We have now discussed all the principal features of the Act, without going into details, which a reference to the Act itself will supply. Enough has been said to show the general bearings of the change as effected by the Act in the law relating to settlements of real estate. From the conveyancer's point of view, the Act is as important as the Conveyancing Acts. For the future, it will be unnecessary for the draftsman to do more than indicate the persons who are to take successive interests in the estate and the quantity of interest to be taken, and to name the trustees. The rest of the lengthy roll of powers and provisions as to management and protection of the property and persons, now usually inserted, will henceforth go without saying. As the draftsman cannot curtail those powers, and as, in most cases, with the exception of the investment clause, there will be little reason for extending them, he cannot do better than avoid vain repetitions and much verbiage by leaving them alone.—Law Journal.

STOPPING THE MILL.—The late Judge Ball, observes a contemporary, though a charming conversationalist and socially popular, was very irritable. The Cork Courthouse, in which on one occasion he opened assizes, was backed by an ancient flourmill of large dimensions, owned by a very litigious gentleman named Bendeable. So close was the mill to the courthouse that the noise of the machinery disturbed the tympanum of Judge Ball, who was in his later years what is known as hard of hearing. "What noise is that, Mr. Sheriff?" he thundered, with fiery face. "It is a mill, my lord," meekly responded that functionary. "Let it be stopped," commanded the judge. "I cannot stop it, my lord," said the sheriff; "the owner is the only one who can do that." "Send for the owner then," said the judge. This was done, and the order given. Bendeable took it literally and unconditionally. The mill was stopped, and remained stopped long after the assizes was over. Bendeable, who was no fool, sued for damages, and the Government had to pay a large sum to compromise.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

The General Half-yearly Meeting of this Society was held on the 27th ult.

Mr. HENRY JAMES PELHAM WEST, President, occupied the chair.

Amongst those present were:—

Thomas R. Baillie-Gage, Arthur Lee Barles, George H. Belas, Augustine F. Baker, Francis R. M. Crozier, Wm. D'Alton, Sydneyham Davis, William J. Dealy, Henry A. Dillon, Henry Thomas Dix, John B. Eaton, Richard B. Falkiner, William Findlater, M.F.; Thomas C. Franks, David Galbraith, John Galloway, James Goff, Samuel Gordon, Keith H. Hallows, John T. Hamerton, William Hitchcock, John A. Hogan, Samuel Hobson, John F. Harkon, W. Milward Jones, Henry L. Kelly, Alexander D. Kennedy, Valentine Kibride, Michael Larkin, Robert O. Longfield, Jehu Mathews, Patrick Maxwell, Henry S. Mecredy, Thomas Merrick, Henry C. Neilson, Edward Nugnt, John Henry Nunn, Michael P. C. O'Meara, Thomas Ormsby, Richard H. M. Orpen, William Read, Samuel P. Redington, Richard S. Reeves, George Roche, Thomas K. Roche, John Ruckley, William H. Robinson, Archibald Robinson, jun., John L. Scallan, Bindon Scott, Charles Sedley, William B. Stanley, Charles G. Stannell, Edward T. Stapleton, William Sterne, Shapland M. Tandy, John E. Tarleton, Kapine H. Tatlow, Archibald Tisdall, Henry Watson, Henry James Pelham West, Patrick K. White.

The Secretary (Mr. John H. Goddard) having read the advertisement convening the Meeting, the following Report was presented by the Council:—

"SCHEDULE OF SOLICITORS' FEES UNDER JUDICATURE (IRELAND) ACT.

"By the Report of Council for 1881, your Society were informed that a letter, dated 5th November, 1881, had been received from Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, stating that the Committee of Judges to whom this matter had been referred would be glad to have the assistance of three members of the Profession when considering the Schedule, and suggesting that one of them should be specially selected to present the views of the country Solicitors; and intimating that the Committee would meet on the 19th November, to confer with the gentlemen who might be selected. Acting upon that letter, your Council selected your (then) President, Mr. John H. Nunn, and Mr. H. J. P. West, to represent your Society, and Mr. McClelland, the President of the Northern Law Society, Belfast, to represent the country Solicitors. The Deputation attended upon the Committee of Judges on the 19th November, and were received in the most courteous manner, when the matter was very fully discussed. The Deputation strenuously urged upon the Committee to adopt the English Schedule; and, having failed to bring the Committee to their views in this respect, they applied themselves to the consideration of the Schedule, item by item. The Committee of Judges, at the close of the interview, intimated their intention of meeting at an early day to consider their Report to the Council of Judges. Your Council, not having received any communication, wrote on the 4th of May last to Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, asking whether the Report of the Committee of Judges had been considered, as the subject would be mentioned at the General Meeting of your Society on 9th May, and received an answer from him, intimating that the Report was in print, but had yet to be submitted to the Council of Judges, and that the delay had been caused by the necessity for making inquiries from Taxing Masters in England and Ireland, &c., before the Committee could report thereon. The amended Schedule was gazetted on the 27th June, and was followed by a Supplemental Gazette of 11th July, correcting some inaccuracies to which the Council had directed the attention of the Judges. It will be seen that the Judges have declined to adopt the English Schedule, but have amended the Schedule as originally framed to a considerable extent, in accordance with the views pressed upon them by the Deputation; and while your Council remain of opinion that there is no reason why the Profession in Ireland should not, on the assimilation of the Practice, have been given a similar Schedule, they trust that the Schedule as now amended will, when applied by the Taxing Officers in a fair and liberal spirit, afford to the Profession reasonable remuneration. Your Council have on many occasions taken steps to discourage the employment as Town Agents of persons not being qualified Solicitors; and they desire to call attention to one item in the amended Schedule—viz., the term Fee for Agency Cases, where the Town Agent is a qualified Solicitor. The objection that the country practitioner could not afford the additional expense is thus removed, and the Council trust that before long every Solicitor in Ireland will see that it is his interest to be represented in town by a qualified Solicitor.

"SCHEDULE OF FEES UNDER SOLICITORS' REMUNERATION ACT (1881).

"Your Council have had under their consideration the draft Schedule prepared by their predecessors, and have been in communication with the Northern Law Society, Belfast; also with the Southern Law Association, Cork; and with the Incorporated Law-Society of London; but not being in a position to submit to you the result of their labours, they confide the matter to the attention of their successors.

"RE SOLICITOR TO INLAND REVENUE, IRELAND.

"This Bill has been printed, and your Council communicated with the London Law Society in reference to it; but it was considered that, even if introduced during the past Session, it could not have been proceeded with in consequence of the pressure of other proposed legislation before the House.

"BILLS BEFORE PARLIAMENT.

"The Council during their year of office had under their consideration a number of Bills which were brought into the House, some of which were afterwards withdrawn, and in others, some of the suggestions of your Council were adopted.

"OFFICE OF CHIEF CLERK IN BANKRUPTCY.

"On the occasion of a vacancy recently occurring in this office by the death of Mr. Thomas Farrell, your Council unanimously passed a resolution calling the attention of the Judges of the Court of Bankruptcy to the fact that the Chief Clerks of the several Divisions of the High Court of Justice must be selected either from the Staff of the Division or from the Profession of Solicitors, and expressing their hope that in filling the vacancy the interests of this Profession would be duly considered. The Chief Registrar replied by direction of the Judges, that there was no analogy between the offices referred to in the resolution of your Council and that of Chief Clerk of the Court of Bankruptcy, the duties of the latter office involving to a large extent the performance of judicial business, whereas the former officers were by the Act creating them precluded from doing business of a judicial character. Mr. W. H. S. Monck, a Barrister, was subsequently appointed. Your Council thereupon wrote to say that, admitting that the duties to be discharged by the Chief Clerk in Bankruptcy were, to some limited extent, of a judicial nature, they were precisely similar to the duties of the present Chief Registrar, who was a Solicitor, as were his predecessors, Mr. Brady and Mr. Bate; and they also called the attention of the Judges to the fact that the late Mr. Thomas Farrell was not a Barrister at the time of his appointment in 1857, nor for several years after, and expressed their hope that the late appointment of a Barrister thereto might not be taken as affirming the principle that the office ought to be limited to members of the Bar. No further communication has been received.

"RE LAW CLERKS' MEMORIALS, PURSUANT TO 29 & 30 VIC., CAP. 84, SEC. 19.

"During some years past a large number of Memorials have been presented to the Judges, pursuant to the above-named Act and Section, by Law Clerks seeking to have the Latin portion of the Preliminary Examination prescribed by the Rules of the Judges under the Act dispensed with; in some instances they have even gone to the length of asking to have the Examination entirely dispensed with. These Memorials have from time to time been opposed. Your Council felt it their duty to oppose in one remarkable case which occurred during their year of office, in which a Law Clerk, who had presented four Memorials to the Judges, between the years 1867 and 1871, praying that the Preliminary Examination might be dispensed with in his case (all of which Memorials had been refused), presented a fifth Memorial, praying their Lordships to order that all the Examinations required by the Rules of your Society might be dispensed with, and that, after the payment of all necessary stamp duty and fees, he might be admitted a Solicitor of the Supreme Court without being called upon to pass either the Preliminary or Final Examinations, or to serve any apprenticeship whatever. This application went so far beyond what had ever previously been sought for, and was so entirely without precedent and in every respect untenable, as well as so manifestly unjust to all those Law Clerk Apprentices who have duly qualified themselves and are serving their time, that your Council submitted their views in the strongest manner to the Lord Chancellor and Judges, and prayed that the applicant's Memorial might be rejected in its entirety, which was accordingly done.

"AN ACT FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRIME IN IRELAND—45 & 46 VIC., CAP. 25.

"Your Council having observed that, by the recent decision of one of the Legal Investigators appointed to hold an Inquiry pursuant to this Act, Solicitors were precluded from personally, and without the intervention of Counsel, advocating the claims of their clients upon applications for compensation for injury under this Act, a short Bill has been drafted to remedy what seems to have been an error, which Bill your Council recommend to their successors."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said the first matter referred to therein was their schedule of fees under the Judicature Act. He was sorry that they had been unable to report that they were successful in inducing the Judges to yield to what they, the Council, thought a reasonable view—namely, that on the assimilation of the practice of Ireland to that of England there should be an assimilation of the fees. They strongly pressed that view on the judges on every occasion, but without inducing them to fall in with it. They had, by the schedules gasetted on the 27th June and the 11th July, got a schedule which, he thought, might be fairly satisfactory. The schedule on the lower scale, applicable to proceedings at law, even as promulgated in 1878, was, with the exception of fees for marking judgments and the fees for attending records, an improvement upon the old schedule of 1854, which was the one in operation up to the Judicature Act. Some of the fees in that Act were increased. That for scrivency was doubled, and sums theretofore only chargeable in Chancery business were introduced. By the schedules of June and July last the fees for marking judgments had been somewhat increased, and the fees for attending records had been restored. By the second section of the 7th order the judges had power, on the hearing of a record, to direct that the costs of it might be taxed on a higher scale. Some of the Judges had expressed to him their willingness, in proper cases, to act upon that rule, and they furthermore expressed their sense that it would be an unjust thing that the costs of a very serious record—such, for instance, as one on a £10,000 policy against an insurance company, or any large action with respect to water or rights of way—should be taxed on the lower scale, while the costs of perhaps some trumpery proceeding in the Chancery Division must, according to the rule, be taxed upon the higher scale. He could not say that the higher scale—the one applicable to Chancery proceedings—was to any great extent an improvement on the former schedule, which was not so bad as the one of 1854 relating to common law business. Some few items had been slightly increased, but there was this to be said—that the schedule was a very elastic one, and he thought that if it were interpreted by men of liberal and enlightened views—such men as their three present taxing masters, who had themselves been practising members of the profession, who knew the great responsibility which devolved upon solicitors, and the enormous difficulties they had to contend with, and who were also cognisant of the numerous matters of business for which under no schedule did they receive any remuneration—he thought it reasonable to expect, and he confidently expected it would be interpreted by each gentleman in a spirit of liberality, not seeking where to reduce, but rather looking where some of these elastic rules would afford them an opportunity of giving the profession what, in the words of the report, they sought—reasonable remuneration. The report mentioned that the schedule issued on the 27th June had to be supplemented, in order to correct inaccuracies, by a further Gazette of the 11th July. It was a matter of great annoyance and pain to the Council that they were obliged to put the Judges to the trouble of meeting a second time in order to frame that supplemental General Order, but duty required them to have the inaccuracies rectified. If the Judges had, as he thought they might have done, permitted the Council to see a draught of the General Order before they had affixed their signatures to it, they would have been saved the annoyance and the Judges the inconvenience of having to meet again and issue a new Gazette. There was an item in the schedule of fees to which he would direct special attention, and it was intended to meet a matter which had been pressed on the Council during the twenty years that he had been a member of it. The Council, in 1862, commenced their endeavours to get rid of the practice, then pretty general, of country solicitors being represented in Dublin by persons who were not qualified practitioners. He was happy to say that the efforts of the Council in that respect had met with considerable success, and that now there were not very many such cases; but the Judges had now ordered that a 5s. term fee "shall" be paid in every country case where the country solicitor was represented in Dublin by a properly qualified practitioner. The report also dealt with the schedule of fees under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act (1881), and informed them that that matter had been under the most careful consideration of the Council, but added that they were not yet in a position to submit the result of their labours. He had no doubt that the incoming Council would give the same consideration to the subject that the outgoing Council had done. With respect to the Bill regulating the appointment of a Solicitor of Inland Revenue, two years ago the Council were directed to bring in a measure to make it impossible that a barrister should be appointed in future to that position, which they felt should be occupied by a solicitor. The bill had been slightly advanced. It was printed, but he thought the Council exercised a wise discretion in not attempting to have it passed during last session, which was, in fact, not possible. A number of other bills were brought in and submitted to the Council, dealing more or less with legal matters. These received careful attention from them, and from a sub-committee, and some had been withdrawn, while others, in which the views of the Council met with the approbation of the House, had been passed. In addition to these Bills, another one came under the consideration of the Council, having been sent to them by the official who had charge of it by direction of the Lord Chancellor. The report was silent on the subject because the Bill was not introduced, and he alluded to it because it would be gratifying to the profession to know that the wise course was adopted of obtaining their views on a Bill which proposed some very important legal and departmental changes before it was introduced into the Legislature. It received the careful consideration of the Council, who made some suggestions and amendments; and they had been assured that those would be attended to and the Bill altered accordingly when brought forward in the ensuing session. In reference to the Act for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland, it having been observed that one of the local investigators had declined to hear solicitors in an inquiry under the Act of Parliament, and it having been felt how entirely opposed that was to the spirit of modern legislation, and also how opposed it was to the interests of the profession, more particularly to the interests of those solicitors with clients in a humble position, the Council prepared a Bill, which they forwarded to one of their members, with instructions to endeavour to have it carried. They would have observed, from the answer of the Chief Secretary to a question in the House, that it was not likely that such a bill would be required, because a hint had been given which would probably be followed. He only alluded to that because it would show their country brethren that the Council were alive to their wishes and interests, even in small matters. He felt that they had not received from country solicitors quite the amount of support to which they were entitled. It was not so much their money as their moral support that was wanted, and he trusted that opportunities would be taken of bringing that Society more under the notice of those parties, and that they would be shown that it was clearly their duty as well as their interest to support it. The report also dealt with educational statistics, and from these it appeared that their profession was becoming more and more popular. They had at the last two examinations within a few of one hundred young gentlemen up for apprenticeship. He hoped their expectations might be realised, and the gloomy anticipations which, he candidly confessed, he was disposed to entertain with respect to the profession, would not be realised. He concluded by formally moving the adoption of the report.

Mr. J. H. NUNN seconded the motion, which was adopted.

The report of the scrutineers was then submitted, showing that the following had been elected as the Committee for the ensuing year:—William Findlater, M.P.; Richard R. Reeves, Michael Larkin, Arthur L. Barles, Henry Thomas Dix, Henry Leland Keily, Patrick Maxwell, Edward Thomas Stapleton, William D'Alton, John T. Hamerton, Jehu Mathews, Henry J. P. West, Charles G. Stannell, W. Milward Jones, William Read, John Henry Nunn, Archibald Tisdall, Keith H. Hallows, Francis R. M. Crozier, John Galloway, Richard H. M. Orpen, Thomas C. Franks, William Burroughs Stanley, Robert O. Longfield, Sydenham Davis, George M. M'Gusty, Shaplaod M. Tandy, Henry S. Meerey, Thomas R. Baillie-Gage, Henry Charles Neilson, and Thomas Knight Roche. Supplementalists—John E. Tarleton, Samuel P. Redington, John B. Eaton, Robert W. Peebles, John O'Hagan, Thomas Gerrard, Edward M'Gauran, Edward O. Murray, William C. Hogan, and Robert Johnston.

Mr. EDWARD T. STAPLETON having been called to the second chair,

Mr. WM. FINDLATER, M.P., moved a vote of thanks to the outgoing President for his dignified conduct during his year of office. Every member of the Society felt a deep debt of gratitude to him for the great ability and knowledge that he had brought to bear on the functions of his office.

Mr. HENRY A. DILLON seconded the motion, and

The PRESIDENT having responded,

The proceedings terminated.

PRESUMPTIONS OF SURVIVORSHIP.

All artificial presumptions of survivorship, where several persons perish in the same calamity, based upon strength, age and sex, have been subjected to a severe criticism by the sad tale of the loss of the "Asia," in a storm on Lake Superior during the past month. The occupants of the boat which contained the two survivors had equal chances of life. But if we take into consideration the fact that the captain and mate, who were in this boat, had in their favour constitutions inured to hardship, their chances were infinitely greater than those of the passengers in the same boat. Yet out of the whole number, two passengers, a mere boy and a mere girl, survived, the remainder of the boat's load sinking from sheer exhaustion or being killed by blows from the gunwale of the boat as it capsized. If it has happened once, so that it is capable of actual demonstration, that a woman has survived the whole number of a ship's crew and passengers, how often may it not have happened when incapable of demonstration that a woman has been the last to die in such a case. If all the passengers and crew had been lost on the vessel when she foundered, it might have been said that the chances of survivorship were in favour of the crew as against the passengers, and in favour of the male passengers as against the female. But the facts of this occurrence are such as to set at defiance all attempts to formulate any presumption which has a preponderance of reason in its favour. An arbitrary rule is all that can be arrived at; and the most reasonable one seems to be that which now appears to be the rule in our law, that where it is necessary or important to ascertain or consider which of two relatives survived, and there is no evidence respecting the circumstances of the calamity, it will be considered that both perished together.—Canada Law Times.

THE APPLICATION OF THE RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES TO RESTRAINT ON ANTI-CIPATION.

Since the year 1833, when the leading case of Cadell v. Palmer was decided, and the so-called rule against perpetuities clearly ascertained and marked out by the House of Lords, there has been comparatively little room for attempts to evade that branch of our law which prohibits restrictions beyond certain limits upon the alienability of property. A point, however, has been raised in more than one recent case which calls in question the applicability of the rule against perpetuities to a clause of almost invariable occurrence in settlements—namely, the clause restraining married women from anticipating or otherwise disposing of their beneficial interests.

It will at once be seen how such a provision may contravene the law of perpetuity. Suppose, for instance, that by an ordinary marriage settlement a fund is settled for the benefit of the husband and wife, and then for their children as they shall appoint. They have daughters, and appoint the fund to them for their separate use without power of anticipation. The daughters marry, and the parents die. Now, bearing in mind that in the case of a special power the period is to be reckoned from the instrument creating, and not from the instrument executing, the power, it is evident that in the case we have supposed the interest of each daughter is tied up during her entire coverture—a period which may obviously exceed twenty-one years from the death of her parents. The question, therefore, arises whether the appointment is void, or the restraint upon anticipation alone is void and the appointment good.

To a question, so probably of frequent occurrence, it might be expected that a distinct answer would have long ago been given. Nevertheless, decisions involving the difficulty are not plentiful, and of those which are usually cited as authorities some appear to be of doubtful value upon the particular point which we are considering.

Thus, in Thornton v. Bright (2 Myl. & Cr. 280), where an appointment was made by a father to a married daughter for her separate use without power of anticipation, Lord Cottenham, it is true, held the appointment to be a valid exercise of the power; but the contest turned entirely upon a point other than the question of remoteness, which, as far as can be gathered from the report, was neither argued nor alluded to in the judgment. So, on the other hand, a mere dictum of Lord Romilly, unnecessary to the decision of the case, in Armitage v. Coates (35 Beav. 1), has been relied upon as laying down the rule that the restriction would be invalid. But, on the whole, so far as the less recent cases have considered the point, it appears to have been fairly well established that, where the restraint may exceed the legal limits, the court will reject it, but will uphold the remainder of the appointment. The question was so determined by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, in Pry v. Copper (Kay. 163). That decision was followed by Vice-Chancellor James in Re Teague's Settlement (L. Rep. 10 Eq. 564), and by Vice-Chancellor Malins in Re Cunyng-ham's Settlement (L. Rep. 11 Eq. 324); and an order to the same effect was made by Vice-Chancellor Hall in Re Michael's Trusts (46 L. J. 651, Ch.)

Of the later cases upon the subject, the principal one is that of Buckton v. Hay (11 Ch. Div. 645). Here a fund was bequeathed by a testator in trust for his niece for life, and after her death in trust for her children living at her death, and the issue then living of any child then dead, in equal shares, the issue to take their parents' share; any legatees, being females, to take for their sole and separate use without power of anticipation. The niece survived the testator, and died, leaving two married daughters. In this case, the niece being the life in esse within the meaning of the perpetuity rule, it is clear that, as in the case we supposed above, the restriction upon anticipation, if valid, might endure beyond twenty-one years after her death. The Master of the Rolls, considering that he was bound by previous decisions, held, with evident reluctance, that the restraint must be rejected as invalid. The view for which he expressed his preference was, that the clause against anticipation ought to be regarded as an exception to the general law against perpetuities. "In the first place," he says, "the law of this country says that all property shall be alienable; but there has been one exception to that general law, for restraint on anticipation or alienation was allowed in the case of a married woman. That was purely an equity doctrine, the invention of the Chancellors. . . . That exception was justified on the ground that it was only the way, or at least the best way, of giving property to a married woman. . . . Then there was another rule, also invented by the Chancellors, in analogy to the common law. . . . That is called the rule against perpetuities. This rule was established directly in favour of alienation; it merely carried out the principle of law that property is alienable. The theory of both rules is, however, the same—namely, that property is alienable, though it may be made inalienable to a certain extent and in a peculiar way. The question is, whether the restraint on alienation should not be allowed within certain limits under the one rule as well as under the other. The first exception is a clear and manifest exception to the general law, which says that property shall be alienable. The question is, whether there should not be a similar exception to that branch of the general law which says that property shall not be inalienable beyond a life in being and twenty-one years after. But this question does not appear to me to have been well weighed or considered."

Seeing that, notwithstanding his own opinion upon the subject, the Master of the Rolls felt himself bound by previous decisions to reject the restriction, it is curious to find that in a subsequent case another judge considered himself empowered by authority to uphold a similar provision. In Herbert v. Webster (15 Ch. Div. 610) a fund was, by a post-nuptial settlement, settled upon certain trusts during the lives of the husband and wife, and then upon trust for their sons and daughters in equal shares, and if daughters for their separate use without power of anticipation. Two daughters were at the date of the deed married, and there were no more children. Upon these facts Vice-Chancellor Hall held the restraint valid, being apparently of opinion that the daughters were, according to a decision of Lord Hatherley in Wilson v. Wilson (4 Jur. N. S. 1076), lives in esse at the date of the settlement, and therefore within the limits of the perpetuity rule. This case, therefore, cannot be regarded as affecting the general application of the law of remoteness.

With regard to the general question, whether the restraint on anticipation should be exempted from the law of perpetuities, there appears to be much force in the observations of the Master of the Rolls in the case we have referred to. If the restriction be an infringement of the rule against perpetuities, a father would be prevented from appointing to his daughters in a way most beneficial to them—namely, in such a way that the daughters, and not their husbands, who are not the objects of the settlor's bounty, should receive the benefit. But, whatever reasons there may be on the ground of expediency or otherwise for holding the restriction exempt, there is clearly at the present time no express authority for so doing; on the other hand, the cases, so far as they go, imply a contrary doctrine. The point, no doubt, is still open to the Court of Appeal, but it appears scarcely to be expected that its decision would be in opposition to the evident current of authority.—Law Times.

THE SUPPOSED PLOT AGAINST THE IRISH JUDGES.

The Morning Post says that it is suggested that the origin of the murder of Constable Cox on Saturday night was that a plot was in course of execution to murder several of the judges who were dining at Judge Harrison's in Mountjoy-square, and who, in fact, passed the corner of Abbey-street at a quarter-past eleven, a few minutes after the murder. The Lord Chancellor and Mr. Justice O'Brien were among them.

MR. JUSTICE TYRRELL.

It is pleasant to record the success of Irishmen abroad at a time when they are denied honour by their countrymen at home. Mr. William Tyrrell, the newly gazetted Judge of the Allahabad High Court, is a very distinguished Trinity College man. He was first scholar and first gold medallist in Classics, and with these University honours joined the Bengal Civil Service in 1859. Rising rapidly through the junior grades of the service, he became Under Secretary to the N. W. P. Government in the Judicial Department, then Judge of the Court of Small Causes at Allahabad, then Registrar of the High Court. From this post he was promoted in due course to a District Judgeship, first at Bareilly and then at Allahabad. He then officiated on several occasions during the temporary absence of High Court Judges, and he has now attained the highest honour open to the judicial branch of the service.—Daily Express.

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.

Messrs. William Irwin and F. W. Meredith, jun., have been admitted Solicitors of the Court of Judicature.

A CHINESE WITNESS.—In California, where there are plenty of Chinamen, the usual Western method is employed in swearing them; so, at least, one may infer from the account of a recent trial given in the Courier de San Francisco of the 29th of September. The judge, evidently not being quite satisfied that the witness understood the object of the form he has just gone through, asked him, as is usual in such cases, if he understood the nature of an oath. "Perfectly," replied the witness, with the utmost confidence; "I know that if I tell a lie everyone in the court will be damned." An equally amusing illustration of the ignorance of the Chinese in the matter of our judicial oath was furnished some time ago by the native usher in the Consular Court at Shanghai. He was observed to be making an anxious search for some missing object; and, on being questioned by the judge, he stated that he was looking for the little book which is given to the witness to smell! And this man had been for eighteen years usher of the court!

Law Professor: "What constitutes burglary?" Student: "There must be a breaking." Professor: "Then if a man enters your door and takes a sovereign from your vest pocket in the hall, would that be burglary?" Student: "Yes, sir; because that would break me."

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS.

Sir J. Pope Hennessy, K.C.M.G., Governor of Hong Kong, has been appointed Governor of the Mauritius.

Mr. William Tyrrell, of the Bengal Civil Service, has been gazetted a Judge of the High Court of Allahabad, N. W. P., India.

Mr. James H. Monahan, Q.C., has been appointed to investigate all applications for compensation under the Prevention of Crimes Act that may come before him at the following places:—Ennistymon, on the 8th inst.; Ennis, on the 11th; and Tulla, on the 18th.

Mr. Gerald FitzGerald, Barrister-at-Law, has been appointed to investigate the several claims for compensation under the Prevention of Crimes Act that may come before him at the following places:—Castleroa, on the 4th inst.; and Boyle, on the 7th.

Mr. M. F. Puroell, Barrister-at-Law, has been appointed an Investigator under the Arrears of Rent Act.

Mr. William Gilbert has been appointed a Commissioner for Administering Affidavits for the City and County of Waterford.

ABYSSINIAN LAW.—The courts of justice in Abyssinia are somewhat primitive places. The advocates plead tied together by their robes. While one is speaking no interruption is permitted, but as some concession must be made to long-suffering human nature pent up under the agony of hearing vituperations and allegations known to be false, the other advocate is allowed to grant when he considers some passage in his opponent's speech particularly objectionable. A case is often settled by bets. For instance, a man will wager so many cows that he is in the right, and the other will do the same. The result is that the loser must pay his bet to the chief as a fine. In this manner a dispute about a matter of five shillings will cost a wordy individual who has trusted to the "glorious uncertainty" of Abyssinian law ten or twelve pounds. We had something not very widely different once amongst ourselves, when cases could be decided by a wager of battle to an opponent in a court of law. An Abyssinian is a quarrelsome and excessively vain personage, and his litigious disposition is greatly owing to the possession of these dubiously commendable qualities.—From "The Peoples of the World" for December.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

KING'S INNS.

HONOR EXAMINATION.—25TH OCTOBER, 1882.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

Examiner—SAMUEL WALKER, Esq., Q.C.

1. Give the form of a negotiable Bill of Exchange drawn by A on B, and payable three months after date; and also of a Promissory Note on demand by A to B not negotiable.

2. On the 1st January, 1882, A gives three notes to B or order, each payable three months after date. In no case is there any consideration for the notes. On the 1st April, B endorses one note to C without value, and on the 2nd April B endorses for value another note to C, and on the 1st May the third note for value to C. What are the remedies of C in each case against A, and how and why are they affected?

3. A gives to B a paper with a bill stamp on it and his (A's) name written across it—ordinarily called an acceptance in blank. To what extent, and when and how can B use it?

4. A gives to B for value a note not negotiable and another negotiable. B loses both notes. What are his remedies against A, and how and with what qualifications in each case can he enforce them?

5. A, on the 1st January, 1882, gives to B three notes:
One payable on demand;
One payable one month after demand;
One payable three months after date;

when does the Statute of Limitations begin to run in each case?

6. A and B give a note to C, who pays the consideration to A. B only joined as surety at C's request, and when the note becomes due C, at A's request, and without B's knowledge, renews the note to A only, for three months, and A fails to pay. Can C then recover against B? If not, why; and how could he have protected himself?

7. A, B, C, and D, give their joint and several note to E, for £100, and E makes A pay the whole: what remedies has A against each of B, C, and D?

8. What alterations can be made in a Bill without vitiating it? What are "material" alterations? As against whom will a bill be valid notwithstanding a material alteration?

9. A draws a negotiable bill on B, who accepts it, and A endorses to C, who endorses to D: as against whom must the bill be presented for payment by D: and at what place and when?

10. What is the effect of "The Summary Bills of Exchange Act?"

11. What is a "qualified" acceptance, and give examples of it?

12. A draws a cheque on a bank in favour of B or order, B loses the cheque, and a finder, without authority, endorses B's name on the cheque, and obtains the money from the bank. In what cases will the bank be liable to A, and in what not? And by what form of cheque can A guard against risk?

Holloway's Pills.—With the darkening days and changing temperatures the digestion becomes impaired, the liver disordered, and the mind despondent unless the cause of the irregularity be expelled from the blood and body by an alterative like these Pills. They go directly to the source of the evil, thrust out all impurities from the circulation, reduce distempered organs to their natural state, and correct all defective and contaminated secretions. Such easy means of instituting health, strength, and cheerfulness should be in the possession of all whose stomachs are weak, whose minds are much harassed, or whose brains are overworked. Holloway's is essentially a blood-tampering medicine, whereby its influence, reaching the remotest fibres of the frame, effects a universal good.

LAW AND SENTIMENT.—Our English cousins need not arrogate any importance to themselves because of the "Married Women's Property Act of 1882;" because we antedate them several years in this respect. In this district, and in a number of the States, such laws prevail; and in the territory of Wyoming the dear creature really vote and hold office. We have expressed our views quite often concerning such laws. They are standing menaces against the matrimonial state, as well as against the rights of mankind. While we stand firmly and affectionately by every right of theirs, we will still protest, because of our love for them, against their becoming the promoters of family broils, instead of fulfilling their sweet mission on earth—that of affection and concord.—Washington Law Reporter.

CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS.—III

A, WITH the intention of shooting his mistress, Maria H., entered, armed with a loaded pistol, the house in which she lived. Not finding her alone, he waited until she left the chamber where she was. When she came out he addressed her, and, after a short conversation, pointed the pistol at her breast. His intention was to kill her; but, the firing of the pistol was not his immediate act, but was caused by the pistol being struck by her. Is he responsible for murder; can it be charged that the pistol was fired by him when it was really fired by her?—questions Dr. Bar, a very eminent German jurist, in his collection of moot cases in criminal law, published in 1875. What would seem to be a precedent for an appropriate verdict in such a case as this (of which this translation will doubtless be more acceptable than the original, in the "Strafrechtsfälle zum akademischen Gebrauch und Selbststudium,") we find in a curious and rather rare volume, called "Life in Ireland," published in 1821. A visit is paid to the Four Courts, which, quoth the author, "has always reminded me of my Lord Mansfield's handsome farmyard, near London, which opens by gothic entrances into a dozen hogsties, and verily the well designated swinish multitude are always found in abundance in and near those pavilions of public reprobation. A cause had just come on, before my Lord Dawerwit, of some notoriety if not of great interest. A gentleman was arraigned, for that he shot his friend, for love, in a duel. The fact was admitted, and the prisoner pleaded in extenuation of the offence, that he could not help hitting his antagonist, by reason they fought at a 'short arm's length.' The plea was good, and a verdict given, 'culpable suicide by compulsion,' to the satisfaction of an indifferent court." Here, however, it is not with the crime of homicide that we have to do; but, in reference to the case mooted by the learned Professor of Law in the University of Breslau, it may be questioned whether A would even be chargeable with having attempted to discharge the pistol, if, as we have seen, according to R. v. Lewis, merely presenting it would not have been sufficient, and if, according to R. v. St. George, the statutory offence would not be committed when the intending perpetrator is prevented from pulling the trigger. We doubt not that he would have been guilty of an "assault with intent to commit a felony": cf. The People v. Bird, and The People v. Lilley, previously cited; State v. Church, 63 N. C. 15; Mullen v. State, 45 Ala. 43 (et cf. People v. Comstock, Oct. 20, 1882, 13 N. W. R. 617). Even a threat to shoot, coupled with the act of presenting a loaded firearm, although it is only "half-cock," is an assault, there being a "present ability" of doing the act threatened, as it could be done in an instant: Osborn v. Veitch, 1 F. & F. 317 (and as to where the firearm is not sufficiently loaded, see R. v. James, 1 C. & K. 530; R. v. Baker, ib. 254; State v. Swails, 8 Ind. 524; Hamilton v. State, 36 ib. 280; 1 Bishop Cr. L. s. 677; 24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 19; the onus lying on the prosecution to prove that it was loaded: Whitley's case, ubi supra; Blake v. Bernard, 9 C. & P. 626; contra, Burton v. State, 3 Tex. Ct. App. 408). But, that is not here the question, any more than whether the intending assassin would have been responsible for murder. And apart from the statutory offence, as narrowed by the rulings in R. v. Lewis and R. v. St. George, it may be that a possible common law misdemeanour was committed, there having been clearly an overt act done with intention to commit a felony. Even where the offender voluntarily desists from the actual commission of a crime he may be guilty of the offence of attempting to commit it. So, where a man knelt down in front of a stack of corn, and lit a match, intending to set the stack on fire, but, observing that he was watched, blew out the match, it was held that he had attempted to set fire to the stack: R. v. Taylor, 1 F. & F. 511; cf. The People v. Bird, ubi supra. And on the other hand, the guilt of an attempt with intent (which may be either primary or secondary: R. v. Gillow, 1 Moo. 85; R. v. Davis, 1 C. & P. 306) to murder—merely to temporarily disable not being enough: R. v. Boyce, 1 Moo. 29; see R. v. Jones, 9 C. & P. 253—will be the same, even though the intent be not directed against the specific individual on whom it is carried into operation; as where by mistake the poison or blow reaches a third person in regular course of things, though not contemplated by the perpetrator: R. v. Smith, 25 L. J. M. C. 29; R. v. Lynch, 1 C. C. C. 361; R. v. Lewis, ubi supra; cf. R. v. Stopford, 11 C. C. C. 643; R. v. Cox, R. & R. Nor would it be a ground for inferring the absence of intent to murder, that the immediate object was merely to cause a miscarriage: R. v. Wilson, D. & B. 127; cf. Kelly v. Commonwealth, 1 Grant, 484; Bechtelheimer v. The State, ubi supra; and see com. on R. v. Heap, 9 Ir. L. T. 220; and a person who gives another a drug to be taken in the absence of the giver "causes it to be taken," and, it would seem, "administers" it, within 24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 58, though absent when it is taken: R. v. Wilson, ubi supra; R. v. Farrow, D. & B. 164; R. v. Harley, 4 C. & P. 369; R. v. Dale, 6 C. C. C. 14.

Again, soliciting another person to commit a felony or doing any act with intent to induce another person to commit such offence, is a misdemeanour, whether the crime is or is not committed: R. v. Gregory, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 77; R. v. Ransford, 31 L. T. N. S. 488, 13 C. C. C.; and see cases cited in Steph., Dig. Cr. L., Ch. 5; and so with regard to solicitation to murder: 24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 4; R. v. Most, see com. 15 Ir. L. T. 341; and as to accessories before the fact in manslaughter, see R. v. Galway, 7 C. C. C. 253, D. & B. 291; R. v. Murphy, Jebb. Cr. & Pr. Cas. 305; Steph., Dig. Cr. L. Although, if two persons agree to commit suicide together, and one escapes but the other dies, the survivor is guilty of murder (R. v. Dyson, R. & R. 523; R. v. Russell, Ry. & M. 356; R. v. Alison, 8 C. & P. 418; and see R. v. Fretwell, L. & C. 161; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 27, s. 6; Keilw. 136; Moor, 754; 1 Hale, P. C. 411-419), an attempt to commit suicide is not an attempt to commit murder, within the Offences against the Person Act (24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 15; R. v. Burgess, L. & C. 258), but still remains a common law misdemeanour. In R. v. Leddington (9 C. & P. 79), a man was charged with inciting another to commit suicide, and Alderson, B., directed an acquittal, saying, "This is a case which by law we cannot try;" but, as Sir James Stephen observes, the reasons for this direction are not given, and a note to the case does not make them clear. And the general principle is that an attempt to incite to the commission of a felony is a misdemeanour; so, where A writes and sends a letter to B, inciting him to commit a felony, A is guilty of an attempt to incite, though B does not read the letter: R. v. Ransford, ubi supra; and as to aiding in an attempt, see R. v. Hapgood, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 221; R. v. Wyatt, 39 L. J. M. C. 83. As to whether a person can be convicted of inciting another to commit a felony, where the latter is ignorant that the act to which he was incited was a felony, see The Queen v. Brien, reported in our present issue, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 106, and note thereto, referring to the observations of Sir James Stephen on R. v. Welham (1 C. C. C. 193).

"LAW JOURNAL REPORTS" FOR DECEMBER.

In all sixty-two cases are reported, of which eight are from the Privy Council, twenty-nine from the Chancery Division, thirteen from the Queen's Bench Division, nine from the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and three Magistrates' Cases.

The first of the Privy Council cases is that of The Melbourne Banking Corporation v. Brougham, in which a release of an equity of redemption by an assignee in bankruptcy was called in question by the bankrupt. In Muscorie v. Raynor a bequest to a wife, "feeling confident" that she will divide the property among the children on her death, was held not a precatory trust. In Russell v. The Queen it was decided that the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors belongs to the Canadian Parliament, and not to the provincial legislatures—a decision which might not be without interest in Cornwall and elsewhere at the present moment, when local liquor Acts are advocated. In Harris v. Perkins it was decided that a suit under the Public Worship Regulation Act did not abate by reason of the churchwarden who instituted it going out of office. In Martin v. Mackonochie the Privy Council decided that the Dean of the Arohes had no power to pronounce a clerk guilty of an ecclesiastical offence, and yet to inflict no punishment but payment of costs, so that Mr. Mackonochie was remitted for punishment. In The China Merchants Steam Navigation Company v. Bignold one ship was to blame in respect of a collision, but the other was to blame in respect of lights, and although lights had nothing to do with the collision, the damage was divided, according to the Admiralty rule. In Merriman v. Williams it was decided that the Bishop of the Church of South Africa has no jurisdiction over a church conveyed to trustees for Church of England services; the South African Church being severed from the Church of England by a proviso in the articles constituting it that in matters of faith it should not be bound by the English decisions. In Ross v. The Charity Commissioners the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, was construed so that an old charitable endowment appropriated to educational purposes by the Court of Chancery within fifty years might be dealt with under the Act.

In The Yorkshire Railway Waggon Company v. Maclure—the first of the Chancery cases—the Court of Appeal upheld a transaction in which a railway company, having exhausted its borrowing powers, sold rolling stock to a waggon company, the stock to remain at hire in the possession of the railway company, which was to pay by instalments, in five years, a sum equal to the purchase money and interest and regain the stock. In Cooper v. Vesey, in the Court of Appeal, a deed of mortgage of land executed by a son in his father's name, which was his also, after his father's death was pronounced a forgery, and, although registered in Middlesex, was held only to pass the son's beneficial interest as against the trustees—of which he was one—of the father's will, which was not registered. In Attorney-General v. Gaskell the Court of Appeal overruled a remarkable objection to answering interrogatories, namely, that they related to matters in issue as to which the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs. In The Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Company v. Beall the Court of Appeal laid down that an interlocutory injunction against a libel prima facie privileged ought hardly ever to be granted. In Taylor v. Johnston a gift of £500 by a girl aged twenty made a few days before her death was upheld by Vice-Chancellor Bacon. In Lambert v. Neuchatel Asphalt Company a shareholder was pronounced on the construction of articles of association, not able to interfere to prevent the payment of dividends out of net profits. In Kinlock v. The Secretary of State for India the House of Lords held that the Royal warrant by which the Banda and Kirwee booty had been granted to the Secretary of State in trust for the persons entitled, did not make the Secretary of State amenable to the Courts in respect of the matter. Robinson v. Ommamney is a case in which the donee of a power of appointment made an appointment which she covenanted not to revoke; whereupon she became bankrupt, and afterwards made another appointment. It was held that her estate was liable in damages, the bankruptcy being that of a non-trader under the Act of 1861. In Ransome v. Graham seventeen combinations of letters used for ploughs of different quality and pattern, and registered, were pronounced by Vice-Chancellor Bacon to be valid as trade marks. An Appeal against this decision was, on Saturday, November 25, dismissed with costs by arrangement. In re Hever, ex parte Kahan, decides some points on a bill of sale, which was held good against trustees in bankruptcy, although registered after the bankruptcy, but within the seven days. In Watson v. Holiday it was held, by Mr. Justice Kay, that a patentee may prove in bankruptcy against a person infringing the patent for the amount of the profits, the demand not being for unliquidated damages. In Ex parte M'George, re Stevens, it was held that to constitute the act of bankruptcy of a trader departing from his dwelling-house, the alleged bankrupt must be a trader at the time of the act of bankruptcy, and it is not enough that he was a trader when he contracted the debt. In Lett v. Osborne, a will leaving property among a family from Sophia downwards was interpreted to include Sophia herself. In the case of In re Parnell, ex parte Ball, resolutions for liquidation in the case of a debtor to the extent of £1,293, with assets nil, and a salary of £5 a week, were declared an abuse of the process, and registration was refused. In Berry v. Keen a receiver was appointed where the title was in dispute. In the case of In re Weld, the Court of Appeal sitting in lunacy laid down that a committee to whom arrears of allowance are due has no power to mortgage them for the benefit of the lunatic and his family. In May v. Thomson the Court of Appeal pronounced the sale of a doctor's practice and house to be one transaction not concluded unless the terms as to the practice were agreed upon. In the case of Re Hutchinson's Trusts a bequest, "after the decease of F. H. S. and R. S., to their children, share and share alike, and their heirs for ever," was held to give half to the representatives of F. H. S., who had no children, and half to the children of R. S. In Williams v. Preston the Court of Appeal held that there was jurisdiction to rehear a case when a solicitor fraudulently made admissions in the statement of defence upon which judgment went. In Ex parte Luxon, in re Pidsley, it was laid down that appeals in bankruptcy to the Court of Appeal, like appeals to the Chief Judge, ought not to be entered without a certificate from the bank of the payment of the deposit. In Van Ghelueve v. Neringckx an unregistered judgment debt was held to rank as a simple contract debt, bearing interest. In the case of In re Moir, ex parte Moir, the bankrupt, who had been a promoter of companies, and produced no accounts but his pass-book and counterfoils of cheques, was ordered to file a cash account for the two years preceding the bankruptcy. In the case of In re Huggins, ex parte Huggins, the pension of a retired colonial judge was held by the Court of Appeal to vest in his trustee in bankruptcy, subject to a part only being applied for the creditors' benefit. In the case of In re the Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Company, ex parte Young, it was held that an affidavit notice to use which had been given could not be withdrawn so as to avoid cross examination. In Brooks v. Edwards it was held that where a person is committed for contempt for a year at most, no application by the sheriff to the Court for release is necessary.

Of the Queen's Bench cases, in Cassaboglon v. Gibbs it was held that a commission agent who is instructed to buy goods of a specific description on account of a merchant, and who buys and forwards goods of an inferior description, is liable to recoup the merchant the amount of the loss which he has actually sustained, and is not liable to pay the difference between the value of the goods sent and the market value of the goods ordered as if he were a vendor. In Williams v. Mercer it was held by the Court of Appeal that wedding presents were property "to which the wife or the husband in her right at any time during the intended overture should become entitled," within the meaning of a settlement which stated that such property if jewels should be the wife's separate property. In Beckett & Co. v. Addyman one of two joint sureties to a bank was held liable after the death of his co-surety. In Brown v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company a contract to absolve the company from liability for delay, in consequence of a lower rate, was held reasonable. In Capell v. The Great Western Railway Co. it was held that the owner of land taken compulsorily under the Lands Clauses Act is entitled to the costs of the arbitration so soon as his title has been accepted, and his right is not postponed until the conveyance of the land. In Maspens y Hermano v. Mildred & Co. the owner of goods in Havana was held entitled to recover money paid under an insurance of the goods in London to the defendants, who had insured them on the instructions of the plaintiff's agents, the plaintiff being undisclosed as a principal to the defendants. In Scarff v. Jardine it was held, by the House of Lords, that a customer of a firm who supplies goods after a change in the firm, of which he has no notice, must elect after notice whether he will charge the old members of the firm or the new. In Dunn v. Wyman a composition deed expressed "to be void" if all creditors to a certain value did not execute it within six months, was held good, although they did not so execute it, as against a creditor who had executed it, and who, after notice that all had not executed it, claimed a dividend under it. In Coltress Iron Company v. Black the House of Lords held that in assessing mines for income tax no deduction will be allowed from gross profits for a sum representing capital expended on making bores and sinking pits which have become exhausted by the year's working. In Babbage v. Colborne "an amount to be settled in case of dispute by two valuers" agreed to be paid by the tenant for breakage on leaving a furnished house was held not recoverable until the amount had been so settled. In Green v. Hunt notice of action, under the Larceny Act, to a constable was held good, although there was a mistake as to one day in the date of the cause of action. In Abbott v. Andrews it was laid down that if the plaintiff was nonsuited on some issues and succeeded on others, the defendant, in the absence of a special order, is entitled to the costs of the issues as to which there was a nonsuit. In Payne v. Lord Leconfield an auctioneer entrusted with a horse for sale was held to have no implied authority from the vendor to warrant it.

Of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty cases the Mac decides, on the authority of the Court of Appeal, that a "mud-hopper barge" is a "ship" so as to give justices jurisdiction to award salvage. In Wigney v. Wigney, a case reported last month on another point, Sir James Hannen declined to direct that an order, extinguishing a husband's interest in the settlement, had the effect of determining a mortgage made by the husband. In Bradley v. Bradley, an application to cancel a deed giving an annuity to a petitioner who had obtained a divorce, on the ground that she was unchaste, was dismissed by reason of want of jurisdiction in that Division. In Mason v. Mason a petition for divorce brought by a husband three years after a judicial separation on the same delinquency was dismissed on the ground of unreasonableness, although the husband had hoped his wife would return. In the Douglas the owners of a ship sunk in a collision, as to which notice had been given to the harbour-master, were held by the Court of Appeal not liable to the owners of another ship which ran against the wreck in the dark. In Carpenter v. The Solicitor to the Treasury the bond of a guarantee society was accepted as security for a receiver in a probate action. In Horkley v. Wyatt a legatee under a previous will was condemned in costs in an action of probate, although he gave notice that he only intended to cross-examine. In Jones v. Jones it was laid down that the assignee of the heir-at-law cannot be cited under 20 & 21 Vict., c. 77, in an action for the revocation of a will dealing only with real estate.

Of the Magistrates' Cases, Regina v. Handley decides that a member of a town council is not disqualified to hear a summons for non-payment of the borough rate. In Hance v. Fairhurst an attendance order made under the Education Act against a father was held not enforceable against the mother on his death. In the case of Re Clew it was held that the Licensing Act, which imposes fine "or" imprisonment for a sale without license, does not authorise a fine with imprisonment in default of payment.—Law Journal.

O'KANE v. SELLHEIM AND OTHERS.

Sept. 5, 1882.—34 Edward III., c. 1—11 Vic., No. 13.

In an information laid under 34 Edward III., cap. 1, the words complained of should be set out; and upon an objection being taken to the information on the above ground, the magistrates should make a distinct charge, which they should require the defendant to answer.

Unless some serious breach of the peace be threatened or likely to arise, sureties for good behaviour, as distinguished from sureties to keep the peace, should be seldom or never required by justices. Haylock v. Sparke commented upon.

The jurisdiction given to Justices under 34 Edward III., in respect to defamatory libel, is now in abeyance in Queensland by reason of the provisions of 11 Vic., No. 13 (The Defamation Act).

Held, however, that upon a conviction for defamatory libel, when the defendant has had an opportunity of using his statutory privilege, the judge may require sureties for good behaviour.

This was a motion to make absolute a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition against Philip Sellheim, and other justices, and William Pritchard Morgan, all of Charters Towers, prohibiting them from proceeding on an order made by the said justices on the 12th day of May, 1882, by which the appellant, Thaddeus O'Kane, editor and proprietor of the Northern Miner newspaper, was bound over, himself in £100, with two sureties of £50 each, to be of good behaviour, towards Morgan and other liege subjects of her Majesty for a period of twelve months; in default, to be imprisoned for twelve months.

The information under which the magistrates acted was laid under 34 Edward III., cap. 1.

The information charged the defendant that he "did on the 9th day of May, 1882, at Charters Towers, and on other and divers occasions make use of, and has for a long time continued a course of conduct of unmannerly and quarrelsome words towards one William Pritchard Morgan, of Charters Towers, tending directly to a breach of the peace." The rule nisi was granted at the last sitting of the court, on the following grounds:—(1) that the information did not disclose that the defendant was "not of good fame" within the meaning of the statute 34 Edward III.; (2) that the evidence did not support the motion; (3) that the evidence did not disclose any facts authorising the justices to order the defendant to find sureties for his good behaviour; and (4) that the order does not show any such authority.

Griffith, Q.C., now moved the rule absolute.

Cooper, A.G., contra, cited Haylock v. Sparke, 1 E. & B., 471; on which authority he submitted that proof of a persistent writing of defamatory words was sufficient to give the justices jurisdiction under the Act, and that a greater aggregate of vile slanders against an individual than those which gave rise to this action could not be got together; the malice, he submitted, was perfectly evident, since there was evidence of nineteen distinct defamatory articles, and some of the publications contained a dozen different libels. He further contended that the offence complained of need not necessarily consist of spoken words, but that a continued course of writing was sufficient. As to the objection to the information he contended that no information was necessary in such a case, but that a person might make a complaint, and he quoted from Haylock v. Sparke, supra, p. 487. In conclusion, he submitted that there was sufficient evidence to support the information, that the justices had jurisdiction, and that there was a proper exercise of such jurisdiction.

Griffith, Q.C., in reply, submitted that Haylock v. Sparke was the only modern case on the subject, and that that case was an authority that the justice did not exceed his jurisdiction although he showed a want of discretion in exercising his powers for such defamation as was shown in the case; but it was not an authority for the proposition that the jurisdiction to require sureties might be exercised by justices in the case of defamatory libels; that there was a great difference between scrawling about the streets and the publication of matter in a newspaper. He submitted that the court would find on examination that the authorities could all be traced back to a case in the Star Chamber, and he referred to the following authorities—Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, Bk. 1, ch. 28, sections 3 & 4; vol. 1, p. 485; Comyn's Digest Forcible Entry, D. 26; Burn's Justices, vol. 6, 768—as to libellers, and he contended that the justices had no jurisdiction in such a matter as that complained of in this case.

LILLEY, C.J., requested counsel to argue the point whether there was anything in our Defamation Act with which the jurisdiction exercised by the justices in this case was inconsistent.

Griffith, Q.C., contended at length that the two tribunals could not stand together, and that the jurisdiction given to justices by the old Act of Edward III. was inconsistent with the statutory law of the colony.

Cooper, A.G., submitted that our Defamation Act did not take away the right to proceed against the defendant for a public offence under the statute of Edward III. He referred to the 5th and 6th sections of the Vagrancy Act.

LILLEY, C.J.:—The applicant, O'Kane, was the printer and publisher of the Northern Miner newspaper on the 12th May last when he was brought before certain justices of the peace on an information by the respondent, Morgan, that he, O'Kane "did make use of, and had for a time continued a course of conduct of unmannerly and quarrelsome words tending directly to a breach of the peace." The justices upon this complaint ordered him to be of good behaviour for twelve months, and for that purpose to enter into a recognisance for that period, himself in the sum of £100, and to find two sureties of £50 each, and in default to be imprisoned until he complied with the order; such imprisonment not to exceed twelve months. The justices assumed to exercise jurisdiction under the statute 34 Edward III., cap. 1, which empowers justices to bind over to the good behaviour towards the sovereign and his people all them that be not of good fame, wherever they be found, to the intent that the people be not troubled or endangered, nor the peace diminished, &c., &c. At the June sitting of this court a rule nisi for a prohibition against the respondent and the justices proceeding on the order in the court below was granted on several grounds, the most important being the first and third, which are these:—1st, that the information does not disclose that the defendant was not of good fame within the statute; and 2nd, that the evidence does not disclose any facts authorising the justices to order the defendant to find sureties for good behaviour. The statute of Edward does not require any information or complaint in writing, and a justice may, on view of any misconduct within that Act, require sureties for good behaviour. The information was, however, in writing, and is clearly bad (Bradlaugh v. The Queen, 3 Q. B. D., 607). The words complained of should have been set out. As it is, the information discloses no offence or misconduct amenable to the law. On this objection being urged, as it was, before the magistrates, they should have made a distinct charge, and required the defendant to answer it. This they could have done instantly, but they proceeded to hear the case upon an information which gave the defendant no knowledge of the offence or misconduct imputed to him. He had thus no opportunity to shape his defence, or to sift the evidence of the witnesses against him. A complaint or charge is the foundation of every summary proceeding before justices, whether it be required by statute or not. If required by the statute creating the offence complained of to be in any particular form or in writing, or on oath, &c., the procedure required by the Act must be followed. Then the result of the authorities is this:—If the defendant appears before the justices and the information is defective in substance or form, he may nevertheless be then and there properly charged, and the case may be heard unless an adjournment be granted by reason of such defect or irregularity. The defendant may, nevertheless, waive it either expressly or by conduct, as by allowing the hearing to proceed without objection, by cross-examining witnesses or calling evidence for his defence, &c. (The Queen v. Hughes, 4 Q. B. D., 614; Blake v. Beech, 1 Ex. D., 320). In effect the original information or complaint ceases to be practically material when "it has performed its twofold effect of informing the defendant of the nature of the complaint against him and procuring or enforcing his appearance" (Reg. v. Paget, 8 Q. B. D., per Field, J., 155). The information or charge may be made in the presence of the accused, and he may be then and there called upon to answer it; but it must be of an offence or misconduct known to the law. Now, in this case, the justices upheld the insufficient information and proceeded to hear and adjudicate on the case. The defendant not only insisted on his objection to the information, but urged that there was no charge. Mr. Marsland, his attorney, said, "I have nothing to answer." No charge was thereafter made against the defendant, he asked no questions, called no witnesses, made no defence, and did nothing to waive his right to a regular hearing, or to object to the irregularity of the proceeding in the court below. It is a principle of natural justice, as well as of law, that a man must know of what he is accused before he can be called upon to answer it. There was a failure to observe this elementary rule in this instance, and the applicant's objection must prevail. This would be sufficient to dispose of the case at this time, and to entitle the applicant O'Kane to our judgment.

But the third ground of the rule covers, although it does not pointedly state, another and important question—that is, whether the justices had jurisdiction to require sureties for good behaviour in this instance under the statute of Edward III. The complaint before them was, as the evidence shows, founded on a persistent course of alleged libels upon Morgan and others published by the defendant in the Northern Miner. It has been urged upon us that the statute is old and not adapted to the circumstances of our modern society. Our laws do not die of old age, but speak on from day to day, and cease only to be potent when the offences which they condemn no longer exist. When society reforms itself, a law may cease to be applicable to its then conditions, but it remains in the armoury of judicial weapons available for use should the need of it again arise. It is true that many of the instances of misconduct which were formerly visited under the statute of Edward III., being merely breaches of morals or good manners, or regulated now by other legislation, are no longer dealt with under that ancient statute, and it may be laid down for the guidance of magistrates that unless some serious breach of the peace be threatened or likely to arise, sureties for good behaviour, as distinguished from sureties to keep the peace, should be seldom or never required. But the mere antiquity of the law can never be accepted as proof of its having ceased to exist. If this were so, all our ancient chartered liberties might be judicially repealed. We treat this argument more fully than it merits from intrinsic value, because even juries are now invited at times to disregard the law because it is old, or has never been put in force, a line of defence which judges invariably reprove, and the inherent immorality of which cannot be too strongly condemned as a solicitation to judicial perjury on the part of jurors. Nor can we yield, in this instance at least, to the argument that the statute would be inapplicable to the social conditions of our day. So lately as 1858, in the case of Haylock v. Sparks, 1 E. & B., 471, the court of Queen's Bench, composed of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Justices Wightman, Erls, and Coleridge, after a review of the authorities, gave this judgment:—"Upon the whole it appears to us that a justice of the peace has jurisdiction to require sureties for good behaviour in some cases of libel against private individuals," adding, "there was, in our opinion, a great want of discretion in requiring sureties on such an occasion." There is nothing in the state of society which, in our time, would render this mode of repressing libels obsolete. It will be observed, however, how cautiously the judgment in that case is limited to "some cases of libel." But a more important question was suggested from the bench during the argument of the present case before us—namely, Is the exercise of this jurisdiction under the statute of Edward consistent with certain new rights and privileges given to defendants by our modern legislation on the subject of defamatory libel? Down to the year 1843, when Lord Campbell's Act was passed "for the better protection of private character, and for more effectually securing the liberty of the press, and for preventing abuses in exercising the said liberty," the truth of the libel was no defence in any proceeding in the criminal jurisdiction, where it was indeed held, "the greater the truth the greater the libel," whether before justices or in the superior courts. By the last-mentioned Act (6 & 7 Vic., cap. 96), section 6, the defendant acquired the new right, under the conditions imposed by the statute, to plead in a criminal case the truth of the matters charged, and that it was for the public benefit that the said matters should be published. We copied that legislation by section 10 of our Act (11 Vic., No. 13), intitled "An Act to amend the law respecting defamatory words and libel." The purposes in view were the same as those contemplated by Lord Campbell's Act. Defamatory libels are criminal because of their tendency to provoke breaches of the peace. If the libel be true, and the publication of it be beneficial to the public, it ceases to be an object of animadversion to the criminal or civil law of this colony (sections 4 and 10 of 11 Vic., No. 13). Whether the proceeding be civil or criminal, then there is a clear right given to the defendant to plead and prove the truth of the libel and its public advantage. When once the defendant has established this position his immunity is complete; he is not required to suffer any public punishment or restraint, or to compensate any private injury. But justices of the peace have no jurisdiction to inquire into the truth or falsehood of the alleged libel (Reg. v. Townsend, 4 F. & F., 1039; Reg. v. Sir Robert Carden, 5 Q. B. D., 1). It follows that if proceedings be taken in any court in which the privilege cannot be asserted, that tribunal has not jurisdiction over the matter. The privilege goes to the root of the charge; it is as general as the law and cannot be taken away from the defendant by any choice of jurisdiction by the prosecutor. We think the words in our Act, giving the privilege "on the trial of any indictment, or information for a defamatory libel, the defendant having pleaded such plea as hereinafter mentioned, the truth of the matter charged may be inquired into," must not be too narrowly or technically construed to limit, or deprive the defendant of, the new right. Whether the proceeding is by information ex officio before the Supreme Court, or written or oral before a justice of the peace, or whether the justice informed himself by his own view, the right to plead the truth, either in writing or orally, or to claim the benefit of this defence, seems to us to be indefeasible, except by the defendant himself. Any omission on the part of the defendant to assert it in the court below would be immaterial, as the justices have no jurisdiction to try the question upon which it depends. Indeed we are required to observe for ourselves any defect or excess of jurisdiction, and to keep inferior courts within their powers (Reg. v. Barton, Sup. Ct., Q. L. J. Reports, Supp. 16, 8th Aug., 1879). In the case of Haylock v. Sparks no point was made as to the effect of Lord Campbell's Act on the jurisdiction of justices under the statute of Edward in cases of defamatory libel, and the learned judge whose name is associated with the Act, and who delivered the judgment of the court, did not at any time advert to it. The case is one which may possibly stand upon its own facts. We certainly do not think the case an authority in this colony under the circumstances disclosed in the present matter, and we think it is a decision likely to be very strictly limited by the English courts, not only to "some," but to few, if, indeed, it be hereafter applied to any cases of defamatory libel. It might have been well if the judges had shown what limitation they conceived the law had placed upon the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in cases of defamatory libel under the statute of Edward. Did the jurisdiction depend in their opinion upon the greater or less malignancy or frequency of the libel, or its more or less potent tendency to provoke a breach of the peace, to disturb the good order and peace of society? But the answer to this suggestion is that all libels are restrained because of their tendency to incite to breaches of the peace; this is the reason of their being treated penally, or criminally, and the gravamen of the misconduct for which sureties are required. We do not think that Fox's Act, which preceded Lord Campbell's, made any change or limitation of the justices' jurisdiction. They had to decide the question of libel or no libel before that statute was passed, and the only effect of the Act is to provide that upon the trial of an indictment or information for making or publishing any libel the jury impanelled may give their verdict upon the whole matter in issue, and shall not be required by the court or judge to find the defendant guilty, merely on the proof of the publication by such defendant of the paper charged to be a libel. The statute merely removes the responsibility of deciding the ultimate issue of "libel or no libel" from the presiding judge to the jury, who are the judges who decide questions of fact under our law, where a trial takes place before them. The statute makes a new division of responsibility, but not a change of an old jurisdiction, or the creation of a new right inconsistent with its exercise. We are aware that some text writers incline to the opinion that Fox's Act limited the jurisdiction of justices to take sureties in cases of libel. We cannot agree with them. They do not observe the effect of Lord Campbell's Act on this new question of jurisdiction. Our statute following in point of time Lord Campbell's, is essentially different from Fox's Act. It creates, as we have seen, a new right inconsistent with the old jurisdiction of the justices, and not cognizable by them. It would seem strange that the Legislature should render a defendant punishable for a publication beneficial to the public if he be charged with it in any court, or before any judge except a justice of the peace, and liable to find heavy sureties or to be imprisoned for default if brought before such justice. It seems the more reasonable interpretation of the law that, inasmuch as the truth is a defence in every case of defamatory libel, there is not any case of the kind cognizable before a tribunal which has no jurisdiction to take evidence upon the matter which is exculpatory if true, and that it must be regarded as the law of this colony that the jurisdiction of justices on a criminal charge in respect of defamatory libel is confined to sending it for trial before the court which has judicial cognizance of it, and where it may be fully and finally heard. We attach no importance to the sentimental argument that the jurisdiction of the justices over libels seems to have been first exercised in the Star Chamber. That court was suppressed for its exercise of arbitrary authority and for its excessive punishments, but the good and salutary portion of its criminal jurisdiction reverted to, or was absorbed by, and has since been administered in, the Court of Queen's Bench, whose jurisdiction we exercise here. Upon a conviction for defamatory libel, when the defendant has had an opportunity of using his statutory privilege, the judge may require sureties for good behaviour; there is, therefore, ample power to repress persistent or dangerous defamatory libels. We assume, as we think we are bound to do, these being printed libels, that the defendant has complied with the laws relating to licensed printing; that he is, in fact, lawfully pursuing his calling, and is entitled to the privileges and advantages of our statute (section 15). Our judgment in this case is restricted to instances of defamatory libel. Upon the whole, then, we think, that so long as our Act 11 Vict., No. 18, is in force, the jurisdiction of justices of the peace under the statute of Edward, in respect of defamatory libels, must be regarded as at least in abeyance, and the rule for a prohibition in this case must be made absolute. Looking at all the circumstances, however, we give the applicant O'Kane no costs; and considering the difficult nature of the question for decision, and believing that the justices and Morgan bona fide thought there was jurisdiction to deal with the case, we restrain the applicant from commencing any action against the magistrates or the respondent Morgan in respect of the proceedings below (14 Vict., c. 43, section 12).

THE SETTLED LAND ACT.—VI.

Streets and Open Spaces (Sect. 16).

The statutory power does not enable dedication of any land for public building, church, chapel, or school (compare David, iii. 1092); also land can only be given for the general benefit of the residents of the settled land. This will doubtless be sufficient in most settlements, but sometimes in large properties it is thought desirable to enable limited owners to make gifts of land generally for certain public purposes, placing a limit on the amount to be given, either on each donation or on the total. For forms see David, iii. 1211; Prid. ii. 315.

By the Places of Worship Sites Acts, 1873, 1882 (36 & 37 Vict., c. 50; 45 & 46 Vict., c. 21), a tenant for life can with concurrence of persons next entitled in remainder, give or sell land, not exceeding an acre, for site for church or other place of Divine worship, or for minister's residence, or for a burial place. Any number of sites may be so given, but none must exceed one acre. Sect. 2 of the latter Act provides for case where the remainderman is unborn, unascertained, &c. See Law Times, Sept. 2, 1882, page 306; and Re Marquis of Salisbury (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 5; 2 Ch. Div. 29). There are provisions for reverter in case the land is used for purposes other than those for which it is given.

By the School Sites Act, 1841 (4 & 5 Vict., c. 36), s. 2, tenant for life may give an acre of land for school or residence for master or mistress, or otherwise for education of the poor; but the person next entitled in remainder in fee or tail must join, and if the land ceases to be used for such educational purposes it reverts. Any number of such grants may be made, but only one in each parish (sect. 9, and 12 & 13 Vict., c. 49, s. 3). Parish means ecclesiastical district (14 & 15 Vic., c. 24). See Chitty's Stat. ii. 789-798.

We have not here attempted to summarise these Acts: our purpose is only to call the attention of the draftsman to them, as they will in some cases render additional powers needless, and in others afford an easy mode of giving such additional powers. Thus a settlor may give to every person being seized or entitled for life to the property within the meaning of the Places of Worship Sites Acts, and having the beneficial interest therein, and being in possession for the time being, and of full age, power to make such conveyances by way of gift, sale, or exchange as therein mentioned, without the consent of the remainderman or any other person. In drafting clauses of this description it must be remembered that tenant for life under the S. L. Act has a very wide meaning, and that, if the phrase is used vaguely in a settlement, it may be construed as in the Act (see sect. 57), although the phrase is really intended to be used either in its natural sense, or in the more restricted sense in which it is used in some other statute. Also in giving powers of donation to "persons having powers of tenant for life," the trustees of infant tenant for life should be expressly included or excluded. Doubtless sect. 60 includes them, yet where the power to be conferred is of donation, and not of administration, a doubt might be raised. In fact, in many cases it will be well to specify the trustees. The committee of a lunatic can only act with an order of the court (sect. 62), so he is of less consequence.

Mortgage (Sect. 18).

Tenant for life may raise money for enfranchisement, or equality of exchange, or partition, by mortgage, &c.

The enfranchisement referred to is that of lands of which the copyhold interest belongs to the settlement. Capital money may be spent for this purpose (sect. 21 (v.)) Compare David, iii. 1022.

The conveyance is provided for by sect. 20. Notice must be given to the trustees (sect. 45). Contracts for mortgage bind successors (sect. 81). It would seem from the words "by creation of a term of years . . . or otherwise," in sect. 18, that the money may be raised by a charge, and this is confirmed by the power to create charges in sect. 20.

No provision is made for providing money for the renewal of leases; where the settled property comprises such leasehold interests provisions should be inserted. See form, David, 1181. It will seldom be worth while to insert any such provision on the mere chance that renewable leaseholds may be purchased; but see form David, iii. 1022. As to trusts for renewal, see Keck v. Sandford (1 L. C. Eq. 58); David, iii. 605; and as to contribution between tenant for life and remainderman, see ib. 610-624; Seton, 1276; Tudor L. C. Conv. 90. 23 & 24 Vict., c. 145, s. 8, which gave power to trustees to renew, and, in some cases, imposed an obligation upon them to renew, is repealed; see schedule to S. L. Act, and sect. 64, which contains a wide saving clause.

Undivided Share (Sect. 19).

The statutory tenant for life of an undivided share may act either alone under sect. 2 (6) with respect to his own share, or with any person having power of disposition over any other undivided share. Thus he may, if he possesses a half share, either sell his half, or join with the other person in selling the whole. The other person may be absolute owner or statutory tenant for life, &c. The partition power will be exceedingly useful.

Conveyance (Sect. 20).

This empowers tenant for life to convey so as to give effect to the dispositions sanctioned by the Act. The deed will pass the land free from the limitations, powers, and provisions, estates, &c., of the settlement; with specified exceptions (sect. 20 (2)); and see sect. 22). The same sub-section declares what estates and interests will have priority to such conveyance, and these should be carefully noticed: (1) Estates, &c., having priority to the settlement; (2) Estates and charges, &c., for money actually raised at the date of the deed; and (3) Leases, easements, &c., are all protected. Secondly, that powers of jointuring and giving portions, and terms to secure them, will be overridden, but not mortgages or charges for such purposes when the money has been actually raised. This last is satisfactory. See David. iii. 598, 1018; Prid. ii. 817.

The phrase "money actually raised" occurs again in sect. 24, but there "and remaining unpaid" is added.

Easements may be created and conveyed (sect. 20 (1)). As to difficulties in connexion with easements see David. iii. 518, note, and elaborate form ib. 1218. And see now as to conveyance of easements by way of use, C. A. sect. 62. For an old form of conveyance of easement see David. ii. 268. For a new form see O'avanagh, 578. As to law of easement, see Surrey v. Piggott, Tudor L. C. Conv. 166.

Title Deeds.

As a general rule legal tenant for life has the custody of the title deeds, except he has been guilty of misconduct, so that the safety of the deeds is endangered, or it becomes necessary for the court to have possession so as to administer the property: (Tudor L. C. Conv., 3rd edit. 88; Seton, 1266; Leathes v. Leathes, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 5 Ch. Div. 221.)

As to equitable tenant for life see Lady Langdale v. Briggs (2 Jur. N. S. 982; 26 L. J. 27, Ch.; 8 De G. M. & G. 391; 2 Sm. & G. 225). A dowress is not entitled to their custody: (Co. Litt. 32 b.) When the statutory tenant for life has not the custody of the deeds no doubt the trustees will be bound to produce them for investigation on any purchase, and to hand over those to which the purchaser is entitled (see V. & P. Act, 1874, s. 2 (5) on completion.

As to equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds see Russel v. Russel (1 L. C. Eq. 674, 678); and as to constructive notice of claim in consequence of non-production of deeds, see Le Neve v. Le Neve (2 L. C. Eq. 85, 58), and Agra Bank v. Barry (L. Rep. 7 H. 185). This last was a case under the Irish Registration Act. See now as to constructive notice, C. A. Am., s. 3.

ADULTERATION IN THE OLDEN TIME.

As early as the reign of Edward the Confessor, we find it recorded in Domesday Book that in the city of Chester a knavish brewer, "malam cerevisiam faciens, in cathedra ponebatur stercoaria"—in other words, the offender was taken round the town in the cart in which the refuse of the place had been collected, and to this degradation was often added corporal chastisement. In many towns in the sixteenth century, we find "ale-tasters," whose duty it was to inspect the beer. In 1529, for example, the Mayor of Guildford ordered that the brewers make a good useful ale, and that they sell none until it be tasted by the "ale-taster." The ale was not only tasted, but some of it was spilt on a wooden seat, and on the wet place the taster sat, attired in leathern breeches, then common enough. If sugar had been added to the beer, the taster became so adherent, that rising was difficult; but if sugar had not been added, it was then considered that the dried extract had no adhesive property. A less coarse, but not dissimilar, method was also applied by the earlier inspectors to test the purity of milk. The frauds of the vintners or wine sellers attracted some share of public attention in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as shown by municipal records, fugitive tracts and broadsides. In August, 1558, a certain Paul Barnardo brought into the port of London some wine, and there is extant an order in council directing the Lord Mayor to find five or six vintners to rack and draw off the said pipes of wine into another vessel, and to certify what drugs or ingredients they found in the said wine or cask to sophisticate the same. At a later date the records of the Common Council contain a certificate from the Lord Mayor to the lords of the council, stating the wines of a certain "Peter Van Payne" had been drawn off in his presence, and that in eight of the pipes had been found bundles of weeds, in four others some quantities of sulphur, in another a piece of mace, and in all of them a kind of gravel mixture sticking to the casks; that they were conceived to be unwholesome and of a nature similar to others formerly condemned and destroyed. In "The Search after Claret," by Richard Ames, a thin quarto, the last leaf is occupied by the following advertisement:—"If any vintner, wine-cooper, &c., between Whitechapel and Westminster Abbey, have some tuns or hogheads of old rich unadulterated claret; and will sell it as the law directs for sixpence per quart, this is to give notice, that he shall have more customers than half his profession, and his house be as full from morning to night as a conventicle or Westminster Hall the first day of term." Later, the vintners became more scientific in their operations. Addison (in the Tatler, No. 181, 1710) alluded to a certain fraternity of chemical operators who wrought underground in holes, caverns, and dark retirements to conceal their mysteries from the eyes and observations of mankind. "These subtle philosophers are daily employed in the transmutation of liquors, and by the power of magical drugs and incantations raise under the streets of London the choicest products of the hills and valleys of France; they squeeze Bordeaux out of the sloe, and draw champagne from an apple."—County Brewer's Gazette.

ADMISSION OF A SOLICITOR.

Mr. Thomas Flynn, has been admitted a Solicitor of the Court of Judicature. Mr. Flynn was for many years the Conducting Clerk of Mr. H. J. P. West, Solicitor, President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, to whom he served his apprenticeship. He was awarded a silver medal at the recent Final Examination.

REVIEWS.

A. B. C. Guide to the Arrears Act, 1882. With the Act, Rules, and Forms annexed. Including all the New Rules and Forms. For the Use of Irish Landlords and Tenants. By GEORGE FORTRELL, Jun., Solicitor. Fifth Edition. Corrected and Enlarged. Dublin: M. H. Gill & Son, 50 Upper Sackville-street. 1882.

MR. FORTRELL'S "Guide to the Arrears" of Rent "Act, 1882" is certainly as clear as "A.B.C."—the very reverse of the Act itself; and its conspicuous success—denoted by the issue of a fifth edition already—has been eminently deserved. Though so unpretentiously presented, merely "for the use of Irish landlords and tenants," their legal advisers too will find it extremely useful and suggestive. But, it is a pity that the ex-solicitor to the Land Commission has not been at the pains of referring to the various decisions upon the Act—so many of which are now reported (exclusively in this Journal). He has been contented to present merely his own views for the benefit of landlords and tenants, while their legal advisers, whether rightly or wrongly, may require some other resource. However, in the present issue he has added a chapter explaining the procedure to be adopted by landlords in order to obtain payment of moneys put to their credit by the Land Commission, when sanctioning the advances in discharge of the arrears; and this must prove not only decidedly useful to landlords, but to solicitors. He has, also, included all the new Rules issued by the Land Commission, and has, in fact, made his little manual as complete as possible within its scope. We notice in particular, among the many Forms given, one of a Receipt to meet the difficulty which arises when the landlord and tenant cannot agree as to the amount payable in respect of the year 1881. And indeed, throughout, as now corrected and enlarged, Mr. Fottrell's Guide is most creditable to its author.

This carefully compiled and exhaustive Diary, which has reached its thirty-ninth year of publication, contains a vast amount of useful information concerning both branches of the Legal Profession, not alone in England and Wales, but in this country. It also contains much that will be useful to the general public. On the whole, it will be found most valuable as a book of reference to those requiring information regarding Legal and Public Departments in the United Kingdom.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Few persons are so favoured by circumstances, or so fortified by nature, as to enable them to pass unscathed the sore trials of an inclement season. With catarrhs, coughs, and influenzas everywhere abounding, it should be universally known that Holloway's Ointment, diligently rubbed upon the chest, checks the worst assaults of these maladies, and securely wards off more grave and dangerous diseases of the throat and lungs. The truth of this assertion must remain unquestioned in the face of thousands of impeccable living witnesses, who have personally derived the utmost possible benefits from this treatment when their present sufferings were appalling, and their future prospects most disheartening. Both remedies act admirably together.

PUBLIC NOTICES:

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882.

THURSDAY THE 7TH DAY OF DECEMBER, 1882.

It is this day ordered by the Irish Land Commission that, from and after this date, the following Rules shall be in force and take effect in lieu of Rules 8, 9, 16, 17, and 18 of the Rules issued upon the 21st day of August, 1882, which last mentioned Rules shall, as regards all future proceedings from and after this day, be rescinded:—

Procedure in the case of Joint Applications in Form B or C.

1. Upon receipt of an application pursuant to Form B or C, duly verified, the same shall be transmitted to the Treasury for inspection. No order for payment to or for the benefit of the landlord of such sum as he shall be entitled to pursuant to the statute shall be made until one fortnight after the date of such transmission to the Treasury, unless the Treasury shall within such fortnight give notice to the Commissioners that the Treasury does not require the case to be investigated. Either after the lapse of such fortnight (if the Treasury do not in the meantime serve a notice, which may be in Form D, requiring the case to be investigated) or immediately after the service, within such fortnight, of a notice that the Treasury does not require the case to be investigated, the Land Commissioners may make an Absolute Order for payment of such Order as may appear just.

2. Notice of the Absolute Order for payment to or for the benefit of the landlord of the sum payable to him pursuant to the statute (which notice may be in Form J) shall be transmitted to the landlord through the post, and a certificate (which may be in Form K) shall be transmitted to the tenant through the post.

3. On return of the Investigator's Report, a Conditional Order for payment to or for the benefit of the landlord, of such sum as he shall be entitled to pursuant to the statute, or such other Conditional Order as the Land Commission may deem just, shall be made, and in case no notice showing cause against such Conditional Order, shall in the meantime be given, such Order shall become absolute at the expiration of one week after the date of the transmission of a notice of the making of such Order through the post pursuant to the next succeeding rules.

4. Where the Conditional Order is for payment to or for the benefit of the landlord, of the sum payable to him pursuant to the statute, notice of same (which may be in Form J) shall be transmitted to the landlord through the post, and when the Conditional Order becomes absolute, a certificate (which may be in Form K), shall be transmitted through the post to the tenant.

5. Where the Conditional Order disallows the application of the applicant or applicants under the Act, notice of the same shall be sent to him or them through the post.

6. Notice of motion of showing cause against making the Conditional Order absolute may be in Form L, and shall in every case specify the grounds of objection, and shall be heard by the Land Commission or any member or members thereof; and such Order shall be made thereon, either allowing the cause and setting aside the Order, or disallowing the cause and making the Conditional Order absolute, or delegating the case to be heard and decided by a Leg-1 Assistant Commissioner, or remitting the same for further investigation and report, as shall be deemed just.

CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS.—IV.

In the recent American case of Stabler v. Commonwealth (11 Central L. J. 404), it appeared that Stabler, having a grievance against Waring, solicited Neyer to put poison in Waring's spring, so that the latter would be poisoned, and offered Neyer a reward for so doing. Neyer refused, and handed back the poison, which Stabler had given him. While they were conversing, Neyer's coat was off; and he found the poison in the pocket, some days afterwards. He never had any intention of administering the poison, did nothing towards it, and had no other conversation with Stabler. Stabler was convicted, on the first count, for a felonious attempt to administer poison to Waring, with intent to commit murder; and, on the sixth count, for wickedly soliciting Neyer to administer poison to Waring. Error was assigned as to the conviction on the first count; but no error was alleged as to the conviction on the sixth count—the court, however, observing that the conviction thereon was right, and that the conduct of Stabler undoubtedly showed an offence for which an indictment under that count would lie, without any further act being committed. Now, the first count—for a felonious attempt to administer poison—was framed under s. 82 of an Act of 1860, which substantially corresponded with the English statute 1 Vic., c. 85, s. 3, under which R. v. Lewis and R. v. St. George (ubi supra) were decided; while in R. v. Williams (1 C. & K. 589, 1 Den. C. C. 39) it was held that the delivery of poison to an agent, with directions to him to cause it to be administered to another, was insufficient to establish an attempt to murder. "The Act," said Mercier, J., delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania (Oct. 1880), "recognises a distinction between intent and attempt. The former indicates the purpose existing in the mind, the latter, an act to be committed. Merely soliciting one to do an act is not an attempt to do that act: R. v. Butler, 6 C. & P. 368; Smith v. Commonwealth, 54 Pa. St. 209." And after referring to the English cases on 1 Vic., c. 85, s. 3, he concluded: "We think all that occurred at the interview with the witness and the legal inference deducible therefrom, followed by no other act, are not sufficient to justify a conviction for an attempt to commit the felony as charged. The act proved did not approximate sufficiently near to the commission of murder, to establish an attempt to commit it, within the meaning of the statute." In People v. Bush (4 Hill, 133), however, a conviction was sustained for an attempt to commit a felony, where the act proved was as remote from the crime intended to be perpetrated, as the act proved in Stabler v. Commonwealth; but, that ruling rested on a statute of New York, containing the additional words, "and in such attempt shall do any act toward the commission of such offence."

Stabler v. Commonwealth, certainly, is a strong case as exemplifying how necessary are approximate overt acts (et cf. the Scottish case of Hinchy, 4 Irvine, 561), in order to constitute an attempt; holding that the putting of the poison by Stabler in Neyer's pocket, even were it done with the expectation, belief, and intent that it was to be used to poison Waring, would not be an act sufficient to constitute an attempt to murder. Yet, it does little more than follow the English decisions we have cited. Others might be mentioned, as illustrating how nice are the distinctions often observed on the subject. A procurer indecent prints with intent to publish them, and has attempted (semble) to publish indecent prints: Dugdale v. R., 1 E. & B. 435, Dear. C. C. 64; but A, having in his possession indecent prints, and forming an intention to publish them, has not attempted to publish indecent prints: per Bramwell, B., R. v. M'Pherson, D. & B. 201. A, going to Birmingham to buy dies to make bad money, has not attempted to make bad money: per Jervis, C.J., R. v. Roberts, Dear. C. C. 539, 25 L. J. M. C. 17; but A, procuring dies for the purpose of coining bad money, has done an act in furtherance of the criminal purpose sufficiently proximate to the offence, and is guilty: s. c.; yet, not so is A, who buys a box of matches for setting a stack of corn on fire: R. v. Taylor, 1 F. & F. 511. A writes and sends to B a letter, inciting B to commit a felony, which B does not read, and A has attempted to incite B to commit a felony: R. v. Ransford, ubi supra; but A soliciting B to commit murder by poison, and putting poison in his pocket, unknown to him, for the purpose, has not attempted to commit murder by poison: Stabler v. Commonwealth, R. v. Williams, ubi supra. Yet, it is from acts of such a character that the requisite intention has to be deduced or implied—unless, indeed, when evidence happens to be admissible, besides, of something else done before the commission of the offence (as that the prisoner had previously attempted to set fire to the same building: Arch. Cr. Pl., 17th ed., 208, 217), or of something done subsequently (as flight when threatened with arrest: People v. Lock Wing, 10 Pacific Coast L. J. 190).

On the other hand, criminal attempts are hardly less iniquitous in foro conscientie than the crimes intended; and sometimes, indeed, as in Hinchy's case (ubi supra) it is a matter of difficulty to distinguish whether or not the intended crime or a mere attempt has, in fact, been perpetrated. Can it be doubted, for instance, that in a moral sense sollicitation would constitute a guilty attempt, even when not so in point of law (see Smith v. Commonwealth, 54 Pa. 209); or that the would-be thief who intrudes his hand into a pocket that, unknown to him, happens to be empty, or who commits an assault for the purpose of robbing what, unknown to him, was not in existence, or in the possession of the person assaulted (see R. v. Johnson, 34 L. J. M. C. 24; R. v. M'Pherson, ubi sup.; Hamilton v. State, 36 Ind. 28; Mullen v. State, 45 Ala. 43), is morally responsible quite as much as if the intended crime had been consummated? Surely, the man who, despite his own intention, happens to be prevented from pulling the trigger of his pistol, even if legally exonerated, is no less guilty under a higher law than the desperado who, without drawing his weapon, puts his hand into a back pocket and fires through it at his victim. And truly, as observed in a Pennsylvania case, last month, "We have reached a period when every one, in the courts and out of them, who is in favour of putting a check to the reckless use of firearms and deadly weapons, should emphasize his earnestness by permitting no guilty violator of the law to escape the punishment due to his crime." Even since we entered on the discussion of this subject, after the alleged attempt against the life of Judge Lawson, another has been made in Dublin to stab a juror to death, and another to shoot a police-constable, who was fortunate enough to escape the fate that befell his comrade on duty. Yet, "as on the one hand, the evil intended is the measure of a man's desert of punishment, on the other hand, the injury done to society is the measure of its interest to punish, and punishment can only be inflicted where the two combine" (Bishop, Crim. L.—where the whole subject of criminal attempts is treated in a much more masterly manner than by any English writer, and far fuller than our own space would allow); and with a view to cases in which the consummate offence is more mischievous, the law, as a rule, makes a distinction, embracing even cases where the complete offence is not more mischievous, and, in order to afford the criminal a locus penitentiae before the consummation (though it may in fact have been prevented, not by his penitence, but by extrinsic causes), punishes attempts less severely than the corresponding consummate crimes (see Anstyn, Jur. 1098; Harris and Toml., 2nd ed., 17, 147). Until 1861, indeed, an attempt to commit murder was only a common law misdemeanour, punishable with two years' imprisonment and hard labour. But certainly, "it is difficult to see why certain contingencies, entirely out of the control of the accused, should affect his position in the most vital manner. For example, the same intent may result in murder, or wounding with intent to murder, according to the skilfulness of the surgeon who treats the wounded man" (Harris & Toml., Cr. L., 2nd ed., 147); and indeed, a recent writer, discussing the Fuiteau case, goes the whole length of maintaining that there can be no reasonable distinction, in point of principle, between the punishment of the complete offence and the punishment of the attempt to commit it (see 15 Ir. L. T. 539); while, commenting on the same case, another writer maintained that our law should be re-altered in the direction of severity to meet cases where the victim, owing to the modern resources of medical science (see R. v. Holland, 2 M. & R. 351), might not die within a year and a day, as to which Mr. Harris, also, observes that it seems hard to explain why there should still be an arbitrary line so drawn, and why it should not be left to the jury to decide whether the death was the direct result of the wound. The Chinese code (Staunton, 328), by the way, allows the magistrates, when inquiring into such cases, to fix the number of days during which the capital responsibility of the accused should last.

However, we have perhaps said enough about the punishment of attempts, and shall assume that our readers are as familiar with that branch of our subject as the learned Mr. John Burke, who, on pleading guilty of an attempt to commit robbery, was sentenced by O'Brien J., on the 4th inst., to seven years' penal servitude, but took exception as he had not admitted actual robbery, and succeeded in getting his sentence reduced to twelve months' imprisonment. It was not the first time for a judge to make a mistake in dealing with criminal attempts. In 1879 a strange case occurred at Litowk, on the Russian frontier. Two Jews, father and son, had long lived on bad terms, and at last the son hired a peasant for twenty pieces of silver "to facilitate the departure of the old man from this vale of tears." On the day fixed for the execution of the crime the peasant repented, and, going to the intended victim, confessed all that had passed. The father made him promise to pretend to his employer that the crime had been committed, and he then went to the rabbi, Joseph Beer, before whom he laid the matter. After due deliberation the rabbi determined to see the son and to inform him that his murdered father had appeared to him in a dream, and he asked his murderer whether he would appear before a terrestrial or celestial jury. The son, quite overwhelmed, chose the former tribunal, which was accordingly formed, and consisted of ten influential parishioners. The father was placed behind a curtain. The prisoner having been placed at the bar, the judges rose, and the rabbi solemnly invited the spirit of the dead man to bring forward his accusation. Hardly had the son recognised the voice of his father when he was seized with terror and fell down dead. The procurator of the province, on learning what had passed, at once caused the rabbi and other members of the court to be arrested. What was the ultimate result we know not; but, doubtless, the learned procurator quoted the case put by Sir James Stephen (Dig. Cr. L., 142), of an impetuous heir rushing into the room of a man (who had aneurism of the heart), and roaring in his ear, "Your wife is dead," intending to kill, and thereby killing him. Why should not such an act amount to murder, queries Sir James? But, say we, had it failed, would it have amounted to an attempt? We apprehend that, at most, it would have been but a semi-existent attempt; like the Kilmainham Treaty,

"Exist it did not, tho' within
A measurable distance
Of that vague line where things begin
To border on existence."

EXCLUDING COUNTER-CLAIMS.

One of the most important alterations introduced by the Judicature Acts was the practice as to counter-claims. It approached, perhaps, more nearly than any of the other changes introduced to an alteration in point of substance. When the procedure of a court allows one cause of action to be freely set off against another, it gives to every debtor a lien on the debt which he owes, to the extent of the debt owed to him. It is thus an alteration in substantive law. The justice of the rules as to counter-claim introduced by the Judicature Acts has not, we think, been disputed. It is, in fact, a very obvious principle of natural equity that when one man asks another for that which is his due, the other should be entitled in his turn to demand that which is due to him. The principle, moreover, is practical and business-like. No man of business would think of paying money to another when he himself had an outstanding claim of an equal or greater amount against that other. The law has now given its sanction to that practice; and men are entitled to conduct themselves accordingly. The rule stands in a very different position from ordinary rules of procedure, such as those which regulate the time for taking a step in a cause or the mode of trial. It may be the sole defence in an action. The defendant may admit the plaintiff's claim in itself, and resist only the paying of it. Such being the peculiar position of the rules of procedure as to counter-claims, it is very necessary that they should be distinct and well ascertained, and subject as little as possible to the discretion of the judge. Judicial discretion may be allowed to have considerable operation among ordinary procedure rules without any danger; but if it operates frequently on the right to resist payment of a debt by a person who is himself a creditor, there is danger of the law on the subject possessing that uncertainty which is the worst feature in a law of the kind. That there is some ground for this fear appears to us to be illustrated by the case of Gray v. Webb, reported in the November number of the Law Journal Reports.

The facts of Gray v. Webb are, we think, most fairly told in chronological order. In July, 1878, Gray a linen-draper, of Great Grimaby, sold the good-will and stock-in-trade of his business to Webb. The purchase-money was paid, together with £800 for the book debts; but, if the book debts brought in less than that sum, the balance, it was agreed, was to be repaid to Webb. Shortly afterwards Webb advanced some small sums of money to Gray, and sold him goods to a small amount.

In March, 1880, Webb agreed to buy the freehold of the premises, where the business was carried on, from Gray, and also some adjoining premises. The price was to be £1,400. Webb entered into possession, but did not pay the purchase-money. Gray brought the action for specific performance, being, in fact, an action for £1,400. Webb thereupon by way of counter-claim, claimed credit for £252, being in respect of the deficiency of the book debts, and the other matters already referred to. In answer to this an application was made to Mr. Justice Kay to strike out the counter-claim. The learned judge, in giving judgment, labours unnecessarily, as we think, in showing that a counter-claim need not be a defence or set-off to the claim in the action. Although in the earlier days of the Judicature Acts judges accustomed to the severe rules of pleading, now happily abolished, may have used expressions tending to show that the right to counter-claim was restricted, it now seems universally acknowledged that no restriction exists. Those who read the judgment of Mr. Justice Kay may be excused from supposing that the opinions expressed by some of his colleagues in restriction of the right to counter-claim, although they did not have sufficient weight to induce him to decide that there was no right to counter-claim in this instance, yet influenced his mind in the exercise of the discretion allowed him. Having decided that the defendant was prima facie entitled to counter-claim, the learned judge disallowed his counter-claim in this instance on the ground that it required investigation, and, therefore, would delay the plaintiff's claim, and that it might have been brought in the form of an action much earlier.

The latter of these two grounds can hardly have weighed much with the learned judge. A man who owes another £1,400 is not likely to bring an action against him for £252; and the question is whether he is not entitled to deduct the £252 from the larger sum. The other ground put forward is, that the investigation of the counter-claim would delay a claim which was practically undefended. Mr. Justice Kay refers to several rules regulating his discretion in the matter. Rule 3 of Order XIX. and Rule 9 of Order XXII. alone appear to have a direct bearing on the matter. Rule 3, Order XIX., gives the defendant a prima facie right to counter-claim subject to the proviso that "the court or judge may, on the application of the plaintiff before trial, if in the opinion of such court or judge such set-off or counter-claim cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action or ought not to be allowed, refuse permission to the defendant to avail himself thereof." These powers are of the widest description, and so expressed that probably it would be difficult to find a case in which the Court of Appeal would overrule the discretion exercised. Rule 9 of Order XXII. is much more restricted in its terms. It provides that, if there is a counter-claim and the plaintiff "contends that the claim thereby raised ought not to be disposed of by way of counter-claim, but in an independent action," he may apply to exclude the counter-claim. This rule apparently restricts the discretion to cases in which the trial of claim and counter-claim together would prejudice the fair trial of the claim. Mr. Justice Kay further fortifies himself with Order XXVII., Rule 1, which allows statements "which may be scandalous, or which may tend to prejudice, or embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action," to be struck out. When there are two rules expressly giving the terms on which counter-claims may be disallowed, no great help can be obtained from a general rule which can hardly have had counter-claims within its purview. Mr. Justice Kay evidently gives a value to the word "delay;" but this word seems to show that the rule did not contemplate the case of counter-claim, because a counter-claim must necessarily delay the action. It is a grave question, which we should wish to see more fully discussed, whether the rules intended to allow a counter-claim to be struck out because the claim was practically undefended, and the counter-claim required investigation which would take time. The test given in Order XIX., Rule 3, that "the counter-claim cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action," seems to exclude the case in question. The counter-claim obviously could not prejudice the fair trial of the claim because the claim was admitted. There was, therefore, no prejudice to the plaintiff except that he was kept out of his money rather longer than if there had been no counter-claim, and the matter might fairly have been adjusted by allowing the counter-claim on the terms of the defendant bringing into court the amount of the claim less the amount of counter-claim. The real fact is that in cases of this kind, in which two persons have cross claims against each other, it is a mere accident which one brings the action. If Webb had brought the action against Gray, instead of Gray against Webb, Gray would clearly have been allowed to counter-claim. The man who claims the most is naturally the one to put the law in motion; but, so far as the merits of the dispute were concerned, that fact is also accidental. The object of the law, as it seems to us, is to find out the point in dispute between the parties, and to decide it. This point cannot be discovered in many cases unless a counter-claim is employed; and the law fails in its purpose when the real gist of the dispute is shown to be an alleged counter-claim, and it declines to entertain the counter-claim.—Law Journal.

THE SETTLED LAND ACT.—VII.

Investment and other Application of Capital Money (Sect. 21).

We have already spoken of capital money, and what it comprises. The Act distinctly states that it includes part of mining rent (sect. 11); money raised by mortgage of the land (sect. 18); consideration for variation or rescission of certain contracts (sect. 31 (1)); part of timber money in certain cases (sect. 35); produce of sale of certain "heirlooms" (sect. 37). Obviously also money receivable on sale, exchange, or partition must be capital money (see sect. 53). We have stated, also, that usually this will be the case with a fine, and our view is confirmed by the mention of fine in sect. 42. We think that this will also usually be the case with licence to copyholder to lease (sect. 14). The Act is not clear as to consideration for surrender of lease (sect. 13 (1)), or for surrender of contract for lease (sect. 31 (1) (iii)), or even for variation of contract for lease (sect. 31 (1) (iii)); but this last much resembles a fine. There is no mention of consideration for variation or rescission of contract with respect to improvements (sect. 31 (1) (v)), but clearly consideration might be taken. Consideration for variation must, we think, be capital money, but it is not so clear in case of rescission. Application may be made to the court as to contracts (sect. 31 (3)). It is clear in all the above cases, that it will not be safe to take the receipt of tenant for life.

Sect. 21 (1) gives a long list of modes of investment. These include Government securities, other securities authorised for the trustees by the settlement, or "by law." As to what are authorised by law, see David, iii. 26; Seton, 86, 439. Stock of the Metropolitan Board of Works is permitted, unless forbidden by the settlement: 34 & 35 Vict., c. 47, s. 13.

The new Act authorises investments on bonds, mortgages, or debentures or debenture stock of railways in Great Britain or Ireland incorporated by special Act, and having for ten years before the investment paid a dividend on ordinary stock or shares.

These powers of investment cannot be taken away from the tenant for life, except with respect to some of those which are not expressly mentioned in the section, but which are otherwise authorised for trustees' investments. Thus it would seem that the stock of the Metropolitan Board may be forbidden, and also loans on the security of land in Ireland: 22 & 23 Vict., c. 85, s. 82. But it would appear that "Court" securities cannot be forbidden: Wedderburn's Trusts, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 904; 9 Ch. Div. 112.

The following general order was made by the Court of Chancery on the 1st Feb., 1861:—

“Cash under the control of the court may be invested in Bank Stock, East Indian Stock, Exchequer Bills, and £2 10s. per Cent. Annuities, and upon mortgage of freehold and copyhold estates respectively in England and Wales; as well as in Consolidated Three per Cent. Annuities, Reduced Three per Cent. Annuities, and New Three per Cent. Annuities.”

The S. L. Act merely forbids investment of money arising from land in England in the purchase of land in Ireland (sect. 23), and giving English in Exchange for Irish land (sect. 4 (8)); it does not forbid mortgages upon Irish land.

The statutory range will usually be sufficient in “real” settlements; but, as a rule, in settlements of land as personality, a wider power will be desired. This may be inserted (sect. 21 (xi)). We hope to discuss settlements of this description hereafter, as sect. 63 makes considerable variations as to them in connexion with investment.

For comprehensive forms of investment in personality settlement, see David. iii. 711, 740; Wolst. & T. 151.

If it is desired to enable the lending of money on security of second mortgages (Lewin, 291), or mortgages of leaseholds (ib. 288, 289) or long terms (Re Boyd, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799; 14 Ob. Div. 626), special power must be given. If it is desired that money may be lent to the tenant for life even on mortgage, power should be given to the trustees to lend it, and they should be declared indemnified for so doing. See Lewin, 287; and compare sect. 53.

Also by sect. 21 money may be applied for authorised improvements (see sect. 25), and in the purchase of a large variety of interests in land, and also for costs incurred in the execution of the powers of the Act (sect. 21 (x)). This last will be a very useful provision for enabling trustees to get their costs. The settlement may increase the modes of application (sect. 21 (xi)); sometimes it may be convenient to do this by increasing the number of authorised “improvements,” but generally the statutory provisions will be amply sufficient.

Capital money is, at the option of tenant for life, to be paid to the trustees or into court (sect. 22 (1)); consequently his own receipt will be insufficient. Tenant for life may direct the trustees in what manner to invest or apply the money; but if he gives no direction (and we suppose, if he is an infant) the trustees decide, but then subject to any consent or direction given by the settlement (sect. 22 (2)). In such case it would seem that sect. 21 will not prevent the settlor imposing what limits he likes upon the investments. See, however, Wedderburn's Trusts (ubi sup.) We should advise that he prohibit investment in any securities payable to bearer. Such securities are not suitable for trustees.

Sect. 23 makes full provision for devolution of income, prevents “conversion,” &c. See, however, sect. 63, in case of settlement on trust for sale. Investments may not be altered during lifetime of tenant for life without his consent (sect. 22 (4)). Probably it is intended that when tenant for life is an infant the trustees may vary them (see sect. 60); but it would be well at present to insert this power in the settlement. Land out of England may not be purchased by means of “capital money” arising from land in England (sect. 23).

Freehold land is to be conveyed to the uses, &c., subsisting with respect to the settled land, or as near thereto as circumstances permit. Copyholds and leaseholds are to be conveyed on corresponding trusts as far as possible; but the vesting of the beneficial interest in leaseholds is suspended (sub-sects. 1-3). Compare David. iii. 1020, and see ib. 558, 598, 600. The next three sub-sections apply to incumbrances, and sub-sect. 7 extends the provisions of the section to mines and minerals. The power to shift incumbrances must not be used unfairly (sect. 53).

The provisions do not appear to need any supplement.

NOTICE OF ACTION.

The law relating to notice of action is closely connected with the duties and practice of justices of the peace who have to administer remedies under so many statutes and take part in much that is done by officials, and also by private informers who seek to enforce in a summary way those remedies. It is difficult to draw a statute which is free from ambiguity, and it is still more difficult to apply it to the various emergencies of life. Mistakes of necessity attend the development of these special remedies in all their stages, and yet these mistakes are so often honestly made that it would be unfair to visit them upon their unwitting authors. It is for the protection of these honest but mistaken administrators of the law that the requirement as to notice of action comes into play. It throws round the defendant a shield, or rather it necessitates an interval for reflection on one side and on the other. The plaintiff who alleges that he has been aggrieved by the action of the defendant, must give a certain preliminary notice of his intention to bring an action, and then the defendant has time to consider whether he can defend himself successfully, and if not then whether some satisfaction might not fitly be tendered so as to get rid of the difficulty. There have been many nice occasions for the courts to settle what is no easy matter, namely, under what circumstances the defendant is entitled to this notice; and secondly, if there must be a notice, then what are the necessary contents of that notice. There are many statutes, each of which makes it necessary to give this notice of action, but they all have a family likeness and use much the same language. The Public Health Act, 1875, in the 264th section, imposes this notice in respect of all acts done under the Act, and says that the month's notice must clearly state the cause of action and the name and place of abode of the intended plaintiff, and of his attorney or agent in the cause, and on the trial no evidence is allowed of any cause of action which is not stated in the notice so served. In like manner the Larceny Act, 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 113, imposes the necessity of notice of action for anything done in pursuance of the Act, and the notice is to state the cause of action. The words constantly used in all these Acts are “things done in pursuance of the Act or under the Act.” It thus constantly becomes a question whether the particular act complained of was one which was done under the Act.

There have been important and carefully considered decisions on this matter. It was at one time considered that the defendant, in order to be entitled to the notice, must have acted not merely honestly but reasonably. This last essential, however, was questioned. In a leading case of Herman v. Seneschal, 26 J. P. 598, the defendant kept a cigar shop, and gave into custody a person for cheating him with a bad florin. The plaintiff was discharged, and brought an action for false imprisonment, when the jury found that the defendant honestly believed that the plaintiff tendered a bad coin, but that he had no reasonable grounds for his belief. It then became a question whether he was entitled to notice. The court came to the conclusion that the main question was, whether there was honesty of purpose, and the reasonableness of the grounds was of inferior importance, though sometimes useful, to be considered also. A later case of Orchard v. Roberts, 28 J. P. 54, confirmed the former case. In this case the plaintiff was a silk salesman employed by the defendant, and being one day challenged to produce the money in his possession, was given into custody for stealing a marked coin. Being discharged, and having brought an action for false imprisonment, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the proper way of directing the jury is to ask them, did the defendant believe honestly in the existence of those facts which, if they existed, would have been a defence to the action and bring him under the statute? It is agreed to be enough if the defendant bona fide thought he was acting in accordance with the law, and that it is not necessary he should have any belief of facts specifically.

Another later case of Leese v. Hart, 32 J. P. 407, again laid down the rule that honest belief was all that was necessary, though in that case such honest belief was not proved. Another case of King v. Chamberlain, 40 L. J. C. P. 273, was one where the defendant by looking through a telescope saw the plaintiff stealing a buoy. The jury thought he could not reasonably draw the inference as to stealing, but the court said the jury had no business to draw such a conclusion, and their sole consideration should have been whether the defendant bona fide believed, not whether he did so reasonably or not. Again in Judge v. Selmes, L. R. 6 Q. B. 724, surveyors of highways blundered in a highway rate which was not properly allowed and published, but apparently all they did was that they merely mistook the form. They were sued by the party rated, and Blackburn, J., said: "In the present case there is nothing to show that the defendants were conscious they were acting illegally; what they were doing was of the essence of their employment, namely, raising money for the repair of the road. They certainly blundered excessively, but were, nevertheless, acting under the Act of Parliament, and were consequently entitled to notice of action."

These cases sufficiently illustrate the rule arrived at in most of the recent cases, which is this, that it is the honesty of the belief of the defendant, and not the reasonableness or soundness of that belief. In other words the law does not require that the defendant should always be right in his law or in his good sense, but he must have an honest intention to do what the statute authorises.

The precise particulars which the notice, when necessary, shall contain, call for still greater care, because it is not so easy to lay down the characteristics of a notice, as it is to arrive at the honesty of the defendant's intention. The notice must give reasonable information, but it is not likely that the courts, especially of the present day, should allow much to turn on mere quibbles and technical accuracy. All that is really wanted is that the plaintiff should draw the defendant's attention to the occasion when the mischief was done, but the words or particularity of detail cannot be important in any view. Nevertheless one or two illustrations of the difficulties are the easiest modes of showing how this point is to be dealt with. In the case of Smith v. West Derby Local Board, 47 L. J. C. P. 607, the action was brought by the plaintiff for the defendants negligently leaving a highway insufficiently repaired, whereby a valuable horse received severe injuries. One day the contractor of the defendants was laying down a sewer in the highway. The work was completed in May, 1874, and the traffic was resumed, but a subsidence took place which was soon repaired, and finally the surveyor at last said all was right. So far as the surveyor was aware there was nothing wrong, but it so happened that one day, being 13th May, the plaintiff's horse was drawing a spring cart when its fore feet suddenly sank through a coating or crust of macadam into a cavity, and was injured. Nobody could account for this sudden hole. The merits of the case and the evidence of negligence need not be described, but it is well to attend to the notice of action that was given. It stated "that you, the said board, by yourselves, your labourers, servants, and others, on or about the 13th May last, negligently, carelessly and improperly did leave a certain portion of the road or highway in an insufficient and improper state of repair, whereby a horse of the plaintiff's, while being lawfully driven, sank into the road, and was thrown therein and severely injured." The notice abounded in much more verbiage, and one would suppose that it gave ten times too much detail, and far too many words. Yet when the objections came to be argued minutely it was contended that the notice was insufficient because it stated the cause of action to be a nonfeasance, whereas the real cause ought to have been stated as a misfeasance. Previous cases were relied upon by the defendant, especially those of Jones v. Nicholas, 13 M. & W. 361, and Jones v. Bird, 5 B. & Ald. 837, where it had long ago been said that these notices were not to be construed like a special pleading, but ought to be liberally dealt with. And if so, who could doubt that this notice gave all the necessary information.

The court, consisting of Grove, J., and Lindley, J., came to the conclusion that the notice was sufficient. Grove, J., said that the document, if reasonably read by a mind willing to understand it, was this, that the board, by their servants or labourers, negligently left a part of the highway in an insufficient state of repair—that they attempted to repair it, but did not do so properly, whereby the horse was thrown. That all pointed to some hole and not to a mere wear and tear. It therefore sufficiently indicated the cause of complaint. And Lindley, J., thought the notice, though capable of being applied to an act of omission, was also capable of being extended to an act of commission. It showed the defendants sufficiently what they have to meet, and they had an opportunity of inquiring into the matter.

The demurrer to the form of notice in the last case was thus overruled. In another very recent case a somewhat curious objection was raised, and at first was more difficult to dispose of. In Green v. Broad, ante, p. 599, one defendant named Broad was the trustee in a liquidation case, who had charge of co-operative stores, and he employed one Hutt, a detective, to watch some persons who were suspected of having committed a felony. One of the orders made in the business was that Hutt was to stop persons who left the premises without producing a voucher or receipt for the goods he was taking away. The plaintiff attended the sale, made purchases, and got his vouchers for payments, but threw them away. When he left the premises he was stopped and asked for the vouchers, and not having any to produce was sent back to the stores. The plaintiff again returned to the gate and proved that he had purchased goods, but the defendant would not let him depart for some time afterwards. This happened on the 12th day of April, 1881. For this arrest the action was brought. There was a notice of action duly delivered, which stated that "I, R. O. Green, &c., give you notice, &c., for that you, the said W. Hutt, did, on the 13th day of April, 1881, at the warehouse of the City of London Co-operative Association, Limited, No. 25 Newgate-street, &c., unlawfully, maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, assault, detain, and imprison me, and keep me so imprisoned, at the said warehouse, for the space of one hour and upwards, to the damage of me, the said R. O. Green, &c." At the trial of the action the objection was taken that the notice was insufficient, because the date of the act done was wrong: it ought to have been on the 12th day and not the 13th April. The case was argued, and the various authorities cited where notices had been challenged as insufficient. The court, consisting of three judges, Grove, J., Mathew, J., and North, J., came to the conclusion that the notice was sufficient. The judges all thought that the time and place were sufficiently identified. It was thought to be undoubted that the defendants must have had their attention called to the occasion, and could not possibly have mistaken it. All the information required was thus sufficiently given.

These decisions support the modern tendency of the court to disregard mere technicalities and look only to the substance of the matter.—Justice of the Peace.

RESIDENCE AND OCCUPATION.

"Residence and occupation" are terms of ambiguous meaning. They are constantly occurring in Acts of Parliament, and therefore constantly require interpretation. In endeavouring to ascertain their true meaning in any one particular statute, it is necessary to consider what was the purpose of the Legislature in inserting them, so that, if possible, an interpretation may be given them which is consonant with that purpose: Blackwell v. England, 3 Jur. N. S. 1302. We find, therefore, many different meanings given to the word "residence," depending upon the object of the particular statute in which the word occurs. For instance, "residence" was held to be equivalent to "home" when used in 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 8 (Lamb v. Smyth, 15 M. & W. 433); whereas when used in 17 & 18 Vict., c. 36, s. 1, it was held that a "place of business" was a residence within the meaning of the statute: Attenborough v. Thompson, 2 H. & N. 559. The Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 10 (2), provides that an affidavit shall be filed, together with every bill of sale which shall give, amongst other things, a description of the residence and occupation of the grantor. It has been held by Vice-Chancellor Bacon, in Ex parte Hoaman (L. Rep. 10 Eq. 65), that the object of this provision is to give, by means of the registration, information to the persons who had dealings with the grantor of the fact that he had given a bill of sale. Probably to this must be added the object referred to by Chief Baron Pollock in Attenborough v. Thompson, namely, that information should be given as to where the grantor was to be found, in order that he might answer any inquiries about the bill of sale. It is obvious, therefore, that a grantor must give a reasonably accurate description of himself in the affidavit accompanying the bill of sale. A difficult question may arise where a grantor resides in one place and carries on business in another, if he give his residence and his occupation without giving the place at which the latter is carried on. For instance, if a grantor of a bill of sale residing in the Strand, and carrying on business in Regent-street as a tailor, were to describe himself in the Strand, tailor, technically he would have complied with the requirements of the Act in having given his residence in the Strand, and his occupation a tailor, though it must be doubted whether he would have complied with the spirit of it in omitting to give the place where he carried on his business. This alone would make the description of his occupation complete. Ex parte National Mercantile Bank, re Haynes (15 Ch. Div. 42), is, to some extent, an authority against this contention, though, on the other hand, in Wallis v. Smyth (Weekly Notes, 1882, p. 77), Chief Judge Bacon appears to take a contrary view. There is much to be said in favour of the argument that a mere description of the occupation, without mention of the place where it is carried on, is an insufficient description of the occupation of the grantor of a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The reasoning in Ex parte Jerningham (9 Ch. Div. 466), where it was held that, where a debtor described himself by his business address only, omitting all mention of his private address, it was a misdescription avoiding the petition, is applicable to the case of the grantor of a bill of sale, and we incline to the opinion that a full and complete description of a grantor's occupation, including the place where it is carried on, is necessary in order to comply with the provisions of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.—Law Times.

In one of the English law courts the then well-known counsel, Mr. Phillimore, was pleading against Sergt. Something, socially his bosom friend, forensially his deadly enemy. It was the case of the theft of some donkeys, and there was a dispute as to the number and sex of the animals. The judge got bothered and testily asked: "How many asses were there in the plaintiff's stable on the night of the robbery?" "Three, my lord," answered the sergeant; "two mares and a colt." "Nay, my lud, four," put in the opposing advocate; "four donkeys in all." "Ah, yes, trae! I beg your ludship's and my learned brother's pardon. He reminds me that there were fours donkeys present—two mares, one colt, and one filly more,"—London Society.

THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL IN A CRIMINAL CASE.

The sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, . . . and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

The ninth section of the first article of the Constitution of Pennsylvania declares that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and his counsel." Provisions identical in language or in substance with one or the other of these quotations are to be found in the Constitution of every State in the Union, with the exception of Virginia.

It is our purpose to examine this right, to trace the history of its establishment, and define its boundaries. The subject is one of unusual interest, and appeals not only to the professional man but to every intelligent layman who values his rights as a citizen and seeks to fully understand them. The claim of Guiteau, recently on trial for the murder of President Garfield, though represented by counsel, to act as his own counsel, and his extraordinary behaviour in the assertion and exercise of his right, awakened a wide-spread public interest in the topic and led to many inquiries concerning it. It is not too late to discuss it.

The rule, briefly stated, is as follows:—At common law, in all cases, whether of treason, felony, or misdemeanor, and at all times, the prisoner has had and still has the right to address the jury in person in his own defence. In misdemeanours he always was and still is allowed to do this by counsel; but it is universally agreed that at common law a prisoner, whether peer or commoner, was not entitled to defend by counsel upon the general issue "not guilty" on any indictment for treason or felony: 1 Archbold's Crim. Prac. and Pl., Pomeroy's ed. 551; Weeks on Attorneys at Law, sect. 184; 1 Chitty's Crim. Law, *407; Hawkins's P. C., b. 2, c. 39, sect. 1; Foster's Crown Law, 281; Hale's P. C. 286.

There were certain well-established exceptions. In appeals, which were private rather than public prosecutions, being the accusation of a murderer by one who had an interest in the person killed, or of a felon by one of his accomplices, full counsel were always allowed to the appellee, because although the object sought was the death of the defendant, yet the form was that of a civil proceeding, and all appeals were presumed to be carried on with greater spleen and vindictiveness than indictments: 2 Hawkins, c. 89, sect. 3; 1 Chitty Crim. Law, *410; 17 State Trials (Howell's ed.) 480; 8 id. 728.

The prohibition of the assistance of counsel applied only to matters of fact, as the court assigned counsel to argue a doubtful point of law arising at or after trial (Hale's P. C. *286); and upon the trial of issues which did not turn on the question of "guilty" or "not guilty," but upon collateral facts, as a plea of sanctuary or a pardon, or upon the assignment of error to reverse a sentence of outlawry, prisoners under capital charges, whether of treason or felony, were entitled to the assistance of counsel: Foster's Crown Law, pp. 42, 46, 56, 232; Ratcliff's case, 4 State Trials, 47.

But these exceptions were of little practical benefit to those ignorant of law, for it was held in all cases that the prisoner must propose the point, and if the court think it will bear a debate they will assign counsel to argue it: 2 Hawkins, c. 89, sect. 4; 7 State Tr. 1523; 8 id. 570; 11 id. 525. At the trial of Lord Preston in 1691, Chief Baron Atkyns said: "It is not the doubt of the prisoner but the doubt of the court that will occasion the assignment of counsel." 12 State Trials, 659, 660.

Upon the trial of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, in 1571, for treason in supporting the right of Mary Queen of Scots to the British throne, he made a vain appeal to the court for counsel even upon questions of law: 1 State Trials, 995. "I have," he said, "had very short warning to provide answer to so great a matter. I have not had fourteen hours in all both day and night; and now I neither hear the same statute alleged, and yet I am put at once to the whole herd of laws, not knowing which particularly to answer unto. The indictment containeth sundry points and matters to touch me by circumstances, and so to draw me into the matter of treason which are not treasons themselves; therefore, with reverence and humble submission, I am led to think I may have counsel, and this I show, that you may think I move not this suit without any ground. I am hardly handled. I have had short warning and no books." Chief Justice Dyer refused the request by answering that counsel could not be allowed in point of treason.

Sir Henry Vane, on his trial for high treason, raised most important questions of law, and prayed to have counsel assigned to speak to them. The application was refused on the ground that the same points had been decided on the trials of the regicides: 6 State Trials, 183, A.D. 1662.

During the trial of Sidney application was made by him for counsel when he contended that conspiracy to levy war was not treason, and when he objected that some of the jury were not freeholders of the county in which the venue of the indictment was laid, and he was answered by Chief Justice Jeffreys "If you assign us any particular point of law, if the court think it such a point as may be worth the debating, you shall have counsel." 9 State Trials, 884. When Bamfield rose as amicus curiæ and suggested in arrest of judgment that there was a material defect in the indictment, Jeffreys coolly observed, "We have heard of it already, we thank you for your friendship and are satisfied." He then sentenced the illustrious prisoner to death. On the trial of Colledge, Lord Chief Justice North declared, "I must tell you a defence in case of high treason ought not to be made by artificial cavils but by plain fact." 8 State Trials, 570.

The judges in the time of the Commonwealth were no less arbitrary. Their behaviour towards John Lilburne on his trial as a traitor for publishing criticisms upon the government of Cromwell, was more decorous in tone but none the less severe than that of Foster or Scroggs. Time and again he besought the appointment of counsel, and was always refused. Then bursting out with long suppressed passion he cried: "Pray let me have fair play, and not be wound and screwed up into hazards and snares." With a courage unequalled by his bravest deeds in battle, he declared: "In so extraordinary a case for me to be denied to consult with counsel, I tell you, sir, it is most unjust and the most unrighteous thing in my apprehension that I ever heard or saw in all my life. O Lord! was there ever such a pack of unjust and unrighteous judges in the world. . . . I would rather have died in this very court before I would have pleaded one word unto you, for now you go about by my own ignorance and folly to make myself guilty of taking away my own life, and therefore unless you will permit me counsel, upon this look I am resolved to die." 4 State Trials, 1299. His appeal was fruitless.

An apology for this harsh feature of the rule was offered in the maxim that the judge was counsel for the prisoner; that it was his duty to see that the proceedings were regular, to examine witnesses for the defendant, to advise him for his benefit, to hear his defence with patience, and in general to take care that he was neither irregularly nor unjustly convicted. In prosecutions where counsel were allowed, the court did not advise the prisoner. The maxim was benevolent, but few judges ever gave the slightest heed to it in practice.

One or two instances must suffice for illustration. Upon the trial of Penn and Mead at the Old Bailey, for preaching to a seditious and tumultuous assembly the recorder put the following question:—

"What say you, Mr. Mead—were you there?"

MEAD.—"It is a maxim of law that no one is bound to accuse himself, and why dost thou offer to inure me with such a question? Doth not this show thy malice? Is this like unto a judge that ought to be counsel for the prisoner at the bar?"

REC.—"Sir, hold your tongue, I did not go about to inure you?" 6 State Trials, 958.

Upon the trial of John Crook, and other Quakers, for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance, the following spirited dialogue is reported:—

FOSTER, C.J.—"John Crook, when did you take the oath of allegiance?"

CROOK.—"Answering this question in the negative is to accuse myself, which you ought not to put me upon. 'Nemo debet seipsum prodece.' I am an Englishman and I ought not to be taken nor imprisoned, nor called in question, nor put to answer but according to the law of the land."

FOSTER, C.J.—"You are here required to take the oath of allegiance, and when you have done that, you shall be heard."

CROOK.—"You, that are judges on the bench, ought to be my counsel, not my accusers."

FOSTER, C.J.—"We are here to do justice, and we are upon our oaths to tell you what is law, not you us. Therefore, sirrah, you are too bold."

CROOK.—"Sirrah is not a word becoming a judge. If I speak loud, it is my zeal for the truth, and for the name of the Lord. Mine innocency makes me bold."

FOSTER, C.J.—"It is an evil zeal."

The chief justice then ordered the mouth of the prisoner to be gagged with a "dirty cloth." 6 State Trials, 119.

The grossest violation of the maxim was the behaviour of Jeffreys upon the trial of Lady Alice Lisle. She was more than seventy years of age and a widow, and had given food and shelter to a dissenting clergyman named Hicks, who had been with the army of Monmouth. The indictment charged her with treason. There was no proof whatever that she knew that the man she harboured had ever been with the rebel army; and the jury declared that they were not satisfied upon this point, which was the only important one in the case. The judge usurped the functions of the counsel for the Crown and pressed a reluctant and conscientious witness so hard as to "clutter him out of his senses." Blasphemy, ribaldry, and the most horrid jests and imprecations were showered upon him in the effort to induce him to say something that would convict the prisoner. Finally, Jeffreys extorted a verdict by arbitrarily declaring "there is as full proof as proof can be." 11 State Trials, 322. He then sentenced the unhappy lady to be burned to death, but she escaped the terrible fate of Elizabeth Gaunt, by a commutation of the sentence into death by hanging. Upon the scaffold she spoke these words: "I have been told the court ought to be counsel for the prisoner; instead of which there was evidence given from thence which, though it were but hearsay, might possibly affect my jury. My defence was such as might be expected from a weak woman; but such as it was I did not hear it repeated to the jury. But I forgive all persons that have done me wrong, and I desire that God will do so likewise."

The rule and the practice under it had their admirers. Lord Coke declared that the reason of its adoption was because the evidence by which the prisoner was to be condemned ought to be so very evident, and so plain, that all the counsel in the world should not be able to answer it: 3 Inst. 137. Sir John Davys declared that our law doth abhor the defence and maintenance of bad causes more than any other law in the world: Preface to Davy's Rep. Sergeant Hawkins asserted, "If it be considered that generally every one of common understanding may as properly speak to a matter of fact as if he were the best lawyer, and that it requires no manner of skill to make a plain and honest defence, which in cases of this kind is always the best, the simplicity and innocence, artless and ingenuous behaviour of one whose conscience acquits him, having something in it more moving and convincing than the highest eloquence of persons speaking in a cause not their own." 2 Hawkins, c. 39, sect. 2.

The rule did not pass unchallenged. The seeds of its Simulation, though slow in development, had been early worn. As far back as the reign of Edward II., the author of the Mirror of Justice had declared that counsel insisted in the law "were more necessary for the defence of indictments and appeals of felony than upon other venial causes." The venerable Whitelocke recalled it in debate; Sir Robert Atkyns declared it a novelty, and significantly said that he knew from experience what the maxim meant that the judge was counsel for the prisoner. Even Jeffreys declared that it was an injustice that a man should have counsel to defend a two-penny trespass, but that in defence of life he should have none. (See the very learned note to 5 State Trials, 460.) The Bloody Assizes aroused the sleeping sense of justice of the nation, and in ten years after, the Bill for regulating Trials in Cases of High Treason was brought forward in the House of Commons early in February of 1495. After much opposition it became a law, known as the 7th Wm. III., c. 8. The Act, among other things, gave to a prisoner charged with high treason "the assistance of counsel, not exceeding two, throughout his trial, to examine his witnesses and to conduct his whole defence as well in point of fact as upon questions of law."

Many wiseacres predicted the ruin of the State. Bishop Burnet, after stating that the bill had passed contrary to the hopes of those then at the head of affairs, said, "the design of it seemed to be to make men as safe in all unreasonable practices as possible." The judges too were the avowed enemies of the change.

The Act was to go into effect on the 25th of March, 1698. On the 24th of March, Sir William Parkyns, a wealthy knight, bred to the law, was put upon his trial for having been concerned with Charnock, Porter, Goodman, and Fenwick in a Jacobite plot to assassinate the king. He prayed that counsel might be allowed him, and cited the preamble of the statute as declaring that such a demand was reasonable and just. Lord Holt replied: "God forbid that we should anticipate the operation of an Act of Parliament even by a single day." 18 State Trials, 72. Parkyns then asked that the trial be postponed; but his application was refused, and the unlucky man was actually convicted and executed six hours before the bill went into effect.

It was a long time, however, before counsel were bold enough to defend their clients with spirit, and it remained for Dunning and the never to be daunted Mackinnon to establish the rights of the bar.

The first instance on record of the assignment of counsel under the Act is on the trial of Rookwood and others for having been concerned in the same conspiracy as Parkyns. Sir Bartholomew Shower was assigned as counsel. "My Lord," said he, addressing Chief Justice Holt, "we are assigned of counsel in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, and we hope that nothing which we shall say in defence of our clients shall be imputed to ourselves. . . . We come not here to countenance the practices for which the prisoners stand accused, nor the principles upon which such practices may be presumed to be founded; for we know of none, either religious or civil, that can warrant or excuse them." Lord Holt administered a very proper rebuke: 18 State Trials, 154.

In strong contrast with this abject apology is the splendid hearing of Erskine on the trial of Paine: "I will for ever—at all hazards—assert the dignity, independence and integrity of the English bar, without which impartial justice, the most valuable part of the English Constitution, can have no existence. From the moment that any advocate can be permitted to say that he will or will not stand between the Crown and the subject arraigned in the court where he daily sits to practice from that moment, the liberties of England are at an end."

Impoverishment had been expressly excepted from the Statute of William, and, therefore, counsel were denied to Lords Winton and Lovat, the latter of whom, broken by the weight of eighty years, was too feeble to struggle even for his life. It is significant that Sir William Jervis, who was the leading manager of their imprisonment, introduced into the House of Commons the bill that in 1747 became known as 20th Geo. II., correcting this abuse. It was not until 1826 that the last remnants of this barbarism were swept away. The 6th & 7th Wm. IV., c. 114, enacted that all persons tried for felony should be admitted to make their defence by counsel or attorney.

As the law now stands, the prisoner, for whatever crime indicted, is entitled to the full assistance of counsel upon every question of fact and law—to visit him in prison, to advise him in court, to cross-examine the opposing witnesses, to examine in chief those produced for the defence, and to address the jury. The only remaining question is, how far does the representation by counsel supplant the prisoner's ancient right to act in person?

It was early held in England that a man could be heard by himself or his counsel, but not by both. The point was raised upon the trial of Mr. Redhead Yorke, in 1796, for a misdemeanour: 25 State Trials, 1021. At the close of the opening by the counsel for the prosecution, Mr. Yorke applied to Justice Rooks to learn whether both himself and his counsel might address the jury. He was informed that both could not, and that he must make his election. Mr. Yorke then applied to be permitted, when his counsel examined the witnesses, to examine them himself also. This was refused. Mr. Yorke and his counsel then alternately cross-examined. Then at the close of the prosecution the court asked the prisoner whether he had elected to address the jury or to leave it to his counsel. He elected to do it in person, and his counsel and himself alternately examined the witnesses for the defence.

In 1811, Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Ex v. White, 3 Camp. N. P. 98, still further restricted the practice. His language is so clear and sensible as to deserve quotation: "I am afraid of the confusion and perplexity that would arise if a cause were to be conducted at the same time both by counsel and the party himself. I am extremely anxious that a person accused should have every assistance in making his defence, but I must likewise look to the decent and orderly administration of justice. I therefore cannot allow counsel to examine witnesses for the defendant if he is likewise to put questions to them himself and afterwards to address the jury. If in the course of the trial, any point of law arises which he declares himself incompetent to discuss, I will be very ready to hear it argued by his counsel, although he conducts the defence himself. I will do in this respect as was formerly done in capital cases when the assistance of counsel was not permitted to prisoners upon matters of fact. I think I cannot consistently with my duty go farther; and surely there is no hardship in the rule I lay down. If the defendant has counsel to conduct his cause, he may suggest any question to them which he considers fit to be put, or if he takes the conduct of it upon himself he may have the benefit of their private suggestions upon matters of fact; and as soon as any point of law arises they shall be readily heard upon it."

Both of these cases were cited in argument before Lord Chief Justice Abbott on the trial of one Parkins for a misdemeanour; he held that a prisoner cannot have counsel to examine and cross-examine witnesses and reserve to himself the right to address the jury: Ex v. Parkins, Ryan & Moody N. P. C. 168.

An examination of the later decisions shows an occasional departure, under very special circumstances, from the rulings just quoted, but the undoubted weight of authority is in favour of the rule, which very eminent judges have repeatedly enforced, that a prisoner is in the hands of his counsel for every purpose, if he see fit to employ counsel; but so tender is the law about infringements of ancient rights that on a murder trial of a foreigner who had obstinately remained mute from malice for more than a year, the court refused to allow counsel to appear for the prisoner without his express consent: Reynolds v. Farnish, 6 Cox C. C. 358.

In the following cases the rule was enforced:—Ex v. Neame, 2 Foster & F. 64; a. c. 6 Jur. N. S. 406; Ex-

v. Taylor, 1 Foster & F. 585; Reg. v. Boucher, 8 C. & P. 141; Reg. v. Barrows, 2 M. & Rob. 124; Reg. v. Walkley, 8 C. & P. 248; Reg. v. Rider, 8 id. 599; Reg. v. Tasts, 4 Jur. N. S. 244.

In the following cases the rule was relaxed:—Reg. v. Stephens, 11 Cox C. C. 669; Reg. v. Dyer, 1 id. 113;—Reg. v. Malings, 8 C. & P. 242; Queen v. Williams, 1 Cox C. C. 863.

We now turn to the United States, and trust go back in point of time. The materials to furnish an accurate judgment of the practice in the colonies prior to the Revolution are few and unsatisfactory. The colonial charters and patents are silent as to any change, real or proposed, of the law of the mother country, but among the laws agreed upon in England between William Penn and "divers free men of the Province" of Pennsylvania, the sixth article provided that "in all courts all persons of all persuasions may freely appear in their own way and according to their own manner, and there personally plead their own cause themselves, or, if unable, by their friend." Admonished, no doubt, by his own sufferings, the liberal and benevolent Proprietary, in the Charter of Privileges granted by him in 1701, with the approbation of the General Assembly, declared, "that all criminals shall have the same privileges of witnesses and counsel as their prosecutors." The records of the Provincial Council show that those accused of crime both defended themselves and were defended by counsel; but we can only conjecture how the practice changed in the other colonies.

In 1718, at Charleston, in South Carolina, Major Stede Bonnet and thirty-three others were tried in the Vice-Admiralty Court for piracy: 15 State Trials, 1231. The prisoners had no counsel, and the behaviour of Chief Justice Trott is a sad instance of judicial barbarity. The statements of the prisoners in one case, to which no credit was given for their exculpation, were used as hearsay evidence in another case to convict the prisoner.

In 1732 John Peter Zenger was tried in New York for libel, and was defended with great boldness by Andrew Hamilton of Philadelphia, the most eloquent and renowned lawyer of his day. The case is no guide for us, however, as libel is graded as a misdemeanour.

In 1770, Josiah Quincy, Jr., and John Adams defended, for the murder of Atucks, Gray and others, the soldiers who had fired upon the mob in the streets of Boston on the evening of the 5th of March. These and the cases of the Salem witches are the only trials of note that our meagre colonial records afford.

The example set by Penn and the sufferings of the English at home, full of instructive warning to those who sought to guard against governmental tyranny by constitutional provisions, are sufficient to account for the presence in the earliest State Constitutions of a clause extending to one accused of crime the protection of a defence by counsel.

Pennsylvania and Maryland so provided in 1776; New York in the following year; Massachusetts in 1780, and Delaware in 1792. In September, 1787, the convention called to frame the Constitution of the United States completed their work, and submitted it to the people for adoption. The original instrument contained no Bill of Rights and no reference to our subject. At the end of July, 1788, eleven States had unconditionally adopted the Constitution, but five of them proposed amendments for the consideration of the first Congress that would assemble under it, and one of the five called for a second general convention to act upon the amendments desired. North Carolina and Rhode Island did not adopt the Constitution until the administration of Washington had fairly begun, and by the 15th of December, 1791, amendments were duly proposed by Congress and ratified by the legislatures of the several States. The sixth amendment, to which alone we need refer, has been partly quoted at the head of this article. To carry it into effect Congress provided "that in all courts of the United States the parties may plead and manage their own causes personally or by the assistance of such counsel or attorneys at law as by the rules of the said courts respectively shall be permitted to manage and conduct causes therein:" and further, at a later date, "every person . . . indicted for treason or other capital offence shall be allowed to make his full defence by counsel learned in the law:" Rev. Stat. U. S. sects. 747, 1084. This language and that of the amendment to the Constitution have never received judicial construction. The practice, we believe, has been in conformity with the English rule, until the recent trial of Guiteau. It is a singular fact that the question has never been raised in any of the States, except in a late case in Tennessee, which we shall presently notice.

In Mississippi, South Carolina and Texas, the language of the constitutional clauses is too explicit to admit of doubt; it gives the right "to be heard by himself or counsel, or both, as he may elect." In Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Vermont and Wisconsin, the language is "by himself and his counsel." In Kansas, Louisiana and Nebraska, it is "in person or by counsel." In Alabama and Maine, it is "by himself and his counsel or either, at his election." In Massachusetts he "shall be fully heard by himself or counsel, at his election." In California, Florida, Nevada and New York, he is "to appear and defend in person and with counsel as in civil actions." In Georgia he "shall have the privilege and benefit of counsel." In Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, North Carolina, Rhode Island and West Virginia, "he shall have the assistance of counsel in his defence." In Maryland it is declared that "he ought to be allowed counsel." In Virginia there is no constitutional provision, but a statute of 1786 and well-settled practice establish the right.

Upon most of these clauses there is room for ingenuity of argument, but the almost total absence of judicial decisions is strong evidence of the sensible determination of criminals to commit their defences exclusively to professional hands. The only case revealed by a diligent search is that of Wilson v. The State, in Tennessee, 3 Heisk. 232. Counsel had fully agreed upon the evidence, and then the prisoner himself claimed the right to make a statement. This was denied. The Court of Errors and Appeals held that the right given by the Constitution, though in the words "to be heard by himself and his counsel," simply meant the right to argue the case upon the facts in evidence, and did not include a sworn or unsworn statement of facts not otherwise proved. Judge Nelson dissented on the ground that this was a denial of right. It may, therefore, be fairly said that the question is still open to debate.

The limitations put upon the rights of advocates, and, by parity of reasoning, upon those who claim to act as their own advocates, are such as grow out of the powers of a court to so superintend the proceedings as to prevent a waste of time or breach of decorum. But while insisting upon the existence of these powers, judges have universally displayed the utmost reluctance to exercise them. The right to "try men by the hour-glass" is declared dangerous in the extreme: Hunt v. The State of Georgia, 49 Geo. 265; People v. Kennan, 13 Cal. 581; Cooley's Const. Lim. 336; State v. Collins, 70 N. C. 241; Word's Case, 3 Leigh (Va.), 743; Commonwealth v. Porter, 10 Met. 268; Lynch v. State, 9 Ind. 541.

Other difficulties may arise, as recent experience has shown, from the rule that in cases of felony the record must show that the prisoner was personally present during every stage of the trial: Price v. The Commonwealth, 6 Harris, 103. This rule is not enforced in cases of misdemeanour: United States v. Davis, 6 Blatch. O. C. R. 464.—American Law Register.

DOCK BRIEFS.

A correspondent of the Times, referring to the difficulties under which prisoners labour in their defence, draws attention to a custom not now frequently followed, but still in accordance with professional etiquette. "As a matter of fact," he says, "any prisoner may call for the services of any disengaged counsel in court (other than Queen's Counsel) on tendering the fee of one guinea, and such a request is never refused. If this right were better known, it might be more often asserted, and its exercise would surely be in harmony with that spirit of fairness which generally characterises our criminal law."

UNDEFENDED PRISONERS IN FRANCE.

Mr. D. Bingham, writing from Paris, gives the following account of the practice in France as to undefended prisoners:—"When a prisoner is about to be tried, he is removed from Mazas to the Conciergerie, which is termed the maison de justice, and which adjoins the courts of law. Here the president of the assize, accompanied by the usher of the court, pays him a visit and asks him the following questions: If he has received a copy of the indictment? If he is aware of the nature of the charges brought against him? If he persists in his declarations? If he has made choice of a counsel? In the event of replying to the last question in the negative, the president appoints a member of the bar to assist the accused during his trial. The law against a criminal being abandoned to his own resources is very explicit. Article 294 of the Code runs thus: 'L'accusé sera interpellé de déclarer le choix qu'il aura fait d'un conseil pour l'aider dans sa défense; si non le juge lui en désignera un sur-le-champ, à peine de nullité de tout ce qui suivra.' A similar system extends to civil cases, and a poor plaintiff can apply for legal assistance, which is readily granted after due inquiry. The counsel called upon by a judge to act on the part of a prisoner or plaintiff receives no fee."

COMMISSIONS TO TAKE EVIDENCE.

The terms of Order XXXVII., rule 4, with regard to the taking of evidence by commission, both in this country and abroad, are so wide that it is no wonder there have been several cases upon the restrictions under which such commissions will be granted. The rule in question was substituted by the Judicature Acts for the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, sect. 47, which had in turn superseded sect. 4 of the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 22. The last-mentioned Act was that which originally gave the courts power to issue such commissions in civil suits, the similar power which previously existed, under an Act of 1773, having been confined to criminal proceedings, and to commissions to be directed to the courts in the East Indies. The ample powers which are given to the court or a judge by the present rule are limited by the words "where it shall appear necessary for the purpose of justice." In Warner v. Moses (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 401; 16 Ch. Div. 100) the Master of the Rolls, sitting in the Court of Appeal, approved the explanation of the rule contained in Wilson on the Judicature Acts, that, within the jurisdiction, depositions may be taken under it, where it is shown that a necessary witness is either going abroad, or is, from illness, age, or other infirmity, likely to be unable to attend at the trial. That is to say, the rules laid down by the common law judges, under the Procedure Act of 1854, were to be applied to the new practice in both divisions of the High Court.

Two cases which have been recently reported together (Berdan v. Greenwood, and Re Boyse, Crofton v. Crofton, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 522; 20 Ch. Div. 764) have materially contributed to settle the practice with regard to commissions for taking the evidence abroad, by laying down important principles on that subject. In the former of these cases, which was before the Court of Appeal in Feb., 1880, the plaintiff, General Berdan, an American, was suing to recover a commission on sales of rifles which he alleged to have been effected by the defendants to the Russian Government through his good offices. He sought to be excused from attendance at the trial, and applied that his evidence might be taken by commission in France, on the ground that it would be dangerous to his health to cross the Channel, as he was suffering from heart disease. The Court of Appeal, consisting of Lords Justices Baggallay and Cotton, disallowed the application, on the ground that justice to the defendants required that, in a case so largely resting upon the plaintiff's own testimony, they should be able to test it by cross-examining him in open court. In Crofton v. Crofton, heard before Mr. Justice Fry in May last, the claim was based upon a document in the form of a bill of exchange purporting to have been drawn by the testator in the action, in favour of one Gautier, a French subject, with whom she was then living at Marseilles, and indorsed by him to the plaintiff. Gautier had refused to come over to England to be examined as to the circumstances under which the instrument had been drawn, and the plaintiff desired to have his evidence taken by a commission directed to a French court, who would examine the witness in accordance with the French procedure. Mr. Justice Fry was of opinion that the circumstances of the claim were so suspicious that, applying the principle laid down in Berdan v. Greenwood, justice to the defendant required that Gautier should be subjected to a rigorous cross-examination. It appeared from the evidence of a French expert who had made an affidavit on behalf of the defendant, that the French practice as to examinations is much less strict than the English, the judge putting all the questions, and the only approach to cross-examination being that the judge frequently consents to put questions suggested by the agents for either party. Under these circumstances, his lordship refused to allow the commission to issue, being of opinion that the case was one in which he would not be justified in depriving the defendants of their right to a strict cross-examination, such as English law provides for. These decisions show that the courts will not lightly allow defendants to be deprived of the protection afforded to them by the wholesome provision of our law.—Law Times.

CURIOSITIES OF EVIDENCE.

Some of the more ignorant of the Roman Catholic Church have a curious idea of the sanctity of an oath. We remember an old Irish woman being called as a witness at a recent assize at Liverpool to prove on the part of the defence an alibi as to the prisoners. She was duly sworn, and gave evidence utterly irreconcilable with the statements of other witnesses of undoubted veracity. It was quietly suggested by a clergyman in court that the Testament used in administering the oath had no cross upon the cover. On this representation another book was sent for which bore the sacred symbol; and being somewhat reluctantly resworn on the new volume, she did not hesitate to say, on being questioned, that all her testimony just given was false, quietly remarking, in answer to a remonstrance from the counsel, that she supposed she might say what she pleased as long as she had not "sworn on the blessed crucifix." The custom of kissing the thumb instead of the book was considered by many an evasion of the moral obligation attached to an oath, while to others, holding the Testament upside down was deemed an equally efficacious release. These and other disreputable artifices are, however, very little indulged in at the present day.

When the celebrated Sergt. Hill conducted a defence at the Bar of the House of Lords, he propounded a question to a witness which the counsel on the other side objected to. After much had been said on either side, the law lords themselves disagreed, and the bar and all strangers were ordered to withdraw. After an absence of two hours they were readmitted and the Lord Chancellor informed Mr. Hill that the House decided the question might be put. "Please you, my lords," said the Sergeant, "it is so long since I asked the question that I forget what it was, but with your lordships' permission I will put another!"

A witness was lately called on a trial at the Old Bailey to prove an alibi. He solemnly swore that the prisoner on the night and at the hour in question (11 25 p.m.) was at home and in bed at a distant part of the parish. Nothing could shake his testimony, for he said he had looked at the clock just as the prisoner went up-stairs, and he had set the clock right with the church clock himself the same day, and it was certainly 11 25 p.m., &c. "Pray what do you make the time now?" blandly asked the counsel who cross-examined, pointing to a great white dial over the dock. No answer was given. "Don't be confused—take your time. I ask you again—what is the time by that clock now?" The question was repeated several times, and the witness was eventually bound to confess that he could not tell the time by a clock at all. Singularly enough, the clock in the court was standing at 11 25 when he made this avowal.

We remember a country witness being called at the assizes to prove that at a particular hour on a certain night the moon was shining and at the full. There happened to be no almanac in court, but the evidence seemed to be satisfactory, for he had obtained his information from "a regular good London stationer's almanac." The question was asked in cross-examination, "How did you obtain this London stationer's almanac? Did you buy it?" "Buy it! No; my father pasted it behind my kitchen door nine years ago—the day I was married!" It need hardly be said that information as to the moon's age during a day in the current year was of little value from an almanac nine years old.

We may remark that all evidence of a "circumstantial" character is received with great caution, and, no doubt, rightly so, on a trial. Take, as an illustration of this, the evidence offered against a prisoner, of footmarks. Nothing is more commonly found than the impression of boots or shoes near to a murdered body, or to premises which have been broken into. A policeman is called as a witness on the trial, who deposes that he took the boots off the prisoner upon his arrest, that he compared them with the footmarks near the place of the alleged crime, and that they corresponded in every particular. "You compared them, I suppose," usually asks the judge, "by placing the boots in the impressions, and found that they corresponded?" "Yes, my lord." The answer is fatal to that branch of evidence, for the placing the boot in the impression found very possibly caused that similarity relied upon; the prudent officer places the prisoner's boot beside the footprint, presses it into the earth, and then removes it, compares the impression made with the one discovered.—Leisure Hour.

REVIEWS.

The Lawyer's Companion and Diary, and London and Provincial Law Directory for 1883, with Tables of Costs, &c. Edited by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Thirty-seventh Annual Issue. London: Stevens and Sons, 119 Chancery-lane; Shaw & Sons, Fetter-lane. 1883.

Even an almanac-maker may incur the penalties of the law, if he omits in the performance of his function, as happened in 1717, when, during the minority of Louis XV. of France, the Duke of Orleans, as Regent, committed to the Bastille "Laurence d'Henry, for disrespect to King George I., in not mentioning him in his almanac as King of Great Britain." Mr. John Thompson, of the Inner Temple, is much more than your mere almanac-maker, but, though the "Lawyer's Companion and Diary" assumes to embrace very many other provinces of information, in none is it deficient, and its pains-taking compiler has as little reason to fear the lash of criticism as a lettre de cachet. It should be premised that the term "lawyer" is ordinarily applied in England to a solicitor also, and not limited, as by our usage, to barristers; and both branches of the legal profession have been abundantly catered for by this encyclopedic "Companion." Here we have, in addition to a Calendar for the proximate year, and a blank Daily Diary, a Table of Costs and abstract of decisions on that subject, a practical Reading of this year's Statutes and an Alphabetical Index to the Practical Statutes from the time of George IV., a full precis of the Stamp Duties now payable, and any number of Tables and Abstracts in reference to legal time, interest, discount, oaths in the Supreme Court, Probate, Legacy and Succession Duties, &c., &c., to say nothing of a complete legal Directory for England. This appears to be its thirty-seventh annual issue, and we are not surprised that such enduring success has rewarded a compilation so valuable, for which the profession should indeed feel grateful to the publishing houses of Stevens & Sons, and Shaw & Sons.

The Law relating to the Compulsory Purchase and Sale of Lands in Ireland, under the Provisions of the Irish Railways and Lands Clauses Acts: being the Full Text of the various Acts; with an Introduction, and Copious Notes of the Practice in Ireland, and of Decided Cases; and an Appendix of Forms. By WILLIAM SUFFERN, LL.B., Barrister-at-Law. Dublin: E. Ponsonby, 116 Grafton-street. 1882.

"THE great defect in the system" treated by Mr. Suffern is, as he observes (Introd. XXII.), "one which must be looked for in all legislative efforts in these countries so long as the present practice of 'tinkering' Acts of Parliament is persisted in. Instead of repealing in toto a statute or a number of statutes and enacting others in lieu thereof, portions only are repealed, and the repealed sections are replaced [in the sense of substituted, we presume] by new Acts; and, in this way, a complete patchwork is produced, which is as distracting to those entrusted with the duties of the administration and interpretation of the law, as it certainly must be bewildering and unsatisfactory to the public, whose rights of property are intended to be thus so seriously interfered with." This farrago of Acts in part repealed, amended and yet again amended, Mr. Suffern has endeavoured most ably to present in the form of a quasi-code, in the first part of his work, which is preceded by an introductory outline of the whole practice dealt with in his attempt at codification; while in the second part he details the result of all the most important decisions in the English and Irish courts upon the construction of the statutes in question. It was a most useful undertaking, especially as no previous treatise had been devoted to the exposition of the Irish Railways Acts; and on inquiries before arbitrators and on the trial of traverses at Assizes the want of such a work has been acutely experienced. That inconvenience can be felt no longer. Mr. Suffern has executed a work which could hardly be surpassed in point of accuracy and completeness—the greater by reason of its very full table of contents and copious index; while the many useful and practical Forms appended, together with the reprint of the statutes themselves would suffice alone to render the work one of permanent and unique value. The decisions, too, which he has collected together and critically examined, especially as regards the English with a view to their bearing and application on the Irish Acts (thus, as to Syers v. Met. Board of Works, p. 168), are not elsewhere so thoroughly dealt with; but, in reference to the word “town,” we observe he has overlooked Deards v. Goldsmith (40 L. T. N. S. 328), following Elliot v. South Devon Ry. Co., and discussing other cases to which he has referred. We have, however, failed to detect any errors or omissions of consequence, and after a painstaking examination can but record our entire satisfaction with this useful work, which, we observe, has been most appropriately dedicated to Mr. Justice Andrews.

Many years ago, a testator in England left £10,000 to a friend, but with the condition that one-half the sum should be buried with him in his coffin. The legatee took advice on the matter. “Where is the money now?” asked his friend. “In the bank,” was the reply. “All right,” said the adviser; “write a cheque for £5,000, and put it in the old man's coffin, payable to his order.”

Holloway's Pills.—Teachings of Experience.—The united testimony of thousands, extending over more than forty years, most strongly recommends these Pills as the best purifier, the mildest aperient, and the safest restoratives. They never prove delusive, or give merely temporary relief, but attack all ailments of the stomach, lungs, heart, head, and bowels in the only safe and legitimate way, by depurating the blood, and so eradicating those impurities which are the source and constituent of almost every disease. Their medicinal efficacy is wonderful in renovating enfeebled constitutions. Their action embraces all that is desirable in a household medicine. They expel every noxious and effete matter; and thus the strength is nurtured and the energies stimulated.

On TUESDAY, the 9th day of FEBRUARY, 1883,
At the hour of Twelve o'clock noon,

In Four Lots,

The Fee-simple Estate of CARRICKYNAGHTEN and GARRYNAGOWNA, situate in the Barony of Athlone, and County Roscommon.

LOT No. 1 consists of Part of the Townland of Carrickynaghten, and Carrickynaghten and Garrynagowna Bog, containing 202a 3r 32p statute measure.

LOT No. 2 consists of Part of the Townland of Carrickynaghten and Garrynagowna Bog, including part thereof known as Collogoriff, containing 277a 2r 31p statute measure.

LOT No. 3 consists of Part of the Townland of Garrynagowna and Carrickynaghten and Garrynagowna Bog, containing 508 acres statute measure. This Lot will be sold subject to an annuity of £120 a year on the life of a lady now in her 62nd year, and will be bound to indemnify the other Lots from the payment thereof.

LOT No. 4 consist of Part of the Townland of Garrynagowna, Carrickynaghten, and Garrynagowna Bog, containing 292a 0r 39p statute measure.

The title rentcharge of £3 7s 4d and the quit rent of £2 14s 1½d will be redeemed out of the purchase-money of the Lots, as also the amounts due to the Commissioners of Public Works on foot of loan.

Dated this 15th day of December, 1882.

H. C. LYNCH, for Examiner.

DESCRIPTIVE PARTICULARS.

The Property is situated between Athlone and Ballinasloe, both important Stations on the Midland Great Western Railway, and both celebrated as being first-class Fair and Market Towns. The county road from Athlone to Ballinasloe and Galway passes through a portion of the property at the south-west extremity, and there is a good road communication from Athlone on another portion of the Estate (forming Lot 1). The river Shannon adjoins a portion of the property, and affords communication by water with Athlone.

The Estate has been well managed, considerable sums of money having been expended on drainage and other improvements, and there is an ample supply of turbary. Almost all the Property, with the exception of the Demesne Lands on Lot 4 (which is in the owner's possession), is in the hands of a peaceful tenantry.

The Dwelling-house is well situated on an extensive demesne, immediate possession of which (with the exception of 59a 8p, set to tenants) will be given to the purchaser of Lot 4. The Demesne Lands are well timbered, fenced, and in good condition, and capable of yielding a large return for meadowing and grazing purposes. There is also an artificial lake of considerable extent on the demesne.

Private proposals will be received by the Solicitor having the carriage of the proceedings up to the 10th day of January, 1883, and submitted to the Court for approval.

For rentals and other particulars apply to the Registrar of the Land Judges Court, Inns-quay, in the City of Dublin; to

CONTRACTS IMPOSSIBLE OF PERFORMANCE.—I.

THE case of Lynch v. The Midland Railway Co., reported in our present issue (16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 115), and already commented on (16 Ir. L. T. 275, 289, 317), is an interesting authority on the subject of contracts impossible of performance, on which we have found another Irish decision not hitherto adverted to, besides some recent Canadian and American cases further illustrative of the doctrine in question. An appeal was taken, and after elaborate arguments judgment was reserved, and has not even yet been delivered; so that, of course, we shall abstain from direct comment on the case. But, for our present purpose, it should be mentioned that on the hearing stress was laid upon two cases not much dwelt upon (and so far as we know, not cited) in the court below—namely, the leading case of Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 26, and Hall v. Wright, E. B. & E. 746, 29 L. J. Q. B. 43, to which in particular the learned Master of the Rolls referred.

Now, we find the former case acted on in the beginning of the present year, by the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Harrison v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., holding that, to an action for breach of contract for shipment of cattle, at a certain time, it is no defence that the cars were prevented from arriving at the required time by an unavoidable accident and delay; inasmuch as, where a party by contract agrees to do a prescribed thing in a prescribed time he is liable for non-performance of the contract, although his non-fulfilment of the contract was occasioned by inevitable and unavoidable accident: citing Paradine v. Jane, ubi supra; Atkinson v. Richie, 10 East, 530 (referred to by May, C.J., in Lynch's case); Spence v. Chadwick, 71 Jur. 872; Place v. Express Co., 27 Hilton, 33; Deming v. Ry. Co., 43 N. H. 455; Hadly v. Clark, 8 T. R. 250; Parmlee v. Wilkes, 22 Barb. 539; Harmony v. Fingham, 2 Kern. 99; Hutchinson. Carriers, s. 317; Angell, Carriers, s. 249. The distinction is that, when the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it, without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, then the law will excuse him; but, when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract: Paradine v. Jane, ubi supra; Hadley v. Clarke, 8 T. R. 259; Carret v. Dutton, 4 Camp. 333; Shubrick v. Salmon, 3 Burr. 1637; Parker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 265; Storer v. Gordon, ib. 308; Blight v. Page, 3 B. & P. 295, n.; Marcus of Buie v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487; Comyn's Dig. tit. Condition, L. 14; Tomkins v. Dudley, 25 N. Y. 272; Oakley v. Morton, 1 Kern. 25; Bunn v. Prather, 21 Ill. 217; Bacon v. Cobb, 45 ib. 47; Steele v. Buc, 61 ib. 343; Walker v. Tucker, 70 ib. 527; School District v. Dauchy, 25 Conn. 520; School Trustees v. Bennet, 3 Dutch. 513; Adams v. Nichols, 19 Pick. 275; Davis v. Smith, 15 Mo. 467; and other English and American cases collected ante, p. 289. But, it should be remembered that, where the continued existence of a specific thing is essential to the performance of the contract, its destruction, from no default of either party, operates as a discharge: Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826; Williams v. Lloyd, W. Jones, 179, Palmer, 543; Jones v. How, 9 C. B. 1; Walker

v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527; Lord v. Wheeler, 1 Gray, 282; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62; cf. Earl of Meath v. Cuthbert, 10 Ir. L. T. Rep. 145; but, see School District v. Dauchy and Bunn v. Prather, ubi supra; and see Knight v. Bean, 22 Me. 536. And so, in the Canadian case of Ellis v. The Midland Ry. Co. (2 C. L. T. 511), decided in September last, where it appeared that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as master of a steamer, for the season of 1877, but the vessel was burned before the season was over, it was held that, by the destruction of the vessel, the contract was at an end, and that the plaintiff could not recover the balance of the salary agreed upon for the season. Cf. Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 36 L. J. C. P. 331; Anglo-Egyptian Nav. Co. v. Rennie, L. R. 10 C. P. 271, 571, 44 L. J. C. P. 130; Scully v. Kirkpatrick, 70 Penn. 324; and as to Hills v. Sughrue, 15 M. & W. 353, see Pollock Contr., 2nd ed., 356, n., Anson, Contr., 2nd ed., 318, n. And again, he who prevents a thing being done shall not avail himself of the non-performance he has occasioned: Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. 528; Hotham v. E. India Co., 1 T. R. 639; Risinger v. Cheney, 2 Gilm. 90; Potter v. Dennison, 5 ib. 590; Rauson v. Clark, 70 Ill. 656; Mt. Vernon v. Patton, 94 ib. 65; Borden v. Borden, 5 Mass. 67; Marshall v. Craig, 1 Bibb, 383; Majors v. Hickman, 2 ib. 217; Shaw v. Hurd, 3 ib. 372; Jones v. Walker, 13 B. Mon. 165; Mayor v. Butler, 1 Barb. 337; Wheatley v. Covington, 11 Bush. 18; Smith v. Cedar Rapids, 43 Iowa, 239; Stewart v. Keteltas, 36 N. Y. 388; Roll's Abr. 445; and other English and American cases collected ante, pp. 289, 290. It has been decided that injunctions obtained at the suit of third persons have not the effect of suspending or extending the period of statutes of limitations: Wilkinson v. Fire Insurance Co., 72 N. Y. 499; Barker v. Millard, 16 Wend. 572; and a well-known American writer (J. L. High) has recently observed that no reason is perceived why the same rule should not apply in cases where performance of a contract is prevented by an injunction obtained by strangers to the contract: 15 Central L. J. 342; and see cases collected ante, p. 289. In Courtenay v. Waterford and Central Ireland Railway Company (13 Ir. L. T. Dig. 20, a case not cited, by the way, in Mr. Emden's recent work on Building Contracts), it appeared that the plaintiff, having contracted with the defendants for the erection of a bridge, to be completed by a prescribed day, subsequently entered into an agreement with them for certain additional work, consisting of alterations in the structure of the bridge, and of such a nature that, until they were finished, the bridge itself could not be completed. It was held that, the original contract having become, by the further agreement and the nature of the work to which it related, a contract to complete within a reasonable time, there was evidence that it was impossible by the exercise of all due and reasonable despatch to complete the bridge within the time originally stipulated; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to recover his demand notwithstanding the delay. See cf. Jones v. St. John's College, Oxford, L. R. 6 Q. B. 115, 40 L. J. Q. B. 80; Thorn v. Mayor of London, L. R. 1 App. Ca. 120, 45 L. J. Ex. 467; and as to contracts to build in contravention of statutes, see Stevens v.

Gourley, 7 C. B. N. S. 90, 29 L. J. C. P. 1, 1 L. T. N. S. 33, 1 F. & F. 498; Cubitt v. Smith, 11 L. T. N. S. 298. In 1 Roll. Abr. P. 450, pl. 10, by the way, a curious rule is laid down that, "if a man covenant to build a house before such a day, and afterwards the plague is there before the day, and continues there till after the day, this shall excuse him from the breach of the covenant for not doing thereof before the day, for the law will not compel him to venture his life for it, but he may do it after." But in Hall v. Wright, ubi supra (to which we shall subsequently refer), Campbell, C.J., citing this rule, said that, time not being of the essence of the contract, the existence of the plague might be pleaded in suspension and in excuse of performance of it on that day; but, the contract was not dissolved, and if the house had not been built in a reasonable time afterwards, the covenantor would have been liable in damages. In Dewey v. School District (19 Amer. L. Reg. 548), it was held that, where schools were suspended for a period on account of the prevalence of small-pox, the teacher remaining ready to perform his contract, he was not by reason of such suspension precluded from his right to compensation during such period—performance not having been rendered impossible, but merely difficult or undesirable, and there having been no destruction of the subject-matter of the contract.

THE LATE RIGHT HON. SIR JOSEPH NAPIER, BART.

On the 4th of May, 1802, Lord Redesdale, then the Irish Chancellor, wrote to Lord Eldon:—"I have been principally engaged in eating and drinking. To-morrow I sit for the first time. Lord Kilwarden is a sensible man, but I think not strong. Lord Norbury—as you know—the Attorney-General, I like, though he is not high as a lawyer. Mr. O'Grady is a pleasant young man. Mr. Saurin sensible, but, I think, discontented. The rest are not of much importance." Some two years after this rather uncomplimentary estimate of the Irish Bar was penned by "a strong-built Chancery pleader from Lincoln's Inn," as he was described by Mr. Justice Johnson, there was born in the north of Ireland one who was destined to add a brilliant name to the many by which the Bar of Ireland was subsequently distinguished. Sir Joseph Napier was born at Belfast on the 26th of December, 1804. He died at St. Leonard's-on-Sea, on the 9th of December, 1882.

He was the youngest son of William Napier, a descendant of the Merchiston branch of the Napier family. Educated in Belfast, and afterwards in the University of Dublin, he had even in early life the advantage of several able teachers. He was placed under the private tuition of the afterwards famous dramatist, J. Sheridan Knowles, and subsequently became his pupil in the Belfast Academical Institution. He next studied classics under Dr. O'Beirne (subsequently master of the Royal School of Enniskillen), and was prepared for Trinity College under the Rev. William Neilson; while he enjoyed the advantage of studying mathematics under the especial care of the late Dr. Thomson of Belfast, father of the celebrated Professor of Cambridge University. Thus prepared, he entered Trinity College in November, 1820, and even before the termination of his first year distinguished himself as a mathematician, publishing a demonstration of the Binomial Theorem, while his undergraduate course was remarkable for his proficiency in classics. In 1825 he graduated B.A., but the time was yet to come when he received the honorary degrees of LL.D. of Dublin and D.C.L. of Oxford. In Trinity he formed an intimate acquaintance with the late Lord

Chief Justice Whiteside; and with him and the late Dr. William Cooke Taylor, the young student engaged successfully in reviving the old Historical Society, founded in 1770, of which, many years later, in 1856, he was chosen President. At that time the Society—which was yet to number on the roll of its auditors, medallists, and prizemen such names as Isaac Butt, Edward Sullivan, Gerald Fitzgibbon, Edward Gibson, David Plunket, and so many others that have won celebrity—was in a condition of completely "suspended animation;" but, the efforts of Napier and his colleagues first succeeded in establishing, outside the walls of the College, what was called the Oratorical Society; and on May 4, 1870, the far-famed College Historical Society was found yet in being and celebrating its centenary under the presidency of the Right Hon. Sir Joseph Napier, Bart., Ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland. His studies in oratory were undertaken with a view to the Bar, and in Easter Term, 1831, after a time spent in London qualifying himself more fully for that profession, he was called, tempore Plunket, and joined the North-West Circuit. The Irish Bar at that time, at all events, could not be deemed to deserve the disparaging remarks of Lord Redesdale. Bushe, the Pennefathers, and O'Connell had brought it celebrity; and Napier took his place among such lawyers and advocates as Blackburne, Brewster, Crampton, Greene, Hatchell, Henn, Holmes, Lefroy, Monahan, Moore, O'Loghlen, Pigot, Sheil, and Whiteside. He soon rose into estimation as a well-read lawyer and consummate special pleader. But, ample as were his own acquired qualifications, he had recognised how inadequate were the provisions then existing for the purpose of legal education; and the system that dispensed with lectures, examinations, or any test of qualification whatever, was put an end to by the establishment in 1839 of the Dublin Law Institute, in which, as a Professor, he took an active part, along with Whiteside and others. Sir Joseph, moreover, largely benefited the profession by his literary efforts; and his little treatise on Civil Bill Practice, re-edited in 1841 by Robert Longfield, became a standard book of reference; while he also contributed various papers to the "Legal Reporter," a useful publication of the day. In 1843 we find him appearing before the House of Lords in the celebrated appeal case of Samuel Gray, involving the accused's right of challenging a juror, when he succeeded in having the conviction of his client reversed. And later on, in 1843-4, he appeared for the Crown in the State Trial of O'Connell, having, it is said, returned a retainer from the traverser's solicitor which had reached him too late. However, he had but a minor part to take in the trial, as junior, but he was subsequently engaged on the appeal to the House of Lords, and after his return he was appointed one of her Majesty's Counsel. In 1847 Napier became a candidate for Parliamentary honours, contesting Trinity College with Sir Frederick Shaw, the then Recorder, but unsuccessfully, notwithstanding Isaac Butt's powerful support. He was returned, however, in the following year, on Sir Frederick Shaw's retirement, and was again elected at the general election of 1857, being unsuccessfully opposed by Mr. (now Judge) Lawson. In 1852 he was appointed Attorney-General, under the administration of Lord Derby, and was sworn of the Irish Privy Council, while his friend Whiteside (who in 1833 had married Miss Napier, sister of the deceased) received the appointment of Solicitor-General; but their tenure of office enured only till the 10th of December in the same year, when the Derby Cabinet resigned. In the same year he was also made an honorary Bencher of the King's Inns. In 1858, on the return of Lord Derby to power, Mr. Napier was appointed Lord Chancellor, holding office till the year following, when there was another change in the Government. But, again Lord Derby formed an administration in 1867, and in that year Mr. Napier was created a baronet. He was, also, chosen Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin, which office he held till 1880, when he was succeeded by Dr. Ball. He had been elected President of the Department of Jurisprudence of the Social Science Association in 1858, and in 1861 he was again elected to that position, and delivered a very able address. It is stated that he was offered, and declined the office of Lord Justice of Appeal in 1866. And in 1868 he was made a Privy Councillor of Great Britain, and constituted a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Sir Joseph Napier was, also, a Commissioner for the Publication of the Ancient Laws of Ireland, and became a member of many public boards, including the Board of National Education; while he was an active member of the Ritual and Clerical Subscription Commission, an energetic supporter of the Church Education Society, and, on the disestablishment of the Church of which he was a peculiarly zealous champion, assisted to frame its new constitution, various important Acts of Synod and rules of debate being shaped by his hand. Sir Joseph married, on the 20th of August, 1831, Charity, second daughter of John Grace, Esq., of Dublin, by whom he had issue two sons and three daughters. But the premature death of his much-loved eldest son, William, a promising and universally respected member of the Bar, which took place a few years ago, exercised a sad influence on the closing years of his busy life. It was a shock from which, it is believed, he never recovered, and he seemed to have become physically unable for sustained mental or bodily work.

Dying after a lingering illness at the age of 78, Sir Joseph Napier has left a reputation worthy of a high estimate even among those of his foremost public and professional contemporaries. Without pretension to rank as an orator with a Whiteside or Butt, he was an able, refined, and perspicuous speaker. But, he was still more a lawyer thoroughly erudite, of consummate soundness and skill, patient, painstaking, and ingenious. A most conscientious and careful judge, his paramount judicial capacity was marred in its exercise by the physical disqualification of defective hearing. In Parliament he failed to achieve any very great success, but he took a prominent part in discussing the more important questions of the day, always on the Conservative side. He opposed the Poor Law Extension Act, and the Ministerial measure for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister; but his principal legislative efforts had relation to land law reform, having unsuccessfully introduced a Land Improvement Bill, a Leasing Power Bill, a Tenants' Improvements' Compensation Bill, and a Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Bill, which, while opposed as an attack upon property, by the party who returned him to Parliament, were moderate indeed when compared with the fruits of recent legislation. In the law, politics, and religious polemics of his day, Sir Joseph Napier, in a word, won a conspicuous renown, and in each capacity deserves to be held in remembrance among the great characters of Irish public life.

THE DEATH OF MR. ROBERT DONNELL.

It is with regret deeper than we can express that we have to record the sad death of Mr. Robert Donnell, who was found drowned in the Grand Canal, near Leeson-street Bridge, shortly after seven o'clock on last Monday evening. The deceased gentleman left his residence in Stephen's-green, South, about 1 o'clock that day, and is believed to have been returning, shortly after six o'clock, from visiting some friends in the neighbourhood of Leeson Park, when, in walking along the edge of the canal, the evening being dark, he stumbled and fell in. His watch appeared to have stopped at 6.30. Besides his gold watch, money to the amount of £6 or £7 was found in his pockets, in which he had also some law papers. An inquest was held on Wednesday, when, Dr. Pratt having testified that death was caused by drowning, and that there were no marks of violence on the body, the jury returned an open verdict accordingly.

