

MEMORIALS OF MAILEY

WILLIAM W. BROWN, JR.

LIBRARY
OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

151
CV

151

MEDITATIONS IN MOTLEY.

MEDITATIONS IN MOTLEY

A BUNDLE OF PAPERS
IMBUED WITH THE SO-BRIETY OF MIDNIGHT

By WALTER BLACKBURN HARTE

THE ARENA PUBLISHING COMPANY, BOSTON, MASS.
MDCCCXCIV

COPYRIGHTED, 1894
BY WALTER BLACKBURN HARTE

952 H328

med

“Motley’s the only wear.”

—As You Like It.

“I am now of all humours, that have show’d themselves humours, since the old days of goodman Adam to the pupil age of this present twelve o’clock at midnight.”

—Prince Henry in King Henry IV.

M772424

CONTENTS.

PREFATORY NOTE.

ON CERTAIN SATISFACTIONS OF PREJUDICE	7
JACOBITISM IN BOSTON	43
ABOUT CRITICS AND CRITICISM: WITH OTHER MATTERS, INCIDENTAL AND IRRELEVANT	103
SOME MASKS AND FACES OF LITERATURE	153
THE FASCINATION OF NEW BOOKS	185
A RHAPSODY ON MUSIC	209

PREFATORY NOTE.

OF the essays included in this unpretentious bundle, one or two first saw the light in the most unexpected and obscure corner of a somewhat obscure parochial register, under the general caption of "In A Corner at Dodsley's." Others have appeared in different periodicals. I am indebted to the Editor of the Arena for permission to reprint the paper on "Prejudice."

I first took down the shutters at Dodsley's, in October, 1891, in the darkest, poorest, dimmallest alley-way in all Grub street, and for over two years I was to be found there by all those who cared to adventure in the literary slums. I chose the name partly out of a contradictory humor, my shop being situated so very far away from Pall Mall, where Robert Dodsley's smart bookshop stood in Pope's and Dr. Johnson's day, and partly because obscurity and squalor are forever associated with the attractions of antiquarianism, and I could only hope in such a quarter to attract the curious. A certain literary bum-bailiff, who objected to my existence and occupations upon principle, finally put the shutters up one fine winter morning, and I found employment elsewhere.

PREFATORY NOTE.

The papers as printed in the parochial register, were written, under some stress of circumstance, to arrest the attention of curious people and interest them in the merits of quack medicines, face powders, sauces and sewing machines. One or two, selected from a considerable number, are now hazarded in this new form without those adventitious aids to circulation.

If I could only hope to see this little venture prosper half as well as do some of the quack medicines, I should be reconciled to the Fates—and I should not disturb my peace of mind with any unnecessary inquiries into the effects of the syllabub, nor the expert criticisms which might be made upon it.

I had no idea of formally dedicating this book to any one of my friends, because it occurred to me that it might be a dubious compliment, since Grub Street is in such bad odor; but on sober second thoughts I have finally decided to offer a tentative word by way of dedication. The opportunity to ingratiate myself with the judicious is too rare to be put aside for a doubt; I therefore commend this little book to the Devil and Dame Chance, the two most potent deities in literary fortunes as in all other sublunary dispensations.

PREFATORY NOTE.

WALTER BLACKBURN HARTE.

OCTOBER, 1894.
BOSTON, MASS.

ON CERTAIN
SATISFACTIONS OF PREJUDICE.

MEDITATIONS IN MOTLEY.

ON CERTAIN SATISFACTIONS OF PREJUDICE.

OVER a cup of tea and the evening paper I am constantly informed by the delightful old lady, who sits at the end of the board and gravely and quietly replenishes my cup without any demur until the limit of five cups is reached, when neither prayers, threats nor entreaties will induce her to pour out another drop, that I am a person of violent antipathies and prejudices. When I attempt to remonstrate and clear myself of this dreadful charge, by explaining that any splenetic explosions in which I may occasionally indulge at the table are imbued with the high moral purpose of shaking the company out of their immoral apathy, I only make matters worse. As the lady absolutely refuses to read anything more exciting than Paley's “Moral Philosophy,” I cannot convince her of the wanton wickedness of her contemporaries, especially such of them as write in the newspapers; and I pen this, I hope scientific, analysis of that cerebral irritation which is called prejudice under this roof, and a glimpse of the subject of prejudice in general, in the hope that discussion of the paper over the tea table will lift a gloom from my social character that has rested upon it in Miss Paulina Pinckney’s mind these many years.

At the other end of the table (years of happy and memorable tea-table strife have given me the place of honor at her right hand, formerly occupied by a famous psychologist possessed with a strong intellectual partiality for criminals), there sits a young man who manufactures what is called editorial opinion for the Sentinel; and our prim but tender-hearted hostess declares that a malicious curiosity once prompted her to read that valuable organ of opinion, but respect for her lodger prevailed over her worsen instincts; for, truth to tell, the young man is really quite ordinarily behaved and, up to this time of writing, has never been discovered at anybody's keyhole or under anybody's bed or concealed in anybody's clothes closet. Miss Paulina has him under constant surveillance, though, in spite of her scruples of conscience, and she had grave doubts about allowing the associate of criminals to have a latch key. She believes he has a hand in every murder mystery that gets into the air. She is convinced the newspaper press is the invention of the Devil, and will not give it any of her countenance. I am not orthodox, but I share Miss Paulina's conviction. I most sincerely uphold the good lady's resolution in abjuring the Sentinel, and I think it reflects great credit upon her character. And then I know that not everybody in this world can suffer to have their illusions comparatively examined, and cheerfully feel that they are gainers; as they actually are, since added to their original stock of illusions, they acquire a knowledge of realities. It is certainly better for the manufacturer of editorial opinion that Miss Paulina extends to him this dubious charity, for if he is responsible for any of the Sentinel's opinions he is to be pitied for enjoying so much of his own society.

The young man himself, however, smiles whimsically at my occasional explosions of splenetic disgust. He has, in fact, some humor and discrimination, and he never reads the Sentinel. Now I do, because the doctor tells me exercise is good for my liver, and I think it stirs me up a bit to damn the Sentinel now and then. I know the Sentinel man is not hurt, for he really has so much appreciation of good literature that his table is piled high with the spoil of my bookshelves; and besides, he knows I too have been a brigand, and a mutual antipathy has drawn us together. But our good gray landlady belongs to a more sober and strenuous time; there is a good deal of the old Puritan conscience in her; and she cannot understand that our journalistic friend experiences a strange joy in bearing all possible odium for a trade he loathes, but being a canny, cautious soul, dares not damn with my whole-souled ardor.

It is because I permit myself the fullest satisfaction of my antipathies that I am able to get along with fewer distractions than most of my less prodigal associates, who have to be penurious of their true opinions to provide for the indulgence of their luxurious tastes. For this reason, my good landlady sometimes suspects me of hypocrisy. She contrasts my general opinions, which are tolerant enough, with my ebullitions on certain subjects—undertaken sometimes for the sake of getting rid of an honest opinion and sometimes for my liver—of which, on paper, I am quite prepared to see both sides, but over the tea table, to pleasure myself, will only see one, and she cannot reconcile my ideas on hygiene with her beautiful belief in the practicability of the Beatitudes.

I have sometimes tried to explain to the good lady, that, it being admitted, as it must be admitted, that every man having so much original sin, a good stock of vigorous abstract prejudices is essential to afford any room for the development of a few virtues. She does not follow my reasoning, and I honestly believe she harbors a dread suspicion that a sixth cup of tea any evening might excite me to the commission of some awful atrocity—perhaps the murder of the editorial opinion-maker of the Sentinel.

The fact is my prejudices afford me my greatest relaxation, a good heated, unsparing tea-table argument, in which I conceive there is no excitement or stimulant unless one is notoriously on the wrong side, with some cherished prejudices in peril to warm one up for the strife, and make defeat more glorious than any cold-blooded victory of mere logic. A man who does not possess certain well recognized and very dear prejudices, for which he will fight against a whole roomful of bloodthirsty opponents, is in very great danger in more serious crises of not being aware of certain congenital errors of mind, which are perfectly familiar to his friends; and not only that, but does any one believe such a man would run any risk for the maintenance of any moral conviction whatsoever? Such a man is too lukewarm and cautious to love the truth. It may seem paradoxical, but to always prefer logic to a good wholesome prejudice is enough to make one suspect such a man would not stick at perjury. This is one of the advantages of acquiring a sympathetic acquaintance with the whole range of one's prejudices.

But the most cogent argument for a due recognition of them in one's social life is that they are really more sociable and loquacious than logic and reason, which are often uncharitable and brutal, if not cold and glum. And to recognize one's prejudices also argues the possession of a logical faculty of some utility, for the half of education is to be able to sift the most palpable errors out of one's knowledge, and live within one's intellectual income without any dangerous pretension, making such of one's errors and prejudices as have any attribute of picturesqueness about them, serve some innocent social purpose, so that in every society one need not become absolutely bankrupt in twenty-four hours.

Behind my evening paper, and in the middle of my fourth cup of Oolong, I would consider it unsocial and, if the term may be allowed, pedantic, to suddenly get becalmed in some unescapably logical conclusion, when all the rest of the company was unbent and familiar, and when I could perhaps add to the general gaiety, as well as exhilarate my sluggish pulse, by waging a passionate battle for some good old antiquated prejudice, probably inherited from a great grandfather addicted to snuffing and proverbial philosophy. My only relapses into purely unexceptionable rational moods at the tea table, occur when I see the bottom of my fifth cup, and all my logic rises for a futile appeal to that implacable moralist, who does not hesitate to avow her conviction that a drop over my allowance would precipitate me upon a literary career of corrupting the young. I hope this consideration has due weight with me — but I confess to a strong prejudice concerning this literary tenderness for the young.

I have in this way developed a sort of intellectual incredulity, which, while making me tender toward my prejudices, keeps me from becoming arrogant over my reasoned opinions. The knowledge of how very specious and satisfactory the one may be, saves me from being over credulous about the others. I sometimes suspect, too, that some of the finest webs of logic are spun to uphold the most fantastic and palpable sophistries; and so in the passionate championing of my prejudices, I honestly think that I have acquired a portion of that humility which will cling to its heart and soul convictions in spite of contumely and persecution. This indulgent incredulity in regard to the credulousness of my nature, which would fain turn some of these hopes into facts, gives me a sort of humorous interest in those very facts, which would come very harshly upon me but for this appreciation of the true nature of my illusions. I grant I have some prejudice against the facts, in a good many instances, but being undeceived about my own prejudices, which have much greater claims upon my regard, I mitigate something of their harshness by not attaching to them quite so much importance as some more equable and more credulous persons do.

Thus while the more matter-of-fact of my friends have forfeited all their illusions before reaching the age of thirty, I hope to retain a sufficiently large number of amusing prejudices to exercise and keep me in humor for a lifetime; and that without becoming seriously a victim of my own illusions. So my incredulity, being of a slow and native growth—it was of almost unconscious development until my plunge into the study of psychology—has not destroyed and deprived me of the advantages of any prejudices that a kind Providence and the concomitance of education and early surroundings ordained should be mine, as contributory to my social happiness; but it has maintained an equilibrium between the real world and the world of my illusions, which I cannot but think has not only been of material benefit to me in my earthly pilgrimage, but has afforded me much innocent mirth at my own expense, when I was too desperately poor to indulge in laughter at anybody else's. And truly the man who cannot laugh heartily at the unescapable discrepancy between his conscience and his inclinations, who cannot perceive the ludicrousness of his grave and sober part, be it what it may, in this great farce of a world, cannot have much charity for those who, either from indolence or natural unfitness, or an excess of philosophic temperament, fail to get anything out of the scramble but hard knocks.

Here is the advantage of boldly acknowledging one's prejudices to oneself (not to the indiscriminating who judge men upon their small talk and small change): it gives one a juster conception of the extent of one's capital ideas and knowledge, and leaves illusions more or less separate and distinct for the safe employment of one's hours of relaxation. Even if one has to abandon some of one's most sober and complacent parts of knowledge in this process of sifting, in the certain gain of prejudices one must increase in both knowledge and tolerance. And through the practice of this discrimination and economy, one can put both one's knowledge and one's prejudices out at interest, and win men's good opinion in business and in social life, without being compelled to do them so much injury as men do who obey their prejudices from greed or ambition without any system or comprehension. I think most people have no idea of the social utility of a good stock of prejudices. In the agreeable strife of the tea table one can really be much wittier in defence of one's most monstrous prejudices than in the calm and sober attempt to gain a hearing for really substantial and rational opinions on church and state. But then I have a theory that no man or woman entirely lacking in wit and humor should dare to nourish any prejudices—or if they must,

they should only do so in a monastic silence and secrecy. Those of us who enjoy the advantage of the society of witty women know how much their prejudices contribute to their charm and brilliancy. Thus by informing myself upon my pet credulities, I have not merely not shattered my illusions, but I have acquired some sympathy for the flattering prejudices of others. At the same time I am wary and cautious, and I enjoy the luxury of cherishing my prejudices without becoming the spoil of my enemies. The man who confuses his prejudices with his moral or immoral convictions is apt either to be a petty tyrant, or the prey of all those large souls who fatten upon others' moral convictions, but with such incorruptible consciences that they fear no contamination.

For instance, I have a prejudice against the Calvinistic theory of total depravity, although my reason, appalled with the facts, rebels; but strong and persistent as is the prejudice, my mental habit of final dubiousness preserves me in the imminent peril of a fatal delusion, that might unfit me for the social state into which I was most unexpectedly born. I have luckily sufficient tolerance for worldly wisdom to save me from allowing what may only be a most ungrounded prejudice to precipitate me into any dangerous sapiency of philanthropy, that, in all probability, would quickly land me in the fearful quagmire of being helplessly dependent upon the chance of the same delusion seizing upon others; and introspection has convinced me that any real love and tenderness is a quality or condition of mind which is daily menaced with too many ugly realities to be at all stable and constant. The one compensation for this fact is that the greatest charity is tolerance in all matters of social and philosophic opinion, which only attracts the best and finest natures and has no fascination for those wasps of humanity that embarrass and prey upon all philanthropy but that which invariably suggests itself to the mind in inverted commas—in the secure keeping of shrewd managers of “charity” organizations. All other so-called practical charity that has not this salt of heroic fundamental sanity and justice is the most villainous of mummeries. It demands higher qualities to declare justice in spite of all “respectable" opinion than to give mere money or bricks. "But money is a good soldier, sir, and will on."

Thus I cannot escape the conviction (although I should like to, as I must oppose conscience when it pricks me to acknowledge an obligation which may seem to more positive minds a vice) that in this one respect I have been somewhat exceptionally fortunate; for though I have many friends and a wide circle of acquaintances, and, as far as my knowledge goes, but few of them are in such destitute circumstances as to be wholly lacking in prejudices, I do not think many of them experience any genuine thrill of pleasure when the certainty is borne in upon them — if that ever happens — that some of their most tenaciously held opinions are in indubitable opposition to facts. It may be scouted as an unreasonable opinion, but half the pleasure of possessing fantastic prejudices consists in being unescapably convicted of error at the end of an argument; for in this conviction is a delicate tribute to one's power of logical construction even with admitted disabilities. I cannot help reflecting, although in this connection it may sound ominously like self-complacency, that men with such cold sympathies that they will not boldly father their prejudices must ever shut out of their minds either something of error or of truth; and it seems to me our capacities as well as our opportunities for obtaining innocent pleasures in this sad old world, are not sufficiently great to justify a prudent man in practising such penury and inhospitality.

I maintain that the man who cannot and dare not admit that the other party to an argument—I am excluding politics, economics and all sober questions but philosophy, which affords the most magnificent opportunities to fantastical souls—has the preponderance of evidence and facts, and still cling courageously to his more picturesque or more agreeable prejudices, is sadly lacking in moral stamina, and is not of that stuff out of which heroes and martyrs are made. If one can only manage it, there is something more comforting in the conviction of infant damnation or the eternal torments of those pagans who do not share our theological fiddle-de-dee than in all the chilly assurances of mere reason. But on the other hand, in a charity that includes dreadful errors of all sorts you have all the real moral progress of civilization, the measure of every man — tolerance of opinion, which surely, to escape all possible charges of hypocrisy and invidious distinctions, must include charity to self. We should reconcile ourselves to our errors with the thought that, granting all the great beacons of the ages, a perfectly balanced mind does not exist. There is some fatal fixity of ideas in even the greatest minds, that must exclude much sanity. Besides, a great deal of modern sober inquiry is being directed to a reëxamination of ancient misses at truth.

In considering prejudices in a broad and tolerant spirit, and the satisfactions it is possible to derive from them, one should certainly turn to Sir Thomas Browne. As the author of a most learned work on "Vulgar Errors," and the "Religio Medici," he has won the good will of a posterity of bookish men through the possession of a goodly share of the most delicious whimsies and prejudices. It will be remembered that he was concerned with Sir Matthew Hale in the burning of witches, a fact which, while I try to cherish the most humane sentiments, I cannot but think contributes something to my delight in his opinions. "The extreme age of an opinion seemed to him to be some warrant for its truth"; and this tendency of mind opened up a field of sober humor and fine-spun disputations in these philosophic meditations on life and destiny and faith and death, more rich in suggestive error and flashes of illuminative truth, proving some unprovable hypothesis, than one can find in any body of fantastical speculation within the same compass in the whole range of English literature. But of course the "Religio Medici" is alone in its kind.

If one is of Sir Thomas Browne's way of thinking that "It is too late to be ambitious," then one can all the more cheerfully congratulate oneself upon a store of robust prejudices for companionship in the swift changing years, and the isolation of one's age. Even the best of wives is not so constant as a well-grounded prejudice; and sons and daughters notoriously grow from short frocks into indifference, and ultimately know only our whimsies and not us. If we can but learn to recognize our prejudices we are saved from loneliness.

It is improbable, however, that many can endure to live in such a penury of complacency, to put the matter on no higher grounds, and so the unwisdom of ambition in this late day will probably never shame a newly-reached majority out of its beady cups; and in this, as in most other things, Nature conspires against reason. But there can surely be no better admonition than Sir Thomas Browne's to those who, being blessed with the most happy prejudices, are so ill-advised and so injudicious as to poison their happiness and contentment with a mad desire to propagate them. These gifts, whether from Providence or the Devil, should be their own reward; it is prodigal to squander them in the reckless gambling of vanity. Browne says, "Those have not only depraved understandings, but diseased affections, which cannot enjoy a singularity without a heresy, or be the author of an opinion without they be of a sect also."

There is a goodly number of most delightful writers (though the most of them lie in the cemeteries) who scorn to use the arts of the politician and of the multitude of scribblers, only happy in some larger shadow than their own, who still hope to get a currency upon the popular tongue by combatting and banning in a grandeur of fantastic and isolated opinion all those popular notions that good, respectable men inherit and apparently carry in their pockets (for they do not truly concern their heads), as good Catholics carry their rosaries. The danger for some of these men is that when they finally become aware of the desperately unintelligent and irrelevant character of a great deal of "wisdom," they are apt to become slothfully content with a scepticism of mere wit. That is not the worst of it with men who lack wit. A prejudice without wit is the Devil with gout — all prescriptions fail to meet the case. With the progress of time some of the finest fantastic spirits not infrequently seem to abdicate reason altogether for the indulgence of their prejudices, because they consider the former to be too common among men, while the latter, in their very vigor and hardiness, and the opposition and clamor they sometimes provoke, give their possessors a peculiar sense of innate originality. Perhaps, with all the mountains of literature behind us, all the originality possible for us moderns lies in our prejudices. In reading some of my contemporaries I think this must be so. The persons just alluded to would rather be removed, even through the very preposterousness of their errors, from the ordinary mass of men, than be lost in the miry darkness of some general opinion of "common sense," which philosophy tells them—and herein is some justification to balance, if not to top, their vanity—may be proved, a generation or so hence, to be quite as unsubstantial, though without any redeeming quality of picturesqueness.

The great majority of men are easily seduced from their native thoughts by the ambition to rise in some party or win popular applause, and to achieve this success they have to concur in prejudices whose nativity could scarcely recommend them to noble minds. There are other men who, in the uncertainty of knowledge, are, above all, desirous of maintaining some sort of intellectual integrity, and they naturally reject all those monstrous popular prejudices, stamped with the "judicial authority," as having no avowed and decent parentage, which would give some clue to nature, as an honest individual prejudice sometimes does; these hold their own prejudices on probation, as being perhaps after all scarcely less dubious than much of the wisdom of theology and politics and moral and other philosophy. The average minds, of course, do not understand them, and mediocrities without a peck more of reason, and with a destitution of wit, laugh them to scorn; for the majority of men are lacking in the vigor of mind necessary to the creation, by illogical thinking, of a lusty native prejudice, and their opinions, like their prayers, are made for them. The masses, whose sole thinking is the morning's hot politics, are in a revolt against any communism of bread and meat, for political economists have shown them the brazen and wicked folly of assuming that these things were intended by Nature to supply her own turbulent claims in empty stomachs; but they are nevertheless for the most part divided in their opinions and their morals more as clamorous, unthinking communes than as individuals, and only a few heretics outside the communes know where the mechanism of all these staid opinions is to be found, and what and whose purposes it serves. The masses of men do not think except through the symbols provided for them. It is no reproach to them, for their bellies are in pawn to a conspiracy against the welfare of the race. One cannot but think that perhaps if all men clung courageously to their prejudices we might enjoy a greater sanity of public opinion than we do in the universal adoration of the "judicial character"; and in all the realistic concerns of life we would possibly gain in tenderness and charity.

