THE Classical Dictionary, published more than thirty years ago, of which this book is a revision, was designed by the late Sir WILLIAM SMITH to include in a single volume as much of the information contained in his larger Dictionaries of Biography and Mythology, and of Ancient Geography, as would be serviceable for the upper forms of schools, and might make it useful also as a compendious book of reference for somewhat more advanced students.

It was intended chiefly to elucidate the Greek and Roman writers usually read in schools, and to the characters and subjects dealt with in their works the greatest space was accordingly allotted; but a large number of shorter articles not included within those limits were added, as it was not considered expedient to omit any names connected with antiquity of which it is expected that some knowledge should be possessed by every person who aspires to a liberal education.

The book has for many years been found useful for the object for which it was written, and it is hoped that a revision with the advantages of the new light thrown by the writings of more recent scholars and explorers will be no less serviceable at the present time.

The design of this revised edition, projected by Sir WILLIAM SMITH more than two years ago, is much the same as that of the older work. It is intended for the use of the same class of students, as an aid in reading those Greek and Latin authors which will usually be studied by them. Hence the old limits are for the most part observed, and, as was then said, 'the historical articles include all the names of any importance which occur in Greek and Roman writers from the earliest times down to the extinction of the Western Empire in the year 476. Very few names are inserted which are not included in this period; but still there are some persons who lived after the fall of the Western Empire who could not with propriety be omitted in a Classical Dictionary. Such is the case with Justinian, whose legislation has exercised such an important influence upon the nations of Western Europe; with Theodoric, at whose court lived Cassiodorus and Boëthius; and with a few others.' Among the literary articles has been included some notice, necessarily brief in many cases, of all Greek and Latin authors whose works are extant, and others who exercised an important influence upon literature, but whose writings have not come down to us. For those, however, who wrote only on ecclesiastical subjects, the student is referred to the Dictionary of Christian Biography. It has been thought that it would be serviceable, and likely to encourage wider reading, to insert the more important ancient authorities (in literature) for each article: fuller references are generally to be found in the larger Dictionaries named above.

Since the publication of the older edition so much additional knowledge has been acquired in most branches of classical study that it has been found necessary, not merely to alter, but practically to rewrite many of the articles: this applies particularly to the articles on Mythology, and to many of those on Topography. Several new plans and maps have been inserted to illustrate the articles on those places which are most important in Greek and Roman literature. Among these are the map of the Troad and that of Syracuse, which is based upon one in Freeman's Sicily. For the alterations in the map of Athens, and for the description of the city, much help has been derived from Miss HARRISON'S Mythology and Monuments of Athens, from Dr. LOLLING'S treatise, and from Professor GARDNER'S New Chapters in Greek History, from which book also the plans of Tiryns, Eleusis, and Olympia, with much valuable information, have been taken. In altering the maps and plans of Rome, as well as in describing the topography, the Editor has been guided chiefly by Professor MIDDLETON'S Remains of Ancient Rome: for the alterations in the map of the Roman Wall in Britain, and for other kind help, he is indebted to Mr. HAVERFIELD. Several new cuts also have been substituted for those which were intended to illustrate the articles on mythology or on art.

Considerations of space have made it impossible to give any references to the modern authorities for each article, but it is thought that those who wish to make a fuller study of any matter which is here concisely treated will sometimes find useful a short Appendix which has been added to give a few of the more important and more accessible works in different branches of classical study. It must also serve to express obligations to the writers which the Editor could not acknowledge under the separate articles.

Throughout the progress of the work Sir WILLIAM SMITH constantly directed and supervised it with all his knowledge and patient carefulness up to the time of his death: the last part of the book has been deprived of the great advantage of his guidance.

G. E. MARINDIN.

A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY

BIOGRAPHICAL, MYTHOLOGICAL, AND GEOGRAPHICAL

ABA

Abā. [ABUS.]

Abacaenum ('Αβάκαινον or τὰ 'Αβάκαινα: 'Αβακαίνιμος: nr. Tripi, Ru.), a town of the Siculi in Sicily, about 4 miles from the N. coast, between Tyndaris and Mylae. The boar and acorn

Coin of Abacaenum in Sicily.

Obv., head of Zeus; rev., boar and acorn. Abacaenum refer to the forest of oaks covering the neighbouring mountains and affording pasture to herds of swine (Diod. xix. 65, 110).

Abae ('Αβαι: 'Αβαίος: nr. Evarchó, Ru.), a town in the N.W. of Phocis, said to have been founded by the Argive Abas. [ABAS, ABANTES.] It possessed a temple and oracle of Apollo (Soph. Oed. T. 899), hence surnamed Abacus. The temple was destroyed in the invasion of Xerxes, and a second time in the sacred war: it was rebuilt by Hadrian (Hdt. i. 46, viii. 27, 33, 134; Paus. x. 35).

Abālus, said by Pytheas to be an island in the northern ocean, where amber was found, probably a portion of the Prussian coast upon the Baltic (Plin. xxxvii. § 35; Diod. v. 23).

Abantes ('Αβαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Euboea (Hom. Il. ii. 536), hence called Abantis and Abantias (Eur. Herc. Fur. 185; Plin. iv. § 64). Hence Abantius, Euboean (Stat. S. iv. 8, 46). The Abantes are said to have first settled in Phocis, where they built Abae, and afterwards to have crossed over to Euboea. The Abantes of Euboea assisted in colonising several Ionic cities of Asia Minor (Hdt. i. 146).

Abantiādes, Abantias. [ABAS.]

Abantiās ('Αβαντίδας), murdered Clinias, the father of Aratus, and became tyrant of Sicyon, B.C. 264 (Plut. Arat. 2; Paus. ii. 8, 2).

Abāris, idis, acc. Abarim ('Αβαρις, idos). 1. A Hyperborean priest of Apollo who came to Greece, while his own country was visited by a plague, about B.C. 570. His history is mythical: he is said to have taken no earthly food, and to have ridden on his arrow, the gift of Apollo, through the air. He cured diseases by incantations, and delivered the world from a plague. Oracles and charms under his name passed current in later times (Hdt. iv. 36; Plat. Charm. p. 158; Paus. iii. 13, 2).—2. Or Avaris, the fortified camp of the Hyksos during their occupation of Egypt, on the E. of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 14). Hence Abāritānus (Plin. xvi. 172).

Abarnis ('Αβαρνις or 'Αβαρνός: 'Αβαρνέως), a town near Lampsacus on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont (Xen. Hell. ii. 1, 29).

Abas, antis ('Αβας, αντος), twelfth king of Argos, son of Lynceus, grandson of Danaus, and father of Acrisius. When he informed his father of the death of Danaus, he was rewarded with the shield of his grandfather, which was sacred to Hera. This shield performed various marvels. It was gained by Aeneas ('magnigestamen Abantis,' Verg. Aen. iii. 286). Abas is described as a successful conqueror and the founder of Abae in Phocis. [ABAE.] Hence (i.) Abantēus, adj. (Ov. M. xv. 164). (ii.) Abantiādēs ('Αβαντιάδης), a descendant of Abas; his son Acrisius (Ov. M. iv. 607), his great-grandson Perseus, by Danaë, daughter of Acrisius (Ov. M. iv. 673, Am. iii. 12, 24). (iii.) Abantias, ādis ('Αβαντίας, άδος), a female descendant of Abas, i.e. Danaë. [DANAË.]

Abātos, i. f. ('Αβατος, i.e. inaccessible), a rocky island in the Nile, near Philae (Sen. Q. N. iv. 2, 7; Luc. x. 323).

Abbassus, a town of Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Abdēra (τὰ 'Αβδῆρα, Abdera, ae. f., and Abdera, orum, n.: 'Αβδηρίτης, Abdērītes and Coin of Abdera in Thrace.

Obv., a griffin, as symbol of Apollo's worship; 'Callidans,' as the magistrate of the year; rev., 'Αβδηρίτων surrounding a square.

Abdērīta, ac, m.) 1. A town of Thrace, near the mouth of the Nestus. According to mythology, it was founded by Heracles in honour of ABDERUS; but according to history, it was colonised first by Timesius of Clazomenae about B.C. 656, and a second time by the inhabitants of Teos in Ionia, who settled there after their own town had been taken by the Persians 544 (Hdt. i. 168). Abdera was a flourishing town when Xerxes invaded Greece (Hdt. vii. 120), and continued a place of importance under the Romans, who made it a free city. It was the birthplace of Democritus, Protagoras, and Anaxarchus; but in spite of this its inhabitants passed into a proverb for stupidity (Juv. x. 50; Mart. x. 25, 4; Cic. Att. iv. 16 (17), vii. 7). Hence Abdēritānus, stupid (Mart. l. c.).—2. (Adra), a town of Hispania Baetica on the coast, founded by the Phoenicians (Strab. p. 157; Plin. iii. § 8).

Abdērus (Ἀβδηρος), a favourite of Heracles, torn to pieces by the mares of Diomedes (Apollod. ii. 5). [ABDERA.]

Abdōlōnŷmus or Abdālōnŷmus, also called Ballonŷmus (Diod. xvii. 46), a gardener, but of royal descent, made king of Sidon by Alexander the Great (Curt. iv. 1, 19; Just. xi. 10, 8).

Abella or Avella (Abellānus: Avella vecchia), a town of Campania, not far from Nola, founded by the Chalcedians in Euboea (Just. xx. 1), afterwards an Oscan town, was celebrated for its apples, whence Virgil (Aen. vii. 740) calls it mālīfera, and for its great filberts (cf. Sil. viii. 545), nuces Avellānae (Plin. xv. § 88).

Abellinum (Abellīnas: Avellino), a town of the Hirpini in Samnium (Plin. iii. § 63). Pliny (iii. § 105) speaks of two towns of this name: 'Abellinates cognomine Protropi' and 'Abellinates cognominati Marsi.'

Abelox, Abelux, or Abilyx (Ἀβιλυξ), a Spaniard of noble birth, who betrayed the Spanish hostages at Saguntum to the Roman generals (Liv. xxii. 22; Pol. iii. 98, &c.).

Abeōna (from abeo) and Adeōna, Roman goddesses who protected children in their first attempts to walk (Aug. Civ. Dei, iv. 21, vii. 3).

Abgārus, Acbārus, or Augārus (Ἀβγαρος, Ἀκβαρος, Ἀύγαρος), a name common to many rulers of Edessa, the capital of Osroēne in Mesopotamia (Tac. A. xii. 12). Of these rulers one is supposed by Eusebius (H. E. i. 33) to have been the author of a letter written to Christ, which is believed to be spurious.

Abia (ἡ Ἀβία: nr. Zarnata), a town of Messenia, on the Messenian gulf, said to have been the same as the Ire of the Iliad (ix. 292), and to have been called Abia after Abia, the nurse of Hyllus, a son of Heracles. Subsequently it belonged to the Achaean League, and existed in the time of Hadrian (Paus. iv. 30; Pol. xxv. 1).

Abii (Ἀβιοί), a Thracian tribe mentioned by Homer (Il. xiii. 6) as the justest of men (Strab. p. 296). At a later time they are described as a Scythian people in Asia (Curt. vii. 6, 11; Arr. An. iv. 1; Amm. xxiii. 6, 53).

Abila (τὰ Ἀβίλα: Ἀβιληνός). 1. A town of Coele-Syria, on the eastern slope of Anti-Libanus, afterwards called Claudiopolis, the capital of the tetrarchy of Abilēne.—2. A town in the Decapolis.

Abisārcs (Ἀβισάρης), also called Embisarus (Diod. xvii. 90), an Indian king beyond the river Hydaspes, sent embassies to Alexander the Great (Curt. viii. 43, 13, ix. 1, 7, x. 3, 20; Arr. An. v. 8, 3, 20, 5).

Abnōba Mons, the range of hills covered by the Black Forest in Germany, in which the Danube rises (Tac. G. 1; Plin. iv. § 79). Hence Abnoba Diana, or simply Abnoba, the goddess of this mountain (Orelli, Inscr. 1986, 4974).

Abōnitīchos (Ἀβόνιον τεῖχος), a town of Paphlagonia on the Black Sea, with a harbour, afterwards called Ionopolis (Ἰωνόπολις), whence its modern name Ineboli, the birthplace of the pretended prophet Alexander, of whom Lucian has left us an account (Strab. p. 545).

Abōrigīnes, the original inhabitants of a country, equivalent to the Greek αὐτόχθονες. But the Aborigines in Italy are in the Latin writers an ancient people who originally dwelt in the mountain districts round Reate, and drove the Siculi out of Latium, where they took the name of Latini from their king Latinus (Dionys. i. 9, 60; Liv. i. 1, 2; Sall. Cat. 6; Varr. L. L. v. § 53; Cic. Rep. ii. 3). We find, in the neighbourhood of Reate, a district called the Cicolano, vestiges of ancient cities which, from the polygonal style of their construction, have been referred to a very early period.

Aborrhās. [CHABORAS.]

Abradātas (Ἀβραδάτας), a king of Susa and an ally of the Assyrians against Cyrus, whose history and that of his wife Panthea are told in Xenophon's Cyropaedia (v. 1, 3, vi. 1, 31, &c.)

Abbrincatūi, a Gallic tribe (Plin. iv. § 107), whence the modern Avranches.

Abrocōmas (Ἀβροκόμας), a satrap of Artaxerxes Mnemon, sent with an army to oppose Cyrus on his march into Upper Asia, B.C. 401. He retreated before Cyrus (Xen. An. i. 3, 20, &c.).

Abrocōmes, son of Darius, slain at Thermopylae (Hdt. vii. 224).

Abroñichus (Ἀβρόνιχος), an Athenian served in the Persian war, B.C. 480, subsequently sent as ambassador to Sparta with Themistocles and Aristides (Hdt. viii. 21; Thuc. i. 91).

Abrotōnum, mother of THEMISTOCLES (Plut. Them. 1).

Abrotōnum (Ἀβρότονον), a Phoenician city on the coast of N. Africa, between the Syrtes, identified with Sabrāta, though Pliny makes them different places (Strab. p. 835; Plin. v. § 27). It formed, with Oea and Leptis Magna, the African Tripolis.

Absyrtides or Apsyrtides, sc. insulae (Ἀψυρτίδες: Cherso and Osero), two islands off the coast of Illyricum (Strab. p. 315; Plin. iii. § 151). [ABSURTUS.]

Absyrtus or Apsyrtus (Ἀψυρτος), son of Aeetes, king of Colchis, and brother of Medea. There are two accounts of his death. 1. According to one, Absyrtus was taken, when a small child, by Jason and Medea on their flight from Colchis, and was murdered by Medea, and his body cut in pieces, that her father might thus be detained by gathering them. Tomi, the place where this horror was committed, was believed to have derived its name from τέμνω, 'cut' (Ov. Tr. iii. 9, 5, Her. vi. 129, xii. 113; Cic. Leg. Man. 9, 22). 2. According to another tradition, Absyrtus, when a young man, was sent out by his father in pursuit of Medea. He overtook her in certain islands off the Illyrian coast, where he was slain by Jason (Hygin. F. 23, 26). Absyrtus is called by some writers Aegialeus (Pacuv. ap. Cic. N. D. iii. 19, 48; Diod. iv. 45; Just. xlii. 3).

Abūlites (Ἀβουλίτης), satrap of Susiana, surrendered Susa to Alexander, who restored to him the satrapy; but he and his son Oxyathres were afterwards executed by Alexander (Arr. An. iii. 16, vii. 4; Curt. v. 2; Diod. xvii. 65).

Aburnus Valens. [VALENS.]

Abus (δ Ἄβος) or Aba (Plin. v. § 83). a mountain in Armenia, identified with the Ararat of Scripture (Strab. pp. 527, 531).

Abus (Humber), a river in Britain.

Abydēnus (Ἀβυδηνός), a Greek historian of uncertain date, wrote a history of Assyria in the Ionic dialect, valuable for chronology. The fragments are given by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc. iv. 278.

Abýdos (ἡ Ἀβυδος, Abydum, Plin. v. § 141: Ἀβυδηνός, Abydenus). 1. A town of the Troad on the Hellespont, and a Milesian colony (Thuc. viii. 61) nearly opposite to Sestos, but a little lower down the stream. It is mentioned as an ally of the Trojans (Il. ii. 836). The bridge of boats which Xerxes constructed over the Hellespont, B.C. 480, commenced a little higher up than Abydos, and touched the European shore between Sestos and Madýtus (Herod. vii. 33). In 411 Abydus revolted from Athens (Thuc.

Coin of Abydos.
Obv., Artemis; rev., eagle.

viii. 62). On the conclusion of the war with Philip (B.C. 196), the Romans declared Abydus, with other Asiatic cities, to be free (Liv. xxxiii. 30). The names of Abydus and Sestos are coupled together in the story of Hero and Leander, who is said to have swum across the channel to visit his mistress at Sestos. Hence Leander is called Abydenus (Ov. H. xviii. 1; Stat. S. 1, 2, 87). Abydus was celebrated for its oysters (ostrifer, Verg. G. i. 207).—2. (Nr. Arabat el Matfoon and El Birbeh, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, near the W. bank of the Nile; once second only to Thebes, but in Strabo's time (A.D. 14) a small village. It had a temple of Osiris and a Memnonium, both still standing, and an oracle. Here was found the inscriptioun known as the Table of Abydos, which contains a list of the Egyptian kings (Strab. p. 813 sq.; Plut. Is. et Osir. 18; Plin. v. § 60).

Abýla or Abila Mons or Columna (Ἀβύλη or Ἀβίλη στήλη or ὄρος: Jebel Zatout, i.e. Apes' Hill, above Ceuta), a mountain in Mauretania Tingitana, forming the E. extremity of the S. or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum. This and M. Calpe (Gibraltar), opposite to it on the Spanish coast, were called the Columns of Hercules, from the fable that they were originally one mountain, which was torn asunder by Heracles (Strab. p. 829; Mel. ii. 6).

Acacallis (Ἀκακάλλις), daughter of Minos, by whom Hermes begot a son Cydon, and Apollo a son Miletus, as well as other children. Acacallis was in Crete a common name for a narcissus (Paus. viii. 52, 2; Athen. xv. p. 681).

Acacēsium (Ἀκακήσιον: Ἀκακήσιος), a town of Arcadia, at the foot of a hill of the same name (Paus. viii. 3, 2; 27, 4; 36, 10).

Acacēsius (Ἀκακήσιος), a surname of Hermes (Callim. Hym. in Dian. 143), for which Homer (Il. xvi. 185; Od. xxiv. 10) uses the form ἀκάκητα (ἀκακήτης). Some derive it from the town of Acacesium, others from κακός, the god who cannot be hurt, or who does not hurt. It is also given to Prometheus (Hes. Theog. 614), whence it may be inferred that its meaning is deliverer from evil.

Acacētes. [ACACESIUS.]

Acadēmīa or īa (Ἀκαδήμεια or Ἀκαδήμια: also Academia in the older Latin writers), a piece of land on the Cephissus, 6 stadia from Athens, originally belonging to the hero Academus (Plut. Thes. 32), and subsequently a gymnasium, adorned by Cimon with plane and olive plantations, statues, and other works of art (Diog. Laërt. iii. 7; Plut. Cim. 13; Paus. i. 29, 3). Here taught Plato, and after him his followers, who were hence called the Academici, or Academic philosophers (Cic. de Or. i. 21, 98, Fin. i. 1, 1). When Sulla besieged Athens in B.C. 87, he cut down the plane trees in order to construct his military machines (Plut. Sull. 12; App. Mithr. 30); but the place was restored soon afterwards. Cicero gave the name of Academia to his villa near Puteoli, where he wrote his 'Academica.' He had another Academia in his Tusculan villa (Cic. Tusc. ii. 3, 9, iii. 3, 7; ad Att. i. 4, 3).

Acadēmīci. [ACADEMIA.]

Acadēmūs (Ἀκάδημος), an Attic hero, who betrayed to Castor and Pollux, when they invaded Attica to liberate their sister Helen, that she was kept concealed at Aphidnae. For this the Lacedaemonians, whenever they invaded Attica, spared the Academy (Plut. Thes. 32; Theogn. 975; Hor. Ep. ii. 2, 45).

Acalandrus (Ἀκάλανδρος: Oalandro), a river in Lucania, flowing into the gulf of Tarentum (Plin. iii. 97; Strab. p. 280).

Acāmas (Ἀκάμας). 1. Son of Theseus and Phaedra, accompanied Diomedes to Troy to demand the surrender of Helen (Diod. iv. 62). He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse at the taking of Troy (Verg. Aen. ii. 262). The promontory of Acamas in Cyprus (Plin. v. § 129), the town of Acamantium in Phrygia, and the Attic tribe Acamantius, derived their names from him (Paus. i. 5, § 2). He was the tribe hero of the Ceramicus according to an inscription (Mitt. iv. 8).—2. Son of Antenor and Theano, slain by Meriones (Il. ii. 823, xii. 100, xiv. 476, xvi. 342).—3. Son of Eussorus, a leader of the Thracians in the Trojan war (Il. ii. 844, v. 462), slain by the Telamonian Ajax (Il. vi. 3).

Acanthus (Ἀκανθος), a Lacedaemonian, victor in the Olympic games in Ol. 15 (B.C. 720), the first who ran quite naked (Paus. v. 8, 3; Dionys. vii. 72; cf. Thuc. i. 6).

Acanthus. 1. (Ἀκανθος: Ἀκάνθιος, Acanthius: Erisso), a town on the isthmus connecting the peninsula of Acte with Chalcidice, and about 1½ mile above the canal of Xerxes. [ATHOS.] It was founded by a colony from Andros. Xerxes stopped here on his march into Greece (B.C. 480). It surrendered to Brasidas 424 and its independence was guaranteed in the treaty of peace made between Athens and Sparta. It afterwards became subject to Macedonia. In the war between the Romans and Philip (200) Acanthus was taken and plundered by the fleet of the republic. On the coin of Acanthus figured above is a lion killing a bull, which justifies the account of Herodotus (vii. 125), that on the march of Xerxes from Acanthus to Therme, lions seized the camels which carried the provisions (Hdt. vii. 115 seq., 121 seq.; Thuc. iv. 84 seq., v. 18; Xen. Hell. v. 2; Liv. xxxi. 45; Strab. p. 330).—2. (Dashour), a city of Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, 120 stadia S. of Memphis, with a temple of Osiris, so called from a sacred enclosure composed of the Acanthus (Strab. p. 809; Diod. i. 97).

Acarnān (Ἀκαρνάν, -ἄνος), one of the Epigoni, son of Alcmaeon and Callirrhœ, and brother of Amphiaterus. Their father was murdered by Phegeus when they were young, and Callirrhœ prayed to Zeus to make her sons grow quickly, that they might avenge their father's death. When they grew up, they slew Phegeus, and went to Epirus, where Acarnan founded the state called after him Acarnania (Thuc. ii. 102; Apollod. iii. 3, 5; Ov. M. ix. 413).

Acarnāniā (Ἀκαρνανία: Ἀκαρνάν, -ἄνος, Acarnan, ānis, acc. āna, pl. ānas, Liv. xxxvi. 11, 6; Epit. 53: αἰγ. Ἀκαρνάνικός, Acarnānicus), the most westerly province of Greece, was bounded on the N. by the Ambracian gulf, on the W. and SW. by the Ionian Sea, on the NE. by Amphilochia, which is sometimes included in Acarnania, and on the E. by Aetolia. It contained about 1,571 square miles. Its chief river is the Achelous, hence called 'amis Acarnan' (Sil. It. iii. 42) and 'amis Acaruanum' (Ov. M. viii. 569): the river god is represented on the coins of Acarnania as a bull with the head of a man. [ACHELOUS.] The name of Acarnania does not occur in Homer. In the most ancient times the land was inhabited by the Taphii, Teleboae, and Leleges, and subsequently by the Curetes, who emigrated from Aetolia and settled there (Strab. p. 465). At a later time a colony from Argos, said to have been led by ACARNAN, the son of Alcmaeon, settled in the country. In the seventh century B.C. the Corinthians founded several towns on the coast. The Acarnanians first emerge from obscurity at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 431, when they sided with the Athenians (Thuc. iii. 105 seq.). They were then a rude people, living by piracy and robbery, and they always remained behind the rest of the Greeks in civilisation and refinement. They were good slingers, and are praised for their fidelity and courage. They espoused the side of Philip in his war with the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 16, 17). The different towns formed a League with a Strategus at their head in the time of war: the members of the League met at Stratos, and subsequently at Thyrium or Leucas. Under the Romans Acarnania formed part of the province of Epirus.

Acastus (Ἀκάστος), son of Pelias, king of Iolcus, one of the Argonauts (Apoll. Rhod. i. 224), also took part in the Calydonian hunt (Ov. M. viii. 306). His sisters were induced by Medea to cut up their father and boil him, in order to make him young again, whereupon Acastus drove Jason and Medea from Iolcus, and instituted funeral games in honour of his father (Paus. iii. 18, 9; Apollod. i. 9, 27; Ov. M. vii. 297, seq. xi. 409). During these games Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, also called Hippolyte (called by Horace, Od. iii. 7, 17, Magnessa, from Magnesia in Thessaly, to distinguish her from the Amazon), fell in love with Peleus, who refused to listen to her addresses; whereupon she accused him to her husband of having attempted her dishonour (Pind. Nem. iv. 56, v. 25). Afterwards, when Acastus and Peleus were hunting on mount Pelion, Acastus took his sword from him when he had fallen asleep. He was in consequence nearly destroyed by the Centaurs; but he was saved by Chiron or Hermes, returned to Acastus, and killed him together with his wife.

Acbārus. [ABGARUS.]

Acca Lārentia (not Laurentia), a mythical woman in early Roman story, connected with the legends of Romulus and Hercules. (i.) According to one account she was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, and the nurse of Romulus and Remus after they had been taken from the she-wolf. She was the mother of twelve sons, and when one of them died Romulus stepped into his place, and took in conjunction with the remaining eleven the name of Fratres Arvales. From the play upon the words lupus and lupa, she was also represented as a prostitute (lupa), who left the property she gained in that way to the Roman people. A festival, Lārentālia [or Lārentinālia] was celebrated in her honour on the 23rd of December by the Flamen Quirinalis as the representative of Romulus in the Velabrum, where she died (Gell. vii. 7, 7; Plin. xviii. § 6; Ov. F. iii. 57; Macrob. i. 10, 11; Varr. L.L. vi. 23; Liv. i. 4). (ii.) According to another account, in the reign of Romulus or Ancus Martius a servant (aedituus) of the temple of Hercules invited the god to a game of dice, promising that if he should lose the game he would treat the god with a repast and a beautiful woman. When the god had conquered the servant, the latter shut up Acca Larentia, with the surname Fabula or Faula, a beautiful prostitute, together with a well-stored table, in the temple of Hercules. On the following morning the god advised her to gain the affections of the first wealthy man she should meet. She succeeded in making Tarrutius or Carutius, an Etruscan, love and marry her. After his death she inherited his large property, which she left to the Roman people (Gell. vii. 7, 6; Macrob. i. 10, 12, 16; Plut. Rom. 4, 5, Qu. R. 35; Lactant. i. 20, 5; August. C.D. vi. 7). The name Acca probably signifies mother (cf. Skr. akka), and the epithet Larentia probably refers to the 12 Lares or Arvales.

L. Accius or Attius, an early Roman tragic poet, son of a freedman, born B.C. 170, lived to a great age. Cicero, when grown up, conversed with him (Brut. 28). His tragedies were chiefly imitated from the Greeks, but he also wrote some on Roman subjects (Prætextata); one, entitled Brutus, was probably in honour of his patron D. Brutus (Cic. Arch. 11, 27; Leg. ii. 21, 54; Phil. i. 15, 36, ii. 3, 31; ad Att. xvi. 5). We possess only fragments of his tragedies, but they are highly spoken of by ancient writers (Cic. Plane. 24, 59, Sest. 56, 120; Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 56). He also wrote Annales in verse, containing the history of Rome; and three prose works, 'Libri Didascalicon,' apparently a history of poetry. The fragments of his tragedies are given by Ribbeck, Tragic. Lat. Reliq.; and those of the Didascalica by Madvig, Hafn. 1831.

Acco, a chief of the Senones in Gaul, induced his countrymen to revolt against Caesar, B.C. 53, by whom he was put to death (B. G. vi. 4, 44).

Accūa, a town of Apulia (Liv. xxiv. 20).

Acē. [PTOLEMAIS.]

Acerbas, a Tyrian priest of Heracles, who married Elissa, the sister of king Pygmalion (Justin. xviii. 4). In the narrative of Justin, Acerbas is the same person as Sichaeus, and Elissa the same as Dido in Virgil (Aen. i. 343 seq.), of whom the same tale is told. [DIDO.]

Acerrae (Acerrānus). 1. (Acerra), a town in Campania on the Clanius, received the Roman franchise in B.C. 332. It was destroyed by Hannibal, but was rebuilt (Liv. xxiii. 17, xxvii. 3). It suffered from the frequent inundations of the Clanius (Verg. G. ii. 225; Sil. It. viii. 357).—2. (Gerra), a town of the Insubres in Gallia Transpadana on the Adda, a fortified place (Pol. ii. 34; Plut. Marc. 6; Strabo, p. 247).—3. A town of Umbria with the epithet Vatrinæ (Plin. iii. § 114).

Acerrōniā, drowned in B.C. 59, when an attempt was made to drown Agrippina, the mother of Nero (Tac. Ann. xiv. 4; Dion Cass. lxi. 13).

Cn. Acerrōnius Procūlus, consul A.D. 37, in which year Tiberius died (Tac. Ann. vi. 45; Suet. Tib. 73).

Aces (Ἀκῆς), a river in central Asia, E. of the Caspian (Hdt. iii. 117).

Acēsās (Ἀκεσᾶς), born at Salamis in Cyprus, famed for weaving cloth with variegated patterns. He and his son Helicon were the first who made a peplus for Athena Polias (Ath. p. 18), which is mentioned by Euripides (Hec. 468) and Plato (Euthyphr. § 6).

Acēsīnes (Ἀκεσίνης). 1. (Chenaub), a river in India, into which the Hydaspes flows, and which itself flows into the Indus (Arr. An. v. 20, 13; Strab. p. 692; Ἀκεσίνος, Diod. ii. 37; Plin. vi. § 71, xvi. § 162).—2. (Cantara), a river in Sicily, near Tauromenium (Thuc. iv. 25), called by Pliny (iii. § 88) ASINES.

Acesta. [SEGESTA.]

Acestes (Ἀκέστης, Ἀλγέστος), son of a Trojan woman, Egesta or Segesta, sent by her father to Sicily, that she might not be devoured by the monsters which infested the territory of Troy. In Sicily the river-god Crimismus begot by her a son Acestes, who founded the town of Acesta or Segesta. Aeneas, on his arrival in Sicily, was hospitably received by Acestes (Verg. Aen. i. 550, v. 35; Ov. M. xiv. 83). Dionysius (i. 52) has a different legend.

Acestor (Ἀκέστωρ). 1. Surnamed Sacas, on account of his foreign origin, a tragic poet at Athens, and a contemporary of Aristophanes (Av. 31; Vesp. 1216).—2. A sculptor of Cnossus, about B.C. 452 (Paus. vi. 17, 2, x. 15, 4).

Achaei (Ἀχαιοί) are represented as descendants of Achaeus, the son of Xuthus and Creusa, and consequently the brother of Ion and grandson of Hellen (Apollod. i. 7, 3; Strab. 383; Paus. vii. 1, 2). There was no broad distinction of race between them and the Hellenes, whose name afterwards prevailed. Like the Hellenes, they were confined to the western side of the Aegean, except that Od. xix. 175 mentions them in Crete. [For the supposed Achaeans on Egyptian monuments of the 14th cent. B.C. see AEGYPTUS.] In the heroic age they are found in the southern part of Thessaly [ACHAIA, 1], and also in the eastern part of Pelepounesus, more especially in Argos and Sparta. Homer describes them as a brave and warlike people, and calls the Greeks in general Achaeans or Panachaeans (Παναχαιοί, Il. ii. 404, vii. 73, &c.). In the same manner Peloponnesus, and sometimes the whole of Greece, is called by the poet the Achaean land (Ἀχαιῆς γαῖα, Il. i. 254, Od. xiii. 249). So also the Roman poets use Achaia and the derivative adjectives as equivalent to Greece and Grecian (Ov. M. viii. 268, v. 306; Verg. Aen. ii. 462; Juv. iii. 61). On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, after the Trojan war, the Achaeans were driven out of Argos and Laconia, and those who remained behind were reduced to the condition of a conquered people. Most of the expelled Achaeans, led by Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, proceeded to the northern coast of Peloponnesus, which was called simply Aegialus (Ἀιγιαλός) or the 'Coast,' and was inhabited by Ionians. The latter were defeated by the Achaeans and crossed over to Attica and Asia Minor, leaving their country to their conquerors, from whom it was henceforth called Achaia (Strab. p. 383; Paus. vii. 1; Pol. ii. 41; Hdt. i. 145). [ACHAIA.]

Achaemēnes (Ἀχαιμένης). 1. Ancestor of the Persian kings, who founded the family of the Achaemenidae (Ἀχαιμενίδαι), which was the noblest family of the Pasargadae (Hdt. i. 125; iii. 75, vii. 11; Hor. Od. ii. 12, 21). The Roman poets use Achaemenius in the sense of Persian (Ov. M. iv. 212; Hor. Carm. iii. 1, 4).—2. Son of Darius I., governor of Egypt, commanded the Egyptian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, B.C. 480. He was killed in battle by Inarus the Libyan, 460 (Hdt. iii. 12, vii. 7, 97; Diod. xi. 74).

Achaemēnides, or Achēmēnides, a companion of Ulysses, who left him behind in Sicily when he fled from the Cyclops. Here he was found by Aeneas (Verg. Aen. iii. 614; Ov. M. xiv. 161, Pont. ii. 2, 25 and 167).

Achaeus (Ἀχαιός). 1. Son of Xuthus, the mythical ancestor of the ACHAEI.—2. Of Eretria in Euboea, a tragic poet, born B.C. 484. In 447, he contended with Sophocles and Euripides, and though he brought out many dramas, he only gained the prize once. In the satirical drama he possessed considerable merit (Diog. Laërt. ii. 133; Athen. p. 451; Ov. Ib. 543). The fragments have been published by Urlichs (1834) and Rauch, Trag. Graec. Fragm. (1856).—3. A later tragic poet, a native of Syracuse, wrote ten tragedies.—4. Governor under Antiochus III. of all Asia W. of mount Taurus, revolted against Antiochus, and was put to death, B.C. 214 (Pol. iv. 51, 68, viii. 17, seq.; Ov. Ib. 301).

Achāia (Ἀχᾶία, Ion. Ἀχαιῆ; Ἀχαιός, Achaeus, Achivus, fem. and adj. Ἀχαιῖς, Achāias, Achāias, Achāis; Adj. Ἀχαιῖος Achāiōs, Achāiūs).

A district in the S. of Thessaly, in which Phthia and Hellas were situated, the original abode of the Achaeans, who were hence called Phthiotan Achaeans (Ἀχαιοὶ οἱ Φθιώται) to distinguish them from the Achaeans in the Peloponnesus. It was from this part of Thessaly that Achilles came (Il. ii. 684). This district retained the name of Achaia in the time of Herodotus (vii. 173, 197), and the inhabitants of Phthia were called Phthiotan Achaeans till a still later period (Thuc. viii. 3).—2. A province in the N. of Peloponnesus, extended along the Corinthian gulf from the river Larissus, a little S. of the promontory Araxus, which separated it from Elis, to the river Sythas, which separated it from Sicyonia. On the S. it was bordered by Arcadia, and on the SW. by Elis. Its greatest length along the coast is about 65 English miles: its breadth from about 12 to 20 miles. Its area was about 650 square miles. Achaia is thus only a narrow slip of country, lying upon the slope of the northern range of Arcadia, through which are deep and narrow gorges, by which alone Achaia can be invaded from the south. From this mountain range descend numerous ridges running down into the sea, or separated from it by narrow levels. The original inhabitants were Pelasgians, called Aegialeis (Αἰγιαλεῖς), or the 'Coast-Men,' from AEGIALUS or AEGIALEIA (Αἰγιαλός, Αἰγιαλεία, Il. ii. 575, Paus. vii. 1, 1; Strab. p. 383), the ancient name of the country, though some writers sought a mythical origin for the name, and derived it from Aegialeus, king of Sicyonia (Hdt. vii. 94; Paus. vii. 1). The Ionians subsequently settled in the country, from which they were expelled by the Achaeans, whence the country was called Achaia. [ACHAEI.] The Achaei settled in 12 cities: Pellene, Aegira, Aegae, Bura, Helice, Aegium, Rhyppae, Patrae, Pharae, Olenus, Dyme, and Tritaea (Hdt. i. 145). Leontium and Ceryneia were afterwards substituted for Rhyppae and Aegae. These cities are said to have been governed by Tisamenus and his descendants till Ogyges, upon whose death a democratical form of government was established in each state; but the twelve states formed a league for mutual defence and protection. In the Persian war the Achaei took no part; and they had little influence in the affairs of Greece till the time of the successors of Alexander. In B.C. 281 the Achaei, subject to the Macedonians, renewed their ancient league to combine the states of the Peloponnesus for the purpose of shaking off the Macedonian yoke. This was the origin of the celebrated Achaean League. It at first consisted of only four towns, Dyme, Patrae, Tritaea, and Pharae, but was subsequently joined by the other towns of Achaia with the exception of Olenus and Helice. It did not, however, obtain much importance till 251, when Aratus united to it his native town, Sicyon. The example of Sicyon was followed by Corinth and many other towns in Greece, and the League soon became the chief political power in Greece. It was undoubtedly a misfortune that Aratus rejected a union with Sparta and sought the aid of Macedon (see further under ARATUS, CLEOMENES, PHILOPOEMEN.) In the following century the Achaei declared war against the Romans, who destroyed the League, and thus put an end to the independence of Greece. Corinth, then the chief town of the League, was taken by the Roman general Mummius, in B.C. 146. The different states composing the Achaean League had equal rights. The assemblies of the League were held twice a year, in the spring and autumn, in a grove of Zeus Homagyrus near Aegium. At these assemblies all the business of the League was conducted, and at the spring meeting the public functionaries were chosen. These were:—1. a Strategus (στρατηγός) or General, and an Hipparchus (ἵππαρχος) or commander of the cavalry; 2. a Secretary (γραμματεὺς); and 3. ten Demiurgi (δημιουργοί, also called ἄρχοντες), who appear to have had the right of convening the assembly.—3. The Roman province, including the whole of Peloponnesus and the greater part of Hellas proper with the adjacent islands. It is usually stated by modern writers that the province was formed on the conquest of the Achaeans in B.C. 146; but it is more probable that the south of Greece was first made a separate province by Julius Caesar: since the first governor of the province of whom any mention is made was Serv. Sulpicius, and he was appointed to this office by Caesar (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6. § 10). In the division of the provinces made by Augustus, the whole of Greece was divided into the provinces of Achaia, Macedonia, and Epirus. Achaia was one of the provinces assigned to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul (Strab. p. 840; Dio Cass. liii. 12). Tiberius in the second year of his reign (A.D. 16) took it away from the senate and made it an imperial province (Tac. Ann. i. 76), but Claudius gave it back again to the senate (Suet. Claud. 25). In the reign of this emperor Corinth was the residence of the proconsul, and it was here that the Apostle Paul was brought before Junius Gallio as proconsul of Achaia (Acta Apost. xviii. 12).

Achāicus, a surname of L. Mummius, who conquered Corinth. [MUMMIUS.]

Acharnae (Ἀχαρναί: Ἀχαρνεὺς, Pl. Ἀχαρνῆς, Acharnāus, Nep. Them. 1; Adj. Ἀχαρνανικός), the principal demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, 60 stadia N. of Athens, near the foot of Mount Parnes, possessed a rough and warlike population, who were able to furnish 3,000 hoplitae at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. Their land was fertile, and they carried on a considerable traffic in charcoal. One of the plays of Aristophanes bears the name of the inhabitants of this demus (Thuc. ii. 13, 19–21; Pind. Nem. ii. 25; Paus. i. 31, 6; Athen. p. 234; Stat. Th. xii. 623).

Acharrae, a town in Thessaliotis in Thessaly, on the river Pamisus (Liv. xxxii. 13), apparently the same place as the Acharne of Pliny (iv. § 32).

Achates, ae. 1. A Trojan, the faithful friend of Aeneas (Verg. Aen. i. 120; Ov. Fast. iii. 603).—2. A river in the SW. of Sicily, remarkable for the clearness of its waters, in which the first agate is said to have been found (Sil. It. xiv. 208; Plin. iii. § 90; Theophr. Lap. § 31).

Achēlōides. [ACHELOUS.]

Achēlōus. 1. (Ἀχελῷος, Ἀχελῷος in Hom.: Aspro Potamo), the largest river in Greece, rises in Mount Pindus, and flows southward, forming the boundary between Acarnania and Aetolia, and falls into the Ionian sea opposite the islands called Echinades, formed by the alluvial deposits of the river (Thuc. ii. 102). It is about 130 miles in length. The god of this river is described as the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and as the eldest of his 3,000 brothers (Hes. Theog. 340). He fought with Heracles for Deianira, but was conquered in the contest. He then took the form of a bull, but was again overcome by Heracles, who deprived him of one of his horns, which however he recovered by giving up the horn of Amalthea, which became the horn of plenty (Soph. Trach. 9, 510; Ov. M. viii. 880, ix. 1). This legend alludes apparently to efforts made to check the ravages of the river inundations, whence large tracts of land were gained for cultivation, which are expressed by the horn of plenty (Strab. p. 459). When Theseus returned from the Calydonian chase, he was hospitably received by Achelous, who related to him in what manner he had changed certain nymphs into the islands called Echinades (Ov. Met. viii. 577-611). The Achelous was regarded as the ruler and representative of all fresh water in Hellas. Hence he is called by Homer (Il. xx. 194) Κρείων Ἀχελῷος, and was worshipped as a mighty god throughout Greece. He was regarded as the representative of all flowing water, so that the name is often used by the poets as equivalent to water (Ephor. ap. Macrob. v. 18; Aesch. Pers. 869; Eurip. Bacch. 625; Aristoph. Lys. 381). The root ἄχ- probably means water, and appears in aqua. The river god is represented on the coins of Acaruania and Oeniadae as a bull with the head of a man. [See coins under ACARNANIA and OENIADAE.]—Hence Acheloiades, contr. Acheloides, i.e. the Sirenes, the daughters of Achelous (Ov. Met. v. 552, xiv. 87): Acheloiā Callirhoē, because Callirhoē was the daughter of Achelous (Ov. Met. ix. 413): poecula Acheloiā, i.e. water in general (Verg. Georg. i. 9): Acheloius heros, that is, Tydeus, son of Oeneus, king of Calydon, Acheloius=Aetolian (Stat. Theb. ii. 142).—2. A river of Thessaly, in the district of Malis, flowing near Lamia (Strab. pp. 434, 450).—3. A mountain torrent in Arcadia, flowing into the Alpheus, from the north of Mount Lycaeus (Paus. viii. 38, 9).—4. Also called PEIRUS, a river in Achaia, flowing near Dyme (Strab. pp. 342, 450).

Achēmēnides. [ACHAEMENIDES.]

Acherdus (Ἀχερδοῦς, οὐντρος; Ἀχερδοῦσιος), from ἄχερδος, a wild pear-tree, a demus of Attica of uncertain site, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis. Aristophanes (Eecl. 362), in joke, uses the form Ἀχραδοῦσιος instead of Ἀχερδοῦσιος (Aeschin. in Tim. § 110).

Acherini, the inhabitants of a small town in Sicily, mentioned only by Cicero (Verr. iii. 43).

Acheron (Ἀχέρων, also Acheruns, untis, Plaut. Capt. v. 4, 2; Acheros, Liv. viii. 24), the name of several rivers, all of which were, at least at one time, believed to be connected with the lower world. It has the same root ἄχ- as Achelous=aqua, but was derived by the ancients from ἄχος, ὁ ἄχθ βέων.—1. A river in Thesprotia in Epirus, which flows through the lake Acherusia, and, after receiving the river Cocytus, flows into the Ionian sea, now Gurila, or river of Suli (Thuc. i. 46; Strab. p. 324). On its banks was an oracle called νεκρομαντεῖον (Hdt. v. 92), which was consulted by evoking the spirits of the dead.—2. A river in Elis which flows into the Alpheus (Strab. p. 344).—3. A river in Southern Italy in Bruttii, on which Alexander of Epirus perished (Liv. viii. 24; Strab. p. 256; Justin. xii. 2).—4. The river of the lower world, usually identified with the Acheron in Thesprotia. [No. 1.] In the Iliad the Styx is the only river of the lower world, but in the Odyssey (x. 513) the Acheron appears as the river of the lower world, into which the Pyriphlegethon (Πυριφλεγέθων, Fire-blazing) and Cocytus (Κόκκυτος, Wailing), a tributary of the Styx, flow. Across the river the shades had to be carried to reach the lower world (Eurip. Ale. 440; Verg. Aen. vi. 295). Acheron is frequently used in a general sense to signify the whole of the lower world (Soph. Ant. 805; Verg. Aen. vii. 312; Hor. Od. i. 3, 36; Nep. Dion. 10). The Etruscans too were acquainted with the worship of Acheron (Acheruns). Their Acheruntici libri treated of the deification of the souls, and of the sacrifices (Acheruntia sacra) by which this was to be effected.—Hence Adj. Ἀχερούσιος, Acherūsian; Ἀχερόντιος, Acherontēus, Acheronticus, Acherunticus.

Achērontiā (Acerenza), a town in Apulia on Mount Vultur, whence Horace (Od. iii. 4, 14) speaks of celsa nidum Acherontiae.