Mr. Donnell, who was a native of Tyrone, was about 40 years of age, and was called to the Bar in Michaelmas Term, 1864. He joined the North-East Circuit, for which he acted as a Reporter for the IRISH LAW TIMES. He enjoyed a considerable practice both on circuit, in the county courts, and in the superior courts, his advocacy being especially sought in cases involving questions on the land laws, with which he possessed an especial acquaintance. He was the author of an able work on the Land Act of 1870, and compiled a valuable volume of Reports of the decisions under that Act, which reached a second edition, and has frequently been judicially referred to in terms of high approval. Mr. Donnell, who had been a distinguished graduate of the Queen's University, filled the office of Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy in the Queen's College, Galway. He was also a Crown Prosecutor for the County of Louth, and County of the Town of Drogheda. On the appointment of the Commission under the Earl of Besborough he was appointed assistant secretary; and it is stated that but for ill-health he would have been one of the first to be appointed an Assistant Land Commissioner. His kindly and courteous disposition had endeared him to all; while his marked ability as a lawyer would certainly have lent a yet more conspicuous lustre to a career now so lamentably frustrated.

THE SETTLED LAND ACT—VIII.

Improvements (Sects. 25-29).

Sect. 25 contains a list of authorised improvements on which capital money may be spent. But, if the capital money is in the hands of the trustees, tenant for life must not only get their approval, but must have either a certificate of the Land Commissioners or of engineer or surveyor nominated by the trustees and approved by the commissioners that the work is properly executed, or an order of the court (sect. 26). Most settlers will approve of these precautions, but in any case where it is desired to give greater facilities for improvements, the settlement may dispense with the formal certificate of execution, or even with the approval of the trustees, and simply require a statement in writing by tenant for life that he desires to execute certain improvements, and afterwards a like statement that they have been executed.

A wider range of Improvements may be permitted if desired. Thus erecting or making permanent improvements in the mansion-house might be allowed.

The provisions in sect. 28 as to maintenance of improvements and insurance may be compared with those in sects. 72, 74 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864. We shall treat of these sections, and also make reference to the Limited Owners' Residences Acts, in our note on sect. 30.

Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (Sect. 30).

Sect. 30 of the S. L. Act extends the list of improvements under s. 9 of the Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 114), so as to comprise those of sect. 25 of the S. L. Act. Erection of mansion-house and appurtenances, and permanent improvements of the same, are, by virtue of the Limited Owners' Residences Acts (83 & 84 Vict., c. 86; 84 & 85 Vict., c. 84), already included in the improvements which may be effected under the Act of 1864. But they are not included in those authorised by the S. L. Act. Construction of reservoirs for supply of water to the property, &c., is also an improvement within the Act of 1864 by virtue of 40 & 41 Vict., c. 31. Compare sect. 25 (xiii.) (xviii.) of S. L. Act.

By ss. 72-74 of the Act of 1864, improvements are to be upheld, and where necessary fire insurance effected. Inclosure commissioners can compel, or give relief from maintenance of improvements, (ss. 75, 76). Charges have priority over existing incumbrances (s. 59). But as to charges under the Limited Owners' Residences Acts see 85 & 86 Vict., c. 56, s. 9. Limited Owners can, within certain limits, charge the estates with the expenses of building "mansions" as residences for themselves, and for permanent improvements in the same: 83 & 84 Vict., c. 86; 84 & 85 Vict., c. 84. See Chitty's Stat. iii. 1420-1449, and Tudor, L. C. Con. 3rd ed. 86; Seton, 1267; David, ii. 749. It would seem that this section (80) of S. L. A. affects land held by clergy in right of their benefices, and other like corporations (although their land is not "settled," either in the ordinary meaning or within the definition of sect. 2 of S. L. Act), since land so held is included in the Act of 1864 (see ss. 8, 20). The effect of this section is to add certain improvements to the list in the Act of 1864, but the procedure is under that Act. The Settled Land Bill contained (clause 29) a provision enabling tenant for life to expend his own money in improvements and subject to certain safeguards to charge the expenditure on the land. This was omitted during the passage of the Bill. It might sometimes be advisable for a settlor to insert in the settlement a provision somewhat resembling the omitted clause, so as to save the expense of the more cumbersome procedure under the earlier Acts.

Contracts (Sect. 31).

This empowers tenant for life to make contracts for sale, exchange, partition, mortgage, and charge, and to vary and rescind them. Any consideration for such variation or rescission is to be capital money. He may contract to make a lease, and accept surrender of contract, and may vary lease. Nothing is said as to whether the consideration for such surrender or variation is to be capital money. See above.

Contracts are to bind successors and the land. The court may give directions for enforcing, varying, or rescinding contracts. Preliminary contracts for lease shall not form part of the title. This last provision corresponds with the enactment in C. A. Am., s. 4, as to leases under powers generally, but appears to be rather wider.

By sect. 45 a tenant for life intending to make any contract for sale, &c., is to give notice to the trustees and their solicitor. Apparently the bona fide purchaser, without "notice," will get a valid contract, although such notice has not been given (sects. 45) (3), 54, 81, (2); and see C. A. Am., s. 3, as to "notice," and sect. 1 (ii.) of that Act for definition of "purchaser." It would seem that the provisions of sect. 45, as to notice to the trustees, do not apply to certain minor powers. See below on that section. But, although a valid contract is made, yet it would still be in the power of the court to set it aside (sect. 81) (8), and this would apparently be the case although there has been no fraud or misbehaviour on the part of the purchaser. See Seton, 1298. The application may be made by a successor or by a person interested in the contract. Possibly, in some cases, the trustees might apply (sect. 44), but usually their remedy is to object when they receive notice (sect. 45) (1). For mode of application see sect. 46.

Application of Money in Court under any Act (Sect. 32).

Money in court under L. C. C. Acts, the S. E. Act, 1877, or any other Act, and liable to be laid out in purchase of land to be settled, may be invested as allowed by sect. 21, or on improvements under sect. 25, as well as in the modes permitted by the particular Act under which it has been paid in.

This applies to money already in court. This enlarges considerably the range of investment with regard to money paid in under the L. C. C. Act, 1845, ss. 69, 70. As to interim investment under that Act see Alph. Pr. 499; Seton, 1422; and as to permanent investments in land or improvements or discharge of incumbrances, &c., see Alph. Pr. 501; Seton, 1423, 1427.

As to money under Settled Estates Act, see Alph. Pr. 801; Seton, 1508.

Moreover these investments will be, if the tenant for life chooses, permanent during his life (sect. 22) (4); he can thus avoid any purchase of land (sect. 22) (5); though the money will be considered as land (sect. 22) (5). See, however, sect. 63 (2) (iii.) as to settlements by way of trust for sale. This will enable the limited owner to save himself the troubles of landowning and to get a better income. This applies to money already in court as well as to money hereafter paid in. The procedure will be in accordance with the Act under which the money is paid in.

This section will not apply to money, which is in court, representing glebe lands.

Application of Money in the Hands of Trustees (Sect. 33).

This enables tenant for life to require investments, &c. of money in the hands of trustees, and liable to be laid out in purchase of land to be settled as though it were capital money arising under the Act. Seem, trustees cannot safely invest under this section without consent of tenant for life. Compare sect. 22 (2).

Application of Money paid for Lease or Reversion (Sect. 34).

We have already spoken of this in our note on sect. 8. We may here add references to Alph. Pr. 506; Seton, 1426; Browne & Theobald, 191, with regard to sect. 74 of L. C. C. Act 1845.

Compare also sect. 37 of the S. E. Act, 1877, see Alph. Pr. 802. As to renewable leaseholds, see Maddy v. Hale (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 134; 3 Ch. Div. 327); Barber's Settled Estates (18 Ch. Div. 624; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433).

It would seem that the trustees have complete discretion, if exercised bona fide, to "lay out, invest, accumulate, and pay," in accordance with this section. If tenant for life has reason to believe they will exercise their discretion unfairly to him, he should, on the sale, &c., direct the capital money to be paid into court (sect. 22) (1). If he has not done this he can, however, apply to the court under sect. 44.

WESTMINSTER HALL AS A LAW COURT.

The inconvenience and heavy expense which the nomadic system entailed upon suitors was the cause of the first improvement upon the primitive method—a clause in Magna Charta stipulating that "common pleas should not follow the court, but shall be held in some certain place." The "certain place" selected was the Great Hall of Westminster. The Royal Palace of Westminster had been the habitat of the Curia previously to this enactment, but only when the king happened to be in residence there; and on the erection in 1097 of the hall its meetings had been transferred thither from the palace. The reign of Henry III. saw another step in the right direction: the Curia itself becoming stationary in all its branches, a lodging in the hall being assigned to each.

Once settled in its new abode, surrounded by the effigies of its former presidents from Edward the Confessor to Stephen, and presided over by the king in person, or in his absence by his deputy, the Totius Angliæ Justiciarius, the business of the Curia grew rapidly in bulk and importance. A Court of Chivalry, under the presidency of the Lord Constable and Lord Mareschal, and a court for the regulation of the king's domestic servants, the prototype of the more modern Palace Court, were added to those already existing. The Barons of Parliament, with the Lord High Steward at their head, formed a Court of Appeal from the lower tribunals, as well as for the trial of delinquent peers; while the Courts of Chancery, Common Pleas, Exchequer, and King's Bench disposed of the remaining legal business. The last named had its domicile in the south-east angle of the hall, deriving its name from the marble bench, appropriated to the king on coronation days, which served as the seat of justice. Here were heard all the pleas of the Crown. The north-west corner was occupied by the Court of Common Pleas. "In the south-west angle," says Walcott, "sat the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and eleven men learned in the civil law called Masters in Chancery;" and as time went on, and even more numerous Courts became necessary to cope with the requirements of suitors, a station close to the King's Bench was assigned to the new Court of Wards and Liveries, instituted by Henry VIII., adjoining which sat an earlier sub-section known as the Equity Court of Requests or Conscience, "sometimes called the Poor Man's Court, because he could there have right without paying money." It is hardly necessary to remark that no court conducting business on these principles exists under our modern system of judicature.

The Court of Exchequer—taking its name from the parti-coloured cover of the table upon which the king's accounts were reckoned—also had its quarters in Westminster Hall, and as late as 1256 was presided over by the King (Henry III.) in person. In modern times its president, when the court sat in equity, has been the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and here the selection of fit and proper persons to serve the office of sheriffs of the counties was made, and the quaint ceremonials attendant on the presentation of the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex to the court took place—the chopping of faggots and formal counting of horse-shoes and hobnails by the senior alderman, by way of suit and service on the part of the City for certain long-defunct tenements in the county of Salop and the parish of St. Clement Danes.

As a Criminal Court, too, Westminster Hall has been the scene of most of the great State trials in English history. Here, on January 20, 1649, Charles I. met his accusers, and refused to recognise the jurisdiction of his self-constituted judges. Here in 1305, William Wallace was condemned to death on charges of treason, sacrilege, and robbery. Here proud protector Somerset, and his no less overbearing rival the Duke of Northumberland, received their sentences. And in the list of trials in Westminster Hall figure also the names of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex; Guy Fawkes and his fellow-conspirators; Wentworth, Earl of Strafford; the Seven Bishops; the Jacobite lords; Earl Ferrers, for murder; the Duchess of Kingston, for bigamy; Warren Hastings, whose trial dragged its slow length along for seven years; and Lord Melville, whose impeachment is said to have drawn tears from the eyes of his friend and political chief, William Pitt.

The original hall having been ruinous in the reign of Richard II., was re-roofed, if not completely rebuilt, by that monarch in the form which—but for necessary repairs and slight alterations—it now presents. Two curious engravings—one of the exterior, published 1808, the other of the interior, published in 1797—are reproduced in "Old and New London." The former plate shows the north front very much as we see it at the present day, except that its lower part is obscured by a range of poor-looking buildings on each side of the doorway: while the sites of the present Law Courts and Houses of Parliament are occupied by private houses and taverns abutting upon the side-walls of the hall itself. The latter print, called "The First Day of Term," "shows the centre of the hall filled with a motley throng; while on either side are rows of banners (guidons, colours, and standards, ensigns and trophies of victory obtained by the confederates under the command of his Grace the Duke of Marlborough); beneath which, on the east, are rows of bookstalls, and on the west sundry stalls of milliners, with ladies making purchases at the counter. At the further end of the hall, upon the steps, are two large boxes or pews, in which are seated six officials in wigs and gowns, and looking as grave as judges."

Such were the incongruous surroundings of the majesty of the law until the building of the present courts, from the design of Sir John Soane, 1820-25. However great the improvement thus effected may have been, it cannot be denied that few cities could show a less imposing or less beautiful structure than that which has sufficed for the legal wants of our metropolis for the last sixty years; and no one can regret the announcement by Mr. Shaw Lefevre of the intended demolition of the mean-looking buildings which now lean against and hide the western side of "Rufus's Hall"—St. James's Gazette

PERPETUITIES ARISING OUT OF CONTRACTS.

The case of The London and South-Western Railway Company v. Gomm, 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 580, forms an important decision on the law relating to perpetuity. The immediate question was to what (if any) period an option to purchase should be restricted; but the case also involved the discussion of the more general question of remoteness as applied to covenants as to user of land. The company, by deed, in 1865, reciting that they were seized in fee of certain land no longer required for the purposes of their railway, conveyed such surplus land for £100; and the purchaser for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted with the company, their successors and assigns, that he and the owners for the time being of the land, and all other persons who should be interested therein, would at any time thereafter, upon a six months' notice and receiving £100, reconvey the land to the company. In 1879 Gomm, with notice of the covenants, purchased the premises. The company, in 1880, gave notice to Gomm to reconvey; and, upon his refusal to do so, brought an action for specific performance of the covenant. They had by their special Act power in 1865 to purchase land by agreement; and that power was extended to the time when the action was brought. It was urged (1) that Gilbertson v. Richards, 28 Law J. Rep. Exch. 158; 4 H. & N. 277, and The Birmingham Canal Company v. Cartwright, 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 552, in which Mr. Justice Fry upheld a right of pre-emption unlimited in point of time, applied; (2) that a contract to buy or sell land, or covenants restricting the use of land, though unlimited, are not void for perpetuity. Mr. Justice Kay disapproved of the former argument, but acceded to the latter. The Court of Appeal, however, held that the covenant could not be enforced. The Master of the Rolls puts a dilemma which it is difficult to avoid. If, he says, it is a mere personal contract, it cannot be enforced against the assignee [viz., Gomm]. But if it binds the land, it creates an equitable interest in the land. "A person exercising the option has to do two things—he has to give notice of his intention to purchase, and to pay the purchase-money; but as far as the man who is liable to convey is concerned, his estate or interest is taken away from him without his consent; and the right to take it away being vested in another, the covenant giving the option must give that other an interest in the land." Whether such interest is created by devise or voluntary gift or contract can make no difference. "Is there," asks the Master of the Rolls, "any difference in substance between the case of a limitation to A. in fee—with a proviso that, whenever a notice in writing is sent and £100 paid by B. or his heirs to A. or his heirs, the estate shall vest in B. and his heirs—and a contract that, whenever such notice is given and such payment made by B. or his heirs to A. or his heirs, A. shall convey to B. and his heirs?"

The view now held by the Court of Appeal has not always prevailed. In Keppel v. Bailey, 2 M. & K. 527, which does not appear to have been cited in the case under consideration, Lord Brougham seems to have taken a different view. He says: "I do not at all doubt that the enjoyment of property may be tied up and an illegal perpetuity created by annexing conditions to grants, or by executing covenants whereby whoever happens to be in possession shall be restrained from using that which is the subject of the grant or covenant in all but a certain prescribed way, provided always that the restraint so constituted is not reserved in favour of some other party, who may release it at his pleasure; . . . but, if the party for whom the condition is made or the party covenantee has the entire power of dealing with his interest in the subject-matter, it is an obvious mistake to treat this as an instance of perpetuity." And a little further on, he adds: "To take another view: though one of the parties interested, the owner of the property subject to the covenant or condition, may be fast, the other is loose, and so quoad both taken together—that is quoad all interested—the property is free." And he illustrates his meaning by referring to perpetual rents and easements which may be released. This view would seem to accord with that taken by Mr. Justice Fry in The Birmingham Canal Company v. Cartwright, 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 552, where he observes that "the total interest in the land, so to speak, is divided between the covenantor and the covenantee, and they can together at any time alienate the land absolutely." In the case under consideration, the Master of the Rolls observes that The Birmingham Canal Co. v. Cartwright must be treated as overruled. So that the court seems virtually now to adopt as its rule one which is expressed by "Lewis on Perpetuities" (Supplement, page 19), as follows: "The test ordinarily allowed for determining the presence or absence of the danger of perpetuities in respect of future limitations is not their capacity of being alienated, but of being destroyed. Extinction and not co-operation is what the law requires to be attainable in respect of remote future estates before it acknowledges their remoteness to be harmless—i.e., it is presumed the power of extinction by the person who takes subject to the limitation over, and without the co-operation of the person who takes a present right to a future interest under such limitation. Of that, the power of a tenant in tail, whose estate, if not barred, is subject to a subsequent limitation over, to bar his estate together with such limitation, is a familiar instance.

Before passing on to the question of remoteness in reference to covenants of user, two points in the argument in The London and South-Western Railway Company v. Gomm may be noticed. It was urged that, in Liverpool, in leases for 999 years, it is common to give an unlimited option of purchase. Now, is such an option effectual any more in a lease than in other cases? In Lewis, 619, it is observed that: "With respect to rights of entry, reserved upon leases for lives or years" . . . "such a right, in fact, merely confers a power to put an end to the contract, on non-performance by the lessee of the conditions on faith of which it was entered into; and, even as to the rights of re-entry, the commissioners, in the third Ry. Pr. Commissioners' Report, 43, while advocating a definition of the law against perpetuities, so as to include inter alia rights of entry for breach of conditions, think fit to make an express exception as to conditions contained in leases, for re-entry by the lessor for non-payment of rent, or breach of any lawful covenant, and suggest that it must be declared that, with reference to contracts between landlord and tenant, the rule against perpetuities shall not apply to any rent, covenant, or proviso, unless it shall appear by the instrument that such rent, covenant, or proviso was reserved or inserted for the purpose of evading the rule." But does not an option of purchase given to the lessee, and conferring upon him a power of acquiring, without further assent by the lessee or his representatives, an estate of a new character, stand upon a wholly different footing from the ordinary right of re-entry by the lessor; and would it not come within the principle of the dictum of Mr. Justice Ashurst, in Roe v. Galliers, 2 T. R. 140, that if a proviso for determining the term on assignment without leave, or on bankruptcy, "were inserted in very long leases, it would be tying up property for a considerable length of time, and would" (if such time exceeded the permitted limits) "be open to the objection of creating a perpetuity?" It was also urged that renewable leases were not within the objection of perpetuity. In reply it was argued that covenants to renew leases are distinguishable, for they run with the land at law; and, no doubt, there was a distinction between a renewal and the principal case. Sir James Hannen observed that the covenant in the latter did not run with the land—and see Sugden, 597—but the observation of Jessel, M.R., that renewable leaseholds are an "exception to the general rule," may be thought the better answer to the objection. Compare Lewis, 682, and the observation of the commissioners (Ry. Pr. Commissioners' third report, 89, in reference to leases for lives) that, "such leases being ordinarily renewable, settlements of them are, in truth, not settlements of a limited interest." If, according to Moore v. Clench, 1 Chanc. Div. 452, the covenant for renewal creates an equitable estate from the time of its execution, still renewable leaseholds may be a species of property excepted by usage from the restrictions against perpetuity.

With regard to covenants as to user of land, the statement in Davidson, vol. 2, 570 note, 4th edition, to the effect that "covenants to build, repair, or inhere in purchase deeds in equity bind an alienee with notice, seems too wide." In fact, according to Haywood v. The Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society, 51 Law J. Rep. Q. B. 73, covenants, to have an effect in equity, must be restrictive. In that case, C. granted land to E. to the use that E. should pay C. the annual chief rent of £11, and subject thereto (it is presumed) to the use of E. in fee, and E. covenanted to pay the rent half-yearly, and to erect and keep in good repair, and, when necessary, rebuild. C. conveyed the rent to Haywood. E. conveyed the premises to M., who mortgaged the same to the society. Haywood sued the society for not keeping the premises in repair; but his action failed, it being decided (1) following Milnes v. Branch, 5 M. & S. 411, that the covenant did not run with the land; and (2) that the equitable doctrine as to covenants relating to user of land was binding only in the case of restrictive covenants. Lord Justice Cotton observed (p. 409): "The covenant to repair can only be enforced by making the owner put his hand into his pocket; and there is nothing which would justify us in going that length." In the case under discussion the Master of the Rolls approved of the limitation placed in the building society case of Tulk v. Moxhay.

In Ex parte Ralph, 1 De Gex, 219, the form of a power of entry is given, providing for other matters besides mere payment of rent. But the power of re-entry is there restricted to lives in being and twenty-one years from the death of the survivor; and this appears to be the safe course (see 2 Davidson, pp. 511, 520; Lewis's Supplement, 201), especially if anything like a power of re-entry is proposed, as in 1 Prideaux, 335, 11th edition, as distinct from a power of entry quousque. The form proposed in Prideaux authorises re-entry within certain lives or twenty-one years from the death of the survivor of them, "and such further time as may not be contrary to any rule or law for preventing perpetuities;" but the form in Davidson seems preferable. These questions are specially important in those localities where it is the custom to convey freeholds in fee subject to perpetual rent-charge and to perpetual covenants as to user. The ruling in Haywood v. The Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society seems a wholesome limitation as to covenants respecting user. On the other hand, it may be thought inconvenient that a condition for entry, if such condition be in itself unobjectionable, should have to be restricted to lives in being and twenty-one years. In other words, if such a condition may be usefully adopted during such a period, does it cease to be useful immediately upon the expiration of that period? Again, assume that the owner of building land desires to impose conditions as to user, in a long lease—say, for 999 years—to be adopted (with the object of securing the performance of these conditions) rather than a grant in fee, when the builder would probably prefer the latter? Are conditions which may be considered harmless in the former case, hurtful in the latter? Conversely, if they ought to be prohibited beyond certain limits in dealing with the fee, ought they to be allowed in a very long lease?

One suggestion may be added. If perpetual rents, although not obnoxious to the rules against perpetuity, have any tendency to fetter dealings with property, might not some statutory machinery be devised under which they might, like quit-rents (Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 45), be redeemed, and this, too, without prejudicing any legal and proper covenants as to user affecting premises out of which such rents are reserved? Might not, on the other hand, facilities be given in all cases where there is a right of perpetual renewal (for instance, in some of the city leases) for enabling the tenant to convert, for a reasonable compensation, his leasehold interest into a fee simple?—Law Journal.

WIGS AND GOWNS.

Woman, says Addison, quoting from a forgotten Greek pedant, is a creature that delights in decorating itself; and the essayist devotes a whole paper in the Spectator to establishing that in all ages she has taken more pains than man to adorn the outside of the head. The ceremony of yesterday tends a little to modify this exclusive belief. The Lord Chief Justice in his SS collar, the judges in their full-bottomed wigs, the sergeants in their scarlet gowns, and the Queen's Counsel in their silk attire, put in, all of them, such an appearance as showed that they valued decoration generally, and were not quite careless even about the outsides of their heads. Argument and case law lay, no doubt, in tight packed layers within, but outside it the goat-hair and the horse-hair in well-trimmed rows, made the old men look wise, and some of the young men look handsome. But in truth it would be an injustice to the law to ascribe to vanity what is chiefly the legacy of past centuries. It was said that no man ever looked so wise as Lord Thurlow when he had his wig on. But Lord Thurlow put his wig on, not in order to look wise, but because whole generations of chancellors had worn wigs before him. Law is the most conservative of all the professions; innovation and reform have been busy with it, and yet it is still padded round with mysteries, fictions and forms, which the others have long ago rejected. There is a legend yet whispered about and fondly believed in at Westminster that on the 22nd July, 1868, so great was the heat, the judge of the Divorce Court took his seat on the bench without his wig. The following day several young barristers followed this revolutionary precedent, and unless the mercury had fallen the profession would have been jeopardised. The noble independence of the law, and its proud superiority over convenience and common sense, came out in strong contrast on that occasion to the selfishness of another bench. It was Bishop Blomfield, the late Primate's predecessor, who asked the king permission for a bishop to dispense with a wig. The leave was easily given; indeed, according to one version, it was volunteered jocularly. The bishops went over one by one, voted uncovered, preached in their own hair, and have left us nothing but the sketch of Dr. Syntax and the portrait of Bishop Burnett to remind us of the days when law and divinity had goat's hair in common. But even at the bar there are signs of surrender. When the judges were banked up on their platform in the Central Hall yesterday morning their wigs were not uniform. Some were all white, and in others the white was relieved by a circular recess constructed just over their organ of benevolence. Law is the perfection of common sense, and for all legal attire there is an adequate cause. This black patch is the coil, and it shows that the judge who wears it holds the degree of sergeant-at-law. Once it was a skull-cap worn by a knight under a helmet. That was, however, many centuries ago. In more modern times—a little before 1800 A.D.—renegade clergymen used to do barristers' work and take barristers' fees. A canon, it is true, forbade them to act as advocates in secular courts, but even then clergymen were contumacious. They pleaded for their client in the teeth of canonical prohibition, and they used the coil to hide the tonsure. One picturesque old annalist, writing about the year 1400, describes how a certain advocate, who was a sergeant, having been proved guilty of the grossest malversation, was sentenced to death. He pleaded his benefit of clergy, and, untying the threads of his coil, disclosed the tonsure. The plea, however, was no bar to the action of the executioner, and he was hurried off from the judgment-seat to the gallows. For six centuries the sergeants remained in undisturbed possession of that little black patch. They had their own rights and their own law. Queen's counsel were of mushroom growth compared to them; their first silk gown was almost of modern date. Francis Bacon (afterwards Lord Verulam) assumed it some time in the sixteenth century. The sergeants dated with the thirteenth. And for centuries the judges, before they had the honour of being made judges, had the honour of being made sergeants; and so it was they called the sergeants their brethren; and so it was they, too, had the little black patch on the summits of their wigs. But legislation has latterly been very cruel to them. The Judicature Act has extinguished the order, and the forensic wig-maker has sold off all his coils. The old judges created before the year 1873 preserve the old custom, but all subsequent judges have their white hair unspotted when they take their seats upon the bench.

Gowns are of older date than wigs. Indeed, at one time our Bar is said to have worn the toque, not very different from what French advocates carry to the present day, or what Miss Terry had on when she appeared as Balthazar before the Doge. But lawyers always wore robes, and there was formerly more variety, or at least more etiquette, in their adoption. The customs exist but they are not adhered to. The variety in a judge's robes connects his position with its origin. It was a clerical vestment, and the colour of it was prescribed by the Calendar. The red gowns were to be worn on red-letter days, the violet on such occasions as the Church directed, but during a criminal trial the judge always wore red. For the prisoner in the dock, Black Monday was always a red-letter day. Even the sergeants once used to wear scarlet in court. To the generation of young barristers it will have been a surprise to have seen the few of the old order who yet remain robed yesterday in red. But there are many men at the bar who can recollect the sergeants in the old courts attired exactly as they were attired when the Queen opened the new courts. The sergeant, robed in red, was a dignified figure in old legal history. And he had a singular privilege. He had the right to remain with his coil on in the presence of royalty, and needed not to take it off even when in conversation with his king. Old court treatises lay this down, side by side with the singular but well-known rights of Lord Kinsale, and the more singular privilege of the chief of an old Italian family, to ride into church with armour and helmet on. The gowns worn by the Bar have changed little, if at all, in the lapse of centuries. They still illustrate the close connexion between the churchmen and the lawyers, as the white tie worn in the equity courts, and the title of "Master," still preserved by the benchers, and analogous to the Maitre of the French tribunals, bring us back to the period when all learning was in the hands of the clerics. Indeed, the antiquity of the gown may be tested by a legal fiction that has been bound up in its trimming. The barrister had no right to his fee. He could not bargain for it or sue for it. He could scarcely even receive it. The rule was very strict, though a fiction was found to relieve him from its hardship, there hung behind his gown—and it hangs there still—a craftily-constructed pouch with a wide funnel and a narrow orifice. The funnel was wide enough to admit a suitor's hand, and the orifice was narrow enough to retain the suitor's guineas. Modern usage has dispensed with the employment of the purse; but the counsel's clerk still is interposed as a kind of buffer to protect the man of law from direct contact with his client's money, and in a general way to secure the proprieties of the profession.—Full Mail Gazette.

JUDICIAL RENTS IN IRELAND.

A return has been issued showing, according to provinces and counties, the number of cases in which judicial rents have been fixed by Sub-Commissioners between September 18 and October 30, 1882, and also the former rents and judicial rents of the holdings. The total number of cases decided is 1,958. The old rents amounted to £41,909 1s. 3½d., and the judicial rents to £34,161 19s. 7½d. showing an average reduction of 18½ per cent. Of the provinces, Ulster heads the list with 709 cases, the former rents amounting to £14,002 13s. 7d., and the judicial rents to £11,293 10s. 11d. showing an abatement of between 19 and 20 per cent. The smallest number of decisions were given in Leinster, where, also, the reductions were much less considerable than in the other provinces. The number of cases was 323, and the aggregate reduction was from £11,392 17s. 8½d. to £9,749 10s. 7½d.; or a little over 14 per cent. In Connaught 526 rents were fixed, amounting to £4,714 18s. 6d., instead of £5,899 2s. 9d., the total of the previous rental. The reduction was something over 20 per cent. In Munster 400 applications were adjudicated upon, the former rents being £10,614 7s. 7½d., and the judicial rents £8,408 19s. 7d., and the abatement was nearly 21 per cent. The largest reductions took place in the counties of Cork and Clare, in which the judicial rents average 25 per cent lower than the former rents, and the lowest were in Dublin County, in which 42 cases were decided, and in rents amounting to £1,542 aggregate abatements of only £80 were granted.

DEATH OF A DUBLIN SOLICITOR.

The Melbourne Argus of Nov, 8th says:—Mr. Thomas Nolan, of the firm of Nolan and Jordan, of Melbourne, Solicitor, expired at his residence, Albert-park, on Tuesday last, after having being confined to his bed for five months. The deceased gentleman was born in Dublin on Christmas Day, 1806, hence his name—Thomas Christmas Nolan. He was admitted as a Solicitor at the early age of 21 years, and followed his profession in Dublin until 1858, when he came out to this colony, and entered upon a successful practice, first by himself, and afterwards as the senior partner in the firm of Nolan and Jordan. Although he was nearly 77 years old, he was a healthy, cheerful man until within the last year or two. He had a wide circle of friends and acquaintances, and in past years was on terms of close friendship with Messrs. Ireland, Dawson, Aspinall, and other well-known members of the legal profession. The deceased has left a widow, but no children. He had, however, a number of nephews and nieces in the colony, amongst the former being his Honor Judge Nolan.

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.

Mr. William B. Stuart, only son of the late William James Stuart, Solicitor, 5 St. Andrew-street, Dublin, has been admitted a Solicitor of the Court of Judicature.

Mr. Daniel M'Callum, jun., Omagh, has been admitted a Solicitor of the Court of Judicature.

We understand that the Committee of (English) Judges now sitting on the rules of procedure have agreed to rules practically abolishing the present system of pleadings, but providing that such pleadings as are allowed shall be signed by counsel, providing for payment of cash down by parties requiring discovery, and assimilating costs in the Common Law Division to costs in the Chancery Division.—Law Times.

TEXT-BOOK ADDENDA.

[From the Law Journal.]

Cordery on Solicitors, 36.

Law stationers transmitting documents to the Probate Registry in the name of solicitors, and receiving probates and letters of administration, are not acting as proctors, or liable to penalties (Law Society v. Shaw, 51 Law J. Rep. Q.B. 249)—C. A.

Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 388.

A pilot taken on board by the regulations of the Suez Canal Company, is not a compulsory pilot relieving the ship from liability for damage (Guy Mannering, 51 Law J. Rep. P. D. & A.).

Hodges on Railways (6th Edition), 233.

A railway company having the usual powers to take land in their special Act, can purchase, compulsorily, minerals apart from the land, and can so purchase them under lands the surface of which it has already acquired. The company are the proper judges of what is necessary for the purposes of their undertaking (Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Company, 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 805)—C. A.

Hodges on Railways (6th Edition), 331.

A sale by a railway company of land which had been compulsorily taken by them from the plaintiff to another company, for the joint purposes of the two railways, without previously offering it to the plaintiff, was held ultra vires; but the sale was not held proof of the land being superfluous. The plaintiff was held to be the owner of the lands from which the purchased land had been severed, although the purchased land was separated from the rest of his land by a high road (Hobbs v. Midland Railway Company, 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 328).

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letters and communications intended for publication, and addressed to THE EDITOR, 53 Upper Sackville-street, Dublin, must be authenticated by the name of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith.

We throw open the columns of this Journal most willingly for the discussion of subjects of interest to the Profession; but it must be understood that we do not necessarily agree with all the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

JUDGMENTS WITHOUT ADDRESS, &c., OF PARTIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Would you or any member of the legal profession kindly inform me through your Journal whether a judgment is void which merely states the names of the plaintiff and defendant, but does not give the address and description of either?

Yours, &c.,

AN APPRENTICE.

STAMPING RECEIPTS FOR GRAND JURY CESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Would you, or one of your readers, kindly inform me whether a Grand Jury Cess Collector is obliged to stamp every receipt given by him to the occupiers on payment of their cess, when £3 and upwards? It may seem a trivial point at first sight, but as a collector has to give thousands of receipts each year it becomes a matter of importance.

Yours truly,

D. J. H.

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS.

NOTE.—Information intended for publication under the above heading should reach us not later than Friday morning in each week, as publication is otherwise delayed.

Mr. Thomas M'Inerney, of Kiltrush, County Clare, has been appointed Commissioner for taking Affidavits for that district.

Mr. William Leslie has been appointed a Commissioner for taking Oaths at Cahiroiveen, County Kerry.

ADJUDICATIONS IN BANKRUPTCY.

The dates of Adjudications are first given, the Sittings follow in Italics.

O'rry, Philip, of 22 Bridge-street, Cavan, in the county of Cavan, grocer, baker, and boot and shoe manufacturer. December 1; Tuesday, December 19, and Friday, January 12, 1883. Molloy & Molloy, solrs.

Carland, Hugh, of Edymore, Strabane, in the county of Tyrone, farmer. December 8; Friday, January 5, and Tuesday, January 16, 1883. D. & T. Fitzgerald, solrs.

Doyle, John, of 58 Charlemont-street, in the city of Dublin, wine and spirit merchant. December 4; Friday, January 5, and Friday, January 19, 1883. Jehu Mathews, solr.

O'Brien, John, of No. 8, Winstavern-street, in the county of the city of Dublin, baker. December 8; Friday, January 5, and Tuesday, January 16, 1883. William M'Cune, solr.

It was Mike's third appearance in court within thirty days, and in reply to his usual appeal for clemency the magistrate impatiently observed—"Its ne use, Mike, you're good for nothing." "It is not my style to be braggin'," retorted Mike, "but if yer honour will borry a pair of shellalehs and stip outside wid me I'll make it inconvaynent for you to howld that opinion."

A CHARACTERISTIC story is told of the Borderers' exploits, and the dangers which judges encountered. The Earl of Traquair, when engaged in a lawsuit, dreaded the Lord President Durie's opposition. The earl's servant, Will Armstrong, as the judge was riding in the suburbs one afternoon, threw a trooper's cloak over him, and did not slacken his steed till Durie was safely lodged in the tower of the Graemes in Annandale. Will boasted he stole "an auld lurdane aff the bench." It was a bold trick, a bit of Border fair play in a lawsuit, and the Border-side rang with laughter against the kidnapped judge. In good time Will set down the judge at the council doors in Edinburgh—

And there fall loudly shouted he:
"Gie me my guerdon, my sovereign like,
An' take ye back your auld Durie."

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Coughs, Influenza.—The soothing properties of these medicaments render them well worthy of trial in all diseases of the respiratory organs. In common colds and influenza, the Pills, taken internally, and the Ointment rubbed over the chest and throat, are exceedingly efficacious. When influenza is epidemic, this treatment is the earliest, safest, and surest. Holloway's Pills purify the blood, remove all obstacles to its free circulation through the lungs, relieve the over-gorged air tubes, and render respiration free, without reducing the strength, irritating the nerves, or depressing the spirits; such are the ready means of escaping from suffering when afflicted with colds, coughs, bronchitis, and other chest complaints, by which the health of so many is seriously and permanently injured in most countries.

ACCESSIO—[See LITHOGRAPHIC STONES.]

ADMINISTRATION—[And see DEATH.]

1.—The foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate is, that there are assets of the deceased to be distributed within its jurisdiction. Therefore, the Court refused to grant administration to an officer whose domicile was Ireland, but who died in India, and whose only assets were some property in India and a sum of money in the hands of the Secretary of State for War. In the Goods of Roche (7 Jur. N. S. 784) observed on.—In the Goods of Butson (Pro.), 9 L. R. Ir. 21.

2.—A married lady, the absolute owner of property and the donee of a power to appoint a trust fund to the children of her marriage, appointed the fund, by a will of the 11th of January, 1864, in favour of five of the children, among them R. H. B., and made her husband residuary legatee and executor. On the 24th of December, 1873, she made another will disposing of her own property, not referring to her power, and appointing R. H. B. residuary legatee. She died in 1879, and administration c. t. a. was granted to R. H. B. by a District Registry without referring to the will of 1864. The husband died in 1880, without having proved the will of 1864, but having appointed R. H. B. executor, who obtained probate. The Court, on the application of R. H. B., revoked the administration with the will of 1873, and granted him administration with both wills annexed.—In the Goods of Blend (Pro.), 9 L. R. Ir. 53.

3.—The assignees in bankruptcy of an administratrix are not entitled to their costs of an action to administer the assets of the deceased when the administratrix is found indebted to the estate.—James v. Richardson (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 383.

4.—A next-of-kin may bring an action for administration of the intestate's personal estate within a year from the intestate's death.—Wallace v. Wallace (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 511.

5.—County Court jurisdiction; administration suit within year from intestate's death; County Courts Act, 1877, s. 41.—Murdoch v. Murdoch (L. J.), 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 97.

ADMINISTRATION OF ASSETS—[See COSTS—EXONERATION OF REAL ESTATE.]

ADOPTION—[See VOLUNTARY DEED.]

ADVANCEMENT—[See CHARGE ON REAL ESTATE—CONTINGENT GIFT—SATISFACTION.]

AGENT—[See AGREEMENT FOR LEASE.]

AGREEMENT FOR LEASE—The defendant's agent, with full authority, though not in writing, advertised a house and farm to be let. Several proposals were sent in—one by the plaintiff, in writing, offering £1 per acre for such term as might be agreed on. The proposals were laid before the defendants by the agent, who explained to them their nature and effect. The plaintiff's and another were selected, and the agent was authorised to accept either, if satisfied with security for the rent. The agent prepared a draft lease from the defendants to the plaintiff for thirty-one years, which he read to the plaintiff, and wrote on the draft the names of the proposed sureties, which he afterwards inserted in the draft as co-lessees with the plaintiff. The plaintiff afterwards attended at an auction of the furniture and farming-stock, and purchased some of the furniture and a large quantity of manure for the farm. In a suit for specific performance, the defendants denied the agent's authority to conclude the agreement for a letting, or to put the plaintiff in possession, and they pleaded the Statute of Frauds, and that the agent was not authorised in writing, as required by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1860, sec. 4. The Court being of opinion that the agent had full authority:—Held, that the agreement between the agent and the plaintiff being preliminary to the execution of a formal lease, it was not necessary that the former should be authorised in writing to conclude it, and the Court granted specific performance on the terms contained in the draft lease.—McCasland v. Murphy (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 2.

ALIMONY—[See COSTS.]

AMENDMENT—[And see LITHOGRAPHIC STONES.]

Order made in a winding up matter to amend the name of the Company in the petition and orders thereunder, without prejudice to the advertisements and proceedings in the matter.—In re Cork Constitution Company (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 163.

ANNUITY—[See CONTINGENT GIFT—PRIORITY.]

ANTICIPATION—On the appeal by the defendants from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor (7 L. R. Ir. 511), the Court of Appeal being of opinion that, in the absence of the trustee of the deed of the 20th day of October, 1871, it was not competent to decide whether the clause in the said deed contained, restraining the defendant Isabella S. Faussett from anticipation, operated to protect the property secured by the deed of the 7th day of May, 1872, varied the order of the Vice-Chancellor, so far as the same declared that "the sum secured by the deed of the 7th day of May, 1872, is not protected from liability to satisfy the plaintiff's demand by the restraint upon anticipation by the said Isabella S. Faussett, contained in the deed of the 20th day of October, 1871," by omitting the said declaration; and further, by adding, before the direction for inquiries, "together with further interest [etc.] until paid;" and subject to such variation, the order of the Vice-Chancellor was affirmed.—Devitt v. Faussett (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 84.

APPEAL—Service of notice of appeal from an equity civil bill decree upon the respondent (not being a solicitor) through the Notice Office, and without service upon his solicitor is not a sufficient service.—Doyls v. Keenan (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 168.

BANKRUPTCY—[And see ADMINISTRATION.]

J. L., being indebted to the U. Bank, on the 31st of January, 1880, deposited with the bank the title-deeds of certain lands of which he was owner. J. L. was adjudicated bankrupt on the 8th of December, 1880, and on the 15th of February, 1881, the U. Bank filed a charge on foot of their security. There was due to the bank, at the date of filing their charge, the sum of £480 8s. 6d. for principal, together with interest. Subsequently to the filing of the charge, but before the same was heard, the bank filed a proof of debt, and therein valued their security at £150. On the hearing of the charge, an order was made declaring the sum of £150 well charged upon the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and also declaring the bank entitled to their costs. The lands were sold for £225. An application was now made to vary that order, so far as it declared the bank entitled to their costs.—Held, that the bank were entitled to be paid their costs out of the surplus proceeds of the sale remaining after the payment of the amount at which they had valued their security.—In re Love (B.), 6.

C

CHANNEL—[See WATER RIGHTS.]

CHARGE ON REAL ESTATE—1—A testator bequeathed to each of his executors £100, but directed that, if they declined to act, the same should merge in the residue. He bequeathed to his wife and A. J. annuities of £200 and £150 respectively, charged on portions of his real estate, and pecuniary legacies of £200 and £150 respectively over and above the annuities. He gave to his younger children legacies with interest thereon till paid off, and appointed C. their guardian, whom he directed to receive, and apply for their maintenance, education, and advancement, as C. should think expedient, the income of the legacies during their minority; and he empowered C. to raise by charge or mortgage of his real estate a portion of the legacies not exceeding £800 for the advancement of any younger child. He created a trust term in certain of his lands, to secure the annuities, and directed that the term should cease when the trusts thereof were satisfied; and he devised the lands subject to the term and all other his real and leasehold estate, and the residue (if any) of his personal estate to his eldest son. The testator's will also contained a clause that, in the event of any of the younger sons becoming entitled to the testator's real estate, the legacies, both original and accruing, bequeathed to him or them should be divided amongst the other younger children. By a codicil the testator bequeathed to his eldest son a pecuniary legacy over and above the bequests made to him in the will, and charged upon the whole of the testator's freehold and personal estate, in priority to the annuities bequeathed by the will.—Held, that the legacies to the testator's younger children were not charged on his real estate.—James v. Jones (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 489.

2—Where a testator by his will directed the rents of his real estate till sale, and after sale the interest of the proceeds, to be applied in payment of such or so much of the legacies "hereinafter bequeathed" as his personal estate would be insufficient to pay, and by his will bequeathed a number of pecuniary legacies, and by a codicil of subsequent date gave some other legacies:—Held, that the word "hereinafter" confined the charge to the legacies given by the will.—Gilluly v. Plunkett (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 324.

CHARITABLE BEQUEST—[And see MONASTIC ORDER—SECRET TRUST.]

1—A testatrix bequeathed to the Representative Church Body £1,000, £500 thereof for the parish church of L., and £500 for the B. Chapel, upon trust to invest same as they should think best, and to pay the annual income of the last-mentioned £500 to the chaplain of the B. Chapel at the time of her decease during his life, and to his successors in said chaplaincy. By a subsequent codicil the testatrix made the following bequest:—"I bequeath to my dear friend the Rev. B. G., chaplain of the B. Hospital, the sum of £300 for his own personal use, and over and above and independent of the bequest made by a former codicil in favour of the chaplain of the said Hospital." At the dates of these codicils and at the death of the testatrix, the Rev. B. G. was chaplain to the B. Chapel, attached to the B. Hospital, but he shortly afterwards resigned his chaplaincy:—Held, that the £500 legacy for the B. Chapel was intended by the testatrix as an endowment for the chapel, and not as a gift for the personal benefit of the clergyman who filled the office of chaplain at her death; and that, therefore, the income of that legacy was payable to the Rev. B. G. so long only as he continued in the office of chaplain, and ceased to be payable to him upon his resignation.—Gibson v. The Representative Church Body (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 1.

2—D., by his will made in 1876, devised—in the event, which happened, of his dying without leaving issue—his freehold lands, except a portion then in the tenancy of his brother C., and as to the excepted portion, after the death of C. without leaving issue, "to the use of the Most Rev. William Delany, Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork, or other the Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork for the time being, in trust for the Sisters of Mercy at Bantry." The testator then left the residue of his property to his executors and trustees upon trust (among other charitable bequests) to pay "to the Most Rev. William Delany, Bishop of Cork, or other the Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork for the time being, . . . £1,000, which I direct forthwith to be applied by him for the benefit of the Convent of Mercy at Bantry, in the County of Cork, the good Sisters of which are requested to apply the same in and to such charitable purposes as they deem most useful." By a codicil the testator further bequeathed "to the priest who shall be the Abbot of Mount Mallery Monastery, in the county of Waterford, at the time of my death, the sum of £50." D. died in 1879, and it was proved that at the time of his death the Sisters of Mercy at Bantry numbered about ten or twelve, and that the objects of the sisterhood were essentially charitable:—Held, by Ormsby, J., and by the Court of Appeal, that the trust of the lands in favour of the Sisters was valid, as one simply for the individual ladies who at the testator's death filled the character of Sisters of Mercy at Bantry. Per Law. C.—"The words 'for the time being' were, though perhaps inaccurately, used by the testator as pointing merely to the time of his death; but even if these words involved the creation of a perpetuity the gift could be upheld as charitable, on the authority of Cocks v. Manners (L. R. 12 Eq. 574), inasmuch as, though no charitable purpose was stated in connexion with the devise, it was a gift to a voluntary society existing for charitable purposes.—In re Delany's Estate (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 238.

CODICIL—[See CHARGE ON REAL ESTATE—REVOCATION OF WILL.]

COLLECTOR-GENERAL—[See EXECUTOR.]

COLLISION—The XIVth Article of the "Sailing Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea" (issued in August, 1879, under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, and which came into force on the 1st September, 1880), provides (inter alia): (a) A ship which is running free shall keep out of the way of a ship which is close-hauled. (c) When both are running free, with the wind on different sides, the ship which has the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the other. (e) A ship which has the wind aft shall keep out of the way of the other ship. A collision took place in January, 1881, between two sailing vessels, the P. and the S., which were crossing. The Court having come to the conclusion, upon conflicting evidence, that the S., though not strictly "close-hauled," was not "running," and that she was "free" at most two points, the wind being at farthest on her beam, while the wind was at most on the quarter of the P., almost certainly not more than three points from her course, and in all probability very nearly "aft":—Held (affirming the decision of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty), that the B. was "close-hauled," and that the P. had the "wind aft," both within the meaning of the Article, and that the P. was, therefore, bound to have kept out of the way of the S., and was solely to blame for the collision. If the wind be at any less angle than forty-five degrees with the line of a vessel's keel, it is a wind "aft" within the Article.—The Privateer (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 105.

COLONIAL COURT—[See PROBATE.]

COMPANY—[And see AMENDMENT—CONTRIBUTORY—MISREPRESENTATION—RAILWAY COMPANY.]

A company was formed with a nominal capital of £150,000, divided into fifteen thousand shares of £10 each, of which £5 per share was, according to the articles of association, to be paid on allotment, and the balance at such time as the directors should think fit. Article 72 authorised the Board to receive from any member, willing to advance it, all or part of the money due upon the shares held by him beyond the sums called, and to pay interest on the money so paid in advance at such rate as should be agreed on. All the capital was subscribed for, and £5 per share paid thereon. Five thousand shares were allotted to M., and £5 per share duly paid by him on allotment. M. paid in advance the further sum of £5 on each of his five thousand shares, under an agreement with the board that the sum so advanced should carry interest at £5 per cent. until the whole of the capital of the Company should be called up. No further call had been made on the shareholders beyond the £5 per share paid on allotment. No profits had been made by the Company in a certain year, and a year's interest was due upon the sum advanced by M., to enforce payment of which the action was brought:—Held, that M. was entitled to recover from the Company the interest due, as a debt payable out of the general assets of the Company, including its available capital, and not merely out of profits. In re National Funds Assurance Company (10 Ch. Div. 115) commented on and distinguished.—Date v. Maritz (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 498.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE—[See COSTS.]

CONDITIONAL CONTRACT—[See VENDOR AND PURCHASER.]

CONDITIONS OF SALE—[See VENDOR AND PURCHASER.]

CONSIDERATION—[See MISREPRESENTATION—VOLUNTARY DEED.]

CONTINGENT GIFT—A testator devised and bequeathed certain freehold and leasehold property upon trust inter alia to pay two annuities to J. A., to whom he also bequeathed a legacy of £1,000, payable out of his personal estate; and by a subsequent clause in his will, the testator directed that the bequests by annuity and legacy for J. A. should not become payable or vest in him until he should have attained the age of twenty-five years; nor then, unless he should have conducted himself to the satisfaction of the trustees of the will, who were empowered in the meantime to pay and advance such part of the provision so made for J. A., either out of the annuities or principal of the legacy, for his maintenance, education, and advancement, as they might think fit; and the testator directed that J. A. should be brought up a Protestant; and that in the event of misconduct on his part, or of his not continuing a Protestant, the annuities and legacy, or such portion thereof as should remain undisposed of and unappropriated, and save such portion thereof as should be necessary for his actual support, should go over upon certain charitable trusts therein mentioned. The testator also directed that J. A. should not have any power to dispose of or incumber said bequests or legacies until he should have attained twenty-five, and have become otherwise entitled to them as aforesaid. J. A. survived the testator, and attained twenty-one, but died under twenty-five years of age.—Held, upon the construction of the will, that the word "vest" must be interpreted in its primary meaning, and could not be construed as referring merely to the time of payment; and that the gifts of the legacy and of the annuities, even so far as they were payable out of personal estate, were contingent on J. A.'s attaining twenty-five.—Creech v. Wilson (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 216.

CONTRACT—[See AGREEMENT FOR LEASE—LITHOGRAPHIC STONES—MISREPRESENTATION—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—VENDOR AND PURCHASER—VOLUNTARY DEED.]

CONTRIBUTORY—S., B., and O. signed the memorandum of association of a projected company, by which they agreed to take one share each. They also signed the articles of association, which provided that they and certain others should be the first directors of the company; that the qualification of a director should be the holding of twenty-five shares; and that the office of director should be vacated, if at any time an existing director should cease to hold twenty-five shares. They were described as directors in the published prospectus; took part in carrying on the business and trading of the concern; acted as directors; and attended the meetings of the board until the company was wound up.—Held, that the qualification clause was not limited to future directors, that it applied to S., B., and O., and that they were liable to be put on the list of contributories for twenty-five shares each.—In re Billion Hotel Company; Slack, Byrne, and Owen's Case (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 338.

CONVERSION—1.—In a mortgagee's suit, instituted in the late Court of Equity Exchequer, for foreclosure and sale, against R. L., the owner in fee of the mortgaged lands, a decree was made that, in default of payment within the usual time, the mortgaged lands, or a competent part thereof, should be sold, and that out of the proceeds of the sale the plaintiff's mortgage, and certain other incumbrances, should be paid off, and the remainder (if any) should be paid to R. L.; and that if any part of the mortgaged lands should remain unsold, the same should be reconveyed to R. L. More than a competent part of the lands were sold, and a surplus remained after payment of the plaintiff in that suit and the other incumbrances. R. L. made two applications to the Court as to the investment of this surplus fund; and the second of these applications, which was to have the fund invested in Government Stock, was granted, and the fund so invested. No further proceeding was ever taken as to the fund until the present action, and the dividends on the Stock had been from time to time lodged by the Accountant-General to the credit of the Equity Exchequer suit. R. L. was long since dead. An action having been brought by R. L.'s administrator de bonis non for administration, and claiming the fund in Court as his personal estate as against the heir-at-law of R. L.—Held, that the capital of the fund was to be deemed a portion of the real estate of R. L., and to have descended as such to his heir-at-law.—Scott v. Scott (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 367.

2.—By marriage settlement, a sum of money was vested in trustees upon trust to lay out the same in the purchase of real estate, to be held upon certain trusts, under which, in the events which happened, A., as only son of the marriage, became absolutely entitled. There was one son only issue of the marriage, who was found a lunatic by inquisition, and died intestate and unmarried. The money had not been laid out in the purchase of real estate, but was invested on a mortgage; and pursuant to an order in the lunacy matter, expressing that it was for the benefit of the lunatic that the mortgaged debt should be called in, the fund was transferred by the representatives of the mortgagor (who was also the surviving trustee of the settlement) into Court to the credit of the lunacy matter, together with other moneys admittedly personalty, and remained to the same credit unsegregated until the death of the lunatic.—Held, that the fund was to be treated as personal estate of the lunatic, and that upon his death it passed to his personal representative.—M'Donogh v. Nolan (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 262.

COSTS—[And see ADMINISTRATION—BANKRUPTCY—SOLICITOR'S LIEN—VENDOR AND PURCHASER.]

1.—Though the Probate Division has jurisdiction to award the payment of the costs of litigation in that Division out of the personal estate of the deceased, the Chancery Division has jurisdiction in the administration of assets to regulate the order and priority in which such costs are to be paid. When a contest for priority arose between pecuniary legatees and parties who had been awarded by a judgment of the Probate Division costs of contentious proceedings to be paid out of the assets, upon the personal estate proving insufficient for the discharge of both costs and legacies.—Held, that the costs awarded by the Probate Division should be paid in priority to the legacies. Semble, the claims of creditors would not be postponed to costs of contentious litigation between legatees or next-of-kin.—Allooly v. Plunkett (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 334; 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 287.

2.—Order for taxation and payment by the respondent of costs already incurred in a pending suit by a wife for divorce a mensa et thoro, and that the future costs of the petitioner be referred for taxation de die in diem, and that the taxing master do ascertain and report what is a sufficient sum to be paid into Court by the respondent, or what is a sufficient security to cover the petitioner's costs incidental to the trial.—M'Dowell v. M'Dowell (Mat.), 9 L. R. Ir. 347.

3.—Three distinct parts of an estate, belonging to the same person as tenant for life, were taken by three several railway companies, under their compulsory powers. The purchase-money payable by each company was paid into Court, and petitions being presented for investment, one of these became attached to the Rolls and the other two to the Vice-Chancellor's Court. Two of the companies were afterwards amalgamated. Three motions for payment in discharge of an incumbrance were served on behalf of the tenant for life in the three matters, and the matter attached to the Rolls Court having been transferred to the Vice-Chancellor.—Held, that only the costs of two motions should be allowed. Held, also, that the costs should be borne by the subsisting companies moietywise.—*In re The Midland Great Western Railway (Ireland) Company; Ex parte Lord Dillon. An unstamped deed conveying a house of the grantor upon trust to apply the profit-rent to the payment of two life annuities remained in his possession until his death. It was signed and sealed by him; and the attestation clause stated that it was signed, sealed, and delivered by him in the presence of two witnesses, one of whom said that he remembered witnessing the deed, that the grantor after signing put it into his pocket, not delivering it to anyone; but he could not recollect whether the grantor said that he signed, sealed, and delivered, or used any words on the occasion. Subsequently the grantor conveyed the same house by a deed duly executed and stamped, upon trusts inconsistent with the former deed; and by his will made the next day he devised the house, "subject to two life annuities charged thereon by me." By a codicil he made another provision for one of the annuitants.—Held, that there was sufficient evidence of the delivery of the first deed, and that it prevailed over the second.—Evans v. Grey (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 539.

EXECUTION OF WILL—A testator, in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, affixed a seal stamped with his initials to his will, which was entirely written by himself, placed his finger on the seal, and said, "This is my hand and seal"—Held, that the will was sufficiently signed by him.—In the Goods of Emerson (Pro.), 9 Ir. L. R. 443.

EXECUTOR—[And see ADMINISTRATION.]

1.—The appointment of an executor vests in him all the personal estate of the testator; and if any part (after payment of the funeral expenses and debts) remain undisposed of by the will, it vests in the executor beneficially, if there be not any next-of-kin of the deceased; but wherever it sufficiently appears on the face of the will that the testator did not intend the executors to take the surplus, they are deemed trustees for those on whom the law would cast the surplus in case of a complete intestacy; and this is so, whether the executors are expressly called executors in trust, or any other expressions occur showing the office only to be intended for them and not the beneficial interest. A testator, after giving a number of pecuniary legacies, some of which involved the performance of active trusts on the part of his "executors," appointed A. B. and C. "executors and trustees of this my will." The will contained a clause providing for abatement of the legacies in case of a deficiency, and no residuary gift; but on the testator's death there was a considerable surplus.—Held (by Sullivan, M.R., and by the Court of Appeal, affirming his decision), that the executors were not beneficially entitled to the undisposed of residue. Observations of Malins, V.C., in Rosse v. Chalk (49 L. J., N. S., Ch. 625) upon Braddon v. Farrand (1 Rnm. 87), commented on.—Dillon v. Reilly (App.), 9 L. E. R. 78.

2.—The executrix of a deceased person granted to the Collector-General of Rates in Dublin a mortgage of the property of the deceased to secure a sum due for municipal rates, which had partly accrued in the lifetime of the deceased and partly after his death, in respect of property held by the executrix, and for which she was rated in her representative capacity.—Held, that the mortgage was properly granted by the executrix for the purposes of administration, and was therefore effective as a charge upon the assets. Held, also, that the Collector-General has power to take a mortgage for municipal rates, and that such security at least as against the mortgagor, is valid and enforceable.—Douglas v. Douglas (Ch.), 9 L. E. R. 548.

EXONERATION OF REAL ESTATE—A testator devised and bequeathed all his property to trustees upon trust in the first instance, to pay off a mortgage debt affecting certain lands which he had inherited from the mortgagor; and also all other his—the testator's—debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and then to convey certain premises, including portion of the mortgaged lands, to one J. M., in consideration of a specified sum of money and a perpetual rentcharge. He gave directions to his trustees as to the leasing of the remaining portions of the mortgaged lands. The will contained a residuary gift.—Held, that the testator had adopted the mortgage debt as his own, and that the will disclosed an intention that the debt should be satisfied out of the testator's personal estate, in exoneration of the mortgaged lands.—Reynolds v. McGloughlin (Ch.), 9 L. E. R. 406.

J. shall make over one-third of such interest in said S. Hotel to my said sons C. and E., for their own sole and separate use and benefit." He bequeathed another hotel to two other sons, "in equal shares and proportions, share and share alike." E. died a minor. In an action by E.'s administrator, claiming his share in the S. Hotel.—Held, that on E.'s death under twenty-one, the testator's widow and C. became entitled to E.'s share by survivorship.—Jury v. Jury (Ch.), 9 L. E. R. 307.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—[See AGREEMENT FOR LEASE.]

LEGACY—[See CHARGE ON REAL ESTATE—CONTINGENT GIFT—PRIORITY—RESIDUE.]

LITHOGRAPHIC STONES—F. commenced an action against the firm of W. & Co., to recover from them lithographic stones, which the firm claimed to be their property. Before the issue of the writ, F. had assigned his property in the stones to J.W., and the suit was subsequently by leave of the Court, amended by making J.W. a co-plaintiff.—Held, by Sir E. Sullivan, M.R., that F. was properly retained as a plaintiff. F. employed W. & Co., lithographers and engravers, to print and publish coloured drawing-books. Their contract (a verbal one) was that F. should pay the artist employed to prepare the drawings; that the firm should reproduce them in the drawing-books in whatever way and by whatever process the firm might consider best or most suitable, according to the nature of the several drawings or otherwise, whether by means of copper or zinc plates, or lithographic stones, or otherwise; and that F. should pay the firm their necessary and proper charges, according to the work done, so as to cover all their outlay and expenditure for skilled labour or otherwise, in reproducing the drawings either upon metal, stone, or wood, as they might decide; and their fair and reasonable profits as engravers or lithographers, for their knowledge, skill and attention in so doing. Nothing was stated expressly, either as to payment for the lithographic stones by means of which the drawings were to be reproduced, or as to the right or property in such materials; but it was understood that the arrangement was to be on the same terms as those existing at the time with reference to writing copy-books, which F. had employed the firm to publish, under which the plates and other originals connected with the writing copy-books were admittedly F.'s property. The firm reproduced the drawing-books from drawings furnished and paid for by F., by the process of chromo-lithography, the first step in which is to transfer the drawings to "mother" stones, which of themselves, apart from the artistic work put upon them, were of little value, and from which the drawings were again transferred to working stones, which latter were used in the direct production of the chromo-lithographs in the drawing-books. The firm, in their invoices and accounts, charged and were paid by F. the cost of the materials used and skilled work in preparing the drawing-books, but not for the cost of the mother stones, apart from the artistic work. Held (by Sir E. Sullivan, M.R.), that the original, or "mother," lithographic stones were the property of the plaintiff, and the Court ordered the firm to deliver them up to the plaintiffs, they having offered, and consenting to pay, the actual value of the stones, apart from the artistic work upon them. Held, on appeal (affirming, with a variation, the judgment below), that J. W. was entitled to the substantial relief granted, but that it should be awarded to him alone, and the consequential directions modified accordingly. Per Law, C.:—Scoble, the order giving leave to amend should not, under the circumstances, have been made. Foster v. Ward (App.), 9 L. E. R. 468.

LOCKE KING'S ACT—A testator directed that, after payment of an annuity of £50 a year to his nephew, the rents of his Dublin property (which, upon the construction of the will, was held to mean the testator's chattels real in Dublin) should be applied in providing a fund for the payment of all charges affecting his Dublin property at his decease, and that if the fund so provided should be insufficient for the purpose, his said Dublin property should be charged with the payment of the balance of such charges. Two mortgages had been granted by the testator, one of which included fee-simple property and chattels real of the testator at Dublin, and personal estate, part of which was specifically bequeathed; the second affected the same property, except premises at Wood-quay (being part of the Dublin fee-simple property):—Held, that the Dublin chattel property was constituted by the will a primary fund for the payment of the mortgages, to that extent excluding the operation of Locke King's Act; but that after its exhaustion the deficiency should be apportioned among the remaining subjects of the mortgage.—Corballis v. Corballis (Ch.), 9 L. E. R. 306.

MAINTENANCE—[See CONTINGENT GIFT.]

MISREPRESENTATION—J., being the owner of mills in Cork, subject to a mortgage for £3,000, and indebted to a bank in £3,000, with the view of forming a company to purchase and carry on the business of the mills, contracted with S. and another, merchants of influence and position, to allow their names to be put forward as directors in consideration of one hundred and fifty paid-up £5 shares of the company to S. and one hundred to the other. A deed was executed between trustees for the bank (who had agreed to purchase the mortgage), J., and S. and C. as trustees for the projected company, whereby the trustees for the bank agreed to sell and convey the mill premises to the company when formed, for £3,000, to be paid by debentures of the Company; and that J., on the formation of the company, should assign to it all his stock-in-trade, books, debts, &c., and all his interest in the mill premises, in consideration of two thousand five hundred paid-up shares of £5 each. The company was formed, and J. and S. were two of the directors; and the articles of association declared the above agreement binding on the company, and directed the allotment of two thousand five hundred paid-up shares to J. for the purchase of the good-will and stock-in-trade. The prospectus stated that the company had acquired "the very valuable concern"—viz., the mill premises, good-will, &c., describing them, "on exceptionally favourable terms—viz., for the small sum of £3,000, payable in debentures, &c., and one thousand paid-up shares, in addition to which the vendor will purchase fifteen hundred shares fully paid up, thus putting a cash capital of £7,500 into the concern." The company was wound up, and the plaintiff, a shareholder, sued J. and S. for damages to him for a false representation in the prospectus as to the capital of the company, and the suppression of the contract between J. and S. under which S. became a director. Upon the trial of issues of fact before a jury, they found that there was a contract between J. and S. that the one hundred and fifty shares were to be paid out of the shares of J., and that the plaintiff had no notice of the contract.—Held (1st), that the statement in the prospectus as to the capital of the company was false and fraudulent, and that J. and S. were answerable to the plaintiff for it; (2nd), following SulHoss v. Micalif (5 C. P. Div. 458), that the contract was within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and the suppression of it from the prospectus fraudulent under that section; (3rd), that J. and S. should pay the plaintiff the sum paid by him for his shares. On appeal, Law, C., Deasy and FitzGibbon, L.J.J., affirmed the decree of the Master of the Rolls, on the ground of the actual misrepresentation and suppression in the prospectus, but without giving any opinion upon the construction of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867.—Jury v. Stoker (App.), 9 L. E. R. 404.

MONASTIC ORDER—The prohibition of monastic bodies in the Roman Catholic Relief Act applies to such bodies as settled in the realm after the passing of the Act as well as to those who were then residing in it:—Held, therefore, that a trust for the benefit of a church belonging to the V. Order, who came to Ireland in 1838, having left it in 1890, and who are bound by religious or monastic vows, is void.—Liston v. Keegan (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 581.

The county court judge decided that the ejectment decree was conclusive evidence, as against the defendant, of the plaintiff's title to an undivided moiety of the lands, and refused to allow the defendant to dispute such title, and made a decree for partition:—Held, upon appeal, that the decision of the county court judge was right.—Doyle v. Keenan (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 168.

1—A testator devised a farm, with all the stock, &c., share and share alike, to his son and his daughter; and after some bequests to them, he declared that the bequests to his daughter should be for her own sole and separate use, to be held by her for her life, with a power of appointing same amongst her children:—Held, that the power to the daughter was coupled with a trust for her children, and that she took only a life interest in a moiety of the property.—Healy v. Donnelly (3 Ir. C. L. R. 218) considered and distinguished.—Aherns v. Aherns (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 144.

2—W. and G. (two brothers) being absolutely entitled in certain events (which happened), as tenants in common, to leasehold houses, by deed, made in 1840, assigned the premises to S. upon trust for M. for life; and after the death of M. to the use of S.; and after the death of S. in trust for the children of W. and G. "respectively," in such shares and proportions as they, or either of them, should appoint; and in default of such appointment, then to and amongst the said children equally and share alike. W., by will, purported to appoint all the premises to his then only child W. F., and died in 1869, without leaving any other child surviving. G. died, leaving several children, and without making any appointment; and M. and S. having also died:—Held (affirming the decision of Chatterton, V.C.), that the children of both brothers, living at the date of the deed of 1840, and subsequently born, were the objects of the non-exclusive power, and also the objects to take in default of appointment; and that there having been only an exclusive exercise of the power, such children became entitled, and that they took per capita.—Fletcher v. Fletcher (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 301.

PRACTICE—[See specific headings.]

PRIORITY—[And see COSTS—REGISTRY ACTS.]

A testatrix, bequeathing legacies and annuities, by her will directed that the first year's rent of certain lands, and, if necessary, the second half-year's rent accruing next after her decease, should be applied in payment of so much of her debts and funeral expenses and of her legacies as her personal estate should be insufficient to pay. She then gave certain annuities, but not to commence till all (i.e., debts and legacies) should be paid. By a codicil, giving certain other annuities and legacies and devising the lands subject to the annuities, the testatrix directed that all her legacies should be paid out of the rents before any of the annuities should become due, except two annuities to A. and B., which were to become payable immediately after her decease. The lands having been sold, and their proceeds proving insufficient to pay the debts, legacies, and annuities in full:—Held—1st. That the direction in the codicil as to the annuities to A. and B. did not alter the priority of the several annuities inter se, but only the time at which these two annuities were to commence; and that, upon payment of the legacies, all the annuities, including those to A. and B., became payable in equal priority, and should therefore abate rateably. 2ndly. That the annuities other than those given to A. and B., commenced from the time at which the legacies ought to have been paid, as distinguished from the time of their actual payment.—Fagham v. Daly (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 484.

PROBATE—[And see ADMINISTRATION—EXECUTION OF WILL.]

A will made in Queensland, and attested by witnesses resident there, was proved and lodged in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, at Sydney. The executor having applied for probate in Ireland, upon the evidence of one of the attesting witnesses of its due execution (to whom a copy only of the will had been exhibited), and upon an affidavit of a solicitor and officer of the Court at Sydney that they had inspected the will there, and had set out a true copy of it in the affidavit, and proving the handwriting of the signatures of the testator and attesting witnesses, there being no suspicious circumstances attached to the will:—Held, by Warren, J. and by the Court of Appeal, that probate should be granted; it being assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that Queensland was outside the jurisdiction of the Courts of New South Wales. Held also, that when attesting witnesses are out of the jurisdiction, a will may be proved by evidence of their handwriting, albeit the will might possibly have been sent to the witnesses.—Wilson v. Collum (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 154.

RECITALS—A testator, after reciting that he was possessed of property in D. for the residue of term of years, bequeathed "his said D. property." He was entitled to freeholds as well as leaseholds in D.:—Held, that the leaseholds only passed under this gift. The testator, after reciting that he was entitled to a sum standing in the Court of Chancery, to the credit of a certain cause, subject to the life estate therein of E. T. C., bequeathed all his interest in the said sum upon certain trusts. He was entitled to an expectant interest in a sum of £3,000 stock, standing to the credit of the cause, and retained to answer an annuity of £105 to E. T. C. for life. The residue of the funds to the credit of the cause, including other sums to which the testator was entitled, were liable to make up any deficiency of the £3,000 stock in payment of the annuity; but E. T. C. was not otherwise interested therein:—Held, that the testator's interest in the £3,000 alone passed under the above bequest, and that the gift did not extend to the other moneys to the credit of the cause.—Corballis v. Corballis (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 309.

"RESIDUE"—The testator, after reciting that he was entitled to a policy of insurance on his life for £2,000, bequeathed £400, part thereof, to E.; £100 and £100, other parts thereof, to two other legatees; and he left "the residue" to J. H. C. At the time of the testator's death, considerable sums by way of bonus were added to the policy:—Held, that the gift of the "residue" of the moneys, payable on foot of the insurance, was residuary and not specific, and that J. H. C. took the entire residue of the proceeds of the policy, including the bonuses, but subject to any liabilities for the satisfaction of which the policy was liable to be resorted to, and that such liabilities were to be borne primarily by the legatees of such residue, in exoneration of the specific legatees of the insurance.—*Corballis v. REVIVAL—[See REVOCATION OF WILL.]

REVOCATION OF WILL—The testator made a will on the 13th of March, 1876, and a second will on the 29th of April, 1876, by which he revoked the former will, and made some changes in the disposition of his property; and a codicil dated the 9th of June, 1880, commencing thus:—"I make and publish this codicil to my will, dated 13th March, 1876. I cancel the gift of £400 willed to my son W. J., having paid him that amount since I made said will."—Held, that the codicil revived the first will, and that the three documents should be admitted to probate.—In the Goods of Edge (Pro.), 9 L. SAILING REGULATIONS, 1879—[See COLLISION.]

SALE—[See CONVERSION—VENDOR AND PURCHASER.]

SATISFACTION—By a marriage settlement of 1832 real and personal estate of H., the intended wife, was conveyed to trustees in trust for E., the intended husband, for life, and after the death of the survivor of E. and H., in trust for the children of the marriage, as R. and H. or the survivor should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children equally. The trustees allowed R. to obtain possession of the trust fund, which he mixed with moneys of his own, and in 1861 one of the trustees commenced a suit to compel him to replace the fund. By arrangement of the trustees with R., he and H., by deed of the 25th September, 1861, irrevocably appointed the fund equally among the children, four of whom were of age, and one (the plaintiff) a minor. On the following day the four adult children, and two years afterwards the plaintiff, when of age executed a deed releasing the trustees from the trusts of the settlement. The children executed the release by the direction of their father, without any professional advice or assistance and in ignorance of its contents or effect, and of their rights under the settlement. R. from time to time paid sums of money for the plaintiff. He purchased for the plaintiff a commission in the army, paid for his outfit, &c., made him an adequate yearly allowance, and paid a large sum for his promotion. No one of the sums so advanced was equal in amount to the plaintiff's share of the trust fund, nor was there any evidence that it was stated at the time of the advances, or understood between the plaintiff and R., that they were made out of the trust fund in R.'s hands.—Held, by Sullivan, M.R., and by the Court of Appeal:—1st. That the release should be set aside. 2nd. That R.'s position was that of a debtor to his five children for their respective shares of the trust fund. 3rd. That the sums advanced, being respectively less in amount than the plaintiff's share, were not a satisfaction of it pro tanto, and that R. was not entitled to credit for them.—Roode v. Roode (App.) 9 L. R. 437.

SEA-SHORE—A patent of King James I. granted the site and precinct of the ancient monastery or priory of H., and certain denominations of land, partly adjoining the sea-shore, and belonging to the priory, including the harbour of S., with its anchorage dues, and four adjacent islands; "and also the customs of the tenants and farmers of all the towns and villages above said, who are accustomed to pay to the lord or tenant of the priory aforesaid the divers plough days [ &c. ]; and the said tenant or farmer of the priory aforesaid was accustomed to take to his own proper use the wreck of the sea, flotsam and jetsam, wafle and strays." The patent contained general words of grant, including wastes, waters, fisheries, fishings, wreck of the sea, and hereditaments whatsoever within the priory, monastery, manors, &c., granted or appertaining or belonging thereto, but there was no express grant of the litus maris. The plaintiff, who derived under the patent, alleged that from its date he predecessors in title and himself had exercised exclusive dominion over the fore-shore forming the eastern boundary of the manor, and over the rocks, sand, and seaweed thereon. It was, however, proved that various persons had for many years taken seaweed, sand and gravel, and quarried stones, from the sea-shore, but that such acts were not referable to any alleged ownership of the soil, and that there had been no serious interruption to the plaintiff's right until 1869, when it appeared that, in the name of his tenant on one of the four islands he brought an action for trespass on the foreshore thereof, and trover for seaweed taken therefrom, and obtained a verdict. In 1875 the plaintiff filed a bill against the Attorney-General and a number of local defendants, praying for an injunction to restrain trespass and the taking of seaweed from the foreshore of the mainland, and that he might be quieted in his possession. No defence was filed, but the Attorney-General appeared at the hearing, and Sullivan, M.R., granted a perpetual injunction against the other defendants, and directed the Attorney-General to abide his own costs. The plaintiff filed a similar bill again in 1877 against the then Attorney-General (who did not dispute the plaintiff's title) and other defendants, the latter of whom appeared upon the hearing, and had a like perpetual injunction pronounced against them by Chatterton, V.C. Two subsequent actions at law, in which the juries had disagreed upon an issue as to the plaintiff's ownership of the foreshore, were pending, when, in January, 1880, the plaintiff instituted another Chancery suit against the Attorney-General and a number of local defendants, praying the same relief as in the former suits. In this action an appearance for the Attorney-General then in office was entered in February by the solicitors for the Board of Trade, who acted as his solicitors in suits of this nature, pursuant to a direction given in 1872 by the then Attorney-General, which remained unchanged. They obtained the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and in accordance therewith instructed counsel to appear at the hearing, who accordingly did so, and did not oppose the plaintiff's claim. A new Attorney-General had been appointed in May, before the hearing, but no side-bar order to proceed against him had been entered by the plaintiff. The action was, with the defendant's acquiescence, tried without a jury before Chatterton, V.C., who made a decree declaring the plaintiff entitled to the foreshore of the mainland and of the islands (to which latter foreshore the local defendants admitted the plaintiff's title), and that he should be quieted in his possession, and granted a perpetual injunction as before. The local defendants subsequently moved to set aside the appearance entered for the Attorney-General in this action, on the ground that the new Attorney-General had not been served with notice of the proceedings, nor made a party, and this motion was refused by Chatterton, V.C. The same defendants then appealed from the decree; and on the case coming before the Court of Appeal, it was ordered to stand over for the Attorney-General to be served with notice of the proceedings; and this having been done, and the proper side-bar order entered, the appeal came on for hearing, when the Attorney-General appeared, and with the other defendants disputed the plaintiff's claim to the foreshore of the mainland:—Held (affirming the decision of Chatterton, V.C.):—(1) That the language of the patent was capable of passing, and intended to pass, the foreshore in dispute; and that, coupled as it was with adequate evidence of exclusive ownership, and with the admitted ownership, and with the admitted right of the plaintiff in the case of the islands, it was sufficient to confer on the grantee a title to such foreshore, notwithstanding the adverse acts proved. (2) That the plaintiff, by the previous litigation, had sufficiently established his title to be quieted in his possession. (3) That the defendants having, on the summons to fix the mode of trial, acquiesced in the action being tried by the Judge without a jury, could not afterwards under G. O. XXXV., Rule 2, insist upon a trial by a jury; and that, independently of such acquiescence, the Judge had full jurisdiction, under section 42 of the Irish Judicature Act, incorporating the provisions of "The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858," and "The Chancery Regulation (Ireland) Act, 1862," as to the determination of questions of fact, himself to decide the issues raised. Held also, that the solicitors for the Board of Trade were warranted in continuing to act in the suit as solicitors for the Attorney-General, and in carrying out the instructions already given.—Hamilton v. The Attorney-General (App.), 9 L. R. 371.

SECRET TRUST—A testator left the residue of his property to A and B, "upon and for certain trusts and purposes which he had fully explained to them," and he named A and C executors. Enclosed in an envelope with the will was found a letter in the testator's handwriting, of the same date, addressed to A and B, directing them to apply the money left to them from time to time "for such missionary purposes in Ireland as they should, in their discretion, think fit." The will was admitted to probate, but the letter was rejected. The testator never spoke to A of any trust. After the will was made, he stated to B that he had left the property to him and A, and asked B if he thought he could work with A; and B replied, "Yes, I could work with A if we had prayer together." The conversation was never communicated to A.—Held, 1. That a trust for "missionary purposes" was void, as too vague and uncertain. 2. That the letter was inadmissible to prove the trust. 3. That there was no acceptance of the trust by A.—Riordan v. Bacon (L. R. 10 Eq. 468) and Re Fleetwood (15 Ch. Div. 594) observed on.—Scott v. Brewster (Ch.), 9 L. R. 1r. 244.

SOLICITOR'S LIEN—A reference to arbitration having been made in action, the arbitrator awarded that a certain sum should be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the award was confirmed by the Court. An order was made on the application of the defendant's solicitor, under the 3rd section of the Act 39 & 40 Vict. c. 44, declaring him entitled to a lien for the costs of the defendant in the action upon the amount awarded, as property recovered or preserved for the defendant through the instrumentality of the solicitor; and directing the plaintiff to pay thereout to the solicitor the amount of such costs when taxed.—McAleavey v. McAleavey (Ch.), 9 L. R. 1r. 165.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—[And see AGREEMENT FOR LEASE—VENDOR AND PURCHASER.]

A railway company, as compensation for injury to the plaintiff's mill by the construction of their railway, agreed to lay down a siding from their line to the mill. The siding was made, but the plaintiff's not having used it, the railway company removed the points, undertaking by a letter of the 2nd March, 1871, to replace them on receiving sufficient notice of an intention to use the siding. In November, 1879, the siding not having been used, the railway company removed the rails, and the plaintiffs having required them to be replaced, its secretary on the 27th November, 1879, wrote to the plaintiffs that the rails had been removed under a misapprehension and would be replaced at once, or that the directors would undertake to do so at any time when called on. By regulations of the Board of Trade issued in July, 1879, railway companies were required to provide signals, &c., on the opening of any siding or branch-line which had not been in use before that time. On the 17th September, 1880, the plaintiffs required the railway company to replace the siding. On the 19th of October, the secretary replied, requiring the plaintiffs to indemnify the directors against the expenses occasioned by the regulations of the Board, in consequence of the non-user of the siding, if they required it to be replaced. The plaintiffs' solicitor refused, and having again required the siding to be replaced, on the 5th January, 1881, wrote to the secretary that unless in that month the plaintiffs should be fully compensated for the injury and expense sustained by them from the construction of the railway, proceedings would be taken to recover full compensation. The secretary replied on the 19th of January, denying the liability of the company in respect of a right never used, and on which the plaintiffs apparently placed no value. In an action for specific performance of the agreement to replace the siding:—Held, 1st. That the non-user of the siding and the expenses caused thereby under the regulations of the Board of Trade was not a defence to the action, and that the company was not entitled to any indemnity against those expenses. 2nd. That the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree to replace the siding and to keep it in working order, the Court considering damages an insufficient remedy. *Wilson v. A testatrix bequeathed two sums of money upon trust for her nieces M. and E. respectively. The legacy given to E. was bequeathed upon trust for her for life, for her separate use, and after her decease for her children, if any, living at her death, as she should appoint, and in default of appointment equally among them, and if but one child, the whole to be in trust for such only child. The legacy to M. was bequeathed upon similar trusts; and the testatrix directed that in case her said nieces, or either of them, should die without leaving issue, the legacy of the niece so dying should be equally divided between "the children of whoever of my said nieces shall happen to survive," and the children of C. in equal shares, on attaining twenty-one years or day of marriage; and if but one child, issue of such her surviving niece or of C., then living, the share of the niece so dying without issue to go to such only child of her surviving niece or of C. There was no express gift over of the whole fund in the event of there being no child to take it. M. died in 1877. E. died in 1881, without issue, and at the time of her death there were living children of M. and children of C.:—Held (by Law, C., and Deasy, L. J., dis. Fitz Gibbon, L. J.), affirming the decision of Chatterton, V.C., that the children of C. were entitled to the whole of the legacy so bequeathed to E., to the exclusion of

M.'s children; for that the words "whichever of my said nieces shall happen to survive" must bear their literal meaning, and could not be construed as equivalent to "the other." Held, by Fitz Gibbon, L. J., that the intention of the testatrix was to provide, in the alternative, for the case (which happened) of only one niece dying without issue, and that the words "whichever of my said nieces shall happen to survive" had reference to the other niece not so dying: a clue to the interpretation of the bequest being furnished by its containing in effect a gift over in the event (which did not happen) of both nieces dying without leaving issue.—In re Dunlevy's Trusts (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 349.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—[And see REGISTRY ACTS.]

At a sale by auction on the 10th August, 1880 (an announcement of which, endorsed on the particulars and conditions, had the auctioneer's name printed at foot), D. signed a memorandum appended to the particulars and conditions, acknowledging that he had "this day purchased from Mr. Stafford, the vendor, by public auction, subject to his approval, the premises mentioned in the annexed particulars, for the sum of £250, subject to the conditions of sale also annexed thereto;" but there was no signature by the vendor, nor any subsequent adoption of the contract under his hand. At the time of sale D. paid portion of the purchase-money in cash, and for the balance of the stipulated deposit he gave his I O U. Three days afterwards D. paid a further sum on account of the deposit, and was handed a receipt, dated the 13th August, 1880, signed by the auctioneer's clerk, on behalf of "Michael Crooke" (the auctioneer), and acknowledging that he had "received from Mr. Dyas (the purchaser) £30 sterling, which, with £20 paid 10th August, makes £50 deposit on his purchase, Lot 4, Mr. John Stafford's property." The vendor's solicitor subsequently wrote to D. recognizing the sale, furnished him with copies of the title-deeds, and approved of the draft conveyance to him, which, however, the vendor refused to execute; whereupon D., having brought an action for specific performance:—Held (reversing the judgment of Chatterton, V.C.), that there was no agreement enforceable against the defendant, as the contract of the 10th August having been made expressly "subject to his approval," the memorandum of that date only amounted to a proposal, and did not constitute a note in writing, within the Statute of Frauds; there not being then in fact any contract in existence; that subsequent parol approval by the defendant or his agents could not have the effect of altering the character in which his name appeared in the memorandum, so as to convert it into an authentication of a contract; and that the auctioneer's name at foot of the endorsement on the particulars and conditions merely authenticated the announcement of the sale. Held also (in accordance with the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor on that point), that the receipt of the 13th August did not satisfy the statute. Per Fitzgibbon, L.J.:—A defendant who succeeds upon a plea of the Statute of Frauds is not to be regarded as an unmeritorious litigant, to be reluctantly allowed his costs.—Dyas v. Stafford (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 530.

VOID BEQUEST—[See MONASTIC ORDER—SECRET TRUST.]

VOLUNTARY DEED—1.—The failure by matter ex post facto of what was, at the date of a conveyance of land, sufficient to constitute a consideration for it of value, will not operate retrospectively, so as to render the conveyance liable to be defeated under the statute 10 Car. 1, sec. 2, c. 3, by a subsequent conveyance for value of the same land by the same grantor to other uses. J., who was tenant in tail in remainder of the lands of A., in 1840, joined his father T., who was tenant for life in possession, in barring the entail; and in a re-settlement, which included limitations to J. and his issue, T. by the deed of re-settlement conveyed the lands of B., to which he was absolutely entitled, to the same uses. All the lands were charged by the re-settlement with a jointure for T.'s wife and portions for his younger children and a present rent-charge for J. It was afterwards discovered that J., who was supposed to have attained his majority at the date of the re-settlement, was in fact an infant at the time, but there was no imputation of fraud upon the transaction. J., upon this discovery and within a reasonable time, repudiated the re-settlement; and T. purported, in 1852, to execute a new settlement, admittedly for valuable consideration, including amongst others the lands of B.:—Held, that as the re-settlement of 1840 was voidable only by J., and not void as against him until his election to repudiate it, there was a sufficient consideration for that deed in its inception to render the settlement of B. a conveyance for value on the part of T.; and that, as this consideration for value originally existed the statute 10 Car. 1, sec. 2, c. 3, was inapplicable, and the deed was not avoided by the subsequent settlement of 1852, notwithstanding the failure of the consideration by J.'s repudiation of the deed of 1840.—Paget v. Paget (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 128. (Reversed on app.)

2.—F, a child of tender age, was adopted with the consent of his parents by L., a stranger to him in blood, who promised the parents to adopt and provide for the child. L. by deed, expressed to be made between himself of the one part and T. and J. of the other part, but executed by himself alone, purported, in consideration of natural love and affection towards F., to assign to T. and J. £5,000, invested in railway debenture stock, to hold from L.'s death, upon trust to apply the income of the said sum for the education, maintenance, and benefit of F. till he F. should attain twenty-one, and then upon trust to assign to F. the said sum, with all accumulations thereon. The deed was not registered as a transfer of the stock, and the stock remained standing in L.'s name till his death. In a suit by the personal representatives of L. for the administration of his estate, and seeking a declaration that the stock which was claimed by T. and J. formed part of it, the court being of opinion, on the evidence, that there had been no change in the status of F. which would have rendered it inequitable on the part of L., or those claiming under him, to refuse to carry out the provisions of the deed:—Held, that the deed, as a voluntary instrument, could not be deemed operative as a declaration of trust; and that, as a gift, it must fall as imperfect and incomplete, unless T. and J. could compel the railway company to register the deed as a transfer of the debenture stock, pursuant to the 8 Vict. c. 16; and the company not being parties to the suit, the court allowed T. and J. reasonable time to institute proceedings for that purpose, if so advised.—West v. West (Ch.), 9 L. R. Ir. 121.

W

WATER—T., who was lessee for lives renewable for ever of a parcel of ground, expressed in the original lease to be demised, "together with the free use of all springs and streams of water arising in or running through the demised premises, or any part thereof, for any bleach-green or other works which then were, or at any time thereafter should be, erected on the premises," made two sub-leases to different persons, for lives renewable for ever, of portions of the premises, the first sub-lease being made in 1861, and describing the premises therein comprised as "that parcel of ground formerly used as a bleach-green, together with the free use of all waters running in or running through the demised premises, or any part thereof, theretofore used for the purposes of linen manufacture on the said lands, as fully as T. was entitled thereto;" and the second being made in 1863, of the remaining portion of the lands, "together with the free use of all water, if any, arising in or running through the demised premises, or any part thereof, as fully as T. was entitled thereto." The interest in both sub-leases, as well as the equity of redemption in the superior lease (which had been mortgaged), afterwards became vested in W., who was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, and the lands were sold by the Court of Bankruptcy. The plaintiff purchased the portion of the lands comprised in the sub-lease of 1861; and one C., under whom the defendants claimed, became the purchaser of the portion included in the sub-lease of 1863. Both portions of the lands were set up for sale by auction on the same day—one of the conditions of sale providing that each would be sold "subject to existing easements"—but the court having refused the plaintiff's first tender, he subsequently increased it, and was not actually declared the purchaser until a few days after the confirmation of the sale to C. By deed of the 15th March, 1876, made between the assignee of W. and certain other persons and the plaintiff, which recited (inter alia) the superior lease, the sub-lease of 1861, with the water rights thereby respectively granted, and the sub-lease of 1863, the grantors conveyed to the plaintiff the parcel of land formerly used as a bleach-green, together with the full use of all water rising in or running through the demised premises, or any part thereof, theretofore used for the purposes of linen manufacture, as fully as T. was entitled thereto under the recited superior lease or otherwise; and all other (if any) the premises comprised in the lease of 1860, "excepting thereout and out of this grant" the premises purchased by C. By deed of the 11th of April, 1876, made between the same grantors and C., and containing similar recitals to those in the conveyance to the plaintiff, the grantors conveyed to C. the lands comprised in the sub-lease of 1863. The testatum of this deed made no mention of water rights. The plaintiff's lands were at a lower level than the lands of C.; and in the plaintiff's lands, a few feet from the fence dividing them from C.'s lands, a copious stream of pure water issued from the ground. This water was peculiarly suitable for bleaching purposes; and the plaintiff, who was a bleacher, deposed that he intended to use it for bleaching; and at the time of action brought, it was used for domestic purposes in the dwelling-house on the plaintiff's ground, and for the supply of a large mill thereon. The defendants, who were the local sanitary authority, entered into an agreement with C. to permit them to bore for water on his lands, and they made a cutting on them a few feet from the fence, and obtained a large supply of water, whereupon the stream on the plaintiff's land ceased to flow. The plaintiff having applied (or an injunction to restrain the defendants from diverting and obstructing the water from his stream, Chatterton, V.C., decided that the conveyance to the plaintiff expressly granted him this water; and that, as the grantors could not derogate from their own grant, neither C., who derived his title from those grantors, nor the defendants claiming through him, could lawfully deprive the plaintiff of the use of the water in question:—Held, on appeal (reversing the decision below), (a) that the conveyance to the plaintiff did not grant him the right claimed, and that he would not have been entitled to it even if the conveyance to C. had contained an exception of all existing easements; and (b) that, although the water flowed subterraneously in a channel which was, and by excavation could have been, ascertained to be defined, the principle of Chasmore v. Richards (7 H. L. C. 249) applied, as the channel was not known.—Evart v. The Belfast Poor Law Guardians (App.), 9 L. R. Ir. 172.

CHOSE IN ACTION—The payee of a promissory note, not negotiable and not then payable, indorsed it as follows:—"I indorse the within promissory note for £100 to my sister L." and delivered over the note to L. There was no consideration for the indorsement and delivery, but it was found as a matter of fact that such indorsement and delivery were made by the payee with the intention of vesting in L. the beneficial interest in the money represented by the note. The payee died before the note fell due, and bequeathed to one of the makers of the note all the moneys she should die possessed of or entitled to, and appointed him executor. After the death of the payee, and before action, express notice in writing of the indorsement was given to the makers.—Held (reversing the judgment of the Common Pleas Division), 1st, that as the appointment of one of the makers of the note executor of the payee extinguished the debt prior to the service of the notice of assignment, there had been no legal transfer of the debt to L. within sect. 3, sub-sect. 6, of the Judicature Act, so as to enable her to maintain an action on the note; 2ndly, that the payee had not constituted herself a trustee of the note or debt for L.—*Lee v. CONTRACT—[And see CARRIER—DAMAGES—FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—LANDLORD AND TENANT PENALTY.]

1—By the 28th section of the "Blackrock Township Act, 1863," it is provided that the Corporation of Dublin "shall supply, and thenceforth continue to supply a quantity of water equivalent to 30 gallons per head per day for the population from time to time of the township." By a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, in 1874 (confirmed by 37 & 38 Vic., c. 186), it was ordered "that it shall be lawful for the Corporation, should they deem it expedient, and in the event of their having a quantity of water in excess of the quantity required for the use of the city of Dublin, and for the supplies provided for the said several townships by the said statutes and contract, to give to the Commissioners respectively of the said several townships permission to draw quantities of water respectively in excess of the quantities provided by the said statutes and contract respectively, from the pipes or mains of the Corporation, on receiving notice from the Commissioners of the several townships respectively of their desire to take such supply in excess of the statutable or contract allowance, at a rate or rates to be agreed upon between the Corporation and such Commissioners respectively, not exceeding in any case the rate of four pence per 1,000 gallons, and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the said several townships respectively to pay out of the rates levied in their respective townships the rents, rates, or charges respectively made by the Corporation for such supply in excess as hereinbefore defined." Accordingly, Sir John Gray, acting for the Corporation of Dublin, and Mr. Vance, acting for the Blackrock Township Commissioners, entered into a written arrangement, not under seal, nor signed by two Commissioners (under the Towns Commissioners Clauses Act, s. 66), by which it was agreed that the statutable allowance of water which the Corporation were to supply should be calculated upon a population of 10,000, until the publication of the then next Government census; and that all water supplied in excess of the statutory allowance of twenty gallons per head per diem to such a population should be paid for by the defendants, at a price to be subsequently fixed; and by a subsequent written arrangement it was agreed that the price should be fixed at 3d. per 1,000 gallons. The Corporation supplied the water accordingly. In an action brought by them to recover on foot of the stipulated price:—Held, on demurrer to the statement of defence (1), that the Corporation were entitled to sue as plaintiffs, although the contract was not under seal, same having been wholly performed on their part (applying the The Fishmongers' Co. v. Robertson, 5 M. & Gr. 197); (2) that, upon the true construction of the contract, it was in effect revocable at the pleasure of the parties at any moment, and, therefore, did not come within the Statute of Frauds, requiring agreements not to be performed within one year to be in writing (applying Knowlman v. Blissett, L. R. 9 Ex. 1, 307; Eley v. Positive Assurance Co., 1 Ex. Div. 24), and so, under the 56th section of the Towns Commissioners' Clauses Act, was not required to be signed by two Commissioners; (8) that, the contract was not rendered illegal or ultra vires by reason of the reference in it to the fixing of the population of Blackrock, for the purposes in question, as 10,000 until the next census. Per Fitzgibbon, L.J.; The meterage rate under the Provisional Order of 1874 is a rate within the 61st section of the Dublin Waterworks Act of 1861, and the provisions of that section are incorporated in the Provisional Order as effectually as if they were in terms repeated therein. Corporation of Dublin v. Commissioners of Blackrock (App.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 111.

- 2—In an action against a railway company by a consignor of cattle, delivered in Ireland to be forwarded to March and Lynn in England, the statement of claim alleged (par 4) that the defendants did not deliver 20 of said cattle at Lynn within a reasonable time, but delayed and detained them in trucks and waggons after their arrival at Lynn for a long and unreasonable time, whereby the cattle were injured; and (par. 5) that the defendants did not deliver 26 of said cattle at March within a reasonable time, but, on the contrary, delayed them for a long time in trucks and waggons on the journey between Liverpool and March, whereby they were injured. The defendants, by their statement of defence, pleaded (par. 14) to the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim, that the defendants were always ready and willing to deliver the 20 head of cattle within a reasonable time, but were prevented from so doing by the causes thereafter mentioned. They then referred to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and stated that by an order of the Privy Council, made in pursuance of that Act, the county of Norfolk, in which Lynn is situate, was declared to be an area infected with foot and mouth disease; and that under the 4th schedule of the said Act and the orders of the Privy Council of Jan. 3, 26, 1881, it became unsafe to move the cattle from the trucks in which the same had arrived at Lynn except by a licence of the local authority, granted on conditions prescribed by the orders in Council; and they averred that no such licence was forthcoming when the cattle arrived at Lynn. The local authority of and for the county of Norfolk refused to allow the cattle to be, and prevented the same from being, moved out of the said trucks unless and until such licence was obtained and produced to their proper officer; and the defendants averred that such licence was afterwards obtained and produced to the officer, whereupon the local authority permitted the cattle to be removed from the trucks, and the defendants thereupon forthwith removed the same and delivered them to the plaintiff. They further pleaded (par. 15) to the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim, referring to the same Sanitary Act and orders in Council, and stating that the defendants carried the cattle with due and reasonable speed as far the town of Peterborough, on the borders of the county of Norfolk, and that it was unlawful to move or carry the cattle from Peterborough to March without a licence of the local authority of the county of Norfolk, and that previous to the arrival of the cattle at Peterborough the plaintiff had not obtained such licence, nor was any such licence given, and by reason of the premises it became unlawful to carry the cattle further on the journey, and the cattle were prevented from being so carried for a time, and did remain at Peterborough for a time. To the 14th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff replied that one of the conditions prescribed by the Privy Council upon which the said licence would be granted was, that the owner of the cattle would make and sign a declaration, as in the schedule to the order set forth, and the plaintiff, as the owner of the cattle, made and signed the said declaration, and at the request of the defendants, and before the cattle were dispatched from Liverpool on the way to Lynn, delivered the declaration to the defendants, but the defendants did not forward the declaration to Lynn with the cattle, so as to have the same forthcoming when the cattle arrived at Lynn or March, but, on the contrary, negligently made default in so doing; that the local authority at Lynn was always ready and willing to grant the licence upon the production by the defendants of the declaration, and the refusal of the local authority to allow the cattle to be removed from the waggons was occasioned by the neglect and default of the defendants in not producing the declaration to the said local authority. To the 15th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff replied to the effect that the licence there referred to was obtainable from the proper local authority on the arrival of the cattle at Peterborough by the production to the local authority of a declaration in writing made by the plaintiff and delivered by him to the defendants before the departure of the cattle from Liverpool, and which declaration the defendants negligently and improperly omitted to produce to the said local authority, by reason whereof a licence for the removal of the cattle from Peterborough could not for a long time be obtained, and the delay in the 15th paragraph mentioned was occasioned thereby. The defendants having demurred to those replications, on the ground that they did not disclose any contract or obligation upon the part of the defendants to forward the declaration to the local authority:—Held, allowing the demurrer, that the defendants were under no obligation, by any express or implied contract, or by reason of any duty otherwise imposed on them, to procure the licence, nor was any duty imposed on them to forward the declaration; but that, the contract being to carry and deliver within a reasonable time, and not at any specified time the case did not fall within the doctrine that, if a person contracts absolutely to do a certain act, he is not discharged from his obligation by the supervention of circumstances rendering performance difficult or impossible; while for delay in carriage within such reasonable time, occasioned by the regulations of the Act and Order in Council, they would not be responsible under the circumstances appearing.—Lynch v. The Midland Railway Co. (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 116. [See com., and cases collected by the present writer, 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 275, 289, 317, 326, 335.—E. N. B.]

COSTS—[And see COUNTY COURT—LANDLORD AND TENANT—SECURITY FOR COSTS—SOLICITOR—STATING PROCEEDINGS—TAXATION OF COSTS.]

- 1—An action was brought in a Division of the High Court of Justice to recover possession of lands on the expiration of a lease for thirty-one years at a yearly rent of £40, under which the lands had been held, the writ of summons being issued before the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. By his statement of claim, delivered in October, 1881, the plaintiff claimed to recover possession and mesne rates. A consent for judgment for possession and a sum for mesne rates was given by the defendants:—Held, that the action for possession and mesne rates might have been brought in the County Court; and that the plaintiff was therefore, by sect. 51 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, disentitled to costs.—Greville v. Kirk (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 41.

- 2—Where at the trial the Judge refuses costs to a successful party, the Divisional Court will not in general interfere with his discretion. Where a defendant in an action for slander, having paid money into Court, obtained a verdict upon that plea, but failed upon issues joined on pleas in bar, the Court refused to vary the order of the Judge of Nisi Prius, refusing the defendant costs.—Kearney v. Harrison (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 65, 10 L. R. Ir. 17.
- 3—When a holding at a rent under £100 per annum has been evicted for non-payment of rent, the tenant or other party having a specific interest in the holding is entitled to a writ of restitution, under 23 & 24 Vic., c. 184, without paying the costs of the action.—*Scully v. - 5—C. having bequeathed a chattel interest in land to his widow so long as she continued unmarried, the widow married D., and died intestate. E. C., the eldest son of C. took out administration to C.'s will, and brought an action to recover possession of the land against D. and his two brothers, to which D. alone took defence. The trial was listed for hearing on Dec. 15, 1881, when the plaintiff's solicitor was informed that the action had been settled by an agreement; and the case was struck out accordingly. By this agreement, signed by the plaintiff and defendants, the plaintiff was to abandon his claim, receiving from the defendants £120 and a promissory note for £20, each party paying his own costs. A few days before this compromise one of D.'s brothers had, as a legatee, instituted a civil bill suit to administer the assets of C. The solicitor for the plaintiff applied to him, without success, for payment of the costs; and the plaintiff afterwards went to America, and on March 2, 1882, the solicitor applied for payment to D., but alike unsuccessfully. On June 29, 1882, the solicitor having moved for an order that he be declared entitled to a charge on the lands, as being property recovered or preserved through his instrumentality, under 39 & 40 Vic., c. 44, s. 3, or for an order that D. should pay the costs, the £120 having been paid in his own wrong: The Court, being divided in opinion, pronounced "no rule."—*Cois v. - 1—Where an action has been brought in the County Court under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vic., c. 42), and is required to be removed into the High Court of Justice under section 6 (1), an application may be made ex parte for a conditional order for the purpose under the County Officers and Courts Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vic., c. 56), section 57. While the circumstances that more than £50 is claimed will not be per se a ground for refusing to remove the action, the Exchequer Division, in accordance with its analogous practice in reference to remitting actions to the County Court under the C. L. P. A. Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic., c. 109), will consider the case "fit to be tried in the High Court" under 40 & 41 Vic., c. 56, section 57, if reasonably satisfied that the plaintiff ought, should he succeed at all, to recover a large sum, more than that amount.—*Mages v. #### DAMAGES—[And see DEFAULT OF APPEARANCE—PENALTY.]

An action was brought by the plaintiff, a trader, for entering judgment against him on a bond, in breach of an agreement by the defendant not to do so except in certain events, which had not happened; and upon the question of damages, he gave in evidence, subject to the defendant's objection, a copy of the Black List containing an entry of the judgment:—Held, that such evidence was properly admitted, as the publication in the Black List was an ordinary and natural consequence of the breach of contract.—*Blairst v. DEMURRER—[And see CONTRACT—PLEADING.]

O. XXVII, r. 6, allowing either party to enter a demurrer "immediately," must be taken as repealing G. O. 1854, r. 50, requiring demurrer books to be made up; and, accordingly, a party whose pleading is demurred to is bound, without waiting for points of demurrer or demurrer books, to enter the demurrer within ten days; otherwise the demurrer is admitted.—*Holmes v. DISCONTINUANCE—In an action against several defendants, a notice wholly discontinuing the action as against some of the defendants is irregular, and will be set aside. The proper course for the plaintiff to adopt is to obtain leave to withdraw his cause of complaint as against such defendants. A plaintiff is entitled, under G. O. XXII, r. 1, by leave of the Court or a Judge, so to discontinue his action wholly, so far as some of the defendants are concerned, and to strike out such defendants from the statement of claim, where the causes of action against such defendants are in the alternative, and distinct from the causes of action alleged against the remaining co-defendants.—Carlisle v. The Belfast Board of Guardians, Anderson, and others (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 38.

DISCOVERY AND INSPECTION—[And see INTERROGATORIES.]

- 1—On an application under O. XXXI, r. 17, the court will not grant an order for inspection of documents, though some of them are referred to in the pleadings of the opposite party, if the documents are not in the possession or power of that party.—Cronin v. Paul and others (Ex.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 36.
- 2—A defendant may obtain discovery of documents, under Order XXXI, r. 11, before a statement of defence has been delivered, when such discovery is necessary for the purpose of ascertaining what damage the plaintiff has actually suffered, with a view to paying money into Court with the defence.—Megan v. M'Diarmid (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 376.

DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF PROSECUTION—An abortive notice of trial does not preclude the dismissal of the action under G. O. XXXV, r. 2, 4. Where the time mentioned in G. O. XXXV, r. 2, had elapsed, the Court dismissed the action for want of prosecution, though notice of trial had been served, the trial having been postponed on the application of the plaintiffs, and no further proceedings having been taken by them to bring the case to trial.—The Hibernian Bank v. Hughes (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 15.

EMBARRASSING PLEADINGS—1 In an ejectment for non-payment of rent, brought by the devisee of a deceased lessor against a person claiming the interest in the lease, the defendant made a counterclaim, in substance alleging that through a mutual mistake of the lessor and lessee a bulk instead of an acreable rent was reserved; that such acreable rent at the stipulated rent per acre would have been less by £45 yearly than the rent reserved in the lease; and that by taking credit for the excess paid in respect of the rent actually reserved, all rent properly due and claimable under the lease had been paid, up to the time of action brought; and the defendant counterclaimed to have the lease rectified by reducing the rent therein from the bulk rent of £119 15s. 3d. to the sum of £74 yearly, being the alleged acreable rent.—Held (affirming the decision of the Common Pleas Division), that the counterclaim should be set aside.—Curren v. Christopher (App.), 10 L. R. Ir. 38.

2—In an action to recover possession of land for non-payment of rent, the defendant denied first, that he became, or was, or is, tenant to the plaintiffs or any of them; and, secondly, that he paid rent to the plaintiffs, or any of them.—Held, embarrassing and defective, in not answering the substance of the claim by a denial that there was a subsisting tenancy in any person under the plaintiffs. In such an action, when the pleader wishes to traverse the alleged tenancy, it is necessary for him to negative any tenancy, whether subsisting in the defendant specially named, or any other person under the plaintiffs. Semble, an allegation in the statement of claim that the defendant paid rent is unnecessary and embarrassing, as either wholly immaterial or as pleading evidence merely; but if payment of rent be alleged, the allegation may be traversed by the defendant in his statement of defence.—Rowley v. Laffan (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 9.

3—In an action for trespass to the plaintiff's dwelling-house, and conversion of his goods, the statement of claim containing allegations that the defendants put bailiffs in the house, stayed therein a long time, and on two different days brought in a concourse of people; the defendants justified the acts complained of as done in execution of a fiert facias, and the plaintiff replied, that in continuing in the house for a long time, posting auction bills, and introducing a concourse of people as in the statement of claim mentioned, the defendants stayed more than a reasonable time and brought in more people and made a greater noise and disturbance upon the plaintiff's premises than was reasonable in order to levy under the fi. fa.—Held, that the reply was either a new assignment, and therefore inadmissible under G. O. XVIII, r. 7, or was embarrassing, and that in either view it should be set aside, with leave to amend the statement of claim.—Byrne v. Duckett (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 24.

EVIDENCE—[And see BREACH OF MARRIAGE PROMISE—DEATH—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—LANDLORD AND TENANT—MASTER AND SERVANT—NOTICE OF SALE—SURETIES TO BE OF GOOD BEHAVIOUR—WITNESS.]

The prisoner, who had been Stamp Distributor of the Queen's Bench Division, was indicted for uttering three law forms with forged stamps impressed thereon. The forms which were the subject of the indictment were those ordinarily used by the Stamp Distributor of the Exchequer Division, and bore his particular mark. It sometimes happens that, in the process of stamping, a second sheet of paper is inadvertently placed under the sheet which is brought into contact with the die; this second sheet receives an impression, but of a fainter character, and one which can be distinguished from the impression made on the outer sheet. These second sheets are termed "bilinda," and are never supposed to be issued by the Stamping Department, or regarded as genuine stamps. The principal defence was that when the prisoner sent to purchase genuine stamps at the Custom House, his messenger, either deceived by the guilty party or in collusion with him, brought back these "bilinda," which were then innocently sold by the prisoner. To meet this defence, counsel for the Crown proposed to give in evidence several documents from the files of the Queen's Bench Division, which were on forms headed with the printed device used on the prisoner's forms, and date-stamps on which were proved by the evidence of an expert to have been made with the same instrument as the forged stamps on the documents the subject of the indictment; and in the prisoner's office implements were found suitable for the forging of such stamps. These documents were submitted by the learned judge to the jury, notwithstanding that the prisoner's counsel objected to their reception on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to connect the prisoner with them.—Held, in the Court for Crown Cases Reserved (dis. FITZGERALD, B., and BARRY, J.), that there was sufficient evidence to connect the prisoner with these documents, and of their having been uttered by him; and that they were rightly submitted to the jury as evidence of guilty knowledge in uttering the stamped instruments which were the subject-matter of the indictment.—*Reg. v. The invoice was forwarded at the same time, but was immediately returned by the defendant, with a letter stating that it did not correspond with the agreement, and notifying his refusal to take the goods:—Held, that there was no evidence of any receipt and acceptance of the goods by the defendant, and that an action against him for the price could not be maintained. Norman v. Phillips (14 M. & W. 277) followed.—Hopton v. M'Carthy (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 264.

G*GARNISHEE—[And see ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS.]

A mortgage of lands having been assigned, the assignee served notice on the tenants to pay him their rents. A judgment creditor of the mortgagor obtained an order attaching rents accrued prior to the assignment, and a conditional order on the tenants to pay. The rents due at the date of the assignment of the mortgage were not thereby assigned to the transferee, but were assigned to him by the mortgagee after the garnishee order. On a motion by the judgment creditor to make absolute the conditional order to pay, notwithstanding cause shown on behalf of the tenants and the transferee of the mortgage:—Held, 1st, that the transferee, whose right to the antecedent arrears was derived by their assignment after the garnishee order, had no locus standi to show cause. 2ndly, that, under section 23, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, the rents attached were, notwithstanding the mortgage, debts due to the mortgagor, and liable to be made the subject of a garnishee order, and that, therefore, the conditional order for payment should be made absolute. *Collins v. In an action by an administratrix for recovery of lands, which formerly were in the possession of the deceased, the defendant was not compelled to answer interrogatories as to the circumstances under which he went into possession, the instrument (if any) under which he held, and the character of his possession. If in an action for recovery of land, it is alleged that there are peculiar circumstances entitling the plaintiff to administer interrogatories of such a character as the above, there should be an affidavit setting out the facts relied on.—Bleasby v. Bleasby (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 80.

1—Where the writ of summons was specially indorsed, claiming two half-years' gales of rent due to the plaintiff for the use and occupation of the lands, and the plaintiff, in his affidavit in support of a motion for leave to sign final judgment under O. XIII., r. 1, alleged the existence of a lease of the said lands made by him to the defendant and executed by the defendant, in which the defendant covenanted to pay the said rent, and the plaintiff claimed the rent as due under said lease:—Held, that the motion should be refused.—Hartford v. Maher (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 53.

2—A defendant having entered an appearance requiring a statement of claim, the plaintiff moved in vacation for final judgment under G. O. XIII.; and the judge made "no rule" on the motion, no special time being limited for the delivery of the defence:—Held, that after the lapse of eight days from the termination of the vacation, the plaintiff might sign judgment by default without delivering a statement of claim, or notice in lieu thereof.—Roe v. Langford (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 108. [S. c., 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 105.]

3—Where, on a motion for leave to sign final judgment on a specially indorsed writ, under O. XIII., r. 1, no rule is pronounced, leave to defend is thereby impliedly given, and the defendant is not entitled to a statement of claim, though demanded, but must deliver a statement of defence within eight days from the date of the order. *Roe v. F. (a Catholic clergyman), in addressing a meeting of the tenantry of C, who were his parishioners, advised them, if any one of their number should be evicted for non-payment of rent, to pay no rent till such evicted tenant should be restored to his holding. F. was summoned to appear at petty sessions, to show cause why he should not give security for future good behaviour, the summons reciting, and the depositions upon which it was founded alleging, that F., on the occasion of the meeting, had endeavoured to excite discontent in the minds of Her Majesty's subjects, to incite them not to fulfil their lawful duties, and to combine to impoverish persons who would not obey an unlawful society known as the "Land League." At the hearing of the summons, portion of a newspaper report of F.'s speech at the meeting was read by counsel on his behalf, and the solicitor for the prosecution tendered the whole of the report in evidence, which was admitted by the justices, notwithstanding the objection of F.'s counsel. F. was tendered as a witness on his own behalf, but the justices refused to allow him to be examined. An order having been made for F. to give sureties for good behaviour, F. obtained a conditional order for a certiorari. On cause shown against making the conditional order absolute:—Held, 1. That the nature of F.'s speech at the meeting of tenantry, the substance of which was not disputed, afforded sufficient ground for the order made by the magistrates. Reg. (Reynolds) v. Justices of the County of Cork (16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 89, 10 L. R. I. 1) adhered to. 2. That in an application under the statute 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, to bind a party over to be of good behaviour, several distinct instances of misconduct may be alleged and relied upon. 3. That there was no improper admission of evidence. 4. That F. was not a competent witness, and that the magistrates were right in refusing to allow him to be examined.—Reg. (Fechan) v. The Justices of the Queen's County (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 234.

1—A landlord served a notice to quit on his tenant, and afterwards commenced an action for recovery of the land for non-payment of rent, on which judgment was entered. A mortgagee of the tenant's interest redeemed the tenancy. The landlord then commenced an action of ejectment for overholding, on which judgment was entered up, and no notice of which proceedings were served on the mortgagee:—Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to notice of the proceedings, and that the judgment should be set aside.—Burt of Liscove v. Kelly (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 4.

2—Where, pending the proceedings in an action for rent, and before judgment, the defendant had called an action of all the stock and effects on the farm tenanted, on which the plaintiff had been prevented from distraining in consequence of the disturbed state of the district, the court refused to grant an injunction, on the application of the plaintiff, to restrain the auctioneer from parting with the proceeds of the sale.—Max v. Buckley (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 4. [Affirmed on app, id..]

3—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21; setting aside lease; jurisdiction.—Levings v. Darcy (L. C.), R. & D. 57.

4—Where, in determining any question relating to a holding, the Land Commission has directed an independent valuer to report to the court his opinion on any matter referred to him, under the Land Law Act, 1881, section 48 (4), such report will be communicated to the litigants, so as to be subject to comment on either side before the court pronounces judgment: Mr. Vernon dissenting.—Adams v. Dunscomb (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 6.

5—A tenant who has sub-let portion of his holding, and delivered over the occupation thereof, under circumstances which did not amount to a default up to the passing of the Land Law Act, 1881, but in the exercise of the right incident to his tenure at the time of the passing of that Act, is not precluded from applying to the court to have a judicial rent determined, notwithstanding the definition of "tenant" given in section 57, with the clause thereto added, in reference to sub-letting, which provision is not to be construed as retroactive. Where no evidence of value is given save by the tenant's valuator, there being no conflict of testimony, the Assistant Commissioners are not obliged and ought not to go beyond the evidence so adduced, and should not make an independent valuation of the land upon their own judgment for the purpose of determining a judicial rent.—Smith v. Colley (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 8.

- 6—Where tenants interfere with landlord's valuator, and prevent valuation, the hearing of their claim to have a fair rent fixed will be adjourned. Costs given against the tenants.—Dunphy v. Lord Mountgarrett (L. C.), R. & D. 62.
- 7—In order to constitute a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49), section 58, sub-section 2, it is not necessary that it should be shown by affirmative evidence that the holding was originally let and taken quod accommodation land, provided that the actual user of the holding was as accommodation land. Lord Dunally v. Hodgins, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 181, and Chism v. Beatty, 10 ib. 33, discussed. Wilson v. Earl of Antrim, 8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 501, applied.—M'Gowan v. Clements (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 11.
- 8—A tenant, a retired grocer, who farmed over 200 acres, held land adjoining the town of Donegal, but in a different townland. He lived in the town and used the land for grazing cattle, brought from his other farms. The words "park" and "town park" had appeared, under protest from him, in the rent receipts since 1871. The lands were described as "town parks" by means of a pencil entry in the rental dated 1st November, 1857.—Held, that, there being no sufficient evidence that the lands bore any increased value as accommodation lands over and above the letting value of an ordinary farm near the town, the holding was not a town park within the meaning of the section 58 (2) of the Land Law Act, 1881.—Davis v. Earl of Arran (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 12.
- 9—A tenant in 1864 purchased a holding, within the town boundary of Ballyshannon, not generally known or ordinarily called in the locality a town park, but described in a lease of 1838 as a "park or field." The land was used as accommodation land by the tenant, a butter merchant, living in the town.—Held, a town park within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).—Bigger v. Shell (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 13.
- 10—Where land was held under a lease for years containing a covenant on the part of the lessee for the execution of works of reclamation and drainage, and works of this description were carried out during the continuance of the lease and subsequent to its expiration.—Held, that such works were, to the extent covenanted for, to be treated as having been executed under the covenant, and therefore to be excluded from consideration on the question as to determining a judicial rent under the Land Law Act, 1881.—Mullin v. Lavins (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 13.
- 11—Setting aside originating notice to fix fair rent, several distinct holdings included in one notice.—Derham v. Hamilton (L. C.), R. & D. 103.
- 12—Judicial rent, determination of; improvements; predecessor in title; lessee continuing in occupation as tenant from year to year; improvements not compensated for by landlord; fair rent, how calculated; decision of Sub-Commission, when subject to review; costs.—Adams v. Dunsath (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 15.
- 13—If the terms of a lease, taken in their entirety, are unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870, and the rights of the tenant under that Act, such a lease may come within the class which the Court is empowered to set aside. By empowering the Court to annul the lease and to enable the tenant to have a fair rent fixed, the legislature has shown that the lease in its entirety, rent as well as everything else, is to be considered. Even though a clause be not specifically referred to in the originating notice to set aside a lease, the fact that there are no formal pleadings and that the Court has ample power of amendment, will enable the Court to take such clause into consideration. Per LITON, Q.C. The reservation of an exorbitant rent is in itself a term of the lease which the Court is bound to regard, and which may be unfair and unreasonable having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870.—Ewart v. Gray (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 23.
- 14—Application on the part of the landlord to have an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed set aside, on the ground that the tenant held under an agreement for a lease for an unexpired term of twenty-one years.—Bingham v. Macrory (L. C.), R. & D. 104.
- 15—A tenant from year to year compelled, by threat of eviction, to accept a lease at an excessive rent and to pay a fine, is entitled to have the lease set aside as containing terms unfair or unreasonable, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870. Quere, whether the lowness of the rent would be taken into account as counterbalancing terms in other respects unfair to the tenant—e.g., loss of his right to compensation for improvements, and the fact of the tenant's having paid a fine might be counterbalanced by the lowness of the rent? Semble: An excessive rent will be regarded as determining the fairness of the other terms in the lease.—Kelly v. Griffith (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 29.
- 16—Where a portion of land covered with turf was adjacent to the original holding of the tenant, though not comprised in the ambit of the holding, and the tenant possessed a right of turbary over such land.—Held, that the tenant possessed no right to the soil after the turf was cut away, but that the soil remained vested in the landlord, subject to the easement on the part of the tenant of cutting turf. The Rentals of Estates are admissible in evidence in cases before the Court.—Oates v. Stoney (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 30.
- 17—Held, that a lessee under the ordinary form of lease granted by the Court of Chancery for a term of seven years, or pending a cause or matter, is not, on its determination, entitled to claim the benefit of being a present tenant, and to so acquire against the inheritor a right to a statutory term for fifteen years being created. Held also, that lettings under the Court of Chancery pending minority must be regarded as made for temporary convenience of the parties and are, therefore, within the exceptions contained in the Act of 1831.—Callan v. Dowdall (L. C.), R. & D. 335.
- 18—Semble that a covenant by which the tenant agreed to make at his own expense any improvements that might be necessary and desirable, and not claim compensation for them, even though the tenant's valuation empowered him to enter into such a covenant, would be unreasonable. Quere, whether the Court has jurisdiction to raise a personal representative to a deceased lessee, for the purpose of having a lease declared void under the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21. The insertion in leases of declarations, contrary to the fact, that all improvements had been made by the lessor, and advertised on, and their effect discussed.—Magner v. Norreys (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 33.
- 19—Where cases, entered for hearing at a previous sitting in Armagh of a Sub-Commissioner, were adjourned on the terms of the payment by the tenants of the costs of the day.—Held, that payment of the costs as ordered was a condition precedent to cases being called on for hearing now; following the practice in the Civil Bill Court under Rule 2 (Land Act, 1881) and Rule 22 of 29th October, 1870.—O'Hara v. M'Geough (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 35.
- 20—Application on behalf of the tenant to have lease declared void, on the ground that it contained terms unreasonable and unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and was procured by the landlord by threat of eviction and undue influence. Motion on behalf of the landlord, that the tenant should inform him by whom, and at what times, and in what manner, the threats of eviction mentioned in the originating notice in this matter were made use of.—Held, that the tenant was obliged to give the names only of the witnesses upon whom he relied as to the proof of threats of eviction.—Gliseman v. Staples (L. C.), R. & D. 241.
- 21—A landlord having, upwards of thirty years ago, resumed possession of about 77 acres of land near his residence, and kept them in his own hands as his own farm for many years, had let parts of them, in 1856, to yearly tenants, who held them till 1859, when the landlord again resumed possession, and laid down the entire in grass. In 1866 the house, demesne, and these particular lands were all let to another tenant who gave all up in November, 1868; and about a month afterwards the present tenant took a lease for seven years of 17½ acres of these 77 at a rent of £35. On the termination of the lease he continued to hold on as a yearly tenant.—Held, that the holding formed part of the home farm attached to the landlord's residence, and that notwithstanding the dealings since 1866 with these lands, they still retained the character of a home farm, and were therefore excluded from the operation of the Land Law Act, 1881, by virtue of section 58 (2).—Stothers v. Nicholson (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 35.
- 22—On an application to fix a fair rent of a holding in Ardara East, county Armagh, containing 8a. 1r. 20p. statute measure, let at a rental of £23 per annum, and consisting of a farm and cottage thereon, the tenant, a book-keeper in a mill concern two miles distant, having admitted that he took the place as a residence merely.—Held, that the holding was within the meaning of section 58 (1) of the Land Law Act, 1881, and accordingly that the notice should be dismissed, with costs.—Wilson v. Ennor (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 36.
- 23—Where the reference to arbitration has not been lodged with the Court in compliance with Rule 132 I. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881, the Court cannot, after award made interfere to compel either party to produce the reference, and the award cannot be recorded.—Lee v. Dyeart (L. C.), R. & D. 245.
- 24—Where land was held under an agreement in writing for a yearly tenancy, and the premises were set out as "all that and those the mill, kiln, and mill farm," the acreage not being more than 30 acres, and the rent £63.—Held, that the holding was not an agricultural one within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881.—M'Curdy v. Heygate (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 36.
- 25—In order to constitute a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2), it is not necessary that the holding should be used as pasture, if it is held as an accommodation to, and accessory of, the tenant's town residence. A tenant, who resided in a house in Dunganran, occupied an adjoining plot of land under another landlord, which he used for the cultivation of potatoes and cabbage for consumption by his family. The land had been held to constitute an "agricultural holding" within the meaning of the L. & T. Act, 1870, by Dowse, B. On an application by the tenant to have a judicial rent fixed, under the Land Law Act, 1881.—Held, that, even though the holding were to be treated as an agricultural one, it was a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2), as it was held solely as accommodatory and accessory to the tenant's town residence, for the purpose of supplying his family with cabbage and potatoes. Taylor v. Dowden (8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 83, Don. L. R. 517) discussed.—Fitzgerald v. Shanahan (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 37.
- 26—A. held under lease for ten years from B. The lease recited that it was made as B. was desirous of leaving Ireland for America, and it gave B. a power of resumption at any time during the ten years, on fulfilling certain conditions. B. went to America, and returned at the end of two and a-half years; but did not during the residue of the ten years, although residing near the demised holding, claim to exercise his power of resumption. The lease expired in March, 1882, and A. claimed to be a present ordinary tenant under sect. 21 L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881, and as such entitled to have a fair rent fixed.—Held, that the letting was one to meet the temporary convenience of the landlord, sect. 58, sub-sect. L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881, and that the originating notice to have a fair rent fixed should be set aside with costs.—Eari v. Neill (L. C.), R. & D. 244.
- 27—Where it appeared that the holding of a tenant who sought to have a judicial rent fixed, had been originally let to the tenant's husband for grazing purposes, and had not been tiller or meadowed by her husband without the original landlord's consent; but afterwards, since 1875, when the present landlord entered on the inheritance, his consent was not asked, and a portion of the lands were of late years kept in tillage.—Held, that, in the absence of evidence of any new arrangement or alteration of the original letting having been made by the present landlord, the holding came within the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (4), as being let to be used wholly or mainly for the purposes of pasture; and that the application to fix a judicial rent should be refused.—Molony v. Delandre (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 38.
- 28—Within a couple of months after the expiration of the last of a series of leases, and while the tenant continued to overhold, the landlord stated that he required the land for building purposes, but, the tenant having urged that if possession were resumed he would be a heavy loser, as he had highly manured the land, the landlord replied that he might keep the land until he had exhausted the manure. The amount of the rent

- to be payable was not fixed, the landlord requiring more and the tenant less than the amount payable under the lease. The tenant, with the landlord's consent, continued in possession thus for three years, and from time to time, after two years, paid various sums as and towards rent, but still without any settlement of what should be the amount. On appeal from an order of the Land Commission, refusing to set aside an originating notice to fix a fair rent for the holding:—Held, that, whether a yearly tenancy had been created or not, the letting was for "the temporary convenience" of the landlord or tenant within the meaning of section 86 (7) of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49). Per Fitzgibbon, L.J.: The temporary convenience or temporary necessity which excludes a tenant's claim may be existing "for a time" compatible not only with a tenancy at will, or a tenancy less than a tenancy from year to year, under section 69 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, but also under both that Act and the Land Law Act, 1881, subject to the restriction as to written evidence, with a tenancy from year to year or for life or lives. Though circumstances were here shown which, if unexplained or unqualified by the other facts, might afford presumptive evidence of a tenancy from year to year, they had been so explained and qualified, and there was no sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court below that a tenancy from year to year existed in the holding; nor was the court debarred, under the circumstances, from reversing the decision, as being upon a question of fact, the question largely depending on legal considerations. Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9, applied.—Etffe v. M'Kenna (App.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 32.
- 29—Service of a notice on a landlord's land-agent to whom the tenants' rent has been usually paid, under Rule 28, need not be effected by serving him in person, but may be effected by leaving a copy for him with any of such persons, including his clerk, as are specified in Rule 27. The court will not, in the exercise of its discretion, set aside proceedings on the ground that a party has not been personally served with an originating notice unless it is distinctly shown that it has not reached his hands. The question as to what constitutes due service pursuant to the rules of the court is one of practice and procedure, not of law such as is contemplated by the 48th section of the Land Law Act, 1881, as being the subject-matter of appeal to the Court of Appeal.—Falconer v. Oramels (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 47.
- 30—Where there is a dispute between the landlord and tenant as to the terms of a parol agreement for a lease, alleged to be followed by part performance, the court will not dismiss the originating notice to fix a judicial rent, but will adjourn the application, in order to enable the landlord to enforce specific performance of the agreement, with liberty to either party to apply subsequently.—Ruledge v. Farrell (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 48.
- 31—Where the affidavits of the landlord and tenant, as to the existence of a parol agreement for a lease and part performance of the agreement, are of a substantially conflicting character, the court will not assume the jurisdiction of deciding that there was such parol agreement, followed by part performance, as would oust the tenant from his prima facie right to be considered a tenant from year to year, but will adjourn the case for such time as will enable the party to take steps to enforce specific performance of the agreement.—Bros v. Mounsell (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 48.
- 32—The landlord of a tenant from year to year, holding at a rent of £40 per annum, having informed him that he should take a lease at an increased rent of £30 per annum, the tenant, after refusing at first so to do assented, as he was informed by the landlord that others were offering as much rent, or more, and that he would take advantage thereof. The lease, executed accordingly, contained covenants against keeping dogs on the farm, and requiring the tenant to preserve the game from being poached upon, with a proviso for forfeiture on breach, or that the landlord might exact an increased rent of £1 per acre:—Held, (without deciding whether a great increase of rent would bring the case within the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 31), that the lease should not be declared void, as it contained, within the meaning of the enactment, no unfair or unreasonable covenants, nor was it procured by threats of eviction or undue influence.—Blyth v. Kirwan (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 49.
- 33—Where a tenant has been evicted for non-payment of rent, the Court has no jurisdiction, under the 18th section of the Land Law Act, 1881, to enlarge his time for redemption save as ancillary to a proceeding by him for a sale of his tenancy. Where a tenant has been evicted for non-payment of rent, prior to the passing of the Land Law Act, 1881, an application made by him to the Court to extend his time for redemption, after the six months allowed by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1860, have expired, is made in sufficient time through the combined operation of sections 18 and 80 of the former Act if made between the 20th of October and the 12th of November, 1881—the periods fixed for the first session of the Court, under the Orders of October 19, 27, 1881; and in defining the "first occasion" of the sitting of the Court, so as to extend beyond merely the first day of its sitting, those Orders are not ultra vires.—Barratt v. Lord Venry (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 50.
- 34—Leave to sign final judgment: writ of summons claiming for use and occupation; plaintiff's affidavit relying on defendant's covenant in lease.—Hartford v. Maher (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 58.
- 35—Where a tenant applies to stay ejectment proceedings pending an application to the Land Commission to fix a judicial rent, the Court will not, on such an interlocutory application, determine whether the tenancy is one to which the Act applies. Boyd v. Hodson, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 120, followed. Semble, per Palles, C.B.:—A tenancy under a written agreement for a year certain, existing at the date of the passing of the Act is one to which section 21 applies.—Fitzgerald v. Brennan (Ex.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 58.
- 36—In April, 1842, a lease was made for 21 years, and during the life of Bryan Gill, then aged 21, or 24. In 1846 Bryan Gill went to Stevens's Hospital, Dublin, suffering from an affection in his eyes; and a short time afterwards some members of his family called, but could hear nothing of him. It was deposed that he had left this country in that year; and it was stated that, when leaving home, before going to the hospital, he had got £5 from his relatives. It did not appear that he had at any time subsequently asked for any assistance from them; and William Gill, his brother, had not heard from him since, and stated his belief that his other brothers and sisters had not heard from him. But the other brothers and sisters made no affidavit; nor did it appear what inquiries were instituted to discover his whereabouts; and it was sworn by or on behalf of the lessor that a bailiff had been informed that Bryan Gill was a mate on board an American vessel in March, 1875. During Bryan Gill's absence rent had been paid by William Gill, and received by the lessor, but not, so far as appeared, with knowledge that, as alleged, Bryan Gill was dead. William Gill (whose elder brother would have been entitled to the land, if Bryan Gill was still alive) claimed to be a "present tenant," under a tenancy from year to year, and served an originating notice to fix a judicial rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881, at a time when Bryan Gill, if still alive, would be about sixty years of age:—Held, that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the presumption that Bryan Gill was dead; and that, even if he were to be so presumed, no circumstances were shown such as would create a tenancy from year to year between the lessor and William Gill; and therefore, it at the originating notice should be set aside.—Gill v. Manly (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 67. [See com., by the present writer, 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 101, 111, 123, 137.—E. N. B.]
- 37—A tenant, who alleged that he held from year to year, applied to have a judicial rent fixed. An agreement, signed by both parties, to pay an increased rent, and that there should not be a revaluation for 21 years, was produced:—Held, that the tenancy continued to be a yearly one.—Cushbert v. Young (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 18.
- 38—The term "improvements" in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49), has the same meaning as in section 70 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870 (38 & 34 Vic., c. 48). The terms "tenant or his predecessors in title" in section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881, have the same meaning as in the 7th section: dis. May, C.J., Morris, C.J., and Deasy, L.J. The provisions of the final paragraph of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, as to improvements made before the passing of that Act, are applicable to such improvements in determining fair rent under the 8th section of the Act of 1881: dis. Law, C. The enjoyment, during the currency of a lease, of improvements made by a tenant during its sub-existence does not constitute a compensation by the landlord, within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881. A lease made before the passing of the Act of 1870, demising lands, together with all houses, edifices, and buildings, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and containing the usual covenants, precludes the tenant from being regarded as having any interest in respect of improvements made (e.g., a house built) before its execution, in determining what is the fair rent of the holding, under the 8th section of the Act of 1881: dis. Law, C., Sir F. Sullivan, M.R., and Palles, C.B. Per Law, C.: "Improvements" simply mean suitable and ameliorative works executed or done upon the holding; and no rent is to be imposed or made payable in respect of the yearly value of such actual improvement-works themselves; but, the increased letting value of the land beyond that, subsequently accruing to the land in consequence of the execution of such works, may be taken into account as entitling the landlord to benefit in the determination of the rent. "Predecessors in title" denote a series of tenants who have transmitted from one to the other their respective tenancies or titles to the possession of a holding, whatever those tenancies or titles may be, or whatever changes they have undergone. In estimating the "interest of the tenant," when determining fair rent under the 8th section of the Act of 1881, not merely his right to claim compensation under the 4th section of the Act of 1870 should be taken into account, but his right to sell his tenancy as it stands, improvements and all, whether executed before or after the Act of 1870, for the best price that can be got for the same, under section 1 of the Act of 1881; while, if the landlord seeks to exercise his right of pre-emption, he must pay, as the "true value" of the holding, what it would bona fide bring in the open market, if sold to an unobjectionable purchaser. Per May, C.J.: "Predecessor in title," within the meaning of the Act of 1881, does not mean an antecedent occupier, but a previous tenant from whom the existing tenant derives his title to the tenancy. Upon an appeal from the decision of a sub-commission to the Land Commissioners they should form their own independent judgment upon the evidence, which may not be confined to that which was adduced in the court below, as the appeal should be regarded as a re-hearing. Per Sir E. Sullivan, M.R.: "Improvements," within the meaning of the Act of 1881, section 9 (8), does not refer to the increased letting value of the holding caused by the making of the improvements, but simply the works which have caused that increase, or rather the interest of the tenant who made them, measured by the money expended on them, as declared and limited by the Acts of 1870 and 1881. The right of sale given by the Act of 1881 does not give an absolute right to sell all the improvements as they stand, and the "true value" which the landlord must pay, when exercising his right of pre-emption, is not the market value, but what, having regard to the interest of landlord and tenant respectively under the code, would be the true estimate of price as between "them." Per Morris, C.J.: While the tenant is entitled to the benefit of improvements which add to the letting value of the holding, the inherent qualities and capacity of the land for such works should be taken into consideration in favour of the landlord, when determining a fair rent. The interest of the landlord in the pleasy interest in the holding, save so far as the tenant establishes, in diminution, claims under the Acts of 1870 and 1881, which constitute his interest. The mere abstinence by the landlord from availing himself of his legal rights, and allowing the tenant to enjoy what, if the landlord chose, he himself might enjoy, amounts to a "compensation" by the landlord, within the meaning of the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), irrespective of threat or statement to that effect. Per Palles, C.B.: "Improvements," within the contemplation of the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), mean works which, being suitable to the holding, add to its letting value, as distinguished from the increased letting value itself; and the enjoyment by the tenant of improvements executed before the passing of the Act of 1870 cannot be excluded from consideration in determining fair rent. Per Deasy, L.J.: With respect to

- the fixing of a fair rent and the ascertainment of compensation for improvements to the tenant, the Land Commission has an unlimited discretion, and no general rule or principle should be laid down by the Court of Appeal that could or ought to bind the exercise of that discretion. Per Fitzgibbon, L.J.: The words "paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title," in the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), include every form of recoupment which the tenant receives, at the hands of the landlord, whether by way of cash payment or out of the landlord's estate, as an equivalent for the tenant's improvements; so, if a landlord gives over to an improving tenant, because he is such, the soil with all its natural powers, at a price so far below the letting value of the landlord's interest as to recoup the tenant for his improvements. The determination of fair rent is not such a mere question of fact as should not form the subject of appeal: Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9, applied, and contrasted with Grey v. Turnbull, L. R. 1 H. L. 63. Holt v. Harborton, 6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1, discussed.—Adams v. Dunseath (App.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 61.

Designating a holding as "town-park," in the agreement under which it is let, is of no avail to constitute the holding a town-park, if in other respects it appears not to possess the characteristics contemplated by the statute.—*M'Morrow v. - 51—The plaintiff having sued to recover one and a half year's rent, payable in respect of a holding of land up to May, 1892, the defendant, who had paid a year's rent in June, 1891, offered to pay the November rent of 1891, and applied, after final judgment and execution issued, to postpone or suspend the proceedings, under section 13 of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), on the ground that the payment in June, 1891, was applicable, in part, to the May rent of that year, that arrears prior to 1891 thereby became and still were due, and that the case came within the purview of the Act:—Held that, as the May rent was usually paid in December following the payment in June was not applicable thereto, that the May rent was still due and no antecedent arrears had become due; and that the application should be refused accordingly.—Quinn v. M'Archie (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 98.
- 52—Section 13 of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), enabling the Court to suspend proceedings for the recovery of rent, or for the recovery of a holding for nonpayment on account of the rent in respect of the year 1891 and antecedent arrears, does not apply unless, in addition to rent due in respect of 1891, arrears antecedent to 1891 be due, and be sued for in such proceedings.—Aitken v. Jeffers (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 99.
- 53—Section 1 (3) of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), enacts that all payments on account of rent made by the tenant to the landlord in or subsequent to 1891, but before Nov. 30, 1892, shall be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of 1891, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of such payment accrued due, provided that where it appears that, according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed to be the time at which the rent accrued due. In construing this enactment, and applying the latter proviso, the usual day of payment by each particular tenant must be ascertained, regardless of what may be usual on the estate; and where the tenant, not paying regularly, has no such usual day, all that can be done is to assume in favour of the tenant, as is implied in the previous part of the enactment, that the question as to the usual day of payment is not to be influenced by the nonpayment of recent years. If payments were previously made regularly, the tenant should be entitled to the benefit of the prior part of the enactment. The last clause,—that the usual day of payment shall be deemed to be the time at which the rent accrued due,—taken in connexion with the preceding words, must be considered, not as a definition of what should be deemed the usual day of payment, but, as defining what should be deemed the - time at which the rent accrued due, and thus to declare that it be deemed to be, not the legal, but the usual day of payment in order to put a limit on the prior part of the clause. Where a process was brought to recover £14 14s., being £2 18s. balance of rent to November 1890, and £11 16s. for one year's rent to November, 1891, it appeared that the tenant had made payments of £6 on May 26th, and £3 on December 24th, 1891. Prior to the accruing of the present arrear, the usual times of payment, a few years since, for both the May and November gales was between Nov. 1st and Christmas each year. The tenant having applied for a suspension of the proceedings, under section 13 of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882:—Held, that the May and November gales should be deemed to have accrued due only after November 1st; that the payment made on May 26th, 1891, could not be applied in discharge of the gale which fell legally due on May 1st, 1891, but that the payment made on December 24th, 1891, should be applied in discharge of so much of the year's rent which legally accrued due on November 1st, 1891, leaving a balance of £5 16s. owing; and that the proceedings should be stayed, on the terms of judgment in court of said balance and costs.—Aitken v. Kerr (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 100.
- 54—The acceptance, by a tenant from year to year, before 1870, of a lease of the holding for twenty-one years, containing the usual covenants to keep and give up the premises in repair, precludes the tenant from being entitled to compensation, under the Land Act of 1870, for improvements previously made, and excludes such improvements from the prohibition to have rent charged in respect of them contained in the Land Law Act, 1881, section 8 (9); but, in determining what would be a fair rent, the court is at liberty to consider, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, whether it is just and fair that any and, if so, what deduction should be made from the full letting value of the lands, in respect of the money expended on such improvements, no correlative obligation being imposed to charge the highest rent upon all that the court is not prohibited from putting any rent upon, but the amount of the rent being to be fixed having regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively, and considering all the circumstances of the case. Adams v. Dunseath, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 59, discussed and applied.—Brennan v. Latouche (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 102.
- 55—Section 13 of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, enabling the Court to suspend proceedings for the recovery of a holding for nonpayment of rent in respect of the year 1891 and antecedent arrears, does not apply, unless, in addition to the rent due in respect of 1891, arrears antecedent to 1891 be due and sued for in such proceedings. Where, on a motion to stay proceedings in an action to recover land for nonpayment of rent due in 1891, and 1892, it appeared that a receipt had been given for a half-year's rent, up to November, 1890, and it was contended that, by virtue of section 1 (3), this payment should be appropriated to the rent accrued due in 1891:—Held that the application could not be sustained, within the provisions of section 13.—Hamilton v. Maguire (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 103.
- 56—Action to recover land for nonpayment of rent; statement of claim introducing new causes of action; amendment.—Crossthwaite v. Smith (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 103.
- 57—The County Court possesses no jurisdiction to stay proceedings, under the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, on a decree for rent or for possession granted at a former session, the proceedings being no longer "pending."—M'Gough v. M'Govern (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 110.
- 58—Where, subsequent to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, the tenant of a holding, subject to the Ulster tenant-right custom, who had been liable to pay the entire grand jury cess, sold his interest, and the purchase money was paid into the estate office and the purchaser put into possession by the agent:—Held, that a new tenancy in the purchaser was created, but that it was an implied term thereof that he should continue liable to pay the whole grand jury cess, section 65 of the statute not preventing such an agreement from being entered into.—Martagh v. Marquis of Bath (Cir. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 112.
- 59—In order to deprive a tenant of the benefit prima facie arising from the initiatory provisions of section 1 (3) of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), it lies on the landlord, relying on the terminal proviso thereof, to establish affirmatively that, according to the "ordinary course of dealing" between him and the particular tenant the rent has "usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due." Such deferred day of payment must be a definite day upon which the rent has been usually paid, or a day capable of being fixed and defined with as much certainty as that upon which, in law and fact, the rent accrued due.—Monaghan v. Sir John Leslie (L. C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 107, 119.
- 60—In 1869 the Rev. Mr. Kearney, parish priest of Bohernmeen, became tenant from year to year, under Mr. Coddington, of twelve Irish acres of land, and a dwelling-house, and offices thereon, which at that time were in the landlord's possession, at a rent of £45 per annum, afterward reduced to £40, the Poor Law valuation being £28 10s. The dwelling-house and offices, which could not now be built for less than £400 or £500, were valued at £18 (included in the £28 10s.), and would be unsuitable for a person living by agriculture and occupying a farm of that extent, while the house was even rather larger than the average residence of Catholic clergymen. Built about seventy years ago, it had ever since been occupied by the successive priests of the parish, except during a short interval, when it was occupied by a medical doctor. The house had been originally demised in 1798 as an agricultural holding, since when the house had been built by one of the clergymen in occupation:—Held (Mr. Foley, Q. C., disc.), that the holding was not agricultural or pastoral, within the Land Law Act, 1881, section 63.—Kearney v. Coddington (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 123.
- 61—Where a tenant serves on his landlord a notice of his intention to sell his tenancy, and the landlord serves on the tenant a notice electing to purchase the tenancy, and applying to the Land Commission to fix the true value of the tenancy, a sale made by the tenant subsequent to such notice by the landlord will be set aside. In fixing the true value of the tenancy, the Court will not consider the market value of the tenancy, but what, having regard to the interest of landlord and tenant respectively under the code, would be the true estimate of price between

- 62—In order to come within sub-section (4), section 8, of the Land Law Act, 1881, providing that an application to determine a fair rent may be disallowed where the improvements have been made by the landlord, it must appear that such improvements were so completely, and not merely partially, made by the landlord, that there would be nothing in respect of which the tenant would be entitled to compensation. And it is open to the tenant to show that improvements made by him cost an amount in excess of the sum allowed to him therefor by the landlord, and to claim the benefit thereof to that extent, notwithstanding his having given a receipt admitting that the sum so allowed by the landlord "was paid pursuant to agreement" (contrary to the fact), "and was received by him in full discharge of all claims" on foot of said improvements.—Lyons v. Lord Ormathwaite (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 128.
- 63—A landlord persistently refusing to perform his part of a parol agreement for a lease for eight years, will not be permitted to set up said agreement, so practically waived, as a bar to the tenants coming in to claim, as yearly tenants, the benefits of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.—Griffin v. Hickson (L. S.-C.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 128.
- 64—By an agreement of letting, the tenant was to hold 66 acres for three years, for grazing and depasturage; he was to reside on them, and might till 4 acres; and the landlord was to pay all taxes, and the tenant to give up possession at the end of the term. On an application to determine a judicial rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881:—Held, that the tenancy came within the Act, not being excluded as for a "temporary depasturage," under section 58 (6), nor being for "temporary convenience" under section 15, sub-s. 4, of the L. & T. Act, 1870.—Connell v. Sheehan (Co. Ct.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 129.

A medical certificate, described in the warrant as "annexed," but not identified in any way by the reference as one which was before the magistrates previous to the signing of the warrant, cannot be taken as incorporated therewith for the purpose of supplying defects therein not of form but of substance. MARKET—B. held under a lease for seventy-five years, from the Corporation of Dublin, a certain piece of land in Green-street, in the city of Dublin, which formerly had been the site of Newgate prison, the lease having been granted in 1875. He erected sheds or stalls thereon, and carried on there the business of a fruit auctioneer, in the same manner as similar business was carried on in other fruit markets, and the premises were advertised as the "City Fruit-market, Green-street." The sheds or stalls were closed at night, and B. kept the keys of the place, and except with his sanction no person had any right to go there:—Held, that the place was not a public building, or a building used for public purposes, and therefore was not subject to a measurement rate under the 12 & 13 Vict., c. 97, s. 117, but ought to be rated under the General Valuation Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict., c. 63).—Byrne v. Collector-General of Rates (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 63.

1—The deceased was employed, with others, to shift a cargo on the defendants' vessel. Upon going on board the names of the men employed were taken down by one of the officers, who told them to go down between decks to have supper. In going below it was necessary to pass round an open hatchway, which was insufficiently lighted, and the passage round which was obstructed by some obstacles. The deceased, when returning from supper, fell through the open hatchway, and was killed:—Held, upon these facts, that, even assuming negligence, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant of the deceased and that, as there was no evidence of the negligent employment by the defendants of the incompetent fellow-servant, the plaintiff suing for damages for the death of the deceased was rightly non-suited. It is not true as a general proposition of law, that a negligent act or default on the part of a servant is in itself evidence of the incompetence of such servant.—McCarthy v. British Shipowners' Company (Ex.), 10 L. E. Ir. 281. [S. c., 17 Ir. L. T. Rep. 21.]

PARTIES—[See AMENDMENT.]

PENALTY—A foreman tailor, in consideration of his employment at a certain salary, entered into a written agreement with his employer to the following effect:—"In consideration, &c., I agree and hereby bind myself, under a penalty of £200, not to violate any of the following undertakings: not to go into business in the tailoring trade, nor enter into the employment of another in said trade within twenty miles of Dublin, for one year after leaving or being discharged from your employment; and at no time to use the name of 'Macdonald & Browne' in any form in connexion with the tailoring trade, out of your actual employment." He was afterwards dismissed, and, within a month of the dismissal, opened a tailoring establishment in Dublin, and described himself as "from Macdonald's," and as having been "foreman cutter in Macdonald's." In an action for breach of the contract, no special damage was proved, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with nominal damages. On motion by the plaintiff to increase the damages to £300, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial:—Held, that the sum of £300, mentioned in the agreement, was a penalty and not liquidated damages. In such cases, ss. 145, 146 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, apply, and the plaintiff cannot recover more than the actual damage shown to have been sustained. The principle of Mages v. Lavel (L. R. 9 C. P. 107) applied. Bonsall v. Byrne (L. R. 1 C. L. 578) observed upon.—Browne v. Phillips (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 212.

1—When a plaintiff applies for liberty to reply and demur to a statement of defence, the application should be made on summons.—Kane v. Stoneyford River Drainage Co. (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 93.

2—The plaintiff, in an action to recover land for non-payment of rent, having delivered a statement of claim for a larger sum than was claimed by the writ of summons, and for mesne rates which had not been included therein:—Held, that the statement of claim was irregular, and should be amended.—Crosthwaite v. Smith (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 108.

POLICY OF INSURANCE—A marine policy containing a provision that the premises insured are warranted free from all average and without benefit of salvage, and that no further proof of interest than the policy shall be required in case of loss, is a wagering policy. Such a policy is not void at common law. Daiby v. India and London Life Assurance Company (15 C. B. 385) followed. The statute, 19 Geo. 3, c. 37, avoiding such policies in Great Britain, does not purport to bind Ireland, and is not a statute "concerning commerce," and "importing to impose equal restraints on the subjects of Great Britain and Ireland and to entitle them to equal benefits," within the purview of 21 & 22 Geo. 3, c. 48 (Ir.), and is consequently not extended to Ireland by that Act. Such a policy is not illegal in Ireland.—Keth v. The Protection Marine Insurance Company of Paris (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 61.

2—In an action by the guardians of the poor for the recovery of rates, brought in one of the superior courts against the immediate lessor of lands, the plaintiffs must aver in their statement of claim that the Local Government Board have given their consent to the institution of the action. *The Guardians of the Poor of the Ballynaboe Union v. PRESENT TENANT—[And see LANDLORD AND TENANT—STAYING PROCEEDINGS.]

A lease for lives determined on the 10th of August, 1881. Part of the demised premises were in the occupation of a sub-tenant as tenant from year to year to the lessee at a rack-rent, and the sub-tenant (as admittedly entitled) continued in occupation till the 29th September, being the last gale day of his tenancy, pursuant to the 28 & 24 Vic., c. 154, s. 24. After the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, which came into operation on the 22nd of August, he applied to the Land Commission to fix a fair rent of the lands in his occupation, and a judicial rent was fixed by a Sub-Commission under the Act. In an ejectment on the title, subsequently brought by the superior landlord without service of any notice to quit:—Held, that the former sub-tenant was not a "present tenant" to the plaintiff within the meaning of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881; that the order of the Sub-Commission, even if it was to be treated as a decision that the relation of landlord and tenant existed, was not binding upon the Court; and that therefore the superior landlord was entitled to recover possession.—*Hemphill v. PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1878—J. held certain premises in the city of Dublin from B. as tenant from year to year, at the yearly rent of £85. The premises were valued under the Acts relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland at £72 10s. J. let the premises to weekly tenants at rents from which he had a profit out of the premises. The sanitary authority of the city of Dublin served on J. a notice under the Public Health Act (Ireland), 1878, addressed to the owner of the premises, or to J., requiring certain specific sanitary works to be done; and on the 3rd of September, 1878, the police magistrate made an order that the works should be done within seven days. J. alleged that B. was the owner under the Public Health Act (Ireland), 1878, on the ground that the rent payable by him (J.) to B. was more than two-thirds of the valuation of the premises:—Held, that B. was not the owner of the premises within the meaning of the Public Health Act (Ireland), 1878.—Bowen v. James (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 28.

RAILWAY—[See CARRIERS—CONTRACT—REASONABLE CONDITIONS.]

RATES—[See CONTRACT—LANDLORD AND TENANT—MARKET—POOR LAW.]

REASONABLE CONDITIONS—In an action against a Railway Company, as carriers, for negligence, whereby a horse delivered to them by the plaintiff was injured at one of their stations, Gormanstown, the defendants in the 11th defence pleaded that they received the horse under a special contract, containing a condition that, in case of animals for which a contract note with two rates of carriage should be offered to the customer, the defendants would give him the alternative of carrying at either rate; that at the full rate, which would be charged when the contrary was not expressed, the defendants would undertake the ordinary duties of carriers, subject to the conditions in the said contract note and their statutory rights; but that at the reduced rate the defendants would carry at the owner's risk, exempt from all liability not occasioned by the wilful misconduct of their servants acting within the scope of authority; and that the plaintiff elected to have his horse carried at the lower rate; and that the injuries were not caused by the wilful misconduct of the defendants' servants acting as aforesaid. They also, as a 12th defence, pleaded that another condition in the said contract was that the defendants should not be liable for injuries occasioned by the fear or restiveness of animals; and that the injuries complained of were solely occasioned by the restiveness of the said horse. The plaintiff signed a contract note containing the above conditions:—Held, that the condition exempting the defendants "in all cases from liability for injuries caused by fear or restiveness of animals" did not embrace cases in which the injury immediately flowed from the fear or restiveness of the animals, directly occasioned by some act of negligence or want of care on the part of the defendants, but applied only to injury from fear or restiveness, caused by the transit, with its ordinary incidents, and without any negligence or default on the part of the Company; and that, taken in this limited sense, the condition was not unreasonable:—Held, also, that it was unnecessary that the two alternative rates should appear on the face of the contract note, but that it was sufficient that the contract note referred to the defendants' tariff containing all the rates. The contract note also contained, amongst others, the two following conditions:—No. 8, that no claims in respect of goods would be allowed unless made within three days after delivery; and No. 9, that all goods were received subject to the Company's general lien, both for carriage thereof and all other charges against the customer:—Held, that "goods" in these conditions meant inanimate goods, not horses or cattle, and that the conditions were reasonable; but Semble, that they did not properly come before the Court for decision under the 17 & 18 Vic., c. 31, s. 1, which only deals with the receiving, forwarding, or delivering of animals, goods, and things, and these conditions related to something occurring after delivery.—Moore v. The Great Northern Railway Company (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 96. [See com., by the present writer, 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 223, 227.—E. N. B.]

REMITTAL TO INFERIOR COURT—1—On a motion to remit an action for damages for assault and battery under the C. L. P. Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic., c. 109), s. 6, the defendant, in his affidavit deposed that the plaintiff was a "small farmer," and "that neither the plaintiff nor I have any means to carry on expensive litigation in the superior courts;" and the plaintiff deposed to his having two large farms of land:—Held, that the defendant's affidavit did not sufficiently comply with the requirements of the statute, as to negating the plaintiff's having visible means of paying the costs should a verdict not be found for the plaintiff.—McManus v. Maguire (C. P.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 31. [As to visible means see paper by the present writer, 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 94.—E. N. B.]

3—Where the notice of motion sought to have the action remitted "to the County Court Judge, at the next ensuing Civil Bill Sessions to be held at Belfast, for the Division of Belfast, in said county," but did not specify what county:—Held, that the motion should be refused.—Ferguson v. Burrows (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 93.

4—In computing the time within which an application to remit should be made, the holidays are to be ascertained by reference to the Common Law Procedure Acts, and not by the Judicature Act. Where time is limited by the Judicature Act and the Rules thereunder, Sundays are to be included or excluded, and holidays are to be ascertained, by those Rules; but where time is limited by the Common Law Procedure Act, or by Acts, in pari materia with it, then Sundays must be excluded, and the holidays must be ascertained by the 23rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1853.—*Grant, Coburn & Co. v. SALE—[See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—NOTICE OF SALE—SALVAGE CREDITOR.]

SALVAGE CREDITOR—A. and B. were tenants of a farm which was under eviction for non-payment of rent, the last day for redemption being the 20th of July. The plaintiff and another had executions against A. and B. but the landlord refused to allow their interest in the farm to be sold unless the rent in arrear were paid. The plaintiff paid the amount of the arrears on the 20th of July, which the landlord accepted from him, and the interest of A. and B. in the farm was thereupon sold by the sheriff. The sheriff, after paying the executions, brought the balance into Court under an interpleader order:—Held, that the plaintiff as a salvage creditor was entitled, under the circumstances, to be recouped out of the money brought into Court the amount paid in discharge of arrears of rent. Semble, however, that the plaintiff, as a mere judgment creditor, had not such an interest in the lands as would have entitled him to redeem, against the will of the landlord.—Warnock v. Laitie (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 68. [Affirmed on app.]

SANITARY WORKS—[See PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1878.]

SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT—Where both consor and consuee of a judgment, entered on a bond in 1854, were deceased several years, and there was no personal representative of the consuee, and the devisee of lands, against which the judgment had been registered as a statutable mortgage, deposed of her own personal knowledge to payment of the debt by the consor in the year 1868, and that no claim had since been made on foot of the judgment, and held in her possession the bond which she swore had been delivered to the consor on payment, a conditional order was made for the entry of satisfaction unless cause should be shown by the eldest son and only surviving male member of the family of the consuee.—Scott v. Wood (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 355.

SAVINGS BANK—By the 26 & 27 Vict., c. 87, s. 38, it is provided that it shall not be lawful for a depositor in a savings bank to make any deposit in any other account at the same or any other savings bank; and that every depositor at the time of the first deposit, and at such other times as such depositor shall be required so to do by the trustees and managers of the bank, shall make a declaration that he is not entitled to any deposit in or any benefit from the funds of any savings bank other than that into which such deposit shall be made, or any other funds in the said savings bank; and if such declaration shall not be true, or if any person shall, at any time, have any deposit or funds in more than one savings bank within the United Kingdom, except as provided by the Act, every such person should, if such deposit were, in the opinion of the barrister-at-law appointed under the Act, made with a fraudulent intention, forfeit all right to any deposit in or funds of any and every such savings bank. By section 48 it was provided that if any dispute should arise between the trustees and managers of any savings bank and any individual depositor thereon, or his personal representatives, claiming to be entitled to any money deposited in such savings bank, the matter in dispute should be referred to the barrister appointed under the Act, whose award should be binding and conclusive. By the 39 & 40 Vict., c. 57, s. 2, the duty of determining any such disputes was transferred to the Assistant-Registrar of Friendly Societies in Ireland. C., after the passing of the Act 36 & 37 Vict., c. 87, placed various sums of money on deposit in a savings bank in fictitious names, with however the knowledge of the officers of the bank. He had also deposits remaining in his own name previously made. The deposits in the aggregate exceeded considerably £200, notwithstanding that the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt had directed that the trustees of any savings bank should not add interest to any annual account so long as it continued at or above £200. C. died in 1880, leaving these moneys on deposit. His personal representatives claimed them, but the trustees refused to pay the sums deposited in fictitious names. On an application by C.'s personal representative for a mandamus to the Assistant-Registrar of Friendly Societies to hear and determine his claim as a dispute between him and the trustees:—Held, 1st, that there was no forfeiture of the deposits under the 38th section; and, 2ndly, that the claim made by the personal representative, and resisted by the trustees, constituted a dispute within the meaning of section 48, which the Assistant-Registrar had jurisdiction to entertain; but, 3rdly, that the deposits in the fictitious names having been made illegally, and in wilful contravention of the 38th section, and contrary to the policy of its provisions, the writ of mandamus, which is one in subsidium justitiæ, ought not to be granted.—Reg. (Cochrane) v. Littledale (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 78. [Affirmed on app.]

SECURITY FOR COSTS—In an action to recover the balance alleged to be due on a bill of exchange between the original parties to the bill, and in which the indorsement of the writ credited the defendants with certain alleged payments, the defendants entered an appearance requiring a statement of claim, and afterwards applied for security for costs, on the ground that the plaintiff resided out of the jurisdiction. The affidavit of merits stated that the bill was an accommodation bill, for which no value was received, and that the defendants had a good defence on the merits:—Held, 1st, following Tollett v. Lalor (8 L. R. Ir. 8), that the defendants had not waived their right to security for costs by appearing; 2ndly, that the affidavit of merits was sufficient.—Charlencorth v. Clayton (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 367.

SEED SUPPLY ACT, 1880—[See POOR LAW.]

SERVICE—[And see DEFAULT OF APPEARANCE—INDORSEMENT OF SERVICE—LANDLORD AND TENANT.]

After service of a writ of summons, the defendant entered an appearance, giving an address at which, on subsequently proceeding to serve a statement of claim, it was found he did not reside, the house being unoccupied. It was stated that he had gone to America, but that his wife, residing in Dublin, was in communication with him. On motion to set aside the appearance, or for leave to substitute service of the statement of claim: Leave to substitute service was given, by posting a copy of the statement of claim on the unoccupied house, and serving the wife in person.—City and County Building Society v. Hayes (Ex.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 106.

SHERIFF—[See NOTICE OF SALE.]

SOLICITOR [And see BILL OF SALE—COSTS—PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT—TAXATION OF COSTS.]

Where the solicitor for a plaintiff, in consequence of abusive conduct on the part of his client, refused to proceed with the action, and the plaintiff thereupon entered the ordinary rule to change, and afterwards applied to amend the order by omitting the usual condition as to payments of costs, the Court made no rule upon the motion, the solicitor undertaking forthwith to hand over all papers and documents, save original deeds; and also to attend and produce at the trial any deeds connected with the case in his possession, the plaintiff undertaking to return all such documents within ten days after the trial; with liberty for the solicitor to issue execution for the amount of his taxed costs, if not paid within fourteen days after taxation.—Riordan v. Coakley (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 22.

SPECIAL INDORSEMENT—The claim endorsed on a writ of summons was for £154 14s., balance due on foot of wages for three and half years; and the particulars stated the dates, the credits allowed, and how they were calculated:—Held, a good special indorsement, and sufficient as a statement of claim.—Gibson v. Walsh (Ex.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 118.

STATEMENT OF CLAIM—[See AMENDMENT—PLEADING—SERVICE—SPECIAL INDORSEMENT.]

STAY OF FRAUDS—[See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.]

STAYING PROCEEDINGS—[And see LANDLORD AND TENANT.]

1—Under the 13th section of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882, the Court can only postpone or suspend proceedings in an action in which the plaintiff sues for some arrears of rent antecedent to the year 1881, or alleges such arrears to be due.—Gresille v. Reilly (Ex.), 10 L. R. Ir. 323.

2—The Court will not stay proceedings under the 13th section of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882, for the purpose of enabling the tenant to make an application under that Act, where the only rent sued for is rent due up to November, 1880.—Trench v. Dunne (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 340.

3—Action to recover land on title; staying proceedings, pending application to Land Commission to fix judicial rent; Land Law Act, 1881, ss. 8, 16 (3), 21, 58 (7).—Fitzgerald v. Brennan (Ex.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 56.

4—In an action to recover possession of land, the Court will not, at the instance of the defendant upon an interlocutory application, stay proceedings pending an application by him to the Land Commission to fix a judicial rent, unless the status of the defendant as tenant be either admitted or be clearly established by him. Where an ejectment was brought upon notice to quit, expiring in September, 1881, the Court refused an interlocutory motion to stay proceedings, the status of the defendant as tenant being disputed.—Boyd v. Phelan (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 380.

5—Plaintiff had brought an action for slander and libel. The libel was contained in a letter written by the defendant, the words of which, as set forth in the statement of claim, the plaintiff failed to prove, and he was non-suited. The costs of this action were not paid by the plaintiff. He then brought a second action for slander and libel against the same defendant. The statement of claim in the second action relied upon the same causes of action in slander, and three of the same causes of action in libel, as were contained in the statement of claim in the first action, but the plaintiff further relied upon other statements contained in the letter which had not been used upon in the former action. The plaintiff having entered a nila prosequi on the causes of action, as far as they were identical with those in the former action, the Court refused to stay proceedings upon the additional causes of action relied on in the second action. Where the plaintiff has been non-suited in a former action, relying upon the same causes of action as he sues upon in a second action, the defendant should (except where the action is one of ejectment) plead the non-suit in bar of the second action, a non-suit under Order X.L., r. 6, being of the same effect as a judgment on the merits for defendant.—Bywater v. Dunne (Ex.), L. R. Ir. 380. [8. c. 17 Ir. L. T. Rep. 15.]

SUB-LETTING—By an instrument in writing not under seal, J. agreed to take from F. certain lands as tenant from year to year, determinable either by six months' notice to quit, or at J.'s death, whichever should first happen; to pay a certain yearly rent; and not to sub-let the premises, or any part thereof. This instrument was signed by J. only. J. purported to let a part of the premises to H. as tenant from year to year. No consent was given by F. to the sub-letting. J., having brought an ejectment on the title against H. to recover possession of the part of the lands so sub-let, without service of notice to quit:—Held, that the instrument under which J. was tenant created a yearly tenancy; that it was a "lease" within the interpretation clause of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1880 (23 & 24 Vic., c. 164); that, therefore, the sub-letting was void, under the 13th section of that Act; and that J. was consequently entitled to recover.—Jago v. Harrington (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 325.

SUMMONS—[See ASSAULT—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—MOTION—PLEADING—SURETIES TO BE OF GOOD BEHAVIOUR.]

SURETIES TO BE OF GOOD BEHAVIOUR—[And see JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.]

1—While the society styled the Irish National Land League were alleged to be acting in unlawful combination for the purpose of inducing tenants not to pay their rents, the following words were addressed by H. R. in the presence of a crowd, including a tenant against whom a writ of habere for non-payment of rent was then being executed:—"Pay no rent to the landlord. We will make you all right about the land. We will build you a house at any expense, and make you comfortable during the winter." The district had been prescribed under the Act for the better Protection of Person and Property in Ireland (44 & 45 Vic., c. 4); and on the occasion in question the sheriff and his officers were accompanied by an armed force of police for their protection, under the command of a magistrate. H. R. appeared to have been entirely unconnected with the tenant, and to have come there, accompanied by an attendant crowd, for the seeming purpose of interrupting the legal proceedings, and apparently as the emissary or agent of a plurality of persons in possession of funds applicable to the fulfilment of the promises held out to the tenant. On informations sworn accordingly, a summons was issued calling on H. R. to show cause why she should not be bound over to be of good behaviour, on the hearing of which she was ordered by the justices at petty sessions to find bail for that purpose, or in default to be imprisoned for six months. She refused to give bail; and on application for a writ of certiorari to quash the order:—Held, that sufficient reasons existed to warrant the justices in inferring that, when so exhorting or encouraging the tenant to pay no rent, H. R. was acting in unlawful concert and combination with an association, and in concluding that the repetition of such conduct should be prevented; and that, while the Court would interfere with the exercise of such jurisdiction only in a strong and clear case of misused authority, the order made was justified, on the ground of probable suspicion that a crime was intended or likely to happen which should be so prevented, and having regard to 34 Edw. 3. c. 1, empowering justices of the peace to bind over to be of good behaviour all that be "not of good fame." On showing cause against a conditional order for a writ of certiorari, it would be contrary to the practice, confining parties to the evidence given before the justices, to allow it to be supplemented by affidavit.—The Queen (Reynolds) v. The Justices of the County Cork (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 89, 10 L. R. Ir. 1, 15 C. C. 78.