These few heretical writers who glory in their native prejudices, but unfortunately too often lose, in the battle of opinions, a wholesome and necessary sub-conscious scepticism about them, are often nearer to Nature in emptying their minds without hypocrisy, than the majority of writers, who pay more court to judicial ignorance than they do to the acquisition of knowledge. And moreover they are, if one reads them in the right spirit, more amusing than some other graver and less erratic writers. We do not go to them when we are lost in the mazes of life, but for an after-dinner pill they are amazingly good homœopathists. And they serve at least one purpose; they are the nipping east wind of all that good, "respectable" opinion that sets one's teeth on edge. They wage war upon all wicked self-complacency—but their own; and, of course, we can only expect a philosophy that would include the latter from very rare humorists indeed. Nor would such be likely to take their prejudices with so much of seriousness as the sort of persons I have in mind. Job had this inclusive quality of wisdom, but he could scarcely have derived the same amount of pleasure from his prejudices as the modern writers I am hinting at, whose ambition is not prophecy or exhortation, but the sort of heresy which inspires as much amiable mirth as anger. Like all schismatics it is only their wit saves them from being bigots. It is the lack of wit that makes all sorts and conditions of orthodox folk so desperately dull. How can one be witty in a world about which one has made up one's mind once and forever? Each day must bring the most unendurable monotony to the orthodox who never fear any doubts lurking round the corner.

But the great peril of men of this fine fanatic temperament is that they often grow tired of the isolated grandeur of amusing the dull with paradoxes too subtle for comprehension at a glance, and not grave enough to interest the wise who have learned to suspect their vanities, and resolve to put their paradoxes into a system. From being too erratic to long occupy any one province of thought they settle down into a persistence of contradiction that is often finally disastrous to their wit. Some petty accident, or a new and sudden influence at the critical period of life, throws them from incertitude, expressed in genially held prejudices, into a fury of positivism, and they seek to turn what was an amiable and amusing folly, in the consideration of men of discernment, into the alarming form of "a school" of folly. This gives an edge to the pointless ribaldry of the dull, who cannot appreciate a quip for its own sake, and have no sense of the sobriety of true humor; the sort of plaguy villains who drive a rational, thinking being mad in twenty-four hours' enforced society with their coagulated nonsense and utterly unreasonable "common sense." And yet perhaps in a world of fine wits it might be possible, and not so menacing, to see the prosperity of all sorts of fantastic "schools" — just for the quip's sake; but in a stupid "common sense" world we can hope for no such mitigation of our evil state. The old philosophy of laughter seems to have gone out of fashion. Therefore we must warn Launcelot, in the words of Sir Thomas Browne, against the perils of this adventure. So long as the world is wedded to common sense it cannot contain much philosophy, or be a very comfortable place for those whose opinions cannot find an echo at every fish wife's basket in the market place.

An old prejudice is like an old friend. We see it often in reason's stuffy police court, and hearing that dread sentence passed upon it by judge and jury, we may in very shame abjure it; but it will as likely as not turn up again, and again be welcomed and pressed into the breach in some tea-table battle. And then, too, the introspectively-minded man, who has something like an illustrated biography of his mind since childhood's earliest memories, knows that there is some difference in prejudices. The latest prejudice, created by some newspaper report, some chance word, some jar to one's interests, cannot hold its own with one of those prejudices that have persisted from childhood. An old prejudice will flare up under a hint of the old excitement in the sunset of life, when all the other prejudices have long faded out of mind. The passing fickle prejudices may have laid waste a world, but at the end of life they shrink into insignificance. The only prejudices that linger then are those old ones that used to set the table in a roar — one's congenital, childish prejudices. The "broad minded" man often has just as many prejudices as the old fogy — and one of them is a prejudice against the idea of their universal distribution. As a man prospers, many of his widening interests in what appears to him to be a larger social world are but new prejudices: thus a man gets the slang of clubs, the patois of "society," the "wisdom" of moneyed men, the narrow cant of schools of ethics supported and encouraged by the idle and fashionable classes, and he feels that life is growing richer and richer for him. In reality the process is reversed. In a continual surrender of his own native habits of thought he is growing poorer and poorer.

Ten new prejudices cannot produce that satisfaction which makes one grapple the lifelong companion to one's soul with hooks of steel. The old prejudice may cause less concern than a new one, but it confers more responsibility, and it is necessary to exercise more energy and feeling to protect it. Some of the lighter prejudices of social exigency but need some mishap in a bargain, some change of fortunes or some accidental acquaintance or book to disturb them; they come and go and are scattered with the beady philosophy of life that gave them sanction. But one's radically inherent prejudices are not so much the creation of hope and vanity and pride, as mysterious and oftentimes wise and tender admonitors of the conscience, warning it, in spite of all judicial authority, experience, worldly precepts and example, all respectable opinion, to cling to something of the old unquestioning pity and mercy and charity. Let pride drive on with its superior airs, as it throws a silver coin with scarcely a glance to the beggar on the highway; old prejudice, which cares not for social opinion and laughs at it, turns out of the road into the path and sits down to loaf and chat with a human being. That is prejudice of the right sort. Pride is but prejudice; but how often those who have known misery in youth think it necessary to rob Chance of her part of their prosperity to bolster up their vanity. But the wiser man thanks the goddess of Chance, who may strip him and his at the eleventh hour, and clings to the old prejudice that in youth warned, that to love some men merely for their abilities and capacities, and to despise others for their lack of them, was simply to alternately fawn upon and spurn Mother Nature, who is indifferent to our love or hate. The pride that shuns and scoffs at the simple merely denies itself an acquaintance with one of the most tolerable and sometimes tender of Nature's aspects. A good sceptical prejudice against the pretensions of all human wisdom will counteract this temptation to live in an atmosphere of chill complacency; it is because the wise are so seldom deceived with their wisdom that we so frequently find them, as we read their biographies, sitting on the benches in the alehouses listening to the talk of the simple. The old prejudice of youth against the authority that would narrow and pen up its heaven and earth is a true instinct; we are wisest in the untroubled paganism of childhood, when we do not doubt that all wonder and beauty and mystery is part of our inheritance; and that man is wisest who can cling, in the clash of new prejudices, to the old prejudice so closely woven into the old illusions and enthusiasms of youth. In outgrowing the latter, if one can but cling to the prejudice one is preserving something also of the faith of childhood.

It was ignorance that dreamed of heaven and fairyland; though it was cunning that threw wide open the gates and gave the poor heaven forever while it seized upon earth. But while the mass of us have always been tenants at will upon earth, under most tyrannous sub-landlords, we have never been formally dispossessed of heaven—although a good many of us are a little anxious to obtain some more secure title to a share of the earth and its fruits, since we cannot bring heaven to earth. But we are told we have arrived too late — the earth and its benefits were divided up about a thousand years ago, and only heaven is left to us; and so perhaps after all we owe more to ignorance than we do to wisdom. Some of us have a prejudice against this apportionment of heaven and earth, and especially as we are menaced with a new peril; we see the temples raised on every hand in which Plutus, invoking all the wondrous wisdom of priestcraft, is trying to placate our God and get into heaven. Since wisdom has made us so incontrovertibly superfluous on God's earth, where all the authority and learning shows our error in coming a thousand years late, what sort of guarantee have we that we may not yet be dispossessed of heaven by the same weight of judicial authority?

Ah, but heaven is God's domain, says the gentleman in cassock and gown. Of course, sir, but whose is the earth? Is not that God's, too? We have a prejudice against the weighty authority which has dispossessed us here and made us trespassers whichever way we turn; and since one of the most learned of the white-choker profession, a certain Dr. Malthus, announced that we were born too late, that there were no plates laid for us at Nature's banquet, that we had no right to persist in an existence conferred upon us by accident and should betake ourselves off this planet, we have a prejudice against you torch bearers who may be luring us, like Cornwall wreckers, to our destruction. We hear you declaiming a strange "Christian" gospel to our taskmasters that sounds familiarly like their fantastic political economy, and we openly suspect you of a collusion to shut us out of heaven itself. I am sorely afraid we shall find Plutus in possession, and shall doubtless be told by Dr. Malthus: "Too late, too late; everything was apportioned a thousand years ago. There are no more places at the banquet here." Ah, yes, we must confess to a sad prejudice against you soft-pawed, white-choker creature, for since we cannot reverse the law of gravitation, you have greatly helped to make it sorely difficult for us to breathe anywhere without some guilty trespass.

It may be indeed no idle fancy that we are too late to dream of heaven, since wisdom claims to hold its golden keys; but there are pagan joys still left to us in fairyland, and let us as long as possible cling to these with a tender prejudice. Learning has given us little happiness; let ignorance disclose the reason, though it comes to the block for so doing—it is almost entirely oblivious of wisdom, which does not need so many granaries, but only eyes and hearts. Ignorance in giving us fairyland has made us some compensation for the world it has shut us out of. We can only preserve it by cherishing our prejudices. Once let us admit to ourselves the dreadful deception of our prejudices, and in this too crowded world we are desolate indeed—companionless, and without a single illusion, the prey of a despair that admits of none of that community of woe that makes those, upon whose bounty we cringe, willing to endure the thought of the possibility of sharing heaven with us. For Plutus too has his ills—ennui, satiety, gout and Bright's disease. And then what treasures can exorcise doubt? It pursues us all, rich or poor. But if it be true that Charon expects no more from Alexander than from Lazarus, we may perhaps indulge the prejudice that our white-choker brethren are far too wise to escape their due proportion of error, and so we may still find consolation in the hope that, if there is any after life, the Almighty will waive any consideration of our prejudice against Dr. Malthus and the rest, upon the ground of justification. We surely pay dearly enough in this world for our error of coming into it; and our obstinacy in remaining, in spite of all the disabilities, has in it, to my mind, something of heroism. We remain because we have a prejudice against God's vicegerents, the rightful owners; and there really is some satisfaction in the thought that while wisdom may harass and pinch and starve us, it cannot exorcise us—it cannot reverse the law of gravitation in our special behoof.

Our minor prejudices are too numerous for anything like adequate enumeration, and, since they increase with their satisfaction, they cannot be touched by mathematics. They are woven into the texture of all theology, philosophy, history, literature—everything. It was probably due to some congenital prejudice in John Calvin that we owe the five cardinal points of Calvinism, which my prejudices would sometimes have true, and at other times clamor against. But Calvin's bilious eye gave posterity something to wax witty over — and that is enough of achievement for any man who would benefit mankind.

The satisfaction that most people derive from that prejudice called "patriotism" is one of the most instructive things in this world to any man who, before aspiring to wisdom, is curious to know something of the boundaries of folly. This prejudice, that lacks the redeeming qualities of others I have in mind, is well characterized by Schopenhauer, who, however, did not realize as fully as he might have done the possible disaster of robbing any man of the sole satisfaction of his vanity. He said: "The cheapest sort of pride is national pride; for if a man is proud of his own nation, it argues that he has no qualities of his own of which he can be proud; otherwise, he would not have recourse to those which he shares with so many millions of his fellow-men." But while some sort of illusion is necessary to life, it must be doubted if this peculiar prejudice serves any useful purpose.

Perhaps the most permanent and most widespread prejudice, and the one which all men of contrary prejudices should investigate carefully, is that against men who publish unpleasant truths. The history of government, philosophy, religion, science and literature is occupied with showing how much weighty wisdom has been expended in stoning and crucifying and broiling and frying the perverse and wicked souls who were possessed of a prejudice in favor of their own wicked opinions and the truth. It is too much of a subject for this paper—which is mainly concerned with the general matter of the satisfactions to be derived from those smaller prejudices that have a social value. These are such prejudices as the ancient one against poverty, which cuts some people off from much good society, the prejudice against cynics and other folk with no genius for hypocrisy, against honesty, against old-fashioned ideas and new virtues, ancient truth and new books, poets and critics, justice and mercy. The list, if prolonged, would become a catalogue of all the virtues, though it would also include a fair proportion of vices.

But although it is the way of the world to confuse all good things with prejudices,

(and we have here, to indulge a humor, somewhat acquiesced in the way of the world), the first thing which a wise man must learn in order to retain his own good opinion is not to mistake his prejudices for his convictions, or vice versa. When he has learned this lesson he must expect to enjoy some isolation, for in retaining his own good opinion in this way he must forfeit that of others. But then a fine, amusing prejudice can flourish much more hardily independent of sympathy than with it. A good, harmless prejudice for a man who needs some intellectual distraction, and is not naturally vicious, is a prejudice against critics. It is perhaps, indeed, due simply to the universality of this prejudice among authors that the critics are read at all. There are prejudices of greater moment, but scarcely one that affords more constant amusement. And with these vague hints I must close, for, unfortunately, there is a growing prejudice against long sermons.

JACOBITISM IN BOSTON.

JACOBITISM IN BOSTON.

I.

ONE of the most quotation-worn of Matthew Arnold's oft-quoted dicta, is the declaration that "poetry is at bottom a criticism of life;" and, accepting for a moment this profound judgment in something of that superficial aspect in which we have been made familiar with it in cocksure critical paragraphing, we link it to a commonplace when we say that the commonest poetic criticism of our time is that it is woefully degenerate and prosaic. This is not only the poetic criticism of our time, but is also the everyday commonplace echo and haphazard complacent verdict of every tea table.

But in referring to poetic criticism let us be precise. This is the criticism of the few poets (among the great multitude of literary lice, that lie snugly and fatten in the public ear and repeat in sugared flatteries the vaporings of the public's too many mouths), who see both true poetry and true criticism trampled into the dust, in order that the hard-earned coins may be cozened out of the pockets of poor boozy and bamboozled King Demos; and this judgment is expressed not so often in print, in either poetry or prose, as in the ebb and flow of talk in a club or tavern corner, or in a garret with a few volumes of the old true poets; for it is characteristic of our glorious contemporary literature that all opinion must perforce coincide with public opinion. The inevitable result of this preposterous law is that all honest opinion is either private opinion, or it raises its wicked fangs in such deep obscurity that even the Archangel Michael is not likely to remark the flash in the darkness.

And let us note, in a by the way, before passing on, that this dictum of Matthew Arnold's, this fine philosophic compendium in a phrase, is, like all such phrases, in danger of becoming hackneyed as a phrase without its deep and true meaning being apprehended. Indeed, the very carelessness with which it can be thrown about in hasty reviewing and in club corner scrap-bag talk, is enough to debar its true ring of spiritual truth from debasing the common currency. We have just exemplified with what a fine relevancy it can be married to an irrelevancy.

But to return. It is certain that, from the poetic standpoint, the very commonplace of criticism is that our modern life is lacking in color, is destitute of contrast and variety, is desperately drab, is irritatingly ugly and is so hideously probable. We have almost robbed Death itself of its holy and beautiful mystery, its grandeur and dignity, its solemn and divine reminders and promptings, thronging thick and fast into heart and brain at its very name, by making it the daily theme and vulgar commodity of our unclean and malodorous newspapers. In the bloodiest eras of antiquity and of the mediæval ages, when fire and sword, pillage and violence and rapine were so common, life itself was cheap enough, but death was the grand mystery; and bloodthirsty, gory heroes would no more gibe at the dead than, in their revels, they would toast their gods as they would a wanton. In all their rudeness there was enough of superstition to keep them from becoming unqualified brutes.

In our age superstition, except in political affairs and literature, has largely disappeared, and with it many wholesome restraints. There is now no respect for heroes, alive or dead; and life is certainly held as cheap as ever. Who cares how many poor serfs perish every winter of cold and hunger because good Mr. Dives has shut down his mills and has gone to bring his daughter out in London society? And as for the mystery of death, is it not only the opportunity of the jackals and vultures of the Press to emerge from their holes to gorge themselves and make unclean noises? At every street corner poor pigmy dealers in blood and woe and every sort of moral grime rustle their enticing wares under our eyes, and with chill penury in their poor, hungry, hoarse and earnest voices, they tempt us with their foul odors and scraps of ghoulish bait. We say we cannot live without the news. We devour every scrap of horror to sate our contempt of our kind; and then we subscribe to send missionaries to the Cannibal Islands ! It is indeed terribly fitting that such histories of horror should have such poor tragic little brokers to hawk them in our streets. Another age saw the slaughter of the Innocents. It has been reserved for this Christian time, and the civilization of this Western world, so prolific of fine charities in bricks and stones, to publicly abandon the Innocents to the Devil, to pipe his wares at all hours of the day and night, in the most tragical and villainous of childish trebles that ever ears and hearts listened to.

Our modern life is indeed horribly probable, and realistic enough to satisfy the most desperate and perverted glutton of facts. In America especially, Gradgrind is the undisputed Titan of the hour. After centuries of labor he is thrown out of the womb of old Time as the finished product of civilization, and he makes God's world a great hell in which the naked spin to clothe the drones, and the starvelings slave to feed the sated. It may shock a great many serious-minded, severe, and comfortable good souls, but I suspect the Devil emulates them in their lively passion for facts !

But still I cannot quite bring myself to subscribe, without some mental reservation, to this altogether sceptical view of the poetic materials afforded by even the ugliness of our modern life; for I think there is often some serious defect in our vision and in our sympathies. The stuff upon the "roaring loom of Time" can never, we must dare assert, become wholly uninteresting or wholly drab in any generation; and then, too, the tragedy of drab is not, we may be quite positive, as yet at all fully understood. So I think our criticism is more rational, even confining ourselves to the immediate aspect of the matter, and not taking the whole purview of the nature and elements of literature, when we look for the causes of any passing eclipse of poetry, in those harsh circumstances and arbitrary conditions of social and governmental systems, which create false ideals, subdue and obscure the beauty and sublimity of human life and nature, and shackle and poison the imagination. Only a very strong, great and original spirit can endure outlawry; and with the strongest, the only safeguard against self-sacrifice often is that some idiosyncrasy of temperament cheats intention, and makes conformity physically impossible, even in those moments when the moral force is fretted away, and the will itself condemns resolution as rash egoism. And in our day and generation, as in others before it, a great poet must perforce live as an outcast, a wretched villifier of the high and sublime smugness and complacency of Philistinism.

The trouble with many of our poets seems to be that they are too much dependent upon our beguiling, marring sympathy; they are much too cognizant and commiserate of our spiritual deficiencies. A great poet must write as if his generation was a race of archangels—which Heaven knows no race of men has ever been! But that is the standard. Our poets—the majority of those who have broken cover—know our small ken only too well. They drink tea with us and read “poems of occasion” at political dinners and church sociables. They have altogether too much consanguinity with us. They live too near us out of the spirit, and to our small preoccupations, to see the spectacle of human life in our day (the old, old phantasmagoria,) in its true proportions, and so, while they are well fitted to serve us, as they do with more or less pertinence and diffidence, in the capacity of optimistic clowns or Job's comforters, they cannot put new color and spiritual grace into our busily barren lives.

But although this commends itself to my imagination as a seeming philosophic view of the matter, we must not wantonly weaken the truth in a general opinion, or we may forfeit a wholesome and large view (which may quicken reformative influences), to dodge around noisome alley-ways after shadows—shadows which prove only too often to be the shadows of corpses. The spirit of toleration is, of course, desirable; but while it may touch charity, it must stop short of its precipitate and undignified exaggerations, or all imagination is dissipated in the endeavor to prove its existence in all manner of small parcels of bald fact. Then the mind loses that elasticity, which in the rebound makes any and every moral hope possible. Promiscuous charity in intellectual affairs, as promiscuous love in the affairs of the heart, makes us poor indeed without enriching a single soul; it leaves us bankrupt in enthusiasm and in friends. Carried to this excess, swept away from our moorings in this timorous passion for exactitude, our liberalism too often becomes mere latitude, our cherished facts mere fantasy, and our good nature and patience simply indifference. If one is ambitious to live and die without a single friend, one should turn away from one's familiar friends to court all the world's favorites. There are so many good people so "broad" that they are too broad for tolerance, and too narrow to experience a holy human indignation. For these, right and wrong lose their geography—every thing is a happy chaos; and, comfortably sitting upon the brink, they placidly fold their hands over it all, having parcelled out their difficulties among the different clubs and societies which are organized to dispose of such things—and tea.

And yet it would be a waste of charity to let it stand here, that these worthy folk in devising a common conscience for their individual apathies, are content to deprive themselves of all interest in that which may happen to lie beyond the range of their sympathies and understanding; for, on the contrary, with "rubbing the poor itch of their opinion" they do "make themselves scabs."

It is therefore simply a desire to prove how I shrink from these treacherous dallings of sympathy, to establish the fact of my orthodoxy (in spite of this catholic and dubious discursiveness), which leads me to declare there is sufficient truth in this general indictment of the ignoble strife of our perpetual market-day civilization, the evidence so far satisfies my scruples of conscience, and so strongly supports the conclusion of drab, that if I were upon the Bench to find a verdict, without the dull wits of a jury to stop the course of justice, to hang or acquit my generation of villainous commonplaceness, I am sorely afraid my generation would hang.

But it would be difficult indeed to find a jury of good and reputable, or even disreputable, citizens with enough appreciation of poetic justice among them to consider the evidence and arguments in this weighty matter in the necessary spirit of proxy humility. I am afraid the counsel for the prosecution would have to challenge every mother's son who might be summoned. We may be quite sure that proper humility would be out of the question with our poor human nature. Possibly twelve members of the Suicide Club could be found to bring enough philosophy to bear upon the matter to serve as jurymen; but even in such fortune we could scarcely hope to elude the vile and detestable prejudices of the defence. Commonplace people, whatever may be their virtues—and they sometimes possess an uncomfortable quantity of them, although seldom much variety—are not usually endowed with even the most embryonic humility; and they always regard people with ideals, who suffer in the constant collision with ugliness, which usually rides over them rough-shod, as pitifully airy creatures. On the other hand, those who have some sense of beauty and the relative values of the things of life and are possessed by a desire of some ideal fulfillment in life of their o'er fond dreaming, not only carry the burden of their own tragedy, but they make themselves miserable over the tragic show of the commonplace in the everyday world,—in which by the way, presumably to cure them of such misanthropic humors, they are often cast for motley. One would like to prescribe a course of Plato to the Furies—but they are doubtless too busy to get any philosophy, and so we have no refuge from their wicked whimsies. The idealists are doubtless right in regarding the commonplace as tragic. It is; but it is dismally ludicrous also.

This gravity is the gravest error of judgment of the idealists, for, since human society is constituted as it is, with its heels in the air, our only possible serenity in life is in our point of view; and to be happy in this world, whose beauty is marred by the ugly ideas it contains, one must learn to regard the ugly as ludicrous. Herein lies the one compensation for those whose vision and morals are not hopelessly tangled.

