, were on thy side”

When confronted with Sir John Douglas of Kelhead (ancestor of the Marquess of Queensberry), before the Privy Council in St. James's, the prisoner was asked, “Do you know this witness?” “Not I,” answered Douglas; “I once knew a person who bore the designation of Murray of Broughton — but that was a gentleman and a man of honour, and one that could hold up his head!” The saucer belonging to Broughton's tea-cup chanced to be preserved; and Walter had made prize of it. — Ep.]

¹ Milton, Eleg. Lib. I.

that profession requires was disagreeable to me, the sort reason between the client and the attorney seemed to render the latter more subservient than was quite agreeable to my mind, besides, I had seen many sad examples, while visiting my father's business, that the utmost exertions, the best mental services, do not secure the bona fide success he is called, from great loss, and no of indignation treatment in the part of his employers. The bar, though I was not of my defence, as a public speaker, was the liber-tion and liberty, it was that also for which most of my moral friends were confined. And, lastly, although I willingly have relieved my father of the labours of his law, yet I saw plainly we could not have agreed on some affairs if we had attempted to conduct it together, and that I disappointed his expectations if I did not turn to the bar.
 My object my studies were directed with great ardour severance during the years 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792

The usual course of study, the Roman or Civil Law was the object of my attention. The second, the Municipal Scotland. In the course of reading on both subjects, I the advantage of studying in conjunction with my friend Clerk, a man of the most acute intellects and power elevation, and who, should he ever shake loose the fetter of indolence by which he has been hitherto transmi-led, and to be distinguished in the highest degree. We attended the regular classes of both laws in the University of Glasgow. The Civil Law class, now worthily filled by Mr Irving, might at that time be considered as in obey-ance the person by whom it was occupied had never been in that situation, and was then almost in a state of dotage.

The Scotch Law lectures were those of Mr David Hume,
 I continued to occupy that situation with as much to himself as advantage to his country. I copied over the lectures twice with my own hand, from notes taken in the class when I have had occasion to consult them, I can sufficiently admire the penetration and clearness of reason which were necessary to the arrangement of the fabric formed originally under the strictest influence of feudal laws, and innovated, altered, and broken in upon by the changes of times, of habits, and of manners, until it resembled an ancient castle, partly entire, partly ruinous, partly dilap-dated and altered during the successive of ages by a variety of additions and combinations, yet still exhibiting, with the marks of its antiquity, symptoms of the skill and wisdom of its founders, and capable of being analysed and made the subject of a methodical plan by an architect who can understand the various styles of the different ages in which it was subjected to alteration. Such an architect has Mr. Hume been to the law of Scotland, neither wandering into fanciful and abstruse disquisitions, which are the more proper subject of the antiquary, nor satisfied with presenting to his pupils a dry and undigested detail of the laws in their present state, but combining the past state of our legal enactments with the present, and tracing clearly and judiciously the changes which took place, and the causes which led to them.

Under these auspices, I commenced my legal studies. A little parlour was assigned me in my father's house, which was spacious and convenient, and I took the exclusive possession of my new realm with all the feelings of novelty and liberty. Let me do justice to the only years of my life in which I applied to learning with stern, steady, and undeviating industry. The rule of my friend Clerk and myself was, that we should mutually qualify ourselves for undergoing an examination upon certain points of law every morning in the week, Sundays excepted. This was at first to have taken place alternately at each other's houses, but we soon discovered that my friend's resolution was inadequate to severing him from his coach at the early hour fixed for this exertion. Accordingly, I agreed to go every morning to his house, which, being at the extremity of Prince's Street, New Town, was a walk of two miles. With great punctuality, however, I beat him up to his task every morning before seven o'clock, and in the course of two summers, we went, by way of question and answer, through the whole of Heineccius's Analysis of the Institutes and Pandects, as well as through the smaller copy of Erskine's Institutes of the Law of Scotland. This course of study enabled us to pass with credit the usual trials, which, by the regulations of the Faculty of Advocates, must be undergone by every candidate for admission into their body. My friend William Clerk and I passed these ordeals on the same days -- namely, the Civil Law trial on the [30th June 1791], and the Scots Law trial on the [6th July 1792]. On the [11th July 1792], we both assumed the gown with all its duties and honours.

My progress in life during these two or three years had been gradually enlarging my acquaintance, and facilitating my entrance into good company. My father and mother, already advanced in life, saw little society at home, excepting that of near relations, or upon particular occasions, so that I was the first construction. ...

 dithers to ...
 and, to make ...
 and elsewhere ...
 ally truthst, had ...
 million ...
 well, as ...
 ly"

* * * * *

CHAPTER II.

Call to the Bar—Early Friendships and Pursuits—Excursions to the Highlands and Border—Light-Horse Volunteers—Disappointment in Love—Publication of Ballads after Bürger. 1792-1797.

WALTER SCOTT, the eldest son of Robert of Sandy Knowe, appears to have been the first of the family that ever adopted a town life, or anything claiming to be classed among the learned professions. His branch of the law, however, could not in those days be advantageously prosecuted without extensive connexions in the country; his own were too respectable not to be of much service to him in his calling, and they were cultivated accordingly. His professional visits to Roxburghshire and Ettrick Forest were, in the vigour of his life, very frequent; and though he was never supposed to have any tincture either of romance or poetry in his composition, he retained to the last a warm affection for his native district, with a certain reluctant flavour of the old feelings and prejudices of the Borderer. I have little to add to Sir Walter's short and respectful notice of his father, except that I have heard it confirmed by the testimony of many less partial observers. "He passed from the cradle to the grave," says his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Thomas Scott, "without making an enemy or losing a friend. He was a most affectionate parent, and if he discouraged, rather than otherwise, his son's early devotion to the pursuits which led him to the height of literary eminence, it was only because he did not understand what such things meant, and considered it his duty to keep his young man to that path in which good sense and industry might, humanly speaking, be thought sure of success." We have, according to William Clerk, a very accurate representation of the old gentleman in the elder Fairford of Redgauntlet; and there is as little doubt that Walter drew from himself in the younger Fairford, and from his friend Clerk in the Darsie Latimer of that tale.

His mother was short of stature, and by no means comely, at least after the days of her early youth. The physiognomy of the poet bore, if their portraits may be trusted, no resemblance to either of his parents; while, on the other hand, a very strong likeness to him is observable in the pictures both of the shrewd farmer and sportsman, Robert of Sandy-Knowe, and of the venerable Jacobite, Beardie. But Scott's mother, there is no doubt, was, in talents as well as tastes, superior to her husband. She had strong powers of observation, with a lively relish for the humorous, and was noted for her skill in story-telling. She had, moreover, like Irving's mother, a love of ancient ballads and Scotch traditions and legends of all sorts, and her Calvinistic prejudices did not save her from the worship of Shakspeare. Her sister, Christian Rutherford, appears to have been still more accomplished; and as she was comparatively young, the intimacy between her and her nephew was more like what occurs commonly between a youth and an elder sister. In the house of his uncle, Dr. Rutherford, Scott must have had access, from his earliest days, to a scientific and scholarlike circle of society. His own parents, too, were, as we have seen, personal friends of John Home, the author of Douglas, at whose villa near Edinburgh young Walter was a frequent visitor: but, above all, his intimacy with the son of Dr. Adam Fergusson, the moralist and historian, who was then one of the chief ornaments of the University, afforded easy opportunity of mixing, in as far as his ambition might gradually aspire, with the most intellectual and cultivated society of his native place. It was under that roof that he conversed with Burns when in his seventeenth year.

I shall only add to what he sets down on the subject of his early academical studies, that in this, as in almost every case, he appears to have underrated his own attainments. He had, indeed, no pretensions to the name of an extensive, far less of an accurate, Latin scholar; but he could read, I believe, any Latin author, of any age, so as to catch without difficulty his meaning; and although his favourite Latin poet, as well as historian, in later days, was Buchanan, he had preserved, or subsequently acquired, a strong relish for some others of more ancient date. I may mention, in particular, Lucan and Claudian. The autobiography has informed us of the early period at which he enjoyed the real Tasso and Ariosto. I presume he had at least as soon as this enabled himself to read Gil Blas in the original; and, in all probability, we may refer to the same time of his life, or one not much later, his acquisition of as much Spanish as served for the Guerras Civiles de Granada, Lazarillo de Tormes, and, above all, Don Quixote. He read all these languages in after life with about the same facility. I never but once heard him attempt to speak any of them, and that was when some of the courtiers of Charles X. came to Abbotsford, soon after that unfortunate prince took up his residence for the second time at Holyroodhouse. Finding that one or two of these gentlemen could speak no English at all, he made some efforts to amuse them in their own language after the champagne had been passing buskily round the table; and I was amused next morning with the expression of one of the party, who, alluding to the sort of reading in which Sir Walter seemed to have chiefly occupied himself, said — “Mon Dieu! comme il estropiait, entre deux vins, le Français du bon sire de Joinville!” Of all these tongues, as of German somewhat later, he acquired as much as was needful for his own purposes, of which a critical study of any foreign language made at no time any part. In them he sought for incidents, and he found images; but for the treasures of diction he was content to dig on British soil. He had all he wanted in the old wells of “English undefiled,” and the still living, though fast shrinking, waters of that sister idiom, which had not always, as he flattered himself, deserved the name of a dialect.

As may be said, I believe, with perfect truth of every really great man, Scott was self-educated in every branch of knowledge which he ever turned to account in the works of his genius — and he has himself told us that his real studies were those lonely and desultory ones of which he has given a copy in the first chapter of Waverley, where the hero is represented as “driving through the sea of books, like a vessel without pilot or rudder;” that is to say, obeying nothing but the strong breath of native inclination. The literary details of that chapter may all be considered as autobiographical.

In all the studies of the two or three years preceding his call to the bar, his chief associate was William Clerk; and, indeed, of all the connexions he formed in life, I now doubt if there was one to whom he owed more. He always continued to say that Clerk was unsurpassed in strength and acuteness of faculties, by any man he had ever conversed with familiarly; and though he has left no literary monument whatever behind him, he was from youth to a good old age indefatigable in study, and rivalled, I believe, by very few of his contemporaries, either in the variety or the accuracy of his acquired knowledge. He entered zealously from the first into all Scott’s antiquarian pursuits, and he it was who mainly aided and stim-ated him throughout the few years which he did devote to his proper training for the profession of the bar. But these were not all the obligations: it was Clerk that first or mainly awakened his social ambition: it was he that drew him out of the company of his father's apprentices, and taught him to rise above their clubs and festivities, and the rough irregular habits of all their intervals of relaxation. It was probably very much in consequence of the tacit influence of this tie that he resolved on following the upper and more precarious branch of his profession, instead of that in which his father's eldest son had, if he chose, the certain prospect of early independence, and every likelihood of a plentiful fortune in the end.

Yet both in his adoption, soon after that friendship began, of a somewhat superior tone of manners and habits generally, and in his ultimate decision for the bar, as well as in his strenuous preparation during a considerable space of time for that career, there is little question that another influence must have powerfully co-operated. Of the few early letters of Scott that have been preserved, almost all are addressed to Clerk, who says, "I ascribe my little handful to a sort of instinctive prophetic sense of his future greatness;"—but a great mass of letters addressed to Scott himself, during his early years, are still in being, and they are important documents in his history, for, as Southey well remarks, letters often tell more of the character of the man they are to be read by than of him who writes them. Throughout all these, then, there occurs no coarse or even jocular suggestion as to the conduct of Scott in that particular, as to which most youths of his then age are so apt to lay up stores of self-reproach. In that season of hot and impetuous blood he may not have escaped quite blameless; but he has the concurrent testimony of all the most intimate among his surviving associates, that he was remarkably free from such indiscretions; that while his high sense of honour shielded him from the remotest dream of tampering with female innocence, he had an instinctive delicacy about him which made him recoil with utter disgust from low and vulgar debaucheries. His friends, I have heard more than one of them confess, used often to rally him on the coldness of his nature. By degrees they discovered that he had, from almost the dawn of the passions, cherished a secret attachment, which continued, through all the most perilous stage of life, to act as a romantic charm in the safeguard of virtue. This was the early and innocent affection which we owe the tenderest pages, not only of Redgauntlet, but of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, and of Rokeby. In all of these works the heroine has certain distinctive features, drawn from one and the same haunting dream of his manly adolescence.

It was about 1790, according to Mr. William Clerk, that Scott was observed to lay aside that carelessness, not to say slovenliness, as to dress, which used to furnish matter for joking at the beginning of their acquaintance. He now did himself more justice in these little matters, became fond of mixing in general female society, and, as his friend expresses it, "began to set up for a squire of dames."

His personal appearance at this time was not unengaging. A lady of high rank, who well remembers him in the Old Assembly Rooms, says, "Young Walter Scott was a comely creature."¹ He had outgrown the sallowness of early ill health, and had a fresh brilliant complexion. His eyes were clear, open, and well set, with a changeful radiance, to which teeth of the most perfect regularity and whiteness lent their assistance, while the noble expanse and elevation of the brow gave to the whole aspect a dignity far above the charm of mere features. His smile was always delightful; and I can easily fancy the peculiar intermixture of tenderness and gravity, with playful innocent hilarity and humour in the expression, as being well calculated to fix a fair lady's eye. His figure, excepting the blemish in one limb, must in those days have been eminently handsome; tall, much above the usual standard, it was cast in the very mould of a young Hercules; the head set on with singular grace, the throat and chest after the truest model of the antique, the hands delicately finished; the whole outline that of extraordinary vigour, without as yet a touch of clumsiness. When he had acquired a little facility of manner, his conversation must have been such as could have dispensed with any exterior advantages, and certainly brought swift forgiveness for the one unkindness of nature. I have heard him, in talking of this part of his life, say, with an arch simplicity of look and tone, which those who were familiar with him can fill in for themselves—"It was a proud night with me when I first found that a pretty young woman could think it worth her while to sit and talk with me, hour after hour, in a corner of the ball-room, while all the world were capering in our view."

I believe, however, that the "pretty young woman" here specially alluded to, had occupied his attention before he ever appeared in the Edinburgh Assembly Rooms, or any of his friends took note of him as "setting up for a squire of dames." I have that their acquaintance began in the Greyfriars' church, where rain beginning to fall one Sunday as the congregation were dispersing, Scott happened to offer his umbrella the tender being accepted, so escorted the lady of his mantle to her residence, which proved to be at no great distance from his own.¹ To return from church together had, it is said, grown into something like a custom before they met in person. Mrs. Scott being of the party. It then appeared that the lady's mother had been companions in their youth, both living secludedly, they had scarcely seen each other many years; and the two matrons now renewed their intercourse. But no acquaintance appears to have existed between the fathers of the young people, until things had advanced in appearance farther than met the approbation of the Clerk to the Signet.

¹ The late Duchess Countess of Sutherland.

Unaware that the young lady — Margaret, daughter of the late Lord and Lady Jane Stuart Belches of Invermay, had a fortune of fortune far above his son's, Mr. Scott conceived it prudent to give her parents warning that he observed a degree of extravagance which, if allowed to go on, might involve the partition and disappointment. He had heard his son talk of a projected excursion to the part of the country in which the nobleman's estates lay, and not doubting that Walter's plan was different from that which he announced, introduced himself with a frank statement that he wished no such excursion to proceed, without the express sanction of those most interested in the happiness of persons as yet too young to calculate the consequences for themselves. — The northern Baronet had been apprised of the young apprentice's intended excursion, and had treated the whole business very lightly. He thanked Mr. Scott for his scrupulous attention — but added, that he was mistaken; and this paternal interference, which Walter did not hear of till long afterwards, produced no effect on his relations with the object of his growing attachment. Neither the power nor the wish to give in detail the particulars of this story. It is sufficient to say, at present, that Walter had through several years nourished the dream of an union with this lady, his hopes terminated in her marriage with the late Sir William Forbes, of Pitsligo, Baronet, a gentleman of the highest character, to whom some affectionate allusions occur in one of the greatest of his works, and who lived to act the part of a most generous friend to his early rival throughout the anxieties and distresses of 1826 and 1827. The actual dispersion of the romantic vision and its immediate consequences will be mentioned in due time.

¹ In one of his latest essays we read — "There have been instances of umbrellas being favourably received in England, when told under an shower, and in the middle of a shower." — Miscellaneous Prose Works, p. 390.

Redgauntlet shadows very distinctly many circumstances connected with the first grand step in the professional history of Alan Fairford. The real thesis, however, was on the Title of the Pandects, Concerning the disposal of the dead bodies of Criminds. It was dedicated (I doubt not by the careful father's advice) to his friend and neighbour in George's Square, Macqueen of Braxfield, Lord Justice-Clerk (or President of the Supreme Criminal Court) of Scotland. Darsie was present at Alan's "bit chack of dinner," and the old Clerk of the Signet was very joyous on the occasion.

I have often heard both Alan and Darsie laugh over their reminiscences of the important day when they "put on the gown." After the ceremony was completed, and they had mingled for some time with the crowd of barristers in the Outer Court, Scott said to his comrade, mimicking the air and tone of a Highland lass waiting at the Cross of Edinburgh to be hired for the harvest work — "We've stood here an hour by the Tron, hinny, and de'il a ane has speered our price." Some friendly solicitor, however, gave him a guinea fee before the Court rose; and as they walked down the High Street together, he said to Mr. Clerk, in passing a hosier's shop — "This is a sort of a wedding-day, Willie; I think I must go in and buy me a new night-cap." He did so accordingly; but his first fee of any consequence was expended on a silver taper-stand for his mother, which the old lady used to point to with great satisfaction, as it stood on her chimney-piece five-and-twenty years afterwards.

The friends had assumed the gown only the day before the Court of Session rose for the autumn vacation, and Scott appears to have escaped immediately afterwards to the familiar scenery of Kelso, where his kind uncle Robert, the retired East Indian Captain, had acquired the pretty villa of Rosebank, overhanging the Tweed. He had on a former occasion made an excursion into Northumberland as far as Flodden, and given, in a letter to Mr. Clerk, the results of a close inspection of that famous battle-field. He now induced his uncle to accompany him in another Northumbrian expedition, which extended to Hexham, where the grand Saxon Cathedral was ly studied. An epistle to Clark (Sept. 15) gives the picture in existence after returning from that trip. "I am coming about the country here, to speak more truly, as the saying is, long. Two old companions of mine, brethren of Mr Walker of Wooden, having come to the coast, we have renewed a great intimacy. As they were desirous to go to the opposite bank of the river, we have not a moment to lose, to which we concert a project of operations for the day. In the forenoon, with officers, and very intelligent young men, we set out, and of me our companions, have a trace of his grandeur. Yesterday forenoon we killed seven hares, and a number of quails, the time is with us. I have turned a keen and a doctor, though my success is not very great, and when walking through the bushes upon this strand, accompanied with the long gun, a pocket, musquito trousers, and a rough cap, I might well pass for one of my reprobated non-steoper passengers, Walter Linnthe man, or rather Willie w' the Boat. For about doors' improvement, I have constructed a seat in a large tree, which reads its branches horizontally over the road. This is a courtly situation of mine for research, especially in a day when the west wind rocks the branches on which I am perched, and the river rolls its waves below me of a tart and blood colour. I have, moreover, cut an embrasure, through which I can lie upon the gulls, herons, and cormorants, as they fly running past my seat. To crown the whole, I have carved an inscription upon it in the ancient Roman taste."

It was, however, within a few days after Scott's return from an excursion to Hexham, that he made another expedition of great importance to the history of his life. While attending the Michaelmas head court at Jedburgh, he was introduced to one Robert Shortreed, who spent the greater part of his life in the enjoyment of much respect as Sheriff-constable of West Lothian. Scott expressed his wish to visit the then wild and inaccessible district of Liddedale, particularly with a view to examine the ruins of the famous castle of Hermitage, and to pick up some of the ancient celtic ballads, said to be still preserved among the descendants of the men-travellers who followed the banner of the Douglases, when lords of that in and remote fastness, and his new acquaintance offered to be his guide.

During seven successive years he made a road, so he called it, into Liddedale, in company with Mr Shortreed, exploring every rivulet to its source, and every ruined peel from foundation to battlement. At this time no wheeled carriage had ever been seen in the district — the first, indeed, that ever appeared there was a gig, driven by Scott himself for a part of his way, when on the last of these seven excursions. There was no inn nor public-house of any kind in the whole valley; the travellers passed from the shepherd's hut to the minister's manse, and again from the cheerful hospitality of the manse to the rough and jolly welcome of the homestead; gathering, wherever they went, songs and tunes, and occasionally more tangible relics of antiquity — even such “a rowth of auld nicknackets” as Burns ascribes to Captain Grose. To these rambles Scott owed much of the materials of his “Minstrelsy of the Border ;” and not less of that intimate acquaintance with the living manners of these unsophisticated regions, which constitutes the chief charm of one of the most charming of his prose works. But how soon he had any definite object before him in his researches, seems very doubtful. “He was makin' himsell a' the time,” said Mr. Shortreed; “but he didna ken maybe what he was about till years had passed: At first he thought o' little, I dare say, but the queerness and the fun.”

“In those days,” says the Memorandum before me, “advocates were not so plenty — at least about Liddesdale;”¹ and the worthy Sheriff-substitute goes on to describe the sort of bustle, not unmingled with alarm, produced at the first farmhouse they visited (Willie Elliot's at Millburnholm, when the honest man was informed of the quality of one of his guests. When they dismounted, accordingly, he received the stranger with great ceremony, and insisted upon himself leading his horse to the stable. Shortreed accompanied Willie, however, and the latter, after taking a deliberate peep at Scott, “out by the edge of the door-check,” whispered, “Weel, Robin, I say, de'il hae me if I's be a bit feared for him now; he's just a chield like ourselves, I think.” Half-a-dozen dogs of all degrees had already gathered round “the advocate,” and his way of returning their compliments had set Willie at his ease.

According to Mr. Shortreed, this good-man of Millburnholm was the great original of Dandie Dinmont. As he seems to have been the first of these upland sheep-farmers that Scott ever knew, there can be little doubt that he sat for some parts of that inimitable portraiture; and it is certain that the James

¹ I am obliged to Mr. John Elliot Shortreed, for some memoranda of his father's conversations on this subject. I had, however, many opportunities of hearing Mr. Shortreed's stories from his own lips, having often been under his hospitable roof in company with Sir Walter, who, to the last, was his old friend's guest whenever business took him to Jedburgh.

Elliot, who carried the name of Dandie to his grave with him, and whose thoroughbred deathbed seems to hold in the eye of Guy Mannering, was first pointed out to Scott by Mr. Wood himself, several years after the novel had established the man's celebrity all over the Border, some accidental recollections of his tenacity, and their odd names, having alone been set to account in the tale. But I have the best reasons to give that the kind and manly character of Dandie, the gentle behaviour of his wife, and some at least of the most picturesque particularities of the morning at Charlestown, were taken up from Scott's observation, years after this period, of a party, with one of whose members he had, through the loss of his life, a close and affectionate connexion. To those who were familiar with him, I have perhaps already sufficiently indicated the early home of his dear friend William Lauder, being "the braes of Yarrow."

They dined at Millburnholm, and after having languished over Mr. Elliot's punch-bowl, until, in Mr. Shortree's phrase, they were "half glowing," mounted their steeds again, and rode to Dr. Elliot's at Cloughhead, where, as Mr. Shortree's memorandum, "folk were na very nice in those days": the travellers slept in one bed—as, indeed, seems to have been the case throughout most of their excursions in this district. Elliot had already a MS. collection of ballads, but he occupied himself, for several years, with redoubled diligence in bringing out the living depositories of such lore among the various recesses of the mountains. "The Doctor," says Mr. Shortree, "would have gone through fire and water for his art, when he once kenned him."

At morning they seem to have ridden a long way, for the express purpose of visiting one "auld Thomas o' Tarszele." Another Elliot, I suppose, who was celebrated for his pipe on the Border pipe, and in particular for being in possession of the real bill of Dick o' the Cow. Before starting, that is, at six o'clock, the ballad hunters had, "just to lay the steam," a devilled duck or two, and some London porter. Auld Thomas found them, nevertheless, well disposed for "breakfast" on their arrival at Tarszelehope, and this being over, he regaled them with one of the most hideous and unearthly of "specimens of 'riding music,'" and, moreover, with excellent libations of whisky-punch, manufactured in a certain wooden vessel, resembling a very small milk-pail, which he called Wisdom, because it "made" only a few spoonfuls of it. Though he had the art of replenishing it so adroitly, that it had been celebrated for fifty years as more fatal sobriety than any bowl in the parish. Having done due honour to Wisdom, they again mounted, and proceeded over moor and moor to some other equally hospitable master of the pipe. "Eh me!" says Shortreed, "sic an endless fund o' humour an' drollery as he then had wi' him! Never ten yards but we were either laughing or rouring and singing. Wherever we stopped, how brawlie he suited himsel' to everybody! He ay did as the lave did; never made himsel' the great man, or took ony airs in the company. I've seen him in a' moods in these jaunt, grave and gay, daft and serious, sober and drunk — (this, how ever, even in our wildest rambles, was but rare) — but, drunk or sober, he was ay the gentleman. He looked excessively heavy and stupid when he was fon, but he was never out o' gude-humour."

On reaching, one evening, some Charlie shope or other (I forget the name) among those wildernesses, they found a kindly reception as usual; but to their agreeable surprise, after some days of hard living, a measured and orderly hospitality as respected liquor. Soon after supper, at which a bottle of elder-berry wine alone had been produced, a young student of divinity, who happened to be in the house, was called upon to take the "big ha' Bible," in the good old fashion of Burns's Saturday Night; and some progress had been already made in the service, when the goodman of the farm, whose "tendency was soporific," scandalised his wife and the dominie by starting suddenly from his knees, and rubbing his eyes, with a stentorian exclamation of "By -----, here's the keg at last!" and in tumbled, as he spake the word, a couple of sturdy herdsmen, whom, on hearing a day before of the advocate's approaching visit, he had dispatched to a certain smuggler's haunt, at some considerable distance, in quest of a supply of rum brandy from the Solway Frith. The pious "exercise" of the household was hopelessly interrupted. With a thousand apologies for his hitherto shabby entertainment, this jolly Elliot, or Armstrong, had the welcome key mounted on the table without a moment's delay, — and gentle and simple, not forgetting the dominie, continued carousing about it until daylight streamed in upon the party. Sir Walter Scott seldom failed, when I saw him in company with his Liddesdale companion, to mimic the sudden outburst of his old host, on hearing the clatter of horses' feet, which he knew to indicate the arrival of the keg — the consternation of the dame — and the rueful despair with which the young clergyman closed the book.

It was in that same season, I think," says Mr. Spalding, "that Sir Walter got from Dr. Parrish the large red deer horn, which we may still see hanging in the arm-chamber at Oxford. How great he was when he was made master of it! I believe it had been found on Herbage's estate, one of the Doctor's servants had been employed to cut a grease-horn for his scythe, before he cut it off the tree. When cleaned out, it was found a very fine specimen of original chain, hoop, and mouth-piece of a scythe, and as you now see them." Sir Walter was on his way from Ladbroke to Chiddingfold, some 150 miles, like Johnny Trupin's letter, while I was sitting a pretty ant-hill but, which we had taken care packed up.

'The front of pride — a pride had he
A long nail gully hung down by his side,
And a great noble went horn to rest on his head.'

meikle and hair we rooted out, and 'hatched and blew, night and morn.' O what pleasant days! And there a' nonsense we had rest an' mairthing. We never put a sock for a week on end. I'll leave there were was indeed I think our bath-charges were a level some a' worn in the gangs' and counts' at his ardour, and it is a pity that we have no letters of Scott's describing rat and into Ladbroke, but as he must have left the Edinburgh very soon after its conclusion, he probably chose the leaves of his own tidings.

We have found, however, two note-books, inscribed "Walter 1792," containing a variety of scraps and hints which may be to fill up our notion of his private studies during that time. We have here a most miscellaneous collection, in which is whatever might have been looked for, with perhaps a single exception of original verse. One of the books agrees with "Feyta's Kotha, or The Descent of Odin, with the story of Thomas Bartholin, and the English poetical version of Gray, with some account of the death of Haldie, both translated in the Folia, and as handed down to us by the learned historians — Auctores Scythici Scand." The second, and the two versions, are then translated, and the original account appended, extending to seven closely-written pages, was, I doubt not, read before one or other of his big meetings. Next comes a page, headed "Description of Charles the First," and containing a transcript of a pt for some plate lent to the King in 1643. He then copies Langhorne's Owen of Carron; the verses of Canute, on passing Ely; the lines to a cuckoo, given by Warton as the oldest specimen of English verse; a translation, "by a gentleman in Devonshire," of the death-song of Regner Lodbrog; and the beautiful quatrain omitted in Gray's Elogy.

"There scattered oft, the earliest of the year," &c.

After this we have an Italian canzone on the praises of blue eyes (which were much in favour at this time); several pages of etymologies from Ducange; some more of notes on the Morte Arthur; extracts from the Books of Adjournd about Dame Janet Beaton, the Lady of Bransome of the Lay of the Last Minstrel, and her husband "Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, called Wicked Watt;" other extracts about witches and charms; various couplets from Hall's Satires; a passage from Allama; notes on the Second Sight, with extracts from Aulrey and Glanville; a "List of Ballads to be discovered or recovered;" extracts from Guerin de Montglave; and after many more similar entries, a table of the Meso-Gothic, Anglo-Saxon and Runic alphabets; — with a fourth section, headed Germana, but left blank.

In November 1792, Scott and Clerk began their regular attendance at the Parliament House, and Scott, to use Mr. Clerk's words, "by and by crept into a tolerable share of such business as may be expected from a writer's connexion." By this we are to understand that he was employed from time to time by his father, and probably a few other solicitors, in that dreary every-day taskwork, chiefly of long written informations, and other papers for the Court, on which young counsellors of the Scotch Bar were then expected to bestow a great deal of trouble for very scanty pecuniary remuneration, and with scarcely a chance of finding reserved for their hands any matter that could elicit the display of superior knowledge or understanding. He had also his part in the cases of persons suing in forma pauperis; but how little important those that came to his share were, and how slender was the impression they had left on his mind, we may gather from a note on Redgauntlet, wherein he signifies his doubts whether he really had ever been engaged in what he has certainly made the cause célèbre of Poor Peter Peebles.

But he soon became as famous for his powers of story telling among the lawyers of the Outer-House, as he had been among the companions of his High-School days. The place where these idlers mostly congregated was called, it seems, by a name which sufficiently marks the date — it was The Mountain. Here, as Roger North says of the Court of King's Bench in his early day, "there was more news than law;" — here hour after hour passed away, month after month, and year after year, in the interchange of light-hearted merriment among a circle of young men, more than one of whom, in after times, attained the highest honours of the profession. Among the most intimate of Scott's daily associates from this time, and during all his subsequent attendance at the Bar, were, besides various since eminent persons that have been already named, the first legal antiquary of our time in Scotland, Mr. Thomas Thomson, and William Erskine, afterwards Lord Kinnedder. Mr. Clerk remembers complaining one morning on finding the group convulsed with laughter, that Duns Scotus had been forestalling him in a good story, which he had communicated privately the day before — adding, moreover, that his friend had not only stolen, but disguised it. "Why," answered he, skilfully waving the main charge, "this is always the way with the Baronet.¹ He is continually saying that I change his stories, whereas in fact I only put a cocked hat on their heads, and stick a cane into their hands — to make them fit for going into company."

Some interest had been excited in Edinburgh as to the rising literature of Germany, by an essay of Mackenzie's in 1778, and a subsequent version of The Robbers, by Mr. Tytler (Lord Woodhouselee). About Christmas 1792, a German class was formed under a Dr. Willick, which included Scott, Clerk, Thomson, and Erskine; all of whom soon qualified themselves to taste the beauties of Schiller and Goethe in the original. This class contributed greatly to Scott's familiarity with Erskine; a familiarity which grew into one of the warmest and closest of his friendships. All the others above named, except Erskine, were by descent and connexion Whigs; and though politics never shook the affection of any of these early companions, the events and controversies of the immediately ensuing years could not but disturb, more or less, the social habits of young barristers who adopted opposite views on the French Revolution and the policy of Pitt. On such subjects Erskine entirely sympathised with Scott; and though in many respects, indeed in strength of mind and character, and in the general turn of opinion and manners, others of his contemporaries must always have seemed far more likely to suit Walter Scott. Erskine became, and continued during the brightest part of his life to be, the nearest and most confidential of all his Edinburgh associates. Nor can it be doubted that he exercised, at the active period we have now reached, a very important influence on his friend's literary tastes, and especially on his German studies. William Erskine was the son of an Episcopalian clergyman in Perthshire, of a good family, but far from wealthy. He had received his early education at Glasgow, where he was boarded under the roof of Andrew Macdonald, the author of Vimonda, who then officiated as minister to a small congregation of Episcopalian nonconformists. From this unfortunate but very ingenious man, Erskine had derived, in boyhood, a strong passion for old English literature, more especially the Elizabethan dramatists; which, however, he combined with a far livelier relish for the classics of antiquity than either Scott or his master ever possessed. From the beginning, accordingly, Scott had in Erskine a monitor who, entering most warmly into his taste for national lore—the life of the past—and the bold and picturesque style of the original English school—was constantly urging the advantages to be derived from combining with its varied and masculine breadth of delineation such attention to the minor graces of arrangement and diction as might conciliate the fastidiousness of modern taste. Directed, as Scott mainly was in the ultimate determination of his literary ambition, by the example of the great founders of the German drama and romance, he appears to have run at first no trivial hazard of adopting the extravagances, both of thought and language, which he found blended in their works with such a captivating display of genius, and genius employed on subjects so much in unison with the deepest of his own juvenile predilections. His friendly critic was just as well as delicate; and severity as to the mingled absurdities and vulgarities of German detail, commanded deliberate attention from one who admired not less enthusiastically than himself the sublimity and pathos of his new favourites.

¹ Duns Scotus was an old college-club nickname for Walter Scott, a tribute to his love of antiquities. Clerk was with the same set the Baronet, as belonging to the family of the Baronets of Pennyquick.

In March 1793, when the Court rose, he proceeded into Gallo-way, in order to make himself acquainted with the case of a certain Rev. Mr. M'Naught, minister of Girthon, whose trial, on charges of habitual drunkenness, singing of lewd and profane songs, dancing and toying at a penny wedding with a "sweetie wife" (that is, an itinerant vender of gingerbread, &c.), and, moreover, of promoting irregular marriages as a time of the year, and he had to be placed before the General Assembly in 1843.

The words of M'Naught's letter are, "I have been engaged in a study of the Bible, and I have found it to be a book of plain and simple truths, and I have been led to believe that it is the only book that should be read by all men."

In yet another letter, he writes, "I have been led to believe that the Bible is the only book that should be read by all men, and that it is the only book that should be read by all men."

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

He believed, as a young man, that he had found a new way of life, and he had found it in the Bible. He had found it in the Bible, and he had found it in the Bible.

"The tailor he, you here, I mean,
 And the weaver he, you here, I mean."

and, however, many and other used, and the evening ended with the Jacks.

Mr. M'Naught was deposed from the ministry. It is to be observed, that the research made with a view to degrading them cause, carried Scott for the first, and I believe for the last time, into the scenery of his Guy Mannering; and several of the names of the minor characters of the novel (M'Guffog, for example) appear in the list of witnesses.

If the preceding autumn forms a remarkable point in his history, as first introducing him to the manners of the wilder Border country, the summer which followed left traces of equal importance. He then visited some of the finest districts of Stirlingshire and Perthshire; and not in the perambulatory manner of his more boyish expeditions but taking up his residence for a week or ten days in succession at the family residences of several of his young allies of The Mounties, and from thence familiarising himself at leisure with the country and the people round about. In this way he lingered some time at Tullibody, the seat of the father of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and grandfather of his friend George Abercromby; and heard from the old gentleman's own lips the narrative of a journey which he had been obliged to make to the retreat of Rob Roy. The venerable laird told how he was received by the cateran "with much courtesy," in a cavern exactly such as that of Bean Lean; dined on collops cut from some of his own cattle, which he recognised hanging by their heels from the rocky roof beyond; and returned in all safety, after concluding a bargain of black-mail—in virtue of which annual payment, Rob Roy guaranteed the future security of his herds against, not his own followers merely, but all freebooters whatever. Scott next visited his friend Edmonstone, at Newton, a beautiful seat close to the ruins of the once magnificent Castle of Doune, and heard another aged gentleman's vivid recollections of all that happened there when John Home, the author of Douglas, and other Hanoverian prisoners, escaped from the Highland garrison in 1745. Proceeding towards the sources of the Teith, he was received for the first time under a roof which, in subsequent years, he regularly revisited, that of another of his associates, Buchanan, the young Laird of Cambusmore. It was thus that the scenery of Loch Katrine came to be so associated with "the recollection of many a dear friend and merry expedition of former days," that to compose the Lady of the Lake was "a labour of love, and no less so to recall the manners and incidents introduced."¹ It was starting from the same house, when the poem itself had made some progress, that he put to the test the practicability of riding from the banks of Loch Vennoch to the Castle of Stirling within the brief space which he had assigned to Fitz-James's Grey Bayard, after the duel with Roderick Dhu; and the principal land-marks in the description of that fiery progress are many hospitable mansions, all familiar to him at the same period:—Blairdrummond, the residence of Lord Kaim; Ochertyre, that of John Ramsay, the scholar and antiquary now best remembered for his kind and sagacious advice to Burns; and "the lofty brow of ancient Kier," the fine seat of the chief family of the name of Stirling; from which, to say nothing of remoter objects, the prospect has on one hand the peak of "Snowdon," and in front the field of Bannockburn.

¹ Introduction to The Lady.

Another resting place was Craighall, in Perthshire, the seat of the Rattrays, a family related to Mr. Clerk, who accompanied him. From the position of this striking place, as Mr. Clerk at once perceived, and as the author afterwards confessed to him, that of Tully-Veolan was faithfully copied; though in the description of the house itself, and its gardens, many features were adopted from Bruntisfield and Ravelstone. Mr. Clerk told me that he went through the first chapters of Waverley without more than a vague suspicion of the new novelist; but that when he read the arrival at Tully-Veolan, his suspicion was converted into certainty, and he handed the book to a common friend of his and the author's, saying, "This is Scott's—and I'll lay a bet you'll find such and such things in the next chapter." I hope to be forgiven for mentioning the circumstance that flashed conviction. In the course of a ride from Craighall, they had both become considerably fagged and fatigued, and Clerk, seeing the smoke of a clachan a little way before them, ejaculated—"How agreeable if we should here alight in with one of those signposts where a red lion predominates over a punch-bowl!" The phrase happened to tickle Scott's fancy—he often introduced it on similar occasions afterwards—and at the distance of twenty years Mr. Clerk was at no loss to recognise an old acquaintance in the "huge cairn" which "predominates" over the stone basin in the courtyard of Baron Bradwardine.

I believe the longest stay was at Meikle in Forfarshire, the seat of Patrick Murray of Simprim, whose passion for antiquities, especially military antiquities, had peculiarly endeared it both to Scott and Clerk. Here Adam Fergusson, too, was of the party; and I have often heard them each and all dwell on the thousand scenes of adventure and merriment which diversified that visit. In the village churchyard, close beneath Mr. Murray's gardens, tradition still points out the tomb of Queen Guenever; and the whole district abounds in objects of historical interest. Amidst them they spent their wandering days, while their evenings passed in the joyous festivity of a wealthy young bachelor's establishment, or sometimes under the roofs of neighbours less refined than their host, the Balmawhapples of the Braes of Augus. From Meikle they made a trip to Dunottar Castle, the ruins of the huge old fortress of the Earls Marischall, and it was in the churchyard of that place that Scott then saw for the first and last time Peter Paterson, the living Old Mortality. He and Mr. Walker, the minister of the parish, found the poor man refreshing the epitaphs on the tombs of certain Cameronians who had fallen under the oppressions of James the Second's brief insanity. Being invited into the manse after dinner to take a glass of whisky punch, "to which he was supposed to have no objections," he joined the minister's party accordingly; but "he was in bad humour," says Scott, "and, to use his own phrase, had no freedom for conversation. His spirit had been sorely vexed by hearing, in a certain Aberdonian kirk, the psalmody directed by a pitch-pipe or some similar instrument, which was to Old Mortality the abomination of abominations."

It was also while he had his headquarters at Meikle at this time, that Scott visited for the first time Glamis, the residence of the Earls of Strathmore, by far the noblest specimen of the real feudal castle, entire and perfect, that had as yet come under his inspection. What its aspect was when he first saw it, and how grievously he lamented the change it had undergone when he revisited it some years afterwards, he has recorded in one of the most striking passages of his Essay on Landscape Gardening.

The night he spent at the yet unprofaned Glamis in 1793 was, as he tells us in his Demonology, one of the "two periods distant from each other" at which he could recollect experiencing "that degree of superstitious awe which his countrymen call erie." "After a very hospitable reception from the late Peter Proctor, seneschal of the castle, I was conducted," he says, "to my apartment in a distant part of the building. I must own, that when I heard door after door shut, after my conductor had retired, I began to consider myself as too far from the living, and somewhat too near the dead," &c. But one of his notes on Waverley touches a certain not unimportant part of the story more distinctly; for we are there informed, that the silver bear of Tully-Veolan, "the poculum potatorium

the valiant baron," had its prototype at Glasgow—a mass of beaker of silver, double gilt, moulded into the form of a shield, the name and bearing of the Earls of Strathmore, and containing about an English pint of wine. "The author," he says, "ought perhaps to be ashamed of recording that he had the honour of swallowing the contents of the beaker—and the collection of the feat suggested the story of the Bear of Bawdland."

From this pleasant tour, so rich in its results he returned home in time to attend the autumnal assizes at Jedburgh, on which occasion he made his first appearance as counsel in a criminal case; and had the satisfaction of helping a veteran preacher sheep-stealer to escape through some of the meshes of the law. "You're a lucky scoundrel," Scott whispered to his client, when the verdict was pronounced—"I'm just a year out of jail," quoth the desperado, "and I'll send ye a washen [wash] the morn, man." I am not sure whether it was at these assizes or the next in the same town, that he had success in the case of a certain notorious housebreaker. The prisoner, however, was well aware that no skill could have baffled the clear evidence against him, and was, after his usual, successful for such exertions as had been made in his behalf, requested the young advocate to visit him once more before he left the place. Scott's curiosity induced him to accept this invitation, and his friend, as soon as they were alone together in the condemned cell, said—"I am very sorry, that I have no fee to offer you—so let me beg your acceptance of two bits of advice which may be useful perhaps when you come to have a house of your own. I am done with practice you are, and here is my legacy. Never keep a large dog out of doors—we can always silence them cheaply indeed if it be a dog, 'tis easier than whistling—but tie a tight yelping terrier within, and secondly, put no trust in a clever, gimcrack lock—the only thing that bothers a huge old heavy one, no matter how simple the construction,—and the ruder and rustier the key, so much the better for the housekeeper." I remember hearing him tell this some thirty years after at a Judges' dinner at Jedburgh, when he summed it up with a rhyme—"Ay, ay, my lord," (he named his friend Lord Meadowbank)—

"Yelping terrier, rusty key,
Was Walter Scott's best Jockhart fee."

The winter of 1793-4 appears to have been passed like the preceding one: the German class resumed their sittings; Scott spoke in his debating club on the questions of Parliamentary Reform and the Inviolability of the Person of the First Magistrate; his love-affair continued on the same footing as before; —and for the rest, like the young heroes in Redgauntlet, he “swept the boards of the Parliament House with the skirts of his gown; laughed, and made others laugh; drank claret at Bayle’s, Fortune’s, and Walker’s, and ate oysters in the Covenant Close.” On his desk “the new novel most in repute lay snugly intrinched beneath Stair’s Institute, or an open volume of Decisions;” and his dressing-table was littered with “old play-bills, letters respecting a meeting of the Faculty, Rules of the Speculative, Syllabms of Lectures — all the miscellaneous contents of a young advocate’s pocket, which contains everything but briefs and bank-notes.” His professional occupation was still very slender; but he took a lively interest in the proceedings of the criminal court, and more especially in those arising out of the troubled state of the public feeling as to politics.

In the spring of 1794 I find him writing to his friends in Roxburghshire with great exultation about the “good spirit” manifesting itself among the upper classes of the citizens of Edinburgh, and above all, the organisation of a regiment of volunteers, in which his brother Thomas was enrolled as a grenadier, while, as he remarks, his own “unfortunate infirmity” condemned him to be “a mere spectator of the drills.” In the course of the same year, the plan of a corps of volunteer light horse was started; and if the recollection of Mr. Skene be accurate, the suggestion originally proceeded from Scott himself, who certainly had a principal share in its subsequent success. He writes to his uncle at Rosebank, requesting him to be on the look-out for a “strong gelding, such as would suit a stalwart dragoon;” and intimating his intention to part with his collection of Scottish coins, rather than not be mounted to his mind. The corps, however, was not organised for some time; and in the meanwhile he had an opportunity of displaying his zeal in a manner which Captain Scott by no means considered as so respectable.

A party of Irish medical students began, towards the end of April, to make themselves remarkable in the Edinburgh Theatre, where they mustered in a particular corner of the pit, and lost no opportunity of insulting the Loyalists of the boxes, by calling for revolutionary tunes, applauding every speech that could bear a seditious meaning, and drowning the national them in howls and roarings. The young forces of the Parliament House resented this licence warmly, and after a succession of minor disturbances, the quarrel was put to the issue of a regular trial by combat. Scott was conspicuous among the juvenile advocates and solicitors who on this grand night assembled in front of the pit, armed with stout cudgels, and determined to have that man the King not only played without interruption, but sung in full chorus by both company and audience. The Irishmen were ready at the first note of the anthem. They rose, clapped on their hats, and brandished their shillelahs; a stern battle ensued, and after many a lead had been cracked, the lawyers at length found themselves in possession of the field. In writing to Simpson a few days afterwards, Scott says: "You will be glad to hear that the fair of Saturday passed over without any worse consequence to the Loyalists than that five, including your friend and humble servant (Colonel Groggy), have been bound over to the peace, and obliged to give bail for their good behaviour, which, you may believe, was easily found. The said Colonel had no less than three broken heads laid to his charge by as many of the Democrats." Sir Alexander Wood says: "Walter was certainly our Corypheus, and signalled himself splendidly in his desperate fray." After this exhibition of zeal, it will not perhaps surprise the reader of Scott's letters, to find him returning to Edinburgh from a remote ramble in the Highlands during the next autumn, on purpose to witness the execution of a traitor, who had been tried and condemned for his share in a plot for seizing the Castle, and proclaiming a provisional republican government. He expresses great contempt for the unhappy man's pusillanimous behaviour in his last scene, and soon after, on occasion of another formidable riot, he appears active among the special constables sworn in by the magistracy.

His rambles continued to give his father considerable vexation. Some sentences in a letter to his aunt, Miss Christian Atherton, may be worth quoting for certain allusions to this and other domestic matters. Mr. Scott, though on particular occasions he could permit himself, like Saunders Fawcett, to play the part of a good Amphytrion, was habitually ascetic in his habits. I have heard his son tell, that it was common with him, if any one observed that the soup was good, to taste it again, and say, — “Yes, it is too good, bairns,” and dash a tumbler of cold water into his plate. It is easy, therefore, to imagine with what rigidity he must have enforced the ultra-Catholic severities which marked, in those days, the yearly half-yearly retreat of the descendants of John Knox. Walter writes: — “I want the assistance of your eloquence to convince my honoured father that nature did not mean me either for a vagabond or travelling merchant, when she honoured me with the wandering propensity lately so conspicuously displayed. I saw Dr. R. yesterday, who is well. I did not choose to intrude upon the little lady, this being sermon week; for the same reason we are looking very religious and very sour at home. However, it is with some folk selon les règles, that in proportion as they are pure themselves, they are entitled to render uncomfortable those whom they consider as less perfect.”

This was Scott's nickname in a boyish club - derived, it is said, from a remarkable pair of Groggram breeches - but another etymon might have been claimed.

If his father had some reason to complain of want of ardour as to the weightier matters of the law, it probably gave him little consolation to hear, in June 1795, of his appointment to be one of the curators of the Advocates' Library, an office always reserved for those members of the Faculty who have the reputation of superior zeal in literary affairs. He had for colleagues David Hume, the Professor of Scots Law, and Malcolm Laing, the historian; and his discharge of his functions must have given satisfaction, for I find him further nominated, in March 1796, together with Mr. Robert Cay, — an accomplished gentleman, afterwards Judge of the Admiralty Court in Scotland — to “put the Faculty's cabinet of medals in proper arrangement.” From the first assumption of the gown, he had been accustomed to spend many of his hours in the low gloomy vaults under the Parliament House, which then formed the only receptacle for their literary and antiquarian collections. This habit, it may be supposed, grew by what it fed on. MSS. can only be consulted within the library, and his Highland and border raids were constantly suggesting inquiries as to ancient local history and legends, which could nowhere else have been pursued with equal advantage. He became an adept in the deciphering of old deeds; and whoever examines the rich treasure of the MacFarlan MSS., and others serviceable for the illustration of Scotch topography and genealogy, will, I am told, soon become familiar with the marks of his early pencil. His reputation for skill in such researches reached George Chalmers, the celebrated antiquary, then engaged in the preparation of his Caledonia. They met at

and a correspondence ensued which proved very useful to the veteran author. The border ballads, as they were collected, and numberless quotations from MSS. and printed books, were eagerly placed at his disposal.

I think, have been since he was indulging his voix during the autumn of 1788, that Mrs. Hacl and part of her family, who had just returned from Edinburgh, and entertained a party at Mr. Douglas's house, by reading William Taylor's then popular translation of the German ballad of Lenore. In the essay on Imitation of Pope, the reader has a full account of the interest which he took in it, and how, some weeks afterwards, a friend's representation of this performance, the anxiety with which he afterwards procured a copy of the original German, the delight with which he at length perused it, and how, having just been presented with some specimens of ballad poetry introduced into Lewis's translation of the Monk, he called to mind the early facility of mind in which he had lain so long in abeyance, and ventured to attempt his friend's rhymed translation of Lenore from his own German. The friend in question was Miss Crautoun, afterwards Mrs. Crautoun, the sister of George Crautoun, Esq. of Purgatall, the sister of George Crautoun,
 Esq. of Purgatall, the sister of George Crautoun,
 Esq. of Purgatall. He began the task, he tells us, after supper, and did not retire to bed until he had finished it, having thus worked himself into a state of excitement which he afterwards called defiance.

On the morning, before breakfast, he carried his MS. to Miss Crautoun, who was not only delighted but astonished at it, and soon sent a letter of hers to a friend in the country, in which she says — "Upon my word, Walter Scott is growing into a poet — something of a cross I think between Gray and Burns." The same day he read it also to Sir Alexander, who retains a vivid recollection of the high enthusiasm into which he had been exalted by such wild unearthly imagery of the German bard. "He said to me," says Sir Alexander, "in a very slow and solemn tone, and after we had said a few words about it, he continued to look at the fire silent and musing for some time, until he at length burst out with 'I wish to see you get a skull and two crossbones.'" Wood said, that he would accompany him to the house of John Bell, Esq. of Purgatall, a celebrated surgeon, he had no doubt this wish might be fulfilled. They went thither accordingly on the morrow.

Wood was himself the son of a distinguished surgeon in Edinburgh, and married one of the daughters of Sir W. Forbes of Purgatall — he was in the diplomatic service — and died in 1840.

stant; — Mr. Bell smiled on hearing the object of their visit, and pointing to a closet, at the corner of his library, bade Walter enter and choose. From a well-furnished museum of mortality, he selected forthwith what seemed to him the handsomest skull and pair of crossbones it contained, and wrapping them in his handkerchief, carried the formidable bundle home to George's Square. The trophies were immediately mounted on the top of his little bookcase; and when Wood visited him, after many years of absence from this country, he found them in possession of a similar position in his dressing-room at Abbotsford.

All this occurred in the beginning of April 1796. A few days afterwards Scott went to pay a visit at a country house, where he expected to meet the "lady of his love." Jane Anne Cranstoun was in the secret of his attachment, and knew, that however doubtful might be Miss Stuart's feeling on that subject, she had a high admiration of Scott's abilities, and often corresponded with him on literary matters; so, after he had left Edinburgh, it occurred to her that she might perhaps forward his views in this quarter, by presenting him in the character of a printed author. William Erskine being called in to her councils, a few copies of the ballad were forthwith thrown off in the most elegant style, and one, richly bound and blazoned, followed Scott in the course of a few days to the country. The verses were read and approved of, and Miss Cranstoun at least flattered herself that he had not made his first appearance in types to no purpose.¹

In autumn he saw again his favourite haunts in Perthshire and Forfarshire, — among others, the residence of Miss Stuart; and that his reception was not adequate to his expectations, may be gathered from some expressions in a letter addressed to him when at Montrose by his confidante, Miss Cranstoun: — "Dear Scott," — (she says) — "I bless the gods for conducting your poor dear soul safely to Perth. When I consider the wilds, the forests, the lakes, the rocks — and the spirits in which you must have whispered to their startled echoes, it amazeth me how you escaped. Had you but dismissed your little squire and Earwig [a pony], and spent a few days as Orlando would have done, all posterity might have profited by it; but to trot quietly away, without so much as one stanza to Despair — never talk to me of love again — never, never, never! I am dying for your collection of exploits. When return? In the meantime, Heaven speed you! Be and hope to the end."

¹ This story was told by the Countess of Purgstall on her death-bed to Captain Basil Hall. See his Schloss Hainfeld, p. 333.

affair in which Miss Cratoun took so lively an interest was now approaching its end. It was known, before it closed, that the lady of his vows had finally promised to his amiable rival, and, when the fact was announced, some of those who knew Scott the best, appear to have entertained very serious apprehensions as to the effect the disappointment might have upon his feelings. For one of these brothers of The Mountain wrote as follows to another of them, on the 12th October 1796. "Mr Scott marries Miss Stuart. This is not good news. I always thought there was some self-deception on the part of our friend, and I now shudder at the violence of his volatile and ungovernable mind. Who is it that says,
"We die, and worms have eaten them, but not for love." I hope sincerely it may be verified on this occasion."
He had, however, in all likelihood, digested his agony during his solitary rambles in the Highlands to which Miss Stuart's last letter alludes.

It is worth to recall here to the reader's memory the opening chapter of Peveril of the Peak, written twenty years after this youthful disappointment. "The general idea of love is formed for the first time, and felt most acutely, in a period seldom that at which there is much prospect of a happy issue. The state of artificial opposes many complicated obstructions to early marriage, and the chance is very great that such obstacles prove insurmountable. In fine, there are few men who do not look back to some period of their youth, at which a sincere early affection was repulsed, or betrayed, or became fruitless from opposing circumstances. It is these little passionate secrets which leave a tinge of romance in our minds, scarce permitting us, even in the most busy and advanced period of life, to listen with total indifference to the tale of true love."

As usual, against circumstances, Scott seems to have returned with renewed ardour to his literary pursuits, and on the 10th October 1796, he was "prevailed on," as he playfully expresses it, "by the request of friends, to indulge his curiosity, by publishing the translation of Lenore, with that of the Wild Huntsman, also from Burger, in a thin quarto."
The volume, which has no author's name on the title-page, was printed for Mannern and Miller of Edinburgh. His had owed his copy of Bürger to a young gentlewoman of high German blood, who in 1795 became the wife of his friend and chief Hugh Scott of Harden. She was daughter of Count Brühl of Martkirchen, long Saxon ambassador at the Court of St. James's, by his wife Almeria, Countess-Dowager of Egremont. The young kinsman was introduced to her soon after her arrival at Mertoun, and his attachment to German studies excited her attention and interest. The ballad of the Wild Huntsman appears to have been executed during the month that preceded his first publication; and he was thenceforth engaged in a succession of versions from the dramas of Meier and Iffland, several of which are still extant in his MS., marked 1796 and 1797. These are all in prose like their originals; but he also versified at the same time some lyrical fragments of Goethe, as, for example, the Morlachian Ballad, "What yonder glimmers so white on the mountain?" and the song from Claudina von Villa Bella. He consulted his friend at Mertoun on all these essays; and I have often heard him say, that among those many "obligations of a distant date which remained impressed on his memory, after a life spent in a constant interchange of friendship and kindness," he counted not as the least the lady's frankness in correcting his Scotticisms, and more especially his Scottish rhymes.

His obligations to this lady were indeed various; but I doubt, after all, whether these were the most important. He used to say, that she was the first woman of real fashion that took him up; that she used the privileges of her sex and station in the truest spirit of kindness; set him right as to a thousand little trifles, which no one else would have ventured to notice; and, in short, did for him what no one but an elegant woman can do for a young man, whose early days have been spent in narrow and provincial circles. "When I first saw Sir Walter," she writes to me, "he was about four or five and twenty, but looked much younger. He seemed bashful and awkward; but there were from the first such gleams of superior sense and spirit in his conversation, that I was hardly surprised when, after our acquaintance had ripened a little, I felt myself to be talking with a man of genius. He was most modest about himself, and shewed his little pieces apparently without any consciousness that they could possess any claim on particular attention. Nothing so easy and good-humoured as the way in which he received any hints I might offer, when he seemed to be tampering with the King's English. I remember particularly how he laughed at himself, when I him take notice that 'the little two dogs,' in some of es, did not please an English ear accustomed to 'the de dogs.'"

was thus the only person at Meriton who took a lively in his parents. Harden entered into all the feelings beautiful bride on this subject, and his mother, the hana Scott, daughter of the last Earl of Mar, lament, to less. She had conversed, in her early days, with the at ornaments of the cycle of Queen Anne, and preserved of anecdotes, well calculated to gratify the curiosity into the ambition of a young enthusiast in literature.
 hana soon appreciated the minister of the clan, and,
 ing to a remarkable age, she had the satisfaction of see-at the height of his eminence. The solitary person id give the author of Marmion personal reminiscences these friends, as well as in his Edinburgh circle, the anonymous volume found warm favour, Hughald Stewart, of Ochtertyre, and George Chalmers, especially people it great success. The many inaccuracies and awkward rhyme and diction to which Scott alludes in republishing ballads towards the close of his life, did not prevent ers of poetry from seeing that no one but a poet could confused the daring imagery of the German in a style bold, masculine, and full of life, but, wearied as all aders had been with that succession of Boney, Jackstrash which followed the appearance of the Reliques of Percy, the opening of such a new vein of popular as these verses revealed, would have been enough to lenient critics for inferior translations. Many, as we on, sent forth copies of the Lecture about the same time, ne of these might be thought better than Scott's in ar passages; but, on the whole, it seems to have been d acknowledged by those best entitled to judge, that he d the palm. Meantime, we must not forget that Scott d lost that very year the great poet Burns, — her glory shame. It is at least to be hoped that a general sentiself-reproach, as well as of sorrow, had been excited remature extinction of such a light; and, at all events, ceable to know that they who had watched his career a most affectionate concern, were among the first to promise of a more fortunate successor.

anticipations of these gentlemen, that Scott's versions attract general attention in the south, were not fulfilled

He himself attributes this to the contemporaneous appearance of so many other translations from Lenore. "I was coldly received," he says, "by strangers, but my reputation began rather to increase among my own friends; and on the whole I was more bent to shew the world that it had neglected something worth notice than to be affronted by its indifference; or rather, to speak candidly, I found pleasure in the literary labours in which I had almost by accident become engaged, and laboured less in the hope of pleasing others, though certainly without despair of doing so, than in pursuit of a new and agreeable amusement to myself."

In his German studies, Scott acquired, about this time, another assistant in Mr. Skene of Rubislaw—a gentleman considerably his junior, who had just returned to Scotland from a residence of several years in Saxony. Their fondness for the same literature, with Scott's eagerness to profit by his new acquaintance's superior attainment in it, opened an intercourse which general similarity of tastes, and I venture to add, in many of the most important features of character, soon ripened into the familiarity of a tender friendship—"An intimacy," Mr. Skene says, in a paper before me, "of which I shall ever think with so much pride—a friendship so pure and cordial as to have been able to withstand all the vicissitudes of nearly forty years, without ever having sustained even a casual chill from unkind thought or word." Mr. Skene adds—"During the whole progress of his varied life, to that eminent station which he could not but feel he at length held in the estimation, not of his countrymen alone, but of the whole world, I never could perceive the slightest shade of variance from that simplicity of character with which he impressed me on the first hour of our meeting."

Among the common tastes which served to knit these friends together, was their love of horsemanship, in which, as in all other manly exercises, Skene highly excelled; and the fears of a French invasion becoming every day more serious, their thoughts were turned with corresponding zeal to the project of mounted volunteers. "The London Light-horse had set the example," says Mr. Skene; "but in truth it was to Scott's ardour that this force in the North owed its origin. Unable, by reason of his lameness, to serve amongst his friends on foot, he had nothing for it but to rouse the spirit of the moustrooper, with which he readily inspired all who possessed the means of substituting the sabre for the musket." On the 14th February 1797, these friends and many more met and drew up to serve as a body of volunteer cavalry in Scotland, as accepted by Government. The organisation of the corps succeeded rapidly; they extended their offer to serve in all parts of the island in case of invasion, and this also being the whole arrangement was shortly completed, when Maitland of Rankenellor was elected Major-Commandant, William Rae of St. Catharine's, Captain, William Forbes Esq., and James Skene of Rubislaw, Cornets, Walter Haymaister, Quartermaster, and Secretary. But the duties thus devolved on Scott were found to interfere severely with his other avocations, and Colin Mackenzie more relieved him from those of paymaster.

"A part of quartermaster," says Mr Skene, "was purposely assigned to him, that he might be spared the rough usage of a soldier; but, notwithstanding his infirmity, he had a remarkable seat on horseback, and in all situations a fearless and intrepid figure. A veteran antiquary ever seemed too much for him, and his zeal and industry served to sustain the enthusiasm of the whole corps, and a ready 'mot à rire' kept up, in all, a degree of good humour and relish for the service, without which, the toil and fatigue of long daily drills would not easily have been supported by such a body of gentlemen. At every interval of the order, ad ad ease, was the signal for the quartermaster to lead the squadron to merriment, every eye was turned on 'Earl Walter,' as he was familiarly called by his associates of that date, and his ready joke seldom failed to produce the ready laugh. He took his full share in all the duties of the corps, had the highest pride in its discipline and proficiency, and was such a trooper himself, as his powerful frame of body and the warmest zeal in the world could have enabled any one to be. But his habitual cheerfulness was the great charm, and at the daily mess (formed together when in quarters) that reigned supreme. His favourite horse, the first charger, by the way, was a tall and powerful animal, named Lenore. These daily drills appear to have continued in during the spring and summer of 1797, the quartermaster residing moreover some weeks in quarters at Muncie. The majority of the troop having professional duties to attend to, the ordinary hour for drill was five in the morning. When we reflect, that after some hours of hard work in the day, Scott had to produce himself regularly in the House at least, with gown and wig, for the space of four hours at least, while his chamber practice, though still increasing, was on the increase — and that he had found a plenty ful source of new social engagements in his troop connexions — it certainly could have excited no surprise had his literary studies been found suffering total intermission during this busy period. That such was not the case, however, his correspondence and note-books afford ample evidence. His fee-book shows that he made by his first year's practice L.24, 3s.; by the second, L.57, 15s.; by the third, L.84, 4s.; by the fourth, L.90.; and in his fifth year at the Bar — that is, from November 1796 to July 1797 — L.144, 10s.; of which L.50 were fees from his father's chamber. He had no turn, at this time of his life, for early rising; so that the regular attendance at the morning drills was of itself a strong evidence of his military zeal; but he must have, in spite of them, and of all other circumstances, persisted in what was the usual custom of all his earlier life, namely, the devotion of the best hours of the night to solitary study. In general, both as a young man, and in more advanced age, his constitution required a good allowance of sleep, and he, on principle, indulged in it, saying, "he was but half a man if he had not full seven hours of utter unconsciousness;" but his whole mind and temperament were, at this period, in a state of most fervent exaltation, and spirit triumphed over matter.

CHAPTER III

the English Lakes - Miss Carpenter - Marriage - Lacowade Original Ballads - Monk Lewis - Poets of Herikshagen Loyden - James Hogg - James Hallantyne - Sherriffship of Dal
- Publication of the Ministry of the Border - 1807 - 1808

On the rising of the Court of Session in July 1797, Scott went on a tour to the English lakes, accompanied by his brother John and Adam Ferguson. Their first stage was Edinburgh in Tweeddale, then inhaled by his friend's father, a philosopher and historian, and they stayed there for a day in the course of which he had his first and only interview with David Ritchie, the original of his Black Dwarf.
Travelling southwards, the tourists visited Carlisle, Penrith, the vale of the Eamont, including Mayburgh and Brougham — Ulswater and Windermere, and at length fixed their quarters at the then peaceful and sequestered little watertown of Gilsland, making excursions from thence to the scenic scenes of romantic interest which are commemorated in the Bridal of Triermain, and otherwise leading very much of his life depicted among the loungers of St. Roman's.
Scott was, on his first arrival at Gilsland, not a little impressed with the beauty of one of the young ladies lodged under the same roof with him; and it was on occasion of a visit to her company to some part of the Roman Wall that he wrote his lines —

"Take these flowers which, purple waving,
On the ruin'd rampart grow," &c.

There was only a passing glimpse of flirtation. A week or two afterwards commenced a more serious affair.
One day with Ferguson, they met, some miles from Gilsland, a young lady taking the air on horseback, whom one of them had previously remarked, and whose appearance so instantly struck both so much, that they kept her in view till they had satisfied themselves that she also was one of the beauties of Gilsland. The same evening there was a ball, at which Captain Scott produced himself in his regimentals, and Fergusson also thought proper to be equipped in the uniform of the Edinburgh Volunteers. There was no little rivalry among the young travellers as to who should first get presented to the unknown beauty of the morning's ride; but though both the gentlemen in scarlet had the advantage of being dancing partners, their friend succeeded in handing the fair stranger to supper — and such was his first introduction to Charlotte Margaret Carpenter.

Without the features of a regular beauty, she was rich in personal attractions; “a form that was fashioned as light as a fay's;” a complexion of the clearest and lightest olive; eyes large, deep-set and dazzling, of the finest Italian brown; and a profusion of silken tresses, black as the raven's wing; her address hovering between the reserve of a pretty young Englishwoman who has not mingled largely in general society, and a certain natural archness and gaiety that suited well with the accompaniment of a French accent. A lovelier vision, as all who remember her in the bloom of her days have assured me, could hardly have been imagined; and from that hour the fate of the young poet was fixed.

She was the daughter of Jean Charpentier, of Lyons, a devoted royalist, who held an office under Government, and Charlotte Volere, his wife. She and her only brother, Charles Charpentier, had been educated in the Protestant religion of their mother, and when their father died, which occurred in the beginning of the Revolution, Madame Charpentier made her escape with her children first to Paris, and then to England, where they found a warm friend and protector in Arthur, the second Marquis of Downshire, who had, in the course of his travels in France, formed an intimate acquaintance with the family, and, indeed, spent some time under their roof. M. Charpentier had, in his first alarm as to the coming Revolution, invested L.4000 in English securities — part in a mortgage upon Lord Downshire's estates. On the mother's death, which occurred soon after her arrival in London, this nobleman took on himself the character of sole guardian to her children; and Charles Charpentier received in due time, through his interest, an appointment in the service of the East India Company, in which he had by this time risen to the lucrative situation of commercial resident at Salem. His sister was now making a little excursion, under the care of the lady who had superintended her education, Miss Jane Nicholson, a daughter of Dr. Nicholson, Dean of Exeter, and grand-daughter of William Nicholson, Bishop of Carlisle, well known as the editor of The English Historical Library." To some connexions which the learned prelate's family had ever since his time kept up in the diocese of Carlisle, Miss Carpenter owed the direction of her summer tour.

Scott's father was now in a very feeble state of health, which counts for his first announcement of this affair being made in a letter to his mother; it is undated;—but by this time the young lady had left Gilsland for Carlisle, where she remained until her destiny was settled. He says:—“My dear Mother,—I should very ill deserve the care and affection with which you have ever regarded me, were I to neglect my duty so far as to omit consulting my father and you in the most important step which I can possibly take in life, and upon the success of which my future happiness must depend. It is with pleasure I think that I can avail myself of your advice and instructions in an affair of so great importance as that which I have at present on my hands. You will probably guess from this preamble, that I am engaged in a matrimonial plan, which is really the case. Though my acquaintance with the young lady has not been of long standing, this circumstance is in some degree counterbalanced by the intimacy in which we have lived, and by the opportunities which that intimacy has afforded me of remarking her conduct and sentiments on many different occasions, some of which were rather of a delicate nature, so that in fact I have seen more of her during the few weeks we have been together, than I could have done after a much longer acquaintance, shackled by the common forms of ordinary life. You will not expect from me a description of her person—for which I refer you to my brother, as also for a fuller account of all the circumstances attending the business than can be comprised in the compass of a letter. Without saying into raptures, for I must assure you that my judgment as well as my affections are consulted upon this occasion—without saying into raptures, then, I may safely assure you, that her temper is sweet and cheerful, her understanding good, and, what I know will give you pleasure, her principles of religion very serious. I have been very explicit with her upon the nature of my expectations, and she thinks she can accommodate herself to the situation which I should wish her to hold in society as my wife, which, you will easily comprehend, I mean should neither be extravagant nor degrading. Her fortune, though partly dependent upon her brother, who is high in office at Madras, is very considerable—at present L.500 a-year.

This, however, we must, in some degree, regard as precarious — I mean to the full extent; and indeed, when you know her, you will not be surprised that I regard this circumstance chiefly because it removes those prudential considerations which would otherwise render our union impossible for the present. Betwixt her income and my own professional exertions, I have little doubt we will be enabled to hold the rank in society which my family and situation entitle me to fill. Write to me very fully upon this important subject — send me your opinion, your advice, and, above all, your blessing."

Scott remained in Cumberland until the Jedburgh assizes recalled him to his legal duties. On arriving in that town, he immediately sent for his friend Shortreed, whose Memorandum records that the evening of the 30th September 1797 was one of the most joyous he ever spent. "Scott," he says, "was sair beside himself about Miss Carpenter; — we toasted her twenty times over — and sat together, he raving about her, until it was one in the morning." He soon returned to Cumberland; and remained there until various difficulties presented by the prudence and prejudices of family connexions had been overcome. It appears that at one stage of the business he had seriously contemplated leaving the bar of Edinburgh, and establishing himself with his bride (I know not in what capacity) in one of the colonies. He attended the Court of Session as usual in November; and was married at Carlisle during the Christmas recess. I extract the following entries from the fly-leaf of his black-letter Bible: —

"Secundum morem majorum hæc de familiâ Gualteri Scott, Juriconsulti Edinensis, in librum hunc sacrum manu sua conscripta sunt.

"Gualterus Scott, filius Gualteri Scott et Annæ Rutherford, natus erat apud Edinam 15mo die Augusti A.D. 1771.

"Socius Facultatis Juridicæ Edinensis receptus erat 11mo die Julii, A.D. 1792.

*"In ecclesiam Sanctæ Mariæ apud Carlisle, uxorem duxit Margaretam Charlottam Carpenter, filiam quondam Joannis Charpentier et Charlottæ Volere, Lugdunensem 24to die Decembris 1797."*¹

¹ The account in the text of Miss Carpenter's origin has been, I am aware, both spoken and written of as an uncandid one: it had been expected that even in 1837 I would not pass in silence a rumour of early prevalence, which represented her and her brother as children of Lord Downshire by Madame Charpentier. I did not think it necessary to allude to this story while any of Sir Walter's own children were living; and I presume it will be sufficient for me to say now, that neither I, nor,

Scott carried his bride to a lodging in George Street, Edinburgh; a house which he had taken, not being quite prepared for her reception. The first fortnight was, I believe, sufficient to convince her husband's family that, however rashly he had formed the connexion, she had the sterling qualities of a wife. Notwithstanding some little leaning to the pomps and vanities of the world, she had made up her mind to find her happiness in better things; and so long as their circumstances continued narrow, no woman could have conformed herself to them with more of good feeling and good sense. I cannot fancy that her manners or ideas could ever have amalgamated very well with those of her husband's parents; but the feeble state of the old gentleman's health prevented her from seeing them constantly; and without any affectation of strict intimacy, they soon were, as always continued to be, very good friends. Anne Scott, the delicate sister to whom the Ashestiel Memoir alludes so tenderly, speedily formed a warm and sincere attachment for the stranger; but death, in a short time, carried off that interesting creature, who seems to have had much of her brother's imaginative and romantic temperament, without his power of controlling it.

Mrs. Scott's arrival was welcomed with unmingled delight by the brothers of The Mountain. The two ladies who had formerly given life and grace to their society, were both recently married. Scott's house in South Castle Street (soon after exchanged for one of the same sort in North Castle Street, which he purchased, and inhabited down to 1826) became now that Cranstoun's and Erskine's had been while their accomplished sisters remained with them. The officers of the Light Horse, too, established a club among themselves, supping once a week at each other's houses in rotation. The lady thus found a somewhat different, but both highly agreeable circles ready to receive her with cordial kindness; and the evening hours passed in a round of innocent gaiety, all the arrangements being conducted in a simple and inexpensive fashion, suitable to my belief, any one of them, ever heard either from Sir Walter, or from his wife, or from Miss Nicholson (who survived them both) the slightest hint as to the rumour in question. There is not an expression in the preserved correspondence between Scott, the young lady, and the Marquis, that gives it a shadow of countenance. Lastly, Lady Scott says kept hanging by her bedside, and repeatedly kissed in her dying moments, a miniature of her father which is now in my hands; and it is a well painted likeness of a handsome gentleman — but I am assured that its features have no resemblance to Lord Downshire or any of the Hill family.

to young people whose days were mostly laborious, and very few of their purses heavy. Scott and Erskine had always been fond of the theatre; the pretty bride was passionately so — and I doubt if they ever spent a week in Edinburgh without indulging themselves in this amusement. But regular dinners and crowded assemblies were in those years quite unthought of. Perhaps nowhere else could have been found a society on so small a scale including more of vigorous intellect, varied information, elegant tastes, and real virtue, affection, and mutual confidence. How often have I heard its members, in the midst of the wealth and honours which most of them in due season attained, sigh over the recollection of those humbler days, when love and ambition were young and buoyant — and no difference of opinion was able to bring even a momentary chill over the warmth of friendship.

In the summer of 1798 Scott hired a cottage at Lasswade, on the Esk, about six miles from Edinburgh. It is a small house, but with one room of good dimensions, which Mrs. Scott's taste set off to advantage at very humble cost — a paddock or two — and a garden (commanding a most beautiful view) in which Scott delighted to train his flowers and creepers. Never, I have heard him say, was he prouder of his handiwork than when he had completed the fashioning of a rustic archway, now overgrown with hoary ivy, by way of ornament to the entrance from the Edinburgh road. In this retreat they spent some happy summers, receiving the visits of their few chosen friends from the neighbouring city, and wandering at will amidst some of the most romantic scenery that Scotland can boast — Scott's dearest haunt in the days of his boyish ramblings. They had neighbours, too, who were not slow to cultivate their acquaintance. With the Clerks of Pennycuik, with Mackenzie the Man of Feeling, who then occupied the charming villa of Auchendinny, and with Lord Woodhouselee, Scott had from an earlier date been familiar; and it was while at Lasswade that he formed intimacies, even more important in their results, with the noble families of Melville and Buccleuch, both of whom have castles in the same valley.

“ Sweet are the paths, O passing sweet,
By Esk's fair streams that run,
O'er airy steep, thro' copsewood deep Impervious to the sun;

“ From that fair dome where suit is paid
By blast of bugle free,
To Auchendinny's hazel shade,
And haunted Woodhouselee.

“ Who knows not Melville’s beechy grove,
 And Roslin’s rocky glen ;
 Dalkeith, which all the virtues love,
 And classic Hawthornden ? ”

Other verse reminds us that

“ There the rapt poet’s step may rove ; ” —

It was amidst these delicious solitudes that he did produce pieces which laid the imperishable foundations of all his fame. It was here, that when his warm heart was beating with young and happy love, and his whole mind and spirit invigorated by new motives for exertion — it was here, that in the ripened glow of manhood he seems to have first felt something of his real strength, and poured himself out in those candid original ballads which were at once to fix his name.

It must, however, approach these more leisurely. When William Erskine was in London in the spring of this year, he happened to meet in society with Matthew Gregory Lewis, author of Hindon, whose romance of The Monk, with the ballads which it included, had made for him, in those barren days, a brilliant reputation. This good-natured fopling, the pet and darling of certain fashionable circles, was then busy with a miscellany which at length came out in 1801, under the title of Tales of Wonder, and was beating up in all quarters for contributions. Erskine shewed Lewis the versions of Leven and the Wild Huntsman; and when he mentioned that his cabinet had other specimens of the German diablerie in his portfolio, the collector anxiously requested that Scott might be engaged in his cause; — and he, who was perhaps at all times more disposed to hold popular favour as the surest test of literary merit, and who certainly continued through life to overestimate all talents except his own, considered this invitation a very flattering compliment. He immediately wrote to Lewis, placing whatever pieces he had translated and imitated from the German Volkslieder at his disposal.

In the autumn Lewis made a tour into the north; and Scott and Allan Cunningham, thirty years afterwards, that he might he had never felt such elation as when the “Monk” invited him to dine with him for the first time at his hotel. When he gazed on Burns in his seventeenth year, he had seen him enjoying, by general consent, the fame of a poet; and it is, whatever Scott might, on maturer consideration, think it his title to such fame, had certainly done him no small service; for the ballads of Alonzo the Brave, &c., had rekindled effectually in his breast the spark of poetical ambition. Lady Charlotte Campbell (now Bury), always distinguished by her passion for letters, was ready, "in pride of rank, in beauty's bloom," to do the honours of Scotland to the Lion of Mayfair and I believe Scott's first introduction to Lewis took place at one of her Ladyship's parties. But they met frequently, and, among other places, at Dalkeith — as witness one of Scott's marginal notes, written in 1825, on Lord Byron's Diary: — "Lewis was fonder of great people than he ought to have been, either as a man of talent or as a man of fashion. He had always dukes and duchesses in his mouth, and was pathetically fond of any one that had a title. You would have sworn he had been a parenuu of yesterday, yet he had lived all his life in good society. His person was extremely small and boyish — he was indeed the least man I ever saw, to be strictly well and neatly made. I remember a picture of him by Saunders being handed round at Dalkeith House. The artist had ingeniously flung a dark folding-mantle around the form, under which was half hid a dagger, a dark lantern, or some such cut-throat appurtenance; with all this the features were preserved and ennobled. It passed from hand to hand into that of Henry, Duke of Buccleuch, who, hearing the general voice affirm that it was very like, said aloud, 'Like Mat Lewis! Why that picture's like a MAN!' He looked, and lo, Mat Lewis's head was at his elbow."

Lewis spent a day or two with Scott at Musselburgh, where the yeomanry corps were in quarters. Scott received him in his lodgings, under the roof of an ancient dame, who afforded him much amusement by her daily colloquies with the fish-women — the Mucklebuckets of the place. His delight in studying the dialect of these people is well remembered by the survivors of the cavalry, and must have astonished the stranger dandy. While walking about before dinner on one of these days, Mr. Skene's recitation of the German Kriegslied, "Der Abschied's Tag ist da" (the day of departure is come), delighted both Lewis and the Quarter-Master; and the latter produced next morning that spirited little piece in the same measure, which, embodying the volunteer ardour of the time, was forthwith adopted as the troop-song of the Edinburgh Light-Horse.

In January 1799, Mr. Lewis appears negotiating with a bookseller, named Bell, for the publication of Scott's version of Goethe's Tragedy, "Goetz von Berlichingen of the Iron Hand." Bell seems finally to have purchased the copyright for twenty-five guineas, and twenty-five more to be paid in case of a section—which was never called for until long after the light had expired. Lewis writes, “I have made him misunderstood, that, if you accept so small a sum, it will be because this is your first publication;” the tiny ad in 1796 had been completely forgotten. The Goetz sold accordingly, with Scott's name on the title-page, in the following February.

LADY SCOTT.

In March 1799, he carried his wife to London, this being the first time that he had seen the metropolis since the days of his youth. The acquaintance of Lewis served to introduce him into the literary and fashionable society, with which he was well acquainted; but his great anxiety was to examine the ruins of the Tower and Westminster Abbey, and to make searches among the MSS. of the British Museum. He is by Scott's Goetz spoken of favourably, on the whole, by the public of the time; but it does not appear to have attracted much attention. The truth is, that, to have given Goethe a fair chance with the English public, his first play ought to have been translated at least ten years before the translators had been more fortunate than the master, and the Waverley, which constitutes one of the landmarks in the history of German literature, had not come even into Scott's mind until he had familiarised himself with the ideas which had been opened, in the puny mimics of writers already forgotten. He readily discovered the vast gulf which separated him from the German dramatists on whom he had hitherto been employing himself; but the public in general drew no distinctions, and the English Goetz was soon after condemned to oblivion, through the unsparring ridicule which was heaped on whatever bore the name of German play, by the able caricature of The Rovers.

The tragedy of Goethe, however, has in truth nothing to do with the wild absurdities against which Canning and Keble riddled the arrows of their wit. It is a broad, bold, free, and picturesque delineation of real characters, manners, and customs; the first fruits, in a word, of that passionate admiration for Shakspeare, to which all that is excellent in the imaginative literature of Germany must be traced. What delight must Scott have found the scope and colour of our Elizabethan drama revived on a foreign stage at the hands of a real master!—with what double delight must he have seen the same scenes, incidents, and transactions, all claiming to be original, and mixed with those that had from boyhood formed the chosen theme of his own sympathy and reflexion! In the baronial robbers of the Rhine, stern, bloody, and rapacious, but frank, generous, and, after their fashion, courteous—in their forays upon each other's domains, the besieged castles, the plundered herds, the captive knights, the browbeaten bishop, and the baffled liege-lord, who vainly strove to quell all these turbulences—Scott had before him a vivid image of the life of his own and the rival Border clans, familiarised to him by a hundred nameless minstrels. If it be doubtful whether, but for Percy's Reliques, he would ever have thought of editing their Ballads, I think it not less so, whether, but for the Ironhanded Goetz, it would ever have flashed upon his mind, that in the wild traditions which these recorded, he had been unconsciously assembling materials for more works of high art than the longest life could serve him to elaborate.

He executed about the same time his "House of Aspen," rather a rifacimento than a translation from one of the minor dramatists that had crowded to partake the popularity of Goetz. It also was sent to Lewis in London, where, having been read and commended by the celebrated actress, Mrs. Esten, it was taken up by Kemble, and I believe actually put in rehearsal for the stage. If so, the trial did not encourage further preparation, and the notion was abandoned. Discovering the play thirty years after among his papers, Scott sent it to the Keepsake of 1829. In the advertisement he says, "He had lately chanced to look over these scenes with feelings very different from those of the adventurous period of his literary life during which they were written, and yet with such, perhaps, as a reformed libertine might regard the illegitimate production of an early amour." He adds, "there is something to be ashamed of, certainly; but, after all, paternal vanity whispers that the child has some resemblance to the father." The scenes are interspersed with some lyrics, the numbers of which, at least, are worthy of attention. One has the metre—and not a little of the spirit—of the boat-song of Clan-Alpin:—

"Joy to the victors, the sons of old Aspen, Joy to the race of the battle and scar!" &c. &c.

His return to Edinburgh was accelerated by the tidings of his father's death. This worthy man had had a succession of paralytic attacks, under which, mind as well as body had by degrees been laid quite prostrate. When the first Chronicles of the Canongate appeared, a near relation of the family said to me—"I had been out of Scotland for some time, and did now of my good friend's illness until I reached Edinburgh a few months before his death. Walter carried me to him, and warned me that I should see a great change. I saw the very scene that is here painted of the elder Croft's sickroom — not a feature different — poor Anne Scott, gentlest of creatures, was treated by the fretful patient exactly like this niece." I have lived to see the curtain rise once more on a like scene.

Thomas Scott continued to manage his father's business. He married early; ¹ he was in his circle of society extremely popular; and his prospects seemed fair in all things. The property left by the old gentleman was less than had been expected, but sufficient to make ample provision for his widow, and a not inconsiderable addition to the resources of those to whom the remainder was divided.

Thomas's mother and sister, both much exhausted with their long illness, lay out on a protracted sickbed, and the latter already in the last stage of the malady which in two years more carried her to her grave, spent the greater part of the following winter and autumn in his cottage at Lasswade. There he was again labouring assiduously in the service of Lewis's "Goblin repast;" and in an essay of 1830, he gives us sufficient specimens of the Monk's Editorial Letters to his contributors, and the lectures of a "martinet in rhymes and numbers — not enough, but useful eventually, as forcing on a young man a needless versifier criticisms absolutely necessary to his success." As to his imperfect rhymes of this period, I do not doubt he owed them to his recent zeal about collecting ballads of the Border. He had, in his familiarity with compositions so remarkable for merits of a higher order, ceased to be offended, as in the days of his devotion to Langhorne's "Cockle he would probably have been, with their loose and careless assonances, which are often, in fact, not rhymes at all; but pardonable enough in real minstrelsy, meant to be sung by moss-troopers with the accompanying tones of the bagpipe, but certainly not worthy of imitation in verses written for the eye of a polished age. Of this carelessness as to the quality of his verse, we see little or nothing in our few specimens of his work, and it does not occur, to any extent that has ever attracted worth notice, in his great works.

Thomas Scott, born Miss Macculloch of Ardwell, was one of the wisest, and most agreeable women I have ever known. She was distinguished by a motherly affection for all Sir Walter's family — and she survived him. She died at Canterbury in April 1848, aged 72.

But Lewis's collection did not engross the leisure of this summer. It produced also what Scott justly calls his "first serious attempts in verse;" and of these, the earliest appears to have been the Glennfinlas. Here the scene is laid in the most favourite district of his favourite Perthshire Highlands; and the Gaelic tradition on which it is founded was far more likely to draw out the secret strength of his genius, as well as to arrest the feelings of his countrymen, than any subject with which the stores of German diablerie could have supplied him. It has been alleged, however, that the poet makes a German use of his Scottish materials; that the legend, as briefly told in the simple prose of his preface, is more affecting than the lofty and sonorous stanzas themselves; that the vague terror of the original dream loses, instead of gaining, by the expanded elaboration of the detail. There may be something in these objections: but no man can pretend to be an impartial critic of the piece which first awoke his own childish ear to the power of poetry and the melody of verse.

The next of these compositions was, I believe, the Eve of St. John, in which Scott re-peoples the tower of Smailholm, the awe-inspiring haunt of his infancy; and here he touches, for the first time, the one superstition which can still be appealed to with full and perfect effect; the only one which lingers in minds long since weaned from all sympathy with the machinery of witches and goblins. And surely this mystery was never touched with more thrilling skill than in that noble ballad. It is the first of his original pieces, too, in which he uses the measure of his own favourite Minstrels; a measure which the monotony of mediocrity had long and successfully been labouring to degrade, but in itself adequate to the expression of the highest thoughts, as well as the gentlest emotions; and capable, in fit hands, of as rich a variety of music as any other of modern times. This was written at Mertoun-house in the autumn of 1799. Some dilapidations had taken place in the tower of Smailholm, and Harden, being informed of the fact, and entreated with needless earnestness by his kinsman to arrest the hand of the spoiler, requested playfully a ballad, of which Smailholm should be the scene, as the price of his assent.

Then came The Grey Brother, founded on another superstition, which seems to have been almost as ancient as the belief in ghosts; namely, that the holiest service of the altar cannot go on in the presence of an unclean person—a heinous sinner unconfessed and unabsolved. The fragmentary form of this greatly heightens the awfulness of its impression, and its structure and metre, the verses which really belong to it, may appear to me the happiest that have ever been produced expressly in imitation of the ballad of the middle age. The stanzas, previously quoted, on the scenery of the Esk, are beautiful in themselves, and however interesting now, making the locality of the composition, he must be allowed to have lapsed into another strain, and produced a poem, per se, which interferes with and mars the general texture. He wrote at the same period the fine chivalrous ballad on The Fire-King, in which there is more than enough to make us forgive the machinery.

It was in the course of this autumn that he first visited Bothwell Castle, the seat of Archibald Lord Douglas, who had married Lady Frances Scott, sister to Henry Duke of Buccleuch, and whose many amiable virtues were combined with an extraordinary strength of mind, and who had, from the first notice of the young poet at Dalkeith, formed high anticipations of his future career. Lady Douglas was one of his friends through life; and now, under her roof, he made an acquaintance (begun also at Dalkeith) with one whose talents and accomplishments not less qualified her to estimate him, and who still survives to lament the only event that could have interrupted their cordial confidence — Lady Isabella Stuart, daughter of the celebrated John Earl of Bute. These ladies, united by the same ties of mind, feeling, and affection, he visited the scenes the noblest and most interesting that all Scotland could show — alike famous in history and romance; and he was willing to make Bothwell and Blantyre the subject of a new ballad; of which, however, only a first and imperfect sketch has been recovered.

On the morning, during his visit to Bothwell, was spent on an excursion to the ruins of Craignethan Castle, the seat, in former times, of the great Evandale branch of the house of Hamilton, and now the property of Lord Douglas; and the poet expressed a peculiar pleasure in the view, and the beauty of the nature with the scenery, that his hosts urged him to accept, for the remainder of his lifetime, the use of a small habitable house, situated within the circuit of the ancient walls. This offer was at first declined; but circumstances occurred before the close of the year which rendered it impossible for him to establish a permanent summer residence in Lanarkshire. The castle of Craignethan is the original of his "Tillicudlem."

The note-book of this year has supplied the recent editions of his works with several other ballads in an incomplete state notwithstanding all these varied essays, and the charms he distinguished society into which his reputation had already introduced him, his friends do not appear to have as yet retained the slightest notion that literature was to be the business of his life. A letter of one very early correspondent, Mr. Kerr of Abbotrude, congratulates him on his having more to do at the autumnal assizes of Jedburgh this than on any former occasion, which intelligence he seems to have communicated with no feeble expressions of satisfaction. "I greatly enjoy this," says Kerr. "Go on; and with your strong sense and hourly ripening knowledge, that must rise to the top of the tree in the Parliament House in season, I hold as certain as that Murray died Lord Mansfield. But don't let many an Ovid,¹ or rather many a Burns (which is better), be lost in you. I rather think men of business have produced as good poetry in their by-hours as the best of the regulars; and I don't see any sufficient reason why President Scott should not be a famous poet (in the vacant time), when we have seen a President Montesquieu step so far beyond the trammels in the Esprit des Loix. I suspect you would have been a happier man had he had your profession. The reasoning talents visible in his verses, assure me he would have ruled in Westminster Hall as easily as he did at Button's, and he might have found time enough besides for everything that one really honours his memory for." This letter appears to have entertained, in October 1799, the very notion as to the profession of literature on which Scott acted through his life.

Having again given a week to Liddesdale, in company with Shortreed, he spent a few days at Rosebank, and was preparing to return to Edinburgh for the winter, when he received a letter which had consequences of importance.

In the early days of Launcelot Whale, he had had for a fellow Mr. James Ballantyne, the eldest son of a decent tradesman in Kelso, and their acquaintance had never been either broken off, as Scott's visits to Rosebank were frequent, and the other had resided for a time in Edinburgh, when pursuing his education with a view to the profession of a solicitor. Mr. Ballantyne had not been successful in his attempts to establish himself in that branch of the law, and was now the proprietor and editor of a weekly newspaper in his native town. He called at Rosebank one morning, and requested his old acquaintance to supply a few paragraphs on some legal question the day for his Kelso Mail. Scott complied; and carrying the article himself to the printing-office, took with him also one of his recent pieces, designed to appear in Lewis's Collection. With these, especially, as his Memorandum says, the "Morlachian fragment after Goethe," Ballantyne was charmed, and he expressed his regret that Lewis's book was so long in appearing. Scott talked of Lewis with rapture; and, after reading some of his stanzas, said — "I ought to apologise to you for having troubled you with anything of my own when I had things like this for your ear." — "I felt at once," says Ballantyne, "that his own verses were far above what Lewis could ever do, and though, when I said this, he dissented, yet he seemed pleased with the warmth of my approbation." At parting, Scott threw out a casual observation, that he wondered his old friend did not try to get some little booksellers' work, to keep his types in play during the rest of the week." Ballantyne answered, that such an idea had not before occurred to him — that he had no acquaintance with the Edinburgh trade; "but, if he had, his types were good, and he thought he could afford to work more cheaply than town-printers. Scott, "with his good-humoured smile," said, — "You had better try what you can do. You have been praising my little ballads; suppose you print off a dozen copies or so of as many as will make a pamphlet, sufficient to let my Edinburgh acquaintances judge of your skill for themselves." Ballantyne consented; and I believe exactly twelve copies of William and Helen, The Fire-King, The Chase, and a few more of those pieces, were thrown off accordingly, with the title (alluding to the long delay of Lewis's Collection) of "Apology for Tales of Error — 1799." This first specimen of a press, afterwards so celebrated, pleased Scott; and he said to Ballantyne — "I have been for years collecting old Border ballads, and I think I could, with little trouble, put together such a selection from them as might make a neat little volume, to sell for four or five shillings. I will talk to some of the booksellers about it when I get to Edinburgh, and if the thing goes on, you shall be the enterpriser." Ballantyne highly relished the proposal; and the result of this little experiment changed wholly the course of his worldly fortunes, as well as of his friend's.

¹How sweet an Ovid, Murray was our boast;
How many Martials were in Pult'ney lost. — Dunciad, iv. 170.

Mr. Ballantyne, after recounting this conversation, says: — "I do not believe that even at this time he seriously contemplated giving himself much to literature;" but I think a letter addressed to Ballantyne, in the following April, affords considerable reason to doubt the accuracy of this impression. Scott there states, that he and another acquaintance of the printer's had been consulting together as to the feasibility of "no less than a total plan of migration from Kelso to Edinburgh;" and proceeds to say, that, in his opinion, there was then a very favourable opening in Edinburgh for a new printing establishment, conducted by a man of talent and education. He mentions—besides the chance of a share in the printing of law-papers—firstly, a weekly newspaper of the higher class; secondly, a monthly magazine; and thirdly, an annual register, as undertakings all likely to be well received; suggests that the general publishing trade itself was in a very languid condition; and ends with a hint that "pecuniary assistance, if wanted, might (no doubt) be procured on terms of a share, or otherwise." The coincidence of most of these air-drawn schemes with things afterwards realised, is certainly very striking. At the same time, between October 1799 and April 1800, there had occurred a change in Scott's personal affairs very likely to have strengthened, if not originated the design, which Ballantyne did not believe him to have seriously entertained at the time of their autumnal interview.

Shortly after the commencement of the Winter Session, the office of Sheriff-depute of Selkirkshire became vacant by the death of an early ally of Scott's, Andrew Plummer of Middlestead, a scholar and antiquary, who had entered with zeal into his ballad researches, and whose name occurs accordingly more than once in the notes to the Border Minstrelsy. Perhaps the community of their tastes may have had some part in suggesting to the Duke of Buccleuch, that Scott might fitly succeed Mr. Plummer in the magistrature. Be that as it might, his Grace's influence was used with Mr. Henry Dundas (afterwards Viscount Melville) who in those days had the general control of the Crown patronage in Scotland, and was prepared to look favourably on Scott's pretensions to some office of this description. Though neither the Duke nor this able Minister were at all addicted to literature, they had both seen him frequently under their own roofs, and been pleased with his manners and conversation; and he had by this time come to be on terms of affectionate intimacy with some of the younger members of either family. The Earl of Dalkeith (afterwards Duke Charles of Buccleuch), and his brother Lord Montagu, both participating with kindred ardour in the military patriotism of the period, had been thrown into his society under circumstances well qualified to ripen acquaintance into confidence.

Dundas, eldest son of the Minister, had been one of his companions in the High School, and he was always a lively partaker in the business of the academy. He had, last not least, Scott always remembered with grateful strong intercession on this occasion of 1790. Mr. Dundas, Robert Dundas of Arncliffe, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Dundas, and William Dundas, then Secretary to the Board of Control.

Appointment to the Sheriffship bears date 1790. It secured him an annual salary of £1000, and to his resources which at once released him from every degree of anxiety he might have felt in respect of an increasing family, along with the extraneous chances of a profession, in the daily budget of which it is possible to suppose that he ever could have formed a wish. The duties of the office were far from being a large, small, peaceful, and pastoral, was so great, and the of the Duke of Buccleuch, and he turned with zeal to his project of editing the Ballads which of the which belonged to this very district. It is thus that those "tales" which, as the Book of the Month expresses it, had "in older times decorated the parlours of the halls" of his noble patron's ancestors.

ound able assistants in the completion of his design. Heber (long Member of Parliament for the University of Edinburgh) happened to spend this winter in Edinburgh, and he, as his talents and accomplishments reflected, by the cultivated society of the place. At the same time, his various learning, particularly his profound knowledge of the literary monuments of the middle ages, some of which, by the close alliance, the stores of his library, extensive, were freely laid open, and his own suggestions were not less valuable. But through his constant maintenance with a person still more qualified to give aid in this undertaking. Few who read these pages acquainted with the leading facts in the history of Scotland. Few can need to be reminded that it was a man, born in a shepherd's cottage in one of the valleys of Roxburghshire, and of course a most uneducated, had, before he attained his majority, founded the doctors of Edinburgh by the judicious acquisitions in almost every department of science, had set the extremest january of other nations, and had never been conscious that it could be regarded as a bar; for bread and water, and access to books and lectures, comprised all within the bounds of his wishes; and thus he toiled and battled at the gates of science after science, until his unconquerable perseverance carried everything before it; and yet with this monastic abstemiousness and iron hardness of will, perplexing those about him by manners and habits in which it was hard to say whether the cross-trooper or the schoolman of former days most prevailed, he was at heart a poet.

Archibald Constable, in after life one of the most eminent of British publishers, was at this period the keeper of a small book-shop, into which few but the poor students of Leyden's order had hitherto found their way. Heber, in the course of his bibliomaniacal prowlings, discovered that it contained some of which were already the Delilahs of his imagination; and, moreover, that the young bookseller had himself a strong taste for such charmers. Frequenting the place, accordingly, he observed with some curiosity the countenance and gestures of another daily visitant, who came not to purchase, evidently, but to pore over the more recondite articles—often balanced for hours on a ladder with a folio in his hand like Dominic Sampson. The English virtuoso was on the look-out for any books or MSS. that might be of use to the editor of the projected “Minstrelsy,” and some casual colloquy led to the discovery that this new stranger was, amidst the endless labyrinth of his lore, a master of legend and tradition—an enthusiastic collector and skilful expounder of these very Border ballads. Scott heard with much interest Heber's account of his odd acquaintance, and found, when introduced, the person whose initials, affixed to a series of pieces in verse, chiefly translations from Greek, Latin, and the northern languages, scattered, during the last three or four years, over the pages of the “Edinburgh Magazine,” had often much excited his curiosity, as various indications pointed out the Scotch Border to be the native district of this unknown “J. I.”

“The small old volumes, dark with tarnished gold,”

These new friendships led to a great change in Leyden's position, purposes, and prospects. He was presently received into the best society of Edinburgh, where his uncountness of demeanour does not seem to have at all interfered with the general appreciation of his genius, his endowments, and amiable virtues. Fixing his ambition on the East, where he hoped to rival the achievements of Sir William Jones, he at length, about the beginning of 1802, obtained the promise of some literary appointment in the East India Company's service; but when the time drew near, it was discovered that the patronage of the season had been exhausted, with the exception of one surgeon-assistant's commission — which had been with difficulty secured for him by Mr. William Dundas; who, moreover, was obliged to inform him, that if he accepted it, he must be qualified to pass his medical trials within six months. This news, which would have crushed any other man's hopes to the dust, was only a welcome fillip to the ardour of Leyden. He at the same hour grappled with a new science in full confidence that whatever ordinary men could do in three or four years, his energy could accomplish in as many months; took his degree accordingly in the beginning of 1803, having just before published his beautiful poem, The Scenes of Infancy; sailed to India; raised for himself, within seven short years, the reputation of the most marvellous of Orientalists; and died, in the midst of the proudest hopes, at the same age with Burns and Byron, in 1811.

But to return: — Leyden was enlisted by Scott in the service of Lewis, and immediately contributed a ballad, called The Elf-King, to the Tales of Terror. Those highly-spirited pieces, the Cout of Keeldar, Lord Soulis, and The Mermaid, were furnished for the original department of Scott's own collection: and the Dissertation on Fairies, prefixed to its second volume, "although arranged and digested by the editor, abounds with instances of such curious reading as Leyden only had read, and was originally compiled by him;" but not the least of his labours was in the collection of the old ballads themselves. When he first conversed with Ballantyne on the subject of the proposed work, and the printer signified his belief that a single volume of moderate size would be sufficient for the materials, Leyden exclaimed — "Dash it, does Mr. Scott mean another thin thing like Goetz of Burlichingen? I have more than that in my head myself: we shall turn out three or four such volumes at least." He went to work stoutly in the realisation of these wider views. "In this labour," says Scott, "he was equally interested by friendship for the editor, and by his own patriotic zeal for the honour of the Scottish borders; and both may be judged of from the following circumstance. An interesting fragment had been obtained of an ancient historical ballad; but the remainder, to the great disturbance of the editor and his coadjutor, was not to be recovered. Two days afterwards, while the editor was sitting with some company after dinner, a sound was heard at a distance like that of the whistling of a tempest through the torn rigging of the vessel which scuds before it. The sounds increased as they approached more near; and Leyden (to the great astonishment of such of the guests as did not know him) burst into the room, chanting the desiderated ballad with the most enthusiastic gesture, and all the energy of what he used to call the saw-tones of his voice. It turned out that he had walked between forty and fifty miles and back again, for the sole purpose of visiting an old person who possessed this precious remnant of antiquity."¹

During the years 1800 and 1801, the Minstrelsy formed its editor's chief occupation — a labour of love truly, if ever such there was; but neither this nor his sheriffship interfered with his regular attendance at the Bar, the abandonment of which was all this while as far as it ever had been from his imagination, or that of any of his friends. He continued to have his summer headquarters at Lasswade; and Sir John Stoddart, who visited him there in the course of his Scottish tour (published 'n 1801), dwells on "the simple unostentatious elegance of the cottage, and the domestic picture which he there contemplated — a man of native kindness and cultivated talent, passing the intervals of a learned profession amidst scenes highly favourable to his poetic inspirations, not in churlish and rustic solitude, but in the daily exercise of the most precious sympathies as a husband, a father, and a friend." His means of hospitality were now much enlarged, and the cottage on a Saturday and Sunday at least, was seldom without visitors.

Among other indications of greater ease in his circumstances, which I find in his letter-book, he writes to Heber, after his return to London in May 1800, to request his good offices on behalf of Mrs. Scott, who had "set her heart on a phaeton, at once strong, and low, and handsome, and not to cost more than thirty guineas;" which combination of advantages Heber seems

¹ Essay on the Life of Leyden — Miscellaneous Prose. Many tributes to his memory are scattered over his friend's works, both prose and verse; and, above all, Scott did not forget him when exploring, three years after his death, the scenery of The Lord of the Isles: —

"Scenes sung by him who sings no more:
His bright and brief career is o'er,
And mute his tuneful strains;
Quench'd is his lamp of varied lore,
That loved the light of song to pour;
A distant and a deadly shore Has Leyden's cold remains!"

e found by no means easy of attainment. The phaeton ower, discovered; and its springs must soon have been a sufficient trial, for this was "the first wheeled carriage er penetrated into Liddesdale" — namely, in August 1800 iendship of the Buccleuch family now placed better means arch at his disposal, and Lord Dalkeith had taken spere that there should be a band of pioneers in waiting he reached Hermitage.

ugh he had not given up Lasswade, his sheriffship now it necessary for him that he should be frequently in c Forest. On such occasions he took up his lodgings little inn at Clovenford, a favourite fishing station on ad from Edinburgh to Selkirk. From this place he could the county town whenever business required his pres-nd he was also within a few miles of the vales of Yarid Ettrick, where he obtained large accessions to his store lads. It was in one of these excursions that, penetrat-yond St. Mary's lake, he found a hospitable reception at m of Blackhouse, situated on the Douglas-burn, then ten by a remarkable family, to which I have already made n—that of William Laidlaw. He was then a very man, but the extent of his acquirements was already ceable as the vigour and originality of his mind; and correspondence where "Sir" passes, at a few bounds, h "Dear Sir," and "Dear Mr. Laidlaw," to "Dear Willie," how speedily this new acquaintance had warmed into a nder affection. Laidlaw's zeal about the ballads was by Scott's anxious endeavours to get him removed from e for which, he writes, "it is no flattery to say that you ch too good." It was then, and always continued to opinion, that his friend was particularly qualified for g with advantage on the study of the medical profesut such designs, if Laidlaw himself ever took them up y, were not ultimately persevered in; and I question r any worldly success could, after all, have overbalanced respect of an honorable life spent happily in the open nature, amidst scenes the most captivating to the eye of and in the intimate confidence of, perhaps, the greatontemporary minds.

as Hogg spent ten years of his life in the service of idlaw's father, but he had passed into that of another rmer in a neighbouring valley, before Scott first visited ouse. William Laidlaw and Hogg were, however, most e friends, and the former took care that Scott should see, without delay, one whose fondness for the minstrelsy of the Forest was equal to his own, and whose aged mother was celebrated for having by heart several ballads in a more perfect form than any other inhabitant of the vale of Ettrick. The personal history of James Hogg must have interested Scott even more than any acquisition of that sort which he owed to this acquaintance with, perhaps, the most remarkable man that ever wore the maud of a shepherd. Under the garb, aspect, and bearing of a rude peasant—and rude enough he was in most of these things, even after no inconsiderable experience of society—Scott found a brother poet, a true son of nature and genius, hardly conscious of his powers. He had taught himself to write by copying the letters of a printed book as he lay watching his flock on the hill-side, and had probably reached the utmost pitch of his ambition, when he first found that his artless rhymes could touch the heart of the ewe-milker who partook the shelter of his mantle during the passing storm. As yet his naturally kind and simple character had not been exposed to any of the dangerous flatteries of the world; his heart was pure, his enthusiasm buoyant as that of a happy child; and well as Scott knew that reflection, sagacity, wit, and wisdom, were scattered abundantly among the humblest rangers of these pastoral solitudes, there was here a depth and a brightness that filled him with wonder, combined with a quaintness of humour, and a thousand little touches of absurdity, which afforded him more entertainment, as I have often heard him say, than the best comedy that ever set the pit in a roar.

Scott opened in the same year a correspondence with the venerable Bishop of Dromore, who seems, however, to have done little more than express a warm interest in an undertaking so nearly resembling that which will ever keep his own name in remembrance. He had more success in his applications to a more unpromising quarter—namely, with Joseph Ritson, the ancient and virulent assailant of Bishop Percy's editorial character. This narrow-minded, sour, and dogmatical little word-catcher had hated the very name of a Scotsman, and was utterly incapable of sympathising with any of the higher views of his new correspondent. Yet the bland courtesy of Scott disarmed even this half-crazy pedant; and he communicated the stores of his really valuable learning in a manner that seems to have greatly surprised all who had hitherto held any intercourse with him on antiquarian topics. It astonished, above all, the amiable and elegant George Ellis, whose acquaintance was about the same time opened to Scott through their common friend Heber. Mr. Ellis was now busily engaged in collecting the materials for his charming works, entitled Specimens of Ancient English Poetry, and Specimens of Ancient English Romance. The correspondence between him and Scott soon came to be constant. They met personally, before many letters had been exchanged, conceived for each other a cordial respect and affection, and continued on a footing of almost brotherly intimacy ever after. To this alliance, Scott owed, among other advantages, his early and ready admission to the acquaintance and familiarity of Ellis's bosom friend, his coadjutor in the Anti-jacobin, and the confidant of all his literary schemes, Mr. Canning.

Scott spent the Christmas of 1801 at Hamilton Palace, in Lanarkshire. To Lady Anne Hamilton he had been introduced by her friend, Lady Charlotte Campbell, and both the late and present Dukes of Hamilton appear to have partaken of Lady Anne's admiration for Glenfinlas and the Eve of St. John. A morning's ramble to the majestic ruins of the old baronial castle on the precipitous banks of the Evan, and among the adjoining remains of the primeval Caledonian forest, suggested to him a ballad, not inferior in execution to any he had hitherto produced, and especially interesting as the first in which he grapples with the world of picturesque incident unfolded in the authentic annals of Scotland. With the magnificent localities before him he skilfully interwove the daring assassination of the Regent Murray by one of the clansmen of "the princely Hamilton." Had the subject been taken up in after years, we might have had another Marmion or Heart of Mid-Lothian; for in Cadyow Castle we have the materials and outline of more than one of the noblest of ballads.

About two years before this piece began to be handed about in Edinburgh, Thomas Campbell had made his appearance there, and at once seized a high place in the literary world by his 'Pleasures of Hope.' Among the most eager to welcome him had been Scott; and I find the brother-bard thus expressing himself concerning the MS. of Cadyow: — "The verses of Cadyow Castle are perpetually ringing in my imagination —

Where, mightiest of the beasts of chase
That roam in woody Caledon, Crashing the forest in his race,
The mountain bull comes thundering on — and the arrival of Hamilton, when Reeking from the recent deed,

He dashed his carbine on the ground.

I have repeated these lines so often on the North Bridge, that the whole fraternity of coachmen know me by tongue as I pass. To be sure, to a mind in sober, serious street-walking humour, it must bear an appearance of lunacy when one stamps with the hurried pace and fervent shake of the head, which strong, pithy poetry excites."

According to the original intention, the Sir Tristrem, an imperfect romance, ascribed to Thomas of Ercildoune, the famous old seer and bard of the Border, was to have had a prominent place in the first livraison of the Minstrelsy; but from the rapid accumulation of matter for notes, as well as of unprinted ballads, this plan was dropped. The Cadyow Castle, too, was ready, but "two volumes," as Ballantyne says, "were already full to overflowing;" so it also was reserved for a third.

Volumes I. and II. appeared in January 1802, from the respectable house of Cadell and Davies in the Strand; and, owing to the cold reception of Lewis's Tales of Wonder, which had come forth a year earlier, these may be said to have first introduced Scott as an original writer to the English public. In his Remarks on the imitation of Popular Poetry, he says:—"When the book came out, the imprint, Kelso, was read with wonder by amateurs of typography, who had never heard of such a place, and were astonished at the example of handsome printing which so obscure a town had produced." One of the embellishments was a view of Hermitage Castle, the history of which is rather curious. Scott executed a rough sketch of it during the last of his "Liddesdale raids" with Shortreed, standing for that purpose for an hour or more up to his middle in the snow. Nothing can be ruder than the performance; but his friend William Clerk made a better drawing from it; and from his, a third and further improved copy was done by Hugh Williams, the elegant artist, afterwards known as "Greek Williams."¹ Scott used to say, the oddest thing of all was, that the engraving, founded on the labours of three draughtsmen, one of whom could not draw a straight line, and the two others had never seen the place meant to be represented, was nevertheless pronounced by the natives of Liddesdale to give a very fair notion of the ruins of Hermitage. The edition was exhausted in the course of the year, and the terms of publication having been that Scott should have half the clear profits, his share was exactly £.78, 10s. — a sum which certainly could not have repaid him for the actual expenditure incurred in the collection of his materials.

¹ His Travels in Greece were published in 1820.

of acknowledgment discernment in this branch of John Duke of Roxburgh is among the number, and also a complimentary message from Lord Spencer, issues his decree of approbation as an eccephed, overflows with heartier praise, and even Joseph extols his presentation copy as "the most valuable treasure in his possession." There follows enough of admiration to have been dangerous for another year, a fine ladies contend who shall be the most extravagant
- and as many professed blue stockings come among, or rather above the rest, Anna Seward, "the Lichfield," who laments that her "bright luminary," does not survive to partake her raptures, observes the Border Ballads the first strong rays of the Delphin inate Jellon Graeme;" and concludes with a fact in e, but strangely expressed, viz that "the Lady Anne
's Lament, Cowdenknowe, &c &c, historically pre- treasures of Burns, and the consummate Voluntaries of St. John."

of the first volumes related naturally their Whom George Ellis dubs "the Bulmer of Kelso." He up to London to cultivate acquaintance with Gold-and on his return writes thus to his employer - "I think the printing the Scottish Minstrelsy one of fortunate circumstances of my life. I have gained by it, in a pecuniary light; and the prospects it has means of opening to me, may advantageously influence destiny. I can never be sufficiently grateful for the on unceasingly take in my welfare. One thing is at Kelso cannot be my abiding place for ever." The seller, Longman, repaired to Scotland soon after this, an offer for the copyright of the Minstrelsy, the me included. This was accepted, and it was at last at Sir Tristram should appear in a separate shape cott proceeded to the Borders with Leyden. "We concluded," he tells Ellis, "an excursion of two or through my jurisdiction of Selkirkshire, where, in mountains, rivers, and bogs, damp and dry, we have the very recesses of Ettrick Forest, to which dis-ever have the happiness of welcoming you, you will ed that I am truly the sheriff of the 'coun and the the course of our grand tour, besides the risks of swamping and breaking our necks, we encountered the formidable hardships of sleeping upon peat-stacks, and eating mutton slain by no common butcher, but deprived of life by the judgment of God, as a coroner's inquest would express themselves. I have, however, not only escaped safe 'per varios casus, per tot discrimina rerum,' but returned loaded with the treasures of oral tradition. The principal result of our inquiries has been a complete and perfect copy of Maitland with his Auld Berd Graie, referred to by Douglas in his Palace of Honour. You may guess the surprise of Leyden and myself when this was presented to us, copied down from the recitation of an old shepherd, by a country farmer, and with no greater corruptions than might be supposed to be introduced by the lapse of time, and the ignorance of reciters."

Leyden seems to have spent much of that autumn at the Lasswade cottage, and here he encountered Joseph Ritson. Their host delighted to detail the scene that occurred when his two rough allies first met at dinner. Well knowing Ritson's holy horror of all animal food, Leyden complained that the joint on the table was overdone. "Indeed, for that matter," cried he, "meat can never be too little done, and raw is best of all." He sent to the kitchen accordingly for a plate of literally raw beef, and manfully ate it up, with no sauce but the exquisite ruelfulness of the Pythagorean's glances. Mr. R. Gillies, a gentleman of the Scotch Bar (since known for some excellent translations from the German), was present another day when Ritson was in Scotland. "In approaching the cottage," he says, "I was struck with the exceeding air of neatness that prevailed around. The hand of tasteful cultivation had been there, and all methods employed to convert an ordinary thatched cottage into a handsome and comfortable abode. At this early period, Scott was more like the portrait by Saxon, engraved for the Lady of the Lake, than to any subsequent picture. He retained in features and form an impress of that elasticity and youthful vivacity, which he used to complain wore off after he was forty, and by his own account was exchanged for the plodding heaviness of an oporose student. He had now, indeed, somewhat of a boyish gaiety of look, and in person was tall, slim, and extremely active." He and Erskine were about to start on a walk to Roslin, and Mr. Gillies accompanied them. In the course of their walk, Scott's foot slipped, as he was scrambling towards a cave on the edge of a precipitous bank, and "had there been no trees in the way" (says this writer), "he must have been killed; but midway he was stopped by a large root of hazel, when, instead of struggling, which would have made matters greatly worse, he seemed perfectly resigned to his fate, and slipped through the tangled thicket till he lay flat on the river's brink. He rose in an instant from his recumbent attitude, and with a hearty laugh called out — Now, let me see who else will do the like. He scrambled up the cliff with alacrity, and entered the cave, where we had a long dialogue." Even after he was an old and hoary man, he continually encountered such risks with the same recklessness. The extraordinary strength of his hands and arms was his great reliance in all such difficulties, and if he could see anything to lay hold of, he was afraid of no leap, or rather hop, that came in his way. Mr. Gillies adds, that when they drew near the famous chapel of Roslin, Erskine expressed a hope that they might, as habitual visitors, escape hearing the usual endless story of the old woman that shewed the ruins; but Scott answered, "There is a pleasure in the song which none but the songstress knows, and by telling her we know it all already, we should make the poor devil unhappy."

On their return to the cottage, Scott inquired for the learned cabbage-eater, who had been expected to dinner. "Indeed," answered his wife, "you may be happy he is not here — he is so very disagreeable. Mr. Leyden, I believe, frightened him away." It turned out that it was even so. When Ritson appeared, a round of cold beef was on the luncheon-table, and Mrs. Scott, forgetting his peculiar creed, offered him a slice. "The antiquary, in his indignation, expressed himself in such outrageous terms to the lady, that Leyden first tried to correct him by ridicule, and then, on the madman growing more violent, became angry in his turn, till at last he threatened, that if he were not silent, he would throw his neck. Scott shook his head at this recital, which Leyden observing, grew vehement in his own justification. Scott said not a word in reply, but took up a large bunch of feathers fastened to a stick, denominated a duster, and shook it about the student's ears till he laughed — then changed the subject." All this is very characteristic of the parties. — Scott's playful aversion to dispute was a trait in his mind and manners, that could alone have enabled him to make use at one and the same time, and for the same purpose, of two such persons as Ritson and Leyden.¹

Shortly after this visit, Leyden went to London, and in the letter that introduced him to Ellis, Scott mentions, among other things to be included in the third volume of the Minstrelsy, "a long poem" from his own pen - "a kind of romance of Border chivalry, in a light-horseman sort of stanza." This refers to the first draught of The Lay of the Last Minstrel; and the author's description of it as being "in a light-horseman sort of stanza," was probably suggested by the circumstances under which the greater part of that draught had been accomplished. He has told us, in his Introduction of 1830, that the poem originated in a request of the young and lovely Countess of Dalkeith, that he would write a ballad on the legend of Gilpin Horner: that he began it at Lasswade, and read the opening stanzas, as soon as they were written, to Erskine and Craunston: that their reception of these was apparently so cold as to disgust him with what he had done; but that finding, a few days afterwards, that the verses had nevertheless excited their curiosity, and haunted their memory, he was encouraged to resume the undertaking. The scene and date of this resumption I owe to the recollection of the then Cornet of the Light-horse. While the troop were on permanent duty at Musselburgh, in the autumnal recess of 1802, the Quarter-Master, during a charge on Portobello sands, received a kick of a horse, which confined him for three days to his lodgings. Mr. Skene found him busy with his pen; and he produced before these three days expired the first canto of the Lay, very nearly, if his friend's memory may be trusted, in the state in which it was ultimately published. That the whole poem was sketched and filled in with extraordinary rapidity, there can be no difficulty in believing. He himself says (in the Introduction of 1830), that after he had once got fairly into the vein, it proceeded at the rate of about a canto in a week. The Lay, however, like the Tristram, soon outgrew the dimensions which he had originally contemplated; the design of including it in the third volume of the Minstrelsy was of course abandoned; and it did not appear until nearly three years after that fortunate mishap on the beach of Portobello.

¹ See Gillies's Reminiscences of Sir Walter Scott.

Next spring, Scott hurried up to London as soon as the Court rose, in hopes of seeing Leyden once more before he left England; but he came too late. He thus writes to Ballantyne, on the 21st April 1803: — "I have to thank you for the accuracy with which the Minstrelsy is thrown off. Longman and Rees are delighted with the printing. I mean this note to be added, by way of advertisement: — 'In the press, and will speedily be published, the Lay of the Last Minstrel, by Walter Scott, Esq., Editor of the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border. Also Sir Tris-trical Romance, by Thomas of Ercildoune, called the edited from an ancient MS, with an Introduction and Walter Scott, Esq. Will you cause such a thing to ed in your own way and fashion?"

 ter is dated "No. 15 Piccadilly West," — he and Mrs
 there domesticated under the roof of the late M.
 Dumergue, a man of superior abilities and excellent well known as surgeon-dentist to the royal family — been intimately acquainted with the Charpentiers, and warmly befriended Mrs. Scott's mother on her first England. M. Dumergue's house was, throughout the of the emigration, liberally opened to the exiles of country; nor did some of the noblest of these unfortgees scruple to make a free use of his purse, as well hospitality. Here Scott met much highly interesting ciety, and until a child of his own was established in e never thought of taking up his abode anywhere else, e he had occasion to be in town.

ter is addressed to "Mr. James Ballantyne, printer, , Edinburgh," which shows, that before the third the Minstrelsy passed through the press, the magis-mended two years earlier had at length taken place — out the end of 1802," says Ballantyne, "that I cleared n so congenial to my wishes. I removed, bag and o Edinburgh, finding accommodation for two presses, f one, in the precincts of Holywell house, then dey lustre and interest from the recent arrival of the s of France. In these obscure premises some of the iful productions of what we called The Border Press ed." The Memorandum states, that Scott having is hint as to pecuniary assistance, as soon as the and his finances straitened, "a liberal loan was sub-ordingly."

nd Macintosh, then at the height of his reputation sionist, and daily advancing also at the bar, had y to welcome Scott in town as old friends, and Hugh m Stewart Rose, and several other men of literary were at the same time added to the list of his ace. His principal object, however — having intended was to make extracts from some MSS. in the library ke of Roxburgh, for the illustration of the Triad; he ived no small assistance in other researches of the from the collections which the indefatigable and ource placed at his disposal. Having completed and their noses and nostrils heard the first two or three cantos of the Lay of the Last Minstrel read under an old oak in Windsor Forest.

From thence they proceeded to Oxford, accompanied by Heber; and it was on this occasion that Scott first saw his friend's brother, Reginald, in afterdays the apostolic Bishop of Calcutta. He had just been declared the successful candidate for that year's poetical prize, and read to Scott at breakfast, in Brazen Nose College, the MS. of his Palestine. Scott observed that, in the verses on Solomon's Temple, one striking circumstance had escaped him, namely, that no tools were used in its erection. Reginald retired for a few minutes to the corner of the room, and returned with the beautiful lines,—

“No hammer fell, no ponderous axes rung,
Like some tall palm the mystic fabric sprung.
Majestic silence,” &c.

After inspecting the University and Blenheim, Scott returned to Edinburgh, where the completed Minstrelsy was published in the end of May. The reprint of the 1st and 2d volumes went to 1000 copies—of volume third Messrs. Longman had ordered 1500. A complete edition of 1250 copies followed in 1806; a fourth, also of 1250, in 1810; a fifth, of 1500, in 1812; a sixth, of 500, in 1820; and since then it has been incorporated in Scott's Collected Poetry. Of the Continental and American editions I can say nothing, except that they have been very numerous. The book was soon translated into German, Danish, and Swedish; and the structure of those languages being very favourable to the undertaking, the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border has thus become widely naturalised among nations themselves rich in similar treasures of legendary lore.

He speaks, in an Essay of his closing years, as if the first reception of the Minstrelsy on the south of the Tweed had been cold. “The curiosity of the English,” he says, “was not much awakened by poems in the rude garb of antiquity, accompanied with notes referring to the obscure feuds of barbarous clans, of whose very names civilised history was ignorant.” In writing those beautiful Introductions of 1830, however, he seems to have trusted entirely to his recollection of days long gone by, and he has accordingly let fall many

ments which we must take with some allowance. His opinions as to the reception of the Minstrelsy were different when writing to his brother in law, Charles Carpenter, on March 1803, for the purpose of introducing Leyden, he says, "I have contrived to turn a very slender portion of my talents to some account, by a publication of the poetical antiquities of the Border, where the old people had preserved many ballads descriptive of the manners of the country during the wars with England. This trifling collection was well received by a discerning public, that, after receiving £100 profit for the first edition, which my vanity permitted me to omit informing you went off in six months, I have secured a copyright for £500 more." This is not the language of disappointment; and though the edition of 1803 did not sell quite so rapidly as the first, and the work did not attract much notice beyond the more cultivated circles of literature, until the Editor's own Lay lent great interest to whatever was connected with his name, I was never aware there was much ground for accusing the English of regarding the Minstrelsy with more coldness than Scotch — the population of the Border districts themselves being, of course, excepted. Had the sale of the original edition been chiefly Scotch, I doubt whether Messrs. Galt would have so readily offered £500, in those days, to purchase a large sum, for the second. Scott had become accustomed, long before 1830, to a scale of book-selling transactions measured by which the largest editions and copies of his own early days appeared insignificant, but the fact seems complete that he was well contented at the certainly had every reason to be so as to the impression the Minstrelsy made on the minds of those entitled to form their own opinions for themselves upon such a subject. The ancient MSS. in his collection, which had never been printed at all, were in number forty-three; and of the others which were in fact all but new to the modern reader, he is entitled to say that his editions were superior in all respects to those that had preceded them. He had, I firmly believe, stated hardly a line or even an epithet of his own, but his diligent zeal had put him in possession of a variety of MSS. in different stages of preservation; and to the task of selecting a standard text among such a diversity of materials, required a knowledge of old manners and phraseology, and a simplicity of taste, such as had never before been united in the person of a poetical antiquary. From among a hundred corruptions he seized, with instinctive tact, the primitive diction and imagery; and produced strains in which the unbroken energy of half-civilised ages, their stern and deep passions, their daring adventures and cruel tragedies, and even their rude wild humour, are reflected with almost the brightness of a Homeric mirror, interrupted by hardly a blot of what deserves to be called vulgarity, and totally free from any admixture of artificial sentimentalism. As a picture of manners, the Scottish Minstrelsy is not surpassed, if equalled, by any similar body of poetry preserved in any other country; and it unquestionably owes its superiority in this respect over Percy's Reliques, to the Editor's conscientious fidelity, on the one hand, which prevented the introduction of anything new — to his pure taste, on the other, in the balancing of discordant recitations. His introductory essays and notes teemed with curious knowledge, not hastily grasped for the occasion, but gradually gleaned and sifted by the patient labour of years, and presented with an easy, unaffected propriety and elegance of arrangement and expression, which it may be doubted if he ever materially surpassed in the happiest of his imaginative narrations. I well remember, when Waverley was a new book, and all the world were puzzling themselves about its authorship, to have heard the Poet of "The Isle of Palms" exclaim impatiently — "I wonder what all these people are perplexing themselves with: have they forgotten the prose of the Minstrelsy?" Even had the Editor inserted none of his own verse, the work would have contained enough, and more than enough, to found a lasting and graceful reputation.

It is not to be denied, however, that the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border has derived a very large accession of interest from the subsequent career of its Editor. One of the critics of that day said that the book contained "the elements of a hundred historical romances;" — and this critic was a prophetic one. No person who has not gone through its volumes for the express purpose of comparing their contents with his great original works, can have formed a conception of the endless variety of incidents and images now expanded and emblazoned by his mature art, of which the first hints may be found either in the text of those primitive ballads, or in the notes, which the happy rambles of his youth had gathered together for their illustration. In the edition of the Minstrelsy published since his death, not a few such instances are pointed out; but the list might have been extended far beyond the rich such an edition allowed. The taste and fancy of pear to have been formed as early as his moral charid he had, before he passed the threshold of authorembled about him, in the uncalculating delight of thrustism, almost all the materials on which his genius ned to be employed for the gratification and instruc-e world.

CHAPTER IV.

Contributions to the Edinburgh Review -- Wordsworth -- Hogg -- Sir Tristrem -- Removal to Ashiestiel -- Mungo Park -- Publication of the Lay of the Last Minstrel -- Partnership with James Ballantyne -- Visit to London -- Appointment as Clerk of Session. 1804-1806.

SHORTLY after the complete Minstrelsy issued from the press, Scott made his first appearance as a reviewer. The Edinburgh Review had been commenced in October 1802, under the superintendance of the Rev. Sydney Smith, with whom, during his short residence in Scotland, he had lived on terms of great kindness and familiarity. Mr. Smith soon resigned the editorship to Mr. Jeffrey, who had by this time been for several years among the most valued of Scott's friends and companions at the Bar; and, the new journal being far from committing itself to violent politics at the outset, he appreciated the brilliant talents regularly engaged in it far too highly, not to be well pleased with the opportunity of occasionally exercising his pen in its service. His first contribution was an article on Southey's Amadis of Gaul. The reader may now trace the sequence of his articles in the Collective edition of his Miscellaneous Prose (1836).

During the summer of 1803, his chief literary work was on the Sir Tristrem, but the Lay of the Last Minstrel made progress at intervals—mostly, it would seem, when he was in quarters with his troop of horse, and necessarily without his books of reference. The resumption of the war (after the short peace of Amiens) had given renewed animation to the volunteers, and their spirit was kept up during two or three years more by the unintermitted threats of invasion. His letters abound in sketches of the camp-life at Musselburgh. To Miss Seward, for example, he says, in July:—“We are assuming a very military appearance. Three regiments of militia, with a formidable park of artillery, are encamped just by us. The Edinburgh Troop, to which I have the honour to be quartermaster, consists entirely of young gentlemen of family, and is, of course, admirably well mounted and armed. There are our troops in the regiment, consisting of yeomanry, on faces and muscular forms announce the hardness of fate against which they wrestle, and the powers which are given them to contend with and subdue it. These have been easily raised in Scotland, the farmers being in a high-spirited race of men, fond of active exercises, content in hardship and fatigue. For myself, I must own to one who has, like myself, la tête un peu exaltée, 'the circumstance of war' gives, for a time, a very poignant pleasing sensation. The imposing appearance of war in particular, and the rush which marks their onset, do me to partake highly of the sublime. Perhaps I am more attached to this sort of sport of swords because my profession requires much active exercise, and a lameness contracted in childhood renders it inconvenient for me to take it otherwise than on horseback. I have, too, a hereditary attachment to the horse — not, I flatter myself, of the common jockey cast, but I regard him as the kindest and most generous of the quadruped tribes. I hardly even except the dogs; at any rate they are usually so much better treated, that compassion and gratitude should be thrown into the scale when we weigh the comparative merits. My wife (a foreigner) never sees a horse used without asking what the poor horse has done in this world of pre-existence? I would fain hope they have been kinder to our hackney-coachmen, and are only experiencing a retributive ill-usage they have formerly inflicted. What think you of that autumn that Scott first saw Wordsworth. My common acquaintance, Stoddart, had so often talked of meeting each other, that they met as if they had not been parted; and they parted friends.

Miss Wordsworth had just completed their tour in the Highlands, of which so many incidents have since been immortalized in the poet's verse and in the hardly less poetical pages of his sister's Diary. On the morning of the 17th of August, having left their carriage at Roslin, they walked through the valley to Lasswade, and arrived there before Mr. and Mrs. Stoddart had risen. "We were received," Mr. Wordsworth writes, "with that frank cordiality which, under whatever circumstances I afterwards met him, always marked his manner; indeed, I found him then in every respect — except, that his animal spirits were somewhat higher — precisely the same man that you knew him in later life; the same cheerful and entertaining conversation, full of anecdote, and averse from disquisition; the same unaffected modesty about himself; the same cheerful and benevolent and hopeful views of man and the world. He partly read and partly recited, sometimes in an enthusiastic style of chant, the first four cantos of the Lay of the Last Minstrel; and the novelty of the manners, the clear picturesque descriptions, and the easy glowing energy of much of the verse, greatly delighted me."

After this he walked with the tourists to Roslin, and promised to meet them in two days at Melrose. The night before they reached Melrose they slept at the little quiet inn of Clovenford, where, on mentioning his name, they were received with all sorts of attention and kindness, — the landlady observing that Mr. Scott, "who was a very clever gentleman," was an old friend of the house, and usually spent a good deal of time there during the fishing season; but, indeed, says Mr. Wordsworth, "wherever we named him, we found the word acted as an open sesamum; and I believe that, in the character of the Sheriff's friends, we might have counted on a hearty welcome under any roof in the Border country."

He met them at Melrose on the 19th, and escorted them through the Abbey, pouring out his rich stores of history and tradition. They then dined together at the inn; but Miss Wordsworth observed that there was some difficulty about arranging matters for the night, "the landlady refusing to settle anything until she had ascertained from the Sheriff himself that he had no objection to sleep in the same room with William." Scott was thus far on his way to the Circuit Court at Jedburgh, in his capacity of Sheriff, and there his new friends again joined him; but he begged that they would not enter the court, "for," said he, "I really would not like you to see the sort of figure I cut there." They did see him casually, however, in his cocked hat and sword, marching in the Judge's procession to the sound of one cracked trumpet, and were then not surprised that he should have been a little ashamed of the whole ceremonial. He introduced to them his friend William Laidlaw, who was attending the court as a jurymen, and who, having read some of Wordsworth's verses in a newspaper, was exceedingly anxious to be of the party, when they explored at leisure, all the law-business being over, the beautiful valley of the Jed, and the ruins of the Castle of Fernieherst, the original fastness of the noble family of Lothian. The grove of stately ancient elms about and below the ruin was seen to great advantage in a fine, grey, breezy autumnal afternoon; and Mr. Wordsworth happened to say, "What life there is in trees!" — "How differ-

l Scott, " was the feeling of a very intelligent young man and bred in the Orkney Islands, who lately came to reason in this neighbourhood." She told me nothing inland scenery had so much disappointed her as dead trees. She found them so dead and lifeless, that never help putting after the eternal motion and variety of the sea. And so back she has gone, and I believe nothing tempt her from the wind except Orkney again."

One day they proceeded up the Torvat to Hawick, Scott bringing his friends with some legend or ballad connected with every tower or rock they passed. He made them stop particularly at a scene of deep and solemn retirement, St. Bernard's Pool, from its having been the daily haunt of a native schoolmaster, known to him in his youth, and on he pointed out the little village schoolhouse, to which a friend Leyden had walked six or eight miles every day across the moors, "when a poor barefooted boy." From the place where they spent the night, he led them next morning over the top of a hill, from which they could see a wide range of border mountains, Ruberslaw, the Carter, and the Galloway, and lamented that neither their engagements nor his health would permit them to make at this time an excursion into the glens of Luddesdale, "where," said he, "I have been so often and so long, that I may say I have a home in the house." "And, indeed," adds Mr Wordsworth, "if we went with him, he seemed to know everybody, and everybody to know and like him." Here they parted, — Mr Wordsworth to pursue their journey homeward by Eskdale, and to return to Lasswade.

The impression on Mr. Wordsworth's mind was, that on the subject he attached much less importance to his literary labours and reputation than to his bodily sports, exercises, and social pleasures; and yet he spoke of his profession as if he had given up almost all hope of rising by it; and someone being made to its profits, observed that "he was sure if he chose, get more money than he should ever wish to have from the booksellers."¹

Confidence in his own literary resources appeared to Mr. Wordsworth remarkable — the more so, from the carelessness with which its expression dropt from him. As to his drawn up the account of this meeting from my recollection of Mr. Wordsworth's conversation — partly from that of his sister's "Diary," which he was so kind as to read over to me on the despondence concerning the Bar, I confess his fee-book indicates less ground for such a feeling than I should have expected to discover there. His practice brought him, as we have seen, in the session of 1796-7, L.144, 10s.; — its proceeds fell down, in the first year of his married life, to L.79, 17s.; but they rose again, in 1798-9, to L.135, 9s.; amounted, in 1799-1800, to L.129, 13s.; in 1800-1, to L.170; in 1801-2, to L.202, 12s.; and in the session that had just elapsed (which is the last included in the record before me), to L.228, 18s.

I have already said something of the beginning of Scott's acquaintance with "the Ettrick Shepherd." Shortly after their first meeting, Hogg, coming into Edinburgh with a flock of sheep, was seized with a sudden ambition of seeing himself in type, and he wrote out that same night a few ballads, already famous in the Forest, which some obscure bookseller gratified him by printing accordingly; but they appear to have attracted no notice beyond their original sphere. Hogg then made an excursion into the Highlands, in quest of employment as overseer of some extensive sheep-farm; but, though Scott had furnished him with strong recommendations to various friends, he returned without success. He printed an account of his travels, however, in a set of letters in the Scots Magazine, which, though exceedingly rugged and uncouth, had abundant traces of the native shrewdness and genuine poetical feeling of this remarkable man. These also failed to excite attention; but, undeterred by such disappointments, the Shepherd no sooner read the third volume of the Minstrelsy, than he made up his mind that the Editor's "Imitations of the Ancients" were by no means what they should have been. "Immediately," he says, in one of his many memoirs of himself, "I chose a number of traditional facts, and set about imitating the manner of the ancients myself." These imitations he transmitted to Scott, who warmly praised the many striking beauties scattered over their rough surface. The next time that business carried him to Edinburgh, Scott invited him to dinner, in company with Laidlaw, who happened also to be in town, and some other admirers of the rustic genius. When Hogg entered the drawing-room, Mrs. Scott, being at the time in a delicate state of health, was reclining on a sofa. The Shepherd, after being presented, and making his best bow, took possession of another sofa placed opposite to hers, and stretched himself thereupon at all his length; for, as he said afterwards, "I thought I could never do wrong to copy the lady of the house." As his dress at this period was precisely that in which any more most legitimate marks of a recent steep-ascending, of the house did not observe with perfect equanimity usage to which her chintz was exposed. The Shop-keeper, remarked nothing of all this—dined heartily and freely, and, by jest, anecdote, and song, afforded merriment. As the liquor operated, his familiarity; from Mr. Scott, he advanced to "Sherra," and "Scott," "Walter," and "Wattie," until, at sup- per, he convulsed the whole party by addressing Mrs "Charlotte."

A collection entitled "The Mountain Bard" was recent- ly published by Constable, in consequence of Scott's recom- mendation, and this work did at last afford Hogg no slender reputation for which he had so long thirsted. It was a business, however, to pursue the details of his story- telling, as it was at length published on the 2d of May 1804. Constable, who, however, expected no little popularity for his work, that the edition consisted only of 1500 copies, were sold at a high price (two guineas), otherwise they would not have been enough to cover the expenses of paper and printing. Mr. Ellis and other friends were much dissatisfied with these arrangements; but I doubt not that Constable was a better judge than any of them. The work, however, has been a due time of the favour attending its editor's name, and has been twice reprinted before it was included in the col- lection of his poetry. It was not a performance from which he had ever anticipated any pecuniary profit, but it did at least, if it did not raise, his reputation in the eyes of his fellow-antiquaries; and his own Conclusion, in the original romance, must always be admired as a specimen of skill and dexterity. As to the arguments of the author, I shall not in this place attempt any discussion. The story of Tristrem was first told in Welsh, Armor- ican, or English verse, there can, I think, be no doubt that it had been told in verse, with such success as to obtain a considerable renown, by Thomas of Ercildoune, and that the story was either the composition of one who had been the old Rhymers recite his lay, or the identical lay of the introduction of Thomas's name in the third person, was the author, but the author's authority, appears to have had no share in convincing Scott that the Auchinlock edition was not the original, but the copy of an English and contemporary. This point seems to have been rendered more doubtful by some quotations in the recent edition of Warton's History of English Poetry; but the argument derived from the enthusiastic exclamation, "God help Sir Tristrem the knight — he fought for England," still remains; and stronger perhaps even than that, in the opinion of modern philologists, is the total absence of any Scottish or even Northumbrian peculiarities in the diction. All this controversy may be waived here. Scott's object and delight was to revive the fame of the Rhymer, whose traditional history he had listened to while yet an infant among the crags of Smallholme. He had already celebrated him in a noble ballad;¹ he now devoted a volume to elucidate a fragment supposed to be substantially his work; and we shall find that thirty years after, when the lamp of his own genius was all but spent, it could still revive and throw out at least some glimmerings of its original brightness at the name of Thomas of Ereildoune.²

In the course of the preceding summer, the Lord-Lieutenant of Selkirkshire complained of Scott's military zeal as interfering sometimes with the discharge of his shrieval functions, and took occasion to remind him, that the law, requiring every Sheriff to reside at least four months in the year within his own jurisdiction, had not hitherto been complied with. While, in consequence of a renewal of this hint, he was seeking about for some "lodge in the Forest," his kinsman of Harden suggested that the tower of Auld Wat (the Stammshloss of their family) might be refitted, so as to serve his purpose; and he received the proposal with enthusiastic delight. On a more careful inspection of the localities, however, he became sensible that he would be practically at a greater distance from county business of all kinds at Harden, than if he were to continue at Lasswade. Just at this time, the house of Ashestiel, situated on the southern bank of the Tweed, a few miles from Selkirk, became vacant by the death of its proprietor, Colonel Russell, who had married a sister of Scott's mother, and the consequent dispersion of the family. The young Laird of Ashestiel, his cousin, was then in India; and the Sheriff took a lease of the house, with a small farm adjoining. On the 4th May, two days after the Tristrem had been published, he says to Ellis, who was meditating a northern tour — "I have been engaged in travelling backwards and forwards to Selkirkshire upon little pieces of business, just important enough to prevent my doing anything to purpose.

¹ See Poetical Works (Edition 1841), pp. 572-581.

² Compare the Fifth Chapter of Castle Dangerous.

at matter, however, I have achieved, which is, procur-self a place of residence, which will save me these migrations in future, so that though I part with my little cottage on the banks of the Esk, you will find summer in the very centre of the ancient Heged, in a farm-house overhanging the Tweed, and situated in a storal country." And again, on the 10th, he thus ap-or not having answered a letter of the tenth. "For an a month my head was fairly tenanted by ideas, though strictly pastoral and rural, were neither literary tical. Long sheep and short sheep, and tops and grand hegs and clinnonts, had made a perfect sheepfold understanding, which is hardly yet cleared of them."
 Mrs. Ellis will clap a bridle on her imagination.
 Forest boasts finely shaped hills and clear romantic ; but, alas! they are late to wildness, and demanded beautiful natural wood with which they were formerly

It is mortifying to see that, though wherever the re excluded, the cupse has immediately sprung up in ce, so that enclosures only are wanting to restore the herever it might be useful or ornamental, yet hardly a or has attempted to give it fair play for a resource too."
 e 10th of June 1801, died, at his seat of Hoxetank,

Robert Scott, the affectionate uncle whose name has rurred in this narrative. "He was," says his nephew on the 18th, "a man of universal benevolence and ndness towards his friends, and to me individually.
 ners were so much tinged with the habits of solitacy nder them peculiar, though by no means unpleasantly is profession (that of a seaman) gave a high colour ie whole. The loss is one which, though the cause e led me to expect it, did not take place at last with-derable pain to my feelings. The arrangement of his nd the distribution of his small fortune among his , will devolve in a great measure upon me. He has shed me by leaving me a beautiful little villa on s of the Tweed, with every possible convenience ant it, and about thirty acres of the finest land in West-describes the amusement of the Sheriff in 1801, upon hearing a on the meaning of long sheep and short sheep (as called to the length of the flower); and adds: "When I saw the words repeated near the beginning (p. 4) of the Black Dwarf, I be mistaken of the author?" — Autobiography prefixed to tes.

Notwithstanding, however, the temptation that this offers, I continue to pursue my Reged plan, and expect settled at Ashestiel in the course of a month. Rosebank is situated so near the village of Kelso, as hardly to be truly a country residence; besides, it is hemmed in by ditches, not to mention Dukes and Lady Dowagers, are bad things for little people. It is expected to sell at advantage. I shall buy a mountain farm with the money, and be quite the Laird of the Cairn and the sold Rosebank in the course of the year for L.5000. The request made an important change in his pecuniary state, and influenced accordingly the arrangements of his life. Independently of practice at the Bar, and of his profits, he was now, with his little patrimony, his income up, and about L.200 per annum arising from the stock he had settled on his wife, in possession of a fixed revenue of L.1000 a year.

Ashestiel will be visited by many for his sake, as long as the names of Marmion and Marmion are remembered. A more beautiful spot for the residence of a poet could not be conceived. The house was then a small one, but, compared with the cottage at Lasswade, its accommodations were amply sufficient. It was approached through an old-fashioned garden, with holly hedges and broad, green, terrace walks. On one side, close to the windows, is a deep ravine, clothed with venerable trees, down which a mountain rivulet is heard, more than a mile in its progress to the Tweed. The river itself is separated from the high bank on which the house stands only by a narrow meadow of the richest verdure. Opposite, and all round, are the green hills. The valley there is narrow, and the aspect in every direction is that of perfect pastoral repose. The heights immediately behind are those which divide the country from the Yarrow; and the latter celebrated stream lies in an easy ride, in the course of which the traveller passes through a variety of the finest mountain scenery in the south of Scotland. No town is within seven miles but Selkirk, which is now a still smaller and quieter than it is now; there was even a gentleman's family within visiting distance, at Yair, a few miles lower on the Tweed, the ancient seat of the Pringles of Whytbank, and at Bowhill, between Bowhill and Ettrick, where the Earl of Dalkeith used to inhabit a small shooting-lodge, which has since been enlarged into a ducal residence. The country all around, with and there an insignificant exception, belongs to the Buccach estate; so that, whichever way he chose to turn, the soil of the clan had ample room and verge enough for every variety of field sport; and being then in the prime vigour of youth, he was not slow to profit by these advantages. In the meantime, the concerns of his own little farm, and the care of his absent relation's woods, gave him healthful occupation during the intervals of the chase; and he had long, solitary evenings for the uninterrupted exercise of his pen, perhaps, on the whole, better opportunities of study than he had ever enjoyed before, or was to meet with elsewhere in later days.

When he first examined Ashestiel, with a view to being his landlord's tenant, he thought of taking home James Hogg to superintend the sheep-farm, and keep watch over the house during the winter. I am not able to tell exactly in what manner this proposal fell to the ground; but in truth the Sheriff had hardly been a week in possession of his new gains, before he made acquaintance with a character much better suited to his purpose than James Hogg ever could have been. I mean honest Thomas Purdie, his faithful servant.

Tom affectionately devoted himself to his master from this time until death parted them. Tom was first brought before him, in his capacity of Sheriff, on a charge of poaching, when the poor fellow gave such a touching account of his circumstances, of his wife, and I know not how many children, depending on his bounty — work scarce and grouse abundant, — and all this mixed with a mixture of odd sly humour, — that the Sheriff's heart was moved. Tom escaped the penalty of the law — was taken into employment as shepherd, and showed such zeal, activity, and shrewdness in that capacity, that Scott never had any occasion to repent of the step he soon afterwards took, in promoting him to the position which had been originally intended to James Hogg.

It was also about the same time that he took into his service as coachman Peter Mathieson, brother-in-law to Thomas Purdie, another faithful servant, who never afterwards left him, and still (1848) survives his kind master. Scott's awkward management of the little phaeton had exposed his wife more than one perilous overturn, before he agreed to set up a new carriage, and call in the assistance of this steady driver.

During this autumn Scott formed the personal acquaintance of James Park, the celebrated victim of African discovery. On his return from his first expedition, Park endeavoured to establish himself as a medical practitioner in the town of Hawick, but the drudgeries of that calling in such a district soon exhausted his ardent temper, and he was now living in seclusion in his native cottage at Fowlsheils on the Yarrow, nearly opposite Newark Castle. His brother, Archibald Park (then tenant of a large farm on the Buccleuch estate), a man remarkable for strength both of mind and body, introduced the traveller to the Sheriff. They soon became much attached to each other; and Scott supplied some interesting anecdotes of their brief intercourse to Mr. Wishaw, the editor of Park's Posthumous Journal, with which I shall blend a few minor circumstances, gathered from him in conversation long afterwards. "On one occasion," he says, "the traveller communicated some very remarkable adventures which had befallen him in Africa, but which he had not recorded in his book." On Scott's asking the cause of this silence, Mungo answered, "That in all cases where he had information to communicate, which he thought of importance to the public, he had stated the facts boldly, leaving it to his readers to give such credit to his statements as they might appear justly to deserve; but that he would not shock their faith, or render his travels more marvellous, by introducing circumstances, which, however true, were of little or no moment, as they related solely to his own personal adventures and escapes." This reply struck Scott as highly characteristic of the man; and though strongly tempted to set down some of these marvels for Mr. Wishaw's use, he on reflection abstained from doing so, holding it unfair to record what the adventurer had deliberately chosen to suppress in his own narrative. He confirms the account given by Park's biographer of his cold and reserved manners to strangers; and, in particular, of his disgust with the indirect questions which curious visitors would often put to him upon the subject of his travels. "This practice," said Mungo, "exposes me to two risks; either that I may not understand the questions meant to be put, or that my answers to them may be misconstrued;" and he contrasted such conduct with the frankness of Scott's revered friend Dr. Adam Fergusson, who, the very first day the traveller dined with him at Hallyards, spread a large map of Africa on the table, and made him trace out his progress thereupon, inch by inch, questioning him minutely as to every step he had taken. "Here, however," says Scott, "Dr. F. was using a privilege to which he was well entitled by his venerable age and high literary character, but which could not have been exercised with propriety by any common stranger."

alling one day at Fowlshells, and not finding Park at home, he walked in search of him along the banks of the Yarrow, which in that neighbourhood passes over various ledges of rock, forming deep pools and eddies between them. Presently he observed his friend standing alone on the bank, plunging one after another into the water, and watching anxiously the bubbles as they rose to the surface. "This," said Scott, "appears but an idle amusement for one who has seen so much exciting adventure." "Not so idle, perhaps, as you suppose," answered Mungo: "This was the manner in which I used to ascertain the depth of a river in Africa before I ventured to cross it—judging whether the attempt would be safe, by the size of the bubbles of air took to ascend." At this time Park's intention of a second expedition had never been revealed to Scott; but he instantly formed the opinion that these experiments on Yarrow were connected with some such purpose.