2—On an information having been made by a police officer, that he had reason to believe, and did believe that M.C. was a member of the "Ladies Land League," a stranger to the locality, and had been visiting various persons therein who had been served with writs for rent, and had advised them rather to submit to eviction than pay rent, while outrages followed immediately after her visits to a disturbed district, a warrant was issued against her, and she was arrested at a Land League meeting, and brought to the police barrack and thence to the petty sessions court. The presiding magistrate then read over to her the information made by the police officer, whom she declined to cross-examine, but admitted the truth of said allegations, and avowed that she was a member of the "Ladies Land League" and was carrying out its objects, declining to give any other explanation, or satisfactory account of herself. Accordingly, the magistrate made an order binding her over to be of good behaviour, or in default directing her to be imprisoned for three months. She refused to give bail; and on application for a writ of certiorari, to quash the order:—Held, that the magistrate had jurisdiction, and was bound to act in the matter; and, on the information made and what took place subsequently in court, was justified in making the order, having just ground for suspecting that she had entered, or was likely to enter upon a course likely to lead to crime, and having regard to 34 Edw. 3. c. 1, empowering justices of the peace to bind over to be of good behaviour all that be "not of good fame."—The Queen (McCormick) v. The Justices of the County Clare (Q. B.), 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 91.

SURETY—In consideration of the plaintiff accepting one H. as his tenant of certain lands, the defendant guaranteed the payment of the rent to become payable by H. as such tenant. In an action upon the guarantee, the defendant pleaded that, prior to the making of the guarantee, H. had been tenant to the plaintiff of the lands at a rent, and had been guilty of gross irregularity and delay in payment of such rent, and at the date of the guarantee was indebted to the plaintiff in a large sum for arrears of such rent, of which the defendant was ignorant; that the plaintiff did not, prior to the guarantee, communicate to the defendant these facts, but concealed from him the said material facts, which, if communicated to the defendant, would have prevented him from executing the said guarantee:—Held, upon demurrer, a bad plea.—Roper v. Cox (C. P.), 10 L. R. Ir. 200.

TAKATION OF COSTS—P., a landlord, served several of his tenants, in the year 1-74, with notice to quit, for the purpose of raising the rents. In 1874 the estate was re-valued, and new rents fixed. Thereupon the tenants filed land claims, with the view, as was stated on their behalf, of having the rents "recorded at Quarter Sessions under the Landlord and Tenant Amendment Act (Ireland), 1870," in order to prevent a further increase of rent at an early period. Notices of dispute were filed by M. as solicitor for P. The Chairman declined to entertain the cases, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so. M. furnished his costs to P., and in October, 1880, served notice to tax the costs in each of the cases before the County Court Judge, under Rule 26 of the 29th of October, 1870; and the costs of M., as between solicitor and client, were taxed and certified by the County Court Judge accordingly. On application by P. for a certiorari to bring up for the purpose of being quashed the orders and certificates of taxation, on the ground that the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to tax such costs:—Held, that the writ of certiorari should not be granted, as the County Court Judge in taxing the costs under the Rule was acting solely in a ministerial not in a judicial capacity, and the certificates did not determine any liability on the part of P. to pay the costs so certified.—Reg. (Powerscourt) v. County Court Judge of Tyrone (Q. B.), 10 L. R. Ir. 217.

The judge at the trial, upon the requisition of the counsel for the Crown, ruled that the notice on the face of it was an unlawful notice within the meaning of the statute, but reserved for the court the point whether he should have so ruled or should have left the question to the jury. The jury, in answer to the only question submitted to them, found that the prisoner had in fact posted the notice, and the prisoner was accordingly convicted:—Held, that the notice was capable of bearing the meaning alleged in the indictment; but that the question whether it did, in fact, bear such meaning should not have been withdrawn from the jury.—*Reg. v. MAX v. BUCKLEY.

had been signed, on Jan. 9th, but the solicitor to whom it was sent down for execution stated that owing to the disturbed condition of the country it would be impracticable to levy the distress.

Eiffe, in support of the application.—We presume the sale has been held, and the only course now open to us is to apply for an injunction, under the Jud. Act, s. 28 (8), to restrain the disposal of the proceeds, pending the recovery of judgment, or until further order.

[LAW, C.—What right have you to such an injunction? If you are entitled to it, the plaintiff in any ordinary action for debt would be equally entitled to restrain the defendant from proceeding with a sale of his property pending the action. FITZGIBBON, L.J.—For aught we know the sale may be for the very purpose of providing funds to meet the rent.]

Such an assumption is negated by the letters of the defendant; in one she merely offers to give up the farm if a half-year's rent deposited by her husband, in 1870, was returned. Our position is different from that of a plaintiff in an ordinary action for debt. This is an action to recover the rent of the lands, the stock and plant on which has been sold by the defendant; and the plaintiff had a right to levy a distress for the rent, either at common law or under the lease,* and to attach the chattels, which he would have done but for the disturbed condition of the country, which precludes the enforcement of his ordinary legal rights. The only remedy remaining is by injunction under the enlarged jurisdiction conferred by the Jud. Act; and the Court, in order to protect the suitor's right, should grant that remedy, where, owing to the state of the country, and the proceedings of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot exercise his ordinary rights: Smith v. Peters, L. R. 20 Eq. 513. We were unable to communicate in time with the police authorities of the district in order to procure assistance. And neither could we in time obtain a remedy by resorting to the Court of Bankruptcy.

[LAW, C.—Here the plaintiff, because he has brought his action to recover a debt, his right to which may be disputed, seeks an injunction to prevent the defendant from disposing of her property. How can we grant this. The state of the country has really nothing to do with the matter; such an application, if at all defensible in point of legal principle, would be equally tenable if the country were undisturbed. FITZGIBBON, L.J.—There are cases in which injunctions have been granted to restrain parties from disposing of property when the right to that property in specie was the subject of pending litigation;† but I know of none against a third party requiring him to hold money till another person recovered judgment.]

Of course, we can cite no direct authority in support of the application, which has been rendered necessary by an abnormal state of things; but even in the absence of precedent the Court can exercise its authority in a fit case, as where a landlord was restrained from exercising his right of distress: Shaw v. Earl of Jersey, 4 C. P. Div. 120, 339. In an action by a principal against an agent, to recover the amount of certain goods supplied to the agent for sale, and admitted to be sold by him, the defendant was restrained, pending the result of the action, from drawing out of the bank, and the bank from paying out certain moneys lying to the agent's credit in the bank, which appeared to be the proceeds of his sale of the goods: Wetton v. Wilson, 12 Ir. L. T. Rep. 148.

[LAW, C.—In Shaw v. Earl of Jersey the right to the rent was disputed, and what the landlord wanted to do was to get his rent by seizing his tenant's goods before the dispute was decided—the right to the rent was the question in dispute; so that it differs entirely from the present case; and neither has Wetton v. Wilson any application to this case, where it is not touching property in dispute that the injunction is sought.*] No doubt, our application is of a novel kind, but then it has been rendered necessary by the unprecedented state of the country; and the Court has at all events complete jurisdiction to grant a remedy: Beddow v. Beddow,* 9 Ch. Div. 89; Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 9 ib. 286, 293; Bryant v. Ball, 10 ib. 158. An injunction, or receiver has been granted, upon the application of the grantees of a bill of sale—who has in reality merely a security for his debt which may be defeated if not registered—to prevent the grantor from selling: Taylor v. Eckersley, 2 Ch. Div. 302; Ex p. Evans, in re Watkins, 11 Ch. Div. 691.†

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—If you had gone before a magistrate and sworn an information that you apprehended a breach of the peace on the occasion of levying the distress, it would have been his duty to protect you in exercising your rights. If you did not do that, why should we be called on to do what the state of the country has nothing to say to? DEASY, L.J.—You presume there has been a sale; and you presume the auctioneer has been paid—which does not necessarily follow. LAW, C.—Suppose the auctioneer has paid over the money to the defendant, you do not seek an injunction against her?]

Yes, we should seek it to prevent her parting with the money.

[LAW, C.—But, you will be content with an injunction against the auctioneer on the chance of his having the money. Surely, it is hard to seek for an injunction under these circumstances.]

We could have notice at once served on him. What injury can accrue? We do not ask to have the sale prevented, or the money handed over to the plaintiff. We ask merely for a conditional order to direct the auctioneer to retain the money pending the result of the action; and if there be any substantial grounds against it, or if any injustice might arise, cause could be shown.

LAW, C.—We are of opinion that this application must be refused. We do not consider that the authorities referred to establish the principle for which counsel for the applicant here has contended. It is not a matter depending on the state of the country; it is an application that might be made by any man who brings an action and thinks that he will not be paid the defendant disposes of certain goods. But, in our opinion, the court has no right to make an order restraining a defendant, in an action merely commenced, from disposing of or realising his or her property, on the mere assumption that the plaintiff would obtain a judgment, and that the amount would not be paid. I never heard of such an application before, and hope I will never hear one again—there is no foundation for it, and it must be refused.

DEASY and FITZGIBBON, L.JJ., concurred.

A right of way on foot through the passage of a house does not include a right to carry heavy goods or burdens on trucks through it.

P. White, Q.C., The Macdermot, Q.C., and Bercley, contra.

PALLES, C.B.—This is an appeal from an order made by the Common Pleas Division. The action is for obstruction of a right of way. The 3rd paragraph of the statement of claim is a typical example of embarrassing pleading. What it alleges could not extend the right of way, and it was only evidence as to the user. However, the defendants did not move to strike it out, but delivered a statement of defence. At the trial, before Judge Barry, at Nisi Prius, there seems to have been no controversy except as to the question—had the right of way, as in the 2nd paragraph of the statement of claim set forth, been obstructed? [His lordship stated the facts as to raising of the floor and erecting steps.] From the report of the Judge, it appears that the plaintiff relied on there being evidence of obstruction of such right, and on the belief that the Judge could not rule that carrying heavy goods through the passage was unreasonable. Towards the carriage of heavy goods most of the evidence was directed; it was all given without objection being raised by the defendants, and much of it was given by the defendants themselves. It was impossible for the Judge to accede to the defendants' requisition as to obstruction. The first question put by the Judge to the jury was a highly proper one. Questions 2 to 4 inclusive, relate to burdens ordinarily carried by persons on foot. As I understand, these questions are not in this appeal objected to by defendants' counsel. I offer no opinion in regard to them, and pass them by. Then we come to questions 5-8, which relate to such burdens as might, previously to the alterations, have been carried through the passage (or, as I understand it, such burdens as the physical conditions of the passage would permit to pass), and also to burdens on trucks. I think defendants' view of these questions is correct, and that the Judge should have complied with them. Had the answer to the Judge's first question been in the negative, the defendants would have been entitled to a verdict, but it was in the affirmative; and we are now asked by defendants to set aside that finding, because other additional questions were also left to them. There is here involved a question of much importance. Where a question of law was (as in this case) involved, the only course formerly was for the jury to return a special verdict. Afterwards the modern practice arose of reserving the question at the trial, which the Court in banc were enabled to decide on afterwards; and thus grew up the practice of leaving all the questions to the jury, which were material on either alternative. By the Act of 1856, an appeal was given on the point reserved at the trial to the House of Lords. This has in practice led to the abolition of special verdicts, and is well described by Lord Blackburn in Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co. v. Slattery, L. R. 3 App. Ca. 1206. But it can only be done by leaving the facts in either alternative before the jury. This is what was here done. Defendants' counsel says that the first question was not in fact tried at all. But is this the fact? The jury was a view jury and a special jury, and I think their verdict on the first question not unreasonable. I cannot agree that it was not fairly tried. It is said these other questions will prejudice the defendants if an injunction is sought. I think these answers will have no such effect except as to the question of obstruction, and that has been decided by the answer to the first question. Under the Jud. Act, sched. r. 82, we are enabled to set aside the findings on some of the questions, leaving others to stand. We think, therefore, the order for a new trial made by the Common Pleas Division should be discharged, the findings on questions 2 to 8 to be struck out, as being in our opinion immaterial, and that on question 1 to stand, and the judgment for the plaintiff thereon, with 8d. damages and costs, to stand; each party to bear his own costs of the proceedings in the Common Pleas Division and this Court.

DEAST, J.—A user of trucks through a gentleman's hall-door, when a right of footway only was claimed, I think most unreasonable, and the finding of the jury on the question was equally so. Mr. Austin never carried trucks through the passage; Mr. Toole, his predecessor, did, but he was the owner of the premises. Question 2 was very objectionable. What are the burdens ordinarily carried by foot passengers? Are there included what a porter ordinarily carries on his shoulders or a bag of coal? But the alterations undoubtedly materially impeded the right of way, and on the first question the finding of the jury was very proper. By putting in an exaggerated claim, the plaintiff has lost the costs he might otherwise perhaps have obtained.

FITZGIBBON, J.—I concur with the previous judgments. There was evidence in support of the first question, and a second trial would most probably have on this point a like result. But we wholly get rid of the other findings by striking them out as immaterial. It certainly appears to me that a reasonable user of a right of footway, such as this, must be one consistent with the ordinary use by a gentleman of his own hall-door.

Motion to dismiss action for want of prosecution. The writ of summons was served on the 10th September, 1881; appearance filed on the 14th September; and on the 7th November a motion to mark final judgment was refused, defendant's costs to be costs in the cause. Since then no step had been taken by the plaintiff. #### THE EARL OF LISTOWEL v. KELLY.

Jan. 13, 1882.—Action for recovery of land for non-payment of rent—Notice to quit—Judgment for possession—Redemption by mortgagee—Judgment in action of ejectment and for mortgage debt by mortgagee—Judgment in action of ejectment by the landlord for overholding—Notice not given to mortgagee—Judgment set aside.

A landlord served a notice to quit on his tenant, and afterwards commenced an action for recovery of the land for non-payment of rent, on which judgment was entered. A mortgagee of the tenant's interest redeemed the tenancy. The landlord then commenced an action of ejectment for overholding, on which judgment was entered up, and no notice of which proceedings were served on the mortgagee:

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to notice of the proceedings, and that the judgment should be set aside.

Motion, on behalf of Patrick Harnett, a mortgagee of the defendant's interest, to set aside the judgment in this case against the defendant.

The writ of summons, issued the 21st April, 1881, claimed the recovery of the possession of the lands of Islandanny, in the Barony of Irraghticonnor and County Kerry, for non-payment of £22 2s. 6d., one year's rent thereof. Judgment for possession was entered up on the 11th May, 1881, and a writ of habere issued. By an indenture of mortgage dated the 24th February, 1879, the defendant assigned to the said P. Harnett all his estate and interest in the tenancy, for the consideration therein mentioned; and the indenture was registered on the 4th March, 1879. On the 9th February, 1881, the said P. Harnett issued a writ against the defendant for recovery of possession of the lands and for the amount of the mortgage debt. On the 2nd of July, 1881, on the trial of P. Harnett's action against the defendant, a verdict was found for the plaintiff therein, by direction of the Lord Chief Justice. On the 2nd August, 1881, P. Harnett obtained an order for a writ of restitution of the possession to said lands to the defendants, he having paid the sum of £29 2s. 6d., the amount of the judgment debt, and costs, into Court. On the 28th September, 1881, P. Harnett lodged with the Sheriff of Kerry the writ of restitution, and also a writ of habere in his action against the defendant. On the 14th

October, 1881, a writ for the recovery of the said lands on the title was issued out of this Division against the defendant by the plaintiff herein; and judgment by default was entered up thereon on the 25th October, 1881. These last-mentioned proceedings were carried out without the knowledge of P. Harnett or anyone representing him. On the 31st October, 1881, the Sheriff of Kerry executed the writ of restitution by restoring the defendant to possession; and then executed the writ of possession at the suit of P. Harnett by dispossessing the defendant. The defendant was admitted as caretaker under a written agreement. On the 5th Nov., 1881, the Sheriff executed a writ of possession on foot of the judgment dated 25th October at the suit of the plaintiff. The entire of the mortgage debt remained due to P. Harnett. The plaintiff herein alleged that on the 26th March, 1881, he caused a notice to quit to be served on the defendant.

Murray, for P. Harnett, in support of the motion.—The ejectment for non-payment of rent determined the tenancy of Kelly subject to redemption as and from the 25th March, and thereby rendered invalid and uncertain the notice to quit, which was served on the day following, i.e., the 26th March: Hall v. Flanagan,* I. R. 11 C. L. 470, 11 Ir. L. T. Dig. 23. The landlord having elected to proceed for non-payment of rent, and having determined the tenancy thereby, could not proceed on the notice to quit served previous to the proceeding in ejectment for non-payment of rent: Jones v. Carter, 15 M. & W. 718.

O'Riordan, Q.C. (with him M. J. Bourke), for the plaintiff, contra.—There is a custom on the plaintiff's estate against mortgaging, or sub-letting; and the mortgage was executed without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff.

[MORRIS, C.J.—You got judgment for non-payment of rent, and the mortgagee paid the money and got a writ of restitution. Is there any case in which, when the landlord accepts the money of a mortgagee redeeming, he can then evict the tenant mortgagor?] The mortgagee never went into possession.

MORRIS, C.J.—We think the plaintiff should have served notice on the mortgagee of the ejectment proceedings.

Motion granted, with costs.

MAX v. BUCKLEY.

Jan. 12, 1882.—Practice—Injunction—Jurisdiction—Action for rent—Auction by defendant of stock—Jud. Act, s. 28, sub-s. 8.

Where, pending the proceedings in an action for rent, and before judgment, the defendant had called an auction of all the stock and effects on the farm tenanted, on which the plaintiff had been prevented from distraining in consequence of the disturbed state of the district, the Court refused to grant an injunction, on the application of the plaintiff, to restrain the auctioneer from parting with the proceeds of the sale.

Motion, ex parte, for an injunction to restrain an auctioneer who was selling the defendant's stock and effects from parting with the proceeds of the sale. A writ of summons had been issued claiming £479 18s. 5d., one year's rent of the defendant's holding, the defendant holding the lands under a lease, ten years of which were unexpired. The district in which the lands were situate had been prescribed under the Act for the Better Protection of Life and Property in Ireland, 1881; and one copy of the writ of summons was posted to the defendant, another copy on the nearest police barrack, and an affidavit setting forth same was duly filed in the office of this Division, but judgment had not been yet entered. On the 9th January, 1882, an advertisement appeared in the Clonmel Chronicle of an auction of the defendant's stock and effects to be held on the 11th January. On the 9th January plaintiff signed a distress warrant to be levied on the defendant, but owing to the disturbed state of the country was unable to have same executed. A letter was received from the defendant saying she was willing to give up the farm on condition of receiving a remission of rent.

Effe, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—The court can grant an injunction to restrain proceedings pending an action: Jud. Act, s. 28, sub-s. 8; Shaw v. Earl of Jersey, 4 C. P. D. 120, 359; Beddow v. Beddow, 9 Ch. D. 89; Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 9 Ch. D. 286, 293; Bryant v. Ball, 10 Ch. D. 153. This is a clearance sale, and we ask, pending proceedings, to restrain the payment away of the proceeds. It is impossible to execute the distress warrant, and if this order be not made the plaintiff cannot recover his debt.

MORRIS, G.J.—This is an entirely novel application and quite unwarranted. It may be taken to the Court of Appeal, however; but, as that court will not entertain the question unless some order has been made, the officer will make out a statement that an order was applied for here and refused.

No rule.*

Nov. 29, 1881; Jan. 11, 1882.—Practice—Employers' Liability Act, 1880, ss. 3, 6.—Removal of action from county court into superior court—40 & 41 Vic., c. 56, s. 57.

Where an action has been brought in the County Court under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vic., c. 42), and is required to be removed into the High Court of Justice under section 6 (1), an application may be made ex parte for a conditional order for the purpose under the County Officers and Courts Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vic., c. 56), section 57.

While the circumstance that more than £50 is claimed will not be per se a ground for refusing to remove the action, the Exchequer Division, in accordance with its analogous practice in reference to remitting actions to the County Court under the C. L. P. A. Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic., c. 109), will consider the case "fit to be tried in the High Court" under 40 & 41 Vic., c. 56, section 57, if reasonably satisfied that the plaintiff ought, should he succeed at all, to recover a large sum, more than that amount.

Motion, ex parte, for an order to bring up for trial in the superior court an action instituted in the Belfast Recorder's Court by the widow of a workman against his employer. She claimed, on behalf of herself and her three children, £245 14s. damages under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for the death of her husband, caused on September 17th, 1881, by the fall on him of a crane whilst in the employment of the defendant. This sum represented three years wages of the deceased (who had been a skilled stone-cutter, engaged at £1 10s. 6d. a week), being the maximum amount she was entitled to claim under s. 3 of the Act. An affidavit, filed in support of the application, stated that the said crane was registered to lift and carry a weight of a ton, but that it was constantly and on the occasion in question, used to carry a ton and a half, with the knowledge and by the direction of defendant's foreman; and it was further stated that the Recorder of Belfast had in a similar recent case (Shelcock v. Great Northern Railway Co.), expressed his opinion that he could not give a decree for a greater sum than £50. The deceased was the sole support of his family.

Cuming, in support of motion.

[FITZGERALD, B.—Should not notice be given to the other side?]

G. O., 1854, r. 149, provided that writs of certiorari to remove actions from inferior courts of record before judgment should issue on the mere production to the officer of an affidavit that the application was not for the purposes of oppression, vexation, or delay. Application under Sir Colman O'Loughlen's Act (37 & 38 Vic., c. 66, s. 2), for removing actions from the county court into the superior courts are made ex parte. Two such orders under that section* have been so made by Fitzgerald, B., in Boyd v. Church Temporalities Commissioners, December, 1879, and the cause subsequently shown by the plaintiff disallowed. In Symonds v. Dimsdale, 2 Ex. R. 583, it was laid down that an order made to bring up an action from an English County Court under 9 & 10 Vic., c. 95, s. 90 (a very similar one to this), was rightly made ex parte.

FITZGERALD, B.—You had better take a conditional order.

Order accordingly.

MAGEE v. MARTIN.

Jan. 11, 1882.—Motion to make conditional order absolute.

Cuming, in support of the motion.—We contend that we could recover greater damages if the jury were empowered to grant more. That large sum is sufficient to make the case a proper one for the superior court.

[PALLES, C.B.—Did the Recorder decide, in the case alluded to in plaintiff's affidavit, that he could only give £50 damages, and is that the law? †]

He stated that to be his opinion, but the case was settled. That expression of opinion would certainly influence his mind if the present case were tried before him.

[PALLES, C.B.—Are there any English cases on this point? ‡]

We cannot find any, for they are there argued in

† As far as could be gathered from the subsequent interlocutory discussion, the inclination of opinion seemed to be, on the whole, that more than £50 (the limit under 40 & 41 Vic., c. 56) might be awarded; but the dicta were inconclusive, and the point was not decided.

Chamber and are not reported. By 37 & 38 Vict., c. 66, s. 2, which is an Act in pari materia, an action may be brought up by certiorari on certain specified grounds, "or any other ground which may make it more proper to have the case tried" in the Superior Courts. Reasonable and proper grounds are here shown. By 40 & 41 Vict., c. 56, s. 57, an action may be removed into the Superior Court by order of a Judge of the High Court "in any case which shall appear to the Judge fit to be tried" in that Court. The defence in this case is one of contributory negligence, and this has always been a formidable ground of opposing a remitting motion under the C. L. P. A. Act, 1870.*

Shaw, contra.—We may leave the amount of compensation out of the question, for the Employers' Liability Act places a limit on it by section 3, and says the action shall be brought in the County Court; clearly then that Court has jurisdiction to give the full amount. The amount of compensation will be the same whether in the County Court or in the Superior Court. Contributory negligence is nearly always pleaded in these cases; and if that were a good ground for removal, the jurisdiction of the County Courts would be practically ousted. If the merits are all with the defendant on account of contributory negligence, he will have been put to much needless expense. The intention of the legislature in enacting that actions under this Act should be brought in the County Courts was to protect employers in the matter of costs.

PALLES, C.B.—On the best consideration we can give to this case we think this action ought to be removed. It is not very easy to gather the intention of the legislature as to this Act, or to find out whether any of the Acts referred to by counsel were in its contemplation when this Act was passed. A new cause of action is given to workmen against employers which did not exist before. The statute deals with and embraces a number of classes of injuries, including slight injuries, and varying in degree up to the class of injuries resulting in death. I think the legislature contemplated that the majority of cases under the Act would deal with sums of small amount. Death is on the whole an unusual result. For this reason the action is to be brought in the County Court, but a power of removal into the Superior Court is given. The question now before us is, in what class of cases is this power of removal given. [His lordship read 43 & 44 Vict., c. 42, s. 6.] It is admitted that 40 & 41 Vict., c. 56, s. 57, is the only existing Act relating to this power of removal. We must decide the question by construing s. 57 of the one Act with s. 6 of the other. [His lordship read s. 57.] We are driven here to determine is this a case fit to be tried before the superior court. Judging as we are in the habit of judging under the Act of 1870, and regarding the fact that the amount sought to be recovered exceeds £50 by a considerable amount, we think it is a fit case for the High Court of Justice, as, without saying she will succeed at all, we think the plaintiff, if she does succeed, will probably get a large sum by way of compensation. As to terms, under section 57, if the claim does not exceed £5 we have no power to make an order without requiring security for costs, but if the claim exceeds £5 we may make an order in a fit case. But, where we think the case is more fit to be tried in the High Court than in the County Court I do not see why the plaintiff should be called upon here to give security for costs. The order will have the effect of a certiorari.

FITZGERALD, B.—I concur, but it is not to be taken as decided that an order for removal would be granted where the sum claimed exceeded £50.

PALLES, C.B.—I assent.

LAND COMMISSION.

(Before O'HAGAN, J., LITTON, Q.C., and J. E. VERNON, Esq.)

ADAMS AND OTHERS v. DUNSEATH. (1.)

SHEPPARD AND OTHERS v. TENNANT.

Jan. 11, 12, 16, 1882.—Practice—Report of independent valuer—Communication of, to litigants—Examination of valuer—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 48 (4).

Where, in determining any question relating to a holding, the Land Commission has directed an independent valuer to report to the Court his opinion on any matter referred to him, under the Land Law Act, 1881, section 48 (4), such report will be communicated to the litigants, so as to be subject to comment on either side before the Court pronounces judgment. Mr. Vernon dissenting.

Appeals from decisions of Assistant Commissioners, determining judicial rents.

In the case firstly above entitled,

Holmes, Q.C., for the landlady, appellant, applied that the report made by the independent valuator appointed by the court under the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 48, should be communicated to the parties, and that their advocates should have an opportunity of considering and commenting on it before the court pronounced judgment. In any contested litigation before any court of justice it is the duty of counsel to ascertain all circumstances and documents which might form the basis of decision; and this document is not different, save in one or two particulars, from any other document that may be used in evidence. Under ordinary circumstances evidence is a statement made under the sanction of an oath, and by a person subject to examination and cross-examination; but the Legislature can, if it sees fit, under certain circumstances, dispense with the oath or a sifting by cross-examination. For many reasons the litigants on both sides should have an opportunity of seeing the report. No matter how skilled a valuator is he may be liable to make a mistake, and he is the more open to make a mistake if he is making a valuation of land in a district with which he was not previously acquainted. Persons who were acquainted with the district, upon reading the report, might be able to detect an error which no amount of skill on the part of the valuator, coming from another part of the country, would be able to avoid, and there might also be errors which could escape the notice of the commissioners, and be detected by the counsel engaged in the case. Then, the court in giving its decision could not altogether ignore the report, and could not entirely avoid references to it. And if they intimated that there was something behind the evidence given in court which influenced them in coming to the conclusion they did, that it need hardly be said would be a judgment which would go forth without authority and would return without respect. The judge would have to state to some extent whether or not the evidence of the report had been acted upon, and if the court allowed the contents of the report to be known to some extent, it would be illogical not to let the whole of it be known. There is another ground to which attention should be called as affording a strong argument and reason of letting the report be at the disposal of the litigants. It had been stated by the Judicial Commissioner on the previous day that he had considered the matter with reference to cases in which an independent valuator had been appointed by the court below under s. 37, and that it was the right of the litigant in that case to see it.

[O'HAGAN, J.—I did not say it was his right. What I said was that it would be a right thing; and my reason was that it might influence him one way or other with regard to appealing]. At all events, it is an argument in support of our proposition.

[O'HAGAN, J.—At what stage of the proceedings would you say the report should be placed at the disposal of the litigants?]

As soon as the report is in the possession of the court. If it is in their possession at the commencement of the case we should get at it, or as soon as the report is made to the court it should be given to us. We look upon it to a certain extent as a public document.

[O'HAGAN, J.—The Legislature seemed to have contemplated that the report would be asked for after the case. What would be done then?]

In that case it ought to be furnished so that there would be 24 hours, or some sufficient time to enable counsel on either side after reading the report to appear before the court, or to submit to the court in writing whatever appeared of importance.

[LITTON, Q.C.—If the report was given during the progress of the case, the whole case would be fought out over it. O'HAGAN, J.—It would be impossible for any tribunal not to be fully impressed by the arguments Mr. Holmes has urged, but there might be great inconveniences as the result of the practice being varied, and there might be great complaints of hardship in some cases. In one case, for instance, the report might be made before the case, and the litigants might get it, and be able to examine witnesses about it without any opportunity being given to the gentlemen who made it to explain. In another case the litigant might not have an opportunity of examining or cross-examining witnesses; so that the variety of practice would necessarily lead to great complaints. Suppose we yielded to your application and gave the report to counsel on both sides after their evidence was closed? That is very reasonable.

Dodd, on behalf of the tenant, joined in the application. The reports are public documents, and could be got in the manner that other public documents are got—by moving for their production in Parliament. If such happened it would not be salutary to find that there were certain things in the report by which the court had been influenced, and which counsel, if he had known they existed, could have dealt with in a satisfactory manner. It is for the interests of the public, as well as of the profession, that the report should be given to the litigants, and it would also be for the interests of the tenants.

In the cases secondly above entitled,

Overend, on behalf of the landlord, supported the same contention.

Mr. M'Mordie, solicitor, for the tenants, contra.—In what position would the Government be placed supposing a prima facie case was made out assailing such a report if it was made public? The court would be obliged to repudiate those whom they had appointed for their own guidance and assistance. We all know that many witnesses might be damaged in the box, so far as public opinion was concerned, while the value of their testimony might not in the smallest degree be affected. It is, therefore, doubly desirable that nothing should occur in relation to these assessors and their reports that would tend to weaken the value of their testimony in the eyes of the public, or shake confidence in this tribunal. To assail the report of the assessors, who are not examined as witnesses, is to assail the court itself.

[LITTON, Q.C.—Mr. Holmes's suggestion was not that these reports should be handed to the parties to enable them to bring forward discrediting witnesses, and to impeach their reports, but that at the conclusion of all the evidence counsel should be allowed an opportunity of seeing them, so as to make any observations they might think desirable.]

There would then be discussion on the reports, and the court ought to consider that there must be some finality to litigation. Logically, if this proposal be acceded to, there is no reason why it should not be asked that every member of the court should be obliged at some stage of the case to submit himself to examination and cross-examination. There must be some person finally in whom we are to have confidence, and if we are to have confidence in this tribunal the best way to secure that confidence is not to make an inroad into its private transactions or to attempt to get from it such information as it might think desirable to get to assist it in coming to a just conclusion. The shorter litigation is the better, and the less time occupied in courts the better for the administration of the law and the public interest, and it would be deplorable, if there was nothing else in this matter, that an hour should be occupied in discussing the accuracy or otherwise of these reports. Supposing the assessors were shown before the public to have generously erred in some case, would not the court be obliged at once to dispense with the services of the gentlemen, and yet these errors might be as easily detected by the court as by any of the persons here engaged.

Decision deferred.

O'HAGAN, J.—In the cases in which Mrs. Dunseath is landlady, and David Adams and others are tenants, Mr. Holmes has made an application that the reports of the independent valuers, whom we appointed, pursuant to the 48th section of the Act, should be communicated to the parties, and that the advocates on either side should have an opportunity of considering and commenting upon them before the court pronounced judgment. Mr. Dodd, who appeared for the tenants in the same cases, supported the application. On the other hand, Mr. M'Mordie, the solicitor for the tenants in the succeeding cases, in which Mr. Tennant was landlord, urged upon us very strongly that we ought not to yield to the application of Mr. Holmes. He contended that these reports should be treated as confidential documents intended for the eye of the court alone—that the valuers were to be deemed in the nature of assessors forming part and parcel of the court, whose reports should not be disclosed to the parties any more than the communications which a skilled member of the court might make to his less expert brethren. He urged, moreover, that the independence which is to be the characteristic of these valuers, and which forms the reason for their existence, would be seriously affected if while prosecuting their inquiries they knew that their reports would be subjected to searching and hostile criticism. He said that if their reports were to be put into the hands of counsel the matter could not rest there—that the valuers must be put into the box to explain their reports; that they should be examined and cross-examined; confronted with the evidence given by the experts employed by the parties; and that thus they might become discredited and cheapened and their whole worth as independent witnesses seriously affected. Some of these consequences need not, I think, ensue, as I shall state presently. But, Mr. M'Mordie's general view is undoubtedly based upon reasons of weight, and I own I should be glad if it were possible to be enabled to avail ourselves of the assistance of men as skilful and trustworthy as we believe our valuers to be, given to us in absolute confidence. Nevertheless, I feel, as I felt during the delivery of Mr. Holmes's argument, that to any lawyer trained in our ideas of jurisprudence his reasons are absolutely irresistible. In truth, our whole forensic system is one of publicity and openness. Litigants never would endure that their rights should be decided upon, and their property affected for secret and undisclosed reasons. Mr. Holmes put it even in a stronger point of view. However honest and careful the valuers may be, their reports may contain fallacies which might pass undetected by a judge, but which might not escape the more sharpened eye of an advocate. Is the judge then to decide, at the risk of being misled, without having obtained that assistance which, if afforded in the usual way by the professional men of either side, might have preserved him from error? No judge could, I think, feel quite at his ease in so deciding. This observation is made all the stronger by the words of the section, enabling the judge to direct the valuer to report facts and circumstances to enable the Commission to form a judgment as to the subject matter of the report. Further, we must look to the matter and grounds of our judgment as pronounced from the Bench. If we profess to go upon the sworn evidence, omitting all reference to the reports of our valuers, whereas in fact and truth those reports are to some extent what we go by, our judgments are unreal and illusory. If we refer to them at all, we, as it were, embody them, and could not on any principle refuse to give the parties the opportunity of judging whether our statement of their contents were right or wrong. But lastly, there is the all powerful authority of precedent. The provision in question contains nothing new. It has been a very common experience in our courts that a judge, hesitating between the conflicting evidence of experts, has referred the matter to some independent skilled person. The rules promulgated under the Irish Chancery Act, 1867, contain an express provision for that purpose. Every lawyer who has practised in Chancery must have in his memory cases in which this course has been adopted. Now, it never was thought of that the reports or certificates should be kept secret, and be seen by the judge alone. They are part of the proceedings kept for record in the office, copies given to the solicitors, and briefed to counsel. And here I revert to Mr. M'Mordie's argument as to the cross-examination of the valuers on oath, which he said would be the necessary consequence of disclosing their reports. In my opinion it need not be so. It certainly is not so in the cases I have referred to of similar references made by the supreme court. I put to Mr. Holmes a question, namely, supposing that we had acceded to his application, at what period of the proceedings he thought it would be most convenient to furnish the reports. He said he thought it would be quite satisfactory if the reports were given to the parties at the close of the evidence, so that the advocates might have an opportunity of commenting on them in their address to the court. In this view I concur. We shall, therefore, permit copies to be taken of the reports by the respective solicitors, and we will hear counsel address us in all these cases of Mrs. Dunseath to-morrow morning. Our valuers, I may mention, are Mr. Gray, an English gentleman long connected with land in this country, both as an agent and as a farmer, and Mr. Murrrough O'Brien, who is at the head of the purchase and sale department of the Land Commission, and who, during a long period of service under the Church Commission, has had large experience in the valuing of land. Mr. O'Brien's services as valuer can, of course, be only temporary, as his own department has paramount claims upon him.

LITTON, Q.C.—It is right it should be understood that Mr. Murrrough O'Brien has not undertaken the duty of making these valuations except at the instance of the Court. He has not for that purpose given up the office which he at present holds in Dublin. With regard to the reports, I entirely concur in the propriety—and I might almost say the necessity—of handing these reports to the parties before finally adjudicating on the cases. I am equally clear that it would be utterly impossible to call these gentlemen who gave their reports to be placed in the witness box or submit to cross-examination. That is a course that has never been adopted in the practice of Equity Courts, and it is a course that we are not prepared under any circumstances to approve of.

MR. VERNON.—I am bound to dissent from that view on these grounds—that I do not see how it is possible that counsel ought to have before them a document with which they are to deal without the party who has furnished that document having the opportunity of explaining, and of giving others the opportunity of cross-examining him. I believe that the cross-examination of a witness is the essence of his testimony; and believing that, I think they should be cross-examined, or that their reports should be considered as the private report of the Assessor of the Court. I entirely take Mr. M'Mordie's view of this subject, and I believe that cross-examination will be found eventually to follow.

LAND SUB-COMMISSION.

(Before ROMNEY FOLEY, Q.C., LAURENCE DOYLE, Barrister-at-Law, and JAMES HOWLIN, Esqrs.)

SMITH v. COLLEY.

Jan. 1, 2, 8, 1882.—Determination of judicial rent—Definition of tenant—Sub-letting without landlord's consent—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 57, not retroactive—Evidence of value—Tenant's valuers uncontradicted—Independent valuations by Assistant Commissioners ultra vires.

A tenant who has sub-let portion of his holding, and delivered over the occupation thereof, under circumstances which did not amount to a default up to the passing of the Land Law Act, 1881, but in the exercise of the right incident to his tenure at the time of the passing of that Act, is not precluded from applying to the court to have a judicial rent determined, notwithstanding the definition of "tenant" given in section 57, with the clause thereto added, in reference to sub-letting, which provision is not to be construed as retroactive.

Where no evidence of value is given save by the tenant's valuers, there being no conflict of testimony, the Assistant Commissioners are not obliged and ought not to go beyond the evidence so adduced, and should not make an independent valuation of the land upon their own judgment for the purpose of determining a judicial rent.

Application, by tenant, to fix judicial rent of holding, consisting of 265a. Or. 22p. statute; present rent, £247 4s. 6d.; poor law valuation, £162. The general circumstances appearing are sufficiently explained in the judgment; and in reference to the point as to subletting, the tenant deposed as follows:—I have a carpenter occupying a house on the farm. He holds a rood of land. He pays me £4 a year, and I have to keep the house in repair for him. I give him the grazing of a sheep, two goats, and an ass, in addition to the house, for £4 a year. He works for me and other people. When I got possession in 1848, the place was set to this carpenter, and continued so up to the present time. Mr. Enos Morris, the sub-agent, was aware of the sub-letting all the time, and he never made any objection on the part of the landlord. By the agreement for the sub-letting, produced on the part of the tenant, it appeared that the premises occupied by the carpenter were vacant in 1879.

Miles Kehoe, for the tenant.

T. P. Law, Q.C., for the landlord.—This application should be dismissed, inasmuch as the tenant, having sub-let portion of his holding, without the consent of his landlord, has no claim under the Land Law Act, 1881. No doubt the amount sub-let was very small, but still the principle is the same as if there had been a large sub-letting. One of the most startling changes effected by the new law is the 15th section of the Act. Under the Act of 1870, when a tenant's lease terminated, or he was evicted, all the sub-tenancies fell with it, but under the 15th section of the Act of 1881, when the tenant's interest terminates, the sub-tenants become immediate tenants to the landlord: the result being that were it necessary to evict Mr. Smith in this case for non-payment of rent, the carpenter would remain a direct tenant to the landlord. The Legislature may not have contemplated this in passing the 15th section, but it is one of the results, and, therefore, it becomes vital to the landlord to urge on the Court the position in which he was placed. By s. 57 the person who comes into Court to claim the benefit of the Act must, at the time of his coming into Court, be a "tenant," who is defined as a person "occupying" land, &c.; and this construction derives greater force from the clause added to that definition, that a tenant sub-letting with consent shall still be deemed in occupation. But here no consent to the sub-letting is shown, and the tenant is not in occupation. It will be argued that the section operated prospectively, but we rely on section 2 to dispose of that contention, expressly contemplating the future when enacting that a tenant "shall not" sub-divide his holding without the consent the landlord, in writing, when the tenancy is from year to year. Again, it may be sought to make out that the consent of the landlord had virtually been given to the sub-letting, because he had not brought an ejectment against the tenant. If he had, it would be deemed a case of most capricious eviction under the Act of 1870. Mr. Smith had a very easy remedy. He could get rid of the carpenter, and then come before the Court in proper form at the next or a future sitting; but as he stands at present, we submit that the Court has no jurisdiction, and that this application to fix a judicial rent should be dismissed. We shall rest our case on this point, and will not go into any evidence, lest in case of an adverse decision, it might prejudice our rights of appeal.

Miles Kehoe, in reply.—As regards the alleged startling changes effected by the 15th section of the Act of 1881, it would be a much more startling thing if a little holding of half a rood of garden could affect the rights of a man in respect of a holding of 265 acres, and drive him out of Court. This 57th section can have no application to the present case. At common law the tenant had a right to sub-let his holding; for a while that right was abrogated by the sub-letting Acts; those Acts were repealed; and at the date of the passing of the Land Law Act, 1881, it was the right of every tenant to sub-let his holding in the absence of agreement to the contrary. Therefore, this clause in the 57th section, if construed as the landlord contends, takes away a right, or rather imposes a penalty on the tenant, who exercises the right which he previously had. It is an elementary rule of construction that penal statutes or clauses in a statute must be strictly construed; but here it is contended that a tremendous penalty is inflicted, not by express direct enactment but by an implication that the tenant is forbidden to sub-let, alleged to arise from the obscure terms of a definition clause in the Act. Further, this being a section not affecting procedure but the vested rights of parties, it is not retrospective but prospective only. The case of Chute v. Busted (16 Ir. C. L. R. 222), which went to the Exchequer Chamber, and was decided on the 3rd section of the Act of 1860, is important to show that the clause now in question cannot have a retrospective effect. Even assuming it was retrospective, the landlord's agent was aware of the sub-letting; the rent was received with knowledge of it; and there is nothing in the section requiring the consent to be in writing. The Commissioners are entitled and bound to look to the general purpose of the Act, and to decide if possible in accordance with it, and it would be an astounding thing if the first result of this Act were to be that probably ten thousand farmers, in order to qualify themselves to come in here, should begin by making clearance of all their tenants, and turning at least ten thousand poor families forth upon the world.

Decision deferred.

Mr. Foley, Q.C.—In this case, in which Mr. H. F. Colley is landlord, and Mr. Arthur Smith, Collinstown, tenant, the holding contains 265 a. Or. 22 p. statute measure, the annual rent being £247 4s. 6d., and the poor law valuation, £162. It appeared in evidence that Mr. Smith succeeded his uncle in the occupation of the lands in 1848, Mr. Colley having become the purchaser of the property in 1846. In 1861, on the falling in of a lease, the rent was raised from £204 12s. 4d. to £247 4s. 6d.—say an increase of about £40. These facts, as I have already said, were stated by the tenant in his evidence. On being cross-examined by Mr. Law, the tenant frankly admitted that a carpenter named John Langan occupied a house and one rood of land on the premises by virtue of an agreement or contract in writing, dated 29th April, 1879, at an annual rent of £4. Mr. Law thereupon submitted that the claim of the tenant should be dismissed, inasmuch as he had sub-let a portion of his holding without the consent of the landlord, and that therefore he had no claim as a tenant under the Act of 1881. Mr. Smith's remedy, counsel contended, was first to get rid of the carpenter, and then come before the Court in proper form at a future sitting. We invited Mr. Law (subject to the legal question) to give evidence as to what would be a fair rent for this holding, but he preferred to rest his case upon the legal point raised, lest, in the event of an adverse decision by us, he might be prejudiced in his right in case of an appeal. Mr. Kehoe, for the tenant, submitted that the 57th section of the statute was inapplicable to the facts of the case, and should be construed with reference to acts of future and prospective sub-lettings; that the consent of the landlord was not required, and that his client was entitled to the full benefits of the Act. The question is plainly one of the greatest moment. It is raised, I believe, for the first time by Mr. Law, on behalf of the landlord.* It will, or may affect the rights of a large portion of other tenants in the community; consequently it has received, as it was entitled to receive, from me a most careful, anxious, and respectful consideration. The contention for the landlord is presented in this way: By the 57th section of the Land Act, 1881, a tenant is defined to be a person occupying land; and for the purpose (as I conceive) of enlargement, not of restriction, this provision is subjoined—"Where he sub-lets part of his holding with the consent of his landlord he shall be deemed to be still in occupation." Are these words necessarily retrospective, as they must be in order to create an incapacity or disability in the tenant who sub-let a portion of his holding at a time when, according to the then state of the law, this tenant had as good a right to sub-let a part of his holding as the landlord (if owner in fee) had to sell the estate? At the best the words are ambiguous, and susceptible, if you choose, of either interpretation. The rule of construction to be applied is stated in the case of Chute v. Bustard, decided in the Exchequer Chamber, in which Mr. Justice Christian said—"I confess I do not see anything to entitle this statute (Deasy's Act) to exemption from the ordinary rule of construction; none of its sections are retrospective, unless expressly made so by the Act." In reason and good sense why should it be held otherwise? Under the then existing state of the law, which was always recognised until interrupted by the sub-letting Acts, the right of a tenant to sub-let, unless he was restrained by a condition or covenant in a lease or agreement against sub-letting, was as clear as the proprietary right of the landlord himself. Lord Eldon was so averse to restrictions of sub-letting as to hold them to the very letter of the contract. The tenant in this case was in no default when the Land Act of 1881 was passed, and therefore I am of opinion that the act of sub-letting with consent could only apply to some act of sub-letting to the validity and efficacy of which the landlord's consent was material, and cannot have reference to an act of sub-letting which was an incident to the independent right and tenure of the tenant at the time when this Act was passed. Let us pause for a moment to consider the vast consequences of Mr. Law's contention, and the extent to which its success would invade the remedial policy of the Land Act of 1881. Under circumstances similar to the present, the tenant's right to sell under section 1 would be forfeited. According to section 5, sub-section 3, sub-letting without written consent on the part of the landlord is forbidden as a condition of a statutory lease and the fixing of a judicial rent; but, under the 13th section of the Act the breach of this condition may be atoned and condoned for if the Land Commission consider that the tenant may be justly and safely relieved from it. Is it to be argued that a tenant, who was in no default when he exercised his undoubted right of property by sub-letting, is to be held to be incapacitated and disabled from obtaining a statutory lease at a judicial rent? In the House of Lords Lord Cairns has declared that the words of a will, contract, or even of a statute, may be rejected if a literal construction of them would lead to a manifest repugnancy and incongruity.† At all events, I have carefully looked to see if the words would admit of a construction consistent with the policy of the Land Act. For these reasons, I may state that I am not of Mr. Law's opinion as to the construction of the measure, and I therefore hold that the tenant is well entitled to a statutory lease, and to have a fair rent fixed; and the question may arise, what was our mode of fixing it. In this case (among others) Mr. Law, on the part of the landlord, declined to go into evidence, and we are consequently left without any evidence of the value of the land, except that which was given on behalf of the tenants. Under these circumstances, inasmuch as there is no conflict of testimony in these cases, Mr. Doyle and I are of opinion that the Sub-commissioners are not obliged, and ought not to go beyond the evidence adduced before them, and should not make an independent valuation of the land upon their own judgment for the purpose of determining a fair rent. The judicial rent which we have fixed (£187 16s.) is, accordingly, based on the uncontradicted evidence of the tenant's valuers, on which, in our view of the matter, we are bound to act, and is not to be considered as fixed upon our own opinion of the absolute value of the holding. Each party to pay costs. Game to be reserved to the landlord. Our general observations are, that the rents on this estate were increased in many instances in or about 1861, a time at which the country enjoyed a great amount of agricultural prosperity. In consequence of remarks which were made during the hearing of these cases, we feel called upon to notice the fact that although the landlord of this estate is non-resident, yet he seems to have always taken a great interest in the well-being of his tenantry. Sums varying from £75 downwards were given at five per cent. to several of the tenants for building and other purposes; to others, slates, timber, &c., were given. On the bog-lands, main drains were opened at the landlord's expense; and a school-house was also built on the property. It has appeared in evidence that an income of from £40 to £80 a year had been received by the landlord from the sale of turf, yet he voluntarily gave this right up for fear the bogs should be cut out, and the tenants—who are permitted to have turf free of charge—be left at any future time without that advantage. Having made inquiries as the dwellings of labourers on the property, we have been informed that the landlord has set apart several houses, with small allotments, for that purpose, which are let at low rents, and are kept in repair free of charge. We consider that these observations are due to Mr. Colley, because it has been stated that he is a non-resident landlord.

SMITH v. COLLEY.

Mr. DOYLE concurred.

Mr. HOWLIN.—My colleagues are of the opinion expressed in the judgment just delivered, that they have no alternative but to fix a rent in accordance with the evidence placed before them by valuers on behalf of the tenants. Being both gentlemen possessed of high legal attainments, it would ill become me to venture to express an opinion contrary to their views, but as to what is my own duty in the matter I feel no doubt. In my opinion, my duty is to aid in fixing, in each case, as the judicial rent that which I believe to be the best of my own judgment to be a fair one to both landlord and tenant on "live and let live" principles, and which may remain unchanged for fifteen years. I have inspected both these farms, and I must say I cannot agree in the view taken by the valuers on the tenants' part as to what would constitute a fair rent for them. The majority of the Court having decided otherwise, I abstain from expressing my opinion as to what would be a fair rent, particularly as the cases will probably come before a higher tribunal. I merely wish to mention that in determining the rents in these three cases I have taken no part.

Order accordingly.

Dec. 20, 1881; Jan. 2, 1882.—Town park, what constitutes—Accommodation land—Holding not let for that purpose—User as such—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

In order to constitute a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49), section 58, sub-section 2, it is not necessary that it should be shown by affirmative evidence that the holding was originally let and taken quod accommodation land, provided that the actual user of the holding was as accommodation land. Lord Dunally v. Hodgins, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 181, and Chism v. Beatty, 10 ib. 93, discussed. Wilson v. Earl of Antrim, 8 Ir. L. T. 501, applied.

Applications, by tenants, to fix judicial rents.—In the case firstly above entitled, the tenant, a carter, said he held the farm in question (39a. 29p.; rent £15; valuation £7) within half a mile of Manorhamilton, with another holding; it had been originally held by his father, and since his death by the tenant and his brother, who used to get receipts for the two holdings, at £19 upon the one receipt. In 1857 the tenant got separate receipts, but his rent was raised to £13. Lord Leitrim, the former landlord, used himself to receive the rents, and with each receipt a tenant got a notice to quit. In 1870, after the Land Act passed, his receipt was made out for Ross, a town park. In 1876 he got notice that his rent would be raised £2 per year. Accordingly, next November when he went to pay his rent he was asked to pay £15. He demurred, as the land was not worth it, and Lord Leitrim told him if he would not pay the increased rent to give up possession. After argument the tenant finally paid the increased rent. Lord Leitrim then told his clerk to draw up an agreement by which the tenant was bound to take the holding at the increased rent and as a town park, but the tenant refused to sign it. About ten days after, the tenant received an order from the bailiff to attend at his office. He attended, and was presented with an agreement which he was asked to sign. He again refused, and was again threatened with eviction, so he signed it. The agreement was produced. It consisted of three pages of closely printed small type, and the tenant on signing it deprived himself of the benefits of the Ulster custom or any other benefits which he might have under the Land Act of 1870, compensation or otherwise. He also had to bind himself to take the lands as town parks. He was not allowed to erect buildings or keep sporting dogs, and would be fined £3 if he kept a goat.

Michael M'Gowan valued the yearly letting at £8 2s. 6d., and Patrick Gilgan at £8.

Mr. Stewart, agent of the property, said he would give the lands at the old letting, £13. When Colonel Clements succeeded to the estate he (witness) was told to make a re-valuation of the estate, and reduce the rents where necessary. This re-valuation was nearly completed. He would not depend on the agreement to make the lands town parks, but would let it rest on the evidence.

Mr. Gore Dacre Cochrane, agent and farmer, valued the lands at £13 yearly.

In the case secondly above entitled the circumstances were similar, save that the tenant, while living in the town, carried on a trade therein in leather and groceries.

The acreage of her holding (about 400 yards from the town) was 39a. 29p.; rent, £56; valuation, £25 5s.

Decision deferred.

Mr. ROCHE.—In these cases, I have reserved judgment for the purpose of considering whether the lands are town parks within the meaning of section 58 of the Land Law Act, 1881, and as such excluded from its benefits so far as regards fixing a judicial rent. In the first case, it appeared that Thady M'Gowan, the present tenant, and Denis, his brother, were in occupation of two farms, one of them the farm at present in dispute, and the other the adjoining farm, as tenants from year to year of the then Lord Leitrim, in the year 1851. In that year and up to 1857, joint receipts were given for the two holdings; but in that year, the late Lord Leitrim having come into his estate in 1855, a separate receipt was given for the holdings, and the rent raised.—Thady M'Gowan being treated as tenant of the farm now in dispute, Denis M'Gowan retaining the adjoining farm. There has been no change in Thady M'Gowan's tenancy since, save successive additions being made to his rent by the late Lord Leitrim. In May, 1877, an agreement was forced upon the tenant by the then Earl of Leitrim, by which the tenant acknowledges the holding to be a town park. That agreement, I should, for my part, have been inclined to treat as a nullity on the ground of its having been obtained by duress, but it was not necessary for the Court to decide the point, as Colonel Clements, the present landlord, acting with that high sense of honour and fairness which has marked his dealings with his tenantry in all cases which have come before me, has waived any rights he might have acquired by that document, and rests his case here on the simple fact as to whether these cases are or are not town parks, independent of any estoppel on the tenant's part. The tenant admittedly lives in the town of Manorhamilton, and is by trade a carter. The lands are situate about 700 yards from the town. Such being the facts, let us see do they fall within the definition of town parks. Baron Fitzgerald, in Lord Dunally v. Hodgins, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 181, lays down that there are three requisites for a town park—the first, that the land should adjoin a city or town, which requisite this holding certainly does comply with; second, that it should bear an increased value, as accommodation land, over and above the ordinary letting value of lands occupied as a farm in the neighbourhood. Now it is on this point, and this point only, that I entertained any doubt in this case—can it be said this is accommodation land?—and this doubt rose from the further definition given by Baron Fitzgerald in Lord Dunally v. Hodgins. He defines accommodation land to mean “land taken by persons living in a city or town for the accommodation of their residence.” Now, does this mean that we should hold no case to be a town park in which there is not affirmative evidence of the lands having been taken for the purpose of accommodation lands? I think not. In Chism v. Beatty, 10 Ir. L. T. Rep. 93, Don. 506, Chief Baron Falkner, after referring to and approving of the definition given in Lord Dunally v. Hodgins, says:—“I am not satisfied that the farm in question was taken or used for this purpose, and I am of opinion that the value the lands bear is to be attributed not to any particular purpose for which they have been taken or used but to the locality in which they are situate, and that such value is their ordinary value as a farm.” In this judgment the learned Chief

DAVIS v. EARL OF ARRAN.

Baron evidently supplements the definition in Lord Dunally v. Hodgins by the use of the words "or used." Indeed, the inconveniences which would otherwise arise are manifest. How is proof to be given of what the intention of the parties was who first made the contract? It may have been made forty or fifty years ago. Who shall say that the original contracting parties intended the lands, at the period of letting, to be used as accommodation or not? In fact if this be the law, it is virtually impossible to prove that such a thing as a town park exists in Ireland; and this portion of the Land Act is a dead letter. Besides, are we not coerced by the strong and plain language of Mr. Justice Keogh in Wilson v. The Earl of Antrim, 8 Ir. L. T. 501: "No doubt, years ago, when there was nothing there but Glenarm Castle, there could be no such thing as a town park in existence there, but the world is every day progressing, and lands that were not town parks 200 years ago might become town parks by the fact of a town growing up about them." For these reasons the question I put is in the language of the Chief Baron in Chism v. Beatty—Was this farm taken or used for the purpose of the accommodation of a residence in a town or city? I answer that it was so used; as to whether it was so taken I have no reliable evidence. The third requisite is that the lands should be in the occupation of some person living in the city or town. This the tenant admittedly is. In his case, therefore, I find all the requisites of a town park. That the lands should be "ordinary termed town parks" is not a requisite but merely an explanatory expression: per Fitzgerald, B., in Lord Dunally v. Hodgins. I, therefore, declare the lands to be a town park, and, as such, we have no power to fix a judicial rent, and the originating notice must be dismissed.

In Mary Algeo's case the facts are simpler. The tenant, or her predecessor, seem always to have resided in the town, where she carries on a trade in leather and groceries. There is no doubt the lands were used for accommodation of the residence in the town, and bear an increased value in consequence. The distance is about 400 yards from Manorhamilton. This case must be dismissed on the same grounds as the other.

DAVIS v. EARL OF ARRAN.

Dec. 7, 1881.—Town park—Accommodation land—Increased value—Rent receipts—Office books—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

A tenant, a retired grocer, who farmed over 200 acres, held land adjoining the town of Donegal, but in a different townland. He lived in the town and used the land for grazing cattle, brought from his other farms. The words "park" and "town park" had appeared, under protest from him, in the rent receipts since 1871. The lands were described as "town parks" by means of a pencil entry in the rental dated 1st November, 1857:

Held, that, there being no sufficient evidence that the lands bore any increased value as accommodation lands over and above the letting value of an ordinary farm near the town, the holding was not a town park within the meaning of the section 58 (2) of the Land Law Act, 1881.

Application to have judicial rent fixed for the lands of Mullins, containing 4a. 3r. 35p., statute measure; present rent £6 18s. 6d.; valuation, £4.

The facts, as they appeared in evidence, are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Mr. Mecready, solicitor, for the tenant, cited Gallagher v. Earl of Arran, Don. Rep. 586; Boyd v. Graham, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 104, Don. Rep. 406.

Kisbey, for the landlord.

Decision deferred.

Mr. Bourke.—James Davis, the applicant in this case, resides in the town of Donegal, has been a farmer all his life, and is now farming over 200 statute acres. He also had for about 20 years a grocer's shop in Donegal, but he retired from business about five years ago. In the year 1851 he took 4a. 3r. 35p. known as Mullins, situate about half a mile from Donegal, outside the boundary of the town, and in a different townland from the Town of Donegal. The yearly rent in 1851 was £3 10s., which rent has since been raised to £6 18s. 6d. According to the evidence before us, when James Davis took this land it was waste land, partly used as a brick-field, and James Davis drew soil to it, filled up the holes, levelled and drained it, and has since used it for feeding bullocks and young stock in summer, and as a winterage; the stock going to or coming from his other farms.

By the agency books produced it appears that the lands were described in Lord Arran's Rental as "Mullins" up to 1854; the Rental of 1855 is mislaid, but in the Rental of 1856 the heading for these lands, together with other lands, on some of which tenants reside, is changed from "Mullins," and is given as "Town Parks;" and this is continued up to the present time. In the receipts given to James Davis the words "his holding" were always used until 1870, but in 1870 they were changed to "Mullins," and in 1871 to "Mullins' Park," and in 1872 to "Mullins' Town Park," against which Mr. Davis is admitted to have protested several times.

The lands are undoubtedly in the occupation of James Davis, who lives in Donegal, they adjoin or are near to Donegal, and the only questions we have to decide are: whether these lands are such as are ordinarily termed town parks, and do they bear an increased value as accommodation lands over and above the ordinary letting value of lands occupied as a farm?

We have no evidence on either side that these lands were known as "Town Parks," except this alteration in the heading on the Rental, from 1856 to the present time, and the alteration in the form of receipts already alluded to, and objected to by James Davis. No further evidence is given that these lands were ordinarily known as "Town Parks," and, therefore, we do not consider this conclusive evidence. We have, therefore, to make out from the rest of the evidence is or is not this a town park?

Are these accommodation lands let at an amount over and above the ordinary letting value of lands occupied as a farm? It is not sufficient that they should bear an increased value because they are in the neighbourhood of a town; they must bear increased value as accommodation land; that is, land taken by a person residing in the town for the accommodation of his residence: Lord Dunally v. Hodgins, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 181, Don. Rep. 465. On the evidence, it appears that when these lands were taken, they were used as a brick-field, portion of them were levelled and drained by James Davis, were kept by him in grass, were not used for grazing cows for milking purposes, but were kept for accommodation land for feeding stock brought from other farms, and that it was not until 1870 that James Davis, after he had filled up the brick-holes and drained the field, was told that Lord Arran considered it to be a "town park."

The original letting value of this field of 4a. 3r. 35p. statute was 70s., and no increase was put on it until 1859, being the time when Lord Arran commenced a general increase of rent on his estate. Was this rent of 70s. an increased rent as accommodation taken by a person residing in the town for the benefit of his residence? We think the lands do bear an increased value, but we are of opinion that this is to be attributed, not to any particular purpose for which they may have been taken or used, but solely to the locality in which they are situate, and that such value is their ordinary value as a farm; and, therefore, we decide that these

BIGGER v. SHEIL.

Nov. 29, Dec. 2, 1881.—Town park—Accommodation land—Sale by previous tenant—Holding described in lease as “park or field”—Land Law Act, s. 58 (2).

A tenant in 1864 purchased a holding, within the town boundary of Ballyshannon, not generally known or ordinarily called in the locality a town park, but described in a lease of 1838 as a “park or field.” The land was used as accommodation land by the tenant, a butter merchant, living in the town:

Held, a town park within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

Application to have a judicial rent fixed of a holding in lands of Coolcolly, containing 8 acres 3 roods, statute measure; present rent, £18 2s. 10d.; valuation, £9 15s. 0d.

The material facts were as follows:—The holding, distant half a mile from Ballyshannon, was stated to be within the town boundary, and rates had been collected upon it as town rates since 1860. The tenant had been in occupation for 17 years, and gave £15 for his interest without the knowledge of the landlord. The tenant was a butter merchant, and lived in the town of Ballyshannon. He used the lands in connexion with his business as accommodation lands, mainly for grazing cattle, but had broken up and tilled about 3 roods. None of the land was broken up when he got it, but there was evidence that within the last 65 years it had been used for tillage, meadow, and grazing. The lands were not generally known as, nor ordinarily called town parks, but appeared as such in the rate collector's books. In a lease (the lessor's interest in which had been purchased in the Court of Bankruptcy by the landlord), dated 1st November, 1838, and produced in Court, the lands of which the holding formed a part were described as a park or field, and in the advertisements of the sale in bankruptcy they were called “town parks.” Two witnesses, produced by the tenant, fixed £10 to £11 as their estimate of the fair rent, but it was admitted that some land close by produced as much as £4 or £5 per acre yearly.

Mr. Macredy, solicitor, for the tenant, cited Daly v. Scott, Don. Rep. 388; Boyd v. Graham, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 104, Don. Rep. 406; Gallagher v. Earl of Arran, Don. Rep. 536; Adams v. Jones, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 74, Don. Rep. 414.

and Boyd v. Graham did not apply, as the tenant resided on the holding; he relied on the lease of 1838,

Kisbey, for the landlord, cited Christy v. Gordon, 13 Ir. L. T. Rep. 79.

Decision deferred.

Mr. Bourke.—This holding consists of 8 acres 3 roods, and the rent is £18. Alexander Bigger, the tenant, has applied to have his rent fixed, and Dr. Sheil has asked us to dismiss the application on the ground that this holding is excluded from the Act by reason of its being a town park.

We have seen the lands, and we have looked into the cases cited, and have carefully considered the definitions of town parks given in the Land Act of 1870, the Land Law Act of 1881, the judgment of Chief Baron Palles in Chism v. Beatty, 10 Ir. L. T. Rep. 93, Don. Rep. 507, and in De Moleyns's Land Owners' and Agents' Practical Guide, 229. On the evidence before us, we have come to the conclusion that this holding fulfils the requirements necessary to constitute town parks. We, therefore, decide that this holding is a town park, and dismiss the application with costs.

It is right, however, to say that one of the Assistant Commissioners has a doubt in the matter, and would be glad if a further decision was taken on this case.

Application dismissed with costs.

MULLIN v. LAVENS.

Jan. 11, 17, 1882.—Originating notice to fix judicial rent—Holding formerly held under lease for 21 years, expiring November 1, 1880—Reclamation—Building and drainage works executed by tenant during continuance of the lease and subsequently—Land Law Act, 1881, ss. 7, 8, (9).

Where land was held under a lease for years containing a covenant on the part of the lessee for the execution of works of reclamation and drainage, and works of this description were carried out during the continuance of the lease and subsequent to its expiration:

Held, that such works were, to the extent covenanted for, to be treated as having been executed under the covenant, and therefore to be excluded from consideration on the question as to determining a judicial rent under the Land Law Act, 1881.

Application to have a judicial rent fixed in respect of a farm of land in Clare, Co. Tyrone, containing about 39 acres, held by Mullin as a yearly tenant, subject to a rent of £47 per annum.

From the evidence given it appeared that the late Alice Mullin had for some years, prior to 1860, held these lands as yearly tenant, at a rent of £44 per annum. At that time the bulk of the buildings now on the holding were erected. In the year 1860 an arrangement was entered into, by which a lease of the holding for 21 years, from 1st November, 1859, at a rent of £47, was agreed to be accepted. Accordingly, a lease dated the 9th March, 1860, from John Lavens to Alice Mullin, widow, and Peter Mullin, was executed, demising all that farm of land, messuage, and premises in the townland of Clare, Co. Tyrone, containing 40 acres, statute measure, or thereabouts, for a term of 21 years, from the 1st of November, 1859, at a yearly rent of £47. It reserved all timber, trees, minerals, quarries, freestone, lime, sand, gravel, &c., and game, to the landlord, and contained the following covenants on the part of the lessees:—“And also, that they, the said Alice Mullin and Peter Mullin, their executors, administrators, and assigns, shall and will, within the space and time of six years, from the said 1st November, 1860, fence, hedge, drain, improve, and reclaim a portion of the premises hereby demised, containing about six acres of cut-out bog, being part of the premises hereby demised, and make good pasture land or arable land of the same, and otherwise improve and manage the said piece or parcel of cut-out bog and premises during the residue of the term hereby granted, in a good and husbandlike manner, and shall and will sufficiently maintain and repair, amend, and keep in good and substantial order all buildings, windows, doors, fixtures, hedges, gates, ditches, drains, or fences, when and so often as need shall be;” and also a covenant, at the end of the term thereby granted, “to leave and yield up the premises and every part thereof, and all improvements made, and to be made thereon, in good and sufficient order, repair, and condition." The tenant and his witnesses deposed to additional buildings having been erected on the land, and to drainage and fencing works having been executed during the past twenty years; and on the part of the landlord objection was taken to the reception of such evidence in so far as it dealt with works of any kind done on the farm up to the 1st November, 1880, when the lease expired.

The Commissioners having determined on hearing the evidence, subject to a discussion afterwards on the legal point raised, the evidence was received and in effect proved that about 6½ acres of the farm had been reclaimed by the tenant at an alleged cost of from £10 to £12 per acre, and that a fence costing about £5 had been erected within the last twenty years, and some 4 acres drained many years ago.

[Mr. FITZGERALD.—I must now ask counsel for the landlord to look at sub-section 9 of section 8 of the Land Law Act, 1881, which provides that "no rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under the Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, and for which, in the opinion of the court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessor in title," and then at section 7, paragraph 1; and to consider whether he can contend that the landlord here had a right to have these improvements included in this valuation of the farm for the purpose of fixing a fair rent.]

Smith, for the landlord.—The two sections referred to have no application. They might be held to apply to cases where, there being no special duty cast by the instrument upon a lessee, he had voluntarily made improvements upon his holding during the continuance of the lease, and such improvements were suitable to the farm and calculated to increase its letting value. But here the lessees, by their acceptance of the lease on the 9th of March, 1860, must be held as in law admitting that at that moment all that was then on the farm was the absolute property of the landlord. The question then resolves itself into this: Having taken that lease on that day, what was the position of the lessees on the expiration of the term on the 1st of Nov., 1880, with respect to the premises? Here comes in the consideration which shows not only that the sections of the Act already referred to have no bearing upon the facts of this case, but that every particle of reclamation, beyond three-quarters of an acre, and all the buildings, drainage, and fences proved to have been done, the tenant had no right whatever to have excluded from the value of the holding on his present application. To make this clear it is requisite to point attention to the terms of that lease. [Counsel then quoted them.] I submit that under that lease the tenant was bound at its expiration to hand back to the landlord all the buildings then on it, and also to treat 6 acres of the reclaimed land as having been reclaimed, and all the drainage and fences proved as having been made, done under the special covenant in the lease as one of the considerations for the granting of the lease originally. It has been suggested, on the part of the tenant, that inasmuch as about 4 acres of the 6½ had actually been reclaimed since November, 1880, therefore no part of those 4 acres could be held to be included in the covenant. But this Act is to be administered according to the principles of equity, and one of the first principles of equity is, that he who seeks justice must do justice. The lessee was bound to do certain works during the term of a lease, and by now giving him the benefit of any portion of those works, on the ground that he had done, after the lease expired, what he was bound by covenant to do while the lease subsisted, the Court would be aiding him in taking advantage of his own wrongdoing, and thereby confiscate the property of his landlord. Even on a claim for compensation this case could not be brought under the terms of sect. 7.

Mr. Venables, solicitor, for the tenant, contended that the sections quoted (7 and 8, sub-sect. 9) applied to this case, and that when it was clear that the greater part of this reclamation, drainage, &c., had been carried out after the lease expired the tenant was entitled to have its value treated as an improvement under these sections in which the landlord was not entitled to have any rent fixed; that the work was outside the covenant altogether, and the third paragraph of sect. 7 was strongly in favour of the tenant's view.

Decision deferred.

Mr. FITZGERALD.—On the 9th of March, 1860, a lease of the farm was made to Peter Mullin and his mother for a period of twenty-one years, from 1st November, 1859, at the yearly rent of £47. By this lease the lessees covenanted to retain 6 acres of land, and to yield up possession of the farm at the determination of the term with all improvements thereon. Peter Mullin appears to have reclaimed about 7 acres, and to have executed some other improvements to which he deposed, and all the buildings on the farm are admitted to have been erected by him or his predecessors. With reference to the buildings the landlord has offered no evidence to show what increase (if any) they have made in the letting value of the farm, and the evidence of valuation which he has produced deals with the farm exclusive of the buildings. Therefore, I do not think we are called upon to estimate any rent on the tenant in respect of those buildings, nor have we taken them into consideration. With reference to six acres of the reclamation, which was referred to in the covenant in the lease, I hold that in point of law that improvement forms part of the consideration of the lease, and that at the determination of the same it became the property of the landlord. We shall declare the judicial rent to be £85.

BELL v. M'NALLY.

Dec. 29, 1881.—Practice—Costs—Fees for instructions to plaintiff's solicitor prior to entry of civil bill.

Where the amount sued for by an ordinary civil bill is tendered before the entering of the civil bill, the plaintiff's solicitor is entitled to payment of the prescribed fee for instructions.

This was a civil bill to recover £15 19s. 11d. for the use and occupation of defendant's holding under the plaintiff. The rent was admitted to be due, and was tendered with certain costs to plaintiff's solicitor two days before the entry of the civil bill. The payment was refused on the ground that the costs did not include the fee for instructions, which is set out in the schedule prior to the fee for entry. On the question, whether this fee is properly chargeable, the case came before the Court.

Mr. R. A. Mullan, solicitor, for the plaintiff.

Mr. A. Gartlan, solicitor, for the defendant.

The Judge held that the plaintiff's solicitor was entitled to charge as against the defendant the fee for instructions before the entry of the civil bill, on the ground that it was reasonable, as it was necessary that a solicitor should have instructions to ascertain whether or not the case was one in which a civil bill should be issued, and the fees were graduated in proportion to the sum claimed, and without the fee for instructions the remuneration to the solicitor would be insufficient.

LAND COMMISSION.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH (2).

Jan. 9, 11, 18, 1882.—Judicial rent, determination of—Improvements—Predecessor in title—Lessee continuing in occupation as tenant from year to year—Improvements not compensated for by landlord—Fair rent, how calculated—Decision of Sub-Commission, when subject to review—Costs—L. & T. Act, 1870, s. 4—L. L. Act, 1881, ss. 7, 8 (9), 57.

In determining a fair rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881, section 8, the rent is not to be calculated on improvements effected by the tenant while in occupation of the holding under a lease, though after its determination the nature of his tenancy has been changed by his continuing in possession as tenant from year to year. Murphy v. Mahony, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 87, approved and applied.

Where a lessee has made improvements during the currency of the lease, and on his death devises his interest to a devisee who, instead of surrendering the possession and claiming compensation for the improvements, continues in possession, after the determination of the lease, as tenant under the implied tenancy from year to year, arising from payment of the rent subsequently, and afterwards submits to an increase of rent while he is tenant from year to year, semble, his right to compensation for the improvements effected by the deceased lessee is not extinguished under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870. In such case, in determining a fair rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881, section 8 (9), the rent is not to be calculated on such improvements, having regard to the provisions of section 7 (amending the Act of 1870), the effect of which is that, in construing the Act of 1870, a prior tenant may be deemed the predecessor in title of a subsequent one, if in reality and substance the tenancy is derived by the latter from the former, notwithstanding that, by reason of determination or merger or surrender, the tenancy of the latter may not be strictly the same tenancy that was held by the former. Holt v. Lord Harberton (6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1), Darragh v. Murdock (5 ib. 38, 67), and Milliken v. Hardy (9 ib. 79, Don. Rep. 473), distinguished.

In order to entitle a landlord to claim rent in respect of the improvements made by a tenant or his predecessors in title, on the ground that they have been paid for or otherwise compensated for by the landlord or his predecessors in title, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, section 8 (9), it must appear that something was given or done or foregone by the landlord as an equivalent for the improvements, the mere fact of a tenant's holding under a lease not amounting in itself to compensation for improvements made during the currency of the lease, without any special circumstances: per O'HAGAN, J., and LITTON, Q.C. (Mr. VERNON, dis.).

In calculating what would constitute a fair rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881, the inquiry should be directed to ascertaining what annual sum could a tenant of ordinary capital, skill, and intelligence be reasonably asked to pay one year with another for the holding as it stands, with all its surroundings, regarding the circumstances of the holding and district, and assuming that the landlord had the farm in his own possession to let it to a solvent tenant; but the competition value must be excluded from the estimate, and neither should the personal qualifications, disqualifications, or condition of the occupying tenant be taken into consideration.

The decision of a Sub-Commission in reference to the amount of rent fixed, on a valuation of the holding, will not be subjected to variation on appeal, unless it be shown that the Assistant-Commissioners have erred in point of principle, or were clearly wrong in point of fact, and will not be disturbed for trifling differences as to the amount of rent proper to be determined.

The principle that costs should be awarded to the successful litigant as a general rule, is inapplicable to proceedings under the Land Law Act, 1881; but, where the decision of the Land Commission is appealed from, the appellant, if unsuccessful, should, as a general rule, be visited with the costs of the appeal.

In this case both tenant and landlord appealed from a decision, on an application by the tenant to have a judicial rent fixed, pronounced by Assistant-Commissioners Greer, Baldwin, and Ross, who reduced the rent to £30 15s. from £36 7s. 6d.

The circumstances, so far as material for the purpose of the present report, are sufficiently explained in the judgments.

Holmes, Q.C. (with him Orr and Overend), for the landlord.*

Dodd, for the tenant.

Judgment reserved.

O'HAGAN, J.—This case, the first appeal which has been heard before us, is one of the greatest importance. The holding is not an extensive one, nor does the question of value of itself present much difficulty. But, it so happens that several of the most serious and most debated questions of law which have been mooted on the construction of the Land Act of 1881, require decision in this case. I regard this as a fortunate circumstance, inasmuch as an opportunity will be given not by our decision alone, but, as we trust, by that of the Court of Appeal, of setting some of these questions at rest, and of determining the principles in regard to them upon which our courts must in future act. The facts of the case lie within a short compass. The holding consists of 42a. 1r. 5p. statute measure, which may be divided into two parts, one containing 20a. 2r. 21p. Irish, or a little more than 33a. statute, formerly held under a lease, which expired in 1875, and of about 9 statute acres of bog, taken from time to time by the tenant since the expiration of the lease. In the year 1842 the 20 acres Irish were in the possession of a man named James M'Kee. The landlord was the then Earl of Mountcashel. In that year Lord Mountcashel thought it right to have the holdings of the tenants valued, with the view of granting leases to them. It has chanced that one of the gentlemen engaged in the valuation, Mr. Raphael, survives, and has been a witness in the present case. Mr. Raphael has given us the details of the then valuation, field by field, amounting in the aggregate to £26 11s. 6d. No lease was executed for more than three years afterwards, and, in the meantime, M'Kee built a good house on the

* At the opening of the case, O'Hagan, J., said—We have considered as to what would be the best method, both as regards expedition and a satisfactory result, of hearing those appeals, and we have come to the conclusion that the best way will be to treat them as a rehearing—that is to say, the tenant makes his case, and then the landlord makes his case; but we think it will be better, upon the whole, to dispense with any opening statement. The cases speak for themselves in nine cases out of ten. We shall therefore hear the evidence, and at the conclusion of the case we will hear whatever observations counsel have to make.

holding, partly, as it appears, with the materials of an older and inferior house, which he took down. Although the new house was built two years before the date of the lease, yet it is admitted that the lease was spoken of and contemplated. The lease itself bears date the 2nd of March, 1846. It is from the Earl of Mountcashel to James M'Kee, for the term of 30 years from the 1st of November, 1845, at the rent of £26 11s. 6d. It contains the usual covenants to keep the premises in repair, and to render them up at the end of the term. It contains a covenant against alienation, but no other special clause. In the October of the same year M'Kee sold and conveyed the holding comprised in the lease to John Adams, father of David Adams, the present tenant, for a sum of £240. Adams, the father, died thirteen years ago, and the land came through him to his son. Improvements were made both in the lifetime of the father, and after his death by the present tenant. These improvements consisted of additions to the buildings, and of reclamation of waste lands, and the making of a farm road. The lease expired in November, 1875. Other leases on the estate expired at the same time, and a revaluation took place. Mr. Raphael, who had taken part in the valuation of 1842, was once more the valuer. He valued the lands which had been in lease at £31 17s. 6d., a valuation which, as he stated, excluded all improvements whatsoever, so as to render it a rent which the tenant ought to pay irrespective of the improvements executed upon the holding. Adams had, from time to time, taken portions of bog at rents amounting in the aggregate to £4 10s., so that his rent altogether became £36 7s. 6d., at which amount it stood until the decision of the Sub-Commission, from which this is an appeal. The Sub-Commission fixed the judicial rent at £30 15s., and we have now to decide whether this judicial rent ought to any, and if so, to what extent, to be varied. But, before approaching the question of the fair rent, there arises the discussion of the principles upon which the rent is to be estimated, and first amongst these the controversy how far improvements effected by the tenant are to be excluded in estimating such rent.

Mr. Holmes submitted to us certain legal propositions on the part of the landlord in this and other cases of Mrs. Dunseath, which, as applied to the present case, are as follows:—(1) That the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made previous to the expiration of the lease in 1875, inasmuch as such improvements were not made by the tenant or his predecessors in title. (2) If the court declined to accede to his first requisition, that the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made during the currency of the lease, except those made by the present tenant himself, inasmuch as his predecessors in occupancy were not his predecessors in title. (3) If the court declined to accede to requisitions 1 and 2, then (a) that the landlord was entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made prior to the making of the lease of 1846; and (b) that the landlord is entitled to some rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease, on the ground that, under the 1st clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870, some deduction must be made, in ascertaining the tenant's interest in such improvements, from the value thereof, and upon the further ground that, by holding under lease, he has been, if not altogether, to some extent compensated for his improvements. I now proceed to consider those propositions of law.

Mr. Holmes's first requisition amounts to a demand on the part of the landlord of rent in respect of all improvements made prior to the expiration of the lease of 1845, and the legal ground is that these improvements were not made by the tenant or his predecessors in title. But it was proved in the case, and could not be contested, that some of the improvements were made by David Adams himself, the present tenant. The words of the 9th sub-section of section 8, of the Act of 1881, are that "no rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title." Is it to be seriously argued that David Adams is to be charged with rent in respect of improvements made by himself while in occupation of the land as tenant, because his tenancy under the lease has expired, and he is now in possession under a tenancy from year to year, arising on the termination of the lease? In the course of the argument I called Mr. Holmes's attention to the case of Murphy v. Mahony, decided by Mr. Justice Lawson, and reported in 14 Irish Law Times Reports, 87. That eminent judge held that, under the Act of 1870, changes in the nature of the tenancy did not affect the right of the tenant who had made them to claim for improvements. That decision is an express authority on the construction of similar words in the Act of 1881.

I pass now to the second of Mr. Holmes's propositions, which is of a more serious complexion. He calls on us to hold that the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made during the currency of the lease, except those made by the present tenant himself, upon the ground that his predecessors in occupancy were not his predecessors in title. To sustain this proposition he chiefly relied on the well-known case of Holt v. Lord Harberton, 6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1. That was a case arising under the 6th section of the Act of 1870, which provides that where either a landlord or a tenant is desirous of preserving evidence of improvements made by himself or his predecessors in title, he may register those improvements in the prescribed manner. John Holt had been tenant from year to year to Lord Harberton of 364 acres of land, and in the year 1842 he built a substantial house upon the lands, at a considerable outlay. In the year 1844 Lord Harberton granted him a lease not only of those lands, but of 91 acres in addition, of which Holt had not previously been in possession, and gave him a lease of the entire at a less rent than had been previously paid for the portion he had held; and it was admitted that this lease was so given in consideration of the tenant's outlay in building the house. Holt the lessee, having died, his son, who became entitled to the lease, claimed to register the house as an improvement against the landlord. It was held by the Court of Land Appeal, consisting of eleven judges, that he could not do so. It is a case of the very highest authority, to which every court in this country must explicitly bow, but I am bound to say, it seems to me not to have decided the abstract principle contended for. Lord O'Hagan, the then Lord Chancellor, said that all former title to the lands and the improvements upon them had been surrendered and done away with by the acceptance of the lease, and there was no other title to which the son could be deemed a successor, but the title under it. Unquestionably, under the circumstances of that case, all former title had been surrendered and done away with, it being taken as assumed that the new lease was granted in consideration of the circumstance of the dwelling-house having been erected. Chief Baron Pigot, of whose high legal attainments it is hardly necessary for me to speak, distinctly stated that he based his judgment upon the transactions which occurred when the new lease was granted, and he expressly guarded himself against being supposed to take any general view which would limit the construction of the Act. His words are these—"I do not consider myself at liberty to speculate on the intentions of the Legislature. I am to take what the Legislature has said, when the Act describes the persons by whom the improvements must be made. The statute treats the person claiming as a person who is to have compensation for all improvements upon his holding, made by him or his predecessors in title. Are we at liberty to add to these words the words following, that is to say, 'at a time when he or they held the premises on which the improvements were made, and under the same title under which he holds them when the claim is made? I do not think it necessary to consider and decide that question. I do not consider myself in the present case bound to determine that the statute is to be read as if those or equivalent words had been inserted by the Legislature, which has omitted them in both these sections."

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

There are two other cases to be considered—one prior, and the other subsequent to that case. The former is the case of Darragh v. Murdock, 5 I. L. T. R. 33, 67. It was a claim for compensation for improvements under the Act of 1870. The father and grandfather of Darragh, the claimant, had been in occupation of the farm for nearly one hundred years. Darragh's father held them by a lease for his own life, which expired in June, 1866. The claimant Darragh, the son, on his father's death, entered into possession of the farm, and remained in such possession until November, 1867. In that month an agreement was entered into between Mr. Murdock, on the one hand, and Darragh, and two sureties for him named Kirk and Sloane on the other, by which Murdock agreed to let to the three conjointly the farm for a year certain, from the 1st November, 1867, at the rent of £22 16s. 9d., an increase upon the former rent, they agreeing to give up possession at the end of the year, and to pay for any depreciation of the lands. It was, also, provided that Murdock might at any time enter upon the farm and lay down materials for building. In the month of November, 1868, a similar agreement was made for another year. In November, 1869, a like agreement was also made. In May, 1870, a notice to quit was served, which expired in the November of that year, when an ejectment was brought. Darragh thereupon claimed under the Act of 1870, in respect of improvements made by his father upon the holding. The learned Chairman of the County of Antrim held that he was not entitled to compensation in respect of these improvements on the ground that his father was not his predecessor in title. This decision was upheld by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald on appeal. The latter expressed himself as follows:—"Upon the question of law in this case I entertain no doubt. The claimant is not such a successor as is recognised by the Act. I should be slow to hold that continuity of possession and title would be broken by a mere increase of rent, but this case is wholly different. The claimant's predecessor held under a lease which expired with himself. The claimant then having acquired a tenancy from year to year, entered into a totally new arrangement with the landlord, under which the term and the rent were altered. It is clear that the landlord wanted the farm for building ground, and took it up for this purpose. It was expressly provided by the agreement made in 1867 that the claimant was only to be tenant for a year, and that at the end of the year possession was to be absolutely given up, and the landlord to resume possession, as he had a right to do. To talk of continuity of possession is quite out of the question, as in 1867 a new title in every particular was created." I do not, of course, venture to question the authority of a case so decided. But what is the case? The lease during which the improvements had been executed expired with the life of the lessee who made them, and at no moment of time did the claimant represent or succeed to the title of his father. As the law then stood the lands, with all the improvements upon them, became absolutely vested in the landlord, and the claimant made three successive agreements for taking the lands for a time certain.

I now turn to the case which followed Holt v. Harberton. It is the case of Milliken v. Hardy, also heard before the Chairman of the County Antrim: 9 I. L. T. R. 79. The case was this:—On the 21st April, 1832, Joseph Wallace had executed to William Terlford a lease of the holding for one life or thirty-one years, at the rent of £27 6s. There was a covenant to expend £100 in building a dwelling-house. The estate of Wallace, the lessee, devolved first upon a gentleman named Hill Hamilton, and then upon Mr. Hardy, the respondent. The lessee's interest became vested by assignment in William Walker, and the then landlord, Mr. Hill Hamilton, having obtained judgment against Walker, and issued an execution on foot of this judgment, the lessee's interest in the premises was in 1854 sold by the sheriff to George Milliken, the claimant's testator. In the month of May, 1854, George Milliken took from Mr. Hamilton a new lease for the term of 12 years from 1st November, 1862, at an increased rent of £30 12s. 1d., that increased rent to commence immediately—that is to say, from the 1st May, 1854. George Milliken afterwards died, having bequeathed his farm to Milliken, the claimant. On the termination of the lease in November, 1874, an ejectment was brought, and thereupon a land claim was filed by the tenant claiming in respect of improvements executed by Terlford and his assignees prior to the lease of 1854. The learned chairman, holding that the lease of 1854 operated as a surrender by operation of law of any existing lease, thought the case was governed by the cases of Holt v. Harberton and Darragh v. Murdock. His decision was upheld on appeal by the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas: Don. Rep. 473. "Morris, C.J., held, on the authority of Holt v. Harberton, that the claimant was not entitled to compensation for improvements executed prior to the new lease in 1854. The lessee of the 1832 lease was not the predecessor in title of the present claimant. Predecessor in title does not mean predecessor under another title, but predecessor in the same title."

Now, in this case also the claimant had never for a moment of time been possessed of the estate which existed in the lands at the time the improvements claimed for were made. It was assumed throughout the case that the lease of 1832 was surrendered and gone by the acceptance of the lease of 1854, and the claimant never had any title save to the latter lease alone. But, does it flow from any of these decisions that if a father, the lessee under a lease, makes valuable improvements and then dies, bequeathing the lease to his son, and, if the son, on the termination of the lease, instead of at once surrendering the possession and claiming compensation for the improvements, continues on as tenant under the implied tenancy from year to year, arising from payment of rent after the expiration of a lease, that by his doing so his right to compensation, which undoubtedly existed at the end of the lease, is absolutely gone and forfeited. I confess I do not think such a consequence flows either from the decisions or from any words in the statute of 1870, and I conceive it to be opposed to the spirit and intention of that statute. Then suppose the same person to submit to an increase of rent whilst he is tenant from year to year, would that circumstance make such a difference as to debar him from compensation for the improvements in question? In my opinion, it would not. The tenancy itself is not changed by an increase of rent. I should, therefore, be of opinion that in the present case David Adams might, on quitting his holding, claim compensation in respect of improvements on his holding made by his father as being his predecessor in title. Such is my opinion on the construction of the Act of 1870. And it follows, in my opinion (apart from the question of compensation by the landlord, with which I shall deal hereafter), that under sec. 8, sub-sec. 9, of the Land Act of 1881, no rent should be allowed or made payable in respect of those improvements. But there is a further question, namely—whether the 7th section of the Act of 1881 can be considered as in any way affecting the construction of sec. 8, sub-sec. 9, of the same Act. The 7th section, so far as is material, is as follows:—

"A tenant on quitting a holding of which he is tenant shall not be deprived of his right to receive compensation for improvements under the Landlord and

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

Tenant (Ireland) Act of 1870, by reason only of the determination, by surrender or otherwise, of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made by such tenant or his predecessors in title, and the acceptance by him of a new tenancy.

"Where in tracing a title for the purpose of obtaining compensation for improvements it appears that an outgoing tenant has surrendered his tenancy in order that some other person may be accepted by the landlord as tenant in his place, and such other person is so accepted as tenant, the outgoing tenant shall not be precluded from being deemed the predecessor in title of the incoming tenant by reason only of such surrender of tenancy by him. The court in adjudicating on a claim for compensation for improvements made before any such change of tenancy or of tenants shall take into consideration all the circumstances under which such change took place, and shall admit, reduce, or disallow altogether such claim as to the court may seem just."

This section was plainly intended to meet what was supposed to have been decided in Holt v. Harberton. It purports to provide for the twofold case—first, the case of the determination, by surrender or otherwise, of the tenancy subsisting at the time when the improvements were made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, and the acceptance by him or them of a new tenancy; and secondly, for the case, common especially in Ulster, of a tenancy being transferred, not by assignment, but by surrender of the old tenancy and the creation of a new one in the person of the new tenant. But certainly, if we assume that before the passing of the Act the term "predecessor in title" had acquired a definite construction, and that, according to this construction, no person could be deemed a predecessor in title whose tenancy had determined or been surrendered, and a new tenancy accepted by him before the tenant who claims compensation had become tenant, and if the same construction is to be applied in interpreting section 7, it appears to me that the first paragraph of that section is deprived, not only of all efficiency, but of all meaning. Take a case such as Mullikin v. Hardy. If the same case arose now, and if the claimant relied on the change of the law effected by section 7, he might be answered in this way—"Under section 7, in order to entitle you to claim for improvements, the person by whom the improvements were made must have been your predecessor in title, which the person who made the improvements for which you claim was not." Therefore, to give an intelligible construction to the first paragraph of the section, it is necessary to read the words "predecessors in title" as if they meant "those who, but for such surrender or merger, would have been his predecessors in title," or some words to that effect. The second paragraph is more clearly worded, and under it when a tenant surrenders his tenancy, in order that another may become tenant in his place, the former may be deemed the predecessor in title of the latter, notwithstanding the surrender. It is to be observed that in both paragraphs the words "by reason only" are used, showing that there may be attendant circumstances which might operate to bar the claim for compensation, and the concluding paragraph of the section expressly enacts that all the circumstances under which the change took place shall be taken into consideration towards the admission, reduction, or disallowance of the claim. I am of opinion that the effect of the 7th section taken in its entirety is, that in construing the Act of 1870 a prior tenant may be deemed the predecessor in title of a subsequent one, if in reality and substance the tenancy is derived by the latter, from the former, notwithstanding that by reason of determination or merger or surrender the tenancy of the latter may not be strictly the same tenancy that was held by the former.

We have now to consider what bearing, if any, the 7th section has on the 8th. Sub-section 1 of the 8th section directs that in fixing a fair rent regard shall be had to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively, and to the circumstances of the case, holding, and district. Under that sub-section it is clear that regard must be had to the interest of the tenant in such improvements as he would be entitled to compensation for under the Act of 1870, as amended by section 7 of the Act of 1881. Therefore, if improvements had been made by a person who would not have been deemed a predecessor in title according to the decisions on the Act of 1870 to which I have referred, but who would be deemed such predecessor in title under section 7 of the Act of 1881, the interest of the tenant in those improvements must be had regard to. Then after the intervening sub-sections comes sub-section 9, enacting that no rent should be made payable in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title unless compensated for by the landlord. Are we to read the words "predecessors in title" here in their strict technical signification as if section 7 had not been passed? If so, this consequence would follow: Suppose a tenant to have made improvements, and desiring to sell his tenancy to another, effected such sale by way of assignment, his assignee could not, in fixing a fair rent, be charged with any rent in respect of those improvements; but if, on the other hand, he carried out the sale by the method so common especially in the North of Ireland of having the vendee entered as tenant in the books of the estate, thereby effecting a surrender of his tenancy by act and operation of law, in that case, although the object arrived at was identical, the incoming tenant could be fixed with rent in respect of the improvements of his predecessor, because in strictness of law he was not his predecessor in title. Such it is contended is the construction to be put upon the words "predecessor in title" under sub-section 9 of section 8 of the Act of 1881, although it is conceded that section 7 of the same Act makes it otherwise if compensation were sought for under the Act of 1870. This seems to me to lead to great difficulty. By the last paragraph of s. 57 of the Act of 1881 it is provided that—

"Any words or expressions in this Act which are not hereby defined, and are defined in the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, shall, unless there is something in the context of this Act repugnant thereto, have the same meaning as in the last-mentioned Act; and the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, except in so far as the same is expressly altered or varied by this Act or is inconsistent therewith, and this Act shall be construed together as one Act."

No definition of the term "predecessors in title," is given by either Act, but construing the Acts as one Act, and finding that by section 7 of the Act of 1881, the words "predecessors in title," obtain as regards the Act of 1870, a construction which looks to the substance and reality of the succession, and not its merely technical form, why should we not give the same construction when dealing with the very next section of the Act of 1881. In my opinion, on the soundest principles of the construction of statutes we are at liberty to do so.* Let us suppose that the Act of 1870 had been differently construed, and had been held to embrace (as was suggested by Chief Baron Pigot), not only those who had been in possession of precisely the same estate, but those who had substantially been the predecessors of the claimant in the holding, though the actual tenancy which they held had been determined by surrender and acceptance of a new tenancy, in that case must not a similar interpretation have been put upon the words in section 8, sub-section 9 of the Act of 1881? But if instead of judicial decision we have, in section 7 of the Act of 1881, what is tantamount to a statutory interpretation of the Act of 1870, should not the same principle be applied?

I know it has been stated, and has in the present case been urged as an argument against this view, that such a construction would sweep away from the landlord's rent all improvements that from time immemorial had been executed on the soil, and leave nothing subject to rent, but the waste and unimproved value of the land itself. Such an apprehension appears to me chimerical. In the first place, the fact of the improvements themselves requires to be proved. In the next place, as regards all improvements made before the 1st August, 1870, there are distinct limits placed to the presumption that such improvements were made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, and every thing outside the statutory presumption must be proved, and although a formal surrender and acceptance of a new tenancy would no longer form a break in the title, yet the title, must in reality and substance, be traced from the tenant who executed the improvements, to the tenant who claims in respect of them. I have so far dealt with the improvements made by John Adams, during the currency of the lease, but there are, moreover, the buildings which were erected by M'Kee, before the execution of the lease. If I be right in thinking that the extension of the meaning of the term "predecessors in title" effected by section 7, should be held also to govern sec. 8, subsec. 9, these buildings also should (apart from the question of compensation) be excluded from consideration in fixing a fair rent. But, in truth, having regard to what was admitted as to the offer and expectation of a lease, and to the fact that the valuation of 1849 was plainly made with a view to the granting of leases by Lord Mountcashel, I think it difficult to exclude those buildings from coming under the principles which govern the question of the improvements made during the currency of the lease.

I now come to the second part of Mr. Holmes's third requisition, which raises a question possibly surpassing in importance any other in this case.

He contended that the landlord was entitled to some rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease. He put this in a twofold way. His first ground was that under the first clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870, some deduction must be made in ascertaining the tenant's interest in such improvements, from the value thereof. That would be so as regards improvements made prior to the Act of 1870, if we had only to consider the first sub-section of section 8. But sub-section 9 is peremptory in its terms, and absolutely forbids the allowing of any rent in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, "for which, in the opinion of the Court, he shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title." Mr. Holmes's second ground is that the tenant, by holding under a lease, has been, if not altogether, to some extent compensated for his improvements. The words of the sub-section are, "compensated by the landlord." It is not as under the last clause of the Act of 1870, with respect to improvements prior to that Act (for with such improvements alone does the clause deal), that mere enjoyment of the advantages of the improvements reduces the tenant's claim. Under the Act of 1881 the compensation must emanate from the landlord. In order to enable him to claim rent in respect of the tenant's improvements, he must, so to speak, have bought them from the tenant, paid him for them, or otherwise compensated him. What amounts to such a compensation? It may take a hundred forms, which it would be impossible to enumerate, but it must, I conceive, be something given or done, or foregone, by the landlord as an equivalent for the improvements. We are not called on to decide whether a lease given at a low rent, in order to enable the tenant to improve, might not in some cases be held to be compensation, or whether in the case of tenancies from year to year the landlord's abstention for a considerable period from the exercise of his legal right to evict the tenant or enforce a larger rent from him by menace of eviction might not, in some cases, be deemed compensation by him. Every case of that kind would, I conceive, be governed by its own special circumstances. But when improvements are simply made during the currency of a lease, without any special circumstances, what equivalent is there? It has been said that the giving over, to the tenant, of the soil with its natural powers is in itself a compensation. But could that have been meant by the legislature? If so, the tenant is worse off in this respect, under the Act of 1881, than he was under the Act of 1870; for, under the Act of 1870, enjoyment of the advantages of improvements forms no ground for reduction of the tenant's claim to compensation, as regards improvements effected since that Act. But if the contention now put forward as to the construction of the Act of 1881 be well founded, then, in every case future as well as past, the mere enjoyment of his own improvements would compensate the tenant. Let us take the case of two neighbouring tenants holding under lease for the same term and at the same rent, say £30 a year each. One tenant by industry and outlay effects improvements which make the holding worth £60 a year. The other does not improve at all, and his holding remains worth £30. At the end of the lease is the landlord under this Act to be entitled to assess the improving man at the full letting value of his holding on the plea that he had compensated him? It seems to me that this would simply be a judicial repeal of the clause. In this view Mr. Litton concurs; but I regret to say that our colleague, Mr. Vernon—for whose opinion on all subjects connected with land, indeed I may say all subjects whatsoever, I have learned to entertain the greatest esteem—does not take the same view, and thinks that our construction would work great injustice and hardship upon landlords. It is satisfactory to reflect that the Court of Appeal will soon put the question at rest.

Having thus said what occurred to me on those very difficult and important questions of law, I now come to the question of value, on which it is not my intention to dwell long or to recapitulate the evidence which has been given. We found that the usual mode of valuing land in Ulster for the purpose of regulating rent was to put an estimate on the tenant's interest and on the landlord's interest respectively, and to fix a fair rent on the principle of not including the tenant's improvements, so as not seriously to affect his tenant-right. We found this mode of valuing common to valuers produced both on the side of the landlord and that of the tenant. Another mode of valuing is, of course, to take the land as it stands, value it as it would be set to a solvent tenant by an equitable landlord, and from the rent so fixed, to deduct what should properly be allowed to the tenant in respect of improvements. So habituated are the people here to the former mode of valuing, that some of the witnesses, when asked what the land would fairly set for in the hands of the landlord, said they had never considered it from that point of view. Mr. Raphael, who had fixed the rent in 1876, gave a valuation field by field, stating the acreage of each field and the rent it ought to bear per acre. The valuation, he said, was made on the basis of fixing in every case the assessable rent at such a figure as would not interfere with the tenant's improvements. He adhered to his valuation of 1876, and declared that the rent of £31 17s. 6d. with the addition of £4 10s. for the bog, making together £36 7s. 6d. was now the fair rent. Mr. Edward Murphy, a gentleman of high reputation as a valuer, said he valued the land in the same way, field by field, making in each case an exclusion in his own mind of the tenant's improvements as he valued. His estimate of the fair rent is £30 2s. 11d. for the land formerly in lease, which, adding £4 10s. for the bog, would make his estimate of a fair rent for the entire £34 12s. 11d. On the other hand, the valuers for the tenant went far indeed in their reduction. Mr. Robinson says that he conceives the lands, if in the hands of the landlord, might be worth £44; yet, excluding the tenant's improvements, he brings the rent as low as £22 2s. 3d. Our official valuers, Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Grey, gentlemen of high ability and unimpeachable integrity, fix the setting value of the land at £37 10s. If this were to be deemed their estimate of a fair rent, there would be an increase of the actual rent fixed by Mr. Raphael. But this is by no means so. They merely excluded the buildings from their valuation, in other respects valuing the land as it stood; and from their valuation, therefore, if I be right in the construction of the statute, reduction must be made in respect of tenant's improvements other than buildings. Mr. M'Mordie conceived it to be his duty, on behalf of his clients, to assail with no little asperity the reports of these gentlemen. As we had determined that their reports were to be given to the parties for comment,* we cannot, of course, blame an advocate for any criticism upon them which he may deem just; but I did distinctly call Mr. M'Mordie's attention to the fact that in attacking these reports he quite misapprehended their basis. In my opinion, the rent of £37 10s. fixed by the valuers would, if an allowance be made for improvements other than houses, reduce the rent at the least to the judicial rent. There remains, then, the judicial rent itself.

Mr. Holmes, in his first proposition, submits to us that this court is not entitled in hearing these cases to have any regard to the "so-called valuation" made by the Assistant-Commissioners. Now, with all respect to Mr. Holmes, this also is a misapprehension. The Assistant-Commissioners are not valuers by profession, but judges appointed either as being members of the profession of the law or from their acquaintance with the value of land in Ireland. They decide, like other tribunals, on sworn evidence. It is true that, by one of our rules, they ought personally to visit the lands in every case in which they deem such visit will conduce to a just decision, and that duty they have, I believe, in every case discharged. By the "so-called valuations," I can understand nothing but their judicial decisions, based not alone upon their own inspection, which might of itself be an insufficient guide,† but assisted greatly by such inspection in deciding the whole case upon the evidence. Their decision comes before us on appeal. If the Sub-Commission have erred in principle, or can be shown to have erred seriously in amount, our plain duty is to vary their order. But is it our duty simply to decide as if we were judges of a court of first instance; and if, in our own opinion, the judicial rent should to some extent be either greater or less than that fixed, are we to vary the decision? If so, two consequences ensue: First, in hardly a single case could the decision of the Sub-Commission stand, for it is almost a moral impossibility that in a matter of opinion such as value two independent minds could arrive at precisely the same conclusion; secondly, that the Sub-Commission might as well not exist, we, the Commissioners, having to decide de novo the value of every farm which has come into court. But such, I apprehend, is not, and was never considered to be, the duty of an appellate tribunal. I shall cite a passage from Lord Chelmsford's judgment in the case of Gray v. Turnbull, reported in the Law Reports, 2 Scotch Appeals, page 53. He there says:—"Upon a question of fact, an appellate tribunal ought not to be called upon to decide which side preponderates in a mere balance of evidence. Different minds will, of course, draw different conclusions from the same facts, and there is no rule or standard which can be referred to by which the correctness of the decision either way can be tested. If we were upon the present occasion to come to the conclusion that the five judges who have decided in favour of the defendant miscarried, we should just as likely be wrong in our conclusion from the fact as they were in deciding the other; and, therefore, if there is to be an appeal on questions of fact—and I regret that there should be such—I think that this principle should be firmly adhered to—namely, that we must call upon the party appealing to show us irresistibly that the opinion of the judges on the question of fact is not only wrong, but entirely erroneous." The same principle has been over and over again enunciated by judges of appeal.* It has been said that this is not strictly an appeal but a rehearing. But now, under the Judicature Act, every appeal is by way of rehearing. In fact, this and the other cases have been very fully and very carefully reheard by us. Now, without saying that these strong expressions of Lord Chelmsford are to be adopted fully in cases like the present, I say this—Show us that the Assistant-Commissioners were in any way wrong in principle, or even clearly wrong in fact, and we will not hesitate to reverse them. But it would be absurd to do so for trifling differences. We, therefore, confirm the judicial rent.

There remains the question of costs. The Sub-Commissioners have given the tenant his costs against the landlord. This we conceive to have been an error. They thought it right, we conceive, to follow the general rule of our courts, by which costs follow success. But this principle is, in our opinion, inapplicable to courts such as ours. I do not term them courts of arbitration. They would only in strictness be so if landlord and tenant came in together. But they are courts established by the Legislature to determine impartially a matter upon which various minds may reasonably differ in opinion, and (exceptional cases apart) it would, in our judgment, be unfair to visit either party with costs in such a case. Of course, if the conduct of either party is such as to deserve reprobation, we may treat such cases as exceptions. The costs of the appeal are a different matter. An appellant comes into court at his peril to set aside a distinct judicial decision. No doubt, as a general rule, an appellant who fails should pay the costs of the appeal, and hereafter, when the principles upon which the court proceeds become more fixed and definite, it will be, we think, our duty to act upon this rule; but as yet they are to a great extent floating and indeterminate, and we cannot say that an appellant, especially in a case like the present, where questions of law of such moment are involved, was wrong in seeking to test the decision given below. We, therefore, vary the order of the court below by declaring that the parties respectively should bear their own costs, and we give no costs of this appeal. We shall suspend, however, the formal making up of an order until the decision of the Court of Appeal be stated, as, if that court should dissent from the principles I have laid down as to the tenant's improvements, it will follow that our decision as to value, based on those principles, may require reconsideration.

LITTON, Q.C.—In expressing my concurrence with the judgment which has been pronounced by the learned judge, and while I do not intend to travel over the ground so ably occupied by him, by entering, in detail into the considerations which have induced the court to arrive at the conclusion announced in this case, I think it to be my duty to make some observations of a general character upon the principles which should regulate the action of the court in arriving at a "fair rent," and in applying the provisions of the 9th subsection of section 8 with regard to improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title. I concur with Mr. Holmes, and, indeed, I may say with the opinion expressed by all the counsel and solicitors who have been engaged in the cases before us, that it is desirable that this course should be taken at the earliest possible moment. The public mind is much exercised on the subject, and both landlords and tenants have a right to expect the court to lay down some rules which, if not applicable to all cases, may at least afford some guidance in their relations with each other, and which may as far as possible facilitate and induce reasonable settlements out of court—a course which, in my mind, no effort on our part should be spared to secure.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

Now, confining myself to the inquiry which principally concerns this court, and in which the various Sub-Commissions have been engaged, the object and aim is to ascertain the fair rent that, having regard to the language of the statute, the tenant in occupation should pay to his landlord for his holding—an inquiry extremely simple to state, but difficult beyond expression to define or answer—the fair rent, considering all the circumstances of the case, holding and district, considering the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively, and considering that no rent is to be allowed or made payable in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, and for which he has not been paid or otherwise compensated. Now, I do not affect to define a fair rent. To do so is almost, if not altogether impossible, and for this reason, if for no other, that a different estimate of what is fair, as regards almost every action in life, will be arrived at by different men as the character of each may have been formed under those influences which conduce to make some men intuitively reasonable and just, and others exacting and ungenerous. The question of rent forms no exception to the general rule, and the estimate of a fair rent is, within certain limits, as uncertain as the character of the man to whose judgment the question is submitted. The great object, however, should be to arrive at a result in the particular case which will commend itself as just, not to one class or to the other class, but to reasonable men in both classes, and it would be unwise to even attempt a definition which, however applicable to some particular case, would mislead in the effort to make it of general application. Still it is right to point out considerations which should be entertained, and considerations which should be rejected. The rule suggested by the Bessborough Commission, if we guard it by one or two limitations, appears to me to commend itself to the judgment as indicating the direction of the inquiry. The members of that Commission state:—"The computation should in general start with an estimate—first, of the gross annual produce; and, secondly, of the full commercial rent, according to the rules observed by the best professional valuers. From this last should be deducted, as a rule, any portion of the annual value which is found to be due to improvements not made or acquired by the landlord." We should, in my mind, ask ourselves in each case, and as far as possible discover from the evidence, what annual sum could a tenant of ordinary capital, skill, and intelligence afford to pay, one year with another, for the holding as it stands with all its surroundings, regarding the circumstances of the holding and district, and assuming that the landlord had the farm in his own possession to let it to a solvent tenant. The question is not what a tenant could be got to offer, but what he could be reasonably asked to pay; and consequently, in answering these questions we should exclude from consideration, in my opinion, any increase of rent which persons might be induced to offer from a mere desire to acquire possession, or which might be procured by reason of circumstances affecting the person making the offer, and not affecting the holding itself. While, then, we should endeavour to ascertain the commercial or market value of the holding as it stands, we should exclude the competition value. The owner of land about to let a holding in his own occupation may demand whatever rent he pleases, and take whatever rent he can procure. It may well be that the desire to procure possession, or the hunger for land, will induce some persons to offer a rent far beyond the value. Nevertheless, the owner has a perfect right in such a case to refuse to accept less. He has a perfect right to the competition rent. But in estimating the rent between the landlord and the present tenant—that is the tenant in occupation—whatever might be procured from the motives I have referred to, beyond the commercial rent, belongs to the tenant who holds the possession, just as it would belong to the landlord if about to let his land for the first time. It forms the element of good-will, and is part of the tenant-right or property of the tenant in possession. It may be said there is no difference in principle between a commercial or economic and a competition rent. This may be true, and in the case of the owner is true; but, in the case of the tenant in possession the landlord has not the possession to give, and therefore cannot claim the competition value. That which he can claim, and has a right to, is the competition value, less by whatever should be deducted as representing mere possession, which is a property in itself. The competition value, less by the good-will arising from actual occupation, I call the commercial value of the holding. The term may be somewhat inaccurate, but I know no better to express my meaning. From the result thus ascertained must be deducted the amount which the improvements of the tenant or his predecessors in title have contributed to the present letting value. The amount to be deducted is not of necessity to be estimated by the annual equivalent in the way of interest for the sum expended. It may so happen that large sums have been expended in the effort or with the intention to improve, and yet the holding in its letting value may not have been improved by the expenditure. The question, therefore, is—To what extent has the letting value been increased by the improvement, if at all? Deducting the latter, when ascertained, from the former, we get a result which ought to represent a fair rent. The amount deducted ought to represent that portion of the value which is independent of the property in simple occupation, and apart from what may be referred to the character of the landlord, which in some places has raised the tenant-right to an excessive figure, and which latter is an element, in my opinion, to be wholly disregarded.

It should be understood—and on this point there should be no mistake—the Act of Parliament never intended, and it would be manifestly unjust, to fix a rent below the commercial value of the holding, as I have defined commercial value, reduced by the value of the tenant's interest in his improvements. The course or rule suggested leaves the tenant-right, so far as it is derived from occupation, untouched, and, so far as it is derived from improvements, gives full effect to it in reducing the commercial rent by the value of the tenant's improvements. In no other way can you fulfil the requirements of the Act in having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively. To act otherwise would be to transfer the property or a portion of the property of one class to the other class, and to no extent ought this to be done. If it is our duty to recognise the tenant's interest, it is equally our duty to recognise that of the landlord, and we are bound by the highest considerations of duty to administer an Act which was intended to secure right in such a manner as that it may not become in our hands the instrument of wrong.

Again, it appears to me impossible to allow the personal qualifications or disqualifications of the occupying tenant to enter into our estimate, or to discuss whether a man can or cannot live in comfort on the particular holding. The inquiry concerns the land—its productive qualities, its commercial value, and not the condition of the tenant, his manner of life, or the number of his children. If the latter considerations were to be admitted the result would be that some holdings, where very small, should be subjected to no rent in order that the tenant might live and support his family in comfort. In numerous cases the remission of all rent would not secure that result, and the rent ascertained on such a principle to be fair to-day would be to-morrow unfair, if the holding passed into the hands of a man with a larger family, or of a less thrifty character. I only notice this doctrine to repudiate it.

I now proceed to make some remarks with respect to the construction of the Act, as it, in my mind, affects the question of improvements in connexion with the imposition of rents—a most important and vital question. By the 4th section of the Act of 1870 the tenant, on quitting his holding, was entitled to claim compensation for improvements made by him or his predecessors in title. The same form of expression is used in sec. 8, sub-section 9 of the new Act, with regard to the imposition of rent—"No rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title." If the case rested here, I, for my part, would feel bound, in placing a construction upon the expression "predecessors in title," to follow the cases which have been decided on the 4th section of the Act of 1870. The case of Holt v. Harberton, and other cases of the same class with which we are familiar, whatever may be said of them when closely examined, undoubtedly narrowed the effect of the 4th section of the Act of 1870. Dealing with the two Acts as part of one code, I would have felt bound to follow the general result of those decisions when dealing with the like expression in relation to the fixing of a fair rent. The 7th section of the Act of 1881, however, purports to affect and remedy the result of the cases to which I have referred in relation to the 4th section of the Act of 1870, for it declares that the tenant shall not be deprived of his right to compensation for improvements made by himself or his predecessors in title, by reason of the determination of the tenancy subsisting at the time the improvements were made, by surrender or otherwise, and acceptance of a new tenancy, and that the outgoing tenant who surrenders in order that some other person may be accepted as tenant in his place is to be deemed the predecessor in title of the incoming tenant. The technical and restrictive construction put upon the expression "predecessor in title" by the cases decided upon the 4th section of the Act of 1870 has been thus got rid of by the enactment in the 7th section of the Act of 1881; and when the new tenancy is accepted in place of the old, or when an outgoing tenant surrenders his interest in order that an incoming tenant may take his place the continuity of title is to be taken as not interrupted. If the law be thus altered in the case of claims for compensation, for improvements, it leaves the court free to construe the expression "predecessor in title," in the 8th section of sub-section 9, in accordance with the legislative declaration of its meaning when it occurs in the 4th section of the Act of 1870. If we now refer to the 9th sub-section of section 8, the language, in my opinion, plainly has reference to past as well as future improvements. The declaration is most distinct—"No rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, and for which, in the opinion of the court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title." I wish, in passing, to lay stress upon the latter words of the clause, for they are of great importance, and I shall have to refer to them presently. It is plain, then, that no rent can be placed upon a holding in respect of any improvements proved to have been made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, within the meaning given to the expression by the 7th section, no matter when made, and no matter whether the landlord's estate has been the subject of sale subsequent to the improvements or not. This rule, in its application, is, however, subject to the limitation that the tenant has not been paid or otherwise compensated; and it is also subject to the direction in the first clause of the same section that, in ascertaining the fair rent, the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively shall be regarded. When, then, actual proof is given as to the making of the improvements, no length of time precludes the tenant from insisting that no rent shall be charged in respect of them; but where no proof is adduced or capable of being adduced as to by whom the improvements were made, the question is, what course should be taken? In such case it appears to me the 5th section of the Act of 1870 affords the principle which should be applied. It provides that all improvements made within twenty years prior to 1870 shall, until the contrary be proved, be presumed to have been made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, subject to certain important exceptions. This presumption in favour of the tenant cannot in my opinion, in either reason or law, be further extended. Lapse of time weakens the presumption. Mr. Grasley in his work on evidence—a work of the highest authority—quotes the following observation of Sir W. D. Evans:—"The effect and weight of presumption cannot be influenced by any consideration more extensively than by the opportunity which the nature of the case affords to support or contradict it by direct testimony." In other words, the presumption which exists in favour of the tenant must cease to exist when once we reach a time when it would be unreasonable to expect that evidence would be forthcoming to contradict it.

Bearing the foregoing observations in mind, and in the first place regarding tenancies from year to year, the enactment in sub-section 9 must apply to all such tenancies, notwithstanding that a change or changes may have taken place in the occupation by reason of sale, devise, or intestacy, or by reason of a surrender taking place in order to admit a new tenant, or by reason of an alteration in the rent. In all such cases the former occupier, whether the same or a different person is the predecessor in title of the latter, and only ceases to be so where a new tenancy is created with a tenant who has not been in some privity with the former tenant in person or estate, or where the old tenant enters into a contract so entirely new as to justify the conclusion that it has been entered into by the landlord in consideration of the tenant releasing his rights. With regard to holdings under lease or otherwise, in cases where the interest of the former lessee has been surrendered for the purpose of creating the new interest, or where, the lease having expired, the late lessee in occupation converts the tenancy which arose on the termination of the expired lease into a new leasehold interest, the mere fact that there has been a change of rent, or that the conditions of the tenancy were reduced to writing, or were embodied in an instrument under seal, will not deprive the lessee under the new lease of the right to claim, when his lease expires, to be successor in title to the former tenant, and to have the benefit of the improvements made by such former tenant, unless, I must repeat again, the lease was granted or accepted as compensation for the former improvements—a fact which, I am of opinion, the court may or may not infer from the acts of the parties and the circumstances of the particular case. And here the importance of the closing words of the 9th sub-section cannot be overlooked. On each occasion of a new lease granted by the landlord and accepted by the tenant in substitution for the former tenancy, although there may have been no break in the continuity of title (and in most cases there will be none under the law as regulated by the present statute), the Court is bound to consider, from the circumstances of the case, how far the consideration for such lease may have included the surrender to the landlord by the tenant of the prior improvements, or how far by executing the lease the landlord, in the words of the section, compensated the tenant for his past improvements.

Enjoyment by the tenant during the continuance of a lease, no matter for how long, cannot be regarded as compensation for improvements made during the lease, and not contracted by the lease to be made. In this respect I consider the concluding paragraph of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, if it be not, as pointed out by the learned judge, confined to improvements made before that Act, is repealed by the 9th sub-section of section 8 of our Act. The words "paid or otherwise compensated" by the landlord must mean either actual payment or some positive and direct consideration moving from the landlord to the tenant, and not an enjoyment of occupation, which has no reference to the improvements one way or the other. Nor, in my mind, can occupation as tenant from year to year, after the expiration of a lease, be deemed compensation, unless it be expressly shown that such occupation was permitted with direct regard to the antecedent improvements and for the purpose of compensation. The duty imposed on the court in fixing the rent, "to have regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively," and the further duty to consider whether the tenant has or has not been compensated by the landlord for his improvements, taken in connexion with the declaration that no rent shall be allowed or made payable in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, appear to me to afford ample power to the Court to do what is just between the parties by recognising the property and the rights of each. I do not propose to occupy time by applying the principles I have endeavoured to lay down to the particular facts of the present case. It is enough to say they are the principles by which in the present case I have tested the evidence, and by which I am prepared to test the evidence in all similar cases. Acting accordingly, I have expressed my concurrence in the result arrived at in the case of David Adams v. Dunseath; and I only wish to say, in conclusion, that I entirely endorse the observation of the learned judge as to the rule which should regulate the action of this Court as to costs, both in the Court of first instance and in this Court of Appeal.

Mr. VERNON.—Sitting in this Court as a judge of fact, not of law, it would be presumption on my part to attempt to follow my learned colleagues through the elaborate judgments which they have delivered. I can only say, that in some important points their judgments do not carry conviction to my mind, and I learn with satisfaction that they are to be submitted to the High Court of Appeal without any delay. Their judgments appear to me to lay down principles and to lead to results which were never contemplated by the Legislature. I am, therefore, obliged, with much diffidence in my own opinion, but without any hesitation as to my duty, to dissent from their judgments. It follows that, dissenting from the judgments, I dissent from the valuations arrived at, so far as those valuations are governed by the principles laid down in reference to the meaning and force of the words, "otherwise compensated."

Order accordingly.

EWART v. GRAY.

Dec. 5, 20, 1881.—Lease made since 1870—Unfair and unreasonable terms—Threat of eviction—Terms taken in their entirety—Rent—Clause in lease not specifically referred to in originating notice—Practice—Power of amendment and absence of formal pleading entitled Court to regard such clause—Land Law Act, 1881, sec. 21.

If the terms of a lease, taken in their entirety, are unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870, and the rights of the tenant under that Act, such a lease may come within the class which the Court is empowered to set aside.

By empowering the Court to annul the lease and to enable the tenant to have a fair rent fixed, the legislature has shown that the lease in its entirety, rent as well as everything else, is to be considered.

Even though a clause be not specifically referred to in the originating notice to set aside a lease, the fact that there are no formal pleadings and that the Court has ample power of amendment, will enable the Court to take such clause into consideration.

Per LITTON, Q.C.—The reservation of an exorbitant rent is in itself a term of the lease which the Court is bound to regard, and which may be unfair and unreasonable having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870.

Application, on behalf of a tenant, to have a lease declared void. The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Dodd, in support of the application.—There were two things contemplated by the Act of 1870 (1st), where the Ulster Custom prevailed the tenant was to be protected in his interest under it; (2nd) he was to be protected where it did not prevail in his property in improvements by compensation. Here the tenant was served with a notice to quit on the 12th of April, 1875, and served with a further notice on the 20th of May, informing him that the object with which the first notice had been served was to increase his rent. The tenant and his predecessors were for nine generations on the farm. He had a large family. There was no clause in the lease excluding him from compensation nor from his right to the value of his improvements; but the lease was for a term of 31 years, which by virtue of the 4th sec. of the Act of 1870 disentitled him to such compensation. The lease contained a covenant against buildings unsuitable to the holding, against assignment, sub-letting, bankruptcy, and one requiring the tenant to pay the whole of the Grand Jury Cess. The lease was carefully drafted with regard to the Act of 1870. The 21st sec. does not mean by terms unfair and unreasonable, covenants that would be void by the Act of 1870, because they had been already rendered void without the 21st section. The tenant would be entitled to his tenant-right, or otherwise to claim compensation for disturbance and all improvements. He covenants in this lease to deprive himself of the benefit of secs. 3 and 4 of the Act of 1870. Not only that, but as this might be regarded as a letting since 1870, the tenant would be entitled under the 65th sec. of the Act of 1870 to deduct half of the Grand Jury Cess, he has covenanted in this lease to pay the entire of it. As under the Act of 1870 he would be entitled to compensation for disturbance and improvements, it is an unfair term having regard to those rights to deprive him of such compensation by coercing him to take a lease in which the rent confiscated his improvements on the one hand, while the term deprived him of compensation for disturbance on the other. He was deprived of the benefits of the Ulster Custom. It was held by Deasy, B., Keogh, J., and Whiteside, C.J., that the Custom did not attach at the end of the lease, Monahan, C.J., alone holding the opposite view, 5 I. L. T. R. 173, in Austin v. Scott, on appeal from the Chairman of the Co. Londonderry. In M'Noin v. Beauclerc, 7 Ir. L. T. R. 185, Barry J., merely refuses to decide that the judgment of Chief Justice Monahan was erroneous. The effect is, that in the opinion of the majority of the judges the Ulster Custom was not proved to exist at the end of a lease. The tenant, therefore, was deprived of compensation under the 3rd and 4th secs. of the Act of 1870; and by the authority cited he was also deprived of any benefit he might derive under the Ulster Custom. He was deprived of all this by threat of eviction. "I will put you out if you do not accept my terms," was in effect the language of the landlord. The lease was not executed until three years after, and the tenant really did not know what terms or conditions it contained.

Obv., for the landlord, contra.—The lease can be declared void, no doubt—other circumstances concurring—when it has been obtained by threat of eviction or undue influence. Undue influence is clearly out of the case. Has there been a threat of eviction from which the lease sprang as a necessary consequence? Is the acceptance of the lease referable to a threat of eviction within the meaning of the 21st section? The payment of an increased rent created a new tenancy, so that all improvements anterior to the change of tenancy became the property of the landlord. The lease given subsequent to such a change of tenancy, in so far as it deprived the tenant of compensation for improvements, cannot be regarded as containing an unfair term having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870, for the tenant had already lost his title to the improvements. Looking at the lease, are there any unreasonable covenants having regard to that Act and to the state of the law at the time of its execution? The object of the Legislature in making, under the Act of 1870, a lease for 31 years an equivalent for the rights conferred upon yearly tenants by the 3rd and 4th secs., was evidently to encourage leases. Leases, therefore, not only are not to be regarded as opposed to the principles of that Act, but to have been contemplated by its policy; they are to be regarded as part of the results intended to be brought about by it. Therefore it is only leases containing terms expressly in contravention of the Act of 1870, and forced upon the tenant by threat of eviction, that are within the purview of the 21st sec. Can the lease here be regarded as answering that description? The valuation of the holding is under £50 a year, so that the tenant could not contract himself out of the benefits of the Act of 1870. The terms in the lease were in accordance with the Act of 1870. The conditions against assignment, sub-letting, and bankruptcy, are not more stringent than those contained in the 9th and 13th secs. of that Act. The covenant not to build any dwelling or other house unsuitable to the holding is, by implication of the strongest character, a licence to build a dwelling or other house suitable to the holding; it amounts to an express covenant enabling him to erect such buildings. We say (1) that the lease does not contain terms unfair and unreasonable to the tenant having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870; and (2) we say that the lease was not procured by threat of eviction.

[O'HAGAN, J.—There were improvements made by the tenant that the increased rent might have been calculated upon. Would not that deprive him of the benefit of the improvements?]

The acceptance of the increased rent created a new tenancy; so that he had no claim to the improvements when the lease was executed.

[O'HAGAN, J.—The tenant had a right to enforce a lease when he paid an increased rent under that agreement for a lease. Would not its operation be retrospective?]

Dodd, in reply.—It is contended there was a new and immediate tenancy created by the change of rent, and that the lease was in no way connected with the increased rent or the new tenancy. The evidence shows that the reverse was the case. The increase of rent was part and parcel of the agreement for the lease even though the lease was not executed for some years after. The first time the tenant sees the lease is when it was ready for execution. It is urged that as the valuation is under £50 it is outside, but it is admitted if it were above £50 it would be within, the purview of the section. That is not a correct view of the law, because the Act allowed it to be done. The Act of 1870 allowed a tenant to contract himself absolutely out of it where his valuation exceeded £50; it allowed him to take a lease for 31 years, no matter what his valuation was, by which he was held to have forfeited all title to improvements except for permanent building and reclamation of waste land. The taking of the lease forfeited all improvements made previous to it, and there only remained the consideration of the increased rent as a term of an unfair character. Any claim that might have escaped by the acceptance of the lease was captured by the increased rent.

O'HAGAN, J.—In this case, in which Thomas Ewart is tenant of the lands of Tullygawley, in the County of Antrim, and James Gray, representative of the late Major Gray, is landlord, an originating notice has been served, seeking, under the 21st section of the Act, to have a lease, accepted by the tenant after the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, declared void on the ground that it contained terms which were unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of that Act, and that its acceptance was obtained by Major Gray by threat of eviction, and undue influence. The originating notice states, as the terms complained of, that the tenant had to sign away the benefits secured by the Land Bill of 1870; and states further the exorbitant rent. The holding is stated to contain 86 acres, statute measure. The rent is £83, and the gross poor law valuation is £20. The lease complained of is a lease of the 25th of September, 1875, from George Gray to Thomas Ewart, of part of the lands of Tullygawley, in the county of Antrim, as delineated by a map endorsed on the lease; to hold for a term of thirty-one years from the 1st of November, 1874, at the yearly rent of £83, payable every 1st of May and 1st of November, free of all deductions, except the landlord's proportion of poor rate. There is a covenant against assigning, sub-letting, or setting in coacre, or bequeathing the holding to more than one person, without the consent of the landlord; a covenant not to build any dwelling or other house unsuitable to the holding, or to use the premises as an inn, tavern, or public-house, without the assent of the landlord; and to keep all buildings in good and proper repair, and so to yield them up at the end of the term. There is also a covenant enabling the landlord to enter and give notice to repair; and if the repairs were not executed by the tenant, the landlord should have the power to re-enter, to execute the repairs, and recover the amount from the tenant as rent. There is a further covenant to spend upon the ground all muck, dung, &c., and to leave the same upon the ground at the end of the term. There is a proviso for the absolute cesser of the lease upon breach of any covenant, and there is also an express covenant by the lessee to pay the whole of the grand jury cess. Prior to the granting of this lease, Thomas Ewart was indisputably tenant from year to year of his holding. His ancestors had held it, he says, for nine generations, which brings us back to the plantation of Ulster. At the time of the earliest memories of the tenant the rent was £16; it was afterwards, some time about 1850, raised to £19. The rent of £19 was made up of £1 for a particular field, and £18 for the rest of the farm. The rent of £1 for the field was in a few years afterwards raised to £4 10s., making the entire rent £22 10s., at which figure it remained until the granting of the lease. It would appear from the evidence of Mr. Boyd, the agent, that the land had, after the death of the tenant's father, been divided; that the present tenant's brother held the greater part of the farm, and he himself only about 7 acres, and that he purchased from his brother in 1865 or 1866. Now, the account which the tenant gives as to what had been done on the farm is as follows:—He says part of it was called a barren hill, which no man thought would be laboured. He says it was he himself who reclaimed the worst of it; that his father reclaimed the easiest parts, and left things that he thought never would be done—things which he himself afterwards did. He described the buildings which he and his father erected on the farm, namely, a farmhouse, a slated byre and a stable, to which, he says, the landlord did not contribute one farthing. The land, he says, was, when he remembered it first, bad grazing ground, stony and heathy, and high ground. There were what he termed "the four old original acres." He did not explain exactly what he meant by this, but I would infer that he referred to the 7 statute acres which he held before he purchased from his brother. Now the tenement valuation, which was made in 1862, was £20 for the 'entire holding—that is to say, for the land £18 5s., and for the buildings £1 15s. I may say that on this question of the improvements, which he alleged were effected by himself and his father, the tenant was not cross-examined. A neighbour of his, named Powell, deposed that he knew Ewart's land for thirty-five years, that he knew it in his father's time; that it was very rough ground; that the tenant was a very improving tenant; that he knew of his own knowledge of his having reclaimed portions of it—large portions; that he could not fix the time, because he was doing it from one time to another; that he believed he did the most himself; that his father did some of it. Mr. Boyd, the landlord's agent, was not, on his direct examination, asked any question as to whether the tenant had been an improving tenant. On his cross-examination he is asked whether he knows the holding, and whether improvements have been made upon it, and he says, "Yes;" and whether the tenant is a good tenant, and he answers, "A most excellent man." It is, therefore, a clear conclusion, in our minds, that the tenant and his predecessors in title had effected considerable improvements upon the holding, not only by the buildings—which we do not take much into consideration, because on Mr. Boyd's evidence their value does not form a constituent part of the rent—but also by gradual reclamation of the waste land and amelioration of the farm. Upon this point there is no discrepancy whatever in the evidence. I now come to the circumstances under which the lease was granted and accepted, concerning which there is considerable discrepancy. The tenant's version is this:—He says that two years before the lease, that is to say in 1873, he was paying his rent to Mr. Boyd, the agent; the rent was paid annually in December. "Mr. Boyd said to me 'The Major has raised your rent.' I said I was paying all that I could pay, and more than I could pay, because I was bringing every farthing of money that I had, and I had often to borrow some once in a while to make things up. He said, 'You should go up to the Major and have an interview.' I did not go. I said I had just paid all the rent I could pay. He said the Major was intending to give me a lease. I said we never had one and did not need any." The tenant had an evident dread of the result of an interview with the Major, and did not go near him, and a year went by. The lapse of this year without any step being taken by the landlord is, I think, to be accounted for by a circumstance mentioned by Mr. Boyd, to which I shall hereafter advert. In the following December of 1874, as he was paying his rent, Mr. Boyd reproved him somewhat sharply for not having gone to see Major Gray; and again the tenant said that he did not know what to do; that he had always paid his rent, and as much as he could pay; that it was too dear without adding more to it. After those two admonitions from Mr. Boyd, Ewart in the following spring received a third, which could not well be neglected. He was served with a notice to quit, bearing date the 12th April, 1875, requiring him to deliver up possession of his farm on the 1st November following. More than a month afterwards he received another document, dated the 20th May, 1875, informing him that the notice to quit was served for the purpose of raising his rent, and that his rent in future was to be £33. It does not appear from the tenant's evidence that he had ever before this been informed verbally of the amount of rent to be put upon him. However this may be, the two documents taken together were of a very serious complexion, and under their pressure Ewart sought that interview with his landlord, which he had previously rather shunned than courted. He went to him in the month of August, 1875, and saw him in his own house, Mr. Boyd being present. The landlord, Mr. Gray, said, "Who are you?" Mr. Boyd said, "This is Thomas Ewart, one of your tenants from Tullygawley." He said "he remembered me." Ewart then mentioned the fact of Major Gray having gone over the farm eighteen years before with Mr. Winder, the former agent, and observed upon its stony condition. He then proceeds with his narrative of the interview. "He (the Major) said, 'We found your rent a little too low, and we have raised it, and I am going to give you a lease to secure you against further rises.' I said a lease would not make me abler to pay rent, that a lease was no good, and I would take none. I asked to be allowed to make statements to him of what I had done. I began to tell him that my land was about the worst that ever had to be broken up in our country, and I had done what the neighbours said was the greatest thing ever done, and after I had it done it was bad land still, though I made it better looking. I said it lies high, and the wind blows down the crops. He said he did not need me to instruct him, I was to accept his terms, 'Do you know that you are my tenant? I will put you out if you do not.' I was hurt about it, that I had done so much, and a man to put me out after all; and I stood a minute, and I said 'that is the hardest thing I ever heard or read of. I am the ninth generation born there, and now you put me out and I have a family of ten children, and a wife, and no place to go to, and no money.' He just turned round and said—'Boyd, give him until Saturday to make up his mind, and if he accepts our terms, and takes a lease he will get the stay'; that he did not need me any further." This is Ewart's evidence. He yielded to the landlord's demand, and paid the rent of £33 as from the preceding gale day—November, 1874; but the lease was not, in fact, executed by him until three years after—November, 1878. The tenant's account of the delay is that he never asked more after the lease for about three years until Mr. Christy, the landlord's solicitor, met him one day in High-street, and told him there was the lease to be signed, and that he should go and get it signed and pay for it; that he said that he did not care if he never saw it; that Mr. Christy told him if he did not sign it he would have to bear the expenses of the court, and that he would charge him twice as much as if he took it directly; that after consulting another solicitor he signed it in Mr. Christy's office. He is asked in cross-examination if he did not ask Mr. Christy to get the lease for him. He says he did not, but that Mr. Christy told him to come and pay for it. He admits that he did ask Boyd to get him the lease about three years after the lease was first named; that Mr. Christy having told him that he would have to pay double if he did not take it then, he told Mr.

EWART v. GRAY.

EWART v. GRAY.

Boyd to get the lease if he had to pay for it. He is also asked whether he did not say that he wanted the lease to borrow money on, but this he entirely denies. Now, we cannot conceal from ourselves that this narrative of the tenant is consistent with what is stated by Mr. Boyd and Mr. Christy. It is entirely a question of recollection, for to none of them can any want of veracity be imputed. Ewart obtained the highest character from Mr. Boyd himself, and certainly in the witness-box he showed all the marks and characteristics of a serious and truthful man. Mr. Boyd says that in the year 1875 a survey was made of the estate by a Mr. Thompson, who is now dead; that he surveyed Ewart's farm amongst others, and valued it first at £35, which increased rent Ewart was asked to pay and refused; that before the service of the notice to quit no mention of a lease was made. He then states that he was present at an interview between Ewart and Major Gray which he fixes as having taken place in the late summer-time of 1875; and in this he and Ewart agree. He is then asked if he recollected what took place at that interview, and he answers "I do not, indeed." He is then asked if he recollects anything at all. He says, "I recollect they had a conversation about the rent and Major Gray told him his farm was cheap, and he would increase the rent, but he did not tell him he would put him out." Of that Mr. Boyd was perfectly sure; he says he does not remember any mention of a lease at that interview. His recollection is that the first mention of a lease was made in 1875, when Ewart was paying the first year of the increased rent, which ran from November, 1874. He adds that decidedly the first proposal for a lease emanated from Ewart; that he said he would take a lease, but Major Gray wanted £85 for the holding, and refused to sign the lease for three years unless the rent should be £85 a year. He then states that Thompson made two valuations—one in 1873, at £35, and the other in 1875, at £33; that Major Gray had a regular tariff for granting leases—viz., an increase of 2s. 6d. the statute acre for thirty-one years, and 5s. the statute acre for sixty-one years. He says that when Ewart proposed in December, 1875, to take a lease he, Mr. Boyd, promised to speak to Major Gray; that he told Ewart what Major Gray said—namely, that he wanted £85 for the farm, and that it was agreed, probably in 1876, that he should have a lease; that it was then agreed that he should have the lease at £33, but that Major Gray refused to sign for three years. Now if Mr. Boyd's narrative of the sequence of events be correct, the tenant's case would encounter a most formidable obstacle; for if the tenant, succumbing to the pressure of the notice to quit, agreed to the increased rent without any reference to a lease, and if the proposal for a lease afterwards emanated from himself as an independent transaction, it would be difficult indeed to hold that the acceptance of the lease was procured by threat of eviction or undue influence. We have dismissed a case on that very ground. But can we rely on Mr. Boyd's memory? In the first place, who is more likely to preserve a recollection of the facts, and, above all, of the important interview in August—Mr. Boyd, to whom this case was but one among a multitude of dealings with tenants over an estate of nearly £6,000 a year, each of whom was to him of comparatively small importance; or the tenant, to whom it was possibly the most momentous event of his life, when the choice was given him of paying an addition of almost fifty per cent. or quitting the farm which he and his had held for close on 300 years? Again, Mr. Boyd's own admissions show plainly that he has nothing in the nature of a distinct recollection of the transaction. He stated so in the beginning of his direct examination; and in cross-examination, in answer to Mr. Dodd, who asked him whether he could recollect positively that in the interview of August there was not a word said about a lease, he answered, "I cannot say that." He is further asked by Mr. Dodd when instruction was given him to prepare the lease, and he answered, "In the year 1876; I think early in 1876." "Are you trusting to your recollection, or have you any date to go upon?—None whatever. Are you perfectly certain it was in 1876?—No. Will you swear it was not in 1875?—No. Will you swear it was not in 1874?—No, I will not. You won't swear there was not a reference made to a lease before the first interview between Major Gray and the tenant?—Yes. Your evidence now is that you won't swear there was not something said about a lease before that interview in 1875?—Yes. And it may have been in 1873?—It might." It is plain that Mr. Boyd's recollection on the whole subject utterly fails him; nor is it, as I have said, wonderful that it should. But the documents themselves furnish the strongest evidence. The lease has a stamp, with the date of issue, 26th April, 1875. Mr. Christy, the solicitor, says that the lease was engrossed on a purchased stamp, and that, so far as he can recollect, he got instructions to prepare the lease about April, 1875. But as to the lease itself; it is a lease duly engrossed, tenant's part and landlord's counterpart. The acreage is stated, and the habendum is "to hold for the term of thirty-one years from the 1st November, 1874, yielding and paying the yearly rent of £83" (the rent being no subsequent insertion, but portion of the original engrossment), "payable half-yearly on the 1st day of May and 1st day of November in every year, the first of such half-yearly payments to be made on the 1st day of May, 1875." The time of the beginning of the lease is cast back to November, 1874, and the first payment is to be made in May, 1875, thus capturing the coming May gale. It seems to us little short of demonstration that that lease was an engrossed though not executed instrument prior to the 1st May, 1875. What, then, becomes of Mr. Boyd's theory that the first mention of a lease emanated from Ewart himself in Dec., 1875, or of the view that at the time of the notice to quit, or of the notice of May, 1875, there had been no thought of a lease, or of the idea that the rent contemplated by Major Gray throughout the year 1875 down to 1876 was £85 and not £83? I think it not unlikely that the idea of £85 was in Major Gray's mind during the year 1874, and that some hesitation on that point was the cause of his inaction during that year. But the evidence of the engrossments, in my opinion, completely confirms the statements of the tenant that when, in December, 1873, the rise of rent was mentioned, the intention to give a lease was also mentioned, and that in the interview of August, 1875 (the engrossments with rent and all fixed being then in Mr. Boyd's possession), Major Gray did say, "We intend to give you a lease, to secure you against any further rises of rent." The rise of rent and the lease were not two distinct and independent things, as Mr. Boyd's memory now tells him. They were one thing and one idea from the beginning. In saying so I do not leave out of account what Mr. Christy tells us. Mr. Christy's evidence, I am bound to say, is wholly irreconcilable with Mr. Boyd's evidence as to the first mention of a lease being in December, 1875. Mr. Christy says that about the time of the preparation of the lease, and after he had been instructed by Mr. Boyd, Ewart called upon him, and gave him to understand that his reason for getting a lease was that he might require to borrow a little money. Now the time of the preparation of the lease must have been before May, 1875. The notice to quit was in April; the notice to pay the increased rent was in May; the first time Ewart came face to face with his landlord was in August, Ewart still bitterly contending against an increase of rent; and yet Mr. Christy, who, I may observe, as well as Mr. Boyd, professes to speak wholly from memory, would tell us that in the spring of 1875 Ewart came in to him, and spoke about his getting a lease. That at some time before the actual execution of the lease, in 1873, Ewart may have asked for the lease, and stated that he might obtain money on it, may be true enough; but Mr. Christy, who, like Mr. Boyd, does not refer to a single book or document, but depends altogether on his recollection, is, in my opinion, entirely astray as to the date. And when Ewart was bound, as he was bound by his agreement, to yield to his landlord's demands; when he had paid the rent reserved by the lease, and from the time mentioned in the lease, there is nothing, I conceive, in the fact of his asking that at least he should get the document embodying the contract which proves that the contract itself was not on his part a most reluctant one. Mr. Orr said to Ewart in cross-examination: "You wanted the lease then?" and his answer to me is very intelligible—"Was I not paying £33, and I had either to take it or pay dear for it." He says Mr. Christy urged him to take out the lease, stating that he would charge him at a less rate than he would afterwards do; and this, in my opinion, derives confirmation from what Mr. Christy himself says, namely, that the sum of £5 which he charged for the lease was less than the usual legal fee. On the whole, we have come to the conclusion, with very little hesitation, that the acceptance of the lease by Ewart was procured by the threat of eviction. But the question remains whether the lease contains terms which at the time of its acceptance by the tenant were unreasonable or unfair to him, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870. And this question is no doubt a very serious one, and one requiring very careful consideration of the real meaning of the enactment we have to construe. It has been urged that the leases which the Legislature had in view were those containing covenants or conditions purporting expressly to debar the tenant from claiming compensation under section 3 or section 4 of the Act of 1870. Leases of that character, it was said, were those which the court obtained power to annul. To this it was answered that so limited a construction would render the effect nugatory; for if the lease were made to a tenant the aggregate of whose holding is valued under £50, any stipulation purporting to prevent the tenant claiming for disturbance under section 3 or for certain improvements under section 4 is made absolutely null and void. It is difficult to conceive that the Legislature meant either to strike at claims which were already annulled by the statute of 1870 itself, or that it only regarded leases to tenants valued at £50 or over. The following dilemma was put to us. How can you call such a stipulation unfair to a tenant valued below £50 when it is a nullity? How can you call it unfair to a tenant valued above £50 when it is authorized by the statute? We are of opinion that a wider construction must be given to the 21st section of the Act of 1881; and that if the terms of the lease, taken in their entirety, are unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870, and the rights of the tenant under that Act, such a lease may come within the class we are empowered to set aside. It has been urged that the court cannot take into account the amount of the rent in judging whether terms were unfair, because the section enacts that when the lease is set aside, the tenant shall be deemed tenant of a present ordinary tenancy from year to year, at the rent mentioned in the lease. It is argued that by leaving the rent unaltered, the Legislature showed that what it had in contemplation were certain oppressive clauses tending to frustrate the benefits of the Act of 1870. But a consideration of the policy of the Act, as shown by the previous sections, will displace that argument. To every tenant of a present tenancy from year to year is given the right to have a fair rent fixed for his holding. But no such right is given to leaseholders during the currency of their leases; they are bound by their contracts. If, however, a lease obtained since 1870 was both unfairly obtained and unfair in itself, with regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870, then the Legislature thought that the tenant should be freed from the fetter of the lease altogether, and be placed in the same situation as a present ordinary tenant, with the same rights of having a fair rent fixed for his holding, and of acquiring a statutory term. If the Legislature had only in view onerous clauses in the lease, apart from the rent, then its object would have been fully attained by giving the court power to strike out those clauses. But by empowering the court to annul the lease altogether, and to enable the tenant to have a fair rent fixed, the Legislature has, we conceive, shown that the lease in its entirety, rent as well as everything else, was to be considered. Now, in the first place what was the position of the tenant just before the agreement for the lease? He held as tenant from year to year a holding valued at £20, at a rent of £23 10s. He was therefore entitled, if disturbed by the act of his landlord, to claim five years' rent as compensation for disturbance. His father had made improvements on the farm, both by buildings and by reclamation of land. He himself had made further improvements. For the value of all these he was entitled to be paid. It is somewhat singular that on neither side was the question asked whether the holding was subject to the Ulster Custom, and accordingly we take the rights of the tenant to be those existing under the 3rd and 4th sections of the Act of 1870. Now, what are the terms of the lease? The increase of rent is prima facie immense, close on 50 per cent. above what the tenant had been paying, and more than 100 per cent. above the rent which had been paid in the tenant's early days; and this increase was made on a tenant admitted to be an excellent and improving tenant of a holding on which, so far as appears, the landlord never spent a shilling. This increase of rent was based on Mr. Thompson's valuation. Mr. Thompson is, unfortunately, dead. Mr. Boyd, the agent, says the valuation was made exclusive of the improvements. He says so without hesitation as to the buildings. He is then asked whether the reclamations were excluded. To this he gives no direct answer, but said, "Oh, as to the reclamations!" and then proceeded to state what the tenant had made by the sale of turbarry; and as it so happened neither counsel brought him back to the point. I asked him whether he meant the land was valued as it then was, with the exception of the buildings. I thought his answer to me was in the affirmative, "I do, my lord." But the shorthand writer has taken it down in the negative, "I do not." He probably did not quite understand my question, for he goes on to say, "There is a large slice of the holding wants to be reclaimed still. Thomas Ewart got from Mr. Winder, he has informed me himself, ten acres of bog or turbarry, out of which he has been living for the last twenty years, and during the coal famine that man made a little fortune out of the bog." Mr. Dodd asked him whether he was charging him rent for that bog, and he answered "Surely it is part of his holding." And therefore he has had it in your opinion far too low? "No," Boyd answers, "It is a fair rent now." And Mr. Commissioner Vernon said to him, "You say that he made a good deal of money of turf;" and he answered, "He did and does so still." He is asked whether that is not contrary to the terms of the lease? He answered "I really cannot tell you; it is deep bog for turbarry." I asked him whether it was with his permission Ewart did that; and he answered, "Oh, yes." Now, if the rent which Mr. Boyd considers a fair rent were based, as would appear to some degree, upon the gains made by the tenant by the sale of turf, the tenant has not one hour's security for that right. Major Gray may be too honourable a man to deprive him of it, but who can answer for his successors? The 29th section of the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1860 expressly debars a tenant from cutting or using turf bog for profit or sale, unless the right so to use and enjoy it was expressly granted in writing by the landlord. The lease is absolutely silent on the subject, and the tenant might be prevented at once by injunction from selling a particle of turf, and might possibly have to purchase the right by a further increase of rent. If the rent was measured on that basis, it would have been only fair to embody it in the lease. But we add that we think it almost inconceivable that Mr. Thompson could have valued the farm irrespective of the tenant's improvements on the land. How was he to know them? How was he to know the previous condition of the land? The tenant who made them appears never to have known of the valuation until it appeared in the formidable result. Mr. Boyd does not say that he spoke a word to Mr. Thompson on the subject, and Mr. Boyd himself was there but for a comparatively short time. It has been said that the amount of the rent is outside the scope of the section with which we are dealing. It is true that we are not engaged in fixing a fair rent; but inquiring whether the lease contains terms unfair to the tenant, having regard to the Act of 1870. And it seems to us that if the tenant had acquired under the Act a property in the holding, as he undoubtedly did, and if a rent were imposed by lease, of an amount sufficient, or more than sufficient, to countervail the property so acquired, we cannot leave this out of account in judging of the fairness of the terms, having regard to the Act of 1870. Again, this lease purports to be a lease for thirty-one years. If it be so in fact, the tenant would on its termination be deprived of all compensation for disturbance, and, to a partial extent, of compensation for improvements. And it may be argued, that inasmuch as the reserved rent of £32 was duly paid from the 1st November, 1874, the lease should be treated as one having its beginning at that date. Although I do not concur in this view, and am of opinion that the lease must be deemed to have its commencement at the earliest as of the date when there was a binding contract for a lease, yet the tenant would be likely to find the point litigated at the end of the lease. But further, some of these improvements were made by the tenant's father while he was tenant from year to year of the holding. Now under the authority of the case of Holt v. Lord Harberton, 6 Ir. L. T. R. 1., the effect of taking the lease, whatever the term may have been, was to preclude the tenant from claiming in respect of the improvements made by his father. This would be no longer so under sect. 7 of the Act of 1881; but we must judge of the lease as it stood at the time it was made. The lease itself is in the most stringent terms, evidently taken from precedents in use in England, and not at all adapted to the customary relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland. I will refer to one clause in particular. There is a proviso that if there should be a breach of any covenant contained in the lease, the landlord might re-enter, and thereupon the term thereby created should absolutely cease and determine. So that if the tenant should let the smallest particle of the lands in consore, or fail to spread and use on the premises all the manure, muck, or dung raised upon it, or fail to keep in due and proper repair all buildings, and also all bridges, gates, palings, rails and fences, watercourses, dykes, dams, ditches, &c., the landlord might at once put an end to the lease, and evict the tenant. A clause of this kind may possibly be fairly enough inserted in a lease where there is a mere arrangement for the hire of the land as a temporary commodity. But where, as in the present case, the farm was the tenant's patrimony, it was, in my judgment, an unfair and unreasonable clause, and not only unfair and unreasonable in itself, but unreasonable and unfair to the tenant, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870. For if, as I have shown, there were rights acquired under that Act, namely, the right to the value of the improvements made by his predecessors in title, which were forfeited by the mere fact of taking the lease, surely it was unfair that the lease, which if a fair lease should be a substitute for the rights thus lost, should be so framed as to be practically a lease at the will of the landlord. It is quite true that these extravagant clauses of forfeiture were very seldom sought to be enforced. I only remember one instance in which the attempt was made, and I am glad to say it failed. But we have to deal with the terms of the lease, and not with the probabilities of their being enforced—probabilities which might on any day undergo a complete change. The clause of forfeiture is not specifically referred to in the originating notice. But as we have no formal pleadings, and have ample power of amendment, this omission does not, I conceive, prevent us from taking it into consideration. There is another clause to which I advert only because it was adverted to in argument—namely, the clause which throws the burthen of the entire grand jury oath on the tenant. I frankly say I do not lay any weight on this clause, both because it was only a continuance of a liability which had previously existed, and because, according to the case of Powercrown v. Mitchell, 4 L. R. I. 82, 13 Ir. L. T. Dig. 19, the result would have been the same if that clause had been omitted, the tenant having been in occupation previous to the lease. But, taking all the terms of the lease—the great increase of rent, sufficient, in our opinion, to countervail, or more than countervail, whatever interest in the land the tenant had under the Act of 1870, the loss by reason of taking the lease of the value of all improvements not actually executed by himself, and the stringent and severe clauses of the lease, rendering the tenure under it most precarious, so far as legal rights are concerned—we have unanimously come to the conclusion that this is a lease containing terms unreasonable and unfair to the tenant, having regard to the Act of 1870; and, being of opinion that its acceptance was procured by the landlord by threat of eviction, we will declare it to be void as from the date of this order.

LITTON, Q.C.—No one who has paid attention to the evidence in this case can entertain a reasonable doubt that the lease of 25th September, 1875, was "procured by the landlord by threat of eviction." To believe that Thomas Ewart signed a lease containing the covenants which have been referred to, and reserving a rent raised from £22 10s. to £33, except under the urgent necessity of having to choose between submitting to the terms imposed by his landlord and quitting his holding for ever, is, I think, simply impossible, if we are to regard the principles of prudence and common sense which regulate men's actions. It is not necessary to dwell upon this part of the case, but I wish to make one or two observations on the terms of the lease itself, as applicable to this and similar cases. To bring any particular case within the 21st section the lease must contain terms which were at the time "unreasonable" or "unfair" to the tenant, "having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870." I am of opinion that the reservation of an exorbitant rent is in itself a term of the lease which the court is bound to regard, and which may be such as to be unfair and unreasonable to the tenant, having regard to the Act of 1870. It is manifest that rent, if forced up to a sufficient amount, must of itself destroy whatever property the tenant has in his holding, or whatever right the tenant has under the Ulster Custom when such custom prevails. The Act of 1870 aimed at securing the tenant by providing compensation for improvements and compensation for disturbance; and in considering the question whether any and what pressure has been brought to bear by the landlord on the tenant to compel him to accept a lease, when we find the tenant yielding to a large increase of rent, and if the facts of the case disclose anything equivalent to a threat of eviction, we ought, I think, speaking for myself, to draw the inference that the acceptance of the lease was due to the tenant's inability to resist a demand the refusal to accept which involved the loss of his holding, and that the increase of rent was unfair and unreasonable within the 21st section of the Act of 1881. The 3rd section of the Act of 1870 provided compensation to be paid to a tenant disturbed by his landlord, "for the loss which the court should find to be sustained by the tenant by reason of quitting his holding," and the compensation was to be awarded accordingly. This provision has been repealed by the 6th section of the Act of 1881. But between 1870 and 1881 the effect of forcing up the rent of a holding was to deprive the tenant of compensation in direct proportion to the increase of rent. The higher the rent the less must be the loss sustained, and the less the loss sustained the less the compensation to which the tenant would be entitled. Having regard to the Act of 1870 and the decision in Hok v. Harberton, nothing more was required in order to destroy the benefits intended to be conferred by the Act of 1870 than to procure the acceptance by your tenant of a lease for 81 years at a rack rent; and wherever any part of the rent so reserved represented the value of the holding as improved by the tenant, nothing could be more unreasonable or unfair, having regard to the provisions of the Act. As to covenant in relation to county cess, I do not think that such a covenant can be considered as unfair or unreasonable, standing alone. The Act of 1870 contemplated that the parties might contract regarding its payment, and it appears to me to be merely a question of more or less rent; but the presence or absence of the covenant in a lease may have, and indeed I think must have, some bearing on the fairness or reasonableness of the rent reserved, having regard to the rights of the tenant under the Act of 1870, immediately prior to the execution of the lease. I only desire to make one other observation, and that is on the forfeiture clause. I do not think a forfeiture clause is unreasonable or unfair if limited to breaches of covenant of the character of the statutory conditions set out in the 5th section of the Act of 1881; but when most minute and almost harassing provisions are inserted in a lease, in relation to the manner in which the holding must be used and enjoyed, and when the forfeiture clause is made applicable to the most trifling and insignificant breach, in such case I would be prepared to hold the clause unfair and unreasonable. I think it was so in this case, and I entirely concur in the conclusion that this lease should be set aside.

KELLY v. GRIFFITH.

Dec. 7, 24, 1881.—Lease made since 1870—Terms unfair or unreasonable—Fine—Excessive rent—Improvements—Disturbance—Forfeiture of right to compensation—Tenant having equitable estate under deed of trust—Right to apply—Landlord—Burthen of proof as to whether tenancy is one from year to year.

A tenant from year to year compelled, by threat of eviction, to accept a lease at an excessive rent and to pay a fine, is entitled to have the lease set aside as containing terms unfair or unreasonable, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870.

Quære, whether the lowness of the rent would be taken into account as counterbalancing terms in other respects unfair to the tenant—e.g., loss of his right to compensation for improvements, and the fact of the tenant's having paid a fine, might be counterbalanced by the lowness of the rent?

Semble.—An excessive rent will be regarded as determining the fairness of the other terms in the lease.

Application, on behalf of a tenant, to have a lease declared void. The circumstances so far as they are material are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Bird, for the landlord, contra.

O'HAGAN, J.—In this case an originating notice, bearing date the 25th October, 1881, was served, seeking to have a lease of the 29th September, 1872, declared void, upon the grounds that it contained terms which were, at the time of such acceptance, unreasonable and unfair to the tenant—namely, that the tenant was compelled to accept said lease at the yearly rent of £47 11s., which was and is excessive, and not a fair rent; and the said tenant was compelled to pay £150 as a fine, which was not stated in the said lease, and should have been taken into consideration in reducing said rent; and that the acceptance thereof was obtained by threat of eviction. Portion of the above statement is an error. The fine of £150 is stated on the face of the lease. The lease is one not made to Honor Kelly herself, but to her son Edward Kelly, for the life of the Duke of Cambridge, at £1 12s. 6d. per Irish acre; but by a declaration of trust signed by him, and bearing date the 23rd of March, 1877, he declared that he obtained the land as a trustee for his mother, Honor Kelly. A good deal of evidence was gone into to show that she was regarded as the tenant from the time of the lease; and one curious feature in the case was, that for some years after the lease the receipts were given neither to the son, who was the lessee in trust, nor to the mother, who was the cestui que trust, but to the representative of the deceased husband of Honor Kelly. There is no doubt that Honor Kelly remained in occupation of the house and farm throughout, and that it was she who cultivated and managed the latter. Her son, the actual lessee, was a shopkeeper in Collooney. He is now in America. The declaration of trust is before us, an unimpeached instrument upon which we must act. Although the legal estate is in him, the legal and beneficial owner of the lease is Mrs. Kelly, who is in the actual occupation of the lands. Therefore, though not having the legal estate, she is, in our opinion, a tenant entitled to apply under the 21st section of the Act. The husband of Honor Kelly died on the 4th April, 1861. The old rent was £32 16s. 6d. a year, about 16s. the Irish acre. The valuation of the premises was £45. It is alleged that her husband held under a lease. So far as we can collect, this was so; but no evidence sufficient for us to act upon as regards the terms, or duration, or determination of this lease appeared before us. The payment of rent being proved before the execution of the present lease, the presumption is that there was a tenancy from year to year, until the contrary is proved. The burthen of proof is on the landlord, and all that he says is that his father's documents were somehow lost or stolen at the time of his death, but he cannot speak as to the terms of the former lease. After her husband's death, in 1861, Mrs. Kelly continued in occupation of the premises and paid the rent, although the receipts were given in the name of the representatives of Michael Kelly. In September, 1871, there was a demand of possession by a bailiff of the estate, named Edward Kelly. She refused to give up possession. Afterwards, she says, Captain Griffith himself and his agent came to her house, in the year 1872. Captain Griffith asked her what she was going to do about her land, and she told him she intended to keep it if she possibly could. He told her she could not expect to have it at the old rent. "I said I thought it was plenty for it, when I myself made the improvements. He said I would not have it at that. He told me to say what rent I would give. I told him I thought the old rent was sufficient. He said 'That won't do. I can get double the rent, and £250 of a fine.' I told him I would not give that, because I could get no money. Then he said, 'You will not get it.' When he was leaving I told him I would give Griffith's valuation, and I could not give more than £1 an acre. He left my house, and he and my son had whatever more talk there was about it." The next matter she deposes to is as to what occurred in the office of Mr. Moloney, the solicitor, in Sligo, who is now dead. Mr. Griffith, according to her account, said to her: "Now, Mrs. Kelly, I am going to sacrifice £100 on your account, and I will take £150 and double the rent." She says they had then the lease in their hands, but she herself was not present at the actual execution of the lease, which, strange to say, never appears to have been executed by the lessee at all. Captain Griffith and Mr. Palmer, his agent, were examined. Mr. Griffith says he never dealt with the old woman, but with her son, and that her son, who was a shopkeeper in Collooney, came to him in 1872, after the lease fell in, and asked him for a new lease. Captain Griffith said he would be very glad to give it to him, but could not give it to him at the same rent his father had it at, that he had it very cheap. He told him to send in a proposal; that there was another man, who is a large tenant of his on an adjoining farm, most anxious to get it. Captain Griffith further said he would double the rent, and that Kelly must give him a fine for the buildings. I will revert to the question of the buildings. At present I am dealing with the circumstances under which the lease was accepted. Mr. Palmer says he valued the farm, and put on it 32s. 6d. an acre. He was asked whether any objection was made by the tenant, and he answers significantly, "There was the usual conversation, and I think the end of it was, he wanted me to leave the rent at 30s." "Was anything said about a fine?—Yes, Captain Griffith wanted £250; and I think I was partly the means of inducing him to take £150." We are of opinion, that although there was no notice to quit or other legal proceedings, there was a very distinct intimation that if the tenants did not yield to Captain Griffith's terms, the land would be taken from them and given to another. There was in substance a threat of eviction.

Now, to turn to the lease itself. Does it contain terms unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the Land Act of 1870? We have already decided in the case of Ewart v. Gray, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 23, that the section is not confined to leases containing clauses or covenants debaring the tenant from the benefits of the Act, but comprises every lease which, taken altogether, in our opinion contains terms unreasonable or unfair to the tenant, having regard to the Act of 1870. In this case valuable buildings had been unquestionably erected on the farm. Mrs. Kelly swears positively that these buildings were erected by her husband, who died in debt in consequence of the expense incurred in erecting them; upon that point, on which she spoke most positively, she was not cross-examined. Captain Griffith says the buildings were erected by his father; but of that he gives no evidence whatever, except that he says his father told him, which of course must be simply wiped out from our minds as forming no evidence whatever. Mrs. Kelly is asked as to her own knowledge as to what her husband did, and she answered, "all the improvements that are on it he made them all, and that he expended £500 upon them." Mr. Mitchell, a practical farmer residing in the neighbourhood, who knows the lands for about thirty years, says he remembers the improvements made by Michael Kelly, the husband of Mrs. Kelly; very extensive and very good improvements. That he saw Kelly's men working at the house; that he did not know who paid for the house, but he saw Mr. Kelly getting it built. He says, besides, that he saw him improving the land itself; that he was a very improving man; that he removed walls and took out stones, and made drains—everything a good tenant could do to the land. He estimates the value of the buildings at the present time, taking into account that the tenant had the use of them, at £350—£300 for the dwelling-house and £50 for the office. If, in fact, these improvements, which appear to have been made twenty years ago, were in reality made by the landlord, it is impossible there should not be some evidence of the fact forthcoming; we conclude that they were made by the tenant. For the value of these improvements the tenant was entitled to be paid, in addition to compensation for disturbance, what might amount to three years' rent of the holding. The entire of the compensation for disturbance was, as the law then stood, lost and forfeited by the acceptance of the new lease, according to the law as laid down in Holt v. Harberton, 6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1, and other cases. In addition the tenant had to pay a fine of £150 on a lease for a single life, a rent of £1 12s. 6d. an Irish acre, double the former rent. In estimating this rent Mr. Palmer took into account not only the buildings, but also the fact that the tenant had the lands before at a cheap rate. Mr. Commissioner Vernon then said to him, "You state that you valued the land, and one item you took into consideration was that the tenant had it for twenty-one years at a cheap rate. Would you consider that an element in valuing land as it stood, that the tenant had had it cheap for twenty one years?" He answers, "I would not; but I would consider it as an element that you should not be very lenient in fixing the rent." As to the amount of rent, we have the evidence of Mr. Mitchell, to whom I have referred above. He says distinctly that at any time £1 12s. 6d. an acre was an exorbitant rent for the land. It is true that for some time Mrs. Kelly did make something out of the land by letting in consacre. But on that subject Mr. Mitchell says, from his own experience, that anyone who lets in consacre cannot make by it, because the land is so much reduced. He says he knows that Mrs. Kelly has not run out the land by a system of consacre for any length of time; that she treated the land well after the consacre people, laying it down with clover. The present value of the land he estimates as follows:—For 36a. 3f. 3p. of arable, 18s. an acre; for 3a. 2r. 4p. of marsh and swamp, 4s. 6d. per acre. We enter into this question of the rent, not that we are directly estimating the fair rent of the holding, but because it is impossible for us, in this inquiry, to leave the rent out of our view. It might be possible that the terms might be in other respects unfair to the tenant—that the right to his improvements might be lost, that a fine might be paid, and that these losses might be counterbalanced by the lowness of the rent. But in this case we are of opinion that the rent itself is excessive, even if there were no improvements and no fine. We are unanimously of opinion that the lease is unfair to the tenant, having regard to the Act of 1870. We accordingly declare it void as from the date of our order.

Jan. 10, 1882.—Turbary—Reclaimed lands not included in ambit of holding—Right of landlord to soil after turf cut away—Admission of Estate Rentals in evidence.

Where a portion of land covered with turf was adjacent to the original holding of the tenant, though not comprised in the ambit of the holding, and the tenant possessed a right of turbary over such land:

Held, that the tenant possessed no right to the soil after the turf was cut away, but that the soil remained vested in the landlord, subject to the easement on the part of the tenant of cutting turf.

The Rentals of Estates are admissible in evidence in cases before the Court.

Application, on behalf of a tenant, to have a judicial rent fixed for his holding.

The originating notice set out that the holding consisted of 12a. 1r. 20p., statute measure, and the present rent was £4. From the evidence it appeared that the tenant held 2a. 2r. Op. of the holding in the year 1836, at a rent of £2. In 1857 the landlord caused a survey of the holding to be made, when it was found that by reason of the cutting away of the adjoining bog the tenant was in possession of 5a. 2r. Op., and the rent was accordingly raised to £3. By a recent survey it was found the holding had in a similar manner been increased and contained 7a. 1r. 9p., statute measure, and the rent was raised to £4. It also appeared that the tenant had the privilege of turbary on 5 acres of the bog remaining, and was allowed to spread the turf when cut on the surface of the bog.

Dane, for the landlord, asked that the originating notice should be amended by inserting in it the area of the holding as 7a. 1r. 9p., and not 12a. 1r. 20p. He contended that it was clear from the evidence that the holding had been yearly added to by the cutting away of the bog; and the landlord had no objection to the tenant having included in his holding the land so reclaimed, and a fair rent then fixed; but he strongly objected to his being given 5 acres of bog which clearly had never formed portion of his holding.

Mr. M'Donnell, solicitor, for the tenant, contended that the holding had always consisted of 12a. 1r. 20p., which included the bog, and he relied on a Poor Law Valuation certificate which set out, that in 1858 Griffith's Valuation stated there was that area in the holding. The tenant also had sworn that he had been in possession of that area.

Dane.—That certificate is only prima facie evidence, and has been fully rebutted by that given.