It must be admitted, however, that this is a sort of stoicism for which Nature does not fit all whom she intends for high purposes. A too vivid perception of the ludicrous is often, in times of distress, a lure to that entire philosophic resignation which easily becomes apathy; and so Dame Nature denies a sense of humor to many fine and noble spirits. And, it must be confessed, that it is hard to make a gibe of a life of moral crucifixion; and when this Mark Tapleyan temperament is lacking, it is impossible to laugh content into ears that sorrow has dulled to all such jocund Jesuitry.

I think in this dropsical prolegomenon, I have at least shown that it is by no means easy to make-believe, when we are quite grown up, in this materialistic time. We ought therefore to be exceeding grateful to any persons who are courageous enough to cherish some utterly unpractical ideals, to dream some beautiful, tender dreams, and to find in the ribald irreverence and incredulousness of the most hopelessly contemporary of their contemporaries, but a fresh impulse to a martyrdom of consoling reflections. Any persons who dare to put a bit of color into our desperately "practical," "utility" lives should obtain our respect, since we are most of us afraid to cut any capers of our own; although it must be said, with entire relevance, that the volume of original sin in the world has certainly not diminished, and we stumble through the decalogue quite as often as did our forefathers in a larger day.

And perhaps, after all, we are not so grim as our occupations and our transgressions would seem to suggest. There are perhaps many of us who would gladly caper a little now and then, but we are disconcerted to find upon the hazard that, while one talent may be sufficient to cut a very respectable figure in the world in any serious calling, for exquisite fooling a man can have all the talents given to mortals, — and then fail.

It would, of course, be invidious to put into cold print the cause of such failures: and the good people who are rash enough to leave their native atmosphere and creep for awhile into this bleakness, have usually too much mercy upon themselves to carry their accidental discoveries to disagreeable conclusions.

But, although all our wonderment is expected nowadays to spin round the big driving wheels of gigantic machinery, there are still some poor benighted souls in the world in whose minds the buzz and whir of all this wonderful machinery awakens no reverential mood, to whom it is buzz and whir and no more, and who shamelessly cling to unprofitable and antiquated ideals merely to understand certain mad poets and other thinking riff-raff. "Poor, pathetic creatures!" we may say of such men, with our fine practicality, our good common-sense interest in dividends, and our touchingly pathetic belief in an impending millennium of dynamos and driving wheels, when all the world will make holiday and none will lack bread for lack of work.

Since, however, none who draw fat dividends care a stiver for this millennium, let us reconsider the moral condition of these perverted dreamers, who are so unfortunate as to be out of sympathy with the social dogmas of their day. When we have had pleasant dreams it is always something of a shock to awake to reality. But what if we could wake into a world of dreams as real? This, of course, is a privilege accorded to few. But these poor, pitiable, deluded wretches at any rate cherish the most delicious of mocking dreams, that are far more satisfactory than those exaggerated professions which bind them together, and by which they are judged of men; and they meet in the flesh and talk of a fine fantastical world, which never was, and never will be, possible in this world, and they read beautiful and whimsical books—and sometimes write them! We should therefore occasionally permit ourselves to taste the joys of a reckless immoral magnanimity, and thank Heaven that the monotonous drab of our day is relieved here and there with a few patches of such fine old glowing revolutionary Toryism—for it is the Tory who is the revolutionary in our society.

This is precisely the admirable and delightful utility of the Jacobites, who, perhaps largely on account of the wholly unpractical and sentimental character of the society, are in force in this picturesque old Puritan city of Boston.

II.

THE Jacobite society exists in Boston as the actual embodiment in the intellectual life of the city of certain social and æsthetic ideas, which are so preposterously antiquated and impossible in this age as to cause an inquiring mind to hesitate before putting them aside as familiar and worthless, or merely curious. They are so antiquated as to suggest the shadow of the “latest” fashion, and they are so evidently exaggerated as to arouse a suspicion of smuggling. It is one of the interesting and remarkable contradictions of the human mind, that, while it most often uses the appearance of ingenuousness and sincerity to achieve selfish ends, it sometimes uses the garb of avowed insincerity to conceal some prohibited and banned sincere and honest, noble thought and purpose.

One should remember Shakespeare's fools and study well the judgments of motley. Perchance in their uncurbed, fantastical similitudes, we may stumble upon motley where before we saw but sober justice; discover mere players' passion where we thought was a Man voicing the tragedy of the world, and, this is most common, find only a pinchbeck mask of gravity where we thought was wisdom and philosophy. This habit of cautious curiosity is one of the advantages to be derived from some desultory reading. Every lover of books has learned to know that the moonlight dreams of one age have become the veriest commonplaces of another. There is a good family of perfectly sane ideas in the silent world of books that are obscured for the reader of violent prejudice in the intentional grotesqueness and exaggeration in which they have been enveloped, so that they might steal into the world, and, in a twinkling, snatch the festal robes and ceremonies from the bodies of old delusions without immediate detection. Such violation is often discovered by a few discerning ones the moment it is committed. But the force of the ridiculous is both so strong and so subtle, that even gravity sometimes forgives sacrilege in the guise of motley; and absolves its tender public conscience at the instigation of its imputative private ditto, with the consoling reflection, that there is already almost enough wisdom between covers in the libraries to cure half the world's ills, but none of it will ever get into the heads of the masses. The worldly wise in the quick in every generation will see to it that the masses do not neglect their own magic piping for the unbending wisdom of the sages. This is the reason why the most passionate poet of the right finds his warmest adherents and closest students among those who have a vested interest in wrong. They have, from the force of contrast, an intense intellectual curiosity about that which their interest forbids them to know through experience; and so, paradoxically, the greatest poets and thinkers, who naturally take the broadest and sanest views of life, appeal most strongly to the few, who would suffer material loss if their enthusiasm for the right ever struggled out of the region of intellectual abstraction. In this matter of the philosophy of misery we all have an intense scorn of empiricists and show an unconquerable attachment to transcendentalism. The multitude, by the same law of the attraction of opposites, have an absorbing interest in the glitter and glamour of supercilious injustice and wrong; and their poets are aliens among them.

As I suspected upon my first acquaintance with the Jacobite society, the organic idea of the constitution and by-laws is the least significant thing about the movement. It is perhaps the one question under heaven most infrequently discussed at the meetings of the society. The constitution serves the admirable purpose, not wholly foreign to other weighty societies, of bringing the members together at regular intervals to discuss matters more or less irrelevant to the objects of the league. Indeed, one of the most delightful circumstances of membership in this society, is, that one is never under any sort of obligation to say anything at all relevant to the avowed purposes of the constitution.

But on the other hand, the Jacobite society in Boston is only properly understood when one allows proper significance to its perfectly irrelevant interests, and accepts the constitution as mere literature. Just as about all the actual democracy in the United States was squeezed once for all into the magnificent periods of Jefferson's famous declaration, so all the principles of the Jacobite league are mirrored in its constitution—where they are beautiful and innocuous. This constitution, by the way, is not sufficiently esteemed by the Jacobites themselves. It is as stuffed full of plums as a haggis. It is quite as sober as Punch, but it is filled with the tenable contradictions of all possible ideas, and is so deliciously ridiculous in its gravity. I have always been curious to learn who inspired this document, for it is the work of many hands; but the mystery, like that of the authorship of the beautiful English of the Book of Common Prayer, is unsolvable.

It is, of course, as well that this mystery should exist. For the testament of any great movement should not be traceable to any one author, so that envious criticism and bigotry can lay violent hands upon an individual and so gibbet with its author both gospel and gossellers.

Unsuspected, or almost unsuspected, Jacobites, are to be found in all the ramifications of our society. It may be they exist in other cities on this side of the Atlantic, but I doubt if Jacobitism could find so congenial an atmosphere in any other American city as it finds in Boston. The comfortable classes here were just ripe for Jacobitism—or any other fine crusade that was unreal and impossible enough. Its progress in Boston among the fortunates who have leisure enough to think, has been remarkable, and ought to convince the most sceptical. It is hard in this materialistic time to find any refuge for the weary spirit, buffeted at every turn by the highly objectionable gossellers of fact and so-called “progress,” so that the success of the Jacobite movement in Boston is distinctly encouraging to all those optimists, who, in divorcing hope, want enough elbow-room in their own day to make merry and thank the good God. There are plenty of modern gospels which insure martyrdom in a very real and vulgar life of pinching poverty, but this is perhaps the most attractive of all the reform movements, that call forth one's most earnest and serious sympathy, without in the least impinging one's sacred identity in a career of highly respectable wrong-doing. In my own case, I do not mind confessing that my sympathies were never so entirely and unreservedly enlisted in any other cause, however worthy, as they have been in Jacobitism; and the reason is, doubtless, that its promoters acknowledge that it is absolutely chimerical.

But the Jacobites have the courage of their convictions, both moral and immoral, and they are not timorous in the expression of their ideas. They do not care for that great bugaboo of democracy, Public Opinion, and they dare to rail openly upon the ugliness of our civilization and progress. Therefore to veil private spleen I am a good Jacobite. It is eminently enjoyable to dignify private distresses into public catastrophes.

It is not every idealistic propaganda in this ugly and materialistic time, which is sufficiently impossible to tempt the discerning and discreet into martyrdom. One has to be careful to make proper investigation into these various reform movements before one embarks; even when they have doctors of divinity on the committees. And, by the way, doctors of divinity are usually so desperately afraid of being suspected of even the least tiptoeing on the solid earth, that one almost suspects they are more fearful of their deacons than they are of their consciences or their divinity. But D. D.'s are so often D. F.'s that one has to be cautious, even in following them, if one would enjoy the pleasures of martyrdom without incurring any of its penalties.

There are so many reforms, which are like the evils for which they are prescribed as antidotes, like in one fatal circumstance — they are but too possible, too obvious. These are the movements a wise man will shun; they involve a loss of social prestige, and an infinitude of sacrifices and embarrassments. They are not sufficiently remote to satisfy the really fine spirit, that is naturally ambitious of a martyrdom of opinion, but also shrinks from the idea of any vulgar collision with distressing facts, whose only remedy in the large tolerant Christian mind is forgetfulness.

Now here is a really excellent and tenable argument, quite by the way, for it has only just occurred to me, for the paunchy and frothy comfortable ones in our pulpits. The cure for love, it is the wisdom of all ages and sages, is love, and when that is not to be encompassed, forgetfulness. And therefore if one is so unfortunate as to feel a preposterous concern in the woes and miseries of humanity at large, if one loves one's neighbor as one's self, the proper cure is, logically enough, forgetfulness. It needs no argument to prove, to even the most illiberal mind, that it is impossible to forget one's self; and since to carry the woes of others is but to add a new misery to the burden of misery already existing in the world, and since it is perfectly possible to put one's neighbors' woes out of one's mind, it is the duty of every man who has the happiness of mankind at heart, to diminish unnecessary misery by forgetting his neighbors' troubles as quickly as they arise. This habit once formed, one soon attains perfection, and in a very little while ceases to be cognizant of the existence of any evils, except those that cross one's own threshold. This is perhaps the only thing in which perfection is granted to poor human endeavor; but precept and practice need never be divorced in this code of morality.

I rather think that this bit of logic solves one of the prime difficulties of the disparity between the Christian credo and Christian conduct to a nicety; and moreover, with an éclat of morality, which, I regret to say, is too often sadly lacking in the apologies of many ecclesiastics of most exalted station. I sometimes sigh when I think what a fine mystical theologian was lost to the world when I was dragged down by my necessities into the noisome obscurity of literary brigandage.

But if we admit every happy thought, our budget will become too bulky.

The prosperity which has attended the Jacobite movement, shows beyond all dispute that the magic of the old name has not entirely departed. There are hundreds of good comfortable souls, brought up in a strictly Puritanical moral atmosphere (a euphemism for the most incurable sort of immorality, by the way), to regard the very word "reform" as a dangerous plague spot in the lexicon, who have rushed incontinently into this revolutionary propaganda of obscurantism, without the least comprehension of its incidental reactionary purposes — which happen to be the only ones that the leaders of the movement are ever suspected of being at all soberly interested in.

It may appear incredible but I am assured by some of the Jacobite leaders, men very high in office, that not only are there serious men in the society, but there are actually serious Jacobites. It is all very well to be a mild Jacobin in our plutocratic society, although one must be more careful in declaring Jacobinism, than one need to be in avowing Jacobitism; but a sober, serious Jacobite is a sorry spectacle, for the Jacobites are indeed belated. Of course, in a certain way, the Jacobites here are really Jacobins, but, from inherited prejudices, they abhor and despise the label; and it certainly is involved in odious traditions about which time can throw no kindly glamour. But the Jacobins can be taken quite soberly when discovered, for despite their evil traditions, they comprise today the thinking, submerged minority that is disloyal to the superstitions of both monarchy and democracy, in order to be loyal to truth, to posterity, and to God.

I have only seen one serious Jacobite, and he almost caused my sentimental gravity to collapse. There are certain precautions necessary to the preservation of this gravity (and of course politeness is one of the cardinal virtues in Jacobite society, as it should be everywhere), which are absolutely essential to obtaining the quintessence of ludicrousness out of the delightful debates in Jacobite gatherings.

It is easy to understand that one cannot get all the humor out of any situation, when one chills the sobriety of the actors with inopportune, or too opportune, wintry jesting. I cannot describe all the necessary precautions here, since I intend to confine myself principally to the more important, incidental interests of Jacobitism—which shows what an incurably serious minded person I am, in spite of my hypocrisy of Jacobitish sympathies. A truly frivolous-minded writer would concern himself wholly with the fundamental principles of the movement. But I may mention one circumstance. I am writing this paper in broad daylight, in one of the back rooms of a city boarding-house, and the windows look out upon a dreary vista of city yards, and back windows, and murky clean clothes, and ash barrels, ragged children, and forlorn, peripatetic cats, and old "clo'" and bottle merchants—a desperately dreary, untidy and uncompromisingly realistic world. I cannot see all this at present, but I have seen it from a hundred back windows, and the mention of it makes my pen pause in mid-air, for the unmitigable ugliness of it all is borne in upon my mind; and that is fatal to gravity, though not to sorrow and heart-aches. Outside, too, I know, is the sunshine and the blue vault of heaven, flecked with golden clouds; but these only intensify those realistic and democratic back yards, and so the shutters are drawn and closed tight, the thick winter curtains make a solemn midnight of the day, and tall, spectral candles throw an uncertain, fantastic light, in which I can gravely believe in almost any fantasy, even in divine rights, even in humanity, and the provable existence of the Golden Rule.

The small heresies of discretion are the traitors to every great cause, and they proclaim the mere merchant in the soldier, the priest, poet or philosopher; for, unfortunately, this is a world in which everything is taken to market, even thought. But man, possibly because he is the only created being capable of laughter, is violently in love with the judicial character. A man cannot be a hero in either action or thought who is fearful of laughter. It is easy to defy the wrath of the wise, and thrive upon opposition, but the laughter of fools has destroyed sages and heroes. A man who shows himself impervious to popular opinion and cat-calls is at least worthy of our respect. The Jacobites are not, therefore, to be put too lightly aside, for they are possessed of that robust self-sufficiency which can repay laughter with laughter. Hence the necessity of a man's earnestly believing in his hobby, if he would enjoy life and play his part with dignity in an isolation of his own high approbation.

And, thank Heaven! there is nothing too impossible and fantastic, but that someone can find a belief in it the one satisfaction of life. It must indeed be a desperately possible crusade for which an earnest, persistent prophet cannot find good, trusty henchmen. But to seek proselytes for a perfectly hopeless cause is the delightfulest occupation of gravity. To be hailed everywhere as an apostle of paradox, the revealer of impossible truths, whose audacity is quite innocent, because too hopelessly divorced from convincing platitudes (the very bed-and-board realities of all great political games), is to pass one's days in a delicious dream of martyrdom.

I have been all my life long too fatally apt to discern the fact, that no parties are all good or all bad, to be able to expect much preferment or pudding or gratitude at the hands of any partisans; and I am troubled with an uneasy consciousness of the probability of an impeachment at the bar at the next meeting of the Jacobite league, for the small indiscretions of discretion I have committed in this paper. It goes hard with any man in this world who pleads the cause of the opposition in whatever camp he may be ; but to arrive at even proximate truth this is precisely what a man of integrity must do. Most men fall so easily into parties, because there is a popular superstition, that, while corporations have no souls, there is a sort of aggregate conscience in parties ; and this, with the support of the popular suffrage behind it, by a process of metaphysics I cannot pretend to follow, absolves the individual conscience for the abandonment of the trouble of examination and continual vigilance, and the worry of decisions. It is this indolence, which makes parties practicable, by creating a popular opinion that may, with some sort of security, be relied upon. If all men weighed every question and thought for themselves, all parties would serve but their temporary purposes, and then become dissipated into new combinations of opinion. But as no two prophets think alike, parties have their usefulness.

There are men, and unfortunately I am one of them, on the other hand, who never attain to any of the dignities of life, because they cannot keep their hands off the dignitaries. It may be scarcely credited by those of my readers who have so often seen me play the ghost of poor Yorick, but I have been all my life long a Puritan—a Puritan in love with Jacobite ideals and with uncorrupted, philosophical Jacobinism; and, as may be imagined, in a devil of a quandary, with my conscience first in one camp and then in the other, and my cause without a friend in either. However, if I have not had that advancement and emolument that lies along the path of orthodoxy, I have had, in a career of transformations, almost as many lives as a cat—and that is some compensation!

If I have written with some freedom of the relative importance of the principles of Jacobitism, I have done so because to exaggerate their importance would be to diminish the beneficial influences of the active concerns of the Jacobites in the region of art and literature, and in the encouragement of the toleration of tolerance. Causes which have only certain invisible ends to serve, and not facts to reveal, are best served by partisan hirelings, who will only see one side of a fence, unless they hear of bigger pay on the other side, and then they will crawl under. But, fortunately, the Jacobite cause is sufficiently impossible to allow of one playing the traitor without treason, and bribery and corruption is luckily out of the question. Of course, if there was the ghost of a chance of a Jacobite revolt and restoration, and the prospect of a seat upon the woolsack in return for my valuable missionary services, I should not perhaps be quite so prepared to don and doff respect and allegiance upon the reading of every other clause in the constitution, simply to preserve the judicial character and the approbation of my own conscience.

But with the unpolitical Jacobin portion of the programme, respecting the introduction into this country of intellectual and moral freedom in the shaping of the arts, so completely dominated in our day by alien influences, I am in entire and earnest sober sympathy. The vulgarization of literature as merchandise, made to tickle fools, is complete in our day. It certainly encourages the good gens gris of letters, who sell words as they would playing cards, and whose opinions (unlike the cards, which do teach the prosperous certain lessons in the even-handedness of Chance) take the color of every bidder's gold; but it outlaws all thinkers, who recognize the sanctity of words. We must be far gone indeed in this barbarism of supply and demand, when men, and men who have had every advantage of education, of communion with the greatest minds of all times in their collegiate course, with a knowledge of the mystic grandeur surrounding the creation and evolution of human language, can talk glibly, and smile, of selling mere words. There are no such things as mere words,—except in the dictionaries. Once marshal words in any array and they are good or evil existences. Thoughts and words are sacred things. Those of us who have been born in the outer darkness of poverty, who have had to struggle upward under bitter burdens to gain the mouth of the pit, before we could begin to climb to the height where we could understand the thoughts of the world's great men, who have had to buy with sweat and blood the right to think our own thoughts, and find our own souls, know there are no mere words! This is largely the bane of good, prosperous mediocrity, which inherits its ideas of the uses of knowledge in the same way that it does its houses and lands and furniture, and in colleges and in society it finds that the teachings of the wise are not considered realities, but only intellectual exercises, bundles of beautiful words, footballs, to kick about for sport, matters entirely irrelevant in the actual world. With men bred in this thick atmosphere our contemporary literature is filled. It is astonishing we should have so many Universities in America and so few real men, so little real literature, so little real knowledge of the true nature and offices of knowledge. Wherever—let us out with this bit of sober heresy!—wherever there is a true man that stands up before all the world and proclaims the absolute reality and grandeur of thought, there is a university whose degrees are worth winning.

I join heart and soul in all the vigorous protests of Jacobitism against the odious moral slavery of our cramped, smug, vulgar, ludicrous nursery art. With this heretical nonsense about the necessity, for gradual educative purposes (sic!), of dragging all thought down to the vacuous pruriency of the vulgar, completely dominant in our art and in our criticism, with our art ever crawling on all fours to carry the heaven-sent middleman on its back, and to make sport for Dives' too corruptible babes and maids, we must thank God for the advent of Jacobitism. How are these babes and maids ever to learn to put away childish things and understand the real world about them with such instruction?

It seems a little hard to an audacious imagination, that a literature for grown-up men and women should not be permitted in our noble, flexible, virile English tongue, so equipped for all the purposes of great Titanic imaginings. Why, since youth is such a fleeting period, and life really begins with the passions of maturity, why should there be no literature in our time for the mature? We have to hie back to our English classics to touch the thoughts of men. To read one's contemporaries in the department of imaginative literature, in this country at least, is almost tantamount to sentencing one's mind to a lifetime of the sucking-bottle. Mrs. Grundy reigns supreme in America, and many fine imaginations she whips into poor popular drivellers. But the Muse is sometimes unconjugal, and kicks over the traces—and then we get the Jacobites in art, the jovial outlaws, who outlaw the whole critical Bench, and delight all the sweet chicks under Mrs. Grundy's wing. Their primal consciousness of art does not begin with the catechism and the social decalogue. The only superstitions they allow as valid are those of art. In so far as Jacobitism is educative in this direction, I hope I may never be found compounding with the Philistines, even for a bishopric.

III.

To all those hideously practical folk who may object that these things do not constitute any tangible aim and purpose for an association of men, I beg leave to say, that the Jacobites are educating the miserable progeny of poor Plutus, born under a stifling cloud of gold-dust, to be something more than merely rich, to be interested in something finer and nobler and more real than the mere breeding of money, and they have put some color into the monotonous drab of our buying and selling society. That is something. It is, at any rate, as good a reason for any human association as that of many solemn societies, in which men meet to exchange toasts and make vapid speeches about trade, progress, political morality, and other abstractions, with nothing improbable about the whole affair, except perhaps intoxication. Our age has grown so decorous over its wine that even its Joe Millers are imbued with a bit of cant. We pass all our days under the ban of respectability, and while it is held to be iniquitous to express an original idea, it is infamous and eccentric to imitate the wise. But to dissent from the opinions of high authority and gravity, which are not kin to the wise, is to invite social ostracism. It is easy to win the golden opinions of the elect, if one will only combine with the judicial character that fine optimism that jostles humanity, pity, and justice out of court. It is the penalty of mere success in a democracy that it is only to be attained through the imitation of solemn fools and poseurs. The ideals of a supply and demand democracy can never rise above the flood-tide of respectability.