Mungo's thoughts had always continued to be haunted with the idea of Africa. He told Scott, that whenever he awoke suddenly in the night, owing to a nervous disorder with which he was afflicted, he fancied himself still a prisoner in the tent of the natives; but when the poet expressed some surprise that he should again to revisit those scenes, he answered, that he would rather brave Africa and all its horrors, than wear out his life in long and toilsome rides over the hills of Scotland, for which remuneration was hardly enough to keep soul and body together.

Towards the end of the autumn, when about to quit his native country for the last time, Park paid Scott a farewell visit, and slept at Ashiestiel. Next morning his host accompanied him homewards over the wild chain of hills between the moor and the Yarrow. Park talked much of his new scheme, and mentioned his determination to tell his family that he had some business for a day or two in Edinburgh, and would then return blessing from thence, without returning to take leave. He was married, not long before, a pretty and amiable woman, and when they reached the Williamshope ridge, "the autumnal mist hanging heavily and slowly down the valley of the Yarrow," presented to Scott's imagination "a striking emblem of the dark and uncertain prospect which his undertaking afforded." He remained, however, unshaken, and at length they reached the spot at which they had agreed to separate. A shallow ditch divided the moor from the road, and in going over it Park's horse stumbled, and nearly fell. "I am afraid, Mungo," said the Sheriff, "that is a bad omen." To which he answered, smiling, "Freits (omens) follow those who look to them." With this expression Mungo struck the spurs into his horse, and Scott never saw him again. His parting proverb, by the way, was probably suggested by one of the Border ballads, in which species of lore he was almost as great a proficient as the Sheriff himself; for we read in Edom o' Gordon,—

"Them looks to freits, my master dear, Then freits will follow them."

The brother of Mungo Park remained in Scott's neighbourhood for some years, and was frequently his companion in his mountain rides. Though a man of the most dauntless temperament, he was often alarmed at Scott's reckless horsemanship. "The de'il's in ye, Sherra," he would say; "ye'll never halt till they bring you hame with your feet foremost." He rose greatly in favour, in consequence of the gallantry with which he assisted the Sheriff in seizing a gipsy, accused of murder, from amidst a group of similar desperadoes, on whom they had come unexpectedly in a desolate part of the country.

To return to the Lay of the Last Minstrel: Ellis, understanding it to be now nearly ready for the press, writes to Scott, urging him to set it forth with some engraved illustrations— if possible, after Flaxman, whose splendid designs from Homer had shortly before made their appearance. He answers, August 21—"I should fear Flaxman's genius is too classic to stoop to body forth my Gothic Borderers. Would there not be some risk of their resembling the antique of Homer's heroes, rather than the iron race of Salvator? I should like at least to be at his elbow when at work. I wish very much I could have sent you the Lay while in MS., to have had the advantage of your opinion and corrections. But Ballantyne galled my kibes so severely during an unusual fit of activity, that I gave him the whole story in a sort of pet both with him and with it."

There is a circumstance which must already have struck such of my readers as knew the author in his latter days, namely, the readiness with which he seems to have communicated this poem, in its progress, not only to his own familiar friends, but to new and casual acquaintances. We shall find him following the same course with his Marmion—but not, I think, with any of his subsequent works. His determination to consult the movements of his own mind alone in the conduct of his pieces, was probably taken before he began the Lay; and he n resolved to trust for the detection of minor inaccuracies two persons only—James Ballantyne and William Erskine: the former printer was himself a man of considerable literary talents: his own style had the incurable faults of pomposity and affectation; but his eye for more venial errors in the writings of others was quick, and, though his personal address was apt to convey to a stranger the impression of insincerity, he was in reality an honest man, and conveyed his mind on such matters with equal candour and delicacy during the whole of Scott's brilliant career. In the vast majority of instances he found his friend acquiesce at once in the propriety of his suggestions; but, there certainly were cases, though rare, in which his advice to alter things of much more consequence than a word or a rhyme, was frankly tendered, and on deliberation adopted by Scott. Mr. Erskine was the referee whenever the poet insisted about taking the hints of the zealous typographer; and his refined taste and gentle manners rendered his critical assistance highly valuable. With two such faithful friends at hand, and within his reach, the author of the Lay might safely dispense with sending his MS. to be revised even by George Ellis.

In the first week of January 1805, The Lay was published; and its success at once decided that literature should be the main business of Scott's life. I shall not meddle with many words as to the merits of a poem which has ever kept its place for nearly half a century; but one or two additional remarks on the history of the composition may be done.

It is curious to trace the small beginnings and gradual development of his design. The lovely Countess of Dalkeith was a wild rude legend of Border diablerie, and sportively suggested to him to make it the subject of a ballad. He had been busily labouring in the elucidation of the "quant Ingles" attributed to an ancient seer and bard of the same district, and perhaps completed his own sequel, intending the whole to be included in the third volume of the Minstrelsy. He assents to Dalkeith's request, and casts about for some new variety of diction and rhyme, which might be adopted without impropriety in a closing strain for the same collection. Sir John Ddard's casual recitation, a year or two before, of Coleridge's published Christabel, had fixed the music of that noble fragment in his memory; and it occurs to him, that by throwing the story of Gilpin Horner into somewhat of a similar cadence, might produce such an echo of the later metrical romance, as would serve to connect his Conclusion of the primitive Sir Tristrem with his imitations of the common popular ballad in the Grey Brother and Eve of St. John. A single scene of feudal festivity in the hall of Branksome, disturbed by some pranks of a nondescript goblin, was probably all that he contemplated; but his accidental confinement in the midst of a volunteer camp gave him leisure to meditate his theme to the sound of the bugle;—and suddenly there flashes on him the idea of extending his simple outline, so as to embrace a vivid panorama of that old Border life of war and tumult, and all earnest passions, with which his researches on the Minstrelsy had by degrees fed his imagination, until even the minutest feature had been taken home and realized with unconscious intensity of sympathy; so that he had won for himself in the past, another world, hardly less complete or familiar than the present. Erskine or Cranstoun suggests that he would do well to divide the poem into cantos, and prefix to each of them a motto explanatory of the action, after the fashion of Spenser in the Faery Queen. He pauses for a moment— and the happiest conception of the framework of a picturesque narrative that ever occurred to any poet— one that Homer might have envied— the creation of the ancient harper, starts to life. By such steps did the Lay of the Last Minstrel grow out of the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

A word more of its felicitous machinery. It was at Bowhill that the Countess of Dalkeith requested a ballad on Gilpin Horner. The ruined castle of Newark closely adjoins that seat, and is now indeed included within its pleasance. Newark had been the chosen residence of the first Duchess of Buccleuch, and he accordingly shadows out his own beautiful friend in the person of her lord's ancestress, the last of the original stock of that great house; himself the favoured inmate of Bowhill, introduced certainly to the familiarity of its circle in consequence of his devotion to the poetry of a by-past age, in that of an aged minstrel, "the last of all the race," seeking shelter at the gate of Newark, in days when many an adherent of the fallen cause of Stuart, — his own bearded ancestor, who had fought at Killiecrankie, among the rest, — owed their safety to her who

"In pride of power, in beauty's bloom,
Had wept o'er Monmouth's bloody tomb."

The arch allusions which run through all these Introductions, without in the least interrupting the truth and graceful pathos of their main impression, seem to me exquisitely characteristic

Scott, whose delight and pride was to play with the genius which nevertheless mastered him at will. For, in truth, what that gives to all his works their unique and marking charm, except the matchless effect which sudden effusions of the pure heart-blood of nature derive from their being poured out, all appearance involuntarily, amidst distress and sentiment equally in the mould of the busy world, and the seemingly natural desire to dwell on nothing but what is of the hour, to excite curiosity, without too much disturbing deeper feelings, in the saloons of polished life? Such is the case even in the dramatically in all his writings, but in the unfeignedly passionate parentheses of the Lay of the Last Minstrel we see the poet's own inner soul and temperament laid bare and lying before us. Even here, indeed, he has a mask, and creates it -- but fortunately it is a transparent one.

Any minor personal allusions have been explained in the notes to the last edition of the Lay. It was hardly necessary then to say that the choice of the hero had been dictated by the poet's affection for the living descendants of the Hazon bastoun; and now -- none who have pursued the preceding generations can doubt that he had dressed out his Margaret of Frankland in the form and features of his own best love. This may be considered as the "bright consummate flower" in which all the dearest dreams of his youthful fancy had at length found expansion for their strength, spirit, tenderness, and beauty.

The closing lines --

"Hush'd is the harp -- the Minstrel gone,
And did he wander forth alone?
No! close beneath proud Norath's tower Arose the Minstrel's humble home," &c

In these charming lines he has embodied what was, at the time he penned them, the chief day-dream of Ashestiel. At the moment that his uncle's death placed a considerable sum of ready money at his command, he pleased himself, as we have seen, with the idea of buying a mountain farm, and naming not only the "sheriff" (as he had in former days liked to call himself), but "the lord of the cairn and the lake." While he was "labouring downwards at the Lay" (as we see of his letters he expresses it), during the recess of 1804, circumstances rendered it next to certain that the small estate Wraithmoulton, situated just over against the ruins of Wraithmoulton, on the northern bank of the Yarrow, would soon be Tristrem with his imitations of the common popular ballad in the Grey Brother and Eye of St. John. A single scene of feudal festivity in the hall of Branksome, disturbed by some pranks of a nondescript goblin, was probably all that he contemplated; but his accidental confinement in the midst of a volunteer camp gave him leisure to meditate his theme to the sound of the bugle;—and suddenly there flashes on him the idea of extending his simple outline, so as to embrace a vivid panorama of that old Border life of war and tumult, and all earnest passions, with which his researches on the Minstrelsy had by degrees fed his imagination, until even the minutest feature had been taken home and realised with unconscious intenseness of sympathy; so that he had won for himself in the past, another world, hardly less complete or familiar than the present. Erskine or Cranstoun suggests that he would do well to divide the poem into cantos, and prefix to each of them a motto explanatory of the action, after the fashion of Spenser in the Faery Queen. He pauses for a moment,—and the happiest conception of the framework of a picturesque narrative that ever occurred to any poet—one that Homer might have envied—the creation of the ancient harper, starts to life. By such steps did the Lay of the Last Minstrel grow out of the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

A word more of its felicitous machinery. It was at Bowhill that the Countess of Dalkeith requested a ballad on Gilpin Horner. The ruined castle of Newark closely adjoins that seat, and is now indeed included within its pleasure. Newark had been the chosen residence of the first Duchess of Buccleuch, and he accordingly shadows out his own beautiful friend in the person of her lord's ancestress, the last of the original stock of that great house; himself the favoured inmate of Bowhill, introduced certainly to the familiarity of its circle in consequence of his devotion to the poetry of a by-past age, in that of an aged minstrel, "the last of all the race," seeking shelter at the gate of Newark, in days when many an adherent of the fallen cause of Stuart, — his own bearded ancestor, who had fought at Killiecrankie, among the rest, — owed their safety to her who

" In pride of power, in beauty's bloom,
Had wept o'er Monmouth's bloody tomb."

The arch allusions which run through all these Introductions, without in the least interrupting the truth and graceful pathos of their main impression, seem to me exquisitely characteristic

cott, whose delight and pride was to play with the genius which nevertheless mastered him at will. For, in truth, what it is that gives to all his works their unique and marking charm, and the matchless effect which sudden effusions of the pure-heart-blood of nature derive from their being poured out, and their appearance involuntarily, amidst diction and sentiment equally in the mould of the busy world, and the seemingly contradictory desire to dwell on nothing but what might be likely to excite curiosity, without too much disturbing deeper feelings, in the saloons of polished life? Such outbursts come so dramatically in all his writings; but in the interludes and passionate parentheses of the Lay of the Last Minstrel we see the poet's own inner soul and temperament laid bare and speaking before us. Even here, indeed, he has a mask, and wears it — but fortunately it is a transparent one.

Many minor personal allusions have been explained in the notes to the last edition of the Lay. It was hardly necessary then to say that the choice of the hero had been dictated by the poet's affection for the living descendants of the Baron Ranstron; and now — none who have perused the preceding pages can doubt that he had dressed out his Margaret of Brank-ley in the form and features of his own first love. This may be considered as the "bright consummate flower" in which all the dearest dreams of his youthful fancy had at last found expansion for their strength, spirit, tenderness, and beauty.

In the closing lines —

“Hush'd is the harp — the Minstrel gone ;
And did he wander forth alone ?
No ! — close beneath proud Newark's tower Arose the Minstrel's humble bower,” &c.

In these charming lines he has embodied what was, at the time when he penned them, the chief day-dream of Ashetiel.
From the moment that his uncle's death placed a considerable sum of ready money at his command, he pleased himself, as we have seen, with the idea of buying a mountain farm, and calling himself not only the "sheriff" (as he had in former days thought to call himself), but "the laird of the cairn and the cave." While he was "labouring doucement at the Lay" (as in one of his letters he expresses it), during the recess of 1804, circumstances rendered it next to certain that the small estate of Broadmeadows, situated just over against the ruins of Newark, on the northern bank of the Yarrow, would soon be exposed to sale; and many a time did he ride round it in company with Lord and Lady Dalkeith,

“When summer smiled on Sweet Bowhill,” surveying the beautiful little domain with wistful eyes, and anticipating that “*There would he sing achievement high

And circumstance of chivalry,
And Yarrow, as he rolled along,
Bear burden to the Minstrel’s song.*”

I consider it as, in one point of view, the greatest misfortune of his life that this vision was not realised; but the success of the poem itself changed “the spirit of his dream.” The favour which it at once attained had not been equalled in the case of any one poem of considerable length during at least two generations: it certainly had not been approached in the case of any narrative poem since the days of Dryden. Before it was sent to the press it had received warm commendation from the ablest and most influential critic of the time; but when Mr. Jeffrey’s review appeared, a month after publication, laudatory as its language was, it scarcely came up to the opinion which had already taken root in the public mind. It, however, quite satisfied the author; and I think it just to state, that I have not discovered in any of the letters which he received from brother-poets — no, not even in those of Wordsworth or Campbell — a strain of approbation higher, on the whole, than that of the chief professional reviewer of the period. When the happy days of youth are over, even the most genial and generous of minds are seldom able to enter into the strains of a new poet with that full and open delight which he awakens in the bosoms of the rising generation about him. Their deep and eager sympathies have already been drawn upon to an extent of which the prosaic part of the species can never have any conception; and when the fit of creative inspiration has subsided, they are apt to be rather cold critics even of their own noblest appeals to the simple primary feelings of their kind.

“It would be great affectation,” says the Introduction of 1830, “not to own that the author expected some success from the Lay of the Last Minstrel. The attempt to return to a more simple and natural poetry was likely to be welcomed, at a time when the public had become tired of heroic hexameters, with all the buckram and binding that belong to them in modern days. But whatever might have been his expectations, whether moderate or unreasonable, the result left them far behind; for among those who smiled on the adventurous minstrel were numbered the great names of William Pitt and Charles Fox. Neither was the extent of the sale inferior to the character of the judges who received the poem with approbation. Upwards of 30,000 copies were disposed of by the trade; and the author had to perform a task difficult to human vanity, when called upon to make the necessary deductions from his own merits, in a calm attempt to account for its popularity."

Through what channel or in what terms Fox made known his opinion of the Lay, I have failed to ascertain. Pitt's praise, as expressed to his niece, Lady Hester Stanhope, within a few weeks after the poem appeared, was repeated by her to William Rose, who, of course, communicated it forthwith to the author; and not long after, the Minister, in conversation with Scott's early friend William Dundas, signified that it would give him pleasure to find some opportunity of advancing the fortunes of such a writer. "I remember," writes this gentleman, "at Mr. Pitt's table in 1805, the Chancellor asked me about you and your then situation, and after I had answered him, Mr. Pitt observed — 'He can't remain as he is,' and desired me to 'look to it.' He then repeated some lines from the Lay, describing the old harper's embarrassment when asked to play, and said — 'This is a sort of thing which I might have expected in painting, but could never have fancied capable of being given in poetry.'" — It is agreeable to know that this great statesman and accomplished scholar awoke at least once from his supposed apathy as to the elegant literature of his own time.

The poet has under-estimated even the patent and tangible evidence of his success. The first edition of the Lay was a magnificent quarto, 750 copies; but this was soon exhausted, and there followed one octavo impression after another in close succession to the number of fourteen. In fact, some forty-four thousand copies had been disposed of in this country, and by the legitimate trade alone, before he superintended the edition of 1830, to which his biographical introductions were prefixed. In the history of British Poetry nothing had ever equalled the demand for the Lay of the Last Minstrel.

The publishers of the first edition were Longman and Co. of London, and Archibald Constable and Co. of Edinburgh; which last house, however, had but a small share in the adventure. The profits were to be divided equally between the author and his publishers; and Scott's moiety was L.169, 6s. Messrs. Longman, when a second edition was called for, offered L.500 for the copyright; this was accepted; but they afterwards, as the Introduction says, "added L.100 in their own unsolicited kindness. It was handsomely given, to supply the loss of a fine horse which broke down suddenly while the author was riding with one of the worthy publishers." The author's whole share, then, in the profits of the Lay, came to L.769, 6s.

Mr. Ballantyne, in his Memorandum, says, that very shortly after the publication of the Lay, he found himself obliged to apply to Mr. Scott for an advance of money; his own capital being inadequate for the business which had been accumulated on his press, in consequence of the reputation it had acquired for beauty and correctness of execution. Already, as we have seen, the printer had received "a liberal loan;" - "and now," says he, "being compelled, maugre all delicacy, to renew my application, he candidly answered that he was not quite sure that it would be prudent for him to comply, but in order to evince his entire confidence in me, he was willing to make a suitable advance to be admitted as a third sharer of my business." No trace has been discovered of any examination into the state of the business, on the part of Scott, at this time. However, he now embarked in Ballantyne's concern almost the whole of the capital which he had a few months before designed to invest in the purchase of Broadmeadows. Dis aliter viam.

I have hinted my suspicion that he had formed some distant notion of such an alliance, as early as the date of Ballantyne's projected removal from Kelso; and his Introduction to the Lay, in 1830, appears to leave little doubt that the hope of ultimately succeeding at the Bar had waxed very faint, before the third volume of the Minstrelsy was brought out in 1803. When that hope ultimately vanished altogether, perhaps he himself would not have found it easy to tell. The most important of men's opinions, views, and projects, are sometimes taken up in so very gradual a manner, and after so many pauses of hesitation and of inward retraction, that they themselves are at a loss to trace in retrospect all the stages through which their minds have passed. We see plainly that Scott had never been fond of his profession, but that, conscious of his own persevering diligence, he ascribed his scanty success in it mainly to the prejudices of the Scotch solicitors against employing, in weighty causes at least, any barrister supposed to be strongly imbued with the love of literature; instancing the career of his friend Jeffrey as almost the soli-

any instance within his experience of such prejudices being entirely overcome. Had Scott, to his strong sense and dexterous ingenuity, his well-grounded knowledge of the jurisprudence of his country, and his admirable industry, added a risk and ready talent for debate and declamation, I can have no doubt that his triumph must have been as complete as Mr. Jeffrey's; nor in truth do I much question that, had one really great and interesting case been submitted to his sole management, the result would have been to place his professional character for skill and judgment, and variety of resource, on so firm a basis, that even his rising celebrity as a man of letters could not have seriously disturbed it. Nay, I think it quite possible, that had he been intrusted with one such case after his reputation was established, and he had been compelled to do his abilities some measure of justice in his own secret estimate, he might have displayed very considerable powers even as a forensic speaker. But no opportunities of this engaging kind having ever been presented to him — after he had persisted for more than ten years in sweeping the floor of the Parliament House, without meeting with any employment but that would have suited the dullest drudge, and seen himself firmly and yearly more and more distanced by contemporaries or whose general capacity he could have had little respect — while, at the same time, he already felt his own position in the eyes of society at large to have been signally elevated as a consequence of his extra-professional exertions — it is not wonderful that disgust should have gradually gained upon him, and that the sudden blaze and tumult of renown which surrounded the author of the Lay should have at last determined him to concentrate all his ambition on the pursuits which had alone brought him distinction.

We have seen that, before he formed his contract with Ballantyne, he was in possession of such a fixed income as might have satisfied all his desires, had he not found his family increasing rapidly about him. Even as that was, with nearly if not quite £1000 per annum, he might perhaps have retired not only from the Bar, but from Edinburgh, and settled entirely at Ashiestiel or Broadmeadows, without encountering what any man of his station and habits ought to have considered as an imprudent risk. He had, however, no wish to cut himself off from the busy and intelligent society to which he had been hitherto accustomed; and resolved not to leave the Bar until he should have at least used his best efforts for obtaining, in addition to his Shrievalty, one of those Clerkships of the Supreme Court, which are usually considered as honorable retirements for advocates who, at a certain standing, up all hopes of reaching the Bench. "I determined," he said, "that literature should be my staff but not my crutch, that the profits of my literary labour, however convenient otherwise, should not, if I could help it, become necessary to my ordinary expenses. Upon such a post an author may hope to retreat, without any perceptible alteration of circumstances, whenever the time should arrive that the public grew weary of his endeavours to please, or he himself should tire of the pen. I possessed so many friends capable of assisting me in this object of ambition, that I could have overrated my own prospects of obtaining the preferment which I limited my wishes; and, in fact, I obtained, in a long period, the reversion of a situation which completely satisfied them."¹

The first notice of this affair that occurs in his correspondence, is in a note of Lord Dalkeith's, February 2, 1800, which his noble friend says—"My father desires me to tell you that he has had a communication with Lord Melrose within these few days, and that he thinks your business good train, though not certain." I consider it as clear, then, that he began his negotiations about a seat at the clerk's table immediately after the Lay was published; and this in the closest connexion with his trading adventure. His design of quitting the Bar was divulged, however, to none but those immediately necessary to his negotiation with the Government; and the nature of his alliance with the printing establishment remained, I believe, not only unknown, but for many years wholly unsuspected, by any of his daily companions except Erskine.

The forming of this commercial tie was one of the most important steps in Scott's life. He continued bound to it during twenty years, and its influence on his literary exertions and his worldly fortunes was productive of much good and a little evil. Its effects were in truth so mixed and balanced during the vicissitudes of a long and vigorous career, that at this moment doubt whether it ought, on the whole, to be considered with more of satisfaction or of regret.

With what zeal he proceeded in advancing the views of a new copartnership, his correspondence bears ample evidence. The brilliant and captivating genius, now acknowledged universally, was soon discovered by the leading booksellers be united with such abundance of matured information in all departments, and, above all, with such indefatigable industry as to mark him out for the most valuable workman they could engage for the furtherance of their schemes. He had, therefore, cast a shrewd and penetrating eye over the literary enterprise, and developed in his own mind the outlines of many extensive plans, which wanted nothing but the command of a sufficient body of able subalterns, to be carried into execution with splendid success. Such of the elements supplied with in his own person were, with rare exceptions, carried to a triumphant conclusion; but the alliance with a bookseller soon infected him with the proverbial rashness of the mercantile adventurer. While, at the same time, his feelings for other men of letters, and his characteristic propensity to overrate their talents, combined to induce him and his friends into a multitude of arrangements, the results of which were often extremely embarrassing, and, collectively, in the aggregate, all but disastrous. It is an old proverb that wherever there is a secret there must be some wrong; and dearly did he pay the penalty for the error in which he had chosen to involve this transaction. From the beginning, that whatever he wrote or printed must be printed at that press; and had he catered for his readers as author and sole editor, all had been well, but had the booksellers known his direct pecuniary interest in keeping the printing extending the occupation of those types, they would not have taken into account his lively imagination and sanguine temperament, as well as his taste and judgment, and could not have recommended him so far more deliberately than they too often did, his own recommendations of new literary schemes, excepted these were with some dim understanding that, if the printing press were employed, his own literary skill would be at his friend's disposal for the general superintendence of the undertaking. On the other hand, Scott's suggestions were, in many cases, perhaps in the majority of them, conveyed to Ballantyne, whose habitual deference to his opinion induced him to advocate them with enthusiastic zeal, and the bookseller who had thus pledged his personal authority for the success of the proposed scheme, must have felt himself committed to the bookseller, and could hardly refuse with decency a certain share of the pecuniary risk, by allowing the method of his own payment to be regulated according to the employer's convenience. Hence, by degrees, was woven the web of entanglement from which neither Ballantyne nor his adviser had any means of escape, except only in that indomitable spirit, the mainspring of personal industry altogether unparalleled, to which, thus set in motion, the world owes its most gigantic monument of literary genius.

¹ Introduction to the Lay of the Last Minstrel. — 1830.

In the very first letter that I have found from Scott to his partner (April 12, 1805), occur suggestions about new editions of Thomson, Dryden, and Tacitus, and, moreover, of a general edition of the British Poets, in one hundred volumes 8vo, of which last he designed to be himself the editor, and expected that the booksellers would readily give him 30 guineas per volume for his trouble. This gigantic scheme interfered with one of the general body of London publishers, and broke down accordingly; but Constable entered with zeal into the plan of a Dryden, and Scott without delay busied himself in the collection of materials for its elucidation.

Precisely at the time when his poetical ambition had been stimulated by the first outburst of universal applause, and when he was forming these engagements with Ballantyne, a fresh impetus was given to the volunteer mania, by the appointment of the Earl of Moira (afterwards Marquis of Hastings) to the chief military command in the north. The Earl had married, the year before, a Scottish Peeress, the Countess of London, and entered with great zeal into her sympathy with the patriotic enthusiasm of her countrymen. Edinburgh was converted into a camp: besides a large garrison of regular troops, nearly 10,000 fencibles and volunteers were almost constantly under arms. The lawyer wore his uniform under his gown; the shopkeeper measured out his wares in scarlet; in short, the citizens of all classes made more use for several months of the military than of any other dress; and the new commander-in-chief consulted equally his own gratification and theirs, by devising a succession of manœuvres which presented a vivid image of the art of war conducted on a large and scientific scale. In the sham battles and sham sieges of 1805, Craigmillar, Gilmerton, Braidhills, and other formidable positions in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, were the scenes of many a dashing assault and resolute defence; and occasionally the spirits of the mock combatants — English and Scotch, or Lowland and Highland — became so much excited, that there was some difficulty in preventing the rough mockery of warfare from passing into its realities. The Highlanders, in particular, were very hard to be dealt with; and once, at least, Lord Moira was forced to alter at the eleventh hour his programme of battle, because a battalion of kilted fencibles could not or would not understand that it was their duty to be beat. Such days as these must have been more nobly spirit-stirring than even the best specimens of the fox-chase. To the end of his life, Scott delighted to recall the details of their counter-marches, ambuscades, charges, and pursuits, and in all of these is associates of the Light Horse agree that none figured more advantageously than himself. Yet such military interludes seem only to have whetted his appetite for closer work. Indeed, nothing but a complete publication of his letters could give an adequate notion of the facility with which he even at his early period combined the conscientious magistrate, the martinet quartermaster, the speculative printer, and the ardent lover of literature for its own sake.

In the course of the summer and autumn of 1805, we find him in correspondence about another gigantic scheme -- an uniform series of the Ancient English Chronicles; and there are hints of various minor undertakings in the editorial line. In the same year he contributed to Mr. Jeffrey's journal an admirable article on Todd's edition of Spenser, another, on Godwin's Fleetwood; a third, on the Highland Society's Report concerning the poems of Ossian; a fourth, on Johnson's translation of Froissart; a fifth, on Colonel Thornton's Sporting Tour; and a sixth, on some cookery books -- the two last being excellent specimens of his humour. By September, meanwhile, he had made considerable progress with his Dryden: for we find him then writing to Eliza. "I will not castrate John Dryden. I would as soon castrate my own father, as I believe Jupiter did of yore. What would you say to any man who would castrate Shakspeare, or Massinger, or Beaumont and Fletcher?" I don't say but that it may be very proper to select correct passages for the use of boarding schools and colleges, being sensible no improper ideas can be suggested in these seminaries, unless they are intruded or smuggled under the beards and ruffs of our old dramatists. But in making an edition of a man of genius's works for libraries and collections, and such I conceive a complete edition of Dryden to be, I must give my author as I find him, and will not cut out the page, even to get rid of the blot, little as I like it. We see not the pages of Swift, and even of Pope, larded with decency, and often of the most disgusting kind? and do we not see them upon all shelves and dressing tables, and in all alcoves and boudoirs? Is not Prior the most indecent of tale-tellers, not even excepting La Fontaine? and how often do we see his works in female hands? In fact, it is not passages of ludicrous indelicacy that corrupt the manners of a people—it is the sonnets which a prurient genius like Master Little sings virginibus puerisque—it is the sentimental slang, half lewd, half methodistic, that debauches the understanding, inflames the sleeping passions, and prepares the reader to give way as soon as a tempter appears. At the same time, I am not at all happy when I peruse some of Dryden's comedies: they are very stupid, as well as indelicate;—sometimes, however, there is a considerable vein of liveliness and humour, and all of them present extraordinary pictures of the age in which he lived. My critical notes will not be very numerous, but I hope to illustrate the political poems, as Absalom and Achitophel, the Hind and Panther, &c., with some curious annotations. I have already made a complete search among some hundred pamphlets of that pamphlet-writing age, and with considerable success, as I have found several which throw light on my author."

But there is yet another important item to be included in the list of his literary labours of this year. The General Preface to his Novels informs us, that "about 1805" he wrote the opening chapters of Waverley; and the second title, 'Two Sixty Years Since, selected, as he says, "that the actual date of publication might correspond with the period in which the scene was laid," leaves no doubt that he had begun the work so early in 1805 as to contemplate publishing it before Christmas.¹ He adds, in the same page, that he was induced, by the favourable reception of the Lady of the Lake, to think of giving some of his recollections of Highland scenery and customs in prose; but this is only one instance of the inaccuracy as to matters of date which pervades all those delightful Prefaces. The Lady of the Lake was not published until five years after the first chapters of Waverley were written; its success, therefore, could have had no share in suggesting the original design of a Highland novel, though no doubt it principally influenced him to take up that design after it had been long suspended, and almost forgotten.

"Having proceeded," he says, "as far as I think the seventh chapter, I shewed my work to a critical friend, whose opinion was unfavourable; and having then some poetical reputation, I was unwilling to risk the loss of it by attempting a new style of composition. I, therefore, then threw aside the work I had commenced, without either reluctance or remonstrance. I ought to add, that though my ingenuous friend's sentence was afterwards reversed, on an appeal to the public, it cannot be considered as any imputation on his good taste; for the specimen subjected to his criticism did not extend beyond the departure of the hero for Scotland, and consequently had not entered upon the part of the story which was finally found most interesting." It is, I think, evident from a letter of 1810, that the first critic of the opening chapters of Waverley was William Erskine.

¹ I have ascertained, since this page was written, that a small part of the MS. of Waverley is on paper bearing the watermark of 1805—the rest on paper of 1813.

His correspondence shews how largely he was exerting himself all this while in the service of authors less fortunate than himself. James Hogg, among others, continued to occupy from time to time his attention; and he assisted regularly and assiduously throughout this and the succeeding year Mr. Robert Jamieson, an industrious and intelligent antiquary, who had engaged in editing a collection of ancient popular ballads before the third volume of the Minstrelsy appeared, and who at length published his very curious work in 1807. Meantime, Ashestiel, in place of being less resorted to by literary strangers than Lasswade cottage had been, shared abundantly in the fresh attractions of the Lay, and "booksellers in the plural number" were preceded and followed by an endless variety of tourists, whose main temptation from the south had been the hope of seeing the Borders in company with their Minstrel. One of this year's guests was Mr. Southey — their first meeting, the commencement of much kind intercourse. Scott still writes of himself as "idling away his hours;" he had already learned to appear as if he were doing so to all who had no particular right to confidence respecting the details of his privacy.

Mr. Skene arrived just after a great storm and flood in August; he says in his Memoranda — "The ford of Ashestiel was never a good one, and for some time after this it remained not a little perilous. Scott was himself the first to attempt the passage on his favourite black horse Captain, who had scarcely entered the river when he plunged beyond his depth, and had to swim to the other side with his burden. It requires a good horseman to swim a deep and rapid stream, but he trusted to the vigour of his steady trooper, and in spite of his lameness kept his seat manfully."

Mr. Skene soon discovered a change which had recently been made in his friend's distribution of his time. Previously it had been his custom, whenever professional business or social engagements occupied the middle part of his day, to seize some hours for study after he was supposed to have retired to bed. His physician suggested that this was very likely to aggravate his nervous headaches, the only malady he was subject to in the prime of his manhood; and, contemplating with steady eye a course not only of unremitting but of increasing industry, he resolved to reverse his plan. In short he had now adopted the habits in which, with slender variation, he ever after persevered when in the country. He rose by five o'clock, lit his own fire when the season required one, and shaved and dressed with great deliberation—for he was a very martinet as to all but the mere coxcombries of the toilet, not abhorring effeminate dandyism itself so cordially as the slightest approach to personal slovenliness, or even those “bed-gown and slipper tricks,” as he called them, in which literary men are so apt to indulge. Glad in his shooting-jacket, or whatever dress he meant to use till dinner time, he was seated at his desk by six o'clock, all his papers arranged before him in the most accurate order, and his books of reference marshalled around him on the floor, while at least one favourite dog lay watching his eye, just beyond the line of circumvallation. Thus, by the time the family assembled for breakfast between nine and ten, he had done enough (in his own language) “to break the neck of the day's work.” After breakfast, a couple of hours more were given to his solitary tasks, and by noon he was, as he used to say, “his own man.” When the weather was bad, he would labour incessantly all the morning; but the general rule was to be out and on horseback by one o'clock at the latest; while, if any more distant excursion had been proposed over night, he was ready to start on it by ten; his occasional rainy days of unintermitted study forming, as he said, a fund in his favour, out of which he was entitled to draw for accommodation whenever the sun shone with special brightness.

It was another rule, that every letter he received should be answered that same day. Nothing else could have enabled him to keep abreast with the flood of communications that in the sequel put his good nature to the severest test—but already the demands on him in this way also were numerous; and he included attention to them among the necessary business which must be despatched before he had a right to close his writing-box, or as he phrased it, “to say, out damned spot, and be a gentleman.” In turning over his enormous mass of correspondence, I have almost invariably found some tion that, when a letter had remained more than a day unanswered, it was because he found occasion for might not to omit, that in those days Scott was far too busy a dragoon not to take a principal share in the stable

Before beginning his desk work in the morning, he only visited his favourite steed, and neither Captain nor Brown Adam (so called after one of the London Minstrelsy), liked to be fed except by him. The latter was indeed altogether untractable in other hands, in his the most submissive and faithful slave. The moment he was bridled and saddled, it was the custom to open the stable door as a signal that his master expected him, when he immediately trotted to the side of the leaping on stone, of

Scott from his lameness found it convenient to make himself stand there, silent and motionless as a rock, until fairly in his seat, after which he displayed his joy by galloping triumphantly through a brilliant and copious shower of curvetts.

Brown Adam never suffered himself to be backed but by his master. He broke, I believe, one groom's arm, and his leg in the rash attempt to tamper with his dignity. He was so was at this time the constant parlour dog. He was handsome, very intelligent, and naturally very fierce, but was as a lamb among the children. As for a brace of pets, styled Douglas and Ferry, he kept one window steadily open, whatever might be the state of the weather, by which they might leap out and in as the fancy moved them.

They talked to Camp as if he understood what was said. The animal certainly did understand not a little of it, in fact, it seemed as if he perfectly comprehended on all occasions that his master considered him as a sensible and friend. The greyhounds as volatile young creatures which he rears must be borne with every day," says Mr Skene, "we had some hours of amusement with the greyhounds, or riding at random over the country of spearing salmon in the Tweed by sunlight, which was a sport, moreover, we often renewed at night by the help of

This amusement of burning the water, as it is called, is without some hazard, for the large salmon generally in pools, the depths of which it is not easy to estimate by torchlight, so that not unfrequently, when the tanner makes a determined thrust at a fish apparently such, his eye has grossly deceived him, and instead of the point of the weapon encountering the prey, he finds himself launched with corresponding vehemence heels over head into the pool, both spear and salmon gone, the torch thrown out by the concussion of the boat, and quenched in the stream, while the boat itself has of course receded to some distance. I remember the first time I accompanied our friend, he went right over the gunwale in this manner, and had I not accidentally been at his side, and made a successful grasp at the skirt of his jacket as he plunged overboard, he must at least have had an awkward dive for it. Such are the contingencies of burning the water. The pleasures consist in being penetrated with cold and wet, having your shins broken against the stones in the dark, and perhaps mastering one fish out of every twenty you take aim at."

In all these amusements, but particularly in the burning of the water, Scott's most regular companion at this time was John Lord Somerville, who united with higher qualities an enthusiastic love for such sports, and consummate address in them. This amiable nobleman then passed his autumns at Alwyn, some eight or nine miles below Ashestiel. They interchanged visits almost every week; and Scott profited largely by his friend's known skill in every department of rural economy. He always talked of him as his master in the art of planting.

The laird of Rubislaw seldom failed to spend a part of the autumn at Ashestiel, as long as Scott remained there; and during these visits they often gave a wider scope to their expeditions. "Indeed," says Mr. Skene, "there are few scenes at all celebrated either in the history, tradition, or romance of the Border counties, which we did not explore together in the course of our rambles. We traversed the entire vales of the Yarrow and Ettrick, with all their sweet tributary glens, and never failed to find a hearty welcome from the farmers at whose houses we stopped, either for dinner or for the night. He was their chief-magistrate, extremely popular in that official capacity; and nothing could be more gratifying than the frank and hearty reception which everywhere greeted our arrival, however unexpected. The exhilarating air of the mountains, and the healthy exercise of the day, secured our relishing homely fare, and we found inexhaustible entertainment in the varied display of character which the affability of the Sheriff drew forth on all occasions in genuine breadth and purity. The beauty of the scenery gave full employment to my pencil, with the free and frequent exercise of which he never seemed to feel impatient. He was at all times ready and willing to alight when any object attracted my notice, and used to seat himself beside me on the brae, to con over some ballad appropriate to the occasion, or narrate the tradition of the glen — sometimes, perhaps, to note a passing idea in his pocket-book ; but this was rare, for in general he relied with confidence on the great storehouse of his memory.

“ One of our earliest expeditions was to visit the wild scenery of the mountainous tract above Moffat, including the cascade of the Grey Mare’s Tail, and the dark tarn called Loch Skene. In our ascent to the lake we got completely bewildered in the thick fog which generally envelopes the rugged features of that lonely region ; and, as we were groping through the maze of bogs, the ground gave way, and down went horse and horsemen pell-mell into a slough of peaty mud and black water, out of which, entangled as we were with our plaids and floundering nags, it was no easy matter to get extricated. Indeed, unless we had prudently left our gallant steeds at a farm-house below, and borrowed hill-ponies for the occasion, the result might have been worse than laughable. As it was, we rose like the spirits of the bog, covered cap-à-pie with slime, to free themselves from which, our wily ponies took to rolling about on the heather, and we had nothing for it but following their example. At length, as we approached the gloomy loch, a huge eagle heaved himself from the margin and rose right over us, screaming his scorn of the intruders ; and altogether it would be impossible to picture anything more desolately savage than the scene which opened, as if raised by enchantment on purpose to gratify the poet’s eye ; thick folds of fog rolling incessantly over the face of the inky waters, but rent asunder now in one direction, and then in another — so as to afford us a glimpse of some projecting rock or naked point of land, or island bearing a few scraggy stumps of pine — and then closing again in universal darkness upon the cheerless waste. Much of the scenery of Old Mortality was drawn from that day’s ride. It was also in the course of this excursion that we encountered that amusing personage introduced into Guy Mannering as ‘ Tod Gabbie.’ He was one of those itinerants who gain a subsistence among the moorland farmers by relieving them of foxes, polecats, and the like depredators — a half-witted, stuttering, and most original creature.

“ Having explored all the wonders of Moffatdale, we turned ourselves towards Blackhouse Tower, to visit Scott’s worthy acquaintances the Laidlaws, and reached it after a long and intricate ride, having been again led off our course by the greyhounds, who had been seduced by a strange dog that joined company to engage in full pursuit upon the tract of what we presume to be either a fox or a roe-deer. The chase was protracted and perplexing, from the mist that skirted the hill-tops; but at length we reached the scene of slaughter, and were much distressed to find that a stately old he-goat had been the victim. He seemed to have fought a stout battle for his life, but now lay mangled in the midst of his panting enemies, who betrayed, on our approach, strong consciousness of delinquency and apprehension of the lash, which was administered accordingly to soothe the manes of the luckless Capricorn—though, after all, the dogs were not so much to blame in mistaking his game flavour, since the fogs must have kept him out of view till the last moment. Our visit to Blackhouse was highly interesting; the excellent old tenant being still in life, and the whole family group presenting a perfect picture of innocent and simple happiness, while the animated, intelligent, and original conversation of our friend William was quite charming.

“Sir Adam Fergusson and the Ettrick Shepherd were of the party that explored Loch Skene and hunted the unfortunate he-goat.

“I need not tell you that Saint Mary’s Loch, and the Loch of the Lowes, were among the most favourite scenes of our excursions, as his fondness for them continued to his last days, and we have both visited them many times together in his company. I may say the same of the Teviot and the Aill, Borthwick water, and the lonely towers of Buccleuch and Harden, Minto, Roxburgh, Gilnockie, &c. I think it was either in 1805 or 1806 that I first explored the Borthwick with him, when on our way to pass a week at Langholm with Lord and Lady Dalkeith, upon which occasion the otter-hunt, so well described in Guy Maunering, was got up by our noble host; and I can never forget the delight with which Scott observed the enthusiasm of the high-spirited yeomen, who had assembled in multitudes to partake the sport of their dear young chief, well mounted, and dashing about from rock to rock with a reckless ardour which recalled the alacrity of their forefathers in following the Buccleuchs of former days through adventures of a more serious order.

“Whatever the banks of the Tweed, from its source to its termination, presented of interest, we frequently visited; and I do verily believe there is not a single ford in the whole course of that river which we have not traversed together. He had an amazing fondness for fords, and was not a little adventurous in plunging through, whatever might be the state of the flood, and this even though there happened to be a bridge in

If it seemed possible to scramble through, he scouted to yards about, and in fact preferred the ford, and it is to be marked, that most of the heroes of his tales seem to have concluded with similar propensities— even the White Lady— and delights in the ford. He sometimes even attempted on foot, though his lameness interfered considerably with progress among the slippery stones. Upon one occasion when I was assisting him through the Lattrick, and we had got upon the same tottering stone in the middle of the river, when some story about a kelpie occurring to him, he would stop and tell it with all his usual vivacity— and at the end of laughing heartily at his own joke, he slipped his foot, on the shuffling beneath him, and down he went headlong into the pool, pulling me after him. We escaped, however, with more than a thorough drenching and the loss of his stick, and floated down the river, and he was as ready as ever for a new exploit before his clothes were half dried upon his back.”

But this time Mr. and Mrs. Scott made a short excursion to the Lakes of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and visited some of their finest scenery, in company with Mr. Wordsworth. I found no written narrative of this little tour, but I have heard Scott speak with enthusiastic delight of the reception he met with in the humble cottage which his brother poet inhabited on the banks of Grasmere; and at least one of the days they spent together was destined to furnish a theme to the verse of each, namely, that which they gave to the Wreck of Helvellyn, where, in the course of the preceding year, a young gentleman having lost his way and perished in climbing over a precipice, his remains were discovered, three years afterwards, still watched by “a faithful terrier bitch, constant attendant during frequent rambles among the rocks.” This day they were accompanied by an illustrious philosopher, who was also a true poet— and might have been the greatest of poets had he chosen; and I have heard Mr. Wordsworth say, that it would be difficult to express the feelings which he, who so often had climbed Helvellyn alone, himself standing on its summit with two such men as Scott and Davy.

After leaving Mr. Wordsworth, Scott carried his wife to a few days at Gilsland, among the scenes where they had met; and his reception by the company at the wells was such as to make him look back with something of regret, as well as of satisfaction, to the change that had occurred in his circumstances since 1797. They were, however, enjoying themselves much there, when he received intelligence which induced him to believe that a French force was about to land in Scotland:—the alarm indeed had spread far and wide; and a mighty gathering of volunteers, horse and foot, from the Lowlands and the Border country, took place in consequence at Dalkeith. He was not slow to obey the summons. He had luckily chosen to accompany on horseback the carriage in which Mrs. Scott travelled. His good steel carried him to the spot of rendezvous, full a hundred miles from Gilsland, within twenty-four hours; and on reaching it, though no doubt to his disappointment the alarm had already blown over, he was delighted with the general enthusiasm that had thus been put to the test—and, above all, by the rapidity with which the yeomen of Ettrick Forest had poured down from their glens, under the guidance of his good friend and neighbour, Mr. Pringle of Torwoodlee. These fine fellows were quartered along with the Edinburgh troop when he reached Dalkeith and Musselburgh; and after some sham battling, and a few evenings of high jollity had crowned the needless muster of the beacon-fires, he immediately turned his horse again towards the south, and rejoined Mrs. Scott at Carlisle.¹

Poetical Works, edit. 1841, p. 629, and compare Wordsworth's Works, vol. III. p. 66.

By the way, it was during his fiery ride from Gilsland to Dalkeith, on the occasion above mentioned, that he composed his Bard's Incantation:—

“The forest of Glenmore is drear,
It is all of black pine and the dark oak-tree,” &c. — and the verses bear the full stamp of the feelings of the moment.

Meantime, the affair of the Clerkship, opened nine or ten months before, had not been neglected by the friends on whose counsel and assistance Scott had relied. Whether Mr. Pitt's hint to Mr. William Dundas, that he would willingly find an opportunity to promote the interests of the author of the Lay, or some conversation between the Duke of Buccleuch and Lord Melville, first encouraged him to this direction of his views, I am not able to state distinctly; but I believe that the desire to see his fortunes placed on some more substantial basis, was at this time partaken pretty equally by the three persons who had the principal influence in the distribution of the crown patronage in Scotland; and as his object was rather to secure a future than an immediate increase of official income, it was comparatively easy to make such an arrangement as would satisfy his ambition. George Home of Wedderburn, an old friend of his family, had now held a Clerkship for upwards of thirty years. In those days there was no system of retiring pensions for the worn-out functionary of this class, and the usual method was, either that he should resign in favour of a successor who advanced a sum of money according to the circumstances of his age and health, or for a coadjutor to be associated with him in his patent, who undertook the duty on condition of a division of salary. Scott offered to relieve Mr. Home of all the labours of his office, and to allow him, nevertheless, to retain its emoluments entire; and the aged clerk of course joined his exertions to procure a conjoint-patent on these very advantageous terms. About the close of 1805, a new patent was drawn out accordingly; but, by a clerical inadvertency, it was drawn out solely in Scott's favour, no mention of Mr. Home being inserted in the instrument. Although, therefore, the sign-manual had been affixed, and there remained nothing but to pay the fees and take out the commission, Scott, on discovering this error, could not proceed in the business; since, in the event of his dying before Mr. Home, that gentleman would have lost the vested interest which he had stipulated to retain. A pending charge of pecuniary corruption had compelled Lord Melville to retire from office some time before Mr. Pitt's death (January 23, 1806); and the cloud of popular obloquy under which he now laboured, rendered it impossible that Scott should expect assistance from the quarter to which, under any other circumstances, he would naturally have turned for extrication from this difficulty. He therefore, as soon as the Fox and Grenville cabinet had been nominated, proceeded to London, to make in his own person such representations as might be necessary to secure the issuing of the patent in the right shape.

¹ See Note, “Alarm of Invasion,” Antiquary, vol. ii. p. 338.

It seems wonderful that he should ever have doubted for a single moment of the result; since, had the new Cabinet been purely Whig, and had he been the most violent and obnoxious of Tory partisans, neither of which was the case, the arrangement had been not only virtually, but, with the exception of an evident official blunder, formally completed; and no Secretary of State, as I must think, could have refused to rectify the paltry mistake in question, without a dereliction of every principle of honour. At this period, however, Scott had by no means measured either the character, the feelings, or the arrangements of great public functionaries, by the standard with which observation and experience subsequently furnished him. He had breathed hitherto, as far as political questions of all sorts were concerned, the hot atmosphere of a very narrow scene — and seems (from his letters) to have pictured to himself Whitehall and Downing Street as only a wider stage for the exhibition of the bitter and fanatical prejudices that tormented the petty circles of the Parliament House at Edinburgh; the true bearing and scope of which no man in after days more thoroughly understood, or more sincerely pitied. The seals of the Home Office had been placed in the hands of a nobleman of the highest character — moreover, an ardent lover of literature; — while the chief of the new Ministry was one of the most generous as well as tasteful of mankind; and there occurred no hesitation whatever on their parts. In communicating his success to the Earl of Dalkeith, whose warm personal kindness, without doubt, had first animated in his favour both the Duke of Buccleuch and Lord Melville, he says (London, February 11): — “ Lord Spencer, upon the nature of the transaction being explained in an audience with which he favoured me, was pleased to direct the commission to be issued, as an act of justice, regretting, he said, it had not been from the beginning his own deed. This was doing the thing handsomely, and like an English nobleman. I have been very much fêted and caressed here, almost indeed to suffocation, but have been made amends by meeting some old friends. . . . After all, a little literary reputation is of some use here. I suppose Solomon, when he compared a good name to a pot of ointment, meant that it oiled the hinges of the hall-doors into which the possessors of that inestimable treasure wished to penetrate. What a good name was in Jerusalem, a known name seems to be in London. If you are celebrated for writing verses or for slicing cucumbers, for being two feet taller or two feet less than any other biped, for acting plays when you should be whipped at school, or for attending schools and institutions when you should be preparing for your grave, — your notoriety becomes a talisman — an ‘Open Sesame’ before which everything gives way — till you are voted a bore, and discarded for a new plaything. As this is a consummation of notoriety which I am by no means ambitious of experiencing, I hope I shall be very soon able to shape my course northward, to enjoy my good fortune at my leisure and snap my fingers at the Bar and all its works. . . . I dine to-day at Holland-house; I refused before, lest it should be thought I was soliciting interest at quarter, as I abhor even the shadow of changing or going with the tide." He says elsewhere, "I never saw Fox on this or any other occasion, and never made any mention to him, conceiving, that in doing so, I might have supposed to express political opinions different from those I had always professed. In his private capacity, there was no man to whom I would have been more proud to owe an attention -- had I been so distinguished."¹

Among other eminent men with whom he on this occasion first made acquaintance, were Ellis's becom friends, Fanny Manning; with the latter of whom his intercourse became very close and confidential. It was now also that he saw Joanna Baillie, of whose Plays on the Passions he had seen, from their first appearance, an enthusiastic admirer. Mr. Sotheby, the translator of Oberon, &c. &c., was the friend who introduced him to the poetess of Hampstead. When asked in 1836 what impression he made upon her at this interview -- "I was at first," she answered, "a little disappointed, for I was fresh from the Lays, and had pictured to myself an ideal elegance and refinement of feature, but I had not time to dwell on this, as I had myself, if I had been in a crowd, and at a loss what to do, would have fixed upon that face among a thousand, as the index of the benevolence and the shrewdness that would help me in my stratagem. We had not talked long, however, before I saw in the expressive play of his countenance far more of elegance and refinement than I had missed in its lines." The acquaintance thus begun, soon ripened into the most affectionate intimacy; and thenceforth Mrs. Joanna Baillie and her distinguished brother, Dr. Matthew Baillie, were reckoned the friends to whose society Scott looked forward with the greatest pleasure when about to visit the metropolis. I have to have mentioned before that he had known Mr. Sotheby in a very early period of life, -- that amiable and excellent man having been stationed for some time at Edinburgh while King George III. was his Majesty as a captain of dragoons. Scott ever entertained for him a sincere regard; he was always, when in London, a frequent guest at his hospitable board, and owed to his personal acquaintance of not a few of their most eminent contemporaries.

Princess Caroline, Princess of Wales, was in those days considered by the Tories, whose politics her husband had uniformly pursued, as the victim of unmerited misfortune, cast aside, from the mere wantonness of caprice, by a gay and dissolute voluptuary; while the Prince's Whig associates had espoused his quarrel, and were already, as the event shewed, prepared to act, publicly as well as privately, as if they believed her to be among the most abandoned of her sex. I know not by whom Scott was first introduced to her little Court at Blackheath; but I think it was probably through Mrs. Hayman, a lady of her bedchamber, several of whose notes and letters occur about this time in the collection of his correspondence. The careless levity of the Princess's manner was observed by him, I have heard him say, with much regret, as likely to bring the purity of heart and mind, for which he gave her credit, into suspicion. For example, when, in the course of the evening, she conducted him by himself to admire some flowers in a conservatory, and, the place being rather dark, his lameness occasioned him to hesitate for a moment in following her down some steps which she had taken at a skip, she turned round, and said, with mock indignation, "Ah! false and faint-hearted troubadour! you will not trust yourself with me for fear of your neck!"

¹ Introduction to Marmion, 1830.

I find from one of Mrs. Hayman's letters, that on being asked, at Montague House, to recite some verses of his own, he replied that he had none unpublished which he thought worthy of her Royal Highness's attention, but introduced a short account of the Eltrick Shepherd, and repeated one of the ballads of the Mountain Bard, for which he was then endeavouring to procure subscribers. The Princess appears to have been interested by the story, and she affected, at all events, to be pleased with the lines; she desired that her name might be placed on the Shepherd's list, and thus he had at least one gleam of royal patronage.

I shall not dwell at present upon Scott's method of conduct in the circumstances of an eminently popular author beleaguered by the importunities of fashionable admirers. His bearing when first exposed to such influences was exactly what it was to the end, and I shall have occasion in the sequel to produce the evidence of more than one deliberate observer.

His nomination as Clerk of Session appeared in the Gazette (March 8, 1806) which announced the instalment of the Hon. Henry Erskine and John Clerk of Eldin as Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General for Scotland. The promotion at such a moment, of a distinguished Tory, might well excite the wonder of the Parliament House, and even when the circumstances were explained, the inferior local adherents of the chant cause were far from considering the conduct of superiors in this matter with feelings of satisfaction. Indication of such humour was deeply resented by his fiery spirit; and he in his turn showed his irritation in very well calculated to extend to higher quarters the with which his advancement had been regarded by as unworthy of his attention. In short, it was almost lately after a Whig Ministry had gazetted his appointment to an office which had for twelve months formed a principal subject of his ambition, that, rebelling against the implication of his having accepted something like a personal bribe at the hands of adverse politicians, he for the first put himself forward as a decided Tory partisan. The impeachment of Lord Melville was among the first measures of the new Government, and personal affection and gratified as well as heightened the zeal with which Scott took the issue of this, in his eyes, vindictive proceeding, though the ex-minister's ultimate acquittal was, as to all charges involving his personal honour, complete, it must be allowed that the investigation brought out many circumstances by no means creditable to his discretion, and the songs of his friends ought not, therefore, to have been indubitably jubilant. Such they were, however—at least in the north; and Scott took his share in them by writing a ballad which was sung by James Ballantyne, and received with warm applause, at a public dinner given in honour of the Duke on the 27th of June 1806.

The reader may turn to this song in the later editions of Scott's Works. Mr. W. Savage Lauder, a man of great learning and literary talents, has in a recent collective edition of his writings reproduced uncharitable judgments on distinguished contemporaries, which the action of advanced life might have been expected to cancel. Sir Walter Scott has his full share in these, but he suffers in good company. However, notice the distinct assertion (vol. I. p. 329), that Scott "wrote and sang a triumphal song on the death of a minister whom, in his lifetime, he had flattered, and who was just in his coffin when he sang the fox is run to earth." Constable of Edinburgh heard him, and related the fact to Curran, who expressed his incredulity with great force, and his abhorrence was greater than his incredulity. "The noble foundation on which this story can have been built is the fact, to the fox." That song was written and sung in June 1806. Mr. Fox was then minister, and died in September 1806. The lines which Mr. Curran speaks of as "flattering Fox during his lifetime," are very coincident: they appeared in the epistle prefixed to the first canto of The Rival Poets, which was published in February 1806, and their subject is the interment of the tombs of Pitt and Fox in Westminster Abbey. Every-

But enough of this. Scott's Tory feelings certainly appear to have been kept in a very excited state during the whole of that short reign of the Whigs. He then, for the first time, mingled keenly in the details of county politics, — canvassed electors — harangued meetings; and, in a word, made himself conspicuous as a leading instrument of his party — more especially as an indefatigable local manager, wherever the parliamentary interest of the Buccleuch family was in peril. But he was, in truth, earnest and serious in his belief that the new rulers of the country were disposed to abolish many of its most valuable institutions; and he regarded with special jealousy certain schemes of innovation with respect to the courts of law and the administration of justice, which were set on foot by the Crown officers for Scotland. At a debate of the Faculty of Advocates on some of these propositions, he made a speech much longer than any he had ever before delivered in that assembly; and several who heard it have assured me, that it had a flow and energy of eloquence for which those who knew him best had been quite unprepared. When the meeting broke up, he walked across the Mound, on his way to Castle Street, between Mr. Jeffrey and another of his reforming friends, who complimented him on the rhetorical powers he had been displaying, and would willingly have treated the subject-matter of the discussion playfully. But his feelings had been moved to an extent far beyond their apprehension: he exclaimed, "No, no — 'tis no laughing matter; little by little, whatever your wishes may be, you will destroy and undermine, until nothing of what makes Scotland Scotland shall remain." And so saying, he turned round to conceal his agitation — but not before Mr. Jeffrey saw tears gushing down his cheek — resting his head until he recovered himself on the wall of the Mound. Seldom, if ever, in his more advanced age, did any feelings obtain such mastery.

Before any of these scenes occurred he had entered upon his duties as Clerk of Session; and as he continued to discharge them with exemplary regularity, and to the entire satisfaction both of the Judges and the Bar, during the long period of body who knew Scott knows that he never sang a song in his life; and if that had not been notorious, who but Mr. Landor could have heard without "incredulity," that he sang a triumphal song on the death of Fox in the presence of the publisher of Marmion and proprietor of the Edinburgh Review? I may add, though it is needless, that Constable's son-in-law and partner, Mr. Cadell; "never heard of such a song as that described by Mr. Landor."

five years, I think it proper to tell precisely in what consisted.

Court of Session sat, in his time, from the 12th of May to the 2th of July, and again from the 12th of November, to the next interval at Christmas, to the 12th of March. The Judges of the Inner Court took their places on the Bench, every day, not later than ten o'clock, and remained according to the usual course of business ready for despatch, but seldom for more or more than six hours daily, during which the principal Clerks continued seated at a table below the Bench, to attend to the progress of the suits, and record the decisions of the Court of all classes being equally apportioned among them.

The Court of Session, however, does not sit on Monday, that day being reserved for the criminal business of the Court of Justiciary, and there is also another blank day in every week, the Trind Wednesday, as it is called, when the Judges are assembled for the hearing of title questions, which belong to a separate jurisdiction, of comparatively small value, and having its own separate establishment of Clerks. On the whole, then, Scott's attendance in Court may be said to have amounted, on the average, to from four to six hours daily during rather less than six months out of the year. A little of the Clerk's business in Court is merely formal, and mechanical; but there are few days in which he is not called upon for the exertion of his higher faculties, in recording the decisions of the Bench, orally pronounced, to be reduced to type; which, in a new, complex, or difficult case, cannot be victoriously done without close attention to all the proceedings, oral and written documents, an accurate understanding of the principles or precedents on which it has been determined, and a rough command of the whole vocabulary of legal forms. The indolent men, promoted through the mere wantonness of royal patronage, might, no doubt, contrive to devolve the greater part of their duty upon humbler assistants; but in general the office had been held by gentlemen of high character and talents; and more than one among Scott's contemporaries enjoyed the reputation of legal science that would have done honour to the Bench. Such men, of course, prided themselves on doing well whatever it was their proper function to do; and it was by their example, not that of the drones who were enabled to lean upon unseen and irresponsible inferiors, that Scott uniformly modelled his own conduct as a Clerk of Court. To do this, required, of necessity, constant study of law-papers and authorities at home. There was also a great deal of really base drudgery, such as the authenticating of registered deeds by signature, which he had to go through out of Court; he had, too, a Shrievalty, though not a heavy one, all the while upon his hands;—and, on the whole, it forms one of the most remarkable features in his history, that, throughout the most active period of his literary career, he must have devoted a large proportion of his hours, during half at least of every year, to the conscientious discharge of professional duties.

Henceforth, then, when in Edinburgh, his literary work was performed chiefly before breakfast; with the assistance of such evening hours as he could contrive to rescue from the consideration of Court papers, and from those social engagements in which, year after year, as his celebrity advanced, he was of necessity more and more largely involved; and of those entire days during which the Court of Session did not sit—days which, by most of those holding the same official station, were given to relaxation and amusement. So long as he continued quartermaster of the Volunteer Cavalry, of course he had, even while in Edinburgh, some occasional horse exercise; but, in general, his town life henceforth was in that respect as inactive as his country life ever was the reverse. He scorned for a long while to attach any consequence to this complete alternation of habits; but we shall find him confessing in the sequel that it proved highly injurious to his bodily health.

I may here observe, that the duties of his clerkship brought him into close daily connexion with a set of gentlemen, most of whom were soon regarded by him with the most cordial affection and confidence. One of his new colleagues was David Hume (the nephew of the historian), whose lectures on the Law of Scotland are characterised with just eulogy in the Ashiestiel Memoir, and who subsequently became a Baron of the Exchequer; a man as virtuous and amiable, as conspicuous for masculine vigour of intellect and variety of knowledge. Another was Hector Maedonald Buchanan of Drummakill, a frank-hearted and generous gentleman, not the less acceptable to Scott for the Highland prejudices which he inherited with the high blood of Clanranald; at whose beautiful seat of Ross Priory, on the shores of Lochlomond, he was henceforth almost annually a visitor—a circumstance which has left many traces in the Waverley Novels. A third (though I believe of later appointment), with whom his intimacy was not less strict, was the late excellent Sir Robert Dundas, of Beech-

d, Bart. ; and the fourth, was the friend of his boyhood, of the dearest he ever had, Colin Mackenzie of Portmore. With these gentlemen's families, he and his lived in such constant familiarity of kindness, that the children all called their fathers' colleagues uncles, and the mothers of their little friends, aunts; and in truth, the establishment was a brotherhood.

CHAPTER V.

Marmion — Edition of Dryden, &c. — Morritt — Domestic life — Quarrel with Constable & Co. — John Ballantyne started as a Publisher — The Quarterly Review begun. 1806-1809.

DURING the whole of 1806 and 1807 Dryden continued to occupy the greater share of Scott's literary hours; but in the course of the former year he found time, and (notwithstanding a few political hickerings) inclination to draw up three papers for the Edinburgh Review; one being that exquisite piece of humour, the article on the Miseries of Human Life, to which Mr. Jeffrey added some, if not all, of the Reviewers' Groans. He also edited, with Preface and Notes, Original Memoirs written during the Great Civil Wars; being the Life of Sir Henry Slingsby, and Memoirs of Captain Hodgson, &c. This volume was put forth in October 1806 by Constable; and in November he began Marmion, — the first of his own Poems in which that enterprising firm had a primary part.

He was at this time in communication with several booksellers, each of whom would willingly have engrossed his labour; but from the moment that his undertakings began to be serious, he seems to have acted on the maxim, that no author should ever let any one horse fancy that they had obtained a right of monopoly over his works — or, as he expressed it, in the language of the Scottish feudalists, "that they had completely thiered him to their mill." Of the conduct of Messrs. Longman, he has attested that it was liberal beyond his expectation; but, nevertheless, a negotiation which they now opened proved fruitless. Constable offered a thousand guineas for the poem very shortly after it was begun, and without having seen one line of it. It is hinted in the Introduction of 1830, that private circumstances rendered it desirable for Scott to obtain the immediate command of such a sum; the price was actually paid long before the book was published; and it suits very well with Constable's character to suppose that his readiness to advance the money may have outstripped the calculations of more established dealers, and thus cast the balance in his

He was not, however, so unwise as to keep the whole to himself. His bargain being concluded, he transferred a fourth of the copyright to Miller of Allendale and another to John Murray, then of Fleet Street, and at once replied, "We both view it as honourable, and glorious to be concerned in the publication of a book by Walter Scott." The news that a third of the price was paid for an unseen and unedited MS. excited in the public a portentous; and it must be allowed that the man who had received such a sum for a performance in circumstances that were almost without precedent, as well as in the hands of a man whose private circumstances which he alluded to precipitated his reappearance as a poet were worthy of his brother Thomas's final withdrawal from the office of a Writer to the Signet, but it is extremely improbable in the absence of any such occurrence, a young, enterprising man would have long resisted the stimulus which had attended the last Ministerial formed," he says, "the prudent resolution to bestow more labour than I had yet done, and to be in no hurry to announce myself as a candidate for literary fame. Especially, particular passages of a poem which was finally in my opinion were laboured with a good deal of care by me, and such much care was seldom bestowed. Whether the work was the labour or not, I am no competent judge, but I am permitted to say, that the period of its composition was a happy one in my life; so much so, that I remember at this moment (1830) some of the spots in which particular passages were composed." The first four of the Waverley Epistles are dated Ashstead, and they point out to us not only some of these spots. There is a knoll with old ashes on the adjoining farm of the Peel, where he used to sit of sitting by himself, and it still bears the name of Waverley's Knoll. Another favourite seat was beneath a tree hard by the river, at the extremity of the haugh of Waverley. It was here that while meditating his verses he

"To waste the solitary day
In plucking from you fen the reed,
And watch it floating down the Tweed."

He frequently wandered far from home, however, attended by a dog, and would return late in the evening, having for an hour slip away among the soft and melancholy wildernesses where Yarrow creeps from her fountains. The lines, “ Oft in my mind such thoughts awake,

By lone Saint Mary’s silent lake,” &c.

paint a scene not less impressive than what Byron found amidst the gigantic pines of the forest of Ravenna; and how completely does he set himself before us in the moment of his gentler and more solemn inspiration, by the closing couplet, --

“ Your horse’s hoof-tread sounds too rude,
So silly is the solitude.”

But when the theme was of a more stirring order, he enjoyed pursuing it over brake and fell at the full speed of his Lieutenant. I well remember his saying, as I rode with him across the hills from Ashestiel to Newark one day in his declining years — “ Oh, man, I had many a grand gallop among these braes when I was thinking of Marmion, but a trotting canny pony must serve me now.”

Mr. Skene, however, informs me that many of the more energetic descriptions, and particularly that of the battle of Flodden, were struck out while he was in quarters again with his cavalry, in the autumn of 1807. “ In the intervals of drilling,” he says, “ Scott used to delight in walking his powerful black steed up and down by himself upon the Portobello sands, within the beating of the surge; and now and then you would see him plunge in his spurs, and go off as if at the charge, with the spray dashing about him. As we rode back to Musselburgh, he often came and placed himself beside me, to repeat the verses that he had been composing during these pauses of our exercise.”

He seems to have communicated fragments of the poem very freely during the whole of its progress. As early as the 22d February 1807, I find Mrs. Hayman acknowledging, in the name of the Princess of Wales, the receipt of a copy of the Introduction to Canto III., in which occurs the tribute to her heroic father, mortally wounded the year before at Jena -- a tribute so grateful to her feelings, that she sent the poet an elegant silver vase as a memorial of her thankfulness. And about the same time, the Marchioness of Abercorn expresses the delight with which both she and her lord had read the generous verses on Pitt and Fox. But his connexion with this family was no new one; for his father, and afterwards his brother, had been the auditors of their Scotch rental.

In March, his researches concerning Dryden carried him again to the south. For several weeks he gave his day pretty regularly to the pamphlets and MSS. of the British Museum, and the evening to the brilliant societies that now courted him whenever he came within their sphere. "As I had," he writes his brother-in-law in India, "contrary to many who avowed the same opinions in sunshine, held fast my integrity during the Foxites' interval of power, I found myself of course very well with the new administration." But he uniformly reserved Saturday and Sunday either for Mr. Ellis at Sunninghill, Lord and Lady Abercorn at Stanmore; and the press copy of Cantos I. and II. of Marmion attests that most of it reached Allantyne in sheets franked by the Marquis, or his son-in-law Lord Aberdeen. Before he turned homeward, he made a short visit to his friend William Rose in Hampshire, and enjoyed in his company various long rides in the New Forest, a day in the dock-yard of Portsmouth, and two or three more in the Isle of Wight. Several sheets of Canto III. are also under covers franked from Gundimore. In the first week of May we find him at Lichfield, having diverged from the great road to Scotland for the purpose of visiting Miss Seward. Her account of her correspondent, whom till now she had never seen, was addressed to Mr. Cary, the translator of Dante. "This proudest east of the Caledonian muse is tall," she says, "and rather robust than slender, but lame in the same manner as Mr. Hay, and in a greater measure. Neither the contour of his face nor yet his features are elegant; his complexion healthy, and somewhat fair, without bloom. We find the singularity of brown hair and eye-lashes, with flaxen eye-brows; and a countenance open, ingenuous, and benevolent. When seriously conversing or earnestly attentive, though his eyes are rather of a lightish grey, deep thought is on their lids; he contracts his brow, and the rays of genius gleam aslant from the orbs beneath them. An upper lip too long prevents his mouth from being decidedly handsome; but the sweetest emanations of temper and heart play about it when he talks cheerfully or smiles—and in company he is much oftener gay than contemplative—his conversation an overflowing fountain of brilliant wit, apt allusion, and playful archness—while on serious themes he is nervous and eloquent; the accent decidedly Scotch, yet by no means broad. Not less astonishing than was Johnson's memory is that of Mr. Scott; like Johnson, also, his recitation too monotonous and violent to do justice either to his own writings or those of others." Miss Seward adds, that she showed him the passage in Cary's Dante where Michael Scott occurs, and that though he admired the spirit and skill of the version, he confessed his inability to find pleasure in the Divina Commedia. "The plan," he said, "appeared to him unhappy; the personal malignity and strange mode of revenge presumptuous and uninteresting." By the 12th of May he was at Edinburgh for the commencement of the summer session, and the printing of his Poem seems thenceforth to have gone on at times with great rapidity, at others slowly and irregularly; the latter cantos having no doubt been merely blocked out when the first went to press, and his professional avocations, but above all his Dryden, occasioning frequent interruptions.

Mr. Guthrie Wright, who was among the familiar associates of the Troop, has furnished me with some details which throw light on the construction of Marmion. This gentleman had, through Scott's good offices, succeeded his brother Thomas in the charge of the Abercorn business.—"In the summer of 1807," he says, "I had the pleasure of making a trip with Sir Walter to Dumfries, for the purpose of meeting Lord Abercorn on his way to Ireland. His Lordship did not arrive for two or three days, and we employed the interval in visiting Sweetheart Abbey, Caerlaverock Castle, and some other ancient buildings in the neighbourhood. He recited poetry and old legends from morn till night; and it is impossible that anything could be more delightful than his society; but what I particularly allude to is the circumstance, that at that time he was writing Marmion, the three or four first cantos of which he had with him, and which he was so good as read to me. It is unnecessary to say how much I was enchanted with them; but as he good-naturedly asked me to state any observations that occurred to me, I said in joke that it appeared to me he had brought his hero by a very strange route into Scotland. 'Why,' says I, 'did ever mortal coming from England to Edinburgh go by Gifford, Crichton Castle, Borthwick Castle, and over the top of Blackford Hill? Not only is it a circuitous detour, but there never was a road that way since the world was created!' 'That is a most irrelevant objection,' said Sir Walter; 'it was my good pleasure to bring Marmion by that route, for the purpose of describing the places you have mentioned, and the view from Blackford Hill—it was his business to find his road and pick his steps the best way he could. But, pray, how would you have me bring him? Not by the post-road, surely, as if he had been travelling in a mail-coach?'—'No,' I replied; 'there were neither post-roads nor mail-in those days; but I think you might have brought a less chance of getting into a swamp, by allowing the natural route by Dunbar and the sea-coast, he might have tarried for a space with the famous Angus, surnamed Bell the Cat, at his favourite seat Tantallon Castle, by which means you would have only that fortress with all his feudal towers, but not of Dunbar, the Ross, and all the beautiful country worth to describe.' This observation seemed to strike him, and after a pause he exclaimed, 'By Jove, you are right! I ought to have brought him that way,' and he put out before he and I part, depend upon it he shall recant.' He then asked if I had ever been there, and when I said I had frequently, he desired me to describe it, I did; and I verily believe it is from what I then said the accurate description contained in the fifth canto was at least I never heard him say he had afterwards gone to the castle; and when the poem was published, I remember he laughed, and asked me how I liked Tantallon." A year had elapsed from his beginning the poem, when he published the Epistle for Canto IV at Valentiael, and who, considering how busily his various pursuits and labours had been passing the interval, can wonder to be told that

"Even now, it scarcely seems a day
 Since first I tun'd this idle lay
 A task so often laid aside
 When leisure graver cares denied
 That now November's dreary gale,
 Whose voice inspir'd my opening tale,
 That same November gale once more Whirls the dry leaves on Yarrow shore."

Introduction was written in Edinburgh in the month of January; that to the last canto, during the Christmas festivities at the Martineau-house, where, from the first days of his ballad to the close of his life, he, like his bearded ancestor, was content that season with the immediate head of the race; the appendix of notes, including a mass of curious and valuable quotations, must have moved somewhat slowly through his hands; but Marmion was at length ready for publication in the middle of February 1808.

The "graver cares" which he alludes to as having retarded his progress, were those of preparing himself for a situation which he was formally appointed to soon afterwards, that of Secretary to a Parliamentary Commission for the improvement of Scottish Jurisprudence. This session, at the head of which was Sir Islay Campbell, Lord of the Court of Session, continued in operation for three years. Scott's salary, as secretary, was a meagre one; but he had been led to expect that his exertions in the city would lead to better things. In giving a general account of his affairs to his brother-in-law in India, he says— "principally pleased with my new appointment as he conferred on me by our chief law lords and King's court consequently an honourable professional distinction employment will be but temporary, but may have consequences important to my future lot in life, if I give due satisfaction to the discharge of it." He appears accordingly to be committed to a great deal of drudgery, in mastering the controversies which had called for legislative interposition; and he discharged his functions, as usual, with the approbation of his superiors; but no result followed.

Not only did he write sundry articles for the Edinburgh Review while Marmion was on hand, but having now frequent correspondence with Mr. Southey, whose literature had yet been very lucrative to him, he made an effort to entice his friend also in the same critical corps. Thalaba and Marmion had been handled by them in no very flattering style; the works of Wordsworth still more irreverently; but Southey declined these offers of intermediation on the score mainly of politics—expressing, at the same time, some regret that Wordsworth in his magnificent sonnet on Killiecrankie, should have introduced that type of ultra-Toryism, the Viscount of Dundee, as an apparent censure of his character. In reply (15th Dec. 1807), Scott admits his own "extreme dislike" of the Edinburgh Review as to the war with Bonaparte. He says:— "I never thought he did a service to a person engaged in an arduous conflict, by proving to him, or attempting to prove, that he must necessarily be beaten? and what effect can such an attempt have but to accelerate the accomplishment of the prophecy it contains? And as for Catholic Emancipation—I am, as God knows, a bigot in religious matters, nor a friend to the measure; but if a particular sect of religionists are intrusted with foreign politics—and placed under the special direction of a class of priests, whose unrivalled dexterity and activity are increased by the rules which detach them from the rest of the world—I humbly think that we may be excused from intrusting to them those places in the State where the influence of such a clergy, who act under the direction

...sive tool of our worst foe, is likely to be attended with the most fatal consequences. If a gentleman chooses to walk about with a couple of pounds of gunpowder in his pocket, if I give him the shelter of my roof, I may at least be permitted to exclude him from the seat next to the fire. So thinking, I have not your scruples in doing anything for the Review of late. For my good friend Dundee, I cannot admit his culpability to the extent you allege; and it is scandalous of the Sunday School to join in your condemnation, 'and yet come of a noble name!'¹ I admit he was tant soit peu sauvage — but he was a noble savage; and the beastly Covenanters against whom he rebelled, hardly had any claim to be called men, unless what was founded on their walking upon their hind feet. You can hardly conceive the perfidy, cruelty, and stupidity of these people, according to the accounts they have themselves preserved. But I admit I had many cavalier prejudices instilled into me, as my ancestor was a Killiecrankie man."

Mr. Southey happened to be in London when Marmion came out, and he wrote thus to the author on his return to Keswick: "Half the poem I had read at Heber's before my own copy arrived. I went punctually to breakfast with him, and he was strong enough dressing to let me devour so much of it. The story is made of better materials than the Lay, yet they are not so well fitted together. As a whole, it has not pleased me so much as in parts, it has pleased me more. There is nothing so finely conceived in your former poem as the death of Marmion: there is nothing finer in its conception anywhere. The introductory stanzas I did not wish away, because, as poems, they gave me great pleasure; but I wished them at the end of the volume, or at the beginning — anywhere except where they were. My taste is perhaps peculiar in disliking all interruptions in narrative poetry. When the poet lets his story sleep, and talks in his own person, it has to me the same sort of unpleasant effect that is produced at the end of an act. You are alive to know what follows, and lo — down comes the curtain, and the fiddlers begin with their abominations."

I pass over a multitude of the congratulatory effusions of Marmion's prior names, but must not withhold part of a letter on a separate sheet, written not in the first hurry of excitement, but some months after Marmion had reached Ellis. He then says: "All the world are agreed that you are like the elephant mentioned in the Spectator, who was the greatest elephant in the world except himself, and consequently, that the only question at issue is, whether the Lay or Marmion shall be reputed the most pleasing poem in our language—save and except one or two of Dryden's fables. But, with respect to the two rivals, I think the Lay is, on the whole, the greatest favourite. It is admitted that the fable of Marmion is greatly superior—that it contains a greater diversity of character—that it inspires more interest—and that it is by no means inferior in point of poetical expression; but it is contended that the incident of Deloraine's journey to Melrose surpasses anything in Marmion, and that the personal appearance of the Minstrel, who, though the last, is by far the most charming of all minstrels, is by no means compensated by the idea of an author shorn of his picturesque beard, deprived of his harp, and writing letters to his intimate friends. These introductory epistles, indeed, though excellent in themselves, are in fact only interruptions to the fable; and accordingly, nine out of ten have perused them separately, either after or before the poem—and it is obvious that they cannot have produced, in either case, the effect which was proposed—viz. of relieving the reader's attention, and giving variety to the whole. Perhaps, continue these critics, it would be fair to say that Marmion delights us in spite of its introductory epistles—while the Lay owes its principal charm to the venerable old minstrel:—the two poems may be considered as equally respectable to the talents of the author; but the first, being a more perfect whole, will be more constantly preferred. Now, all this may be very true—but it is no less true that everybody has already read Marmion more than once—that it is the subject of general conversation—that it delights all ages and all tastes, and that it is universally allowed to improve upon a second reading. My own opinion is, that both the productions are equally good in their different ways: yet, upon the whole, I had rather be the author of Marmion than of the Lay, because I think its species of excellence of much more difficult attainment. What degree of bulk may be essentially necessary to the corporeal part of an Epic poem, I know not; but sure I am that the story of Marmion might have furnished twelve books as easily as six—that the masterly character of Constance would not have been less bewitching had it been much more minutely painted—and that De Wilton might have been dilated with great ease, and even to considerable advantage;—in short, that had it been your intention merely to exhibit a spirited romantic story instead of making that story subservient to the delineation of the manners which prevailed at a certain period of our history, the number and variety of ters would have suited any scale of painting. Mar-Deloraine what Tom Jones is to Joseph Andrews; ish of high breeding nowhere diminishes the prom-the features — and the minion of a king is as light

¹ James Grahame, author of The Sabbath, &c.

y a cavalier as the Borderer, — rather less ferocious, ed, less fit for the hero of a ballad, and far more for f a regular poem. On the whole, I can sincerely
, ‘sans phrase,’ that had I seen Marmion without ne author, I should have ranked it with Theodore ia, — that is to say, on the very top shelf of Eng-
.” This elegant letter may no doubt be considered me of the very highest and most refined of London on Marmion, during the first freshness of its popubefore the only critical journal of which any one in thought very seriously, had pronounced its verdict.
e consider some parts of that judgment, together with s personal intimacy with the editor and the aid which late been affording to the Review itself, it must be at Mr. Jeffrey acquitted himself on this occasion in highly creditable to his courageous sense of duty.
er for April 1808 was accompanied by this note: — re, Tuesday. — Dear Scott, — If I did not give you more unanimity than other of your irritable tribe, scarcely venture to put this into your hands. As it with no little solicitude, and earnestly hope that it no difference in the friendship which has hitherto etween us. I have spoken of your poem exactly as d though I cannot reasonably suppose that you will with everything I have said, it would mortify me ly to believe I had given you pain. If you have left for me, you will not delay very long to tell me meantime, I am very sincerely yours, — F. Jeffrey.”
er will I hope pause here and read the article as it deavouring to put himself into the situation of Scott as laid upon his desk, together with this ominous the editor, who, as it happened, had been for some ed to dine that same Tuesday in Castle Street. The aticism of the paper is, I am sure, done in a style on writer cannot now reflect with perfect equanimity, man on the lofty and decisive tone of the sweeping by which it was introduced. All this, however, I e Scott to have gone through with great composure;
t, I think, have wondered, to say the least, when he elf accused of having “throughout neglected Scottish feelings and Scottish characters!" — He who had just poured out all the patriotic enthusiasm of his soul in so many passages of Marmion, which every Scotchman to the end of time will have by heart; painted the capital, the court, the camp, the heroic old chieftains of Scotland, in colours instinct with a fervour that can never die; and dignified the most fatal of her national misfortunes by a celebration as loftily pathetic as ever blended pride with sorrow, — a battle-piece which even his critic had pronounced to be the noblest save in Homer! But not even this injustice was likely to wound him very deeply. Coming from one of the recent witnesses of his passionate agitation on the Mound, perhaps he would only smile at it. At all events, he could make allowance for the petulancies into which men the least disposed to injure the feelings of others will sometimes be betrayed, when the critical rod is in their hands. He assured Mr. Jeffrey that the article had not disturbed his digestion, though he hoped neither his booksellers nor the public would agree with the opinions it expressed; and begged he would come to dinner at the hour previously appointed. Mr. Jeffrey appeared accordingly, and was received by his host with the frankest cordiality; but had the mortification to observe that the mistress of the house, though perfectly polite, was not quite so easy with him as usual. She, too, behaved herself with exemplary civility during the dinner; but could not help saying, in her broken English, when her guest was departing, "Well, good night, Mr. Jeffrey — dey tell me that you have abused Scott in de Review, and I hope Mr. Constable has paid you very well for writing it." This anecdote was not perhaps worth giving; but it has been printed already in an exaggerated shape, so I thought it as well to present the edition which I have derived from the lips of all the three persons concerned. No one, I am sure, will think the worse of any of them for it, — least of all of Mrs. Scott. She might well be pardoned, if she took to herself more than her own share in the misadventures as well as the successes of the most affectionate of protectors. It was, I believe, about this time when, as Scott has confessed, "the popularity of Marmion gave him such a leeze, he had for a moment almost lost his footing," that a shrewd and sly observer, Mrs. Grant of Laggan, said, wittily enough, upon leaving a brilliant assembly where the poet had been surrounded by all the buzz and glare of fashionable cecstasy — "Mr. Scott always seems to me like a glass, through which the rays of admiration pass without sensibly affecting it; but the bit of per that lies beside it will presently be in a blaze — and no wonder.”

I shall not, after so much about criticism, say anything more of Marmion in this place, than that I have always considered it as on the whole the greatest of Scott's poems. There is a certain light, easy, virgin charm about the Lay, which we look for in vain through the subsequent volumes of his verse; but the superior strength, and breadth, and boldness both of conception and execution in the Marmion appear to me indisputable. The great blot, the combination of mean felony with so many noble qualities in the character of the hero, was, as the poet says, severely commented on at the time by the most ardent of his early friends, Leyden; but though he admitted the justice of that criticism, he chose “to let the tree lie as it had fallen.” He was also sensible that many of the subordinate and connecting parts of the narrative are flat, harsh, and obscure — but could never make any serious attempt to do away with these imperfections; and perhaps they, after all, heighten by contrast the effect of the passages of high-wrought enthusiasm which alone he considered, in after days, with satisfaction. As for the “epistolary dissertations” (as Jeffrey called them), I must, I take it, be allowed that they interfered with the flow of the story, when readers were turning the leaves in the first glow of curiosity; and they were not, in fact, originally intended to be interwoven in any fashion with the romance of Marmion. Though the author himself does not allude to, and had perhaps forgotten the circumstance, when writing the Introductory Essay of 1830 — they were announced by an advertisement early in 1807 as “Six Epistles from Ettrick Forest,” to be published in a separate volume; and perhaps it might have been better that this first plan had been adhered to. But whatever that may be, are there any pages, among all he ever wrote, that one would be more sorry he should not have written? They are among the most delicious portraiturets that genius ever painted of itself, — buoyant, virtuous, happy genius exulting in its own energies, yet possessed and mastered by clear, calm, modest mind, and happy only in diffusing happiness around it.

The feelings of political partisanship find no place in this poem; but though Mr. Jeffrey chose to complain of its “most neglect of Scottish feelings,” I take leave to suspect that the boldness and energy of British patriotism which breathes in many passages, may have had more share than that alleged omission in pointing the pen that criticised Marmion. Scott had sternly and indignantly rebuked and denounced the then too prevalent spirit of anti-national despondence; he had put the trumpet to his lips, and done his part at least to sustain the hope and resolution of his countrymen in that struggle from which it was the doctrine of the Edinburgh Review that no sane observer of the times could anticipate anything but ruin and degradation. He must ever be considered as the "mighty minstrel" of the anti-Gallican war; and it was Marmion that first announced him in that character.

Be all this as it may, his connexion with the Review was now broken off; and indeed it was never renewed, except in one instance, many years after, when the strong wish to serve poor Maturin shook him for a moment from his purpose. The loftiest and purest of human beings seldom act but under a mixture of motives, and I shall not attempt to guess in what proportions he was swayed by aversion to the political doctrines which the journal had lately been avowing with increased openness — by dissatisfaction with its judgments of his own works — or, lastly, by the feeling that, whether those judgments were or were not just, it was but an idle business for him to assist by his own pen the popularity of the vehicle that diffused them. That he was influenced more or less by all of these considerations, appears highly probable; and I fancy I can trace some indications of each of them in a letter with which I am favoured by a warm lover of literature, and a sincere admirer both of Scott and Jeffrey, and though numbered among the Tories in the House of Commons, yet one of the most liberal section of his party¹ — who happened to visit Scotland shortly after the article on Marmion appeared, and has set down his recollections of the course of table-talk at a dinner where he for the first time met the poet in company with his censor: — "There were," he says, "only a few people besides the two lions — and assuredly I have seldom passed a more agreeable day. A thousand subjects of literature, antiquities, and manners, were started; and much was I struck, as you may well suppose, by the extent, correctness, discrimination, and accuracy of Jeffrey's information; equally so with his taste, acuteness, and wit, in dissecting every book, author, and story that came in our way. Nothing could surpass the variety of his knowledge, but the easy rapidity of his manner of producing it. He was then in his meridian. Scott, delighted to draw him out, delighted also to talk himself, and displayed, I think, even a larger range of anecdote and illustration; remembering everything, whether true or false,

¹ The late Mr. Morrilt of Rokeby. — 1848.

It was characteristic or impressive; everything that was good, lovely, or lively. It struck me that there was this great difference -- Jeffrey, for the most part entertained us, when books were under discussion, with the detection of faults, blunders, abilities, or plagiarisms; Scott took up the matter where he left it, recalled some compensating beauty or excellence for which no fault had been allowed, and by the recitation, perhaps, of one fine stanza, set the poor victim on his legs again. I believe it was just at this time that Scott had abandoned his place in Mr Jeffrey's class. The journal had been started among the clever young society with which Edinburgh abounded when they were both bringing life as barristers; and Jeffrey's principal antagonists some time were Sydney Smith, Brougham, Horner, Scott himself -- and on scientific subjects, Playfair; but clever combatants were sought for in all quarters. But it was not long ere Brougham dipped the concern deep in witty Whiggery, and it was thought at the time that some very foolish neglects on the part of Pitt had a principal share in making several of the brilliant young men decide on carrying over their weapons to the enemy's camp. Scott was a strong Tory, nay, by his early recollections and poetical feelings of association, a Jacobite. Jeffrey, however, was an early friend -- and thus there was a conflict of feelings on both sides. Scott, as I was remonstrated against the deepening Whiggery, Jeffrey rejoined that he could not resist the wit. Scott offered to try his hand at a witty bit of Toryism -- but the editor pleaded off, on the danger of inconsistency. These differences first cooled -- and soon dissolved their federation. To return to my dinner. As the chariot was taking its rounds, Jeffrey produced some good-natured eulogy of his old supporters Sydney Smith, Brougham, and Horner. 'Come,' says Scott, 'I can't say too much about Sydney or Brougham, but I don't admire your Horner: he always put me in mind of a bulliah's bull, who, although as Father Shandy observed, never produced a calf, went through his business with a grave demeanour, that he always maintained his credit as a parish!' The fun of the illustration tempted him to rally, I believe; but Horner's talents did not lie in our, and his economical labours were totally uncongential to the mind of Scott."

Before quitting Marmion and its critics, I ought to say that, in the Lay, this and the subsequent great poems were all published in a splendid quarto form. The 2000 of the first Marmion, price a guinea and a half, were disposed of in less than a month; and twelve octavo editions between 1808 and 1825, had carried the sale to upwards of 30,000 copies, before the author included it in the collection of his poetry with biographical prefaces in 1830; since which period there have been frequent reprints; making an aggregate legitimate circulation between 1808 and 1848 of about 60,000.

Ere the poem was published, a heavy task, begun earlier, and continued throughout its progress, had been nearly completed; and there appeared in the last week of April 1808, The Works of John Dryden, now first collected; with notes historical, critical, and explanatory, and a Life of the Author. Eighteen volumes, 8vo. This was the bold speculation of William Miller of Albemarle Street; and the editor's fee, at forty guineas the volume, was £756. The bulk of the collection, the neglect into which a majority of the pieces had fallen, the obsolescence of the party politics which had so largely exercised the author's pen, and the indecorum, not seldom running into flagrant indecency, by which transcendent genius had ministered to the appetites of a licentious age, all combined to make the warmest of Scott's admirers doubt whether even his skill and reputation would be found sufficient to ensure the success of this undertaking. It was, however, better received than any one, except perhaps the courageous bookseller himself, had anticipated. The entire work was reprinted in 1821; since then the Life of Dryden has had its place in various editions of Scott's prose miscellanies; nor perhaps does that class of his writings include any piece which keeps a higher estimation.

This Dryden was criticised in the Edinburgh Review for October 1808, with great ability, and, on the whole, with admirable candour. The industry and perspicacity with which Scott had carried through his editorial researches and annotations were acknowledged in terms which, had he known the name of his reviewer, must have been doubly gratifying; and it was confessed that, in the Life of his author, he had corrected with patient honesty, and filled up with lucid and expansive detail, the sometimes careless and often naked outline of Johnson's masterly Essay. It would be superfluous to quote in this place a specimen of critical skill which has already enjoyed wide circulation, and which will hereafter, no doubt, be included in the miscellaneous prose works of HALLAM. The points of political faith on which that great writer dissents from the Editor of Dryden, would, even if I had the inclination to pursue such a discussion, lead me far astray from the immediate object of these pages; they embrace questions on which the best and wisest of our countrymen will probably continue to take opposite sides, as long as our past history excites a living interest, and our literature is that of an active nation. On the poetical character of Dryden, I think the editor and his critic will be found to have expressed substantially much the same judgment; when they appear to differ, the battle strikes me as being about words rather than things, as is likely to be the case when men of such abilities and attainments approach a subject remote from their personal passions. As might have been expected, the terse and dexterous reviewer has often the better in this logomachy; but when the balance is struck, we discover here, as elsewhere, that Scott's broad and masculine understanding had, by whatever happy hardihood, grasped the very result to which others win their way by the more cautious processes of logical investigation. While nothing has been found easier than to attack his details, his general views on critical questions have seldom, if ever, been successfully impugned.

I wish I could believe that Scott's labours had been sufficient to recall Dryden to his rightful station, not in the opinion of those who make literature the business or chief solace of their lives—for with them he had never forfeited it—but in the general favour of the intelligent public. That such has been the case, however, the not rapid sale of two editions, aided as they were by the greatest of living names, can be no proof; nor have I observed among the numberless recent speculations of the English booksellers, a single reprint of even those tales, satires, and critical essays, not to be familiar with which would, in the last age, have been considered as disgraceful in any one making the least pretension to letters.

Scott's Biography of Dryden—the only life of a great poet which he has left us, and also his only detailed work on the personal fortunes of one to whom literature was a profession—was penned just when he had begun to apprehend his own destiny. On this point of view, forbidden to contemporary delicacy, we may now pause with blameless curiosity. Seriously as he must have in those days been revolving the hazards of literary enterprise, he could not, it is probable, have handled any subject of this class without letting out here and there thoughts and feelings proper to his own biographer's province; but, widely as he and his predecessor may appear to stand apart as regards some of the most important both of intellectual and moral characteristics, they had nevertheless many features of resemblance, both as men and as authors; and I doubt if the entire range of our annals could have furnished a theme more calculated to keep Scott's scrutinising interest awake, than that which opened on him as he contemplated step by step the career of Dryden. There are grave lessons which that story was not needed to enforce upon his mind: he required no such beacon to make him revolt from paltering with the dignity of woman, or the passions of youth, or insulting by splenetic levities the religious convictions of any portion of his countrymen. But Dryden's prostitution of his genius to the petty bitternesses of political warfare, and the consequences both as to the party he served, and the antagonists he provoked, might well supply matter for serious consideration to the author of the Melville song. "Where," says Scott, "is the expert swordsman that does not delight in the flourish of his weapon?" and a brave man will least of all withdraw himself from his ancient standard when the tide of battle beats against it." But he says also, —and I know enough of his own then recent experiences, in his intercourse with some who had been among his earliest and dearest associates, not to apply the language to the circumstances that suggested it—"He who keenly engages in political controversy must not only encounter the vulgar abuse which he may justly contemn, but the altered eye of friends whose regard is chilled." Nor, when he adds that "the protecting zeal of his party did not compensate Dryden for the loss of those whom he alienated in their service," can I help connecting this reflexion too with his own subsequent abstinence from party personalities, in which, had the expert swordsman's delight in the flourish of his weapon prevailed, he might have rivalled the success of either Dryden or Swift, to be repaid like them by the settled rancour of Whigs and the jealous ingratitude of Tories.

It is curious enough to compare the hesitating style of his apology for that tinge of evanescent superstition which seems to have clouded occasionally Dryden's bright and solid mind, with the open avowal that he has "pride in recording his author's decided admiration of old ballads and popular tales;" and perhaps his personal feelings were hardly less his prompter where he dismisses with brief scorn the sins of negligence and haste which had been so often urged against Dryden. "Nothing," he says, "is so easily attained as the power of presenting the extrinsic qualities of fine painting, fine music, or fine poetry; the beauty of colour and outline, the combination of notes, the melody of versification, may be imitated by artists of mediocrity; and many will view, hear, or peruse their performances, without being able positively to discover why they should not, since composed according to all the rules, afford pleasure equal to those of Raphael, Handel, or Dryden. The deficiency lies in the vivifying spirit, which, like alcohol, may be reduced to the same principle in all the fine arts. The French are said to possess the best possible rules for building ships of war, although not equally remarkable for their power of fighting them. When criticism becomes a pursuit separate from poetry, those who follow it are apt to forget that the legitimate ends of the art for which they lay down rules, are instruction and delight; and that these points being attained, by what road soever, entitles a poet to claim the prize of successful merit. Neither did the learned authors of these disquisitions sufficiently attend to the general disposition of mankind, which cannot be contented even with the happiest imitations of former excellence, but demands novelty as a necessary ingredient for amusement. To insist that every epic poem shall have the plan of the Iliad, and every tragedy be modelled by the rules of Aristotle, resembles the principle of the architect who should build all his houses with the same number of windows and of stories. It happened, too, inevitably, that the critics, in the plenipotential authority which they exercised, often assumed as indispensable requisites of the drama, or epopeia, circumstances which, in the great authorities they quoted, were altogether accidental or indifferent. These they erected into laws, and handed down as essential; although the forms prescribed have often as little to do with the merit and success of the original from which they are taken as the shape of the drinking glass with the flavour of the wine which it contains." These sentences appear, from the dates, to have been penned immediately after the biographer of Dryden had perused the Edinburgh Review on Marmion.

I conclude with a passage, in writing which he seems to have anticipated the only serious critical charge that was ever brought against his edition of Dryden as a whole — namely, the loose and irregular way in which his own æsthetical notions are indicated, rather than expounded. "While Dryden," says Scott, "examined, discussed, admitted, or rejected the rules proposed by others, he forbore, from prudence, indolence, or a regard for the freedom of Parnassus, to erect himself into a legislator. His doctrines are scattered without system or pretence to it: — it is impossible to read far without finding some maxim for doing, or forbearing, which every student of poetry will do well to engrave upon the tablets of his memory; but the author's mode of instruction is neither harsh nor dictatorial."

On the whole, it is impossible to doubt that the success of Dryden in rapidly reaching, and till the end of a long life holding undisputed, the summit of public favour and reputation, in spite of his "brave neglect" of minute finishing, narrow laws, and prejudiced authorities, must have had a powerful effect in nerving Scott's hope and resolution for the wide ocean of literary enterprise into which he had now fairly launched his bark. Like Dryden, he felt himself to be "amply stored with acquired knowledge, much of it the fruits of early reading and application;" anticipated that though, "while engaged in the hurry of composition, or overcome by the lassitude of continued literary labour," he should sometimes "draw with too much liberality on a tenacious memory," no "occasional imperfections would deprive him of his praise;" in short, made up his mind that "pointed and nicely-turned lines, sedulous study, and long and repeated correction and revision" would all be dispensed with,—provided their place were supplied as in Dryden by "rapidity of conception, a readiness of expressing every idea without losing anything by the way—perpetual animation and elasticity of thought—and language never laboured, never loitering, never (in Dryden's own phrase) curseedly confined."

I believe that Scott had, in 1807, agreed with London booksellers as to the superintendence of two other large collections, the Somers' Tracts and the Sadler State Papers; but it seems that Constable first heard of these engagements when he accompanied the second cargo of Marmion to the great southern market; and, alarmed at the prospect of losing his hold on Scott's industry, he at once invited him to follow up his Dryden by an Edition of Swift on the same scale, — offering, moreover, to double the rate of payment; that is to say, to give him £1500 for the new undertaking. This magnificent tender was accepted; and as early as May 1808, I find Scott writing in all directions for books, pamphlets, and MSS., likely to be serviceable in illustrating the Life and Works of the Dean of St. Patrick's. While these were accumulating about him, which they soon did in greater abundance than he had anticipated, he concluded his labours on Sadler, and kept pace at the same time with Ballantyne, as the Somers' Tracts continued to move through the press. The Sadler was published in 1809, in three large volumes, quarto; but the last of the thirteen equally ponderous tomes to which Somers extended, was not dismissed from his desk until towards the conclusion of 1812.

He also edited this year, for Murray, Strutt's unfinished romance of Queenhoo-hall, with a conclusion in the fashion of the original; for Constable, Carleton's Memoirs of the War of the Spanish Succession, to which he gave a lively preface and various notes; and the Memoirs of Robert Cary, Earl of Monmouth. The republication of Carleton,¹ Johnson's eulogy of which fills a pleasant page in Boswell, had probably been suggested by the interest which Scott took in the first outburst of Spanish patriotism consequent on Napoleon's transactions at Bayonne. There is one passage in the preface which I must transcribe. Speaking of the absurd recall of Peterborough from the command in which he had exhibited such a wonderful combination of patience and prudence with military daring, he says:—"One ostensible reason was, that Peterborough's parts were of too lively and mercurial a quality, and that his letters shewed more wit than became a General;—a commonplace objection, raised by the dull malignity of commonplace minds, against those whom they see discharging with ease and indifference the tasks which they themselves execute (if at all) with the sweat of their brow and in the heaviness of their hearts. There is a certain hypocrisy in business, whether civil or military, as well as in religion, which they will do well to observe who, not satisfied with discharging their duty, desire also the good repute of men." It was not long before some of the dull malignants of the Parliament House began to insinuate what at length found a dull and dignified mouthpiece in the House of Commons—that if a Clerk of Session had any real business to do, it could not be done well by a man who found time for more literary enterprises than any other author of the age undertook—"wrote more books," Lord Archibald Hamilton serenely added, "than anybody could find leisure to read"—and, moreover, mingled in general society as much as many that had no pursuit but pleasure.

The eager struggling of the different booksellers to engage

¹ It seems to be now pretty generally believed that Carleton's Memoirs were among the numberless fabrications of De Foe; but in this case (if the fact indeed be so), as in that of his Cavalier, he no doubt had before him the rude journal of some officer who had fought and bled in the campaigns described with such an air of truth.

Scott at this time, is a very amusing feature in the voluminous correspondence before me. Had he possessed treble the energy for which it was possible to give any man credit, he could never have encountered a title of the projects that the post brought day after day to him, announced with extravagant enthusiasm, and urged with all the arts of conciliation. I shall mention only one out of at least a dozen gigantic schemes which were thus proposed before he had well settled himself to his Swift; and I do so, because something of the kind was a few years later carried into execution. This was a General Edition of British Novelists, — beginning with De Foe and reaching to the end of the last century — to be set forth with prefaces and notes by Scott, and printed of course by Ballantyne. The projector was Murray, who was now eager to start on all points in the race with Constable; but this was not, as we shall see presently, the only business that prompted my enterprising friend's first visit to Ashiestiel.

Conversing with Scott, towards the end of his toils, about the tumult of engagements in which he was thus involved, he said, "Aye — it was enough to tear me to pieces — but there was a wonderful exhilaration about it all: my blood was kept at fever-pitch — I felt as if I could have grappled with anything and everything; then there was hardly one of all my schemes that did not afford me the means of serving some poor devil of a brother author. There were always huge piles of materials to be arranged, sifted, and indexed — volumes of extracts to be transcribed — journeys to be made hither and thither, for ascertaining little facts and dates, — in short, I could commonly keep half-a-dozen of the ragged regiment of Parnassus in tolerable case." I said he must have felt something like what a locomotive engine on a railway might be supposed to do, when a score of coal waggons are seen linking themselves to it the moment it gets the steam up, and it rushes on its course regardless of the burden. "Yes," said he, laughing, and making a crashing cut with his axe (for we were felling larches;) "but there was a cursed lot of dung carts too." He was seldom, in fact, without some of these appendages; and I admired nothing more in him than the patient courtesy, the unwearied gentle kindness with which he always treated them, in spite of their delays and blunders, to say nothing of the almost incredible vanity and presumption which more than one of them often exhibited in the midst of their fawning; and, I believe, with all their faults, the worst and weakest of them repaid him by a canine fidelity of affection. This part of Scott's character recalls by far the most pleasing trait in that of his last predecessor in the plenitude of literary authority—Dr. Johnson. There was, perhaps nothing (except the one great blunder) that had a worse effect on the course of his pecuniary fortunes, than the readiness with which he exerted his interest with the booksellers on behalf of inferior writers. Even from the commencement of his connexion with Constable in particular, I can trace a continual series of such applications. They stimulated the already too sanguine publisher to numberless risks; and when these failed, the result was, in one shape or another, some corresponding deduction from the fair profits of his own literary labour. "I like well," Constable was often heard to say in the sequel, "I like well Scott's ain bairns—but heaven preserve me from those of his fathering!"

Every now and then, however, he had the rich compensation of finding that his interference had really promoted the interests of some meritorious obscure. None more meritorious could be named than John Struthers, a shoemaker of Glasgow, whose very striking poem, The Poor Man's Sabbath, being seen in MS. by Miss Joanna Baillie when on a visit to her native district, was by her recommended to Scott, and by him to Constable, who published it in 1808. Mr. Struthers made a pilgrimage of gratitude to Ashiestiel, where he was received with hearty kindness; and it is pleasing to add, that he ended his life in a very respectable position—as keeper of Stirling's Library, an old endowment in Glasgow.

James Hogg was by this time beginning to be appreciated, and the popularity of his Mountain Bard encouraged Scott to more strenuous intercession in his behalf. I have before me a long array of letters on this subject, which passed between Scott and the Earl of Dalketh and his brother Lord Montagu, in 1808. Hogg's prime ambition at this period was to procure an ensigncy in a militia regiment, and he seems to have set little by Scott's representations that the pay of such a situation was very small and that, if he obtained it, he would probably find his relations with his brother officers far from agreeable. There was, however, another objection which Scott could not hint to the aspirant himself, but which seems to have been duly considered by those who were anxious to promote his views. Militia officers of that day were by no means unlikely to see their nerves put to the test; and the Shepherds'—though he wrote some capital war songs, especially Donald Macdonald—were not heroically strong. This was in truth no secret among his early intimates, though he had not measured himself at all exactly on that score, and was even tempted, when he found there was no chance of the militia epaulette, to threaten that he would "list for a soldier" in a marching regiment. Notwithstanding at least one melancholy precedent, the Excise, which would have suited him almost as badly as "hugging Brown Bess," was next thought of; and the Shepherd himself seems to have entered into that plan with considerable alacrity: but I know not whether he changed his mind, or what other cause prevented such an appointment from taking place. After various shiftings, he at last obtained from the Duke of Buccleuch's kindness, the gratuitous life-rent of a small farm in the vale of Yarrow; and had he contented himself with the careful management of its fields, the rest of his days might have been easy. But he could not withstand the attractions of Edinburgh, which carried him away from Altrive for months every year; and when at home, a warm and hospitable disposition, so often stirred by vanity less pardonable than his, made him convert his cottage into an unpaid hostelry for the reception of endless troops of thoughtless admirers; and thus, in spite of much help and much forbearance, he was never out of one set of pecuniary difficulties before he had begun to weave the meshes of some fresh entanglement. In pace requiescat. There will never be such an Ettrick Shepherd again.

In May 1808, Joanna Baillie spent a week or two under Scott's roof in Edinburgh. Their acquaintance was thus knit into a deep and respectful affection on both sides; and henceforth they maintained a close epistolary correspondence, which will always be read with special interest. But within a few weeks after her departure, he was to commence another intimacy not less sincere and cordial; and one productive of a still more important series of his letters. He had now reached a period of life after which real friendships are but seldom formed; and it is fortunate that another with an Englishman of the highest class of accomplishments had been thoroughly compacted before death cut the ties between him and George Ellis—because his dearest intimates within Scotland had of course but a slender part in his written correspondence. Mr. Morritt of Rokeby and his wife had long been intimate with Lady Louisa Stuart and Mr. William Rose; and the meeting, therefore, had been well prepared for. It took place at Edinburgh in June. Scott shewed them the lions of the town and its vicinity, exactly as if he had nothing else to attend to but their gratification; and Mr. Morrill recollected with particular pleasure one long day spent in rambling along the Esk by Roslin and Hawthornden,

Where Jonson sat in Drummond's social shade, down to the old haunts of Lasswade. "When we approached that village," he writes,—"Scott, who had laid hold of my arm, turned along the road in a direction not leading to the place where the carriage was to meet us. After walking some minutes towards Edinburgh, I suggested that we were losing the scenery of the Esk, and, besides, had Dalkeith Palace yet to see. 'Yes,' said he, 'and I have been bringing you where there is little enough to be seen—only that Scotch cottage—(one by the roadside, with a small garth)—but, though not worth looking at, I could not pass it. It was our first country-house when newly married, and many a contrivance we had to make it comfortable. I made a dining-table for it with my own hands. Look at these two miserable willow-trees on either side the gate into the enclosure; they are tied together at the top to be an arch, and a cross made of two sticks over them is not yet decayed. To be sure, it is not much of a lion to shew a stranger; but I wanted to see it again myself, for I assure you that after I had constructed it, mamma (Mrs. Scott) and I both of us thought it so fine, we turned out to see it by moonlight, and walked backwards from it to the cottage door, in admiration of our own magnificence and its picturesque effect. I did want to see if it was still there—so now we will look after the barouche, and make the best of our way to Dalkeith.' Such were the natural feelings that endeared the Author of Marmion and the Lay to those who saw him in 'the happier hour of social pleasure.' His person at that time may be exactly known from Raeburn's first picture, which had just been executed for his bookseller, Constable, and which was a most faithful likeness of him and his dog Camp. The literal fidelity of the portraiture, however, is its principal merit. The expression is serious and contemplative, very unlike the hilarity and vivacity then habitual to his speaking face, but quite true to what it was in the absence of such excitement. His features struck me at first as commonplace and heavy,—but they were almost always lighted up by the flashes of the mind within. This required a hand more masterly than Raeburn's; and indeed, in my own opinion, Chantrey alone has in his bust attained that, in his case, most difficult task of portraying the features faithfully, and yet giving the real and transient expression of the countenance when animated.

“We passed a week in Edinburgh, chiefly in his society and that of his friends the Mackenzies. We were so far on our way to Brahan Castle, in Ross-shire. Scott unlocked all his antiquarian lore, and supplied us with numberless data, such as no guide-book could have furnished, and such as his own Monkbarns might have delighted to give. It would be idle to tell how much pleasure and instruction his advice added to a tour in itself so productive of both, as well as of private friendships and intimacies, now too generally terminated by death, but never severed by caprice or disappointment. His was added to the number by our reception now in Edinburgh, and, on our return from the Highlands, at Ashiestiel where he had made us promise to visit him, saying that the farm-house had pigeon-holes enough for such of his friends as could live, like him, on Tweed salmon and Forest mutton. There he was the cherished friend and kind neighbour of every middling Selkirkshire yeoman, just as easily as in Edinburgh he was the companion of clever youth and narrative old age in refined society. He carried us one day to Melrose Abbey or Newark -- another, to course with mountain greyhounds by Yarrow braes or St. Mary's Loch, repeating every ballad or legendary tale connected with the scenery -- and on a third, we must all go to a farmer's kirn, or harvest-home, to dance with Border lasses on a barn floor, drink whisky punch, and enter with him into all the gossip and good-fellowship of his neighbours, on a complete footing of unrestrained conviviality, equality, and mutual respect. His wife and happy young family were clustered round him, and the cordiality of his reception would have unbent a misanthrope.

“At this period his conversation was more equal and animated than any man's that I ever knew. It was most characterised by the extreme felicity and fun of his illustrations, drawn from the whole encyclopædia of life and nature, in a style sometimes too exuberant for written narrative, but which to him was natural and spontaneous. A hundred stories, always apposite, and often interesting the mind by strong pathos, or eminently ludicrous, were daily told, which, with many more, have since been transplanted, almost in the same language, into the Waverley novels and his other writings. These, and his recitations of poetry, which can never be forgotten by those who knew him, made up the charm that his boundless memory enabled him to exert to the wonder of the gaping lovers of wonders. But equally impressive and powerful was the language of his warm heart, and equally wonderful were the conclusions of his vigorous understanding, to those who could return or appreciate either. Among a number of such recollections, I have seen many of the thoughts which then passed through his mind embodied in the delightful prefaces annexed late in life to his poetry and novels. Those on literary quarrels and literary irritability are exactly what he then expressed. Keenly enjoying literature as he did, and indulging his own love of it in perpetual composition, he always maintained the same estimate of it as subordinate and auxiliary to the purposes of life, and rather talked of men and events than of books and criticism. Literary fame, he always said, was a bright feather in the cap, but not the substantial cover of a well-protected head. This sound and manly feeling was what I have seen described by some of his biographers as pride, and it will always be thought so by those whose own vanity can only be gratified by the admiration of others, and who mistake shows for realities. None valued the love and applause of others more than Scott; but it was to the love and applause of those he valued in return that he restricted the feeling—without restricting the kindness. Men who did not, or would not, understand this, perpetually mistook him—and, after loading him with undesired eulogy, perhaps in his own house neglected common attention or civility to other parts of his family. It was on such an occasion that I heard him murmur in my ear, ‘Author as I am, I wish these good people would recollect that I began with being a gentleman, and don’t mean to give up the character.’ Such was all along his feeling, and this, with a slight prejudice common to Scotchmen in favour of ancient and respectable family descent, constituted what in Grub Street is called his pride. It was, at least, what Johnson would have justly called defensive pride. From all other, and still more from mere vanity, I never knew any man so remarkably free.”

The farmer at whose annual kirn Scott and all his household were, in those days, regular guests, was Mr. Laidlaw, the Duke of Buccleuch’s tenant on the lands of Peel, which are only separated from the eastern terrace of Ashestiel by the ravine and its brook. Mr. Laidlaw was himself possessed of some landed property in the same neighbourhood, and being considered as wealthy, and fond of his wealth, he was usually called among the country people Laird Nippy; an expressive designation which it would be difficult to translate. Though a very dry, demure, and taciturn old Presbyterian, he could not resist the Sheriff's jokes; nay, he even gradually subdued his scruples so far as to become a pretty constant attendant at his "English printed prayers" on the Sundays; which, indeed, the parish-kirk being eight miles distant, attracted by degrees more neighbours than quite suited the capacity of the parlour-chapel. Mr. Laidlaw's wife was a woman of superior mind and manners—a great reader, and one of the few to whom Scott liked lending his books; for most strict and delicate was he always in the care of them, and indeed, hardly any trivial occurrence ever seemed to touch his temper at all, except anything like irreverent treatment of a book. The intercourse between the family at Ashestiel and this worthy woman and her children, was a constant interchange of respect and kindness; but I remember to have heard Scott say that the greatest compliment he had ever received in his life was from the rigid old farmer himself; for, years after he had left Ashestiel, he discovered casually that special care had been taken to keep the turf seat on the Shirra's knowe in good repair; and this was much from Nippy.

And here I must set down a story, which, most readers will smile to be told, was often repeated by Scott, and always with an air that seemed to me, in spite of his endeavours to the contrary, as grave as the usual aspect of Laird Nippy of the Peel. This neighbour was a distant kinsman of his dear friend William Laidlaw;—so distant, that elsewhere in that condition they would scarcely have remembered any community of blood;—but they both traced their descent, in the ninth degree, to an ancestress who, in the days of John Knox, fell into trouble from a suspicion of witchcraft. In her time the Laidlaws were rich and prosperous, and held rank among the best gentry of Tweeddale; but in some evil hour, her husband, the head of his blood, reproached her with her addiction to the black art, and she, in her anger, cursed the name and lineage of Laidlaw. Her youngest son, who stood by, implored her to revoke the malediction; but in vain. Next day, however, on the renewal of his entreaties, she carried him with her into the woods, made him slay a heifer, sacrificed it to the power of evil in his presence, and then, collecting the ashes in her apron, invited the youth to see her commit them to the river. "Follow them," said she, "from stream to pool, as long as they float visible, and as many streams as you shall then have passed, for so many generations shall your descendants prosper. After that, they shall, like the rest of the name, be poor, and take their part in my curse." The streams he counted were nine;

“and now,” Scott would say, “look round you in this country, and sure enough, the Laidlaws are one and all landless men, with the single exception of Auld Nippy!” Many times had I heard both him and William Laidlaw tell this story, before any suspicion got abroad that Nippy’s wealth rested on insecure foundations. Year after year, we never escorted a stranger by the Peel, but I heard the tale, and at last it came with a new conclusion: “and now, think whatever we choose of it, my good friend Nippy is landless.” He had sold his own land and quitted the Peel.

Mr. Morritt’s mention of the “happy young family clustered round him” at Mr. Laidlaw’s kirk, reminds me that I ought to say a few words on Scott’s method of treating his children in their early days. He had now two boys and two girls,¹ and he never had more. He was not one of those who take much delight in a mere infant; but no father ever devoted more time and tender care to his offspring than he did to each of his, as they reached the age when they could listen to him, and understand his talk. Like their playmates, Campbells and the greyhounds, they had at all times free access to his study; he never considered their prattle as any disturbance; they went and came as pleased their fancy; he was always ready to answer their questions; and when they, unconscious how he was engaged, entreated him to lay down his pen and tell them a story, he would take them on his knee, repeat a ballad or a legend, kith and kin, and set them down again to their needles or tinopans, and resume his labour, as if refreshed by the interruption. From a very early age he made them dine at table, and “to sit up to supper” was the great reward when they had been “very good bairns.” In short, he considered it as the highest duty as well as the sweetest pleasure of a parent to be the companion of his children; he partook all their little joys and sorrows, and made his kind informal instructions to blend so easily and layfully with the current of their own sayings and doings, that so far from regarding him with any distant awe, it was never thought that any sport or diversion could go on in the right way, unless papa were of the party, or that the rainiest day could be dull, so he were at home.

Of the irregularity of his own education he speaks with regret, in the autobiographical fragment written this year at Shottel; yet his practice does not look as if that feeling had been strongly rooted in his mind;— for he never did show much concern about regulating systematically what is usually called education in the case of his children. It seemed, on the contrary, as if he attached little importance to anything else, so he could perceive that the young curiosity was excited — the intellect, by whatever springs of interest, set in motion. He detested and despised the whole generation of modern children's books, in which the attempt is made to convey accurate notions of scientific minutiae: delighting cordially, on the other hand, in those of the preceding age, which, addressing themselves chiefly to the imagination, obtain through it, as he believed, the best chance of stirring our graver faculties also. He exercised the memory by selecting for tasks of recitation passages of popular verse the most likely to catch the fancy of children; and gradually familiarised them with the ancient history of their own country, by arresting attention, in the course of his own oral narrations, on incidents and characters of a similar description. Nor did he neglect to use the same means of quickening curiosity as to the events of sacred history. On Sunday he never rode — at least not until his growing infirmity made his pony almost necessary to him — for it was his principle that all domestic animals have a full right to their Sabbath of rest; but after he had read the prayers and lessons of the day, he usually walked with his whole family, dogs included, to some favourite spot at a considerable distance from the house — most frequently the ruined tower of Elibank — and there dined with them in the open air on a basket of cold provisions, mixing his wine with the water of the brook beside which they all were grouped around him on the turf; and here, or at home, if the weather kept them from their ramble, his Sunday talk was just such a series of biblical lessons as that which we have preserved for the permanent use of rising generations, in his Tales of a Grandfather on the early history of Scotland. I wish he had committed that other series to writing too; — how different that would have been from our thousand compilations of dead epitome and imbecile cant! He had his Bible, the Old Testament especially, by heart; and on these days inwove the simple pathos or sublime enthusiasm of Scripture, in whatever story he was telling, with the same picturesque richness as in his week-day tales the quaint Scotch of Pitscottie, or some rude romantic old rhyme from Barbour's Bruce or Blind Harry's Wallace.

¹ Charlotte Sophia, born in October 1790; Walter, October 1801; Anne, February 1803; Charles, December 1805.

By many external accomplishments, either in girl or boy, he set little store. He delighted to hear his daughters sing an old ditty, or one of his own framing; but, so the singer ap-to feel the spirit of her ballad, he was not at all of the technical execution. There was one thing, however, on which he fixed his heart hardly less than the Persians of the Cyropædia: like them, next to love of the horse, he held love of horsemanship for the prime point of education. As soon as his eldest girl could sit a pony, she was the regular attendant of his mountain rides, and they, when they attained sufficient strength, had the like advantage. He taught them to think nothing of tumbling, and invited them to his own reckless delight in perilous fords and rapid streams; and they all imbibed in great profusion a passion for horses—as well, I may venture to add, as his reverence for the more important article of that Persian sage. “Without courage,” he said, “there cannot be truth, without truth there can be no other virtue.”

He had a horror of boarding-schools; never allowed his girls to go to anything out of his own house; and chose their governess, Miss Miller—who about this time was domesticated with him, and never left them while they needed one, for her greater regard to her kind good temper and excellent moral and religious principles, than to the measure of attainments in what are called fashionable accomplishments.

The admirable system of education for boys in the country had carried their satchels to the High School, and the family was in Edinburgh, just as he had done before; and shared of course the evening society of their happy friends.

But he rarely, if ever, left them in town, when he himself he in the country; and at Ashiestiel he was, whether or for worse, his eldest boy's daily tutor, after he had learned Latin.

His letters of this autumn to such friends as Rose, Merritt, and Miss Baillie, give additional details of the pleasant domestic life at Ashiestiel. In one (Sept 3) he says to Miss Joanna Baillie: “To ask what I am doing, I am very like a certain ancient philosopher distinguished in the Edda, who, when Loki paid him a

Was twisting of collars his dogs to hold,
And combing the mane of his courser bold

“The idle man's employment required any apology, we must not be in the difficulty of seeking food to make any other increase of English guests; for we are eight miles from market, and all in all the country sports to aid the larder.” Scott, however, had business enough at this time, besides combing the mane of Brown Adam, and twisting couples for Douglas and Percy. He was deep in Swift; and the Ballantyne press was groaning under a multitude of works, with almost all of which his hand as well as his head had something, more or less, to do. But a serious change was about to take place in his relations with the spirited publishing house which had hitherto been the most efficient supporters of that press; and his letters begin to be much occupied with disputes which cost him many anxious hours in the apparently idle autumn of 1808. Mr. Constable had then for his partner Mr. Hunter, afterwards Laird of Blackness, to whose intemperate language, much more than to any part of Constable's own conduct, Scott ascribed this unfortunate alienation; which, however, as well as most of my friend's subsequent misadventures, I am inclined to trace in no small degree to the influence which a third person, hitherto unnamed, was about this time beginning to exercise over the concerns of James Ballantyne.

John Ballantyne, a younger brother of Scott's school-fellow, was originally destined for the paternal trade of a merchant—(that is to say, a dealer in everything from fine broadcloth to children's tops)—at Kelso. The father seems to have sent him when very young to London, where, whatever else he may have done in the way of professional training, he spent some time in the banking-house of Messrs. Currie. On returning to Kelso, however, the “department” which more peculiarly devolved upon him was the tailoring one.¹ His personal habits had not been improved by his brief sojourn in the Great City, and the business, in consequence (by his own statement) of the irregularity of his life, gradually melted to nothing in his hands. Early in 1805, his goods were sold off, and barely sufficed to pay his debts. The worthy old couple found refuge with their ever affectionate eldest son, who provided his father with some little occupation (real or nominal) about the printing office; and thus John himself again quitted his native place, under circumstances which, as I shall shew in the sequel, had left a deep and painful trace even upon that volatile mind. He had, however, some taste, and he at least fancied himself to have some talent for literature; ² and the rise of his

¹ The first time that William Laidlaw saw John Ballantyne, he had come to Selkirk to measure the troopers of the Yeomanry Cavalry, of whom Laidlaw was one, for new breeches.

² John Ballantyne, upon the marvellous success of Waverley, wrote and published a wretched novel, called The Wicksteed's Lodgings.

, who also had met with no success in his original profession was before him. He had acquired in London great dexterity in book-keeping and accounts. He was by this time; and it might naturally be hoped, that the severe lessons of the past, he would now apply sedulously to any duty that might be intrusted to him. The Company in the Canongate was a growing one, and James Ballant's somewhat indolent habits were already severely tried by its management. The Company offered John a salary of £100 per year as clerk; and the destitute ex-merchant was too glad to accept the proposal.

John was a quick, active, intrepid little fellow; and in society so lively and amusing, so full of fun and merriment — such a highly light-hearted droll, all-over quaintness and humorism; and moreover, such a keen and skilful devotee and manager of field-sports, from fox hunting to badger-baiting, that it was no wonder he should have made a favourable impression on Scott, when he appeared in Edinburgh in a destitute plight, and offered to assist James in book-keeping, which the latter never understood, or could bring himself to do with regularity. The contrast between the two was not the least of the amusement; indeed that could amuse him to the last. The elder of these is painted so fully in an early letter of Leyden's, which, on the Doctor's authority, though not (I fancy) without warrant, permitted to be printed: — " Methinks I see you with your confounded sard, bull-neck, and upper lip turned up to your nose, and one of your eyebrows is cocked perpendicularly, and the other forms pretty well the base of a right angled triangle, and your great gloating eyes, and crying — But Leyden!!!" — John was a short, stout, well made man, and would have been considered a handsome one, but for these grotesque frowns, and twistings of his features, set off by a certain mock gravity of walk and gesture, which he had perhaps contracted from his usual companions, the emperors and tyrants of the stage. His voice in talk was grave and sonorous, and he sang with great pathos and feeling (and he sang very patriotically well), in a fine rich bass. John's tone in singing was a sharp treble — in conversation something between a whisper and a squeak. Of his style of story-telling it is sufficient to say that the late Charles Mathews's "old Scotch lady" was a perfect copy of the original, which the great comedian had read in my presence from his lips.¹ He was shorter than the reader will find an amusing anecdote of Johnny in the Memoirs of James Ballant, by his widow, vol. II. p. 362.

James, but lean as a scarecrow, and he rather hopped than walked; his features, too, were naturally good, and he twisted them about quite as much, but in a very different fashion. The elder brother was a gourmand—the younger liked his bottle and his bowl, as well as, like Johnny Armstrong, “a hawk, a hound, and a fair woman.” Scott used to call the one Aldiborontiphoscophornio—the other Rigdunfaunides. They both entertained him; they both loved and revered him; and I believe would have shed their heart’s blood in his service; but James had serious deficiencies as a man of business, and John was not likely to supply them. A more reckless, thoughtless, imprudent adventurer never rushed into the serious responsibilities of commerce; but his cleverness, his vivacity, his unaffected zeal, his gay fancy always seeing the light side of everything, his imperturbable good-humour, and buoyant elasticity of spirits, made and kept him such a favourite, that I believe Scott would have as soon ordered his dog to be hanged, as harboured, in his darkest hour of perplexity, the least thought of discarding “jocund Johnny.”

The great bookseller of Edinburgh was a man of calibre infinitely beyond the Ballantynes. Though with a strong dash of the sanguine (without which, indeed, there can be no great projector in any walk of life), Archibald Constable was one of the most sagacious persons that ever followed his profession. Mr. Thomas Campbell writes to Scott, a year or two before this time, — “Our butteracious friend at the Cross turns out a deep draw-well;” and another eminent literator, still more closely connected with Constable, had already, I believe, christened him “The Crafty.” Indeed, his fair and very handsome physiognomy carried a bland astuteness of expression, not to be mistaken by any who could read the plainest of nature’s handwriting. He made no pretensions to literature—though he was in fact a tolerable judge of it generally, and particularly well skilled in the department of Scotch antiquities. He trusted himself, however, in such matters, being conscious that his early education had been very imperfect; and moreover, he wisely considered the business of a critic as quite as much out of his “proper line” as authorship itself. But of that “proper line,” and his own qualifications for it, his estimation was ample; and—often as I may have smiled at the lofty serenity of his self-complacence—I confess I now doubt whether he rated himself too highly as a master in the true science of the bookseller. He had, indeed, in his mercantile character one deep and fatal flaw—for he hated accounts, and systematically refused, during the most vigorous years of his life, to examine or sign a balance-sheet; but for casting a keen eye over the remotest indications of popular taste—for anticipating the chances of success and failure in any given variety of adventure—for the planning and invention of his calling—he was not, in his own day at least, surpassed; and among all his myriad of undertakings, I question if any one that really originated with himself, and continued to be superintended by his own care, ever did fail. He was as bold as far-sighted—and his disposition was as liberal as his views were wide. Had he and Scott from the beginning trusted as thoroughly as they understood each other; had there been no third parties to step in, flattering an overweening vanity on the one hand into presumption, and on the other side spurring the enterprise that wanted nothing but a bridle, I have no doubt their joint career might have been one of unbroken prosperity. But the Ballantynes were jealous of the superior mind, bearing, and authority of Constable; and though he too had a liking for them both personally—esteemed James's literary tact, and was far too much of a humourist not to be very fond of the younger brother's company—he could never away with the feeling that they intervened unnecessarily, and left him but the shadow, where he ought to have had the substantial lion's share, of confidence. On his part, again, he was too proud a man to give entire confidence where that was withheld from himself.

But in tracing the progress of the coldness which this year advanced to a complete rupture, it must be especially kept in mind that the Edinburgh Review had been the great primary source of the wealth and influence of the house of Constable. The then comparatively little-known bookseller of London, who was destined to be ultimately its most formidable rival in more than one department, has told me, that when he read the article on Marmion, and another on general politics in the same Number, he said to himself—"Walter Scott has feelings both as a gentleman and a Tory, which these people must now have wounded; the alliance between him and the whole Étiquette of the Review, its proprietor included, is shaken;" and, as far at least as the political part of the affair was concerned, John Murray's sagacity was not at fault. We have seen with what thankful alacrity he accepted a small share in the adventure of Marmion—and with what brilliant success that was crowned; nor is it wonderful that a young bookseller, conscious of ample energies, should now have watched with eagerness the circumstances which seemed not unlikely to place within his own reach a more intimate connexion with the first great living author in whose works he had ever had any direct interest. He forthwith took measures for improving and extending his relations with James Ballantyne, through whom, as he guessed, Scott could best be approached. His tenders of employment for the Canongate press were such that the apparent head of the firm proposed a conference at Ferrybridge in Yorkshire; and there Murray, after detailing some of his own literary plans — particularly that already alluded to, of a Novelist's Library — in his turn sounded Ballantyne so far as to resolve on pursuing his journey into Scotland. Ballantyne had said enough to satisfy him that the project of setting up a new publishing house in Edinburgh, in opposition to Constable, was already all but matured; and he, on the instant, proposed himself for its active co-operator in the metropolis. The printer proceeded to open his budget farther, mentioning, among other things, that the author of Marmion had “both another Scotch poem and a Scotch novel on the stocks;” and had moreover chalked out the design of an Edinburgh Annual Register, to be conducted in opposition to the politics and criticism of Constable's Review. These tidings might have been enough to make Murray proceed farther northwards; but there was a scheme of his own which had for some time deeply occupied his mind, and the last article of this communication determined him to embrace the opportunity of opening it in person at Ashiestiel. He arrived there about the middle of October. The 26th Number of the Edinburgh Review, containing Mr. Brougham's article entitled “Don Cevallos on the usurpation of Spain,” had just been published; and one of the first things Scott mentioned in conversation was, that he had so highly resented the tone of that essay, as to give orders that his name might be discontinued on the list of subscribers.¹ Mr. Murray could not have wished better auspices for the matter he had come to open; it was no other than the project of a London Review on the scale of the Edinburgh; and, for weeks ensuing, Scott's letters to Ellis, Morritt, and other literary Tories, attest with what eager zeal he had embraced the new scheme.

¹ When the 26th Number appeared, Mr. Scott wrote to Constable in these terms: — “The Edinburgh Review had become such as to render it impossible for me to continue a contributor to it. — Now, it is such as I can no longer continue to receive or read it.” The list of the then subscribers exhibits, in an indignant dash of Constable's pen opposite Mr. Scott's name, the word “STOP!!!” — R. Cadell.

It is impossible to include more than a fragment of this curious and curious correspondence in the present narrative; the first letter to Ellis (Nov. 2) seems to contain, in a few sentences, a sufficiently intelligible summary of his main views. It says:—“The present Ministry are not all that I could wish them—for (Canning excepted) I doubt there is among them too much self-seeking, as it was called in Cromwell’s time; and what is their misfortune, if not their fault, there is not among them one in the decided situation of paramount authority both with respect to the others and to the Crown, which is, in my opinion, necessary, at least in difficult times, to produce promptitude, regularity, and efficiency in measures of importance. If their political principles are sound English principles, and compared to the greedy and inefficient horde which preceded them, they are angels of light and of purity. It is obvious, however, that they want defenders both in and out doors. Pitt’s —‘Love and fear glued many friends to him;

And now he’s fallen, those tough commixtures melt.’¹

Were this only to affect a change of hands, I should expect it to have more indifference; but I fear a change of principles is designed. The Edinburgh Review tells you coolly, ‘We forego a speedy revolution in this country, as well as Mr. Cobbett;’ and, to say the truth, by degrading the person of the Sovereign and exalting the power of the French armies, and the wisdom of their counsels—holding forth that peace (which they allow may only be purchased by the humiliating prostration of our country) is indispensable to the very existence of this country—I think, that for these two years past, they have done their utmost to hasten the accomplishment of their own prophecy. This work 9000 copies are printed quarterly, and no genteel family can pretend to be without it, because, independent of its political merits, it gives the only valuable literary criticism which can be met with. Consider, of the numbers who read this work, how many are likely to separate the literature from the politics—how many youths are there upon whose minds the flashy and bold character of the work is likely to make an indelible impression. Now, I think there is balm in Gilead for all this; and that the cure lies in instituting such a Review in London, which should be conducted totally independent of bookselling influences, on a plan as liberal as that of the Edinburgh, its literature as well supported, and its principles English and constitutional. Accordingly, I have been given to understand that Mr. William Gifford is willing to become the conductor of such a work, and I have written to him a very voluminous letter on the subject. Now, should this plan succeed, you must hang your birding-piece on its hooks, take down your old Anti-Jacobin armour, and 'remember your swashing blow.' In point of learning, you Englishmen have ten times our scholarship; and as for talent and genius, 'Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than any of the rivers in Israel?' Have we not yourself and your cousin, the Roses, Malthus, Matthias, Gifford, Heber, and his brother? Can I not procure you a score of blue-caps, who would rather write for us than for the Edinburgh Review if they got as much pay by it? 'A good plot, good friends, and full of expectation— an excellent plot, very good friends!'"¹

¹ See 3d K. Henry IV. Act II. Scene 6.

The excellent plot had too many good friends to be long a secret; nor could the rumours of Scott's share in it and other new schemes tend to soothe the irritation between him and the house of Constable. Something occurred before the end of 1808 which induced Scott to suspect that among other sources of uneasiness had been a repentant grudge as to their bargain about Swift; and on the 2d of January 1809, I find him requesting, that if, on reflexion, they thought they had hastily committed themselves, the deed might be cancelled. To this the firm did not assent: their letter expresses regret that Scott should have attached importance to "an unguarded expression" of the junior partner, "our Mr. Hunter," and the hope that the old footing may be restored hereafter, when the misrepresentations of interested persons may cease to be remembered." Scott replies coldly, requesting that a portrait for which he had paid to Raeburn may be considered as done for himself, charged to his account, and sent to him. Mr. Constable declined, in every handsome terms, to give up the picture. But for the present the breach was complete. Among other negotiations which Scott had patronised twelve months before, was one concerning the publication of Miss Seward's Poems. On the 19th of March, he writes as follows to that lady:— "Constable, like many other folks who learn to undervalue the means by which they have risen, has behaved, or rather suffered his partner to behave, very uncivilly towards me. But they may both live to know that they should not have kicked down the ladder till they were sure of their footing. The very last time I spoke to him on business was about your poems. I understood him to decline your terms; but I had neither influence to change his opinion, nor inclination to interfere with his resolution. He is a very enterprising, and, I believe, a thoroughly honest man, but his vanity in some cases overpowers his discretion."

¹ Hotspur — 1st K. Henry IV. Act II. Scene 3.

"Our Mr. Hunter" was, I am told by friends of mine who knew him well, a man of considerable intelligence and accomplishments, to whose personal connexions the house of Constable owed a great accession of business and influence. He was, however, a very keen politician — in Scott's phrase, "a sort of Whig gone mad;" — regarded Scott's Toryism with a fixed bitterness; and, moreover, could never conceal his impression that Scott ought to have embarked in no other literary undertakings whatever until he had completed his edition of Swift. It is not wonderful that, not having been bred regularly to the book-selling business, he should have somewhat misapprehended the obligation which Scott had incurred when the bargain for that work was made; and his feeling of his own station and consequence was no doubt such as to give his style of conversation, on doubtful questions of business, a tone for which Scott had not been prepared by his previous intercourse with Mr. Constable. The defection of the poet was, however, at once regretted and resented by both these partners; and Constable, I am told, often vented his wrath in figures as lofty as Scott's own. "Ay," he would say, stamping on the ground with a savage smile, "Ay, there is such a thing as rearing the oak until it can support itself."

The project of the Quarterly Review was not the only declaration of hostilities. The scheme of starting a new bookselling house in Edinburgh, begun in the short-sighted heat of pique, had now been matured; — I cannot add, either with composed observation or rational forecast — for it was ultimately settled that the ostensible and chief managing partner should be a person without capital, and neither by training nor by temper in the smallest degree qualified for such a situation; more especially where the field was to be taken against long experience, consummate skill, and resources which, if not so large as all the world supposed them, were still in comparison vast, and admirably organised. The rash resolution was, however, carried into effect, and a deed, deposited for secrecy's sake in the hands of Scott, laid the foundation of the firm of "John Ballantyne & Co., booksellers, Edinburgh." Scott appears to have supplied all the capital, at any rate his own one-half share, and one-fourth, the portion of James, who, not having any funds to spare, must have become indebted to some one for it. It does not appear from what source John acquired his, the remaining fourth; but Rigdumfunnidlos was thus installed in Hanover Street as the avowed rival of "The Crafty."

This was arranged in January. Under the same month I must mention an event often alluded to in its correspondence: — the death of Camp, the first of several dogs whose names will be "freshly remembered" as long as their master's works are popular. This favourite preserved his affection and sagacity to the last. At Ashestiel, as the servant was laying the cloth for dinner, he would say, "Camp, my good fellow, the Sheriff's coming home by the ford — or by the hill;" and the sick animal would immediately bestir himself to welcome his master, going out at the back door or the front door according to the direction given, and advancing as far as he was able, either towards the Tweed, or the Glenkinnon burn. He was buried on a fine moon-light night, in the little garden behind the house in Castle Street, immediately opposite to the window at which Scott usually sat writing. My wife told me that she remembered the whole family standing in tears about the grave, as her father himself smoothed down the turf above Camp with the saddest expression of face she had ever seen in him. He had been engaged to dine abroad that day, but apologised on account of "the death of a dear old friend;" and Mr. Macdonald Buchanan was not at all surprised that he should have done so, when it came out next morning that Camp was no more.

CHAPTER VI.

London — Theatrical Anecdotes — Byron's Satire — The Lady of the Lake — Excursion to the Hebrides — Vision of Don Roderick — Byron — Davy — Crabbe — Purchase of Abbotsford. 1809-1812.

IN February Mr. John Ballantyne proceeded to London, for the purpose of introducing himself to the chief publishers there in his new capacity, and especially of taking Mr. Murray's instructions respecting the Scotch management of the Quarterly Review. As soon as the spring vacation began, Mr. and Mrs. Scott followed him by sea. They stayed two months, and this being the first visit to town since his fame had been crowned by Marmion, he was more than ever the object of curiosity and attention. Mr. Morritt saw much of him, and I transcribe a few sentences from his Memoranda of the period.

'Scott,' his friend says, "more correctly than any other man I ever knew, appreciated the value of that apparently enthusiastic engouement which the world of London shews as the fashionable wonder of the year. The homage paid him neither altered his opinions, nor produced the affectation of despising it; on the contrary, he received it, cultivated it, and paid it in its own coin. 'All this is very flattering,' he would say, 'and very civil; and if people are amused with hearing me tell a parcel of old stories, or recite a pack of ballads to lovely young girls and gaping matrons, they are easily pleased, and a man would be very ill-natured who could not give pleasure so cheaply conferred.' If he dined with us and found any new faces, 'Well, do you want me to play to-day?' was his usual question — 'I will roar if you like to your heart's content.' He would, indeed, in such cases put forth all his inimitable powers of entertainment — and day after day surprise me by their unexpected extent and variety. Then, when the party dwindled, and we were left alone, he laughed at himself, quoted — 'Yet know that I one Snug the joiner am no lion fierce,' &c. — and was at once himself again.

“He often lamented the injurious effects for literature and genius resulting from the excitement of ambition for this ephemeral reputation du salon. ‘It may be a pleasant gale to sail with,’ he said, ‘but it never yet led to a port that I should like to anchor in;’ nor did he willingly endure, either in London or in Edinburgh, the little exclusive circles of literary society, much less their occasional fastidiousness and petty partialities. One story which I heard of him from Dr. Howley, now Archbishop of Canterbury (for I was not present), was very characteristic. The Doctor was one of a grand congregation of lions, where Scott and Coleridge, cum multis aliis, attended at Sotheby’s. Poets and poetry were the topics of the table, and there was plentiful recitation of effusions as yet unpublished, which of course obtained abundant applause. Coleridge repeated more than one, which, as Dr. H. thought, were eulogised by some of the company with something like affectation, and a desire to humble Scott by raising a poet of inferior reputation on his shoulders. Scott, however, joined in the compliments as cordially as anybody, until, in his turn, he was invited to display some of his occasional poetry. Scott said he had nothing of his own worth their hearing, but he would repeat a little copy of verses which he had shortly before seen in a provincial newspaper, and which seemed to him almost as good as anything they had been listening to. He repeated ‘Fire, Famine, and Slaughter.’ The applauses that ensued were faint—then came slight criticisms, from which Scott defended the unknown author. At last a more bitter antagonist opened, and fastening upon one line, cried, ‘This at least is absolute nonsense.’ Scott denied the charge—the Zealot persisted—until Coleridge, out of all patience, exclaimed, ‘For God’s sake let Mr. Scott alone—I wrote the poem.’

“He often complained of the dulness of parties where each guest arrived under the implied obligation of exhibiting some extraordinary powers of talk or wit. ‘If,’ he said, ‘I encounter men of the world, men of business, odd or striking characters of professional excellence in any department, I am in my element, for they cannot lionise me without my returning the compliment and learning something from them.’ He was much with George Ellis, Canning, and Croker, and delighted in them—as indeed who did not?—but he loved to study eminence of every class and sort, and his rising fame gave him easy access to gratify all his curiosity.”

The meetings with Canning, Croker, and Ellis, to which Morritt alludes, were, as may be supposed, chiefly occupied the affairs of the Quarterly Review. The first number red while Scott was in London: and contained three es from his pen.

his way back to Scotland, he spent some days more with tt, at Rokeby Park, on the northern boundary of York ; and he was so delighted by the scenery of the river Tees treta, which have their confluence within the demesne, o interested with his host's traditional anecdotes of avaliers of the Rokeby lineage, that he resolved on eting a poem with these fair landscapes. But he had ly, I presume, begun the Lady of the Lake; for, on his d at Edinburgh, he undertook that it should be finished by nd of the year. In July he revisited all the localities so o him in the days of his juvenile rambling, which he had i for the scene of his fable. He gave a week to Cambus and ascertained, in his own person, that a good horse- ight gallop from Loch Venmaelur to Stirling within the allotted to Fitz-James. He then, under the guidance of Maedonald Buchanan, explored Loch Lomond, Arrochar, Sloy, and all the scenery of a hundred conflicts between acfarlanes, the Colquhouns, and the Clan Alpine. At uan House, which is very near Ross Priory, Lady as and Lady Louisa Stuart were visiting the Duke of ose; he joined them there, and read to them the Stag, which he had just completed under the full influence genius loci.

was at Buchanan that he first saw Lord Byron's Eng- ards and Scotch Reviewers. I need not reprint here o says in an essay in 1830, on his "share in the flagel- of that famous satire," viz. —

Next view in state, proud prancing on his roan,
The golden-crested haughty Marmion —

to

For this we spurn Apollo's vernal son,
And bid a long good night to Marmion.

is amusing enough to contrast with that graceful "Intro- 1" the plain words of a letter to Southey, written in t 1809. He there says: — "If I were once in possession e reversionary income, I would do nothing but what I l, which might be another phrase for doing very little. always an admirer of the modest wish of a retainer in Beaumont and Fletcher's plays —

‘ I would not be a serving man, to carry the cloak-bag still,
 Nor would I be a falconer, the greedy hawks to fill ;
 But I would be in a good house, and have a good master too,
 For I would eat and drink of the best, and no work would I do.’¹

In the meantime, it is funny enough to see a whelp of a young Lord Byron abusing me, of whose circumstances he knows nothing, for endeavouring to scratch out a living with my pen. God help the bear, if, having little else to eat, he must not even suck his own paws. I can assure the noble imp of fame it is not my fault that I was not born to a park and L.5000 a year, as it is not his lordship’s merit, although it may be his great good fortune, that he was not born to live by his literary talents or success.”

About this time several travesties of Scott’s poetry, I do not recollect by whom, were favourably noticed in some of the minor reviews, and appear to have annoyed Mr. Morritt. Scott’s only remark on the Lay of the Scotch Fiddle, &c. &c. is in a very miscellaneous letter to that friend : — “ As to those terrible parodies which have come forth, I can only say with Benedict, A college of such witmongers cannot flout me out of my humour. Had I been conscious of one place about my temper, were it even, metaphorically speaking, the tip of my heel, vulnerable to this sort of aggression, I have that respect for mine own ease, that I would have shunned being a candidate for public applause, as I would avoid snatching a honey-comb from among a hive of live bees.” When, three years later, all the world laughed over James Smith’s really admirable Death of Clutterbuck, in the Rejected Addresses, no one laughed more heartily than the author of Marmion.

To this period belong two stories, which it would be unfair to suppress. It is a rare case when a large family does not include a frail member. Walter Scott’s youngest brother Daniel was such.² After many luckless adventures, he obtained, through the poet’s connexion with George Ellis, a post of responsibility on a West Indian estate ; but in a moment of danger, his nerves shewed the effects of continued dissipation. He was dismissed, and died soon afterwards at Edinburgh, under his mother’s roof — but his brother would never see him, nor would he attend his funeral, or wear mourning for him. Thus sternly, when in the height and pride of his blood, could Scott, whose heart was never hardened against the distress of an enemy, coil from the disgrace of a brother. It is a more pleasing part of my duty to add, that he spoke to me, twenty years afterwards, in terms of great and painful contrition for the sterility with which he had conducted himself on this occasion. I must add, moreover, that he took a warm interest in a natural child whom Daniel had bequeathed to his mother's care; and after the old lady's death, religiously supplied her place as the child's protector.

¹ The Knight of the Burning Pestle.

² See Chap. I., ante, p. 9.

The other story is connected with his ever dear brother Thomas, in whose hands, as has been mentioned above, the business that he inherited did not prosper. Walter, as Clerk of Session, had the patronage of several offices in the Register House at Edinburgh, and he appointed Thomas to one of these, which no means so lucrative as others at his disposal, but welcome under the circumstances. Thomas soon after found it convenient to withdraw for a time to the Isle of Man; and while he was there, the Government introduced a bill, by which his tractorship, and many other little places of the sort, were to be abolished, the holders receiving some compensation by way of annuity. Some keen Edinburgh partisans suggested to the Earl of Lauderdale (then at the head of the Whig interest in Scotland) that Walter Scott had foreseen the abolition of the office when he bestowed it on Thomas — that Thomas was discharging its small duties by deputy — and that in his case compensation would be only the successful crowning of a job. Scott, in his letters to friends, both Whig and Tory, denies indignantly that either he or Thomas had anticipated the abolition of the office, and intimates his conviction that the parliamentary opposition to the compensation sprang entirely from the wish to hurt his own feelings. Lord Lauderdale's amendment was lost in the House of Peers. Indeed no other peer spoke in favour of it except Lord Holland; and Scott presented that speech warmly, because his Lordship seemed to have "gone out of his way" in meddling about a small Scotch matter. It happened unluckily that Lord Holland visited Edinburgh within a few weeks afterwards, and he was then introduced by Scott's friend, Mr. Thomas Thomson, at a dinner of the Friday Club.¹ The poet, in a letter to his brother, says: "We met accidentally at a public party. He made up to me, but I remembered his part in your affair, and cut him with as little remorse as an old pen." Two gentlemen who were present, inform me that they distinctly remember a very painful scene, for which, knowing Scott's habitual good-nature and urbanity, they had been wholly unprepared. One of them (Lord Jeffrey) adds, that this was the only example of rudeness he ever witnessed in him in the course of a lifelong familiarity. It is consolatory to add, that he enjoyed much agreeable intercourse in after days with Lord Holland.