Mr. Roche.—In this case the judgment I am about to deliver is that of my brother Lynch and myself, Mr. Commissioner Morrison dissenting from the view we take. The evidence is principally documentary, and, in my mind, the documentary evidence produced by the landlord is clear and conclusive on the point that this holding does not contain 12a. 1r. 20p. as stated in the originating notice, but 7a. 1r. 9p., and that the originating notice should be accordingly amended. The first entry we find is in the estate rental of 1836, where we find John Oates holding 1a. 1r. 18p. Irish, and the map attached to the rental and coloured blue defines this portion very clearly as in Oates' possession, a large area containing 4a. 3r. 9p. lying to the South of Oates' holding being coloured yellow. The lands were surveyed in 1857, and in that survey we find Oates holding 3a. 1r. 25p. Irish. The course which was adopted by the tenant is clear; he had a right of cutting turf on the lands adjoining his holding, and as he exercised this right he reclaimed the portion cut away and made it cultivated land, and this land is now in his possession, and Mr. Stoney does not dispute his right to this portion. This portion added to the original amount of the holding will amount to 7r. 1r. 9p. statute. The question arises whether the tenant has a right to the remaining 5 acres of bog adjoining his holding which is not yet cut away, but on which he appears to possess a right of turbary. In my opinion, he has no right to the ownership of this land when so cut away. The landlord, as appears by the rental, never included these 5 acres in the ambit of the holding, and the tenant never held the lands in any manner hostile to the landlord's ownership thereof. It would, in my mind, be a principle highly dangerous to property, if it were held that, by a course of proceedings such as has taken place here, a landlord's rights could be lost. I will be no party to any such principle, and am prepared to hold that, when a tenant has exercised his right of turbary, he has no further right or interest in the soil. An objection has been raised in this case to the admission of the rentals and maps of the estate in evidence. I have already in similar cases ruled in favour of their admission, and, unless my decision is reversed on appeal, I shall continue to do so. In my opinion, it would work a monstrous injustice to landlords, and indeed to tenants also, if a tribunal possessing the extraordinary jurisdiction we have entrusted to us, were to reject the only means available to prove the history of the estate, and were to reject the truthful evidence of these ancient documents connected with the estate, containing entries in favour of landlord and tenant alike.

The writ of summons, issued the 10th January, 1882, claimed the recovery of damages for assault and battery. The defendant, in his affidavit, after detailing the circumstances under which the assault was alleged to have been committed, deposed that the plaintiff is a "small farmer," and, "that neither the plaintiff nor I have any means to carry on expensive litigation in the superior courts." The plaintiff, in his affidavit, deposed to his having two large farms of land, and denied that the action was speculative.

demurrer books, to enter the demurrer within ten days; otherwise the demurrer is admitted.

Motion for judgment in an action for recovery of land for non-payment of rent. The statement of claim averred that the plaintiff had let the lands of Ballymacshanboy, in the County of Limerick, by lease to Daniel Connolly; that the defendant was in possession of the said lands and paid rent under the said lease, and that one year's rent was now due. The defendant pleaded that the lessee, Daniel Connolly, never executed the lease and did not enter into possession under it. To this defence the plaintiff demurred, on the ground that by such defence the defendant admitted the making of the lease by the lessor, the possession by the defendant of the lands demised, the payment of rent under the lease, and that more than one year's rent was due. The demurrer was not set down for argument within ten days, as required by O. XXVII., r. 6; but, on the ninth day, the solicitors for defendant wrote to the solicitors for plaintiff requiring to be furnished with the points of demurrer. The points of demurrer not having been furnished until after the tenth day, and the demurrer not having been set down, the plaintiff accordingly moved for judgment.

Carson, for plaintiff.—The demurrer not having been set down for argument within ten days after delivery, the plaintiff's claim must be taken to be admitted, under O. XXVII., r. 6, and he is entitled to judgment.

Shannon, contra.—It is conceded that under O. XXVII., r. 6, the onus is now cast on the party whose pleading is demurred to of entering the demurrer for argument, but the party demurring must still furnish the points of demurrer. These cannot be supposed to be within the knowledge of the party demurred to. It is true that O. XXVII., r. 6, is silent as to this, but G. O. 1854, r. 50, requiring demurrer books to be made up is still in force. These books must be made up by the party demurring—i.e., in this case the plaintiff, and he has failed to do so. Till they are so made up the defendant cannot set down the demurrer for argument. If there were no demurrer books the inconvenience to the court as well as to the parties would be considerable, the points for argument not being known till stated in court. In the only reported case on the subject since the Jud. Act, it is assumed that demurrer books are still necessary: Crawford v. Heathcote, 12 Ir. L. T. Rep. 135.

PARSONS, C.B.—In this case I must hold that O. XXVII., r. 6, practically repeals G. O. 1854, r. 50, requiring demurrer books to be lodged. I am aware that this change must be attended with the greatest possible inconvenience, but the words of the new rule are too strong to leave any other conclusion open to me. O. XXVII., r. 6, provides that either party may enter the demurrer for argument "immediately;" and this is inconsistent with G. O. 1854, r. 50, which would give six days for making up demurrer books and two more for examination. The defendant should have set down the demurrer for argument within ten days. However, as we do not wish that parties should be misled or taken by surprise through such a change in the old practice, I am prepared in this case to show both parties some indulgence. The defence was clearly well pleaded, and therefore, I shall allow the plaintiff, if he thinks fit, to withdraw the demurrer, and put the defendant upon terms which will insure a trial being had before Christmas. Each party must abide his own costs of this motion.

Order accordingly.

MORRIS v. CRANWELL AND WIFE.

Dec. 21, 1881.—Practice—Amendment of writ and statement of claim—Married woman—Separate estate—Married Women's Property Acts (33 & 34 Vic., c. 93, s. 12; 37 & 38 Vic., c. 50, ss. 1, 2, 4).

Where in proceedings against a husband and wife for breach of contract by the wife before marriage it is sought to charge the separate estate of the wife, the Court will allow the pleadings to be amended by inserting a claim against it.

A new and independent claim cannot be introduced into a statement of claim without amending the writ of summons. Moore v. Alwell, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 54, followed.

Summons, on behalf of plaintiff, for liberty to amend the writ of summons and statement of claim. The action was for breach of promise of marriage by the female defendant before her marriage with the co-defendant. The original writ of summons claimed £1,500 damages against both defendants for the breach. The statement of defence contained, inter alia, a plea on behalf of the husband that the defendants were married after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act (1870), Amendment Act, 1874, and that he did not receive any assets on the occasion of the said marriage, and was not, therefore, liable for his wife's prior engagements. The amendment to the writ of summons sought was an addition to the claim in the indorsement, "that it may be declared that the separate estate of the said Matilda Cranwell is well charged with and liable to the payment of the said damages," and "an inquiry as to said separate estate, whereof it consists, and in whom it is vested," directed, and for further relief. An affidavit of plaintiff's solicitor, filed in support of the motion, stated that the female defendant was possessed of considerable property before her marriage, and that the same now formed separate estate belonging to her, save in so far as the defendant, Thomas Cranwell, might have received assets with her upon his marriage.

Hitchcock, in support of the motion.—The statement of claim could be amended before reply without leave: O. XXVI., r. 1; but this amendment could not be made unless the indorsement in the writ were also amended: Moore v. Alwell, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 54, 8 L. R. Ir. 245. The proposed amendment corresponds to the order made in Picard v. Hine, 5 Ch. D. 278. The proper course is to direct an inquiry into the separate estate in the first instance: Davies v. Jenkins, 6 Ch. D. 728. The plaintiff has the same right to charge the separate estate as he had before the Married Women's Property Act, 1870: Chubbs v. Stretch, L. R. 9 Eq. 555; and the claim against the separate estate must appear on the pleadings whether made under the old law or under the Act of 1870, s. 12. It is uncertain whether the word "debts" in s. 12 of the Act of 1870 includes breach of contract. Sec. 4 of the Amendment Act, 1874, does not apply, because, if the issue on the special defence were found in favour of the defendant, no damages could be recovered, and there could be no "residue" within the meaning of that section. The judgment to be of any use should specifically charge the separate estate.

Lynch, contra.—The amendment sought is unnecessary, for it is already given to the plaintiff by section 4 of the Amendment Act. He is not in any way advanced by having this claim on the writ.

He cited:—Pollock on Con. 65, 69; Pike v. Fitz- gibbon, 17 Ch. D. 454; Johnson v. Gallagher, 3 D. F. J. 494; Dixon v. Dougan, 8 L. R. Ir. 211.

PAILES, C.B.—I think the amendment should be allowed. In order to raise the question the plaintiff ought to put in this claim. We so decided in Moore v. Alwell (ubi supra), a case which ran counter to two English decisions, Large v. Large, W. N., 1877, 198, and Johnson v. Palmer, 4 C. P. D. 258, but which was lately followed in the English Court of Appeal. Large v. Large was therefore wrong, and it may now be taken as settled that Moore v. Alwell is right. Mr. Lynch does not contest this point, but he argues that the proposed amendment is unnecessary as the law gives the plaintiff the remedy he seeks. Now I will not decide that the plaintiff could not get relief without the amendment. [His Lordship read sec. 12 of the Act of 1870, and sec. 4 of the Amendment Act, 1874.] If he gets judgment against the female defendant he would be entitled to an inquiry into her separate estate, which would then become liable. But, I do not think this is a sufficient answer. A party has a right to an inquiry of that description if there is an allegation in the statement of claim that the married woman has separate estate: Gallagher v. Lady Nugent, 8 L. R. Ir. 353. The plaintiff is here entitled to proceed in either of two ways—the way he first adopted in the action, and the way he now proposes by the amendment. If the first course were pursued the defendant could deny the receipt of assets under s. 2 of the Act of 1874, and that could be decided at the hearing. There are several instances where bills have been dismissed on proof of no separate estate. Prior to the Act of 1870 separate estate was only liable in a Court of Equity, the legal estate being in the husband, subject to a trust for the separate use of his wife. If you proceeded in rem against her estate you had to proceed in a Court of Equity. By the Act of 1870, s. 12, the remedy is against her separate estate, which is made liable. On this section Malina, V.C., in Chubbs v. Stretch decided that property settled by a woman to her separate estate continues liable for engagements entered into by her before marriage, though she be personally discharged by the bankruptcy of her husband. I am unable to prevent Mr. Hitchcock from raising this point. I will not, as a single judge, go against the decision in that case and prevent the plaintiff from raising the question; and, therefore, I shall extend the time for amending the statement of claim. If Mr. Lynch objects to this, he can raise the point afterwards by demurrer. I think Pike v. Fitzgibbon does not touch this case. Costs of both parties costs in the cause—Mr. Lynch to plead, if he likes, to the amended statement of claim without further order.

MAGNER v. NORREYS AND ANOTHER.

Dec. 9, 1881.—Undue influence—Threat of eviction—Lease—Unfair or unreasonable terms—Improvements—Compensation—Assignee—Personal representative—Jurisdiction—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21.

Semble, that a covenant by which the tenant agreed to make at his own expense any improvements that might be necessary and desirable, and not claim compensation for them, even though the tenant's valuation empowered him to enter into such a covenant, would be unreasonable.

Quære, whether the Court has jurisdiction to raise a personal representative to a deceased lessee, for the purpose of having a lease declared void under the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21?

The insertion in leases of declarations, contrary to the fact, that all improvements had been made by the lessor, animadverted on, and their effect discussed.

Application that lease be declared void, under Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21.—The farm, the subject-matter of the application, was situated at Kilconway, near Mallow, and contained 89 statute acres at a rent of £105 5s. 5d., the valuation being £66 5s. The father of the tenant had in 1853 been put in possession of part of the land containing 37 Irish acres for three years at £1 3s. the Irish acre, and the land was at the time in a very impoverished condition. The tenant rebuilt the dwelling-house and built substantial farm buildings. In 1856 the rent was increased to 36s. per Irish plantation acre. It also appeared that the land had to be limed and manured in order to put it in a proper state for cultivation. In 1868 or 1869 a notice to quit was served, but rent was subsequently received. In 1869 an adjoining farm became vacant, and the applicant's father became tenant of it on paying a separate rent.

The rent of the new take, which comprised 18 acres, was £2 an acre. Two proposals had been sent to the landlord for the two farms, offering to take them at the increased rent for 31 years. They were not, however, accepted, and the matter continued in treaty from 1869 to 1871, when eventually two leases were given—one comprising the tenant's old take and the 18 acres already referred to which had belonged to a man named Farrell, and which the tenant wanted for the purpose of rounding his farm, and the other lease comprising the rest of Farrell's land. The lease contained a clause declaring that all the improvements necessary and proper for the working, cultivation, or management of the lands had been theretofore made and executed by the lessor. It was, also, covenanted that, in consideration that the necessary improvements had been made by the lessor and of the term granted, the lessee should make and execute at his own expense for the future any improvements that he might consider necessary or desirable, and that he would not claim any compensation in respect thereof. The lessee, also, covenanted not to claim any compensation for disturbance or upon any other account whatsoever under the Land Act of 1870, or under any other law, custom, or usage whatsoever. The lease contained a covenant against assignment; and notwithstanding it the father of the applicant assigned his interest without consent. Moreover, the tenant to whom the lease was made was dead intestate, and no letters of administration to him had been taken out. Both parties having gone into evidence,

J. Roche, for the tenant.—The recital that all the improvements had been made by the landlord is in fact false. It corroborates the evidence given that the leases had been forced upon the tenant. The tenant further binds himself not to claim compensation for any improvements that he might afterwards make, and which he covenanted to make and execute at his own expense. He had no solicitor.

[O'HAGAN, J.—There is no consent to the assignment endorsed on the instrument. The Court has power to raise any point between assignor and assignee. The objection can be waived by assent at any time.]

MAGNER v. NORREYS AND ANOTHER.

[Lane, for the landlord.—The estate is vested in trustees, and they have no power to endorse the assignment.]

If they refuse to give assent to the assignment we shall raise a legal personal representative. The personal representative would be in the same position as the lessee. The Court has power to raise a personal representative.

[O'HAGAN, J.—We have all the powers of the Act of 1870 with respect to raising a personal representative, but I do not think we have power to raise a personal representative for the purposes of the 21st section.]

Lane, contra.—All the requisites of the 21st section must coincide. No threat of eviction has been proved, and the undue influence should be of the same character as would be relied on in a case before the Court of Probate. You may lead a party into a contract, but you cannot drive him. There is nothing to show it here except that some one said the landlord had stated that he had been offered £2 an acre. That is not undue influence. The increase of rent is only on the old take, but there is no increase where the two holdings are taken together. There is an important legal question as to the right of an assignee to claim the benefit of the 21st section. He is not entitled to apply. The setting aside of a lease has been always regarded as a personal equity in the lessee which he would not be entitled to assign. It would require express enactment to change the rule. The Legislature did not contemplate the conferring of any such right, as it did not provide the requisite machinery. How are you to work out the personal equities? The sum of £350 has been paid. If it be equitable that the lease should be set aside, the rights of the parties should be adjusted. You would not be dealing with the person injured, but you would be conferring a benefit on a party who never bargained for it. If the benefit of the 21st section be intended for one assignee, it must be intended for any other. The tenant is the person who accepted the lease, and the same language is used throughout the section. A person could not derive a title to set aside a lease by assignment. The Court will not depart from that principle unless coerced. Our objections are (1) that to hold an assignee entitled would be equivalent to champerty and maintenance; (2) the Legislature did not contemplate it, as they provided no machinery for adjusting the equities between the assignor and assignee.

J. Roche, in reply.—The receipt of rent between March and September is evidence of a yearly tenancy; undue influence or coercion in obtaining the lease is proved by the lease itself. The assignee is entitled because the definition of tenant includes successors in title.

O'HAGAN, J.—In order to bring himself within the 21st section, the applicant must have been a yearly tenant whose acceptance of a lease was procured by undue influence or threat of eviction, and it must be shown that the lease so accepted contained terms that were unreasonable or unfair, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870. Mr. Roche has put before us very strongly that one of the conditions of the section existed very clearly in the case—namely, that the lease contained terms that were unreasonable or unfair, and he relied upon the clause in which it was said to be hereby declared, admitted, and agreed by and between the said parties that all improvements, necessary, proper, or desirable for the working, cultivation, or management of the land had been heretofore made and executed by the lessor, and in consideration thereof, and the term thereby granted, the lessee covenanted to make and execute, at his own expense, any improvements which might be necessary or desirable; and for any improvements that he should make at any time hereafter he should not claim compensation, nor was he to claim compensation for disturbance, or upon any other account whatsoever, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, or under any other Act, law, custom, or usage whatsoever.

Now, as to the declaration that all improvements necessary or proper for the due cultivation of the farm had been made and executed by the lessor—if that were the fact, and it was agreed upon between the landlord and tenant—it would be a right and proper thing to insert the declaration, in order to perpetuate the testimony of it. But, I observe that this lease is a printed form, elaborately framed, merely leaving spaces for the names, dates, and the amount of rent. The clause I have just read is a printed one, therefore plainly intended to be adopted and executed by every tenant, and it would therefore happen that it might be adopted and executed by the tenants, wholly irrespective of whether it might be applicable to their cases or not. That being so, I am bound to say for myself, and I am sure I may say the same for my colleagues, that I should speak in strong reprobation of any such clause being introduced as any ordinary printed clause in the leases of any estate. With respect to the clause by which the tenant covenants to make at his own expense any improvements which he might consider necessary or desirable, and should not claim compensation, all I can say is that it amounts in substance to a mutual covenant that the land should be unimproved during the whole term of the lease, because it could not be expected that a tenant bound by that covenant would improve his farm. The covenant is perfectly legal, as the tenant's valuation enabled him to contract himself out of the Act, but it was a covenant practically debarring him from making improvements; and though such a covenant might be perfectly legal within the Act of 1870, it might at the same time be most unreasonable. If it could be shown in any way that such a covenant had been procured by threat of eviction most certainly I would go a considerable way to think it an unreasonable covenant. However, the section requires that a lease containing unreasonable clauses and covenants should be obtained by threat of eviction or undue influence. On that point it is our unanimous opinion that the case of the tenant fails.

Two proposals, in technical form, drawn with care, and complete in all the essential requisites, had been sent to the landlord. One was signed by James Magner, and it began, "I propose and promise to pay £ as annual rent for the holding containing 41 acres for and during the time or term of 31 years." There was another proposal by Byrne: "I promise to pay, &c." [His lordship having read both proposals, which contained the term for which the leases were to be granted, the time from which they were to begin, the rent proposed to be paid, and the extent of the holding comprised in each proposal, continued.] These were two technically-drawn proposals, and if the landlord had accepted them they would have become leases, plainly upon their own proposal, without any suggestion of the landlord. That proposal had not been accepted; negotiations went on, and eventuated, in September, 1871, in two leases, both of them given to Magner—one of them comprising his own old take, together with 17 acres of Farrell's, and the second lease comprising the rest of Farrell's two holdings. The second lease he settled upon his daughter, the other he plainly intended for his son. Accepting these leases it would require most cogent evidence that, notwithstanding the two proposals referred to, and which have been just read, he had in the interval changed his mind, and became determined to remain a tenant from year to year, and

O'HARA AND OTHERS v. M'GEOUGH.

Where cases, entered for hearing at a previous sitting in Armagh of a Sub-Commission, were adjourned on the terms of the payment by the tenants of the costs of the day:

Held, that payment of the costs as ordered was a condition precedent to cases being called on for hearing now; following the practice in the Civil Bill Court under Rule 2 (Land Act, 1881) and Rule 22 of 29th October, 1870.

On those cases, which appeared in the list for hearing before the Sub-Commission at Armagh, having been called on by the Registrar,

Mr. Simpson, solicitor, for the landlord, applied that the costs of the adjournment, ordered by the former Sub-Commission in November, 1881, to be paid to the landlord, should be first paid. Rule 20 of the code under the Act of 1870 provided for the adoption, under the Act of 1870, of the practice in force for the Civil Bill Courts in ejectment proceedings, and Rule 2 of those issued under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, necessarily implies the same course of procedure. In the County Courts the invariable practice has always been that such costs should be paid before the party directed to pay them could proceed.

Mr. Girvin, solicitor, for tenants, argued that the practice referred to did not apply to proceedings under the Act of 1881.

Mr. FITZGERALD—In my opinion, Mr. Simpson's view is the correct one, and we accordingly direct that unless the amount of those costs be first paid we must, before the close of these sittings, strike out the cases altogether.

The costs were thereupon paid, and the hearing of the cases was by consent postponed until a subsequent day.

STOTHERS v. NICHOLSON.

Feb., 1882.—Home farm, what constitutes—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

A landlord having, upwards of thirty years ago, resumed possession of about 77 acres of land near his residence, and kept them in his own hands as his own farm for many years, had let parts of them, in 1856, to yearly tenants, who held them till 1859, when the landlord again resumed possession, and laid down the entire in grass. In 1866 the house, demesne, and these particular lands were all let to another tenant who gave all up in November, 1868; and about a month afterwards the present tenant took a lease for seven years of 17½ acres of these 77 at a rent of £35. On the termination of the lease he continued to hold on as a yearly tenant:

Held, that the holding formed part of the home farm attached to the landlord's residence, and that notwith*standing the dealings since 1856 with these lands, they still retained the character of a home farm, and were therefore excluded from the operation of the Land Law Act, 1881, by virtue of section 58 (2).*

Application to fix a fair rent in respect of holding containing 17a. 2r. 35p. statute of lands of Cranagill, county Armagh, held under a yearly tenancy at a rent of £35 per annum. The tenant had taken lands in November, 1868, on a lease for seven years at the same rent, and on the termination of the lease remained on in possession as yearly tenant at the same rent nominally, though he annually got an abatement of between £3 and £4. Evidence was given to show that in the year 1848 about 77 acres of the lands (of which the present holding formed a part) were in the occupation of several small tenants whose interest the landlord had purchased up, and whose holdings he had cleared of fences, houses, &c., and thrown into large square fields, and ornamentally fenced in. The entire lay immediately adjacent to the demesne and house of Cranagill. He had kept it in his own hands for a home farm until 1856, when parts of it were let to yearly tenants who kept them till 1859, when the landlord again resumed possession, and put all down in grass, and used them for his own farm till 1866, when he let the house, demesne, and lands (including these 17½ acres) to a Mr. Shillington, who occupied the place as a residence for two years. Then this particular part was let to the present tenant on lease as above mentioned. Other portions of the 77 acres had been also let since then to other parties, one of whom had given up his holding last December voluntarily. None of the tenants of any part of the 77 acres had ever paid any input in respect of their holdings.

Smith, for the landlord.—The lands were clearly part of the owner's "home farm," and as such were excluded from the operations of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, under the terms of sec. 58 (2). That sub-section has for the first time introduced the term "home farm" as a term perfectly distinct from that known since 1870 as "demesne" lands; and the very language of the sub-section shows that, in order to treat a holding as part of a "home farm," it is not necessary that it should have been originally demised as such. The only question is, "Did these lands form part of a home farm?" If so, no matter by what designation they were described in the lease, they are now, as part of a home farm, in fact, outside of the Act altogether. Admittedly they were made part of the landlord's home farm in 1848, and so used by him until 1856. He resumed ownership over them in 1859, and down to 1866 used them again as part of his home farm, in connexion with his residence and demesne adjoining; and then set the entire place to one gentleman, who for two years used them as the landlord himself had done before. In 1868, no doubt, the owner let this particular holding to the present tenant on a lease in which the lands were simply called "part of the lands of Cranagill;" but the lease contains covenants on the tenant's part to prevent trespass over the lands, to prevent footpaths being made across them, and to keep the farm path, abutting on part of the holding, in good order; and these covenants clearly indicate that, even in so temporarily letting the lands, the landlord had still in view the subsequent retention of the holding as part of the "home farm," from which, for the time, it was to be so excluded. It is submitted that the decisions in respect of "demesne" lands have no application to cases such as this.

STOTHERS v. NICHOLSON.—WILSON v. ENSOR.—M'CURDY v. HEYGATE.

Mr. Gallagher, solicitor, for the tenant.—Even assuming these lands ever had the character of part of a home farm, the fact that they had been let in 1856 simply as lands for ordinary agricultural purposes, and again in 1868, divested them of any such character. In the very lease executed to the present tenant in 1868 the lands were not called part of a home farm or of demesne lands, but simply lands. They were let as an agricultural holding; they were used as such by the tenant, uncontrolled by any special clauses in the lease, and the decision of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald in Hill v. Antrim, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 70, is a clear authority in favour of the tenant's contention in this case. The language of that decision might be applied to the case thus:—"Is it to be supposed that, because there is a wall or fence round these grounds, all within the enclosure is, therefore, a demesne or home farm within the Act. Even if it was once a demesne or home farm the parties have acted in such a way as entirely to denude it of that character."

The Commissioners having stated they would reserve judgment until they had inspected the premises,

Mr. FITZGERALD.—The holding in this case consists of two large fields, amounting in the whole to 17a. 2r. 35p. statute measure. It was let to the tenant in 1868, under a lease for seven years, at the rent of £25 8s. 4d. Since the expiration of the lease in 1875 the tenant has continued in possession as a yearly tenant. The holding is situated at the rear of Cranagill House, the residence of the landlord, who alleges that it forms part of the demesne or home farm attached to such residence, and that as such it is excluded from the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. It appears that the landlord's father purchased this residence many years ago; that at the time of his purchase there were a number of tenants occupying the present holding; that he bought up their interests, threw down the fences, and made the holding into what it is at present—namely, two large squared fields. There appears to be about 77 acres, inclusive of the holding in this case, lying completely round the residence. The residence, with the entire 77 acres, was let to a Mr. Shillington some time previous to the present tenant going into occupation of the holding, while from 1856 to 1859 about 44 acres, including the present holding, was let to a man named Hyde. With the exception of the foregoing lettings, the present holding appears to have been in the landlord's hands since 1848 and worked or grazed by him. Lettings appear to have been made of some other portions of the 77 acres; in one instance a letting so made of a portion similarly circumstanced to the present holding was voluntarily surrendered by the tenant to the landlord last December. The present landlord lives away from the residence the greater portion of the year. The tenant does not appear to have created any improvements. From our inspection of the premises, and consideration of the evidence, we have come to the conclusion that the holding formed part of a home farm attached to the landlord's residence; that there has been nothing in the dealings by the parties in connexion with it to denude it of that character; and that it was never intended to separate the holding in a permanent manner from the residence of Cranagill, to which it had been attached as a home farm. We consequently dismiss this case, but, taking all the facts into consideration, we consider that it was a fair case on the tenant's part to bring into court, and we do not allow any costs.

WILSON v. ENSOR.

Feb., 1882.—Agricultural or pastoral holding—Farm taken as a residence merely—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (1).

On an application to fix a fair rent of a holding in Ardress East, county Armagh, containing 8a. 1r. 20p. statute measure, let at a rental of £28 per annum, and consisting of a farm and cottage thereon, the tenant, a book-keeper in a mill concerns two miles distant, having admitted that he took the place as a residence merely:

Held, that the holding was within the meaning of section 58 (1) of the Land Law Act, 1881, and accordingly that the notice should be dismissed with costs.

Application to fix a judicial rent.—The facts as appearing in evidence were as follows:—The holding had been occupied by successive clergymen in the parish as a residence from 1852 to about 1875. In the latter end of that year the present tenant applied for it and took it under a written agreement for a yearly tenancy at a rent of £28 per annum, and in that document the premises were described as "the cottage and farm of land." On the part of the landlord a notice of dispute (Form No. 29) had been served on the tenant. The tenant on cross-examination admitted that he took the place particularly as a residence, and had occupied it as such. He had farmed the land in both tillage and grazing.

Smith, for the landlord.—This application should be dismissed with costs, on the ground that the holding is clearly within the meaning of sub-section 1 of section 58 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881: M'Cutcheon v. Lansdowne, 9 Ir. L. T. Rep. 20; Carr v. Nuan, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 26.

Mr. M'Mordie, solicitor, for tenant, argued that the terms of the agreement were quite consistent with the holding being treated as a farm for agricultural purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD.—We have, however, the admission of the tenant that he took the place for a residence, and that he is engaged as a book-keeper in a concern some miles distant from early morning till late in the evening. The agreement refers no doubt to the land, but it deals specifically with matters of repairs of the house; and we think under such circumstances the holding is clearly a residential one, and therefore we must dismiss the notice with costs.

rent £63, and the Government valuation £44. The landlord produced an agreement of tenancy, dated 21st Nov., 1871, in which the premises were described as the "mill, kiln, and mill farm." The material facts, as they appeared in evidence, are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Colquhoun, Q.C., for the landlord.—This is not an agricultural or pastoral holding within the meaning of the Act. The rent of mill and land is not severed, but all held under one contract of tenancy. The landlord could not resume possession of the mill without taking up the land. The agreement contains a covenant to insure and also not to sell. If a judicial rent was fixed the tenant would have power to sell, and the landlord could not enforce these covenants. The last clause of sec. 7 of Land Law Act, 1881, allows a flax scutching mill to be deemed suitable to the holding on which it is erected, but does not provide for the case of a mill like the present one.

Decision deferred.

MR. BOURKE.—John M'Curdy has applied to us to fix a fair rent of his holding. The holding was originally held under lease dated the 14th of March, 1832, for lives and years, and the premises are therein called the Mill Farm, with the mill and corn kiln lately erected thereon. This lease expired on the death of James M'Curdy, and the premises were evicted, and the landlord kept them in his own hands for two years, repaired the mill, and re-let the premises to the applicant in Nov., 1871. It is right to say this eviction took place in consequence of disagreements amongst the M'Curdy's, and Mr. Gage, the landlord's agent, eventually settled the dispute, gave this holding to John M'Curdy, and M'Curdy paid £200 to the minors. An agreement was then entered into between the present landlord and tenant dated the 21st day of Nov., 1871, whereby Sir F. W. Heygate agreed to let and John M'Curdy agreed to take "all that and those the mill, kiln and mill farm, to hold unto the said John M'Curdy from the 1st of Nov., 1871, as tenant from year to year, at the yearly rent of £63, payable half-yearly;" and the agreement contains a covenant to insure the mill and kiln for £500. On the 16th of Dec., 1881, Mr. M'Curdy wrote a very proper letter to Sir Frederick Heygate, stating that he had asked Mr. Gage for a reduction, and that Mr. Gage had told him to send a statement of his case to the landlord; and in the letter he says:—"In the first place, I have no complaint about the land, with the exception of the acreage, which is only 21a. 1r. 6p." He then adds that the mill is not making much above the working expenses. He asks for a reduction in rent, and he suggests that £38 would be a fair rent. The landlord has offered to make a reduction in the yearly rent, but Mr. M'Curdy is not satisfied with the offer. It is unnecessary for us to consider who built the mill, it being in the landlord's hands before the letting to the present applicant. What we have to consider is, Was this let as an agricultural holding under the agreement of the 21st Nov., 1871, and is it a holding on which we can fix a rent? In my opinion we cannot divide this letting, and fix a rent on the land and leave the mill alone, and we could not fix a rent on the land and include the mill in the rent of the land. M'Curdy also states in his letter that he has no complaint about the land with the exception of the acreage, and solely complains that the mill is not now paying its working expenses. Mr. M'Curdy has no residence on the holding, and lets a considerable quantity of the land in conacre every year. It appears to me that, looking at the agreement and the entire of the holding, and having regard to the dealings of both parties respecting it for the purpose of ascertaining its character, both parties appear to have dealt with it as a mill and not as an agricultural or pastoral holding, and I do not think it was taken as a farm, and therefore we dismiss the application. We think, however, it was a fair case to have brought before the court, and we therefore give no costs.

FITZGERALD v. SHANAHAN.

Jan. 30; Feb. 1, 1882.—Town park, what constitutes—User—Pasture—Plantation of potatoes and cabbage—Agricultural holding—Accommodation land—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58.

In order to constitute a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2), it is not necessary that the holding should be used as pasture, if it is held as an accommodation to, and accessory of the tenant's town residence.

A tenant, who resided in a house in Dungan, occupied an adjoining plot of land under another landlord, which he used for the cultivation of potatoes and cabbage for consumption by his family. The land had been held to constitute an "agricultural holding" within the meaning of the L. & T. Act, 1870, by Dowse, B. On an application by the tenant to have a judicial rent fixed, under the Land Law Act, 1881:

Held, that, even though the holding were to be treated as an agricultural one, it was a town park, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2), as it was held solely as accommodatory and accessory to the tenant's town residence, for the purpose of supplying his family with cabbage and potatoes. Taylor v. Dowden (8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 83, Don. L. R. 517) discussed.

Application, by tenant, to have a judicial rent fixed.—The holding consisted of 35 perches (statute) in Dungan, held at a rent of £2, the poor-law valuation being 15s. The tenant, who resided in the town, in a cottage held under another landlord, deposed that when he took the land (originally at 30s.) it was a commonage. "He drew surface on it," and the landlord told him he would never disturb him. The use he made of the land was to grow potatoes and cabbage for his family. No witnesses were called for the landlord.

Mr. O'Connell, solicitor, for the tenant, mentioned that, on an appeal from a previous decision in the case, Dowse, B., had held that the holding was an agricultural one, and the case had been referred to in a book by Mr. Healy on the subject. He, also, referred to one of the papers on Town Parks in 15 Ir. L. T. & S. J., and submitted that, in order to constitute a town park, the holding should be used as pasture.

Matheson, contra, contended that, even though the holding were to be treated as agricultural, it was a town park within the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

FITZGERALD v. SHANAHAN.—MOLONY v. DELANDRE.

[Co. Ct.]

The JUDGE.—In this case the tenant seeks to have a fair rent fixed for his holding, which consists of 35 perches of land situate in the town of Dungarvan. He does not live on the holding but in a cottage in the town held under another landlord. This holding has been already the subject of judicial decision with reference to the Land Act of 1870. The landlord, Shanahan, brought a civil bill ejectment for over-holding against the present tenant, which was tried before me. A notice to quit, duly signed by the landlord and served on the tenant, was proved. It was objected on the part of the tenant that the holding was within the provisions of the Land Act, 1870, and as the notice to quit was not stamped I was asked to dismiss the ejectment. I held that the holding was not an agricultural or pastoral holding, and consequently was not within the provisions of the Act of 1870. An appeal was taken from my decision. The appeal was heard at Waterford Assizes before Baron Dowse, who decided that the holding was agricultural and within the Act of 1870, and, as the notice to quit was not stamped, he reversed my decision and dismissed the ejectment. As I believe that in fact no use was ever made of this holding except to grow potatoes and cabbages for use in the tenant's family, I cannot concur with the learned Baron's decision, but I am bound by it; and I have come to the conclusion that I must treat this as an agricultural holding within the meaning of the Act of 1870, and consequently of the Land Act of 1881 also. The tenant now seeks to have a fair rent fixed. Mr. Matheson, for the landlord, submits that, even though I treat it as an agricultural holding, I should not fix a fair rent as it comes within the exceptions provided for in section 58, sub-section 2, of the Land Law Act, 1881, because it is a holding "ordinarily termed 'town parks,' which bears an increased value as accommodation land over and above the ordinary letting value of land occupied as a farm, and is in the occupation of a person living in the town." Mr. O'Connell, solicitor for the tenant, urges that within the meaning of the Act of 1881 a "town park" must be a holding used as pasture, and that as the tenant in this case uses the holding to grow potatoes and cabbages it is not a "town park," and he referred to an article in the fifteenth volume of the Irish Law Times, quoting a decision of Robert Ferguson, Q.C., in the case of Taylor v. Dowden, in which he is reported to have said that a town park should be in grass. But, on looking to his decision in that case, as reported in Donnell's Land Reports, p. 517, I do not find any words bearing out that construction; but even if such a decision was made by him, I could not follow it. I am clearly of opinion that it is immaterial whether a tenant

* It is impossible to conceive how such a misunderstanding of the reference to Taylor v. Dowden, in the article alluded to, could have arisen. Mr. Ferguson, Q.C., has never been reported to have said that a town park should be in grass; and nothing of the kind was stated by the writer, in any of the three articles on "Town Parks," within the Land Acts, 1870, 1881," published in the Irish Law Times last December. Precisely to the contrary, it is there stated:—"It must be allotted or used for the accommodation of a town residence, and not held and used for mere agricultural or commercial purposes: Taylor v. Dowden, 8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 83; Walsh v. Duane, 9 ib. 180; M'Math v. Richards, 13 ib. 80; Mullally v. Moore, 15 ib. 82; but it is not necessary that it should be used as pasture land: Trustees of Lord Kilmorrey v. Anderson, 8 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 109; Corbett v. Carey, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 15." So, in Taylor v. Dowden, as reported in Donnell's Land Reports, the learned Chairman said: "The important element is wanting that they have never been allotted or used for the accommodation of a house in the town. They have been held and used for agricultural and commercial purposes, and are not, in my opinion, within the meaning of the exception in sec. 15." Those are the identical words, also reported in 8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 83—a report revised by the learned Chairman, and occupying a page and a half, and the effect of which appears to have been accurately presented in Mr. Donnell's abstract, occupying eleven lines.—[E. N. B., Ed.]

uses a "town park" in pasture for grazing a cow or in tillage for growing potatoes, provided it is held as an accommodation to, and an accessory of the town house. In this case, I am clearly of opinion that the tenant holds this plot solely as an accommodation to his house in the town of Dungarvan—growing on it, as he has proved, potatoes and cabbages for consumption in his house—and that it is a "town park" within the meaning of section 58, sub-section 2, of the Land Law Act, 1881; and I, therefore, dismiss the case.

MOLONY v. DELANDRE.

Feb. 6, 1882.—Holding for purposes of pasture under original letting—Subsequent user for purposes of tillage—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (4).

Where it appeared that the holding of a tenant, who sought to have a judicial rent fixed, had been originally let to the tenant's husband for grazing purposes, and had not been tilled or meadowed by her husband without the original landlord's consent; but afterwards, since 1875, when the present landlord entered on the inheritance, his consent was not asked, and a portion of the lands were of late years kept in tillage:

Held, that, in the absence of evidence of any new arrangement or alteration of the original letting having been made by the present landlord, the holding came within the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (4), as being let to be used wholly or mainly for the purposes of pasture; and that the application to fix a judicial rent should be refused.

Application, by tenant, to fix judicial rent.—The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Carson, in support of the application.

Matheson, contra.

The JUDGE.—In this case the tenant has applied to have a fair rent fixed for her holding. It appears that the late Mr. Vernon Delandre, solicitor, held, under the Marquis of Waterford, a house and about 22 acres of land near Passage East, in this County (Waterford). For several years he occupied the house as a summer residence. The holding is divided by a road. At one side are the house and out-offices, consisting of stable and coach-house and other buildings, a garden and a lawn; at the other side lie some fields containing about 15 acres. In the year 1854, Mr. Vernon Delandre let the house, out-offices, garden and lawn, to Mr. Steele, and afterwards to Mr. Ryan, and at the same time he let the other fields to the late John Molony, the husband of the present tenant. Mr. Ryan was succeeded by another tenant who held only the house, and, upon this change, the lawn, garden, and out-offices, were given to Molony. He appears to have had only the occasional use of the stable and coach-house, as it was proved that when some of Mr. Delandre's family went to stay for a time in the house, the stable and coach-house were reserved for their use. The landlord has always paid all the rates and taxes and kept the premises in repair. John Molony, and, since his death, his widow, have remained in possession since 1854. Mr. Mark F. Delandre, son of the late Vernon Delandre, has examined and produced a rent-book of his father, containing entries relative to the tenancy of John Molony, from the year 1854 to 1863. In this book there is an entry in the late Mr. Delandre's handwriting, stating that the "grazing" of this land was let to Molony, and all the entries down to 1863 treat the tenancy as a letting of the grazing of the land only. These entries were given in evidence without objection by the tenant's counsel. Mr. Mark Delandre, in addition, proved that, in his presence, on several occasions, Molony asked permission from Mr. Vernon Delandre to till some of the lands, and also to use part as meadow; and he says that during his father's lifetime Molony never tilled or meadowed the lands without permission from his father; he proved that permission was asked down to the year 1874, when he left home. Mr. Vernon Delandre died in 1875, when the present landlord inherited the place. No evidence was given as to permission to till or meadow the lands having been asked since the death of the late Mr. Delandre; and it was proved, on behalf of the tenant, that about three acres of the land have in late years been always in tillage, and the rent receipts were given in evidence. These are ordinary receipts for rent, and do not allude to the nature of the tenancy. Under these circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that this holding was not let to John Molony as an ordinary farm. To hold that it is an ordinary farm and that the tenant is entitled to have a fair rent fixed, would work great injustice to the landlord; it would separate the residence from the out-offices, garden, lawn, and lands, leaving it on the landlord's hands, entirely isolated and greatly reduced in value. I believe that the holding was let by the late Mr. Delandre to be used wholly for the purpose of pasture, and that it continued so up to his death; and no evidence has been given that any new arrangement or alteration of the original letting was made by the present landlord. I, therefore, hold that the case comes within the exception prescribed by sec. 58, sub-sec. 4, of the Act of 1881—namely, that it is a holding "let to be used wholly or mainly for the purposes of pasture, the tenant of which does not actually reside on the same;" and I dismiss the case.

[A.]

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Reported by H. E. FITCHCOCK, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before LAW, C., SULLIVAN, M.R., DEASY, and FITZGIBBON, L.J.J.)

EIFFE (Appellant) v. M'KENNAS (Respondents).

Feb. 1, 2, 8, 1882.—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (7)—Letting for "temporary convenience"—"Yearly tenancy"—Setting aside originating notice to fix fair rent—Appeal, right of.

Within a couple of months after the expiration of the last of a series of leases, and while the tenant continued to overhold, the landlord stated that he required the land for building purposes, but, the tenant having urged that if possession were resumed he would be a heavy loser, as he had highly manured the land, the landlord replied that he might keep the land until he had exhausted the manure. The amount of the rent to be payable was not fixed, the landlord requiring more and the tenant less than the amount payable under the lease. The tenant, with the landlord's consent, continued in possession thus for three years, and from time to time, after two years, paid various sums as and towards rent, but still without any settlement of what should be the amount. On appeal from an order of the Land Commission, refusing to set aside an originating notice to fix a fair rent for the holding:

Held, that, whether a yearly tenancy had been created or not, the letting was for "the temporary convenience" of the landlord or tenant within the meaning of section 58 (7) of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49).

Per FITZGIBBON, L.J.—The temporary convenience or temporary necessity which excludes a tenant's claim may be existing "for a time" compatible not only with a tenancy at will, or a tenancy less than a tenancy from year to year, under section 69 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, but also under both that Act and the Land Law Act, 1881, subject to the restriction as to written evidence, with a tenancy from year to year or for life or lives. Though circumstances were here shown which, if unexplained or unqualified by the other facts, might afford presumptive evidence of a tenancy from year to year, they had been so explained and qualified, and there was no sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court below that a tenancy from year to year existed in the holding; nor was the court debarred, under the circumstances, from reversing the decision, as being upon a question of fact, the question largely depending on legal considerations. Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9, applied.

Appeal from an order made by the Land Commission on the 3rd December, 1881.

The respondents served an originating notice to fix a fair rent of a farm called Millfield, at Harold's-cross, county Dublin. The originating notice was as follows:—

Holding—

County Dublin.	Poor Law Union South Dublin.	Electoral Division Rathmines.
Name by which lands are known on Ordnance Survey,		Rathlands.
Area in Statute Measure 8A. 2R. 7F.	Rent of Holding £50 0 0	Gross Poor Law Valuation £14 15 0

The proceedings under this notice are intended to be carried on before the Land Commission Court.

Originating notice of application by tenant, or landlord and tenant jointly, to court to fix a fair rent. The tenants apply to the court for an order fixing the fair rent to be hereafter paid for the above holding.

(Signed), J. PLUNKET & SON, Solicitors.

Dated this 11th of November, 1881.

The appellant applied to the Land Commission Court for an order that the originating notice might be dismissed with costs on the ground—firstly, that the applicants were not tenants within the meaning of the 8th section of the Land Law Act, 1881; and secondly, that the holding was let to the tenants to meet the temporary convenience of the landlord and Charles Kavanagh, deceased. The application was refused with three guineas costs, and from this order the landlord appealed, leave to appeal having been given by the Land Commission Court.

The landlord made an affidavit, in support of his application, to the Land Commission Court, in which he stated the following facts:—On 7th May, 1847, George A. F. Robinson demised the holding in question to James Kavanagh for 31 years at the rent of £30 per annum. The lease expired on 7th May, 1878, and at and previous thereto all the estate and interest of

George A. F. Robinson was vested in Mr. Eiffe; and all the estate and interest of James Kavanagh was vested in Charles Kavanagh, the respondents' testator. Charles Kavanagh held also three other holdings on lease under Mr. Eiffe. The four holdings adjoined, and the rents, amounting to £196 15s. 6d. per annum, were paid in one sum and one receipt was given for all. After the lease of the holding in question expired in May, 1878, the rents of the three other holdings, amounting to £166 15s. 6d., were paid in a similar manner, the holding in question being dealt with separately. In July, 1878, Charles Kavanagh called on Mr. Eiffe with reference to the portion of land out of lease, and said he thought that the appellant would renew his lease. The appellant told him that he purposed taking possession of the holding with a view of establishing a brick manufactory thereon, and building thereon or letting it for building. Charles Kavanagh then said he had highly manured the land, and if possession were taken he would be a heavy loser. Mr. Eiffe replied that he would not wish on any account that he should lose the benefit of the manure, and said he might keep the land until he had exhausted the manure, adding, that he had made arrangements as to starting the brick manufactory and the building scheme. Charles Kavanagh thanked him very much for leaving him in possession on those terms. Mr. Eiffe told him he should expect him to pay for such time as he might have the land at the rate of £10 per Irish acre, and that he should re-erect the fences which had been thrown down. He agreed to the latter; but said that £10 an acre was too much, and that he could not pay more than £8. No arrangement was come to as to the amount of rent to be paid. Charles Kavanagh made two payments after this, one of £80, on the 28th September, 1880, and the other of £25, on the 20th November, 1880. On neither of these occasions did he agree as to the amount to be paid. Mr. Eiffe continued to require to be paid at the rate of £10 per acre, and the tenant continued to refuse to pay more than £8 per acre. Mr. Eiffe accordingly only gave receipts on account. After the death of Charles Kavanagh the respondents, as his executors, accompanied by their solicitor had an interview with Mr. Eiffe, when they paid him the further sum of £40 10s. for the use of the holding. They told him that by the terms of the testator's will, it was necessary that a sale should take place of his holdings at Rathlands, and asked if he would consent to recognise a tenancy from year to year as subsisting in the portion of land out of lease (being the holding in question) for the purpose of sale. This Mr. Eiffe distinctly declined to do. Without any further communication the originating notice was served. The appellant further deposed that the respondents, as executors of Charles Kavanagh, occupied the holding merely on his sufferance, pending his making arrangements for brick-making or letting for building, and on the distinct agreement that at any moment he might take up possession of the same, and that the occupation was for the temporary convenience of himself and of Charles Kavanagh, so that pending such arrangement the land might not be idle.

James M'Kenna, one of the respondents, made an affidavit, in which he stated that the late Charles Kavanagh was in possession and occupation of the lands in the originating notice mentioned up to the expiration of the lease, on the 7th May, 1878, and continued in possession up to the time of his death, which took place on the 10th June, 1881; that since his death John M'Kenna and deponent, as his executors, continued in possession and occupation; that Charles Kavanagh and his executors had paid rent, as claimed by Mr. Eiffe, for the holding, at the rate of £10 per acre, up to the 1st of May, 1881; that the moneys thus paid were received as such rent and receipts given therefor; and he referred to several letters written and receipts signed by Mr. Eiffe, and submitted that John M'Kenna and deponent were present yearly tenants of the holding.

The letters and receipts referred to, so far as material, were as follows:—

If you do not wish to pay that please at once deliver up possession, and we can settle on what is fair for the land up to this date. If you deliver up possession the fences must be put up, which appear to have been completely destroyed.

holdings of his situate at Harold's-cross. There is a fourth holding, which I must bring particularly under your notice. It was leased to the late Mr. James Kavanagh. The lease expired in May, 1878, since which time no arrangement had been made for a re-letting. I had some idea of working the brick clay therein, and also that portion of it might be taken for a railway. I told Mr. Charles Kavanagh that as long as he kept it he should pay me £10 per acre (Irish). The lot contains 5a. 1r. 4p. Irish. He paid me two sums on account of this—one of £80 and another of £25. There therefore remains due for the use and occupation of this portion up to the 25th March last the sum of £45. I must distinctly decline being in any way mixed up with any sale that may be made of the remainder of the premises. I may be disposed to let the land to a solvent tenant for £50 per annum, subject to certain restrictions. In the event of necessity I beg to inform the representatives of Mr. Charles Kavanagh that I shall require them to put up all fences levelled by him or his predecessors.

Letter from L. S. Eiffe to Messrs. Plunket & Son, solicitors for the tenants:—

"45 Fitzwilliam-square, Dublin,
"10th October, 1881.

"KAVANAGH, deceased.

"DEAR SIRS,—There is now due for rent from the above estate, £236 15s. 6d. This sum is entirely more than I can afford to have due; but, before taking hostile proceedings to administer the estate, I wish to let you know, in order that the representatives may, if they so desire, pay the amount due. In order to avoid legal proceedings I shall be willing to take £83 7s. 9d. for the land in lease, and 10 per cent. off the amount (£45) due for the portion out of lease, making in all £123 17s. 9d., to clear all demands up to the 25th March, 1881, provided that amount be paid on or before Saturday next. The executors must also come to some arrangement as to the portion out of lease, as I must know whether or no they will hold it on on the terms I mentioned.

"Yours faithfully,

"Messrs. James Plunket & Son."

Campion, Q.C. (with him Houston), for the appellant.—The facts are conceded and their legal effect alone is for the Court. In the contract there is not a single element of prospective tenancy, but simply an agreement as long as you keep it you pay at the rate, the landlord says, of £10, the tenant says £8, an Irish acre. Neither the £10 nor the £8 correspond with the rent in the original tenancy. The quantity of land is stated in the lease—viz., 5a. 1r. 3p., Irish, so that there is nothing like the continuation of the former lease, but everything is essentially different. The contract was for the convenience of both parties, and therefore within the 58th section of the Act, the tenant being permitted to take advantage of the manure; and on the other hand, it was for the convenience of the landlord to have the lands let until he wanted them for building purposes. For two years and four months not one shilling was paid for the occupation, because it was a simple occupation for the convenience of both parties impressed upon the very terms of the occupation itself. The gale days in the lease were in March and September. Whether there was a tenancy from year to year is a question of evidence. Here were two receipts given—one for £80, on account of £100; in the other the landlord objected to the £100, and the tenant accepts a receipt in which are the words "without any settlement as to what should be the rent." The tenant made a request and the landlord complies with it by saying, "You may occupy until you exhaust the manures." The estate of the tenant is in legal effect an estate for the life of the lessee circumscribed by events. It may go to the extent of the life, it cannot go beyond it. There was no fixed or definite rent on the day the Act passed. It is a fixed principle of law that you cannot have a tenancy from year to year without a fixed rent being paid. After the death of the tenant, and two months after the passing of the Act, his executors came to the landlord and asked that the tenancy should be described as a yearly one. They were accompanied by their solicitor. The landlord said, "No; it was never a yearly tenancy." It would have been needless and nugatory for the tenants to have asked this if their case were true. Two things were confounded in the court below—presumptive evidence of facts and the facts themselves, the presumed evidence of tenure and the tenure itself: O'Keefe v. Walsh, 6 L. R. Ir. 348. The same thing cannot be expressed and implied. It is a contradiction in terms. It is a palpable incompatibility. Where a pre-existing right is sought to be divested the party endeavouring so to do must do so by clear, distinct, and unequivocal evidence, and should be held by the very letter. We submit (1) that, although it is conceded that payment of rent and occupation of land are sufficient presumptive evidence of a tenancy from year to year, it does not even constitute that on the whole evidence, because the essential characteristics of a yearly tenancy are absent. These are, (a) a defined and specific rent. (b) The rent must be referable to a yearly tenancy, and must be paid by a man in the character of a yearly tenant. (c) The possession must be unexplained by external evidence pointing to the original character of the occupation. (2) The tenure was plainly in its inception, within the very meaning of the 58th section, for the mutual convenience of the landlord and tenant, on the very terms of express contract as such. (3) When you have a grant or contract dependent on an event uncertain and contingent you cannot impress that with a term of years, or from year to year.

[LAW, C.—If the tenant was living could you put him out without notice?]

Yes; if the manure were exhausted.

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—Would not the exhaustion of the manure depend on the tenant? Suppose he laid it down in grass?]

It is a matter capable of being determined by skilled agriculturists. It was not a tenancy at will. The appellant could not disturb the tenant without showing that the manure was exhausted. It was a tenancy for life, determinable on the exhaustion of the manures.

[LAW, C.—You say the contract was that this individual was to keep the land until the manure was exhausted?]

Yes; and on both sides that contract has been partly performed.

[LAW, C.—An overholding tenant is generally a tenant from year to year.]

When we are driven to give a character to the tenancy we have a right to adopt our 3rd alternative proposition. The whole law as regards this is given in the notes to Smith's Leading Cases, last edition, pp. 104-112.

He cited Davis (app.), Waddington (resp.), 7 M. & Gr. 45-48, note; Coke Littleton, 42a; Preston, Estates, 45; Kusel v. Watson, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 129; Wood v. Davis, 6 L. R. Ir. 50, 14 Ir. L. T. Dig. 17; Spaight v. Commissioners of Irish Church Temporalities, 12 Ir. L. T. Rep. 47.

Sergeant Hemphill, Q.C. (with him Gordon), for the respondent. Under sec. 8 of the Land Law Act, 1881, all we have to show is that we are tenants of a present tenancy to which the Act applies, and it is immaterial whether the tenancy is a yearly or any other one. The glossary of the Act is given in the 57th section. It first defines what a tenancy is:—"Present tenancy means a tenancy subsisting at the time of the passing of this Act, or created before the 1st January, 1883, in a holding in which a tenancy was subsisting at the time of the passing of this Act, and every tenancy to which this Act applies shall be deemed to be a present tenancy until the contrary is proved." That language is peculiar. If we can show an interest in a tenancy then the onus is thrown on the landlord to show we are not present tenants.

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—To define what "present tenancy" is you have to define what "tenancy," "holding," "tenant," "contract of tenancy," respectively are, and you go back four steps not two.]

The court below unanimously drew the conclusion that we were present tenants, and they arrived at that conclusion as a conclusion of fact, having regard to the evidence that was before them. The principle then arises whether, in every case where a conclusion of fact is drawn by the court below, you will, without the clearest evidence to the contrary, come to the conclusion that an appeal lies. If you were sitting as jurors, or as judges and jurors combined, you could come to no other conclusion than that a tenancy from year to year existed at the passing of the Act. It is admitted that Mr. Eiffe was perfectly aware that the lease terminated on 7th May, 1878. Therefore we have now this broad fact that the tenant who was in under a lease which expired was, with the knowledge of the landlord, allowed to hold possession for three years after its expiration. That is most important in dealing with the question. The appellant accepted from the tenant himself, and his representatives, three years rent. The only controversy was what the rent should be—there never was a question of what the tenancy he should be allowed to hold on should be until just on the eve of the Land Act. No jury would hesitate to say that a tenancy from year to year was created on the facts. It was a well-settled principle in England that where an overholding tenant was allowed to hold on with the knowledge of the landlord it at once raised a presumption of a yearly tenancy: Doe. d. Thomas v. Field, 2 Dow Pr. C. 542. The mere fact of continuance in possession after the expiration of the lease to the knowledge of the landlord raises the presumption.

[SULLIVAN, M.R.—Do you mean without anything else? It is a strange proposition.]

The same point was decided in this country: Fahy v. O'Donnell, I. R. 4 C. L. 332.

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—Those were not cases of mere possession, but the tenant was always occupying as a tenant to the knowledge of the landlord. The way to test it is, suppose the landlord was out of the country. SULLIVAN, M.R.—Your argument puts the proposition entirely too strongly.]

Hanway v. Taylor, 8 Ir. L. T. Rep. 98, I. R. 8 C. L. 254; and Kelly v. Patterson, L. R. 9 C. P. 681, show what position the parties are in after they are in possession for three years. The landlord would not have been able to eject us without notice to quit if the Land Act had not been passed. It is impossible to say that the plaintiff would have been entitled to a direction in ejectment on the title. The letter of 2nd July, 1878, shows an intention to make a tenancy, and therefore a yearly tenancy.

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—Suppose the tenant had accepted that proposal would not that be a letting for a temporary purpose?]

No.

[LAW, C.—It is perfectly plain from the letter that the continuance in possession was with the consent of the landlord. FITZGIBBON, L.J.—There was a tenancy created; but the question would arise whether it was a term of that tenancy that it was to be a tenancy of the ordinary character requiring six months' notice to quit, or a tenancy for a term uncertain to be put an end to by the landlord himself, which would be unusual.]

We are dealing with legal tenancies. There was no part performance. The landlord states his views, and the tenant uses it as an argument that he has the manure, which would make it unreasonable to put him out. During the whole of the winter of 1878 and during all 1879 Kavanagh goes on managing the farm and doing everything as before, and the landlord never intervened. If the amount of rent was not fixed it would not prevent his being tenant from year to year.

[SULLIVAN, M.R.—The letter of the 30th July, 1880, is consistent with some temporary understanding having taken place, but no definite arrangement.

FITZGIBBON, L.J.—If the tenants paid their money on the terms of that letter is it not inconsistent with any future tenancy. In order to establish your tenancy from year to year, you have to get over the state of facts shown in that letter.]

Where is the line to be drawn? If he was tenant until the manure was exhausted it was a continuing tenancy, because there was no evidence that the manure was exhausted.

[SULLIVAN, M.R.—Cannot a man who has a notice to let for building on his land allow a man in as his tenant, but say to him: Mind, as soon as it is taken for building you must go out? Is there anything in the Act to prevent that?]

That would give an opportunity for evading the Act altogether.

[SULLIVAN, M.R.—Not at all.]

It would not be a temporary purpose within the meaning of sub-section 7. If it were it would be the easiest thing in the world to evade the Act: Sect. 5, sub-s. 6.

[SULLIVAN, M.R.—That section applies only to tenancies within the Act.]

It is not temporary convenience to let until the land is built on: Darragh v. Murdock, 5 Ir. L. T. Rep. 38, 69.

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—The time that is covered by the adjective "temporary" must be a time that must go on for more than a year. DEASY, L.J.—In the originating notice the rent is £50 a year. When did you agree to pay the £50?]

It was in fieri. We put the rent in the originating notice most strongly against ourselves. It is a contradiction in terms to say it was a tenancy from year to year at law and a tenancy at will. "Temporary" means for some short time—something that is to be put an end to. It occurs twice in the Act of 1870: s. 15 (4), s. 69. The argument on the other side must be pushed to this, that if for twenty years the lands were held under this contract, the man could be put out at the end of the twenty years without the benefit of the Act.

EIFFE v. M'KENNA.

[AP.]

[FITZGIBBON, L.J.—What exactly do you mean by “temporary purpose?”]
Letting for a couple of months.

[LAW, C.—That would not be within the Act at all.] Before the Act passed the tenant would be entitled to compensation for improvements and disturbance. What was intended by this Act was to give an equivalent for what he enjoyed under the Act of 1870, sec. 15. Will you give this construction to the 58th section of this Act of 1881 that would deprive the tenant of all right to compensation?

[LAW, C.—It would not deprive him. SULLIVAN, M.R.—The only effect of a decision against you would be that you are out of this Act of 1881.]

There is no express repeal of the 15th section of the Act of 1870. At law once a tenancy from year to year is created anything repugnant to it must be rejected. A clause or condition, which would be inconsistent with that established, could not be added to it. Doe. d. Warner v. Browne, 8 East, 165, decides that if there is enjoyment under a parol demise for life and payment of rent a pure and simple tenancy from year to year is created, and that the estate for life must be disregarded: Wood v. Beard, L. R. 2 Ex. Div. 30.

[LAW, C.—The Act of Parliament treats tenancies from year to year, and other tenancies, as being capable of being for temporary convenience. We cannot then listen to any argument to show that such a letting is impossible. What you have to show is that the tenancy from year to year in this present case, which we may assume it is, was not made for temporary convenience.]

Whatever the original idea was, the subsequent dealings of the parties created a pure and simple tenancy from year to year. Even though the original intention was to create an uncertain tenancy dependent on the exhaustion of the manures, the agreement in pursuance thereof only contemplated one year, and the subsequent dealings of the parties and the acceptance of rent by the landlord, changed that into a yearly tenancy.

Houston, in reply.—No matter what may have been the nature of the tenancy, it was one for temporary convenience within the meaning of this statute. The scope of the argument on the other side amounts to this:—that there are certain circumstances in this case—payment of rent, payment of certain sums for use and occupation, and continuance in possession—which make it necessary to draw an inference of a yearly tenancy, notwithstanding that those facts are explained by the parol evidence of the landlord and by the documents in the case. But whatever presumption those circumstances may raise, or whatever inference might be drawn from them in the absence of other evidence, those presumptions and inferences are explained away and rebutted by abundant evidence, both parol and documentary, displacing any inference of a yearly tenancy to be drawn from possession and payments. The letter of the landlord written in July, 1878, shows most distinctly and unmistakably that at that time the idea in the landlord's mind was that the arrangement was to be one of a purely temporary character. Everything which occurred only bears out the intention which was expressed on the face of that letter—that is, the intention of doing nothing which would not give the landlord the right to take up possession. Nothing turns on the mere use of the word “rent.” It was necessary to express the payment, and the word was used as the most convenient word to express the payment, and in the next receipt the term which was used was “use and occupation.”

LAW, C.—This is an appeal, brought by Mr. Eiffe, landlord, with the permission of the Court of Land Commissioners, under the Land Law (Ireland) Act; section 48, sub-section 2, from an order made by that Court on the 3rd December last, refusing with costs, his application to set aside an originating notice served on him by the defendants as executors of Charles Kavanagh, and seeking to have a fair rent fixed for certain lands in their possession as such executors, called the “Windmill Field,” situate in the Electoral Division of Rathmines, in the South Dublin Union. The field contains 5a; 1r. 4p., and was lately held by Mr. Charles Kavanagh from Mr. Eiffe under a lease for 31 years from the 7th May, 1847, at the rent of £80. The lease expired in 1878, and within a couple of months after the determination of the lease—viz., on the 2nd July, 1878—Mr. Eiffe wrote to Mr. Charles Kavanagh a letter, in which this passage occurs: “When do you propose coming to some arrangement as to the land out of lease, and what rent do you say for this half-year? I shall expect £10 the Irish acre at the least for this half-year ending 7th November, 1878. If you do not wish to pay that, please at once deliver up possession, and we can settle what is fair for the rent up to this date: If you deliver up possession the fences must be put up, which appear to have been completely destroyed.” No written reply appears to have been made to this letter; but Mr. Kavanagh seems to have called personally on Mr. Eiffe to discuss the subject of the letter, and what then occurred is narrated in the 4th paragraph of the affidavit made by Mr. Eiffe, the accuracy of which is not attempted to be disputed. That paragraph is as follows:—“In July, 1878, the said Charles Kavanagh called upon me with reference to the said portion of land out of lease. At such interview, the said Charles Kavanagh said that he thought I would renew his lease. I told him that I purposed taking possession of the said portion of land with a view of establishing a brick manufactory thereon, for the purpose of working the brick clay thereunder, and building thereon or letting it for building. The said Charles Kavanagh then said I have highly manured the land, and if you take possession I shall be a heavy loser. I replied that I would not wish on any account that he should lose the benefit of the manure, and said he might keep the land until he had exhausted the manure. I added that in addition I had not yet made arrangements as to starting the brick manufactory and the building scheme. The said Charles Kavanagh thanked me very much for leaving him in possession of the land upon the aforesaid terms. I told him I should expect him to pay for such time as he might have the land at the rate of £10 per Irish acre, and that he should re-erect the fences which had been thrown down. He agreed to the latter; but said that £10 an acre was too much, that he could not pay more than £8. We parted without coming to any arrangement as to the amount.”

As Kavanagh did not give up possession, but, on the contrary, was allowed to retain it, we must assume that this was on the terms thus stated by Mr. Eiffe, there being no evidence of any other arrangement at the time. The amount of rent, however, to be paid by Kavanagh would appear to have remained unsettled during his lifetime. He paid £80 on the 28th Sept., 1880, and took a receipt expressed to be on account of back rent of the Mill Field, lately out of lease, and afterwards, on the 20th Nov., paid a further sum of £20, getting a receipt which stated in terms that there was still no settlement as to what should be the rent. He died on the 10th June, 1881, leaving matters in that position. On the 30th July, Mr. Eiffe wrote to the respondents, who were Kavanagh's executors, asking for the rent of the three other holdings, and adding: "There is a fourth holding which I must bring particularly under your notice. It was leased to the late Mr. Charles Kavanagh. The lease expired in May, 1878, since which time no arrangement was made for a letting. I had some idea of working the brick clay thereon, and also that portion of it might be taken for a railway. I told Mr. Charles Kavanagh that as long as he kept it he should pay me £10 per acre (Irish) for it. He paid me two sums on account of it, one of £80 and another of £25. There, therefore, remains due for the use and occupation of this portion, up to the 25th March last, the sum of £45. I must distinctly decline being in any way mixed up with any sale that may be made of the remainder of the premises. I may be disposed to let the land to a solvent tenant for £50 per annum, subject to certain restrictions. In the event of necessity I beg to inform the representatives of Mr. Charles Kavanagh that I shall require them to put up all fences levelled by him or his predecessors."

EIFFE v. M'KENNA.

Again, on the 10th October, Mr. Eiffe wrote to the executors saying—"The executors must also come to some 'arrangement' as to the portion out of lease, as I must know whether they will hold it on the terms I mentioned." In consequence of this letter, the respondents and their solicitor had an interview with Mr. Eiffe on the 17th October last, and paid him £40 10s., which, with £4 10s. allowed as an abatement, amounted to £45, and for this sum of £45 Mr. Eiffe gave them a receipt in full for all demands for use and occupation up to 25th March, 1881. On that occasion they also applied to Mr. Eiffe to recognise them as his tenants from year to year of this Windmill Field, so that they might sell it as part of their testator's effects. This he says he declined to do, and that without further communication they served him with the originating notice to have a fair rent fixed under section 8 of the Land Law Act. Mr. Eiffe further deposes in paragraph 7 of his affidavit—"The applicants, as executors of the said Charles Kavanagh, occupy the said portion of land merely on my sufferance pending my making arrangements for brick making, or letting for building, and on the distinct agreement that at any moment I might take up possession of the same. The occupation was for the temporary convenience of myself and the said Charles Kavanagh that pending such arrangement the land might not be idle."

Under these circumstances, Mr. Eiffe insists here, as he did before the Land Commission, in the first place, that the respondents are not his yearly tenants at all, and therefore not entitled to apply under the Land Law Act to fix a fair rent; and, secondly, that even if they were his yearly tenants their holding is excluded from the Act by section 58, sub-s. 7, as being one "for the temporary convenience or to meet a temporary necessity of either landlord or tenant." Both of these grounds of objection were, of course, disputed by the respondents, but, in the view I take of the case, it is unnecessary to express any opinion upon the first point in controversy; and, as it may possibly come before a jury for decision, I think it is better to leave it for that tribunal unprejudiced by any observations of mine.

As to the second point, I believe we are all agreed that, whatever the tenancy may be, the holding is one for temporary convenience within the meaning of the clause referred to, and, as such, excluded from the operation of the Act. It appears by the originating notice that the field is in the electoral division of Rathmines, and, taking the terms of the letting from Mr. Eiffe's affidavit, where alone we find any evidence of them, I feel satisfied that the land was let to Kavanagh as a matter of temporary convenience, so that Mr. Eiffe, when the necessary arrangements and preparations of which he told Kavanagh should be sufficiently advanced, might be able to recover possession without inconvenient delay, and that in the meantime the land might not remain idle and unproductive of income. In fact, it appears to me that this is precisely the sort of case for which the exemption in question is most needed, and to which it most properly applies. If land which is likely soon to become building ground, or, what is the same thing, which the owner contemplates soon dealing with as building ground, is not to be saved from the operation of the Land Law Act very great injustice would be done. The fixing a fair rent under the Act would frustrate all such building designs on the part of the landlord, giving absolute fixity of tenure to the tenant for the first fifteen years, and, after that, only enabling the landlord, if the Court allowed him, to purchase out the tenant at the full value of his interest. Taking then the arrangement between Mr. Eiffe and Charles Kavanagh, as described in Mr. Eiffe's affidavit, I have no doubt that it was of the temporary character indicated by the exempting clause referred to. Nor can I find anything in the two letters which Mr. Eiffe subsequently wrote at all inconsistent with such temporary arrangement. On the contrary, they seem to me, rightly or wrongly, to treat even the arrangement, whatever it was to be, as still incomplete, and therefore it is impossible to regard them as showing that the occupation was not treated by Mr. Eiffe, at least, as still of the temporary character mentioned at his personal interview with Kavanagh in July, 1878.

As to the receipts, they also are valueless for any purpose of this kind. Even assuming the occupation to have been that of a yearly tenant he was, of course, bound as such to pay rent, and therefore this cannot affect the present question. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that this holding was one for the temporary convenience of Mr. Eiffe, and indeed Kavanagh also; that Mr. Eiffe's application to set aside the originating notice should have been acceded to, and must now be granted; and therefore, that the order appealed from should be reversed with costs.

SULLIVAN, M.R.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor. Giving any separate judgment of my own would only be repeating what he has said.

DEASY, L.J.—I concur, also, in the judgment which has been delivered. This is the first appeal which we have had from the Land Commissioners, and I suppose it will not be the last, and as we differ from the Court below I will state some of my reasons for so differing. If this were a controversy as to fact, with evidence on both sides, I would be unwilling to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judges, who had more experience, even for their short tenure of office, in disputes between landlord and tenant than I have had. But, this is not a question of disputed facts at all. With the single exception of an uncontroverted statement in an affidavit, it rests on documents and letters produced by the tenants themselves. I do not express any opinion as to whether there was a tenancy from year to year, but I am not to be taken as coming to the conclusion that there was. The scope and policy of the Land Law Act is to deal with tenancies from year to year, which in their inception were not limited in duration by the contract of the parties, and I judge of the policy of an Act only from the words contained in it. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant's tenancy, if it existed at all, was only for a temporary purpose, and is therefore expressly exempted from the operation of the Act by the 58th section.

FITZGERBON, L.J.—I agree also. It is, to my mind, proved that, whatever the legal character of Charles Kavanagh's occupation might have been after the expiration of his lease, neither he nor Mr. Eiffe at any time believed or intended that it should be regarded as under a settled or permanent letting. The continuance in occupation originated in the tenant's desire to take the benefit of his manure, and in the landlord's willingness (possibly, in order to avoid liability to compensation) to permit him to do so, pending some definite arrangement, while waiting some more profitable disposition of the land. Upon the construction as well of the Act of 1870 as of the Act of 1881 it is further, to my mind, clear that the temporary convenience or temporary necessity which excludes a tenant's claim may be existing "for a time" compatible not only with a tenancy at will, or a tenancy less than a tenancy from year to year, under section 69 of the former Act, but also under both Acts, subject to the restriction as to written evidence, with a tenancy from year to year or for life or lives. This appears at once on our applying the definition of "holding" in the former Act to its use in section 15, sub-section 4, and on tracing the meaning of the expressions "tenant of any present tenancy" in section 8, sub-section 1, and "holding let to the tenant," in section 53, sub-section 7, of the Act of 1881, through the chain of dependent interpretations given in section 57, of "present tenancy," "tenancy," "holding," "tenant," and "contract of tenancy," which by their ultimate effect restrict the benefits of the statute to tenants for terms of years, or for lives, or for lives and years, or from year to year. The provisions of the late Act in reference to the resumption of a holding for a reasonable and sufficient purpose, having relation to the good of the holding, seem opposed at least to the spirit of the decision appealed from here by which 5 acres of land in the vicinity of Rathmines might be practically stereotyped as an agricultural holding, because the landlord had permitted the tenant to take in specie the benefit of some manure which happened to be unexhausted at the expiration of the last of a series of leases. These provisions seem to me further to indicate that a temporary arrangement made even with an agricultural or pastoral tenant for a tenancy from year to year of land ultimately, though at an indefinite period, intended to be taken up for other purposes beneficial to the estate, might be an arrangement for temporary convenience within the meaning of the Act. Of course such arrangement, when alleged, must in all cases be clearly proved, and as to future transactions the necessity for writing will tend to preclude evasions of the statute, while the tenant from year to year cannot be deprived of his right to compensation under the Act of 1870. Upon the evidence in the present case, whether I hold Kavanagh to have been a tenant from year to year or not, I am not to avoid the further conclusion that the letter to him, was within the meaning of the Act, one for the temporary convenience of both landlord and tenant.

I am, however, not satisfied upon the documents and affidavits that either Kavanagh or his executors attained the status of tenants from year to year at all after the expiration of the lease. To test the status of the tenant, if in answer to any of the landlord's letters the tenant had said, "I will not take the land, nor will I occupy it any longer on your terms," and had left the place, I think, as at present advised, that the landlord must have been nonsuited. Had he sued for subsequent rent as assignee of a tenancy from year to year, such a tenancy could not be imposed upon or imputed to one party only, and the true position of Kavanagh and of his executors would seem to be that of tenants at will pending negotiation, holding conditionally upon some definite arrangement, to be ultimately arrived at, not liable to pay rent de anno in annum, but subject to a liability, well explained by Mr. De Moleyns, at page 149 of his book—namely, that "in the absence of express agreement the implication will arise whenever a person, by permission, has occupied the land of another: the law, with homely sense, assuming that he has agreed to pay what his beneficial occupation may be reasonably worth."

Tenants in this position, if not holding for merely a temporary purpose, would be protected under section 69 of the Act of 1870 to the extent of being entitled to notice to quit and to compensation, but they are not therefore to be permitted to claim the further advantages which under the Act of 1881 are reserved to tenants of the permanent and defined classes. No doubt, circumstances are shown which, if unexplained or unqualified by the other facts, might afford presumptive evidence of a tenancy from year to year; but they are in my opinion so explained and qualified, and upon the whole case as it now stands I can find no sufficient evidence to sustain the finding that a tenancy from year to year existed in the holding. For the reasons given by the other members of the Court, however, I base my judgment on the temporary character of the occupation. Mr. Sergeant Hemphill called upon us not to overrule the unanimous decision of the Land Commission, because it was a question of fact; at least, unless the appellant could show us irresistibly that the opinion of the Court below upon the question of fact was not only wrong but entirely erroneous. Though unable, with every respect for the high authority quoted, to appreciate the distinction, and though prepared in any view to accept the full responsibility of allowing the appeal in the present case, I do not think the principle is applicable here. This Court expressly refused to apply it in the late apposite case of Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9, and the House of Lords affirmed its decision.* We have before us the same materials which were submitted to the Land Commission. The conclusion depends largely on legal considerations, and we are, in my judgment, bound independently to rehear the case and to form and pronounce our own opinion upon it.

As to costs, the course taken by the respondent in avoiding any definite arrangement with the appellant as to the amount payable for its occupation as land out of lease, taking a receipt upon the explicit terms of the appellant's letter asking him, apparently as a favour, to recognise them as his tenants from year to year, and upon his refusal to do so, suddenly serving him with the originating notice, based upon the assumption that such a tenancy had long previously existed, seems to me one not to be favoured. I think the notice should be set aside and the appeal allowed, with the costs before the Land Commission and the costs of the appeal.

FERGUSON v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE BALLINA UNION.

Feb. 14, 16, 1882.—Seed Supply (Ir.) Act, 1880—Poor Law Guardians—Liability of, to purchasers of seed under the Act—Sale—Implied Warranty.

No action lies against Poor Law Guardians in their corporate capacity for damage by reason of the inferior quality of seed supplied by them under the provisions of the Seed Supply (Ireland) Act, 1880, and merely in carrying out same, there being no evidence of fraud or negligence.

Special case stated by Fitzgibbon, L.J., one of the justices of Assize of Mayo at the Summer Assizes, 1881. The plaintiff brought his action against the defendants for £3 damages for loss sustained by him by reason of the inferior quality of seed potatoes sold and delivered to him by the defendants under the provisions of the Seed Supply (Ir.) Act, 1880. The guardians in March, 1880, being duly authorised under that Act to supply seed potatoes to occupiers of land in the electoral division of Kilgarvin, for that purpose entered into contracts with several wholesale merchants for the purchase of large quantities of imported "Champion Seed Potatoes," in bags of 2 cwt. each. In the selection of the merchants, in the price they paid, and in all their dealings with the seed purchased, in their proceedings to distribute to purchasers the best quality of Champion seed potatoes, and of those only, the guardians and their officers and servants used all reasonable precautions. Champion seed potatoes were a specific and well-known species of seed potatoes commanding a higher price, and being for the purposes of seed of a much higher value than ordinary potatoes, but they were not capable of being distinguished by the exercise of ordinary observation from ordinary potatoes either by the guardians, their officers, and servants, or by the plaintiff. On March 20, 1881, the plaintiff, being a duly qualified occupant within the said electoral division, obtained from one of the guardians an order for delivery of "6 cwt. potatoes." He took the order to the proper officer and asked for "6 cwt. of Champions," and accordingly three bags, each containing 2 cwt. of potatoes, in the same condition in which they had been received from the merchants, were delivered by the defendants' officer to the plaintiff. Save as hereinbefore stated, there was no reference to the quality of the seed potatoes, but the price charged therefor was the market price of imported "Champion Seed Potatoes"—i.e., about four times as much as for ordinary potatoes. The defendants believed that they delivered, and the plaintiff that he received, and he asked for, Champion potatoes, and those only; but there was no warranty, representation, or express contract save as before stated. Two of the bags contained imported "Champion Seed Potatoes," but the third bag contained other potatoes, not Champions, of an inferior quality, useless as seed in resisting disease, though of a merchantable appearance—facts ascertainable by the merchant, but not by the purchaser till they had almost reached maturity. The plaintiff sustained damage to the amount of £3 by reason of their inferior quality, and the County Court Judge made a decree for that amount and costs. An appeal was taken; and on the hearing thereof Fitzgibbon, L.J., was of opinion in favour of the decree; but M'Kenna v. Guardians of Monaghan Union (15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 42) to the contrary, being cited, and it having been mentioned that other cases depended on the decision, he directed a special case to be stated for one of the Common Law Divisions of the High Court of Justice.

The questions for the Court were, (1) whether, upon the above facts, the defendants were legally capable of making any contract or incurring any liability to the plaintiff for the loss and damage he had sustained; and (2) if so, whether, on the above facts, the defendants made any contract upon which they ought to be held liable to the plaintiff for the said loss and damage.

Trench, for plaintiff.—The guardians are given by the Act (43 Vic., c. 1) powers to purchase seed. If they have been supplied with inferior seed they have their remedy against the merchants who supplied them, or they can recover against the rates. Under s. 6 (3) they cannot sell for less than the price they paid, but they may sell for more and they may make a profit; and therefore, they are subject to the ordinary liabilities of vendors. If the Legislature had intended to take away the ordinary liability from the guardians, it would have done so in express terms. On the other hand, it is not necessary that the Legislature should expressly confer on us a right of action against them; it should, in terms, take it away from us in order to prevent us exercising our common law right. The guardians expressly contracted to give us a particular article, and this is no mere implied warranty.

He cited Coe v. Wise, L. R. 1 Q. B. 711; Kendall v. King, 17 C. B. 483; Livingstone v. Guardians of Lurgan Union, 2 Ir. L. T. 210, I. R. 2 C. L. 202.

Dillon (with him Beytagh, Q.C.), contra.—No action lies against the guardians. The Act is mandatory on them. The particular way the sale is to be carried out is prescribed in sec. 6, and the price to be paid.

[PALLES, C.B.—Though the word "sale" is used throughout the Act, is there anything in it showing that the transaction is anything more than an equitable distribution of the seed to the farmers of the district?] No; and the payment to the guardians is not as in a common sale (sec. 7). Clearly the Act is to be considered a part of the Poor Law code (sec. 14). Negligence is here out of the question, for it is found that all reasonable precautions were taken. In the written contract there is no mention of Champion potatoes, and there is no warranty.

[PALLES, C.B.—Would the guardians have power to levy a rate to pay the expenses of this action?]

We think they have no such powers. The case is completely governed by M'Kenna v. Monaghan Union, 151 L. T. Rep. 42, which is in reference to the very same Act. The plaintiff is not without remedy; he can appeal against the rates.

They cited Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 5 Ap. Ca. 214; Smart v. West Ham Union, 10 Ex. R. 867; 11 id., 867; Hammond v. St. Pancras Union, L. R. 9 C. P. 316; Brennan v. Limerick Union, 12 Ir. L. T. Rep. 33, 2 L. R. Ir. 42.

Trench, in reply.—Besides the word "sale" being used in the Act, the transaction has all the characters of a sale, and though payment may be in a special way it may be in the ordinary way also.

PALLES, C.B.—We limit our decision to the exact question in the case. There is a finding that there was no negligence on the part of the guardians, and therefore we say nothing as to what the law may be if negligence, fraud, or deceit be introduced as an element in the sale. Also, we say nothing as to the question of the liability of persons actually engaged personally in the sale, as distinguished from persons acting together in a corporate capacity. Divested of these considerations, was there a breach of contract express or implied? The questions put to us in the special case are not those on which the liability or non-liability depends. The true question is, whether in a sale such as this—and we hold it to be a sale—there was a contract under a warranty that the goods sold were Champion seed potatoes. We think there was no such contract or warranty. As the goods were there and in ess it would more properly be called a warranty. I think this case depends entirely on the construction of the Act; and it is on the construction of the whole Act, and not of any particular section of it, I found my opinion. By section 3 the guardians are given power to borrow money. The Legislature did not contemplate or authorise that money borrowed being applied to any purpose other than those named. Under section 6 they are authorised to apply it in purchasing seed and defraying expenses for carriage, storage, or otherwise, in providing such seed for sale; and then in mandatory terms they are told to what is called "sell" that seed. No doubt it is called a sale, and it is strictly a sale in its incidents—such as transfer of possession and consideration. But it is one thing to say it is a sale and another to say it is a sale carrying a warranty. Terms are made part of the sale. It is to be for "not less than the net price paid by the guardians for it, including all the expenses incurred for the carriage, storage, or otherwise, in providing such seed for sale." These words are nearly identical with the purpose for which the guardians are authorised to borrow. Then in section 8 there are provisions for superintending and inspecting the land sown by the purchaser with the seed, to see he has done so properly. If plaintiff were correct in his contention, the guardians would have been unable to sell what they were by the Act bound to sell, under the description under which they bought, without entering into the liability which the Legislature never intended to impose upon them. We therefore hold that, though called a sale, and containing the common law incidents, it is not a sale which carries a warranty. We express no opinion whether the plaintiff has an appeal against the rates; but we think this action does not lie against the guardians, under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, for they were acting merely as trustees for the public good. We reverse the decree and dismiss the process; but the case being one of public importance, and the Judge of Assize being evidently inclined in favour of the plaintiff, we give no costs of the appeal or of this special case.

FALCONER v. CRAMSIE.

Dec. 17, 19, 1881.—Practice—Originating Notice—Service on land-agent's clerk—Office of agent—Personal service—Rules 24, 27, 28, 29—Appeal, right of—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 48.

Service of a notice on a landlord's land-agent to whom the tenants' rent has been usually paid, under Rule 28, need not be effected by serving him in person, but may be effected by leaving a copy for him with any of such persons, including his clerk, as are specified in Rule 27.

The Court will not, in the exercise of its discretion, set aside proceedings on the ground that a party has not been personally served with an originating notice unless it is distinctly shown that it has not reached his hands.

The question as to what constitutes due service pursuant to the Rules of the Court is one of practice and procedure, not of law such as is contemplated by the 48th section of the Land Law Act, 1881, as being the subject-matter of appeal to the Court of Appeal.

Motion, on behalf of the landlord, to set aside the originating notice on the ground that it had been served on the clerk of the land agent in his office instead of being served on the agent personally.

Monroe, Q.C., for the landlord.

O'HAGAN, J.—An application has been made for an order that the originating notice served in this case be set aside, and the abstract thereof erased from the books of the Land Commission, inasmuch as the case is not properly in court for hearing, and no notice has been served on the landlord, as provided by the Land Law

(Ireland) Act, 1881, and the rules made thereunder. The originating notice is one to fix a fair rent. The landlord is a Mr. Cramsie, who resides at Portsmouth, in England, and his agent is a Mr. Douglas of Pool, Ballintra, in the County of Antrim. The affidavit of service of the originating notice was made by a person named Thomas M'Laughlin, who deposes that on the 8th of November he served Mr. Douglas, the known agent and receiver of the landlord, to whom the tenant's rent was paid, with the originating notice, by leaving a true copy of it with the clerk of Mr. Douglas, at Mr. Douglas's office in Kincoboy in the County of Antrim. This is the service which the landlord impeaches; and the ground is that under our rules, if the landlord were served through his agent, the agent should be personally served. Now, in the first place, I have to observe that no affidavit whatever has been sworn by or on behalf of the landlord. It has been laid down in several cases, among which I shall only refer to Emerson v. Brown, 8 Scott's N. R. 219, that the court will not set aside proceedings on the ground that the defendant has not been personally served with process, unless it be distinctly shown that it has not come to his hands. On this ground we should, as a matter of discretion, refuse this motion. But we should be sorry to decide it upon any ground so narrow, inasmuch as we are of opinion that the service was perfectly good service within the meaning of our rules. The mode of service prescribed by the 27th rule follows, with some verbal variations to make the sense more clear, the mode of service prescribed by the Civil Bill Act of 1851 for the service of civil bills—that is to say, service is to be either personal or by leaving a copy of the notice with a relative or servant of the person to be served. But inasmuch as in the case of landlords who receive their rents through agents, those agents are really the persons with whom the tenants have to deal, we permitted the agent to whom the tenants' rents were paid to be served in place of the landlord. We, therefore, provided by the 28th rule that when the person intended to be served was the landlord service on the agent to whom the rent was usually paid shall be deemed sufficient service on the landlord. But what is service on the agent? It is contended that it must mean personal service alone. We say it means service, as we have defined service in the preceding rule. It is substantially to the same effect as the 7th of the judges' rules under the Act of 1870, which prescribes that the service of notice of claim on any landlord, or in his absence on his known agent, shall be effected as now by law prescribed for the service of ordinary civil bill processes, with the difference that we do not require the landlord to be absent to make service on the agent sufficient. Accordingly, in the 29th rule we deal with service by registered letter, directed to the landlord or his agent, and in our Forms—Form 7, Form 9, and a number of others—the signature is directed to be by the landlord or his agent. In truth we have, so far as was in our power, made the agent the landlord's representative for the purposes of the Act. It has been said by Mr. Monroe that when an order is made by one of the Superior Courts directing substitution of service that the service must be personal on the person directed to be served. But this is not a question of substitution of service, it is a question what mode of service has been prescribed by our rules. We have no doubt that the service was good, and that this motion must be refused with costs.

We have been asked for leave to appeal. We are desirous in every case to enable parties aggrieved by our decision to bring their cases before the Court of Appeal. But I have sought in vain for a single case in which the decision of a Superior Court as to what constitutes due service of process, pursuant to its rules, was brought for review before a Court of Appeal. This is not a question of law such as is contemplated by the 48th section of the Act; it is a question of practice and procedure which the Court of Appeal would hear opened with amazement.

RUTLEDGE v. FARRELL.

Jan. 4, 1882.—Originating Notice to fix judicial rent—Motion to dismiss—Agreement for lease not signed—Specific performance—Commencement uncertain—Date omitted.

Where there is a dispute between the landlord and tenant as to the terms of a parol agreement for a lease, alleged to be followed by part performance, the court will not dismiss the originating notice to fix a judicial rent, but will adjourn the application, in order to enable the landlord to enforce specific performance of the agreement, with liberty to either party to apply subsequently.

Application, on behalf of the landlord, to have the originating notice, served by the tenant to have a judicial rent fixed, set aside, on the ground that he held under an agreement for a lease. It was stated in the affidavit of the landlord that in December, 1853, the tenant agreed to take a lease for 61 years, or the life of his son, at a rent of £135. No agreement, however, had been signed. In 1861 in answer to an application, made by Mr. Nolan, the landlord's solicitor, for particulars of the agreement, the tenant wrote the following:—"The terms of the agreement between me and Mr. Farrell are as follows: I have promised to pay for the lands containing 110a. 3r. 5p. £135, and Mr. Farrell has promised me a lease for my son's life or 61 years."

Bewley, for the landlord.—This letter discloses all the terms of the agreement.

[O'HAGAN, J.—The Court of Appeal in England overruled a decision of Mr. Justice Fry, which I always considered sound law. They have held that the date of the commencement of the tenancy should be stated in the agreement.†]

The facts of that decision have not yet been made public. In 1863 Mr. Rutledge surrendered part of the lands, and the agent apportioned the rent for the remainder. In 1880 Rutledge reminded the agent that he had promised him a lease, to which Mr. Nolan replied, "Certainly." The case made by the tenant in his affidavit is that there was never any final agreement as to the conditions of the lease. In 1863 he agreed to give up the whole of the land, but that afterwards he decided to keep the house and part of the land about it, and that he had always believed that from that date a yearly tenancy alone existed. There is no doubt that an agreement for a lease has been entered into. The tenant's letter of 1861 shows it fully, and that agreement still subsisted.

J. B. Murphy, Q.C., for the tenant, contra.—There never was an agreement that could be enforced by any court, and even if there were such an agreement, that the occurrence which took place in 1863 rescinded it, and that ever since the tenant held as tenant from year to year.

O'HAGAN, J.—I have a strong opinion in point of law against the landlord's contention—the first ground being the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in the case already referred to; the second being that if it should appear the property was put in settlement subsequently to the agreement, that as the trustees had not notice of an unregistered instrument they would not be bound by it.

We shall make the following rule:—Let the motion stand for three weeks, for the purpose of enabling the landlord to take proceedings to enforce specific performance of the agreement for a lease, either party to be at liberty to apply at the end of three weeks.

BROE v. MAUNSELL.

Jan. 4, 1882.—Originating Notice to fix judicial rent—Motion to dismiss—Parol agreement for lease—Part performance—Conflicting affidavits—Specific performance.

Where the affidavits of the landlord and tenant, as to the existence of a parol agreement for a lease and part performance of the agreement, are of a substantially conflicting character, the Court will not assume the jurisdiction of deciding that there was such parol agreement, followed by part performance, as would oust the tenant from his prima facie right to be considered a tenant from year to year, but will adjourn the case for such time as will enable the party to take steps to enforce specific performance of the agreement.

Motion, on behalf of the landlord, that the originating notice to fix a judicial rent should be struck out, on the ground that the premises mentioned in it were held under an agreement for a lease for 31 years. The holding in question contained 201 statute acres, the yearly rent being £281 16s. 6d., and the Poor Law valuation, including the valuation of the houses, being £203. It appeared from the affidavit of the landlord, Mr. John Maunsell, that the tenants predecessor in title had allowed arrears of rent to accumulate prior to 1876. The rent had been fixed in 1830, and from that period remained unchanged until 1876. Before 1874 and in that year the tenant applied to the landlord for a lease, and on one occasion, in 1874, he asked him had he any objection to his getting married, to which the landlord replied he had not the slightest objection. The tenant then asked for a lease, and Mr. Maunsell promised to give him one for 31 years, but that he could not give it at the rent he had been previously paying. Finally, after a number of applications, the landlord instructed his brother, who acted as his agent, to write to the tenant informing him of the terms on which the lease for 31 years would be given—namely, 45s. an acre in the event of his giving up a small portion of his farm. The tenant, however, preferred to retain the whole of the farm, with slight modifications, at 45s. an acre, and although no lease was made he continued to pay the rent as secured under the new agreement.

The tenant in reply had made an affidavit denying that there was any definite agreement for a tenancy, or that he ever paid rent under the alleged agreement.

Holmes, Q.C., in support of the application.

[O'HAGAN, J.—It is an unsatisfactory position for a landlord having a parol agreement for a lease followed by part performance not to enforce it, because time runs against him. A court of equity in granting relief in such cases will consider the time a party rested on his

BLIGH v. KIRWAN.

rights a most material element.* The question is—Are we in a case of such importance to decide off-hand the rights of the parties instead of consigning them to a court of equity.]

Nolan, for the tenant, contra.—The whole of the terms of the agreement are vague and indefinite. There is a special covenant as to a right of way, but there is no certainty with regard to it. It does not appear from what date the lease was to run. In fact there was nothing more than treaty and negotiations, which never came to a definite issue. The case is governed by Rutledge v. Farrell previously decided by the Court.

O'HAGAN, J.—This is a case of some importance. It is alleged by the landlord that it does not come within the 21st section, as the tenant holds under a binding agreement for a lease. By the payment of rent a tenancy from year to year is impliedly created, but that can be rebutted by showing that he holds under another kind of agreement. There is a very considerable controversy between the parties, and where the affidavits of the landlord and tenant as to the existence of a parol agreement for a lease are of such a conflicting character, it would be very difficult indeed to show any case in which we ought to assume the jurisdiction of deciding that there was such parol agreement, followed by such part performance as would, in our opinion, amount to a binding agreement ousting the tenant from his prima facie right of being considered a tenant from year to year. If part performance be relied upon—that is, where we are asked to say that although there is not a binding contract within the Statute of Frauds, there is a binding parol agreement because of part performance—we must be satisfied that the agreement to which the part performance is referable is a clear and specific one—that there can be no doubt of its existence and of its terms. But whenever there is a dispute I do not think it would be proper for the Court, clothed with its peculiar jurisdiction, to assume the jurisdiction of a court of equity, to enforce specific performance of a parol agreement followed by part performance, as it would be practically doing if it took upon itself the decision of a question of so much importance as that which arises here. If Mr. Mannsell's case be well founded—and I do not question its correctness—he ought at once to take steps to enforce the agreement in a court of equity. The order we shall make in this case will be similar to that made in the last (Rutledge v. Farrell, ante)—namely, “Let the case stand for five weeks to enable the landlord to enforce specific performance of the agreement—either party to be at liberty to apply at the end of that time. The question of costs to be reserved.”

BLIGH v. KIRWAN.

Dec. 8, 1881.—Lease—Covenants, unfair or unreasonable—Yearly tenancy—Threat of eviction, or undue influence—Evidence—Jurisdiction—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21.

The landlord of a tenant from year to year, holding at a rent of £40 per annum, having informed him that he should take a lease at an increased rent of £30 per annum, the tenant, after refusing at first so to do, assented, as he was informed by the landlord that others were offering as much rent, or more, and that he would take advantage thereof. The lease, executed accordingly, contained covenants against keeping dogs on the farm, and requiring the tenant to preserve the game from being poached upon, with a proviso for forfeiture on breach, or that the landlord might exact an increased rent of £1 per acre:

Held (without deciding whether a great increase of rent would bring the case within the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 21), that the lease should not be declared void, as it contained, within the meaning of the enactment, no unfair or unreasonable covenants, nor was it procured by threats of eviction or undue influence.

Application, on behalf of the tenant, to have a lease declared void, as having been executed by him under threat of eviction, and because it contained covenants which, at the time of its acceptance, were unreasonable or unfair to him, having regard to the provisions of the L. & T. Act, 1870.

The lease in question was made in April, 1872, of lands in the Co. Galway. The rent had been raised from £40 a year to £70 a year; and the applicant further deposed that his father had built a house on the farm, had walled and fenced it in, and had drained and otherwise improved the land. He also stated that up to the end of the year, 1871, the lands were held from year to year, but in March of the following year the landlord, after giving the applicant a receipt for the half year's rent due up to the 1st November, 1871, informed him that there should be a new arrangement as his land was let too low; and that he should take a lease at an increased rent of £30 a year. The tenant refused to agree to the proposal, and said he would prefer to remain on as tenant from year to year. He was, however, compelled to take a lease, as he was informed by the landlord that other persons had offered as much as he was asking or even more, and that he would take these offers. The lease, which was accepted under those circumstances, contained a covenant against keeping dogs on the farm, and one requiring the tenant to preserve the game from being poached upon, together with a proviso that in case of a breach of any covenant a forfeiture would be worked, or the landlord at his option might increase the rent by £1 the acre. It appeared from the evidence, on behalf of the landlord, that the land had been held from 1823 to 1869 by lease; and that the tenant had surrendered the lease of 1823, and obtained a promise of a lease for 21 years from 1848. The books produced by the landlord showed an entry to that effect, which as an entry against interest by a deceased person—the late landlord—the Court held to be evidence, which would have enabled the tenant to enforce specific performance.

O'HAGAN, J.—As I have already observed in two previous cases the jurisdiction of the Court is bound by the terms of the Act of Parliament, and we can in no way go outside them. In order to break a lease we must find that the applicant was a tenant from year to year at the time of the acceptance of the lease; that the lease contained conditions that were unreasonable or unfair, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1870; and that it was obtained by threat of eviction or undue influence. Unless all these matters concur, we are debarred by the statute from granting the application. In order to arrive at a right conclusion we examined the books of the agent, and I must say that they were kept in a manner worthy of imitation by every gentleman similarly engaged in Ireland. They contained a record of everything that occurred between landlord and tenant on the estate, and have been of great assistance to the Court. I am not going to offer an opinion on the abstract question as to whether a great increase of rent would not bring the case within the operation of the section. All I need say is that we are unanimous in holding that the applicant has failed to show that he could be considered a tenant from year to year; that the lease contained unfair or unreasonable covenants; or that threats of eviction or undue influence had been employed to coerce him into an acceptance of it.

Where a tenant has been evicted for non-payment of rent, prior to the passing of the Land Law Act, 1881, an application made by him to the Court to extend his time for redemption, after the six months allowed by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1860, have expired, is made in sufficient time through the combined operation of sections 13 and 60 of the former Act, if made between the 20th of October and the 12th of November, 1881—the periods fixed for the first session of the Court, under the Orders of October 19, 27, 1881; and in defining the “first occasion” of the sitting of the Court, so as to extend beyond merely the first day of its sitting, those Orders are not ultra vires.

O'HAGAN, J.—In the case in which John Barrett is tenant and Lord Ventry is landlord, a judgment in ejectment for non-payment of rent had been obtained by the landlord, which was executed, and possession taken on the 6th of May, 1881, the tenant being left in possession pending redemption. On the 2th of November, 1881, a notice of motion (by mistake dated the 19th of November) was served by the tenant of an application to this court to extend the time during which the tenant might exercise his power of sale and redeem the tenancy, on the ground that the sale of the tenancy was delayed pending an application to have a judicial rent fixed.

An originating notice to have a judicial rent fixed for his holding was served on the 10th of November. The motion was originally moved before us on the 12th of November. The hearing of it was then adjourned, owing to the pressure of other business, and stood adjourned from time to time for the convenience of the parties, and was at length fully argued on the 2nd of December. The question is whether we have jurisdiction to make any order on this motion.

The 70th section of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1860, which in this respect is but a re-enactment of the provisions of an earlier statute, gives six months after the execution of the habere for the tenant to redeem in the manner provided by the statute, in default of which redemption he is debarred from all relief at law or in equity. Therefore, on the 6th of November, 1881, the tenant's right of redemption was gone unless we had the power of extending the time for redemption under the Act of 1881. It was the tenant's contention that we had, in fact, this power, and he called upon us to exercise it in his favour. His counsel urged, firstly, that under the 18th section we had the power for any reasonable cause to extend the period during which the tenant might, in case of ejectment for non-payment of rent, redeem the tenancy irrespective of intention to sell; secondly, that even if our power did not extend so far, but only entitled us to extend the time for redeeming the tenancy when the sale of the tenancy is delayed by reason of any application being made to a court, or for any other reasonable cause, yet that in this case the sale of the tenancy was in fact delayed by reason of the application to fix a judicial rent, and that being so delayed the tenant was entitled to have the time for redemption extended, in order to a sale being had. And in answer to the objection on the part of the landlord that even if the tenant's propositions could in any case be tenable, yet in this case the tenant came into court altogether too late, his time for redemption having expired on the 6th of November, and no step of any kind having been taken by him until the 10th of November, the tenant replied that the time was saved for him by force of the 60th section of the Act; that he applied to the court on the occasion of its first sitting after the passing of the Act, and that, therefore, his application was to be taken as if it had been made on the 23rd of August, the day on which the Act received the Royal assent. Those were the tenant's legal propositions. On the other hand the landlord asserted, firstly, that no power to extend the time for redemption is conferred upon the court, save as ancillary to the extension of time for sale of the tenancy; secondly, that the time for the sale of the tenancy being by the preceding part of the section confined to the period of six months from the execution of the writ or decree for possession in an ejectment for non-payment of rent, some step must have been taken within that period of six months to effect a sale, and it must be shown that the sale thus initiated within the prescribed period was in fact delayed by reason of application having been made to the court, or for some other reasonable cause, and that if no step were taken within that period the jurisdiction of this court absolutely failed. And with regard to the effect of the 60th section he contended that the time when the application was made to the court—namely, the 10th of November—could not legally be held to have been made on the first occasion of the sitting of the court. The issues of law thus knit were argued on both sides with great ability and ingenuity; and we now proceed to consider them seriatim.

First—Has this court a power under the 18th section to extend the time for redemption irrespective of delay of sale. Our prima facie view, to which I gave expression very early in the sitting of the court, was in the negative of this proposition; and to this view, after very full consideration, we adhere. But, I am bound to say that I was considerably impressed, if not shaken, by the argument on the point addressed to us on behalf of the tenant, and I can well conceive that a different interpretation might commend itself to another mind.

BARRETT AND OTHERS v. LORD VENTRY AND OTHERS.

The 13th section is as follows. [His lordship, having read the section, proceeded]:—Counsel for the tenant urged that the words “for any other reasonable cause” applied not to the delay of the sale, but to the grounds of the action of the court—that in fact it was to be read as if it ran thus: “The court may, when a sale is delayed by reason of an application to the court, or for any other reasonable cause, extend the time for sale or in case of an ejectment for non-payment of rent, extend the time to redeem the tenancy.” He urged that the word “for” would never have been introduced, and the sentence beginning with the words “by reason of” would have been simply carried on without a new preposition if nothing but the reason of delay of sale were contemplated. But he chiefly relied on the alternative word “or” at the end of the clause. The power, he argued, was a disjunctive one. The power to extend the time for sale was given, he said, in any case of eviction, whether in case of ejectment for overholding or in case of ejectment for non-payment of rent; but in the latter case a separate power in the disjunctive is conferred—namely, an independent power to extend the time for redemption. The force of this latter argument I do not disguise from myself; and I feel that, in order to give the clause a meaning which confines it to delay of sale, we must read the word “or” as if it meant “and”—a construction only open to us if we are convinced that no other interpretation will make the clause consistent and coherent with itself. Yet to this conclusion, in my opinion, we are compelled. The sub-section opens with the words “when the sale of any tenancy is delayed;” and as the sub-section consists of but one sentence we must hold that those words govern the entire of it, and that all the powers conferred upon the court are dependent upon that circumstance. The 1st sub-section is conversant altogether with the power of sale, and the 2nd sub-section is as if it were engrafted upon it, showing the cases in which the power of sale may be extended, and, as a necessary auxiliary to that extension, the time for redeeming the tenancy when the ejectment was for non-payment of rent should be extended also. The startling consequences of the tenant’s proposition must also be considered—for it must amount to this, that in every case of ejectment for non-payment of rent, whether in the Civil Bill Court or in the Supreme Court of Judicature, this court, wholly irrespective of any proceedings being pending here, would have power for what it might deem reasonable cause, to extend the time for redemption. Against such a construction the 3rd sub-section giving power, not to this court, but, to the court where the proceedings are pending, to suspend such proceedings in cases in which an application is made here to fix a judicial rent, afford to me an argument of enormous weight. Upon this point we feel ourselves bound to decide with the landlord.

The next point is whether the tenant has made his application to extend the time for sale in sufficient time. Apart from the 60th section he plainly has not. The 60th section is as follows. [His lordship read the section, and proceeded]:—Upon this section the tenant contends that his application was, in fact, made to the court on the first occasion on which it sat; and that being so made, the court had all the power to give him relief which it would have had if it had sat on the 22nd of August, the day of the passing of the Act. The landlord, on the other hand, asserts that the application was not made on the occasion of the first sitting of the court; and that even if it were, the lapse of the six months without a step being taken by the tenant towards effecting a sale was fatal to him. These questions we have now to consider.

On the 19th of October we made and promulgated the following Order. [His lordship read the Order of that date, fixing the period of the first sitting of the Court up to and including Saturday, the 29th of October.] And on the 27th of October we made the following further Order. [His lordship read the further Order, extending the time of the first sitting to Saturday, the 12th November.] It was contended that those Orders were ultra vires* and void; that we had no power given to us to fix any particular period on the first occasion on which the court sat. Mr. Weir insisted that “first occasion” must mean the first day. Mr. Holmes did not go so far—he said it meant the first time. As I understood him, he did not mean to deny the power of the court to adjourn de die in diem until all the applications were disposed of; but as I understood him, he contended that the parties should have taken some steps towards making the application on or before the 20th of October, the first day of the sitting, although he admitted that if, from the pressure of the number of applications, the court could not dispose of them all at once, it might sit daily till they were finished. So I understood his argument.

Now, I have to state that, as regards our sittings, the Act of Parliament leaves us entirely free. The sittings of the court are not defined by statute, as the sittings of the Supreme Court or the sittings of the Courts of Quarter Sessions, within certain bounds, are. The power of making rules conferred on us is of the very widest character. It embraces any matter or thing in respect to which it may seem expedient to the Land Commission to make rules for carrying the Act into effect. Have we not, therefore, power to define what time the first session of the court should embrace? And if, in view of what turned out to be the case—namely, the very great number of applications which would be made on the first occasion of our sitting—we determined that that sitting should be for a certain lengthened period, how can it be said that such an Order is ultra vires? It is to be observed that the word “Court” does not mean our court alone. It embraces, and, indeed, according to the Act primarily means, the Civil Bill Court. I asked one of the learned counsel who argued the case whether he contended that an application to the Civil Bill Court under the 60th section must be made on the first day of its sitting after the passing of the Act. He answered that he would so contend. I can only say that such a contention appears to us wholly untenable, and a virtual abrogation of the 60th section. The first occasion of the sittings of the Civil Bill Court means, in our opinion, the first session of that court after the passing of the Act; and we consider that the application might be made on any day of such first session of the Civil Bill Court; and that it might be made on any day of the sittings which we constituted our first session.

But even so, Mr. Holmes further contended that our power was gone, inasmuch as no step towards a sale had been taken within the six months. The consideration of the 60th section, in our opinion, displaces that argument. The tenant came in, as we hold, on the first occasion on which the Court sat, and applied, in pursuance of an originating notice served by him, to have a judicial rent fixed for his tenancy. That application he had a right to make under the combined effect of the 13th and 60th sections. We recorded that application as made by him on the first occasion of the sitting of the Court, and adjourned its further hearing until it should be heard by a Sub-Commission duly delegated by us to deal with it. He further applied to extend the time for sale of his tenancy, inasmuch as the sale would be delayed pending the application to fix a judicial rent. Now, if we were sitting on the 22nd of August, would not these applications have been perfectly in time under the 13th section? And does not the 60th section oblige us to deal with them as if we were sitting on that day? See what Mr. Holmes’ conclusion would lead to. The sale must be a sale pursuant to the Act, and made in the prescribed manner. Our rules, though we used the utmost despatch, necessarily took some time to prepare,

BARRETT AND OTHERS v. LORD VENTRY AND OTHERS.

and were not, in fact, promulgated till the 1st of October. Until that time, therefore, the prescribed manner did not exist. Is it to be contended that every tenant whose time for redemption and sale had expired before that date was debarred from his right to sell under the statute, though he could not know what the mode of sale under the statute was. It was precisely in view of possibilities of this kind that, in our opinion, the 60th section was passed; and we would contemplate with dismay a result which would be, as nearly as possible, a repeal of it. The motion thus made on the first occasion of the sitting of the Court stood adjourned for the concurrence of all parties. We now make an order upon it, extending the time for sale of the tenancy until the 20th of May, and we extend the time for redemption until the same period. This order will, under the 60th section, have the same effect as if made on the 22nd of August, and the order to fix a fair rent will speak as if made on the same day.

Mr. LITTON, Q.C.—The first question for the Court to consider in this case is, whether it has power to extend the time to enable a tenant to redeem his tenancy, irrespective of a proceeding by him to sell. The second, whether, through the combined operation of the 13th and 60th sections, an application made after the six months have actually expired, if made between the 20th October and the 12th November inclusive—the period limited as the first occasion on which the Court shall sit—is made in sufficient time. Regarding the dates in the present case, the application would be late if the above question is answered in the negative.

Now, as regards the jurisdiction of the Court to extend the time of redemption, irrespective of a sale, I am of opinion that the time can only be extended as ancillary to a sale by the evicted tenant of his tenancy. The Act of 1881 confers on the tenant evicted for non-payment the right to sell his tenancy within the time limited, whether the eviction takes place before or after the passing of the Act. This is a general provision applicable to all cases. The section then proceeds to confer a further right—but limited to cases where the eviction has taken place before the Act—namely, it enables the tenant in such a case (but still within the six months) to apply to the Court to have a fair rent fixed. This provision is confined to evictions before the Act, for this reason, as it appears to me, that no opportunity of fixing a fair rent existed for those already evicted, who were out of occupation, and therefore the special provision referred to was inserted. The position then under the 1st sub-section is this: the tenant evicted for non-payment of rent before the Act may sell his tenancy within the six months, and likewise apply to have the fair rent fixed. It is to be observed that the tenant's right of redemption is left precisely in the same position as it stood before—unaffected and unaltered. What the sub-section does is to give a right to sell the tenancy. Now, the right of sale conferred by the 1st section of the Act is a right which may be exercised without application to the Court. The necessity of an application to the Court only exists where a controversy arises between the landlord and the tenant in relation to the sale, and may arise at different stages of the proceeding. Again, even without any such controversy as I refer to, the tenant evicted before the 22nd August might desire to have the rent fixed so as to enable him to sell, as he might imagine, on more favourable terms; and thus a reference to the Court would become necessary. Either proceeding must occupy time beyond the control of the tenant, and it would have been idle to confer on the evicted tenant the right of sale if the limit of six months was absolute. The tenant would have been completely in the power of the landlord, who, by objecting to the purchaser, or by some other step, could render it impossible for the tenant to complete the sale within the time; or he might perhaps compel the tenant to forego some right conferred on him by the statute rather than allow the six months to elapse, and with it lose his right of sale altogether. In order to prevent this result some such provision as is contained in the 2nd sub-section was absolutely necessary, and it was, I cannot doubt, introduced simply with the object of effectuating what alone was aimed at in the 1st sub-section—namely, the sale of the tenancy. It provides that when the sale is delayed by reason of an application to the Court, or any other reasonable cause, the Court should have power to relax the limit of time specified in the 1st sub-section; but, as I apprehend, clearly for the purpose of that which was indicated in the 1st sub-section—a sale. The application to the Court has reference, not alone to an application to fix the rent, but to any dispute which required the intervention of the Court in the course of sale under section 1 of the Act; and further, to any reasonable cause which, without default of the tenant, might by reason of lapse of time defeat his right. In such case the Court is given power to extend the time. The sub-section adds: "or the time during which the tenant may redeem his holding." It has been argued that this confers a right to extend the time for redemption, for the purpose of redemption only. In my opinion, this is not the true construction of the sub-section. Sub-section 2 covers the two branches of the 1st sub-section, which deals with the respective classes of ejectments therein mentioned. The language, therefore, of sub-section 2 is disjunctive; but the single purpose of the 1st sub-section is that of sale alone. It does not affect to alter the time for redemption, but leaves that as it found it; and it appears to me the power to extend the time within which the tenant might redeem was for the purpose of effectuating the sale, and for that purpose alone.

I have now to consider the 60th section, as it affects the present case. I think the aim and object of that section is plain. The Act was passed on the 22nd August. It was thought reasonable, and no one can doubt that it was reasonable, that during the period required to enable the Commission to prepare its Rules and make provision for its sittings, rights should not be lost by reason of events which the party could not control. The 60th section provided, therefore, that any application made to the Court on the first occasion of the sitting should be regarded as made on the 22nd August, and that the person should be in the same position and have the same rights in respect of his tenancy as he would have been in and would have had if the application had been made on the day on which the Act came into force. The first day the Court sat was the 20th October. If the "occasion" means the first day, the present application is late. It seems to me impossible to contend that the first occasion should be held to be the first day of the first occasion. If the Civil Bill Court was the Court to which the tenant applied, surely an application made at any time during the October Sessions would be sufficient. If the first "day" had been intended, nothing would have been more easy than to have said so; and the fact that "occasion" and not "day" has been used satisfies me that it was not intended to limit the time within which the application should be made to the first day of the sitting. If this be so, the Court of necessity, must have the power to determine how many days the sitting shall last. It is said that the Court, in defining "occasion," has assumed legislative functions. I do not think so. We have but interpreted the phrase as we would be bound to do any other phrase not defined, and have simply appointed days for the commencement and termination of the sitting, which becomes a necessity the moment you conclude that the "first occasion" cannot be read the first day. We have then an application to extend the time with a view to sell, and an application to fix a fair rent, in effect made on the 22nd August. The tenant on that day had ever two months to serve notice of intention to sell, independently of any order the Court might make on his application. I apprehend it would have been quite enough, upon the application being made on the 22nd August, for the tenant to have stated that he intended to sell, and to have given an undertaking to serve the notice within a limited time, and that it was not necessary he should at the time have already served the notice as a condition precedent. We may make the order now, which we would have then made if we arrived at the conclusion on the 22nd August that a sale could not be effected within the prescribed period, having regard to the fact that a fair rent had to be fixed, and that such could not be done within the six months. By no other construction could a tenant evicted on the 23rd February obtain relief, although such a tenant had, on the 22nd August, well-defused rights confirmed by the statute. I do not entertain any doubt that the judgment of the Court is right.

Jan. 25, 1882.—Practice—Leave to sign final judgment—Landlord and Tenant—Writ of summons claiming for use and occupation—Plaintiff's affidavit relying on defendant's covenant in lease—O. XIII., r. 1.

Where the writ of summons was specially indorsed, claiming two half-years' gales of rent due to the plaintiff for the use and occupation of the lands, and the plaintiff, in his affidavit in support of a motion for leave to sign final judgment under O. XIII., r. 1, alleged the existence of a lease of the said lands made by him to the defendant and executed by the defendant, in which the defendant covenanted to pay the said rent, and the plaintiff claimed the rent as due under said lease:

Held, that the motion should be refused.

Motion for leave to sign final judgment under O. XIII., r. 1.

The writ of summons, specially indorsed, claimed the recovery of £42, being the amount of one year's rent due by the defendant to the plaintiff for the use and occupation of part of the lands of Upper Grange, County Kilkenny, particularised as follows:—

1st May, 1881.—Half-year's rent, £21
	£42

The plaintiff, in his affidavit in support of the motion, deposed that the amount claimed was one year's rent due by the defendant out of the said lands, held by the defendant under a lease dated 28th January, 1878, made by the plaintiff to the defendant for 99 years; and verified the cause of action. The defendant, in his affidavit, admitted that he signed the said lease; but denied that he ever went into possession of the lands, farmed or otherwise used or enjoyed them; and denied that he ever paid rent. The plaintiff replied in an affidavit that the defendant gave possession to a man named Brennan, but that neither he nor the defendant resided on the farm; and that the rent was regularly paid, and referred to a letter of the defendant dated 22nd Nov., 1880, sending a cheque for £23 10s., being the amount of half-year's rent, and £2 10s. costs of writ of summons.

Lyster, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.

Houston and Counsel, contra.—This action is not brought on the lease produced. An action for use and occupation cannot be maintained unless the defendant is shown to be in actual occupation of the lands.

[LAWSON, J.—All those distinctions are now abolished.]

The very form of the special indorsement given in Appendix A (Jud. Act) shows how carefully these things are provided for.

[HARRISON, J.—Your affidavit is that you do not use and occupy the lands.]

If the plaintiff wanted to pursue the defendant by this summary application, he should have sued on the lease. It is not for a person who made a lease to a tenant to say to him, you do not hold under that lease at all, and then come into court and say, you do hold under that lease. The defendant swears he never was in occupation of the lands.

LAWSON, J.—It appears to me that this motion cannot be maintained. It should have been stated in the writ that the action was brought on the covenant in the lease.

Feb. 16, 1882.—Practice—Specially indorsed writ—No rule on motion to sign final judgment—Leave to defend—Time for delivery of defence—O. XIII., r. 1—O. XXI., r. 3.

Where, on a motion for leave to sign final judgment on a specially indorsed writ, under O. XIII., r. 1, no rule is pronounced, leave to defend is thereby impliedly given, and the defendant is not entitled to a statement of claim, though demanded, but must deliver a statement of defence within eight days from the date of the order. Rae v. Langford, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 105, followed.

Motion, on behalf of the defendant, to set aside a judgment on the ground of surprise and irregularity.

The writ of summons, issued the 5th July, 1881, claimed the recovery of £50, one year's rent, due by the defendant out of his holding as tenant to the plaintiff, the particulars of which were indorsed on the writ. The appearance was entered on the 25th October, and a statement of claim demanded on the 23rd November. A motion, on behalf of the plaintiff, to mark final judgment for the sum claimed was made, on which the Court pronounced no rule. No statement of claim or notice in lieu thereof was delivered by the plaintiff. On the 27th January, 1882, judgment was entered; and a consent to set aside the judgment was subsequently tendered for signature, but was not complied with.

Shannon, in support of the motion.—Where no rule has been made on a motion to enter final judgment, leave to defend is thereby impliedly given: Rae v. Langford, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 105; Murgate Pier and Harbour Co. v. Perry, W. N. 1876, 52; Atkins v. Taylor, W. N. 1876, 11. The plaintiff is bound to deliver a statement of claim unless it be specifically dispensed with: O. XX., r. 1; or in the case of a specially indorsed writ, a notice in lieu of statement of claim: r. 2. Leave to defend a specially indorsed writ may be given on such terms as the Court thinks fit: O. XIII., r. 6. Where leave has been given to defend, the defendant must deliver his defence within such time as is limited by the order, and within eight days if no time has been limited: O. XXI., r. 3; Eiffe, Jud. Act, 330. But where the defendant has demanded a statement of claim, the plaintiff was bound to deliver it or a notice in lieu thereof.

Cathrew, contra.—O. XXI., r. 3, is perfectly plain. It has been expressly decided in Margate Pier and Harbour Co. v. Perry (ubi supra) that in such a case the plaintiff can enter judgment after the expiration of eight days though no statement of claim or notice in lieu thereof be delivered.

LAWSON, J.—We shall follow the decision in England. When no rule is pronounced on a motion to enter final judgment, it is equivalent to leave to defend. Mr. Shannon may take the case to a higher tribunal; but we decide it according to the settled practice of the Exchequer Division, shown by Rae v. Langford, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 105.

DEVITT v. FAUNT AND WIFE.

Feb. 23, 1882.—Practice—Action against husband and wife—Separate estate—No appearance—Statement of claim—Motion to charge separate estate—Service of notice of motion—O. XVIII., r. 21—O. XXIX., r. 4.

In an action against husband and wife, the plaintiff, claiming that the separate estate of the wife should be declared well charged with the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and no appearance having been filed, delivered a statement of claim, and filed a notice of motion with the proper officer of the Division to apply to the Court for an order to declare the separate estate of the married woman well charged with the amount of the plaintiff's claim and costs, but same was not served:

Held, that the notice of motion should have been served.

Motion, on behalf of the plaintiff, for an order that the proper officer of the Division do make up an order previously made by the court declaring that the separate estate of the married woman was well charged with the amount of the plaintiff's claim and costs, which the officer had declined to do without the production of an affidavit of service of the notice of motion.

The writ of summons was issued on the 4th October, 1881, by which the plaintiff claimed, as public officer of the National Bank, Limited, against the separate estate of the defendant S. A. Faunt, who, at the time of making the promissory note hereinafter mentioned, was the wife of the defendant T. L. Faunt, and was then and still continued entitled to property to her separate use, and against the said T. L. Faunt as her husband. The following particulars were endorsed:—“Joint and several promissory note for £30 15s. 6d., 17th May, 1877, made by the said S. A. Faunt and one

C. H. Faunt to the National Bank or order, payable two months after date:

“Principal, - - - - £30 15 6

“Interest up to 31st May, 1881, - 7 3 0”

And the plaintiff claimed (1) that it be declared that the separate estate of the said S. A. Faunt, vested in her or in any other person in trust for her, be chargeable with the payment of the said sum of £30 15s. 6d., and interest; (2) payment of the said sum of £30 15s. 6d., and interest; (3) if the said defendant S. A. Faunt shall not admit possession of separate estate sufficient to answer same, an inquiry of what the defendant's separate estate consists at the present time, and for payment thereof of the said sum of £30 15s. 6d., and interest; and (4) further and other relief. There was no appearance filed. The statement of claim, delivered the 17th November, 1881, alleged (1) that the plaintiff was a public officer of the National Bank, Limited; (2) that S. A. Faunt was, at the time of making the said promissory note, the wife of T. L. Faunt, and was and still is possessed of separate estate; (3) that on the 17th May, 1877, the said S. A. Faunt and one C. H. Faunt made their joint and several promissory note to the said National Bank for £30 15s. 6d., at two months after date; (4) that note became due on the 20th July, 1877, and £7 3s. interest up to 31st May, 1881, no part of which has been paid. The plaintiff claimed (1) that it be declared that the separate estate of the said S. A. Faunt, vested in her or in any other person in trust for her, is chargeable with payment of £30 15s. 6d., and interest; (2) payment of £30 15s. 6d., and interest; (3) an inquiry of what the separate estate of the said S. A. Faunt consists; and (4) further relief. The plaintiff moved in pursuance to notice, and obtained an order declaring that the separate estate of the said S. A. Faunt, vested in her or in any other person in trust for her, well charged with the sum of £30 15s. 6d., interest, and costs; and that it be referred to the Master of the Division to inquire and report of what such separate estate consisted, and in whom same is vested. The notice of motion on which that order was granted was not served, but merely filed. The officer declined to make up the order except on production of an affidavit of service of the notice of motion.

O'Connor, in support of the motion.—When a defendant does not enter an appearance any pleading or document shall be deemed to be delivered by being filed in the proper office: O. XVIII., r. 21; O. XXIX., r. 4. A notice of motion is a document which may be delivered by filing it with the proper officer when proceeding against a defendant who has not appeared: Dymonds v. Croft, 3 Ch. D. 512, 24 W. R. 700.

[LAWSON, J.—Why should you not serve notice of motion? We cannot have proceedings taken behind the backs of defendants.]

It was decided by Jessel, M.R., in Dymonds v. Croft, supra, which was a similar case, that delivery was not necessary. In actions of this kind it is the practice of the Common Law Divisions to follow the practice of the Equity Division.

[HARRISON, J.—How does it appear that the defendant has any separate estate?]

It does not appear until after the Master makes up his report.

KEARNEY v. HANNON.

Jan. 13, 1882.—Costs—Action for slander—Judgment entered for defendant—Defendant deprived of costs—Motion to vary judge's order—Discretion of trial judge—Jud. Act, s. 53.

In an action claiming damages for slander, where the defendant set up a plea of privilege, practically tantamount to a justification, which he was unable to substantiate at the trial, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of 10s. lodged in court, the judge entered judgment for the defendant, and certified that he was not to be entitled to costs. On an application to vary the judge's order as to costs:

Held, that the Court would not interfere with the discretion exercised by the trial judge, on a consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the case disclosed in the evidence before him, on which he was in a position to form a better opinion.

Motion, on behalf of the defendant, to vary the judge's order, made at the trial of the action at Armagh Summer Assizes, 1881, depriving the defendant of his costs. The statement of claim alleged—paragraph (1) that the plaintiff was a publican in Crossmaglen, county Monaghan; (2) that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff, as such publican, and in relation to his conduct in such trade and business the words, "He keeps no one but highwaymen;" "it" (plaintiff's public-house) "is a den of infamy and of thieves and prostitutes; no one would go into it who had any respect for themselves" (meaning thereby that the plaintiff had conducted his said business in a disorderly and improper manner, and permitted his place of business to be used as a resort of thieves and prostitutes); (3) as a further cause of action, repeating the allegations in the preceding paragraphs, omitting the innuendo at the end of the 2nd; and (4) as a further cause of action the plaintiff complained that defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff the words, "He" (plaintiff) "keeps no one but highwaymen;" "it" (plaintiff's public-house) "is a den of infamy and of thieves and prostitutes, and no one would go into it who had any respect for themselves" (meaning that the plaintiff kept and was the keeper of a house which was a common nuisance, and was guilty of an indictable offence). Plaintiff claimed £500 damages.

The statement of defence (1) traversed the speaking and publishing of the words in the 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of the statement of claim; (2) admitting, for the purpose of the defence, the speaking and publishing of the words, traversed the allegation that they were spoken of the plaintiff as a publican; (3) traversed the defamatory sense alleged in the 2nd paragraph of the statement of claim; (4) traversed the speaking and publishing of the words in the 4th paragraph complained of; (5) traversed the defamatory sense alleged in the 4th paragraph; (6) as a further defence, averred that at the time of the speaking and publishing of the words complained of the defendant was a resident ratepayer in Crossmaglen and the plaintiff was a licensed publican, carrying on his business in the house next door to that of the defendant; that as such resident ratepayer the defendant was directly interested in the proper and orderly conduct of the plaintiff's business as a publican; that, upon the occasion of the speaking of the words complained of, a person named E. Malone left the plaintiff's licensed house in a state of intoxication, and coming over to the house of the defendant behaved towards him in a most disorderly and violent way, so that the defendant was obliged to send for the constabulary, who upon their arrival followed the said E. Malone into the house of the plaintiff, to which he had returned, and there arrested him; that the defendant, who had on other occasions been annoyed by the disorderly conduct of persons when leaving the plaintiff's licensed house, did thereupon, in the belief that the plaintiff was conducting his business in a disorderly manner, and in contravention of the licensing laws, and also for the purpose of securing himself from similar scenes of disturbance, complain to the constabulary, who were the proper authorities constituted by law to receive such complaint and to redress the grievance complained of; that the defendant made such complaint bona fide and without malice, and believing it to be true, and in making such complaint he spoke and published the words in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th paragraphs of the statement of claim mentioned; and (7) the defendant lodged 10s. in court. By consent the 6th paragraph of the defence was amended by stating the words following:—"In making such complaint he spoke and published the words in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th paragraphs of the statement of defence referred to."

The action was tried in Armagh, at the Summer Assizes, 1881, before Palles, C.B., and a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff generally, and that the sum of 10s. lodged in court was sufficient damages. The Lord Chief Baron entered judgment for the defendant, but certified that, in consequence of the verdict on the defendant's pleas in bar being found for the plaintiff, the defendant should not be entitled to costs.

The Solicitor-General, Porter, Q.C. (with him J. H. Campbell), in support of the application.—The costs generally follow the event, and where judgment was entered up for the defendant in an action of slander he is entitled to the costs, unless for special cause shown; and the divisional court is empowered to vary the order of the judge who tried the case: Jud. Act, s. 53. The English and Irish orders as to costs are different. Before depriving the defendant of his costs special cause should have been shown to the contrary.

Monroe, Q.C. (with him T. L. O'Shaughnessy), for the plaintiff, contra.—An application to interfere with the order of the judge at trial acting in his discretion, never yet succeeded: Harnett v. Vise, 5 Exch. D. 307. The defendant could not prove his plea of privilege at the trial. O. XLV. (Eng.) is stronger than s. 53 (Ir. Jud. Act, 1877). The judge at the trial has full power to order that costs shall not follow the event: Turner v. Heyland, 4 C. P. D. 432.

MORRIS, C.J.—I am called on to decide such a case for the first time. An application to vary the order of the judge at the trial may be made to the judge or to the divisional court. This is an application by way of appeal from the judge at the trial. It is an appeal from the order of the judge who is well acquainted with the facts of the case. The Lord Chief Baron put the costs on the defendant on account of his failure to prove his plea of privilege. Practically, privilege and justification are dealt with in the same way; but this is something in the nature of a plea of justification. The Lord Chief Baron thought, on the facts of the case, that the costs should be put on the defendant. The judge at the trial can form a better opinion of the circumstances

Feb. 23, 1882.—Action to recover lands on the title—Staying proceedings pending application to Land Commission to fix judicial rent—Land Law Act, 1881, ss. 8, 13 (sub-s. 3), ss. 21, 58 (sub-s. 7).

Where a tenant applies to stay ejectment proceedings pending an application to the Land Commission to fix a judicial rent, the Court will not, on such an interlocutory application, determine whether the tenancy is one to which the Act applies. Boyd v. Hodson, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 120, followed.

Semble, per PALLES, C.B.—A tenancy under a written agreement for a year certain, existing at the date of the passing of the Act, is one to which section 21 applies.

Motion, under the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 13, sub-s. 3, for a stay of proceedings pending an application to the Land Commission to have a judicial rent fixed. The action was brought to recover possession of portion of the lands of Geraldine, in the Barony of Athy and County of Kildare. The lands were held by the defendant under a written agreement dated February 17, 1881, by which he became tenant of the said lands from the first day of January, 1881, till the first day of January, 1882. The agreement further provided that the letting, being one for the temporary convenience of both the landlord and tenant, the tenant was to be debarred from any right or claim for compensation for disturbance or improvements under the Land Act of 1870.

The action was commenced January 5, and notice of trial had been served for March 1.

Moriarty, in support of motion.—The defendant is a "present tenant" within the meaning of sec. 8 of the Act; for sec. 21 enacts that those who hold under "leases or other contracts of tenancy existing at the date of the passing of this Act, except yearly tenancies and tenancies less than yearly tenancies," shall, at the expiration of same, become present ordinary tenants. At the date of the passing of the Act this was an existing "other contract of tenancy."

[PALLES, C.B.—Surely, the way to try the question whether this tenant is entitled to apply to the Land Commission or not, is before a jury, and if you object to their verdict, it can then come before us in the ordinary way.]

Hamilton, contra, was not called on.

PALLES, C.B.—In my opinion this motion should be refused with costs. [His Lordship read s. 13 (3).] Before we can, under this section, suspend the proceedings we should have to decide judicially that the applicant is a present tenant. This has already been decided in the Common Pleas Division in Boyd v. Hodson, 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 120. Subject to what Mr. Hamilton might have to say, I am of opinion that if the case rested on section 21 the tenant would be the tenant of a present tenancy. He held under a written agreement, which expired on January 1st, 1882. [His Lordship read section 21.] If, therefore, this was a tenancy to which the Act applied, it would appear that Mr. Moriarty has brought himself within that clause which entitles him to apply to this Court. But the answer to this is that s. 58, sub-s. (7), states that the Act is not to apply to any holding let to the tenant for the temporary convenience, or to meet a temporary necessity, either of the landlord or tenant. Therefore, before we held that defendant had the status which entitled him to make this application, we should decide that these lands were not let for the temporary convenience of either landlord or tenant.* A written document is produced here in court which expressly declares, on the face of it, that the letting was a letting for that purpose. Without saying that this is an estoppel against the defendant, we think it is a question of fact that must be tried in the ordinary way by a jury. The motion must, therefore, be refused with costs.

CRONIN v. PAUL AND OTHERS

Feb. 13, 1882.—Practice—Inspection of documents—O. XXXI., r. 17.

On an application under O. XXXI., r. 17, the Court will not grant an order for inspection of documents, though some of them are referred to in the pleadings of the opposite party, if the documents are not in the possession or power of that party.

Summons, on behalf of the plaintiff, for an order that defendants should produce to the plaintiff for his inspection, and permit him to take extracts from and copies of the several documents mentioned in the affidavit of John Egan. The action was brought against the defendants, as five members of a committee of merchants of Cork, to try the legality of their dealings in relation to the butter market of that city. An order for discovery of documents which are or have been in the possession or control of the defendants had been obtained, June 23rd, 1881. On July 30 the defendants filed an affidavit in the usual form denying that they have or had any such documents, and alleging that all documents connected with the Cork butter exchange were in the possession of the committee of merchants, and referring to an affidavit of John Egan, the secretary and treasurer of the said committee. The affidavit of Egan set forth in a Schedule the documents in the possession of the deponent, who objected to produce same unless ordered to do so by the said committee or the court. On Nov. 3 a notice was served on defendants to produce, for the inspection of plaintiff, the documents scheduled in Egan's affidavit, which had not been complied with, hence the present summons. An affidavit of the plaintiff filed in support of the motion stated that it was material and necessary for him to inspect and copy a number of documents comprising five letters from plaintiff to the committee of merchants, between Feb., 1877, and March, 1880, the books containing the minutes of the meetings of the said committee from 1877 to 1881, and all their rules and regulations for the same period, and several other documents. All of them were included with others in the schedule to Egan's affidavit, and some of them were referred to in the statement of defence of the defendants. In answer to this affidavit the defendants filed another which alleged that the committee of merchants consisted of twenty-one members, and that three of the five defendants had not been members thereof since May 4, 1881. They believed the documents referred to in plaintiff's affidavit were in the possession of Egan, but they had no authority over him to order him to produce any documents in his custody, and that all orders given to him must be by resolution passed at a meeting of the said committee.

O'Riordan, Q.C., in support of motion.—We earmark the documents we want in plaintiff's affidavit, and they are all included in Egan's affidavit. We are entitled to inspect all the documents incorporated in the pleadings.

Jan. 14, 1882. —Lease for life—Presumption of death—Tenancy from year to year—Originating Notice to fix judicial rent.

In April, 1842, a lease was made for 21 years, and during the life of Bryan Gill, then aged 21, or 24. In 1856 Bryan Gill went to Steevens's Hospital, Dublin, suffering from an affection in his eyes; and a short time afterwards some members of his family called, but could hear nothing of him. It was deposed that he had left this country in that year; and it was stated that, when leaving home, he had got £5 from his relatives. It did not appear that he had subsequently asked for any assistance from them; and William Gill, his brother, had not heard from him since, and stated his belief that his other brothers and sisters had not heard from him. But the other brothers and sisters made no affidavit; nor did it appear what inquiries were instituted to discover his whereabouts; and it was sworn that a bailiff had been informed that Bryan Gill was a mate on board an American vessel in March, 1875. During Bryan Gill's absence rent had been paid by William Gill, and received by the lessor, but not, so far as appeared, with knowledge that, as alleged, Bryan Gill was dead. William Gill (whose elder brother would have been entitled to the land, if Bryan Gill was still alive), claiming to be a "present tenant," under a tenancy from year to year, having served an originating notice to fix a judicial rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881:

Held, that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a presumption that Bryan Gill was dead; and that, even if he were to be so presumed, no circumstances were shown such as would create a tenancy from year to year between the lessor and William Gill; and, therefore, that the originating notice could not be sustained.

Application on behalf of the landlord to set aside an originating notice to fix a judicial rent, on the ground that of an area of 29a. 3r. 20p., which it included, 25a. 1r. 37p. were held, not from year to year, but under a lease made on the 27th of April, 1842, and which was still subsisting, and that the originating notice inaccurately described the lands as one holding instead of two. The lease had been made for a term of 21 years and the life of Bryan Gill, who, it was deposed, had left this country about the year 1856. It was stated, in an affidavit filed on behalf of the landlord, that a bailiff on the property had been informed that Bryan Gill, in March, 1875, was a mate on board an American vessel. The affidavit filed on behalf of the tenant, William Gill, stated that Bryan Gill went to Steevens's Hospital in Dublin in the year 1856, as he was suffering from an affection of the eyes; that a member of the family called some very short time after to the hospital, but could learn nothing about him. There were other brothers and sisters, and none of them, it was believed, had ever heard from him since.

Bewley, for the landlord.—The party relying on the fact of death having taken place must show it by some evidence. It must be shown that the death took place at a particular time. The applicant is not entitled if the life is in being, as he was an elder brother. He must, also, show when the death took place, because if it only took place a day or two before the passing of the Act he would not be a present tenant. If it took place since the passing of the Act he might be deemed to be a present tenant. If the death took place before the passing of the Act, and rent were paid subsequently to the death, he might be a tenant from year to year; but we do not know whether this is the case or not. The evidence in an ejectionment under 7 Wm. III, c. 8, must be of the most exhaustive character before the presumption created by the statute can be allowed; but in this case there are other members of the family alive, and they do not state that they have not heard from him. On every ground the motion must be granted.

G. M'Dermot, for the tenant.—At the end of a period of seven years, when a party has not been heard of, it is presumed that he is dead. That period has several times passed since Bryan Gill was heard of. It is, therefore, not necessary for us to show the time of his death. We admit that there is no presumption that he died at a particular time; but, if the presumption is that at the end of the first seven years he is dead, it must be presumed that he died before the commencement of the second seven years. The bailiff's statement is not evidence; it is the hearsay of a person who does not even make an affidavit.*

GILL v. MANLY.—CUTHERBERT v. YOUNG.

[L. C.

That is a matter for the Sub-Commission. They will go into the case fully. It is enough for us to show a right to come in as a tenant from year to year. The landlord may, when the case comes before the Sub-Commission, require us to give the most satisfactory evidence in aid of the presumption of death; but he is not entitled, on a summary motion of this sort, to have a case, in which the controversy is one of fact, disposed of. The presumption here is not one of law, it is one of fact: Lapley v. Grierson, 1 H. L. C. 498. It is so far in our favour, for the Court has decided that cases in which the controversy is one of fact shall go before the Sub-Commissions.* Bryan Gill was evidently a delicate person; the first thing we hear about him is that he went to a hospital. On inquiry at the hospital a very short time after there is no account of him.

Hardly; but even so, it is plain he was dependent on his family, for he got £5 on leaving home, and he would have been likely to have wanted money after leaving the hospital; and the fact of his not applying for money, where the probabilities are so strong that he would have applied if he were alive, is evidence of his death: In re Henderson's Trusts, cited in Roscoe's N. P. at p. 44. There is a very strong case where a person born in 1829 went to America in 1853, and had frequently written home till August, 1858, when he wrote from on board an American warship, but from that time nothing was heard of him except that he was entered on the books of the American navy as having deserted on the 16th of June, 1860, while on leave; and Gifford, L.J., refused to presume that he was alive on the 6th of January, 1861: In re Phene's Trusts, L. R. 5 Ch. 139.

[LITTON, Q.C.—That only shows there is no presumption either way.]

There is no presumption that the person was alive in January, 1861, although entered as having deserted in the preceding June. The presumption from that case is that Bryan Gill is not alive; and the general presumption from the fact of his not having been heard of for seven years is that he is dead. There is a twofold presumption against life, and in favour of death.

[LITTON, Q.C.—It must be shown that he died either before the 22nd August, 1861, and that a tenancy from year to year was created, by the payment and receipt of rent under circumstances which would lead a jury to say there was a tenancy from year to year created, or that he died after the Act, so as to bring you within the 21st section.]

There is the strongest authority for holding the presumption of death right in this case. By statute 19 Charles II., c. 6, s. 2, in actions by lessor or reversioner for the recovery of lands granted or leased for lives, or for years determinable on lives, the cestui que vie shall be accounted to be naturally dead if they shall remain beyond the seas or elsewhere absent themselves within the realm by the space of seven years together, and no sufficient or evident proof be made of the lives of such persons.

[LITTON, Q.C.—What do you say to the evidence required under the statute of William III. ?]

It is the corresponding statute in Ireland, and it does not, so far as we see, affect our argument. If we ask that death should be presumed, by giving evidence that no member of the family has heard from him for a period of seven years, we should be allowed to do so before the Sub-Commission. This is not the place to decide the question.

LITTON, Q.C.—In this case, part of the lands are held under a lease which I must regard as subsisting, unless I am bound to presume, on the evidence before me, that Bryan Gill, the life in the lease, has died. It appears that when the lease was made he was a young man, according to one statement, of twenty-one years of age, and according to another, of twenty-four; so that he would now if alive be about sixty years of age. It is, therefore, quite within the probabilities of human existence that he might be alive and well at this moment. If he be alive, the tenant has no claim to the land comprised in the lease, for his elder brother would then be the party entitled to the land. I think the evidence produced on behalf of the tenant wholly insufficient to justify me in saying Bryan Gill must be presumed to have died. While it is stated in the affidavit of William Gill that there are brothers and sisters living, no affidavit has been made by the members of the family referred to; nor does it appear what inquiries were instituted to discover the whereabouts of Gill. On the other hand, it is stated that in March, 1875, he was mate in a sailing vessel from New York. But, even if I was prepared to now presume the death of Bryan Gill on the very insufficient evidence I have referred to, the mere payment of rent by William Gill, the tenant, and receipt by the landlord, in ignorance of the fact that the life had dropped, would not create a tenancy from year to year between the parties. Under those circumstances the originating notice should be dismissed; but as Gill is admittedly tenant from year to year of 4a. 2r. 8p., with the consent of the landlord, I shall make the following order:—The landlord so consenting, let the tenant amend his originating notice by striking out of it the 25a. 1r. 37p. mentioned in the lease; and also, amend the particulars as to the rent and valuation of the residus of the lands.

Order accordingly.*

CUTHERBERT v. YOUNG.

Jan. 16, 17, 1882.—Application to fix judicial rent—Agreement for a lease—Land Law, Ireland, Act (1881).

A tenant, who alleged that he held from year to year, applied to have a judicial rent fixed. An agreement signed by both parties to pay an increased rent, and that there should not be a revaluation for 21 years, was produced:

Held, that the tenancy continued to be a yearly one, and that the case should be heard.

Application to fix a judicial rent. The holding consisted of 104a. 2r. 2p., near the city of Londonderry. The rent was £132 0s. 9d., and the Government valuation £105. It appeared that the tenant held under the following (stamped) agreement:—

“Coolkeeragh, 27th December, 1873.

“SIR,—I agree to give you up the field called Gatesburn, containing 31a. 0r. 6p. statute, and also the Woodfield, containing 6a. 3r. 20p. statute measure, on 1st November, 1873, without receiving any compensation from you.

Colquhoun, Q.C., for the landlord, applied to dismiss the case on the ground that the tenant held under an agreement for a lease.

R. H. Todd, solicitor, for the tenant, submitted that the agreement was merely one not to raise the rent during 21 years, and that the landlord could at any time during this period have sustained an ejectment founded on a notice to quit.

Decision deferred.

Mr. Bourke.—The first farm is not described in the agreement any further than "my present holding," and the rent is only stated as "an advance of £30 per annum on my present rent." The second farm is called Warnock's farm, and the rent is stated as "an advance of £5 on Warnock's farm." It is also difficult, from the dates, to know whether the letting was to commence on the 1st May, 1874; or the 1st November, 1873. I am clearly of opinion that at the time of making this agreement it was not the intention of either party to create a tenancy for 21 years, but that this agreement was solely made to prevent the landlord increasing the rent during the term of 21 years, from 1st November, 1873. I do not think a court of equity could force either party to execute a lease on such an agreement as this. There is no sufficient description of the property demised; there is no absolute certainty as to the time at which the demise was to commence; there is no fixed rent to be paid, and no mention of any covenants to be inserted; and, from the wording of the agreement, neither party, at the time it was made, considered it to be an agreement for a 21 years' lease. I, therefore, decide that the agreement of the 27th December, 1873, is not an agreement for a lease, but is only an agreement binding on Captain Young, in consideration of his having got Gateshurn and Woodfield, not to raise the rent on certain other farms belonging to Captain Young, in the possession of David Cuthbert at the time of the agreement. And the only way, in my opinion, that Captain Young is bound by the agreement is that he will not raise David Cuthbert's rent for 21 years from the 1st November, 1873. I, therefore, decide that we can hear this case.*

continuing in occupation from year to year—Compensation by Landlord—True value—Fair rent—Appeal—Statute, construction of—Retroactive operation—L. & T. Act, 1870, s. 4—L. L. Act, 1881, ss. 7, 8 (9), 57.

The term "improvements" in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Land Law Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vic., c. 49), has the same meaning as in section 70 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vic., c. 46).

The terms "tenant or his predecessors in title" in section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881, have the same meaning as in the 7th section: dis. MAY, C.J., MORRIS, C.J., and DEASY, L.J.

The provisions of the final paragraph of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, as to improvements made before the passing of that Act, are applicable to such improvements in determining fair rent under the 8th section of the Act of 1881: dis. LAW, C.

The enjoyment, during the currency of a lease, of improvements made by a tenant during its sub-existence does not constitute a compensation by the landlord, within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881.

A lease made before the passing of the Act of 1870, demising lands, together with all houses, edifices, and buildings, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and containing the usual covenants, precludes the tenant from being regarded as having any interest in respect of improvements made (e.g., a house built) before its execution, in determining what is the fair rent of the holding, under the 8th section of the Act of 1881: dis. LAW, C., SIR E. SULLIVAN, M.R., and PALLES, C.B.

Per LAW, C.:—"Improvements" simply mean suitable and ameliorative works executed or done upon the holding; and no rent is to be imposed or made payable in respect of the yearly value of such actual improvement-works themselves; but, the increased letting value of the land beyond that, subsequently accruing to the land in consequence of the execution of such works, may be taken into account as entitling the landlord to benefit in the determination of the rent. "Predecessors in title" denote a series of tenants who have transmitted from one to the other their respective tenancies or titles to the possession of a holding, whatever those tenancies or titles may be, or whatever changes they have undergone. In estimating the "interest of the tenant," when determining fair rent under the 8th section of the Act of 1881, not merely his right to claim compensation under the 4th section of the Act of 1870 should be taken into account, but his right to sell his tenancy as it stands, improvements and all, whether executed before or after the Act of 1870, for the best price that can be got for the same, under section 1 of the Act of 1881; while, if the landlord seeks to exercise his right of pre-emption, he must pay, as the "true value" of the holding, what it would bona fide bring in the open market, if sold to an unobjectionable purchaser.

Per MAY, C.J.:—"Predecessor in title," within the meaning of the Act of 1881, does not mean an antecedent occupier, but a previous tenant from whom the existing tenant derives his title to the tenancy. Upon an appeal from the decision of a sub-commissioner to the Land Commissioners they should form their own independent judgment upon the evidence, which may not be confined to that which was adduced in the court below, as the appeal should be regarded as a re-hearing.

ADAMS v. DUNSBATH.

Per SIR E. SULLIVAN, M.R.:—"Improvements," within the meaning of the Act of 1881, section 9 (8), does not refer to the increased letting value of the holding caused by the making of the improvements, but simply the works which have caused that increase, or rather the interest of the tenant who made them, measured by the money expended on them, as declared and limited by the Acts of 1870 and 1881. The right of sale given by the Act of 1881 does not give an absolute right to sell all the improvements as they stand, and the "true value" which the landlord must pay, when exercising his right of pre-emption, is not the market value, but what, having regard to the interest of landlord and tenant respectively under the code, would be the true estimate of price as between "them."

Per MORRIS, C.J.: While the tenant is entitled to the benefit of improvements which add to the letting value of the holding, the inherent qualities and capacity of the land for such works should be taken into consideration in favour of the landlord, when determining a fair rent. The interest of the landlord is the plenary interest in the holding, save so far as the tenant establishes, in diminution, claims under the Acts of 1870 and 1881, which constitute his interest. The mere abstention by the landlord from availing himself of his legal rights, and allowing the tenant to enjoy what, if the landlord chose, he himself might enjoy, amounts to a "compensation" by the landlord, within the meaning of the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), irrespective of threat or statement to that effect.

Per FALLON, C.B.: "Improvements," within the contemplation of the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), mean works which, being suitable to the holding, add to its letting value, as distinguished from the increased letting value itself; and the enjoyment by the tenant of improvements executed before the passing of the Act of 1870 cannot be excluded from consideration in determining fair rent.

Per DEASY, L.J.: With respect to the fixing of a fair rent and the ascertainment of compensation for improvements to the tenant, the Land Commission has an unlimited discretion, and no general rule or principle should be laid down by the Court of Appeal that could or ought to bind the exercise of that discretion.

Per FITZGIBBON, L.J.: The words "paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title," in the Act of 1881, section 8 (9), include every form of recoupment which the tenant receives, at the hands of the landlord, whether by way of cash payment or out of the landlord's estate, as an equivalent for the tenant's improvements; so, if a landlord gives over to an improving tenant, because he is such, the soil with all its natural powers, at a price so far below the letting value of the landlord's interest as to recoup the tenant for his improvements. The determination of fair rent is not such a mere question of fact as should not form the subject of appeal: Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9, applied, and contrasted with Grey v. Turnbull, L. R. 1 H. L. 53.

Holt v. Harberton, 6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1, discussed.

Case stated by the Land Commission, the judgments of which Court are reported ante, p. 15:—

On the 17th of October, 1881, the tenant in this case served the landlord with an originating notice of an application to the Court of the Land Commission to fix a fair rent for his holding; we refer to this notice, which bears date the 14th of October, 1881. It describes the lands as the lands of Kildowney, in the county of Antrim, and Poor Law Union of Ballymena. The other particulars as to the holding stated in the originating notice are as follows:—

Area in statute measure, . . . . . 42a. 1r. 5p.
Rent of holding, . . . . . £36 10s. 0d.
Gross Poor Law Valuation, . . . . . £24 10s. 0d.

2. The application came on to be heard before a Sub-Commission sitting at Ballymena, and duly delegated and authorised to decide the case. The Sub-Commission made an order bearing date the 19th day of November, 1881, to which we refer, fixing the judicial rent at the sum of £30 15s. 0d., and directing the landlord to pay to the tenant the costs of the case.

3. By notice bearing date the 2nd of December, 1881, to which we refer, the landlord stated he was aggrieved by the above order, and required the case to be re-heard before the three Land Commissioners sitting together. Accordingly the case was re-heard before us, the three Land Commissioners, sitting together in Belfast on the 9th day of January, 1882, and we by our order, to which we refer, varied the order of the Sub-Commissioners so far as regards costs, directing that the parties respectively should abide their own costs of the hearing, but affirmed the order of the Sub-Commission as regards the judicial rent of £30 15s., and directed that the parties respectively should bear their own costs. The facts are as follows:—In and prior to the year 1842, the greater portion of the holding in this case, consisting of 20a. 2r. 21p. Irish plantation measure, equivalent to 33a. 1r. 25p. statute measure, or thereabouts, was in the occupation of a tenant named James M'Kee, who held them as tenant under the Earl of Mountcashel, but at what rent does not appear. In the year 1842, the Earl of Mountcashel caused the lands to be valued. They were valued accordingly by valuers appointed by him, at the yearly sum of £26 11s. 6d. From the time of the valuation the rent £26 11s. 6d. was paid by James M'Kee for said 20a. 2r. 21p. Irish, for the term of thirty years from the 1st Nov., 1845, at the yearly rent of £26 11s. 6d. We refer to this lease, which was given in evidence. James M'Kee built a house on the holding, using in some degree for that purpose the materials of an older house previously existing. It did not appear clearly from the evidence at what time M'Kee erected the house. By consent and admission of the parties, we state that the house was built two years before the existence of the lease; but the agent appears verbally to have offered a lease prior to the building, and M'Kee understood that he could have a lease if he liked. No improvements other than the building of the house were alleged to have been made prior to the execution of the lease. By deed dated October, 1846, in consideration of the sum of £240, James M'Kee granted and assigned all his estate and interest in the premises comprised in the lease to John Adams, the father of David Adams the present tenant. We refer to this assignment. John Adams died about thirteen years ago, and on his death the holding devolved on David Adams. It did not appear in what legal manner the holding so devolved; but no question was raised on this point, and it was admitted that all the estate and interest of John Adams in the holding became upon his death legally vested in David Adams. By deed of conveyance of 30th April, 1857, the Commissioners of Incumbered Estates in Ireland conveyed to William Dunseath, deceased, the husband of the above-named Jane Dunseath, his heirs and assigns, the lands of Kildowney, subject amongst other tenancies to the tenancy created by the said lease of the 2nd March, 1846. There is another lease of the same date and between the same parties mentioned in the schedule to the conveyance, comprising between five and six statute acres; but this case is not conversant with the latter lease. William Dunseath died in the year 1869, and upon his death all his estate and interest in the lands of Kildowney became vested in Jane Dunseath. John Adams erected buildings upon the lands in addition to those previously existing. The buildings so erected by John Adams consist of a boiling-house and shed. John Adams also effected improvements by reclamation of waste lands, by making fences and drains and a farm road. After the death of John Adams, and during the currency of the lease, David Adams effected improvements on the lands by reclamation of waste lands, and by making fences and drains. David Adams, from time to time during the currency of the lease, took as tenant from year to year under Mrs. Dunseath certain pieces of bog, amounting together to about nine acres, statute measure, at rents amounting in the aggregate to £4 10s. He was in possession of these pieces of bog at the termination of the lease. He also effected improvements by reclamation of a portion of these pieces of bog. The lease expired on the 1st of November, 1875. After its expiration Mrs. Dunseath caused the premises comprised in it to be re-valued, with a view to the re-adjustment of the rent. They were accordingly re-valued at the annual rent of £31 17s. 6d. The valuer was Mr. Raphel, who had taken part in the previous valuation of 1842, and he was examined as a witness before us. He stated that in valuing the land he took no improvements into consideration, but kept the improvements out. The sum of £31 17s. 6d. thus ascertained, and the annual sum of £4 10s., paid for the pieces, made together £36 7s. 6d., which rent accordingly was paid from the 1st November, 1875.

We do not think it necessary to state the conflicting evidence as to the value, inasmuch as this case is conversant solely with questions of law.

Mr. Holmes, on the conclusion of this and some other cases of Mrs. Dunseath's, which were also reheard before us, submitted to us in writing certain requisitions in point of law, to which we refer. The case therein mentioned as No. 1 is the case of David Adams tenant, Jane Dunseath landlord, with which we are now dealing. As applied to the present case, his contentions were:—"1. That the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made previous to the expiration on the 1st of November, 1875, of the lease of 1846, inasmuch as such improvements were not made by the tenant or his predecessor in title; or, if the Court should refuse to act on this view, then—2. That the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made during the currency of the lease, except those made by the present tenant himself, inasmuch as his predecessors in occupancy were not his predecessors in title; 3. If the Court declined to accede to requisitions 1 and 2, then [a] that the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made prior to the making of the lease of 1846; and [b] that the landlord is entitled to some rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease, on the ground that (1) under the final clause of section 4 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, some deduction must be made in ascertaining the tenant's interest in such improvements from the value thereof: and upon the further ground (2), that by holding under lease he has been, if not altogether, to some extent 'compensated' for his improvements."

We declined to accede to the requisitions of Mr. Holmes, or to any of them; but on his application we agreed to state the present case for consideration and decision of her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland.

The questions submitted for such consideration and decision are—

1. Whether in fixing a fair rent for the holding, the landlord should be allowed rent in respect of all improvements made previous to the expiration of the lease of the 2nd of March, 1846?

2. Whether in fixing such fair rent the landlord should be allowed rent in respect of all improvements made during the currency of the lease, except those made by the present tenant himself?

3. Whether in fixing such fair rent the landlord should be allowed any rent in respect of all improvements made prior to the making of the lease of 2nd March, 1846?

4. Whether in fixing such fair rent the landlord should be allowed any rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease of 2nd March, 1846, on the ground that under the 1st clause of the 9th section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, some deductions must be made in ascertaining the tenant's interest in such improvements from the value thereof?

5. Whether in fixing such fair rent the landlord should be allowed some rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease, on the ground that the tenant by holding under lease has been (if not altogether) to some extent compensated for his improvements?

Law, C.—This is a case stated by the Land Commission in respect of certain questions of law arising in a proceeding before it for fixing the fair rent of a tenant's holding, under the 8th section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. The facts of the case as stated by the Land Commission are as follows:—The holding consists of about 42 acres of the lands of Kildowney, in the county of Antrim, originally part of the estate of Lord Mountcashel, but now by purchase and subsequent devolution become the property of a Mrs. Dunseath. In 1842, some 33 acres, statute measure, of the present farm were held by one James M'Kee, but how or at what rent does not appear. In that year, however, (1842), Lord Mountcashel had the lands revalued, and the rent fixed at £26 11s. 6d., which rent was thenceforward paid by the tenant. It is stated that a lease was verbally promised to M'Kee; and accordingly, on the 2nd March, 1846, a lease was executed to him of his farm, at the rent already arranged in 1842; similar leases being executed on the same day to nine other tenants on this same townland, all alike for the same term of thirty years from the 1st November, 1845. In the interim, however, between the revaluation or arrangement of the new rent in 1842 and the actual execution of the lease on the 2nd March, 1846, M'Kee re-built the dwelling-house; and this particular "improvement" raises one of the questions in the present case. M'Kee having got the lease in March, sold the farm to John Adams in the following October for £240, the assignment being dated the 27th October, 1846. John Adams, having thus bought the farm, proceeded to make further improvements thereon. He erected certain buildings, reclaimed waste land, made fences and drains, and also a farm road. He died about the year 1869, and the farm then vested in his son David Adams, the present tenant. Meanwhile, in the year 1851, the Mountcashel estate was sold by the Commissioners for the Sale of Incumbered Estates, and the townland of Kildowney being purchased by a Mr. Dunseath was conveyed to him by a deed dated the 30th April, 1851, subject, of course, to the existing leases and tenancies as specified in the schedule; turning to which we find a number of leases dated the 2nd March, 1846, and amongst them this particular lease, referred to as then vested in the representative of James M'Kee. Mr. Dunseath died in 1869, and the property so purchased by him thereupon vested in his widow, Mrs. Dunseath. David Adams, who about the same time succeeded his father in the leasehold, made further improvements on the farm. These improvements consisted of reclamation, and the making of new fences and drains. He also, from time to time before the expiration of the lease, took from Mrs. Dunseath, as yearly tenant, some pieces of bog adjoining, I suppose, his leasehold, the quantity being in all about nine statute acres, and the rents amounting in the aggregate to £4 10s. Some parts of this bog land also he is stated to have reclaimed. The lease expired on the 1st November, 1875; and thereupon Mrs. Dunseath had the lands comprised in it revalued, and a rent of £31 17s. 6d. assessed on it. This, added to the £4 10s., the rent of the bog, made the rent of the whole amount to £36 7s. 6d., which the tenant has hitherto paid accordingly, but now seeks to have reduced, as not being a fair rent under all the circumstances of the case.

The case was heard by three Assistant Commissioners, who, by their order of the 19th of November, 1881, determined that the fair rent of the holding was £30 15s. From this decision both tenant and landlord appealed to the Land Commission itself, who reheard the case on the 9th of January. On the occasion of this rehearing, Mr. Holmes, as counsel for the landlord, submitted certain requisitions to the Commission, calling on them to decide as matters of law:—"1. That the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made previous to the expiration on the 1st of November, 1875, of the lease of 1846, inasmuch as such improvements were not made by the tenant or his predecessor in title; or, if the Court should refuse to act on this view, then, 2. That the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made during the currency of the lease, except those made by the present tenant himself, inasmuch as his predecessors in occupancy were not his predecessors in title. 3. If the Court declined to accede to requisitions 1 and 2, then [a] that the landlord is entitled to rent in respect of all improvements made prior to the making of the lease of 1846; and [b] that the landlord is entitled to some rent in respect of improvements made during the currency of the lease, on the ground that (1) under the final clause of section 4 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, some deduction must be made in ascertaining the tenant's interest in such improvements from the value thereof; and upon the further ground (2), that by holding under lease he has been, if not altogether, to some extent 'compensated' for his improvements." The Commissioners declined to accede to these requisitions, or any of them; but on the application of Mr. Holmes, as counsel for the landlord, they agreed to state the facts of the case and submit his propositions for the consideration and decision of this Court. The questions, accordingly, with which the present case concludes are merely Mr. Holmes' requisitions in an interrogative form. Now, however well adapted the requisitions were for their original purpose, they are exceedingly difficult, if not practically impossible, to answer clearly when thus turned into questions. Some of them propose a single legal question as applied to different states of facts; and in short any precise answer to them would require so many qualifications and distinctions, that we have thought it better on the whole to extract for ourselves and answer the purely legal questions which arise in the case as stated, leaving the Land Commission to apply our answers to the facts as they have already been, or may hereafter be, found by them.

The questions of law, then, which appear to be presented by the case are these:—

I. What is the meaning of the word "improvements" in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Land Law Act, 1881?

II. Has the expression "his predecessors in title," as applied to the tenant in that sub-section, the same meaning as in the 7th section of the Act?

III. Are the provisions of the final paragraph of the 4th section of the Land Act of 1870 (as to a tenant claiming compensation for improvements made before the passing of that Act) applicable to such improvements in determining what is a "fair rent" under the 8th section of the Act of 1881?

IV. Where a tenant, holding by lease, makes improvements, is enjoyment thereof by him or his successors during the residue of the lease "compensation by the landlord," within the meaning of the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881?

V. Does the lease of the 2nd March, 1846 (Lord Mountcashel to James M'Kee), preclude the tenant from being regarded as having any interest in respect of the improvements made (that is, the house built) before the execution of that lease, in determining what is the fair rent of the holding, under the 8th section of the Act of 1881?

We think that distinct answers to these several questions will practically solve all the legal difficulties presented by the case. Before proceeding, however, to answer the questions, it is necessary to notice one important matter:—The case does not state that the holding of David Adams is subject to the Ulster Tenant-right custom; and therefore we must, for our purposes, assume that the tenant is not entitled to the benefit of that custom. This, indeed, is substantially implied, as well by the questions originally proposed to us, as by those which we have framed for ourselves; for the doctrine of Holl v. Harborton (6 Ir. L. T. Rep. 1, Ir. R. R. & L. App. 12), and that class of cases, has never caused any difficulty with respect to an Ulster Tenant-right holding. The tenant of such a holding has always had the right to sell it as it stood, with its improvements on it, and never thought of claiming compensation for them from the landlord under section 4 of the Act of 1870. On the other hand, any landlord insisting on rent in respect of improvements made not by himself, but by the tenants for the time being, whether holding under one continuous tenancy, or under distinct successive tenancies transmitted from one tenant to another, has always, I apprehend, been dealt with as infringing on the custom by thus demanding what was unreasonable and unfair. Our answers, therefore, to the questions in this case must not be taken as applicable to an Ulster Tenant-right holding, but only to one subject to the general law.

The questions I shall now endeavour to answer as clearly as I can:—As to the first—viz., the meaning of the word “improvements,” in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Land Law Act (Ireland), 1881, there is I apprehend, little room for controversy. The Act of 1881, provides (section 57) that any words or expressions not defined by that Act, but which are defined in the Land Act of 1870, shall have the same meaning as in the latter. Now the word “improvements” is not defined in the Act of 1881, but is in the Land Act of 1870. Accordingly, turning to the Act of 1870, we find it there declared (section 70) that “improvements” shall mean “(1), Any work which, being executed, adds to the letting value of the holding, on which it is executed, and is suitable to such holding;” also (2), “Tillage, manures, or other like farming works, the benefit of which is unexhausted at the time of the tenant quitting his holding.” In the Act of 1881, therefore, as well as in the Act of 1870, we must interpret the word “improvements” as meaning simply suitable and ameliorative works executed or done upon the holding. Being suitable and ameliorative, they of course increase its letting value; but the works are one thing and the increased letting value another. The works executed by the tenant are wholly his, and are to be completely protected and secured against confiscation whether by imposition of rent on them or otherwise. But so far as those works may have brought out latent powers and capacities of the land, and so increased its letting value, that increased value does not necessarily belong to the tenant. I say necessarily, because whilst there are many cases in which the increased yearly value would be no more than a fair return for the tenant's outlay in effecting the improvement, as in the case of permanent buildings, and in many kinds of reclamation, there may still be cases (as mentioned by Mr. Butt in his Treatise on the Act of 1870, at p. 128), in which the increase of yearly value is so greatly in excess of the most liberal allowance to the tenant in respect of his improvement-works that the landlord, in the ascertainment of a fair rent, is justly entitled to have some share of that increased yearly value. In my opinion, therefore, the negative provision contained in sub-section 9 of the fair rent clause (section 9) of the Act of 1881, that “No rent shall be allowed or made payable in respect of tenants' improvements,” secures against the imposition of any rent only the improvement-works, that is, their yearly value, leaving any increased yearly value beyond that to be dealt with under the earlier part of section 8, as may under all the circumstances of the case be considered just and fair between the parties. For it should be observed that though the absolute prohibition of charging rent contained in this 9th sub-section is thus limited, it by no means follows that the rent is to be charged on all outside the scope of the prohibition. That is a matter for the Commissioners in the exercise of their discretion, and having regard to what may appear to them to be just and right.

As to the second question, that is to say, What is the meaning of the expression “tenant, or his predecessor in title” as used in the 9th sub-section, I concur with Mr. Justice O'Hagan in holding that its meaning is the same there as in the preceding section 7. That section plainly was inserted to remedy the mischief and injustice often caused by the strict interpretation of those words, which require not merely that one tenant should derive title from another, but that the title or tenancy itself should remain identically the same throughout; the necessary consequence being that on any change whatever of the tenancy, the tenant's property in his improvements, whether made by himself or by those from whom he derived his original interest, was, in effect, transferred to the landlord, without any consideration being given for it, and in fact without any such result being contemplated or desired by either party. The 7th section of the Act of 1881 removes this technical objection to a tenant's claim to compensation for improvements made before the supposed change in the tenancy, leaving it to the Court, in adjudicating on the claim, to take into consideration all the circumstances under which the change of tenancy or tenants took place, and admit, reduce, or disallow the claim, as it may deem just. This is the substantial effect of the clause. But for our present purpose it is even more important to observe the language by which this is done. [His Lordship here read the 1st paragraph of section 7]. It will thus be seen that the preceding tenants who are supposed to have made improvements under determined and extinct tenancies are called by the statute “the predecessors in title” of the actual tenant, holding by a new tenancy since created. The expression, therefore, being used to describe these preceding tenants who held not by the now existing title, but by other titles since determined, and replaced by the new title of the actual tenant, it is manifest that in this section the old, strict, technical interpretation, requiring the “predecessor in title” to be predecessor in the same title, must be rejected, and the expression be taken to be here used by the legislature in a less technical and wider sense, as simply denoting a series of tenants who have transmitted from one to the other their respective tenancies or titles to the possession of a holding, whatever those tenancies or titles may be, or whatever changes they may have undergone. So that the legislature not only remedies the evil caused by the former technical and strict construction of the expression in the 4th and 6th sections of the Act of 1870, but itself gives an illustration of how it means the expression to be interpreted, at all events in this Act of 1881, by using the words predecessors in title to describe a line of tenants preceding each other in the same farm, though by different titles or tenancies. Such then being the plainly declared meaning of the expression “predecessors in title” in this 7th section, it follows, I think, according to the well-settled rules of interpretation, that we ought to regard it as having the same meaning in the few other places where it occurs in this statute. “It is a sound rule of construction,” to borrow the language of one of the Judges of the English Court of Exchequer in Courtauld v. Leys (L. R. 4 Ex. 130), “to give the same meaning to the same words occurring in different parts of an Act of Parliament or other document.” “I do not consider,” says Turner, L.J., in Re National Savings Banks Association (1 Ch. App. 549) “that it would be at all consistent with the law, or with the course of the Court, to put a different construction upon the same word in different parts of an Act of Parliament, without finding some very clear reason for doing so.” “We disclaim altogether,” says Lord Denman (Reg. v. Poor Law Commissioners, 6 Ad. & E. 68), “the assumption of any right to assign different meanings to the same words in an Act of Parliament, on the ground of a supposed general intention in the Act. We find it necessary to give a fair and reasonable construction to the language used by the legislature; but we are not to assume the unwarrantable liberty of varying that construction for the purpose of making the Act consistent with any views of our own.”

