Co'prel. n. f. [This word is varioufly fpelt ; as copel, cupel, cuple, and cuppel; but I cannot find its etymology ] An infrument ufed in chymiftry in the form of a difh, made of afhes, well wafhed, to cleanfe them from all their falt; or of bones thoroughly calcined. Its ufe is to try and purify gold and filver, which is done by mingling lead with the metal, and expofing it in the coppel to a violent fire a long while. The impurities of the metal will then be carried off in drofs, which is called the litharge of gold and filver. The refiners call the coppel a teft. Harris. CO'PPER. n. S. [kepcr, Dut. cuprum, Latin.] One of the fix primitive metals.

Copper is the moft ductile and malleable metal, after gold and filver. Of a mixture of copter and lapis calaminaris is formed brafs; a compolition of copper and tin makes bellmetal; and copper and brafs, melted in equal quantities, produces what the French call bronze, ufed for figures and ftatues.

Chainbers.
Copier is heavier than iron or tin; but lighter than filver, lead, and gold. It is not unfrequently found native in a malleable ftate, but in fimall quantities. In the ftate of ore it makes, according to its various admixtures, many very different appearances. The richer copper ores are found in many parts of Germany and Sweden; and we have fome in England little inferior to the fineft Swedifh. Hill on Foolz/s.

Co'pperas. n. $\int$. [kopperoofe, Dut. couperoufe, Fr. fuppofed to be found in copper mines only.] A name given to three forts of vitriol; the green, the bluifh green, and the white, which are produced in the mines of Germany, Hungary, and other countries. But what is commonly fold here for copperas, is an artificial vitriol, made of a kind of ftones found on the feathore in Effex, Hamphire, and fo weftward, ordinarily called gold ftones from their colour. They abound with iron, and are expofed to the weather in beds above ground, and receive the rains and dews, which in time breaks and diffolves the ftones: the liquor that runs off is pumped into boilers, in which is firft put old iron, which, in boiling, diffolves. When the boiling is finifhed, the liquor is drawn off into coolers, where it fhoots into cryftals of a fine green colour. This factitious copperas, in many refpects, perfectly agrees with the native green vitriol of Germany; and is ufed in dying hats and cloths black, and in making ink.

$\mathrm{Co}^{\prime}$ py-hold. n. $\int$. [copy and bold.] A tenure, for which the tenant hath nothing to fhew but the copy of the rolls made by the fteward of his lord's court: for the fteward, as he enrolls other things done in the lord's court, fo he regifters fuch tenants as are admitted in the court, to any parcel of land or tenement belonging to the manor; and the tranfeript of this is called the court-roll, the copy of which the tenaut takes from him, and keeps as his only evidence: This is called a bafe tenure, becaufe it holds at the will of the lord; yet not fimply, but according to the cuftom of the manor: fo that if a copy-holder break not the cuflom of the manor, and thereby forfeit his tenure, he cannot be turned out at the lord's pleafirre. Thefe cuftoms of manors vary in one point or other, almof in every manor. Some copy-bolds are finable, and fome certain: that which is finable, the lord rates at what fine or income he pleafes, when the tenant is admitted into it: that which is certain is a kind of inheritance, and called in many places cuftomary; becaufe the tenant dying, and the hold being void, the next of blood paying the cuftomary finc, as two fhillings for an acre, or fo, cannot be denied his admiffion. Some copy-holders have, by cuftom, the wood growing upon their own land, which by law they could not have. Some hold by the verge in ancient demefne; and though they hold by copy, yet are they, in account, a kind of freeholder: for, if fuch a one commit felony, the king hath annumn, die:", and vafium, as in cafe of freehold. Some others hold by common tenure, called mere copy-b:ld; and they committing felony, their land efcheats to the lord of the manor. Cowel.

CO'RAL. n. $\int$. [corallium, Latin.]

1. Red coral is a plant of great hardnefs and fony nature, while growing in the water, as it has after long expofure to the air. The vulgar opinion, that coral is foft, while in the fea, proceeds from a foft and thin coat, of a cruftaceous matter, covering it while it is growing, and which is taken off before it is packed up for ufe. This external bark is of a fungous fpongy texture, of a yellowifh or greenifh colour, and is full of an acrid juice refembling milk. It covers every part of the plant, and is cafily feparated from the internal or ttony part by friction, while it is moift ; but adheres to it very firmly, if fuffered to dry on it. 'The whole coral plant grows to a foot or more in height, and is varioufly ramified. It is thickeft at the ftem, and its branches grow gradually fimaller to the extremitics. It grows to ftones, or any other folid fubflances, without a root, or without any way penctrating them, as plants do the earth. It has been doubted whether coral were properly a plant or not; but as it is found to grow, and take in its nourifhment in the manner of plants, , and to produce flowers and feeds, or at leaft a matter analogous to feeds, it properly belongs to the vegetable kingdom, The ancients afcribed great virtues to red coral; but now it is only ufed internally as an aftringent and abforbent, with other medicines of the fame intention. We hear of white coral, of which the ancients make no mention; and what is fold under this name is a fipecies of the madrepora, another fea-plant. There is a black coral of the fume ftony fubfance with the red, and as glofly as the blackeft marble; but what is fold in the fhops under that name, is a plant of a dificrent genus, and of a tough horny texture.