¹ The Friday Club was instituted in June 1803 — on the model, I believe, of Johnson's at the Turk's Head. Scott, Thomson, and most of his intimates at the Bar were original members. The great majority were Whigs. They dined at Fortune's tavern.

I willingly turn from these dregs of politics to some other matters, which about this time occupied a large share of his thoughts. He had from his boyish days a great love for theatrical representation; and so soon as circumstances enabled him to practise extended hospitality, the chief actors of his time, whenever they happened to be in Scotland, were among the most acceptable of his guests. Mr. Charles Young was, I believe, the first of them of whom he saw much: as early as 1803 I find him writing of that gentleman to the Marchioness of Abercorn as a valuable addition to the society of Edinburgh; and down to the end of Scott's life, Mr. Young was never in the north without visiting him. Another graceful performer, of whom he saw a great deal in his private circle, was Miss Smith, afterwards Mrs. Bartley. But at the period of which I am now treating, his principal theatrical intimacy was with John Philip Kemble, and his sister Mrs. Siddons, both of whom he appears to have often met at Lord Abercorn's villa near Stanmore. Of John Kemble's character and manners, he has recorded his impressions in a pleasing review of Mr. Bowden's Memoir. The great tragedian's love of black-letter learning afforded a strong bond of fellowship; and I have heard Scott say that the only man who ever seduced him into very deep potations in his middle life was Kemble. He was frequently at Ashestiel, and a grave butler, by name John Macbeth, made sore complaints of the bad hours kept on such occasions in one of the most regular of households; but the watchings of the night were not more grievous to "Cousin Macbeth," as Kemble called the honest brunfettier, than were the hazards and fatigues of the morning to the representative of "the Scotch usurper." Kemble's miseries during a rough gallop were quite as grotesque as those of his namesake, and it must be owned that species of distress was one from the contemplation of which his host could never derive anything but amusement.

I have heard Scott chuckle with particular glee over the recollection of an excursion to the vale of the Ettrick, near oh river the party were pursued by a bull. "Come, King John," said he, "we must even take the water;" and accordingly he and his daughter Sophia plunged into the stream. King John, halting on the bank, and surveying the river, which happened to be full and turbid, exclaimed, in his usual manner,

—"The flood is angry, Sheriff; Methinks I'll get me up into a tree."

As well that the dogs had succeeded in diverting the bull, because there was no tree at hand which could have sustained King John, nor, had that been otherwise, could so stately a monarch have dismounted and ascended with such alacrity as the circumstances would have required. He at length followed his friends through the river with the rueful dignity of Don Quixote.

It was this intercourse which led Scott to exert himself vigorously about 1809, to prevail on Mr. Henry Siddons, the nephew of Kemble, to undertake the lease and management of the Edinburgh Theatre. On this occasion he purchased shares, and became one of the acting trustees; and thenceforward, during a long series of years, he continued to take a lively concern in the proceedings of the Edinburgh company. In this he was plentifully encouraged by his domestic circle; for his wife had all a Frenchwoman's passion for the spectacle; and the elder Ballantyne was a regular newspaper critic of theatrical affairs, and in that capacity had already attained a measure of authority supremely gratifying to himself.

The first new play produced by Henry Siddons was the family Legend of Joanna Bailie. This was, I believe, the first of her dramas that ever underwent the test of representation in her native kingdom; and Scott exerted himself most faithfully in its behalf. He was consulted about all the details of costume, attended every rehearsal, and supplied the prologue. The play was better received than any other

John Kemble's most familiar table-talk often flowed into blank verse. So indeed did his sister's. Scott (who was a capital mimic) often recited her tragic exclamation to a footboy during a dinner at Ashfield

"You've brought me water, boy— I ask'd for beer!"

Another time, dining with a Provost of Edinburgh, she ejaculated, in answer to her host's apology for his pièce de résistance—

"Beef cannot be too salt for me, my Lord!"

which the gifted authoress has since subjected to the same experiment; and how ardently Scott enjoyed its success may be seen in many letters which he addressed to his friend on the occasion.

It was at a rehearsal of this piece that Scott was first introduced to another theatrical performer — who ere long acquired a large share of his regard and confidence — Mr. Daniel Terry. He had received a good education, and been regularly trained as an architect; but abandoned that profession at an early period of life, and was now beginning to attract attention as a valuable actor in Henry Siddons's company. Already he and the Ballantynes were constant companions, and through his familiarity with them, Scott had abundant opportunities of appreciating his many excellent and agreeable qualities. He had the manners and feelings of a gentleman. Like John Kemble, he was deeply skilled in the old literature of the drama, and he rivalled Scott's own enthusiasm for the antiquities of vertu. Their epistolary correspondence in after days was frequent, and none so well illustrates many of the poet's minor tastes and habits. As their letters he before us, they appear as if they had all been penned by the same hand. Terry's idolatry of his new friend induced him to imitate his writing so zealously, that Scott used to say, if he were called on to swear to any document, the utmost he could venture to attest would be, that it was either in his own hand or in Terry's. The actor, perhaps unconsciously, mimicked him in other matters with hardly inferior pertinacity. His small lively features had acquired, before I knew him, a truly ludicrous cast of Scott's graver expression; he had taught his tiny eyebrow the very trick of the poet's meditative frown; and to crown all, he so habitually affected his tone and accent, that, though a native of Bath, a stranger could hardly have doubted he must be a Scotchman. These things afforded all their acquaintance much diversion; but perhaps no Stone could have helped being secretly gratified by seeing a clever and sensible man convert himself into a living type and symbol of admiration.

Charles Mathews and Terry were once thrown out of a gig together, and the former received an injury which made him halt ever afterwards, while the latter escaped unhurt. "Dooms, Daniel," said Mathews when they next met, "what a pity that it wasna your luck to get the game leg, mon! Your Shirra would hae been the very thing, ye ken, an' ye wad hae been croose till ye war confined!" Terry, though he did not

"When broke his leg by some infortunate broke,
Says I to Johnson, all by way of joke,
Says, sir, in Paragraft will soon be clever,
He'll take off Peter better now than ever."

Mathews's witty caricature of Terry's sober mimicry of it was one of the richest extravaganzas of his social hours; indeed I have often seen this Proteus dramatise the whole lantyrne group with equal success — while Rigdumfumundus sneezed with delight, and Aldiboroniphosphorhio faintly ekked, and the Sheriff, gently smiling, pushed round his anters.¹

Scott had by the end of 1809 all but completed his third lantyrne; yet this year also was crowded with miscellaneous lantyrne labours. In it he made great progress with Swift, and at he finished and saw published his edition of the Sadler lantyrnes; the notes copious, curious, lively and entertaining, and the Life of Sir Ralph a very pleasing specimen of his lantyrne. Several volumes of the huge Somers' Collection, illustrated throughout with similar care, were also issued in 1809; and I suppose he received his fee for each volume as it appeared, the whole sum amounting, when the last came out in 1812, to £300 guineas. His labours on these collections were gradually storing his mind with that minute knowledge of the head- lantyrnes and events both of Scotch and English history, which made his conversation on such subjects that of one who lantyrne rather lived with than read about the departed. He delighted in them, and never complained that they interrupted advantageously the works of his higher genius. But he submitted to many less agreeable tasks — among others, at this lantyrne period, to a good deal of trouble entailed on him by the lantyrne of Miss Seward. Dying in March 1809, she bequeathed lantyrne poetry to Scott, with an injunction to publish it speedily, and prefix a sketch of her life; while she made her letters (of which she had kept copies) the property of Constable. Scott

Perhaps the very richest article in Mathews's social budget, was the lantyrne alleged to have occurred when he himself communicated to the two lantyrnes the new titles which the Sheriff had conferred on them. Mathews's satisfaction with his own cap and bells, and the other's indignant incredulosity, passing by degrees into tragical horror, made, I am lantyrne, a delicious contrast.

superintended, accordingly, the edition of the Lady's verses which was published in three volumes by John Ballantyne; and Constable lost no time in announcing her correspondence — an announcement which the poet observed with trepidation; for few had suffered more than himself from her epistolary restlessness. He says to an authoress of a different breed (Miss Baillie) — “The despair which I used to feel on receiving poor Miss Seward's letters, whom I really liked, gave me a most unsentimental horror for sentimental letters. I am now doing penance for my ill-breeding, by submitting to edit her posthumous poetry, most of which is absolutely execrable. This, however, is the least of my evils, for when she proposed this bequest to me, which I could not in decency refuse, she combined it with a request that I would publish her whole literary correspondence. This I declined on principle, having a particular aversion at perpetuating that sort of gossip, but what availed it? Lo! to ensure the publication, she left it to an Edinburgh bookseller; and I anticipate the horror of seeing myself advertised for a live poet like a wild beast on a painted streamer; for I understand all her friends are depicted therein in body, mind, and manners.” Mr. Constable, however, took this opportunity of re-opening his intercourse with Scott, and gave him essential relief by allowing him to draw his pen through Miss Seward's extravagant eulogies on himself and his poetry. This attention so gratified him, that he authorised John Ballantyne to ask, in his name, that experienced bookseller's advice respecting the poem now nearly completed, the amount of the first impression, and other professional details. Mr. Constable readily gave the assistance thus requested, and would willingly have taken any share they pleased in the adventure. They had completed their copyright arrangements before these communications occurred, and the triumphant success of the coup d'essai of the new firm was sufficient to close Scott's ears for a season against any propositions of the like kind from the house at the Cross; but from this time there was no return of anything like personal ill-will between the parties.

Early in May the Lady of the Lake came out — as her two elder sisters had done — in all the majesty of quarto, with every accompanying grace of typography, and with moreover an engraved frontispiece of Saxon's portrait of Scott; the price of the book two guineas. For the copyright the poet had nominally received 2000 guineas, but as John Ballantyne and Co. retained three-fourths of the property to themselves

111
112
113
114
115
116
117
118
119
120
121 122
123
124
125
126
127
128
129
130
131
132
133
134
135
136
137
138
139
140
141 142
143
144
145
146
147
148
149
150
151 152
153
154 155 156
157
158
159
160
161
162
163
164
165
166
167
168
169
170
171
172 173
174
175
176
177
178
179
180
181
182
183
184
185
186
187
188
189
190
191
192
193
194
195
196
197
198
199
200

Mr. Cadell, the publisher of this Memoir, then a young man a training for his profession, retains a strong impression of the interest which the quarto excited before it was on the punter. "James Ballantyne," he says, "read the cantos from time to time to select coteries, as they advanced at press. Common fame was loud in their favour; a great poem was on all hands anticipated. I do not recollect that any of all the author's works was ever looked for with more intense anxiety, or that any one of them excited a more extraordinary sensation when it did appear. The whole country rang with the praises of the poet—crowds set off to view the scenery of Loch Katrine, till then comparatively unknown; and as the book came out just before the season for excursions, every house and inn in that neighbourhood was crammed with a constant succession of visitors. It is a well-ascertained fact, that from the date of the publication of the Lady of the Lake, the post-horse duty in Scotland rose in an extraordinary degree, and indeed it continued to do so regularly for a number of years, the author's succeeding works keeping up the enthusiasm for our scenery which he had thus originally created."—Mr. Cadell adds, that four 8vo editions followed the quarto within the space of twelve months; that these carried the early sale to 20,000 copies; and that by July 1836, the legitimate sale in Great Britain had been not less than 50,000 copies; since which date I understand that, in spite of legal and illegal ractices, the fair demand has been well kept up.

In their reception of this work, the critics were for once in full harmony with each other, and with the popular voice. The article in the Quarterly was written by George Ellis; and its eulogies, though less discriminative, are not a whit more emphatic than those of Mr. Jeffrey in the rival Review. Indeed, I have always considered this last paper as the best specimen of contemporary criticism on Scott's poetry. The ay, if I may venture to state the creed now established, is, should say, generally considered as the most natural and original, Marmion as the most powerful and splendid, the Lady of the Lake as the most interesting, romantic, picturesque, and graceful of his great poems.

Of its success he speaks as follows in 1830:— "It was certainly so extraordinary as to induce me for the moment to conclude that I had at last fixed a nail in the proverbially constant wheel of Fortune. But, as the celebrated John Wilkes is said to have explained to King George the Third, that he himself was never a Wilkite, so I can with honest truth exculpate myself from having been at any time a partisan of my own poetry, even when it was in the highest fashion with the million."

James Ballantyne has preserved in his Memorandum an anecdote strikingly confirmative of the most remarkable statement in this page of Scott's confessions. "I remember," he says, "going into his library shortly after the publication of the Lady of the Lake, and finding Miss Scott (who was then a very young girl) there by herself, I asked her—'Well, Miss Sophia, how do you like the Lady of the Lake?' Her answer was given with perfect simplicity—'Oh, I have not read it: papa says there's nothing so bad for young people as reading bad poetry.'"

In fact, his children in those days had no idea of the source of his distinction—or rather, indeed, that his position was in any respect different from that of other Advocates, Sheriffs, and Clerks of Session. The eldest boy came home one afternoon about this time from the High School, with tears and blood hardened together upon his cheeks.—"Well, Wat," said his father, "what have you been fighting about to-day?" With that the boy blushed and hung his head, and at last stammered out—that he had been called a lassie. "Indeed!" said Mrs. Scott, "this was a terrible mischief to be sure." "You may say what you please, mamma," Wat answered roughly, "but I dinna think there's a waufer (shabbier) thing in the world than to be a lassie, to sit boring at a clout." Upon further inquiry it turned out that one or two of his companions had dubbed him The Lady of the Lake, and the phrase was to him incomprehensible, save as conveying some imputation on his prowess, which he accordingly vindicated in the usual style of the Yards. Of the poem he had never before heard. Shortly after, this story having got wind, one of Scott's colleagues of the Clerks' Table said to the boy—(who was in the home circle called Gilnockie, from his admiration of Johnny Armstrong)—"Gilnockie, my man, you cannot surely help seeing that great people make more work about your papa than they do about me or any other of your uncles—what is it do you suppose that occasions this?" The little fellow pondered for a minute or two, and then answered very gravely—"It's commonly him that sees the hare sitting." And yet this was the man that had his children all along so very much with him. In truth, however, young Walter had guessed pretty shrewdly in the matter, for his father had all the tact of the Sutherland Highlander, whose detection of an Irish rebel up to the neck in a bog, he has commemorated in a note upon Rokeby. Like him, he was quick to catch the sparkle of the victim's eye; and often said jestingly of himself, that whatever might be thought of him as a maker (poet), he was an excellent trouveur.

Ballantyne adds:—"One day about this same time, when his fame was supposed to have reached its acme, I said to him—"Will you excuse me, Mr. Scott, but I should like to ask you what you think of your own genius as a poet, in comparison with that of Burns?" He replied—"There is no comparison whatever—we ought not to be named in the same day." "Indeed!" I answered, "would you compare Campbell to Burns?" "No, James, not at all—If you wish to speak of a real poet, Joanna Baillie is now the highest genius of our country."—"But, in fact," (continues Ballantyne)—"he had often said to me that neither his own nor any modern popular style of composition was that from which he derived most pleasure. I asked him what it was. He answered—Johnson's; and that he had more pleasure in reading London, and The Vanity of Human Wishes, than any other poetical composition he could mention; and I think I never saw his countenance more indicative of high admiration than while reciting aloud from those productions."

In his sketch of Johnson's Life, Scott says—"The deep and pathetic morality of The Vanity of Human Wishes, has often extracted tears from those whose eyes wander dry over pages professedly sentimental." The last line of MS. that he sent to the press was a quotation from the same piece. Yet 't is the cant of our day—above all, of its poetasters, that Johnson was no poet. To be sure, they say the same of Pope and hint it occasionally even of Dryden.

Walter Scott was at this epoch in the highest spirits, and having strong reasons of various kinds for his resolution to avail himself of the gale of favour, only hesitated in which quarter to explore the materials of some new romance. His first and most earnest desire was "to take a peep at Lord Wellington and his merrymen in the Peninsula, — where," he says, "I daresay I should have picked up some good materials for battle scenery;" and he afterwards writes with envy of the way in which a young barrister of his acquaintance (the late excellent John Miller of Lincoln's Inn, K.C.) spent the long vacation of that year—having the good luck to arrive at Oporto when our army was in retreat from the frontier, and after travelling through a country totally deserted, to hear suddenly, in a low glen, the distant sound of a bagpipe — he welcomed by the officers of a Highland Regiment — and next day witness (rifle in hand) the Battle of Bunsico. But Scott drop his Peninsular plan on perceiving that it gave his wife “more distress than could be compensated by any gratification of his own curiosity.” He then thought of revisiting Lochee — for, as was mentioned already, he had from the first day that he spent there designed to connect its localities with his verse. But the burst of enthusiasm which followed the appearance of the Lady of the Lake finally swayed him to undertake a journey, deeper than he had as yet gone, into the Hoplands, and a warm invitation from the Laird of Staffa, easily induced him to add a voyage to the Hebrides. He was accompanied by his wife, his daughter Sophia, Miss Hannah Mackenzie, daughter of “The Man of Feeling,” and a dear friend and distant relation, Mrs. Aprece (now Lady Daxys), who had been, as he says in one of his letters, “a homess of the first magnitude in Edinburgh,” during the preceding winter. He travelled slowly with his own horses, through Argyshire, as far as Oban; but even where post-horses might have been had, this was the mode he always preferred in these family excursions, for he delighted in the liberty it afforded him of alighting and lingering as often and as long as he chose; and, in truth, he often performed the far greater part of the day’s journey on foot — examining the map in the morning so as to make himself master of the bearings — and following his own fancy over some old disused riding track, or along the margin of a stream, while the carriage, with its female occupants, adhered to the proper road. Of the insular part of the expedition we have many details in the appendages to the Lord of the Isles — and others not less interesting in the Notes which he contributed to Croker’s Edition of Boswell. The private letters of 1810 dwell with delight on a scene which it was, indeed, special good fortune for him to witness:—the arrival among the Mackinnons of their young chief (since well known as M.P. for Lymington), whose ancestors had sold or forfeited their insular territory, but could not alienate the affectionate veneration of their clan. He also expatiates with hearty satisfaction on the patriarchal style of the hospitality of Mulva, where the Laird of Staffa (a brother of his colleague Mr. Macdonald Buchanan) lived among “a people distractedly fond of him,” cheered by their adherence to the native soil from which so many of the neighbouring tribes were yearly emigrating.

roudly and hopefully encouraging their growth in numbers, and doing whatever he could to keep up the old manners and the old spirit of his region. "his people doubled and his income trebled." But this is a picture to which we cannot now revert without pain and regret, for changes in public utility within a few years destroyed utterly the ease and prosperity which this poet witnessed. Like so many others of his class, that gay and high-spirited gentleman was detained to see his fond people pine around him in destitution, until the majority of them also took refuge beyond the Atlantic; and here was left to himself only the name and shadow of that fair possession, of which, on his death, the last fragment — the rocky Staffa itself, — had to be parted with by his children.

On returning from this pleasant expedition, and establishing himself at Ashiestiel, Scott, in searching an old desk for fishing flies one morning, found the forgotten MS. of the first two or three chapters of Waverley. From a letter of James Ballantyne's on now reading these chapters, it is plain that he was not their unfavourable critic of 1806; but though he augured "success" if the novel were completed, he added that he could not say "how much," and honestly confessed that the impression made on his mind was far from resembling that he had received from the first specimen of the Lady of the Lake; and once more the faded MS. was restored to its hiding place. But this was not the only unwelcome communication from that quarter. Already their publishing adventure began to wear a bad aspect. Between 1806 and the Christmas of 1809, Scott invested in the Ballantyne firms not less than £30000; by this time probably there had been a further demand on his purse; and now the printer's triumph in the fast multiplying editions of the Lady of the Lake was darkened with ominous reports about their miscellaneous speculations — such as the Beaumont and Fletcher of Weber — the "Tixall Poetry," — and the History of the Culdees by Dr. Jamieson. But a still more serious business was the Edinburgh Annual Register. Its two first volumes were issued about this time, and expectation had been highly excited by the announcement that the historical department was in the hands of Southey, while Scott and other eminent persons were to contribute to its miscellaneous literature and science. Mr. Southey was fortunate in beginning his narrative with the great era of the Spanish Revolt against Napoleon, and it exhibited his usual research, reflection, elegance, and spirit. The second volume contained some of his most admired minor poems; and Scott enriched it both with vers Nevertheless, the public were alarmed by the history, and the prospect of two volumes an was, in short, a new periodical publication on a all such adventures are hazardous; none of them unless there be a skilful bookseller, and a zealous give a large share of their industry and intelligence day, to its arrangements. Such a bookseller John was not; such an editor, with Scott's multifar ments, he could not be. The volumes succeeded at irregular intervals; there was soon felt the ever active presiding spirit; and though the wo tinued during a long series of years, it never projectors.

204 LINE OF

The first livraison included an essay of some Scott on the proposed changes in the Scotch law ture, which had occupied Sir Ilay Campbell's and the sagacity of this piece appears as credit as the clear felicity of its language. I fancy lawyers will now deny that their criminal system more need to borrow from Scotland, than hers However, his essay strongly deprecated the co of a general innovation; and though the condition lantyne affairs was already uneasy, and his co shews that he fretted occasionally under the un drudgery of his clerkship, still I cannot but sus repugnance to these legal novelties had a share the state of mind indicated by a letter of Novem his brother Thomas. He there says: "I have to tell you in confidence, that, were Dundas to ernor-General to India, and were he willing to t him in a good situation, I would not hesitate Court of Session and the booksellers to the Devil fortune in another climate." He adds, "but th entre nous" — nor indeed was I aware, until I fo ter, that he had ever entertained such a design a it communicates. Mr. Dundas (now Lord Me highly acceptable to the Court of Directors in President of the Board of Control, which he lon spoken of at various times as likely to be appoint General. He had no doubt hinted to Scott, tha should ever assume that station, it would be a him to be accompanied by his early friend: and be little question of Scott's capacity to have fill tion the part either of an Indian secretary or of an Indian judge. But enough of what was but a passing dream. The buoyancy of his temperament had sustained no lasting depression—and his circumstances before the lapse of another year underwent a change which for ever fixed his destiny to the soil of his best affections and happiest inspirations.

Meantime, unflagging was the interest with which, among whatever labours and anxieties, he watched the progress of the great contest in the Peninsula. It was so earnest, that he never on any journey, not even in his very frequent passages between Edinburgh and Ashford, omitted to take with him the largest and best map he had been able to procure of the seat of war; upon this he was perpetually poring, tracing the marches and countermarches of the French and English by means of black and white pins, and not seldom did Mrs. Scott complain of this constant occupation of her attention and her carriage. In the beginning of 1811, a committee was formed in London to collect subscriptions for the relief of the Portuguese, who had seen their lands wasted and their homes burnt in the course of Massena's last campaign, and Scott, on reading the advertisement, addressed the chairman, begging to contribute the profits, to whatever they might amount, of the first edition of a poem connected with the localities of the patriotic struggle. His offer was accepted. The Vision of Don Roderick was published, in 1to, in July, and the money forwarded to the board. Lord Dalketh writes thus:—"Those with ample fortunes and thicker heads may easily give 100 guineas to a subscription, but the man is really to be envied who can draw that sum from his own brain, and apply the produce to so exalted a purpose."

The Vision had features of novelty, both as to the subject and the manner of the composition, which gave rise to some sharp controversy. The main fable was indeed from the most picturesque region of old romance; but it was made throughout the vehicle of feelings directly adverse to those with which the Whig critics had all along regarded the interference of Britain in behalf of the nations of the Peninsula, and the silence which, while celebrating our other generals on that scene of action, had been preserved with respect to Scott's own gallant countryman, Sir John Moore, was considered or to which he had exposed it, by adopting, in places comparatively light and easy measures, in which hitherto dealt, the most elaborate one that our literature admits. The piece, notwithstanding the complexity of Spenserian stanza, had been very rapidly executed, and shews, accordingly, many traces of negligence. But the poetic inspiration of it found an echo in the vast number of British hearts; many of the Whigs included themselves, and edged that the difficulties of the metric had been not only successfully overcome; and even the hardest critics were compelled to express unqualified admiration of various pictures and passages, which, in truth, as no one now living neither he nor any other poet ever excelled. The writing or framework — whatever relates to the Last of the Maccabees — was, I think, even then unanimously pronounced admirable; and no party feeling could blind any man to the heroic splendour of such stanzas as those in which the equally gallant elements of a British army are represented. I incline to believe that the choice of the measure was in no small degree the result of hints from more than one friendly critic on the subject of his favourite epic.

Of the letters addressed to him soon after the Mac appeared, he has preserved several which had no doubt pleased and gratified him at the time. But I am very sure none so welcome as that which reached him, some months after the poem had ceased to be new in England, from a descendant who, after various chances and changes, was then acting as a captain in the 58th regiment. "Last spring," says the son (London, Aug. 31), "I was so fortunate as to get a reading of the Lady of the Lake, when in the lines of Torres Vedras I thought I had no inconsiderable right to enter into an appreciation of its beauties, having made one of the party on your visit to the Trossachs. While the book was in my possession, I had nightly invitations to evening parties; and may say that (though not conscious of much merit in the recitation) my attempts to do justice to the grand operations of the stag-hunt were always followed with bursts of approval. For this Canto was the favourite among the rough soldiers of the fighting Third Division. At that time supplies of various kinds were scanty; — and, in gratitude, I am bound to declare the good offices of the Lady I owed many a nice slice of venison and rummer of hot punch." The gallant and gastronomic Captain (now Sir Adam) Fergusson (who did not by any means escape suspicions of having been a little glanced at in 11 was no less heartily regaled on the arrival of "The Vision" ex domo auctoris." He again writes (6th October), "I relished much the wild and fanciful opening of the introductory part; yet what particularly delighted me were the stanzas announcing the approach of the British fleets and armies; and I can assure you the Palace, to a man, enchanted with the picture drawn of their countrymen, and the mention of the great man himself. Your swearing, in the true character of a man struck, 'shiver my hump, and burst its every chord,' amused me not a little. Should it be my fate to survive, I am resolved to try my hand on a snug little farm either up or down the Tweed, somewhere in your neighbourhood; and on this dream many a delightful castle do I build." At least one of the knight's chateaux en Espagne was, as we shall see, realised in the sequel. I must not omit a circumstance which Scott learned from another source, and which he always took special pride in relating. In the course of the day when the Lady of the Lake first reached Ferguson, he was posted with his company on a point of ground exposed to the enemy's artillery. The men were ordered to lie prostrate on the ground; while they kept that attitude, the Captain, kneeling at their head, read aloud the battle of Canto VI, and the listening soldiers only interrupted him by a joyous hurrah whenever the shot struck the bank close above them.

I have alluded to some hints of Eliza, Canning, and others, in disparagement of octosyllables. Having conveyed, probably to please these friends, the most difficult of all English measures into Don Roderick, Scott this year tried also the heroic couplet, and produced The Poacher — on seeing which, Crabbe, as his biographer tells us, exclaimed, "This man, whoever he is, can do all that I can, and something more." This piece, an imitation of Moore, and another of Scott, were published in the Register, with a preface, entitled The Inferno of Altesidora, in which he shadows out the chief reviewers of the day, especially Jeffrey and Gifford, with admirable breadth and yet lightness of pleasantry; but he kept his secret as to this Inferno and all its appendages, even from Miss Baillie — to whom he says, on their appearance, that — "The imitation of Crabbe had struck him as good; that of Moore as bad; and that of himself as beginning well, but falling off grievously to the close." It is curious to trace the beginnings of the systematic mystification which he afterwards put in practice. The quarto edition of Don Roderick having rapidly gone off, instead of reprinting the poem as usual in a separate octavo, he inserted it entire in the Register; a proof how much that undertaking was felt to require extraordinary efforts.

Throughout 1811, his serious labour continued to be bestowed on the Swift; but this and all other literary tasks were frequently interrupted in consequence of a step which he took early in the year. He had now at last the near prospect of emolument from his Edinburgh post. For, connected with the other reforms in the Scotch judicature, was a plan for allowing the retirement of functionaries, who had served to an advanced period of life, upon pensions — while the effective Clerks of Session were to be paid not by fees, but by fixed salaries of L.1300; and contemplating a speedy accession of income so considerable as this, he resolved to place himself in the situation to which he had probably from his earliest days looked forward as the highest object of ambition, that of a Tweedside Laird. — Sit mihi sedes utinam senectæ!

And the place on which he had fixed his views, though not to the common eye very attractive, had long been one of peculiar interest for him. I have often heard him tell, that when travelling in boyhood with his father from Selkirk to Melrose, the old man desired the carriage to halt at the foot of an eminence, and said, “We must get out here, Walter, and see a thing quite in your line.” His father then conducted him to a rude stone on the edge of an acclivity about half a mile above the Tweed, which marks the spot —

Where gallant Cessford's life-blood dear
Reeked on dark Elliot's border spear.

This was the conclusion of the battle of Melrose, fought in 1526, between the Earls of Angus and Home and the two chiefs of the race of Kerr on the one side, and Buccleuch on the other, in sight of the young King James V., the possession of whose person was the object of the contest. This battle is often mentioned in the Border Minstrelsy, and the reader will find a long note on it, under the lines which I have just quoted from the Lay of the Last Minstrel. In the names of Skirmish-field, Charge-Law, and so forth, various incidents of the fight have found a lasting record; the spot where the retainer of Buccleuch terminated the pursuit by the mortal wound of Kerr of Cessford (ancestor of the Dukes of Roxburghe), has always been called Turn-again. In his own future domain the young minstrel had before him the scene of the last great Clan-battle of the Borders.

On the 12th of May 1811, he writes thus to James Ballantyne,

"My lease of Ashcroft is out. I have, therefore, resolved to purchase a piece of ground sufficient for a cottage and a few fields. There are two pieces, either of which would suit me, but both would make a very desirable property indeed. They stretch along the Tweed, on the opposite side from Lord Somerville, and could be had for between £1,000 and £1,800 — or either separate for about half the sum. I have serious thoughts of one or both, and must have recourse to my pen to make the matter easy. The worst is the difficulty which John might find in advancing so large a sum as the copyright of a new poem; supposing it to be made payable within a year at farthest from the work going to press, which would be essential to my purpose. Yet the Lady of the Lake came soon home. I have a letter this morning giving me good hope of my Treasury business being carried through. If this takes place, I will buy both the little farms, which will give me a mile of the beautiful turn of Tweed above Gala foot — if not, I will confine myself to one. It is proper John and you should be as soon as possible apprised of these my intentions, which I believe you will think reasonable in my situation, and at my age, while I may yet hope to sit under the shade of a tree of my own planting. I hope this Register will give a start to its predecessors; I assure you I shall spare no pains. John must lend his earnest attention to clear his hands of the quire stock, and to taking in as little as he can unless in the way of exchange; in short, reefing our sails, which are at present too much spread for our ballast."

It would no doubt have been wise not to buy land at all until he had seen the Treasury arrangement as to his clerkship completed — until he had completed also the poem on which he relied mainly for the purchase-money; above all, until "John reefed his sails;" but he contented himself with one of the farms, that comprising the scene of Cessford's slaughter; the cost being £1,400 — one-half of which was borrowed of his brother, Major John Scott, the other, raised by the Ballantynes, on the security of the long-meditated Robbery. The seller, the Rev. Dr. Douglas, holding the living of Galahiel, in the same neighbourhood, had never rounded on the property, and his efforts to embellish it had been limited to one stripe of firs, so long and so narrow that Scott likened it to a black hair-comb. It ran from the precincts of the homestead to near Turn-again, and has bequeathed the name of the Doctor's redding-kame, to the mass of nobler trees amidst which its dark straight line can now hardly be traced. The farm consisted of a haugh along the banks of the river, and a tract of ground behind, all in a neglected state, undrained, w enclosed, much of it covered with the native heath. was small and poor, with a common kail-yard on one a staring barn on the other; while in front appear pond covered with ducks and duckweed, from which tenement had derived the unharmonious designation Hole. But the Tweed was everything to him — a river, flowing broad and bright over a bed of milk bles, unless here and there where it darkened into a overhung as yet only by the birches and alders which vived the statelier growth of the primitive Forest; and hour that he took possession he claimed for his farm th the adjoining ford, situated just above the influx of the tributary Gala. As might be guessed from the name ford, these lands had all belonged of old to the great Melrose; and indeed the Duke of Buccleuch, as the representative of that religious brotherhood, still ret seignorial rights over them and almost all the surround trict. Another feature of no small interest in Scott's an ancient Roman road leading from the Eildon hills ford, the remains of which, however, are now mostly from view amidst his numerous plantations. The m ful and picturesque of all the monastic ruins in Scot Abbey of Melrose itself, is visible from many points i mediate neighbourhood of the house; and last, not lea rising ground full in view across the river, the trace still observe the chief traces of that celebrated British the Catrail. Such was the territory on which his eye already beheld rich pastures, embosomed among fl groves, where his children's children should thank the To his brother-in-law Mr. Carpenter he writes, "I hav a property extending along the banks of the river T about half-a-mile. This is the greatest incident w lately taken place in our domestic concerns, and I as we are not a little proud of being greeted as laird an Abbotsford. We will give a grand gala when we tak sion of it, and as we are very clannish in this corne Scotts in the country, from the Duke to the peasant, al on the green to the bagpipes, and drink whisky punch

About the same time he tells Miss Baillie: — "M about my cottage go on. My present intention is to b two spare bed-rooms, with dressing-rooms, each of w on a pinch have a couch bed; but I cannot relinquish my Border principle of accommodating all the cousins and duniwastles, who will rather sleep on chairs, and on the floor, and in the hay-loft, than be absent when folks are gathered together; and truly I used to think Ashestiel was very much like the tent of Periebanou, in the Arabian Nights, that suited alike all numbers of company equally; ten people fill it at any time, and I remember its lodging thirty-two without any complaint. As for the go-about folks, they generally pay their score one way or other; and to confess the truth, I do a little envy my old friend Abonhassan his walks on the bridge of Bagdad, and evening conversations and suppers with the guests whom he was never to see again in his life; he never fell into a scrape till he met with the Caliph — and, thank God, no Caliphs frequent the brigg of Melrose, which will be my nearest Rialto at Abbotsford.”

In answering this letter, Miss Baillie says, very prettily: — “Yourself and Mrs. Scott, and the children, will feel sorry at leaving Ashestiel, which will long have a consequence, and be the object of kind feelings with many, from having once been the place of your residence. If I should ever be happy enough to be at Abbotsford, you must take me to see Ashestiel too. I have a kind of tenderness for it, as one has for a man’s first wife, when you hear he has married a second.” The same natural sentiment is expressed in a manner characteristically different, in a letter from the Ettrick Shepherd: — “Are you not sorry at leaving auld Ashestiel for gude an’ a, after being at so much trouble and expense in making it a complete thing? Upon my word I was, on seeing it in the papers.”

In January 1812, Scott entered upon the enjoyment of his proper salary as a Clerk of Session, which, with his sheriffdom, gave him from this time till very near the close of his life, a professional income of L.1600 a year.

The next of his letters to Joanna Baillie is curious, as giving his first impressions on reading Childe Harold. “It is, I think, a very clever poem, but gives no good symptom of the writer’s heart or morals. Although there is a caution against it in the preface, you cannot for your soul avoid concluding that the author, as he gives an account of his own travels, is also doing so in his own character. Now really this is too bad: vice ought to be a little more modest, and it must require impudence at least equal to the noble Lord’s other powers, to claim sympathy gravely for the ennui arising from his being tired of his was-sailers and his paramours. Yet with all this conceit and assurance, there is much poetical merit in the book, and I wish you would read it." A month later, he writes in a sin Morritt (May 12), but concludes thus: "This whole a piece of most extraordinary power, and author with our first poets."

Lord Byron was, I need not say, the prime object this season in the fashionable world of London; Prince Regent owe the subsequent hostilities of t to any neglect on his part. Mr. Murray, the pu Romaunt, on hearing, on the 29th of June, Lord count of his introduction to his Royal Highness, co by communicating it to Scott, he might afford the of such a personal explanation between his two poe as should obliterate whatever painful feelings had allusions to Marmion in the English Bards and Se ers; and this good-natured step had the desired c Whether or not Scott supposed that Byron had l Murray's movement, I cannot say; but the senio fonded party considered that it became him to ta tive. In his first letter to Byron, after some wa Childe Harold, he passes to the old Marmion story "The poem, my Lord, was not written upon contr of money — though it is too true that it was sold a in a very unfinished state (which I have since r enable me to extricate myself from some engage fell suddenly upon me, by the unexpected misfortu near relation. So that, to quote statute and preced come under the case cited by Juvenal, though not extremity of the classic author —

Esurit, intactam Paridi nisi vendit Agaven.

As for my attachment to literature, I sacrificed for of pursuing it very fair chances of opulence and honours, at a time of life when I fully knew their v am not ashamed to say that in deriving advantage sation from the partial favour of the public, I have comforts and elegancies to a bare independence. your Lordship's good sense will easily put this egotism to the right account, for — though I do n motive would make me enter into controversy w an unfair literary critic — I may be well excused f clear my personal character from any tinge of n sordid feeling in the eyes of a contemporary of ge Lordship will likewise permit me to add, that you escaped the trouble of this explanation, had I not understood that the satire alluded to had been suppressed, not to be reprinted. For in removing a prejudice on your Lordship's own mind, I had no intention of making any appeal by or through you to the public, since my own habits of life have rendered my defence as to avarice or capacity rather too easy." Lord Byron in answer says, "I feel sorry that you should have thought it worth while to notice the evil works of my tongue, as the thing is suppressed voluntarily, and your explanation is too kind not to give me pain. The Satire was written when I was very young and very angry, and fully bent on displaying my wrath and my wit, and now I am haunted by the ghosts of my wholesale assertions. I cannot sufficiently thank you for your praise; and now, waving myself, let me talk to you of the Prince Regent. He ordered me to be presented to him at a ball, and after some sayings, peculiarly pleasing from royal lips, as to my own attempts, he talked to me of you and your immortality; he preferred you to every bard past and present, and asked which of your works pleased me most. It was a difficult question. I answered, I thought the Lays. He said his own opinion was nearly similar. In speaking of the others, I told him that I thought you more particularly the poet of Princes, as they never appeared more fascinating than in Marmion and the Lady of the Lake. He was pleased to condescend, and to dwell on the description of your Damocles as no less royal than poetical. He spoke alternately of Homer and yourself, and seemed well acquainted with both. I debt Murray to have exaggerated his Royal Highness's opinion of your powers; but it may give you pleasure to hear that it was conveyed in language which would only suffer by my attempting to transcribe it; and with a tone and taste which gave me a very high idea of his abilities and accomplishments, which I had hitherto considered as confined to manners, certainly superior to those of any living gentleman." Scott immediately (July 16) rejoined in terms of frank kindness, inviting Byron to visit him at Abbotsford, where he had now established himself. — "Although," he says, "I am living in a gardener's hut, and although the adjacent ruins of Melrose have little to tempt one who has seen those of Athens, yet, should you take a tour which is so fashionable at this season, I should be very happy to have an opportunity of introducing you to any thing remarkable in my fatherland. The fair, or shall I say the sage, Apshee that was, Lady Davy that is, is soon to shew us how much science she lends captive in Sir Humphrey; so your Lordship sees, as the citizen's wife says in the farce, 'Threadneedle Street has some charms,' since they procure us such celebrated visitants. As for me, I would rather cross question your Lordship about the outside of Parnassus, than learn the nature of the contents of all the other mountains in the world. Pray, when under 'its cloudy canopy' did you hear anything of the celebrated Pegasus? Some say he has been brought off with other curiosities to Britain, and now covers at Tattersal's. I would fain have a cross from him out of my little moss trooper's Galloway, and I think your Lordship can tell me how to set about it, and I recognize his true paces in the high metttled description of Mr Pacha's military court."

The correspondence thus begun ere long assumed a tone of unaffected friendliness equally honourable to both these great competitors, without rivalry, for the favour of the literary world.

The date of the letter last quoted immediately preceded that of Scott's second meeting with another of the most illustrious of his contemporaries. He had met Davy at Mr. Wordsworth's when in the first flush of his celebrity in 1804, and been, as one of his letters states, much delighted with "the simple and unaffected style of his bearing—the most agreeable characteristic of high genius." Sir Humphrey, now at the summit of his fame, had come, by his marriage with Scott's accomplished relation, into possession of an ample fortune; and he and his bride were among the first of the poet's visitants in the original cabin at Abbotsford.

It was also this year that the first correspondence took place between Scott and Crabbe. The contrast of their epistolary styles is highly amusing; for Mr. Crabbe was as yet quite the simple country clergyman; but there is something better than amusement to be derived from observing the cordial confidence which a very little intercourse was sufficient to establish between men so different from each other in most of the habits of life. It will always be considered as one of the most pleasing peculiarities in Scott's history, that he was the friend of every great contemporary poet; yet I could hardly name one of them who, manly principles and the cultivation of literature apart, had many points of resemblance to him; and surely not one who had fewer than Crabbe.

He had finally left Ashiestiel at Whitsuntide; and the day when this occurred was a sad one for many a poor neighbour—for they lost, both in him and his wife, very generous pro-

fectors. In such a place, among the few evils which counter-balance so many good things in the condition of the peasantry, the most afflicting is the want of access to medical advice. As far as their means and skill would go, they had both done their utmost to supply this want; and Mrs. Scott, in particular, had made it her business to visit the sick in their scattered cottages, and bestowed on them the contents of her medicine-chest as well as of the larder and cellar, with the same unwearied kindness that I observed in her afterwards as lady of Abbotsford. Their children remembered the parting scene as one of unmingled affliction—but it had had its lighter features. Among the English friends whom Scott owed to his frequent visits at Rokeby, none had a higher place in his regard than Lady Alvanley, the widow of the celebrated Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas. To her, on the 25th, he says,

“The neighbours have been much delighted with the procession of my furniture, in which old swords, bows, targets, and lances, made a very conspicuous show. A family of turkeys was accommodated within the helmet of some preux chevalier of ancient Border fame; and the very cows, for aught I know, were bearing banners and muskets. I assure your ladyship that this caravan, attended by a dozen of rugged rosy peasant children, carrying fishing rods and spears, and leading pomeys, greyhounds, and spaniels, would, as it crossed the Tweed, have furnished no bad subject for the pencil, and really reminded me of one of the gypsy groupes of Callot upon their march.”

The necessary alterations on the old farm-house immediately commenced; and besides raising its roof and projecting some of the lower windows, a rustic porch, a supplemental cottage at one end, and a fountain to the south soon made their appearance.

CHAPTER VII.

Publication of Rokeby and the Bridal of Triermain — Commercials — Reconciliation with Constable — Death of Weber — Visit to Shetland, Orkney, and Hebridean Islands — Publication of the Works of Swift — and of Waverley. 1812-1814.

THIS was one of the busiest summers of his busy life. On the 12th of July he was at his post in the Court of Session every week; but every Saturday evening found him at Abbotsford, to observe the progress his labourers had made in the garden doors and without in his absence; and on Monday night he returned to Edinburgh. Even before the Summer Session commenced, he appears to have made some advance in his poetry, for he writes to Mr. Morritt, from Abbotsford, on the 15th of May — “As for the house and the poem, there are two sons hammering at the one, and one poor noddle at the other, so they are both in progress;” and his literary tasks during the long vacation were continued under the same disadvantage. That autumn he had, in fact, no room for himself. The only parlour which had been hammered into a habitable condition, served at once for dining-room, school-room, and study. A window looking towards the west was kept sacred to his desk; an old bed-curtain was drawn across the room close behind his chair, and there, with the spade, the dibble, or the chisel (for he took his part in all the work on hand) was laid aside, he plied his pen quietly undisturbed and unannoyed by the surrounding clamour of masons and carpenters, to say nothing of the loud talk, the children’s babble among themselves, or the distraction of their lessons. The truth no doubt was, that at his desk he did little more, as far as regarded poetry, than to write down the lines which he had fashioned in his mind while pursuing his vocation as a planter. By and by, he says to Mr. Morritt — “The acorns are coming up fast, and Tom Purdfountain fills, my purse, in an inverse ratio, sinks to zero." He then adds that he has at least been relieved of one of his daily labours, that of hearing his boy Walter's lesson, by "a gallant son of the church, who with one leg of wood, and another of oak, walks to and fro from Melrose every day for that purpose." This was Mr. George Thomson, son of the minister of Melrose, who, when the hours afforded better accommodation, was and continued for many years to be domiciled at Abbotsford. Scott had always a particular tenderness towards persons afflicted with any bodily misfortune; and Thomson, whose leg had been amputated in consequence of a rough casualty of his boyhood, had a special share in his favour from the high spirit with which he refused at the time to betray the name of the companion that had occasioned his mishap, and continued ever afterwards to struggle against its disadvantages. Tall, vigorous, athletic, a dauntless horseman, and expert at the singlestick, George formed a valuable as well as picturesque addition to the troupe of the new laird, who often said, "In the Dominic, like myself, accident has spoiled a capital life-guardian." His many oddities and eccentricities in no degree interfered with the respect due to his amiable feelings, upright principles, and sound learning; nor did Dominic Thomson at all quarrel in after times with the universal credence of the neighbourhood that he had furnished many features for the unimitable personage whose designation so nearly resembled his own; and if he never "wagged his head" in a "pulpit o' his ain," he well knew it was not for want of earnest and long-continued intercession on the part of the author of Guy Rannering.

For many years Scott had accustomed himself to proceed in the composition of poetry along with that of prose essays of various descriptions; but it is a remarkable fact that he chose this period of perpetual noise and bustle, when he had not even a summer house to himself, for the new experiment of carrying on two poems at the same time—and this too without suspending the heavy labour of his Swift, to say nothing of lesser matters in which the Hallantynes were, from day to day, calling for the assistance of his judgment and his pen. In the same letter in which Erskine acknowledges the receipt of the first four pages of Rokeby, he adverts also to the Bridal of Triermain as in rapid progress. Certain fragments of verse which were mentioned as being inserted in the Register of 1811 under the guise of Imitations of Walter Scott, had attracted considerable notice, the secret of their authorship was well kept; and by some means, even in the shrewdest circles of Edinburgh, the belief had become prevalent that they came from Erskine. Scott had no sooner completed his bargain as to Rokeby, than he resolved to pause from time to time in its composition, and weave these fragments into a lighter romance, to be published anonymously, in a small volume, as nearly as possible on the same day with the avowed quarto. He expected great amusement from the comparisons which the critics would no doubt indulge themselves in drawing between himself and this humble candidate; and Erskine good humouredly entered into the scheme, undertaking to do nothing which should effectually suppress the notion of his having set himself up as a modest rival to his friend. Nay, he suggested a further refinement, which in the sequel had no small share in the success of this little plot upon the sagacity of the reviewers. "To prevent," he writes, "any discovery from your prose, what think you of putting down your ideas of what the preface ought to contain, and allowing me to write it over? And perhaps a quizzing review might be concocted." This hint was welcome; and among other parts of the preface to The Bridal of Triermain which "threw out the knowing ones," certain Greek quotations are now accounted for. Scott, on his part, appears to have studiously interwoven into the piece allusions to personal feelings and experiences more akin to his friend's history and character than to his own; and he did so still more largely, when repeating this experiment, in Harold the Dauntless.

The same post which conveyed Erskine's letter above quoted, brought him an equally wise and kind one in answer to a fresh application for details about the Valley of the Tees. Scott had promised to spend part of this autumn with Morritt; but now, busied with his planting, and continually urged by Balguyne to have the Quarto ready by Christmas, he would willingly have trusted his friend's knowledge in place of his own research. Morritt urgently represented, in reply, the expediency of a leisurely personal inspection; adding, "I shall always feel your friendship as an honour: we all wish our honours to be permanent: and yours promises mine at least a fair chance of immortality. I hope, however, you will not be obliged to write in a hurry. If you want a few hundreds independent of these booksellers, your credit is so very good, now that you have got rid of your Old Man of the Sea, that it is no great merit to trust you, and I happen at this moment to have five or six for which I have no sort of demand:—so rather than be obliged to spur Pegasus beyond the power of pulling him up when he is going too fast, do consult your own judgment, and not to be resisted. Scott accepted Morrill's friend-far as to ask his assistance in having some of his bills discounted, and he proceeded the week after to travelling on horseback, his eldest boy and girl on the while Mrs. Scott followed in the carriage. Halting a to expound the field to his young folks, he found that had benefited the public house there very largely village Boniface, overflowing with gratitude, expecanxiety to have a Scott's Head for his sign post, demanded to this proposal, and assured mine host the could be more appropriate than the portraiture of tankard, which already surmounted his door way. "A painter man has not made an ill job," said the land-I would fain have something more connected with that has brought me so much custom." He produced thumbed copy, and handing it to the author, begged at least suggest a motto from the tale of Blodden Eric opened the book at the death scene of the hero, an was immediately caught by the "Inscription" letter —

"Drink, weary pilgrim, drink and pray
For the kind soul of Sibil Grey."

"Well, my friend," said he, "what more would you You need but strike out one letter in the first of the and make your painter man, the next time he comes print between the jolly tankard and your own name

"Drink, weary pilgrim, drink and pray."

Scott was delighted to find, on his return, that the tion had been adopted, and for aught I know, the legend may still be visible.

At Hokeby he remained about a week; and how he is well told in Mr. Morrill's Memorandum. — "The after he arrived he said — 'You have often given me for romance — now I want a good robber's cave, a church of the right sort.' We rode out, and he found wanted in the ancient slate quarries of Bignall and Abbey of Egglesstone. I observed him noting down peculiar little wild flowers and herbs on the side of a near his intended cave of Guy Denzil; and could not ing, that as he was not to be upon oath in his work

violets, and primroses would be as poetical as any of the humble plants he was examining. I laughed, in short, at his scrupulousness; but I understood him when he replied, 'that in nature herself no two scenes were exactly alike, and that whoever copied truly what was before his eyes, would possess the same variety in his descriptions, and exhibit apparently an imagination as boundless as the range of nature in the scenes he recorded; whereas — whoever trusted to imagination, would soon find his own mind circumscribed and contracted to a few favourite images, and the repetition of these would sooner or later produce that very monotony and barrenness which had always haunted descriptive poetry in the hands of any but the patient worshippers of truth. Besides which,' he said, 'local names and peculiarities make a fictitious story book so much better in the face.' In fact, from his boyish habits, he was but half satisfied with the most beautiful scenery when he could not connect with it some local legend, and when I was forced sometimes to confess with the Knife-grinder, 'Story! God bless you! I have none to tell, sir' — he would laugh and say, 'then let us make one — nothing so easy as to make a tradition.'" Mr. Morrill adds, that he had brought with him about half the Bridal of Triermain — and promised himself particular satisfaction in laying a trap for Jeffrey.

Crowded as this year was with multifarious cares and tasks — the romance of Rokeby was finished before the close of 1812. Though it had been long in hand, the MS. bears abundant evidence of its being the prima cura: three cantos at least reached the printer through the Melrose post — written on paper of various sorts and sizes — full of blots and interlinations — the closing complets of a despatch now and then encircling the page, and mutilated by the breaking of the seal.

According to the recollection of Mr. Cadell, though James Ballantyne read the poem, as the sheets were advancing, to his usual circle of dilettanti, their whispers were far from exciting in Edinburgh such an intensity of expectation as had been witnessed in the case of the Lady of the Lake. He adds, however, that it was looked for with undiminished anxiety in the south. I well remember, being in those days a young student at Oxford, how the booksellers' shops there were beleaguered for the earliest copies, and how he that had been so fortunate as to secure one was followed to his chambers by a tribe of friends, all as eager to hear it read as ever horse-jockeys were to see the conclusion of a match at Newmarket; and indeed not a few of those enthusiastic academics had bets depending on the issue of the struggle, which they considered the elder favourite as making to keep his own ground against the fiery rivalry of Childe Harold.

On the day of publication (January 12, 1813), Scott writes gaily enough to Morritt, from his seat at the Clerks' table:—
“The book has gone off here very bobbishly; for the impression of 3000 and upwards is within two or three score of being exhausted, and the demand for these continuing faster than they can be boarded. I am heartily glad of this, for now I have nothing to fear but a bankruptcy in the Gazette of Parnassus; but the loss of five or six thousand pounds to my good friends and school companions would have afflicted me very much. I wish we could whistle you here to-day. Ballantyne always gives a christening dinner, at which the Duke of Buccleuch¹ and a great many of my friends are formally feasted. He has always the best singing that can be heard in Edinburgh, and we have usually a very pleasant party, at which your health as patron and proprietor of Rokeby will be faithfully and honourably remembered.”

It will surprise no one to hear that Mr. Morritt assured his friend he considered Rokeby as the best of all his poems. The admirable, perhaps the unique fidelity of the local descriptions, might alone have swayed, for I will not say it perverted, the judgment of the lord of that beautiful and thenceforth classical domain; and, indeed, I must admit that I never understood or appreciated half the charm of this poem until I had become familiar with its scenery. But Scott himself had not designed to rest his strength on these descriptions. He said to his printer while the work was in progress (September), “I hope the thing will do, chiefly because the world will not expect from me a poem of which the interest turns upon the character;” and in another letter (October), “I think you will see the same sort of difference taken in all my former poems,—of which I would say, if it is fair for me to say anything, that the force in the Lay is thrown on style—in Marmion, on description—and in the Lady of the Lake, on incident.” Possibly some of these distinctions may have been matters of afterthought; but as to Rokeby there can be no mistake. Of its principal characters no one who compares the poem with his novels will doubt that, had he undertaken their portraiture in prose, they would have come forth with effect hardly inferior to any of all the groupes he ever created. As it is, I question whether even in his prose there is anything more exquisitely wrought out, as well as fancied, than the whole contrast of the two rivals for the love of the heroine; and that heroine herself has a very particular interest attached to her. Writing to Miss Edgeworth five years after this time (1818), he says, "I have not read one of my poems since they were printed, excepting last year the Lady of the Lake, which I liked better than I expected, but not well enough to induce me to go through the rest — so I may truly say with Macbeth —

¹ Charles Earl of Dalkeith became Duke of Buccleuch in January 1812, on the death of Duke Henry his father.

I am afraid to think of what I've done —
Look on't again I dare not.

This much of Matilda I recollect (for that is not so easily forgotten) — that she was attempted for the existing person of a lady who is now no more, so that I am particularly flattered with your distinguishing it from the others, which are in general mere shadows." I can have no doubt that the lady he here alludes to, was the object of his own unfortunate first love; and as little, that in the romantic generosity, both of the youthful poet who fails to win her higher favour, and of his chivalrous competitor, we have before us something more than a mere shadow.

In spite of these graceful characters, the inimitable scenery on which they are presented, and the splendid vivacity and thrilling interest of several chapters in the story — such as the opening interview of Bertram and Wychiff — the flight up the cliff on the Greta — the first entrance of the cave at Bugnall — the firing of Rokeby Castle — and the catastrophe in Egglestone Abbey; — in spite certainly of exquisitely happy lines profusely scattered throughout the whole composition, and of some detached images — that of the setting of the tropical sun in Canto VI., for example — which were never surpassed by any poet; — in spite of all these merits, the immediate success of Rokeby was greatly inferior to that of the Lady of the Lake, nor has it ever since been so much a favourite with the public at large as any other of his poetical romances. He ascribes this failure, in his Introduction of 1830, partly to the radically unpoetical character of the Roundheads; but surely their character has its poetical side also, had his prejudices allowed him to enter upon its study with impartial sympathy. Partly he blames the satiety of the public ear, which had had so much of his rhythm, not only from himself, but from dozens of mocking-birds, male and female, all more or less applauded in their day, and now all equally forgotten. This circumstance, too, had probably no slender effect; the more that, in defiance of all the hints of his friends, he now repeated (with more negligence) the uniform octosyllabic couplets of the Lady of the Lake, instead of recurring to the more varied cadence of the Lay or Marmion. It is fair to add that, among the London circles at least, some sarcastic lines in Mr. Moore's Two-penny Post Bag may have had an unfavourable influence on this occasion.¹ But the cause of failure which the poet himself places last, was unquestionably the main one. The deeper and darker passion of Child Harold, the audacity of its morbid voluptuousness, and the melancholy majesty of the numbers in which it defied the world, had taken the general imagination by storm; and Rokeby, with many beauties and some sublimities, was pitched, as a whole, on a key which seemed tame in the comparison.

I have already adverted to the fact that Scott felt it a relief, not a fatigue, to compose the Bridal of Triermain parsi passim with Rokeby. In answer, for example, to one of his printer's letters, he says, "I fully share in your anxiety to get forward the grand work, but, I assure you, I feel the more confidence from competing with the guerilla." The quarto was followed, within two months, by the small volume which had been designed for a twin birth, — the MS. had been transcribed by one of the Ballantynes themselves, in order to guard against any indiscretion of the press-people, and the mystification, aided and abetted by Erskine, in no small degree heightened the interest of its reception. Except Morritt, Scott had no English confidant. Whether any of his companions in the Parliament House were in the secret, I have never heard; but I can scarcely believe that any of those who had known him and Erskine from their youth upwards, could have believed the latter capable either of the invention or the execution of this airy and fascinating romance in little. Mr. Jeffrey, as it happened, made a voyage that year to America, and thus lost the opportunity of immediately expressing his opinion either of Rokeby or of Triermain. The Quarterly critic seems to have been completely deceived. "The diction (he says) undoubtedly reminds us of a rhythm and cadence we have heard before; but the sentiments, descriptions, and characters, have qualities that are native and unstudied." If this writer was (as I suppose) Ellis, he no doubt considered it as impossible that Scott should have engaged in such a scheme without giving him a hint of it, but to have admitted into the secret any —that of keeping the only moneyed partner accurately informed as to the actual obligations and resources of the establishment.

¹ See the Epistle of Lady Corke — and that of Messrs. Lockington.

Mr. John's loose methods of transacting business had soon cooled the alliance between his firm and the great Foreign Publisher of London. Murray's Scotch Agency was taken away; he retained hardly any connection with Scott himself, except as a contributor to his Review, and from time to time a friendly visitor in Albemarle Street; and under these altered circumstances, I do not see how the whole concern of John Ballantyne & Co. could have escaped the necessity of an abrupt and disastrous exposure within but a few weeks after the appearance of the Triermain, had not the personal differences with Constable been by that time healed. Mr. Hunter had now retired from that house; and Constable, released from his influence, had been watching with hope the unconcealable complication in the affairs of this fragile rival. Constable had never faltered in his conviction that Scott must continue to be the ruling spirit in the literature of their age; and there were few sacrifices which that sanguine man would not have made to regain his hold on the unmatched author. The Ballantynes saw the opening for help, and their advances were well met, but some quite unexpected calls on Scott compelled him to interfere directly, and he began in his own person a negotiation which, though at the time he likened it to that of the treaty of Amiens, was far from being capriciously protracted, or from leading only to a brief and barren truce. Constable, flattered in nomine by the offer, on fair terms, of a fourth part of the remaining copyright of Rokeby, agreed to relieve the labouring firm of a mass of its stock: the partners to exert themselves in getting rid of the residue, and then wind up their publishing concern with all convenient speed. This was a great relief: on the 18th of May 1813, Scott writes to Mr. John—"For the first time these many weeks, I shall lay my head on a quiet pillow:" but there was still much to be achieved. The warehouse must still groan under unsaleable quires—the desk, too late explored, shewed a dismal vista of approaching demand. Scott was too just not to take something of the blame upon himself; the accumulated stock bore witness against too many of his own plans and suggestions: nor could he acquit himself of carelessness in not having forced the manager to greater exactness in the detailing of accounts. But still he felt that he had serious reason for complaint; and the letter of which a sentence has just been quoted ends in these words, which ought to have produced the deeper impression because of their gentleness: "Adieu, my dear John— If I have ever expressed myself with irritation in speaking of this business, you must impute it to the sudden, extensive, and unexpected embarrassments in which I found myself involved all at once. If to your real goodness of heart and integrity, and to the quickness and acuteness of your talents, you added habits of more universal circumspection, and, above all, the courage to tell disagreeable truths to those whom you hold in regard, I pronounce that the world never held such a man of business. These it must be your study to add to your other good qualities. Meantime, as some one says to Swift, I love you with all your failings. Pray make an effort and love me with all mine. Yours truly, W. S."

"P.S.— James has behaved very well during this whole transaction, and has been most steadily attentive to business. I am convinced that the more he works the better his health will be. One or other of you will need to be constantly in the printing office hereafter— it is the sheet anchor."

The allusion in this postscript to the printer's health reminds me that Scott's letters to himself are full of hints on that subject, even from a very early period of their connexion; and these hints are all to the same effect. One letter (Aberdeen, 1810) will be a sufficient specimen:—"I am very sorry for the state of your health, and should be still more so, were I not certain that I can prescribe for you as well as any physician in Edinburgh. You have naturally an athletic constitution and a hearty stomach, and these agree very ill with a sedentary life and the habits of indolence which it brings on. You must positively put yourself on a regimen as to eating, not for a month or two, but for a year at least, and take regular exercise—and my life for yours." Among the early pets at Abbotsford there was a huge raven, whose powers of speech were remarkable, and who died in consequence of an equally remarkable voracity. Thenceforth, Scott often repeated to his old friend, and occasionally scribbled by way of postscript to his notes on business—

"When you are craving, Remember the Raven."

Sometimes the formula is varied to—

"When you've dined half,

His preachments of regularity in book-keeping to John, and of abstinence from good cheer to James, were equally vain; but, on the other hand, it must be allowed that the "hard skirmishes," as he calls them, of May 1813, do not seem to have left on himself all the impression that might have been anticipated. He was in the most vigorous of his prime: his temperament was buoyant and hopeful: nothing had occurred to check his confidence in the resources of his own genius and industry. So it was, that ere many weeks had passed, he was preparing fresh embarrassments for himself by bidding for another parcel of land. As early as the 20th of June he writes to Constable as being already aware of this matter, and alleges his anxiety "to close at once with a very capricious person," as the only reason that could have induced him to offer for £5000 the whole copyright of an as yet unwritten poem, to be called "The Nameless Glen." A long correspondence ensued, in the course of which Scott mentions "the Lord of the Isles," as a title which had suggested itself to him in place of "The Nameless Glen," but as the negotiation did not succeed, I may pass its details. The new property which he was so eager to acquire, was that hilly tract stretching from the old Roman road near Turnagain towards the Cauldshiels Loch: a then desolate and naked mountain-mere, which he likens, in a letter of this summer, to the Lake of the Genie and the Fisherman in the Arabian Tale. To obtain this lake at one extremity of his estate, as a contrast to the Tweed at the other, was a prospect for which hardly any sacrifice would have appeared too much; and he contrived to gratify his wishes in the course of July. Nor was he, I must add, more able to control some of his minor tastes. I find him writing to Terry on the same 20th of June, about "that splendid lot of ancient armour, advertised by Winstanley," a celebrated auctioneer in London, of which he had the strongest fancy to make spoil, though he was at a loss to know where it should be placed when it reached Abbotsford; and on the 2d of July, this acquisition also having been settled, he says to the same correspondent — "I have written to Mr. Winstanley. My bargain with Constable was otherwise arranged, but little John is to find the needful article, and I shall take care of Mr. Winstanley's interest, who has behaved too handsomely in this matter to be trusted to the mercy of our little friend the Picaroon, who is, notwithstanding his many excellent qualities, a little on the score of old Gobbo — doth somewhat smack — somewhat grow to."

On the 12th of July, as usual, he removed to Tweedside;

but he had not long enjoyed himself in sketching out woods and walks for the borders of his Fairy Lake before he received sharp admonishment. Two lines of a letter to the "little Pica-roon," dated July 24th, speak already to a series of annoyances: — "Dear John, — I sent you the order, and have only to hope it arrived safe and in good time. I waked the boy at three o'clock myself, having slept little, less on account of the money than of the time. Surely you should have written, three or four days before, the probable amount of the deficit, and, as on former occasions, I would have furnished you with means of meeting it. These expresses, besides every other inconvenience, excite surprise in my family and in the neighbourhood. I know no justifiable occasion for them but the unexpected return of a bill. I do not consider you as answerable for the success of plans, but I do and must hold you responsible for giving me, in distinct and plain terms, your opinion as to any difficulties which may occur, and that in such time that I may make arrangements to obviate them if possible."

The affair of the 24th itself was aggravated by the circumstance that Scott had been prepared to start on the 25th for a visit in a different county: so that the worst consequences that had so late alarmed his manager, must have been after all unavoidable if he had deferred his messenger but a few hours more.

Scott proceeded, accordingly, to join a gay and festive circle, whom the Duke of Buccleuch had assembled about him on first taking possession of the magnificent Castle of Drumlanrig, in Nithsdale, the principal messuage of the dukedom of Queensberry, which had recently lapsed into his family. But post equitem sedet atra cura — a second and a third of these unwelcome missives, rendered necessary by neglect of precisely the same kind, reached him in the midst of this scene of rejoicing.

He had been engaged also to meet the Marquis of Abercorn at Carlisle, in the first week of August, on business connected with his brother Thomas's late administration of that nobleman's affairs; and he had designed to pass from Drumlanrig to Carlisle for his purpose, without going back to Abbotsford. In consequence of these repeated harassments, however, he so far altered his plans as to cut short his stay at Drumlanrig, and turn homewards for two or three days, where James Ballantyne met him with such a statement as in some measure relieved his mind.

He then proceeded to fulfil his engagement with Lord Abercorn, whom he encountered travelling in a rather peculiar style between Carlisle and Longtown. The ladies of the family and the household occupied four or five carriages, all drawn by the Marquis's own horses, while the noble Lord himself brought up the rear, mounted on horseback, and decorated with the ribbon of the Garter. On meeting the cavalcade, Scott turned with them, and he was not a little amused when they reached the village of Longtown, which he had ridden through an hour before, with the preparations which he found there made for the dinner of the party. The Marquis's major-domo and cook had arrived there early in the morning, and every thing was now arranged for his reception in the little public house, as nearly as possible in the style of his own mansions. The ducks and geese that had been dabbling three or four hours ago in the village pond, were now ready to make their appearance under numberless disguises; a regular bill-of-fare flanked the Marquis's allotted cover; every huckaback towel in the place had been pressed to do service as a napkin; and the landlady's poor remnants of crockery had been furbished up, and mustered in solemn order on a crazy beaufet, which was to represent a sideboard worthy of Lucullus. I think it worth while to preserve this anecdote, which Scott delighted in telling, as perhaps the last relic of a style of manners now passed away, and never likely to be revived among us.

Having despatched this dinner and his business, Scott again turned southwards, intending to spend a few days at Rokeby; but on reaching Penrith, the landlord placed a letter in his hands: ecce iterum — it was once more a cry of distress from John Ballantyne. Having once more despatched a cheque, and a gentle remonstrance to Edinburgh, he rode on to Brough; but there he received such a painful account of Mrs. Morrill's health, that he abandoned his intention of proceeding to Rokeby; and indeed it was much better that he should be at Abbotsford again; for by this time the whole of these affairs had reached a second crisis. Again Constable was consulted; and now a detailed statement was submitted to him. On examining it, he so expressed himself, that all the partners concurred in the necessity of submitting forthwith to steps not less decisive than painful. Constable again relieved them of some of their crushing stock; but he frankly owned that he could not do in that way enough to serve them effectually; and Scott was constrained to have recourse to the Duke of Buccleuch, who with the kindest promptitude gave him a guarantee to the extent of L.4000, immediately available in the money market — the poet insuring his life for that sum, and depositing the insurance as security with the Duke; while John Ballantyne agreed, in place of a leisurely winding up of the publishing affair, to terminate it with the utmost possible speed, and endeavour to establish himself as an auctioneer of books, antiquities, and objects of vertu. How bitterly must Scott have felt his situation when he wrote thus to John on the 16th August: "With regard to the printing, it is my intention to retire from that also as soon as I can possibly do so with safety to myself, and with the regard I shall always entertain for James's interest. Whatever loss I may sustain will be preferable to the life I have lately led, when I seem surrounded by a sort of magic circle, which neither permits me to remain at home in peace, nor to stir abroad with pleasure. Your first exertion as an auctioneer may probably be on 'that distinguished, select, and inimitable collection of books, made by an amateur of this city retiring from business.' I do not feel either health or confidence in my own powers sufficient to authorize me to take a long price for a new poem, until these affairs shall have been in some measure digested." There still remained a difficult digestion. His correspondence on to Christmas is deeply chequered; but the nature of the details may be guessed by such as have had experience in the merchandise of literature; and few others, I suppose, will regret their curtailment.

It was in the midst of these distressing occurrences that Scott received two letters—one from Dr. Stanier Clarke, private librarian to the Regent, and another, more formal, from the Marquis of Hertford, Lord Chamberlain, announcing his Royal Highness's desire to nominate him to the office of Poet-laureate, which had just fallen vacant by the death of Mr. Pye. Its emoluments were understood by him to be "£400, or at least £300 a-year;" at that time such an accession of income must have been welcome; and at any rate, what the Sovereign designed as a favour and a distinction could not be lightly waived by Walter Scott. He felt, however, that holding already two lucrative offices in the gift of the Crown, he could not gracefully accept a third, entirely unconnected with his own legal profession, while so many eminent men remained wholly dependent on their literary exertions; and the friends whom he consulted, especially the Duke of Buccleuch, all concurring in the propriety of these scruples, he declined the royal offer. It is evident that from the first he had had Mr. Southey's case in his contemplation. The moment he made up his mind as to himself, he wrote to Mr. Croker and others in the Prince Regent's confidence, suggesting that name: and he congratulated his friend of Keswick on assuming the laurel, which "had been worn of old by Dryden and by Warton." Mr. Southey, in an essay long subsequent to his death, says — "Sir Walter's conduct was, as was, characteristically friendly and generous."

This happened in September. October brought an accession of John Ballantyne's missives, to one of which he answered: — "For Heaven's sake, treat me as a man and a milch-cow;" — and a third crisis, at the approach of tinmas term, was again weathered with the narrowest — chiefly, as before, through the intervention of C. All these annoyances produced no change whatever in his habits of industry. During these anxious months of September, October, and November, he kept feeding from day to day both with the annotated text of the volumes of Swift's works, and with the MS. of his Lady Dean. He had also proceeded to mature in his mind the plan of the Lord of the Isles, and executed such a portion of the First Canto as gave him confidence to renew his negotiations with Constable for the sale of the whole, or part of it, at a fair price. It was, moreover, at this period, that his eye was first directed to light once more on the Ashestiel fragment of Waverley. He read over those introductory chapters — thought they were undervalued — and determined to finish the story.

It is proper to mention, that, in the very agony and perplexities, the unfortunate Maturin received from Constable a timely succour of £50, rendered doubly acceptable by a kind and judicious letter of advice in which it was stated that his help had been before me ample evidence that his help had been extended to other struggling brothers of the same trade, even when he must often have had actual difficulty to procure the immediate expenditure of his own family.

The great successes of the Allied Powers in the course of 1813 gave a salutary stimulus to commercial enterprise, and the return of general confidence facilitated many arrangements in which Scott's interests were involved. He, therefore, needed no such considerations to heighten his patriotism, which overflowed in two songs — one of them, since, I believe, omitted at any celebration of the anniversary of Mr. Pitt's death —

"O dread was the time and more dreadful the omen,
When the brave on Marengo lay slaughter'd in vain

He also wrote an address to the Sovereign for the Magistracy of Edinburgh, which was privately acknowledged to the penman, by his Royal Highness's command, as "the most elegant congratulation a sovereign ever received or a subject offered." The Magistrates accordingly found particular graciousness at Carlton House; and on their return (Christmas, 1813) presented Scott with the freedom of his native city and a very handsome piece of plate.

I must, however, open the year 1814 with a melancholy story. Mention has been made in connection with an unlucky edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, of Henry Weber, a German scholar, who, escaping to this country in 1804, from misfortunes in his own, excited Scott's compassion, and was thenceforth furnished, through his means, with literary employment of various sorts. Weber was a man of considerable learning; but Scott, as was his custom, appears to have formed an exaggerated notion of his capacity, and certainly countenanced him, to his own severe cost, in several most unhappy undertakings. When not engaged on things of a more ambitious character, he had acted for ten years as his protector's amanuensis, and when the family were in Edinburgh, he very often dined with them. There was something very interesting in his appearance and manners: he had a fair, open countenance, in which the honesty and the enthusiasm of his nation were alike visible; his demeanour was gentle and modest; and he had not only a stock of curious antiquarian knowledge, but the reminiscences, which he detailed with amusing simplicity, of an early life chequered with many strange-enough adventures. He was, in short, much a favourite with Scott and all the household; and was invited to dine with them so frequently, chiefly because his friend was aware that he had an unhappy propensity to drinking, and was anxious to keep him away from places where he might have been more likely to indulge it. This vice had been growing on him; and of late Scott had found it necessary to make some rather severe remonstrances about habits which were at once injuring his health and interrupting his literary industry. They had, however, parted kindly when Scott left Edinburgh at Christmas; and the day after his return, Weber attended him as usual in his library — being employed in transcribing extracts during several hours, while his friend, seated over against him, continued working at the Life of Swift. The light beginning to fail, Scott threw himself back in his chair, and was about to ring for candles, when he observed the German's eyes fixed upon him with an unusual solemnity of expression. "Weber," said he the matter with you?" "Mr. Scott," said Weber, "I have long insulted me, and I can bear it no longer brought a pair of pistols with me, and must must taking one of them instantly;" and with that he produced his weapons, which had been deposited under his chair, and laid one of them on Scott's manuscript. "You are mistaken," said Scott, "in your way of setting about this but no matter. It can, however, be no part of your business to annoy Mrs. Scott and the children; therefore, if you will put the pistols into the drawer till after dinner, we will then arrange to go out together like gentlemen." Weber answered with equal coolness, "I believe that will be better," and laid the second pistol also on the table. Scott then took them both in his desk, and said, "I am glad you have observed the propriety of what I suggested — let me only request that nothing may occur while we are at dinner to give your wife any suspicion of what has been passing." Weber assented, and Scott withdrew to his dressing-room, from whence he despatched a message to one of Weber's companions. When dinner was served, and Weber joined the circle, he conducted himself with composure, and everything went on in the ordinary way, until whisky and hot water were produced, Scott, instead of inviting his guest to help himself, mixed two moderate tumblers of toddy, and handed them to Weber, who, upon that, started up with a pale countenance, but instantly sat down again, and when Scott expressed her fear that he was ill, answered that he was liable to spasms, but that the pain was gone. He then took the glass, eagerly gulped down its contents, and pushed it back to Scott. At this moment the friend who had been sent for made his appearance; and Weber, on seeing him enter the room, rushed past him and out of the house, stopping to put on his hat. The friend, who pursued him, came up with him at the end of the street, and did all that was possible to soothe his agitation, but in vain. The same evening he was obliged to be put into a strait-waistcoat; and though in a few days he exhibited such symptoms of recovery that he was allowed to go by himself to pay a visit in the North of Scotland, he there soon relapsed, and continued ever after a hopeless lunatic, being supported to the end of his life, in 1818, at Scott's expense, in an asylum at York.

On the first of July 1814, the Swift, nineteen volumes, at length issued from the press. This adventure, un-by Constable in 1808, had been proceeded in during all the variety of their personal relations, and now came forth when author and publisher felt more warmly towards each other than perhaps they had ever before done. The impression was of 1250 copies; and a reprint of similar extent was called for in 1824. Scott added to his edition many admirable pieces, both in prose and verse, which had never before been printed, and still more, which had escaped notice amidst old bundles of pamphlets and broadsides. To the illustration of these and of all the better known writings of the Dean, he brought the same qualifications which had, by general consent, distinguished his Dryden. "imiting," as the Edinburgh Review expresses it, "to the minute knowledge and patient research of the Malone and Chalmerses, a vigour of judgment and a vivacity of style to which they had no pretensions." His biographical narrative, introductory essays, and notes show, indeed, an intimacy of acquaintance with the obscurest details of the political, social, and literary history of the period of Queen Anne, which it is impossible to consider without feeling a lively regret that he never accomplished a long cherished purpose of editing Pope. It has been specially unfortunate for that "true deacon of the craft," as Scott often called him, that first Goldsmith, and then Scott, should have taken up, only to abandon it, the project of writing his life and annotating his works.

The Edinburgh Reviewer thus characterises the Memoir of the Dean of St. Patrick's:—

"It is not much like the production of a mere man of letters, or a fastidious speculator in sentiment and morality; but exhibits throughout, and in a very pleasing form, the good sense and large toleration of a man of the world, with much of that generous allowance for the

'Fears of the brave and follies of the wise.'

which genius too often requires, and should therefore always be most forward to show. It is impossible, however, to avoid noticing that Mr. Scott is by far too favourable to the personal character of his author, whom we think it would really be injurious to the cause of morality to allow to pass either as a very dignified, or a very amiable person. The truth is, we think, that he was extremely ambitious, arrogant, and selfish; of a morose, vindictive, and haughty temper; and though capable of a sort of patronising generosity towards his dependents, and of some attachment towards those who had long known and flattered him, his general demeanour, both in public and private life, appears to have been far from exemplary; destitute of temper and magnanimity, and we will add, of principle, in the former; and in the latter, of tenderness, fidelity, or compassion."—Vol. viii. p. 9.

I have no desire to break a lance in this place in defence of Swift. It does not appear to me that he stands at all distinguished among politicians (least of all, among the politicians of his time) for laxity of principle; nor can I consent to charge his private demeanour with the absence either of tenderness, or fidelity, or compassion. But who ever dreamed — most assuredly not Scott — of holding up the Dean of St. Patrick's as on the whole an "exemplary character"? The biographer felt, whatever his critic may have thought on the subject, that a vein of morbid humour ran through Swift's whole existence, both mental and physical, from the beginning. "He early adopted," says Scott, "the custom of observing his birthday as a term not of joy but of sorrow, and of reading, when it recurred, the striking passage of Scripture in which Job laments and execrates the day upon which it was said in his father's house that a man-child was born;" and I should have expected that any man who had considered the black close of the career thus early clouded, and read the entry of Swift's diary on the funeral of Stella, his epitaph on himself, and the testament by which he disposed of his fortune, would have been willing, like Scott, to dwell on the splendour of his immortal genius, and the many traits of manly generosity "which he unquestionably exhibited," rather than on the faults and foibles of melancholy and inscrutable disease, which tormented and embittered the far greater part of his earthly being. What the critic says of the practical and business-like style of Scott's biography, appears very just — and I think the circumstance eminently characteristic; nor, on the whole, could his edition, as an edition, have been better dealt with than in the Kew which I have quoted. It was, by the way, written by Mr. Jeffrey at Constable's particular request. "It was, I think, the first time I ever asked such a thing of him," the bookseller said to me; "and I assure you the result was no encouragement to repeat such petitions." Mr. Jeffrey attacked Swift's whole character at great length, and with consummate dexterity; and, in Constable's opinion, his article threw such a cloud on the Dean as materially checked for a time the popularity of his writings. Admirable as the paper is in point of ability, I think Mr. Constable may have considerably exaggerated its effects; but in those days it must have been difficult for him to form an impartial opinion upon such a question; for, as Johnson said of Cave that "he could not spit over his window without thinking of The Gentleman's Magazine," I believe Constable allowed nothing to interrupt his paternal pride in the concerns of his Review, until Waverley opened another periodical publication still more important to his fortunes.

And this consummation was not long delayed. Before Christmas Erskine had perused the greater part of the first volume, and expressed his decided opinion that Waverley would prove the most popular of all his friend's writings. The MS. was forthwith copied by John Ballantyne, and sent to press. As soon as a volume was printed, Ballantyne conveyed it to Constable, who did not for a moment doubt from what pen it proceeded, but took a few days to consider of the matter, and then offered L.700 for the copyright. When we recollect what the state of novel literature in those days was, and that the only exceptions to its mediocrity, the Irish Tales of Miss Edgeworth, however appreciated in refined circles, had a circulation so limited that she had never realised a tithe of L.700 by the best of them — it must be allowed that Constable's offer was a liberal one. Scott's answer, however, was, that L.700 was too much in case the novel should not be successful, and too little if it should. He added, "If our fat friend had said L.1000, I should have been staggered." John did not forget to convey this last hint to Constable, but the latter did not choose to act upon it; and ultimately agreed to an equal division of profits between himself and the author.

There was a considerable pause between the finishing of the first volume and the beginning of the second. Constable, eager about an extensive Supplement to his Encyclopædia Britannica, earnestly requested Scott to undertake a few articles; and, anxious to gratify the generous bookseller, he laid aside his tale until he had finished two essays — those on Chivalry and the Drama. They were written in the course of April and May, and he received for each of them L.100.

A letter of the 9th July to Mr. Morritt gives in more exact detail than the author's own recollection could supply in 1830, the history of the completion of Waverley: which had then been two days published. "I must now" (he says) "account for my own laziness, by referring you to a small anonymous sort of a novel, which you will receive by the mail of this day. It was a very old attempt of mine to embody some traits of those characters and manners peculiar to Scotland, the last remnants of which vanished during my own youth. I had written great part of the first volume, and sketched other passages, when I mislaid the MS., and only found it by the merest accident as I was rummaging the drawers of an old cabinet; and I took the fancy of finishing it. It has made a very strong impression here, and the good people of Edinburgh are busied in tracing the author, and in finding out originals for the portraits it contains. Jeffrey has offered to make oath that it is mine, and another great critic has tendered his affidavit ex contrario; so that these authorities have divided the Gude Town. Let me know your opinion about it. The truth is that this sort of muddling work amuses me, and I am something in the condition of Joseph Surface, who was embarrassed by getting himself too good a reputation; for many things may please people well enough anonymously, which if they have me in the title-page, would just give me that sort of ill name which precedes hanging—and that would be in many respects inconvenient, if I thought of again trying a grande oeuvre."

Morritt, as yet the only English confidant, conveyed on volume by volume as he read them his honest criticism: at last vehemently protesting against the maintenance of the incognito. Scott in his reply (July 24th) says:—"I shall not own Waverley; my chief reason is, that it would prevent me the pleasure of writing again. David Hume, nephew of the historian, says the author must be of a Jacobite family and predilections, a yeoman-cavalry man, and a Scottish lawyer, and desires me to guess in whom these happy attributes are united. I shall not plead guilty, however; and as such seems to be the fashion of the day, I hope charitable people will believe my affidavit in contradiction to all other evidence. The Edinburgh faith now is, that Waverley is written by Jeffrey, having been composed to lighten the tedium of his late transatlantic voyage. So you see the unknown infant is like to come to preferment. In truth, I am not sure it would be considered quite decorous for me, as a Clerk of Session, to write novels. Judges being monks, Clerks are a sort of lay brethren, from whom some solemnity of walk and conduct may be expected. So whatever I may do of this kind, 'I shall whistle it down the wind, and let it prey at fortune.'¹ The second edition is, I believe, nearly through the press. It will hardly be printed faster than it was written; for though the first volume was begun long ago, and actually lost for a time, yet the other two were begun and finished between the 4th June and the first July, during all which I attended my duty in Court, and proceeded without loss of time or hinderance of business."

This statement as to the time occupied by the second and third volumes of Waverley, recalls to my memory a trifling anecdote, which, as connected with a dear friend of my youth, whom I have not seen for many years, and may very probably never see again in this world, I shall here set down, in the hope of affording him a momentary, though not an unmixed pleasure, when he may chance to read this compilation on a distant shore—and also in the hope that my humble record may impart to some active mind in the rising generation a shadow of the influence which the reality certainly exerted upon his. Happening to pass through Edinburgh in June 1814, I dined one day with the gentleman in question (now the Honourable William Menzies, one of the Supreme Judges at the Cape of Good Hope), whose residence was then in George Street, situated very near to, and at right angles with, North Castle Street. It was a party of very young persons, most of them, like Menzies and myself, destined for the Bar of Scotland, all gay and thoughtless, enjoying the first flush of manhood, with little remembrance of the yesterday, or care of the morrow. When my companion's worthy father and uncle, after seeing two or three bottles go round, left the juveniles to themselves, the weather being hot, we adjourned to a library which had one large window looking northwards. After carousing here for an hour or more, I observed that a shade had come over the aspect of my friend, who happened to be placed immediately opposite to myself, and said something that intimated a fear of his being unwell. "No," said he, "I shall be well enough presently, if you will only let me sit where you are, and take my chair; for there is a confounded hand in sight of me here, which has often bothered me before, and now it won't let me fill my glass with a good will." I rose to change places with him accordingly, and he pointed out to me this hand which, like the writing on Belshazzar's wall, disturbed his hour of hilarity. "Since we sat down," he said, "I have been watching it—it fascinates my eye—it never stops—page after page is finished and thrown on that heap of MS. and still it goes on unwearied—and so it will be till candles are brought in, and God knows how long after that. It is the same every night—I can't stand a sight of it when I am not at my books."—"Some stupid, dogged, engrossing clerk, probably," exclaimed myself, or some other giddy youth in our society. "No, boys," said our host, "I well know what hand it is—'tis Walter Scott's." This was the hand that, in the evenings of three summer weeks, wrote the two last volumes of Waverley.

¹ Othello, Act III. Scene 3.

The gallant composure with which Scott, when he had dismissed a work from his desk, awaited the decision of the public—and the healthy elasticity of spirit with which he could meanwhile turn his whole zeal upon new or different objects—are among the features in his character which will always, I believe, strike the student of literary history as most remarkable. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance to his fortunes of this his first novel. Yet before he had heard of its reception in the south, except the whisper of one partial friend, he started on a voyage which was likely to occupy two months, and during which he could hardly expect to receive any letters.

He had been invited to accompany the Commissioners of the Northern Light Houses in their annual expedition; and as its programme included the Hebrides, and he had already made some progress in the Lord of the Isles, the opportunity for refreshing and enlarging his acquaintance with that region would alone have been a strong temptation. But there were many others. The trip was also to embrace the isles of Shetland and Orkney, and a vast extent of the mainland coasts, no part of which he had ever seen—or but for such an offer might ever have much chance of seeing. The Commissioners were all familiar friends of his—William Erskine, then Sheriff of the Orkneys, Robert Hamilton, Sheriff of Lanarkshire, Adam Duff, Sheriff of Forfarshire; but the real chief was the Surveyor-General, the celebrated engineer Mr. Stevenson, and Scott anticipated special pleasure in his society. "I delight," he told Morritt, "in these professional men of talent. They always give you some new lights by the peculiarity of their habits and studies—so different from the people who are rounded and smoothed and ground down for conversation, and who can say all that every other person says—and no more."

To this voyage we owe many of the most striking passages in the Lord of the Isles, and the noble romance of the Pirate wholly. The leisure of the yacht allowed him to keep a very minute diary, from which he gave sundry extracts in his notes to both these works, and which may now be read entire in the larger memoirs of his life and correspondence. It abounds in interest—in sketches of scenery which could have come from his hand alone—in most curious details of insular manners; but its chief value is in its artless portraiture of the penman. I question if any man ever drew his own character more fully or more pleasingly. We have before us, according to the scene and occasion, the poet, the antiquary, the magistrate, the planter, and the agriculturist; but everywhere the warm yet sagacious philanthropist—everywhere the courtesy, based on the unselfishness, of the thoroughbred gentleman. It concludes with these words:—“But I must not omit to say, that among five or six persons, some of whom were doubtless different in tastes and pursuits, there did not occur, during the close communication of more than six weeks aboard a small vessel, the slightest difference of opinion. Each seemed anxious to submit his own wishes to those of his friends. The consequence was, that by judicious arrangement all were gratified in their turn, and frequently he who made some sacrifices to the views of his companions, was rewarded by some unexpected gratification calculated particularly for his own amusement. We had constant exertion, a succession of wild and uncommon scenery, good humour on board, and objects of animation and interest when we went ashore:—Sed fugit interea — fugit irrevocabile tempus.”

I have been told by one of the companions of this voyage, that heartily as he entered throughout into their social enjoyments, they all perceived him, when inspecting for the first time scenes of remarkable grandeur, to be in such an abstracted and excited mood, that they felt it would be the kindest and discreetest plan to leave him to himself. “I often,” said Lord Kinnedder, “on coming up from the cabin at night, found him pacing the deck rapidly, muttering to himself—and went to the fore-castle, lest my presence should disturb him. I remember, that at Loch Corriskin, in particular, he seemed quite overwhelmed with his feelings; and we all saw it, and retiring unnoticed, left him to roam and gaze about by himself, until it was time to muster the party and be gone.” Scott used to mention the surprise with which he himself witnessed Erskine’s emotion on first entering the Cave of Staffa. “Would you believe it?” he said—“my poor Willie sat down and wept like a woman!” Yet his own sensibilities, though betrayed in a more masculine and sterner guise, were perhaps as keen as well as deeper than his amiable friend’s.

A few days before his voyage ended, he heard casually of the death of Harriet, Duchess of Buccleuch, who ever since the days of Lasswade had been his most kind friend. The sad intelligence was confirmed on his arrival in the Clyde, by a most touching and manly letter from the Duke. Its closing paragraph has these sentences:—“Endeavouring to the last to conceal her suffering, she evinced a fortitude, a resignation, a Christian courage, beyond all power of description. Her last injunction was to attend to her poor people. I have learned that the most truly heroic spirit may be lodged in the tenderest and the gentlest breast. If ever there was a proof of the efficacy of our religion in moments of the deepest affliction, and in the hour of death, it was exemplified in her conduct. I will endeavour to do in all things what I know she would wish. I have therefore determined to lay myself open to all the comforts my friends can afford me. I shall be most happy to cultivate their society as heretofore. I shall love them more and more because I know they loved her. Whenever it suits your convenience I shall be happy to see you here. I feel that it is particularly my duty not to make my house the house of mourning to my children; for I know it was her decided opinion that it is most mischievous to give an early impression of gloom to the mind."

The Duke survived for some years, and he continued in the line of conduct which he had from the first resolved upon; but he never recovered the blow: and this no one perceived more clearly than Scott.

In his letter to Morrith on reaching Edinburgh, he says (September 14th),—"We sailed from Leith, and skirted the Scottish coast, visiting the Buller of Buchan and other remarkable objects—went to Shetland—thence to Orkney— from thence round Cape Wrath to the Hebrides, making descents everywhere, where there was anything to be seen—thence to Lewis and the Long Island—to Skye—to Iona—and so forth, lingering among the Hebrides as long as we could. Then we stood over to the coast of Ireland, and visited the Giant's Causeway and Port Rush, where Dr. Richardson, the inventor (discoverer, I would say,) of the celebrated fiorin grass, resides. By the way, he is a chattering charlatan, and his fiorin a mere humbug. But if he were Cicero, and his invention were potatoes, or anything equally useful, I should detest the recollection of the place and the man, for it was there I learned the death of my friend. Adieu, my dear Morrith; like poor Tom, 'I cannot daub it farther.'"

As he passed through Edinburgh, the negotiation as to the Lord of the Isles, which had been protracted through several months, was completed: Constable agreeing to give fifteen hundred guineas for one-half of the copyright, while the other moiety was retained by the author. The same sum had been offered at an early stage of the affair, but it was not until now accepted, in consequence of the earnest wish of Messrs. Balfantyne to saddle the publisher of the new poem with another pyramid of their old "quire stock,"—which, however, Constable ultimately persisted in refusing. It may easily be believed that John's management during a six weeks' absence had been such as to render it doubly convenient for the Poet to have this matter settled; and it may also be supposed that the progress of Waverley during that interval had tended to put the chief parties in good humour with each other. For nothing can be more unfounded than the statement repeated in various memoirs of Scott's Life, that the sale of the first edition of this immortal Tale was slow. It appeared on the 7th of July, and the whole impression (1000 copies) had disappeared within five weeks; an occurrence then unprecedented in the case of an anonymous novel, put forth at what is called among publishers the dead season. A second edition of 2000 copies was at least projected by the 21th of the same month: — that appeared before the end of August, and it too had gone off so rapidly that Scott now, in September, found Constable eager to treat, on the same terms as before, for a third of 1000 copies. This third edition was published in October; and when a fourth of the like extent was called for in November, I find Scott writing to John Ballantyne: — "I suppose Constable won't quarrel with a work on which he has netted £.612 in four months, with a certainty of making it £.1000 before the year is out." It would be idle to enumerate subsequent reprints. Well might Constable regret that he had not ventured to offer £.1000 for the whole copyright of Waverley!

The only private friends originally intrusted with his secret appear to have been Erskine and Merritt. But there was one with whom it would, of course, have been more than vain to affect any concealment. On the publication of the third edition, I find him writing thus to his brother, then in Canada: — "Dear Tom, a novel here, called Waverley, has had enormous success. I sent you a copy, and will send you another with the Lord of the Isles which will be out at Christmas. The success which it has had, with some other circumstances, has induced people

* To lay the bantling at a certain door,
Where lying store of faults, they'd fain heap more.*

You will guess for yourself how far such a report has credibility; but by no means give the weight of your opinion to the Transatlantic public; for you must know there is also a counter-report, that you have written the said Waverley. Send me a novel intermixing your exuberant and natural humour, with any incidents and descriptions of scenery you may see — particularly with characters and traits of manners. I will give it all the cobbling that is necessary, and, if you do but exert yourself, I have not the least doubt it will be worth L.500; and, to encourage you, you may, when you send the MS., draw on me for L.100, at fifty days' sight — so that your labours will at any rate not be quite thrown away. You have more fun and descriptive talent than most people; and all that you want — i.e. the mere practice of composition — I can supply, or the devil's in it. Keep this matter a dead secret, and look knowing when Waverley is spoken of. If you are not Sir John Falstaff, you are as good a man as he, and may therefore face Colville of the Dale. You may believe I don't want to make you the author of a book you have never seen; but if people will, upon their own judgment, suppose so, and also on their own judgment give you L.500 to try your hand on a novel, I don't see that you are a pin's-point the worse. Mind that your MS. attends the draft. I am perfectly serious and confident, that in two or three months you might clear the cobs. I beg my compliments to the hero who is afraid of Jeffrey's scalping-knife."

* Garrick's Epilogue to Polly Honeycombe, 1760.

In truth, no one of Scott's intimate friends ever had, or could have had, the slightest doubt as to the parentage of Waverley: nor, although he abstained from communicating the fact formally to most of them, did he ever affect any real concealment in the case of such persons; nor, when any circumstance arose which rendered the withholding of direct confidence on the subject incompatible with perfect freedom of feeling on both sides, did he hesitate to make the avowal. Nor do I believe that the mystification ever answered much purpose among literary men of eminence beyond the circle of his personal acquaintance. But it would be difficult to suppose that he had ever wished that to be otherwise; it was sufficient for him to set the mob of readers at gaze, and above all, to escape the annoyance of having productions, actually known to be his, made the daily and hourly topics of discussion in his presence — especially (perhaps) productions in a new walk, to which it might be naturally supposed that Lord Byron's poetical successes had diverted him.

Mr. Jeffrey had known Scott from his youth — and in reviewing Waverley he was at no pains to conceal his conviction of its authorship. He quarrelled as usual with carelessness of style and some inartificialities of plot, but rendered justice to the substantial merits of the work. The Quarterly was far less favourable. Indeed the articles on Waverley and Guy Mannering in that journal will bear the test of ultimate opinion as badly as any critical pieces which our time has produced. They are written in a captious, cavilling strain of quibble, which shews us complete blindness to the essential interest of the narrative, as the critic betrays on the subject of the Scottish dialogue, which forms its liveliest ornament, when he pronounces that to be "a dark dialect of Anglified Erse." With this remarkable exception, the censors of any note were not slow to confess their belief that, under a hackneyed name and trivial form, there had appeared a work of original creative genius, worthy of being placed by the side of the very few real masterpieces of prose fiction. loftier romance was never blended with easier, quainter humour, by Cervantes. In his familiar delineations he had combined the strength of Smollett with the native elegance and unaffected pathos of Goldsmith; in his darker scenes he had revived that real tragedy which appeared to have left our theatre with the age of Shakspeare; and elements of interest so diverse had been blended and interwoven with that nameless grace, which, more surely perhaps than even the highest perfection in the command of any one strain of sentiment, marks the master-mind cast in Nature's most felicitous mould.

CHAPTER VIII.

Publication of the Lord of the Isles and Guy Mannering — Meeting with Byron — Carlton House dinner — Excursion to Paris — Publication of the Field of Waterloo — Paul's Letters — The Antiquary — Harold the Dauntless — and the first Tales of my Landlord. 1816-1819.

THE voyage and these good news sent him back in high vigour to his desk at Abbotsford. For lighter work he had on hand the Memorie of the Somervilles, a very curious specimen of family history, which he had undertaken to edit at the request of his neighbour Lord Somerville. This was published in October. His serious labour was on the Lord of the Isles: of which only three cantos had been written when he concluded his bargain with Constable. He had carried with him in the Yacht some proof-sheets of a little book that Ballantyne was printing, entitled Poems illustrative of Traditions in Galloway and Ayrshire, by Joseph Train, Supervisor of Excise at Castle-Stewart: and, being struck with the notes, wrote, on his arrival at home, to the author, whom he had never seen, requesting information concerning the ruins of Turnberry, on the Ayrshire coast, of which he wished to say something in connexion with one of Bruce's adventures in the forthcoming poem. Mr. Train did much more than Scott had meant to ask; — for he had never himself been at Turnberry — but instantly rode over the hills to the spot, and transmitted ample details of the castle and all its legends: — not omitting a local superstition, that on the anniversary of the night when Bruce landed there from Arran, the meteoric gleam which had attended his voyage reappeared unfailingly in the same quarter of the heavens. What use Scott made of this and other parts of Mr. Train's paper, we see from the fifth canto of the Lord of the Isles and its notes: and the date of the communication (November 2) is therefore important as to the history of the composition: but this was the beginning of a correspondence schemes, dropt all notion of authorship in his own person, and devoted his leisure with most generous assiduity to the collection of whatever stories he fancied likely to be of use to his new acquaintance, who, after one or two meetings, had impressed him with unbounded enthusiasm of attachment. To no one individual did Scott owe so much of the materials of his novels: and one of the very earliest packets from Castle-Stewart (November 7) contained a ballad called the Durham Garland, which, reviving Scott's recollection of a story told in his youth by a servant of his father's, suggested the ground work of the second of the series. James Ballantyne, in writing by desire of "the Author of Waverley" to Miss Edgeworth, with a copy of the fourth edition of that novel (November 11), mentioned that another might soon be expected; but, as he added, that it would treat of manners more ancient than those of 1745, it is clear that no outline resembling that of Guy Mannering was then in the printer's view: most probably Scott had signified to him that he designed to handle the period of the Covenanters. There can, I think, be as little doubt that he began Guy Mannering as soon as Train's paper of the 7th November reached him.

He writes, on the 25th December, to Constable that he "had corrected the last proofs of the Lord of the Isles, and was setting out for Abbotsford to refresh the machine." And in what did his refreshment of the machine consist? The poem was published on the 15th January; and he says, on that day, to Morritt, "I want to shake myself free of Waverley, and accordingly have made a considerable exertion to finish an odd little tale within such time as will mystify the public, I trust — unless they suppose me to be Briareus. Two volumes are already printed, and the only persons in my confidence, W. Erskine and Ballantyne, are of opinion that it is much more interesting than Waverley. It is a tale of private life, and only varied by the perilous exploits of smugglers and excisemen." Guy Mannering was published on the 24th February — that is, exactly two months after the Lord of the Isles was dismissed from the author's desk; and — making but a narrow allowance for the operations of the transcriber, printer, bookseller, &c., I think the dates I have gathered together confirm the accuracy of what I have often heard Scott say, that his second novel "was the work of six weeks at a Christmas." Such was his recipe "for refreshing the machine."

I am sorry to have to add, that this severity of labour, like the repetition of it which had deplorable effects at a later period, was the result of difficulties about the discussion of Ballantyne's bills.

Finding that Constable would not meet his views of these matters, Mr. John suggested to Scott that his house might prove more accommodating if he were to offer them not only the new novel, but the next to the established favourite Waverley : but upon this proposition Scott at once set his veto. "Dear John," "your expedients are all wretched, as far as regard never will give Constable, or any one, room to broken my word with him in the slightest degree; everything else, I will at least keep my honour un and I do hold myself bound in honour to offer him a while he shall continue to comply with the conditions. The result was, that Messrs. Longman undertook the printing, relieving John of some of his encumbering Longman, in compliance with Scott's wish, admitted to a share in the adventure; and with one or two originating in circumstances nearly similar, the house published all the subsequent novels.

I must not, however, forget that the Lord of the Isles was published a month before Guy Mannering. The public perceived with an interest much heightened by the growing success of the mysterious Waverley. Its appearance so rapidly following that novel, and accompanied with the announcement of another prose tale, just about to be published by the same hand, puzzled and confounded the masses. The more sagacious few said to themselves, "making one serious effort more in his old line, and will be determined whether he does or does not renounce that for his new one."

The most important remarks of the principal Reviewers on the details of the plot and execution are annexed to the edition of the poem; and shew such an exact and judicious judgment in two masters of their calling, as had never been exemplified in the professional criticism of his romances. The defects which both point out, are, but too completely explained by the preceding statements: the rapidity with which this, the last of those great enterprises, had been thrown off; nor do I see that either has failed to do sufficient justice to the beauties which the imperfections of the Lord of the Isles—except the whole character of Bruce, its real hero, and the description of the Battle of Bannockburn, which, now that one can these works from something like the same point of view, does not appear to me in the slightest particular inferior to the Flodden of Marmion.

This poem is now, I believe, about as popular as Rokeby; but it has never reached the same station in general favour with the Lay, Marmion, or the Lady of the Lake. The instant consumption of 1800 quartos, followed by 8vo reprints to the number of 12,000, would, in the case of almost any other author, have been splendid success; but as compared with what he had previously experienced, even in his Rokeby, and still more so as compared with the enormous circulation at once attained by Lord Byron's early tales, which were then following each other in almost breathless succession, the falling off was decided. One evening, some days after the poem had been published, Scott requested James Ballantyne to call on him, and the Printer found him alone in his library, working at the third volume of Guy Mannering. — "Well, James," he said, "I have given you a week — what are people saying about the Lord of the Isles?" — "I hesitated a little," says the Printer, "after the fashion of Gil Blas, but he speedily brought the matter to a point — 'Come,' he said, 'speak out, my good fellow; what has put it into your head to be on so much ceremony with me all of a sudden? But, I see how it is, the result is given in one word — Disappointment.' My silence admitted his inference to the fullest extent. His countenance certainly did look rather blank for a few seconds; in truth, he had been wholly unprepared for the event; for it is a singular fact, that before the public, or rather the booksellers, had given their decision, he no more knew whether he had written well or ill, than whether a die thrown out of a box was to turn up a size or an ace. However, he instantly resumed his spirit, and expressed his wonder rather that his poetical popularity should have lasted so long, than that it should have now at last given way. At length he said, with perfect cheerfulness, 'Well, well, James, so be it — but you know we must not droop, for we can't afford to give over. Since one line has failed, we must just stick to something else:' — and so he dismissed me, and resumed this novel. . . . He spoke thus, probably, unaware of the undiscovered wonders then slumbering in his mind. Yet still he could not but have felt that the production of a few poems was nothing in comparison of what must be in reserve for him, for he was at this time scarcely more than forty. An evening or two after, I called again on him, and found on the table a copy of the Giaour, which he seemed to have been reading. Having an enthusiastic young lady in my house, I said to him if I might carry the book home with me, but on a casual glance on the autograph blazon, 'To the Monarch of the North, from one of his subjects,' instantly retracted my request. "I had not observed Lord Byron's inscription before," said he; "O yes, I had forgot, but insert no inscription, you are equally welcome." I again thanked him, and he continued — "James, Byron hits the mark when he even pretend to fledge my arrow." At this time he had not seen Byron, but I knew he meant soon to be in London, and no doubt, the mighty consummation of the meeting of the two bards would be accomplished — and I ventured to say that I must be looking forward to it with some interest. His countenance became fixed, and he answered impressively, "Of course." In a minute or two afterwards he rose from his seat, paced the room at a very rapid rate, which was his wont in certain moods of mind, then made a dead halt, and burst forth in an extravaganza of laughter, "James," cried he, "I'll tell you what Byron should say to me when we are about to meet each other —

Art thou the man whom men famed Grizzle call?

And then how germane would be my answer —

Art thou the still more famed Tom Thumb the small?

"This," concludes Mr. B., "kept him full of mirth for the rest of the evening."

The whole scene is delightfully characteristic: and it is more of Scott than of his printer; for Ballantyne, with all his reverence and found worship of his benefactor, was an undoubting adherent to the decision of the public, or rather of the book-buying public, and among the many absurdities into which his reverence for the popedom of Paternoster-Row led him, I never recollect to consider with special astonishment, the facility with which he seemed to have adopted the notion that the Byron of the day was really entitled to supplant Scott as a popular poet. In his depreciating, as no man of his talents could fail to do, the merits of the glow and depth of Childe Harold, he always appeared to be blind to the fact that in the Giaour, the Bride of the West, Parisina, and indeed, in all his early narratives, Byron had at least half his success to imitation of Scott, and the other share of the rest to the lavish use of materials which he never employed, only because his genius was under ance of high feelings of moral rectitude. All this Lord Byron himself seems to have felt most completely: witness his letters and diaries; and I think I see many symptoms that both the decision of the million, and its index, "the decision of the book-sellers," tend the same way at present.

If January brought "disappointment," there was abundant consolation in store for February 1815. Guy Mannering was received with eager curiosity, and pronounced by acclamation fully worthy to share the honours of Waverley. The easy transparent flow of its style; the beautiful simplicity, and here and there the wild solemn magnificence of its sketches of scenery; the rapid, ever heightening interest of the narrative; the unaffected kindness of feeling, the manly purity of thought, everywhere mingled with a gentle humour and a homely sagacity; but, above all, the rich variety and skilful contrast of characters and manners at once fresh in fiction, and stamped with the unforgeable seal of truth and nature; these were charms that spoke to every heart and mind; and the few murmurs of pedantic criticism were lost in the voice of general delight, which never fails to welcome the invention that introduces to the sympathy of imagination a new group of immortal realities.

The first edition was, like that of Waverley, in three little volumes, with a humility of paper and printing which the meanest novelist would now disdain to imitate; the price a guinea. The 2000 copies of which it consisted were sold the day after the publication; and within three months came a second and a third impression, making together 5000 copies more. Of the subsequent vogue it is needless to speak.

On the rising of the Court of Session in March, Scott went by sea to London with his wife and their eldest girl. Six years had elapsed since he last appeared in the metropolis; and brilliant as his reception had then been, it was still more so on the present occasion. Scotland had been visited in the interim, chiefly from the interest excited by his writings, by crowds of the English nobility, most of whom had found introduction to his personal acquaintance — not a few had partaken of his hospitality at Ashestiel or Abbotsford. The generation among whom, I presume, a genius of this order feels his own influence with the proudest and sweetest confidence — on whose fresh minds and ears he has himself made the first indelible impressions — the generation with whose earliest romance of the heart and fancy his idea had been blended, was now grown to the full stature; the success of these recent novels, seen on every table, the subject of every conversation, had, with those who did not doubt their parentage, far more than weighed his declination, dubious after all, in the poe-ance; while the mystery that hung over them quod curiosity of the hesitating and conjecturing many name on which ever and anon some new circumstan-lated stronger suspicion, loomed larger through the which he had thought fit to envelop it. Moreover, the period of high national pride and excitement. At such Prince and people were well prepared to hail him, and perhaps than any other master of the pen, had could sustain the spirit of England throughout the struggle, was as yet supposed to have been terminated on the Toulouse. "Thank Heaven you are coming at last."

Baillie had written a month or two before. "Make mind to be stared at only a little less than the Czar of or old Blücher."

And now took place James Ballantyne's "mighty re-tion of the meeting of the two bards." "Report," says to Moore, "had prepared me to meet a man of peculiar and a quick temper, and I had some doubts whether likely to suit each other in society. I was most agree-appointed in this respect. I found Lord Byron in the degree courteous, and even kind. We met for an hour almost daily, in Mr. Murray's drawing room, and found deal to say to each other. We also met frequently in and evening society, so that for about two months I advantage of a considerable intimacy with this dis-individual. Our sentiments agreed a good deal, except the subjects of religion and politics, upon neither of was inclined to believe that Lord Byron entertained opinions. I remember saying to him, that I really thought if he lived a few years he would alter his sentiments.
swerved, rather sharply. — 'I suppose you are one of the prophesy I shall turn Methodist.' I replied — 'No, I expect your conversion to be of such an ordinary kind.
rather look to see you retreat upon the Catholic faith.
tinguish yourself by the austerity of your penance.' I gravely, and seemed to allow I might be right. Often he used sometimes to express a high strain of what called Liberalism; but it appeared to me that the afforded him, as a vehicle for displaying his wit and against individuals in office, was at the bottom of the thinking, rather than any real conviction of the principles on which he talked. He was certainly proud rank and ancient family, and, in that respect, as much an aristocrat as was consistent with good sense and good breeding. Some disquinta, how adopted I know not, seemed to me to have given this peculiar and (as it appeared to me) contradictory cast of mind; but, at heart, I would have termed Byron a patrician on principle. . . . Lord Byron's reading did not seem to me to have been very extensive, either in poetry or history. Having the advantage of him in that respect, and possessing a good competent share of such reading as is little read, I was sometimes able to put under his eye objects which had for him the interest of novelty. I remember particularly repeating to him the fine poem of Hardyknute, an imitation of the old Scottish ballad, with which he was so much affected, that some one who was in the same apartment asked me what I could possibly have been telling Byron by which he was so much agitated. . . . Like the old heroes in Homer, we exchanged gifts. I gave Byron a beautiful dagger mounted with gold, which had been the property of the redoubted Elli Bey. But I was to play the part of Diomed in the Iliad, for Byron sent me, some time after, a large sepulchral vase of silver. It was full of dead men's bones, and had inscriptions on two sides of the base. One ran thus: 'The bones contained in this urn were found in certain ancient sepulchres within the long walls of Athens, in the month of February 1811.' The other lace bears the lines of Juvenal — Expendite quot libras in duce summo invenies? Mors sola fatetur quantum sint hominum corpuscula. To these I have added a third inscription, in these words — 'The gift of Lord Byron to Walter Scott.' There was a letter with this vase, more valuable to me than the gift itself, from the kindness with which the donor expressed himself towards me. I left it naturally in the urn with the bones; but it is now missing. As the theft was not of a nature to be practised by a mere domestic, I am compelled to suspect the inhospitality of some individual of higher station, most gratuitously exercised certainly, since, after what I have here said, no one will probably choose to boast of possessing this literary curiosity. We had a good deal of laughing, I remember, on what the public might be supposed to think, or say, concerning the gloomy and ominous nature of our mutual gifts. He was often melancholy — almost gloomy. When I observed him in this humour, I used either to wait till it went off of its own accord, or till some natural and easy mode occurred of leading him into conversation, when the shadows almost always left his countenance, like the mist rising from a landscape. In conversation, he was un-mated. . . . I think I also remarked in his temper suspicion, when he seemed to pause and consider there had not been a secret, and perhaps offensive, in something casually said to him. In this case I did it best to let his mind, like a troubled spring, work its which it did in a minute or two. I was considerably you will recollect, than my noble friend, and had to fear his misconstruing my sentiments towards him.

I ever the slightest reason to doubt that they were turned on his part. If I had occasion to be mortified display of genius which threw into the shade each part as I was then supposed to possess, I might conclude that, in my own case, the materials of mental happiness had been mingled in a greater proportion. . . . I have continued to think that a crisis of life was arrived, in new career of fame was opened to him, and that he permitted to start upon it, he would have obliterated the memory of such parts of his life as friends would wish to

It was also in the spring of 1815 that Scott had, for the first time, the honour of being presented to the Prince Regent by the Royal Highness, on reading his Edinburgh Address, to William Dundas, that "Walter Scott's charming about the laureateship made him doubly desirous of seeing him at Carlton House;" and there had been other means of introducing him to the Prince's librarian. On hearing from Mr. Croker (Secretary to the Admiralty) that Scott was to be in London in the middle of March, the Prince said — "Let me know when he comes, and I'll get up a snug little dinner that will do him good;" and, after he had been presented and graciously received at the levee, he was invited to dinner afterwards through his excellent friend Mr. Adam (afterwards Lord Commissioner of the Jury Court in Scotland,¹ who at that time held a confidential office in the royal household). The Prince had consulted with Mr. Adam also as to the composition of the party. "Let us have," said he, "just a few friends of —and the more Scotch the better;" and both the Commissioner and Mr. Croker assure me that the party

¹ This most amiable and venerable gentleman, my dear friend, died at Edinburgh on the 17th February 1839, in the 80th year of his age. He retained his strong mental faculties in their full vigour to the last days of this long life, and with them the warmth of feelings which had endeared him to all who were so happy as to have the opportunity of knowing him — to none more than Scott.

most interesting and agreeable one in their recollection. It comprised, I believe, the Duke of York—the late Duke of Gordon (then Marquess of Huntly), the late Marquess of Hertford (then Lord Yarmouth), the Earl of Fife, and Scott's early friend Lord Melville. "The Prince and Scott," says Mr. Croker, "were the two most brilliant story-tellers in their several ways, that I have ever happened to meet; they were both aware of their forte, and both exerted them selves that evening with delightful effect. On going home, I really could not decide which of them had shone the most. The Regent was enchanted with Scott, as Scott with him; and on all his subsequent visits to London, he was a frequent guest at the royal table." The Lord Chief Commissioner remembers that the Prince was particularly delighted with the poet's anecdotes of the old Scotch judges and lawyers, which his Royal Highness sometimes capped by ludicrous traits of certain eminent sages of his own acquaintance. Scott told, among others, a story which he was fond of telling; and the commentary of his Royal Highness on hearing it amused Scott, who often mentioned it afterwards. The anecdote is thus:—A certain Judge, whenever he went on a particular circuit, was in the habit of visiting a gentleman of good fortune in the neighbourhood of one of the unizive towns, and staying at least one night, which, being both of them ardent chess players, they usually concluded with their favourite game. One Spring circuit the battle was not decided at day break, so the Judge said—"Weel, Donald, I must e'en come back this gate in the harvest, and let the game lie ower for the present;" and back he came in October, but not to his old friend's hospitable house; for that gentleman had in the interim been apprehended on a capital charge (of forgery), and his name stood on the Partisans Roll, or list of those who were about to be tried under his former guest's auspices. The laird was indicted and tried accordingly, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty. The Judge forthwith put on his cocked hat (which answers to the black cap in England), and pronounced the sentence of the law in the usual terms—"To be hanged by the neck until you be dead; and may the Lord have mercy upon your unhappy soul!" Having concluded this awful formula in his most somorous eudence, the Judge, dismounting his formidable beaver, gave a familiar nod to his unfortunate acquaintance, and said to him in a sort of chuckling whisper—"And now, Donald, my man, I think I've checkmated you for anee." The Regent laughed heartily at this specimen of judicial humour; and "I' faith, Walter," said he, "this old big-wig seems to have taken things as coolly as my tyrannical self. Don't you remember Tom Moore's description of me at breakfast—

‘The table spread with tea and toast,
Death-warrants and the Morning Post’ ? ”

Towards midnight, the Prince called for “a bumper, with all the honours, to the Author of Waverley,” and looked significantly, as he was charging his own glass, to Scott. Scott seemed somewhat puzzled for a moment, but instantly recovering himself, and filling his glass to the brim, said, “Your Royal Highness looks as if you thought I had some claim to the honours of this toast. I have no such pretensions, but shall take good care that the real Simon Pure hears of the high compliment that has now been paid him.” He then drank off his claret, and joined in the cheering, which the Prince himself timed. But before the company could resume their seats, his Royal Highness exclaimed—“Another of the same, if you please, to the Author of Marmion—and now, Walter, my man, I've checkmated you for ance.” The second bumper was followed by cheers still more prolonged: and Scott then rose and returned thanks in a short address, which struck the Lord Chief Commissioner as “alike grave and graceful.” This story has been circulated in a very perverted shape. I now give it on the authority of my venerated friend.—He adds, that having occasion, the day after, to call on the Duke of York, his Royal Highness said to him—“Upon my word, Adam, my brother went rather too near the wind about Waverley—but nobody could have turned the thing more prettily than Walter Scott did—and upon the whole I never had better fun.”¹

The Regent, as was his custom with those he most delighted to honour, uniformly addressed the poet, even at their first dinner, by his Christian name, “Walter.”

Before he left town, he again dined at Carlton House, when the party was a still smaller one than before, and the merriment, if possible, still more free. That nothing might be ¹ Since this narrative was first published, I have been told by two gentlemen who were at this dinner, that, according to their recollection, the Prince did not on that occasion run “so near the wind” as my text represents: and I am inclined to believe that a subsequent scene may have been unconsciously blended with a gentler rehearsal. The Chief Commissioner had promised to revise my sheets for the second edition; but alas! he never did so—and I must now leave the matter as it stands.

wanting, the Prince sung several capital songs in the course of that evening: — as witness the lines in Sultan Scandalib —

“ I love a Prince will bid the bottle pass, Exchanging with his subjects glance and glass;
In fitting time can, rayer of the gay,
Keep up the jest and mingle in the lay,
Such Monarchia beat our freeborn humour suit,
But despots must be stately, stern, and mute.”

Before he returned to Edinburgh, on the 22d of May, the Regent sent him a gold snuff box, set in brilliants, with a medallion of his Royal Highness's head on the lid, “as a testimony” (writes Mr. Adams, in transmitting it) “of the high opinion his Royal Highness entertains of your genius and merit.”

I transcribe what follows from James Ballantyne's Memoirs: — “After Mr. Scott's first interview with his Sovereign, one or two intimate friends took the liberty of inquiring, what judgment he had formed of the Regent's talents? He declined giving any definite answer — but repeated, that ‘he was the first gentleman he had seen — certainly the first English gentleman of his day; — there was something about him which, independently of the prestige, the “divinity, which hedges a King,” marked him as standing entirely by himself; but as to his abilities, spoken of as distinct from his charming manners, how could any one form a fair judgment of that man who introduced whatever subject he chose, discussed it just as long as he chose, and dismissed it when he chose?” — Ballantyne adds — “What I have now to say is more important, not only in itself, but as it will enable you to give a final contradiction to an impudens report which has been in circulation; viz. that the Regent asked him as to the authorship of Waverley, and received a distinct and solemn denial. I took the bold freedom of requesting to know from him whether his Royal Highness had questioned him on that subject, and what had been his answer. He glanced at me with a look of wild surprise, and said — ‘What answer I might have made to such a question, put to me by my Sovereign, perhaps I do not, or rather perhaps I do, know; but I was never put to the test. He is far too well bred a man ever to put so ill-bred a question.’”

During his brief residence in London, Scott lost his dear friend George Ellis — which threw a heavy cloud over a bright sky. — But the public events of the time must alone have been sufficient to keep him in a state of fervid excitement. On his return to the North, Napoleon had been full of glory, and the allied forces were fast assembling in the West. His official duties compelled him to defer once more his anxiety for "a peep at Wellington and his merry men," until the fate of Europe had been decided at Waterloo. His friends were well aware of his resolution to visit the Continent as soon as the session was over; and he very kindly acceded to the proposal of three young neighbours of Tweeddale, who were eager to make the excursion in his society.

With these gentlemen, Alexander Pringle of Glasgow (since M.P. for Selkirkshire), Robert Bruce (now Lord of Argyle), and his kinsman, the late accomplished General of Gala, he left Edinburgh accordingly on the 2d of August. They travelled by the stage coach, and took the route by the bridge; for Gala and Whythank, both members of the Society, were desirous of showing its architecture to the best advantage. After this wish had been gratified, they proceeded on their journey. "The weather was beautiful," says Gala, "so we sat on the side of the coach. At starting, there was a general conversation on the subject of the late celebrated bishop of my Alma Mater; our friend, Whythank, was in great glee, and never was a merrier basket than he all the morning. He had cautioned us, on leaving Edinburgh, never to name names in such situations, and our adherence to this rule was rewarded by some amusing incidents. One day, for example, as we entered the town where we were to dine, a looking man, who was to stop there, took occasion to compliment Scott for the pleasure his anecdotes afforded him: 'a good memory, sir,' said he: 'mayhap, now, you will write down what you hear or be a-reading about me.' I answered, very gravely, that he did occasionally put me down in my notes, if anything struck him particularly. In the evening it happened that he sat on the box, while the rest of us sat behind him. Here, by degrees, he became absorbed in his own reflexions. He frequently repeated to himself, and perhaps, for a good while, and often smiled or raised his eyes, seeming completely occupied and amused. His conversation was vastly scientific and rather grave professor, in a Benjamin and broad-brimmed beaver, cast many a long glance at him, evidently suspecting that all was not as it appeared with the upper story, but preserved perfect politeness. The poet was, however, discovered by the captain of the boat, which we crossed to Helvoetaluys; and a perilous was, chiefly in consequence of the increasing tumblers in which this worthy kept drinking his health."

Before Scott reached Harwich, he received Constable's acceptance of an offer to compose, during the journey, a series of sketches, which he undertook to have ready for publication "by the second week of September", and thenceforth he threw his daily letters to his wife into the form of communications meant for an imaginary group, consisting of a spinster sister, a statistical hand, a rural clergyman of the Presbyterian Kirk, and a brother, a veteran officer on half pay. The rank of this last personage corresponded, however, exactly with that of his own elder brother, John Scott, who also, like the Major of the book, had served in the Duke of York's unfortunate campaign of 1797; the sister is only a slender disguise for his aunt Christian Rutherford, already often mentioned; Lord Somerville, long President of the Board of Agriculture, was Paul's laird; and the shrewd and unbigoted Dr. Douglas of Galashiels was his "minister of the gospel." These epistles, after having been devoured by the little circle at Abbotstord, were transmitted to Major John Scott, his mother, and Miss Rutherford, in Edinburgh; from their hands they passed to those of James Ballantyne and Mr. Erskine, both of whom assured me that the copy ultimately sent to the press consisted, in great part, of the identical sheets that had successively reached Melrose through the post. The rest had of course been, as Ballantyne expresses it, "somewhat cobbled"; but, on the whole, Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk are to be considered as a true and faithful journal of this expedition. The kindest of husbands and fathers never portrayed himself with more unaffected truth than in this vain effort, if such he really fancied he was making, to sustain the character of "a cross old bachelor." The whole man, just as he was, breathes in every line, with all his compassionate and benevolent sympathy of heart, all his sharpness of observation, and sober shrewdness of reflexion; all his enthusiasm for nature, for country life, for simple manners and simple pleasures, mixed up with an equally glowing enthusiasm, at which many may smile, for the finest relics of feudal antiquity — and last, not least, a pulse of physical rapture for the "circumstance of war," which bears witness to the blood of Boltfoot and Fire-the-Braes. I shall not trespass on the reader of that delightful record, except by a few particulars which I owe to the juniors of the party.

Paul modestly acknowledges in his last letter, the personal attentions which he received, while in Paris, from Lords Cathcart, Aberdeen, and Castlereagh; and hints that, thro' intervention, he had witnessed several of the splendors given by the Duke of Wellington, where he saw crowned heads of Europe grouped among the gallant who had cut a way for them to the guilty capital of Scotland. Scott's reception, however, had been distinguished to which Paul's language gives no notion. The Scotch above named welcomed him with cordial satisfaction. The Duke of Wellington, to whom he was first presented by John Malcolm, treated him then, and ever afterwards with a kindness and confidence, which, I have often heard he considered as "the highest distinction of his life." He used to tell, with great effect, the circumstances of his introduction to the Emperor Alexander, at a dinner given by the Earl of Cathcart. Scott appeared, on that occasion in blue and red dress of the Selkirkshire Lieutenant-General, the Czar's first question, glancing at his lameness, was, "what affair were you wounded?" Scott signified he suffered from a natural infirmity; upon which the Emperor said, "I thought Lord Cathcart mentioned that you had served." Scott observed that the Earl looked a little embarrassed at this, and promptly answered, "O yes; in a sense I have served—that is, in the yeomanry of the home force resembling the Landwehr, or Landwehr." "Under what commander?" — "Sous-Major Chevalier." "Were you ever engaged?" — "In some slight action, as the battle of the Cross Causeway and the affair of the Mill." — "This," says Mr. Pringle of Whythbank, "was seen in Lord Cathcart's face, quite sufficient, so he returned the conversation to some other subject." It was at the same dinner that he first met Platoff,¹ who seemed to have a great fancy to him, though, adds my friend, "I do not think they had any common language to converse in." One day, however, when Pringle and Scott were walking in the Rue de la Paix, the Hetman happened to be cantering with some of his Cossacks; as soon as he saw them he jumped off his horse, leaving it to the Pulk, and up to him, kissed him on each side of the cheek with extraordinary demonstrations of affection, and then made him understand, through an aide de camp, that he wished him to join his staff at the next great review, when he would take care to mount him on the gentlest of his Ukraine horses.

¹ Scott acknowledges, in a note to St. Roman's Well (vol. 1 p. 10) he took from Platoff this portrait of Mr. Touchwood — "His face, at the distance of a yard or two seemed hale and smooth, appeared, on close examination, to be seamed with a million of wrinkles, creases, and other in every direction possible, but as fine as if drawn by the very fine needle." Thus did every little peculiarity remain to his memory, to be used in due time for giving the air of minutely some imaginary personage.

It will seem less surprising that Scott should have been honoured with much attention by the leading soldiers and statesmen of Germany then in Paris. The fame of his poetry had already been established for some years in that country. Yet it may be doubted whether Blücher had heard of Marmion any more than Platoff; and old Blücher struck Scott's fellow-travellers as taking more interest in him than any foreign general, except only the Hetman.

A striking passage in Paul's tenth letter indicates the high notion which Scott had formed of the personal qualities of the Prince of Orange. After depicting, with almost prophetic accuracy, the dangers to which the then recent union of Holland and Belgium must be exposed, he concludes with expressing his hope that the firmness and sagacity of the King of the Netherlands, and the admiration which his heir's character and bearing had already excited among all, even Belgian observers, might ultimately prove effective in redeeming this difficult experiment from the usual failure of "arrondissements, indemnities, and all the other terms of modern date, under sanction of which cities and districts, and even kingdoms, have been passed from one government to another, as the property of lands or stock is transferred by a bargain between private parties."

It is not less curious to compare, with the subsequent course of affairs in France, the following brief hint in Paul's 16th letter:—"The general rallying point of the Liberalistes is an avowed dislike to the present monarch and his immediate connexions. They will sacrifice, they pretend, so much to the general inclinations of Europe, as to select a king from the Bourbon race; but he must be one of their own choosing, and the Duke of Orleans is most familiar in their mouths." Thus, in its very bud, had his eye detected the conjuratiön de quinze ans!

As yet, the literary reputation of Scott had made but little way among the French nation; but some few of their eminent men vied even with the enthusiastic Germans in their courteous and unwearied attentions to him. The venerable Chevalier, in particular, seemed anxious to embrace every opportunity of acting as his cicerone; and many mornings were spent in exploring, under his guidance, the most remarkable scenes and objects of historical and antiquarian interest both in its neighbourhood. He several times also entertained and his young companions at dinner; but the last dinner was thoroughly poisoned by a preliminary canard. The poet, on entering the saloon, was presented to a man whose physiognomy struck him as the most hideous ever seen; nor was his disgust lessened, when he a few minutes afterwards, that he had undergone the same fate as the "David" of the blood-stained brush."

From Paris, Mr. Bruce and Mr. Pangle went on to London, leaving the Poet and Gala to return home together, they did by way of Dieppe, Brighton, and London, where, on the 11th of September, that Scott had been dining with Byron. He carried his young friend in the evening to call on Lord Byron, who agreed to dine with them at the hotel, where he met also Charles Mathews and D. G. Gala has recorded it in his note-book as the most interesting day he ever spent. "How I did stare," he says, "at Byron's beautiful pale face, like a spirit's—ago. But he was bitter—what a contrast to Scott! An anecdote of British prowess and spirit, Scott met a young gentleman——— had been awfully the head while conveying an order from the Duke, staggered on, and delivered his message when at the death. 'Ha!' said Byron, 'I daresay he could do most people without his head—it was never of use to him.' Waterloo did not delight him, probably he could talk or think of scarcely anything else."

Mathews accompanied them as far as Warwickworth, both of which castles the poet had seen and now re-examined with particular curiosity. The next night at Sheffield; and early next morning Scott went to provide himself with a planter's knife of the most ingenious contrivance and finished workmanship. Having it put to his mind, and which for many years after was his pocket-companion, he wrote his name on a card "John Scott, Abbotsford," and directed it to be engraved on the handle. On his mentioning this acquisition at London, young Gala expressed his desire to equip himself in the same manner, and was directed to the shop accordingly. When he purchased a similar knife, and produced his name on the card to the engraver, the master cutler eyed the signature for a moment, and exclaimed—"John Scott of Abbotsford, I hope your ticket may serve me in as good stead as a Scott's has just done. Upon my word, one of my best men, an honest fellow from the North, went out of his senses when he saw it—he offered me a week's work if I would let him keep it to himself—and I took Saunders at his word." Scott used to talk of this as one of the most gratifying compliments he ever received in his literary capacity.

In a letter to Morritt, he says,—"We visited Corby Castle on our return to Scotland, which remains, in point of situation, as beautiful as when its walks were celebrated by David Hume, in the only rhyme he was ever known to be guilty of. Here they are, from a pane of glass in an inn at Carlisle:

* Here chicks in eggs for breakfast sprawl,
Here goddess love God's glories squall,
Here Scotchmen's hands do guard the wall,
But Corby's walks above for all.'

Would it not be a good quiz to advertise The Poetical Works of David Hume, with notes, critical, historical, and so forth—with an historical inquiry into the use of eggs for breakfast; a physical discussion on the causes of their being addled; a history of the English Church music, and of the choir of Carlisle in particular; a full account of the affair of 1715, with the trials, last speeches, and so forth of the poor *plaid*s who were strapped up at Carlisle; and lastly, a full and particular description of Corby, with the genealogy of every family who ever possessed it? I think, even without more than the usual waste of margin, the Poems of David would make a decent twelve shilling touch. I shall think about it when I have exhausted mine own century of inventions."

Reaching Abbotsford, Scott found with his family his old friend Mr. Skene of Rubislaw, who had expected him to come home sooner, and James Ballantyne, who had arrived with a copious budget of bills, calenders, booksellers' letters, and proof-sheets. From each of these visitors' memoranda I now extract an anecdote. Mr. Skene's is of a small enough matter, but still it places the man so completely before myself, that I am glad he thought it worth setting down. "During Scott's absence," says his friend, "his wife had had the tiny drawing-room of the cottage fitted up with new chintz furniture—everything had been set out in the best style—and she and her girls had been looking forward to the pleasure which they supposed the little surprise of the arrangements would give him. He was received in the spruce fresh room, set himself comfortably down in the chair prepared for him, and remained in the full enjoyment of his own fireside, and a return to his family without the least consciousness that any change had taken place until, at length, Mrs. Scott's patience could hold out no longer, and his attention was expressly called to it. "The vessel shewed at having caused such a disappointment, as was as amiably characteristic as—and in the course of the evening he every now and then threw out some word of admiration to reconsole mamma."

Ballantyne's note of their next morning's conference is in these terms: "He had just been reviewing a page of emperors and kings, which seemed, like another Cloth of Gold, to have been got up to realize before some of his own splendid descriptions. I begged him to tell me what was the general impression left on his mind, and he answered, that he might now say he had seen and felt, with all classes of society, from the palace to the cottage, including every conceivable shade of science and art, but that he had never felt awed or abashed except in the presence of one man—the Duke of Wellington. I expressed my surprise. He said I ought not, for that the Duke of Wellington possessed every one mighty quality of the mind in a degree than any other man did, or had ever done. He beheld in him a great soldier and a great statesman, the greatest of each. When it was suggested that this was on his part, saw before him a great poet and novelist, he smiled, and said, 'What would the Duke of Wellington give for a few bits of novels, which perhaps he had never read, for which the strong probability is that he would not give sixpence if he had?' You are not," adds Ballantyne, "to suppose that he looked sheepish or embarrassed in the presence of the Duke—indeed you well know that he did not could not do so; but the feeling, qualified and modified as it may have described it, unquestionably did exist to a certain extent. Its origin forms a curious moral problem; and may be traced to a secret consciousness, which he might not advert to, that the Duke, however great as a soldier and a statesman, was so defective in imagination as to be incapable of appreciating that which had formed the charm of his own works as well as of his works."¹

¹ It is proper to add to Mr. Ballantyne's solution of his moral problem," that he was in his latter days a strenuous opponent of the Duke of Wellington's politics; to which circumstance he alludes in these same memoranda, the only coolness that ever occurred between him and Scott. I think it very probable that Scott had his own

Two years after this time, when Mr. Washington Irving visited Scott, he walked with him to a quarry, where his people were at work. "The face of the humblest dependent," he says, "brightened at his approach — all paused from their labour to have a pleasant 'crack wi' the laird.'" Among the rest was a tall straight old fellow, with a healthful complexion and silver hairs, and a small round-crowned white hat. He had been about to shoulder a hod, but paused, and stood looking at Scott with a slight sparkling of his blue eye as if waiting his turn; for the old fellow knew he was a favourite. Scott accosted him in an affable tone, and asked for a pinch of snuff. The old man drew forth a horn snuff-box. 'Hoot man,' said Scott, 'not that old mull. Where's the bonnie French one that I brought you from Paris?' 'Troth, your honour,' replied the old fellow, 'sic a mull as that is nae for week-days.' On leaving the quarry, Scott informed me, that, when absent at Paris, he had purchased several trifling articles as presents for his dependents, and, among others, the gay snuff-box in question, which was so carefully reserved for Sundays by the veteran. 'It was not so much the value of the gifts,' said he, 'that pleased them, as the idea that the laird should think of them when so far away.' "

One more incident of this return — it was told to me by himself, some years afterwards, with gravity, and even sadness. "The last of my chargers," he said, "was a high-spirited and very handsome one, by name Daisy, all over white, without a speck, and with such a mane as Rubens delighted to paint. He had, among other good qualities, one always particularly valuable in my case, that of standing like a rock to be mounted. When he was brought to the door, after I came home from the Continent, instead of signifying, by the usual tokens, that he was pleased to see his master, he looked askant at me like a devil; and when I put my foot in the stirrup, he reared bolt upright, and I fell to the ground rather awkwardly. The ex-view with the Duke in his mind when he described the introduction of Roland Græme to the Regent Murray in the Abbot: — "Such was the personage before whom Roland Graham now presented himself with a feeling of breathless awe, very different from the usual boldness and vivacity of his temper. In fact he was, from education and nature, much more easily controlled by the moral superiority arising from the elevated talents and renown of those with whom he conversed, than by pretensions founded only on rank or external show. He might have braved with indifference the presence of an Earl merely distinguished by his belt and coronet; but he felt overawed in that of the eminent soldier and statesman, the wielder of a nation's power, and the leader of her armies."

result. It occurred to me that he might have taken a serious dislike to my dress; and Tom Pardee, who adhered to the white hat and green jacket, and so forth, Scott has made me discard a set of garments, was to try whether these habiliments would produce him reception from his old friend Daisy — but Daisy all to back him with all manner of gentleness. The inexplicable — but he had certainly taken some part in high dudgeon and disgust, and after trying for at the interval of a week, I was obliged to part with and wars and rumours of wars being over, I ready forth to have done with such dainty blood — I now good sober cob." Somebody suggested, that Daisy considered himself as ill used, by being left at home. Laird went on his journey. "Ay," said he, "these have many thoughts of their own, no doubt, that we penetrate." Then laughing, "Troth," said he, "my bird had whispered Daisy that I had been to see reviews at Paris on a little scrag of a Cossack, while gallant trooper was left behind bearing Peter and the to Melrose."

Scott had written verse as well as prose during his life. The Field of Waterloo was published before the October; the profits of the first edition being his contribution to the fund raised for the relief of the widows and children of the soldiers slain in the battle. This piece appeared disappointed those most disposed to sympathise with the author's views and feelings. The descent is indeed from his Bannockburn to his Waterloo: the present but visible reality of what his dreams cherished, soon overawed his imagination, and tamed it into a weak power of movement. The burst of pure native enthusiasm in Scottish heroes that fell around the Duke of Wellington, bears, however, the broadest marks of the Minstrel : —

— — — "Saw gallant Miller's fading eye
Still bent where Albion's standards fly,
And Cameron, in the shock of steel, Die like the offspring of Lochiel," &c. ; — and this is far from being the only redeeming passage in the poem was the first upon a subject likely to be so hackneyed; and, having the advantage of coming in a small cheap form — (prudently imitated from Murray

tion with the tales of Byron, which was the death-blow to the system of verse in quatrains—it attained rapidly a measure of circulation above what had been reached either by Rokeby or the Lord of the Isles.

Meanwhile the revision of Paul's Letter was proceeding; and Scott had almost immediately on his return concluded his bargain for the first edition of a third novel—The Antiquary, nor was it much later that he completed a brief, but interesting negotiation with another baronet lord, and made a present to Miss Balguy, dated Nov. 12, 1794. "My eldest son, a very bold horseman and a fine shot, though only about fourteen years old—I assure you I was provider of the first blackcock he killed, than I have been of anything whatever since I first killed one myself, and that not only years ago—This is all stupid gossip, but, as Mr. de Courpal, Nyon says, 'things must be as they may'—you cannot expect scraps from Thomas, or much amusement from a brain bewildered with thorn hedges at Kaenside, for such is the somewhat title of my new possession, in virtue of which I subscribe myself,

ANDREW D. BARON."

His pride in the young hero of Robinson and Rokeby was much gratified about this time, on occasion of a domestic football match near Edinburgh, held under the auspices of the Duke of Buccleuch on the famous field of Carterhaugh, the scene of Montrose's last battle. The combatants on one side were picked men of the town of Selkirk, duly marshalled and led by their Provost, on the other, yeomen and shepherds of the vale of Yarrow, at whose head marched the Duke's gay and good-humoured brother-in-law, Lord Home, well pleased with this festive mockery of old times, which would have been forgotten ages before but for the ballad so dear to the burghers,

*'Tis up for the Sutors of Selkirk,
And 'tis down for the Earl of Home*

His Lordship's lieutenant was James Hogg, now ranked among the tenants of Yarrow, and the muster being complete—to quote the Edinburgh newspaper of 15th December—"The ancient banner of the Buccleuch family, a curious and venerable relique, emblazoned with armorial bearings, and with the word Hellenstone, the ancient war-cry of the clan of Scott, was displayed, as on former occasions when the chief took the field in person, whether for the purpose of war or sport. The banner was delivered by Lady Ann Scott to Master Walter Scott, younger of Abbotsford, who attended suitably mounted and armed, and, riding over the field, displayed it to the sound of the war-pipes, and amid the acclamations of the assembled spectators, who could not be fewer than 2000 in number. That this singular renewal of an ancient military custom might not want poetical celebrity, verses were distributed among the spectators, composed for the occasion by Mr. Walter Scott and the Ettrick Shepherd. . . . The parties parted with equal honours, but, before they left the ground, the Sheriff threw up his hat, and in Lord Dalkeith's name and his own, challenged the Yarrow men, on the part of the Sutors, to a match to be played upon the first convenient opportunity." The newspaper then gives Scott's "Lifting of the Banner:" —

"Then up with the Banner! let forest winds fan her!
She has blazed over Ettrick eight ages and more;
In sport we'll attend her, in battle defend her,
With heart and with hand, like our Fathers before;"

—and that excellent ditty by Hogg, entitled "The Ettrick Garland to the Ancient Banner of the House of Buccleuch:" —

"All hail! memorial of the brave,
The liegemen's pride, the Border's awe!
May thy grey pennon never wave
On sterner field than Carterhaugh."

I have no doubt the Sheriff of the Forest was a prouder man, when he saw his boy ride about Carterhaugh with the pennon of Bellenden, than when Platoff mounted himself for the imperial review of the Champ de Mars.

Mr. Hogg in his Autobiography informs us that when the more distinguished part of the company assembled on the conclusion of the sport to dine at Bowhill, he was proceeding to place himself at a particular table — but the Sheriff seized his arm, told him that was reserved for the nobility, and seated him at an inferior board — "between himself and the Laird of Harden." "The fact is," says Hogg, "I am convinced he was sore afraid of my getting to be too great a favourite among the young ladies of Buccleuch!" Who can read this, and not be reminded of Sancho Panza and the Duchess? And, after all, he quite mistook what Scott had said to him; there was no high table for the nobility — but there was a side-table for the children, at which, when the Shepherd was about to seat himself, his friend probably whispered that it was reserved for the "little lords and ladies, and their playmates." — Hogg was incurable; if it had been otherwise, he must have been cured, for a little time at least, by some incidents of the preceding winter. He then, being as usual in pecuniary straits, projected a work, to be called "The Poetic Mirror," in which should appear some piece by each popular poet of the time, the whole to be edited by himself, and published for his benefit; and he addressed, accordingly, to his brother bards a circular petition for their best assistance. Scott — like Byron and most others — declined the proposition. His letter has not been preserved, but nobody can suspect that it was uncourteous. The Shepherd, however, took some phrase in high dudgeon, and penned an answer virulently insolent in spirit and in language, accusing him of base jealousy of his own genius. I am not sure whether it was on this or another occasion of the like sort, that James varied the usual formulas of epistolary composition, by beginning with "Damned Sir," and ending, "Believe me, Sir, yours with disgust, &c.;" but the performance was such that no intercourse took place for some weeks, or perhaps months, afterwards. The letter in which Hogg at length solicits a renewal of kindness, says nothing, it may be observed, of the circumstance which, according to his Autobiography, had caused him to repent of his suspicions. The fact was, that hearing, shortly after the receipt of the offensive epistle, that the Shepherd was confined to his lodgings, in an obscure alley of Edinburgh, by a dangerous illness, Scott called on a kind friend and protector of his, Mr. John Grieve (a hatter on the North Bridge), to make inquiries about him, and to offer to take on himself the expenses of the best medical attendance. He had, however, cautioned the worthy hatter that no hint of this offer must reach Hogg; and in consequence, it might perhaps be the Shepherd's feeling at the time that he should not, in addressing his life-long benefactor, betray any acquaintance with this recent interference on his behalf. There can be no doubt, however, that he obeyed the genuine dictates of his better nature when he penned this apologetic effusion: —

"Gabriel's Road, February 28, 1815.

"Mr. Scott, — I think it is great nonsense for two men who are friends at heart, and who ever must be so — indeed it is not in the nature of things that they can be otherwise — should be professed enemies.

"Mr. Grieve and Mr. Laidlaw, who were very severe on me, of them in the sale, for 6000 went off in the first six days; it is now at press again; which is very flattering to the unknown author." In a letter of the same date to Terry says — "It wants the romance of Waverley and the adroitness of Guy Mannering; and yet there is some salvation afforded for if a man will paint from nature, he will be likely to please those who are daily looking at it."

After a little pause of hesitation, it attained popularity inferior to Guy Mannering; and though the author was for a moment to have shared the doubts which he received from the countenance of James Ballantyne, it certainly was, in the estimation of his chief favourite among all his novels. Nor is it difficult to account for this preference, without laying any stress on the fact that, during a few short weeks, it was pretty commonly talked of as a falling off from its immediate predecessor, and that some minor critics re-echoed this in print. In point of view, there were many of its successors that had stronger claims on the parental instinct of protection. But the chief reason is, that although Scott's Introduction of 1830 represents him as pleased with fancying that, in the principal personage, he had embalmed a worthy friend of his boyish days, his antiquarian propensities, originating perhaps in the kindling impressions of George Constable of Wallace-Craigie, and fostered a little, at about as ductile a period, by those of old John of Eldin, and John Ramsay of Ochertyre, had by degrees developed themselves, that he could hardly, even when Antiquary was published, have scrupled about recognising a quaint caricature of the founder of Abbotsford Museum in the inimitable portraiture of the Laird of Monkbarons. The Descriptive Catalogue of that collection which he began towards the close of his life, but, alas! never finished, is entitled "Reliquiæ Trottosianæ — or the Gabions of the late John Oldbuck, Esq." But laying this, which might have been more than a good-humoured pleasantry, out of the question, there is assuredly no one of all his works on which more of his own early associations have left their image. Of these early associations, as his full-grown tastes were all the more keen, so his genius, in all its happiest efforts, was the "Immortalising Angel;" and when George Constable first expounded "Gabions" to the child that was to immortalise his name, they were either wandering hand in hand over the field, or the grass still grew rank upon the grave of Balmawhapple, sauntering on the beach where the Mucklebuckets of Plover pans dried their nets, singing

"Weel may the boatie row, and better may she speed, O weel may the boatie row that wins the bairns' bread" — or telling wild stories about cliff escapes and the funerals of shipwrecked fishermen.

Considered by itself, this novel seems to me to possess, almost throughout, in common with its two predecessors, a kind of simple unthought charm, which the subsequent works of the series hardly reached, save in occasional snatches: — like them it is, in all its humbler and softer scenes, the transcript of actual Scottish life, as observed by the man himself.

And I think it must also be allowed that he has nowhere displayed his highest art, that of skilful contrast, in greater perfection. Even the tragic romance of Waverley does not set off its MacWherries and Callum Begs better than the oddities of Jonathan Oldbuck and his circle are relieved, on the one hand by the stately gloom of the Glenallens, on the other by the stern affliction of the poor fisherman, who, when discovered repairing the "auld black hutch o' a boat" in which his boy had been lost, and congratulated by his visitor on being capable of the exertion, makes answer — "And what would you have me to do, unless I wanted to see four children starve, because one is drowned? It's weel wi' you gentles, that can sit in the house wi' handkerchers at your een, when ye lose a friend; but the like o' us mair to our work again, if our hearts were beating as hard as my hammer."

It may be worth noting, that it was in correcting the proof-sheets of this novel that Scott first took to equipping his chapters with mottoes of his own fabrication. On one occasion he happened to ask John Ballantyne, who was sitting by him, to hunt for a particular passage in Beaumont and Fletcher. John did as he was bid, but did not succeed in discovering the lines. "Hang it, Johnnie," cried Scott, "I believe I can make a motto sooner than you will find one." He did so accordingly; and from that hour, whenever memory failed to suggest an appropriate epigraph, he had recourse to the inexhaustible mines of "old play" or "old ballad," to which we owe some of the most exquisite verses that ever flowed from his pen.

Unlike, I believe, most men, whenever Scott neared the end of one composition, his spirit seems to have caught a new spring of buoyancy, and before the last sheet was sent from his desk, he had crowded his brain with the imagination of another fiction. The Antiquary was published, as we have seen, in May, but by the beginning of April he had already opened to the Ballantynes the plan of the first Ta Landlord; and — to say nothing of Harold the Dauntless which he began shortly after the Endal of Tinnem finished, and which he seems to have kept before him years as a congenial plaything, to be taken up when coach brought no proof-sheets to jog him as to serious — he had also, before this time, undertaken to write the historical department of the Register for 1814. He had collected the materials requisite for his historical sketch year distinguished for the importance and complexity of events; but these, he doubted not, would soon reach him; he felt no hesitation about pledging himself to complete only that sketch, but four new volumes of prose romance and his Harold the Dauntless also, at Ballantyne's request, in any suitable arrangement on that score — between the end of 1815 and the Christmas of 1816.