Now, it is to be observed that throughout this long statute, consisting of 62 sections, the expression “predecessors in title” occurs in only six places, and that in all but one of these it is used in connexion with the ownership of “improvements” on a holding, and nothing else. It occurs twice in the 1st section, which gives the general right of sale—viz., in the 6th and 8th sub-sections. It is used, as we have seen, in the 7th section, and it is used again in the 8th (or fair rent) section, viz., in sub-sections 4, 9, and 10, and in all alike, as I have said, except the last, in a similar connexion. Why then is it not to be understood in the same untechnical and popular sense throughout? and especially why are we to interpret it in the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause differently from what we necessarily do in the preceding section, both of which are plainly intended to secure the tenant's interest in his improvements? It appears to me that not only would this be to act in disregard of the settled rules of construction to which I have referred, but also contrary to the plain object of this enactment, and the simple justice of the case. The tenant's right to improvements, whether made by himself, or purchased or otherwise acquired by him, being admittedly preserved and secured by the 7th section, notwithstanding any such change of tenancy or tenants as there described, it seems but a mere corollary to provide that this right shall not be eaten away by any imposition of rent on those improvements. Besides, for the purposes of this sub-section, what distinction can be fairly made between the case of improvements transmitted through a series of "predecessors in the same title," and those transmitted through "predecessors in different titles," but secured to the present tenant by section 7? But there are, as it appears to me, other and strong reasons for reading the words in their untechnical and popular sense. In whatever way we interpret them as applied to the tenant, we must, I apprehend, interpret them in a similar way as applied to the landlord. If the words in the tenant's case include only those who preceded him in his present estate or tenancy, how can a deceased landlord tenant for life be, with any propriety or consistency, regarded as the predecessor in title of the remainderman? Or take the case of a property settled, as is very generally the case, subject to a mortgage. The tenant for life of the equity of redemption being in possession, pays the occupying tenant for his improvements, and dies. The mortgagee then forecloses the equity of redemption and sells through the Court, or sells under his power of sale. Is the purchaser entitled to treat the equitable tenant for life, who paid for the improvements, but whose estate is since determined, as his predecessor in title? How can he be so, if we insist on the old technical interpretation of the same words as applied to the tenant in the previous line of the same sub-section? Again, let us turn to one of the earlier places in which we find this expression. Sub-section 8 of the first clause makes provision for cases in which permanent improvements have been made by the landlord or his predecessors in title (solely or by him or them) jointly with the tenant or his predecessors in title. Now, suppose a landlord tenant for life of a settled estate, and his tenant lessee for years, join in executing some permanent improvement on the holding. The landlord tenant for life dies. The tenant's lease expires; but the landlord's successor, seeing the tenant an industrious and thriving man, lets him remain on in his holding as before, or perhaps gives him an additional piece of land, throwing all into one tenancy, at, of course, an increased rent. The tenant then dies, leaving everything on the farm to his son, who proceeds to sell. Assuming the sub-section to be brought into operation, and all interests in the improvements to be sold, is the landlord remainderman to be held entitled to their entire proceeds, on the ground that the deceased tenant for life, who joined the then occupying tenant in making the improvements, was his, the remainderman's predecessor, but that the occupying tenant who joined that tenant for life in making them was not the predecessor of his son to whom he left the farm? Surely, we cannot rightly construe an Act of Parliament in this fashion. All these difficulties, however—and more might be suggested—will be at once avoided if we take the expression "predecessor in title" as applied to both tenant and landlord alike, to be used in an untechnical and popular sense, as not necessarily involving the idea of one single estate continuing unbroken and undetermined, throughout the whole line of succession, but as denoting in one case the substantial devolution of title to the reversion, and in the other the substantial devolution of title to the possession from predecessor to successor. These, however, I refer to only as subsidiary or confirmatory arguments. I base my decision mainly on the implied declaration of the legislature in the 7th section of this statute, that it uses the expression not in the sense in which it was interpreted in Holt v. Herberton, and other cases, but in the untechnical and wider sense I have indicated; and having thus once ascertained the meaning of the expression from the Act itself, I read it in the same sense throughout: in the 1st and 8th sections, as well as in the 7th—doing so all the more readily because I thus have the satisfaction of knowing that such construction renders the Act consistent with itself and with justice, and that at all events I am not interpreting the same words, when repeated in the same clause, as meaning one thing for the landlord, and another for the tenant.

As to the 3rd question—viz., whether the provisions of the final paragraph of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, as to a tenant claiming compensation for improvements made before the Act, are now applicable in determining what is a "fair rent" under the 8th section of the Act of 1881, I am of opinion that they are not so applicable, and that on two grounds. In the first place, it appears to me that to treat these provisions as applicable to this process of fixing a fair rent, and allow to the landlord any rent in respect of improvements made by the tenant before the 1st of August, 1870, is directly and explicitly prohibited by the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause. It is said that, in having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively, as directed by the 1st sub-section of the clause, the landlord should be credited with the abatement from the actual present value of these improvements; to which the tenant would have to submit, if he were proceeding against the landlord under the 4th section of the Act of 1870. But this is not a proceeding under that enactment; and moreover, this general direction that the Court, in fixing fair rent, shall have "regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively, and consider all the circumstances of the case," is, it seems to me, designedly controlled and explained by the specific provision of the 9th sub-section, which enacts that no rent shall be allowed or made payable in respect of any improvements whatever belonging to the tenant. If it had been intended that some rent might be allowed in respect of improvements made before the passing of the Act of 1870, there would certainly have been an exception or qualification to that effect introduced into this sweeping prohibition. Expressed, however, as it is, I find it impossible to give it any construction which would allow of rent being charged in respect of these any more than other improvements. But there is another reason, also, which weighs with me. I have already observed, when referring to the case of an Ulster Tenant-right holding, that the Ulster tenant with his custom had nothing to do with the 4th section of the Act of 1870, or any of its qualifications. His right was to sell his holding, improvements and all, and that for his own absolute use. It was never, as far as I know, contended with respect to such a holding, that the landlord could fairly ask for increased rent in respect of improvements made before 1870, and subsequently enjoyed, on the ground that if the tenant had been claiming compensation from him under section 4 of the Act of 1870 (which he never did), the landlord could have insisted on having some abatement from the real value of those improvements, because of the tenant's enjoyment of them. Now, it appears to me that by the 1st clause of the Act of 1881, all tenants throughout Ireland are in this respect placed in practically the same position as the Ulster tenant. By that clause it is enacted that "the tenant for the time being of every holding may sell his tenancy for the best price that can be got for the same;" that is, may sell his tenancy as it stands, improvements included, insisting on the landlord accepting the purchaser as tenant, if not open to any reasonable objection, and put the purchase-money into his pocket. The landlord, indeed, has a right of pre-emption, just as in Ulster; but he has no right to get the tenancy for less than its real value. If he cannot agree with the tenant as to the price, he must pay "such sum as may be ascertained by the Court to be the true value thereof." That is to say, if the landlord wants the holding, he must pay for it what it would bona fide bring in the open market, if sold to an unobjectionable purchaser. He has no right to get it for less than this, for if so he would get it for less than its value, and the enactment is that he shall pay the "true value thereof." It cannot, I think, be maintained that, in ascertaining the price which in such cases the landlord is to pay, he is to be credited in reduction of the "true value" of the tenancy with an abatement in respect of the enjoyment of improvements made before 1870, such as he would be entitled to if the tenant were claiming compensation from him under section 4 of the Act of 1870. Besides that this would be forcing the tenant to take less than the "true value" of his tenancy, which the Act of 1881 says he is to have, it would also, I think, be inconsistent with the 11th sub-section, which broadly distinguishes between these two rights—viz., the right of sale and the right to claim compensation for improvements; and, as it seems to me, forbids their being thus confounded or mixed up together. [His Lordship read sub-section 11.] It would be rather hard, I venture to think, upon the tenant thus selling his tenancy, forcibly to debit him in favour of the landlord-purchaser with an abatement from its "true value," as if he were merely claiming for his improvements under the Act of 1870, when this same free-sale section declares that on such occasion he shall not be entitled to make any claim for compensation at all; the plain reason being that, by exercising his right of sale he is getting paid for his improvements, as included in the price of the tenancy. For just as by the Act of 1870 the Ulster tenant, claiming the benefit of his custom under section 1, and thereby getting payment for his improvements, as included in the value of his tenancy, is expressly debarred from claiming compensation under section 4 of the Act, so now by the 1st clause of the Act of 1881, a tenant availing himself of the new right of sale thus conferred upon him is for the same reason precluded from making a separate claim to be paid compensation for his improvements. It will be observed, too, that this view does not in the least interfere with the right of the landlord to have a "fair rent" fixed for the holding. Whether in Ulster or elsewhere, the sale of the tenancy is subject to this right, which the purchaser of course takes into account. But when the question of what is a fair rent comes to be determined, and the present intrinsic value of the tenant's "improvement-works" is ascertained, it appears to me that, in estimating the tenant's interest in his holding, he should be credited with the entire of the present value of his "improvement-works" so ascertained, whether those works were executed before or since the 1st of August, 1870; because this is no more than what he would get by selling the tenancy as he may wish those "improvement-works" upon it; and that the landlord is not entitled to have any part of this actual present value of those works struck off or credited to him as against the tenant's enjoyment of them, as might have been the case if the tenant had had no right of sale, and no power of thereby getting the full market value of those "improvement-works," but had been limited to a mere claim of compensation from the landlord under the 4th section of the Act of 1870, with all its exceptions and qualifications. For the right thus conferred by the Act of 1881 enables the tenant, I apprehend, to realise the full present value of his improvements, even though they be of a class for which, if he were quitting, he could not claim compensation from the landlord under section

ADAMS v. DUNGEATH.

4 of the Act of 1870. At all events it must, I think, be admitted that when the tenant sells he will get back the then fair market value of the improvements, wholly irrespective of whether they were made before or after the 1st of August, 1870, and without any reference to his enjoyment of them, save so far as this may possibly be represented by their deterioration, which is, of course, taken into account in arriving at their existing value. It seems, therefore, to me to be a fallacy to disregard and ignore this new right conferred on the tenant by the Act of 1881, and to estimate his interest in his holding as if it had no existence. Just as the Ulster tenant never resorted to a claim for compensation under the 4th section of the Act of 1870 (or the 3rd), unless he had lost his right to sell the tenancy in the open market, so now, I apprehend, no tenant in Ireland will, except under some peculiar circumstances, make any claim upon his landlord to be paid for his improvements under the Act of 1870, but will sell his tenancy improved as it stands, and thus get, as included in the price, whatever is the fair present value of his improvements. Accordingly, it seems to me that, even putting out of consideration the 9th sub-section of clause 8, with its express prohibition of charging any rent whatever for improvements, we ought, in estimating the "interest of the tenant" under the general words of the beginning of the 8th (or fair rent) clause, to take into account not merely his old right to claim compensation from his landlord under the 4th section of the Act of 1870, but also his much larger right—viz., the right to sell his tenancy as it stands, improvements and all, as the statute says, "for the best price that can be got for the same." In other words, I think the tenant's interest is to be measured by the maximum and not by the minimum of his rights. For these reasons I think no rent should be allowed or made payable in respect of improvements, whether made before the 1st of August, 1870, or after that date.

As to the 4th question—viz., when a tenant holding by lease makes improvements and enjoys them till the end of his lease, can such enjoyment be deemed "compensation by the landlord" within the meaning of the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881?—this question, I think, almost answers itself. What in such a case has the tenant got from the landlord for his improvements? Simply nothing. The lessee purchased from the landlord for a certain term the possession and use of the land with all its capacities of improvement. For this he pays the stipulated price—viz., the yearly rent. Whether he executes improvements or not, he has a right to hold the land for the term; and so long as he pays the instalments of his purchase-money, known in this case as rent, the landlord cannot interfere with him. The right to hold for the term was thus purchased before the improvements are supposed to have been made; and how the enjoyment of that right for which the tenant pays the stipulated price, and to which he is alike entitled whether he makes improvements or not, can be regarded as not only compensation for these improvements, but also compensation for them by the landlord, is, I confess, beyond my comprehension. This question, therefore, as between lessor and lessee, with which alone we are here concerned, must, I think, be answered in the negative.

Lastly, I come to the 5th question, as to the effect of the lease of the 2nd March, 1846, of itself to preclude the tenant from being regarded as having any interest in the house built before its execution. In my opinion there is nothing in this instrument to bar the tenant's claim in that respect. It is, no doubt, a demise of all the farm or parcel of land, "together with all houses, edifices, and buildings, and appurtenances thereunto belonging;" but so, in effect, is every demise, whether by instrument under seal or by mere word of mouth. That it was a new letting is, of course, admitted; but whether it made mention of "houses" or demised the land simply, which would carry the houses and everything else upon it, seems to me wholly unimportant; the maxim being that expressio eorum que tacite insunt nihil operatur. Unless the buildings were to be excepted out of the demise and taken from the tenant, they must be demised to him, and whether they be so demised nominatim, or as included in the word land, is not, in my opinion, of the least importance. The same objection would lie to every case in which an improving tenant has bought an adjoining holding with the consent of his landlord, and united both farms into one holding at a single rent. This, as it seems to me, is simply the technical objection which was meant to be met, and as I think has been effectually met, by the 7th section of the Act of 1881. The mere surrender of a prior tenancy from year to year, and acceptance of the new tenancy, without anything more, is not, the statute says, to prejudice the tenant's right in respect of improvements made under the surrendered tenancy. Whether the transaction ought to be differently viewed depends now on its substance, not, as before, upon its mere form; and in this case, if the Court, after due investigation and full consideration of all the circumstances under which this particular change of tenancy took place, came to the conclusion that the lease was in fact given in consideration of and as compensation for the building of the new dwelling-house, then of course the present tenant should not be regarded as having any claim in respect of it, or as entitled to object to rent being allowed for it. This, however, is a matter of fact for the Commission to deal with, and not one of law, on which we can pronounce any definite opinion beyond this—that there is nothing in the lease, as I conceive, to exclude the application of section 7 to the house built before its execution. It may be suggested that the land being here demised “with all houses, &c., thereunto belonging,” the demise in that form amounts to an express exclusion of the right to compensation in respect of such houses, within the 2nd proviso subjoined to section 4 of the Land Act, 1870, which bars the tenant's right to compensation for any improvement “his right to which compensation is expressly excluded by such lease or contract.” But this view cannot, I think, be maintained. From the year 1845, when the Devon Commission recommended that a measure should be passed giving tenants a right to claim compensation for their improvements, it was plain that this reform was certain to be sooner or later adopted. Lord Derby proposed it in 1847; Sir Joseph Napier proposed it in 1852; and almost every Session of Parliament up to 1870 saw similar enactments attempted. Under these circumstances it became by no means unusual for landlords to insert in their leases covenants expressly providing that no such claim should under any circumstances be admissible (an example of which, if desired, may be seen in the reported case of Stevenson v. Leitrim, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 84, Ir. R. R. & L. App. 121); and it was to meet cases of this kind, in which leases or written contracts of tenancy had been previously made, containing clauses expressly excluding any claim to compensation for improvements, that the proviso in question was inserted in the 4th section of the Act of 1870. Besides this the mere demise of the farm with all houses, &c., on it cannot, I apprehend, be fairly construed as an express exclusion of the right to compensation for those houses; especially when we remember that even an express covenant to give up the holding at the end of the term, with all houses, buildings, &c., thereon, does not amount to an express exclusion of the right to compensation within the meaning of this exception. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the lease of 1846 of itself does not preclude the tenant's claim to compensation in respect of the house built before its execution, and therefore that the landlord is not necessarily entitled to rent in respect of it. Whether he is so or not depends, I think, on what the Land Commission may find to have been the substance of the transaction of the 2nd March, 1846, and the change of tenancy which then took place.

MAY, C.J.—As to the meaning of the word “improvements,” used in the 9th sub-section to the 8th section of the Act of 1881, I think it clear that the definition in the Act of 1870 must be followed, and that the word must be taken to mean an actual work executed at a definite period of time, not any increased value subsequently accruing to the lands in consequence of the execution of such work. The term being impressed with this definite meaning, it seems to me that the operation of this 9th sub-section will be confined within somewhat narrow limits. The sub-section enacts that no rent shall be allowed or payable in respect of any improvement executed by the tenant or his predecessors in title. In the case of the erection of a house, or any structure having an existence separate from the lands, this language is of easy application, and seems simply to mean that the holding shall be valued irrespective of such structures. But in the case of drains and other works of reclamation, or improvement of that nature, it would seem that the language of the sub-section is not appropriate. It seems that rent could hardly be claimed in respect of a drain, or in respect of an embankment made for the purpose of reclamation, or any similar work. The improvement-work in such cases possesses in itself little or no annual value, and the increased value which it may confer on the adjoining land is not an improvement in its statutory sense. Nor does it appear to me that the expenditure of money or labour in the construction of such a work can be regarded as an “improvement.” Such expenditure or labour could not be registered under the 6th section of the Act of 1870. It appears to me that improvements of this class do not fall within the operation of this 9th sub-section; but this result would not be prejudicial to the tenant. Such expenditure would, I think, constitute one of the circumstances of the case to be considered by the Commissioners in fixing a fair rent. But in what manner such a circumstance should be had regard to, or by what process the rights or interests of the landlord and tenant respectively in the holding should be ascertained, is not, I think, a matter of law on which this Court is called upon to express any opinion, but rather a matter of valuation to be considered elsewhere.

As to the meaning of the term “predecessor in title,” I consider this Court and every member of it is bound by the decision of the Court in Holt v. Herberton. But independently of the conclusive authority of that case, it seems to me plain that in the Act of 1881 this term does not mean an antecedent occupier, but a previous tenant from whom the existing tenant derived his title to his tenancy. Any other construction might operate to the prejudice of the existing tenant. Thus, under the 3rd and 4th sections of the Act of 1870 it is provided that from moneys payable to a tenant for disturbance, or by way of compensation for improvements, there shall be deducted all sums due to the landlord from the tenant or his predecessors in title for arrears of rent, or for damages for deterioration of the holding; and these enactments cannot apply to all previous occupiers, some of whose interests may have been determined by notice to quit, or by eviction for non-payment of rent, but must be limited to persons from whom the tenant derived his title and interest; otherwise, the compensation payable to the tenant might be absorbed in liquidating the obligations of prior insolvent occupiers. But, it has been contended that the 7th section of the Act of 1881 has had the effect of enlarging the meaning of the term when used in that Act, and therefore, also, I presume in the Act of 1870, as the Acts are to be read as one Act. This 7th section of the Act of 1881 is the last clause in the first part of the Act, and is headed “Amendment of law as to compensation for improvements;” and it provides that a tenant, on quitting the holding of which he is tenant, shall not be deprived of his right to receive compensation under the Act of 1870 by reason only of the determination, by surrender or otherwise, of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, and the acceptance by him or them of a new tenancy. The clause seems to me to be intended to apply to cases where a tenancy has been transmitted not by assignment in the proper sense of the word, but by a surrender of the outgoing tenant, and acceptance by the incoming tenant of the same tenancy—a view which would seem to derive support from the next succeeding passage in reference to tracing title. Supposing lands to be evicted for non-payment of rent, or for forfeiture incurred by violation of covenants or otherwise, and the landlord to resume possession and make a new letting to another tenant, it does not seem to me that such tenant could claim compensation for improvements made by the evicted tenant as his predecessor in title; so that the clause would not apply, in my opinion, in every case of the determination of a tenancy of one tenant, and the acceptance of a new tenancy by another person. In my opinion, the operation of the 7th section is limited, by the express language used, to the case of a tenant who is quitting his holding and is claiming compensation for improvements, and does not apply to the case of a tenant who is not disturbed, who has no intention of quitting his holding, but on the contrary is taking steps to perpetuate his tenancy, and to have his rent ascertained. It has been contended that the operation of the 7th section should be extended by construction so as to operate on the second part of the Act and change the legal meaning of the term "predecessor in title," used in that second part, and particularly in the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause. Now, what is the effect of the 9th section? The doctrine of common law was well established that, subject to some exceptions, a tenant's structural improvements by which foreign matter was fixed to the freehold, subject to the interest of the tenant under his tenancy, vested in the landlord. And of course, such is still the law in this country as to all lands other than those falling within the operation of these Land Acts. As to town-parks, demesne, and pasture lands, residential villas, and buildings in towns the ancient law is unchanged. The 9th sub-section is simply intended to transfer the beneficial interest in the improvements coming within its operation from the landlord to the tenant and his successors; the landlord's interest being converted, virtually for ever, into a dry unprofitable reversion. I conceive that the old principle applies here, that where a modern statute innovates and encroaches on the common law, such a construction of the enactment should be adopted as would confine this innovation within limits as narrow as are consistent with the giving effect to the modern Act. The Act of 1881 does not affect to give any new definition of the term "predecessor in title." The 9th section does not do so, whether expressly or by implication. That section merely provides, as I read it, that where a title to a tenancy is traced from a tenant through his predecessors in title—that is, predecessors in the proper and legal sense of the term—and a gap or solution of continuity of a particular kind is found to have taken place, the present tenant, claiming compensation for improvements on quitting his holding, shall not be prejudiced by such interruption in the regular chain of the title. I do not think that the proper meaning of this term is thereby altered. But even if it should be deemed to be so altered, for the limited purpose of that section, I should not extend this alteration to a different and separate part of the Act, or extend its meaning. I shall give the legal and logical meaning to the terms of this Act of Parliament, which, so far at least as the landlords are concerned, seems to me not of a remedial nature. In my opinion, therefore, this term "predecessor in title" continues to bear the meaning which the case Holt v. Harborton ascribed to it.

With respect to the operation of the final clause in the 4th section of the Act of 1870, it would seem that such deductions and allowances as are there spoken of should be considered in fixing a fair rent, so far as they can be regarded as elements of compensation by the landlord within the meaning of the 9th sub-section. Questions of this nature involve matters of fact rather than matters of law, and can be satisfactorily determined only when the proper elements are submitted to the constituted tribunal; nor am I able to form a satisfactory opinion on this point in the abstract. It seems to me clear that improvements made during a lease cannot be deemed to be compensated by the landlord merely because they have been enjoyed during the lease. During his term the tenant is entitled to make the utmost profit out of the lands demised, including all their capabilities, consistently with the observance of his obligations as tenant; and he enjoys the benefit of his improvements not by the favour of his landlord, but in his own right as limited owner.

This case as to the house cannot, I think, be distinguished from Holt v. Harborton, which, as I have already said, is still an authority binding on this Court, notwithstanding the 7th section of the Act of 1881. But supposing that Holt v. Harborton does not apply, the case, on the question of compensation, is open to a different consideration. It is not to be supposed that the tenant expended money upon this holding—the house was built about two years before the granting of the lease in 1846—while merely a tenant from year to year, unless upon the understanding that if he built such a house he should get a lease for a considerable term of years. The landlord gave this lease for thirty years to the tenant, at a rent ascertained irrespectively of the house, and before it was contemplated. The inference, to my mind, is that the tenant built the house, reckoning that his enjoyment during this term would compensate him for the expenditure; and in any view of the case it seems to me that the lease then granted ought to be regarded as compensation wholly or partially for the house built before its commencement. In 1842 the then landlord, Lord Mountcashel, caused the premises to be revalued, and they were valued at £26 11s. 6d.; and in 1846 the lease was granted at a rent equal to that valuation. But at the termination of the lease of 1846 the subject-matter of the tenancy was changed by other premises being added, the holdings then combined being let at a single rent; so that the case seems to me to be much stronger than Holt v. Harborton.

The tenant also occupied from 1875 till 1881 as tenant from year to year, and at a rent calculated irrespectively of all improvements. This enjoyment also, as it seems, should have been considered on the question of compensation by the landlord. I do not consider that it should have been expressly shown that such occupation was permitted "with direct regard to the antecedent improvements, and for the purpose of compensation," to use the language of Mr. Commissioner Litton. During these years the landlord apparently permitted the tenant to enjoy these improvements free from all rent; and in my view this was a benefit to the tenant, for which allowance would have been made under the final clause of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, and which should have been regarded pro tanto as compensation under the 9th sub-section in question. The words of the final clause of the 4th section of the Act of 1870 are—"The Court . . . shall . . . take into consideration the time during which the tenant may have enjoyed the advantage of such improvements, also the rent at which such holding has been held, and any benefits which such tenant may have received from his landlord in consideration, expressly or impliedly, of the improvements so made." Furthermore, Judge O'Hagan's view of the Commissioners' function upon an appeal from the decision of the Sub-Commissioners does not meet with my concurrence. This is not an appeal to a Superior Court to be heard upon the same evidence as was before the Court below; it is a re-hearing upon which the whole case is open and fresh evidence may be adduced; and it seems to me the duty of the tribunal of appeal is to form its own independent judgment upon the evidence brought before it. The Commissioners most properly reversed the order by which the Sub-Commissioners ordered the owner to pay the tenant his costs. On what ground they made such an order is not explained; till explained, it must be regarded by all persons who have any acquaintance with judicial proceedings with surprise.

SIR E. SULLIVAN, M.R.—The Lord Chancellor has clearly stated the five questions of law which arise on the case stated for decision. They are all of more or less importance, as they involve matters of general application in the administration of the law under the two Land Acts of 1870 and 1881. The solution of those questions depends altogether on the correct interpretation of the language of those two statutes taken together and construed as one code. The principles of judicial interpretation of statutes are conceded at the Bar, and we are all, I believe, entirely agreed as to those principles. The statutes must be construed according to the fair and reasonable meaning of the language used in them, and everything that such language conveys or enforces must be adopted and carried out totally independently of the policy or impolicy of the results.

As to the first question, my opinion is that the word "improvements" as used in the 9th sub-clause of the 8th section of the Act of 1881, must receive the same, or rather the identical, meaning it has in the Act of 1870; and in the various other parts of that Act and the Act of 1881 where the word occurs, it does not, and cannot, mean the increased letting value of the holding caused by the making of the improvements, but simply the works which have caused that increase, or rather the interest of the tenant who made them, measured by the money expended on them, as declared and limited by the two said Acts. We are not left to speculate on this matter; for the very word is the subject of express definition in the Act of 1870, the 70th section thereof defining improvements as follows:—"Any work which being executed adds to the letting value of the holding on which it is executed, and is suitable to such holding;" and the 57th section of the Act of 1881 directs that Act and the Act of 1870 to be construed together as one Act—which in itself would, I think, be sufficient to show the true meaning of the word improvement in the 9th sub-section of the 8th section of the Act of 1881; but there is an unambiguous enactment in the Act of 1881 that any words or expressions therein which are not thereby defined, and are defined in the Act of 1870, shall, unless there be something in the context repugnant thereto, have the same meaning as in the Act of 1870, except so far as the same is expressly altered or varied, or is inconsistent therewith. The conclusion on this very important matter which seems to have been adopted by two of the learned Commissioners, Mr. Justice O'Hagan and Mr. Commissioner Litton, is, in my mind, erroneous. An interpretation of the 9th sub-section in question which would make the term improvements therein mean the whole increase of letting value, involves consequences so large and startling that one testing the construction of the statutes is at once disposed to think some error must exist; for as a tenant on quitting his holding would only be entitled at the utmost to the value of the expenditure on the work that caused the increase of letting value, he, remaining in his holding and claiming to have a fair rent determined, would, on such an interpretation, be entitled to have awarded to him as his own property, as against the landlord, the whole increase of letting value caused by his expenditure. For instance, a tenant paying a rent of £100 a year for his holding during his tenancy may spend £500 in executing works in the nature of permanent improvements, causing an increase of the letting value of his holding of £100 a year at the time he quits. The utmost he could get on quitting his holding, under the Act of 1870, even as amended by the Act of 1881, would be £500, and that sum may be capable of being reduced to a lower point; while though not quitting, and a still abiding tenant, with all the advantages of the judicial term and rent, the Commissioners would have to allow to him the whole £100 a year which has been produced by the joint aid of his money and the soil he has had in tenancy from his landlord. This, I think, cannot be. The two Acts seem to me entirely opposed to such a conclusion. I can find nothing in the statute of 1881 to show that such a change in the position of the tenant and landlord was ever contemplated; on the contrary, the sub-section itself stands strongly opposed to such a construction. By its very language, the test as to whether no rent is to be allowed in respect of improvements is whether they have or have not been paid for or otherwise compensated by the landlord. What is the landlord to pay for or otherwise compensate? Surely, not the whole increased yearly letting value added by the making of the improvements, but at the utmost the amount of money expended by the tenant in making the same. Following this up, the matter will appear still plainer. Supposing the tenant actually awarded compensation under the Act of 1870, the amount not being paid, of course he would under that Act be entitled to hold on or continue as tenant; supposing the landlord not being able to pay the compensation, the tenant comes under the Act of 1881 to have a fair rent fixed. His expenditure was say £500, causing an increased letting value of £100 a year; the awarded compensation for improvements say was £400. What would be his position under the 9th sub-section? Is the fact that his right to compensation for improvements has already been fixed at £400 to be completely thrown aside; or does it constitute the true element for the guidance of the Commissioners? I think it plain that this is so. The 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881, giving force to every word of it, can stand well together with the 8th section in all its parts. The mandatory duty cast thereby on the Commissioners is really one to be observed in administering the first part of the 8th section itself; and the meaning of it is this, that though the Commissioners are to consider the interests of landlord and tenant respectively, there is one thing they must do—viz., not fix any rent that is an annual sum in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, not paid or otherwise compensated for by the landlord. These improvements are the very improvements he would be compensated for if he was leaving his holding, and no others—a view which, independently of the right interpretation of the two statutes as a whole, is made further manifest by the introduction of the 4th sub-section therein, enabling the Commissioners to disallow the application when the improvements had been maintained by the landlord or his predecessors in title. In the illustration I have put, the duty of the Commissioners in determining a fair rent would be not to allow to the tenant the whole increased letting value of £100 a year, but to assess what would be a fair percentage or yearly allowance for his expenditure, checked and qualified by the consideration of what he would get on leaving his holding; and supposing they thought £400 would be the sum payable, and that a percentage of £10 or £12 per annum was to be allowed upon it, they should leave the £40 or £48 for the tenant free from any rent in respect thereof, while the remaining £90 or £52 should be dealt with by the Commissioners under the early part of the 8th section of the Act of 1881, with due regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively. These figures are only used by me to illustrate my meaning. All this would be for the Commissioners, acting under the principles I have indicated, and by which, I think, they are bound.

As to the second question, I agree with the opinion of the Lord Chancellor that "tenant or his predecessors in title" are to be construed as the same terms would be construed under the 7th section of the Act of 1881, amending the Act of 1870. I can satisfactorily to my mind, in the language of the two statutes throughout, discover amongst others one paramount object—namely, the preservation of the tenant's right to the value of his improvements; and I think that a tenant on quitting his holding was to be enabled to get compensation in respect of all existing improvements made on the holding by himself or any former occupant thereof, notwithstanding any change of tenancy of the holding, no matter how caused, provided there was nothing else to bar the right to such compensation. In the Act of 1870 the term predecessor in title occurs in two important sections before section 11, the one in section 4 giving the claim for compensation for improvements, the other in section 6 giving the power of registration of improvements. It is plain that the term predecessors in title, as used in the Act of 1870, was deemed unsatisfactory without some explanation of it, inasmuch as in its strict interpretation the term would import only the same tenancy in devolution, and did not cover breaks in that devolution which involved the creation of a new tenancy, making the term predecessors in title inapplicable to the former holder of the premises held under a new tenancy. To remedy, to some extent, this matter, the 11th section of the Act of 1870 was plainly passed, which undoubtedly carried the meaning of the ambiguous term a short way, as the decision in Holt v. Harborton, showed. This defective definition was largely extended by the 7th section of the Act of 1881; and by its terms it shows to me that it was meant to meet or counteract the ruling of the Court in that case of Holt v. Harborton; and there is thus, by the express language of the statute, a plain indication of intention that each successive occupant of a holding should be entitled to compensation for the improvements thereon made by the tenant for the time being, and that he should not be barred of such compensation by reason only of breaks or interruptions in the tenancy; in other words, that a new tenant of the holding which he got from a former occupant should have the right to compensation untouched, unless in the creation of the new tenancy this right to compensation was bargained for or lost by some arrangement. Now, previously to the 11th section of the Act of 1881, the term tenant or his predecessors in title occurs in three important places, twice in the 6th sub-section of section 1, and once in the 8th sub-section of same section. Before we come to the 9th sub-section of section 8, the terms tenant or predecessors in title occur twice in the 4th sub-section of the same clause, and they occur in a remarkable juncture in the 10th sub-section. They are, for the most part, outside the 9th sub-section of section 8, used in reference to compensation; and this right of compensation is so clearly mixed up with the fixing of a fair rent that I am, by what I conceive to be the plain intendment of the statute as shown by its language, compelled to hold that on its true construction the right to get compensation for improvement is really the basis of the 9th sub-section of the 8th clause in the Act of 1881, and that therefore the term tenant or his predecessors in title must have the same meaning therein as is indicated by the provisions contained in section 7 of the same Act. It further appears to me that predecessors in title, as applied to the landlord, is so loosely used in that sub-section and in the previous parts of the statute where the same term "landlord or his predecessors" occurs, that, independently of what I have stated, a very strong argument could be drawn therefrom so as to prevent the palpable injustice of the construction that payment for or maintenance of improvements by a tenant for life would not enure to a remainderman to whom a tenant for life would not, I think, be strictly a predecessor in title; but I prefer to rest my judgment on the provisions of the two statutes taken together, as indicating that the term in question must have the same meaning all through. It is a fixed sense of construction that a word once defined, or whose meaning is unquestionably ascertained in an instrument, must have the same meaning throughout; except the context opposes. No doubt, an apparent difficulty occurs here, that the extension of meaning in section 7 of the Act of 1881 is by its language only applied to the case of a tenant quitting his holding; but this, I think, is removed by the consideration that the very extended right thereby given is the very right which gives the extended claim to compensation for improvements, which forms, in my opinion, the basis on which sub-section 9 can only legitimately be rested; the right of the tenant to get compensation for his improvements, and his right to be exempted from rent in respect of them, being, according to my view, almost, if not entirely, correlative. This view has, I think, a very strong argument in its favour; that it makes the construction of the two Acts throughout entirely uniform on the present point.

In reference to the third question, the very considerations I have just stated induce me to think that the positive enactments as to improvements before 1870, as mentioned in the final clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870, must still apply. The two Acts, by the express enactment in the statute of 1881, must be construed as one, that is, as one code. The provisions of the final clause in section 4 of the Act of 1870 are just as mandatory as those of sub-section 9; and in the statute of 1881 there is no declared intention of repealing it. Under such circumstances the rule of construction is, that they must stand together if they can be reconciled. I think they can stand together, and that the exemption as to improvements in the 9th sub-section must operate on improvements made before the passing of the Act of 1870, just as they are defined by the statute of 1870, with all the qualifications attaching thereon. This view again establishes an uniformity of construction throughout, which if it rests on a sound principle of construction, as I think it does, has much to recommend its being adopted. Nothing can be more illusory than a term in a part of a code consisting of several Acts of Parliament being taken in its apparent meaning in any one section of one of the statutes, particularly in the last statute in the series. If one reads the 8th sub-section per se, he would at first sight be disposed to give the word improvements a very wide interpretation; but when we find in the very statute in which this word is used a peremptory direction that its meaning shall be taken as in the former Act of 1870, the rule is at once enforced that that interpretation must be abided by, the context not offering any obstacle. And when this is once determined, it seems to me to follow, as I have come to the conclusion, that the right to compensation for improvements is the true basis of the enactment in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881; that the improvements mentioned in the sub-section must be taken as not merely defined in the Act of 1870, but also with the qualifications attached thereto by that statute, so far as the improvements were made before the passing of the Act of 1870. It appears to me that this view is as well sanctioned as it is strongly supported by all the cases that have arisen on the construction of statutes held to be one code or to be dealt with in pari materia. I need only refer to one case of Eyre v. MacDowell, 9 H. L. Cas. 619, one of the most remarkable; where the late Lord Chancellor Brady and Lord Justice Blackburn, in a series of decisions, by adhering to the supposed literal meaning of the 7th section of the Judgment Mortgage Act of 1860, 13 & 14 Vict., c. 29, taken by itself, gave the judgment registered as a mortgage force and effect against the previously unregistered deed of the judgment debtor. Now, on the language of that section, per se, that was apparently so; but they erroneously disregarded the circumstances that the statute was but part of a code regulating the rights of judgment creditors, and that before the statute the judgment itself, with its general lien, only affected what the debtor at the date of the judgment could dispose of, and that the new statute was only intended to affect that very interest in another way, and that therefore the registration could only affect what was so bound, and was as to that, and that alone, to stand as a registered deed for the future. The whole principle of the decision of the House of Lords, in every part of it, seems to me to apply in this very case on the point I am now dealing with. I think it right to add that I cannot agree with the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor, which relies on the right of sale conferred on the tenant by the early sections of the Act of 1881. These sections do not, in my opinion, give an absolute right of sale of all the improvements as they stand; if they did, it would seem to me to follow that the whole increased letting value caused by improvements becomes the absolute property of the tenant. The right of sale is by the express enactment a restricted one; the landlord can intervene, and then the Court must fix the true value. This value cannot be the market value, but what, having regard to the interest of landlord and tenant respectively under this code, would be the true estimate of price between them.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

As to whether a tenant having made improvements during the currency of a lease, and enjoying them during that period, gets compensation thereby from the landlord, I am clearly of opinion that he does not. When a man takes a lease, he is a purchaser for the whole extent of the term granted, provided he fulfils his obligations under the lease. If he makes improvements which he can lawfully do under the terms of his lease, he has the same right to enjoy them during the term as to make them. He buys the right to enjoy and make use of them during the term, as much as he buys the legitimate use of the land; and it is impossible to say that in such a state of facts he is "otherwise compensated for such improvements" by a user or enjoyment while the lease lasts. The same consequences would follow under any other tenancy during which the improvements are made, and whilst it remains unaltered; on every break in the tenancy a state of things may undoubtedly occur which the Land Commissioners would have to consider, as to whether it amounted to a compensation for the improvements otherwise than by payment. This state of things may mount up to a case where the new tenancy is granted and accepted expressly in consideration of the improvements being made, and descend to a case where nothing whatever is said between the landlord and tenant on the subject; but where from the terms of the new tenancy it can and ought to be reasonably inferred that the new tenancy has been granted upon terms which fairly imply that the improvements were, either to the entire or partial extent, the moving cause to the landlord giving the new tenancy, no contract is, in my mind, in any way necessary towards getting at a "compensation otherwise than payment" under the section—much less is a threat or menace of eviction on the part of the landlord. The facts or circumstances surrounding each change of tenancy of the holding, on which improvements have been made, must in the end rule each case. Now, as an instance where, independently of any contract, I would regard this question of "otherwise compensated" as one which should be considered by the Commissioners, I will take this one: A tenant holds under a lease at a moderate rent; he, being an improving tenant, has executed permanent improvements within the statutes, which much enhance the letting value of the holding when the lease ends. The landlord at the end of the lease enters on the premises, and having viewed the premises, says to the tenant, "I see you have improved this holding; go on from year to year. I will let you hold at the old rent you paid under the terminated lease." The tenant so holds on—say for ten or twenty years. It seems to me that in that case, at the end of either of these periods, the Land Commissioners, in fixing a rent as between the landlord and the tenant, should take into consideration a letting so made as an element in coming to the conclusion whether the improvements made were wholly or partially compensated for.

As to the operation of the lease of 1846, this is unquestionably a point of much practical moment. It has, of course, all the recommendation of a new and safe starting-point as between landlord and tenant; but, I must confess I cannot think that by itself it bars the tenant's claim. I see no difference between a lease describing the subject-matter of demise and the same subject-matter demised by parol, say from year to year. The statement in the lease that the house is part of the demised premises is no more than what would happen if the landlord let the holding and tenant took it. To bar the tenant conclusively, on a change of tenancy, of his right to compensation for improvements, or of the benefit of the 9th sub-section, I think there should be a clear dealing, either express or implied, involving an abandonment of such right or benefit. When this does not exist, the Land Commissioners must, I admit, carefully review the whole state of things accompanying the change of tenancy, and rule upon it. It would, of course, be of the utmost moment to get a starting-point, but this must and should be one clear and safe beyond any doubt. I would be apprehensive that a decision, holding that a lease in the terms of that of 1846 was a bar to the subsequent occupant of the holding claiming compensation or the benefit of the 9th sub-section, would to a great degree involve the conclusion that each change of tenancy would bar all claim to improvements made before it, which I think it was the most decisive object of the statute to prevent. I think that in the present case there was nothing in any of the changes of tenancy to bar the claim to compensation for improvements, or the rights of the last occupying tenant in respect thereof.

Such are my answers, and the reasons for them, to the questions which we all agree are necessary to be answered, so as to determine the legal points arising on the case submitted to us. I have, perhaps, stated my reasons at too much length; but as there is a considerable difference of opinion amongst the members of this Court, for whom I entertain supreme respect, I have thought it better to state those reasons fully.

MORRIS, C.J.—The learned Judicial Commissioner, in his judgment, states that he expects this Court may determine, in regard to important questions arising in this case, principles by which the Land Commissioners' future action should be regulated. We do so, after much consideration and lengthened conference, but, I regret, in some instances with more or less difference of opinion. The five questions which directly arise on the case have been stated by the Lord Chancellor. First, with respect to the word "improvements." It appears to have been used and dealt with as of the same signification as "the increased letting value" caused by the improvements. The word is defined in the Act of 1870 as "any work which being executed adds to the letting value of the holding, &c.," but the addition to the letting value is caused by the work plus the inherent qualities and capacity for such work of the holding; the latter is the landlord's, while the former is the tenant's. The absence of any consideration of the inherent capacity of the soil, in the consideration of increased letting value caused by improvements or work done by the tenant, appears to pervade the judgments; it might in many cases be the most important factor, while in other cases it might not. This is well put by Mr. Butt, at page 128 of his work on the Act of 1870. He says:—"If, for instance, the letting value of the farm was increased by £10 a year, it may be urged that this value is created by the industry and expenditure of the tenant, and that therefore he is entitled to regard the property he has so created as his own;" but he proceeds to say, "the additional value is not the creation solely of the tenant—it is the creation partly

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

of the expenditure and skill of the tenant, and partly of the inherent capabilities of the soil."

The second question is as to the meaning of "predecessors in title." We are all of opinion that the distinction sought to be drawn between this case and Holt v. Harborton by the learned Judicial Commissioner is untenable. It was not decided on any such assumption as he appears to think—viz., "that the new lease was granted in consideration of the circumstance of the dwelling-house having been erected." The Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Deasy, and I myself were three of the judges who decided Holt v. Harborton; and the ratio of the case was that "predecessor in occupancy" was not "predecessor in title." The Judicial Commissioner refers, in support of his view of Holt v. Harborton, to the judgment of the then Lord Chief Baron, who did not concur fully in the grounds of the judgment of the other judges pronounced by Lord Chancellor O'Hagan, and, therefore gave his own grounds; but the point of the judgment of the Court is emphasised by the judgment of the one judge who was not satisfied to rest his judgment on the same grounds as was the judgment of the Court. But then arises the question whether the 7th section of the Act of 1881 affects the construction of the words "predecessors in title" in section 8, sub-section 9. I am of opinion that it does not. The legal meaning of "predecessors in title" was settled by Holt v. Harborton. The meaning is not purported to be altered by section 7, but by that section it is declared that a tenant, under certain circumstances (the leading one being when quitting his holding), shall not be deprived of the right to compensation by reason of certain other circumstances set forth, and that in such case a former tenant shall be deemed to be a predecessor in title to him, when, according to legal interpretation of the words, he would be deprived, and would not be a successor in title. I cannot concur in the argument which carries that legislative accretion, under certain circumstances, to the words "predecessors in title" in section 7 to another section dealing with another set of circumstances, where the words "predecessors in title" are simply used, and no accretion of meaning attached to them; and I cannot concur in the judgment of the learned Judicial Commissioner that the legal meaning of the words—their plain, ordinary meaning—is a strict technical meaning. Neither can I accept the argument that, because in one section and under peculiar circumstances, a word is declared to have a signification different to its legal one, ergo the same word, when used in another section, is also to have a different signification from its legal sense—e contra, "expressio unius exclusio alterius."

As to the third question, the Commissioners, in order to determine a fair rent under the 8th section, have to regard the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively. The interest of the former is the plenary interest in the holding, save so far as the tenant establishes, in diminution, claims under the Acts of 1870 or 1881. These claims constitute the tenant's interest. What is the tenant's claim under the Act of 1870 in respect of improvements made before the passing of that Act? [His lordship read section 4 of the Act of 1870.] The tenant's claim is, by the final paragraph, limited as to improvements made before the passing of the Act by the period of enjoyment, that is to the extent the tenant has been repaid by enjoyment. The Act of 1870 was so administered by all tribunals. When the Act of 1881 passed, the tenant's interest in respect of improvements made before 1870 was not, in name or substance, a claim to have them recognised as his, or a claim to their full value, but a claim to be compensated so far as he had not been compensated by enjoyment in the various degrees of time, &c., as set forth in section 4. Such legislatively compensated for improvements could not, in the teeth of the Act of 1870 (incorporated with the Act of 1881), be part of the tenant's interest within the meaning of section 8; and if not, they are part of the landlord's interest—to be so regarded in fixing a fair rent. But is this altered by sub-s. 9? In my opinion, "no." That sub-section, in that respect, only reaffirms in more special language that the tenant's improvements are not to be assessed in rent; it does not purport to repeal section 4 of the Act of 1870, by which improvements made by a tenant or his predecessor in title before the Act were, under the circumstances and with the measures set forth respectively, declared compensated for, and were consequently not to become, but to remain, the property of the landlord, and as such part of his interest in ascertaining his fair rent; and, being the landlord's property, what part of sub-section 9 takes them from him, the Act of 1870 non obstante? Similar considerations may apply to provisos of section 4, such as proviso (a) and proviso 3, whereby a thirty-one years' lease, enjoyed by a tenant, was deemed full compensation with certain exceptions.

Question four, I consider, necessarily calls for a consideration of the meaning of the 9th sub-section, as to what is meant by "otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title." It was argued here, on the part of the tenant, that it should be compensation ejusdem generis as "paid." It appears to me to be the contrary. "Otherwise" signifies "by any other means," which, so far from being ejusdem generis, might be of the most opposite character. "Compensated," the word so often used in the Act of 1870, signifies "indemnified from loss." The section so interpreted would read thus:—"No rent shall be allowed for improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title for which the tenant, &c., has not been paid, or by any other means been indemnified by the landlord or his predecessors in title"—that is out of the property of the landlord. The learned Judicial Commissioner says:—"Under the Act of 1881 the compensation must emanate from the landlord. In order to enable him to claim rent in respect of the tenant's improvements, he must, so to speak, have bought them from the tenant, paid him for them, or otherwise compensated him. What amounts to such compensation? It may take a hundred forms, which it would be impossible to enumerate. But it must, I conceive, be something given, or done, or foregone by the landlord as an equivalent for the improvements. We are not called on to decide whether a lease given at a low rent, in order to enable the tenant to improve, might not in some cases be held to be compensation, nor whether, in the case of a tenancy from year to year, the landlord's abstention for a considerable period from the exercise of his legal right to evict the tenant or enforce a larger rent from him by menace of eviction might not, in some cases, be deemed compensation by him. Every case of that kind would, I conceive, be governed by its own special circumstances." I do not much differ from this reading of the section, with the following modifications: firstly, the use of the ambiguous word "emanate"—if by that he means that there must be some active giving by the landlord it is, in my opinion, a mistaken view. Again he says, by way of illustration—"We are not called on to decide whether a lease given at a lower rent, in order to enable the tenant to improve, might not in some cases be held to be a compensation." I should say such a case could admit of no doubt but that "it might." Again he says, "in the case of tenancies from year to year, the landlord's abstention for a considerable period from the exercise of his legal right to evict or enforce a larger rent by menace of eviction might in some cases be a compensation." Here again, the words "menace of eviction" introduce the false element of any action, whether actual or by threat, on the part of the landlord. The mere abstention by the landlord from availing himself of his legal rights and allowing the tenant to enjoy what, if the landlord chose, he might enjoy himself, must, in my opinion, be a compensation by the landlord, irrespective of threat or statement to that effect. Mr. Commissioner Litton cuts the Gordian knot by elaborating a compendious formula, and proceeds to state it thus:—"The question is, to what extent has the letting value been increased by improvements, if at all;" deducting the latter from what he has described as the commercial value of the holding, he adds, "we get the fair rent." What we have decided as to the true meaning of the word "improvements"—viz., that it is not the same, as the increase of the letting value, destroys this formula at its outset. Passing on further to the consideration of the words "otherwise compensated," the same learned Commissioner lays down thus—"The words, 'paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord' must mean either actual payment or some positive and direct consideration moving from the landlord to the tenant, and not the enjoyment of occupation which has no reference to the improvements." During the argument of this case this proposition was described by the Lord Chief Baron as placing the enjoyment on the basis of contract, express or implied, when he asked the leading counsel for the tenant whether he so argued. I have already in effect stated what appears to me fairly clear—viz., that the enjoyment by the tenant is not necessarily to rest on the basis of contract between him and his landlord. It rests on the basis of compensation in fact obtained by him out of the landlord's property, irrespective of whether the landlord actively or passively permitted or knew of the enjoyment—considerations, in my opinion, outside the real one—viz., "indemnification" by the tenant out of the landlord's property—e.g., enjoyment at a low rent for a long time. The construction contended for by the tenant requires us to interpret the sub-section as if it ordained in express words that the time of enjoyment should not be held to be compensation. I could not, however, apply the principle of compensation out of the landlord's property to improvements made during the currency of this lease, and of which the only enjoyment was the period that the lease lasted. In the restricted sense of the word "improvements," which we decide is its legal signification, what enjoyment is there during the lease out of the landlord's property? If in the present case Mrs. Dunseath had not raised the rent on the expiration of the lease, there would be from that period clear enjoyment by the tenant out of the property pro tanto. When the stipulated term had determined during which the landlord could not disturb the tenant's possession, or raise his rent, or impose any fresh terms, the aspect changed; a parol tenancy from year to year sprang up; the tenant would be left in the enjoyment of improvements with which it was competent for the landlord to interfere by raising the rent. The subsequent enjoyment by the tenant of the whole unshared benefit of the improved holding, including its developed and realised capability, would amount pro tanto to compensation by the landlord; and I know of no form of compensation more advantageous to the tenant. It furnished the distinction between landlords who left the tenant the entire profit of his improvements, and those who insisted upon sharing in the advantages derived by them from increase of rent.

As to the 5th question, I am of opinion that Mrs. Dunseath is entitled to rent for the house. The house being on the land when James M'Kee took his lease in 1846, by whomsoever built, he took it as the landlord's property. This result follows necessarily from the opinion I have formed on the question of "predecessor in title," as this case, in respect of the house, would be not alone in principle, but almost in fact, the same as Holt v. Harberton.

It becomes unnecessary to decide whether on another ground, suggested in argument, the same result should not be arrived at. The widow Dunseath's husband bought, with other property, the reversion expectant on the lease to M'Kee in the Incumbered Estates Court in 1851, and the conveyance was executed to him by the judges of that Court. That conveyance by indefeasible title conveyed to the purchaser the estate as then improved, subject only to the lease of 1846 and any rights flowing from it—I say emphatically from it; but with no reservation of any rights, real or imaginary, that flow or might be supposed to flow from anything done at an earlier period than the date of the lease. What reduces the purchaser under the Incumbered Estates Court title from being the grantee of an improved estate—i.e., of an estate with its then improvements—to the position of grantee of an estate practically minus the improvement? The question remains whether the general words in the 9th subsection relate back not alone to tenancies existing at the time of the passing of the Act of 1881, but to tenancies and to improvements made during past tenancies by the tenant and his predecessors in title, and thus, getting behind the conveyance, attach improvements to a past tenancy which, even if it had existed in 1851, would be destroyed by the Incumbered Estates Court conveyance—propositions it might be difficult to establish.

In arriving at these conclusions on those questions I have endeavoured to loyally obey and give effect to the meaning of the statute where its meaning is clear and plain, irrespective of any individual opinion of its policy or impolicy, or what injury it may entail on individuals. But where the terms are obscure or ambiguous—I use the words of an eminent judge—"the Court should not lose sight of the principle that a party is not to be stripped of his undoubted property or rights by ambiguous terms of an Act of Parliament."

Finally, I desire to acknowledge the assistance I have derived from the full and able judgments of the learned Commissioners, though I am on some points unable to arrive at the same conclusions they have—conclusions which, in the terse but pregnant judgment of the lay Commissioner, appeared to him to lay down principles and to lead to results which were never contemplated by the Legislature.

Here my intended judgment concluded; but, I make this remark on the Lord Chancellor's reference in his judgment to the Ulster custom as affecting this case—No reference is made to it in the case stated for our judgment; none in the judgment of the learned Commissioners; none was made during the argument before us; and none, so far as appears, during the argument before the learned Commissioners at Belfast. I must, therefore, decline a legal exhortation on assumptions not put before us, and for aught I know non-existent.

PALLES, C.B.—All the questions stated by the Lord Chancellor, as those upon which this Court is to pronounce its opinion, arise upon the construction of the 8th section of the Act of 1881. That statute and the Act of 1870 must, as well upon the ordinary principles of construction of Acts in pari materia, as by the express legislative declaration contained in the 57th section of the later Act, be construed together as one code. In considering these two Acts, I shall limit myself to the enactments material to the question before us—viz., to so much of the Act of 1870 as provides compensation for improvements; and such portions of the Act of 1881 as, firstly, amend those provisions, and secondly, entitle a tenant to hold on for the statutory term. In these portions of the Acts I find two distinct objects: firstly, that a tenant on quitting his holding shall be entitled to certain compensation for improvements; secondly, that a tenant of a certain class shall not be bound to quit his holding at all, but shall be entitled to hold on for a term of fifteen years practically renewable for ever, for successive terms of fifteen years. When, as in the present case, a tenant who is so entitled avails himself of his right to obtain a statutory term, there is not, and cannot be, a quitting, within the meaning of the Act of 1870; and the main question we have to decide is, what in that event is his right in respect of improvements?

Improvements are defined by the 70th section of the Act of 1870 to be works which increase the letting value of the holding, and are suitable to it; and the 4th section of that Act provides that a tenant may, on quitting his holding, claim compensation, to be paid by his landlord, in respect of all improvements on his holding, made by him or his predecessors in title. The general words of this enactment are, however, at once cut down by the first proviso, which describes five classes of improvements in respect of which it enacts "a tenant shall not be entitled to claim any compensation." The first of these classes is "improvements made before the passing of this Act, and twenty years before the claim of such compensation shall have been made, except permanent buildings and reclamation of waste lands." The second proviso further limits the class of improvements in respect of which a tenant can claim compensation. The third proviso is to the effect that when a holding is under lease for a term certain of not less than thirty-one years, the tenant shall not (in the absence of special provision in the lease) be entitled to compensation in respect of any improvements, except permanent buildings, reclamation of waste lands, tillages, and manures. The fourth proviso uses the expression "his" (the tenant's) "interest in his improvements"; and the final clause enacts that in awarding compensation in respect of improvements made before the Act, the Court shall, in reduction of the claim of the tenant, take into consideration (1) the time during which the tenant shall have enjoyed the advantage of such improvements, (2) the rent at which such holding has been held, and (3) any benefits which such tenant may have received from his landlord in consideration, expressly or impliedly, of the improvements so made. Those provisos show that works which add to the letting value of, and are suitable to, a holding (and therefore improvements within the 70th section) are not, although made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, necessarily improvements in respect of which the tenant has a right to receive compensation. That he may have this right in respect of them, the works must in addition be outside the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd provisos, and the amount of compensation he had a right to receive in respect of such works is liable to reduction in respect of the matters mentioned in the final clause of the 4th section.

The expression "predecessors in title" was, in my opinion, rightly construed by the majority of the Court for Land Cases Reserved, in Holt v. Harberton. If, therefore, the present case were governed by the Act of 1870 alone, the tenant Adams, were he now quitting, would have been disentitled to claim compensation for any of the improvements executed before 1875, as the continuity of title had been broken by the new tenancy created in that year. He would, further, have been disentitled (even if the continuity had not been broken), to claim for any works, except the house and reclamation of waste lands (if any), executed before 1862. This state of the law was, however, amended by the 7th section of the Act of 1881. The subject-matter of the first clause of this section (the portion which is material here) is the "right" of the tenant to receive compensation under the Act of 1870; and the subject-matter of the second clause (which is in pari materia with the first), although expressed in different terms, is in fact the same, as a title for the purpose of obtaining compensation for improvements can exist only in respect of works for which the tenant had a right to obtain compensation. Were it not for the third clause, which imposes upon the Court, in adjudicating upon any claim falling within the prior portions of the section, a duty, not prescribed by the Act of 1870, of taking into consideration all the circumstances under which the change of tenancy took place, and admitting, reducing, or altogether disallowing the claim accordingly, I should have thought it open to argument that the second clause of this section was declaratory of the construction of the Act of 1870. Such a construction is, however, in my opinion, rendered impossible by the latter clause; but I confess that, in reference to the question now under consideration, I think it of little importance whether the section be or be not to a certain extent declaratory, for, whatever be its nature, it seems to me clear that its wording renders it impossible to give the extended construction to the expression "tenant or his predecessors in title," except where these words are read in reference to the class of improvements to which alone they are applied in the 7th section. The cases to which the extended construction applies are, therefore, prima facie subject to, and restricted by two (but as far as I can see by only two) limitations—one, a limitation involving the procedure by which effect is to be given to the tenant's right to compensation—viz., upon a claim on the tenant quitting his holding; the second, and in my mind the most important one, a limitation involving the subject-matter in reference to which the extended construction can apply—viz., not improvements generally, but improvements (to revert again to the words at the commencement of the 7th section) in respect of which the tenant had a "right to receive compensation." I now turn to the provisions of the Act of 1881, in reference to the statutory term. Section 8, sub-section 3, enacts—"Where the judicial rent of any present tenancy has been fixed by the Court, then, until the expiration of a term of fifteen years, such present tenancy shall (if it so long continue to subsist) be deemed to be a tenancy subject to statutory conditions." Section 5 provides that a tenant of such tenancy shall not be compelled to quit his holding, except in consequence of the breach of some one or more of the statutory conditions. The 8th section in sub-section 1 empowers a tenant of a present tenancy desirous of obtaining this tenure, to apply to the Court to fix a fair rent, and the Court, "having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively," is to determine what is such fair rent. I pause here to repeat what I have already observed, that the tenant by entitling himself to hold on for fifteen years, has postponed for that, and possibly for a much longer period, the quitting upon which he would have been entitled under the Act of 1870, to claim for the improvements in respect of which he had a right to receive compensation. He has not, however, thereby lost his interest in those improvements. If, therefore, his interest in improvements is to be at all considered in settling a fair rent, it must be so considered although there has not been a quitting; and therefore although a claim under the 4th section of the Act of 1870 could not be sustained. This 8th section, accordingly, in its 9th sub-section, enacts—"No rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, and for which in the opinion of the Court the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title." Were the class of improvement within the sub-section a larger one, than that to which "predecessors in title" is, by the 7th section applied in its extended sense, I would agree with the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, that the extended construction could not prevail in this sub-section, because that would be to apply that construction to a subject-matter to which there is no intention on the face of the Act that it should be applied. But, on the other hand, if the improvements referred to in the sub-section are identical with those within the 7th section, then one of the two difficulties of the application of the extended construction does not exist. What then, upon the true construction of the sub-section, are the improvements contemplated by it? In order to determine this, I must read this 9th sub-section as part of, and in connection with the other provisions of the 8th section. So reading it, I am of opinion that it was not contradictory to, but in explanation and enforcement of the principle contained in the 1st sub-section, which, in my opinion, contains the key to the entire section—viz., that in fixing the fair rent regard should be had to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively. In my view, it was not intended by this sub-section to provide that the Court should not have regard to the interest of the landlord or to transfer to the tenant any part of that interest, either in the holding or in the improvements thereon. Even were the context doubtful, a construction involving such a consequence could not obtain. But the context is, in my opinion, not doubtful. The improvements in respect of which rent is not to be payable are restricted by the words, "and for which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant or his predecessor in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title," and these words demonstrate an affirmative intention that the landlord's interest in the improvements should not be transferred to the tenant. Compensation may be partial as well as complete, and may be partial even in respect of one indivisible work. Therefore, the words I have last mentioned must define not only the class of works, but the extent of the interest or property in these works, in respect of which rent is not to be payable. If I be right in the conclusions at which I have arrived—viz., first, that the tenant had an interest in improvements made by himself or his predecessors in title, as used in the wider signification; secondly, that there is in the 9th sub-section an intention not to transfer property in improvements from landlord to tenant—what remains to satisfy the expression in the 9th sub-section, "improvements made by the tenant or predecessors in title, and for which in the opinion of the Court the tenant or his predecessors in title have not been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title?" I answer, that which can alone remain, unless some part of the property of the landlord in the improvements be transferred to the tenant—the interest of the tenant in the improvements; and this interest he can have in such improvements only as he had a right to receive compensation for. These are the improvements, and in my opinion the only improvements, within the section; and the property in this class of improvements is cut down by the words, "and for which the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title," to the interest of the tenant therein which has been uncompensated by the landlord. This interest, although vested and existing, was one the money value of which depended upon a future and contingent event—upon his quitting his holding; and, in my opinion, the operation of this sub-section is to give effect in presenti to that interest by exempting it from rent. Reading the sub-section in this sense, an effect is given to it which is consistent with every other provision of the section, and is in furtherance of the essential principle of that section, that "regard shall be had to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." But, the improvements in which the tenant has this interest include those made by his predecessors in title in the wider sense mentioned in the 7th section. I, therefore, have (1) that regard is to be had to the interest of the tenant; (2) that that interest includes interest in improvements in respect of which he has a right to claim compensation, that is, improvements made by himself or his predecessors in title as used in the wider sense; (3) a direction in the 9th sub-section that no rent shall be allowed in respect of the interest of the tenant in improvements made by him or his predecessors in title in respect of which he has a right to claim compensation. It seems to me to follow that the expression "predecessors in title," in the 9th sub-section, must, in order to make the interest of the tenant, which was intended to be protected, co-extensive with the interest which he in fact had, and to which regard is directed to be given, be read in its extended meaning, unless there be something in the context of the clause giving this wider meaning, which absolutely prohibits such an application. This brings us back to the 7th section to inquire whether it contains this absolute prohibition. I revert to the two limitations which I endeavoured to show restricted—and were the only limitations which restricted—the extended construction. As to the first, which involves the procedure, it is rendered inapplicable by the express legislation of the 9th sub-section. That section substantially directs the consideration, upon an application to fix a fair rent (without a claim for compensation, and although there is no quitting), of improvements which under the previous legislation could be considered only upon such claim, and after such event. As to the second, the construction which I have given to the words "improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title" renders it identical with the subject-matter as to which, and to which alone, I have shown the words "tenant or his predecessors in title" can obtain their extended construction. In result, then, I am of opinion that the suggested difficulties of giving the extended meaning to "his predecessors in title" in the 9th sub-section do not in fact exist, and that the intention gathered from the 8th section requiring these words to be read in that sub-section in that extended meaning must prevail. These considerations enable me to answer the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd questions.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

As to the 1st, I am of opinion that the word "improvements" in the 9th sub-section means works which, being suitable to the holding, add to its letting value, as distinguished from the increased letting value itself. It is in this sense "improvements" are defined by the 70th section of the Act of 1870; and the 57th section of the Act of 1881 enacts that expressions in that Act which are not thereby defined, and are defined by the Act of 1870, shall, unless there is something in the context repugnant thereto, have the same meaning as in the last-mentioned Act.

In answer to the 2nd question, I am of opinion that "predecessors in title" in the expression "the tenant or his predecessors in title," in the 9th sub-section, mean predecessors in title in the extended sense in which that expression is used in the 7th section.

As to the 3rd question, being of opinion that that which has been exempted from rent is not the entire work, but the uncompensated interest of the tenant in that work, it necessarily follows that I am of opinion that enjoyment by the tenant of improvements executed before the passing of the Act of 1870, which, by the express terms of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, is to be taken into consideration in reduction of the tenant's interest in such work, cannot be excluded from consideration in determining fair rent. As I understand the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, who has arrived at a conclusion upon the 3rd question different from mine, the point of divergence between us is the extent of the interest of the tenant under the 8th section in respect of improvements. The Lord Chancellor is of opinion that, as the tenant is entitled under section 1, sub-section 2, to sell his holding in the open market, subject to a right of pre-emption in the landlord to purchase, at the true value, the interest of the tenant in the improvements is the difference between what would be the selling value of the farm in its unimproved state and its actual selling value when improved. This construction subjects this holding (which is not in fact subject to the Ulster custom), and subjects also every other holding to which the Act applies, to a right analogous or similar to the Ulster custom. The effect of this would be to give to the tenant, under the word improvements, the entire of the increased letting value caused by such improvements—a result disclaimed by the Lord Chancellor. Irrespective, however, of what the result may be, I cannot agree either in the conclusion of the Lord Chancellor or in the reasoning on which it is founded. The tenant has, no doubt, a right to acquire a term of fifteen years, with a right of renewal from fifteen years to fifteen years; but that right has not yet been acquired. We are not now determining the right which the tenant may have at the end of a term of fifteen years in reference to improvements executed after the Act, and when he had practically a perpetual interest in his holding. The question we have here deals with the conditions upon which the tenant is entitled to acquire his first statutory term. Until he acquires this term, he has nothing more to sell than a tenancy from year to year—a tenancy which he was entitled to sell before the Act of 1881. The conditions upon which he is entitled to acquire the fifteen years' term include payment of a fair rent, and the question is, subject to what fair rent shall he acquire his statutory term? Were there no express provision in the Act as to the interest of the landlord, you could not, as a condition precedent to determining what rent he should pay for a term of fifteen years, assume that he already had an interest practically perpetual, and deduct out of the amount which would otherwise be a fair rent the annual equivalent of a perpetual interest in improvements. But, the 8th section is express, that the Court is to "have regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively"—that is, to the interest which these parties have at the time the rent is being ascertained, and before the period arrives at which the tenant acquires his statutory term. Were the statute read in the view of the Lord Chancellor, its effect would be to transfer to the tenant all the property of the landlord in improvements which had been effected by the tenant, notwithstanding that some of such improvements had, under the provisoes of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, become parcel of the holding, without liability upon the landlord to pay any compensation in respect of them, and that the amount of compensation payable in respect of others had been materially reduced by enjoyment. I have searched the Act in vain for words which indicate such an intention. To liken the case to one of Ulster custom is to assume that the only essential element of that custom is the right of sale in the tenant, whereas, in fact, the foundation of the Ulster tenant-right is the liability, on the part of the landlord, to pay the full value of the holding upon an eviction in breach of the custom. The right of sale existed in all common law tenancies from year to year; it was a right which the Ulster custom could not extend, but with which, in many instances, it materially interfered.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

The 4th question is, "Whether the enjoyment, during the currency of a lease, of improvements made by the tenant during such lease, but after the passing of the Act of 1870, is a compensation by the landlord within the meaning of the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the Act of 1881?" By "improvements," in this question, I, of course, understand suitable works which add to the letting value of the holding, not the increase of such value. Reading the question in this sense, I am of opinion that, upon the true construction of the sub-section, this enjoyment is not compensation by the landlord. As the question is limited to improvements made after the Act of 1870, the final proviso in the 4th section of that statute does not apply; and we must therefore inquire whether, irrespective of the statute, such enjoyment may amount to compensation. To be compensation under the 4th section, it must be compensation "by the landlord or his predecessors in title"—words which, in my opinion, include the estate of such landlord or predecessors in title. The increased letting value caused by the improvements is, no doubt, not the creation solely of the tenant: it is the result partly of the expenditure and skill of the tenant, and partly of the inherent capabilities of the soil. Of these two elements, however, the first is supplied solely by the tenant, and the second, the inherent capabilities of the soil, is portion of that which has been let to him by the landlord for the term of his lease. Those capabilities, although unused at the time of the lease, and capable if used of producing a profit perhaps not in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the lease, are portions of the thing which the tenant has acquired by his contract, and which he is entitled to utilise in every reasonable mode not contrary to that contract. It is impossible to hold that this increased letting value during the tenancy has been produced by the landlord, or by his estate, or can be deemed compensation by him within the meaning of the section. No doubt it may be said, in one sense, that the landlord's "estate" contributes to the result; but in that sense "estate" is used in its popular signification, meaning the land of which a particular proprietor is the landlord, and not his reversion or legal interest in the land. The increased value during the lease is no more contributed to by the landlord than he contributes to the growth of grass on the pasture-land which he has demised as such to his tenant. This view is sustained by the 5th sub-section of the same 8th section, which requires the landlord, on exercising his right of pre-emption on sale of his tenant's holding, to pay the specified value for the tenancy, together with the value of any improvements made by the tenant since such specified value was fixed. Value of improvements here must mean true value, and excludes reduction by reason of their enjoyment. I, however, offer no opinion whether possession after the termination of a lease, whether under a new contract or not, or possession under a tenancy from year to year, which a landlord might have, but in fact has not, determined, may not amount to compensation within the meaning of the 9th sub-section.

The 5th and last question is, "Whether the lease of 1846 excludes the tenant from any interest in respect of the house built before the execution of that lease, in the ascertainment of the fair rent of his holding?" The facts material to the question appear to be as follows:—Prior to 1842 the lands in question were in the possession of one James M'Kee as tenant under the Earl of Mountcashel, but at what rent does not appear. In 1842 the lands were valued by valuers appointed by the Earl, at the yearly rent of £26 11s. 6d. From the time of the valuation in 1842 this rent of £26 11s. 6d. was paid by James M'Kee. M'Kee, being thus tenant, at some time about the year 1844 erected a house, using in some degree for that purpose the materials of an older house previously existing. Prior to the building of this house the agent verbally offered M'Kee a lease; and, as I understand the case, offered it at the rent of £26 11s. 6d. M'Kee at the time of the erection of the house understood that he could have a lease if he desired. No actual contract for the lease was, however, made prior to the building of the house; but on 2nd March, 1846, being after the completion of the house, the Earl leased the premises to M'Kee for thirty years from 1st November, 1845, at the same rent, £26 11s. 6d., which M'Kee had previously paid. Upon the 27th October, 1846, M'Kee assigned to John Adams, who died about 1869, and it is admitted that the estate and interest of John Adams in the holding became upon his death legally vested in David Adams, the present tenant. The lease expired on 1st November, 1875. Those are the only facts in relation to this question found by the case, and it is to be remembered that by the section of the statute under which this case is stated, our jurisdiction is to determine questions of law only. We are not at liberty to assume facts, or even to draw an inference of fact from facts stated in the case. The opinion I have expressed upon the 2nd question shows that, in my view, the question whether this lease excludes the tenant from any interest in respect of the house in the ascertainment of the fair rent of his holding, is identical with another, "whether the lease excludes the tenant from compensation (in respect of the building of the house) under the 4th section of the Act of 1870, as amended by the 7th section of the Act of 1881." The decision in Holt v. Harberton, as expounded by the reasons expressed for their judgment by the majority of the Court, coerces us to hold that, were the case governed by the Act of 1870 alone, the tenant would be so excluded. The question, then, must rest upon the 7th section of the Act of 1881—"a tenant on quitting his holding shall not be deprived of his right to receive compensation for improvements under the Act of 1870, by reason only of the determination, by surrender or otherwise, of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made by such tenant or his predecessors in title, and the acceptance by him or them of a new tenancy." Now first, it is said by Mr. Holmes that the section does not apply in the present case, as the lease expired in 1875, and the law then regulating rights to compensation was the Act of 1870, under which it is conceded the tenant would have had no right to compensation had he then quit. He cannot, it is said, have been deprived by that lease of that which he never had—a right of compensation. In my opinion, this argument is unsustainable. This section amends the Act of 1870. That Act in its 4th section deals with claims for compensation for improvements on a tenant quitting his holding, and the 7th section (the amending enactment) must, from the date of the passing of the Act of 1881, be read into, and incorporated with the 4th section of the prior Act, and the section so amended is applicable to every claim in respect of a quitting after the passing of the Act of 1881. Had the old tenancy of 1842 not been determined by the acceptance of the lease of 1846, the tenant, if now quitting, would, under the Act of 1870, have had a right to compensation for the house, and in my opinion the effect of the legislation of 1881 is to prevent the determination of that old tenancy, and the acceptance of the lease of 1846, depriving the tenant of that right. I pass now from this question of time, and shall consider the case as if the 7th section had been a substantive enactment in the Act of 1870. The mode in which the argument in favour of the extinguishment of the tenant's rights is put is, as I understand it, thus:—By the lease of 1846 the tenant took a demise, not only of the land, but of the house which was upon the land, and even of the house in express terms. By the acceptance of this lease, he is at common law estopped from denying that the house, of which he so took a lease from the Earl of Mountcashel, was the property of the Earl, and his present claim to compensation for the building of that house is an assertion of fact contrary to his estoppel. Let me test this argument: a similar estoppel would arise although the house were not specifically mentioned in the parcels of the lease. The house would have passed as part of the demised premises, whether mentioned or not. Again, although this lease is by indenture, a similar estoppel would arise in every case of a letting even by parol. The effect, therefore, of this reasoning, if pressed to its legitimate limits, would be, that a tenant holding over, after the expiration of his lease, and accepting a new tenancy from his landlord, would by such acceptance estop himself from denying that everything upon the land, including improvements made by himself, were the property of the landlord, and would therefore extinguish his claim to compensation.* If this be right, what is the scope or

* In giving judgment on April 1, 1882, at Lifford, Mr. Bourke (Sub-Com.), said: On Mr. Ferguson's estate the farms we had to view were situate about two miles beyond Carndonagh. In these cases we were not given any evidence of value by the landlord, and we only had the valuation of Mr. Doherty for the tenants to assist us. This property appears to have been held under an old lease, dated in 1790. The property, on the expiration of this old lease, was relet by lease dated 1840, for a term of thirty-one years, and the tenants have since held at the same rents as tenants from year to year. Mr. M'Cay has asked me to hold that, in accordance with the decision given in Adams v. Dunseath, the houses and buildings erected on the lands previous to the execution of the lease are the property of the landlord; but, I think from the lease which was handed in to me that these leases differ from the lease of the 2nd March, effect of the 7th section? Such an argument, if sustainable, would simply repeal it. In answer to this, it is said that although the legal effect of the lease would, before the Act of 1881, have been the same whether the house were or were not mentioned in the parcels, yet the fact of its having been so mentioned has become material since the Act, because it shows that the subject-matter of the lease was something different from the subject-matter of the old tenancy; and this, it is said, establishes a new relation between the landlord and tenant, and notwithstanding the Act of 1881 constitutes a new terminus a quo in respect of improvements. I confess myself unable to see that the subject-matter of the old tenancy when it was determined was anything different from the subject-matter of the new lease. The house, having been built during the old tenancy, became part of the land, the subject-matter of that old tenancy, and the rent reserved upon that old tenancy issued as well out of the house (after it had been built) as out of any other part of the land. It may not, therefore, be strictly necessary to consider whether the circumstances of the subject-matter of the new tenancy not being altogether identical with that of the old would necessarily exclude the application of the 7th section. Nevertheless, I do not wish that any misapprehension should exist as to my opinion on the question. That section does not limit the new tenancy (the acceptance of which, is not per se to extinguish the tenant's right) to a tenancy at the same rent, for the same terms, or upon the same conditions as the old. It is most general in its terms, "the acceptance of a new tenancy." No doubt, the section itself shows that the new tenancy must include part of the old holding, because the improvements to which the claim is to be preserved are improvements on the old holding, but I cannot be party to a construction which would determine that the incorporation in the new holding of a parcel of land not in the old, or the consolidation into one of two previously separate holdings, would not be within the protection of the section. The reasoning of my learned predecessor in Holt v. Herberton, where he relied upon the dealing of the parties having created a new relation, and given rise to a new subject-matter, was applied to the Act of 1870 alone, not to that Act as amended by the statute of 1881. It must, of course, be admitted that there may be a determination of a tenancy, and the acceptance by the tenant of a new tenancy of such a character, and under such circumstances as to extinguish the claim for compensation for prior improvements, and, in my opinion, this Court cannot satisfactorily base their answer to the 5th question upon any principle, without determining what is the essential element in the new tenancy, or what the circumstances attending it, which will work such extinguishment. This question is, in my mind, capable of an easy answer. That which by the former law effected the extinguishment was the passing of the interest of the tenant, by surrender or otherwise, into the landlord, not the acceptance of the new tenancy. The acceptance of the new tenancy was of value only because it was it which worked the surrender; but the extinguishment itself was caused by the surrender, and not by the acceptance of the new tenancy, if that acceptance were separate and distinct from the surrender of the old. The terms, therefore, of the new tenancy were immaterial upon the question of extinguishment. Now, the legislature having declared that the determination of an old, and the acceptance of a new tenancy, shall not of itself extinguish the claim, it in my opinion necessarily follows that, in order to work that extinguishment, there must be that in the transaction which under the old law would have had that effect without a change of tenancy. I am not aware of any mode by which, under such circumstances, this could have been accomplished save by contract. In my opinion, therefore, the real question in every such case is now one of contract. Did the landlord grant the new tenancy in consideration of the improvements, and did the tenant accept such new tenancy in satisfaction of such improvements? In other words, the tribunal charged with determining the question has not to deal with what was in the landlord's mind, uncommunicated to the tenant, nor with the proposal of the landlord, unaccepted by the tenant; but ought upon a review of all the facts to determine whether the transaction in itself amounted to an accord and satisfaction—an agreement to accept in satisfaction, and a giving and accepting in satisfaction, in pursuance of that agreement. This, at all events, has the merit of putting the question upon the plain and intelligible ground, of (once the surrender and acceptance of a new tenancy has been declared by the legislature insufficient) requiring the existence of that which, at common law, without surrender or new tenancy, would work an extinguishment. It may be said, and I have no doubt will be said, that in this construction I am giving no effect to the word "only" in the section—"the tenant shall not be deprived of his right by reason only of the determination of the tenancy." I answer, that effect may and ought to be given to the surrender of the new tenancy, but only as one of several circumstances all material upon the question of accord and satisfaction. Viewing the case in this light, I must answer this 5th question in the negative. I have no authority to determine, as a matter of fact, whether the tenant did or did not accept this lease in satisfaction of any claim which he might have in respect of the house. Considering that in 1846 the tenant had no legal ground to claim compensation for his house, it might not be an unreasonable inference that he willingly accepted a lease of it for thirty-one years, as such compensation; but it might, upon the other hand, be said that this lease was offered at the same rent before the house was built, and that it does not appear that the offer was made upon the condition, or with the intention, that the house should be built. But these are matters of fact, which I decline to discuss. We have nothing further before us than the determination of one tenancy, and the acceptance of another; and, in my opinion, these two circumstances are in themselves insufficient to exclude the tenant's claim for prior improvements. I wish it, however, to be distinctly understood that I give no affirmative opinion that the tenant is entitled to compensation for the house. Before doing so I should have the determination of the Commissioners upon the matter of fact that the lease had not been executed in satisfaction of the claim.

I have but one word to add. It is in reference to the new tenancy created in 1875. To this the reasoning in respect of the transaction of 1846 equally applies. There is no finding of fact as to whether the new letting was or was not accepted in satisfaction of the tenant's claim for improvements. It is stated that after the expiration of the lease the premises were re-valued with a view to a re-adjustment of the rent, that the amount of the re-valuation was £31 17s. 6d., and that Mr. Raphael, the valuer, said that in valuing the lands he took no improvements into consideration. There is, however, absent from the case, in reference to this letting, any statement that the new tenancy was accepted in satisfaction of the tenant's claim.

In result, therefore, I concur with Mr. Justice O'Hagan and Mr. Commissioner Litton as to the meaning of "tenant and his predecessors in title" in the 8th section; but, I have found myself coerced to arrive at a conclusion different from theirs as to the applicability of the final clause of the 4th section of the Act of 1870 in the determination of the fair rent under the 8th section of the Act of 1881. In a case, however, of this importance, I think it right to guard myself against expressing an opinion upon any of the questions discussed in their very clear and able judgments, other than those which have now been made the subject of our express decision.

DEASY, L.J.—I shall now state the views I have formed respecting the questions before the Court, and I do so entirely in deference to the opinions of my brethren on the bench. I should say, in the first place, that I have had very grave doubts as to whether this was a proceeding at all within the Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament says, in the 48th section, that the Land Commissioners may state a case in respect to any questions of law arising on such proceedings for the consideration and opinion of the Court of Appeal. In this matter we stand here in the same relation to the Land Commission as do the English judges when called in to the House of Lords. The judges of the Court below were bound to state to us a question of law, and to preface that by a finding on facts by which we are bound, and from which we have no right to deviate. I have met with a case which went before the House of Lords, where the English judges refused to answer questions put to them by the House of Lords, because they involved more than questions of law, and the House of Lords yielded to that. On reading the present case stated, I was at first of opinion that we ought to send it back to the Commissioners in order that they might recast it, and comply exactly with the statute as to stating the facts, and state the question of law upon which they wished the opinion of the Court.* But other and wiser counsels prevailed, and the majority of the judges were of opinion—wisely of opinion—that it would be better to endeavour, in the interest and alleged importance of the case, to dispose of it in some way. Accordingly, five questions have been evolved from the documents submitted to us by the Commissioners, only one of which was stated by the Commissioners themselves. Even the way in which the case came before us was very embarrassing. In the course of the discussion, when counsel stated a fact, I remarked that it was not found in the case. "No," I was told, "but it was implied in one of the submitted questions." Again, on another occasion, I met with an answer that a certain fact was not stated in the case, but was to be found in the judgments of one of the Commissioners. That was not complying with the provisions of the Act. Whether the Court below will derive very material assistance from what has passed now, it was for them to say. For the future I hope they will not submit a case for the opinion of the Court unless they comply with the plain directions of the Act—to give a plain statement of facts: otherwise, we may refuse to answer.

Now, the first question evolved by the Master of the Rolls from the case sent to us by the Land Court is—What is the true meaning of the word "improvements" in the 8th sub-section of section 8 of the Land Act of 1881? Thinking that, in deference to the opinions of the other members of the Court, I ought to answer it, though it is not one of the questions put to us by the Court, nor, as I think, necessarily implied in any of those questions, my answer to it is, that the word

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

"improvements," in the sub-section referred to, must be construed as having the same meaning as that which it has in the Act of 1870, because section 57 of the Act of 1881 enacts that any words or expressions in this Act which are not thereby defined, and are defined in the Act of 1870, shall, unless there is something in the context repugnant thereto, have the same meaning as in that Act; and the Act of 1870, except so far as it is expressly varied or altered by this Act, or is inconsistent therewith, and this Act shall be construed as one Act. There is no definition of the word "improvements" in the Act of 1881, and therefore I must refer to the definition of that word in the Act of 1870; and there I find that section 70 says:—"The term 'improvements' shall mean, in relation to a holding—1. Any work which being executed adds to the letting value of the holding on which it is executed, and is suitable to such holding; also, 2. Tillages, manures, or other like farming works, the benefit of which is unexhausted at the time of the tenant quitting his holding." I find nothing in the sub-section referred to which is inconsistent with or repugnant to the application to it of the definition which is contained in the Act of 1870.

Then we have to consider how the improvements stated to have been made in the present case are to be dealt with. There are four classes of improvements, as to three of which questions have been put by the Land Court: (1.) The house built by James M'Kee before the lease of 2nd March, 1846. (2.) Improvements made by John Adams, the father of David, after the assignment of the lease. (3.) Improvements made by David Adams after the death of John, and during currency of lease. (4.) Improvements by David Adams on a piece of bog which he took during currency of lease, and which, after expiration of lease, he continued to hold with the demised premises, at one rent, £36 7s. 6d. No question is asked as to the improvements made by the present tenant, except so far as they are involved in questions 4 and 5, which relate to improvements made during the currency of the lease of 1846.

As to the house, I think the case is governed by the decision in Holt v. Harberton, where it was decided by eleven judges that a tenant who built a house, under circumstances precisely similar to those in the present, was not entitled to compensation in respect of it at the expiration of the lease granted subsequently to its erection, but that the house would become then the absolute property of the landlord, discharged of any claim by the tenant. In that case, as in this, the tenant held as a yearly tenant, and while so holding built on the lands so held the house for which he claimed to be entitled to compensation. He afterwards took a lease of those and other adjoining lands, and undoubtedly the building of the house was the inducement which led to the granting of the subsequent lease; but there was no contract that, in consideration of the tenant's building the house, the landlord should grant the lease. The granting of the lease was a purely voluntary act on the part of the landlord, and the word "consideration," referred to and relied on by O'Hagan, J., was used in its popular, and not in its legal sense. That is precisely the case here; and we did decide, and intended to decide, the precise question here involved. There Lord O'Hagan says: "Two things are plain; first, that when the house was built the tenant had no legal right to compensation, and, secondly, that the lease of 1844 worked as a surrender by operation of law of the antecedent tenancy, estopping the lessee who accepted it from any denial of the lessor's right to make it, and giving him a title new, and changed in all respects as to the quantity of his land, the rent to be paid by him, and the condition of his tenancy. This being so, the question is whether, under such circumstances, it is possible under the 6th section of the Land Act to allow the claim to register the house as an improvement." All former title to the lands and improvement upon them was surrendered and done away with by the acceptance of that lease, and there is no other title to which he can be deemed a successor but the title under it. Before 1844, the father held other premises at another rent by another tenure. His title to them did not and could not devolve on his son, because he consented to its destruction. What did devolve on the appellant was the new title substituted for the old under the lease, and we cannot go behind it and declare him to have succeeded to a title which was extinguished. The circumstances here are precisely the same as in that case, except that here there was no additional land demised; and, therefore, I think that the present case is governed by that decision. O'Hagan, J., relies on the judgment of Chief Baron Pigot in that case. But he arrived at the same conclusion as the other ten, though for different reasons, not expressing any dissent from their judgment. Surely that does not impair the authority of the other ten, but on the contrary gives it greater force. He says, also, I am bound to say, it seems not to have decided the abstract principle contended for. Unquestionably, under the circumstances of this case, all former title had been surrendered and done away with, it being taken as assumed that the new lease was granted in consideration of the circumstance of the dwelling-house having been erected. But the passages from the judgment which I have read show that ten of the judges did decide the abstract principle that the lease destroyed the claim for compensation. At the time the Act of 1881 was passed, this house, therefore, was unquestionably the landlord's property, and the tenant had no right to claim compensation in respect of it. I can see nothing in that Act which has taken away that property from the landlord, and transferred it to the tenant. Reliance is placed on the 1st clause of section 7, as having that effect; but that clause only deals with tenants who had a right to compensation under the Act of 1870. A tenant, on quitting his holding, shall not be "deprived" of his right to receive compensation for improvements under the Act of 1870 by reason only of the determination by surrender or otherwise of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made by such tenant or his predecessors in title, and the acceptance by him or them of a new tenancy. But here there never was a right to claim compensation for this house existing in the present tenant, or in his predecessors in title, and he was not deprived of anything in respect of this house by "reason only" of the determination of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements—that is, improvements for which he might otherwise have got compensation under the Act of 1870—were made that Act had nothing to do with that house, and never gave him any claim in respect of it.

With respect to improvements made during the currency of the lease of 1846, by the father of David Adams, they became at its termination the property of the landlord. That was undoubtedly so at common law; and the Act of 1870 only altered the law to this extent, that it gave to the tenant on quitting his holding a right to get from his landlord compensation for all such improvements made by him or his predecessors in title, as were suitable to the holding and increased its letting value. But it had been held that where there had been a change of tenancy after the improvements had been made, by the acceptance by the tenant or his predecessors in title of a new tenancy, all right to compensation for improvements made previously to such change of tenancy was at an end. It was to remedy this that clause 7 was introduced into the Act of 1881; and it provides for that case in express terms, and it is confined to that case, and deals only with tenants quitting their holdings and claiming compensation for improvements. Whether this tenant would come within its provisions it is not necessary to decide. That would depend (1) on the question whether the section is retrospective;" (2) on the effect to be given to the words "determination by surrender or otherwise," in the 1st clause of section 7, which is the only part of it applicable to this case. The rule is that enactments altering procedure are retrospective in their operation, but those interfering with vested rights are not so in default of specific legislation. [His Lordship referred to M'Arsey v. Hannan, 13 Ir. C. L. Rep. 70, stating that it was held in the Exchequer Chamber in that case that s. 8 of the L. & T. Act, 1860, was not retrospective.] That question was not argued, however, in the present case. As to whether the words "by surrender or otherwise" apply at all to a case where the lease expires by efflux of time, the very addition of those words after the word "determination" may be taken to point to the negative conclusion; why not stop with "surrender?" But, I express no opinion upon either of those questions, as it is not necessary to do so. Assuming that section 7 does apply, that would not change the property in the improvements. The right to claim compensation for improvements, and the obligation to pay, assume, and proceed on the assumption, that the improvements to be compensated for have become the property of the landlord, subject to the right of the tenant to compensation for them at the end of the tenancy. All that section 7 gives to the tenant is a right on quitting his holding to receive compensation for improvements made by his predecessors in title, and relief in asserting such right from the previous consequences of acceptance of a new tenancy after the improvements were made. But the tenant here is not quitting his holding. He is seeking to get a new lease of it for fifteen years, renewable toties quoties at a rent to be fixed by the Court. How can that contingent and future right, which may never be exercised, avail him to deprive the landlord of rent which he would otherwise be entitled to? It ought to be taken into account, under the 1st clause of section 8, as forming part of "the interest of the tenant" in the land in question. But it would be difficult to put any pecuniary value on it.

The Commissioners have not put any question to us as to the meaning of the words "predecessors in title" in section 9 of clause 8. But it has been considered as involved in this case, and therefore is put to us directly in one of the five questions submitted to us, and it has become necessary for me to state my opinion respecting it. I consider that those words should receive their ordinary legal interpretation. This sub-section involves the transfer of a large amount of property from landlords to tenants. Previously to the Act of 1881, all improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title became on the termination of the tenancy the property of the landlord, subject to the right of the tenant to get compensation for them. By this section the tenant gets the right to enjoy them for the statutable period without being charged any rent for them. That may be politic, wise and just, and I do not question its policy, its wisdom, or its justice. But I think that such a great change in the law, involving such serious consequences, ought not to be extended by construction beyond the legal signification of the words used by the legislature in effecting it. It ought not to be extended to cases not included in its terms, merely by inferences from another clause dealing with another subject-matter, and which is not referred to in it directly or indirectly. It is a rule in the construction of statutes that words of known legal import are to be considered as having been used in their technical sense or according to their strict interpretation, unless there appears a manifest intention of using them in their popular sense: Dwarris, p. 578; Poole v. Poole, 3 B. & P. 620; Jesson v. Wright, 2 Bligh, 56. As Lord Redesdale observes: "It is dangerous where words have a fixed legal effect, to suffer them to be controlled without some clear expression, or necessary implication." "It is a very safe rule of construction to adhere to the words of an Act according to their grammatical and natural sense, unless it appears clearly from the context they were intended to be used in some other sense:" per Parke, J., in Rex v. Ditchet, 9 B. & C. 186. The construction contended for must greatly extend the area of litigation between landlord and tenant; for it will, as O'Hagan, J., says, make the limit of the right of the tenant to improvements extend as far back as human testimony can be got, and will therefore give rise to increased litigation. The intention to effect this ought not to be lightly ascribed to the legislature by a strained construction of these words; I can only gather their intention from their words, and I cannot construe the words predecessors in title as if they were "predecessors in occupancy."

And now, with respect to the fixing of a fair rent and the ascertainment of compensation for improvements to the tenant, I think we cannot and ought not to lay down any rule, or enunciate any principle which can or ought to bind the Court in the exercise of the unlimited discretion as to both subjects vested in them by Parliament. By the final clause of section 8 (1) they are empowered and directed, "After hearing the parties, and having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively, and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, to determine what is the fair rent that should be paid." It is impossible to frame words giving a larger discretionary power. What authority have we to limit the Commissioners in the exercise of that power without which the Act could not be carried into practical operation? In the same way, by sub-section 9 they are invested with unlimited power to decide what amounts to compensation for improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title. They are to say in each case whether the tenant or his predecessors has or have "in their opinion," been compensated for improvements made by him or them. There also, as in ascertaining what is a fair rent, it is impossible to lay down any rule, or enunciate any principle as to what are to be elements which should enter into the formation of their opinion as to what is compensation. They may not state any principle, but their "opinion" on the matter is conclusive. The Court is an exceptional tribunal created by Parliament, and invested by it with the unlimited discretionary powers to which I have referred, in order to carry out the great objects of public policy which Parliament had in view, and for the effectuating of which it was necessary that the Judges of the new Court should possess those powers. The present Commissioners have been appointed by Parliament, and they have been provided with a numerous official staff to assist them in the discharge of their arduous duties. They are provided with Sub-Commissioners, whose duty is to go into the different localities, hear evidence on the spot, and inspect the holdings which are the subject of controversy. In cases of appeal, they can report the evidence taken before them to the Commissioners, who can take additional evidence. They have, besides, two official valuers, who make confidential reports to them respecting any holding which may be the subject of an appeal. Notwithstanding all that assistance, their duties are arduous and responsible. They have, as it were, to mediate between conflicting classes. But I am confident that they will discharge their duties with zeal, industry, and impartiality, actuated only by an anxious desire to do justice between landlord and tenant in all cases that may come before them.

FRIZGIBBON, L.J.—In consequence of observations which the Lord Chancellor has thought it necessary to make, I wish to state, at the outset, that my judgment and all my remarks in this case proceed upon the assumption that the holding in question was not proved to be subject to any usage capable of affecting the ascertainment of a fair rent. I make this assumption because no such usage is mentioned in the special case, nor during three days' argument has it been referred to at the bar, and also because question No. 4 upon the case is founded upon the applicability of part of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, which in terms relates only to those tenants who are not entitled to compensation under the tenant-right sections 1 and 2, or who do not make any claim under either of those sections. If, therefore, the holding of David Adams be subject to any usage regulating or affecting the determination of its fair rent, the case has been stated under a misapprehension of the law applicable to it, or in the attempt, always difficult and dangerous, to obtain a decision of abstract principles for general application upon the facts of a single case, special rights of the individual litigants have been ignored. It may be that, owing to the lease or otherwise, no usage affected this holding, or it may be that no substantial difference of rights is involved in the distinction; and I am not aware that any variety of the Ulster custom excludes or affects the right of the landlord to a fairly valued rent, ascertainable from time to time upon principles at least analogous to those guiding the determination of a fair rent under the Act of 1881.

Upon the first question of law which we have eliminated from the case, I have to declare my concurrence in the unanimous judgment of this Court upon the error which seems to pervade the whole decision of the Land Commission, arising from the confusion of the term "improvements" with the increase of letting value consequent upon them, and to emphasise my own opinion of the practical importance of observing the distinction which the majority of the Commissioners have hitherto overlooked. The existence of the mistake appears most plainly upon the judgment of Mr. Litton, who states the matter as a definite problem in subtraction. He says: "The competition value, less by the good-will arising from actual occupation, I call the commercial value of the holding." "From the result thus ascertained must be deducted the amount which the improvements of the tenant or his predecessors in title have contributed to the present letting value." "The question is, to what extent has the letting value been increased by the improvement, if at all? Deducting the latter, when ascertained, from the former, we get a result which ought to represent a fair rent." This result he calls "the commercial value, reduced by the value of the tenant's interest in his improvements." In justice to Mr. Litton, it is to be observed that he seems to have fallen into this mistake by adopting the language of the parliamentary paper which he quotes; but though the Judicial Commissioner does not refer to the same guide for the interpretation of the statute, Mr. Justice O'Hagan distinctly adopted Mr. Litton's conclusion. He says: "Let us take the case of two neighbouring tenants holding under lease for the same term and at the same rent, say £80 a year each. One tenant, by industry and outlay, effects improvements which make the holding worth £60 a year; the other does not improve at all, and his holding remains worth £80. At the end of the lease is the landlord, under this Act, to be entitled to assess the improving man at the full letting value of his holding, on the plea that he had compensated him? It seems to me that this would simply be a judicial repeal of the clause. In this view Mr. Litton concurs; but I regret to say that our colleague Mr. Vernon does not take the same view, and thinks that our construction would work great injustice and hardship upon landlords." I am very far indeed from holding that a landlord could, in the case put, be entitled to assess the improving tenant at the full letting value of his holding, or in any ordinary case at any rent nearly approaching it; but the construction which Mr. Litton has stated, and in which the Judicial Commissioner has concurred, would give to the tenant in the case put the whole increase of letting value consequent upon his improvements, namely, £80 a year, wholly irrespective of their cost or value. The injustice and hardship of such a construction, which was not only apparent to Mr. Vernon, but was pointed out by Mr. Butt, especially in paragraphs 147, 193, and 194 of his remarkable work, may be easily illustrated by one or two examples:—Every improvement must to some extent, greater or less, depend for its return upon the holding on which the improving work is executed; but the contribution from the holding, as distinguished from that from the work, may, according to circumstances, vary from almost nothing to the largest part of the profit. In the case of a house, the building is generally almost the whole source of the increased letting value; yet, even there the landlord is entitled to so much of the rent of the house as is derived from its site; and as similar houses in different situations bring in, by reason of their situations, different returns upon the outlay incurred in building them, even in such cases the proportion of such return which is justly attributable to the landlord's interest may largely vary. But take other classes of improvements. Two tenants holding at the same rent expend each the same amount of industry, skill and money upon drainage or reclamation. The letting value of the one holding—poor, thankless soil, or disadvantageously circumstanced—is increased by £50 a year; while in the other case the land, from its inherent qualities, or its more favourable circumstances, returns three or four times as much. The capital invested by the tenant in the improvement is in each case the same; the difference of return arises from the utilisation of advantages, or the development of resources, in which the landlord has the largest if not the whole interest. As a matter of fact, such advantages and resources are not paid for in advance; but when they are utilised and developed the landlord becomes entitled to his fair share of the return from them; yet, the decision before us would stereotype the maximum interest of the landlord in his property as its letting value at the worst point to which evidence could carry back the description of its condition. It is not for us to determine the amount of rent in any case, but we may direct attention to the large proportion of the letting value which in the present instance seems to be affected by the erroneous principle of the judgment, and to the large proportion of the rental which may be involved in its correction. Mr. Justice O'Hagan tells us that, according to the evidence of the tenant's valuers, §22 2s. 8d. only was the letting value, excluding the improvements, of the lands which, if in the hands of the landlord, might be worth §44, while the official valuers fixed the setting value of the land as it stood (excluding the buildings altogether) at £87 10s., and in the opinion of the learned Judge an allowance for such only of the improvements as were made during the lease would reduce the rent of £87 10s. at the least to the "judicial rent" of £30 15s. The proportion of value attributable to the improvements, therefore, varies from nearly 50 per cent. to over 20 per cent. (excluding the house) of the gross letting value of the holding. It will, of course, be understood that before any part of this difference is allowed to the landlord, the Land Commission should estimate the present value of the improving works, or, as Mr. Butt well expresses it, should ascertain what would it cost the landlord to put the farm into its present condition, supposing the improvements had never been executed, and upon that amount the improving tenant is entitled to a just and, I would add, a liberal return, while (except in respect of considerations of reduction and compensation) the landlord should not be allowed any rent whatever. In respect of the full present value of the additional capital which his improvements have added to the holding, the tenant should be scrupulously protected in the enjoyment of a just and even of an ample return, but, after this has been provided for, the landlord is equally entitled to the return derived from the more active and profitable use of his interest in the holding.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

I guard myself, as the Master of the Rolls has done, from saying that the whole surplus profit belongs to the landlord, as I do not desire to prejudge the question which is not now before us, but which may hereafter arise, whether the tenant under the Acts of 1870 and 1881 has not an interest in the holding over and above his statutory tenure and his rights to compensation. Thus far, however, our unanimous statement of the rule appears to me to lead—the landlord is entitled, as part of the fair rent of the holding, to so much of any increase of letting value consequent upon improvements, after making a fair return to the tenant upon the value of the improving works, as is derived from the utilisation of the landlord's interest in the inherent qualities, advantages, and resources of the holding. Of course, I have hitherto discussed the landlord's right independently of any additional allowance to which he may be entitled under the provisions as to compensation, and of any reduction of the tenant's right by reason of enjoyment, under the provisions applicable to particular classes of improvements.

Upon the next question, namely, Whether the terms "tenant or his predecessors in title," in section 8, sub-section 9, have the same meaning as in section 7 of the Act of 1881, I concur in result with the Master of the Rolls and the Chief Baron, upon considerations also applicable to the 3rd question, "Whether the provisions of the final paragraph of the Act of 1870, section 4, are applicable to such improvements in determining fair rent under the Act of 1881, section 8?" The statutes of 1870 and 1881 are not merely in pari materia; they are, under section 57 of the latter Act, "to be construed together as one Act," except where inconsistent. Wherever the amount of fair rent is to be determined, the first duty imposed upon the Court is to "have regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." I cannot proceed to ascertain those interests while a tenancy continues, upon any other principles than those which are to regulate them if the tenant quits his holding. No other interest of the tenant anywhere appears upon the Acts than that for which he should receive compensation, or the true value of which should be ascertained, if he were quitting his holding or selling his tenancy under the landlord's power of pre-emption. What under his power of sale he can sell is only what he possesses himself; and this, upon quitting his holding, he must give to his landlord, upon the terms of receiving the judicially ascertained "true value," or the statutory compensation. Though the compensation on quitting is limited in certain cases where the true value ascertainable on sale is not, yet, in all events, whether the tenant quits his holding, or keeps it in his own hands, or sells to his landlord, or to a purchaser in the open market, I cannot see that the tenant's interest in the holding must not be valued and considered as subject either to a fair rent, payable at the time, or to the liability to have the present rent altered at any moment to a fair rent; and the first element of the value of the holding must be the amount of the rent to which it is fairly liable. Therefore, I cannot understand how the true value of that interest can be ascertained otherwise than by determining the fair rent, and valuing the tenancy as practically charged with the amount of that fair rent. If, and as far as, any improvements may have ceased to be the subject of compensation on quitting, or to be included in the property for which the landlord must pay the true value if he exercises his power of pre-emption, so far also must they be, as it seems to me, treated as having ceased to be included in that "interest of the tenant" to which, in ascertaining the fair rent, the court is directed to have regard; and so far, as a necessary consequence, must regard be had to them as part of the landlord's interest, and as pro tanto a source of fair rent. Thus, as it seems to me, without express words, but by necessary implication, we are obliged to read the provisions of section 4 of the Act of 1870 as incorporated with section 7 of the Act of 1881, and both as included in the elements of the respective interests of the landlord and tenant, to which, in fixing a fair rent under section 8, the Court must have regard. The impossibility of consistently divorcing the elements of fair rent from those of compensation, or of construing the terms "tenant or his predecessors in title," differently in section 7 and in section 8, sub-section 9, was, to my mind, demonstrated by the cross-arguments into which counsel at both sides were driven upon the two sections, by the attempt to construe each section in the sense most favourable to their respective clients. Sergeant Hemphill was compelled to contend that a tenant, so long as he held his tenancy, was entitled to appropriate for nothing the value of improvements for which, if he were quitting his holding, he could not claim any compensation; while Mr. Holmes was forced to argue that the landlord was entitled, during the tenancy, to rent upon the value of improvements for which, if the tenancy were determined, he must pay full compensation to the tenant. In truth, the fair rent, and the allowance as against that rent for improvements, are, as it seems to me, but the annual equivalents, calculated with regard to present value and future enjoyment, for the capital values of the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively, which, upon the severance of their interests would be ascertained in fixing compensation. But in addition to these considerations, I think, as a matter of verbal construction, that in the 1st paragraph of section 7, in the mention of the "tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made by such tenant or his predecessors in title," the term "predecessors in title" must mean those who held the tenancy before such a determination of a subsisting tenancy, and such an acceptance of a new tenancy as is dealt with by the section; and I cannot think that the same words, when used without any apparent reason for discarding the effect of section 7 in the subsequent provision, section 8, sub-section 9, of the same statute can be construed as unaffected by the previous clause. It is quite a different matter, upon which I am sorry to say I must more fully explain myself hereafter, what is the effect of section 7, what is the nature of the break in the title which is within its operation, and what is the continuity of title which, notwithstanding its provisions, must still subsist to satisfy the other provisions of both the Acts. For the present, I hold that section 7 regulates the effect to be given to the terms "tenant or his predecessors in title" as used in section 8, sub-section 9, but at the same time I stop far short of the conclusion that section 7 practically abolishes the necessity for tracing title, renders continuity of title in a defined tenancy immaterial, or reduces the meaning of succession in title to mere succession of occupancy in the capacity of tenant. I, also, hold that the term "tenant" is used throughout the Acts not to designate merely the same person, but a person who at the different periods in question fulfils the character of tenant of the same holding under such a title as the Acts deem continuous. No one could, under any circumstances, in my opinion, claim, as "tenant" for works done by himself for which, if the holding had passed to a successor, such successor could not claim. Suppose, for example, A. B. executed works upon a holding and was evicted, or surrendered, and the holding was afterwards relet to C. D. under a new contract of tenancy, A. B. could not, on becoming C. D.'s successor in the new tenancy, claim to have any benefit under section 8, sub-section 9, to which C. D. was not entitled, nor call for a disallowance of rent on the ground that the improvements had been executed by himself as tenant at a former time.

The third question is little more than a corollary to the second question, upon what I will call the principle of uniform and consistent interpretation applied to both Acts. The final clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870 is not repealed; section 7 of the Act of 1881 expressly deals with rights to compensation under the Act of 1870, and no such right could escape the operation of that clause; therefore, a provision which confers no new right, but in terms only saves the tenant from the deprivation of a right otherwise conferred, cannot exclude restrictions which were concomitant upon that right from its origin. Then if the prohibition to allow rent in respect of improvements must, as I think it must, apply only to the tenant's interest in those improvements, and if that interest is for the purpose of fixing a fair rent to be ascertained by reference to the amount which would compensate the tenant for it if he were quitting his holding, it follows that the third question must be answered in the affirmative.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

The fourth question eliminated by us is substantially the same as the fifth question stated in the special case, abstracting considerations of fact, and adding the important words "by the landlord," which were omitted from the case. Upon this question I entertain a clear and unqualified opinion in favour of the tenant. The question is, "Whether the enjoyment, during the currency of a lease, of improvements made by a tenant during such lease is a compensation for such improvements by the landlord within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881?" The question does not apply to reductions of the tenant's claim under the final clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870, nor to cases in which improvements made during a lease are in whole or in part brought within the consideration of the contract for making the lease; and otherwise I hold it impossible that the tenant's title to the protection of the sub-section can be in anywise diminished by his enjoyment of all the profits which, by improvements or otherwise, he can lawfully make out of his leasehold, or that such enjoyment can be regarded as in any degree compensation by the landlord. When the landlord makes the lease, he wholly parts, in consideration of the rent and covenants, with all his interest during the term, as well in any capacity for improvement which the holding may possess as in all the other incidents of its use and occupation. Whatever the tenant during his term can lawfully derive from his holding is his own, and though the profits of his improvements may more than compensate him for his outlay, yet this compensation is only the reward of his own industry, skill, or capital applied to property which for the term of the demise is his own; and I think their full enjoyment so long as the lease lasts cannot be regarded as in any degree a compensation by the landlord. Though the Land Commission has not asked the much more important question which the facts of the case raised—whether the same principle must apply after the lease expires, the judgments of Mr. Justice O'Hagan and of Mr. Litton contain statements upon that subject so inconsistent with my view of the law, that, in order to prevent my answer to the question put from being misapplied or misunderstood, I feel bound to make some observations by way of caution, on a subject with which the Master of the Rolls and Chief Justice Morris have already dealt. In my judgment, the words "paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title," in their plain sense and in justice, include payment with the landlord's money, or compensation out of the landlord's property. A cash payment is contrasted with compensation by other means, and I think the terms include every form and manner of recoupment which the tenant receives, at the hands of his landlord, out of his landlord's pocket, or out of his landlord's estate, as an equivalent for his improvements. When the landlord, not being bound to do so by the terms of the tenancy or otherwise, permits an improving tenant to enjoy his holding at a rent below the fair letting value, and such permission is, under all the circumstances, referable to the tenant's improvements, it is justly to be regarded as pro tanto a compensation by the landlord for the tenant's improvements—always, however, safeguarding in the first instance to the tenant a fair return for the value of those improvements, as part of the tenant's capital added to the holding. I agree that the Court may or may not infer, from the acts of the parties and the circumstances of any particular case, that the tenant's enjoyment is or is not to be regarded as compensation, but I dissent from the principle that the words "paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord" must mean "either actual payment, or some positive and direct consideration moving from the landlord to the tenant;" or that "occupation as tenant from year to year, after the expiration of a lease, cannot be deemed compensation, unless it be expressly shown that such occupation was permitted with direct regard to the antecedent improvements, and for the purpose of compensation." The question whether the tenant has been "compensated by the landlord" is in the very terms of the section one to be determined by "the opinion of the Court"—an elastic expression which seems to me inapplicable to the determination of a question of actual payment or of definite contract, but to be quite apposite to a matter resting upon the result of "considering all the circumstances of the case." The tenant must receive "something given or done or foregone" by the landlord as an equivalent for the improvements; but, I can conceive no reason for declining to find adequate evidence of compensation in the act of a landlord who gives over to an improving tenant, because he is an improving tenant, the soil with all its natural powers, at a price so far below its fair letting value of the landlord's interest as to recoup the tenant for his improvements. I cannot agree with Mr. Justice O'Hagan that the tenant under this rule would be "worse off under the Act of 1881 than he was under the Act of 1870." Under the final clause of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, as regards improvements made before the passing of the Act (to which improvements alone the clause applies), the Court must, in reduction of the tenant's claim, take into consideration the time during which he may have enjoyed the advantages of the improvements, whether enjoyed under a lease or other tenancy at a fixed rent or not; whereas, under the Act of 1881, the question of compensation can only arise in respect of advantages derived by the tenant from the landlord's voluntary permission to hold the lands at a rent so far below the fair letting value of the landlord's own interest therein as to afford to the tenant an equivalent for his improvements, which rent it is in the power of the landlord to increase.

There remains the question to which I am obliged to give the most ample consideration, on account of my position with respect to the differences of opinion existing upon it, viz., "Whether the lease of the 2nd of March, 1846, excludes the tenant from any interest in respect of the improvements made before the execution of that lease, in the ascertainment of the fair rent of the holding under the Act of 1881?" The principle upon which three members of the Court are enabled to construe the words "predecessors in title" in section 8, sub-section 9, as unaffected by section 7 of the Act of 1881 for them answers this question in the affirmative, independently of the special circumstances of the particular case, as the decision in Holt v. Harberton rules the point directly, unless the 7th section takes effect. The decision in which six members of the Court concur, and by which the final clause of section 4 of the Act of 1870 is applied to, and must in any case reduce any claim of the tenant, and confer upon the landlord a right to some rent in respect of the improvements made before the lease, now nearly forty years ago, brings down the amount dependent upon this question, as between David Adams and Jane Dunseath, at most, to some paltry figure. I farther understand the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief Baron to concur in the view which I am about to state, to this extent, that they hold that if the Land Commission should agree in my conclusions of fact, the lease should be treated as the terminus from which the tenant's rights must be taken to commence; and that the landlord must in that case be allowed a full and fair rent upon the present value of the house built in 1844. The difference which I understand to exist between them and me upon this question is, that upon the facts stated in this special case I feel bound to draw, or rather I find drawn, an inference of fact as to the nature and effect of the transactions connected with the granting of the lease, which, while not indicating any opinion that it should not be drawn, they think that the Land Commission, which has the exclusive jurisdiction to decide questions of fact, has not decided upon the case, nor do they think that facts enough have been stated to reduce it to a question of law. With all the doubt and deference with which I must at any time put forward an opinion of my own differing from that entertained by my respected colleagues, I am driven to the opinion that a very serious question of principle is at stake, on which I cannot concur with their conclusion. Section 7 is, in my opinion, a provision of limited and defined operation. I think that it does not, either for its own purposes or in its reflex effect upon section 8, sub-section 9, require us to disregard continuity of title, or to dispense with the necessity of tracing title altogether, except only in the case of defined, limited, and mainly technical or formal breaks arising from changes of tenancy or of tenants, not amounting to the creation of new holdings or tenancies in freshly defined subject-matter actually contemplated as such. The 1st paragraph of section 7 deals with the case where the same tenant holds in succession what are no doubt legally different tenancies. The 2nd paragraph deals with the case where different persons have, in like manner, in succession held legally different tenancies. The 3rd paragraph provides that in both cases the Court shall consider all the circumstances, and shall thereupon admit, reduce, or disallow altogether the tenant's claim, as to the Court may seem just; and it describes the events dealt with in both the previous paragraphs, and with which alone the section is conversant, as "such change of tenancy or of tenants." It seems to me that the key to the whole section must be found in limiting its operations to changes of tenancy or of tenants in subject-matter, that is to say, in holdings, which are really continuous, and which remain substantially and in the contemplation of the parties the same. The definitions of "holding," "contract of tenancy," "tenancy," and "tenant" are relative and dependent upon each other, and their connexion depends, in my opinion, upon the identity in reality and substance, of the holding. Every "holding" as the subject-matter of a "tenancy," must, for the purposes of the Act, in my opinion, have some definite commencement, and this must be found in a transaction by which its identity is ascertained or declared by the contract, or according to the contemplation of the parties. Whatever works exist upon a holding must, whenever that holding in its existing state is defined as the subject-matter of a new tenancy, cease to be any longer regarded as "improvements." An "improvement" is defined as a work "which adds to the letting value of the holding on which it is executed;" and it would be a contradiction in terms to hold that a work was an improvement of a holding which was at any time incorporated with that holding as an integral part of the holding itself. Now, in the present case what are the facts stated? Before 1842, 20a. 2r. 21p. of land were in the occupation of James M'Kee, who held as tenant under the Earl of Mountcashel, but at what rent did not appear, and under what tenure is not stated. In 1842 these lands were valued at £26 11s. 6d., which sum was paid by M'Kee from the time of the valuation, and he therefore appears to have been tenant from year to year at that rent from 1842 to the commencement of his lease. About 1844 the house was built, partly with the materials of an older house previously existing on the holding (a fact which alone would show that the total disallowance of rent to the landlord in respect of the building is erroneous). Prior to the building, the agent offered a lease to M'Kee, who "understood that he could have the lease if he liked." On that understanding he built the house; and Mr. Justice O'Hagan in his judgment tells us that it is admitted that when he did so "the lease was contemplated." Thereupon, on this understanding, and after completing the house, M'Kee took and executed a lease for thirty years from November 1st, 1845, in express terms demising the farm "with all houses and buildings thereunto belonging, as then in his actual occupation," with the usual covenant to keep and yield up the buildings in repair. I can give no other meaning to this transaction than that it was a complete and definite creation of a new tenancy in a holding which was then by contract, and in the actual contemplation of both parties at the time, expressly identified as comprising the house as an integral part of its subject-matter. Even taken it for granted (for the moment only) that section 7 would be otherwise applicable, could M'Kee, if he were now tenant under a tenancy from year to year arising on the expiration of that lease, claim to go behind the lease itself under the language of the 1st paragraph of section 7? I am of opinion that he could not, and it follows that his successor under the lease cannot do so either. The language of the paragraph is strictly negative:—The tenant "shall not be deprived of his right to receive compensation for improvements by reason only of the determination of the tenancy subsisting at the time when such improvements were made, and the acceptance by him of a new tenancy." I hold that M'Kee could have no right to receive compensation for works as improvements which, by the terms of the instrument creating his tenancy and in his own actual contemplation, were an integral part of the holding itself, and included in its original definition. It seems to me to be in itself a sufficient answer to the attempt to apply the 7th section to the case of the improvements made before the lease, that M'Kee never had any right in respect of them, and therefore neither he nor his successors could be aided by an enactment that he should not be deprived of any right which he possessed. But even assuming the right to exist, the tenant seems to me to be met by another insuperable obstacle, for upon the facts stated he would be deprived of that right not "by reason only of the determination of the tenancy subsisting when the improvements were made, and the acceptance of a new tenancy," but by the express terms and essential elements of that new tenancy itself as evidenced by the lease creating it, which expressly declares the existing house to be part of the subject-matter of the demise, at least when coupled with the fact that the granting of the lease and the inclusion of the house in the holding was actually "contemplated" before the house was built. I wish to guard myself against resting my opinion either on the terms of the lease alone or only on the contemplation of the building by the parties when the lease was granted, but both these elements concurring, seem to me conclusive as well as to the form as also as to the substance of the transaction creating the leasehold tenancy in 1846, and mark the lease as the terminus of all the tenant's rights in this case. That the 7th section was not intended to apply to cases where any real ascertainment of, or any essential alteration in, the holding has taken place, seems to me further demonstrated by the 2nd paragraph of the section. There the language is as qualified and as negative as in the 1st: "Where, in tracing a title, it appears that an outgoing tenant has surrendered his tenancy in order that some other person may be accepted as tenant in his place, and such other person is so accepted as tenant, the outgoing tenant shall not be precluded from being deemed the predecessor in title of the incoming tenant by reason only of such surrender of tenancy by him." This provision is conversant expressly with the tracing of a title, thus implying some definite origin and some ascertained subject-matter, and it merely protects the incoming tenant from being precluded by reason only of the fact that the tenancy of which the title is so traced has, in the course of its devolution, been momentarily and formally surrendered to the landlord, for the mere purpose of enabling one person to take the place of another in the position of tenant under a tenancy substantially the same. I have neither the jurisdiction nor the intention to discuss the nature or extent of the changes, such for example as variations of rent, additions of one holding to another, or the like, which may be justly brought within the operation of the section. What I do hold is that it was not intended to enable, and that it does not enable, a tenant who has accepted a definite and settled tenancy upon the terms of an express written letting describing his holding, as he understood and contemplated it to be, afterwards to go behind the instrument creating his tenancy, and to say that part of the subject-matter of the letting was no part of it at all, but on the contrary was "an improvement" executed upon it, giving him a right to receive compensation from his landlord on quitting, with a concurrent right to hold the property in the meantime free of rent. But there is, also, an express provision of the Act of 1870 which seems to me to answer the contention of the tenant upon this lease. Those of us who hold that the final clause of section 4 operates to control the Act of 1881 must also hold the other provisions of the same section, where applicable, to have a like operation. Now, section 4, proviso 2, excludes a tenant of a holding under a lease or written contract, made before the passing of the Act, from compensation in respect of any improvement his right to which compensation is expressly excluded by such lease or contract. This provision cannot be restricted to an express exclusion of rights under the Act, for, as it applies only to leases made before the passing of the Act, except prophetically such rights could not be excluded. It must, therefore, extend to every case in which the claim to compensation is inconsistent with the express terms of the written instrument. Now, in my opinion, the declaration contained in this lease that the house is part of the holding, and is included in the subject-matter of demise, and the covenant to give up the house at the end of the term, is an express declaration that it is not to be regarded as an improvement, and therefore I think this lease is inconsistent with a claim for compensation going behind its date and terms. It is notable that even if the lease had expired after the Act of 1881 had come into force, the same argument would apply, under section 21 of that Act, which provides that "any leases or other contracts of tenancy existing at the date of the passing of this Act shall remain in force to the same extent as if this Act had not passed, and holdings subject to such existing leases shall be regulated by the lawful provisions contained in the said leases, and not by the provisions relating to tenancies in that behalf contained in this Act." It seems to me an impossible construction which would, because this lease expired between 1870 and 1881, disallow the landlord's claim to rent upon the house, though the lawful provisions of the lease would regulate his right, in exclusion of the statute, if it had lasted until the Act of 1881 had been passed. There is another observation which I do not wish to be supposed to have overlooked, though I do not rest my judgment on it. It is not clear to me that section 7 of the Act of 1881 ought to be treated as retrospective, not only in preserving rights which might have accrued under the Act of 1870 after its passing, but also in creating rights, at earlier dates, which otherwise could not have arisen, or that we ought to carry back the provisions of the statute as amended to the most remote periods of time from which evidence can be brought down, as if it had never taken effect in its original form. It would require further argument than the matter has yet received to satisfy me that, upon the principles applicable to such legislation, we are justified in giving any further ex post facto operation to a statute transferring rights from one person to another, beyond that which a strict fulfilment of its literal terms requires. I am confirmed in my view of the effect of section 7 by a reference to the judicial decision which led to its enactment. The judgment of the majority of the Court in Holt v. Harberton, in the language of Lord O'Hagan, who delivered it, was at least wide enough to cover the principle that any formal determination of a subsisting tenancy, though followed by the acceptance by the same person, or by another person in his place, of a new tenancy substantially the same, regardless of the absence of intention to entail any change either in the subject-matter of the tenancy or in the rights of the parties, would amount to an extinguishment of the title, and a destruction of all rights annexed to it. But in truth the facts of Holt v. Harberton necessitated the adoption of no such sweeping principle. I have before me the original case stated, upon which it appears that the lease there in question comprised about ninety-two acres of additional land, of which the family of the lessee had not been previously in possession, and that the rent reserved by the lease was considerably less than the combined rents previously paid for all the lands, as well the original holding as the additional lands. The evidence stated on the case as to the circumstances under which the lease was granted is most material. After the house was built the agent went over it, told the tenant that he would endeavour to get him a lease from Lord Harberton on account of the house, and said that "he would get him a lease in consequence of having built the house, at the then present rent." The agent afterwards "asked Lord Harberton would he not give the tenant a lease in consideration of this house;" "he represented the house as finished, and urged on Lord Harberton to give him a lease, and Lord Harberton then consented to give him a lease." This oral evidence is set out in terms on the special case, and followed by this paragraph:—"The several matters stated in the foregoing evidence are for the purposes of this case to be assumed to be true." The questions reserved are, "Whether the existing lease is the terminus from which the improvements claimed by the appellant are to be allowed or disallowed?" and "Whether the appellant, upon the facts and the law, is disallowed from claiming compensation under the statute for the building of the dwelling-house on the lands demised?" One member of the Court, the Lord Chief Baron, while concurring in the general judgment, based his decision, as upon this point I am now doing, on "the transactions by which the lease was obtained." I am satisfied that the same considerations which weighed with him in Holt v. Harberton must still be taken into account under the 7th section of the Act of 1881, and that that section was not intended to create or save rights to compensation displaced by the principles of substance and of justice enunciated by the Chief Baron (Pigot), and not merely by the general principle sanctioned by the majority of the Court. With scarcely an alteration I apply Chief Baron Pigot's language to this case, and adopt it as my judgment upon the question now under consideration. I rest my judgment mainly on the transactions by which the lease was obtained. I think we are entitled to look into those transactions, because we are entitled to ascertain what was the subject-matter of the new contract of tenancy created by that lease. I am satisfied that in the present case these transactions created a perfectly new relation between the parties, lessor and lessee, by creating a subject-matter of a perfectly new contract in 1846. I think it precluded the person who took that lease, and all deriving under him by that title, from setting up any claim for any benefit resulting from the building of the house which formed part of the subject-matter of the new lease. I think that to permit the lessee, or anyone succeeding him in title, to claim any further benefit from the building of that house would be inconsistent with the transactions and contract, and in effect would work a fraud upon the transaction and contract by which the entire holding, including this house, was demised by the lease, and is now enjoyed by the claimant.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

ADAMS v. DUNSMATH.

In the interpretation of those statutes we cannot act, with the same confidence as in most other cases, upon the rule which is usually a safe guide—namely, that vested rights and vested property ought not to be disturbed, but at least we ought not to divest such rights or property unless the language of the statute plainly directs or necessarily implies that this shall be done. Mr. Litton defines the duty of the Court, in reference to the ascertainment of fair rent, in language which I find it hard to reconcile with his decision, but which commends itself to me as applicable to our own duty, and descriptive of the principle which ought to guide us to our decision. "To act otherwise," he says, "would be to transfer the property, or a portion of the property of one class to the other class, and to no extent ought this to be done. If it is our duty to recognise the tenant's interest, it is equally our duty to recognise that of the landlord, and we are bound by the highest consideration of duty to administer an Act which was intended to secure right in such a manner as that it may not become in our hands the instrument of wrong." So far as the Act clearly leads me, I neither criticise its policy, hesitate to follow its directions, nor regard its consequences; but where I find the language involved negative and doubtful, I am bound, in seeking its true meaning, to consider the consequences of the opposing constructions, and to prefer that which leads to apparent justice as the true meaning of the legislature. For this purpose only, let us see the practical result of holding that the lease of 1846 did not define, as from a new starting-point, the subject-matter of M'Kee's tenancy. Having built the house, and got the lease for a term of thirty years from the 1st of November, 1846, M'Kee, on the 27th of October, 1846, with the approbation of the landlord, sold, and once and for all assigned away all his interest in the holding to John Adams for the agreed sum of £240. For that sum, subject to the rent and covenants, Adams acquired the house and holding for the residue of the term, but not as the law then stood for a day longer, nor in fixing his price did he buy or pay for any right or title whatsoever lasting beyond the 1st of November, 1875. On the 13th of April, 1851, William Dunseath on the other hand, under judicial sanction, and through a Parliamentary conveyance, purchased for £6,000 all the freehold interest for ever in the holding, subject during its term to the lease. In this price he paid for, and under that conveyance he acquired, the absolute interest in the house from and after the 1st of November, 1875. Any answer other than that which I have given to the question now under consideration would, at the least, place it in the power of the Land Commission to give this house for ever free of rent to a tenant who never bought it, and to disallow to the landlord for ever all title to rent from it, though thirty years ago he bought and paid for it at its full value, and had it conveyed to him by a Court under the sanction of a statute, and though after the passing of the Act of 1870 he fixed the terms of a new tenancy under a law which, under the then settled judicial interpretation of the statute, precluded the tenant from then claiming it as an improvement. Even with the palliative of the final clause of the 4th section of the Act of 1870, this is the result of the judgments which, while I am forced to differ from them, are most near to my own conclusion. But the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, as I understand it, and the decision of the Judicial Commissioner and

Mr. Litton, would leave no discretion in the matter, but would hold that this momentous transfer of vested property has been absolutely made by section 8, sub-section 9. In my opinion, the statute did not contemplate and does not effectuate such a result; and even if there were less room for doubt, I should hold it my duty, against everything except such plain words as might easily have been used to preclude questions, so to read the law as to avoid the result I mention.

In this case the amount involved is small, but (in the way I have indicated) we should see the consequences of admitting the principle of the decision. Mr. Justice O'Hagan meets the argument that his construction "would sweep away from the landlord's rent all improvements that, from time immemorial, have been executed on the soil, and leave nothing subject to rent but the waste and unimproved value of the land itself," by saying that "such an apprehension appears to me chimerical." "In the first place," he says, "the fact of the improvements themselves requires to be proved." Dealing as we are, with buildings, I apprehend those buildings, however old, will prove themselves, and so remove that difficulty. "In the next place," he says, "as regards all improvements made before the 1st of August, 1870, there are distinct limits placed to the presumption that such improvements were made by the tenant or his predecessor in title, and everything outside the statutory presumption must be proved; and although a formal surrender and acceptance of a new tenancy would no longer form a break in the title, yet the title must in reality and substance be traced from the tenant who executed the improvements to the tenant who claims in respect of them." As to the latter portion of this sentence, I need not again explain that in terms I concur with this statement of the law, and that the difference between Mr. Justice O'Hagan and myself is in our estimate of what is "a formal surrender and acceptance of a new tenancy" and what is "in reality and substance" the creation of a new title. My present concern is with the effect of relying on presumption to meet the consequences of the doctrine that a lease in terms defining the subject-matter of a demise, admitted to be contemplated as such by both parties at the time, is not the terminus from which all claims for compensation must commence. Presumption will arise only in the absence of evidence. The humble and illiterate tenant from year to year, not improbably the successor of generations of tenants occupying the same holding, under substantially the same tenancy, will be met and will be defeated by the presumption, so far as he cannot overcome it by the oral testimony of the oldest witnesses whom he can produce, though the facts, if capable of proof, might lay a just ground for a legal claim. But, what is to be done in the case of the great number of most valuable holdings which, throughout Ireland, have for long periods of years (extending, even in cases within my own experience, to centuries) been held under leases immediately succeeding each other, whether under powers of renewal at the tenant's option or otherwise, without any break in occupancy? If the present occupant under the last of a series of such leases were, at its expiration, to decline to take another, and to call upon the Land Commission to fix a fair rent for his holding, the successive leases would negative occupation by the landlord, and would afford evidence of continuous occupation by a tenant for the time being throughout the whole period. The existence of the buildings, their apparent age, and their present value, could be proved at once, and then Mr. Litton's rule of deducting that present value from the commercial value of the holding, as defined by him, being applied, I apprehend that the result would logically follow, leaving no room for presumption, that the transactions of ages must be disregarded, and the rent must be fixed upon the assumption that the tenant who held a "present tenancy" at the passing of the Act of 1881 is entitled to hold all the buildings on his holding absolutely rent free for ever, though none of his predecessors (including those who had erected those buildings) had ever enjoyed any such advantage. I think the construction of the statute leading to such a result ought not to be adopted unless unambiguously prescribed. I may remark that Mr. Litton, with Mr. Justice O'Hagan, refers only to the effect of "presumption from lapse of time," as moderating this effect of the statute of 1881. "When actual proof is given" (as, in the case I put, it would be by the documents of title), he says, "no length of time precludes the tenant from insisting that no rent shall be charged in respect of them."

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

It has been said by the Lord Chief Baron that the construction I adopt should equally exclude the tenant from the benefit of section 8, sub-section 9, in respect of the improvements made during the lease, as in respect of those made before its execution, on the ground that a second break in the title occurred in 1875, when the lease was succeeded by a tenancy from year to year at a different rent. My answer is that here (even apart from the considerations arising on the written instrument of 1846) the facts are not found, and it is for the Land Commission to decide whether there was, or was not, in 1875 any substantial consideration by both parties of their position and of their rights, or any new definition of the subject-matter of the holding, such as the transactions ending in the granting of the lease constituted in 1846, or whether there was anything more than a continuation of substantially the same tenancy, in the same hands, with a mere re-adjustment of rent, but with no consideration of rights or contemplation of their alteration or surrender. In 1875 the tenant had a vested right to compensation for his improvements made during the currency of the lease. Though the lands were valued, and the valuer stated to the Commissioners that, "he took no improvements into consideration, but kept the improvements out," the case does not authorise us (as that in Holt v. Harborton did) to assume that this evidence is true, while the exclusion of the improvements from rent might have been counterbalanced by the increase of the amount of rent from £26 11s. 6d. to £31 17s. 6d. I have, therefore, no means of determining whether in 1875 there was or was not that deliberate contemplation and determination by the landlord and tenant of their respective interests, or that actual and substantial creation of a new tenancy which would constitute the commencement of the tenancy from year to year in 1875 as the root of a new and distinct title or as a terminus from which the tenant's present rights and claims must take their origin. For the reasons I have already given, I think the granting of the lease of 1846 was such a terminus and origin, and therefore I answer the last question in the negative; but as to the transactions of 1875 I can draw no conclusion.

While remitting the case with our answers to the Court of the Land Commission, I think it necessary (lest I should be taken to accept the observations of Mr. Justice O'Hagan on the subject) to say that I can in no sense regard the determination of a fair rent as a "question of fact," within the meaning of Lord Chelmsford's dictum in Gray v. Turnbull, L. R. 2 H. L. 53. In the report of that case it appears that the matter in dispute was a part and parcel question, about an angle of ground described in the evidence as "only eight square yards in extent, and not worth five shillings intrinsically." This Court, in Montgomery v. Montgomery, 14 Ir. L. T. Rep. 9,* refused to apply that dictum even to an important question arising upon the contradictory evidence of witnesses, and the House of Lords (ib.) affirmed the decision; but, I cannot admit the application of such a principle to the question of fair rent, which is eminently a question of judgment and of judicial discretion, and as to which Mr. Litton truly says, "The estimate of a fair rent is within certain limits as uncertain as the character of the man to whose judgment the question is submitted." Even where the Land Commission have, in the words of the 43rd section, thought it "expedient" to "delegate" the consideration of the matter in the first instance to a Sub-Commission, any person aggrieved is entitled to require his case to be reheard by the Commissioners themselves, and to have their judgment independently exercised upon it as a question calling for the exercise of their highest qualifications. I am confident that upon that question, as between the present parties and all others affected by like considerations, the judgment, and the only judgment, to which the law has confided its final settlement, viz., the judgment of the Court of the Land Commission, will henceforth be exercised with due regard to the statements of the law which it has been our duty now to pronounce, but in all other respects upon its own responsibility.

Order:—"The Court, considering that the questions as presented cannot be treated solely as questions of law, but being of opinion that the following questions of law arise on the Case Stated, viz. :—(1) What is the meaning of the term "improvements" in the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881? (2) Whether the terms "tenant or his predecessors in title," in the same sub-section, have the same meaning respectively as in the 7th section of the same Act? (3) Whether the provisions of the final paragraph of the 4th section of the L. & T. (Ir.) Act, 1870, as to improvements made before the passing of that Act, are applicable to such improvements in determining fair rent under the 8th section of the L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881? (4) Whether the enjoyment, during the currency of a lease, of improvements made by a tenant during such lease is a compensation by the landlord within the meaning of the 9th sub-section of section 8 of the L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881? (5) Whether the lease of the 2nd of March, 1846, excludes the tenant from any interest in respect of the house built before the execution of that lease, in the ascertainment of the fair rent of the holding under the L. L. (Ir.) Act, 1881? It is considered and hereby declared, in answer to the 1st of the questions next hereinbefore mentioned, that the meaning of the term "improvements" is the same as in the L. & T. (Ir.) Act, 1870, section 70; and as to the 2nd, 3rd, and 5th of the said questions, that they should respectively be answered in the affirmative; and that the 4th of the said questions should be answered in the negative."

* In Collier v. Lord Fitzwilliam (Carlow, March 29, 1882), the following judgment was given by

Mr. WYLLIE:—"This case was heard at Tinahely on the 6th of February last, and in consequence of Mr. Gibson, for the landlord, having submitted to me certain propositions of law which were then pending for decision by the Court of Appeal in the case of Adams v. Dunseath, I thought it better for the parties that we should reserve our judgment. I have had the advantage of hearing the judgments of the Appeal Court in that case, and I also carefully read the newspaper reports of those judgments, and there appeared to me such a diversity of opinion among the judges on almost every question raised in the case that I felt very considerable difficulty in applying those judgments to the present case, and I have delayed giving judgment until now in the hope that I might have an opportunity of perusing a full and authoritative report of the judgments, and of seeing how they would be applied by the Land Commissioners in that particular case. As this is our last sitting before Easter, and as we are not certain either as to our future circuits or even as to the composition of the several Sub-Commissions, we think it better not to delay our decision further. I regret being compelled to give our judgment now, because a fuller knowledge of the judgments in Adams v. Dunseath and of their effect upon the ultimate decision in that case might have enabled us to have arrived at an unanimous judgment; and this I am sorry to say, is not the case now, and the judgment which I am about to give is only that of Mr. Kenny and myself. I have endeavoured to understand the steps by which Mr. Barry reaches his ultimate decision, but I have been unable to do so, and I must let him speak for himself. The holding in this case was formerly held in two separate portions by two different tenants. One portion consists of 19a. Or. 5p. Irish plantation measure, demised by Lord Fitzwilliam to Thomas Morton, by lease dated the 30th August, 1824, for one life, with a concurrent term of 21 years, at the yearly rent of £11; the other portion, consisting of 11a. 3r. 4p. Irish plantation measure, was demised by Lord Fitzwilliam to Francis Morton, by lease of same date for another life with a similar term of years concurrent, at the yearly rent of £6 10s. In February, 1841, Thomas Morton, in consideration of £250, assigned his lease to Robert Collier, father of the present tenant, and by two assignments, in 1846 and 1848 respectively, Francis Morton's portion was also assigned to Robert Collier in consideration of £84. There were, also, other sums admitted to have been paid in order to get rid of some cottier tenants, which brings the purchase-money of both leases up to £400. It was admitted that the leases expired some time before 1859, and that during their currency the rents had been reduced on account of tithe rent-charge, or some other outgoings, from £17 10s. to £16 11s. 10d. In 1859 it was arranged that Robert Collier should continue as tenant from year to year at the rent of rent of £17. The present tenant knows nothing himself of the terms of this arrangement, but admitted that his father told him something about the smallness of the advance being in consequence of his improvements. The rent-book for 1859 was produced on behalf of the landlord, containing, below the entry of the two holdings in the name of the Mortons, the following memorandum, in the handwriting of Mr. Lawrenson, who was in the office at the time:—"Robert Collier inserted for both at three half-years' rent to Michaelmas, 1860, with a nominal advance of 12s. 3d. for the present, in consequence of the large improvements made by him in buildings and in the land, viz., 8s. 2d. a year." In May, 1862, Robert Collier assigned to his son, the present tenant, the whole of this holding, with the good will of the business and certain chattels, in consideration of an annuity of £17, to be paid by the tenant to his father during his life. It did not appear clearly whether this assignment was ever known to the agent, but the father and son having some disputes in 1853, a notice to quit was served, determinable in March, 1864. It was then arranged, between the father, the son, and the agent, that the son should become tenant, and that in addition to the rent of £17 he should pay to his father an annuity of £20 during his life, the payment of which was to be secured by having it paid into the office as part of the rent. This sum of £20 was regularly paid by the tenant to his father, through the office, in the way I have mentioned, up to his death in 1876. Notwithstanding the father's death, which was never mentioned or referred to by either party, the tenant continued to pay, and the office to receive, this sum of £20 ever since, and when the tenant now complains of this the reply given is that he never made any objection to its continuance. A great deal of evidence was given, on behalf of the tenant, as to the condition and value of the holding when Collier first got it, its present condition and value, and the extent and nature of the improvements; and I shall mention hereafter what we consider to be the effect of that evidence. Such being the principal facts in the case, Mr. Gibson submitted to me three propositions of law, which I am required to make a ruling upon, and I give them in his own words:—First, "That the rent to be calculated or fixed should not be reduced by reason of any improvements made by Collier, senior, during the leases, or either of them, inasmuch as a wholly new letting was made of the entire holding in the year 1859, and the new rent then fixed (£17) was much less than the true value (admitted by the tenant to be £31); that this low rent was fixed in consequence of the tenant's improvements, and that the case is directly within Holt v. Harborton." It appears to me that that is a very compound, and in some respects an ambiguous, proposition, and before ruling upon it I must divide it, and explain what I understand by it. If it mean that the new letting itself, apart from the amount of the rent, caused a breach in the chain of title within the meaning of the decision in Holt v. Harborton, so as to preclude the tenant from claiming credit for prior improvements as being made by a predecessor in title, then, I think, it is immaterial whether the case is, in this respect, similar to Holt v. Harborton or not, as, in my opinion, this case falls within section 7 of the Act of 1881, and the case of Holt v. Harborton is, so far, overruled by Adams v. Dunseath. If, again, Mr. Gibson's first proposition mean that the new letting made in 1859, at what is termed a low rent, was made in consideration of, and as compensation for the prior improvements, so that the tenant holding under the new letting, if it had continued unchanged, could not now go behind it and claim credit for such improvements, then the proposition is, in our opinion, not sustainable. In Holt v. Harborton a tenant from year to year built a substantial house, and afterwards took from his landlord a long lease of the same land and 91 acres in addition, at a less rent than he had been paying for the original portion, the lease having been admittedly granted in consideration of the buildings; and the lessee's successor claiming, under the Act of 1870, to register as improvements against the landlord the very buildings in consideration of which the lease was granted, it was held that he could not go behind the lease. Now, what occurred in this case in 1859? Robert Collier and his predecessors in title having been in possession of this holding from 1824, under two leases, at the yearly rent of £16 11s. 10d., and having, during those leases, made large improvements, both in buildings and on the land, at the expiration of those leases Collier was allowed to continue on as tenant from year to year at a nominal increase of rent, put on for the purpose of squaring it up to £17. That new tenancy might have been determined at the end of the next twelve months, and as a matter of fact was determined five years after; and whatever may be the effect of that new letting upon the amount of deductions now to be made in respect of improvements, having regard to the question of compensation otherwise than by agreement, there is, in our opinion, nothing in that new letting, apart from such question of compensation, which precludes the tenant from claiming a deduction in respect of prior improvements. Any other point which may be involved in the first proposition beyond those to which I have referred falls, I think, within the third proposition, and will be dealt with under it. Mr. Gibson's second proposition is, "That the rent to be fixed should not be reduced by any improvements made by the father or son previous to the determination of the tenancy by notice to quit in 1864, and the creation of a new tenancy direct with the son." Now, what was the position of the parties prior to 1864? The tenant's father being in possession of this holding as tenant from year to year under the new letting in 1859, assigned his interest to his son in May, 1862; and, though it is doubtful whether this assignment was known to the agent, the tenancy passed by the assignment to the son, and it is remarkable that the notice to quit was actually served on the son, though it was said to be intended for the father, but their names being the same it applied to either, and would no doubt have been held to determine the tenancy in either. At any rate, the son accepted the new tenancy in 1864, and the prior tenancy was determined either by the notice to quit or by surrender by operation of law. In either view of the case I think it comes clearly within sect. 7 of the Act of 1881; and, according to the interpretation put upon that section and sec. 8, sub-sec. 9, of the same Act by the Court of Appeal in Adams v. Dunseath, I think that, notwithstanding the change which occurred in 1864, both the father and son were in possession prior to that time as predecessors in title to the present tenant; and therefore, in my opinion, the second proposition is also unsustainable. Mr. Gibson's third proposition is, "That the new letting of 1859 at the low rent was in any event, upon the evidence in this case, a compensation within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881, so far as related to improvements, up to that date." This appears to me to be by far the most difficult of the three propositions to deal with; and it was specially with reference to the question raised here that I was anxious to have a careful perusal of the different judgments in Adams v. Dunseath, before giving our decision. So far as I have been able to gather the effect of those judgments, from hearing them delivered and from the newspaper reports, I cannot say that they have made our path more easy; and in dealing with this proposition, which was not decided in that case, but in reference to which qualified opinions were thrown out by the judges, we must only apply those opinions to it as best we can, in accordance with what we consider, in the light of them, to be the meaning and intention of the Act. In order to relieve the proposition from any ambiguity, and to prevent any misconception as to our decision, it is necessary for us to distinguish between two very different senses in which the expression "low rent" may be used, and also to decide one or two questions of fact, which must, in our opinion, form the basis of our decision upon this third proposition, and will therefore materially affect our ultimate decision as to the fair rent. The words "low rent" may mean either a rent that is below the fair letting value of the land including all improvements upon it at the time such rent is fixed, or they may mean a rent that is below the fair letting value of the land apart from the tenant's improvements, or, putting a gloss upon the word improvements in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Adams v. Dunseath, a "low rent" in the second sense means a rent which is below the fair letting value, after giving the tenant credit for so much of the increase in letting value arising from his improvements as he is entitled to have deducted in respect of such improvements. If the expression "low rent" contained in this third proposition be used in this second sense, I think we would be justified in affirming even a wider principle of compensation than the proposition contains, because it appears to me that where a tenant from year to year is allowed to continue in possession at such a low rent, he is every year receiving some compensation for past improvements, at whatever time effected. This being our view as to the principle to be applied, it follows that we must decide, as a matter of fact, whether the rent of £17, paid since 1859 for this holding, was then or has become since a low rent as understood in the second sense; and in order to ascertain this we must decide whether, having regard to the evidence in the case, as to the character of the land and the tenant's outlay, the excess of the full letting value including improvements over the rent of £17 was in 1859, or has been since, more than what the tenant was fairly entitled to as a return for his labour and expense. As I have already stated, the holding was originally let in two portions by two separate leases to Thomas and Francis Morton in 1824 at rents amounting together to £16 11s. 10d. Collier, senior, purchased Thomas's portion in 1841 for £250 and that of Francis a few years later for £84. Thomas's holding adjoined the public road, and for some time prior to the purchase Thomas was engaged in building a shop upon his holding. Collier was at the same time living at the opposite side of the road, and had a grocer's shop there. After his purchase he completed the shop commenced by Thomas and erected other buildings at the cost of £600, and transferred his business to the new buildings, where he has carried it on ever since. After purchasing the holding of Francis Morton for £84, he had to pay other sums to get rid of some cottier tenants, making a total of £150 for this holding, and a total of £400 for both; and the fact of his having given such a large sum for these holdings was relied on by Mr. Gibson as showing that the rents were low, but we think the facts I have stated show a sufficient reason for the price without our drawing any such inference as to the rents, more especially as the rest of the evidence seems to us to rebut such an inference. In 1859 when the leases were out, and both landlord and tenant were legally free to arrange whatever rent they pleased for the future, the tenant asked to have it reduced to £16, but the agent refused, and it was increased by a nominal sum to £17. The entry which I have referred to in the rent-book states that the nominal increase was in consequence of the large improvements made by Collier in buildings and in the land. What is the natural and reasonable inference to be drawn from that transaction? Is it that the land was being let at a low rent, in the second sense which we have attached to the words, for the purpose of compensating the tenant for improvements to which he had then not the shadow of a claim? or is it that the agent was acting in the way in which you would expect a nobleman in Lord Fitzwilliam's position or his agent to act—viz., abstaining from charging an improving tenant rent on his own improvements, and putting on what he considered a fair rent for the land without encroaching on the tenant's improvements? We have no hesitation in accepting the latter inference as the correct interpretation of the intention and motives of the parties at the time. But passing by these inferences from facts, which I have only noticed because contrary inferences may be drawn by others from the same facts, and coming to the facts proved by the witnesses—what are they? Collier and his brother proved that, besides the £600 spent in buildings, they expended on the land since 1842 over £2,000 in reclamation, drainage, and in blasting, removing, and sinking boulders. They also proved the condition and value of the land when Collier got it, and their evidence on this point was fully sustained by several witnesses who were familiar with the land at the time. This evidence was also corroborated by reference to the Ordnance map, which shows a considerable portion of the land marked as rough and unclaimed, also by the entry in the rent-book of 1859 in which the agent even then speaks of the large improvements made by Collier in buildings and in the land; and lastly, we have what is to us perhaps the most satisfactory corroboration of all, the evidence of our own senses. The condition of this land and the adjoining land, as we saw it, and the immense fences of stones, dividing field from field, satisfy us that the tenant has expended upon this holding an amount of labour and expense for which he will never reap an adequate return. On the whole case, therefore, we have come to the conclusion that the whole increase in the letting value of the holding at any time over and above the sum of £17 was solely due to the tenant's improvements, and that that increase did not at any time give the tenant a return of more than two or three per cent. on his expenditure, on account of the unimprovable nature of the land. In our opinion, therefore, this holding was not let to, or ever since held by, the tenant at a low rent, in the second sense of the expression; and therefore Mr. Gibson's third proposition, using the words in this sense, would not apply to this case. But there can be no question, upon the tenant's own evidence, that the sum of £17 was a low rent for this holding in 1859, using the words in the first sense referred to, because he admitted that at that time the holding, including buildings and improvements, would have been worth £81 a year to an incoming tenant; and this rent of £81 the landlord would at that time have been entitled in point of law to have charged the tenant. The important question then arises, whether the mere abstention of the landlord from exercising his legal right, prior to the Land Acts, of charging the tenant rent upon his own improvements, is a compensation by the landlord for those improvements within the meaning of section 8, sub-section 9, of the Act of 1881? One would think that such a proposition required only to be stated to be dismissed. At all events, I shall not be the first to affirm it, but shall leave that duty to some other, or higher authority. What would be the effect of affirming such a proposition? Simply compelling indirectly, by legal process under an Act passed for the benefit of tenants, a good landlord to do the very acts for which other landlords have been condemned, and on account of which the very Act we are administering was passed. A landlord who, by an increase of rent, compels a tenant to pay him interest upon the money spent by such tenant in improvements is condemned by all just men, and because a good landlord has permitted the tenant for a number of years to receive that interest himself, are we now called upon, under this remedial Act, to hand over the whole principal to the landlord, and compel the tenant to pay him interest upon it from this time forth? That is not a course which commends itself to our judgment, and, therefore, Mr. Gibson's third proposition—if it is to be understood in this sense—we think entirely unsustainable. We are, therefore, of opinion that there is nothing in this case which can be considered as compensation by the landlord for any of the tenant's improvements, and the tenant is consequently entitled to have deducted from the present letting value of the holding such sum as would represent the present increase in letting value arising from such improvements. Where the improvements consist of buildings, our course has always been, and we see no reason to change it, to value the holding irrespective of such buildings. In the case of improvements on the land, we must first value the land as it now stands, including improvements, and endeavour to ascertain as best we can from the whole evidence, how much of that value is due to tenant's improvements. According to the evidence in this case, the present letting value of the land is about £38 or £39, and, in our opinion, considerably more than half that value is due to tenant's improvements. The Poor Law valuation of the land is £24, and of the buildings £11; and the rent, since 1864, has been nominally £37, but in reality £17, and this we think is a fair rent for Collier to pay, and we accordingly fix £17 as the judicial rent.

ADAMS v. DUNSEATH.

In Brenan v. Latouche (Sub-Com., NASS, May 22, 1882), where it appeared that the tenant, about 1841, erected certain "permanent buildings" (within the L. & T. Act, 1870, s. 4, sub-s. a), and that in March, 1858, his father, the then tenant, had accepted a lease of the holding for 21 years, containing the usual covenants to keep and give up the premises in repair, Mr. KAUSE said:—"In my opinion, we are bound by the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Adams v. Dunseath. I hold that the acceptance of that lease would destroy the right to compensation under the Act of 1870 for an improvement made before its date, and therefore excluded such improvements from the prohibition to have rent charged in respect of them, contained in s. 8 (9) of the Act of 1881. But I adopt the words of the Lord Chancellor in Adams v. Dunseath [quoting the two last sentences at end of 1st paragraph, col. 1, p. 63]. In my opinion, although we in this case do not come under the prohibition contained in s. 8 (9), we are not under a correlative obligation to charge the fullest rent upon all that we are not prohibited from putting any rent upon. [Introduction to s. 8 quoted.] . . . In my opinion, therefore, we are at liberty to consider, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, whether it is just and fair that any, and if so what, deduction should be made from the present full letting value of the lands, in respect of the moneys so laid out in improvements by the father of the present tenant."

THE QUEEN (REYNOLDS) v. THE JUSTICES OF THE COUNTY CORK.

Jan. 19, 21, 1892.—Certiorari.—Justice of the Peace.—Jurisdiction.—Sureties to be of good behaviour.—Inviting tenant not to pay rent.—34 Ed. 3, c. 1.—Practice.—Supplemental affidavits.

While the society styled the Irish National Land League were alleged to be acting in unlawful combination, for the purpose of inducing tenants not to pay their rents, the following words were addressed by H. R., in the presence of a crowd, including a tenant against whom a writ of habere for non-payment of rent was then being executed:—
"Pay no rent to the landlord. We will make you right about the land. We will build you a house at any expense, and make you comfortable during the winter." The district had been proscribed under the Act for the better Protection of Person and Property in Ireland (44 & 45 Vic., c. 4); and on the occasion in question the sheriff and his officers were accompanied by an armed force of police for their protection, under the command of a magistrate. H. R. appeared to have been entirely unconnected with the tenant, and to have come there, accompanied by an attendant crowd, for the seeming purpose of interrupting the legal proceedings, and apparently as the emissary or agent of a plurality of persons in possession of funds applicable to the fulfilment of the promises held out to the tenant. On informations sworn accordingly, a summons was issued calling on H. R. to show cause why she should not be bound over to be of good behaviour, on the hearing of which she was ordered by the justices at petty sessions to find bail for that purpose, or in default to be imprisoned for six months. She refused to give bail, and on application for a writ of certiorari, to quash the order:

Held, that sufficient reasons existed to warrant the justices in inferring that, when so exhorting or encouraging the tenant to pay no rent, H. R. was acting in unlawful concert and combination with an association, and in concluding that the repetition of such conduct should be prevented; and that, while the court would interfere with the exercise of such jurisdiction only in a strong and clear case of misused authority, the order made was justified, on the ground of probable suspicion that a crime was intended or likely to happen which should be so prevented, and having regard to 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, empowering justices of the peace to bind over to be of good behaviour all that be "not of good fame."

On showing cause against a conditional order for a writ of certiorari, it would be contrary to the practice, confining parties to the evidence given before the justices, to allow it to be supplemented by affidavit.

Certiorari.—The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment. Against making absolute the conditional order which had been obtained:

The Attorney-General (Johnson, Q.C.), J. Murphy, Q.C., and E. Sullivan, showed cause, contending that the justices had jurisdiction in the matter, originating with their commission; and that the facts justified the exercise of that jurisdiction, putting a reasonable construction on the words used, and holding a conspiracy among tenants not to pay their rents to be unlawful.*

O'Riordan, Q.C., and White, contra.—This complaint is not by an individual who has been injured by the act alleged, or who was apprehensive of a breach of the peace and made informations for its prevention. It does not come within 34 Ed. 3, c. 1, under which the summons may be taken out by anyone, for "evil fame" therein must be such as is recognised by law. Nor does it come under the jurisdiction given by the commission of the peace. The political opinions of proposed sureties do not constitute a ground for refusing bail. There should have been an adjudication on the charge of meeting not to pay rent. But, in fact, it is not shown that rent was due, or that there was an eviction in consequence, nor was there evidence of any tenancy. To induce persons to leave their employment is not criminal; † and the director not to pay rent, if criminal, should be given to the tenant. If any offence there was, it would be under 38 & 39 Vic., c. 86, s. 7. The order complained of amounted to an adjudication, but was made without sufficient evidence; and the discretion vested in the magistrate must be a legal discretion, to be exercised only on sufficient grounds. But, if not within the statute 34 Ed. 3, c. 1, the conviction cannot be sustained; and here no grounds are shown on which it can be supported.

MAY, C. J.—This case came before the Court upon motion to show cause against the making absolute a conditional order which had been obtained for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of the 23rd December, 1891, made by Mr. E. B. Warburton, a magistrate of the County of Cork. By that order, which recites a complaint that Hannah Reynolds had unlawfully incited Catherine Murphy, a tenant of the Earl of Bantry, to refuse to pay rent due by her to the said landlord, it was ordered that the said Hannah Reynolds should be bound to her good behaviour for six months, herself in £50, and two sureties in £25 each, or in default should be imprisoned for one month. This order was made by the magistrate upon sworn informations, and also upon oral evidence of witnesses who were examined before him and cross-examined on the part of the defendant, Hannah Reynolds. The material facts and circumstances, as they appeared upon such information and evidence, were substantially as follows:—On the 1st December, 1891, the sheriff proceeded to execute writs of habere which had issued against two tenants of the Earl of Bantry residing in the parish

* They sought to read an affidavit which had been made by Mr. Warburton, in reference to what had occurred on the occasion, as he had been present, and as the conditional order was granted on the ground, amongst others, that there was no evidence to justify the order he had made. But, the Court were of opinion that to allow the affidavit to be used would be inconvenient, and contrary to the practice, which confines parties to the evidence before the magistrates. (See, cf. R. v. Justices of Limerick, 7 Ir. L. T. 55.)

of Killoatherine, in the county of Cork, in actions of ejectment for nonpayment of rent. The sheriff and his officers were accompanied by an armed force for their protection, and also by the same magistrate Mr. E. B. Warburton, whose presence was considered necessary in order to assist in keeping the peace in case of disturbance. It appears that on the 4th March, 1881, the district in question had been prescribed under the Act for the better Protection of Person and Property in Ireland, which circumstance serves to account for the precautions thus taken. The officers of the law executed the writ in the case of one of the tenants without disturbance, the respondent Hannah Reynolds being present. They then proceeded towards the holding of the other tenant, the said Catherine Murphy; but it appears that the respondent, accompanied by a crowd of men, women, and children, arrived at the farm of the second tenant before the officers of the law, and then upon their arrival, in the presence of the magistrate and the legal officials, addressed a crowd which was there assembled and which included the tenant Catherine Murphy, her son, and other persons, some of them the wives of neighbouring farmers, to the following effect: "Pay no rent to the landlord. We will make you right about the land. We will build you a house at any expense and make you comfortable during the winter." To understand and appreciate the meaning and tendency of language such as this, it is proper to consider some of the circumstances which preceded and surrounded the occasion. It is perfectly well known, and this court in particular has judicial notice, that for a considerable time there had existed in Ireland a certain society called the Irish National Land League; and it had been alleged that such society consisted of a number of persons acting in combination for the purpose of inducing tenants in this country not to pay either wholly or partially to their landlords rent which they had contracted to pay, such tenants at the same time retaining their holdings. The judges of this court who presided at the recent trial of Reg. v. Parnell laid it down as clear and undoubted law that persons confederating together for such a purpose were guilty of a criminal conspiracy; that exposition of the law was scarcely questioned by the traversers or their counsel, and I apprehend that no doubt exists in the mind of any lawyer on the authorities both in England and Ireland that the law was so correctly stated. It appears that on the 20th Oct., 1881, a proclamation was issued by his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of this country which, after stating to the effect that an association calling itself the Irish National Land League had existed for some time assuming to interfere with the Queen's subjects in the free exercise of their lawful rights, and especially to control the relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland, among other things seeking to deter the Queen's subjects from fulfilling their contracts, and that the said association had avowed its purpose to be to prevent the payment of all rent, contained a warning to all persons that such association was illegal, and that they should disconnect themselves from the same, and a declaration that the resources of Government would be employed to enforce the fulfilment of all lawful obligations, and all loyal and well-affected subjects were thereby called upon to aid the Crown in maintaining and upholding the authority of the law. This proclamation could not have the effect of establishing propositions of law or the existence of matters of fact, but it certainly did convey such a warning as ought to have induced well-disposed and loyal persons to refrain from engaging in conduct such as was therein characterised and treated as illegal; and such an injunction as it would be the duty of all magistrates and persons in legal authority to obey. Under these circumstances the officers of the law being engaged in the execution of legal process to enforce the payment of rent, the respondent thought fit in the presence of the magistrate to address the tenant and a mixed crowd of persons to the effect above described. She appears to have been entirely unconnected with the tenant, and apparently came to the spot, accompanied by the crowd which attended her, for the sole purpose of interrupting the legal proceedings which was taking place; she came apparently as the emissary and agent of a plurality of persons in possession of funds applicable to the fulfilment of the promises she held out to the tenant. The language "We will make you right about the land and we will build you a house" pointed, I think, tolerably clearly to the existence of some body of persons whose representative she was. The magistrate by whom such language was heard, or who was satisfied upon proper evidence that it had been used, had, in my judgment, cogent reasons for inferring that the respondent, in thus exhorting and encouraging the tenant to pay no rent, was acting in unlawful concert and combination with some association of persons, and in concluding that it was his duty by all legal means to prevent the repetition by her of similar conduct.

Now, with respect to the legal aspect of this case, and the jurisdiction of magistrates to make orders to give security for good behaviour, I do not think it necessary to refer at length to the comments of Hawkins, Dalton, Bacon's Abridgment, Burn's Justice of the Peace, and other books on the subject. Upon an elementary matter of this nature, it is, I think, abundantly sufficient to refer to Blackstone, who discusses the subject in the 4th book and 18th chapter of the old editions. "Preventive justice," he there tells us, "consists in obliging those persons whom there is probable ground to suspect of future misbehaviour to stipulate with and give full assurance to the public that such offence as is apprehended shall not happen by finding pledges or securities for keeping the peace or for their good behaviour." This requisition of sureties must be understood rather as a caution against the repetition of the offence than any immediate pain or punishment. This caution is such as is intended merely for prevention without any crime actually committed by the party, but arising only from a probable suspicion that some crime is intended or likely to happen, and consequently it is not meant as any degree of punishment, except, perhaps, for a man's imprudence in giving just ground for apprehension. By the statute of 84 Ed. 3. c. 1, justices are empowered to bind over to good behaviour all that be "not of good fame;" and the legal authorities show that a very wide and liberal interpretation has been given to this language, various instances of which are given in the books, many of them comparatively innocent when contrasted with the conduct of this respondent brought under our notice. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case—to what was established in evidence before the magistrate, and which evidences that gentleman, having been an eye witness of the transaction, was well able to appreciate—I think the justice had ample grounds for concluding that Miss Reynolds was engaged in an illegal course of conduct, and that he was well warranted in restraining or endeavouring to restrain a continuance or recurrence of such acts on her part. It is scarcely necessary to say that, if it clearly appeared that any subject, under such an order, has been deprived of liberty without sufficient grounds, this Court would interfere, though considering the very wide discretion given to the justice in the exercise of this salutary jurisdiction, it should, I think, only interfere in a strong and clear case of misused magisterial authority. In this case, I think, it is, on the contrary, clear that abundant grounds have been shown to have existed for the order made, that it was a perfectly proper order, made in the exercise of the jurisdiction of the justice, and that the cause shown must be allowed.

THE QUEEN (M'CORMICK) v. THE JUSTICES OF THE COUNTY CLARE.

Feb. 9, 1882.—Certiorari—Justice of the Peace—Sureties to be of good behaviour—Inciting tenants not to pay rent—Jurisdiction—Summons or warrant—34 Ed. 3, c. 1.

On an information having been made by a police officer, that he had reason to believe, and did believe that M'C. was a member of the "Ladies Land League," a stranger to the locality, and had been visiting various persons therein who had been served with writs for rent, and had advised them rather to submit to eviction than pay rent, while outrages followed immediately after her visits to a disturbed district, a warrant was issued against her, and she was arrested at a Land League meeting, and brought to the police barrack and thence to the petty sessions court. The presiding magistrate then read over to her the information made by the police officer, whom she declined to cross-examine, but admitted the truth of said allegations, and avowed that she was a member of the "Ladies Land League" and was carrying out its objects, declining to give any other explanation, or satisfactory account of herself. Accordingly, the magistrate made an order binding her over to be of good behaviour, or in default directing her to be imprisoned for three months. She refused to give bail; and on application for a writ of certiorari, to quash the order:

Held, that the magistrate had jurisdiction, and was bound to act in the matter; and, on the information made and what took place subsequently in court, was justified in making the order, having just ground for suspecting that she had entered, or was likely to enter upon a course likely to lead to crime, and having regard to 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, empowering justices of the peace to bind over to be of good behaviour all that be "not of good fame."

Certiorari.—It appeared that on Jan. 19, 1882, an information was sworn by Hubert Crean, sub-inspector Royal Irish Constabulary, before C. D. Clifford Lloyd, resident magistrate, of Tulla, county Limerick, setting forth that the defendant, Anne M'Cormick, arrived in his district about the 11th of the month, and he had reason to believe, and did believe, that she was a member of the Ladies Land League, a stranger to the locality, and had been visiting persons in various parts of the district, in the baronies of Upper and Lower Tulla, upon whom writs had been served for nonpayment of rent, urging them to stand to Land League principles, and submit to eviction sooner than pay their rents; that she was at that time engaged in holding a Land League meeting; that she was going about the district creating discord and dissension amongst her Majesty's subjects, and with that object she had been visiting various persons and localities; that the baronies of Upper and Lower Tulla were in a very disturbed state, and defendant had visited the northern part of the Upper barony, where outrages immediately followed.

A warrant, founded on the foregoing information, was issued by the magistrate (Major Lloyd) on the same day, and the defendant was arrested and brought before him, whereupon he read over to her the warrant and the information sworn by the sub-inspector. He (Lloyd) then informed her of the charge preferred against her; he asked her whether she wished to put any questions to the sub-inspector, and she replied that she did not, but admitted the truth of the statements in the information and the charge in the warrant, with the exception of "creating discord amongst her Majesty's subjects." She added that she was proud to say she was a member of the Ladies Land League in Dublin, and had been going about the localities in the interest of the League. She was throughout the entire of the proceedings accompanied by the Rev. Father Kenny, who had been president of the Scariff Branch of the Land League. He interposed, and said he supposed she had been travelling for charitable purposes only; but, she in reply said she would not say so, as she was travelling in the interest of the League. Major Lloyd called upon defendant to give a satisfactory account of herself, in order to enable him to discharge her, but she declined to do so. He then told her there was nothing left him but to direct her to find bail for her good behaviour; and, having admitted the charge and declined to give a satisfactory account of herself, he (Lloyd) made the order, which, having recited the foregoing facts, bound her over to be of good behaviour for three months, or in default directed that she should be imprisoned for that period, or until the recognisances be sooner entered into. The arrest of defendant led to a riot in the town of Tulla, and certain of the rioters were brought before him, and he made in their cases similar orders to that made in the case of Miss M'Cormick.

Miss M'Cormick made an affidavit, stating that when she was arrested no warrant for her apprehension was produced, and no explanation was given of the reasons of her arrest beyond the statement that Mr. Lloyd would brook no delay; that when brought before him a paper was read to her by him, in which the charges against her were made, but no evidence was given against her, and when the information was read she was ordered to find bail; that she did not stir up any discontent, and the charges against her were fictitious, and put forward as a pretext for depriving her of her liberty; and that she was detained in the police barracks till nine at night, and then conveyed to the county jail at Ennis.

Against making absolute the conditional order, which had been obtained to bring up and quash the order made by the magistrate:

James Murphy, Q.C., and Peter O'Brien, Q.C. (with them Gerrard), showed cause.