I am under bonds not to reveal the place of meeting where we toast Prince Charlie "over the sea." In the present edition of the interesting Stuart family, to be strictly accurate, it is Prince Robert of Bavaria. At these Jacobite meetings, it is interesting to note we drink in the good old Jacobite exile fashion — across, and not out of, the water bottle; and I think this would please even such a stout Hanoverian as old Dr. Johnson himself, with his fine Homeric declaration for tipping: “Claret for boys, port for men, and brandy for Heroes” — and his beautiful allegiance to Bohea! If you are old-fashioned enough in your ideas to enjoy a rollicking good time, without the formalities of the ordinary dinner party, but with certain modern æsthetic exaggerations and modifications, I should enjoin Jacobitism.

I have always been somewhat deficient in history, and have been a Jacobite rather from moral conviction than evidence, as I have been a Puritan more from evidence than conviction, so that when I sat down to write this paper I found I had not sufficient historical data, and writing away from books, I was obliged to have recourse to my good friend Napier McDougall, the laird of Highdudgeon Peak, one of the most prominent and most picturesque of the Jacobite leaders in Boston, for a precise exposition of the political principles and hopes of Jacobitism. This, of course, was very bitter; but it saved much laborious reading and time, and also obviated all danger of my drifting into wild conjectures; and I am an authority upon the historical aspects of Jacobitism from this day forth. About all I actually knew of the hopes and standing of the cause in these latter days, I am free to confess, was that the old Pretender was as dead as Queen Anne.

According to the views of my friend, however, the sympathies of the American colonies were largely with the House of Stuart from the beginning of the Parliamentary struggle in England, and the principles of the Parliamentarians never did have any strong hold upon the imaginations of the exiles for conscience' sake on this side of the Atlantic. In support of this view there is the fact that the first charter of the Massachusetts Bay Colony was issued under the hand and seal of Charles I. That is strong enough logic for any good sentimental Jacobite.

The Jacobites believe that history has been largely wrongly written; and it is scarcely necessary to believe in Jacobitism to quite concur in this view. What Oscar Wilde says of "Debrett's Peerage," we can say of half the English histories—that they are "the best things in fiction the English have ever done."

There is the American Revolution, of course—but the Jacobites find no difficulty in dealing with this matter. With a largeness of view, which it would be a good thing for most self-satisfied democrats and others, even enthusiastic moral Jacobins, to emulate in this and other matters, they declare it is perfectly possible for an American to believe in the principles of the Revolution, and to believe in them ardently, and yet at the same time uphold the ideals of Jacobitism. The war was not against England, but against the vile Hanoverian who occupied the throne of England, and it was because of his oppressions that the outraged colonists revolted. They had no ill-feeling against the Crown as an institution, or against monarchy as a system of Government; and there is a tradition, which the Jacobites acknowledge as a tradition, but are naturally loth to part with, that after the Declaration of Independence, there was a movement on foot among the leaders and substantial men of the victorious revolutionaries to invite the Chevalier de St. George, commonly known as the "Old Pretender," to take the throne in America. But the Prince was old and broken down, and the project fell through.

And there is another more or less authenticated story, which the Jacobites do not forget to recite in this connection, to the effect that the crown was then offered to George Washington, who, as is well known, declined the honor. The Jacobites claim that Washington, realizing he had no divine right to the regal character, put aside the ambition of his friends, because he feared the embroilments of factions and rivalries and violence such as rent Rome under the Cæsars.

The more moderate of the Jacobites, who have an ambition to make their sentimental diversion serve some useful purpose in the dignifying of popular opinion and taste, content themselves with pointing out that the master minds of the Revolution, Washington, the Adamses, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, and the rest, all belonged to the aristocracy of intellect and fine spirit; and none could be more shocked than they if they were to return to earth and witness the vulgar excesses and the depravity of modern plutocracy, in politics, in journalism and in literature. They none of them believed in the whims of the lowest being gratified at the cost and sacrifice of the interests of the highest. Napier McDougall, the laird of Highdudgeon, believes that even Sam Adams, the most democratic of them all, would rather have paid the tax on tea and said no more about it, if the alternative had been presented of his days being prolonged to our time with the necessity of reading the enormities of our Sunday newspapers. As for Dr. Franklin and Alexander Hamilton, those two splendid figures in history, who raised dignity to a fine art, we certainly cannot doubt for a moment what would be their opinion of the prostitution of the printing-press and the labors and thoughts of the study in the interests of plutocracy to exploit the poor, benighted hoodlums of the democracy.

The Revolution was not undertaken by the fathers of the Republic to establish a democracy of darkness, but to remedy certain outrages that infringed on the dignity of the commonwealth. Unfortunately it is much easier to overthrow a monarchy or an autocracy than it is to render a democracy tolerable to pass one's life in.

But to show that we are not incapable of seeing both sides of a question, let us anticipate the criticism of the regnant powers, and quote the snort of unshakable respectabilism—“That is all mere fustian!” But, ah! the irony of Time's revenges, to think that Toryism and Sansculottism should so change places, that Toryism should have to storm in impotence against the iron rule of its old contempt!

In the abstract, the Jacobite idea of government is based upon the idea that the power of kingship comes from above and not from the consent of the governed. This is in the Jacobite constitution. The sentimental gravity I maintain, when I hear it read in solemn convocation, is, I am convinced, excellent discipline for me. The Jacobites think that the Stuarts are the best representatives of the old idea of kingship, as opposed to what they call the debased and circumscribed kingship of the Hanoverians; and they sincerely sympathize with the unfortunate condition which has obtained in English politics, through the too great predominance of representative government, whereby the country sustains a loss of continuity and stability of legislation, and is tossed continually from conservatism to radicalism.

There are two Jacobite organizations in London, and although the revival of the movement in England only dates back a few years, its progress has been remarkable. One society is the Order of the White Rose, and the other is the Legitimist Jacobite League, of which the Marquis de Ruvigny is the President. The Marquis was in Boston a year or two ago, and it was largely due to his enthusiasm for the old cause that the Jacobite League was organized in America. My friend the laird of Highdudgeon is the head and front of the League in Boston.

The English Jacobite societies include members of some of the most aristocratic families in the kingdom. As might be expected, Scotch and Irish names predominate. The movement has also attracted many men of distinction in all the learned professions, who are naturally quick to perceive the charms of fantasy, since they thrive upon other people's illusions. There are thousands of men in all walks of life in the membership of these two societies, and they are both in communication with the head of the House of Stuart, which is at present represented in the person of Maria Theresa Henrietta of Bavaria, whose son Robert will, upon the death of his brother, the mad king of Bavaria, become King of Bavaria and informally King Robert the First of England, Ireland and Normandy.

It is whispered among Jacobites in Boston, and I repeat the rumor, because we owe so many of our agreeable delusions to Dame Rumor, the dear, wicked old woman, that the Jacobite movement has already attracted attention in the British House of Commons.

The Jacobites in America have no political aspirations. They are content to be a social rather than a political body, for this insures a continuance of both gravity and fantasy. Of course, they have their ideas about the political machinery of our time; but though their political ideas are revolutionary and reactionary, no good democrat need lie awake fearing to be murdered in his bed on account of them. It is unnecessary to state that whatever perturbations the shadow of Jacobitism may have caused at Westminster, the Jacobite representation in Congress is not causing the political factions in Washington much anxiety at present.

It is believed among the English radicals that the House of Lords is a hotbed of Jacobitism. But in Great Britain, especially among the more fiery-blooded Irish, who from time immemorial have fought for, and believed in, every impossible cause, there is perhaps more faith in political miracles than there is among the Jacobites we know. These ardent spirits, who are the least tempered by philosophical Jacobinism, and are spoiling for a cracking of crowns, are comforted with the belief that the present deplorable state of affairs in England, a wicked dominant Parliament and a subservient Crown, will find its logical conclusion in anarchy, chaos and old night. And then—Prince

Robert of Bavaria will be haled from his obscurity!

But in general the Jacobites hug themselves in a martyrdom, which has the great recommendation of exciting curiosity and providing material for good, witty dinner-table talk, without any possible horrible exigency of a Bill being passed to sweep away their occupation by enacting the reform for which they are willing to perish,—but which they never want to live to see perish.

There are very few martyrs of public opinion who can ever hope to be asked out to dine at great houses. The Jacobins never have such good fortune,—at least not those who confine their Jacobinism to the unprofitable, although delightful, advocacy of the Devil in literature. Did any cabinet minister or government ever yet think it worth while to offer a philosophical Jacobin, with an eye on both sides of every question, a good fat magistracy? That is the ruin of many poor devils whose wits seduce them into Jacobinism; they are too philosophical to be in any wise formidable—except to their own party. They are too sincere to amuse the public, and too logical-minded to embarrass the workers in iniquity.

As the Jacobite movement exists today, it is the expression of the sympathy of the dilettante element in society, with certain aspects of the large general social movement away from the creeds and vicious materialism and commercialism of our modern civilization. There is little hope of any restoration to the throne of the Legitimate house in England, and a measure of doubt exists in the minds of some people as to the long-continued occupancy of the House of Brunswick. And so the Jacobite movement on both sides of the Atlantic really stands more for the restoration of some high ideals, and beauty, in art and life, than for anything else.

The Jacobites are, to some extent, Epicureans in philosophy. They are the cynics of idealism, and so, though in advance of the thought of most of their contemporaries in art matters, in America at least, they are only on the threshold of beauty, which is in the inner sanctuary of truth. Their idealism would utterly collapse if the prop of a comfortable and substantial surplus, for the luxuries of rare prints and first editions and wines with a genuine bouquet, were removed. Among them are a few, a very few, choice spirits, who actually stint their stomachs to indulge their passion for the beautiful. But these are mostly the Jacobins, whose Jacobitism is far more dubious than their talents; men who are admitted to Jacobite circles only on that shameful sufferance, which wit and genius, outside the covers of a book, in the poor, vulgar envelope of God, obtain everywhere among the comfortable ones who inherit the earth.

But the Jacobites are certainly unique among the Philistines of our comfortable classes. Outside of the picturesque bacchanals in honor of the House of Stuart, they cling to the pleasures of the mind, and recognize that they are the highest pleasures. No; that is wrong. They recognize these as their highest pleasures. We know that they are only allied to the higher pleasures. They realize that such pleasures must necessarily appeal to the few; but they have become bitten with some of the doctrines of the perverse followers of Epicurus, and do not comprehend the futility and triviality of the pleasures of the mind when wholly unimbued with morality.

The Jacobites have many things in common with the Philistines. They are dreadfully like them in one respect. Although they revolt from the established slavery of opinion, their patronage is dangerous to the arts. In making a fine art of fine folly they come perilously near making a folly of the arts, especially of literature. They, as well as the Philistines, come to love an army of good words, but care not greatly for real thought. I do not sympathize with making thought the sport of the few. It is as fatal to write to please a specific minority as to cozen the masses. The courtier who knows his King and Cardinal becomes their shadows and echoes if he remains a good courtier, but he is afraid to think aloud. It is as evil to think the thoughts, and to echo the prejudices of a class, as it is to try to sink to the intellectual level of the lowest prisoners of circumstance. There is, of course, more catholicity of opinion in highly-cultured minorities, because, cloyed with sweets, they often think more of the manner in which a thought is put than of the thought itself, and the daily game of critical battledore has taught them to regard ideas more as playthings than as realities. They are therefore but amused with heresies that horrify the bourgeoisie.

But nevertheless it is an evil state to play the mere revolutionary for mere revolutionaries. It is only when a haphazard shell from the workshop of some rough, passionate thinker comes hurtling into their midst from out of the noisy turmoil of the outer darkness that the æsthetically minded comfortables learn to perceive the difference between the thought of a man who has all the Epicureans and Euphuists at his fingers' ends and can play the acquiescent, amusing cynic to perfection, and the thought of a man to whom the sanctity of his thought is dearer than liberty or life.

To understand the true nature of thought, and the holy passion in which it is born, it would be well for Jacobites, and others, to turn to the divine fury of Milton's "Areopagitica." The philosophy of the Jacobites, in spite of its fantastic exaggerations and Epicurean complexion, is much more like that of the smug Philistines, whom they despise, than they suspect. Their favorite doctrine of laissez faire is one of the most cherished doctrines of smugocracy. The main difference is that the Jacobite version of the gospel is disseminated in delightfully epigrammatic prose, in beautiful, tantalizing limited editions, printed on stout buckram, with rubricated initials, wide margins and uncut edges; and the other is scattered broadcast in Blue-books, newspapers, and in the choice repositories of family literature.

There is, however, a palpable difference in the intellectual emotions excited by these two literatures; and, in the choice of two immoral, we naturally choose the most curious and amusing. It is this fact which attracts many men to the ranks of Jacobitism, whose occupation does not permit that audacity of opinion, which is born of indifference and a fat exchequer. As a delightful Jacobite said to me one day while we were on a debauch among the thousands and thousands of dusty thoughts in the crypt of the Old South Church, "I dare to say anything audacious and unpalatable, because I always say it so genially, and because I myself so seldom believe in the things I preach."

The Jacobite creed is, to put it briefly, Credo quia impossibile est. But the Jacobites most emphatically disbelieve in any Utopia for all God's poor players. That is an impossibility which has no glamour for the Jacobite imagination. On the contrary, they are apt to clothe blind Chance, the poor harlot of human vanity and greed, in all the high authority of the highest divinity; and they cling to the comfortable belief that injustice, misery, suffering and the ironies of accident, are all divinely appointed to maintain the picturesque, and to minister to the gratification of the elect through the force of contrast. They believe firmly in the elect; and if the play in the world does really mean anything, it seems to support the good old orthodox idea of predestination.

If moral worth consists, as some of the ancient philosophers asserted, in taking pleasure in the intrinsically beautiful, the Jacobites are certainly more moral than some of the moralists who condemn them, for they take pleasure in beauty alone. It is pertinent to inquire in passing, to what baleful star we must impute the fact that most moralists have a fatal trick of making morality hideous. The Jacobites follow the old Pythagoreans in the belief that wisdom is superior to virtue, because virtue is a poor sublunary thing, while wisdom touches that purer, higher, spiritual region, where reason is wrapt in divine intuitions. But then, unfortunately, the wisdom of the Jacobites is almost wholly comprised in that fatal trick of paradox. A man who has a ready mind and a gift of words, once an adept at paradox, gives you all his store of wisdom in a few paradoxes; and then his career of miracle-working begins, and, with admirable and baffling skill, he summons into existence the palpable shadow of nothing. That is his miracle! The virtue of the paradoxical writer is this: he cannot leave behind him a whole library of his own works; such writing necessarily compels infinite polishing and compression. The trouble with Epicurean idealism is that it too fatally suggests the commonplaces of the comfortable life—beefsteaks and beer! There are some facts of life whose too deliberate exclusion but emphasizes their existence. The moral dangers of Jacobitism are shown in that observation in the “Pilgrim’s Scrip”—“Poetry, love and such like, are the drugs earth has to offer to high natures, as she offers low ones debauchery." But we touch in this society a fugacious toleration, or indifference, that, at least, has a curious eye and ear for the charmed lure of thought; and as Meredith says in the same book, "Culture is half way to Heaven!"

Thus, in spite of its high-colored political background, Jacobitism is mainly a literary and artistic propaganda, but it is in no sense a reversion to the literary mode and spirit of the Restoration. The literature of Charles II.'s time was, as our picturesque Jacobite most picturesquely put it, an exaggerated revulsion from Puritan and prurient ideals. The literature of Charles II.'s time shows those excesses which always follow a period of unwise rigidity. But it was a transition time without ideals; and the Jacobite movement in America is essentially a movement for the restoration of ideals in art, and a reversion in literary and artistic expression toward older methods of thought, and that old freedom of philosophical opinion, which belonged to a much earlier day than Jacobitism itself.

Jacobitism is closely in sympathy with the Catholic revival and the renaissance of idealistic painting and literature, which is quite opposed in spirit to the gross literature of the Restoration. All these things and Jacobitism are more or less bound up together in the aims of the new schools of poets, painters and essayists, which include the impressionists, the symbolists, the grotesques and the rest. They most of them find a refuge from the purely materialistic background of their idealism in an exaggerated Euphuism.

The Jacobites do not recognize any affinity in their aims and those of the Jacobin wretches; but the interest of the Jacobins in all this is, that it affords an engine to a body of opinion in favor of moral and intellectual freedom of thought. It is rank heresy, but a good deal of the reality in the Jacobite propaganda is Jacobinism of the modern, moderate, intellectual sort, that abhors the cant of violence very much more than the virtuous respectables, who, indeed, soberly regard the constabulary as the last word of civilization.

“Oh world diseased! Oh race empirical
Where fools are the fathers of every miracle.”

In looking over this budget of heresies, I should quake in my shoes if I did not remember that, luckily, heresies nowadays are the shuttlecocks of five o'clock teas, and for most men such discussions belong wholly to the world of abstractions, and so may pass without comment or contradiction. Even the man who is most wedded to the established, who has found imperturbable consolation in the sage advice of Epictetus, "The best way to be happy in this world is to want everything to happen just as it does happen," greatly enjoys a revolution on paper every morning at breakfast. But, "in action" as the "Pilgrim's Scrip" has it, "Wisdom goes by majorities," and I so shroud my political and sociological opinions and speculations in mystery.

ABOUT CRITICS AND CRITICISM.

ABOUT CRITICS AND CRITICISM: WITH OTHER MATTERS INCIDENTAL AND IRRELEVANT.

I.

A MAN with a talent for leisure—a talent as rare as many others held in greater esteem—cannot help thinking it was good to live in the “good old days” (putting them in the eighteenth century), if one only chanced to have deserved so well of Providence prenatally as to be under no obligation to deserve anything of anybody in this world. When one’s circumstances entirely remove all necessity of deserving well of one’s fellows, one exercises unconsciously a strong moral influence, for they at once become extraordinarily magnanimous, and credit one with all the virtues in the decalogue, besides many others not mentioned therein. And it is to be noted, too, that these latter are the virtues upon which the world sets the greatest store. The biographies of the deserving do not make very cheerful reading for those whose ambition it is to deserve; but they must afford great amusement to the wily ones, who have learned their lesson of indifference, and leave deserving to dreamers and fools. Certainly the lives of the deserving in the "good old days" can seldom inspire envy in the deserving of these days; but, all things considered, it is not very probable that the deserving of the eighteenth century, if they were to revisit the earth, would find any remarkable improvement in the condition of their mistaken brethren of this end of the nineteenth century.

If a man is so destitute of resources that he can only hope to get his bread by deserving it, he merits hanging. A man can only become honored in the community by being dishonest; for men love not qualities, but the appurtenances of power. If it is love one seeks, there is at least one way to secure it — become a feeder of swine. The Prodigal Son had just found a sphere in which he could be loved, when he became a prey to the common desire to be popular — a totally different thing. It is not at all remarkable, although few people are conscious of the fact, but we never envy the deserving. We may under the stress of certain emotions admire them, but we envy only the undeserving. We seldom envy men's qualities, anyway, but simply their conditions.

But there was a certain excitement (at least it seems so to us looking back into history) about the profession of letters, as about the stage, when it was a disgraceful outlawry, which is lacking in these days when it is a respectable, but poor and contemptible trade. There is not much to be said on moral grounds for the old system of patronage in literature, but one should hesitate before condemning it altogether. The present system is theoretically better, but a thousand and one deteriorating influences in the machinery, with which thought has been clogged since the invention of printing, and the practical abandonment of real schools, cause one to almost doubt whether we have made any real progress. The steam press has multiplied all the books that are mere printed matter, and this is such a profitable business that publishers do not care to venture the cost of genuine thought; and so in a world full of books, literature goes a-begging in the market-place.

Thus it has come about, that the modern tendency (in England and America, at least) is to flatter and appeal to the tastes of the mob, which never encouraged any art. It is certainly better to flatter one discerning individual (it is a discerning person who pays for flattery) and retain one's intellectual freedom in all other particulars, than to dilute one's self to flatter a multitude of fools. —to sell one's very soul for popularity. As Emerson said: "Popularity is for dolls." The old system of patron and client, with all its hideous incongruities, fostered some of the world's greatest thinkers. The popularization of the types too often perverts them to base uses, and fosters more than anything else the two extremes of the pious platitudinarian and the hysterical "society" female in literature.

Every great work of literary art has been written to satisfy one critic — the author! If everything had been written to please the public we should have no literature at all. The public is the damnation of all serious endeavor in art and critical literature; and the high priests of Clotûre are the conventional critics.

In the precarious calling of letters, the critics and essayists occupy the least stable position; and it is with the art of Montaigne, Addison, Steele, Dean Swift, Dr. Johnson and Goldsmith in mind, that I allow my imagination to revert to the old days —the days, when, if Steele had to write an article in the tap-room of the Devil's Tavern and wait for a printer's "devil" to bring him money enough in return to pay his reckoning, and if Dr. Johnson and Goldsmith got only garret room and scanty meals in the households of Edward Cave and Ralph Griffith for their labor, they at least were not compelled to cater to the tastes of the mob. They were robbed, of course; but they were not obliged to think the thoughts of the tinker and candlestick maker. The abolition of thought is one of the effects of the complete commercialization of literature in these days. This is the triumph of contemporary periodical literature. Imitation is only possible to poor plodding mediocrity. Thus we have produced the interesting spectacle of our contemporary literary world. The publishers offer the public the crystals of sugar loaves, but they refuse to give currency to diamonds. All the periodicals have a peculiarly distinctive character, and a certain organization of literary sparrows is always to be found in them twittering a different strain in each. It is the perfection of literary mechanism; but genius is more one-idea'd, and it cannot surrender its individuality even in the interests of conventional morality. Men can make wax flowers, but only God can impart the perfume to the rose and the narcissus.