Acherūsia (Ἀχερουσία λίμνη or Ἀχερουσίς), the name of several lakes believed to be connected with the lower world. 1. In Thesprotia. [ACHERON].—2. (Lago di Fusaro) in Campania, so called in consequence of its proximity to Avernus. [AVERNUS.] (Strab. pp. 243, 245; Plin. iii. § 6).—3. Near Hermione in Argolis (Paus. ii. 35, 10).—4. Near Heraclea in Bithynia (Xen. An. vi. 2, 6).—5. In Egypt near Memphis (Diod. i. 96).

Achilla or Acholla (Ἀχόλλα; Ἀχολλαῖος; Achillitānus; El Aliah, Ru.), a town on the coast of Africa, in the Carthaginian territory, above the N. point of the Syrtis Minor (Strab. p. 331; Liv. xxxiii. 48; B. Afric. 33-43).

Achillas (Ἀχιλλᾶς), commander of the Egyptian troops, when Pompey fled to Egypt B.C. 48. He and L. Septimius killed Pompey. He resisted Caesar, and was put to death by Arsinoë, the sister of Ptolemy, B.C. 47 (Caes. B. C. iii. 104 seq., B. Al. 4; Luc. viii. 538).

Achilles (Ἀχιλλεύς, Ἀχιλεῦς, εὖς, Ep. ἦος; Lat. is, &c., also gen. Achillēi, Hor. Od. i. 15, 4; Achilli, Verg. Aen. iii. 87; acc. Achillēa, Luc. x. 523; abl. Achilli, Ov. Pont. iii. 3, 43; adj. Ἀχιλλεῖος, Ion. Ἀχιλλῆϊος, Achillēus), the great hero of the Iliad.—Homeric story. Achilles was the son of Peleus, king of the Myrmidones in Phthiotis, in Thessaly, and of the Nereid Thetis (Il. xx. 206 &c.). From his father's name he is often called Pelides, Pelēiades, and Pelion (Πηλεΐδης, Πηληϊάδης, Πηλεῖων, Il. xviii. 316; i. 1; i. 197; Verg. Aen. ii. 263), and from his grandfather Aeacides (Αἰακίδης, Il. ii. 860; Verg. Aen. i. 99). He was educated, along with Patroclus, his life-long friend (Il. xxiii. 84), by Phoenix, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war (Il. ix. 485, xi. 832), and by Chiron, the centaur, who taught him the healing art (xi. 232). His mother Thetis foretold him that his fate was either to gain glory and die early or to live a long but inglorious life (ix. 410). The hero chose the former, and therefore when Ulysses and Nestor came to Phthia to persuade him to take part in the Trojan war he followed them willingly, though he knew he was not to return (xi. 765). Accompanied by Phoenix and Patroclus, he led his hosts of Myrmidones, Hellenes, and Achaeans, in fifty ships, against Troy (ii. 681). Here the swift-footed Achilles was the great bulwark of the Greeks, and the worthy favourite of Athene and Hera. When, in the tenth year of the war, Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseis to her father, he threatened to take away Briseis from Achilles, who surrendered her on the persuasion of Athene, but at the same time refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. Zeus, on the entreaty of Thetis, promised that victory should be on the side of the Trojans until the Achaeans should have honoured her son. The Greeks were defeated, and were at last pressed so hard that an embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseis; but in vain. At last, however, he was persuaded by Patroclus to allow the latter to make use of his men, his horses, and his armour. Patroclus was slain, and when this news reached Achilles he was seized with unspeakable grief. Thetis consoled him, and promised new arms, to be made by Hephaestus, and Iris exhorted him to rescue the body of Patroclus. Achilles now rose, and his thundering voice alone put the Trojans to flight. When his new armour was brought to him, with the celebrated shield described at length by Homer, he hurried to the field of battle. He slew numbers of Trojans, and at length met Hector, whom he chased thrice around the walls of the city. He then slew him, tied his body to his chariot, and dragged him to the ships of the Greeks. After this, he burnt the body of Patroclus, together with twelve young captive Trojans, who were sacrificed to appease the spirit of his friend; but he gave up the body of Hector to Priam, who came in person to beg for it. Achilles was slain at the Scaean gate, by Paris and Apollo, before Troy was taken. His death itself does not occur in the Iliad, but it is alluded to in a few passages (xxii. 358, xix. 417, xxi. 278). It is expressly mentioned in the Odyssey (xxiv. 36), where it is said that his fall—his conqueror is not mentioned—was lamented by gods and men, that his original name, Ligyron, i.e. the 'whining,' into Achilles (Pind. Nem. iii. 51; Stat. Achill. i. 269 &c.; Hor. Epod. 13, 11). Chiron fed his pupil with the hearts of lions and the marrow of bears. According to other accounts, Thetis endeavoured to make Achilles immortal by dipping him in the river Styx, and succeeded with the exception of the heel, by which she held him (Stat. Achill. i. 269). When he had reached the age of nine, Calchas declared that Troy could not be taken without his aid; and Thetis, knowing that the war would be fatal to him, disguised him as a maiden, and introduced him among the daughters of Lycomedes of Scyros, where he was called by the name of Pyrrha on account of his golden locks. Here he remained concealed till Ulysses visited the place in the disguise of a merchant, and offered for sale some female dresses, amidst which he had mixed some arms. Achilles discovered his sex by eagerly seizing the arms, and then accompanied Ulysses to the Greek army. During his residence at Scyros, one of his companions, Deïdamia, became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. [For the events at Aulis and the pretext of marrying Iphigenia to him, see his remains, together with those of Patroclus, were buried in a golden urn which Dionysus had given as a present to Thetis, and were deposited on the coast of the Hellespont, where a mound was raised over them. Achilles is the principal hero of the Iliad; he is the handsomest and bravest of all the Greeks; affectionate towards his mother and his friends; formidable in battles, which are his delight; open-hearted and without fear, and at the same time susceptible to the gentle and quiet joys of home. His greatest passion is ambition, and when his sense of honour is hurt he is unrelenting in his revenge and anger, but withal submits obediently to the will of the gods.—Later traditions. These chiefly consist of accounts which fill up the history of his youth and death. His mother, wishing to make him immortal, concealed him by night in fire, in order to destroy the mortal parts he had inherited from his father, and by day anointed him with ambrosia. But Peleus one night discovered his child in the fire, and cried out in terror. Thetis left her son and fled, and Peleus entrusted him to Chiron, who educated and instructed him in the arts of riding, hunting, and playing the phorminx, and also changed

IPHIGENIA; for the healing of Telephus by Achilles, see TELEPHUS.] In the war against Troy, Achilles slew Penthesilea, an Amazon, but was deeply moved upon discovering her beauty; and when Thersites ridiculed him for his tenderness of heart, he killed the scoffer by a blow with the fist. He fought with Memnon and slew the young Troilus (Q. Smyrn. ii. 480; Verg. Aen. i. 474). Both incidents are favourite subjects with vase-painters. In the former the mothers of the combatants watch the fight, or Zeus is represented weighing the life of Achilles against that of Memnon. The accounts of his death differ much, though all agree in stating that he did not fall by human hands, or at least not without the interference of the god Apollo. According to some traditions, he was killed by Apollo himself (Soph. Philoct. 334; Hor. Od. iv. 6, 8), as had been foretold (Il. xxi. 278). According to others Apollo merely directed the weapon of Paris against Achilles, and thus caused his death, as had been suggested by the dying Hector (Verg. Aen. vi. 57 Ov. M. xii. 601; Il. xxii. 358). Others again relate that Achilles loved Polyxena, a daughter of Priam, and tempted by the promise that he should receive her as his wife, if he would join the Trojans, he went without arms into the temple of Apollo at Thymbra, and was assassinated there by Paris. His body was rescued by Ulysses and Ajax the Telamonian; his armour was promised by Thetis to the bravest among the Greeks, which gave rise to a contest between the two heroes who had rescued his body. [AJAX.] After his death, Achilles became one of the judges in the lower world, and dwelled in the islands of the blessed, where he was united with Medæa or Iphigenia. The fabulous island

Achillēum (Ἀχιλλεῖον), a town near the promontory Sigæum in the Troad, where Achilles was supposed to have been buried (Hdt. v. 94; Strab. p. 594; Arr. An. i. 12).

Achilleus, assumed the title of emperor under Diocletian, reigned over Egypt, and was put to death by Diocletian A.D. 296 (Eutrop. ix. 14, 15; Aur. Vict. Caes. 39).

Achillēus Dromos (Ἀχιλλεῖος δρόμος: Tendera or Tendra), a tongue of land in the Euxine Sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes, where Achilles is said to have made a race-course. Before it lay the Island of Achilles (Insula Achillis) or Leuce (Λευκή), where was a temple of Achilles (Hdt. iv. 55, 76; Eur. Iph. in T. 438; Pind. Ol. ii. 85; Strab. p. 306).

Achillēus Portus (Ἀχιλλεῖος λιμὴν: Vaithy), a harbour in Laconia, near the promontory Taenarum (Paus. iii. 25, 4).

Achillides, a patronymic of Pyrrhus, son of Achilles (Ov. Her. viii. 3), also of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who traced his descent from Achilles (Ov. Ib. 303).

Achillis Insula. [ACHILLES DROMOS.]

Achivi (gen. pl. Achivom, Verg. Aen. xi. 226), another form of the Achæi, and used, like Achæi, to signify the whole Greek nation (Hor. Ep. i. 2, 14; Ov. Pont. i. 4, 33, Her. i. 21).

Acholla. [ACHILLA.]

Acholōe. [HARPYIAE.]

Achrādina or Acrādina. [SYRACUSAE.]

Acichōrius (Ἀκισχόριος), one of the leaders of the Gauls, who with Brennus invaded Thrace and Macedonia in B.C. 280, and Greece in 279 (Paus. x. 19, 4; x. 22, 5; x. 23, 1).

Acidālia, a surname of Venus (Verg. Aen. i. 720), from the well Acidalius near Orchomenos.

Acidinus, L. Manlius. 1. A Roman general in the second Punic war, served against Hasdrubal in 207, and was sent into Spain in 206, where he remained till 199 (Liv. xxix. 1-3, xxxii. 7).—2. Surnamed FULVIANUS, praetor B.C. 188 in Nearer Spain, and consul in 179 with his own brother Q. Fulvius Flaccus, which is the only instance of two brothers being consuls at the same time (Liv. xxxviii. 35, xl. 34; Vell. Pat. ii. 8; Cic. de Or. ii. 64).

Acilia Gens, plebeian. See under the family names AVIOLA, BALBUS, GLABRIO.

Acis (Ἄκισ), son of Faunus and Symaethis, beloved by the nymph Galatea, and crushed by Polyphemus the Cyclops through jealousy under a huge rock. His blood gushing forth from under the rock was changed by the nymph into the river Acis, at the foot of Mount Aetna (now Fiume de Jaci). This story is perhaps only a fiction suggested by the manner in which the stream springs forth from under a rock (Ov. M. xiii. 750 seq., F. iv. 468; Sil. It. xiv. 221 seq.). Theocritus (Id. i. 69) speaks of the sacred waters of Acis.

Acmonia (Ἀκμονία: Ἀκμονίτης, Acmonensis), a city of the Greater Phrygia (Cic. Flacc. 15, 34; Plin. v. § 106).

Acmonides, one of the three Cyclopes in Ovid (F. iv. 288), is the same as Pyracmon in Virgil of Leuce in the Euxine was especially sacred to him. [ACHILLEUS DROMOS.] Achilles was worshipped in several places as one of the national heroes of Greece; as at Pharsalus, Tanagra, and Sparta: in Epirus even as a god. The remarkable worship on the coasts of the Euxine may have been spread by the Milesian settlement at Byzantium, perhaps combined with the worship of some local heroes. Various explanations of his name are given. Most of the ancients connect it with ἄχος, because Achilles gave pain to the Trojans. Some writers regard him as originally a river god, arguing that ἄχ-, like the root in ACHELOS, may signify water, as in aqua. Others make him a sun-god, as they have attempted to make the whole Iliad a representation of the sun taking possession of the east. There is certainly more connexion in the story of Achilles with water divinities than with the sun: it is even possible that some part of his story may be borrowed from local rituals of river or sea deities; but there is no valid reason why the reader of Greek poets should not see in the main story of Achilles the glorification in ballads of a traditional hero of war, in no degree suggested originally by any phenomena of nature; still less are we obliged to base his story on any of the supposed etymologies of his name.

Achilles Tattius, of Alexandria, lived in the middle of the fifth century of our era, and is the author of a Greek romance in eight books, containing the adventures of two lovers, Clitophon and Loucippe, published by Fr. Jacobs, Lips. 1821. He must be distinguished from Achilles Stattius, or Tattius, who probably lived in the second century of our era, and wrote a work on the sphere (περὶ σφαιρας), a fragment of which, professing to be an introduction to the Phaenomena of Aratus, is printed in Petavii, Uranologia, Paris, 1630.

Acœtes (Ἀκοίτης), a poor Maconian (Ly-dian), or Tyrrhenian, who served as pilot in a ship. The sailors, landing at the island of Ceos, brought with them on board a beautiful boy asleep, whom they wished to take with them; but Acœtes, who recognised in the boy the god Bacchus, dissuaded them from it, but in vain. When the ship had reached the open sea the boy awoke, and desired to be carried to Naxos, his native island. The sailors promised to do so, but did not keep their word; where-upon the god disclosed himself in his majesty; vines began to twine round the vessel, tigers appeared; and the sailors, seized with madness, jumped into the sea, and were changed into dolphins. Acœtes alone was saved and conveyed to Naxos, where he was initiated in the Bacchic mysteries. This is the tale related by Bacchus himself, in the form of Acœtes, to Pentheus (Met. iii. 582 seq.). The story is founded on the Homeric Hymn to Diouysus.

Acontius (Ἀκόντιος), a beautiful youth of Ceos. Having come to Delos to celebrate the festival of Diana, he fell in love with Cydippe, and in order to gain her he had recourse to a stratagem. While she was sitting in the temple of Diana, he threw before her an apple upon which he had written the words 'I swear by the sanctuary of Diana to marry Acontius.' The nurse took up the apple and handed it to Cydippe, who read aloud what was written upon it, and then threw the apple away. But the goddess had heard her vow, and the repeated illness of the maiden, when she was about to marry another man, compelled her father to give her in marriage to Acontius. This story is related by Ovid (Her. 20, 21), who borrowed it from a lost poem of Callimachus, entitled 'Cydippe.'

Acœris (Ἀκωρίς), king of Egypt, assisted Evagoras, king of Cyprus, against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, about b.c. 385. He died about 374, before the Persians entered Egypt in the following year (Diod. xv. 2-4, 8, 9, 29, 41, 42).

Acræ. [ACRÆE.]

Acræ Leuce (Ἄκρα Λευκή), a city of Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by Hamilcar Barca (Diod. xxv. 2), probably identical with the Castrum Album of Livy (xxiv. 41).

Acræe (Ἄκραί).—1. (Acrensens, Plin.; Palazzo), a city of Sicily, on a lofty hill 24 miles W. of Syracuse, was founded by the Syracusans 70 years after its parent city, i.e. b.c. 663 (Thuc. vi. 5; Liv. xxiv. 36; Plin. iii. § 91).—2. A town in Aetolia (Pol. v. 13).—3. (or Ἄκρα). A town in the Cimmerian Bosphorus (Strab. p. 494; Plin. iv. § 86).

Acræa (Ἄκραία), and Acræus, surnames given to various goddesses and gods whose temples were situated upon hills, such as Zeus, Hera, and others (Liv. xxxii. 23, xxxviii. 2).

Acræpheus. [ACRÆPHIA.]

Acræphia, Acræphiae, or Acræphion (Ἀκραίφια, Ἀκραίφιαί, Ἀκραίφιον: Ἀκραίφιος, Ἀκραίφιαῖος; Kardhitza), a town in Boeotia, on the lake Copais, founded by Acræpheus, the son of Apollo. It contained an oracle of Apollo Ptous (Hdt. viii. 135; Strab. p. 410; Liv. xxxiii. 29; Paus. ix. 23, 5; Plin. iv. § 26).

Acrægas. 1. [AGRIGENTUM].—2. A celebrated engraver (Plin. xxxiii. § 154).

Acratus, a freedman of Nero, sent into Asia and Achaia (A.D. 64) to plunder the temples (Tac. Ann. xv. 45, xvi. 23).

Acriæ (Ἀκριαί, or Ἀκραίαι: Ἀκριάτης), a town in Laconia, not far from the mouth of the Eurotas (Paus. iii. 21; Pol. v. 19; Liv. xxxv. 27; Strab. p. 343, 363).

Acrillæ (Ἀκριλλὰ), a town in Sicily between Agrigentum and Acræe (Liv. xxiv. 35).

Acrisîonê, Acrisîoniâdês. [ACRISIUS.]
Acrisius (Ἀκρίσιος), son of Abas, king of Argos. He expelled his twin-brother, Proetus, from his inheritance; but supported by his father-in-law, Iobates the Lycian, Proetus returned, and Acrisius was compelled to share his kingdom with him. Acrisius held Argos, and Proetus Tiryns. An oracle had declared that Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius, would give birth to a son who would kill his grandfather. For this reason he kept Danaë shut up in a subterranean apartment, or in a brazen tower. But here she became mother of Perseus by Zeus, who visited her in a shower of gold. Acrisius ordered mother and child to be exposed on the sea in a chest; but the chest floated towards the island of Seriphus, where both were rescued by Dictys. As to the manner in which the oracle was subsequently fulfilled, see PERSEUS (Hdt. vi. 53; Verg. Aen. vii. 372; Ov. M. iv. 607 seq.; Hor. Od. iii. 16, 5).—Hence Acrisîonê (Ἀκρισιώνη), Danaë, daughter of Acrisius (Il. xiv. 319). Acrisîoniâdês, Perseus, son of Danaë, grandson of Acrisius (Ov. M. v. 70). Acrisîonêus, adj.: arces, i.e. Argos (Ov. M. v. 239); coloni, muri, referring to Ardea, supposed to have been founded by Danaë (Verg. Aen. vii. 410; Sil. i. 661).

Acrîtas (Ἀκρίτας, Ἀκρίτας: C. Gallo), the most southerly promontory in Messenia (Strab. p. 359; Paus. iv. 31, 12; Plin. iv. § 15).

Acro. [ACRON.]

Acrôcæraunia (τὰ Ἀκροκεράυνια, sc. ὄρη: sing. Acrocæraunium prom. Plin. iii. § 97; C. Linguetta), a promontory in Epirus, jutting out into the Ionian sea, the most W. part of the CERAUNI MONTES. It was dangerous to ships, whence Horace (Od. i. 3, 20) speaks of infames scopulos Acrocæraunia (comp. Luc. v. 652; Sil. viii. 632). Hence any dangerous place (Ov. R. Am. 739).

Acrôcôrînthus. [CORINTHIUS.]

Acrôlissus. [LISSUS.]

Acron. 1. King of the Caeninenses, whom Romulus slew in battle, and whose arms he dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius as Spolia Opima (Prop. v. 10, 7). Livy (i. 10) mentions the circumstance, without giving the name of the king.

—2. An eminent physician of Agrigentum in Sicily, said to have been in Athens during the great plague (b.c. 430) in the Peloponnesian war, and to have ordered large fires to be kindled in the streets for the purpose of purifying the air. This fact is not mentioned by Thucydides (Diog. Laert. viii. 65; Plut. Is. et Os. 80).

Acron Helenius, a Roman grammarian of uncertain date, perhaps of the second century A.D., wrote a commentary on Horace, on some comedies of Terence, and perhaps on Persius. His commentary on Horace does not exist; that which bears his name is the work of another writer, perhaps Porphyryon. It is published with the other scholia on Horace by Pauly (2nd ed. 1861), and Hauthal (1864, 1866).

Acrôpôlis (ἡ Ἀκρόπολις). The Acropolis of Athens, also called by the Athenians Polis (Πόλις), from the city being originally confined to the Acropolis (Thuc. ii. 15, v. 23, 5; cf. Aesch. Eum. 687), was a rock about 150 feet high, 1,150 long, and 500 broad. Upon it, as a defensible site rising out of the river valley, the original settlement was made, whose name Cecropia (Strab. 397; Eur. Suppl. 658, El. 1289) expresses the belief, doubtless correct, that it existed before the union of Attica attributed to Theseus.—Traces of Buildings earlier than 500 B.C. Our knowledge of the earlier buildings has been greatly increased by recent excavations. On some parts of the rock foundations of the rude dwellings of early inhabitants have been discovered, and graves of the same age, with primitive pottery of the type known as 'Mycenaean.' To a very early period must be ascribed also the remains of what was called the Pelasgian Wall, i.e. a wall which was prehistoric to the Greek writers who mention it (Hdt. ii. 137, v. 64), but still available in the age of Peisistratus. This wall did not surround the whole rock, since the natural precipice on the N. and NE. needed no fortification. In other parts portions of this wall have been discovered [see plan]. It followed the edge of the rock and sometimes falls within the lines of the straighter wall of Cimon, which in other places absorbed it. It is necessary to distinguish the Pelasgian Wall from τὸ Πελασγικὸν or Πελαργικὸν (Thuc. ii. 117; Aristoph. Av. 851), which was a space of ground beneath the Acropolis at the SW., perhaps of the pediments and statues of more than three temples have been found under the floor, so to speak, of the Acropolis. It has been held by some that this older temple whose foundations we see was rebuilt and preserved after the Persian repulse; but to this it is with justice objected that since it would have presented a blank wall within six feet of the porch of the newer Erechtheum it is impossible to admit that it was standing after that porch was built.—The Acropolis after the Persian War. The present form of the surface is due to Cimon. The natural rock surface sloped somewhat from the centre to the sides, and has been compared to a low-pitched gable roof. To level this sufficiently for the projected works, Cimon built up solid walls all round the edge of the platform and filled up the space between these walls and the highest ridge with earth and rubble, composed in great part of the débris left after the Persians burnt the earlier buildings. In this substratum many pieces of archaic sculpture and architecture, and many inscriptions, have been found. To the same Cimonian period belongs the great bronze statue of Athene Promachos, armed with spear and helmet, which dominated the city and was extending from Pan's cave to the Asclepiacum, a space which was to be left vacant, since, as was said, a curse was laid upon its occupation. Probably the origin of its being considered unlucky was that for military reasons it had been held advisable from 'Pelasgian' times to keep this ground clear from buildings which might shelter an approaching foe; the cause in all probability of the similar prohibition against building on the Roman pomerium [Dict. Ant. s.v.] On the Acropolis the early chiefs and kings of Athens had their palace, the foundations of which have been recently found near the Erechtheum, as well as traces of stairs in the rock leading thence into the plain at the NE. corner. It is known from inscriptions that a temple of Athene called the Hecatompedon stood on the Acropolis before the Persian invasion, and of this the foundations have been found just S. of the Erechtheum. It had two treasuries behind the cella, one probably for Athene and the other for the other deities there worshipped. It is probable that there was also in the time of Peisistrates an earlier Parthenon and an earlier Erechtheum occupying part of the sites of the later temples; indeed fragments seen far out to sea.—Acropolis in the Time of Pericles. The greatest works were carried out under Pericles. For the approach to the Acropolis the plan of Cimon was set aside, which gave only a narrow and defensible gateway (defence being less necessary since the fortification of the whole city was completed), and the magnificent Propylaea were designed by Mnesicles in B.C. 437. In the marble wall there were five gateways, the central being the largest, and admitting a sloping carriage-way; the two gates on each side were reached by five steps; beyond was a portico, and rising above this another portico. On each side of the entrance were wings, each intended to have a small outer and a large inner hall (in the smaller northern hall were paintings by Polygnotus, whence it was sometimes called the Pinakotheke); but the plan of making the wing on the right or south side symmetrical in size and form with the left wing was not carried out, probably because it would have encroached on sacred ground; for in this part of the Acropolis were the temple of Nike Apteros (Athene-Nike) and the sanctuary of Artemis Brauronia beyond it. To the right of the entrance to the

Propylaea is still visible the base of Agrippa's statue [see Plan]. This was set up by the Athenians after Agrippa's third consulship, B.C. THENON; to the left or N. of the Parthenon the ERECHTHEUM [see the separate articles]. Next in importance on the Acropolis to the wor-

27. As each one passed through the upper portico of the Propylaea he saw the great statue of Athene Promachos towering above his head; to the right-front of this the Par-ship of Athene was that of Artemis Brauronia, whose sanctuary was noted above as standing next to the temple of Nike Apteros just to the south-east of the Propylaea, and whose rites were probably the survival of an older religion in this place than that of Athene. [ARTEMIS.] No remains of any temple of Artemis are discoverable, nor have we any warrant for assuming its existence: the steps leading up to the sacred precinct are still visible. Between this precinct and the Parthenon are the foundations of a building, not a temple, and a portico; this was probably the Chalcotheke, a building in which was stored all that was required for the service of Athene (C.I.A. ii. 61); some have imagined the remains to belong to a temple of Athene Ergane; but we have no reason to suppose that there was any such temple. E. of the Parthenon, a little NW. of the modern museums, are the foundations of the small temple of Rome and Augustus, of which the fragment of the epistyle has been found with the dedication to the emperor under the title Σεβαστός, which he assumed in B.C. 27 (C.I.A. iii. 63). NE. of this, about 150 yards E. of the great statue and visible from it (if we assume that the old temple between the Erechtheum and the Parthenon was not rebuilt), stood in the open air the great altar of Athene, of which the base is visible cut in the rock. To the N. of the Parthenon, midway between it and the foundations of the old temple is visible cut in the rock the inscription for the base on which stood the statue of 'Earth praying Zeus to send rain' (Paus. i. 24); another base remains to give us a fixed point—the base of the statue of Athene Hygieia, which is found by the southernmost column of the eastern portico of the Propylaea. This statue was dedicated by Pericles to commemorate the recovery of a mason who fell from the Propylaea; near it once stood the bronze lioness in honour of the mistress of Aristogeiton, the statue of Aphrodite by Calamis, of Diitrephes (of which the base has been found not in situ), and of Perscus by Myron. About 200 feet west of the N. porch of the Erechtheum are the remains in the rock of the steps leading down from the Acropolis to the cave of AGRAULOS, in the temenos of which the oaths of the Ephebi were taken [Dict. Ant. s. v. Ephebi.] It lay near the base of the northern rocks of the Acropolis known as 'the long rocks' (Μακρά). The well called the Olepsydra (Aristoph. Lys. 911) has been identified at the NW. angle of the Acropolis outside the Cimonian walls. It was walled in by the Greek commander Odysseus in 1822 to secure his water supply. This 'Bastion of Odysseus' is now removed. A little to the east of this, in the side of the northern rocks, are the two caves of Apollo and Pan (Eur. Ion, 492; Paus. i. 28, 4). The sculptures of the Gigantomachia, which Attalus sent, and from which a figure of Dionysus fell during a storm into the Theatre (Paus. i. 25, 2; Plut. Ant. 60), must have been on the south wall near the site of the modern museums.

Acroëra (ἡ Ἀκρόρεια: Ἀκρωρεῖοι) a mountainous tract of country in the north of Elis. (Diod. xiv. 17 Xcn. Hell. iii. 2, 30, vii. 4, 14).

Acrotatus (Ἀκρότατος). 1. Son of Cleomenes II. king of Sparta, went to Sicily in 314 to assist the Agrigentines against Agathocles of Syracuse. But at Agrigentum he acted with such cruelty that the inhabitants rose against him. He returned to Sparta, and died in 309 before his father, leaving a son, Areus, who succeeded Cleomenes (Diod. xv. 70; Paus. iii. 6, 1; Plut. Agis, 3).—2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Areus I. king of Sparta, bravely defended Sparta against Pyrrhus in 272; succeeded his father in 265, but was killed in the same year in battle against Aristodemus, tyrant of Megalopolis (Plut. Pyrrh. 26–28; Agis, 3; Paus. iii. 6, 3).

Acrothoum or Acrothōi (Ἀκρόθων, Ἀκρόθωοι: Ἀκρόθωος, Ἀκροθωτηῆς: Lavra), a town near the extremity of the peninsula of Athos (Hdt. vii. 22; Thuc. iv. 109; Strab. p. 331).

Actaea (Ἀκταία), daughter of Nereus and Doris (Il. xviii. 41; Hes. Theog. 249).

Actaeon (Ἀκταίων). 1. Son of Aristaeus and Autonoe, a daughter of Cadmus, a celebrated

Actaeon. (British Museum.)

huntman, trained by the centaur Chiron. He was changed into a stag by Artemis (Diana), and torn to pieces by his fifty dogs on Mount Cithæron, because he had seen the goddess bathing with her nymphs, or because he had boasted that he excelled her in hunting. After the dogs had devoured him, they went whining in search of their master, till they came to the cave of Chiron, who appeared them by making an image of Actaeon (Ov. M. i. 131 seq.; Callim. H. in Pallad. 107 seq.; Eurip. Bacch. 380; Apollod. iii. 4, 4). According to several modern writers the fifty hounds of Actaeon are the fifty dog-days, and the myth represents the plant-life destroyed by the heat of the dog-days; for Actaeon was the son of the protector of plants (see ARISTAEUS). It is difficult, however, to explain upon this theory why they were his own hounds.—2. An Argive, son of Melissus, and grandson of Abiron. He was a beautiful youth, whom Archias endeavoured to carry off; but in the struggle which ensued Actaeon was killed (Plut. Narr. Am. 2). [ARCHIAS.]

Actaeus (Ἀκταῖος), son of Erisichthon, the earliest king of Attica, derived his name from Acte, the ancient name of Attica (Paus. i. 2, 6). He had three daughters, Agraulos, Herse, and Pandrosus, and was succeeded by Cecrops, who married Agraulos.

Acte (Ἀκτὴ), properly a piece of land running into the sea, and attached to another larger piece of land, but not necessarily by a narrow neck. 1. An ancient name of Attica, used especially by the poets (Eur. Hel. 1674; Strab. p. 391). Hence Ἀκταῖος, Actaeus, adj., Attic, Athenian (Ov. M. ii. 720, ex Pont. iv. 1, 31, Her. xviii. 42). Also Actias, ἄdis, a female Athenian, i.e. Ori-thyia, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens (Verg. G. iv. 463); also called Actaea (Ov. M. vi. 711).—2. The eastern coast of Peloponnesus near Troezen and Epidaurus (Pol. v. 91, 8; Diod. xv. 31).—3. The peninsula between the Strymonic and Singitic gulfs, on which Mount Athos is (Thuc. iv. 109).—4. The concubine of Nero, originally a slave from Asia Minor (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12, 46).

Actiæus. [ACTIUM.]

Actium (Ἀκτιον; Eth. Ἀκτιος, Actius; Adj. Ἀκτιακός, Actiacus, also Ἀκτιος, Actius: La Punta, not Azio), a promontory in Acarnania at the entrance of the Ambraciot Gulf (Gulf of Arta) off which Augustus gained his celebrated victory over Antony and Cleopatra, September

Plan of Actium.

1. Ruins of Prevesa; 2. C. La Scara; 3. Prom. Actium. La Punta; 4. C. Madonna; 5. Temple of Apollo. Fort La Punta; 6. Azio; P. Bay of Prevesa.

2nd B.C. 31. There was a temple of Apollo on this promontory (Thuc. i. 29; Strab. p. 325), whence Apollo was called Actius and Actiacus (Ov. M. xiii. 715; Verg. Aen. viii. 704; Prop. iv. 6, 67). There was an ancient festival named Actia celebrated here in honour of the god. Augustus after his victory enlarged the temple, and revived the ancient festival, which was henceforth celebrated once in four years (ludi quinquennales), at NICOPOLIS on the opposite coast, which Augustus founded in commemoration of his victory (Dio Cass. li. 1; Suet. Aug. 18, Tib. 6; Verg. Aen. iii. 280; Hor. Ep. i. 18, 61 Ov. Her. xv. 166). Statius (S. iii. 2, 120) gives the epithet of Actius to Cleopatra, because she was conquered at Actium. The annexed map shows the site of Actium, which has been the subject of dispute. The promontory of Actium was at La Punta (3), opposite Prevesa (1), near the site of the ancient Nicopolis. Others erroneously place it at C. Madonna (4), misled by the modern name Azio. The fleet of Antony was stationed in the Bay of Prevesa (P), and sailed out through the strait between 1 and 3 into the open sea, where the battle was fought, not in the Bay of Prevesa, as some suppose.

Actias. [ACTE; ACTIUM.]

Actisānes (Ἀκτισάνης), king of Ethiopia, conquered Egypt (Diod. i. 60; Strab. p. 759).

Actius. [ATTIUS.]

Actor (Ἀκτωρ). 1. Father of Menoetius, and grandfather of Patroclus (Il. xi. 785; Pind. Ol. ix. 104).—2. Father of Eurytus and Cteatus (Apollod. ii. 7, 2; Paus. v. 1, 11).—3. An Orchomenian, father of Astyoche (Il. ii. 513; Paus. ix. 37, 6).—4. A companion of Aeneas (Verg. Aen. ix. 500).—5. An Anruncan, of whose conquered lance Turnus made a boast (Verg. Aen. xii. 94, Juv. ii. 100).—Hence Actōrides (Ἀκτορίδης), a descendant of Actor: Patroclus (Ov. M. xiii. 273, Tr. i. 9, 29; F. ii. 39); Erithos (Ov. M. v. 79); Echeclus (Il. xvi. 189); Eurytus and Cteatus (Ov. M. viii. 308). Also, Actorion (Ἀκτορίων), a descendant of Actor: Eurytus and Cteatus (Il. ii. 621, xi. 750).

Aculeō. 1. C. Furius, quaestor B.C. 187 (Liv. xxxviii. 55).—2. C., an eminent Roman lawyer, who married the sister of Helvia, the mother of Cicero, was a friend of the orator L. Licinius Crassus (Cic. de Or. i. 43, 191; ii. 1, 2; Brut. 76, 264).

Acūsilaus Ἀκουσίλαος), of Argos, an early Greek logographer, about B.C. 525, wrote in the Ionic dialect three books of Genealogies, chiefly a translation of Hesiod into prose. The fragments are published by Sturtz, Lips. 1824, and in Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec. i. p. 100.

Ada (Ἄδα), sister of Maussolus, king of Caria, married her brother Idrieus, on whose death (B.C. 344) she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her brother Pixodarus in 340. When Alexander entered Caria in 334, Ada, who was in possession of the fortress of Aliuda, surrendered this place to him. After taking Halicarnassus, Alexander committed the government of Caria to her (Arr. An. i. 23; Diod. xvi. 42, 74; Plut. Alex. 10, 22).

Adamantēa. [AMALTHEA.]

Adamantius (Ἀδαμάντιος), a Greek physician, about A.D. 415, the author of a treatise on Physiognomy, borrowed from Polemo. Edited by Franzius, in Script. Phys. Vet. 1780, 8vo.

Addua (Adda), a river of Gallia Cisalpina, rising in the Rhaetian Alps near Bormio, and flowing through the Lacus Larius (L. di Como) into the Po, about 8 miles above Cremona (Pol. ii. 32; Strab. pp. 192, 204; Tac. Hist. ii. 40).

Adherbal (Ἀδέρβας). 1. A Carthaginian commander in the 1st Punic war defeated the Roman consul P. Claudius in a sea-fight off Drepana, B.C. 249 (Pol. i. 49-52).—2. A Carthaginian commander in the 2nd Punic war; was defeated in a sea-fight off Carthage by C. Laelius in 206 (Liv. xxviii. 30).—3. Son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, had the kingdom of Numidia left to him by his father in conjunction with his brother Hiempsal and Jugurtha, 118. After the murder of his brother by Jugurtha, Adherbal fled to Rome, and was restored to his share of the kingdom by the Romans in 117. But he was again stripped of his dominions by Jugurtha and besieged in Cirta, where he was treacherously killed by Jugurtha in 112 (Sall. Jug. 5, 13, 14, 24, 25, 26).

Adiabēnē (Ἀδιαβηνή, Ἀδιαβηνός) a district of Assyria, E. of the Tigris, between the river Lycus, called Zabatus by Xenophon, and the Caprus, both being branches of the Tigris. In the Christian era it was a separate kingdom, tributary to the Parthians (Strab. pp. 505, 745).

Adimantus (Ἀδείμαντος). 1. Commander of the Corinthian fleet, when Xerxes invaded Greece (B.C. 480), opposed the advice of Themistocles to give battle to the Persians (Hdt. viii. 5, 56, &c.).—2. An Athenian, one of the commanders at the battle of Aegospotami, B.C. 405; was accused of treachery in this battle, and is ridiculed by Aristophanes in the 'Frogs' (Xen. Hell. i. 7, 1, ii. 1, 30; Arist. Ran. 1513).—3. Brother of Plato (Apol. p. 34; Rep. ii. p. 367).

Admētē (Ἀδμήτη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Thetys (Hes. Th. 349).—2. Daughter of Enrystheus, for whom Heracles fetched the girdle of Ares, which was worn by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons (Apollod. ii. 5, 9).

Admētus (Ἀδμητος). 1. Son of Pheres, king of Pherae in Thessaly, took part in the Calydonian hunt and in the expedition of the Argonauts. Pelias promised him his daughter Alcestis (Il. ii. 715), if he came to her in a chariot drawn by lions and boars. This Admetus performed by the assistance of Apollo. The god tended the flocks of Admetus when he was obliged to serve a mortal for a year for having slain the Cyclops. On the day of his marriage with Alcestis, Admetus neglected to offer a sacrifice to Artemis, but Apollo reconciled the goddess to him, and at the same time Adonis, -is, -idis, also Adon, -ōnis). 1. A beautiful youth, beloved by Aphrodite (Venus), a son of Cinyras, king of Paphos in Cyprus, and Myrrha (Smyrna). The gods changed Myrrha into a myrtle-tree, to save her from the wrath of her father, for whom she had an unholy passion; and from this tree Adonis was born, the offspring of Myrrha and her father. Aphrodite, charmed with the beauty of the infant, concealed him in a chest, which she entrusted to Persephone; but the latter refused to give it up. Zeus decided the dispute by declaring that Adonis should have a third of the year to himself, should belong to Persephone for another third, and to Aphrodite for the remaining third. Adonis, however, preferring to live with Aphrodite, also spent with her the four months over which he had control. Having offended Artemis, he was killed during the chase. The spot on which his blood fell was sprinkled with nectar by Aphrodite, and from this sprang the anemone, as well as other flowers. So great was the grief of the goddess, that the gods of the lower world allowed him to spend six months of every year with her upon the earth (Apollod. iii. 14, 3; Ov. M. x. 298 seq.; A. A. i. 75, 512; Verg. E. x. 18). The worship of Adonis, which in later times was spread over nearly all the countries round the Mediterranean was of Phoenician or Syrian origin, in which language Adon signifies lord. In the Homeric poems no trace of the worship occurs, and the later Greek poets changed the original symbolic account of Adonis into a poetical story. In the Asiatic religions Aphrodite was the fructifying principle of nature, and Adonis appears to have reference to the death of nature in winter and its revival in spring—hence he spends six months in the lower and six in the upper world. His death and his return to life were celebrated in annual festivals (Adonia) at Byblos, Alexandria in Egypt, Athens, and other places. A special feature in this worship was the 'Adonis garden' (Ἀδωνίδος κήποι), or bowers of plants in flower surrounding his image to show the revival of plant life, soon to die again. The Idyll of Theocritus called Adoniazusae describes the celebration of this festival at Alexandria.—2. (Nahr el Ibrahim.) A small river of Syria, rising in Mount Libanus, which, after a sudden fall of rain, is tinged of a deep red by the soil of the hills. Hence some have sought to explain the myth of Adonis (Strab. p. 755; Lucian, Dea Syr. 6; Plin. v. § 78).

Death of Adonis.

Heracles and Alcestis.

induced the Moirae to grant him deliverance from death if his father, mother, or wife would die for him. Alcestis died in his stead, but was brought back by Heracles from the lower world (Apollod. i. 9, 15; Eurip. Ale.)—2. King of the Molossians, to whom THEMISTOCLES fled for protection when pursued as a party to the treason of Pausanias (Thuc. i. 136; Plut. Them. 24; Nep. Them. 8).

Adōnis (Ἄδωνις, -ιδος, Ἄδων, -ωνος: Lat.

Adramyttium (Ἀδραμύττειον or Ἀδραμύττιον; Ἀδραμυττινός, Adramyttēnus: Adramyti, or Edremiti), a town of Mysia on the gulf of Adramyttium, opposite to the island of Lesbos, was a colony of the Athenians, and a seaport of some note (Hdt. vii. 42; Thuc. v. 1, viii. 108; Strab. p. 606; Liv. xxxvii. 19; Act. Ap. xxvii. 2).

Adrāna (Eder), a river of Germany, flowing into the Fulda near Cassel (Tac. Ann. i. 56).

Adrānum or Hadrānum (Ἀδρανόν, Ἀδρανόν; Ἀδρανίτης, Hadrunitēnus, Plin. iii. § 91: Aderno), a town in Sicily, on the river Adranus, at the foot of M. Aetna, built by Dionysius, the seat of the worship of the god Adranus (Diod. xiv. 37, xvi. 68; Plut. Tim. 12; Sil. xiv. 250).

Adrānus (Ἀδρανός). [ADRANUM.]

Adrastia (Ἀδράστεια: Lat. Adrastia, -ēa). 1. Daughter of Zeus (Eur. Rhes. 342), identified with Némēsis, also used as an epithet of Nemesis. She derived her name, according to some, from Adrastus, the ruler of Adrastia in Mysia, who built her first sanctuary on the river Aesepus, near Cyzicus. Others derive her name from ἄ-δρᾶναι (fr. διδράσκω), the goddess whom none can escape (Strab. p. 588; Il. ii. 828, seq.; Aesch. Prom. 936; Verg. Cir. 239; Ann. xiv. 11, 25). She was probably originally a Phrygian goddess and the same as Rhea Cybele.—2. A nymph, daughter of Melisseus, king of Crete, to whom and her sister Ida, Rhea gave the infant Zeus to be reared (Apollod. i. 1, 6; Callim. Hym. in Jov. 47). Originally the same as No. 1.

Adrastus (Ἀδραστος). 1. Son of Talatis, king of Argos, was expelled from Argos by Amphiarus, and fled to his grandfather Polybus, king of Sicyon, on whose death he became king of that city (Il. ii. 578; Hdt. v. 67; Pind. Nem. ix. 9 seq.). Afterwards he was reconciled to Amphiarus, gave him his sister Eriphyle in marriage, and returned to his kingdom of Argos. While reigning there Tydens of Calydon and Polynices of Thebes, both fugitives from their native countries, met at Argos before the palace of Adrastus. A quarrel arose between them, and Adrastus, on hearing the noise, came forth and separated the combatants, in whom he recognised the two men who had been promised to him by an oracle as the future husbands of two of his daughters; for one bore on his shield the figure of a boar, and the other that of a lion, and the oracle had declared that one of his daughters was to marry a boar and the other a lion. Adrastus therefore gave his daughter Deipylo to Tydeus, and Argeia to Polynices, promising to restore each to his own country. Adrastus first prepared for war against Thebes, although Amphiarus, who was a soothsayer, foretold that all who engaged in it should perish, with the exception of Adrastus. Thus arose the celebrated war of the 'Seven against Thebes.' The seven heroes, according to Sophocles (Oed. Col. 1313 seq.) and Aeschylus (Theb. 377 seq.), were Amphiarus, Tydeus, Eteocles, Hippomedon, Capaneus, Parthenopaeus, Polynices. (Adrastus, who escaped, is not counted one of the Seven.) Euripides (Phoen. 1104 seq.) has the same list, except that Eteocles is omitted and Adrastus substituted. The preceding drawing from an early Etruscan gem represents, with the true feeling of archaic art, a council of five of the heroes who fought against Thebes. The names are added: Phylince (Polynices), Tute (Tydeus), Amphiare (Amphiarus), Atresthe (Adrastus), and Parthanapae (Parthenopaeus). On arriving at Nemea, they founded the Nemean games in honour of Archemorus [ARCHEMORUS]. On approaching Thebes, they sent Tydeus to the city to demand from Eteocles the sovereignty for Polynices. In the palace of Eteocles he challenged several Thebans to combat and conquered them. In revenge they laid an ambush of fifty men on his return, but Tydeus slew them all, with one exception (Il. iv. 384 seq., v. 802 seq.). The war ended as Amphiarus had predicted; six of the Argive chiefs were slain, Polynices by his brother Eteocles; and Adrastus alone was saved by the swiftness of his horse Arion, the gift of Heracles (Hom. Il. xxiii. 346). Creon of Thebes refusing to allow the bodies of the six heroes to be buried, Adrastus fled to Athens, where he implored the assistance of Theseus, who undertook an expedition against Thebes, took the city, and delivered the bodies of the fallen heroes to their friends for burial (Aesch. Sept. c. Theb.; Eur. Phoen. and Suppl.; Stat. Theb.) Ten years afterwards Adrastus, with the sons of the slain heroes, made a new expedition against Thebes. This is known as the war of the 'Epigoni' (Ἐπιγονοί) or descendants. Thebes was taken and razed to the ground. The only Argive hero that fell in this war was Aegialeus, the son of Adrastus: the latter died of grief at Megara on his return to Argos, and was buried in the former city. He was worshipped in several parts of Greece, as at Megara, at Sicyon, where his memory was celebrated in tragic choruses, and in Attica (Apollod. iii. 7, 3-4; Hdt. v. 61; Strab. p. 325; Paus. i. 43, 1). The legends about Adrastus and the two wars against Thebes furnished ample materials for the epic as well as tragic poets of Greece.—2. Ruler of Adrastia in Mysia (Strab. p. 588). [ADRASTEIA].—3. Son of Merope of Adrasteia, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Diomedes (Il. ii. 828, xi. 328).—4. A Trojan, slain by Patroclus (Il. xvi. 694).—5. A Trojan, taken by Menelaus, and killed by Agamemnon (Il. vi. 37, 64).—6. Son of the Phrygian king Gordius, having unintentionally killed his brother, fled to Cræsus, who received him kindly. While hunting he accidentally killed Atys, the son of Cræsus, and in despair put an end to his own life (Hdt. i. 34-45).

