THE DISUNIONISTS.

Of the four candidates for President there is but one who is openly and avowedly sustained by all the factions of the Disunion. The old adherents of Buck and Everett are dragged at the heels of the Union; those of Douglas and Johnson are not less ardent in their employment. Even the supporters of Lincoln and Hamlin, although professing sentiments infinitely dangerous to the country, still style themselves Union men. The leaders of the Breckinridge and Lane party alone call boldly to the Union. They allow, either directly or indirectly, either by frank and bold avowal, or by insinuations or innuendo, display their determination to break up the confederacy in the event of their failure to compass the election of their candidates. And, as they are positively certain in advance that their case is utterly hopeless—that Messrs. Breckinridge and Lane will be ignominiously defeated—we may say they are already preparing to strike a blow for the consummation of their odious design.

After the evidence furnished in these columns of the Disunion proclivities of the Breckinridge leaders, further testimony will scarcely be required. The proofs are positive and presumptive, direct and circumstantial. The blind persistence of the party in running an independent ticket in the Northern States, in the teeth of the fact that they have not the slightest chance of success, and that they only improve the prospects of Lincoln; the distinct admissions made repeatedly by Pryor Dickinson, and a host of other Democratic champions, that Douglas is no better than Lincoln; the fact that every prominent Disunion man in the land is an ardent Breckinridger, and that South Carolina, the hot-bed of Disunionism, supports him confessedly because his ticket is a sectional one; the additional fact that Breckinridge is strong only where the rank weed of Disunion flourishes with most luxuriance—all corroborate the validity of the charge. But we have still more convincing evidence at hand. The Nashua Democrat, published in the parish of Terrebonne, in this State, came out a few weeks ago in a article favoring the dismemberment of the Union, and the very next week displayed its kindred sympathies by raising the banner of Breckinridge and Lane. Within the last few days S. C. Elam, a prominent politician of the South, has declared himself in favor of Breckinridge, and in a letter explanatory of his reasons for so doing, avows that he affiliates with the Breckinridge faction, because it is the Disunion party. He joins it for the sake of Disunion, and nothing else. He loves the treason so devotedly as to be willing to unite heart and hand with any political organization which promises to further his views. Here is a passage from his letter which leaves no doubt of the sincerity of Mr. Elam's wishes:

And the controlling reason with me—Breckinridge's party position points to a remedy even in case of Lincoln's election—and to fully meet clearly as I should like—outright for a dissolution if Lincoln is elected—but the finger on the hand points that way. The party is now committed to resistance to Lincoln's inauguration that there is no escape from it except through a peace convention, or the assured ignominious defeat of the Breckinridge and his party. It will seem to abandon a great principle which, if clearly abandons them, and provide a government that will give protection for abolitionism, they might as well submit to Lincoln at once than their whole movement was gotten up and set on foot in order that the South might be saved prior to the election mercy of Black Republicans as speedily as possible. Breckinridge couldn't beat Lincoln if Douglas was out of the field—no party knew it. The belief that the party will follow its principles to their logical consequences draws me into its support.

So, to use the language of a contemporary, Mr. Elam has joined a party which his known cannot possibly succeed in electing its candidate, and which, as he himself acknowledges and proclaims, could not possibly succeed even if Douglas were out of the way; and he does so for the purpose, as he explains it and avows it, of breaking
