PRINTING EXHIBITION

GRAPHIC ARTS

etting forth the fact that of all the specimens of printing shown at this great exhibition a large percentage were printed on handmade papers supplied exclusively by the Japan Paper Company.

This is the more significant since the exhibition contained specimens of printing from all parts of the United States and Canada; representing every variety of work from widely scattered sources, all indicating the unmistakable trend toward the use of handmade papers for the best printed matter.

CADE: "Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar school; and whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used; and, contrary to the king, his crown, and dignity, thou hast built a paper-mill."

—KING HENRY VI, Part 2, Act IV, Scene 7.

ACHIEVEMENT

THE American Institute of Graphic Arts held an exhibition of Printing in the galleries of the National Arts Club in New York, from May fifth to June first, Nineteen hundred and twenty.

The purpose of this exhibition was to assemble a representative collection of contemporary American printing, definitely to indicate the standards attained by the printing art in this country.

The announcement of the exhibition met with instant response from representative printers in all sections of the United States and Canada. Thousands of specimens were submitted to the Committee, and after careful examination over fifteen hundred were selected for exhibition.

The classification of exhibits included Books, Catalogues, Labels, Booklets, Circulars, Stationery, Calendars, Wrappers, Display Cards, Cards, Folders, Posters, Prints, Advertisements, Color Printing and Maps.

That the purpose of the exhibition was accomplished in large measure, is best evidenced by the enthusiastic interest displayed by the many devotees of the printing art who were daily visitors. Further indication of this is to be found in the published comments on the exhibition appearing in the trade publications and newspapers.

The Committee of Judges awarded gold, silver and bronze medals as announced elsewhere in this volume; The American Institute of Graphic Arts Gold Medal for the best specimen in the Exhibition was awarded to No. 277: book, 15x20, title "Old Masters Drawings," printed for Mortimer L. Schiff, printed by Norman T. A. Munder Company; cover French Marble paper; text 192 pages, end and fly leaf unbleached handmade Arnold paper; photogravure illustrations; exhibited by Norman T. A. Munder Company of Baltimore.

One outstanding feature of this great exhibition almost universally observed and widely commented on, is the large proportion of the exhibits printed, wholly or in part, upon paper supplied by the Japan Paper Company.

Of the total number of specimens shown in the various classes, the percentage of those on handmade papers were as follows:

Folders	49%	Posters	43%
Cards	51%	Prints (typographic)	25%
Labels	59%	Books	39%
Circulars	58%	Catalogues	12%
Stationery	22%	Booklets	40%

This is remarkable evidence of the influence of paper upon the advancement of the standards of the printing art.

Art lends inspiration to faith and faith finds expression in works. Twenty years ago the Japan Paper Company was founded upon faith in the idea that by upholding the finest traditions of the art of paper making and extending the market for its worthiest products, the printing and allied arts could best be served and their standards advanced.

This printing exhibition has furnished evidence that this faith was more than justified. It has demonstrated that the rare handmade papers from Europe and the Orient, handled exclusively by the Japan Paper Company, have been a powerful factor in the development of the printing art in the western hemisphere.

It has been the constant effort of this company to advance the interests of the Graphic Arts by making a special study of fine papers, by obtaining the finest grades from various parts of the world, and presenting them in the most attractive manner.

In the beginning of its business the company dealt exclusively in the products of Japan, hence the name, Japan Paper Company; later the papers of China and Korea were added, and as the appreciation of their possibilities warranted, the papers of the European makers were included.

The officers of the Company have traveled extensively through Europe and the Orient to obtain the finest products of foreign paper makers for the American market.

In the exploitation of these exceptional papers they have enjoyed the enthusiastic cooperation of progressive artists and printers who have not been lacking in appreciation of their unusual merits and artistic possibilities. The results were admirably shown in the printing exhibition in the remarkable collection of catalogues, booklets, folders, circulars, posters, labels and cards featuring these distinctive papers.