Adria or Hadría. 1. (Adria), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, between the mouths of the Po and the Athesis (Adige), now 14 miles from the sea, but originally a sea-port of great celebrity, founded by the Etruscans (Liv. v. 33; Strab. p. 214).—2. (Atri), a town of Picenum in Italy, probably an Etruscan town originally, afterwards a Roman colony, at which place the family of the emperor Hadrian lived (Vit. Hadr. i.).

Adria (δ' Ἀδρίας, Ion. δ' Ἀδρίας, Hdt. iv. 33), or Mare Adriaticum, also Mare Supërum, so called from the town Adria [No. 1], was in its widest signification the sea between Italy on the W., and Illyricum, Epirus, and Greece on the E. By the Greeks the name Adrias was only applied to the northern part of this sea, the southern part being called the Ionian Sea. The navigation of the Adriatic was much dreaded on account of the frequent and sudden storms to which it was subject: its evil character on this account is repeatedly alluded to by Horace (Od. i. 3, 15; 33, 15; ii. 14, 14; iii. 9, 23).

Adriānus. [HADRIANUS.]

Adriānus (Ἀδριανός), a Greek rhetorician, born at Tyre in Phoenicia, was the pupil of Herodes Atticus, and was invited by M. Antoninus to Rome, where he died about A.D. 192. Three of his declamations are published by Walz in Rhet. Gr. vol. i. 1832.

Adrumëtum. [HADRUMETUM.]

Aduatūca, a castle of the Ebrunnes in Gaul (Caes. B. G. vi. 32), probably the same as the later Aduaca Tongrorum (Tongern).

Aduatūci or Aduatīci, a powerful people of Gallia Belgica (Caes. B. G. ii. 29, 33), were the descendants of the Cimabri and Teutones. Their chief town, perhaps the modern Falaise, must not be confounded with Aduatuca.

Adūla Mons (δ' Ἀδούλας), a group of the Alps about the passes of the Splügen and S. Bernardino, and at the head of the valley of the Hinter Rhein (Strab. pp. 192, 204, 213).

Adūle or Adūlis (Ἀδούλη, Ἀδουλῖς: Ἀδουλίτης, Adulitanus: Thulla or Zulla, Ru.), a maritime city of Aethiopia, on a bay of the Red Sea, called Adulitanus Sinus (Ἀδουλιτικὸς κόλπος, Annesley Bay). It was founded by slaves who fled from Egypt, and afterwards was the seaport of the Auxumitae (Plin. vi. 172 seq.). Cosmas Indicopleustes (A. D. 535) found here the Monumentum Adulitanum, a Greek inscription recounting the conquests of Ptolemy II. Euergetes in Asia and Thrace.

Adyrmāchidae (Ἀδυρμαχίδαι), a Libyan people, W. of Egypt, extending to the Catabathmus Major, but were afterwards pressed further inland. In their manners and customs they resembled the Egyptians (Hdt. iv. 168; Sil. iii. 278, ix. 223).

Aea (Αἶα, Αἶαίν), the name of two mythical islands in the east and the west: in the eastern dwelt Acētes, in the western Circe. The eastern land was afterwards identified with Colchis (cf. Hdt. i. 2); the western with the Italian promontory Circeii. The connection of Acētes and Circe with the sun explains the double land of Aia in east and west. Aeaea is naturally the epithet of Circe and of Medea: in Propert. iii. 12. 31 it denotes Calypso. This is explained by the fact that Ogygia, the island of Calypso, was sometimes confused with Aea (Mela, ii. 120).

Aeāces (Αἰάκης). 1. Father of Polycrates.—2. Son of Syloson and nephew of Polycrates. He was tyrant of Samos, but was deprived of his tyranny by Aristagoras, when the Ionians revolted from the Persians, B. C. 500. He then fled to the Persians, who restored him to the tyranny of Samos, B. C. 494 (Hdt. vi. 13).

Aeācëum (Αἰάκειον). [AEGINA.]

Aeācides (Αἰακίδης), a patronymic of the descendants of Aeacus, as Peleus, Telamon, and Phocus, sons of Aeacus; Achilles, son of Peleus and grandson of Aeacus; Pyrrhus, son of Achilles and great-grandson of Aeacus; and Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who claimed to be a descendant of Achilles.

Aeācides, son of Arybas, or Arybbas, king of Epirus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, slain in Italy, B. C. 326. Aeacides married Phthia, by whom he had the celebrated Pyrrhus. He took part in favour of Olympias against Cassander; but his subjects disliked the war, and drove him from the kingdom. He was recalled in B. C. 313; but Cassander sent an army against him under Philip, who slew him in battle (Pans. i. 11; Diod. xix. 11; Liv. viii. 24; Plut. Pyrrh. 1, 2).

Aeācus (Αἰάκος), son of Zeus and Aegina, a daughter of the river-god Asopos. He was born in the island of Oenone or Oenopia, whither Aegina had been carried by Zens [compare Sisyphus], and from whom this island was afterwards called Aegina. Some traditions related that at the birth of Aeacus, Aegina was not yet inhabited, and that Zens changed the auts (μύρμηκες) of the island into men (Myrmidones) over whom Aeacus ruled. [For other versions of the myth see MYRMIDONES.] His wife was Endeis, daughter of Sciron of Megara. Aeacus was renowned in all Greece for his justice and piety (Plut. Thes. 10), and was frequently called upon to settle disputes, not only among men, but even among the gods themselves, (Pind. Isthm. viii. 23; Paus. i. 39). Pindar alone relates that he helped Apollo and Poseidon to build the walls of Troy (Nem. viii. 9). He was such a favourite with the gods that, when Greece was visited by a drought, rain was at length sent upon the earth in consequence of his prayers. (The earliest mention of this is in Isocr. Evag. § 14. It is noticeable as a possible origin of the story that, according to Theophrastus περὶ σημείων, i. 24, a cloud appearing on the hill of Zeus Hellenios in Aegina was the recognised sign of coming rain.) Respecting the temple which Aeacus erected to Zens Panhellenios, and the Aeacëum, see AEGINA. After his death Aeacus became one of the three judges in Hades [cf. MINOS, RHADAMANTHUS]. This office is only ascribed to him by writers later than Pindar (see esp. Plat. Gorg. p. 523 E). He held the keys of Hades, and hence is called κλειδοῦχος in an inscription (cf. Aristoph. Ran. 465). The Aeginetans regarded him as the tutelary deity of their island. They lent statues of Aeacus and the Aeacidae to their allies as a protection in dangerous wars (Hdt. v. 81, viii. 64).

Aeaea (Αἶα). [See AEA, ad fin.]

Aebūra (Cuerva), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Aebūtia Gens, patrician, was distinguished in the early ages of the Roman republic, when many of its members were consuls, viz. in B. C. 499, 463, and 442.

Aeca or Aecae (Aecānus), a town of Apulia on the road from Aquilonia in Sannium to Venusia.

Aeclānum or Aeclānum, a town of the Hirpini in Sannium, a few miles S. of Beneventum.

Aedeptus (Αἰδηψος: Αἰδήψιος: Dipso), a town on the W. coast of Euboea, N. of Chalcis, with warm baths sacred to Heracles, a watering-place well known to the Romans (Plut. Sull. 26).

Aēdon (Ἀηδών), daughter of Pandareus of Miletus, wife of Zethus king of Thobes, and mother of Itylus. Envious of Niobe, the wife of her brother Amphion, who had six sons and six daughters, she resolved to kill Amaleus, the eldest of Niobe's sons, but by mistake slew her own son Itylus. Zeus relieved her grief by changing her into a nightingale, whose melancholy notes are represented by the poets as Aedon's lamentations for her child. Such is the Homeric version (Od. xix. 518, and Schol.: cf. Aesch. Ag. 1143; Soph. El. 107; Paus. ix. 5, 9). A later version, though existing before the time of Pausanias, makes Aedon the wife of Polytechnus, an artist of Colophon. They quarrelled from rivalry in work, and Polytechnus outraged Chelidon the sister of Aedon. The two sisters revenged themselves by murdering Itys and serving his flesh as food to his father. Zeus, to stay the succession of horrors, turned all the family into birds—Polytechnus into a woodpecker, Chelidon into a swallow, Aedon into a nightingale, her mother Harmothoe into a halcyon, her father Pandareus into an osprey, her brother into a hoopoe. For further illustration of these bird-myths see TEREUS.

Aedūi or Hēdūi, one of the most powerful people in Gaul, lived between the Liger (Loire) and the Arar (Saône). They were the first Gallie people who made an alliance with the Romans, by whom they were called 'brothers and relations' (Caes. B. G. i. 10, 16, 31; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 10). On Caesar's arrival in Gaul, B. C. 58, they were subject to Ariovistus, but were restored by Caesar to their former power. In B. C. 52 they joined in the insurrection of Vercingetorix against the Romans, but were at the close of it treated leniently by Caesar. Their principal town was BIBRACTE. Their chief magistrate, elected annually by the priests, was called Vergobretus, i. e. Judge.

Aeētes or Aeēta (Αἰήτης), son of Helios (the Sun) and Persēis, and brother of Circe, Pasiphaë, and Perses. His wife was Idyia, a daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had two daughters, Medea and Chalciope, and one son, Absyrtus. He was king of Colchis at the time when Phrixus brought thither the golden fleece. For the remainder of his history, see ABSYRTUS, ARGONAUTAE, JASON, MEDEA.—Hence Aeētis, Aeētias, and Aeētine, patronymics of Medea, daughter of Aeētes.

Aega (Αἴγη). [AMALTHEA.]

Aegae (Αἴγαι: Αἰγαῖος). 1. A town in Achaia on the Crathis, with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, was originally one of the twelve Achaean towns, but its inhabitants subsequently removed to Aegira.—2. A town in Emathia in Macedonia, the burial-place of the Macedonian kings.—3. A town in Euboea with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, who was hence called Aegaeus.—4. Also Aegaeae (Αἰγαίαι: Αἰγαίτης), one of the twelve cities of Aeolis in Asia Minor, N. of Smyrna, on the river Hyllus: it suffered greatly from an earthquake in the time of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. ii. 47).—5. (Ayas), a seaport town of Cilicia.

Aegaeon (Αἰγαίων), son of Uranus by Gaea. Aegaeon and his brothers Gyges, or Gyes, and Cottus are known under the name of the Uranids, and are described as huge monsters with a hundred arms (ἑκατόγχοιρες) and fifty heads. Most writers mention the third Uranid under the name of Briareus instead of Aegaeon, which is explained by Homer (Il. i. 403), who says that men called him Aegaeon, but the gods Briareus. According to the most ancient tradition Aegaeon and his brothers conquered the Titans when they made war upon the gods, and secured the victory to Zeus, who thrust the Titans into Tartarus, and placed Aegaeon and his brothers to guard them. Similarly in Homer

(Il. i. 896 ff.), when the Olympian deities rebel against Zeus, Thetis calls Aegaeon to oppose them. Other legends represent Aegaeon as one of the giants who attacked Olympus; and many writers represent him as a marine god living in the Aegaeon sea. Another, and probably later, story, followed by Virgil (Aen. x. 565), makes him the opponent of Zeus. Other stories again make him a deity or a monster of the sea. He is called by some the son of Gaea and Pontus; by others of Poseidon. His name connects him alike with the Aegean sea and with Ποσειδῶν Αἰγαῖος. In Hesiod (Th. 811) he is married to the daughter of Poseidon. Aegaeon and his brothers must be regarded as personifications of the extraordinary powers of nature, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and the like. Roscher suggests that his shape with a hundred arms may have been imagined from the polypus of the sea (cf. Ov. Met. ii. 10). [For further portions of the myth see TITANES, URANUS.]

Aegaeum Mare (τὸ Αἰγαῖον πέλαγος, ὁ Αἰγαῖος πόντος), the part of the Mediterranean now called the Archipelago. It was bounded on the N. by Thrace and Macedonia, on the W. by Greece, and on the E. by Asia Minor. It contains in its southern part two groups of islands, the Cyclades, which were separated from the coasts of Attica and Peloponnesus by the Myrtoan sea, and the Sporades, lying off the coasts of Caria and Ionia. The part of the Aegean which washed the Sporades was called the Icarian sea, from the island Icaria, one of the Sporades. The origin of the name of Aegean is uncertain; some derive it from Aegaeus, the king of Athens, who threw himself into it; others from Aegaea, the queen of the Amazons, who perished there; others from Aegae in Euboea; others connect it with αἰσσω, aísw, a squall, on account of its storms: others take it to be a Phoenician word.

Aegaeus (Αἰγαῖος). [AEGAE, No. 3.]

Aegaleos. 1. (Αἰγάλεως, τὸ Αἰγάλεων ὕψος: Skarmanga), a mountain in Attica opposite Salamis, from which Xerxes saw the defeat of his fleet B. C. 480 (Hdt. viii. 90; Thuc. ii. 19).—2. High ground in the west of Messenia, above Pylus.

Aegātes, the goat islands, were three islands off the W. coast of Sicily, between Drepanum and Lilybaeum, near which the Romans gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians, and thus brought the first Punic war to an end, B. C. 241. The islands were Aegūsa (Αἰγούσσα) or Caprītria (Favignana), Phorbautia (Levanzo) and Hiera (Maretimo).

Aegēria. [EGERIA.]

Aegestus. [SEGESTA.]

Aegestus. [ACESTES.]

Aegeus (Αἰγέως). 1. Son of Pandion and king of Athens. He had no children by his first two wives, but he afterwards begot Theseus by Aethra at Troezen. When Theseus had grown up to manhood, he went to Athens and defeated the 50 sons of his uncle Pallas, who had made war upon Aegeus and had deposed him. Aegeus was now restored. When Theseus went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute it had to pay to Minos, he promised his father that on his return he would hoist white sails as a signal of his safety. On approaching the coast of Attica he forgot his promise, and his father, perceiving the black sail, thought that his son had perished and threw himself into the sea, which according to some traditions received from this event the name of the Ægean. Ægeus was one of the eponymous heroes of Attica; and one of the Attic tribes (Ægeïis) derived its name from him. [For further details see THESEUS.]—2. The eponymous hero of the phyle called the Ægidæ at Sparta, son of Oeolycus, and grandson of Theras, the founder of the colony in Thera. All the Ægeïds were believed to be Cadmeans, who formed a settlement at Sparta previous to the Dorian conquest.—Hence Ægides (Αἰγείδης), a patronymic from Ægeus, especially his son Theseus.

Ægiæ (Αἰγίαί, Αἰγῆαι), a small town in Laconia, not far from Gythium, the Ægiæ of Homer (Il. ii. 583).

Ægiäle or Ægiälæa (Αἰγιάλη, Αἰγιάλεια), daughter of Adrastus and Amphitheia, or of Ægialeus, the son of Adrastus, whence she is called Adrastine. She was married to Diomedes (Il. v. 412), who, on his return from Troy, found her living in adultery with Cometes. The hero attributed this misfortune to the anger of Aphrodite, whom he had wounded in the war against Troy (Verg. Æn. xi. 277): when Ægiäle threatened his life, he fled to Italy. [DIOMEDES.]

Ægiälæa, Ægiälos. [ACHAIA; SICYON.]

Ægiälæus (Αἰγιάλευς). 1. Son of Adrastus, the only one among the Epigoni that fell in the war against Thebes: a hero, the Αἰγιάλειον, was consecrated to him at Pagæ in Megaris (Paus. i. 44, 7). [ADRASTUS.]—2. Son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia, from whom the part of Peloponnesus afterwards called Achaia derived its name Ægiälæa: he is said to have been the first king of Sicyon.—3. Son of Æetes, and brother of Medea, commonly called Absyrtas. [ABSYRTUS.]

Ægiöreus (Αἰγικόρευς), son of Ion, and eponym of the Attic tribe Αἰγικορεῖς (but see TRIBUS, Dict. of Antiq.).

Ægides. [ÆGEUS.]

Ægila (τὰ Αἰγίλα), a town of Laconia with a temple of Demeter.

Ægilia (Αἰγίλια: Αἰγίλιεύς). 1. A demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, celebrated for its figs.—2. (Cerigotto), an island between Crete and Cythera. — 3. An island W. of Enboea and opposite Attica.

Ægimius (Αἰγίμιος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, whose king he was when they were yet inhabiting the northern parts of Thessaly. Involved in a war with the Lapithæ, he called Heracles to his assistance, and promised him the third part of his territory, if he delivered him from his enemies. The Lapithæ were conquered. Heracles did not take the territory for himself, but left it to the king, who was to preserve it for the sons of Heracles. Ægimius had two sons, Dymas, and Pamphylus, who migrated to Peloponnesus, and were regarded as the ancestors of two branches of the Doric race (Dymanes and Pamphyliaus), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hylleans), the son of Heracles, who had been adopted by Ægimius. Pindar (fr. 4) makes a Dorian army under Ægimius and Hyllus occupy Ægina. There existed in antiquity an epic poem called Ægimius, which described the war of Ægimius and Heracles against the Lapithæ (see Æpic. Gr. Fr. ed. Kinkel, i. 82; cf. Athen. p. 503; C.I.G. 5984 c).

Ægimürus (Αἰγίμουρος, Ægimuri Arae, Plin., and probably the Arae of Verg. Æn. i. 108; Zowamour or Zembra), a lofty island, surrounded by cliffs, off the African coast, at the mouth of the Gulf of Carthage.

Ægina (Αἴγινα: Αἰγινήτης: E'ghina), a rocky island in the middle of the Saronic gulf, about 200 stadia in circumference. It was originally called Oenone or Oenopia, and is said to have obtained the name of Ægina from Coin of Ægina.

Rev., the Æginetan symbol of a tortoise; obv., a square, with a dolphin in one quarter and part of the name Αἴγινα.

Ægina, the daughter of the river god Asopus, who was carried to the island by Zeus in the form of an eagle, or, according to Ov. (Met. vi. 113), of fire, and there bore him a son Æacus. As the island had then no inhabitants, Zeus changed the ants into men [MYRMIDONES], over whom Æacus ruled. [ÆACUS.] It was first colonised by Achæans, and afterwards by Dorians from Epidaurus, whence the Doric dialect and customs prevailed in the island. It was at first closely connected with Epidaurus, and was subject to the Argive Phidon, who is said to have established a silver-mint in the island. [PHIDON.] It early became a place of great commercial importance, and its silver coinage was the standard in most of the Dorian states. [Dict. Antiq. PONDERA.] In the sixth century B.C. Ægina became independent, and for a century before the Persian war was a prosperous and powerful state. After a period of war with Athens the two states were reconciled by the stress of the Persian war: the Aeginetans fought with 30 ships against the fleet of Xerxes at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, and are allowed to have distinguished themselves above all the other Greeks by their bravery. After this time its power declined. In B.C. 451 the island was reduced by the Athenians, who in B.C. 429 expelled its inhabitants. The Aeginetans settled at Thyrea, and though a portion of them was restored by Lysander in B.C. 404, the island never recovered its former prosperity. It belonged successively to the Achaean League, the Aetolian League, and finally to the Romans, who allowed the inhabitants a nominal self-government. In the NW. of the island there was a city of the same name, which contained the Aeacæum or temple of Aeacus, and on a hill in the NE. of the island was the celebrated temple of Zeus Panhellenius, said to have been built by Aeacus, the ruins of which are still extant. The sculptures which occupied the tympana of the pediment of this temple were discovered in 1811, and are now preserved at Munich. In the half century preceding the Persian war, and for a few years afterwards, Aegina was the chief seat of the Greek art; the most eminent artists of the Aeginetan school were SMILIS, CALLON, ANAXAGORAS, GLAUCIAS, ONATAS, and CALLITELES.

Aeginēta Paulus. [PAULUS AEGINETA.]

Aegium (Αἰγίνιον: Αἰγινίους: Stagus), a town of the Tymphaei in Thessaly on the confines of Athamania.

Aegiōchus (Αἰγιοχος), a surname of Zeus, because he bore the Aegis.

Aegipan (Αἰγίπαν). [PAN.]

Aegiplanctus Mons (τὸ Αἰγίπλαγκτον ὄρος), a mountain in Megaris.

Aegira (Αἰγείρα: Αἰγειράτης), probably the Homeric Hyperesia (Il. ii. 573), a town in Achaia on a steep hill, with a sea-port about 12 stadia from the town. [AEGAE, No. 1.]

Aegirūssa (Αἰγυρόεσσα, Αἰγυρούσσα), one of the 12 cities of AEGOLIS (only in Hdt. i. 149).

Aegisteas (Αἰγιστέας), son of Midas, perhaps identical with Aeschurus, of whom a story like that of M. Curtius is told, that, when a chasm opened in Celaenae and the oracle told his father Midas that the most precious possession must be thrown in, he leapt in and the chasm closed. This may explain the proverbial use of Αἰγιστέου πῆδημα = a bold action.

Aegisthus (Αἰγισθος), son of Thyestes, who unwittingly begot him by his own daughter Pelopia. Immediately after his birth he was exposed, but was saved by shepherds and suckled by a goat (αἴξ), whence his name. His uncle Atreus brought him up as his son. When Pelopia lay with her father, she took from him his sword, which she afterwards gave to Aegisthus. This sword was the means of revealing the crime of Thyestes, and Pelopia thereupon put an end to her own life. Aegisthus murdered Atreus, because he had ordered him to slay his father Thyestes, and he placed Thyestes upon the throne, of which he had been deprived by Atreus. Homer appears to know nothing of these tragic events; and we learn from him only that Aegisthus succeeded his father Thyestes in a part of his possessions. We may suppose that the story was developed by the later Epic poets and the Tragedians. Hyginus (Fab. 87), who relates it as above, seems to draw from the two dramas called Thyestes by Sophocles and Euripides, of which we have few fragments remaining; Aeschylus (Ag. 1588) speaks of Atreus as banishing his brother Thyestes with his youthful son Aegisthus, but does not give details. According to Homer Aegisthus took no part in the Trojan war, and during the absence of Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, Aegisthus seduced his wife Clytemnestra (Od. i. 35, iii. 263, iv. 517, xi. 409). Aegisthus murdered Agamemnon on his return home, and reigned 7 years over Mycenae. In the 8th Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, avenged the death of his father by putting the adulterer to death. [AGAMEMNON, ATREUS, CLYTEMNESTRA, ORESTES.]

Aegithallus (Αἰγίθαλλος; C. de S. Teodoro), a promontory in Sicily, between Lilybaeum and Drepanum, near which was the town Aegithallum.

Aegitium (Αἰγίτιον), a town in Aetolia, on the borders of Locris.

Aegium (Αἰγίον: Αἰγίους: Vostitza), a town of Achaia, and the capital after the destruction of Helice. The meetings of the Achaean League were held at Aegium in a grove of Zeus called Homarion.

Aeglē (Αἰγλή), that is "Brightness" or 'Splendour,' is the name of several mythological females, such as, 1. The daughter of Zeus and Neaera, the most beautiful of the Naiads; she married Helios and became mother of the Charites;—2. a sister of Phaëton;—3. one of the Hesperides;—4. a nymph beloved by Theseus, for whom he forsook Ariadne;—5. one of the daughters of Asclepius.

Aeglētes (Αἰγλήτης), that is, the radiant god, a surname of Apollo.

Aegōcērus (Αἰγόκερος), a surname of Pan, descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, but more commonly the name of one of the signs of the Zodiac, Capricornus.

Aegos-Pōtāmi (Αἰγὸς ποταμοί), in Latin writers Aegos flumen, the "goat's-river," a small river, with a town of the same name on it, in the Thracian Chersonesus, flows into the Coin of Aegospotami.

Obv., Demeter; rev., goat.

Hellespont. Here the Atheuianus were defeated by Lysander, B.C. 405.

Aegosthēna (Αἰγόσθυνα: Αἰγιοσθενεύς, Αἰγιοσθενίτης), a town in Megaris on the borders of Boeotia, with a sanctuary of Melampus.

Aegus and Roscillus, two chiefs of the Allobroges, who had served Caesar with fidelity in the Gallic war, deserted to Pompey in Greece (B.C. 48).

Aegūsa. [AEGATES.]

Aegyusps or Aegysus, a town of Moesia on the Danube.

Aegyptus (Αἰγυπτος), son of Belus and Anchiroe, and twin-brother of Danaus. Belus assigned Libya to Danaus, and Arabia to Aegyptus, but the latter subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Aegypt after his own name. Aegyptus by his several wives had 50 sons, and his brother Danaus 50 daughters (the Danaides). Danaus had reason to fear the sons of his brother, and, having by advice of Athene built the first fifty-oared ship, fled with his daughters to Argos in Peloponnesus. Thither he was followed by the sons of Ægyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives, and promised faithful alliance. Danaus pretended to forgive his wrongs, and distributed his daughters among them, but to each of them he gave a dagger, with which they were to kill their husbands in the bridal night. All the sons of Ægyptus were thus murdered, with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. [LYNCEUS.] The Danaids threw the heads of their murdered husbands into the marsh of Lerna, and buried their bodies outside the town. (Pausanias, ii. 24, reverses this order.) They were afterwards purified of their crime by Athens and Hermes at the command of Zeus. Plutarch (de Flav. 10) tells that Ægyptus, by order of an oracle, in time of drought sacrificed his daughter Aganippe, and in grief threw himself into the river Melas (the Nile), which thence took the name Ægyptus. In later writers Ægyptus is identified with a historical king: in Manetho with Sethos, in Eusebius with Rameses or Ramses.

Ægyptus (ἡ Αἴγυπτος; Αἴγύπτιος, Ægyptius: Ægypti), a country in the NE. corner of Africa, bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean, on the E. by Palestine, Arabia Petraea, and the Red Sea, on the S. by Ethiopia, the division between the two countries being at the First or Little Cataract of the Nile, close to Syene (Assouan; Lat. 24° 8'), and on the W. by the Great Libyan Desert. This is the extent usually assigned to the country; but it would be more strictly correct to define it as that part of the basin of the Nile which lies below the First Cataract. The native name for the country was Chemî or Kamit, 'the black land,' from the dark alluvial soil, by which it was distinguished from the neighbouring desert and from the 'red land' of Arabia. The name Αἴγυπτος was given first by the Greeks to the Nile—such, at any rate, is its Homeric use (Od. iv. 477, &c.)—and afterwards to the country. The Semitic name was Mizir or Mizraim.—1. Physical Description of Egypt. The river Nile, flowing from S. to N. through a narrow valley, encounters, in Lat. 24° 8', a natural barrier, composed of two islands (Philæ and Elephantine) and between them a bed of sunken rocks, by which it is made to fall in a series of cataracts, or rather rapids (τὰ Κατάρκτου, ὁ μικρὸς Κατάρκτου, Catarrhactes Minor, comp. CATARRHACTES), which have always been regarded as the southern limit assigned by nature to Egypt. The river flows due N. between two ranges of hills, so near each other as to leave scarcely any cultivable land, as far as Silsilis (Jebel Selselch), about 40 miles below Syene, where the valley is enlarged by the W. range of hills retiring from the river. Thus the Nile flows for about 500 miles, through a valley whose average breadth is about 7 miles, between hills which in one place (W. of Thebes) attain the height of 1000 or 1200 feet above the sea, to a point some few miles below Memphis, where the W. range of hills runs to the NW., and the E. range strikes off to the E., and the river divides into branches (seven in ancient time, but now only two), which flow through a low alluvial land, called, from its shape, the Delta, into the Mediterranean. To this valley and Delta must be added the country round lake MOERIS, called Nomos Arsinoïtes, lying NW. of Heracleopolis, and connected with the valley of the Nile by a break in the W. range of hills. The whole district thus described is periodically laid under water by the overflowing of the Nile from April to October. The river in subsiding, leaves behind a rich deposit of fine mud, which forms the soil of Egypt. All beyond the reach of the inundation is rock or sand. Hence Egypt was called the 'Gift of the Nile.' The extent of the cultivable land of Egypt is in the Delta about 4500 square miles, in the valley about 2255, in Fayûm about 340, and in all about 7095 square miles. The outlying portions, included in the Egyptian nomes after the beginning of the Greek period under the Ptolemies, consisted of the Greater and Lesser Oases (cultivable valleys so called from the Egyptian Uah, 'settlement'), in the midst of the Western or Libyan Desert, a valley in the W. range of hills on the W. of the Delta, called Nomos Nitriotes from the Natron Lakes which it contains, some settlements on the coast of the Red Sea and in the mountain passes between it and the Nile, and a strip of coast on the Mediterranean, extending E. as far as Rhinocolura (El-Arish), and W. as far as the Catabathmus Minor, Long. about 25° 10' E. (Strab. 798). The only river of Egypt is the Nile [NILUS]. A great artificial canal (Bahr-Yussouf, i.e. Joseph's Canal) runs parallel to the river, at the distance of about 6 miles, from Diopolis Parva in the Thebais to a point on the W. mouth of the river about half way between Memphis and the sea [see under MOERIS]. Many smaller canals were cut to regulate the irrigation of the country. A canal from the E. mouth of the Nile to the head of the Red Sea was commenced by kings of the 19th dynasty (about 1400 B.C.), resumed by Necho II. about 600 B.C., and was opened by Darius, son of Hystaspes. This canal communicated with the present head of the Red Sea through the 'bitter Lakes.' It had so far sunk in the time of Aelius Gallus that it could only be used for floating wood down; but it was deepened in Trajan's time, and was called Amnis Augustus. There were several lakes in the country, respecting which see MOERIS, MAREOTIS, BUTOS, TANIS, SIRBONIS, and LACUS AMARI.—2. Ancient History. At the earliest period to which our records reach back, Egypt was inhabited by a highly civilised agricultural people, under a settled monarchical government. The first dynasty begins with Mena, probably between 5000 and 4000 B.C.; but he sprang from a settled city, the ancient Thinis, which he inhabited before he founded Memphis. Some have imagined that the primitive seat of the Egyptian people was Ethiopia, and that their civilisation was imparted by priests from Meroë. Such was the Greek tradition: but the evidence from the relative antiquity of Egyptian architectural monuments tends to show that, on the contrary, the earliest signs of a civilised race of builders is in lower Egypt, and that these arts were carried later southwards into Ethiopia. The kings, whose power was absolute, bore the title Per-ao, 'the Great House,' whence came the equivalent Pharaoh. The country was administered by a governor and a deputy, under whom worked a vast number of scribes, some of whom were, by the king's favour or their own merit, promoted into the ranks of the nobles. Ordinarily the caste of the nobles was derived from royal descent. They held by hereditary right large provincial estates, as well as court offices. By merit they obtained from the king further titles of honour. It cannot be doubted that, in spite of the high regard for justice evinced in Egyptian writings, the peasants suffered under heavy burdens and enforced labour. The priests, who were in possession of all the literature and science of the country and all the employments based upon such knowledge, formed a powerful caste. At their head, at any rate in the post-Memphite dynasties (after 1700 B.C.), was the high priest of Amon-Ra, or Amun. One of the priests seized the sovereignty about 1150 B.C. and founded a dynasty. It must be observed that the supremacy of temples and of the various orders or dynasties of gods was changed by the accession of some of the dynasties of kings and with the shifting of the capital. The religion of Egypt, which was mainly derived from sun-worship, but was also connected with a totemistic animal worship, cannot be discussed in this work. Those deities, however, who are mentioned in Greek and Latin literature will be noticed under their several names. Nor can Egyptian art or its relation to Greek art be treated here: reference may be made to the Dict. of Antiquities s.vv. Pictura, Statuaria Ars, Templum and Vas. The Egyptian alphabet is probably the oldest known. It originated with the priests, and was first taught with other learning in their schools, of which the great university or seminary at On (HELIOPOLIS) was the development. This writing was first purely pictorial. Then an alphabet sprang from the conventional figures, but the picture was added to the word. From this 'hieroglyphic' writing a 'hieratic' running hand was formed in very early times (written from right to left), and by the 9th century a still farther abridgment in the 'demotic' writing common to the people. The Egyptians were mainly agriculturists, with little commercial enterprise, but they obtained foreign productions chiefly through the Phoenicians, and at a later period they engaged in maritime expeditions. The ancient history of Egypt may be divided for our purpose into 4 periods:—(1) From the earliest times to its conquest by Cambyses; during which it was ruled by a succession of native princes, into the difficulties of whose history this is not the place to inquire. Those named by Greek writers are treated separately. The last of them, Psammenitus, was conquered and dethroned by Cambyses in B.C. 525, when Egypt became a province of the Persian empire. Until shortly before this date Egypt was but little known to the Greeks. It is a disputed point whether the inscriptions at Karnak of the time of Menepthah II. and Ramses III. (prob. about B.C. 1300) bear upon the question when Greeks first set foot in Egypt. Among the allies of the Libyan invaders appear the Aquasha, Shardana, Shakalisha, Turisha, Liku, and, in the Hittite wars of Ramses II., the Masu, the Dardani and Danau. Some have read in these names the Achæans, Sardinians, Sicilians, Etruscans, Lycians, Mysians, Dardanians and Danaans. Brugsch has pointed out that these are represented as circumcised tribes; it is certainly unsafe to assume from a somewhat similar name that we are reading of Greeks or Sicilians. Still less is it as yet safe to accept the arguments of Mr. Petrie from the pottery which he has found, that Greek settlements in Egypt existed certainly in B.C. 1400, and possibly in 2000. From our present knowledge, therefore, it can only be asserted that the Greeks knew something of Egypt in the Homeric age, and that their mariners at least touched upon its shores (Od. iv. 351, &c.; cf. the Cyclic story of Helen), and that before the 6th century B.C. Greeks were settled at Naucratis (see further under NAUCRATIS and DAPHNÆ). In the latter part of the period learned men among the Greeks began to travel to Egypt for the sake of studying its institutions: among others it was visited by Pythagoras, Thales, and Solon. (2) From the Persian conquest in B.C. 525, to the transference of their dominion to the Macedonians in B.C. 332. This period was one of almost constant struggles between the Egyptians and their conquerors, until B.C. 340, when Nectanebo II. (Nekt-neb-ef), the last native ruler of Egypt, was defeated by Darius Ochus. It was during this period that the Greeks acquired a considerable knowledge of Egypt. In the wars between Egypt and Persia, the two leading states of Athens and Sparta at different times assisted the Egyptians, according to the state of their relations to each other and to Persia; and, during the intervals of those wars, Egypt was visited by Greek historians and philosophers, such as Hæcæticus, Herodotus, Anaxagoras, Plato, and others, who brought back to Greece the knowledge of the country which they acquired from the priests and through personal observation. (3) The dynasty of Macedonian kings, from the accession of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, in B.C. 323, when Egypt became a Greek kingdom, down to B.C. 30, when she became a province of the Roman empire. When Alexander invaded Egypt in B.C. 332, the country submitted to him without a struggle; and, while he left it behind him to return to the conquest of Persia, he conferred upon it the greatest benefit that was in his power, by giving orders for the building of Alexandria. In the partition of the empire of Alexander after his death in B.C. 323, Egypt fell to the share of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who assumed the title of king in B.C. 306, and founded the dynasty of the Ptolemies, under whom the country greatly flourished, and became the chief seat of Greek learning. But soon came the period of decline. Wars with the adjacent kingdom of Syria, and the vices, weaknesses, and dissensions of the royal family, wore out the state, till in B.C. 81 the Romans were called upon to interfere in the disputes for the crown, and in B.C. 55 the dynasty of the Ptolemies came to be entirely dependent on Roman protection, and, at last, after the battle of Actium and the death of Cleopatra, who was the last of the Ptolemies, Egypt was made a Roman province, B.C. 30. (4) Egypt under the Romans, down to its conquest by the Arabs in A.D. 638. As a Roman province, Egypt was one of the most flourishing portions of the empire. The fertility of its soil, and its position between Europe and Arabia and India, together with the possession of such a port as Alexandria, gave it the full benefit of the two great sources of wealth, agriculture and commerce. Learning continued to flourish at Alexandria, and the patriarchs of the Christian Church in that city became so powerful as to contend for supremacy with those of Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome, while a succession of teachers, such as Origen and Clement of Alexandria, conferred real lustre on the ecclesiastical annals of the country. When the Arabs made their great inroad upon the Eastern empire, the geographical position of Egypt naturally caused it to fall an immediate victim to that attack, which its wealth and the peaceful character of its inhabitants invited. It was conquered by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, in A.D. 638.—3. Political Geography.—In the earliest times the country was divided into the 'land of the South' and 'the land of the North': the former extended as far as Memphis, but did not include it, and was subdivided for administration into 22 nomes; the latter contained 20 nomes. But in Greek and Roman times the division was threefold: (1) the Delta or Lower Egypt (τὰ Δέλτα, ἡ κάτω χώρα); (2) the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt; (3) the Thebais or Upper Egypt (ἡ ἄνω χώρα), of which the chief town was Ptolemais. In Roman times the whole land was governed by a procurator, styled the Praefectus Aegypti [see Dict. Ant. s.v.], in Greek ἡγεμῶν: each of the three great divisions was administered by an epistrategus (ἐπιστρατηγός), who in Thebais was also called ἀραβ-ἀρχῆς from the greater Arab admixture in the population; the subdivision into nomes (νομοί) was retained, but the total number was 47; over each was a νομάρχης, in the Roman period usually called στρατηγός. Each nome was further subdivided into τοπαρχίαι, and these again into κῶμαι and τόποι, who had their own officials κομογραμματεῖς and τοπιγραμματεῖς, being administered by villages, not by cantons. For the special government of Alexandria, see that article. The Dodecarchy of 12 kings, of Herodotus, iv. 147, refers to the partition of Egypt, as an Assyrian province, into twenty satrapies by Esarhaddon after he defeated Tirhahai, B.C. 672. It is probable that the mistaken number was derived from the 12 courts in the Labyrinth.

Ægeys (Αἴγυς, Αἰγύτης: nr. Ghiorgitza), a town of Laconia on the borders of Arcadia.

Æelāna (Αἰλάνα: Αἰλανίτης), a town on the northern arm of the Red Sea, near the Bahr-el-Akaba, called by the Greeks Aelanites from the name of the town. It is the Elath of the Hebrews, and one of the seaports of which Solomon possessed himself. (Strab. p. 768; Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, 4.)

Æelia Gens, plebeian, the members of which are given under their surnames, GALLUS, LAMIA, PAETUS, SEJANUS, STILO, TUBERO.

Æelia, a name given to Jerusalem after its restoration by the Roman emperor Aelius Hadrianus.

Æliānus, Claudius ("Sophista"), was born at Praeneste in Italy, and lived at Rome about the middle of the 3rd century of the Christian era. Though an Italian, he wrote in Greek. Two of his works have come down to us: one a collection of miscellaneous history (Ποικίλη Ἱστορία) in 14 books, commonly called Varia Historia; and the other a work on the peculiarities of animals (Περὶ Ζῴων ἰδιότητος) in 17 books, commonly called De Animalium Natura. The former work contains short narrations and anecdotes, historical, biographical, antiquarian, &c., selected from various authors, generally without their names being given, and on a great variety of subjects. The latter work is partly collected from older writers, and partly the result of his own observations both in Italy and abroad. There are also attributed to him 20 letters on husbandry (Ἀγροικικαὶ Ἐπιστολαί), written in a rhetorical style and of no value.—Editions. Hercher, Paris, 1858; Teubner, Leips. 1866.

Æliānus, Plautius, mentioned by Tac. Hist. iv. 53 as Pontifex in A.D. 71, when the Capitol was restored. His full name appears in an inscription as Ti. Plautius Silvanus Aelianus: he was consul in A.D. 47.

Æliānus Tacticus, a Greek writer, who lived in Rome and wrote a work on the Military Tactics of the Greeks (Περὶ Στρατηγικῶν Τάξεων Ἑλληνικῶν), dedicated to the emperor Hadrian. He also gives a brief account of the constitution of a Roman army at that time.—Editions. By Franciscus Robortellus, Venice, 1552; Elzevir, Leyden, 1613; Köchly and Rüstow, 1855.

Æillo, one of the Harpies. [HARPYIAE.]

Æemilia. 1. The 3rd daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, who fell in the battle of Cannae, was the wife of Scipio Africanus I. and the mother of the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi.—2. Aemilia Lepida. [LEPIDA.]—3. A Vestal virgin, put to death B.C. 114. (Plut. Q. R. p. 284; Liv. Ep. 63.)

Æemilia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, said to have been descended from Mamercus, who received the name of Aemilius traditionally on account of the persuasiveness of his language (δι' αἰμυλλίαν λόγου) (Plut. Æemil. 2). This Mamercus is represented by some as the son of Pythagoras, and by others as the son of Nnma. The most distinguished members of the gens are given under their surnames BARBULA, LEPIDUS, MAMERCUS or MAMERCINUS, PAPUS, PAULUS, REGILLUS, SCAURUS.

Æemilia Via, made by M. Aemilius Lepidus, cos. B.C. 187, continued the Via Flaminia from Ariminum, and traversed the heart of Cisalpine Gaul through Bononia, Mutina, Parma, Placentia (where it crossed the Po) to Mediolanum. It was subsequently continued as far as Aquileia.

Æemiliānus. 1. The son of L. Aemilius Paulus Macedonicus, was adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and was thus called P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africanus. [SCIPIO.]—2. The governor of Pannonia and Moesia in the reign of Gallus, was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in A.D. 253, but was slain by them after reigning a few months.—3. One of the 30 tyrants (A.D. 259—268), assumed the purple in Egypt, but was taken prisoner and strangled by order of Gallienus.

Æemilius Probus. [NEPOS, CORNELIUS.]

Æemodae or Haemodae, probably the Shetland islands. (Plin. H. N. iv. § 103; Mel. iii. 6.)

Æemōna or Emōna (Laibach), a fortified town in Pannonia, and an important Roman colony, said to have been built by the Argonauts.

Æenāria, also called Pithēcūsa and Inārimē (Verg. Æen. ix. 716), (Ischia) a volcanic island off the coast of Campania, at the entrance of the bay of Naples, under which the Roman poet represented Typhoeus as lying. The form of the name in Virgil is probably due to a misconception of Hom. Il. ii. 783.

Æenēa (Αἰνεῖα: Αἰνεῖός, Αἰνεῖαίτης), a town in Chalcidice, on the Thermaic gulf, said to have been founded by Aeneas (Hdt. vii. 123; Liv. xl. 4, xlv. 10). See coin under ÆNEAS, p. 25.

Æeneādes (Αἰνεῖαδῆς), a patronymic from Aeneas, given to his son Ascanius or Iulus, and to those who were believed to be descended from him, such as Augustus, and the Romans in general.

Æenēas (Αἰνεῖας), the son of Anchises and Aphrodite, born on Mount Ida. On his father's side he was a great-great-grandson of Tros, and thus a cousin of Priam, who was great-grandson of Tros (Hom. Il. xx. 230 f.) The story with which we are most familiar, adopted by Virgil from various sources, represents that Aeneas, after the fall of Troy, escaped with his father, his wife, and his son Iulus, and, having gathered some followers, migrated westward, reaching Epirus, Sicily and Africa, and eventually settling in Latium, where he became the heroic founder of the Romans. [DIDO; LATINUS; TURNUS.] But this is the outcome of many different accounts, and it is necessary in treating of a character so important in legend to trace the development of the story.—1. Homeric Story. He was brought up in the house of Alcathous, the husband of his sister [Xenophon, De Venat. 1, 2, strangely makes him a pupil of Chiron]. He took no part in the Trojan war until Achilles attacked him on Mount Ida, drove away his cattle and captured Lyrnessus. Then he led the Dardanians to battle, and ranked thenceforth next to Hector as the bulwark of the Trojans.

Aegean, Crete, the west coast of Greece and Epirus, Sicily [ACESTES], Carthage [DIDO]. From Carthage he returned to Sicily, and after celebrating there the funeral games in honour of Anchises, sailed to Cumae in Italy, where he consulted the Sibyl. Thence he went to Latium and was received into alliance by King Latinus, whose daughter, Lavinia, he married. The Aeneid closes with the defeat and death of Turnus, king of the Rutulians, which leaves Aeneas free to reign over the native races of Latium and the Trojans united as one people.—Account in other post-Homeric writers. From the Cyclic poets we gather a different tradition of Aeneas in Asia Minor. Arctinus, in telling the story of Laocoon says, that Aeneas then (before the capture of Troy) withdrew with his family to Mount Ida [according to Dionys. i. 48 the same story appeared in the Laocoon of Sophocles]. Quintus Smyrnaeus gives us from the Cyclic poets many details of the battles after Hector's death, including the narrative which is apparently the source of Verg. Aen. ii. 440-476. He names the wife of Aeneas as

It is noticeable that Philostratus (Her. 13) calls Hector the Hand, Aeneas the Mind of the Trojans; and in the Homeric battles we never find Aeneas escaping dangers by his own strength of arm, but by the intervention of the gods. Thus Aphrodite carried him off when he was wounded by Diomedes (Il. v. 320), and Poseidon saved him in his combat with Achilles (Il. xx. 75-352). It should be observed that this latter passage is one of the so-called "greater interpolations," which are now generally assigned to some date between 750 and 600 B.C. It follows, therefore, that not only does Homer make no allusion to the westward migration, but that even the story of Aeneas reigning over the Trojans after the capture of Troy by the Greeks, as stated prophetically in Il. xx. 307 (cf. line 180 and Hymn. v. 196), is (according to the majority of Homeric scholars) of a comparatively late origin. We learn nothing of Aeneas from the Odyssey.—Virgilian Account. Virgil (for whose agreement with and divergence from other writers see below), makes Aeneas with his companions wander for seven years after the capture of Troy, by Thrace, the

'Eurydice' (cf. Paus. x. 26; Enn. ap. Cic. Div. i. 20, 40). Creusa first appears in Dionys. i. 69. There is a curious statement in Dionys. i. 48, that he betrayed Troy and was therefore left as a ruler by the Greeks, which looks like an attempt to explain the Homeric tradition that he was to reign there in later times. The oldest source for his migration westwards is in the Iliu Persis of Stesichorus (B.C. 630-550). The Tabula Iliaca shows Aeneas embarking at Sigeum, leading Ascanius and carrying Anchises with the images of the gods; Misenus the trumpeter is behind. Dionysius and Virgil agree mainly in the story of his visit to Thrace: by these and other writers he is brought to Aeneas on the Thermaic gulf (Liv. xl. 4), to Samothrace and the Cabiri, to Delos, Crete, Cythera (Paus. viii. 12, 8; iii. 22, 11), Zacynthus, Leucas, Actium, Ambracia (Virgil omits Leucas and Ambracia), Epirus, Sicily (cf. Cic. Verr. ii. 4, 7). Dionysius, however, says nothing of Africa or Dido; and, according to Macrobius v. 2, 4, Virgil is here following Naevius. As to the landing in Italy, Virgil agrees with Dionysius, except in the consultation of the Sibyl, which seems to come from Naevius. The journey to Etruria is not in Dionysius or Naevius, but appears in Lycophron of Alexandria (B.C. 285-247). Pausanias (x. 17) takes him to Sardinia. It should be noted that Coin of Aeneas, with the legend AINEAS (Aeneas).