Hill's Materia Micdica.
In the fea, upon the fouth weft of Sicily, much coral is found. It is a fubmarine plant: it hath no lcaves: it brancheth only when it is under waier. It is foft, and grreen of colour; but being brought into the air, it becometh hard and fhining red, as we fee. Bacon's ATatural Hifory, NV. 780.

This gentleman, defirous to fuld the nature of coral, caufed a man to go down a hundred fathom into the fea, with exprefs orders to take notice whether it were hard or foft in the place where it groweth.

Corban ftands for an offering or gift made to God, or his temple. The Jews fometimes fwore by corban, or the gifts offered unto God. If a man made all his fortune corlam, or devoted it to God, he was forbidden to ufe it. If all that he was to give his wife, or his father and mother, was declared corban, he was no longer permitted to allow them neceffary fubfiftence. Even debtors were permitted to defraud their creditors, by confecrating their debt to God. Our Savicur reproaches the Jews, in the Gofpel, with thefe uncharitable and irreligious vows. By this word fuch perfons were likewife meant as devoted themfelves to the fervice of God and his temple. Corban fignifies alfo the treafury of the temple, where the offerings, which were made in money, were depofited.

Corro'sion. n.f. [corrodo, Latin.] The power of cating or wearing away by degrees.

Corrofion is a particular fpecies of diffolution of bodies, either by an acid, or a faline menftruum. It is almoft wholly defigned for the refolution of bodies moft ftrongly compacted, as bones and metals; fo that the menftruums here employed, have a confiderable moment or force. Thefe liquors, whether acid or ürinous, are nothing but falts diffolved in a little phlegm ; therefore thefe being folid, and confequently containing a çonfiderable quantity of matter, do both attract one another more, and are alfo more attracted by the particles of the body to be diffolved; fo when the more folid bodies are put into faline menitruums, the attraction is ftronger than in other folutions; and the motion, which is always proportional to the attraction, is more violent: fo that we may cafily conceive, when the motion is in fuch a manner increafed, it fhould drive the falts into the pores of the bodies, and open and loofen their cohefion, though ever fo firm. 1. A fhire; that is, a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the better government thereof, and the more eafy adminiftration of juftice; fo that there is no part of the kingdom, but what lieth within fome county. Every county is governed by a yearly officer, called a fheriff, who, among other duties belonging to his office, puts in execution all the commands and judgments of the king's courts. Of thefe counties four are termed county-palatines, as that of Lancafter, Chefter, Durham, and Ely. A countypalatine is a jurifdiction of fo high a nature, that whereas all pleas, touching the life and the maiming of a man, called pleas of the crown, and ordinarily held in the king's name, and which cannot pafs in the name of any other; the chief governors of thefe, by fpecial charter from the king, fent out all writs in their own name, and did all things touching juftice as abfolutely as the prince himfelf in other counties, only acknowledging him their fuperior and fovereign. But this power has, by a flatute in Henry VIII. his time, been much abridged. Befides the above counties of both forts, there are likewife counties corporate, which are certain cities or ancient boroughs upon which our princes have thought good to beftow extraordinary liberties. Of thefe London is one, York another, the city of Chefter a third, and Canterbury a fourth. And to thefe may be added many more; as the county of the town of Kingfon upon Hull, the county of the town of Haverfordweft, and the county of Litchfield. Co:nty is, in another fignification, ufed for the county-court which the fheriff keeps every month within his charge, either by himfelf or his deputy. Of thefe counties, one with another, there are reckoned thirty-feven in England, befides twelve in Walcs.

does by that attractive force which is in all bodies, and particularly in falt, by reafon of its folidity: whereby, when the menftruum or fluid, in which fuch particles flow, is fated enough or evaporated, fo that the faline particles are within each other's attractive powers, they draw one another more than they are drawn by the fluid, then will they run into cry ftals. And this is peculiar to thofe, that let them be ever to much divided and reduced into minute particles, yet, when they are formed into cryftals, they each of them reaffume their proper fhapes; fo that one might as eafily diveft them of their faltnefs, as of their figure. This being an immutable and perpetual law, by knowing the figure of the cryftals, we may underftand what the texture of the particles ought to be, which can form thofe cryftals; and, on the other hand, by knowing the texture of the particles, may be determined the figure of the cryptals.