During the war, which made the supply of these foreign papers practically unavailable, the Japan Paper Company was able to render peculiarly valuable service to the Ordnance Department of the Government in producing certain useful materials unobtainable from any other source.

Since the termination of hostilities, trips have been made to Europe and the Orient by officers of the company, for the purpose of securing an early resumption of trade relations to meet the growing demand for these unusual papers of foreign manufacture.

It is generally conceded that the printing art has made more progress in the last twenty-five years than in the century preceding. It is not too much to say that one of the most helpful influences to which this progress must be attributed is the encouragement and sympathetic coöperation afforded to the earnest and progressive craftsmen by the Japan Paper Company in furnishing papers offering such tempting possibilities to the artist and printer. These papers by their very texture, color, substance and "feel" may, unadorned by design or text, suggest almost every human emotion as tenderness, virility, anger, vigor, daintiness, sentiment, strength, etc.

To the artist and printer blessed with a genuine appreciation of their distinctive charm they offer an endless opportunity for his best expression.

A brief reference to some of the principal sources of supply of these papers may not be without interest.

China, though the first country to engage in the paper making industry has been singularly lacking in its development. It is characteristic of the Chinese to cling to the past and to turn a deaf ear to the calls of progress. From the Chinese point of view that which the past accepted is good enough to meet the needs of today. This element in the Chinese character is exemplified by the fact that in common use may be found today many sheets of Chinese papers not varying in a single detail of quality, size, texture, color and crudity from their prototypes of many centuries past.

This has served to establish for these papers a place all their own, and has undoubtedly restricted the varieties of handmade papers of Chinese origin. Fortified by this isolation they stand apart untouched, unchanged by the progress of the new world. In this respect they perfectly typify the vast kingdom whence they come, so slow to open its doors to admit the wonders of modern progress. The Chinese papers bear the earmarks of the first great invention and suggest grimly the conditions of those dim days of the past which still live in China. A fair example of this is the Hang Chow representing the unchanging customs of centuries. Its merit lies in its appearance of age and the interest it cannot fail to attract by its warm tint and unusual texture. The poster "Old China" imprinted on this paper received the award of the silver medal in the poster class.

Japan, notwithstanding her close geographical relation to China seems to afford a peculiar contrast to her neighbor in the development of her paper-making industry. The Japanese more than any other nation have progressed in the art of producing fine papers of vegetable fibre.

Though originating in China, this industry has made its greatest strides in the land of Nippon. The Japanese have devised improvements which have left the products of Chinese paper makers far behind.

Indigenous to the Island are the Kodzu, Mitsumata and Gampi shrubs, from which Japan's entire output of native paper is made. These shrubs are very similar to the mulberry plant, and the soft beautiful lustre which characterizes Japanese paper is due to the peculiar silky texture of this fibre.

Domestic architecture in Japan was aided largely by the addition of paper as material for house building, in the form of the shoji (or window), and the use of the fan, parasol, lantern and screen, and above all as shown in the art of the people, by kakemonos and prints—all of early origin in Japan.

These led to a demand that rapidly developed and resulted in many new uses and in a manufacture that became practically universal throughout the island. So great is the variety now produced that it is impossible to offer any one sheet as typical of Japanese manufacture, but without doubt the best known is the famous handmade Japanese Vellum paper which is universally used for fine books and plate and process reproductions.

The many other styles, each in itself individual, are becoming more generally known and appreciated, through their adaptability to the interests of modern advertising, especially when the wares in question possess a character, worthy of reflection in the quality and novelty of the paper and when the artistic may vie with the commercial.

Spanish claims to the distinction of being the first country in Europe to engage in the manufacture of paper are disputed by Italy. Support is found for the claims of Spain in the fact that through the intercourse of wars the Chinese came into contact with the Arabs who acquired from them the secret of paper making and at once put it into practice with the use of linen and cotton rags obtained from their discarded cloaks and mantles. It was early in the eleventh century that this industry was started in the old city of Toledo whence it spread throughout the country. Departing from her traditions which have led her in most matters to cling to the old times and ancient customs Spain has, singularly enough, in her paper industry failed to carry on in the development of handmade papers. These are being gradually but certainly replaced by the machine made sheets. One or two "tubs" still survive however and the quality of their output is beyond question.