Trojan settlement in Latium is unknown to Stesichorus and first appears in Cephalon (4th cent. B.C.), who makes Romulus, a son of Aeneas, the founder of Rome (Dionys. i. 72). The death or disappearance of Aeneas takes place in the fourth year after the death of Turnus and Latins, during a war between his subjects and the Rutulians, aided by Mezentius: in one story he is taken up to the gods; in another he is drowned in the river Numicus. (See Liv. i. 2.) He becomes according to Livy the Jupiter Indiges; according to Dionysius θεὸς χθόνιος.—A coin of Aeneas [AENEAS], which belongs to the middle of the sixth century B.C., represents Aeneas flying from Troy, carrying his father Anchises on his shoulders, and accompanied by his wife, who holds Ascanius by the hand. This subject is also frequently represented on Greek vases.

Aeneas Gazaeanus, so called from Gaza, his birthplace, lived in the latter half of the 5th century A.D. He was at first a Platonist and a Sophist, but afterwards became a Christian, when he composed a dialogue, on the Immortality of the Soul, called Theophrastus.—Editions. By Barthius, Lips. 1655; by Boissonade, Par. 1836.

Aeneas Tacticus, a Greek writer of the middle of the 4th century B.C. Casaubon supposes him to be the same as Aeneas of Stymphalus, the general of the Arcadians, B.C. 362 (Xen. Hell. vii. 3 § 1). He wrote a work on the art of war, of which a portion only is preserved, commonly called Commentarius Poliorceticus, showing how a siege should be resisted. An epitome of the whole book was made by Cineas. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 25.)—Editions. By Ernesti, Lips. 1763; by Orelli, Lips. 1818; by Hug, 1874.

Aenesidemus (Αἰνησιδημος), 1. a celebrated sceptic, born at Cnossus in Crete, probably lived a little later than Cicero. He differed on many points from the ordinary sceptics. The grand peculiarity of his system was the attempt to unite scepticism with the earlier philosophy, to raise a positive foundation for it by accounting from the nature of things for the never-ceasing changes both in the material and spiritual world. None of the works of Aenesidemus have come down to us. To them Sextus Empiricus was indebted for a considerable part of his work. From him we learn the eight methods by which Aenesidemus shows fallacy in all a priori reasoning, as all arguments whatever were confuted by the δέκα τρόποι [ΠΥΡΡΗΟ], viz. (1) Either the cause given is unseem and not proven by things seen. (2) Or if the cause is seen it cannot be shown to exclude other hypotheses. (3) A regular and constant effect attributed to an irregular and fitful cause: c.g. the motions of planets to a sudden impulse. (4) In arguing from the seen to the unseen it is assumed that the laws are the same. (5) 'Causes' only mean opinion of causes, in conflict with other opinions. (6) Equally probable causes are accepted or rejected as the theory requires. (7) The causes given are at variance with phenomena. (8) Principles are uncertain because the facts from which they proceed are uncertain.—2. [THERON.]

Aeneus, son of Apollo and Stilbe, husband of Aenete and father of Cyzius.

Aeniānes (Αἰνιαῖνες, Ion. Ἐνιήνες), an ancient Greek race, originally near Ossa, afterwards in southern Thessaly (Hom. Il. ii. 749; Hdt. vii. 198), between Octa and Othrys, on the banks of the Sperchæus. Chief town Hypata.

Aenus. 1. (Αἴνος; Αἴνιος, Αἰνιάτης; Ενο), an ancient town in Thrace, near the mouth of the Hebrus, mentioned in Hom. Il. iv. 520. It was colonised by the Aeolians of Asia Minor. Virgil (Aen. iii. 18) supposes Aenos to have been built by Aeneas, but he confounds it with AENEAS in Chalcidice. Under the Romans Aenos was a free town, and a place of importance.—2. A town in Aetolia.—3. Mountain in Cephalonia.

Aenus (Inn), a river in Rhaetia, the boundary between Rhaetia and Noricum. (Tac. Hist. iii. 5.)

Aeōles or Aeōlii (Αἰολεῖς). One of the three great divisions of the Greeks at one time dwelling in the Thessalian country south of the Peneus. [For their mythical origin see AEOLUS.] In the colonisation of Asia Minor from Greece the Aeolians as a mixed body, uniting Locrians, Magnetes, Boeotians and Achaeans, started from Aulis. They were, however, mainly descendants of the Achaeans. Traditionally they were led first by Orestes, and after his death by his son Penthilus as far as Thrace, and thence by Archelaus son of Penthilus to Dascyleum in the country of Cyzius, whence Gras son of Archelaus first advanced to the Granicus and then retired and occupied Lesbos. A second detachment under Cleuas and Melaus, descendants also of Agamemnon, founded Cyme (Strab. p. 582). It seems probable that the Aeolians first occupied Lesbos, that thence a second migration colonised Cyme and thut from Cyme and Lesbos the Aeolian cities of the northern part of Asia Minor were founded [AEOLIS.] Cyzius was first colonised by the Milesians in 756 B.C. [For Aeolian poets, see ALCAEUS, SAPPHO.]

Aeōliāe Insūlae (αἱ Αἰόλου νῆσοι: Lipari Islands), a group of islands NE. of Sicily, where Aeolus, the god of the winds, reigned. Homer (Od. x. 1) mentions only one Aeolian island, and Virgil (Aen. i. 52) accordingly speaks of only one Aeolia (sc. insula), where Aeolus reigned, supposed to be Strougyle (Strab. p. 276) or Lipara (Diod. v. 9). These islands were also called Hephaestūācs or Vulcāniāe, because Hephaestus or Vulcan was supposed to have had his workshop in one of them called Hiera (Verg. Aen. viii. 415 seq.). They were also named Lipārenses, from Lipāra, the largest of them. The names of these islands were, Lipāra (Lipari); Hiera (Volcano); Strongyle (Stromboli); Phoenicūsa (Felicudi); Ericūsa (Alicudi); Euonymus (Panaria); Didyme (Salina); Hicesia (Lisca Bianca); Basilidia (Basilizzo); Osteodes (Ustica).

Aeōlides (Αἰολίδης), a patronymic given to the sons of Aeolus, as Athamas, Cretheus, Sisyphus, Salmoneus, &c., and to his grandsons, as Cephalus, Ulysses and Phrixus. Aeolis is the patronymic of the female descendants of Aeolus, given to his daughters Canace and Alcyone.

Aeōlis (Αἰολίς) or Aeōlia, a district of Mysia in Asia Minor, was peopled by Aeolian Greeks, whose cities extended from the Troad along the shores of the Aegean to the river Herminus. The northern group comprised the islands of Tenedos and Lesbos with its six cities, the southern group was formed into a league of twelve cities with a common religious festival (Panaeoliūm), viz. Cyne, Larissae, Neontichos, Tomnus, Cilla, Notium, Aegirūsa, Pitano, Aegaeae, Myrina, Grynēa, and Smyrna; but SMYRNA subsequently became a member of the Ionian confederacy. (Hdt. i. 149 seq.) These cities were subdued by Croesus, and were incorporated in the Persian empire on the conquest of Croesus by Cyrus. Magnesia (g. v.) on the Maeander is said to have also been founded by the Aeolians.

Aeōlus (Αἰόλος). 1. Son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and brother of Dorus and Xuthus. He was the ruler of Thessaly, and the founder of the Aeolic branch of the Greek nation. His children are said to have been very numerous; but the most ancient story mentioned only four sons, viz., Sisyphus, Athamas, Cretheus, and Salmoneus: others represent him as the father also of Mimas and Macareus and of five daughters, one of whom, Canace, was seduced by her brother Macareus and slain for that reason by her father (Ov. Her. 11). Another daughter was Arne. The great extent of country which this race occupied probably gave rise to the varying accounts about the number of his children.—2. Son of Poseidon and Arne, and grandson of the previous Aeolus. His story probably refers to the emigration of a branch of the Aeolians to the west. His mother was carried to Metapontum in Italy, where she gave birth to Aeolus and his brother Boeotus. It is this Aeolus who figures in the story which supplies the plots for the two plays of Euripides called Melanippe.—3. Aeolus, son of Hippotes, represented in the Odyssey as friend of the gods, dwelling in the floating western island Aeolia. Here he reigned as a just and pious king, taught the natives the use of sails for ships, and foretold them the nature of the winds that were to rise. In Homer (Od. x. 1 seq.) Aeolus, the son of Hippotes, is neither the god nor the father of the winds, but merely the happy ruler of the Aeolian island, to whom Zeus had given dominion over the winds, which he might soothe or excite according to his pleasure; wherefore he gives Odysseus a bag confining the unfavourable winds—a myth which is identical in the folk-lore of other nations, e.g. the Laplanders. This statement of Homer led to Aeolus being regarded in later times as the god and king of the winds, which he kept enclosed in a mountain (Ov. Met. xiv. 223; Verg. Aen. i. 52). It is therefore to him that Juno applies when she wishes to destroy the fleet of the Trojans. The Aeolian island of Homer was in later times believed to be Lipara or Strongyle, and was accordingly regarded as the place in which the god of the winds dwelt. [AEOLIAE INSULAE.] The above distinction is by no means invariable, and we find the 2nd and the 3rd Aeolus in some authors confused. Diodorus (iv. 67, v. 7) connects the three by a regular genealogy: Mimas son of Aeolus I., Hippotes son of Mimas, Aeolus II. son of Hippotes, Arne daughter of Aeolus II. and mother of Aeolus IV.

Aepēa (Αἰπεῖα: Αἰπεδῆς). 1. A town in Messenia on the sea-coast, afterwards THURIA.—2. A town in Cyprus, afterwards SOLI.

Aepy (Αἶπυ), a town in Elis, situated on a height, as its name indicates.

Aepŷtus (Αἶπυτος). 1. A mythical king of Arcadia, from whom a part of the country was called Aepytiis. He died from the bite of a snake, and was buried near Cyllene. His grave is mentioned in Hom. Il. ii. 603. His father was Elatos (Pind. Ol. vi. 33) and his daughter was EVADNE.—2. Youngest son of the Heraclid Cresphontes, king of Messenia, and of Merope, daughter of the Arcadian king Cypselus. When his father and brothers were murdered during an insurrection, Aepytus alone, who was with his grandfather Cypselus, escaped the danger. The throne of Cresphontes was in the meantime occupied by the Heraclid Polyphontes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. When Aepytus had grown to manhood, he returned to his kingdom, and put Polyphontes to death. From him the kings of Messenia were called Aepytiids instead of the more general name Heraclids.—3. Son of Hippothous, king of Arcadia, and great-grandson of the Aepytus mentioned first. He was father of Cypselus (Paus. viii. 5, 5).

Aequi, Aequicōli, Aequicōlae, Aequicūlāni, an ancient warlike people of Italy, dwelling in the upper valley of the Anio in the mountains forming the eastern boundary of Latium, and between the Latini, Sabini, Hernici, and Marsi. In conjunction with the Volsci, who were of the same Oscan race, they carried on constant hostilities with Rome, but their resistance became feebler at the end of the 6th century B.C., and though they joined the Samnite coalition they were completely brought under the Roman power in 304 B.C. Their chief towns were ALBA FUCENS and CARSEOLI.

Aequi Falisci. [FALERII.]

Aequimaelium. [MAELIUS.]

Aērōpē (Ἀερόπη). 1. Daughter of Catreus, king of Crete, and granddaughter of Minos. Her father, who had received an oracle that he should lose his life by one of his children, gave her and her sister Clymene to Nauplius, who was to sell them in a foreign land. Aeope married Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, and became by him the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus. After the death of Plisthenes Aeope married Atreus; and her two sons, who were educated by Atreus, were generally believed to be his sons. Aeope was faithless to Atreus, being seduced by Thyestes, and according to some was thereupon thrown into the sea. Soph. Aj. 1297 may either refer to this or to the story followed by Euripides in the Κρήσσαι, that she was seduced by a slave of her father's. In the latter play, however, she is not drowned but is delivered by Catreus to Nauplius to be drowned and is spared by him, marrying Atreus afterwards. [ATREUS; AGAMEMNON.]—2. Daughter of Cepheus and mother of Aeropus by Ares (Paus. viii. 44. 7).

Aesācus (Αἰσακος), son of Priam and Arisbe (Apoll. iii. 12. 5), or Alexirrhōē (Ov. Met. xi. 763). He lived far from his father's court in the solitude of mountain forests. Hesperia, however, the daughter of Cebren, kindled love in his heart, and on one occasion while he was pursuing her, she was bitten by a viper and died. Aesacus in his grief threw himself into the sea and was changed by Thetis into an aquatic bird. Apollodorus tells that Aesacus, having learnt the interpretation of dreams from his grandfather Merops, prophesied to Priam the evils which Paris would cause.

Aesar, the name of a deity among the Etruscans.

Aesar or Aesārus (Esaro), a river near Croton in Bruttii, in southern Italy.

Aeschines (Ἀισχίνης). 1. The Athenian orator, born B.C. 389, was the son of Atrometus and Glaucotea. According to Demosthenes, his political antagonist, his parents were of disreputable character and not even citizens of Athens; but Aeschines himself says that his father was descended from an honourable family, and lost his property during the Peloponnesian war. In his youth Aeschines appears to have assisted his father in his school; he next acted as secretary to Aristophon, and afterwards to Eubulus; he subsequently tried his fortune as an actor, but was unsuccessful; and at length, after serving with distinction in the army at the battle of Tamyrae (Aesch. F. L. § 169), came forward as a public speaker and soon acquired great reputation. In 347 he was sent along with Demosthenes as one of the 10 ambassadors to negotiate a peace with Philip: from this time he appears as the friend of the Macedonian party and as the opponent of Demosthenes. Shortly afterwards Aeschines formed one of the second embassy sent to Philip to receive the oath of Philip to the treaty which had been concluded with the Athenians; but as the delay of the ambassadors in obtaining the ratification had been favourable to the interests of Philip, Aeschines on his return to Athens was accensured by Timarchus. He evaded the danger by bringing forward a counter-accusation against Timarchus (345), and by showing that the moral conduct of his accuser was such that he had no right to speak before the people. The speech in which Aeschines attacked Timarchus is still extant: Timarchus was condemned and Aeschines gained a brilliant triumph. It can hardly be doubted, however, that Aeschines had corruptly played into the hands of Philip, and had purposely misled his own countrymen. In 343 Demosthenes renewed the charge against Aeschines of treachery during his second embassy to Philip. This charge of Demosthenes (περὶ παραπροσβέτας) was not spoken, but published as a memorial, and Aeschines answered it in a similar memorial on the embassy (περὶ παραπροσβέτας), which was likewise published. Shortly after the battle of Chaeronea in 338, which gave Philip the supremacy in Greece, Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre at the great Dionysia. Aeschines in consequence accused Ctesiphon; but he did not prosecute the charge till 8 years later, 330. The speech which he delivered on the occasion is extant, and was answered by Demosthenes in his celebrated oration on the crown (περὶ στεφάνου). Aeschines was defeated, and, being condemned to pay the fine of 1000 drachmae, withdrew from Athens. He went to Asia Minor, and at length established a school of eloquence at Rhodes. On one occasion he read to his audience in Rhodes his speech against Ctesiphon, and also the reply of Demosthenes: when his hearers expressed their admiration he said: 'Your admiration would be greater if you heard Demosthenes deliver his own speech' (Cic. de Orat. iii. 56, 213; Plin. H.N. vii. § 110). Aeschines was undoubtedly not only a fluent, but a brilliant orator (he prided himself as needing less study than Demosthenes): but among the points in which his speeches rank far below those of Demosthenes may be noticed a want of that nobility in mind and purpose which add force and inspiration to the oratory of his rival. From Rhodes he went to Samos, where he died in 314. Besides the 3 orations extant, we also possess 12 letters which are ascribed to Aeschines, but are the work of late sophists.—Editions. In the editions of the Attic orators [DEMOSTHENES], and by Bremi, Zurich, 1823; Franke, 1873; Schultz, 1865.—2. An Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, and a disciple of Socrates. After the death of his master he seems (Hermod. up. Diog. Laert. ii. 106, iii. 6) to have stayed with Euclid in Megara in company with Plato and others: thence he went to Syracuse, but returned to Atheus after the expulsion of Dionysius, and supported himself, receiving money for his instructions. He wrote several dialogues, but the three which have come down to us under his name are not genuine (περὶ Ἀπεργίης, Axiochus and Eryxias: see Hermann, de Aeschinis reliq. 1850).—Editions. By Fischer, Lips. 1786; by Böckh, Heidelberg. 1810; and in many editions of Plato.—3. Of Neapolis, a Peripatetic philosopher, who was at the head of the Academy at Athens, together with Charmades and Clitomachus about B.C. 109 (Cic. de Orat. i. 11).—4. Of Miletus, a contemporary of Cicero, and a distinguished orator in the Asiatic style of eloquence (Cic. Brut. 95; Diog. ii. 64).

Aeschriion (Ἀισχρίων). 1. Of Syracuse, whose wife Pippa was one of the mistresses of Verres, and who was himself one of the scandalous instruments of Verres.—2. An iambic poet, a native of Samos. There was an epic poet of the same name, who was a native of Mytilene and a pupil of Aristotle, and who accompanied Alexander on some of his expeditions. He may perhaps be the same person as the Samian. (What remains of his poems is printed in Bergk's Poëtae Lyrici, 1866).—3. A native of Pergamum, and a physician in the second century after Christ, was one of Galen's tutors.

Aeschylus (Ἀισχύλος). 1. The great tragic poet, was born at Eleusis in Attica, B.C. 525, so that he was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Marathon, and contemporary with Simonides and Pindar. His father Euphorion was probably connected with the worship of Demeter, and Aeschylus himself was, according to some authorities, initiated in the mysteries of this goddess. At the age of twenty-five (B.C. 499), he made his first appearance as a competitor for the prize of tragedy against Pratinas, without being successful. His chief rival at this period was Phrynichus. He fought, with his brothers Cynaegirus and Aminias, at the battle of Marathon (490), and also at those of Salamis (480) and Plataea (479). In 485 he first gained the prize; and in 472 he gained the prize with the trilogy of which the Persae, the earliest of his extant dramas, was one piece. About this time, as is generally supposed, he went to the court of Hiero, and produced his play Aetnaeae to inaugurate the city Aetna [CATANA], which Hiero had founded. It is said that the Persae was reproduced there. He remained in Sicily about three years and returned to Athens before the death of Hiero: for in B.C. 468 his play was defeated by the Triptolemus of Sophocles. At the same time there are reasons which may incline us to think that the first visit to Sicily was earlier. The city of Aotna, in honour of which he wrote his play, was actually founded in B.C. 476. Again, the subject of the play Glaucus Pontius, which formed part of the trilogy, is such as would more naturally be suggested after a visit to Sicily. Lastly, the tradition, though improbable in itself, that he went to Sicily because he was jealous of Simonides, is not likely to have arisen unless it was known that he quitted Athens before Simonides, i.e. before 477. On the whole we are met with fewer difficulties if we place the first visit between 479 and 472, and suppose that he returned to Athens in or shortly before the year in which he produced the Persae, which we shall then date after the Aetnaeae. In the year 477 he was victorious with the Septem e. Thebas. At some time later, probably after his victory with the Oresteia in B.C. 458, he returned to Sicily, and died at Gela in 456, at the age of sixty-nine. Various traditions are preserved as to the cause of his quitting Athens for Sicily. Some said it was from mortification at a defeat by Sophocles. It may be remarked that the most probable dates for his two journeys to Sicily do not follow a defeat. Others said it was because he had been defeated by Simonides in an elegy on those who died at Marathon. If this was so, it is strange that he should have gone to the court of Hiero only to meet Simonides there after all. Others said that it was because he had divulged the mysteries; others (and this, at any rate, must refer to his second visit to Sicily) because the alarm caused to women and children by the chorus of Furies had raised bad feeling against him. Whatever may have been the cause of his earlier visit to Hiero, of his final departure from Athens is that he was disheartened by the failure of his attempt to support the power of the Areopagus by his Eumenides, and uneasy at the growing power of the democracy, whose leaders, moreover, must have regarded him with ill will. The well-known story of his death, that an eagle, mistaking the poet's bald head for a stone, dropped a tortoise on it to break the shell, is represented on a gem, which Baumeister thinks was copied from a relief, and suggests that the story came from the relief and was fitted on to Aeschylus. It was held to fulfil an oracle by which Aeschylus was to die by a blow from heaven.—Aeschylus so changed the system of the tragic stage that he has more claim than anyone else to be regarded as the founder of Tragedy. His great change consisted in introducing a second actor, which was done certainly before the Persae. Before this there can have been little real dramatic action and a dialogue merely between the single actor and the chorus was of far less importance than the classic odes. Aeschylus first made the dialogue more important than the chorus. He improved the masks and the costumes generally (see Diet. Antiq. s.v. Tragoedia): it was said (Athen. p. 21, e.) that he in some degree imitated the splendid dress of the hierophant in the Eleusinian mysteries. It is stated by Vitruvius that Aeschylus first employed Agatharchus to paint scenes: it is not quite easy to reconcile this with Aristotle, Poet. 4, 16, where σκηνογραφία is mentioned as introduced by Sophocles. It is possible that Aeschylus first used it in a still ruder form, and that Sophocles so far developed it as to make it his own. The characteristics of the plays of Aeschylus are a sublimity and grandeur of feeling and expression, with less of the pathos which we find in Sophocles and Euripides. Prometheus is his most pathetic play, but we are made to feel that Prometheus is a deity and removed above mere human pity. The poet brings before us more forcibly, and more terribly, than the other tragedians the unseen powers working out the doctrine of retributive justice, and the mysteries of laws which control even the gods themselves. Not only are his hearers no men of common life, but behind all their actions and sufferings we are made to feel the supernatural power working out the punishment of presumption. And the diction has been suited to the subject, so that Aeschylus is above all poets magniloquent, sometimes to a degree which in a lesser man would be called turgid, abounding in sonorous words and daring metaphors. It has been suggested, not without reason, that the apparent influence of the philosophy of Pythagoras, as well as some remarkable Doric forms, may have been due to the poet's prolonged stay in Sicily on his first visit. We are told that Aeschylus wrote 70 tragedies besides satyric dramas. The 'fable trilogy,' i.e. a succession of three plays working out the successive chapters of some legend, belongs especially to Aeschylus. The trilogies of Sophocles more frequently, though not always, were disconnected in story. Of the plays of Aeschylus seven only remain: 1. The Persae, produced in 472, of the trilogy Phineus, Persae, Glaucus Pontius; 2. the Septem e. Thebas (B.C. 468) of the series Laius, Oedipus, Septem, forming with the satyric drama Sphinx a tetralogy; 3. the Supplices (B.C. 462), the middle play between the Egyptians and the Danaids; 4. the Prometheus Vincetus (of uncertain date), the middle play between Προμηθεὺς πυρφόρος and Πρ. λυόμενος, and lastly (B.C. 458), the three plays Agamemnon, Choephoroe, and Eumenides, which form the trilogy of the Oresteia.—Editions. Dindorf; Paley; Weil; Hartung; of separate plays, especially Müller's Eumenides, and Sidgwick's Oresteia, Prickard's Prometheus.

Aesculāpius. [ASCLEPIUS.]

Aesēpus (Ἄσηπος), a river which rises in Ida, and flows by a N.E. course into the Propontis, which it enters W. of Cyzicus and E. of the Granicus. The river god was the son of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 342).

Aesernia (Isernia), a town in Samnium, made a Roman colony in the first Punic war (Liv. xxvii. 10; Cic. ad Att. viii. 11).

Aeserninus. 1. A surname of MARCELLUS, who was taken prisoner at Aesernia (Liv. Ep. lxxiii.).—2. A Samnite gladiator of great strength, whence the proverb "Pacideianus cum Aesernino," for skill against brute force (Cic. ad Q. F. iii. 4), Pacideianus being the most skilful gladiator of his day.

Aesis (Esino or Fiumesino), a river which formed the boundary between Picenum and Umbria, was anciently the S. boundary of the Senones, and the N.E. boundary of Italy proper.

Aesis or Aesium (Aesinas: Jesi), a town and a Roman colony in Umbria on the river Aesis, celebrated for its cheese, Aesinus caseus.

Aeson (Αἰσών), son of Cretheus, the founder of Iolcus, and of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, and father of Jason and Promachus. He was excluded from the throne by his half-brother Pelias, who endeavoured to keep the kingdom to himself by sending Jason away with the Argonauts. Pelias subsequently attempted to get rid of Aeson by force, but the latter put an end to his own life. According to Ovid (Met. vii. 162 seq.), Aeson survived the return of the Argonauts, and was made young again by Medea. His mother's name in Ov. Her. vi. 105 is Alcimedea.

Aesopus (Αἰσωπος). 1. The traditional author of Greek Fables. According to Herodotus ii. 134, he lived about B.C. 570. He was originally a slave, and received his freedom from his master, Iadmon the Samian. Upon this he visited Croesus, who sent him to Delphi, to distribute among the citizens 4 minae apiece; but in consequence of some dispute on the subject, he refused to give any money at all, upon which the enraged Delphians threw him from a precipice (cf. Aristoph. Vesp. 1446). Plagues were sent upon them from the gods for the offence, and they proclaimed their willingness to give a compensation for his death to anyone who could claim it. At length Iadmon, the grandson of his old master, received the compensation, since no nearer connexion could be found. A life of Aesop is prefixed to a book of fables purporting to be his, and collected by Maximus Planudes, a monk of the 14th century, who represents Aesop as a monster of ugliness. It is clear that the Greeks even of the time of Herodotus knew little about Aesop's history; but it is probable that he was a real personage, and later traditions of his date agree with that given by Herodotus (cf. Plut. Sept. Sap. Conv. p. 152, c.). The tendency to ascribe all fables to him appears from many passages (Aristoph. Pax, 127, Av. 471, 651; Plat. Phaed. p. 60, &c.). It was shown by Bentley that the fables which bear his name are spurious. They were, in fact, later prose versions of metrical fables. (See further under BABRIUS, PHALDRUS.)—2. See JULIUS VALERIUS.

Aesopus, Claudius, or Clodius, was the greatest tragic actor at Rome, and a contemporary of Roscius, the greatest comic actor; and both of them lived on intimate terms with Cicero (Cic. de Div. i. 37, 80; pro Sest. 58, 123; ad Q. F. i. 2). Aesopus appeared for the last time on the stage at an advanced age at the dedication of the theatre of Pompey (B.C. 55), when his voice failed him, and he could not go through the speech (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 1). Aesopus realised an immense fortune by his profession, which was squandered by his son, a foolish spendthrift. It is said, for instance, that he dissolved in vinegar and drank a pearl worth about 8000*l.*, which he took from the ear-ring of Caecilia Metella (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 239; Val. Max. ix. 1. 2; Plin. ix. § 122).

Aestii, Aestyi, or Aestui, a people dwelling on the sea-coast, in the N.E. of Germany, probably in the modern Kurland, who collected amber, which they called glessum. Their customs, says Tacitus (Germ. 45), resembled the Suevic, and their language the British. They were probably a Sarmatian or Slavonic race, and not a Germanic.

Aesula (Aesulanus), a town of the Aequi on a mountain between Praeneste and Tibur. "Ae-sulae declivè arvom," Hor. Od. iii. 29; Liv. xxvi. 9.)

Aesymnētes. [EURYPYLUS.]

Aethalia (Αἰθαλία, Αἰθάλη), called Ilva (Elba) by the Romans, a small island in the Tuscan sea, opposite the town of Populonia, celebrated for its iron mines. It had on the N.E. a good harbour, "Argous Portus" (Porto Ferrajo), in which the Argonaut Jason is said to have landed.

Aethalides (Αἰθαλίδης), son of Hermes and Eupolemia, the herald of the Argonauts. He had received from his father the faculty of remembering every thing, even in Hades, and was allowed to reside alternately in the upper and in the lower world. His soul, after many migrations, at length took possession of the body of Pythagoras, in which it still recollected its former migrations. (Apoll. Rh. i. 640; Hygin. Fab. 14.)

Aether (Αἰθήρ), a personified idea of the mythical cosmogonies, in which Aether was considered as one of the elementary substances out of which the Universe was formed. Aether was regarded by the poets as the pure upper air, the residence of the gods, and Zeus as the Lord of the Aether, or Aether itself personified. (Cic. N. D. iii. 44, 53; Lucret. v. 498.) Hesiod, Th. 124, makes Aether son of Erebus and Nyx, and brother of Hemera. Verg. Georg. ii. 325, Lucr. i. 251, seem to identify him with Zeus and make him wedded to the Earth.

Aethices (Αἰθίκες), a Thessalian or Epirot people, near M. Pindus.

Aethicus, Hister or Ister, a Roman writer of the 7th century after Christ, a native of Istria, the author of a geographical work, called Aethicæ Cosmographiæ. Edited by Gronovius, in his edition of Pomponius Mela, Leyden, 1722; Wnttke, Leips. 1854.

Aethilla (Αἰθίλλα or Αἰθυλλα), daughter of Laomedon and sister of Priam, is said to have become after the fall of Troy the prisoner of Protesilaus, with whose history, however, this does not agree.

Aethiopes (Αἰθίοπες, said to be from αἶθω and ὤψ, but perhaps really a foreign name corrupted), was a name applied (1) most generally to all black or dark races of men; (2) to the inhabitants of all the regions S. of those with which the early Greeks were well acquainted, extending even as far N. as Cyprus and Phoenicia; (3) to all the inhabitants of Inner Africa, S. of Mauretania, the Great Desert, and Egypt, from the Atlantic to the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, and to some of the dark races of Asia; and (4) most specifically to the inhabitants of the land S. of Egypt, which was called AETHIOPIA. The Aethiopes in Homer are the most distant of people (Il. i. 423, Od. i. 22); in Hesiod, Th. 985, their king bears the apparently Egyptian name of Memnon.

Aethiopia (Αἰθιοπία, Αἰθ. ἕπερ Αἰγύπτου: Αἰθιοψ, Αἰθιοπεύς, Hom., fem. Αἰθιοπίς, Aethiops: Nubia, Kordofan, Sennaar, Abyssinia), a country of Africa, S. of Egypt, the boundary of the countries being at Syene (Assouan) and the Smaller Cataract of the Nile, and extending on the E. to the Red Sea, and to the S. and SW. indefinitely, as far apparently as the knowledge of the ancients extended. The Egyptians knew it as the land of Cush. In its most exact political sense the word Aethiopia seems to have denoted the kingdom of ΜΕΡΟΪ; but in its wider sense it included also the kingdom of the ΑΝΟΜΙΤΑΙ, besides several other peoples, such as the Troglodytes and the Ichthyophagi on the Red Sea, the Blemmyes and Megabari and Nubae in the interior. The country was watered by the Nile and its tributaries, the Astapus (Bahr-el-Azrek or Blue Nile) and the Astaboras (Atbara or Tacazze). Monuments are found in the country closely resembling those of Egypt, but of an inferior style, and the evidence from them is against the view that the Egyptians derived their civilisation from Meroc. [ÆGYPTUS.] The kings of the 12th dynasty made successful expeditions against them and checked their encroachments by fortresses, but without permanent occupation, beyond Semneh at the 2nd Cataract, within which the 'Viceroys of Cush' administered. But about 750 B.C. the Ethiopians not only recovered complete independence, but gained possession of Thebes and established the 25th dynasty, which lasted till the defeat of Tirhakah by the Assyrians in 672. Under the Ptolemies Graeco-Egyptian colonies established themselves in Ethiopia, and Greek manners and philosophy had a considerable influence on the upper classes; but the country was never subdued. The Romans failed to extend their empire over Ethiopia, though they made expeditions into the country, in one of which C. Petronius, prefect of Egypt under Augustus, advanced as far as Napata, and defeated the warrior queen Candace (B.C. 22). The submission of the country was, however, nominal, at any rate south of Premis, where, as at Pselchis, there were Roman garrisons under Diocletian.

Aëthlius (Ἀέθλιος), first king of Elis, father of Endymion, was son of Zeus and Protogenia, daughter of Deucalion, or son of Aeolus.

Aethra (Ἀἴθρα). 1. Daughter of Pittheus of Troezen, was mother of Theseus by Aegeus. [THESEUS.] She afterwards lived in Attica, from whence she was carried off to Lacedaemon by Castor and Pollux, and became a slave of Helen, with whom she was taken to Troy (Il. iii. 144). At the capture of Troy she was restored to liberty by her grandson Acamas or Demophon.—2. Daughter of Oceanus, by whom Atlas begot the 12 Hyades and a son Hyas.

Aëtion (Ἀετίων). 1. A sculptor of Amphipolis about the middle of the 3rd century B.C.—2. A celebrated painter, whose best picture represented the marriage of Alexander and Roxana. It is probable that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great; though some argue from Lucian, Herod. 4, that he lived about the time of Hadrian and the Antonines.

Aëtius. 1. A celebrated Roman general and patrician, defended the Western empire against the barbarians during the reign of Valentinian III. In A.D. 451 he gained, in conjunction with Theodoric, a great victory over Attila, near Châlons in Gaul, by which he saved the empire; but he was treacherously murdered by Valentinian in 454. [See also BONIFACIUS.]—2. A Greek medical writer, born at Amida in Mesopotamia, lived at the end of the 5th or the beginning of the 6th century after Christ. His work Βιβλία ἱατρικὰ ἑκκαίδεκα, 'Sixteen Books on Medicine,' is one of the most valuable medical remains of antiquity, as being a judicious compilation from many authors whose works are lost. The whole of it has never appeared in the original Greek, but parts are edited in Anecd. Gr. Venice, 1816; Hebenstreit, Lips. 1757; and a Latin translation in Stephens, Medicæ Artis Principes, Paris, 1567.

Actna (Ἀἴτνη). 1. (Now Mongino = Monte Gibino, the original name being displaced by a mixture of two Latin and Arabic words, both meaning "the mountain") a volcanic mountain in the N.E. of Sicily between Taormenium and Catana. It is said to have derived its name from Actna, a Sicilian nymph, a daughter of Uranus and Gaea, or of Briareus. Zeus buried under it Typhon or Enceladus; and in its interior Hephaestus and the Cyclopes forged the thunderbolts for Zeus. There were several eruptions of M. Actna in antiquity. One occurred in B.C. 475, to which Aeschylus (Prom. 363 ft.) and Pindar (Ol. iv. 10) probably allude, and another in B.C. 425, which Thucydides says (iii. 116) was the third on record since the Greeks had settled in Sicily. The form of the mountain seems to have been much the same in antiquity as it is at present. Its base covers an area of nearly 90 miles in circumference, and its highest point is 10,874 feet above the level of the sea. The circumference of the crater is variously estimated from 2½ to 4 miles, and the depth from 600 to 800 feet.—2. (Aetnenses: S. Maria di Licodia), a town at the foot of M. Actna, on the road to Catana, formerly called Inessa or Innesa. It was founded in B.C. 461, by the inhabitants of Catana, who had been expelled from their own town by the Siculi. They gave the name of Actna to Inessa, because Catana had been called Actna by Hiero I.

Aetnaeus (Ἀἰτναῖος), an epithet of gods and mythical beings connected with Actna—of Zeus, to whom a festival was celebrated there, called Aetna; of Hephaestus; and of the Cyclopes.

Ætōliā (Ἀἰτωλία: Ἀἰτωλός), a division of Greece, was bounded on the W. by Acarnania, from which it was separated by the river Achelous, on the N. by Epirus and Thessaly, on the E. by the Ozolian Locrians, and on the S. by the entrance to the Corinthian gulf. It was divided into two parts, Old Aetolia from the Achelous to the Evenus and Calydon, and New Aetolia, or the Acquired (ἐπίκτητος), from the Evenus and Calydon to the Ozolian Locrians. On the coast the country is level and fruitful, but in the interior mountainous and unproductive. The mountains contained many wild beasts, and were celebrated in mythology for the hunt of the Calydonian boar. The country was originally inhabited by Curetes and Leleges, but was at an early period colonised by Greeks from Elis, led by the mythical AETOLUS. The Aetolians took part in the Trojan war, under their king Thoas. They continued for a long time a rude and uncivilised people, living in villages without a settled town, and to a great extent by robbery; and even in the time of Thucydides (B.C. 410) many of their tribes spoke a language which was not Greek, and were in the habit of eating raw flesh (Thuc. iii. 94-98). Like the other Greeks, they abolished at an early time the monarchical form of government, and lived under a democracy. They were, perhaps, loosely united by a religious tie centring in the temple at Thermon (Il. ii. 638, xiii. 217); but the first political league was formed against Macedonia after the battle of Chaeronea. It did not acquire much importance till after the death of Alexander, and somewhat later became a formidable rival to the Macedonian monarchs and to the Achaean League, from which it differed in being a league of tribes, not of towus: it had much less stability and coherence. The Aetolian League at one time included, not only Aetolia Proper, but Acarnania, part of Thessaly, Locris, and the island of Cephalenia; and it also had close alliances with Elis and several towns in the Peloponnesus, and likewise with Cius on the Propontis. Its annual meetings, called Pan- aetolica, were held in the autumn at Thermon, and at them were chosen a General (στρατηγός), who was at the head of the League, an Hipparchus, or Master of the Horse, a Secretary, and a select committee called Apocleti (ἀπόκλητοι). The Aetolians took the side of Antiochus III. against the Romans, and on the defeat of that monarch B.C. 189, they became virtually the subjects of Rome. On the conquest of the Achaean, B.C. 146, Aetolia was included in the Roman province of Achaia. After the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, a considerable part of the population of Aetolia was transplanted to the city of Nicopolis, which Augustus built in commemoration of his victory.

Aetōlus (Αἰτωλός) son of Endymion and Neis, or Iphianassa, married Pronoë, by whom he had two sons, Pleuron and Calydon. His father made him run a race at Olympia with his brother Epeius for the succession to the throne; he was defeated, but, after the death of Epeius, became king of Elis. Afterwards he was obliged to leave Peloponnesus, because he had slain Apis, the son of Jason or Salmonsus. He went to the country near the Achelous, which was called Aetolia after him (Paus. v. 1, 2; Strab. p. 357).—2. Son of Oxylyus and Pieria, and brother of Laius. He died young, and was buried at the gate of Elis (Paus. v. 4, 4).

Aexōnē (Αἰξωνή and Αἰξωνήϊς: Αἰξωνεύς), an Attic demus of the tribe Cecropis or Pandionis.

Afer, Domitius, of Nemausus (Nismes) in Gaul, was the teacher of Quintilian, and one of the most distinguished orators in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, but he sacrificed his character by conducting accusations for the government (Tac. Ann. iv. 52, 66, xiv. 19; Dio Cass. lix. 19). He was consul suffectus in A. D. 39, and died in 60. Quintilian mentions several works of his on oratory, which are all lost (viii. 5, 16, ix. 2, 20, x. 1, 118.)

Afrānius. 1. L. A Roman comic poet, flourished about B. C. 100. He was the principal poet of the national comedy (Comoedia togata), which did not borrow from the Greek but dealt with Italian scenes and manners. His subjects were greatly taken from the life of the middle and lower classes (Com. tabernariae), and from the skill with which he described Roman life he was regarded as the Roman Menander (Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 57). He is praised by Cicero (Brut. 45, 105), and by Quintilian (x. 1, 10), but with a reservation on account of the immorality of his plots. The titles of more than forty plays are preserved. Fragments are edited by Ribbeck, Com. 1873.—2. L. an adherent of Pompey, under whom he served against Sertorius and Mithridates, and was, through his influence, made consul B. C. 60. When Pompey obtained the provinces of the two Spains in his second consulship (B. C. 55), he sent Afranius and Petreius to govern Hither Spain, while he himself remained in Rome. In B. C. 49, Afranius and Petreius were defeated by Caesar in Spain. Afranius therefore passed over to Pompey in Greece; was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B. C. 48; and subsequently at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, B. C. 46. He then attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and killed.

Africa (Ἀφρική: Africānus), or Libya (Λιβύη), was used by the ancients in two senses, (1) for the whole continent of Africa, and (2) for the portion of N. Africa which constituted the territory of Carthage, and which the Romans erected into a province, under the name of Africa Propria.—1. In the more general sense the name was not used by the Greek writers; and its use by the Romans arose from the extension to the whole continent of the name of a part of it. The proper Greek name for the continent is Libya (Λιβύη). (Strab. 824–839.) Considerably before the historical period of Greece begins, the Phoenicians extended their commerce over the Mediterranean, and founded several colonies on the N. coast of Africa, of which Carthage was the chief. [CARTHAGO.] The Greeks knew very little of the country until the foundation of the Dorian colony of CYRENE (B. C. 620) [as regards the intercourse of Greeks with Egypt see AEGYPTUS], and even then their knowledge of all but the part near Cyrene was derived from the Egyptians and Phoenicians, who sent out some remarkable expeditions to explore the country. A Phoenician fleet sent by the Egyptian king Pharaoh Necho (about B. C. 600) sailed from the Red Sea, round Africa, and so into the Mediterranean (Hdt. iv. 42): the authenticity of this story has been doubted without reason, not only by Strabo (p. 98), but by some modern writers. We still possess an authentic account of another expedition, which the Carthaginians despatched under Hanno (about B. C. 510), and which reached a point on the W. coast nearly, if not quite as far as lat. 10° N. On the opposite side of the continent, the coast appears to have been very little known beyond the S. boundary of Egypt, till the time of the Ptolemies. In the interior, the Great Desert (Sahara) interposed a formidable obstacle to discovery; but even before the time of Herodotus the people on the northern coast told of individuals who had crossed the Desert and had reached a great river flowing towards the E., with crocodiles in it, and black men living on its banks; which, if the story be true, was probably the Niger in its upper course, near Timbuctoo. That the Carthaginians had considerable intercourse with the regions S. of the Sahara, has been inferred from the abundance of elephants they kept. Later expeditions and inquiries extended the knowledge which the ancients possessed of the E. coast to about 10° S. lat., and gave them, as it seems, some further acquaintance with the interior, about Lake Tchad, but the southern part of the continent was so totally unknown, that Ptolemy, who finally fixed the limits of ancient geographical science, recurred to the old notion, which seems to have prevailed before the time of Herodotus, that the S. parts of Africa met the SE. part of Asia, and that the Indian Ocean was a vast lake. The greatest geographers who lived before Ptolemy—namely, Eratosthenes and Strabo—had accepted the tradition that Africa was circumnavigable. The shape of the continent they conceived to be that of a right-angled triangle, having for its hypotenuse a line drawn from the Pillars of Hercules to the S. of the Red Sea: and, as to its extent, they did not suppose it to reach nearly so far as the Equator. Ptolemy supposed the W. coast to stretch N. and S. from the Pillars of Hercules, and he gave the continent an indefinite extent towards the S. There were also great differences of opinion as to the boundaries of the continent. Some divided the whole world into only two parts, Europe and Asia, and they were not agreed to which of these two Libya (i.e. Africa) belonged; and those who recognised three divisions differed again in placing the boundary between Libya and Asia either on the W. of Egypt, or along the Nile, or at the isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea: the last opinion gradually prevailed. As to the subdivision of the country itself, Herodotus distributes it into Aegyptus, Aethiopia (i.e. all the regions S. of Egypt and the Sahara), and Libya, properly so-called; and he subdivides Libya into three parts, according to their physical distinctions—namely, (1) the Inhabited Country along the Mediterranean, in which dwelt the Nomad Libyans (οἱ παραθαλάσσιοι τῶν νομάδων Λιβύων: the Barbary States); (2) the County of Wild Beasts (ἡ θηριώδης), S. of the former: that is, the region between the Little and Great Atlas, which still abounds in wild beasts, but takes its name from its prevailing vegetation (Beled-el-Jerid, i. e. the Country of Palms); and (3) the Sandy Desert (ἡ ψάμμος: the Sahara), that is, the table land bounded by the Atlas on the N. and the margin of the Nile-valley on the E., which is a vast tract of sand broken only by a few habitable islands, called Oases. As to the people, Herodotus distinguishes four races—two native, namely, the Libyans and Ethiopians, and two foreign, namely, the Phoenicians and the Greeks. The Libyans, however, were a Caucasian race: the Ethiopians of Herodotus correspond to our Negro races. The Phoenician colonies were planted chiefly along, and to the W. of, the great recess in the middle of the N. coast, which formed the two SYRTES, by far the most important of them being Carthage; and the Greek colonies were fixed on the coast along and beyond the E. side of the Syrtes; the chief of them was CYRENE, and the region was called Cyrenaica. Between this and Egypt were Libyan tribes, and the whole region between the Carthaginian dominions and Egypt, including Cyrenaica, was called by the same name as the whole continent, Libya. The chief native tribes of this region were the ADYRMACHIDAE, MARMARIDAE, PSYLLI, and NASAMONES. The last extended into the Carthaginian territory. To the W. of the Carthaginian possessions, the country was called by the general names of NUMIDIA and MAURETANIA, and was possessed partly by Carthaginian colonies on the coast, and partly by Libyan tribes under various names, the chief of which were the NUMIDAE, MASSYLLI, MASSAESYLLI, and MAURI, and to the S. of them the GAETULI. The whole of this northern region fell successively under the power of Rome, and was finally divided into provinces as follows: 1. AEGYPTUS; (2) CYRENAICA (for the changes in this province, see that article); (3) Africa Propria, the former empire of Carthage (see below, No. 2); (4) NUMIDIA; (5) MAURETANIA, divided into (a) Siftensis, (b) Caesariensis, (c) TINGITANA: these, with (6) AETHIOPIA, make up the whole of Africa, according to the divisions recognised by the latest of the ancient geographers. The northern district was better known to the Romans than it is to us, and was extremely populous and flourishing; and, if we may judge by the list of tribes in Ptolemy, the interior of the country, especially between the Little and Great Atlas, must have supported many more inhabitants than it does at present. Further information respecting the several portions of the country will be found in the separate articles.—2. Africa Propria or Provincia, or simply Africa, was the name under which the Romans, after the Third Punic War (B. C. 146), erected into a province the whole of the former territory of Carthage. It extended from the river Tusca, on the W., which divided it from Numidia, to the bottom of the Syrtis Minor, on the SE. It was divided under Diocletian into three districts (regiones): namely, (1) Zeugis or Zeugitana, the district round Carthage and Hippo, called also Africa proconsularis; (2) Byzacium or Byzacena, S. of Zeugitana, as far as the bottom of the Syrtis Minor—the former dioecesis of Hadrumetum; (3) Tripolitana, the district of Tacrapae, under a praeses. The province was full of flourishing towns, and was extremely fertile, especially Byzacena: it furnished Rome with its chief supplies of corn. With Africa Numidia was joined under a proconsul from the time of Augustus until that of Septimius Severus, when Numidia was placed under the separate government of an imperial procurator.