Miller.
The cyprefs is a tall ftrait tree, produced with great difficulty. Its fruit is of no ufe: its leaves are bitter, and the very fmell and fhade of it are dangerous. Hence the Romans looked upon it to be a fatal tree, and made ufe of it at funerals, and in mournful ceremonies. The wood of the cyprefstree is always green, very heavy, of a good fmell, and never either rots or is worm eaten. It is diftinguifhed into male and female: the branches of the male are, as it werc, horizontal; and thofe of the female are upright, which is therefore generally ufed for paliffades of gardens, and to make pyramids. The fruit is round, of an olive colour, and as large as nuts when they are ripe, and it grows in fcparate places. The Latins call it conus, becaufe of its figure. This fruit is compofed of a kind of feales, in the clefts of whicla are hidden little feeds, flat and angular. This tree is common on mount Libanus.

From the Gicek word Jisea; in Englifh, ten ; becaure he was anciently fet over ten canons or prebendaries at leaft in fome cathedral church. Aylife's Parcrgon.
As there are two foundations of cathedral churches in England, the old and the new, (the new are thofe which Henry VIII. upon fuppreffion of abbeys, transformed from abbot or prior, and convent to dean and chapter) to there are two means of creating thefe deans; for thofe of the old foundation are brought to their dignity much like bifhops, the king firft fending out his Conge de'eire to the chapter, the chapter then chufing, the king yielding his royal affent, and the bifhop confirming them, and giving his mandate to inftal them. Thofe of the new foundation are, by a fhorter courfe, inftalled by virtue of the king's letters patents, without either election or confirmation. This word is alfo applied to divers, that are chief of certain peculiar churches or chapels; as the dean of the king's chapel, the dean of the Arches, the dean of St. George's chapel at Windfor, and the dean of Bocking in Effex.

Cowel.
The dean and canons, or prebends of cathedral churches, in their firft inftitution, were of great ufe in the church: they were not only to be of counfel with the bifhop for his revenue, but chiefly for his government in caufes ecclefiaftical. Diamond. n. f. [diamant, French; allamas, Latin.]
The diamond, the moft valuable and hardeft of all the gems, is, when pure, perfectly clear and pellucid as the pureft water; and is eminently diftinguifhed from all other fubftances: by its vivid fplendour, and the brightnefs of its reflexions. It is extremely various in fhape and fize, being found in the greatef quantity very fmall, and the larger ones extremcly feldom met with. The largeft ever known is that in the pofleffion of the great Mogul, which weighs two hundred and feventy-nine carats, and is computed to be worth feven hundred and feventy-nine thoufand two hundred and forty-four pounds. The diamond bears the force of the Atrongeft fires, except the concentrated folar rays, without hurt; and even that infinitely fierceft of all fires does it no injury, unlefs directed to its weaker parts. It bears a glafs-houfe fire for many days, and, if taken carefully out, and fuffered to cool by degrees, is found as bright and beautiful as before; but if taken haftily out, it will fometimes crack, and even fplit into two or three pieces. The places where we have diamonds are the Eaft Indies and the Brafils; and though they are ufually found clear and colourlcfs, yet they aro fometimes Alightly tinged with the colours of the other gems, by the mixture of fome metalline particlés.

E.Has two founds; long, as fiène, and fhort, as men. $E$ is the moft frequent vowel in the Englifh language; for it not only is ufed like the reft in the beginning or end of words, but has the peculiar quality of lengthening the foregoing vowel, as cän, cīne; män, mīne; găp, gäpe; glüd, gläde; brïd, brïde; chin, chine; whip, wīpe; thin, thīne; nid, n̄̈de; tün, tīne; plum, plüme. Yet it fometimes occurs final, where yet the foregoing vowel is not lengthened; as göne, knowlëdge, ̆̈ldge, g.ve. Anciently almoft every word ended with $e$; as for $c a n$, canne; for year, yeare; for great, greate; for need, neede; for flock, flocke. It is probable that this e final had at firft a foft found, like the female $e$ of the French; and that afterwards it was in poetry either mute or vocal, as the verfe required,'till at laft it became univerfally filent.
$E a$ has the found of $e$ long: the $e$ is commonly lengthened rather by the immediate addition of a than by the appofition of $e$ to the end of the word; as mèn, mian; fill, fal; mit, mēat; nit, nēat.

The fpecies are, the common rough-leaved elm; the witch hazel, or broad-leaved elm, by fome called the Britifh elm; the fmooth-leaved or witch elm. It is generally believed neither of them were originally natives of this country; but they have propagated themfelves by feeds and fuckers in fuch plenty as hardly to be rooted out, where they have had long poffeffion; efpecially in hedgerows, where there is harbour for their roots, which will fend forth various twigs. They are very proper to place in hedgerows upon the borders of fields, where they will thrive better than when planted in a wood or clofe plantation, and their thade will not be very injurious to whatever grows under them. They are alfo proper to plant at a diftance from a garden, or building, to break the violence of winds; for they may be trained up in form of an hedge, keeping them cut every year, to the height of forty or fifty feet: but they fhould not be planted too near a garden where fruit-trees or other plants are placed, becaufe the roots of the elm run fuperficially near the top of the ground, and will intermix with the roots of other trees, and deprive them of nourifhment.