It is impossible to give any rules for the production of literature by the industrious indigent or the socially ambitious, but one can give a recipe by which any person with a certain facility for misusing the English language, can obtain success in literature nowadays. Get a dress suit, go into society and dine The Editor — using the term in its generic sense. A man cannot provide himself with brains, when the Almighty, for His own good reasons, has omitted to furnish him in this particular; but most men can procure a dress suit, and it is a substitute that more than meets the occasion.

There are at the present time many earnest and true thinkers in certain fields of thought a little removed in the popular mind from literature, but in literature proper the ease with which all degrees of fools and quacks with golden keys gain access, makes the lot of a reviewer indeed a pitiable one.

There is a large class of publishers which insists upon modelling the opinions of authors, to make them appeal to an imaginary audience, which is conjured up in back offices, and whose existence is honestly believed in. And there is a still larger class of publishers that, with equal fatuity, sincerely believes that the public is shocked at honest criticism, and of all critical condiments has only developed a taste for molasses. The public has indeed a good appetite for colorless commonplace, but its instinct of curiosity is as strong as its literary taste is undecided. It is as much through condemnation as praise that great books obtain any vogue at all. But, on the other hand, general condemnation of balderdash only gives it a wider circulation. It is absurd for the publishers to be so desperately anxious to pass all their authors through a moulding-machine, that turns them out like children's popguns which will all make exactly the same report upon discharge. Of course, the effeminate, the indiscriminating do not weary of these small noises; but once you give masculine, robust boys or men the chance to handle genuine pistols and artillery, popguns lose their hold upon their imaginations. The popular writers and the popular critics have always prevented the popularization of the great authors; for popguns lose their significance the moment great field pieces are brought on the scene.

The publishers are too much afraid of offending their constituencies. Their little catechism for authors is ludicrously unnecessary, when one reflects that the public is only deeply concerned about one thing — its belly; and will read good and bad literature without discovering a pin's point of difference between the two. Perhaps, however, in this view, I am thinking of a distinct class of readers — the large genteel class, which buys books as it buys silver spoons, in order to possess every appurtenance of a well-ordered household. It is probably nearer the truth to say that the great mass of the public has acquired its letters without learning to read—that is, to read in the real sense. It pores over that class of periodicals and books which cannot be regarded as literature at all; and therefore, in a consideration of literature (even bad literature), is not to be taken into account.

The fact is, the position of the publishers is an impertinence. They should rightly be middlemen, authors' agents, who put forth and distribute literature without any power of interference in its character. Only fools buy books for the imprints of publishers. Thinkers buy books to add thinkers to their circles—not publishers. We buy books, and even magazines, to learn the authors' opinions, and to get their opinions expressed in their own fashion. It is very good of the publishers, no doubt, to attempt to exclude from circulation any opinions which, from their point of view, we may not agree with. But it is precisely the people we differ from that we desire to meet. We discover our own opinions in learning other peoples'. But for publishers' opinions, with all deference to a worthy class of tradesmen, we really do not care a tinker's damn.

Here is an exactly analagous case. We patronize a certain restaurant because the chef tickles our appetites with the diversity of his bill of fare. He is an artist; he lives upon popular suffrage, and we appreciate his art. But we do not desire the company of the proprietor of the caravansary at the meal we have paid for, and we do not care a fig for his views upon the art we discuss. All we ask of the publishers is the bill of fare; nothing more. But, perhaps, we cannot get what we are willing to pay for until the machinery of production is more simplified than it is under the present competitive system. We must wait until publishers are authors' agents, on commission, as are dealers for other inventors, before we can hope to buy literature in the market-place, which exists primarily as literature.

But the critics will not consider works published by the author, and the public is popularly supposed to share their distaste, for all the channels of reaching it are closed to the author who manages his own business. This plan has, however, been worked by John Ruskin in our own time, and has been found practicable, I believe, by several great French authors. Nobody is ever amazed that a brilliant statesman, or lawyer, or a great general is able to manage his own affairs, and there is no reason whatever to assume that literary genius can only exist in men incapable of protecting their own interests in the ordinary business of life.

II.

IN the good old days of Addison and Steele, and afterwards of Dr. Johnson, Burke, Goldsmith, and Sir Joshua Reynolds, a new book, or a new play, or a new journal was the talk of the town; and the criticisms which were made at Button's Coffee-House and at the Mitre Tavern in Fleet Street were the deliberate opinions of men who had time not only for opinions, but for reading, and leisure not only to read, but to think. The best criticisms are often those which fly across the mahogany after a good dinner has been disposed of, and when those around it are poets and wits and philosophers. There is a reconciliation between body and mind, in such a moment, that is sacred. The criticisms which arise naturally out of the conversation of thinkers, when a bottle or two in the window-sill transforms the world, make the stuff of some of our best literature. Their spontaneous birth gives them a subtle character that the deliberateness of written literature denies. In the alchemy of good talk men surprise even themselves—the sparkles come and go, and tantalizingly elude and tickle the memory the next minute, when the glasses are filled and new bubbles rise to the surface. In this lies their greatest charm. We speculate about these gatherings—with, say, Dr. Johnson in the chair; and in imagination summon the wits back to their seats—only to find the substitution of our wit for theirs makes them very commonplace shadows indeed. The fact that these opinions and judgments often died as soon as they were born adds considerably to our curiosity about them. Old port and Madeira often played the midwife upon these occasions. A gathering of wits can be as dull as a convention of deacons without a bottle or two of wine on the table; for wit and wisdom, as well as headaches and heartaches, are born in very small wine-glasses—constantly re-filled! It is one of the strangest of anomalies that out of the same bottle of port will come imaginings too fantastic for telling, much less writing, with the sanest criticisms upon life, philosophy, and the actual creations of art. (I am now referring, of course, to the first bottle of port and not to the third.)

The critic whose criticisms are of any value should read one book carefully, and then think about it for a week. There is nothing more common and nothing more useless than the continual devouring of books without thought. Elizabeth Barrett Browning compares this form of mental dissipation to whittling. The critic should read and think and dine, for opinions, if not thought, come nowhere so readily as at dinner.

The poor critics have usually belonged to what Nathaniel Hawthorne called "the aristocracy of wretchedness." In the popular imagination they are the autocrats of literature, and it is amazing to what an extent this delusion is shared by authors, to whom there is no mystery about a printing-office. The critics are the serfs of literature. If the authors have done with Grub-street, the poor critics have not. It demands a much more varied equipment and talent to write opinions that shall possess interest and originality about contemporary literature (the bulk of which is not worth the effort of making up one's mind about at all), than to write an average popular novel. A vivacious chronicle of opinion requires a wide acquaintance with genuine literature, a judicial, logical mind, a faculty for epigram, a strong creative power (using the word "creative" in its proper sense) and a distinct charm of style. The average popular novel demands none of these things. In fact, it would not seem extravagant to say that the average popular novel becomes so through the complete absence of these qualities in the creator. The critic who signs his work has usually a better sense of proportion and a deeper insight into the responsibilities of literature than the popular novelist who reviles him. The critic, at least, contributes to the literature of knowledge; while the popular novelist, with his industrious multiplication of mysteries and insipid heroes and heroines, simply denies his readers an acquaintance with literature of any sort. Anonymous critics who abuse their office to ventilate personal dislikes, are as unworthy of notice as anonymous letter writers.

But to be quite candid, only those critics who have an established place in literature and have forced the proprietors of the journals to permit the printing of their signatures, dare express sincere, honest personal opinions. As a matter of fact, speaking generally, a much less interesting custom than Donnybrook criticism obtains in our current literature. "Bloody" Jeffrey, Croker, Gifford and their myrmidons have no successors. The "Bloody" sessions are closed; and they were so amusing in their ludicrous, earnest asininity, that one cannot but regret that a little of their barbarism has not survived in our day of vapid, sugary criticism. The philosophic mind is merely amused at adverse opinion, expressed with exaggerated violence and intolerance. The literary claquers of to-day, who always yell one way like a pack of hounds, cannot afford one the same innocent distraction from one's serious interests. Honest criticism is almost a lost art; and so is the dishonest criticism that amuses. I confess if I had an hour for relaxation I would rather spend it in seeing a man hanged in effigy than in listening to one of those eulogies that are like eating-house dishes — all alike except in name.

After all that can be said in disapprobation of them, the critics are more to be pitied as the martyrs of ignoble machinery, than execrated as bad amusers. Are they not asked and compelled to sacrifice their whole intellectual capital to the mechanical approval or disapproval of a multiplicity of dull authors, who could not write an interesting paper on their own stupidity if it were to save their necks from the halter? We ought to be thankful that a few critics are able to dispose of their ostensible subjects in a paragraph or two and give us essays on other matters very much more amusing. A really independent mind will not allow itself to be fettered and padlocked by titles, even of its own forging, when it can find sweeter, greener pasturage in a by-path.

A man who has a decided taste for literature is entirely unfitted for the career of a successful practical critic nowadays, as it is far more important for a success in literature to be a woman, a beauty, a possessor of a wonderful wardrobe, and give costly dinners in "society," than to possess any literary qualifications whatever. This makes criticism an impertinence. A woman is allowed by all the rules of chivalry to be a fool without danger or reproach; but a discreet woman will not publish the fact broadcast. The worst of being a professional literary critic is that you are brought into collision with so many fools every week—in gilt edges, cloth and paper covers. A man had far better ruin his palate as a tea-taster than poison the sources of his imagination and inner life as a literary taster. The average critic who is compelled to earn his livelihood by his pen usually exists in an atmosphere of hopeless contemporaneity. His examinations and his judgments in their very positiveness must necessarily be of the most perfunctory character. He is, with very few exceptions, in the same pickle as the unfortunate society reporter; who is obliged by his necessities to squander his life in the vestibule of "society," and hails every vapid young woman, who makes her formal entrance into her gilded cage, as a paragon of beauty and an Admirable Crichton in petticoats. The counting-house controls the critic's judgments, and allows him no selection; and, indeed, when an author or publisher has a social lever, as well as the ordinary means of influencing the opinions of the poor critic, through his employer, there is very little moral hesitation in evidence: then the critic cuts capers which may well make him desirous of preserving his anonymity. It is hard to have to praise a lady's book because she is the wife of a millionaire, and one's employer is invited to her table; and it adds a new poignancy to the situation when the lady's dinners and not the book must occupy the chief place in one's review.

A man without imagination cannot be a critic — neither a true nor a sham one. If he were only allowed to say what he thought, the critic's life would not be so miserable; but his opinions are furnished him by gentlemen whose ideas of literature are picturesque, to put it mildly, and the poor man has to father all sorts of crudities, or else resign in favor of someone to whom intellectual prostitution is less obnoxious. Books, which should be among the real satisfactions of life, become the bane of his existence. Even when he reviews good books he is in no better plight, for he must not let a careful review of one good book crowd out a dozen puffs of twelve bad ones: and so he has to put the same smear of molasses over everything which is thrown upon his table. He is only asked to read enough of the books that are sent to him to give his public a taste of their condimental character: but he has to read so many every day that his whole existence becomes one long nightmare. He is the victim of the thousand and one semi-weekly, tri-weekly, weekly, semi-monthly and monthly libraries of fiction, and having leisure only to know the names of literature, he is haunted with a million multi-colored, grotesque and often suggestive covers of the popular sensational and didactic novels. Some writers flout the poor critic for his misfortunes. This is mere wanton cruelty. I have an immense pity for the critic serving his term of servitude — possibly because I have served a long term at the galleys myself.

The secret of one-half of the ridiculous puffery of the press is poverty. The critics are often brilliant men of strong literary tastes, but they do not belong to themselves; they belong to a counting-house. It is owing to this deplorable perversion of the critical office that good books are so often neglected and allowed to die in a week with the bad ones. The indiscriminate puffing has led the mass of readers to disregard all criticism, which, whatever certain novelists may say to the contrary, rightly and honestly practised, is a very useful and necessary office.

But it is painful to dwell long upon the condition of the unfortunates under the harrow. It is pleasanter to turn to a consideration of a more legitimate and less saddening phase of critical writing.

III.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY, recently published A Code for Critics, which, while containing some wholesome counsel, taken too much to heart would hopelessly divorce criticism and literature. It is a code for commonplace reviewers — not for critics; for reviewing and criticism are two distinct vocations. Mr. Saintsbury's rules are: "Never to like anything old merely because it is old, or anything new merely because it is new" (which is sound common sense enough; but not startlingly original); "never to judge anything in literature or politics except from the historical and comparative standpoint" (which in respect to art would often prove to be pinching); "and always to put the exposition of the subject before the display of personal cleverness."

The greatest creative artist goes to nature as if no art existed before him. The painter learns to draw from the plaster cast; he expresses himself from nature. It is the same in creative literature; and it is the true function of criticism in a consideration of art to refer to nature as the highest standard. Such a code is too cast-iron for the critics whose names belong to literature. It is eminently good advice for the cataloguers of literature—for compilers of text books for schools, who need modesty; but otherwise it can only satisfy those poor folk who think they can raise the east wind with a pair of bellows.

The body of great critical literature contains a very considerable portion of the world's best thought; but the makers of this literature suffered no self-effacement; and examining and illuminating the work of other men, while doing their own thinking, it must ever be borne in mind, that they were essentially creators, and not mere commentators and cataloguers. Indeed, many of the greatest creative minds have found expression in writings distinctly imbued with the critical and inquiring spirit—men whom we cannot put below the salt—and it is obviously impertinent therefore to beg a second place in literature for such thought—much less to divorce it from literature altogether.

There is, as a matter of fact, nearly always something that is suggestive and attractive in the work of the critic who consciously strives to force the conclusion that he is wittier and deeper than the author he discusses; for he may not succeed in his attempt, and thus afford one a source of innocent merriment; or he may succeed

(for there are instances of critics whose light has dwarfed that of their authors into feeble candle-light), and in succeeding add to the sum of our pleasures by merging criticism into authorship. Indeed, there is very much to be said for digression and discursiveness in criticism. To cite but a few preëminent examples, men who combined keen critical faculties with an equally strong sense of personality, which consciously or unconsciously permeated all their essays, this ideal of personal subordination was broken by Charles Lamb, Thomas De Quincey, Heinrich Heine and William Hazlitt—and who can doubt that we should have lost the best element in their essays if they had left themselves out of them?

The only kind of criticism that is organic and inheres properly to creative literature, is constructive criticism; what I may perhaps call inferential commentary—the embodiment in a brief statement of one's ultimate impressions, derived from a chaotic mass of impressions received during a careful and sympathetic reading of an author. The antiquated fashion of minute verbal criticism, while necessitating great labor, is about as useful to us in our literary navigation as a chart of the waters of Mars would be to an Atlantic pilot. The best criticism is that which throws the man against the background of his time and its distinctive influences, and with as accurate measuring as possible, discovers his moral stature for that time, and other times. This consideration of an author rises to the dignity of literature itself. It is not the mere explanation of what is already clear, but is an illumination of some of the subtle processes which take place in one in reading, involving not only the intellect, but the conscience—a continuous operation of reconstruction—a perpetual reconciliation of antipathies, pre-conceived ideas and new sympathies and intuitions. This is a condition of individual development which, in certain highly sensitive and absorbent minds, often provokes the production of thought as distinct and quickening as the thought that quickened it.

IV.

THE æsthetic instinct in the race, in its crude form of love of color, fine feathers and beads, is next only in potentiality for good or ill to those other crude and vulgar instincts, which insure the continuance of the race and keep the world from tumbling into chaos — if we accept Schopenhauer's formula that "the world is simply the perception of a perceiver — in a word, idea." Herbert Spencer emphasizes the fact of the innate love of fine feathers as conferring distinction upon the wearer, and pushes the analogy into a consideration of the prevailing ideas and practice in regard to modern education.

There can be no doubt but that this desire of attaining distinction, is the impelling force in the production of that considerable portion of our literature, which, for convenience, we designate as belles-lettres. Its claims are not those of mere utility, but it is certainly not devoid of real use, for it develops certain faculties in us that are apt to get rusty from want of employment. It is a platitude that Vanity is the lever that has moved the world. It is a far greater force than hunger. While hunger is rifling bakers' shops, Vanity is making seers and heroes. Life without cocks' feathers is not living. Cynics, optimists, pessimists, fatalists—we all wear cocks' feathers in our hats and seek mirrors in the eyes of our circle. We pay very dearly for the wonder of our fellows.

But to return to our painted savages, and the humble beginnings of æsthetics. Herbert Spencer points out that decoration precedes dress; and cooking precedes civilization. "The facts of aboriginal life seem to indicate that dress is developed out of decorations." Thus, it is evident that the love of æsthetics, in some form or other, is one of the strongest factors in the social life of the most primitive states of society. The whole complicated web of our arts is held by a thread to the aboriginal love of color. And it is worthy of note, in passing, that, speaking generally of the mass, it is only in this crude form that the innate love of æsthetics exercises any appreciable influence in our modern civilization. But the taste exists, and has its root in instinct. It is not an altogether arbitrary matter of will, an ingraftment upon the simplicity of nature, but the development of a common and natural appetite. It is an appetite that finds only a strange and violent expression among the masses of people, mainly because, under the competitive system, they are entirely absorbed in the struggle for mere bread, and their consequent condition of mental and physical squalor affords no opportunity or desire for cultivation. Among the women it still finds sporadic expression in a barbaric love of color in their dress; but the generality of the men usually look at the world through the bottom of a quart pot. They are as reconciled to the sombre in their surroundings as undertakers' mutes are to funerals. This utter content with the ugly is, no doubt, necessary for the supporting of existence under such conditions, but it is one of the most dreadful things about the life of the slums to those who come in out of the sunlight. It certainly shocks the fragile daughters of the well-to-do who occasionally peep with pretty horror into these rookeries — of which their benevolent fathers are frequently the owners. But the savages of the slums often do not wash and have no money for paint, and so, having traced the analogy between the inhabitants of the wilds of Central Africa and those of the wilds of the Bowery, we will proceed with our argument.

The germ of æsthetics is in the crudest and most superstitious form of religion: all poetry begins in religion. The imagination is aroused and receives impressions long before the observation is sufficiently trained and enforced by a catalogue of comparisons to refer such impressions to Nature. A considerable gap in intellectual development separates the activity of observation and the activity of reflection upon observation—except the crudest and most perfunctory kind. In the natural order of things, poetry, in some form or other, precedes philosophy. Poetry is the firebrand plucked from the early camp-fire of barbarism to lighten the darkness of superstition. Its advent is the twilight of the world; and although the shadows it casts are often too grotesque to afford a clue to the times, with it begins history, and out of it finally comes philosophy. Poetry and philosophy should never be put asunder, for they are as akin as light and heat. Appreciation of poetry always antedates a knowledge of the nature and elements of poetry, just as men learn to use their voices in singing long before they are conversant with the systematized laws of music. The introduction of measure into poetry and music, adds to their beauty, and is as necessary as order is in life; but in the application of these principles we must not forget that in their essence they are arbitrary, and we must not confuse mere conformity with excellence. The subtle spell of poetry and music cannot be analyzed; it escapes and rises above all laws, which are but the lathes and chisels of art. The tools are, of course, necessary, but the perfected work is the product of more than the will and the tools; and the overplus cannot possibly be defined, even by the artist, in any less elastic term than inspiration. We can tell how many miles an hour the wind is blowing, but we cannot analyze the weird color sounds of the music it makes in the telegraph wires over our heads. The beauty of the poem or the piece of music is a fact to those whose minds are caught in its gossamer toils; the analysis of the charm may be dull or interesting, but it necessarily consists largely of hypothesis. The secret of great art overlies the fulfillment of the laws of art. The artist is bound to observe these laws, but he is bound to do something more, or he fails of his purpose.

If this be granted, then it is clear that in the consideration of æsthetic art, the critics must not content themselves with an acquaintance with literature and the principles of art. And, on the other hand, they must be more than simply acquainted with the rude externals of life. The æsthetic instinct is like all others in one particular: it varies greatly in degree in individuals, and it is subject to the same laws of association, cultivation and neglect. In its highest development it reaches a plane, where, for all practical discussion, it loses all affinity with its origin. It becomes so infinitely refined and diversified, that what appeals merely to the elementary perceptions and passions, is crude, tedious and repulsive to the mind of the man, who has generations of refinement behind him, and whose æsthetic interests have traversed the line of mere instinct and taken on the complexion of psychological habitudes. At this stage of development, the mental and moral are inextricably commingled, and there is a large element of artificiality added; but henceforth the vision is colored by moral impressions and beauty loses its simplicity. A return to absolutely natural conditions and pure perceptions would, however, be much more unnatural and artificial. The crude instincts are greatly overweighted, but their dominance in the healthy, civilized man is intermittent, and they are seldom stronger than the imagination (which they so often seduce) when sustained by the ideas and habits of years.

It is therefore of the greatest importance that the arts should be practised to appeal to the highest natures and most cultivated intelligences, and never in such a way as to compromise with, or descend to, the intellectual level of those unspiritual or despiritualized elements in society, which constitute its principal ugliness. This, it seems to me, should be the basis upon which comparative criticism, in its application to the fine arts, should be exercised. The existence of the æsthetic sense or intuition, in a greater or less degree, in the mass, should make the critics unceasingly protest against its debasement by the panderers, who make their way into literature, as into everything else. And by panderers, I do not mean only those writers, who, according to orthodox notions, are supposed to cater to immoral curiosity, but the whole host of popular triflers, who say: "The people have only the heart to laugh and be fools!"—and who are leagued together to flatter and cater to the people, and keep them fools. On the other hand, the existence of the æsthetic sense, even in a most rudimentary form, in the mass, should prevent the critics from rashly condemning works of art by comparison with other works of art, produced by men of opposite temperament and under different circumstances.