Africānus. 1. Sex. Caecilius, a Roman juriscult, lived under Antoninus Pius (A.D. 138-161), and wrote Libri IX. Questionum, from which many extracts are made in the Digest (Gell. xx. 1). He was noted for the difficulty of his definitions, whence the proverb 'Africani lex' for anything hard to understand. The fragments are collected by Hommel, Paling. pp. 3-26.—2. Julius, a celebrated orator in the reign of Nero, is much praised by Quintilian, who speaks of him and Domitius Afer as the best orators of their time (x. 1. 118). He was probably son of Julius Africanus of Santoni in Gaul, whom Tacitus mentions as condemned to death A.D. 32 (Ann. vi. 7).—3. An orator, grandson of No. 2 (Plin. Ep. vii. 6. 11).—4. Sex. Julius, a learned Christian writer at the beginning of the third century, passed the greater part of his life at Emmaus in Palestine, and afterwards lived at Alexandria. His principal work was a Chronicon in five books, from the creation of the world, which he placed in 5499 B.C., to A.D. 221. This work is lost, but part of it is extracted by Eusebins in his Chronicon, and many fragments of it are preserved by Georgius Syncellus, Cedrenus, and in the Paschale Chronicon. There was another work attributed to Africanns, entitled Cesti (Κεστοί), that is, embroidered girdles, so called from the celebrated Cestus of Aphrodite (Venus). It treated of a vast variety of subjects—medicine, agriculture, natural history, the military art, &c. The work itself is lost, but some extracts from it are published in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693, and also in the Geoponica.

Afrīcus (ἀφύ by the Greeks), the SW. or WSW. wind (between Auster and Favonius), so called because it blew from Africa, frequently brought storms with it (ereberque procellis Africus, Verg. Aen. i. 85; Hor. Od. i. 15; Sen. Q. N. v. 16. 6).

Agamēdē (Ἀγαμήδη), daughter of Augeias and wife of Melius. According to Homer (Il. xi. 739), she was acquainted with the healing powers of all the plants that grow upon the earth. She is probably the same as Perimedo (Theocr. ii. 16; Schol. ad Propert. ii. 48).

Agamēdes (Ἀγαμήδης), commonly called son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, and brother of Trophonius (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 500). According to Pausanias, however, he was son of Stymphalus (viii. 4. 3). Agamodes and Trophonius distinguished themselves as architects: they built a temple of Apollo at Delphi, and a treasury of Hyrieus, king of Hyria in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 37. 3; Strab. p. 421). The story about this treasury resembles the one which Herodotus (ii. 121) relates of the treasury of the Egyptian king Rhampsinitus. In the construction of the treasury of Hyrieus, Agamedes and Trophonius contrived to place one stone in such a manner that it could be taken away outside, and thus formed an entrance to the treasury, without anybody perceiving it. Agamedes and Trophonius now constantly robbed the treasury; and the king, seeing that locks and seals were uninjured while his treasures were constantly decreasing, set traps to catch the thief. Agamedes was thus ensnared, and Trophonius cut off his head to avert the discovery. After this Trophonius was immediately swallowed up by the earth. On this spot there was afterwards, in the grove of Lebadœa, the cave of Agamedes with a column by the side of it. Here also was the oracle of Trophonius, and those who consulted it first offered a ram to Agamedes and invoked him. A tradition mentioned by Plato (Asiarch. p. 367 c.) and Cicero (Tusc. i. 47, 114) states that Agamedes and Trophonius, after building the temple of Apollo at Delphi, prayed to the god to grant them in reward for their labour what was best for men. The god promised to do so on a certain day, and when the day came the two brothers died.

Agamemnon (Ἀγαμέμνων), son of Plisthenes and Aërope or Eriphyle, and grandson of Atreus, king of Mycenæ: but Homer and others call him a son of Atreus and grandson of Pelops. Agamemnon and his brother Menelaus were brought up together with Aegisthus and Thyestes, in the house of Atreus. After the murder of Atreus by Aegisthus and Thyestes, who succeeded Atreus in the kingdom of Mycenæ [ÆGISTHUS], Agamemnon and Menelaus went to Sparta, where Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, the daughter of Tyndareus, by whom he became the father of Iphianassa (Iphigenia), Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Orestes. The manner in which Agamemnon obtained the kingdom of Mycenæ is differently related. From Homer (Il. ii. 107) it appears that he had peaceably succeeded Thyestes, while, according to others, he expelled Thyestes, and usurped his throne. He now became the most powerful prince in Greece. In the above passage of Homer he is said to reign over 'all Argos,' but in the catalogue of ships (Il. ii. 569 ff.) he rules Mycenæ, Corinth, Sicyon, Cleonæ, and cities of Achaia, while Diomedæ reigns at Argos, Tiryns, and Aegina. Thucydides (i. 9) reconciles the discrepancy by supposing that Agamemnon conquered Argos and the islands (cf. Strab. p. 377). There is a similar uncertainty in the Tragedians, who make him reign sometimes at Mycenæ, sometimes at Argos. Stesichorus, Simonides, and Pindar (Nem. viii. 12), place him at Sparta. When Helen, the wife of Menelaus, was carried off by Paris, and the Greek chiefs resolved to recover her by force of arms, Agamemnon was chosen their commander-in-chief. After two years of preparation, the Greek army and fleet assembled in the port of Aulis in Boeotia. According to the Cypria there was first an unsuccessful expedition [see TELEPHUS], and in the second gathering at Aulis Agamemnon killed a stag which was sacred to Artemis, who in return visited the Greek army with a pestilence, and produced a calm which prevented the Greeks from leaving the port. In order to appease her wrath, Agamemnon consented to sacrifice his daughter Iphigenia; but at the moment she was to be sacrificed, she was carried off by Artemis herself to Tauris and another victim was substituted in her place. The Tragedians follow this account, and so do the Roman Tragedians (Ribbeck, Rom. Trag. 94, 104, 344). The calm now ceased, and the army sailed to the coast of Troy. Agamemnon alone had 100 ships, independent of 60 which he had lent to the Arcadians. In the tenth year of the siege of Troy we find Agamemnon involved in a quarrel with Achilles respecting the possession of Briseis, whom Achilles was obliged to give up to Agamemnon. Achilles withdrew from the field of battle, and the Greeks were visited by successive disasters. The danger of the Greeks at last induced Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, to take part in the battle, and his fall led to the reconciliation of Achilles and Agamemnon. [ACHILLES.] Agamemnon, although the chief commander of the Greeks, is not the hero of the Iliad, and in chivalrous spirit, bravery, and character is altogether inferior to Achilles. But he nevertheless rises above all the Greeks by his dignity, power, and majesty: his eyes and head are likened to those of Zeus, his girdle to that of Ares, and his breast to that of Poseidon. The emblem of his power is a sceptre, the work of Hephaestus, which Zeus had once given to Hermes, and Hermes to Pelops, from whom it descended to Agamemnon. At the capture of Troy he received Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his prize. On his return home he was murdered by Aegisthus, who had seduced Clytemnestra during the absence of her husband. Pindar and the tragic poets make Clytemnestra murder

Agamemnon with her own hand, and instead of the murder being at the banquet, as in the epic poets and in Livius Andronicus (Ribbeck, It. Tr. 28), the Greek Tragedians describe the murder in the bath. Her motive is in Aeschylus her jealousy of Cassandra, in Sophocles and Euripides her wrath at the death of Iphigenia. His tomb is said to be at Mycenae in Paus. ii. 16. 6; but at Amyclae (Paus. iii. 19, 6) there was also a μνήμα in a temple of Alexandra, who is said to be the same as Cassandra. He seems to have been worshipped not merely as a hero but in some places to have been a representative of Zeus. In Sparta a Zeus Ἀγαμέμνων was worshipped (Lycophr. 335, 1123, 1369, Tsetz). In art he appears as a bearded man as in the above drawing from a very ancient bas-relief from Samothrace, which represents Agamemnon seated, with his two heralds Talthybius and Epēus standing behind him.

Agamemnonides (Ἀγαμέμνονιδης), the son of Agamemnon, i.e. Orestes.

Aganippe (Ἀγανίππη), daughter of the river god Permessos (Paus. ix. 29; Verg. Ecl. x. 12). A nymph of the well of the same name at the foot of Mount Helicon, in Boeotia, which was considered sacred to the Muses (who were hence called Aganippides), and which was believed to have the power of inspiring those who drank of it. The fountain of Hippocrēne has the epithet Aganippis (Ov. Fast. v. 7), from its being sacred to the Muses, like that of Aganippe.

Agapenor (Ἀγαπήνωρ), son of Ancaeus king of the Arcadians, received 60 ships from Agamemnon, in which he led his Arcadians to Troy (Il. ii. 609). On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Cyprus, where he founded the town of Paphos, and in it the famous temple of Aphrodite (Paus. viii. 5, 2).

Agarista (Ἀγαρίστη). 1. Daughter of Clisthenes, tyrant of Sicily, wife of Megacles, and mother of Clisthenes, the Athenian statesman, and Hippocrates.—2. Daughter of the above-mentioned Hippocrates, grand-daughter of No. 1, wife of Xanthippus, and mother of Pericles.

Agasias (Ἀγασίας), son of Dositheus, a sculptor of Ephesus (about B.C. 100), sculptured the statue known by the name of the 'Borghese Gladiator,' which is still preserved in the gallery of the Louvre, and is a marvel of anatomical study. This statue, as well as the Apollo Belvidero, was discovered among the ruins of a palace of the Roman emperors on the site of the ancient Antium (Capo d'Anzo). From the attitude of the figure it is clear that the statue represents, not a gladiator, but a warrior contending with a mounted combatant. In style this sculptor, like Menophilus and Dositheus, seems to follow the Greek traditions handed down from Lysippus to the so-called Hellenistic school, though in date he is contemporary with the Graeco-Roman schools (see Dict. Ant. s.v. Sculptura).

The so-called 'Borghese Gladiator,' by Agasias.

Agasicles, Agesicles, or Hegesicles (Ἀγασικλῆς, Ἀγησικλῆς, Ἡγησικλῆς), king of Sparta, succeeded his father Archidamus I., about B.C. 600 or 590.

Agasthenes (Ἀγασθένης), son of Augeias and father of Polyxenus, king of Elis (Paus. v. 3, 4; Hom. Il. ii. 624).

Agatharchides (Ἀγαθαρχίδης) or Agatharchus (Ἀγάθαρχος), a Greek grammarian, born at Cnidos, lived at Alexandria, probably about B.C. 130. He wrote a considerable number of geographical and historical works; but we have only an epitome of a portion of his work on the Erythraean sea, which was made by Photius (printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores), and some fragments (edited by C. Müller).

Agatharchus (Ἀγάθαρχος), an artist, native of Samos, said to have invented scene-painting, in the time of Aeschylus. It was probably not till towards the end of Aeschylus's career that scene-painting was introduced, and not till the time of Sophocles that it was generally made use of; which may account for Aristotle's assertion (Poët. iv. 16) that scene-painting was introduced by Sophocles (see Dict. Ant. s.v. Theatrum). Some have asserted that it must be a different Agatharchus whom Alcibiades kept by force to work in his house, and who is mentioned as alive in the time of Zeuxis (Plut. Alc. 16; Andoc. in Alc. § 17): but there is no difficulty in supposing the same man to have painted as early as B.C. 460 and as late as B.C. 415.

Agathēmērus (Ἀγαθήμερος). 1. The author of 'A Sketch of Geography in Epitome' (τῆς γεωγραφίας ὑποτυπώσεις ἐν ἐπιτομῇ), probably lived about the beginning of the 3rd century after Christ. The work consists chiefly of extracts from Ptolemy and other earlier writers. It is printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores.—2. A physician in the 1st cent. after Christ, born at Lacedaemon and a pupil of Cornutus, in whose house he became acquainted with Persius about A.D. 50.

Agathias (Ἀγαθίας), a Byzantine writer, born about A.D. 536 at Myrina in Aeolia, practised as an advocate at Constantinople, whence he obtained his surname Scholasticus (which word signified an advocate in his time), and died about A.D. 582. He wrote many epigrams (see Anthologia Graeca), but his principal work was his History in five books, which is also extant, and is of considerable value. It contains the history from A.D. 553–558, a period remarkable for important events, such as the conquest of Italy by Narses and the exploits of Belisarius over the Goths and Bulgarians.—Editions. By Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828; Dindorf, 1871.

Agathinus, a Greek physician in the 1st cent. A.D., born at Sparta. He was tutor of Archigenes. He founded a medical school called the Eclectici: What remains of his writings is printed in Kuhn's Additamenta.

Agathoclēa (Ἀγαθόκλεια), mistress of Ptolemy IV., king of Egypt, and sister of his minister Agathocles. She and her brother were put to death on the death of Ptolemy (b.c. 205).

Agathocles (Ἀγαθοκλῆς). 1. A Sicilian, raised himself from a humble station to be tyrant of Syracuse and ruler of Sicily, by his ability in handling mercenary troops and making them serve his purpose. Born at Thermae, a town of Sicily subject to Carthage, he is said to have been exposed when an infant, by his father, Carcinus of Rhegium, in consequence of a succession of troublesome dreams, portending that he would be a source of much evil to Sicily. His mother, however, secretly preserved his life, and at 7 years old he was restored to his father, who had long repented of his conduct to the child. By him he was taken to Syracuse and brought up as a potter. His strength and personal beauty, and his prowess in military service, recommended him to Damas, a noble Syracusan, who drew him from obscurity, and on whose death he married his rich widow, and so became one of the wealthiest citizens in Syracuse. His ambitious schemes then developed themselves, and he was driven into exile. After several changes of fortune, he collected an army which overawed the Syracusans, favoured as he was by Hamilcar and the Carthaginians, and was restored under an oath that he would not interfere with the democracy, which oath he kept by murdering 4000 and banishing 6000 citizens. He was immediately declared sovereign of Syracuse, under the title of Autocrator, b.c. 317. In the course of a few years the whole of Sicily which was not under the dominion of Carthage submitted to him. In b.c. 310 he was defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, under Hamilcar, who straightway laid siege to Syracuse; whereupon he formed the bold design of averting the ruin which threatened him, by carrying the war into Africa. He landed and burnt his ships. His successes were most brilliant and rapid. He constantly defeated the troops of Carthage, but was at length summoned from Africa by the affairs of Sicily, where many cities had revolted from him, b.c. 307. These he reduced, after making a treaty with the Carthaginians. He had previously assumed the title of king of Sicily. He afterwards plundered the Lipari isles, and also carried his arms into Italy, in order to attack the Brutii. But his last days were embittered by family misfortunes. His grandson Archagathus murdered his son Agathocles, for the sake of succeeding to the crown, and the old king feared that the rest of his family would share his fate. He accordingly sent his wife Texena and her two children to Egypt, her native country; and his own death followed almost immediately, b.c. 289, after a reign of 28 years, and in the 72nd year of his age. [For his mercenaries, the Mamertini, see MESSANA.] Other authors speak of his being poisoned by Maeno, an associate of Archagathus. The poison, we are told, was concealed in a quill which he used as a toothpick. (Diod. xix.-xxi.; Justin. xxii. 1 ff.)—2. Of Pella, father of Lysimachus.—3. Son of Lysimachus, was defeated and taken prisoner by Dromichaetis, king of the Getae, about b.c. 292, but was sent back to his father with presents. In 287 he defeated Demetrius Poliorcetes. At the instigation of his stepmother, Arsinoë, Lysimachus cast him into prison, where he was murdered (284) by Ptolemaeus Ceraunus. (Plut. Demetr. 39 ff.)—4. Brother of AGATHOCLEA.—5. A Greek historian, of uncertain date, wrote the Cyzicus, which was extensively read in antiquity, and is referred to in Cic. de Div. i. 24, 50; Athen. pp. 375, 515.

Agathodaemon (Ἀγαθοδαίμων or Ἀγαθὸς θεός). 1. The 'Good Deity' or Genius, the impersonation of prosperity; especially of natural fruitfulness, called by the Romans 'Bous Eventus' (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. § 23), and in Greece sometimes identified with Dionysus, as particularly giving increase of vineyards. Hence probably the honour paid to him at banquets, where at the end of the banquet a libation of pure wine was poured for him, followed by the paeon (Aristoph. Eg. 106; Athen. pp. 675, 692). Hence, too, he was represented as holding a patera in one hand and (as connected with Demeter) corn and poppies in the other (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. § 77): or with the horn of Amalthea (Paus. vi. 25, 4). It is noteworthy that his oldest symbol was a snake (Serv. ad Georg. iii. 417; Lamprid. Elagab. 28).—2. Of Alexandria, the designer of some maps to accompany Ptolemy's Geography. Copies of these maps are found appended to several MSS. of Ptolemy.

Agathon (Ἀγάθων), an Athenian tragic poet, born about b.c. 447, of a rich and respectable family, was a friend of Euripides and Plato, and a follower of Gorgias, by whom he was probably influenced in the rhetoric of his dramas. He gained his first victory in 417: in honour of which Plato represents the Symposium to have been given, which he has made the occasion of his dialogue so called. In 407, he visited the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, where his friend Euripides was also a guest at the same time. He died about 400, at the age of 47. The poetic merits of Agathon were considerable, and in reputation he came next to the three great Tragedians, but his poetry was characterised by prettiness rather than force or sublimity. Aristophanes represents him as effeminate (Eccles. 100 ff.). His innovations in Tragedy were (1) that he composed choric odes unconnected with the subject which could be sung as orchestral interludes in any play (ἐμβόλιμα); (2) that he departed from the exhausted mythical subjects, and invented plots of his own, as in his play called Ἄνθος (Arist. Poët. 9, § 7; 18, §§ 17, 22). In the Thesmophoriazusaë of Aristophanes he is ridiculed for his effeminacy, being brought on the stage in female dress.

Agathyrna, Agathyrnum (Ἀγάθυρνα, -ον; Ἀγαθυρναῖος: Agatha), a Sikel town on the N. coast of Sicily.

Agathyrsi (Ἀγάθυρσοι), a people in European Sarmatia, with a mythical founder Agathyrus, son of Heracles (Hdt. iv. 10), on the river Maris (Marosch) in Transylvania. From their practice of staining their skin with a blue dye they are called by Virgil (Aen. iv. 146) picti Agathyrsi. (Cf. Plin. H. N. iv. § 88; GELONI.)

Agavē (Ἀγανή), daughter of Cadmus, wife of Echion, and mother of Pentheus. She is said to have accused her sister Semele of falsely representing Zeus as the father of her child; whence the subsequent revenge of Dionysus. When Pentheus attempted to prevent the women from celebrating the Dionysiac festivals on mount Cithaeron, ho was torn to pieces there by Agave, who in her frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. (Ov. M. iii. 725.) [PENTHEUS.]—One of the Nereids, one of the Danaïds, and one of the Amazons, were also called Agavae.

Agbatāna. [ECBATANA.]

Agdistis (Ἀγδίστις), an androgynous deity, the offspring of Zeus and Earth, connected with a Phrygian worship of Attos or Attis. [See further under ATTIS and CYBELE.]

Agedincum or Agedicum (Sens), the chief town of the Senonos in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Agēladas (Ἀγελάδας), an eminent statuary of Argos, the instructor of the three great masters, Phidias, Myron, and Polyclethus. He seems to have worked from the end of the 6th century B.C. to the middle of the 5th. (See Dict. Antiq. s.v. Sculptura.)

Agēläus (Ἀγέλαος). 1. Son of Heracles and Omphale, and founder of the house of Croesus.—2. Son of Damastor and one of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Ulysses.—3. A slave of Priam, who exposed the infant Paris on mount Ida, in consequence of a dream of his mother.—4. Brother of Meleager.

Agēnor (Ἀγήνωρ). 1. Son of Poseidon and Libya, founder of the Phoenician race, twin-brother of Belus, and father of Cadmus, Phoenix, Cilix, Thasus, Phineus, and according to some of Europa also. The settlement of various nations is figured in the myth that these sons being sent in pursuit of their sister, when Zeus carried her off, settled down in the various lands which they reached. (Il. xii. 93, xxi. 590.) Virgil (Aen. i. 338) calls Carthage the city of Agenor.—2. Son of Iasus, and father of Argus Panoptes, king of Argos.—3. Son and successor of Triopas, in the kingdom of Argos.—4. Son of Pleuron and Xanthippe, and grandson of Aetolus.—5. Son of Phegeus, king of Psopis, in Arcadia. He and his brother Pronous slew Alcmaeon, when he wanted to give the celebrated necklace and peplos of Harmonia to his second wife Callirrhoe. [PHEGEUS] The two brothers were afterwards killed by Amphoterus and Acarnan, the sons of Alcmaeon and Callirrhoe.—6. Son of the Trojan Antenor and Theano, one of the bravest among the Trojans, was wounded by Achilles, but rescued by Apollo.

Agēnorides (Ἀγηνοριδης), a descendant of an Agenor, such as Cadmus, Phineus, and Perseus.

Agēsander, a sculptor of Rhodes in the 2nd century B.C., who, in conjunction with Polydorus and Athenodorus, sculptured the group of Laocoon. This celebrated group was discovered in the year 1506, near the baths of Titus on the Esquiline hill: it is now preserved in the museum of the Vatican. [LAOCOON.]

Agēsiläus (Ἀγησίλαος), king of Sparta. 1. Son of Doryssus, reigned 44 years, and died about B.C. 886. He was contemporary with the legislation of Lycurgus (Paus. iii. 2, 3).—2. Son of Archidāmus II., succeeded his half-brother Agis II., B.C. 398, excluding, on the ground of spurious birth, and by the interest of Lysander, his nephew LEOTYCHIDES. From 396 to 394 he carried on the war in Asia Minor with success, and was preparing to advance into the heart of the Persian empire, when he was summoned home to defend his country against Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, which had been induced by Artaxerxes to take up arms against Sparta. Though full of disappointment, he promptly obeyed; and in the course of the same year (394), he met and defeated at Coronē in Boeotia the allied forces (Xen. Hell. iv. 3). During the next four years he regained for his country much of its former supremacy, till at length the fatal battle of Leuctra, 371, overthrew for ever the power of Sparta, and gave the supremacy for a time to Thebes. For the next few years Sparta had almost to struggle for its existence amid dangers without and within, and it was chiefly owing to the skill, courage, and presence of mind of Agesilaus that she weathered the storm. In 361 he crossed with a body of Lacedaemonian mercenaries into Egypt to assist Tachos against Persia. When Nectanebis rose against Tachos, he gained the throne chiefly by the help of Agesilaus, whom he rewarded by a gift of 230 talents. But Agesilaus died, while preparing for his voyage home, in the winter of 361–360, after a life of above 80 years and a reign of 38. His body was embalmed in wax, and buried at Sparta. In person Agesilaus was small, mean-looking, and lame, on which last ground objection had been made to his accession, an oracle, curiously fulfilled, having warned Sparta of evils awaiting her under a 'lame sovereignty.' In his reign, indeed, her fall took place, but not through him, for he was one of the best citizens and generals that Sparta ever had. His life is written by Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos.

Agēsipōlis (Ἀγησίπολις), king of Sparta. 1. Succeeded his father Pausanias, while yet a minor, in B.C. 394, and reigned 14 years. As soon as his minority ceased, he took an active part in the wars in which Sparta was then engaged with the other states of Greece. In 390 he invaded Argolis with success; in 385 he took the city of Mantinea; in 381 he went to the assistance of Acanthus and Apollonia against the Olynthians, and died in 380 during this war in the peninsula of Pallene.—2. Son of Cleombrotus, reigned one year, B.C. 371.—3. Succeeded Cleomenes in B.C. 220, but was soon deposed by his colleague Lycurgus: he afterwards took refuge with the Romans.

Aggēnus Urbicus, a writer on the science of the Agrimensores, may perhaps have lived at the latter part of the 4th century of our era. His works are printed in Goesius, Rei Agrariae Auctores; Scriptores Gromatici, ed. Lachmann.

Aggrammes or Xandrames (Ξανδράμης), the ruler of the Gangaridae and Prasii in India, when Alexander invaded India, B.C. 327.

Agias (Ἀγίας), one of the so-called Cyclic poets, who wrote probably before B.C. 700. He was a native of Troezen, and wrote the Nόστοι, or return of the Greeks. Proclus gives a summary of the poem, which described the adventures of Agamemnon and Menelaus after the fall of Troy, and the wanderings of other heroes.

Aginnum (Agen), the chief town of the Nitobriges in Gallia Aquitania.

Agis (Ἄγισ), kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Eurysthenes, the founder of the family of the Agidae.—2. Son of Archidāmus II., reigned B.C. 427–398. He took an active part in the Peloponnesian war, and invaded Attica several times. (Thuc. iv. 2; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 2.) While Alcibiades was at Sparta he was the guest of Agis, and is said to have seduced his wife Timaea; in consequence of which Leotychides, the son of Agis, was excluded from the throne as illegitimate.—3. Son of Archidāmus III., reigned B.C. 338–330, attempted to overthrow the Macedonian power in Europe, while Alexander the Great was in Asia, but was defeated and killed in battle by Antipater in 330.—4. Son of Eudamidas II., reigned B.C. 244–240. He attempted to re-establish the institutions of Lycurgus, and to effect a thorough reform in the Spartan state; but he was resisted by his colleague Leonidas II. and the wealthy, was thrown into prison, and was there put to death by command of the ephors, along with his mother Agesistrata, and his grandmother Archidamia.

Agis, a poet of Argos, a flatterer of Alexander the Great (Curt. viii. 5; Arrian, Anab. v. 9).

Agläia (Ἀγλαΐα). 1. One of the CHARITES or GRACES.—2. Wife of Charopus and mother of Nireus, who came from the island of Sime against Troy (Il. ii. 671).

Aglaophēmē. [SIRENES.]
Agläōphon (Ἀγλαοφών). 1. Painter of Thasos, father and instructor of POLYGNORUS and Aristophon, lived about B. C. 500 (Plat. Gorg. p. 448 B).—2. Painter, lived about B. C. 420, probably grandson of No. 1.

Aglauros (Ἀγλαυρος)—less correctly Agraulos.—1. Daughter of Actaeus 1st king of Athens, wife of Cecrops and mother of Erysichthon, Aglauros 2, Herse and Pandrosos.—2. Daughter of Cecrops and Aglauros 1. The legends concerning her must be carefully distinguished. a. Athene gave a chest in which was the child ERICHTHONIUS to the three daughters of Cecrops—Aglauros, Pandrosos and Herse—to preserve unopened. Pandrosos obeyed, but her two sisters opened the chest and saw the child with a snake twined round it. As a punishment, according to some they were killed by the serpent, according to others, they were driven mad and threw themselves from the rocks of the Acropolis. (Paus. i. 18; Eur. Ion, 267; Apollod. iii. 14.) b. According to Ovid, Met. ii. 710, no immediate punishment fell upon the sisters, but Athene filled Aglauros, as the more guilty, with jealousy, so that she prevented Hermes from visiting her sister Herse, and was by him turned into stone. c. Aglauros is wedded to Ares and is mother of Alcippe [see HALIETHOTHIOS]. d. Aglauros was an Attic maiden who offered herself up as a sacrifice for the state in time of war: therefore there was a temple to her on the Acropolis where the Ephebi on first assuming arms took an oath of loyal devotion to their country (Dem. F.L. p. 438, § 303 and Schol.; Poll. viii. 105; Dict. Ant. s. v. Ephebus). The origin of the legend in a and b cannot be traced with any certainty; it is suggested that it arose from the chest carried by the ἀρρηφόροι or ἐρσηφόροι. As regards the legend in d, it must be observed that the three maidens represent the deities of dew fertilising the fields, and that they must have been at one time identified with Athene in her relations to the land of Attica. Hence we find both Aglauros and Pandrosos used as actual surnames for Athene. The temple of the oath must have replaced a shrine of Athene Aglauros, the protectress of Athens in war; and when the name Aglauros alone remained it was necessary to suppose that she was no unfaithful maiden, but one who had saved the country. The story of the sacrifice and also that of the fall from the rocks in all probability point to an old human sacrifice, such as was in fact made to Athene Aglauros in the Cyprian Salamis. The connexion of Athene and Aglauros appears also in the festival of Plynteria. From the fact that Aglauros is joined with Ares as one of the ἵστορες (Poll. viii. 106, cf. Dem. p. 303) in whose names oaths were taken, it has been recently surmised that Aglauros was a transference from the Theban cult of Erinys Tilphossa, wife of Ares.

Agläus (Ἀγλαός), a poor citizen of Psophis in Arcadia, whom the Delphic oracle declared happier than Gyges king of Lydia, on account of his contented disposition. Pausanias places him in the time of Croesus. (Plin. H. N. vii. § 151; Paus. viii. 33, 7.)

Agnaptus, an architect who built the porch called by his name in the Altis at Olympia (Paus. 15, 4, vi. 20, 7).

Agnōdicē (Ἀγνοδίκη), an Athenian maiden, was the first of her sex to learn midwifery, which a law of Athens forbade any woman to learn. Dressed as a man, she obtained instruction from a physician named Hierophilus, and afterwards practised her art with success. Summoned before the Areiopagus by the envy of the other practitioners, she was obliged to disclose her sex, and was not only acquitted, but obtained the repeal of the obnoxious law. This tale, though often repeated, does not deserve much credit, as it rests on the authority of Hyginus alone (Fab. 274).

Agnōnīdes (Ἀγνωνιδης), an Athenian demagogue, induced the Athenians to sentence Phocion to death (B. C. 318), but was shortly afterwards put to death himself by the Athenians. (Plut. Phoc.) Corn. Nepos calls him Agnon (Nep. Phoc.).

Agoracritus (Ἀγοράκριτος), a statutory of Paros, flourished B. C. 440–428, and was the favourite pupil of Phidias (Paus. ix. 34). From a similarity of style and perhaps from direct help or partnership in work, it resulted that some statues were variously attributed to Phidias and to Agoracritus. Thus the Nemesis at Rhamnus is said by Pausanias (i. 33) to be the work of Phidias; but by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. § 17) to be by Agoracritus. Pliny tells the improbable tale that this statue was first an Aphrodite for Athens, and was turned into a Nemesis by its author and sent to Rhamnus because the Athenians favoured Alcamenes, his rival.

Agōraea and Agōraeus (Ἀγοραία and Ἀγοραῖος), epithets of several divinities who were considered as the protectors of the assemblies of the people in the agora, such as Zeus, Athene, Artemis, and Hermes.

Agraei (Ἀγραῖοι), a people of Aetolia on the Achelous (Thuc. iii. 106; Strab. p. 449).

Agraulē (Ἀγραυλή and Ἀγρούλη: Ἀγρουλεύς), an Attic demus of the tribe Erechtheis, named after AGLAUROS, No. 2.

Agraulos. [AGLAUROS.]

Agreus (Ἀγρεύς), a hunter, a surname of Pan and Aristaenus.

Agri Decumates, tithe lands, the name given by the Romans to a part of Germany, E. of the Rhine and N. of the Danube, which they took possession of when the Germans retired eastward, and which they gave to Gauls and subsequently to their own veterans on the payment of a tenth of the produce (decuma). About A.D. 100 these lands were incorporated in the Roman empire. (Tac. Germ. 29.)

Agriçola, Cn. Jūlius, born June 13th, A. D. 37, at Forum Jūlii (Fréjus in Provence), was the son of Julius Graecinus, who was executed by Caligula, and Julia Procilla. He received a careful education; he first served in Britain, A. D. 60, under Suetonius Paulinus; was quaestor in Asia in 63; was governor of Aquitania from 74 to 76; and was consul in 77, when he betrothed his daughter to the historian Tacitus, and in the following year gave her to him in marriage. In 78 he received the government of Britain, which he held for 7 years, during which time he subdued the whole of the country with the exception of the highlands of Caledonia, and by his wise administration introduced among the inhabitants the language and civilisation of Rome. He was recalled in 85 through the jealousy of Domitian, and on his return lived in retirement till his death in 98, which according to some was occasioned by poison, administered by order of Domitian. His character is drawn in the brightest colours by his son-in-law Tacitus, whose Life of Agricola has come down to us.

Agrigentum (Ἀκράγας : Ἀκραγαντινος, Agrigentinus : Argenti), a town on the S. coast of Sicily, about 2½ miles from the sea, between the Acragas (Fiume di S. Biagio), and Hypsas (Fiume Drago). It was celebrated for its wealth and populousness, and till its destruction by the Carthaginians (B. C. 405) was one of the most splendid cities of the ancient world. It was the birthplace of Empedocles. It was founded by a Doric colony from Gela, about B. C. 579, was under the government of the cruel tyrant Phalaris (about 560), and subsequently under that of Theron (488-472), whose praises are celebrated by Pindar. After its destruction by the Carthaginians, B. C. 406, it was rebuilt by Timoleon, but it never regained its former greatness. After undergoing many vicissitudes it at length came into the power of the Romans (210), in whose hands it remained. There are still gigantic remains of the ancient city, especially of the Olympiæum, or temple of the Olympian Zeus.

Map of Agrigentum.

Agrinium (Ἀγρινιον), a town in Aetolia, perhaps near the sources of the Thermessus.

Agrippa, Herodes. 1. Called 'Agrippa the Great,' son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with the future emperor Claudius, and Drusus the son of Tiberius. The cognomen Agrippa was given to him in compliment to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. Having given offence to Tiberius he was thrown into prison; but Caligula, on his accession (A. D. 37), set him at liberty, and gave him the tetrarchies of Abilene, Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. On the death of Caligula (41), Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services, Judæa and Samaria were annexed to his dominions. By his wife Cypros he had a son Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla.—2. Son of Agrippa I., was educated at the court of Claudius, and at the time of his father's death was 17 years old. Claudius kept him at Rome, and sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator of the kingdom, which thus again became a Roman province. On the death of Herodes, king of Chalcis (48), his little principality was given to Agrippa, who subsequently received an accession of territory. Before the outbreak of the war with the Romans, Agrippa attempted in vain to dissuade the Jews from rebelling. He sided with the Romans in the war; and after the capture of Jerusalem, he went with his sister Berenice to Rome, and died in the 70th year of his age, A. D. 100. [For both of the above see further in Dictionary of the Bible.]

Agrippa, M. Vipsanius, born in B. C. 63, of an obscure family, studied with young Octavius (afterwards the emperor Augustus) at Apollonia in Illyria; and upon the murder of Caesar in 44, was one of the friends of Octavius, who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. In the civil wars which followed, and which terminated in giving Augustus the sovereignty of the Roman world, Agrippa took an active part; and his military abilities, combined with his promptitude and energy, contributed greatly to that result. In 41 Agrippa, who was then praetor, commanded part of the forces of Augustus in the Perusinian war. In 38 he obtained great success in Gaul and Germany; in 37 he was consul. For his naval campaign against Sex. Pompeius he provided a harbour for his ships in the course of the years 38 and 37 by cutting through the strips of land which separated the lake Lucrinus from the sea and the lake Averuus from the Lucrinus, thus forming the Portus Julius (Verg. Georg. ii. 161; Hor. A. P. 63; Vell. ii. 81; Dio Cass. xlix. 14; Plin. H. N. xvi. § 7.) In B. C. 36 he defeated Sex. Pompeius at Mylae and finally at Naulochus. In reward he received the naval crown. In 31 he commanded the fleet of Augustus at the battle of Actium; was consul a second time in 28, and a third time in 27. His greatness appears no less in his public works from his aedileship in 33 through a succession of years. Especially to be noticed are his restoration of aqueducts and sewers, the building of the Julian Aqueduct, the Porticus Neptuni in the Campus, his Thermae and the Pantheon, and in Gaul the magnificent aqueduct to supply Nemausus (Nîmes) now called the Pont du Gard. He also completed the survey of the Roman world begun by Julius Caesar, from which he formed the map engraved on marble and afterwards placed in the Porticus Pollae. In 21 he married Julia, daughter of Augustus. He had been married twice before, first to Pomponia, daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, and next to Marcella, niece of Augustus. He continued to be employed in various military commands in Gaul, Spain (where he subdued the Cantabrians B.C. 18), Syria (where he founded the colony of Berytus, Beyrout), and Pannonia, till his death in B.C. 12. By his first wife Pomponia, Agrippa had Vipsania, married to Tiberius, the successor of Augustus; and by his third wife, Julia, he had 2 daughters, Julia, married to L. Aemilius Paulus, and Agrippina, married to Germanicus, and 3 sons, Caius Caesar, Lucius Caesar [CAESAR], and Agrippa Postumus, who was banished by Augustus to the island of Planasia, and was put to death by Tiberius at his accession, A.D. 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 3, ii. 39, 40). In manner he is described as blunt, "vir rusticitati propior quam deliciis" (Plin. H.N. xxxv. § 26), though of his good taste his works are sufficient proof. The "torvitas" is shown in the stern expression of his face as preserved to us in coins and busts.

Agrippina. 1. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, married Germanicus, by whom she had nine children, among whom were the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. She was distinguished for her virtues and heroism, and shared all the dangers of her husband's campaigns. On his death in A.D. 17 she returned to Italy; but the favour with which she was received by the people increased the hatred and jealousy which Tiberius and his mother Livia had long entertained towards her. For some years Tiberius disguised his hatred, but at length under the pretext that she was forming ambitious plans, he banished her to the island of Pandataria (A.D. 30), where she died 3 years afterwards, A.D. 33, probably by voluntary starvation (Tac. Ann. i.-vi.; Suet. Aug. 64, Tib. 53; Dio Cass. lviii. 22).—2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina [No. 1.], and mother of the emperor Nero, was born at Oppidum Ubiorum, afterwards called in honour of her Colonia Agrippina, now Cologne. She was beautiful and intelligent, but licentious, cruel, and ambitious. She was first married to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus (A.D. 28), by whom she had a son, afterwards the emperor Nero; next to Crispus Passienus; and thirdly to the emperor Claudius (49), although she was his niece. In 50, she prevailed upon Claudius to adopt her son, to the prejudice of his own son Britannicus; and in order to secure the succession for her son, she poisoned the emperor in 54. Upon the accession of Nero, who was then only 17 years of age, she governed the Roman empire for a few years in his name. The young emperor soon became tired of the ascendancy of his mother, and after making several attempts to shake off her authority, he caused her to be assassinated in 59. (Tac. Ann. xii. xlii. xiv.; Dio Cass. lix.-lxi.; Suet. Claud. 43, 44; Ner. 5, 6.)

Agrippinenses. [COLONIA AGRIPPINA.]

Agrius (Ἄγριος). 1. Son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus, king of Calydon in Aetolia; his six sons, of whom one was Thersites, deprived Oeneus of his kingdom, and gave it to their father; but Agrius and four of his sons were afterwards slain by Diomedes, the grandson of Oeneus (Il. xiv. 117; Paus. ii. 25; Ov. Her. ix. 153; Hyg. Fab. 175).—2. Son of Odysseus and Circe, according to a doubtful line in Hes. Th. 1013.

Agroeciŭs or Agroetiŭs, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the 5th century after Christ, and wrote an extant work De Orthographia et Differentia Sermonis, which is printed in Putschius, Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, pp. 2266-2275.

Agron (Ἄγρων). 1. Son of Ninus, the first of the Lydian dynasty of the Heraclidae.—2. Son of Pleuratus, king of Illyria, died B.C. 231, and was succeeded by his wife Teuta, though he left a son Pinnes or Pinneus by his first wife, Tritaeta, whom he had divorced. (Dio Cass. xxxiv. 46, 151; Polyb. ii. 2.)

Agrōtēra. [ARTEMIS.]

Agryle. [AGRAULE.]

Agyieus (Ἄγυιεύς), a surname of Apollo, as the protector of the streets and public places.

Agylla (Ἄγυλλα), the ancient Greek name of the Etruscan town of CAERE.

Agyrĭum (Ἀγύριον: Ἀγυριναιός, Agyrinensis: S. Filippo d'Argĭro), a town in Sicily on the Cyamosorus, NW. of Centuripae and NE. of Enna, the birth-place of the historian Diodorus. The town was originally Sikel, but had adopted the special worship of Heracles, perhaps replacing some native deity.

Agyrrĭus (Ἀγύρριος), an Athenian, after being in prison many years for embezzlement of public money, obtained about B.C. 395 the restoration of the Theoricon, and also raised to three obols the pay for attending the assembly. He was appointed to command the fleet in B.C. 389. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 31; Dem. c. Timoc. p. 742, § 134; Arist. Ath. Pol. 41.)

Ahāla, Serviliŭs, the name of several distinguished Romans, who held various high offices in the state from B.C. 478 to 342. Of these the best known is C. Servilius Ahala, magister equitum in 439 to the dictator L. Cincinnatus, when he slew SP. MAELIUS in the forum, because he refused to appear before the dictator (Liv. v. 9). Ahala was afterwards brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. M. Brutus claimed descent on the mother's side from this Ahala (cf. Cic. Att. xiii. 40).

Aharna, a town in Etruria, NE. of Volsiui (Liv. x. 25).

Ahēnōbarbus, Domitiŭs, the name of a distinguished Roman family. They are said to have obtained the surname of Ahenobarbus, i.e. 'Brazen-Beard' or 'Red-Beard,' because the Dioscuri announced to one of their ancestors the victory of the Romans over the Latins at lake Regillus (B.C. 496), and, to confirm the truth of what they said, stroked his black hair and beard, which immediately became red (Suet. Ner. 1; Plut. Aemil. 25).—1. Cn., plebeian aedile B.C. 196, praetor 194, and consul 192, when he fought against the Boii.—2. Cn., son of No. 1, consul suffectus in 162.—3. Cn., son of No. 2, consul 122, conquered the Allobroges in Gaul, in 121, at the confluence of the Sulga and Rhodanus. He was censor in 115 with Caecilius Metellus. The Via Domitia in Gaul was made by him (Cic. Font. 4, 18; 12, 36; Clu. 42, 119; Strab. iv. p. 191).—4. Cn., son of No. 3, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward the law (Lex Domitia), by which the election of the priests was transferred from the collegia to the people. The people afterwards elected him Pontifex Maximus out of gratitude. He was consul in 96, and censor in 92, with Licinius Crassus, the orator. In his censorship he and his colleague shut up the schools of the Latin rhetoricians: but otherwise their censorship was marked by their violent disputes (Liv. Ep. lvii.; Cic. pro Deiot. 11, 31).—5. L., brother of No. 4, praetor in Sicily, probably in 96, and consul in 94, belonged to the party of Sulla, and was murdered at Rome in 82, by order of the younger Marius. His cruelty is noticed in Cic. Verr. v. 3.—6. Cn., son of No. 4, married Cornelia, daughter of L. Cinna, consul in 87, and joined the Marian party. He was proscribed by Sulla in 82, and fled to Africa, where he was defeated and killed by Cn. Pompey in 81.—7. L. (the friend of Cicero), son of No. 4, married Porcia, the sister of M. Cato, and was a staunch and courageous supporter of the aristocratical party. He was aedile in 61, praetor in 58, and consul in 54. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he threw himself into Corfinium, but was compelled by his own troops to surrender to Caesar. He next went to Massilia, and, after the surrender of that town, repaired to Pompey in Greece: he fell in the battle of Pharsalia (48), where he commanded the left wing, and, according to Cicero's assertion in the second Philippic (11, 27), by the hand of Antony (Caes. B. C. i. 6, 16; iii. 99; cf. index to Cicero's letters).—8. Cn., son of No. 7, was taken with his father at Corfinium (49), was present at the battle of Pharsalia (48), and returned to Italy in 46, when he was pardoned by Caesar. After Caesar's death in 44, he commanded the republican fleet in the Ionian sea. He afterwards became reconciled to Antony whom he accompanied in his campaign against the Parthians in 36. He was consul in 32, and deserted to Augustus shortly before the battle of Actium.—9. L., son of No. 8, married Antonia, the daughter of Antony by Octavia; was aedile in 22, and consul in 16; and, after his consulship, commanded the Roman army in Germany and crossed the Elbe (Tac. Ann. iv. 44). He died A.D. 25.—10. Cn., son of No. 9, consul A.D. 32, married Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and was father of the emperor Nero. [AGRIPPINA.]