The excellent character of these papers and their limited variety but add to their value, and their resulting exclusiveness renders them particularly useful and interesting for certain purposes.

The pretensions of Italy as the first of the European countries to seriously undertake the making of papers are not to be ignored. To her must be accorded the credit for first introducing the use of animal size, replacing the vegetable size originally used by the Chinese.

Early in the eleventh century paper making was inaugurated at Amalfi and at Fabriano. Both mills are still in existence; the former little more than a relic; the latter a great plant, turning out the wonderful papers which bear its name.

In these mills the crude original forms are still largely used and the papers have lost little of their original character except that they have progressed in their adaptation to modern needs. One sheet in particular is still produced as it was in the early thirteenth century and it shows the great coarse screen and the crude watermark of the Star.

Among all of the handmade papers in present use those from the Italian mills have a peculiar charm of texture and color, and they fittingly adorn many delightful specimens of the printing art.

In France the making of paper is rated as a national industry. Its introduction is generally assigned to the latter part of the twelfth century and a French watermark is said to exist bearing date of 1282.

To Beaumarchais is accredited the preservation and conservation of three famous mills, one at Arches, one at Archettes, and one at Plombieres (all founded in 1492).

Mills were scattered about central and southern France especially in Lorraine, and Vosges, where the air, the brooks and the rivers were exceptionally pure, giving to the pulp the desired whiteness; for in paper making natural forces play a great part. Moreover, work with the hands was not considered menial, and the art was handed down from father to son as an inheritance, many of the smaller mills not even employing outside help, the women of the household taking part in the enterprise. The larger mills took on the form of schools or ateliers, where the boys were apprenticed for a term of years; thus the youths were brought up to love the trade which their forefathers had left them.

The works of art, the glory of the Renaissance were printed on the beautiful rag papers which the finesse and love of handiwork of the Frenchman had created, and today the fine books of France are still made with the same materials. That these materials have lived is due to their worth, and that this worth is just as inherent today as then, has been proved by their adaptation to works above the ordinary in this country.

England with characteristic conservatism was the last of the old world countries to engage in paper making. For many years the handmade papers for England were imported from France and Holland. Not until the sixteenth century was the industry firmly established in England though this followed a long period of experimentation dating back well into the previous century.

The same conservatism prevented development up to about 1685 when, as the records show, the Huguenots emigrating from France revived the industry and thus the art and mills were started in England on the same plan as in France, being handed down from father to son, from generation to generation.

So the handiwork was cultivated and continually bettered with typical British thoroughness, which culminated in the high standard demanded by William Morris in his shop at Kelmscott. Here he revolutionized the art of book making, the influence of which is still felt and demonstrated by many workshops and presses patterned after his. Not alone do his theories, ideals and books live, but the materials he used, designed as they were to meet his high requirements, still survive and are as representative of worth and quality today as at the time of their inception.

It is interesting in this connection to note that the Kelmscott paper is still made in the same way and by the same people. It naturally follows that a paper which answers such requirements is a safe medium to use today in any form of good advertising.

If England was the last of the European countries to enter the field of paper making, her advancement in the art has been equally notable. Indeed her progress in this industry has fully kept pace with her advancement in every manifestation of the graphic arts; and who does not pay tribute to her master craftsmen of this and the preceding century in "the art of all arts preservative?"

To those hereditary artisans of Orient and Occident whose skill, industry and ingenuity have developed and preserved for the use of the modern craftsmen these wonderful handmade papers, must be accorded a prominent place among the factors which make for printing of the highest quality. To the Japan Paper Company great credit is due for making these remarkable papers available to the printers of America.

The achievement of their high purpose is thus signalized as evidence of the vast influence of the paper makers in the advancement of the Art of Printing.