The Antiquary had been published by Constable, but we presume that, in addition to the usual stipulations, he had again, on that occasion, solicited to relieve John Ballantyne's stock to an extent which he did not find quite convenient at all events he had of late shewn a considerable reluctance to employ James Ballantyne and Co. as printers. One of these impediments is alluded to in this queer note — “Dear John, — I have seen the great swab, who is a glove, and will do ALL, which some interpret NOTHING ever, we shall do well enough. W. S.” “The great swab had been admitted, almost from the beginning, into the management of the Novels — and for that, among other reasons, it has been desirable for the Novelist to have him connected with the publisher without interruption; but Scott was led to think that if he were called upon to conclude a bargain for a new novel before the third had made its appearance, his attention to the matter of printing might at least protract the completion, and why Scott should have been urgently desirous that the transaction settled at once, is sufficiently explained by the fact, that though so much of Mr. John's old unfortunate stock still remained on hand — and with it some occasion of embarrassment of difficulty as to floating-bills must be expected — Mr. James Ballantyne's management of pecuniary affairs had not been very careful¹ — nevertheless, the sanguine man was gone on purchasing one patch of land after another, estate had already grown from 150 to nearly 1000 acres. The property all about his original farm had been in the hands of small holders (Scottish, cock birds); these were sharp enough to understand that their neighbour could with difficulty resist any temptation that might present itself in the shape of acres; and thus he proceeded buying up lot after lot of unimproved ground, at extravagant prices, his "appetite increasing by what it fed on;" while the excited yemen set themselves down elsewhere, to fatten at their leisure upon the profits — most commonly the anticipated profits — of "The Scotch Novels."

¹ In February 1816, when James Ballantyne married, it appears from letters in his handwriting that he owed to Scott more than £1000 personal debt.

He was ever and anon pulled up with a momentary misgiving, — and resolved that the latest acquisition should be the last, until he could get rid entirely of "John Ballantyne & Co." But, after the first and more serious embarrassments had been overcome, John was far from continuing to hold by his patron's anxiety for the total abolition of their unhappy copartnership. He, unless when some sudden emergency arose, flattered Scott's own gay imagination, by representing everything in the most smiling colours; and though Scott, in his replies, seldom failed to introduce some hint of caution — such as "Nullum nomen abest si sit prudentia" — he more and more took home to himself the agreeable cast of his Riolum's anticipations, and wrote to him in a vein as merry as his own — e.g. — "As for our stock,

" 'Twill be wearing awn', John,

Like saw-wreath when it's thaw, John," &c. &c. &c.

John could never have forgotten that it was to Constable alone that his firm had more than once owed its escape from dishonour; and he must have known that, after the triumphant career of the Waverley series had once commenced, nothing could have been more easy than to bring all the affairs of "back-stock, &c.," to a close, by entering into a distinct and candid treaty on that subject, in connexion with the future works of the great Novelist, either with Constable or with any other first-rate house in the trade: but he also knew that, were that unhappy firm wholly extinguished, he must himself subside into a clerk of the printing company. Therefore, in a word, he appears to have systematically disguised from Scott the extent to which the whole Ballantyne concern had been sustained by Constable — especially during his Hebridean tour of 1814, and his Continental one of 1815 — and prompted and enforced the idea of trying other booksellers from time to time, adhering to Constable, merely for the selfish purpose of facilitating the immediate discount of bills; so further perplexing Scott's affairs, the entire discontent, which would have been, as he fancied, prejudicial to personal importance.

It was resolved, accordingly, to offer the risk and loss of the first edition of another new novel—or rather of novels—to Mr. Murray of Albemarle Street, and Blackwood, who was then Murray's agent in Scotland; but at the same time resolved, partly because Scott wished to try another experiment on the public sagacity, but partly to avoid the question, from the wish to spare Constable's feelings, that the title-page of the Tales of my Landlord should not contain the magical words "by the Author of Waverley." The fact, which both Murray and Blackwood embraced such a course, as no untried novelist, being sane, could have dreamt of, in doing, shews that neither of them had any doubt as to the ability of the author. They both considered the withdrawal of the avowal on the forthcoming title-page as likely to ensure much the first success of the book; but they were determined to prevent Constable's acquiring a sort of prescriptive right to publish for the unrivalled novelist, and agreed to all terms, including a considerable burden of the endless "black-

Scott's intention originally was to give in the four volumes as many tales, each having its scene laid in a different part of Scotland; but this scheme was soon abandoned, and the series included only the two stories of the Black Dwarf and Old Mortality. When the former had been printed off, he shewed it to Gifford, who expressed some disapprobation to Blackwood, on hearing what the Quarterly critic thought of it. Gifford used to write to James Ballantyne, intimating his objection, and Ballantyne, likewise, that the Dwarf would be considered unworthy of the author: he said that the groundwork was excellent, but that the execution had been too rapid—the conclusion seemed to him very disappointing: and that if the author would recast the latter chapters, he (Mr. Ballantyne) would gladly take on himself the expense of cancelling the sheets. Scott, on receiving this communication, wrote to Ballantyne in terms of violent indignation, of which Blackwood had the sternest share apparently, but which I doubt chiefly stirred against the "coadjutor" referred to in the publisher's epistle. "Tell him and his coadjutor," said Scott, "that I belong to the Black Hussars of Literature, who give nor receive quarter. "I'll be cursed but this is the most impudent proposal that ever was made." Hallantyne translated this into courtly phrase for the eye of the parties — but Scott heard no more of preliminary criticism.

On the first of December, the Tales appeared, and notwithstanding the silence of the title page, the change of publishers, and the attempt which had certainly been made to vary the style both of delineation and of language, all doubts whether they were or were not from the same hand with Waverley had worn themselves out before the lapse of a week. On the 11th, the London publisher was unable to suppress his exultation, and addressed to Scott himself a letter concluding in these words:

— "Heber says there are only two men in the world — Walter Scott and Lord Byron. Between you, you have given existence to a third — ever your faithful servant, John Murray."

To this cordial effusion, Scott returned a dexterous answer. It was necessary, since he had resolved against compromising his incognito, that he should be prepared not only to repel the impertinent curiosity of strangers, but to evade the proffered congratulations of overflowing kindness. He contrived, however, to do so, on this and all similar occasions, in a style of equivocal which could never be seriously misunderstood. He says to Murray: — "I give you heartily joy of the success of the Tales, although I do not claim that paternal interest in them which my friends do me the credit to assign me. I assure you I have never read a volume of them until they were printed, and can only join with the rest of the world in applauding the true and striking portraits which they present of old Scottish manners. I do not expect implicit reliance to be placed on my disavowal, because I know very well that he who is disposed not to own a work must necessarily deny it, and that otherwise his secret would be at the mercy of all who choose to ask the question, since silence in such a case must always pass for consent, or rather assent. But I have a mode of convincing you that I am perfectly serious in my denial — pretty similar to that by which Solomon distinguished the fictitious from the real mother — and that is, by reviewing the work, which I take to be an operation equal to that of quartering the child. But this is only on condition I can have Mr. Fraking's assistance, who admires the work greatly more than I do, though I think the painting of the second Tale both true and powerful. The first Tale is not very original in its conception, and lame and impotent in its conclusion."

Murray, gladly embracing this offer of an article for his journal on the 'Tales of my Landlord, begged Scott to take a wider scope, and dropping all respect for the idea of a divided parentage, to place together any materials he might have for the illustration of the Scotch Novels in general. What Scott's original conception had been I know not; but the able biographer of John Knox, Dr. Mc'rie, had, in the meantime, considered the representation of the Covenanters, in the story of Old Mortality, as so unfair as to demand at his hands a very serious rebuke. The Doctor forthwith published, in a religious magazine, a set of papers, in which the historical foundations of that tale were attacked with indignant warmth; and Scott found the impression they were producing so strong, that he finally devoted a very large part of his article for the Quarterly to an elaborate defence of his own picture of the Covenanters.

The answer to Dr. Mc'rie, and the Introduction of 1830, have exhausted the historical materials on which he constructed his Old Mortality; and the origin of the Black Dwarf—as to the conclusion of which story he appears on reflexion to have adopted the opinion of honest Blackwood—has already been mentioned in an anecdote of his early wanderings. The latter Tale, however imperfect, and unworthy as a work of art to be placed high in the catalogue of his productions, derives a singular interest from its delineation of the dark feelings so often connected with physical deformity; feelings which appear to have diffused their shadow over the whole genius of Byron—and which, but for this single picture, we should hardly have conceived ever to have passed through Scott's happier mind. All the bitter blasphemy of spirit which, from infancy to the tomb, swelled up in Byron against the unkindness of nature; which sometimes perverted even his filial love into a sentiment of diabolical malignity; all this black and desolate train of reflexions must have been encountered and deliberately subdued by the manly parent of the Black Dwarf—Old Mortality, on the other hand, is remarkable as the novelist's first attempt to repeople the past by the power of imagination working on materials furnished by books. In Waverley he revived the fervid dreams of his boyhood, and drew, not from printed records, but from the artless oral narratives of his Invernaehyles. In Guy Mannering and the Antiquary he embodied characters and manners familiar to his own wandering youth. But whenever his letters mention Old Mortality in its progress, they represent him as strong in the confidence that the industry with which he had pored over a library of forgotten tracts would enable him to identify himself with the time in which they had birth, as completely as if he had listened with his own ears to the dismal sermons of Peden, ridden with Claverhouse and Dalzell in the rout of Bothwell, and been an advocate at the bar of the Privy Council when Lauderdale catechised and tortured the assassins of Archbishop Sharpe. To reproduce a departed age with such minute and life-like accuracy as this tale exhibits, demanded a far more energetic sympathy of imagination than had been called for in any effort of his serious verse. It is indeed most curiously instructive for any student of art to compare the Roundheads of Rokeby with the Bluebonnets of Old Mortality. For the rest—the story is framed with a deeper skill than any of the preceding novels; the canvas is a broader one; the characters are contrasted and projected with a power and felicity which neither he nor any other master ever surpassed; and notwithstanding all that has been urged against him as a disparager of the Covenanters, it is to me very doubtful whether the inspiration of romantic chivalry ever prompted him to nobler emotions than he has lavished on the reanimation of their stern and solemn enthusiasm. This work has always appeared to me the Marmion of his novels.

¹ Since I have mentioned this reviewal, I may express here my conviction, that Erskine, not Scott, was the author of the critical estimate of the Waverley novels which it embraces—although for the purpose of my stillification Scott had taken the trouble to transcribe the paragraphs in which that estimate is contained. At the same time I cannot but add that, had Scott really been the sole author of the article, he need not have incurred the severe censure which has been applied to his supposed conduct in the matter. After all, his judgment of his own works must have been allowed to be not above, but very far under the mark; and the whole affair would, I think, have been considered by every candid person exactly as the letter about Solomon and the rival mothers was by Murray, Gifford, and "the four o'clock visitors" of Albemarle Street—as a good joke. A better joke, certainly, than the allusion to the report of Thomas Scott being the author of Waverley, at the close of the paper, was never penned, and I think it includes a confession over which a misanthrope might have chuckled;—"We intended here to conclude this long article, when a strong report reached us of certain Transatlantic confessions, which, if genuine (though of this we know nothing), assign a different author to these volumes than the party suspected by our Scottish correspondents. Yet a critic may be excused seizing upon the nearest suspicious person, on the principle happily expressed by Claverhouse, in a letter to the Earl of Linlithgow. He had been, it seems, in search of a gifted weaver, who used to hold forth at conventicles; 'I sent for the webster (weaver), they brought in his brother for him; though he, may be, cannot preach like his brother, I doubt not but he is as well-principled as he, wherefore I thought it would be no great fault to give him the trouble to go to jail with the rest!'"—Miscell. Prose, xix. p. 86.

I have disclaimed the power of farther illustrating ical groundworks, but I am enabled by Mr. Train's to give some interesting additions to Scott's own this novel as a composition. The generous Supervisor him in Edinburgh in May 1816, a few days after the tion of the Antiquary, carrying with him a purse belonged to Rob Roy, and also a fresh heap of tr gleanings—among others some story by a Mr. "schoolmaster at the chiechan of Penningham." had facetiously signed his communication (Clashbon professional appellation derived," says Mr. Train, use of the birch, and by which he was usually among his companions, who assembled, not at the Inn of Gandereluech, but at the sign of the Should ton in Newton-Stewart." Scott (who already poss Roy's gun) received these gifts with benignity, and i friendly donor to breakfast next morning. He fou work in his library, and surveyed with enthusiastic the furniture of the room, especially its only picture, of Graham of Claverhouse. Train expressed the sur which every one who had known Dundee only in th the Presbyterian Annualists, must see for the first beautiful and melancholy visage, worthy of the mos dreams of romance. Scott replied, "that no characte so foully traduced as the Viscount of Dundee—the to Wodrow, Cruickshanks, and such chroniclers, he, every inch a soldier and a gentleman, still passed a Scottish vulgar for a ruffian desperado, who rode horse, was proof against shot, and in league with th "Might he not," said Mr. Train, "be made, in ge the hero of a national romance as interesting as either Wallace or Prince Charlie?" "He might," s "but your western zealots would require to be faith trayed in order to bring him out with the right effect what," resumed Train, "if the story were to be deliv from the mouth of Old Mortality? Would he not d as the Minstrel did in the Lay?" I think it certai this interview with Train we owe the framework of dereleuch Series, as well as the adoption of Clay period for one of its first fictions. It seems also prob we owe a further obligation to the Supervisor's pro of Rob Roy's spleuchan.

Within less than a month, the Black Dwarf and Ol ity were followed by "Harold the Dauntless, by the

the Bridal of Triermann." This poem had been, it appears, begun several years back; nay, part of it had been actually printed before the appearance of Childe Harold, though that circumstance had escaped the author's remembrance when he penned, in 1830, his Introduction to the Lord of the Isles; for he there says, "I am still astonished at my having committed the gross error of selecting the very name which Lord Byron had made so famous." The volume was published by Messrs. Constable, and had, in those booksellers' phrase, "considerable success." It has never, however, been placed on a level with Triermann; and though it contains many vigorous pictures, and splendid verses, and here and there some happy humour, the confusion and harsh transitions of the fable, and the dim rudeness of character and manners, seem sufficient to account for this inferiority in public favour. It is not surprising that the author should have redoubled his aversion to the notion of any more serious performances in verse. He had seized on an instrument of wider compass, and which, handled with whatever rapidity, seemed to reveal at every touch treasures that had hitherto slept unconsciously within him. He had thrown off his fetters, and might well go forth rejoicing in the native elasticity of his strength.

It is at least a curious coincidence in literary history, that as Cervantes, driven from the stage of Madrid by the success of Lope de Vega, threw himself into prose romance, and produced, at the moment when the world considered him as silenced for ever, the Don Quixote which has outlived Lope's two thousand triumphant dramas — so Scott, abandoning verse to Byron, should have rebounded from his fall by the only prose romances, which seem to be classed with the masterpiece of Spanish genius, by the general judgment of Europe.

CHAPTER IX.

Serious illness — Laidlaw settled at Kaoside and the Fergusley Burn — New House begun — Washington Irving — Rob Roy — and the Heart of Mid Lothian — Scott 1817-1818.

Nor to disturb the narrative of his literary progress have I deferred until now the mention of an attempt which Scott made during the winter of 1816-1817, to be present at the Clerk's table for one on the Bench of the Court of Exchequer. It had often occurred to me in my most prosperous years of his life, that such a situation would have suited him better in every respect than that which he held, and that his never attaining a promotion, in the eyes of the Scottish public would have considered so naturally of his character and services, reflected little honour on his allies. But at the period when I was entitled to be present at his table, he appeared to have made up his mind that the situation of Clerk of Session was more compatible than that of Judge with the habits of a literary man, who was constantly publishing, and whose writings were generally of a speculative order. I had also witnessed the zeal with which he seconded the views of more than one of his own friends, whose ambition was directed to the Exchequer. He remained, in short, ignorant that he ever had serious views of it for himself, until the ruin of his worldly prospects in 1826; nor had I any information that his wish to be present at the Duke of Buccleuch were placed in my hands after the Duke's death. The Duke's answers shew the warmest anxiety to be present at the distribution of Crown patronage, but refer to private matters, which rendered it impossible for me, with his Grace's feelings to interfere at the time. I incline to think, however, that the death of this nobleman, which soon terminated the influence of his house in abeyance, must have childish years, with a painful illness, which proved the harbinger of a series of attacks, all nearly of the same kind, continued at short intervals during more than two years. The reader has been told already how widely his habits of life when in Edinburgh differed from those of Abbotsford. They at all times did so to a great extent; but he had pushed his liberties with a most robust constitution to a perilous extreme while the affairs of the Ballantynes were labouring. "I had," he writes to Morrill (12th March) "been plagued all through this winter with cramps in my stomach, which I endured as a man of mould might, and endeavoured to combat them by drinking scalding water, and so forth. As they grew rather unpleasantly frequent, I had reluctant recourse to Baillie. But before his answer arrived, on the 5th, I had a most violent attack, which broke up a small party at my house, and sent me to bed roaring like a bull-calf. All sorts of remedies were applied, as in the case of Gil Blas' pretended colic, but such was the pain of the real disorder that it out-deviled the Doctor hollow. Even heated salt, which was applied in such a state that it burned my shirt to rags, I hardly felt when clapped to my stomach. At length the symptoms became inflammatory, and dangerously so, the seat being the diaphragm. They only gave way to very profuse bleeding and blistering, which, under higher assistance, saved my life. My recovery was slow and tedious from the state of exhaustion. I could neither stir for weakness and giddiness, nor read for dazzling in my eyes, nor listen for a whizzing sound in my ears, nor even think for lack of the power of arranging my ideas. So I had a comfortless time of it for about a week. Even yet I by no means feel, as the copy-book hath it, on the contrary, I am as weak as water. They tell me (of course) I must renounce every creature comfort, as my friend Jedediah calls it. As for dinner and so forth, I care little about it — but toast and water, and three glasses of wine, sound like hard laws to me. However, to parody the lamentation of Hassan, the camel-driver,

'The lion bold, which the lamb doth hold —'

'The lily health outvies the grape's bright ray
And life is dearer than the usquebae.'"

The scene of the 5th was more than once repeated. His friends in Edinburgh continued all that spring in great anx-

CHAPTER IX.

Serious illness — Laidlaw settled at Knaresdale and the Fergusons
ley Burn — New House begun — Washington Irving — The Rob Roy — and the Heart of Mid Lothian — Scott in 1817-1818.

NOR to disturb the narrative of his literary prohave deferred until now the mention of an offer Scott made during the winter of 1816-1817, to ex-seat at the Clerk's table for one on the Bench of Court of Exchequer. It had often occurred to a most prosperous years of his life, that such a situahave suited him better in every respect than that held, and that his never attaining a promotion, Scottish public would have considered so naturally character and services, reflected little honour on his allies. But at the period when I was entitled to be him, he appeared to have made up his mind that the Clerk of Session was more compatible than that of Judge with the habits of a literary man, who was publishing, and whose writings were generally of the tive order. I had also witnessed the zeal with which ended the views of more than one of his own friends, their ambition was directed to the Exchequer Bench remained, in short, ignorant that he ever had serious of it for himself, until the ruin of his worldly fortune 1826; nor had I any information that his wish to had ever been distinctly stated, until his letters to Duke of Buccleuch were placed in my hands after The Duke's answers shew the warmest anxiety to see but refer to private matters, which rendered it im-with his Grace's feelings to interfere at the time of distribution of Crown patronage. I incline to think whole, that the death of this nobleman, which soon the influence of his house in abeyance, must have

childish years, with a painful illness, which proved the harbinger of a series of attacks, all nearly of the same kind, continued at short intervals during more than two years. The reader has been told already how widely his habits of life when in Edinburgh differed from those of Abbotsford. They at all times did so to a great extent, but he had pushed his liberties with a most robust constitution to a perilous extreme while the affairs of the Ballantynes were labouring. "I had," he writes to Mount (12th March) "been plagued all through this winter with cramps in my stomach, which I endured as a man of mould might, and endeavoured to combat them by drinking scalding water, and so forth. As they grew rather unpleasantly frequent, I had reluctant recourse to Baillie. But before his answer arrived, on the 5th, I had a most violent attack, which broke up a small party at my house, and sent me to bed roaring like a bull-calf. All sorts of remedies were applied, as in the case of Gal Blas' pretended colic, but such was the pain of the real disorder that it out-devised the Doctor hollow. Even heated salt, which was applied in such a state that it burned my shirt to rags, I hardly felt when clapped to my stomach. At length the symptoms became inflammatory, and dangerously so, the seat being the diaphragm. They only gave way to very profuse bleeding and blistering, which, under higher assistance, saved my life. My recovery was slow and tedious from the state of exhaustion. I could neither stir for weakness and giddiness, nor read for dazing in my eyes, nor listen for a whizzing sound in my ears, nor even think for lack of the power of arranging my ideas. So I had a comfortless time of it for about a week. Even yet I by no means feel, as the copy-book hath it, on the contrary, I am as weak as water. They tell me (of course) I must renounce every creature comfort, as my friend Jedediah calls it. As for dinner and so forth, I care little about it. — but toast and water, and three glasses of wine, sound like hard laws to me. However, to parody the lamentation of Hassan, the camel-driver,

'The lion bold, which the lamb doth hold --'

'The lily health outvies the grape's bright ray

icity on his account. Scarcely, however, had the tortures yielded to severe medical treatment, than he began to have beguiled the intervals of his suffering by writing a drama on a story supplied to him by one of Frank's relations, which he desired to present to Terry, on the actor's first-born son, who had been christened with the name of Walter Scott Terry.¹ Such was the original title of "Fortunes of Devorgoil" — a piece which, though soon afterwards, and submitted by Terry to many suggestions with a view to the stage, was never received by the manager, and was first published, towards the close of the author's life, under the title, slightly altered for a reason, of "The Doom of Devorgoil."

On the 29th of March John Philip Kemble, after going through the round of his chief parts, to the delight of the Edinburgh audience, took his final leave of them at the Theatre Royal, and in the costume of that character delivered a farewell address, penned for him by Scott. No one who witnessed that scene, and heard the lines as then recited, can be again interested to the same extent by anything similar occurring within the walls of a theatre; nor was I ever at any public dinner in all its circumstances more interested than that which occurred a few days afterwards, at which Mr. Kemble's Scotch friends and admirers assembled around the table, Francis Jeffrey being chairman, Walter Scott and John Wilson Croker the croupiers.

His letters to Terry about this time prove sufficient to show that whatever pain he endured, he had no serious apprehensions as to his health; for a principal theme is the planning a new house at Abbotsford; and by and by the details of that project wholly engross the correspondence. The execution was in part laid early in the ensuing summer: a prominent feature in Scott's history; for he was by degrees obliged to extend his design, and the ultimate expense very much exceeded all his and his friends' calculations.

Shortly before this time, Mr. William Laidlaw had met with some misfortunes, which rendered it necessary for him to quit his farm. He was now anxiously looking about him for a new establishment, and Scott invited him to occupy a portion of his property, and endeavour, under his guidance, to make such literary exertions as might improve his income. The prospect of obtaining such a neighbour was, no doubt, more welcome to "Abbotford and Kaeside," from its opening at this period of fluctuating health; and Laidlaw, who had for twenty years loved and revered him, considered the proposal with far greater delight than the most lucrative appointment on any noble domain in the island could have afforded him. Though possessed of a lively and searching sagacity as to things in general, he had always been as to his own worldly interests simple as a child. His tastes and habits were all modest, and when he looked forward to spending the remainder of what had not hitherto been a successful life, under the shadow of the genius that he had worshipped almost from boyhood, his gentle heart was all happiness. He surveyed with glistening eyes the humble cottage in which his friend proposed to lodge him, his wife, and his little ones, and said to himself that he should write no more sad songs on Forest Plittings!

¹ Mr. W. S. Terry lived to distinguish himself as an officer in the India army: and fell in action against the Afghans.

He soon procured a little employment from Mr. Blackwood, who was then starting his Magazine; and Scott being at the moment too unwell to write himself, dictated to and for him the anecdotes of gypsies which appeared in Blackwood's opening Number, and have since been placed among the appendages of Guy Mannering. By and by, when the Laird had made other additions to his territory, and especially to his woodlands, Laidlaw's active watchfulness over the habits and comforts of the cottars employed well entitled him to a regular salary as factor. Meantime occasional literary jobs both amused and helped him; and any deficiency of funds was no doubt supplied in the way that may be guessed from Scott's delicate and thoughtful notes and letters to his most amiable friend, for example, this of November 1817:—

I hope you will not quarrel with my last. Believe me that, to a sound judging and philosophical mind, this same account of Dr. and Cr. which fills up so much time in the world, is comparatively of very small value. When you get rich, unless I thrive in the same proportion, I will request your assistance for less, for little, or for nothing, as the case may require; but while I wear my seven-leagued boots to stride in triumph over moss and murr, it would be very silly in either of us to let a cheque twice a year of £.25 make a difference between us. But all this we will talk over when we meet. I meditate a couple maitre, which will make my friend's advice essential—indeed worthy of much better remuneration.

¹ Laidlaw's song of "Lucy's Flitting" — a simple and pathetic picture of a poor Ettrick maiden's feelings in leaving a service where she had been happy — must ever be a favourite with all who understand the delicacies of the Scottish dialect, and the manners of the district in which the scene is laid.

Neither the recurring fits of cramp, nor anything else, yet, interrupt Scott's literary industry. Before Whisk had made his bargain for another novel. This was ordered to Constable, who was delighted to interrupt the connexion with Murray and Blackwood, and to meet John Ballantyne at Abbotstord, where all was settled.

As to Rob Roy, the title was suggested by Cowden, he told me years afterwards, the difficulty he had adopted by the author. "What!" said he, "Mr. Puff must you be setting up for Mr. Spensor too?" "No, but it." Constable said the name of the real hero was the best possible name for the book. "Nay," answered he, "never let me have to write up to a name. You know I have generally adopted a title that told nothing to the bookseller, however, persevered; and after the truth these scruples gave way.

On rising from table, according to Constable, they went to the green before the door of the cottage, and all the best spirits enjoyed the fine May evening. John Puff, hopping up and down in his glee, exclaimed, "Behold here, Mr. Scott; would you object to my trying the novel with a few de joy!" "Nay, Mr. Puff," said Scott, "I will burst, and blow you to the devil before your time." "My man," said Constable, "what the mischief put that at sight into your head?" Scott laughed heartily at the innuendo; and then observing that the little man was looking what sore, called attention to the notes of a lurd in the neighbouring shrubbery. "And by the by," said he, as they were listening, "'tis a long time, Johnny, since we had a Cobbler of Kelso." Mr. Puff forthwith jumped up on a block of stone, and seating himself in the proper attitude for working with his awl, began a favourite interlude, a certain son of Crispin, at whose stall Scott and his friend lingered when they were schoolboys, and a blackbird, a companion of his cell, that used to sing to him, whistle, and whistled to it all day long. With this performance Scott was always delighted: nothing could be richer than the contrast of the bird's wild sweet notes, some of which he uttered with wonderful skill, and the accompaniment of the lurd's hoarse cracked voice, uttering all manner of endearment.

which Johnny multiplied and varied in a style worthy of the Old Women in Rabelais at the birth of Pantagruel. I often wondered that Mathews, who borrowed so many good things from John Ballantyne, allowed this Coddler, which was certainly the masterpiece, to escape him.

Scott himself had probably exceeded that evening the three glasses of wine sanctioned by his Sangrado. "I never," said Constable, "had found him so disposed to be communicative about what he meant to do. Though he had had a return of his illness but the day before, he continued for an hour or more to walk backward and forward on the green, talking and laughing—he told us he was sure he would make a hit in a Glasgow weaver, whom he would rival up with Rob; and fairly outshone the Coddler, in an extempore dialogue between the baillie and the cateran—something not unlike what the book gives us as passing in the Glasgow tollbooth."

Mr. Puff might well exult in the "full and entire success" of his trip to Abbotford. His friend had made it a sine qua non with Constable that he should have a third share in the bookseller's moiety of the bargain—and though Johnny had no more trouble about the publishing or selling of Rob Roy than his own Coddler of Kelso, this stipulation had secured him a bonus of £1,200 before two years passed. Moreover, one must admire his adroitness in persuading Constable, during their journey back to Edinburgh, to relieve him of that fraction of his own old stock, with which his unobnoxious share in the new transaction was burdened. Scott's kindness continued as long as John Ballantyne lived, to provide for him a constant succession of similar advantages at the same easy rate; and Constable, from deference to Scott's wishes, and from views of bookselling policy, appears to have submitted to this heavy tax on his most important ventures.

During the summer term, Scott seems to have laboured chiefly on his History of 1815 for the Register, which was published in August; but he also found time to draw up a valuable introductory Essay for the richly embellished quarto, entitled "Border Antiquities," which came out a month later. Upon the rising of the Court, he made an excursion to the Lennox, chiefly that he might visit a cave at the head of Loch Lomond, said to have been a favourite retreat of his hero, Rob Roy, and thence to Glasgow, where, under the auspices of a kind and intelligent acquaintance, Mr. John Smith, bookseller, he refreshed his recollection of the noble cathedral, and other localities of the birthplace of Bailie Jarvie.

By this time, the foundations of that part of the house of Abbotsford, which extends from the hall to the original court yard, had been laid: and Scott, finding home, found a new source of constant occupation in the proceedings of his masons. He had, moreover, employment further afield, for he was now negotiating with another neighbouring landowner for the purchase of an estate of more consequence than any he had hitherto possessed. In the course of the autumn he concluded the bargain, and became, for the price of £10,000, proprietor of the estate of Toftfield, on which there had recently been erected a substantial mansion-house. This circumstance offered a prospect which much quickened Scott's zeal for completing his present employment. The venerable Professor Fergusson had died before; his son Adam had been placed on half pay; and he now saw the means of securing for himself, being in the immediate neighbourhood of the companion of his youth, a home for his amiable sisters. Fergusson, who had written some lines of Torres Vedras his hopes of finding, where he should be over, some sheltering cottage upon the Tweed, a walk of Abbotsford, was delighted to see his dream realized, and the family took up their residence next spring at the house of Toftfield, on which Scott then bestowed, at the request, the name of Huntley Burn: this more descriptive designation being taken from the mountain brook which flows through its garden, — the same famous in tradition as the scene of Thomas the Rhymer's interviews with the Queen of Faery. The upper part of the Rhymer's Glen, through which the burn finds its way from the Cauldshields Loch to Toftfield, was included in a previous purchase. He was now making these haunts of "True Thomas," and of the whole ground of the battle of Melrose, from Skirmish-field to Turn again. The progress of the new territory was, however, interrupted by the returns of his cramp, and the depression of spirit which attended, in his case, the use of opium, the only medicine that seemed to have power over the disease.

A pleasant incident belongs to August 1817. Scott's History of New York by Knickerbocker, shortly after its appearance in 1812; and the admirable humour of his work had led him to anticipate the brilliant career which the author has since run. Campbell, being no stranger to the estimation of Washington Irving's genius, gave him a personal introduction, which, halting his chaise on the high-road at Abbotsford, he modestly sent down to the house "w of Melrose, and wished to know whether it would be agreeable to Mr. Scott to receive a visit from him in the course of the morning."

"The noise of my carriage," says Irving, "had disturbed the quiet of the establishment. Out sallied the warden of the castle, a black greyhound, and leaping on one of the blocks of stone, began a furious barking. This alarm brought out the whole garrison of dogs, all open mouthed and vociferous. In a little while the lord of the castle himself made his appearance. I knew him at once, by the likeness that had been published of him. He came limping up the gravel walk, aiding himself by a stout walking staff, but moving rapidly and with vigour. By his side jogged along a large iron grey staghound, of most grave demeanour, who took no part in the clamour of the canine rabble, but seemed to consider himself bound, for the dignity of the house, to give me a courteous reception. Before Scott reached the gate, he called out in a hearty tone, welcoming me to Alhodsford, and asking news of Campbell. Arrived at the door of the chaise, he grasped me warmly by the hand: 'Come, drive down, drive down to the house,' said he, 'ye're just in time for breakfast, and afterwards ye shall see all the wonders of the Abbey.' I would have excused myself on the plea of having already made my breakfast. 'Hut, man,' cried he, 'a ride in the morning in the keen air of the Scotch hills is warrant enough for a second breakfast.' I was accordingly whirled to the portal of the cottage, and in a few moments found myself seated at the breakfast table. There was no one present but the family, which consisted of Mrs. Scott, her eldest daughter, Sophia, then a fine girl about seventeen, Miss Ann Scott, two or three years younger; Walter, a well-grown stripling; and Charles, a lively boy, eleven or twelve years of age. — I soon felt myself quite at home, and my heart in a glow, with the cordial welcome I experienced. I had thought to make a mere morning visit, but found I was not to be let off so lightly. 'You must not think our neighbourhood is to be read in a morning like a newspaper,' said Scott; 'it takes several days of study for an observant traveller, that has a relish for auld world trumpery. After breakfast you shall make your visit to Melrose Abbey, I shall not be able to accompany you, as I have some household affairs to attend to; but I will put you in charge of my son Charles, who is very learned in all things touching the old ruin and the neighbourhood it stands in; and he and my friend Johnnie Bower, will tell you the whole truth about it, with a great deal more that you are not called upon to believe, unless you be a true and nothing-doubting antiquary. When you come back, I'll take you out on a ramble about the neighbourhood. To-morrow we will take a look at the Yarrow, and the next day we will drive over to Dryburgh Abbey, which is a fine old ruin, well worth your seeing.' — In a word, before Scott had got through with his plan, I found myself committed for a visit of several days, and it seemed as if a little realm of romance was suddenly open before me."

After breakfast, while Scott, no doubt, wrote a chapter of Rob Roy, Mr. Irving, under young Charles's guidance, saw Melrose Abbey, and had much talk with old Bower, the showman of the ruins, who was eager to enlighten in all things the Sheriff's friends. "He'll come here sometimes," said

"with great folks in his company, and the first I'll is his voice calling out Johnny! — Johnny Bower!
I go out I'm sure to be greeted with a joke or a ple.
He'll stand and crack an' laugh wi' me just like a — and to think that of a man that has such an awful o' history!"

On his return from the Abbey, Irving found Scott a ramble.

"As we sallied forth," he writes, "every dog in the turned out to attend us. There was the old staghound, I have already mentioned, a noble animal, and Hamlet, the hound, a wild thoughtless youngster, not yet arrived at discretion; and Finette, a beautiful setter, with soft, silky pendant ears, and a mild eye, the parlour favourite. When the house, we were joined by a superannuated greyhound from the kitchen wagging his tail; and was cheered by Scott's friend and comrade. In our walks, he would frequently per-versation, to notice his dogs, and speak to them as if ration-lions; and, indeed, there appears to be a vast deal of rational faithful attendants on man, derived from their close intimacy.
Malda departed himself with a gravity becoming his age; he seemed to consider himself called upon to preserve a great di-nity and decorum in our society. As he jogged along a little ahead of us, the young dogs would gambol about him, leap worry at his ears, and endeavour to tease him into a gambol.
dog would keep on for a long time with imperturbable serenity, and then seeming to rebuke the wantonness of his young At length he would make a sudden turn, seize one of them him in the dust, then giving a glance at us, as much as to say gentlemen, I can't help giving way to this nonsense," would gravity, and jog on as before. Scott amused himself with the titles. 'I make no doubt,' said he, 'when Malda is alone with dogs, he throws gravity aside, and plays the boy as much as a but he is ashamed to do so in our company, and seems to say with your nonsense, youngsters; what will the laird and the tleman think of me if I give way to such foolery?' Scott am-with the peculiarities of another of his dogs, a little shaggy with large glassy eyes, one of the most sensitive little bodies indignity in the world. 'If ever he whipped him,' he said, 'a low would sneak off and hide himself from the light of day garret, from whence there was no drawing him forth but by the chopping-knife, as if chopping up his victuals, when he forth with humiliated and downcast look, but would skulk near any one regarded him.' — His domestic animals were his friends.
thing about him seemed to rejoice in the light of his countenance.
ramble took us on the hills commanding an extensive prospect.
said Scott, 'I have brought you, like the pilgrim in the Pilgrim's ress, to the top of the Delectable Mountains, that I may show goodly regions hereabouts.' . . . I gazed about me for a time surprise, I may almost say with disappointment. I beheld cession of grey waving hills, line beyond line, as far as my eye could reach, men domineering in their aspect, and so destitute of trees, that one could almost see a stout fly walking along their profile; and the far-famed Tweed appeared a naked stream, flowing between bare hills, without a tree or thicket on its banks, and yet such had been the magic web of poetry and romance thrown over the whole, that it had a greater charm for me than the richest scenery I had beheld in England. I could not help saying utterance to my thoughts. Scott hummed for a moment to himself, and looked grave; he had no idea of having his muse complimented at the expense of his native hills. 'It may be pertinacity,' said he at length, 'but to my eye, these grey hills, and all this wild border country, have beauties peculiar to themselves. I like the very nakedness of the land, it has something bold, and stern, and solitary about it. When I have been for some time in the rich scenery about Edinburgh, which is like ornamented garden land, I begin to wish myself back again among my own honest grey hills; and if I did not see the heather, at least once a year, I think I should die!' The last words were said with an honest warmth, accompanied by a thump on the ground with his staff, by way of emphasis, that shewed his heart was in his speech. He vindicated the Tweed, too, as a beautiful stream in itself, and observed, that he did not dislike it for being bare of trees, probably from having been much of an angler in his time; and an angler does not like to have a stream overhung by trees, which embarrass him in the exercise of his rod and line. I took occasion to plead, in like manner, the associations of early life for my disappointment in respect to the surrounding scenery. I had been so accustomed to see hills crowned with forests, and streams breaking their way through a wilderness of trees, that all my ideas of romantic landscape were apt to be well wooded. 'Ay, and that's the great charm of your country,' cried Scott. 'You love the forest as I do the heather, but I would not have you think I do not love the glory of a great woodland prospect. There is nothing I should like more than to be in the midst of one of your grand wild original forests, with the idea of hundreds of miles of untrdden forest around me. I once saw at Leith an immense stick of timber just landed from America. It must have been an enormous tree when it stood in its native soil, at its full height, and with all its branches. I gazed at it with admiration; it seemed like one of the gigantic obelisks which are now and then brought from Egypt to shame the pigny monuments of Europe; and, in fact, these vast aboriginal trees, that have sheltered the Indians before the intrusion of the white men, are the monuments and antiquities of your country.'

The conversation here turned upon Campbell's poem of Gertrude of Wyoming, as illustrative of the poetic materials furnished by American scenery. Scott cited several passages of it with great delight. 'What a pity it is,' said he, 'that Campbell does not write more and oftener, and give full sweep to his genius! He has wings that would bear him to the skies; and he does, now and then, spread them grandly, but folds them up again, and resumes his perch, as if he was afraid to launch away. What a grand idea is that,' said he, 'about prophetic bidding, or, in common parlance, second sight

Coming events cast their shadows before.'

'The fact is,' added he, 'Campbell is, in a manner, a bugbear to himself.

The brightness of his early success is a detriment to all his fur-
He is afraid of the shadow that his own fame casts before him.

“We had not walked much farther, before we saw the two advancing along the hillside to meet us. The morning’s sun over, they had set off to take a ramble on the hills, and got blossoms with which to decorate their hair for dinner. As bounding lightly like young fawns, and their dresses fluted pure summer breeze, I was reminded of Scott’s own deary children, in his introduction to one of the cantos of Marmion.

‘My hips, though hard, hold, and will,
As best befits the mountain bill,’ &c.

As they approached, the dogs all sprung forward, and gambol-ed them. They joined us with countenances full of health and glad-the eldest, was the most lively and joyous, having much of the varied spirit in conversation, and seeming to catch excitement words and looks; Ann was of a quieter mood, rather subdued in some measure, no doubt, to her being some years younger.”

Having often, many years afterwards, heard Irving warmly of William Laidlaw, I must not omit the passage:—

“One of my pleasantest rambles with Scott about the neck of Abbotsford, was taken in company with Mr. William Laidlaw, steward of his estate. This was a gentleman for whom Scott a particular value. He had been born to a competency, had educated, his mind was richly stored with varied information, was a man of sterling moral worth. Having been reduced to poverty, Scott had got him to take charge of his estate. He lived on a farm, on the hillside above Abbotsford, and was treated by Scott as a cherished and confidential friend, rather than a dependant.
At dinner we had Mr. Laidlaw and his wife, and a female friend who accompanied them. The latter was a very intelligent respectable woman about the middle age, and was treated with particular attention and respect by Scott. Our dinner was a most agreeable one, for the evidently cherished visitors to the house, and felt that they were valued. When they were gone, Scott spoke of them in the most praiseworthy manner. ‘I wish to shew you,’ said he, ‘some of our real plain Scotch people: not fine gentlemen and ladies, for such meet everywhere, and they are everywhere the same. The character of a nation is not to be learnt from its fine folks.’ He then read a particular eulogium on the lady who had accompanied them.
She was the daughter, he said, of a poor country clergyman who died in debt, and left her an orphan and destitute. Having had a plain education, she immediately set up a child’s school, and gathered a numerous flock under her care, by which she earned a decent maintenance. That, however, was not her main object. Her first aim was to pay off her father’s debts, that no ill word or ill will might remain in memory. This, by dint of Scotch economy, backed by filial affection and pride, she accomplished, though in the effort she subjected herself to every privation. Not content with this, she in certain instan-

to take pay for the tuition of the children of some of her neighbours, who had befriended her father in his need, and had since fallen into poverty. 'In a word,' added Scott, 'she's a fine old Scotch girl, and I delight in her more than in many a fine lady I have known, and I have known many of the finest.'

"The evening having passed away delightfully in a quaint-looking apartment, half study, half drawing room, Scott read several passages from the old Romance of Arthur, with a fine deep sonorous voice, and a gravity of tone that seemed to suit the antiquated black letter volume. It was a rich treat to hear such a work read by such a person, and in such a place, and his appearance, as he sat reading, in a large arm chair, with his favourite bound Maida at his feet, and surrounded by books and reliques, and Border trophies, would have formed an admirable and most characteristic picture. When I retired for the night, I found it almost impossible to sleep: the idea of being under the roof of Scott; of being on the Borders on the Tweed; in the very centre of that region which had, for some time past, been the favourite scene of romantic fiction; and, above all, the recollections of the ramble I had taken, the company in which I had taken it, and the conversation which had passed, all fermented in my mind, and nearly drove sleep from my pillow.

"On the following morning the sun darted his beams from over the hills through the low lattice of my window. I rose at an early hour, and looked out between the branches of eglantine which overhung the casement. To my surprise, Scott was already up, and forth, seated on a fragment of stone, and chatting with the workmen employed in the new building. I had supposed, after the time he had wasted upon me yesterday, he would be closely occupied this morning: but he appeared like a man of leisure, who had nothing to do but bask in the sunshine and amuse himself. I soon dressed myself and joined him. He talked about his proposed plans of Abbotsford: happy would it have been for him could he have contented himself with his delightful little vine-covered cottage, and the simple, yet hearty and hospitable, style in which he lived at the time of my visit."

These lines to the elder Ballantyne are without date. They accompanied, no doubt, the last proof sheet of Rob Roy, and were therefore in all probability written about ten days before the 31st of December 1817 — on which day the novel was published.

"With great joy
I send you Roy.
'Twas a tough job,
But we're done with Rob."

The novel had indeed been "a tough job" — for lightly and airily as it reads, the author had struggled almost throughout with the pains of cramp or the lassitude of opium. Calling on him one day to dun him for copy, James found him with a clean pen and a blank sheet before him, and uttered some rather solemn exclamation of surprise. "Ay, ay, Jemmy," said he, "'tis easy for you to bid me get on, but how the deuce can I make Rob Roy's wife speak, with such a curmudgeon to my guts?"

Rob and his wife, Bailie Jarvie and his house-keeper, Die Vernon and Rashleigh Oswaldstone — these boldly drawn and happily contrasted personages — were welcomed as warmly as the most fortunate of their predecessors. Con. Table's resolution to begin with an edition of 10,000, proved to have been as sagacious as brave; for within a fortnight a second 5000 was called for.

Scott, however, had not waited for this new burst of applause. As soon as he came within view of the completion of Rob Roy, he desired John Ballantyne to propose to Constable a second series of the Tales of my Landlord, to be comprised, like the first, in four volumes, and ready for publication by "the King's birth day;" that is, the 4th of June 1818. "I have hungered and thirsted," he wrote, "to see the end of those shabby borrowings among friends; they have all been wiped out except the good Duke's L. 4000 — and I will not suffer other new offers of land or anything else to come in the way of that clearance. I expect that you will be able to arrange this resurrection of Jedediah, so that L. 5000 shall be at my order."

Mr. Rigdum used to glory in recounting that he acquitted himself on this occasion with a species of dexterity not contemplated in his commission. He well knew how sorely Constable had been wounded by seeing the first Tales of Jedediah published by Murray and Blackwood — and that the utmost success of Rob Roy would only double his anxiety to keep them out of the field, when the hint should be dropped that a second MS. from Ganderclench might shortly be looked for. John therefore took a convenient opportunity to mention the new scheme as if casually — so as to give Constable the impression that the author's purpose was to divide the second series also between his old rival in Albemarle Street, of whom his jealousy was always sensitive, and his neighbour Blackwood, whom, if there had been no other grudge, the recent conduct and rapidly increasing sale of his Magazine would have been sufficient to make Constable hate with a perfect hatred. To see not only his old Scots Magazine eclipsed, but the authority of the Edinburgh Review itself bearded on its own soil by this juvenile upstart, was to him gall and wormwood; and, moreover, he himself had come in for his share in some of those grotesque jeux d'esprit by which Blackwood's young Tory wags delighted to assail their elders and betters of the Whig persuasion. To prevent the proprietor of this new journal from acquiring anything like a hold on the author of Waverley, and thus competing with himself not only in periodical literature, but in the highest of the time, was an object for which, as John Ballantyne shrewdly guessed, Constable would have made at that moment almost any sacrifice. When, therefore, the haughty but trembling bookseller — “The Lord High Constable” (as he had been dubbed by these jesters) — signified his earnest hope that the second Tales of my Landlord were destined to come out under the same auspices with Rob Roy, the plenipotentiary answered with an air of deep regret, that he feared it would be impossible for the author to dispose of the work — unless to publishers who should agree to take with it the whole of the remaining stock of “John Ballantyne & Co. ;” and Constable, pertinaciously as he had stood out against many more modest propositions of this nature, was so worked upon by his jealous feelings, that his resolution at once gave way. He agreed on the instant to do all that John seemed to shrink from asking — and at one sweep cleared the Augean stable in Hanover Street of unsaleable rubbish to the amount of £5270! I am assured by his surviving partner, that when he had finally redisposed of the stock, he found himself a loser by fully two thirds of this sum. Burthened with this heavy condition, the agreement for the sale of 10,000 copies of the embryo series was signed before the end of November 1817; and on the 7th January 1818, Scott wrote to his noble friend of Buccleuch, — “I have the great pleasure of enclosing the discharged bond which your Grace stood engaged in on my account.”

The time now approached when a Commission to examine the Crown room in the Castle of Edinburgh, which had sprung from one of Scott's conversations with the Prince Regent in 1816, was at length to be acted upon; and the result was the discovery of the long lost regalia of Scotland. Of the official proceedings of the 4th Feb. 1818, the reader has a full and particular account in an Essay which Scott penned shortly afterwards; but I may add a little incident of the 5th. He and several of his brother Commissioners then revisited the Castle, accompanied by some of the ladies of their families. His daughter Sophia told me that her father's conversation had worked her feelings up to such a pitch, that when the lid was again removed, she nearly fainted, and drew back from the circle. As she was retiring, she was startled by his voice exclaiming, in a tone of the deepest emotion, “something between anger and despair,” as she expressed it, “By G—, No!”

One of the Commissioners, not quite entering into sympathy with which Scott regarded the business, had it so a sort of motion as if he meant to put the crown on of one of the young ladies near him, but the voice of the Poet were more than sufficient to make the gentleman understand his error; and respecting the crown with which he had not been taught to sympathize, he the ancient diadem with an air of painful embarrassment whispered, "Pray forgive me," and turning round the moment, observed his daughter deadly pale, and beat door. He immediately drew her out of the room, the air had somewhat recovered her, walked with the Mound to Castle Street. "He never spoke at home," she said, "but every now and then I felt tremble; and from that time I fancied he began to more like a woman than a child. I thought he liked too, than he had ever done before."

At this moment, his position, take it for all in all inclined to believe, what no other man had ever won self by the pen alone. His works were the daily only of his countrymen, but of all educated Europe, city was courted by whatever England could shew of Station, power, wealth, beauty, and genius, strove other in every demonstration of respect and worship few political fanatics and envious poetasters apart he appeared in town or country, whoever had seen him, "gentle or simple," felt it move more rapidly the veins when he was in the presence of Scott. To denote many looked on as higher things, he considered himself was considered by all about him, as rapidly considerable fortune:—the annual profits of his novels alone several years, been not less than £10,000; his domain daily increased—his castle was rising—and he doubted that ere long he might receive from the just his Prince some distinction in the way of external as had seldom before been dreamt of as the consequences of a mere literary celebrity. It was about that the compiler of these pages first had the opportunity observing the plain easy modesty which had survived temptations of such a career; and the kindness of vading, in all circumstances, his gentle deportment, with him the rare, perhaps the solitary, example of a man elevated from humble beginnings, and loved more by his earliest friends and connexions, in proportion fixed on himself the homage of the great and the wonder of the world.

It was during the sitting of the General Assembly of the Kirk in May 1818, that I first had the honour of meeting him in private society: the party was not a large one, at the house of a much valued common friend—Mr. Home Drummond, the grandson of Lord Kames. Mr. Scott, ever apt to consider too favourably the literary efforts of others, and more especially of very young persons, received me, when I was presented to him, with a cordiality which I had not been prepared to expect from one filling a station so exalted. This, however, is the same story that every individual, who ever met him under similar circumstances, has had to tell. When the ladies retired from the dinner table, I happened to sit next him; and he, having heard that I had lately returned from a tour in Germany, made that country and its recent literature the subject of some conversation. In the course of it, I told him that when, on reaching the inn at Weimar, I asked the waiter whether Goethe was then in the town, the man stared as if he had not heard the name before; and that on my repeating the question, adding Goethe der grosse dichter (the great poet), he shook his head as doubtfully as before—until the landlady solved our difficulties, by suggesting that perhaps the traveller might mean “the Herr Geheimen Rath (Privy Counsellor) Von Goethe.”—Scott seemed amused with this, and said, “I hope you will come one of these days and see me at Abbotsford; and when you reach Selkirk or Melrose, be sure you ask even the landlady for nobody but the Sheriff.” He appeared particularly interested when I described Goethe as I first saw him, alighting from a carriage crammed with wild plants and herbs which he had picked up in the course of his morning’s botanising among the hills above Jena. “I am glad,” said he, “that my old master has pursuits somewhat akin to my own. I am no botanist, properly speaking; and though a dweller on the banks of the Tweed, shall never be knowing about Flora’s beauties;¹ but how I should like to have a talk with him about trees!” I mentioned how much any one must be struck with the majestic beauty of Goethe’s countenance—the noblest certainly by far that I have ever yet seen—“Well,” said he, “the grandest demigod I ever saw was Dr. Carlyle, minister of Musselburgh, commonly called Jupiter Carlyle, from having sat more than once for the king of gods and men to Gavin Hamilton a shrewd, clever old carle was he, no doubt, but no more than his precentor. As for poets, I have seen, I believe the best of our own time and country—and though Burns most glorious eyes imaginable, I never thought an artist would come up to an artist's notion of the character of Byron." Principal Nicol of St. Andrew's expressed regret that he had never seen Lord Byron. "And then resumed Scott, "give me no impression of him—there, Doctor, but it is not lighted up. Byron's countenance a thing to dream of. A certain fair lady, whose name is too often mentioned in connexion with his, told me, that when she first saw Byron, it was in a crowd and she did not know who it was, but her eyes were nailed, and she said to herself, that pale face is my fate. A poor soul, if a godlike face and godlike powers could make any excuse for devilry, to be sure she had one. In the course of this talk, Sir P. Murray of Ochtertyre, an old friend and schoolfellow of Scott's, asked him, across the table, whether he had any faith in the antique busts of Homer. "No," answered, smiling, "for if there had been either busts or stuccoers worth their salt in those days, the owner of the headpiece would never have had to trail the poke. They would have alimented the honest man decently among the lay-figure."

¹ “What beauties does Flora disclose,
How sweet are her smiles upon Tweed,” &c.

A few days after this, I received a communication from Messrs. Ballantyne, to the effect that Mr. Scott's vacations had prevented him from fulfilling his agreement with them as to the historical department of the Edinburgh Register for 1816, and that it would be acceptable to them well as them, if I could undertake to supply it in the autumn. This proposal was agreed to, and I had frequently occasion to meet him pretty often during the session. He told me, that if the war had gone on, he would have liked to do the historical summary as before, but the prospect of having no events to record but radicalism and the passing or rejecting of corn bills and poor laws had ened him; that his health was no longer what it was, and that though he did not mean to give over writing—(here he smiled significantly, and glanced his eye at a pile of MS. on the desk by him)—he thought himself entitled to write nothing but what would rather be a relief than a fatigue to him. — "Juniores ad labores."

He at this time occupied as his den a small square

behind the dining parlour in Castle Street. It had but a single Venetian window, opening on a patch of turf not much larger than itself, and the aspect of the place was on the whole sombrous. The walls were entirely clothed with books; most of them folios and quartos, and all in that complete state of repair which at a glance reveals a tinge of bibliomania. A dozen volumes or so, needful for immediate purposes of reference, were placed close by him on a small moveable frame — something like a dumb-waiter. All the rest were in their proper niches, and wherever a volume had been lent, its room was occupied by a wooden block of the same size, having a card with the name of the borrower and date of the loan, tacked on its front. The old bindings had obviously been retouched and regilt in the most approved manner; the new, when the books were of any mark, were rich, but never gaudy — a large proportion of blue morocco — all stamped with his device of the portcullis, and its motto, clausus tulus ero — being an anagram of his name in Latin. Every case and shelf was accurately lettered, and the works arranged systematically; history and biography on one side — poetry and the drama on another — law books and dictionaries behind his own chair. The only table was a massive piece of furniture which he had had constructed on the model of one at Rokeby; with a desk and all its appurtenances on either side, that an amanuensis might work opposite to him when he chose; and with small tiers of drawers, reaching all round to the floor. The top displayed a goodly array of session papers, and on the desk below were, besides the MS. at which he was working, sundry parcels of letters, proof-sheets, and so forth, all neatly done up with red tape. His own writing apparatus was a very handsome old box, richly carved, lined with crimson velvet, and containing ink-bottles, taper-stand, &c. in silver — the whole in such order that it might have come from the silversmith's window half an hour before. Besides his own huge elbow-chair, there were but two others in the room, and one of these seemed, from its position, to be reserved exclusively for the amanuensis. I observed, during the first evening I spent with him in this sanctum, that while he talked, his hands were hardly ever idle; sometimes he folded letter-covers — sometimes he twisted paper into matches, performing both tasks with great mechanical expertness and nicety; and when there was no loose paper fit to be so dealt with, he snapped his fingers, and the noble Maida aroused himself from his lair on the hearth-rug, and laid his head across his master's knees, to be caressed and fondled. The room had no space for pictures except one, a portrait of Claverhouse, which hung over the chimney-piece, with a Highland target on either side, and broadswords and dirks (each having its own story) disposed star-fashion round them. A few green tin boxes, such as solicitors keep title-deeds in, were piled over each other on one side of the window; and on the top of these lay a fox's tail, mounted on an antique silver handle, wherewith, as often as he had occasion to take down a book, he gently brushed the dust off the upper leaves before opening it. I think I have mentioned all the furniture of the room except a sort of ladder, low, broad, well carpeted, and strongly guarded with oaken rails, by which he helped himself to books from his higher shelves. On the top step of this convenience, Huse of Hunsfeldt (so called from one of the German Kinder mütchen), a venerable tom cat, fat and sleek, and no longer very locomotive, usually lay watching the proceedings of his master and Maida with an air of dignified equanimity; but when Maida chose to leave the party, he signified his inclinations by thumping the door with his huge paw, as violently as ever a fashionable footman handled a knocker in Grosvenor Square; the Sheriff rose and opened it for him with courteous alacrity, — and then Huse came down purring from his perch, and mounted guard by the footstool, viz Maida absent upon furlough. Whatever discourse might be passing, was broken every now and then by some affectionate apostrophe to these four-footed friends. He said they understood everything he said to them — and I believe they did understand a great deal of it. But at all events, dogs and cats, like children, have some infallible tact for discovering at once who is, and who is not, really fond of their company; and I venture to say, Scott was never five minutes in any room before the little pets of the family, whether dumb or lisping, had found out his kindness for all their generation.

I never thought it lawful to keep a journal of what passes in private society, so that no one need expect from the sequel of this narrative any detailed record of Scott's familiar talk. What fragments of it have happened to adhere to a tolerably retentive memory, and may be put into black and white without wounding any feelings which my friend, were he alive, would have wished to spare, I shall introduce as the occasion suggests or serves. But I disclaim on the threshold anything more than this; and I also wish to enter a protest once for all against the general fidelity of several literary gentlemen who have kindly forwarded to me private lucubrations of theirs, designed to Boswellise Scott, and which they may probably publish hereafter. To report conversations fairly, it is a necessary prerequisite that we should be completely familiar with all the interlocutors, and understand thoroughly all their minutest relations, and points of common knowledge and common feeling, with each other. He who does not, must be perpetually in danger of misinterpreting sportive allusions into serious statement; and the man who was only recalling, by some jocular phrase or half-phrase, to an old companion, some trivial reminiscence of their boyhood or youth, may be represented as expressing, upon some person or incident casually tabled, an opinion which he had never framed, or if he had, would never have given words to in any mixed assemblage — not even among what the world calls friends at his own board. In proportion as a man is witty and humorous, there will always be about him and his a widening maze and wilderness of cues and catch-words, which the uninitiated will, if they are bold enough to try interpretation, construe, ever and anon, egregiously amiss — not seldom into arrant falsity. For this one reason, to say nothing of many others, I consider no man justified in journalising what he sees and hears in a domestic circle where he is not thoroughly at home; and I think there are still higher and better reasons why he should not do so where he is.

Before I ever met Scott in private, I had, of course, heard many people describe and discuss his style of conversation. Everybody seemed to agree that it overflowed with hearty good-humour, as well as plain unaffected good sense and sagacity; but I had heard not a few persons of undoubted ability and accomplishment maintain, that the genius of the great poet and novelist rarely, if ever, revealed itself in his talk. It is needless to say, that the persons I allude to were all his own countrymen, and themselves imbued, more or less, with the conversational habits derived from a system of education in which the study of metaphysics occupies a very large share of attention. The best table-talk of Edinburgh was, and probably still is, in a very great measure made up of brilliant disquisition — such as might be transferred without alteration to a professor's note-book, or the pages of a critical Review — and of sharp word-catchings, ingenious thrusting and parrying of dialectics, and all the quips and quibbles of bar pleading. It was the talk of a society to which lawyers and lecturers had, for at least a hundred years, given the tone. From the date of the Union, Edinburgh ceased to be the headquarters of the Scotch nobility — and long before the time of which I speak, they had all but entirely abandoned it as a place of residence. I think I never knew above two or three of age to have houses there at the same time — and usually among the poorest and most insignificant of them. The wealthier gentry had followed their example, of that class ever spent any considerable part of the Edinburgh, except for the purposes of educating their or superintending the progress of a lawsuit, and then not more likely than a score or two of comatose and old Indians, to make head against the established order of academical and forensic celebrity. Now Scott's resources had not much in common with those who inherited and preserved the chief authority in this hierarchy of rhetoric. He was highly amused with their dexterous logomachies — but his delight in such arose mainly, I cannot doubt, from the fact of the both as to subject-matter and style and method, remote volæ studiis. He sat by, as he would have done at a sword or a fencing-match, enjoying and applauding the skill of his rival either of the foil or the buskin. I can easily see, therefore, that in the earlier part of his life — before the glare of universal fame had overawed local prejudice, and a generation, accustomed to hear of that fame from their fathers had grown up — it may have been the commonly adopted opinion in Edinburgh, that Scott, however distinguished otherwise, was not to be named as a table-companion in the same circle as this or that master of luminous dissertation or quick and ready wit who now sleeps as forgotten as his grandmother. It is natural enough that persons brought up in the same circle and who remembered all his beginnings, and had but slowly begun to acquiesce in the justice of his claim to unrivalled celebrity in literature, should have clung all the closer for that reason to the essence to their original estimate of him as inferior to themselves in other titles to admiration. It was also natural that their prejudice on that score should be readily taken up by young aspirants who breathed, as it were, the atmosphere of their professional renown. Perhaps, too, Scott's sternness, and the effect of his genius and example in modifying the intellectual sway of the long dominant Whigs in the north, may have had some share in this matter. However all this may have been, the substance of what I had been accustomed to hear certainly was, that Scott had a marvellous stock of anecdotes, which he often told with happy effect, but that these drafts on a portentous memory, set off with a su-fashioned naïveté of humour and pleasantry, his strain of talk was remarkable neither for depth of remark nor felicity of illustration; that his views and opinions on the most important topics of practical interest were hopelessly perverted by his blind enthusiasm for the dreams of by-gone ages; and that, but for the grotesque phenomenon presented by a great writer of the nineteenth century gravely uttering sentiments worthy of his own Dundees and Invermahyles, the main texture of his discourse would be pronounced by any enlightened member of modern society, rather bald and poor than otherwise. I think the epithet most in vogue was commonplace.

It will be easily believed, that, in companies such as I have been alluding to, made up of, or habitually domineered over, by voluble Whigs and political economists, Scott was often tempted to put forth his Tory doctrines and antiquarian prejudices in an exaggerated shape, in colours, to say the truth, altogether different from what they assumed under other circumstances, or which had any real influence upon his mind and conduct on occasions of practical moment. But I fancy it will seem equally credible, that the most sharp-sighted of these social critics may not always have been capable of tracing, and doing justice to, the powers which Scott brought to bear upon the topics which they, not he, had chosen for discussion. In passing from a gas-lit hall into a room with wax candles, the guests sometimes complain that they have left splendour for gloom; but let them try by what sort of light it is most satisfactory to read, write, or embroider, or consider at leisure under which of the two either men or women look their best.

The strongest, purest, and least observed of all lights, is, however, daylight; and his talk was commonplace, just as sunshine is, which gilds the most indifferent objects, and adds brilliancy to the brightest. As for the old-world anecdotes which these clever persons were condescending enough to laugh at as pleasant extravagances, serving merely to relieve and set off the main stream of debate, they were often enough, it may be guessed, connected with the theme in hand by links not the less apt that they might be too subtle to catch their bedazzled and self-satisfied optics. There might be keener knowledge of human nature than was "dreamt of in their philosophy" — which passed with them for commonplace, only because it was clothed in plain familiar household words, not dressed up in some pedantic masquerade of antithesis. "There are people," says Landor, "who think they write and speak finely, merely because they have forgotten the language in which their fathers and mothers used to talk to them ; " and surely there are a thousand homely old proverbs, which many a dainty modern would think it beneath his dignity to quote either in speech or writing, any one of which condenses more wit (take that word in any of its senses) than could be extracted from all that was ever said or written by the doctrinaires of the Edinburgh school. Many of these gentlemen held Scott's conversation to be commonplace exactly for the same reason that a child thinks a perfectly limpid stream, though perhaps deep enough to drown it three times over, must needs be shallow. But it will be easily believed that the best and highest of their own idols had better means and skill of measurement: I can never forget the pregnant expression of one of the ablest of that school and party — Lord Cockburn — who, when some glib youth chanced to echo in his hearing the consolatory tenet of local mediocrity, answered quietly — " I have the misfortune to think differently from you — in my humble opinion, Walter Scott's sense is a still more wonderful thing than his genius."

Indeed I have no sort of doubt that, long before 1818, full justice was done to Scott, even in these minor things, by all those of his Edinburgh acquaintance, whether Whig or Tory, on whose personal opinion he could have been supposed to set much value. With few exceptions, the really able lawyers of his own or nearly similar standing, had ere that time attained stations of judicial dignity, or were in the springtide of practice; and in either case they were likely to consider general society much in his own fashion, as the joyous relaxation of life, rather than the theatre of exertion and display. Their tables were elegantly, some of them sumptuously, spread; and they lived in a pretty constant interchange of entertainments, in every circumstance of which, conversation included, it was their ambition to imitate those voluptuous metropolitan circles, wherein most of them had from time to time mingled, and several of them with distinguished success. Among such prosperous gentlemen, like himself past the mezzo cammin, Scott's picturesque anecdotes, rich easy humour, and gay involuntary glances of mother-wit, were, it is not difficult to suppose, appreciated above contributions of a more ambitious stamp; and no doubt his London reputation de salon (which had by degrees risen to a high pitch, although he cared nothing for it) was not without its effect in Edinburgh. But still the old prejudice lingered on in the general opinion of the place, especially among the smart praters of the Outer-House.

In truth, it was impossible to listen to Scott's oral narrations, whether gay or serious, or to the felicitous fun with which he parried absurdities of all sorts, without discovering better qualities in his talk than wit — and of a higher order; I mean especially a power of vivid painting — the true and primary sense of what is called Imagination. He was like Jacques — though not a “Melancholy Jacques;” and “moralised” a common topic “into a thousand similitudes.” Shakspeare and the banished Duke would have found him “full of matter.” He disliked mere disquisitions in Edinburgh, and prepared impromptus in London; and puzzled the promoters of such things sometimes by placid silence, sometimes by broad merriment. To such men he seemed commonplace — not so to the most dexterous masters in what was to some of them almost a science; not so to Rose, Hallam, Moore, or Rogers, — to Ellis, Mackintosh, Croker, or Canning.

Scott managed to give and receive such great dinners as I have been alluding to, at least as often as any other private gentleman in Edinburgh; but he very rarely accompanied his wife and daughters to the evening assemblies, which commonly ensued under other roofs — for early to rise, unless in the case of spare-fed anchorites, takes for granted early to bed. When he had no dinner engagement, he frequently gave a few hours to the theatre; but still more frequently, when the weather was fine, and still more, I believe, to his own satisfaction, he drove out with some of his family, or a single friend, in an open carriage; the favourite rides being either to the Blackford Hills, or to Ravelston, and so home by Corstorphine; or to the beach of Portobello, where Peter was always instructed to keep his horses as near as possible to the sea. More than once, even in the first summer of my acquaintance with him, I had the pleasure of accompanying him on these evening excursions; and never did he seem to enjoy himself more fully than when placidly surveying, at such sunset or moonlight hours, either the massive outlines of his “own romantic town,” or the tranquil expanse of its noble estuary. He delighted, too, in passing when he could, through some of the quaint windings of the ancient city itself, now deserted, except at mid-day, by the upper world. How often have I seen him go a long way round about, rather than miss the opportunity of halting for a few minutes on the vacant esplanade of Holyrood, or under the darkest shadows of the Castle rock, where it overhangs the Grassmarket, and the huge slab that still marks where the gibbet of Porteous and the Covenanters had its station. His coachman knew him too well to John's pace amidst such scenes as these. No fun crept more leisurely than did his landau up the C the Cowgate; and not a queer tottering gable but him some long-buried memory of splendour or which, by a few words, he set before the hearer in of life. His image is so associated in my mind with uities of his native place, that I cannot now r without feeling as if I were treading on his gravest

Whatever might happen on the other evenings e he always dined at home on Sunday, and usual friends were then with him, but never any person he stood on ceremony. These were, it may be r posed, the most agreeable of his entertainments. into the room rubbing his hands, his face bright an like a boy arriving at home for the holidays, his I Mustards gambolling about his heels, and even Maida grinning and wagging his tail in sympath the most regular guests on these happy evenings v time, as had long before been the case, Mrs. Macleod of Torloisk (with whom he agreed cordially on except the authenticity of Ossian), and her daught guardian he had become at their choice. The old had been for some years married to the Earl of Co Marquis of Northampton), and was of course sel north; but the others had much of the same tastes pishments which so highly distinguished the late I ampton; and Scott delighted especially in their p the poetry and music of their native isles. Mr Skene of Rubislaw were frequent attendants — and Macdonald-Buchanans of Drumakilt, whose eldes Isabella, was his chief favourite among all his n Clerks' table — as was, among the nephews, my own and companion, Joseph Hume, a singularly grac man, rich in the promise of hereditary genius, bu off in the early bloom of his days. The well-belov was seldom absent; and very often Terry or James came with him — sometimes, though less frequently Among other persons who now and then appear “dinner without the silver dishes,” as Scott call may mention — to say nothing of such old cron Clerk, Mr. Thomson, and Mr. Kirkpatrick Sharpe- ander Boswell of Auchinleck, who had all his fat cleverness, good-humour, jovialty, without one to meaner qualities — wrote Jenny dang the Weaver, and some other popular songs, which he sang capitally — and was moreover a thorough bibliomaniac; the late Sir Alexander Don of Newton, in all courteous and elegant accomplishments the model of a cavalier; and last, not least, William Allan, R.A., who had shortly before this time returned to Scotland from several years of travel in Russia and Turkey. At one of these plain hearty dinners, however, the company rarely exceeded three or four, besides the as yet undivided family.

Scott had a story of a topping goldsmith on the Bridge, who prided himself on being the mirror of Amphitryons, and accounted for his success by stating that it was his invariable custom to set his own stomach at ease, by a beefsteak and a pint of port in his back-shop, half-an-hour before the arrival of his guests. But the host of Castle Street had no occasion to imitate this prudent arrangement, for his appetite at dinner was neither keen nor nice. Breakfast was his chief meal. Before that came, he had gone through the severest part of his day's work, and then he set to with the zeal of Crabbe's Squire Tovell —

“ And laid at once a pound upon his plate.”

No foxhunter ever prepared himself for the field by more substantial appliances. His table was always provided, in addition to the usually plentiful delicacies of a Scotch breakfast, with some solid article, on which he did most lusty execution — a round of beef — a pasty, such as made Gil Blas's eyes water — or, most welcome of all, a cold sheep's head, the charms of which primitive dainty he has so gallantly defended against the disparaging sneers of Dr. Johnson and his bear-leader.¹ A huge brown loaf flanked his elbow, and it was placed upon a broad wooden trencher, that he might cut and come again with the bolder knife. Often did the Clerks' coach, commonly called among themselves the Lively — which trundled round every morning to pick up the brotherhood, and then deposited them at the proper minute in the Parliament Close — often did this lumbering hackney arrive at his door before he had fully appeased what Homer calls “the sacred rage of hunger;” and vociferous was the merriment of the learned uncles, when the surprised poet swung forth to join them, with an extemporised sandwich, that looked like a ploughman's luncheon in his hand. But this robust supply would have served him in fact for the day. He ate nothing more before dinner, and at dinner he ate sparingly as Squire Tovell's niece from the boarding-

¹ See Croker's Donnell (edit. 1831), vol. iii. p. 38.

— — — “Who cut the sanguine flesh in frustums fine
And marvelled much to see the creatures dine.”

The only dishes he was at all fond of were the old ones to which he had been accustomed in the days of Fairford; and which really are excellent dishes, truth, as Scotland borrowed from France before Cat Medicis brought in her Italian ricettasi to revolutionise the kitchen like the court. Of most of these, I believe, the course of his novels found some opportunity to re-estimate. But, above all, who can forget that his King amidst the splendours of Whitehall, thinks himself a monarch unless his first course includes cockylerkie?

It is a fact, which some philosophers may think worth putting down, that Scott's organisation, as to more than the senses, was the reverse of exquisite. He had very little of what musicians call an ear; his smell was hardly to be depended on; and his taste was not to be trusted. I have seen him stare about, quite unconsciously, when his whole company betrayed their uneasiness at the approach of an over-kept haunch of venison; and by the nose or the palate could he distinguish cork from sound. He could never tell Madeira from Sherry; an Oriental friend having sent him a butt of shceraz, remembered the circumstance some time afterwards, and for a bottle to have Sir John Malcolm's opinion of it; it turned out that his butler, mistaking the label, had served up half the butt as sherry. Port he considered as a medicine; he never willingly swallowed more than one glass of it, and was sure to anathematise a second, if offered. He peated John Home's epigram —

“Bold and erect the Caledonian stood,
Old was his mutton, and his claret good;
Let him drink port, the English statesman cried —
He drank the poison, and his spirit died.”

In truth, he liked no wines except sparkling champagne; but even as to this last he was no connoisseur; he sincerely preferred a tumbler of whisky-toddy to the most precious “liquid ruby” that ever flowed in the cup of a monarch. He rarely took any other potation when quite alone.

family; but at the Sunday board he circulated the champaign briskly during dinner, and considered a pint of claret each man's fair share afterwards. I should not omit, however, that his Bourdeaux was uniformly preceded by a small libation of the genuine mountain dew, which he poured with his own hand, more majorum, for each guest—making use for the purpose of such a multifarious collection of ancient Highland quaihs (little cups of curiously dovetailed wood, inlaid with silver) as no Lowland sideboard but his was ever equipped with—but commonly reserving for himself one that was peculiarly precious in his eyes, as having travelled from Edinburgh to Derby in the canteen of Prince Charlie. This relic had been presented to “the wandering Ascanius” by some very careful follower, for its bottom is of glass, that he who quaffed might keep his eye the while upon the dirk hand of his companion.

The sound of music—even, I suspect, of any sacred music but psalm-singing)—would be considered indecorous in the streets of Edinburgh on a Sunday night; so, upon the occasions I am speaking of, the harp was silent, and Otterburne and The Bonnie House of Airlie must needs be dispensed with. To make amends, after tea in the drawing-room, Scott usually read some favourite author for the amusement of his little circle; or Erskine, Ballantyne, or Terry, did so, at his request. He himself read aloud high poetry with far greater simplicity, depth, and effect, than any other man I ever heard; and in Macbeth or Julius Caesar, or the like, I doubt if Kemble could have been more impressive. Yet the changes of intonation were so gently managed, that he contrived to set the different interlocutors clearly before us, without the least approach to theatrical artifice. Not so the others I have mentioned; they all read cleverly and agreeably, but with the decided trickery of stage recitation. To them he usually gave the book when it was a comedy, or, indeed, any other drama than Shakspeare's or Joanna Baillie's. Dryden's Fables, Johnson's two Satires, and certain detached scenes of Beaumont and Fletcher, especially that in the Lover's Progress, where the ghost of the musical innkeeper makes his appearance, were frequently selected. Of the poets, his contemporaries, however, there was not one that did not come in for his part. In Wordsworth, his pet pieces were, I think, the Song for Brougham Castle, the Laodamia, and some of the early sonnets:—in Southey, Queen Orraca, Fernando Ramirez, the Lines on the Holly Tree—and, of his larger poems, the Thalaba. Crabbe was perhaps, next to Shakspeare, the standing resource; but in those days Byron was pouring out fresh and full; and, if a new piece from his hand had it was sure to be read by Scott the Sunday evening and that with such delighted emphasis as showed plainly the elder bard had kept all his enthusiasm for the pitch of youth, all his admiration of genius, free, unstained by the least drop of literary jealousy, beautiful example of a happily constituted and virtuously disciplined mind and character!

Let me turn, meanwhile, to a table very different from my own, at which, from this time forward, I often met Scott.

James Ballantyne then lived in St. John Street, a row of old-fashioned, and spacious houses, adjoining the Castle and Holyrood, and at no great distance from his printing establishment. He had married a few years before the death of a wealthy farmer in Berwickshire — a quiet and unassuming man of simple manners, and perfectly domestic habits: a fine young children were growing up about him, and he usually, if not constantly, had under his roof his aged mother, and his and his wife's tender care of whom it was most piteous to witness. As far as a stranger might judge, there could not be a more exemplary household, or a happier one; and when I occasionally met the poet in St. John Street when there were no other guests but Erskine, Torry, George Hogarth, and another intimate friend or two, and when James Ballantyne was content to appear in his own true and best character as the kind head of his family, the respectful but honest acknowledgment of Scott, the easy landlord of a plain, comfortable table, when any great event was about to take place in the literary world, especially on the eve of a new novel, there were doubtless a higher strain in St. John Street; and to be present at those scenes was truly a rich treat, even — if not especially so for persons who, like myself, had no more knowledge of the rest of the world as to the authorship of Waverley than I had — were congregated about the printer all his own literary friends, of whom a considerable number were by no means unfamiliar with "THE GREAT UNKNOWN:" — who, by the way, owed to him that widely adopted title; — and He who presided among the rest with his usual open aspect of buoyant and cheerful humour — although it was not difficult to trace, in the play of his features, the diversion it afforded him to watch all the procedure of his swelling confidant, and the curious neophytes that surrounded the well-spread board.

¹ George Hogarth, Esq. W.S., brother of Mrs. James Ballantyne, a gentleman is now well known in the literary world; especially in the History of Music, of which all who understand that science are acquainted with — 1848.

The feast was, to use one of James's own favourite epithets, gorgeous; an aldermanic display of turtle and venison, with the suitable accompaniments of iced punch, potent ale, and generous Madeira. When the cloth was drawn, the burley preses arose, with all he could muster of the port of John Kemble, and spouted with a sonorous voice the formula of Macbeth:—

“ Fill full !
I drink to the general joy of the whole table ! ”

This was followed by “ The King, God bless him ! ” and second came — “ Gentlemen, there is another toast which never has been nor shall be omitted in this house of mine — I give you the health of Mr. Walter Scott with three times three ! ” — All honour having been done to this health, and Scott having briefly thanked the company with some expressions of warm affection to their host, Mrs. Ballantyne retired; — the bottles passed round twice or thrice in the usual way; — and then James rose once more, every vein on his brow distended, his eyes solemnly fixed upon vacancy, to propose, not as before in his stentorian key, but with “ bated breath,” in the sort of whisper by which a stage conspirator thrills the gallery — “ Gentlemen, a bumper to the immortal Author of Waverley ! ” — The uproar of cheering, in which Scott made a fashion of joining, was succeeded by deep silence, and then Ballantyne proceeded —

“ In his Lord-Burleigh look, serene and serious,
A something of imposing and mysterious ” — to lament the obscurity in which his illustrious but too modest correspondent still chose to conceal himself from the plaudits of the world — to thank the company for the manner in which the nomina umbra had been received — and to assure them that the Author of Waverley would, when informed of the circumstance, feel highly delighted — “ the proudest hour of his life,” &c. &c. The cool demure fun of Scott's features during all this mummery was perfect; and Erskine's attempt at a gay nonchalance was still more ludicrously meritorious. Aldiborontiphosco-phornio, however, bursting as he was, knew too well to allow the new novel to be made the subject of discussion. Its name was announced, and success to it crowned another cup; but after that, no more of Jedediah. To cut the thread out unbidden some one of his many theatrical songs, that would have done no dishonour to almost any of The Maid of Lodi — or perhaps, The Day of Biscay — The sweet little cherub that sits up aloft — Other followed, interspersed with ditties from other performers. George Thomson, the friend of Burns, was ready, for The Moorland Wedding, or Willie brew'd a peck o' — and so it went on, until Scott and Erskine, with an or very staid personage that had chanced to be admitted to withdraw. Then the scene was changed — and olives made way for broiled bones and a night punch; and when a few glasses of the hot beverage restored his powers, James opened ore rotundo on the forthcoming romance. "One chapter — one chapter — was the cry. After "Nay, by'r Lady, nay!" and a coy shift, the proof-sheets were at length produced, and with many a prefatory hem, read aloud what he considered the most striking dialogue they contained.

The first I heard so read was the interview between Deans, the Duke of Argyle, and Queen Caroline, in Leinster Park; and notwithstanding some spice of the pomp to which he was addicted, I must say he did the scene great justice. At all events, the effect it produced deep and memorable, and no wonder that the exulting rapher's one bumper more to Jedediah Cleishbotham — his parting stave, which was uniformly The Last Marmion, executed certainly with no contemptible Braham.

What a different affair was a dinner, although precluding many of the same guests, at the junior partner in those days retained, I think, no private apartments, to his auction-rooms in Hanover Street, over the door he still kept emblazoned "John Ballantyne and Co. Booksellers." At any rate, such of his entertainments as ever saw Scott partake of, were given at his villa near Frith of Forth, by Trinity; — a retreat which the latter had invested with an air of dainty voluptuous finery, differing strikingly enough with the substantial citizen-like neatness of his elder brother's domestic appointments. It was surrounded by gardens so contrived as to seen to a considerable extent, having many a shady tuft, trellised mysterious alcove, interspersed among their bright flowers. His professional excursions to Paris and Brussels it objects of vertu, had supplied both the temptation and the means to set forth the interior in a fashion that might have satisfied the most fastidious petite maitresse of Norwood or St. Denis. John, too, was a married man: he had, however, erected for himself a private wing, the accesses to which, whether from the main building or the bosquet, were so narrow that it was physically impossible for the handsome and portly lady who bore his name to force her person through any one of them. His dinners were in all respects Parisian, for his wasted palate disdained such John Bull luxuries as were all in all with James. The piquant paste of Strasburg or Perigord was never to seek; and even the pièce de résistance was probably a boar's head from Coblenz, or a turkey ready stuffed with truffles from the Palais Royal. The pictures scattered among John's innumerable mirrors were chiefly of theatrical subjects — many of them portraits of beautiful actresses — the same Peg Woffingtons, Bellamys, Kitty Clives, and so forth, that found their way in the sequel to Charles Mathews's gallery at Highgate. Here that exquisite comedian's own mimeries and parodies were the life and soul of many a festival, and here, too, he gathered from his facetious host not a few of the richest materials for his at homes and monopolylogues. But, indeed, whatever actor or singer of eminence visited Edinburgh, of the evenings when he did not perform several were sure to be reserved for Trinity. Here Braham quavered, and here Liston drolled his best — here Johnstone, and Murray, and Yates, mixed jest and stave — here Kean revelled and rioted — and here the Roman Kemble often played the Greek from sunset to dawn. Nor did the popular danseuse of the time disdain to freshen her roses, after a laborious week, amidst these Paphian arbours.

Johnny had other tastes that were equally expensive. He had a well-furnished stable, and followed the fox-hounds whenever the covert was within an easy distance. His horses were all called after heroes in Scott's poems or novels; and at this time he usually rode up to his auction on a tall milk-white hunter, yeleft Old Mortality, attended by a leash or two of greyhounds, — Die Vernon, Jenny Dennison, and so forth, by name. The featherweight himself appeared uniformly, hammer-in-hand, in the half-dress of some sporting-club — a light grey frock, with emblems of the chase on its silver buttons, white cord breeches, and jockey-boots in Meltonian order. Yet he affected in the pulpit rather a grave address; and was really one of the most plausible and imposing of the Puff tribe.

Probably Scott's presence overawed his ludicrous propensities; for the poet was, when sales were going on, almost a daily attendant in Hanover Street, and himself not the least energetic of the numerous competitors for Johnny's ancient Aljeers, Venetian lamps, Milanese cuirasses, and old Dutch cabinets. Mauda, by the way, was so well aware of his master's habits, that about the time when the Court of Session was likely to break up for the day, he might usually be seen couched in expectation among Johnny's own tail of greyhounds at the threshold of the mart.

It was at one of those Trinity dinners this summer that I first saw Constable. Being struck with his appearance, I asked Scott who he was, and he told me — expressing some surprise that anybody should have lived a winter or two in Edinburgh without knowing, by sight at least, a citizen whose name was so familiar to the world. I happened to say that I had not been prepared to find the great bookseller a man of such gentlemanlike and even distinguished bearing. Scott smiled, and answered — “Ay, Constable is indeed a grand-looking chield. He puts me in mind of Fielding's apology for Lady Booby — to wit, that Joseph Andrews had an air which, to those who had not seen many noblemen, would give an idea of nobility.” I had not in those days been much initiated in the private jokes of what is called, by way of excellence, the trade, and was puzzled when Scott, in the course of the dinner, said to Constable, “Will your Czarish Majesty do me the honour to take a glass of champaign?” I asked the master of the feast for an explanation. “Oh!” said he, “are you so green as not to know that Constable long since dubbed himself The Czar of Muscovy, John Murray The Emperor of the West, and Longman and his string of partners The Diran?” — “And what title,” I asked, “has Mr. John Ballantyne himself found in this new almanach imperial?” — “Let that flee stick to the wa’,” quoth Johnny: “When I set up for a bookseller, The Crafty christened me The Dey of Alljeers — but he now considers me as next thing to dethroned.” He added — “His Majesty the autoerat is too fond of these nicknames. One day a partner of the house of Longman was dining with him in the country, to settle an important piece of business, about which there occurred a good deal of difficulty. ‘What fine swans you have in your pond there!’ said the Londoner, by way of parenthesis. — ‘Swans!’ cried Constable; ‘they are only geese, man. There are just five of them, if you please to observe, and their names are Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, and Brown.’ This skit cost The Crafty a good bargain.”

It always appeared to me that James Ballantyne felt his genius rebuked in the presence of Constable: his manner was constrained, his smile servile, his hilarity elaborate. Not so with Johnny: the little fellow never seemed more airily frolicsome than when he capered for the amusement of the Czar.

When I visited Constable, as I often did at a period somewhat later than that of which I now speak, and for the most part in company with Scott, I found the bookseller established in a respectable country gentleman's seat, some six or seven miles out of Edinburgh, and doing the honours of it with all the ease that might have been looked for had he been the long-descended owner of the place; — there was no foppery, no show, no idle luxury, but to all appearance the plain abundance and simple enjoyment of hereditary wealth. His conversation was manly and vigorous, abounding in Scotch anecdotes of the old time, which he told with a degree of spirit and humour only second to his great author's. No man could more effectually control, when he had a mind, either the extravagant vanity which, on too many occasions, made him ridiculous, or the despotic temper which habitually held in fear and trembling all such as were in any sort dependent on his Czarish Majesty's pleasure. In him I never saw (at this period) anything but the unobtrusive sense and the calm courtesy of a well-bred gentleman. His very equipage kept up the series of contrasts between him and the two Ballantynes. Constable went back and forward between the town and Polton in a deep hung and capacious green barouche, without any pretence at heraldic blazonry, drawn by a pair of sleek, black, long-tailed horses, and conducted by a grave old coachman in plain blue livery. The Printer of the Canongate drove himself and his wife about the streets and suburbs in a snug machine, which did not overburthen one powerful and steady cob; — while the gay Auctioneer, whenever he left the saddle for the box, mounted a bright blue dog-cart, and rattled down the Newhaven road with two high-mettled steeds prancing tandem before him.

The Sheriff told with peculiar unctiousness the following anecdote of this spark: — The first time he went over to pick up curiosities at Paris, it happened that he met, in the course of his traffickings, a certain brother bookseller of Edinburgh, as unlike him as one man could well be to another — a grave, dry Presbyterian, rigid in all his notions as the buckle of his wig. This precise worthy having ascertained John's address, went to call on him a day or two afterwards, with the news of some richly illuminated missal, which he might possibly be glad to make prize of. On asking for his friend, a smiling lignons de place informed him that Monsieur had gone out, but that Madame was at home. Not doubting that Mrs. Ballantyne had accompanied her husband on his trip, he desired to pay his respects to Madame, and was ushered in accordingly. "But oh, Mr. Scott!" said, or rather groaned the austere elder on his return from this modern Babylon — "oh, Mr. Scott, there was nae Mrs. John yonder, but a painted Jezebel sittin' up in her bed, wi' a wheen impudent French hummers like Israel, and twa or three whiskered blackguards, takin' their collation o' nicknacks and champagne wine. I ran out o' the house as if I had been shot. What judgment will this wicked world come to! The Lord pity us!" Scott was a severe enough censor in the general of such levities, but somehow, in the case of Rigdumfunnidos, he seemed to regard them with much the same toleration as the naughty tricks of a monkey in the "Jardin des Plantes."

Why did Scott persist in mixing up all his most important concerns with these Ballantynes? The reader of these pages will have all my materials for an answer; but in the meantime let it suffice to say, that he was the most patient, long-suffering, affectionate, and charitable of mankind; that in the case of both the brothers he could count, after all, on a sincerely, nay, a passionately devoted attachment to his person; that, with the greatest of human beings, use us in all but unconquerable power; and that he who so loftily tossed aside the seemingly most dangerous assaults of flattery, the blandishment of dames, the condescension of princes, the enthusiasm of crowds — had still his weak point, upon which two or three humble besiegers, and one unwearied, though most frivolous underminer, well knew how to direct their approaches. It was a favourite saw of his own, that the wisest of our race often reserve the average stock of folly to be all expended upon some one flagrant absurdity.

I alluded to James Ballantyne's reading of the famous scene in Richmond Park. According to Scott's original intention, the second series of Jedediah was to have included two tales; but his Jeanie Deans soon grew so on his fancy as to make this impossible; and the Heart of Mid-Lothian alone occupied the four volumes which appeared in June 1818, and were at once placed by acclamation in the foremost rank of his writings. Lady Louisa Stuart's picture of the southern rapture may be found elsewhere; but I must not omit here her own remarks on the principal character: — "People were beginning to say the author would wear himself out; it was going on too long in the same key, and no striking notes could possibly be produced. On the contrary, I think the interest is stronger here than in any of the former ones—(always excepting my first-love Waverley)—and one may congratulate you upon having effected what many have tried to do, and nobody yet succeeded in, making the perfectly good character the most interesting. Of late days, especially since it has been the fashion to write moral and even religious novels, one might almost say of some of the wise good heroines, what a lively girl once said of her well-meaning aunt—‘Upon my word she is enough to make anybody wicked.’ And though beauty and talents are heaped on the right side, the writer, in spite of himself, is sure to put agreeableness on the wrong; the person from whose errors he means you should take warning, runs away with your secret partiality in the meantime. Had this very story been conducted by a common hand, Effie would have attracted our concern and sympathy—Jennie only cold approbation. Whereas Jennie, without youth, beauty, genius, warm passions, or any other novel-perfection, is here our object from beginning to end. This is ‘enlisting the affections in the cause of virtue’ ten times more than ever Richardson did; for whose male and female pedants, all-excelling as they are, I never could care half so much as I found myself inclined to do for Jennie before I finished the first volume.”

From the choice of localities, and the splendid blazoning of tragical circumstances that had left the strongest impression on the memory and imagination of every inhabitant, the reception of this tale in Edinburgh was a scene of all-engrossing enthusiasm, such as I never witnessed there on the appearance of any other literary novelty. But the admiration and delight were the same all over Scotland. Never before had he seized such really noble features of the national character as were canonised in the person of his homely heroine: no art had ever devised a happier running contrast than that of her and her sister, or interwoven a portraiture of lowly manners and simple virtues, with more graceful delineations of polished life, or with bolder shadows of terror, guilt, crime, remorse, madness, and all the agony of the passions.

CHAPTER X.

Sketches of Abbotsford—Illness and Domestic Afflictions—The Bride of Lammermoor—The Legend of Montrose—Ivanhoe. 1818-1819.

THE 12th of July [1818] restored Scott as usual to the supervision of his trees and carpenters; but he had already told the Ballantynes, that the story which he had found it impossible to include in the recent series should be forthwith taken up as the opening one of a third; and instructed John to embrace the first favourable opportunity of offering Constable the publication of this, on the footing of 10,000 copies again forming the first edition; but now at length without any more stipulations connected with the "old stock."

Before he settled himself to his work, however, he made a little tour of the favourite description with his wife and children—halting for a few days at Drumlanrig, thence crossing the Border to Carlisle and Rokeby, and returning by way of Alnwick. On the 17th August, he writes thus to John Ballantyne from Drumlanrig—"This is heavenly weather, and I am making the most of it, as I shall have a laborious autumn before me. I may say of my head and fingers as the farmer of his mare, when he indulged her with an extra feed—

'Ye ken that Maggie winna sleep
For that or Summer.'

We have taken our own horses with us, and I have my pony, and ride when I find it convenient."

The following letter to Mr. Morrith of Rokeby, M.P., seems to have been among the first he wrote after his return:—

"ABBOTSFORD, 10th Sept. 1818.

"MY DEAR MORRITH,—We have been cruising to and fro rupted my purpose of telling you as how we arrived safe at Abbotsford, without a drop of rain, thus completing a tour of three weeks in the same fine weather in which we commenced it—a thing which never fell to my lot before. Captain Fergusson is inducted into the office of Keeper of the Regalia, to the great joy, I think, of all Edinburgh. He has entered upon a farm (of eleven acres) in consequence of this advancement, for you know it is a general rule, that whenever a Scotsman gets his head above water, he immediately turns it to land. As he has already taken all the advice of all the notables in and about the good village of Darnick, we expect to see his farm look like a tailor's book of patterns, a strip of every several opinion which he has received occupying its appropriate corner. He is truly what the French call un docteur de corps."

One of his visitors of September was Mr. R. Cadell, who was now in all the secrets of his father-in-law and partner Constable; and observing how his host was harassed with lion-hunters, and what a number of hours he spent daily in the company of his work-people, he expressed, during one of their walks, his wonder that Scott should ever be able to write books at all while in the country. "I know," he said, "that you contrive to get a few hours in your own room, and that may do for the mere pen-work; but when is it that you think?"—"Oh," said Scott, "I lie simmering over things for an hour or so before I get up—and there's the time I am dressing to overhaul my half-sleeping, half-waking, projet de chapitre—and when I get the paper before me, it commonly runs off pretty easily. Besides, I often take a dose in the plantations, and while Tom marks out a dyke or a drain, as I have directed, one's fancy may be running its ain riggs in some other world."

It was in the month following that I first saw Abbotsford. He invited my friend John Wilson (now Professor of Moral Philosophy at Edinburgh) and myself to visit him for a day or two on our return from an excursion to Mr. Wilson's beautiful villa on Windermere, but named the particular day (October 8th) on which it would be most convenient for him to receive us; and we discovered on our arrival, that he had fixed it from a good-natured motive. We found him walking at no great distance from the house, with five or six young people, and his friends Lord Melville and Adam Fergusson. Having presented us to the first Lord of the Admiralty, he fell back a little and said "I am glad you came to-day, for I thought it might be of use to you both, some time or other, to be known to my old school-fellow here, who is, and I hope will long continue to be, the great giver of good things in the Parliament House. I trust you have had enough of certain pranks with your friend Ebony, and if so, Lord Melville will have too much sense to remember them."¹ We then walked round a plantation called the Thicket, and came back to the house by a formidable work which he was constructing for the defence of his haugh against the wintry violences of the Tweed; and he discoursed for some time with keen interest upon the comparative merits of different methods of embankment, but stopped now and then to give us the advantage of any point of view in which his new building on the eminence above pleased his eye. It had a fantastic appearance—being but a fragment of the existing edifice—and not at all harmonising in its outline with the original tenement to the eastward. Scott, however, expatiated con amore on the rapidity with which, being chiefly of darkish granite, it was assuming a "time-honoured" aspect. Fergusson, with a grave and respectful look observed, "Yes, it really has much the air of some old fastness hard by the river Jordan." This allusion to a so-called Chaldee MS., in the manufacture of which Fergusson fancied Wilson and myself to have had a share, gave rise to a burst of laughter among Scott's merry young folks, while he himself drew in his nether lip and rebuked the Captain with "Toots, Adam! Toots, Adam!" He then returned to his embankment, and described how a former one had been entirely swept away in one night's flood. But the Captain was ready with another verse of the Oriental MS., and groaned out by way of echo—"Verily my fine gold hath perished!"² Whereupon the "Great Magician" elevated his huge oaken staff as if to lay it on the waggish soldier's back—but flourished it gaily over his own head, and laughed louder than the youngest of the company. As we walked and talked, the Pepper and Mustard terriers kept snuffing about among the bushes and heather near us, and started every five minutes a hare, which scudded away before them and the ponderous stag-hound Maida—the Sheriff and all his tail hollowing and cheering in perfect confidence that the dogs could do no harm to poor puss than the venerable tom cat, Hunsfeldt, who pursued the vain chase with the rest.

¹ Ebony was Mr. Blackwood's own usual designation in the jeux d'esprit of his young Magazine, in many of which the persons thus addressed by Scott were conjoint culprits. They both were then, as may be inferred, sweeping the boards of the Parliament House as "briefless barristers."

² See Blackwood for October 1817.

At length we drew near Peterhouse, and found so himself, and his brother-in-law the facetious Factor Purdie, superintending, pipe in mouth, three or four labourers busy in laying down the turf for a bowl. "I have planted hollies all round it, you see," said Scott, "I have laid out an arbour on the right-hand side for the use of the ladies here I mean to have a game at bowls after dinner in fine weather — for I take that to have been among the indispensables of our old vie de chateau." But I must not dwell on the reason he gave me some time afterwards for having that spot for his bowling-green. "In truth," he said, "I wished to have a smooth walk and a sunny seat within ear-shot of Peter's evening psalm." The Factor was a devout Presbyterian, and many a time have I years accompanied Scott on his evening stroll, when the principal object was to enjoy, from the bowling-green, the sweetening melody of this good man's family-worship — and to hear him repeat, as Peter's manly voice led the humble choir, that beautiful stanza of Burns's Saturday Night: —

"They chant their artless notes in simple guise;
They tune their hearts, by far the noblest aim," &c.

It was near the dinner-hour before we reached the house, and presently I saw assembled a larger company than I could have fancied to be at all compatible with the existing accommodations of the place; but it turned out that Adam and the friends whom I have not as yet mentioned were to find quarters elsewhere for the night. His youngest son, Captain John Fergusson of the Royal Navy (a favourite tenant of Lord Nelson's), had come over from Huntly; there were present also, Mr. Scott of Gala, whose residence was within an easy distance; Sir Henry Hay Macdonough of Erston, an old baronet, with gay, lively, and highly polished manners, related in the same degree to both Galsburgh and Sheriff; Sir Alexander Don, the member for Roxburgh, whose elegant social qualities have been alluded to in the preceding chapter; and Dr. Scott of Darnley, a modest and unassuming gentleman who, having realised a fortune in the East India Company's medical service, had settled within two miles of Abbotsford, and, though no longer practising fession, had kindly employed all the resources of his skill in the endeavour to counteract his neighbour's recent liability to attacks of cramp. Our host and one or two others appeared, as was in those days a common fashion with country gentlemen, in the lieutenant uniform of their county. How fourteen or fifteen people contrived to be seated in the then dining-room of Abbotsford I know not — for it seemed quite full enough when it contained only eight or ten; but so it was — nor, as Sir Harry Maedougal's fat valet, warned by former experience, did not join the train of attendants, was there any perceptible difficulty in the detail of the arrangements. Everything about the dinner was, as the phrase runs, in excellent style; and in particular the potage à la Meg Merrilees, announced as an attempt to imitate a device of the Duke of Buccleuch's celebrated cook — by name Monsieur Florence — seemed, to those at least who were better acquainted with the Kaim of Derneleugh than with the cuisine of Bowhill,¹ a very laudable specimen of the art. The champaign circulated nimbly — and I never was present at a gayer dinner. It had advanced a little beyond the soup when it received an accompaniment which would not, perhaps, have improved the satisfaction of southern guests, had any such been present. A tall and stalwart bagpiper, in complete Highland costume, appeared pacing to and fro on the green before the house, and the window being open, it seemed as if he might as well have been straining his lungs within the parlour. At a pause of his strenuous performance, Scott took occasion to explain, that John of Skye was a recent acquisition to the rising hamlet of Abbotstown; that the man was a capital hedger and ditcher, and only figured with the pipe and philabeg on high occasions in 'the after part of the day; "but indeed," he added, laughing, "I fear John will soon be discovering that the hook and mattock are unfavourable to his chanter hand." When the cloth was drawn, and the never-failing salver of quaijhs introduced, John Bruce, upon some well-known signal, entered the room, but en militaire, without removing his bonnet, and taking his station behind the landlord, received from his hand the largest of the Celtic bickers brimful of Glenlivet. The man saluted the company in his own dialect, tipped off the contents (probably a quarter of an English pint of raw aquavita) at a gulp, wheeled about as solemnly as if the whole ceremony had been a movement on parade, and forthwith recommenced his jubrecha and gathering continued until long after the ladies had left the room; the autumnal moon was streaming in upon us so brightly as to dim the candles.

¹ I understand that this now celebrated soup was extemporised by M. Florence on Scott's first visit to Bowhill after the publication of Guy Mannering.

I had never before seen Scott in such buoyant spirits; he shewed this evening—and I never saw him in higher spirits; and no wonder, for this was the first time since Lord Melville, and Adam Fergusson, daily companions of his at the High School of Edinburgh, and partners in many joys of the early volunteer period, had met since the commencement of what I may call the serious part of any of their lives. The great poet and novelist was receiving them under his own roof when his fame was at its acme, and his fortune seeming to be mounting to about a corresponding height—and the generous liberance of his hilarity might have overflowed without the spleen of a Cynic. Old stories of the Yards and the causeway were relieved by sketches of real warfare; and none but Fergusson (or Charles Mathews, had he been a soldier) could ever have given; and they toasted the memory of Greenbreeks and the health of the Beau with equal devotion.

When we rose from table, Scott proposed that we should ascend his western turret, to enjoy a moonlight view of the valley. The younger part of his company were too good to do so: some of the seniors, who had tried the thing before, found pretexts for hanging back. The stairs were crowded, and steep; but the Sheriff piloted the way, and there were as many on the top as it could well afford to hold. Nothing could be more lovely than the panorama; the harsher and more naked features being lost in the moonlight; the Tweed and the Gala winding and sparkling beneath our feet; and the distant ruins of Melrose appearing as if carved of alabaster, under the black mass of the tower. The poet, leaning on his battlement, seemed to hang in the beautiful vision as if he had never seen it before. “I will build me a higher tower, with a more spacious platform, and a staircase better fitted for an old man’s scrambling.” The piper was heard returning his instrument below, and he called to him for Lachaber no mor; the piper of Skye obeyed, and as the music rose, softened by the distance, Scott repeated in a low key the melancholy words of the song of exile.

On descending from the tower, the whole company assembled in the new dining-room, which was still under the hands of the carpenters, but had been brilliantly illuminated.

for the occasion. Mr. Bruce took his station, and old and young danced reels to his melodious accompaniment until they were weary, while Scott and the Dominie looked on with glad-some faces, and beat time now and then, the one with his staff, the other with his wooden leg. A tray with mulled wine and whisky punch was then introduced, and Lord Melville proposed a bumper, with all the honours, to the Roof-tree. Captain Fergusson having sung Johnnie Cope, called on the young ladies for Kenmure's on and awa'; and our host then insisted that the whole party should join, standing in a circle hand-in-hand more majorum, in the hearty chorus of “ Weel may we a' be,

Ill may we never see,
God bless the king and the gude companie! ”

— which being duly performed, all dispersed. Such was the handsel — (for Scott protested against its being considered as the househeating) — of the new Abbotsford.

Awakening between six and seven next morning, I heard the Sheriff's voice close to me, and looking out of the little latticed window of the then detached cottage called the Chapel, saw him and Tom Purdie pacing together on the green before the door, in earnest deliberation over what seemed to be a rude daub of a drawing; and every time they approached my end of their parade, I was sure to catch the words Blue Bank. It turned out in the course of the day, that a field of clay near Toftfield went by this name, and that the draining of it was one of the chief operations then in hand. My friend Wilson, meanwhile, who lodged also in the chapel, tapped also at the door, and asked me to rise and take a walk with him by the river, for he had some angling project in his head. He went out and joined in the consultation about the Blue Bank, while I was dressing; presently Scott hailed me at the casement, and said he had observed a volume of a new edition of Goethe on my table — would I lend it him for a little? He carried off the volume accordingly, and retreated with it to his den. It contained the Faust, and I believe in a more complete shape than he had before seen that masterpiece of his old favourite. When we met at breakfast, a couple of hours after, he was full of the poem — dwelt with enthusiasm on the airy beauty of its lyrics, the terrible pathos of the scene before the Mater Dolorosa, and the deep skill shewn in the various subtle shadings of character between Mephistopheles and poor Margaret. He remarked, however, of the Introduction (which I suspect was new to him), that blood would out — that, even as an artist as he was, Goethe was a German, and that even a German would ever have provoked a comparison with the book of Job, “the grandest poem that ever was written,” added, that he suspected the end of the story had been written in obscura, from despair to match the closing scene of Marlowe’s Doctor Faustus. Mr. Wilson mentions that Coleridge was engaged on a translation of the poem, and “I hope it is so,” said Scott: “Coleridge made Schiller’s poem far finer than he found it, and so he will do by this. Every man has all the resources of poetry in such profusion, but he cannot manage them so as to bring out all that is his own on a large scale at all worthy of his gifts. The ore is like a lump of coal rich with gas, which lies dormant in itself in puffs and gleams, unless some shrewd hand comes to blow it into a cast-iron box, and compel the compressed gas to do itself justice. His fancy and diction would have placed him above all his contemporaries, had they been directed by the direction of a sound judgment and a steady will. We now expect a great original poem from Coleridge, but he will easily make a sort of fame for himself as a poetical translator, that would be a thing completely unique and unprecedented.”

While this criticism proceeded, Scott was cutting up his brown loaf and a plate of kippered salmon, which strongly reminded me of Dandie Dinmont’s at Mump’s Hall; nor was his German topic at all the dominant one. On the contrary, the sentences which dwelt on my memory dropt from him now and then in the pauses, as it were, of his main talk; — for though he could not help recurring, ever and anon, to the subject of the day, he had not been quite out of his way to make any literary allusion the chief theme of his conversation, when there was no other person present who was not likely to feel much interest in its discussion. — How often have I heard him on such occasions, Mr. Vellum’s advice to the butler in the excellent play of The Drummer — “Your conjuror is indeed a twofold personage — but he eats and drinks with the people!”

Before breakfast was over the post-bag arrived, and its contents were so numerous, that Lord Melville asked what election was on hand — not doubting that there must be some very particular reason for such a shower of letters. He answered that it was much the same most common sort, and added, “though no one has kinder friends in the line, and though Freeeling and Croker especially¹ are always ready to stretch the point of privilege in my favour, I am nevertheless a fair contributor to the revenue, for I think my bill for letters seldom comes under £.150 a-year; and as to coach-parcels, they are a perfect rivation." He then told with high merriment a disaster that had lately befallen him. "One morning last spring," he said, "I opened a huge lump of a despatch, without looking how it was addressed never doubting that it had travelled under some omnipotent frank like the First Lord of the Admiralty's, when, lo and behold, the contents proved to be a MS. play, by a young lady of New York, who kindly requested me to read and correct it, equip it with prologue and epilogue, procure for it a favourable reception from the manager of Drury Lane, and make Murray or Constable bleed handsomely for the copyright; and on inspecting the cover, I found that I had been charged five pounds odd for the postage. This was bad enough, but there was no help, so I groaned and submitted. A fortnight or so after, another packet, of not less formidable bulk, arrived, and I was absent enough to break its seal too without examination. Conceive my horror when out jumped the same identical tragedy of The Cherokee Lovers, with a second epistle from the authoress, stating that, as the winds had been boisterous, she feared the vessel intrusted with her former communication might have foundered, and therefore judged it prudent to forward a duplicate."

Scott said he must retire to answer his letters, but that the sociable and the ponies would be at the door by one o'clock, when he proposed to shew Melrose and Dryburgh to Lady Melville and any of the rest of the party that chose to accompany them; adding that his son Walter would lead anybody who preferred a gun to the likeliest place for a black-cock, and that Charlie Purdie (Tom's brother) would attend on Mr. Wilson, and whoever else chose to try a cast of the salmon-rod. He withdrew when all this was arranged, and appeared at the time appointed, with perhaps a dozen letters sealed for the post, and a coach parcel addressed to James Ballantyne, which he dropt at the turnpike-gate as we drove to Melrose. Seeing it picked up by a dirty urchin, and carried into a hedge-pothouse, where half-a-dozen nondescript wayfarers were smoking and tipping, I could not but wonder that it had not been the fate of some one of those innumerable packets to fall into unscrupulous hands, and betray the grand secret. That very morning we had seen two post-chaises drawn up at his gate, and the enthusiastic travellers, seemingly decent tradesmen and their families, who must have been packed in a manner worthy of Mrs. Gilpin, lounging about to catch a glimpse of him at his going forth. But it was impossible in those days to pass between Melrose and Abbotsford without encountering some odd figure, armed with a sketch-book, evidently bent on a peep at the Great Unknown; and it must be allowed that many of these pedestrians looked as if they might have thought it very excusable to make prize, by hook or by crook, of a MS. chapter of the Tales of my Landlord.

¹Scott's excellent friend Sir Thomas Freeeling was Secretary of the Post-Office for a long series of years: Mr. Croker was Secretary of the Admiralty from 1809 to 1827.

Scott showed us the ruins of Melrose in detail, and as we proceeded to Dryburgh, descanted learnedly and sagaciously on the good effects which must have attended the erection of so many great monastic establishments in a district so peculiarly exposed to the inroads of the English in the days of the Border wars. "They were now and then violated," he said, "as their aspect to this hour bears witness; but for once that they suffered, any lay property similarly situated must have been harrid a dozen times. The bold Dunces, Laddells, and Howards, that could get easy absolution at York or Durham for any ordinary breach of a truce with the Scots, would have had to drée a heavy dole had they confessed plundering from the fat brothers, of the same order perhaps, whose lines had fallen to them on the wrong side of the Cheviot." He enlarged too on the heavy penalty which the Crown of Scotland had paid for its rash acquiescence in the wholesale robbery of the Church at the Reformation. "The proportion of the soil in the hands of the clergy had," he said, "been very great — too great to be continued. If we may judge by their share in the public burdens, they must have had nearly a third of the land in their possession. But this vast wealth was now distributed among a turbulent nobility, too powerful before; and the Stuarts soon found, that in the bishops and lord abbots they had lost the only means of balancing their factions, so as to turn the scale in favour of law and order; and by and by the haughty barons themselves, who had scrambled for the worldly spoil of the church, found that the spiritual influence had been concentrated in hands as haughty as their own, and connected with no feelings likely to buttress their order any more than the Crown — a new and sterner monkery, under a different name, and essentially plebeian. Presently the Scotch were on the verge of republicanism, in state as well as kirk, and I have sometimes thought it was only the accession of King Jamie to the throne of England that could have given monarchy a chance of prolonging its existence here." One of his friends asked what he supposed might have been the annual revenue of the abbey of Melrose in its best day. He answered, that he suspected, if all the sources of their income were now in clever hands, the produce could hardly be under L.100,000 a-year: and added — "Making every allowance for modern improvements, there can be no question that the sixty brothers of Melrose divided a princely rental. The superiors were often men of very high birth, and the great majority of the rest were younger brothers of gentlemen's families. I fancy they may have been, on the whole, pretty near akin to your Fellows of All Souls — who, according to their statute, must be bene nati, bene vestiti, et mediocriter docti. They had a good house in Edinburgh, where, no doubt, my lord abbot and his chaplains maintained a hospitable table during the sittings of Parliament." Some one regretted that we had no lively picture of the enormous revolution in manners that must have followed the downfall of the ancient Church of Scotland. He observed that there were, he fancied, materials enough for constructing such a one, but that they were mostly scattered in records — "of which," said he, "who knows anything to the purpose except Tom Thomson and John Riddell? It is common to laugh at such researches, but they pay the good brains that meddle with them; — and had Thomson been as diligent in setting down his discoveries as he has been in making them, he might, long before this time of day, have placed himself on a level with Ducange or Camden. The change in the countryside," he continued, "must indeed have been terrific; but it does not seem to have been felt very severely by a certain Boniface of St. Andrews, for when somebody asked him, on the subsidence of the storm, what he thought of all that had occurred, — 'Why,' answered mine host, 'it comes to this, that the moderatour sits in my meikle chair, where the dean sat before, and in place of calling for the third stoup of Bordeaux, bids Jenny bring ben anither bowl of toddy.'"

At Dryburgh Scott pointed out to us the sepulchral aisle of his Haliburton ancestors, and said he hoped, in God's appointed time, to lay his bones among their dust. The spot was, even then, a sufficiently interesting and impressive one; but I shall not say more of it at present.

On returning to Abbotsford, we found Mrs. Scott and her daughters doing penance under the merciless eye of a couple of tourists who had arrived from Selkirk and set out for Melrose. They were rich specimens — young men, both of them rigged out in new jackets of the Macgregor tartan, the one, as they knew, being a lawyer, the other a Unitarian preacher, from London. These gentlemen, when told on their arrival that Scott was not at home, had shown such signs of business, and asked if they would wish to speak to his lady. They grasped at this, and so conducted in the interview, that Mrs. Scott never doubted but that they brought letters of introduction to her husband, and accordingly to partake of her luncheon. They were walking about the house and grounds with her and the two daughters ever since that time, and appeared at the party when the Sheriff and his party returned to dinner, as if they were already fairly enrolled on his visiting list. For the two he too was taken in — he fancied that his wife must have received and opened their credentials — and shook them with courteous cordiality. But Mrs. Scott, overflowing good-nature, was a sharp observer; and a minute had elapsed, interrupted the exultant conversation of the strangers, by reminding them that her husband was glad to have the letters of the friends who had been long as to write by them. It then turned out that the letters were to be produced — and Scott, signifying that dinner approached, added, that as he supposed the two gentlemen would walk to Melrose, he could not trespass further on their time. The two lion-hunters seemed quite unprepared for this, and chose to exert it, the power of civil repulsion; he was overwhelmed originals to his door, and on re-entering the parlour, found Mrs. Scott complaining very indignantly that they had gone so far as to pull out their note-book, and to ask for an account, not only of his age — but of her own. She was half-relenting, laughed heartily at this misery. I am sure, however, that “if he were to take in all the world, he would better put up a sign-post at once, —

‘Porter, ale, and British spirits, Painted bright between two trees;’¹ and that no traveller of respectability could ever be

¹ Macneill's Will and Jean.

for such an introduction as would ensure his best hospitality.' Still he was not quite pleased with what had happened — and as we were about to pass, half an hour afterwards, from the drawing-room to the dining-room, he said to his wife, "Hang the Yahoos, Charlotte — but we should have bid them stay dinner." "Devil a bit," quoth Captain John Fergusson, who had again come over from Huntley Burn, and had been latterly assisting the lady to amuse her Americans — "Devil a bit, my dear, — they were quite in a mistake, I could see. The one asked Madame whether she deigned to call her new house Tullyveolan or Tillietudlem; and the other, when Maida happened to lay his nose against the window, exclaimed pro-di-gi-ous! In short, they evidently meant all the humbug not for you, but for the culprit of Waverley, and the rest of that there rubbish." "Well, well, Skipper," was the reply, — "for a' that, the loons would hae been mane the waur o' their kail."

From this banter it may be inferred that the younger Fergusson had not as yet been told the Waverley secret — which to any of that house could never have been any mystery. Probably this, or some similar occasion soon afterwards, led to his formal initiation; for during the many subsequent years that the veil was kept on, I used to admire the tact with which, when in their topmost high-jinks humour, both "Captain John" and "The Auld Captain" eschewed any the most distant allusion to the affair.

And this reminds me, that at the period of which I am writing, none of Scott's own family, except of course his wife, had the advantage in that matter of the skipper. Some of them, too, were apt, like him, so long as no regular confidence had been reposed in them, to avail themselves of the author's reserve for their own sport among friends. Thus, one morning, just as Scott was opening the door of the parlour, the rest of the party being already seated at the breakfast-table, the Dominic was in the act of helping himself to an egg, marked with a peculiar hieroglyphic by Mrs. Thomas Purdie, upon which Anne Scott, then a lively rattling girl of sixteen, lisped out, "That's a mysterious looking egg, Mr. Thomson — what if it should have been meant for the Great Unknown?" Ere the Dominic could reply, her father advanced to the foot of the table, and having seated himself and deposited his stick on the carpet beside him, with a sort of whispered whistle, "What's that Lady Anne's¹ saying?" quoth he; "I thought that it had been well known that the keelairned egg must be a soft one for the

¹ When playing in childhood with the young ladies of the Buccleuch family, she had been overheard saying to her namesake Lady Anne Scott,

And so he took his egg, and while all smiled in silence Anne said gaily, in the midst of her blushes, "Upon papa, I thought Mr. John Ballantyne might have pected." This allusion to Johnny's glory in being as the accredited representative of Jedediah Cleverly produced a laugh — at which the Sheriff frowned — laughed too.

I remember nothing particular about our second ner, except that it was then I first met my dear and friend William Laidlaw. The evening passed more quietly than the preceding one. Instead of the new new dining-room, we had a succession of old ballads harp and guitar by the young ladies of the house; when they seemed to have done enough, found some for taking down a volume of Crabbe, and read us favourite tales —

" Grave Jonas Kindred, Sibyl Kindred's sire, Was six feet high, and looked six inches higher."

But jollity revived in full vigour when the suppertroduced, and to cap all merriment, Adam Ferguson us with the Laird of Cockpen. Lord and Lady Melville to return to Melville Castle next morning, and Mr. V I happened to mention that we were engaged to dine at the seat of my friend and relation Mr. Pringle lee, on our way to Edinburgh. Scott immediately would send word in the morning to the Laird, that gusson meant to accompany us — such being the us ous style in which country neighbours in Scotland other. Next day, accordingly, we all rode over to the "distant Torwoodlee" of the Lay of the Last Minstrel tant not above five or six miles from Abbotsford.
hares as we proceeded, but inspecting the antiqui Catrail to the interruption of our sport. We had joyous evening at Torwoodlee. Scott and Ferguson home at night, and the morning after, as Wilson and for Edinburgh, our kind old host, his sides still sore ter, remarked that "the Sheriff and the Captain tog too much for any company."

Towards the end of this year Scott received from

"Well, I do wish I were Lady Anne too — it is so much Miss;" thenceforth she was commonly addressed in the coveted title.

mouth the formal announcement of the Prince Regent's desire (which had been privately communicated some months earlier through the Lord Chief-Commissioner Adam) to confer on him the rank of Baronet. When he first heard of the Regent's intention, he signified considerable hesitation; for it had not escaped his observation that such airy sounds, however modestly people may be disposed to estimate them, are apt to entail in the upshot additional cost upon their way of living, and to affect accordingly the plastic fancies, feelings, and habits of their children. But Lord Sidmouth's letter happened to reach him a few months after he had heard of the sudden death of Charles Carpenter, who had bequeathed the reversion of his fortune to his sister's family: and this circumstance disposed Scott to waive his scruples, chiefly with a view to the professional advantage of his eldest son, who had by this time fixed on the life of a soldier. As is usually the case, the estimate of Mr. Carpenter's property transmitted on his death to England proved to have been an exaggerated one; and at any rate no one of Scott's children lived to receive any benefit from the bequest. But it was thus he wrote at the time to Morritt: — "It would be easy saying a parcel of fine things about my contempt of rank, and so forth; but although I would not have gone a step out of my way to have asked, or bought, or begged, or borrowed a distinction, which to me personally will rather be inconvenient than otherwise, yet, coming as it does directly from the source of feudal honours, and as an honour, I am really gratified with it; — especially as it is intimated, that it is his Royal Highness's pleasure to heat the oven for me expressly, without waiting till he has some new batch of Baronets ready in dough. My poor friend Carpenter's bequest to my family has taken away a certain degree of impecuniosity, a necessity of saving cheese-parings and candle-ends, which always looks inconsistent with any little pretension to rank. But as things now stand, Advance banners in the name of God and St. Andrew! Remember, I anticipate the jest, 'I like not such grinning honours as Sir Walter hath.'¹ After all, if one must speak for themselves, I have my quarters and emblazonments, free of all stain but Border theft, and High Treason, which I hope are gentlemanlike crimes; and I hope Sir Walter Scott will not sound worse than Sir Humphry Davy, though my merits are as much under his, in point of utility, as can well be imagined. But a name is something, and mine is the better of the two."

¹ Sir Walter Blunt — 1st King Henry IV., Act V. Scene 3.

His health prevented him from going up to the honour for more than a year. Meantime his building operations continued to tax his resources more than calculated upon; and he now completed an important one with Constable, who agreed to give him bonds for the consideration of all his existing copyrights, namely shares had been reserved to him in the earlier part of the whole property in his novels down to the third series of my Landlord inclusive. The deed included a clause that Constable was to forfeit £2,000 if he ever "divulged of the Author of Waverley during the life of the said Scott, Esq." It is perhaps hardly worth mentioning, that at this date a London bookseller announced certain cheap Grub-Street manufactures, as "A New Series of the Landlord;" and when John Ballantyne, as the "author of Waverley," published a declaration that the thus advertised were not from that writer's pen, he was met by a declaration by an audacious rejoinder — impeaching his veracity, and asserting that nothing but the personal appearance of the gentleman for whom Ballantyne professed to shake his belief that he was himself in the countenance of the true Simon Pure. Hereupon the dropping of Scott seems to have been pronounced advisable by both Constable and Constable. But he calmly replied, "The Author of Waverley himself to such a trick must be a blockhead — let them publish, and that will serve our purpose better than any thing we ourselves could do." I have forgotten the names of the cheap manufactures, which, being published accordingly, fell still-born from the shelves.

During the winter he appears to have made little progress with the third series included in this negotiation; — his seizures of cramp were again recurring frequently, and he probably thought it better to allow the novels to lie over till his health should be re-established. In the meantime he published a set of topographical and historical essays, which appeared in the successive numbers of the splendidly illustrated work, entitled Provincial Antiquities of Scotland.¹ He published this merely to gratify his own love of the subject, and whether well or ill, he must be doing something. He declined pecuniary recompense; but afterwards, when the success of the publication was secure, accepted from the proprietor a handsome sum for the beautiful drawings by Turner, Thomson, and others, which had been prepared to accompany his text. He that winter his article on the Drama for the Encyclopædia Supplement, and the reviewal of the fourth canto of Childe Harold for the Quarterly.

¹ These charming essays are now included in his Miscellaneous Works.

On the 15th of February 1819, he witnessed the first representation, on the Edinburgh boards, of the most meritorious and successful of all the Terrifications, though Terry himself was not the manufacturer. The drama of Rob Roy will never again be got up so well in all its parts, as it then was by William Murray's Company; the manager's own Captain Thornton was excellent—and so was the Dugald Creature of a Mr. Duff—there was also a good Mattie—(about whose equipment, by the by, Scott felt such interest that he left his box between the acts to remind Mr. Murray that she “must have a mantle with her lanthorn;”)—but the great and unrivalled attraction was the personification of Baillie Jarvie, by Charles Mackay, who, being himself a native of Glasgow, entered into the minutest peculiarities of the character with high gusto, and gave the west-country dialect in its most racy perfection. It was extremely diverting to watch the play of Scott's features during this admirable realisation of his conception; and I must add, that the behaviour of the Edinburgh audience on all such occasions, while the secret of the novels was preserved, reflected great honour on their good taste and delicacy of feeling. He seldom, in those days, entered his box without receiving some mark of general respect and admiration; but I never heard of any pretext being laid hold of to connect these demonstrations with the piece he had come to witness, or, in short, to do or say anything likely to interrupt his quiet enjoyment of the evening in the midst of his family and friends.

This Rob Roy had a continued run of forty-one nights; and when the Baillie's benefit-night arrived, he received an epistle of kind congratulation signed Jedediah Cleishbotham, and enclosing a five-pound note: but all the while, Scott was in a miserable state, and when he left Edinburgh, in March, the alarm about him in the Parliament House was very serious. He had invited me to visit him in the country during the recess; but I should not have ventured to keep my promise, had not the Ballantynes reported amendment towards the close of April. John then told me that his “illustrious friend” (for so both the brothers usually spoke of him) was so much recovered as to have resumed his usual literary tasks, though with this difference, that he now, for the first time in his life, found it necessary to employ the hand of another.

He had now begun in earnest his Bride of Lammermoor, and his amanuenses were William Laidlaw and John B. — of whom he preferred the latter, when he could be found, on account of the superior rapidity of his pen — because John kept his pen to the paper without intermission, and, though with many an arch twinkle in his eyes, and then an audible smack of his lips, had resolution on like a well-trained clerk; whereas good Laidlaw, with such keen zest into the interest of the story as came from the author's lips, that he could not suppress expressions of surprise and delight — "Gude keep us a'! — the li — eh sirs! eh sirs!" — and so forth — which did not impede his despatch. I have often, however, in the sequel, heard these secretaries describe the astonishment with which they were equally affected when Scott began this experiment. The affectionate Laidlaw beseeching him to stop dictating, and his audible suffering filled every pause, "Nay, Willie," he would say, "only see that the doors are fast. I would fain keep the secret as well as all the wool to ourselves; but as to your work, that can only be when I am in woollen." John B. told me, that after the first day, he always took care to have a dozen of pens made before he seated himself to the sofa on which Scott lay, and that though he often rested himself on his pillow with a groan of torment, he continued the sentence in the same breath. But when this peculiar animation was in progress, spirit seemed to be altogether over matter — he arose from his couch and paced up and down the room, raising and lowering his voice as the parts were acting. It was in this fashion that he produced the far greater portion of The Bride of Lammermoor, the whole of the Legend of Montrose — and almost the whole of Ivanhoe. Yet when his health was fairly re-established, he disdained to avail himself of the power of dictation, and had thus put to the sharpest test, but resumed, and for many years resolutely adhered to, the old plan of writing with his own hand. When I once, some time after, expressed my surprise that he did not consult his case, he answered — "I should as soon think of getting into a new pair of shoes while I can use my legs."

But to return: — I rode out to Abbotsford with John B. towards the end of the spring vacation, and he had warned me of a sad change in Scott's appearance far beyond what I had been led to anticipate. He had a great deal of flesh — his clothes hung loose about countenance was meagre, haggard, and of the deadliest yellow of the jaundice — and his hair, which a few weeks before had been but slightly sprinkled with grey, was now almost literally snow-white. His eye, however, retained its fire unquenched; indeed it seemed to have gained in brilliancy from the new languor of the other features; and he received us with all the usual cordiality, and even with little perceptible diminishment in the sprightliness of his manner. He sat at the table while we dined, but partook only of some rice pudding; and after the cloth was drawn, while sipping his toast and water, pushed round the bottle in his old style, and talked with easy cheerfulness of the stout battle he had fought, and which he now seemed to consider as won.

“One day there was,” he said, “when I certainly began to have great doubts whether the mischief was not getting at my mind — and I’ll tell you how I tried to reassure myself on that score. I was quite unfit for anything like original composition; but I thought if I could turn an old German ballad I had been reading into decent rhymes, I might dismiss my worst apprehensions — and you shall see what became of the experiment.” He then desired his daughter Sophia to fetch the MS. of The Noble Murringer, as it had been taken down from his dictation, partly by her and partly by Mr. Laidlaw, during one long and painful day while he lay in bed. He read it to us as it stood, and seeing that both Ballantyne and I were much pleased with the verses, he said he should copy them over, — make them a little “tighter about the joints,” — and give them to the Register for 1816.

The reading of this long ballad, however, — (it consists of forty-three stanzas)¹ — seemed to have exhausted him: he retired to his bed-room; and an hour or two after, when we were about to follow his example, his family were distressed by the well-known symptoms of another sharp recurrence of his affliction. A large dose of opium and the hot bath were immediately put in requisition. His good neighbour, Dr. Scott of Darnlee, was sent for, and soon attended; and in the course of three or four hours we learned that he was once more at ease. But I can never forget the groans which, during that space, his agony extorted from him. Well knowing the iron strength of his resolution, to find him confessing its extremity, by cries audible not only all over the house, but even to a considerable distance from it — it may be supposed that this was sufficiently alarming, even to my companion; how much more to me, who had never before listened to that voice, except in the gentle accents of kindness and encouragement.

¹ See Scott's Poetical Works, royal 8vo, p. 618.

I told Ballantyne that I saw this was no time for my visit, and that I should start for Edinburgh again at an early hour — and begged he would make my apologies — in the propriety of which he acquiesced. But as I was dressing, about seven next morning, Scott himself tapped at my door, and entered, looking better I thought than at my arrival the day before. “Don’t think of going,” said he, “I feel hearty this morning, and if my devil does come back again, it won’t be for three days at any rate. For the present, I want nothing to set me up except a good trot in the open air, to drive away the accursed vapours of the laudanum I was obliged to swallow last night. You have never seen Yarrow, and when I have finished a little job I have with Jocund Johnny, we shall all take horse and make a day of it.” When I said something about a ride of twenty miles being rather a bold experiment after such a night, he answered, that he had ridden more than forty, a week before, under similar circumstances, and felt nothing the worse. He added, that there was an election on foot, in consequence of the death of Sir John Riddell of Riddell, Member of Parliament for the Selkirk district of Burghs, and that the bad health and absence of the Duke of Buccleuch rendered it quite necessary that he should make exertions on this occasion. “In short,” said he, laughing, “I have an errand which I shall perform — and as I must pass Newark, you had better not miss the opportunity of seeing it under so excellent a eicerone as the old minstrel,

‘Whom withered cheek and tresses grey Shall yet see many a better day.’”

About eleven o’clock, accordingly, he was mounted, by the help of Tom Purdie, upon a staunch active cob, yecept Sibyl Grey, — exactly such a creature as is described in Mr. Dinmont’s Dumple — while Ballantyne sprang into the saddle of noble Old Mortality, and we proceeded to the town of Selkirk, where Scott halted to do business at the Sheriff-Clerk’s, and begged us to move onward at a gentle pace until he should overtake us. He came up by and by at a canter, and seemed in high glee with the tidings he had heard about the canvass. And so we rode by Philiphaugh, Carterhaugh, Howhill, and Newark, he pouring out all the way his picturesque anecdotes of former times — more especially of the fatal field where Montrose was finally overthrown by Leslie. He described the battle as vividly as if he had witnessed it; the passing of the Ettrick at daybreak by the Covenanting General's heavy cuirassiers, many of them old soldiers of Gustavus Adolphus, and the wild confusion of the Highland host when exposed to their charge on an extensive haugh as flat as a bowling-green. He drew us aside at Slain-men's-lee, to observe the green mound that marks the resting-place of the slaughtered royalists; and pointing to the apparently precipitous mountain, Minchmoor, over which Montrose and his few cavaliers escaped, mentioned, that, rough as it seemed, his mother remembered passing it in her early days in a coach and six, on her way to a ball at Peebles — several footmen marching on either side of the carriage to prop it up, or drag it through bogs, as the case might require. He also gave us, with all the dramatic effect of one of his best chapters, the history of a worthy family who, inhabiting at the time of the battle a cottage on his own estate, had treated with particular kindness a young officer of Leslie's army quartered on them for a night or two before. When parting from them to join the troops, he took out a purse of gold, and told the goodwoman that he had a presentiment he should not see another sun set, and in that case would wish his money to remain in her kind hands; but, if he should survive, he had no doubt she would restore it honestly. The young man returned mortally wounded, but lingered a while under her roof, and finally bequeathed to her and hers his purse and his blessing. "Such," he said, "was the origin of the respectable lairds of ——, now my good neighbours."

The prime object of this expedition was to talk over the politics of Selkirk with one of the Duke of Buccleuch's great store farmers, who, as the Sheriff had learned, possessed private influence with a doubtful bailie or deacon among the Souters. I forget the result, if ever I heard it. But next morning, having, as he assured us, enjoyed a good night in consequence of this ride, he invited us to accompany him on a similar errand across Bowden Moor, and up the Valley of the Ayle; and when we reached a particular bleak and dreary point of that journey, he informed us that he perceived in the waste below a wreath of smoke, which was the appointed signal that a wavering Souter of some consequence had agreed to give him a personal interview where no Whiggish eyes were likely to observe them; — and so, leaving us on the road, he proceeded to thread his way westwards, across moor and bog, until we lost view of him. I think a couple of hours might have passed before he joined us again, which was, as had been arranged, not far from the village of Lilliesleaf. In that place, too, he had a tion of the same sort to look after; and when he it, he rode with us all round the ancient woods of would not go near the house; I suppose lest any of family might still be there. Many were his lament the catastrophe which had just befallen them he said, "one of the most venerable races in the sc land—they were here long before these glens ha the name of Soullis or Douglas—to say nothing of they can shew a Pope's bull of the tenth century the then Riddell to marry a relation within the t grees. Here they have been for a thousand year and now all the inheritance is to pass away, me one good worthy gentleman would not be conten his horses, his hounds, and his bottle of claret, h forty predecessors, but must needs turn scientific a take almost all his fair estate into his own hand, for himself perhaps a hundred ploughs, and try nostrum that has been tabled by the quackish impe time. And what makes the thing ten times mor is, that he kept day-book and ledger, and all the accurately as if he had been a cheesemonger in market." Some of the most remarkable circum Scott's own subsequent life have made me often re versation—with more wonder than he expressed ruin of the Riddells.

I remember he told us a world of stories, ma
 some comical, about the old lairds of this time-ho age; and among others, that of the seven Bibles a bottles of ale, which he afterwards inserted in a ne then in progress.¹ He was also full of anecdotes a of his father's, a minister of Lilliesleaf, who reig generations the most popular preacher in Teviot forget the orator's name. When the original of Sa ford congratulated him in his latter days on the a authority he still maintained—every kirk in the ne being left empty when it was known he was to tent at any country sacrament—the shrewd divi
 "Indeed, Mr. Walter, I sometimes think it's a ver There's aye a talk of this or that wonderfully p man frae the college; but whenever I'm to be at th sion with ony o' them, I e'en mount the white l Revelations, and he dings them a'."

¹ See The Bride of Lammermoor, Note to chap.

Thus Scott amused himself and us as we jogged homewards: and it was the same the following day, when (no election matters pressing) he rode with us to the western peak of the Eildon hills, that he might shew me the whole panorama of his Teviotdale, and expound the direction of the various passes by which the ancient forayers made their way into England, and tell the names and the histories of many a monastic chapel and baronial peel, now mouldering in glens and dingles that escape the eye of the traveller on the highways. Among other objects on which he descanted with particular interest, were the ruins of the earliest residence of the Kerrs of Cessford, so often opposed in arms to his own chieftains of Branksome, and a desolate little kirk on the adjoining moor, where the Dukes of Roxburghe are still buried in the same vault with the hero who fell at Turnagain. Turning to the northward, he shewed us the crags and tower of Smailholme, and behind it the shattered fragment of Ercildoune — and repeated some pretty stanzas ascribed to the last of the real wandering minstrels of this district, by name Burn: —

“ Sing Ercildoune, and Cowdenknowes,
Where Holmes had ance commanding,” &c.

That night he had again an attack of his cramp, but not so serious as the former. Next morning he was again at work with Ballantyne at an early hour; and when I parted from him after breakfast, he spoke cheerfully of being soon in Edinburgh for the usual business of his Court. I left him, however, with dark prognostications; and the circumstances of this little visit to Abbotsford have no doubt dwelt on my mind the more distinctly, from my having observed and listened to him throughout under the painful feeling that it might very probably be my last.

Within a few days he heard tidings, perhaps as heavy as ever reached him. His ever steadfast friend, to whom he looked up, moreover, with the feelings of the true old Border clansman, Charles Duke of Buccleuch, died on the 20th of April at Lisbon. Captain Adam Fergusson had accompanied the Duke, whose health had for years been breaking, to the scene of his own old campaigns: he now attended his Grace's remains to England; and on landing received a letter, in which Scott said: — “I have had another eight days' visit of my disorder, which has confined me chiefly to my bed. It will perhaps shade off into a mild chronic complaint — if it returns frequently with the same violence, I shall degrees, and follow my dear chief — I thank God for this possibility without much anxiety, and without fear.”

On the 11th of May he returned to Edinburgh present at the opening of the Court; when all were as much struck as I had been at Abbotsford by the change in his appearance. He was unable to persue his attendance at the Clerks' table — for several weeks I think he seldom if ever attempted it; and I was that, when the Bride of Lammermoor and Legend at length came out (which was on the 10th of June) known to be confined to bed, and the book was recd. the deep general impression that we should see that parentage.

“The Bride of Lammermoor” (says James Ballantyne) not only written, but published before Mr. Scott rose from his bed; and he assured me that when put into his hands in a complete shape, he did not recollect one single incident, character, or conversation in the story. He did not desire me to understand, nor did I desire that his illness had erased from his memory the incidents of the story, with which he had been acquainted from his boyhood. These remained rooted where they had been; or, to speak more explicitly, he remembered the facts of the existence of the father and mother, of the daughter, of the rival lovers, of the compulsory marriage, of the attack made by the bride upon the hapless lover, with the general catastrophe of the whole. All that he recollected just as he did before he took to his bed, he literally recollected nothing else — not a single character by the romancer, not one of the many scenes attended with humour, nor anything with which he was conversant as a writer of the work. ‘For a long time,’ he said, ‘I was very uneasy in the course of my reading, lest I should be disappointed by meeting something altogether glaring and fantastic; but ever, I recollected that you had been the printer of the work, and I was sure that you would not have permitted anything of the kind to pass.’ ‘Well,’ I said, ‘upon the whole, how did it affect you?’ — ‘Why,’ he said, ‘as a whole, I felt it monstrous and grotesque; but still the worst of it made me feel that I trusted the good-natured public would not be led astray. I do not think I ever ventured to lead to the consideration of this singular phenomenon again; but you may dep that what I have now said is as distinctly reported as if it had been taken down in short-hand at the moment; I believe you will agree with me in thinking that the history of the human mind contains nothing more wonderful."

One day, soon after he reappeared in the Parliament House, he asked me to walk home with him. He moved languidly, and said, if he were to stay in town many days, he must send for Sibyl Grey; but his conversation was heart-whole; and, in particular, he laughed till, despite his weakness, the stick was flourishing in his hand, over the following almost incredible specimen of the eleventh Earl of Buchan.

Hearing one morning shortly before this time, that Scott was actually in extremis, the Earl proceeded to Castle Street, and found the knocker tied up. He then descended to the door in the area, and was there received by honest Peter Mathieson, whose face seemed to confirm the woful tidings, for in truth his master was ill enough. Peter told his Lordship that he had the strictest orders to admit no visitor; but the Earl would take no denial, pushed the bashful coachman aside, and elbowed his way upstairs to the door of Scott's bedchamber. He had his fingers upon the handle before Peter could give warning to Miss Scott; and when she appeared to remonstrate against such an intrusion, he patted her on the head like a child, and persisted in his purpose of entering the sick-room so strenuously, that the young lady found it necessary to bid Peter see the Earl downstairs again, at whatever damage to his dignity. Peter accordingly, after trying all his eloquence in vain, gave the tottering, bustling, old, meddlesome coxcomb a single shove, — as respectful, doubt not, as a shove can ever be, — and he accepted that hint, and made a rapid exit. Scott, meanwhile, had heard the confusion, and at length it was explained to him; when, fearing that Peter's gripe might have injured Lord Buchan's feeble person, he desired James Ballantyne, who had been sitting by his bed, to follow the old man home — make him comprehend, if he could, that the family were in such bewilderment of alarm that the ordinary rules of civility were out of the question — and, in fine, inquire what had been the object of his Lordship's intended visit. James proceeded forthwith to the Earl's house in George Street, and found him strutting about his library in a towering indignation. Ballantyne's elaborate demonstrations of respect, however, by degrees softened him, and he condescended to explain himself. "I wished," said he, "to embrace Walter Scott before he died, and inform him that I had long considered it as a satisfactory circumstance if they were destined to rest together in the same place of interment. The principal thing, however, was to relieve his mind by the arrangements of his funeral — to show him a plan prepared for the procession — and, in a word, to that I took upon myself the whole conduct of the ceremony at Dryburgh." He then exhibited to Ballantyne a programme, in which, as may be supposed, the predominant name was not Walter Scott, but David Earl of Buchan, who had settled, inter alia, that the said Earl was to pronounce an oration over the grave, after the fashion of French Academies in the Père la Chaise.

And this was the elder brother of Thomas and Henry. But the story is well known of his boasting one day to the Duchess of Gordon of the extraordinary talents of his younger son, when her unscrupulous Grace asked him, very coolly, "If the wit had not come by the mother, and been all in the younger branches?"

I must not forget to set down what Sophia Scott told me of her father's conduct upon one night in 1806, when he really did despair of himself. He then called for his children about his bed, and took leave of them with solemn advice. After giving them, one by one, such advice as was suited to their years and characters, he added, — "For myself, my conscience is unconscious of ever having done any man an injury, or any fair opportunity of doing any man a benefit. I believe that no human life can appear otherwise than weak and insignificant in the eyes of God; but I rely on the merits and merits of our Redeemer." He then laid his hands on the heads of his children, and said — "God bless you! Live so that you may meet each other in a better place hereafter. And I pray for me, that I may turn my face to the wall." They obeyed him, but he presently fell into a deep sleep; and when he awoke from it after many hours, the crisis of extreme danger was over by himself, and pronounced by his physician, to be completely overcome.

The Tales of the Third Series would have been written with more indulgence, had they needed it; for the painful circumstances under which they must have been produced were well known wherever an English newspaper made its appearance. I believe that, except in typical errors, from the author's hands to correct proof-sheets, no one ever affected to perceive or work the slightest symptom of his malady. Dugald Stewart was placed by acclamation in the same rank with B — a conception equally new, just, and humorous, and worked out in all the details, as if it had formed the luxurious entertainment of a chair as easy as was ever shaken by Rabelais; and though the character of Montrose himself seemed hardly to have been treated so fully as the subject merited, the accustomed rapidity of the novelist's execution would have been enough to account for any such defect. Caleb Balderstone — (the hero of one of the many ludicrous delineations which he owed to the late Lord Haddington) — was pronounced at the time, by more than one critic, a mere caricature; and, though he himself would never, in after days, admit this censure to be just, he allowed that "he might have sprinkled rather too much parsley over his chicken." But even that blemish, for I grant that I think it a serious one, could not disturb the profound interest and pathos of the Bride of Lammermoor — to my fancy the most pure and powerful of all the tragedies that Scott ever penned.

These volumes, as was mentioned, came out before the middle of June; and though at that moment he was unable to quit his room, he did not hesitate to make all arrangements as to another romance. Nay, though his condition still required an amanuensis, he had advanced considerably in the new work before the Session closed in July. That he felt much more security as to his health by that time, must be inferred from his then allowing his son Walter to proceed to Ireland to join the 18th regiment of Hussars. The Cornet was only in the eighteenth year of his age; and the fashion of education in Scotland is such, that he had scarcely ever slept a night under a different roof from his parents, until this separation occurred. He had been treated from his cradle with all the indulgence that a man of sense can ever permit himself to shew to any of his children; and for several years he had now been his father's daily companion in all his out-of-doors occupations and amusements. The parting was a painful one: but Scott's ambition centred in the heir of his name, and instead of fruitless pinings and lamentings, he henceforth made it his constant business to keep up such a frank correspondence with the young man as might enable himself to exert over him, when at a distance, the gentle influence of kindness, experience, and wisdom. The series of his letters to his son is, in my opinion, by far the most interesting and valuable, as respects the personal character and temper of the writer. His manly kindness to his boy, whether he is expressing approbation or censure of his conduct, is a model for the parent; and his practical wisdom was of

and the world, that I am persuaded it will often be found available to the circumstances of their own various cases, by young men of whatever station or profession.

Abbotsford had, in the ensuing autumn, the honour of a visit from Prince Leopold, now King of Belgium, who had been often in Scott's company in Paris in 1815, and his Royal Highness was followed by many other distinguished guests; none of whom, from what they saw, would have doubted that the masons and foresters fully occupied their host's time. He was all the while, however, making steady progress with his Ivanhoe—and that although he was so far from entire recovery, that Mr. Laidlaw continued to produce most of the MS. from his dictation.

The approach of winter brought a very alarming aspect of things in our manufacturing districts; and there was throughout Scotland a general revival of the old volunteer spirit. Scott did not now dream of rejoining the Light Horse of Edinburgh, which he took much pleasure in seeing reorganised; but in conjunction with his neighbour the laird of Gala, he planned the raising of a body of Border Sharpshooters, and was highly gratified by the readiness with which a hundred young men from his own immediate neighbourhood sent in their names, making no condition but that the Sheriff himself should be the commandant. He was very willing to accept that stipulation; and Laidlaw was instantly directed to look out for a stalwart charger, a fit successor for the Brown Adams of former days. But the progress of disaffection was arrested before this scheme could be carried into execution. It was in the midst of that alarm that he put forth the brief, but beautiful series of papers entitled The Visionary.

In December he had an extraordinary accumulation of distress in his family circle. Within ten days he lost his uncle Dr. Rutherford; his dear aunt Christian Rutherford; and his excellent mother. On her death he says to Lady Louisa Stuart (who had seen and been much pleased with the old lady):—“If I have been able to do anything in the way of painting the past times, it is very much from the studies with which she presented me. She connected a long period of time with the present generation, for she remembered, and had often spoken with, a person who perfectly recollected the battle of Dunbar, and Oliver Cromwell's subsequent entry into Edinburgh. She preserved her faculties to the very day before her final illness; for our friends Mr. and Mrs. Scott of Harden visited her on the Sunday, and, coming to our house after, were expressing their surprise at the alertness of her mind, and the pleasure which she had in talking over both ancient and modern events. She had told them with great accuracy the real story of the Bride of Lammermuir, and pointed out wherein it differed from the novel. She had all the names of the parties, and detailed (for she was a great genealogist) their connexion with existing families. On the subsequent Monday she was struck with a paralytic affection, suffered little, and that with the utmost patience; and what was God's reward, and a great one to her innocent and benevolent life, she never knew that her brother and sister, the last thirty years younger than herself, had trodden the dark path before her. She was a strict economist, which she said enabled her to be liberal; out of her little income of about £300 a year, she bestowed at least a third in well-chosen charities, and with the rest lived like a gentlewoman, and even with hospitality more general than seemed to suit her age; yet I could never prevail on her to accept of any assistance. You cannot conceive how affecting it was to me to see the little preparation of presents which she had assorted for the New Year — for she was a great observer of the old fashions of her period — and to think that the kind heart was cold which delighted in all these acts of kindly affection."

There is in the library at Abbotsford a fine copy of Baskerville's folio Bible, two volumes, printed at Cambridge in 1763; and there appears on the blank leaf, in the trembling handwriting of Scott's mother, this inscription — "To my dear son, Walter Scott, from his affectionate Mother, Anne Rutherford — January 1st, 1819." Under these words her son has written as follows: — "This Bible was the gift of my grandfather Dr. John Rutherford, to my mother, and presented by her to me; being alas! the last gift which I was to receive from that excellent parent, and, as I verily believe, the thing which she most loved in the world, — not only in humble veneration of the sacred contents, but as the dearest pledge of her father's affection to her. As such she gave it to me; and as such I bequeath it to those who may represent me — charging them carefully to preserve the name, in memory of those to whom it has belonged. 1820."

On the 18th of December, while his house was thus saddened, appeared his Ivanhoe. It was received throughout England with a more clamorous delight than any of the Scotch novels had been. The volumes (three in number) were now, for the first time, of the post 8vo form, with a finer paper than hitherto, the press-work much more elegant, and the price accordingly raised from eight shillings the volume to ten; yet the copies sold in this original shape were twelve thousand.

I ought to have mentioned sooner, that the original intention was to bring out Ivanhoe as the production of a new hand, and that to assist this impression, the work was printed in a size and manner unlike the preceding ones; but Constable, when the day of publication approached, remonstrated against this experiment, and it was accordingly abandoned.

The reader has already been told that Scott dictated the greater part of this romance. The portion of the MS which is his own, appears, however, not only as well and firmly executed as that of any of the Tales of my Landlord, but distinguished by having still fewer erasures and interlineations, and also by being in a smaller hand. The fragment is beautiful to look at — many pages together without one alteration. It is, I suppose, superfluous to add, that in no instance did Scott re-write his prose before sending it to the press. Whatever may have been the case with his poetry, the world uniformly received the prima cura of the novelist.

As a work of art, Ivanhoe is perhaps the best of all Scott's efforts, whether in prose or in verse; nor have the strength and splendour of his imagination been displayed to higher advantage than in some of the scenes of this romance. But I believe that no reader who is capable of thoroughly comprehending the author's Scotch character and Scotch dialogue will ever place even Ivanhoe, as a work of genius, on the same level with Waverley, Guy Mannering, or the Heart of Mid-Lothian.

The introduction of the charming Jewess and her father originated, I find, in a conversation that Scott held with his friend Skene during the severest season of his bodily sufferings in the early part of this year. "Mr. Skene," says that gentleman's wife, "sitting by his bedside, and trying to amuse him as well as he could in the intervals of pain, happened to get on the subject of the Jews, as he had observed them when he spent some time in Germany in his youth. Their situation had naturally made a strong impression; for in those days they retained their own dress and manners entire, and were treated with considerable austerity by their Christian neighbours, being still locked up at night in their own quarter by great gates; and Mr. Skene, partly in seriousness, but partly from the mere wish to turn his mind at the moment upon something that might occupy and divert it, suggested that a group of Jews would be an interesting feature if he could contrive to bring them into his next novel." Upon the appearance of Ivanhoe, he reminded Mr. Skene of this conversation, and said, "You will find this book owes not a little to your German reminiscences."