Ajax (Ἄϊαξ). 1. Son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Periboea or Eriboea, and grandson of Aeacus. In the Homeric legend, however, he is merely known as son of Telamon. There is no hint of the descent from Aeacus, and therefore from Zeus, nor of his being a cousin of Achilles. The assignment to him of the left wing in the fleet with his 12 Salaminian ships (while Achilles held the right) belongs to the later catalogue (Il. ii. 557), and probably originated when Salamis was united to Athens. Homer calls him Ajax the Telamonian, Ajax the Great, or simply Ajax, whereas the other Ajax, son of Oileus, is always distinguished from him by some epithet. He is represented in the Iliad as second only to Achilles in bravery, and as the hero most worthy, in the absence of Achilles, to contend with Hector, as πύργος Ἀχαιῶν, especially sturdy and enduring in fight (Il. ii. 768, vi. 5, vii. 182, xi. 545, xvii. 233): but also wise in council (vii. 289), though a clumsy speaker (xiii. 824). There is no trace of the ἔβρις which later traditions attribute; on the contrary, he appears as reverent in spirit and obedient to the gods (see especially Il. vii. 194, xvi. 120, and his prayer, xvii. 645). Later than the Iliad came the story that in the contest for the arms of Achilles, which were to be given to the worthiest of the surviving Greeks, he was defeated by Odysseus. This is mentioned in the Odyssey (xi. 545). Further particulars are derived from later poets: that his defeat (upon the testimony of Trojan captives, who said that Odysseus had done them most harm) resulted in madness sent upon him by Athena, and that having slaughtered a flock of sheep, as though they were his enemies among the Greeks, he slew himself with the sword which Hector had given him. This story is given in the Aethiopis of Arctinus and the Iliad Minor of Lesches (of which fragments are preserved), as well as in the Tragedians. From his blood sprang the purple flower (Iris?) marked with the letters AI (Paus. i. 35; Theoc. x. 28; Ov. Met. xiii. 394; Verg. Ecl. iv. 107; Euphorion, fr. 36). Among other versions of his story preserved in post-Homeric poets and in works of art may be noticed, that his mother Periboea was an Athenian; that his wife Tecmessa was taken by him in the siege of a Phrygian town of which her father Teleutas was king (Soph. Aj. 20, 487); that at his birth Heracles sought an omen for him to show that he would be as strong as the lion-skin which he himself wore, whereupon Zeus sent an eagle (Pind. Isthm. v. 37): hence he was vulnerable only in the side uncovered by the lion-skin. Ajax was worshipped at Salamis, where he had a temple and a festival (Diet. Antig. s.v. Aianteia). After the union of Salamis with Athens, the Athenians adopted the Salaminian hero as ἐπώνυμος for their own country. The tribe Aiantis was called after him; he was summoned to the help of Athens before the battle of Salamis (Herod. viii. 64); his statue stood near the βουλευτήριον (Paus. i. 5): he was regarded as ancestor of Peisistratus, of Harmodius, of Miltiades, and of Alcibiades.—2. Son of Oileus, king of the Locrians, also called the lesser Ajax, sailed against Troy with 40 ships. He is described as small of stature, and wears a linen cuirass (λινοθώραξ), but is brave and intrepid, skilled in throwing the spear, and, next to Achilles, the most swift-footed among the Greeks. On his return from Troy his vessel was wrecked on the Whirling Rocks (Γυράλ πέτραι); he himself got safe upon a rock through the assistance of Poseidon; but as he boasted that he would escape in defiance of the immortals, Poseidon split the rock with his trident, and Ajax was swallowed up by the sea. This is the account of Homer, but his death is related somewhat differently by Virgil and other writers, who tell us that the anger of Athena was excited against him, because, on the night of the capture of Troy, he violated Cassandra in the temple of the goddess, where she had taken refuge, and that, his vessel being wrecked on the Capharean rocks, he was killed by lightning (Aen. i. 40). He was worshipped as a national hero both by the Opuntian and the Italian Locrians.

Aides (Ἄϊδης). [HADES.]

Aidōneus (Ἄϊδωνεύς). 1. A lengthened form of Aides. [HADES].—2. A mythical king of the Molossians in Epirus, husband of Persephone, and father of Core. When Theseus and Pirithous attempted to carry off Core, Aidoneus had Pirithous killed by Cerberus, and kept Theseus in captivity till he was released by Heracles.

Aius Locūtius or Lōquens, a Roman divinity. A short time before the Gauls took Rome (B.C. 390) a voice was heard at Rome in the Via Nova, during the silence of night, announcing that the Gauls were approaching. No attention was at the time paid to the warning, but the Romans afterwards erected on the spot where the voice had been heard, an altar with a sacred enclosure around it, to Aius Locutius, or the 'Announcing Speaker.' (Liv. v. 32; Cic. Div. i. 45, 101, ii. 82, 69; Gell. xvi. 17.)

Alābanda (ἡ Ἀλάβανδα or τὰ Ἀλάβανδα: Ἀλαβανδεύς or Ἀλάβανδος: Arabissar), an inland town of Caria, near the Marsyas, to the S. of the Maeander, was situated between two hills. Under the Romans it was the seat of a conventus juridicus. Pliny speaks of a lapis Alabandicus found here, fusible and used for glass-making (H. N. xxxvi. 62).

Alabon (Ἀλαβόν) or Alabis, a river on the E. coast of Sicily, perhaps La Cantara (Diod. iv. 78). It is probably the same as the Abolus of Plutarch (Tim. 34).

Alagōnia (Ἀλαγονία), a town of the Eleuthero-Laconians on the frontiers of Messenia.

Alalcomēnae (Ἀλακκομεναί: Ἀλακκομεναίος, Ἀλακκομενεύς: Sulinari), an ancient town of Boeotia, E. of Coronēa, with a temple of Athena, who is said to have been brought up by its autochthonous founder Alalcomeneus (Paus. ix. 33, 5; Hom. Il. iv. 8; Strab. pp. 411, 418), and who was hence called Alalcomenēis (Ἀλακκομενηῖς, ἶδος).

Alalia. [ALERIA.]

Alander. [LALANDUS.]

Alāni (Ἀλανοί, Ἀλανοί, i.e. mountaincers, from the Sarmatian word ala), a great Asiatic people, included under the general name of Scythians, but probably a branch of the Massagetae (Amm. Marc. xxii. 8, 30, xxxi. 2). They were a nation of warlike horsemen. They are first found about the E. part of the Caucasus, in the country called Albania, which appears to be only another form of the same name. In the reign of Vespasian they made incursions into Media and Armenia; and at a later time they pressed into Europe, as far as the banks of the Lower Danube, where, towards the end of the 5th century, they were routed by the Huns, who then compelled them to become their allies. In A.D. 406, some of the Alani took part with the Vandals in their irruption into Gaul and Spain, where they became incorporated in the kingdom of the Visigoths.

Alāricus, in German Al-ric, i.e. 'All-rich,' elected king of the Visigoths in A.D. 398, had previously commanded the Gothic auxiliaries of Theodosius. He twice invaded Italy, first in A.D. 402-403, when he was defeated by Stilicho at the battle of Pollentia, and a second time in 408-410; in his second invasion he took and plundered Rome, 24th of August, 410. He died shortly afterwards at Consentia in Bruttium, while preparing to invade Sicily, and was buried in the bed of the river Basentinus, a small tributary of the Crathis. (Jornand. de Reb. Get. 30; Oros. vii. 29; Zosim. v. vi.; Aug. Civ. Dei, i. 1; Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 2.)

Alastor (Ἀλάστωρ). 1. 'The scarer' or 'driver': the avenging deity who follows up the sinner, and drives him to fresh crime, and so becomes an evil genius in his family after him (Aesch. Ag. 1465; Soph. O. C. 788; Eur. Or. 1556): hence sometimes the man who is thus driven (Aesch. Eum. 237).—2. A surname of Zeus and of the Furies as Avengers.—3. A Lycian, companion of Sarpedon, slain by Odysseus (Il. v. 677).—4. A Trojan name (Il. iv. 295, xx. 463).

Alba Silvius. [SILVIUS.]

Alba. 1. (Abla), a town of the Bastitani in Spain.—2. (Alwana), a town of the Barduli in Spain.—3. Augusta (Aulps), a town of the Elicoci in Gallia Narbonensis.—4. Fucientia or Fucentis (Albenses: Alba or Albi), a town of the Marsi, and subsequently a Roman colony, was situated on a lofty rock near the lake Fucinus. It was a strong fortress, and was used by the Romans as a state prison (Strab. p. 240; Liv. xlv. 42).—5. Longa (adj. Albāni), the most ancient town in Latium, is said to have been built by Ascanius, and to have founded Rome. It was called Longa, from its stretching in a long line down the Alban Mount towards the Alban Lake. Alba was regarded as the primitive Latin town. It was the religious head of the Latin confederate 30 cantons. Here the Latins assembled for their festival and offered sacrifice to Jupiter Latiaris. At some time (traditionally in the reign of Tullus Hostilius) Alba was destroyed, and its inhabitants became part of the Roman people; but the Alban clans retained their family shrines, and the Alban Mount continued to be the place for the Latiar, or Feriae Latinae (see Dict. Antiq. s.v.). The surrounding country was studded with the villas of the Roman aristocracy and emperors (Pompey's, Domitian's, &c.), each of which was called Albanum, and out of these a new town at length grew, also called Albanum (Albano), on the Appian road.—6. Pompeia (Albenses Pompeiani: Alba), a town in Liguria, founded by Scipio Africanus I., and colonised by Pompeius Magnus, the birth-place of the emperor Pertinax.

Albānia (Ἀλβανία: Ἀλβανί, Albāni; Schirwan and part of Daghestan, in the S.E. part of Georgia), a country of Asia on the W. side of the Caspian, extending from the rivers Cyrus and Araxes on the S. to M. Ceraunius (the E. part of the Caucasus) on the N., and bounded on the W. by Iberia. It was a fertile plain, abounding in pasture and vineyards; but the inhabitants were fierce and warlike. They were a Scythian tribe, probably a branch of the Massagetae, and identical with the ALANI. The Romans first became acquainted with them at the time of the Mithridatic war, when they encountered Pompey. (Strab. p. 501.)

Albānum. [ALBA, No. 5.]

Albānus Lacus (Lago di Albano), a small lake about 5 miles in circumference, W. of the Mons Albanus between Bovillae and Alba Longa, is the crater of an extinct volcano, and is many hundred feet deep. The emissarium which the Romans bored through the solid rock (traditionally during the siege of Veii) in order to carry off the superfluous water of the lake, is extant at the present day (see Dict. Antiq. s.v. Emissarium).

Albānus Mons (Monte Cavo or Albano), was, in its narrower signification, the mountain in Latium on whose declivity the town of Alba Longa was situated. It was the sacred mountain of the Latins, on which the religious festivals of the Latin League were celebrated (Latiar, or Feriae Latinae), and on its highest summit was the temple of Jupiter Latiaris, to which the Roman generals ascended in triumph, when this honour was denied them in Rome. The Mons Albanus in its wider signification included the Mons ALGIDUS and the mountains about Tusculum.

Albi Montes, a lofty range of mountains in the W. of Crete, 300 stadia in length, covered with snow the greater part of the year.

Albici (Ἀλβλοικοί, Ἀλβειῖς), a warlike Gallic people, inhabiting the mountains north of Massilia (Strab. p. 203; Caes. B. C. i. 34).

Albingaunum. [ALBIUM INGAUNUM.]

Albinovānus, Celsus, is mentioned by Horace (Ep. i. 8), as scriba of Tiberius Nero, and warned to avoid plagiarism. We have no record of his writings. It is surmised that he is the Celsus mentioned in Ov. Pont. i. 9.

Albinovānus, C. Pēdo, a friend of Ovid, who addresses to him one of his Epistles from Pontus (iv. 10). We have no warrant for attributing to Albinovanus the three elegies, Epicēdium Drusi, de Maecenatis Obitu, and de Moribundo Maecenate, printed by Wernsdorf, in his Poëtae Latini Minores, vol. iii. iv., and by Meinecke, Quodlinburg, 1819. Their authorship remains unknown. Only one genuine fragment of Albinovanus survives: the 23 lines de Navigatione Germanici, which are quoted by Seneca (Suas. i. 14) with approval. They seem to have formed part of an epic poem on contemporary history. He wrote also an epic, Thescis (Ov. l.c.), and epigrams. He is called by Quintilian (x. 1, 90) a poet 'non indignus cognitione.'

Albinōvānus, P. Tullius, belonged to the Marian party, was proscribed in b.c. 87, but was pardoned by Sulla in 81, in consequence of his putting to death many of the officers of Norbanus, whom he had invited to a banquet at Ariminum.

Albinus or Albus, Postumius, the name of a patrician family at Rome, many of the members of which held the highest offices of the state from the commencement of the republic to its downfall.—1. A., surnamed Regillensis, dictator b.c. 498, when he conquered the Latins in the great battle near lake Regillus, and consul 496, in which year some of the annals placed the battle (Liv. ii. 19; Dionys. vi. 2; Cic. N. D. ii. 2, 6).—2. Sp., consul 466, and a member of the first decemvirate 451 (Liv. iii. 2, 31, 70).—3. A., consul b.c. 464 (Liv. iii. 4).—4. Sp. (son of No. 2), cons. trib. in b.c. 432 (Liv. iv. 25).—5. P., cons. trib. b.c. 411 (Liv. iv. 49).—6. M., censor b.c. 403 (Liv. v. 1; Fast. Cap.)—7. A., cons. trib. b.c. 397 (Liv. v. 16).—8. Sp., cons. trib. b.c. 394 (Liv. v. 26).—9. Sp., consul 344, and again 321. In the latter year he marched against the Samnites, but was defeated near Caudium, and obliged to surrender with his whole army, who were sent under the yoke. The senate, on the advice of Albinus, refused to ratify the peace which he had made with the Samnites, and resolved that all persons who had sworn to the peace should be given up to the Samnites, but they refused to accept them (Liv. viii. 16, ix. 1–10; Appian, de Reb. Samn. 2; Cic. de Off. iii. 30.—10. L., consul 234, and again 229. In 216 he was praetor, and was killed in battle at Litana by the Boii. His head was cut off, lined with gold, and used as a cup by the Boii (Liv. xxiii. 24; Polyb. iii. 106, 118; Cic. Tusc. i. 37, 89.—11. Sp., consul in 186, when the senatusconsultum was passed, which is extant, for suppressing the worship of Bacchus in Rome. He died in 179.—12. A., consul 180, when he fought against the Ligurians, and censor 174. He was subsequently engaged in many public missions. Livy calls him Luscus, from which it would seem that he was blind of one eye (Liv. xl. 41, xlii. 10, xlv. 17).—13. Sp., brother of Nos. 12 and 14, surnamed Paullulus, consul 174 (Liv. xxxix. 45, xli. 26, xliii. 2).—14. L., praetor 180, in Further Spain, where he remained two years, and conquered the Vaccaei and Lusitani. He was consul in 173, and afterwards served under Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia in 168 (Liv. xl. 44, xlv. 41).—15. Sp., lieutenant of Paullus b.c. 168, consul 110, carried on war against Jugurtha in Numidia, but effected nothing. When Albinus departed from Africa, he left his brother Aulus in command, who was defeated by Jugurtha. Spurius was condemned by the Mumia Lex, as guilty of treasonable practices with Jugurtha.

—16. A., consul 151, imprisoned by tribunes for conducting the loves with too much severity (Liv. Ep. 48; Pol. xxxv. 3); accompanied Mummius to Greece as legate in 146 (Cic. Att. xiii. 30, 32). He wrote a Roman history in Greek, of which Polybius did not think highly (Pol. xl. 6). Cicero speaks of him as a learned man (Acad. ii. 45, 137, Brut. 21, 81).—17. A., consul b.c. 99, with M. Antonius, is said by Cicero to have been a good speaker (Brut. 25, 94).

Albinus (Ἀλβίνος), a Platonic philosopher, lived at Smyrna in the 2nd century after Christ, and wrote an Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato.—Editions. In the first edition of Fabricius's Bibl. Graec. vol. ii., and prefixed to Etwall's edition of three dialogues of Plato, Oxon. 1771; Schneider, 1852; C. Hermann, 1873.

Albinus, Clōdīus, whose full name was Decimus Clodius Ceionius Septimius Albinus, was born at Adrumetum in Africa. The emperor Commodus made him governor of Gaul and afterwards of Britain, where he was on the death of Commodus in A.D. 192. In order to secure the neutrality of Albinus, Septimius Severus made him Caesar; but after Severus had defeated his rivals, he turned his arms against Albinus. A great battle was fought at Lugdunum (Lyons), in Gaul, the 19th of February, 197, in which Albinus was defeated and killed. (Dio Cass. lxx. 4; Vita Alb.)

Albion or Alēbion (Ἀλβίων, Ἀλεβίων), son of Poseidon and brother of Dereynus or Bergion, with whom he attacked Heracles, when he passed through their country (Liguria) with the oxen of Geryon. They were slain by Heracles.

Albion, another name of BRITANNIA, by which it was originally distinguished from Ierne (Plin. H. N. iv. § 102).

Albis (Elbe), one of the great rivers in Germany, the most easterly which the Romans became acquainted with, rises according to Tacitus in the country of the Hermunduri. The Romans reached the Elbe for the first time in b.c. 9 under Drusus, and crossed it for the first time in b.c. 3 under Domitius Ahenobarbus. Tiberius reached the Elbe A.D. 5; but after that the legions were withdrawn from this part of Germany, whence the expression in Tac. Germ. 41, 'nunc tantum auditur.'

Albium Ingaunum or Albingaunum (Albenga), a town of the Ingauni on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium (Plin. iii. § 48; Strabo, p. 202, writes it Ἀλβιγγαῦνον).

Albium Intemeliū or Albintemeliū (Vintimiglia) a town of the Inteuclii on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium. (Strabo connects both this name and the preceding with the word Alp.)

T. Albūcius or Albūtius, studied at Athens, and belonged to the Epicurean sect; he was well acquainted with Greek literature, but was satirised by Lucilius on account of his affecting on every occasion the Greek language and philosophy. He was praetor in Sardinia in b.c. 105; and in 103 was accused of extortion by C. Julius Caesar, and condemned. He retired to Athens and pursued the study of philosophy. (Cic. Brut. 35, 131; de Fin. i. 38; Orat. 44, 149; Tusc. v. 37, 108.)

Albūla, an ancient name of the river TIBER.

Albūlae Aquae. [ALBUNEA.]

Albūnea (Albūla, Stat. Silv. i. 3. 75; according to some, Albūna in Tib. ii. 5. 69), a prophetic nymph or Sibyl, to whom a grove was cousecrated in the neighbourhood of Tibur (Tivoli), with a fountain and a temple (Verg. Aen. vii. 81; Hor. Od. i. 7, 12). This fountain was the largest of the Albulæ aquæ, still called Acque Albule, sulphurous springs at Tibur, which flow into the Anio. Hence the story of the Anio bearing the oracular books unwetted in its stream to Tibur (Tib. ii. 5, 69). The name perhaps belonged to other sulphurous springs, for Probus (ad Georg. i. 10) mentions one so called in the Laurentine district. Near it was the oracle of Faunus Fatidicus. The temple is still extant at Tivoli.

Alburnus Mons, a mountain in Lucania (Verg. Georg. iii. 146).

Alcaeus (Ἀλκαῖος), 1.—Son of Perseus and Andromeda, and father of Amphitryon and Anaxo.—2. A name of Heracles.—3. Son of Heracles, ancestor of Candaules (Herod. i. 7).

Alcaeus. 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the earliest of the Aeolian lyric poets. He belonged to the nobles of Mytilene and fought both with sword and pen in the struggles of the oligarchs against those who usurped the sovereignty. About the year 612 B.C. Melanchrus, the despot of Mytilene, was slain by a faction in which the brothers of Alcaeus, Kilus and Antemenidas, were joined with Pittacus. Their party, however, was overcome by Myrsilus, who made himself despot, and the brothers went into exile, Alcaeus to Egypt and Antemenidas to Assyria, where he seems to have taken service with Nebucadrezzar. One of the odes of Alcaeus tells of an ivory-hilted sword which his brother had worn in this service. Myrsilus was slain by the popular party, led by Pittacus; and we find Alcaeus making war upon Pittacus in the interest of the oligarchic faction. He was defeated and imprisoned, but soon pardoned by Pittacus. The only other event of which we have distinct notice, is that when the Athenians tried to colonise Sigeum, Alcaeus fought in the Mytilenæan army against them, and incurred the disgrace (as he himself tells) of leaving his shield in his flight from the battle (Hdt. v. 95; Strab. p. 600). His poetry, in ten books, included hymns to the gods and odes, the latter being divided into political (στασιωτικὰ), scolia and erotica; all, however, practically of the class of scolia or drinking songs, and greatly inferior poetry to that of his younger contemporary Sappho. Among the few fragments remaining are the originals of Horace's odes 'Vides ut alta,' 'O navis referent,' and 'Nunc est bibendum,' which last is a rejoicing over the death of Myrsilus. He has given his name to the Alcaic metre, and seems also to have been the earliest writer of Sapphics.—Editions. Bergk, in Poetae Lyrici, 1867; Hartung, 1855.—2. A comic poet at Athens belonging to the transition between Old and New Comedy, about B.C. 388.—3. Of Messene, author of epigrams in Anth. Pal., about B.C. 200.

Alcaeus.

Alcāmēnes (Ἀλκαμένης). 1. Son of Teleclus, king of Sparta, from B.C. 779 to 742.—2. A sculptor of Athens, flourished from B.C. 444 to 400 and was the most famous of the pupils of Phidias. His greatest works were a statue of Aphrodite (Plin. xxxvi. 16; Lucian, Imag. 4), and a Dionysus. We are told also by Pausanias that the west pediment in the temple of Zeus at Olympia was his work. It is thought that this belongs to an early period of his art, before he came under the influence of Phidias. [Cf. AGORACRITUS.]

Alcander (Ἀλκανδρος), a young Spartan, who thrust out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, when his fellow-citizens were discontented with the laws he proposed. Lycurgus pardoned the outrage, and thus converted Alcander into one of his warmest friends. (Plut. Lyc. 11; Ael. V.H. xiii. 23.)

Alcāthōē or Alcīthōē (Ἀλκαθόη or Ἀλκιθόη), daughter of Minyas, refused with her sisters Leucippe and Arsippe to join in the worship of Dionysus when it was introduced into Bœotia, and were accordingly changed by the god into bats, and their weaving-loom into vines (Ov. Met. iv. 1–40, 390–415). A somewhat different legend existed, apparently an attempt to explain a human sacrifice. The daughters of Minyas for the above reason being driven mad by Dionysus, Leucippe gave up her son Hippasos to be torn in pieces. Hence, it was said, came the custom that the priest of Dionysus slew any maiden of the race of Minyas whom he found at the festival of Agrionia (Ant. Lib. 10; Plut. Q.G. 38; Ael. V.H. iii. 42; Dict. of Ant. s.v. Agrionia.)

Alcāthōus (Ἀλκάθοος). 1. Son of Pelops and Hippodamīa, brother of Atreus and Thyestes, obtained as his wife Euaechme, the daughter of Megareus, by slaying the Cithaeronian lion, and succeeded his father-in-law as king of Megara. He restored the walls of Megara, in which work he was assisted by Apollo. The stone upon which the god used to place his lyre while he was at work was believed, even in late times, to give forth a sound, when struck, similar to that of a lyre (Ov. Met. viii. 15).—2. Son of Aesyetes and husband of Hippodamīa, the daughter of Auchises and sister of Aeneas, was one of the bravest of the Trojan leaders in the war of Troy, and was slain by Idomeneus (Il. xiii. 427, 466).

Alcestis or Alcestē (Ἀλκίστις or Ἀλκίστη), daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, wife of Admetus, died in place of her husband. [ADMETUS.]

Alcētas (Ἀλκέτας), two kings of Epirus. 1. Son of Tharypus, was expelled from his kingdom, and was restored by the elder Dionysius of Syracuse. He was the ally of the Athenians in B.C. 373 (Demosth. Timoth. pp. 1187, 1190, §§10, 22; Paus. i. 11; Diod. xv. 13).—2. Son of Arymbas, and grandson of Alcetas I., reigned B.C. 313–303, and was put to death by his subjects (Diod. xix. 88; Plut. Pyrrh. 3).

Alcētas. 1. King of Macedonia, reigned 29 years, and was father of Amyntas I.—2. Brother of Perdiccas and son of Oroutes, was one of Alexander's generals. On the death of Alexander, he espoused his brother's party, and upon the murder of the latter in Egypt in 321, he joined Eumenes. He killed himself at Termessus in Pisidia in 320, to avoid falling into the hands of Antigonus.

Alcībīades (Ἀλκιβιάδης), son of Clinias and Dinomache, was born at Athens about B.C. 450, and on the death of his father in 447, was brought up by his relation Pericles. He possessed a beautiful person, transcendent abilities, and great wealth, which received a large accession through his marriage with Hipparche, the daughter of Hipponicus. His youth was disgraced by his amours and debaucheries, and Socrates, who saw his vast capabilities, attempted to win him to the paths of virtue, but in vain. Their intinacy was strengthened by mutual services. At the battle of Potidaea (B.C. 432) his life was saved by Socrates, and at that of Delium (424) he saved the life of Socrates. He did not take much part in public affairs till after the death of Cleon (422), but he then became one of the leading politicians, and the head of the war party in opposition to Nicias. Enraged at the affront put upon him by the Lacedaemonians, who had not chosen to employ his intervention in the negotiations which ended in the peace of 421, and had preferred Nicias to him, he induced the Athenians to form an alliance with Argos, Mantinea and Elis, and to attack the allies of Sparta. In 415 he was foremost among the advocates of the Sicilian expedition, which he believed would be a step towards the conquest of Italy, Carthage, and Peloponnesus. While the preparations for the expedition were going on, there occurred the mysterious mutilation of the Hermes-busts, which the popular fears connected in some unaccountable manner with an attempt to overthrow the Athenian constitution. Alcibiades was charged with being the ring-leader in this attempt. He had been already appointed along with Nicias and Lamachus as commander of the expedition to Sicily, and he now demanded an investigation before he set sail. This, however, his enemies would not grant; as they hoped to increase the popular odium against him in his absence. He was therefore obliged to depart for Sicily; but he had not been there long, before he was recalled to stand his trial. On his return homewards, he managed to escape at Thurii, and thence proceeded to Sparta, where he acted as the avowed enemy of his country. At Athens sentence of death was passed upon him, and his property was confiscated. At Sparta he rendered himself popular by the facility with which he adopted the Spartan manners; but the machinations of his enemy Agis II. induced him to abandon the Spartans and take refuge with Tissaphernes (412), whose favour he soon gained. Through his influence Tissaphernes deserted the Spartans and professed his willingness to assist the Athenians, who accordingly recalled Alcibiades from banishment in 411. He did not immediately return to Athens, but remained abroad for the next 4 years, during which the Athenians under his command gained the victories of Cynossema, Abydos, and Cyzicus, and got possession of Chalcedon and Byzantium. In 407 he returned to Athens, where he was received with great enthusiasm, and was appointed commander-in-chief of all the land and sea forces. But the defeat at Notium, occasioned during his absence by the imprudence of his lieutenant, Antiochus, furnished his enemies with a handle against him, and he was superseded in his command (B.C. 406). He now went into voluntary exile to his fortified domain at Bisantho in the Thracian Chersonesus, where he made war on the neighbouring Thracians. Before the fatal battle of Aegos-

Potami (405), he gave an ineffectual warning to the Athenian generals. After the fall of Athens (404), he was condemned to banishment, and took refuge with Pharnabazus; he was about to proceed to the court of Artaxerxes, when one night his house was surrounded by a band of armed men, and set on fire. He rushed out sword in hand, but fell, pierced with arrows (404). The assassins were probably either employed by the Spartans, or (according to Plutarch) by the brothers of a lady whom Alcibiades had seduced. He left a son by his wife Hippareto, named Alcibiades, who never distinguished himself. It was for him that Isocrates wrote the speech Περὶ τοῦ Ζεύρου. (Plut. Alcib.; Nepos, Alcib.; Thuc. v.-viii.; Xen. Hell. i. 11; Diod. xiii.; Andoc. in Alc. de Myst.; Isocr. de Bigis.)

Alcidāmas (Ἀλκιδάμας), a Greek rhetorician, of Elaea in Aegina, in Asia Minor, was a pupil of Gorgias, and resided at Athens between B.C. 432 and 411. His works were characterised by pompos diction and the extravagant use of poetical epithets and phrases (Quintil. iii. 1, 10; Arist. Rhet. i. 13, 5, iii. 3, 8; Cic. Tusc. i. 48, 116). There are two declamations extant which bear his name, entitled Odysseus (in which Odysseus accuses Palamedes) and de Sophistis. These are generally thought by modern critics to be the work of different authors, and it is possible that neither is by Alcidamas. In a fragment of a speech about Messene, Alcidamas seems to condemn slavery as contrary to natural law.—Editions of the two declamations ascribed to him, in Reiske's Orat. Gr.; Bekker's Orat. Att.; Blass, 1871.

Alcīdas (Ἀλκίδας Dor. = Ἀλκείδης), a Spartan commander of the fleet B.C. 428-427. In the former year he was sent to Mytilene, and in the latter to Corcyra. (Thuc. iii. 16, 26, 69.)

Alcīdes (Ἀλκείδης), a name of Amphitryon, the son of Alcaeus, and more especially of Hercules, the grandson of Alcaeus. Alcaeus also seems to have been an early name of Hercules himself.

Alcīmedē (Ἀλκίμεδη), daughter of Phylacus and Clymene, wife of Aeson, and mother of Jason (Ov. Her. vi. 105; Ap. Rh. i. 45).

Alcīmus (Ἀλκίμος) Alethius, the writer of 7 short poems, a rhetorician in Aquitania, is spoken of in terms of praise by Sidonius Apollinaris and Ausonius.—Editions. In Meier's Anthologia Latina, 254-260, and in Wernsdorf's Poetae Latini Minores, vol. vi.

Alcīmedon (Ἀλκίμεδων), an Arcadian hero, father of Phialo, whom he cast forth upon the mountains with the child which she had borne to Hercules. Hercules, guided by a jay (κίσσα) discovered and saved them (Paus. viii. 12, 2).

Alcīnōus (Ἀλκίνοος). 1. Son of Nausithous, and grandson of Poseidon, is celebrated in the story of the Argonauts, and still more in the Odyssey. Homer represents him as the happy ruler of the Phaeacians in the island of Scheria, friend of the Immortals, who appear in visible form to him and his people. He has by Arete five sons and one daughter, Nausicaa. The way in which he received Ulysses, and the stories which the latter related to the king about his wanderings, occupy a considerable portion of the Odyssey (books vi. to xiii.). Pliny (iv. § 52) identifies Scheria with Corfu, the inhabitants of which are said still to point out the rocky island of Pontikonisi, noticed by Pliny, in shape like a ship, as the rock into which the Phaeacian ship (Od. xiii. 160) was changed. The doom of the city of Alcīnōus, that it should be overwhelmed by a mountain is foretold as though to enhance the nobility of the character of Alcinous, but is not further related. [For the Argonaut story, which places Alcinous in the island of Drepane, see ARGONAUTÆ; Ap. Rh. iv. 990.]—2. A Platonic philosopher, who probably lived under the Caesars, wrote a work entitled Epitome of the Doctrines of Plato, but he ascribes to Plato much that belongs to Aristotle, and some theories about transmigration, which are probably derived from Pythagoras. His δαίμονες are not unlike the Gnostic Eons.—Editions. By Fell, Oxon. 1667, and by J. F. Fischer, Lips. 1873, 8vo.

Alciphron (Ἀλκίφρων), the most distinguished of the Greek epistolary writers, was probably a contemporary of Lucian, about A.D. 180. The letters (118 in number, in 3 books) are written by fictitious personages, and the language is distinguished by its purity and elegance. The new Attic comedy was the principal source from which the author derived his information respecting the characters and manners which he describes, and for this reason they contain much valuable information about the private life of the Athenians of that time.—Editions. By Bergler, Lips. 1715; Hercher, 1873; Meineke, 1858.

Alcithœe. [ALCATHOE.]

Alcmaeon (Ἀλκμαίων). 1. Son of Amphiaræus and Eriphyle, and brother of Amphiloehus (Paus. x. 10, 2). His mother was induced by the necklace of Harmonia, which she received from Polyneices, to persuade her husband Amphiaræus to take part in the expedition against Thebes; and as he knew he would perish there, he enjoined his sons to kill their mother as soon as they should be grown up, before they went against Thebes. Alcmaeon took part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes. The oracle made his leadership in the expedition a condition of its success, and his mother, bribed by Thersander with the dress of Harmonia, overcame his scruples about starting without having avenged his father, wishing that her son also might die; and on his return home after the capture of the city, he slew his mother according to the injunction of his father, and urged also by the oracle of Apollo. For this deed he became mad, and was haunted by the Erinnyes. He went to Psophis, and was there purified by Phegeus, whose daughter Arsinoë or Alphasiboea he married, giving her the necklace and peplos of Harmonia. But as the land of this country ceased to bear on account of its harbouring a matricide, his madness returned; he left Psophis and repaired to the country at the mouth of the river Achelous. Here in the alluvial deposit of the river was ground which had not existed when his mother cursed him, and so he was healed from his madness. The god Achelous gave him his daughter Callirrhœe in marriage; and as the latter wished to possess the necklace and peplos of Harmonia, Alcmaeon went to Psophis and obtained them from Phegeus, under the pretext of dedicating them at Delphi; but when Phegeus heard that the treasures were fetched for Callirrhœe, he caused his sons to murder Alcmaeon. Alcmaeon was worshipped as a hero at Thebes, and at Psophis his tomb was shown, surrounded with cypresses. His sons by Callirrhœe avenged his death. (Paus. viii. 24; Thuc. ii. 102; Plut. de Exil. p. 602; Apollod. iii. 7; Ov. Met. ix. 407.)—2. Son of Megacles, was greatly enriched by Croesus, as related in Idt. vi. 125.—3. Of Crotona in Italy. He is said to have been the first person who dissected animals, and he made important discoveries in anatomy and natural philosophy. There are traces of Pythagorean influence in his opinions. He wrote several medical and philosophical works, which are lost. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 83; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 308.)

Alcmaeōnidae (Ἀλκμαίωνῖδαι), a noble family at Athens, members of which fill a space in Grecian history from B.C. 750 to 400. They were a branch of the family of the Nelidae, who were driven out of Pylus in Messenia by the Dorians, and settled at Athens. In consequence of the way in which Megacles, one of the family, treated the insurgents under Cylon (B.C. 612), they brought upon themselves the guilt of sacrilege, and were in consequence banished from Athens, about 595. About 560 they returned from exile, but were again expelled by Pisistratus. In 548 they contracted with the Amphictyonic council to rebuild the temple of Delphi, and obtained great popularity throughout Greece by executing the work in a style of magnificence which much exceeded their engagement. On the expulsion of Hippias in 510, they were again restored to Athens. They now joined the popular party, and Clisthenes, who was at that time the head of the family, gave a new constitution to Athens. [See also CLISTHENES, MEGACLES, PERICLES.]

Alcman (Ἀλκμάν, also called Ἀλκμαίων), the chief lyric poet of Sparta, by birth a Lydian of Sardis, was brought to Laconia as a slave, when very young, and was emancipated by his master, who discovered his genius. He lived in the 7th century B.C., and most of his poems were composed after the conclusion of the second Messenian war. Lyric poetry was chiefly used at Sparta for religious worship, and accordingly Alcman wrote pæans, wedding hymns and processional hymns (prosodia), but he wrote also parthenia (for girls to sing in chorus), and is said by some ancient writers to have been the inventor of erotic poetry. His metres were very various. The Cretic hexameter was named from him Alcmanic. His dialect was the Spartan Doric, with an intermixture of epic and Aeolic. The Alexandrian grammarians placed Alcman at the head of their canon of the 9 lyric poets. The fragments of his poems are edited by Welcker, Gissen, 1815; Bergk, in Poetae Lyrici Graeci, 1867; Dramard-Baudry, Paris, 1870.

Alcmēnē (Ἀλκμήνη), daughter of Electryon, king of Mycenæ, by Anaxo or Lysidice. The brothers of Alcmenē were slain by the sons of Pterelaus; and their father set out to avenge their death, leaving to Amphitryon his kingdom and his daughter Alcmenē, whom Amphitryon was to marry. But Amphitryon having unintentionally killed Electryon before the marriage, Sthenelus expelled both Amphitryon and Alcmenē, who went to Thebes. But here, instead of marrying Amphitryon, Alcmenē declared that she would only marry the man who should avenge the death of her brothers. Amphitryon undertook the task, and invited Creon of Thebes to assist him. During his absence, Zeus, in the disguise of Amphitryon, visited Alcmenē, and, pretending to be her husband, related in what way he had avenged the death of her brothers. (Pind. Nem. x. 15, Isthm. vii. 5). Amphitryon himself returned the next day; Alcmenē became the mother of Heracles by Zeus, and of Iphicles by Amphitryon. [HERACLES.] When Heracles was raised to the rank of a god, Alcmenē, fearing Eurystheus, fled with the sons of Heracles to Athens; but when Hyllus died she returned to Thebes and, according to some, died there (Anton. Lib. 33); Pausanias (i. 41) says that she died near Megara, and was buried there. Pherecydes (ap. Ant. Lib.) relates that Zeus sent Hermes to conduct her to the Islands of the Blest, where she married Rhadamanthys. From this comes a variant, that she married Rhadamanthys while he was king of Ocalia. (Apollod. ii. 4, 11; Plut. Lys. 28.)

Alcÿōnē or Halcÿōnē (Ἀλκυόνη) 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and beloved by Poseidon.—2. Daughter of the Thessalian Aeolus and Enarete, wife of the Malian king Ceÿx.—3. Daughter of the wind-god Aeolus and Aegiale, wife of Ceÿx, the son of Hesperus. They lived so happily that they were presumptuous enough to call each other Zeus and Hera, for which Zeus metamorphosed them into birds, alcyon and cejx (Ap. Rh. i. 1087). Others relate that Ceÿx perished in a shipwreck, that Alcyone for grief threw herself into the sea, and that the gods, out of compassion, changed the two into birds (Hyg. Fab. 65; Ov. Met. xi. 410-750). It was fabled that during the seven days before, and as many after, the shortest day of the year, while the bird alcyon was breeding, there always prevailed calms at sea. Hence the term ἄλκυονίδες ἡμέραι (Arist. H. A. v. 9; cf. Theocr. vii. 57).

Alcÿōneus (Ἀλκυονεύς), a giant killed by Heracles at the Isthmus of Corinth (Apollod. i. 6, 1; Pind. Nem. iv. 27). He is called βουβότας (Nem. vi. 36), because he was said to have driven off the cattle of the Sun from Erytheia. Later poets represent him as lying under Aetna.

Alcÿōnium Māre (ἡ Ἀλκυονίς θάλασσα), the E. part of the Corinthian Gulf.

Alēa (Ἀλέα), a surname of Athene, under which she was worshipped at Alea, Mantinea, and Tegea. Her temple at the latter place was one of the most celebrated in Greece. It is

Alebïon. [ALBION.]

Alecto. [EUMENIDES.]

Alemanni or Alamanni or Alamani (from the German alle Männer, all men), a confederacy of German tribes, chiefly of Suevic extraction, between the Danube, the Rhine, and the Main, though we subsequently find them extending their territories as far as the Alps and the Jura. The different tribes of the confederacy were governed by their own kings, but in time of war they obeyed a common leader. They were brave and warlike, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They first came into contact with the Romans in the reign of Caracalla, who assumed the surname of Alemanicus on account of a pretended victory over them (A.D. 214). They were attacked by Alexander Severus (234), and by Maximin (237). They invaded Italy in 270, but were driven back by Aurelian, and were again defeated by Probus in 282. After this time they continually invaded the Roman dominions in Germany, and, though defeated by Constantius I., Julian (357), Valentinian, and Gratian, they gradually became more and more powerful, and in the fifth century were in possession of Alsace and of German Switzerland.

Alēria (Ἀλερία: Ἀλαλία in Herod.), one of the chief cities of Corsica, on the E. of the island, on the S. bank of the river Rhotanus (Tarignano) near its mouth. It was founded by the Phocaeans B.B. 564, was plundered by L. Scipio in the first Punic war, and was made a Roman colony by Sulla. (Hdt. i. 165; Zonar. viii. 11; Diod. v. 13.)

Alēsa. [HALESA.]

Alēsia (Ἀλεσία), an ancient town of the Mandubii in Gallia Lugdunensis, said to have been founded by Hercules, and situated on a high hill (now Auxois), which was washed by the two rivers Lutosa (Oze) and Osera (Ozerain). It was taken and destroyed by Caesar, said to have been built by Aleus, son of Aphidas, king of Tegea, from whom the goddess derived this surname (Paus. viii. 4, 4).

Alēa (Ἀλέα: Ἀλεύς), a town in Arcadia, E. of the Stymphalian lake, with a celebrated temple of Athene, the ruins of which are near Piali (Paus. viii. 28).

in B.C. 52, after a memorable siege, but was afterwards rebuilt. (Caes. B. G. vii. 68-90; Strab. p. 191; Diod. iv. 19.)

Alēsiae (Ἀλεσῖαι), a town in Laconia, W. of Sparta, on the road to Pherac (Paus. iii. 20).

Alēsium (Ἀλεσίον), a town in Elis, not far from Olympia, afterwards called Alesiaeum (Strab. p. 341; Hom. Il. ii. 617).

Alésius Mons (τὸ Ἀλήσιον ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia, with a temple of Poseidon Hippius and a grove of Demeter. [MANTINEA.]

Alétes (Ἀλήτης), son of Hippotes and a descendant of Heracles, is said to have taken possession of Corinth, and to have expelled the Sisyphids, thirty years after the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Heraclids. His family, called the Aletidae, maintained themselves at Corinth down to the time of Bacchis. (Strab. p. 389; Paus. ii. 4; Vell. Pat. i. 3). According to tradition he got his name, 'Wanderer,' because his father had been banished for the murder of Carnus. It is not improbable that he may be under this name merely the representative of the migrating Dorians, who were spoken of as ἀλήται. Regarding the manner in which Aletes took Corinth, there are various stories. The historical account is that the conquerors entrenched themselves on the Solygiau hill, and from that basis got possession of the town (Thuc. iv. 42). Pausanias (ii. 4, 3) says that the two kings Doris and Hyanthidas made terms for themselves to remain in the land while their Aeolian subjects were driven out. From their names it might rather be imagined that they were eponyms of Dorian tribes. A more popular legend is that Aletes consulted the oracle of Zeus at Dodona, and was told that he might take the city on a festal day if he could first induce a native of the place to give him a clod of earth. Aletes disguised himself and asked a Corinthian for bread; the man churlishly gave him a clod, upon which he, recognising the omen, said, δέχεται καὶ βῶλον Ἀλήτης. As a festival of the Dead was going on, he contrived to accost the daughter of Creon the king, and promised to marry her if she would open the city gates for him, which she did. He called the place Διὸς Κόρινθος, because he had gained it by the aid of Zeus; hence the proverb for an 'old story,' because this story was so often told. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 155.) The legend seems to have grown up somehow as an explanation of the proverb itself, and of the custom of asking for earth in token of submission. [For another story of the taking of Corinth see HELLOTIS.] Aletes also fought against Atreus when Codrus devoted himself [see CODRUS]. He divided his people into eight tribes, with eight districts. From him the Corinthians are called παῖδες Ἀλάτα (Pind. Ol. xiii. 17).

Alethēa (Ἀλήθεια), Truth personified, the daughter of Zeus (Pind. Ol. xi. 6; Schol. ad loc.). The Romans regarded her as daughter of Saturnus = Κρόνος (Plut. Q. R. 11). Gellius apparently confuses Κρόνος and χρόνος when he says (xii. 11) that she was the daughter of Tempus.

Alētis. [ERIGONE.]

Aletium (Aletinus), a town of Calabria (Strab. p. 282; Plin. iii. § 105).

Aletrium or Alatrium (Aletrinas, ātis: Alatri), an ancient town of the Hernici, subsequently a municipium and a Roman colony, W. of Sora and E. of Anagnia (Liv. ix. 42; Cic. Clu. 16, 42; Strab. p. 287; C. I. L. i. 1166). It is especially remarkable for its remains of ancient walls in polygonal masonry.

Aleuādae. [ALEUAS.]

Aleuas (Ἀεῦας), a descendant of Heracles, was the ruler of Larissa in Thessaly, and the reputed founder of the celebrated family of the Aleuadae (Pind. Pyth. x. 5; Theocr. xvi.

34). In Ael. H. A. viii. 11 we have a story of a sorpent falling in love with him while he tended cattle on Ossa. [For the history of the Aleuadae see THESSALIA.]

Aleus. [ALEA.]

Alex or Halex (Alece), a small river in S. Italy, was the boundary between the territory of Rhegiun and of the Locri Epizephyrii (Strab. p. 260; Thuc. iii. 99).

Alexander (Ἀλεξανδρος), the usual name of PARIS in the Iliad.

Alexander Sevērus. [SEVERUS.]

Alexander. I. Minor Historical Persons.