Every work of art, great or small, is a problem in psychology. It touches certain chords of emotion and leaves others untouched; and when a book does not please us it is perhaps as often owing to the absence of the proper sympathy in us, as it is due to the lack of art in the book. No matter how popular an author's works may become, they cannot please every mind, because, however excellent they may be, they can only express relative truth, and can only give us a glimpse of beauty. Every man has a moral squint, more or less pronounced, and we all see beauty, as it were, in partial eclipse. The difference between genius and mediocrity often consists in the simple capacity of the former to trust to its own eyes, instead of looking at life through the thousands of other eyes that would perform the office. The greatest books do not always attract the greatest number of people, for they play upon certain chords that often do not exist, or are unresponsive from disuse, in the average man and woman. Then, too, however facile and pregnant may be an author's art of expression, it can never meet the demand made upon it by his feelings and imagination, so that for anything like an adequate interpretation of his meaning, his critics and readers must bring to his pages more than intelligence and knowledge of life and other books. They must bring the sympathy and the poetry that creates as well as understands. This is well exemplified in music, which is only a succession of noises to those who have no ear and imagination. A true book unconsciously selects its readers, as its author selects his friends and his studies.

Thus, it often happens that after a book has received almost unanimous rejection at the hands of the comparative critics, it gives pleasure and profit to thousands, who have escaped the blight of mere tradition, and have looked into their own hearts, and at life, for truth, and not for fashion. And if we accept the comparative method as our sole guide in a consideration of style, it is more unsatisfactory; for as there is nothing new under the sun, if a writer resembles another in his style of presentation, his works are without a reason for existence, and do not therefore call for any criticism at all. All men, being both isolated and dependent, capable only of limited sympathies, and incapable of more than the most partial self-knowledge, much less self-revelation, the mystery of life can never lose its hold upon thoughtful minds; and comparative criticism of the literature that must ever be the result, can at best only give us psychological hints of the impressions and conclusions of other minds. The value of comparative criticism lies in the broad generalizations it affords us, from an examination of the best minds on the most vital, if insoluble, questions.

V.

THERE is no ascertainable criterion of æsthetic art. All criticism is necessarily empirical. It is too often little more than an unfavorable opinion of Pegasus expressed by a man who is accustomed to riding only in an omnibus. A positive basis of criticism is impossible, but the comparative method of estimating imaginative literature, takes us farther away from a reasonable approximation, by comparing things utterly unlike, and rejecting those of most recent date for their dissimilarity. It rarely helps us to form any true and definite idea of the relative value of anything, for aside from conformity to the broad principles of art, there is frequently little community of purpose or method among the greatest artists. The tyranny of the literary conventions of the past has always been one of the strongest obstacles to progress in thought. On the other hand, to attempt to destroy the influence of the greatest thinkers of the past, simply because it is the influence of the past, is presumptuous and injurious; but when fresh examinations and the changes in political and social life bring about the condemnation of old errors and prejudices, no matter how ancient and respectable, it is the lowest depth of mental servility to defer to the Tory spirit, that always survives for a generation or two the ideas which are effectually exploded by the thinking men of the time. But in throwing away the conventions of other days we are surely under no obligation to discard or depreciate the truth and beauty of the art that grew up under their shadow. We may disapprove of the whole spirit of many books written in a different moral atmosphere from ours, and yet experience a keen delight in observing their beauties of style and breadth of fantasy.

And we can be equally catholic in regard to contemporary authors. My friend, the laird of Highdudgeon, is an ardent Monarchist, an aristocrat (and, it must also be admitted, something of a snob), whose ideas of sociology and political economy are those of the fifteenth century; but he has the gift of confidences, and his egotistical confessions are absolutely fascinating, while (and this is half the charm of his matter) his command of beautiful English is the envy of all his detractors, among whom naturally he can number as many friends as enemies. A fine old crusted Tory is very good company when one is desperately in need of relaxation, and does not wish to confess to a liking for clowning and ballet dancing, but he is a little too solemnly frivolous for one's serious moods. Then there is Magnifico, whose ideas are all "advanced"—and borrowed; but whose heart is a mere organ. It would be wronging him to declare that he has no vanity. He makes five thousand a year by frowning, and his judicial hesitation is so great, that his unexpressed dissents and endorsements have made him an honorary member of half the learned societies in both hemispheres. His puckered lips carry more conviction than all the eloquence of his opponents. He has a prodigious conceit, but it is too silent to afford continual amusement. He is so in love with platitude and is so decorous in his mental habits, that he will not even consent to be witty with other people's witticisms. He always writes in a very restrained, judicial and correct fashion, but he is merely the proxy for his opinions and his gentility; and it would be to the decided improvement of his work, if he would only consent to err occasionally and express his own ideas. On second thoughts I perceive I am here guilty of a sad fallacy. I may affect a little contempt of Magnifico in his absence, but I am wofully conscious that in his living presence I cannot escape his ponderous condescension. He understands the value and impressiveness of dullness and a dignified demeanor in this world—but then he attaches a greater importance to its playthings than is possible for me. He casts a long shadow in the world, and is tickled—but then he never reflects upon the longer shadow of Death. There is nothing in the world really worth the effort of keeping up the farce of dignity. But Magnifico will probably never lose an iota of his dignity until he feels the cold creeping up his legs, and knows that he is in the presence of the arch joker, who rings down the farce a tragedy. But just think of the instruction in such a career, and the philosophic resignation one can derive from the contemplation of it.

•

Augustus William Schlegel defines the scope of comparative criticism as affording a clue to the conditions necessary to the creation of original works of art. He says:

“Everything must be traced up to the root of human nature; if it has sprung from thence, it has an undoubted worth of its own; but if, without possessing a living germ, it is merely externally attached thereto, it will never thrive nor acquire a proper growth.”

This is the value of the best criticism. It compares the works of the greatest artists, not to discover conformity of opinion, or matter, or method, but merely to ascertain in a general way some guide to the highest expression of art. There will be almost as much correspondence in certain particulars as there is wide divergence in others, because, with all differences of temperament, and training, and experience, men of genius must deal largely with the same material, human life, and their reflections must often be of the same metal; but they are stamped with the superscription of their authors, and are as new as next year's apples will be. People do not discard a gold mine after the first few nuggets are discovered; and while life and death remain, literature can never become merely the echo of literature. In the examination of history, the sciences and philosophy, the strictly comparative method is indispensable to the reaching of any sound conclusions; although it is indubitable that, in the latter, essential truths have often been discovered in large and bold generalizations.

For the artist and the critic of æsthetics, however, the value of reference to existing works that have already met with acceptance, is simply that these productions have proved to contain elements capable of touching certain chords of emotion, and have therefore fulfilled the general laws of art, and are worthy of study as psychological hints. They are, to the artist, like Baedeker's guide books: they afford some indispensable information as to some things to be looked for, but they by no means exhaust the subject; and when the critics insist upon comparing all literature to literature, they are in reality finding fault with the Almighty for not moulding the mountains after the description of the guide books. They are comparing Vesuvius to the fusees that have been honored with its name; a glorious sunset to the limelight at the theatre. The secret of great art cannot be weighed out and sold in newspaper articles; but the mystery of life is too deep for the plummet of art, and so there can never come an end to art — or not until the mystery is exploded. The infallible standard is Nature, and this forever eludes any systematization. We do not go to an author to explain his work, or to see if he conforms to another man's ideas of art, but to gain something from him which will clarify our own mental atmosphere, and give an impulse to our own thinking.

Other critics may differ from this — but it is a fact that, whether we are wrong or right, we remember writers through our agreements and disagreements with their thought, and the final residuum of gain of which we are conscious after the effect of immediate impressions has lost its original force. We do not find the charm of one writer to consist in imitation of or resemblance to another. We are, doubtless, oftenest attracted by our personal agreements. But our point of view changes as we learn more from our reading, and as our critical faculties are developed we become at once more sensitive to impressions and less swayed by traditional views and prejudices. It is the business of criticism to deal with ultimate impressions—masses, so to speak—and not with minor defects; and so, if an author offers nothing that is beautiful and quickening, it is not worth while to categorize his minor shortcomings.

VI.

THERE is small place in our study of literature proper for that kind of criticism which confines itself entirely to bald comparison, and alternates between the quotation of familiar passages, en bloc, and the perpetration of conventional labels. Of the latter, by the way, I have, safely locked up in a trunk in my garret, a large and varied assortment. It includes all the approved condescensions and humiliations, and I am ready to sell it at a great sacrifice, or exchange it for one good book—even if it be but a book of proverbial philosophy, whose lessons consist largely in inciting one to the verification of its exceptions. The completeness and authenticity of the collection cannot be doubted, when I state that it was left to me by a great-uncle of mine, who, for many years, earned a precarious livelihood as a literary taster for the London Saturday Review. My great uncle was perhaps the glummost humorist of the whole gang of glum villains who wrote and write for the Saturday. He died scowling.

Candidly, I regard as the best critical writing that which is either avowedly or surreptitiously self-expression on parallel and on dependent themes, if such lead to clarity and definiteness. A self-obliterated critic is, to my thinking (it should be remembered that I am referring to literature in its narrower sense, and am not including history, philosophy, and the literature of physics), as satisfactory as a stale Stilton cheese, so economically hollowed out that only the rind remains standing. It possesses neither the interest of a ruin nor of a scaffolding. It merely arouses animosity for exciting an appetite without gratifying it. It is a poor empty cheat; it has even ceased to have a distinctive odor, but takes that of the viands nearest to it. You may pour rich, generous wine continually into its belly, and its poor spare ribs may retain some of it, but there is no substance to absorb it, there is nothing to ferment and ripen, and the wine, without changing its character, is obviously not improved in such a vessel. A good ripe blue Stilton, quickened with the best liquor, needs no apology for its presence on the table. And it needs no demonstration to prove that it is preferable to get wine from the wood than to drink it out of a stale cheese rind.

Certainly the time spent in reading scraps of an author, woven into a crazy patchwork, in which the critic's part is merely a thread of conventional opinion (of the impersonal, offensively-inoffensive, demure, and altogether damnable sort), might assuredly be more advantageously employed in studying originals. The critic who merely spreads his innocuous platitude and imbecility over the original soil, is not a quickening agency, but an altogether abominable nuisance. Only when a critic is himself original—a writer not merely of labels and echoes, but of views; a man, who, in his interpretation of others' philosophy, illustrates his subject with an experience of life at first hand—only the man whose thought is thus quickened by the thought of others, and who, in turn, quickens our thought, can be of any service to us.

When, in a consideration of creative art, the comparison is to Nature, we get the comparative criticism from which, in our own individual comparisons, we may learn something.

There are some preternaturally dull big-wigs, of very high standing in the literary world, who write as if they were muffled up in the shrouds of dead authors. They are ashamed of nature, and are as dependent upon precedent as police magistrates. They dare not look up and see God's sun shining in the heavens, unless some illustrious predecessor in their libraries made note of the phenomenon. They are afraid to compromise the dignity of the fancy figures they conjure up in their minds, of themselves, for the delectation of posterity. This is the only matter in which such men betray the smallest possession of imagination: they can see nothing worthy or beautiful in their own generation, but they are greatly concerned to impress a proper sense of their personal dignity and talents upon the hopeful children of their worthless contemporaries—if not upon those lost souls themselves. They despise their contemporaries so much, because, while looking back, they also look forward, and fancy they belong to no generation but to posterity. The dullest of judicial folk, perched upon the peak of bald precision, is secretly the thrall of a most grotesque imagination. “Folly is set in great dignity.”

The man of great capacities and noble qualities can alone afford to unbend in general society. He is secure in the consciousness of his genuine purpose, and has his quip and joke regardless of immediate impressions. Dignity is more often than anything else a confession of weakness. Transparent, empty men assume it, on the principle that architects put stained glass windows in hallways that look out upon bricks, mortar and nothing, to give an appearance of depth and color. Where there is depth and flowers and color we do not need stained glass. Most men dare not be natural, for they would be discovered. Wise men sometimes assume dignity, because their experience teaches them that it is a needful weapon to keep fools at an undisturbing distance. A wit in a company of fools, is unanimously voted the fool of the occasion. A seer who unbends to a fool for five minutes, is despised in his neighborhood forever.

To-morrow is the Court of Reversion. If posterity would only print all its portraits from men's own negatives, our literary galleries would be sadly monotonous. But posterity will do no such thing! It is possible to cheat one's own generation, but not all generations to come. We have much to be thankful for, when we reflect that so many portentous negatives, handed down to posterity, are ignominiously broken into fragments, or so reduced and reconstructed, and printed in such colors, as to give a delightful half pathetic, half ludicrous interest to literary and historical portraiture. Dullness so often counterfeits seriousness, and plays Pontifex, that it is very gratifying to know that posterity sometimes avenges its poor misguided forefathers, knocks Gravity's black cap ingloriously over its eyes, and banishes the judges to limbo.

After all, it must always be remembered, a critic is only a human being. And who is at once wise enough and foolish enough to surrender his judgment and personality completely, even in the presence of the sages, whom he can summon at will in the library? It is no more presumptuous or unforgivable to hold up one's head in the strong daylight of great men, than in the fitful, ephemeral matchlight of one's vague, or uncomfortably crowding and omnipresent hobgoblin contemporaries. It is healthful to be honest occasionally. There is more to be said for the retention of instinct than habit; and modesty is usually merely a convention—a disguise. Let us throw a little of our false modesty to the winds (we do not want to wear masks so long that we forget our own complexion), and get all there is to be got out of the natural satisfaction of our sane appetites; among which, rightly understood, is egoism.

SOME MASKS AND FACES.

SOME MASKS AND FACES OF LITERATURE.

I.

I AM the poor rebellious pawn of my stomach. I am a buccaneer. But I think I may say with modesty and justice, that I only contrive to support the character at such great violence to my whole intellectual and moral temper, aims, and inclinations, that I am sufficiently punished by my own dismal exploits. A few of my associates in the office of The Sentinel have more predilection for buccaneering, and actually derive some ghoulish satisfaction from their work—a horrible fact, which puts all my philosophy and algebraical calculations for potential moral and spiritual remainders completely at fault.

In the early days of my acquaintance with journalism, after the first great moral catastrophe of my awakening to the real world about me, I tried to solve this delicate question of ethical remainders by the rough, unphilosophic method of common subtraction: for I did not then fully realize that the agreeable custom of hypothecating one's moral nature for so many dollars a week, finally reduces one's moral nature, when one seeks to extricate it, or its fragments, in such an inquiry as this, to almost a hypothetical quantity. But with increased and painfully acquired knowledge of this ghastly trade of buccaneering, I found myself compelled to invoke the aid of the higher mathematics, or surrender myself to the blackest sort of pessimism. Of course my choice was the higher mathematics.

One cannot weigh off moral and spiritual consolations against intellectual disaster in a sentence or a paragraph, and so I will not open an inquiry into the measure of comfort I have obtained from my mathematical calculations. But, if on this complicated moral question I do not know whether desperation or compensation tips the beam, I am quite certain that I have no stomach for this farcical life of a bravo in the dark alley-ways of publicity, and "'tis my poverty, and not my will, consents" to any participation in this tragic masking. It is entirely due to the mishap of my having been born into this century, which has criminally perverted the printing press, instead of into either the seventeenth or eighteenth, that I have ever held the remotest relation to this miserable business of buccaneering. I have no natural affinity with cut-throats and Paul Prys, detectives and confidence men; indeed, I had much rather be a good honest Billingsgate fish-woman. I thank Heaven, I have too much robust egotism to take any extravagant delight in playing Tartuffe for the glorification of the freedom of the press. Indeed, I think it is high time in America for a John Milton to arise who shall write a companion to "Areopagitica," on "The Necessity of a Censorship of the Press; to curtail its unseemly License to a rational exercise of Liberty."

For harboring such seditious sentiments I am sometimes regarded with grave suspicion in the high and ludicrously solemn councils of this nightmare world; and I confess I take but an indifferent interest in its trivial and contemptible doings—except, that when I allow my mind to dwell upon them, even momentarily, my bile is so disturbed I am threatened with hypochondria.

I hope I may not be misunderstood in the following statement, for I intend to keep strictly within the bounds of orthodoxy: but upon a certain point, about which my faith used to waver wofully, I am now, after many years spent in the brigandage of journalism, firmly established. I have not arrived at my conclusion through any of those seemingly irrational processes of conversion familiar at revival meetings; but by inexorable logic.

The newspapers and their peculiar intellectual and moral methods and influences are indisputable facts; and the immense prosperity of the newspapers, at the cost of the dwarfed mental and moral perceptions of the masses, is perhaps the most portentous fact of this century; and therefore the doctrine of total depravity is removed from the perplexed region of theology and is proved beyond all question.

But my associates on the staff of the Sentinel, and in the small noisy world of which it forms a part, with but few exceptions, are absolutely without any real knowledge of me. They are only acquainted with the facts of my grosser and more apparent necessities, and my more or less perfunctory discharge of certain duties for the procuring of some of the necessaries of civilized life.

In this shadow-world, in which all play a part, and in which, by the way, the most grotesque intellectual pigmies cast quite portentous shapes upon the screen of the passing hour, we do not get any nearer intimacy than do men in the ugly collisions of intoxication. The shadows we throw sometimes exaggerate, though more often diminish, us; but they always distort us. At any rate this life, although it consumes my days, is not my life. These ugly necessities and these unspeakably distressing duties are not ME. I only begin to draw the breath of real life as the sun sinks out of our horizon to rise in another.

I am a distorted shadow, a poor disturbed ghost, all day long, and let the sun shine as it will, it cannot make a healthy, moral, human being of me during the hours from nine in the morning until six o'clock at night. Unlike the flowers, my heart only uncloses and pours forth its true human fragrance with the moonrise.

I take on a human semblance at the supper table, at which we mix up good, honest jests, with no wicked mendacious sting in them, and poetry and philosophy; and after a pipe and a book for an hour or two, or perhaps a walk to the seashore, or down the shadowy turnpike, which connects my sundown suburb and the hideous noonday town, I begin to be conscious of human ideas and impulses struggling into life within me. And at last when the workaday world and its claims seem to have faded out of my memory, I enter into that mystic world, whose mockeries I know, but love to court. I climb up to my eyrie garret study, from whose diamond-paned window I can catch a glimpse of a patch of silver sea; and then—ah, if print could but whisper it only in sympathetic ears, instead of blabbing it to all the scornful Pharisees of the literary world!—and then in spirit I am a poet.

II.

I HAVE only thus hinted at my dual life, because it is typical of so many lives in this time and country, which are sacrificed to the devil, in order that some tattered remnant may be devoted to the high and noble service of literature.

In touching upon my own experiences, I can write without any exaggeration of the poignant bitterness of the nightly and early twilight endeavors to balance accounts between the Mr. Hyde and the Dr. Jekyll of the forced partnership, which is the secret woe of perhaps a good half of the men whose names are more or less current in contemporary literature. And this is the reason for this hint of the secrets of my own midnight confessional. These horrors underlying our comfortable good-natured amusing literature, out of which all the coarse scum of the alley-ways are expelled, unless they consent to come a-masking à la mode, are usually hidden out of sight. But it is only to the honor of all who strive to make honest literature in these days of literary mumming that some facts should be known.

It is too bad to have to admit a worse man to all our most sacred counsels, and it is deplorable when we have to pamper this rascal with the sacrifice of one noble and worthy interest after another, because we cannot deny that it is he and his miserable, heart-breaking charlatanry which keep us in bed and board. And then, too, what humiliation there is in the thought that this villain, who degrades us and makes our highest ideals and God-given thoughts but a penance, is, after all, not an utter alien in our brain, but sprang up there native and lusty with the threat of starvation. Of how many of our literary men is it true that the capacity and the spirit was there, for better things, for real work — but the cupboard was empty—is empty!

It is unfortunate that for the most part our wants crowd our needs out of our lives. It is a condition well put in Ecclesiastes: "Wisdom is good together with an inheritance, and profitable unto them that see the Sun." Unto them that see the Sun! — ah, but what a mockery it is to be conscious of that great inheritance of human pity and love and tenderness, that poetry which sets the soul free, and then to lose everything in the horrible hazard of earning a little bread and meat and shelter. Well indeed may the poet in his despairing moments sometimes envy the ignorance, and even the besottedness, of the poor desperate outcasts of our civilization. Their ignorance is their bane, but it is also their protection from greater tragedies. For these the world is beautiful in vain; and this is Nature's partial compensation for the havoc human nature makes. It is better for such offenders that they hear no music in the rustling of the trees, see no visions in the clouds, catch no divine messages in the break of the sea, find no peace or promise in the sun-kissed, wind-kissed ripples and eddies of the river — only see in the latter, indeed, a last refuge from their kind. It is better for such that, in the stifling and perversion of the mind, those divinely torturing intuitions, which are insured to some by the accident of birth, quickly perish, and forever, as far as this world is concerned.

If a man's poverty is increased with a faculty of spiritual vision that unfits him for contentment and ignoble patience with the moral decrepitude of the long servitude of utility, in which he shares the portion of the beast, he is indeed in a pitiable strait. The world has no ears for poets and prophets who come not arrayed in purple and fine linen, secure in their contempt of the world. Our stomachs may sometimes be consolers, but they rob the majority of us of all that we prize in life, of all that gives beauty and sanctity to our lives, of their very spiritual marrow. They debar us from our inheritance; we sell our birthright for a mess of pottage almost every day. But while the pangs of hunger, and their anticipation, not only terrorize us, but fret away something of the purpose of the few whom God has made irreclaimably poets at birth, it must be confessed that they do also occasionally prove a wholesome and necessary counterblast to indolence, and compel the greatest to share something of their incalculable fortune with their fellows, in order to procure the wherewithal to satisfy them. Still they more often drag a genius from his pinnacle, and make a pot-boy of the poet.

“The mass of men,” wrote Thoreau, “lead lives of quiet desperation. What is called resignation is confirmed desperation.” I confess I see nothing in the facts and conditions of our modern civilization to induce any contradictory optimism that would not be merely an emphasis of some pervasive dogma of a very respectable and very dubious character; but putting the question of the masses aside (since certitude is impossible, and there is a pitch-and-toss chance of consolation for those who are shut up in sensation, which is denied to those who live in the spirit), it is quite certain that the man, who, from his youth upward, by temperament and instinct, has lived the inner life of the poet, is only reconciled to a lower plane of thought and life when he has lost all interest in what once made the world and men sacred and beautiful to him.