FITZGERALD, J.—The Court does not require to hear counsel in reply for the Crown. I have been asked by my Lord Chief Justice to pronounce the judgment of the Court, and I may first say that having now for the first time heard part of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice in the case of Miss Reynolds, I concur in it, so far as I have heard it. The application now before us is to make absolute the conditional order which was obtained on two grounds—first, that the magistrate acted without, and in excess of, jurisdiction; second, that the order made by the magistrate was not founded on any legal procedure sufficient to justify him in making such order. Upon those grounds the Court has to deal with this case, and I must guard myself against going into any other question which is not open to us. There are two points for our consideration—the excess of jurisdiction, and the absence of legal procedure to justify the magistrate in making the order. Some other questions have been debated before us, but I confine my observations to those two. Upon the information of Sub-Inspector Crean, we must pause to consider whether the magistrate had jurisdiction to act as he has done. From this information it appears, inter alia, that it was stated that a stranger had been seen some days before in the neighbourhood, going about from place to place, and he (the Sub-Inspector) had reason to believe, and he did believe, that she had been visiting all the persons who had been served with writs for rent, and that she had advised them rather to submit to eviction than pay rent; and the information further states that she had been visiting various persons and localities in the County, in the Barony of Upper and Lower Tulla, and visited the northern parts of the County, where outrages immediately followed. Upon this information we are called upon to consider whether the magistrate had jurisdiction to act.

THE QUEEN (M'CORMICK) v. THE JUSTICES OF THE COUNTY CLARE.

There is no doubt that under the Statute of Edward the Third, on information, reliable information, coming not from a private individual, but from one who is charged with the duty of watching over and protecting the public peace, the magistrate had not only jurisdiction, but was bound to act in the matter. He might have issued a summons or a warrant, and it is not necessary for us to consider whether the more expedient course would not have been to have issued a summons; but the magistrate has issued a warrant only, and probably the exigencies of the times required that there should be speedy action taken in the case, for had he acted by summons, possibly a week, a fortnight, or a month would have elapsed before any adjudication could have been made. We have nothing to do with the earlier stages of the procedure, but come at once to the time when the lady was brought before the magistrate. We have to consider merely the course pursued by the justice. The police officer goes to a place of meeting, described as a Land League meeting, and he insists that Miss M'Cormick, whom he sees there, shall attend before a magistrate. It is really unimportant whether her attendance was compulsory or voluntary. Major Lloyd, it appears, read over to Miss M'Cormick the sub-inspector's information, the witness being then present. All this occurred upon the same day—making the affidavit, seeking for the lady, bringing her to the Sessions Court, and the final order requiring her to give security to keep the peace, did not occupy more than a couple of hours. The lady attends in the court, and the magistrate reads over to her the entire of the information from beginning to end, with the object that she should have an opportunity of cross-examining the witness or offering any observations she might choose to make. A person charged upon suspicion as being an evil-doer or disturber of the peace or other crime, is brought to the Court, the reason being to give the person an opportunity of giving any explanation to the magistrate which can be given by her. This is one of the reasons for bringing a party accused before a magistrate. The lady declines to give any explanation, but admitted that all the matters of fact charged on belief were well founded; that she had been going about the country as an emissary, and was a member of the Ladies' Land League, advising persons who were served with law process rather to submit to eviction than pay their rents; in other words, she admitted to be true all the facts set forth in the information on belief. There was another incident in the case which has made me regret that I cannot pronounce an order in her favour, and that is, when Father Kenny interfered and suggested that what she meant was she had come down there on a charitable mission only, she declined to say so. She had the courage at any rate to defend her opinions openly, and she said—"It was not for that purpose I am here. I glory in being a member of the Ladies' Land League in Dublin, and I am here to carry out the objects of that body." Such was the nature of evidence before Major Lloyd. What was he to do? He was charged with the preservation of the public peace, and he finds placed before him a person obviously intending to disseminate opinions dangerous to the public peace, and to carry them out, to incite people to do that which is a crime—to incite the tenants to conspire together not to pay rent to their landlords. This was a much stronger case, on the facts, as I have interpreted them, than the case of Miss Reynolds, for I do not recollect in that case a charge of having incited the tenants not to pay rent, but only a particular tenant. These facts, as they finally appeared before the justice, present a much stronger case than that of Miss Reynolds. There may have been irregularity in the proceedings, but nobody can doubt—no lawyer can doubt—that Major Lloyd had jurisdiction to entertain the case. This disposes of the first ground.

As to the second ground—that the order of the magistrate had not been made on any legal procedure sufficient to justify it—it is not easy to see what exactly is meant. The Court is of opinion that the magistrate had before him a body of evidence quite persuasive, which, in our judgment, called upon him to require the person to give an explanation or to enter into security for future good conduct. She is called upon to explain—to tell what was her mission in the country; she refuses to disclose—she has nothing more to say, she gave no explanation then, she gives no explanation now, she is a wanderer in a locality where she was a stranger. Let us see what is the position of a justice of the peace. It is our province and duty to examine the case, upon the grounds which have been deliberately brought before us, with extreme caution and great jealousy, as the magistrate was exercising an extraordinary summary authority involving personal liberty. If we find that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, or that his order was founded on no legal procedure, it will be our duty to pronounce in favour of the lady, and have the proceedings brought up to be quashed. But see the position of a justice. He has all the powers of a conservator of the peace at common law, and his first and primary duty to the community is to have regard to the preservation of the public peace. The statute law confers upon him large powers for the repression and punishment of crime, and gives him to a certain extent repressive and preventive authority, the object being to give him that authority to a considerable extent for the public good, and the preservation of the public peace. There is no difference in the law in this respect in England or Ireland. The statute of 54th Edward the Third, chapter 1, is an English Act, but is in force in this country, and confers on the justice wide discretionary powers to be exercised for the public good and the preservation of the public peace, but subject to the jealous supervision and control of this Court, where individual liberty is concerned. In the case of Haylock v. Sparke, Lord Campbell, C.J., in 1 Ell. & Bl. 486, thus says—"The law upon this subject begins with statute 54th Edward the Third, chapter 1, by which justices of the peace were first appointed. This statute, entrusting these magistrates with a wide discretion, authorises them to take of all them that be not of good fame, where they shall be found, sufficient surety and mainprise of their good behaviour towards the King and his people." In 4 Inst. 181, Lord Coke, remarking upon this clause, says that "the offences against the peace after they are done having been provided for, now followeth an express authority given to the justices, for the prevention of such offences before they be done—viz., and to take of all them that be not of good fame (that is, that he defamed, and justly suspected that they intend to break the peace), where they shall be found, sufficient surety and main-prize of their good behaviour towards the King and his people (which must concern the King's peace, as is also provided by the word subsequent, to the intent that the people be not by such rioters troubled or indamaged, nor the peace blemished, &c.)” This is Lord Coke's explanation of the statute, and, I apprehend, that it is quite in accordance with the present law. In Strange v. Hyde (2 Roll.), one question was—whether calling another a knave was a breach of a recognizance of good behaviour. The Court held that it was not, and a case is cited there where a person having been committed for not finding sureties for good behaviour for calling an alderman a knave was discharged, such a word alone not being sufficient. It appears from these and other cases, turning upon similar words that aggravated defamation, was a ground for requiring sureties for good behaviour, although rash words of anger were not sufficient. In 2nd Hawk, P. Cr. 14 (7th Ed. B. 1, c. 61, ss. 3, 4), the learned author says:—“It seems the better opinion that no one ought to be bound to the good behaviour for any rash, quarrelsome, or unmannerly words unless they either directly tend to a breach of the peace or to scandalize the Government. However, I am inclined to think that he (the magistrate) has a discretionary power to take such surety of all those whom he shall have just cause to suspect to be dangerous, quarrelsome, or scandalous.” So in Comyn's Digest (Forcible Entry, D. 25), it is said that sureties for good behaviour may be required of all not of good fame “if he does that which tends to a breach of the peace.” Upon the whole, it appears to us that the justice of the peace has the jurisdiction to require sureties, &c. Although the main point in the case of Haylock v. Sparke does not touch the point in the present case, it is clear if a magistrate has just ground for suspecting a particular person as likely to enter, or has entered, upon a course likely to lead to crime, he may, in the exercise of his discretion, require sureties for his good behaviour.

We are of opinion that there were reasonable grounds for the magistrate, upon which he exercised his discretion. It is not for us to say on the present motion whether he acted wisely or with regularity; but were I asked to give an opinion on the subject, I would say, he exercised that discretion wisely. The magistrate asked the defendant to tell him what she was about in visiting the neighbourhood, but she declined to answer or to give any explanation, yet admitted that she was an emissary of some association, and was there inciting and advising the tenants not to pay rent. Then the magistrate said to her, “If you give no explanation I must take the facts as proved, and I require you to find sureties for your good behaviour.” It was not unreasonable to require that sureties should be procured, and I can have no doubt in saying, in discharging the conditional order, that the magistrate had jurisdiction to entertain the case brought before him, and that the procedure before him was sufficient to sustain the order which he made. We, therefore, are of opinion that the conditional order should be discharged, and I desire to add that, so far as I have heard, the judgment in the case of Miss Reynolds was well founded, and governs the case now before the Court.

BARRY, J.—I entirely concur in the propositions that fell from Mr. Sullivan in his very moderate and well-reasoned argument, that this is an abstract question of law which should be decided upon well-established principles, and it has been so decided. Mr. O'Riordan has suggested that a different kind of law should not be laid down in this from that laid down in any other case. I am not aware that a different kind of law is being laid down in this case. I am of opinion that the decision is in accordance with rules that have been well established in England and Ireland for, at all events, the last 200 years, from the interpretation and administration of the law under the ancient statute of Edward.

Where the notice of motion sought to have the action remitted “to the County Court Judge, at the next ensuing Civil Bill Sessions to be held at Belfast, for the Division of Belfast, in said county,” but did not specify what county:

Held, that the motion should be refused.

SHIRT, for the defendant, moved that this case be remitted to the County Court Judge of Antrim, at the next ensuing Civil Bill Sessions to be held at Belfast.

SAVELEY, contra, objecting in limine.—The Act, and the forms in use under it, contemplate that the notice of motion should show to what county the action was to be remitted; but here the notice does not specify any county, and only asks “that it should be remitted to the County Court Judge at the next ensuing Civil Bill Sessions to be held at Belfast, for the Division of Belfast, in said county” (not specified).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLL.—The objection is a fatal one. The least a party seeking to remit may do is to inform his opponent where the action is to be remitted to. I must refuse the motion.

Ex parte motion, on behalf of the plaintiff, for a garnishee order to attach £190 due to the defendant on deposit receipt in the Bank of Ireland.

The plaintiff obtained judgment on the 17th April, 1882, against the defendant for £21 17s. and £9 2s. 6d. costs, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum since the date of the judgment. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had no goods or chattels out of which the judgment could be realised, and that the defendant had £190 to his credit in the Eunis Branch of the Bank of Ireland on deposit receipt. The money was not drawn out, the conditions of the deposit receipt requiring ten days' notice.

CREATON v. MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN OF IRELAND RAILWAY CO.

Feb. 15.—Practice—Amendment—Adding co-defendant—Agency—Two causes of action—Breach in respect of one out of the jurisdiction—Jud. Act, sch. r. 19—O. XV., rr. 3, 4.

Where, in an action against a railway company for breach of contract in not carrying the plaintiff's pigs safely from a station in Ireland to Liverpool, and for wrongful conversion, the defendants, by answers to interrogatories, showed that the alleged conversion took place wholly in England, and was committed by another railway company without their sanction, leave was granted to the plaintiff to add the latter company as co-defendants.

Summons, on behalf of plaintiff, for an order to add the London and North Western Railway Company as co-defendants in the action, which was brought to recover £207 14s. damages for negligence in carrying 41 pigs of the plaintiff from Ballaghaderreen to Liverpool, and for conversion of part of the said goods. It appeared that the pigs were to have been delivered at Liverpool in time for a certain market. They missed the said market, and 17 of them were sold in Manchester, and one, which had died, in London, by the London and North Western Railway Company, for £71 14s. Interrogatories were delivered by the plaintiff, which, by consent, it was agreed should be answered by W. G. Skipworth, the agent in Dublin of the London and North Western Railway Company. In answer to a question whether such sale had been effected by the London and North Western Railway Company as agents for the defendants, the said agent answered the sale was effected by the said company without any communication having been made to or received from the defendants in reference thereto, and the 17 pigs were tendered to the plaintiff as he was informed and believed, and he refused to accept same alleging he had missed the market. They were then, as he was informed and believed, by arrangement with the plaintiff, sent to Manchester as aforesaid. The answer being deemed unsatisfactory and ambiguous, Mr. Skipworth was directed to file a further answer. The further answer was that the London and North Western Railway Company sold the pigs, not as the agents of the Midland Great Western Company, and they sold them in the interest of the plaintiff, and at the best price obtainable.

The motion was heard by Dowse, B., in chambers, and was by him adjourned into court.

Dillon, in support of motion.—The Jud. Act, sch. r. 19, allows a defendant to be added at any stage of the proceedings, and O. XV., rr. 3, 4, shows that our applying to have the London and North Western Railway Company added as defendants in no way involves our having no action against the Midland Great Western Railway Company: Edward v. Louther, 45 L. J. C. P. 417.

[FITZGERALD, B.—But in that case both parties were originally liable, and equally liable, and might have been sued together in the beginning].

The London and North Western Railway Company acquired the possession of the pigs, either as the agents of the defendants or not; if not there has been a tortious conversion, and they are liable. There is, in any case, a liability on the defendants; in one case on the London and North Western Railway Company.

The Macdermot, Q.C., for the defendants, contra—If the London and North Western Railway Company were agents they should not be joined at all. The alleged breach of contract by us is in Ireland; the alleged conversion was in England. The conversion took place without our sanction; and if we are not liable for it the amendment should not be allowed, as it would involve us in the trial of matters in which we are not concerned. Even supposing that the London and North Western Railway Company might have been joined originally, they should not be added at the present stage of the proceedings, upon the facts in evidence. And besides, the whole cause of action in reference to them arose out of the jurisdiction.

PALLES, C.B.—I think this order should be granted. It appears that the plaintiff entrusted a number of pigs to the Midland Great Western Railway Company to be delivered in Liverpool, and prima facie he is not interested in the question what agents they employed or in what way they performed the contract, provided the mode adopted was consistent with their contract. As a matter of fact they performed it in part by carrying the pigs to Dublin in their own vans, and then handing them over to the London and North Western Railway Company to carry to Liverpool. I have no doubt, then, that for the purposes of carriage and delivery they must be treated as the agents of the Midland Great Western Railway Company. The sale of the pigs, however, was so carried out by the London and North Western Railway Company, according to the answers to the interrogatories, that they could not be held to be the agents of the Midland Great Western Railway Company for that sale. As against the defendants I assume that the statement so made by them is true. The London and North Western Railway Company have, therefore, so intervened in the performance of the contract of carriage that there is reason to believe that complete justice in reference to this performance—which is the matter in dispute—cannot be done in their absence. We should have before us both those liable for the carriage and also those liable for the sale. There can be no doubt it would be very convenient, and we have full jurisdiction to bring them before us, under Sch. r. 19, and it is not necessary that both of them should be interested as to all the relief sought. In my opinion it is impossible that the London and North Western Railway Company, had they originally been made defendants, could have been struck out afterwards. It is an Irish transaction, and, consequently, one over which we have full jurisdiction, and this being so we should exercise it with all the necessary parties before us. It would also be more convenient that it should be settled in one action, and that it should not be necessary to institute two actions.

QUINN v. M'ARDLE.

Dowax, B.—I have very considerable doubts as to the propriety of making this order; but they are not strong enough to induce me to dissent from the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Baron, the more especially as I am clearly of opinion we have the jurisdiction to make the order; though in the exercise of the discretion vested in us I do not think I would have made the order on this occasion. Mr. Dillon must admit, if he joins the London and North Western Railway Company as defendants, he had no right of action against the Midland Great Western Railway Company for conversion—a barrier, so to speak, is raised between the two causes of action. If defendants were bound by the tortious act of the London and North Western Railway Company, the plaintiff has his remedy on the record as it stands; while if they are not so bound the London and North Western Railway Company are brought into the action on independent grounds, and in a case in which the cause of action, if any, arose in England.

QUINN v. M'ARDLE.

Sept. 29, 1882.—Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, ss. 1 (3), 13—Suspension of proceedings—Motion after judgment signed, and execution issued—“Antecedent arrears” —“Usual day of payment.”

The plaintiff having sued to recover one and a half years' rent, payable in respect of a holding of land up to May, 1882, the defendant, who had paid a year's rent in June, 1881, offered to pay the November rent of 1881, and applied, after final judgment and execution issued, to postpone or suspend the proceedings, under section 13 of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), on the ground that the payment in June, 1881, was applicable, in part, to the May rent of that year, that arrears prior to 1881 thereby became and still were due, and that the case came within the purview of the Act:

Held that, as the May rent was usually paid in December following, the payment in June was not applicable thereto, that the May rent was still due and no antecedent arrears had become due; and that the application should be refused accordingly.

Motion, by defendant, under the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, s. 13, for an order postponing or suspending the proceedings in this action, which had been brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of one and a half years' arrears of rent up to May 1st, 1882, of certain lands in Maghera, Kilocranny, Co. Armagh, the Poor Law valuation of which was £28 per annum.

In support of the motion an affidavit was made by the tenant, that he owed one and a half years' arrears of rent of his holding; that an execution issued in this action for the amount was in the hands of the Sheriff of Armagh; that he was unable to pay same without deprivation of the holding, or of the means for cultivating same; that he had, on the 20th of June, 1881, paid one year's rent, half of which he claimed should, by virtue of the Arrears of Rent Act, be applied and appropriated in payment of the half-year's rent which had accrued due on May 1st, 1881; and that he had before this motion tendered the November rent of 1881.

On the other hand, an affidavit was made by Mr. Ephraim Fullerton, land agent of the plaintiff, averring that the May rent of each year was usually paid along with the November rent in the December of the year in which the rent accrued due; and that the tenant had, as he believed, ample means to pay the rent now sued for.

Staveley, in support of the motion, contended that under the Arrears of Rent Act, section 13, the Court could stay an action for the rent of a holding falling within the Act—namely, an agricultural holding valued under £30—even though the action did not include any arrears due before 1881; but that, at all events, here, under section 1, sub-section 3, half of the payment made in June, 1881, “should be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring at the last gale day of the year 1881,” which had accrued due before June 20, 1881—namely, the May rent of 1881; and that, the May rent of 1881 being thus wiped out, the rent now due would consist of—(1) the November rent of 1881, (2) the May rent of 1882, and (3) a half-year of the rent which had accrued due prior to 1881; and that the tenant would, under the Act, be entitled to be relieved from that prior arrear. Similar orders had repeatedly been made to stay sales under executions for rent.

Cuming, contra, without admitting the power of this Court to restrain proceedings after judgment, contended that section 13 of the Arrears of Rent Act only gave the Court power to restrain “proceedings on account of the rent in respect of the year expiring at the last gale day of 1881, and antecedent arrears,” and that the very exceptional powers given by the section were never intended to apply to a case where the landlord sued merely for the rent of 1881 alone. He, also, contended that the payment made on June 20, 1881, could not be applied to the rent which fell due in May, 1881, since sub-section 3, of section 1, provides that “where it appears that, according to the ordinary course of dealing between a landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent has been usually paid on a day subsequent to the day on which it became due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed for purposes of this sub-section the time at which the rent accrued due.” Consequently, the tenant could not apply the payment made in June to the May rent, which was usually paid in the following December. Both the May and November rent of 1881 were therefore due, and no prior arrears were due, and the tenant could obtain no benefit from the Arrears Act whatever.

O'BRIEN, J., held that the payment in June could not be appropriated to the rent falling due in May, but usually paid in December, and refused the motion, stating that if the May rent had been usually paid before June 20th the payment on June 20th would have been applicable to it, and that he could have then restrained the action, because, by virtue of the third sub-section of section 1, it would then have become an action for rent of 1881 and antecedent arrears. COLE v. DAWSON.

June 29, July 1, 1882.—Solicitor and Client—Charging lien—“Property recovered or preserved”—Decree or judgment—Parties not before the Court—Delay in application—39 & 40 Vict., c. 44, s. 3.

C. having bequeathed a chattel interest in land to his widow so long as she continued unmarried, the widow married D., and died intestate. E. C. the eldest son of C., took out administration to C.'s will, and brought an action to recover possession of the land against D. and his two brothers, to which D. alone took defence. The trial was listed for hearing on Dec. 15, 1881, when the plaintiff's solicitor was informed that the action had been settled by an agreement; and the case was struck out accordingly. By this agreement, signed by the plaintiff and defendants, the plaintiff was to abandon his claim, receiving from the defendants £120 and a promissory note for £20, each party paying his own costs. A few days before this compromise one of D.'s brothers had, as a legatee, instituted a civil bill suit to administer the assets of C. The solicitor of the plaintiff applied to him, without success, for payment of the costs; and the plaintiff afterwards went to America; and on March 2, 1882, the solicitor applied for payment to D., but alike unsuccessfully. On June 29, 1882, the solicitor having moved for an order that he be declared entitled to a charge on the lands, as being property recovered or preserved through his instrumentality, under 39 & 40 Vic., c. 44, s. 3, or for an order that D. should pay the costs, the £120 having been paid in his own wrong:

The COURT, being divided in opinion, pronounced “no rule.”

Motion, on behalf of Charles Henegan, solicitor, for the plaintiff, that he be declared entitled to a charge upon the lands of Ardristan, and the interest therein of the plaintiff as administrator of the late Patrick Cole, being the property recovered or preserved in this action through the instrumentality of the said Charles Henegan, for the costs, charges and expenses of the proceedings; and for orders for taxation and payment of the same, or for an order that Daniel Dawson, the defendant, do pay to the said Charles Henegan the said costs, charges and expenses, &c.

The action was instituted to recover possession of the lands of Ardristan in the County of Carlow. The plaintiff, Edward Cole, was the eldest son of Patrick Cole, who died in 1860, having previously made his will, by which he bequeathed £100 to each of his three sons, who were then very young, and the residue of his property (which included his chattel interest in the said farm of Ardristan) to his widow so long as she continued unmarried. His widow was appointed executrix of said will, which she never proved; and she shortly afterwards married the defendant Daniel Dawson, and died intestate in 1881. The plaintiff only became aware of the existence of the said will in 1880, and he obtained letters of administration cum test. annexo, after her death. The only property of the testator now remaining was this farm containing about 50 Irish acres and the stock thereon. Dawson had been, and still continued, in possession of the said lands; and the plaintiff, as administrator, instructed Mr. Henegan, as his solicitor, to institute the proceedings for the recovery of the same. The case was listed for hearing on December 15, 1881, and on that day, when briefs had been delivered to counsel, Mr. Henegan was informed that the action had been arranged, and the solicitor for the defendant handed him the agreement hereinafter mentioned, and accordingly, he had to allow the case to be struck out of the list. The agreement, dated December 13, 1881, Tullow, County Carlow, was signed by plaintiff and defendant, and by Thomas and Patrick Cole, two brothers of the plaintiff who were co-defendants, but who had not taken defence. It stated that by consent of four men whose names were given, Edward Cole, the plaintiff, agreed to receive from the three defendants the sum of £120 sterling and £20 on promissory note of the defendants, payable June 13, 1883, each party paying their own costs, and the plaintiff to abandon his claim. The costs of Mr. Henegan in the action including the costs of administration less by £8 10s. he had obtained from the plaintiff, amounted to £73 7s. 9d. He had applied to the plaintiff without success; and on March 2, 1882, he sent a registered letter to defendant requesting payment, but the latter refused to receive the letter, which was returned to him through the General Post Office. The plaintiff had since gone to America, and there was no other property off which the said costs could be realised. The applicant swore that the compromise was entered into without his knowledge or consent and with a view to defeat his claim. Affidavits of the defendant and one of the arbitrators denied there was any fraud or attempt to deprive him of his costs, and alleged that one of the brothers had caused an equity civil bill action to be instituted against the plaintiff, a few days before the compromise, to administer the assets of the deceased.

Macmahon, Q.C., and Shortt for the applicant, Charles Henegan.—We are entitled to a charge on the lands in the possession of defendant; he had notice of the action, and that amounts to notice of the solicitor's costs: Faithfull v. Ewen, 7 Ch. D. 495. Also, he evidently knew of the actual claim by refusing the registered letter. This claim binds a purchaser, being in the nature of a salvage claim: Haymes v. Cooper, 33 Beav. 431. The property was “preserved” within the meaning of 39 & 40 Vict., c. 44, s. 3, on which statute we find no Irish cases, but it corresponds to 23 & 24 Vict., c. 127, s. 28. The costs of probate and administration were ancillary and necessarily incurred to give plaintiff title in the action.

[FITZGERALD, B.—Is the release of a disputed claim equivalent to a sale of the estate?]

It is not necessary that a judgment or verdict recovering or preserving the property should have been obtained—a compromise is within the authorities: Jones v. Frost, 7 Ch. Ap. 773; Twynam v. Porter, 11 Eq. 181. The defendant has no title except under the compromise. In the alternative we are entitled to an order on the defendant for payment, the £120 being money paid by him in his own wrong: White v. Pearse, 7 Hare, 276.

They also cited Früchard v. Roberts, 17 Eq. 222; Bailey v. Birchall, 2 Hem. and Mil. 371.

Eiffe, for the defendant, contra.—The charge of fraud is made, and no evidence given to substantiate it. The application is unprecedented, being made against one of three defendants, and the plaintiff is not here, and there is not a case in the books where such an order has been made in his absence. A great lapse of time occurred before application was made to defendant for payment.

He cited In re Sullivan, L. R. 4 Q. B. 153; Berrie v. Hewitt, 9 Eq. 1.

PALLEs, C.B.—I am sorry to say we are unable to agree in this case; the result being that we make no rule upon the motion. I think the motion is right, and I will say why I think so. The only question is whether it comes within 39 & 40 Vic., c. 44, s. 8. I take it to be clear it is not absolutely necessary there should be a decree or judgment, though that would be a very material circumstance. This appears from Jones v. Frost and other cases cited. If a suit has been once instituted and properly recovered or preserved that is sufficient. Has there been such in this case? That turns upon the true meaning of this transaction, which resulted in the signing of this agreement. Was it an admission of plaintiff's legal title to the land, and a purchase of his equitable interest therein? Dawson's case is that he caused an equity civil bill action to be instituted previous to the signing of this agreement against the plaintiff in this action for administration of the assets of the testator, which are alleged to include the farm in question, but it was brought in the name of one of the legatees, showing the defendant had no title, and it was a claim which could not exist against land which was not assets in the hands of the administrator. Therefore I think the plaintiff sold his interest by this transaction. It is a case quite as strong as Jones v. Frost. You cannot by the purchase deprive the solicitor of his costs out of the property, which he is declared by the Act to have a charge on, and right to payment out of. Thus would the case stand if everything were done as it should be; but it is quite otherwise. The parties are not all before the Court. The co-defendants are not here. In my opinion, the right course would be to serve a conditional order upon them. The plaintiff himself is not here, which is more inconvenient. There has also been great delay in application to defendant. This has pressed upon me; and, if it were a matter of discretion, it is a case in which I think I would not exercise it. But it is a right, and the time that has elapsed has not been sufficient to disentitle the applicant.

FITZGERALD, B.—I do not say that it is always necessary that the case should be prosecuted to judgment; but I cannot see that the right of the plaintiff was established by this transaction.

WHITE v. WORKMAN AND ANOTHER.

Feb. 23, 1882.—Practice—Amendment—Adding co-defendant—Joint liability—Jud. Act, Sch. r. 19—O. XV., r. 17.

On an application by a defendant, under the Jud. Act, Sch. r. 19, to compel the plaintiff to join other parties as co-defendants in the action on the ground of their joint liability with him, he must establish that joint liability by clear and distinct evidence.

Motion, on behalf of Workman, one of the defendants, for an order that the plaintiff do join as co-defendants with the present defendants, six other persons in the notice of motion named. The action was for £144 17s. 5d., being the amount of a bill of costs served on the defendants representing services rendered to them by the plaintiff as their solicitor.

An affidavit, filed in support of the motion by the solicitor for the said defendant, alleged that his client being in Edinburgh he had not time to communicate with him for the purpose of procuring him to swear to the facts thereafter deposed to before the time for putting in his defence would expire; that he was instructed by his client and believed that the only bill of costs served upon his said client was one he made an exhibit of; that he was instructed by his client and believed that his only liability (if any) in respect of the subject matter of this action, save as thereafter mentioned, was as a member of a committee of the persons whose names were prefixed to the said bill of costs and now sought to be made co-defendants in this action, and that he was instructed by his client and believed that he had promised to subscribe £5 to a guarantee fund which was being raised for the purpose of meeting the costs, the subject matter of the action, and that he had paid same along with other subscribers, a list of whom he believed was in the plaintiff's own possession. It appeared that the said committee was formed for the purpose of opposing the extension of the borough of Belfast in the Malone district. The bill of costs referred to was headed with the names of eight persons, including the two defendants, and stated that they were indebted to J. White, solicitor.

No affidavit was made by the plaintiff in reply.

Craig, in support of the motion.—The only bill of costs served on us was that in respect of which the action is brought, and that document clearly shows that the liability, if any, is a joint one with those other persons whom we wish the plaintiff to make co-defendants. That the liability is joint appears from our affidavit, and must be taken to be admitted, as the plaintiff might have denied it by affidavit if he could.

[PALLEs, C.B.—To make him answer now would be to make him show his hand in a way to which I would not press him.]

Pleas in abatement are abolished by the Jud. Act Rules, but not without substituting another mode of procedure by which the benefit obtained by such pleas may still be secured: O. V., r. 17.

[PALLEs, C.B.—And would not judgment obtained against these two defendants extinguish the right against the other six when the liability is joint and several—a fortiori where the liability is joint only?] The fact of the affidavit not being made by the defendant himself is satisfactorily explained. No doubt all these persons were also served with the same bill of costs; the plaintiff might at least have sworn that he only served the two defendants, or that if he served the others it was by mistake.

He cited Kendall v. Hamilton, 4 Ap. Ca. 504, judgments of Lords Hatherley and Cairns at pp. 515-6, 522. Weir, Q.C., contra.—The writ was served October 21, 1881, and this defendant's appearance was entered November 2, 1881, so that there was abundance of time to get the information from Workman himself, especially as this is an application which may be made at "any stage of the proceedings." The whole of the facts are before the Court only on information and belief. Under the old system this would have been a plea in abatement—a technical proceeding, every formality of which had to be complied with, which is not done here. Moreover, if the defendant failed in such a plea the judgment for the plaintiff was final. Again, why should we be compelled to proceed against these six persons at our risk if we think that we can only prove against these two. If the liability is as stated the defendants will be entitled to contribution, and their course is plain—i.e., to proceed to make them parties under O. XV., r. 17. But the last statement in the affidavit shows there is no joint liability at all. Such a proceeding ought to make our writ a better one, but this would make it worse.

PALLES, C.B.—My view of the question is this:—There are two different ways under the Judicature Act by which persons not parties to the record may be made such. There is, first, Sch. r. 19, which is a very wide rule, giving a large discretion to the Court, and one which has been exercised without an application by either party. This rule only applies where the new parties originally "ought to have been joined," or where their presence is necessary for the Court "effectually and completely to adjudicate and settle all the questions involved in the action." There is in the next place O. XV., r. 17, under which the defendant may apply where he claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity, or any other relief against any other person. The present application is one by the defendant to compel the plaintiff to join other parties as co-defendants—in fact, to impose on him an obligation against his will to establish a right against these parties. Why should he be bound to prove a liability against eight persons, which he may think, perhaps, he cannot, when he is content to prove it against two. Suppose he succeeds in the action against the two, but fails against the other side, he would recover, with costs, against the two, but he would, perhaps, have to pay six other sets of costs. To entitle the defendant in such an application there must be clear and distinct evidence of joint liability. Here the joint liability is not clear. We have only the affidavit of the solicitor of the defendant on information and belief, which contains moreover a very doubtful statement in the last paragraph. It may well be that there is a liability on some other members of this Committee; but we are far from satisfied that the joint liability is established. It is the assertion of the defendant; if he establish it he will be entitled to contribution or indemnity, and a mode of procedure is given to him by O. XV., r. 17; but there is no application before us under that rule, therefore we must refuse the motion, with costs.

DOWSE, B.—In my opinion, it makes no difference whether an affidavit in answer were made or not. The onus of proof lay on the defendant; and he has failed to establish his case.

FITZGERALD, B., concurred.

Appeal from a dismiss, pronounced by the County Court judge of Tyrone, on a process brought by a collector of poor rates, the appellant, to recover £1 8s. 6d. due for poor rate by the respondent.

The appellant admitted that he had paid to the Poor Law Guardians the full amount of the rates sued for, having been obliged to pay them the whole amount of the rates struck, under the terms of his bond.

Mr. H. H. Moore, solicitor, for the respondent, relied on the collector's admission, and cited Boyle, app., v. Lennon, resp., 12 Ir. L. T. 161, contending that the effect of that decision was that, under such circumstances, the collector had no remedy against the ratepayer unless the latter had specifically authorised him to pay the rates as due.

Mr. T. C. Dickie, solicitor, for the appellant, contra.—In Boyle, app., v. Lennon, resp., ubi supra, the collector only sued for money (county cess) paid for the ratepayer's use and at his request. Fitzgerald, B., said, "if he is to recover an amount from a cesspayer as money paid to his use, he must have the cesspayer's authority for the payment;" "you cannot recover money paid for a person without his request." There no request was proved, and it was held that none was implied, and, accordingly, the dismiss was affirmed because, in order to maintain such a process, "the collector should have had the authority of the cesspayer for the advancement of the money;" but, that case was very far from deciding that no other remedy would be open to the collector. On the contrary, statutory powers are given both to poor rate and county cess collectors to sue for and collect those rates in their own names as collectors: 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 116, s. 153; 1 & 2 Vic., c. 56, s. 73; and here the process has been rightly brought.

DEASY, L.J.—I entertained no doubt on this case myself, but held over my decision on account of the construction which was sought to be put on Boyle, app., v. Lennon, resp., to the effect that when a collector has paid to the Guardians the full amount of his collection he has no remedy against the ratepayer unless the latter had specifically authorised him to pay the rates for him. That did not appear to me to be the effect of that case; and having consulted Baron Fitzgerald, he assured me that such was not the effect of his decision, but merely that, where the process was for money paid for the defendant's use, the plaintiff could not recover it in that form; and he now agrees with me that payment by the collector of the full amount of the collection, under the obligation of his bond, does not absolve the ratepayer in any way from payment of rates legally due by him, nor debar the collector from suing for same in his own name. I shall, therefore, reverse the dismiss, and give a decree for the full amount with costs.

Appeal from decree made by the County Court Judge of Sligo. The action was brought to recover £10, value of two pigs, which defendants received from the plaintiff to carry from Sligo to Dublin. These pigs, along with 18 others, also belonging to the plaintiff, were delivered by him to the defendants on the 19th September, 1881, to be conveyed to Manchester via Dublin, by the train leaving Sligo at 8 30 p.m. on that day. The pigs were placed in a wagon by themselves, and the train started in due time, and arrived without accident, and in due time, at the Railway Company's premises at the North Wall, Dublin. The plaintiff stated that the pigs were in a healthy condition at the time of delivery. There was no evidence of overcrowding. On the arrival of the train the wagon was opened in order to deliver the 20 pigs to the servants of the Steamboat Company who were to convey them to England, when two of the pigs were found to have died. The County Court Judge on this state of facts gave a decree to the plaintiff for £4, with £3 for witness's expenses; and from this the defendants appealed.

ATKINSON v. JEFFERS.

Oct. 25, 26, 1882.—Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882, ss. 1, 13—Suspension of proceedings—“Antecedent arrears.”
Section 13 of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), enabling the Court to suspend proceedings for the recovery of rent, or for the recovery of a holding for nonpayment on account of the rent in respect of the year 1881 and antecedent arrears, does not apply unless, in addition to rent due in respect of 1881, arrears antecedent to 1881 be due, and be sued for in such proceedings.

Applications (heard at Armagh) to stay proceedings, under 45 & 46 Vic., c. 47, s. 13. The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Mr. Gallagher, solicitor, for the applicant.

Mr. Wm. Atkinson, for the landlord.

Judgment deferred.

The JUDGE.—In these cases civil bill processes had been brought to recover rent due up to November, 1881.

* See com., by the present writer, 15 Ir. L. T. 223, 237.—E. N. B., Ed.]

Notices in form “A” had been served upon the landlord of an intended application to the Land Commission under the Arrears of Rent Act. Applications have also been made to me, under section 13 of that Act, to stay the proceedings pending the decision of the Land Commission. The question is not directly before me in these cases, whether either of these tenants is entitled to have any of his arrears paid or remitted under the Act. The plaintiff seeks decrees to recover the two gales of rent which legally accrued due on May 1st, 1881, and November 1st, 1881. If I give the decrees that rent may be levied immediately; but the tenants in each case having paid since the 1st May, 1881, sums amounting to a year's rent, they now contend that, under the Arrears of Rent Act, these sums should be applied in discharge of the year's rent now sued for, and that therefore I should stay the proceedings until the Land Commission have decided whether the rent of 1881 is to be presumed to have been discharged by the payments made during that year, and since. When the landlord received these payments he, as a matter of course, applied them to the discharge of the antecedent arrears, leaving the tenants clear up to November, 1880. He says that the rent sued for should have been discharged before Christmas, 1881; and that it would be a great injustice to him to delay his recovering it, when there will be another year's rent due in a few days which he has not yet asked for. In these two cases there are no antecedent arrears due—that is, in the words of the statute, no arrears antecedent to 1881. The words of the 13th section of the Arrears of Rent Act, as I construe them, save me from difficulty in these two cases; for I hold that unless the tenant, at the time of the application to me, owes both the year's rent of 1881 and antecedent arrears section 13 does not apply. The words of the section, omitting technical and unnecessary words, are as follows:—“When any proceedings for the recovery of rent of a holding, or for the recovery of such holding for nonpayment of rent on account of the rent in respect of the year 1881, and antecedent arrears, have been taken and are pending, the court shall, if the provisions of section 1, sub-section ‘A,’ have been complied with, on such terms as the court may direct, postpone or suspend such proceedings.” It was argued before me that the words “and antecedent arrears” apply only to ejectments, and not to proceedings for the recovery of rent. If such were the true construction, I would be obliged in another case to stay proceedings for the recovery of the rent of 1882, although there was no claim either for the rent of 1881 or for antecedent arrears. The words “and antecedent arrears” could not grammatically be limited in their application to the case of proceedings for the “recovery of the holding” without carrying with them the prior words “on account of rent in respect of the year 1881,” and such a construction would be contrary to the whole intentions of the Act. I, therefore, hold that to these two cases, there being no claim for antecedent arrears—that is, for arrears antecedent to 1881—section 13 does not apply, and I should not stay proceedings. The other case, in which there is a small sum of antecedent arrears, is in a different position. It is, therefore, unnecessary in these two cases for me to consider whether the latter part of section 13, as to the payment or the presumed payment of the rent of 1881, has been complied with. The defendants, if they should succeed before the Land Commission, will suffer no loss by the payment of these decrees; for the money, if they succeed, will then be applied to the discharge of the rent for 1882. It has, also, been argued that the word “holding,” to which the Act applies, includes all holdings, where the money paid was applied to the arrears of 1880, but, under the Act, could be appropriated to 1881, and section 1 of the Act is referred to. But section 1, sub-section (b), makes it one of the necessary circumstances that antecedent arrears are due. I will, however, give a stay of execution till 30th November if a half-year's rent, and costs, be lodged in court.

Orders accordingly.

ATKINSON v. KERR AND ANOTHER.

[Co. Ct.]

ATKINSON v. KERR AND ANOTHER.

Oct. 26, 27, 1882.—Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882, ss. 1, 13—Suspension of proceedings—“Usual day of payment” of rent—Deferred payment—Hanging Gale.

Section 1 (3) of the Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), enacts that all payments on account of rent made by the tenant to the landlord in or subsequent to 1881, but before Nov. 30, 1882, shall be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of 1881, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of such payment accrued due, provided that where it appears that, according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed to be the time at which the rent accrued due. In construing this enactment, and applying the latter proviso, the usual day of payment by each particular tenant must be ascertained, regardless of what may be usual on the estate; and where the tenant, not paying regularly, has no such usual day, all that can be done is to assume in favour of the tenant, as is implied in the previous part of the enactment, that the question as to the usual day of payment is not to be influenced by the nonpayment of recent years. If payments were previously made regularly, the tenant should be entitled to the benefit of the prior part of the enactment. The last clause,—that the usual day of payment shall be deemed to be the time at which the rent accrued due,—taken in connexion with the preceding words, must be considered, not as a definition of what should be deemed the usual day of payment, but, as defining what should be deemed the time at which the rent accrued due, and thus to declare that it be deemed to be, not the legal, but, the usual day of payment, in order to put a limit on the prior part of the clause.

Where a process was brought to recover £14 14s., being £2 18s. balance of rent to November, 1880, and £11 16s. for one year's rent to November, 1881, it appeared that the tenant had made payments of £6 on May 28th, and £8 on December 24th, 1881. Prior to the accruing of the present arrear, the usual time of payment, a few years since, for both the May and November gales was between Nov. 1st and Christmas each year. The tenant having applied for a suspension of the proceedings, under section 13 of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882:

Held, that the May and November gales should be deemed to have accrued due only after November 1st; that the payment made on May 28th, 1881, could not be applied in discharge of the gale which fell legally due on May 1st, 1881, but that the payment made on December 24th, 1881, should be applied in discharge of so much of the year's rent which legally accrued due on November 1st, 1881, leaving a balance of £5 16s. owing; and that the proceedings should be stayed, on the terms of lodgment in court of said balance and costs.

The JUDGE.—Several cases are now standing for judgment before me, in which the question has been raised whether the tenants are entitled under section 13 of the Arrears Act to have proceedings stayed, and on what terms. Some cases have already been disposed of, in which processes have been brought to recover the single year's rent which became legally due on 1st November, 1881, and not for antecedent arrears, and I have held that the 13th section does not apply to such cases, as there are no antecedent arrears sued for, as required by the words of the section. Some other cases have also been disposed of, in which ejectments have been brought for a year and a half's rent, due up to May, 1882. In the cases at the suit of Henry B. Armstrong in which the same rule would apply, on a year's rent having been paid in December, 1881 (which payment the Land Commission, in any case otherwise within the provisions of section 1, may, by the aid of sub-section 3 of section 1, apply in discharge of the year's rent up to November, 1881), I have deemed it fair to the tenants, on the terms of half a year's rent and costs being lodged before 20th November, to stay the decrees until the sessions of April, 1883. As the Land Commission have no power to remit the half-year's rent due May, 1882, sued for in these ejectments, the lodging of one half-year's rent out of the three half-years' rent sued for cannot affect the decision of the Land Commission as to the other two gales up to November, 1881; and as to them the proceedings are stayed until the Land Commission have time to decide. Sub-section 2 of section 1 shows that it was intended that the decrees should go in this court for the sums legally due, because it gives power to the Land Commission, when they have determined upon the tenants' rights, to set aside all such decrees and judgments. It is now necessary to consider the third class of cases where proceedings are pending for one year's rent of 1881, and antecedent arrears.

This case of Atkinson v. Kerr is one of such. It is a process for £14 14s., being £2 18s., balance of rent to November, 1880, and £11 16s. for one year's rent to November, 1881, making £14 14s. The proceedings are brought for the rent of 1881, and antecedent arrears, and are pending. The tenant claims under section 13 to have them stayed until he obtains from the Land Commission the benefit of the Act. I am bound under that section to stay them upon such terms and conditions as shall seem just, provided that the provisions of section 1, sub-section A., have been complied with—that is, if the year's rent for 1881 has been paid or satisfied. It has not, in fact, been paid, for the last payment left £2 18s. of the rent to November, 1880, still due; but sub-section 3 of section 1 provides in substance that all payments made in the year 1881, or subsequent to that year, and before the 30th November, 1882, “shall be deemed to have been paid on account of the gale or gales of rent for 1881, which were due at the time of the respective payments.” This would be clear enough if the section stopped there, and in this case the two payments of £6 on the 28th May, 1881, and £8 on December 24th, 1881, should be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect to the year 1881 to the extent to which it was then due. But the next clause, known as the “hanging gale clause”—that is, the last clause of sub-section 3, section 1—causes immense difficulty. It seems scarcely capable of a strict grammatical construction, and must only be construed, as nearly as possible in each case, in accordance with the general intention of this sub-section, and of the Act generally. We must first endeavour to ascertain to what cases or class of cases it is intended to apply. Here we are met by language which, upon its strict meaning, would apply to almost every tenant's case. The words at the beginning of the clause are—“Where the rent of such holding has usually been paid upon some day after the day on which it became legally due,” and this is the preface to the clause, upon which all the rest follows, and to any ordinary intelligence if you are asked the question in what cases is the rent usually paid on some day after it is due, why, it is in every case except one in a thousand—in every case except where the tenant pays on the very day the rent is due, or before it is due, because in every other case the rent is usually paid on some day after the day it becomes due. Again, the question is not what is usual upon the estate. That is not what is referred to, but the words of the Act, "What is usual between the landlord and the tenant of the holding." And then it goes on to say, "It is the rent of such holding that is to be affected;" and this seems necessarily to require each case to be dealt with separately, regardless of the rule of the estate. But the next difficulty arising from this very shadowy and inartistic language is, to lay down any regular rule for each particular tenant by which to ascertain what is, in the words of the section, "the usual day of payment;" and we are bound to ascertain what is the usual day of payment in each case. If the question was, what is usual on the estate? it would be easily ascertained on most estates; but when you come to what is usual with a tenant—with each particular tenant—all is at large; and I observed that Mr. Gallagher cross-examined Mr. Armstrong and continued to ask the question, was there any usual day of payment? and the tenants were puzzled, for the man who never pays regularly has no "usual day;" and yet, on the wording of the section you cannot go on what is usual on the estate, but only what is usual with that particular tenant. Again, in very many cases we have standing arrears of three or four or five years or more, and then, in strictness of language, "the usual day of payment" for such tenants is four or five years after the rent is legally due. Amid this ambiguity all that can be done is to assume in favour of the tenant, as is implied by the previous part of sub-section 3 that the question as to the usual day of payment is not to be influenced by the nonpayment of recent years; but, if payments were previously regularly made, then the tenant should be entitled to the prior part of sub-section 3. Such is the obscurity concerning the meaning of "usual day of payment," and yet the whole purport of the clause depends upon its meaning. When we come to the end of the clause, the wording is equally involved and equally obscure. The words are these—"The usual day of payment shall be deemed to be the time at which the rent accrued due." Taken grammatically and alone, this would be a legal and arbitrary definition of what was to be considered the "usual day of payment;" but this would be contradictory to the definition of the "usual day of payment" contained in the preceding words—"When it is paid on some day after the day upon which it becomes due." We are absolutely obliged to seek for some other explanation of this last clause. It must be taken, then, as a legal definition of what is to be considered "the time at which the rent accrued due," and thus to declare that, for the purpose of this section, the time at which the rent accrued due is to be deemed to be, not the legal, but the usual day of payment, in order to put a limit on the prior part of the clause. The rent is to be assumed for the purpose of the section to have accrued due not on the legal day, but only on the "usual day of payment," so that if the landlord, through an indulgence to the tenant, was not in the habit of asking for the rent for more than six or more than twelve months after it accrued due such landlord should not be punished by the application to him of sub-section 3, compelling the application of money received by him in 1881 to the discharge of gales of rent which he was not in the habit of receiving or calling for until six months or twelve months after the time the moneys were received by him in 1881. The proof in this case was that prior to the accruing of the present arrear, a few years since, the usual time of payment for both the May and November gales in each year was between 1st November and Christmas of the same year. Therefore, under the clause, the two gales are to be deemed for the purpose of considering the application of sub-section 3, to accrue due only after Nov. 1st. It follows that the payment of £6 made on May 28th, 1881, cannot be applied in discharge of the gale which legally fell due on 1st May, 1881. That gale is under the clause only to be deemed to have accrued on or subsequent to 1st November, such being the usual day of payment. The other £6, which was paid on the 24th December, 1881, will be applied under sub-section 3 to discharge so far the year's rent of £11 16s. which legally accrued due on the 1st of November, 1881. This will leave £5 16s. still due, and under the power given me by section 18 when staying proceedings, to impose terms and conditions which I believe just to both parties, I shall order that £5 16s. and costs should be lodged in court before November 30th. The rule therefore is:—Stay until the 30th November, and if £5 16s. with the costs be then lodged, a further stay until next April sessions. The rule then applied is that where the usual day of payment is six or twelve months after the rent becomes legally due, then the gales of rent for 1881 shall only be deemed to be legally due at such usual time of payment, and, therefore, payments made in 1881 cannot, under the prior part of sub-section 3, be applied absolutely in discharge of the gales of 1881, but only in discharge of such gales as are to be deemed due at the usual day of payment.

ATKINSON v. KERR AND ANOTHER.

The ejection in the case of H. B. Armstrong v. O. Loughran is brought for one and a half-year's rent up to May, 1882, at £18 18s. a year, making £28 7s., the gale days being May and November. Until the last two or three years the tenant usually paid the year's rent between November and Christmas. In August, 1871, defendant paid £15, and in April, 1872, he paid £3 18s. According to my ruling the £15 cannot be credited against the rent of 1881, but the £3 18s. may. The defendant since this action was brought tendered £5 10s. 6d. to make up a half-year, but this was not enough. He must lodge £15 to make up with the £3 18s. a year's rent, and must lodge the costs. The decree will therefore be stayed until the 1st December for this lodgment, and if the amount be lodged then a further stay till April sessions, with liberty to apply for a still further stay.

In the case of H. B. Armstrong v. James Carberry the yearly rent is £19 8s. 4d., and two years' rent are due up to May, 1882. On December 21, one year's rent was paid, and this must be credited to the year 1881, as the usual time for payment for the year's rent was after November, and both gales had accrued. Defendant must therefore lodge one half-year's rent, £9 19s. 2d. and costs. Like stay as in the last case.

The yearly rent in the case of H. B. Armstrong v. Margaret Johnston was proved to be £7 2s. 5d., and the amount due was two and a half-years' rent up to May, 1882, and amounted to the sum of £17 16s. One year was paid on June 15th, 1881. The usual time of payment was after November, and payment was made in the same manner as in the previous case. The amount paid in June, 1881, cannot be applied against rent of 1881. Defendant might be obliged to lodge one and a half-year's rent, but on lodging a half-year's rent and costs in ten days, and another half-year's rent on December 1st, I will grant the same stay as in the previous case.

The yearly rent in the case of H. B. Armstrong v. Thomas Mallon was shown to be £20 16s. 6d., and the sum due up to May, 1882, £52 1s. 8d. One year's rent was paid on March 7th, 1882. This is to be applied to rent of 1881. I will grant stay until December 1st, and if a half-year's rent and costs be lodged on that date, a further stay until April sessions.

Orders accordingly.

May 22, 1882.—Judicial rent, determination of—Improvements—Tenant from year to year—Acceptance of lease prior to 1870—Imposition of rent in respect of increased value beyond yearly value of improvement-works—L. L. Act, 1881, s. 8 (9).

The acceptance, by a tenant from year to year, before 1870, of a lease of the holding for twenty-one years, containing the usual covenants to keep and give up the premises in repair, precludes the tenant from being entitled to compensation, under the Land Act of 1870, for improvements previously made, and excludes such improvements from the prohibition to have rent charged in respect of them contained in the Land Law Act, 1881, section 8 (9); but, in determining what would be a fair rent, the court is at liberty to consider, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, whether it is just and fair that any and, if so, what deduction should be made from the full letting value of the lands, in respect of the money expended on such improvements, no correlative obligation being imposed to charge the highest rent upon all that the court is not prohibited from putting any rent upon, but the amount of the rent being to be fixed having regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively, and considering all the circumstances of the case. Adams v. Dunseath, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 59, discussed and applied.

Application to determine judicial rent. The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment, delivered as follows:—

MR. KANE.—This case presents circumstances of some difficulty. The holding comprises 144 acres, principally in the townland of Dunstown, but a small portion, about 6 Irish acres, in the townland of Harristown. The part in the townland of Dunstown seems to have been a gentleman's place, with what was a large three-storied house, with the offices suitable to a gentleman's residence upon it, and was let in the year 1798 to a Mr. Brunton, under a lease for three lives or forty-one years, at the annual rent of £169 Irish currency, equal to £156 sterling. That lease expired in 1839, and the place seems to have been in Mr. Latouche's hands from that year until 1845, when it, along with the 6 acres in Harristown, was let to the father of the present tenant, as a tenant from year to year, at a rent of £136 10s., which was reduced in 1851 to £180, the present rent. About the same year, 1851, the tenant expended a large sum of money, apparently about £400, in re-roofing the dwellinghouse, and converting it from a three into a two-storied house, and in rebuilding some of the out-offices, which had become ruinous. He seems, in addition to his own expenditure, to have been allowed £100 by Mr. Latouche, apparently for timber and slates. Upon the evidence, and on inspection of the buildings, we are of opinion that what has been done by the tenant were not mere repairs, but are to be considered as permanent buildings within the exception to sec. 4, sub-sec. a, of the Act of 1870; so that the tenant would not be excluded from compensation by the mere lapse of twenty years from the date of the improvement. However, in the year 1858 the then tenant, the father of the present tenant, accepted a lease of the holding, dated the 24th March, 1858, for twenty-one years, and containing the usual covenants to keep and give up the premises in repair. In my opinion, we are bound by the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Adams v. Dunseath, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 59, to hold that the acceptance of the lease destroyed the right to compensation under the Act of 1870 for all improvements made before its date, and therefore excluded such improvements from the prohibition to have rent charged in respect of them contained in s. 8, sub-sec. 9, of the Act of 1881. But, to adopt the words of the Lord Chancellor, in Adams v. Dunseath, "It should be observed that though the absolute prohibition of charging rent contained in this 9th sub-section is thus limited, it by no means follows that rent is to be charged on all outside the scope of the prohibition. That is a matter for the Commissioners in the exercise of their discretion, and having regard to what may appear to them to be just and right." In my opinion, although we, in this case, do not come under the prohibition contained in sec. 8, sub-sec. 9, we are not under a correlative obligation to charge the highest rent upon all we are not prohibited from putting any rent upon. We are—by the introductory part of sec. 8—to fix a fair rent, "having regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively, and considering all the circumstances of the case." Surely, one of the circumstances of the case to be taken into consideration in determining what rent is "fair," may be that the tenant has laid out large sums of money in improvements for which he has received no compensation in fact, although he may, by reason of the supposed compensation by the taking of the lease, have lost his right to compensation under the Act of 1870, and therefore to the benefit of the absolute exclusion from rent under sub-sec. 9. In my opinion, therefore, we are at liberty to consider, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, whether it is just and fair that any and, if so, what deduction should be made from the present full letting value of the lands, in respect of the moneys so laid out in improvements by the father of the present tenant. These buildings are the only improvements of importance in this case. The tenant, during the continuance of the lease, laid out £40 in repairs to the house. But, under his covenant he was bound to keep it in repair, and he was therefore only fulfilling a legal obligation, and cannot claim for the money so laid out as on improvements. The only improvement on the land which is claimed is the stubbing up of furze out of one field and the partial clearing of a watercourse. On the other hand, the tenant has allowed drains which were made by the landlord to become choked up and useless, and has thereby deteriorated the land to at least as great an extent as he has improved it. The land has been divided by all the witnesses into three classes—some very good land, some upland not so good, and some wet bottom land. As to the valuations of the witnesses, there is a great discrepancy, and only two seem to have come near the mark. Mr. Fitzpatrick's estimate was £108 18s., or £115, including the buildings; Mr. Dillon's was £96 6s., with £10 for buildings. For the landlord, Joseph Milne and Philip Grierson valued the holding at £159 8s., and £190 2s. 4d. respectively. In our opinion, the valuations for the tenant are too low, and for the landlord too high. Upon the evidence in court, and our own inspection of the holding, we are of opinion that the present rent of £180 is not only a fair but a moderate rent. We, however, do not think we ought to increase it, and therefore declare it to be the judicial rent. We were asked by Mr. Wright to consider whether there should not be an increase instead of a decrease in this case; but then we have a notice to fix the value of the tenancy. Mr. Dillon thought it would be worth about £1,000 at his valuation, and Mr. Grierson £1,200 at the present rent, but we think £600 to be about the fair value of the tenancy at the present rent, and we therefore fix it at that sum.

Order accordingly.

HAMILTON v. MAGUIRE.

Nov. 24, 1882.—Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, ss. 1 (3), 13—Suspension of proceedings—“Antecedent arrears”—Receipt for rent due in 1880—Appropriation of payment to rent due in 1881.

Section 13 of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, enabling the Court to suspend proceedings for the recovery of a holding for non-payment of rent in respect of the year 1881 and antecedent arrears, does not apply, unless, in addition to rent due in respect of 1881, arrears antecedent to 1881 be due and sued for in such proceedings.

Where, on a motion to stay proceedings in an action to recover land for non-payment of rent due in 1881, and 1882, it appeared that a receipt had been given for a half-year's rent, up to November, 1880, and it was contended that, by virtue of section 1 (3), this payment should be appropriated to the rent accrued due in 1881:

Held, that the application could not be sustained, within the provisions of section 13.

Application to stay proceedings.—From the affidavit of Jane Maguire (wife of the tenant, who was in America) it appeared that in August, 1882, she was served with the copy of a writ of summons for the recovery of land (for non-payment of one year's rent due in 1881, and half a year's rent due in 1882) situated in the parish of Holmpatrick, county of Dublin. Upon the 4th of November, 1881, she was applied to by the agent of the plaintiff for a sum of £13 9s. 3d., being half a year's rent of the lands, and she got a receipt in the following terms:—

“Dated Nov. 4, 1881.”

Upon the 1st day of November, 1882, she tendered to the agent £12 13s., another half-year's rent, which he refused to accept, and which was now lodged in court.

Shannon, for defendant, contended that the payment of the sum of £13 9s. 3d. satisfied half a year's rent due in the year 1881, and that the sum of £12 13s. lodged in court satisfied the other half-year's rent, also due in 1881. These payments, therefore, being appropriated to the year 1881, cleared up the rent of that year, and caused half a year's antecedent arrears, due in 1880. It was true the writ of summons is not endorsed for any antecedent arrears, but this form of the action cannot prevent the tenant from obtaining the benefit of the Act if, by virtue of section 1, sub-section 3, his payment in November, 1881, was now to be regarded as a payment for the year 1881.

[MAY, C.J.—Before the action was brought had not the rent due in 1880, been paid?]

Yes, according to the receipt; but we contend that, by virtue of the Arrears of Rent Act, the sum paid in November, 1881, is applicable to the half-year due in 1881, notwithstanding the form of the receipt.

[MAY, C.J.—Although it is for rent due in 1880?]

Yes; otherwise s. 1, sub-s. 3, has no meaning—providing that all payments on account of rent made in the year 1881 shall be deemed to be made on account of the year 1881, so far as the rent of that year had then accrued due.

[MAY, C.J.—Does not the section say that the action must be brought for rent and antecedent arrears?]

Yes; but the form of this action can make no difficulty if s. 1, sub-s. 3, regulates the appropriation of the payment.

[MAY, C.J.—Was not the action brought for rent due in 1881?]

Yes; but they cannot evade the third sub-section, which entitles the tenant to the privilege we claim. Therefore, although the receipt was given in 1880, it is to be looked upon as a payment in 1881. The point does not appear to have been actually decided in the superior courts, but there is a decision—Atkinson v. Jeffers, before the Chairman of Armagh, 16 Ir. L. T. T. Rep. 99—which is against our contention; but the county court judge did not deal with the third sub-section of the first section of the Act. We have, by virtue of s. 1, sub-s. 3, and the lodgment in court, discharged the rent of 1881. There is thus half a year's rent due to the landlord before 1881.

[MAY, C.J.—How can this be? The tenant has paid the rent, and a receipt has been given.]

Then the third sub-section is unmeaning if this form of receipt is to prevail.

MAY, C.J.—We shall make no rule. If we are wrong our judgment can be revised on appeal.

Order accordingly.

CROSTHWAITE v. SMITH.

Nov. 8, 1882.—Pleading—Statement of claim introducing new causes of action—Amendment—O. XXVI., r. 1.

The plaintiff, in an action to recover land for non-payment of rent, having delivered a statement of claim for a larger sum than was claimed by the writ of summons, and for mesne rates which had not been included therein:

Held, that the statement of claim was irregular, and should be amended.

Motion, on behalf of the defendant, under O. XXVI., r. 1, that the plaintiff's statement of claim should be set aside upon the grounds that it departed and varied from the writ of summons, by introducing new causes of action not claimed therein, and also a claim for a larger sum as due by defendant to plaintiff than was claimed by the writ, and a claim for arrears of rent that had occurred between periods different from those alleged in the writ.

The writ of summons, which was in the ordinary form directed by O. I., r. 2 a, set forth that the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant, Samuel Smith, an executor of Wm. Smith, possession of the lands situated in Monkstown, comprising 13a. 1r. 21p., known as the lands of Kilnagosh, for non-payment of rent—viz., eight years' rent from the 1st of Nov., 1873, to the 1st Nov., 1881, at £35 a year—in all £280. The defendant had paid upon account £175. There was no claim for rent or mesne profits in the writ. The statement of claim alleged that Thomas M. Carew had let to William Smith the aforesaid lands, he (Smith) to pay £35 a year, in half-yearly payments, upon the 1st May and 1st Nov., in 1857. Thomas M. Carew died, and his estate became vested in Laurence Carew, and the interest in the lessor vested in plaintiff. In 1877 Wil-ham Smith died, having by his will nominated the defendant executor. The plaintiff claimed the aforesaid lands, £182 arrears of rent up to 1st May, 1882, money due for use and occupation from the 1st of May, 1882, to the day of plaintiff receiving possession thereof. The venue was laid in Wicklow; and the defendant likewise sought to change it to Dublin.

A. W. Samuels, for defendant, in support of the motion.—The writ was of the ordinary form used in actions to recover land for non-payment of rent, and the statement of claim is informal, as claiming under new causes of action—namely, for rent and mesne profits, not set forth in the writ of summons. The statement of claim cannot proceed upon grounds which are not embodied in the writ of summons: Moore v. Allwell,* 15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 54, 8 L. R. (Ir.) 245. A year's rent (£35) had been paid into court, covering the rent due to 1st Nov., 1881, but in the statement of claim there was a charge for rent accruing due upon the 1st of May, 1882. This is a completely new cause of action.

W. Kenny, contra, admitted that the statement of claim was for a sum slightly in excess of that charged in the writ of summons, but the defendant could not be embarrassed because the writ of summons was correct.

A. W. Samuels.—The claim for the half-year's rent due in 1882 ought to be struck out from the statement of claim, also the claim for mesne rates.

The Court made an order that the plaintiff should, within a week, amend the statement of claim, as he might be advised; also that the writ of summons be amended by changing the venue to Dublin; the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

Solicitor for plaintiff: J. P. Kavanagh.

Solicitor for defendant: Arthur Samuels.

PATTON v. COOTE.

Nov. 10, 1882.—Pleading—Amendment—Parties—Marriage of female defendant before statement of defence delivered—O. XLIX., r. 4.

Motion, on behalf of the plaintiff, for an order that the pleadings be amended.—The writ of summons in an action for debt was issued against the defendant Coote in June, 1882. In August the statement of claim was delivered, and on the 25th of October the statement of defence was delivered. The defence was drawn in August, in the sole name of the defendant, then an unmarried lady. The vacation intervened, and in the meantime the lady married Mr. James C. Wolfe, and the object of the present application was to obtain from the court permission to make the required amendment in the pleadings to meet the change of circumstances in the case by reason of the aforesaid marriage, and the necessity of including in the action the husband as co-defendant.

J. H. Moore, in support of the application.

[MAY, C.J., suggested that a summons should be served upon the opposite party. This was the usual course.]

The difficulty in the present case has been removed by a notice served by the defendant on the plaintiff in these terms:—The statement of defence having been inadvertently delivered subsequent to the marriage of defendant, she was willing to withdraw, but owing to the defendant's marriage it would become necessary that the statement of claim should be amended as well as the defence; and the defendant, for the purpose of avoiding costs, was willing to make the amendment.

He cited Seear v. Lawson, W. N. 1880, p. 189.*

The Court made an order to amend the pleadings accordingly, the proceedings to be continued in the names of the added parties, and the statement of claim also to be amended.

WILSON v. CONNOLLY.

June 30, 1882.—Practice—Transfer of action to Chancery Division—Action for rent—Counter-claim to set aside lease—Jud. Act, s. 36 (5)—O. II., r. 3.

Where a plaintiff claimed for rent due under a lease, and the defendant, admitting the lease and the rent being due, counter-claimed damages for non-performance of an agreement and that the lease should be set aside, on the application of the plaintiff the action was transferred to the Chancery Division.

Motion to strike out the alternative counter-claim of the defendant, or that the action be transferred to the Chancery Division. The action was for £80, two years' rent. The statement of claim alleged that by lease bearing date 23rd May, 1880, the plaintiff let the lands of Ballinagappa, in the county of Kildare, to the defendant, who was then in possession of the same, from the 25th March then last, at the yearly rent of £40. The defendant occupied and used the same, but paid no rent on the covenant in said lease contained. The statement of defence admitted the lease, and that £80 would be due on foot of same except for the matters hereinafter mentioned. The defendant then, by way of counter-claim, alleged that in April, 1880, she was in occupation of the said lands and some 24 acres of other lands, and the plaintiff then agreed to give her a lease of the lands comprised in the lease, and pay her £70 in cash, and expend £140 in building a dwelling-house for her, if she would give up the said other lands. In part performance the defendant gave up possession of the said 24 acres, and plaintiff paid the £70 and executed the lease, but neglected and refused to expend the £140 as aforesaid, which sum the defendant accordingly counter-claimed. By way of alternative counter-claim the defendant alleged she was an ignorant and weak-minded woman, and at the time when she made the said agreement acted without professional advice or assistance, and was ignorant of the fact of which plaintiff was well aware, that he had no power to make said lease. That he took advantage of her as aforesaid, and thereby induced her to execute on April 20, 1880, a surrender of all the lands in her possession, and on May 23, 1880, the said lease. She was ignorant of the value of the lands surrendered, and of the fact which the plaintiff well knew, that she had no power to make such surrender. The defendant claimed that the said agreement, surrender, and lease should be set aside as fraudulent and void, upon such terms as to the court shall seem fit. It appeared probable that the defendant was only guardian of her children, who were minors, and who had the real right to occupy the lands.

H. B. Leech in support of motion.—Here there are in reality three actions, and the last is an equity suit. The latter, then, should be excluded from this action under O. XXXL, r. 9, and Sch. r. 22: Quin v. Hession, 13 Ir. L. T. Rep. 12; Naylor v. Farrer, 26 W. R. 809; Nicholson v. Jackson, W. N. 1876, 38. The defences setting up two inconsistent states of facts would puzzle and confuse a jury. If, however, this court will try the case without a jury, we are content. The alternative counter-claims, by Judicature Act, s. 36 (5), assigned to the Chancery Division, being an action for the setting aside and cancellation of deeds; it should, therefore, be transferred there, Judicature Act, s. 37 (2). There will have to be a settling of deeds, which would be inconvenient in this court: Hillman v. Mayhew, 1 Ex. D. 182; Padwick v. Scott, 2 Ch. D. 736, 745.

A. Holmes, contra.—All these facts form but one transaction, and should be tried together. The real defence is the second counter-claim, which is placed second only for convenience of pleading. There need be no settling of deeds, for, if the deed of surrender be set aside, the lease surrendered will be set up. He cited Mostyn v. West Mostyn Coal Co., 1 C. P. D. 145; Storey v. Waddle, 4 Q. B. D. 289; Heap v. Marris, 2 Q. B. D. 630; Jud. Act, s. 27 (7).

PALLES, C.B.—I have some hesitation in making this order, but as my brother Fitzgerald has formed a strong opinion, I shall not dissent. No doubt, if ever there was a case for a transfer, it is this. The original claim is admitted in the defence, and the counter-claim raised is equitable. As a general rule, such a case should be transferred to the Chancery Division, especially as deeds may have to be executed. The change can only be made with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, which is obtained through his secretary. Subject to obtaining his consent we made an order for transfer; costs to be costs in the cause. The doubt raised by James, L.J., in Storey v. Waddle does not arise. The children are not here, and possibly, the real question may be between parties not now before the court.

FITZGERALD, B.—There is no question of fact to be tried, as defendant admits the lease; the action is then substantially an equity suit.

Order accordingly.*

June 30, 1882.—Practice—Memorandum of Appearance—Address for Service—Fictitious Address—Statement of Claim—Substitution of Service of—O. XI., r. 1—Sch. r. 15.

After service of a writ of summons, the defendant entered an appearance, giving an address at which, on subsequently proceeding to serve a statement of claim, it was found he did not reside, the house being unoccupied. It was stated that he had gone to America, but that his wife, residing in Dublin, was in communication with him. On motion to set aside the appearance, or for leave to substitute service of the statement of claim:

Leave to substitute service was given, by posting a copy of the statement of claim on the unoccupied house, and serving the wife in person.

* See vide Earl of Ranfurly v. Dickson, 16 Ir. L. T. & S. J. 105.—[E. N. B., Ed.]

Motion to substitute service of the statement of claim on the wife of the defendant or to set aside his appearance. The action was brought to recover possession of certain premises mortgaged by defendant to plaintiffs. The writ of summons was served on defendant at the Convent, St. Laurence's-place, Dublin, on May 3, 1882; and he entered an appearance in person on May 10, giving as his address 34 Glengariffe-parade. An affidavit of the law messenger of plaintiffs' solicitor stated that on May 25 he went to said address to deliver a copy of the statement of claim, but he found the said house unoccupied, and thereupon he left a copy in the letter-box. He believed that since the said delivery of the statement of claim defendant had gone to America, that his wife resided at 116 Upper Dorset-street, and that she was in communication with the defendant.

Teeling, in support of the motion.—The statement of claim was delivered at the address given by defendant within a reasonable time—a fortnight—after his appearance. He was not there; so we are entitled to have that appearance set aside as fictitious: Sch. r. 15. The power given under that rule existed under the C. L. P. Act: Richy v. Crawford, 2 Ir. L. T. 353, I. R. 2 C. L. 434. In the alternative, we ask for leave to substitute service on the wife.

The Court made an order giving leave to substitute service by posting a copy of the statement of claim at 34 Glengariffe-parade, and serving the wife in person at 116 Upper Dorset-street.

Feb. 24, 1882.—Lunatic—Justices' warrant to commit—Printed form of, with blanks to be filled in—Neglect to insert—Removal of lunatic to district asylum—Certificate of medical officer—Incorporation of, in the warrant—30 & 31 Vic., c. 118, s. 10.

Where the blanks in a printed form of a warrant to commit a dangerous lunatic to the district asylum, under 30 & 31 Vic., c. 118, were not filled in with statements that the magistrates called in the assistance of a proper medical officer, and that he gave a proper medical certificate, the warrant was held void. A medical certificate, described in the warrant as "annexed," but not identified in any way by the reference as one which was before the magistrates previous to the signing of the warrant, cannot be taken as incorporated therewith for the purpose of supplying defects therein not of form but of substance. The medical custodian of the lunatic, acting and justifying under such warrant, is equally liable with the magistrates to an action for false imprisonment.

Demurrers.—The plaintiff, a farmer of the King's County, sought to recover £500 damages for assault and false imprisonment, and the statement of claim alleged that W. Woods and Molloy (Justices of the Peace) maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, ordered the plaintiff to be imprisoned and brought before them as justices of the peace, and then caused him to be conveyed to Maryborough Lunatic Asylum, and there detained in custody for twenty-eight days. Another paragraph alleged that Hatchell, the other defendant, as resident medical superintendent of the said asylum, without any authority or jurisdiction in that behalf, in conjunction with Woods and Molloy, kept him imprisoned in said asylum. The magistrates, in a special defence, alleged that the wife of the plaintiff having made a complaint on oath and in writing before the said Molloy, as a justice of the peace, that the plaintiff had assaulted her, and she believed him to be of unsound mind, the said Molloy issued a warrant for his arrest, by virtue of which he was arrested and brought before the said justices at Parsonstown; and it appearing to them that he had been apprehended under circumstances denoting a derangement of intellect, and a purpose of committing an indictable crime, they, the defendants, called to their assistance Thomas Woods, being the medical officer of the dispensary district in which they, the said justices of the peace, were to examine the plaintiff; and the said Thomas Woods there and then examined him, and certified under his hand to the said justices that he was a dangerous lunatic, and a fit subject for speedy admission into the asylum, under the provisions of 30 & 31 Vic., c. 118, s. 10; and thereupon the said justices, acting in the execution of their office bona fide, by warrant directed the plaintiff to be put in the asylum, which was accordingly done—which were the acts complained of. The defence of Hatchell was substantially the same, as he justified under the warrant. To those defences the plaintiff demurred separately, on the ground that the warrant did not set forth or specify the grounds or foundation of the jurisdiction in law of the justices to issue such warrant, and was wholly bad in law. The warrant, which was a printed form, with blanks to be filled in, recited the sworn information of the plaintiff's wife, "on the — day of Dec., 1880," and the facts from which it appeared the plaintiff was deranged. It proceeded thus:—"And whereas, we have called to our assistance —, who is —, and whereas, the said — has duly examined the said —, and has duly certified by the medical certificate annexed hereto that the said James Coghlan is now a dangerous lunatic," &c. The rest was filled in properly, except that it was stated to be "given under our hands and seals, at — this — day of December, 1880." The medical certificate was on the same sheet of paper as the warrant, and was duly signed by the medical officer, described as of Parsonstown, and it was dated December 24, 1880.

COGHLAN v. WOODS AND OTHERS.—THE QUEEN v. BRIEN.

Barry (J. Gibson, Q.C., with him), in support of demurrers.—The warrant, being referred to in the pleadings is before the Court: Fitzpatrick v. Pine, 13 I. C. L. 32. Every warrant must show jurisdiction on the face of it. The facts founding the jurisdiction—viz. the examination and certificate of the prescribed medical officer, are absent; and even if the name of the medical officer was contained in the warrant, it would be insufficient if his capacity as medical officer was not stated: 1 Vic., c. 27; 8 & 9 Vic., c. 107; 30 & 31 Vic., c. 118, s. 10. The certificate cannot be incorporated without parol evidence, which is inadmissible. He cited Queen v. Atall, 11 I. C. L. 279; Hodgens v. Pöe, 21 I. R. C. L. 32; Lindsay v. Leahy, 11 Q. B. 455. Brookley (Monroe, Q.C., with him), contra, for Hatchell; the medical officer.—A distinction has always been drawn, as regards the strictness with which they are to be construed, between commitments in execution and commitments for mere safe custody, as here: Rez v. Ghafay, 7 B. & C. 689; 1 Chit. Crim. L., 113; Patey, Conv. 323, 344. The custodian is more favourably looked upon than the persons warranting the commitment. On the pleadings it is admitted that the proper medical officer was called in, and signed the required certificate.

Walker, Q.C. (Molloy with him), contra, for the magistrates.—The date is not necessary to be inserted in the warrant: Bowdler's case, 12 Q. B. R. 612; Braham v. Joyce, 4 Ex. 487. The certificate of the medical officer is incorporated in the warrant, and supplies any deficiency therein, being referred to in the warrant as "annexed," and being actually on the same piece of paper. They must be read together. If the magistrates had jurisdiction, their mistake in its exercise should not deprive them of the benefit of 12 Vic., c. 16, s. 1, 7. The court will give judgment on the whole record: Irwin v. Osborne, 5 Ir. C. L. R. 404; Leyman v. Latimer, 3 Ex. D. 352; MacAllister v. Bishop of Rochester, 5 C. P. D. 194. In Laurenson v. Hill, 10 Ir. C. L. R. 177, the warrant was held bad as it did not recite the information; but here that is not the case.

FITZGERALD, B.—Those demurrers must be allowed. Two facts are necessary to establish the jurisdiction of the magistrates, which are wholly omitted in this warrant—namely, that the magistrates called in the assistance of the proper medical officer and that he gave a proper medical certificate. This objection is not one of form, but of substance; and the doctor is in no better position than the magistrates, as the defect appears on the face of the warrant. There is no incorporation of the certificate in the warrant. The reference on the printed form to a certificate as annexed does not in any way identify the certificate as one which was before the magistrates previous to the signing of the warrant.

DOWSE, B.—This is not a warrant at all, and a warrant is necessary by the statute. It is impossible to incorporate the medical certificate, even if it were sufficient to make the warrant a good one. As a matter of conjecture, I think it highly probable that the warrant was signed before the certificate was drawn up, and the blanks were left to be filled up afterwards by the clerk; probably the merits are with the magistrates, but the demurrers must be allowed nevertheless.

ARTHUR MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

Nov. 28, 1882.—Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882, s. 1—"Usual day of payment" of rent—Deferred payment—Rent usually collected after certain period subsequent to gale day, but on indeterminate days.

In order to deprive a tenant of the benefit prima facie arising from the initiatory provisions of section 1 (3) of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), it lies on the landlord, relying on the terminal proviso thereof, to establish affirmatively that, according to the "ordinary course of dealing" between him and the particular tenant (regardless of what may be customary on the estate as a whole), the rent has "usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due." Such deferred day of payment must be a definite day upon which the rent has been usually paid, or a day capable of being fixed and defined with as much certainty as that upon which, in law and fact, the rent accrued due. And wherever, on the contrary, it is shown that the gales of rent have been paid in different months or at different periods in successive years, and where there has not been established a determinate rent day, upon which rents are usually paid, the case does not fall within the proviso in question, even though, according to the ordinary course of dealing, the rent was not usually demanded or collected until after the lapse of a certain period from the gale day when it accrued due.

Appeal from a ruling made by Mr. Geo. M'Dermot, Investigator, under the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, who decided that, owing to the existence of a custom of a "hanging gale" on the landlord's estate, which is situate near Pettigo, in the Co. of Donegal, the tenant had not satisfied the rent for the year 1881 within the meaning of section 1 of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882, and that consequently he could not receive the benefit of that Act.

From the evidence of the tenant and the rent books, it appeared that he had paid on the 9th January, 1882, one year's rent, £10 10s., for which he received a receipt discharging the rent due up to the 29th September, 1879. Evidence was given as to the dates of the various payments of rent by the tenant. From the books produced by Mr. M'Cullagh, agent of the estate, it appeared that the rent due on 29th September, 1879, was paid on the 9th of January, 1882; the rent due on the 29th September, 1878, was paid on 20th November, 1880; the rent due on 29th September, 1877, was paid on 26th July, 1879; the rent due on 29th September, 1876, was paid on 21st January, 1878; the gale due on 29th September, 1875, was paid on the 20th December, 1876; the gale due on 29th September, 1874, was paid on 24th June, 1876; and so on backwards, there being at the various dates of payment arrears of rent due out of the holding. The rents which accrued due in 1860, 1861, and 1862, appeared to have been paid in the same years respectively. The agent, Mr. James M'Cullagh, was examined in reference to the facts. Monroe, Q.C., having asked him the custom with regard to all the tenants on the estate, Mr. Litton, Q.C., disallowed the question on the ground that it was general; the words in the sub-section were "the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding;" he would not allow any question except as regards the one holding before them. At the request of Mr. Monroe, the learned judge made a note of the objection. A process was produced which had been served on Sept. 16th, 1881, for three years' rent up to Sept. 29th, 1881, which had been settled by payment of one year's rent and costs, leaving the "hanging gale."

Weir, Q.C. (with him P. White), for the appellant tenants. By the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-s. 3, "All payments on account of rent made by the tenant to the landlord in or subsequent to the year expiring as aforesaid"—which is defined by sub-section 4 to be the last gale day of 1881—"but before the 30th day of November, 1882, shall be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of such payment accrued due." We come within all these requirements, having paid a year's rent on account of 1881, in 1882, and prior to 30th November. The proviso under which the landlord seeks to exclude us from the benefits of that sub-section is—"Provided that, where it appears that, according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed, for the purposes of this sub-section, to be the time at which the rent accrued due." We submit, in the first place, that it is for the landlord to show that this proviso applies to these tenants, and excludes them from the benefit of the sub-section; in the second place, that it is not enough to show that the rents generally were in arrear over the estate, because, if that were so, there is scarcely an estate to which the proviso would not apply so as to exclude them; and in the third place, that the landlord must show that the rent in arrear was paid on a particular day, according to the usual course of dealing on the holding, and that if the landlord merely shows that it was allowed to fall into arrear, and was paid at dif-

* "Upon this"—remarks Sir James Stephen (Dig. Cr. L., Note 3)—"Mr. Greaves (1 Russ. Cr. 84, note (a)) asks, 'How can the guilt of the inciter depend upon the state of mind of the incitee?' The inciting and the intention of the inciter constitute the offence." As I understand the facts of R. v. Welham, Welham incited Hood to carry off corn which Hood supposed Welham to have a right to carry off. If this were so, Welham's offence, if any, was an attempt to commit felony by an innocent agent, and not an incitement to commit a felony, which view would justify the language of the two eminent judges. A. tells B. to put into C.'s tea something which B. supposed to be powdered sugar, but which is really arsenic. This is an attempt by A. to murder C., but it is not an inciting B. to commit murder. This view is strengthened by Williams' Case (1 Den. C. C. 89), in which it was held that to incite a person to poison another under such circumstances that the instigator would have been an accessory before the fact if the poison had been given, was not an attempt to administer poison." front times and on different days, the tenant is entitled to the full benefit of the sub-section.

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—In every instance the rents appear to have been paid after the date on which they legally became due—that appears to be the usage]. We submit that it is not sufficient for the landlord to prove that the rents were paid on some date after that on which they legally accrued due. There is no estate in Ireland in which that does not occur. Out of the 600,000 tenants in Ireland, we do not believe there are 600 tenants who pay their rents on the day on which it becomes due. The sub-section means that the rent is payable, and paid usually, on one certain day after it legally accrues due.

Monroe, Q.C., and Dane, contra.—If the construction properly to be put upon the sub-section is that the rents must usually have been paid on a particular date, the section might be struck out of the Act altogether, for no such custom prevails in Ireland. The sub-section was intended to refer to the ordinary custom and the hanging gale; and although the May rent was not paid until the November following, there never was a day fixed in that November for the rents being paid. The usage merely meant that the rent would not be demanded until six months in some cases, and twelve months in other cases, after it legally accrued due. The words of the sub-section are “has usually been paid on some day,” which does not mean any particular day. The rents on the Leslie estate were never demandable until more than a year had elapsed after they became legally due, and the first day on which the office opened for the rent due on September, 1881, was the 20th of October, 1882. The only interference with that usage was in the case of the sale of a tenant's interest, when the purchaser should pay the arrears of rent up to the day of purchase; but he was not asked for another payment until two years had elapsed, so that he might be placed in the same position with regard to the hanging gale as the other tenants.

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—Do you ask me to construe the word “paid” in this proviso as if it were “demanded”?] That is our contention. The instructions issued to the official Investigators support that contention—“By the sub-section referred to, wherever the May rent is paid in the following November and the November rent in the following May, the usual time of payment is deemed to be the time that the rent accrued due.”

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—That says “time of payment.” You say “time of demand.” Do you mean to say that Sir John Leslie could not have recovered his rents before the time at which they were usually demanded?]

We presume he could in point of law. But every tenant knows perfectly well that the rent of September, 1881, would not be demanded until after the 20th October, 1881.

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—They knew, in other words, that Sir J. Leslie was content to wait until October, 1882, for the rent which accrued due in September, 1881.]

They did. No person was ever asked for rent until the 20th October in the year after it accrued due. That was the custom.

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—It is very unfortunate that the Legislature did not say “demanded” instead of “paid,” if it mean that. If it had, we would have no difficulty with these cases.]

The landlord had been paid his rents well and punctually until the recent agitation, and had always been indulgent and reasonable. If the Legislature intended to benefit such a landlord it was surely but reasonable that Sir John Leslie would receive consideration. The intention is clear from the section, and we contend that weight should be given to it in this case in favour of the landlord.

[MR. LITTON, Q.C.—We cannot speculate on the intention of the Act. The words speak for themselves; it is unnecessary to speculate at all.]

Atkinson v. Kerr, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 100, was cited.

MR. LITTON, Q.C.—The tenant on the 23rd day of October lodged his application, under the Arrears of Rent Act, for an order for payment for the benefit of his landlord of a sum equal to one half of the antecedent arrears alleged to be due, and subject to the limitation prescribed by the statute, that the sum to be paid should not exceed a year's rent payable in respect of the holding. The tenant's application contains the prescribed statements required to bring the case within the Act, and amongst others the statement, in accordance with one of the preliminary conditions, that the rent of his holding in respect of the year of his tenancy expiring on the 29th September, 1881, had been satisfied. The application was in due course referred for investigation, and was investigated on the 18th of November. The only question raised before the Investigator was whether or not the rent “for the year expiring as aforesaid” had been satisfied. The Investigator arrived at the conclusion that it had not been satisfied, and he states in his report (which I have before me) that the case went off on the question of the hanging gale. On the 23rd instant a conditional order was made, following the report, directing that the application of the tenant be dismissed unless cause was shown within the time limited by the rules. The tenant now moves showing cause against the conditional order, and, having had the advantage of hearing the case ably argued on both sides, and having heard the evidence and examined the rent books and the tenants' receipts, I am called on to decide whether the conclusion arrived at by the Investigator is right or wrong. The following are the facts so far as it is necessary to state them for the purpose of deciding the question:—Sir John Leslie's estate is of large extent in the County of Donegal. It has been the practice to demand the rent only once a year, and not only so, but not to require the year's rent due in any one year until it had been more than twelve months in arrear. At the same time, I gather from the evidence that rent when offered at any time was not refused, even though the ordinary time had not arrived—that is to say, March and September. Rents of any particular year are not asked for or enforced until the March gale has been more than eighteen months due, and the September gale more than twelve months due, and then collected and payment received in one sum. And further, that when it became necessary to take legal steps against a tenant, the rent claimed was the entire amount legally due. In the particular case of Arthur Monaghan the rent books and the tenant's receipts were produced, and are of the greatest importance. The rent books debit the tenants with the year's rent regularly from the 29th September, 1881, year by year, and credit the payments from time to time made, and those payments corresponded with the tenant's receipts which have been produced. What do we find?—September, 1879, paid 9th January, 1882; September, 1878, paid 20th November, 1880; September, 1877, paid 26th July, 1879; September, 1876, paid 21st January, 1878; September, 1875, paid 20th December, 1876; September, 1874, paid 24th June, 1876. Going back we find the 1863 rent paid 25th April, 1864; 1862 was paid 8th December, 1862; 1861 was paid 23rd December, 1861; 1860 was paid November, 1860. At this period each year's rent was paid immediately after it accrued due, and there was no deferred payment. If we go still further back we find the September gale of 1856 paid in 1856; that of 1855 paid in two payments—17th December,

ARTHUR MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

1855, and November, 1856; that of 1854 also in two payments—December 20th, 1854, and December, 1855; and soon. We have also in evidence the fact that an ejection was brought in December, 1881, for non-payment of rent, claiming rent due immediately preceding 29th September, which, according to the alleged practice, would not have been demandable until October or November, 1882. On the investigation held before the Investigator, Arthur Monaghan relied on a payment of £10 10s. made on the 9th January, 1882, asserting that he thereby discharged the rent for the year of his tenancy ending 29th September, 1881, and fulfilled the preliminary conditions in question, because at the time of the payment the rent for that year had accrued due. This would undoubtedly be so, having regard to the earlier portion of sub-section 8, but the conclusion is challenged by Sir John Leslie, who relies on the proviso at the close of the sub-section which has given rise to so much controversy; and he contends, through his counsel, that although the March and September gales of 1881 were legally due at the date of payment, yet by reason of the ordinary dealing between the landlord and the tenant, and by virtue of the proviso at the close of sub-section 8, section 1, they are not to be deemed to have accrued due until after the £10 10s. had been in fact paid, and consequently the payment so made cannot be credited to the year expiring as aforesaid, but must be taken as applicable to the antecedent arrears, and a further year's rent must be paid. This appears to have been the opinion of the Investigator. The case, therefore, raises for the decision of the Court the construction of the sub-section referred to, and in particular that proviso which is said to deal with what is called the hanging gale. I am fully sensible of the interest which attaches to the question, and the important results which may follow the decision I am about to pronounce.

Now, in the first place, I think it advisable to abandon the use of the expression "hanging gale." The words do not occur in the Act of Parliament; and although I believe the expression "hanging gale" is, properly speaking, applied to a gale remaining unpaid after the next succeeding gale accrues legally due, still it is better to avoid language of a technical character, which may itself be open to controversy, and, taking the words of the sub-section as we find them, bring them to bear on the particular facts of this particular case. Referring then to the sub-section, the earlier part is free from all doubt, and distinctly appropriates the payment made in or subsequent to the year expiring as aforesaid, to the rent payable in respect of that year, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of payment accrued due. This provision was absolutely essential, and forms a vital portion of the Act. But for it, the payment of the required year's rent in the year expiring or expired, or up to the 30th November, 1882, would have gone towards discharging the arrears which it was the object of the Act to discharge. The general and governing intention of the Legislature was to wipe out all arrears and to enable tenants to make a fresh start in life where they came forward and paid their rent for the year 1881; and undoubtedly, if the contention of Sir J. Leslie is correct, that intention is defeated, and the payment of £10 10s. made by Alfred Monaghan, solely because it was made before the 29th September, 1882, and not after, deprives him of the benefit intended to be conferred by the Act. The sub-section, for the sake of securing the object of the Act, confers on the tenant a distinct right or benefit, and I apprehend it requires words equally distinct and clear from ambiguity to cut down or limit the universal application of that enactment. The proviso which follows affects to do so under certain circumstances—namely, "provided that where it appears that according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due; the usual day of payment shall be deemed, for the purposes of this sub-section, to be the time at which the rent accrued due." Now, the first observation I have to make is, it lies on the landlord to establish affirmatively the existence of those conditions which, undoubtedly if they do exist, must deprive the tenant of the benefit prima facie arising from the earlier enactment—that is, the landlord must prove to the satisfaction of the Court that according to the "ordinary course of dealing" between himself and the particular tenant the rent has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due. The words of the section do not refer to the practice or custom as regards the estate, but the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding. In such case the usual day of payment, and not the actual day on which it accrued due, shall be deemed, for the purpose of the sub-section, to be the time at which the rent accrued due. As I read the sub-section, there must be established, first, an "ordinary course of dealing" between the landlord and the particular tenant; and secondly, that course of dealing must show the usual payment of the rent on some day after the day it became legally due. Where both are established, then the enactment provides that that day—that is the "some day" shown to be the usual day on which the rent was paid, shall be deemed the time at which the rent accrued due for the purpose of the sub-section. Now, it has been pointed out by counsel that if the language of the proviso is taken in its literal sense, every single tenant within the limits prescribed by the Act would be drawn within it and excluded from the benefit of the statute; for the custom undoubtedly is, to pay the rent on some day after that on which it becomes due. Any construction which would lead to such a result is manifestly to be rejected as absurd. Now, the evidence in the present case shows that at an early date Monaghan's rent, year by year after it became due, and after the year came to be deferred as regards collection, was never paid on the same day in two consecutive years. Under those circumstances, can I say the rent has been usually paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due? Which of the several days shall I take as the day on which it was usually paid? "Some" day in connexion with the word "usually," points to a particular day—otherwise "some" day should be read in the indefinite sense as "any" day, or in the still more indefinite sense of any time or period. It appears to me the enactment provides in substance and in fact that the deferred day of payment—when an ordinary course of dealing is established—shall be deemed the time at which the rent accrued; but the deferred day must be that day upon which the rent has been usually paid—a definite day, or a day capable of being fixed and defined with as much certainty as the day upon which in law and in fact the rent accrued due. As rent must accrue due on some certain day, so the deferred day of payment, upon which it is to be deemed to accrue due, must be some certain day—that is, a day capable of being made certain by showing the rent was usually paid on that day. The ordinary course of dealing on large estates is to have a rent collection at stated periods of the year; and I believe I only state what will be admitted on all sides that the collection is arranged to suit the convenience of the agent or of the tenants by reference to some local fair, and that not unfrequently it extends over several days. In this case; however, there was no stated time for collection, no rent day in the usual sense of the term. The tenant might come in and pay on any of the weekly office days from 1st October, and we find accordingly payments made at all times of the year. If the practice of annual or half-yearly rent days was in the mind of the legislature, and if it was intended that the usual time of collection should be deemed the deferred period at which the rent was, for the purpose of the sub-section, to be deemed to have accrued due, very strange language has been used to give effect to that intention. If we find the language peculiar we have a right to assume that the words have been deliberately chosen, and that the words "usually paid on some day" were advisedly selected rather than "usually demanded," as contended for by Mr. Monroe, or "usually collected at stated times." I am at a loss to know how I am to arrive at the intention of the legislature, save by regarding the words it has used. For all I know the object in using the peculiar words we find in the sub-section, was to reduce to the smallest limit the mischief introduced into the general enactment by the proviso. This, however, is mere speculation; but in my opinion, the plain, distinct and paramount object of the Act ought to prevail when brought into conflict with language which is uncertain, obscure, and open to a twofold interpretation. In all cases, therefore, where the tenant's receipts or the agent's books show that the gales of rent have been paid in different months or at different periods in successive years, and where there has not been established a special rent day, upon which rents are usually paid, I feel bound to hold that the rent of the holding has not been usually paid on the "some day" required by the Act, after the day on which it became legally due within the meaning of the proviso; and, accordingly, that the proviso does not apply to such cases, even though, according to the ordinary course of dealing, the rent was not usually demanded or collected until after the lapse of a certain period from the gale day when it accrued due. The order, therefore, which I shall make in this case will be—To allow the cause shown, and declare that the year's rent paid on the 9th day of January, 1882, satisfied the rent for the year of the tenancy expiring on the last gale tenancy in the year 1881, and let the sum of £10 10s. be paid to or for the benefit of the landlord. The result will be that the antecedent arrears of the tenant are extinguished.

Dec. 5.—Dane applied for directions, desiring to know whether the court would desire to have the case re-argued before the three Commissioners, or would state a case for the Court of Appeal. He referred to Rule 17, under the Arrears of Rent Act.

O'HAGAN, J.—Our view is that, as the stating of a case would be the conjoint action of the Land Commissioners, the several members ought to hear the arguments and evidence. We shall direct, therefore, the case to be re-argued, and the notes of the evidence taken before Mr. Commissioner Litton can be used. We shall sit on Friday, Dec. 8, to hear the case.

M'MORROW v. IRVINE.

Feb. 7, 1882.—Town-park—Town, what constitutes—Agreement to take as town-park—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

Ederney, Co. Fermanagh, is not sufficiently populous to constitute a town, within the meaning of the Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58 (2).

Designating a holding as "town-park," in the agreement under which it is let, is of no avail to constitute the holding a town-park, if in other respects it appears not to possess the characteristics contemplated by the statute.

Applications to fix judicial rents, in respect of two separate holdings, comprising 6a. and 9a. 2r., situate respectively about a mile and half a mile (Eng.) from Ederney, Co. Fermanagh, in which the tenant had a shop and resided. At the time of the letting the tenant signed a document by which he took the land as town-parks, and was deprived of the benefit of the L. & T. Act, 1870. The tenant deposed that Ederney contained 40 houses, and the landlord (to whom Ederney belonged) stated that it had 400 inhabitants, while a former postmaster there deposed that the population 12 years ago was about 250. But the landlord stated that he had spent, since he got the property, £332 on building a market-house, and had built 22 houses, which had led to an increase of the population by at least 100. The tenant stated that no fair or market was held there, nor had it a local bank.

Mr. Alexander, solicitor, for the landlord.—We rely, in the first place, on the agreement.

[Mr. HODDER.—But that will not make it a town-park unless three requisites are fulfilled—the place should be let as a town-park, it should be situated in immediate proximity to a town, and it should bear an increased value because of its being held as accommodation land.]

It is so let; it adjoins the town, where the tenant lives; and the rent as now payable was fixed in consequence of the increased value of the holding as being adjacent to the town.

[Mr. HODDER, having looked in Thom's Directory to ascertain the population of Ederney, said—Really, if the town has only a population of 200 or 300 I think it is only trifling with the court to go on with the question.]

Mr. J. C. Macniffe, solicitor, for the tenant.—In Cox v. Archdale the County Court judge (Mr. Blake, Q.C.) held that lands were not town-parks which adjoined Derrygonnelly, which is larger than Ederney.

Mr. HODDER.—I think the lands are not town-parks. The evidence should be very strong to make me hold otherwise; and I say that these lands round a place the size of Ederney are not town-parks within the meaning of the Act. It is not a town of sufficient importance. In Moneygall the idea has been scouted, and it is a larger town than this.*

to stay proceedings upon decrees for rent, and decrees for possession for non-payment of rent, granted and issued at a former sessions. The question whether this court has power to do so depends upon what is meant by pending proceedings in this court. The jurisdiction to hear civil cases was given to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, by the 14th & 15th Vic., c. 57, sec. 85 and it was only given to hear and determine by civil bill. Thus, as to some cases of special jurisdiction—in cases against a landlord, who, by not paying his chief rent, has allowed the sub-tenant to be distrained by the head landlord (sec. 39), in cases of replevin (sec. 43), in cases for the recovery of a legacy (sec. 49). In all these cases the proceedings should be by civil bill in the required form, and served at the required time (secs. 65 to 68.) Thus in all cases the jurisdiction was given only when the proceedings was by civil bill in the manner directed. The decree is in force for one year only (sec. 139), unless it shall have been renewed. The jurisdiction to renew a decree was given by sections 139 and 140. The jurisdiction of the Civil Bill Court was extended by the 40 & 41 Vic., chap. 56 (part 3), but the mode of procedure by civil bill was retained in the Court of the County Court judge. The jurisdiction is different from that of the superior Courts of Record, where the proceedings are considered pending so long as the decree or judgment is unsatisfied, and these courts continually hear motions even to vary or set aside the judgment. In the Civil Bill Court there is no proceeding by notice of motion; the jurisdiction depends entirely upon the statutes, and cannot be exercised except as provided by statute. Once a decree has been pronounced the only statutable provision concerning it is to grant renewals of the decree or dismiss in the manner provided by sections 130 to 142. There is no provision made for withdrawing, varying, or staying a decree except by an appeal to the Judge of Assize under section 127. If not appealed from the decree or dismissal is made absolutely final to all intents and purposes, and shall not be subject to be removed by any writ of error or otherwise to any other of her Majesty's Courts, nor capable of being revised (sec. 133). The power of the County Court judge to bring back, vary, or annul a decree after it had once been pronounced was very fully discussed in the full court of the Exchequer Division in the case of M'Glone v. Smith (15 Ir. L. T. Rep. 97, 8 L. R. Ir. 267), which was an appeal from this court. In that case I found that by mistake a dismissal on the merits had been signed and issued, instead of a dismissal without prejudice, or an order annulling the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, as it should have been. In the interest of justice and to prevent fraud, I there assumed power to exercise the same jurisdiction as a superior Court of Record would clearly have done to rectify the mistake, and directed the Clerk of the Peace's book to be amended accordingly. But the full court of the Exchequer Division, upon the hearing of an application for a writ of prohibition, decided that once the decree was signed and issued, the County Court judge had no power over it. The Lord Chief Baron gave the judgment of the Court, and said: "I am of opinion that there is no jurisdiction to amend." He also alluded to a matter of great importance in this case, the distinction between a pending proceeding and a case where the decree had been signed. He said, "I am clearly of opinion that whatever may be the power of the judge during the sessions—a matter on which I say nothing—the court has no power after the expiration of the sessions to compel the party to bring back the decree or dismiss which must be deemed to have been made. If not appealed from it is final." This appears conclusive as to the construction of the 13th section of the Arrears Act, under which the applications have been now made to stay decrees issued at the June sessions, 1882, for rent and for possession of holdings for non-payment of rent. That section gave the court power to "postpone or suspend" proceedings, the very words implying a reference to something not yet decided nor finally decreed. And it gives this power only "when any proceedings for recovery of rent of a holding, or for recovery of such holding for non-payment of rent are pending." In any case in which a decree for rent or for possession has been issued at any former sessions it is no longer pending, and this section gives the County Court judge no jurisdiction over it. The only jurisdiction given in the matter seems that given to the Land Commission Court by sub-section 2 of section 1. That court clearly has power as soon as they have determined that a tenant is entitled to the benefit of the Arrears Act to vacate the decree or judgment of this or any other court. These applications must all be refused, and though there would be power under section 67 of the County Courts Act (40 & 41 Vic., c. 56) to award costs, as the question was a new one under the Arrears of Rent Act the order will be to strike out the case, but without costs.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.
COURT OF APPEAL.

Reported by E. N. BLAKE, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before LAW, C., PALLES, C.B., and FITZGIBBON, L.J.)

CORPORATION OF DUBLIN v. COMMISSIONERS OF BLACKROCK.

Nov. 24, 25, 29, 1882.—Corporation aggregate—Contract—Writing—Seal—Signature—Ultra vires—Statute of Frauds—Blackrock Township Act, 1863, s. 28—Local Government Board Provisional Order, 1874—37 & 38 Vic., c. clxxvi.—Towns Commissioners' Clauses Act, s. 56—Dublin Waterworks Act, 1861.

By the 28th section of the "Blackrock Township Act, 1863," it is provided that the Corporation of Dublin "shall supply, and thenceforth continue to supply a quantity of water equivalent to 20 gallons per head per day for the population from time to time of the township." By a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, in 1874 (confirmed by 37 & 38 Vic., c. clxxvi.), it was ordered "that it shall be lawful for the Corporation, should they deem it expedient, and in the event of their having a quantity of water in excess of the quantity required for the use of the city of Dublin, and for the supplies provided for the said several townships by the said statutes and contract, to give to the Commissioners respectively of the said several townships permission to draw quantities of water respectively in excess of the quantities provided by the said statutes and contract respectively, from the pipes or mains of the Corporation, on receiving notice from the Commissioners of the several townships respectively of their desire to take such supply in excess of the statutable or contract allowance, at a rate or rates to be agreed upon between the Corporation and such Commissioners respectively, not exceeding in any case the rate of four pence per 1,000 gallons, and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the said several townships respectively to pay out of the rates levied in their respective townships the rents, rates, or charges respectively made by the Corporation for such supply in excess as hereinbefore defined." Accordingly, Sir John Gray, acting for the Corporation of Dublin, and Mr. Vance, acting for the Blackrock Township Commissioners, entered into a written arrangement, not under seal, nor signed by two Commissioners (under the Towns Commissioners Clauses Act, s. 56), by which it was agreed that the statutory allowance of water which the Corporation were to supply should be calculated upon a population of 10,000, until the publication of the then next Government census; and that all water supplied in excess of the statutory allowance of twenty gallons per head per diem to such a population should be paid for by the defendants, at a price to be subsequently fixed; and by a subsequent written arrangement it was agreed that the price should be fixed at 3½d. per 1,000 gallons. The Corporation supplied the water accordingly. In an action brought by them to recover on foot of the stipulated price:

Held, on demurrer to the statement of defence (1), that, the Corporation were entitled to sue as plaintiffs, although the contract was not under seal, same having been wholly performed on their part (applying The Fishmongers' Co. v. Robertson, 5 M. & Gr. 192); (2) that, upon the true construction of the contract, it was in effect revocable at the pleasure of the parties at any moment, and, therefore, did not come within the Statute of Frauds, requiring agreements not to be performed within one year to be in writing (applying Knowlman v. Bluett, L. R. 9 Ex. 1, 307; Eley v. Positive Assurance Co., 1 Ex. Div. 24), and so, under the 56th section of the Towns Commissioners' Clauses Act, was not required to be signed by two Commissioners; (3) that, the contract was not rendered illegal or ultra vires by reason of the reference in it to the fixing of the population of Blackrock, for the purposes in question, as 10,000 until the next census.

Per FITZGIBBON, L.J.—The meterage rate under the Provisional Order of 1874 is a rate within the 61st section of the Dublin Waterworks Act of 1861, and the provisions of that section are incorporated in the Provisional Order as effectually as if they were in terms repeated therein.

Demurrer.—The way in which the questions of law arising on the pleadings in this case came under consideration appears sufficiently, for the purposes of the present report, in the judgments delivered, without setting out the pleadings in extenso. Briefly stated, the circumstances in question were substantially as follows:—The Corporation of Dublin, under a Provisional Order of 1874, and the Act 37 & 38 Vic., c. clxxxvi., confirming it, being empowered to supply the various townships with water, entered into an arrangement with the Blackrock Township Commissioners to supply water to the inhabitants of Blackrock (whom they were bound to supply, under the Blackrock Township Act, 1863) at the rate of 20 gallons a day for each of the population, the number of which was taken as 10,000, until the next census; and by another arrangement they agreed that any water supplied in excess should be paid for at the rate of 3½d. per thousand gallons. Upon these agreements the Corporation supplied water in 1877 and the following years, up to and including part of last year, and the excess water calculated on the assumed population of 10,000, at the rate of 3½d. per thousand gallons, was admitted to amount to £448 9s. 1d. Portion of the sum was paid, and portion remitted, but for the balance, amounting to £258 4s. 10d. still due, the Corporation brought an action. The Blackrock Commissioners disputed the claim, while admitting they had got the water, and also that the agreements existed; but they alleged, first, that the agreements had been come to between Mr. Vance on their part and the late Sir John Gray on the part of the Corporation, and that they were ultra vires; and, further, that the agreement was verbal, and not under seal, as required by the common law when the contracting parties are corporations, nor was it in writing signed by two members of the corporate bodies respectively, as appointed in the statute, and that, therefore, they were not bound by it. To their statement of defence, so maintaining, the Corporation demurred; and from the order of the Common Pleas Division, allowing the demurrer, this appeal was taken.

S. Walker, Q.C., Carton, Q.C., and Byrne, for the respondents.

PALLES, C.B.—This case has been so fully argued, and we have had such an opportunity of considering the various questions which are involved in our decision, that we think it better to dispose of it at once, instead of putting the parties to the expense of another day.

A great number of questions have been argued at the bar, but a decision upon three of them will be sufficient to rule the matter before us.

There are two questions that have been argued upon which I myself wish to refrain from offering any opinion. I mean, first, whether the clauses in the Dublin Corporation Acts, in reference to contracts to supply water, not being under seal, apply to the supply of water under the Act of 1874. I do not say that I at all differ from the view of that question in the court below, but it appears to me to be a question of so much importance that it is not right to deliver an opinion upon it in a case where it does not arise. The second matter, upon which I desire to offer no opinion, is the question whether, if there is an executed consideration, though the contract is not under seal, where it ought to be under seal, a corporation of this character can be sued in the same way as an ordinary individual could be sued under similar circumstances. That, too, is a very important question; but, in my view, it does not arise in the present case.

Now, the three questions the decision of which, in my opinion, dispose of this case are—first, whether the Corporation of Dublin are entitled to sue as plaintiffs although they have not sealed the contract under which this water was supplied, assuming that there is no statutory exemption in their Acts of Parliament entitling them to enter into a contract of this description without a seal. That is the first question.

The second question is as regards the defendants' authentication of this contract—that is, whether this is a contract which ought to be in writing, signed by two of the Commissioners—or, in other words, whether it is a contract which, as between private individuals, ought to be in writing.

The third question is whether this contract has been rendered illegal by reason of the reference in it to the fixing of the population of Blackrock for certain purposes as 10,000 until the next census.

Now, as to the first question, I take it as perfect settled law from the time of the decision of The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson, 5 M. & Gr. 192, down to the present, that where the contract has been actually executed by the corporation who are suing, they can sue as plaintiffs although the contract is not sealed. What is the objection usually made when a corporation are plaintiffs suing upon an unsealed contract? The only objection is that founded on the want of mutuality. But, want of mutuality is no objection when the contract has been wholly performed by the party suing in the action. The absence of mutuality in such a case cannot affect the defendant who has already got everything he was entitled to get under the contract. Now, Mr. Houston very fairly admitted that the principle of The Fishmongers' Company v. Robertson, and that class of cases, is applicable to the present, unless there were something in the constitution of the defendants which rendered the contract insufficiently authenticated upon their side. But that admission plainly gives up this objection to the plaintiffs suing altogether; for if, by reason of the defendants being a corporation and not bound by this contract because it is not signed by them, the plaintiffs are not entitled to sue, it is not by reason of any incapacity in the plaintiffs or want of authentication on their part, but it is by reason of the defendants not being bound by the contract; and that, therefore, brings us to the second question. In fact, the admission of Mr. Houston takes away from this first question all character of an independent objection. It is not required, he admits, if the second objection is good, and the defendants not liable by reason of the absence of writing, and if the absence of writing is no objection to the defendants' liability, he admits that the first objection cannot be sustained; so that we may pass over the first objection altogether. It must be ruled against the defendants admittedly if the Court should be against them on the second question.

CORPORATION OF DUBLIN v. COMMISSIONERS OF BLACKROCK.

The second question is involved in some little peculiarity. Under the Provisional Order of 1874, and the Act (37 & 38 Vict., chap. cxxxvi.) confirming it, the Corporation of Dublin acquired a certain power which may be shortly described as a power to sell excess water to the defendants here; and the defendants acquired a power to purchase that excess water. The price was to be a sum not exceeding 4d. per 1,000 gallons, to be fixed by agreement; and the water upon which that price was to be charged was water over and above what they were obliged to supply under the "Blackrock Township Act, 1863"—a quantity of water to be measured by the number of the population from time to time of the Blackrock Township. It appears that Sir John Gray, acting for the Corporation of Dublin, and Mr. Vance, acting for the Blackrock Township Commissioners, entered into what has been called during the argument "an agreement," and that agreement was that the statutable allowance of water which the Corporation were to supply should be calculated upon a population of 10,000, until the publication of the then next Government census; and that all water supplied in excess of the statutory allowance of twenty gallons per head per diem to such a population should be paid for by the defendants, at a price to be subsequently fixed. It then appears that there was a subsequent fixing of the price at 8½d. per 1,000 gallons; and, I own for myself, I quite concur with the argument of Mr. White and Mr. Houston, that we ought to read in the fixing of that price as a term in the arrangement made between Sir John Gray and Mr. Vance. I also agree with them that, as there was a reference in that agreement to the then next Government census, we ought to take it to have been in their contemplation that this price of 8½d. per 1,000 gallons, and the population of 10,000 which was to be an element in ascertaining the quantity upon which the price should be paid, should endure for a period above a year; and, in my opinion, if there had been a definite agreement between Sir John Gray on the part of the Corporation and Mr. Vance on the part of the township, that the Corporation should supply and that the township should take, for the entire period until the next Government census, excess water, to be paid for upon the calculation I have mentioned, that would have been an agreement not to be performed within a year, and, therefore, should be in writing within the Statute of Frauds.

But, in my view, no such agreement is alleged. I am not at all clear that any such agreement was in contemplation between the parties. I think all that was done was so done in reference, not to an obligation upon the part of the Corporation to supply, or an obligation upon the part of the township to accept, but in reference to the statutable power created by the Provisional Order.

The Corporation had the power to supply excess water at a certain price to be agreed upon. The township had the power to take it at a certain price to be agreed upon, and, in my view, that arrangement between Sir John Gray and Mr. Vance was entered into with a view to carrying out that power under the Act of Parliament, and the arrangement was that if that power were exercised, then the price should be a certain price. But there was no obligation upon the Corporation to supply excess water, and no obligation upon the township to accept it. It would have been competent for the township at any moment, if they thought the price too high, to serve notice to have it discontinued, and thenceforth decline to receive it; and, on the other hand, it was competent for the Corporation at any moment if they thought fit to serve notice and thenceforth discontinue to supply it. The question, then, is whether such a contract, if made between individuals, would be within the Statute of Frauds—a contract by which the price was fixed in the event of one party being willing to supply, and the other desiring to receive. That, in fact, is not a contract upon which an action could be brought at all. There was no obligation on either the Corporation or the township. The arrangement was—"As long as we, the Corporation, think fit to supply, and as long as you, the Blackrock Commissioners, think fit to accept, excess water, the price at which it is to be paid for shall be so and so." But, the Corporation could not have been sued for refusing to supply, nor could the Commissioners have been sued for refusing to accept, even if the contract had been sealed by both parties. In my opinion, this question is perfectly concluded by authority. I look upon it as one of the A-B-C's of the application of the Statute of Frauds. It has always been considered that the only mode in which you can test whether a contract is one not to be performed within the year is by ascertaining what are the obligations of the parties. If the obligations of the parties respectively are such that they may be reasonably intended to endure beyond the year, then, and not till then, the contract is within the statute. Here, the only obligation on the part of the defendants is the implied one which arises de die in diem from the acceptance of the water upon the terms previously arranged. If authority were required for the proposition I have laid down, it would be found in the case of Knowlman v. Bluett, L. R. 9 Exch. 1, and in Ex. Ch., ib., 307; and the subsequent case of Eley v. Positivus Assurance Company, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 24, instead of being against the principle of Knowlman v. Bluett, is in confirmation of it. There the decision of the two members of the court who took this view of the Statute of Frauds (Barons Amphlett and Cleasby) was grounded upon this, that they thought the true construction of the 118th article of association was that the plaintiff was to be continued as solicitor for the company during the entire of its existence. They thought the possible existence of the company ought to be considered as enduring, in the contemplation of the parties, for more than one year; and they distinguished the case of Knowlman v. Bluett by stating that in that case the contract was revocable at any moment. In the present case, according to the view I take of the contract sued upon here, it was revocable at the pleasure of the parties at any moment, and for that reason the Statute of Frauds would not apply as between private parties; and, therefore, under the 56th section of the Towns Commissioners' Clauses Act it was not required to be signed by two Commissioners.

So much for the second objection. The last question is one of a little more peculiarity, and perhaps rather more interesting than the two I have been already discussing. It has been principally argued by Mr. Houston in reply, and it depends upon the terms of the "Blackrock Township Act, 1863" (the 26th and 27th Victoria, chapter 121), and one of the clauses of the Provisional Order of 1874. I think I shall make what

CORPORATION OF DUBLIN v. COMMISSIONERS OF BLACKROCK.

I have to say more clear by first reading a few words from each of those provisions:—

By the 28th section of the "Blackrock Township Act, 1868," it is provided that "the Corporation . . . shall supply, and thenceforth continue to supply, a quantity of water equivalent to 20 gallons per head per day for the population from time to time of the township." Now it seems clear that the words "from time to time" in that provision were intended by the legislature to be used literally—that the quantity of water that was to be supplied was to be measured de die in diem upon the actual population of the township; so that during the summer months, when the population of Blackrock was largely in excess of its winter population, there would be an obligation upon the Corporation to supply a larger quantity of water per diem than they would be obliged to supply during the winter months, because the legislative provision is not for a certain quantity per year or per month, but per head per day.

Then comes the Local Government Board Order of 1874. "It is ordered that it shall be lawful for the Corporation, should they deem it expedient, and in the event of their having a quantity of water in excess of the quantity required for the use of the city of Dublin, and for the supplies provided for the said several townships by the said statutes and contract, to give to the Commissioners respectively of the said several townships permission to draw quantities of water respectively in excess of the quantities provided by the said statutes and contract respectively, from the pipes or mains of the Corporation, on receiving notice from the Commissioners of the several townships respectively of their desire to take such supply in excess of the statutable or contract allowance, at a rate or rates to be agreed upon between the Corporation and such Commissioners respectively, not exceeding in any case the rate of four pence per 1,000 gallons, and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the said several townships respectively to pay out of the rates levied in their respective townships the rents, rates, or charges respectively made by the Corporation for such supply in excess as hereinbefore defined."

Now reading those two provisions together, the Corporation are entitled to recover from the Commissioners of the township a meterage rate for all such quantities of water taken in excess of 20 gallons per head per day for the population from time to time of the township, at a rate to be agreed upon, not exceeding four pence per 1,000 gallons. I have said my opinion is that the township were entitled to get 20 gallons per head per day upon the actual population, and thus they would be entitled to get a larger quantity in summer than in winter. But, when we come to measure the excess water that is to be paid for under these provisions, it is clear that we must give the Act of Parliament some reasonable construction; for, if it was read and applied literally, it would be necessary, before it could be ascertained what sum should be paid by the township for excess water, that the actual population should be ascertained each day, and of course that is not possible to be done. But, in addition to that, the Act of Parliament contemplates an agreement between the Corporation and the Commissioners as to price, and, therefore, it evidently contemplated something in the nature of a fixing beforehand of the actual population with a view to determining the excess quantity which was to be paid for by contract. These considerations satisfy me that the words "population from time to time of the township" can only mean something to be arrived at in the nature of an estimate, and being something to be arrived at in the nature of an estimate the Corporation and the Commissioners ought to be able to agree by contract upon what that estimate should be. But, in entering into such a contract, there is no doubt that the contract could not be made a cloak for evading the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and therefore we must see what is the exact provision in the Act of Parliament, in order to take care that any fixing of the population or otherwise by the township will not be contrary to the provisions of the Act.

Now, the first observation to be made in reference to this is, that it is only necessary to fix the population for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be paid for water supplied in excess. The next is that there is no limit in the Act as to the minimum to be paid—the limit is only as to the maximum. It would be competent to the Corporation to contract to supply excess water at a penny per 1,000 gallons. It would not be competent to the Commissioners to contract to pay at the rate of five pence per 1,000 gallons. Thus the element of purpose in the Act of Parliament, in the only limitation I can find to the fixing the quantity of excess water which is to be paid for by the township, is that it shall be such that they are not to be charged at a greater rate than four pence per 1,000 gallons for the excess. In my opinion, it was competent for both the Corporation and the Commissioners to estimate the population from time to time in the township of Blackrock for the purpose of this calculation at a number which they might agree upon as in excess of the actual number. I do not think they are bound to fix, or endeavour to fix, the actual number, but that if they fix some number which is not less than, or in excess of, the actual number, then the purpose of the Act of Parliament is fully satisfied, and there being no corresponding limitation as to a minimum rate, the Act of Parliament is not violated in any way.

The question is, whether upon these pleadings this agreement is an illegal agreement or not. Now, the Corporation having a general power, as I think they have, to thus fix by estimate the population, it would appear to me that the statement of claim could not be subject to demurrer but for one element which has been introduced into this arrangement between Sir John Gray and Mr. Vance—I refer to the term as to the next census. Now, if it were desired by the defendants to raise the question that this term rendered the contract void (if it were a contract), I think it would have been necessary for them to have alleged in their pleading that that period was an unreasonable period; because if they had the power of fixing the population for any limited period, instead of taking the actual number from day to day, the only limit must be that of a reasonable time, and (what is a reasonable time being a question of fact, not a question of law) we could not assume upon these pleadings that fixing a number for seven years was fixing it for an unreasonable time; and, therefore, for that reason alone I should think the statement of claim not subject to demurrer upon that ground. But going further than that, and supposing it were alleged in the pleadings here that seven years—or the period till the next census—was an unreasonable time, I would observe that the contract on which the plaintiffs are suing was a contract, not to supply for a fixed period, but only so long as both parties chose. I think the question would be, whether fixing a price for no definite time, but giving a power to each party to revoke that fixed price whenever they thought fit, rendered the contract illegal. In my opinion, such an agreement could not be held unreasonable, because both the parties had the power of withdrawing from it—the Commissioners could withdraw if they thought at any time that the actual population was much in excess, and the Corporation could withdraw if they thought it was much less than the number estimated. Therefore, so far as the statement of claim is concerned, I think it is not open to demurrer upon that ground.

We now come to the 8th paragraph of the defence. In substance it alleges that this number, 10,000, so fixed as the population of the township, was an arbitrary number and not the actual number, nor fixed upon or determined or adopted as the actual number of said population at the time when the agreement is alleged to have been made, or at any time thereafter. I pass over for a moment the words "arbitrary number." It was not the actual number; but, clearly its not being the actual number would not in itself have rendered the agreement illegal. The actual number never could be ascertained. In my opinion, in fixing the population, they were not bound to fix it as the population upon any particular day during the interval it was to cover. In fact, I rather think they would have been wrong in fixing it as the population on any particular day. If they sought to arrive at mathematical accuracy for the purposes of calculation, it would rather be by taking an average of the population upon each of the different days constituting the period in question. But, as I have already said, I go further than that. I do not think they were bound to fix it in that way by the method of averages. I think it would be sufficient if they took care that the number, 10,000, was over and above the fair estimated average population of the township for the period intended to be covered.

I now treat the plea as including the word "arbitrary," the presence of which, up to this, I have ignored. I read, however, this word in the plea, not as meaning without reference to any principle whatsoever, but without regard to the particular principle propounded by the plea—viz., that the number should be the actual or estimated population of the township on some particular day. Giving, then, full force and effect to every word in the plea, in the sense in which it was intended to be used, it seems to me that it does not show that this number, 10,000, was not bona fide fixed as a number in excess of the estimated average population of Blackrock, as it then was, or possibly would be until after the then next census; and that being so, I think there is nothing in the plea which constitutes an answer to the action.

For these reasons, and without going into any question, except, first, the question whether the Corporation can sue, not having sealed this contract; secondly, whether the contract required to be in writing, signed by two commissioners; and, thirdly, whether upon the facts stated in the pleadings it was an illegal contract—going into these questions only, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Common Pleas Division was right, and ought to be affirmed.

LAW, C., concurred.

FITZGERBON, L.J.—I concur in the judgment pronounced by my Lord Chief Baron; at the same time, I wish to say I entertain no doubt that the meterage rate under the Provisional Order of 1874 is a rate within the 61st section of the "Dublin Waterworks Act" of 1861, and that the provisions of that section are incorporated as effectually as if they were in terms repeated in the Provisional Order. With regard to the supposed illegality of fixing a rough standard of population, I am entirely unable to see that it is applicable in the present case. The contract for the supply of excess water, which is the only contract sued upon, is a contract arising de die in diem from delivery of the water on one side and acceptance on the other, and whether the standard of population was or was not fixed by reference to some census which the parties would not have a right to use for the purpose if it ceased to be favourable to the defendants, I think it lies upon the defendants to show that the water sued for was not in fact excess water. It is not an illegality to be assumed in the argument on the pleadings. In my opinion, it would rest upon the defendants to show, in answer to an action under this contract, not only that the standard from which the water supplied assumed the character of excess water was a standard that at the time was illegal, but that the use of that standard had resulted in charging them for water as excess water which was not so in fact. They are endeavouring to incorporate an illegality, which would only arise when the contract ceased to give them the full statutory allowance, with a contract under which they have not shown on the pleadings that they did not get a great deal more than they were entitled to.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Reported by S. N. ELLINGTON, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before MAY, C.J., and BARRY, J.)

LYNCH v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY CO.

April 21, 1882.—Carrier—Contract—Impossibility of performance—Delay in carriage occasioned by operation of statute—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878—Declaration of owner—Licence by local authority—Duties of consignor and of carrier—Delivery within a reasonable time—Construction of pleading.

In an action against a railway company by a consignor of cattle, delivered in Ireland to be forwarded to March and Lynn in England, the statement of claim alleged (par. 4) that the defendants did not deliver 20 of said cattle at Lynn within a reasonable time, but delayed and detained them in trucks and waggons after their arrival at Lynn for a long and unreasonable time, whereby the cattle were injured; and (par. 5) that the defendants did not deliver 25 of said cattle at March within a reasonable time, but, on the contrary, delayed them for a long time in trucks and waggons on the journey between Liverpool and March, whereby they were injured. The defendants, by their statement of defence, pleaded (par. 14) to the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim, that the defendants were always ready and willing to deliver the 20 head of cattle at Lynn within a reasonable time, but were prevented from so doing by the causes thereafter mentioned. They then referred to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and stated that by an order of the Privy Council, made in pursuance of that Act, the county of Norfolk, in which Lynn is situate, was declared to be an area infested with foot and mouth disease; and that under the 4th schedule of the said Act and the orders of the Privy Council of Jan. 3, 26, 1881, it became unsafe to move the cattle from the trucks in which the same had arrived at Lynn except by a licence of the local authority, granted on conditions prescribed by the orders in Council; and they averred that no such licence was forthcoming when the cattle arrived at Lynn. The local authority of and for the county of Norfolk refused to allow the cattle to be, and prevented the same from being, moved out of the said trucks unless and until such licence was obtained and produced to their proper officer; and the defendants averred that such licence was afterwards obtained and produced to the officer, whereupon the local authority permitted the cattle to be removed from the trucks, and the defendants thereupon forthwith removed the same and delivered them to the plaintiff. They further pleaded (par. 15) to the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim, referring to the same Sanitary Act and orders in Council, and stating that the defendants carried the cattle with due and reasonable speed as far as the town of Peterborough, on the borders of the county of Norfolk, and that it was unlawful to move or carry the cattle from Peterborough to March without a licence of the local authority of the county of Norfolk, and that previous to the arrival of the cattle at Peterborough the plaintiff had not obtained such licence, nor was any such licence given, and by reason of the premises it became unlawful to carry the cattle further on the journey, and the cattle were prevented from being so carried for a time, and did remain at Peterborough for a time. To the 14th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff replied that one of the conditions prescribed by the Privy Council upon which the said licence would be granted was, that the owner of the cattle would make and sign a declaration, as in the schedule to the order set forth, and the plaintiff, as the owner of the cattle, made and signed the said declaration, and at the request of the defendants, and before the cattle were despatched from Liverpool on the way to Lynn, delivered the declaration to the defendants, but the defendants did not forward the declaration to Lynn with the cattle, so as to have the same forthcoming when the cattle arrived at Lynn or March; but, on the contrary, negligently made default in so doing; that the local authority at Lynn was always ready and willing to grant the licence upon the production by the defendants of the declaration, and the refusal of the local authority to allow the cattle to be removed from the waggons was occasioned by the neglect and default of the defendants in not producing the declaration to the said local authority. To the 15th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff replied to the effect that the licence there referred to was obtainable from the proper local authority on the arrival of the cattle at Peterborough by the production to the local authority of a declaration in writing made by the plaintiff and delivered by him to the defendants before the departure of the cattle from Liverpool, and which declaration the defendants negligently and improperly omitted to produce to the said local authority, by reason whereof a licence for the removal of the cattle from Peterborough could not for a long time be obtained, and the delay in the 15th paragraph mentioned was occasioned thereby. The defendants having demurred to those replications, on the ground that they did not disclose any contract or obligation upon the part of the defendants to forward the declaration to the local authority:

Held, allowing the demurrer, that the defendants were under no obligation, by any express or implied contract, or by reason of any duty otherwise imposed on them, to procure the licenses, nor was any duty imposed on them to forward the declaration; but that, the contract being to carry and deliver within a reasonable time, and not at any specified time, the case did not fall within the doctrine that, if a person contracts absolutely to do a certain act, he is not discharged from his obligation by the supervention of circumstances rendering performance difficult or impossible; while for delay in carriage within such reasonable time, occasioned by the regulations of the Act and Order in Council, they would not be responsible under the circumstances appearing.

Demurrer by the defendants to certain replies pleaded by the plaintiff to the statement of defence.

The statement of claim (paragraph 1) alleged that the defendants were carriers of cattle for hire from Dublin and Drogheda to Lynn and March, in England. The 2nd paragraph alleged that the plaintiff delivered to the defendants, as such carriers, 45 head of the cattle to be by the defendants carried from Dublin to March, with all due and reasonable speed, and at March to be delivered for the plaintiff within a reasonable time. The 3rd paragraph alleged that at Liverpool it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendants that the defendants would carry 20 of the said 45 head of cattle to Lynn, instead of March, and there deliver them within a reasonable time. By the 4th paragraph it was stated that the defendants did not deliver the said 20 cattle at Lynn within a reasonable time, but delayed and detained them in trucks and waggons after their arrival at Lynn for a long and unreasonable time, whereby the cattle were injured, and the plaintiff put to expense in feeding them, and so forth. By the 5th paragraph it was alleged that the defendants did not deliver the 25 head of cattle destined for March within a reasonable time, but, on the contrary, delayed them for a long time in trucks and waggons on the journey between Liverpool and March, whereby they were injured, and deteriorated in value.

The 14th paragraph of the defence, pleaded to the 4th paragraph of the statement of claim, alleged that the defendants were always ready and willing to deliver the 20 head of cattle at Lynn within a reasonable time, but were prevented from so doing by the causes therein mentioned. The defendants then referred to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and stated in substance that by an order of the Privy Council, made in pursuance of that Act, the county of Norfolk, in which Lynn is situate, was declared to be an area infected with foot and mouth disease; and that under the 4th schedule of the said Act and the orders of the Privy Council of Jan. 3, 26, 1881, it became unsafe to move the said cattle from the trucks in which the same had arrived at Lynn except by a licence of the local authority, granted on conditions prescribed by the orders in Council; and the defendants averred that no such licence was forthcoming when the said cattle arrived at Lynn. The local authority of and for the county of Norfolk refused to allow the cattle to be, and prevented the same from being, moved out of the said trucks unless and until such licence as aforesaid was obtained and produced to their proper officer, and the defendants averred that such licence was afterwards obtained and produced to the said officer, whereupon the local authority permitted the said cattle to be removed from the said trucks, and the defendants thereupon forthwith removed the same and delivered them to the plaintiff. The 15th par. of the defence, pleaded to the 5th par. of the statement of claim, referred to the same sanitary Act and orders in Council. It stated that the defendants carried the said cattle with due and reasonable speed as far as the town of Peterborough, which is on the borders of the county of Norfolk, and that it was unlawful to move or carry the said cattle from the said town of Peterborough unto the said town of March without a licence of the local authority of the said county of Norfolk, and that previous to the arrival of the said cattle at Peterborough the plaintiff had not obtained such licence, nor was any such licence given, and by reason of the premises it became unlawful to carry the cattle further on the said journey, and the cattle were prevented from being so carried for a time, and did remain at Peterborough for a time.

To the 14th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff

replied to the following effect, viz.—that one of the conditions prescribed by the Privy Council upon which the said licences would be granted was, that the owner of the cattle would make and sign a declaration, as in the schedule to the order set forth, and the plaintiff, as the owner of the said cattle, made and signed the said declaration, and at the request of the defendants, and before the said cattle were despatched from Liverpool on the way to Lynn, delivered the said declaration to the defendants, but the defendants did not forward the said declaration to Lynn with the said cattle, so as to have the same forthcoming when the said cattle arrived at Lynn or March, but, on the contrary, negligently made default in so doing; that the local authority at Lynn was always ready and willing to grant the said licence upon the production by the defendants of the said declaration, and the refusal of the local authority to allow the said cattle to be removed from the said waggons was occasioned by the neglect and default of the defendants in not producing the declaration to the said local authority. To the 15th paragraph of the defence the plaintiff replied to the effect that the licence there referred to was obtainable from the proper local authority on the arrival of the cattle at Peterborough by the production to the said local authority of a declaration in writing made by the plaintiff and delivered by him to the defendants before the departure of the said cattle from Liverpool, and which declaration the defendants negligently and improperly omitted to produce to the said local authority, by reason whereof a licence for the removal of the cattle from Peterborough could not for a long time be obtained, and the delay in the 15th paragraph mentioned was occasioned thereby. To those replications the defendants demurred, on the ground that they did not disclose any contract or obligation upon the part of the defendants to forward the declaration to the local authority.

MAX, C.J. (after referring to the pleadings)—It seems that the substantial point to be determined on the pleadings is that referred to by the demurrer to the replies—namely, Did any obligation rest on the defendants, by any contract, express or implied, existing between them and the plaintiff, or by reason of any duty imposed on them, and arising out of the facts alleged, to procure these licences, so rendered necessary by the Act of 1878, and the Orders in Council, made in pursuance of its provisions. First, referring to the reply to the 14th paragraph of the statement of defence, it is conceded upon the pleadings that, in order to the removal of the cattle from the station at Lynn, it was necessary that the local authority at Lynn should have given a licence for that purpose. Then it appears from the Order in Council of the 3rd of January, 1881 (sec. 9, A, sub-sec. 1), that these animals ought not to have been moved, except with a licence of the local authority on a certificate of a veterinary inspector, certifying that the animals were not affected with foot and mouth disease, and had not, to the best of his knowledge and belief, been exposed to the infection of the foot and mouth disease, or on a declaration, such as is indicated in Form A in the schedule to the order, or to the like effect, made by the owner of the animals described in the declaration, or his agent authorised in writing for that purpose. The declaration in Form A is to the effect that the declarant declares that to the best of his knowledge and belief the animals specified are not affected with foot and mouth disease, and have not been exposed to the infection of such disease. Now, with regard to the obtaining this certificate of the veterinary inspector, under the first branch of the alternative in sec. 9, sub-sec. 1, it seems clear that the procurement of such certificate rested with the plaintiff, the owner of the cattle, and so also it was incumbent on the owner of the cattle, or his duly appointed agent, to make the declaration mentioned in the second branch of the alternative. The allegation in the reply to the 14th paragraph of the statement of defence is that the plaintiff duly made the proper declaration before the cattle left Liverpool for Lynn; and at the request of the defendants delivered the same to the defendants; but the defendants did not forward the said declaration to Lynn with the said cattle, so as to have the same forthcoming when the said cattle arrived at Lynn, but, on the contrary, negligently made default in so doing; by reason of which default the local authority refused to allow the cattle to be removed. This allegation, that the declaration was delivered to the defendants, is singularly bare and meagre. There is no allegation that it was delivered to the defendants to be delivered by them to the local authority at Lynn; there is not even an allegation that the defendants were informed of the nature and object of such declaration, or were aware of the necessity of its production to the local authority. There is the utter absence of any statement, or any express contract or undertaking by the defendants, to forward the declaration to Lynn. No fact being, therefore, stated from which such a contract could be implied, and no express contract being alleged, contract of this nature, and all reference to the forwarding this declaration seems out of the case; and it therefore seems unnecessary to inquire whether such contract, if entered into, would have bound the defendants, or would have been void ultra vires, with the additional objection that it would have been a contract by parol, and that the defendants are a corporation. It is, secondly, to be considered whether any duty rested on the defendants to forward this declaration to Lynn; the allegation that the defendants were guilty of negligence and default in not forwarding the declaration having no legal significance unless facts are alleged from which such duty could be deduced. The defendants were carriers of cattle, and as such were prima facie bound to carry them safely to their destination and deliver them within a reasonable time; but that, I think, was the limit of their duty as carriers. No additional special duty rested on them as carriers, owing to the exceptional fact that Lynn, the place of destination, was within an infected area, and it is simply in their capacity of carriers that the defendants are sued: I think the replication to the 14th paragraph of the statement of defence, is wholly defective in not showing any contract between the parties with reference to the obtaining the necessary licence, nor any fact out of which the suggested duty in that behalf arose.

It was argued by the plaintiff that this case falls within the doctrine that if a person contracts absolutely to do a certain act, he is not in any case discharged from his obligation by the superintention of acts, rendering performance difficult or even impossible. Richards v. Easto, 15 M. & W. 253, and other cases on this point, were referred to, but I do not think this principle applicable to the present case. The defendants did not enter into a contract, express or implied, to carry and deliver the cattle at any specified time, but within a reasonable time, and so it is pleaded in the statement of claim. Whether they were or were not conveyed and delivered within such reasonable time would depend on all the circumstances. They would not, I think, be responsible for delay occasioned by the regulations springing out of the Act of Parliament, and the Orders in Council, and particularly not in the present case, in which, as appears from the reply, the existence of these regulations and the necessity of procuring a licence for the transmission and delivery of the cattle, were known to the plaintiff; nor could the plaintiff be heard to complain of delay occasioned by the absence of the proper licence, and the obligation to take proper steps to procure the licence rested not on the defendants, but on himself. He was the owner of the cattle, and was aware that a licence for their delivery was necessary. It was clearly incumbent on him to procure the proper passport for his cattle, and any loss occasioned by delay in obtaining that licence ought, I think, to fall on him. I think both these replications are bad and insufficient.

But, finally, the counsel for the plaintiff argued that these defences were insufficient because they contained no allegation that it was the duty of the plaintiff to procure these licences; but such an allegation was, in my opinion, wholly uncalled for. Upon the facts stated in these pleadings, I think it appeared that it was not the duty of the defendants to procure them. On the contrary, it appears, in my opinion, that any such duty was imposed on the plaintiff, the owner of the cattle, and who were interested in their transmission and delivery, and who had it in their power to take proper steps to procure them. I think these demurrers should be allowed.

BARRY, J.—I concur in thinking that the defences are good, and the replications bad. The pleaders at both sides seem to have been curiously afraid of each other, or of their own respective cases, as on neither side is the proposition which has been contended for in the argument before us, specifically, in plain language, raised on the pleading. The defendants contended that the duty of procuring the licence of the local authority was cast on the plaintiff, and mean to assert that the delay in the delivery was caused by his default in not obtaining it, but though the statement of defence is certainly not remarkable for brevity it does not from first to last contain a simple averment of either of these propositions, but we are left to infer the grounds of defence from statements of the vaguest character. On the other hand, the plaintiff's counsel have first strenuously required that the duty of procuring the licence lay on the defendants, but, secondly, they assert that there is a practice whereby the railway company take charge of the owner's declaration (Form A), and have it on the proper occasion for production to the authorities; and that this practice was duly followed by the plaintiff, so that there was, in fact, a contract on the part of the defendants to carry forward the declaration and produce it at the station of delivery; and that the delay was occasioned by their breach of that contract. This contention they seek to raise on the replication; but, it is only necessary to read the replication to see that it is wholly insufficient in its averment.

We were much pressed with an argument that the statement of defence admits an absolute and unconditional contract to carry and deliver within a reasonable time, and admits a breach of that contract, and that the defendants cannot rely on the want of the licence as they had not made it an express condition of the contract that the plaintiff should obtain the licence. This argument might, and most probably would, have prevailed under the former system of pleading, but I think under the existing system we may interpret the defence in a more liberal spirit, and it seems to me that the fair result of this pleading may be held to be—"True it is, there was a delay in the delivery of the cattle, but we, the defendants, did everything in due performance of our contract as carriers. We carried and were ready and willing to deliver within a reasonable time, and the delay was solely caused by you (the plaintiff) failing to obtain the licence necessary by law for enabling you to take delivery of the cattle." On this construction, I think the defence a good one, though vaguely pleaded, and, for the reasons stated, I think the replications bad.

MURTAGH v. MARQUIS OF BATH.

March 11, 1882.—L. & T. Act, 1870, s. 65—Payment of grand jury cess—Sale of tenant-right under Ulster Custom—Creation of new tenancy—Implied term that purchaser shall continue to pay all the rates.

Where, subsequent to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1870, the tenant of a holding, subject to the Ulster tenant-right custom, who had been liable to pay the entire grand jury cess, sold his interest, and the purchase-money was paid into the estate office and the purchaser put into possession by the agent:

Held, that a new tenancy in the purchaser was created, but that it was an implied term thereof that he should continue liable to pay the whole grand jury cess, section 65 of the statute not preventing such an agreement from being entered into.

Appeal (heard at Monaghan) from dismissal of civil bill process, brought to recover grand jury cess, under the circumstances stated in the judgment.

J. Ross, for the tenant.

Mr. M'William, solicitor, for the landlord.

LAWSON, J.—In this case the plaintiff sought to recover a sum of 11s. 4d. county rates paid by him, relying upon the 65th section of the Land Act of 1870, whereby, with respect to tenancies created subsequently, half the county rates are to be paid by the landlord. The question is one of general importance as affecting the sale of the tenant right. It appears that in February, 1880, Woods, who was tenant of a farm under the Marquis of Bath, applied to the office for leave to sell his farm to Murtagh, the plaintiff, for a sum of £70. The agent gave the permission, and the purchase money, £70, was paid into the office according to the usual custom, and after deducting from it the half year's rent due, the balance was paid over to Woods, and the bailiff of the estate went and put Murtagh into possession. It is relied on that this was a surrender of the old and the creation of a new tenancy, and that, therefore, the 65th section transferred the liability to half the rates to the landlord. It is, I think, in point of law, the creation of a new tenancy, but that was a tenancy subject to all the conditions and obligations of the preceding tenant, and as he was bound to pay all the rate, the new tenant is under the same obligation. The section relied upon does not prevent the entering into an agreement which would render the tenant liable to all the rate, and in my opinion that term is implied in this contract, and is just as binding as if it had been expressly mentioned. It would be very injurious to the tenants themselves to hold that such a transaction did not give to the incoming tenant all the rights which his predecessors had, and if he has the rights he also takes all the liabilities of his predecessors. I must, therefore, dismiss this process.

Order accordingly.

LAND COMMISSION.

Reported by E. N. BLAKE, Barrister-at-Law.

(Before O'HAGAN, J., E. F. LITTON, Q.C., LORD MONCK, and J. E. VERNON, Esq.)

ARTHUR and WILLIAM MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

Dec. 8, 11, 1881.—Arrears of Rent (Ir.) Act, 1882, s. 1—"Usual day of payment" of rent—Deferred payment—Rent usually collected after certain period subsequent to gale day, but on indeterminate days.

In order to deprive a tenant of the benefit prima facie arising from the initiatory provisions of section 1 (3) of the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vic., c. 47), it lies on the landlord, relying on the terminal proviso thereof, to establish affirmatively that, according to the "ordinary course of dealing" between him and the particular tenant the rent has "usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due." Such deferred day of payment must be a definite day upon which the rent has been usually paid, or a day capable of being fixed and defined with as much certainty as that upon which, in law and fact, the rent accrued due.

Appeal from rulings made by Mr. George M'Dermot, barrister-at-law, Investigator, under the Arrears of Rent Act, 1882, who decided that, owing to the existence of a custom allowing a "hanging gale" on the landlord's estate, the tenants had not satisfied the rent for the year 1881 within the meaning of section 1, and that consequently they were not entitled to the benefit of the Act. The case of the tenant Arthur Monaghan had been argued on a previous occasion before Mr. Litton, Q.C. (reported, ante, p. 107), who desired that the question involved should be re-argued before the full Court, it alone having power to state a case for the Court of Appeal. The circumstances appearing (already stated in the previous report) are sufficiently explained, for the purposes of the present report, in the judgment delivered.

Weir, Q.C. (with him P. White), for the appellant tenants.—There has been no uniform course of dealing as regards the period of or for payment; and any theory as to the time of its being demandable, sought to be set up by the landlord, conflicts with the whole practice prevailing between the parties. It is not the date on which the agent was prepared to receive the rent, but that on which it was actually paid that is to determine the question; nor is it to be governed by evidence of a general custom, but of particular dealings between the parties—and so Mr. Commissioner Litton ruled, excluding the former evidence.

[Mr. VERNON.—In the evidence given before him, was there any of any notification to the particular tenant that the rent would be expected to be paid on the day the office was opened?] The evidence showed that no notification was given, verbally or otherwise.

[Monroe, Q.C.—One of the objects we had in asking the general evidence as to the usage of the estate to be received was because everybody knew it as an admitted understanding. Mr. LITTON, Q.C.—What evidence was there of that? Monroe, Q.C.—The question was not allowed to be asked.]

The onus of showing that the tenant is not entitled to the benefit of the enactment lies on the landlord. The statute must be construed according to the plain meaning of the terms used, and not by speculating on its intention or intentions. It does not even mention the word "hanging gale." "Time" and "day" are distinctively used; and to construe "day" in the sense contended for by the landlord would be to give to it different meanings in different places closely connected. "Day" in s. 1, sub-s. (3) is used in apposition to "gale day" in s. 1 (a); and what is provided for is a usual day of payment later than the gale day. If "some day" be interpreted to mean any day the proviso would be universally applicable, instead of operating as a mere exception. Taken with the words "has usually been paid," followed by "usual day of payment," the

MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

"some day" must mean a day certain on which the rent has been paid (not a day for payment), substituted for the definite day on which the rent accrues due. But, not only is there no evidence of any such specific day of payment, but there is none even of any specific day of demand.

Monroe, Q.C., and Dane, contra.—According to the judgment already pronounced, wherever it is shown that the gales of rent have been paid in different months or at different periods in successive years, and where there has not been established a determinate rent day upon which the rents are usually paid, the case would not fall within the proviso, even though according to the ordinary course of dealing, the rent was not usually demanded or collected until after the lapse of a certain period from the gale day when it accrued due: 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 107. On that determination there is no case in which this sub-section could apply unless there was a specified day after the rent became due fixed for the payment; or in other words, if one landlord said, "You may have up to November 5th for payment," and another said, "You may have what time you like for payment," in one case the Act of Parliament would apply, and in the other it would not. It is perfectly manifest that the mischief intended to be met by the first part of the sub-section was that there might be a considerable amount of arrears existing on a landlord's estate, and if rent was paid at a certain time the law would appropriate that payment to the rent that accrued due at the earliest period, and therefore the Legislature said—"True, that would be the natural course of appropriation; but if you can show any rent has been paid in 1881, or down to November, 1882, we appropriate that to the rent of 1881; but that is not to apply to a case where, although the rent becomes payable, it is thoroughly well known and thoroughly well understood that, though payable, it is not to be paid," or in other words, "You are not to appropriate payments made in 1881 or 1882 to the payment of rent in 1881 in those cases in which, although payable, it was well known it was not to be paid until the year afterwards." What the Legislature had in view was what is called the custom of the "hanging gale;" and the Instructions to Investigators issued by this court seem to have had that construction in contemplation. "Some day" means any usual day for payment (and "for" should be read instead of "of"), between two particular periods, on which payment can be fairly demanded according to usage, and before which it would not be payable. Here the rent was by usage payable on or after the 20th of October. The fair was then held. If the tenants so knew and understood, there was no occasion to send them a notice.

[O'HAGAN, J.—You could have cross-examined them as to their knowledge of any such custom. But, could you ask what was the usual custom on the estate, not having shown the knowledge of any particular tenant?]

We should first lay a foundation, by showing a custom existed. There was a tacit understanding that it was not to be payable for a year. As regards the civil bill process, we were obliged to endorse all the rent then legally accrued due, under Deasy's Act.

[Mr. LITTON, Q.C.—I would not rely on that matter at all.]

The rent is to be assumed to have accrued due on the "usual day of payment," so that if the landlord, through an indulgence to the tenant, was in the habit of not asking for the rent for months after it was legally due he should not be punished by the application of the section to him: Atkinson v. Kerr, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 100. Quinn v. McArde, 16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 95, supports our contention, for there the May rent was usually paid along with the November rent in the "December (or January," according to the affidavit) following. A proviso, repugnant to the prior part of a section, may even be taken to go the length of repealing it: Att-Gen. v. Chelsea Waterworks, Fitz. Rep. 195; Maxwell, Stata., 107-8. To require that the rent should be usually paid on a fixed day would abrogate the proviso.

[O'HAGAN, J.—What is clear is not to be abrogated by what is obscure. LORD MONCK.—I can only tell you it is within my own knowledge that this sub-section and proviso puzzled every lawyer in the House of Lords, from the Lord Chancellor down.]

It should be construed as a remedial measure, and an indulgent landlord was not intended to suffer from its operation.

O'HAGAN, J.—The question in the first of these cases is whether a sum of £10 10s., the amount of a year's rent, which was paid by the tenant on the 9th January in the present year, is to be deemed as having been paid on account of the year of the tenancy expiring on the 29th of September, 1881. The question in the second case is similar—namely, whether a payment of £22, being the amount of a year's rent, paid by the tenant on the 12th of December, 1881, is to be deemed to have been paid on account of the like year of the tenancy. By section 1, sub-section 1, of the Arrears of Rent Act, a tenant, in order to obtain the benefit of the Act, must show that the rent, payable in respect of the year to the tenancy expiring on the last gale day of the tenancy in the year 1881, has been satisfied, and that antecedent arrears of rent are due to the landlord. Sub-section 2 of the same section enacts that all payments on account of rent made by the tenant to the landlord, in or subsequent to the year expiring, as aforesaid, shall be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring, as aforesaid, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of such payment accrued due. The gale days in both the present cases were the 25th of March and the 29th Sept. Both gales of the year expiring as aforesaid had, therefore, accrued due at the time when the respective payments were made, and those payments would, therefore, plainly be deemed to be on account of the rent of the year expiring as aforesaid, if the proviso contained in the same sub-section does not operate to prevent them from having that effect. That proviso is as follows—"Provided that where it appears that according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed, for the purposes of this sub-section, to be the time at which the rent accrued due." What is insisted on by the landlord in the present cases is that the course of dealing between the landlord and the respective tenants brings them within the class of cases contemplated by the proviso, and that the rent payable in respect of the year expiring as agreed, although it had legally accrued due, at the time of the respective payments had not accrued due, having regard to this proviso and to the course of dealing between landlord and tenant. Such was the view taken by the Investigator, who accordingly reported against the tenants' claim. A conditional order having been made in pursuance of this report, the tenant showed cause, and the matter came on to be argued before Mr. Litton during the absence of the other Commissioners. The rent-books were produced, and Arthur Monaghan, on the one hand, and Mr.

MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

M'Cullagh, the laudlord's agent, on the other, were examined visu voce and subjected to cross-examination. Mr. Litton came to the conclusion that the facts did not bring the case within the proviso, and that the payments made in January, 1882, and December, 1881, should be credited to the rent of 1881 (16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 107). He deemed the matter, however, so important that he desired the cases to be re-argued before all the Commissioners, and we accordingly heard it fully and most ably argued. We did not hear any fresh visu voce evidence, but proceeded on the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence before Mr. Litton, taken together with the entries in the rent-books. Now, I shall first advert to the course of dealing shown by the rent-books, which gives very clearly the dates of all payments made on account of rent by these tenants—in one case for twenty-six years, and in the other for over thirty years. In Arthur or John Monaghan's case, the tenant held formerly a portion only of his present farm at a rent, first of £2 18s. 6d., and then of £3 1s. 6d., and afterwards of £5 10s. He obtained another piece of land in 1866 at the rent of £5, and his rent from that time became £10 10s. At the early period his rent, which was then partly paid in labour, was discharged in full the same year that it became due; but, afterwards he seems to have drifted into greater arrear, so that it was not paid until the lapse of more than a year from its accrual. To take the last ten or eleven years: On the 1st of January, 1872, a payment was made of £10 10s., which was credited to the rent of 29th September, 1870. He made subsequent payments of £10 10s. each on the following dates—namely—the 10th of February, 1873; the 22nd December, 1878; the 8th of February, 1875; the 24th of January, 1876; the 20th of December, 1876; the 21st of January, 1878; the 26th of June, 1879; the 20th of November, 1880, and on the 9th of January, 1882—the last being the payment the application of which is now in controversy. Each of these payments, when made, was credited as against the year's rent of the year of the tenancy ending on the 29th September of the year but one preceding. In William's case the rent at an early period seems to have fallen into arrear, and to have been, also, in great degree discharged by labour. Payments are entered up as having been made at various periods in the months of July, August, September, October, November, and December. Taking, however, the last ten or eleven years, as in the former case, we find that on the 23rd of September, 1872, a payment was made of £24, being a year's rent; and a like amount was paid by him on the following dates—the 24th November, 1873; the 23rd November, 1874; the 15th November, 1875; the 20th November, 1876; the 19th of November, 1877, and the 23rd of December, 1878. Each of them was credited to the rent of the year but one previous. In 1879 no payment appears to have been made, so that two years' arrears became due. The rent was reduced from £25 to £22, and the next two payments were made on the 8th of November, 1880, and the 12th December, 1881, the last being the payment now in controversy. Turning to the visu voce examination, Arthur Monaghan, the representative of John Monaghan, was examined, and produced his receipts; but it does not appear to me that his evidence tells us anything more than the books do. He was asked by Mr. Litton whether he was ever notified to come in and pay his rent from time to time, and his answer was, "Not until Mr. M'Cullagh's time;" but the question was not pursued on either side, and no evidence was given of any such notice. Mr. M'Cullagh, the agent, was examined, and he said, in answer to Mr. Litton, that the ordinary course of dealing was that the September rent was paid on the 20th of October next year; and in answer to Mr. Dane, he said that Monaghan should pay his rent on or after the 20th of October, twelve months after the rent was due. The estate office, he said, was always closed on the 20th of May till the 20th of October, and was opened on the latter day. He was asked was it open on every day in the week, and he said "On Mondays." He was asked on cross-examination whether the offices were ever open in summer at all, and he said "Yes;" and whether he had received rent in the summer, and he said he had. He was further asked whether he knew anything of any alleged custom of usual dealing, save so far as appears from the books, and he answered "No;" and whether, as regard this particular tenant, he knows anything except what appears in the books, and he answered "I don't know." On his re-examination by Mr. Dane, he said that the 20th of October was the fair day of Pettigo, and the first fair day after the 29th September.

It has been contended with great earnestness and force by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Dane, for the landlord, that it is impossible to read the words "some day" in the proviso in question as meaning some definite and determinate day; that what the Legislature had in view was what is commonly termed in Ireland the custom of the hanging gale, by which a gale of rent is, by usage, not demanded or paid until another had accrued due, or sometimes until a second succeeding gale had accrued due; that these postponed payments were hardly ever made on any definite day; and that to require a course of dealing to be proved showing a payment on some definite day would be tantamount to striking the proviso out of the statute altogether. They further urged that even if a definite day were required it was not necessary that it should be shown to be the day on which the rent, according to the course of dealing, had been actually paid; that the usual day of payment meant, not the day on which payment was made, but on which it was required to be made, and on or after which it was in fact made—as Mr. Monroe put it, not the usual day of payment, but the usual day for payment—and that in the present case the evidence showed that the 20th of October, the day on which the agent's office was opened for receipt of rents after the summer, was the usual day for payment of the rent of these holdings. To this it was answered by Mr. Weir and Mr. White, that the word hanging gale is nowhere mentioned in the enactment; that to depart from the plain terms of a statute, where the words are clear, in order to meet some suggested intention, is a vicious and fallacious method of construction, and has been over and over again repudiated by judges. That what the statute plainly provided for was a usual day of payment later than the gale day; that as the rent accrues due on a certain day, so the day substituted for it must also be certain, and not an indefinite and fluctuating period of time; that to construe the word "day," in the sense the landlord's counsel contended for, would be to give to the same word different meanings, when the places in which it occurs are in the closest juxtaposition to each other; that if the word "some day" be interpreted to mean any day, or some uncertain day, then the effect would be that the proviso, instead of being an exception to the substantive enactment, would be universally applicable, because there hardly existed a holding in Ireland on which the rent is not usually paid on some day or other after it accrued due. They said that what the framer of the proviso plainly had in his mind was the custom of some fixed rent-day on which the tenant not only was required to pay his rent, but as a matter of fact customarily did so, and that every word of the proviso was aptly framed to meet such a case. With respect to the second contention—namely, that if a definite day were necessary the 20th of October was such definite day—they answered that, even if it were shown that the rent was required to be paid on that day, it would not bring it within the section, because the basis of the entire enactment is that it must appear that the rent has usually been paid on the day in question; and if that basis fail, no other basis can be substituted; and that where you have the words "usual day of payment" immediately following the words "has usually been paid," it is plain that what what must be shown to be usual is payment on that day. They answered, secondly, that there was no evidence given even of the rent being required to be paid on the 20th of October; that the agent's evidence amounted to no more than this—that his office was open for receipt of rent on the 20th of October (the October fair-day of Pettigo); but that no demand or requisition upon the tenants in those cases to come in and pay their rents was ever made.

MONAGHAN v. SIR JOHN LESLIE.

Now, in dealing with these important questions, it is right to revert to the precise object which the Act aimed at accomplishing: When three circumstances concur—first, that the rent for the year 1881 has been satisfied; secondly, that antecedent arrears are due; and, thirdly, that the tenant is unable to pay such arrears; then this Commission is authorised to make an order for payment to the landlord of a sum equal to half the arrears, provided that it does not exceed a year's rent. This enactment seems at first to present little or no difficulty beyond the difficulty which might arise from investigation of the tenant's ability. Yet if there had been no further provision, the whole object of the statute would have been defeated, for, as the ordinary rule of an estate, as well as of other accounts between debtor and creditor, is that each payment made is credited to the earliest debt, and as no one is by law compelled to receive a portion only of what is due to him, a tenant might be placed in the position of being unable to pay the rent of the year 1881 without discharging the previous arrears. Accordingly, sub-section 3 of section 1 provides that all payments made in or subsequent to the year of the tenancy expiring as aforesaid, but before the 30th November, 1882, shall be deemed to be made in respect of that year to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of the payment accrued due. This provision is, we conceive, perfectly clear and unambiguous. The gale days—that is, the days on which the rent by law accrued due—were in the present cases the 25 March and the 29th September. Suppose, then, a payment to have been made on the 24th March, 1881, such payment would not, under the statute, be credited to the rent of 1881, because no gale of that rent had then accrued due. But suppose the payment to be made on the 25th of March or any subsequent day before the 29th of September, then the payment would be credited as against the half year's rent due on the 25th of March, 1881, but no payment would be credited to the rent of the 29th of September until that day arrived. Nothing can be clearer than this. The day of the accruing due of the rent is one definite day, and, therefore, it can at once be determined whether a particular payment is to be deemed made on foot of the rent of the year 1881 by simply seeing whether it was made before a particular day or on or after that day. Then comes a proviso engrafted on that enactment, that in certain cases the day on which the rent had legally accrued due should not be deemed so for the purposes of the sub-section. It enacts that, where it appears that by the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding the rent had been usually paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment was to be deemed "the time at which the rent accrued due." Mr. Monroe contends that the words "some day" is an indefinite expression, pointing rather to a period of time than to a fixed day, and that this is fortified by the subsequent use of the word "time"—namely, that the usual day of payment is to be deemed the time at which the rent accrued due. But the time at which the rent legally accrues due is one certain day, and the whole wording of the proviso imports that what is substituted should be as certain, otherwise how is it possible to determine whether a particular payment made by a tenant is to be credited as against the rent of 1881 or not. In the earlier part of the section the line is clearly drawn—that is to say, the day of the legal accruing due of the rent must have arrived before any payment could be credited against it. But if you definite period of time, it appears to be impossible to substitute, not another day; but, a fluctuating and insensy when the rent is to be deemed to have accrued due. It is a cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that words and sentences are to be construed in their plain and grammatical meaning, unless either the context shows that something different was intended, or that the primary construction leads to some contradiction or absurdity. The able counsel for the landlord contend that the literal interpretation only leads to an absurdity; because the custom in Ireland is such that the literal interpretation would find no application. How are we to know that? Is it to be said that there are no estates in Ireland on which a rent day exists, that rent day being some day after the rent became legally due, demand of payment on which is publicly notified, and on which, by the course of dealing, the rent is usually paid? We have no evidence that a state of facts which would meet the very words of the statute may not exist, and exist to a considerable extent. But, secondly, it is contended that in these cases there was a definite day which was the usual day of or for payment, and that this day was the 20th of October in each year, on which day the year's rent due on the last gale day of the preceding year was demanded and became payable, and on or after which it was in fact paid. In our opinion, the evidence as to this fails. In the case of Arthur Monaghan, although the payments of rent are traced back for twenty-six years, in no single instance was the rent paid on the 20th of October. In the case of Wm. Monaghan the payments are traced back for even a longer period. Since 1851 but one payment was made on the 20th October; that was in the year 1869. The rent for the year 1871 was paid on the 23rd of September, 1872. Since then it has been paid on a different day in each and every year, varying from the 15th November to the 23rd December. Nor was there the slightest evidence produced of any demand or notice having been given to either of these tenants in any year whatever. Mr. M'Cullagh, who has been agent only since the year 1876-1877, upon being asked what was the usual day of payment of the rent by John Monaghan, said the 20th of October, but upon being tested he said he had no knowledge except what was derived from the books; and as to his own practice, the sum and substance of it amounts to no more than this, that the rent office was open by him on that day, being one of the fair days of Pettigo. If it were once established that the 20th of October or any other fixed day was the "usual day" within the statute, it would be immaterial that either the payments now in controversy or any other particular payments were not made on that day. But, we are of opinion that upon the evidence in this case no "usual day" has been shown; and inasmuch as the payments were both made subsequent to the year expiring on the last gale day of 1881, and after the rent for that year had accrued those payments must, in our opinion, be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid. The order will, therefore, stand allowing the cause shown.

Mr. LITTON, Q.C., LORD MONCK, and Mr. VERNON, concurred.

Monroe, Q.C.—We desire to have a case stated for the Court of Appeal.

O'HAGAN, J.—Before doing so we must see that there is a question of law involved; and at present our opinion is that there is none, and that the case depends on a mere inference of fact. We must, therefore, ask you, in the first place, to state definitely in writing the precise questions of law you would desire to be reserved for the court above; and on a subsequent day the case will be set down for argument on your requisition, when we shall, also, deal with the question of costs. Were we not, ourselves, to draw the necessary inferences of fact, we would be subject to animadversion in the court above.

LAND SUB-COMMISSION.

(Before R. FOLEY, Q.C., LAURENCE DOYLE, Barrister-at-Law, and JAMES HOWLIN, Esqrs.)

KEARNEY v. CODDINGTON.

1882.—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 58—Agricultural or Pastoral holding—Residential farm—Letting to tenant in his capacity of parish priest—Determination of judicial rent—Fixing value of tenancy—True value, what, and when to be determined.

In 1869 the Rev. Mr. Kearney, parish priest of Bohermeen, became tenant from year to year, under Mr. Coddington, of twelve Irish acres of land, and a dwelling-house and offices thereon, which at that time were in the landlord's possession, at a rent of £45 per annum, afterwards reduced to £40, the Poor Law valuation being £28 10s. The dwelling-house and offices, which could not now be built for less than £400 or £500, were valued at £13 (included in the £28 10s.), and would be unsuitable for a person living by agriculture alone and occupying a farm of that extent, while the house was even rather larger than the average residence of Catholic clergymen. Built about seventy years ago, it had ever since been occupied by the successive priests of the parish, except during a short interval, when it was occupied by a medical doctor. The land had been originally demised in 1798 as an agricultural holding, since when the house had been built by one of the clergymen in occupation:

Held (Mr. FOLEY, Q.C., diss.), that the holding was not agricultural or pastoral, within the Land Law Act, 1881, section 58.

Application, on behalf of tenant, to fix judicial rent; and cross-notice, on behalf of landlord, to fix value of tenancy.

The holding formed part of the lands of Bohermeen, on which the parochial house was built, the tenant being the parish priest, there residing. In addition to the documentary evidence, referred to in the judgments, the following evidence was given:—The tenant deposed that he was appointed parish priest of Bohermeen in 1869. Mr. Coddington, the landlord, asked a rent of £50 a year, but after some time the rent, against witness's remonstrance, was fixed at £45 a year, until the law would be settled, as expected, in 1870, but it was paid only for one year, for, giving way to witness's dissatisfaction, the landlord reduced it to £40, which was since paid. Witness had improved the holding by manuring the land highly with farm-yard and bone manures. Although he had written to Mr. Coddington, praising his generosity in reducing the rent, it was only because he was satisfied with £40 as compared with £50 then; but he believed that the poor law valuation (£28 10s.) would be the fair rent, excluding his improvements. He denied that, as far as he knew, Mr. Coddington was anxious to preserve the place for the residence of the succeeding parish priest; so far from that, he said he could get £50 a year for it from others. On Nov. 12, 1873, he wrote to Mr. Coddington, saying: "The farm annexed to my house is entirely too small, especially if the land is to be enriched and improved as it ought to be. If this be so, I would suggest that a legitimate opportunity may shortly occur to add to it a neighbouring plot of ground. The Savages are very old people, and have no representatives, and if their holding is annexed to mine I will give you £3 an acre for it, and you will have no trouble whatever." The Savages were very old, and should give up the land (which was much better than his) soon after. An old man named Owen M'Donagh said he recollected the Rev. Mr. Brannigan, P.P., living and dying in the house occupied by Father Kearney. The chapel was not built till 1808. Father Brannigan built the house about the year 1810, and occupied it until his death in 1833. After his death a nephew of his (a doctor) occupied the house. Father Kennedy, the successor of Father Brannigan, lived in this house also, but died in a neighbouring house. Father Geoghegan, the succeeding parish priest, lived in the house also, and Father Langan, the next parish priest, likewise occupied it. John Farrelly, a farmer, who had examined and valued the land, testified to the improved condition of the holding, and estimated its value at £18 15s., including the tenant's improvements, and £12 without the improvements. He remembered that after Father Brannigan's death his nephew managed the farm. He put out Father Kennedy, the succeeding parish priest, and the reverend gentleman died in a neighbouring house. Mr. Patrick Smith, an auctioneer, estimated the present value of the land at £17 1s. 4d., independent of its connexion with the buildings. Mr. Coddington then gave evidence as to entries in books and payments by a former parish priest's executors, the Rev. Mr. M'Cullagh. He could not say if he had paid any money in cash to Father Geoghegan. Mr. Coddington, jun., deposed that the rent paid by Father Langan, the predecessor of Father Kearney, was £45. The land was worth 50s. an acre. Witness himself did not farm any land, but inspected the holding as agent. Robert Rennicks, bailiff on the estate, said if it were not a priest's holding a great deal more could be got for it. The condition of the farm was good when Father Kearney got it, and was so still. Mr. Joseph Lowry, auctioneer and valuator, and Sub-Sheriff of Meath, considered a fair value would be 44s. per Irish acre, and he would value the house and grounds at £14 a year rent.

Mr. W. Mooney, solicitor, for the tenant.—The holding was originally set as a purely agricultural holding. At the time it was first let the priests of the parish largely derived their incomes from farming, and though it is principally in pasture at present, it had for a whole series of years been treated as an ordinary agricultural and pastoral holding. It would be unjust to the tenant to fix the value of the tenancy at present, because the court is not in a position to ascertain the full price which the tenant would get. The proper time to ascertain the price would be when the tenant proceeded to sell his interest, and if in pursuance of his intention to do so he invited tenders, which turned out to be bona fide, the court, if called upon, would be bound to give effect to them.

[Mr. DOYLE.—You think the true value of the tenancy mentioned in the sub-section is the price the holding would bring by public competition.]

KEARNEY v. CODDINGTON.

[L. C.]

Undoubtedly.* The tenant by the terms of the Act is entitled to the best price he could get, and the landlord has the right of pre-emption after the full price was ascertained.

[Mr. DOYLE.—Your contention is that the specified value referred to in the sub-section and the best price he can get are the same thing?]
Quite so.* But at present you have not the materials to ascertain the best price, and you cannot have them until the tenant sells.

[Mr. FOLEY.—That appears to be the good sense of the matter; at all events, if we are not constrained by the language of the Act. After a great deal of consideration it appears to me to be going too fast to fix the value of the tenancy at the present moment. When a fair rent has been fixed on the application of the tenant, and he has his statutory term made certain, he has something to sell; but, until then he has nothing and if the court were now forced to settle the fair rent, and at the same time fix the valuation of his interest for saleable purposes, we would be doing a plain injustice to the tenant.† The rent being fixed, the tenant has something to sell, and he has a right to select his best market, not in the present depressed state of the country, but, as the Act contemplates, at its true value.]