1. Son of Aeropus, and son-in-law of Antipater, a native of the Macedonian district called Lyncestis, whence he is usually called Alexander Lyncestes. He was an accomplice in the murder of Philip, B.C. 336, but was pardoned by Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alexander to Asia; but in 334 he was detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Darius, was kept in confinement and put to death in 330 (Arr. i. 25; Curt. viii. 8; Plut. Al. 10; Just. xii. 14).—2. Son of Antonius, the triumvir, and Cleopatra, surnamed Helios, born with his twin-sister Cleopatra Selene, B.C. 40. After the battle of Actium they were taken to Rome by Augustus, and were generously educated by Octavia, the wife of Antonius, with her own children (Plut. Ant. 54, 87; Dio Cass. xlix. 40, li. 21).—3. Eldest son of Aristobulus II., king of Judaea, rose in arms in B.C. 57 against Hyrcanus, who was supported by the Romans. Alexander was defeated by the Romans in 56 and 55, and was put to death by Pompey at Antioch in 49 (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5; B. J. i. 8).—4. Third son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great. In his quarrel with his elder brother Antipater for the government [ANTIPATER], he called in the aid of Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Polioretetes, by the latter of whom he was murdered B.C. 294 (Plut. Pyrrh.; Dem.; Just. xvi. 1).—5. Jannaeus, the son of Joannes Hyrcanus, and brother of Aristobulus I., king of the Jews B.C. 104–77. At the commencement of his reign he was engaged in war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus; and subsequently he had to carry on for six years a dangerous struggle with his own subjects, to whom he had rendered himself obnoxious by his cruelties and by opposing the Pharisees. He signalled his victory by the most frightful butchery of his subjects (Jos. Ant. xii. 12).—6. Surnamed Isius, the chief commander of the Aetolians, took an active part in opposing Philip of Macedonia (B.C. 198, 197), and in the various negotiations with the Romans, including the embassy to Rome, B.C. 189, to obtain peace for the Aetolians on terms of submission after the victories of Fulvius Nobilior (Liv. xxxii. 32; Pol. xvii. xviii. xxii. 9).—7. Tyrant of Pherae, nephew of Jason, and also of Polyphron, whom he murdered, thus becoming Tagus of Thessaly, B.C. 369 (Plut. Pel. 29 &c.; Xen. Hell. vi. 4; Cic. de Off. ii. 7, 25). In consequence of his tyrannical government the Thessalians applied for aid first to Alexander II., king of Macedonia, and next to Thebes. The Thebans sent Pelopidas into Thessaly to succour the malcontents; but having ventured incautiously within the power of the tyrant, he was seized by Alexander and thrown into prison, B.C. 368. The Thebans sent a large army into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas, but they were defeated in the first campaign, and did not obtain their object till the next year, 367. In 364 Pelopidas again entered

Thossaly with a small force, but was slain in battle by Alexander. The Thebans now sent a large army against the tyrant, and compelled him to become a dependent ally of Thebes. Wo afterwards hour of Alexander making piratical descents on many of the Athenian dependencies, and even on Attica itself. Ho was murdered in 367, by his wife Thebe, with the assistance of her three brothers, when, as it is said, he was planning to murder her and marry the widow of his unco Jason. Reference to the anecdote in Plut. Pel. 29 will show that Shakespearo in all probability took some suggestions for the plot of Hamlet from what is related of Alexander of Pherae, especially as regards the 'play-scene.'—8. Son of Polysperchon, tho Maccdonian, was chiefly employed by his father in the command of the armies which he sent against Cassander. Thus he was sent against Athens in B.C. 318, and was engaged in military operations during the next year in various parts of Greece. But in 315 he became reconciled to Cassander, and we find him in 314 commanding on behalf of the latter. He was murdered at Sicyon in 314 (Diod. xviii. 65 &c., xix. 11, 53, 60, 66).—9. Ptolemaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS.]—10. Tiberius, born at Alexandria, of Jewish parents, and nephew of the writa Philo. He deserted the faith of his aucestors, and was rewarded for his apostasy by various public appointments. In the reign of Claudius he succeeded Fadus as procurator of Judaea (A.D. 46), and was appointed by Nero procurator of Egypt. He was the first Roman governor who declared in favour of Vespasian; and he accompanied Titus in the war against Judaea, and was present at the taking of Jerusalem. (Jos. Ant. xx. 4, B. J. ii. 11 &c.; Tac. Ann. xv. 28, Hist. i. 11, ii. 74, 79.)

II. Kings of Epirus.

1. Son of Neoptolemus and brother of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Philip made him king of Epirus in place of his cousin Aeacides, and gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage (B. C. 336). In 332, Alexander, at the request of the Tarentines, crossed over into Italy, to aid them against the Lucanians and Bruttii. After meeting with considerable success, he was defeated and slain in battle in 326, near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron in Southern Italy. (Just. viii. 6, xii. 2; Liv. viii. 17, ix. 17).—2. Sou of Pyrrhus and Ianassa, daughter of the Sicilian tyrant Agathocles, succeeded his father in B. C. 272, and drove Antigonus Gonatas out of Macedonia. He was shortly afterwards deprived of both Macedonia and Epirus by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus; but he recovered Epirus by the aid of the Acarnanians. (Plut. Pyrrh. 9; Just. xxvi. 2, xxviii. 1.)

III. Kings of Macedonia.

1. Son of Amyntas I., distinguished himself in the life-time of his father by killing the Persian ambassadors who had come to demand the submission of Amyntas, because they attempted to offer indignities to the ladies of the court, about B. C. 507. He succeeded his father shortly afterwards, was obliged to submit to the Persians, and accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B. C. 480). He gained the confidence of Mardonius, who sent him to Athens to propose peace to the Athenians, which was rejected. He was secretly inclined to the cause of the Greeks, and informed them the night before the battle of Plataeae of the intention of Mardonius to fight on the following day. He died B. C. 454, and was succeeded by Perdiccas II. (Hdt. vii. 173, viii. 136, ix. 44; Just. vii. 3).—2. Son of Amyntas II., whom he succeeded, reigned B. C. 369–367 (Plut. Pel. 26; Diod. xv. 60; Dem. F.L. p. 402, § 195). A usurper, of the name of Ptolemy Alorites, having risen against him, Pelopidas, who was called in to mediate between them, left Alexander in possession of the kingdom, but took with him to Thebes several hostages; among whom was Philip, afterwards king of Macedonia, and father of Alexander the Great. Alexander was shortly afterwards murdered by Ptolemy Alorites.

3. Alexander 'The Great,' Son of Philip II. and Olympias, was born at Pella, B. C. 356. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus, who taught him to compare himself with Achilles; at the age of 13, he was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character which was manifest to the latest period of his life. At the age of 16 Alexander was entrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father, while he was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chaeronæa (338), where the victory was mainly owing to his impetuosity and courage. On the murder of Philip (336), to which he was considered by some, though probably with injustice, to have been privy, Alexander ascended the throne, at the age of 20, and found himself surrounded by enemies on every side. He first put down rebellion in his own kingdom, and then rapidly marched into Greece. His unexpected activity overawed all opposition; Thebes, which had been most active against him, submitted when he appeared at its gates; and the assembled Greeks at the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Lacedæmonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. He now directed his arms against the barbarians of the north, marched (early in 335) across mount Haemus, defeated the Triballi, and advanced as far as the Danube, which he crossed; and on his return subdued the Illyrians and Taulantii. A report of his death having reached Greece, the Thebans once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. He advanced into Boeotia by rapid marches, took Thebes by assault, destroyed all the buildings, with the exception of the house of Pindar, killed most of the inhabitants, and sold the rest as slaves. (Arr. i. 7; Just. xi. 2; Plut. Al. 11.) Alexander now prepared for his great expedition against Persia. Philip having been nominated leader of the war against Persia by the Greek States, whose best policy in the interests of their own freedom would have been to preserve the balance of Persia against Macedon, Alexander now succeeded to the enterprise. In the spring of 334, he crossed the Hellespont, with about 35,000 men. Of these 30,000 were foot and 5000 horse; and of the former only 12,000 were Maccdonians. At Ilium he offered sacrifice to Athene, placed garlands on the tomb of Achilles and himself ran round it. Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the river Granicus in Mysia (May 334), where they were entirely defeated by him. This battle was followed by the capture or submission of the chief towns on the W. coast of Asia Minor. Halicaruassus was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defence by Memnon, the ablest general in the Persian service, whose death in the following year (333) relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. He now marched along the coast of Lycia and Pamphylia, and then N. into Phrygia and to Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated Gordian knot, attaching the yoke to the pole of the waggon (traditionally that of Gordius), which, it was said, was to be loosened only by the conqueror of Asia. In 333, he marched from Gordium though the centre of Asia Minor into Cilicia, where he nearly lost his life at Tarsus by a fever, brought on by his great exertions, or through bathing, when fatigued, in the cold waters of the Cydnus. Darius meantime had collected an army of 500,000 or 600,000 men, with 30,000 Greek mercenaries, whom Alexander defeated in the narrow plain of Issus. Darius escaped across the Euphrates by the ford of Thapsacus; but his mother, wife, and children fell into the hands of Alexander, who treated them with the utmost delicacy and respect. It was a fortunate capture for Alexander, since Darius for a long time abstained from opposition in hopes of ransoming the captives, and so lost valuable time. Alexander now directed his armies against the cities of Phoenicia, most of which submitted; but Tyre was not taken till the middle of 332, after an obstinate defence of seven months. Next followed the siege of Gaza, which again delayed Alexander two months. His cruelty towards Batis its defender, whom he fastened to the chariot and dragged round the walls, in imitation of Achilles, is unlike his previous character. Afterwards, according to Josephus, he marched to Jerusalem, intending to punish the people for refusing to assist him, but he was diverted from his purpose by the appearance of the high priest, and pardoned the people. There is no doubt that this story, which rests on the authority of Josephus alone, should be rejected. Alexander next marched into Egypt, which willingly submitted to him, for the Egyptians had ever hated the Persians, who treated their national religion and customs with contempt, while Alexander's policy was exactly the opposite. At the beginning of 331, Alexander founded at the mouth of the W. branch of the Nile, the city of ALEXANDRIA, and about the same time visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, in the desert of Libya, and was saluted by the priests as the son of Jupiter Ammon.—In the spring of the same year (331), Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army. He marched through Phoenicia and Syria to the Euphrates, which he crossed at the ford of Thapsacus; thence he proceeded through Mesopotamia, crossed the Tigris, and at length met with the immense hosts of Darius, said to have amounted to more than a million of men, in the plains of Gaugamela. The battle was fought in the month of October, 331, and ended in the complete defeat of the Persians. Alexander pursued the fugitives to Arbela (Erbil), which place has given its name to the battle, though distant about 25 miles from the spot where it was fought. Darius, who had left the field of battle early in the day, fled to Ecbatana (Hamadan), in Media. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia, and began to adopt Persian habits and customs, by which he conciliated the affections of his new subjects. From Arbela, he marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, all of which surrendered to him. At Susa he found a treasure of 40,000 talents, and, among other spoils carried off by Xerxes, the statues of Harmodius and Aristogeiton, which he sent back to Athens. Here he received a reinforcement of 15,000 men from Greece. He is said to have set fire to the palace of Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian courtesan (Curt. v. 6; Arr. iii. 19; Diod. xvii. 70; Plut. Al. 42). The treasure found at Persepolis is said to have amounted to 120,000 talents.—At the beginning of 330 Alexander marched from Persepolis into Media, to Ecbatana, in pursuit of Darius, whom he followed through Rhagae and the passes of the Elburz mountains, called by the ancients the Caspian Gates, into Parthia, where the unfortunate king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Alexander sent his body to Persepolis, to be buried in the tombs of the Persian kings. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of king of Persia. Alexander was engaged during the remainder of the year in subduing the N. provinces of Asia between the Caspian and the Indus—namely, Hyrcania, Parthia, Aria, the Drangae and Sarangae. It was during this campaign that PHILOTAS, his father PARMENION, and other Macedonians, were executed on the charge of treason. The proceedings in this matter were both cruel and unjust, and have left a stain upon Alexander's memory. In 329 Alexander crossed the mountains of the Paropamisus (the Hindoo Koosh), and marched into Bactria against Bessus, whom he pursued across the Oxus (which he crossed upon pontoons formed of inflated skins) into Sogdiana. In this country Bessus was betrayed to him, and was put to death. From the Oxus, after occupying Maracanda (Samarcand), he advanced as far as the Jaxartes (the Sir), which he crossed, and defeated several Scythian tribes N. of that river. After founding a city Alexandria on the Jaxartes, called also Alexandria Eskate, as the northern limit of his march—it is probably either Khojend or Kokan—he retraced his steps, and returned to Zariaspa or Bactra, where he spent the winter of 329. It was here that he killed his friend Clitus in a drunken revel.—In 328, Alexander again crossed the Oxus to complete the subjugation of Sogdiana, but was not able to effect it in the year, and accordingly went into winter quarters at Nautaca, a place in the middle of the province. At the beginning of 327, he took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposited his wife and daughters. The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror, and he accordingly made her his wife. This marriage with one of his Eastern subjects was in accordance with the whole of his policy. Having completed the conquest of Sogdiana, he marched S. into Bactria, and made preparations for the invasion of India. While the army was in Bactria another conspiracy was discovered for the murder of the king. The plot was formed by Hermolaus with a number of the royal pages, who were all put to death. Alexander found, or pretended to find, that the philosopher Callisthenes, whose freedom of speech he resented, was an accomplice and put him also to death, at the same time uttering a threat against the absent Greeks (i.e. Aristotle) who had sent Callisthenes to him (for the comment of Theophrastus, see Cic. Tusc. iii. 10, 21). Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of 327: he recrossed the Paropamisus mountains (Hindoo Koosh), and, marching by Cabul and the Cophen (Cabul river), crossed the Indus, probably near the modern Attock. He met with no resistance till he reached the Hydaspes (Jelum), where he was opposed by Porus, an Indian king, whom he defeated after a gallant resistance, and took prisoner. Alexander restored to him his kingdom, and treated him with distinguished honour. He founded two towns, one on each bank of the Hydaspes: one called Bucephala, in honour of his horse Bucephalus, who died here, after carrying him through so many victories; and the other Nicaea, to commemorate his victory. From thence he marched across the Acesines (the Chinab) and the Hydraotes (the Ravi), and penetrated as far as the Hyphasis (Gharra). This was the furthest point which he reached, for the Macedonians, worn out by long service, and tired of the war, refused to advance further; and Alexander, notwithstanding his entreaties and prayers, was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, where he had previously given orders for the building of a fleet, and then sailed down the river with about 8000 men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. This was late in the autumn of 327. The people on each side of the river submitted without resistance, except the Malli, in the conquest of one of whose towns (probably Mooltan), where he was the first to scale the wall, Alexander was severely wounded. At the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus, Alexander founded a city, and left Philip as satrap, with a considerable body of Greeks. Here he built some fresh ships, and continued his voyage down the Indus, founded a city at Pattala, the apex of the delta of the Indus, and sailed into the Indian ocean, which he reached about the middle of 326. Nearchus was sent with the fleet to sail along the coast to the Persian gulf [NEARCHUS]; and Alexander marched with the rest of his forces through Gedrosia, in which country his army suffered greatly from want of water and provisions. He reached Susa at the beginning of 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest from their labours; and anxious to form his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned to about 80 of his generals Asiatic wives, and gave with them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius, and according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About 10,000 Macedonians followed the example of their king and generals, and married Asiatic women. Alexander also enrolled large numbers of Asiatics among his troops, and taught them the Macedonian tactics. He moreover directed his attention to the increase of commerce, and for this purpose determined to make the Euphrates and Tigris navigable, by removing the artificial obstructions which had been made in the river for the purpose of irrigation. The Macedonians, who were discontented with several of the new arrangements of the king, rose in a mutiny, which he quelled with some difficulty. Towards the close of the same year (325) he went to Ecbatana, where he lost his great favourite HEPHÆSTION. From Ecbatana he marched to Babylon, subduing in his way the Cossaei, a mountain tribe; and before he reached Babylon he was met by ambassadors from almost every part of the known world. Alexander entered Babylon in the spring of 324, about a year before his death, notwithstanding the warnings of the Chaldaeans, who predicted evil to him if he entered the city at that time. He intended to make Babylon the capital of his empire, as the best point of communication between his eastern and western dominions. His schemes were numerous and gigantic. His first object was the conquest of Arabia, which was to be followed, it was said, by the subjugation of Italy, Carthage, and the West. But his views were not confined merely to conquest. He ordered a fleet to be built on the Caspian, in order to explore that sea. He also intended to improve the distribution of waters in the Babylonian plain, and for that purpose sailed down the Euphrates to inspect the canal called Pallacopas. On his return to Babylon he was attacked by a fever, probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts around Babylon, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died after an illness of 11 days, in the month of May or June B.C. 323, at the age of 32, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months. He appointed no one as his successor, but just before his death he gave his ring to Perdiccas. Roxana was with child at the time of his death, and afterwards bore a son who is known by the name of Alexander Aegus.—Portraits of Alexander were made by Lysippus the sculptor, Apelles the painter, and Pyrgoteles the gem-engraver. His successors introduced his portrait upon their coins, as in the accompanying one of Lysimachus, where he is represented as Zeus Ammon.—The history of by Lysippus the sculptor, Apelles the painter, and Pyrgoteles the gem-engraver. His successors introduced his portrait upon their coins, as in the accompanying one of Lysimachus, where he is represented as Zeus Ammon.—The history of Alexander as Zeus Ammon, on a coin of Lysimachus.

Alexander forms an important epoch in the history of mankind. Alexander himself must rank as one of the most remarkable men of all ages and countries. It would be difficult to name any one whose career was more remarkable, especially when we remember that all his achievements were crowded into twelve years, and that he died before he reached middle life, younger in fact at the time of his death than Julius Caesar was when he began his career. As a general he has no proved superior in history. It is true that, as the Romans were glad to remark, his Asiatic opponents were, like other Asiatics, bad and untrustworthy troops such as have in other ages been defeated by forces small in number; but he had had to defeat Greek troops before he started for Asia, and in Asia itself Greeks were opposed to him; at Granicus 20,000 Greeks fought in the Persian army, and at Issus 30,000. When we consider his uniform success under these circumstances, we cannot set it down to the fact that his foes were a mob of unwarlike Asiatics. But a stronger evidence of his rank as a pre-eminent military commander is afforded by his strategical greatness and the absence of all failure in his provision for long and difficult marches arranged long beforehand, and for drawing reinforcements from Greece into the heart of Asia. His marches through such country as the defiles of the "Susian Gates" and the Hindoo Koosh, alone are evidence of marvellous skill. Of his power to organise and control the vast empire which he had conquered, it is more difficult to speak positively. The proof was to come in the following 20 or 30 years which he never saw. But his dealings with Greece, with Egypt, and so far with Persia give reason to believe that he had political capacity also, such as rarely has been surpassed. His character, which seems to have been naturally chivalrous and generous, however liable to fits of passion, had, it must be admitted, suffered by his Eastern conquests. His treatment of Batis, of Philotas and Parmenio, and of Callisthenes, and his affectation of Asiatic dress and manners, seem to show that, except as regards mere personal bravery, little of the early chivalry remained. His importance in history is due not merely to his traversing and opening up countries unknown to the Western nations. In spite of the break up of his plans and the general confusion which ensued from his premature death, it is not easy to overestimate the importance of the results to history from his policy of founding cities to mark his conquests, and planting in them Hellenising populations which spread so widely the Greek language and, in some cases, the Greek learning. And, as he initiated this policy, which his successors followed, it is not unfair to ascribe to him cities such as Antioch, hardly less than Alexandria.—4. Aegus, son of Alexander the Great and Roxana, was born shortly after the death of his father, in B.C. 323, and was acknowledged as the partner of Philip Arrhidaeus in the empire, under the guardianship of Perdicas, Antipater, and Polysperchon in succession. Alexander and his mother Roxana were imprisoned by Cassander, when he obtained possession of Macedonia in 316, and remained in prison till 311, when they were put to death by Cassander. (Diod. xix. 51, 52, 61, 105; Just. xv. 2.)

IV. Kings of Syria.

1. Surnamed Balas, a person of low origin, pretended to be the son of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, and reigned in Syria B.C. 150-146. He defeated and slew in battle Demetrius I. Soter, but was afterwards defeated and dethroned by Demetrius II. Nicator (Polyb. xxxiii. 14; Just. xxv.; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 2).—2. Surnamed Zebina or Zabinas (i.e. the slave), son of a merchant, was set up by Ptolemy Physcon as a pretender to the throne of Syria, shortly after the return of Demetrius II. Nicator from his captivity among the Parthians, B.C. 128. He defeated Demetrius in 125, but was afterwards defeated by Antiochus Grypus, by whom he was put to death, 122. (Just. xxxix. 1; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 9.)

V. Literary.

1. Of Aegae, a peripatetic philosopher at Rome in the first century after Christ, was tutor to the emperor Nero (Suet. Tib. 57).—2. The Aetolian, of Pleuron in Aetolia, a Greek poet, lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247), at Alexandria, where he was reckoned one of the seven tragic poets who constituted the tragic pleiad. He also wrote other poems besides tragedies. His fragments are collected by Capelmann, Alexandri Aetoli Fragmenta, Bonn, 1829.—3. Of Aphrodisias, in Caria, the most celebrated of the commentators on Aristotle, and hence called Exegetes, lived about A.D. 200. About half his voluminous works were edited and translated into Latin at the revival of literature; there are a few more extant in the original Greek, which have never been printed, and an Arabic version is preserved of several others. His most important treatise is entitled De Fato, an inquiry into the opinions of Aristotle on the subject of Fate and Free-will: edited by Orelli, Zurich, 1824; Usener, Berlin, 1859.—4. Cornelius, surnamed Polyhistor, a Greek writer, was made prisoner during the war of Sulla in Greece (B.C. 87-84), and sold as a slave to Cornelius Lentulus, who took him to Rome, made him the teacher of his children, and subsequently restored him to freedom. The surname of Polyhistor was given to him on account of his prodigious learning. He is said to have written a vast number of works, all of which have perished: the most important of them was one in 42 books, containing historical and geographical accounts of nearly all countries of the ancient world. Some fragments are collected by C. Müller, Frag. Hist. Graec. 1849.—5. Surnamed Lychnus, of Ephesus, a Greek rhetorician and poet, lived about B.C. 30. A few fragments of his geographical and astronomical poems are extant. (Strab. p. 642; Cic. Att. ii. 20, 22.) See C. Müller, Frag. Hist. Graec.—6. Of Myndus, in Caria, a Greek writer on zoology, of uncertain date.—7. Numenius, a Greek rhetorician, who lived in the second century of the Christian aera. Two works are ascribed to him, one De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, from which Aquila Romanus took his materials for his work on the same subject; and the other On Show-speeches; which was written by a later grammarian of the name of Alexander. Edited in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. viii.; Spengel, 1856.—8. The Paphlagonian, a celebrated impostor, who flourished about the beginning of the second century after Christ, of whom Lucian has given an amusing account, chiefly of the various contrivances by which he established and maintained the credit of an oracle, which he pretended to be the reappearance of Asclepius in the form of a serpent. The influence he attained over the populace seems incredible; indeed, the narrative of Lucian would appear to be a mere romance, were it not confirmed by some medals of Antoninus and M. Aurelius (Lucian, Alex.).—9. Surnamed Philolaton, a Greek rhetorician of Seleucia in Cilicia, was appointed Greek secretary to M. Antoninus, about A.D. 175. At Athens he conquered the celebrated rhetorician Herodes Atticus, in a rhetorical contest. All persons, however, did not admit his abilities; for a Corinthian said that he had found in Alexander 'the clay [Πηλός], but not Plato.' This saying gave rise to the surname of Peloplatau (Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 5).—10. Philalēthes, an ancient Greek physician, lived probably towards the end of the first century B.C., and succeeded Zeuxis as head of a celebrated Herophilean school of medicine, established in Phrygia between Laodicea and Carura (Strab. p. 580; Galeu. de Diff. Puls. iv. 4, vol. viii. p. 727, 746).—11. Of Tralles in Lydia, one of the most eminent of the ancient physicians, lived in the 6th century after Christ (Agathias, Hist. v. p. 149), and is the author of two extant Greek works:—1. Libri Duodecim de Re Medica; 2. De Lumbricis (Puschmann, Vienna, 1878).

which was joined to the city by an artificial dyke, called Heptastadium, which formed, with the island, the two harbours of the city, that on the NE. of the dyke being named the Great Harbour (now the New Port), that on the SW. Eunostus (εὐνοστος, the Old Port). These harbours communicated with each other by two channels cut through the Heptastadium, one at each end of it; and there was a canal from the Eunostus to the Lake Mareotis. The city was built on a regular plan; and was intersected by two principal streets, above 100 feet wide, the one extending 30 stadia from E. to W., the other across this, from the sea towards the lake, to the length of 10 stadia. The city was divided into three regions: the Brucheium, which was the Royal, or Greek, region at the eastern end, the Rhacotis or Egyptian quarter on the west, beyond which, and outside of the city, was the Necropolis or cemetery. A great lighthouse was built on the I. of Pharos in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 283). Under the care of the Ptolemies, as the capital of a great kingdom and of the most fertile country on the earth, and commanding by its position all the commerce of Europe with the East, Alexandria soon became the most wealthy and splendid city of the known world. Greeks, Jews, and other foreigners flocked to it; and its population probably amounted to three quarters of a Plan of Alexandria.

Alexandria, oftener -ia, rarely -ēa (Ἀλεξάνδρεια: Ἀλεξανδρεὺς, Alexandrinus), the name of several cities founded by, or in memory of Alexander the Great.—1. (Alexandria, Arab. Iskandaria), the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, ordered by Alexander (who himself traced the ground plan) to be founded in B.C. 332. (Strab. p. 791; Arrian, iii. 1; Curt. iv. 8; Amm. Marc. xxii. 40; Plin. v. 10; Polyb. xxxix. 14; Caes. B.C. iii. 112.) It was built on the narrow neck of land between the Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, opposite to the I. of Pharos, million (in Diod. Sic. xvii. 52 the free citizens alone are reckoned at 300,000, B.C. 58). Under the empire the food of the populations of Rome and Constantinople depended largely on the despatch of the corn-ships from Alexandria. Its fame was greatly increased through the foundation, by the first two Ptolemies, of the Museum, an establishment in which men devoted to literature were maintained at the public cost, and of the Library, which contained 90,000 distinct works, and 400,000 volumes, and the increase of which made it necessary to establish another library in the Serapeium (Temple of Serapis), which reached to 42,800 volumes, but which was destroyed by the bishop Theophilus, at the time of the general overthrow of the heathen temples under Theodosius (A.D. 389). The Great Library suffered severely by fire when Julius Caesar was besieged in Alexandria, and was finally destroyed by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, in A.D. 651. These institutions made Alexandria the chief centre of literary activity. When Egypt became a Roman province [ÆGYP'TUS], Alexandria was made the residence of the Praefectus Aegypti. Its government was peculiar and retained specially in the hands of the emperor, perhaps owing to the importance of the sending or delaying the corn supply. The emperor appointed the chief official, called Juridicus Alexandriae, who acted as procurator, exercising, without any municipal senate, jurisdiction over the city as apart from the Egyptian country districts. The Jewish population had a council and an ἐθνάρχης of their own, competent to deal with purely Jewish disputes; but in causes affecting other nationalities the sole authority was the juridicus. Other subordinate officers belonging to the city were the ἐξηγητής, who managed the markets and commerce, the town-clerk called ὑπομηματογράφος, and the νικετηρὸς στρατηγός, or praefectus vigilum for the police. In matters beyond municipal concern the Praefectus Aegypti was supreme. It retained its commercial and literary importance, and became also a chief seat of Christianity and theological learning. Among the ruins of the ancient site are the remains of the cisterns by which the whole city was supplied with water, house by house; the two obelisks (vulg. Cleopatra's Needles), which adorned the gateway of the royal palace, and, outside the walls, to the S., the column of Diocletian (vulg. Pompey's Pillar). The modern city stands on the dyke uniting the island of Pharos to the mainland.—2. A. Troas, also Troas simply (Ἄ. ἡ Τρωάς: Eskistamboul, i.e. the Old City), on the sea-coast SW. of Troy, was enlarged by Antigonus, hence called Antigonia, but afterwards it resumed its first name. It flourished greatly, both under the Greeks and the Romans; it was made a colonia (Plin. v. § 124; Strab. p. 593). It is even said that both Julius Caesar and Constantine thought of establishing the seat of empire in it (cf. Suet. Caes. 79; Hor. Od. iii. 3. 37; Zosim. ii. 30).—3. A. ad Issum (Ἄ. κατὰ Ἴσσον: Iskenderoon, Scanderoun, Alexandrette), a seaport at the entrance of Syria, a little S. of Issus, on the coast road between that place and Rhossus. It possibly occupied the site of Myriandus (Xen. An. i. 4), and received its name in Alexander's honour.—4. In Susiana, aft. Antiochia, aft. Charax Spasini (Χάραξ Πασίνου or Σπασ.), at the mouth of the Tigris, built by Alexander; destroyed by a flood; restored by Antiochus Epiphanes: birthplace of Dionysius Periegetes and Isidorus Characenus.—5. A. Ariae (Ἄ. ἡ ἐν Ἀρίοις: Herat), founded by Alexander on the river Arius, in the Persian province of Aria, a very flourishing city, on the great caravan road to India.—6. A. Arachosiae or Alexandropolis (Kandahar?), on the river Arachotus, was probably not founded till after the time of Alexander.—7. A. Bactriana (Ἄ. κατὰ Βάκτρα: prob. Khooloom, Ru.), E. of Bactra (Balkh).—8. A. ad Caucasum, or apud Paropamisidas (Ἄ. ἐν Παροπαμισδαίς), at the foot of M. Paropamisus (Hindoo Kooshi), probably near Cabul.—9. A.

Ultima or Alexandrescata (Ἄ. ἡ ἐσχάτη: Kokand?), in Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, a little E. of Cyropolis, marked the furthest point reached by Alexander in his Scythian expedition (Arrian, An. iv. 1, 3; Curt. vii. 6).

Alexānor (perhaps an old surname of Asclepius), son of Machaon and grandson of Asclepius, to whom he is said to have built the temple of Titane, near Sicyon (Paus. ii. 11, 6).

Alexiāres, brother of Anicetus, son of Heracles and Hehe. Both these sons were probably imagined out of surnames of Heracles similar in meaning to ἀλεξίκακος.

Alexinus (Ἄλεξίνος), of Elis, a philosopher of the Dialectic or Megarian school, and a disciple of Eubulides, lived about the beginning of the 3rd century B.C. From Cic. Acad. ii. 24, 75, he seems to have dealt in sophistical puzzles. He died from being wounded by a reed while swimming in the Alpheus (Diog. Laërt. ii. 109).

Alexis (Ἄλεξις), a comic poet, born at Thurii in Italy, and an Athenian citizen. He was the uncle and instructor of Menander, was born about B.C. 394, and lived to the age of 106. He was the chief poet of the Middle Comedy, and wrote 245 plays, of which we have fragments from 140, but not of sufficient length to criticise. He lived on into the period of the New Comedy; but the fragments of his works show the political allusions, and also mythological subjects, which do not belong to the New Comedy (Poet. Comic. Frag. ed. Meineke, 1847).

Alfēnus Varus. [VARUS.]

Algīdus Mons, a range of mountains in Latium, extending S. from Praeneste to M. Albanus, cold, but covered with wood, and containing good pasturage. The two kinds of oak, deciduous and evergreen (quercus et ilices, Hor. Od. iii. 23, 10, iv. 4, 50), may still be seen on its slopes. It was an ancient seat of the worship of Diana. From it the Aequi usually made their incursions into the Roman territory. A small town, Algīdus, on its slopes is mentioned in Strabo, p. 237.

Aliēnus Caecina. [CAECINA.]

Alimentus, L. Cincius, a celebrated Roman annualist, was praetor in Sicily, B.C. 209, and wrote his Annales, which contained an account of Rome to the second Punic war. He was for some time a prisoner in Hannibal's army. Hence when Livy appeals to his writings for matters connected with the second Punic war (as regards the route of Hannibal, Liv. xxi. 38), the statements are entitled to more respect than they sometimes receive.

Alinda (τὰ Ἄλινδα: Ἄλινδεύς), a fortress and small town, SE. of Stratouice, where Ada, Queen of Caria, fixed her residence, when she was driven out of Halicarnassus (B.C. 340).

Aliphēra (Ἀλίφειρα, Ἀλίφρηρα, Ἀλιφειραῖος, Ἀλιφρηεύς: nr. Nerovitza, Ru.), a fortified town in Arcadia, situated on a mountain on the borders of Elis, S. of the Alphēns, said to have been founded by the hero Alipherus, son of Lycæon (Paus. viii. 26).

Aliphērus. [ALIPHERA.]

Aliso (Elson), a strong fortress built by Drusus B.C. 11, at the confluence of the Luppia (Lippe) and the Eliso (Almo) (Dio Cass. liv. 33; Tac. Ann. ii. 7).

Alsentia (Alsit), a river flowing into the Mosella (Mosel).

Allectus, the chief officer of Carausius in Britain, whom he murdered in A.D. 293. He then assumed the imperial title himself, but was defeated and slain in 296 by the general of Constantius.

Allectus, Roman Emperor, A.D. 293-296.
Obv., head of Emperor; rev., Pax (struck in London).

Allia, or more correctly Alia, a small river, which rises in the neighbourhood of Crnstumerium, and flows into the Tiber, crossing the Via Salaria about 11 miles from Rome. It is memorable for the defeat of the Romans by the Gauls on its banks, July 16th, B.C. 390; which day, dies Alliensis, was hence marked as an unlucky day in the Roman calendar. (Liv. vi. 1, 28; Tac. Hist. ii. 91; Verg. Aen. vii. 717.) There is some dispute about its identification, but it seems probable that it is the stream now known as Scolo del Casale, which crosses the road at Fonte di Papa. It is a very small brook, but runs in a deep hollow.

A. Allienus. 1. A friend of Cicero, was the legate of Q. Cicero in Asia, B.C. 60, praetor in 49, and governor of Sicily on behalf of Caesar in 48 and 47 (Cic. Q. F. i. 1; Att. x. 15; Fam. xiii. 78).—2. A legate of Dolabella, by whom he was sent into Egypt in 43 (Cic. Phil. xi. 12).

Allifae, or more correctly Alifae (Alifanns: Allife), a town of Samnium, on the Volturnus, in a fertile country. It was celebrated for the manufacture of its large drinking-cups (Alifana sc. pocula, Hor. Sat. ii. 8, 39).

Allobroges (Nom. Sing. Allöbrox: ἄλλοβρογες, ἄλλοβρυγες, ἄλλοβριγες), a powerful people of Gaul dwelling between the Rhodanus (Rhone) and the Isara (Isère). In the time of Julius Caesar their territory extended as far as that corner of L. Lemannus where Geneva stands. At that point they were bounded on the east by the Nantuates, south of whom came the Centrones, and next, forming the southern border of the Allobroges (i.e. immediately across the Isère), the Graioceli and the Vocontii. To the west they were bounded by the Rhone, as far as Lyons, and the same river formed their northern boundary up to the Lake of Geneva. Hence their territory at that time comprised the NW. corner of Savoy and part of the department of Isère, with the southern corner of Drôme. Their chief city was Vienna (Vienne) on the Rhone (Caes. B. G. i. 6 and 10; Strab. p. 185). But there is good reason to suppose that their territory was not the same two centuries earlier (as modern writers seem generally to assume). There can be no doubt that the country which both Polybius and Livy call 'the Island,' was precisely the country of the Allobroges in Caesar's time: but in Polybius, iii. 49, 50, the ἄλλοβριγες are obviously not the people of the 'Island,' but dwell in the country through which Hannibal was next to pass; they furnished guides at first and afterwards attacked him on his march. It is probable that they then dwelt south of the Isère, perhaps near Gap, and at a late time (before B.C. 121) moved northwards and occupied the 'Island.' Livy (xxi. 31) though he says correctly, speaking of the Island, 'incolunt prope Allobroges,' yet seems to confuse them with the then dwellers in the Island as described by Polybius. If the Celtic etymology of their name (ail, 'other,' and brog, 'dwelling') is correct, they would seem to have been at one time a roving tribe. They were conquered, in B.C. 121, by Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus, and made subjects of Rome, but they bore the yoke unwillingly, and were always disposed to rebellion. In B.C. 63 their ambassadors first intrigued with Catiline, and then divulged the conspiracy (Sall. Cat. 41; Cic. Cat. iii. 5).

Almo (Almone), a small river, rises near Bovillae, and flows into the Tiber S. of Rome, half a mile from the walls on the Ostian road, in which the statues of Cybele were washed annually. (Dict. Ant. s. v. Megalesia.)

Almōpes (Ἀλμῶπες), a people in Macedonia, inhabiting the district Almopia between Eordaea and Pelagonia.

Alōeus (Ἀλωεύς) 1. Son of Helior, and brother of Aretes. He was King of Asopia (Paus. ii. 41).—2. Son of Poseidon and Canace, married Iphimedia, the daughter of Triops. His wife was beloved by Poseidon, by whom she had two sons, Otus and Ephialtes, who are usually called the Alōidae, from their reputed father Alōeus. In Hom. Il. v. 385 they are genuine sons of Alōeus—in Od. xi. 305; Ap. Rh. i. 481; Ov. Met. vi. 116, of Poseidon. They were renowned for their extraordinary strength and daring spirit. When they were 9 years old, each of their bodies measured 9 cubits in breadth and 27 in height. At this early age, they threatened the Olympian gods with war and attempted to pile Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. They would have accomplished their object, says Homer, had they been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood; but Apollo destroyed them before their beards began to appear (Od. xi. 305 seq.). They also put the god Ares in chains, and kept him imprisoned for 13 months. Ephialtes is said to have sought the love of Hera and Otus of Artemis (or both of Artemis): therefore Artemis passed between them in the form of a hind, at which they hurled spears and slew one another (Pind. Pyth. iv. 88; Apollod. i. 482). In Hades they were bound to a pillar by serpents, and plagned by the cries of an owl (ὄπιος, however, means 'shriek-owl') (Hyg. Fab. 28; cf. Verg. Aen. vi. 582). The Thracian legend is totally different. They are heroes who founded Asara on Helicon, and instituted the worship of the Muses. Their graves were honoured at Anthedon (Paus. ix. 22; Diod. v. 51). They were worshipped also in Naxos (C. I. G. ii. 2420). The conclusion should be that they were originally for the Thracians deities representing the increase and produce of the earth, and presiding over agricultural work: under this view the names are connected with ἀλωή, and with ὠθέω, ἐφάλλομαι, as describing the work of the wine-press. These earth-deities were then imagined by the Greeks as in conflict with the gods of Olympus.

Alōidae. [ALOEUS.]

Alonta (Ἀλόντα: Terek), a river of Sarmatia Asiatica, flowing into the Caspian (Ptol. v. 9, 12).

Alōpe (Ἀλόπη), daughter of Cercyon, became by Poseidon the mother of Hippocoon. She was put to death by her father, but her body was changed by Poseidon into a well, which bore the same name (Hyg. Fab. 187; Paus. i. 5; Aristoph. Av. 559).

Alōpe (Ἀλόπη: Ἀλοπεύς, Ἀλοπίτης). 1. A town in the Opuntian Locris, opposite Euboea (Thuc. ii. 26; Strab. p. 426).—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly (Il. ii. 682; Strab. p. 427, 432).

Alōpēce (Ἄλωπεκὴ and Ἄλωπεκαί: Ἄλωπεκέος), a demus of Attica, of the tribe Antiochis, 11 stadia E. of Athens, on the hill Anchesmus.

Alopeconnesus (Ἀλωπεκόννησος: Ἄλωπεκουνήσιοι: Alexi?), a town in the Thracian Cher-sonesus, founded by the Aeolians (Dem. de Cor. p. 256, § 92; Liv. xxxi. 16).

Alorus, a town of Macedonia, west of Methone, in the Thermaic Gulf, birthplace of Ptolemaeus Alorites (Strab. p. 330).

Alpēnus (Ἄλπηρός, Ἄλπηροί), a town of the Epicnemidii Locri at the entrance of the pass of Thermopylae (Hdt. vii. 176, 216).

Alpes (αἱ Ἄλπεις, ἡ Ἄλπις, τὰ Ἄλπεινὰ ὄρη, τὰ Ἄλπεια ὄρη; probably from the Celtic Alb or Alp, 'a height'), the mountains forming the boundary of northern Italy, are a part of the great mountain-chain which extends from the Gulf of Genoa to the Adriatic near Trieste, but on the west the line of demarcation between the Alps and the Apennines, running southwards, is not very distinct, while on the east the spurs from the Cornice Alps, separating the valleys of the Save and Drave from the Adriatic, pass into the Illyrian mountains, and so eastward to the Balkans. Of the Alps proper the Greeks had very little knowledge, and included them under the general name of the Rhipaeen mountains. They appear in Lycophron (Alex.
1361) as Σάλια. The Romans first obtained some knowledge of them by their conquest of Cisalpine Gaul and by Hannibal's passage across them: this knowledge was gradually extended by their various wars with the inhabitants of the mountains, who were not finally subdued till the reign of Augustus. In the time of the emperors the different parts of the Alps were distinguished by the following names, most of which are still retained. We enumerate them in order from W. to E. 1. ALPES MARITIMAE, the Maritime or Ligurian Alps, from Genoa (Genoa), where the Apennines begin, run W. as far as the river Varns (Var) and
M. Cema (la Caillole), and then N. to M. Vesulus (Monte Viso). (Plin. H. N. iii. § 117; Strab.
p. 201; Mel. ii. 4.)—2. ALPES COTTIAE or COT- TIANAE, the Cottian Alps (so called from a king Cottius in the time of Augustus), from Monte Viso to Mont Cenis, contained M. Matriona, afterwards called M. Janus or Janua (Mont Genèvre), across which Cottius constructed a road, which became the chief means of communication between Italy and Gaul.—3. ALPES GRAIAE, also Saltus Graivus (the Romans fancifully connected the name with the legendary passage of Hercules, but it is probably Celtic, and has nothing to do with Greece) and Mons Graivus (Tac. Hist. iv. 68), the Graian Alps, from Mont Cenis to the Little St. Bernard inclusive, contained the Jugum Cremonis (Liv.
xxi. 38) (le Cramont) and the Centronicae Alps, apparently the little St. Bernard and the surrounding mountains.—4. ALPES PENNINAE, the Pennine Alps, from the Great St. Bernard to the Simplon inclusive, the highest portion of the chain, including Mont Blanc, and Monte Rosa. The Great St. Bernard was called M.
Penninus, and on its summit the inhabitants worshipped a deity, whom the Romans called Jupiter Penninus. The name is probably derived from the Celtic pen, 'a height.' Livy (xxi. 38) expressly rejects the absurd derivation from Poeni, which was based on the idea that Hannibal had gone round to Martigny in the upper Rhone valley.—5. ALPES LEPONTIORUM or LEPONTIAE, the Lepontian or Helvetian Alps, occupied by the Celtic Lepontii, from the Simplon to the St. Gothard.—6. ALPES RHAETI-

CAE, the Rhaetian Alps, from the St.
Gothard to the Ortler and the pass of the Stelvio. [Cf. ADULA MONS.]—7. ALPES TRIDEN- TINAE, the mountains of southern Tyrol, in which the Athēsis (Adige) rises, with the pass of the Brenner.—8. ALPES NORICAE, whence the Drave rises (Plin. iii. § 139), the Noric Alps, NE. of the Tridentine Alps, comprising the mountains in the neighbourhood of Salzburg, with mines worked by the Romans for iron.—9. ALPES CARNICAE, the Carnic Alps, E. of the Tridentine, and S. of the Noric, to Mount Terglu. From these mountains flows the Save (Plin. ib.).—10. ALPES JULIAE, the Julian Alps, from Mount Terglu to the commencement of the Illyrian or Dalmatian mountains (Tac. Hist. iii. 8), which are known by the name of the Alpes Dalmaticae, further north by the name of the Alpes Pannonicae. The Alpes Juliae were so called because Julius Caesar or Augustus constructed roads across them: they are also called Alpes Venetae.
(Ann. Marc. xxxi. 16). We have some mention of the industries and produce of the Alps, which then, as now, consisted of pine wood, resin, honey, wax and cheese, with but little corn (Strab. p. 206); and of alpine animals, the chamois (rupicapra), the ibex, the marmot, white hares and ptarmigan (Plin. viii. § 214,
x. § 186, Varr. R.R. iii. 12).

Principal Passes of the Alps.

It will be useful to enumerate the passes used by the Romans, and, no doubt, communicated to them by the natives of the various districts as the easiest routes; for we can hardly doubt that there were other mountain paths traversed, though less frequently, by the natives themselves. The Roman roads, or bridle tracks, over the Alps were as follows, reckoning from the western sea coast:—1. Per Alpes Mari- timas, corresponding to the Cornice Road, from the Var to Genoa, which was opened in the time of Augustus as a regular road, the Ligurians being entirely subdued. Turbia was regarded as the summit of the pass: thence it passed rather north of Nice.—2. It is probable that the modern Col de l'Argentière, from Cuneo by the valley of the Stura to Barcelo-nette, by the valley of the Ubaye and so to Gap, was used by the Romans (see Freshfield, Alp.
Journ. xi. 282; Desjardins, Géogr. de la Gaule
Rom. i. 96). If so, this pass led from Pollentia to Vapincum, and was, no doubt, like the following, described as per Alpes Cottias.—3. Per Alpes Cottias, i.e. the pass of Mont Genèvre from Augusta Taurinorum (Turin) to Brigantio (Briançon). It thence at first followed the Durance to Chorges in the Caturiges: whence those who were bound for the Southern Pro- vincia (Nîmes, Orange, &c.) continued by the Durance; those who went northwards to Valence, Vienne, &c., crossed the Col Bayard by Gap, down the valley of the Drac, into the valley of the Isère. This in all probability was the route of Hannibal (see Freshfield, l.c., who, however, makes Hannibal reach Italy by the Col de l'Argentière mentioned above). Pompey probably shortened the route by taking the Col de Lauteret from Briançon after he had crossed the Genèvre. This Col is higher than the Genèvre itself but a much more direct route to Grenoble, and after the time of Pompey it became a recognised Roman road.—4. North of the Genèvre is the pass of Mont Cenis, which also belongs to the Alpes Cottiae. There is little doubt that over this, or rather over the Petit Mont Cenis, from Susa (Segusio) was a route used by the Romans: here probably Caesar passed to Gallia Ulterior (B.G. i. 10). The pass descends by the valley of the Arc, through the territory of the Centrones into the valley of the Isère.—5. Per Alpes Graias: this is the pass of the Little St. Bernard, from the plain of the Po at Ivrea, through the defiles of the valley of Aosta, then from Aosta (Augusta Praetoria), S. Didier (Arbrigitum) over the pass to B. St. Maurice (Kergintrum), and by the valley of the Isère, directly to Vienna or northwards to Geneva. It will be found impossible to make the route by the valley of Aosta agree with Polybius's account of Hannibal's route. 6. Per Alpes Penninas: the Great St. Bernard, from Martigny (Ocotodurus) to Aosta (Tac. Hist. i. 61, iv. 68; cf. Liv. xxi. 38). 7. Per Alpes Rhaeticas, from Brigantia ou L. Constance to Mediolanum (Milan). This passage had two alternative routes: a, most direct, by Curia (Coire) over the Julier pass as far as Bivium (Bivio), thence over the Septimer to Casaccia and Clavenna (Chiavenna); b, branching off at Bivio by the remainder of the Julier pass to Silvaplana, and then by the Maloja to Chiavenna, rejoining the Septimer route at Casaccia. Both routes pass by Tinnetto (Tinzen) on the Swiss side. Either will suit the description in Claud. Bell. Get. 320–360.—8. Also per Alp. Rhaet., from Brigantia to Tridentum, striking off from the preceding at Clunia (Feldkirch), and passing by the upper Inn and Meran to Bauziauum (Botzen).—9. A divergence from the preceding by the Puster Thal and Lienz, to reach Aquileia. [Possibly also a direct road from Sebatum (Brunnecken) to Belluno.]—10. Per Alpes Tridentinas, from Verona to Tridentum, thence up the valley of the Athesis, and over the Brenner, and so to Augusta Viudelicorum (Augsburg).—11. Per Alpes Carnicas, from Aquileia through Julium Carnicum (Zuglio), by the pass of Sta Croce and the valley of the Gail into the valley of the Drave, near Aguontum (Lienz).—12. Slightly east of the preceding (from which it diverged near Gemona), more directly to Villa ad Aquas (Villach), by the low pass of Tarvis (the lowest in the chain of the Alps).—13. Per Alpes Julias, through the valley of the Sontius (Isonzo), by the Predil pass to Villa ad Aquas.—14. Also per Alp. Julias, from Aquileia by the valley of the Wippach over the pass of Loitsch to Emoua (Laibach), and the valley of the Save. The last five were intended as lines of communication from Aquileia to Rhaetia, Noricum, and Pannonia.