III.

It is a most lamentable thing that, in spite of all the literary activity and the intellectual restlessness of our time, there are not probably more than half a dozen writers in the United States who follow literature, pure and simple, as a profession; and it is noteworthy that among these there are neither poets nor essayists—the backbone of belles-lettres.

The men of letters of the old type who were concerned with more momentous questions than Sandy and Arabella's love affairs are apparently either extinct in this country, or banished. Emerson, Thoreau, Lowell, Whitman and Dr. Holmes, were the last representatives of this sort here. Since their day we have had a plague of literary little ones, who never tire of telling us how well-behaved Sandy and Arabella are in their love-making. For that good, lusty, robust wit we find in the old English writers we seek everywhere in vain. It is severely disapproved of by our Lilliputian literary dictators, who would fain persuade us that purring is the thing. But oh, how some of us, in the crush of life, long for that laugh and roar of the old giants. It is not that I have any quarrel with the serene and gentle spirits, for these never lacked convictions and vigor. It is only the hypocrisy of good temper that keeps terms with trivialities of all kinds and laughs with superior scorn at the great and tragic and sober fantastic facts of life, and declares they exist no longer, that makes me regret I cannot command all the catgut I could put to a good use in a merry hanging Monday.

I can only recall the names of a few novelists, who, without fortune, solely dependent upon their own efforts, are able to devote themselves to the life of letters; and among these, I regret to say, the most prosperous, the men whose undivided devotion to their calling is the least doubtful, are gentry (and we must make the term generic to include the ladies,) whose productions are unmentionable and unreadable, through their crude lubricity, and who bring literature itself into bad odor among the ignorantly moral. Within recent years there has been a very marked increase in the publication of this sort of vile pandering, and it has brought into suspicion a certain necessary measure of freedom in art, which could only be a helpful influence in the direction of moral sanity and both Christian and sweet Pagan love and sympathy.

This new audacity of those on the fringe of literature is, in its way, a sort of protest against the indifference of the better classes, or, at least, the people who have the means and leisure to broaden their horizon, which has forced nearly all the literary impulse of late years in this country into alien and subterranean passages.

The higher types of men, however, bow to the inevitable, and since they cannot follow the native bent of their minds without incurring the perpetual temptation of so befouling their intellectual and moral integrity, they go into one of the professions, or some commercial pursuit, and make literature their recreation — their hobby-horse.

If they are wise they will not be deluded into imagining they can find a compromise in journalism. Indeed, I believe that a man, if he is not utterly lacking in the temperamental qualifications and habits of mind necessary for executive work, will not only find the daily round of duties in some commercial occupation, more dignified, less irksome, and less exhausting, but in every way more interesting and pleasant than any of the menial offices of any of the lower forms of literary employment can possibly be. Under such conditions Charles Lamb produced all his best work; and, from what scanty experience I have had in a dreary life of literary brigandage, I can well believe that men of some serenity of temper can find a distinct relief in the multiplicity of business details, and, too, in some sort, a fillip, through the force of contrast, for the less arbitrary interests of their leisure.

At any rate, the literature thus spontaneously produced, out of the overflowing heart and mind without regard to popular demands, editorial whimsies, ephemeral excitements, and the strain for novelty in a crowded market, is more apt to be unvexed art than that of the poor devil whose pen is forever in the ink-pot, and who is in more danger of immediate and material ruin from his possible excellencies than from his most determinate and palpable deficiencies. A man can indulge every whim that makes good literature, when he does not have to ride his hobby-horse to catch "editions" and early mail trains, and perform feats over "scare headlines"; and if he never does get into print at all, he, at least, has had all the riding.

But the poor journeyman is under a constant strain to put away all those elements of culture, mental integrity, natural feeling, logical faculty, and imagination, which combined make style and literature; and he reluctantly subdues all his real interests in a continual effort to echo the echoes that chase each other through the vaporous minds of those "all sorts and conditions of men," for whose high pleasure it is continually alleged the abominations of the half-hourly newspaper press are committed.

The man of affairs is seldom so busy, unless he is greatly bitten with the social mania, but that he has his heures perdues; but the man who innocently goes into journalism under the hallucination that it has some sort of intermittent relation to literature, sells his soul to the Devil; and, to make matters worse, with so little prudence, that after a precarious life in a brigandage, which does not even procure a share of the spoil, he ends his days in the gutter. At forty years of age he is an old man, and there is a superstition in the world of journalism that only beardless boys make good brigands and cut-throats. At any rate, one never sees a reporter who has definitely emerged from the thirties, and there are no fortunes made in this cut-throat business, except by the highly respectable owners of the bravoës.

Unfortunately, however, the majority of men of literary instincts and temperament, are entirely without any executive or business capacity. I do not think shrewdness and common-sense incompatible with the possession of genius; and there are examples in the range of literary and artistic biography which prove that genius can be allied to all the most admirable qualities of Scotch and Yankee thrift; and these even practised, for self-preservation, until they touch the point of niggardliness. Turner, for instance, in his latter years became almost miserly. Carlyle had the sturdy Scotch peasant's genius for the thrift that keeps mind and soul secure and independent. It is by no means the least of the virtues. It is often the only power that can save a man from the long servitude of expediency and mental and moral dishonesty. But nevertheless, it is perhaps more often the case that, in the exact ratio of their imaginative and creative endowment, poets and thinkers and artists are lacking in all those qualities which are essential to securing success or even a livelihood in the practice of law, medicine, teaching, preaching, broking, political prophecy, or tipstaffing.

In the intense competition of modern life an indifferent teacher or lawyer or clerk soon goes to the wall. Many of the most fit are crushed out at forty, for in these days, we have got into the habit of regarding forty as dotage. Therefore those miserables with only one talent, when they are possessed of any decided moral sense and proper pride and independence of character, which forbid them sinking into a complacent career of more or less successful literary mendicancy and adventuring, are compelled to sacrifice their hopes, talents, ambitions, high sense of honor and justice, happiness and comfort, to seek a hazardous independence in journalism.

In these days, when almost every avenue of literature is blocked up by men who are merely literary manufacturers, with a most plaguey passion of industry, there is always great peril to the writer, whose literary aims are purer and higher than perhaps either his capacity or his conscience would seem to warrant, in the alternative that may present itself to him at a certain crisis in his career. He can either continue a hopeless struggle in poverty against the tide of popular demands and the forces leagued and mortgaged to popular opinion; or he can risk the hazard of ending poverty in a jovial confession of poverty, and, turning his back upon the prizes and discipline of poverty, adopt the large elastic beliefs of a literary Franciscan, and become a genial pilgrim among the well-to-do and comfortable classes. Then, making a jest of all such crude moral obligations as can be cribbed in common arithmetic and usurers' purgatories, he can play the philosophic clown for those cliques, which affect singularity, and have so much discrimination as to pay more for the court of such an amusing cynic than for the flatteries of good honest tradesfolk. These circles are perhaps as yet too small in this country for the proper encouragement of all those writers who have a more decided faculty for the production of beautiful and fantastic literature — mere literature — than for the practice of that formal morality which is enforced, with many pains and penalties, upon mortals of less extraordinary endowment; but there are signs of a continual social expansion.

If this sort of philosophic clowning (putting morality and that bigoted sense of self-respect for one moment aside — and I protest I have not lost sight of them, but I must for one brief moment be catholic!)

was good enough for Shakespeare's fools, it is possibly not such disastrous and unblushing wisdom in our modern poets. At any rate, almost every literary man has some good politic friend in his acquaintance, some worldly sage who understands the strange whimsies of the world of busy men, one who always sells fresh fish in Lent, and is ever ready with the well-meant advice: "Go, mountebank their loves." And to be really charitable, if Nature has included in our parts any blessed and comfortable strain of sophistry, we must not be chary of exercising it.

IV.

It is not every man of letters who possesses either the scholastic acquirements or the temperament necessary to fit him for the duties of a professor of literature in a university, even if there were chairs enough to go round; and not all professors of literature, perhaps very few, can find in their intimate chronological acquaintance with literature just that overmastering urge to self-expression and creation which, deep down beyond all the plummets of comparative criticism and culture, is the metaphysical basis of all literature.

Although some very eminent men in the long roll-call of fame have occupied professorial chairs—from Erasmus to James Russell Lowell, it is the exception for writers to combine in anything like equal degree the critical and creative faculties, and so by far the greater number of those who contribute to what we call the belles-lettres are wholly absorbed in their one great passion. If that fails them, they have but the one resource of perverting their gifts to the base uses of literary brigandage.

In America it is true that the colleges and the churches have afforded employment that was not wholly mentally and morally dissipating and disastrous to some of the most eminent poets and thinkers, whose genius has redeemed the civilization of this country from the charge of mere industrial barbarism; and we may thank Heaven that these havens from the plague of popular interests have existed, or more men of genius would have been broken on the wheel than there have been.

The biographical dictionary of American authors, with a few conspicuous exceptions, is more than anything else a record of poor devils whose talents were wholly perverted, and whose lives were wrecked, by the accident of having been born into the wrong hemisphere.

Every man who is truly called to literature is not as surely called to learning, and usually has an instinctive abhorrence of theology, and as for the law, the average poet and imaginative thinker is apt to regard it as the sum of all villainies. In passing, let me say, however, that such an opinion is generally caught at a tangent from a more or less perfunctory contemplation of the lawyers. There are fascinations for the speculative mind in the philosophy of law. And therefore, if a writer is not one of the favored of the gods, who cultivate literature upon a patrimony, he is thrown upon the mercy of the varying tastes of the public, and that in a purely commercial community means infinite woe and degradation. And then, too, not every man, even when he has enough versatility of talent to accept the situation and live two lives, is content to appear before his fellows in a mask. His large overbrimming personality may be opposed to his more dubious talents, which, indeed, if too much indulged, would certainly imperil those very qualities and capacities which he made such sacrifices to save from overwhelming destruction.

The majority of writers, however, have little choice in this matter, as they are incapable of dividing their attention between literature (or, when they get wrecked, its immoral counterfeits and distortions) and any other pursuit. There are metaphysical hindrances which, after all, are as valid as mental or physical ones; and though the relation of literature and life must ever be intimate and unescapable, the poets and thinkers, irresistibly elected, will always constitute a Brahminical element in society. Even in our modern democracy there are more or less vague indications in some quarters of a revulsion toward that healthy government by minorities without which, in all intellectual and moral matters, every nation is in danger of stamping itself in history—imbecile.

In the beginning of this reversion from the poor clipt literature of the market-place and the brutalizing domination of vile and illiterate newsmongering, there will naturally be more or less intemperance and over-emphasis, some misleading revival of finnicked art, some mediocre mediævalism, and perhaps a flourishing bedevilment of Euphuism; but these will only be temporary phases; and, though in the nature of masks, since they do, at any rate, encourage independence of opinion and a diversity of observation and influence, they lead us circuitously to sanity and freedom and dignity in literature.

We are perhaps already upon the threshold of this new era—in the shadow of the Euphuistic revulsion from more deliberate and unforgivable platitude. Its most ludicrous manifestation is the invasion of literature by those merely fashionable wittlings of both sexes, who, in the economy of nature, should be content to circulate their second-hand witticisms and observations in ordinary social intercourse, and not go outside their proper province, which should be that of consumers and not producers.

If this craze of authorship among the comfortable classes is, however, a sign that our “high” society is not really all stomach, but is actually beginning to grow a head, we will suffer the infliction with becoming patience. But we pray that the wrath of God may not be upon us forever.

V.

It is exceedingly difficult for even the most versatile of men to belong to two radically different worlds, antagonistic in fact, and keep his identity separate and distinct in each, particularly when to remain in one at all he must completely forfeit, or, at least, put aside, his mental and moral integrity. Yet this is precisely the miracle that thousands who are compelled to find a meagre support in journalism endeavor to accomplish. They try to combine the character of the mountebank with that of the poet and thinker and teacher.

The most tragical circumstance about the horrible business of newsmongering, as we see it in this country, in its most degraded and most impudent form, is not so much that it panders to the lowest elements of society, but that its huge vortex swallows up and debases and strangles so many fine, generous, noble natures, who might perhaps have made the world better for their having been in it. And the newspaper makes of them what—what, in the name of God?—poor, self-disgusted intellectual bawds, tragical students of the tastes of thieves' kitchens and dens of infamy.

In case some amiable and virtuous knave in the great world of journalism, who finds the society of thieves' kitchens quite congenial, should imagine that I am not qualified to write upon this matter, I may say I have spent almost my whole life in newspaper offices, and have served in the ranks in every capacity, and I write out of the bitterness of a full knowledge.

We ought to make shrouds out of these sad and dreary sensational newspapers!

These are some of the masks of literature, and none can tell what tragedies are hidden behind them. The true, honest faces we seldom see; they are mostly banished to the very purlieus of literature. The American man of letters is an imp of letters after dark. When he is the bond slave and bravo of a newspaper he has not only the difficulty of having perpetually to try and forget the one world when in the other, of re-creating the essential atmosphere in each, but he has to fight against nature if he would ever accomplish anything worth doing. I have known hundreds of good, gentle, noble men who were bravos from high noon until two or three o'clock in the morning, who, upon coffee or quinine, to keep nature from utter insubordination, were poets, priests, and philosophers from two until six.

But every book written under such circumstances costs a life. And then, no matter how fine was a man's equipment for his work originally, if he would belong to himself he must not belong more than half the time to the Devil. The ogre of the newspaper office is behind his chair, nay, in his ink pot, all the time. He tries to banish the noonday criminal in vain. After a few years in the masked service of journalism, even the most robust talent is crippled and deformed; and for men who are lacking in vanity, doggedness of character and the most intense concentration and tenacity of purpose, a year or two as a journalistic cut-throat is enough to wholly corrupt and falsify their talent forever. "The dyer's hand is subdued to what it works in,"

There was a time when journalism was in some sort an apprenticeship to the higher forms of literature, teaching several important lessons. But within a quarter of a century the whole character of journalism in this country has changed. Even the ideals and standards of Mr. Jefferson Brick have been ruthlessly destroyed. Jefferson Brick at least had an ambition to teach an effete and corrupt civilization something of the glory of this land of political freedom. He a little over-estimated Jefferson Brick, that was all. But our contemporary journalism does not belong simply to the pot-house, it is of and for the bawdy house. In no country in the world has the divorce between journalism and literature been so complete as it has been for some years past in America. The amusingly Jovian dignity of the old journalism proper is a thing of the past; but it is supplanted by newsmongering of the vilest sort. Thirty years ago some of the best and greatest names in American literature were associated with the journals of the time, and some of the highest American literature was first published in the literary departments of the journals. It was Horace Greeley who encouraged Thoreau in the Tribune, and Thoreau was no sensation-monger. All this is now over. Instead of literature in the so-called literary supplements and Sunday newspapers, we have snippets of news and vulgar trivial gossip about the domestic life of the personalities of the prize ring, the stage and politics. And we must not forget that literary abortion—the omnipotent American “funny man,” who, in its ghastly antics, is more tedious than “Punch” itself.

All writing in a literary form which is impermanent by intention, is sheer perversity. What is impermanent in the arts should only be so from inherent weakness, and not intention. Every writer should write with all the fervor and labor necessary to insure permanence, whether he can indulge the hope and vanity of fame or not.

THE FASCINATION OF NEW BOOKS.

THE FASCINATION OF NEW BOOKS.

I.

THE fascination of old books has been celebrated by hundreds of pens. The names of Dibdin and Isaac Disraeli at once occur to one's mind as two of the most familiar and pre-eminent of orthodox bibliophiles, as one sweeps the department of letters in which this subject naturally arises. But almost every essayist in English literature has told us something about the resources and consolation afforded by a well-selected library of old books. Dr. Johnson, Burke, Goldsmith, DeQuincey, Hazlitt, and other writers innumerable, have paid their respects to the great dead, with whom they have held silent communion. One of Charles Lamb's most interesting essays treats of the delights snatched from old books at the booksellers' stands in the nooks and crannies of London, between the old East India House and Charing Cross.

But I do not recall any paper that touches upon the charm of absolutely new books. And yet almost every book lover, who is genuinely a lover of literature, will experience the constant fascination and temptation of the potentiality of new books. I have purposely implied a distinction between a lover of books and a lover of literature. It is one of the strange quirks of our imaginations, that we often come under the influence of the appearances of books, while we remain wholly impervious to the ideas they contain; as men seek the society of the wise (when their genius, if not their teaching, is recognized in the circles of authority), and love to boast, in other company, of their intimacy with poets and philosophers, with whose teaching their whole lives are at variance, and at whose unpractical character they often openly scoff. Thus there are thousands of good folk, whose social, political and religious orthodoxy induces a corresponding Toryism in taste, which never permits them to feel curious about what is growing on the other side of their traditionary fences; but who, nevertheless, industriously amass great libraries (and often write about them, too), and invest all their follies with the dignity of high authority. But these are usually mere lovers of "editions" with no true reverence for books at all.

In spite of frequent disappointments, the real lover of literature is provoked into an uneasy curiosity, that feeds upon delay, by every thoughtful, suggestive title he sees in the book-shops, or in the book publishers' advertisements, and every new name which emerges from obscurity, with a rumor of the true associations about it, tempts him to extravagance, and oftentimes to very real sacrifice.

Every book buyer has solemnly vowed a thousand times to begin immediately to put into practice a much needed policy of retrenchment; but I never knew one, upon whom the habit of book-buying had well fastened, who ever succeeded in practising strict economy in this one particular. Lots of book buyers are parsimonious, and often miserly, in all other matters, but they will not quake even at the possibility of the Bankruptcy court, when they have set their hearts upon possessing a certain author.

We writers should thank heaven for the existence of such men—they are rarely writers themselves. But more authors read books than the tradition will allow; although perhaps it is more raiding than reading.

Indeed, I once knew a literary man with a love of books, who left his wife one morning to entertain a sheriff while he went out to try to collect some debts for some literary journeyman work done ages ago. God wrought a miracle in his behalf! He succeeded in finding a publisher tender-hearted enough to pay something on account for the work done. He started for home in triumph,—and returned laden with old and new editions, penniless. Even his poverty did not satisfy his curiosity about his contemporaries; and poverty is apt to make us discuss our contemporaries a good deal and read them very little. He had been inveigled into an auction room, and the sheriff, his tearful partner and her admonitions, all had vanished completely out of his horizon.

We are always on the alert for the new prophet; but our insight is less than our curiosity, and we have usually a poor discernment of prophecy. On the other hand, we do not always keep our heads when we read those works which come with the stamp of authority, and so we often allow solemn dullness to impose upon our native judgment.

It is a common mistake of a certain class of critics and writers upon literature to assume that only the frivolous minded are subject to this curiosity about works just fresh from the press. The envy of the learned serves them in just as good stead as the curiosity of the vulgar. The masses have been shut out for generations from all awakening influences. They are but now getting together some rudimentary mental furniture to aid them in groping for their souls, and it is true that they fall, and very naturally, an easy prey to certain forms of literature, which are but forms and no more. The masses are not anxious about thought just molten into type; they have at present ears for words only. But let us try feeding them on ideas for half a century before we despair and become wholly reconciled to the vulgar diablerie of the newspapers.

Those who comprehend the thought of yesterday will be but too anxious to discover prophets in their own day. The denial of this by certain critics, who cling to the skirts of literary orthodoxy, because they are naked, is without significance to any one who has a real passion for literature. The diffusion of this vulgar error by these persons is due to the fact that their acquaintance with books has landed them in that apathy and indifference usual with the custodians of libraries and clerks in book-shops, who merely know the names of books. A new volume of Herbert Spencer is just as intrinsically important and valuable as would be the discovery of an unexpected manuscript of Aristotle. It is, in my view, quite as important that Herbert Spencer should live to complete the series of works which is to embody the thought of his lifetime, as that some archæologist should live to dig up an iron chest filled with old Greek tragedies, long supposed to have gone to limbo. If the find was a bundle of comedies we might hesitate, for there is much good philosophy in good comedy.

Those who are vitally touched and awakened in their contact with the great minds of all ages are conscious of the arbitrariness with which God orders their thoughts, altogether independently of worldly circumstances or happenings, and so they do not despair of to-day. I suppose even the most despondent of contemptuous Tories does not care to prophesy what the Almighty will do for to-morrow. For my part, I do not believe the world has at any time been empty of great souls and great poets; and so I open the most inauspicious looking volume with respect. It is, at any rate, possibly the best expression of a man, his highest ideas written in his most divine moments.

But I do think the world has often belabored its poets into silence. We are all so in love with our ogre of "circumstances" and the tributes we pay to it, that we have no sympathy for those, who, having no stomach for such vulgar self-diminution, die in the gutter silently contemptuous of our pot-bellied god. Perhaps some very great poets, finding the world so topsy-turvy, have not thought it worth while to reveal themselves to the maskers around them. It is scarcely a hopeful task to preach truth in a world whose symbol of government and society is the indifferent, stony-hearted sphinx. We are the playthings of a false Fate, and the deluded never forgive those who dare to declare the farcical nature of the delusion.

An appreciation and comprehension of the beautiful and profound in literature, as in life and nature, inevitably forces us to the conclusion that the clue to the mystery of life resides in something we have not, and can never hope to discover. Until the invisible mechanism of thought and love and passion and hope is revealed and explained by the physicists, every new philosophy and every new singer will influence our imaginations and fan the undying curiosity of the race. If the knowledge of our limitations forbids any prophecies, at least it increases rather than diminishes our passion for examination, and so the rumors that envelop every new thinker at once provoke our curiosity, and compound for our previous disappointments and loss of faith in our kind.

If we are ever disposed to fancy that we have the secret of God's universe under lock and key in our private libraries and national museums, we should get some intellectual barbarian to figuratively but forcibly maltreat us. This is a poor sort of vanity.

One of the prime uses of such a great, original nature as Walt Whitman — a man in a generation, for the most part, stifling in a clothes closet — is that he shakes us out of this small, arrogant humility to make way for dignity and truth. We should remember that in attributing omniscience to the old writers, we are merely seeking to assign an arbitrary limit to God's mysteries, so that we may, by rendering due homage to "The Golden Age" (the accredited and final manifestation of the divine intelligence stirring men's souls to poetry), awe our own generation into silence or cringing deprecation and humility, and so secure ourselves in the poor dignity of a barren honor in a barren day.