By the way, before Ivanhoe made its appearance, I had myself been formally admitted to the author's secret; but had he favoured me with no such confidence, it would have been impossible for me to doubt that I had been present some months before at the conversation which suggested, and indeed supplied all the materials of, one of its most amusing chapters. I allude to that in which our Saxon terms for animals in the field, and our Norman equivalents for them as they appear on the table, and so on, are explained and commented on. All this Scott owed to the after-dinner talk one day in Castle Street of his old friend Mr. William Clerk, — who, among other elegant pursuits, has cultivated the science of philology very deeply.

I cannot conclude without observing that the publication of Ivanhoe marks the most brilliant epoch in Scott's history as the literary favourite of his contemporaries. With the novel which he next put forth, the immediate sale of these works began gradually to decline; and though, even when that had reached its lowest declension, it was still far above the most ambitious dreams of any other novelist, yet the publishers were afraid the announcement of anything like a falling-off might cast a damp over the spirits of the author. He was allowed to remain for several years under the impression that whatever novel he threw off commanded at once the old triumphant sale of ten or twelve thousand, and was afterwards, when included in the collective edition, to be circulated in that shape also as widely as Waverley or Ivanhoe. In my opinion, it would have been very unwise in the booksellers to give Scott any unfavourable tidings upon such subjects after the commencement of the malady which proved fatal to him, — for that from the first shook his mind; but I think they took a false measure of the man when they hesitated to tell him exactly how the matter stood, throughout 1820 and the three or four following years, when his intellect was as vigorous as it ever had been, and his heart as courageous; and I regret their scruples (among other reasons), because the years now mentioned were the most costly ones in his life; and for every twelve months in which any man allows himself, or is encouraged by others, to proceed in a course of unwise expenditure, it becomes proportionably more difficult for him to pull up when the mistake is at length detected or recognised.

In the correspondence of this winter [1819-1820], there occurs frequent mention of the Prince Gustavus Vasa, who spent some months in Edinburgh, and his Royal Highness's accomplished attendant, the Baron Fohler. I met them often in Castle Street, and remember as especially interesting the first evening that they dined there. The only portrait in Scott's Edinburgh dining-room was one of Charles XII. of Sweden, and he was struck, as indeed every one must have been, with the remarkable resemblance which the exiled Prince's air and features presented to the hero of his race. Young Gustavus, on his part, hung with keen and melancholy enthusiasm on his host's anecdotes of the expedition of Charles Edward. The Prince, accompanied by Scott and myself, witnessed the ceremonial of the proclamation of King George IV. on the 21 of February, at the Cross, from a window over Mr Constable's shop in the High Street; and on that occasion also the air of sadness that mixed in his features with eager curiosity was very affecting. Scott explained all the details to him, not without many lamentations over the barbarity of the Auld Reekie ladies, who had removed the beautiful Gothic Cross itself, for the sake of widening the thoroughfare. The weather was fine, the sun shone bright; and the antique tabards of the heralds, the trumpet notes of God save the King, and the hearty cheerings of the immense uncovered multitude that filled the noble old street, produced altogether a scene of great splendour and solemnity. The Royal Exile surveyed it with a flushed cheek and a watery eye, and Scott, observing his emotion, withdrew with me to another window, whispering "poor lad! poor lad! God help him." Later in the season the Prince spent a few days at Abbotsford, where he was received with at least as much reverence as any eldest son of a reigning sovereign could have been. He gave Scott, at parting, a seal, which he almost constantly used ever after.

About the middle of February — it having been ere that time arranged that I should marry his eldest daughter in the course of the spring, — I accompanied him and part of his family on one of those flying visits to Abbotsford, with which he often indulged himself on a Saturday during term. Upon such occasions Scott appeared at the usual hour in Court, but wearing, instead of the official suit of black, his country morning dress — green jacket and so forth — under the clerk's gown; a licence of which many gentlemen of the long robe had been accustomed to avail themselves in the days of his youth — it being then considered as the authentic badge that they were lairds as well as lawyers — but which, to use the dialect of the place, had fallen into desuetude before I knew the Parliament House. He was, I think, one of the two or three, or at most the half-dozen, who still adhered to this privilege of their order; and it has now, in all likelihood, become quite obsolete, like the ancient custom, a part of the same system, for all Scotch barristers to appear without gowns or wigs, and in coloured clothes, when upon circuit. At noon, when the Court broke up, Peter Mathieson was sure to be in attendance in the Parliament Close, and five minutes after, the gown had been tossed off, and Scott, rubbing his hands for glee, was under weigh for Tweedside. On this occasion, he was, of course, in mourning; but I have thought it worth while to preserve the circumstance of his usual Saturday's costume. As we proceeded, he talked without reserve of the novel of The Monastery, of which he had the first volume with him: and mentioned, what he had probably forgotten when he wrote the Introduction of 1830, that a good deal of that volume had been composed before he concluded Ivanhoe. "It was a relief," he said, "to interlay the scenery most familiar to me, with the strange world for which I had to draw so much on imagination."

Next morning there appeared at breakfast John Ballantyne, who had at this time a hunting-box a few miles off, in the vale of the Leader — and with him Mr. Constable, his guest; and it being a fine clear day, as soon as Scott had read the Church service and one of Jeremy Taylor's sermons, we all sallied out, before noon, on a perambulation of his upland territories; Maida and the rest of the favourites accompanying our march. At starting we were joined by the constant henchman, Tom Purdie — and I may save myself the trouble of any attempt to describe his appearance, for his master has given us an inimitably true one in introducing a certain personage of his Redgauntlet: — "He was, perhaps, sixty years old; yet his brow was not much furrowed, and his jet black hair was only grizzled, not whitened, by the advance of age. All his motions spoke strength unabated; and though rather undersized, he had very broad shoulders, was square made, thin-flanked, and apparently combined in his frame muscular strength and activity; the last somewhat impaired, perhaps, by years, but the first remaining in full vigour. A hard and harsh countenance; eyes far sunk under projecting eyebrows, which were grizzled like his hair; a wide mouth, furnished from ear to ear with a range of unimpaired teeth of uncommon whiteness, and a size and breadth which might have become the jaws of an ogre, completed this delightful portrait." Equip this figure in Scott's cast-off green jacket, white hat and drab trousers; and imagine that weary treatment, comfort, and the honest consequence of a trial griece, had softened away much of the hardness and ainess originally impressed on the visage by anxious pe the sinister habits of a black-fisher: — and the Tom of 1820 stands before us.¹

We were all delighted to see how completely Sc recovered his bodily vigour, and none more so the stable, who, as he puffed and panted after him up and down another, often stopped to wipe his forehead and remarked that “it was not every author who should such a dance.” But Purdie’s face shone with rapt observed how severely the awag-bellied bookseller’s was taxed. Scott exclaiming exultingly, though pe the tenth time, “This will be a glorious spring for a Tom!” — “You may say that, Shurra,” quoth To then lingering a moment for Constable, — “My e added, scratching his head, “and I think it will be season for our buiks too.” But indeed Tom always our buiks as if they had been as regular products of t our ails and our birks. Having threaded, first the He and then the Rhymers’ Glen, we arrived at Hunt where the hospitality of the kind Weird-Sisters, as the Miss Fergussons, reanimated our exhausted B and gave them courage to extend their walk a little down the same famous brook. Here there was a sma in a very sequestered situation, by making some li tions to which Scott thought it might be converted i able summer residence for his daughter and future s The details of that plan were soon settled — it was all hands that a sweeter scene of seclusion could not be He repeated some verses of Rogers’ “Wish,” which spot: —

“ Mine be a cot beside the hill —
A bee-hive’s hum shall soothe my ear ;
A willowy brook that turns a mill,
With many a fall shall linger near: ” &c.

But when he came to the stanza —

“ And Lucy at her wheel shall sing,
In russet-gown and apron blue, ”

¹There is in the dining-room at Abbotsford a clever little sh of Tom Purdie by Edwin Landseer, R. A. — who often enjo company in sports both of flood and field.

he departed from the text, adding —

“But if Bluestockings here you bring,
The Great Unknown won't dine with you.”

Johnny Ballantyne, a projector to the core, was particularly zealous about this embryo establishment. Foreseeing that he should have had walking enough ere he reached Huntley Burn, his dapper little Newmarket groom had been ordered to fetch Old Mortality thither, and now, mounted on his fine hunter, he capered about us, looking pallid and emaciated as a ghost, but as gay and cheerful as ever, and would fain have been permitted to ride over hedge and ditch to mark out the proper line of the future avenue. Scott admonished him that the country-people, if they saw him at such work, would take the whole party for heathens; and clapping spurs to his horse, he left us. “The deil's in the body,” quoth Tom Purdie; “he'll be ower every yett atween this and Turn-again, though it be the Lord's day. I wadna wonder if he were to be ceeted before the Session.” — “Be sure, Tam,” cries Constable, “that you egg on the Dominie to blaw up his father — I wouldna grudge a hundred miles o' gait to see the ne'er-do-weel on the stool, and neither, I'll be sworn, would the Sheriff.” — “Na, na,” quoth the Sheriff, “we'll let sleeping dogs be, Tam.”

As we walked homeward, Scott, being a little fatigued, laid his left hand on Tom's shoulder, and leaned heavily for support, chatting to his “Sunday poney,” as he called the affectionate fellow, just as freely as with the rest of the party, and Tom put in his word shrewdly and manfully, and grinned and grunted whenever the joke chanced to be within his apprehension. It was easy to see that his heart swelled within him from the moment that the Sheriff got his collar in his gripe.

There arose a little dispute between them about what tree or trees ought to be cut down in a hedge-row that we passed; and Scott seemed somewhat ruffled with finding that some previous hints of his on that head had not been attended to. When we got into motion again, his hand was on Constable's shoulder — and Tom dropped a pace or two to the rear, until we approached a gate, when he jumped forward and opened it. “Give us a pinch of your snuff, Tom,” quoth the Sheriff. Tom's mull was produced, and the hand resumed its position. I was much diverted with Tom's behaviour when we at length reached Abbotsford. There were some garden chairs on the green in front of the cottage porch. Scott sat down on one of them to enjoy the view of his new tower as it gleamed in the sunset, and Constable and I did the like. Mr Purdie lounging near us for a few minutes, and then asking "to speak a word." They withdrew together into the garden — and Scott presently rejoined us with a particular expression of face. As soon as Tom was out of a room — "Will ye guess what he has been saying, no? — this is a great satisfaction! Tom assures me he has thought the matter over, and will take my advice, in thinning of that clump behind Captain Fergusson's house."

I must not forget, that whoever might be at the table, Tom always appeared at his master's elbow on Sunday dinner was over, and drank long life to the Laird and all the good company, in a quag of whisky, or a glass of wine, according to his fancy. I believe Scott's conduct was never expressed in print his satisfaction that, in the changes of our manners, the ancient freedom of parading the doors of a master and his servants may still be indulged between a master and his doors servant; but in truth he kept by the old rule with domestic servants, to an extent which I have never practised by any other gentleman. He conversed with the coachman if he sat by him, as he often did on the road, and with his footman, if he happened to be in the rumble seat. If there was any very young lad in the household, it was his point of duty to see that his employments were so arranged as to leave time for advancing his education, made him a copy-book once a week to the library, and examined all that he was doing. Indeed he did not confine his attention to his own people. Any steady servant of a family was soon considered as a sort of friend too, and was sure to have a kind little colloquy to himself at coming and going. With all this, Scott was a very rigid enforcer of discipline—contrived to make it thoroughly understood by all about him, that they must do their part by him as he did his by them; and the result was happy. I never knew any man so well served as he was—so carefully, so respectfully, and so silently; and I cannot help doubting if in any department of human operations real kindness ever compromised real dignity.

¹ I was obliged to the Sheriff's companion of 1816, John Richardson of Fludyer Street (one of Sir Walter's domestics) for reminding me of the following trait of Tom Purdie. John Richardson of Fludyer Street (one of Sir Walter's domestics) came to Abbotsford, Tom (who took him for a Scotchman) attend upon him while he tried for a fish (i.e. a salmon) in the neighbourhood of Melrose Bridge. As they walked thither, Tom bragged grandly of the size of the fish he had himself caught there, giving the stranger no credit for much skill in the Waltonian art. By and by, however, Richardson, who was an admirable angler, a serious and a cautious fellow, and after a beautiful exhibition of the art, landed a salmon with safety. "A fine fish, Tom." — "Oo, aye, Sir," quoth Tom, "a bonny grilse." "A grilse, Tom!" says Mr. R. — "It's as big as the heaviest you were telling me about." Tom showed a smile of bitter incredulity; but while they were still debating, a fisherman of the name of Erville came up with scales in his basket, and insisted on having his victim weighed. The result was to the advantage of the captor. "Weel," says Tom, letting the salmon drop, "weel, ye are a meikle fish, mon — and a meikle fule too, a lower key) "to let yoursel be kilt by an Englander."

CHAPTER XI.

Scott's Baronetcy—Portrait by Lawrence and Bust by Chantrey—Presidency of the Royal Society of Edinburgh—His Sports at Abbotsford—Publication of The Monastery and Kenilworth. 1820.

THE novel of The Monastery was published in the beginning of March 1820. It appeared not in the post-Ivanhoe, but in 3 vols. 12mo, like the earlier works in the series. In fact, a few sheets of The Monastery were printed before Scott agreed to let Ivanhoe be called "Author of Waverley" on its title-page; and the shapes of the two books belonged to the abortive plan of passing off "Mr. Laurence Templeton" as a hitherto unknown candidate for literary success.

At the rising of his Court on the 12th, he returned to London, for the purpose of receiving his baronetcy, which had been prevented from doing in the spring of the previous year by illness, and again at Christmas by family business. The Prince Regent was now King.

One of his first visitors was Sir Thomas Lawrence, who informed him that his Majesty had resolved to add a gallery, then in progress at Windsor Castle, with a bust in his hand of his most distinguished contemporaries, reigning monarchs of Europe, and their chief officers and generals, had already sat for this purpose: on the same day the King desired to see exhibited those of his countrymen who had attained the highest honours of literature—and it was his pleasure that this series should begin with Walter Scott. The portrait was begun immediately, and the head was finished before Scott left town. Sir Thomas caught and fixed with admirable skill one of the most expressive of his countenances at the proudest period of his life; to the perfect truth of the representation, every eye who surveyed him in the act of composition, or the extremely unfortunate that Sir Thomas filled in the figure from a separate sketch after he had quitted London. When I first saw the head, I thought nothing could be better; but there was an evident change for the worse when the picture appeared in its finished state — for the rest of the person had been done on a different scale, and this neglect of proportion takes considerably from the majestic effect which the head itself, and especially the mighty pile of forehead, had in nature. I hope one day to see a good engraving of the head alone, as I first saw it floating on a dark sea of canvas.

Lawrence told me several years afterwards that, in his opinion, the two greatest men he had painted were the Duke of Wellington and Sir Walter Scott; “and it was odd,” said he, “that they both chose usually the same hour for sitting — seven in the morning. They were both as patient sitters as I ever had. Scott, however, was, in my case at least, a very difficult subject. I had selected what struck me as his noblest look; but when he was in the chair before me, he talked away on all sorts of subjects in his usual style, so that it cost me great pains to bring him back to solemnity, when I had to attend to anything beyond the outline of a subordinate feature. I soon found that the surest recipe was to say something that would lead him to recite a bit of poetry. I used to introduce by hook or by crook a few lines of Campbell or Byron; he was sure to take up the passage where I left it, or cap it by something better — and then — when he was, as Dryden says of one of his heroes,

‘Made up of three parts fire — so full of heaven
It sparkled at his eyes’ —

then was my time — and I made the best use I could of it. The hardest day’s work I had with him was once when ——¹ accompanied him to my painting room. —— was in particularly gay spirits, and nothing would serve him but keeping both artist and sitter in a perpetual state of merriment by anecdote upon anecdote about poor Sheridan. The anecdotes were mostly in themselves black enough — but the style of the conteur was irresistibly quaint and comical. When Scott came next, he said he was ashamed of himself for laughing so much as he listened to them; ‘for truly,’ quoth he, ‘if the tithe was fact, —— might have said to Sherry — as Lord Braxfield once said to an eloquent culprit at the bar — "You're a chief, man, but ye wad be nae the waur o' a hant."

¹ A distinguished Whig friend.

It was also during this visit to London that Scott met Chantrey for that bust which alone preserves for posterity a faint expression most fondly remembered by a young man mingled in his domestic circle. Chantrey's request that he would sit to him was communicated through Allan Cunningham, clerk of the works in the great sculptor's establishment. "Honest Allan," in his early days, when gaining a livelihood as a stone-mason in Nithsdale, made a pilgrimage to Edinburgh, for the sole purpose of seeing the author of Waverley as he passed along the street. He was now rising to a celebrity of his own, and had mentioned to him the purpose of calling on Scott to thank him for some advice he had received, through a common friend, on the subject of those "Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song" which first made his poetical talents known to the public. Chantrey embraced this opportunity of conveying to Scott his cherished ambition of modelling his head; and Scott readily assented to the flattering proposal. "It was about the middle of the morning," says Mr. Cunningham, "that I sent in for him at Miss Dumergue's in Piccadilly. It had not been a minute, when I heard a quick heavy step coming, and he came, holding out both hands, as was his custom, and as he pressed mine — 'Allan Cunningham, I am glad to see you.' I said something," continues Mr. C., "about the bust, and he said he would be glad to do it. I felt in touching the hand that had charmed me, and he moved his hand, and with one of his comic sayings — 'Ay — and a big brown hand it is.' I was a little surprised at first: Scott saw it, and soon put me at my ease, and I was in power — I had almost called it the art, but art it was, and it was winning one's heart, and restoring one's confidence, and I never met a man like him."

Chantrey's purpose had been the same as Lawrence's. He would seize a poetical phasis of the countenance; and when the poet first sat, he proceeded to model the head as he would a waxen figure, — warily, gravely and solemnly. The talk that passed had amused and gratified both, and fortunately Chantrey requested that Scott would come and bring his bust to him next morning before they recommenced operations in his studio. He accepted the invitation, and when he came again in Ecclestone Street, found two or three men assembled to meet him, — among others, his old friend Heber. The breakfast was, as any party in said to an eloquent culprit at the bar. "Ye're a v'chiel', man, but ye wad be wane the waur o' a hangin'."

MRS. J. G. LOCKHART.
Eldest daughter of Sir Walter Scott.

It was also during this visit to London that Scott Chantrey for that bust which alone preserves for posterity the features of expression most fondly remembered by all mingled in his domestic circle. Chantrey's request would sit to him was communicated through Allan Ham, clerk of the works in the great sculptor's establishment. "Honest Allan," in his early days, when gaining his bread as a stone-mason in Nithsdale, made a pilgrimage to Edinburgh, for the sole purpose of seeing the author of Waverley as he passed along the street. He was now in the fullness of a celebrity of his own, and had mentioned to his wife the purpose of calling on Scott to thank him for some advice and encouragement he had received, through a common friend, on the subject of those "Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song" which first made his poetical talents known to the public. He embraced this opportunity of conveying to Scott his cherished ambition of modelling his head; and Scott readily assented to the flattering proposal. "It was about the middle of the morning," says Mr. Cunningham, "that I sent in a letter to Miss Dumergue's in Piccadilly. It had not been a minute, when I heard a quick heavy step coming, and a man came, holding out both hands, as was his custom, and he pressed mine—'Allan Cunningham, I am glad to see you.' I said something," continues Mr. C., "about the bust, and he said he would be glad to do it. I was sure I felt in touching the hand that had charmed me, and I was glad to see it. He moved his hand, and with one of his comic songs he said, 'Ay—and a big brown hand it is.' I was a little surprised at first: Scott saw it, and soon put me at my ease; I was in his power—I had almost called it the art, but art it was not. It was winning one's heart, and restoring one's confidence, and I was glad to see a man I ever met."

Chantrey's purpose had been the same as Lawton's. He would seize a poetical phasis of the countenance; and when the poet first sat, he proceeded to model the head as he went along, forwards, gravely and solemnly. The talk that passed, and the bust, had amused and gratified both, and fortunately Chantrey requested that Scott would come and breathe the air of his studio next morning before they recommenced operations in his studio. He accepted the invitation, and when he came again in Ecclestone Street, found two or three accessories assembled to meet him,—among others, his old friend Heber. The breakfast was, as any party in Scotland

MRS. J. G. LOCKHART.
Eldest daughter of Sir Walter Scott.

Chantrey's house was sure to be, a gay one, and not having seen Heber in particular for several years, Scott's spirits were unusually excited. "In the midst of the mirth (says Cunningham) John (commonly called Jack) Fuller, the member for Surrey, and standing jester of the House of Commons, came in. Heber, who was well acquainted with the free and joyous character of that worthy, began to lead him out by relating some festive anecdotes: Fuller growled approbation, and indulged us with some of his odd sallies; things which he assured us 'were damned good, and true too, which was better.' Mr. Scott, who was standing when Fuller came in, eyed him at first with a look grave and considerate; but as the stream of conversation flowed, his keen eye twinkled brighter and brighter; his stature increased, for he drew himself up, and seemed to take the measure of the hoary joker, body and soul. An hour or two of social chat had meanwhile induced Chantrey to alter his views as to the bust, and when Scott left us, he said to me privately, 'This will never do — I shall never be able to please myself with a perfectly serene expression. I must try his conversational look, take him when about to break out into some sly funny old story.' As Chantrey said this, he took a string, cut off the head of the bust, put it into its present position, touched the eyes and mouth slightly, and wrought such a transformation, that when Scott came to his third sitting, he smiled and said — 'Ay, ye're mair like yoursel now! — Why, Mr. Chantrey, no witch of old ever performed such cantrips with clay as this.'"

The baronetcy was conferred on him, not in consequence of any Ministerial suggestion, but by the King personally, and of his own unsolicited motion; and when the poet kissed his hand, he said to him — "I shall always reflect with pleasure on Sir Walter Scott's having been the first creation of my reign."

The Gazette announcing this was dated March 30, 1820; and the Baronet, as soon afterwards as he could get away from Lawrence, set out on his return to the North; for he had such respect for the ancient prejudice (a classical as well as a Scottish one) against marrying in May, that he was anxious to have the ceremony in which his daughter was concerned, over before that unlucky month should commence. He reached Edinburgh late in April, and on the 29th of that month he gave me the hand of his daughter Sophia. The wedding, more Scotico, took place in the evening; and adhering on all such occasions to ancient modes of observance with the same punctiliousness which he mentions as distinguishing his worthy father, he gave a jolly supper afterwards to all the connexions of the young couple.

In May 1820, he received from both the English Universities the highest compliment which it was in their power to pay. The Vice-Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge came to him, in the same week, their request that he would attend at the approaching Commemorations, and accept the degree of Doctor in Civil Law. It was impossible to leave Scotland again in time; and on various other renewals of the same flattering proposition from either University he was prevented by similar circumstances from availing himself of their distinguished kindness.

About the middle of August, my wife and I went to Edinburgh; and we remained there for several weeks, during which I became familiarised to Sir Walter Scott's mode of life in the country. The humblest person who stayed there on a short visit, must have departed with the impression that what he witnessed was an occasional variety; that the courtesy prompted him to break in upon his habit of life had a stranger to amuse; but that it was physically impossible that the man who was writing the Waverley romance at the rate of nearly twelve volumes in the year, could count on after week, and month after month, to devote all but a perceptible fraction of his mornings to out-of-door exertion, and the whole of his evenings to the entertainment of a constantly varying circle of guests. The hospitality of the rooms must alone have been enough to exhaust the strength of almost any man; for his visitors did not mean, like those of country-houses in general, to enjoy the landlord's company and amuse each other; but the far greater proportion came from a distance, for the sole sake of the Poet and his household, whose person they had never before seen, and whose voice they might never again have an opportunity of hearing. No other villa in Europe was ever resorted to from so many motives, and to anything like the same extent, except the Haut and Voltaire never dreamt of being visible to his haut for a brief space of the day; — few of them even dined at his establishment, and none of them seems to have slept under his roof. His establishment, on the contrary, resembled in every respect that of the affluent idler, who, because he has no other means of would fain transmit political influence in some provincial open house — receives as many as he has room for in their apartments occupied, as soon as they vacate, another troop of the same description. Even on guiltless of inkshed, the exercise of hospitality upon this sort of scale is found to impose a heavy tax; few of them, now-a-days, think of maintaining it for any large portion of the year: very few indeed below the highest rank of the nobility—in whose case there is usually a staff of led-captains, led-chaplains, servile dandies, and semi-professional talkers and jokers from London, to take the chief part of the burden. Now, Scott had often in his mouth the pithy verses—

“Conversation is but carving:—
Give no more to every guest,
Than he’s able to digest:
Give him always of the prime,
And but little at a time;
Carve to all but just enough,
Let them neither starve nor stuff;
*And that you may have your due,
Let your neighbours carve for you:”*

and he, in his own familiar circle always, and in other circles where it was possible, furnished a happy exemplification of these rules and regulations of the Dean of St. Patrick’s. But the same sense and benevolence which dictated adhesion to them among his old friends and acquaintance, rendered it necessary to break them when he was receiving strangers of the class I have described above at Abbotsford: he felt that their coming was the best homage they could pay to his celebrity, and that it would have been as uncourteous in him not to give them their fill of his talk, as it would be in your everyday lord of manors to make his casual guests welcome indeed to his venison, but keep his grouse-shooting for his immediate allies and dependants.

Every now and then he received some stranger who was not indisposed to take his part in the carving; and how good-humouredly he surrendered the lion’s share to any one that seemed to covet it—with what perfect placidity he submitted to be bored even by bores of the first water, must have excited the admiration of many besides the daily observers of his proceedings. I have heard a spruce Senior Wrangler lecture him for half an evening on the niceties of the Greek epigram; I have heard the poorest of all parliamentary blunderers try to detail to him the pros and cons of what he called the Truck system; and in either case the same bland eye watched the lips of the tormentor. But, with such ludicrous exceptions, Scott was the one object of the Abbotsford pilgrims; and evening followed evening only to shew him exerting, for their amusement, more of animal spirits, to say nothing of intellectual vigour, than would have been considered by any other man in the company as sufficient for the whole expenditure of a week's existence. Yet this was not the object aimed at. He talked of things that interested himself, because he knew that by doing so he should give most pleasure to his guests. But how vast was the range of subjects on which he could talk with unaffected zeal; and with what admirable delicacy of instinctive politeness did he select his topics according to the peculiar history, study, pursuits, or social habits of the stranger! And all this was done without approach to the unmanly trickery of what is called cutting the coat of the person one converses with. Scott took the subjects on which he thought such a man or woman would like best to hear him speak. — but not to handle it in their way, or in any way but what was completely, and most simply his own, — not to flatter them by embellishing, with the illustration of his genius, the views and opinions which they were supposed to entertain, — but to let his genius play out its own variations, for his own delight and theirs, as freely and easily, and with an endless multiplicity of delicious novelties, as ever the magic of Beethoven or Mozart could fling over the few primitive notes of a village air.

It is the custom in some, perhaps in many, country houses to keep a register of the guests, and I have often regretted that nothing of the sort was ever attempted at Abbotsford. It would have been a curious record — especially if so contrived — (as I have seen done) — that the names of each day should, by their arrangement on the page, indicate the exact order in which the company sat at dinner. It would hardly, I believe, be too much to affirm, that Sir Walter Scott entertained, under his roof, in the course of the seven or eight brilliant seasons when his prosperity was at its height, as many persons of distinction in rank, in politics, in art, in literature, and in science, as the most princely nobleman of his age ever did in the like space of time. — I turned over, since I wrote the preceding sentence, Mr. Lodge's compendium of the British Peerage, and on summing up the titles which suggested to myself some reminiscence of this kind, I found them nearly as one out of six. — I fancy it is not beyond the mark to add, that of the eminent foreigners who visited our island within this period, a moiety crossed the Channel mainly in consequence of the interest with which his writings had invested Scotland — and that the hope of beholding the man under his own roof was the crowning motive with half that moiety. As for countrymen of his own, like him ennobled, in the higher sense of that word, by the display of their intellectual energies, if any one such contemporary can be pointed out as having crossed the Tweed, and yet not spent a day at Abbotsford, I shall be surprised.

It is needless to add, that Sir Walter was familiarly known, long before the days I am speaking of, to almost all the nobility and higher gentry of Scotland; and consequently, that there seldom wanted a fair proportion of them to assist him in doing the honours of his country. It is still more superfluous to say so respecting the heads of his own profession at Edinburgh: Sibi et amicis—Abbotsford was their villa whenever they pleased to resort to it, and few of them were ever absent from it long. He lived meanwhile in a constant interchange of easy visits with the gentlemen's families of Teviotdale and the Forest; so that mixed up with his superfine admirers of the Mayfair breed, his staring worshippers from foreign parts, and his quick-witted coevals of the Parliament House—there was found generally some hearty homespun laird, with his dame, and the young laird—a bashful bumpkin, perhaps, whose ideas did not soar beyond his gun and pointer—or perhaps a little pseudo-dandy, for whom the Kelso race-course and the Jedburgh ball were Life and the World. To complete the olla podrida, we must remember that no old acquaintance, or family connexions, however remote their actual station or style of manners from his own, were forgotten or lost sight of. He had some, even near relations, who, except when they visited him, rarely if ever found admittance to what the haughty dialect of the upper world is pleased to designate exclusively as society. These were welcome guests, let who might be under that roof; and it was the same with many a worthy citizen of Edinburgh, habitually moving in an obscure circle, who had been in the same class with Scott at the High School, or his fellow-apprentice when he was proud of earning threepence a page by the use of his pen. To dwell on nothing else, it was surely a beautiful perfection of real universal humanity and politeness, that could enable this great and good man to blend guests so multifarious in one group, and contrive to make them all equally happy with him, with themselves, and with each other.

I remember saying to William Allan one morning as the whole party mustered before the porch after breakfast—“A faithful sketch of what you at this moment see, would be more interesting a hundred years hence, than the so-called historical picture that you will ever exhibit set House;" and my friend agreed with me so soon I often wondered afterwards he had not attempted the suggestion. The subject ought, however, to be treated conjointly by him (or Wilkie) and Edwin. It was a clear, bright September morning, with a haze in the air that doubled the animating influence of the sunshine, and all was in readiness for a grand couronne at Newark Hill. The only guest who had chalked out sport for himself was the staunchest of anglers, Mr. Ross; he, too, was there on his sheltie, armed with his salmon landing net, and attended by his humorous square H. Charlie Purdie, a brother of Tom, in those days the celebrated fisherman of the district. This little group of sportsmen, bound for Lord Somerville's preserve, remained about to witness the start of the main cavalcade. Sir Humphry was mounted on Sibyl, was marshalling the order of the troop with a huge hunting-whip; and, among a dozen youths and maidens, who seemed disposed to laugh at the discipline, appeared, each on horseback, each as sagacious a youngest sportsman in the troop, Sir Humphry Wollaston, and the patriarch of Scottish belles-lettres, Mackenzie. The Man of Feeling, however, was, with some difficulty, to resign his steed for the preference of a faithful negro follower, and to join Lady Scott in the rear. The adjutant, until we should reach the ground of our ballus, was a tall, long-tailed wiry Highlander, yekept Hoobin Grey, who carried him nimbly and stoutly, although his feet almost never touched the ground as he sat, was the adjutant. But the most resque figure was the illustrious inventor of the salmon net. He had come for his favourite sport of angling, and was practising it successfully with Ross, his travelling companion for two or three days preceding this, but he had not intended for coursing fields, or had left Charlie Purdie's troop on Walter's on a sudden thought; and his fisherman's costume, a brown hat with flexible brims, surrounded with feathers, a line, and innumerable fly-hooks—jack boots worthy of a smuggler, and a fustian surtout dabbled with the blood of salmon, made a fine contrast with the smart jackets, breeches, and well-polished jockey-boots of the distinguished cavaliers about him. Dr. Wollaston was in the rear, with his noble serene dignity of countenance unimpaired, passed for a sporting archbishop. Mr. Mackenzie, at

in the 76th year of his age, with a white hat turned up with green, green spectacles, green jacket, and long brown leathern gaiters buttoned upon his nether anatomy, wore a dog-whistle round his neck, and had all over the air of as resolute a devotee as the gay captain of Huntley Burn. Tom Purdie and his subalterns had preceded us by a few hours with all the greyhounds that could be collected at Abbotsford, Darnick, and Melrose; but the giant Maida had remained as his master's orderly, and now gambolled about Sibyl Grey, barking for mere joy like a spaniel puppy.

The order of march had been all settled, and the sociable was just getting under weigh, when the Lady Anne broke from the line, screaming with laughter, and exclaimed — "Papa, papa, I knew you could never think of going without your pet." — Scott looked round, and I rather think there was a blush as well as a smile upon his face, when he perceived a little black pig frisking about his pony, and evidently a self-elected addition to the party of the day. He tried to look stern, and cracked his whip at the creature, but was in a moment obliged to join in the general cheers. Poor piggy soon found a strap round its neck, and was dragged into the background: — Scott, watching the retreat, repeated with mock pathos the first verse of an old pastoral song —

" What will I do gin my hoggie¹ die?
 My joy, my pride, my hoggie!
 My only beast, I had nae mae,
 And wow! but I was vogie!"

— the cheers were redoubled — and the squadron moved on.

This pig had taken — nobody could tell how — a most sentimental attachment to Scott, and was constantly urging its pretensions to be admitted a regular member of his tail along with the greyhounds and terriers; but indeed I remember him suffering another summer under the same sort of pertinacity on the part of an affectionate hen. I leave the explanation for philosophers — but such were the facts. I have too much respect for the vulgarly calumniated donkey to name him in the same category of pets with the pig and the hen; but a year or two after this time, my wife used to drive a couple of these animals in a little garden chair, and whenever her father appeared at the door of our cottage, we were sure to see Hannah

¹ Hog signifies in the Scotch dialect a young sheep that has never been shorn. Hence, no doubt, the name of the Poet of Ettrick — derived from a long line of shepherds.

More and Lady Morgan (as Anne Scott had wicked them) trotting from their pasture to lay them to palm, and, as Washington Irving says of the old hedger with the Parisian small box, "to have a p with the land."

But to return to the chase. On reaching New we found Lady Scott, her eldest daughter, and Mackenzie, all busily engaged in unpacking, which had been placed in their carriage, and arranging the furniture upon the mossy rocks overlooking the bed row. When such of the company as chose had this reflection, the Man of Feeling turned his pence the mountain, duly marshalled at proper as to beat in a broad line over the heather, sinning the movement from the right wing toward Davy, next to whom I chanced to be riding, laid in the fern like an experienced hand, but cracked a too, upon his own jackboots, and surveying the lotation of bush rangers, exclaimed — "Good heaven that I visit the scenery of the Lay of the Last Min then kept muttering to himself, as his glowing eye and brightest that I ever saw — ran over the land of those beautiful lines from the Conclusion of the

" But still,

When summer smiled on sweet Howland,
And July's eye, with balmy breath,
Waved the bluebells on Newark beach,
When throats sang on Harborslaw,
And corn was green in Carrithough,
And flourished, broad, Mahandro's oak,
The aged harper's soul awoke," &c

Mackenzie, spectacled though he was, saw the hare, gave the word to slip the dogs, and spurred like a boy. All the seniors, indeed, did well as course was upwards, but when pass took down they halted and breathed themselves upon the knoll gaily, however, the young people, who dashed at far and below them. Coursing on such a mountain is same sport over a set of fine English pastures — gulfs to be avoided and bogs enough to be threaded stiff nag stuck fast — many a bold rider measured among the peat-hugs — and another stranger to besides Davy plunged neck-deep into a treacherous which, till they were floundering in it, had borne pearance of a piece of delicate green turf. When Sir Humphry emerged from his involuntary bath, his habiliments garnished with mud, slime, and mangled water-cresses, Sir Walter received him with a triumphant encore! But the philosopher had his revenge, for joining soon afterwards in a brisk gallop, Scott put Sibyl Grey to a leap beyond her prowess, and lay humbled in the ditch, while Davy, who was better mounted, cleared it and him at a bound. Happily there was little damage done — but no one was sorry that the sociable had been detained at the foot of the hill.

I have seen Sir Humphry in many places, and in company of many different descriptions; but never to such advantage as at Abbotsford. His host and he delighted in each other, and the modesty of their mutual admiration was a memorable spectacle. Davy was by nature a poet — and Scott, though anything but a philosopher in the modern sense of that term, might, I think it very likely, have pursued the study of physical science with zeal and success, had he chanced to fall in with such an instructor as Sir Humphry would have been to him, in his early life. Each strove to make the other talk — and they did so in turn more charmingly than I ever heard either on any other occasion whatsoever. Scott in his romantic narratives touched a deeper chord of feeling than usual, when he had such a listener as Davy; and Davy, when induced to open his views upon any question of scientific interest in Scott's presence, did so with a degree of clear energetic eloquence, and with a flow of imagery and illustration, of which neither his habitual tone of table talk (least of all in London), nor any of his prose writings (except, indeed, the posthumous Consolations of Travel) could suggest an adequate notion. I say his prose writings — for who that has read his sublime quatrains on the doctrine of Spinoza can doubt that he might have united, if he had pleased, in some great didactic poem, the vigorous ratiocination of Dryden and the moral majesty of Wordsworth? I remember William Laidlaw whispering to me, one night, when their "rapt talk" had kept the circle round the fire until long after the usual bedtime of Abbotsford — "Gude preserve us! this is a very superior occasion! Eh, sirs!" he added, cocking his eye like a bird, "I wonder if Shakspeare and Bacon ever met to screw ilk other up?"

Since I have touched on the subject of Sir Walter's autumnal diversions in these his latter years, I may as well notice here two annual festivals, when sport was made his pretext for assembling his rural neighbours about him anticipated, and fondly remembered by many solemn bout of salmon fishing for the neighbours and their families, instituted originally, I believe, by Somerville, and now, in his absence, conducted over by the Sheriff. Charles Fawcett, Tom's brother (partly as lessee) of the salmon fisheries for three miles of the Tweed, including all the water attached to Abbotsford, Gala, and Allwyn; and this festival established with a view, besides other considerations, to recompense him for the attention he always bestowed on the lairds or their visitors that chose to fish, either from the banks or the boat, within his jurisdiction. He took care, the day before, and other precautions, generally secured a plentiful supply of sport for the great anniversary; and then the anglers assembled to regale on the newly caught prey, broiled and roasted in every variety of preparation, beneath the old ash, adjoining Charlie's cottage at Boldside, on the margin of the Tweed, about a mile above Abbotsford. A banquet took place earlier in the day or later, according to circumstances; but it often lasted till the harvest moon shone on the lovely scene and its revellers. There is a picture that would have done no discredit to Watteau, which a better hand has painted the background in the illustration of The Monastery:—"On the opposite bank of the Tweed may be seen the remains of ancient enclosures, surrounded by birches and ash-trees of considerable size. These once formed the crofts or arable ground of a village, which has dwindled to a single hut, the abode of a fisherman, who affords a ferry. The cottages, even the church which once stood here, have sunk into vestiges hardly to be traced without a close search. The spot, the inhabitants having gradually withdrawn, is now a prosperous town of Galashiels, which has risen in the same position within two miles of their neighbourhood. The old, however, has tenanted the deserted grove, and the wild beings to supply the want of the mortal tenants have deserted it. The ruined and abandoned churchyard on the north side has been long believed to be haunted by the spirits of the dead. The deep broad current of the Tweed, wheeling round the foot of the steep bank, with the numerous islands, originally planted for shelter round the fields, and now presenting the effect of scattered groves, fill up the idea which one would form in the mind for a scene that Oberon and Queen Mab might love."

There are evenings when the spectator might believe, with Father Chaucer, that the ‘Queen of Faery,

With harp, and pipe, and symphony,
Were dwelling in the place.’¹

Sometimes the evening closed with a “burning of the water;” and then the Sheriff, though now not so agile as when he practised that rough sport in the early times of Ashestiel, was sure to be one of the party in the boat,—held a torch, or perhaps took the helm,—and seemed to enjoy the whole thing as heartily as the youngest of his company—

“ ’Tis blythe along the midnight tide,
With stalwart arm the boat to guide —
On high the dazzling blaze to rear,
And heedful plunge the barbed spear;
Rock, wood, and scaur, emerging bright,
Fling on the stream their ruddy light,
And from the bank our band appears Like Genii armed with fiery spears.”¹

The other “superior occasion” came later in the season; the 28th of October, the birthday of Sir Walter’s eldest son, was, I think, that usually selected for the Abbotsford Hunt. This was a coursing field on a large scale, including, with as many of the young gentry as pleased to attend, all Scott’s personal favourites among the yeomen and farmers of the surrounding country. The Sheriff always took the field, but latterly devolved the command upon his good friend Mr. John Usher, the ex-laird of Toftfield; and he could not have had a more skilful or a better humoured lieutenant. The hunt took place either on the moors above the Caudshields’ Loch, or over some of the hills on the estate of Gala, and we had commonly, ere we returned, hares enough to supply the wife of every farmer that attended with soup for a week following. The whole then dined at Abbotsford, the Sheriff in the chair, Adam Fergusson croupier, and Dominic Thompson, of course, chaplain. George, by the way, was himself an eager partaker in the preliminary sport; and now he would favour us with a grace, in Burns’s phrase “as long as my arm,” beginning with thanks to the Almighty, who had given man dominion over the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, and expatiating on this text with so luculent a commentary, that Scott, who had been fun-

¹ See Poetical Works, royal 8vo, p. 604.

blind with his spoon long before he reached A help exclamation as he sat down, "Well done, think we've had everything but the yew-bell pany, whose onset had been with him defeated, were under thirty in number, and sometimes they. The feast was such as suited the occasion. At the foot of the table, a salted round at the head of hare soup and hotch-potch extended down such light articles as geese, turkeys, a roasted sheep's head, and the undulating hanging, were a of side-dishes. Black-brook and musk-towl, black puddings, white puddings, and pyramids formed the second course. Ale was the ran during dinner, but there was plenty of port those whose stomachs they suited. The quarts were tossed off as if they held water. They made a few rounds of the table, but the hints soon became clamorous. Two or three bowls w and placed under the supervision of experienced — one of these being usually the Firth's Sheep the business of the evening commenced in rose faces shone and glowed like those at Canach's chairman told his richest stories of old rural Highland; Fergusson and humbler heroes fought lar battles o'er again, the stalwart Dundie found their last winter's snow storm, the parish saw the dexterous bargain of the Northumberland 70 man was knocked down for the song that he took most pleasure in singing. Sheriff substitute (a cheerful, hearty, little man, with a sparkling infectious laugh) gave us Dick o' the Cow, dale has ridden a raid; his son Thomas, Sir W's disciple and assistant in Border Heraldry and G without a rival in The Douglas Tragedy and The a weather-beaten, stiff-bearded veteran, Captain he was called (though I doubt if his rank was the Horse-Guards), had the primitive pasto known in sweet perfection; Hogg produced T or The Kye comes hame; and, in spite of many contrived to make everybody delighted whether the pathos of his ballad; the Melrose doctor style some of Moore's masterpieces; a couple o joined in Bonnie Admiral Duncan upon the high gallant croupier crowned the last bowl with A art my darling! Imagine some smart Parisian savant—some dreamy pedant of Halle or Heidelberg—a brace of stray young Lords from Oxford or Cambridge, or perhaps their prim college tutors, planted here and there amidst these rustic wassailers—this being their first vision of the author of Marmion and Ivanhoe, and he appearing as heartily at home in the scene as if he had been a veritable Dandie himself—his face radiant, his laugh gay as childhood, his chorus always ready. And so it proceeded until some worthy, who had fifteen or twenty miles to ride home, began to insinuate that his wife and bairns would be getting sorely anxious about the fords, and the Dumps and Hoddins were at last heard neighing at the gate, and it was voted that the hour had come for doch an dorrach—the stirrup-cup—to wit, a bumper all round of the unmitigated mountain dew. How they all contrived to get home in safety, Heaven only knows—but I never heard of any serious accident except upon one occasion, when James Hogg made a bet at starting that he would leap over his wall-eyed pony as she stood, and broke his nose in this experiment of “o’ervaulting ambition.” One comely goodwife, far off among the hills, amused Sir Walter by telling him, the next time he passed her homestead after one of these jolly doings, what her husband’s first words were when he alighted at his own door—“Ailie, my woman, I’m ready for my bed—and oh lass (he gallantly added), I wish I could sleep for a towmont, for there’s only nae thing in this warld worth living for, and that’s the Abbotsford Hunt!”

It may well be supposed that the President of the Boldside Festival and the Abbotsford Hunt did not omit the good old custom of the Kirn. Every November, before quitting the country for Edinburgh, he gave a harvest home, on the most approved model of former days, to all the peasantry on his estate, their friends and kindred, and as many poor neighbours besides as his barn could hold. Here old and young danced from sunset to sunrise,—John of Skye’s bagpipe being relieved at intervals by the violin of some Wandering Willie;—and the laird and all his family were present during the early part of the evening—he and his wife to distribute the contents of the first tub of whisky-punch, and his young people to take their due share in the endless reels and hornpipes of the earthen floor. As Mr. Morrith has said of him as he appeared at Laird Nippy’s kirn of earlier days, “to witness the cordiality of his reception might have unbent a misanthrope.” He had his private joke for every old wife or “gausie carle,” his arch compliment for the ear of every bonny lass, and his hand and his blessing for the head of every little Typo Thistle from Abbotstown or Broomfielders.

The whole of the ancient ceremonial of the doth days, as they are called in Scotland, obtained its poet at Abbotstown. He said it was unwonted, and would certainly have felt it very uncomfortable, not to welcome the new year in the midst of his family, and a few old friends, with the immemorial libation of a hot pint; but of all the consecrated ceremonies of the time none gave him such delight as the visit which he received as Laird from all the children on his estate, on the last morning of every December—when, in the words of an obscure poet often quoted by him,

“The cottage bannowing by the auld gae,
At the ha’ door for hospinny”

The following is from a new year’s day letter to Joanna Baillie:—“The Scottish labourer is in his natural state perhaps one of the best, most intelligent and kind hearted of human beings; and in truth I have hunted my other habits of expense very much since I fell into the habit of employing mine honest people. I wish you could have seen about a hundred children, being almost entirely supported by their fathers’ or brothers’ labour, come down yesterday to dance to the pipes, and get a piece of cake and bannock, and pence apiece (no very deadly largesse) in honour of hospinny. I declare to you, my dear friend, that when I thought the poor fellows who kept these children so neat, and well taught, and well behaved, were slaving the whole day for eighteen pence or twenty-pence at the most, I was ashamed of their gratitude, and of their bows and bows. But after all, one does what one can, and it is better twenty families should be comfortable according to their wishes and habits, than half that number should be raised above their situation. Besides, like Fortunio in the fairy tale, I have my gifted men—the best wrestler and cudgel-player—the best runner and leaper—the best shot in the little district; and, as I am partial to all manly and athletic exercises, these are great favourites, being otherwise decent persons, and bearing their faculties meekly. All this smells of sad egotism, but what can I write to you about save what is uppermost in my own thoughts? And here am I, thinning old plantations and planting new ones; now undoing what has been done, and now doing what I suppose no one would do but myself, and accomplishing all my magical transformations by the arms and legs of the aforesaid genii, conjured up to my aid at eighteen-pence a day."

"The notable paradox," he says in one of the most charming of his essays, "that the residence of a proprietor upon his estate is of as little consequence as the bodily presence of a stockholder upon Exchange, has, we believe, been renounced. At least, as in the case of the Duchess of Suffolk's relationship to her own child, the vulgar continue to be of opinion that there is some difference in favour of the next hamlet and village, and even of the vicinage in general, when the squire spends his rents at the manor-house, instead of cutting a figure in France or Italy. A celebrated politician used to say he would willingly bring in one bill to make poaching felony, another to encourage the breed of foxes, and a third to revive the decayed amusements of cock-fighting and bull-baiting — that he would make, in short, any sacrifice to the humours and prejudices of the country gentlemen, in their most extravagant form, provided only he could prevail upon them to 'dwell in their own houses, be the patrons of their own tenantry, and the fathers of their own children.'"¹

In September 1820 appeared The Abbot — the continuation, to a certain extent, of The Monastery, of which I barely mentioned the publication under the preceding March. I have nothing of any consequence to add to the information which the Introduction of 1830 affords us respecting the composition and fate of the former of these novels. It was considered as a failure — the first of the series on which any such sentence was pronounced; — nor have I much to allege in favour of the White Lady of Avenel, generally criticised as the primary blot — or of Sir Percy Shafton, who was loudly, though not quite so generally, condemned. In either case, considered separately, he seems to have erred from dwelling (in the German taste) on materials that might have done very well for a rapid sketch. The phantom, with whom we have leisure to become familiar, is sure to fail — even the witch of Endor is contented with a momentary appearance and five syllables of the shade she evokes. And we may say the same of any grotesque absurdity in human manners. Scott might have considered with advantage how lightly and briefly Shakbeen successful in finding some reconciling medium of giving consistency and harmony to his naturally in materials. "These," said one of his ablest critics, "—but they refuse to blend. Nothing can be more in conception, and sometimes in language, than the the White Maid of Avenel, but when this ethereal p who rides on the cloud which 'for Araby is bound'

*Something between heaven and hell, Something that neither is nor fell;

whose existence is linked by an awful and mysterious to the fortunes of a decaying family, when such a this descends to clownish pranks, and promotes a jest about a tailor's bodkin, the course of our sym rudely arrested, and we feel as if the author had put the old-fashioned pleasantry of selling a bargain."

The beautiful natural scenery, and the sterling S characters and manners introduced in The Monastery, are sufficient to redeem even these mistakes, and, incl inclined to believe that it will ultimately occupy place than some romances enjoying hitherto a far hign tation, in which he makes no use of Scottish material.

Sir Walter himself thought well of The Abbot wh finished it. When he sent me a complete copy, I t slip of paper at the beginning of volume first, there from Tom Cribb's Memorial to Congress

"Up he rose in a funk, lapped a toothful of brandy, And to it again! — any odds upon Sandy!"

and whatever ground he had been supposed to lo Monastery, part at least of it was regained by this especially by its most graceful and pathetic portratur Stuart. "The Castle of Locheven," says the Chri sioner Adam, "is seen at every turn from the north Blair-Adam. This castle, renowned and attractive the others in my neighbourhood, became an object increased attention, and a theme of constant conversat the author of Waverley had, by his inimitable power ating character — by his creative poetic fancy in rej scenes of varied interest — and by the splendour of h tic descriptions, infused a more diversified and a de of feeling into the history of Queen Mary's capt escape."

¹ Adolphus's Letters to Heber, p. 13.

I have introduced this quotation from a little book privately printed for the amiable Judge's own family and familiar friends, because Sir Walter owned to myself at the time, that the idea of The Abbot had arisen in his mind during a visit to Blair-Adam. In the pages of the tale itself, indeed, the beautiful localities of that estate are distinctly mentioned, with an allusion to the virtues and manners that adorned its mansion, such as must have been intended to satisfy the possessor (if he could have had any doubts on the subject) as to the authorship of those novels.

About Midsummer 1816, the Judge received a visit from his near relation William Clerk, Adam Fergusson, his hereditary friend and especial favourite, and their lifelong intimate, Scott. They remained with him for two or three days, in the course of which they were all so much delighted with their host, and he with them, that it was resolved to reassemble the party, with a few additions, at the same season of every following year. This was the origin of the Blair-Adam Club, the regular members of which were in number nine. They usually contrived to meet on a Friday; spent the Saturday in a ride to some scene of historical interest within an easy distance; enjoyed a quiet Sunday at home — "duly attending divine worship at the Kirk of Cleish (not Cleishbotham)" — gave Monday morning to another antiquarian excursion, and returned to Edinburgh in time for the Courts of Tuesday. From 1816 to 1831 inclusive, Sir Walter was a constant attendant at these meetings. He visited in this way Castle-Campbell, Magus Moor, Falkland, Dunfermline, St. Andrew's, and many other scenes of ancient celebrity: to one of those trips we must ascribe his dramatic sketch of Macduff's Cross — and to that of the dog-days of 1819 we owe the weightier obligation of The Abbot.

To return — for reasons connected with the affairs of the Ballantynes, Messrs. Longman published the first edition of The Monastery; and similar circumstances induced Sir Walter to associate this house with that of Constable in the succeeding novel. Constable disliked its title, and would fain have had The Nunnery instead; but Scott stuck to his Abbot. The bookseller grumbled a little, but was soothed by the author's reception of his request that Queen Elizabeth might be brought into the field in his next romance, as a companion to the Mary Stuart of The Abbot. Scott would not indeed indulge him with the choice of the particular period of Elizabeth's reign, indicated in the proposed title of The Armada; but expressed his willingness to take up his own old favourite legend of Meikle's ballad. He wished for all the world, like the ballad, Chamber Hall, but in further deference to Constable's wishes, substituted Kendalworth. John Ballantyne objected to this title, and told Constable the result would be "something worthy of the kennel;" but Constable had all reason to be satisfied with the child of his christening. His partner, Mr. Cadell, says: "His vanity boiled over so much at this time, on having his suggestion gone into, that, when an hour had elapsed, he used to stalk up and down his room, and exclaim, 'By G—, I am all but the author of the Waverley Novels!'" Constable's bibliographical knowledge, however, it is not fair to say, was really of most essential service to Scott upon many of these occasions; and his letter proposing the subject of The Abbot, furnished such a catalogue of materials for the illustration of the period as may, probably enough, have called forth some very energetic expression of thankfulness.

Scott's kindness secured for John Ballantyne the usual interest in the profits of Kendalworth, the last of his great works in which his friend was to have any concern. I have already mentioned the obvious drooping of his health and strength; yet his manners continued as airy as ever. In May, it was now, after his maladies had taken a very serious shape, and it was hardly possible to look on him without anticipating a speedy termination of his career, that the gay hopeful spirit of the shattered and trembling invalid led him to plunge into a new stream of costly indulgence. It was an amiable point in his character, that he had always retained a tender fondness for his native place. He had now taken up the ambition of rivalling his illustrious friend, in some sort, by providing himself with a summer retirement amidst the scenery of his boyhood; and it need not be doubted, at the same time, that in erecting a villa at Kelso, he calculated on substantial advantages from its vicinity to Abbotsford.

One fine day of this autumn I accompanied Mr. Walter to inspect the progress of this edifice, which was to have the title of Walton Hall. John had purchased two or three old houses with notched gables and thatched roofs, near the end of the long original street of Kelso, with their small gardens and paddocks running down to the Tweed. He had already fitted up convenient bachelor's lodgings in one of the primitive tenements, and converted the others into a goodly range of stabling, and was now watching the completion of his new corps de logis behind, which included a handsome entrance-hall, or saloon, destined to have old Piscator's bust on a stand in the centre, and to be embellished all round with emblems of his sport. Behind this were spacious rooms overlooking the little pleasance, which was to be laid out somewhat in the Italian style, with ornamental steps, a fountain and jet d'eau, and a broad terrace hanging over the river. In these new dominions John received us with pride and hilarity; we dined gaily, al fresco, by the side of his fountain; and after not a few bumpers to the prosperity of Walton Hall, he mounted Old Mortality, and escorted us for several miles on our ride homewards. It was this day that, overflowing with kindly zeal, Scott revived one of the long-forgotten projects of their early connexion in business, and offered his gratuitous services as editor of a Novelist's Library, to be printed and published for the sole benefit of his host. The offer was eagerly embraced, and when, two or three mornings afterwards, John returned Sir Walter's visit, he had put into his hands the MS. of that admirable life of Fielding, which was followed at brief intervals, as the arrangements of the projected work required, by fourteen others of the same class and excellence. The publication of the first volume of Balantyne's Novelist's Library did not take place, however, until February 1821; and notwithstanding its Prefaces, in which Scott combines all the graces of his easy narrative with a perpetual stream of deep and gentle wisdom in commenting on the tempers and fortunes of his best predecessors in novel literature, and also with expositions of his own critical views, which prove how profoundly he had investigated the principles and practice of those masters before he struck out a new path for himself—in spite of these delightful and valuable essays, the Collection was not a prosperous speculation.

Sir James Hall of Dunglass resigned, in November 1820, the Presidency of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and the Fellows, though they had on all former occasions selected a man of science to fill that post, paid Sir Walter the compliment of unanimously requesting him to be Sir James's successor in it. He felt and expressed a natural hesitation about accepting this honour—which at first sight seemed like invading the proper department of another order of scholars. But when it was urged upon him that the Society is really a double one—embracing a section for literature as well as one of science—and that it was only due to the former to let it occasionally supply the chief of the whole body,—Scott acquiesced in the flattering proposal; and his gentle skill was found effective, so long as he held the Chair, in maintaining and strengthening the tone of good feeling and good manners which can alone render the meetings of such a society, either as a donor or a friend. The new President himself soon began to take a personal interest in many of their discussions, those at least which were pointed to any discovery of practical use, and he frequently added some eminent men of science, with whose acquaintance he had hitherto been slight, to the list of his most valued friends, in particular Sir David Brewster.

I may mention his introduction, about the same time, to an institution of a far different description, that called "The Celtic Society of Edinburgh," a considerable society for the patronage of ancient Highland music, and customs, especially the use of "the Gaelic Old Gaelic." A large part of their funds have always been applied to the really important object of extending education in the wilder districts of the north. At their annual meetings Scott was hereof with a regular attendant. He appeared, as in duty bound, in the costume of the Fraternity, and was usually followed by "John of Skye," in all his plumage.

His son Charles left home for the first time towards the close of 1820—a boy of exceedingly quick and lively parts, with the gentlest and most affectionate and modest of dispositions. This threw a cloud over the domestic circle, but, as on the former occasion, Sir Walter sought and found comfort in a constant correspondence with the absent favourite. Charles had gone to Lampeter, in Wales, to be under the care of the celebrated scholar John Williams, Archdeacon of Cardigan; whose pains were well rewarded in the progress of his pupil.

About Christmas appeared Kentworth, in 3 vols. post 8vo, like Ivanhoe, which form was adhered to with all the subsequent novels of the series. Kentworth was one of the most successful of them all at the time of publication, and it continues, and, I doubt not, will ever continue to be placed in the very highest rank of prose fiction. The rich variety of character, and scenery, and incident in this novel, has never indeed been surpassed; nor, with the one exception of the Truce of Hammermoor, has Scott bequeathed us a deeper and more affecting tragedy than that of Amy Robsart.

CHAPTER XII.

Death of John Ballantyne— and William Erskine— George IV. at Edinburgh— Visits of Mr. Crabbe and Miss Edgeworth— Reminiscences by Mr. Adolphus— Publication of Lives of the Novelists— Halidon Hill— The Pirate— The Fortunes of Nigel— Peveril of the Peak— Quentin Durward— and St. Roman's Well. 1821-1823.

BEFORE the end of January 1821, he went to London at the request of the other Clerks of Session, that he might watch over the progress of an Act of Parliament designed to relieve them from a considerable part of their drudgery in attesting recorded deeds by signature; and his stay was prolonged until near the beginning of the Summer term of his Court. On his return he found two matters of domestic interest awaiting him. On the 23d April he writes to the Cornet: "The noble Captain Fergusson was married on Monday last. I was present at the bridal, and I assure you the like hath not been seen since the days of Lesmahago. Like his prototype, the Captain advanced in a jaunty military step, with a kind of leer on his face that seemed to quizz the whole affair. You should write to your brother sportsman and soldier, and wish the veteran joy of his entrance into the band of Benedicts. Odd enough that I should christen a grandchild and attend the wedding of a contemporary within two days of each other. I have sent John of Skye, with Tom, and all the rabblement which they can collect, to play the pipes, shout, and fire guns below the Captain's windows this morning; and I am just going over to hover about on my pony, and witness their reception. The happy pair returned to Huntley Burn on Saturday; but yesterday being Sunday, we permitted them to enjoy their pillows in quiet. This morning they must not expect to get off so well."

The Captain and his Lady soon pitched a tent for themselves—but it was in the same parish, and Gattonside was but an

he by nature : a very arduous character, but unambitious, and more afraid of the possibility of injury to the name of doctor to any one who only consulted him in the full "reign of society." His sister Margaret is extremely like him in the freedom of thought and of humour, and he has two others who are an "great" contribution in their way. The eldest was a simple, good-natured, and all the gravity and shyness of the character, but not a variety of that old humour or spleen, on the contrary, he is one of the kindest and most motherly creatures in the world. The second, Mary, was in her day a very pretty girl, but her person has since deformed, and she has the advantage of features, with which that circumstance is sometimes attended. She rises very early in the morning, and runs over all my wild land in the neighbourhood, wearing the most complicated pair of handkerchiefs of different colours on her head, and a stick double her own height in her hand, attended by two dogs, whose power of yelping are truly terrific. With much good and accompaniments, she has very nearly established the character in the neighbourhood of being something no money, and the archdeacon of Melrose and Darnick are frightened from gathering hazel nuts and cutting wands in my church, by the fear of meeting the dust lady. With all this quackery, I do not believe there ever existed a family with so much mutual affection, and such an overflow of benevolence to all around them, from men and women down to hedge sparrows and lame asses, more than one of which they have taken under their direct and special protection."

On the 15th of June 1821, died at Edinburgh John Halliwell. Until within a week or two before, Sir Walter had not entertained any thought that his end was near. I was present at one of their last interviews, and John's death-bed was a thing not to be forgotten. We sat by him for perhaps an hour, and I think half that space was occupied with his predictions of a speedy end, and details of his last will, which he had just been executing, and which lay on his covered, the other half being given, five minutes or so at a time, to questions and remarks, which intimated that the hope of life was still flickering before him. Nay, that his interest in all its concerns remained eager. The proof-sheets of a volume of his Novelist's Library lay also by his pillow, and he passed from them to his will, and then back to them, as by jerks and starts Abbotsford — and the spirit of the auctioneer virtuoso flashed up as he began to describe what would, he thought, be the best style and arrangement of the book-shelves. He was interrupted by an agony of asthma, which left him with hardly any signs of life; and ultimately he did expire in a fit of the same kind. Scott was visibly and profoundly shaken by this scene and sequel. As we stood together a few days afterwards, while they were smoothing the turf over John's remains in the Canongate churchyard, the heavens which had been dark and slaty, cleared up suddenly, and the midsummer sun shone forth in his strength. Scott, ever awake to the "skiey influences," cast his eye along the overhanging line of the Calton Hill, with its gleaming walls and towers, and then turning to the grave again, "I feel," he whispered in my ear, — "I feel as if there would be less sunshine for me from this day forth."

As we walked homewards, he told me, among other favourable traits of his friend, one little story which I must not omit. He remarked one day to a poor student of divinity attending his auction, that he looked as if he were in bad health. The young man assented with a sigh. "Come," said Ballantyne, "I think I ken the secret of a sort of draft that would relieve you — particularly," he added, handing him a cheque for L.5 or L.10 — "particularly, my dear, if taken upon an empty stomach."

I am sorry to take leave of John Ballantyne with the remark, that his last will was a document of the same class with too many of his states and calendars. So far from having L.2000 to bequeath to Sir Walter, he died as he had lived, ignorant of the situation of his affairs, and deep in debt.

The coronation of George IV. had been deferred in consequence of the unhappy affair of the Queen's Trial. The 19th of July 1821 was now announced for this solemnity, and Sir Walter resolved to be among the spectators. It occurred to him that if the Ettrick Shepherd were to accompany him, and produce some memorial of the scene likely to catch the popular ear in Scotland, good service might thus be done to the cause of loyalty. But this was not his only consideration. Hogg had married a handsome and most estimable young woman, a good deal above his own original rank in life, the year before; and expecting with her a dowry of L.1000, he had forthwith revived the grand ambition of an earlier day, and taken an extensive farm on the Buccleuch estate, at a short distance from Altrive Lake. Misfortune pursued the Shepherd — the bankruptcy of his wife's father interrupted the stocking of the sheep-walks, and the article is mismanaged. Scott hoped that a series of literary nation poets, or pamphlet, might end in some po that would relieve these authentic, and when at Sidmouth, to ask a place for himself in the Hall Westminster, begged suitable accommodation. I Lord Selwinkle answered that Sir Walter's wish gratified, provided they would both arise with him the coronation, in Richmond Park, "where," says the Under Secretary, "his Lordship will receive York and a few other Jacobites to meet you." made known to the tenant of Mount Benger, he w as he says, "with the tear in his eye, to night went to London, he must miss attending the great der fair, held on St. Botolph's Green, on the 1 July; and that his absence from that meeting, entering upon business as a store farmer, would by his new competitors as highly imprudent and "In short," James concludes, "the thing is imp as there is no man in his Majesty's dominions great talents for government, and the energy at his administration, so much as I do, I will write home, and endeavour to give it you before you Shepherd probably expected that these pretty would reach the royal ear; but however that ma his own Muse turned a deaf ear to him — at least of anything that he wrote on this occasion. See without him, on board a new steam ship called the burgh, which, as he suggested to the master, ou have been christened the New Reekie.

On the day after the coronation, Sir Walter's letter descriptive of the whole ceremonial to Bal published it in his newspaper. It has been su frequently; and will probably possess considerable the student of English history and manners in t for the two next coronations were conducted inferior scale of splendour and expense — and t of curtailment in any such matters is now seldom

At the close of that brilliant scene, he receive homage to his genius which delighted him not les Nippy's reverence for the Sheriff's Knoll, and outler's dear acquisition of his signature on a st Missing his carriage, he had to return home on foot minster, after the banquet — that is to say, between o'clock in the morning; when he and a young gentleman his companion found themselves locked in the crowd, somewhere near Whitehall, and the bustle and tumult were such that his friend was afraid some accident might happen to the lame limb. A space for the dignitaries was kept clear at that point by the Scots Greys. Sir Walter addressed a serjeant of this celebrated regiment, begging to be allowed to pass by him into the open ground in the middle of the street. The man answered shortly, that his orders were strict — that the thing was impossible. While he was endeavouring to persuade the serjeant to relent, some new wave of turbulence approached from behind, and his young companion exclaimed in a loud voice, "Take care, Sir Walter Scott, take care!" The stalwart dragoon, on hearing the name, said, "What! Sir Walter Scott? He shall get through anyhow!" He then addressed the soldiers near him — "Make room, men, for Sir Walter Scott, our illustrious countryman!" The men answered, "Sir Walter Scott! — God bless him!" — and he was in a moment within the guarded line of safety.

"I saw Sir Walter again," says Allan Cunningham, "when he attended the coronation. In the meantime his bust had been wrought in marble, and the sculptor desired to take the advantage of his visit to communicate such touches of expression or lineament as the new material rendered necessary. This was done with a happiness of eye and hand almost magical: for five hours did the poet sit, or stand, or walk, while Chantrey's chisel was passed again and again over the marble, adding something at every touch. 'Well, Allan,' he said, 'were you at the coronation? it was a splendid sight.' — 'No, Sir Walter,' I answered, — 'places were dear and ill to get: I am told it was magnificent: but having seen the procession of King Crispin at Dumfries, I was satisfied.' Scott laughed heartily. — 'That's not a bit better than Hogg,' he said. 'He stood balancing the matter whether to go to the coronation or the fair of Saint Boswell — and the fair carried it.' During this conversation, Mr. Bolton the engineer came in. Something like a cold acknowledgment passed between the poet and him. On his passing into an inner room, Scott said, 'I am afraid Mr. Bolton has not forgot a little passage that once took place between us. We met in a public company, and in reply to the remark of some one, he said, "That's like the old saying, if you are a Scot, the world you will find a Scot: a rat and whole edifice;—throughout there were numberless consultations with Mr. Blore, Mr. Terry, and Mr. Skene, as well as with Mr. Atkinson—and the actual builders placed considerable inventive talents, as well as admirable workmanship, at the service of their friendly employer. Every preparation was now made by them, and the foundations might have been set about without farther delay; but he was very reluctant to authorise the demolition of the rustic porch of the old cottage, with its luxuriant overgrowth of roses and jessamines; and, in short, could not make up his mind to sign the death-warrant of his favourite bower until winter had robbed it of its beauties. He then made an excursion from Edinburgh, on purpose to be present at its downfall—saved as many of the creepers as seemed likely to survive removal, and planted them with his own hands about a somewhat similar porch, erected expressly for their reception, at his daughter Sophia's little cottage of Chiefswood.

There my wife and I spent this summer and autumn of 1821—the first of several seasons which will ever dwell on my memory as the happiest of my life. We were near enough Abbotsford to partake as often as we liked of its brilliant society; yet could do so without being exposed to the worry and exhaustion of spirit which the daily reception of new comers entailed upon all the family except Sir Walter himself. But, in truth, even he was not always proof against the annoyances connected with such a style of open-house-keeping. Even his temper sunk sometimes under the solemn applauses of learned dulness, the vapid raptures of painted and periwigged dowagers, the horseleech avidity with which underbred foreigners urged their questions, and the pompous simpers of condescending magnates. When sore beset at home in this way, he would every now and then discover that he had some very particular business to attend to on an outlying part of his estate, and craving the indulgence of his guests overnight, appear at the cabin in the glen before its inhabitants were astir in the morning. The clatter of Sibyl Grey's hoofs, the yelping of Mustard and Spice, and his own joyous shout of reveillé under our windows, were the signal that he had burst his toils, and meant for that day to "take his ease in his inn." On descending, he was to be found seated with all his dogs and ours about him, under a spreading ash that overshadowed half the bank between the cottage and the brook, pointing the edge of his woodman's axe for himself, and listening to Tom Purdie's lecture touching the plantation that most needed thinning. After breakfast, he would take possession of a room upstairs, and write a chapter of The Pirate having made up and despatched his packet for away to join Purdie wherever the foresters were, and sometimes to labour among them strenuously until it was time either to rejoin his own party at the quiet circle of the cottage. When his guests were and friendly, he often made them come over and Chiefswood in a body towards evening, and such appeared to more amiable advantage than when young people with their little arrangements and opinions. He was ready with all sorts of devices to wants of a narrow establishment, he used to del- larly in sinking the wine in a well under the went out, and hauling up the basket just before announced—this primitive process being, he as had always practised when a young housekeeper, his opinion, far superior in its results to any ap- ice; and, in the same spirit, whenever the wealth- ciently genial, he voted for dining out-of-door which at once got rid of the inconvenience of rooms, and made it natural and easy for the help the ladies, so that the paucity of servants nothing. Mr. Rose used to amuse himself with scene and the party to the closing act of one of French dramas, where "Monsieur le Comte" and Comtesse" appear feasting at a village bridal and but in truth, our "M. le Comte" was only trying again for a few simple hours his own old life of E.

When circumstances permitted, he usually spent at least in the week at our little cottage, as frequently he did the like with the Fergussons, to he could bring chance visitors, when he pleased freedom as to his daughter's. Indeed it seemed a matter of chance, any fine day when there had been invasion of the Southron, whether the three families in fact, made but one) should dine at Abbotsford Burn, or at Chiefswood; and at none of them was considered quite complete, unless it included also. Death has laid a heavy hand upon that circle—circle I believe as ever met. Bright eyes now of gay voices for ever silenced, seem to haunt me as

During several weeks of that summer Scott had roof Mr. William Erskine and two of his daughters

Walter Scott
1797-1832

Presented by November 1858

SIR WALTER SCOTT

From the marble bust by Sir J. Chantrey in the Library at Abbotsford

I believe, their first visit to Tweedside since the death of Mrs. Erskine in September 1819. He had probably made a point of having his friend with him at this particular time, because he was desirous of having the benefit of his advice and corrections from day to day as he advanced in the composition of The Pirate—with the localities of which romance the Sheriff of Orkney and Zetland was of course thoroughly familiar. At all events, the constant and eager delight with which Erskine watched the progress of the tale has left a deep impression on my memory; and indeed I heard so many of its chapters first read from the MS. by him, that I can never open the book now without thinking I hear his voice. Sir Walter used to give him at breakfast the pages he had written that morning; and very commonly, while he was again at work in his study, Erskine would walk over to Chiefswood, that he might have the pleasure of reading them aloud to my wife and me under our favourite tree, before the packet had to be sealed up for Edinburgh. I cannot paint the pleasure and the pride with which he acquitted himself on such occasions. The little artifice of his manner was merely superficial, and was wholly forgotten as tender affection and admiration, fresh as the impulses of childhood, glistened in his eye, and trembled in his voice.

Erskine was, I think, the only man in whose society Scott took great pleasure, during the more vigorous part of his life, that had neither constitution nor inclination for any of the rough bodily exercises in which he himself delighted. The Counsellor (as the survivors of The Mountain always called him) was a little man of feeble make, who seemed unhappy when his pony got beyond a foot-pace, and had never, I should suppose, addicted himself to any out-of-door sport whatever. He would, I fancy, have as soon thought of slaying his own mutton as of handling a fowling-piece; he used to shudder when he saw a party equipped for coursing, as if murder were in the wind; but the cool meditative angler was in his eyes the abomination of abominations. His small elegant features, hectic cheek, and soft hazel eyes, were the index of the quick sensitive gentle spirit within. He had the warm heart of a woman, her generous enthusiasm, and some of her weaknesses. A beautiful landscape, or a fine strain of music, would send the tears rolling down his cheek; and though capable, I have no doubt, of exhibiting, had his duty called him to do so, the highest spirit of a hero or a martyr, he had very little command over his nerves amidst circumstances such as men of ordinary mould (to say nothing of iron fabrics like Scott's) regard with his friend hardly perceived to be a descent at a precipice, and, unlike the White Lady, go a long way round for a bridge.

Erskine had as yet been rather unfortunate in his career, and thought a sheriffship by way of advancement due to his merits, and which might naturally have secured for him. This had at the time when I first observed him in our; he had come to intermingle a certain weakness now and then with his forensic exhibition seemed inclined (though altogether incapable the Tory party) to say bitter things of people, but, with these exceptions, never was beneath the human race more lively and overflowing than was, even when he considered himself as one to complain of his luck in the world. Now little asperities had disappeared, one great rock its shadow over him, and submissive to the Heaven, he had no longer any thoughts for the of mankind. Meanwhile he shrank from the general society, and lived almost exclusively in a circle of intimates. His conversation, though wise and logical on the first impression, was not. His literary ambition, active and aspiring at long before this time merged in his profound Scott; but he still read a great deal, and did believe with a view of assisting Scott by hints as for his own amusement. He had much of in extracting the picturesque from old, and, generally dull books; and in bringing out his stores he great deal of quaint humour and sly wit. So respected, trusted, and loved him, much as an hand does the wife who gave him her heart in his thoughts rather than her own in the eye soothed, cheered, and sustained Erskine habit believe a more entire and perfect confidence than theirs was and always had been in each one who had duly observed the creeping jealous nature, it might perhaps seem doubtful on the chance of real nobility of heart and character, their connexion at the time of which I am to be cast.

In the course of a few months more, Sir great satisfaction of seeing Erskine at length promoted to a seat on the Bench of the Court of Session, by the title of Lord Kinnedder; and his pleasure was enhanced doubtless by the reflection that his friend owed this elevation very much, if not mainly, to his own unwearied exertions on his behalf. He writes thus on the occasion to Joanna Baillie:—"There is a degree of melancholy attending the later stages of a barrister's profession, which, though no one cares for sentimentalities attendant on a man of fifty or thereabout, in a rusty black bombazine gown, are not the less cruelly felt: their business sooner or later fails, for younger men will work cheaper, and longer, and harder—besides that the cases are few, comparatively, in which senior counsel are engaged, and it is not etiquette to ask any one in that advanced age to take the whole burden of a cause. Insensibly, without decay of talent, and without losing the public esteem, there is a gradual decay of employment, which almost no man ever practised thirty years without experiencing; and thus the honours and dignities of the Bench, so hardly earned, and themselves leading but to toils of another kind, are peculiarly desirable. Erskine would have sat there ten years ago, but for wretched intrigues."

In August appeared the volume of the Novelist's Library, containing Scott's Life of Smollett; and it being now ascertained that John Ballantyne had died a debtor, the editor offered to proceed with this series of prefaces, on the footing that the whole profits of the work should go to his widow. Mr. Constable, whose own health was now beginning to break, had gone southwards in quest of more genial air, and was residing near London when he heard of this proposition. He immediately wrote to me, entreating me to represent to Sir Walter that the undertaking, having been coldly received at first, was unlikely to grow in favour if continued on the same plan—that in his opinion the bulk of the volumes, and the small type of their text, had been unwisely chosen, for a work of mere entertainment, and could only be suitable for one of reference; that Ballantyne's Novelist's Library, therefore, ought to be stopped at once, and another in a lighter shape, to range with the late collected edition of the first series of the Waverley Romances, announced with his own name as publisher and Scott's as editor. He proposed at the same time to commence the issue of a Select Library of English Poetry, with prefaces and a few notes by the same hand; and calculating that each of these collections should extend to twenty-five volumes, and that the publication of both might be concluded within two years. — The writing of the prefaces, & perhaps an occasional relief from more important labours, the bookseller offered to pay their editor £1,000, a portion of which sum, as he hinted, would undoubtedly than Mrs. John Ballantyne could ever hope to derive from the prosecution of her husband's last publishing adventures combined to prevent the realisation of his inefficient projects. — Scott now, as at the beginning of his career, had views about what a collection of English Poetry in which even Constable could not be made to coincide with his letters to Lady Louisa Stuart sufficiently coldness with which he regarded further attempts at the Elder Novelists. The Ballantyne Library crept to the tenth volume, and was then dropped abruptly; and negotiation with Constable was never renewed.

Lady Louisa had not, I fancy, read Scott's Elder Novelists until, some years after this time, they were introduced into two little piratical dunderboxes by a Parisian bookseller on her then expressing her admiration of them, to her astonishment that the speculation of which they formed a part should have attracted little notice of any sort, in London, as follows: — "I am delighted they afford any entertainment for they are rather flimsily written, being done merely for a friend: they were yoked to a great all-conditioned double-columned book, which they were as useful to the world as a set of fleas would be to draw a mail coach. — It is difficult to answer your Ladyship's curious question as to the change of taste; but whether in young or old, it takes place insensibly without the parties being aware of it. — A copy of my own, Mrs. Keith of Ravelstone, who was in a very advanced condition, being a daughter of Sir John Swinton — lived with unabated vigour of intellect to an advanced age. — She was very fond of reading, and on the last of her long life. — One day she asked me whether I happened to be alone together, whether I had ever read Aphra Behn's novels? — I confessed the charge. — Whether I had got her a sight of them? — I said, with some hesitation, I believed I could; but that I did not think she would be able to read the manners, or the language, which approached too much to the manners of Charles II.'s time to be quite proper reading. — 'I am less,' said the good old lady, 'I remember them being much admired, and being so much interested in them myself, I wish to look at them again.' — To hear was to obey. — Mrs. Aphra Behn, curiously sealed up, with 'privat fidential' on the packet, to my gay old grand-aunt. The next time I saw her afterwards, she gave me back Aphra, properly wrapped up, with nearly these words:—'Take back your bonny Mrs. Behn; and, if you will take my advice, put her in the fire, for I found it impossible to get through the very first novel. But is it not,' she said, 'a very odd thing that I, an old woman of eighty and upwards, sitting alone, feel myself ashamed to read a book which, sixty years ago, I have heard read aloud for the amusement of large circles, consisting of the first and most creditable society in London?' This, of course, was owing to the gradual improvement of the national taste and delicacy. The change that brings into and throws out of fashion particular styles of composition, is something of the same kind. It does not signify what the greater or less merit of the book is:—the reader, as Tony Lumpkin says, must be in a concatenation accordingly— the fashion, or the general taste, must have prepared him to be pleased, or put him on his guard against it. It is much like dress. If Clarissa should appear before a modern party in her lace ruffles and head dress, or Lovelace in his wig, however genteelly powdered, I am afraid they would make no conquests; the fashion which makes conquests of us in other respects, is very powerful in literary composition, and adds to the effect of some works, while in others it forms their sole merit."

Among other miscellaneous work of this autumn, Scott amused some leisure hours with writing a series of "Private Letters," supposed to have been discovered in the repositories of a Noble English Family, and giving a picture of manners in town and country during the early part of the reign of James I. These letters were printed as fast as he penned them, in a handsome quarto form, and he furnished the margin with a running commentary of notes, drawn up in the character of a disappointed chaplain, a keen Whig, or rather Radical, overflowing on all occasions with spleen against Monarchy and Aristocracy. When the printing had reached the 72d page, however, he was told candidly by Prskine, by James Ballantyne, and also by myself, that, however clever his imitation of the epistolary style of the period in question, he was throwing away in these letters the materials of as good a romance as he had ever penned; and a few days afterwards he said to me— patting Sibyl's neck till she danced under him— "You were all quite right; if the letters had passed for genuine they would have found favour only with a few musty antiquaries; and if the joke were detected, there was not story enough to carry it off. I shall burn the sheets, and give you Jamie and all his tail in the old shape, as soon as Captain Goffe within view of the gallows."

I think it must have been about the middle of October he dropped the scheme of this fictitious correspondence. I remember the morning that he began The Fortune. The day being destined for Newark Hill, I went to Hotsford before breakfast, and found Mr. Terry waiting with his friend's master mason. While Terry was chatting, Scott came out, bareheaded, with a bunch in his hand, and said, "Well, lads, I've had the keel lugged this morning — here it is — be off to the water-let me hear how you like it." Terry took the paper, walking up and down by the river, read to me the first of Nigel. He expressed great delight with the amusing, and especially with the contrast between its title of London life, and a chapter about Norma of the in the third volume of The Pirate, which had been him in a similar manner the morning before. I could (according to the Sheriff's phrase) he smell vent there was every prospect of a fine field for the art of tion. The actor, when our host met us returning haugh, did not fail to express his opinion that the would be of this quality. Sir Walter, as he took the his hand, eyed him with a gay smile, in which gentleness mingled with mock exultation, and then threw self into an attitude of comical dignity, he rolled tones of John Kemble, one of the loftiest bursts of son's Mammon —

"Come on, sir. Now you set your foot on shore
In Noro orbe — — Pertinax, my Surly,¹
Again I say to thee aloud, Be rich,
This day thou shalt have ingots."

This was another period of "refreshing the machine." In November, I find Sir Walter writing thus to partner, Mr. Cadell: — "I want two books, Malcolm Redivivus, or some such name, and Derham's Artificer." [The reader of Nigel will understand these. "All good luck to you, commercially and otherwise."

¹ The fun of this application of "my Surly" will not escape who remembers the kind and good-humoured Terry's power a peculiarly saturnine aspect. This queer grimace of lookable to the comedian; and in private he often called it up was most cheerful.

grown a shabby letter-writer, for my eyes are not so young as they were, and I grudge everything that does not go to press."

Sir Walter concluded, before he went to town in November, another negotiation of importance with this house. They agreed to give for the remaining copyright of the four novels published between December 1819 and January 1821 — to wit, Ivanhoe, The Monastery, The Abbot, and Kenilworth — the sum of five thousand guineas. The stipulation about not revealing the author's name, under a penalty of L.2000, was repeated. By these four novels, the fruits of scarcely more than twelve months' labour, he had already cleared at least L.10,000 before this bargain was completed. I cannot pretend to guess what the actual state of his pecuniary affairs was at the time when John Ballantyne's death relieved them from one great source of complication and difficulty. But I have said enough to satisfy every reader, that when he began the second, and far the larger division of his building at Abbotsford, he must have contemplated the utmost sum it could cost him as a mere trifle in relation to the resources at his command. He must have reckoned on clearing L.30,000 at least in the course of a couple of years by the novels written within such a period. The publisher of his Tales, who best knew how they were produced, and what they brought of gross profit, and who must have had the strongest interest in keeping the author's name untarnished by any risk or reputation of failure, would willingly, as we have seen, have given him L.6000 more within a space of two years for works of a less serious sort, likely to be despatched at leisure hours, without at all interfering with the main manufacture. But alas! even this was not all. Messrs. Constable had such faith in the prospective fertility of his imagination, that they were by this time quite ready to sign bargains and grant bills for novels and romances to be produced hereafter, but of which the subjects and the names were alike unknown to them and to the man from whose pen they were to proceed.¹ A forgotten satirist well says:—

"The active principle within Works on some brains the effect of gin ;"

¹ Mr. Cadell says:— "This device for raising the wind was the only real legacy left by John Ballantyne to his generous friend; it was invented to make up for the bad book stock of the Hanover Street concern, which supplied so much good money for the passing hour."

but in Sir Walter's case, every external influence combined to stir the flame, and swell the intoxication of restless exuberant energy. His allies knew indeed, what he did not, that the sale of his novels was rather less than it had been in the days of Ivanhoe; and hints had sometimes been dropped to him that it might be well to try the effect of a pause. But he always thought — and James Ballantyne had decidedly the same opinion — that his best things were those which he threw off the most easily and swiftly; and it was no wonder that his booksellers, seeing how numerously even his worst excelled in popularity, as in merit, any other person's best, should have shrunk from the experiment of a decrease of output. On the contrary, they might be evened up from time to time flattering themselves, that if the books sold at less rate, this might be counterpoised by still greater rapidity of production. They could not make up their minds to cast the precious vessel adrift; and, in short, after every little whisper of prudential misgiving, echoed the unflinching burden of Ballantyne's song — to push on, hoisting more and more sail as the wind lulled.

He was as eager to do as they could be to suggest — and this I well knew at the time. I had, however, no notion, until all his correspondence lay before me, of the extent to which he had permitted himself thus early to build on the chances of life, health, and continued popularity. Before The Fortunes of Nigel issued from the press, Scott had exchanged instruments, and received his booksellers' bills, for no less than four "works of fiction" — not one of them otherwise described in the deeds of agreement — to be produced in unbroken succession, each of them to fill at least three volumes, but with proper saving clauses as to increase of copy money in case any of them should run to four. And within two years all this anticipation had been wiped off by Feveril of the Peak, Quentin Durward, St. Roman's Well, and Redgauntlet; and the new castle was by that time complete. But by that time the end also was approaching!

The splendid Romance of The Pirate was published in the beginning of December 1821; and the wild freshness of its atmosphere, the beautiful contrast of Minna and Brenda, and the exquisitely drawn character of Captain Cleveland, found the reception which they deserved. The work was analysed second of a series of articles in that Journal, conceived and executed in a tone widely different from those given to Waverley, Guy Mannering, and The Antiquary. I fancy Mr. Gifford had become convinced that he had made a grievous mistake in this matter, before he acquiesced in Scott's proposal about "quartering the child" in January 1816; and if he was fortunate in finding a contributor able and willing to treat the rest of Father Jedediah's progeny with excellent skill, and in a spirit more accordant with the just and general sentiments of the public, we must also recognise a pleasing and honourable trait of character in the frankness with which the recluse and often despotic editor now delegated the pen to Mr. Senior.

On the 13th December, Sir Walter received a copy of Cain, as yet unpublished, from Lord Byron's bookseller, who had been instructed to ask whether he had any objection to having the "Mystery" dedicated to him. He says, in answer to Mr. Murray,—"I accept with feelings of great obligation the flattering proposal of Lord Byron to prefix my name to the very grand and tremendous drama of Cain. Some part of the language is bold, and may shock one class of readers, whose tone will be adopted by others out of affectation or envy. But then they must condemn the Paradise Lost, if they have a mind to be consistent. The fiend-like reasoning and bold blasphemy of the fiend and of his pupil lead exactly to the point which was to be expected—the commission of the first murder, and the ruin and despair of the perpetrator." Such was Scott's opinion of the drama which, when pirated, Lord Eldon refused to protect. It may be doubted if the great Chancellor had ever read Paradise Lost.

Whoever reads Scott's letters to Terry might naturally suppose that during this winter his thoughts were almost exclusively occupied with the rising edifice on Tweedside. The pains he takes about every trifle of arrangement, exterior and interior, is truly most remarkable; it is not probable that many idle lords or lairds ever look half so much about such matters. But his literary industry was all the while unresting. His Nigel was completed by April 1822. He had edited Lord Fountainhall's Chronological Notes, and several other antiquarian publications. Nor had he neglected a promise of the summer before to supply Miss Baillie with a contribution for a volume of miscellaneous verse, which she had undertaken to compile for the benefit of a friend in distress. With that view he now produced—and that, as I well remember, in the course of two rainy mornings at Abbotsford—the dramatic

he had given it an extent quite incompatible with his friend's arrangements for her charitable picnic. He therefore cast about for another subject likely to be embraced in smaller compass; and the Blair Adam meeting of the next June supplied him with one in Macduff's Cross. Meantime, on hearing a whisper about Halidon Hill, Constable's junior partner, without seeing the MS., forthwith tendered £1,000 for the copyright. The same sum that had appeared almost irrationally munificent, when offered in 1807 for the embryo Marmion. It was accepted, and a letter about to be quoted will shew how well the head of the firm was pleased with this wild bargain.

The Nigel was published on the 30th of May 1822; and was, I need not say, hailed as ranking in the first class of Scott's romances. Indeed, as a historical portraiture, his of James I. stands forth pre-eminent, and almost alone, nor, perhaps, in reperusing these novels deliberately as a series, does any one of them leave so complete an impression, as the picture of an age. It is, in fact, the best commentary on the old English drama — hardly a single picturesque point of manners touched by Ben Jonson and his contemporaries but has been dovetailed into this story, and all so easily and naturally, as to form the most striking contrast to the historical romances of authors who ex tra, as the schoolboys phrase it, and then set to work oppressed and bewildered with their crude and undigested burden.

On the day after the publication, Constable, then near London, wrote thus to the author: "I was in town yesterday, and so keenly were the people devouring my friend Jingling Geordie, that I actually saw them reading it in the streets as they passed along. I assure you there is no exaggeration in this. A new novel from the Author of Waverley puts aside — in other words, puts down for the time — every other literary performance. The smack Ocean, by which the new work was shipped, arrived at the wharf on Sunday; the bales were got out by one on Monday morning, and before half past ten o'clock 7000 copies had been dispersed! I was truly happy to hear of Halidon Hill, and of the satisfactory arrangements made for its publication. I wish I had the power of prevailing with you to give us a similar production every three months; and that our ancient enemies on this side the Border might not have too much their own way, perhaps your next dramatic sketch might be Bannockburn. It would be presumptuous in me to point out subjects [had he quite forgotten the Lord of the Isles?] but you know my craving to be great, and I cannot resist mentioning here that I should like to see a battle of Hastings—a Cressy—a Bosworth field—and many more.”

—The Nigel was just launched—Constable knew that Peveril of the Peak was already on the stocks: yet see how quietly he suggests that a little pinnace of the Halidon class might easily be rigged out once a quarter by way of diversion, and thus add another £ 1000 per annum to the £ 10,000 or £ 15,000, on which all parties counted as the sure yearly profit of the three deckers in fore! But Constable, during that residence in England, was in the habit of writing every week or two to Sir Walter, and his letters are all of the same complexion. The ardent bookseller’s brain seems to have been well-nigh unsettled; and I have often thought that the foxglove which he then swallowed (his complaint being a threatening of water in the chest) might have had a share in the extravagant excitement of his mind. Occasionally, however, he enters on details, as to which, or at least as to Sir Walter’s share in them, there could not have been any mistake; and these were, it must be owned, of a nature well calculated to nourish and sustain in the author’s fancy a degree of almost mad exhilaration, near akin to his publisher’s own predominant mood. In a letter of the ensuing month, for example, after returning to the progress of Peveril of the Peak, under 10,000 copies of which (or nearly that number) Ballantyne’s presses were now groaning, and glancing gaily to the prospect of their being kept regularly employed to the same extent until three other novels, as yet unchristened, had followed Peveril, he adds a summary of what was then, had just been, or was about to be, the amount of occupation furnished to the same office by reprints of older works of the same pen;—“a summary,” he exclaims, “to which I venture to say there will be no rival in our day!” And well might Constable say so; for the result is, that James Ballantyne and Co. had just executed, or were on the eve of executing, by his order—

“ A new edition of Sir W. Scott’s Poetical Works, in 10 vols. (miniature)	5000 copies.
Novels and Tales, 12 vols. ditto,	5000 —
Historical Romances, 6 vols. ditto,	5000 —
Poetry from Waverley , &c. 1 vol. 12mo.	5000 —
Paper required,	7772 reams.
Volumes produced from Ballantyne’s press,	145,000 !”

To which we may safely add from 20,000 to 40,000 more as the immediate produce of the author's labours within the space of twelve months. The scale of operations was, without question, enough to turn any wits; Constable's, in his soberest hours, was as a head piece as ever sat on the shoulders of a giant; ambition, in truth, had been moving per se, of these last stirring and firming years, with poet. He, too, as I ought to have mentioned before, like a true Scotchman, concentrated his dreams of bequeathing to his heir the name and identity acres; he, too, had considerably before this time landed estate in his native county of Fife, he, not, had, while Abbotstord was rising, his own petto; and alas! for "Archibald Constable of Fife" and his overweening intoxication of worldly success had already begun to prepare a stern rebuke.

I must pass on to a different excitement — that visit to his northern dominions in the autumn of 1745 — this time no Prince of the House of Hanover yet have touched the soil of Scotland, except one, who ever been held there in universal detestation — the conqueror of Culloden. — "the butcher Cumberland" — the very last dream of Jacobitism had expired with the fall of York, there could be little doubt that all Tories, of whatever shade of sentiment, would greet their lawful Sovereign a greeting of warm and devoted affection; but the feelings of the Liberals towards George I. had been unfavourably tinged, in consequence of the incidents in his history — above all — (speaking of the population addicted to that political creed) — the sessions and scandals which had terminated, as yesterday, in the trial of his Queen. — On the whole, the opinion of cool observers, a very doubtful one, which the new, but not young, king had resolved to follow, he had been moved to do so in a very great measure, directly and indirectly, by Scott, there can be no doubt. I believe it will be granted by all who recall the events which they occurred, that his Majesty mainly owed to Scott the influence, authority, and zeal, the more than fulfilment of the highest hopes he could have indulged in of this progress.

Whether all the arrangements which Sir Walter enforced, were conceived in the most accurate taste

ent question. It appeared to be very generally thought, when the first programmes were issued, that kilts and bagpipes were to occupy a great deal too much space. With all respect for the generous qualities which the Highland clans have often exhibited, it was difficult to forget that they had always constituted a small, and almost always an unimportant part of the Scottish population; and when one reflected how miserably their numbers had of late years been reduced in consequence of the selfish and hard hearted policy of their landlords, it almost seemed as if there was a cruel mockery in giving so much prominence to their pretensions. But there could be no question that they were picturesque — and their enthusiasm was too sincere not to be catching; so that by and by even the coolest-headed Sassenach felt his heart, like John of Argyle's, "warm to the tartan;" and high and low were in the humour, not only to applaud, but each, according to his station, to take a share in what might really be described as a sort of grand terrification of the Holyrood chapters in Waverley; — George IV., anno ætatis 60, being well contented to enact Prince Charlie, with the Great Unknown himself for his Baron Bradwardine, "ad exuenda vel detrahenda caligas domini regis post battalliam."

But Sir Walter had as many parts to play as ever tasked the Protean genius of his friend Mathews; and he played them all with as much cordial energy as animated the exertions of any Henchman or Piper in the company. His severest duties, however, were those of stage-manager, and under these I sincerely believe any other human being's temper would very soon have given way. The magistrates, bewildered with the rush of novelty, threw themselves on him for advice about the merest trifles; and he had to arrange everything, from the order of a procession to the embroidering of a cross. Ere the green-room in Castle Street had dismissed provosts and bailies, it was sure to be besieged by swelling chieftains, who could not agree on the relative positions their clans had occupied at Bannockburn, which they considered as constituting the authentic precedent for determining their own places, each at the head of his little theatrical tail, in the line of the King's escort between the Pier of Leith and the Canongate. It required all Scott's unwearied good humour, and imperturbable power of face, to hear in becoming gravity the sputtering controversies of such fiery rivals, each regarding himself as a true potentate, the representative of princes as ancient as Bourbon; and no man could have coaxed them into decent co-operation, except him whom all the Highlanders, from the haughtiest MacIvor to the slyest Callum Beg, agreed in looking up to us the great restorer of their traditional glories. He had, however, in delicate part of his administration, an admiral one who had also, by the direction of his literary acquirements, no mean share of authority among the G. David Stewart of Garth, the historian of the Himents. On Garth remained all over with the and Spain devolved the Toy Captainship of the already alluded to as an association of young es astic for the promotion of the philology, and conducted that motley array in such style, that perhaps, the most splendid feature in the whole panorama. But he, too, had a potential voice in of rival chieftains, and with the able backing of veteran, Scott succeeded finally in assuaging and reducing their conflicting pretensions to to at least, and compromise. A ballad (now in works), wherein these magnates were most adre was understood to have had a considerable share in this peace-making; but the constant hospital was a not less efficient organ of influence.

About noon of the 14th of August, the royal attendant vessels of war cast anchor in the Ro but although Scott's ballad prologue had entreated "warstle for a sunny day," the weather was so that it was found necessary to defer the land 15th. In the midst of the rain, however, Sir off to the Royal George; and, says the newspaper — "When his arrival alongside the yacht was the King. — 'What!' exclaimed his Majesty, 'Sir The man in Scotland I most wish to see! Let hi When he stepped on the quarter-deck, his Maje a bottle of Highland whisky, and having drun desired a glass to be filled for him. Sir Walter, his bumper, made a request that the King wou to bestow on him the glass out of which his Ma drunk his health; and this being granted, the was immediately wrapped up and carefully dep he conceived to be the safest part of his dress. with it to Castle Street; but — to say nothing at midst of these tumultuous preparations for the royal advent. Notwithstanding all such impediments, he found his quarters ready for him, and Scott entering, wet and hurried, embraced the venerable man with brotherly affection. The royal gift was forgotten—the ample skirt of the coat within which it had been packed, and which he had hitherto held cautiously in front of his person, slipped back to its more usual position—he sat down beside Crabbe, and the glass was crushed to atoms. His scream and gesture made his wife conclude that he had sat down on a pair of scissors or the like: but very little harm had been done except the breaking of the glass, of which alone he had been thinking. This was a damage not to be repaired: as for the scratch that accompanied it, its scar was of no great consequence, as even when mounting the “cat-dath, or battle garment” of the Celtic Club, he adhered, like his hero Waverley, to the trews.

By six o'clock next morning, Sir Walter, arrayed in the Garb of old Gaul (which he had of the Campbell tartan, in memory of one of his great-grandmothers), was attending a muster of these gallant Celts in the Queen-Street Gardens, where he had the honour of presenting them with a set of colours, and delivered a suitable exhortation, crowned with their rapturous applause. Some members of the Club, all of course in their full costume, were invited to breakfast with him. He had previously retired for a little to his library, and when he entered the parlour, Mr. Crabbe, dressed in the highest style of professional neatness and decorum, with buckles in his shoes, and whatever was then considered as befitting an English clergyman of his years and station, was standing in the midst of half-a-dozen stalwart Highlanders, exchanging elaborate civilities with them in what was at least meant to be French. He had come into the room shortly before, without having been warned about such company, and hearing the party conversing together in an unknown tongue, the polite old man had adopted, in his first salutation, what he considered as the universal language. Some of the Celts, on their part, took him for some foreign abbé or bishop, and were doing their best to explain to him that they were not the wild savages for which, from the startled glance he had thrown on their hirsute proportions, there seemed but too much reason to suspect he had taken them; others, more perspicacious, gave in to the thing for the joke's sake; and there was high fun when Scott dissolved the charm of their stammering, by grasping Crabbe with one hand, and the nearest of these figures with the other, and greeted the whole with the same hearty good morning.

Perhaps no Englishman of these recent days could visit Scotland with a scantier stock of information as to the country and the people than judging from all the more expressively looked, this illustrious poet with him in August 1822. It seemed as if he for one moment conceived that the same island peaceful parsonage stood, contained actually a number of lords and gentlemen too, owning no affinity with him in blood or in speech, and still proud in wear and opportunity served, a national dream of their considerably more resemblance to an American than to that of an old-fashioned divine from the V. But the aspect of the city on the 15th was a different one: its inhabitants, as it would have been even to the Londoners, were every height and precipice occupied by a regular army, or by detachments of those more irregulars from beyond the Grampians — lines and artillery, circling Arthur's Seat, Salisbury Crag, Calton Hill — and the old black Castle and its towers were in the smoke of repeated salvos, while a huge flag, such as had not waved there since 1746, floated over all: — every street, square, garden, or open space was paved with solid masses of silent expectants where glittering lines of helmets marked the way for the approaching procession. All captiousness and criticism sunk into nothing before the grandeur of the occasion and it was the same, or nearly so, on every day when the King chose to take part in the annual. I forget where Sir Walter's place was but on one or other of these occasions I remember him in an open carriage, in the Highland dress, armed and dressed as heroically as Garth himself (who accompanied him) and evidently in a most hardish state of excitement. An honest Peter Mathieson managed as best he might, and of a fierier sort than he had usually in his keep perhaps, after all, he might be less puzzled with the cocked-hat and regular London John Bull which he, for the first and last time, displayed in royal fortnight."

It is, I believe, of the dinner of this 15th August at 10, Strand that Crabbe penned the following brief Journal: — "Whilst it is fresh in my memory scribe the day which I have just passed, but I do not believe an accurate description to be possible. What avails it to say, for instance, that there met at the sumptuous dinner, in all the costume of the Highlanders, the great chief himself, and officers of his company. This expresses not the singularity of appearance and manners—the peculiarities of men all gentlemen, but remote from our society—leaders of clans—joyous company. Then we had Sir Walter Scott's national songs and ballads, exhibiting all the feelings of clanship. I thought it an honour that Glengarry even took notice of me, for there were those, and gentlemen too, who considered themselves honoured by following in his train. There were also Lord Errol, and the Macleod, and the Fraser, and the Gordon, and the Fergusson; and I conversed at dinner with Lady Glengarry, and did almost believe myself a harper, or bard, rather for harp I cannot strike; and Sir Walter was the life and soul of the whole. It was a splendid festivity, and I felt I know not how much younger."

In the glittering and tumultuous assemblages of that season, the elder bard was (to use one of his friend's favourite similitudes) very like a cow in a friend's lair; and though Scott could never have been seen in colours more likely to excite admiration, Crabbe had hardly any opportunity of observing him in the everyday loveliness of his converse. Sir Walter's enthusiastic excitement about the kilts and the processions seemed at first utterly incomprehensible to him; but by degrees he perceived and appreciated the dexterous management of prejudices and pretensions. He exclaims, in his Journal,—"What a keen discriminating man is my friend!" But I shall ever regret that Crabbe did not see him at Abbotsford among his books, his trees, his own good simple peasants. They had, I believe, but one quiet walk together, and it was to the ruins of St. Anthony's Chapel and Muschat's Cairn, which the deep impression made on Crabbe by the Heart of Mid-Lothian had given him an earnest wish to see. I accompanied them; and the hour so spent, in the course of which the fine old man gave us some most touching anecdotes of his early struggles, was a truly delightful contrast to the bustle and worry of miscellaneous society which consumed so many of his few hours in Scotland.

The King took up his residence at Dalkeith Palace; and here his dinner party almost daily included Sir Walter, who, however, appeared to have derived more deep-felt gratification from his Majesty's kind and paternal attention to his juvenile host (the Duke of Buccleuch was at that time of teenth years), than from all the flattering compliments on himself. From Dalkeith the King repaired house two or three times, for the purpose of a ing-room. One Sunday he attended divine at Cathedral of St. Giles', when the decorum an-served by the multitudes in the streets, struck a remarkable contrast to the rapturous exultation on week days; and the scene was not less the eyes of Crabbe, who says in his Journal, of Edinburgh on the Sunday is in itself devout."

There is in the armoury at Abbotsford a sword by Charles I. to the great Marquis of Montrose.
Henry's arms and cypher on one side of the blade on the other. One day the late Duke of Mont-to sit next to Sir Walter, and complimented his ous muster of Border Yeomanry which Pontolow exhibited that morning. "Indeed," said Scott, "I a man left to guard our homesteads." "I've a quoth the Duke, "to send a detachment of my ford to make prize of my ancestor's sword." "I says Sir Walter, drily, "is very welcome to tr near Philiphaugh yonder."

Another very splendid day was that of a pro-Holyrood to the Castle, whereof the whole cereobviously been arranged under Scott's auspices.
pose of culling up, as exactly as might be, the observance of "the Riding of the Parliament" (then Secretary of State for the Home Departmenous of witnessing this procession privately, made place in it, and he walked up the High Street company with Scott, some time before the royal to get into motion. The Poet was as little drawing notice as the Secretary, but he was soon rec-his companion, when revisiting Scotland, after fourteen years, expressed his lively remembrance sinistic veneration with which Scott's person was by all classes of his countrymen. In proposing memory at a public dinner given to him in Glasg-ber 1836, Sir Robert Peel said, "I had the hon-panying his late Majesty as his Secretary of Spaid a visit to Edinburgh. I suppose there are here who were present on that occasion, at the scene, when the days of ancient chivalry were re-every man's friendship seemed to be confirmed — when men met for the first time, who had always looked to each other with distrust, and resolved in the presence of their Sovereign to forget their hereditary feuds and animosities. In the beautiful language of Dryden —

‘Men met each other with erected look —
The steps were higher that they took ;
Friends to congratulate their friends would haste,
And long inveterate foes saluted as they pass'd.’

Sir Walter Scott took an active lead in these ceremonies. On the day on which his Majesty was to pass from Holyroodhouse, he proposed to me to accompany him up the High Street, to see whether the arrangements were completed. I said to him — ‘You are trying a dangerous experiment — you will never get through in privacy.’ He said, ‘They are entirely absorbed in loyalty.’ But I was the better prophet: he was recognised from the one extremity of the street to the other, and never did I see such an instance of national devotion expressed.”

The King at his first levee diverted many, and delighted Scott, by appearing in the full Highland garb, — the same brilliant Stuart Tartans, so called, in which certainly no Stuart, except Prince Charles, had ever presented himself in the saloons of Holyrood. His Majesty's Celtic toilette had been carefully watched and assisted by the gallant Laird of Garth, who was not a little proud of the result of his dexterous manipulations of the royal plaid, and pronounced the King “a vera pretty man.” And he did look a most stately and imposing person in that beautiful dress — but his satisfaction therein was cruelly disturbed, when he discovered, towering and blazing among and above the genuine Glengarries and Macleods and MacGregors, a figure even more portly than his own, equipped, from a sudden impulse of loyal ardour, in an equally complete set of the self-same conspicuous Stuart tartans: —

“He caught Sir William Curtis in a kilt —
While throug'd the chiefs of every Highland clan
To hail their brother, Vich Ian Alderman.”¹

In truth, this portentous apparition cast an air of ridicule and caricature over the whole of Sir Walter's Celtified pagantry. A sharp little bailie from Aberdeen, who had previously made acquaintance with the worthy Garth and tasted the birth soup of his voluptuous. As he smiled down the long gallery of Holywell that, after all, his costume was not quite William, who had been ranged out, as the ancient fictions say, "regardless of expense," exclaimed he mistaken? begged he would explain his critic he spoke, threw a glance of admiration on a skew knife, which, like a true "warrior and hunter" were stuck into one of his garters. "Oho! 's the Aberdorman; 'the knife's a' right, mon, but speed?" "where's your spoon?" Such was Scott but whether he "gave it a cocked hat and with the hope of restoring the King's good humour, shaken by this heterical dogged gander, it is not yet to inquire.

¹ Byron's Age of Bronze.

As in Hamlet, there was to be a play within the by his Majesty's desire, William Murray's company in his presence the drama of Rob Roy. The was enchanted with the King's hearty laughter at B. jokes; - but I particularly remember his Majesty Muttie's "name o' your Lauman tricks."

On the 24th the Magistrates entertained their Sir a banquet in the Parliament House; and Sir Wall invited to preside over one of the tables. - But the ing homage (though apparently an unconscious genius received during this festive period, was, when after proposing the health of the Magistrates, there was one toast more, and but one, in which quest the assembly to join him, - "I shall simply said he, "The Chieftains and Clans of Scotland perity to the Land of Cakes." So completely has imitation taken possession, that nobody seems to startled at the time by language which thus conveyed his Majesty's impression that the marking a glory of Scotland consisted in the Highland chieftains.

Scott's early associations, and the prime labours of his life, had been so deeply connected with the that it was no wonder he should have taught him on their clans and chiefs with almost as much respect as if he had had more than a scintilla of in his veins. - But it was necessary to be an eye-w royal visit, in order to comprehend the extent to v allowed his imagination to get the mastery over him as to all these matters; and perhaps it was necessary to understand him thoroughly on such points, in his personal relations, feelings, and demeanour, before one could follow his genius to advantage in some of his most favoured and delightful walks of exertion. The strongest impression, however, which the whole affair left on my mind was, that I had never till then formed any just notion of his capacity for practical dealing and rule among men. I do not think he had much in common with the statesmen and diplomatists of his own age and country; but I am mistaken if Scott could not have played in other days either the Cæsar or the Gondomar; and I believe no man, after long and intimate knowledge of any other great poet, has ever ventured to say that he could have conceived the possibility of any such parts being adequately filled on the active stage of the world, by a person in whom the powers of fancy and imagination had such predominant sway as to make him in fact live three or four lives habitually in place of one. I have known other literary men of energy perhaps as restless as his; but all such have been entitled to the designation of busy bodies—busy almost exclusively about trifles, and, above all, supremely and constantly conscious of their own remarkable activity, and rejoicing and glorying in it. Whereas Scott, neither in literary labour nor in continual contact with the affairs of the world, ever did seem aware that he was making any very extraordinary exertion. The machine, thus gigantic in its impetus, moved so easily that the master had no perception of the obstructions it overcame—in fact, no measure for its power. Compared to him, all the rest of the poet species that I have chanced to observe nearly— with but one glorious exception— have seemed to me to do little more than sleep through their lives— and at best to fill the sum with dreams; and I am persuaded that, taking all ages and countries together, the rare examples of indefatigable energy, in union with serene self-possession of mind and character, such as Scott's, must be sought for in the roll of great sovereigns or great captains, rather than in that of literary genius.

In the case of such renowned practical masters, it has been usual to account for their apparent calmness amidst the stirring troubles of the world, by imputing to them callousness of the affections. Perhaps injustice has been done by the supposition; but, at all events, hardly could any one extend it to the case of the placid man of the imaginative order;—a great depicter of man and nature, especially, would seem to by, ex vi termini, a profound sympathiser with all his brethren, with the weaknesses as well as with all of humanity. Such assuredly was Scott. His "wounded with life" (to use a phrase of Ben Jonson); and I never saw him tried in a tenderer way than during the full whirl of splendour and gaiety to make every brain but his dizzy in the Edinburgh 1822.

Few things had ever given him so much pleasure as Erskine's promotion to the Bench. It seemed to his dearest friend to content and cheerfulness, have doubled his own sources of enjoyment. His constitution had been shaken before he attained it, and the anxious delicacy of his conscience rendered it oppressive and overwhelming. In a feeble state, with a sensitive mind stretched and strained, a set about by some envious gossip, was sufficient to chase him out of life. On his return to Edinburgh 20th of July, Scott found him in visible danger; every friendship could do to comfort and stimulate all was in vain. Lord Kinnesdier survived but a few half-a-year—and who that observed Scott's publishing the three or four weeks I have been describing suspected that he was daily and nightly the watch-bed, or the consider of cuplains; straying all the

"True earnest sorrows, rooted miseries, Anguish in gain, vexations ripe and blown?"

I am not aware that I ever saw him in such a state as he was when I accompanied him and his friend Thomson from Edinburgh to Queensferry, in attending Lord Kinnesdier's funeral. Yet that was one of the days of the royal festival, and he had to plume himself on a scene of high gaiety the moment after he returned. He halted in Castle Street, Mr. Crabbe's maid, the appeared at the window, and Scott said, on being asked what he was doing there, "Now for what our old friend there puts down the curse of his poor player in the Borough —"

"To hide in rant the heart-ache of the night."

any one who has never lived much among my good country-people, to comprehend that an idle story of a love intrigue, a story alike base and baseless, should be the death of an innocent man of high character, high station, and well advanced in years. It struck into poor Erskine's heart and soul, however, quite as cruelly as any similar calumny ever affected a modest woman. He withered and sunk. There is no need that I should say peace be with him! If ever a pure spirit quitted this vale of tears, it was William Erskine's. I must turn to and see what can be done about getting some pension for his daughters."

The King's stay in Scotland was protracted until the 29th of August. He then embarked from the Earl of Hopetoun's magnificent seat on the Firth of Forth, and Sir Walter had the gratification of seeing his Majesty, in the moment of departure, confer the honour of knighthood on two of his friends both of whom, I believe, owed some obligation in this matter to his good offices—namely, Captain Adam Fergusson, deputy keeper of the Regalia, and Henry Raeburn, R.A., properly selected as the representative of the fine arts in Scotland. This amiable man and excellent artist, however, did not long survive the receipt of his title. Sir Henry died on the 8th of July 1823—the last work of his pencil having been a portrait of Scott for Lord Montagu.

On the eve of the King's departure he received a letter from Mr. Peel, saying: "The King has commanded me to acquaint you that he cannot bid adieu to Scotland without conveying to you individually his warm personal acknowledgments. His Majesty well knows how many difficulties have been smoothed, and how much has been effected by your unremitting activity, by your knowledge of your countrymen, and by the just estimation in which they hold you. The King wishes to make you the channel of conveying to the Highland chiefs and their followers, who have given to the varied scene which we have witnessed so peculiar and romantic a character, his particular thanks for their attendance, and his warm approbation of their uniform deportment."

Though Mr. Crabbe found it necessary to leave Scotland without seeing Abbotsford, this was not the case with many less celebrated friends from the south, who had flocked to the Royal Festival. Sir Walter's house was, in his own phrase, "like a cried fair," during several weeks after the King's departure; and as his masons were then in the highest activity, the tumult within doors and without was really perplexing.

scenes had thrown him into a fever, and, I believe, lucky that an eruption took place, which compelled him to keep his chamber for some days.

Not was an unusual influx of English pilgrims, legacy of "the glorious days" of August. A considerable number of persons who had borne a part in the restoration, that their exertions had entitled them to some sort of approbation, and just after post brought deep these enthusiasts, to him who was supposed to be a matter of this description, the result of a great deal of honour. To how many of these applications more than a civil answer I cannot tell, but the Duke was too good a Jacobite not to grant favourable to his request that one or two half-pay officers distinguished themselves in the van of the Celts, employed in Highland regiments, and so reinvigorate untheatrical "Garb of old Gaul." Sir Walter had a notion of his own. This related to a certain gigantic ordnance, celebrated in the history of the Scottish under the title of Mons Meg, which had been removed from Edinburgh Castle to the Tower in 1746. When George the King, after he had displayed his person on the walls of the old fortress, he lamented the absence of Meg that occasion in language which his Majesty could not have uttered. There ensued a correspondence with the official proprietress of Meg among others, with the Duke of Wellington, Master General of the Ordnance, and though she deferred her restoration, it was never lost sight of in place when the Duke was Prime Minister, in 1828.

A more serious petition was a written one in which Sir Walter expressed feelings in which I believe every countryman were disposed to concur with him, certainly none more so than George IV himself. It was for the restoration of the peerages forfeited in consequence of the insurrections of 1715 and 1746; and the honours, in whose favour this liberal measure was soon adopted, appear to have vied with each other in the expression of their gratefulness for his exertions on their behalf.

Early in October, he had another attack of illness, which he attributed to Terry, in a letter full of details about milk-banquet cabinets, and so forth: -- "I have not been very well since, on account of a whoremson thickness of blood, and a depression of spirits, arising from the loss of friends, have annoyed me

Peveril will, I fear, smell of the apoplexy. I propose a good rally, however, and hope it will be a powerful effect. My idea is, entre nous, a Scotch archer in the French king's guard, tempore Louis XI., the most picturesque of all times." This is the first allusion to Quentin Durward and also the species of malady that ultimately proved fatal to Sir Walter Scott. He never mentioned to his family the symptoms which he here speaks of; but long before any serious apoplectic seizure occurred, it had been suspected by myself, and by others of his friends, that he had sustained slight attacks of that nature, and concealed them. The depression of spirits could not, however, have hung over him long. Peveril was completed, and some progress had also been achieved with Quentin Durward, before the year reached its close. Nor had he ceased to contemplate future labour with firmness and hopefulness. He, in October, received Constable's balls for another unnamed "work of fiction;" and this was the last such work in which the great bookseller was destined to have any concern. The engagement was in fact that redeemed three years afterwards by Woodstock.

Peveril of the Peak appeared in January 1823. Its reception was somewhat colder than that of its three immediate predecessors. The rapidity of the Novelist's execution was put to a severe trial, from his adoption of so wide a canvas as was presented by a period of twenty busy years, and filled by so large and multifarious an assemblage of persons, not a few of them, as it were, struggling for prominence. Finella was an unfortunate conception; what is good in it is not original, and the rest absurd and incredible. Even worse was that condescension to the practice of vulgar romances, in his treatment of the trial scenes — scenes usually the very citadels of his strength — which outraged every feeling of probability with those who had studied the terrible tragedies of the Popish Plot, in the authentic records of, perhaps, the most disgraceful epoch in our history. The story is clumsy and perplexed; the catastrophe (another signal exception to his rules) foreseen from the beginning, and yet most inartificially brought about. All this is true; and yet might not criticisms of the same sort be applied to half the masterpieces of Shakspeare? And did any dramatist — to say nothing of any other novelist — ever produce, in spite of all the surrounding bewilderment of the fable, characters more powerfully conceived, or, on the whole, more happily portrayed, than those (I name but a few) of Christian, Bridgenorth, Buckingham, and Chiffinch? — sketches more vivid than those of young Derby, Cole and the keeper of Newgate."

Among the lounging barristers of the Golden Age days, Sir Walter, in the intervals of his duty, came forth and mingled much in the style of his Mountain. Indeed the pleasure he seemed to take in society of his professional juniors, was one of the most, and certainly not the least agreeable features of him at this period of his consummate honour and celebrity should rather have said, perhaps, of young people male or female, law or lay, gentle or simple. I saw it was near of kin to another feature in him, his bright light. It was always, I suspect, against the him, when he did not even work at his desk with the upon him. However, one morning soon after I got out, one of our most famous wags (now famous things,) namely, Patrick Robertson,¹ commonly called endearing Scottish diminutive "Peter," observed the old white head advancing above the crowd toward a place, where the usual roar of fun was going on, briefless, and said, "Hush, boys, here comes old I see the Peak." A laugh ensued, and the Great One he withdrew from the circle after a few minutes' sisted that I should tell him what our joke upon had been. When enlightened, being by that time across the "babbling hall" towards his own D looked round with a sly grin, and said, between "Ay, ay, my man, as weel Peveril o' the Peak o' Peter o' the Panch" (punch) — which, being from the brethren of the stare school, of course delighted except their portly Coryphæus. But Peter's application to his dying day, Scott was in the Outer House Pe Peak, or Old Peveril — and, by and by, like a good he took to the designation kindly. He was well in his own family and younger friends constantly talk under this sobriquet. Many a little note have I had (and so probably has Peter also), reproving, or perhaps aging, Tory mischief, and signed, "Thane, Peveril."

It was, perhaps, some inward misgiving towards the tion of Peveril, that determined Scott to break new his next novel; and as he had before awakened a f est by venturing on English scenery and history, try the still bolder experiment of a continental excursion. However this may have been, he was encouraged and strengthened by the return of his friend Skene, about this time, from a tour in France; in the course of which he had kept an accurate and lively journal, and executed a vast variety of clever drawings, representing landscapes and ancient buildings, such as would have been most sure to interest Scott had he been the companion of his wanderings. Mr. Skene's MS. collections were placed at his disposal, and he took from one of their chapters the substance of the original Introduction to Quentin Durward. Yet still his difficulties in this new undertaking were frequent, and of a sort to which he had hitherto been a stranger. I remember observing him many times in the Advocates' Library poring over maps and gazetteers with care and anxiety.

¹ Mr. R. became Dean of the Faculty of Advocates in 1842, by the style of Lord Robertson in 1843. His first (and successful) appearance as a Poet was in 1847.

He was much amused with a mark of French admiration which reached him (opportunately enough) in February — one of the few such that his works seem to have brought him prior to the publication of Quentin Durward. He says to Constable, — “A funny Frenchman wants me to accept some champaign for a set of my works. I have written in answer that as my works cost me nothing I could not think of putting a value on them, but that I should apply to you. Send him a set of my children and god children (poems and novels), and — if he found, on seeing them, that they were worth a dozen flasks of champaign, he might address the case,” &c.

A compliment not less flattering was paid within a few weeks after the appearance of Peveril. In the epistle introductory of that novel, Clutterbuck amuses Dryasdust with an account of a recent visit from their common parent “the Author of Waverley,” whose outward man, as it was in those days, is humorously caricatured, with a suggestion that he had probably sat to Geoffrey Crayon for his “Stout Gentleman of No. 11.,” and who is made to apologise for the heartiness with which he pays his duty to the viands set before him, by alleging that he is in training for the anniversary of the Roxburghe Club: — “He was preparing himself” (said the gracious and portly Édolon) “to hobnob with the lords of the literary treasures of Althorpe and Hodnet in Madeira negus, brewed by the classical Dibdin.” This drollery in fact alluded, not to the Roxburghe, but to an institution of the same class which was just at this time springing into life in Edinburgh — the Bannatyne Club, of which Scott was the founder and first president. The heroes of the Roxburghe, however, were not to penetrate the mysteriousness of Captain Clatterbuck's report, then joined and erudite board, when they next surrounded a "generous flask of Burgundy, each flanked uncut tobacco." Their Secretary, Dr. Delain, wrote saying:—"The death of Sir M. Sykes leaving no vacancy in our Club, I am desired to request that you have the goodness to make that fact known to the A. Waverley, who, from the Prothome to Parvum or id seems disposed to become one of the members; there am further desired to express the wishes of the Club that the said A. Waverley may succeed to the said B. Sir Walter answered, that he would find means to convey a message to the "Author of Waverley," adding:—"A personal appearance in the fraternity is not like to be an event, the table of the Roxburghs, like that of King will have a vacant chair. But if this author, who 'seed and walketh invisible,' should not appear to before I come to London, with permission of the Club have something of adventure in me, although a knight Sir Andrew Agurchook, 'dubbed with unbacked reason on carpet consideration,' would, rather than lose the of a dinner with the Roxburghs Club, take upon me the ure of the nieps peribons, and reap some amends for p scandale into which the invisible champion has drawn being his beum tenens on so distinguished an occasion. Club gladly accepted this offer; and Scott writes again Secretary:—"Mad Tom tells us, that 'the Prince of is a gentleman;' and this mysterious personage will partake as much of his honourable feelings as his mind, retaining his incognito, permit me to enjoy, in an honour which I value more than I do that which bestowed on me by the credit of having written a novels."—In his way of taking both the Frenchmatics and those of the Roxburghs, we see evident that the mask had begun to be worn rather carelessly. Walter, it may be worth mentioning, was also about elected a member of "The Club"—that famous club lished by Johnson, Burke, and Reynolds. Moreover been chosen, on the death of the antiquary Lyeons, of Ancient History to the Royal Academy—a chair permitted. A particular dinner of the Royal Academy, at all events, is recorded with some picturesque details in his essay on the life of Kemble, who sat next to him upon that occasion.

The Bannatyne Club was a child of his own, and from first to last he took a most fatherly concern in all its proceedings. His practical sense dictated a direction of their funds different from what had been adopted by the Roxburghe. Their Club Books already constitute a very curious and valuable library of Scottish history and antiquities; their example was soon followed with not inferior success by the Maitland Club of Glasgow, of which too Sir Walter was a zealous associate; by the Spalding Club of Aberdeen — and since his death by a fourth, founded at Edinburgh in his honour, and styled The Abbotsford Club — which last has taken a still wider range — not confining their printing to works connected with Scotland, but admitting all materials that can throw light on the ancient history or literature of any country, described or handled by the Author of Waverley.

At the meetings of the Bannatyne he presided from 1823 to 1831; and in the chair on their anniversary dinners, surrounded by some of his oldest and dearest friends — Thomas Thomson (the Vice-President), John Clerk (Lord Eldon), the Chief-Commissioner Adam, the Chief Baron Shepherd, Lord Jeffrey, Mr. Constable — and let me not forget his kind, intelligent, and indelibly ally, Mr. David Laing,¹ bookseller, the Secretary of the Club — he from that time forward was the unfailing source and centre of all sorts of merriment, “within the limits of becoming mirth.” Of the origin and early progress of their institution, the reader has a full account in his reviewal of Pitcairn’s Criminal Trials; and the last edition of his Poems includes that excellent song composed for their first dinner — on March 9, 1823 — and then sung by James Ballantyne, and heartily chorused by all the aforesaid dignitaries: —

“Ansat me, ye friends of old books and old wine,
To sing in the praise of sage Bannatyne,
Who left such a treasure of old Scottish lore,
As enabled each age to print one volume more,
One volume more, my friends — one volume more,
We’ll ransack old Hanny for one volume more.” — &c.

Various passages in Scott’s correspondence have recalled to my recollection the wonder with which the friends best acquainted with the extent of his usual engagements observed, about this period, his readiness in various kinds of business of associations far different from the Bank. I cannot doubt that his conduct as President of Society, and as manager of the preparations for visit, had a main influence in this matter. In the he had been thrown into contact with many of the of his fellow-citizens, who had previously been in favour their notions of him with something of the politics; and they had soon appreciated his influence must all have had abundant opportunities of observ with which all humours are engendered, to the sh all really useful discussion, wherever social equala conclave, without having some official presen, weight of strong and quick intellect, with the c moderation of a brave spirit, and the conciliat habitual courtesy. Presumption, dogmatism, an shrunk from the over-awing contrast of his modest the poison of every little passion was abashed and beneath the charitable dignity of his penetration a fretfulness, and spleen felt themselves transmuted a atmosphere of good sense, good humour, and goo And whoever might be apt to plead off on the accor duty of any sort, Scott had always leisure as well command, when invited to take part in any busine with a rational hope of public advantage. There th like the discovery of some new element of wealth, eager spirits who considered the Royal Society a local parent and minister of practical inventions a cal improvements; and they found it no hard matt their genial chief with a warm sympathy in not a then predominant speculations. He was invited, to place himself at the head of a new company fo the manufacture of oil gas, and in the spring of thi to officiate regularly in that capacity. Other assoc like kind called for his countenance, and recovr fame of his ready zeal and happy demeanour grew and from this time, until bodily infirmities disab Walter occupied, as the most usual, acceptable, an chairman of public meetings of almost every sort politica, a very prominent place among the activ his native town. Any foreign student of statistica have happened to peruse the files of an Edinburgh for the period to which I allude, would, I think, hav that there must be at least two Sir Walter Scotts.

¹ Now Librarian to the Signet Library, Edin., and LL.D. — 1871.

one the miraculously fertile author whose works occupied two thirds of its literary advertisements and critical columns — another some retired magistrate or senator of easy fortune and indefatigable philanthropy, who devoted the rather oppressive leisure of an honourable old age to the promotion of patriotic ameliorations, the watchful guardianship of charities, and the ardent patronage of educational institutions.

The reader of his correspondence will find hints about various little matters connected with Scott's own advancing edifice, in which he may trace the President of the Royal Society and the Chairman of the Gas Company. But I cannot say that the "century of inventions" at Abbotsford turned out very happily. His bells to move by compression of air in a piston proved a poor succedaneum for the simple wire; and his application of gas-light to the interior of a dwelling-house was in fact attended with so many inconveniences, that ere long all his family heartily wished it had never been thought of. Moreover, he had deceived himself as to the expense of such an apparatus when constructed and maintained for the use of a single domestic establishment. The effect of the apparatus was at first superb. In sitting down to table, in Autumn, no one observed that in each of three chandeliers there lurked a tiny bead of red light. Dinner passed off, and the sun went down, and suddenly, at the turning of a screw, the room was filled with a gush of splendour worthy of the palace of Aladdin; but, as in the case of Aladdin, the old lamp would have been better in the upshot. Jewelry sparkled, but cheeks and lips looked cold and wan in this fierce illumination; and the eye was wearied, and the brow ached, if the sitting was at all protracted. I confess, however, that my chief enmity to the whole affair arises from my conviction that Sir Walter's own health was damaged, in his latter years, in consequence of his habitually working at night under the intense and burning glare of a broad star of gas.

In June Quentin Durward was published; and surpassing as its popularity was eventually, Constable, who was in London at the time, wrote in cold terms of its immediate reception.

Very shortly before the bookseller left Edinburgh for that trip, he had concluded another bargain (his last of the sort) for the purchase of Waverley copyrights — acquiring the author's property in The Pirate, Nigel, Peveril, and also Quentin Durward, out and out, at the price of five thousand guineas. He had thus paid for the copyright of novels (over and above the half profits of the early separate editions) the sum of £22,500;

and his advances upon "works of fiction" still amounted at this moment to £. 10,000 more or less, and the wonder is that he began to take to the process of creation was moving too rapidly. The production of different parts of the Fables in a collection probably have had a share in opening his eyes to the inadvisableness of an author's attempting to do the rapid diffusion of his works as library-book objects with any publisher who appears at four times the fortune. But he merely intimated on this occasion, considering the usual chances of life and health, he was not contracting for any more novels until those already written. Scott himself appears to have had at that moment the suspicion that he had been overdone in the scheme of a work on superstitions, in the form of dialogue, for which he possessed ample materials in his curious library. But before Constable had leisure to consider the matter on all its bearings, Quentin Durward, from being pressed, it, frost-bit, had emerged into most torrid life. In fact, the sensation which this novel's appearance created in Paris, was extremely similar to which attended the original Waverley in Edinburgh afterwards in London. For the first time he ventured on foreign ground, and the French public of the pompous tragedians and feeble romancers, striven to bring out the ancient history and manners of their country in popular forms, were seized with a fever when Louis XI. and Charles the Bold started at the back of the Northern Magician. The result was, that Quentin Durward, as regards the contemporary literature of the continent, would open a field for ample digression. The author himself, the rays of foreign enthusiasm thawed the frost of Constable's unwonted misgivings. Dialogues on Superstition, if he ever began the work, soon dropped, and the Novelist resumed his pen, and sunk under the short-lived frown — for he wrote it on first ascertaining that a damp was thrown on his enterprise.

"The mouse who only trusts to one poor hole Can never be a mouse of any soul ;"

and, while his publisher yet remained irresolute on the subject of Dialogues, throw off his excellent Essay on Ro-

Encyclopædia Britannica; and I cannot but consider it as another display of his high self-reliance, that, though he well knew to what influence Quentin owed its ultimate success in the British market, he, the instant he found himself encouraged to take up the trade of story-telling again, sprang back to Scotland — may, voluntarily encountered new difficulties, by selecting the comparatively tame and unpicturesque realities of modern manners in his native province.

A conversation, which much interested me at the time, had, I fancy, some share at least in this determination. As he, Laidlaw, and myself, were lounging on our ponies, one fine calm afternoon, along the brow of the Eldon Hill where it overhangs Melrose, he mentioned to us gaily the row, as he called it, that was going on in Paris about Quentin Durward, and said, "I can't but think that I could make better play still with something German." Laidlaw grumbled at this, and said, like a true Scotchman, "Na, na, sir — take my word for it, you are always best, like Helen MacGregor, when your foot is on your native heath; and I have often thought that if you were to write a novel, and lay the scene here in the very year you were writing it, you would exceed yourself." — "Hame's hame," quoth Scott, smiling, "be it ever sae hamely. There's something in what you say, Willie. What suppose I were to take Captain Clutterbuck for a hero, and never let the story step a yard beyond the village below us yonder?" — "The very thing I want," says Laidlaw; "stick to Melrose in July 1823." — "Well, upon my word," he answered, "the field would be quite wide enough — and what for not?" — (This pet phrase of Meg Doda was a Laidlawism.) Some fun followed about the different real persons in the village that might be introduced with comical effect; but as Laidlaw and I talked and laughed over our worthy neighbours, his air became graver and graver; and he at length said, "Ay, ay, if one could look into the heart of that little cluster of cottages, no fear but you would find materials enow for tragedy as well as comedy. I undertake to say there is some real romance at this moment going on down there, that, if it could have justice done to it, would be well worth all the fiction that was ever spun out of human brains." He then told us a tale of dark domestic guilt which had recently come under his notice as Sheriff, and of which the scene was not Melrose, but a smaller hamlet, on the other side of the Tweed, full in our view; but the details were not of a kind to be dwelt upon; — anything more dreadful was never conceived by Crabbe, and he told it so as to produce on us who listened all the effect of another Hall of Justice. It could never have entered into his head to elaborate such a tale; but both Laidlaw and I used to think that this talk suggested St. Ronan's Well — though my good friend was by no means disposed to accept that as payment in full of his demand, and from time to time afterwards, would give the Sheriff a little poking about "Melrose in July."

Before Sir Walter settled to the new novel, he received Joanna Baillie's long-promised Collection of Poetical Miscellanies, in which appeared his dramatic sketch of Macduff's Cross. When Halidon Hill first came forth, there were not wanting reviewers who hailed it in a style of rapture, such as might have been expected had it been a Macbeth. But this folly soon sunk; and I only mention it as an instance of the extent to which reputation bewilders and confounds even persons who have good brains enough when they find it convenient to exercise them. The second attempt of the class produced no sensation whatever at the time; and both would have been long since forgotten, but that they came from Scott's pen. They both contain some fine passages — Halidon Hill has, indeed, several grand ones. But, on the whole, they always seemed to me unworthy of Sir Walter; and, now that I have read his admirable letters on dramatic composition to Allan Cunningham, it appears doubly hard to account for the rashness with which he committed himself in even such slender attempts on a species of composition, of which, in his cool hour, he so fully appreciated the difficult demands. Nevertheless, I am very far from agreeing with those critics who have gravely talked of Halidon Hill and Macduff's Cross, and the still more unfortunate Doom of Devorgoil, as proving that Sir Walter could not have succeeded in the drama, either serious or comic. It would be as fair to conclude, from the abortive fragment of the Vampyre, that Lord Byron could not have written a good novel or romance in prose. Scott threw off these things currente calamo; he never gave himself time to consider beforehand what could be made of their materials, nor bestowed a moment on correcting them; and neither when they were new, nor even after, did he seem to attach the slightest importance to them.

The month of August 1823 was one of the happiest in Scott's life. Never did I see a brighter day at Abbotsford than that on which Miss Edgeworth first arrived there — never can I forget her look and accent when she was received by him at his archway, and exclaimed, "Everything about you is exactly what one ought to have had wit enough to dream!" The weather was beautiful, and the edifice, and its appurtenances, were all but complete; and day after day, so long as she could remain, her host had always some new plan of gaiety. One day there was fishing on the Cauldshield's Loch, and a dinner on the heathy bank. Another, the whole party feasted by Sir Thomas the Rhymer's waterfall in the glen — and the stone on which Maria that day sat was ever afterwards called Edgeworth's Stone. A third day we had to go further afield. He must needs shew her, not Newark only, but all the upper scenery of the Yarrow, where "fair hangs the apple frae the rock," and the baskets were unpacked about sunset, beside the ruined Chapel overlooking St. Mary's Loch — and he had scrambled to gather blue-bells and heath-flowers, with which all the young ladies must twine their hair, — and they sang, and he recited, until it was time to go home beneath the softest of harvest moons. Thus a fortnight was passed — and the vision closed; for Miss Edgeworth never saw Abbotsford again during his life; and I am very sure she could never bear to look upon it now that the spirit is fled.

Another welcome guest of the same month was Mr. Adolphus — the author of the Letters to Heber; whose reminiscences of this and several subsequent visits are singularly vivid and interesting. He says: — "The circumstances under which I presented myself were peculiar, as the only cause of my being under his roof was one which could not without awkwardness be alluded to, while a strict reserve existed on the subject of the Waverley novels. This, however, did not create any embarrassment; and he entered into conversation as if anything that might have been said with reference to the origin of our acquaintance had been said an hour before. I never saw a man who, in his intercourse with all persons, was so perfect a master of courtesy. His manners were so plain and natural, and his kindness took such immediate possession of the feelings, that this excellence in him might for a while pass almost unobserved. I cannot pay a higher testimony to it than by owning that I first fully appreciated it from his behaviour to others. His air and aspect, at the moment of a first introduction, were placid, modest, and, for his time of life, venerable. Occasionally, where he stood a little on ceremony, he threw into his address a deferential tone, which had in it something of old-fashioned politeness, and became him extremely well.

"A point of hospitality in which Sir Walter Scott never failed, whatever might be the pretensions of the guest, was to do the honour of conversation. When a stranger arrived, he seemed to consider it as much his duty to offer him the resources of his mind as those of his table, taking care, however, by his choice of subjects, to give the visitor an opportunity of making his own stories, if he had them, available. To me he addressed himself often as to a member of his own profession, and indeed he seemed always to have a real pleasure in citing from his own experience as an advocate and a law officer.

"It would, I think, be extremely difficult to give a just idea of his general conversation to any one who had not known him. Considering his great personal and literary popularity, and the wide circle of society in which he had lived, it is perhaps remarkable that so few of his sayings, real or unparaphrased, are in circulation. But he did not affect sayings, the points and sententious turns, which are so easily caught up and transmitted, were not natural to him; though he occasionally expressed a thought very pithily and neatly. For example, he once described the Duke of Wellington's style of debating as 'dividing the argument into two or three parts, and helping himself to the best.' But the great charm of his 'table-talk' was in the sweetness and abundant with which it flowed, — always, however, guided by good sense and taste; the warm and unstudied eloquence with which he expressed rather sentiments than opinions; and the liveliness and force with which he narrated and described; and all that he spoke derived so much of its effect from indefinable felicities of manner, look, and tone — and sometimes from the choice of apparently insignificant words — that a moderately faithful transcript of his sentences would be but a faint image of his conversation. No one who has seen him can forget the surprising power of change which his countenance showed when awakened from a state of composure. In 1823, his face, which was healthy and sanguine, and the hair about it, which had a strong reddish tinge, contrasted rather than harmonised with the sleek, silvery locks above; a contrast which might seem rather suited to a jovial and humorous than to a pathetic expression. But his features were equally capable of both. The form and lobe of his eyes (for the benefit of minute physiognomists it should be noted that the iris contained some small specks of brown) were wonderfully calculated for showing great varieties of emotion. Their mournful aspect was extremely earnest and affecting; and when he told some dismal and mysterious story, they had a doubtful, melancholy, exploring look, which appealed irresistibly to the hearer's imagination. Occasionally, when he spoke of something very audacious or eccentric, they would dilate and light up with a tragicomic, hare-brained expression, quite peculiar to himself; one might see in it a whole chapter of Cœur de Lion and the Clerk of Copmanhurst. Never, perhaps, did a man go through all the gradations of laughter with such complete enjoyment, and a countenance so radiant. The first dawn of a humorous thought would shew itself sometimes, as he sat silent, by an involuntary lengthening of the upper lip, followed by a shy sidelong glance at his neighbours, indescribably whimsical, and seeming to ask from their looks whether the spark of drollery should be suppressed or allowed to blaze out. In the full tide of mirth he did indeed 'laugh the heart's laugh,' like Walpole, but it was not boisterous and overpowering, nor did it check the course of his words; he could go on telling or descanting, while his lungs did 'crow like chanticleer,' his syllables, in the struggle, growing more emphatic, his accent more strongly Scotch, and his voice plaintive with excess of merriment.

"The habits of life at Abbotsford, when I first saw it, ran in the same easy, rational, and pleasant course which I believe they always afterwards took; though the family was at this time rather straitened in its arrangements, as some of the principal rooms were not finished. After breakfast Sir Walter took his short interval of study in the light and elegant little room afterwards called Miss Scott's. That which he occupied when Abbotsford was complete, though more convenient in some material respects, seemed to me the least cheerful¹ and least private in the house. It had, however, a recommendation which perhaps he was very sensible of, that as he sat at his writing-table, he could look out at his young trees. About one o'clock he walked or rode, generally with some of his visitors. At this period, he used to be a good deal on horseback, and a pleasant sight it was to see the gallant old gentleman, in his seal-skin cap and short green jacket, lounging along a field-side on his mare, Sibyl Grey, and pausing now and then to talk, with a serio-comic look, to a labouring man or woman, and rejoice them with some quaint saying in broad Scotch. The dinner hour was early; the sitting after dinner was hospitably but not immoderately prolonged; and the whole family party (for such it always seemed, even if there were several visitors) then met again for a short evening, which was passed in conversation and music. I once heard Sir Walter say, that he believed there was a 'pair' of cards (such was his antiquated expression) somewhere in the house — but probably there is no tradition of their having ever been used. The drawing room and library (unfurnished at the time of my first visit) opened into each other, and formed a beautiful evening apartment. By every one who has visited at Abbotsford they must be associated with some of the most delightful recollections of his life. Sir Walter listened to the music of his daughters, which was all congenial to his own taste, with a never-failing enthusiasm. He followed the fine old songs which Mrs. Lockhart sang to her harp with his mind, eyes, and lips, almost as if joining in an act of religion. To other musical performances he was a dutiful, and often a pleased listener; but I believe he cared little for mere music — the notes failed to charm him if they were not connected with good words, or immediately associated with some history or strong sentiment, upon which his imagination could fasten. A similar observation might, I should conceive, apply to his feeling of other arts. I do not remember any picture or print at Abbotsford which was remarkable merely as a work of colour or design. All, I think, either represented historical, romantic, or poetical subjects, or related to persons, places, or circumstances in which he took an interest. Even in architecture, his taste had the same bias, almost every stone of his house bore an allusion or suggested a sentiment.

¹ It is, however, the only sitting-room in the house that looks southward.

“It seemed at first a little strange, in a scene where so many things brought to mind the Waverley novels, to hear no direct mention of them, or even allusion to their existence. But as forbearance on this head was a rule on which a complete tacit understanding subsisted, there was no embarrassment or appearance of mystery on the subject. Once or twice I have heard a casual reference made, in Sir Walter’s presence, to some topic in the novels; no surprise or appearance of displeasure followed, but the conversation, so far as it tended that way, died a natural death. It has, I believe, happened that he himself has been caught unawares on the forbidden ground; I have heard it told by a very acute observer, not now living, that on his coming once to Abbotsford, after the publication of The Pirate, Sir Walter asked him, ‘Well, and how is our friend Kemble? glorious John!’ and then, recollecting, of course, that he was talking of Claud Halero, he checked himself, and could not for some moments recover from the false step. Had a man been ever so prone to indiscretion on such subjects, it would have been unpardonable to betray it towards Sir Walter Scott, who (beside all his other claims to respect and affection) was himself cautious, even to nicety, of hazarding an inquiry or remark which might appear to be an intrusion upon the affairs of those with whom he conversed. It may be observed, too, that the publications of the day were by no means the staple of conversation at Abbotsford, though they had their turn; and with respect to his own works, Sir Walter did not often talk even of those which were avowed. If he ever indulged in anything like egotism, he loved better to speak of what he had done and seen than of what he had written.

“After all, there is perhaps hardly a secret in the world which has not its safety-valve. Though Sir Walter abstained strictly from any mention of the Waverley novels, he did not scruple to talk, and that with great zest, of the plays which had been founded upon some of them, and the characters, as there represented. Soon after our first meeting, he described to me, with his usual dramatic power, the deathbed scene of ‘the original Dandie Dinmont;’ of course referring, ostensibly at least, to the opera of Guy Mannering. He dwelt with extreme delight upon Mackay’s performances of the Bailie and Dominie Sampson, and appeared to taste them with all the fresh and disinterested enjoyment of a common spectator. I do not know a more interesting circumstance in the history of the Waverley novels, than the pleasure which their illustrious author thus received, as it were at the rebound, from those creations of his own mind which had so largely increased the enjoyments of all the civilised world.

“In one instance only did he, in my presence, say or do anything which seemed to have an intentional reference to the novels themselves, while they were yet unacknowledged. On the last day of my visit in 1823, I rode out with Sir Walter and his friend Mr. Rose, who was then his guest and frequent companion in these short rambles. Sir Walter led us a little way down the left bank of the Tweed, and then into the moors by a track called the Girth Road, along which, he told us, the pilgrims from that side of the river used to come to Melrose. We traced upward, at a distance, the course of the little stream called the Elland. When we had ridden a little time on the moors, he said to me rather pointedly, ‘I am going to shew you something that I think will interest you;’ and presently, in a wild corner of the hills, he halted us at a place where stood three small ancient towers or castellated houses, in ruins, at short distances from each other. It was plain, upon the slightest consideration of the topography, that one (perhaps any one) of these was the tower of Glendun, where so many romantic and marvellous accidents are supposed to have happened in 'The Monastery.' While we looked at this for some time, I said to Sir Walter that they were what Burns calls 'the haunts of our iiring edifices.' 'Yes,' he answered carelessly, 'I dare say there are many stories about them.'"

Every friend of Sir Walter's and I admire particularly Mr Adolphus's exquisite description of his laugh, but indeed, every word of these memoranda is precious.

In September, the Highland Society, at the request of Sir Henry Stewart of Allanton, sent a deputation to his seat in Lanarkshire, to examine and report upon his famous improvements in the art of transplanting trees. Sir Walter was one of the committee, and he took a lively interest in it, witness his Essay on Landscape Gardening. He himself made several Allantonian experiments at Auldalord, but found reason in the sequel to abate somewhat of the enthusiasm which his Essay expresses as to the system. The question, after all, comes to pounds, shillings, and pence — and, whether Sir Henry's accounts had or had not been accurately kept, the thing turned out greatly more expensive on Tweeddale than he found it represented in Clydesdale.

I accompanied Sir Walter on this little expedition, in the course of which we paid several other visits, and explored not a few ancient castles in the upper regions of the Tweed and the Clyde. Even while the weather was most unpropitious, nothing could induce him to remain in the carriage when we approached any ruined or celebrated edifice. If he had never seen it before, his curiosity was like that of an eager strapping; if he had examined it fifty times, he must renew his familiarity, and gratify the tenderness of youthful reminiscences. While on the road, his conversation never flagged — story suggested story, and ballad came upon ballad in endless succession. But what struck me most, was the apparently omnivorous grasp of his memory. That he should recollect every stanza of any ancient ditty of chivalry or romance that had once excited his imagination, could no longer surprise me — but it seemed as if he remembered everything without exception, so it were in anything like the shape of verse, that he had ever read. For example, the morning after we left Allanton, we went across the country to breakfast with his friend Cranstoun (Lord Corchouse), who accompanied us in the same carriage; and his Lordship happening to repeat a phrase, remarkable only for its absurdity, from a Magazine poem of the very silliest feebleness, which they had laughed at when at College together, Scott immediately began at the beginning, and gave it us to the end, with apparently no more effort than if he himself had composed it the day before. I could after this easily believe a story often told by Hogg, to the effect that, lamenting in Scott's presence his having lost his only copy of a long ballad composed by him in his early days, and of which he then could recall merely the subject, and one or two fragments, Sir Walter forthwith said, with a smile,—“Take your pencil, Jamie, and I'll dictate your ballad to you, word for word;”—which was done accordingly.¹

As this was among the first times that I ever travelled for a few days in company with Scott, I may as well add the surprise with which his literary diligence, when away from home and his books, could not fail to be observed. Wherever we slept, whether in the noble mansion or in the shabbiest of country inns, and whether the work was done after retiring at night or before an early start in the morning, he very rarely mounted the carriage again without having a packet of the well-known aspect, ready sealed and corded, and addressed to his printer in Edinburgh. I used to suspect that he had adopted in his latter years the plan of writing everything on paper of the quarto form, in place of the folio which he at an earlier period used, chiefly because in this way, whatever he was writing, and wherever he wrote, he might seem to casual observers to be merely engaged upon a common letter; and the rapidity of his execution, taken with the shape of his sheet, has probably deceived hundreds; but when he had finished his two or three letters, St. Ronan's Well, or whatever was in hand, had made a chapter in advance.

¹“One morning at breakfast, in my father's house, shortly after one of Sir Walter's severe illnesses, he was asked to partake of some of ‘the baked meats that coldly did furnish forth the breakfast-table.’ — ‘No, no,’ he answered; ‘I bear in mind at present, Bob, the advice of your old friend Dr. Weir —

From season'd meats avert your eyes,
From hams, and tongues, and pigeon pies —
A venison pasty set before ye,
Each bit you eat — Memento mori.’