* See Lloyd v. Irwin, infra.—[E. N. B., Ed.]

† In delivering judgment in a subsequent case, Flinn v. Pratt, Mr. Foley, Q.C., said:—In this case an application has been made on the part of the landlord to fix the specified value of the tenancy. No evidence of any kind has been produced on the landlord's behalf to enable us to do so. We have asked the landlord's advisers if the value of the tenant's estate in the statutory term, which imports nothing less than a potential right to acquire the fee-simple in their holdings, is to be established at a nominal sum, and they admitted that that was not their contention. We then asked them if the scale of compensation to the tenant for the loss of parting with this valuable right ought to be less than the scale of compensation prescribed in cases of disturbance by the Land Act of 1870, as amended and enlarged by the Act of 1881, and to this we did not receive any answer. We are, therefore, as judges of law as well as of fact, not supplied with a scintilla of evidence on the part of the landlord to enable us to know the price at which the landlord is now entitled to bargain for the right to purchase the tenant's interest. We will not act on any speculations of our own, and for these reasons the application will be refused. On the general question as to whether it is desirable to entertain simultaneously the application to fix a fair rent, and likewise to fix the value of the tenancy, which are applications very dissimilar, if not contrariant in their nature, it seems to me that we ought to have a discretion to leave the value of the tenancy to be ascertained at the time of sale. According to the greatest authority, Lord St. Leonards, the way to ascertain the value of a thing is to see what it will fetch in open market set up for sale. How are we to ascertain a priori the sum which the tenant's goodwill is worth except by open competition. By postponement we prevent the chance or risk of doing a great injustice. The attempt to measure a fair price now would be a leap in the dark. In fixing fair rents there are some things reasonably clear. A deduction is made from the rent for any portion of the annual value which is found to be due to improvements not made by the landlord. We ask ourselves and discover as best we can from the evidence what annual sum could a tenant afford to pay one year with another for his holding, and the question with us is not what sum could a tenant in possession be got or sorewed up to offer for his holding, for what

Shannon, for the landlord, submitted that this was a letting to the Rev. Father Kearney in his capacity as parish priest;‡ that the letting had been for generations past to the parish priests of the parish, and was a residential farm in the nature of being an adjunct to the dwelling-house thereon, set thus to successive parish priests as a parochial building; and that this proceeding was an attempt by the Rev. Mr. Kearney to obtain for himself, personally, the house that had always been occupied by the parish priests of Bohernmeen. He also submitted, assuming that the court held against him on these contentions, that this was a residential holding and not agricultural or pastoral in its character. He relied upon documents showing that the interest of the holding had been purchased from Father Brannigan's representative by Father Geoghegan, and that both he and the landlord, in correspondence at present existing, expressed a desire that the place should be for the use of the parish priest living among Mr. Coddington's tenantry, and that with that view Father Geoghegan had been compensated for his expenditure in acquiring and improving the holding, by Coddington. The result of acceding to the present application, therefore, would be to give Father Kearney a personal interest in the holding which was intended for the use of the parish priest.‡ He further submitted that the landlord, having purchased Father Geoghegan's interest, and compensated him for his improvements, was entitled to have a value and rent assessed upon them under the Act.

Mr. FOLEY, Q.C.—The holding in this case contains 20a. 1r. statute measure. The present rent is £40; the poor law valuation, £28 10s.—divided thus, £15 10s. for the lands, and £13 for the buildings. It appears in evidence that by an indenture of lease dated so far back as the 10th December, 1798, made between Henry Coddington, of Oldbridge—I suppose the father, or a predecessor in title of this landlord—of the one part, and the Rev. Michael Brannigan of Bohernmeen, of the other part, the lands were demised to the lessee and to his heirs and assigns, as all that tenement and garden on which he then resided, with the field held by him; and also a field lately held by Richard Murray, and another field lately held by Peter Hammond—to hold the premises under the lessor his heirs and assigns at the yearly rent of £27 19s. 4d. or £27 9s. 4d. over and above all taxes then or thereafter to be imposed, during the lives of the three parties therein named, the survivor of whom died, according to the evidence, in the year 1860. There was not a line in this document will not a man give for his home? The occupancy of the holding gives the tenant a title to have this fair rent fixed on these lines, and in my opinion excludes the landlord from the competition value, and this exclusion or deprivation of the right to the competition value of the farm is the creation of the statute which we are bound to obey. In the case of the landlord he has no occupation to give, and the tenant has the right to the competition value of his holding.

‡ In a recent American case (Chatard v. O'Donovan, 21 Amer. L. Register, 461) it was held that, where a Catholic priest was appointed to his position as pastor by, and held it at the discretion of, his bishop, subject to removal at the bishop's pleasure (see O'Keefe v. Cardinal Cullen, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 100), the priest would have no right of occupancy of premises as a parsonage and place for religious worship save only as incidental to his employment in the pastorate, and when he is deprived of the latter the former ceases, without his being entitled to a notice to quit, as between landlord and tenant, the relationship being rather that of master and servant. But, obviously, the relationship between the parties in the principal case could not be so regarded.—[E. N. B., Ed.]

leading up to the idea that the holding was let or taken as a parochial residence; the tenant was not even described as a Parish Priest. The rent indicated by its amount that it was thereby demised as an agricultural farm. The limitation of the interest in the premises was to the heirs of the lessee, not to his successors, and the heirs would succeed by special occupancy to the descendable freehold when the lessee died. The premises were capable of being sold, underlet, or assigned, at the pleasure of the lessee or his heirs during the continuancy of the lease; and if Mr. Coddington, the lessor, had a hundred times the intention to make the farm a residence allocated to the parish priest, no court of law or equity would have listened for one moment to any such declaration of intention while the lease of 1798 remained subsisting and undetermined. The evidence of Owen Donagh, repels the idea of the farm being let by way of parochial residence as an adjunct to the chapel, for he says the chapel was not built till 1808. Father Brannigan died in 1833, and then, in accordance with his legal title, as we must now presume, he was succeeded in the occupation of his holding by his nephew, also named Brannigan, who was a medical doctor, and was not an ecclesiastic. The lease expired in 1860 by the death of the last surviving party to the lease. The land was worked as a farm prior to 1860, and nothing had occurred except the building of a comfortable house at his own expense, by the occupier, to alter the character of the holding which had been impressed upon it by the lease of 1798. It was endeavoured to be shown by evidence of transactions contained in letters which passed between the Rev. Mr. Geoghegan and Mr. Coddington, and certain entries made by Mr. Coddington in his own books, that in some way or other he, Mr. Coddington, had become the purchaser or owner of the house built by Brannigan, together with the improvements, and that the house was therefore to become a parochial residence. These letters plainly cannot be read in evidence against Mr. Kearney; they are inadmissible. Mr. Coddington never in any way bound himself to devote the house to such a purpose; it was a treaty not ripened into contract (see Land Law Act, 1881, section 58, sub-sec. 7). Neither can the entries against interest, by Mr. Coddington, not proved to have been communicated to Mr. Kearney, be used in evidence against him—and they are not used to refresh the memory, for Mr. Coddington cannot from memory depose to these transactions. No user of the house by the clergy, however numerous, is of the slightest importance to control the solemn agreement of 1798, and no user since that time is of the slightest value unless based on a contract as expressed in sec. 58, sub-sec. 7. We now approach the evidence which was clearly admissible—namely, the letters of the Rev. Mr. Kearney himself. [The Chairman read extracts from letters put in evidence in the case. One of them declined to accede to Mr. Coddington's proposition, and in that Mr. Coddington had acquiesced.] These letters, so far as they go, state that Father Kearney was not bound to keep the place as a parochial residence; on the contrary, that he was allowed to keep the place simply as an agricultural holding. In other letters, dated November, 1871, and November, 1873, the clergyman complains that the farm adjoining his house is too small, especially if it were to be enriched and improved as it ought to be; and these letters are important in this way, that they show the man was desirous of improving his holding, and wanted his landlord's assistance in doing so. The man was a good and improving tenant, and Mr. Coddington himself admitted so, and the enactment ought to be regarded as intended to meet cases of that class. My reading of the agreement is that this was originally an agricultural holding, and I shall not hold an enactment intended for the public good to deprive an individual of the benefits conferred by it unless I am coerced by the enactment itself or on the authorities to do so. The question is—Is this Court to say and decide that a holding originally demised as an agricultural farm in '98, and used as such ever since, has lost that character by the circumstance that an improving tenant built on it a house somewhat more commodious than an ordinary farmer might require—yet certainly a modest house for the claimant—when there is not a grain of legal proof before us that Father Kearney ever agreed to take the holding for purposes other or different from those for which it was always held and used; and so far from it that, on the contrary, he declined Mr. Coddington's proposition, and continued to farm the holding. There is a little contradiction in Father Kearney's letters to Mr. Coddington, for the latter gentleman, it would appear, never asked him to keep the place for the parish priest of that parish or his successor, and Father Kearney, who is an honourable and respectable man, did not ask to keep Mr. Coddington to such conditions when going into the house, but had matters so arranged that he could be removed just like any other tenant. As I said before, there is not a grain of legal testimony to show that the place was ever held other than as an agricultural holding, and, if that be so, can it be argued that a parish priest must only have the same class of house to live in as any other farmer? He has to earn the respect and esteem of his people, and he must do this as well by maintaining his position as by his exemplary conduct. He, therefore, in this case, occupied a dwelling suited to his position, but at the same time he continued to farm the holding. Not a witness has been produced, not a document has been read to prove it to be a residential holding; not a question put on cross-examination as to whether he took it as a residence without regard to its agricultural character. The onus of proof lies with the party who wants to show that it is an agricultural holding, and that must be done in this case before it can be taken out of range of the policy of this enactment. Has that been done? No it has not; and if my colleagues act upon their own notions of what a priest's house should be, in regard to the extent of land he occupied, they will be acting upon their judgment merely somewhat in the capacity of unsworn jurors. I did not think they would take such a view of the matter, having regard to the large experience they had of the world and the requirements of rank and station. On the authorities it appears to me that, not alone should this farm be considered an agricultural one, but that the tenant should be entitled to a statutory lease deducting from the rent the value of the improvements effected by him. It, also, appears to me, on the authorities, that any residence on a small farm that monopolised the greater part of the farm in lawns, shrubberies, plantations, gardens, and the like, might be said to be residential; but this could not be said of Father Kearney's residence. It was a plain farmhouse, not a bit better than those in which the majority of well-to-do English farmers live in. We visited the place ourselves and saw the house, and I should say for my own part that I would like to see our parish priests having far better residences. This is a case of great importance, and one which involves a very grave and momentous principle, and I trust that it will be taken before a higher tribunal in order to have the point settled on a satisfactory basis. Our priests will have many cases of this nature to contend with during the administration of the Land Act, because there are very many of them situate precisely as Mr. Kearney is. If it were once established that the fact of their having comfortable residences upon comparatively small farms constituted residential holdings instead of agricultural, then they would lose all the benefits conferred by the Act. A residential holding is one that has been beautified beyond the usual range of agricultural holdings. Most of those in court are probably acquainted with the Glen, near Drogheda, the residence of Mr. Frank Chadwick. A class of residence such as that would not come under the Act. It is situate in the midst of beautiful grounds, has ponds, greenhouses, shrubberies, walks, lawns, &c., round and adjaacent to it. That is a contrast to Father Kearney's residence, because it just is what the other is not. The clergyman's house has no lawn, no pond, no shrubbery, in fact nothing at all of the ornate. In the entire case there was a chain of incontrovertible evidence showing that the holding was purely agricultural. The tenant to be sure was an industrious man, and built a little better than his neighbours, but what of all that?—it did not take away the agricultural character. As observed by Lord O'Hagan, in Carr v. Nunn, 7 Ir. L. T. Rep. 26, in matters of this description, "every case must be regarded on its own special merits." Plainly this case has its own merits. It was beyond doubt, a truly generous lease showing what a worthy and disinterested landlord Mr. Coddington was, as he had always the reputation of being—because from beginning to end of the instrument there was not one stringent covenant in it; no clause binding the tenant not to sub-let, to build, or any other restrictions so common to other leases; but there was one clause in it which showed in a peculiar manner the agricultural nature of the holding, and that was the liberty to cut turf, which was not at all usual in other leases. The character of the tenant should be taken into account when the style of the house was considered. Was the law to be strained because one tenant built his house a little bit better than those around him, or because he chose to have one a little more indifferent, or perhaps a little worse than others might have? Surely not. This case on the whole is a doubtful one, as may be seen from the fact that my colleagues differ from me in their judgment on it. But I hold that, when there is a doubt, it is the tenant should get the benefit of it—if anything is to be sacrificed it should be sacrificed to the canon of the enactment. Under all the circumstances I unhesitatingly say that Father Kearney should be declared entitled to the benefits of the Act, that his holding was an agricultural one, and that he is entitled to the benefits of his improvements.

Mr. DOYLE—In the view which I take of this case, I do not consider it necessary to go into the history of the transactions between the landlord and the successive tenants who preceded Father Kearney in the occupation of the holding. In the year 1869 Father Kearney, having been appointed parish priest of Bohernmeen, entered into negotiations with Mr. Coddington with a view to become tenant of the holding. Mr. Coddington had the holding in his own hands, and no other person had any claim to the buildings or other improvements which were then upon it. No material addition has been made to those buildings or improvements since that time. Ultimately Father Kearney became tenant from year to year at the rent of £45, which was afterwards reduced to the present rent of £40. I am of opinion that we are to look at the character and circumstances of the holding at the date of the commencement of the present tenancy in order to determine the question which is before us for our decision—namely, whether this holding is excluded from the Act of 1881 as not being agricultural or pastoral in its character, or partly agricultural and partly pastoral. In answering this question I accept entirely the statement of the law applicable to the matter which Mr. Foley has made. I regret, however, that in applying the law to the facts of the case, as I understand them, I have come to a different conclusion from him. I think that this holding, whether we regard its own character or the circumstances in which the present tenancy began, must be considered to be substantially a residence and not a farm. The house and offices would be quite unsuitable for a person living by agriculture, and occupying a little farm of twelve Irish acres; the valuation of the buildings is £18, and of the land £15. It is unnecessary to say that farmers occupying twelve acres do not ordinarily live in houses valued at £18. No person, in fact, would come to live in this house who did not possess some source of income largely exceeding the profits to be derived from this small piece of land. The dwelling-house is rather larger than the average house occupied by a Catholic clergyman. It was built about seventy years ago, and has ever since been occupied by the successive priests of the parish, except during a short interval, when it was occupied by the nephew of one of them, a medical doctor. It is the sort of house which anybody acquainted with the country would naturally expect to find in the occupation of a clergyman or other professional man, but not by any means in the occupation of a small farmer. It appears to me that the present tenant in 1869 took the holding mainly as a residence, with a piece of land attached for the accommodation of the house, and that this character still remains impressed upon it. I think, therefore, that the holding is a residence with a piece of land annexed to it, and not a farm, and that the Act does not apply to it.

Mr. HOWLIN—I cannot take the view that this holding is an agricultural one within the meaning of the Act. The house on it is one which could not at the present time be built for less than between £400 and £500, and is of a class altogether unsuited to the requirements of a person farming so small an extent as about 12 acres. Then we have the fact that it has been inhabited for years by the rev. gentlemen who were in succession parish priest of Bohernmeen. Having regard to the wish expressed by the late Rev. Mr. Geoghegan that the place should continue to be a residence for the Catholic clergymen of the district, I trust that the landlord, Mr. Coddington, may see fit to make such arrangements as will secure so satisfactory a result. Some words having dropped from the Chairman which might be interpreted as expressing his knowledge that his colleagues think the house too good for the Catholic clergymen of the district, I wish to repudiate on my own part any such construction of my views in this case. In my own county I have had the pleasure to be able to provide a site in perpetuity for the building of a much better house for the Catholic clergymen of the parish.

LLOYD v. IRWIN.

Application on behalf of the landlord to set aside a sale by the tenant, and to fix the true value of tenancy.

The rent of the holding was £110 13s. 10d., and the tenant, on the 12th December, 1881, served a notice in the prescribed form on the landlord of his intention to sell his tenancy. On the 24th of December the landlord served the tenant with notice that, having received notice of the tenant's intention to sell, and having disagreed with the tenant as to the terms of the purchase thereof by him, he (the landlord) electing to purchase the same, and under clause 1 of the Land Act, 1881, applied to the court to ascertain the true value thereof. On the 13th of January, 1882, the tenant served the following notice (signed by him) on the landlord:—"I have agreed to sell my tenancy in the above holding. The name of the purchaser is George R. Acheson, and the consideration agreed to be given by him for the purchase is £500." On the 24th of January, 1882, the landlord served the following notice on the tenant: "I apply to the court to declare void the sale made or agreed to be made by you of your tenancy in the above holding to George R. Acheson; and I make this application because you have failed to give notice of your intention to sell the tenancy in the manner directed by the rules made pursuant to the above-mentioned statute, or satisfied the landlord that you are the proper person to do so, or that the landlord has served you with Form No. 2, being an originating notice of application by him to ascertain the value of tenancy with a view to purchase." It appeared that prior to the service of these notices, about the month of November, 1881, Mr. Irwin had intimated to Mr. Lloyd his intention of selling his farm. Some negotiations had then commenced as to the purchase of Mr. Irwin's interest by Mr. Lloyd, the terms offered by Mr. Lloyd, in a letter of November 8th, being to allow 1 year's rent, which was then due, and to pay for the improvements effected by the tenant on the lands. This offer was considered insufficient by Mr. Irwin, who informed Mr. Lloyd that he could get more, and that Mr. Acheson would probably become a purchaser. Mr. Lloyd raised no objection to Mr. Acheson as a tenant, and it was not contended during the course of the case that Mr. Acheson was not, in every sense of the word, a desirable tenant. These negotiations between the landlord and tenant were finally put an end to by a letter dated 18th November, 1881, in which Mr. Lloyd intimated to Mr. Irwin that he would not permit him to sell his interest in the farm. Subsequently to that date, Mr. Lloyd was informed of the amount of the purchase money (£500) that Mr. Acheson was willing to give; but he still persisted in his refusal, whereupon the tenant served him with the notice of his intention to sell of the 12th of December. On the 13th of January, 1882, the negotiations between Mr. Irwin and Mr. Acheson culminated in an agreement, duly executed, in which Mr. Acheson agreed to purchase the farm for £500, under certain conditions unnecessary to set out for the purpose of this report. This agreement, it was at one stage of the case urged, was not a bonâ fide one, but it was abandoned by the landlord during the progress of the case.

Bird, for the landlord.

Mr. ROSEN.—The portions of the Act having reference to the sale of tenancies are contained in section 1, which enacts: "the tenant for the time being of every holding, not hereinafter specially excepted from the provisions of this Act, may sell his tenancy for the best price that can be got for the same subject to the following regulations, and subject also to the provisions contained in this Act, with respect to the sale of a tenancy, subject to statutory conditions." It is to be observed that the general right to sell for the best price that can be got is limited by this section. These limitations, so far as they affect this case, are as follows:—Sub-s. 2—"The tenant shall give the prescribed notice to his landlord of his intention to sell his tenancy. (3.) On receiving such notice the landlord may purchase the tenancy for such sum as may be agreed upon, or, in the event of disagreement, may be ascertained by the court to be the true value thereof. (4.) Where the tenant shall agree to sell his tenancy to some other person than the landlord, he shall upon informing the landlord of the name of the purchaser state in writing therewith the consideration agreed to be given for the tenancy. (5.) If the tenant fails to give the landlord the notice or information required by the foregoing sub-sections, the court may, if it think fit, and that the just interests of the landlord so require, declare the sale to be void. (6.) Where the tenancy is sold to some other person than the landlord, the landlord may, within the prescribed period, refuse, on reasonable grounds, to accept the purchaser as tenant."

Now, it appears to me that the unrestricted right of sale, given by the earlier clause of a. 1, is very much cut down and restricted by sub-a. 3, which directs the court to ascertain the true value. As to the meaning of that phrase I shall presently revert. But, it seems to me beyond dispute that, when the landlord has invoked the machinery of the court to fix a true value, it is not open to the tenant to stop this proceeding by such a sale, or notice of sale, as was attempted in this case on the 18th of January. This notice must, therefore, be dismissed, and the landlord's notice of the 24th of January, 1882, to set aside the sale must be granted, and we hereby set aside the sale of the 13th of January, and declare it void.

It is now necessary to say what the true value is. This is pithily and clearly laid down by Sir Edward Sullivan, M.R., in Adams v. Dunsceath (16 Ir. L. T. Rep. 59), where he says:—"The right of sale is on the express enactment a restricted one, the landlord can intervene, and then the court must fix the true value. This value cannot be the market value, but what, having regard to the interest of landlord and tenant respectively under this code, would be the true estimate of price between them." Such being the case, I disregard the fact of Mr. Irwin having been offered £500 by Mr. Acheson. Had such an offer been an extravagant one, or a competition price, it would be no test whatever of the true value. But, it must be observed that it was not a competition price, and Mr. Irwin by no means put up the farm to the highest bidder. I make these observations lest it should be supposed for a minute that I fix the sum of £500 as the true value because Mr. Acheson offered that sum for it. I expressly repudiate such a test. The farm has been visited by my colleagues, we have heard all the evidence, and, as a result, I have little hesitation in stating my belief that, in fixing the true value of this very convenient and marketable farm at £500, we have by no means set too high a value on it. The true value of the farm we fix of £500.

Mr. LYNCH concurred in the judgment, but wished to express his opinion that the true value was what a tenant could get for a tenancy from a bonâ fide purchaser in the open market, at which price the landlord had a right of pre-emption.*

Oct. 21, 1882.—Land Law Act, 1881, s. 8, sub-s. 4.—Improvements made by landlord—Tenant only partially compensated for expenditure by him—Receipt stating money received from landlord “in full discharge of claims” — Rebuttal.

In order to come within sub-section (4), section 8, of the Land Law Act, 1881, providing that an application to determine a fair rent may be disallowed where the improvements have been made by the landlord, it must appear that such improvements were so completely, and not merely partially, made by the landlord, that there would be nothing in respect of which the tenant would be entitled to compensation. And it is open to the tenant to show that improvements made by him cost an amount in excess of the sum allowed to him therefor by the landlord, and to claim the benefit thereof to that extent, notwithstanding his having given a receipt admitting that the sum so allowed by the landlord “was paid pursuant to agreement” (contrary to the fact), “and was received by him in full discharge of all claims” on foot of said improvements.

Application to fix a fair rent.—The circumstances are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

O’Reardon, Q.C., contra.

MR. MACCARTHY.—Daniel Lyons holds 124 acres near Listowel. His father, who was his predecessor in title, died in 1876. In the same year a new contract of tenancy was entered into with applicant, and the rent was increased from £56 to £64. During the father’s occupancy, but subsequent to 1862, he made 123 perches of drains, 130 perches of dykes, and a limekiln, towards which improvements the landlord contributed £7 8s., being an amount obviously less than their cost. During the occupancy of the present tenant he built a cattle store, the cost of which he estimates at £20, and reclaimed three acres at an estimated cost of £24, the landlord making certain allowances, which, according to the evidence, were insufficient to cover the cost. On the occasion of each allowance being made, the tenant signed a very peculiar form of receipt, admitting that the sum paid by him “was paid pursuant to agreement, and that the amount was received by him in full discharge of all claims for said work and any other improvements made by him on said farm up to the date of the receipt.” No evidence was given that any antecedent agreement or other contract had in fact been entered into. Under these circumstances it was contended by counsel for the landlord that the case should be dismissed, pursuant to what is commonly called the “Heneage” clause. The cost of improvements being in excess of the landlord’s contributions, it is evident that, apart from the special question of the receipts, the case would not come within that clause. The receipts are evidence of the actual sums which passed under them, but, inasmuch as they were not in fact made in pursuance of an antecedent contract, they bind the tenant no further. He is entitled, in having his rent fixed, to get the benefit of any improvements he has made to the extent to which, as a matter of fact, he has not been compensated. The Act contemplates complete, not partial, compensation. A receipt not under seal is no estoppel. It can be questioned between the original parties in like manner as an acceptor of a bill of exchange can plead want of consideration, or the owner of a ship can question the accuracy of the statement in a bill of lading against the shipper. In this case it is perfectly open to the tenant to show that the improvements specified in the receipts cost more than the allowances made by the landlord; and in this, and in all the other cases that turn on the same point, the tenants have, according to the evidence, shown it. My colleagues and the official valuer consider that in many cases the cost has been over-estimated, but that nevertheless the cost exceeded the allowance.

As to the clause in the receipt stating that the tenant has accepted the specified amount in discharge of all claims up to its date, it seems to me that whatever may have been its force previous to the Acts of 1870 and 1881, it is wholly inoperative as against the plain provisions of their acts. Considered as a receipt it is liable to be rebutted by evidence, and it has been so rebutted; considered as an estoppel, it is not obligatory; considered as a contract it is void. Under all these circumstances of the case we consider the presents rents of the several tenants too high. To dismiss the cases under the “Heneage” clause in face of the evidence would be absurd, and we admit the tenants to the benefit of the Act.

GRIFFIN AND OTHERS v. HICKSON.

Oct. 23, 1882.—Tenant holding under agreement for lease—Landlord refusing to grant lease—Tenant treated as yearly tenant, and fair rent fixed.

A Landlord persistently refusing to perform his part of a parol agreement for a lease for eight years, will not be permitted to set up said agreement, so practically waived, as a bar to the tenants coming in to claim, as yearly tenants, the benefits of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.

Application to fix fair rent.—The facts are sufficiently explained in the judgment.

Mr. B. O’C. Horgan, solicitor, for the tenants.
Hickson, Q.C., for the landlord.

MR. M’CARTHY.—The learned counsel for the landlord called upon us to dismiss all the applications on this estate on the grounds that the tenants held under subsisting agreements for leases. The circumstances are these:—In 1852 the tenants got leases for twenty years. These leases expired in 1873, and negotiations for new leases were then entered into between the agent of the estate on the one side and the tenants on the other. A verbal agreement was entered into, which, having regard to the reported decision in Nux v. Fabian (L. R. Ch. Ap. 35), was binding if the parties were authorised to make it, and if it had not been subsequently waived. The term and the date of its commencement were agreed upon, increased rent was agreed upon, and such increased rent has since been paid. The tenants agreed to pay a half-year’s rent as security for the last year, and £2 each for the costs of the leases, and such payments were made. Here, then, we have the essentials of a specific agreement, and a part performance by the tenants quite adequate to take the case out of the statute of frauds. But, at the very root of the transaction, there lies this difficulty—that we had no evidence of the authority of the agent to enter into any such contract at all. A mere agent to receive rents has no such authority: Piers v. Sneyd (17 Beav. 151). A power of attorney to manage the estate might have authorised him, but he testified that he had no such power of attorney. Shortly after the agreement was entered into, the tenants applied to sub-agent for their leases, but they were refused; and the tenants have since been treated as yearly tenants. Now, could the landlord, who has persistently refused to grant leases to those tenants, be permitted to set up this agreement for a lease when it suits him—could he apply to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice to enforce the specific performance thereof? It seems to be well settled law that the part performance necessary to have a contract enforced must be a part performance by the party seeking relief (Fry on Specific Performance, p. 255, where the cases on this point are collected). Here we have no performance by the landlord. On the contrary, we have a series of refusals to perform his part of the agreement; and I do not think it is now open to him or his representatives to turn round after nine years and claim the benefit of a contract which had been thus virtually and practically waived. It is not on light grounds that any court of justice should deny to the tenantry of a considerable estate the rights to which prima facie the statute entitles them. I decline to deny these rights on the grounds stated, and I admit the tenants to the benefit of the Act. [The judicial rent was then fixed.]

CONNELL v. SKEHAN.

July 21, 1882.—Fair rent.—Written agreement for three years for grazing and depasturage—"Temporary convenience"—L. & T. Act, 1870, s. 15, sub-s. 4—L. & T. Act, 1881, ss. 57, 58, sub-ss. 3, 4, 6.

By an agreement of letting, the tenant was to hold 66 acres for three years, for grazing and depasturage; he was to reside on them, and might till 4 acres; and the landlord was to pay all taxes, and the tenant to give up possession at the end of the term. On an application to determine a judicial rent, under the Land Law Act, 1881:

Held, that the tenancy came within the Act, not being excluded as for a "temporary depasturage," under section 58 (5), nor being for "temporary convenience" under section 15, sub-s. 4, of the L. & T. Act, 1870.

Application to determine a judicial rent.—By agreement dated January, 1879, the landlord agreed to let and the tenant to take 66 acres of certain lands for three years "for grazing and depasturage;" the tenant was to reside on them, and might till 4 acres; the landlord was to pay all taxes, and the tenant was to give up possession at the end of the term.

Mr. M'Coy, solicitor for the landlord, objected that this was a mere dairy agreement, and not a tenancy within the Act; being merely a letting for a temporary convenience of the landlord or tenant.

Sargent, for the tenant, relied on the agreement as containing all the ordinary words of an agreement for the letting of lands; and contended that, to be outside the Act, it should have borne on its face a mention of the "temporary convenience," under the Act of 1870, s. 15, sub-s. 4; and that the term was too long to be considered a "temporary depasturage" within s. 58, sub-s. 6, of the Act of 1881. He distinguished Mulligan v. Adams, 8 Ir. L. Rep. 132; and submitted that the poor law valuation and express words of the agreement as to residence took the case out of s. 58, sub-ss. 3, 4, of Act of 1881. And he further relied on the definitions in s. 57 of "contract of tenancy," "present tenant," and "holding."

The Judge, after consideration, held that the agreement came within the provisions of the Act, and fixed a fair rent.*

PUBLIC GENERAL STATUTES,

45° & 46° VICTORIÆ (1882).

CAP. I.

An Act to apply the sum of Three hundred and thirteen thousand two hundred and seventy pounds out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on the thirty-first day of March one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two. [13th March 1882.]

CAP. II.

An Act to authorise the use of Reply Post Cards. [13th March 1882.]

WHEREAS the Post Office Act, 1875, authorised the Treasury from time to time by warrant to fix the rates of postage to be charged by or under the authority of the Postmaster-General in respect (among other postal packets) of post cards, conveyed or delivered for conveyance by post, whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, subject to the proviso (among others) that the highest rate for an inland post card shall not exceed one half-penny:

And whereas it is proposed to issue such reply post cards as herein-after mentioned, and doubts have arisen as to the power to issue the same, and it is expedient to remove such doubts:

Be it therefore enacted, by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Post Office (Reply Post Cards) Act, 1882, and this Act may be cited together with the Post Office (Duties) Acts, 1840 to 1875, as the Post Office (Duties) Acts, 1840 to 1882.

Acts not to prevent issue of reply post cards.

2. Nothing in the Post Office (Duties) Acts, 1840 to 1875, or any of them, shall be deemed to prevent the issue of a reply post card, or the fixing of a rate of postage for a reply post card not exceeding double the rate charged for an ordinary post card.

A "reply post card" means a post card of such a character that the person receiving the same through the post may without further payment again transmit the same or a part thereof through the post.

A reply post card or any part thereof which may be again transmitted through the post without further payment shall be deemed to be a postal packet within the meaning of the above-mentioned Acts.

CAP. IX.

An Act to amend the Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, and other enactments relating to the evidence of documents by means of copies printed by the Government Printers.

[19th June 1882.]

31 & 32 Vict.
c. 37.
32 & 34 Vict.
c. 75, s. 55.
33 & 34 Vict.
c. 79, s. 21.
34 & 35 Vict.
c. 70, s. 7.
40 & 41 Vict.
c. 21, s. 91.
c. 53, s. 58.

WHEREAS by the Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, and enactments applying that Act, divers proclamations, orders, regulations, rules, and other documents may be proved by the production of copies thereof purporting to be printed by the Government Printer, and the Government Printer is thereby defined to mean and include the Printer to Her Majesty :

And whereas divers other enactments provide that copies of Acts of Parliament, regulations, warrants, circulars, gazettes, and other documents shall be admissible in evidence if purporting to be printed by the Government Printer, or the Queen's Printer, or a printer authorised by Her Majesty, or otherwise under the authority of Her Majesty :

And whereas it is expedient to make further provision respecting the printing of the copies aforesaid :

Be it therefore enacted, &c.,

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Documentary Evidence Act, 1882.

Documents printed under superintendence of Stationery Office receivable in evidence. 2. Where any enactment, whether passed before or after the passing of this Act, provides that a copy of any Act of Parliament, proclamation, order, regulation, rule, warrant, circular, list, gazette, or document shall be conclusive evidence, or be evidence, or have any other effect, when purporting to be printed by the Government Printer, or the Queen's Printer, or a printer authorised by Her Majesty, or otherwise under Her Majesty's authority, whatever may be the precise expression used, such copy shall also be conclusive evidence, or evidence, or have the said effect (as the case may be) if it purports to be printed under the superintendence or authority of Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Penalty for forgery. 3. If any person prints any copy of any Act, proclamation, order, regulation, royal warrant, circular, list, gazette, or document which falsely purports to have been printed under the superintendence or authority of Her Majesty's Stationery Office, or tenders in evidence any copy which falsely purports to have been printed as aforesaid, knowing that the same was not so printed, he shall be guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction, be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years, or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

Application of Act to Ireland. 4. The Documentary Evidence Act, 1868, as amended by this Act, shall apply to proclamations, orders, and regulations issued by the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland, either alone or acting with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland, as fully as it applies to proclamations, orders, and regulations issued by Her Majesty.

In the same Act, the term "the Privy Council" shall include the Privy Council in Ireland, or any committee thereof.

In the same Act, and in this Act, the term "the Government Printer" shall include any printer to Her Majesty in Ireland and any printer printing in Ireland under the superintendence or authority of Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

CAP. XIV.

An Act to confer further powers upon the Metropolitan Board of Works with respect to Streets and Buildings in the Metropolis. [19th June 1882.]

CAP. XV.

An Act to provide for the better application of Moneys paid by way of Compensation for the compulsory acquisition of Common Lands and extinguishment of Rights of Common. [19th June 1882.]

CAP. XVI.

An Act to amend the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act, 1874. [19th June 1882.]

WHEREAS under the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed in the session of the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter eighty-six, intitled "The Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act, 1874," loans have been made for fishing purposes which have proved to be of great public utility and of important benefit to the poorer classes of fishermen in certain counties in Ireland; and it is expedient for the still further encouragement and promotion of the Fisheries that the provisions of said Act should be amended :

Be it therefore enacted, &c.,

Short title of Act. 1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Amendment Act, 1882.

Repeal of clauses 2 and 3 of s. 5, of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 86. 2. The second and third clauses of the fifth section of the Act thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth Victoria, chapter eighty-six, which limit the amount of loans to be made in any one year to a certain proportion of the fund standing to the credit of the county in which such loans are made, are hereby repealed; and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, under the said Act, to advance, by way of loan, such amount, not exceeding in the whole the amount standing to the credit of each county in any year, as the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries may from time to time recommend, subject to the provisions of the said Act and the rules made thereunder by the Lord Lieutenant.

Lord Lieutenant in Council may make rules for supply of boats and gear to borrowers in lieu of money. 3. In addition to any rules heretofore made the Lord Lieutenant in Council may make such further rules as may seem expedient to enable the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries to supply, in cases where they may deem it expedient, to persons obtaining loans under the said Act and this Act, boats or fishing-gear in lieu of money; and on the certificate of the Inspectors that such boats and gear have been supplied the Commissioners may pay for such boats and gear instead of paying the money to the borrowers, which shall be as effectually binding on the borrowers, so far as the liabilities or securities they may have entered into with the Commissioners shall extend, as if such borrowers had received the actual value of such securities in money instead of boats and gear.

Recovery of loans. Summary powers. 4. All moneys of whatever amount, and at whatever time they may have accrued, due to the Commissioners on account of loans made by them under the said recited Act or this Act, including any costs and charges in respect of such loans or the recovery thereof, may be recovered before the justices in petty sessions, in the manner prescribed by the Act of the twenty-second year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter fourteen, and any Acts amending it.

The power given by this section shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers to which the Commissioners may be entitled at common law or in equity of recovering any moneys due to them, and the Commissioners may use any such powers accordingly.

Certificate of amount due. 5. A certificate, purporting to be under the seal of the Commissioners and to be signed by one of them, stating the amount due to the Commissioners from any person in respect of any loan made to him under the said recited Act or this Act, together with interest thereon, and any costs and charges in respect of such loans or the recovery thereof, shall, until the contrary is proved, be evidence of the amount due and of the liability of the party therein named to pay the same; and it shall be sufficient, notwithstanding any rule, order, or form of procedure in any court whatsoever, if such certificate be produced to the court before which proceedings are instituted for the recovery of any such sum by any person delegated by the said Commissioners, or any one of them, to produce such certificate.

Two Acts to be construed as one Act. 6. This Act and the said recited Act may be read and construed as one Act.

CAP. XVII.

An Act for the transfer of Property in Ireland held for the Service of Her Majesty's Customs and of the Inland Revenue to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland; and for other purposes relating thereto.

[3rd July 1882.]

CAP. XVIII.

An Act to regulate the procedure of School Boards in Scotland in the dismissal of Teachers.

[3rd July 1882.]

CAP. XIX.

An Act to amend the law relating to the interment of any person found felo de se.

[3rd July 1882.]

CAP. XX.

An Act to amend the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869.

[3rd July 1882.]

BE it enacted, &amp;c.,

Short title. 1. This Act shall be called the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, Amendment Act, 1882.

Interpretation, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41. 2. This Act and the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, as amended, shall be read as one Act.

Payment of rates by outgoing occupier to be proportionate to time of occupation. 3. The provisions of the sixteenth section of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, so far as regards the payment of rates by an outgoing occupier, shall extend and apply to any outgoing occupier assessed in the rate, and such outgoing occupier shall only be liable to pay so much of the rate as shall be proportionate to the time of his occupation within the period for which the rate was made, notwithstanding he may not be succeeded in his occupation by an incoming tenant.

Publication of rate where no parish church. 4. In a parish in which there is no church or chapel of the parish, a poor rate, whether made before or after the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to have been duly published if, within fourteen days after the making of the rate, notice thereof has been given by affixing such notice in some public and conspicuous place or situation in the parish.

CAP. XXI.

An Act to amend the Places of Worship Sites Act, 1873.

[12th July 1882.]

CAP. XXII.

An Act to make better provision for Inquiries with regard to Boiler Explosions.

[12th July 1882.]

WHEREAS special provision has been made by law for making inquiry into the causes and circumstances of boiler explosions on board ships and on railways, and it is expedient that like provision be made for making inquiries with respect to boiler explosions in other cases:

Be it therefore enacted, &amp;c.,

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882.

Extent of Act. 2. This Act shall extend to the whole of the United Kingdom.

Interpretation of terms. 3. In this Act the term "boiler" means any closed vessel used for generating steam, or for heating water, or for heating other liquids, or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes.

The term "court of summary jurisdiction" means any justices of the peace, metropolitan police magistrate, stipendiary magistrate, sheriff, sheriff substitute, or other magistrate or officer, by whatever name called, who is capable of exercising jurisdiction in summary proceedings for the recovery of penalties.

Application of Act.

4. This Act shall not apply to any boiler used exclusively for domestic purposes, or to any boiler used in the service of Her Majesty, or to any boiler on board a steamship having a certificate from the Board of Trade, or to any boiler explosion into which an inquiry may be held under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, or either of them.

35 & 36 Vict. c. 77.
35 & 36 Vict. c. 77.
Notice of boiler explosion to be sent to the Board of Trade.

5. (1.) On the occurrence of an explosion from any boiler to which this Act applies, notice thereof shall, within twenty-four hours thereafter, be sent to the Board of Trade by the owner or user, or by the person acting on behalf of the owner or user.

(2.) The notice shall state the precise locality as well as the day and hour of the explosion, the number of persons injured or killed, in addition to the purposes for which the boiler was used, and, generally, the part of the boiler that failed, and the extent of the failure, and such other particulars, if any, as the Board of Trade by notice inserted in the London Gazette may require, and shall be in the form printed in the schedule to this Act, or in such other form as the Board of Trade may from time to time approve for the purpose.

(3.) If default is made in complying with the requirements of this section, the person in default shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds.

Power for Board of Trade to direct inquiry as to boiler explosion.

6. (1.) On receiving notice of a boiler explosion the Board of Trade may, if it thinks fit, appoint one or more competent and independent engineer or engineers, practically conversant with the manufacture and working of boilers, to make a preliminary inquiry with respect to the explosion, and the persons so appointed shall have the powers conferred on the court by subsection (4) of this section. If it appears to the Board of Trade, either upon or without such preliminary inquiry, that a formal investigation of the causes and circumstances attending the explosion is expedient, the Board of Trade may direct a formal investigation to be held; and with respect to such investigation the following provisions shall have effect:

(2.) Formal investigations of boiler explosions shall be made at or near the place of such explosion by a court consisting of not less than two commissioners appointed by the Board of Trade, of whom one at least shall be a competent and practical engineer specially conversant with the manufacture and working of steam boilers, and one a competent lawyer. The court shall be presided over by one of the commissioners, the selection being made by the Board of Trade.

(3.) Any such formal investigation shall be held in open court, in such manner, and under such conditions, as the commissioners may think most effectual for ascertaining the causes and circumstances of the explosion, and for enabling them to make the report herein-after mentioned in this section.

(4.) The court shall have, for the purpose of its investigations, all the powers of a court of summary jurisdiction when acting as a court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, and shall in addition have the following powers; viz.,

(a.) The court, or any one appointed by it, may enter and inspect any place or building, the entry or inspection whereof appears to the court requisite for the said purpose:

(b.) It may by summons under its hand require the attendance of all such persons as it thinks fit to call before it, and examine for the said purpose, and may for such purpose require answers or returns to such inquiries as it thinks fit to make:

(c.) It may require and enforce the production of all books, papers, and documents which it considers important for the said purpose:

(d.) It may administer an oath, and require any person examined to make and sign a declaration of the truth of the statements made by him in his examination:

(e.) Every person so summoned, not being the owner or user of the boiler, or in the service or employment of the owner or user, or in any way connected with the working or management of the boiler, shall be allowed by the Board of Trade such expenses as would be allowed to a witness attending on subpoena before a court of record, and in Scotland to a witness attending a criminal trial by jury in the sheriff court; and in case of dispute as to the amount to be allowed, the same shall be referred by the court to a master of one of the superior courts, and in Scotland to the auditor of the Court of Session, who, on request under the hands of the members of the court, shall ascertain and certify the proper amount of such expenses.

(5.) The court making a formal investigation with respect to any boiler explosion, shall present a full and clear report to the Board of Trade, stating the causes of the explosion, and all the circumstances attending the same, with the evidence, adding thereto any observations thereon, or on the evidence, or on any matters arising out of the investigation which they think right to make, and the Board of Trade shall cause every such report to be made public in such manner as it thinks fit. When no formal investigation is held, the report presented to the Board of Trade by the engineer making a preliminary inquiry with respect to a boiler explosion shall be made public in such manner as the Board of Trade thinks fit.

As to costs and expenses of inquiry.

7. The court may order the costs and expenses of a preliminary inquiry or formal investigation or any part thereof, including therein the remuneration of persons holding such inquiry or investigation, to be paid by any person summoned before it, or by the Board of Trade; and such order shall, on the application of any party entitled to the benefit of the same, be enforced by any court of summary jurisdiction as if such costs and expenses were a penalty imposed by such court.

The Board of Trade may, if they think fit, pay to the persons holding any inquiry or investigation under this Act such remuneration as they may with the consent of the Treasury appoint.

If and so far as not otherwise provided for, all costs and expenses incurred by the Board of Trade, including any remuneration paid under this section, and any costs and expenses ordered by the court to be paid by the Board of Trade, shall be paid out of moneys to be provided by Parliament.

Recovery of fine.

27 & 28 Vict. c. 53.

44 & 45 Vict. c. 33.

8. Any fine payable under this Act shall be recoverable in England in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, in Scotland in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, and of any Act or Acts amending the same, and in Ireland within the police district of Dublin metropolis, in accordance with the provisions of the Acts regulating the powers and duties of justices of the peace for such district, or of the police of such district elsewhere in Ireland in accordance with the provisions of the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict., c. 93), and any Act amending or affecting the same.

SCHEDULE.

REPORT OF EXPLOSION of a STEAM BOILER to be sent to the BOARD OF TRADE within twenty-four hours after the occurrence of an EXPLOSION.

See Section 5.

1. Name of premises or works on which the boiler exploded.
  2. Address by the post.
  3. Day and hour of explosion.
  4. Number of persons killed.
  5. Number of persons injured.
  6. General description of the boiler.
  7. Purposes for which the boiler was used.
  8. Part of the boiler which failed, and the extent of failure generally.

CAP. XXIII.

An Act to extend the Public Health Act, 1875, to the making of Byelaws for Fruit Pickers. [12th July 1882.]

CAP. XXIV.

An Act to amend the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851. [12th July 1882.]

BE it enacted, &c.,

1. In the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, the word "agent" shall include the father, son, husband, wife, or brother of the complainant or defendant; provided that any such person be thereunto authorised in writing by the complainant or defendant (as the case may be), and do receive no remuneration therefor, and have the leave of the court to appear and be heard, and that the court is satisfied that such complainant or defendant is from infirmity, or other unavoidable cause, unable to appear.

2. This Act may be cited as the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1882; and the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, and this Act may be cited together as the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Acts, 1851, 1882.

CAP. XXV.

An Act for the prevention of Crime in Ireland. [12th July 1882.]

WHEREAS by reason of the action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland the operation of the ordinary law has become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and it is expedient to make further provision for that purpose:

Be it therefore enacted, &c.,

PART I.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

1. (1.) The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time direct a commission or commissions to be issued for the appointment of a court or courts of special commissioners for the trial in manner provided by this Act of persons committed for trial for any of the following offences; that is to say,

- (a.) Treason or treason-felony committed after the passing of this Act;
- (b.) Murder or manslaughter;
- (c.) Attempt to murder;
- (d.) Aggravated crime of violence against the person;
- (e.) Arson, whether by common law or by statute;
- (f.) Attack on dwelling-house;

and whenever it appears to the Lord Lieutenant that in the case of any person committed for trial for any of the said offences a just and impartial trial cannot be had according to the ordinary course of law, the Lord Lieutenant may by warrant assign to any such court of Special Commissioners (in this Act referred to as a Special Commission court) the duty of sitting at the place named in the warrant and of there, without a jury, hearing and determining, according to law, the charge made against the person so committed for trial and named in the warrant, and of doing therein what to justice appertains.

(2.) A Special Commission court shall consist of three judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland (other than the Lord Chancellor), to be named in such commission, and they shall try in open court, according to the tenor of a warrant under this Act, all persons named in the warrant who may be brought before them for trial.

(3.) The evidence taken on a trial before a Special Commission court, and the reasons, if any, given by the judges in delivering judgment, shall be taken down by a shorthand writer, who shall be sworn to take the same accurately to the best of his ability.

(4.) A person tried by a Special Commission court shall be acquitted unless the whole court concur in his conviction, and the judges of the said court shall in all cases of conviction give in open court the reasons for such conviction.

(5.) Where a person is tried by a Special Commission court he shall, if acquitted by such court, be entitled to be conveyed free of cost to any place he selects in the county in which he was committed for trial.

(6.) The Lord Lieutenant shall from time to time provide for the payment of the reasonable expenses of witnesses, and in the case of poor persons charged with treason, treason felony, or murder, for the payment of counsel required for the defence of a person brought for trial before a Special Commission court, and certified to be so required by such court.

Provided that nothing in this Act shall empower a Special Commission court to try a person for any offence, unless a judge and jury in Ireland would, but for this section, have had jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence.

Appeal from Special Commission court to Court of Criminal Appeal.

2. (1.) Any person convicted by a Special Commission court under this Act may, subject to the provisions of this Act, appeal either against the conviction and sentence of the court, or against the sentence alone, to the Court of Criminal Appeal, hereinafter mentioned, on any ground, whether of law or of fact; and the Court of Criminal Appeal shall (subject to the provisions of this Act) have power after hearing the appeal to confirm the conviction and sentence, or to enter an acquittal, or to vary the conviction or sentence.

Provided that—

- (a.) The conviction shall not be varied save by substituting a conviction for some less offence, for which the Special Commission court had jurisdiction on the trial to convict the appellant; and (b.) The sentence shall not be increased.

(2.) The conviction and sentence as confirmed or varied by the Court of Criminal Appeal shall have effect as if it were the conviction and sentence of the Special Commission court, and shall be deemed to be the sentence of a Special Commission court.

(3.) If the appellant establishes want of jurisdiction in the Special Commission court, the Court of Criminal Appeal may quash the proceedings.

(4.) The Court of Criminal Appeal shall have for the purpose of any appeal all the powers and jurisdiction of the Special Commission court.

Constitution of Court of Criminal Appeal.
40 & 41 Viet. c. 57.

3. (1.) The Court of Criminal Appeal under this Act shall consist of the judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland (with the exception of the Lord Chancellor), and any of those judges not less than five may sit and exercise the powers of the court.

Provided that a judge who sat in the Special Commission court shall not sit in the Court of Criminal Appeal on any appeal against a conviction or sentence by that Special Commission court to which he was a party.

(3.) The determination of any appeal shall be according to the determination of a majority of the judges who heard the appeal.

PART II.

SPECIAL JURORS AND VENUE.

Special jurors in criminal cases.

4. (1.) Where the trial of a person charged with an indictable offence would otherwise have been had by a jury before some court not being a court of general or quarter sessions, the Attorney General for Ireland, or the person charged, may, on serving the prescribed notice in the prescribed manner, require that the jury shall consist entirely of special jurors, and the jury shall consist of special jurors accordingly. Where more persons than one are to be tried together on the same charge, and notice for special jurors has not been served by the Attorney General, but has been served by some and not all of such persons, the jury shall consist entirely of special jurors or not, as the court may direct:

Provided that a trial shall not be impeached on any ground connected with the qualification of the jurors or any of them.

(2.) The special jurors shall be taken by ballot in manner provided by the nineteenth section of the Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1876, from all the jurors upon the panel returned by the sheriff from the special jurors book.

(3.) A county mentioned in the first column of the Second Schedule to this Act, and a county of a city or town set opposite the name of that county in the second column of the said schedule, shall as respects special jurors be deemed to be contributory counties; and the special jurors of each of two contributory counties shall be lawful jurors for the trial of any person who is to be tried by special jurors in either of such contributory counties; and, whenever a trial requiring special jurors under this Act is about to take place in any one of two contributory counties, steps shall be duly taken by the sheriff of each of the said counties for returning to the proper officer of the court in which such trial is held the panel of the special jurors of his county, and the special jury for such trial shall be taken by ballot accordingly from all the jurors upon such two panels indifferently; and the sheriff of each of the said contributory counties shall deliver to the proper officer of the court the cards for such ballot, and the ballot shall be taken in manner provided by the said nineteenth section of the Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1876.

The expression "sheriff" in this section includes any officer who by law performs the duties of sheriff in relation to the return of jurors.

Penalty for non-attendance of special juror. 5. The words "twenty pounds" shall be substituted for the words "forty shillings" in section four of the Juries Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1876, in the case of special jurors.

Change of venue. 6. (1.) The Attorney General, on making application to the High Court of Justice or a judge thereof, and certifying that in his opinion it is expedient in the interests of justice that a person awaiting his trial for an indictable offence should be tried in some county named in the certificate other than the county in which he would otherwise be tried, shall be entitled as of right to an order directing such person to be tried in the county named in the certificate; and, if such order is made before any indictment or inquisition has been found, the said offence may be inquired of in the county named in the order in like manner in all respects as if it had been committed in that county; and, if the order is made after an indictment or inquisition has been found, the indictment or inquisition shall be transmitted to the court of assize for the county named in the order, and have effect as if it had originally been duly found at or returned to that court; and, in either case, the offence may be heard and determined, and the person charged with the said offence may be convicted and sentenced, as if the offence had been committed in the county named in the order, but the sentence of the court shall be carried into effect as if such person had been tried in the county in which he would have been tried if the said order had not been made, and such person shall, if necessary, be removed accordingly, in pursuance of an order of the court made for the purpose.

(2.) The Lord Lieutenant shall from time to time provide for the payment, if an order is made under this section respecting the trial of any person, of the reasonable expenses of such person coming to the place at which, in pursuance of such order, he is to be tried in any case where he was admitted to bail, and also of the witnesses required for the defence of such person, and certified by the court before whom he is tried to be so required.

(3.) Where an order is made under this Act directing a change of venue, the prescribed Crown solicitor, or other prescribed officer under the direction of the Attorney General, shall provide, where necessary, for advancing money for enabling the person to be tried and the witnesses required for the defence of such person to attend the trial.

(4.) For the purposes of this section the expression "awaiting his trial" means committed for trial or charged with any indictable offence by indictment or inquisition; and "court of assize" includes any court of oyer and terminer or gaol delivery.

PART III.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Intimidation.

7. Every person who—

Wrongfully and without legal authority uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation,

(a.) to or towards any person or persons with a view to cause any person or persons, either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do; or

- (b.) to or towards any person or persons in consequence, either of his or their having done any act which he or they had a legal right to do, or of his or their having abstained from doing any act which he or they had a legal right to abstain from doing, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

In this Act the expression "intimidation" includes any word spoken or act done in order to and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.

Riots and other offences. 8. Every person who in a proclaimed district—

- (a.) Takes part in any riot or unlawful assembly; or (b.) Within nine months after the execution of any writ of possession or decree for possession of any house or land takes or holds forcible possession of such house or land or any part thereof; or
 (c.) Commits an aggravated act of violence against the person; or (d.) Commits an assault on any constable, bailiff, process server, or other minister of the law, while in the execution of his duty or in consequence thereof, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

Unlawful associations. 9. Every person who knowingly—

- (a.) Is a member of an unlawful association as defined by this Act; or (b.) Takes part in the operations of an unlawful association as defined by this Act, or of any meeting thereof, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

Illegal meetings. 10. (1.) The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing of which public notice shall be given and published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. A copy of such order shall be forthwith served in the prescribed manner if possible on the promoters of such meeting.

(2.) And, in case such meeting be so prohibited, two or more justices of the peace shall attend at the place where they have reason to believe such meeting is to be held, and one or more of such justices shall in the prescribed form and manner then and there notify aloud, to the persons attending, that such meeting is prohibited by the Lord Lieutenant; and in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse forthwith within a reasonable time, each of such persons thereupon shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; so, however, that the term of imprisonment awarded shall not exceed three months.

(3.) A copy of every such order shall be laid before Parliament within fourteen days after the day on which such order was made, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament.

Arrest of persons found at night under suspicious circumstances. 11. (1.) In a proclaimed district, if a person is out of his place of abode at any time after one hour later than sunset and before sunrise under circumstances giving rise to a reasonable suspicion of a criminal intent, any constable may arrest that person and bring him forthwith before the nearest available justice of the peace, and such justice, after inquiry into the circumstances of the case, may either discharge him or take the necessary steps, by committing him to prison or taking reasonable bail with two sufficient sureties not exceeding fifty pounds each, to bring him as soon as may be, and within a period not exceeding seven days, before a court of summary jurisdiction acting under this Act, and if on such person appearing before a court of summary jurisdiction acting under this Act, and the case being heard, the court believes that such person was out of his place of abode and not upon some lawful occasion or business he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act; so, however, that the term of imprisonment awarded shall not exceed three months.

(2.) Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, that person may, if he thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case.

PART IV.

GENERAL POWERS.

Arrest of strangers found under suspicious circumstances. 12. (1.) If a constable finds in a proclaimed district any stranger under circumstances giving rise to a reasonable suspicion of a criminal intent, he may arrest such stranger and bring him before a justice of the peace, and if such justice after inquiry into the circumstances of the case by evidence on oath, is satisfied that such stranger has not a lawful object in being in such place the justice may require him to give security by entering into a recognizance with two sufficient sureties to an amount not exceeding fifty pounds for each surety, to keep the peace and to be of good behaviour towards all Her Majesty's subjects during the ensuing six months, and, in default of his giving such security, may commit him to prison until he gives such security or is discharged in pursuance of this section, so however that he shall not be so imprisoned for more than one month.

(2.) The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, and the Acts amending the same, in the case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as is in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.

(3.) Upon the inquiry into the circumstances of the case of a person arrested under this section, such person and the husband or wife of such person as the case may be, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case.

(4.) The justice or justices committing a person to prison in pursuance of this section may for good cause discharge a person so committed, and in any case shall forthwith transmit a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant, stating the grounds of the committal, the security required, and any explanation given by the prisoner by way of defence. The Lord Lieutenant may order the prisoner to be discharged if it seems just to him so to do.

Newspapers. 13. (1.) Where after the passing of this Act any newspaper wherever printed is circulated or attempted to be circulated in Ireland, and any copy of such newspaper appears to the Lord Lieutenant to contain matter inciting to the commission of treason or of any act of violence or intimidation, the Lord Lieutenant may order that all copies of such newspaper containing that matter shall, when found in Ireland, be forfeited to Her Majesty, and any constable duly authorised by the Lord Lieutenant may seize the same.

(2.) Where it appears to the Lord Lieutenant that such newspaper was printed and published in Ireland, the order of the Lord Lieutenant shall indicate the part of the newspaper on account of which the order was made, and if the newspaper specifies the office in Ireland at which the newspaper is printed and published, the order shall, as soon as practicable, be served in the prescribed manner at the office so specified.

(3.) Every order of the Lord Lieutenant under this section shall be published in the "Dublin Gazette," and shall be laid before Parliament within thirty days if Parliament is then sitting, and, if not, within thirty days after the next sitting of Parliament Searches for arms and illegal documents.

14. (1.) It shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant from time to time by warrant in the prescribed form to direct the inspectors and sub-inspectors of constabulary for the time being acting in any constabulary district, or any of them, to search for and seize in any proclaimed district, or in any part thereof, specified in the warrant, all or any of the following articles; that is to say, any arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles suspected to be used or to be intended to be used for the purpose of or in connexion with any secret society or secret association existing for criminal purposes; all such articles when seized shall be forfeited to Her Majesty.

(2.) Any inspector or sub-inspector so authorised by the warrant may, at any time within three months from the date of the warrant, and at any place within the proclaimed district or the part thereof specified in the warrant, together with such constables and other persons as he calls to his assistance, seize, detain, and carry away any of the articles above mentioned which he may find; and for the purposes aforesaid may at any time enter into any house, building, or place, and if admittance is refused or is not obtained within a reasonable time after it is first demanded, may enter by force in order to execute such warrant.

(3.) The person so executing the warrant shall, if desired, before executing the warrant produce the same.

Application of Alien Act to aliens.

15. The Act of the session of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter twenty, intitled "An Act to authorise for one year and to the end of the then next session of Parliament the removal of aliens from the realm," and a copy of which is set forth in the third schedule to this Act, is hereby re-enacted, and shall continue in force for the same period as this Act.

Provided as follows:—

- (1.) For the purposes of construction the Act mentioned in this section shall be deemed to have been passed at the date of the passing of this Act, and expressions in the said Act referring to its commencement or passing shall be construed accordingly, but section seven of the said Act, providing for its duration, shall be of no effect:
- (2.) An alien convicted of a misdemeanour under section two of the said Act shall be treated as a misdemeanant of the first class or division:
- (3.) The place in which any examination of witnesses or hearing of a case before the Lords of the Privy Council, in pursuance of section three of the said Act is held, shall be in open court:
- (4.) The said Act shall extend to the Isle of Man in like manner as if that isle were declared by the said Act to form part of Great Britain.

Power of justices to summon witnesses.

16. Where a sworn information has been made that an offence has been committed, any resident magistrate in the county or place in which the offence was committed, although no person may be charged before him with the commission of such offence, may summon to appear before him at a police office or the place where the petty sessions for the district in which the said offence has been committed are usually held any person within his jurisdiction whom he has reason to believe to be capable of giving material evidence concerning such offence, and he may examine on oath and take the deposition of such person concerning any such offence, and, if he sees cause, may bind such person by recognizance to appear and give evidence at the next petty sessions, or when called upon within three months from the date of such recognizance; and the law relating to a witness when summoned before a justice having jurisdiction and required to give evidence concerning the matter of an information or complaint shall apply to a witness summoned under this section.

(1.) An offence for the purposes of this section means any felony or misdemeanour, and also any offence against this Act, with the exception of the offences specified in sections ten and eleven of this Act.

(2.) A person summoned to appear under this section shall not be excused from answering any question on the ground that the answer thereto may criminate, or tend to criminate, himself, but any statement made by any person in answer to any question put to him on any examination under this section shall not, except in case of an indictment or other criminal proceeding for perjury, be admissible in evidence against him in any proceeding civil or criminal.

(3.) A magistrate who conducts the examination, under this section, of a person concerning any offence, shall not, if such offence is punishable on summary conviction, take part in the hearing and determination of a charge for that offence, and shall not, if such offence is an indictable offence, take part in the committing for trial of such person for such offence.

Power of apprehending absconding witnesses.

17. Whenever any person is bound by recognizance to give evidence before justices, or any criminal court, any justice, if he sees fit, upon information being made in writing, and on oath, that such person is about to abscond, or has absconded, may issue his warrant for the arrest of such person, and if such person is arrested any justice, upon being satisfied that the ends of justice would otherwise be defeated, may commit such person to prison until the time at which he is bound by such recognizance to give evidence, unless in the meantime he produces sufficient sureties. Provided that any person so arrested shall be entitled on demand to receive a copy of the information upon which the warrant for his arrest was issued.

Additional constabulary force.

18. (1.) When it appears to the Lord Lieutenant from time to time, that by reason of the existence or apprehension of crime and outrage in any district, the number of constabulary ordinarily employed in such district is not sufficient, he may by proclamation, which shall be published in the "Dublin Gazette," declare that for the reasons aforesaid such district requires additional constabulary, and may order additional constabulary to be employed in such district, and for that purpose may from time to time add to the Royal Irish Constabulary such officers and men (if any) as he thinks necessary.

(2.) The Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary shall from time to time make out, in such manner as the Lord Lieutenant may order, an account of the total cost of any additional constabulary employed in any district under this section, and shall certify the amount to the Lord Lieutenant.

(3.) The whole, or such part of the whole as the Lord Lieutenant may order, of the amount so certified, shall be a charge payable by the district in which such additional constabulary are employed. And the Lord Lieutenant may exempt from charge any specified portion of the area declared to be chargeable, or any specified rateable property in such area.

Provided that if the district is in a county where the number of constabulary is, after allowing for vacancies arising from death, absence on leave, absence from illness, or other like cause, deficient as compared with the quota for that county, and additional constabulary are employed, under this section, in the county, a charge under this section shall not be made in respect of such number of the additional constabulary as is equal to the number required for the time being to make up the said deficiency.

There shall be published monthly in the "Dublin Gazette" a return showing the number of additional constabulary employed pursuant to this section, the district or districts in which they are respectively employed, and a statement of the cost or approximate cost to each district resulting from such employment.

Power of Lord Lieutenant as to compensation, to be paid in certain cases of murder or maiming.

19. (1.) Where it appears from information on oath and in writing that any one has been murdered, maimed, or otherwise injured in his person, and that such murder, maiming, or injury is a crime of the character commonly known as agrarian, or arising out of any unlawful association, and an application is made for compensation, the Lord Lieutenant may, if he thinks fit, after giving public notice in the district in the prescribed manner, by warrant nominate such person or persons being or one of whom shall be a practising barrister of at least six years standing as he thinks fit to investigate the application, and after hearing all parties whom he or they deem to be interested, including any body of ratepayers of the district, to report to the Lord Lieutenant thereon; the parties shall be heard personally or by counsel, and the evidence taken on oath in open court.

(2.) For the purpose of such investigation the person or persons so nominated shall, with respect to enforcing the attendance of witnesses and all other matters, have the same power as justices sitting in petty sessions. Such public notice shall be given of the place and time at which the investigation will be held, and the investigation shall be proceeded with in such manner, and the report to the Lord Lieutenant shall be in the prescribed form and shall be made in such manner as the Lord Lieutenant may direct. The remuneration of such person or persons and the expenses of holding the investigation, to such amount as may be fixed by the Lord Lieutenant, with the approval of Her Majesty's Treasury, shall be defrayed out of moneys to be provided by Parliament.

(3.) Upon such report, the Lord Lieutenant may dismiss the application if he thinks fit, or may award such sum for compensation as he thinks just.

(4.) The said sum shall, if the Lord Lieutenant think just, be a charge payable by such district and in such instalments as the Lord Lieutenant may by warrant order, and shall be paid to the personal representative of the person murdered or to the person maimed or injured, or if he is dead to his personal representative.

(5.) Applications under this Act may be made by the personal representative or one of the next-of-kin of any person murdered, or by any person maimed or injured, or by a Crown solicitor, or by any person in that behalf authorised by the Lord Lieutenant.

(6.) This section shall not apply to any cases of murder, maiming, or injury which have occurred before the first day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty, except cases in which notice of intention to apply for a presentment under the provisions of the 33 Vic. c. 9. thirty-ninth section of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, had been published as prescribed by that Act, but the claim for compensation failed to be decided by reason of the expiration of that Act.

(7.) Where the act causing the murder, maiming, or injury has occurred since the passing of this Act, an application for compensation under this section shall not be entertained unless it is made within three months after the occurrence of the act causing the murder, maiming, or injury.

(8.) Where the act causing the murder, maiming, or injury has occurred before the passing of this Act, an application for compensation under this section shall not be entertained unless it is made within three months after the passing of this Act.

20. (1.) For the purpose of the provisions of this Act with respect to additional constabulary in any district, and compensation in cases of murder, maiming, or injury, the expression "district" means any county, barony, townland, or parish, or part or parts thereof respectively.

(2.) Any charge in respect of such additional constabulary, or any sum for such compensation as aforesaid, which is for the time being a charge payable by any district shall be apportioned rateably upon all rateable hereditaments in the district other than those exempted by the Lord Lieutenant in pursuance of this Act, and shall be payable by the occupiers thereof:

(3.) Such apportionment shall be made and such charges collected by persons for the time being appointed by warrant of the Lord Lieutenant for that purpose; and every person so appointed collector shall, for the purpose of such collection, have all the powers, authorities, and remedies given by law to the collector of grand jury cess, and shall account for the sums which he is authorised to collect in manner directed from time to time by the Lord Lieutenant, and the Lord Lieutenant's warrant shall be conclusive proof that the sums named in the warrant are to be raised in the district as therein mentioned, and that the person named in the warrant is authorised to collect the same.

(4.) Any person liable to any portion of such charge shall on demand before the execution of the warrant for collection be entitled to inspect the apportionment and the warrant or a copy thereof for the collection of the same.

(5.) A return showing the sums from time to time collected under this section, the districts from which the same have been levied, and the manner in which the same have been disposed of, shall be presented annually to Parliament within one month after the opening of Parliament.

Every warrant imposing a charge upon a district in respect of such additional constabulary, or such compensation as aforesaid, shall specify the time during which it is to remain in force, and shall be in the prescribed form, and shall be published in the prescribed manner, and a copy of every such warrant shall be laid before Parliament within one month after the date of the warrant, if Parliament is then sitting, and if not within one month after the next meeting of Parliament, together with a statement showing the following par-particulars, in cases where such particulars do not appear in the warrant; that is to say, the valuation of the district proposed to be charged; the number of instalments by and the time within which the charge is to be raised; the poundage rate necessary for raising the same; and the grounds upon which the district has been charged, and the number of inhabitants in such district at the last census as far as can be ascertained.

PART V.

SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISIONS AND DEFINITIONS.

Punishment for offence against Act. 21. A person guilty of an offence against this Act shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding six months, or such less term as is in that behalf fixed by any section of this Act.

Summary procedure for offences under Act. 22. (1.) Any offence against this Act shall be punishable on summary conviction, and may be prosecuted—

(a.) Within the police district of Dublin Metropolis in manner provided by the Acts regulating the powers and duties of justices of the peace of such district or of the police of such district; and

(b.) Elsewhere in manner provided by the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93. Acts amending the same, subject nevertheless to the provisions of this section.

(2.) The proceedings for enforcing the appearance of the person charged, and the attendance of witnesses, shall be the same, and the evidence for both the prosecution and defence shall be taken as depositions in the same manner as if the offence were an indictable offence; but, save as aforesaid, the procedure, including the enforcing the attendance of witnesses for the defence, shall be the same as in the case of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(3.) A charge for an offence against this Act shall be heard and determined—

(a.) Within the police district of Dublin Metropolis before a divisional justice of that district; and

(b.) Elsewhere before two resident magistrates in petty sessions, one of whom shall be a person of the sufficiency of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant shall be satisfied:

And in this Act the expression "court of summary jurisdiction acting under this Act" means any such divisional justice or two resident magistrates.

(4.) The petty sessions held by two resident magistrates may be held at any place fixed by law for the holding of petty sessions, and on such days as may be from time to time determined in the prescribed manner.

(5.) Where a person is convicted summarily of an offence against this Act and sentenced to any term of imprisonment exceeding one month, such person may appeal against such conviction to a court of general sessions held in pursuance of this section, but the proceedings before a divisional justice or two resident magistrates, on a charge for an offence against this Act, shall not be reviewed in any other manner, whether by means of a writ of certiorari or otherwise, and such appeal shall, save as herein-after otherwise provided,—

(a.) Be subject, except in the police district of Dublin Metropolis, to the provisions to which an appeal under the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, is by section twenty-four of that Act, and any enactments amending that section made subject; and

(b.) Be subject in the police district of Dublin Metropolis to the said provisions, with such modifications therein as may be prescribed for the purpose of adapting the same to the circumstances of that district.

(6.) For the purpose of hearing and determining appeals under this section general sessions of the peace shall be held at the prescribed times and places, and at such general sessions the chairman of the county shall sit as sole judge of the court, and shall hear and determine any such appeals which are brought before him, and shall have the jurisdiction and powers of a court of quarter sessions, and the decision of such chairman, whether as to the jurisdiction of the justice or magistrates or otherwise, shall be final and conclusive.

(7.) Any depositions taken at the hearing of a case before the divisional justice or two resident magistrates may be admitted in evidence on an appeal in that case.

(8.) The expression "chairman of the county" in this section means a county court judge and chairman of the quarter sessions of a county, and includes a recorder.

Proclamation of districts. 23. The Lord Lieutenant, by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland, may from time to time, when it appears to him necessary for the prevention of crime and outrage, by proclamation declare the provisions of this Act which relate to proclaimed districts or any of those provisions to be in force within any specified part of Ireland as from the date of the proclamation, or any later date specified in the proclamation; and the provisions of this Act which are mentioned in the proclamation shall after the said date be in force within such specified part of Ireland, and that part of Ireland shall be a proclaimed district within the meaning of the provisions so mentioned. The proclamation shall provide for the manner of the promulgation thereof.

Supplemental provisions as to proclamations and orders. 24. (1.) The Lord Lieutenant, but by and with the advice of the Privy Council, where a proclamation or order has been made by and with such advice, may, by a further proclamation or order, from time to time alter or revoke any proclamation or order made by him under this Act. A copy of every proclamation under this Act shall be laid before each House of Parliament within fourteen days after the making thereof, if Parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament.

(2.) Any warrant, order, notice, or other document of the Lord Lieutenant under this Act may be signed under his hand or under the hand of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant.

(3.) Every proclamation under this Act, and a notice of the promulgation thereof in the manner provided, shall be published in the "Dublin Gazette."

(4.) The production of a printed copy of the "Dublin Gazette," purporting to be printed and published by the Queen's authority, and containing the publication of any proclamation, order, or notice under this Act, shall be conclusive evidence of the contents of such proclamation, order, or notice, and of the date thereof, and in the case of a proclamation that the district specified in such proclamation is a proclaimed district within the meaning of the provisions of this Act mentioned in the proclamation, and that the said proclamation has been duly promulgated, and in the case of an order that it has been duly made.

Regulation as to warrants and notice of trial. 25. (1.) A warrant for the trial by a Special Commission court of a person charged with an offence shall be in the prescribed form, and shall, subject to the other provisions of this Act, be issued before he is arraigned for trial for such offence before some other tribunal in the ordinary course of law, or before the expiration of two months from the date of his being committed for trial, whichever of such events may first happen.

(2.) A copy of a warrant for the trial of a person before a Special Commission court shall be served on such person in the prescribed manner not less than fourteen days before his trial before such court begins, and shall be published in the "Dublin Gazette," and shall be laid before Parliament within fourteen days, if Parliament be then sitting, and, if not, within fourteen days after the then next meeting of Parliament.

(3.) Not less than fourteen days before the sitting of any Special Commission court to try a person for any offence, public notice shall be given in the prescribed manner in the locality in which the person charged with such offence was committed for trial, stating the names of the Special Commissioners, the said offence, the name of the person charged with such offence, and the place at which the court will sit and the day on which the sitting of the court will begin. A copy of such notice shall also be served in the prescribed manner, and within the prescribed time, on the person to be tried.

(4.) An objection to the jurisdiction of a Special Commission court to try a person for any offence shall not be entertained by reason only of any non-observance of the provisions of this section; but the court, on application, may adjourn the case, so as to prevent any person charged being prejudiced by such non-observance.

Rota of Judges. 26. (1.) The judges to be members of a Special Commission court, and the judges to sit in the Court of Criminal Appeal under this Act, shall be respectively selected according to separate rotas to be determined by ballots held at the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner; but where a judge appears to the Lord Lieutenant to be, on account of illness or some reasonable cause, ineligible, the judge next on the rota shall be selected.

(2.) Any judge appointed after either rota is determined shall be added after all the other judges on the rota.

(3.) An objection to the jurisdiction of a Special Commission court, or of the Court of Criminal Appeal under this Act, shall not be entertained by reason only of the rota of the judges to form or sit on such court not having been properly determined, or not having been observed.

Regulations as to courts. 27. (1.) Commissions under this Act constituting Special Commission courts shall be in the prescribed form and be issued and superseded in the prescribed manner.

(2.) If any member of a Special Commission court dies, or it appears to the Lord Lieutenant that from illness or some reasonable cause it is necessary that another judge should be appointed in the place of a member of a Special Commission court, the Lord Lieutenant may, if he thinks it expedient so to do, direct a supplemental commission to be issued in the prescribed form and manner, appointing the next judge on the rota who is not ineligible to fill the vacancy in such court.

(3.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, and for the purpose of the trial of any persons charged before them, a Special Commission court shall have all the powers and jurisdiction of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland, and all the same powers and jurisdiction as if it were a court of assize, and court of oyer and terminer, and a court of gaol delivery, trying with a jury an offender indicted before such court, and shall have all the powers of a petty jury at such court, and shall be a superior court of record, and the same intendment shall be made in respect of all orders, writs, and processes made by and issuing out of such Special Commission court, as if it were a superior court of record acting according to the course and by the authority of the common law.

(4.) All the members of a Special Commission court shall be present at the hearing and determination of the case of a person tried before such court, but, save as aforesaid, the jurisdiction of the court may be exercised by any of such members, and any act of the court shall not be invalidated by reason of any vacancy among the members.

(5.) Any offence with which a person brought for trial before a Special Commission court, in pursuance of this Act, is charged, shall be deemed to have been committed at some place within the jurisdiction of such court.

(6.) During such time as a person is subject, in pursuance of a warrant under this Act, to be tried by a Special Commission court for any offence, he shall not be liable to be tried by any other court for the same offence.

(7.) The trial by a Special Commission court of a person in pursuance of a warrant under this Act shall begin at such time within two months from the date of the warrant as may be ordered by the Lord Lieutenant, unless such trial is postponed by the court in the prescribed manner on the request of such person, or on account of the illness or absence of a witness, or on account of a vacancy in the court, or of the illness of such person, or some other sufficient cause, or unless the trial of such person, when commenced, has been discontinued on account of a vacancy in the court or the illness of such person, or some other sufficient cause.

(8.) Where a trial of a person is postponed or discontinued, the trial of such person may take place before the same court or any other Special Commission court, and shall take place as soon as may be and within the prescribed time.

(9.) In the event of a trial of a person which has been postponed or discontinued taking place before the same Special Commission court, the prescribed notice shall be given of such trial, and in the event of such trial taking place before another Special Commission court, a new warrant shall be issued for the trial of such person, and such warrant shall not be invalidated by reason only that it is issued after the expiration of two months from the date of such person being committed for trial.

(10.) A commission appointing a Special Commission court shall not be superseded or affected by the issue of another like commission, or of any commission of assize, oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, or other commission whatsoever, whether to the same or any other persons, nor shall the sitting or jurisdiction of such court be affected by the sitting of any such commission or of the High Court of Justice.

(11.) The number of judges sitting as the Court of Criminal Appeal under this Act to hear any case shall be such uneven number as, subject to the provisions of this Act, the Lord Chancellor may from time to time appoint, but if during the hearing of any case any judge so sitting dies or becomes unable to act, the whole case shall be again heard.

(12.) Sentence of death passed by a Special Commission court shall be carried into effect in the county or place where the trial is held by the sheriff having jurisdiction therein, or in such other place and by such other sheriff or officer as the Lord Lieutenant may direct.

(13.) The indictment against any person brought for trial before a Special Commission court shall be prepared in the prescribed manner, and shall be in the prescribed form, and shall be of the same effect as if it were, and shall, so far as circumstances may admit, be deemed for all the purposes of the trial to be, an indictment found by a grand jury; and the proceedings before a Special Commission court shall, so far as circumstances may admit, be conducted in like manner as the proceedings on the trial of an indictment before a court of oyer and terminer, and the court shall have the same power of amending any indictment or other document or proceeding which a court of oyer and terminer has.

(14.) An objection to the jurisdiction of a Special Commission court to try a person in pursuance of a warrant under this Act shall not be entertained by reason only of any want of form in the warrant or of any mistake in the name or description of such person in the warrant if it is shown that the person tried is the person to whom the warrant relates; and an objection to the proceedings of such court for any want of form on the trial of any person shall not be entertained, if no injustice was thereby done to such person.

(15.) Lists of the names of all persons convicted by a Special Commission court under this Act, with the dates of their convictions and the offences of which they have respectively been convicted, shall from time to time be laid before both Houses of Parliament at the following times, that is to say, a list of such names shall be laid before Parliament within seven days after the commencement of each Session of Parliament, and subsequent lists at intervals of not more than three months during the continuance of each Session. Every list after the first list shall contain only the names of persons convicted since the previous list.

(16.) The Lord Lieutenant shall from time to time provide for the payment of the reasonable expenses of a person coming to the place at which he is to be tried before a Special Commission court in any case where he was admitted to bail and is to be tried beyond the limits of the county in which he was committed for trial.

(17.) The prescribed Crown Solicitor, or other prescribed officer, under the direction of the Attorney General, shall provide, when necessary, for advancing money for enabling a person about to be tried before a Special Commission court, and the witnesses required for the defence of such person, to attend the trial.

Rules of Procedure in Schedule.

28. The rules in the first schedule to this Act with respect to procedure on appeals under this Act to the Court of Criminal Appeal and the other matters therein mentioned shall have the same effect as if enacted in the body of this Act.

Allowances to judges, witnesses, and others.

29. There shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund such allowances to judges and chairmen of counties, and there shall be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament such allowances to officers and other persons acting in pursuance of this Act, and such expenses incurred in reference to any court established or exercising jurisdiction under this Act, and such expenses of persons charged, counsel, and witnesses, payable in pursuance of this Act, as the Lord Lieutenant, with the approval of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, may from time to time appoint.

Rules for procedure and matters to be prescribed.

30. The Lord Lieutenant may, from time to time, by and with the advice of the Privy Council make, and when made revoke, add to, and alter rules in relation to the following matters:—

- (1.) For adapting the procedure on and preliminary to the trial of criminal cases, including the forms of indictment and other matters, to a Special Commission court under this Act; and
- (2.) In relation to the procedure on appeals from a Special Commission court under this Act, and in relation to the sittings of the Court of Criminal Appeal under this Act; and
- (3.) In the case of a trial before a Special Commission court, in relation to the sitting of such court in any place, and to the nomination of officers of such court; and
- (4.) In the case of a trial before a Special Commission court, or the case where a special jury is required or where the venue is changed in relation to the attendance, authority, and duty of sheriffs, coroners, justices, gaolers, constables, officers, ministers, and persons, the removal and custody of prisoners, the alteration of any writs, precepts, inquisitions, indictments, recognizances, proceedings, and documents, the transmission of inquisitions, indictments, recognizances, and documents, and the expenses of prosecutors, and witnesses, and the carrying of sentences into effect; also, in the case where a special jury is required, the number of jurors to be returned on any panel; and
- (5.) In relation to forms for the purposes of this Act, and to any matter by this Act directed to be prescribed; and
- (6.) In relation to any matters which appear to the Lord Lieutenant, by and with the advice aforesaid, to be necessary for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act; and any rules made in pursuance of this Act shall be judicially noticed and be of the same validity as if they were contained in this Act.

Powers of Act to be cumulative.

31. Any powers or jurisdiction conferred by this Act on any court or authority in relation to any offence or matter shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers or jurisdiction of any court or authority subsisting at common law or by Act of Parliament in relation to such offence or matter:

Provided that no person shall be tried or punished twice for the same offence.

Saving for trade unions.

34 & 35 Vict. c. 31.
39 & 40 Vict. c. 22.
38 & 39 Vict. c. 84.

Saving for associations.

32. No agreement or combination which, under the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876, or the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, is legal, shall be deemed to be an offence against this Act.

33. Nothing in this Act shall render unlawful any political or social association for such objects, and acting by such means as, under this Act or otherwise, are not unlawful, nor shall membership of such an association be deemed to be an offence against this Act.

Definition of "unlawful association."

34. The expression "unlawful association" means an association formed:—

- (a.) for the commission of crimes; or
- (b.) carrying on operations for or by the commission of crimes; or
- (c.) for encouraging or aiding persons to commit crimes;

and the expression "crime" for the purposes of this section means any offence against this Act, and also any crime punishable on indictment by imprisonment with hard labour, or by any greater punishment.

General definitions.

35. In this Act unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression "Lord Lieutenant" means the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland for the time being.

The expression "county" includes a county of a city and a county of a town and city and county.

The expression "Attorney General" includes in the case of any vacancy or inability to act the Solicitor General.

44 & 45 Vict. c. 5. The expressions "arms" and "ammunition" respectively have the same meaning as in the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881.

The expression "prescribed" means prescribed by rules to be made by the Lord Lieutenant in manner provided by this Act.

The expression "committed for trial" means a person committed to gaol to be there kept until his trial for an offence, or admitted to bail on the condition of his appearing to take his trial for any offence.

The expression "aggravated act of violence against the person" means an assault which either causes actual bodily harm or grievous bodily harm, or is committed with intent to cause grievous bodily harm.

The expression "attack on a dwelling house" means any crime cognisable by law involving the breaking into, firing at, or otherwise assaulting or injuring a dwelling house.

The expression "resident magistrate" means a magistrate appointed in pursuance of the Act of the session of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter thirteen, intituled "An Act to consolidate the laws relating to the constabulary force in Ireland," and of the Acts amending the same, and includes any divisional justice of the police district of Dublin metropolis.

The expression "inspector of constabulary" means a county inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and includes an inspector of the Dublin metropolitan police, and the expression "sub-inspector of constabulary" means a sub-inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

The expression "judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature" means the judges of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal and of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland other than the Judicial Commissioner of the Irish Land Commission.

Short title. 36. This Act may be cited as the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act, 1882.

Duration of Act. 37. This Act shall continue in force until the expiration of three years next after the passing thereof, and to the end of the then current session of Parliament.

Provided, that the expiration of this Act shall not affect the validity of anything done in pursuance of this Act, and any person convicted under this Act may be punished as if this Act continued in force, and all appeals, prosecutions, and other legal proceedings pending under this Act at the time of the expiration thereof may be carried on, completed and carried into effect, and the sentences carried into execution, as if this Act had not expired.

SCHEDULES.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Section 28.

RULES FOR APPEALS TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

(1.) Notice of the appeal shall be given within seven days after the day on which the appellant was sentenced by the Special Commission court, or such further time as may be allowed by the said Special Commission Court, or by the Court of Criminal Appeal.

(2.) The said notice shall be served in the prescribed manner on the master of the Crown Office, or other prescribed person (who is in this Schedule included in the term Master of the Crown Office), but such notice shall not be invalidated by any informality in the procedure.

(3.) The master of the Crown Office shall forthwith in the prescribed manner give notice to the Attorney General, and to the Special Commission court before which the appellant was tried, and the latter court shall forthwith forward in the prescribed manner for the use of the Court of Criminal Appeal copies of the shorthand writer's notes, and all indictments, documents, and things connected with the case.

(4.) The master of the Crown Office shall forthwith give notice to the judges whose duty it is, according to the rota, to sit in the Court of Criminal Appeal, and those judges shall, notwithstanding any vacation, forthwith proceed to hold a court, and hear and determine the appeal.

(5.) Unless the Court of Criminal Appeal on the application of the appellant, or of the Attorney-General, for special reason otherwise orders, the court shall be held within fourteen days after the day on which the appellant was sentenced, and shall sit from day to day to hear the appeal.

(6.) The appeal shall be heard in open court in the presence of the appellant, and the appellant may appear by counsel or solicitor.

(7.) The court may re-hear the case by the reading of the evidence as contained in the shorthand writer's notes, and may permit to be called or call any new witness, and may recall any witness who gave evidence at the trial, and may either examine such witness or let him be examined and cross examined by or on behalf of the appellant and the prosecutor.

(8.) During the time allowed for an appeal and while an appeal is pending a sentence shall not be carried into execution, but the appellant shall be detained in custody in like manner as if he were awaiting his trial; and he shall be brought before the court in accordance with the prescribed rules, and the master of the Crown Office shall give the prescribed notice of the appeal to the sheriff, gaoler, and other persons concerned in the execution of the sentence or the custody of the appellant, and shall also give such notice of the result of the appeal as may be necessary for carrying into effect the final judgment of the court.

(9.) Where a person convicted by a Special Commission court is in custody and without legal assistance, and is desirous to appeal, it shall be the duty of the governor or other chief officer of the prison in which he is confined to assist him in making out and forwarding within due time a notice of appeal to the proper officer in accordance with this Act.

(10.) An appellant shall be entitled, on application, to have a copy of the shorthand writer's notes, free of charge.

THIRD SCHEDULE.

ALIEN ACT.

COPY OF ACT REFERRED TO.

ANNO UNDECIMO
VICTORIÆ REGINÆ.
CAP. XX.

An Act to authorise for One Year, and to the End of the then next Session of Parliament, the Removal of Aliens from the Realm. [9th June 1848.]

Power to Secretary of State or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to order Aliens to depart this Realm.

WHEREAS it is expedient for the due Security of the Peace and Tranquillity of this Realm, that Provision should be made, for a Time to be limited, respecting Aliens arriving or resident in this Kingdom: Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, That when and so often as One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State in that Part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, or the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors in that Part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, shall have Reason to believe, from Information given to him or them respectively, in Writing, by any Person subscribing his or her Name and Address thereto, that for the Preservation of the Peace and Tranquillity of any Part of this Realm it is expedient to remove therefrom any Alien or Aliens who may be in any part of this Realm, or who may hereafter arrive therein, it shall be lawful for such Secretary of State in that Part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain, and for such Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors in that Part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, by Order under his or their Hand or Hands respectively, to be published in the London or Dublin Gazette, as the Case may be, to direct that any such Alien or Aliens who may be within Great Britain or Ireland respectively, or who may hereafter arrive therein, shall depart this Realm, within a Time limited in such Order;

If Aliens wilfully refuse to obey such Order, they may be committed to Gaol until taken in charge for the purpose of the being sent out of the Realm. and if any such Alien shall knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect to pay due Obedience to such Order, or shall be found in this Realm or any part thereof, contrary to such Order, after such Publication thereof as aforesaid, and after the Expiration of the Time limited in such Order, it shall be lawful for any of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, or for the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary, or for any Justice of the Peace, or for the Mayor or Chief Magistrate of any City or Place, to cause every such Alien to be arrested, and to be committed to the Common Gaol of the County or place where he or she shall be so arrested, there to remain, without Bail or Mainprize, until he or she shall be taken in charge for the Purpose of being sent out of the Realm, under the Authority hereinafter given.

Penalty on Aliens disobeying such Order.

Order as aforesaid shall be guilty of a Misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall, at the Discretion of the Court, be adjudged to suffer Imprisonment for any Time not exceeding one Month for the First Offence, and not exceeding Twelve Months for the Second and any subsequent Offence.

Aliens on neglecting to obey Order may be given in charge by Warrant of Secretary of State or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to be conveyed out of the Kingdom.

Neglect to obey such Order, or convicted of such Refusal or Neglect, and either before or after such Alien shall have suffered the Punishment inflicted for the same, by Warrant under his hand and Seal, to give such Alien in charge to One of Her Majesty's Messengers, or to any other Person or Persons to whom he shall think proper to direct such Warrant, in order to such Alien being conveyed out of the Kingdom; and such Alien shall be so conveyed accordingly:

Where any Alien shall allege any Excuse for not complying with Order, Privy Council to judge of the Sufficiency of the same.

Provided always, that where such Alien (not having been convicted as aforesaid) shall allege any Excuse for not complying with such Order, or any Reason why the same should not be enforced, or why further Time should be allowed him or her for complying therewith, it shall be lawful for the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Great Britain or in Ireland, as the Case may be, to judge of the Sufficiency of such Excuse or Reason, and to allow or disallow the same either absolutely or on such Condition as they shall think fit; and where such Alien shall be in Custody under such Warrant of any of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State or of the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland as aforesaid, the Messenger or other Person in whose Custody he or she shall be, forthwith upon its being signified to him that such Excuse or Reason is alleged by such Alien, shall make known the same to such Secretary of State, or to the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, as the Case may be, who, upon receiving such Notification, or in any Case in which he or they shall be informed that any such Excuse or Reason is alleged by or on behalf of any Alien to quit the Realm, shall forthwith suspend the Execution of such Warrant until the Matter can be inquired into and determined by the said Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council; and such Alien, if in Custody under any such Warrant, shall remain in such Custody, or if not in Custody may be given in charge by any such Warrant as aforesaid, and shall remain in Custody until the Determination thereon shall be made known, unless in the meantime such Secretary of State, or the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, shall consent to or the said Lords shall make Order for the Release of such Alien, either with or without Security: Provided always, that the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council shall cause to be delivered to such Alien, in Writing, a general Summary of the Matters alleged against him or her, and shall allow him or her reasonable Time to prepare his or her Defence; and that it shall be lawful for him or her to summon and examine upon Oath Witnesses before the said Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and to be heard before them, by himself or herself, or his or her Counsel, in support of the Excuse or Reason by him or her alleged.

Privy Council shall cause a Summary of Matters alleged against Alien to be delivered to him, &c.

Judges may admit Aliens to Bail in all Cases, if they see sufficient Cause.

IV. Provided always, and be it enacted, That in every Case in which Power is given by this Act to commit any Alien to Gaol without Bail or Mainprize it shall and may be lawful for any Justices of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or in Dublin, or for any of the Barons in Great Britain or Ireland, being of the Degree of the Coif, or for the Lord Justice Clerk or any of the Commissioners of Justiciary in Scotland, if upon Application made he shall see sufficient Cause, to admit such Person to Bail, he or she giving sufficient Security for his or her Appearance to answer the Matters alleged against him or her.

Where Alien shall not have been sent out of the Realm within One Month after Commitment, Judge, &c. empowered, where application has been made, to continue in, or discharge such Alien out of, Custody.

V. Provided, nevertheless, and be it enacted, That where any Alien who shall have been committed under this Act to remain until he or she shall be taken in charge for the Purpose of being sent out of the Realm, shall not be sent out of the Realm within one Calendar Month after such Commitment, it shall in every such Case be lawful for any of the Justices of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or in Dublin, or for any of the Barons in Great Britain or Ireland, being of the Degree of the Coif, or for the Lord Justice Clerk or any of the Commissioners of Justiciary in Scotland, or for any Two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in any Part of the United Kingdom, upon Application made to him or them by or on the Behalf of the Person so committed, and upon Proof made to him or them that reasonable Notice of the Intention to make such Application had been given to some or One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State in Great Britain, or to the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, or his or their Chief Secretary, according to his or their Discretion, to order the Person so committed to be continued in or discharged out of Custody.

Act not to extend to Ambassadors, &c., or Aliens who have resided in the Kingdom for Three Years. VI. Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing in this Act contained shall affect any Foreign Ambassador or other Public Minister duly authorised, nor any Person belonging to the diplomatic or domestic Establishment of any such Foreign Ambassador or Public Minister, registered as such according to Law, or being actually attendant upon such Ambassador or Minister, nor any Alien under the Age of Fourteen Years, or who shall have been residing within this Realm for Three Years next before the passing of this Act.

Duration of Act. VII. And be it enacted, That this Act shall continue in force for One Year from the passing thereof, and until the End of the then next Session of Parliament.

Act may be repealed, &c. VIII. And be it enacted, That this Act may be repealed or amended in the present Session of Parliament,

CAP. XXVI.

An Act to amend the Law relating to the Election of Lords Temporal to serve in Parliament for Ireland. [12th July 1882.]

BE it enacted, &c., . . . . .
Reduction of period between tests of writ and election. 1. In the event of any future election of a Lord Temporal to serve in Parliament for Ireland, the period of fifty-two days from the teste of the writs for such election, within which it is required by the Act of Union of Great Britain and Ireland that the same shall be returned into the Crown Office of Ireland, shall be reduced to a period of thirty days.

Short title. 2. This Act may be cited as the Election of Representative Peers (Ireland) Act, 1882.

CAP. XXVII.

An Act to extend certain Provisions of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, to the Highway Rate, and for other purposes. [12th July 1882.]

CAP. XXVIII.

An Act to apply the sum of five million seven hundred and three thousand eight hundred and ninety-one pounds out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on the thirty-first day of March one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three. [24th July 1882.]

CAP. XXIX.

An Act to amend the Acts relating to the County Courts in Ireland, and to make better provision for Appeals under the said Acts. [24th July 1882.]

WHEREAS it is expedient to amend the law and procedure regulating appeals from county courts in Ireland:

Be it enacted, &c., . . . . .

Application of Act. 1. This Act shall extend to Ireland only.

Short title. 2. This Act may be cited as the County Court Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1882.

Interpretation of terms. 3. The terms "county court judge," "clerk of the peace," "civil bill court," "county," and "borough" in this Act shall have the same meaning as is provided by the fortieth and forty-first Victoria, chapter fifty-six.

Any person dissatisfied with any decree, dismissal, or order, whether adverse to him or in his favour, pronounced by any county court judge, in the exercise by him of any jurisdiction at law under the several Acts conferring jurisdiction on county or civil bill courts in Ireland, may, in manner herein provided, appeal therefrom to the judge of assize for the respective counties in which such decree, dismissal, or order shall have been made or pronounced; and such judge of assize is hereby empowered and required to hear such suit or matter, and to make such decree or order thereon, and issue such execution in all respects as is empowered by the several statutes in that behalf by the said county court judges to be awarded, and the said judge of assize may upon any such appeal adjourn or remit the suit or matter back to the county court judge with such declarations or directions as he shall think proper, and may upon said appeal make such order with reference to the costs thereof as he shall think fit. Nothing contained in this section shall apply to any suit or matter instituted under the equitable jurisdiction vested in the county courts by the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 58.

4. Any person dissatisfied with any decree, dismissal, or order, whether adverse to him or in his favour, pronounced by any county court judge, in the exercise by him of any jurisdiction at law under the several Acts conferring jurisdiction on county or civil bill courts in Ireland, may, in manner herein provided, appeal therefrom to the judge of assize for the respective counties in which such decree, dismissal, or order shall have been made or pronounced; and such judge of assize is hereby empowered and required to hear such suit or matter, and to make such decree or order thereon, and issue such execution in all respects as is empowered by the several statutes in that behalf by the said county court judges to be awarded, and the said judge of assize may upon any such appeal adjourn or remit the suit or matter back to the county court judge with such declarations or directions as he shall think proper, and may upon said appeal make such order with reference to the costs thereof as he shall think fit. Nothing contained in this section shall apply to any suit or matter instituted under the equitable jurisdiction vested in the county courts by the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 58.

5. Every appeal under this Act shall be by notice signed by the party appealing or his solicitor in the form or to the like effect in the schedule to this Act annexed. Such notice shall be lodged with the clerk of the peace and shall be served within four clear days from the close of the sitting of the county court for the hearing of civil bills at which the decree or adjudication appealed from shall have been made, and shall be to the next assize to be held after the said period. Service of such notice shall be effected on the opposing party or his solicitor personally, or by leaving same at their or either of their residences with a clerk, servant, wife, or child, or other person therein over the age of sixteen years; and proof of such service shall be by affidavit made before any justice of the peace, which he is hereby empowered to take, or be by affidavit.

6. A notice of appeal shall be a stay of execution, provided a recognizance with sufficient sureties conditioned to pay the sum recovered and costs, or costs awarded in case no sum is recovered if a defendant appealing, or to pay the costs awarded where the appellant was a plaintiff in the county court, and to pay the costs of the appeal in case the adjudication appealed from was in favour of the party appealing, be entered into within the said period of four clear days before the clerk of the peace or any justice of the peace of the county, or in case the party appealing desire to dispense with a recognizance by lodgment within the like period of the amount of said proof being given the clerk of the peace shall enter the same for hearing before the judge of assize, and such entry shall be prima facie proof of due service thereof before such judge of assize.

6. A notice of appeal shall be a stay of execution, provided a recognizance with sufficient sureties conditioned to pay the sum recovered and costs, or costs awarded in case no sum is recovered if a defendant appealing, or to pay the costs awarded where the appellant was a plaintiff in the county court, and to pay the costs of the appeal in case the adjudication appealed from was in favour of the party appealing, be entered into within the said period of four clear days before the clerk of the peace or any justice of the peace of the county, or in case the party appealing desire to dispense with a recognizance by lodgment within the like period of the amount of said sums respectively with the clerk of the peace, who shall retain the same and dispose thereof as he shall be directed by the judge of assize; and the recognizance herein provided may be in the Form 31, Schedule C. of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter fifty-seven, or to the like effect, and with such variation as is by this Act provided; and the reception of such recognizance by the clerk of the peace shall be conclusive evidence that the several provisions herein enacted in reference thereto have been complied with, and in case any such recognizance shall have been taken by any justice of the peace, the same shall be returned to the clerk of the peace within two days after same shall have been taken or acknowledged: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall affect the provisions of the sixty-ninth section of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth Victoria, chapter one hundred and fifty-four.

Appeal from Recorder of Dublin.

7. Appeals in civil bill cases from the Recorder of Dublin shall be to the court to which such appeals lie at the time of the passing of this Act, but in other respects shall be regulated by the enactments contained in this Act.

Execution after notice of entering into recognizance to render party a trespasser.

8. In case any decree, dismiss, or adjudication, notwithstanding notice of appeal and of the entry into such recognizance or of the making of such lodgment as is herein provided, shall be executed, the party so executing the same or continuing in possession of any goods thereafter shall be deemed to be a trespasser, and may be proceeded against accordingly.

Repeal and re-enactment of certain statutable provisions.

9. From and after the passing of this Act sections one hundred and twenty-seven, one hundred and twenty-eight, one hundred and twenty-nine, and one hundred and thirty of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter fifty-seven, are hereby repealed; and it is hereby further enacted that every decree, dismiss, or adjudication made under section one hundred and fifty of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter fifty-seven, may be appealed from as in this Act provided. The fifty-fifth section of the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877, is hereby repealed.

Extension of existing jurisdiction of county courts under 40 & 41 Vict. c. 64. s. 23.

10. The several civil bill courts in Ireland shall, in addition to the jurisdiction now possessed by them, have and exercise all the power and authority of the High Court of Chancery in the suits and matters herein-after mentioned, that is to say, where the subject thereof shall not exceed in amount or value, so far as it consists of personalty, five hundred pounds, and so far as it consists of lands, shall not exceed the annual value of thirty pounds; (that is to say,)

- (a.) In suits by executors or administrators for the administration of assets;
- (b.) In suits for the setting aside, cancelling, or reforming any deed, agreement, assurance, or conveyance of any property on the ground of fraud or mistake.

Appeals under jurisdiction conferred by foregoing section.

11. Every order or adjudication made under the jurisdiction conferred by the foregoing section of this Act shall be subject to appeal as is provided by Part II. of the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877.

Not to affect appeals under 33 & 34 Vict. c. 46. 44 & 45 Vict. c. 49.

12. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to include any appeal brought under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, or the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and appeals thereunder shall be brought in manner and to the court provided by the forty-seventh section of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.

CAP. XXX.

An Act to amend the Baths and Wash Houses Acts. [24th July 1882.]

CAP. XXXI.

An Act to render Judgments obtained in certain Inferior Courts in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, effectual in any other part of the United Kingdom. [24th July 1882.]

81 & 82 Vict. c. 64.

WHEREAS it is expedient to extend the principle of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, to the judgments of certain inferior courts of Great Britain and Ireland:

Be it therefore enacted, &c., . . .

Short title.

1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Inferior Courts Judgments Extension Act, 1892.

Interpretation of terms.

2. In this Act the following words and expressions shall have the interpretations and meanings in this section assigned to them respectively, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction; (that is to say),

The expression "judgment" shall include decreet, civil bill decree, dismiss, or order:

The expression "inferior courts" shall include County Courts, Civil Bill Courts, and all Courts in England and Ireland having jurisdiction to hear and determine civil causes, other than the High Courts of Justice; and in Ireland, Courts of Petty Sessions and the Court of Bankruptcy; and in Scotland shall include the Sheriffs Courts and the Courts held under the Small Debts and Debts Recovery Acts;

The expression "registrar of an inferior court" shall include the sheriff clerk of a Sheriff's Court in Scotland, and any officer fulfilling the duties of a registrar in an inferior court in England; and in Ireland shall include the clerk of the peace or other officer whose duty it is to enter the judgment, decree, or order of the court:

"Prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under the provisions of this Act:

The expression "person" shall include any party or parties to a cause in any inferior court in England, Scotland, or Ireland:

The expression "plaintiff" shall include pursuer, complainer, or any person at whose instance any action or proceeding in an inferior court is instituted; and the expression "defendant" shall include defender, respondent, or other person against whom any such action or proceeding is directed: The expression "action" shall mean the action or other proceeding in which any judgment was pronounced; and the expression "summons" shall mean the summons or other initial writ in such action.

Registrar of Inferior Court to grant certificate of judgment.

3. Where judgment shall hereafter be obtained or entered up in any of the inferior courts of England, Scotland, or Ireland respectively for any debt, damages, or costs, the registrar of such inferior court or other proper officer shall, after the time for appealing against such judgment shall have elapsed, and in the event of such judgment not being reversed upon appeal or of execution thereunder not being stayed, upon the application of the party who has recovered such judgment, and upon proof that the same has not been satisfied, and payment of the prescribed fee, grant a certificate in the form in the schedule to this Act annexed.

Registration of certificate shall have the effect of a judgment of the Court in which it is registered.

4. On the production to the registrar or other proper officer of a county court, or, in the City of London, of the City of London Court in England where a judgment has been obtained in Scotland or Ireland, or to the registrar or other proper officer of a Sheriff's Court in Scotland where a judgment has been obtained in England or Ireland, or to the registrar or other proper officer of a Civil Bill Court in Ireland where a judgment has been obtained in England or Scotland of a certificate under this Act purporting to be signed by the registrar or other proper officer of the inferior court where such judgment was obtained, such certificate shall, on payment of the prescribed fee, be registered in the prescribed form by such registrar or other proper officer to whom the same shall be produced for that purpose; and all reasonable costs and charges attendant upon the obtaining and registering such certificate shall be added to and recovered in like manner as if the same were part of the original judgment. No certificate of any such judgment shall be registered as aforesaid in any inferior court in the United Kingdom more than twelve months after the date of such judgment.

Execution of judgments.

5. Where a certificate of a judgment of any of the inferior courts aforesaid has been registered under this Act, process of execution may issue thereon out of the Court in which the same shall have been so registered against any goods or chattels of the person against whom such judgment shall have been obtained, which are within the jurisdiction of such last-mentioned Court, in the same or the like manner as if the judgment to be executed had been obtained in the Court in which such certificate shall be so registered as aforesaid.

Jurisdiction over registered judgments limited to execution.

6. The courts of Great Britain and Ireland to which this Act applies shall, in so far as relates to execution under this Act, have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over and with respect to the execution of any judgment, a certificate of which shall be registered under this Act, as they now have and exercise over and with respect to the execution of any judgment in their own courts.

Cancellation of registry.

7. On proof of the setting aside, or satisfaction, of any judgment of which a certificate shall have been registered under this Act, the Court in which such certificate is so registered may order the registration thereof to be cancelled.

Costs not to be allowed in actions on judgments unless by order of Court.

8. In any action brought in any of the inferior courts aforesaid for the purpose of enforcing any judgment which might be registered under this Act in the country in which such action is brought, the party bringing such action shall not recover or be entitled to any costs or expenses, unless the Court in which such action shall be brought shall otherwise order.

Existing limits of local jurisdiction shall not be exceeded.

9. Nothing contained in this Act shall authorise the registration in an inferior court of the certificate of any judgment for a greater amount than might have been recovered if the action or proceeding had been originally commenced in such inferior court.

Provided that where a judgment obtained in an inferior court in Scotland cannot be registered in an inferior court in England or Ireland, by reason of its being for a greater amount than might have been recovered if the action or proceeding had been originally commenced in such inferior court, it shall be competent to register a certificate of such judgment in the register directed to be kept in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster and Dublin respectively, to be called "The Register of Scotch Judgments," by section three of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, in the same manner, to the same effect, and subject to the same provisions, as if the said certificate had been a certificate of an extracted decret of the Court of Session, registered in the said register under the said Act.

Act not to apply in certain cases.

10. This Act shall not apply to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in England against any person domiciled in Scotland or Ireland at the time of the commencement of any action, unless the whole cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district, nor to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in Scotland against any person domiciled in England or Ireland at the time of the commencement of any action, unless the whole cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district, nor to any judgment pronounced by any inferior court in Ireland against any person domiciled in England or Scotland at the time of the commencement of any action, unless the whole cause of action shall have arisen, or the obligation to which the judgment relates ought to have been fulfilled, within the district of such inferior court, and the summons was served upon the defendant personally within the said district.

Provided that it shall be competent to any person against whom any judgment to which this Act does not apply, as aforesaid, is sought to be enforced by registration in the register of an inferior court in England or Ireland to apply for and obtain from one of the superior courts of England or Ireland a prohibition or injunction against the enforcement of such judgment, and of any execution thereupon; and that it shall be competent to any person against whom any judgment to which this Act does not apply, as aforesaid, is sought to be enforced by registration in the register of an inferior court in Scotland, to apply for and obtain from the Bill Chamber or Court of Session in Scotland suspension or suspension and interdict of or against the enforcement of such judgment and any diligence thereon, and in any such proceeding as aforesaid the unsuccessful party may be found liable in costs.

Rules. 11. Rules for the purposes of this Act may be made and altered from time to time by the like persons and in the like manner in which rules and regulations may be respectively made under and for the purposes of the County Courts Acts in England; of the Sheriffs Courts Acts in Scotland, and of the Civil Bill Courts Acts in Ireland; provided that the said rules and regulations shall not extend the jurisdiction of any inferior court.

Be it enacted, &c., .

I.—PRELIMINARY.

Short title; commencement; extent. 1. (1) This Act may be cited as the Settled Land Act, 1882.

(2) This Act, except where it is otherwise expressed, shall commence and take effect from and immediately after the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, which time is in this Act referred to as the commencement of this Act.

(3) This Act does not extend to Scotland.

II.—DEFINITIONS.

Definition of settlement; tenant for life, &c. 2.—(1) Any deed, will, agreement for a settlement, or other agreement, covenant to surrender, copy of court roll, Act of Parliament, or other instrument, or any number of instruments, whether made or passed before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of which instrument or instruments any land, or any estate or interest in land, stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates or is for purposes of this Act a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement, or as the settlement, as the case requires.

(2) An estate or interest in remainder or reversion not disposed of by a settlement, and reverting to the settlor or descending to the testator's heir, is for purposes of this Act an estate or interest coming to the settlor or heir under or by virtue of the settlement, and comprised in the subject of the settlement.

(3) Land, and any estate or interest therein, which is the subject of a settlement, is for purposes of this Act settled land, and is, in relation to the settlement, referred to in this Act as the settled land.

(4) The determination of the question whether land is settled land, for purposes of this Act, or not, is governed by the state of facts, and the limitations of the settlement, at the time of the settlement taking effect.

(5) The person who is for the time being, under a settlement, beneficially entitled to possession of settled land, for his life, is for purposes of this Act the tenant for life of that land, and the tenant for life under that settlement.

(6) If, in any case, there are two or more persons so entitled as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, or for other concurrent estates or interests, they together constitute the tenant for life for purposes of this Act.

(7) A person being tenant for life within the foregoing definitions shall be deemed to be such notwithstanding that, under the settlement or otherwise, the settled land, or his estate or interest therein, is incumbered or charged in any manner or to any extent.

(8) The persons, if any, who are for the time being, under a settlement, trustees with power of sale of settled land, or with power of consent to or approval of the exercise of such a power of sale, or if under a settlement there are no such trustees, then the persons, if any, for the time being, who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for purposes of this Act, are for purposes of this Act trustees of the settlement.

(9.) Capital money arising under this Act, and receivable for the trusts and purposes of the settlement, is in this Act referred to as capital money arising under this Act.

(10.) In this Act—

(i.) Land includes incorporeal hereditaments, also an undivided share in land; income includes rents and profits; and possession includes receipt of income:

(ii.) Rent includes yearly or other rent, and toll, duty, royalty, or other reservation, by the acre, or the ton, or otherwise; and, in relation to rent, payment includes delivery; and fine includes premium or fore-gift, and any payment, consideration, or benefit in the nature of a fine, premium, or fore-gift:

(iii.) Building purposes include the erecting and the improving of, and the adding to, and the repairing of buildings; and a building lease is a lease for any building purposes or purposes connected therewith:

(iv.) Mines and minerals mean mines and minerals whether already opened or in work or not, and include all minerals and substances in, on, or under the land, obtainable by underground or by surface working; and mining purposes include the sinking and searching for, winning, working, getting, making merchantable, smelting or otherwise converting or working for the purposes of any manufacture, carrying away, and disposing of mines and minerals, in or under the settled land, or any other land, and the erection of buildings, and the execution of engineering and other works, suitable for those purposes; and a mining lease is a lease for any mining purposes or purposes connected therewith, and includes a grant or licence for any mining purposes:

(v.) Manor includes lordship, and reputed manor or lordship:

(vi.) Steward includes deputy steward, or other proper officer, of a manor:

(vii.) Will includes codicil, and other testamentary instrument, and a writing in the nature of a will:

(viii.) Securities include stocks, funds, and shares:

(x.) The Land Commissioners for England as constituted by this Act are referred to as the Land Commissioners:

(xi.) Person includes corporation.

III.—SALE; ENFRANCHISEMENT; EXCHANGE; PARTITION.

General Powers and Regulations.

3. A tenant for life—

Powers to tenant for life to sell &c.

- (i.) May sell the settled land, or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind, over or in relation to the same; and
- (ii.) Where the settlement comprises a manor,—may sell the seignory of any freehold land within the manor, or the freehold and inheritance of any copyhold or customary land, parcel of the manor, with or without any exception or reservation of all or any mines or minerals, or of any rights or powers relative to mining purposes, so as in every such case to effect an enfranchisement; and
- (iii.) May make an exchange of the settled land, or any part thereof, for other land, including an exchange in consideration of money paid for equality of exchange; and
- (iv.) Where the settlement comprises an undivided share in land, or, under the settlement, the settled land has come to be held in undivided shares,—may concur in making partition of the entirety, including a partition in consideration of money paid for equality of partition.

Regulations respecting sale, enfranchisement, exchange, and partition.

4. (1.) Every sale shall be made at the best price that can reasonably be obtained.

(2.) Every exchange and every partition shall be made for the best consideration in land or in land and money that can reasonably be obtained.

(3.) A sale may be made in one lot or in several lots, and either by auction or by private contract.

(4.) On a sale the tenant for life may fix reserve biddings and buy in at an auction.

(5.) A sale, exchange, or partition may be made subject to any stipulations respecting title, or evidence of title, or other things.

(6.) On a sale, exchange, or partition, any restriction or reservation with respect to building on or other user of land, or with respect to mines and minerals, or with respect to or for the purpose of the more beneficial working thereof, or with respect to any other thing, may be imposed or reserved and made binding, as far as the law permits, by covenant, condition, or otherwise, on the tenant for life and the settled land, or any part thereof, or on the other party and any land sold or given in exchange or on partition to him.

(7.) An enfranchisement may be made with or without a re-grant of any right of common or other right, easement, or privilege theretofore appendant or appurtenant to or held or enjoyed with the land enfranchised, or reputed so to be.

(8.) Settled land in England shall not be given in exchange for land out of England.

Special Powers.

Transfer of incumbrances on land sold, &c.

5. Where on a sale, exchange, or partition there is an incumbrance affecting land sold or given in exchange or on partition, the tenant for life, with the consent of the incumbrancer, may charge that incumbrance on any other part of the settled land, whether already charged therewith or not, in exoneration of the part sold or so given, and, by conveyance of the fee simple, or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term of years in the settled land, or otherwise, make provision accordingly.

IV.—LEASES.

General Powers and Regulations.

Power for tenant for life to lease for ordinary or building or mining purposes.

6. A tenant for life may lease the settled land, or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind, over or in relation to the same, for any purpose whatever, whether involving waste or not, for any term not exceeding—

- (i.) In case of a building lease, ninety-nine years:
- (ii.) In case of a mining lease, sixty years:
- (iii.) In case of any other lease, twenty-one years.

Regulations respecting leases generally.

7. (1.) Every lease shall be by deed, and be made to take effect in possession not later than twelve months after its date.

(2.) Every lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, regard being had to any fine taken, and to any money laid out or to be laid out for the benefit of the settled land, and generally to the circumstances of the case.

(3.) Every lease shall contain a covenant by the lessee for payment of the rent, and a condition of re-entry on the rent not being paid within a time therein specified not exceeding thirty days.

(4.) A counterpart of every lease shall be executed by the lessee and delivered to the tenant for life; of which execution and delivery the execution of the lease by the tenant for life shall be sufficient evidence.

(5.) A statement, contained in a lease or in an indenture thereon, signed by the tenant for life, respecting any matter of fact or of calculation under this Act in relation to the lease, shall, in favour of the lessee and of those claiming under him, be sufficient evidence of the matter stated.

Building and Mining Leases.

Regulations
building leases.

8. (1.) Every building lease shall be made partly in consideration of the lessee, or some person by whose direction the lease is granted, or some other person, having erected, or agreeing to erect, buildings, new or additional, or having improved or repaired, or agreeing to improve or repair, buildings, or having executed, or agreeing to execute, on the land leased, an improvement authorized by this Act, for or in connexion with building purposes.

(2.) A peppercorn rent or a nominal or other rent less than the rent ultimately payable, may be made payable for the first five years or any less part of the term.

(3.) Where the land is contracted to be leased in lots, the entire amount of rent to be ultimately payable may be apportioned among the lots in any manner; save that—

(i.) The annual rent reserved by any lease shall not be less than ten shillings; and

(ii.) The total amount of the rents reserved on all leases for the time being granted shall not be less than the total amount of the rents which, in order that the leases may be in conformity with this Act, ought to be reserved in respect of the whole land for the time being leased; and

(iii.) The rent reserved by any lease shall not exceed one fifth part of the full annual value of the land comprised in that lease with the buildings thereon when completed.

Regulations
respecting mining leases.

9. (1.) In a mining lease—

(i.) The rent may be made to be ascertainable by or to vary according to the acreage worked, or by or according to the quantities of any mineral or substance gotten, made merchantable, converted, carried away, or disposed of, in or from the settled land, or any other land, or by or according to any facilities given in that behalf; and

(ii.) A fixed or minimum rent may be made payable with or without power for the lessee, in case the rent, according to acreage or quantity, in any specified period does not produce an amount equal to the fixed or minimum rent, to make up the deficiency in any subsequent specified period, free of rent other than the fixed or minimum rent.

(2.) A lease may be made partly in consideration of the lessee having executed, or his agreeing to execute, on the land leased, an improvement authorized by this Act, for or in connexion with mining purposes.

Variation of building or mining lease according to circumstances of district.

10. (1.) Where it is shown to the Court with respect to the district in which any settled land is situate, either—

(i.) That it is the custom for land therein to be leased or granted for building or mining purposes for a longer term or on other conditions than the term or conditions specified in that behalf in this Act, or in perpetuity; or

(ii.) That it is difficult to make leases or grants for building or mining purposes of land therein, except for a longer term or on other conditions than the term and conditions specified in that behalf in this Act, or except in perpetuity;

the Court may, if it thinks fit authorize generally the tenant for life to make from time to time leases or grants of or affecting the settled land in that district, or parts thereof, for any term or in perpetuity, at fee-farm or other rents, secured by condition of re-entry, or otherwise, as in the order of the Court expressed, or may, if it thinks fit, authorize the tenant for life to make any such lease or grant in any particular case.

(2.) Thereupon the tenant for life, and subject to any direction in the order of the Court to the contrary, each of his successors in title being a tenant for life, or having the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, may make in any case, or in the particular case, a lease or grant of or affecting the settled land, or part thereof, in conformity with the order.

to be set aside.

11. Under a mining lease, whether the mines or minerals leased are already opened or in work or not, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement, there shall be from time to time set aside, as capital money arising under this Act, part of the rent as follows, namely—where the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals, three fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one fourth part thereof, and in every such case the residue of the rent shall go as rents and profits.

Special Powers.

Leasing powers for special objects.

12. The leasing power of a tenant for life extends to the making of—

(i.) A lease for giving effect to a contract entered into by any of his predecessors in title for making a lease, which, if made by the predecessors, would have been binding on the successors in title; and

(ii.) A lease for giving effect to a covenant of renewal, performance whereof could be enforced against the owner for the time being of the settled land; and

(iii.) A lease for confirming, as far as may be, a previous lease, being void or voidable; but so that every lease, as and when confirmed, shall be such a lease as might at the date of the original lease have been lawfully granted, under this Act, or otherwise, as the case may require.

Surrenders.

Surrender and new grant of leases.

13. (1.) A tenant for life may accept, with or without consideration, a surrender of any lease of settled land, whether made under this Act or not, in respect of the whole land leased, or any part thereof, with or without an exception of all or any of the mines and minerals therein, or in respect of mines and minerals or any of them.

(2.) On a surrender of a lease in respect of part only of the land or mines and minerals leased, the rent may be apportioned.

(3.) On a surrender, the tenant for life may make of the land or mines and minerals surrendered, or of any part thereof, a new or other lease, or new or other leases in lots.

(4.) A new or other lease may comprise additional land or mines and minerals, and may reserve any apportioned or other rent.

(5.) On a surrender, and the making of a new or other lease, whether for the same or for any extended or other term, and whether or not subject to the same or to any other covenants, provisions, or conditions, the value of the lessee's interest in the lease surrender may be taken into account in the determination of the amount of the rent to be reserved, and of any fine to be taken, and of the nature of the covenants, provisions, and conditions to be inserted in the new or other lease.

(6.) Every new or other lease shall be in conformity with this Act.

Copyholds.

Power to grant to copyholders licences for leasing.

14. (1.) A tenant for life may grant to a tenant of copyhold or customary land, parcel of a manor comprised in the settlement, a licence to make any such lease of that land, or of a specified part thereof, as the tenant for life is by this Act empowered to make of freehold land.

(2.) The licence may fix the annual value whereon fines, fees, or other customary payments are to be assessed, or the amount of those fines, fees, or payments.

(3.) The licence shall be entered on the court rolls of the manor, of which entry a certificate in writing of the steward shall be sufficient evidence.

V.—SALES, LEASES, AND OTHER DISPOSITIONS.

Mansion and Park.

Restriction as to mansion house, park, &c.

15. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the principal mansion house on any settled land, and the demesnes thereof, and other lands usually occupied therewith, shall not be sold or leased by the tenant for life, without the consent of the trustees of the settlement, or an order of the Court.

Streets and Open Spaces.

16. On or in connexion with a sale or grant for building purposes, or a building lease, the tenant for life, for the general benefit of the residents on the settled land, or on any part thereof,—

Dedication for streets, open spaces, &c.

- (i.) May cause or require any parts of the settled land to be appropriated and laid out for streets, roads, paths, squares, gardens, or other open spaces, for the use, gratuitously or on payment, of the public or of individuals, with sewers, drains, watercourses, fencing, paving, or other works necessary or proper in connexion therewith; and
- (ii.) May provide that the parts so appropriated shall be conveyed to or vested in the trustees of the settlement, or other trustees, or any company or public body, on trusts or subject to provisions for securing the continued appropriation thereof to the purposes aforesaid, and the continued repair or maintenance of streets and other places and works aforesaid, with or without provision for appointment of new trustees when required; and
- (iii.) May execute any general or other deed necessary or proper for giving effect to the provisions of this section (which deed may be enrolled in the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature), and thereby declare the mode, terms, and conditions of the appropriation, and the manner in which and the person by whom the benefit thereof is to be enjoyed, and the nature and extent of the privileges and conveniences granted.

Separate dealing with surface and minerals, with or without way-leaves, &c.

17. (1.) A sale, exchange, partition, or mining lease, may be made either of land, with or without an exception or reservation of all or any of the mines and minerals therein, or of any mines and minerals, and in any such case with or without a grant or reservation of powers of working, wayleaves or rights of way, rights of water and drainage, and other powers, easements, rights, and privileges for or incident to or connected with mining purposes, in relation to the settled land, or any part thereof, or any other land.

(2.) An exchange or partition may be made subject to and in consideration of the reservation of an undivided share in mines or minerals.

Mortgage for equality money, &c.

18. Where money is required for enfranchisement, or for equality of exchange or partition, the tenant for life may raise the same on mortgage of the settled land, or of any part thereof, by conveyance of the fee simple, or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term of years in the settled land, or otherwise, and the money raised shall be capital money arising under this Act.

Undivided Share.

Concurrence in exercise of powers as to undivided share.

19. Where the settled land comprises an undivided share in land, or, under the settlement, the settled land has come to be held in undivided shares, the tenant for life of an undivided share may join or concur, in any manner and to any extent necessary or proper for any purpose of this Act, with any person entitled to or having power or right of disposition of or over another undivided share.

Conveyance.

Completion of sale, lease, &c., by conveyance.

20. (1.) On a sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage, or charge, the tenant for life may, as regards land sold, given in exchange or on partition, leased, mortgaged, or charged, or intended so to be, including copyhold or customary or leasehold land vested in trustees, or as regards easements or other rights or privileges sold or leased, or intended so to be, convey or create the same by deed, for the estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or for any less estate or interest, to the uses and in the manner requisite for giving effect to the sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage, or charge.

(2.) Such a deed, to the extent and in the manner to and in which it is expressed or intended to operate and can operate under this Act, is effectual to pass the land conveyed, or the easements, rights, or privileges created, discharged from all the limitations, powers, and provisions of the settlement, and from all estates, interests, and charges subsisting or to arise thereunder, but subject to and with the exception of—

- (i.) All estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement; and
- (ii.) All such other, if any, estates, interests, and charges as have been conveyed or created for securing money actually raised at the date of the deed; and
- (iii.) All leases and grants at fee-farm rents or otherwise, and all grants of easements, rights of common, or other rights or privileges granted or made for value in money or money's worth, or agreed so to be, before the date of the deed, by the tenant for life, or by any of his predecessors in title, or by any trustees for him or them, under the settlement, or under any statutory power, or being otherwise binding on the successors in title of the tenant for life.

(3.) In case of a deed relating to copyhold or customary land, it is sufficient that the deed be entered on the court rolls of the manor, and the steward is hereby required on production to him of the deed to make the proper entry; and on that production, and on payment of customary fines, fees, and other dues or payments, any person whose title under the deed requires to be perfected by admittance shall be admitted accordingly; but if the steward so requires, there shall also be produced to him so much of the settlement as may be necessary to show the title of the person executing the deed; and the same may, if the steward thinks fit, be also entered on the court rolls.

VI.—INVESTMENT OR OTHER APPLICATION OF CAPITAL TRUST MONEY.

Capital money under Act; investment, &c. by trustees or Court.

21. Capital money arising under this Act, subject to payment of claims properly payable thereout, and to application thereof for any special authorized object for which the same was raised, shall, when received, be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one, or partly in one and partly in another or others, of the following modes (namely):

- (i.) In investment on Government securities, or on other securities on which the trustees of the settlement are by the settlement or by law authorized to invest trust money of the settlement, or on the security of the bonds, mortgages, or debentures, or in the purchase of the debenture stock, of any railway company in Great Britain or Ireland incorporated by special Act of Parliament, and having for ten years next before the date of investment paid a dividend on its ordinary stock or shares, with power to vary the investment into or for any other such securities:
- (ii.) In discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land, or other the whole estate the subject of the settlement, or of land-tax, rentcharge in lieu of tith, Crown rent, chief rent, or quit rent, charged on or payable out of the settled land:
- (iii.) In payment for any improvement authorized by this Act:
- (iv.) In payment for equality of exchange or partition of settled land:
- (v.) In purchase of the seignory of any part of the settled land, being freehold land, or in purchase of the fee simple of any part of the settled land, being copyhold or customary land:
- (vi.) In purchase of the reversion or freehold in fee of any part of the settled land, being leasehold land held for years, or life, or years determinable on life:
- (vii.) In purchase of land in fee simple, or of copyhold or customary land, or of leasehold land held for sixty years or more unexpired at the time of purchase, subject or not to any exception or reservation of or in respect of mines, or minerals therein, or of or in respect of rights or powers relative to the working of mines or minerals therein, or in other land:
- (viii.) In purchase, either in fee simple, or for a term of sixty years or more, of mines and minerals convenient to be held or worked with the settled land, or of any easement, right, or privilege convenient to be held with the settled land for mining or other purposes:

- (ix.) In payment to any person becoming absolutely entitled or empowered to give an absolute discharge:
- (x.) In payment of costs, charges, and expenses of or incidental to the exercise of any of the powers, or the execution of any of the provisions, of this Act:
- (xi.) In any other mode in which money produced by the exercise of a power of sale in the settlement is applicable thereunder.

Regulations respecting investments, devolution, and income invested or applied as aforesaid, be paid of securities, &c.

22. (1.) Capital money arising under this Act shall, in order to its being either to the trustees of the settlement or into Court, at the option of the tenant for life, and shall be invested or applied by the trustees, or under the direction of the Court, as the case may be, accordingly.

(2.) The investment or other application by the trustees shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, and in default thereof, according to the discretion of the trustees, but in the last-mentioned case subject to any consent required or direction given by the settlement with respect to the investment or other application by the trustees of trust money of the settlement; and any investment shall be in the names or under the control of the trustees.

(3.) The investment or other application under the direction of the Court shall be made on the application of the tenant for life, or of the trustees.

(4.) Any investment or other application shall not during the life of the tenant for life be altered without his consent.

(5.) Capital money arising under this Act while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and securities on which an investment of any such capital money is made, shall, for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution, be considered as land, and the same shall be held for and go to the same persons successively, in the same manner and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts, as the land wherefrom the money arises would, if not disposed of, have been held and have gone under the settlement.

(6.) The income of those securities shall be paid or applied as the income of that land, if not disposed of, would have been payable or applicable under the settlement.

(7.) Those securities may be converted into money, which shall be capital money arising under this Act.

Investment in land in England.

23. Capital money arising under this Act from settled land in England shall not be applied in the purchase of land out of England, unless the settlement expressly authorizes the same.

Settlement of land purchased, taken in exchange, &c.

24. (1.) Land acquired by purchase or in exchange, or on partition, shall be made subject to the settlement in manner directed in this section.

(2.) Freehold land shall be conveyed to the uses, on the trusts, and subject to the powers and provisions which, under the settlement, or by reason of the exercise of any power of charging therein contained, are subsisting with respect to the settled land, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, but not so as to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging.

(3.) Copyhold, customary, or leasehold land shall be conveyed to and vested in the trustees of the settlement on trusts and subject to powers and provisions corresponding, as nearly as the law and circumstances permit, with the uses, trusts, powers, and provisions to on and subject to which freehold land is to be conveyed as aforesaid; so nevertheless that the beneficial interest in land held by lease for years shall not vest absolutely in a person who is by the settlement made by purchase tenant in tail, or in tail male, or in tail female, and who dies under the age of twenty-one years, but shall, on the death of that person under that age, go as freehold land conveyed as aforesaid would go.

(4.) Land acquired as aforesaid may be made a substituted security for any charge in respect of money actually raised, and remaining unpaid, from which the settled land, or any part thereof, or any undivided share therein, has theretofore been released on the occasion and in order to the completion of a sale, exchange, or partition.

(5.) Where a charge does not affect the whole of the settled land, then the land acquired shall not be subjected thereto, unless the land is acquired either by purchase with money arising from sale of land which was before the sale subject to the charge, or by an exchange or partition of land which, or an undivided share wherein, was before the exchange or partition subject to the charge.

(6.) On land being so acquired, any person who, by the direction of the tenant for life, so conveys the land as to subject it to any charge, is not concerned to inquire whether or not it is proper that the land should be subjected to the charge.

(7.) The provisions of this section referring to land extend and apply, as far as may be, to mines and minerals, and to easements, rights, and privileges over and in relation to land.

VII.—IMPROVEMENTS.

Improvements with Capital Trust Money.

Description of Improvements
by Act.

25. Improvements authorized by this Act are the making or execution on, or in connexion with, and for the benefit of settled land, of any of the following works, or of any works for any of the following purposes, and any operation incident to or necessary or proper in the execution of any of those works, or necessary or proper for carrying into effect any of those purposes, or for securing the full benefit of any of those works or purposes (namely):

- (i.) Drainage, including the straightening, widening, or deepening of drains, streams, and watercourses;
- (ii.) Irrigation; warping;
- (iii.) Drains, pipes, and machinery for supply and distribution of sewage as manure;
- (iv.) Embanking or weiring from a river or lake, or from the sea, or a tidal water;
- (v.) Groyne; sea walls; defences against water;
- (vi.) Inclosing; straightening of fences; re-division of fields;
- (vii.) Reclamation; dry warping;
- (viii.) Farm roads; private roads; roads or streets in villages or towns;
- (ix.) Clearing; trenching; planting;
- (x.) Cottages for labourers, farm-servants, and artisans, employed on the settled land or not;
- (xi.) Farmhouses, offices, and out-buildings, and other buildings for farm purposes;
- (xii.) Saw-mills, scutch-mills, and other mills, water-wheels, engine-houses, and kilns, which will increase the value of the settled land for agricultural purposes or as woodland or otherwise;
- (xiii.) Reservoirs, tanks, conduits, watercourses, pipes, wells, ponds, shafts, dams, weirs, sluices, and other works and machinery for supply and distribution of water for agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, or for domestic or other consumption:

- (xiv.) Tramways; railways; canals; docks;
- (xv.) Jetties, piers, and landing places on rivers, lakes, the sea, or tidal waters, for facilitating transport of persons and of agricultural stock and produce, and of manure and other things required for agricultural purposes, and of minerals, and of things required for mining purposes;
- (xvi.) Markets and market-places;
- (xvii.) Streets, roads, paths, squares, gardens, or other open spaces for the use, gratuitously or on payment, of the public or of individuals, or for dedication to the public, the same being necessary or proper in connexion with the conversion of land into building land;
- (xviii.) Sewers, drains, watercourses, pipe-making, fencing, paving, brick-making, tile-making, and other works necessary or proper in connexion with any of the objects aforesaid;
- (xix.) Trial pits for mines, and other preliminary works necessary or proper in connexion with development of mines;
- (xx.) Reconstruction, enlargement, or improvement of any of those works.

Approval by Land Commissioners of scheme for improvement
thereon.

26. (1.) Where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money arising under this Act shall be applied in or towards payment for an improvement authorized by this Act, he may submit for approval to the trustees of the settlement, or to the Court, as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement, showing the proposed expenditure thereon.

(2.) Where the capital money to be expended is in the hands of trustees, then, after a scheme is approved by them, the trustees may apply that money in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or operation comprised in the improvement, on—

- (i.) A certificate of the Land Commissioners certifying that the work or operation, or some specified part thereof, has been properly executed, and what amount is properly payable by the trustees in respect thereof, which certificate shall be conclusive in favour of the trustees as an authority and discharge for any payment made by them in pursuance thereof; or on
- (ii.) A like certificate of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor nominated by the trustees and approved by the Commissioners, or by the Court, which certificate shall be conclusive as aforesaid; or on
- (iii.) An order of the Court directing or authorizing the trustees to so apply a specified portion of the capital money.

(3.) Where the capital money to be expended is in Court, then, after a scheme is approved by the Court, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on a report or certificate of the Commissioners, or of a competent engineer or able practical surveyor, approved by the Court, or on such other evidence as the Court thinks sufficient, make such order and give such directions as it thinks fit for the application of that money, or any part thereof, in or towards payment for the whole or part of any work or operation comprised in the improvement.

Concurrence in improvements.

27. The tenant for life may join or concur with any other person interested in executing any improvement authorized by this Act, or in contributing to the cost thereof.

Obligation on tenant for life and successors to maintain, insure, &c.

28. (1.) The tenant for life, and each of his successors in title having, under the settlement, a limited estate or interest only in the settled land, shall, during such period, if any, as the Land Commissioners by certificate in any case prescribe, maintain and repair, at his own expense, every improvement executed under the foregoing provisions of this Act, and where a building or work in its nature insurable against damage by fire is comprised in the improvement, shall insure and keep insured the same, at his own expense, in such amount, if any, as the Commissioners by certificate in any case prescribe.

(2.) The tenant for life, or any of his successors as aforesaid, shall not cut down or knowingly permit to be cut down, except in proper thinning, any trees planted as an improvement under the foregoing provisions of this Act.

(3.) The tenant for life, and each of his successors as aforesaid, shall from time to time, if required by the Commissioners, on or without the suggestion of any person having, under the settlement, any estate or interest in the settled land in possession, remainder, or otherwise, report to the commissioners the state of every improvement executed under this Act, and the fact and particulars of fire insurance, if any.

(4.) The Commissioners may vary any certificate made by them under this section, in such manner or to such extent as circumstances appear to them to require, but not so as to increase the liabilities of the tenant for life, or any of his successors as aforesaid.

(5.) If the tenant for life, or any of his successors as aforesaid, fails in any respect to comply with the requisitions of this section, or does any act in contravention thereof, any person having, under the settlement, any estate or interest in the settled land in possession, remainder, or reversion, shall have a right of action, in respect of that default or act, against the tenant for life; and the estate of the tenant for life, after his death, shall be liable to make good to the persons entitled under the settlement any damages occasioned by that default or act.

Execution and Repair of Improvements.

Protection as regards waste in execution and repair of improvements. 29. The tenant for life, and each of his successors in title having, under the settlement, a limited estate or interest only in the settled land, and all persons employed by or under contract with the tenant for life, or any such successor, may from time to time enter on the settled land, and, without impeachment of waste by any remainderman or reversioneer, thereon execute any improvement authorized by this Act, or inspect, maintain, and repair the same, and, for the purposes thereof, on the settled land, do, make, and use all acts, works, and conveniences proper for the execution, maintenance, repair, and use thereof, and get and work freestone, limestone, clay, sand, and other substances, and make tramways and other ways, and burn and make bricks, tiles, and other things, and cut down and use timber and other trees not planted or left standing for shelter or ornament.

Improvement of Land Act, 1864.

Extension of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 114, s. 9. 30. The enumeration of improvements contained in section nine of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, is hereby extended so as to comprise, subject and according to the provisions of that Act, but only as regards applications made to the Land Commissioners after the commencement of this Act, all improvements authorized by this Act.

VIII.—CONTRACTS.

Power for tenant for life to enter into contracts.

31. (1.) A tenant for life—
(i.) May contract to make any sale, exchange, partition, mortgage, or charge; and

(ii.) May vary or rescind, with or without consideration, the contract, in the like cases and manner in which, if he were absolute owner of the settled land, he might lawfully vary or rescind the same, but so that the contract as varied be in conformity with this Act; and any such consideration, if paid in money, shall be capital money arising under this Act; and

(iii.) May contract to make any lease; and in making the lease may vary the terms, with or without consideration, but so that the lease be in conformity with this Act; and

(iv.) May accept a surrender of a contract for a lease, in like manner and on the like terms in and on which he might accept a surrender of a lease; and thereupon may make a new or other contract, or new or other contracts, for or relative to a lease or leases, in like manner and on the like terms in and on which he might make a new or other lease, or new or other leases, where a lease had been granted; and

(v.) May enter into a contract for or relating to the execution of any improvement authorized by this Act, and may vary or rescind the same; and

(vi.) May, in any other case, enter into a contract to do any act for carrying into effect any of the purposes of this Act, and may vary or rescind the same.

(2.) Every contract shall be binding on and shall enure for the benefit of the settled land, and shall be enforceable against and by every successor in title for the time being of the tenant for life, and may be carried into effect by any such successor; but so that it may be varied or rescinded by any such successor, in the like case and manner, if any, as if it had been made by himself.

(3.) The Court may, on the application of the tenant for life, or of any such successor, or of any person interested in any contract, give directions respecting the enforcing, carrying into effect, varying, or rescinding thereof.

(4.) Any preliminary contract under this Act for or relating to a lease shall not form part of the title or evidence of the title of any person to the lease, or to the benefit thereof.

IX.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Application of money in Court under Land Clauses and other Acts. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 106. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 18. 40 & 41 Vict. c. 18. 32. Where, under an Act incorporating or applying, wholly or in part, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845, 1860, and 1869, or under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, or under any other Act, public, local, personal, or private, money is at the commencement of this Act in Court, or is afterwards paid into Court, and is liable to be laid out in the purchase of land to be made subject to a settlement, then, in addition to any mode of dealing therewith authorized by the Act under which the money is in Court, that money may be invested or applied as capital money arising under this Act, on the like terms, if any, respecting costs and other things, as nearly as circumstances admit, and (notwithstanding anything in this Act) according to the same procedure, as if the modes of investment or application authorized by this Act were authorized by the Act under which the money is in Court.

Application of money in hands of trustees under powers of settlement. 33. Where under a settlement, money is in the hands of trustees, and is liable to be laid out in the purchase of land to be made subject to the settlement, then, in addition to such powers of dealing therewith as the trustees have independently of this Act, they may, at the option of the tenant for life, invest or apply the same as capital money arising under this Act.

Application of money paid for lease or reversion.

34. Where capital money arising under this Act is purchase money paid in respect of a lease for years, or life, or years determinable on life, or in respect of any other estate or interest in land less than the fee simple, or in respect of a reversion dependent on any such lease, estate, or interest, the trustees of the settlement or the Court as the case may be, and in the case of the Court on the application of any party interested in that money, may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, require and cause the same to be laid out, invested, accumulated, and paid in such manner as, in the judgment of the trustees or of the Court, as the case may be, will give to the parties interested in that money the like benefit therefrom as they might lawfully have had from the lease, estate, interest, or reversion in respect whereof the money was paid, or as near thereto as may be.

Cutting and sale of timber and part of proceeds to be set aside.

35. (1.) Where a tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of timber, and there is on the settled land timber ripe and fit for cutting, the tenant for life, on obtaining the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the Court, may cut and sell that timber, or any part thereof.

(2.) Three fourth parts of the net proceeds of the sale shall be set aside as and be capital money arising under this Act, and the other fourth part shall go as rents and profits.

Proceedings for protection or recovery of land settled or claimed as settled.

36. The Court may, if it thinks fit, approve of any action, defence, petition to Parliament, parliamentary opposition, or other proceeding taken or proposed to be taken for protection of settled land, or of any action or proceeding taken or proposed to be taken for recovery of land being or alleged to be subject to a settlement, and may direct that any costs, charges, or expenses incurred or to be incurred in relation thereto, or any part thereof, be paid out of property subject to the settlement.

Heirlooms.

37. (1.) Where personal chattels are settled on trust so as to devolve with land until a tenant in tail by purchase is born or attains the age of twenty-one years, or so as otherwise to vest in some person becoming entitled to an estate of freehold of inheritance in the land, a tenant for life of the land may sell the chattels or any of them.

(2.) The money arising by the sale shall be capital money arising under this Act, and shall be paid, invested, or applied and otherwise dealt with in like manner in all respects as by this Act directed with respect to other capital money arising under this Act, or may be invested in the purchase of other chattels, of the same or any other nature, which, when purchased, shall be settled and held on the same trusts, and shall devolve in the same manner as the chattels sold.

(3.) A sale or purchase of chattels under this section shall not be made without an order of the Court.

X.—TRUSTEES.

Appointment of trustees by Court.

38. (1.) If at any time there are no trustees of a settlement within the definition in this Act, or where in any other case it is expedient, for purposes of this Act, that new trustees of a settlement be appointed, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the tenant for life or of any other person having, under the settlement, an estate or interest in the settled land in possession, remainder, or otherwise, or, in the case of an infant, of his testamentary or other guardian, or next friend, appoint fit persons to be trustees under the settlement for purposes of this Act.

(2.) The persons so appointed, and the survivors and survivor of them, while continuing to be trustees or trustee, and, until the appointment of new trustees the personal representatives or representative for the time being of the last surviving or continuing trustee, shall for purposes of this Act become and be the trustees or trustee of the settlement.

Number of trustees to act.

39. (1.) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, capital money arising under this Act shall not be paid to fewer than two persons as trustees of a settlement, unless the settlement authorizes the receipt of capital trust money of the settlement by one trustee.

(2.) Subject thereto, the provisions of this Act referring to the trustees of a settlement apply to the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee of the settlement for the time being.

Trustees receipts.

40. The receipt in writing of the trustees of a settlement, or where one trustee is empowered to act, of one trustee, or of the personal representatives or representative of the last surviving or continuing trustee, for any money or securities, paid or transferred to the trustees, trustee, representatives, or representative, as the case may be, effectually discharges the payer or transferor therefrom, and from being bound to see to the application thereof, or being answerable for any loss or misapplication thereof, and, in case of a mortgagee or other person advancing money, from being concerned to see that any money advanced by him is wanted for any purpose of this Act, or that no more than is wanted is raised.

Protection of each trustee individually.

41. Each person who is for the time being trustee of a settlement is answerable for what he actually receives only, notwithstanding his signing any receipt for conformity, and in respect of his own acts, receipts, and defaults only, and is not answerable in respect of those of any other trustee, or of any banker, broker or other person, or for the insufficiency or deficiency of any securities, or for any loss not happening through his own wilful default.

Protection of trustees generally.

42. The trustees of a settlement, or any of them, are not liable for giving any consent, or for not making, bringing, taking, or doing any such application, action, proceeding, or thing, as they might make, bring, take, or do; and in case of purchase of land with capital money arising under this Act, or of an exchange, partition, or lease, are not liable for adopting any contract made by the tenant for life, or bound to inquire as to the propriety of the purchase, exchange, partition, or lease, or answerable as regards any price, consideration, or fine, and are not liable to see to or answerable for the investigation of the title, or answerable for a conveyance of land, if the conveyance purports to convey the land in the proper mode, or liable in respect of purchase-money paid by them by direction of the tenant for life to any person joining in the conveyance as a conveying party, or as giving a receipt for the purchase-money, or in any other character or in respect of any other money paid by them by direction of the tenant for life on the purchase, exchange, partition, or lease.

Trustees reimbursement.

43. The trustees of a settlement may reimburse themselves or pay and discharge out of the trust property all expenses properly incurred by them.

Reference of differences to Court.

44. If at any time a difference arises between a tenant for life and the trustees of the settlement, respecting the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, or respecting any matter relating thereto, the Court may, on the application of either party, give such directions respecting the costs of the application, as the Court thinks fit.

Notice to trustees.

45. (1). A tenant for life, when intending to make a sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage, or charge, shall give notice of his intention in that behalf to each of the trustees of the settlement, by posting registered letters, containing the notice, addressed to the trustees, severally, each at his usual or last known place of abode in the United Kingdom, and shall give like notice to the solicitor for the trustees, if any such solicitor is known to the tenant for life, by posting a registered letter, containing the notice, addressed to the solicitor at his place of business in the United Kingdom, every letter under this section being posted not less than one month before the making by the tenant for life of the sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage, or charge, or of a contract for the same.

(2.) Provided that at the date of notice given the number of trustees shall not be less than two, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement.

(3.) A person dealing in good faith with the tenant for life is not concerned to inquire respecting the giving of any such notice as is required by this section.

XI.—COURT; LAND COMMISSIONERS; PROCEDURE.

Regulations respecting payments into Court, applications, &c.

46. (1.) All matters within the jurisdiction of the Court under this Act shall, subject to the Acts regulating the Court, be assigned to the Chancery Division of the Court.

(2.) Payment of money into Court effectually exonerates therefrom the person making the payment.

(3.) Every application to the Court shall be by petition, or by summons at Chambers.

(4.) On an application by the trustees of a settlement notice shall be served in the first instance on the tenant for life.

(5.) On any application notice shall be served on such persons, if any, as the Court thinks fit.

(6.) The Court shall have full power and discretion to make such order as it thinks fit respecting the costs, charges, or expenses of all or any of the parties to any application, and may if it thinks fit, order that all or any of those costs, charges, or expenses be paid out of property subject to the settlement.

(7.) General Rules for purposes of this Act shall be deemed Rules of Court within section seventeen of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, as altered by section nine-teen of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1881, and may be made accordingly.

(8.) The powers of the Court may, as regards land in the County Palatine of Lancaster, be exercised also by the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine; and Rules for regulating proceedings in that Court shall be from time to time made by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with the advice and consent of a Judge of the High Court acting in the Chancery Division, and of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine.

(9.) General Rules, and Rules for the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine, may be made at any time after the passing of this Act, to take effect on or after the commencement of this Act.

(10.) The powers of the Court may, as regards land not exceeding in capital value five hundred pounds, or in annual rateable value thirty pounds, and, as regards capital money arising under this Act, and securities in which the same is invested, not exceeding in amount or value five hundred pounds, and as regards personal chattels settled or to be settled, as in this Act mentioned, not exceeding in value five hundred pounds, be exercised by any County Court within the district whereof is situate any part of the land which is to be dealt with in the Court, or from which the capital money to be dealt with in the Court arises under this Act, or in connexion with which the personal chattels to be dealt with in the Court are settled.

Payment of costs out of settled property.

47. Where the Court directs that any costs, charges, or expenses be paid out of property subject to a settlement, the same shall, subject and according to the directions of the Court, be raised and paid out of capital money arising under this Act, or other money liable to be laid out in the purchase of land to be made subject to the settlement, or out of investments representing such money or out of income of any such money or investments, or out of any accumulations of income of land, money, or investment, or by means of a sale of part of the settled land in respect whereof the costs, charges, or expenses are incurred, or of other settled land comprised in the same settlement and subject to the same limitations, or by means of a mortgage of the settled land or any part thereof, to be made by such person as the Court directs, and either by conveyance of the fee simple or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term, or otherwise, or by means of a charge on the settled land or any part thereof, or partly in one of those modes and partly in another or others, or in any such other mode as the Court thinks fit.

Constitution of Land Commissioners; their powers, &c.

48. (1.) The commissioners now bearing the three several styles of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, and the Copyhold Commissioners, and the Tithe Commissioners for England and Wales, shall, by virtue of this Act, become and shall be styled the Land Commissioners for England.

(2.) The Land Commissioners shall cause one seal to be made with their style as given by this Act; and in the execution and discharge of any power or duty under any Act relating to the three several bodies of commissioners aforesaid, they shall adopt and use the seal and style of the Land Commissioners for England, and no other.

(3.) Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this section shall be construed as altering in any respect the powers, authorities, or duties of the Land Commissioners, or as affecting in respect of appointment, salary, pension, or otherwise any of those commissioners, in office at the passing of this Act, or any assistant commissioner, secretary, or other officer or person then in office or employed under them.

(4.) All Acts of Parliament, judgments, decrees, or orders of any court, awards, deeds, and other documents, passed or made before the commencement of this Act, shall be read and have effect as if the Land Commissioners were therein mentioned instead of one or more of the three several bodies of commissioners aforesaid.

(5.) All acts, matters, and things commenced by or under the authority of any one or more of the three several bodies of commissioners aforesaid before the commencement of this Act, and not then completed, shall and may be carried on and completed by or under the authority of the Land Commissioners; and the Land Commissioners, for the purpose of prosecuting or defending, and carrying on any action, suit, or proceeding pending at the commencement of this Act, shall come into the place of any one or more, as the case may require, of the three several bodies of commissioners aforesaid.

(6.) The Land Commissioners shall, by virtue of this Act, have, for the purposes of any Act, public, local, personal, or private, passed or to be passed, making provision for the execution of improvements on settled land, all such powers and authorities as they have for the purposes of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864; and the provisions of the last-mentioned Act relating to their proceedings and inquiries, and to authentication of instruments, and to declarations, statements, notices, applications, forms, security for expenses, inspections, and examinations, shall extend and apply, as far as the nature and circumstances of the case admit, to acts and proceedings done or taken by or in relation to the Land Commissioners under any Act making provision as last aforesaid; and the provisions of any Act relating to fees or to security for costs to be taken in respect of the business transacted under the Acts administered by the three several bodies of commissioners aforesaid shall extend and apply to the business transacted by or under the direction of the Land Commissioners under any Act, public, local, personal, or private, passed or to be passed, by which any power or duty is conferred or imposed on them.

Filing of certificates, &c., of Commissioners.

49. (1.) Every certificate and report approved and made by the Land Commissioners under this Act shall be filed in their office.

(2.) An office copy of any certificate or report so filed shall be delivered out of their office to any person requiring the same, on payment of the proper fee, and shall be sufficient evidence of the certificate or report whereof it purports to be a copy.

XII.—RESTRICTIONS, SAVINGS, AND GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Powers not assignable; contract not to exercise powers void.

50. (1.) The powers under this Act of a tenant for life are not capable of assignment or release, and do not pass to a person as being, by operation of law or otherwise, an assignee of a tenant for life, and remain exercisable by the tenant for life after and notwithstanding any assignment, by operation of law or otherwise, of his estate or interest under the settlement.

(2.) A contract by a tenant for life not to exercise any of his powers under this Act is void.

(3.) But this section shall operate without prejudice to the rights of any person being an assignee for value of the estate or interest of the tenant for life; and in that case the assignee's rights shall not be affected without his consent, except that, unless the assignee is actually in possession of the settled land or part thereof, his consent shall not be requisite for the making of leases thereof by the tenant for life, provided the leases are made at the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, without fine, and in other respects are in conformity with this Act.

(4.) This section extends to assignments made or coming into operation before or after and to acts done before or after the commencement of this Act; and in this section assignment includes assignment by way of mortgage, and any partial or qualified assignment, and any charge or incumbrance; and assignee has a meaning corresponding with that of assignment.

Prohibition or limitation against exercise of powers, void.

51. (1.) If in a settlement, will, assurance, or other instrument executed or made before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act a provision is inserted purporting or attempting, by way of direction, declaration, or otherwise, to forbid a tenant for life to exercise any power under this Act, or attempting, or tending, or intended, by a limitation, gift, or disposition over of settled land, or by a limitation, gift, or disposition of other real or any personal property, or by the imposition of any condition, or by forfeiture, or in any other manner whatever, to prohibit or prevent him from exercising, or to induce him to abstain from exercising, or to put him into a position inconsistent with his exercising, any power under this Act, that provision, as far as it purports, or attempts, or tends, or is intended to have, or would or might have, the operation aforesaid, shall be deemed to be void.

(2.) For the purposes of this section an estate or interest limited to continue so long only as a person abstains from exercising any power shall be and take effect as an estate or interest to continue for the period for which it would continue if that person were to abstain from exercising the power, discharged from liability to determination or cesser by or on his exercising the same.

Provisions against forfeiture.

52. Notwithstanding anything in a settlement, the exercise by the tenant for life of any power under this Act shall not occasion forfeiture.

Tenant for life trustee for all parties interested.

53. A tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties.

General protection of purchasers, &c.

54. On a sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage, or charge, or purchaser, lessee, mortgagee, or other person dealing in good faith with a tenant for life shall, as against all parties entitled under the settlement, be conclusively taken to have given the best price, consideration, or rent, as the case may require, that could reasonably be obtained by the tenant for life, and to have complied with all the requisitions of this Act.

Exercise of powers; limitation of provisions, &c.

55. (1.) Powers and authorities conferred by this Act on a tenant for life or trustees or the Court or the Land Commissioners are exercisable from time to time.

(2.) Where a power of sale, enfranchisement, exchange, partition, leasing, mortgaging, charging, or other power is exercised by a tenant for life, or by the trustees of a settlement, he and they may respectively execute, make, and do all deeds, instruments, and things necessary or proper in that behalf.

(3.) Where any provision in this Act refers to sale, purchase, exchange, partition, leasing, or other dealing, or to any power, consent, payment, receipt, deed, assurance, contract, expenses, act, or transaction, the same shall be construed to extend only (unless it is otherwise expressed) to sales, purchases, exchanges, partitions, leasings, dealings, powers, consents, payments, receipts, deeds, assurances, contracts, expenses, acts, and transactions under this Act.

Saving for other powers.

56. (1.) Nothing in this Act shall take away, abridge, or prejudicially affect any power for the time being subsisting under a settlement, or by statute or otherwise, exercisable by a tenant for life, or by trustees with his consent, or on his request, or by his direction, or otherwise; and the powers given by this Act are cumulative.

(2.) But in case of conflict between the provisions of a settlement and the provisions of this Act, relative to any matter in respect whereof the tenant for life exercises or contracts or intends to exercise any power under this Act, the provisions of this Act shall prevail; and, accordingly, notwithstanding anything in the settlement, the consent of the tenant for life shall, by virtue of this Act, be necessary to the exercise by the trustees of the settlement or other person of any power conferred by the settlement exercisable for any purpose provided for in this Act.

(3.) If a question arises, or a doubt is entertained, respecting any matter within this section, the Court may, on the application of the trustees of the settlement, or of the tenant for life, or of any other person interested, give its decision, opinion, advice, or direction thereon.

Additional or larger powers by settlement.

57. (1.) Nothing in this Act shall preclude a settlor from conferring on the tenant for life, or the trustees of the settlement, any powers additional to or larger than those conferred by this Act.

(2.) Any additional or larger powers so conferred shall, as far as may be, notwithstanding anything in this Act, operate and be exercisable in the like manner, and with all the like incidents, effects, and consequences, as if they were conferred by this Act, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement.

XIII.—LIMITED OWNERS GENERALLY.

Enumeration of other limited owners, to have powers of tenant for life.

58. (1.) Each person as follows shall, when the estate or interest of each of them is in possession, have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, as if each of them were a tenant for life as defined in this Act (namely):

- (i.) A tenant in tail, including a tenant in tail who is by Act of Parliament restrained from barring or defeating his estate tail, and although the reversion is in the Crown, and so that the exercise by him of his powers under this Act shall bind the Crown, but not including such a tenant in tail where the land in respect whereof he is so restrained was purchased with money provided by Parliament in consideration of public services:
- (ii.) A tenant in fee simple, with an executory limitation, gift, or disposition over, on failure of his issue, or in any other event:
- (iii.) A person entitled to a base fee, although the reversion is in the Crown, and so that the exercise by him of his powers under this Act shall bind the Crown:
- (iv.) A tenant for years determinable on life, not holding merely under a lease at a rent:
- (v.) A tenant for the life of another, not holding merely under a lease at a rent:
- (vi.) A tenant for his own or any other life, or for years determinable on life, whose estate is liable to cease in any event during that life, whether by expiration of the estate, or by conditional limitation, or otherwise, or to be defeated by an executory limitation, gift, or disposition over, or is subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts or other purpose:

(vii.) A tenant in tail after possibility of issue extinct:

(viii.) A tenant by the curtesy:

(ix.) A person entitled to the income of land under a trust or direction for payment thereof to him during his own or any other life, whether subject to expenses of management or not, or until sale of the land, or until forfeiture of his interest therein on bankruptcy or other event.

(2.) In every such case, the provisions of this Act referring to a tenant for life, either as conferring powers on him or otherwise, and to a settlement, and to settled land, shall extend to each of the persons aforesaid, and to the instrument under which his estate or interest arises, and to the land therein comprised.

(3.) In any such case any reference in this Act to death as regards a tenant for life shall, where necessary, be deemed to refer to the determination by death or otherwise of such estate or interest as last aforesaid.

XIV.—INFANTS; MARRIED WOMEN; LUNATICS.

Infant absolutely entitled to be as tenant for life.

59. Where a person, who is in his own right seized of or entitled in possession to land, is an infant, then for purposes of this Act the land is settled land, and the infant shall be deemed tenant for life thereof.

Tenant for life, infant.

60. Where a tenant for life, or a person having the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, is an infant, or an infant would, if he were of full age, be a tenant for life, or have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, may be exercised on his behalf by the trustees of the settlement, and if there are none, then by such person and in such manner as the Court, on the application of a testamentary or other guardian or next friend of the infant, either generally or in a particular instance, orders.

Married woman, how to be affected.

61.—(1.) The foregoing provisions of this Act do not apply in the case of a married woman.

(2.) Where a married woman who, if she had not been a married woman, would have been a tenant for life or would have had the powers of a tenant for life under the foregoing provisions of this Act, is entitled for her separate use, or is entitled under any statute, passed or to be passed, for her separate property, or as a feme sole, then she, without her husband, shall have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act.

(3.) Where she is entitled otherwise than as aforesaid, then she and her husband together shall have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act.

(4.) The provisions of this Act referring to a tenant for life and a settlement and settled land shall extend to the married woman without her husband, or to her and her husband together, as the case may require, and to the instrument under which her estate or interest arises, and to the land therein comprised.

(5.) The married woman may execute, make, and do all deeds, instruments, and things necessary or proper for giving effect to the provisions of this section.

(6.) A restraint on anticipation in the settlement shall not prevent the exercise by her of any power under this Act.

Tenant for life, lunatic.

62. Where a tenant for life, or a person having the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, is a lunatic, so found by inquisition, the committee of his estate may, in his name and on his behalf, under an order of the Lord Chancellor, or other person intrusted by virtue of the Queen's Sign Manual with the care and commitment of the custody of the persons and estates of lunatics, exercise the powers of a tenant for life under this Act; and the order may be made on the petition of any person interested in the settled land, or of the committee of the estate.

XV.—SETTLEMENT BY WAY OF TRUSTS FOR SALE.

Provision for case of trust to sell and re-invest in land. 63. (1.) Any land, or any estate or interest in land, which under or by virtue of any deed, will, or agreement, covenant to surrender, copy of court roll, Act of Parliament, or other instrument or any number of instruments, whether made or passed before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act, is subject to a trust or direction for sale of that land, estate, or interest, and for the application or disposal of the money to arise from the sale, or the income of that money, or the income of the land until sale or any part of that money or income, for the benefit of any person for his life, or any other limited period, or for the benefit of two or more persons concurrently for any limited period, and whether absolutely, or subject to a trust for accumulation of income for payment of debts or other purpose, or to any other restriction, shall be deemed to be settled land, and the instrument or instruments under which the trust arises shall be deemed to be a settlement; and the person for the time being beneficially entitled to the income of the land, estate, or interest aforesaid until sale, whether absolutely or subject as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be tenant for life thereof; or if two or more persons are so entitled concurrently, then those persons shall be deemed to constitute together the tenant for life thereof; and the persons, if any, who are for the time being under the settlement trustees for sale of the settled land, or having power of consent to, or approval of, or control over the sale, or if under the settlement there are no such trustees, then the persons, if any, for the time being, who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for purposes of this Act are for purposes of this Act trustees of the settlement.

(2.) In every such case the provisions of this Act referring to a tenant for life, and to a settlement, and to settled land, shall extend to the person or persons aforesaid, and to the instrument or instruments under which his or their estate or interest arises, and to the land therein comprised, subject and except as in this section provided (that is to say):

(i.) Any reference in this Act to the predecessors or successors in title of the tenant for life, or to the remaindermen, or reversioners or other persons interested in the settled land, shall be deemed to refer to the persons interested in succession or otherwise in the money to arise from sale of the land, or the income of that money, or the income of the land until sale (as the case may require).

(ii.) Capital money arising under this Act from the settled land shall not be applied in the purchase of land unless such application is authorized by the settlement in the case of capital money arising thereunder from sales or other dispositions of the settled land, but may, in addition to any other mode of application authorized by this Act, be applied in any mode in which capital money arising under the settlement from any such sale or other disposition is applicable thereunder, subject to any consent required or direction given by the settlement with respect to the application of trust money of the settlement.

(iii.) Capital money arising under this Act from the settled land and the securities in which the same is invested, shall not for any purpose of disposition, transmission, or devolution, be considered as land unless the same would, if arising under the settlement from a sale or disposition of the settled land, have been so considered, and the same shall be held in trust for and shall go to the same persons successively in the same manner and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts as the same would have gone and been held if arising under the settlement from a sale or disposition of the settled land, and the income of such capital money and securities shall be paid or applied accordingly.

(iv.) Land of whatever tenure acquired under this Act, by purchase, or in exchange, or on partition, shall be conveyed to and vested in the trustees of the settlement, on the trusts, and subject to the powers and provisions which, under the settlement or by reason of the exercise of any power of appointment or charging therein contained, are subsisting with respect to the settled land, or would be so subsisting if the same had not been sold, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, but so as not to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging.

XVI.—REPEALS.

Repeal of enactments in schedule.

64. (1.) The enactments described in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed.

(2.) The repeal by this Act of any enactment shall not affect any right accrued or obligation incurred thereunder before the commencement of this Act; nor shall the same affect the validity or invalidity, or any operation, effect, or consequence, of any instrument executed or made, or of anything done or suffered, or of any order made, before the commencement of this Act; nor shall the same affect any action, proceeding, or thing then pending or uncompleted; and every such action, proceeding, and thing may be carried on and completed as if there had been no such repeal in this Act.

XVII.—IRELAND.

Modifications respecting Ireland.

65. (1.) In the application of this Act to Ireland the foregoing provisions shall be modified as in this section provided.

(2.) The Court shall be Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland.

(3.) All matters within the jurisdiction of that Court shall, subject to the Acts regulating that Court, be assigned to the Chancery Division of that Court; but General Rules under this Act for Ireland may direct that those matters or any of them be assigned to the Land Judges of that Division.

(4.) Any deed inrolled under this Act shall be inrolled in the Record and Writ Office of that Division.

(5.) General Rules for purposes of this Act for Ireland shall be deemed Rules of Court within the 40 & 41 Vict. Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877, and may be made accordingly, at any time after the passing of this Act, to take effect on or after the Commencement of this Act.

(6.) The several Civil Bill Courts in Ireland shall, in addition to the jurisdiction possessed by them independently of this Act, have and exercise the power and authority exercisable by the Court under this Act, in all proceedings where the property, the subject of the proceedings, does not exceed in capital value five hundred pounds, or in annual value thirty pounds.

(7.) The provisions of Part II. of the 40 & 41 Vict. County Officers and Courts (Ireland) c. 56.

Act, 1877, relative to the equitable jurisdiction of the Civil Bill Courts, shall apply to the jurisdiction exercisable by those Courts under this Act.

(8.) Rules and Orders for purposes of this Act, as far as it relates to the Civil Bill Courts, may be made at any time after the passing of this Act, to take effect on or after the commencement of this Act, in manner prescribed by section seventy-nine of the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877.

(9.) The Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland shall be substituted for the Land Commissioners.

(10.) The term for which a lease other than a building or mining lease be granted shall be not exceeding thirty-five years.

THE SCHEDULE.

Section 64.

REPEALS.

23 & 24 Vict., c. 145, in part	An Act to give to trustees, mortgagees, and others, certain powers now commonly inserted in settlements, mortgages, and wills	} in part; namely,—
Parts I. and IV. (being so much of the Act as is not repealed by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881).

40 & 41 Vict., c. 18, in part	The Settled Estates Act, 1877 Section seventeen.	} in part; namely,— CAP. XXXIX.

An Act for further improving the Practice of Conveyancing; and for other purposes.

[10th August 1882.]

Be it enacted, &c.,

Preliminary.

Short titles; commencement; extent; interpretation.
44 & 45 Vict. c. 41.

1. (1.) This Act may be cited as the Conveyancing Act, 1882; and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (in this Act referred to as the Conveyancing Act of 1881) and this Act may be cited together as the Conveyancing Acts, 1881, 1882.

(2.) This Act, except where it is otherwise expressed, shall commence and take effect from and immediately after the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, which time is in this Act referred to as the commencement of this Act.

(3.) This Act does not extend to Scotland.

(4.) In this Act and in the Schedule thereto—

(i.) Property includes real and personal property, and any debt, and any thing in action, and any other right or interest in the nature of property, whether in possession or not;

(ii.) Purchaser includes a lessee or mortgagee, or an intending purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee, or other person, who, for valuable consideration, takes or deals for property, and purchase has a meaning corresponding with that of purchaser;

3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 74. (iii.) The Act of the session of the third and fourth years of King William the Fourth (chapter seventy-four) "for the abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the substitution of more simple modes of Assurance" is referred to as the Fines and Recoveries Act; and
4 & 5 Will. 4 c. 92. the Act of the session of the fourth and fifth years of King William the Fourth (chapter ninety-two) "for the abolition of Fines and Recoveries, and for the substitution of more simple modes of Assurance in Ireland" is referred to as the Fines and Recoveries (Ireland) Act.

Searches.

Official negative and other certificates of searches for judgments, crown debts, &c.

2. (1.) Where any person requires, for purposes of this section, search to be made in the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature for entries of judgments, deeds, or other matters or documents, whereof entries are required or allowed to be made in that office by any Act described in Part I. of the First Schedule to the Conveyancing Act of 1881, or by any other Act, he may deliver in the office a requisition in that behalf, referring to this section.

(2.) Thereupon the proper officer shall diligently make the search required, and shall make and file in the office a certificate setting forth the result thereof; and office copies of that certificate shall be issued on requisition, and an office copy shall be evidence of the certificate.

(3.) In favour of a purchaser, as against persons interested under or in respect of judgments, deeds, or other matters or documents, whereof entries are required or allowed as aforesaid, the certificate, according to the tenor thereof, shall be conclusive, affirmatively or negatively, as the case may be.