But the poet who, living outside the jurisdiction of literary legislation, and totally ignorant of its statutes and penal records, simply listens reverentially to the whisperings of God in the fields and in the market place, and afterward publishes an echo of what has thrilled his heart and soul, at once establishes the right of to-day to take its place among the infinitude of sunlit days. The new thought should have as proper a claim upon our respectful consideration, or at any rate upon our politeness, as would a stranger from another planet, who certainly might be expected to possess one or two secrets worth listening to. Every new poet is a pilgrim and an alien.

When one considers that vanity is the mother of blind Toryism (among other evils), one wonders a little at this denial of all grandeur in our own time. The old-fashioned Tory is a pessimist of the most pronounced and anarchistic type. He would destroy all the interests of his fellows because they have multiplied the interests of his forefathers. He wants to put us all into short frocks because Adam wore an apron of fig leaves. He deplures to-day because the hands of the clock have moved; but he forgets that the hands go round. He forgets that genealogy and its spirit is not the concern of poets. They have, of course, had forbears but fortunately hold these vague gentry of less account than themselves and their songs. It is poor human nature to take more interest in one's self than in one's literary godfathers. But the desperate Tory cares little for human nature, and he will have nothing to do with the new book because Jeffrey, or Gifford, or Lockhart did not review it.

In this matter most of us have outgrown our terror of jack o' lanterns somewhat, and we should have an immense deal of irreverent fun with the "Bloody Assizes" of literary criticism if it were held to-day. I, for one, would love to have a good tilt with Gifford or Croker, or any of the other solemn autocrats of respectable Tory dullness. I have egotism enough to think I should grow fat in laughing them into modesty — and I have never been able to get any flesh on my bones. But we only have our little revenges and vendettas in literature because they so often afford material for amusing "copy," and not because we are so entirely lacking in philosophy as to be unable to recognize their ludicrousness and futility. Heaven forbid we should take them seriously.

II.

THE habit of buying books, it must be suspected, has almost fallen into desuetude.

Indeed, in spite of the multiplication of public libraries, one might almost say that the reading of books is becoming a badge of eccentricity, and is regarded by the generality of men, who swallow the news and their meat and drink together, as a certain evidence of an unsound mind. We want our literature in small doses. For this reason, the craving for variety has made originality almost impossible.

There is perhaps more "study" and less reading of literature to-day than has ever been known since the invention of printing. The hourly issues of the newspapers have created a factitious appetite for mere words, which is a more effectual bar to all thought, education and appreciation of the true realities of life than mere illiteracy. As long as the newspaper takes the place of the book, the work of the schoolmaster and the minister of God is in vain. In the homes of the masses in the cities we too often look in vain for books; and the talk of our young men and women largely consists of the idlest repetition of catch words. In the country, where men live away from this intrusion of hourly "editions," if we do not find many books, and seldom many of the greatest and truest ones, at least we are often struck with the independent philosophical conclusions of these simple folk. Ideas are an excellent supplement to a library, large or small, and if they happen to be the genuine offspring of true instincts and intuitions, they will compensate for a very great deficiency both in the variety and the quality of the books one reads.

The most magnificent public library, with its infrequent and soothing snatches of human sounds, its book-lined, dimly lighted alcoves, inviting meditation, — although these possess a distinct charm, — cannot, in my opinion, rival in allurements the old-fashioned bookstore. The library in a way anticipates all your appetites at once, and so leaves you with a feeling of satiety and oppression before you have broken your fast. But the book shop has enough to tantalize you, though not enough to make you despair. It holds an incomparable delight, with its opening and closing doors; its buzz of conversation; its piles of new books, — their virgin souls pressed between covers of all imaginable shades of color (often alas! to remain un-fondled and unthumbed, although pressed upon those who come without opinions); its narrow passageways between stacks of books; its dark recesses, lit with ghostly gas jets, and its characteristic groups of habitués. The customers of any other kind of store usually all seem to be very much alike; but in a bookstore, one sees at a glance, all seem to have and to wear naturally, without accentuation or apology, their well-marked peculiarities of pose and physiognomy. Faces, whose vacuity we do not notice in a butcher's, excite our curiosity and wonder in a bookstore.

But perhaps the best place to read a book—old or new—is in a bare garret, where there are no other books or pictures to distract one, and where three flights of stairs impose silence between one and the world as effectually as the path to a mountain top. I cannot understand how a man could be the custodian of a public library, or even the owner of one of those splendid private collections (whose main purpose seems to be to make the lips of penniless book-lovers water with anguish), and write or even desire to write. Such a multiplicity of authors and subjects indeed is very seldom conducive to helpful reading.

But still it is easy to be wise in such matters, when a great deal of the attraction of books, new and old, consists in one's inability to buy them. A great many book-lovers have read much through the lack of pence which prevented the purchase of all the books they wanted. Possession would have deferred their curiosity and so ruined them.

There is a good story told of a certain bibliomaniac who when he wanted to refer to a book in his immense library sent out and bought a new copy. He lost half the charm of book-buying for his books did not represent any sacrifice.

Occasionally a good deal of the fascination of a new book is that we may one day meet the author of it, and so come into vital touch with the complement of the work. But if we reap anything from the book, it is usually fortunate for us that we cannot meet the author. Of course, in reading the old authors, although they are new to us in turn, this danger is removed (at least in this world); and as we all love a spice of danger we regret the loss of this element of attraction. It is this craving for a glimpse of the individual behind the thought, that makes us all so love biography, and, even more, autobiography. I suffer agonies every time I see advertised a new volume of memoirs, the price of which is beyond my resources. There are moments when our heartstrings seem to be wound about our purses; but, be it remembered, hearts are only concerned with empty purses! It is so seldom one meets a Man in everyday life, that one thanks Heaven for the happy phenomenon, which makes most men tell something of the truth, when they strive to reduce falsehood to truth's complexion on paper. The truth gets into our inkstands as well as into our cups. It is because our daily journals are mostly written in lead pencil that the truth so seldom slips into them.

But I, for one, am so nearly a spendthrift in my intellectual hospitality, that if ever the newspapers take to filling their great sheets with thought (even if it is only witty, dainty sophistry), I will gladly give up some of my precious hours of recreation to the reading of what this very morning has to tell me of the wonders of the last twelve hours. It is not that our newspaper press is so utterly deficient in morality, that pains me, so much as the fact that, it is so variously dull, and so irremediably stupid and vulgar. This is largely to be attributed to the conspiracy of wickedness which robs all journalistic writers of their independence by forcing anonymity upon them.

I flatter myself I am one of those who can receive a positive good, and not feel any necessity to diminish my benefits by comparing them to those I already possess. Therefore I give the same welcome to the new book which teaches me something or pleases me, that I accord to the old book which performs the same office. I confess that I do not care whether the printer's ink is wet or dry as long as the ideas are in it. To me all books are new, until I have got my heartstrings wound about them; and then every time I open them they evoke old memories and new thoughts, with every turning of the leaves. My reverential curiosity about every promising new book is perhaps apt to be more an arbitrary matter of a mood than it used to be years ago when it was a pure instinct; but still, however sporadic it may become, I am sure I shall never entirely lose it. If ever I do, it will not be that I am either wiser or more discerning, but simply that, wearied in my passion for truth, I have buoyed up my self-esteem by a conservative exclusiveness. It is one of the worst evils of old age that it is apt to account for all its increasing mental and physical failings by the rapid declension of the race morally and intellectually. It puts all its faith in old almanacs.

There is at least one author whose books will always be sure of generous attention at my hands, even if I live to become a nonagenarian. That author is myself. But there are other contemporary authors, whose works, apart from this peculiar circumstance, really have a stronger hold upon my imagination. Of course they cannot so closely touch my sympathies.

I can discover an excellent reason, without any difficulty, for a new volume of essays by that delightful egoist, Robert Louis Stevenson. Augustine Birrell and William Ernest Henley, too, have each a charmingly original style, — almost an anachronism in these days of the triumph of the "article" mode of writing, and a fine old feeling, quite eighteenth century, for essay-writing. We want all their books upon our shelves. A new novel by George Meredith is an event in many lives. I am catholic enough in my literary tastes to enjoy the fine touches of Andrew Lang's delicate humor and bantering Toryism ; although I confess I think a little more catholicity would be to the advantage of his literary morals. His style is the delightful quintessence of dilettanteism. But there is a sort of bantering more intolerant than Calvinism. I have dipped enough into Walter Pater, to know that he is preeminently a stylist, with a delightful indifference about what is going on in the world to-day. And what does it matter since to-day is only repeating unnumbered yesterdays? I cannot rest until I have, at least, had a glimpse of a new book by Oscar Wilde, for he has an exquisite gift of paradox, and paradox makes us all sit up. Besides paradox is the half of truth, and the one half is surely as good as the other. With one half the truth provided for us surely we can contribute the other half ourselves. It is a chance to test the truth within us. I do not believe, anyhow, that one can have a genuine love of truth unless one is somewhat susceptible to the beauty of sophistry. And then I must confess I read more for amusement than anything else.

As my taste in letters is essentially masculine I do not know much about the work of that sex which is, or should be, the poetry of life.

I am consumed with curiosity about every new work I see announced upon ethics, metaphysics, and philosophical socialism; but I regret that my ethics are too ridiculously antiquated to enable me to obtain possession of my favorite books through any less uncertain and troublesome method than that of barter and borrowing; and so my philosophical library is restricted to a few inherited volumes. But I console myself with the reflection that much of the best philosophy is contained in the works of the poets,—and in our own hearts, if we keep them young and merry, and open to all God's creatures; among whom, in our Transcendental moods, we can sometimes include humanity, in large and sufficiently remote and vague masses.

But when one tries to recall a few of the names even among one's contemporaries, the mention of which excite a pleasurable anticipation, they all slip out of one's memory. As Walter Bagehot says, "The fact of a book being a book goes immensely in its favor." I thank heaven that ignorance was not omitted from my patrimony, for as long as I live I am assured a vital and enduring interest in books. And some such interest as this gives us a perpetual consciousness of our higher selves, and so lends a dignity and purpose to lives poor and insignificant enough in performance.

The man with a hobby-horse seldom commits suicide. I have haunted the book-shops for years without a penny, and I shall never make away with myself, as long as the privilege of fingering the new books, and dipping into them, is accorded me upon the old conditions, viz.: that I purchase a copy of The Literary Guillotine every time my head is in the basket.

A RHAPSODY ON MUSIC.

A RHAPSODY ON MUSIC.

THE maestro has bowed and glided noiselessly to the grand piano. The hum is broken with a momentary hush, then rises again with hurried force into a wave of commentary, until pierced with a tremulous note demanding silence.

A minor chord or two follows, floating like a benediction into the body of the great hall, misty in the struggle of the incandescent lights with the waning light of the afternoon. It is the right light for music: one does not want a glare to dream in. A hush falls immediately upon the audience. The expressions on the upturned faces change rapidly, as if an angel had swept through the room, and in his flight had stolen the masks with which these "civilized" barbarians conceal the human in them. Music alone can compel this complete revelation of the human—this rare lighting up of men's faces with divine wonderment; music alone can create of a sudden this intense isolation in the midst of a crowd, that permits, and, indeed, enforces, this supreme abandonment of the imagination, this liberation of the poet imprisoned in every man's heart—this incontinent retreat into the riotous world of dreams. It is indeed the maddest, divinest of arts; none other can evoke this marvellous transformation of hard, worldly, animal, indifferent, selfish and careworn faces into beautiful, human faces—the faces we look for in the streets in vain, and lovingly welcome in our day-dreams.

Sculpture, painting and literature sometimes hold us in their thrall, and, indeed, the latter is often the record of the sister arts; still, they cannot dominate our every fibre as does music. There is no draught which can intoxicate more quickly than subtle harmonies. Music is our sport, and we are its sport: listening, we live all the lives we hoped to live in our early dreaming; and then live again the life we have lived—thus hovering ever betwixt the heights and the abyss, we taste the distillation of all joys and fears and miseries, and finding a sweetbitterness in all, we are delighted to be the playthings of this false Fate. All realities become the unrealities they are; only the ideas laughed at in the noisy streets outside seem valuable, and these are at once a consolation and a torture. Music makes us forget all things; and it brings everything back to memory. It flatters and mocks us; it lifts us up among the gods; it thrills us with power; it loosens a chaos of song diviner than any sung by men; it whispers of easy accomplishment on the morrow; and then drags up those yesterdays we thought were forever buried and reminds us that there is no morrow. It is the echo of our own hopes; and we, poor, fond fools, willingly accept its voice as an external certificate of worth and capacity; and, dreaming of that morrow, we are happy. Ah well, it is good to be happy—and what else can make us so?

After life and sunshine, music is the divinest, sweetest gift of God, who, to the ear attuned, graciously vouchsafes innumerable harmonies, even in the rattle of machinery and in the roar of crowded streets. But, of course, there is music in the shock of men ; for music is the universal consoler, and life is music. All Nature throbs with music. If it were not so, this would be a world of madmen ; for every rustle of the wind in the trees, every wash of the breakers on the beach, every cry of the birds, every sound, would come like a blow, torturing all the senses at once.

Listening to the music of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Chopin, Wagner, Schumann or Schubert, one enters a new world—a world entirely strange to most men ; and yet no man, once across the threshold, ever feels unfamiliar in it. It is the world of dreams—the mystic closet of the mind that every man possesses, but of which so few keep the key. The poet, the philosopher and the painter escape their poverty in this world ; and all have separate keys. But most men, in the absorption of prosperity, throw their keys away. They are the poorest of poor devils ; for dreams alone are real. One dreams, loses, and gains all there is to be gained. The other grubs among the muck-heaps of the world and gains much, but loses the secret of happiness. The only almost universal key to the gate of dreams, so rarely opened by the mass of men, is melody; and so the poet and the trader occasionally pass into this magic realm together. But the former would never credit the latter with any familiarity with it; and the latter could scarcely describe his acquaintance there. It is only by intuition that those to whom this is the real world of their lives can discover their fellowship in this workaday world: for the world of dreams is a world of intense isolation; and in this outer world the dreamers may be dreamers to each other, but they cannot possibly be dreams; and the only satisfactory companions of a dreamer are those of his dreams. Therefore the spirit world of music is like the great silence of death; it has a thousand entrances, unseen, stumbled upon only in the dark—and every man must enter alone.

Music is the confessional-box of the whole world. If one has a dormant conscience one fears to awaken, one should never go to a grand recital, for one is caught in the toils of sound, and stripped to one's self before one is aware of it. True music—and I allude to that kind only—is the arraigner of all cruelty, greed, pettiness, all misliving. It is the very poetry of passion; but it preaches a morality as rigid as the Decalogue's. All the grosser elements of a man are subdued, indeed, quite forgotten, under its spell. The man who would become the prey of his baser passions immediately after listening to a Beethoven sonata or a Mendelssohn march could (to use a paradox) never have had the patience to listen to such music at all. In the exaltation born of music one drifts naturally into introspective and heroic moods, and one is shocked to recognize one's littlenesses and meannesses in sudden hushes, or borne upon a wave of sound that sets all one's nerves thrilling with noble impulses while one is wholly unconscious of any physical being. But although music is an accuser—a conscience, that will not be swept aside, while it is throbbing in the air—it is also a great inspirer, a wellspring of worthy and human promptings. Music is not only the world's conscience; it is the world's comfort. One can find all one's moods, one's hopes, and one's failings and fears in its great heart, but one can find forgiveness also. It is the mother of great resolves and good resolutions, innumerable: and perhaps, if in our workaday world we lived to a continual accompaniment of sweet and bitter harmonies, men and women would be less indifferent, less selfish and less cruel; in a word, not only human, but humane. The fundamental problem of life which confronts all reformers of existing abuses—the insoluble question: how to reform human nature—might then be disposed of. But, I fear me, if there were any intermissions, the looting, the chicanery and the brutality would break out with renewed violence; and so my panacea for the pimply body politic is no more practical than those of the Sans-culotte political economists. Of course, in the woods, among the hedgerows, and along the seashore, the air is filled with God's music, and one can draw up a sane philosophy of life with it ringing in one's ears; but in the cities where a clatter of men's wheels and engines has been substituted for God's eternal music, such a philosophy would seem quite insane. And yet, for the poet, there are doubtless eternal meanings even in the recurrent, unceasing rumble of a city's traffic and trades. The music of the woods may be sweeter at some seasons, but the music of the streets is sadder, for it is the music of birth and life, misery and wrong, short-lived gayety and suffering and death; and still "the loom of time" roars on, and each generation repeats the same old dirge—and each thinks it is a new thing!

Every orthodox Christian dreams of a heaven where symphonies and chorals shall be unceasing; and perhaps this is a vague recognition of the fact that music is the most effective check upon the instinctive savagery of mankind. A heaven without music would be an immense anarchy. It is certain in this world that hearts which are quite indifferent to suffering, misery, prayers and pleadings, and bitter tears wrung from other human hearts, will soften in a few moments, as Mendelssohn whispers of a higher, diviner life. If men had but usually ears to listen, the music of the streets should have the same effect; but, alas, it more often happens that the roar of the great tide brushes any passing tenderness out of the heart, and the noblest badge of the noblest manhood is condemned as unworthy a man of the world. What an ironical phrase that is!

The musician is less and more than a poet. He is less in retrospect; he is more as long as his art holds us in its sweet torment. He is the creator of a shadow world in which the poet may revel, but which no words can describe. Music is a universal language; it is foreign in every land, but it needs no interpreter. All Babel can listen and comprehend, but no tongue can translate; for music is idealized sound, and something more; it is the soul of all philosophies, all religions, all strife, all peace, misery and happiness. We have grand poems and sonorous prose in our literature, but music is the only art possessing pure harmony that is at once ideal and common. There is something lacking in the grandest poetry, something indefinable, that is in every snatch of true melody; it cannot be explained or accounted for by theories or laws, but poetry may make mere moralists or even better men; music makes demi-gods. To be able to pile sound upon sound until it reaches a grand culmination of triumphant or despairing music is to be able to create, not only a few men and women — the triumph of the novelist! — but a whole world of marvellous peaks and seas and gods and goddesses: it quite transcends the delight of making beautiful English.

The world of the musician is entirely different from this world of reality, but it throws a startling, unescapable light upon realities; it is the world of romance, but it presents the realism of improbable dreams — and what can be more realistic than that? We delude ourselves with “realities.” Thought is the only real thing in the world, and though we can enter through our hearing alone, music is essentially a world of thought. All other possessions and pleasures are mockeries.

The musician holds the keys to human souls, long locked; and, though he cannot look therein, he does more — he throws them open to those who would fain shut out their cries and memories. And he gives all who care to listen the freedom of that ancient Eastern city of dreams, which exists in the mind of almost every man, and far transcends in mystery and splendor the Orient men go out in ships to see. Looking into the stolid face of your neighbor you can scarcely think it conceivable that he is floating in a garlanded barge, lying on a bed of roses, with his head in the lap of Venus, stricken with the languor of love, drunk with the singing of the Bacchantes dancing at the prow, a King of love and life—floating idly beneath an amethyst sky, on a gently rocking purple sea, broken into wreaths of pearls by splashing nymphs. But, good, respectable citizen and lying butcher that he is, your fat, red, smugfaced neighbor is actually in the highest of bad company; and his stupid-looking spouse, who, lacking an ear for music, lacks all that excuses her existence, does not know that her husband is a conqueror in the Court of Love itself. And he, poor man, will awake, and go home sad at heart—and perhaps grumble at his own beefsteak!

Music is a great paradox: it gives and denies; it consoles one for what is done irremediably, and makes one yearn for that which is unattainable; it laughs in one's face at one's success, or ennobles one's failure, and while comforting, dazzles one with triumphs beyond one's reach; or else one is caught up in the grandeur of the music, and wakes only to failure when the last note has died into silence, and the released hum of humanity—the disillusioning murmur of life, mocks one's new-born hopes. Music makes life more real, and dreams more vivid than life. It is the gate of Paradise, and the cheat of all mankind; it brings supreme fulfilment, great desire, or great despair; it is everything to every mind; it is the echo of thought and the germ of reflection; it can be a queen or a common paramour. It is the one art practiced of men which completely transcends humanity, without being repellent to the lowest intellect.

Music is the sea on which all the argosies of our hopes go safely into port. It is paradise to the sensualist and the ascetic. All can find in it what they seek. The poet who sees visions and dreams, but has to write for his bread, and so cheats all the world, listening, sees his page crowded with great thoughts. The artist sees his canvas start into life. The merchant, forgetting his counting-house and ledgers, lives again in the wonderland of his boyhood, when he, too, dreamed of being a poet. All who are disappointed in life are crowned with success, or made content with the revelation of the cheat of success.

In the mad world of music old faces are seen, cold lips are warm and return one's kisses, old hopes are renewed, old loves prove true. Faces filled with joy are dashed through a rent in the sound, as the air is still quivering with the crash of a fortissimo, and then in the minor chords become contorted with pain and disappear. The audience and the hall are swallowed up in the vague shadows of this world of sound. Here are demons, nymphs, strange lights and stranger shadows—a medley of the most grotesque imaginings and human memories. The wildest imaginations of men find expression in music, as they never can in words or color, for music is both; and miracle of miracles! the men who cannot understand the mysteries of the world of books, set forth in plain types, are immediately in sympathy with this stranger world of music. It is a world of sorrows and joys, of laughter, joyous and terrifying, and tears of happiness and despair. It is the epitome of human endeavor; the mockery of human accomplishment. It is God speaking to men through his human agents.

If all this is madness, take a fool's advice: Go and be mad for one evening — and live!

14 DAY USE
RETURN TO DESK FROM WHICH BORROWED

LOAN DEPT.

This book is due on the last date stamped below, or on the date to which renewed.
Renewed books are subject to immediate recall.

13 MAY '62 TW

REC'D LD

APR 30 1962

LD 21A-50m-3,'62
(C7097s10)476B

General Library
University of California
Berkeley

YA 02002