This was a verse of a clever rhyming prescription sent some 30 years before, and which my father then remembered to have repeated upon one of their Liddesdale raids. The verses had almost entirely escaped his memory, but Sir Walter was able to give us a long screed of them. — Andrew Shortrede.”

The novel just mentioned was published in December, and in its English reception there was another falling off, which of course somewhat dispirited the bookseller for the moment. Scotch readers in general dissented stoutly from this judgment, alleging as they might well do that Meg Dods deserved a place by the side of Monkburn, Basil Jervis, and Captain Dalgetty; that no one, who had lived in the author's own country, could hesitate to recognise vivid and happy portraits in Touchwood, MacTurk, and the reclusive minister of St. Roman's; that the descriptions of natural objects might rank with any he had given; and, finally, that the whole character of Clara Mowbray, but especially its development in the third volume, formed an original creation, destined to be classed by posterity with the highest efforts of tragic romance. Some Edinburgh critics, however (both talkers and writers) received with considerable grudgings certain sarcastic sketches of the would-be fine life of the watering place sketches which their Southern brethren had kindly suggested might be drawn from Northern observation, but could never appear better than fantastic caricatures to any person who had visited even a third-rate English resort of the same nominal class. There is no doubt that the author dashed off these minor personages with, in the painter's phrase, a rich brush, but I must confess my belief that they have far more truth about them than his countrymen seemed at the time willing to allow, and that while the Continent was shut, as it was in the days of Sir Walter's youthful wanderings, a trip to such a sequestered place as Gilsland, or Moffat, or Innerbrathen (almost as inaccessible to London duns and bathfibs as the Isle of Man was then, or as Boulogne and Dieppe are now) may have supplied the future novelist's note-book with authentic materials even for such worthies as Sir Bungo and Lady Banks, Dr. Quackleson, and Mr. Winterblossom. It should moreover be borne in mind, that during our insular blockade, northern watering places were not alone favoured by the resort of questionable characters from the south. The comparative cheapness of living, and especially of education, procured for Sir Walter's "own romantic town" a constant succession of such visitants, so long as they could have no access to the salles d'hôte and dancing masters of the Continent. When I first mingled in the society of Edinburgh, it abounded with English, broken in character and in fortune, who found a mere title (even a baronet's one) of consequence enough to obtain for them, from the proverbially cautious Scotch, a degree of attention to which they had long been unaccustomed nearer home; and I heard many name, when the novel was new, a booby of some rank, in whom they recognised a sufficiently accurate prototype for Sir Bingo.

Sir Walter had shewn a remarkable degree of good-nature in the completion of this novel. When the end came in view, James Ballantyne suddenly took vast alarm about a particular feature in the history of the heroine. In the original conception, and in the book as actually written and printed, Miss Mowbray's mock marriage had not halted at the profaned ceremony of the church; and the delicate printer shrunk from the idea of obtruding on the fastidious public the possibility of any personal contamination having been incurred by a high-born damsel of the nineteenth century. Scott was at first inclined to dismiss his friend's scruples as briefly as he had done those of Blackwood in the case of the Black Dwarf:—"You would never have quarrelled with it," he said, "had the thing happened to a girl in gingham:—the silk petticoat can make little difference." James reclaimed with double energy, and called Constable to the rescue;—and after some pause, the author very reluctantly consented to cancel and rewrite about twenty-four pages, which was enough to obliterate to a certain extent the dreaded scandal—and in a similar degree, as he always persisted, to perplex and weaken the course of his narrative and the dark effect of its catastrophe.

Whoever might take offence with different parts of the book, it was rapturously hailed by the inhabitants of Innerleithen, who immediately identified the most striking of its localities with those of their own pretty village and picturesque neighbourhood, and foresaw in this celebration a chance of restoring the popularity of their long neglected Well;—to which Scott had occasionally escorted his mother and sister in the days of boyhood. The notables of the little town voted by acclamation that the old name of Innerleithen should be, as far as possible, dropped thenceforth, and that of St. Ronan's adopted. Nor were they mistaken in their auguries. An unheard-of influx of water-bibbers forthwith crowned their hopes; and spruce hottles and huge staring lodging-houses soon arose to disturb wofully every association that had induced Sir Walter to make Innerleithen the scene of a romance. Nor were they who profited by these invasions of the genus loci at all sparing in their demonstrations of gratitude;—the traveller reads on the corner of every new erection there, Abbotsford Place, Waverley Row, The Marmion Hotel, or some inscription of the like coinage.

Among other consequences of the revived fame of the place, a yearly festival was instituted for the celebration of The St. Roman's Barber Games. A clan of Borderers of the Border, arrayed in doublets of Lincoln green, with broad blue bonnets, and having the Ulrick Shepherd for captain, assumed the principal management of this exhibition, and he oftentimes was well pleased to be enrolled among them, and during several years was a regular attendant, both on the Messon, where he acted (archery, leaping, racing, wrestling, stone-throwing, and hammer-throwing, went on opposite to the noble and brave of Traquair, and at the subsequent banquet, where Hume usually continued always presided a number of the ceremonies. A greater spectacle than that of The St. Roman's Games in those days could not well have been devised. The Shepherd, even when on the verge of threescore, seldom failed to carry off some of the prizes, to the astonishment of his vanquished juniors, and the fair youths of Edinburgh mustered strong among the gentry and yeomen of Tweeddale to see him afterwards in his glory filling the president's chair with eminent success, and commonly supported on this — which was, in fact, the grandest evening of his year — by Sir Walter Scott, Professor Wilson, Sir Adam Fergusson, and Peter Robertson.

CHAPTER XIII.

Publication of Redgauntlet—Abbotsford completed—Marriage of Captain Scott—Constable's Miscellany projected—Life of Napoleon begun—Tales of the Crusaders published—Tour in Ireland—Visit to Windermere—Moore at Abbotsford—Rumours of evil among the Booksellers. 1824-1825.

IMMEDIATELY on the conclusion of St. Ronan's Well, Sir Walter began Redgauntlet;—but it had made considerable progress at press before Constable and Ballantyne could persuade him to substitute that title for Herries. The book was published in June 1824, and was received at the time somewhat coldly, though it has since, I believe, found more justice. The reintroduction of the adventurous hero of 1745, in the dulness and dimness of advancing age and fortunes hopelessly blighted—and the presenting him—with whose romantic portraiture at an earlier period historical truth had been so admirably blended—as the moving principal of events, not only entirely, but notoriously imaginary—this was a rash experiment, and could not fail to suggest disadvantageous comparisons; yet, had there been no Waverley, I am persuaded the fallen and faded Aseanius of Redgauntlet would have been universally pronounced a masterpiece. About the secondary personages there could be little ground for controversy. What novel or drama has surpassed the grotesquely ludicrous, dashed with the profound pathos, of Peter Peebles—the most tragic of farces?—or the still sadder merriment of that human shipwreck, Nautic Ewart?—or Wandering Willie—and his Tale—the wildest and most rueful of dreams told by such a person, and in such a dialect? With posterity, even apart from these grand features, this novel will yield in interest to none of the series; for it contains perhaps more of Allan Fairford's personal experiences than any other of them, or even than all the rest put together.

This year—mirabile dictu!—produced but one novel; and very outset of his career. As a printer's apprentice, he had attracted notice by his attempts with the pen, and Sir Walter was called upon, after often admiring his skill in representing dogs and horses and the like, to assist him with his advice, as ambition had been stirred, and the youth would fain give himself to the regular training of an artist. Scott took him into his room, and conversed with him at some length. He explained the difficulties and perils of this aspiring walk, and ended with saying, "It has often struck me that some clever fellow might make a good hit, if, in place of enrolling himself among the future Raphaels and Van Dykes, of the Royal Academy, he should resolutely set himself to introducing something of a more elegant style of house-painting."

Meantime, the progress of Abbotford stimulated both friends and strangers to contribute articles of curiosity towards its adornment. Mr. Train's gift of this year was a handsome chair made from the oak of the house of Robroyston, the traditional scene of the betrayal of Wallace by Menteith. This Sir Walter placed in his own sanctum where there was no other chair but the one on which he sat at work. But the arrivals were endless: among the rest came, I think within the same week, a copy of Montfaucon's Antiquitates, in fifteen volumes folio, richly bound in scarlet, the gift of King George IV., and a set of the Varnorum Classics, in a hundred and forty volumes, together with a couple of really splendid carved chairs, the spoils of some Venetian palace, from Mr. Constable. These were his tokens of gratitude, by the way, for the MSS. of the Novels, which, on Lord Kennedy's death, Scott drew from that friend's secret repositories, and transferred, with strict injunctions of watchfulness, to his delighted publisher.

Towards the close of this year, Sir Walter heard of the death of his dear brother Thomas, whose only son had been for some time domesticated at Abbotford. In October, his own son Charles began his residence at Brasenose College, Oxford. The adoption of this plan implied finally dropping an appointment in the civil service of the East India Company, which had been placed at his disposal by Lord Bathurst in 1820; a step which, were there any doubt on that subject, would alone be sufficient to prove that the young gentleman's father at this time considered his own worldly fortunes as in a highly prosperous situation. A writership in India is early independence;—in the case of a son of Scott, so conducting himself as not to discredit the name he inherited, it could hardly have failed to be early wealth. And Sir Walter was the last man to deprive his boy of such safe and easy prospects of worldly advantage, turning him over to the precarious chances of a learned profession in Great Britain, unless in the confidence that his own resources were so great as to render ultimate failure in such a career a matter of no primary importance.

ABBOTSFORD. From the Garden.

By Christmas the 'Tales of the Crusaders' were begun, and Abbotsford was at last rid of carpenters and upholsterers. Young Walter arrived to see his father's house complete, and filled with a larger company than it could ever before accommodate. One of the guests was Captain Basil Hall, always an agreeable one; a traveller and a servant, full of stories and theories, inexhaustible in spirits, curiosity, and enthusiasm. Sir Walter was surprised and a little annoyed on observing that the Captain kept a note-book on his knee while at table, but made no remark. He kindly allowed me, in 1836, to read his Abbotsford Diaries, &c., and make what use of them I might then think proper. On the present occasion I must give but a specimen:—

"On coming to a broad path in the middle of the woods, we took notice of a finger-post, on which was written 'The Road to Selkirk.' We made some remark about Tom's orthography, upon which he laughed, and said that that finger-post had gained him great popularity in the neighbourhood. 'I cannot s.v.,' he remarked, 'that I had any such view when I ordered it to be put up. The public road, it is true, is not far off, and it leads through the very centre of my grounds, but I never could bring myself to make that a reason for excluding any person who finds it agreeable or advantageous to take over the hill if he likes. But although my practice in this respect had always been well known, the actual admission of it, the avowed establishment of it as a sort of right, by sticking up the finger-post, was received as a kind of boon, and I got a world of credit for a thing which had certainly not any popularity for its object. Nevertheless,' he continued, 'I have no scruple in saying that what I did deserved the good people's acknowledgment; and I seriously disapprove of those proprietors who act on a different principle in these matters. Nothing on earth would induce me to put up boards threatening prosecution, or cautioning one's fellow-creatures to beware of man-traps and spring-guns. I hold that all such things are not only in the highest degree offensive and hurtful to the feelings of people whom it is every way important to conciliate, but that they are also quite inefficient—and I will venture to say, that not one of my young trees has ever been cut, nor a fence trodden access which all the world has to my place. To visit the house, of course, there is a set of walks set apart and kept private for the ladies—but over all the rest of my land any one may rove as he likes. I please myself with the reflection that many people of taste may be indulging their fancies in the air grounds, and I often recollect how much of Burns's inspiration was probably due to his having near him the woods of Ballyhulish to ramble through at his will when he was a raged rilliant! Some one talked of the pains taken to provide the poor with receipts for making good dishes out of their ordinary means. 'I dislike all such interference,' he said, '—all your domestic, kind, impertinent visits. They are all pretty much felt like insults, and do no manner of good. Let people go on in their own way, in God's name. How would you like to have a nobleman coming to you to teach you how to dish up your beefsteak into a French kichshaw? Let the poor alone in their domestic habits: protect them, treat them kindly, trust them, but let them enjoy in quiet their dish of porridge, and their potatoes and herrings, or whatever it may be. For any sake don't torment them with your fashionable soups. And take care,' he added, 'not to give them anything gratis, except when they are under the gripe of immediate misery—what they think misery—consider it as a sin to do anything that can tend to make them lose the precious feeling of independence. For my part, I very very rarely give anything away. Now, for instance, this pile of branches which has been thinned out this morning, is placed here for sale for the poor people's fires, and I am perfectly certain they are more grateful to me for selling it at the price I do (which, you may be sure, is no great matter), than if I were to give them ten times the quantity for nothing. Every shilling collected in this and other similar manners, goes to a fund which pays the doctor for his attendance on them when they are sick, and this is my notion of charity.'—'I make not a rule to be on intimate terms,' he told us, 'with all my neighbours—that would be an idle thing to do. Some are good—some not so good, and it would be foolish and ineffectual to treat all with the same cordiality; but to live in harmony with all is quite easy, and surely very pleasant. Some of them may be rough and gruff at first, but all men, if kindly used, come about at last, and by going on gently, and never being eager or noisy about what I want, and letting things glide on leisurely, I always find in the end that the object is gained on which I have set my heart, either by exchange or purchase, or by some sort of compromise by which both parties are obliged, and good-will begot if it did not exist before — strengthened if it did exist.’ — I have never seen any person on more delightful terms with his family. The youngest of his nephews and nieces can joke with him, and seem at all times perfectly at ease in his presence — his coming into the room only increases the laugh, and never checks it — he either joins in what is going on or passes. No one notices him any more than if he were one of themselves. These are things which cannot be got up.”

Another entry says: — “Last night there was a dance in honour of Sir Walter Scott’s eldest son, who had recently come from Sandhurst College, after having passed through some military examinations with great credit. We had a great clan of Scotts. There were no less than nine Scotts of Harden, and ten of other families. There were others besides from the neighbourhood — at least half-a-dozen Fergussons, with the jolly Sir Adam at their head — Lady Fergusson, her niece Miss Jobson, the pretty heiress of Lochore,” &c. But with all his acuteness, Hall does not seem to have caught any suspicion of the real purpose and meaning of this ball. That evening was one of the very proudest and happiest in Scott’s brilliant existence. Its festivities were held in honour of the young lady, whom the Captain names cursorily as “the pretty heiress of Lochore.” It was known to not a few of the party, and I should have supposed it might have been surmised by the rest, that those halls were displayed for the first time in all their splendour, on an occasion not less interesting to the Poet than the conclusion of a treaty of marriage between the heir of his name and fortunes, and the amiable niece of his friends Sir Adam and Lady Fergusson. It was the first regular ball given at Abbotsford, and the last. Nay, I believe nobody has ever danced under that roof since then. I myself never again saw the whole range of apartments thrown open for the reception of company except once — on the day of Sir Walter Scott’s funeral.

The lady’s fortune was a handsome one, and her guardians exerted the powers with which they were invested, by requiring that the marriage-contract should settle Abbotsford (with reservation of Sir Walter’s own liferent) upon the affianced parties. To this condition he gave a ready assent, and the moment he had signed the deed, he exclaimed — “I have now parted with my lands with more pleasure than I ever derived from the acquisition or possession of them; and if I be spared for ten years, I think I may promise to offer some again upon the same subject. It was said by his children that his augurs, which, taken upon the matter of worldly wealth, were destined to be of moment as respected consideration of a liberal education.

The marriage took place at Edinburgh on the 17th of February, and when the young couple left Abbotsford three weeks afterwards, Sir Walter accompanied them to their regimental quarters in Ireland in the course of the year. Before he fulfilled that purpose he had the pleasure of seeing his son-in-law appointed a 1st Hussar—a step for which Sir Walter had advanced a sum of £1500.

In May, Terry, and his able brother-in-law, Yates, entered on a negotiation, which terminated in coming joint lessees and managers of the Adolphus. Terry requested Scott and Ballantyne to assist him on occasion by some advance of money, or at that other convenient, by the use of their credit. They were anxious to serve him, but Sir Walter had a poor speculation in theatrical property, and, moreover, was suspicious, too well justified by the result, that Terry was much qualified for conducting the preliminary part of business. Ultimately Ballantyne, who shared the sum, became Terry's security for a considerable sum (£1500), and Sir Walter pledged his credit in like manner to the extent of £1200. He had, in the sequel, to pay this sum and that for which the printer had engaged.

But at this time the chief subject of concern was a scheme of revolution in the whole art and traffic of printing, which Constable first opened in detail one Sir Abbotshford—none being present except Sir Walter, and myself. After dinner, there was a little expectation, and the brave schemer suddenly started res, saying:—"Literary genius may, or may not, be in its best; but the trade are in the cradle." Scott, the florid bookseller's beaming countenance, and the solemnity with which the equally portly printer was listening, being round the bottles with a hearty chuckle, laid on our two sonnie bubbies a drop mother's milk." Terry sucked in fresh inspiration, and proceeded to say copy of which interesting document he drew from his pocket, and substituted for his D'Oyley. It was copiously diversified, "text and margin," by figures and calculations in his own handwriting, which I for one might have regarded with less reverence, had I known at the time this "great arithmetician's" rooted aversion and contempt for all examination of his own balance-sheet. He had, however, taken vast pains to fill in the number of persons who might fairly be supposed to pay the taxes for each separate article of luxury, armorial bearings, hunters, racers, four-wheeled carriages, &c., &c.; and having demonstrated that hundreds of thousands held, as necessary to their comfort and station, articles upon articles of which their forefathers never dreamt, said, that our self-love never deceived us more grossly than when we fancied our notions as to the matter of books had advanced in at all a corresponding proportion. "On the contrary," cried Constable, "I am satisfied that the demand for Shakspeare's plays, contemptible as we hold it to have been, in the time of Elizabeth and James, was more creditable to the classes who really indulged in any sort of elegance then, than the sale of Childe Harold or Waverley is to this nineteenth century."

Scott helped him on by interposing, that at that moment he had a rich valley crowded with handsome houses under his view, and yet much doubted whether any laird within ten miles spent ten pounds per annum on the literature of the day. "No," said Constable, "there is no market among them that's worth one's thinking about. They are contented with a review or a magazine, or at best with a paltry subscription to some circulating library forty miles off. But if I live for half-a-dozen years, I'll make it as impossible that there should not be a good library in every decent house in Britain as that the shepherd's ingle-nook should want the scut poke. Ay, and what's that?" he continued, warming and puffing; "why should the ingle-nook itself want a shelf for the novels?" — "I see your drift, my man," says Sir Walter; — "you're for being like Billy Pitt in Gilray's print — you want to get into the salt-box yourself." — "Yes," he responded (using a favourite adjuration) — "I have hitherto been thinking only of the wax lights, but before I'm a twelvemonth older I shall have my hand upon the tallow." — "Troth," says Scott, "you are indeed likely to be 'The grand Napoleon of the realm of print.'" — "If you outlive me," says Constable, with a regal smile, "I bespeak that line for my tombstone, but, in the meantime, may I presume to ask you to be my right hand man when I open my campaign of Marygates? I have now settled my outline of operations:—a three shilling or half crown volume every month, which must and shall sell, not by thousands or tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands—ay, by millions! Twelve volumes in the year, a halfpenny of profit upon every copy of which will make me richer than the possession of all the opéras-comés of all the quarters that ever were, or will be, but present!—twelve and twelve, no good that millions must wish to have them, and so cheap that every butcher's assistant may have them, if he please to let me tax him sixpence a week!"

Many a previous consultation, and many a solitary meditation, too, prompted Scott's answer. "Your plan," said he, "cannot fail, provided the books be really good, but you must not start until you have not only leading volumes, but depth upon depth of reserve in thorough order. I am willing to do my part in this grand enterprise. Often, of late, have I felt that the vein of fiction was nearly worked out, often, as you all know, have I been thinking seriously of turning my hand to history. I am of opinion that historical writing has no more been adapted to the demands of the increased circles among which literature does already find its way, than you allege us to the shape and price of books in general. What say you to taking the field with a Life of the great Napoleon?"

The reader does not need to be told that the scheme of cheap volumes, subsequently named under the title of Constatable's Miscellany, was the scheme on which this great bookseller was brooding. Before he left Abbotsford, it was arranged that the first number of this collection should consist of one half of Waverley; the second, of the first section of a Life of Napoleon Buonaparte by the author of Waverley; that this Life should be completed in four of these numbers, and that, until the whole series of his novels had been raised, a volume every second month, in this new and uncouth form, he should keep the Ballantyne press going with a series of historical works, to be issued on the alternate months.

Some circumstances in the progress of the Tales of the Crusaders, now on the eve of publication, must have been uppermost in Scott's mind when he met Constatable's proposals as it advanced with Ballantyne; and so heavily did his critical remonstrances weigh on the author, that he at length determined to cancel it for ever. The tale, however, all but a chapter or two, had been printed off, and both publisher and printer paused before committing such a mass to the flames. The sheets were hung up meanwhile, and Scott began The Talisman — of which also James criticised the earlier chapters in such a strain that Scott was deeply vexed. "Is it wise," he wrote, "to mend a dull overloaded fire by heaping on a shovelful of wet coals?" and hinted some doubts whether he should proceed. He did so, however; the critical printer by degrees warmed to the story, and he at last pronounced The Talisman such a masterpiece, that The Betrothed might venture abroad under its wing. Sir Walter was now reluctant on that subject, and said he would rather write two more new novels than the few pages necessary to complete his unfortunate Betrothed. But while he hesitated, the German newspapers announced "a new romance by the author of Waverley" as about to issue from the press of Leipzig. There was some ground for suspecting that a set of the suspended sheets might have been purloined and sold to a pirate, and this consideration put an end to his scruples. And when the German did publish the fabrication, entitled Walladmor, it could no longer be doubtful that some reader of Scott's sheets had communicated at least the fact that he was breaking ground in Wales.

Early in June, then, the Tales of the Crusaders were put forth; and, as Mr. Ballantyne had predicted, the brightness of the Talisman dazzled the eyes of the million as to the defects of the twin-story. Few of these publications had a more enthusiastic greeting; and Scott's literary plans were, as the reader will see reason to infer, considerably modified in consequence of the new burst of applause which attended the brilliant procession of his Saladin and Cœur de Lion.

To return for a moment to our merry conclave at Abbotsford. Constable's vast chapter of embryo schemes was discussed more leisurely on the following Monday morning, when we drove to the crags of Smailholm and the Abbey of Dryburgh, both poet and publisher talking over the past and the future course of their lives, and agreeing, as far as I could penetrate, that the years to come were likely to be more prosperous than any they had as yet seen. In the evening, too, this being his friend's first visit since the mansion had been completed, Scott (though there were no ladies and few servants) had the hall and library lighted up, that he might shew serenity did not sink below those objects of a more distant view, expounding armour and politics, and re-creating the Fabian which he had built.

He began, without delay, what was meant to be a very short preliminary sketch of the French Revolution, prior to the appearance of his hero upon the scene of action. This, he thought, might be done almost as easily as any other, for his recollection of all the great events which occurred was exact, and he had not failed to peruse every book of any considerable importance on these subjects, as it was of them the press. He apprehended the necessity, on the other hand, of more laborious study in the way of reading than he had for many years had occasion for, before he could enter with advantage upon Buonaparte's military career, and Constantine accordingly set about collecting a new library of printed materials, which continued from day to day pouring in upon him, till his little parlour in Castle Street looked more like an auctioneer's parchment than an author's. The first waggon delivered stock of about a hundred huge folios of the Montaigne, and Lezabon, Paris, Amsterdam, and Brussels, were all laid under contribution to meet the bold demands of his porncvor.

In the meantime he advanced with his Introduction; and, catching fire as the theme expanded before him, had so soon several chapters in his desk, without having travelled over half the ground assigned for them, that Constantine saw it would be in vain to hope for the completion of the work within four duodecimes. They resolved that it should be published, in the first instance, as a separate book, in four volumes of the same size with the Tales of the Crusaders, but with more pages and more letterpress to each page. Scarcely had this been settled before it became obvious that four such volumes would never suffice; and the number was week after week extended, with corresponding alterations as to the rate of the author's payment. Constantine still considered the appearance of the second edition of the Life of Napoleon in his Miscellany as the great point on which the fortunes of that undertaking were to turn; and its commencement was in consequence adjourned, which, however, must have been the case at any rate, as the stock of the Novels was greater than he had calculated, and some interval must elapse, before, with fairness to the retail trade, he could throw that long series into any cheaper form.

Before the Court rose in July, Sir Walter had made considerable progress in his Sketch of the French Revolution, but it was agreed that he should make his promised excursion to Ireland before any MS. went to the printers. He had seen no more of the sister island than Dunluce and the Giant's Causeway; his curiosity about the scenery and the people was lively; and besides the great object of seeing his son and daughter-in-law under their own roof, and the scarcely inferior pleasure of another meeting with Miss Edgeworth, he looked forward to renewing his acquaintance with several accomplished persons who had been serviceable to him in his labours upon Swift. But, illustriously as Ireland has contributed to the English Library, he had always been accustomed to hear that almost no books were now published there, and fewer sold than in any other country calling itself civilised; and he had naturally concluded that apathy and indifference prevailed as to literature itself, and of course as to literary men. He had not, therefore, formed the remotest anticipation of the kind of reception which awaited him. Miss Anne Scott and myself accompanied him. We left Edinburgh on the 8th of July in a light open carriage, and embarked at Glasgow for Belfast. The steam-boat, besides a crowd of passengers of all possible classes, was lumbered with a cargo offensive enough to the eye and the nostrils, but still more disagreeable from the anticipations and reflections it could not fail to suggest. Hardly had our carriage been lashed on the deck before it disappeared from our view amidst mountainous packages of old clothes; — the cast-off raiment of the Scotch beggars was on its way to a land where beggary is the staple of life. A voyage down the Firth of Clyde, however, is enough to make anybody happy: nowhere can the home tourist, at all events, behold, in the course of one day, such a succession and variety of beautiful, romantic, and majestic scenery: on one hand, dark mountains and castellated shores — on the other, rich groves and pastures, interspersed with elegant villas and thriving towns — the bright estuary between, alive with shipping, and diversified with islands. It may be supposed how delightful such a voyage was on a fine day in July, with Scott, always as full of glee on any trip as a schoolboy; crammed with all the traditions and legends of every place we passed; and too happy to pour them out for the entertainment of his companions on deck. After dinner, too, he was the charm of the table. A worthy old Bailie of Glasgow sat by him, and shared fully in the general pleasure; though his particular source of interest and satisfaction was, that he had got into such close quarters with a live Sheriff and Clerk of Session, — and this gave him the opportunity of discussing sundry knotty points of police law, as to which our steerage passengers might perhaps have been more curious than most of those admitted to the compartment of the cabin. Sir Walter, however, was ready for the reports of the Broomielaw, as for the mystic antiquities of Balaclava, or the discomfiture of the Norsemen at Largs, or Bruce's adventures in Arran. The Barbe insisted for a second bowl of punch, and volunteered to be the manufacturer, "for," quoth he ably, "I am reckoned a fair hand, though not equal to my father the deacon." Scott smiled in acquiescence.

We reached Belfast next morning. When we halted at Drougheda, a retired officer of dragoons, discovering that the party was Sir Walter's, sent in his card, with a polite offer to attend him over the field of the battle of the Boyne, about two miles off, which of course was accepted. Sir Walter rejoicing the veteran's heart by his vigorous recitation of the famous ballad (The Crossing of the Waters), as we proceeded to the ground, and the eager and intelligent curiosity with which he received his explanations of it.

On Thursday the 14th we reached Dublin in time for dinner, and found young Walter and his bride established in one of those large and noble houses in St. Stephen's Green (the most extensive square in Europe), the founders of which little dreamt that they should ever be let at an easy rate as garrison lodgings. Never can I forget the fond joy and pride with which Sir Walter looked round him, as he sat for the first time at his son's table. I could not but recall Pindar's lines, in which, wishing to paint the gentlest rapture of felicity, he described an old man with a foaming wine-cup in his hand at his child's wedding feast.

In the evening arrived a deputation from the Royal Society of Dublin, inviting Sir Walter to a public dinner, and next morning he found on his breakfast table a letter from the Provost of Trinity College (Dr. Kyle, afterwards Bishop of Cork), announcing that the University desired to pay him the high compliment of a degree of Doctor of Laws by diploma. The Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. Magee) was among the earliest of his visitors; another was the Right Honourable Anthony Blake, who was the bearer of a message from the Marquis Wellesley, then Lord-Lieutenant, inviting him to dine next day at his small and sumptuous table. Mr. Blake's the judges were out of town; but all the other great functionaries, and the leading noblemen and gentlemen of the city and its neighbourhood, of whatever sect or party, hastened to tender every conceivable homage and hospitality. But all this was less surprising to the companions of his journey (though, to say the truth, we had, no more than himself, counted on such eager enthusiasm among any class of Irish society), than the demonstrations of respect which, after the first day or two, awaited him, wherever he moved, at the hands of the less elevated orders of the Dublin population. If his carriage was recognised at the door of any public establishment, the street was sure to be crowded before he came out again, so as to make his departure as slow as a procession. When he entered a street, the watchword was passed down both sides like lightning, and the shopkeepers and their wives stood bowing and curtsying all the way down.

From Dublin, we made an excursion of some days into Wicklow, halting for a night at the villa of the Surgeon-General, Sir Philip Crampton, who kindly did the honours of Lough Breagh and the Dargle; and then for two or three at Old Connaught, near Bray, the seat of the Attorney-General, afterwards Lord Plunkett. Here there was a large and brilliant party assembled; and from hence, under the guidance of Mr. Attorney and his amiable family, we perambulated to all possible advantage the classical resorts of the Devil's Glyn, Rosanna, Kilruddery, and Glendalough, with its seven churches, and St. Kevin's Bed—the scene of the fate of Cathleen, celebrated in Moore's ballad—

“By that lake whose gloomy shore
Skylark never warbles o'er,” &c.

It is a hole in the sheer surface of the rock, in which two or three people might sit. The difficulty of getting into this place has been exaggerated, as also the danger, for it would only be falling thirty or forty feet into very deep water. Yet I never was more pained than when Scott, in spite of all remonstrances, would make his way to it, crawling along the precipice. After he was gone, Plunkett told the female guide he was a poet. Cathleen treated this with indignation, as a quiz of Mr. Attorney's.—“Poet!” said she; “the devil a bit of him—but an honourable gentleman: he gave me half-a-crown.”

On the 1st of August we proceeded from Dublin to Edgeworthstown, the party being now reinforced by Captain and

Mrs. Scott, and also by the direct recommendation of the Surgeon-General. A happy meeting it was, and they conversed together for several days, making every subject of conversation, and other objects of interest in London and the adjacent country. The country everywhere exciting their curiosity, which they had no opportunity to satisfy then affectionate pride in the beauties of their own country, woman, and their appreciation of her talents, was not forgotten; Mr. Lovell Edgeworth, had been a very agreeable friend every evening with a succession of shuffling feet from the side of Ireland. Here, above all, we had the opportunity of seeing in what universal respect and consideration a Catholic family may live in that country, and in far from an unimproved district, provided only they be there habitually, and do their duty as the friends and guardians of those among whom Providence has appointed their proper place. Here we found neither mud hovels nor naked poverty, but snug cottages, and smiling faces all about. Here there was a very large school in the village, of which masters and pupils were in a nearly equal proportion Protestants and Roman Catholics—the Protestant squire himself making it a regular part of his daily business to visit the scene of their operations, and exercise a authority, and enforce discipline by his personal superintendence. It is a curious enough coincidence that Oliver Goldsmith and Maria Edgeworth should both have derived their early love and knowledge of Irish character and manners from the same identical district. He received part of his education at this very school of Edgeworthstown, and Pallasiana (the Journal ennomes est Pallas of Johnson's epigram, the little hamlet where the author of the Wear of Wakefield first saw the light, is still, as it was in his time, the property of the Edgeworths. It may well be imagined with what lively interest Sir Walter surveyed the scenery with which so many of the precious recollections of Ireland must ever be associated, and how curiously he studied the rural manners it presented to him, in the hope (not disappointed) of being able to trace some of his friend's bright creations to their first hints and germs. On the delight with which he contemplated her position in the midst of her own domestic circle, I need say still less. The reader is aware by this time how deeply he condemned and pitied the conduct and fate of those who, gifted with pre-eminent talents for the instruction and entertainment of and romance has always reaped its highest and purest, perhaps its only true and immortal honours. In Maria he hailed a sister spirit — one who, at the summit of literary fame, took the same modest, just, and, let me add, Christian view of the relative importance of the feelings, the obligations, and the hopes in which we are all equally partakers, and those talents and accomplishments which may seem, to vain and short-sighted eyes, sufficient to constitute their possessors into an order and species apart from the rest of their kind. Such fantastic conceits found no shelter with either of these powerful minds. I was then a young man, and I cannot forget how much I was struck at the time by some words that fell from one of them, when, in the course of a walk in the park at Edgeworthstown, I happened to use some phrase which conveyed (though not perhaps meant to do so) the impression that I suspected Poets and Novelists of being a good deal accustomed to look at life and the world only as materials for art. A soft and pensive shade came over Scott's face as he said — "I fear you have some very young ideas in your head: — are you not too apt to measure things by some reference to literature — to disbelieve that anybody can be worth much care, who has no knowledge of that sort of thing, or taste for it? God help us! what a poor world this would be if that were the true doctrine! I have read books enough, and observed and conversed with enough of eminent and splendidly cultivated minds, too, in my time; but I assure you, I have heard higher sentiments from the lips of poor uneducated men and women, when exerting the spirit of severe yet gentle heroism under difficulties and afflictions, or speaking their simple thoughts as to circumstances in the lot of friends and neighbours, than I ever yet met with out of the pages of the Bible. We shall never learn to feel and respect our real calling and destiny, unless we have taught ourselves to consider everything as moonshine, compared with the education of the heart." Maria did not listen to this without some water in her eyes — (her tears are always ready when any generous string is touched; — for, as Pope says, "the finest minds, like the finest metals, dissolve the easiest;") — but she brushed them gaily aside, and said, "You see how it is — Dean Swift said he had written his books in order that people might learn to treat him like a great lord — Sir Walter writes his in order that he may be able to treat his people as a great lord ought to do."

Lest I should forget to mention it, I put down here a rebuke which, later in his life, Sir Walter once gave in my hearing to his daughter Anne. She happened to say of something, I forget what, that she could not abide it. It was vulgar. "My love," said her father, "you speak like a very young lady; do you know, after all, the meaning of this word vulgar?" 'Tis only common; nothing that is common, except wickedness, can deserve to be spoken of in a tone of contempt, and when you have lived to my years, you will be disposed to agree with me in thanking God that nothing really worth having or caring about in this world is uncommon."

Miss Edgeworth, her sister Harriet, and her brother William, were easily persuaded to join our party for the rest of our Irish travels. We were anxious to make the best of our way to the Lakes of Killarney; but posting was not to be very rapidly accomplished in those regions by so large a company as had now collected—and we were more agreeably delayed by the hospitalities of Miss Edgeworth's old friends, and Sir Walter's new ones, at various mansions on our line of route—of which I must note especially Judge Moore's, at Lambertton, near Maryborough, because Sir Walter pronounced its beneficence to be even beyond the usual Irish scale, for, on reaching our next halting place, which was an indifferent country inn, we discovered that we need be in no alarm as to our dinner at all events, the Judge's people having privately packed up in one of the carriages a pickled salmon, a most lordly venison party, and half-a-dozen bottles of champagne. But most of these houses seemed, like the Judge's, to have been constructed on the principle of the Peri Banou's tent. They seemed to have room not only for the lion and lioness, and their respective tails, but for all in the neighbourhood who could be held worthy to inspect them at feeding-time.

It was a succession of festive gasty wherever we halted; and in the course of our movements we saw many castles, churches, and ruins of all sorts—with more than enough of mountain, wood, lake, and river, to have made a similar progress in perhaps any other part of Europe truly delightful. But those to whom the south of Ireland was new, had almost continually before them spectacles of abject misery, which robbed these things of more than half their charm. Sir Walter, indeed, with the habitual helpfulness of his temper, persisted that what he saw even in Kerry was better than what books had taught him to expect; and insured, therefore, that improvement, however slow, was going on. But, ever and anon, as we moved deeper into the country, there was a melancholy in his countenance, and, despite himself, in the tone of his voice, which I for one could not mistake. The constant passings and repassings of bands of mounted policemen, armed to the teeth, and having quite the air of highly disciplined soldiers on sharp service;—the rueful squalid poverty that crawled by every wayside, and blocked up every village where we had to change horses, with exhibitions of human suffering and degradation, such as it had never entered into our heads to conceive; and, above all, the contrast between these naked clamorous beggars, who seemed to spring out of the ground at every turn like swarms of vermin, and the boundless luxury and merriment surrounding the thinly scattered magnates who condescended to inhabit their ancestral seats, would have been sufficient to poison those landscapes, had nature dressed them out in the verdure of Arcadia, and art embellished them with all the temples and palaces of Old Rome and Athens. It is painful enough even to remember such things; but twenty years can have had but a trifling change in the appearance of a country which, so richly endowed by Providence with every element of wealth and happiness, could, at so advanced a period of European civilisation, sicken the heart of the stranger by such wide-spread manifestations of the wanton and reckless profligacy of human mismanagement, the withering curse of feuds and factions, and the tyrannous selfishness of absenteeism; and I fear it is not likely that any contemporary critic will venture to call my melancholy picture overcharged. A few blessed exceptions—such an aspect of ease and decency, for example, as we met everywhere on the vast domain of the Duke of Devonshire—served only to make the sad reality of the rule more flagrant and appalling.

There were, however, abundance of ludicrous incidents to break this gloom; and no traveller ever tasted either the humours or the blunders of Paddy more heartily than did Sir Walter. I find recorded in one letter a very merry morning at Limerick, where, amidst the ringing of all the bells, in honour of the advent, there was ushered in a brother-poet, who must needs pay his personal respects to the author of Marmion. He was a scare-crow figure—by name O'Kelly; and he had produced on the spur of the occasion this modest parody of Dryden's famous epigram:—

“Three poets, of three different nations born,
The United Kingdom in this age adorn;
Byron of England, Scott of Scotia's blood,
And Erin's pride—O'Kelly great and good.”

Sir Walter's five shillings were at once forthcoming board, in order that Miss Edgeworth might display erently, pointed out, in a little volume of his works moreover, we had all to subscribe, this pregnant cou

Scott, Morgan, Edgeworth, Byron, prop. of Green
Are characters whose fame not soon will cease

We were still more amused (though there was real the case) with what befell on our approach to a cert.
seat, in a different county, where there was a collector ures and carpenters not usually shown to travellers fleming, whom we had met in Dublin, had been accus us part of the day's journey, and volunteered, being a with the owner, to procure us easy admission. At the of the domain, to which we proceeded under his wing startled by the dolorous apparition of two undertakers voluminous black scarfs, though there was little or no black about the rest of their habiliments, who sat highway before the gate, with a whisky bottle on a between them. They informed us that the master of had died the day before, and that they were to keep a ward in this style until the funeral, inviting all their sengers to drink a glass to his repose. Our circum card for the widow — having previously, no doubt, w it the names of his two lions. Shortly after we reg post-house, he received a polite answer from the lady best of my memory it was in these terms: — "Mrs sents her kind compliments to Mr _____, and much reg she cannot shew the pictures to-day, as Major _____ di day evening by apoplexy; which Mrs _____ the more t it will prevent her having the honour to see Sir Wal and Miss Edgeworth." Sir Walter said it reminded woman in Pife, who, summing up the misfortunes of year in her history, said — "Let me see, sirs, first we wee callant — and then Jenny — and then the gudeman died — and then the coo died too, poor hizzoy; but, to her hide brought me fifteen shillings."

At one county gentleman's table where we dined, the grand full length daubs of William and Mary adorned of the room, there was a mixed company — about as nu olies as Protestants, all apparently on cordial terms, and each other lustily in bumpers of capital claret. About after dinner, however, punch was called for; tumblers

of hot water appeared, and with them two magnums of whisky — the one bearing on its label KING'S, the other QUEEN'S. We did not at first understand these inscriptions; but it was explained, sotto voce, that the King's had paid the duty, the Queen's was of contraband origin; and, in the choice of liquors, we detected a new shibboleth of party. The jolly Protestants to a man stuck to the King's bottle—the equally radiant Papists paid their duty to the Queen's.

Since I have alluded at all to the then grand dispute, I may mention, that, after our tour was concluded, we considered with some wonder that, having partaken liberally of Catholic hospitality, and encountered almost every other class of society, we had not sat at meat with one specimen of the Romish priesthood; whereas, even at Popish tables, we had met dignitaries of the Established Church. This circumstance we sat down at the time as amounting pretty nearly to a proof that there were few gentlemen in that order; but we afterwards were willing to suspect that a prejudice of their own had been the source of it. The only incivility, which Sir Walter Scott ultimately discovered himself to have encountered — (for his friends did not allow him to hear of it at the time) — in the course of his Irish peregrination, was the refusal of a Roman Catholic gentleman, named O'Connell, who kept stag-hounds near Killarney, to allow of a hunt on the upper lake, the day he visited that beautiful scenery. This he did, as we were told, because he considered it as a notorious fact, that Sir Walter Scott was an enemy to the Roman Catholic claims for admission to seats in Parliament. He was entirely mistaken, however; for, though no man disapproved of Romanism as a system of faith and practice more sincerely than Sir Walter always did, he had long before this period formed the opinion, that no good could come of farther resistance to the claim in question. He on all occasions expressed manfully his belief, that the best thing for Ireland would have been never to relax the strictly political enactments of the penal laws, however harsh these might appear. Had they been kept in vigour for another half century, it was his conviction that Popery would have been all but extinguished in Ireland. But he thought that, after admitting Romanists to the elective franchise, it was a vain notion that they could be permanently or advantageously debarred from using that franchise in favour of those of their own persuasion. The greater part of the charming society into which he fell while in Ireland, entertained views and sentiments very likely to confirm these impressions; and it struck me that considerable pains were taken to enforce them. It was felt, probably, that a decision drew near; and there might be a natural desire to secure the suffrage of the great writer of the time.

Having crossed the hills from Killarney to Cork, in repetition of the Dublin reception — cooperation, invitations of the literary and scientific societies, and awaited him, he gave a couple of days to the busy this flourishing town, and the beautiful scenery of not forgetting an excursion to the groves of Blarney whose shades we had a right martial poem. So scrambled up to the top of the castle, and kissed, with and devotion, the famous Blarney stone, our salute to said to emancipate the pilgrim from all future mauvaise honte :

“ The stone this is, whoever kisses,
He never misses to grow eloquent
’Tis he may clamber to a lady’s chamber,
Or be a member of Parliament.”

From Cork we proceeded to Dublin by Fermoy, Cashel, Kilkenny, and Holycross — at all of which were bountifully entertained, and assiduously cured our old quarters in St. Stephen’s Green, and after or two spent in taking leave of many kind faces that never to see again, Sir Walter and his original fellow started for Holyhead on the 15th of August. Our through North Wales produced nothing worth record, perhaps the feeling of delight which everything in of the common people, their dress, their houses, their and their husbandry, could not fail to call up in pe had just been seeing Ireland for the first time. While at Edgeworthstown, been requested by Mr. C meet him at his friend Mr. Bolton’s, on Winder reaching that lake, we spent a pleasant day with Wilson at Elleray, and he then conducted us to a large company had been assembled there in honour of inter — among others was Mr. Wordsworth. It has pone, often happened, to a plain English merchant, architect of his own fortunes, to entertain at one time embracing so many illustrious names. He was pr guests; they respected him, and honoured and loved and it would have been difficult to say which star or constellation shone with the brightest or the softest light was “high discourse,” intermingled with as gay fl courtly wit as ever Canning displayed; and a plentiful allowance, on all sides, of those airy transient pleasantries, in which the fancy of poets, however wise and grave, delights to run riot when they are sure not to be misunderstood. There were beautiful and accomplished women to adorn and enjoy this circle. The weather was as Elysian as the scenery. There were brilliant cavalcades through the woods in the mornings, and delicious boatings on the Lake by moonlight; and the last day, "the Admiral of the Lake" presided over one of the most splendid regattas that ever enlivened Windermere. Perhaps there were not fewer than fifty barges following in the Professor's radiant procession, when it paused at the point of Storrs to admit into the place of honour the vessel that carried kind and happy Mr. Bolton and his guests. The bards of the Lakes led the cheers that hailed Scott and Canning; and music and sunshine, flags, streamers, and gay dresses, the merry hum of voices, and the rapid splashing of innumerable oars, made up a dazzling mixture of sensations as the flotilla wound its way among the richly-foliaged islands, and along bays and promontories peopled with enthusiastic spectators.

On at last quitting Storrs, we visited Mr. Wordsworth at his charming retreat of Mount Rydal: and he thence accompanied us to Keswick, where we saw Mr. Southey in his unrivalled library. Mr. Wordsworth and his daughter then turned with us, and passing over Kirkstone to Ulswater, conducted us first to his friend Mr. Marshall's elegant villa, near Lyulph's Tower, and on the next day to the noble castle of his lifelong friend and patron Lord Lonsdale. The Earl and Countess had their halls filled with another splendid circle of distinguished persons. Sir Walter remained a couple of days, and perambulated, under Wordsworth's guidance, the superb terraces and groves of the "fair domain" which that poet has connected with the noblest monument of his genius. He reached Abbotsford again on the 1st of September, and said truly that "his tour had been one ovation."

Without an hour's delay he resumed his usual habits of life — the musing ramble among his own glens, the breezy ride over the moors, the merry spell at the woodman's axe, or the festive chase of Newark, Fernilee, Hangingshaw, or Deloraine; the quiet old-fashioned contentment of the little domestic circle, alternating with the brilliant phantasmagoria of admiring, and sometimes admired, strangers — or the hoisting of the telegraph flag that called laird and bonnet-laird to the burning of the water, or the wassail of the hall. The hours of the day had found a change. The preparation for the Lecture was a course of such hard reading as had not I while "the great magician," in the full and unimpaired himself, and delighted the world, by what after told, his endlessly varied panorama of its miracle had to all appearance cost him no effort and serene among the multiplicities of worldly the invasions of half Europe and America, he tranquilly enjoying, rather than exerting his production of those masterpieces which have per firesides with inexpensive friends, and renders supremacy of Shakspeare, as an all-comprehensive painter of man, no longer a proverb.

He had, while this was the occupation of his time, read only for his diversion. How much he read of correspondence may have afforded some notion observed him the most constantly, were never stand how he contrived to keep himself so thorough the stream of contemporary literature of all French and German, as well as English. That might tell him more than another man could week's poring, may easily be guessed, but the was his perpetual practice of his own grand maxim doing nothing. He had no "unconsidered trifles." Every moment was turned to account, and thus for everything—except, indeed, the newspapers—save so many precious hours now always with me of which, during the period of my acquaintance, certainly read less than any other man I ever had any habit of reading at all. I should also except, generally, the Reviews and Magazines of the time he saw few, and of the few he read little.

He had now to apply himself doggedly to the a huge accumulation of historical materials noted, and indexed with the pertinacity of some in the British Museum; but rose from such an radiant and buoyant, as after he had been for among the teeming harvests of Fancy, but w brow, and eyes on which the dimness of years plant some specks, before they were subjected straining over small print and difficult manuscript no doubt, been familiar to them in the early time (Shortrede's phrase) "he was making himself pleasant sight when one happened to take a passing peep into his den, to see the white head erect, and the smile of conscious inspiration on his lips, while the pen, held boldly, and at a commanding distance, glanced steadily and gaily along a fast-blackening page of The Talisman. It now often made me sorry to catch a glimpse of him, stooping and poring with his spectacles, amidst piles of authorities — a little note-book ready in the left hand, that had always used to be at liberty for patting Maida.

About this time, being again a traveller, I lost the opportunity of witnessing his reception of several eminent persons; — among others the late admirable Master of the Rolls, Lord Gifford, and his Lady — Dr. Philpotts, now Bishop of Exeter; and Mr. Thomas Moore. This last fortunately found Sir Walter in an interval of repose — no one with him at Abbotsford but Lady and Miss Scott — and no company at dinner except the Fergussons and Laidlaw. The two poets had thus the opportunity of a great deal of quiet conversation; and from the hour they met, they seem to have treated each other with a full confidence, the record of which, however touchingly honourable to both, could hardly be made public in extenso while one of them survives. The first day they were alone after dinner, and the talk turned chiefly on the recent death of Byron — from which Scott passed unaffectedly to his own literary history. Mr. Moore listened with great interest to details, now no longer new, about the early days of Mat Lewis, the Minstrelsy, and the Poems; and “at last,” says he, “to my no small surprise, as well as pleasure, he mentioned the novels, without any reserve, as his own. He gave me an account of the original progress of those extraordinary works, the hints supplied for them, the conjectures and mystification to which they had given rise, &c. &c. :” he concluded with saying, “they have been a mine of wealth to me — but I find I fail in them now — I can no longer make them so good as at first.” This frankness was met as it should have been by the brother poet; and when he entered Scott’s room next morning, “he laid his hand,” says Mr. Moore, “with a sort of cordial earnestness on my breast, and said — Now, my dear Moore, we are friends for life.” They sallied out for a walk through the plantations, and among other things, the commonness of the poetic talent in these days was alluded to. “Hardly a Magazine is now published,” said Moore, “that does not contain verses which some thirty years ago would have made a reputation.” — Scott turned with his look of shrewd humour, as if chuckling over his success, and said, "Egad, we were in the luck of it to catch these fellows;" but he added, playfully flourishing as he spoke, "we have, like Robasid, taught them with our own weapons." "In complete novelty," he seemed to think, lay the only chance for a man of high literary reputation in these days."

Moore says "I parted from Scott with the feeling that the world might admire him in his works, but that I could learn to love him as he deserved who had seen me at Abbotsford. I give you carte blanche, to say what I think of my sense of his cordial kindness and gentleness—a not very dignified phrase would express my feeling better than any fine one—it was that he was a thorough gentleman. What Scott thought of his guest appears from the following entry in a private note-book:—"Tom Moore's is the most warbling I ever heard. . . . There is a manly frankness, perfect ease and good-breeding, about him, which is not the least touch of the poet or the pedant. He is a very little man—less, I think, than Lewis, and more like him in person; God knows, not in conversation. He is, though a clever fellow, was a bore of the first class. Moreover, he looked always like a schoolboy. Moore has none of this insignificance. His countenance is full, the expression so very animated, especially in singing, that it is far more interesting than the finest could have rendered it. I was aware that Byron had spoken of Moore and myself in the same breath, and with the same sort of regard; so I was curious to see what would be in common betwixt us, Moore having lived so much in the gay world, I in the country, and with people of business, sometimes with politicians; Moore a scholar, I a musician and artist, I without knowledge of a note, he a poet, I an aristocrat—with many other points of difference besides his being an Irishman, I a Scotchman, and I probably national. Yet there is a point of resemblance—a strong one. We are both good-humoured fellows, we both seek to enjoy what is going forward than to maintain our dignity as Lions; and we have both seen the world, and too well not to condemn in our souls the imagination of literary people who walk with their

The author of Lalla Rookh's Kelso chaise was followed before many days by a more formidable equipage. The much-talked-of lady who began life as Miss Harriet Mellon, a comic actress in a provincial troop, and died Duchess of St. Albans, was then making a tour in Scotland as Mrs. Coutts, the enormously wealthy widow of the first English banker of his time. No person of such consequence could, in those days, have thought a Scotch progress complete, unless it included a reception at Abbotsford; but Mrs. Coutts had been previously acquainted with Sir Walter, who indeed had some remote connexion with her late husband's family, through the Stuarts of Allanbank. He had visited her occasionally in London during Mr. Coutts's life, and was very willing to do the honours of Teviotdale in return. But although she was considerate enough not to come on him with all her retinue (leaving four of the seven carriages with which she travelled at Edinburgh), the appearance of only three coaches, each drawn by four horses, was rather trying for poor Lady Scott. They contained Mrs. Coutts — her future lord the Duke of St. Albans — one of his Grace's sisters — a dame de compagnie — a brace of physicians — for it had been considered that one doctor might himself be disabled in the course of an expedition so adventurous — and, besides other menials of every grade, two bedchamber women for Mrs. Coutts's own person; she requiring to have this article also in duplicate, because, in her widowed condition, she was fearful of ghosts — and there must be one Abigail for the service of the toilette, a second to keep watch by night. With a little puzzling and cramming, all this train found accommodation; — but it so happened that there were already in the house several ladies, Scotch and English, of high birth and rank, who felt by no means disposed to assist their host and hostess in making Mrs. Coutts's visit agreeable to her. I need not observe how effectually women of fashion can contrive to mortify, without doing or saying anything that shall expose them to the charge of actual incivility.

Sir Walter, during dinner, did everything in his power to counteract this influence of the evil eye, and something to overawe it; — but the spirit of mischief had been fairly stirred, and it was easy to see that Mrs. Coutts followed these noble dames to the drawing-room in by no means that complacent mood which was customarily sustained, doubtless, by every blandishment of obsequious flattery, in this mistress of millions. He cut the gentlemen's sederunt short, and soon after joining the ladies, managed to withdraw the youngest, and gayest, and cleverest, who was also the highest in late Marchioness of Northampton, into his arms joining. "I said to her" she told me, "I want to have a word with you about Mrs. Coutts, — we have known her for other a good while, and I know you won't take any notice of what I can say in ill part. — It is, I hear, not uncommon among the fine ladies in London to be very well pleased to receive the attentions, and even sometimes to hunt after them, to Mr. Coutts's grand balls and fetes, and then, if they meet her in a particular circle, to practise on her the delicate manœuvre called the cold shoulder. — This you agree with me is shabby, and nothing new either to you or to me, that fine people are shabbinesses for which beggars might blush, if they were so low as to poke for tickets. — I am sure you would not let the world do such a thing; but you must permit me to take the great liberty of saying, that I think the style you received my guest Mrs. Coutts in, this evening, is, to a certain extent, a sin of the same order. — You were all told of days ago that I had accepted her visit, and that she was to arrive to-day to stay three nights. — Now if any of you had been disposed to be of my party at the same time, there would have been plenty of time for you to have gone away before she came; and as none of you moved, and it was my own fancy that any of you would remain out of mere curiosity, I thought I had a perfect right to calculate on your coming, and made up your minds to help me out with her." — The Marchioness of Northampton (who had been his ward) answered — "I thank you, Sir Walter; — you have done me the great honour to say that if I had been your daughter, and depend upon it you would have obeyed with heart and good will." — One by one, the other ladies and gentlemen were seen engaged in a little tête-à-tête with Sir Walter. — Sir Walter was soon satisfied that things had fallen into a right train; the Marchioness was requested to sing a particular song, because he thought it would please Mrs. Coutts. — Nothing could gratify her more than to please Mr. Coutts. — Mrs. Coutts's brow smoothed, and in the course of the evening hour she was as happy and easy as ever she was in her life, rattling away at comical anecdotes of her early theatrical career, and joining in the chorus of Sir Adam's Laird o' the Leith. — She stayed out her three days¹ — saw, accompanied by her circle, Melrose, Dryburgh, and Yarrow — and left delighted with her host, and, to all appearance, with his other guests.

¹Sir Walter often quoted the maxim of an old lady in Ferrier's novels — that a visit should never exceed three days — the drest day — and the prest day."

It may be said (for the most benevolent of men had in his lifetime, and still has, some maligners) that he was so anxious about Mrs. Coutts's comfort, because he worshipped wealth. I dare not deny that he set more of his affections, during great part of his life, upon worldly things, wealth among others, than might have become such an intellect. One may conceive a sober grandeur of mind, not incompatible with genius as rich as even his, but infinitely more admirable than any genius, incapable of brooding upon any of the pomps and vanities of this life — or caring about money at all, beyond what is necessary for the easy sustenance of nature. But we must, in judging the most powerful of minds, take into account the influences to which they were exposed in the plastic period; and where imagination is visibly the predominant faculty, allowance must be made very largely indeed. Scott's autobiographical fragment, and the anecdotes annexed to it, have been printed in vain, if they have not conveyed the notion of such a training of the mind, fancy, and character, as could hardly fail to suggest dreams and aspirations very likely, were temptation presented, to take the shape of active external ambition — to prompt a keen pursuit of those resources, without which visions of worldly splendour cannot be realised. But I think the subsequent narrative and his own correspondence must also have satisfied every candid reader that his appetite for wealth was after all essentially a vivid yearning for the means of large beneficence. As to his being capable of the silliness — to say nothing of the meanness — of allowing any part of his feelings or demeanour towards others to be affected by their mere possession of wealth, I cannot consider such a suggestion as worthy of much remark. He had a kindness towards Mrs. Coutts, because he knew that, vain and pompous as her displays of equipage and attendance might be, she mainly valued wealth, like himself, as the instrument of doing good. Even of her apparently most fantastic indulgences he remembered, as Pope did when ridiculing the "lavish cost and little skill" of his Timon,

" Yet hence the poor are clothed, the hungry fed ; "

but he interfered, to prevent her being made uncomfortable in his house, neither more nor less than he would have done, had she come there in her original character of a comic actress, and been treated with coldness, as such, by his Marchion Comtesses.

Since I have been led to touch on what many a sidered as the weak part of his character — his overworldly things in general, — I must say one word matter of rank, which undoubtedly had far more effect than money. — In the first place, he was all along of the great world — not at by him, and, secondly, ple was with its attentions, he derived infinitely greater from the trusting and hearty affection of his old the inferiors whose welfare he so unweariedly promo thirdly, he made acute discriminations among the m out orders of claimants who jostle each other for p in the curiously complicated system of modern Brit His imagination had been constantly exercised in re embellishing whatever features of the past it was connect with any pleasing ideas, and a historical n charm that literally stirred his blood. — But not so a He revered the Duke of Buccleuch — but it wa Duke, but as the head of his clan, the representative knights of Brunsholm. — In the Duke of Hamilton, the premier peer of Scotland, but the lineal heir of old Douglasses; and he had profounder respect fo of a Highland Clan, without any title whatever, an ill-paid rental of two or three thousand a year, th haughtiest magnate in a blue ribbon, whose name d up any grand historical reminiscence. — I remember he had some young Englishmen of high fashion in there arrived a Scotch gentleman of no distinguish ance, whom he received with a sort of eagerness and ment of reverential courtesy that struck the stranger out of common. — His name was that of a Scotch Ear and no doubt he was that nobleman's son. — “Well, of the Southrons to me, — “I had never heard tha of ——— was one of your very greatest lords in the even a second son of his, booby though he be, seem wonderful consideration.” — The young English lord some surprise, that the visitor in question was a poor on half-pay, heir to a tower about as crazy as Don and nowadays related (at least according to English relationship) to the Earl of ———. — “What, then,” “what can Sir Walter mean?” — “Why,” said I, “he is very clear. — This gentleman is the male representat the Earl of ——— may possibly be in the female line) c who is celebrated by our old poet Blind Harry, as having signalled himself by the side of Sir William Wallace, and from whom every Scotchman that bears the name of — has at least the ambition of being supposed to descend." — Sir Walter's own title came unsought; and that he accepted it, not in the foolish fancy that such a title, or any title, could increase his own personal consequence, but because he thought it fair to embrace the opportunity of securing a certain external distinction to his heirs at Abbotsford, was proved pretty clearly by his subsequently declining the greatly higher, but intransmissible rank of a Privy-Councillor. At the same time, I dare say his ear liked the knightly sound; and undoubtedly he was much pleased with the pleasure his wife took, and gaily acknowledged she took, in being My Lady.

The circumstances of the King's visit in 1822, and others already noted, leave no doubt that imagination enlarged and glorified for him many objects to which it is very difficult for ordinary men in our generation to attach much importance; and perhaps he was more apt to attach importance to such things, during the prosperous course of his own fortunes, than even a liberal consideration of circumstances can altogether excuse. To myself it seems to have been so; yet I do not think the severe critics on this part of his story have kept quite sufficiently in mind how easy it is for us all to undervalue any species of temptation to which we have not happened to be exposed. I am aware, too, that there are examples of men of genius, situated to a certain extent like him, who have resisted and repelled the fascinations against which he was not entirely proof; but I have sometimes thought that they did so at the expense of parts of their character nearer the marrow of humanity than those which his weakness in this way tended to endamage; that they mingled, in short, in their virtuous self-denial, some grains of sacrifice at the shrine of a cold, unsocial, even sulky species of self-conceit. But this digression has already turned out much longer than I intended. It is time to open occurrences which contrast sadly with the summer scenes of 1825.

Towards the end of September I returned to Scotland from a visit to London on some personal business. During that visit I had heard a great deal more than I understood about the commercial excitement of the time. There had been several house, or warehouse, had been sufficient to raise him to a decent and safely increasing opulence, and was more than sufficient to occupy all his attention, drank in the vain delusion that he was wasting his time and energy on things unworthy of a masculine ambition, and embarked the resources necessary for the purposes of his lawful calling, in schemes worthy of the land-surveyors of El Dorado. It was whispered that the trade (so called, par excellence) had been bitten with this fever; and persons of any foresight who knew the infinitely curious links by which booksellers, and printers, and paper-makers (and therefore authors) are bound together, for good and for evil, already began to prophesy that, whenever the general crash, which must come ere long, should arrive, its effects would be felt far and wide among all classes connected with the productions of the press. When it was rumoured that this great bookseller, or printer, had become a principal holder of South American mining shares — that another was the leading director of a gas company — while a third house had risked about L.100,000 in a cast upon the most capricious of all agricultural products, hops — it was no wonder that bankers should begin to calculate balances, and pause upon discounts.

Among other hints were some concerning a bookselling establishment in London, with which I knew Constable to be closely connected. Little suspecting the extent to which any mischance of Messrs. Hurst and Robinson must involve Sir Walter's own responsibilities, I transmitted to him the rumours in question. Before I could have his answer, a legal friend told me that people were talking doubtfully about Constable's own stability. I thought it probable, that if Constable fell into any embarrassments, Scott might suffer the inconvenience of losing the copy-money of his last novel. Nothing more serious occurred to me. But I thought it my duty to tell him this whisper also; and heard from him, almost by return of post, that, shake who might in London, his friend in Edinburgh was "rooted, as well as branched, like the oak."

A few days, however, after my arrival at Chiefswood, I received a letter from the legal friend already alluded to — (Mr. William Wright, the eminent barrister of Lincoln's Inn, — who, by the way, was also on habits of great personal familiarity with Constable, and liked the Czar exceedingly) — which renewed my apprehensions, or rather, for the first time, gave me any suspicion that there really might be something "rotten in the state of Muscovy." Mr. Wright informed me that it was reported in London that Constable's London banker had thrown over to Abbotsford, and found Sir Walter alone over his glass of whisky and water and cigar — at this time, whenever there was no company, “his custom always in the afternoon.” I gave him Mr. Wright’s letter to read. He did so, and returning it, said, quite with his usual tranquil good-humour of look and voice, “I am much obliged to you for coming over; but you may rely upon it Wright has been hoaxed. I promise you, were the Crafty’s book thrown up, there would be a pretty decent scramble among the bankers for the keeping of it. There may have been some little dispute or misunderstanding, which malice and envy have exaggerated in this absurd style; but I shan’t allow such nonsense to disturb my siesta.”

Seeing how coolly he treated my news, I went home relieved and gratified. Next morning, as I was rising, behold Peter Mathieson at my door, his horses evidently off a journey, and the Sheriff rubbing his eyes as if the halt had shaken him out of a sound sleep. I made what haste I could to descend, and found him by the side of the brook looking somewhat worn, but with a serene and satisfied countenance, busied already in helping his little grandson to feed a fleet of ducklings. — “You are surprised,” he said, “to see me here. The truth is, I was more taken aback with Wright’s epistle than I cared to let on; and so, as soon as you left me, I ordered the carriage to the door, and never stopped till I got to Polton, where I found Constable putting on his nightcap. I stayed an hour with him, and I have now the pleasure to tell you that all is right. There was not a word of truth in the story — he is fast as Ben Lomond; and as Mamma and Anne did not know what my errand was, I thought it as well to come and breakfast here, and set Sophia and you at your ease before I went home again.”

We had a merry breakfast, and he chatted gaily afterwards as I escorted him through his woods, leaning on my shoulder all the way, which he seldom as yet did, except with Tom Purdie, unless when he was in a more than commonly happy and affectionate mood. But I confess the impression this incident left on my mind was not a pleasant one. It was then that I first began to harbour a suspicion, that if anything should befall Constable, Sir Walter would suffer a heavier loss than the non-payment of some one novel. The night journey revealed serious alarm. My wife suggested, as we talked things over, that his alarm had been, not on his own account, but Ballantyne’s, who, in case evil came on the great employer of his types, might possibly lose a year’s profit on them, which neither she nor

I doubted must amount to a large sum — any more than that a misfortune of Ballantyne's would grieve her father as much as one personal to himself. His warm regard for his printer could be no secret; we well knew that James was his confidential critic — his trusted and trustworthy friend from boyhood. Nor was I ignorant that Scott had a share in the property of Ballantyne's Edinburgh Weekly Journal. That had been commonly reported before I was acquainted with them; and all doubt was removed at the time of the Queen's trial in 1820, when they had some warm debates in my presence as to the side to be taken on that unhappy question. But that Sir Walter was, and had all along been James's partner in the great printing concern, neither I, nor, I believe, any member of his family, had entertained the slightest suspicion prior to the coming calamities which were now "casting their shadows before."

It is proper to add here, that the story about the banker's throwing up Constable's book was groundless. Sir Walter's first guess as to its origin proved correct.

A few days afterwards, Mr. Murray sent me a transcript of Lord Byron's Ravenna Diary, with permission for my neighbour also to read it if he pleased. Sir Walter read those extraordinary pages with the liveliest interest, and filled several of the blank leaves and margins with illustrative annotations and anecdotes. In perusing what Byron had jotted down from day to day in the intervals of regular composition, it very naturally occurred to him that the noble poet had done well to avoid troubling himself by any adoption or affectation of plan or order — giving an opinion, a reflexion, a reminiscence, serious or comic, or the incidents of the passing hour, just as the spirit moved him; — and seeing what a mass of curious things, such as "after times would not willingly let die," had been thus rescued from oblivion at a very slight cost of exertion, — he resolved to attempt keeping thenceforth a somewhat similar record. A thick quarto volume, bound in vellum, with a lock and key, was forthwith procured. The occupation of a few stray minutes in his dressing-room at getting up in the morning, or after he had retired for the night, was found a pleasant variety for him. He also kept the book by him when in his study, and often had recourse to it when anything puzzled him and called for a halt in the prosecution of what he considered (though posterity will hardly do so) a more important task. It was extremely fortunate that he took up this scheme exactly at the time when he settled seriously to the history of Buonaparte's personal career. The sort of preparation which every chapter of that book now called for has been already alluded to; and — although, when he had fairly read himself up to any one great cycle of transactions, his old spirit roused itself in full energy, and he traced the record with as rapid and glowing a pencil as he had ever wielded — there were minutes enough, and hours, — possibly days of weariness, depression, and languor, when (unless this silent confidant had been at hand) even he perhaps might have made no use of his writing-desk.

Even the new resource of journalising, however, was not sufficient. He soon convinced himself that it would facilitate, not impede, his progress with Napoleon, to have a work of imagination in hand also. The success of the Tales of the Crusaders had been very high; and Constable, well aware that it had been his custom of old to carry on two romances at the same time, was now too happy to encourage him in beginning Woodstock, to be taken up whenever the historical MS. should be in advance of the press.

Thenceforth, as the Diary shews, he continued to divide his usual desk-hours accordingly: but before he had filled many pages of the private Quarto, it begins to record alarm — from day to day deepening — as to Constable, and the extent to which the great publisher's affairs had by degrees come to be connected and bound up with those of the printing firm.

Till John Ballantyne's death, as already intimated, the pecuniary management of that firm had been wholly in his hands. Of his conduct in such business I need add no more: the burden had since been on his surviving brother; and I am now obliged to say that, though his deficiencies were of a very different sort from John's, they were, as respected his commercial career and connexions, great and unfortunate.

He had received the education, not of a printer, but of a solicitor; and he never, to his dying day, had the remotest knowledge or feeling of what the most important business of a master-printer consists in. He had a fine taste for the effect of types — no establishment turned out more beautiful specimens of the art than his; but he appears never to have understood that types need watching as well as setting. If the page looked handsome, he was satisfied. He had been instructed that on every L.50 paid in his men's wages, the master-printer is entitled to an equal sum of gross profit; and beyond this rule of thumb calculation, no experience could bring him to penetrate his mystery. In a word, James never comprehended that in the greatest and most regularly employed manufactory entirely swallowed up, unless the acting master be most watchful and scrupulous, from week to week, and from day, as to the machinery and the materials. So busy was he, that during several of the business-important years of his connexion with the establishment the Canongate, he seldom crossed its doors. His own elbow chair, in a comfortable library, situated in a quiet street — not certainly an idle man — quite a different man, though naturally indolent — but the most negligent and negligent of master printers.

He was busy, indeed, and most assiduously so, with his labour, but it consisted solely in the correction of proof sheets. It is most true, that Sir Walter's method of composition rendered it absolutely necessary that whatever he wrote should be subjected to far more than the usual amount of inspection required at the printer's, and it is equally so, that it would have been difficult to find another man willing and able to bestow so much time and care on his proof sheets as they uniformly were from James. But this was, in fact, not the proper business of the man who was at the head of the establishment; he had undertaken the pecuniary management. In a great printing-house that I have known anything of, there are intelligent and well-educated men, called, technical readers, who devote themselves to this species of labour, and are, I fear, seldom paid in proportion to its importance. Goldsmith, in his early life, was such a reader in the house of Richardson; but the author of Clariissa did not like to look after the press and types himself, or he would have accumulated the fortune that enabled him to become the employer of readers like Goldsmith. In a letter addressed to John Ballantyne, when the bookselling house was but newly begun, Scott says, — "One or other of you will need to be in the printing-office henceforth; it is the sheet and the galley was ten years after that establishment began. I have seen James, in compliance with this injunction, occupy many hours of every day, a cabinet within the press-room of the Canongate; but whoever visited him there, found him occupied with some eternal business, that of a literator, not that of a printer. He was either editing his newspaper — or correcting the press — or writing critical notes to the Author of Waverley. Addison, Johnson, and Burke, were at his elbow, and not the ledger. We may thus understand poor J plaint, in what I may call his dying memorandum, of the "large sums abstracted from the bookselling house for the use of the printing-office." Yet that bookselling house was from the first a hopeless one; whereas, under accurate superintendence, the other ought to have produced the partners a dividend of from L.2000 to L.3000 a year, at the very least.

On the other hand, the necessity of providing some remedy for this radical disorder must very soon have forced itself upon the conviction of all concerned, had not John introduced his fatal enlightenment on the subject of facilitating discounts, and raising cash by means of accommodation-bills. Hence the perplexed states and calendars—the wildernesses and labyrinths of ciphers, through which no eye but that of a professed accountant could have detected any clue; hence the accumulation of bills and counter-bills drawn by both bookselling and printing house, and gradually so mixed up with other obligations, that John died in utter ignorance of the condition of their affairs. The pecuniary detail then devolved upon James; and I fancy it will be only too apparent that he never made even one serious effort to master the formidable array of figures thus committed to his sole trust.

The reader has been enabled to trace from its beginnings the connexion between Constable and the two Ballantyne firms. It has been seen how much they both owed to his interference on various occasions of pressure and alarm. But when he, in his overweening self-sufficiency, thought it involved no mighty hazard to indulge his better feelings, as well as his lordly vanity, in shielding these firms from commercial dishonour, he had estimated but loosely the demands of the career of speculation on which he was himself entering. And by and by, when advancing by one mighty plunge after another in that vast field, he felt in his own person the threatenings of more signal ruin than could have befallen them, this "Napoleon of the press"—still as of old buoyed up to the ultimate result of his grand operations by the most fulsome flatteries of imagination—appears to have tossed aside very summarily all scruples about the extent to which he might be entitled to tax their sustaining credit in requital. The Ballantynes, if they had comprehended all the bearings of the case, were not the men to consider grudgingly demands of this nature, founded on service so important; and who can doubt that Scott viewed them from a chivalrous altitude? It is easy to see, that the moment the obligations became reciprocal, there arose extreme peril of their coming to be hopelessly compli-on these affairs, as their complication thickened which he excited, and rather ponded himself smaller points of worldly business, to the which did not, I must always regard as the eminent history, but various incidents in that history already narrated, prove incontrovertibly that he so, and I am unable to account for this having except on the supposition that his confidence of Constable and the piety of James Ballantyne, that he willingly absolved himself from all and thoroughgoing superintention.

It is the extent to which the confusion had attituded the great puzzle — I have been told that, in his heyday, might be heard whistling John Stevenson often alluded to in Scott's An' Your Jock, from the sanctum behind the shop you lubber, fetch him a sheaf o' stamps." So well enough be believed of that hare-brained eraser solemn James could have made up his mind to have done, to follow much the same wild course which occurred, as to me, I must own, incompromisable books were kept at the printing house; and of Peter (who alone in fact had capital at stake) in examined them as often as he liked: but it is doubtful if he ever once attempted to do so: and if they were never balanced during the latter year or more. During several years it was almost daily walk home with Sir Walter from the Parliament at James's on our way. For the most part I myself with a newspaper or proof-sheet in hand while they were closeted in the little cabinet and merry were the tones that reached my ears named in colloquy. If I were called in, it was in his ecstasy, must have another to enjoy the his friend was improving — between Meg Do Mac'Turk, for example, or Peter Peebles and his

The reader may perhaps remember a page in the text where I described Scott as riding with John and myself round the deserted halls of the ancient Riddell, and remarking how much it increased their ruin that the late baronet had kept "day-as regular as any cheese-manger in the Grass nevertheless true, that Sir Walter kept from accurate an account of his own personal expenditure as Sir John Riddell could have done of his extravagant outlay on agricultural experiments. I could, I believe, place before my reader the sum-total of sixpences that it had cost him to ride through turnpike-gates during a period of thirty years. This was, of course, an early habit mechanically adhered to : but how strange that the man who could persist, however mechanically, in noting down every shilling that he actually drew from his purse, should have allowed others to pledge his credit, year after year, upon sheafs of accommodation paper, without keeping any efficient watch — without knowing any one Christmas for how many thousands he was responsible as a printer in the Canongate.

This is sufficiently astonishing — and had this been all, the result must sooner or later have been sufficiently uncomfortable; but it must be admitted that Scott could never have foreseen a step which Constable took in the frenzied excitement of his day of pecuniary alarm. Owing to the original habitual irregularities of John Ballantyne, it had been adopted as the regular plan between that person and Constable, that, whenever the latter signed a bill for the purpose of the other's raising money among the bankers, there should, in case of his neglecting to take that bill up before it fell due, be deposited a counter-bill, signed by Ballantyne, on which Constable might, if need were, raise a sum equivalent to that for which he had pledged his credit. I am told that this is an usual enough course of procedure among speculative merchants; and it may be so. But mark the issue. The plan went on under James's management, just as John had begun it. Under his management also — such was the incredible looseness of it — the counter-bills, meant only for being sent into the market in the event of the primary bills being threatened with dishonour — these instruments of safeguard for Constable against contingent danger were allowed to lie uninquied about in Constable's desk, until they had swelled to a truly monstrous "sheaf of stamps." Constable's hour of distress darkened about him, and he rushed with these to the money-changers. And thus it came to pass, that, supposing Ballantyne and Co. to have, at the day of reckoning, obligations against them, in consequence of bill transactions with Constable, to the extent of L.25,000, they were legally responsible for L.50,000.

It is not my business to attempt any detailed history of the house of Constable. The sanguine man had, almost at the outset of his career, been "lifted off his feet," in Burns's phrase, by the sudden and unparalleled success of the Edinburgh Review. Scott's poetry and Scott's novels followed; a confined himself to those three great and triumph-taking, he must have died in possession of a prince. But his "appetite grew with what it fed on," and a of his voluminous publications, pushed on, one after in the cravenest capacity, swallowed up the gains w ever vast, he never counted, and therefore always c to himself. Finally, what he had been to the Ballat than other still more audacious "Shear-men" had be Hurst, Robinson, and Co had long been his London c ents, and he had carried on with them the same tra and counter-bill that the Cannon-gate Company dic and upon a still larger scale. They had done w not — or at least did not to any very culpable ex had carried their adventures out of the line of their ness. It was they, for example, that must needs be such vast sums in a speculation on hops! When r ened them, they availed themselves of Constable's c out stint or hunt — while he, feeling darkly that t around him, struggled and splashed for relief, no r might suffer, so he escaped! And Sir Walter Scot he suffered, was too plainly conscious of the "stro he had allowed his own imagination to play, not to eful allowance for all the apparently monstrous thi have now been narrating of Constable.

For the rest, his friends, and above all posterity, n to consider his fate without consoling reflexions. knew and loved him, must ever remember that the re of his character could not have exhibited itself to th large, had he not been exposed in his later years to of adversity. And others as well as they may fe that had not that adversity been preceded by the spur of pecuniary demands, he who began life with appetites for all its ordinary enjoyments, would n devoted himself to the rearing of that gigantic mo genius, labour, and power, which his works now. The imagination which has bequeathed so much and humanise mankind, would have developed few of ulous resources, except in the embellishment of his noma existence. The enchanted spring might have earth with the rod that bade it gush, and left us waters. We cannot understand, but we may never spect even the strangest caprices of the marvellous co of faculties to which our debt is so weighty. We r to picture to ourselves what the actual intellectual life must have been, of the author of such a series of romances. We should ask ourselves whether, filling and discharging so soberly and gracefully as he did the common functions of social man, it was not, nevertheless, impossible but that he must have passed most of his life in other worlds than ours; and we ought hardly to think it a grievous circumstance that their bright visions should have left a dazzle sometimes on the eyes which he so gently reopened upon our prosaic realities. He had, on the whole, a command over the powers of his mind—I mean, that he could control and direct his thoughts and reflexions with a readiness, firmness, and easy security of sway—beyond what I find it possible to trace in any other artist's recorded character and history; but he could not habitually fling them into the region of dreams throughout a long series of years, and yet be expected to find a corresponding satisfaction in bending them to the less agreeable considerations which the circumstances of any human being's practical lot in this world must present in abundance. The training to which he accustomed himself could not leave him as he was when he began. He must pay the penalty, as well as reap the glory of this life-long abstraction of reverie, this self-abandonment of Fairyland.

This was for him the last year of many things; among others, of Sibyl Grey and the Abbotsford Hunt. Towards the close of a hard run on his neighbour Gala's ground, he adventured to leap the Catrail—that venerable relic of the days of

“Reged wide and fair Strath-Clyde.”

He was severely bruised and shattered; and never afterwards recovered the feeling of confidence, without which there can be no pleasure in horsemanship. He often talked of this accident with a somewhat superstitious mournfulness.

CHAPTER XIV

Ruin of the House of Constable and Ballantyne. — Death Publication of Woodstock. — January 1, 1826, and cation of the Life of Napoleon. — 1827-1827.

JAMES BALLANTYNE says, in a paper dated deathbed: "I need not here enlarge upon the facility which, at the period of universal confiden-gence, our and other houses received from the bank it to say that all our appearances of prosperity those of Constable, and Hurst and Robinson, shadows, and that from the moment the banks symptoms of doubt, it might have been easy to must be the ultimate result. During weeks, and however, our house was kept in a state of very pense. The other two, I have no doubt, saw events more clearly. I must here say, that it was Walter's weaknesses to shrink too much from loss the face, and that he was apt to carry a great de-'sufficient for the day in the evil thereof.' For it was more than three weeks before the catastro-became fully convinced it was impending. If noings ever reached the length of conviction at all.
last, his fortitude was very severely tried indeed."

Mr. Ballantyne had never seen Scott's Diary, an-from the 20th November 1825 (when it began middle of January 1826, are in perfect accordan-statement. The first on the subject is in these term-is matter for a May morning, but much fitter for ber one. The general distress in the city has affec-R., Constable's great agents. Should they go, it is that Constable can stand; and such an event would great distress and perplexity on the part of J. B.
Thank God, I have enough to say more than 100.

mind. But this is no time for journalising or moralising either. Necessity is like a sourfaced cook-maid, and I a turnspit she has flogged, ere now, till he mounted his wheel. If Woodstock can be out by 25th January it will do much, — and it is possible.”

Thus he continued to labour on at his romance; from time to time arrested amidst his visions by some fresh omen of the coming reality: but after suggesting or concurring in the commercial measure that seemed feasible, immediately commanding his mind into oblivion of whatever must prevent his pursuance of the task that depended solely on himself. That down to the 14th of December he was far indeed from having brought home to himself anything like the extent of his danger, is clear enough from the step recorded in that day's entry — namely, his consenting to avail himself of the power he had retained of borrowing L.10,000 on the lands of Abbotsford, and advancing that sum to the struggling houses. Balantyne hints that in his opinion both Constable and his London agents must have foreseen more clearly the issue of the struggle; and it is certain that the only point in Constable's personal conduct which Scott afterwards considered himself entitled to condemn and resent, was connected with these last advances.

My residence had been removed to London before Sir Walter felt, or acknowledged, serious apprehensions: nor can I on this occasion quote his Diary so largely as would enable the reader to follow from day to day the fluctuations of hope, anxiety, and fear. I must limit myself to a few of what seem the most remarkable passages of that record. On the 18th of December he writes thus:—“If things go badly in London, the magic wand of the Unknown will be shivered in his grasp. He must then, faith, be termed the Too-well-known. The feast of fancy will be over with the feeling of independence. He shall no longer have the delight of waking in the morning with bright ideas in his mind, hasten to commit them to paper, and count them monthly, as the means of planting such scaurs and purchasing such wastes; replacing dreams of fiction by other prospective visions of walks by ‘Fountain heads, and pathless groves;

Places which pale passion loves.’

This cannot be; but I may work substantial husbandry, i.e. write history, and such concerns. They will not be received with the same enthusiasm; at least, I much doubt the general knowledge that an author must write for his bread, at least for his fame; his pittance, degrades him and his productions in the public eye. He falls into the second rate rank of estimation:

'While the harness sore galls, and the spurs his side goad,
The high mettle'd racer's a hack on the road.'

It is a bitter thought; but if tears start at it, let them flow. My heart clings to the place I have created — there is scarce a tree on it that does not owe its being to me. — What a life mine has been! half-educated, almost wholly neglected, or left to myself, stuffing my head with most nonsensical trash, and undervalued by most of my companions for a time; getting forward, and held a bold and a clever fellow, contrary to the opinion of all who thought me a mere dreamer; broken-hearted for two years; my heart handsomely pieced again — but the crack will remain till my dying day. Rich and poor four or five times; once on the verge of ruin, yet opened a new source of wealth almost overflowing. Now to be broken in my pitch of pride, and nearly winged (unless good news should come) because London chooses to be in an uproar, and in the tumult of bulls and bears, a poor inoffensive lion like myself is pushed to the wall. But what is to be the end of it? God knows; and so ends the catechism. Nobody in the end can lose a penny by me — that is one comfort. Men will think pride has had a fall. Let them indulge their own pride in thinking that my fall will make them higher, or seem so at least. I have the satisfaction to recollect that my prosperity has been of advantage to many, and to hope that some at least will forgive my transient wealth on account of the innocence of my intentions, and my real wish to do good to the poor. Sad hearts, too, at Darnick, and in the cottages of Abbotsford. I have half resolved never to see the place again. How could I tread my hall with such a diminished crest? — how live a poor indebted man where I was once the wealthy, the honoured? I was to have gone there on Saturday in joy and prosperity to receive my friends. My dogs will wait for me in vain. It is foolish — but the thoughts of parting from these dumb creatures have moved me more than any of the painful reflexions I have put down. Poor things! I must get them kind masters! There may be yet those who, loving me, may love my dog because it has been mine. I must end these gloomy forebodings, or I shall lose the tone of mind with which men should meet distress. I feel my dogs' feet on my knees—I hear them whining and seeking me everywhere. This is nonsense, but it is what they would do could they know how things may be.—An odd thought strikes me—When I die, will the journal of these days be taken out of the ebony cabinet at Abbotsford, and read with wonder, that the well-seeming Baronet should ever have experienced the risk of such a hitch?—or will it be found in some obscure lodging-house, where the decayed son of chivalry had hung up his scutcheon, and where one or two old friends will look grave, and whisper to each other, 'Poor gentleman'—'a well-meaning man'—'nobody's enemy but his own'—'thought his parts would never wear out'—'family poorly left'—'pity he took that foolish title.' Who can answer this question?—Poor Will Laidlaw!—Poor Tom Purdie!—such news will wring your hearts, and many a poor fellow's besides, to whom my prosperity was daily bread.

“Ballantyne behaves like himself, and sinks the prospect of his own ruin in contemplating mine. I tried to enrich him indeed, and now all—all is in the balance. He will have the Journal still, that is a comfort, for sure they cannot find a better editor. They—alas, who will they be—the *unbekanntern obern*¹ who may have to dispose of my all as they will? Some hard-eyed banker—some of these men of millions!—I have endeavoured to give vent to thoughts naturally so painful, by writing these notes—partly to keep them at bay by busying myself with the history of the French Convention. I thank God I can do both with reasonable composure. I wonder how Anne will bear such an affliction. She is passionate, but stout-hearted and courageous in important matters, though irritable in trifles. I am glad Lockhart and his wife are gone. Why? I cannot tell—but I am pleased to be left to my own regrets, without being melted by condolences, though of the most sincere and affectionate kind.—Half-past eight. I closed this book under the impression of impending ruin. I open it an hour after (thanks be to God) with the strong hope that matters will be got over safely and honourably, in a mercantile sense. Cadell came at eight to communicate a letter from Hurst and Robinson, intimating they had stood the storm. I shall always think the better of Cadell for this—not merely because 'his feet are beautiful on the mountains who brings good tidings,' but because he shewed feeling—deep feeling, poor fellow. He, who I thought had no more than his numeration-table, and who, if he had had his whole counting-house full of sensi-

¹ Unbekanntern obern—unknown rulers.

176
LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.
bility, had yet his wife and children to bestow it upon — I will not forget this, if all keeps right. I love the virtues of rough-and-round men — the others are apt to escape in salt rheum, sal-volatile, and a white pocket handkerchief.

“December 19. — Ballantyne here before breakfast. He looks on last night’s news with confidence. Constable came in and sat an hour. The old gentleman is firm as a rock. He talks of going to London next week. But I must go to work.

“December 21. — Dined with James Ballantyne, and met R. Cadell, and my old friend Mathews the comedian. The last time I saw him before, he dined with me in company with poor Sir Alexander Boswell, who was killed within a week. I never saw Sir A. more. The time before was in 1815, when Gala and I were returning from France, and passed through London, when we brought Mathews down as far as Leamington. Poor Byron made an early dinner with us at Long’s, and a most brilliant day we had of it. I never saw Byron so full of fun, frolic, wit, and whim; he was as playful as a kitten. Well, I never saw him again. So this man of mirth, with his merry meetings, has brought me no luck. I could not help thinking, in the midst of the glee, what gloom had lately been over the minds of three of the company. What a strange scene if the surge of conversation could suddenly ebb like the tide, and show us the state of people’s real minds!

‘No eyes the rocks discover Which lurk beneath the deep.’

Life could not be endured were it seen in reality. Things keep mending in London.

“December 22. — I wrote six of my close pages yesterday, which is about twenty-four pages in print. What is more I think it comes off twangingly. The air of Bonnie Dundee running in my head to-day, I wrote a few verses to it before dinner, taking the key-note from the story of Clavers leaving the Scottish Convention of Estates in 1688–9. I wonder if they are good. Ah, poor Will Erskine! thou couldst and wouldst have told me. I must consult J. B., who is as honest as was W. E. But then, though he has good taste too, there is a little of Big bow-wow about it. Can’t say what made me take a frisk so uncommon of late years as to write verses of free-will. I suppose the same impulse which makes birds sing when the storm has blown over.

“December 24. — Constable has a new scheme of publishing the works of the Author of Waverley in a superior style, at L.1, 1s. volume. He says he will answer for making L.20,000 of this, and liberally offered me any share of the profits. I have no great claim to any, as I have only to contribute the notes, which are light work; yet a few thousands coming in will be a good thing — besides the Printing Office. Constable, though valetudinary, and cross with his partner, is certainly as good a pilot in these rough seas as ever man put faith in.

“December 25. — Abbotsford. — Arrived here last night at seven. Our halls are silent compared to last year, but let us be thankful — Barbarus has segetes? Nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia. There shall be no lack of wisdom. But come — il faut cultiver notre jardin. I will accept no invitation for dinner, save one to Newton-Don, and Mertoun to-morrow, instead of Christmas-Day. On this day of general devotion, I have a particular call for gratitude.

“January 14. — An odd mysterious letter from Constable, who has gone post to London. It strikes me to be that sort of letter which I have seen men write when they are desirous that their disagreeable intelligence should be rather apprehended than expressed. I thought he had been in London a fortnight ago, disposing of property to meet this exigence, and so I think he should. Well, I must have patience. But these terrors and frights are truly annoying. . . . A letter from J. B., mentioning Constable’s journey, but without expressing much apprehension. He knows C. well, and saw him before his departure, and makes no doubt of his being able easily to extricate whatever may be entangled. I will not therefore make myself uneasy. I can help doing so surely, if I will. At least, I have given up cigars since the year began, and have now no wish to return to the habit, as it is called. I see no reason why one should not, with God’s assistance, shun noxious thoughts, which foretell evil, and cannot remedy it.”

A few days after Sir Walter penned the last-quoted paragraph, Mr. Constable made his appearance in London. I saw him immediately. Having deferred his journey imprudently, he had performed it very rapidly; and this exertion, with mental excitement, had brought on a sharp access of gout, which confined him for a couple of days to his hotel in the Adelphi — reluctanterem draconem. A more impatient spirit never boiled in swing given to the tyrannical temper of the Czar. spoke, and gesticulated like some hoary despot, acc nothing but the complete indulgence of every wish against whose sovereign authority his most trusted tributaries had suddenly revolted — open rebellion provinces — confusion in the capital — treason in I will not repeat his haughty ravings of scorn and listened to these with wonder and commiseration. such feelings mitigated when, having exhausted his vituperation against many persons of whom I had n heard him speak but as able and trusted friends, down sufficiently to answer my question as to the pra nness on which the note announcing his arrival in to nified his urgent desire to take my advice. Consta that he had already seen one of the Hurst and Rob and that the storm which had seemed to be “blown he was satisfied, only been lulled for a moment to b redoubled fury. If they went, however, he must f had determined to support them through the coming had done through the last; and he had the mean effectually, provided Sir Walter Scott would star heartily and boldly.

The first and most obvious step was to make lar copyrights; and it was not surprising that Constable s formed most extravagant notions of the marketabl the property of this nature in his possession. Every is very apt to do so. A manuscript is submitted t inspects it with coldness and suspicion; with hesita a sum for it; obtains it, and sends it to be printed hardly courage to look at the sheets as they are t but the book is at last laid on his counter, and he moment regards it with an eye of parental fondn his; he considers it in that light quite as much a author, and is likely to be at least as sorely provok thing in the shape of hostile criticism. If this be working of self-love or self-interest in such cases, w that the man who had at his disposal (to say notl innumerable minor properties) the copyrights of the l dia Britannica, a moiety of the Edinburgh Review, Scott's Poetry, the Waverley Novels, and the adva of Napoleon — who had made, besides, sundry cor novels by Scott, as yet unwritten — and who seriou his plan of the new Miscellany as in itself the sure of a gigantic fortune — what wonder that the san, able should have laid to his soul the flattering unction, that he had only to display such resources in some quarter totally above the momentary pressure of the trade, and command an advance of capital adequate to relieve him and all his allies from these unfortunate difficulties about a few paltry "sheafs of stamped paper? To be brief, he requested me to accompany him, as soon as he could get into his carriage, to the Bank of England, and support him (as a confidential friend of the Author of Waverley) in his application for a loan of from £100,000 to £200,000 on the security of the copyrights in his possession. It is needless to say that, without distinct instructions from Sir Walter, I could not take upon me to interfere in such a business as this. Constable, when I refused, became vivid with rage. After a long silence, he stamped on the ground, and swore that he could and would do alone. I left him in stern indignation.

There was another scene of the same kind a day or two afterwards, when his object was to get me to back his application to Sir Walter to borrow £20,000 in Edinburgh, and transmit it to him in London. I promised nothing but to acquaint Scott immediately with his request, and him with Scott's answer. Sir Walter, ere the message reached him, had been candidly told by Constable's own partner that any further advances would be mere folly.

Constable lingered on, fluctuating between wild hope and savage despair, until, I seriously believe, he at last hovered on the brink of insanity. When he returned to Edinburgh, he was to confront creditors whom he knew he could not pay.

Scott's Diary has — "Edinburgh, January 16. — Came through cold roads to as cold news. Hurst and Robinson have suffered a bill to come back upon Constable, which I suppose infers the ruin of both houses. We shall soon see joined with the Skenes." — Mr. Skene assures me that he appeared that evening quite in his usual spirits, conversing on whatever topic was started as easily and gaily as if there had been no impending calamity; but at parting he whispered — "Skene, I have something to speak to you about; be so good and look in on me as you go to the Parliament House to-morrow." When Skene called in Castle Street, about half-past nine o'clock next morning, he found Scott writing in his study. He rose, and said — "My friend, give me a shake of your hand — mine is that of a beggar." He then told him that Ballantyne had just been with him, and that his ruin was certain and complete; explaining, briefly, the nature of his connexion with the three houses, whose downfall must that morning be made public. He added—"Don't fancy I am going to stay at home to brood idly on what can't be helped. I was at work upon Woodstock when you came in, and I shall take up the pen the moment I get back from Court. I mean to dine with you again on Sunday, and hope then to report progress to some purpose."—When Sunday came, he reported accordingly, that in spite of all the numberless interruptions of meetings and conferences with his partner and men of business—to say nothing of his anxieties on account of his wife and daughter—he had written a chapter of his novel every intervening day. And the Diary gives the precise detail. His exertions, he there says, were suspended for the 17th and 18th; but in the course of the 19th, 20th, and 21st, he wrote 38 pages of his novel—such pages that 70 of them made "half a volume of the usual size."

Diary.— "January 17.—James Ballantyne this morning, good honest fellow, with a visage as black as the crook. He hopes no salvation; has indeed taken measures to stop. It is hard, after having fought such a battle. Have apologised for not attending the Royal Society Club, who have a gaudeamus on this day, and seemed to count much on my being the preses. My old acquaintance, Miss Elizabeth Clerk, sister of Willie, died suddenly. I cannot choose but wish it had been Sir W. S.; and yet the feeling is unmanly. I have Anne, my wife, and Charles, to look after. I felt rather sneaking as I came home from the Parliament House—felt as if I were liable monstrari digito in no very pleasant way. But this must be borne cum cæteris; and, thank God, however uncomfortable, I do not feel despondent."

The reader may be curious to see what account Ballantyne's memorandum gives of that dark announcement on the morning of Tuesday the 17th. It is as follows:— "On the evening of the 16th, I received from Mr. Cadell a distinct message putting me in possession of the truth. I called immediately in Castle Street, but found Sir Walter had gained an unconscious respite by being engaged out at dinner. It was between eight and nine next morning that I made the final communication. No doubt he was greatly stunned—but, upon the whole, he bore it with wonderful fortitude. He then asked—'Well, what is the actual step we must first take? I suppose we must do something?' I reminded him that two or three thousand pounds were due that day, so that we had only to do what we must do—refuse payment—to bring the disclosure sufficiently before the world. He took leave of me with these striking words — ‘Well, James, depend upon that, I will never forsake you.’”

In the course of that unhappy yet industrious week, Sir Walter's situation as Ballantyne's partner became universally known. Mr. Ballantyne, as an individual, had no choice but to resolve on the usual course of a commercial man unable to meet engagements: but Scott from the first moment determined to avoid, if by his utmost efforts it could be avoided, the necessity of participating in such steps. He immediately placed his whole affairs in the hands of three trustees (James Jollie, W.S., Alex. Monypenny, W.S., and John Gibson, W.S.), all men of the highest honour and of great professional experience; and declined every offer of private assistance. These were very numerous: — his eldest son and his daughter-in-law eagerly tendered the whole fortune at their disposal, and the principal banks of Edinburgh, especially the house of Sir William Forbes & Co., which was the one most deeply involved in Ballantyne's obligations, sent partners of the first consideration, who were his personal friends, to offer liberal additional accommodation. What, I think, affected him most of all, was a letter from Mr. Poole, his daughters' harp-master, offering L.500, — “probably,” says the Diary, “his all.” From London, also, he received various kind communications. Among others, one tendering an instant advance of L.30,000 — a truly munificent message, conveyed through a distinguished channel, but the source of which was never revealed to him, nor to me until some years after his death, and even then under conditions of secrecy. To all, his answer was the same. And within a few days he had reason to believe that the creditors would, as a body, assent to let things go in the course which he and his trustees suggested.

His Diary has this entry for the 24th January: — “I went to the Court for the first time to-day, and, like the man with the large nose, thought everybody was thinking of me and my mishaps. Many were, undoubtedly, and all rather regrettingly; some obviously affected. It is singular to see the difference of men's manner whilst they strive to be kind or civil in their way of addressing me. Some smiled as they wished me good-day, as if to say, ‘Think nothing about it, my lad; it is quite out of our thoughts.’ Others greeted me with the affected gravity which one sees and despises at a funeral. The best-bred — all I believe meaning equally well — just shook hands and went on. A foolish puff in the papers, calling on men and gods to assist a popular author, who having choused the public of many thousands, had not the sense to keep wealth when

If I am hard pressed, and measures need to be taken, use all means of legal defence, and subscribe myself in a petition for sequestration. It is the course one any rate, have advised a client to take. But for th in a Court of Honour, deserve to lose my spurs. No permit me, I will be their vassal for life, and mine of my imagination to find diamonds (or sell for such) to make good my engagements, not myself. And this from no reluctance to be called the which I probably am, but because I will not put power of my creditors the resources, mental or liter yet remain to me."

Jan. 26. "Gibson comes with a joyful face, announc almost all the creditors had agreed to a private trust handsome and confidential, and must warm my best get them out of the scrape. I will not doubt—to c lose. Sir William Forbes took the chair, and behav has ever done, with the generosity of ancient faith friendship. That House is more deeply concerned In what scenes have Sir William and I not borne gether! desperate and almost bloody affairs, riva drinking matches, and finally, with the kindest f both sides, somewhat separated by his retiring much bosom of his family, and I moving little beyond m fated our planets should cross, though, and that a ods most interesting for me. Down—down—thoughts."

There soon, however, emerged new difficulties. It deed have been very wonderful if all the creditors of panics, whose concerns were inextricably intertang once adopted the views of the meeting, composed eminent citizens of Edinburgh, over which Sir Will presided on the 26th of January; nor, it is proper t Scott himself aware, until some days later, of the which the debts of the two houses of Constable and ceded their assets: circumstances necessarily of th importance to the holders of Bullantyne's paper. I fact, it turned out that the obligations of the three by what is termed cross-rankings, reached respect far beyond the calculations of any of the parties. C revelation of this state of things, some of the printer felt great disinclination to close with Scott's prop there ensued a train of harassment, the detail of whi left in his Diary, but which was finally terminated according to his own original, and really most generous suggestion.

The day of calamity revealed the fact that James Ballantyne personally possessed no assets whatever. The claims against Sir Walter, as the sole really responsible partner in the printing firm, and also as an individual, settled into a sum of about L.130,000. On much heavier debts Constable & Co. paid ultimately 2s. 9d. in the pound; Hurst & Robinson about 1s. 3d. The Ballantyne firm had as yet done nothing to prevent their following the same line of conduct. It might still have allowed itself (and not James Ballantyne merely as an individual) to be declared bankrupt, and obtained a speedy discharge, like these booksellers, from all its obligations. But for Scott's being a partner, the whole affair must have been settled in a very short time. If he could have at all made up his mind to let commercial matters take the usual commercial course, the creditors of the firm would have brought into the market whatever property, literary or otherwise, Scott at the hour of failure possessed; they would have had a right to his liferent of Abbotsford, among other things—and to his reversionary interest in the estate, in case either his eldest son or his daughter-in-law should die without leaving issue, and thus void the provisions of their marriage-contract. All this being disposed of, the result would have been a dividend very far superior to what the creditors of Constable and Hurst received; and in return, the partners in the printing firm would have been left at liberty to reap for themselves the profits of their future exertions. Things were, however, complicated in consequence of the transfer of Abbotsford in January 1825. Some creditors now had serious thoughts of contesting the validity of that transaction; but a little reflexion and examination satisfied them that nothing could be gained by such an attempt. On the other hand, Sir Walter felt that he had done wrong in placing any part of his property beyond the reach of his creditors, by entering into that marriage-contract without a previous most deliberate examination into the state of his responsibilities. He must have felt in this manner, though I have no sort of doubt, that the result of such an examination in January 1825, if accompanied by an instant calling in of all counter-bills, would have been to leave him at perfect liberty to do all that he did upon that occasion. However that may have been, and whatever may have been his delicacy respecting this point, he persisted in regarding the embarrassment of his commercial firm with the feelings not of a merchant but of a gentleman. He thought that by devoting

the upshot, pay 100 last farthing he owed them. "I one or two exceptions applauded his honourable interesolutions, and partook, to a certain extent, in the ac-of their debtor. Nor had they miscalculated as to the Nor had Sir Walter calculated wrongly. He paid the of health and life, but he saved his honour and respect.

"The glory is dead, and the grief is past."¹

As to the difficulty that occurred in February extract from his Diary need here suffice. On the writes thus:—"Masterman's growling bark" con-and louder. By assigning my whole property to the behalf of creditors, with two works in progress publication, and with all my future literary labour covered I was bringing into the field a large fund of which could not exist without my exertions, and far I was entitled to a corresponding degree of indu-therefore supposed, on selling this house, and vari-property, and on receiving the price of Woodstock aloon, that they would give me leisure to make other and be content with the rents of Abbotsford, without ing a sale. But Gibson last night came in after dark gave me to understand that the Bank of Scotland saw a different point of view, and consider my contributproduce of past, present, and future labours, as comin full by their accepting of the trust deed, instead of the mode of sequestration, and placing me in the They therefore expect the trustees to commence a reduce the marriage-settlement which settles the ex-Walter; thus loading me with a most expensive as-suppose selling library and whatever else they care on. Now this seems unequal measure, and would itself totally destroy any power of fancy—of ge-deserves the name, which may remain to me. A man write in the House of Correction; and this species forte et dure which is threatened, would render it for one to help himself or others. So I told Gibson my mind made up as far back as the 24th of Jan-to suffer myself to be harder pressed than law will me. If they take the sword of the law, I must be the shield. If they are determined to consider me as an irretrievable bankrupt, they have no title to object to my settling upon the usual terms which the statute requires. They probably are of opinion, that I will be ashamed to do this by applying publicly for a sequestration. Now, my feelings are different. I am ashamed to owe debts I cannot pay; but I am not ashamed of being classed with those to whose rank I belong. The disgrace is in being an actual bankrupt, not in being made a legal one. I had like to have been too hasty in this matter. I must have a clear understanding that I am to be benefited or indulged in some way, if I bring in two such funds as those works in progress, worth certainly from L.10,000 to L.15,000."

¹ Sonnet on Scott's death, by Sir E. Brydges.

It was by and by settled that he should be left in the undisturbed possession of Abbotsford, on his pledging himself to dispose immediately of all his other property, of what kind soever, for the behoof of the creditors—to limit his personal expenses henceforth within his official salary—and, continuing his literary labour with his best diligence, to pay in all its profits until the debt should be wholly obliterated. Excepting from a single London Jew, a creditor originally of Hurst's, no practical interference with this arrangement was ever subsequently threatened. Scott, meanwhile, laboured on at his desk. In the very darkest period of his anxieties, he not only continued his Novel and his Buonaparte, but threw off his graceful and humorous, as well as sagacious and instructive reviewal of Pepys' Diary: and before that was published, he had also most effectually displayed his self-possession by a political demonstration under a new but thin disguise.

As soon as Parliament met, the recent convulsion in the commercial world became the subject of some very remarkable debates in the Lower House; and the Ministers, tracing it mainly to the rash facility of bankers in yielding credit to speculators, proposed to strike at the root of the evil by taking from private banks the privilege of circulating their own notes as money, and limiting even the Bank of England to the issue of notes of L.5 value and upwards. The Government designed that this regulation should apply to Scotland as well as England; and the northern public received the announcement with almost universal reprobation. The Scotch banks apprehended a most serious curtailment of their profits; and the merchants and traders of every class were well disposed to back them in opposing the Ministerial innovation. Scott, ever sensitively jealous as to the interference of English statesmen with the internal affairs of his native kingdom, took the part which he could have displayed again had he lived in the days of Queen Anne. His mind may have been somewhat stimulated, perhaps, by a sense of gratitude for the generous forbearance Edinburgh banking houses had just been exhibiting, and I think it need not be doubted, that the splendid loss which, as the Diary confesses, fortune had engendered, demanded some escape. The three Letters of Malachi Malactowther, which first appeared in the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, and were collected into a pamphlet by the late Mr. Black that occasion, for the first time, had justice done of a character by "the Black Humor of Lateral."

These shafts produced in Scotland a sensibility, inferior to that of the Draper's Letters, greater one, certainly, than any political tract of the British public at large since the appearance of Reflections on the French Revolution. They were most elaborately and acutely in the London Correspondent, an official organ of Lord Liverpool's Government. Walter's friend, the secretary of the Admiralty, who perhaps hazarded, in the heat of his composition, personal allusions that might as well have been directed against the King, which might have tempted a less good-natured man to a fiery rejoinder. Meeting, however, with no petition on petition came up with thousands of signatures, and the Ministers ere long found that the opposition Malachi had led the van, was, in spite of all their efforts, and Mr. Croker's essays, too strong and too rapid in its progress, to be safely encountered. The Scotch party was dropt; and Scott, having carried his point, was not at all disposed to persist in a controversy farther pursued, could scarcely, as he foresaw, for the kindly feelings that Croker and he had for each other, and also to aggravate unnecessarily, the resentment with which several members in the Cabinet had regarded his unlooked-for appearance as a hostile agitator.

When the Court of Session was to rise for the session he had to take farewell of his house in Edinburgh. Henceforth, his family were to stay always, as in the country—and a small hired lodging was taken by himself when his duty called him to be in Edinb.

day's diary he says,—“Looked out a quantity of things, to go to Abbotsford; for we are flitting, if you please. It is with a sense of pain that I leave behind a parcel of trumpery prints and little ornaments, once the pride of Lady S——'s heart, but which she sees consigned with indifference to the chance of an auction. Things that have had their day of importance with me I cannot forget, though the merest trifles. But I am glad that she, with bad health, and enough to vex her, has not the same useless mode of associating recollections with this unpleasant business.”—Again, on the 13th March—“I have hinted in these notes, that I am not entirely free from a sort of gloomy fits, with a fluttering of the heart and depression of spirits, just as if I knew not what was going to befall me. I can sometimes resist this successfully, but it is better to evade than to combat it. The hang-dog spirit may have originated in the confusion and chucking about of our old furniture, the stripping of walls of pictures, and rooms of ornaments; the leaving of a house we have so long called our home, is altogether melancholy enough. Meanwhile, to make my reculant spirit do penance, I have set to work to clear away papers and pack them for my journey. What a strange medley of thoughts such a task produces! There lie letters which made the heart throb when received, now lifeless and uninteresting—as are perhaps their writers—riddles which have been read—schemes which time has destroyed or brought to maturity—memorials of friendships and enmities which are now alike faded. Thus does the ring of Saturn consume itself. To-day annihilates yesterday, as the old tyrant swallowed his children, and the snake its tail. But I must say to my journal as poor Byron did to Moore—‘D—n it, Tom, don't be poetical.’”

“March 14.—J. B. called this morning to take leave, and receive directions about proofs, &c. Talks of the uproar about Malachi; but I am tired of Malachi—the humour is off, and I have said what I wanted to say, and put the people of Scotland on their guard, as well as ministers, if they like to be warned. They are gradually destroying what remains of nationality, and making the country tabula rasa for doctrines of bold innovation. Their loosening and grinding down all those peculiarities which distinguished us as Scotsmen, will throw the country into a state in which it will be universally turned to democracy, and instead of canny Saunders, they will have a very dangerous North-British neighbourhood. Some lawyer expressed to Lord Klibank an opinion, that at the Union the English law should have been extended to Scotland. 'I cannot say how that might have answered its purpose,' said Lord Patrick, who was never nonsuited of an answer, 'but it would scarce have suited your purpose; this time the *Aberdeen Advocates*¹ would have possessed themselves of all the business in Westminster Hall.'

"March 15. — This morning I leave No. 39 Curzon Street for the last time. 'The cabin was convenient,' and that made it agreeable to me. I never reckoned upon a change of this particular so long as I held an office in the Commission. In all my former changes of residence it was to be better — this is retrograding. I leave this house and I cease to be an Edinburgh citizen, in the sense of a proprietor, which my father and I have been for some years at least. So farewell, poor 39, and may you never be worse people than those who now leave you. Not that the Lares all at once, Lady S. and Anne remain till I do. As for me, I go, as aforesaid, this morning.

'Ha til mi tulidh'! — " 2

Sir Walter's Diary begins to be clouded with species of distress than mere loss of wealth could beget in spirit. His darling grandson is sinking at a distance under incurable disease. At home the misfortune which his manhood struggled with stern energy, and countered by his affectionate wife under the disadvised and enfeebled health; and it seems but too evident that the pain and mortification had a great share in hurrying his end to a fatal end. Nevertheless, all his afflictions seem to have interrupted for more than a day or two his course of labour. With rare exceptions he appears through this trying period, to have finished his daily thirty printed pages of Woodstock — until that is completed; or, if he paused in it, he gave a similar time to some minor production; such as his paper on the subject of Kemble. He also corresponded much as usual, standing all he says about indolence on that score, and absent friends; and I need scarcely add, that his Sheriff claimed many hours every week. The picture of industry and industry which this portion of his Journal is certainly as remarkable as the boldest imagination could have conceived.

¹ The Solicitors of Aberdeen enjoy somehow the title of Advocates.

² I return no more.

“Abbotsford, March 17. — A letter from Lockhart. My worst augury is verified;—the medical people think poor Johnnie is losing strength; he is gone with his mother to Brighton. The bitterness of this probably impending calamity is extreme. The child was almost too good for this world;—beautiful in features; and though spoiled by every one, having one of the sweetest tempers as well as the quickest intellect I ever saw; a sense of humour quite extraordinary in a child, and, owing to the general notice which was taken of him, a great deal more information than suited his years. The poor dear love had so often a slow fever, that when it pressed its little lips to mine, I always foreboded to my own heart what all I fear are now aware of.

“March 18. — Slept indifferently, and under the influence of Queen Mab, seldom auspicious to me. Dreamed of reading the tale of the Prince of the Black Marble Islands to Little Johnnie, extended on a paralytic chair, and yet telling all his pretty stories about Ha-Papa, as he calls me, and Chiefswood — and waked to think I should see the little darling no more or see him as a thing that had better never have existed. Oh misery! misery! that the best I can wish for him is early death, with all the wretchedness to his parents that is likely to ensue!

“March 19. — Lady S., the faithful and true companion of my fortunes, good and bad, for so many years, has, but with difficulty, been prevailed on to see Dr. Abercrombie, and his opinion is far from favourable. Her asthmatic complaints are fast terminating in hydropsy, as I have long suspected; yet the announcement of the truth is overwhelming. They are to stay a little longer in town to try the effects of a new medicine. On Wednesday, they propose to return hither — a new affliction, where there was enough before; yet her constitution is so good, that if she will be guarded by advice, things may be yet ameliorated. God grant it! for really these misfortunes come too close upon each other.

“March 28. — We have now been in solitude for some time — myself nearly totally so, excepting at meals. One is tempted to ask himself, knocking at the door of his own heart, Do you love this extreme loneliness? I can answer conscientiously I do. The love of solitude was with me a passion of early youth; when in my teens, I used to fly from company to indulge in visions and airy castles of my own, the disposal of the present world, which I have often seen, when I awakening with other passions, there is no from which I have, however, at times with have been always a great deal to do. I ha least satisfied, and which it be one or two p strong intellect, or whose spirit and good hum

I wish neither to see the high, the low, nor the of society. This is a feeling without the least thropy, which I always consider as a kind of shocking description. If God be as with the we may sincerely endure each other. If th always have, and always will endeavour to be me, at least to show willingness to please. I had rather live alone, and I wish my appointm rent otherwise, did not require my going to I this must be, and in my little lodging I shall be

" April 1. — Fix uno die dice omnia. — Re nooner, studied and wrote till breakfast, with quarter before ten. Lady Scott seldom able to or one. Then I write or study again till one today I drove to Huntley Barn, and walked the hundred and one pleasing paths which I hav the woods I have planted. — now chatting wit who carries my plaid and speaks when he pla stories of hits and misses in shooting twent sometimes chewing the end of sweet and bit sometimes attending to the humours of two cu riers of the Dandie Dinmont breed, together w hound puppy which Glengarry has given me to This brings me down to the very moment I de is prophetic. I shall feel drowsy when this and perhaps sleep until Dalgleish brings the d Then I shall have a chat with Lady S. and An or soup, a slice of plain meat — and man's ch Dr. Johnson's estimation, is briefly despatched with my family, and half an hour's coquetting tumbler of weak whisky and water, and a nev on to tea, which sometimes consumes anothe chat; then write and read in my own room til night; a little bread, and then a glass of por and this, very rarely varied by a visit from s tenor of my daily life — and a very pleasant o it not for apprehensions about Lady S. and fear —

“April 3. — I have the extraordinary and gratifying news that Woodstock is sold for £8228; all ready money — a matchless sale for less than three months’ work.” [The reader will understand that, the novel being sold for the behoof of J. B. and Co.’s creditors, this sum includes the cost of printing the first edition, as well as paper.] “If Napoleon does as well, or near it, it will put the trust affairs in high flourish. Four or five years of leisure and industry would, with such success, amply replace my losses. I have a curious fancy; I will go set two or three acorns, and judge by their success in growing whether I shall succeed in clearing my way or not. I have a little toothache keeps me from working much to-day — besides I sent off copy for Napoleon.”

The price received for Woodstock shews what eager competition had been called forth among the booksellers, when, after the lapse of several years, Constable’s monopoly of Sir Walter’s novels was abolished by their common calamity. The interest excited, not only in Scotland and England, but all over civilized Europe, by the news of Scott’s misfortunes, must also have had its influence in quickening this commercial rivalry. The reader need hardly be told, that the first meeting of James Ballantyne & Company’s creditors witnessed the transformation, a month before darkly prophesied, of the “Great Unknown” into the “Too-well-known.” Even for those who had long ceased to entertain any doubt as to the main source at least of the Waverley romances, there would have been something stirring in the first confession of the author; but it in fact included the avowal, that he had stood alone in the work of creation; and when the mighty claim came in the same breath with the announcement of personal ruin, the effect on the community of Edinburgh was electrical. It is, in my opinion, not the least striking feature in his Diary, that it contains no allusion (save the ominous one of 18th December) to this long-withheld revelation. He notes his painful anticipation of returning to the Parliament House — monstrari digito — as an insolvent. It does not seem even to have occurred to him, that when he appeared there the morning after his creditors had heard his confession, there could not be many men in the place but must gaze on his familiar features with a mixture of curiosity, admiration, and sympathy, of which a hero in the moment of victory might have been proud — which might have swelled the heart of a martyr as he was bound to the stake. The universal feeling was, I believe, much what the late amiable and accomplished Earl of Dudley expressed to Mr. Morrill when these news reached them at Brighton. — “Scott ruined!” said he, “the author of Waverley ruined! Good God! let every man to whom he has given months of delight give him a sixpence, and he will rise to-morrow morning richer than Rothschild!”

152

It is no wonder that the book, which it was known he had been writing during this crisis of distress, should have been expected with solicitude. Shall we find him, asked thousands, to have been master truly of his genius in the moment of this ordeal? Shall we trace anything of his own experiences in the construction of his imaginary personages and events? — I know not how others interpreted various passages in Woodstock, but there were not a few that carried deep meaning for such of Scott's own friends as were acquainted with, not his pecuniary misfortune alone, but the drooping health of his wife, and the consolation afforded him by the dutiful devotion of his daughter Anne, in whose character and demeanour a change had occurred exactly similar to that painted in poor Alice Lee: “A light joyous air, with something of a humorous expression, which seemed to be looking for amusement, had vanished before the touch of affliction, and a calm melancholy supplied its place, which seemed on the watch to administer comfort to others.” In several mottoes, and other scraps of verse, the curious reader will find similar traces of the facts and feelings recorded in the author's Diary. As to the novel itself, though none can pretend to class it in the very highest rank of his works, since we feel throughout the effects of the great fundamental error, likened by a contemporary critic to that of the writer who should lay his scene at Rome immediately after the battle of Philippi, and introduce Brutus as the survivor in that conflict, and Cicero as his companion in victory; yet even this censor is forced to allow that Woodstock displays certain excellences, not exemplified in all the author's fictions, and which attest, more remarkably than any others could have done, the complete self-possession of the mind when composing it. The success of the book was great: large as the price was, its publishers had no reason to repent their bargain; and of course the rapid receipt of such a sum as L.8000, the product of hardly three months' labour, highly gratified the body of creditors, whose debtor had devoted to them whatever labour his health should henceforth permit him to perform.

His Diary shews that he very soon began another work of

ANNE SCOTT.

Second daughter of Sir Walter Scott.

falling like the Trojan harp, may have some the praise of one's Maker. — Even so the dis-taw members on horseback, with their plathem — the father heading the procession :
river, and pointing out the ford by which he carried on the last long road — none of the sin discord with the general tone of the men just accessories, and no more, this is affecting “ April 24. — Constable is sorely broken in ‘ Poor fool and knave, I have one part in That’s yours yet for a thief.’

His conduct has not been what I deserved : believe that, walking blindfold himself, he malice pœpense. It is hard to think so at contrary be demonstrated. To nourish angry a man whom I really liked, would be to lay own heart.

“ May 6. — The same scene of hopeless cal-ing anxiety. — Still welcoming me with a smile she is better. — I fear the disease is too deep the principles of life. — I am a tolerable stoic myself in vain.

‘ Are these things, then, necessities?’

‘ Then let us meet them like necessi-

“ May 11. — Charlotte was unable to take in a sound sleep, after a very indifferent night as well. — Emotion might have hurt her; and have expressed would have been worth the rseen, for two years and more, that this met not be far distant. — I have seen plainly, w-months, that recovery was hopeless. — And ye companion of twenty-nine years, when so ve-not, could not foresee. — It withers my heart to recollect that I can hardly hope again t-and counsel from that ear to which all migfided.”

His niece Miss Anne Scott (daughter of Th-arrived before he was thus forced to quit the alone to his new lodgings in Edinburgh :
Brown’s Lodgings, North St. David Street. —

these dull walls. Methinks you look as if you were looking as bright on the banks of the Tweed; but look where you will, Sir Sun, you look upon sorrow and suffering. — Hogg was here yesterday in danger, from having obtained an accommodation of L.100 from James Ballantyne, which he is now obliged to repay. I am unable to help the poor fellow, being obliged to borrow myself. But I long ago remonstrated against the transaction at all, and gave him L.50 out of my pocket to avoid granting the accommodation, — but it did no good.

“May 15. — Received the melancholy intelligence that all is over at Abbotsford.

“Abbotsford, May 16. — She died at nine in the morning, after being very ill for two days — easy at last. I arrived here late last night. Anne is worn out, and has had hysterics, which returned on my arrival. Her broken accents were like those of a child — the language as well as the tones broken, but in the most gentle voice of submission. ‘Poor mamma — never return again — gone for ever — a better place.’ Then, when she came to herself, she spoke with sense, freedom, and strength of mind, till her weakness returned. It would have been inexpressibly moving to me as a stranger — what was it then to the father and the husband? For myself, I scarce know how I feel — sometimes as firm as the Bass Rock, sometimes as weak as the water that breaks on it. I am as alert at thinking and deciding as I ever was in my life. Yet, when I contrast what this place now is, with what it has been not long since, I think my heart will break. Lonely, aged, deprived of my family — all but poor Anne; an impoverished, an embarrassed man, deprived of the sharer of my thoughts and counsels, who could always talk down my sense of the calamitous apprehensions which break the heart that must bear them alone. — Even her foibles were of service to me, by giving me things to think of beyond my weary self-reflections.

“I have seen her. The figure I beheld is, and is not, my Charlotte — my thirty years’ companion. There is the same symmetry of form, though those limbs are rigid which were once so gracefully elastic — but that yellow masque, with pinched features, which seems to mock life rather than emulate it, — can it be the face that was once so full of lively expression? I will not look on it again. Anne thinks her little changed, because the latest idea she had formed of her mother is as she appeared under circumstances of extreme pain — mine go back to a period of comparative ease. If I write long in this way,

I shall write down my resolution, which I should rather write up if I could. I wonder how I shall do with the large portion of thoughts which were hers for thirty years. I suspect they will be hers yet, for a long time at least. But I will not blaze cambric and crape in the public eye like a disconsolate widower, that most affected of all characters.

“May 18. — Another day, and a bright one to the external world, again opens on us; the air soft, and the flowers smiling, and the leaves glittering. They cannot refresh her to whom mild weather was a natural enjoyment. Cerements of lead and of wood already hold her — cold earth must have her soon. But it is not my Charlotte — it is not the bride of my youth, the mother of my children, that will be laid among the ruins of Dryburgh, which we have so often visited in gaiety and pastime — No! no! She is sentient and conscious of my emotions somewhere — somehow: where we cannot tell; how we cannot tell; yet would I not at this moment renounce the mysterious yet certain hope that I shall see her in a better world, for all that this world can give me. The necessity of this separation — that necessity which rendered it even a relief, — that and patience must be my comfort. I do not experience those paroxysms of grief which others do on the same occasion. I can exert myself, and speak even cheerfully with the poor girls. But alone, or if anything touches me, — the choking sensation. I have been to her room: there was no voice in it — no stirring; the pressure of the coffin was visible on the bed, but it had been removed elsewhere; all was neat, as she loved it, but all was calm — calm as death. I remembered the last sight of her; she raised herself in bed, and tried to turn her eyes after me, and said, with a sort of smile, ‘You all have such melancholy faces.’ These were the last words I ever heard her utter, and I hurried away, for she did not seem quite conscious of what she said; when I returned, immediately departing, she was in a deep sleep. It is deeper now. This was but seven days since.

“They are arranging the chamber of death — that which was long the apartment of connubial happiness, and of whose arrangements (better than in richer houses) she was so proud. They are treading fast and thick. For weeks you could have heard a foot-fall. Oh, my God!

“May 19. — Anne, poor love, is ill with her exertions and agitation — cannot walk — and is still hysterical, though less so. We speak freely of her whom we have lost, and mix her name with our ordinary conversation. This is the rule of nature. All primitive people speak of their dead, and I think virtuously and wisely. The idea of blotting the names of those who are gone out of the language and familiar discourse of those to whom they were dearest, is one of the rules of ultra-civilisation, which in so many instances strangle natural feeling by way of avoiding a painful sensation. The Highlanders speak of their dead children as freely as of their living members—how poor Colin or Robert would have acted in such or such a situation. It is a generous and manly tone of feeling; and so far as it may be adopted without affectation or contradicting the general habits of society, I reckon on observing it.

“May 20. — To-night, I trust, will bring Charles or Lockhart, or both. Sophia’s baby was christened on Sunday 14th May, at Brighton, by the name of Walter Scott. May God give him life and health to wear it with credit to himself and those belonging to him! Melancholy to think that the next morning after this ceremony deprived him of so near a relation!

“May 22. — Lockhart doubtful if Sophia’s health will let him be here. Charles arrived last night, much affected, of course. Anne had a return of her fainting-fits on seeing him, and again upon seeing Mr. Ramsay,¹ the gentleman who performs the service. I heard him do so with the utmost propriety for my late friend, Lady Alvanley,² the arrangement of whose funeral devolved upon me. How little I could guess when, where, and with respect to whom, I should next hear those solemn words. Well, I am not apt to shrink from that which is my duty, merely because it is painful; but I wish this day over. A kind of cloud of stupidity hangs about me, as if all were unreal that men seem to be doing and talking about—

“May 23. — About an hour before the mournful ceremony of yesterday, Walter arrived, having travelled express from Ireland on receiving the news. He was much affected, poor fellow,—and no wonder. Poor Charlotte nursed him, and perhaps for that reason she was over partial to him. The whole scene floats as a sort of dream before me—the beautiful day, the grey ruins covered and hidden among clouds of foliage and flourish, where the grave, even in the lap of beauty, lay lurking, and gaped for its prey. Then the grave looks, the hasty important bustle of men with spades and mattocks—the train of carriages—the coffin containing the creature that was so long the dearest on earth to me, and whom I was to consign to

¹ The Rev. E. B. Ramsay, now Dean of Edinburgh.

² Lady Alvanley died at Edinburgh, in January 1825.

It seems till now that this could not be really so, and duty to God and to my children must be. Poor Anne has had longer fits since our arrival than before, but yesterday was the crisis. She prayed in a most solemn manner. But her strength ran through. She fainted before the service was

"May 24. Slept wretchedly, or rather we all night, and was very sick and bilious in consequence unable to hold up my head with pain. A visit with my sons, did me a deal of good; for indeed is the greatest support the world can afford me. All of everything are so just and honourable, kind, generous, and affectionate to me, that I must thank God for sparing them to me, and continuing to the world for their sakes, if not for my own.

"May 25. — I had sound sleep to-night, and not a word or nothing of the strange dreamy feeling which for some days feel like one bewildered in a mist or snow has disguised those features of which are best known to him. This evening being anxious to return to his wife as well as to

"May 26. — A rough morning makes me go to George's Channel, which Walter must cross to-morrow to get to Athlone. His absence is a great circle, especially I think to his sister Anne, to whom I invariably much kindness. But indeed they are all in exception each towards the other, and in no way shown themselves a family of love. I will

Monday and resume my labours. Fearing now of them they cannot go against the general temper of the world in other respects the exertion, as far as I am concerned, do me good; besides I must re-establish my fortitude of the children, and of my own character. I will not to indulge the disabling and discouraging thoughts on me. Were an enemy coming upon my head I should do my best to fight, although oppressed in spirit. A similar despondency prevent me from mental exertion shall not, by Heaven! This day and to-morrow shall be the currency of the ideas which have of late occurred, and with Monday they shall be mingled at length in my thoughts and cares. —

"Abbotsford, Saturday, June 17 — Left Ed

DRYBURGH ABBEY, FROM THE EAST.

after Parliament-House. My two girls met me at Torsonce, which was a pleasant surprise, and we returned in the sociable all together. Found everything right and well at Abbotsford under the new regime. I again took possession of the family bed-room, and my widowed couch. This was a sore trial, but it was necessary not to blink such a resolution. Indeed, I did not like to have it thought that there is any way in which I can be beaten.

“September 12. — I begin to fear Nap. will swell to seven volumes. — As I slept for a few minutes in my chair, to which I am more addicted than I could wish, I heard, as I thought, my poor wife call me by the familiar name of fondness which she gave me. My recollections on waking were melancholy enough. These be

‘The airy tongues that syllable men’s names.’

“September 13. — Wrote my task in the morning, and thereafter had a letter from the sage Privy-counsellor —. He proposes to me that I shall propose to the — of —, and offers his own right honourable intervention to bring so beautiful a business to bear. I am struck dumb — absolutely mute and speechless — and how to prevent him making me farther a fool is not easy, for he has left me no time to assure him of the absurdity of what he proposes; and if he should ever hint at such a piece of d—d impertinence, what must the lady think of my conceit or of my feelings! I will write to his present quarters, however, that he may, if possible, have warning not to continue this absurdity.”¹

Lady Scott had not been quite four months dead, and the entry of the preceding day shews how extremely ill-timed was this communication, from a gentleman with whom Sir Walter had never had any intimacy. Nor will the next entry that I extract diminish this impression. In October he resolved to make a journey to London and Paris, in both which capitals he had reason to expect important material would be submitted to him as the biographer of Napoleon. At starting he writes: — “October 11. — We are ingenious self-tormentors. This journey annoys me more than anything of the kind in my life. My wife’s figure seems to stand before me, and her voice is in my ears — ‘Scott, do not go.’ It half frightens me. Strange throbbing at my heart, and a disposition to be very sick. It is just the effect of so many feelings which had been lulled asleep by the uniformity of my life, but which awaken on any new subject of agitation. Poor, poor Charlotte!! I cannot doubt whether I get incapable of arranging my papers too. I write out for half an hour. God relieve me!"

¹ This was not the only proposition of the kind that reached him during his widowhood. In the present case there was very high rank and an ample fortune.

His expedition was a very seasonable relief; nor was he disappointed as to its direct object. By the kindness of Earl Bathurst, Colonial Secretary of State, and the Under-secretary, Mr. Wilmot Horton and Mr. Robert Hay (who were all good friends of his), he had access to many unpublished documents preserved in Downing Street, and copious extracts were prepared under his directions. The Duke of Wellington was good enough to give him a MS. commentary of his own on the Russian campaign, and many hours of confidential conversation respecting other parts of Buonaparte's military history. At Paris he was treated with equal kindness by Marshal Macdonald with whom he had become acquainted a few years before, when the Marshal visited his paternal kindred in Scotland; among others, Sir Walter's constant friend, Hector M'Donald the younger. In both cities he was received with the most marked attention. The deep and respectful sympathy with which his misfortunes, and gallant behaviour under them, had been regarded by all classes of men at home and abroad, was brought home to his perception in a way not to be mistaken. Finally he had the satisfaction of settling his son Charles's destiny, the King personally undertaking that as soon as he had graduated at Oxford, he should be launched in the diplomatic service. I must confine myself to a very few extracts from the diary — which will illustrate, among other things, the manner of his society on this occasion.

"Windsor, October 20. — Commanded down to pass a day at Windsor. The Lodge in the Forest, though ridiculed by the courtiers, seems to be no bad specimen of a royal retirement and is delightfully situated. A kind of cottage, too large perhaps for the style, but yet so managed that in the walks you can only see parts of it at once, and these well composed and grouped with the immense trees. His Majesty received me with the same mixture of kindness and courtesy which has always distinguished his conduct towards me. There was no company besides the royal retinue — Lady Conyngham — her daughter — and two or three other ladies. After we left table, there was excellent music by the royal band, who lay ambushed in a green-house adjoining the apartment. The King made me sit beside him, and talk a great deal — too much perhaps — for I has the art of raising one's spirits, and making you forget the retenue which is prudent everywhere, especially at court. But he converses himself with so much ease and elegance, that you lose thoughts of the prince in admiring the well-bred and accomplished gentleman. He is in many respects the model of a British Monarch — has little inclination to try experiments on government otherwise than through his Ministers — sincerely, I believe, desires the good of his subjects — is kind towards the distressed, and moves and speaks 'every inch a king.' I am sure such a man is fitter for us than one who would long to head armies, or be perpetually intermeddling with la grande politique. A sort of reserve, which creeps on him daily, and prevents his going to places of public resort, is a disadvantage, and prevents his being so generally popular as is earnestly to be desired. This, I think, was much increased by the behaviour of the rabble in the brutal insanity of the Queen's trial, when John Bull, meaning the best in the world, made such a beastly figure. — Pall-Mall, October 21. — Walked in the morning with Sir William Knighton, and had much confidential chat, not fit to be here set down, in case of accidents. Returned to a hasty dinner at Lockhart's, and then hurried away to see honest Dan Terry's theatre, called the Adelphi. The heat was dreadful, and Anne so unwell that she was obliged to be carried into Terry's house, — a curious dwelling no larger than a squirrel's cage, which he has contrived to squeeze out of the vacant space of the theatre, and which is accessible by a most complicated combination of staircases and small passages. There we had rare good porter and oysters after the play."

Sir Walter returned from Paris about the middle of the ensuing month — and his progress from London homewards is indicated in the following entries: — "Oxford, November 21. — Breakfasted with Charles in his chambers at Brazen-nose, where he had everything very neat. How pleasant it is for a father to sit at his child's board! It is like the aged man reclining under the shadow of the oak which he has planted. My poor plant has some storms to undergo, but were this expedition conducive to no more than his entrance into life under suitable auspices, I should consider the toil and the expense well bestowed. — Nov. 23. — Slept at Macclesfield. As we came in between ten and eleven, the people of the inn expressed surprise at our travelling so late, as the general distress of the manufacturers has rendered many of the lower classes desperately outrageous. — Nov. 24. Breakfasted at Manchester; — pressed on — and by dint of exertion reached Kendal to sleep; thus getting out of the region of the stern, sullen, unwashed artificers, whom you see lounging sulkily along the streets in Lancashire. God's justice is requiting, and will yet farther requite, those who have blown up this country into a state of unsubstantial opulence, at the expense of the health and morals of the lower classes.

Abbotsford, November 26. — Naturally reflected how much expense has increased since I first travelled. My uncle's servant, during the jaunts we made together while I was a boy, used to have his option of a shilling per diem for board wages, and usually preferred it to having his own board. A servant now-a-days, to be comfortable on the road, does not have 1*l.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* board wages, which before 1790 would have maintained his master. But if this be pitiful, it is still more so to feel the alteration in my own temper. When young, on returning from such a trip as I have just had, my mind would have loved to dwell on all I had seen that was rich and rare, or have been placing, perhaps, in order, the various additions with which I had supplied my stock of information. — and now, like a stupid boy blundering over an arithmetical question half obliterated on his slate, I go stumbling on upon the audit of pounds, shillings, and pence. Well — the skirmish has cost me 1,200*l.* I wished for information — and I have had to pay for it.

On proceeding to Edinburgh to resume his official duties, Sir Walter established himself in a furnished house in Walker Street, it being impossible for him to leave his daughter alone in the country, and the aspect of his affairs being so much anchored that he did not think it necessary to carry the young lady to such a place as Mrs. Brown's lodgings. During the six ensuing months, however, he led much the same life of toil and seclusion from company which that of Abbotsford had been during the preceding autumn — very rarely dining abroad, except with one or two intimate friends, en famille — still more rarely receiving even a single guest at home — all the while, in fact, he suffered great pain (enough to have disturbed effectually any other man's labours, whether official or literary) from successive attacks of rheumatism, which seems to have been fixed on him by the wet sheets of one of his French nuns, and his Diary contains, besides, various indications that his constitution was already shaking under the fatigue to which he had subjected it. Formerly, however great the quantity of work he read of new books, or for mere amusement, was done by snatches in the course of his meals; and to walk, when he could walk at all, to the Parliament House and back again, through the Prince's Street Gardens, was his only exercise and his only relaxation. Every ailment, of whatever sort, ended in aggravating his lameness; and, perhaps, the severest test his philosophy encountered was the feeling of bodily helplessness that from week to week crept upon him. The winter, to make bad worse, was a very cold and stormy one. The growing sluggishness of his blood shewed itself in chilblains, not only on the feet but the fingers, and his handwriting becomes more and more cramped and confused.

He spent a few days at Abbotsford at Christmas, and several weeks during the spring vacation; but the frequent Saturday excursions were now out of the question — if for no other reason, on account of the quantity of books which he must have by him while working at his Napoleon. He says on the 30th of December — “Wrote hard. Last day of an eventful year; much evil — and some good, but especially the courage to endure what Fortune sends, without becoming a pipe for her fingers. It is not the last day of the year; but to-morrow being Sunday, we hold our festival to-day. The Fergussons came, and we had the usual appliances of mirth and good cheer. Yet our party, like the chariot-wheels of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, dragged heavily. — It must be allowed that the regular recurrence of annual festivals among the same individuals has, as life advances, something in it that is melancholy. We meet like the survivors of some perilous expedition wounded and weakened ourselves, and looking through diminished ranks to think of those who are no more. Or they are like the feasts of the Caribs, in which they held that the pale and speechless phantoms of the deceased appeared and mingled with the living. Yet where shall we fly from vain repining — or why should we give up the comfort of seeing our friends because they can no longer be to us, or we to them, what we once were to each other?”

On again quitting Tweedside after the spring holidays (1827) the Diary has: — “I never could help admiring the concatenation between Ahithopel's setting his house in order and hanging himself.¹ The one seems to follow the other as a matter of course. But what frightens and disgusts me is those fearful letters from those who have been long dead, to those who linger on their wayfare through the valley of tears. Those fine lines of Spencer came into my head —

‘The shade of youthful Hope is there,
That lingered long, and latest died ;
Ambition all dissolved to air,
With phantom Honours by his side.
What empty shadows glimmer nigh ?
They once were Friendship, Truth, and Love !
Oh ! die to thought, to memory die,
Since lifeless to my heart ye prove.’¹

Ay, and can I forget the author — the frightful moral of his own vision ? What is this world ? — a dream within a dream : as we grow older, each step is an awakening. The youth awakes, as he thinks, from childhood — the full-grown man despises the pursuits of youth as visionary — the old man looks on manhood as a feverish dream. The grave the last sleep ? No ; it is the last and final awakening.

“ Edinburgh, May 15. — It is impossible not to compare this return to Edinburgh with others in more happy times. But we should rather recollect under what distress of mind I took up my lodgings in Mrs. Brown’s last summer. — Went to Court and resumed old habits. Heard the true history of ———.² Imagination renders us liable to be the victims of occasional low spirits. All belonging to this gifted, as it is called, but often unhappy class, must have felt, that but for the dictates of religion, or the natural recoil of the mind from the idea of dissolution, there have been times when they would have been willing to throw away life as a child does a broken toy. I am sure I know one who has often felt so. O God ! what are we ? — Lords of nature ? — Why, a tile drops from a house-top, which an elephant would not feel more than the fall of a sheet of pasteboard, and there lies his lordship. Or something of inconceivably minute origin — the pressure of a bone, or the inflammation of a particle of the brain — takes place, and the emblem of the Deity destroys himself or some one else. We hold our health and our reason on terms slighter than one would desire, were it in their choice, to hold an Irish cabin.”

These are melancholy entries. Most of those from which they have been selected begin with R. for Rheumatism, or R. R. for Rheumatism redoubled, and then mark the number of leaves sent to Ballantyne — the proof sheets corrected for press — or the calculations on which he reluctantly made up his mind to extend the Life of Buonaparte from six to seven, from seven to eight, and finally from eight to nine thick and closely-printed volumes.

¹ “ Poems by the late Honourable W. R. Spencer,” p. 45.

² Sir Walter had this morning heard of the suicide of a man of warm imagination, to whom, at an earlier period, he was much attached.

During the early months of 1827, however, he executed various minor tracts also: for the Quarterly Review, an article on "Mackenzie's Life and Works of John Home, author of Douglas," which is, in fact, a rich chapter of Scott's own early reminiscences, and gives many interesting sketches of the literary society of Scotland in the age of which Mackenzie was the last honoured relic; and for the Foreign Quarterly Review, then newly started under the editorship of Mr. R. P. Gillies, an ingenious and elaborate paper on the writings of the German novelist Hoffman. This article, it is proper to observe, was a benefaction to Mr. Gillies, whose pecuniary affairs rendered such assistance very desirable. Scott's generosity in this matter — for it was exactly giving a poor brother author L.100 at the expense of considerable time and drudgery to himself — I think it necessary to mention; the date of the exertion requires it of me. But such, in fact, had been in numberless instances his method of serving literary persons who had little or no claim on him, except that they were of that class. I have not conceived it delicate to specify many things of this kind; but I am at liberty to state, that when he wrote his first article for the Encyclopædia Supplement, and the editor of that work, Mr. Marvey Napier (a Whig in politics, and with whom he had hardly any personal acquaintance), brought him L.100 as his remuneration, Sir Walter said — "Now tell me frankly, if I don't take this money, does it go into your pocket or your publisher's?" for it is impossible for me to accept a penny of it from a literary brother." Mr. Napier assured him that the arrangements of the work were such, that the editor had nothing to do with the fund destined for contributions. Scott then pocketed his due, with the observation, that "he had trees to plant, and no conscience as to the purse of his fat friend" — to wit, Constable.

At this period, the Edinburgh Diary very seldom mentions anything that could be called a dinner-party. Skene he often styles "his good Samaritan:" he was now the usual companion of whatever walks he was willing or able to indulge in. He and his daughter partook generally once in every week the family meal of Mr. and Mrs. Skene; and they did the like occasionally with a few other old friends, chiefly those of the

Clerk's table. When an exception occurs, it is easy to see that the scene of social gaiety was doubly grateful from its rarity. Thus one entry, referring to a party at Mr. J. A. Murray's,¹ says—"met Jeffrey, Cockburn, Rutherford, and others of that file. Very pleasant—capital good cheer and excellent wine—much laugh and fun. I do not know how it is, but when I am out with a party of my Opposition friends, the day is often merrier than when with our own set. Is it because they are cleverer? Jeffrey and Harry Cockburn are to be sure very extraordinary men; yet it is not owing to that entirely. I believe both parties meet with the feeling of something like novelty—we have not worn out our jests in daily contact. There is also a disposition on such occasions to be courteous, and of course to be pleased." Another evening, spent in Rose Court, seems to have given him especial delight. He says—"I wrote hard till dressing time, when I went to Will Clerk's to dinner. As a bachelor, and keeping a small establishment, he does not do these things often, but they are proportionally pleasant when they come round. He had trusted Sir Adam to bespeak his dinner, who did it con amore, so we had excellent cheer, and the wines were various and capital. As I before hinted, it is not every day that M'Nab mounts on horseback,² and so our landlord had a little of that solicitude that the party should go off well, which is very flattering to the guests. We had a very pleasant evening. The Chief-Commissioner was there, Admiral Adam, J. A. Murray, Tom Thomson, &c. &c.,—Sir Adam predominating at the head, and dancing what he calls his merry-andrada in great style. In short, we really laughed, and real laughter is a thing as rare as real tears. I must say, too, there was a heart—a kindly feeling prevailed over the party. Can London give such a dinner?—it may, but I never saw one—they are too cold and critical to be easily pleased.—I hope the Bannatyne Club will be really useful and creditable. Thomson is superintending a capital edition of Sir James Melville's Memoirs. It is brave to see how he wags his Scots tongue, and what a difference there is in the form and firmness of the language, compared to the mincing English edition in which he has hitherto been alone known."

¹ He became Lord Advocate, and afterwards a Judge of the Court of Session, by the title of Lord Murray.

² That singular personage, the late M'Nab of that ilk, spent his life almost entirely in a district where a boat was the usual conveyance. I suspect, however, that there is an allusion to some particular anecdote which I have not recovered.

No wonder that it should be a sweet relief from Buonaparte and Blücher to see M'Nab on horseback, and Sir Adam Ferguson in his merry andradra exaltation, and laugh over old Scotch stories with the Chief-Commissioner, and hear Mr. Thomas Thomson report progress as to the doings of the Bannatyne Club. But I apprehend every reader will see that Sir Walter was misled by his own modesty, when he doubted whether London could afford symposia of the same sort. He forgets that he had never mixed in the society of London except in the capacity of a stranger, a rare visitor, the unrivalled literary marvel of the time, and that every party at which he dined was got up expressly on his account, and constituted, whoever might be the landlord, on the natural principle of bringing together as many as the table could hold — to see and hear Sir Walter Scott. Hence, if he dined with a Minister of State, he was likely to find himself seated with half the Cabinet — if with a Bishop, half the Bench had been collected. As a matter of course, every man was anxious to gratify on so rare an occasion, as many as he could of those who, in case they were uninvited, would be likely to reproach him for the omission. The result was a crowding together of too many rival eminences; and he very seldom, indeed, witnessed the delightful result so constantly produced in London by the intermingling of distinguished persons of various classes, full of facts and views new to each other — and neither chilled nor perplexed by the pernicious and degrading trickery of lionising. But besides, it was unfair to institute any comparison between the society of comparative strangers and that of old friends dear from boyhood. He could not have his Clerks and Fergussons both in Edinburgh and in London. Enough, however, of commentary on a very plain text.

That season was further enlivened by one public dinner, and this, though very briefly noticed in Scott's Diary, occupied a large space in public attention at the time, and, I believe I may add, several columns in every newspaper in Europe. His good friend William Murray, manager of the Edinburgh Theatre, invited him to preside at the first festival of a charitable fund for decayed performers. He agreed, and on Friday the 23d February took the chair, being supported by the Earl of Fife, Lord Meadowbank, Sir John Hope of Pinkie, Admiral Adam, Robert Dundas of Arniston, Peter Robertson, and many other personal friends. Lord Meadowbank had come on short notice, and was asked abruptly on his arrival to take a toast which had been destined for a noble person who had not been able to appear. He knew that this was the first public dinner at which the object of the toast had appeared since his misfortune, and taking him aside in the anteroom, asked him whether he would now consider it indelicate to hazard a distinct reference to the parentage of the Waverley Novels. Sir Walter smiled, and said, "Do just as you like—only don't say much about so old a story." In the course of the evening the Judge rose accordingly, and said—

"I would beg leave to propose a toast—the health of Scott and the Fictions. The clouds have been dispelled—the darkness has been cleared away—and the Great Unknown—the monarch of our western land—the mighty magician who has rolled back the current of time, and conjured up before our living senses the men and the manners of days which have long passed away, stands revealed to the eyes and the hearts of his affectionate and admiring countrymen. We owe to him, as a people, a large and heavy debt of gratitude. He it is who has opened to foreigners the grand and characteristic beauties of our country;—it is to him that we owe that our gallant ancestors and illustrious patriots have obtained a fame no longer confined to the boundaries of a remote and comparatively obscure country. He it is who has conferred a new reputation on our national character, and bestowed on Scotland an imperishable name, were it only by her having given birth to himself. I propose the health of Sir Walter Scott."

Long before Lord Meadowbank ceased speaking, the company had got upon chairs and tables, and the storm of applause that ensued was deafening. When they recovered from the first fever, Sir Walter spoke as follows:

"I certainly did not think in coming here to-day, that I should have the task of acknowledging before 300 gentlemen, a secret which, considering that it was communicated to more than twenty people, has been remarkably well kept. I am now at the bar of my country, and may be understood to be on trial before Lord Meadowbank as an offender, and no quietly did all who were pro et contra conduct themselves, that I am sure that, were the pro et contra now to stand on his defence, every impartial jury would bring in a verdict of Not Proven. I am willing, however, to plead guilty—but shall I detain the Court by a long explanation why my confession has been so long deferred. Perhaps caprice might have a considerable share in the matter. I have now to say, however, that the merits of these works, if they had any, and their faults, are all entirely imputable to myself. Like another Scottish criminal of more consequence, our Macbeth,

'Tis not a fault to think what I have done.

exception of quotations, there is not a single word that was not derived from myself, or suggested in the course of my reading. The wand is now broken, and the book buried. You will allow me further to say, with Prospero, it is your breath that has filled my sails, and to crave one single toast in the capacity of the author of these novels. I would fain dedicate a bumper to the health of one who has represented several of those characters, of which I had endeavoured to give the skeleton, with a truth and liveliness for which I may well be grateful. I beg leave to propose the health of my friend Bailie Nicol Jarvie — and I am sure, that when the author of Waverley and Rob Roy drinks to Nicol Jarvie, it will be received with the just applause to which that gentleman has always been accustomed, — nay, that you will take care that on the present occasion it shall be PRO-DI-GI-OUS!” (Long and vehement applause.)

MR. MACKAY. — “My conscience! My worthy father the deacon could never have believed that his son would hae sic a compliment paid to him by the Great Unknown!”

SIR WALTER SCOTT. — “The Small Known now, Mr. Bailie!”