(4.) Every requisition under this section shall be in writing, signed by the person making the same, specifying the name against which he desires search to be made, or in relation to which he requires an office copy certificate of result of search, and other sufficient particulars; and the person making any such requisition shall not be entitled to a search, or an office copy certificate, until he has satisfied the proper officer that the same is required for the purposes of this section.

(5.) General Rules shall be made for the purposes of this section, prescribing forms and contents of requisitions and certificates, and regulating the practice of the office, and prescribing, with the concurrence of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, the fees to be taken therein; which Rules shall be deemed Rules of Court, within section seventeen of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, as altered by section nineteen of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1881, and may be made, at any time after the passing of this Act, to take effect on or after the commencement of this Act.

(6.) If any officer, clerk, or person employed in the office commits, or is party or privy to, any act or fraud or collusion, or is wilfully negligent, in the making of or otherwise in relation to any certificate or office copy under this section, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

(7.) Nothing in this section or in any Rule made thereunder shall take away, abridge, or prejudicially affect any right which any person may have independently of this section to make any search in the office; and every such search may be made as if this section or any such Rule had not been enacted or made.

(8.) Where a solicitor obtains an office copy certificate of result of search under this section, he shall not be answerable in respect of any loss that may arise from error in the certificate.

(9.) Where the solicitor is acting for trustees, executors, agents, or other persons in a fiduciary position, those persons also shall not be so answerable.

(10.) Where such persons obtain such an office copy without a solicitor, they shall also be protected in like manner.

(11.) Nothing in this section applies to deeds enrolled under the Fines and Recoveries Act, or under any other Act, or under any statutory Rule.

(12.) This section does not extend to Ireland.

Notice.

Restriction on constructive notice.

3. (1) A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of any instrument, fact, or thing unless—

(i.) It is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or

(ii.) In the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel, as such, or of his solicitor, or other agent, as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor, or other agent, as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent.

(2.) This section shall not exempt a purchaser from any liability under, or any obligation to perform or observe, any covenant, condition, provision, or restriction contained in any instrument under which his title is derived, mediately, or immediately; and such liability or obligation may be enforced in the same manner and to the same extent as if this section had not been enacted.

(3.) A purchaser shall not by reason of anything in this section be affected by notice in any case where he would not have been so affected if this section had not been enacted.

(4.) This section applies to purchases made either before or after the commencement of this Act; save that, where an action is pending at the commencement of this Act the rights of the parties shall not be affected by this section.

Leases.

Contract for lease not part of title to lease.

4. (1.) Where a lease is made under a power contained in a settlement, will, Act of Parliament, or other instrument, any preliminary contract for or relating to the lease shall not, for the purpose of the deduction of title to an intended assign, form part of the title, or evidence of the title, to the lease.

(2.) This section applies to leases made either before or after the commencement of this Act.

Separate Trustees.

Appointment of separate sets of trustees.

5. (1.) On an appointment of new trustees, a separate set of trustees may be appointed for any part of the trust property held on trusts distinct from those relating to any other part or parts of the trust property; or, if only one trustee was originally appointed, then one separate trustee may be so appointed for the first-mentioned part.

(2.) This section applies to trusts created either before or after the commencement of this Act.

Powers.

Disclaimer of power by trustees.

6. (1.) A person to whom any power, whether coupled with an interest or not, is given, may, by deed, disclaim the power; and, after disclaimer, shall not be capable of exercising or joining in the exercise of the power.

(2.) On such disclaimer, the power may be exercised by the other or others, or the survivors or survivor of the others, of the persons to whom the power is given, unless the contrary is expressed in the instrument creating the power.

(3.) This section applies to powers created by instruments coming into operation either before or after the commencement of this Act.

Married Women.

Acknowledgment of deeds by married women.

7. (1.) In section seventy-nine of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and section seventy of the Fines and Recoveries (Ireland) Act, there shall, by virtue of this Act, be substituted for the words "two of the perpetual commissioners, or two special commissioners," the words "one of the perpetual commissioners, or one special commissioner;" and in section eighty-three of the Fines and Recoveries Act, and in section seventy-four of the Fines and Recoveries (Ireland) Act, there shall, by virtue of this Act, be substituted for the word "persons" the word "person," and for the word "commissioners" the words "a commissioner;" and all other provisions of those Acts, and all other enactments having reference in any manner to the sections aforesaid shall be read and have effect accordingly.

(2.) Where the memorandum of acknowledgment by a married woman of a deed purports to be signed by a person authorized to take the acknowledgment, the deed shall, as regards the execution thereof by the married woman, take effect at the time of acknowledgment, and shall be conclusively taken to have been duly acknowledged.

(3.) A deed acknowledged before or after the commencement of this Act by a married woman, before a judge of the High Court of Justice in England or Ireland, or before a judge of a county court in England, or before a chairman in Ireland, or before a perpetual commissioner or a special commissioner, shall not be impeached or impeachable by reason only that such judge, chairman, or commissioner was interested or concerned either as a party, or as solicitor, or clerk to the solicitor for one of the parties, or otherwise, in the transaction giving occasion for the acknowledgment; and General Rules shall be made for preventing any person interested or concerned as aforesaid from taking an acknowledgment; but no such Rule shall make invalid any acknowledgment; and those Rules, shall as regards England, be deemed Rules of Court within section seventeen of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59. 1876, as altered by section nineteen of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 63. and shall, as regards Ireland, be deemed Rules of Court within the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877, and may be made accordingly, for England and Ireland respectively, at any time after the passing of this Act, to take effect on or after the commencement of this Act.

(4.) The enactments described in the Schedule to this Act are hereby repealed.

(5.) The foregoing provisions of this section, including the repeal therein, apply only to the execution of deeds by married women after the commencement of this Act.

(6.) Notwithstanding the repeal or any other thing in this section, the certificate, if not lodged before the commencement of this Act, of the taking of an acknowledgment by a married woman of a deed executed before the commencement of this Act, with any affidavit relating thereto, shall be lodged, examined, and filed in the like manner and with the like effects and consequences as if this section had not been enacted.

(7.) There shall continue to be kept in the proper office of the Supreme Court of Judicature an index to all certificates of acknowledgments of deeds by married women lodged therein, before or after the commencement of this Act, containing the names of the married women and their husbands, alphabetically arranged, and the dates of the certificates and of the deeds to which they respectively relate, and other particulars found convenient; and every such certificate lodged after the commencement of this Act shall be entered in the index as soon as may be after the certificate is filed.

(8.) An office copy of any such certificate filed before or after the commencement of this Act shall be delivered to any person applying for the same; and every such office copy shall be received as evidence of the acknowledgment of the deed to which the certificate refers.

Powers of Attorney.

Effect of power of attorney, for value, made absolutely irrevocable.

8. (1.) If a power of attorney, given for valuable consideration, is in the instrument creating the power expressed to be irrevocable, then, in favour of a purchaser,—

(i.) The power shall not be revoked at any time, either by anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee of the power, or by the death, marriage, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or bankruptcy of the donor of the power; and

(ii.) Any act done at any time by the donee of the power, in pursuance of the power, shall be as valid as if anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee of the power, or the death, marriage, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or bankruptcy of the donor of the power, had not been done or happened; and

(iii.) Neither the donee of the power nor the purchaser shall at any time be prejudicially affected by notice of anything done by the donor of the power, without the concurrence of the donee of the power or of the death, marriage, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or bankruptcy of the donor of the power.

(2.) This section applies only to powers of attorney created by instruments executed after the commencement of this Act.

Effect of power of attorney, for value or not, made irrevocable for fixed time.

9. (1.) If a power of attorney, whether given for valuable consideration or not, is in the instrument creating the power expressed to be irrevocable for a fixed time, therein specified, not exceeding one year from the date of the instrument, then, in favour of a purchaser,—

(i.) The power shall not be revoked, for and during that fixed time, either by anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee of the power, or by the death, marriage, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or bankruptcy of the donor of the power; and

(ii.) Any act done within that fixed time, by the donee of the power, in pursuance of the power, shall be as valid as if anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee of the power, or the death, marriage, lunacy, unsoundness of mind, or bankruptcy of the donor of the power, had not been done or happened; and

(2.) This section applies only to powers of attorney created by instruments executed after the commencement of this Act.

Executory Limitations.

Restriction on executory limitations.

10. (1.) Where there is a person entitled to land for an estate in fee, or for a term of years absolute or determinable on life, or for term of life, with an executory limitation over on default or failure of all or any of his issue, whether within or at any specified period or time or not, that executory limitation shall be or become void and incapable of taking effect, if and as soon as there is living any issue who has attained the age of twenty-one years, of the class on default or failure whereof the limitation over was to take effect.

(2.) This section applies only where the executory limitation is contained in an instrument coming into operation after the commencement of this Act.

Long Terms.

Amendment of enactment respecting long terms.

11. Section sixty-five of the Conveyancing Act of 1881 shall apply to and include, and shall be deemed to have always applied to and included, every such term as in that section mentioned, whether having as the immediate reversion thereon the freehold or not; but not—

(i.) Any term liable to be determined by re-entry for condition broken; or (ii.) Any term created by sub-demise out of a superior term, itself incapable of being enlarged into a fee simple.

Mortgages.

Reconveyance on mortgage.

12. The right of the mortgagor, under section fifteen of the Conveyancing Act of 1881, to require a mortgagee, instead of reconveying, to assign the mortgage debt and convey the mortgaged property to a third person, shall belong to and be capable of being enforced by each incumbrancer, or by the mortgagor, notwithstanding any intermediate incumbrance; but a requisition of an incumbrancer shall prevail over a requisition of the mortgagor, and, as between incumbrancers, a requisition of a prior incumbrancer shall prevail over a requisition of a subsequent incumbrancer.

Saving.

Restriction on repeals in this Act.

13. The repeal by this Act of any enactment shall not affect any right accrued or obligation incurred thereunder before the commencement of this Act; nor shall the same affect the validity or invalidity, or any operation, effect, or consequence, of any instrument executed or made, or of anything done or suffered, before the commencement of this Act; nor shall the same affect any action, proceeding, or thing then pending or uncompleted; and every such action, proceeding and thing may be carried on and completed as if there had been no such repeal in this Act.

CAP. XL.

An Act to amend the law of Copyright relating to Musical Compositions. [10th August 1882.]

WHEREAS it is expedient to amend the law relating to copyright in musical compositions, and to protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties for the unauthorised performance of the same :

Be it therefore enacted, &c., . . . . .

Printed notice restraining public performance.

1. On and after the passing of this Act the proprietor of the copyright in any musical composition first published after the passing of this Act, or his assignee, who shall be entitled to and be desirous of retaining in his own hands exclusively the right of public representation or performance of the same, shall print or cause to be printed upon the title-page of every published copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved.

Provision when right of performance and copyright are vested in different owners.

2. In case, after the passing of this Act, the right of public representation or performance of and the copyright in, any musical composition shall be or become vested before publication of any copy thereof in different owners, then, if the owner of the right of public representation or performance shall desire to retain the same, he shall, before any such publication of any copy of such musical composition, give to the owner of the copyright therein notice in writing requiring him to print upon every copy of such musical composition a notice to the effect that the right of public representation or performance is reserved; but in case the right of public representation or performance of, and the copyright in, any musical composition shall, after publication of any copy thereof subsequently to the passing of this Act, first become vested in different owners, and such notice as aforesaid shall have been duly printed on all copies published after the passing of this Act previously to such vesting, then, if the owner of the right of performance and representation shall desire to retain the same, he shall, before the publication of any further copies of such musical composition, give notice in writing to the person in whom the copyright shall be then vested, requiring him to print such notice as aforesaid on every copy of such musical composition to be thereafter published.

Penalty on owner of copyright for noncompliance with notice from owner of right of performance.

3. If the owner for the time being of the copyright in any musical composition shall, after due notice being given to him or his predecessor in title at the time, and generally in accordance with the last preceding section, neglect or fail to print legibly and conspicuously upon every copy of such composition published by him or by his authority, or by any person lawfully entitled to publish the same, and claiming through or under him, a note or memorandum stating that the right of public representation or performance is reserved, then and in such case the owner of the copyright at the time of the happening of such neglect or default, shall forfeit and pay to the owner of the right of public representation or performance of such composition the sum of twenty pounds, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Costs. 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 15.

4. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Act passed in the third and fourth years of His Majesty King William the Fourth to amend the laws relating to dramatic literary property, or any other Act in which those provisions are incorporated, the cost of any action or proceedings for penalties or damages in respect of the unauthorised representation or performance of any musical composition published before the passing of this Act shall, in cases in which the plaintiff shall not recover more than forty shillings as penalty or damages, be in the discretion of the court or judge before whom such action or proceedings shall be tried.

Short title.

5. This Act may be cited as the Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act, 1882.

CAP. XLVII.

An Act to make provision respecting certain Arrears of Rent in Ireland. [18th August 1882.]

Be it enacted, &c.,

PART I.

Settlement by Land Commission of arrears of rent. 1. (1.) In the case of any holding to which the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, applies, and which is valued under the Acts relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland at not more than thirty pounds a year, if on the application of the landlord and the tenant of such holding, or of either of them after ten days notice in the prescribed manner by the landlord or his agent to the tenant, or by the tenant to the landlord or his agent, the following circumstances (in this Act referred to as preliminary conditions) are proved to the satisfaction of the Irish Land Commission, namely,—

- (a.) That the rent payable in respect of the year of the tenancy expiring on the last gale day of the tenancy in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one (which year of the tenancy is in this Act referred to as "the year expiring as aforesaid") has been satisfied on or before the thirtieth day of November one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two; and
- (b.) That antecedent arrears of rent are due to the landlord; and
- (c.) That the tenant is unable to discharge such antecedent arrears, without loss of his holding, or deprivation of the means necessary for the cultivation thereof, the Irish Land Commission (in this Act referred to as the Land Commission) may make an order for the payment to or for the benefit of the landlord of a sum equal to one half of such antecedent arrears, subject to the limitation that the sum so paid shall not exceed the yearly rent payable in respect of the holding for the year of the tenancy next preceding the year expiring as aforesaid: Provided that for the purpose of application under the provisions of sections two, ten, and thirteen respectively of this Act, the Land Commission may in respect of such notice extend the periods in the said sections respectively mentioned for any time not exceeding ten days.

(2.) On such order for payment to or for the benefit of the landlord being made by the Land Commission, all such antecedent arrears of rent shall, subject as herein-after mentioned, be released and extinguished, and any judgment, decree, or security for the rent of the holding, and any judgment or decree for the recovery of the holding on account of the nonpayment of rent, shall be vacated so far as regards any rent due in respect of the holding before the last gale day in the year expiring as aforesaid, but shall not be vacated so far as regards any rent subsequently accrued due, or any costs due in pursuance of such judgment, decree, or security: Provided that in the event of a sale of the tenancy within seven years from the making of such order the arrears of rent dealt with by such order and not satisfied by payment or remission shall, to an amount not exceeding one year of such arrears nor one half of the proceeds of such sale, be a sum payable to the landlord

44 & 45 Vic. c. 49. out of such proceeds within the meaning of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.

For the purposes of this Act the saleable value of the tenant's interest shall, so far as the Commissioners think it reasonable, be taken into account in ascertaining whether the tenant is unable to discharge such antecedent arrears.

(3.) All payments on account of rent made by the tenant to the landlord in or subsequent to the year expiring as aforesaid, but before the thirtieth day of November one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, shall be deemed to have been made on account of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid, to the extent to which the rent for that year had at the time of such payment accrued due, provided that where it appears that, according to the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and tenant of a holding, the rent of such holding has usually been paid on some day after the day on which it became legally due, the usual day of payment shall be deemed, for the purposes of this sub-section, to be the time at which the rent accrued due.

(4.) A remission by the landlord of the whole or any part of the rent payable in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid shall be deemed to be a satisfaction of the amount of rent so remitted; provided that no remission made for any previous year shall be credited to the year expiring as aforesaid.

(5.) The Land Commission, if satisfied on the occasion of any application made under this Act that it is just so to do, may authorise the tenant to make to the Land Commission any payments on account of the rent payable in respect of the year of the tenancy expiring as aforesaid which the tenant might otherwise have made to the landlord, and such payment shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to have been made to the landlord, and the Land Commission shall, having first given public notice in the prescribed manner, cause any sum so paid by the tenant to be paid to the person appearing to such Commission to be entitled thereto as landlord.

(6.) Any money payable under this Act by the Land Commission to the landlord shall be paid to the person entitled as landlord without cost, except so far as may be caused by disputed title or by the person so entitled failing to comply with the rules for the time being in force relating to the payment of such money: Provided always, that where two or more parties are entitled to the arrears, the Land Commission shall have power to decide the rights of the parties, and the proportion in which the sums so ordered to be paid to or for the benefit of the landlord shall be divided amongst them.

Modification in case of evicted tenant when restored to holding.

2. Any tenant evicted from his holding for nonpayment of rent, or whose tenancy has been purchased for the landlord at any sale under and by virtue of any writ of execution founded upon a judgment obtained by the landlord for an arrear of rent due in respect of such holding, may, if his landlord agrees to reinstate him, apply, with the consent of his landlord in the prescribed manner, during the time limited for applications under this Act to the Land Commission under this Act, and the Land Commission may make an order under this Act in the same manner as if the tenant had not been evicted or his tenancy had not been sold.

Any tenant evicted for nonpayment of rent whom the landlord does not agree to reinstate, but who is entitled to apply for a writ of restitution in pursuance of the seventy-first section of the Landlord and Tenant

may apply during the time limited for applications under this Act to the Land Commission under this Act, and the Land Commission may make an order under this Act in the same manner as if the tenant had not been evicted, and on an application being made to the court having cognizance of the case for a writ of restitution, that court shall deal with the case as if the tenant had paid all arrears of rent up to the last gale day in the year expiring as aforesaid, and on compliance by the tenant with the other conditions of the said Act of 1860 the court may order his restitution: Provided that an order of the Land Commission under this section shall not take effect until and unless the tenant is restored to his holding.

For the purpose of enabling any such evicted tenant to make an application to the Land Commission under the first section of this Act, the Land Commission shall have power, on application made by him within six months from the time of eviction, and during the time limited for applications under this Act, to enlarge the time during which he may redeem his tenancy for a period not exceeding three months, subject to such terms and conditions as may seem just.

Application of Act to existing leases. 3. This Act shall apply to holdings subject to existing leases within the meaning of section twenty-one of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, in like manner as it applies to any other holding.

PART II.

Supplemental Provisions.

Powers of Land Commission 4. For the purposes of this Act the Land Commission may exercise all such powers vested in them for the purpose of the execution of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, as are referred to in the first schedule to this Act, and shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine all matters, whether of law or fact, that may be required to be determined by them for the purposes of this Act, and they shall have power to retain in their hands any moneys which may be payable to a landlord until they have decided to whom such moneys are legally payable, and they shall in respect of such moneys have all the powers vested in the court by the thirty-seventh section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, in respect of the distribution of purchase moneys, in the same manner as if the moneys so payable to the landlord were purchase moneys.

The Land Commission shall not be subject to be restrained in the execution of their powers under this Act by the order of any court, nor shall any proceedings before them be removed by certiorari into any court.

The Land Commission may of its own motion, or shall on the application of any party to any proceeding pending before it unless it considers such application frivolous and vexatious, state a case in respect of any question of law arising in such proceedings, and refer the same for the consideration and decision of Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland.

Delegation of powers of Land Commission. 5. The Land Commission may from time to time by rule under this Act or by any special order delegate any power or duty under this Act, except the power of making rules or appointments, to the Civil Bill Court or to any Sub-Commission, or any member of the Land Commission, or any member of a Sub-Commission being a barrister-at-law or solicitor, and every Court, Sub-Commission, or member of the Land Commission or Sub-Commission to whom such power or duty shall be delegated, shall, in reference thereto, and subject to an appeal on matter of law to the Land Commission on and in such conditions and circumstances as may be prescribed, have all the powers of the Land Commissioners.

The Land Commission may, from time to time, with the assent of the Treasury, appoint fit persons possessing such qualifications as may be prescribed by the Treasury to investigate and report as to the existence or non-existence in the case of holdings of the preliminary conditions required to be proved for the purpose of orders under this Act and as to the values of such holdings, and the Land Commission may adopt any such report, or any part thereof, as may seem expedient, and may from time to time direct a fresh investigation to take place, or may themselves take evidence in respect of the subject matter of such investigation.

Any person or persons appointed in pursuance of this section may for the purposes of the investigation administer an oath.

The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may be represented on any inquiry under this Act by any person nominated by them for such purpose.

Incorporated provisions of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 48. 6. In the case of any persons interested in any matter arising under this Act, the provisions of sections fifty-nine, sixty, and sixty-one of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, as to administration on the death of a tenant, and as to provision for married women, and as to provision for other persons under disability, shall apply to any proceedings under this Act in the same manner as if the said sections were herein enacted, and in terms made applicable to this Act.

Punishment of fraudulent claim. 7. If in any proceeding under this Act any person concerned in such proceeding as principal or agent, with intent to substantiate a false claim, suppresses, attempts to suppress, or is privy to the suppression of any document, or of any fact, or produces or is privy to the production of any false evidence the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and upon conviction shall be liable, in the discretion of the court, either to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds. Any sum paid by the Land Commission in respect of any false claim shall be a debt due to the Crown from the person on behalf of whom it is paid.

Charge of liabilities under Act on Irish Church Temporalities Fund and Consolidated Fund. 8. Any liabilities incurred by the Land Commission on account of payments to landlords in respect of arrears of rent under this Act shall be primarily a charge on the Irish Church Temporalities Fund, and, subject thereto, on the Consolidated Fund in such manner as may hereafter be provided by Parliament.

The Irish Church Temporalities Fund means the fund under the control of the Land Commission under the provisions of the Irish Church Act 44 and 45 Vict. c. 71. Amendment Act, 1881.

Definition of landlord. 9. The expression "landlord" in relation to a holding means, for the purposes of this Act, any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of such holding.

Limit of time. 10. An application under this Act shall not be made by any landlord or tenant after the last day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, except by leave of the Land Commission, and in no case after the thirtieth day of April one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, and the Land Commission shall grant such leave only in cases where it is proved to their satisfaction that injustice would be done in case leave were refused.

Exclusion of tenants of holdings of an aggregate valuation exceeding thirty pounds.

11. An order under this Act shall not be made in the case of a holding the tenant of which is possessed of two or more holdings in Ireland to which the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, applies, and the valuation of which under the Acts relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland amounts in the whole to more than thirty pounds a year.

And the question as to whether the tenant of any holding in respect of which an application may be made under this Act is or is not possessed of such holdings as are in this section in that behalf mentioned may be investigated and reported on by any person appointed under this Act to investigate and report on the preliminary conditions for an order under this Act.

Holding valued as part of larger tenement.

12. Where a holding, as defined by the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, is not separately valued, but forms part of a larger parcel of land valued as one tenement under the Acts relating to the valuation of rateable property in Ireland, such holding shall be deemed to be a separate holding for the purposes of this Act, and to be valued under the said Acts at such proportion of the sum at which the whole of the said tenement is valued as the rent of the holding bears to the rent of the whole of the said tenement.

Suspension of proceedings.

13. Where any proceedings for the recovery of the rent of a holding to which this Act applies, or for the recovery of such holding for nonpayment of rent on account of the rent in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid and antecedent arrears, have been taken before or after an application under this Act in respect of such holding, and are pending before such application is disposed of, the court before which such proceedings are pending shall, if the provisions of section one, sub-section (a.), have been complied with, and on such terms and conditions as the court may direct, postpone or suspend such proceedings until the application under this Act has been disposed of.

Evidence.

14. Evidence required for the purposes of this Act shall, whenever practicable, be taken upon oath, and may be either oral or by affidavit, and affidavits of the landlord, or his agent, and the tenant may be accepted as prima facie evidence of all or any of the preliminary conditions or other matters.

Affidavits for the purposes of this Act may be taken and sworn before any person authorised by this or any other Act to administer an oath.

Cancellation of certain rent-charges under 44 & 45 Vict., c. 49, s. 59, in repayment of advances for arrears of rent.

15. Whereas by section fifty-nine of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, it is provided, that where it appeared to the Court, on the joint application, made on or before the twenty-eighth day of February one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, of the landlord and tenant of any holding valued at a sum not exceeding thirty pounds a year, that the tenant had paid the whole of the rent payable in respect of the year of the tenancy expiring on the gale day next before the twenty-second day of August one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, and that antecedent arrears were due, the Land Commission might make in respect of such antecedent arrears an advance of a sum not exceeding one year's rent of the holding and not exceeding half the antecedent arrears, and thereupon the Court should by order declare the holding to be charged with the repayment to the Land Commission of the said advance by a rentcharge payable and calculated as in the said section mentioned:

And whereas in pursuance of the said section divers advances have been made in respect of the arrears of rent on divers holdings, and such holdings have been charged with the repayment of the said advances by such rentcharges as in the said section mentioned, and it is expedient to amend the said section: Be it therefore enacted as follows:

Where in pursuance of section fifty-nine of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, an advance has been made, before the passing of this Act, towards the payment of the arrears due in respect of any holding, and a rentcharge has been charged on such holding for the repayment of such advance, the Land Commission, if it is proved to their satisfaction on the application of either the landlord or the tenant of the holding that the tenant was, at the date of the said advance being made, unable to discharge the arrears in respect of which the advance was made, may by order cancel the said rentcharge, and the same shall cease to be payable, whether by the landlord or the tenant, as from the last day appointed for payment of the same next before the date of the order, and the amount of the said advance shall be a charge on the Irish Church Temporalities Fund.

Arrears of rent how dealt with.

16. Where it appears to the Land Commission, on the joint application of the landlord and tenant of any such holding valued at a sum not exceeding fifty pounds a year, that the tenant has paid the whole (or such sum as the landlord may be willing to accept in full discharge of the whole) of the rent payable in respect of the year of the tenancy expiring as aforesaid, and that the tenant has obtained a receipt in full for such rent, and that antecedent arrears are due, the Land Commission may make to the landlord, in respect of such antecedent arrears, an advance of a sum not exceeding one year's rent of the holding, and not exceeding half the antecedent arrears, and thereupon the Court shall by order declare the holding to be charged with the repayment of the advance to the Land Commission, by a rentcharge payable half-yearly on the first day of January and the first day of July during the thirty-five years from the date specified in the order, and calculated at the rate of five pounds by the hundred, by the year, of the advance.

The charge declared by the order as aforesaid shall have priority over all charges affecting the holding, except quit-rent and crown rent, and sums payable to the Commissioners of Public Works, and shall be payable by the tenant of the holding for the time being, and shall be levied and collected in manner herein-after provided; and in the event of the tenant failing to pay any half-yearly instalment of the said charge for the space of twelve months after the same shall have accrued due, then and in every such case the amount of such instalments, together with the entire of the unpaid residue of such charge, with interest as ascertained by the Land Commission, shall forthwith be payable by the tenant, and the amount thereof shall be raised by sale of the tenancy in the prescribed manner.

The half-yearly instalments of such charge shall be from time to time collected by the collector authorised to collect poor rate in the electoral division in which such holding is situate; and for the purpose of such collection every collector shall have all such powers and authorities as he shall for the time being possess for collecting and recovering poor rate, and shall and may collect and levy the same accordingly from the tenant liable to pay the same, notwithstanding that such tenant may not be liable to pay poor rate.

For the purpose of such collection the Land Commission shall, in each half-year, transmit to the clerk of every union, within which any holding or holdings charged as aforesaid shall be situate, a warrant under the seal of the Land Commission, setting forth the names of the tenants within such union liable to pay such charges or the instalments thereof, and the amount due by each respectively, and such warrant shall be judicially noticed in all proceedings in court, and shall be conclusive evidence of the arrears due by such tenants respectively, and of their liability to pay the same.

The collector shall be paid by the Land Commission such remuneration, not exceeding one shilling in the pound of his collection, as the Land Commission, with the consent of the Treasury, may determine, and the clerk of the union may be paid such remuneration (if any) as the Land Commission may with the like consent determine.

Every such collector shall pay and account for the sums collected or collectable by him under this Act to the guardians of the union in which such holding is situate in the prescribed form; and the guardians shall transmit the amounts from time to time received by them as aforesaid to the Land Commission under the prescribed regulations.

In the event of such default by the tenant for the space of twelve months as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the county court of the county in which the holding is situate, on the application of the Land Commission, to order a sale of such tenancy, which shall be sold, and the proceeds of such sale dealt with by the said county court in the prescribed manner.

If the proceeds of any such sale fail to realise the amount ascertained by the Land Commission as aforesaid, together with the cost of sale, the amount of the deficiency shall be paid by the landlord of the said holding, and shall be a charge upon his estate and interest therein, and shall be collected and levied in the prescribed manner: Provided, that on any transfer of the tenant's interest in the holding by sale, the principal sum and interest, if any, remaining due to the Land Commission, shall be paid out of the purchase money to the Land Commission.

On the order of the Land Commission being made as aforesaid in relation to any holding such antecedent arrears shall be deemed to be absolutely released.

The landlord and tenant may agree that any rent paid by the tenant in or subsequent to the year expiring as aforesaid shall be deemed, for the purposes of this section, to have been paid in respect of the rent due for that year, and not in respect of arrears of rent.

Where arrears of rent in respect of a holding are due to some person or persons besides the landlord the advance made under this section shall be rateably distributed amongst the persons entitled thereto.

An application for an advance under this section shall not be made after the periods mentioned in the tenth clause aforesaid.

The omission or refusal by either landlord or tenant of any holding to join with the other of them in obtaining a loan from the Land Commission under this section shall not prejudice any other application or proceeding which either of them may make or institute under this Act or the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, or the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, in relation to such holding.

The Land Commission shall, at such time after the expiration of each period of twelve months as the Treasury may from time to time appoint, make up an account showing for the said period of twelve months the amount of all such payments due to them in respect of rentcharges payable to them under this section as they have failed to recover at the expiration of the said period.

Whenever, in the case of any tenant evicted for non-payment of rent, or in case the holding of the tenant has been sold and purchased by the landlord, and possession taken thereof by him, since the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty, the landlord agrees to reinstate such tenant on the terms in this section set forth, this section shall apply as if such tenant had not been so evicted from his holding.

17. Where, in the case of a holding of which any person is owner, antecedent arrears of rent due in respect of any year or years, or portion of a year, have been extinguished in pursuance of this Act, and any public charge or tax accrued during such year or years, or portion of year or years, is due from such person as or in consequence of his being owner of such holding, then, on proof to the satisfaction of the Land Commission that the owner has, during such time as aforesaid, received no rent, or an amount of rent less than the full rent, such public charges or taxes shall, if no rent has been received, be wholly remitted, and if an amount of rent less than the full rent has been received, be remitted in proportion to the amount of rent not received.

Where a person has paid any public charges or taxes which, if not paid, would be remitted under this section, the amount which would have been so remitted shall be allowed as a deduction from any future payment or payments of the public charges or taxes of the same description, or may be recovered as a debt from the authority to whom it may have been paid.

Any payment which an owner may receive under this Act in respect of arrears of rent shall, for the purposes of this section, be taken into account as rent.

The Land Commission shall ascertain, for the purposes of this section, in such manner as they think best calculated to ascertain the truth, the amount of public charges or taxes due in any year or portion of a year from a person as or in consequence of his being owner of a holding.

"Public charges or taxes" means tithe rentcharge payable to the Land Commission, income tax, quit-rent, or any of such charges or taxes.

PART III.

Emigration.

Power of guardians to borrow for emigration.

18. From and after the passing of this Act, the board of guardians of any union in Ireland are authorised to borrow money for the purpose of defraying or assisting to defray the expenses of the emigration of poor persons resident within their union, or any electoral division thereof, in manner provided by the Poor Law c. 104.

Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1849, as amended by subsequent Acts, subject to the following modifications; (that is to say),

- (1.) The provisions of the said Act in relation to the repayment of the advance by annual instalments shall not apply;
- (2.) The advances may be made by the Commissioners of Public Works out of any moneys granted to them for the purpose of loans in place of the Public Works Loans Commissioners;
- (3.) Every such advance made by the Commissioners of Public Works shall bear interest at the rate of three-and-a-half per centum per annum, or at such other rate as the Treasury may from time to time fix, in order to enable the advance to be made without loss to the Exchequer;
- (4.) Every such advance made by the Commissioners of Public Works, and the interest thereon, shall be repaid within such period from the date of the advance, not being less than fifteen years nor more than thirty years, as the Treasury may from time to time fix.

For the purposes of this Act the Poor Law Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1849, means the Act of the session of the twelfth and thirteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and four.

Orders for payment of loans may be made by Local Government Board.

19. If at any time the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland certify that any sum remains due to them from the board of guardians of any union on account of any loan or advance made under this Act, and is then payable to the Commissioners, the Local Government Board shall, by order under their seal, require the guardians of the union to pay the sum so certified, and shall send copies of such order to the board of guardians and to the treasurer of the union; and thereupon the treasurer of the union shall, out of any money then in his hands to the credit of the guardians, or if such money is insufficient for the purpose, then out of all moneys subsequently received by him on account of the guardians, pay over the amount mentioned in the order to the Commissioners of Public Works. The guardians of the union shall debit the several electoral divisions with such proportions of that sum as may be payable by such electoral divisions respectively.

Grants in aid of emigration.

20. The Treasury may from time to time authorise the Commissioners of Public Works to make, subject to the regulations of the Treasury, grants to the board of guardians of any union, or such other body or persons and on such terms as the Lord Lieutenant may approve, for emigration purposes.

The moneys so granted shall be applied in accordance with the said regulations for the same purposes as moneys borrowed under the provisions of this Act.

The sums granted by the Commissioners of Public Works shall not exceed one hundred thousand pounds in the whole, and the sums granted shall not exceed five pounds per each person.

Such grants shall only be made for the benefit of the unions mentioned in the second schedule to this Act, and of such other unions or electoral divisions as may from time to time be settled by the Local Government Board, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant: Provided that such unions are situate wholly or in part in some county specified in the schedule to the public notice issued by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland on the twenty-second day of November one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, that is to say, the counties of Donegal, Clare, Cork (West Riding), Kerry, Galway, Leitrim, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo.

Each grant shall only be made on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, stating that the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied that the guardians of the union are unable, without unduly burdening the ratepayers, to make adequate provision, by borrowing under the powers conferred upon them by this Act, or otherwise, for the emigration purposes of the union, and that proper arrangements have been made for securing the satisfactory emigration of such persons.

The money required for the purpose of grants under this section shall be paid by the Land Commission to the Commissioners of Public Works, and shall be part of the liabilities of the Land Commission, and be a charge primarily upon the Irish Church Temporalities Fund, and, subject thereto, on the Consolidated Fund, in such manner as may be provided by Parliament.

Rules.

21. The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time make provision that arrangements shall be made for securing the satisfactory emigration of persons for whom means of emigration are provided under this Act, by prescribing rules in relation to such matters, and for the employment of special agents for that purpose, and otherwise as he thinks expedient. And any grants made under this Act for emigration purposes shall be applicable to defraying the expenses of such arrangements in such manner as the Lord Lieutenant directs.

Power to appoint an additional member of the Land Commission.

22. In addition to the three persons named as commissioners in the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, the Right Honourable the Viscount Monck is hereby constituted a member of the Irish Land Commission, at a salary of three thousand pounds a year, and for the term of two years from the passing of this Act.

Save as aforesaid, the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, which relate to the members of the Irish Land Commission, other than the Judicial Commissioner, shall apply to the said the Right Honourable the Viscount Monck, and to every person appointed as herein-after provided to a vacancy in his office, as if he had been named in the said Act a member of the Land Commission other than the Judicial Commissioner.

If and so often as during the said term of two years any vacancy occurs in the office of the said the Right Honourable the Viscount Monck by the death, resignation, inability to act, or otherwise, of the said the Right Honourable the Viscount Monck, or any person appointed in his place, Her Majesty may by warrant under the sign manual appoint some fit person to fill such vacancy; but the person so appointed shall only continue in office until the expiration of the said term of two years: Provided, that any act or matter which under the said Act shall be done or performed, or may be done or performed by three Land Commissioners sitting together, shall and may after the passing of this Act be in like manner done or performed by three of the Land Commissioners.

Rules for carrying Act into effect.

23. The Land Commission shall from time to time circulate forms of application and directions as to the mode in which applications are to be made under this Act, and may from time to time make, and when made may rescind, amend, or add to, rules with respect to the following matters, or any of them:

- (1.) The tribunal, whether Land Commission, civil bill court, sub-commission, or member of the Land Commission or a sub-commission by which such applications are to be heard:
- (2.) The mode of making applications under this Act, and the manner in which the tenant shall set out any property or effects of which such tenant may be possessed or entitled to, and which would be applicable to the satisfaction of any arrears of rent, and the conduct of proceedings before any tribunal hearing applications under this Act:
- (3.) The conditions and circumstances on and in which appeals may be had to the Land Commission where applications have not been heard by the Land Commission:
- (4.) The mode in which the expenses of hearing any application under this Act or of any appeal are to be defrayed:
- (5.) The attendance and discharge of duties by the officers of the civil bill courts before the Land Commission and sub-commissions when holding sittings under this Act:
- (6.) The service of notices on persons interested, and any other matter by this Act directed to be prescribed:
- (7.) The mode of collecting, suing for, recovering, and accounting for charges and instalments of charges, and the procedure for the sale of tenancies to raise the amount of such charges, and for dealing with the proceeds of such sales under this Act:

- (8.) As to any other matter or thing, whether similar or not to those above mentioned, in respect of which it may seem to the Land Commission expedient to make rules for the purpose of carrying this Act into effect.

Any rules made in pursuance of this section shall be of the same force as if enacted in this Act, and shall be judicially noticed.

Short title of Act. 24. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Act, 1882.

c. 43, &c. ing such annuities and contracts:

Be it therefore enacted, &c.,

Short title and construction. 1. This Act may be cited as the Government Annuities Act, 1882.

This Act and the Government Annuities Acts, 1829 to 1873, may be cited together as the Government Annuities Acts, 1829 to 1882.

This Act shall be construed as one with the Government Annuities Act, 1864.

The Act of the session of the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter forty-six, intituled "An Act to provide for the investment and appropriation of all moneys received by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of deferred life annuities and payments to be made on death," is in this Act referred to and may be cited as the Government Annuities (Investments) Act, 1864.

Limit of grant of annuities.

2. An annuity granted to any one person under the Government Annuities Acts, 1853 and 1864, as amended by this Act (in this Act referred to as a savings bank annuity), may be of any amount not exceeding one hundred pounds a year.

Any such annuity may be granted to any person not under the age of five years.

Contract for endowments and definition of insurance.

3. The National Debt Commissioners may, subject to the limits in this Act mentioned, contract with any person for a payment to be made on the attainment by such person of a specified age, or sooner in case of his death, and the Government Annuities Acts, 1853 and 1864, as amended by this Act (including the provisions punishing false declaration, forgery, and other offences), shall apply in like manner, so far as is consistent with the tenour thereof, as if such contract were a contract for the payment of a sum of money on death; and a contract with a person under the said Acts as amended by this Act for either any such payment to him as above in this section specified, or for a payment at his death, is in this Act referred to as a savings bank insurance.

Limits of insurance.

4. A savings banks insurance granted to one person may be for any amount not exceeding one hundred pounds.

(2.) A savings banks insurance may be granted to a person not over the age of sixty-five years and not under the age of fourteen years, or if the amount does not exceed five pounds, not under the age of eight years.

Tables for annuities and insurances.

5. (1.) The Treasury may on the passing of this Act cause tables to be constructed for the grant of savings banks annuities and insurances.

(2.) Every such table when approved by the Treasury shall, together with a statement of the rules observed in constructing it, be laid before both Houses of Parliament for not less than thirty days, and if any address is presented to Her Majesty by either House of Parliament praying that such table may be cancelled, the table shall be cancelled without prejudice to the framing of another table in lieu of the table so cancelled.

(3.) After the expiration of the said thirty days the Treasury may cause the table, if not cancelled as above provided, to be published in the London Gazette, and the table shall come into operation on the day of that publication or such later day as may be fixed by the Treasury.

(4.) The tables shall be framed in such manner that the fund formed by the receipt of sums in respect of deferred annuities and of insurances and the amounts paid for immediate annuities shall respectively be adequate (after payment of expenses) to meet all claims without causing any loss to the Exchequer.

(5.) The tables shall be framed so that the payments to obtain the annuities and insurances may be made in one sum or in annual or more frequent instalments, and may be made during life or during a limited period,

(6.) The tables may also provide for such variations in the rates for and conditions of annuities and insurances and such surrender of insurances and such other matters as may seem expedient.

(7.) The Treasury may from time to time cause a new table to be constructed under this Act in lieu of any then existing table, and such table shall be laid before Parliament and be subject to be cancelled and be published in manner above provided by this section.

(8.) All savings banks annuities and insurances shall be granted in accordance with the tables for the time being in force in pursuance of this Act, and upon any new table made under this section coming into operation, any previously existing table in lieu of which such new table is expressed to be made shall, whether made before or after the passing of this Act be revoked without prejudice nevertheless to any annuity or insurance granted in accordance therewith.

(9.) If the fund formed by the receipt of sums in respect of insurances is so much in excess of the liabilities that it is possible to reduce the payments made to obtain insurances, and a new table is made under this section for that purpose, the Treasury may provide for giving to the persons entitled to insurances in force at that time such portion of the surplus of the said fund as seems just in such manner as seems expedient.

Regulations. 6. The regulations made in pursuance of section sixteen of the Government Annuities Act, 1864, shall provide:—

- (a.) For proofs of age, of identity, and state of health, and such other matters as appear necessary or proper for the grant of annuities and insurances, and in the case of an insurance for such sum not exceeding twenty-five pounds as may be fixed by the regulations, for diminishing the amount to be paid to the insured in the event of any regulations as to medical certificates or any other matters having been dispensed with; and
- (b.) For regulating the time and mode of making the payments to obtain savings banks annuities and insurances, whether granted before or after the passing of this Act, and enabling them to be made out of the deposits in a savings bank; and
- (c.) For crediting the accounts of depositors in a savings bank with the sum due in respect of savings bank annuities or insurances granted to them either before or after the passing of this Act, or otherwise for regulating the mode of payment of such annuities or insurances, or of any annuities granted under any Acts repealed by the Government Annuities Act, 1853, and for regulating the receipts to be given for the same; and
- (d.) For cancelling or varying contracts for the grant of annuities and insurances and correcting errors arising on any such grant; and
- (e.) For enabling a person to whom an insurance is granted to nominate a person to whom the money due under such insurance, not exceeding fifty pounds, is to be paid on the death of such person, and for the discharge to be given for such money; and
- (f.) In the case of minors under the age of twenty-one years for the making of contracts, the making of payments to obtain savings bank annuities and insurances out of the deposits in a savings bank, the giving of receipts and the doing of other acts on their behalf; and the contracts and payments so made, the receipts so given, and the acts so done shall be valid and binding on the minor.

The regulations shall also make such provisions as seem to the authority making the same necessary or proper for making payments on the death of children under ten years of age subject to the provisions contained in section twenty-eight of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, in like manner as if c. 60. the same were the payments in that section mentioned.

Regulations may be made, in pursuance of the said section sixteen of the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as amended by this Act, by the National Debt Commissioners, with the approval of the Treasury, so far as regards any annuities and insurances granted by such Commissioners either directly or through any parochial or other society.

Application of Savings Banks Acts.

7. Subject to the provisions of this Act and of the regulations made under the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as amended by this Act, all enactments for the time being in force relating to savings banks, and all regulations made in pursuance of those enactments, shall, so far as is consistent with the tenour thereof, apply for the purposes of this Act, and a person to whom a savings bank annuity or insurance has been granted, either before or after the passing of this Act, shall be deemed for the purpose of those regulations and enactments to be a depositor in a savings bank.

Provided that—

- (a.) for the purpose of the immediate purchase of a savings banks annuity or insurance, a deposit to an amount not exceeding the amount to be paid for such annuity or insurance may be deposited in any one savings bank year, in addition to the maximum amount which otherwise is allowed to be deposited in a savings bank in that year, and
- (b.) in computing the maximum amount of deposit allowable for a depositor in a savings bank, any deposit for the above-mentioned purpose and any sum credited to the account of a depositor in respect of any savings bank annuity or insurance shall not be reckoned, and it shall be lawful to credit the account of a depositor with any such deposit or sum: Provided that if, after such deposit or sum has been credited, the aggregate sum standing to the credit of a depositor exceeds the maximum amount which otherwise is allowed to be deposited in a savings bank, either in any one savings bank year or in the aggregate, such excess shall bear no interest, but shall be forthwith applied to the purpose for which it was deposited, or paid over to the depositor.
- (c.) Nothing in the said Acts or this Act shall exempt any person obtaining or becoming entitled to a savings bank insurance from any probate or stamp duty payable by law.

Trust and joint account.

8. (1.) Notice of any trust express, implied, or constructive affecting any savings bank annuity or insurance (except such trusts as are from time to time recognised by law in relation to deposits in savings banks, and except such trusts as are provided for by section ten of the Married Women's 33 & 34 Vict., Property Act, 1870, or any enactment c. 93. now or hereafter to be passed relating to the property of married women,) shall not be entered upon any contract for such annuity or insurance, or in any deposit book relating thereto, or be receivable by the National Debt Commissioners or any savings bank.

(2.) A savings bank annuity or insurance depending on the life of any person may be granted to that person jointly with any other persons to an amount not exceeding in the whole the amount of the annuity or insurance which could have been granted to one person, and the said persons shall be deemed to be entitled to such annuity and insurance as joint tenants.

(3.) The National Debt Commissioners may permit the transfer of any annuity so granted to more persons than one under such regulations, as to such Commissioners seem fit, so however that the person on whose life such annuity is granted shall be transferee, or one of the transferees, and where it is granted on the joint lives of two or more persons, all of those persons, or such of those persons as the National Debt Commissioners think fit, shall be the transferees or included among the transferees.

Inane or incapacitated grantees.

9. Where any person entitled to a savings bank annuity or insurance is insane or otherwise incapacitated to act, then (subject to the conditions prescribed by the regulations under section sixteen of the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as amended by this Act) payment of such annuity or insurance may be made at such times and in such sums and to such persons as may seem proper, and the receipt of the said persons shall be a good discharge for the same.

Amendment of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 43. ss. 8 and 11. as to surrender of policy or assignment of policy after payment of five years premium.

10. Whereas by the Government Annuities Act, 1864, it is provided that a person who has obtained a savings bank insurance, and has paid the premiums thereon for a period of not less than five years, may (under section eight) surrender his policy or obtain a return in respect of the premiums paid by him (not being less than one-third thereof) or obtain another savings bank insurance or annuity in lieu of such premiums, and (under section eleven) may assign his right and interest in such insurance, and it is expedient to amend the said section: Be it therefore enacted as follows:

A person who has obtained a savings bank insurance, and has paid the premiums thereon for not less than two years, shall have the same right under sections eight and eleven of the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as a person who has paid the premiums for not less than five years, and sections eight and eleven of the said Act shall be construed as if "two years" were therein substituted for "five years," and so much of the said section eight as requires the amount returned to be not less than one-third of the premiums shall be repealed.

Forfeiture by person holding annuity or insurance exceeding the maximum or making false declaration.

11. (1.) If any one person by his own act holds or claims to be entitled to any savings bank annuities or insurances, whether granted before or after the passing of this Act, which exceed in the whole the maximum annuity or insurance allowed by this Act to be granted to any one person, such person shall be liable, in the discretion of the National Debt Commissioners, to forfeit the whole or any part of such annuities or insurances.

(2.) Any person who makes a false declaration in relation to any matter or thing required by the Government Annuities Act, 1853 and 1864, or by this Act, or by the regulations made in pursuance of the said Acts, or any of them, or produces any false declaration or certificate, shall be liable, in the discretion of the National Debt Commissioners, to forfeit the whole or any part of the savings bank annuity or insurance to which such false declaration or certificate related or for the purpose of obtaining which it was made or produced, and all or any part of the money paid for obtaining such annuity or insurance, and the National Debt Commissioners may, in lieu of all or any part of such forfeiture, adjust the contract made by such person so as to be in accordance with what it would have been if such false declaration or certificate had not been made or produced.

(3.) If a person makes any such false declaration as aforesaid knowing the same to be false in any material particular, he shall, in addition to such forfeiture, be liable on conviction to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a period not exceeding twelve months.

Penalty for receiving annuity or insurance in fraud of the Commissioners.

12. (1.) If any person receives any payment in respect of any savings bank annuity after the death of the person at whose death such annuity is to cease, or receives the amount of any insurance payable at the death of a person before the death of that person, he shall be liable to pay to the National Debt Commissioners double the amount of the sum received, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum from the date of the receipt: such sum shall be recoverable in a county court or any other competent court as a debt to Her Majesty.

(2.) If a person receiving any such money as above mentioned receive the same with intent to defraud, he shall, in addition to the above-mentioned payment, be liable on conviction to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a period not exceeding twelve months.

Application and investments of sums paid for savings bank annuities or insurances.

13. (1.) All sums paid in order to obtain savings bank annuities and insurances shall be paid into the bank to the account of the National Debt Commissioners, and there carried to such account or accounts and under such title or titles as the National Debt Commissioners from time to time direct, but such current outgoings as herein-after mentioned may be defrayed thereout, either before or after such payment into the bank, and the application thereof herein-after mentioned shall be subject to such defraying of outgoings.

(2.) The sums paid for immediate annuities shall be forthwith applied in the purchase of government annuities (that is to say), of perpetual bank annuities, terminable annuities, exchequer bills, exchequer bonds, or treasury bills, and the securities so purchased shall be forthwith cancelled, and cease to be charged on the Consolidated Fund.

(3.) All immediate annuities granted under this Act shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund and issued thereout, or out of the growing produce thereof, at such times as the Treasury may from time to time direct with a view to the due payment thereof to the persons entitled thereto.

(4.) The Government Annuities (Investments) Act, 1864, shall apply to all sums paid into the bank as aforesaid, other than amounts applicable for immediate annuities as above provided.

(5.) In the event of any contract for a savings bank annuity or insurance being cancelled or varied in pursuance of this Act, or any error therein corrected, the National Debt Commissioners may vary the charge on the Consolidated Fund, and on the fund created under the Government Annuities (Investments) Act, 1864, in such manner as may be necessary for carrying into effect such cancellation, variation or correction, and the Treasury may, if need be, create new securities in lieu of any securities which have been cancelled, and the securities so created shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund, and payable in like manner, and be subject to the same conditions as the securities which were cancelled.

(6.) The expression "current outgoings" includes all sums payable by the National Debt Commissioners in respect of annuities or insurances from time to time, and also all such expenses of carrying into effect this Act as are payable out of the sums paid by persons to obtain savings bank annuities and insurances.

All expenses incurred by any savings bank in the execution of this Act to such amount as may be from time to time allowed by the National Debt Commissioners (subject to the directions of the Treasury) shall be paid by the National Debt Commissioners, and defrayed by them as part of the expenses of the grant of annuities and insurances.

(7.) The expression "bank" in this section means the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or the Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland, as the case requires.

Definitions. 14. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression "Treasury" means the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury;

The expression "National Debt Commissioners" means the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt;

The expression "trustee savings bank" means a savings bank to which the Trustee Savings Banks Act, 1863, extends; and

The expression "savings bank" means a trustee savings bank and a post office savings bank.

A savings bank year shall be reckoned as the twelve months ending, in the case of a trustee savings bank, on the twentieth day of November, and in the case of a post office savings bank, on the thirty-first day of December.

Repeal of Acts and savings. 15. The Acts specified in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed as from the commencement of this Act to the extent in the third column of that schedule mentioned, without prejudice to anything previously done or suffered in pursuance of any enactment hereby repealed; and every annuity and insurance granted before such commencement shall, save as may otherwise be provided by this Act or by regulations under the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as amended by this Act, have effect as if the said enactment had not been repealed.

Until revoked in pursuance of this Act, the tables in force at the commencement of this Act shall continue in force as if made in pursuance of this Act.

The regulations in force under any enactment repealed by this Act shall continue in force until revoked or superseded by regulations made in pursuance of section sixteen of the Government Annuities Act, 1864, as amended by this Act.

Where, at the passing of this Act, a person has obtained an annuity or insurance through the medium of a post office, and such person has a deposit in a trustee savings bank, nothing contained in this Act or done thereunder shall render such deposit in a trustee savings bank unlawful or prevent such person from making or receiving any payment in respect of such annuity or insurance by means of the post office savings bank.

Extension of Acts to Channel Islands and Isle of Man. 16. The Government Annuities Act, 1853, the Government Annuities Act, 1864, and this Act shall extend to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, and the Royal Courts of the Channel Islands shall register the same accordingly.

BE it enacted, &c.,

Preliminary.

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Artizans Dwellings Act, 1882.

PART I.

Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Acts, 1875 and 1879.

Construction of Part I. of Act. 38 & 39 Vict. c. 36.

2. This part of this Act shall be construed as one with the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Acts, 1875 and 1879, and those Acts together with this part of this Act may be cited together as the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Acts, 1875 to 1882.

Amendment of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 36, s. 6, as to the provision of accommodation for the working classes.

3. Whereas by section five of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, it is provided, amongst other things, that an improvement scheme of a local authority shall provide for the accommodation of at the least as many persons of the working class as may be displaced in the area with respect to which the scheme is proposed in suitable dwellings which, unless there are special reasons to the contrary, shall be situate within the limits of the same area, or in the vicinity thereof:

And whereas by section four of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1879, it is provided that the above requirements of section five of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, may, if the confirming authority so authorise, be complied with by the provision of equally convenient accommodation at some place other than within the area or the immediate vicinity of the area comprised in such scheme:

And whereas it is expedient to make further provision respecting such accommodation: Be it therefore enacted as follows:

Where an improvement scheme of a local authority comprises an area situate in the Metropolis or the City of London, the confirming authority shall, without prejudice to the powers conferred on it by the said fourth section of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1879, be authorised (on the application of the local authority, and on a report being made by the officer conducting the local inquiry directed by the confirming authority that it is expedient having regard to the special circumstances of the locality and to the number of artizans and others belonging to the labouring class dwelling within the area, and being employed within a mile thereof, that a modification should be made) to dispense in the provisional order authorising the scheme altogether with the obligation of the local authority to provide for the accommodation of the persons of the working class who may be displaced by their scheme to such extent as he may think expedient, having regard to such special circumstances as aforesaid, but not exceeding one half of the persons so displaced, and where any such improvement scheme comprises an area situate elsewhere than in the Metropolis or the City of London, it shall, if the confirming authority so require (but it shall not otherwise be obligatory on the local authority so to frame their scheme), provide for the accommodation of such number of those persons of the working class displaced in the area with respect to which the scheme is proposed in suitable dwellings to be erected in such place or places either within or without the limits of the same area as the said authority on a report made by the officer conducting the local inquiry may require.

The twelfth section of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, and any other enactment relating to the requirement of the said Act as to the accommodation of the working classes, shall be construed with reference and subject to the modifications made by this Act.

The power by this section given to the confirming authority to dispense altogether with the obligation of the local authority to provide for the accommodation of the persons of the working class who may be displaced by their scheme to an extent not exceeding one half of the persons so displaced may (in the case of any scheme which has, before the passing of this Act, been authorised by a confirming Act) upon the application of the local authority be exercised by the confirming authority by an order made at any time within twelve months after the passing of this Act.

Amendment of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 36, s. 19 as to the valuation of land.

4. Whereas it is expedient to amend section nineteen of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875: Be it therefore enacted as follows:

In the estimate of the value of the said lands or interests in the said section in that behalf mentioned any addition to or improvement of the property made after the date of the publication of an advertisement in pursuance of section six of the said Act stating the fact of the improvement scheme having been made shall not (unless such addition or improvement was necessary for the maintenance of the property in a proper state of repairs) be included, nor in the case of any interest acquired after the said date shall any separate estimate of the value thereof be made so as to increase the amount of compensation to be paid for the lands, and the words "and all circumstances affecting such value" in the said section are hereby repealed.

Amendment of schedule to 38 & 39 Vict. c. 36.

5. There shall be repealed so much of the schedule to the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, as is comprised under the heading "Proceedings on Arbitration," that is to say, articles numbered (5) to (13) both inclusive, and there shall be substituted therefor the articles contained in the schedule hereto; Provided that such repeal shall not affect anything duly done or suffered under any provision hereby repealed.

Limit of area to be dealt with on official representation.

6. Where an official representation made to the Metropolitan Board of Works in pursuance of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, relates to not more than ten houses, the Metropolitan Board of Works shall not take any proceedings on such representation, but shall direct the officer making the same to report the case to the local authority as defined by the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, and it shall be the duty of the local authority to deal with such case in manner provided by the last-mentioned Act, and the Acts amending the same.

PART II.

Construction of Part II. 31 & 32 Vict. c. 180. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 64.

7. This part of this Act shall be construed as one with the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act (1868), and the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act (1868), Amendment Act, 1879, and those Acts and this part of this Act may be cited together as the Artizans Dwellings Acts, 1868 to 1882.

Power to local authority to purchase houses for opening alleys, &c.

8. (1.) If in any place to which the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, applies the officer of health finds that any building, although not in itself unfit for human habitation is so situate that by reason of its proximity to or contact with any other buildings it causes one of the following effects, that is to say,—

(1) it stops ventilation, or otherwise makes or con-

duces to make such other buildings to be in a condition unfit for human habitation; or

- (2) it prevents proper measures from being carried into effect for remedying the evils complained of in respect of such other buildings, in any such case, the officer of health shall make a report to the local authority in writing of the particulars relating to such first mentioned building (in this Act referred to as "an obstructive building"), stating that in his opinion it is expedient that the obstructive building should be pulled down, and shall deliver the report to the clerk of the local authority.

(2.) The local authority shall refer such report to a surveyor or engineer to report thereon, and to report as to the cost of acquiring the lands on which such obstructive building is erected and of pulling down such building.

(3.) The local authority shall take into consideration the reports of the officer of health and of the surveyor, and if they decide to adopt such reports shall cause copies to be given to the owner of the lands on which the obstructive building stands, with notice of the time and place appointed by the local authority for the consideration thereof; and such owner shall be at liberty to attend and state his objections, and after hearing such objections the local authority shall make an order in writing signed by their clerk either allowing the objections or directing that such obstructive building shall be pulled down, and such order shall be subject to appeal in like manner as an order of the local authority under the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868.

(4.) Where an order of the local authority for pulling down an obstructive building is made under this section and is not appealed against, or if appealed against is confirmed, the local authority shall be deemed to be authorised to purchase the lands on which the obstructive building is erected in like manner as if they had been authorised by a special Act to purchase the same; and for the purpose of such purchase the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement shall be deemed to be incorporated in this Act (subject nevertheless to the provisions of this Act), and for the purpose of those provisions this Act shall be deemed to be the special Act and the local authority to be the promoters of the undertaking, and such lands may be purchased at any time within one year after the date of the order, or if it was appealed against after the date of the confirmation.

(5.) The owner of the lands may within one month after notice to purchase the same is served upon him declare that he desires to retain the site of the obstructive building and undertake either to pull down or to permit the local authority to pull down the obstructive building, and in such case the owner shall retain the site and shall receive compensation from the local authority for the pulling down of the obstructive building.

(6.) The amount of such compensation, and also the amount of any compensation to be paid on the purchase of any lands under this section, shall in case of difference be settled by arbitration in manner provided by section seven of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act (1868) Amendment Act, 1879, as amended by this part of this Act.

(7.) Where the owner retains the site or any part thereof section twenty-three of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, shall apply to such site.

(8.) Where the lands are purchased by the local authority the local authority shall pull down the obstructive building or such part thereof as may be obstructive within the meaning of this section, and keep as an open space the whole site, or such part thereof as may be required to be kept open for the purpose of remedying the evils caused by such obstructive building, and may, with the assent of the confirming authority and upon such terms as such authority thinks expedient, permit such portion of the site to be sold as is not required for the purpose of carrying this section into effect.

Where in the opinion of the arbitrator the demolition of an obstructive building adds to the value of such other buildings as are in that behalf mentioned in this section, the arbitrator shall apportion so much of the compensation to be paid for the demolition of the obstructive building as may be equal to the increase in value of the other buildings amongst such other buildings respectively, and the amount apportioned to each such other building in respect of its increase in value by reason of the demolition of such obstructive building shall be deemed to be private improvement expenses incurred by the local authority in respect of such building, and such local authority may, for the purpose of defraying such expenses, make and levy improvement rates on the occupier of such premises accordingly; and the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, relating to private improvement expenses and to private improvement rates shall, so far as circumstances admit, apply accordingly in the same manner as if such provisions were incorporated in this Act, and the said provisions shall be deemed to extend to the city of London and to the metropolis, and in the construction of the said provisions as respects the city of London the Commissioners of Sewers, and as respects the metropolis the Metropolitan Board of Works, shall be deemed to be the urban authority.

If any dispute arises between the owner or occupier of any building (to which any amount may be apportioned in respect of private improvement expenses) and the arbitrator by whom such apportionment is made, such dispute shall be settled by two justices in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in cases where the compensation claimed in respect of lands does not exceed fifty pounds.

Amendment of 9. Section seven of the Artizans and
a. 7 of
42 & 43 Vict. Labourers Dwellings Act (1868) Amend-
c. 64. ment Act, 1879, shall be construed as if the words "and all circumstances affecting such value" were omitted therefrom.

Expenses of local 10. The expenses of the local authority authority. under this part of this Act shall be defrayed in like manner as expenses incurred in pursueance of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act (1868) Amendment Act, 1879.

Amendment of 11. Whereas by section twelve of the
a. 7 of
42 & 43 Vict. Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act
c. 64. s. 12. as to (1868) Amendment Act, 1879, it is pro-enforcement of Act by provided that in the event of a local authority Metropolitan within the metropolis declining or neglect-Board of Works. ing for the space of three months after receiving a notice from the Metropolitan Board of Works requiring such local authority to put in force the provisions of the said Act in respect of any premises described in such notice, the Metropolitan Board of Works shall have the powers therein mentioned, and it is expedient to amend the said section: Be it therefore enacted as follows:

Where an officer of health in pursuance of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, has reported any premises as unfit for human habitation, or in pursuance of this part of this Act has reported that the pulling down of any obstructive building would be expedient the board of guardians in whose union or parish, or the owner of any property in the neighbourhood of which such premises or buildings are situate, may complain to the Metropolitan Board of Works that the local authority have failed to put in force the provisions of the said Acts in respect of such premises or building, and the Metropolitan Board of Works may, if they think it expedient so to do, thereupon proceed under section twelve of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act (1868) Amendment Act, 1879, and that section shall apply as if it were enacted in this part of this Act and in terms made applicable to the duties of local authorities under this part of this Act.

SCHEDULE.

AMENDMENT OF SCHEDULE TO 38 & 39 VICT. c. 86.

(1.) In lieu of articles eight to thirteen (both inclusive) of the schedule to the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, the following articles shall be substituted; that is to say,

Proceedings on Arbitration.

(a.) Before any arbitrator enters upon any inquiry he shall, in the presence of a justice of the peace, make and subscribe the following declaration; that is to say,

'I A. B. do solemnly and sincerely declare, that I will faithfully and honestly, and to the best of my skill and ability, hear and determine the matters referred to me under the provisions of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875.

'Made and subscribed in the presence of

And such declaration shall be annexed to the award when made; and if any arbitrator, having made such declaration, wilfully act contrary thereto, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

(b.) As soon as an arbitrator has been appointed as aforesaid, the confirming authority shall deliver to him the maps and schedules deposited at their office, and the local authority shall publish once in each of three successive weeks the following particulars:—

- (1.) The appointment of the arbitrator; and
- (2.) The deposit at the office of the local authority of the copies of such maps and schedules as aforesaid, with a description of the situation of such office, and a statement of the time at which such copies may be inspected by any person desirous of inspecting the same.

(c.) In every case in which compensation is payable under the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, by the local authority to any claimant, and which compensation has not been made the subject of agreement (in this Act referred to as "a disputed case"), the arbitrator shall ascertain in such manner as he thinks most convenient the amount of compensation demanded by the claimant, and the amount which the local authority may be willing to pay; and after hearing all such parties interested in each disputed case as may appear before him at a time and place of which notice has been given as in this Act mentioned, he shall proceed to decide on the amount of compensation to which he may consider the claimant to be entitled in each case.

(d.) The arbitrator shall from time to time give notice to the claimants in disputed cases by causing such notice to be published or otherwise in such manner as he thinks advisable, of a time and place at which the difference between the claimants and the local authority in disputed cases as to the amount of compensation to be paid will be decided by the arbitrator.

(e.) After the arbitrator has arrived at a decision on all the disputed cases brought before him he shall make an award under his hand and seal, and such award shall be final, and be binding and conclusive (subject to the provisions concerning an appeal herein-after contained) upon all persons whomsoever, and no such award shall be set aside for irregularity in matter of form.

(f.) Such award as aforesaid shall be deposited at the office of the confirming authority, and a copy thereof shall be deposited at the office of the local authority, and the local authority shall thereupon publish once in each of three successive weeks notice of the deposit having been made at the office of the local authority of a copy of the award, and a further notice requiring all persons claiming to have any right to or interest in the lands (the compensation to be paid in respect of which is ascertained by such award) to deliver to the local authority on or before a day to be named in such notice (such day not being earlier than twenty-one days from the date of the last publication of the notice), a short statement in writing of the nature of such claim, and a short abstract of the title on which the same is founded; and such statement and abstract shall be paid for by the local authority. Such abstract of title, in the case of a person claiming a fee simple interest in the land, shall commence twenty years previous to the date of the claim, except there has been an absolute conveyance on sale within twenty years, and more than ten years, previous to the claim when the abstract shall commence with such conveyance.

(g.) Any person or local authority dissatisfied with the amount of compensation awarded may, where such amount exceeds one thousand pounds, but not otherwise, appeal in manner provided by article twenty-six of the schedule to the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, and that article shall be construed as if one thousand pounds were therein substituted for five hundred pounds.

(h.) The costs, charges, and expenses payable by the local authority under article twenty-eight of the schedule to the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, shall not be payable until the amount has been certified by the confirming authority.

(i.) Notwithstanding anything contained in article twenty-nine of the said schedule, the arbitrator shall not be required to certify the amount of costs incurred by any party in relation to the arbitration in any case where he considers that such costs are not properly payable by the local authority.

[18th August 1882.]

CAP. LVIII.

An Act to amend the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876; and for other purposes. [18th August 1882.]

CAP. LIX.

An Act to reorganise the Educational Endowments of Scotland. [18th August 1882.]

CAP. LX.

An Act to amend and extend the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, relating to Labourers Cottages and Allotments.

[18th August 1882.]

WHEREAS it is expedient to amend and extend the provisions relating to labourers cottages and allotments of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881:

Be it enacted, &c.,

1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Labourers Cottages and Allotments (Ireland) Act, 1882.

2. In this Act the expression "the principal Act" means the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and the several words and expressions to which meanings are assigned by that Act shall have the same respective meanings in this Act unless there be something in the context repugnant thereto

3. Where under section eight of the principal Act the landlord and tenant of any holding have agreed and declared, or shall agree and declare, by writing under their hands, what is the fair rent of the holding, and such agreement and declaration has been or shall be filed in court, the Land Commission may at any time within six months from the passing of this Act, or within twelve months from the date of the filing of such declaration and agreement, whichever shall last happen, order the tenant of such holding for the accommodation of the labourers employed thereon to improve any existing cottage or cottages, or build any new cottage or cottages, or assign to any such cottage an allotment not exceeding half an acre, and may by such order fix the terms as to rent and otherwise on which such accommodation is to be provided, and any such order may be made on the application of the landlord, or of the tenant of the holding, or of any labourer bona fide employed and required for the cultivation thereof.

4. Where an order shall be made under this Act, or has been made or is made under section nineteen of the principal Act, for providing accommodation for the labourers employed on any holding, and such order has not been complied with within six months from the date of such order, or six months from the passing of this Act, whichever shall last happen, the person failing to comply with such order shall be liable thenceforth to a penalty of one pound for every week during which such order is not complied with, and such penalty shall be recoverable in a summary manner before two or more justices in petty sessions in manner provided by the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, upon the complaint of any labourer employed on the holding, and in whose favour such order has been or shall have been made, and the justices shall award such penalty to the guardians of the poor of the union within which the holding is situate to be applied in aid of the poor rate of such union.

5. Any person who has incurred any penalty under the provisions of this Act may apply to the Land Commission for relief from the same, and the Land Commission may relieve him from the whole or part of such penalty on such terms as to compliance with the order and as to costs or otherwise as the Land Commission thinks fit, and such relief may be granted notwithstanding that an order has been made at petty session for the payment of the penalty.

6. This Act and the principal Act shall be read together and construed as one Act.

CAP. LXI.

An Act to codify the law relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques, and Promissory Notes.

[18th August, 1882.]

Be it enacted, &c.,

PART I.

PRELIMINARY.

1. This Act may be cited as the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—

- "Acceptance" means an acceptance completed by delivery or notification.
- "Action" includes counter claim and set off.
- "Banker" includes a body of persons whether incorporated or not who carry on the business of banking.
- "Bankrupt" includes any person whose estate is vested in a trustee or assignee under the law for the time being in force relating to bankruptcy.
- "Bearer" means the person in possession of a bill or note which is payable to bearer.
- "Bill" means bill of exchange, and "note" means promissory note.
- "Delivery" means transfer of possession, actual or constructive, from one person to another.
- "Holder" means the payee or indorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof.
- "Indorsement" means an indorsement completed by delivery.
- "Issue" means the first delivery of a bill or note, complete in form to a person who takes it as a holder.
- "Person" includes a body of persons whether incorporated or not.
- "Value" means valuable consideration.
- "Written" includes printed, and "writing" includes print.

PART II.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Form and Interpretation.

3. (1.) A bill of Exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer.

(2.) An instrument which does not comply with these conditions, or which orders any act to be done in addition to the payment of money, is not a bill of exchange.

(3.) An order to pay out of a particular fund is not unconditional within the meaning of this section; but an unqualified order to pay, coupled with (a) an indication of a particular fund out of which the drawee is to re-imburse himself or a particular account to be debited with the amount, or (b) a statement of the transaction which gives rise to the bill, is unconditional.

(4.) A bill is not invalid by reason—

- (a.) That it is not dated;
- (b.) That it does not specify the value given, or that any value has been given therefor;
- (c.) That it does not specify the place where it is drawn or the place where it is payable.

Inland and foreign bills.

4. (1.) An inland bill is a bill which is or on the face of it purports to be (a) both drawn and payable within the British Islands, or (b) drawn within the British Islands upon some person resident therein. Any other bill is a foreign bill.

For the purposes of this Act "British Islands" mean any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and the islands adjacent to any of them being part of the dominions of Her Majesty.

(2.) Unless the contrary appear on the face of the bill the holder may treat it as an inland bill.

Effect where different parties to bill are the same person.

5. (1.) A bill may be drawn payable to, or to the order of, the drawer; or it may be drawn payable to, or to the order of, the drawee.

(2.) Where in a bill drawer and drawee are the same person, or where the drawee is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity to contract, the holder may treat the instrument, at his option, either as a bill of exchange or as a promissory note.

Address to drawee.

6. (1.) The drawee must be named or otherwise indicated in a bill with reasonable certainty.

(2.) A bill may be addressed to two or more drawees whether they are partners or not, but an order addressed to two drawees in the alternative or to two or more drawees in succession is not a bill of exchange.

Receipt required as to payee.

7. (1.) Where a bill is not payable to bearer, the payee must be named or otherwise indicated therein with reasonable certainty.

(2.) A bill may be made payable to two or more payees jointly or it may be made payable in the alternative to one or two, or one or some of several payees. A bill may also be made payable to the holder of an office for the time being.

(3.) Where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person the bill may be treated as payable to bearer.

What bills are negotiable.

8. (1.) When a bill contains words prohibiting transfer, or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable, it is valid as between the parties thereto, but is not negotiable.

(2.) A negotiable bill may be payable either to order or to bearer.

(3.) A bill is payable to bearer which is expressed to be so payable, or on which the only or last indorsement is an indorsement in blank.

(4.) A bill is payable to order which is expressed to be so payable, or which is expressed to be payable to a particular person, and does not contain words prohibiting transfer or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable.

(5.) Where a bill, either originally or by indorsement, is expressed to be payable to the order of a specified person, and not to him or his order, it is nevertheless payable to him or his order at his option.

Sum payable.

9. (1.) The sum payable by a bill is a sum certain within the meaning of this Act, although it is required to be paid—

- (a.) With interest.
- (b.) By stated instalments.
- (c.) By stated instalments, with a provision that upon default in payment of any instalment the whole shall become due.
- (d.) According to an indicated rate of exchange or according to a rate of exchange to be ascertained as directed by the bill.

(2.) Where the sum payable is expressed in words and also in figures, and there is a discrepancy between the two, the sum denoted by the words is the amount payable.

(3.) Where a bill is expressed to be payable with interest, unless the instrument otherwise provides, interest runs from the date of the bill, and if the bill is undated from the issue thereof.

Bill payable on demand.

10. (1.) A bill is payable on demand—

- (a.) Which is expressed to be payable on demand, or at sight, or on presentation; or
  - (b.) In which no time for payment is expressed.
- (2.) Where a bill is accepted or indorsed when it is overdue, it shall, as regards the acceptor who so accepts, or any indorser who so indorses it, be deemed a bill payable on demand.

Bill payable at a future time.

11. A bill is payable at a determinable future time within the meaning of this Act which is expressed to be payable—

- (1.) At a fixed period after date or sight.
- (2.) On or at a fixed period after the occurrence of a specified event which is certain to happen, though the time of happening may be uncertain.

An instrument expressed to be payable on a contingency is not a bill, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect.

Omission of date in bill payable after date.

12. Where a bill expressed to be payable at a fixed period after date is issued undated, or where the acceptance of a bill payable at a fixed period after sight is undated, any holder may insert therein the true date of issue or acceptance, and the bill shall be payable accordingly.

Provided that (1) where the holder in good faith and by mistake inserts a wrong date, and (2) in every case where a wrong date is inserted, if the bill subsequently comes into the hands of a holder in due course the bill shall not be avoided thereby, but shall operate and be payable as if the date so inserted had been the true date.

Ante-dating and post-dating.

13. (1.) Where a bill or an acceptance or any indorsement on a bill is dated, the date shall, unless the contrary be proved, be deemed to be the true date of the drawing, acceptance, or indorsement, as the case may be.

(2.) A bill is not invalid by reason only that it is ante-dated or post-dated, or that it bears date on a Sunday.

Computation of time of payment.

14. Where a bill is not payable on demand the day on which it falls due is determined as follows:

- (1.) Three days, called days of grace, are, in every case where the bill itself does not otherwise provide, added to the time of payment as fixed by the bill, and the bill is due and payable on the last day of grace: Provided that—

(a.) When the last day of grace falls on Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, or a day appointed by Royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day, the bill is, except in the case hereinafter provided for, due and payable on the preceding business day;

(b.) When the last day of grace is a bank holiday (other than Christmas Day or Good Friday) under the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, and Acts amending or extending it, or when the last day of grace is a Sunday and the second day of grace is a Bank Holiday, the bill is due and payable on the succeeding business day.

34 & 35 Vict.
c. 17.

- (2.) Where a bill is payable at a fixed period after date, after sight, or after the happening of a specified event, the time of payment is determined by excluding the day from which the time is to begin to run and by including the day of payment.
- (3.) Where a bill is payable at a fixed period after sight the time begins to run from the date of the acceptance if the bill be accepted, and from the date of noting or protest if the bill be noted or protested for non-acceptance, or for non-delivery.
- (4.) The term "month" in a bill means calendar month.

Case of need. 15. The drawer of a bill and any indorser may insert therein the name of a person to whom the holder may resort in case of need, that is to say, in case the bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment. Such person is called the referee in case of need. It is in the option of the holder to resort to the referee in case of need or not as he may think fit.

Optional stipulations by drawer or indorser. 16. The drawer of a bill, and any indorser, may insert therein an express stipulation—

- (1.) Negating or limiting his own liability to the holder;
- (2.) Waiving as regards himself some or all of the holder's duties.

Definition and requisites of acceptance. 17. (1.) The acceptance of a bill is the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer.

(2.) An acceptance is invalid unless it complies with the following conditions, namely:

- (a.) It must be written on the bill and be signed by the drawee. The mere signature of the drawee without additional words is sufficient.
- (b.) It must not express that the drawee will perform his promise by any other means than the payment of money.

Time for acceptance. 18. A bill may be accepted.

(1.) Before it has been signed by the drawer, or while otherwise incomplete:

- (2.) When it is overdue, or after it has been dishonoured by a previous refusal to accept, or by non-payment;
- (3.) When a bill payable after sight is dishonoured by non-acceptance, and the drawee subsequently accepts it, the holder in the absence of any different agreement, is entitled to have the bill accepted as of the date of first presentment to the drawee for acceptance.

General and qualified acceptances. 19. (1.) An acceptance is either (a) general or (b) qualified.

(2.) A general acceptance assents without qualification to the order of the drawer. A qualified acceptance in express terms varies the effect of the bill as drawn.

In particular an acceptance is qualified which is—

- (a.) conditional, that is to say, which makes payment by the acceptor dependent on the fulfilment of a condition therein stated:

(b.) partial, that is to say, an acceptance to pay part only of the amount for which the bill is drawn:

(c.) local, that is to say, an acceptance to pay only at a particular specified place:

An acceptance to pay at a particular place is a general acceptance, unless it expressly states that the bill is to be paid there only and not elsewhere:

(d.) qualified as to time:

(e.) the acceptance of some one or more of the drawees, but not of all.

Inchoate instruments. 20. (1.) Where a simple signature on a blank stamped paper is delivered by the signer in order that it may be converted into a bill, it operates as a prima facie authority to fill it up as a complete bill for any amount the stamp will cover, using the signature for that of the drawer, or the acceptor, or an indorser; and, in like manner, when a bill is wanting in any material particular, the person in possession of it has a prima facie authority to fill up the omission in any way he thinks fit.

(2.) In order that any such instrument when completed may be enforceable against any person who became a party thereto prior to its completion, it must be filled up within a reasonable time, and strictly in accordance with the authority given. Reasonable time for this purpose is a question of fact.

Provided that if any such instrument after completion is negotiated to a holder in due course it shall be valid and effectual for all purposes in his hands, and he may enforce it as if it had been filled up within a reasonable time and strictly in accordance with the authority given.

Delivery. 21. (1.) Every contract on a bill, whether it be the drawer's, the acceptor's, or an indorser, is incomplete and revocable, until delivery of the instrument in order to give effect thereto.

Provided that where an acceptance is written on a bill, and the drawee gives notice to or according to the directions of the person entitled to the bill that he has accepted it, the acceptance then becomes complete and irrevocable.

(2.) As between immediate parties, and as regards a remote party other than a holder in due course, the delivery—

(a.) in order to be effectual must be made either by or under the authority of the party drawing, accepting, or indorsing, as the case may be:

(b.) may be shown to have been conditional or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the bill.

But if the bill be in the hands of a holder in due course a valid delivery of the bill by all parties prior to him so as to make them liable to him is conclusively presumed.

(3.) Where a bill is no longer in the possession of a party who has signed it as drawer, acceptor, or indorser, a valid and unconditional delivery by him is presumed until the contrary is proved.

Capacity and Authority of Parties.

Capacity of parties. 22. (1.) Capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill is co-extensive with capacity to contract.

Provided that nothing in this section shall enable a corporation to make itself liable as drawer, acceptor, or indorser of a bill unless it is competent to it so to do under the law for the time being in force relating to corporations.

(2.) Where a bill is drawn or indorsed by an infant, minor, or corporation having no capacity or power to incur liability on a bill, the drawing or indorsement entitles the holder to receive payment of the bill, and to enforce it against any other party thereto.

Signature essential to liability.

23. No person is liable as drawer, indorser, or acceptor of a bill who has not signed it as such: Provided that
- (1.) Where a person signs a bill in a trade or assumed name, he is liable thereon as if he had signed it in his own name:
  - (2.) The signature of the name of a firm is equivalent to the signature by the person so signing of the names of all persons liable as partners in that firm.

Forged or unauthorised signature.

24. Subject to the provisions of this Act, where a signature on a bill is forged or placed thereon without the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be, the forged or unauthorised signature is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the bill or to give a discharge therefor or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto can be acquired through or under that signature, unless the party against whom it is sought to retain or enforce payment of the bill is precluded from setting up the forgery or want of authority.

Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the ratification of an unauthorised signature not amounting to a forgery.

Procurator signatures.

25. A signature by procurator operates as notice that the agent has but a limited authority to sign, and the principal is only bound by such signature if the agent in so signing was acting within the actual limits of his authority.

Person signing as agent or in representative capacity.

26. (1.) Where a person signs a bill as drawer, indorser, or acceptor, and adds words to his signature, indicating that he signs for or on behalf of a principal, or in a representative character, he is not personally liable thereon; but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent, or as filling a representative character, does not exempt him from personal liability.

(2.) In determining whether a signature on a bill is that of the principal or that of the agent by whose hand it is written, the construction most favourable to the validity of the instrument shall be adopted.

The Consideration for a Bill.

Value and holder for value.

27. (1.) Valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by,—

- (a.) Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract;
- (b.) An antecedent debt or liability. Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time.

(2.) Where value has at any time been given for a bill the holder is deemed to be a holder for value as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill who became parties prior to such time.

(3.) Where the holder of a bill has a lien on it, arising either from contract or by implication of law, he is deemed to be a holder for value to the extent of the sum for which he has a lien.

Accommodation bill or party.

28. (1.) An accommodation party to a bill is a person who has signed a bill as drawer, acceptor, or indorser, without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person.

(2.) An accommodation party is liable on the bill to a holder for value; and it is immaterial whether, when such holder took the bill, he knew such party to be an accommodation party or not.

Holder in due course.

29. (1.) A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions; namely,

- (a.) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact:
- (b.) That he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it.

(2.) In particular the title of a person who negotiates a bill is defective within the meaning of this Act when he obtained the bill, or the acceptance thereof, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud.

(3.) A holder (whether for value or not), who derives his title to a bill through a holder in due course, and who is not himself a party to any fraud or illegality affecting it, has all the rights of that holder in due course as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill prior to that holder.

Presumption of value and good faith.

30. (1.) Every party whose signature appears on a bill is prima facie deemed to have become a party thereto for value.

(2.) Every holder of a bill is prima facie deemed to be a holder in due course; but if in an action on a bill it is admitted or proved that the acceptance, issue, or subsequent negotiation of the bill is affected with fraud, duress, or force and fear, or illegality, the burden of proof is shifted, unless and until the holder proves that, subsequent to the alleged fraud or illegality, value has in good faith been given for the bill.

Negotiation of Bills.

Negotiation of bill.

31. (1.) A bill is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such a manner as to constitute the transferee the holder of the bill.

(2.) A bill payable to bearer is negotiated by delivery.

(3.) A bill payable to order is negotiated by the indorsement of the holder completed by delivery.

(4.) Where the holder of a bill payable to his order transfers it for value without indorsing it, the transfer gives the transferee such title as the transferor had in the bill, and the transferee in addition acquires the right to have the indorsement of the transferor.

(5.) Where any person is under obligation to indorse a bill in a representative capacity, he may indorse the bill in such terms as to negative personal liability.

Requisites of a valid indorsement.

32. An indorsement in order to operate as a negotiation must comply with the following conditions, namely:—

(1.) It must be written on the bill itself and be signed by the indorser. The simple signature of the indorser on the bill, without additional words, is sufficient.

An indorsement written on an allonge, or on a "copy" of a bill issued or negotiated in a country where "copies" are recognised, is deemed to be written on the bill itself.

(2.) It must be an indorsement of the entire bill. A partial indorsement, that is to say, an indorsement which purports to transfer to the indorsee a part only of the amount payable, or which purports to transfer the bill to two or more indorsees severally, does not operate as a negotiation of the bill.

- (3.) Where a bill is payable to the order of two or more payees or indorsees who are not partners all must indorse, unless the one indorsing has authority to indorse for the others.
- (4.) Where, in a bill payable to order, the payee or indorsee is wrongly designated, or his name is misspelt, he may indorse the bill as therein described, adding, if he think fit, his proper signature.
- (5.) Where there are two or more indorsements, on a bill, each indorsement is deemed to have been made in the order in which it appears on the bill, until the contrary is proved.
- (6.) An indorsement may be made in blank or special. It may also contain terms making it restrictive.

Conditional Indorsement.

33. Where a bill purports to be indorsed conditionally the condition may be disregarded by the payer, and payment to the indorsee is valid whether the condition has been fulfilled or not.

Indorsement in blank and special indorsement.

34. (1.) An indorsement in blank specifies no indorsee, and a bill so indorsed becomes payable to bearer.

(2.) A special indorsement specifies the person to whom, or to whose order, the bill is to be payable.

(3.) The provisions of this Act relating to a payee apply with the necessary modifications to an indorsee under a special indorsement.

(4.) When a bill has been indorsed in blank, any holder may convert the blank indorsement into a special indorsement by writing above the indorser's signature a direction to pay the bill to or to the order of himself or some other person.

Restrictive indorsement

35. (1.) An indorsement is restrictive which prohibits the further negotiation of the bill or which expresses that it is a mere authority to deal with the bill as thereby directed and not a transfer of the ownership thereof, as, for example, if a bill be indorsed "Pay D. only," or "Pay D. for the account of X.," or "Pay D. or order for collection."

(2.) A restrictive indorsement gives the indorsee the right to receive payment of the bill and to sue any party thereto that his indorser could have sued, but gives him no power to transfer his rights as indorsee unless it expressly authorise him to do so.

(3.) Where a restrictive indorsement authorises further transfer, all subsequent indorsees take the bill with the same rights and subject to the same liabilities as the first indorsee under the restrictive indorsement.

Negotiation of overdue or dishonoured bill.

36. (1.) Where a bill is negotiable in its origin it continues to be negotiable until it has been (a) restrictively indorsed, or (b) discharged by payment or otherwise.

(2.) Where an overdue bill is negotiated, it can only be negotiated subject to any defect of title affecting it at its maturity, and thenceforward no person who takes it can acquire or give a better title than that which the person from whom he took it had.

(3.) A bill payable on demand is deemed to be overdue within the meaning and for the purposes of this section, when it appears on the face of it to have been in circulation for an unreasonable length of time. What is an unreasonable length of time for this purpose is a question of fact.

(4.) Except where an indorsement bears date after the maturity of the bill, every negotiation is prima facie deemed to have been effected before the bill was overdue.

(5.) Where a bill which is not overdue has been dishonoured any person who takes it with notice of the dishonour takes it subject to any defect of title attaching thereto at the time of dishonour, but nothing in this sub-section shall affect the rights of a holder in due course.

Negotiation of bill to party already liable thereon.

37. Where a bill is negotiated back to the drawer, or to a prior indorser or to the acceptor, such party may, subject to the provisions of this Act, re-issue and further negotiate the bill, but he is not entitled to enforce payment of the bill against any intervening party to whom he was previously liable.

Rights of the holder.

38. The rights and powers of the holder of a bill are as follows:

- (1.) He may sue on the bill in his own name:
- (2.) Where he is a holder in due course, he holds the bill free from any defect of title of prior parties, as well as from mere personal defences available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment against all parties liable on the bill:
- (3.) Where his title is defective (a) if he negotiates the bill to a holder in due course, that holder obtains a good and complete title to the bill, and (b) if he obtains payment of the bill the person who pays him in due course gets a valid discharge for the bill.

General Duties of the Holder.*When presentment for acceptance is necessary.

39. (1.) Where a bill is payable after sight, presentment for acceptance is necessary in order to fix the maturity of the instrument.

(2.) Where a bill expressly stipulates that it shall be presented for acceptance, or where a bill is drawn payable elsewhere than at the residence or place of business of the drawee it must be presented for acceptance before it can be presented for payment.

(3.) In no other case is presentment for acceptance necessary in order to render liable any party to the bill.

(4.) Where the holder of a bill, drawn payable elsewhere than at the place of business or residence of the drawee, has not time, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, to present the bill for acceptance before presenting it for payment on the day that it falls due, the delay caused by presenting the bill for acceptance before presenting it for payment is excused, and does not discharge the drawer and indorsers.

Time for presenting bill payable after sight.

40. (1.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill payable after sight is negotiated, the holder must either present it for acceptance or negotiate it within a reasonable time.

(2.) If he do not do so, the drawer and all indorsers prior to that holder are discharged.

(3.) In determining what is a reasonable time within the meaning of this section, regard shall be had to the nature of the bill, the usage of trade with respect to similar bills, and the facts of the particular case.

Rules as to presentment for acceptance, and excuses for non-presentment.

41. (1.) A bill is duly presented for acceptance which is presented in accordance with the following rules:

- (a) The presentment must be made by or on behalf of the holder to the drawee or to some person authorised to accept or refuse acceptance on his behalf at a reasonable hour on a business day and before the bill is overdue:
- (b) Where a bill is addressed to two or more drawees, who are not partners, presentment must be made to them all, unless one has authority to accept for all, then presentment may be made to him only:

- (c) Where the drawee is dead presentment may be made to his personal representative:
- (d) Where the drawee is bankrupt, presentment may be made to him or to his trustee:
- (e) Where authorised by agreement or usage, a presentment through the post office is sufficient.
- (2.) Presentment in accordance with these rules is excused, and a bill may be treated as dishonoured by non-acceptance—
- (a) Where the drawee is dead or bankrupt, or is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity or contract by bill:
- (b) Where, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, such presentment cannot be effected:
- (c) Where although the presentment has been irregular, acceptance has been refused on some other ground.
- (3) The fact that the holder has reason to believe that the bill, on presentment, will be dishonoured does not excuse presentment.

Non-acceptance. 42. (1.) When a bill is duly presented for acceptance and is not accepted within the customary time, the person presenting it must treat it as dishonoured by non-acceptance. If he do not, the holder shall lose his right of recourse against the drawer and indorsers.

Dishonour by non-acceptance and its consequences. 43. (1.) A bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance—

- (a) when it is duly presented for acceptance, and such an acceptance as is prescribed by this Act is refused or cannot be obtained; or
- (b) when presentment for acceptance is excused and the bill is not accepted.

(2.) Subject to the provisions of this Act when a bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance, an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and indorsers accrues to the holder, and no presentment for payment is necessary.

Duties as to qualified acceptance. 44. (1.) The holder of a bill may refuse to take a qualified acceptance, and if he does not obtain an unqualified acceptance may treat the bill as dishonoured by non-acceptance.

(2.) Where a qualified acceptance is taken, and the drawer or an indorser has not expressly or impliedly authorised the holder to take a qualified acceptance, or does not subsequently assent thereto, such drawer or indorser is discharged from his liability on the bill.

The provisions of this sub-section do not apply to a partial acceptance, whereof due notice has been given. Where a foreign bill has been accepted as to part, it must be protested as to the balance.

(3.) When the drawer or indorser of a bill receives notice of a qualified acceptance, and does not within a reasonable time express his dissent to the holder he shall be deemed to have assented thereto.

Rules as to presentment for payment. 45. Subject to the provisions of this Act a bill must be duly presented for payment. If it be not so presented the drawer and indorsers shall be discharged.

A bill is duly presented for payment which is presented in accordance with the following rules:—

- (1.) Where the bill is not payable on demand, presentment must be made on the day it falls due.
- (2.) Where the bill is payable on demand, then, subject to the provisions of this Act, presentment must be made within a reasonable time after its issue in order to render the drawer liable, and within a reasonable time after its indorsement, in order to render the indorser liable.

In determining what is a reasonable time, regard shall be had to the nature of the bill, the usage of trade with regard to similar bills, and the facts of the particular case.

- (3.) Presentment must be made by the holder or by some person authorised to receive payment on his behalf at a reasonable hour on a business day, at the proper place as herein-after defined; either to the person designated by the bill as payer, or to some person authorised to pay or refuse payment on his behalf if with the exercise of reasonable diligence such person can there be found.
- (4.) A bill is presented at the proper place:—
- (a.) Where a place of payment is specified in the bill and the bill is there presented.
- (b.) Where no place of payment is specified, but the address of the drawee or acceptor is given in the bill, and the bill is there presented.
- (c.) Where no place of payment is specified and no address given, and the bill is presented at the drawee's or acceptor's place of business if known, and if not, at his ordinary residence if known.
- (d.) In any other case if presented to the drawee or acceptor wherever he can be found, or if presented at his last known place of business or residence.
- (5.) Where a bill is presented at the proper place, and after the exercise of reasonable diligence no person authorised to pay or refuse payment can be found there, no further presentment to the drawee or acceptor is required.
- (6.) Where a bill is drawn upon, or accepted by two or more persons who are not partners, and no place of payment is specified, presentment must be made to them all.
- (7.) Where the drawee or acceptor of a bill is dead, and no place of payment is specified, presentment must be made to a personal representative, if such there be, and with the exercise of reasonable diligence he can be found.
- (8.) Where authorised by agreement or usage a presentment through the post office is sufficient.

Excuses for delay or non-presentment for payment. 46. (1.) Delay in making presentment for payment is excused when the delay is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the holder, and not imputable to his default, misconduct, or negligence. When the cause of delay ceases to operate presentment must be made with reasonable diligence.

- (2.) Presentment for payment is dispensed with,—
- (a.) Where, after the exercise of reasonable diligence presentment, as required by this Act, cannot be effected.

The fact that the holder has reason to believe that the bill will, on presentment, be dishonoured, does not dispense with the necessity for presentment.

- (b.) Where the drawee is a fictitious person.
- (c.) As regards the drawer where the drawee or acceptor is not bound, as between himself and the drawer, to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented.
- (d.) As regards an indorser, where the bill was accepted or made for the accommodation of that indorser, and he has no reason to expect that the bill would be paid if presented.
- (e.) By waiver of presentment, express or implied.

Dishonour by non-payment. 47. (1.) A bill is dishonoured by non-payment (a) when it is duly presented for payment and payment is refused or cannot be obtained, or (b) when presentment is excused and the bill is overdue and unpaid.

(2.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill is dishonoured by non-payment, an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and indorsers accrues to the holder.

Notice of dishonour and effect of non-notice.

48. Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or by non-payment, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer and each indorser, and any drawer or indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged; Provided that—

(1.) Where a bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance, and notice of dishonour is not given, the rights of a holder in due course subsequent to the omission, shall not be prejudiced by the omission.

(2.) Where a bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance and due notice of dishonour is given, it shall not be necessary to give notice of a subsequent dishonour by non-payment unless the bill shall in the meantime have been accepted.

Rules as to notice of dishonour.

49. Notice of dishonour in order to be valid and effectual must be given in accordance with the following rules:—

- (1.) The notice must be given by or on behalf of the holder, or by or on behalf of an indorser who, at the time of giving it, is himself liable on the bill.
- (2.) Notice of dishonour may be given by an agent either in his own name, or in the name of any party entitled to give notice whether that party be his principal or not.
- (3.) Where the notice is given by or on behalf of the holder, it ensures for the benefit of all subsequent holders and all prior indorsers who have a right of recourse against the party to whom it is given.
- (4.) Where notice is given by or on behalf of an indorser entitled to give notice as herein-before provided, it ensures for the benefit of the holder and all indorsers subsequent to the party to whom notice is given.
- (5.) The notice may be given in writing or by personal communication, and may be given in any terms which sufficiently identify the bill, and intimate that the bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment.
- (6.) The return of a dishonoured bill to the drawer or an indorser is, in point of form, deemed a sufficient notice of dishonour.
- (7.) A written notice need not be signed, and an insufficient written notice may be supplemented and validated by verbal communication. A misdescription of the bill shall not vitiate the notice unless the party to whom the notice is given is in fact misled thereby.
- (8.) Where notice of dishonour is required to be given to any person, it may be given either to the party himself, or to his agent in that behalf.
- (9.) Where the drawer or indorser is dead, and the party giving notice knows it, the notice must be given to a personal representative if such there be, and with the exercise of reasonable diligence he can be found.
- (10.) Where the drawer or indorser is bankrupt, notice may be given either to the party himself or to the trustee.
- (11.) Where there are two or more drawers or indorsers who are not partners, notice must be given to each of them, unless one of them has authority to receive such notice for the others.
- (12.) The notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter.

In the absence of special circumstances notice is not deemed to have been given within a reasonable time, unless—

- (a.) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in the same place, the notice is given or sent off in time to reach the latter on the day after the dishonour of the bill.
  - (b.) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, and if there be no such post on that day then by the next post thereafter.
- (13.) Where a bill when dishonoured is in the hands of an agent, he may either himself give notice to the parties liable on the bill, or he may give notice to his principal. If he give notice to his principal, he must do so within the same time as if he were the holder, and the principal upon receipt of such notice has himself the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder.
- (14.) Where a party to a bill receives due notice of dishonour, he has after the receipt of such notice the same period of time for giving notice to antecedent parties that the holder has after the dishonour.
- (15.) Where a notice of dishonour is duly addressed and posted, the sender is deemed to have given due notice of dishonour, notwithstanding any miscarriage by the post office.

Excuses for non-notice and delay.

50. (1.) Delay in giving notice of dishonour is excused where the delay is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the party giving notice, and not imputable to his default, misconduct, or negligence. When the cause of delay ceases to operate the notice must be given with reasonable diligence.

- (2.) Notice of dishonour is dispensed with—
- (a.) When, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, notice as required by this Act cannot be given to or does not reach the drawer or indorser sought to be charged;
  - (b.) By waiver express or implied. Notice of dishonour may be waived before the time of giving notice has arrived, or after the omission to give due notice;
  - (c.) As regards the drawer in the following cases, namely, (1) where drawer and drawee are the same person, (2) where the drawee is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity to contract, (3) where the drawer is the person to whom the bill is presented for payment, (4) where the drawee or acceptor is as between himself and the drawer under no obligation to accept or pay the bill, (5) where the drawer has countermanded payment;
  - (d.) As regards the indorser in the following cases, namely, (1) where the drawee is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity to contract and the indorser was aware of the fact at the time he indorsed the bill, (2) where the indorser is the person to whom the bill is presented for payment, (3) where the bill was accepted or made for his accommodation.

Noting or protest of bill.

51. (1.) Where an inland bill has been dishonoured it may, if the holder think fit, be noted for non-acceptance or non-payment, as the case may be; but it shall not be necessary to note or protest any such bill in order to preserve the recourse against the drawer or indorser.

(2.) Where a foreign bill, appearing on the face of it to be such, has been dishonoured by non-acceptance it must be duly protested for non-acceptance, and where such a bill, which has not been previously dishonoured by non-acceptance, is dishonoured by non-payment it must be duly protested for non-payment. If it be not so protested the drawer and indorsers are discharged. Where a bill does not appear on the face of it to be a foreign bill, protest thereof in case of dishonour is unnecessary.

(3.) A bill which has been protested for non-acceptance may be subsequently protested for non-payment.

(4.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, when a bill is noted or protested, it must be noted on the day of its dishonour. When a bill has been duly noted, the protest may be subsequently extended as of the date of the noting.

(5.) Where the acceptor of a bill becomes bankrupt or insolvent or suspends payment before it matures, the holder may cause the bill to be protested for better security against the drawer and indorsers.

(6.) A bill must be protested at the place where it is dishonoured: Provided that—

(a.) When a bill is presented through the post office, and returned by post dishonoured, it may be protested at the place to which it is returned and on the day of its return if received during business hours, and if not received during business hours, then not later than the next business day;

(b.) When a bill drawn payable at the place of business or residence of some person other than the drawee, has been dishonoured by non-acceptance, it must be protested for non-payment at the place where it is expressed to be payable, and no further presentment for payment to, or demand on, the drawee is necessary.

(7.) A protest must contain a copy of the bill, and must be signed by the notary making it, and must specify—

(a.) The person at whose request the bill is protested :

(b.) The place and date of protest, the cause or reason for protesting the bill, the demand made, and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found.

(8.) Where a bill is lost or destroyed, or is wrongly detained from the person entitled to hold it, protest may be made on a copy or written particulars thereof.

(9.) Protest is dispensed with by any circumstance which would dispense with notice of dishonour. Delay in noting or protesting is excused when the delay is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the holder, and not imputable to his default, misconduct, or negligence. When the cause of delay ceases to operate the bill must be noted or protested with reasonable diligence.

Duties of holder as regards drawee or acceptor. 52. (1.) When a bill is accepted generally presentment for payment is not necessary in order to render the acceptor liable.

(2.) When by the terms of a qualified acceptance presentment for payment is required, the acceptor, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, is not discharged by the omission to present the bill for payment on the day that it matures.

(3.) In order to render the acceptor of a bill liable it is not necessary to protest it, or that notice of dishonour should be given to him.

(4.) Where the holder of a bill presents it for payment, he shall exhibit the bill to the person from whom he demands payment, and when a bill is paid the holder shall forthwith deliver it up to the party paying it.

Liabilities of Parties.

Funds in hands of drawee. 53. (1.) A bill, of itself, does not operate as an assignment of funds in the hands of the drawee available for the payment thereof, and the drawee of a bill who does not accept as required by this Act is not liable on the instrument. This subsection shall not extend to Scotland.

(2.) In Scotland, where the drawee of a bill has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof, the bill operates as an assignment of the sum for which it is drawn in favour of the holder, from the time when the bill is presented to the drawee.

Liability of acceptor. 54. The acceptor of a bill, by accepting it—

(1.) Engages that he will pay it according to the tenor of his acceptance :

(2.) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course :

(a.) The existence of the drawer, the genuineness of his signature, and his capacity and authority to draw the bill ;

(b.) In the case of a bill payable to drawer's order, the then capacity of the drawer to indorse, but not the genuineness or validity of his indorsement ;

(c.) In the case of a bill payable to the order of a third person, the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse, but not the genuineness or validity of his indorsement.

Liability of drawer or indorser. 55. (1.) The drawer of a bill by drawing it—

(a.) Engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or any indorser who is compelled to pay, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken ;

(b.) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse.

(2.) The indorser of a bill by indorsing it—

(a.) Engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or a subsequent indorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken ;

(b.) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature and all previous indorsements ;

(c.) Is precluded from denying to his immediate or a subsequent indorsee that the bill was at the time of his indorsement a valid and subsisting bill, and that he had then a good title thereto.

Stranger signing bill liable as indorser. 56. Where a person signs a bill otherwise than as drawer or acceptor, he thereby incurs the liabilities of an indorser to a holder in due course.

Measure of damages against parties to dishonoured bill. 57. Where a bill is dishonoured, the measure of damages, which shall be deemed to be liquidated damages, shall be as follows :

(1.) The holder may recover from any party liable on the bill, and the drawer who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from the acceptor, and an indorser who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from the acceptor or from the drawer, or from a prior indorser—

(a.) The amount of the bill :

- (b.) Interest thereon from the time of presentment for payment if the bill is payable on demand, and from the maturity of the bill in any other case:
- (c.) The expenses of noting, or, when protest is necessary, and the protest has been extended, the expenses of protest.
- (2.) In the case of a bill which has been dishonoured abroad, in lieu of the above damages, the holder may recover from the drawer or an indorser, and the drawer or an indorser who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from any party liable to him, the amount of the re-exchange with interest thereon until the time of payment.
- (3.) Where by this Act interest may be recovered as damages, such interest may, if justice require it, be withheld wholly or in part, and where a bill is expressed to be payable with interest at a given rate, interest as damages may or may not be given at the same rate as interest proper.

Transferor by delivery and transferee.

58. (1.) Where the holder of a bill payable to bearer negotiates it by delivery without indorsing it, he is called a "transferor by delivery."

(2.) A transferor by delivery is not liable on the instrument.

(3.) A transferor by delivery who negotiates a bill thereby warrants to his immediate transferee being a holder for value that the bill is what it purports to be, that he has a right to transfer it, and that at the time of transfer he is not aware of any fact which renders it valueless.

Discharge of Bill.

Payment in due course. 59. (1.) A bill is discharged by payment in due course by or on behalf of the drawee or acceptor.

"Payment in due course" means payment made at or after the maturity of the bill to the holder thereof in good faith and without notice that his title to the bill is defective.

(2.) Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, when a bill is paid by the drawer or an indorser it is not discharged; but

(a.) Where a bill payable to, or to the order of, a third party is paid by the drawer, the drawer may enforce payment thereof against the acceptor, but may not re-issue the bill.

(b.) Where a bill is paid by an indorser, or where a bill payable to drawer's order is paid by the drawer, the party paying it is remitted to his former rights as regards the acceptor or antecedent parties, and he may, if he thinks fit, strike out his own and subsequent indorsements, and again negotiate the bill.

(3.) Where an accommodation bill is paid in due course by the party accommodated the bill is discharged.

Banker paying demand draft whereon indorsement is forged.

60. When a bill payable to order on demand is drawn on a banker, and the banker on whom it is drawn pays the bill in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, it is not incumbent on the banker to show that the indorsement of the payee or any subsequent indorsement was made by or under the authority of the person whose indorsement it purports to be, and the banker is deemed to have paid the bill in due course, although such indorsement has been forged or made without authority.

Accepter the holder at maturity.

61. When the acceptor of a bill is or becomes the holder of it at or after its maturity, in his own right, the bill is discharged.

Express waiver.

62. (1.) When the holder of a bill at or after its maturity absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor the bill is discharged.

The renunciation must be in writing, unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor.

(2.) The liabilities of any party to a bill may in like manner be renounced by the holder before, at, or after its maturity; but nothing in this section shall affect the rights of a holder in due course without notice of the renunciation.

Cancellation.

63. (1.) Where a bill is intentionally cancelled by the holder or his agent, and the cancellation is apparent thereon, the bill is discharged.

(2.) In like manner any party liable on a bill may be discharged by the intentional cancellation of his signature by the holder or his agent. In such case any indorser who would have had a right of recourse against the party whose signature is cancelled, is also discharged.

(3.) A cancellation made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder is inoperative; but where a bill or any signature thereon appears to have been cancelled the burden of proof lies on the party, who alleges that the cancellation was made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without authority.

Alteration of bill.

64. (1.) Where a bill or acceptance is materially altered without the assent of all parties liable on the bill, the bill is avoided except as against a party who has himself made, authorised, or assented to the alteration, and subsequent indorsers.

Provided that,

Where a bill has been materially altered, but the alteration is not apparent, and the bill is in the hands of a holder in due course, such holder may avail himself of the bill as if it had not been altered, and may enforce payment of it according to its original tenor.

(2.) In particular the following alterations are material, namely, any alteration of the date, the sum payable, the time of payment, the place of payment, and, where a bill has been accepted generally, the addition of a place of payment without the acceptor's assent.

Acceptance and Payment for Honour.

Acceptance for honour supra protest.

65. (1.) Where a bill of exchange has been protested for dishonour by non-acceptance, or protested for better security, and is not overdue, any person, not being a party already liable thereon, may, with the consent of the holder, intervene and accept the bill supra protest, for the honour of any party liable thereon, or for the honour of the person for whose account the bill is drawn.

(2.) A bill may be accepted for honour for part only of the sum for which it is drawn.

(3.) An acceptance for honour supra protest in order to be valid must—

(a.) be written on the bill, and indicate that it is an acceptance for honour:

(b.) be signed by the acceptor for honour:

(4.) Where an acceptance for honour does not expressly state for whose honour it is made, it is deemed to be an acceptance for the honour of the drawer.

(5.) Where a bill payable after sight is accepted for honour, its maturity is calculated from the date of the noting for non-acceptance, and not from the date of the acceptance for honour.

Liability of acceptor for honour.

66. (1.) The acceptor for honour of a bill by accepting it engages that he will, on due presentment, pay the bill according to the tenor of his acceptance, if it is not paid by the drawee, provided it has been duly presented for payment, and protested for non-payment, and that he receives notice of these facts.

(2.) The acceptor for honour is liable to the holder and to all parties to the bill subsequent to the party for whose honour he has accepted.

Presentment to acceptor for honour. 67. (1.) Where a dishonoured bill has been accepted for honour suprà protest, or contains a reference in case of need, it must be protested for non-payment before it is presented for payment to the acceptor for honour, or referee in case of need.

(2.) Where the address of the acceptor for honour is in the same place where the bill is protested for non-payment, the bill must be presented to him not later than the day following its maturity; and where the address of the acceptor for honour is in some place other than the place where it was protested for non-payment, the bill must be forwarded not later than the day following its maturity for presentment to him.

(3.) Delay in presentment or non-presentment is excused by any circumstance which would excuse delay in presentment for payment or non-presentment for payment.

(4.) When a bill of exchange is dishonoured by the acceptor for honour it must be protested for non-payment by him.

Payment for honour suprà protest. 68. (1.) Where a bill has been protested for non-payment, any person may intervene and pay it suprà protest for the honour of any party liable thereon, or for the honour of the person for whose account the bill is drawn.

(2.) Where two or more persons offer to pay a bill for the honour of different parties, the person whose payment will discharge most parties to the bill shall have the preference.

(3.) Payment for honour suprà protest, in order to operate as such and not as a mere voluntary payment, must be attested by a notarial act of honour which may be appended to the protest or form an extension of it.

(4.) The notarial act of honour must be founded on a declaration made by the payer for honour, or his agent in that behalf, declaring his intention to pay the bill for honour, and for whose honour he pays.

(5.) Where a bill has been paid for honour, all parties subsequent to the party for whose honour it is paid are discharged, but the payer for honour is subrogated for, and succeeds to both the rights and duties of, the holder as regards the party for whose honour he pays, and all parties liable to that party.

(6.) The payer for honour on paying to the holder the amount of the bill and the notarial expenses incidental to its dishonour is entitled to receive both the bill itself and the protest. If the holder do not on demand deliver them up he shall be liable to the payer for honour in damages.

(7.) Where the holder of a bill refuses to receive payment suprà protest he shall lose his right of recourse against any party who would have been discharged by such payment.

Lost Instruments.

Holder's right to duplicate of lost bill. 69. Where a bill has been lost before it is overdue, the person who was the holder of it may apply to the drawer to give him another bill of the same tenor, giving security to the drawer if required to indemnify him against all persons whatever in case the bill alleged to have been lost shall be found again.

If the drawer on request as aforesaid refuses to give such duplicate bill, he may be compelled to do so.

Action on lost bill. 70. In any action or proceeding upon a bill, the court or a judge may order that the loss of the instrument shall not be set up, provided an indemnity be given to the satisfaction of the court or judge against the claims of any other person upon the instrument in question.

Bill in a Set.

Rules as to sets. 71. (1.) Where a bill is drawn in a set, each part of the set being numbered, and containing a reference to the other parts, the whole of the parts constitute one bill.

(2.) Where the holder of a set indorses two or more parts to different persons, he is liable on every such part, and every indorser subsequent to him is liable on the part he has himself indorsed as if the said parts were separate bills.

(3.) Where two or more parts of a set are negotiated to different holders in due course, the holder whose title first accrues is as between such holders deemed the true owner of the bill; but nothing in this sub-section shall affect the rights of a person who in due course accepts or pays the part first presented to him.

(4.) The acceptance may be written on any part, and it must be written on one part only.

If the drawee accepts more than one part, and such accepted parts get into the hands of different holders in due course, he is liable on every such part as if it were a separate bill.

(5.) When the acceptor of a bill drawn in a set pays it without requiring the part bearing his acceptance to be delivered up to him, and that part at maturity is outstanding in the hands of a holder in due course, he is liable to the holder thereof.

(6.) Subject to the preceding rules, where any one part of a bill drawn in a set is discharged by payment or otherwise, the whole bill is discharged.

Conflict of Laws.

Rules where laws conflict. 72. Where a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows:

(1.) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue, and the validity as regards requisites in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance suprà protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made.

Provided that—

(a.) Where a bill is issued out of the United Kingdom it is not invalid by reason only that it is not stamped in accordance with the law of the place of issue:

(b.) Where a bill, issued out of the United Kingdom, conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom, it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become parties to it in the United Kingdom.

(2.) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance suprà protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made.

Provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall as regards the payer be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom.

- (3.) The duties of the holder with respect to presentment for acceptance or payment and the necessity for or sufficiency of a protest or notice of dishonour, or otherwise, are determined by the law of the place where the act is done or the bill is dishonoured.
- (4.) Where a bill is drawn out of but payable in the United Kingdom and the sum payable is not expressed in the currency of the United Kingdom, the amount shall, in the absence of some express stipulation, be calculated according to the rate of exchange for sight drafts at the place of payment on the day the bill is payable.
- (5.) Where a bill is drawn in one country and is payable in another, the due date thereof is determined according to the law of the place where it is payable.

PART III.

CHEQUES ON A BANKER.

Cheque defined. 73. A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand.

Except as otherwise provided in this Part, the provisions of this Act applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand apply to a cheque.

Presentment of cheque for payment. 74. Subject to the Provisions of this Act—

- (1.) Where a cheque is not presented for payment within a reasonable time of its issue, and the drawer or the person on whose account it is drawn had the right at the time of such presentment as between him and the banker to have the cheque paid and suffers actual damage through the delay, he is discharged to the extent of such damage, that is to say, to the extent to which such drawer or person is a creditor of such banker to a larger amount than he would have been had such cheque been paid.
- (2.) In determining what is a reasonable time regard shall be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade and of bankers, and the facts of the particular case.
- (3.) The holder of such cheque as to which such drawer or person is discharged shall be a creditor, in lieu of such drawer or person, of such banker to the extent of such discharge, and entitled to recover the amount from him.

Revocation of banker's authority 75. The duty and authority of a banker to pay a cheque drawn on him by his customer are determined by—

- (1.) Countermand of payment:
- (2.) Notice of the customer's death.

Crossed Cheques.

General and special crossings defined. 76. (1.) Where a cheque bears across its face an addition of—

- (a.) The words "and company" or any abbreviation thereof between two parallel transverse lines, either with or without the words "not negotiable"; or
  - (b.) Two parallel transverse lines simply, either with or without the words "not negotiable";
- that addition constitutes a crossing, and the cheque is crossed generally.

(2.) Where a cheque bears across its face an addition of the name of a banker, either with or without the words "not negotiable," that addition constitutes a crossing, and the cheque is crossed specially and to that banker.

Crossing by drawer or after issue. 77. (1.) A cheque may be crossed generally or specially by the drawer.

(2.) Where a cheque is uncrossed, the holder may cross it generally or specially.

(3.) Where a cheque is crossed generally the holder may cross it specially.

(4.) Where a cheque is crossed generally or specially, the holder may add the words "not negotiable."

(5.) Where a cheque is crossed specially, the banker to whom it is crossed may again cross it specially to another banker for collection.

(6.) Where an uncrossed cheque, or a cheque crossed generally, is sent to a banker for collection, he may cross it specially to himself.

Crossing a material part of cheque 78. A crossing authorised by this Act is a material part of the cheque; it shall not be lawful for any person to obliterate or, except as authorised by this Act, to add to or alter the crossing.

Duties of banker as to crossed cheques. 79. (1.) Where a cheque is crossed specially to more than one banker except when crossed to an agent for collection being a banker, the banker on whom it is drawn shall refuse payment thereof.

(2.) Where the banker on whom a cheque is drawn which is so crossed nevertheless pays the same, or pays a cheque crossed generally otherwise than to a banker, or if crossed specially otherwise than to the banker to whom it is crossed, or his agent for collection being a banker, he is liable to the true owner of the cheque for any loss he may sustain owing to the cheque having been so paid.

Provided that where a cheque is presented for payment which does not at the time of presentment appear to be crossed, or to have had a crossing which has been obliterated, or to have been added to or altered otherwise than as authorised by this Act, the banker paying the cheque in good faith and without negligence shall not be responsible or incur any liability, nor shall the payment be questioned by reason of the cheque having been crossed, or of the crossing having been obliterated or having been added to or altered otherwise than as authorised by this Act, and of payment having been made otherwise than to a banker or to the banker to whom the cheque is or was crossed, or to his agent for collection being a banker, as the case may be.

Protection to banker and drawer where cheque is crossed. 80. Where the banker, on whom a crossed cheque is drawn, in good faith and without negligence pays it, if crossed generally, to a banker, and if crossed specially, to the banker to whom it is crossed, or his agent for collection being a banker, the banker paying the cheque, and, if the cheque has come into the hands of the payee, the drawer shall respectively be entitled to the same rights and be placed in the same position as if payment of the cheque had been made to the true owner thereof.

Effect of crossing on holder. 81. Where a person takes a crossed cheque which bears on it the words "not negotiable," he shall not have and shall not be capable of giving a better title to the cheque than that which the person from whom he took it had.

Protection to collecting banker. 82. Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment.

PART IV.

PROMISSORY NOTES.

Promissory note defined.

83. (1) A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing made by one person to another signed by the maker, engaging to pay, on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money, to, or to the order of, a specified person or to bearer.

(2) An instrument in the form of a note payable to maker's order is not a note within the meaning of this section unless and until it is indorsed by the maker.

(3) A note is not invalid by reason only that it contains also a pledge of collateral security with authority to sell or dispose thereof.

(4) A note which is, or on the face of it purports to be, both made and payable within the British Islands is an inland note. Any other note is a foreign note.

Delivery necessary.

84. A promissory note is inchoate and incomplete until delivery thereof to the payee or bearer.

Joint and several notes.

85. (1) A promissory note may be made by two or more makers, and they may be liable thereon jointly, or jointly and severally according to its tenor.

(2) Where a note runs "I promise to pay" and is signed by two or more persons it is deemed to be their joint and several note.

Note payable on demand.

86. (1) Where a note payable on demand has been indorsed, it must be presented for payment within a reasonable time of the indorsement. If it be not so presented the indorser is discharged.

(2) In determining what is a reasonable time, regard shall be had to the nature of the instrument, the usage of trade, and the facts of the particular case.

(3) Where a note payable on demand is negotiated, it is not deemed to be overdue, for the purpose of affecting the holder with defects of title of which he had no notice, by reason that it appears that a reasonable time for presenting it for payment has elapsed since its issue.

Presentment of note for payment.

87. (1) Where a promissory note is in the body of it made payable at a particular place, it must be presented for payment at that place in order to render the maker liable. In any other case, presentment for payment is not necessary in order to render the maker liable.

(2) Presentment for payment is necessary in order to render the indorser of a note liable.

(3) Where a note is in the body of it made payable at a particular place, presentment at that place is necessary in order to render an indorser liable; but when a place of payment is indicated by way of memorandum only, presentment at that place is sufficient to render the indorser liable, but a presentment to the maker elsewhere, if sufficient in other respects, shall also suffice.

Liability of maker.

88. The maker of a promissory note by making it—

(1) Engages that he will pay it according to its tenor;

(2) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse.

Application of Part II. to notes.

89. (1) Subject to the provisions in this part and, except as by this section provided, the provisions of this Act relating to bills of exchange apply, with the necessary modifications, to promissory notes.

(2) In applying those provisions the maker of a note shall be deemed to correspond with the acceptor of a bill, and the first indorser of a note shall be deemed to correspond with the drawer of an accepted bill payable to drawer's order.

(3) The following provisions as to bills do not apply to notes; namely, provisions relating to—

(a.) Presentment for acceptance;

(b.) Acceptance;

(c.) Acceptance supra protest;

(d.) Bills in a set.

(4) Where a foreign note is dishonoured, protest thereof is unnecessary.

PART V.

Supplementary.

Good faith.

90. A thing is deemed to be done in good faith, within the meaning of this Act, where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not.

Signature.

91. (1) Where, by this Act, any instrument or writing is required to be signed by any person, it is not necessary that he should sign it with his own hand, but it is sufficient if his signature is written thereon by some other person by or under his authority.

(2) In the case of a corporation, where, by this Act, any instrument or writing is required to be signed, it is sufficient if the instrument or writing be sealed with the corporate seal.

But nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring the bill or note of a corporation to be under seal.

Computation of time.

92. Where, by this Act, the time limited for doing any act or thing is less than three days, in reckoning time, non-business days are excluded.

"Non-business days" for the purposes of this Act mean—

(a.) Sunday, Good Friday, Christmas Day;

(b.) A bank holiday under the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, or Acts amending it;

(c.) A day appointed by Royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day.

Any other day is a business day.

When noting equivalent to protest.

93. For the purposes of this Act, where a bill or note is required to be protested within a specified time or before some further proceeding is taken, it is sufficient that the bill has been noted for protest before the expiration of the specified time or the taking of the proceedings; and the formal protest may be extended at any time thereafter as of the date of the noting.

Protest when not accessible.

94. Where a dishonoured bill or note is authorised or required to be protested, and the services of a notary cannot be obtained at the place where the bill is dishonoured, any householder or substantial resident of the place may, in the presence of two witnesses, give a certificate, signed by them, attesting the dishonour of the bill, and the certificate shall in all respects operate as if it were a formal protest of the bill.

The form given in Schedule 1 to this Act may be used with necessary modifications, and if used shall be sufficient.

Dividend warrants may be crossed.

95. The provisions of this Act as to crossed cheques shall apply to a warrant for payment of dividend.

Repeal.

96. The enactments mentioned in the second schedule to this Act are hereby repealed as from the commencement of this Act to the extent in that schedule mentioned.

Provided that such repeal shall not affect anything done or suffered, or any right, title, or interest acquired or accrued before the commencement of this Act, or any legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any such thing, right, title, or interest.

Savings. 97.—(1.) The rules in bankruptcy relating to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and cheques, shall continue to apply thereto notwithstanding anything in this Act contained.

(2.) The rules of common law including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to bills of exchange, promissary notes, and cheques.

(3.) Nothing in this Act or in any repeal effected thereby shall affect—

23 & 24 Vict. c. 97. (a.) The provisions of the Stamp Act, 1870, or Acts amending it, or any law or enactment for the time being in force relating to the revenue :

25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. (b.) The provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, or Acts amending it, or any Act relating to joint stock banks or companies :

(c.) The provisions of any Act relating to or confirming the privileges of the Bank of England or the Bank of Ireland respectively :

(d.) The validity of any usage relating to dividend warrants, or the indentments thereof.

Saving of summary diligence in Scotland. 98. Nothing in this Act or in any repeal effected thereby shall extend or restrict, or in any way alter or affect the law and practice in Scotland in regard to summary diligence.

Construction with other Acts, &c. 99. Where any Act or document refers to any enactment repealed by this Act, the Act or document shall be construed, and shall operate, as if it referred to the corresponding provisions of this Act.

Parole evidence allowed in certain judicial proceedings in Scotland. 100. In any judicial proceeding in Scotland, any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory note, which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence : Provided that this enactment shall not in any way affect the existing law and practice whereby the party who is, according to the tenor of any bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory note, debtor to the holder in the amount thereof, may be required, as a condition of obtaining a sist of diligence, or suspension of a charge, or threatened charge, to make such consignation, or to find such caution as the court or judge before whom the cause is depending may require.

This section shall not apply to any case where the bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory note has undergone the sesennial prescription.

SCHEDULES.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Section 24. Form of protest which may be used when the services of a notary cannot be obtained.

Know all men that I, A. B. [householder], of _____ in the county of _____ in the United Kingdom, at the request of C. D., there being no notary public available, did on the _____ day of _____ 188____ at _____ demand payment [or acceptance] of the bill of exchange hereunder written, from E. F., to which demand he made answer [state answer, if any] wherefore I now, in the presence of G. H. and J. K. do protest the said bill of exchange.

(Signed) A. B.
G. H. } Witnesses.

CAP. LXX.

An Act to amend the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877. [18th August 1882.]

40 & 41 Vic. c. 57. WHEREAS by section seventy-three of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland), 1877 (herein-after called the principal Act), it is enacted that subject to the provisions in that Act contained as to existing officers of the courts whose jurisdiction had been thereby transferred to the Supreme Court, the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron, or any two of them, of whom the Lord Chancellor should be one, with the concurrence of the Treasury, should within two years from the commencement of the Act determine what officers, clerks, or other persons holding subordinate positions requisite for the permanent organization of the official staff of the Supreme Court, and every court and division thereof should be retained or employed; and might with the like concurrence abolish any unnecessary office, or reduce or in case of additional duties increase the salary of an office, or alter the duties or designation thereof, notwithstanding that the patronage thereof might be vested in an existing judge:

And whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the said powers or any of them can be exercised after the expiration of the said period of two years from the commencement of the said Act, and also whether such powers, though not subject to such limitation in point of time, can be exercised so as to abolish, or reduce or increase the salary of, or alter the designation or duties of an office determined to be requisite, or the salary, designation, or duties which have been once fixed in pursuance of the above recited section:

And whereas it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, and that the exercise of the said powers or any of them should not be in anywise limited or restricted as aforesaid:

Be it therefore declared and enacted, &c., .

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act, 1882.

Interpretation of "office." 2. The word "office" shall for the purposes of this Act include any clerkship or subordinate employment held by any person in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, or any division or office thereof.

Amendment of a. 78. of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57. 3. The Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron, or any three of them, of whom the Lord Chancellor shall be one, with the concurrence of the Treasury, may from time to time, as occasion may require, exercise all or any of the powers conferred by the said section of the principal Act as fully as if no time had been prescribed in that behalf in the said section, notwithstanding that any office affected thereby may have been previously determined to be requisite, or that the salary, designation, or duties of any office may have been previously fixed under the powers conferred by the principal Act or by this Act, and also notwithstanding that the patronage thereof may be vested in an existing judge: Provided always, that no existing officer shall receive a less salary than heretofore, and that no officer to be hereafter appointed shall, during his tenure of office, have his salary reduced; and provided also, that any rights preserved by the principal Act to any officers existing at the commencement of that Act shall not be affected by this Act.

CAP. LXXIII.

An Act for the better protection of Ancient Monuments. [18th August 1882.]

CAP. LXXIV.

An Act to amend the Post Office Acts with respect to the Conveyance of Parcels. [18th August 1882.]

WHEREAS the Postmaster-General, with the consent of the Treasury, has made an arrangement with the railway companies named in the First Schedule to this Act whereby the Postmaster-General will pay to the said railway companies and such other railway companies as become parties to the arrangement under this Act the remuneration to railway companies for services rendered by them in relation to the conveyance of parcels, and the said railway companies, through the medium of the London Railway Clearing Committee, will apportion such remuneration among the different railway companies, and such remuneration will consist of the sums herein-after mentioned:

And whereas the Treasury propose, on the representation of the Postmaster-General to make regulations in pursuance of the Acts relating to the Post Office with respect to the posting, forwarding, conveyance and delivery of parcels, and to provide that parcels of the weights mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act shall be carried at the rates in that schedule mentioned, and on different conditions from ordinary postal packets:

And whereas it is expedient to make the provisions herein-after appearing respecting such parcels and for carrying into effect the said arrangement:

And whereas the Bill for this Act has, so far as the same affects the railway companies named in the First Schedule to this Act, been assented to by them:

Be it therefore enacted, &c.,

Short title. 1. This Act may be cited as the Post Office (Parcels) Act, 1882.

Remuneration to railway companies for carriage of parcels. 2. In the event of any regulations being made by the Treasury in pursuance of the Post Office Acts and providing for the conveyance of parcels by post on different conditions from ordinary postal packets, the following provisions shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, have effect:

(1.) The Postmaster-General shall from time to time pay to the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act the amount herein-after mentioned as the remuneration of all railway companies in respect of the conveyance of parcels by such companies, and the amount so paid (in this Act referred to as the railway remuneration) shall be in substitution for any other remuneration in respect of the conveyance of such parcels, and every railway company shall render in respect of such parcels the services required by this Act, and shall accept the said payment in full satisfaction and discharge for the said services.

(2.) The amount of the railway remuneration shall be eleven-twentieth parts of the gross receipts of the Postmaster-General from such of the said parcels as are conveyed by railway;

Provided that if at any time in pursuance of regulations of the Treasury the weights of or rates of postage for parcels differ from those mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act, the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act may, by notice under the hand of the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee, require a revision of the amount of the railway remuneration, and the amount as determined on such revision shall be substituted for the above-mentioned eleven-twentieth parts of the gross receipts, subject nevertheless, in the event of any further change in the weights of or rates of postage for parcels, to another revision on notice requiring the same given either by the railway companies or by the Postmaster-General, and so on from time to time.

(3.) In the case of a revision the amount of railway remuneration shall be a sum to be paid to the companies collectively in manner provided by this Act, and if such amount is not determined by agreement between the Postmaster-General and the railway companies, parties to the arrangement under this Act, the amount shall be referred to arbitration in manner provided by this Act.

(4.) The provisions of this section (in this Act referred to as the arrangement under this Act) shall continue in force during a period of twenty-one years next after the said regulations come into operation, and thereafter until the expiration of twelve months notice to determine the same given by the Postmaster-General on the one side, or by the railway companies on the other, either before or after the expiration of the said twenty-one years.

Services to be rendered by railway companies. 3. During the continuance of the arrangement under this Act the railway companies shall render the following services:—

(1.) Every railway company shall convey by any train by which passengers, goods, or parcels are conveyed all such parcels as may be tendered for conveyance by such train, whether such parcels be under the charge of a person appointed by the Postmaster-General or not, and notwithstanding that no notice has been given to the company with respect to the conveyance of such parcels:

Provided that the conveyance of parcels by mail and express trains shall be limited so as not to affect prejudicially the convenient and punctual working of those trains.

(2.) Every railway company shall afford all reasonable facilities for the receipt and delivery of the sacks, hampers, boxes, or other receptacles containing the parcels at any of their stations without requiring them to be booked or interposing any other delay, and shall perform the service of transferring such sacks, hampers, boxes, or other receptacles to and from the vehicles of the Postmaster-General at the outwards and inwards railway stations.

(3.) Every railway company shall convey, free of charge, but in a manner convenient to them but not interfering with his custody of the parcels, any servant of the Postmaster-General appointed to take charge of the parcels during their conveyance by railway; but if such person during the conveyance receives any injury, and the company pay any sum for damages or costs in respect of such injury, or on account of death arising from such injury, the Postmaster-General shall pay to the company one half of such sum, but if the sum is paid by the company under agreement or by way of compromise of any claim, the Postmaster-General shall not be liable to pay one half unless his written consent has been previously given to the payment of such sum.

(4.) If the parcels are in charge of a person appointed by the Postmaster-General every railway company shall permit such person, if he thinks fit, by himself or his assistants, to deliver and receive the parcels at any station at which the train by which the sacks, hampers, boxes, or other receptacles containing the parcels are intended to be or are conveyed is appointed to stop and during the time limited for such stoppage, but nevertheless shall, if required by such person, assist him in transferring the sacks, hampers, boxes, or other receptacles to and from the vehicles of the Postmaster-General.

(5.) Every railway company shall, if the Postmaster-General so require, provide in every train, not being an express or mail train, a special parcels van or other separate accommodation for sorting parcels carried by such train, and the Postmaster-General shall pay to such company in respect of the said van or accommodation such amount as may be agreed on, or, in case of difference, be determined by arbitration.

Calculation of gross receipts.

4. The gross receipts of the Postmaster-General from parcels conveyed by railway for the purposes of this Act—
- (a.) shall be calculated without any deduction whether for the cost of stamps, or otherwise; and
  - (b.) shall not include such extra charges (over and above the usual rate of postage) as may be from time to time fixed by the said regulations; and
  - (c.) shall include the rates of postage which would be chargeable for Government parcels, if they were sent by private persons, notwithstanding that the same may be conveyed without being stamped; and
  - (d.) As regards foreign parcels shall be taken to be the same amount as would have been the gross receipts of the Postmaster-General in respect of such parcels if they had been inland parcels of the same weight.

Payments to Clearing
Committee.

5. (1.) The Postmaster-General shall from time to time, and at least once in every three months, and, within seven weeks after the expiration of the period to which such accounts respectively relate, render to the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act, through the medium of the London Railway Clearing Committee, such accounts as may be reasonably necessary to show the sums due to railway companies in respect of railway remuneration under this Act, and shall keep all such accounts as are reasonably necessary for that purpose, and shall afford reasonable inspection thereof to the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee on behalf of the railway companies, and shall as soon as may be, and at least within one week after the delivery of the account pay to the railway companies through the medium of the said committee the amount appearing from the said accounts to be so due, and may pay the same out of moneys for the time being to the credit of the Postmaster-General at the Bank of England; but such payments shall be charged in the accounts of the Post Office to the gross receipts in respect of parcels.

(2.) The receipt of the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee shall be a full discharge for all sums paid by the Postmaster-General in respect of railway remuneration, and the Postmaster-General shall not be required to take any part in or otherwise be responsible for the division amongst the railway companies of the amount so paid.

Apportionment of amount received by
committee.

6. (1.) The railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act shall from time to time apportion the railway remuneration received from the Postmaster-General among all the railway companies in accordance with the provisions set forth in the Third Schedule to this Act, which provisions shall have effect as if they were enacted in the body of this Act.

(2.) For the purpose of facilitating such apportionment the Postmaster-General shall for one week in each half year keep, and within twenty-eight days thereafter deliver to the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee, records of the number of the parcels conveyed by railway and forwarded from the different post towns in the United Kingdom during the week for which such account shall be so kept.

Conditions as to conveyance of parcels by railway.

7. During the continuance of the arrangement under this Act the following provisions shall have effect with reference to the parcels conveyed for the Postmaster-General by railway companies:

- (1.) He shall direct his officers from time to time to distribute, so far as practicable, the parcels between the different railways, so that the expense to any railway company of carrying the parcels may, with due regard to the public convenience, be proportionate to that company's share of the receipts divisible among the railway companies under this Act:

- (2.) He shall direct his officers to secure so far as practicable the delivery of the parcels at the outwards railway station a reasonable time before the departure of the trains, and to be so far as practicable in attendance at the inwards station to meet on arrival any train by which parcels are expected to arrive:
- (3.) The parcels shall be placed by the officers of the Postmaster-General for each separate railway station in sacks, hampers, boxes, or other receptacles, and in such reasonably convenient manner for delivery to and for transfer and conveyance by the railway companies as the Postmaster-General may from time to time direct.
- (4.) The railway companies shall not be required to carry, under this Act, any such explosive or dangerous articles as they, independently of this Act, for the time being refuse to carry as a parcel by passenger trains.
- (5.) The parcels shall, with regard to security and compensation for loss or otherwise, be treated as letters sent by post, and no company shall incur or be subject to any liability in respect of the conveyance or loss of or damage to any of the parcels, but the railway companies shall take all reasonable care for the security of the parcels while under their charge.

Arbitration
under Act.

8. Where during the continuance of the arrangement under this Act the amount of railway remuneration or other matter of difference between the Postmaster-General and the railway companies parties to the said arrangement or any matter of difference between the Postmaster-General and any single railway company or any company or person or persons owning any steam vessel in respect of any services under this Act, is in pursuance of this Act referred to arbitration, the arbitration shall be in accordance with s. 53. the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859, and the Acts amending the same, and where it is between the Postmaster-General and the companies parties to the arrangement under this Act shall be conducted in like manner as if the said companies were one party to the arbitration on the one side and the Postmaster-General were a company party to the arbitration on the other side, and if each side appoints an arbitrator, one arbitrator only shall be appointed on behalf of the said companies under the hand of the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee.

Railway
parties to arrangement and remuneration to company not party to arrangement.

9. (1.) The following railway companies shall be deemed to be railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act:—

- (a.) the railway companies named in the First Schedule to this Act; and
  - (b.) every railway company who in pursuance of this Act elects to become a party to the arrangement under this Act; and
  - (c.) as regards any railway authorised after the passing of this Act, the railway company working such railway.
- (2.) Any railway company in the United Kingdom not being one of the parties to the arrangement under this Act may serve a notice in writing and under seal on the Postmaster-General, and on the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee, expressing the desire of such company to become one of the parties to the arrangement under this Act, and upon the service of such notice the company shall be deemed to have elected to become one of the parties to the arrangement under this Act.

(3.) Any railway company in the United Kingdom not being one of the parties to the arrangement under this Act shall, nevertheless, when required by the Postmaster-General, render the services with respect to the conveyance of parcels which are required by this Act to be rendered by railway companies, and shall be entitled as remuneration for such services to receive from the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act the proper proportion of the railway remuneration, and if a difference arises with respect to the amount of such remuneration and is not determined by agreement between such company and the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act, acting through the medium of the London Railway Clearing Committee, the difference shall be referred to arbitration; and the award on such arbitration shall determine the difference and the amount due to such company in respect of the said services, and such amount shall be paid out of the railway remuneration by the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act:

Provided that where a railway company is not one of the parties to the arrangement under this Act, nothing in this section shall authorise the Postmaster-General to require such company to carry parcels on any railway worked by such company on which the company does not carry any parcels traffic within the meaning of the Third Schedule to this Act.

(4.) An arbitration under this section shall be conducted in accordance with the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859, and any Act amending the same, in like manner as if the companies parties to the arrangement under this Act were one party to the arbitration, but the arbitrator shall, on application under the hand of the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee, be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice of England, but if no such application is made and each side appoints an arbitrator, one arbitrator only shall be appointed on behalf of the companies parties to the arrangement under this Act under the hand of the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee.

Application of law upon determination of arrangement under this Act.

10. Upon the determination of the arrangement under this Act the enactments then in force in relation to the conveyance of other postal packets by railway, and the remuneration to be paid for the services of the railway companies as regards such conveyance and the determination of such remuneration (in the absence of agreement) by arbitration, shall apply in the case of parcels in like manner as in the case of other postal packets.

Saving of existing rights.

11. Nothing in this Act shall in any way prejudice or affect on the one hand the rights or powers of any railway company, either in the conveyance of parcels for the public on the company's own account, or the charges or conditions to be made or imposed in respect of such conveyance, or on the other hand the right of the Postmaster-General under his powers with respect to the conveyance of mails by railway, and every company shall be entitled to be paid for all services in respect of the conveyance of mails other than parcels wholly irrespective of and without reference to the provisions of this Act.

Mode of acting by Postmaster-General and Clearing Committee.

12. (1.) Every agreement under this Act by the Postmaster-General shall, in accordance with the Post Office Acts, be made with the consent of the Treasury.

(2.) Any notice or document required for the purposes of this Act to be served on the Postmaster-General may be served by the delivery thereof to the Postmaster-General or to any of the secretaries or assistant secretaries to the Post Office, or by sending the same by post addressed to the Postmaster-General at the General Post Office.

(3.) For any purpose connected with railway remuneration in pursuance of the arrangement under this Act, any notice or document to be given or served to, on, or by the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act shall be given or served to, on, or by the secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee, and the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act may collectively sue and be sued in the name of the said secretary; and during the continuance of the arrangement under this Act, the Postmaster-General in dealing (for the purposes of railway remuneration) with the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act may deal only with such companies collectively through the medium of the London Railway Clearing Committee, and shall not be required to deal, as regards railway remuneration, with any of such companies individually.

(4.) All accounts to be rendered or notices given to or served on the railway companies with reference to railway remuneration shall be rendered, given, or served by sending the same through the post to, or leaving the same at, the office of the London Railway Clearing Committee, addressed to the secretary to such committee.

Application of Act to steam vessels.

13. Where any railway company own or work any steam vessel, the provisions contained in this Act with respect to the conveyance of parcels by railway shall, so far as they are applicable, extend to the conveyance of parcels by such steam vessels, and the expressions in this Act shall be construed accordingly; and expressions referring to railway stations shall refer to places where steam vessels depart, call, or arrive:

Provided that where any such steam vessel carries on communication between a port in the United Kingdom and any place out of the United Kingdom, the remuneration for services rendered by such steam vessel in respect of the conveyance of parcels shall not be included in the railway remuneration, but shall be such as may be determined by agreement between the Postmaster-General and the company owning or working the steam vessel, or in case of difference be determined by arbitration, and the amount so determined shall be paid direct to the company, and the parcels conveyed by such steam vessel shall not, in respect of that conveyance, be deemed to be parcels conveyed by railway.

Where any steam vessel carries on regular communication between a port in the United Kingdom and any other port or place within the United Kingdom, or is a home-trade ship as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and such steam vessel is neither owned nor worked by any railway company, the company or person or persons by whom such steam vessel is owned or worked shall, from and after the passing of this Act, be bound to convey parcels; and the remuneration due for the services rendered by such steam vessel, in respect of the conveyance of parcels, shall be determined by agreement between the Postmaster-General and the company or person or persons owning or working such steam vessel, or in case of difference such remuneration shall be determined by arbitration, and the amount so determined shall be paid direct to such company or person or persons, and the parcels conveyed by such steam vessel shall not in respect of that conveyance be deemed to be parcels conveyed by railway.

Application of
foreign parcels.

14. (1.) Subject to any exceptions and modifications made by regulations under this section, the provisions of the Acts for the time being in force relating to the Customs (in this Act referred to as Customs enactments) shall apply to goods contained in foreign parcels, in like manner, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, as they apply to any other goods; and persons may be punished for offences against the said enactments, and goods may be examined, seized, and forfeited, and the officers examining and seizing them shall be protected, and legal proceedings in relation to the matters aforesaid may be taken, accordingly under the said enactments.

(2.) The Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commissioners of Customs and the Postmaster-General, may from time to time make, and, when made, revoke and vary, regulations for the purpose of modifying or excepting the application of any of the Customs enactments to foreign parcels, and for the purpose of securing, in the case of such parcels, the observance of the Customs enactments, and for enabling the officers of the Post Office to perform, for the purpose of those enactments and otherwise, all or any of the duties of the importer and exporter, and for carrying into effect any treaty, convention, or arrangement with any foreign State or the government of any British possession with reference to foreign parcels, and for punishing any contravention of the Customs enactments or of the regulations under this section.

(3.) The Postmaster-General shall have the same right of recovering any sums paid, in pursuance of the Customs enactments or otherwise under the said regulations, in respect of any foreign parcel, as he would have if the sum so paid were a rate of postage.

(4.) A contravention of the regulations in force under this section shall be deemed to be a contravention of the Customs enactments, and shall involve accordingly the like punishment of persons guilty thereof, and the like forfeiture of goods.

Application of Act to Channel Islands and Isle of Man.

15. This Act shall apply to the Channel Islands and Isle of Man as if they were part of the United Kingdom, subject to the following provisions:—

(1.) Save as provided by regulations made under this section, it shall not be lawful, by means of any inland parcel, to export or remove from the Channel Islands or Isle of Man, or import or bring into the United Kingdom, or to export or remove from the United Kingdom or import or bring into the Channel Islands or Isle of Man, any goods on the exportation, importation, removal, or bringing in of which there is for the time being any prohibition or restriction, or any Customs duty payable.

(2.) Regulations under this section may be made for permitting and regulating the exportation, importation, removal, or bringing in of any such goods as above mentioned to the extent provided by the regulations.

(3.) Subject to any exceptions or modifications made by the regulations under this section, the provisions of this Act with respect to the application of the Customs enactments to foreign parcels shall apply in like manner as if the inland parcels sent between the United Kingdom, Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man were foreign parcels, and for the purpose of such application any goods for the time being prohibited by this section from being imported, exported, brought in, or removed shall be deemed to be so prohibited by the said Customs enactments.

(4.) The Treasury may from time to time, on the recommendation of the Commissioners of Customs and the Postmaster-General, make, and, when made, revoke and vary, regulations for carrying into effect this section.

(5.) All laws of those islands punishing offences committed in relation to post letters or post letter bags shall apply as if parcels were post letters, and sacks, hampers, boxes, and other receptacles containing parcels were post letter bags.

Application of Post Office Acts.

16. This Act shall be deemed to be a Post Office Act within the meaning of 7 Will 4. & 1 Vict. c. 36. the Post Office (Offences) Act, 1837, and, subject to the provisions of this Act, the Post Office Acts shall apply to parcels within the meaning of this Act in like manner as they apply to other postal packets.

Definitions.

17. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

The expression "British possession" does not include the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, but includes all other territories and places forming part of Her Majesty's dominions.

Exceeding 5 lbs. and not exceeding 7 lbs.	1s.

THIRD SCHEDULE.

APPORTIONMENT AMONG THE RAILWAY COMPANIES.

1. All sums paid by the Postmaster-General under this Act to the railway companies parties to the arrangements under this Act shall be apportioned amongst the railway companies entitled to share therein by the London Railway Clearing Committee half-yearly up to the thirtieth day of June and the thirty-first day of December in each year, or to such other half-yearly days as the parcels accounts between the companies may for the time being be made up by the London Railway Clearing Committee.

2. The share of each railway company shall bear the same ratio to the whole sum divisible as that company's gross receipts from local and through parcels traffic for each half-yearly period bear to the gross receipts from local and through parcels traffic of all the companies for the same period: Provided that where upon an arbitration with any company not a party to the arrangement under this Act any sum is awarded to be paid to such company, such sum shall be so paid in lieu of the share ascertained as aforesaid.

Each company shall render to the London Railway Clearing Committee the necessary returns of their parcels traffic certified by their accountant, such returns to be subject to audit and inspection of books by the London Railway Clearing Committee.

(3.) If at any time after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act, or if at any time in pursuance of regulations of the Treasury the weights or rates of postage for parcels differ from those mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Act, any one or more of the companies consider that the apportionment of the receipts from parcels traffic above provided by this Act (hereinafter called "the prescribed apportionment") is inequitable, such company or companies (without prejudice to any right conferred by this Act on a company not represented by the committee) may forward to the London Railway Clearing Committee a statement in writing of the grounds of objection to the prescribed apportionment, and thereupon the following provisions shall have effect:

(a.) The secretary to the London Railway Clearing Committee shall convene a special meeting of the general managers of the railway companies parties to the arrangement under this Act (hereinafter called "the conference") for the purpose of taking such statement into consideration, and shall give not less than fourteen days notice of such special meeting.

(b.) The conference shall at such special meeting take the said statement into consideration and determine by a majority of its members present at such meeting whether a prima facie case has been shown for altering the prescribed apportionment.

(c.) If the conference determine that a prima facie case has not been shown for altering the prescribed apportionment no further proceedings shall be taken, and the prescribed apportionment shall continue in force until further complaint be made under this article.

(d.) If the conference determine that a prima facie case has been shown for altering the prescribed apportionment, it shall proceed either at such meeting or any adjournment or adjournments thereof, or at any other meeting specially convened for the purpose as herein-before provided, to consider a fair and equitable revision of the prescribed apportionment.

(e.) The conference may by a majority of its members present at any such meeting and representing companies whose aggregate share capital is for the time being not less than three-fourths of the aggregate share capital represented at such meeting determine upon a revision of the prescribed apportionment.

(f.) If the conference, for the space of three months after they have decided that a prima facie case for revision has been shown, fail to determine by the requisite majority upon a revision of the prescribed apportionment, then the question of revising the prescribed apportionment shall be referred to an arbitrator appointed under this schedule, who shall have power to determine whether any, and, if any, what revision of the prescribed apportionment is required to remedy any inequality or injustice which may in his opinion be established upon due inquiry before him.

(g.) The conference or the arbitrator shall, in considering a revision of the prescribed apportionment, have power to deal with any complaint of inequality or injustice which may be submitted to them or him by any of the companies, and may adopt in revising the prescribed apportionment such basis of division or such data as to them or him shall seem just.

(h.) Any decision of the conference or of the arbitrator shall be final and conclusive upon the companies, and shall, unless any further alteration is made in the weights and rates of postage of the parcels in pursuance of regulations of the Treasury, continue in force for the period of three years and thereafter until any further complaint shall be made under this enactment.

- (i.) The selection by the Postmaster-General of any route or routes for the transmission of parcels in preference to any competing route or routes shall in no case be a reason for revising the prescribed apportionment.

4. Parcels traffic for the purposes of the apportionment shall (unless and till otherwise determined by the conference, who shall have power to add to or take from the following list of excepted articles,) include all such traffic as according to the practice for the time being of the London Railway Clearing Committee is included in that expression, except—

Mails, other than parcels; fish, meat, and poultry for markets; milk; carriages; cattle, horses, dogs, and other animals; corpses; and specie.

5. The conference shall have power from time to time to make, and if necessary, to revoke and alter all such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the purpose of giving full effect to this Act with respect to—

- (a.) The forms to be used by the companies in dealing with parcels traffic as above defined;
 (b.) The returns to be made by the companies for the purposes of this Act;
 (c.) The verification of any such returns; and (d.) Any matters of detail necessary or proper for carrying this schedule into effect; and all such rules and regulations shall be binding on the companies.

6. The arbitrator to determine any question between the companies under the provisions of this schedule shall be appointed when such question arises by the Lord Chief Justice of England, on the application of the London Railway Clearing Committee, and the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859, shall apply to any such arbitration.

CAP. LXXV.

An Act to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Property of Married Women.

[18th August 1882.]

WHEREAS it is expedient to consolidate and amend the Act of the thirty-third and thirty-fourth Victoria, chapter ninety-three, intituled "The Married Women's Property Act, 1870," and the Act of the thirty-seventh and thirty-eighth Victoria, chapter fifty, intituled "An Act to amend the Married Women's Property Act (1870)";

Be it enacted, &c.,

1. (1.) A married woman shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, be capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing by will or otherwise, of any real or personal property as her separate property in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, without the intervention of any trustee.

(2.) A married woman shall be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property on any contract, and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her; and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action or proceeding shall be her separate property; and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise.

(3.) Every contract entered into by a married woman shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, unless the contrary be shown.

(4.) Every contract entered into by a married woman with respect to and to bind her separate property shall bind not only the separate property which she is possessed of or entitled to at the date of the contract, but also all separate property which she may thereafter acquire.

(5.) Every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole.

2. Every woman who marries after the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold as her separate property, and to dispose of in manner aforesaid all real and personal property which shall belong to her at the time of marriage, or shall be acquired by or devolve upon her after marriage, including any wages, earnings, money, and property gained or acquired by her in any employment, trade, or occupation, in which she is engaged, or which she carries on separately from her husband, or by the exercise of any literary, artistic, or scientific skill.

3. Any money or other estate of the wife lent or entrusted by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him, or otherwise, shall be treated as assets of her husband's estate in case of his bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the amount or value of such money or other estate after, but not before, all claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

4. The execution of a general power by will by a married woman shall have the effect of making the property appointed liable for her debts and other liabilities in the same manner as her separate estate is made liable under this Act.

5. Every woman married before the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold and to dispose of in manner aforesaid as her separate property all real and personal property, her title to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall accrue after the commencement of this Act, including any wages, earnings, money, and property so gained or acquired by her as aforesaid.

6. All deposits in any post office or other savings bank, or in any other bank, all annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt or by any other person, and all sums forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or of any other bank, which at the commencement of this Act are standing in the sole name of a married woman, and all shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other interests of or in any corporation, company, or public body, municipal, commercial, or otherwise, or of or in any industrial, provident, friendly, benefit, building, or loan society, which at the commencement of this Act are standing in her name, shall be deemed, unless and until the contrary be shown, to be the separate property of such married woman; and the fact that any such deposit, annuity, sum forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks Execution of general power.

Property acquired after the Act by a woman married before the Act to be held by her as a feme sole.

As to stock, &c., to which a married woman is entitled.

Property of a woman married after the Act to be held by her as a feme sole.

or funds transferable in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England or of any other bank, share, stock, debenture, debenture stock, or other interest as aforesaid, is standing in the sole name of a married woman, shall be sufficient prima facie evidence that she is beneficially entitled thereto for her separate use, so as to authorise and empower her to receive or transfer the same, and to receive the dividends, interest, and profits thereof, without the concurrence of her husband, and to indemnify the Postmaster General, the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, the Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland, and all directors, managers, and trustees of every such bank, corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid, in respect thereof.

As to stock, &c. to be transferred, &c. to a married woman. 7. All sums forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable in the books of the Bank of England or of any other bank, and all such deposits and annuities respectively as are mentioned in the last preceding section, and all shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, and other interests of or in any such corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid, which after the commencement of this Act shall be allotted to or placed, registered, or transferred in or into or made to stand in the sole name of any married woman shall be deemed, unless and until the contrary be shown, to be her separate property, in respect of which so far as any liability may be incident thereto her separate estate shall alone be liable, whether the same shall be so expressed in the document whereby her title to the same is created or certified, or in the books or register wherein her title is entered or recorded, or not.

Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall require or authorise any corporation or joint stock company to admit any married woman to be a holder of any shares or stock therein to which any liability may be incident, contrary to the provisions of any Act of Parliament, charter, byelaw, articles of association, or deed of settlement regulating such corporation or company.

Investments in joint names of married women and others. 8. All the provisions herein-before contained as to deposits in any post office bank, annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt or by any other person, sums forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable in the books of the Bank of England or of any other bank, shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other interests of or in any such corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid respectively, which at the commencement of this Act shall be standing in the sole name of a married woman, or which, after that time, shall be allotted to, or placed, registered, or transferred to or into, or made to stand in, the sole name of a married woman shall respectively extend and apply, so far as relates to the estate, right, title, or interest of the married woman, to any of the particulars aforesaid which, at the commencement of this Act, or at any time afterwards, shall be standing in, or shall be allotted to, placed, registered, or transferred to or into, or made to stand in, the name of any married woman jointly with any persons or person other than her husband.

As to stock, &c. standing in the joint names of a married woman and others. 9. It shall not be necessary for the husband of any married woman, in respect of her interest, to join in the transfer of any such annuity or deposit as aforesaid, or any sum forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable as aforesaid, or any share, stock, debenture, debenture stock, or other benefit, right, claim, or other interest of or in any such corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid, which is now or shall at any time hereafter be standing in the sole name of any married woman, or in the joint names of such married woman and any other person or persons not being her husband.

Fraudulent investments with money of husband. 10. If any investment in any such deposit or annuity as aforesaid, or in any of the public stocks or funds, or in any other stocks or funds transferable as aforesaid, or in any share, stock, debenture, or debenture stock of any corporation, company, or public body, municipal, commercial, or otherwise, or in any share, debenture, benefit, right, or claim whatsoever in, to, or upon the funds of any industrial, provident, friendly, benefit, building, or loan society, shall have been made by a married woman by means of moneys of her husband, without his consent, the Court may, upon an application under section seventeen of this Act, order such investment, and the dividends thereof, or any part thereof, to be transferred and paid respectively to the husband; and nothing in this Act contained shall give validity as against creditors of the husband to any gift, by a husband to his wife, of any property, which after such gift, shall continue to be in the order and disposition or reputed ownership of the husband or to any deposit or other investment of moneys of the husband made by or in the name of his wife in fraud of his creditors; but any moneys so deposited or invested may be followed as if this Act had not passed.

Moneys payable under policy of assurance not to form part of estate of the insured. 11. A married woman may by virtue of the power of making contracts herein-before contained effect a policy upon her own life or the life of her husband for her separate use; and the same and all benefit thereof shall enure accordingly.

A policy of assurance effected by any man on his own life and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife, or of his children, or of his wife and children, or any of them, or by any woman on her own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of her husband, or of her children, or of her husband and children, or any of them, shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named, and the moneys payable under any such policy shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains unperformed, form part of the estate of the insured, or be subject to his or her debts: Provided, that if it shall be proved that the policy was effected and the premiums paid with intent to defraud the creditors of the insured, they shall be entitled to receive, out of the moneys payable under the policy, a sum equal to the premiums so paid. The insured may by the policy, or by any memorandum under his or her hand, appoint a trustee or trustees of the moneys payable under the policy, and from time to time appoint a new trustee or new trustees thereof, and may make provision for the appointment of a new trustee or new trustees thereof, and for the investment of the moneys payable under any such policy. In default of any such appointment of a trustee, such policy, immediately on its being effected, shall vest in the insured and his or her legal personal representatives, in trust for the purposes aforesaid. If, at the time of the death of the insured, or at any time afterwards, there shall be no trustee, or it shall be expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, a trustee or trustees or a new trustee or new trustees may be appointed by any court having jurisdiction under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850, or the Acts amending and extending the same. The receipt of a trustee or trustees duly appointed, or, in default of any such appointment, or in default of notice to the insurance office, the receipt of the legal personal representative of the insured shall be a discharge to the office for the sum secured by the policy, or for the value thereof, in whole or in part.

c. 60.

Remedies of married woman for protection and security of separate property.

12. Every woman, whether married before or after this Act, shall have in her own name against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, the same civil remedies, and also (subject, as regards her husband, to the proviso hereinafter contained) the same remedies and redress by way of criminal proceedings, for the protection and security of her own separate property, as if such property belonged to her as a feme sole, but, except as aforesaid, no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other for a tort. In any indictment or other proceeding under this section it shall be sufficient to allege such property to be her property; and in any proceeding under this section a husband or wife shall be competent to give evidence against each other, any statute or rule of law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, that no criminal proceeding shall be taken by any wife against her husband by virtue of this Act while they are living together, as to or concerning any property claimed by her, nor while they are living apart, as to or concerning any act done by the husband while they were living together, concerning property claimed by the wife, unless such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the husband when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, his wife.

Wife's ante-
and liabilities.

13. A woman after her marriage shall continue to be liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property for all debts contracted, and all contracts entered into or wrongs committed by her before her marriage, including any sums for which she may be liable as a contributory, either before or after she has been placed on the list of contributories, under and by virtue of the Acts relating to joint stock companies; and she may be sued for any such debt and for any liability in damages or otherwise under any such contract, or in respect of any such wrong; and all sums recovered against her in respect thereof, or for any costs relating thereto, shall be payable out of her separate property; and, as between her and her husband, unless there be any contract between them to the contrary, her separate property shall be deemed to be primarily liable for all such debts, contracts, or wrongs, and for all damages or costs recovered in respect thereof: Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall operate to increase or diminish the liability of any woman married before the commencement of this Act for any such debt, contract, or wrong, as aforesaid, except as to any separate property to which she may become entitled by virtue of this Act, and to which she would not have been entitled for her separate use under the Acts hereby repealed or otherwise, if this Act had not passed.

Husband to be
wife's debts contracted before marriage to a certain extent.

14. A husband shall be liable for the debts of his wife contracted, and for all contracts entered into and wrongs committed by her, before marriage, including any liabilities to which she may be so subject under the Acts relating to joint stock companies as aforesaid, to the extent of all property whatsoever belonging to his wife which he shall have acquired or become entitled to from or through his wife, after deducting therefrom any payments made by him, and any sums for which judgment may have been bonâ fide recovered against him in any proceeding at law, in respect of any such debts, contracts, or wrongs for or in respect of which his wife was liable before her marriage as aforesaid; but he shall not be liable for the same any further or otherwise; and any court in which a husband shall be sued for any such debt shall have power to direct any inquiry or proceedings which it may think proper for the purpose of ascertaining the nature, amount, or value of such property: Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall operate to increase or diminish the liability of any husband married before the commencement of this Act for or in respect of any such debt or other liability of his wife as aforesaid.

Suits for ante-nuptial liabilities.

15. A husband and wife may be jointly sued in respect of any such debt or other liability (whether by contract or for any wrong) contracted or incurred by the wife before marriage as aforesaid, if the plaintiff in the action shall seek to establish his claim, either wholly or in part, against both of them; and if in any such action, or in any action brought in respect of any such debt or liability against the husband alone, it is not found that the husband is liable in respect of any property of the wife so acquired by him or to which he shall have become so entitled as aforesaid, he shall have judgment for his costs of defence, whatever may be the result of the action against the wife if jointly sued with him; and in any such action against husband and wife jointly, if it appears that the husband is liable for the debt or damages recovered, or any part thereof, the judgment to the extent of the amount for which the husband is liable shall be a joint judgment against the husband personally and against the wife as to her separate property; and as to the residue, if any, of such debt and damages, the judgment shall be a separate judgment against the wife as to her separate property only.

Act of wife liable
proceedings.

16. A wife doing any act with respect to any property of her husband, which, if done by the husband with respect to property of the wife, would make the husband liable to criminal proceedings by the wife under this Act, shall in like manner be liable to criminal proceedings by her husband.

Questions between husband and wife as to property to be decided in a summary way.

17. In any question between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property, either party, or any such bank, corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid in whose books any stocks, funds, or shares of either party are standing, may apply by summons or otherwise in a summary way to any judge of the High Court of Justice in England or in Ireland, according as such property is in England or Ireland, or (at the option of the applicant irrespectively of the value of the property in dispute) in England to the judge of the county court of the district, or in Ireland to the chairman of the civil bill court of the division in which either party resides, and the judge of the High Court of Justice or of the county court, or the chairman of the civil bill court (as the case may be) may make such order with respect to the property in dispute, and as to the costs of and consequent on the application as he thinks fit, or may direct such application to stand over from time to time, and any inquiry touching the matters in question to be made in such manner as he shall think fit: Provided always, that any order of a judge of the High Court of Justice to be made under the provisions of this section shall be subject to appeal in the same way as an order made by the same judge in a suit pending or on an equitable plaint in the said court would be; and any order of a county or civil bill court under the provisions of this section shall be subject to appeal in the same way as any other order made by the same court would be, and all proceedings in a county court or civil bill court under this section in which, by reason of the value of the property in dispute, such court would not have had jurisdiction if this Act or the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, had not passed, may, at the option of the defendant or respondent to such proceedings, be removed as of right into the High Court of Justice in England or Ireland (as the case may be), by writ of certiorari or otherwise as may be prescribed by any rule of such High Court; but any order made or act done in the course of such proceedings prior to such removal shall be valid, unless order shall be made to the contrary by such High Court: Provided also, that the judge of the High Court of Justice or of the county court, or the chairman of the civil bill court, if either party so require, may hear any such application in his private room: Provided also, that any such bank, corporation, company, public body, or society as aforesaid, shall, in the matter of any such application for the purposes of costs or otherwise, be treated as a stakeholder only.

Married woman as an executrix or trustee. 18. A married woman who is an executrix or administratrix alone or jointly with any other person or persons of the estate of any deceased person, or a trustee alone or jointly as aforesaid of property subject to any trust, may sue or be sued, and may transfer or join in transferring any such annuity or deposit as aforesaid, or any sum forming part of the public stocks or funds, or of any other stocks or funds transferable as aforesaid, or any share, stock, debenture, debenture stock, or other benefit, right, claim, or other interest of or in any such corporation, company, public body, or society in that character, without her husband, as if she were a feme sole.

Saving of existing settlements, and the power to make future settlements. 19. Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman, or shall interfere with or render inoperative any restriction against anticipation at present attached or to be hereafter attached to the enjoyment of any property or income by a woman under any settlement, agreement for a settlement, will, or other instrument; but no restriction against anticipation contained in any settlement or agreement for a settlement of a woman's own property to be made or entered into by herself shall have any validity against debts contracted by her before marriage, and no settlement or agreement for a settlement shall have any greater force or validity against creditors of such woman than a like settlement or agreement for a settlement made or entered into by a man would have against his creditors.

Married woman to be liable to the parish for the maintenance of her husband. 20. Where in England the husband of any woman having separate property becomes chargeable to any union or parish, the justices having jurisdiction in such union or parish may, in petty sessions assembled, upon application of the guardians of the poor, issue a summons against the wife, and make and enforce such order against her for the maintenance of her husband out of such separate property as by the thirty-third section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, they may now make and enforce against a husband for the maintenance of his wife if she becomes chargeable to any union or parish. Where in Ireland relief is given under the provisions of the Acts relating to the relief of the destitute poor to the husband of any woman having separate property, the cost price of such relief is hereby declared to be a loan from the guardians of the union in which the same shall be given, and shall be recoverable from such woman as if she were a feme sole by the same actions and proceedings as money lent.

Married woman to be liable to the parish for the maintenance of her children. 21. A married woman having separate property shall be subject to all such liability for the maintenance of her children and grandchildren as the husband is now by law subject to for the maintenance of her children and grandchildren: Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall relieve her husband from any liability imposed upon him by law to maintain her children or grandchildren.

Repeal of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93. 37 & 38 Vict. c. 50. 22. The Married Women's Property Act, 1870, and the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, Amendment Act, 1874, are hereby repealed: Provided that such repeal shall not affect any act done or right acquired while either of such Acts was in force, or any right or liability of any husband or wife, married before the commencement of this Act, to sue or be sued under the provisions of the said repealed Acts or either of them, for or in respect of any debt, contract, wrong, or other matter or thing whatsoever, for or in respect of which any such right or liability shall have accrued to or against such husband or wife before the commencement of this Act.

Legal representative of married woman. 23. For the purposes of this Act the legal personal representative of any married woman shall in respect of her separate estate have the same rights and liabilities and be subject to the same jurisdiction as she would be if she were living.

Interpretation of terms. 24. The word "contract" in this Act shall include the acceptance of any trust, or of the office of executrix or administratrix, and the provisions of this Act as to liabilities of married women shall extend to all liabilities by reason of any breach of trust or devastavit committed by any married woman being a trustee or executrix or administratrix either before or after her marriage, and her husband shall not be subject to such liabilities unless he has acted or intermeddled in the trust or administration. The word "property" in this Act includes a thing in action.

Commencement of Act. 25. The date of the commencement of this Act shall be the first of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three.

Extent of Act. 26. This Act shall not extend to Scotland.

Short Title. 27. This Act may be cited as the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

CAP. LXXXII.

An Act for amending the Lunacy Regulation Acts.
[18th August 1882.]

WHEREAS it is expedient to amend the Lunacy Regulation Acts:

Be it enacted, &c., . . . . .

1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as the Lunacy Regulation Amendment Act, 1882.

Construction of Act.
16 & 17 Viet. c. 70.

2. This Act shall be construed as one with the Lunacy Regulation Acts, 1853 and 1862, and unless there is something in the subject matter or context repugnant to such construction, the expression "The Lord Chancellor intrusted as aforesaid," and all other expressions having a special or defined meaning in the last-mentioned Acts, or either of them, shall have the same meaning in this Act.

Power of Lord Chancellor where property of lunatic does not exceed £2,000, or £100 per annum.

3. Section twelve of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, is hereby amended so as to have effect as if the words "two thousand pounds in value" had been inserted therein instead of the words "one thousand pounds in value," and the words "one hundred pounds per annum" instead of "fifty pounds per annum."

All Chancery lunatics to be visited twice a year.

4. Whereas by section twenty of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, it is enacted that "every lunatic shall be personally visited and seen by one of the said visitors four times at least in every year, and such visits shall be so regulated as that the interval between successive visits to any such lunatic shall in no case exceed four months: Provided always, that lunatics who are resident in licensed houses, asylums, or registered hospitals shall not necessarily be visited by any of the said visitors more than once in the year, unless the Lord Chancellor intrusted as aforesaid shall otherwise direct": Be it enacted, that the said section shall be construed as if the words "twice" had been inserted therein instead of the words "four times," and as if the words "eight months" had been inserted therein instead of the words "four months," and as if instead of the proviso therein there had been inserted the following words: Provided always, that every lunatic resident in a private house shall, during the two years next following inquisition, be so visited at least four times in every year.