The reader may, perhaps, expect that I should endeavour to name the “upwards of twenty persons” whom Sir Walter alluded to on this occasion as having been put into the secret of the Waverley Novels, previously, and without reference, to the catastrophe of 1826. I am by no means sure that I can give the complete list: but in addition to immediate members of the author’s own family — (including his mother and his brother Thomas) — there were Constable, Cadell, the two Ballantynes — two persons employed in the printing-office, namely, Daniel M’Corkindale and Daniel Robertson — Mr. Terry, Mr. Laidlaw, Mr. Train, and Mr. G. H. Gordon — Charles Duke of Buccleuch, Lady Louisa Stuart, Lord Montagu, Lord and Lady Polwarth, Lord Kinnedder, Sir Adam Fergusson, Mr. Morritt, Mr. and Mrs. Skene, Mr. William Clerk, Mr. Rose, Mr. Hay Donaldson, Mr. Thomas Shortreed, Mr. John Richardson, and Mr. Thomas Moore.

We now reach the completion of that severe task — the Life of Napoleon: and following instantly, the commencement of the charming Tales of a Grandfather.

“Diary. — June 5. — Proofs. Parliament-House till two. Commenced the character of Buonaparte. To-morrow being a Teind-day, I may hope to get it finished. — June 10. — Rose with the odd consciousness of being free of my daily task. I have heard that the fish-women go to church of a Sunday with their creels new washed, and a few stones in them for ballast, just because they cannot walk steadily without their usual load. I feel something like them, and rather inclined to take up some light task, than to be altogether idle. I have my proof-sheets, to be sure; but what are these to a whole day?”

A good specimen came in my hand of White Stories for little Johnnie Lockhart, from the History of Scotland, like those taken from the History of England. But I will not write mine quite so simply as Croker has done. I am persuaded both children and the lower class of readers hate books which are written down to their capacity, and love those that are composed more for their elders and betters. I will make, if possible, a book that a child shall understand, yet a man will feel some temptation to peruse it, and be obliged to take it up. It will require, however, a great deal of pains to put in my own. The grand object is to get rid of those long words. A clever thief of the name of Croker has said that I received, some weeks ago, a letter from a very intelligent young man, the late Mr. H. B. H. of the name of the Etrick Shepherd, employed in Edinburgh, Scotland, by Mr. Anthony's printing office, a letter from which I have taken the extract.

"Having been for a few days employed by Sir Walter Scott, when he was finishing his Lives of Heronaparte, to copy papers connected with that work, and to write occasionally to his dictation, it may perhaps be in my power to mention some circumstances relative to Sir Walter's habits of composition, which could not fall under the observation of any one except a person in the same situation with myself. When I waited upon him to be informed of the business in which he needed my assistance, he asked me to attend him the next morning at six o'clock. I was punctual, and found Sir Walter already busy writing. He appointed my tasks, and sat me down at his own desk. We continued to write during the usual work hours till six o'clock in the evening, without interruption, except to take breakfast and dinner, which were served in the room beside us, so that no time was lost. I had no notion it was possible for any man to undergo the fatigue of composition for so long a time at once, and Sir Walter acknowledged he did not usually subject himself to so much exertion, though it seemed to be only the manual part of the operation that occasioned him any inconvenience. Once or twice he desired me

¹ The following note accompanied a copy of the First Series of the Lives of a Grandfather :—

" To the Right Hon. J. W. Croker

" My Dear Croker, I have been stealing from you, and as it seems the fashion to compound felony, I send you a sample of the steal, by way of stopping your mouth. . . . Always yours, to relieve him, and dictated while I wrote. I have performed the same service to several other persons, most of whom walked up and down the apartment while excogitating what was to be committed to writing; they sometimes stopt, too, and, like those who fail in a leap and return upon their course to take the advantage of another race, endeavoured to hit upon something additional by perusing over my shoulder what was already set down,—mending a phrase, perhaps, or recasting a sentence, till they should recover their wind. None of these aids were necessary to Sir Walter: his thoughts flowed easily and felicitously, without any difficulty to lay hold of them, or to find appropriate language; which was evident by the absence of all solicitude (miseria cogitandi) from his countenance. He sat in his chair, from which he rose now and then, took a volume from the book-case, consulted it, and restored it to the shelf—all without intermission in the current of ideas, which continued to be delivered with no less readiness than if his mind had been wholly occupied with the words he was uttering. It soon became apparent to me, however, that he was carrying on two distinct trains of thought, one of which was already arranged, and in the act of being spoken, while at the same time he was in advance considering what was afterwards to be said. This I discovered by his sometimes introducing a word which was wholly out of place—entertained instead of denied, for example,—but which I presently found to belong to the next sentence, perhaps four or five lines farther on, which he had been preparing at the very moment that he gave me the words of the one that preceded it. Extemporaneous orators of course, and no doubt many writers, think as rapidly as was done by Sir Walter; but the mind is wholly occupied with what the lips are uttering or the pen is tracing. I do not remember any other instance in which it could be said that two threads were kept hold of at once—connected with each other indeed, but grasped at different points.”

" W. Scott "

The Life of Buonaparte, then, was at last published about the middle of June 1827. Two years had elapsed since Scott began it; but, by a careful comparison of dates, I have arrived at the conclusion that, his expeditions to Ireland and Paris, and the composition of novels and critical miscellanies, being duly allowed for, the historical task occupied hardly more than twelve months. The book was closely printed; in fact, if it had been printed on the original model of his novels, the Life of Buonaparte would have filled from thirteen to fourteen volumes: the work of one twelvemonth — done in the midst of pain, sorrow, and ruin.

The general curiosity with which it was expected, and the satisfaction with which high and candid minds perused it, cannot be better described than in the words of the author's most illustrious literary contemporary.

“Walter Scott,” says Goethe, “passed his childhood among the stirring scenes of the American War, and was a youth of seventeen or eighteen when the French Revolution broke out. Now well advanced in the fifties, having all along been favourably placed for observation, he proposes to lay before us his views and recollections of the important events through which he has lived. The richest, the easiest, the most celebrated narrator of the century, undertakes to write the history of his own time.

“What expectations the announcement of such a work must have excited in me, will be understood by any one who remembers that I, twenty years older than Scott, conversed with Paoli in the twentieth year of my age, and with Napoleon himself in the sixtieth.

“Through that long series of years, coming more or less into contact with the great doings of the world, I failed not to think seriously on what was passing around me, and, after my own fashion, to connect so many extraordinary mutations into something like arrangement and interdependence.

“What could now be more delightful to me, than leisurely and calmly to sit down and listen to the discourse of such a man, while clearly, truly, and with all the skill of a great artist, he recalls to me the incidents on which through life I have meditated, and the influence of which is still daily in operation?” — Kunst und Altherthum.

The lofty impartiality with which Scott treats the personal character of Buonaparte, was of course sure to make all ultrapoliticians both at home and abroad condemn his representation; and an equally general and better founded exception was taken to the lavish imagery of his historical style. He despised the former clamour — to the latter he bowed submissive. He could not, whatever character he might wish to assume, cease to be one of the greatest of poets. Metaphorical illustrations, which men born with prose in their souls hunt for painfully, and find only to murder, were to him the natural and necessary offspring and playthings of ever-teeming fancy. He could not write a note to his printer — he could not speak to himself in his Diary — without introducing them. Few will say that his historical style is, on the whole, excellent — none that it is perfect; but it is completely unaffected, and therefore excites nothing of the unpleasant feeling with which we consider the elaborate artifices of a far greater historian — the greatest that our literature can boast — Gibbon. The rapidity of the execution infers many inaccuracies as to minor matters of fact; but it is nevertheless true that no inaccuracy affecting the character of the book as a fair record of great events, has to this hour been detected by the malevolent ingenuity of Jacobin or Buonapartist. Even the most hostile examiners were obliged to acknowledge that the gigantic career of their idol had been traced, in its leading features, with wonderful truth and spirit. No civilian, it was universally admitted, had ever before described modern battles and campaigns with any approach to his daring and comprehensive felicity. The public, ever unwilling to concede a new species of honour to a name already covered with distinction, listened eagerly for a while to the indignant reclamations of nobodies, whose share in mighty transactions had been omitted, or slightly misrepresented; but, ere long, all these pompous rectifications were summed up—and found to constitute nothing but a contemptible monument of self-deluding vanity. The work, devoured at first with breathless delight, had a shade thrown over it for a time by the pertinacious blustering of these angry Lilliputians; but it has now emerged, slowly and surely, from the mist of suspicion—and few, whose opinions deserve much attention, hesitate to avow their conviction that, whoever may be the Polybius of the modern Hannibal, posterity will recognise his Livy in Scott.

Woodstock, as we have seen, placed upwards of L.8000 in the hands of Sir Walter's creditors. The Napoleon (first and second editions) produced for them a sum which it even now startles me to mention,—L.18,000. As by the time the historical work was published, nearly half of the First Series of Chronicles of the Canongate had been written, it is obvious that the amount to which Scott's literary industry, from the close of 1825, to the 10th of June 1827, had diminished his debt, cannot be stated at less than L.28,000. Had health been spared him, how soon must he have freed himself from all his encumbrances!

CHAPTER XV.

Death of Constable — Controversy with Gourgaud — Excursion to Durham — Publication of the Chronicles of the Canongate and Tales of a Grandfather — Religious Discourses — Fair Maid of Perth — Anne of Geierstein — Threatening of Apoplexy — Death of Thomas Purdie. 1827-1829.

My wife and I spent the summer of 1827, partly at a sea-bathing place near Edinburgh, and partly in Roxburghshire. The arrival of his daughter and her children at Portobello was a source of constant refreshment to Scott during June; for every other day he came down and dined there, and strolled about afterwards on the beach; thus interrupting, beneficially for his health, and I doubt not for the result of his labours also, the new custom of regular night-work, or, as he called it, of serving double-tides. When the Court released him, and he returned to Abbotsford, his family did what they could to keep him to his ancient evening habits; but nothing was so useful as the presence of his invalid grandson. The poor child was at this time so far restored as to be able to sit his pony again; and Sir Walter, who had, as the reader has observed, conceived, the very day he finished Napoleon, the notion of putting together a series of Tales on the history of Scotland, somewhat in the manner of Mr. Croker's on that of England, rode daily among the woods with his "Hugh Littlejohn," and told the story, and ascertained that it suited the comprehension of boyhood, before he reduced it to writing. Sibyl Grey had been dismissed in consequence of the accident at the Catrail; and he had now stooped his pride to a sober, steady creature, of very humble blood; dun, with black mane and legs; by name Douce Davie, alias the Covenanter. This, the last of his steeds, by the way, had been previously in the possession of a jolly old laird near Peebles, and acquired a distinguished reputation by its skill in carrying him home safely when drunk. Douce Davie, on such occasions, accommodated himself to the swerving balance of his rider with such nice discrimination, that on the defunct stood off to a man when it was understood that the Sheriff coveted the succession.

The Chronicles of the Canongate proceeded pari passu with these historical tales; and both works were published before the end of the year. He also superintended, at the same time, the first collection of his Prose Miscellanies, in six volumes 8vo. several articles being remodelled and extended to adapt them for a more permanent sort of existence than had been originally thought of. Moreover, he penned that autumn his beautiful and instructive Article on the Planting of Waste Lands, which is indeed no other than a precious chapter of his autobiography. What he wrote of new matter between June and December, fills from five to six volumes in the late uniform edition of his works; but all this was light and easy after the perilous drudgery of the preceding eighteen months.

On the 22d of July, his Diary notes the death of Mr. Constable:—"This might have been a most important thing to me if it had happened some years ago, and I should then have lamented it much. He has lived to do me some injury; yet, excepting the last £5000, I think most unintentionally. He was a prince of booksellers. Constable was a violent tempered man with those he dared use freedom with. He was easily overawed by people of consequence; but, as usual, took it out of those whom poverty made subservient to him. Yet he was generous, and far from bad hearted:—in person good-looking, but very corpulent latterly; a large feeder, and deep drinker, till his health became weak. He died of water in the chest, which the natural strength of his constitution set long at defiance. I have no great reason to regret him; yet I do. If he deceived me, he also deceived himself."

Constable's spirit had been effectually broken by his downfall. To stoop from being primus absque secundo among the Edinburgh booksellers, to be the occupant of an obscure closet of a shop, without capital, without credit, all his mighty undertakings abandoned or gone into other hands, except indeed his Miscellany, which he had now no resources for pushing on in the fashion he once contemplated,—this reverse was too much for that proud heart. He no longer opposed a determined mind to the ailments of the body, and sunk on the 21st of this month, having, as I am told, looked, long ere he took to his bed, at least ten years older than he was. He died in his 54th year; but into that space he had crowded vastly more than the usual average of zeal and energy, of hilarity and triumph, and perhaps of anxiety and misery.

Of the 10th of August — when the news of death reached Abbeystead — and the day following — “The death of the Premier is an immense Canning — the witty, the accomplished, the who had toiled thirty years, and involved his harassing discussions, to attain this dizzy feat, held it for three months of intrigue and obloquy, a heap of dust, and that is all — No man possessed more playful wit in society, no one, since more commanding sarcasm in debate, in the moments he was the terror of that species of Yelpers. His lash fetched away both skin and bone, have penetrated the hide of a rhinoceros — In statesman he had a great fault — he lent himself to intrigue — The last composition with the Whigs of principle on both sides — To me Canning personally most kind — My nerves have for the last days been susceptible of an acute excitation, the beauty of the evening, the summer breeze, bring the tears into my eyes — But I must take exercise, and cease harden myself in encouraging these moulds of the mind.”

He received about this time a visit from Mr. who had not seen him since 1824 — and says —

“Calamity had borne heavily upon Sir Walter; but the painful and anxious feeling with which he approached for the first time under such circumstances, at once to the unassumed serenity of his countenance, were some signs of age about him which the world would scarcely have accounted for, but his eyes only, not broken; if they had sunk, they had sunk gently. It was a declining, not a clouded sun, he never made any reference to the afflictions he had undergone, when, speaking of his Life of Napoleon, in a quiet but affecting tone, ‘I could have done it all, I could have written at more leisure, and with a more cheerful mind. One morning a party was made to breakfast at Abbeystead, and any one who on that occasion looked at Sir Walter Scott, in the midst of his children and friends, must have rejoiced to see that his life was still a store of pleasures, and that his heart was still under their influence as ever. I was much struck by the influence which fell from him on this subject a short time ago. After mentioning an accident which had upon pleasure of a visit to his daughter in London, he then added — ‘I have had as much happiness in my time as most men, and I must not complain now.’ I said, that whatever had been his share of happiness, no man could have laboured better for it. He answered — ‘I consider the capacity to labour as part of the happiness I have enjoyed.’

“A substitute for walking, which he always very cheerfully used, and which at last became his only resource for any distant excursion, was a ride in a four-wheeled open carriage, holding four persons, but not absolutely limited to that number on an emergency. Tame as this exercise might be in comparison with riding on horseback, or with walking under propitious circumstances, yet as he was rolled along to Melrose, or Bowhill, or Yair, his spirits always freshened; the air, the sounds, the familiar yet romantic scenes, wakened up all the poetry of his thoughts, and happy were they who heard it resolve itself into words. At the sight of certain objects — for example, in passing the green foundations of the little chapel of Lindean, where the body of the ‘Dark Knight of Liddesdale’ was deposited on its way to Melrose, — it would, I suppose, have been impossible for him, unless with a companion hopelessly unsusceptible or preoccupied, to forbear some passing comment, some harping (if the word may be favourably used) on the tradition of the place. This was, perhaps, what he called ‘bestowing his tediousness;’ but if any one could think these effusions tedious because they often broke forth, such a man might have objected against the rushing of the Tweed, or the stirring of the trees in the wind, or any other natural melody, that he had heard the same thing before.

“Some days of my visit were marked by an almost perpetual confinement to the house; the rain being incessant. But the evenings were as bright and cheerful as the atmosphere of the days was dreary. Not that the gloomiest morning could ever be wearisome where, independently of the resources in society which the house afforded, the visitor might ransack a library, unique, I suppose, in some of its collections, and in all its departments interesting and characteristic of the founder. So many of the volumes were enriched with anecdotes or comments in his own hand, that to look over his books was in some degree conversing with him. And sometimes this occupation was pleasantly interrupted by a snatch of actual conversation with himself, when he entered from his own room to consult or take away a book. How often have I heard with pleasure, after a long silence, the uneven step, the point of the stick emerse from his study, with a face of the cheerfulness, followed perhaps by Nansie, with limbs and waist, as if tired out with occupation.

"On one of the rainy days I have alluded to at the usual hour became hopeless, Sir Walter sat with him while he continued his morning exercise for my own employment the gardeners' Club. His study, as I recollect it, was still, though an elegant one. It had been furnished with pictures, but at last, I think, very few articles remained. The chief of these was the print of St.bury Pilgrims, which hung over the chimney; the place assigned to it must have been in great. Sir Walter made the characteristic criticism: the procession were to move, the young Square in the foreground would in another minute be head. The shelves were stored with sermons; door opened into the great library, and a hall; the room itself communicated with his bed; have been a good lesson to a desultory student, moderately active amanuensis, to see the manner with which Sir Walter Scott applied himself; conjectured that he was at this time writing Grandfather. When we had sat down to our employments, the stillness of the room was only the light rattle of the rain against the window; the trot of Sir Walter's pen over his paper, unlike each other, and which seemed to vie in speed and continuance. Sometimes, when he stopped book, a short dialogue would take place upon it which I was occupied — about Mary Queen of Scots or Viscount Dundee; or, again, the silence for a moment by some merry outcry in the hall; the little grandchildren, which would half wake Bran, or Spice, as they slept at Sir Walter's feet; a growl or a stifled bark — not in anger, but by. For matters like these, work did not proceed as it seemed to me, did Sir Walter feel at all such interruptions as a message or the entrance. One door of his study opened into the hall, and appear to be any understanding that he was disturbed. At the end of our morning we attempt had made only a little way in the shrubbery-walks overlooking the Tweed, when the rain drove us back. The river, swollen and discoloured, swept by majestically, and the sight drew from Sir Walter his favourite lines---

'I've seen Tweed's silver streams, glittering in the sunny beams,
'Turn drimly and dark, as they rolled on their way.'

There could not have been a better moment for appreciating the imagery of the last line. I think it was in this short walk that he mentioned to me, with great satisfaction, the favourable prospects of his literary industry, and spoke sanguinely of retrieving his losses with the booksellers."

Towards the end of August, Sir Walter's Diary has a good deal about an affair which, however, annoyed his family much more than himself. Among the documents laid before him in the Colonial Office, when he visited London at the close of 1826, were some which represented one of Buonaparte's attendants at St. Helena, General Gourgaud, as having been guilty of gross unfairness, giving the English Government private information that the Emperor's complaints of ill-usage were utterly unfounded, and yet then, and afterwards, aiding and assisting the delusion in France as to the harshness of Sir Hudson Lowe's conduct towards his captive. Sir Walter, when using these remarkable documents, guessed that Gourgaud might be inclined to fix a personal quarrel on himself; and there now appeared in the newspapers a succession of hints that the General was seriously bent on this purpose. He applied, as Colonel Grogg would have done forty years before, to The Baronet. — He writes to William Clerk on the 27th: — "I am about to claim an especial service from you in the name of our long and intimate friendship. I understand that General Gourgaud has, or is about to set out for London, to verify the facts averred concerning him in my history of Napoleon. Now, in case of a personal appeal to me, I have to say that his confessions to Baron Sturmer, Count Balmain, and others at St. Helena — confirmed by him in various recorded conversations with Mr. Goulburn, then Under-Secretary of State — were documents of a historical nature which I found with others in the Colonial Office, and was therefore perfectly entitled to use. If his language has been misrepresented, he has certainly been very unfortunate; for it has been misrepresented by four or five different people to whom he said the same things — true or false, he knows best. I also acted with delicacy towards him, leaving out whatever related to his private of Bertrand, &c., so that, in fact, he has no reason of me, since it is ridiculous to suppose I was to formal evidence, furnished by him voluntarily, present sentiments render it displeasing for him which he formerly entertained should be known.

 man who finds himself in a scrape, General Ge wish to fight himself out of it, and if the quarrel thrust on me — why, I will not baulk him, Jack not dishonour the country through my sides, I can I have, of course, no wish to bring the thing to sue ment — Now, in this case, I shall have occasion f and resolute friend, and I naturally look for him companion of my youth, on whose firmness and sag with such perfect confidence rely."

Clerk was ready for his part: — but the Gener ever meditated a direct call on Scott, did not pers Diary of September 10th says — "Gourgand's wra forth in a very distant clap of thunder, in which me of contriving, with the Ministry, to slander reputation. He be d — d for a fool, to make his by stirring. I shall only revenge myself by pu whole extracts I made from the records of the Col in which he will find enough to make him lute h Scott accordingly printed a brief letter, with a crus dix of documents — This produced a blustering rej Gourgand, but Scott declined to prolong the paper stating in Ballantyne's print, that "while leaving t to the decision of the British public, he should h hesitation in referring it to the French nation, p documents he had produced were allowed to be pr
 French newspapers, from which hitherto they had bee
 And he would indeed have been idle had he said this, for his cause had been taken up on the inst English journal, of whatever politics; and The summed up its review of the debate: —

"Sir Walter Scott did that which would have occurred to man, whose fair-dealing had violent imputations cast upon duced his authorities — In the General's reply there is ene satiety, of declamation against the English Government, — and equivocation with regard to the words on record again and of gross abuse and Billingsgate against the historian arded him; but of direct and successful negative there is not The Aide-de-camp of St. Helena shows himself to be nothing a cross between a blusterer and a sophist."

Before Gourgaud fell quite asleep, Sir Walter received an invitation from Lord and Lady Ravensworth to meet the Duke of Wellington at their castle near Durham. The Duke was then making a progress in the north of England, to which additional importance was given by the condition of politics; — the chance of Lord Goderich's being able to maintain himself as Canning's successor seeming very precarious — and the opinion that his Grace must soon be called to the helm of State gaining ground every day. Sir Walter, who felt for the Great Captain the pure and exalted devotion that might have been expected from some honoured soldier of his banners, accepted this invitation, and witnessed a scene of enthusiasm with which its principal object could hardly have been more gratified than he was. The most remarkable feature was a grand dinner in the Episcopal Castle at Durham — that See being as yet unshorn of its Palatine magnificence. "On the 3d October," says his Diary, "we dined about one hundred and forty or fifty men — a distinguished company —

‘Lords and Dukes and noble Princes,
All the pride and flower of Spain.’

We dined in the old baronial hall, impressive from its rude antiquity, and fortunately free from the plaster of former improvement, as I trust it will long be from the gingerbread taste of modern Gothicisers. The bright moon streaming in through the old Gothic windows contrasted strangely with the artificial lights within; spears, banners, and armour were intermixed with the pictures of old bishops, and the whole had a singular mixture of baronial pomp with the grave and more chastened dignity of prelacy. The conduct of our reverend entertainer suited the character remarkably well. Amid the welcome of a Count Palatine he did not for an instant forget the gravity of the Church dignitary. All his toasts were gracefully given, and his little speeches well made, and the more affecting that the failing voice sometimes reminded us that our host laboured under the infirmities of advanced life." I was favoured at the time with a letter from Dr. Philpotts (now Bishop of Exeter) who said — "I never saw curiosity and enthusiasm so highly excited, and I may add, as to a great part of the company, so nearly balanced. Sometimes I doubted whether the hero or the poet was fixing most attention — the latter, I need hardly tell you, appeared unconscious that he was regarded differently from the others about him, until the good Bishop rose and proposed his health." Another friend, the able Henry Labbell, says: "Bishop Van Mildert health with peculiar tenacity, remarking that he could not give up the labour of a long literary life, with the consolation that everything he had written tended to the practical and to the improvement of the human race. Sir Walter said that hereafter he should always reflect with great satisfaction that moment of his existence, when his health had in such terms, by the Bishop of Durham in his own hall, surrounded and supported by the assembled nobles of the two northern counties, and in the presence of Wellington!"

On the 8th Sir Walter reached Abbotsford, and resumed his Grandfather's Tales, which he composed out with the ease and heartiness reflected in this: "This morning was damp, dripping, and unpleasant made a work of necessity, and set to the Tales like I murdered Maclellan of Bonaly at the Thrieve Cast the Black Douglas in the town of Stirling; astonish James before Roxburgh; and stilled the Earl of Bath in the Canongate. A wild world, my masters land of ours must have been. No fear of want of industry in those days for want of work —

' For treason, d'ye see,
Was to them a dish of tea,
And murder bread and butter.' "

Such was his life in Autumn 1827. Before I period, I must note how greatly I admired the which all his dependents appeared to have met the of his fortunes — a reverse which inferred very a alteration in the circumstances of every one of the butler, Dalgluish, had been told when the distress a servant of his class would no longer be required man burst into tears, and said, rather than go he without any wages: So he remained — and instead the easy chief of a large establishment, was now the work of the house, at probably half his former Old Peter, who had been for five-and-twenty years coachman, was now ploughman in ordinary, only p horses to the carriage upon high and rare occasions with all the rest that remained of the ancient t all, to my view, seemed happier than they had before. Their good conduct had given every one of them a new elevation in his own mind — and yet their demeanour had gained, in place of losing, in simple humility of observance. The great loss was that of William Laidlaw, for whom (the estate being all but a fragment in the hands of the trustees and their agent) there was now no occupation here. The cottage, which his taste had converted into a loveable retreat, had found a rent-paying tenant; and he was living a dozen miles off on the farm of a relation in the Vale of Yarrow. Every week, however, he came down to have a ramble with Sir Walter over their old haunts — to hear how the pecuniary atmosphere was darkening or brightening; and to read in every face at Abbotsford, that it could never be itself again until circumstances should permit his re-establishment at Kaeside.

All this warm and respectful solicitude must have had a salutary influence on the mind of Scott, who may be said to have lived upon love. No man cared less about popular admiration and applause; but for the least chill on the affection of any near and dear to him he had the sensitiveness of a maiden. I cannot forget, in particular, how his eyes sparkled when he first pointed out to me Peter Mathieson guiding the plough on the haugh: “Egad,” said he, “auld Pepe” (this was the children’s name for their good friend) — “auld Pepe’s whistling at his darg. The honest fellow said, a yoking in a deep field would do baith him and the blackies good. If things get round with me, easy shall be Pepe’s cushion.” In general, during that autumn, I thought Sir Walter enjoyed much his usual spirits; and often, no doubt, he did so. His Diary, however, shews (what perhaps many of his intimates doubted during his lifetime) that, in spite of the dignified equanimity which characterised all his conversation with mankind, he had his full share of the delicate sensibilities, the mysterious ups and downs, the wayward melancholy, and fantastic sunbeams of the poetical temperament. It is only with imaginative minds, in truth, that sorrows of the spirit are enduring. Those he had encountered were veiled from the eye of the world, but they lasted with his life.

The first series of Chronicles of the Canongate — (which title supplanted that of The Canongate Miscellany, or Traditions of the Sanctuary) — was published early in the winter. The contents were, the Highland Widow, the Two Drovers, and the Surgeon’s Daughter — all in their styles excellent, except that the Indian part of the last does not well harmonise with the rest; and certain preliminary chapters generally considered as still better than the stories duce. The portraiture of Mrs. Murray Keith, and of Mrs. Bethune Baliol, and that of Chrystal throughout, appear to me unsurpassed in Scott's works. In the former, I am assured he has mixed up various of his own beloved mother; and in the latter, there is no doubt that a good deal was taken from nobody else. In fact, the choice of the hero's residence, the origin of the book, and a world of minor circumstances, were suggested by painful circumstances recorded in his Diary of 1827. He had, while toiling his life out for his creditors, received various threatenings of severe treatment from the Law, as formerly alluded to, Messrs. Abud and Co.; and, on one occasion, he made every preparation for taking refuge in the Sanctuary of Holyroodhouse. Although these persons were well aware that at Christmas 1827 a very large dividend was to be paid on the Ballantyne debt, they could not be expected to comprehend that their interest lay in allowing the free use of his time; that by thwarting and harassing him personally, nothing was likely to be achieved but the ruin of the trust, and the settlement of the insolvent affairs on the usual terms of a sequestration. They could understand nothing, but that the very unanimity of the creditors as to the propriety of being gentle with him rendered it extremely probable that their own harshness would be rewarded by immediate payment of their whole claims. They fancied that the trustees would clear off all their claims rather than disturb the arrangements generally adopted. They fancied that, in case they laid Sir Walter Scott in prison, there would be some extraordinary burst of feeling in Edinburgh, that private friends would interfere;—in short, in any way or another, they should get hold, without farther delay, of their "pound of flesh."—Two paragraphs from the Diary will be enough as to this unpleasant subject:—

"October 31.—Just as I was merrily cutting away my trees, arrives Mr. Gibson with a very melancholy news, indeed the news he brought was shocking enough. Mr. Abud has given positive orders to take action against me for his debt. This breaks all the measures I had resolved on, and prevents the dividend from taking place, which many poor persons will be great sufferers by. The alternative will be more painful to my feelings than the sequestration, and more injudicial to my interests. To submit to a seques-allow the creditors to take what they can get, will be the inevitable consequence. This will cut short my labour by several years, which I might spend, and spend in vain, in endeavouring to meet their demands. I suppose that I, the Chronicler of the Canongate, will have to take up my residence in the Sanctuary, unless I prefer the more airy residence of the Calton Jail, or a trip to the Isle of Man. November 4. — Put my papers in some order, and prepared for the journey. It is in the style of the Emperors of Abyssinia, who proclaim, ‘Cut down the Kantuffa in the four quarters of the world, for I know not where I am going.’ Yet, were it not for poor Anne’s doleful looks, I would feel firm as a piece of granite. Even the poor dogs seem to fawn on me with anxious meaning, as if there were something going on they could not comprehend. Set off at twelve, firmly resolved in body and mind. But when I arrived in Edinburgh at my faithful friend Mr. Gibson’s — lo! the scene had again changed, and a new hare is started.”

The “new hare” was this. It transpired in the very nick of time, that a suspicion of usury attached to these Israelites in a transaction with Hurst & Robinson, as to one or more of the bills for which the house of Ballantyne had become responsible. This suspicion assumed a shape sufficiently tangible to justify that house’s trustees in carrying the point before the Court of Session. Thus, though the Court decided in favour of the Abuds, time was gained; and as soon as the decision was pronounced, Scott heard also that the Jews’ debt was settled. In fact, Sir William Forbes, whose banking-house was one of Messrs. Ballantyne’s chief creditors, had crowned his generous efforts for Scott’s relief by privately paying the whole of Abud’s demand (nearly L.2000) out of his own pocket — ranking as an ordinary creditor for the amount; and taking care at the same time that his old friend should be allowed to believe that the affair had merged quietly in the general measures of the trustees. It was not until some time after Sir William’s death, that Sir Walter learned what had been done on this occasion; and I may as well add here, that he died in utter ignorance of some services of a like sort which he owed to the secret liberality of three of his brethren at the Clerk’s table — Hector Macdonald Buchanan, Colin Mackenzie, and Sir Robert Dundas. I ought not to omit, that as soon as Sir Walter’s eldest son heard of the Abud business, he left Ireland for Edinburgh; but before he reached his father, the alarm had blown over.

This vision of the real Canongate has drawn me away from the Chronicles of Mr. Croftangry. The scenery of his patrimonial inheritance was sketched from that of Carmichael, the ancient and now deserted mansion of the noble family of Hyndford; but for his strongly Scottish feelings about parting with his land, and stern efforts to suppress them, the author had not to go so far afield. Christie Steele's brief character of Croftangry's ancestry, too, appears to suit well all that we have on record concerning his own more immediate progenitors of the stubborn race of Raeburn:—"They werena ill to the poor folk, sir, and that is aye something; they were just decent bein bodies. Ony poor creature that had face to beg got an awmous, and welcome; they that were shamefaced gaed by, and twice as welcome. But they keepit an honest walk before God and man, the Croftangrys; and as I said before, if they did little good, they did as little ill. They lifted their rents and spent them; called in their kain and eat them; gaed to the kirk of a Sunday; bowed civilly if folk took aff their bannets as they gaed by, and lookit as black as sin at them that keepit them on." I shall give no offence by adding that many things in the character and manners of Mr. Gideon Gray of Middlemas, in the Tale of the Surgeon's Daughter, were considered at the time by Sir Walter's neighbours on Tweedside as copied from Dr. Ebenezer Clarkson of Selkirk. "He was," says the Chronicler, "of such reputation in the medical world, that he had been often advised to exchange the village and its meagre circle of practice for Edinburgh. There is no creature in Scotland that works harder, and is more poorly requited, than the country doctor, unless perhaps it may be his horse. Yet the horse is, and indeed must be, hardy, active, and indefatigable, in spite of a rough coat and indifferent condition; and so you will often find in his master, under a blunt exterior, professional skill and enthusiasm, intelligence, humanity, courage, and science." A true picture—a portrait from the life, of Scott's hard-riding, benevolent, and sagacious old friend, "to all the country dear."

These Chronicles were not received with exceeding favour at the time; and Sir Walter was a good deal discouraged. Indeed he seems to have been with some difficulty persuaded by Cadell and Ballantyne that it would not do for him to "lie fallow" as a novelist; and then, when he in compliance with their entreaties began a Second Canongate Series, they were both disappointed with his MS., and told him their opinions so plainly that his good-nature was sharply tried. The Tales which they disapproved of, were those of My Aunt Margaret's Mirror, and the Laird's Jock; he consented to lay them aside, and began St. Valentine's Eve or the Fair Maid of Perth, which from the first pleased his critics. It was in the brief interval occasioned by these misgivings and debates, that his ever elastic mind threw off another charming paper for the Quarterly Review — that on Ornamental Gardening, by way of sequel to the Essay on Planting Waste Lands. Another fruit of his leisure was a sketch of the life of George Bannatyne, the collector of ancient Scottish poetry, for the Club which bears his name.

He had taken, for that winter, the house No. 6 Shandwick Place, which he occupied by the month during the remainder of his servitude as a Clerk of Session. Very near this house, he was told a few days after he took possession, dwelt the aged mother of his first love; and he expressed to his friend Mrs. Skene a wish that she should carry him to renew an acquaintance which seems to have been interrupted from the period of his youthful romance. Mrs. Skene complied with his desire, and she tells me that a very painful scene ensued. His Diary says: — "November 7. — Began to settle myself this morning after the hurry of mind and even of body which I have lately undergone. — I went to make a visit, and fairly softened myself, like an old fool, with recalling old stories, till I was fit for nothing but shedding tears and repeating verses for the whole night. This is sad work. The very grave gives up its dead, and time rolls back thirty years to add to my perplexities. I don't care. I begin to grow case-hardened, and, like a stag turning at bay, my naturally good temper grows fierce and dangerous. Yet what a romance to tell! — and told, I fear, it will one day be. And then my three years of dreaming, and my two years of wakening, will be chronicled, doubtless. But the dead will feel no pain. — November 10. — Wrote out my task and little more. At twelve o'clock I went again to poor Lady Jane to talk over old stories. I am not clear that it is a right or healthful indulgence to be ripping up old sores, but it seems to give her deep-rooted sorrow words, and that is a mental blood-letting. To me these things are now matter of calm and solemn recollection, never to be forgotten, yet scarce to be remembered with pain."

A few days afterwards arrived a very agreeable piece of intelligence. The King had not forgotten his promise with respect to the poet's second son; and Lord Dudley, then Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, was very well disposed to comply with the royal recommendation. Charles was appointed to a clerkship in the Foreign Office; and his settlement was happily followed by more than one fortunate incident in his father's literary and pecuniary history. The first Tales of a Grandfather appeared early in December, and their reception was more rapturous than that of any one of his works since Ivanhoe. He had solved for the first time the problem of narrating history, so as at once to excite and gratify the curiosity of youth, and please and instruct the wisest of mature minds. The popularity of the book has grown with every year that has since elapsed; it is equally prized in the library, the boudoir, the schoolroom, and the nursery; it is adopted as the happiest of manuals, not only in Scotland, but wherever the English tongue is spoken; nay, it is to be seen in the hands of old and young all over the civilised world, and has, I have little doubt, extended the knowledge of Scottish history in quarters where little or no interest had ever before been awakened as to any other parts of that subject, except those immediately connected with Mary Stuart and the Chevalier.

There had been serious doubts, in what proportions the copyright of the Novels, &c. was vested, at the moment of the common calamity, in Scott or in Constable. One of the ablest of the Scotch Judges, John Irving, Lord Newton, undertook the settlement of this complicated question, as private arbiter: and the result of his ultimate award was, that Scott had lost all hold on the copyright of the Novels from Waverley to Quentin Durward; but that Napoleon and Woodstock were wholly his. This decision, however, was not to be expected speedily: it had now become highly expedient to bring the body of copyrights to sale -- and it was agreed to do so, the money to be deposited in bank until the award was given. This sale (on 19th December 1827) comprised all the Novels from Waverley to Quentin Durward inclusive, besides a majority of the shares of the Poetical Works. Mr. Cadell's family and private friends were extremely desirous to secure for him part at least of these copyrights; and Sir Walter's were not less so that he should seize this last opportunity of recovering a share in the prime fruits of his genius. The relations by this time established between him and Cadell were those of strict confidence and kindness; and both saw well that the property would be comparatively lost, were it not ensured that thenceforth the whole should be managed as one unbroken concern. The result was, that the copyrights exposed to sale were purchased, one-half for Sir Walter, the other half for Cadell, at the price of L.8500. Well might the "pockpuddings" — for so the Diary styles the English booksellers — rue their timidity on this day; but it was the most lucky one that ever came for Sir Walter's creditors. A dividend of six shillings in the pound was paid at this Christmas on their whole claims. The result of their high-hearted debtor's exertions, between January 1826 and January 1828, was in all very nearly L.40,000. No literary biographer in all likelihood, will ever have such another fact to record. The creditors unanimously passed a vote of thanks for the indefatigable industry which had achieved so much for their behoof.

On returning to Abbotsford at Christmas, after completing these transactions, he says in his Diary — "My reflections in entering my own gate to-day were of a very different and more pleasing cast than those with which I left this place about six weeks ago. I was then in doubt whether I should fly my country, or become avowedly bankrupt, and surrender up my library and household furniture, with the life-rent of my estate, to sale. A man of the world will say I had better done so. No doubt, had I taken this course at once, I might have employed the money I have made since the insolvency of Constable and Robinson's houses in compounding my debts. But I could not have slept sound, as I now can under the comfortable impression of receiving the thanks of my creditors, and the conscious feeling of discharging my duty as a man of honour and honesty. I see before me a long, tedious, and dark path, but it leads to stainless reputation. If I die in the harrows, as is very likely, I shall die with honour; if I achieve my task, I shall have the thanks of all concerned, and the approbation of my own conscience."

He now took up in earnest two pieces of work, which promised and brought great ultimate advantage; namely, a complete collection of his Poems, with biographical prefaces; the other, an uniform edition of his Novels, each to be introduced by an account of the hints on which it had been founded, and illustrated throughout by historical and antiquarian annotations. On this last, commonly mentioned in the Diary as the Magnum Opus, Sir Walter bestowed pains commensurate with its importance; — and in the execution of the very delicate task which either scheme imposed, he has certainly displayed such a combination of frankness and modesty as entitles him to a high place in the short list of graceful autobiographers. True dignity is always simple; and perhaps true genius, of the

Scott's personal conduct, is always humble, took no notice of it, yet he laboured hard to become a great and able historian. He contributed articles to the Quarterly Review and the Edinburgh Review, and to the Journal conducted by General F. on Moliere, this last being at the editor's

But the first advertisement of 1828 was of the announcement that the Author of Way in the press, was received perhaps with as much interest in the clerical world, as could have been excited by that of a romance from the Archbishop of Canterbury's volume, entitled "Religious Discourses," and having "W. S." at the foot of a short story, came in the course of the spring, and all might be in perfect keeping, of Mr. Coleridge's then known almost exclusively as the author of what is called light reading—novels of fact and the like pretty ephemera. I am afraid that the same course, too, would, but for the author's name, have been the history of their composition, sufficiently explaining the humility of these transactions, as well as a theological point of view, will, I hope, interest my readers.—Sir Walter's encounter over Way in 1815, was a certain Major Pryse Gordon, then resident at Brussels. The acquaintance, up to that time, had been slight; but he was exceedingly attentive during Scott's stay, and took some pains about collecting reliques of the poet. One evening the poet supped at his house, and to sit next him the host's eldest son, then a young man, whose appearance and situation much interested the poet. He had been destined for the Church of Scotland, but was afflicted with a deafness, which had come on him in boyhood, and worse, and at length his friends feared to invest him for the clerical function. He had spent his vacation with his father, and General Adam had given him a temporary appointment as a clerk in the Comptrol Office, which he hoped to convert into a permanent one, in due season. At the time of Scott's arrival that project had gone, and the young man's infirmity, his father's situation, and other things to which his own memorandum book alluded, excited the visitor's sympathy. Though the poet's hunters of no small consequence in the part of his talk into the poor clerk's ear-trumpet; and at parting, begged him not to forget that he had a friend on Tweedside.

A couple of years elapsed before he heard anything more of George Huntly Gordon, who then sent him his father's little spolia of Waterloo, and accompanied them by a letter explaining his situation, and asking advice, in a style which renewed and increased Scott's favourable impression. He had been dismissed from the Commissariat at the general reduction of our establishments, and was now hesitating whether he had better take up again his views as to the Kirk, or turn his eyes towards English orders; and in the meantime he was anxious to find some way of lightening to his parents, by his own industry, the completion of his professional education. There ensued a copious correspondence between him and Scott, who gave him on all points of his case most paternal advice, and accompanied his counsels with offers of pecuniary assistance, of which the young man rarely availed himself. At length he resolved on re-entering the Divinity Class at Aberdeen, and in due time was licenced by the Presbytery there as a Preacher of the Gospel; but though with good connexions, for he was "sprung of Scotia's gentler blood," his deafness operated as a serious bar to his obtaining the incumbency of a parish. The provincial Synod pronounced his deafness an insuperable objection, and the case was referred to the General Assembly. That tribunal heard the young man's cause maintained by all the skill and eloquence of Mr. Jeffrey, whose good offices had been secured by Scott's intervention, and they overruled the decision of the Synod. But Gordon, in the course of the discussion, gathered the conviction that a man almost literally stone-deaf could not discharge some of the highest duties of a parish-priest in a satisfactory manner, and he with honourable firmness declined to take advantage of the judgment of the Supreme Court. Meantime he had been employed, from the failure of John Ballantyne's health downwards, as the transcriber of the Waverley MSS. for the press, in which capacity he displayed every quality that could endear an amanuensis to an author; and when the disasters of 1826 rendered it unnecessary for Scott to have his MS. copied, he exerted himself to procure employment for his young friend in one of the Government offices in London. Being backed by the kindness of the Duke of Gordon, his story found favour with the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lushington—and Mr Gordon was named assistant private secretary to that gentleman. The appointment was temporary, but he so pleased his chief that there was hope of better things by and by. — Such was his situation at Christmas 1827; but that being his first Christmas in London, it was no wonder that he then discovered himself to have somewhat miscalculated about money matters. In a word, he knew not whither to look at the moment for extrication, until he bethought him of the following little incident of his life at Abbotsford.

He was spending the autumn of 1824 there, daily copying the MS. of Redgauntlet, and working at leisure hours on the Catalogue of the Library, when the family observed him to be labouring under some extraordinary depression of mind. It was just then that he had at length obtained the prospect of a Living, and Sir Walter was surprised that this should not have exhilarated him. Gently sounding the trumpet, however, he discovered that the agitation of the question about the deafness had shaken his nerves — his scruples had been roused — his conscience was sensitive, — and he avowed that, though he thought, on the whole, he ought to go through with the business, he could not command his mind so as to prepare a couple of sermons, which, unless he summarily abandoned his object, must be produced on a certain day — then near at hand — before his Presbytery. Sir Walter reminded him that his exercises when on trial for the Probationership had given satisfaction; — but nothing he could say was sufficient to rebrace Mr. Gordon's spirits, and he at length exclaimed, with tears, that his pen was powerless, — that he had made fifty attempts, and saw nothing but failure and disgrace before him. Scott answered — “My good young friend, leave this matter to me — do you work away at the Catalogue, and I'll write for you a couple of sermons, that shall pass muster well enough at Aberdeen.” Gordon assented with a sigh; and next morning Sir Walter gave him the MS. of the Religious Discourses. On reflection, Mr. Gordon considered it quite impossible to produce them at Aberdeen as his own: but they had remained in his hands; and it now occurred to him that, if Sir Walter would allow him to dispose of these to some bookseller, they might possibly bring a price that would float him over his little difficulties of Christmas.

The only entries in the Diary which relate to the business, are the following: — “December 28. Huntly Gordon writes me in despair about L.180 of debt which he has incurred. He wishes to publish two sermons which I wrote for him when he was taking orders; and he would get little money for them without my name. People may exclaim against the undesired and unwelcomed zeal of him who stretched his hands to help the ark over, with the best intentions, and cry sacrilege. And yet they will do me gross injustice, for I would, if called upon, die a martyr for the Christian religion, so completely is (in my poor opinion) its divine origin proved by its beneficial effects on the state of society. Were we but to name the abolition of slavery and polygamy, how much has, in these two words, been granted to mankind in the lessons of our Saviour! — January 10, 1828. Huntly Gordon has disposed of the two sermons to the bookseller, Colburn, for L.250; well sold, I think, and to go forth immediately. I would rather the thing had not gone there, and far rather that it had gone nowhere, yet hang it, if it makes the poor lad easy, what needs I fret about it? After all, there would be little grace in doing a kind thing, if you did not suffer pain or inconvenience upon the score."

The next literary entry is this: — "Mr. Heath, the engraver, invites me to take charge of a yearly publication called the Keepsake, of which the plates are beyond comparison beautiful, but the letter-press indifferent enough. He proposes L.800 a-year if I would become editor, and L.400 if I would contribute from seventy to one hundred pages. I declined both, but told him I might give him some trifling thing or other. To become the stipendiary editor of a New-Year's-Gift Book is not to be thought of, nor could I agree to work regularly, for any quantity of supply, at such a publication. Even the pecuniary view is not flattering, though Mr. Heath meant it should be so. One hundred of his close printed pages, for which he offers L.400, are nearly equal to one volume of a novel. Each novel of three volumes brings L.4000, and I remain proprietor of the mine after the first ore is scooped out." The result was that Mr. Heath received, for L.500, the liberty of printing in his Keepsake the long-forgotten juvenile drama of the House of Aspen, with Aunt Margaret's Mirror, and two other little tales, which had been omitted, at Ballantyne's entreaty, from the second Chronicles of Croftangry. But Sir Walter regretted having meddled in any way with the toyshop of literature, and would never do so again, though repeatedly offered very large sums — nor even when the motive of private regard was added, upon Mr. Allan Cunningham's lending his name to one of these painted bladders. In the same week that Mr. Heath made his proposition, Sir Walter received another, which he thus disposes of in his Diary: — "I have an invitation from Messrs. Saunders and Ottley, booksellers, offering me from L.1500 to L.2000 annually to conduct a journal; but I am their humble servant. I am too indolent to stand to that sort of work, and I must preserve the undisturbed use of my leisure, and possess my soul in quiet. A large income is not my object; I must clear my debts; and that is to be done by writing things of which I can retain the property."

He finished his novel by the end of March, and immediately set out for London, where the last budget of proof-sheets reached him. The Fair Maid was, and continues to be, highly popular, and though never classed with his performances of the first file, it has undoubtedly several scenes equal to what the best of them can shew, and is on the whole a work of brilliant variety and most lively interest.

Though the Introduction of 1830 says a good deal on the most original character, that of Connachar, the reader may not be sorry to have one paragraph on that subject from the Diary:— "December 5, 1827. The fellow that swam the Tay, and escaped, would be a good ludicrous character. But I have a mind to try him in the serious line of tragedy. Miss Baillie has made her Ethling a coward by temperament, and a hero when touched by filial affection. Suppose a man's nerves, supported by feelings of honour, or say by the spur of jealousy, sustaining him against constitutional timidity to a certain point, then suddenly giving way, I think something tragic might be produced. James Ballantyne's criticism is too much moulded upon the general taste of novels to admit (I fear) this species of reasoning. But what can one do? I am hard up as far as imagination is concerned,—yet the world calls for novelty. Well, I'll try my brave coward or cowardly brave man. Valeat quantum."

I alluded, in an early chapter, to a circumstance in Sir Walter's conduct which it was painful to mention, and added, that in advanced life he himself spoke of it with a deep feeling of contrition. Talking over this character of Connachar, just before the book appeared, he told me the unhappy fate of his brother Daniel and how he had declined to be present at his funeral or wear mourning for him. He added— "My secret motive in this attempt was to perform a sort of expiation to my poor brother's manes. I have now learned to have more tolerance and compassion than I had in those days." I said he put me in mind of Samuel Johnson's standing bareheaded, in the last year of his life, on the market-place of Uttoxeter, by way of penance for a piece of juvenile irreverence towards his father. "Well, no matter," said he; "perhaps that's not the worst thing in the Doctor's story."¹

Sir Walter and Miss Scott remained at this time six weeks in the Regent's Park. His eldest son's regiment was stationed at Hampton Court; the second had recently taken his desk at the Foreign Office, and was living in my house; he had thus looked forward to a happy meeting with all his family — but he encountered scenes of sickness and distress, in consequence of which I saw but little of him in general society. Nor is his Diary particularly interesting, with the exception of a few entries. That for May 1st is:— "Breakfasted with Lord and Lady Francis Gower, and enjoyed the splendid treat of hearing Mrs. Arkwright sing her own music, which is of the highest order; — no forced vagaries of the voice, no caprices of tone, but all telling upon and increasing the feeling the words require. This is 'marrying music to immortal verse.' Most people place them on separate maintenance." — Among other songs, Mrs. Arkwright delighted Sir Walter with her own set of —

"Farewell! farewell! — The voice you hear
Has left its last soft tone with you;
Its next must join the seaward cheer,
And shout among the shouting crew," &c.

He was sitting by me, at some distance from the lady, and whispered as she closed — "Capital words — whose are they? Byron's, I suppose, but I don't remember them." He was astonished when I told him that they were his own in The Pirate. He seemed pleased at the moment, but said next minute — "You have distressed me — if memory goes, all is up with me, for that was always my strong point."

"May 5. — Breakfasted with Haydon, and sat for my head. I hope this artist is on his legs again. The King has given him a lift, by buying his clever picture of the Mock Election in the King's Bench prison. Haydon was once a great admirer and companion of the champions of the Cockney school, and is now disposed to renounce them and their opinions. To this kind of conversation I did not give much way. A painter should have nothing to do with politics. He is certainly a clever fellow, but too enthusiastic, which, however, distress seems to have cured in some degree. His wife, a pretty woman, looked happy to see me, and that is something. Yet it was very little I could do to help them.¹ — with Mr. Alexander of Ballochmyle; — Lord who were kind to you in Ireland, and a Scottish from learning the broad accents and honest native land. A large circle in the evening came up to me and asked 'If I had seen your work, the most beautiful, the most high — and then the editor or editress — a female might be ask a very great favour?' and out I of this poem. I was really angry, and said, then he might command me, for a contribu may be misrepresented, but I care not. Sup of the March gives five guineas to his distres think he does a great deal, yet he takes fifty I calmest an in the world; for the communic if it be worth anything. There is no equal jewel. May 11. — Dined with his Majesty i party, two or six only being present. It is i convey a more friendly manner than that his Maj me. May 19. — Dined by command with Kent. I was very kindly recognised by Prin presented to the little Princess Victoria — I change her name — the heir-apparent to the now stand. How strange that so large and that of his late Majesty, should have died into old age, with so few descendants. I Cumberland is, they say, a fine boy about a bit of a Puckle. This little lady is educ care, and watched so closely, that no busy ment to whisper, 'You are heir of England we could dissect the little heart, we should pigeon or other bird of the air had carried in fair, like the royal family — the Duchess h ing and affable in her manners. I sat by M very agreeable man. There were also Charl lady — and the evening, for a Court evening off. I am commanded for two days by Pr will send excuses. — May 25. — After a m writing, leave-taking, papers destroying, and trumpery, Sophia and I set out for Hampton Court, carrying with us the following lions and lionesses — Samuel Rogers, Tom Moore, Wordsworth, with wife and daughter. We were very kindly and properly received by Walter and his wife, and had a very pleasant day. At parting, Rogers gave me a gold-mounted pair of glasses, which I will not part with in a hurry. I really like S. R., and have always found him most friendly.”

¹ See Boswell under August 1784.

¹ Sir Walter had shortly before been one of the c description for Mr. Haydon. The imprisonm from tion relieved the artist produced, I need scarcely say, t in the Diary. This clever man concluded an unhappi happiest manner in 1840.

Breakfasting one morning with Allan Cunningham (whose notes are before me), he looked round the table, and said, “What are you going to make of all these boys, Allan?” — “I ask that question often at my own heart,” said Allan, “and I cannot answer it.” — “What does the eldest point to?” — “The callant would fain be a soldier, Sir Walter — and I have half a promise of a commission in the King’s army for him; but I wish rather he could go to India, for there the pay is a maintenance, and one does not need interest at every step to get on.” Scott dropped the subject; but went an hour afterwards to Lord Melville (who was now President of the Board of Control), and begged a cadetship for young Cunningham. Lord Melville promised to inquire if he had one at his disposal, in which case he would gladly serve the son of “honest Allan;” but the point being thus left doubtful, Scott meeting Mr. John Loch, one of the East India Directors, at dinner the same evening, at Lord Stafford’s, applied to him, and received an immediate assent. On reaching home at night, he found a note from Lord Melville, intimating that he had inquired, and was happy in complying with his request. Next morning, Sir Walter appeared at Sir F. Chantrey’s breakfast-table, and greeted the sculptor (a brother of the angle) with — “I suppose it has sometimes happened to you to catch one trout (which was all you thought of) with the fly, and another with the bobber. I have done so, and I think I shall land them both. Don’t you think Cunningham would like very well to have cadetships for two of those fine lads?” — “To be sure he would,” said Chantrey, “and if you’ll secure the commissions, I’ll make the outfit easy.” Great was the joy in Allan’s household on this double good news; but I should add, that before the thing was done he had to thank another benefactor. Lord Melville, after all, went out of the Board of Control before he had been able to fulfil his promise; but his successor, Lord Ellenborough, on hearing the case, desired Cunningham to set his mind at rest; and both his young men are now prospering in the India service.

of my most sincere friends, — a man unequalled for good sense, high literary culture, and sweetest temper that ever graced His name. He is much attached to him, and a elegant as well as beautiful young women, — a partiality to female beauty that commands temporary homage from the aged, as well as from the young, I cannot conceive; but it is a very large portion of some other amiable quality to counterbalance the absolute want of this, whom beauty is, and shall henceforward be, a upon it with the quiet devotion of an old we no longer offers incense on the shrine, but peace and of taper, taking special care in doing s own fingers. Nothing in life can be more temptible than an old man aping the passion.

Next night Sir Walter rested at Carlisle, — says the Diary, "in my domestic remembrance married my poor Charlotte. She is gone, an later, perhaps, than I wot of. It is so loved and loved, and our poor children are affectionate, that it chastens the sadness after of our separation." His feeling and spr wrote thus a day or two afterwards to her in the morning before we started, papa took the Cathedral. This he had often done before he must stand once more on the spot where mamma. After that we went to the Castle, man went through the old trick of pointing Ivor's very dungeon. Peveril said — 'It quite sure, sir?' And on being told there was troubled with a fit of coughing, which The man seemed exceedingly indignant, so on, I whispered who it was. I wish you had start, and how he stared and bowed as he p then rammed his keys into his pocket, and gallop to warn the rest of the garrison. He ready, and we escaped a row."

They reached Abbotstford that night, and wards Edinburgh; where Sir Walter was g satisfactory intelligence that his plans as to had been considered at a meeting of his t approved in toto. As the scheme inferred a large outlay on drawings and engravings, and otherwise, this decision had been looked for with much anxiety by him and Mr. Cadell. He says — “I trust it will answer; yet who can warrant the continuance of popularity? Old Nattali Corri, who entered into many projects, and could never set the sails of a windmill to catch the aura popularis, used to say he believed that were he to turn baker, it would put bread out of fashion. I have had the better luck to dress my sails to every wind; and so blow on, good wind, and spin round, whirligig.” The Corri here alluded to was an unfortunate adventurer, who, among many other wild schemes, tried to set up an Italian opera at Edinburgh.

During the remainder of this year Sir Walter never opened his “locked book.” Whether in Edinburgh or the country, his life was such, that he describes himself, in several letters, as having become “a writing automaton.” He had completed by Christmas the Second Series of Tales on Scottish History, and made considerable progress in another novel — Anne of Geierstein: he had also drawn up for the Quarterly Review his article on Hajji Baba in England; and that delightful one on Davy’s Salmonia — which, like those on Planting and Gardening, abounds in sweet episodes of personal reminiscence. And, whenever he had not proof-sheets to press him, his hours were bestowed on the Opus Magnum.

About this time died Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, the widower of his first love, and the most generous and efficient friend in the late crisis of distress. On this event his letters have some very touching passages — but his feelings towards that admirable person have been sufficiently shewn in preceding extracts.

Visiting Abbotsford at Christmas, I found him apparently well in health (except that he suffered from rheumatism), and enjoying the society, as usual, of the Fergussons, with the welcome addition of Mr. Morritt and Sir James Steuart of Allbank — a gentleman whose masterly pencil had often been employed on subjects from his poetry and novels, and whose conversation on art (like that of Sir George Beaumont and Mr. Scrope), being devoid of professional pedantries and jealousies, was always particularly delightful to him. One snowy morning, he gave us sheets of Anne of Geierstein, extending to, I think, about a volume and a half; and we read them together in the library, while he worked in the adjoining room, and occasionally dropt in upon us to hear how we were pleased. All were highly gratified with those vivid and picturesque pages, — and both Morrith and Steuart, being familiar with the scenery of Switzerland, could not sufficiently express their astonishment at the felicity with which he had divined its peculiar character, and outdone, by the force of imagination, all the efforts of a thousand actual tourists. Such approbation was of course very acceptable. I had seldom seen him more gently and tranquilly happy.

When these friends left him, he went with me to my brother's in Clydesdale, and there enjoyed some days of relaxation. It was then that he first saw the self-educated sculptor, John Greenshields, who greatly interested him from a certain resemblance to Burns, and took the first sitting for a very remarkable statue in freestone, now in Mr. Cadell's possession — the last work which this worthy man was destined to complete.

Sir Walter's operations appear to have been interrupted ever and anon, during January and February 1829, in consequence of severe distress in the household of his printer; whose warm affections were not, as in his own case, subjected to the authority of a stoical will. On the 14th of February the Diary says: — "The letters I received were numerous, and craved answers; yet the 3d volume is getting on hooly and fairly. I am twenty leaves before the printer, but Ballantyne's wife is ill, and it is his nature to indulge apprehensions of the worst, which incapacitates him for labour. I cannot help regarding this amiable weakness of the mind with something too nearly allied to contempt." On the 17th, "I received the melancholy news that James Ballantyne had lost his wife. With his domestic habits the blow is irretrievable. What can he do, poor fellow, at the head of such a family of children? I should not be surprised if he were to give way to despair." — James was not able to appear at his wife's funeral; and this Scott viewed with something more than pity. Next morning, however, says the Diary — "Ballantyne came in, to my surprise, about twelve o'clock. He was very serious, and spoke as if he had some idea of sudden and speedy death. He has settled to go to the country, poor fellow!" — He retired accordingly to some sequestered place near Jedburgh, and there indulged his grief in solitude. Scott regarded this as weakness, and in part at least as wilful weakness, and addressed to him several letters of strong remonstrance and rebuke. In writing of the case to myself, he says — "I have a sore grievance in poor Ballantyne's increasing lowness of heart, and I fear he is sinking rapidly into the condition of a religious dreamer. His retirement from Edinburgh was the worst advised scheme in the world. I in vain reminded him, that when our Saviour himself was to be led into temptation, the first thing the Devil thought of was to get him into the wilderness." — Ballantyne, after a few weeks, resumed his place in the printing-office; but he addicted himself more and more to what his friend considered as erroneous and extravagant notions of religious doctrine; and I regret to say that in this difference originated a certain alienation, not of affection, but of confidence, which was visible to every near observer of their subsequent intercourse. Towards the last, indeed, they saw but little of each other. I suppose, however, it is needless to add, that down to the very last, Scott watched over Ballantyne's interests with undiminished attention.

Many entries of his Diary during the Spring Session refer to the final carrying of the Roman Catholic Question. When the Duke of Wellington announced his intention of conceding those claims, there were meetings and petitions enough in Edinburgh as elsewhere; and though Scott felt considerable repugnance to acting in any such matter with Whigs and Radicals, in opposition to a great section of the Tories, he ultimately resolved not to shrink from doing his part in support of the Duke's Government on that critical experiment.¹ He wrote, I believe, several articles in favour of the measure for the Weekly Journal; he spoke, though shortly, at the principal meeting, and proposed one of its resolutions; and when the consequent petition was read in the House of Commons, his name among the subscribers was received with such enthusiasm, that Sir Robert Peel thought fit to address to him a special and very cordial letter of thanks on that occasion.

His novel was finished before breakfast on the 29th of April; and his Diary mentions that immediately after breakfast he began his compendium of Scottish history for Dr. Lardner's Cyclopædia. When the proprietors of that work, in July 1828, offered him L.500 for an abstract of Scottish History in one volume, he declined the proposal. They subsequently offered L.700, and this was accepted; but though he began the task under the impression that he should find it a heavy one, he soon warmed to the subject, and pursued it with cordial zeal and satisfaction. One volume, it by and by appeared, would never do, — in his own phrase, "he must have elbow-room" — and I believe it was finally settled that he should have L.1500 for the book in two volumes; of which the first was published before the end of this year.

¹ See Ante, p. 451.

Anne of Geierstein came out about the middle of the century, which may be almost called the last work of his genius, was received at least as well — (or that is — as the Fair Maid of Perth had been) — as any novel of his after the Crusaders. I partake I am aware, in the feeling which most of my countrymen have little shame in avowing, that no novel, neither scenery nor character is Scottish, belongs to the eminent class with those in which he painted his native landscape. I have confessed that even his best English romances with such creations as Edith and Old Mortality; far less can I believe will attach similar value to this Maid of the Mountains however, display in undiminished perfection all the grace of the mere artist, with occasional outbreaks of poetic spirit, more than sufficient to remove to an immeasurable distance from any of its order previous country in our own age. Indeed, the various pictures of the combination of persons and events, and the beauty of both imagery and diction, may well justify to the author what he beautifully says of his King:

“ A mirthful man he was; the snows of age
 Fell, but they did not chill him. Gaiety,
 Even in life's closing, touch'd his teeming
 With such wild visions as the setting sun Raises in front of some bear glacier,
 Painting the bleak ice with a thousand hues.”

It is a common saying that there is nothing so genius as the retention, in advanced years, of the faculty to depict the feelings of youth with all their original purity. But I apprehend this blessed distinctness and is the just reward of, virtuous genius only of extraordinary force of imagination, combined with the indulgence of a selfish mood — not combined, say, with the genial temper of mind and thought and Nature design to be kept alive in man by charities out of which the other social virtues spring and with which they find such endless links of dependence; — in this unhappy case, which none would the biography of genius can pronounce to be the very power which heaven bestowed seems to be darkened, the sternest avenger of its own misapprehension; retrospect of life is converted by its energy into ness of desolate regret; and whether this breaks out in the shape of a rueful contemptuousness, or a sarcastic mockery of tone, the least drop of the poison is enough to paralyse all attempts at awakening sympathy by fanciful delineations of love and friendship. Perhaps Scott has nowhere painted such feelings more deliciously than in those very scenes of Anne of Geierstein, which offer every now and then, in some incidental circumstance or reflection, the best evidence that they are drawn by a grey-headed man. The whole of his own life was too present to his wonderful memory to permit of his brooding with exclusive partiality, whether painfully or pleasurably, on any one portion or phasis of it; and besides, he was always living over again in his children, young at heart whenever he looked on them, and the world that was opening on them and their friends. But above all, he had a firm belief in the future reunion of those whom death has parted.

He lost two more of his old intimates about this time;— Mr. Terry in June, and Mr. Shortreed in the beginning of July. The Diary says:—“July 9. Heard of the death of poor Bob Shortreed, the companion of many a long ride among the hills in quest of old ballads. He was a merry companion, a good singer and mimic, and full of Scottish drollery. In his company, and under his guidance, I was able to see much of rural society in the mountains, which I could not otherwise have attained, and which I have made my use of. He was, in addition, a man of worth and character. I always burdened his hospitality while at Jedburgh on the circuit, and have been useful to some of his family. Poor fellow! So glide our friends from us. Many recollections die with him and with poor Terry.”

His Diary has few more entries for this twelvemonth. Besides the volume of history for Lardner, he had ready by December the last of the Scottish Series of Tales of a Grandfather; and had made great progress in the prefaces and notes for Cadell's Opus Magnum. He had also overcome various difficulties which for a time interrupted the twin scheme of an illustrated edition of his Poems: and one of these in a manner honourably characteristic of the late John Murray of Albemarle Street, who had till now retained a share in the copyright of Marmion. Scott having requested him to sell that share, he generously replied:—“So highly do I estimate the honour of being, even in so small a degree, the publisher of the author of the poem, that no pecuniary consideration whatever can induce me to part with it. But there is a consideration of another kind, which until now I have not which would make it painful to me if I were moment longer. I mean the knowledge of it by the author, into whose hands it was sent in the same instant that I read his request."

The success of the collective novels was either Sir Walter or Mr. Cadell had ventured Before the close of 1829, eight volumes had the monthly sale had reached as high as 35,000 go on, there was, indeed, every reason to hope aid of undiminished industry in the preparation it would wipe off all his load of debt in the few years. And during the autumn (which I it was most agreeable to observe the effects of intelligence, which every succeeding month brought spirits.

This was the more needed, that his eldest son to the south of France on account of some trouble in his health, did not at first seem to the change of climate. He feared that he not so obedient to his physicians as he ought and in one of many letters on this subject, some of Cadell's good news as to the great

"I have wrought hard, and so far success you plainly, my dear boy, that if you permit decline from want of attention, I have not enough to exert myself in these matters as been doing." Happily Major Scott was, ere his usual state of health and activity.

Sir Walter himself, too, besides the usual rheumatism, and other lesser ailments, had season of a nature which gave his family which for several days he himself regarded prognostications. After some weeks, during plained of headache and nervous irritation changes indicated the sort of relief required, it from copious cupping. He says, in his Diary
"The ugly symptom still continues. Either resolved. I wrote in the morning. The Countess near two. In the evening Dr. Ross ordered an operation which I only knew from its being those eminent medical practitioners, the barbs is not painful; and, I think, resembles a giving your flesh between his finger and thumb."

better, he said, than he had done for years before; but there can be little doubt that the natural evacuation was a very serious symptom. It was, in fact, the precursor of apoplexy. In telling the Major of his recovery, he says—"The sale of the Novels is pro—di—gi—ous. If it last but a few years, it will clear my feet of old encumbrances, nay, perhaps, enable me to talk a word to our friend Nicol Milne.

' But old ships must expect to get out of commission,
Nor again to weigh anchor with yo heave ho!'

However that may be, I should be happy to die a free man; and I am sure you will all be kind to poor Anne, who will miss me most. I don't intend to die a minute sooner than I can help for all this; but when a man takes to making blood instead of water, he is tempted to think on the possibility of his soon making earth."—Mr. Milne, be it observed, was the proprietor of a considerable estate conterminous with Abbotsford to the westward.

Among a few other friends from a distance, Sir Walter received this summer a short visit from Mr. Hallam, and made in his company several of the little excursions which had in former days been of constant recurrence. Mr. Hallam had with him his son, Arthur, a young gentleman of extraordinary abilities, and as modest as able, who not long afterwards was cut off in the very bloom of opening life and genius. His beautiful verses on Melrose seen in company with Scott, have since been often printed.

The close of the autumn was embittered by a sudden and most unexpected deprivation. Apparently in the fullest enjoyment of health and vigour, Thomas Purdie leaned his head one evening on the table, and dropped asleep. This was nothing uncommon in a hard-working man; and his family went and came about him for several hours, without taking any notice. When supper was ready, they tried to awaken him, and found that life had been for some time extinct. Far different from other years, Sir Walter seemed impatient to get away from Abbotsford to Edinburgh. "I have lost," he writes (4th November) to Cadell, "my old and faithful servant—my factotum—and am so much shocked, that I really wish to be quit of the country and safe in town. I have this day laid him in the grave. This has prevented my answering your letters."

The grave, close to the Abbey at Melrose, is surmounted by a modest monument, having on two sides these inscriptions:—

In grateful remembrance of the faithful and attached friendship years, and in sorrow for the loss of a sincere moral; this stone was erected by Sir Walter S of Abbotstord.

*Here lies the body of Thomas Purdie, wood-forester at who died 29th October 1829, aged sixty two years.
lest thou be faithful over a few things, I will make thee many things." — St. Matthew, chap. xxxv. ver. 21st*

CHAPTER XVI.

Publication of the Ayrshire Tragedy, Letters on Demonology, Tales on the History of France, &c. — Apoplectic Seizure — Retirement from the Court of Session — Offers of a pension and of additional rank declined — Count Robert of Paris begun — Death of George IV. — Political Commotions — Fourth Epistle of Malagrowther — Speech on Reform at Jedburgh. 1830–1831.

AT this time, Mr. Pitcairn was editing for the Bannatyne Club that curious collection of Ancient Scotch Criminal Trials which Scott reviewed in the Quarterly of 1831. On his arrival in Edinburgh, Mr. Pitcairn sent him a new volume in proof requesting his attention particularly to its details on the extraordinary case of Mure of Auchindraine, A.D. 1611. Scott was so much interested with these documents, that he resolved to found a dramatic sketch on their terrible story; and the result was a composition far superior to any of his previous attempts of that nature. Indeed, there are several passages in his Ayrshire Tragedy — especially that where the murdered corpse floats upright in the wake of the assassin's bark — (an incident suggested by a lamentable chapter in Lord Nelson's history) — which may bear comparison with anything but Shakspeare. Yet I doubt whether the prose narrative of the preface be not, on the whole, more dramatic than the versified scenes. It contains, by the way, some very striking allusions to the recent murder of Weare by Thurtell and others at Gill's Hill in Hertfordshire, and the atrocities of Burke and Hare in the West Port of Edinburgh. This piece was published in a thin octavo, early in 1830.

But he was now to pay the penalty of his unparalleled toils. On the 15th of February, about two o'clock in the afternoon, he returned from the Parliament House apparently in his usual state, and found an old acquaintance, Miss Young of Hawick, waiting to shew him some MS. memoirs of her father (a dissenting minister of great worth and talents), which he had lunk down again — a slight convulsion agitated. After a few minutes he got up and staggered to room, where Anne Scott and my sister, Violet, I sitting. They rushed to meet him, but he fell at on the floor ere they could reach him. He remain for about ten minutes, by which time a surgeon h bled him. He was cupped again in the evening recovered possession of speech, and of all his f fat that, the occurrence being kept quiet, wher abroad again after a short interval, people in ge no serious change. He submitted to the utme regimen, taking nothing but pulse and water fo and the alarm of his family and intimate friends and he, he again mingled in society much as us to have almost persuaded himself that the attack merely from the stomach, though his letters cont aison to drop hints that the symptoms resemble paralysis. When we recollect that both his f elder brother died of paralysis, and consider th agitation and exertion to which Sir Walter had during the four preceding years, the only wond blow (which had, I suspect, several indistinct h deferred so long; there can be none that it was by others of the same description.

He struggled manfully, however, against hi during 1820 covered almost as many sheets with 1829. About March I find, from his correspond lantyne, that he was working regularly at his Let ology and Witchcraft for Murray's Family Lib on a Fourth Series of the Tales of a Grandfath being French History. Both of these books v by the end of the year; and the former contains worthy of his best day — little snatches of pict tive and the like — in fact, transcripts of his ow side stories. The shrewdness with which eviden legal cases attests, too, that the main reason mained unshaken. But, on the whole, these wo be submitted to a strict ordeal of criticism. Th a cloudiness both of words and arrangement. N differently of the second volume of his Scottis Lardner, which was published in May. His v viewal of Mr. Southey's Life and Edition of Bu in August — about which time his recovery reached its acme.

In the course of the Spring Session, circumstances rendered it highly probable that Sir Walter's resignation of his place as Clerk of Session might be acceptable to the Government; and it is not surprising that he should have, on the whole, been pleased to avail himself of this opportunity. He says, in his Diary — "May 27. I am agitating a proposed retirement from the Court. As they are only to have four instead of six Clerks of Session, it will be their interest to let me retire on a superannuation. Probably I shall make a bad bargain, and get only two-thirds of the salary, instead of three-fourths. This would be hard, but I could save between two or three hundred pounds by giving up town residence. At any rate, jacta est alea. I think the difference will be infinite in point of health and happiness. Yet I do not know. It is perhaps a violent change in the end of life to quit the walk one has trod so long, and the cursed splenetic temper which besets all men makes you value opportunities and circumstances when one enjoys them no longer."

On the 26th of June, he heard of the death of King George IV. with the regret of a devoted and obliged subject. He had received almost immediately before, two marks of his Majesty's kind attention. Understanding that his retirement from the Court of Session was at hand, Sir William Knighton suggested that he might henceforth be more frequently in London, and that he might fitly be placed at the head of a new commission for examining and editing the MSS. collections of the exiled Princes of the House of Stuart, which had come into the King's hands on the death of the Cardinal of York. This Sir Walter gladly accepted, and contemplated with pleasure spending the ensuing winter in London. But another proposition, that of elevating him to the rank of Privy Counsellor, was unhesitatingly declined. He desired the Lord Chief-Commissioner, whom the King had desired to ascertain his feelings on the subject, to convey his grateful thanks, with his humble apology: and his reasons are thus stated in the Diary of the succeeding winter: — "I had also a kind communication about interfering to have me named a P. Counsellor. But — besides that when one is old and poor, one should avoid taking rank — I would be much happier if I thought any act of kindness was done to help forward Charles; and having said so much, I made my bow, and declared my purpose of remaining satisfied with my knighthood. All this is rather pleasing. Yet much of it looks like winding up my bottom for the rest of my life."

In July came the formal intimation that he had a Clerk of Session, and should thenceforth have, salary, &c. £1,300; an allowance of £1,800 per year was accompanied by an intimation from the H. that the Ministers were quite ready to grant covering the reduction of his income. Considered the bond-slave of his creditors, he made known proposition, and stated that it would be extremely hard to accept of it, and with the delicacy and generosity throughout characterised their conduct towards him, without hesitation entreated him on no account to do otherwise than to own to me in such a matter as this. Few things more pleasant than this handsome communication.

Just after he had taken leave of Edinburgh, and had thought for ever, he received a communication, as inopportune as any that ever reached him for the 15th July says briefly — "I have a letter from a young gentleman, announcing that his sister has mistaken the intentions of a lame baronet high as to suppose him only prevented by modesty certain wishes and hopes, &c. The party is a woman, so my vanity may be satisfied. But I excused little picking upon the terms."

During the rest of the summer and autumn his I were at Chiefswood, and saw him of course daily, too, had been restored to the cottage at Kaeside. Tom Furdie made a dismal blank, old habits were of course of life seemed little altered from what it be. He looked pale and worn before evening seldom departed from the strict regimen of his often brightened up to all his former glee, to the bottle and sipping toast and water. His especially saw no change. However languid, viewed at the sight of them, and the greatest pleasure was in paring Douce Davie through the green lawns, with them clustered about him on ponies, while Laidlaw, the ladies, and myself, walked in his directions about pruning and marking trees. In the immediate alarms of the spring, it might have been able to witness this placid twilight scene, but I edge that nothing could keep him from toiling daily at his desk, and alas! that he was no longer by the daily commendations of his printer. In as the season advanced, that the manner in which communicated with him was sinking into his spirits, and Laidlaw foresaw, as well as myself, that some trying crisis of discussion could not be much longer deferred. A nervous twitching about the muscles of the mouth was always more or less discernible from the date of the attack in February; but we could easily tell, by the aggravation of that symptom, when he had received a packet from the Canongate. It was distressing, indeed, to think that he might, one of these days, sustain a second seizure, and be left still more helpless, yet with the same undiminished appetite for literary labour. And then, if he felt his printer's complaints so keenly, what was to be expected in the case of a plain and undeniable manifestation of disappointment on the part of the public, and consequently of the bookseller?

All this was for the inner circle. Country neighbours went and came, without, I believe, observing almost anything of what grieved the family. Nay, this autumn he was far more troubled with the invasions of strangers, than he had ever been since his calamities of 1826. The astonishing success of the new editions was, as usual, doubled or trebled by rumour. The notion that he had already all but cleared off his encumbrances, seems to have been widely prevalent, and no doubt his refusal of a pension tended to confirm it. Abbotsford was, for some weeks at least, besieged much as it had used to be in the golden days of 1823 and 1824; and if sometimes his guests brought animation and pleasure with them, even then the result was a legacy of redoubled lassitude. The Diary, among a very few and far-separated entries, has this:— "September 5.— In spite of Resolution, I have left my Diary for some weeks, — I cannot well tell why. We have had abundance of travelling Counts and Countesses, Yankees male and female, and a Yankee-Doodle-Dandy into the bargain—a smart young Virginia-man. But we have had friends of our own also—the Miss Ardens, young Mrs. Morrith and Ann Morrith, most agreeable visitors.— Cadell came out here yesterday with his horn filled with good news. He calculates that in October the debt will be reduced to L.60,000. This makes me care less about the terms I retire upon. The efforts by which we have advanced thus far are new in literature, and what is gained is secure."

Mr. Cadell's great hope, when he offered this visit, had been that the good news of the Magnum might induce Sir Walter to content himself with working at notes and prefaces for its coming volumes, without straining at more difficult tasks. He found his friend, however, by no means disposed to adopt such views, and suggested very kindly, and by way of an exergone, that before entering into it, he should draw up a sort of catalogue most curious articles in his library and manuscript, and began next morning to do what he deemed to publish in the usual manner, under the title of "Reliquiae Frobenianae, or the Oldbook." Nothing, as it seemed to all, have suited the time better, but after a few found this was not sufficient—that he should during hæc subsessio, but must bend his position of a romance, founded on a story which once told cursorily already, and for which, under the various titles of Robert of Robert de L'Isle—and Count Robert of F nothing to be said in reply to the decisive this purpose. The usual agreements were drawn up, and the work was begun.

In the ensuing month (October 1830) the King of France, Charles X., was invited by the English to resume his old quarters at Holyrood; and other things that about this time mortified him more than to hear that the popular burgh had been so much exasperated against him (especially by an ungenerous article in the organ of the place), that his reception there would be rough and insulting. Sir Walter thought on this occasion his voice might, perhaps, be listened to by his countrymen well in their strength, as well as in their weakness, and put forth in Ballantyne's newspaper (October), a manly appeal to their better feelings, in these words:—"The person who writes this, leaving his native city, never to return as a resident. He has some reason to be proud of distance from his fellow citizens; and he has not the least doubt that the taste and good feeling of those who will term us, will dictate to them the quiet, civil tone of feeling, which will do honour both to their hearts, which have seldom been appealed to. Frenchman Melmet, in mentioning the refuge afforded to Henry VI. in his distress, records it as a hospitable town in Europe. It is a testimony, and sincerely do I hope there is little danger upon the present occasion."

the writer had anticipated. The royal exiles were received with perfect decorum, which their modest bearing to all classes, and unobtrusive, though magnificent benevolence to the poor, ere long converted into a feeling of deep and affectionate respectfulness. During their stay in Scotland, the King took more than one opportunity of conveying to Sir Walter his gratitude for this salutary interference on his behalf. The ladies of the royal family had a curiosity to see Abbotsford, but being aware of his reduced health and wealth, took care to visit the place when he was known to be from home. Several French noblemen of the train, however, paid him their respects personally. I remember with particular pleasure a couple of days that the Duke of Laval-Montmorency spent with him: he was also gratified with a visit from Marshal Bourmont, though unfortunately that came after his ailments had much advanced. The Marshal was accompanied by the Baron d'Haussez, one of the Polignac Ministry, whose published account of his residence in this country contains no specimen of vain imbecility more pitiable than the page he gives to Abbotsford. So far from comprehending anything of his host's character or conversation, the Baron had not even eyes to observe that he was in a sorely dilapidated condition of bodily health.

The reader has already seen that he had many misgivings in contemplating his final retirement from the situation he had occupied for six-and-twenty years in the Court of Session. Such a breach in old habits is always a serious experiment; but in his case it was very particularly so, because it involved his losing during the winter months, when men most need society, the intercourse of almost all that remained to him of dear familiar friends. He had besides a love for the very stones of Edinburgh, and the thought that he was never again to sleep under a roof of his own in his native city, cost him many a pang. But he never alludes either in his Diary or in his letters (nor do I remember that he ever did so in conversation) to the circumstance which, far more than all besides, occasioned care and regret in the bosom of his family. However he might cling to the notion that his recent ailments sprung merely from a disordered stomach, they had dismissed that dream, and the heaviest of their thoughts was, that he was fixing himself in the country just when his health, perhaps his life, might depend any given hour on the immediate presence of a surgical hand. They reflected that the only practitioner resident come too late, even if through the messenger should have come, but that his practice extended over a widely-peopled country, and that at the hour of need, probably for half a day's journey off us at Melrose, would have persuaded him that his library, and other papers, had fallen into such confusion, that to have some clever young student in the house during his absence to arrange them; and had he taken the suggestion of a medical student would of course have been asked whether or not he suspected our real motive, he would not have done so much; and his friendly surgeon (Mr. James) then did the best he could for us, by instructing a domestic, privately, in the use of the lancet. The Nicholson—a name never to be mentioned by any family without respect and gratitude. He had been in the household from his boyhood, and was about this time (Daglish retiring from weak health) advanced in age. Early and continued kindness had made a deep impression on this fine handsome young man's heart, he possessed intelligence, good sense, and a courage and dexterity which Sir Walter had to see him display in sports and pastimes, proved of inestimable service to the master whom he loved and revered; with the love and reverence of a son, he had yet fully reached the period at which human beings are capable of ministrations of this class, I may as well name him, Nicholson, Miss Scott's maid, Mrs. Celia Street's person whose unwearied zeal, coupled with a modest and unassuming stamp of Nature's gentlewomen, contributed to the comfort of Sir Walter and his children during the brief remainder of his life.¹

Affliction, as it happened, lay heavy at this time on the household of Huntley Burn also. The eldest Miss Feilding died on her deathbed; and thus, when my wife and I were obliged to move southwards at the beginning of winter, Sir Walter left almost entirely dependent on his daughter Anne Laidlaw, and the worthy domestics whom I have before mentioned. Anne Laidlaw attended him as amanuensis, and often dined and breakfasted with him. A more delicate task never upon any man's friend, than he had about this time to encounter. He could not watch Scott from hour to hour—above all, he could not write to his dictation, without gradually, slowly, most reluctantly taking home to his bosom the conviction that the mighty mind, which he had worshipped through more than thirty years of intimacy, had lost something, and was daily losing something more of its energy. The faculties were there, and each of them was every now and then displaying itself in its full vigour; but the sagacious judgment, the brilliant fancy, the unrivalled memory, were all subject to occasional eclipse—

¹ On Sir Walter's death, Nicholson passed into the service of Mr. Morritt at Rokeby. He died at Kelso in 1841. Mrs. Street remained in my house till 1836, when she married Mr. Griffiths, a respectable tradesman at Kaling.

“ Amid the strings his fingers stray'd,
And an uncertain warbling made.”

Ever and anon he paused and looked round him, like one half-waking from a dream, mocked with shadows. The sad bewilderment of his gaze shewed a momentary consciousness that, like Samson in the lap of the Philistine, “his strength was passing from him, and he was becoming weak like unto other men.” Then came the strong effort of aroused will—the cloud dispersed as if before an irresistible current of purer air—all was bright and serene as of old—and then it closed again in yet deeper darkness.

During the early part of this winter the situation of Cadell and Ballantyne was hardly less painful, and still more embarrassing. What doubly and trebly perplexed them was, that while the MS. sent for press seemed worse every budget, Sir Walter's letters continued as clear in thought, and almost so in expression, as formerly—full of the old shrewdness and firmness, and manly kindness, and even of the old good-humoured pleasantry. About them, except the staggering penmanship, and here and there one word put down obviously for another, there was scarcely anything to indicate decayed vigour. It is not surprising that poor Ballantyne, in particular, should have shrunk from the notion that anything was amiss,—except the choice of an unfortunate subject, and the indulgence of more than common carelessness and rapidity in composition. He seems to have done so as he would from some horrid suggestion of the Devil; and accordingly obeyed his natural sense of duty, by stating, in plain terms, that he considered the opening chapters of Count Robert as decidedly inferior to anything that had ever before come from that pen. James appears to have dwelt chiefly on the hopelessness of any Byzantine fable, and he might certainly have long train of examples for the fatality which so often attended any attempt to awaken anything like a liberal and liberalizing sentiment among the persons and manners of the generation to which he alluded. The childish form and bigotry, the weak pompous pretensions, the miserable plots and treacheries without cultivation of those European Chinese on which Scott had fixed was, however, one that doomed slaves of vanity and superstition into a vigorous barbarism both of western Christendom and the Ottoman. Sir Walter had, years before, been called upon to show his own capabilities,¹ and who dares to say that, had he not done so, he would not have achieved as signal a triumph over all critics as he had done when he rescued Scottish romance from the mawkish degradation in which Waverley found it.

In himself and his own affairs there was one and perplex him and all who watched him; but the political horizon also pressed more heavily upon him than it had ever done before. All the evils which were apprehended from the rupture among the Torys at the beginning of 1827, were now, in his opinion, abated and annihilated. The high Protestant party, blind to the merits of the abolition of the Test Act and the Catholic disabilities, seemed willing to run any risk for the purpose of driving the Duke of Wellington from office. The general election, occasioned by the demise of George IV. was held while the successful revolts in France were uppermost in every mind, and furnished the ultra-Tories with captivating topics. The result had strengthened the old opposition in the House of Commons, and a single vote, in which the ultra-Tories joined, was considered by the Ministry as so ominous, that they immediately retired from office. The succeeding cabinet, headed by Grey, included names identified, in Scott's view, with the wildest rage of innovation. Their first step was to pass a bill of Parliamentary Reform on a large scale, and it was soon known they had secured the warm support of William IV. Great discontent prevailed throughout the labouring classes of many districts, both commercial and rural. Every newspaper teemed with reports of riot and incendiarism; and the selection of such a Ministry was considered an impatience and turbulence for a legislative experiment.

¹ See his Essay on Romance, 1823.

important than had ever before been agitated within the forms of the constitution — was perhaps regarded by most grave and retired men with feelings near akin to those of the anxious and melancholy invalid at Abbotsford. To annoy him additionally, he found many eminent persons, who had hitherto avowed politics of his own colour, renouncing all their old tenets, and joining the cry of Reform, which to him sounded Revolution, as keenly as the keenest of those who had been through life considered apostles of Republicanism. And I must also observe, that as, notwithstanding his own steady Toryism, he had never allowed political differences to affect his private feelings towards friends and companions, so it now happened that among the few with whom he had daily intercourse, there was hardly one he could look to for sympathy in his present reflections and anticipations. The affectionate Laidlaw had always been a stout Whig; he hailed the coming changes as the beginning of a political millennium. Ballantyne, influenced probably by his new ghostly counsellors, was by degrees leaning to a similar view of things. Cadell, his bookseller, and now the principal confidant and assistant from week to week in all his plans and speculations, had always, I presume, considered the Tory creed as a piece of weakness — to be pardoned, indeed, in a poet and an antiquary, but at best pitied in men of any other class.

Towards the end of November, Sir Walter had another slight touch of apoplexy. He recovered himself without assistance; but again consulted his physicians in Edinburgh, and by their advice adopted a still greater severity of regimen.

The reader will now understand what his frame and condition of health and spirits were, when he at length received from Ballantyne a decided protest against the novel on which he was struggling to fix the shattered energies of his memory and fancy. He replied thus:

“ Abbotsford, 8th Dec. 1830.

“ My Dear James, — If I were like other authors, as I flatter myself I am not, I should ‘ send you an order on my treasurer for a hundred ducats, wishing you all prosperity and a little more taste; ’¹ but having never supposed that any abilities I ever had were of a perpetual texture, I am glad when friends tell me what I might be long in finding out myself. Mr. Cadell will shew you what I have written to him. My present idea is to go abroad for a few months, if I hold to-gather as long. So ended the Fathers of the No-von Street, and it would be no unprofessi-vian. W. S."

¹ Archbishop of Grenada, in Gil Blas.

This note to the printer, and a letter of the strain to the publisher, "struck both," Mr. Caddismay. They resolved to go out to Abbotsfoa few days, because a general meeting of the hand, and there was reason to hope that it enable them to appear as the bearers of sundry town. Meantime, Sir Walter himself called and resolved, by way of testing his powers, w-being suspended, to write a fourth epistle of growth on the public affairs of the period.
ment of a political dissertation, at such a momen-excitement, and from a hand already trembling grings of a fatal malady, might well have fil-Hallantyne with new "dismay," even had they pared to adopt, in the fullest extent, such views of our state, and the remedies for them, as th-likely to dwell upon. They agreed that what safely do to avert this experiment must be done were both equally anxious to find, if it could means of withdrawing him from all literary la-that of annotating his former novels. But the only persons who had been, and then were, ex-art for that same purpose. His kind and skill-Doctors Abercrombie and Ross of Edinburgh, over preached the same doctrine, and assured peranted in working his brain, nothing coul-malady from recurring ere long in redoubled answered. "As for bidding me not work, I well put the kettle on the fire and say, Now, c myself, when I ventured to address him in a sit-replied. "I understand you, and I thank you, but I must tell you at once how it is with me, that I am quite myself in all things; but I am s-point there is no change. I mean, that I for-that if I were to be idle I should go mad. In this, death is no risk to shrink from."

The meeting of trustees and creditors took pl-

Mr. George Forbes (brother to the late Sir V-chair. There was then announced another d-Hallantyne estate of three shillings in the pound

ing the original amount of the debt to about L.54,000. It had been not unnaturally apprehended that the convulsed state of politics might have checked the sale of the Magnum Opus; but this does not seem to have been the case to any extent worth notice. The meeting was numerous — and, not contented with a renewed vote of thanks to their debtor, they passed unanimously a resolution, which was moved by Mr. (now Sir James) Gibson-Craig, and seconded by Mr. Thomas Allan — both, by the way, leading Whigs: — “That Sir Walter Scott be requested to accept of his furniture, plate, linens, paintings, library, and curiosities of every description, as the best means the creditors have of expressing their very high sense of his most honourable conduct, and in grateful acknowledgment for the unparalleled and most successful exertions he has made, and continues to make, for them.”

On the 18th, Cadell and Ballantyne proceeded to Abbotsford, and found Sir Walter in a placid state — having evidently been much soothed and gratified with the tidings from Mr. Forbes. His whole appearance was greatly better than they had ventured to anticipate; and deferring literary questions till the morning, he made this gift from his creditors the chief subject of his conversation. He said it had taken a heavy load off his mind; he apprehended that, even if his future works should produce little money, the profits of the Magnum, during a limited number of years, with the sum which had been insured on his life, would be sufficient to obliterate the remaining part of the Ballantyne debt: he considered the library and museum now conveyed to him as worth at the least L.10,000, and this would enable him to make some provision for his younger children. He said that he designed to execute his last will without delay, and detailed to his friends all the particulars which the document ultimately embraced. He mentioned to them that he had recently received, through the Lord Chief-Commissioner Adam, a message from the new King, intimating his Majesty's disposition to keep in mind his late brother's kind intentions with regard to Charles Scott; — and altogether his talk, though grave, and on grave topics, was the reverse of melancholy.

Next morning, in Sir Walter's study, Ballantyne read aloud the political essay — which had (after the old fashion) grown to an extent far beyond what the author contemplated when he began his task. To print it in the Weekly Journal, as originally proposed, would now be hardly compatible with the limits of that paper: Sir Walter had resolved on a separate publication.

I believe no one ever saw this performance but the bookseller, the printer, and William Laidlaw; and I cannot pretend to have gathered any clear notion of its contents,—except that the panacea was the reimposition of the income-tax; and that after much reasoning in support of this measure, Sir Walter attacked the principle of Parliamentary Reform in toto. We need hardly suppose that he advanced any objections which would seem new to the students of the debates in both Houses during 1831 and 1832; his logic carried no conviction to the breast of his faithful amanuensis; but Mr. Laidlaw assured me, nevertheless, that in his opinion no composition of Sir Walter's happiest day contained anything more admirable than the bursts of indignant and pathetic eloquence which here and there "set off a halting argument."

The critical arbiters, however, concurred in condemning the production. Cadell spoke out. He assured Sir Walter, that from not being in the habit of reading the newspapers and periodical works of the day, he had fallen behind the common rate of information on questions of practical policy; that the views he was enforcing had been already expounded by many Tories, and triumphantly answered by organs of the Liberal party; but that, be the intrinsic value and merit of these political doctrines what they might, he was quite certain that to put them forth at that season would be a measure of extreme danger for the author's personal interest; that it would throw a cloud over his general popularity, array a hundred active pens against any new work of another class that might soon follow, and perhaps even interrupt the hitherto splendid success of the Collection on which so much depended. On all these points Ballantyne, though with hesitation and diffidence, professed himself to be of Cadell's opinion. There ensued a scene of a very unpleasant sort; but by and by a kind of compromise was agreed to: the plan of a separate pamphlet, with the well-known nom de guerre of Malachi, was dropt; and Ballantyne was to stretch his columns so as to find room for the lucubration, adopting all possible means to mystify the public as to its parentage. This was the understanding when the conference broke up; but the unfortunate manuscript was soon afterwards committed to the flames. James Ballantyne accompanied the proof-sheet with many minute criticisms on the conduct as well as expression of the argument: the author's temper gave way and the commentary shared the fate of the text.

Mr. Cadell opens a very brief account of this affair with expressing his opinion, that "Sir Walter never recovered it;"

and he ends with an altogether needless apology for his own part in it. He did only what was his duty by his venerated friend; and he did it, I doubt not, as kindly in manner as in spirit. Even if the fourth epistle of Malachi had been more like its precursors than I can well suppose it to have been, nothing could have been more unfortunate for Sir Walter than to come forward at that moment as a prominent antagonist of Reform. Such an appearance might very possibly have had the consequences to which the bookseller pointed in his remonstrance; but at all events it must have involved him in a maze of replies and rejoinders; and I think it too probable, that some of the fiery disputants of the periodical press, if not of St. Stephen's Chapel, might have been ingenious enough to connect any real or fancied flaws in his argument with those circumstances in his personal condition which had for some time been darkening his own reflections with dim auguries of the fate of Swift and Marlborough. His reception of Ballantyne's affectionate candour may suggest what the effect of really hostile criticism would have been. The end was, that seeing how much he stood in need of some comfort, the printer and bookseller concurred in urging him not to despair of Count Robert. They assured him that he had attached too much importance to what had formerly been said about the defects of its opening chapters; and he agreed to resume the novel, which neither of them ever expected he would live to finish. "If we did wrong," says Cadell, "we did it for the best; we felt that to have spoken out as fairly on this as we had on the other subject, would have been to make ourselves the bearers of a death-warrant." I hope there are not many men who would have acted otherwise in their painful situation.

The next entry of the Diary has these sentences:— "Ever since my fall in February, it is very certain that I have seemed to speak with an impediment. To add to this, I have the constant increase of my lameness—the thigh-joint, knee-joint, and ankle-joint. I move with great pain in the whole limb, and am at every minute, during an hour's walk, reminded of my mortality. I should not care for all this, if I were sure of dying handsomely; and Cadell's calculations might be sufficiently firm, though the author of Waverley had pulled on his last nightcap. Nay, they might be even more trustworthy, if remains, and memoirs, and such like, were to give a zest to the posthumous. But the fear is, lest the blow be not sufficient to destroy life, and that I should linger on, 'a driveller and a show.'"¹

¹ Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes.

He says again, "January 18, 1831. Dictate till about one o'clock, during which time it was rained. I walked, shivering about in the mud, and detestable. In fact, there is no mistaking the Thro and Fate is now straitening its circumvallations: January 19. Mr. Landlaw came down at ten, till one. This is an important help to me, as it saves eyesight and nerves, which had been cruelly affected; those who look out of the windows grow gradually darker. Rode out, or, more properly, was carried, would to see the course of a new road, which carry off the flammings of the trees, and for ride well lined, and will serve both for beauty and Mr. Landlaw engages to come back to dinner, and three more pages. Met my agreeable and lady-like Mrs. Brewster, on my pony, and I was actually seen by her.

'Sir Denis Brand! and on so poor a steed!

I believe detestable folly of this kind is the leaves us. One would have thought I ought vanity at this time o' day; but it is an abiding of the old Adam, and I write for penance what actually felt. I think the peep, real or imaginary of death, should have given me firmness not afflictions."

On the 31st of January, Mrs. Scott being too journey, Sir Walter went alone to Edinburgh for of executing his last will. He for the first time town took up his quarters at a hotel; but the street disturbed him during the night (another much his nervous system had been shattered), he was persuaded to remove to his bookseller's Crescent. In the apartment allotted to him the several little pieces of furniture which some kin purchased for him at the sale in Castle Street, presented to Mrs. Cadell. "Here," says his Lockhart, "I saw various things that belonged to I had many sad thoughts on seeing and handling they are in kind keeping, and I was glad they to strangers."

There came on, next day, a storm of such so

1 See Plozz's Tale of The Three Sufficient Wa

2 Crabbe's Borough, Letter xiii.

had to remain under this friendly roof until the 9th of February. His host perceived that he was unfit for any company but the quietest, and had sometimes one old friend, Mr. Thomson, Mr. Clerk, or Mr. Skene, to dinner—but no more. He seemed glad to see them—but they all observed him with pain. He never took the lead in conversation, and often remained altogether silent. In the mornings he wrote usually for several hours at Count Robert; and Mr. Cadell remembers in particular, that on Ballantyne's reminding him that a motto was wanted for one of the chapters already finished, he looked out for a moment at the gloomy weather, and penned these lines—

“The storm increases — 'tis no sunny shower, Foster'd in the moist breast of March or April.
Or such as parched Summer cools his lips with.
Heaven's windows are flung wide; the inmost deeps
Call in hoarse greeting one upon another;
On comes the flood in all its foaming horrors,
And where's the dike shall stop it?”

The Deluge: a Poem.

On the 4th February, the will was signed, and attested by Nicolson, to whom Sir Walter explained the nature of the document, adding, “I deposit it for safety in Mr. Cadell's hands, and I still hope it may be long before he has occasion to produce it.” Poor Nicolson was much agitated, but stammered out a deep amen.

Another object of this journey was to consult, on the advice of Dr. Ebenezer Clarkson, a skilful mechanist, by name Fortune, about a contrivance for the support of the lame limb, which had of late given him much pain, as well as inconvenience. Mr. Fortune produced a clever piece of handiwork, and Sir Walter felt at first great relief from the use of it: insomuch that his spirits rose to quite the old pitch, and his letter to me upon the occasion overflows with merry applications of sundry maxims and verses about Fortune: “Fortes Fortuna adjuvat,” &c. &c.

Of this excursion the Diary says—“Abbotsford, February 9. The snow became impassable, and in Edinburgh I remained immoveably fixed for ten days, never getting out of doors, save once or twice to dinner, when I went and returned in a sedan-chair. Cadell made a point of my coming to his excellent house, where I had no less excellent an apartment, and the most kind treatment; that is, no making a show of me, for which I was in but bad tune. Abercrombie and Ross had me bled with cupping-glasses, reduced me confoundedly, and rest all creature comforts. But they did me good, as I sincerely meant to do; I got rid of a giddy feeling I had been plagued with, and have certainly returned much better. I did not neglect my testamentary affairs. I executed my will, leaving Walter burdened with L.1000 to Sophie and Anne, and the same to Charles. He is to advance the money if they want it; if not, to pay them interest at his own choice, otherwise I would have sold the rattletraps. I have made provisions for clearing my publications, should it be possible; and should it be possible, from the time of such clearance being effected, a fund available to all my children who shall be alive as representatives. My bequests must, many of them, be legal and thetical."

At the beginning of March, he was anew roused up in local affairs; and bestowed four days in drawing up a petition against the Reform Bill, which he designed to be presented by the Freeholders of the Forest. They, however, were a shorter one from the pen of a plain practical countryman (the late Mr. Elliot Lockhart of Borthwickbrae) who often represented them in Parliament: and Sir V. was probably, felt this disappointment more acutely than he had chosen to indicate in his Journal.

"March 11.—This day we had our meeting at Jedburgh. I found Borthwickbrae had sent the frame of an address which was the reverse of mine in every respect. As I had never met the ideas of the meeting (six in number) before, and as mine, than mine, I instantly put that in my pocket. It was my right to decline future interference, and let the world know 'Transeat cum cæteris erroribus.'—I will make my address public at every place where I shall be called upon to appear; but I will not thrust myself forward as a candidate. The Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to this vow!"

He kept it in all parts. Though urged to take part against the Reform Bill, by several persons of consequence, who of course little knew his real condition, he resolutely refused to make any such experiment. As he was equally resolved to be absent from no meeting as Sheriff or Deputy-Lieutenant, he might naturally be expected to appear in his place, and record his aversion to the Bill. The first of these meetings was one of the freeholders of the Forest, held at Jedburgh on the 21st of March, and there, dress and alarm of his daughter, he insisted on being present, and proposing one of the Tory resolutions, — which he did in a speech of some length, but delivered in a tone so low, and with such hesitation in utterance, that only a few detached passages were intelligible to the bulk of the audience.

“We are told” (said he) “on high authority, that France is the model for us, — that we and all the other nations ought to put ourselves to school there, — and endeavour to take out our degrees at the University of Paris.¹ The French are a very ingenious people; they have often tried to borrow from us, and now we should repay the obligation by borrowing a leaf from them. But I fear there is an incompatibility between the tastes and habits of France and Britain, and that we may succeed as ill in copying them, as they have hitherto done in copying us. We, in this district, are proud, and with reason, that the first chain-bridge was the work of a Scotchman. It still hangs where he erected it, a pretty long time ago. The French heard of our invention, and determined to introduce it, but with great improvements and embellishments. A friend of my own saw the thing tried. It was on the Seine, at Marly. The French chain-bridge looked lighter and airier than the prototype. Every Englishman present was disposed to confess that we had been beaten at our own trade. But by and by the gates were opened, and the multitude were to pass over. It began to swing rather formidably beneath the pressure of the good company; and by the time the architect, who led the procession in great pomp and glory, reached the middle, the whole gave way, and he — worthy, patriotic artist — was the first that got a ducking. They had forgot the great middle bolt — or rather, this ingenious person had conceived that to be a clumsy-looking feature, which might safely be dispensed with, while he put some invisible gimcrack of his own to supply its place.” — Here Sir Walter was interrupted by violent hissing and hooting from the populace of the town, who had flocked in and occupied the greater part of the Court-House. He stood calmly till the storm subsided, and resumed; but the friend, whose notes are before me, could not catch what he said, until his voice rose with another illustration of the old style. “My friends,” he said, “I am old and failing, and you think me full of very silly prejudices; but I have seen a good deal of public men, and thought a good deal of public affairs in my day, and I can’t help suspecting that the manufacturers of this new constitution are like a parcel of schoolboys taking to pieces a watch which used to go tolerably well for all practical purposes, in the concert that they can put it together, than the old watchmaker. I fear they will come to the reconstruction, and I should be much surprised if it were to turn out that they had been to break the main spring." Then he was assailed by a Babel of contemptuous sounds, which rendered further attempts ineffectual. He, at length, proposed his Resolution, and then, turning to the artisans, exclaimed, "I regard you as the goose on the green." His countenance glowed, as he resumed his seat on the bench. A few moments afterwards, the business being over, he drew, every trace of passion was gone. He rose to the door, and bowed to the assembly. Two or three renewed their hissing, he bowed again, and the words of the doomed gladiator, which I had joined in these insults underpinned—"AD SALUTEM."

¹ See Edinburgh Review for October 1830, p. 23.

CHAPTER XVII.

Apoplectic Paralysis Miss Ferrier.— Election Scenes at Jedburgh and Selkirk— Castle Dangerous begun— Excursion to Douglasdale— Visits of Captain Burns and Wordsworth— Departure from Abbotsford— London— Voyage in the Barham— Malta— Naples— Rome— Notes by Mrs. Davy, Sir W. Gell, and Mr. E. Cheney— Publication of the last Tales of my Landlord. 1831–1832.

AFTER a pause of some days, the Diary has this entry for April 25, 1831:— “From Saturday 16th April, to Saturday 24th of the same month, unpleasantly occupied by ill health and its consequences. A distinct stroke of paralysis affecting both my nerves and speech, though beginning only on Monday with a very bad cold. Doctor Abercrombie was brought out by the friendly care of Cadell,—but young Clarkson had already done the needful, that is, had bled and blistered, and placed me on a very reduced diet. Whether precautions have been taken in time, I cannot tell. I think they have, though severe in themselves, beat the disease; but I am alike prepared.”

The preceding paragraph has been deciphered with difficulty. The blow which it records was greatly more severe than any that had gone before it. Sir Walter's friend Lord Meadowbank had come to Abbotsford, as usual when on the Jedburgh circuit; and he would make an effort to receive the Judge in something of the old style of the place; he collected several of the neighbouring gentry to dinner, and tried to bear his wonted part in the conversation. Feeling his strength and spirits flagging, he was tempted to violate his physician's directions, and took two or three glasses of champagne, not having tasted wine for several months before. On retiring to his dressing-room he had this severe shock of apoplectic paralysis, and kept his bed under the surgeon's hands for several days.

Shortly afterwards his eldest son and his daughter Sophia arrived at Abbotsford. It may be supposed that they both of a fever. I followed her a week later, when we established ourselves at Chiefswood for the rest of the season. Charles Scott had some months before this time gone to Naples, as an attaché to the British embassy there. During the next six months the Major was at Abbotsford every now and then — as often as circumstances could permit him to be absent from his Hussars.

On my arrival (May 10th), I found Sir Walter to have rallied considerably; yet his appearance, as I first saw him, was the most painful sight I had ever then seen. Knowing at what time I might be expected, he had been lifted on his pony, and advanced about half a mile on the Selkirk road to meet me. He moved at a foot-pace, with Laidlaw at one stirrup, and his forester Swanston (a fine fellow, who did all he could to replace Tom Purdie) at the other. Abreast was old Peter Mathieson on horseback, with one of my children astride before him on a pillion. Sir Walter had had his head shaved, and wore a black silk night-cap under his blue bonnet. All his garments hung loose about him; his countenance was thin and haggard, and there was an obvious distortion in the muscles of one cheek. His look, however, was placid — his eye was bright as ever — perhaps brighter than it ever was in health; he smiled with the same affectionate gentleness, and though at first it was not easy to understand everything he said, he spoke cheerfully and manfully.

He had resumed, and was trying to recast, his novel. All the medical men had urged him, by every argument, to abstain from any such attempts; but he smiled on them in silence, or answered with some jocular rhyme. One note has this post-script — a parody on a sweet lyric of Burns: —

“Dour, dour, and eident was he,
Dour and eident but-and-ben — Dour against their barley-water,
And eident on the Bramah pen.”

He told me, that in the winter he had more than once tried writing with his own hand, because he had no longer the same “pith and birr” that formerly rendered dictation easy to him; but that the experiment failed. He was now sensible he could do nothing without Laidlaw to hold the Bramah pen; adding, “Willie is a kind clerk — I see by his looks when I am pleasing him, and that pleases me.” And however the cool critic may now estimate Count Robert, no one who then saw the author could wonder that Laidlaw’s prevalent feeling in writing these pages should have been admiration. Under the full consciousness that he had sustained three or four strokes of apoplexy or palsy, or both combined, and tortured by various attendant ailments—cramp, rheumatism in half his joints, daily increasing lameness, and now of late gravel (which was, though last, not least)—he retained all the energy of his will, struggled manfully against this sea of troubles, and might well have said seriously, as he more than once both said and wrote playfully, “’Tis not in mortals to command success,

But we’ll do more, Sempronius, we’ll deserve it.”¹

To assist them in amusing him in the hours which he spent out of his study, and especially that he might be tempted to make those hours more frequent, his daughters had invited his friend the authoress of Marriage to come out to Abbotsford; and her coming was serviceable. For she knew and loved him well, and she had seen enough of affliction akin to his, to be well skilled in dealing with it. She could not be an hour in his company without observing what filled his children with more sorrow than all the rest of the case. He would begin a story as gaily as ever, and go on, in spite of the hesitation in his speech, to tell it with picturesque effect;—but before he reached the point, it would seem as if some internal spring had given way—he paused and gazed round him with the blank anxiety of look that a blind man has when he has dropped his staff. Unthinking friends sometimes pained him sadly by giving him the catchword abruptly. I noticed the delicacy of Miss Ferrier on such occasions. Her sight was bad, and she took care not to use her glasses when he was speaking; and she affected to be also troubled with deafness, and would say

“Well, I am getting as dull as a post— I have not heard a word since you said so and so;”—being sure to mention a circumstance behind that at which he had really halted. He then took up the thread with his habitual smile of courtesy— as if forgetting his case entirely in the consideration of the lady’s infirmity. — He had also a visit from the learned and pious Dr Macintosh Mackay, then minister of Laggan, but now at Dunoon—the chief author of the Gaelic Dictionary, then recently published under the auspices of the Highland Society; and this gentleman also accommodated himself, with the tact of genuine kindness, to the circumstances of the time.

In the family circle Sir Walter seldom spoke of his illness

¹ Addison’s Cato.

at all, and when he did, it was always in the hopeful strain. In private to Laidlaw and myself, his language corresponded exactly with the tone of the Diary — he expressed his belief that the chances of recovery were few — very few — but always added, that he considered it his duty to exert what faculties remained to him, for the sake of his creditors, to the very last. “I am very anxious,” he repeatedly said to me, “to be done, one way or other, with this Count Robert, and a little story about the Castle Dangerous, which also I had long had in my head — but after that I will attempt nothing more — at least not until I have finished all the notes for the novels, &c. ; for, in case of my going off at the next slap, you would naturally have to take up that job, — and where could you get at all my old wives’ stories?”

I felt the sincerest pity for Cadell and Ballantyne at this time; and advised him to lay Count Robert aside for a few weeks at all events, until the general election now going on should be over. He consented — but immediately began another series of Tales on French History — which he never completed.

On the 18th of May, I witnessed a scene which must dwell painfully on many memories besides mine. The rumours of brick-bat and bludgeon work at the hustings of this month were so prevalent, that Sir Walter’s family, and not less zealously the Tory candidate (Henry Scott, heir of Harden, now Lord Polwarth), tried every means to dissuade him from attending the election for Roxburghshire. We thought overnight that we had succeeded, and indeed, as the result of the vote was not at all doubtful, there could be no good reason for his appearing on this occasion. About seven in the morning, however, when I came downstairs intending to ride over to Jedburgh, I found he had countermanded my horse, ordered his chariot to the door, and was already impatient to be off for the scene of action. We found the town in a most tempestuous state: in fact, it was almost wholly in the hands of a disciplined rabble, chiefly weavers from Hawick, who marched up and down with drums and banners, and then, after filling the Court-hall, lined the streets, grossly insulting every one who did not wear the reforming colours. Sir Walter’s carriage, as it advanced towards the house of the Shortreed family, was pelted with stones; one or two fell into it, but none touched him. He breakfasted with the widow and children of his old friend, and then walked to the Hall between me and one of the young Shortreeds. He was saluted with groans and blasphemies all the way — and I blush to add that a woman spat upon him from a window; but this last contumely I think he did not observe. The scene within was much what has been described under the date of March 21st, except that though he attempted to speak from the Bench, not a word was audible, such was the frenzy. Young Harden was returned by a great majority, 40 to 19, and we then with difficulty gained the inn where the carriage had been put up. But the aspect of the street was by that time such, that several of the gentlemen on the Whig side came and entreated us not to attempt starting from the front of our inn. One of them, Captain Russell Elliot of the Royal Navy, lived in the town, or rather in a villa adjoining it, to the rear of the Spread Eagle. Sir Walter was at last persuaded to accept this courteous adversary's invitation, and accompanied him through some winding lanes to his residence. Peter Mathieson by and by brought the carriage thither, in the same clandestine method, and we escaped from Jedburgh—with one shower more of stones at the Bridge. I believe there would have been a determined onset at that spot, but for the zeal of three or four sturdy Darnickers (Joseph Shillinglaw, carpenter, being their Coryphæus), who had, unobserved by us, clustered themselves beside the footman in the rumble. The Diary contains this brief notice:—“May 18.—Went to Jedburgh greatly against the wishes of my daughters. The mob were exceedingly vociferous and brutal, as they usually are nowadays. The population gathered in formidable numbers—a thousand from Hawick also—sad blackguards. The day passed with much clamour and no mischief. Henry Scott was re-elected—for the last time, I suppose. Troja fuit. I left the borough in the midst of abuse, and the gentle hint of Burk Sir Walter. Much obliged to the brave lads of Jeddart.”

Sir Walter fully anticipated a scene of similar violence at the Selkirk election, which occurred a few days afterwards; but though here also, by help of weavers from a distance, there was a sufficiently formidable display of Radical power, there occurred hardly anything of what had been apprehended. Here the Sheriff was at home—known intimately to everybody, himself probably knowing almost all of man's estate by head mark, and, in spite of political fanaticism, all but universally beloved as well as feared. The only person who ventured actually to hustle a Tory elector on his way to the poll, attracted Scott's observation at the moment when he was getting out of his carriage; he instantly seized the delinquent with his own hand—the man's spirit quailed, and no one coming to the rescue, he was safely committed to prison until the business of the day was over. Sir Walter had endeavoured to preside at this election, and therefore his family would probably have made no attempt to dissuade him from attending, even had he staid away from Jedburgh. Among the circulating and unproved rumours of the time, was one that Lord William, the Tory candidate for Dumbartonshire, had been cruelly massacred by the rabble of his county town. He was grievously maltreated, but escaped murder, though, it is said, narrowly. But I can never forget the high glow of indignation which refused Sir Walter's countenance when he heard the unproved and denied story, and said calmly, in rather a clear voice, in the midst of his calamitous affliction almost disappearing for the moment — "Well, Lord William died at his post —

‘Non aliter cineres mando jacere meos.’”¹

I am well pleased that the ancient capital of the nation should not stain its fair name upon this miserable occasion. I am sorry for Jedburgh and Hawick. This last town is almost within sight of Branksome Hall, overhanging the sweet Teviot's silver tide. The civilised American or Englishman will curse these places, of which he would never hear had it not been for Scott, as he passes through them in some remote century, when perhaps all that remains of our nation may be the high literature adopted and extended in America, and planted from our blood.

No doubt these disturbances of the general election had an unfavourable influence on the invalid. When they were over he grew calmer and more collected; his speech became a little time, much clearer, and such were the symptoms of recovery still about him, that I began to think a restoration not impossible. Some business called me to London about the middle of the year, and when I returned at the end of three weeks, I had the satisfaction to find that he had been gradually amending.

But, alas! the first use he made of this partial recovery had been to expose his brain once more to an imaginary attack. He began his Castle Dangerous — the ground-work being an old story which he had told in print, many years before, in a rapid manner.² And now, for the first time, he let out the type of his secret. He thus writes to Cadell on the 10th of July: — “I intend to tell this little matter to nobody but my heart. Perhaps not even to him; certainly not to Johnstone, having turned his back on his old political friends.

¹ Martial, i. 89

² See Essay on Chivalry — 183.

longer have a claim to be a secretary in such matters, though I shall always be glad to befriend him." James's criticisms on Count Robert had wounded him — the Diary, already quoted, shews how severely. The last visit this old ally ever paid at Abbotsford, occurred a week or two after. His newspaper had by this time espoused openly the cause of the Reform Bill — and some unpleasant conversation took place on that subject, which might well be a sore one for both parties — and not least, considering the whole of his personal history, for Mr. Ballantyne. Next morning, being Sunday, he disappeared abruptly, without saying farewell; and when Scott understood that he had signified an opinion that the reading of the Church service, with a sermon from South or Barrow, would be a poor substitute for the mystical eloquence of some new idol down the vale, he expressed considerable disgust. They never met again in this world. In truth, Ballantyne's health also was already much broken; and if Scott had been entirely himself, he would not have failed to connect that circumstance in a charitable way with this never strong-minded man's recent abandonment of his own old terra firma, both religious and political. But this is a subject on which we have no title to dwell. Sir Walter's misgivings about himself, if I read him aright, now rendered him desirous of external support; but this his spirit would fain suppress and disguise even from itself. When I again saw him on the 13th of this month, he shewed me several sheets of the new romance, and told me how he had designed at first to have it printed by somebody else than Ballantyne, but that, on reflection, he had shrunk from hurting his feelings on so tender a point. I found, however, that he had neither invited nor received any opinion from James as to what he had written, but that he had taken an alarm lest he should fall into some blunder about the scenery fixed on (which he had never seen but once when a schoolboy), and had kept the sheets in proof until I should come back and accompany him in a short excursion to Lanarkshire. He was anxious in particular to see the tombs in the Church of St. Bride, adjoining the site of his "Castle Dangerous," of which Mr. Blore had shewn him drawings; and he hoped to pick up some of the minute traditions, in which he had always delighted, among the inhabitants of Douglasdale.

We set out early on the 18th, and ascended the Tweed, passing in succession Yair, Ashestiel, Innerleithen, Traquair, and many more scenes dear to his early life, and celebrated in his writings. The morning was still, but gloomy, and at length we had some thunder. It seemed to excite him vividly, — and on coming soon afterwards within view of the white Drakel, that is on the moorland ridge I and Castle, which was begun, but never finished. Morton was a man so vain typical of his ambition could hardly be restrained from making some remark. Morton, too, was a Douglas, and that name his claim of chivalry. We pushed on to Higgarr reaching it towards sunset, were detained there by want of houses. It was soon discovered who population of the little town turned out, and he gratified with their respectful courtesy. It was I observed him otherwise than annoyed upon his journey, he stood, lying on his mind, and he in to find that political differences did not interfere with his reception among his countrymen. Because lay deeper.

Another symptom that distressed me during was, that he seemed constantly to be setting tasks. It was not as of old, when, if any one quoted from the fulness of his heart, could not help repeat. He was obviously in fear that this power was losing its tenacity, and taking every occasion stretch it. He sometimes failed, and gave it in captand in his eye. At other times he succeeded, and smiled as he closed his recital. About Higgarr, we overtook a parcel of carters, one of treating his horse, and Sir Walter called to him through window in great indignation. The man looked innocently, and as we drove on, he used some words about what he would have done had this been the bounds of his sheriffship. As he continued uncommon degree, I said, jokingly, that I would ride diet had left his blood so warm, and quote

“ Was ever Tartar horse or cruel Upon a mass of water-gruel ? ”

He smiled graciously, and extemporised this next couplet —

“ Yet who shall stand the Sheriff’s fo

This seemed to put him into the train of Prior, and he repeated several striking passages both of the Alma and the Solomon. He was still at this when we reached a longish hill, and he got out to walk a little. As we climbed the ascent, he leaning heavily on my shoulder, we were met by a couple of beggars, who were, or professed to be, old soldiers both of Egypt and the Peninsula. One of them wanted a leg, which circumstance alone would have opened Scott's purse-strings, though for ex facie a sad old blackguard; but the fellow had recognised his person, as it happened, and in asking an alms, bade God bless him fervently by his name. The mendicants went on their way, and we stood breathing on the knoll. Sir Walter followed them with his eye, and planting his stick firmly on the sod, repeated without break or hesitation Prior's verses to the historian Mezeray. That he applied them to himself, was touchingly obvious —

“ Whate'er thy countrymen have done,
By law and wit, by sword and gun,
In thee is faithfully recited;
And all the living world that view
Thy works, give thee the praises due —
At once instructed and delighted.

Yet for the fame of all these deeds,
What beggar in the Invalides,
With lameness broke, with blindness smitten,
Wished ever decently to die,
To have been either Mezeray —
Or any monarch he has written?
The man in graver tragic known,
Though his best part long since was done,
Still on the stage desires to tarry;
And he who play'd the harlequin,
After the jest, still loads the scene,
Unwilling to retire, though weary.”

We spent the night at the Inn of Douglas Mill, and at an early hour next morning proceeded to inspect, under the care of one of Lord Douglas' tenants, Mr. Haddow, the Castle, the strange old bourg, the Church, long since deserted as a place of worship, and the very extraordinary monuments of the most heroic and powerful family in the annals of Scotland. That works of sculpture equal to any of the fourteenth century in Westminster Abbey (for such they certainly were, though much mutilated by Cromwell's soldiery) should be found in so remote an inland place, attests strikingly the boundless resources of those haughty lords, "whose coronet," as Scott says, "so often counterpoised the crown." The effigy of the best friend of Bruce is among the number, and represents him cross-legged, as having fallen in battle with the Saracen, when on his way to Jerusalem with the heart of his king. The whole people of the barony gathered round the doors, and two persons of extreme old age,—one so old that he well remembered Duke Willie—that is to say, the Conqueror of Culloden—were introduced to tell all their local legends, while Sir Walter examined by torchlight these silent witnesses of past greatness. It was a strange and melancholy scene, and its recollection prompted some passages in Castle Dangerous, which might almost have been written at the same time with Lammermoor. The appearance of the village, too, is most truly transferred to the novel; and I may say the same of the surrounding landscape. We descended into a sort of crypt in which the Douglases were buried until about a century ago, when there was room for no more; the leaden coffins around the wall being piled on each other, until the lower ones had been pressed flat as sheets of pasteboard, while the floor itself was entirely paved with others of comparatively modern date, on which coronets and inscriptions might be traced. Here the silver case that once held the noble heart of the Good Lord James himself, is still pointed out. It is in the form of a heart, which, in memory of his glorious mission and fate, occupies ever since the chief place in the blazon of his posterity:—

"The bloody heart blazed in the van, Announcing Douglas' dreaded name."

This charnel-house, too, will be recognised easily. Of the redoubted Castle itself, there remains but a small detached fragment, covered with ivy, close to the present mansion; but he hung over it long, or rather sat beside it, drawing outlines on the turf, and arranging in his fancy the sweep of the old precincts. Before the subjacent and surrounding lake and morass were drained, the position must indeed have been the perfect model of solitary strength. The crowd had followed us, and were lingering about to see him once more as he got into his carriage. They attended him to the spot where it was waiting, in perfect silence. It was not like a mob, but a procession. He was again obviously gratified, and saluted them with an earnest yet placid air, as he took his leave.

It was again a darkish cloudy day, with some occasional mutterings of distant thunder, and perhaps the state of the atmosphere told upon Sir Walter's nerves; but I had never before seen him so sensitive as he was all the morning after this inspection of Douglas. As we drove over the high table-land of Lesmahago, he repeated I know not how many verses from Winton, Barbour, and Blind Harry, with, I believe, almost every stanza of Dunbar's elegy on the deaths of the Makers (poets). It was now that I saw him, such as he paints himself in one or two passages of his Diary, but such as his companions in the meridian vigour of his life never saw him — "the rushing of a brook, or the sighing of the summer breeze, bringing the tears into his eyes not unpleasantly." Bodily weakness laid the delicacy of the organisation bare, over which he had prided himself in wearing a sort of half-stoical mask. High and exalted feelings, indeed, he had never been able to keep concealed, but he had shrunk from exhibiting to human eye the softer and gentler emotions which now trembled to the surface. He strove against it even now, and presently came back from the Lament of the Makers, to his Douglasses, and chanted, rather than repeated, in a sort of deep and glowing, though not distinct recitative, his first favourite among all the ballads, —

" It was about the Lammas tide,
 When husbandmen do win their day,
 That the Doughty Douglas bownde him to ride
 To England to drive a prey," — down to the closing stanzas, which again left him in tears, —

" My wound is deep — I fain would sleep — Take thou the vanguard of the three,
 And hide me beneath the bracken-bush,
 That grows on yonder lily lee."

We reached my brother's house on the Clyde some time before the dinner-hour, and Sir Walter appeared among the friends who received him there with much of his old graceful composure of courtesy. He walked about a little — was pleased with the progress made in some building operations, and especially commended my brother for having given his bridge "ribs like Bothwell." Greenshields was at hand, and he talked to him cheerfully, while the sculptor devoured his features, as under a solemn sense that they were before his eyes for the last time. My brother had taken care to have no company at dinner except two or three near neighbours, with whom Sir

Walter had been familiar through life, and whose entreaties had been impossible to resist. One of these was the Elliott Lockhart of Cleghorn and Borthwickbrae — late member of Parliament for Selkirkshire — the same who, in his reform address had been preferred to the Sheriff of the free-holders of that county in the preceding March. Alas! very soon after that address was accepted, Borthwickbrae had a shock of paralysis as severe as any his country had as yet sustained. He, too, had rallied beyond expectation, and his family were more hopeful, perhaps, than they dared to be. Sir Walter and he had not met for a few years, not since they rode side by side, as I well remember, on a merry day's sport at Bowhill; and I need not tell any one who knew Borthwickbrae, that a finer or more gallant sportsman, or the Border gentleman than he was in his prime, never appeared on a hunting-field. When they now met (heu quantum), each saw his own case glassed in the other, and neither of their manly hearts could well contain itself as they conversed. Each exerted himself to the utmost — indeed far beyond it, and they were both tempted to transgress the laws of the physicians.

At night Scott promised to visit Cleghorn on his way, but next morning, at breakfast, came a messenger to inform that the laird, on returning to his own house, fell into another fit, and was now despaired of. Immediately he had intended to remain two days, Sir Walter, leaving his brother aside, and besought him to lend him horses as Lanark, for that he must set off with the least possible delay. He would listen to no persuasions. — “No,” he said, “this is a sad warning. I must home to write what it is called day; for the night cometh when no man can work. I put that text, many a year ago, on my dial-stone; but it has preached in vain.”¹

We started accordingly, and making rather a forced march, reached Abbotsford the same night. During the journey I was more silent than I ever before found him; he seemed to be wrapt in thought, and was but seldom roused to take notice of any object we passed. The little he said was more than enough to show that he felt the danger of Castle Dangerous, which he now seemed to feel sure to finish in a fortnight, though his observation of the must needs cost the re-writing of several passages in the chapters already put into type.

¹ This dial-stone, which used to stand in front of the old castle, is now in the centre of the garden, is inscribed, ΝΤΕ ΓΑΡ ΕΡΧΕΤΑΙ Η ΝΥΧΤΙΣ ΟΤΑΝ ΟΥΔΕΙΣ ΕΡΓΑΣΙΑΙΣ ΑΣΧΕΤΑΙ. The same Greek words made the legend on Dr. Johnson's watch: probably taken the hint from Boswell.

For two or three weeks he bent himself sedulously to his task — and concluded both Castle Dangerous and the long-suspended Count Robert. By this time he had submitted to the recommendation of all his medical friends, and agreed to spend the coming winter away from Abbotsford, among new scenes, in a more genial climate, and above all (so he promised), in complete abstinence from all literary labour. When Captain Basil Hall understood that he had resolved on wintering at Naples (where, as has been mentioned, his son Charles was attached to the British Legation), it occurred to the zealous sailor that on such an occasion as this all thoughts of political difference ought to be dismissed, — and he, unknown to Scott, addressed a letter to Sir James Graham, then First Lord of the Admiralty, stating the condition of his friend's health, and his proposed plan, and suggesting that it would be a fit and graceful thing for the King's Government to place a frigate at his disposal. Sir James replied that it afforded his Royal Master, as well as himself, the sincerest satisfaction to comply with this hint; and that whenever Sir Walter found it convenient to come southwards, a vessel should be prepared for his reception. Nothing could be handsomer than the way in which all this matter was arranged, and Scott, deeply gratified, exclaimed that things were yet in the hands of gentlemen; but that he feared they had been undermining the state of society which required such persons as themselves to be at the head.

He had no wish, however, to leave Abbotsford until the approach of winter; and having dismissed his Tales, seemed to say to himself that he would enjoy his dear valley for the intervening weeks, draw friends about him, revisit all the familiar scenes in his neighbourhood once more; and if he were never to come back, store himself with the most agreeable recollections in his power, and so conduct himself as to bequeath to us who surrounded him a last stock of gentle impressions. He continued to work a little at his notes and prefaces, the Reliquiæ of Oldbuck, and a private tome entitled Sylva Abbotsfordiensis, but did not fatigue himself; and when once all plans were settled, and all cares in so far as possible set aside, his health and spirits certainly rallied most wonderfully. He had settled that my wife and I should dine at Abbotsford, and he and Anne at Chiefswood, day about; and this rule was seldom departed from. Both at home and in the cottage he was willing to have a few guests, so they were not at home. The accomplished and popular novelist, who this season lived at Maxpottle, and Mr. Arden, who was spending his vacation at Melbury, additions, and frequently so, to his accustomed Scotts of Harlow, the Pungles of Whybank, an Kinnis of Aboctiel, the Frowsters, and the Per Walter observed the prescribed diet, on the whole rarely, and seemed, when in the midst of his friends, always tranquil—sometimes cheerful. Two occasions he was even gay, particularly, if the weather was so fine as to tempt us to dine in hall at Aboctford, or at an early hour under Clackwood.

He had the gratification of a visit from Mr. , accompanied him one day as far as Oakwood and Ettrick. He also received and made several hits with the great artist, Turner, whose regard to connected with the collective edition of his Poem ing, in particular, he carried Mr. Turner, with myself, to Smallholm Crags, and it was in looking them, while the painter did his sketch, that he told "Samaritan" how the habit of lying on the turf the sheep and lambs, when a lame infant, had given a peculiar tenderness for those animals, which since retained.

He seemed to enjoy the scene of yet there was many a touch of sadness both in his voice. He then carried us to Dylough, but self from attending Mr. Turner into the enclosure I perceived that it would be better for us to leave and we both accompanied Turner. Lastly, the not omit Bemerade. The good hard and lady well flattered, and after walking about a little while in old trees that surround their tower, we ascended the third tier of its vaulted apartments, and had a stately hall, arched also in stone, but with well (as being out of harm's way) duly blazoned with crests, and the time-honoured motto, Herrie, B. the first words of a prophetic couplet ascribed to Rhymor:

"Betide, betide, what'er betide,
There shall be Haigs in Bemerade."

¹The Archdeacon, Charles Scott's early tutor, was at the time of the New Edinburgh Academy.

Mr. Turner's sketch of this picturesque Peel, and its "brotherhood of venerable trees," is probably familiar to most of my readers.

Mr. Cadell brought the artist to Abbotsford, and was also of this Bemerside party. I must not omit to record how gratefully all Sir Walter's family felt the delicate and watchful tenderness of Mr. Cadell's conduct on this occasion. He so managed that the Novels just finished should remain in types, but not thrown off until the author should have departed; so as to give opportunity for revising and abridging them. He might well be the bearer of cheering news as to their greater concerns, for the sale of the Magnum had, in spite of political turbulences and distractions, gone on successfully. But he probably strained a point to make things appear still better than they really were. He certainly spoke so as to satisfy his friend that he need give himself no sort of uneasiness about the pecuniary results of idleness and travel. It was about this time that we observed Sir Walter beginning to entertain the notion that his debts were paid off. By degrees, dwelling on this fancy, he believed in it fully and implicitly. It was a gross delusion—but neither Cadell nor any one else had the heart to disturb it by any formal statement of figures. It contributed greatly more than any circumstance besides to soothe Sir Walter's feelings, when it became at last necessary that he should tear himself from his land and his house, and the trees which he had nursed. And with all that was done and forborne, the hour when it came was a most heavy one.

Very near the end there came some unexpected things to cast a sunset brilliancy over Abbotsford. His son, the Major, arrived with tidings that he had obtained leave of absence from his regiment, and should be in readiness to sail with his father. This was a mighty relief to us all, on Miss Scott's account as well as his, for my occupations did not permit me to think of going with him, and there was no other near connexion at hand. But Sir Walter was delighted—indeed, dearly as he loved all his children, he had a pride in the Major that stood quite by itself, and the hearty approbation which looked through his eyes whenever turned on him, sparkled brighter than ever as his own physical strength decayed. Young Walter had on this occasion sent down a horse or two to winter at Abbotsford. One was a remarkably tall and handsome animal, jet black all over, and when the Major appeared on it one morning, equipped for a little sport with the greyhounds, Sir Walter insisted on being put upon Douce Davie, and conducted as far as the Cauld-shields had done, ere the day's work began. He high bank to the north of the lake, and I remain beside, in a sort of bay track on the part of the the "tumult" great of dogs and men." We will pretty chance or two on the opposite side of the way followed always the tall black steed and his father might well assure Lewis Topsy, that "a l low never put foot into stirrup." But when his high wall of loose stones, at which everybody easily and elegantly as if it had been a jumble the old man's capture was extreme. "Look at it only look at him." Now, isn't he a fine fellow was the last time, I believe, that Sir Walter mounted back.

On the 14th of September the old splendour was, after a long interval, and for the last time, a fair James Glencairn Burns, son of the poet, from India and Sir Walter visited him with their economies Mr and Mrs McDermid of spend a day under his roof. The neighbourhood assembled, and having his son to help him, Sir Walter gracefully the honours of the table.

On the 20th Mrs Lockhart set out for London for her father's reception there; and on the following Wordsworth and his daughter arrived from Weymouth to take farewell of him. This was a very fortunate nothing could have gratified Sir Walter more, or better, if he needed any support from without. On his arrangements being completed, and Landlaw his a paper of instructions, the last article of which read them to be "very careful of the dogs" - these by who had through life loved each other well, at very different theories as to art, appreciated each more justly than inferior spirits ever did either the morning together in a visit to Newark. I revisited the last of the three poems by which has connected his name to all time with the most Scottish streams.

Sitting that evening in the library, Sir Walter dealt about the singularity that Fielding and Smollett had been driven abroad by declining health, and never which circumstance, though his language was r at this time, he had often before alluded to in a d and Mr. Wordsworth expressed his regret that in great masters of romance appeared to have been surrounded with any due marks of respect in the close of life. I happened to observe that Cervantes, on his last journey to Madrid, met with an incident which seemed to have given him no common satisfaction. Sir Walter did not remember the passage, and desired me to find it out in the life by Pellicer which was at hand, and translate it. I did so, and he listened with lively though pensive interest. Our friend Allan, the historical painter, had also come out that day from Edinburgh, and he since told me that he remembers nothing he ever saw with so much sad pleasure as the attitudes and aspect of Scott and Wordsworth as the story went on. Mr. Wordsworth was at that time, I should notice—though indeed his noble stanzas tell it—in but a feeble state of general health. He was, moreover, suffering so much from some malady in his eyes, that he wore a deep green shade over them. Thus he sat between Sir Walter and his daughter: absit omen—but it was no wonder that Allan thought as much of Milton as of Cervantes. The anecdote of the young student's raptures on discovering that he had been riding all day with the author of Don Quixote, is introduced in the Preface to Count Robert and Castle Dangerous, which—(for I may not return to the subject)—came out at the close of November in four volumes, as the Fourth Series of Tales of My Landlord.

The following Sonnet was, no doubt, composed by Mr. Wordsworth that same evening:—

“A trouble, not of clouds, or weeping rain,
Nor of the setting sun's pathetic light
Engendered, hangs o'er Eildon's triple height:
Spirits of power assembled there complain
For kindred power departing from their sight;
While Tweed, best pleased in chanting a blithe strain,
Saddens his voice again, and yet again.
Lift up your hearts, ye mourners! for the might
Of the whole world's good wishes with him goes;
Blessings and prayers, in nobler retinue
Than sceptred King or laurelled Conqueror knows, Follow this wondrous potentate. Be true,
Ye winds of Ocean, and the Midland Sea,
Wafting your charge to soft Parthenope.”

Early on the 23d of September 1831, Sir Walter left Abbotsford, attended by his daughter Anne and myself, and we reached London by easy stages on the 28th, having spent one day at Rokeby. I have nothing to mention of this journey except that notwithstanding all his infirmities, he paid any amount to which he had ever attached special value, getting out of the carriage to reveal it. It (for example) about the gigantic British or Danish cathedral at Fournth, which we had all seen dozen before, seemed as great as if not a year had fled. It may be supposed that his parting with Mr. Mongrave was a finding that he had left the ring he then wore, behind him at one of the inns on the road, in Merritt to make enquiries after it, as it had been the name of Hermitage Castle, and probably belong to one of the "Dark Knights of Laddendale," and if to keep it until he should come back to reclaim it, meantime, to wear it for his sake. The ring, which belt of silver with an angel holding the heart of De found, and having been worn to the end of life by M was by him bequeathed to his friend's grandson.

Sir Walter arrived in London in the midst of the debates on the second Reform Bill, and the ferocious denunciations of the populace on its rejection were in part with him. He saw the honours of several of the chief Tories above all, that of the Duke of Wellington, shattered most sacked. He heard of violence offered to the persons of his own noble friends, and having been attend the christening of the infant heir of Buccleugh grandfather the King had proposed to be, he had the understand that the ceremony must be adjourned, was not considered safe for his Majesty to visit, to purpose, the palace of one of his most amiable and illustrious peers.

During his stay, which was till the 25th of October he called on many of his old friends; but he accepted hospitalities except breakfasting once with Sir Robert Clapham Common, and twice with Lady Gifford Hampton. Usually he worked a little in the morning for the Magnum.

Dr Robert Fergusson (now one of her Majesty's physicians) one of the family with which Sir Walter had lived all in such brotherlike affection, saw him constantly remained in the Regent's Park; and though neither valid nor his children could fancy any other medicine necessary, it was only due to Fergusson that some of his should be called in occasionally with him. Sir H Ford (whom Scott reverenced as the friend of Baillie

Henry Holland (an esteemed friend of his own) came accordingly; and all the three concurred in recognising evidence that there was incipient disease in the brain. There were still, however, such symptoms of remaining vigour, that they flattered themselves, if their patient would submit to a total intermission of all literary labour during some considerable space of time, the malady might yet be arrested. When they left him after the first inspection, they withdrew into an adjoining room, and on soon rejoining him found that in the interim he had wheeled his chair into a dark corner, so that he might see their faces without their being able to read his. When he was informed of the comparatively favourable views they entertained, he expressed great thankfulness; promised to obey all their directions as to diet and repose most scrupulously; and he did not conceal from them, that "he had feared insanity and feared them."

The following are extracts from his Diary:— "London, October 2, 1831. — I have been very ill, and if not quite unable to write, I have been unfit to do it. I have wrought, however, at two Waverley things, but not well. A total prostration of bodily strength is my chief complaint. I cannot walk half a mile. There is, besides, some mental confusion, with the extent of which I am not, perhaps, fully acquainted. I am perhaps setting. I am myself inclined to think so, and like a day that has been admired as a fine one, the light of it sets down amid mists and storms. I neither regret nor fear the approach of death, if it is coming. I would compound for a little pain instead of this heartless muddiness of mind. The expense of this journey, &c. will be considerable; yet these heavy burdens could be easily borne if I were to be the Walter Scott I once was—but the change is great. And the ruin which I fear involves that of my country. I fancy the instances of Euthanasia are not in very serious cases very common. Instances there certainly are among the learned and the unlearned—Dr. Black, Tom Purdie. I should like, if it pleased God, to slip off in such a quiet way; but we must take what fate sends. I have not warm hopes of being myself again."

Sir Walter seemed to enjoy having one or two friends to meet him at dinner—and a few more in the evenings. Among others he thus saw, more than once, Lord Montagu and his family, the Marchioness of Stafford (afterwards Duchess of Sutherland), the Macleods of Macleod, Lady Davy, Mr. Rogers, Lord Mahon, Mr. Murray, Lord Dudley, Lord Melville, the Bishop of Exeter, Lord Ashley, Sir David Wilkie, Mr. Thomas

Moore, Mr. Milman, Mr. Washington Irving, and medical friends. At this time the Reform Bill was in discussion in the House of Commons, and a very brilliant speech in opposition to it was made by Mr. Peel, that he had owed his insignificant degree, to having risen from the table and sat by his side. But the most regular of the evening was, I think, Sir James Mackintosh. That intellectual charm and grace was himself in very truth whatever might have been the angusties of other that there was appointment with him at every participation that they might never meet again. Sir James was the more welcome, that his appearance at the political of the hour, on which his old friend's acceptance to brood. Their conversation, wherever it was sure to lasten ere long on Lochaber.

Before quitting home Scott had directed a monument to be prepared for the grave of Helen Walsdale of Jeanie Deans, in the churchyard of Iron Church. He penned the epitaph now inscribed there, and the pathetic farewell in the last page of the poem of Robert of Paris.

On the 19th, the Hon. Henry Duncan, R.N., the Ordnance, who had taken a great deal of trouble in matters for the voyage, called on Sir Walter to him Captain, now Sir Hugh Pigot, the commander of the Barham — who expected to sail on the 24th.

"Oct 23 Misty morning — looks like a year in the curse of London. I would hardly take for a share of its wealth and its curiosity — distilled fog, of the most intolerable kind. C. stirring yet, but Baby and Macaw beginning notes." — Dr. Fergusson, calling early, found this page of his Diary before him. "As he was at his MS" says the Doctor, "I offered to retire, if permitted. On my saying I had come to take leave before he quitted England, he exclaimed, with sentiment — 'England is no longer a place for an old man — shall not live to find it so; you may.' He then told the details of a very favourite superstition of the middle of every century had always been in the great convulsion or calamity in this island, which had taken place in his mind and person at him, three years before, were very apparent.

of the countenance, and the play of features were changed by slight palsy of one cheek. His utterance was so thick and indistinct as to make it very difficult for any but those accustomed to hear it, to gather his meaning. His gait was less firm and assured than ever; but his power of self-command, his social tact, and his benevolent courtesy, the habits of a life, remained untouched by a malady which had obscured the higher powers of his intellect."

After breakfast, Sir Walter, accompanied by his son and both his daughters, set off for Portsmouth; and Captain Basil Hall had the kindness to precede them by an early coach, and prepare everything for their reception at the hotel. In changing horses at Guilford, Sir Walter got out of his carriage, and very narrowly escaped being run over by a stage-coach. Of all "the habits of a life," none clung longer to him than his extreme repugnance to being helped in anything. It was late before he came to lean, as a matter of course, when walking, upon any one but Tom Purdie; and, in the sequel, this proud feeling, coupled with increasing tendency to abstraction of mind, often exposed him to imminent hazard.

The Barham could not sail for a week. During this interval, Sir Walter scarcely stirred from his hotel, being unwilling to display his infirmities to the crowd of gazers who besieged him whenever he appeared. He received, however, deputations of the literary and scientific societies of the town, and all other visitors, with his usual ease and courtesy: and he might well be gratified with the extraordinary marks of deference paid him by the official persons who could in any way contribute to his comfort. The first Lord of the Admiralty, Sir James Graham, and the Secretary, Sir John Barrow, both appeared in person, to ascertain that nothing had been neglected for his accommodation on board the frigate. The Admiral, Sir Thomas Foley, placed his barge at his disposal; the Governor, Sir Colin Campbell, and all the chief officers, naval and military, seemed to strive with each other in attention to him and his companions. In Hall's Third Series of Fragments of Voyages, some interesting details have long since been made public:—it may be sufficient to say here that had Captain Pigot and his gallant shipmates been appointed to convey a Prince of the Blood, more anxious and delicate exertions could not have been made, either in altering the interior of the vessel, so as to meet the wants of the passengers, or afterwards, throughout the voyage, in rendering it easy, comfortable, and as far as might be, interesting and amusing.

On the 27th, the wind changed, and the Barham got under weigh. After a few days, when they had passed the Bay of Biscay, Sir Walter ceased to be annoyed with seasickness, and sat most of his time on deck, enjoying apparently the air, the scenery, and above all the ship itself, the beautiful discipline practised in all things, and the martial exercises of the men. In Sir Hugh Pigot, Lieutenant-crown Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker, the physician, Dr. Lindell, and I believe in many others of the officers, he had highly intelligent as well as polished companions. The course was often altered, for the express purpose of giving him a glimpse of some famous place, and it was only the temptation of a singularly propitious breeze that prevented a halt at Algiers.

On the 20th November, they came upon that remarkable phenomenon, the sudden creation of a submarine volcano, which bore, during its very brief date, the name of Graham's Island. Four months had elapsed since it "arose from out the azure main" and in a few days more it disappeared. "Already," as Dr. Davy says, "its crumbling masses were falling to pieces from the pressure of the hand or foot." Yet nothing could prevent Sir Walter from landing on it, and in a letter of the following week he thus describes his adventure to Mr. Skene:

"Not being able to borrow your fingers, those of the Captain's clerk have been put in requisition for the enclosed sketch, and the notes adjoined are as accurate as can be expected from a hurried visit. You have a view of the island, very much as it shews at present, but nothing is more certain than that it is on the eve of a very important change, though in what respect is doubtful. I saw a portion of about five or six feet in height give way under the feet of one of our companions on the very ridge of the southern corner, and become completely annihilated, giving us some anxiety for the fate of our friend, till the dust and confusion of the dispersed pinnacle had subsided. You know my old talents for horsemanship. Finding the earth, or what seemed a substitute for it, sink at every step up to the knee, so as to make walking for an infirm and heavy man nearly impossible, I mounted the shoulders of an able and willing seaman, and by dint of his exertions, rode nearly to the top of the island. I would have given a great deal for you, my friend, the frequent and willing supplier of my defects; but on this journey, though undertaken late in life, I have found, from the benevolence of my companions, that when one man's strength was insufficient to supply my deficiencies, I had the willing aid of twenty if it could be useful. I have sent you one of the largest blocks of lava which I could find on the islet."

At Malta, which he reached on the 22d, Sir Walter found several friends of former days. The Right Honourable John Hookham Frere had been resident there for several years, the captive of the enchanting climate and the romantic monuments of the old chivalry.¹ Sir John Stoddart, the Chief Judge, had known the Poet ever since the days of Lasswade; and the Lieutenant-Governor, Colonel Seymour Bathurst, had often met him under the roof of his father, the late Earl Bathurst. Captain Dawson, husband to Lord Kinmedder's eldest daughter, was of the garrison, and Sir Walter felt as if he were about to meet a daughter of his own in the Euphemia Erskine who had so often sat upon his knee. She immediately joined him, and insisted on being allowed to partake his quarantine. Lastly, Dr. John Davy, the brother of his illustrious friend, was at the head of the medical staff; and this gentleman's presence was welcome indeed to the Major and Miss Scott, as well as to their father, for he had already begun to be more negligent as to his diet, and they dreaded his removal from the skilful watch of Dr. Liddell.

Nor less so was the society of Mrs. Davy — the daughter of an old acquaintance and brother advocate, and indeed almost a next-door neighbour in Edinburgh (Mr. Fletcher). This lady's private journal, Sir Walter's own diary (though hardly legible), and several letters to Laidlaw and myself, tell of extraordinary honours lavished on him throughout his stay. The Lieutenant-Governor had arranged that he should not be driven to the ordinary lazaretto, but to Fort Manuel, where apartments were ready for him and his party; and Mrs. Davy, accompanying Colonel and Mrs. Bathurst on their first visit there, says, the number of boats and the bustle about the sombre landing-place of the Marsa Muscat "gave token even then" — that is, in the midst of the terror for the cholera — "of an illustrious arrival." The quarantine lasted nine days, but Sir Walter, she says, "held a daily levee" to receive the numerous visitors that flocked to converse with him across the barrier — which Mr. Frere, notorious for absence of mind, more than once all but transgressed. On being set at liberty, Sir Walter removed to a hotel close to Dr. Davy's residence in the Strada Ponente. He, chiefly under Mrs. Davy's escort, visited the knightly antiquities of La Valetta, the Church of St. John and its rich monuments, the deserted palaces and libraries of the heroic brotherhood, with respectful interest the spot where famous great Ducrest met his death, and the Via Strada the young knight of Malta used to fight their duel town. He said to Mrs. Davy, "is quite like a dream go hard but I make something of this" — and in fact he speaks repeatedly of his purpose to frame a new pact with the Order. But the hospitalities of Malta too much for him. The garrison officers got up a honour, and the dignitaries gave dinner after dinner.

¹ Mr. Frere died there in 1846.

 most persons afflicted with paralytic disease, had long command over himself at table, and a very slight his physician's orders was now sure to infer a perception to have escaped another fit of apoplexy on promptitude of Dr. Davy's lance, and his children planned when he consented to re-embark in the B Naples on the 14th December. Mrs. Davy speaks
 Dr. Ferguson had done in London, of the change pearance — and she gives some sad instances of le-memory, especially that, when extolling certain could not bring out their writer's name, but only, affful praise, "that Irish lady." But Mrs. Davy, too, sp-Ferguson, of the unaltered courtesy of his demeanoccasions, and the warmth of affection that was e-every allusion to old friends and ties. She told him last meeting, that her husband was writing Sir Hu-Life. "I am glad of it," said Sir Walter; "I hope he lived to see his greatness."

On the 15th the Barham reached Naples, and S found his son Charles ready to receive him. The q was cut short by the courtesy of the King, and the established themselves in an apartment of the Pala-manco. Here, again, the British Minister, Mr. I Lord Berwick), and the English nobility and gentry residing in Naples, did whatever kindness and respect great, nor were the natives less attentive. The M Hertford, the Hon. Koppel Craven, the Hon. William and his lady, Sir George Talbot, the venerable Matthi of The Pursuits of Literature), Mr. Auldjo (celebrat ascent of Mont Blanc), and Dr. Hogg, who has since an account of his travels in the East — appear to have various ways, contributed whatever they could to hi and amusement. But the person of whom he saw mo late Sir William Gill, who had long been condemne in Italy by ailments and infirmities not dissimilar to

Though he remained here until the middle of April, the reader will pardon me for giving but few of the details to which I have had access. He was immediately elected into the chief literary societies of the place; and the king gave him unusual facilities in the use of all its libraries and museums. An ancient MS. of the Romance of Sir Bevis of Hampton being pointed out to him, he asked and obtained permission to have a transcript; and one was executed in his own apartments. He also expressed great curiosity as to the local ballads and popular tracts, chiefly occupied with the exploits of bandits, and collected enough of them to form about a dozen volumes, which he took a fancy to have bound in vellum. Sir William Gell was his cicerone to most of the celebrated spots in the city and its vicinity — but soon discovered that he felt comparatively little interest in anything that he saw, unless he could connect it somehow with traditions or legends of mediæval history or romance, or trace some resemblance to the scenery of familiar associations at home. Thus, amidst the chestnut forest near Pæstum, he was heard repeating Jock of Hazeldean — and again, in looking down on the Lucrine Lake, Baiæ, Misenum, and Averno, he suddenly pronounced, “in a grave tone and with great emphasis,” some fragment of a Jacobite ditty —

“’Tis up the rocky mountain and down the mossy glen,
We darena gang a milking for Charlie and his men.”

At Pompeii alone did his thoughts seem to be wholly commanded by the realities before him. There he had himself carried from house to house, and examined everything leisurely; but said little, except ever and anon in an audible whisper, “The city of the dead — the city of the dead!”

Meantime he more and more lost sight of the necessary restrictions — resumed too much of the usual habits in participating of splendid hospitalities, and, worst of all, resumed his pen. No persuasion could arrest him. He wrote several small tales, the subjects taken from the Newgate history of the Neapolitan banditti; and covered many quires with chapter after chapter of a romance connected with the Knights of St. John.

The MS. of these painful days is hardly to be deciphered by any effort; but he often spoke as well pleased with what he was doing, and confident that, on reaching Scotland again, he should have produced welcome materials for the press — though on many other occasions his conversation intimated apprehensions of a far different order, and he not only prognosticated that his end was near, but expressed alarm that he had to live to finish the journey homewards.

He continued, however, to be haunted with a merriment on the origin of which I can offer no guess. "I'm being driven" (writes Gell) "Sir Walter always noticed his dog of mine, which was usually in the carriage, and usually patted the animal's head for some time, saying

'poor boy.' 'I have got at home,' said he, 'two favourite dogs, so large, that I am almost afraid too handsome and too fondal for my diminished means, very fond of them, but they are so large it was impossible to take them with me.' He came one morning rather to my house, to tell me he was sure I should be pleased with good luck which had befallen him, and of which he had received notice. This was, as he said, an account from friends in England, that his last works, Robert of Castle Dangerous, had gone on to a second edition. He told me in the carriage that he felt quite relieved by his 'lot,' said he, 'I could have never slept straight in bed till I had satisfied every claim against me.' 'And as to the dog, 'my poor boy, I shall have my house and estate round it, free, and I may keep my dogs as many as I choose, without fear of reproach.' He told me, being relieved from debt, and no longer forced to work for money, he longed to turn to poetry again. I encouraged him, and asked him why he had ever relinquished poetry. 'Because Byron bet me,' said he, pronouncing the word, bet. I rejoined, that I thought I could remember by heart passages of his poetry as of Byron's. He replied that he was not, but he bet me out of the field in the description of strong passions, and in deep-seated knowledge of the human heart; so I gave up poetry for the time.' He became extremely curious about Rhodes, and having chosen for his next subject the chivalrous story of the slaying of the dragon by De Gozon, and the stratagems and valour with which he conceived and executed his purpose, he was quite desirous to hear that I had seen the skeleton of this real or imaginary dragon, which yet remains secured by large iron bolts to the vaulted roof of one of the gates of the city."

From this time, whoever was near him often heard him say when he reached Scotland, it would be to re-entirely unfettered use and administration of his estate. He wrote to Mrs. Scott of Harden bespeaking her presence at a little festival which he designed to hold within a few at Abbotsford, in celebration of his release from all difficulties. All this while he sent letters frequently to his daughter Sophia, Mr. Cadell, Mr. Laidlaw, and myself. Some were of a very melancholy cast—for the dream about his debts was occasionally broken: in general, however, these his last letters tell the same story of delusive hopes both as to health and wealth, of satisfaction in the resumption of his pen, of eagerness to be once more at Abbotsford, and of affectionate anxiety about the friends he was there to rejoin. Every one of those to Laidlaw has something about the poor people and the dogs. One to myself conveyed his desire that he might be set down for “something as handsome as I liked” in a subscription then thought of for the Ettrick Shepherd; who that spring visited London, and was in no respect improved by his visit. Another to my wife bade her purchase a grand pianoforte which he wished to present to Miss Cadell, his bookseller’s daughter. The same generous spirit was shewn in many other communications.

It had been his intention not to leave the Mediterranean without seeing Rhodes himself—but he suddenly dropt this scheme, on learning that his friend Sir Frederick Adam, Governor of the Ionian Islands, who had invited him to Corfu, was ordered to India. From that hour his whole thoughts were fixed on home—and his companions soon ceased from opposing his inclinations. Miss Scott was no doubt the more willing to yield, as having received intelligence of the death of her nephew, the “Hugh Littlejohn” of the Grandfather’s Tales—which made her anxious about her sister. But indeed, since her father would again work, what good end could it serve to keep him from working at his own desk? And since all her entreaties, and the warnings of foreign doctors, proved alike unavailing as to the regulation of his diet, what remaining chance could there be on that score, unless from replacing him under the eye of the friendly physicians whose authority had formerly seemed to have due influence on his mind? He had wished to return by the route of the Tyrol and Germany, partly for the sake of the remarkable chapel and monuments of the old Austrian princes at Innspruck, and the feudal ruins upon the Rhine, but chiefly that he might have an interview with Goethe at Weimar. That poet died on the 22d of March, and the news seemed to act upon Scott exactly as the illness of Borthwickbrae had done in the August before. His impatience redoubled: all his fine dreams of recovery seemed to vanish at once—“Alas for Goethe!” he exclaimed: “but he at least died at home. "Let us to Abbotsford." And he quotes more than once in his letters the first hemistich of the line from Poltunian with which he had closed his early memoir of Leyden — "Græda quæque potior."

When the season was sufficiently advanced, then, the party set out, Mr. Charles Scott having obtained leave to accompany his father, which was quite necessary, as his elder brother had already been obliged to rejoin his regiment. They quitted Naples on the 16th of April, in an open barouche, which could at pleasure be converted into a bed. Sir Walter was somewhat interested by a few of the objects presented to him in the earlier stages of his route. The certainty that he was on his way home, for a time soothed and composed him; and amidst the agreeable society which again surrounded him on his arrival in Rome, he seemed perhaps as much himself as he had ever been in Malta or in Naples. For a moment even his literary hope and ardour appear to have revived. But still his daughter entertained no doubt, that his consenting to pause for even a few days in Rome, was dictated mainly by consideration of her natural curiosity. Gell went to Rome about the same time, and Sir Walter was introduced there to another accomplished countryman, who exerted himself no less than did Sir William, to render his stay agreeable to him. This was Mr. Edward Cheney — whose family had long been on terms of very strict intimacy with the Maclean Clephanes of Torloak, so that Sir Walter was ready to regard him at first sight as a friend. Nor was it a small circumstance that the Cheney family had then in their occupancy the Villa Muti at Frascati, for many of his later years the favourite abode of the Cardinal York.

At Rome, Sir Walter partook of the hospitalities of the native nobility, many of whom had travelled into Scotland under the influence of his writings, and on one or two occasions was well enough to sustain their best impressions of him by his conversation. But, on the whole, his feebleness, and incapacity to be roused by objects which, in other days, would have appealed most powerfully to his imagination, were too painfully obvious — and, indeed, the only, or almost the only very lively curiosity he appeared to feel regarded the family pictures and other Stuart relics then preserved at the Villa Muti — but especially the monument to Charles Edward and his father in St. Peter's, the work of Canova, executed at the cost of George IV. Excepting his visits at Frascati, the only excursion he made into the neighbouring country was one to the grand old castle of Bracciano: where he spent a night in the feudal halls of the Orsini, now included among the numberless possessions of the Banker Prince Torlonia.

“Walking on the battlements of this castle next morning” (10th May) — says Mr. Cheney — “he spoke of Goethe with regret; he had been in correspondence with him before his death, and had purposed visiting him at Weimar. I told him I had been to see Goethe the year before, and that I had found him well, and, though very old, in the perfect possession of all his faculties. — ‘Of all his faculties!’ he replied; — ‘it is much better to die than to survive them, and better still to die than live in the apprehension of it; but the worst of all,’ he added, thoughtfully, ‘would have been to have survived their partial loss, and yet to be conscious of his state.’ — He did not seem to be, however, a great admirer of some of Goethe’s works. Much of his popularity, he observed, was owing to pieces which, in his latter moments, he might have wished recalled. He spoke with much feeling. I answered, that he must derive great consolation in the reflection that his own popularity was owing to no such cause. He remained silent for a moment, with his eyes fixed on the ground; when he raised them, as he shook me by the hand, I perceived the light-blue eye sparkled with unusual moisture. He added — ‘I am drawing near to the close of my career; I am fast shuffling off the stage. I have been perhaps the most voluminous author of the day; and it is a comfort to me to think that I have tried to unsettle no man’s faith, to corrupt no man’s principle.’”

Next day, Friday, May 11, Sir Walter left Rome. — “During his stay there” (adds Mr. Cheney) “he had received every mark of attention and respect from the Italians, who, in not crowding to visit him, were deterred only by their delicacy and their dread of intruding on an invalid. The enthusiasm was by no means confined to the higher orders. His fame, and even his works, are familiar to all classes — the stalls are filled with translations of his novels in the cheapest forms; and some of the most popular plays and operas have been founded upon them. Some time after he left Italy, when I was travelling in the mountains of Tuscany, it has more than once occurred to me to be stopped in little villages, hardly accessible to carriages, by an eager admirer of Sir Walter, to inquire after the health of my illustrious countryman.”

CHAPTER VIII

Return to England — Seizure at Nimeguen — Jermyn Street, London — Edinburgh — Altonford — Death and Funeral of Scott in September 1832 — His Character — Monuments to his Memory — Pictures, Busts, and Statues

The last jotting of Sir Walter Scott's Diary — perhaps the last specimen of his handwriting — records his starting from Naples on the 16th of April. After the 11th of May the story can hardly be told too briefly.

The irritation of impatience, which had for a moment been suspended by the respect and society of Rome, returned the moment he found himself again on the road, and seemed to increase hourly. His companions could with difficulty prevail on him to see even the falls of Terni, or the church of Santa Croce at Florence. On the 17th, a cold and dreary day, they passed the Apennines, and dined on the top of the mountains. The snow and the pines recalled Scotland, and he expressed pleasure at the sight of them. That night they reached Bologna, but he would see none of the interesting objects there, — and next day, hurrying in like manner through Ferrara, he proceeded as far as Monsecco. On the 19th he arrived at Venice, and he remained there till the 23d; but showed no curiosity about anything except the Bridge of Sighs and the adjoining dungeons — down into which he would scramble, though the exertion was exceedingly painful to him. On the other historical features of that place — one so sure in other days to have inexhaustible attractions for him — he would not even look; and it was the same with all that he came within reach of — even with the fondly anticipated chapel at Inspruck — as they proceeded through the Tyrol, and so onwards, by Munich, Ulm, and Heidelberg, to Frankfort. Here (June 5) he entered a bookneller's shop; and the people, seeing an English party, brought out among the first things a lithographed print of repeatedly wished to travel all the night as well as all the day and the symptoms of an approaching fit were so obvious, that he was more than once bled, ere they reached Mayence, by the hand of his affectionate domestic.

At this town they embarked, on the 8th June, in the Rhine steam-boat; and while they descended the famous river through its most picturesque region, he seemed to enjoy, though he said nothing, the perhaps unrivalled scenery it presented to him. His eye was fixed on the successive crags and castles, and ruined monasteries, each of which had been celebrated in some German ballad familiar to his ear, and all of them blended in the immortal panorama of Childe Harold. But so soon as they had passed Cologne, and nothing but flat shores, and here and there a grove of poplars and a village spire were offered to the vision, the weight of misery sunk down again upon him. It was near Nimeguen, on the evening of the 9th, that he sustained another serious attack of apoplexy, combined with paralysis. Nicolson's lancet restored, after the lapse of some minutes, the signs of animation; but this was the crowning blow. Next day he insisted on resuming his journey, and on the 11th was lifted into an English steam-boat at Rotterdam.

He reached London about six o'clock on the evening of Wednesday the 13th of June. Owing to the unexpected rapidity of the journey, his eldest daughter had had no notice when to expect him; and fearful of finding her either out of town, or unprepared to receive him and his attendants under her roof, Charles Scott drove to the St. James's hotel in Jernyn Street, and established his quarters there before he set out in quest of his sister and myself. When we reached the hotel, he recognised us with many marks of tenderness, but signified that he was totally exhausted; so no attempt was made to remove him further, and he was put to bed immediately. Dr. Fergusson saw him the same night, and next day Sir Henry Halford and Dr. Holland saw him also; and during the next three weeks the two latter visited him daily, while Fergusson was scarcely absent from his pillow. The Major was soon on the spot. To his children, all assembled once more about him, he repeatedly gave his blessing in a very solemn manner, as if expecting immediate death; but he was never in a condition for conversation, and sunk either into sleep or delirious stupor upon the slightest effort.

Mrs. Thomas Scott came to town as soon as she heard of his arrival, and remained to help us. She was more than once recognised and thanked. Mr. Cadell, too, arrived from Edinchurch, to receive a new minister, and he had been now another of the "free agents" of Mr. J. R. K. himself, once. An anxiety to do well, and a familiar voice, were the only things that kept it dropped powerfully, and he said, "I was hand." Richardson made a note of the and, after a moment, got out of the the woods, which he had been eye brightened, and he said, "I was

Mr. Richardson had lately purchased the estate Trenthdale, and Sir Walter had built a new building. His friend told him that and that the Marquis of E. had been one of his own, meaning, naturally, that is a good man," said Sir Walter, "he may receive a favour, and that's in these days." The subject Richardson never heard his name again. The state continued till the beginning of July.

During these melancholy weeks, great interest and were manifested. Allan Cunningham, returning home late one night, he found several persons together at the corner of Jeremy Street, and asked him soon if there was but one death-bed
"Do you know, sir, if this is the street where The inquiries both at the hotel and at my and I think there was hardly a member of the who did not send every day. The newspapers paragraphs about Sir Walter, and one of these threw out a suggestion that his travels had expensive resources, and that if he were capable of at all, cares of that sort might probably be This paragraph came from a very ill-informed, but a well-meaning quarter. It caught the attention members of the Government, and, in consequence, private communication, to the effect that, if the stated, Sir Walter's family had only to say what relieve him from embarrassment, and it would be advanced by the Treasury. The then Paymaster of Lord John Russell, had the delicacy to convey the through a lady with whose friendship he knew honoured — the Honourable Catherine Arden. We our grateful sense of his politeness, and of the liberal Government, and I now beg leave to do so.

but his Lordship was of course informed that Sir Walter Scott was not situated as the journalist had represented.

Dr. Fergusson's Memorandum on Jermyn Street will be acceptable to the reader. He says — "When I saw Sir Walter, he was lying in the second floor back-room of the St. James's Hotel, in a state of stupor, from which, however, he could be roused for a moment by being addressed, and then he recognised those about him, but immediately relapsed. I think I never saw anything more magnificent than the symmetry of his colossal bust, as he lay on the pillow with his chest and neck exposed. During the time he was in Jermyn Street he was calm but never collected, and in general either in absolute stupor or in a waking dream. He never seemed to know where he was, but imagined himself to be still in the steam-boat. The rattling of carriages, and the noises of the street, sometimes disturbed this illusion — and then he fancied himself at the polling-booth of Jedburgh, where he had been insulted and stoned. During the whole of this period of apparent helplessness, the great features of his character could not be mistaken. He always exhibited great self-possession, and acted his part with wonderful power whenever visited, though he relapsed the next moment into the stupor from which strange voices had roused him. A gentleman [Mr. Richardson] stumbled over a chair in his dark room; — he immediately started up, and though unconscious that it was a friend, expressed as much concern and feeling as if he had never been labouring under the irritability of disease. It was impossible even for those who most constantly saw and waited on him in his then deplorable condition, to relax from the habitual deference which he had always inspired. He expressed his will as determinedly as ever, and enforced it with the same apt and good-natured irony as he was wont to use.

"At length his constant yearning to return to Abbotsford induced his physicians to consent to his removal; and the moment this was notified to him, it seemed to infuse new vigour into his frame. It was on a calm, clear afternoon of the 7th July, that every preparation was made for his embarkation on board the steam-boat. He was placed on a chair by his faithful servant Nicolson, half-dressed, and loosely wrapped in a quilted dressing-gown. He requested Lockhart and myself to wheel him towards the light of the open window, and we both remarked the vigorous lustre of his eye. He sat there silently gazing on space for more than half an hour, apparently wholly occupied with his own thoughts, and having no distinct perception of where he was, or how he came there. — I himself to be lifted into his carriage, which was with a crowd, among whom were many gentlemen on horse had loitered about to gaze on the scene. His child deeply affected, and Mrs. Lockhart trembled from her and wept bitterly. — Thus surrounded by those nearest he alone was unconscious of the cause or the depth of the and while yet alive seemed to be carried to his grave.

On this his last journey, Sir Walter was attended by daughters, Mr. Cadell, and myself — and also by Dr.
Watson, who, it being impossible for Dr. Ferguson to town at that moment, kindly undertook to see him Aldersford. — We embarked in the James Watt, steam master of which (Captain John Jamieson), as well as of the proprietors, made every arrangement in their the convenience of the invalid. — The Captain gave Walter's use his own private cabin, which was a erection — a sort of cottage on the deck, and he soon scious, after laid in bed there, that any new remedy curred. — On arriving at Newhaven, late on the 10th, careful preparations made for his landing by the
the Shipping Company (Mr. Hamilton) — and Sir Watrate in his carriage, was along on shore, and con-thence to Douglas's hotel, in St. Andrew's Square, in complete apparent unconsciousness. — Mrs. Douglas had days been the Duke of Buccleuch's house-keeper at He-she and her husband had also made the most suitable

At a very early hour on the morning of Wednesday we again placed him in his carriage, and he lay in torpid state during the first two stages on the road side. — But as we descended the vale of the Gala he gaze about him, and by degrees it was obvious that recognizing the features of that familiar landscape he murmured a name or two — "Gala Water, sure holm — Torwoodlee." — As we rounded the hill at and the outline of the Eildons burst on him, he became excited; and, when turning himself on the couch caught at length his own towers at the distance of sprang up with a cry of delight. — The river being had to go round a few miles by Melrose bridge, and time this occupied, his words and house being within it required occasionally both Dr. Watson's strength in addition to Nicholson's, to keep him in the carriage passing the bridge, the road for a couple of miles long

Abbotsford, and he relapsed into his stupor; but on gaining the bank immediately above it, his excitement became again ungovernable.

Mr. Laidlaw was waiting at the porch, and assisted us in lifting him into the dining-room, where his bed had been prepared. He sat bewildered for a few moments, and then resting his eye on Laidlaw, said — “Ha! Willie Laidlaw! O man, how often have I thought of you!” By this time his dogs had assembled about his chair — they began to fawn upon him and lick his hands, and he alternately sobbed and smiled over them, until sleep oppressed him.

Dr. Watson having consulted on all things with Mr. Clarkson of Melrose, and his father, the good old “Country Surgeon” of Selkirk, resigned the patient to them, and returned to London. None of them could have any hope, but that of soothing irritation. Recovery was no longer to be thought of: but there might be Euthanasia.

And yet something like a ray of hope did break in upon us next morning. Sir Walter awoke perfectly conscious where he was, and expressed an ardent wish to be carried out into his garden. We procured a Bath chair from Huntley Burn, and Laidlaw and I wheeled him out before his door, and up and down for some time on the turf, and among the rose-beds then in full bloom. The grandchildren admired the new vehicle, and would be helping in their way to push it about. He sat in silence, smiling placidly on them and the dogs their companions, and now and then admiring the house, the screen of the garden, and the flowers and trees. By and by he conversed a little, very composedly, with us — said he was happy to be at home — that he felt better than he had ever done since he left it, and would perhaps disappoint the doctors after all. He then desired to be wheeled through his rooms, and we moved him leisurely for an hour or more up and down the hall and the great library: — “I have seen much,” he kept saying, “but nothing like my ain house — give me one turn more!” He was gentle as an infant, and allowed himself to be put to bed again, the moment we told him that we thought he had had enough for one day.

Next morning he was still better. After again enjoying the Bath chair for perhaps a couple of hours out of doors, he desired to be drawn into the library, and placed by the central window, that he might look down upon the Tweed. Here he expressed a wish that I should read to him, and when I asked from what book, he said — “Need you ask? There is but one.”

I chose the 14th chapter of St. John's Gospel, he listened with mild devotion, and said when I had done — "Well, this is a great comfort — I have followed you distinctly, and I feel as if I were yet to be myself again." In this placid frame he was again put to bed, and had many hours of soft slumber.

On the third day Mr. Landlaw and I again wheeled him about the small piece of lawn and shrubbery in front of the house for some time, and the weather being delightful, and all the richness of summer around him, he seemed to taste fully the balmy influences of nature. The sun getting very strong, we halted the chair in a shady corner, just within the verge of his verdant arcade around the court wall, and breathing the coolness of the spot, he said, "Read me some amusing thing — read me a bit of Crabbe." I brought out the first volume of his old favourite that I could lay hand on, and turned to what I remembered as one of his most favourite passages in it — the description of the arrival of the Players in the Borough. He listened with great interest, and also, as I soon perceived, with great curiosity. Every now and then he exclaimed, "Capital — excellent — very good. Crabbe has lost nothing" — and we were too well satisfied that he considered himself as hearing a new production, when, chuckling over one couplet, he said "Better and better — but how will poor Terry endure these ruts?" I went on with the poet's terrible sarcasms upon the theatrical life, and he listened eagerly, muttering, "Honest Dan!" — "Dan won't like this." At length I reached these lines —

"Sad happy race" soon raised and soon depressed,
Your days all passed in jeopardy and jest
Poor without prudence, with afflictions vain,
Not warned by misery, nor enriched by gain."

"Shut the book," said Sir Walter — "I can't stand more of this — it will touch Terry to the very quick."

On the morning of Sunday the 15th, he was again taken out into the little pleasure, and got as far as his favourite terrace-walk between the garden and the river, from which he seemed to survey the valley and the hills with much satisfaction. On re-entering the house, he desired me to read to him from the New Testament, and after that he again called for a little of before he could have repeated every line of, and which I chose for one of these readings, because, as is known to every one, it had formed the last solace of Mr. Fox's death-bed. On the contrary, his recollection of whatever I read from the Bible appeared to be lively; and in the afternoon, when we made his grandson, a child of six years, repeat some of Dr. Watts's hymns by his chair, he seemed also to remember them perfectly. That evening he heard the Church service, and when I was about to close the book, said — "Why do you omit the visitation for the sick?" — which I added accordingly.

On Monday he remained in bed, and seemed extremely feeble; but after breakfast on Tuesday the 17th he appeared revived somewhat, and was again wheeled about on the turf. Presently he fell asleep in his chair, and after dozing for perhaps half an hour, started awake, and shaking the plaids we had put about him from off his shoulders, said — "This is sad idleness. I shall forget what I have been thinking of, if I don't set it down now. Take me into my own room, and fetch the keys of my desk." He repeated this so earnestly, that we could not refuse; his daughters went into his study, opened his writing-desk, and laid paper and pens in the usual order, and I then moved him through the hall and into the spot where he had always been accustomed to work. When the chair was placed at the desk, and he found himself in the old position, he smiled and thanked us, and said — "Now give me my pen, and leave me for a little to myself." Sophia put the pen into his hand, and he endeavoured to close his fingers upon it, but they refused their office — it dropped on the paper. He sank back among his pillows, silent tears rolling down his cheeks; but composing himself by and by, motioned to me to wheel him out of doors again. Laidlaw met us at the porch, and took his turn of the chair. Sir Walter, after a little while, again dropt into slumber. When he was awaking, Laidlaw said to me — "Sir Walter has had a little repose." — "No, Willie," said he — "no repose for Sir Walter but in the grave." The tears again rushed from his eyes. "Friends," said he, "don't let me expose myself — get me to bed — that's the only place."

With this scene ended our glimpse of daylight. Sir Walter never, I think, left his room afterwards, and hardly his bed, except for an hour or two in the middle of the day; and after another week he was unable even for this. During a few days he was in a state of painful irritation — and I saw realised all that he had himself prefigured in his description of the meet-

Dr. Keble came out from Edinburgh, bringing with him his wife, one of the dearest pieces of the Clerk's table, with some difficulty recognised the Doctor, but Mrs. Keble's voice, exclaimed at once "I can't Hume!" These kind friends remained for two weeks with us. Clarkson's latest was pronounced never relief it afforded was, I am happy to say, very eff-

After this he declined daily, but still there was a way to be wasted, and the process was long. He seemed to suffer no bodily pain, and his mind, though he seemed, appeared, when there was any symptom of weakness, to be dwelling, with rare exceptions, on serious things, the accent of the voice grave, sometimes never querulous, and very seldom indicative of resentful thoughts. Now and then he imagined himself administering justice as Sheriff; and once or twice to be ordering Tom Purdie about trees. A few of us are sorry to say, we could perceive that his fancy burgh and Thick Sir Walter escaped him in a tone. But commonly whatever we could follow but a fragment of the Bible (especially the Prophecies of the Book of Jehoi, or some petition in the litany, some psalm in the old Scotch metrical version, or the magnificent hymns of the Romish ritual, in which he always delighted, but which probably hung on now in connexion with the Church services he had while in Italy. We very often heard distinctly the Dies Ire, and I think the very last stanza to make out, was the first of a still greater favourite

"Stabat Mater dolens, Juxta crucem lacrymosa, Dum pendebat Filius."

All this time he continued to recognise his daughter-in-law, and myself, whenever we spoke to him. His every attention with a most touching thankfulness, son, too, was always saluted with the old courtesy, which could open but a moment for him to do so. It might be said that the gentleman survived the

After two or three weeks had passed in this way, he was obliged to leave Sir Walter for a single day, and to return to burgh to transact business, on his account, with Cockburn (now Lord Cockburn), then Solicitor-General for Scotland. The Scotch Reform Bill threw a great burden of new duties and responsibilities upon the Sheriffs; and Scott's Sheriff-substitute, the Laird of Raeburn, not having been regularly educated for the law, found himself unable to encounter these novelties, especially as regarded the registration of voters, and other details connected with the recent enlargement of the electoral franchise. Under such circumstances, as no one but the Sheriff could appoint another Substitute, it became necessary for Sir Walter's family to communicate the state he was in in a formal manner to the Law Officers of the Crown; and the Lord Advocate (Mr. Jeffrey), in consequence, introduced and carried through Parliament a short bill (2 and 3 William IV. cap. 101), authorising the Government to appoint a new Sheriff of Selkirkshire, "during the incapacity or non-resignation of Sir Walter Scott." It was on this bill that the Solicitor-General had expressed a wish to converse with me: but there was little to be said, as the temporary nature of the new appointment gave no occasion for any pecuniary question; and, if that had been otherwise, the circumstances of the case would have rendered Sir Walter's family entirely indifferent upon such a subject. There can be no doubt, that if he had recovered in so far as to be capable of executing a resignation, the Government would have considered it just to reward thirty-two years' faithful services by a retired allowance equivalent to his salary—and as little, that the Government would have had sincere satisfaction in settling that matter in the shape most acceptable to himself. And perhaps (though I feel that it is scarcely worth while) I may as well here express my regret that a statement highly unjust and injurious should have found its way into the pages of some of Sir Walter's biographers. These writers have thought fit to insinuate that there was a want of courtesy and respect on the part of the Lord Advocate, and the other official persons connected with this arrangement. On the contrary, nothing could be more handsome and delicate than the whole of their conduct in it; Mr. Cockburn could not have entered into the case with greater feeling and tenderness, had it concerned a brother of his own; and when Mr. Jeffrey introduced his bill in the House of Commons, he used language so graceful and touching, that both Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Croker went across the House to thank him cordially for it.

Perceiving, towards the close of August, that the end was near, and thinking it very likely that Abbotsford might soon undergo many changes, and myself, at all event again, I felt a desire to leave some image preferable apartments as occupied by their founder from Edinburgh for that purpose. Sir Walter's old William Allan — whose presence, I well knew under the circumstances of that time, he bows to any of the family, but the contrary in all William willingly complied, and executed a series drawings. He also shared our watchings, and had the last moments. Sir Walter's cousins, Ansted, came down frequently, for a day or two and did whatever sisterly affection could prompt mother and his daughters. Mrs. Mary Scott (a. uncle Thomas, and Mrs. Scott of Harden, did the

As I was dressing on the morning of Monday September, Nicholson came into my room, and told master had awake in a state of composure and and wished to see me immediately. I found himself, though in the last extreme of feebleness, clear and calm — every trace of the wild fire of d gushed. "Lockhart," he said, "I may have bu speak to you. My dear, be a good man — be religious — be a good man. Nothing else will comfort when you come to be here." He said

"Shall I send for Sophia and Anne?" " "don't disturb them. Poor souls! I know the night. God bless you all." With this he an tranquil sleep, and, indeed, he scarcely afterw sign of consciousness, except for an instant on his sons.

They, on learning that the scene was about to anew leave of absence from their posts, and Abbeford on the 15th. About half past one p. of September, Sir Walter breathed his last, in of all his children. It was a beautiful day — every window was wide open — and so perfectly sound of all others most delicious to his ear, the g the Tweed over its pebbles, was distinctly audib around the bed, and his eldest son kissed and c. No sculptor ever modelled a more majestic im.

Almost every newspaper that announced this land, and many in England, had the signs of mon the demise of a king. With hardly an except was that of universal, unminged grief and veneration

It was considered due to Sir Walter's physicians, and to the public, that the nature of his malady should be distinctly ascertained. The result was, that there appeared the traces of a very slight mollification in one part of the substance of the brain.

His funeral was conducted in an unostentatious manner, but the attendance was very great. Few of his old friends then in Scotland were absent,—and many, both friends and strangers, came from a great distance. His domestics and foresters made it their petition that no hireling hand might assist in carrying his remains. They themselves bore the coffin to the hearse, and from the hearse to the grave. The pall-bearers were his sons, his son-in-law, and his little grandson; his cousins, Charles Scott of Nesbitt, James Scott of Jedburgh (sons to his uncle Thomas), William Scott of Raeburn, Robert Rutherford, Clerk to the Signet, Colonel (now Lieut.-General Sir James) Russell of Avestiel, William Keith (brother to Sir Alexander Keith of Ravelstone); and the chief of his family, Hugh Scott of Harden, afterwards Lord Polwarth.

When the company were assembled, according to the usual Scotch fashion, prayers were offered up by the Very Reverend Dr. Baird, Principal of the University of Edinburgh, and by the Reverend Dr. David Dickson, Minister of St. Cuthbert's, who both expatiated in a very striking manner on the virtuous example of the deceased.

The court-yard and all the precincts of Abbotsford were crowded with uncovered spectators as the procession was arranged; and as it advanced through Darnick and Melrose, and the adjacent villages, the whole population appeared at their doors in like manner—almost all in black. The train of carriages extended, I understand, over more than a mile; the yeomanry followed in great numbers on horseback; and it was late in the day ere we reached Dryburgh. Some accident, it was observed, had caused the hearse to halt for several minutes on the summit of the hill at Bemerside—exactly where a prospect of remarkable richness opens, and where Sir Walter had always been accustomed to rein up his horse. The day was dark and lowering, and the wind high.

The wide enclosure at the Abbey of Dryburgh was thronged with old and young; and when the coffin was taken from the hearse, and again laid on the shoulders of the afflicted serving-men, one deep sob burst from a thousand lips. Mr. Archdeacon Williams read the Burial Service of the Church of England; and thus, about half-past five o'clock of Wednesday the 26th September 1832, the remains of WALTER SCOTT were laid by the side of his wife in the chure of his ancestors — “in sure and certain hope of resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our vile body that it may be like unto his glorious body according to the mighty working, whereby he is able to do all things to himself.”

We read in Solomon — “The heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his sorrow; and a wise poet of our own time thus beautifully saying:—

“Why should we faint and fear to live alone,
Since all alone, so Heaven has willed, we dwell;
Nor even the tenderest heart, and next our own,
Knows half the reasons why we smile and grieve.”

Such considerations have always induced me to hold in small respect any attempt to delineate fully and accurately a human being's character. I distrust, even in the best cases, our capacity for judging our neighbour; and I cannot but pity the presumption that must swell the vanity and brain of any ordinary brother of the race, who attempts to pronounce ex cathedra on the whole structure of a great mind, from the comparatively narrow materials which can by possibility have been placed before him. Nor is the difficulty to my view lessened, — perhaps increased, when the great man is a great artist. It is not many of the feelings common to our nature which can be expressed adequately, and that some of the finest feelings can only be expressed at all, in the language of art, and especially in the language of poetry. But it is equally true that high and sane art never attempts to express that which the artist does not claim and expect general sympathy for. However much of what we had thought to be our own adventures to give shape to, it becomes us, I can truly say, believing, to rest convinced that there remained a vast field of mysteries to which the dignity of genius would not have borne tolerance. I have therefore endeavoured to lay before you those parts of Sir Walter's character to which we are indebted as they were indicated in his sayings and doings.

long series of his years;—but refrained from obtruding almost anything of comment. It was my wish to let the character develop itself: and now I am not going to “peep and botanise” upon his grave. But a few general observations will be forgiven—perhaps expected.

I believe that if the history of any one family in upper or middle life could be faithfully written, it might be as generally interesting, and as permanently useful, as that of any nation, however great and renowned. But literature has never produced any worthy book of this class, and probably it never will. The only lineages in which we can pretend to read personal character far back, with any distinctness, are those of kings and princes, and a few noble houses of the first eminence; and it hardly needed Swift’s biting satire to satisfy the student of the past, that the very highest pedigrees are as uncertain as the very lowest. We flatter the reigning monarch, or his haughtier satellite, by tracing in their lineaments the conqueror or legislator of a former century. But call up the dead, according to the Dean’s incantation, and we might have the real ancestor in some chamberlain, confessor, or musician. Scott himself delighted, perhaps above all other books, in such as approximate to the character of good family histories,—as for example, Godscroft’s House of Douglas and Angus, and the Memorie of the Somervilles,—which last is, as far as I know, the best of its class in any language; and his reprint of the trivial “Memorials” of the Haliburtons, to whose dust he is now gathered, was but one of a thousand indications of his anxiety to realise his own ancestry to his imagination. No testamentary deed, instrument of contract, or entry in a parish register, seemed valueless to him, if it bore in any manner, however obscure or distant, on the personal history of any of his ascertainable predecessors. The chronicles of the race furnished the fireside talk to which he listened in infancy at Smailholm, and his first rhymes were those of Satchels. His physical infirmity was reconciled to him, even dignified, perhaps, by tracing it back to forefathers who acquired famousness in their own way, in spite of such disadvantages. These studies led by easy and inevitable links to those of the history of his province generally, and then of his native kingdom. The lamp of his zeal burnt on brighter and brighter amidst the dust of parchments; his love and pride vivified whatever he hung over in these dim records, and patient antiquarianism, long brooding and meditating, became gloriously transmuted into the winged spirit of national poetry.

Whatever he had in himself, he would fain have made out a hereditary claim for. He often spoke both seriously and sportively on the subject. He had assembled about him in his "own great parlour," as he called it—the room in which he died—all the pictures of his ancestors that he could come by; and in his most genial evening mood he seemed never to weary of perusing them. The Cavalier of Killiecrankie—brave, faithful, learned, and romantic old "Beardie," a determined but melancholy countenance—was often surveyed with a repetition of the solitary Latin rhyme of his Vow. He had, of course, no portraits of the elder heroes of Harden to lecture upon; but a skilful hand had supplied the same wall with a fanciful delineation of the rough wooing of "Meikle-mouthed Meg;" and the only historical picture, properly so called, that he ever bespoke, was to be taken (for it was never executed) from the Raid o' the Redswire, when

"The Rutherfords with great renown, Convoyed the town o' Jedburgh out."

The ardent but sagacious "goodman of Sandyknowe," hangs by the side of his father, Bearded Wat; and when moralising in his latter day over the doubtful condition of his ultimate fortunes, Sir Walter would point to "Honest Robin," and say, "Blood will out:—my building and planting was but his buying the hunter before he stocked his sheep-walk over again." "And yet," I once heard him say, glancing to the likeness of his own staid calculating father, "it was a wonder, too—for I have a thread of the attorney in me." And so no doubt he had; for the "elements" were mingled in him curiously as well as "gently."

An imagination such as his, concentrating its day-dreams on things of this order, soon shaped out a world of its own—to which it would fain accommodate the real one. The love of his country became indeed a passion; no knight ever tilted for his mistress more willingly than he would have bled and died to preserve even the airiest surviving nothing of her antique pretensions for Scotland. But the Scotland of his affections had the clan Scott for her kernel. Next, and almost equal to the throne, was Buccleuch. Fancy rebuilt and prodigally embellished the whole system of the social existence of the old time in which the clansman (wherever there were clans) acknowledged practically no sovereign but his chief. The author of the Lay would rather have seen his heir carry the Banner of Bellenden gallantly at a foot-ball match on Carterhaugh, than he would have heard that the boy had attained the highest honours of the first university in Europe. His original pride was to be an acknowledged member of one of the "honourable families" whose progenitors had been celebrated by Satchels for following this banner in blind obedience to the patriarchal leader; his first and last worldly ambition was to be himself the founder of a distinct branch; he desired to plant a lasting root, and dreamt not of personal fame, but of long distant generations rejoicing in the name of "Scott of Abbotsford." By this idea all his reveries — all his aspirations — all his plans and efforts, were overshadowed and controlled. The great object and end only rose into clearer daylight, and swelled into more substantial dimensions, as public applause strengthened his confidence in his own powers and faculties; and when he had reached the summit of universal and unrivalled honour, he clung to his first love with the faith of a Paladin. It is easy enough to smile at all this; many will not understand it, and some who do may pity it. But it was at least a different thing from the modern vulgar ambition of amassing a fortune and investing it in land. The lordliest vision of acres would have had little charm for him, unless they were situated on Ettrick or Yarrow, or in — "Pleasant Tiviedale, Fast by the river Tweed" —

— somewhere within the primeval territory of "the Rough Clan."

His worldly ambition was thus grafted on that ardent feeling for blood and kindred which was the great redeeming element in the social life of what we call the middle ages; and — though no man estimated the solid advantages of modern existence more justly than he did, when, restraining his fancy, he exercised his graver faculties on the comparison — it was the natural effect of the studies he devoted himself to and rose by, to indispose him for dwelling on the sober results of judgment and reason in all such matters. What a striking passage that is in one of his letters, where he declines to write a biography of Queen Mary, "because his opinion was contrary to his feeling!" But he confesses the same of his Jacobitism; and yet how eagerly does he seem to have grasped at the shadow, however false and futile, under which he chose to see the means of reconciling his Jacobitism with loyalty to the reigning monarch who befriended him? We find him, over and over again, alluding to George IV. as acquiring a title de jure on the death of the poor Cardinal of York! Yet who could have known better that whatever rights the exiled males of the Stuart line ever possessed, must have remained entire with their female descendants?

The same resolution to give imagination her scope, and always in favour of antiquity, is the ruling principle and charm of all his best writings. So also with all the details of his building at Abbotsford, and of his hospitable existence, when he had fairly completed his "romance in stone and lime;"—every outline copied from some old baronial edifice in Scotland—every roof and window blazoned with clan bearings, or the lion rampant gules, or the heads of the ancient Stuart kings. He wished to revive the interior life of the castles he had emulated—their wide, open, joyous reception of all comers, but especially of kinsmen and neighbours—ballads and pibrochs to enliven flowing bowls and quaighs—jolly hunting fields in which yeoman and gentleman might ride side by side—and mirthful dances, where no Sir Piercy Shafton need blush to lead out the miller's daughter. In the brightest meridian of his genius and fame, this was his beau idéal. There was much kindness surely in such ambition:—in spite of the apparent contradiction in terms, was there not really much humility about it?

To this ambition we owe the gigantic monuments of Scott's genius; and to the kindly feelings out of which his ambition grew, grew also his connexion with merchandise. I need not recur to that sad and complicated chapter. Nor, perhaps, need I offer any more speculations, by way of explaining, and reconciling to his previous and subsequent history and demeanour, either the mystery in which he had chosen to wrap his commercial connexions from his most intimate friends, or the carelessness with which he abandoned these matters to the direction of inefficient colleagues. And yet I ought, I rather think, to have suggested to certain classes of my readers, at a much earlier stage, that no man could in former times be called either to the English or the Scottish Bar, who was known to have any direct interest in any commercial undertaking of any sort; and that the body of feelings or prejudices in which this regulation originated—(for though there might be sound reason for it besides, such undoubtedly was the main source)—prevailed in Scotland in Sir Walter's youth, to an extent of which the present generation may not easily form an adequate notion.

In the minds of the "northern noblesse de la robe," as they are styled in Redgauntlet, such feelings had wide and potent authority; insomuch that I can understand perfectly how Scott, even after he ceased to practise at the Bar, being still a Sheriff, and a member of the Faculty of Advocates, should have shrunk sensitively from the idea of having his alliance with a trading firm revealed among his comrades of the gown. And, moreover, the practice of mystery is, perhaps, of all practices, the one most likely to grow into a habit: secret breeds secret; and I ascribe, after all, the long silence about Waverley to the matured influence of this habit, as much as to any of the motives which the author has thought fit to assign in his late confessions.

But was there not, in fact, something that lay far deeper than a mere professional prejudice? Among the many things in Scott's Diaries which cast strong light upon the previous part of his history, I must number the reluctance which he confesses himself to have felt towards the resumption of the day's proper appointed task—however willing, nay eager, to labour sedulously on something else. We know how gallantly he combated it in the general—but these precious Diaries themselves are not the least pregnant proofs of the extent to which it very often prevailed—for an hour or two at least, if not for the day. I think this, if we were to go no farther, might help us somewhat in understanding the neglect about superintending ledgers and bill books; and, consequently, the rashness about buying land, building, and the like. But to what are we to ascribe the origin of this reluctance for accurate and minute investigation and transaction of business, so important to himself, in a man possessing such extraordinary sagacity, and exercising it every day with admirable regularity and precision, in the various capacities of the head of a family—the friend—the magistrate—the most distinguished citizen of Edinburgh—beyond all comparison the most distinguished member of society that figured in his time in his native kingdom?

The whole system of conceptions and aspirations, of which his early active life was the exponent, resolves itself into a romantic idealisation of Scottish aristocracy. He desired to secure for his descendants (for himself he had very soon acquired something infinitely more flattering to self-love and vanity) a decent and honourable middle station—in a scheme of life so constituted originally, and which his fancy pictured as capable of being so revived, as to admit of the kindest personal contact between a peasant, the peasant at the plough, and the magnate with a castle overlooking the monarch's. It was the patriarchal domestic system, that he thought of; one that never prevailed even in Scotland, within the historical period that is to say, except in the Highlands, and in his own dear Borderland. This system knew nothing of commerce — a little certainly of literature beyond the raiment of the wandering harper.

“High placed in hall — a welcome guest”

His filial reverence of imagination shrunk from marring the antique, if barbarous, simplicity. I suspect that at the highest elevation of his literary renown — when princes bowed to his name, and nations thrilled at it — he would have considered losing all that at a change of the wind, as nothing, compared to parting with his place as the Cadet of Harden and Chamberlain of Buccleuch, who had, no matter by what means, reached such a position, that when a notion arose of embodying “a Buccleuch legion,” not a Scott in the Forest would have thought it otherwise than natural for Abbotstford to be one of the field-officers. I can, therefore, understand that he may have, from the very first, exerted the dispensing power of imagination very liberally, in virtually absolving himself from dwelling on the wood of which his ladder was to be constructed. Enough was said in a preceding chapter of the obvious fact, that the author of such a series of romances as his, must have, to all intents and purposes, lived more than half his life in worlds purely fantastic. In one of the last obscure and faltering pages of his Diary he says, that if any one asked him how much of his thought was occupied by the novel then in hand, the answer would have been, that in one sense it never occupied him except when the amanuensis sat before him, but that in another it was never five minutes out of his head. Such, I have no doubt, the case had always been. But I must be excused from doubting whether, when the substantive fiction actually in process of manufacture was absent from his mind, the space was often or voluntarily occupied and positive external duty interposing upon the real practical worldly position and business of the Clerk of Session — of the Sheriff, — least of all of the printer or the bookseller. The sum is, if I read him aright, that he was always willing, in his ruminative moods, to veil, if possible, from his own optics the kind of machinery by which alone he had found the means of attaining his darling objects. Having acquired a perhaps unparalleled power over the direction of scarcely paralleled faculties, he chose to exert his power in this manner. On no other supposition can I find his history intelligible;—I mean, of course, the great obvious and marking facts of his history; for I hope I have sufficiently disclaimed all pretension to a thorough-going analysis. He appears to have studiously escaped from whatever could have interfered with his own enjoyment—to have revelled in the fair results, and waved the wand of obliterating magic over all besides; and persisted so long, that (like the sorcerer he celebrates) he became the dupe of his own delusions. It is thus that (not forgetting the subsidiary influence of professional Edinburgh prejudices) I am inclined, on the whole, to account for his initiation in the practice of mystery—a thing, at first sight, so alien from the frank, open, generous nature of a man, than whom none ever had or deserved to have more real friends.

The indulgence cost him very dear. It ruined his fortunes—but I can have no doubt that it did worse than that. I cannot suppose that a nature like his was fettered and shut up in this way without suffering very severely from the “cold obstruction.” There must have been a continual “insurrection” in his “state of man;” and, above all, I doubt not that what gave him the bitterest pain in the hour of his calamities, was the feeling of compunction with which he then found himself obliged to stand before those with whom he had, through life, cultivated brotherly friendship, convicted of having kept his heart closed to them on what they could not but suppose to have been the chief subjects of his thought and anxiety, in times when they withheld nothing from him. These, perhaps, were the “written troubles” that had been cut deepest into his brain. I think they were, and believe it the more, because it was never acknowledged.

If he had erred in the primary indulgence out of which this sprang, he at least made noble atonement. During the most energetic years of manhood he laboured with one prize in view; and he had just grasped it, as he fancied, securely, when all at once the vision was dissipated: he found himself naked and desolate as Job. How he nerved himself against the storm—how he felt and how he resisted it—how soberly, steadily, and resolutely he contemplated the possibility of yet, by redoubled exertions, in so far retrieving his fortunes, as that no man should lose by having trusted those for whom he had been pledged—how well he kept his vow, and what price it cost him to do so — all than the reader, I doubt not, will It seems to me that strength of character was severer test than when, for labours of love, so hitherto almost always been — The pleasant excite-for the attainment of ends that owed all the beauty to a poetical fancy — there came to be iron pertinacity of daily and nightly toil, in the a days which there was nothing but the sense honour to make stringent — It is the fond and fancy in all the previous story that gives its dignity to the voluntary agony of the sequel, which appears

“Sapientis, ubique imperiosus;
 Quem neque paupertas, neque mors, neque vitæ
 Responsare cupidinibus, contemnere honores,
 Fortis, et in seipso totus, teres atque rotundus,
 Extremi ne quid valeat per hunc morari;
 In quem manca ruit semper Fortuna.”

The attentive reader will not deny that every proud ideal has been justified to the letter. — boasted of stoicism, his heroism was something the star's; for it was not founded on a hazy down of all delicate and tender thoughts and lays his heart bare in his Diary; and we there reters that will never die, how the steamiest resolulioner may be at once quickened and adorned impulses of that spirit of love, which alone is angel of life — This is the moment in which he sure to fix his portraiture. — But the noble exhibi-fleeting one, it was not that a robust mind elea fierce effort for the crisis of an hour. — The man with his days; and if it shortened them, let us own immortal words,

“Sound, sound the clarion, till the life,
 To all the sensual world proclaim —
 One crowded hour of glorious life
 Is worth an age without a name.”

For the rest, I presume, it will be allowed character, which we have the opportunity of equal minuteness, had fewer faults mixed up
 The grand virtue of fortitude, the basis of all displayed in higher perfection than in him; and haps true courage always is, combined with an rable spirit of kindness and humanity. His pride, if we must call it so, undebased by the least tincture of mere vanity, was intertwined with a most exquisite charity, and was not inconsistent with true humility. If ever the principle of kindness was incarnated in a mere man, it was in him; and real kindness can never be but modest. In the social relations of life, where men are most effectually tried, no spot can be detected in him. He was a patient, dutiful, reverent son; a generous, compassionate, tender husband; an honest, careful, and most affectionate father. Never was a more virtuous or a happier fireside than his. The influence of his mighty genius shadowed it imperceptibly; his calm good sense, and his angelic sweetness of heart and temper, regulated and softened a strict but paternal discipline. His children, as they grew up, understood by degrees the high privilege of their birth; but the profoundest sense of his greatness never disturbed their confidence in his goodness. The buoyant play of his spirits made him sit young among the young; parent and son seemed to live in brotherhood together; and the chivalry of his imagination threw a certain air of courteous gallantry into his relations with his daughters, which gave a very peculiar grace to the fondness of their intercourse. Though there could not be a gentler mother than Lady Scott, on those delicate occasions most interesting to young ladies, they always made their father the first confidant.

Perhaps the most touching evidence of the lasting tenderness of his early domestic feelings was exhibited to his executors, when they opened his repositories in search of his testament, the evening after his burial. On lifting up his desk, we found arranged in careful order a series of little objects, which had obviously been so placed there that his eye might rest on them every morning before he began his tasks. These were the old-fashioned boxes that had garnished his mother's toilet, when he, a sickly child, slept in her dressing-room — the silver taper-stand which the young advocate had bought for her with his first five-guinea fee — a row of small packets inscribed with her hand, and containing the hair of those of her offspring that had died before her — his father's snuff-box and étui-case — and more things of the like sort, recalling the "old familiar faces." The same feeling was apparent in all the arrangement of his private apartment. Pictures of his father and mother were the only ones in his dressing-room. The clumsy antique cabinets that stood there, things of a very different class from the beautiful and costly productions in the public rooms below, had all belonged to the furniture of George's father's rickety washing-stand, with all tenancies, though exceedingly unlike what scrupulous habits would have selected in ground. The whole place seemed fitted up of the lares.

Such a son and parent could hardly fail in social relations. No man was a firmer or more devoted friend. I knew not that he ever lost one whom, during the energetic middle stage of his life, differences or other accidental circumstances had separated. All his friends, however familiarly, had all gathered round him, and his warmth of early affection in his later days. He sought to dignify the connexion in their eyes; but on either side. The imagination that so often possessed him when he chose to give her the rein, was a determined control when any of the possibilities of active life came into question. A high and dignified presence presided over whatever he had to do as a contractor; and as a landlord, he considered his position as a guardian of his hearth.

Of his political creed, the many who have known him will of course say that it was the natural result of his devotion to the mere prejudice of antiquity. I am willing to allow that this must have had a great influence on the matter — and that he himself would have been more of the word prejudice as of the word antiquity. Scotland could be considered as standing separate from the rest of the empire, he was not slow to embrace the opportunity of again rehoisting the old signal of national independence; and I believe that no circumstance in his literary career gave him more satisfaction than the success of Malachi Malaguth's titles. He confesses, however, in his Diary, how much it became him to summon calmness to resist his imaginative prepossessions on this score; and that they ever led him into any serious pursuit. He delighted in letting his fancy run wild about astrology and horoscopes — but I venture to say, had he been placed on a bench a hundred years before he was born, he would have been more certain to give juries sour testimony by examining the pretended evidence of supernatural powers of any sort; and I believe, in like manner, that he would have been more certain to give juries a verdict in favour of the English faction, civil or religious, sprung from the

in Scotland, he would have done more than any other living man could have hoped to do, for putting it down. He was on all practical points a steady, conscientious Tory of the school of William Pitt; who, though an anti-revolutionist, was certainly anything but an anti-reformer. He rejected the innovations, in the midst of which he died, as a revival, under alarmingly authoritative auspices, of the doctrines which had endangered Britain in his youth, and desolated Europe throughout his prime of manhood. May the gloomy anticipations which hung over his closing years be unfulfilled! But should they be so, let posterity remember that the warnings, and the resistance of his and other powerful intellects, were probably in that event the appointed means for averting a catastrophe in which, had England fallen, the whole civilised world must have been involved.

Sir Walter received a strictly religious education under the eye of parents, whose virtuous conduct was in unison with the principles they desired to instil into their children. From the great doctrines thus recommended he appears never to have swerved; but he must be numbered among the many who have incurred considerable risk of doing so, in consequence of the rigidity with which Presbyterian heads of families were used to enforce compliance with various relics of the puritanical observance. He took up, early in life, a repugnance to the mode in which public worship is conducted in the Scottish Establishment; and adhered to the sister Church, whose system of government and discipline he believed to be the fairest copy of the primitive polity, and whose litanies and collects he revered as having been transmitted to us from the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles. The few passages in his Diaries in which he alludes to his own religious feelings and practices, shew clearly the sober, serene, and elevated frame of mind in which he habitually contemplated man's relations with his Maker; the modesty with which he shrunk from indulging either the presumption of reason, or the extravagance of imagination, in the province of Faith; his humble reliance on the wisdom and mercy of God; and his firm belief that we are placed in this state of existence, not to speculate about another, but to prepare ourselves for it by active exertion of our intellectual faculties, and the constant cultivation of kindness and benevolence towards our fellow-men.

But his moral, political, and religious character has sufficiently impressed itself upon the great body of his writings.

He is indeed one of the few great authors of modern Europe who stand acquitted of having written a line that ought to have embittered the bed of death. His works teach the practical lessons of morality and Christianity in the most captivating form — unobtrusively and unaffectedly. And I think it is not refining too far to say, that in these works, as well as his whole demeanour as a man of letters, we may trace the happy effects — (enough has already been said as to some less fortunate and agreeable ones) — of his having written throughout with a view to something beyond the acquisition of personal fame. Perhaps no great poet ever made his literature so completely ancillary to the objects and purposes of practical life. However his imagination might expatiate, it was sure to rest over his home. The sanctities of domestic love and social duty were never forgotten; and the same circumstance that most ennoble all his triumphs, affords also the best apology for his errors.

From the first, his possession of a strong and brilliant genius was acknowledged; and the extent of it seems to have been guessed by others, before he was able to persuade himself that he had claim to a place among the masters of literature. The ease with which he did everything, deceived him; and he probably would never have done himself any measure of justice, even as compared with those of his own time, but for the fact, which no modesty could long veil, that whatever he did became immediately "the fashion," — the object of all but universal imitation. Even as to this, he was often ready to surmise that the priority of his own movement might have been matter of accident; and certainly nothing can mark the humility of his mind more strikingly than the style in which he discusses, in his Diary, the pretensions of the pigmies that swarmed and fretted in the deep wake of his mighty vessel. To the really original writers among his contemporaries he did full justice; no differences of theory or taste had the least power to disturb his candour. In some cases he rejoiced in feeling and expressing a cordial admiration, where he was met by, at best, a cold and grudging reciprocity: and in others, his generosity was proof against not only the private belief but the public exposure of envious malignity. Lord Byron might well say that Scott could be jealous of no but the brilliancy of his imagination greatly sustained the delusion. It unconsciously gave precision to the trembling outline, and life and warmth to the vapid colours before him. This was especially the case as to romances and novels; the scenes and characters in them were invested with so much of the "light within," that he would close with regret volumes which, perhaps, no other person, except the diseased glutton of the circulating library, ever could get half through. Where colder critics saw only a schoolboy's hollowed turnip with its inch of tallow, he looked through the dazzling spray of his own fancy, and sometimes the clumsy toy seems to have swelled almost into "the majesty of buried Denmark."

These servile imitators are already forgotten, or will soon be so; but it is to be hoped that the spirit which breathes through his works may continue to act on our literature, and consequently on the character and manners of men. The race that grew up under the influence of that intellect can hardly be expected to appreciate fully their own obligations to it: and yet if we consider what were the tendencies of the minds and works that, but for his, must have been unrivalled in the power and opportunity to mould young ideas, we may picture to ourselves in some measure the magnitude of the debt we owe to a perpetual succession, through thirty years, of publications unapproached in charm, and all instilling a high and healthy code; a bracing, invigorating spirit; a contempt of mean passions, whether vindictive or voluptuous; humane charity, as distinct from moral laxity as from unsympathising austerity; sagacity too deep for cynicism, and tenderness never degenerating into sentimentality: animated throughout in thought, opinion, feeling, and style, by one and the same pure energetic principle—a pith and savour of manhood; appealing to whatever is good and loyal in our natures, and rebuking whatever is low and selfish.

Had Sir Walter never taken a direct path in politics as a writer, the visible bias of his mind on such subjects must have had a great influence; nay, the mere fact that such a man belonged to a particular side would have been a very important weight in the balance. His services, direct and indirect, towards repressing the revolutionary propensities of his age, were vast—far beyond the comprehension of vulgar politicians.

On the whole, I have no doubt that, the more the details of his personal history are revealed and studied, the more powerfully will that be found to inculcate the same great lessons with his works. Where else might we have sought to perity may be extended by the memory, and fringed by exertion. Where else we see the wise more strikingly reborn, and as if miraculously purified and exalted in the passage through death? I have lingered so long on the detail perhaps, because, even from that one instance, I find that more rapid success may be to some mass. But who does not feel that there is something as well as elevating in the content character seems to belong to a more elevated world than ours, and, indeed, I cannot help thinking of tectural fabrics of other ages, which he most delight there is such a congregation of imagery and trac-less indulgence of whim and fancy, the sublime with the beautiful, and there contrasted with the half, perhaps, seen in the clear daylight, and half with the blazoned forms of the past — that one get bewildered among the variety of particulars and not feel either the unity of the grand height and solidness of the structure, until the closed upon the labyrinth of aisles and shrines, and it from a distance, but still within its shadow.

And yet as, with whatever admiration has been but regard him constantly when among them, feeling was still love and affection, so is it now ever it be, as to his memory. It is not the priv-reader to have partaken in the friendship of A GENTLE MAN; but those who have not, may be assured of ment, which the near homely contemplation of inspires, is a thing entirely by itself.

And now to conclude. — In the year 1832, Fr many, as well as Britain, had to mourn over the intellects. Goethe shortly preceded Scott, and C him; and with these mighty lights were extinothers of no common order — among the res Macintosh.

Of the persons closely connected with Sir W often named accordingly in these pages, few re-Hallantyno was on his deathbed when he heard friend and patron's death. The Ettrick Shepherd 1815; George Thomson, the happy "Domino" the happy days of Abbotstord, in 1838. Wil-after 1832, had the care first of the Scotforth, the Balnagowan estates, in Ross-shire, as factor: but being struck with paralysis in August 1814, retired to the farmhouse of his excellent brother James at Contin, and died there in May 1815. Mr. Morrill, to whom the larger Memoirs of his friend were inscribed, died at Rokeby on the 12th of July 1813: loved, venerated, never to be forgotten. William Clerk of Eldin, admired through life for talents and learning, of which he has left no monument, died at Edinburgh in January 1817.

But why extend this catalogue? Sixteen years have passed the generation to which Scott belonged have been gathered to their fathers. Of his own children none now survives. Miss Anne Scott received at Christmas 1832 a grant of L.200 per annum from the privy purse of King William IV. But her name did not long burden the pension list. Her constitution had been miserably shattered in the course of her long and painful attendance, first on her mother's illness, and then on her father's; and perhaps reverse of fortune, and disappointments of various sorts connected with that, had also heavy effect. From the day of Sir Walter's death, the strong stimulus of duty being lost, she too often looked and spoke like one

“ Taking the measure of an unmade grave.”

After a brief interval of disordered health, she contracted a brain fever, which carried her off abruptly. She died in my house in the Regent's Park on the 25th June 1833, and her remains are placed in the New Cemetery in the Harrow Road.

The adjoining grave holds those of her nephew John Hugh Lockhart, who died 15th December 1831; and also those of my wife Sophia, who expired after a long illness, which she bore with all possible meekness and fortitude, on the 17th of May 1837. Of all the race she most resembled her father in countenance, in temper, and in manners.

Charles Scott, whose spotless worth had tenderly endeared him to the few who knew him intimately, and whose industry and accuracy were warmly acknowledged by his professional superiors, on Lord Berwick's recall from the Neapolitan Embassy resumed his duties as a clerk in the Foreign Office, and continued in that situation until the summer of 1841. Sir John M'Neill, G.C.B., being then intrusted with a special mission to the Court of Persia, carried Charles with him as attaché and private secretary; but the journey on horseback through Asia Minor was trying for his never robust frame; and he contracted an inflammatory disorder, which cut him off at Teheran, almost immediately on his arrival there — October 28, 1841. He had reached his 36th year. His last hours had every help that kindness and skill could yield: for the Ambassador had for him the affection of an elder brother, and the physician, Dr. George Joseph Bell (now also gone), had been his schoolfellow, and through life his friend. His funeral in that remote place was so attended as to mark the world-wide reputation of his father. By Sir John M'Neill's care, a small monument with a suitable inscription was erected over his untimely grave.

Walter, who succeeded to the baronetcy, proceeded to Madras in 1839, as Lieutenant-Colonel of the 15th Hussars; and subsequently commanded that regiment. He was beloved and esteemed in it by officers and men as much, I believe, as any gentleman ever was in any corps of the British army; and there was no officer of his rank who stood higher in the opinion of the heads of his profession. He had begun life with many advantages — a very handsome person, and great muscular strength — a sweet and even temper, and talents which in the son of any father but his would have been considered brilliant. His answers, when examined as a witness before a celebrated Court-Martial in Ireland in 1834, were indeed universally admired: — whoever had known his father, recognised the head and the heart: and in his letters from India, especially his descriptions of scenery and sport, there occur many passages which, for picturesque effect and easy playful humour, would have done no discredit even to his father's pen. Though neglectful of extra-professional studies in his earlier days, he had in after-life read extensively, and made himself, in every sense of the term, an accomplished man. The library for the soldiers of his corps was founded by him: the care of it was a principal occupation of his later years. His only legacy out of his family was one of L.100 to this library; and his widow, well understanding what he felt towards it, directed that a similar sum should be added in her own name. Sir Walter having unwisely exposed himself in a tiger-hunt in August 1846, was on his return to his quarters at Bangalore, smitten with fever, which ended in liver disease. He was ordered to proceed to England, and died near the Cape of Good Hope, on board the ship Wellesley, February the 8th, 1847. Lady Scott conveyed his remains to this country, and they were interred in the paternal aisle at Dryburgh on the 4th of May following, in the presence of the few survivors of his father's friends and many of his own. Three officers who had served under him, and were accidentally in Britain, arrived from great distances to pay him the last homage of their respect. He had never had any child; and with him the baronetcy expired.

The children of illustrious men begin the world with great advantages, if they know how to use them: but this is hard and rare. There is risk that in the flush of youth, favourable to all illusions, the filial pride may be twisted to personal vanity. When experience checks this misgrowth, it is apt to do so with a severity that shall reach the best sources of moral and intellectual developement. The great sons of great fathers have been few. It is usual to see their progeny smiled at through life for stilted pretension, or despised, at best pitied, for an inactive inglorious humility. The shadow of the oak is broad, but noble plants seldom rise within that circle. It was fortunate for the sons of Scott that his day darkened in the morning of theirs. The sudden calamity anticipated the natural effect of observation and the collisions of society and business. All weak unmanly folly was nipt in the bud, and soon withered to the root. They were both remarkably modest men, but in neither had the better stimulus of the blood been arrested. In aspect and manners they were unlike each other: the elder tall and athletic, the model of a cavalier, with a generous frankness: the other slender and delicate of frame, in bearing of a womanly gentleness and reserve; but in heart and mind none more akin. The affection of all the family, but especially perhaps of the brothers, for each other, kept to the end all the warmth of undivided childhood. When Charles died, and Walter knew that he was left alone of all his father's house, he evidently began to droop in spirit. It appeared to me from his letters that he thenceforth dreaded rather than desired a return to Scotland and Abbotsford. His only anxiety was that his regiment might be marched towards the Punjaub.

The only descendants of the Poet now alive are my son, Walter Scott Lockhart, (a lieutenant in the army,) who, as his uncle's heir of entail, has lately received permission to assume the additional surname of Scott;—and his sister, Charlotte Harriet Jane, married in August 1847 to James Robert Hope, Barrister, second son of the late General the Honourable Sir Alexander Hope, G.C.B.¹

¹ Walter Scott Lockhart Scott died at Versailles, on the 10th of January 1853, and was buried in the cemetery of Notre Dame there.

John Gibson Lockhart, his father, and the author of this Biography, died at Abbotsford on the 25th of November 1854, and was buried in Dryburgh Abbey, at the feet of Walter Scott.

Mrs. Hope, on the death of her brother, succeeded to the estate of Abbotsford, and, with her husband, assumed the name of Scott, in addi-

In the winter succeeding the Poet's death, his sons and myself, as his executors, endeavoured to make such arrangements as were within our power for completing the great object of his own wishes and fatal exertions.

We found the remaining principal sum of commercial debt to be nearly L.54,000. L.22,000 had been insured upon his life; there were some monies in the hands of the Trustees, and Mr. Cadell very handsomely offered to advance to us the balance, about L.30,000, that we might without further delay settle with the body of creditors.

This was effected accordingly on the 2d of February 1833; Mr. Cadell accepting, as his only security, the right to the profits accruing from Sir Walter's copyright property and literary remains, until such time as this new and consolidated obligation should be discharged. Besides his commercial debt, Sir Walter left also one of L.10,000, contracted by himself as an individual, when struggling to support Constable in December 1825, and secured by mortgage on the lands of Abbotsford. And, lastly, the library and museum, presented to him in free gift by his creditors in December 1830, were bequeathed to his eldest son, with a burden to the extent of L.5000, which sum he designed to be divided between his younger children, as already explained in an extract from his diary. His will provided that the produce of his literary property, in case of its proving sufficient to wipe out the remaining debt of the firm, should then be applied to the extinction of these mortgages; and thereafter, should this also be accomplished, divided equally among his surviving family.

Various meetings were held soon after his death with a view to the erection of Monuments to his memory; and the records of these meetings, and their results, are adorned by many of the noblest and most distinguished names both of England and of Scotland. In London, the Lord Bishop of Exeter, Sir Robert Peel, and Sir John Malcolm, took a prominent part as speakers: and the result was a subscription amounting to about L.10,000; but a part of this was embezzled by a young person rashly appointed to the post of secretary, who carried it with him to America, where he soon afterwards died. The noblemen and gentlemen who subscribed to this fund adopted a suggestion —

tion to that of Hope. She died at Edinburgh on the 26th of October 1858, leaving three children, viz. : —

“Mary Monica,” born on the 2d of October 1852.

“Walter Michael,” born on the 2d of June 1857.

“Margaret Anne,” born on the 17th of September 1858.

Of these, Margaret died on the 3d, and Walter on the 11th of December 1858, and their remains lie beside those of their mother (and of their father, J. R. Hope-Scott, who died April 29, 1873) in the vaults of St. Margaret's Convent, Edinburgh. “Mary Monica,” who thus became the only surviving descendant of Walter Scott, married in 1874 the Hon. J. C. Maxwell, who assumed the name of Scott, and has, with other issue, Walter Joseph, born 1875.

(which originated, I believe, with Lord Francis Egerton, now Earl of Ellesmere, and the Honourable John Stuart Wortley, now Lord Wharfedale) — that, in place of erecting a cenotaph in Westminster Abbey, or a statue or pillar elsewhere, the most suitable and respectful tribute that could be paid to Sir Walter's memory would be to discharge all the encumbrances upon Abbotsford, and entail the House, with its library and other articles of curiosity collected by him, together with the lands which he had planted and embellished, upon the heirs of his name for ever. The sum produced by the subscription, however, proved inadequate to the realisation of such a scheme; and after much consultation, it was at length settled that the money in the hands of the committee (between £7000 and £8000) should be employed to liquidate the debt upon the library and museum, and whatever might be over towards the mortgage on the lands. This arrangement enabled the Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Walter Scott to secure, in the shape originally desired, the permanent preservation at least of the house and its immediate appurtenances, as a memorial of the tastes and habits of the founder.

Such was the state of matters when the Lieutenant-Colonel embarked for India: and in his absence no further steps could well be taken. Upon his death, it was found that, notwithstanding the very extensive demand for his father's writings, there still remained a considerable debt to Mr. Cadell, and also the greater part of the old debt secured on the lands. Mr. Cadell then offered to relieve the guardians of the young inheritor of that great name from much anxiety and embarrassment, by accepting, in full payment of the sum due to himself, and also in recompense for his taking on himself the final obliteration of the heritable bond, a transference to him of the remaining claims of the family over Sir Walter's writings, together with the result of some literary exertions of the only surviving executor. This arrangement was completed in May 1847; and the estate, as well as the house and its appendages, became at last unfettered. The rental is small; but I hope and trust, that as long as any of the blood remains, reverent care will attend over the guardianship of a possession associated with so many high and noble recollections. On that subject the gallant soldier who executed the entail expressed also in his testament feelings of the devoutest anxiety: and it was, I am well assured, in order that no extraneous obstacle might thwart the fulfilment of his pious wishes, that Mr. Cadell crowned a long series of kind services to the cause and the memory of Sir Walter Scott, by the very handsome proposition of 1847.

Abbotsford, after his own immortal works, is the best monument of its founder. But at Edinburgh also, soon after his death, a meeting was held with a view to the erection of some visible memorial in his native city; the prominent speakers were the late Marquess of Lethbrun, the late Earl of Rosebery, Lord Jeffrey, and Peacock, and the subscription then begun reached a sum which by subsequent exertions reached no less. The result has now to be seen in a truly magnificent composition to every visitor of Scott's "Tomb" — a lofty Gothic cross, enclosing and surmounting a statue of the Poet, which, as well as many in the interior, does great honour to the church of

In Glasgow, also, there was a meeting in 1841, from which there reached £1,500, and in the chief city, already graced with statues of two illustrious names, James Watt and Sir John Moore, there is now surmounted with a statue of Sir Walter Scott.

Finally, in the market place of Selkirk they set up, at the cost of local friends and neighbours, a stone, by Mr Alexander Ritchie of Musselburgh, with the following inscription:—

"ERECTED IN AUGUST 1830, IN GRATEFUL AND AFFECTIONATE REMEMBRANCE
OF
SIR WALTER SCOTT, BARON
SUMNER OF THIS COUNTY
FROM 1800 TO 1832

By Yarrow's stream still let me stray,
Though none should guide my feeble way,
Still feel the breeze down Ettrick break
Although it chill my withered cheek."

In what manner to cover the grave itself required some consideration, in consequence of the surrounding and overhanging ruins. Sir F. C. recommended a block of Aberdeen granite, so solid as to defy the fall of the wind roof of the aisle, and kind shape, in which he followed the stone coffin-ages — especially the "marble stone" on which awaits the opening of the wizard's vault in drawing had just been given to Allan Cummin am informed, the very last that he penned. He also had within a few hours a paralytic seizure, from which he never rose. The inscriptions on this simple but graceful tomb are merely of name and date.

DRYBURGH ABBEY: SCOTT'S TOMB.

The authentic likenesses of Sir Walter Scott, as far as I have been enabled to trace them, are as follows:—

1. A very good miniature, done at Bath, when he was in the fifth or sixth year of his age, was given by him to his daughter Sophia, and is now in my possession—the artist's name unknown. The child appears with long flowing hair, the colour a light chestnut; a deep open collar, and scarlet dress. It is nearly a profile; the outline wonderfully like what it was to the last; the expression of the eyes and mouth very striking—grave and pensive.

2. A miniature sent by Mrs. Scott to Miss Carpenter, shortly before their marriage in 1797—at Abbotsford. It is not a good work of art, and I know not who executed it. The hair is slightly powdered.

3. The first oil painting, done for Lady Scott in 1805, by Saxon, was, in consequence of repeated applications for the purpose of being engraved, transferred by her to Messrs. Longman & Co., and is now in their house in Paternoster Row. This is a very fine picture, representing, I have no doubt, most faithfully, the author of the Lay of the Last Minstrel. Length, three-quarters—dress black—hair nut-brown—the favourite bull-terrier Camp leaning his head on the knee of his master.

4. The first picture by Raeburn was done in 1808 for Constable, and passed, at the sale of his effects, into the hands of the Duke of Buccleuch. Scott is represented at full length, sitting by a ruined wall, with Camp at his feet—Hermitage Castle and the mountains of Liddesdale in the background. This noble portrait has been repeatedly engraved. Dress black—Hessian boots.—5. The second full-length by Raeburn (done a year later) is nearly a repetition; but the painter had some new sittings. Two greyhounds (Douglas and Percy) appear in addition to Camp, and the background gives the valley of the Yarrow, marking the period of Ashestiel and Marmion. This piece is at Abbotsford.

6. A head in oil by Thomas Phillips, R.A., done in 1818 for Mr. Murray, and now in Albermarle Street. The costume was, I think, unfortunately selected—a tartan plaid and open collar. This gives a theatrical air to what would otherwise have been a very graceful representation of Scott in the 47th year of his age. Mr. Phillips (for whom Scott had a warm regard, and who often visited him at Abbotsford) has caught a true expression not hit upon by any of his brethren — a smile of gentle enthusiasm. The head has a vivid resemblance to Sir Walter's eldest daughter, and also to his grandson John Hugh Lockhart. A duplicate was added by the late Earl Whitworth to the collection at Knowle.

7. A head sketched in oil by Geddes — being one of his studies for a picture of the finding of the Scottish Regalia in 1818 — is in the possession of Sir James Steuart of Allanbank, Baronet. It is nearly a profile — boldly drawn.

8. The unrivalled portrait (three-quarters) by Sir Thomas Lawrence, painted for King George IV. in 1820, and now in the Corridor at Windsor Castle. The engraving by Robinson is masterly.

9. A head by Sir Henry Raeburn — the last work of his hand — was done in 1822 for Lord Montagu, and is at Ditton Park: a massive strong likeness, heavy at first sight, but which grows into favour upon better acquaintance — the eyes very deep and fine. This picture has been well engraved in mezzotinto.

10. A small three-quarters, in oil, done at Chiefswood, in August 1824, by Gilbert Stewart Newton, R.A., and presented by him to Mrs. Lockhart. This pleasing picture gives Sir Walter in his usual country dress — a green jacket and black neckcloth, with a leathern belt for carrying the forester's axe round the shoulders. It is the best domestic portrait ever done. A duplicate, in Mr. Murray's possession, was engraved for Finden's "Illustrations of Byron."

11. A half-length, painted by C. R. Leslie, R.A., in 1824, for Mr. Ticknor of Boston, New England, is now in that gentleman's possession. I never saw this picture in its finished state, but the beginning promised well, and I am assured it is worthy of the artist's high reputation. It has not been engraved — in this country I mean — but a reduced copy of it furnished an indifferent print for one of the Annuals.

12. A small head was painted in 1826 by Mr. Knight, a young artist, patronised by Terry. This juvenile production, ill-drawn and feeble in expression, was engraved for Mr. Lodge's great work!

13. A half-length by Mr. Colvin Smith of Edinburgh, done in January 1828, for the artist's uncle, Lord Gillies. I never admired this picture; but it pleased many, perhaps better judges. Mr. Smith executed no less than fifteen copies for friends of Sir Walter;—among others, the Bishop of Llandaff (Copleston), the Chief-Commissioner Adam, and John Hope, now Lord Justice-Clerk of Scotland.

14. A half-length done by Mr. Graham Gilbert in 1829, for the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

15. An excellent half-length portrait, by John Watson Gordon, R.A., done in March 1830, for Mr. Cadell. Scott is represented sitting, with both hands resting on his staff—the stag-hound Bran on his left.

16. A cabinet picture done at Abbotsford in 1831 by Francis Grant, R.A.,—who had the advantage of a familiar knowledge of the subject, being an attached friend of the family. This interesting piece, which has armour and stag-hounds, was done for Lady Ruthven.

17. I am sorry to say that I cannot express much approbation of the representation of Sir Walter introduced by Sir David Wilkie in his “Abbotsford Family;” nor indeed are any of the likenesses in this graceful composition (1817) at all satisfactory to me, except only that of Sir Adam Fergusson, which is perfect. This is in Sir A.’s possession.—18, 19, 20. Nor can I speak more favourably either of the head of Scott in Wilkie’s “Arrival of George IV. at Holyrood” (1822), or of that in Sir William Allan’s picture of the “Ettrick Shepherd’s Househeating” (1819). Allan has succeeded better in his picture of “The Author of Waverley in his Study;” this was done shortly before Sir Walter’s death.

21. Mr. Edwin Landseer, R.A., has painted a full-length portrait, with the scenery of the Rhymer’s Glen; and his familiarity with Scott renders this almost as valuable as if he had sat for it. This beautiful picture is in the gallery of Mr. Wells at Redleaf, Kent.

I have given better evidence than my own as to the inimitable Bust done by Sir Francis Chantrey in 1820, and now in the library at Abbotsford. Previous to Sir Walter’s death, the niche which this now occupies held a cast of the monumental effigy of Shakspeare, presented to him by George Bullock, with an elegant stand, having the letters W. S. in large relieve on its front. Anxiety to place the precious marble in the safest station induced the poet’s son to make the existing arrangement on the day after his father’s funeral. The propriety of the position is obvious; but in case of misrepresentation hereafter, it is proper to mention that it was not chosen by Sir Walter for an image of himself. As already stated, Chantrey sculptured, in 1828, for Sir Robert Peel, a bust character of a most original. Sir Walter's good likeness, at various periods of his life, to other eminent families and reputation. I am not aware that any of these persons named but two ever reached marble. One of these, a very tolerable work by Mr. Joseph about 1827, and is in the gallery of London, at Frestonhall, near London. The other, by Mr. Lawrence Macdonald, in the year 1840. The period of the artist's observation was so sufficient to render his efforts fruitless.

The only statue executed during Sir Walter's life, that by John Greenhalgh in freestone. On the occasion of an early companion of the Poet, Mr. Thomas Theobald, exclaimed, "A petrification of Scott!" It is a meritorious work, and I am well pleased that it is in Mr. Cadell's premises in St. Andrew Square. The proprietor has adopted the inscription for it at St. Alban's, and carved on the pedestal "Sir Walter Scott's noble marble statue for the Edinburgh was erected in 1847."

¹ This statue was presented by the trustees of Mr. Cadell to the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh, and is in the Library. 1862

INDEX.

A.

"ARMOR, THE," 3 vols., publication of, in 1820, 373.

Abbotsford, description and purchase of, 209. New purchase of land added to, 228, 267, 274; purchase of Toftfield, and extent of territory in 1817, 288. Hospitalities and sports at, 360. The hunt, 369. Plans for completion of, 384. "Century of Inventions" at, 417. Completion of, 432-435. Public access to, 435. Advance of £10,000 to Constable on the lands of, 473. The Library, 517. Feelings of domesticity at, 522. Gift of the Library, furniture, &c. to Scott by creditors, 559.

Abbotsford Club, 415.
Hunt, 360, 471.

Abercorn, Marchioness of, 152, 194.
Marquis of, 152, 154, 194.
— Scott's visit to, 229.

Abercrombie, Dr., 558, 563, 567.

Abercromby, Lord, 35, 60.

Aberdeen Advocates, 488.

Abud & Co., London Jews, their harsh treatment of Scott, 521.

Adam, Dr. Alex., Rector of the High School of Edinburgh, 21.

Adam, Admiral, 506, 507.
— Sir Frederick, 530, 593.
General, 530.
— Lord Chief-Commissioner, at a Carlton House Dinner, 254. His formation of the Blair-Adam Club, 374, 375.
— 415, 506, 549, 559.

Adolphus, J. L. Esq., visits Abbotsford, 421; his reminiscences of, 421. Visits Abbotsford in 1827, 516. Extracts from his memoranda, ib. 580.

Advocates, usages of the Faculty of, 613.

Allan, Thomas, Esq., 559.

Altrive Farm, 172.

Alvanley, Lady, 215. Letter to, 497.

American tourists at Abbotsford, 330.
— MS. tragedy, 327.
— axe, 432.

Ancestry of Scott, 2, 609.

"ANNE OF GEIERSTEIN," 3 vols., 439.
Publication of, in May, 1829, 542.

Annual Festivals, 503.

"ANTIQUARY, THE," 3 vols., 267.
Publication of, 271, passim, 274.

Antiquity, Scott's love of, 611.

"Apology for Tales of Terror." See Tales.

Apennines, the, 596.

Arden, Hon. Catherine, 598.

Aristocracy, Scottish, Scott's romantic idealisation of, 613.

Arkwright, Mrs., her musical compositions, 535.

Ashestiel, house of, 114; description of, 116.
— 209, 211; departure of Scott from, 214.

Ashley, Hon. William, 590.

Atkinson, Mr., architect, 384, 385.

"AUCHINDRANE, OR THE AYRSHIRE TRAGEDY," publication of, 547.

Auldjo, Mr., Naples, 590.

B.

BAILLIE, Miss Joanna, Scott's introduction to, 143.
— Letters to, 171, 172, 179, 201, 210, 372, 389, 534.
— her "Family Legend," 195.
— Dr. Matthew, 143.

Baird, the Very Rev. Principal, 607.

Ballantyne, James, his first acquaintance with Scott at Kelso, 88. Printer of the "Apology for Tales of Ter-

- lines to, on "Rob Roy" 231 His dinners in St. John Street on the appearance of a new novel, 310 Reminiscence of the composition of the "Bride of Lamartine," 311 Interference with the Earl of Harrow, 341 His criticism of "St. Julian's Well," 429 and "The Betrothed," 440 Alarm of his stability 463 Sketch of his business habits, 476 Catastrophe of affairs 476. State of parties concerned 487 Death of his wife, 540 Allegation of Scott from him in part, 541 Unpleasant discussions with No. 41, 565 passage, 559, 571 His last meeting with Scott, 571 death, 623
- Hallantyne, Letters to 220, 221, 247, 257
191, 195, 196, 200, 221, 227, 247, 249, 263, 274, 287, 294, 415, 429, 476, 520, 529, 570
- Hallantyne, John, sketch of, 190, his partnership with Scott 197, published "The Lady of the Lake," 199, and other Works, 201 Embarrassment of affairs in 1813, 225, passage, 232 His position with Scott and Constable in 1816, 274 Knowledge of, at Abbotsford 290 His house in the Waterloo Square, 297 Negotiation with Constable for the second "Lays of my Landlord" 325 Falsifies his book stock on Constable 305 His domestic establishment, and dinners at "Harmony Hall," 313 Anecdote of him at Paris, 415 Amateurs to Scott 336 A Sunday day at Abbotsford, 351 His illness, 375 Walton Hall 376 His Novelists' Library, 377 His last will, and death in June, 1821, 390 Anecdote of him, 381 Retrospections of, 425, 428
Letters to, 220, 229, 231
199, 244, 273, 304, 336, 390, 392 on "Hallantyne's Novels" 415 many, 470 Scott's Contributions to, 377, 390, 399
- Bank of Scotland, the, in Scott's affairs, 184
- Banking System of Scotland and England, 465
- Bankrupt, actual and legal, 464
- Banktynne Club, Scott its founder and

- Harrow, Sir John, 337
- Bath, Scott's reminiscence of, 15
- Bathurst, Colonel, Secretary of the Board of Trade, 15 Board of Trade, 15
Beattie of Merchiston and Beattie of Fletcher, 1 Beauty, female, 535
- Beggan and Co. 374,
Belton, Major, Novels, 380
- Belcher, Miss Stuart, of Scott's first love, 19, William Forbes, 19
- Bell, John, Esq., surgeon, Member, 290, 307
- Ben Jonson, lines of, 362
- Bermak, Lord, at Naples
"Bismarck, the"
"The Crusaders"
- Bible, the family, at Abbotsford, 28, 347 presented to Scott by 347
- Biggan, town of, 374
- "Black Art," story of the
"Black Art," story of the
"Black Art," story of the alteration of, 376, published, 377, passage, opinions of Blackhouse farm of, 365
Scott's visit to, 137
- Blacklock, Rev. Dr., 34
- Blackwood, William, 1
"Lays of my Landlord," 376 His criticism of Dunbar 376, 379, 394, the Blackwood's Magazine, 28 490
- Blair, Adam (pub. 375 N
Blair, Rev. Dr. Hugh, 20
- Blake, Right Hon. Arthur
Blarney, the grooves of, vi
Blucher, Field Marshal,
Scott with, 214
- Boarding school, 170
- Bohndie, festival at, 208
- Bolton, John, Esq., visit by Scott, Canning, etc 452
Mr. of Birmingham, 203, 204
- "Bonnie Dundee," song
"Bonnie Dundee," song
"Bonnie Dundee," song
2 vols. 416, 334

Bourmont, Marshall, 553.
 Bower, John, Melrose, 289, 290.
 Boyle, Right Hon. David, 38.
 Bracciano, Castle of, 595.
 Braxfield, Lord, 357.
 Breakfasting, Scott's mode of, 307.
 Brewster, Sir David, 378.
 — Mrs. Dr., 562.
 "BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR, THE," 335, 347; composed under severe illness, 336, 342; publication of, in 1818, 342, 345.
 "BRIDAL OF TRIERMALN, THE," Erskine's alleged paternity of, 217, 223; publication of, 223.
 Brougham, Henry, now Lord, 163.
 "Broughton's Saucer," anecdote of, 40 n.
 Bruce, John, Professor of Ethics, 29.
 — John. See "John of Skye."
 — Robert, Esq., Sheriff of Argyle, 258, 262.
 Bruhl, Count, 70.
 Buccleuch, Henry, third Duke of, 82, 90, 172.
 — Charles, fourth Duke of, his loan of £4000 to Scott, 230; letter from, on the death of the Duchess, 241; death of, 341.
 — 221, 229, 230, 231, 267, 282, 295.
 — Harriet, Duchess of, her death, 241.
 — Walter, fifth Duke of, 403, 460, 584.
 Buchan, David, Earl of, absurd conduct of, during Scott's illness, 343; anecdote of, with the Duchess of Gordon, 84.
 — Dr. James, 19.
 Buchanan, H. Macdonald, Esq., of Drummalkin, visited by Scott, 191; generous conduct of, in Scott's affairs, 525.
 — 148, 188, 500.
 — Miss Macdonald, 306.
 — Mr., of Cambusmore, 60.
 Bullock, Mr. George, 631.
 "BUONAPARTE, LIFE OF," 9 vols. projected, 440, 442; progress of, 454; letter on the composition of, 509; publication of, in June, 1827. Goethe's remarks on, 512.
 "Bürger's Lenore," translation of, by Taylor, 67, and by Scott, 67.
 "Burning the Water," for salmon, 135, 369.
 Burns, Robert, Scott's reminiscences of, 31. Lines of, parodied, 568.
 — 201, 436.
 — Captain James Glencairn, visits Abbotsford, 582.

Business habits of Scott, remarks on the, 613.
 Byron, Lord, his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," 191. "Child Harold," 211, 223, 281. Correspondence with Scott on "Marmion," 212-214; invitation to Abbotsford, 213 the "Giaour," 249. Meeting with Scott, 252, and exchange of presents 253. His last meeting with Scott 262. Remarks on his countenance 298. His "Cain," dedicated to Scott 395, 476. His Ravenna Diary, 464. His Poetry, 310, 592.
 — 420, 455, 456, 487.
 — Lady, 298.

C.

CADELL, ROBERT, partner of Constable & Co., 146 n. Recollections of the success of "The Lady of the Lake," 199. His purchase of the copyright of "Halidon Hill," 396. Scott's estimate of him, 475, 493. Communicates catastrophe of the affairs of Scott, Constable & Co., and the Ballantynes, 480. Becomes in 1826 sole publisher of Scott's Works, 493; and partner with Scott in the re-purchase of the Waverley copyrights, 528. Unpleasant discussions with Scott, 555. passim, 561. His politics, 557. Scott's residence with, in Athol Crescent, 562, 563. Visit to Abbotsford in 1831, 581. Arrival in London on Scott's last illness, 597. Accompanies him to Edinburgh and Abbotsford, 600. Advances of money in payment of Scott's debts, 626, 627.
 — Letters to, 392, 545, 572.
 — Extracts from his memoranda regarding Scott's industry, and John Ballantyne, 393 n.
 — 376, 475, 480, 526, 551, 570, 631 632.
 — Mrs. R., 562.
 — Miss, Scott's present to, 593.
 "CADYOW CASTLE," ballad of, 97. Cambridge, 360.
 Campbell, Lady Charlotte, 82, 97.
 — Mr. Alexander, 37.
 — Sir Colin, 587.
 — Sir Islay, 156.
 — Thomas, Esq., his "Gertrude," 291. His timidity in poetry, 291.
 — 97, 182, 201, 288.
 Canning, Right Hon. George, meets Scott, Wordsworth, etc., at Storrs 452. His death, 516; and character ib.

182. Temporary alienation of Scott from, 180, 186. Bequest of Miss Seward's MS. Letters to, 197. Gradual reconciliation with Scott, 198, 226, 235. Relief of Ballantyne & Co., 226. Offer for the copyright of "Waverley," 237. His position with Scott in 1816, 271. Visits Abbotsford, and suggests the title of "Rob Roy," 286. Negotiations for the second "Tales of my Landlord," 291. Relieves Ballantyne of stock, 295. His social intercourse with the Ballantynes - anecdotes and nicknames, 314. Purchase of Scott's copyrights in 1818 for L.12,000, 334. A Sunday at Abbotsford, 351. His titles of "The Abbot" and "Kenilworth," 375, 376. Views regarding "The Novelists' Library," 389. Second purchase of copyrights for 5000 guineas, 393; and of four unnamed works of fiction, 394, 418. Letter to Scott on the publication of "Nigel," 297. His ambition of success, 398. Estate of Balnoll, 398. Third purchase of copyrights for 5000 guineas, 417. Gift to Scott, and receipt of the "Waverley MSS.," 434. Visit to Abbotsford, and projection of his "Miscellany," 438, 441. Rumours of the instability of his firm, 402. His connexion with the Ballantynes, 467, passim, 470. Scott's advance to him of L.10,000, 473. Scheme of republishing the Waverley Novels, 477. Interview with Mr. Lockhart in London, 477, 478. Catastrophe of affairs, 480. State of parties concerned, 482. Change of Scott's views regarding him, 493, 494. His death and character, 515.
- Constable, Letters to, 413, 477.
 — 102, 115 n., 171, 230, 242, 247, 348, 390, 415, 420.
 — George, the prototype of Jonathan Oldbuck, 17 n., 272.
- Conversation of Scott, 301, 302, 303, 421, 422.
 — of Edinburgh Society, 301.
 — Lines on, 301.
- Corby Castle, 263.
- Cork, the City of, visited, 452.
- Corri, M. Nattall, 539.
- "COÛRTE ROBERT DE PARIS," 552, 553, Covenanters, the, 157.
- Crabbe, Rev. George, 207. Scott's correspondence with, 214. Scott's guest during the visit of George IV. to Edinburgh, 400, 401, passim; extract from his journal, 402. Poetry of, read to Scott in his last illness, 602. Death of, 622.
- Craig, Sir James Gibson, Bart., 559.
- Craighall, seat of the Rattrays, 61.
- Craignethan Castle, 87.
- Crampton, General Sir Philip, 445.
- Craunston, George, Esq. (Lord Corehouse), 425.
 — Miss, 67.
- Craven, Hon. Keppel, 590.
- Creditors, Scott's, noble exertions of energy on behalf of, 615.
- Croker, Right Hon. John Wilson, replies to the "Letters of Malachi," 486. His Tales of English History, 510. Letter to, with "Tales of a Grandfather," ib. Speech on the Reform Bill, 586.
 — 190, 251, 255, 327 n.
- Cross, the, of Edinburgh, 350.
- Cumberland, Duke of (1746), 398.
 — Prince George of, 536.
- Cunning, Lady, 37 n.
- Cunningham, Allan, Esq., his reminiscences of Scott in London in 1820, 358, and in 1821, 383. Patronage of his two sons through Scott's influence, 537. Monument to Scott at Dryburgh, 628.
 — 533, 598.
- Curle, Mr., at Yethyrs, 13.
- Curran, John Phillipot, Esq., 145 n.
- Cuvier, Baron, 622.
- D.
- "DAFT DAYS" at Abbotsford, 372.
- Daisy, Scott's charger, anecdote of, 265.
- Dalgleish, the butler at Abbotsford, 522.
- Dalhousie, Earl of (1832), 628.
- Dalkeith, Earl of, afterwards Charles Duke of Buccleuch, 90, 142, 171, 205.
 — Harriot, Countess of, 102, 121.
 — Palace, residence of King George IV. in, 403.
- Dalzell, Mr. Andrew, Professor of Greek in Edinburgh College, 27.

Davy, Dr. John, Malta, 588-590.
 — Mrs., 589, 590.
 — Lady H., 202.
 — Sir Humphry, ascends Helvellyn with Scott and Wordsworth, 139.
 Visits Abbotsford, 364, passim.
 Dawson, Captain, 589.
 Dead, remembrance of the, 497.
 Debating Societies, 39.
 Debts of Scott, his delusion regarding,
 592, 593.
 Defoe, Daniel, 169 n.
 D'Haussez, Baron, his account of Abbotsford, 553.
 "DEMONOLOGY AND WITCHCRAFT, LETTERS ON," publication of, in 1830, 548.
 "Den" of Scott in Castle Street described, 208, 209.
 Devonshire, Duke of, his Irish domain, 449.
 Dial-stone, inscription, 578 n.
 "Dialogues on Superstition," proposed publication of, 418.
 DIARY OF SCOTT, hint of, from Lord Byron's, 464. Extracts from, on his commercial misfortunes, 472, passim, and domestic afflictions, 488, passim, 499. Miscellaneous, 500.
 Diaries, Scott's remarks on, 613.
 Dibdin, Rev. Dr., letter from, 414.
 Letter to, ib.
 Dickson, Rev. Dr. David, 607.
 Dining, Scott's mode of, 307, 308.
 His Sunday dinners, 309, 370.
 Distance, effects of, 493.
 Domestic servants, Scott's treatment
 of, 354.
 "DON RODERICK, THE VISION OF,"
 published in July, 1811, 205.
 Don, Sir Alexander, of Newton, 307, 322.
 "DOOM OF DEVORGOIL, THE," published in 1830, 284.
 "Douce Davie," 514.
 Douglas, Archibald Lord, 87.
 — David, Lord Reston, 20.
 — old church of, 575. Vaults of, 576. Village of, ib.
 — the Lords of, ib.
 — "the good Lord James," 576.
 — Castle, 576.
 — Rev. Dr. Galashiels, 209, 259.
 — Mrs., hotel, 600.
 — Sir John, of Kelhead, 40 n.
 Doune Castle, 60.
 Downshire, the Marquis of, 76.
 Drochel Castle, 574.
 Drogheda, town of, 444.
 Drumlanrig Castle, 229.
 Drummond, Henry Home, Esq., 297.

Dryburgh Abbey, 3 607.
 — Monument of S
 "DRYDEN'S, JOHN, L
 projected edition 131; publication o
 — John, 201. Iris
 epigram, 449.
 Dublin visited by Sc Dudley, Earl of, and Duff, Adam, Esq., 2
 Dumergue, M. C., 10
 Duncan, Hon. Henry
 — Rev. Dr., Merto
 — Colonel William
 Dundas, Right Hon.
 91.
 — Robert, Esq., of
 — Sir Robert, of H
 148. Generous con affairs, 525.
 — Right Hon. Will Dundee, Viscount
 278 n., 280, 300.
 Dunottar Castle, 62.
 Durham, Bishop of entertains the Du and Scott in the C 521.
 E.
 EDGEWORTH, Miss,
 visits Abbotsford,
 Scott at Edgeworth
 — Miss Harriet, 44
 — Richard Lovell,
 Edgeworthstown, 44
 Edinburgh visited by in 1822, 398, 410.
 — "Annual Regist
 the, by Ballantyn 287, 298.
 Edinburgh Celtic Soc
 — Cross of, 350.
 — Review, the, Sco
 to, 108, 131, 162, 18
 — Royal Society, 3
 — Theatre, riot in the Play of Rob R
 by King George IV
 Egerton, Lord Franc
 Edmonstoune, John
 Newton, 38, 60.
 Education of childr
 heart, 447.
 Eildon Hills, 600.
 Eldon, Lord, 395.
 Elibank, Lord, aneed
 Elland Water, 425.
 Ellenborough, Lord,

Ellesmere, Earl of, 627.
 Elliot, Capt. Russell, R. N., 571.
 — Cornelius, of Wollee, 12 n.
 — Dr. Cleughhead, 53, 55.
 — of Borthwick-brace, 578.
 — W., at Milburnholm, an alleged original of Dandie Dinmont, 52.
 Ellis, George, Esq., Letters to, 114, 115, 120, 131, 184, 185; Letter to, on Marmion, 157.
 96, passim, 172, 190, 192, 199, 257.
 "Encycl. Britannica," Scott's contributions to, 419, 505.
 Energy, Scott's noble exertions of, 615.
 Erskine, William, Lord Kinnedder, his alleged paternity of the "Bridal of Triormain," 218, 221. Quarterly Review of "Old Mortality," 278, 278 n. Visit to Abbotsford, 386. Sketch of, 387. Promoted to the Bench, 389. Illness and death, 408.
 — 57, 58, 81, 121, 133, 237, 240, 241.
 Esk River, lines on the scenery of, 80.
 "ESSAY ON CHIVALRY," by Scott, 418, 505.
 — THE DRAMA," 418.
 — ROMANCE," ib.
 — THE PLANTING OF WASTE LANDS," 515.
 — LANDSCAPE GARDENING," 426, 527.
 "EYE OF ST. JOHN," the ballad of, 86.
 Euthanasia, 585, 601.
 Exchequer Bench, Scott's view towards the, 282.

F.

"FAIR MAID OF PERTH, THE," 527. publication of, in April, 1828, 534.
 Family Bible of Scott, extracts from. See Bible.
 "Family Legend, The," Miss Baillie's play of, 195.
 "Faust," poem of, by Goethe, 325.
 Fees, record of, 112.
 Female beauty, 538.
 Fergusson, Dr. Adam, 45, 75, 118, 288.
 — Sir Adam, letters to Scott from Lisbon, 206, 207. Becomes resident at Huntley Burn, 288. At Abbotsford, 321. At Lisbon, 341. Letter to, ib. Visits Blair-Adam with Scott, 375. His marriage, 379. Receives the honour of knighthood, 409.
 — 38, 61, 75, 332, 369, passim, 430, 506, 631.
 — Captain John, 75, 322, 325, 331.
 — Misses, Huntley Burn, 352. Sketch of, 380, 554.

Ferrier, Miss, invited to Abbotsford during Scott's illness, 569.
 Festivals, annual, 503.
 "FIELD OF WATERLOO, THE," a poem, publication of, 266.
 Fielding, 582.
 Fife, Earl of, 507.
 — woman, misfortunes of a, 450.
 "FIRE KING, THE," ballad of, 87.
 First love, 222.
 Fish-women, 509.
 Flodden Field, 219.
 Florence, M., the Duke of Buccleuch's cook, 323.
 Foley, Admiral Sir Thomas, 587.
 Forbes, Sir William, of Pitsligo, Bart., 49. Generous conduct of, in Scott's affairs, 481, 525. Death of, 539.
 — George, Esq., 558.
 Forebodings, melancholy, of Scott on impending ruin, 472, passim.
 "Foreign Quarterly Review," Scott's contributions to, 505, 530.
 Fortitude of Scott, remarks on the, 616.
 Fortune, Mr., his mechanism, 563.
 "FORTUNES OF NIGEL, THE," 3 vols., 392; publication of, in 1822, 396.
 Fox, Right Hon. C. J., 125, 141, 143, 145 n., 603.
 France and Britain contrasted, 565.
 Frankfort visited by Scott, 596.
 Fraser, Mr. Luke, High School, Edinburgh, 18.
 Freeling, Sir Thomas, 327.
 French invasion, alarm of, 140.
 — Rev. James, 19.
 — snuff-box, 265.
 Frenchman, "a funny," 413.
 Frere, Right Hon. John Hookham, 589.
 "Friday Club," the, 193.
 Friendship of Scott, remarks on the, 618.
 Fuller, Jack, 359.
 Funerals, Scott's dislike of, 493.
 Futurity, speculations on, 496, 497.

G.

GAS LIGHT AT ABBOTSFORD, 417.
 Gattonside, 379.
 Geddes, Mr. A., his portrait of Scott, 630.
 Gell, Sir William, his memoranda of Scott at Naples, 591; at Rome, 594.
 Genius, distinction of, in youth and in age, 542; of Scott, estimate of the, 620.
 George III., King, 200.

- George IV. Introduction of Lord Byron to, 212. His opinion of Scott's poetry, ib.; entertains Scott at Carlton House, 254; confers a baronetcy on Scott, 333. Proclamation at Edinburgh of his accession, 350. Coronation of, 381. Visit to Edinburgh, 1822, 398, 409. Gift to Scott of "Montfauçon's Antiquities," 434. Commands Scott to Windsor, 500. Scott's estimate of, 501. Death of, 549.
- "GERMAN BALLADS," translated and published by Scott, 67, 70, 82.
- Gibson, John, Esq., W.S., 481, 482, 524.
- Gifford, Lord and Lady, 455, 584.
— William, Esq., 186, 395.
- Gilbert, Mr. Graham, his portrait of Scott, 631.
- Gillies, Mr. R. P., 100, 505, 530.
- Gilsland, Visit of Scott to, 139.
- Glamis Castle visited, 62.
- Glasgow bailie, anecdote of a, 443.
— Statue of Scott in, 628.
- "GLENFINLAS," ballad of, 86, 97.
- Glengarry, M'Donnell of, 403.
- Goderich, Lord, 521.
- Godscroft's "History of the House of Douglas," 609.
- Goethe, his tragedy of "Goetz" translated and published by Scott, 82. His poem of "Faust," 325. View of Scott's "Life of Buonaparte," 512. Death of, 622.
— 297, 593, 595.
- "GOETZ VON BERLICHINGEN," translated and published by Scott, 82.
- Goldsmith, Oliver, 446, 466.
- Goodfellow, William, a tailor, 433. Death of, 433.
- Gordon, Mr. George Huntly, account of him as amanuensis to Scott, 530; publishes "Two Sermons," the gift of Scott, for L.250, 532, 533.
— Duke of, 531.
— Duchess of, 344.
— John Watson, Esq., his portrait of Scott, 681.
— Major Pryse, Scott's cicerone at Waterloo, 530.
- Gourgaud, General, his conduct regarding Buonaparte, 519. Anticipated challenge from, 519, 520; and results, 520.
- Gower, Lord and Lady Francis, 535.
- Graham of Claverhouse. See Viscount Dundee.
— Sir James, 579, 587.
— Island, Letter from Scott on, 588.
— Lord William, 572.
- Grant, Francis, R.A., his portrait of Scott, 631.
- Grant, Mrs., of Laggan, 160.
- Greenshields, Mr. John, his statue of Sir Walter, 540, 577, 632.
- "GREY BROTHER," the ballad of, 86.
— Mare's Tail, 137.
- Grierson, Mr. Thomas, 32 n.
- Grieve, Mr. John, 269.
- Griffith, Mr. Ealing, 554 n.
- Gustavus, Prince of Sweden, visits Scott in Castle Street, 350; and at Abbotsford, ib.
- "GUY MANNERING," 3 vols., 247; publication of, 247, 251; dramatised by Terry, 271.

H.

- HADDOW, Mr. Douglas, 575.
- Halford, Sir Henry, 584, 597.
- "HALIBURTONS, MEMORIALS OF THE," 5, 609.
- "HALIDON HILL," a drama, publication of, in 1822, 396, 420.
- Hall, Capt. Basil, R.N., visits Abbotsford, 435; extracts from his diary, ib., 437. Successful application at the Admiralty on behalf of Scott, 579; at Portsmouth with Scott, 587.
— Sir James, of Dunglass, 377.
- Hallam, Henry, Esq., 164; visits Abbotsford, 545.
- Hamilton, Lord Archibald, 169.
— Lady Anne, 97.
— Duke of, 97.
— Palace, 97.
— Robert, Esq., 240.
- Hardyknute, ballad of, 13.
- "HAROLD THE DAUNTLESS," 274; publication of, 280.
- "Harvest Home" at Abbotsford, 371.
- Hawick, town of, 572.
— weavers, 570, 571.
- Hay, Mr. D. R., painter, 433.
- Haydon, B. R., Esq., sketch of, 535. Portrait of Scott, ib. Death of, 536 n.
- Hayman, Mrs., Blackheath, 144, 152.
- "HEART OF MIDLOTHIAN, THE," publication of, in 1818, 316.
- Heath, Mr. Charles, engraver, his literary offers to Scott, 533.
- Heber, Reginald, Bishop of Calcutta, 104.
— Richard, Esq., 91, 104; meets Scott in London, 358.
- Helvellyn, ascent of, 139.
- Hermitage Castle, 51, 98, 584.
- Hertford, Marquis of, 590.
- Highland clans, muster of, in 1822, 399, 403, 406.
— Garb assumed by King George IV., 405; and Sir William Curtis, ib.

- Highlands of Scotland, Scott's excursion to, 34 n., 60.
- "HIGHLAND WIDOW, THE," tale of, published in November, 1827, 523.
- "HISTORY OF SCOTLAND" for Lardner's Cyclopædia, publication of vol. i., in 1829, and vol. ii., in 1830, 548.
- Hogg, James, the Ettrick Shepherd, at dinner with Scott, 112. Sketch of, 171. Song on the banner of Buccleuch, 268. Anecdote of, at Bowhill, 268. Quarrel with Scott, ib., and letter to, 269. His marriage, 381; invited to witness the coronation of King George IV., and declines, ib., 383; president of the St. Ronan's games, 430. Accommodation of money by Scott, 593; visits London, ib.
- 95, 115 n., 117, 133, 211, 370. Death of, 622.
- Mr. Robert, letter from, on Scott's composition of "The Life of Buonaparte," 510.
- Hogarth, George, Esq., W.S., 310.
- Hogmanay at Abbotsford, 372.
- Holland, Dr. Henry, 585, 597.
- Lord, 193, 194.
- Holyrood Palace, King George IV. in, 399, 404.
- Home, George, Esq., of Wedderburn, resigns his clerkship of Session in favour of Scott, 141.
- John, author of "Douglas," 15, 45, 60. Reviewal of his life and works, 505.
- Lord, 267.
- Homer, busts of, 298.
- Hope, James Robert, Esq., married to Miss Lockhart, 625.
- James, Esq., 20.
- Sir John, of Pinkie, 507.
- Horner, Francis, Esq., 163.
- Horsemanship, 179.
- Horton, Right Hon. Sir Robert Wilmot, 500.
- "HOUSE OF ASPEN, THE," translated by Scott in 1799, and published in 1829, 84, 533.
- Howgate Inn, 35.
- Howley, Dr., Archbishop of Canterbury, 190.
- Human life, a dream, 504.
- frail tenure of, 504.
- Hume, David, the historian, "Poetical Works" of, 263.
- David, Esq., Professor of Scots Law, afterwards Baron of Exchequer, 41, 66, 148, 238.
- Joseph, Esq., advocate, 306.
- Hunter, Alex. Gibson, Esq., of Blackness, 180, 186, 226.
- Huntley Burn becomes the residence of the Fergussons, 288.
- 352, 490, 554.
- Hurst, Robinson & Co., London, 462, 470, 472, 478, 479.
- Huxley, Lieut.-Col., 9 n.
- Hymns, Roman Catholic, 604.

I.

- IDEAS, YOUNG, 447.
- Illustrious men, the children of, 625.
- Imagination, the, of Scott, 610.
- victims of, 504.
- Imitations of Scott, literary, 620, 621.
- Influence and zeal of Scott in society, 416.
- Inglis, Sir Robert, 584.
- Innerleithen, 429.
- Invasion, French, alarm of, 140.
- Ireland, visited by Scott, 444, passim; aspect of the south of, 448, 449.
- Irish whisky, "Kings and Queens," 451.
- widow, a card from one, 450.
- Irongray Churchyard, monument to Helen Walker, 586.
- Irving, Alex., Lord Newton, 41.
- John, Esq., 30, 35.
- Washington, Esq., visits Abbotsford, 265, 288. Extracts from his journal, 289.
- "IVANHOE," 3 vols., 336, 346. Publication of, in December, 1819, 347.

J.

- JACOBITISM of Scott, 611.
- James, G. P. R., Esq., 580.
- James VI., King, 308.
- Jamieson, Captain John, of the "James Watt," 600.
- Mr. Robert, his collection of popular ballads, 133.
- Jedburgh, town of, 572; assizes at, 63. Speech of Scott against reform at, 564, 565; and at the Roxburghshire election, 570. Scott insulted at, 565, 570, 604.
- "Jeddart fee," 63.
- Jeffrey, Francis, now Lord, his first acquaintance with Scott, 39 n., 108. His reviewal of the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," 124; "Marmion," 159, 161. Sketch of him, 162, 163. Reviewal of "Scott's Life of Swift," 236; and of "Waverley," 244.

Jeffrey, 136, 146, 163, 184, 199, 221, 228, 415, See 426
 Jews, state of in Germany, 346
 Jon Bush of, 426
 Johnson, Miss of Leith, visits Abbotstford, 411 married to Scott's eldest son, 439
John of St. Paul, the paper, 376, 379
 Johnson, Dr. Samuel, his "Vanity of Human Wishes," 291 Penance of, 294
 180, 275 n
 Jolie, James, Esq. M. P. 181
 Joseph, Mr., his bust of Scott, 611
 Journalising remarks on, 281
 "Judging our Neighbour," 600

K

Kennin's "CHRISTIAN YOUTH," lines from, 126
 "Keepsake, The," editorship of, offered to Scott, 333 His contributions to it Keith, Mrs. Murray, portrayed in "Chronicles of the Causegate," 324
 Mrs. of Ravenna, anecdote of,
 330
 William, Esq., 607
 Kelsy, Scott's schoolboy days at, 23
 376 Kemble, John Philip, Esq., Scott's intimacy with, 184, 186 His retirement from the Edinburgh stage, 351, 313
 "Kernanoman," 4 vols., 276, publication of, in 1820, 376
 Kerr, Charles, Esq., of Abbotrule, 88 Kent, Duchess of, commands Scott to dine with her, 284
 Kinross, Lord, See William Erskine
 "Kirk" at Abbotstford, 371
 Knight, Mr., his portrait of Scott, 620
 Kitchin, Sir William, 549
 Kyle, Dr., Bishop of Cork, 414

L

"LADY OF THE LAKE," THE, 191,
 publication of, in May, 1810, 190,
 "Lady of the Lake" compared with "The Lay" and "Marmion," 190
 Laidlaw, Mr. William, 51, 95, passim

521, 531 and restored, 550 His interviews with Scott in last illness, 621, passim Death of, 622
 Laidlaw, 546, 567, 551, 557
 (and Nipper), 115, 171
 Laidlaw, the superstitious story regarding, 116, 177
 Laing, Mr. David, 115,
 Malcolm, Esq., 661
 "Laird's Journal, The," tale of, 527
 Lamb, resident, 373, 446
 Lamb, Walter Savage, Esq., 145 n, 351
 "LAWRENCE GARDENING," ESSAY
 ON, 136
 Lambton, Edwin, R. A., his portrait of Scott, 611
 Larnside Cottage, Scott's residence at, 26, passim, 100 Morritt's remittiscences of Scott at, 173
 Lauderdale, Earl of, 183
 Laughter, of Scott, 121
 Laval Montgomery, Duke of, 231
 Lawrence, Sir Thomas, his portrait of Scott, 526, 620
 "LAW OF THE LAST MEMENTO," 102, 190 Publication of, in 1805, 121
 123, 161, contrasted with "Marmion" and the "Lady of the Lake," 231
 "LAWRENCE MEMENTO," 106. Publication of, in 1818, 342, 345
 Leitch, Prince, 526
 Leslie, C. R., R. A., his portrait of Scott, 620
 "LETTERS OF MALACHI MALACHOW-ITZ," origin of their composition, and publication of, in March, 1820, 196, 197, 618 Fourth Letter of, written and suppressed, 558, 561
 "LETTERS OF DEMONIOLOGY AND WIZARDRY," publication of, in 1820, 548
 Lewis, M. G., author of "The Monk," 81 His "Tales of Wonder," ib.
 85, 90, 603, 306
 Leyden, Dr. John, 91, passim, 103,
 Letter from, 181
 Liddell, the Hon. Henry, letter from, 522
 Dr., 568, 569
 Liddesdale, Scott's first excursion to, 51
 Lido See Human Lilloleaf, anecdote of a minister of

- Loch Katrine, 199.
 of the Lowes, 138.
 St. Mary's, 138.
 Skene, 137.
 Vennachar, 60.
- Lochleven Castle, 374.
- Lockhart, John Gibson, Esq., his first meeting with Scott, in 1818, 297. First Visit to Abbotsford, 1818, 320. Visit during Scott's illness, 336. Sunday at Abbotsford, 350. Marriage with Miss Scott, 359. Autumn at Abbotsford, 360. Visit to Walton Hall, 376. Residence at Chiefswood Cottage, 385. Excursion with Scott to Clydesdale, 426; and to Ireland, 443. Communications with Scott on the commercial alarms of 1825, 462. Removal to London, 473. Interview with Constable there, 477. Residence at Portobello, and visits of Scott, 514. Scott's residence with, in London, 1828, 535. Remonstrance with Scott in illness, 558. Visits Abbotsford during Scott's illness, 1831, 568. Excursion with Scott to Douglasdale, 573. Accompanies him on his departure from Abbotsford, 1831, 583; and in last illness, from London to Abbotsford, 600, passim.
 572, 600, 606.
 Mrs., her marriage, 359. Autumn at Abbotsford, 360. Residence at Chiefswood Cottage, 385; at Portobello, 514. Return to Chiefswood, 568; to Abbotsford during Scott's illness, 1831, 568. Accompanies him to Portsmouth, 587. Attends on him in his last illness, 600, 603, passim. Her death, 623.
 424, 489, 537, 562, 564, 597, 600.
 John Hugh (the Hugh Littlejohn of the "Tales of a Grandfather,") 510, 514. Illness of, 488, 489; and death, 593, 623.
 Walter Scott, grandson of Scott, 497.
 Miss Charlotte Harriet Jane, grand-daughter of Scott, now Mrs. Hope, 625.
 Miss Violet, 548.
 William, Esq., of Milton-Lockhart, Scott's visit to, 577.
 William Elliott, Esq., of Borthwickbrae, 564.
- "LORD OF THE ISLES, THE," 228, 232, 240, 246, 247, passim. Publication of, 242.
- Lothian, Marquis of, 598.
- Love, a first, often repulsed, 69.
- Lushington, Hon. S. R. 531.
- Lysons, Professor, 414.

M.

- M'GRIE, Rev. Dr., his defence of the Covenanters, 278.
- M'ulloch, Miss Elizabeth, afterwards Mrs. Thomas Scott, 9 n.
- M'Diarmid, Mr. and Mrs., Dumfries, 582.
- Macdonald, Andrew, author of "Vionda," 58.
 — Mr. Lawrence, his bust of Scott, 632.
 — Marshal, 500.
- Macdougall, Sir George, 12.
 — Sir Henry Hay, of Makerstone, 12, 322.
 — Isobel, 12 n.
 — Ronald, Esq., of Staffa, 202.
- "MACDUFF'S CROSS," a dramatic sketch, 375, 420.
- Macfuit, Dr., 29.
- Mackay, Mr. Charles, his admirable personification of Baillie Jarvie, 335, 509.
 — Rev. Dr., visits Abbotsford, 569.
- Mackenzie, Colin, Esq., of Portmore, 149; generous conduct in Scott's affairs, 525.
 — Henry, Esq., 80, 364, passim.
- Mackintosh, Sir James, 103; meeting with Scott, 586; death of, 622.
- M'Nab, the Laird of, 506.
- M'Naught, minister of Girthon, case of, 58.
- M'Neill, Sir John, 623, 624.
- Macelesfield, 501.
- Magee, Dr., Archbishop of Dublin, 441.
- Maida* in Scott's den, 299.
- Maitland Club, 415.
- Malachi Malagrowth. See Letters of.
- Malahide Castle, 444.
- Malcolm, Sir John, presents Scott to the Duke of Wellington, 260, 626.
- Ma ta. Scott's arrival at, 589.

- Nicol, Rev. Principal, St. Andrews, 298.
 — W., of the High School, Edinburgh, 22.
 Nicholson, Miss Jane, 76.
 — Dr. Dean of Exeter, ib.
 William, Bishop of Exeter, 77.
 Nicolson, John, Abbotsford, 554, 563, 597.
 Nineguen, Scott's fatal attack at, 597.
 "Noble Morninger, The," ballad of, composed under severe illness, 337.
 Northampton, Marchioness of, at Abbotsford with Mrs. Coult, 458.
 Northern Lighthouses, Commissioners of, 240.
- O.
- OIL GAS COMPANY, the, Scott president of, 417.
 O'Kelly, an Irish rhymmer, 449.
 "OLD MORTALITY," publication of, 276. Review of, 278, 278 n. Opinions of, 279. Suggestions of Mr. Train regarding, 280.
 "OPUS MAGNUM," 581, passim.
 Orange, the Prince of (1815), 261.
 Orkney and Shetland, Scott's voyage to, 240.
 Orleans, Duke of (1815), 261.
 Ormiston, "Auld Sandle," 11 n.
 — Captain, 370.
 Ossian, 25.
 Oxford, 360.
- P.
- PAINTING, Scott's incapacity for, 36.
 PARIS, success of "Quentin Durward" in, 418.
 Park, Mungo, anecdotes of, 117, 118.
 — Mr. Archibald, 118.
 Parliamentary Reform Bill, the, 556. Scott's opposition to, 560, 564. Riots in London, 584. Duties of Sheriffs, 605.
 Paterson, Peter, "the living Old Mortality," 62.
 "PAUL'S LETTERS TO HIS KINSMEN," 259. Publication of, 270.
 Peel, Right Hon. Sir Robert, accompanies King George IV. to Edinburgh, 404. His letters to Scott, 400, 441.
 96. His "Reliques of Ancient Poetry," 26, 106.
 Percy Anecdotes, misstatement in, 20 n.
 "PEVERIL OF THE PEAK," 4 vols., 397. Publication of, in 1823, 411.
 "Peveril," anecdote of, "Peter o' the pinch," 412.
 Philiphaugh, battle-field of, visited, 338, 404.
 Phillips, Thomas, R.A., his portrait of Scott, 629.
 Philpotts, Dr., Bishop of Exeter, 455, 626. Letter from, 521.
 "Phoebe Dawson," Crabbe's poem of, 602.
 "Pleuroon," 229.
 Pig at Abbotsford, 365.
 Pigot, Sir Hugh, commander of the Barham frigate, 586-588.
 Pindar, Peter, lines of, 197.
 "PIRATE, THE," 3 vols., 240, 386, 387, 392. Publication of, in 1821, 391.
 Pitcairn's, Robert, Esq., "Ancient Criminal Trials," 415, 547.
 Pitt, Right Hon. William, 125, 140, 232.
 Platoff, the Hetman, meeting of Scott with, 260 n.
 Plummer, Andrew, of Middlestead, 90.
 "POACHER, THE," an imitation of Crabbe, 207.
 Post-Laureate, office of, offered to Scott, and declined, 231.
 Poetry, Scott's estimate of his own, 200, 201.
 Poets, contrast of, with Scott, 407.
 Poole, Mr. J. F., his offer of money to Scott, 481.
 Polier, Baron, 350.
 Political creed of Scott, remarks on the, 618.
 Pompeii, Scott's visit to, 591.
 Poor, treatment of the, 435, 436.
 Pope, 235, 259, 447, 459.
 Popish Plot, the, 411.
 Portsmouth, Scott's residence at, 587.
 Pragmatic Sanction, the, 17 n.
 Prestonpans, Scott's residence at, in 1779, 16. Revisited, 34.
 Pringle, A., of Whytbank, 258, 262.
 — James, Esq., of Torwoodlee, 140. Visit to, 332.
 Prior, lines of, 574, 575.
 "Private Letters" of the 17th century, projected publication of, 391.
 Prynne, Counsellor, mark of offered to Purdie, Thomas, promoted into the service of Scott, 117. Description of, 351, 352. Anecdotes of, 296, 322, 325, 352, 353, 354, 354 n., 432, 435, 49C. His death and epitaph, 545, 546.

Q.

QUAIGHS, HIGHLAND, 309, 370.
"Quarterly Review," the, projected, 184. Review of the Waverley Novels, by Mr. Senior, 395. Scott's contributions to, 505, 527, 539.
"QUEENHOO HALL," published by Scott, 169.
"QUENTIN DURWARD," 3 vols., 411, 413; publication of, in 1823, 417.

R.

RAEBURNS, family progenitors of the, 526.
— Sir Henry, 409. His portrait of Scott, 173, 409, 629, 630.
Ramsay, Rev. E. B., 497, 498.
— John, Esq., Ochtertyre, 61, 71, 272.
Rank, Scott's estimate of, 460.
Ravensworth, Lord and Lady, 521.
"REDGAUNTLET," 3 vols., publication of, in 1824, 431.
Reform Bill, see Parliamentary.
REGALIA OF SCOTLAND, the discovery of, 295.
Religion of Scott, remarks on the, 619.
"RELIGIOUS DISCOURSES BY A LAYMAN," singular account of the composition, 530, and publication, 532.
"Reliquiæ Troctosiensis," proposed publication of, 552.
Residence of landlords, 373.
Rhine, the river, 597.
Rhymer's Glen, 288, 421.
Rice, Spring, Esq., 536.
Richardson, John, Esq., London, anecdote of his angling, 354 n., 598.
— Samuel, 466.
Riddell House, 340.
Riddell, John, Esq., 329.
— Sir John, of Riddell, 338; family of, 340, 469.
Ritchie, Mr. Alex. Musselburgh, 628.
— David, original of "The Black Dwarf," 75.
Ritson, Mr. Joseph, 96, passim, 101.
Robertson, Peter Lord, anecdote of Peveril, 412, 430.
"ROB ROY," the title of, suggested by Constable, 286. Published in December, 1817, 293.
— the drama of, performed in the Edinburgh theatre, 335. Witnessed by King George IV., 406.

Rob Roy, Cave of, 60, 287.
Rogers, Samuel, Esq., 103, 352. Lines of, 537.
"Rokeby," 218, 220. Publication of, 221.
Rokeby Park, Scott's visit to, 191, 219.
Rome, Scott's residence at, 594.
Roman Catholic hymns, 604.
Rose, William Stewart, Esq., 103, 153, 172, 364.
Rosebank, seat of, bequeathed to Scott, 116.
Rosebery, Earl of, 628.
Ross, Dr. Adolphus, 558, 563, 604.
— Mrs., 604.
— Priory, 148.
Roundheads, the, 222.
Roxburgh, John Duke of, 99.
— Club, the, 414.
Royal Society of Edinburgh, Scott President of, 377, 416.
Russell, Lieut.-Gen. Sir James, 607.
— Lord John, 598.
Rutherford, Andrew, Esq., 506.
— Anne, married to Walter Scott, the father of the Poet, 7. See Mrs. Scott.
— Miss Christian, aunt of Sir Walter Scott, 45, 259. Death of, 346.
— Dr. Daniel, uncle of Sir Walter Scott, 7, 45. Death of, 346.
— Miss Janet, aunt of Sir Walter Scott, 7.
— Dr. John, grandfather of Sir Walter Scott, 7, 347.
— Robert, Esq., W.S., 607.
Ruthven, Lady, 631.

S.

SABBATH-DAY, Scott's observance of the, 178.
"SADDLER, SIR RALPH, STATE PAPERS," 3 vols., 4to, 168; publication of, 197.
St. Albans, the Duke of, visits Abbotsford with Mrs. Coutts, 457.
St. Anthony's Chapel, 403.
St. Kevin's Bed, excursion to, 445.
"ST. RONAN'S WRELL," 3 vols., 420; publication of, in 1823, 428.
St. Ronan's Border Games, 430.
Salmon Fishing, 354 n., 364. Festival of, 368. "Burning the Water," 135, 369.
Sandy-Knowe, Scott's residence at, 10, 11 n.
Saunders and Ottley, Messrs., 533.

Saxon, Mr., his portrait of Scott, 629.
SCOTT, SIR WALTER, Bart. of Abbotsford his AUTOBIOGRAPHY, 1-13.
His Ancestry, 1, 2. Parentage, 5, 6.

1771-1792. Born 15th August, 1771, 9. Anecdotes of his Infancy, 10, 11. Sent in his fourth year to Bath, 11. Returns to Sandy Knowe, 16. Residence at Prestonpans, ib.; at George Square, 17. Sent to the High School of Edinburgh, 18; to Kelso, 23. Removed to the College of Edinburgh, 27. Apprenticed to his father as Writer to the Signet, 1785, 29. Meets Robert Burns, 31 n. First excursion to the Highlands, 31 n. Literary Societies, 37. Early companions, 38. His law studies and call to the Bar, July, 1792, 40-43. Study of Languages, 45, 46.

1792-1797. First love, 47. His personal appearance, 48. Excursions to Northumberland, 50; to Liddesdale, 51; to the Highlands, 60. Jedburgh assizes, 63. Plan of the Volunteer Cavalry started, 61. Publishes Ballads after Bürger, 67, 69. Disappointed in love, 69. Organisation of the Volunteer Cavalry, 73.

1797-1803. — Tour to the English Lakes, 1797, 75. Meets Miss Carpenter at Gilsland, and married to, 78. Early married life (1797-1798) at Edinburgh, 79; and Lasswade Cottage, 80. Meets with Monk Lewis, 81. Publishes "Goetz of Berlichingen" in 1799, 83. Visits London, ib. Death of his father, 81. First publication of original "Ballads," 86. Origin of his connexion with the Ballantyne press, 89. Appointed Sheriff of Selkirkshire, 90. His "Border Minstrelsy," 94, 98, 104. "Sir Tristram," 98. Visits London, 102; and Oxford, 104. Publishes "Sir Tristram," 113.

1804-1806. — Contributions to the Edinburgh Review, 108, 131. Visited by Wordsworth, 109. Removal to Ashiestell, 116. Publication of "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," 121. Partnership with James Ballantyne, 126. His position in society at this period, 127. Literary projects, 129-131. Visits Wordsworth and the Lakes, 139; Gilsland, 139. Appointed Clerk of Session and visits London, 141-149.

1806-1809. Commencement of "Marmion," 150. Appointed Secretary to the Commission on Scotch Jurisprudence, 155. Publication of "Marmion," 155, passim, 163; of "The Life and Works of Dryden," 164; and various other Works, 168. Visit of Mr. Morritt, and his account of Scott's Domestic Life, 172, 173. Rupture with Constable & Co., 180, passim, 187. Organisation of the "Quarterly Review," 184. Partnership with John Ballantyne, 180, 187. 1809-1812. — Visit to London, 180. Theatrical Anecdotes, 194, 195. Publication of "The Lady of the Lake," 198. Excursion to the Hebrides, 202. Publication of "The Vision of Don Roderick," 205. Purchase of Abbotsford, 209-215. Correspondence with Lord Byron, 212. Departure from Ashiestell, 214.

1812-1814. — Visit to Rokeby Park, 219. Publication of "Rokeby," 220, and "The Bridal of Triermain," 223. Commercial difficulties, 225, 229, passim. Reconciliation with Constable, 198, 226, 235. New purchase of land, 228. Offered the Poet-Laureateship, 231. Affair with Henry Weber, 233. Publication of "Swift's Life and Works," 234. "Waverley," 237-243. Voyage to Orkney, Shetland, and the Hebrides, 240.

1815-1816. — Publication of "The Lord of the Isles," 246, and of "Guy Mannering," 247-251. Visit to London, 251. Meeting with Lord Byron, 252. Carlton-house dinner, 254. Excursion to Paris, 259. Publication of "The Field of Waterloo," 266; "Paul's Letters," 270; "The Antiquary," 271; "Harold the Dauntless," 280; and of the first "Tales of my Landlord," 277.

1817-1818. — Aspires to be a Baron of Exchequer, 282. First attack of cramp in the stomach, 283. Purchase of the lands of Toftfield, or Huntley Burn, 288. Visited by Washington Irving, 289. Publication of "Rob Roy," 293. His "Den" in Castle Street, 298. His position in society, 296, passim, 304. Publication of "The Heart of Midlothian," 316.

1818-1819. — Sketches of Abbotsford, 320, passim. Sale of Copyrights to Constable for £12,000, 334. Serious illness, 335, passim, 344. Publication of "The Bride of Lammermoor" and "Legend of Montrose," 342. Domestic afflictions, 346. Publication of "Ivanhoe," 347. Sunday at Abbotsford, 351.

1820. — Revisits London, 356; his Portrait by Lawrence, ib.; and Bust by Chantrey, 358, 383, 384. Baronetcy gazetted in March, 359. Autumn at Abbotsford. — Hospitalities and sports, 360, passim. Visited by Sir Humphry Davy and others, 364, passim. Publication of "The Abbot," 373. The Blair-Adam Club, 375. At Walton Hall, and contributes to John Ballantyne's "Novelist's Library," 376, 377. President of the Royal Society, 377. Publication of "Kenilworth," 378.

1821-1823. — Visits London at the Coronation of George IV., 381. Autumn at Abbotsford, 385. Visit of Mr. and Mrs. Lockhart, ib.; of Mr. Erskine, 386. His "Lives of the Novelists," 389. "Private Letters," 391. Second sale of copyrights, 393. Publication of "The Pirate," 394; "The Fortunes of Nigel," and "Halidon Hill," 396. Multiplied editions of his Works, 397. Exertions during the visit to Edinburgh of George IV., 398. Visit of the poet Crabbe, 400. First symptom of apoplexy, 411. Publication of "Peveril of the Peak," ib., and "Quentin Durward," 417. Third sale of copyrights, ib. Visit of Miss Edgeworth and Mr. Adolphus, 420, 421. Excursion to Clydesdale, 426. Publication of "St. Roman's Well," 427.

1824-1825. — Publication of "Redgauntlet," 431, and the second edition of "Swift," 432. Completion of Abbotsford arrangements, ib. passim. Visit of Captain Hall, 435. Marriage of his eldest son, and settlement of Abbotsford, 437, 438. Visit of Constable, and projection of "The Miscellany," 438. Publication of "Tales of the Crusaders," 441. Excursion to Ireland, 443. Visited by Thomas Moore at Abbotsford, 455; by Mrs. Coutts and the Duke of St. Albans, 457. Commercial alarms, 461. His Diary commenced, 464. Retrospect of his connexion with Constable and the Ballantynes, 467.

1825-1827. — Catastrophe of his affairs in the downfall of Hurst, Constable, and Ballantyne, 472, 481. L.10,000 borrowed on Abbotsford too late, 473. Extracts from his Diary on his commercial misfortunes, ib. passim, 427; and on his domestic afflictions, ib., passim, 502. Miscellaneous extracts, ib., passim. Executes a trust-deed, 481. State of parties in connexion, 482, 483. Publication of "Malachi's Letters," 486. Final departure from 39 Castle Street, 486, 487. Illness of Lady Scott, 488, passim. Publication of "Woodstock," 491. First avowal of authorship, 491. Death of Lady Scott, 495. Proposal to him of matrimony, 499. Journey to London and Paris, ib. Commanded by King George IV. to Windsor, 500. Return and removal to lodgings, 502. Public avowal of Authorship at the Theatrical Fund Dinner, 508. Publication of "The Life of Buonaparte," 511.

1827-1829. — Publication of "Miscellaneous Prose Works," in 6 vols. 8vo, 515. Autumn at Abbotsford, 514-523. Visit of Mr. Adolphus, 516. Controversy with General Gourgaud, 519. Excursion to Ravensworth, Durham, and meeting with the Duke of Wellington, 521. Publication of the first "Chronicles of the Canon-gate," 523-526. Affair of Abud & Co., 524. Residence at Shandwick Place, and painful scene there, 527. Publication of the first "Tales of a Grandfather," 528. Joint re-purchase, with Mr. Cadell, of the Waverley copyrights for L.8500, 529. Christmas at Abbotsford, ib.: Plan of the "Opus Magnum," 529. Writes "Two Religious Discourses," 532. Contributions to "The Keepsake," 533. Publication of "The Fair Maid of Perth," 534. Visits London, 535. Returns by Rokeby, 538; and Carlisle, 538. Excursion to Clydesdale, 540. Writes "The History of Scotland" for Lardner's Cyclopædia, 541. Publication of "Anne of Geierstein," 542. Publication and success of the "Opus Magnum," 544. Nervous attack — cupping, ib. Death and epitaph of Thomas Purdie, 545, 546.

1830-1831. — Publication of "Auchin-drane," 547. Apoplectic seizure, 548, 557. Publication of "Letters on Demonology," and fourth series of "Tales of a Grandfather," 548. Resignation of the Clerkship of Session, 549. Offers of a pension, and of the rank of Privy Counsellor declined, 549. A second overture of matrimony, 550. Admonition to the citizens of Edinburgh on the reception of King Charles X. of France, 552.

Visits of the French exiled noblesse, 553. Unpleasant discussion with Messrs. Ballantyne and Cadell, 555, passim, 561. Second dividend to creditors, and their gift to him of the library, &c. at Abbotsford, 559. Fourth Letter of "Malachi" written and suppressed, 560. Residence with Mr. Cadell in Athol Crescent, 562. His last will executed, 564. Opposition to the Parliamentary Reform Bill, 564. Insulted at Jedburgh, 565, 570.

1831-1832. - Apoplectic paralysis, 567. Election scenes at Jedburgh and Selkirk, 570. Last interview with Ballantyne, 573. Excursion to Douglasdale, 575. His last winter at Abbotsford, 579. Resolves on an excursion to Italy - a Government frigate prepared for his voyage, ib. Last visit to Smallholm, Bemerside, &c., 580. Farewell visit to Wordsworth, 582. Departure for London, 583. Arrival at Portsmouth, 587. Voyage in the Barham, 587. Arrival at Malta, 589; Naples, 590; Rome, 591; Venice, &c., 596. Fatal attack on the Rhine, near Nimeguen - "the crowning blow," 597. Arrival in London - Jermyn Street, ib. Voyage to Edinburgh, 599. Journey to Abbotsford, 600; and last days there, 601-606.

His death, 21st September, 606; funeral, 607; character, summary of, personal, literary, and political, 609, passim; last will, and state of his affairs, 626.

Monuments to his memory, 626-628. Portraits, 173, 535, 629-631.

Busts, 358, 631.

Statues, 540, 628, 632.

Scott, Lady, of Abbotsford, in early married life, 79, 94, 101. Anecdote of, and Jeffrey, 160. Drawing-room anecdote, 263. Reception of American tourists, 330. Illness of, 488, passim. Death, 495; and funeral, 497.

--- Scott's reminiscences of, 538.

--- 200, 205, 215, 234, 497.

--- Anne, second daughter of Sir Walter, 289, 292. Anecdote of the egg, 331. The "Lady Anne," 365. Accompanies her father to Ireland, 443, 448. Dutiful devotion of, 492, 495, 496, passim. Letter from Carlisle, 538. Accompanies her father to London, Italy, &c., 583. Death of, 623.

Scott, Anne, second daughter of Sir Walter, 423, 492, 501, 545, 562.

--- Anne, sister of Sir Walter, 8, 9, 79, 85.

--- Anne, niece of Sir Walter, 494.

--- Charles, second son of Sir Walter, accompanies Washington Irving to Melrose Abbey, 289. Sent to Lampeter in Wales, 378; to Oxford, 434. Proposed for India, ib. Visited by his father at Oxford, 501. Appointed a Clerk in the Foreign Office, 528. To the British Embassy at Naples, 568. Receives his father at Naples, 590. Accompanies his father home, 597. At Abbotsford in his father's last illness, 606. Attached to the Embassy at Persia, 623; and death, ib.

--- Charles, second son of Sir Walter, 497, 549, 559, 564.

--- Charles, Esq., of Nesbitt, 607.

--- Daniel, fourth brother of Sir Walter, 9. Unfortunate case of, 192; and death, ib. Contrition of Sir Walter regarding him, 534.

--- Mr., of Danesfield, 12.

--- Lady Diana, 71.

--- Dr., of Darnlee, 322, 337.

--- Lady Frances, 87.

--- Hugh, Esq., of Harden, afterwards Lord Polwarth, 70, 607.

--- Mrs., of Harden, aids Scott in his German studies, 70. Letter from, 70, 71.

--- 592, 606.

--- Henry, Esq., now Lord Polwarth, 570.

--- Janet, aunt of Sir Walter, 13, 23.

--- John, Major, second brother of Sir Walter, 8, 209, 259. Death and character of, 271.

--- John, Esq., of Gala, 258, 262, 354 n.

--- Miss Mary, 606.

--- Captain Robert, uncle of Sir Walter, 15, 45. His bequest to Scott, and death, 115.

--- Robert, eldest brother of Sir Walter, 9.

--- Sophia, eldest daughter of Sir Walter, anecdote of, 289. Married to Mr. Lockhart, 359. See Mrs. Lockhart.

--- 292, 295, 344.

--- Thomas, third brother of Sir Walter, 9, 85. His appointment in the Register House, 193. Letter to, 204. Letter to, on "Waverley," 243. Death, 434.

--- Mrs. Thomas, sister-in-law of Sir Walter, 9 n., 85, 597.

--- Thomas, at Crailing, 12.

- Scott, Walter, father of Sir Walter Scott
Character of, 16, 41. Married Miss Anne Rutherford, 1. Family of, 1. His death, 84.
- Mrs. Walter, mother of Sir Walter Scott
Character of, 17, 51. Her letters to, 71. Her death and burial, 140.
- Lieut. Col. the late Sir Walter Scott, eldest son of the first, and date of, 200. At the battle of Halidon Hill on Carterthorough, 201. A member of the 18th Regiment of Horse, 201. Married to Miss Fergus, 208. Called as Captain of Horse, 207. Abroad for health, 214. Accompanied his father to Malta, Naples, &c., 201, and attended on him in his last illness, 207, 208. Commander of the 15th Hussars at Madras, 214. Estimate of his character, 17. His death, 214. affairs of, after his father's death, 236.
- Letter to, 270.
- 200, 137, 145, 181, 197, 199, 225, 261, 267.
- Mrs. Walter, now Lady Scott 44, 181, 234.
- Captain Walter, of Natchells, 180.
- William, Esq., of Raeburn, 126, 187.
- Scottish aristocracy, Scott's romantic idealisation of, 61.
- Jurisdiction, 150.
- Secrecy of Scott, remarks on the, 61.
- Selkirk, status of Scott in, 120.
- Subsides, 207, 180.
- Senior, Mr., his Resignation of the Waverley Novels, 225.
- Romantic, domestic, Scott's treatment of, 151, 155.
- Travelling expenses of, 202.
- Seaton, Court of, Scott appointed as a Clerk of, 140, 141. Duties of the office, 140.
- Stewart, Miss Anna, Lichfield, 100.
- Visited by Scott, 151. Her "Poetical Works," 3 vols., 180, 197, and "Letters," in 2 vols., 180.
- Shandwick Place, Scott's residence there, 577. A painful scene at, 58.
- Sharpshooters, The Border, raised by Scott, 340.
- Sheffield knife, anecdote of, 202.
- Shrewsbury, the General, Lord Chief Justice, 180.
- Shroton, Mr. John Ed-
Thomas, 170.
- Siddons, Mrs., 134.
- Mr. Henry, 170.
- Smith, John, Esq., 180.
- His Resignation of Hampton, 141.
- Sir James Mackintosh,
187. Published in, 1.
Stewart, James, Esq., of
First hospitalisation of Remembrance of Scott,
170. Letter from, 261.
St. John's Island, 200.
- 41, 205, 50, 200.
- Mrs. witnesses of
with Scott, 257.
- Squinting Club, 115.
- Speculative Society, 11.
See, 180.
- Spencer, Earl, 142.
- Hon. W. R. Jones
Spencer, 27.
- Stalker, Mr., 15.
- Stanhope, Lady Hector.
- Steele, Mr. John, his 128, 182.
- Stevenson, John, "The Robert, Esq., English
Stewart, Alexander, 1 340.
- General David, of Dugald, Professor
Biography, 20, 71.
- Sir Henry of Allart.
- Sir James of Allart.
- Stoddart, Sir John, 94.
- Street, Mrs. Collins, 254.
- Stretcher, Mr. John, 14.
- Stuart a Homestead of "C, 100.
- Stuart, Prince Charles
at Rome, 204.
- Lady Louisa, 10.
Jeanie Deans, 100.
- See, on the death of Letter to, 200.
- 87, 172, 200.
- Sublime, a case of, 201.
- "Superstition, History
posed, 418.
- "Suzanne's Daughter of, published in N 225.
- Swinton, John, 180.

T.

TABLE TALK OF SCOTT, 302, 361, 422.
Talbot, Sir George, 590.

"TALES OF THE CRUSADERS," 4 vols., 435, 410. Publication of, in 1825, 441.

"TALES OF A GRANDFATHER," first series, 3 vols.; origin of their composition, 510, 514, 522; published in December, 1827, 528.

Second series, 3 vols., published in 1828, 539.

Third series, 3 vols., published in December, 1829, 543.

Fourth series, 3 vols. (FRANCE), publication of, in 1830, 518.

"TALES OF MY LANDLORD," first series, 4 vols., publication of, by Murray and Blackwood, 274, passim, 279. See "The Black Dwarf," and "Old Mortality."

Second series, 4 vols., 291. See "Heart of Midlothian."

Third series, 344, 314. See "The Bride of Lammermoor," and "Legend of Montrose."

Fourth series, 4 vols., publication of, in 1834, 583. See "Count Robert of Paris," and "Castle Dangerous," a spurious series of, announced, 334.

"Tales of Terror, Apology for," the first specimen of the Ballantyne Press, 89, 93.

"Tales of Wonder," by Lewis, 81, passim, 98.

"TALISMAN, THE." See "Tales of the Crusaders."

Taylor's, William, translation of Bürger's "Lene," 67.

Terry, Daniel, comedian, Scott's intimacy with, 196. His drama of Guy Mannering, 271. Pecuniary loss to Scott by, 438. Visited by Scott at the Adelphi, 501. Death of, 543.

228, 284, 392, 395, 410.

Walter Scott, 284.

Theatre. See Edinburgh.

Theatrical Fund dinner, Scott's avowal of authorship at, 508.

"Thomas o' Twizzlehope," 53.

Thomson, Rev. George, tutor at Abbotsford, 217. Death of, 622.

George, Esq., 312, 369.

Thomas, Esq., Advocate, 193, 329, 408, 415, 507, 561, 579.

Train, Mr. Joseph, poems of, 246; useful to Scott in antiquarian collecting, 217. Suggestions to Scott regarding "Old Mortality," 280. Gift to Scott of Rob Roy's purse, ib., and the Wallace chair, 434.

"Tully-Veolan," 61; silver bear of, 62, 63.

Turnberry Castle, 246.

Turner, J. M. W., Esq., R.A., visits Abbotsford, Bemerside, &c., 580.

"Tweedly, the great," 456.

Tweed river, 138, 151, 208, 210, 291, 368, 606; "drumly and dark," 519.

"Two Drovers, THE," tale of, published in November, 1827, 523.

U.

USHER, Mr. John, Toffield, 369.

V.

VENICE, Scott at, 596.

Victoria, Princess, now Queen, Scott presented to, 536.

"VISIONARY, THE," publication of, 346.

"Visits of three days," 458*n*.

Voltaire, 360.

Volunteer mania in Edinburgh, 130.

Vulgar, its true meaning, 448.

W.

WALKER, Admiral, Sir Baldwin, 588.

— Rev. Mr., Dumottar, 62.

— Helen, Scott's monument to, 586.

"Walladmoor," tale of, 441.

Walton Hall visited by Sir Walter and Mr. Lockhart, 376.

Watch, simile of a, 565, 566.

Watson, Dr. Thomas, 600.

Watt, Robert, execution of, 65.

"WAVERLEY," 3 vols., 106. MS. of, 203, 232, 237. Offer of Constable for the Copyright, 237. Publication of, in 3 vols., in 1814, 237, 243. Anecdote of its composition, 230.

WAVERLEY NOVELS, MSS. of, gifted to Constable by Scott, 434; award of their right of vestment, 528.

— 48 vols. (The "Opus Maximum").

- joint purchase of Sir Walter and Mr. Cadell, for L.8500, 529.
- Whale, Mr. Lancelot, Kelso, 23.
- Wharnecliffe, Lord, 627.
- Wealth and rank, remarks on Scott's estimate of, 459, 460.
- Weber, Henry, melancholy case of, 233.
- Wellesley, Marquis of, 444.
- Wellington, the Duke of, Scott first presented to, 260. Scott's admiration of, 264, 265 n. Style of debating, 422. Meeting with Scott at Durham and Ravensworth Castles, 521.
— 357, 410, 500, 556, 584.
- Wicklow, excursion into, 445.
- Wilkes, John, 200.
- Wilkie, Sir David, his portraits of Scott, 631.
- Williams, Rev. Archdeacon, 378, 580, 607.
- Wilson, Professor John, visits Abbotsford, 320, and Storrs, 452.
— 332, 430, 628.
- Windermere, 453.
- Windsor Lodge in the Forest, Scott commanded to, 500.
- Wines, Scott's taste for, 308.
- Winstanley, Mr., auctioneer, 228.
- Wollaston, Dr., 364, passim
- Woman, in Fife, misfortune of, 67.
- Wood, Sir Alex., 65, 67.
- Woodhouselee, Lord, 80.
- "WOODSTOCK," 3 vols., 46
tion of in April, 1826, 491
- Wordsworth, William, Esq., at Lasswade, 109. Scott 139. Visit to Storrs, 452. well visit to Abbotsford, from his "Yarrow Revisitation," 225.
— Miss, 582.
- Wright, Thos. Guthrie, Esq. niscences of Scott, 154.
— William, Esq., of Linlithgow, 462.
- Writings of Scott, their merit, 620. Genius, 620. Imitations, 621; and tendency, 621.
- Wynn, Right Hon. C. W., 582.

Y.

- YARROW RIVER, 118, 119, 410.
- York, Duke of (1822), 410.
- Young, Charles, Esq., Tragical, 547.
— Miss, of Hawick, 547.
— ideas, 447.