Of these passes Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7 were known to Polybius (cited by Strabo, p. 209), and Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5 are mentioned by Varro (Serv. ad Aen. x. 13), who reckons five passes, probably because he considers the Col de Lauteret passed by Pompey as a separate one. He brings Hasdrubal over the Cenis. The communication with the Central Alps was by No. 6 to the Rhone valley, and thence by Viviscus (Vevey) and Minnodunum (Moudon) to Aventicum; or by No. 7 to Brigantia, thence by the western road through Vindonissa (Windisch) to Salodurum (Solothurn) and Aventicum.

Alphēnus Varus. [VARUS.]

Alphēsibōea (Ἀλφεσιβοία). 1. Mother of Adonis. [ADONIS.]—2. Daughter of Phegeus, who married Alcmæon. [ALCMAEON.]—3. Daughter of Bias and wife of Pelias (Theoc. iii. 45).

Alphēus Mytilēneus (Ἀλφειὸς Μυτιληναῖος), the author of about 12 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was probably a contemporary of the emperor Augustus (Anth. Pal.).

Alphēus (Ἀλφειός; Dor. ἄλφεός; Alfeo, Rofeo, Rizzo, Rufca), the chief river of Peloponnesus, rises at Phylaco in Arcadia, shortly afterwards sinks under ground, appears again near Asea, and then mingles its waters with those of the Eurōtas. After flowing 20 stadia, the two rivers disappear under ground: the Alpheus again rises at Pegae in Arcadia, and increased by many affluents, among them the Ladon and the Erymanthus, flows NW. through Arcadia and Elis, not far from Olympia, and falls into the Ionian sea. (Paus. viii. 54; Strab. pp. 275, 343). The subterranean descent of the river, which is confirmed by modern travellers, gave rise to the stories about the river-god Alphēus and Artemis Alpheiaea, or the nymph Arethusa: a. that the river-god Alpheus loved Artemis and she escaped him by the strange disguise of smearing her face and the faces of her nymphs with mud (Paus. vi. 227: b. that Artemis fled from him to Ortygia (Pind. Nem. i. and Schol.): c. the later poeticised legends, where instead of Artemis we have a nymph Arethusa pursued by Alpheus, both changed to streams passing under the sea and at last united in Ortygia (Paus. v. 7, 2; Ov. Met. v. 752, with the intervention of Artemis; Verg. Aen. iii. 694; Stat. Silv. i. 2, 203; Theb. i. 271, iv. 239). The actual sequence appears to be, that the Artemis of Elis and Arcadia was a deity of fountains and streams who was σύμβωμος, or united in worship, with Alpheus, and was called Artemis Alpheiaea or ποταμία. This worship was transferred to Ortygia by some of the family of the Iamidæ at Olympia who joined in the Corinthian settlement and established a temple of Artemis ποταμία and also named a spring in Ortygia after the spring Arethusa in Elis. It is easy to understand how later orthodoxy found it necessary to substitute Arethusa for Artemis in the legend of the passage under the sea. (Pind. Ol. v., Nem. i.; Diod. v. 8; Strab. p. 270.) Strabo mentions the story of the sancer thrown into the fountain at Olympia and coming up in Ortygia with the sacrificial stains upon it: for, when the nymph, pursued by Alpheus, was changed by Artemis into the fountain of Arethusa in the island of Ortygia at Syracuse, the god continued to pursue her under the sea, and attempted to mingle his stream with the fountain at Ortygia.

Alphūs Avītus. [AVITUS.]

Alpinus. [See under BIBACULUS.]

Alsa, a small river of Venetia, which flows into the Adriatic a little west of Aquileia. The younger Constantine fell here, A. D. 340.

Alsium (Alsiensis: Palo), one of the most ancient Etruscan towns on the coast near Caere, and a Roman colony after the 1st Punic war. In its neighbourhood Pompey had a country-seat (villa Alsiensis).

Althæa (Ἀλθαία), daughter of the Aetolian king Thestius and Eurythemis, married Oeneus, king of Calydon, by whom she became the mother of several children. [See MELEAGER.]

Althæa, the chief town of the Olcades in the country of the Oretani in Hispania Tarracoenensis.

Althēmēnes (Ἀλθημένης or Ἀλθαιμένης), son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle, that Catreus would lose his life by one of his children, Althemenes quitted Crete and went to Rhodes. There he unwittingly killed his father, who had come in search of his son. (Diod. v. 59; Apollod. iii. 2.)

Altinum (Altinas: Altino), a municipium in the land of the Veneti in the N. of Italy, at the mouth of the river Silis and on the road from Patavium to Aquileia, was a wealthy manufacturing town, and the chief emporium for all the goods which were sent from southern Italy to the countries of the north. Goods could be brought from Ravenna to Altinum through the Lagoons and the numerous canals of the Po, safe from storms and pirates. There were many beautiful villas around the town. (Mart. iv. 25; Strab. p. 214; Tac. Hist. iii. 6.)

Altis (Ἄλτις), the sacred grove of Zeus at OLYMPIA.

Aluntium or Haluntium (Ἀλουντίου), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, on a steep hill, celebrated for its wine. It lay between Tyndaris and Calacta: the town of S. Marco probably occupies its site. (Dionys. i. 51; Cic. Verr. iv. 23. 1.)

Alus or Halus (Ἄλος, ἄλος: Ἀλεύς: nr. Κεφαλοσι, Ru.), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the extremity of M. Othrys, built by Athamas. (Il. ii. 682; Hdt. vii. 173; Strab. p. 432.)

Alÿattes (Ἀλυάττης), king of Lydia, B.C. 617-560, succeeded his father Sadyattes, and was himself succeeded by his son Croesus. He carried on war with Miletus from 617 to 612, and with Cyaxares, king of Media, from 590 to 585; an eclipse of the sun, which happened in 585 during a battle between Alyattes and Cyaxares, led to a peace between them. Alyattes drove the Cimmerians out of Asia and took Smyrna. The tomb of Alyattes, N. of Sardis, near the lake Gygaea, which consisted of a large mound of earth, with a circumference of nearly a mile, raised upon a foundation of great stones, still exists. (Hdt. i. 25, 73, 93; Strab. p. 627.)

Alÿba (Ἀλύβη), a town on the S. coast of the Euxine. (Il. ii. 857.)

Alypius (Ἀλύπιος), of Alexandria, probably lived in the 4th century of the Christian aera, and is the author of a Greek musical treatise entitled 'Introduction to Music' (εἰσαγωγή μουσική), printed by Meibomius in Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amstel. 1652; Script. Metricæ, ed. Westphal, 1866.

Alyzia or Alyzæa (Ἀλυζία, Ἀλύζεια: Ἀλυζαῖος; Ru. in the valley of Kandili), a town in Acarnania near the sea opposite Leucas, with a harbour and a temple both sacred to Heracles. The temple contained one of the works of Lysippus representing the labours of Heracles, which the Romans carried off. (Thuc. vii. 31; Xen. Hell. v. 4; Strab. p. 450; Cic. Fam. xvi. 2; Plin. iv. 2.)

Amadocus (Ἀμάδοκος) or Mēdocus (Μήδοκος). 1. King of the Odrysæ in Thrace, when Xenophon visited the country in B.C. 400. He and Sathies, who were the most powerful Thracian kings, were frequently at variance, but were reconciled to each other by Thrasymbulus, the Athenian commander, in 390, and induced by him to become the allies of Athens (Diod. xiii. 105; Xen. An. vii. 2, Hell. iv. 8).—2. A ruler in Thrace, who, in conjunction with Berisades and Cersobleptes, succeeded Cotys in 358. (Dem. in Arist. p. 623.)

Amafinius, one of the three writers on Epicurean philosophy who preceded Cicero (the other two being Rabirius and Catius Insuber). They wrote simply and in a popular manner, especially on the physical theories of Epicurus, merely drawing from the Greek sources without any original reasoning. (Cic. Acad. i. 2, 5; Tusc. i. 3, 6, ii. 3, 7, iv. 3, 6.)

Amagetobria. [MAGETOBRIA.]

Amalthæa (Ἀμάλθεια). 1. The nurse of the infant Zeus in Crete. According to some traditions Amalthæa is the goat who suckled Zeus, and who was rewarded by being placed among the stars. [ÆGA.] According to others, Amalthæa was a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, Helios, Haemonius, or of the Cretan king Melisseus, who fed Zeus with the milk of a goat. When this goat broke off one of her horns, Amalthæa filled it with fresh herbs and gave it to Zeus, who placed it among the stars. According to other accounts Zeus himself broke off one of the horns of the goat Amalthæa, and gave it to the daughters of Melisseus, and endowed it with the wonderful power of becoming filled with whatever the possessor might wish. This story is explanatory of the celebrated horn of Amalthæa, commonly called the horn of plenty or cornucopia, which was used in later times as the symbol of plenty in general. (Athen. p. 503; Strab. p. 458; Ov. Fast. v. 115, Met. ix. 87.) [For the story of Amalthæa giving the horn of plenty to Achelous, and his exchange, see ACHELOUS.] In Diod. iii. 68, there is a story that Amalthæa was beloved by the Libyan Ammon, who gave her a horn-shaped portion of land of great fertility.—2. One of the Sibyls, identified with the Cumæan Sibyl, who sold to king Tarquinius the celebrated Sibylline books (Lactant. Inst. i. 6, 10), but distinguished from her in Tibull. ii. 5, 67.

Amalthæum or Amalthæa, a villa of Atticus on the river Thyamis in Æpirus, was perhaps a shrine of the nymph Amalthæa, which Atticus adorned with statues and bas-reliefs, and converted into a beautiful summer retreat. Cicero, in imitation, constructed a similar retreat on his estate at Arpinum. (Cic. de Legg. ii. 3, 7; Att. i. 13.)

Amantia (Ἀμαντία: Amantinus, Amantiānus, or Amantes, pl.: Nivitsa), a Greek town and district in Illyricum; the town, said to have been founded by the Abantes of Euboea, lay at some distance from the coast, E. of Oricum. (Caes. B.C. iii. 12, 40; Cic. Phil. xi. 11.)

Amānus (δ' Ἀμανός, τὸ Ἀμανόν: Ἀμανίτης, Amaniensis: Almadagh), a branch of Mt. Taurus, which runs from the head of the Gulf of Issus NE. to the principal chain, dividing Syria from Cilicia and Cappadocia (Strab. pp. 521, 535). There were two passes in it: the one, called the Syrian Gates (αἱ Συριαὶ πύλαι, Syriae Portae: Bylan) near the sea; the other, called the Amanian Gates (Ἀμανίδες or Ἀμανικαὶ πύλαι: Amanicæ Pylae, Portae Amani Montis: Demir Kapu, i.e. the Iron Gate), further to the N. The former pass was on the road from Cilicia to Antioch, the latter on that to the district Commageue; but, on account of its great difficulty, the latter pass was rarely used, until the Romans made a road through it. (Arrian. An. ii. 7; Polyb. xii. 17, 19; Strab. p. 676; Cic. Fam. xv. 4.)

Amardi or Mardi (Ἀμαρδοί, Μάρδοι), a powerful, warlike, and predatory tribe who dwelt on the S. shore of the Caspian Sea. (Strab. p. 514.)

Amardus or Mardus (Ἀμαρδος, Μάρδος: Kizil Ozien), a river flowing through the country of the Mardi into the Caspian Sea.

Amarynceus (Ἀμαρυγκεύς), a chief of the Eleus (Il. xxiii. 630), is said by some writers to have fought against Troy; but Homer only mentions his son Dioces (Amaryncides) as taking part in the Trojan war (Il. ii. 622, iv. 517).

Amarynthus (Ἀμάρυνθος: Ἀμαρύνθιος), a town in Euboea 7 stadia from Eretria, to which it belonged, with a celebrated temple of Artemis

(Strab. p. 448; Paus. i. 31; Liv. xxxv. 38), who was hence called Amarynthia or Amarysia, and in whose honour there was a festival of this name both in Euboea and Attica. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Amarynthia.)

Amāsēnus (Amaseno), a river in Latium, rises in the Volscian mountains, flows by Privernum, and after being joined by the Ufens (Ufente), which flows from Setia, falls into the sea between Circeii and Terracina, though the greater part of its waters are lost in the Pontino marshes. (Verg. Aen. vii. 684, xi. 547.)

Amāsia or -ea (Ἀμάσεια: Ἀμασεύς: Amasiah), the capital of the kings of Pontus, was a strongly fortified city on both banks of the river Iris. It was the birthplace of Mithridates the Great and of the geographer Strabo. It is described by Strabo (p. 561).

Amāsis. 1. King of Egypt, B.C. 572–528 [the Egyptian Aahmes II]. When the expedition of Apries against Cyrene had failed [APRIES], Amasis, whom he had trusted to quell the mutinous troops, became their leader and defeated his master. For six years he reigned jointly with Apries, and then put him to death. Although the Egyptian party who had given him the throne expected him to withdraw all favour from the Greeks and cease to employ them or mercenaries, he did just the contrary. He formed a body-guard of Ionians at Memphis, married Ladice, a native of Cyrene, of the family of the Battadiade, and restored Naucratis as a settlement for Greek traders in the Delta. [NAUCRATIS.] His reign was one of great prosperity. (Hdt. ii. 161–182, iii. 1–16; Diod. i. 68, 95).—2. A Persian, sent in the reign of Cambyses (B.C. 525) against Cyrene, took Barca, but did not succeed in taking Cyrene. (Hdt. iv. 167, 201.)

Amāstris (Ἀμαστρίς, Ion. Ἀμηστρίς). 1. Wife of Xerxes, and mother of Artaxerxes I., was of a cruel and vindictive character (Hdt. vii. 61, ix. 108–113).—2. Also called Amāstrine, niece of Darius, the last king of Persia. She married, 1. Craterus; 2. Dionysius, tyrant of Heraclea in Bithynia, B.C. 322; and 3. Lysimachus, B.C. 302. Having been abandoned by Lysimachus upon his marriage with Arsinoë, she retired to Heraclea, where she reigned. She was drowned by her two sons about 288. (Arrian. An. vii. 4; Diod. xx. 109; Memn. 4, 5.)

Amāstris (Ἀμαστρίς: Ἀμαστρινός: Amasera), a large and beautiful city, with two harbours, on the coast of Paphlagonia, built by Amāstris after her separation from Lysimachus (about B.C. 300), on the site of the old town of Sesānus, which name the citadel retained. The new city was built and peopled by the inhabitants of Cytorus and Cromna. (Il. ii. 853; Strab. p. 544; Plin. Ep. x. 99; Catull. 4, 11.)

Amāta, wife of king Latinus and mother of Lavinia, opposed Lavinia being given in marriage to Aeneas, because she had already promised her to Turnus. When she heard that Turnus had fallen in battle, she hung herself. (Verg. Aen. xii. 600; Dionys. i. 64.)

Amāthūs, untis (Ἀμαθούς, οὐντος: Ἀμαθούσιος: Limasol), an ancient town on the S. coast of Cyprus, with a celebrated temple of Aphrodite, who was hence called Amathūsiā. But it preserved its Phoenician character and retained the worship of Melcart. It long remained faithful to Persia (Hdt. v. 104). There were copper-mines in the neighbourhood of the town (secundam Amathuntā metalli, Ov. Met. x. 220). CYPRUS.]

Amātius, surnamed Pseudomarius, originally an oculist. It is said that his real name was Herophilus, which he romanised into Amatius. Pretended to be either the son or grandson of the great Marius, and was put to death by Antony in B.C. 41. (Val. Max. ix. 15, 2; Appian. B. C. ii. 2; Cic. Att. xii. 49, xiv. 6–8, Phil. i. 2, 5.)

Amāzōnes (Ἀμαζόνες), a mythical race of warrior women who engaged in battle with different Greek heroes according to various local traditions. Their especial country in legend was in Pontus, near the river Thermodon, where, by some accounts, the Naiad Harmonia had born them to Arcs, and where they founded the city Themiscyra, in the neighbourhood of the modern Trebizond (Paus. i. 2; Diod. iv. 16; Ap. Rh. ii. 996; Pherecyd. fr. 25). Their country was inhabited only by the Amazons, who were governed by a queen; but in order to propagate their race, they met once a year the Gargareans in Mount Caucasus. The children of the female sex were brought up by the Amazons, and each had her right breast cut off, the better to manage spear and bow (whence the name, α-μαζός, according to most; Diod. ii. 45; Apollod. ii. 5; Arrian. An. vii. 13; cf. Unimammia, Plaut. Cure. iii. 75), but it should be observed that this does not appear in any art representation of an Amazon. The male children were sent to the Gargareans or put to death. The foundation of several towns in Asia Minor and in the islands of the Aegean is ascribed to them, e.g. of Ephesus, Smyrna, Cyne, and Myrina, and it is particularly to be noticed that very prevalent traditions connect them, not merely with the north of Asia Minor, Colchis, the Caucasus, &c., but also with Thrace and Scythia (Aesch. Pr. 723; Verg. Aen. xi. 659; Strab. p. 504; Hdt. iv. 110). The Greeks believed in their existence as a real historical race down to a late period; and hence it is said that Thalestris, the queen of the Amazons, hastened to Alexander, in order to become a mother by the conqueror of Asia (Plut. Alex. 46). The following are the chief mythical adventures with which the Amazons are connected. In Homer they appear in Phrygian and Lycian story (Il. iii. 188, vi. 186)—they are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of Iobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophon, who happened to be staying at the king's court. [BELLEROPHONTES; LAOMEDON.] They also invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans when Priam was a young man. Their story was developed by Arctinus, who, unlike Homer, makes their queen Penthesilea the ally of Priam, but in the period of the war after the close of the Iliad, when she was slain by Achilles. This is a favourite subject in art (Q. Smyrn. i. 669). A later story tells of their being repelled from the island of Leuce at the mouth of the Danube by the ghost of Achilles. The ninth among the labours imposed upon Heracles by Eurystheus, was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received as a present from Ares. [HERACLES.] The Athenian story makes them invade Attica, penetrating into the town itself, in revenge for the attack which Theseus had made upon them. They are repelled and driven back to Asia by Theseus. This was the subject of Micon's picture of the Amazons on the Stoa Poikile (Paus. i. 15, 2; Aristoph. Lys. 678; cf. Aesch. Enum. 655; Plut. Thes. 27). As to the origin of these stories different theories have been put forward. That of O. Müller and later writers following him, is that the story arose from armed maiden attendants (ιερόδουλοι) of the 'Magna Mater' under one or more of her names, the Goddess of Comana, Artemis of Ephesus, Cybele, the Goddess Ma or Amma. This may derive some probability from the accounts of their connexion with Artemis in some stories, their attendance on her as huntress maidens, their offerings to Artemis Tauropolos, their recognition of her power in Laconia (Pans. iii. 25, 2). But, on the other hand, nothing can be further removed than the Amazons, as represented to us, from the sensuality of the temple-slaves. A more likely origin is suggested by the legends which make them come from Thracian and Scythian lands, connected with the Thracian Ares, whose children they are by some accounts, and to whom they sacrifice horses (Ap. Rh. ii. 387). Coupling this with the accounts which reached the Greeks regarding the life and character of women among these northern races, their free and hardy life, hunting and bathing like men (Hdt. iv. 116), it is easy to understand how these stories of warrior women may have grown up, and how they reached Greece in connexion Ambiatinus Vicus, a place in the country of the Treviri near Coblenz, where the emperor Caligula was born (Suet. Cal. 8).

Ambibāri, an Armoric people in Gaul, near the modern Ambières in Nonnaudy (Caes. B. G. vii. 75).

Ambiliāti, a Gallic people, perhaps in Brittany (Caes. B. G. iii. 9).

Ambiōrix, a chief of the Eburones in Gaul, cut to pieces, in conjunction with Catiuolcus, the Roman troops under Sabinus and Cotta, who were stationed for the winter in the territories of the Ebrones, b.c. 54. He failed in taking the camp of Q. Cicero, and was defeated on the arrival of Caesar, who was unable to obtain possession of the person of Ambiorix, notwithstanding his active pursuit of the latter. (Caes. B. G. v. 26-51, vi. 29-43, viii. 24; Dio Cass. xl. 5, 31.)

Ambivareti, the clientes or vassals of the Aedui, probably dwelt N. of the latter (B. G. vii. 75).

Ambivariti, a Gallic people, W. of the Maas, in the neighbourhood of Namur (B. G. iv. 9).

Wounded Amazons. (Phigalean Marbles.)

with stories of Ares; the connexion with Artemis probably arose merely from the huntress character which belonged to her. In art the Amazons are a favourite subject alike in great sculptures such as those from the temple frieze at Bassae, from the Mausoleum and from Xanthus, and on vases. It is noticeable that in the more archaic art they are dressed and armed exactly like male warriors (ἀνδρῶνειαι); but after the Persian wars in vase pictures they assume an Oriental type of dress and appearance, while in sculptures they become idealised warrior maidens, resembling some types of the huntress Artemis, and perhaps modelled after Spartan maidens. In the Greek form they wear the chiton with the right breast bare whether on foot or on horseback; on the vases their garb is Oriental with the Phrygian cap and with the Asiatic or the Scythian trousers. The characteristic Amazonian arms besides the bow are the double battle-axe and the crescent shield (cf. Hor. Od. iv. 4, 17; Dict. Ant. s.v. Pelta, Securis). [PENTHESILEA.]

Ambarri, a people of Gaul, on the Arar (Saône) E. of the Aedui, and of the same stock as the latter (Caes. B. G. vii. 75; Liv. v. 34).

Ambiāni, a Belgic people, between the Bellovaci and Atrebatas, conquered by Caesar in b.c. 57. Their chief town was Samarobriva, afterwards called Ambiani, now Amiens (Caes. B. G. ii. 4, 15, vii. 75).

Ambivius Turpio. [TURPIO.]

Amblada (τὰ Ἀμβλαδα: Ἀμβλαδεύς), a town in Pisidia, on the borders of Caria; famous for its wine (Strab. p. 570).

Ambrācia (Ἀμπρακία, afterwards Ἀμβρακία: Ἀμβρακιώτης, Ἀμβρακιεύς, Ambraciensis: Arta), a town on the left bank of the Arachthos, 80 stadia from the coast, N. of the Ambracian Gulf, was originally included in Acarnania, but afterwards in Epirus. It was colonised by the Corinthians about b.c. 660, and at an early period acquired wealth and importance. It became subject to the kings of Epirus about the time of Alexander the Great. Pyrrhus made it the capital of his kingdom, and adorned it with public buildings and statues. At a later time it joined the Aetolian League, was taken by the Romans in b.c. 189, and stripped of its works of art. Its inhabitants were transplanted to the new city of NICOPOLIS, founded by Augustus after the battle of Actium, b.c. 31. South of Ambracia on the E. of the Arachthos, and close to the sea, was the fort Ambracius. (Strab. pp. 325, 452; Hdt. viii. 45; Thuc. i. 46, ii. 80, iii. 105; Polyb. xxii. 9-13; Liv. xxxviii. 3-9.)

Ambracius Sinus (Ἀμπρακιὸς or Ἀμβρακιὸς κόλπος: G. of Arta), a gulf of the Ionian Sea between Epirus and Acarnania, said by Polybius to be 300 stadia long and 100 wide, and with an entrance only 5 stadia in width. Its real length is 25 miles and its breadth 10; the entrance is about half a mile wide, narrowing in one part to 700 yards.

Ambrōnes (Ἀμβρωνες), a Celtic people, who joined the Cimabri and Teutones in their invasion of the Roman dominions, and were defeated by Marius near Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix) in B.C. 102.

Ambrosius, bishop of Milan A.D. 374. [See Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Ambrýsus or Amphrýsus (Ἀμβρουσός: Ἀμφρουσεύς: nr. Dhístomo), a town in Phocis strongly fortified, S. of M. Parnassus: in the neighbourhood were numerous vineyards. It was fortified with a double wall by the Thebans as a stronghold against Philip. (Strab. p. 423; Paus. x. 36, 1.)

Amustus, Fábýs. The notable persons of this name are 1. M., pontifex maximus in the year when Rome was taken by the Gauls, B.C. 390. His three sons, Kaeso, Numerius, and Quintus, were sent as ambassadors to the Gauls when the latter were besieging Clusium, and took part in a sally of the besieged against the Gauls (B.C. 391). The Gauls demanded that the Fabii should be surrendered to them for violating the law of nations; and upon the senate refusing to give up the guilty parties, they marched against Rome. The three sons were in the same year elected consular tribunes (Liv. v. 35, 41).—2. M., consular tribune in B.C. 331 and 369, and censor in 363, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, and the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, the author of the Licinian Rogations. According to the story recorded by Livy, the younger Fabia induced her father to assist her husband in obtaining the consulship for the plebeian order, into which she had married (Liv. vi. 22, 34, 36).—3. M., thrice consul, in B.C. 360, when he conquered the Hernici, a second time in 356, when he conquered the Falisci and Tarquinienes, and a third time in 354, when he conquered the Tiburtes. He was dictator in 351. He was the father of the celebrated Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. [MAXIMUS.] (Liv. vii. 11, 17, 22, viii. 33.)

Amēnānus (Ἀμενανός, Dor. Ἀμενας), a river in Sicily near Catania, sometimes dried up for years together (nunc fluit, interdum suppressis fontibus aret, Ov. Met. xv. 280; Strab. p. 240), possibly owing to volcanic changes in Etna, at whose foot it rises.

Amēria (Amerinus: Amelia), an ancient town in Umbria, and a municipium, the birthplace of Sex. Roscius defended by Cicero, was situate in a district rich in vines (Verg. Georg. i. 265), on a hill 56 miles from Rome, between the valleys of the Tiber and the Nar (Strab. p. 227; Plin. iii. § 114).

Ameriōla, a town in the land of the Sabines, destroyed by the Romans at a very early period (Liv. i. 38; Plin. iii. § 68).

Amestrátus (Amestratinus: Mistretta), a town in the N. of Sicily, not far from the coast, the same as the Myttistratum of Polybius and the Amastra of Silius Italicus, taken by the Romans from the Carthaginians in the first Punic war (Cic. Verr. iii. 39, 43, 74).

Amestris. [AMASTRIS.]

Amida (ἡ Ἀμίδα: Diarbekr), a town in Sophene (Armenia Major) on the Upper Tigris. It was taken by the Persian king Sapor A.D. 359, when Ammianus Marcellinus was among the defenders (Am. Marc. xix. 1). The Romans afterwards recovered it.

Amilcar. [HAMILCAR.]

Aminias (Ἀμεινίας), brother of Aeschylus, distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis

(B.C. 480); he and Eumenes were judged to have been the bravest on this occasion among all the Athenians (Hdt. viii. 84, 93; Plut. Them. 14; Diod. xi. 27).

Amípsias (Ἀμειψίας), a comic poet of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, whom he twice conquered in the dramatic contests, gaining the second prize with his Connus when Aristophanes was third with the Clouds (B.C. 423), and the first with his Comastæ when Aristophanes gained the second with the Birds (B.C. 414). (Diog. Laert. ii. 28.)

Amisía or Amisius (Ems), a river in northern Germany well known to the Romans, on which Drusus had a naval engagement with the Bructeri, B.C. 12 (Strab. p. 290; Mela, iii. 3; Tac. Ann. i. 60, 63, 70, ii. 23).

Amisía (Emden ?), a fortress on the left bank of the river of the same name (Tac. Ann. ii. 8).

Amisōdārus (Ἀμισώδαρος), a king of Lycia, who brought up the monster Chimaera; his sons Atymnius and Maris were slain at Troy by the sons of Nestor (Il. xvi. 317–328; Apollod. ii. 3).

Amīsus (Ἀμισός: Ἀμισηνός, Amisenus: Samsun), a large city on the coast of Pontus, on a bay of the Euxine Sea, called after it (Amisenus Sinus). Mithridates enlarged it, and made it one of his residences. It was taken by Lucullus B.C. 71, by Pharnaces B.C. 47, freed by Julius Caesar, and again held by tyrants, liberated from the tyrant Strato by Augustus immediately after Actium (see Ramsay's Asia Minor, p. 194). It became one of the civitates foederatae, and before Trajan's time was attached to the province of Bithynia-Pontus as a free city (Strab. p. 547; Dio Cass. xlii. 46; App. B. C. ii. 91; Plut. Luc. 15; Plin. Ep. x. 93).

Amiternum (Torre d'Amiterno), an ancient Sabine town, according to Cato and Varro the cradle of the Sabine race (Dionys. i. 14, ii. 49). It stood on the Aternus, under the highest of the Apennines (Gran Sasso d'Italia). It fell into decay in the civil wars, but was re-colonised and became a place of importance under the Empire, and was the birthplace of Sallust. According to Liv. x. 39 it was in the power or the alliance of Samnium at the beginning of the third Samnite war, and was taken B.C. 293 (Verg. Aen. vii. 710; Strab. p. 228).

Ammiānus (Ἀμμιανός), a Greek epigrammatist, but probably a Roman by birth, the author of nearly thirty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Trajan and Hadrian.

Ammiānus Marcellinus, by birth a Greek, and a native of Syrian Antioch, was admitted at an early age among the imperial bodyguards. He served many years under Ursicinus, one of the generals of Constantius, both in the West and East, and he subsequently attended the emperor Julian in his campaign against the Persians (A.D. 363). Eventually he established himself at Rome, where he composed his history, and was alive at least as late as 390. His history, written in Latin, extended from the accession of Nerva, A.D. 96, the point at which the histories of Tacitus terminated, to the death of Valens, A.D. 378, comprising a period of 282 years. It was divided into 31 books, of which the first 13 are lost. The remaining 18 embrace the acts of Constantius from A.D. 353, the seventeenth year of his reign, together with the whole career of Gallus, Julianus, Jovianus, Valentinianus, and Valens. The portion preserved was the more important part of the work, as he was a contemporary of the events described in these books. The style of Ammianus is too often affected and bombastical.

Ammôn, more correctly Amon or Amun, the supreme god of the Egyptians according to the Theban theology. He may possibly, as some think, have been originally the god of animal and vegetable fruitfulness; but there is no doubt that as Amen-Ra at Thebes he was the Sun-God, who ruled over all the upper and the under world, and whose representative on the earth was the reigning king of Egypt. His worship in the original form was set aside by Amenhotep IV., who from his mother, apparently a Mesopotamian, had adopted views in favour of a purer monotheism, and substituted the worship of 'the sun's disk' for the orthodox worship of Amun, and though the original faith was restored by the following dynasty, and especially by Ramses II. (=Sesostris), some traces of the change remained. A further variation from other lands was caused by the Ethiopian conquest of Egypt in the 8th century B.C., whence some Ethiopian characteristics were introduced into his worship, and the erroneous idea arose that the Egyptians had derived the religion of Amun from Meroë (Hdt. ii. 29, 42). When Psammetichus established his rule in Lower Egypt at Sais, in the 7th century B.C., the exclusive worship of Amun, except in his special temples, diminished; but soon after this he was brought into relation with Greek mythology, through the settlers at Naucratis, &c., and still more through the Greek colonists of Cyrene, who became acquainted with the famous oracle of Ammon in the western Oasis of the Ammonium (Siwah), founded by a colony of Egyptians and Ethiopians in the 8th century. His worship spread in Greece, being identified with that of Zeus; so that he became Zeus 'Αμμων, and to the Romans Jupiter Ammon. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 16; Plat. Polit. 257 B, where 'our' God means Cyrenaic.) It appears in Laconia (Paus. iii. 18, 2). The oracle from the Ammonium, to which tradition gave the same origin as that of Dodona (Hdt. ii. 54), gained much influence with the Greeks after Alexander's visit, and sacred embassies were sent to it [see Dict. Ant. s.v. Theoris]. In Egyptian art Ammon is represented sometimes with a head-dress of two lofty feathers, symbolising his rule over the upper and under world; sometimes as a ram-headed deity with an orb over the horns, symbolising the sun. Some take the ram merely to signify animal fruitfulness. It looks more like the remnant of a totemistic religion, especially where the custom of clothing the statue in the skin of a slaughtered ram is mentioned (Hdt. ii. 42). In Greek art this symbol of the ram is preserved, but brought into agreement with Greek taste by merely showing the horns added to the ideal human

Ammonium. [OASIS.]

Ammōnius (Ἀμμώνιος). 1. Grammaticus, of Alexandria, left this city on the overthrow of the heathen temples in A.D. 389, and settled at Constantinople. He wrote, in Greek, a valuable work, On the Differences of Words of like Signification (περὶ ὁμοίων καὶ διαφόρων λέξεων).—Editions. By Valckenaer, Lugd. Bat. 1739; by Schafer, Lips. 1822.—2. Son of Hermeas, studied at Athens under Proclus (who died A.D. 484), and was the master of Simplicius, Damascius, and others. He wrote numerous commentaries in Greek on the works of the earlier philosophers. His extant works are Commentaries on the Isagoge of Porphyry, or the Five Predicables, first published at Venice in 1500; and On the Categories of Aristotle, and De Interpretatione, published by Brandis in his edition of the Scholia of Aristotle.—3. Of Lamprae in Attica, a Peripatetic philosopher, lived in the first century of the Christian era, and was the instructor of Plutarch (Plut. Symp. iii. 1).—4. Surnamed Saccas, or sack-carrier, because his employment was carrying the corn landed at Alexandria, as a public porter, was born of Christian parents. Some writers assert, and others deny, that he apostatised from the faith. At any rate he combined the study of philosophy with Christianity, and is regarded by those who maintain his apostasy as the founder of the later Platonic School. Among his disciples were Longinus, Herennius, Plotinus, and Origen. He died A.D. 243, at the age of more than 80 years.

Amnias, a river of Pontus, E. of the Halys (Strab. p. 562; Appian, Mithr. 18).

Amnisus (Ἀμισός), a town in the N. of Crete and the harbour of Cnossus, situated on a river of the same name, the nymphs of which, called Amnisiades, were in the service of Artemis (Strab. p. 470; Od. xix. 188; Ap. Rh. iii. 881; Callim. Hymn. Dian. 15).

Amon. [AMMON.]

Amor. [EROS.]

Amorgus (Ἀμοργός; Ἀμοργίνος; Amorgo), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Sporades, the birthplace of Simonides, and under the Roman emperors a place of banishment, more favourable than Gyarus as being productive of corn, oil, and wine. It had three towns on its western coast, Aigiale, Arcesius, and Minon. (Strab. p. 487; Scyl. p. 22; Tac. Ann. iv. 30.)

Amōrium (Ἀμόριον), a city of Galatia, 30 miles SW. of Pessianus.

Ampē (Ἀμπη, Hdt.) or Ampelōne (Plin.), a town at the mouth of the Tigris, where Darius I. planted the Milesians whom he removed from their own city after the Ionian revolt (B.C. 494). (Hdt. vi. 20; Plin. vi. § 159.)

L. Ampelius, the author of a small work, entitled Liber Memorialis, lived in the 2nd century of the Christian era. His work is a sort of commonplace-book, containing a meagre summary of the most striking natural objects and of the most remarkable events, divided into 50 chapters. He is praised by Sidonius Apollinaris (ix. 299). It is generally printed with Florus, and is published separately by Beck, Lips. 1826; Wölfelin, Lips. 1854.

Ampēlus, the personification of the vine. He was a beautiful youth, son of a satyr and a nymph, and beloved by Dionysus. According to Ovid (Fast. iii. 407), he was killed by falling from a vine branch, and was placed, as Vindemitor, in the stars; according to Nonn. Dionys. x. 175, he was changed into a vine. A marble group now in the British Museum represents Dionysus with Ampelus half changed into a vine.

Ampēlus (Ἀμπελος), a promontory at the extremity of the peninsula Sithonia in Chalcidice in Macedonia, near Torone.

Ampēlūsia (Ἀμπελουσία: C. Espartel), the promontory at the W. end of the S. or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum (Straits of Gibraltar). The natives of the country called it Cotes (αἱ Κάτεις). (Strab. p. 825; Plin. v. 1.)

Amphaxitis (Ἀμφαξιτίς), a district of Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouths of the Axios and Echedorus (Polyb. v. 97; Strab. p. 330).

Amphēa (Ἀμφεία: Ἀμφεύς), a small town of Messenia on the borders of Laconia and Messenia, conquered by the Spartans in the first Messenian war (Paus. iv. 5, 9).

Amphīārāus (Ἀμφιάραος), son of Oicles and Hyperinnestra, daughter of Thestius, was descended on his father's side from the famous seer Melampus, and was himself a great prophet and a great hero at Argos, having first gained his prophetic powers by sleeping in the μαντικὸς οἶκος at Phlius (Paus. ii. 13, 6). By his wife Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, he was the father of Alcmaeon, Amphilocheus, Eurydice, and Demonassa. He took part in the hunt of the Calydonian boar, and the Argonautic voyage. He also joined Adrastus in the expedition against Thebes, although he foresaw its fatal termination, through the persuasions of his wife Eriphyle, who had been induced to persuade her husband by the necklace of Harmonia which Polyneices had given her. On leaving Argos, however, he enjoined his sons to punish their mother for his death. [ALCMAEON.] During the war against Thebes, Amphiaras fought bravely, but could not escape his fate. Pursued by Periclymenus, he fled towards the river Ismenius, and the earth swallowed him up together with his chariot, before he was overtaken by his enemy. (Od. xv. 240-247; Pind. Nem. ix. 57, Ol. vi. 21; Aesch. Sept. 587; Soph. El. 837; Stat. Theb. vii. 816.) In Paus. i. 34 there is a story that he was swallowed up by the earth at Harua, near Mycalessus. Zeus made him immortal, and henceforth he was worshipped as a hero between Potniae and Thebes (Hdt. i. 46, viii. 134), but afterwards with greater fame near Oropus, where also his temple for dream-oracles was situated (Paus. i. 34). (See Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.)

Amphicaea or Amphicēa (Ἀμφίκαϊα, Ἀμφίκληϊα: Ἀμφικαϊεύς: Dhadhi or Oghunitzā?), a town in the N. of Phocis, with an adytum of Dionysus, was called for a long time Ophitēa (Ὀφιτεία) (Hdt. viii. 33; Paus. x. 3, 33).

Amphictyōn (Ἀμφικτυών). 1. A king of Attica who drove out his father-in-law Cranaus, and reigned for 12 years, when he was displaced by Erichthonius (Paus. i. 2, 5; Apollod. i. 7).—2. The mythical founder of the Amphictyonic council, son of Deucalion (Paus. x. 8). He had a temple at Anthela, near Thermopylae (Hdt. vii. 200).

Amphidāmas (Ἀμφιδάμας). 1. Son of Aleus and brother of Lycurgus, the Arcadian king (Paus. viii. 4, 6; Ap. Rh. i. 161); others make him the father, others the son, of Lycurgus (Il. ii. 603). He was one of the Argonauts. (Other mythical persons of the same name, Il. x. 266; Hes. Op. 652).—2. General of the Eleans B.C.

218, taken prisoner by Philip, king of Macedon (Polyb. iv. 75, 84, 86).

Amphidoli (Ἀμφιδόλοι), a town in Pisatis in Elis (Xen. Hell. iii. 2, 30; Strab. pp. 341, 349).

Amphilōchia (Ἀμφιλοχία), the country of the Amphilochi (Ἀμφιλοχοί), an Epirot race, at the E. end of the Ambracian gulf, usually included in Acarnania. Their chief town was Argos AMPHILOCHICUM. (Strab. p. 326.)

Amphilōchus (Ἀμφιλοχος), son of Amphiaras and Eriphyle, and brother of Alcmaeon. He took an active part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes, assisted his brother in the murder of their mother [ALCMAEON], and afterwards fought against Troy, and was in the wooden horse (Quint. Sm. xii. 323). On his return from Troy, together with Mopsus, who was like himself a seer, he founded the town of Mallos in Cilicia. Hence he proceeded to his native place, Argos, but returned to Mallos, where he was killed in single combat with Mopsus (Strab. p. 675; Lycophr. 439), or by Apollo (Strab. p. 676). Others relate (Thuc. ii. 68) that, after leaving Argos, Amphilocheus founded Argos Amphilocheum on the Ambracian gulf. He was worshipped at Mallos in Cilicia, at Oropus, and at Athens. (Paus. i. 34, 2, iii. 15, 6; cp. Mopsus.)

Amphilŷtus (Ἀμφίλυτος), a celebrated seer in the time of Peisistratus (B.C. 559), is called both an Acarnanian and an Athenian: he may have been an Acarnanian who received the franchise at Athens (Hdt. i. 62; Plat. Theag. p. 124).

Amphimāchus (Ἀμφίμαχος). 1. Son of Cteatus, grandson of Poseidon, one of the four leaders of the Epeans against Troy, was slain by Hector (Il. xiii. 185).—2. Son of Nomion, with his brother Nastes, led the Carians to the assistance of the Trojans, and was slain by Achilles (Il. ii. 870).—3. Son of Polyxeus (Il. ii. 623).

Amphimalla (τὰ Ἀμφίμαλλα), a town on the N. coast of Crete, on a bay called after it (G. of Armiro).

Amphimēdon (Ἀμφιμέδων), of Ithaca, a guest-friend of Agamemnon, and a suitor of Penelope, slain by Telamachus (Od. xxii. 254, xxiv. 108).

Amphinōmus (Ἀμφινόμος) and his brother Anapius were dutiful citizens of Catane, who in an eruption of Aetna carried off, the one his father, the other his mother, on their shoulders. The lava turned aside and spared them. They appear in later coins of the city. (Paus. x. 28, 4; Claudian, vii. 41; Auson. Ord. Urb. Nob. 92.)

Amphion (Ἀμφίων). 1. Son of Zeus and Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes, and twin-brother of Zethus. Amphion and Zethus were born either at Eleutherae in Boeotia or on Mount Cithaeron, whither their mother had fled, and grew up among the shepherds, not knowing their descent. Hermes (according to others, Apollo, or the Muses) gave Amphion a lyre, who henceforth practised song and music, while his brother spent his time in hunting and tending the flocks. (Od. xi. 260; Eur. Antiope. Fr.; Paus. ii. 6, 2; Ov. Met. vi. 110; Hor. Ep. i. 18.) Having become acquainted with their origin, they marched against Thebes, where Lycus reigned, the husband of their mother Antiope, whom he had repudiated, and had then married Dirce in her stead. They took the city, and as Lycus and Dirce had treated their mother with great cruelty, the two brothers killed them both. They put Dirce to death by tying her to a bull, who dragged her about till she perished; and they then threw her body into a well, which was from this time called the well of Dirce (Stat. Theb. ix. 678). After they had obtained possession of Thebes, they fortified it by a wall. It is said that when Amphion played his lyre, the stones moved of their own accord and formed the wall (Schol. Ap. Rh. i. 740, 763; Apollod. iii. 5, 5; Hor. Od. iii. 11; Prop. i. 9, 10; Stat. Theb. iv. 357). Amphion afterwards married Niobe, who bore him many sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo. His death is differently related: some say that he killed himself from grief at the loss of his children (Ov. Met. vi. 270), and others tell us that he was killed by Apollo because he made an assault on the Pythian temple of the god. Amphion and his brother were buried at Thebes. A connexion may be traced between the Theban legend of these twin sons of Zeus and the Lacedaemonian legend of the Dioscuri; and, again, between Amphion and Apollo. The punishment inflicted upon Dirce is represented in the celebrated Farnese bull, the work of Apollonius and Tauriscus, which was discovered in 1546, and placed in the Farnese palace at Rome. (Plin. xxxvi. § 34.) [DIRCE.]—2. Son of Jasus and father of Chloris (Od. xi. 281). In Homer, this Amphion, king of Orchomenos, is distinct from Amphion the husband of Niobe; but in some traditions they were regarded as the same person.

Amphipolis (Ἀμφίπολις; Ἀμφιπολίτης; Neokhorio, in Turkish Jeni-Keui), a town in Macedonia on the left or eastern bank of the Strymon, just below its egress from the lake Cercinitis, and about 3 miles from the sea. The Strymon flowed almost round the town, nearly forming a circle, whence its name Amphipolis. It was originally called Ἐννεα ὁδοί, 'the Nine Ways,' and belonged to the Edonians, a Thracian people. Aristagoras of Miletus first attempted to colonise it, but was cut off with his followers by the Edonians in B.C. 497. The Athenians made a next attempt with 10,000 colonists, but they were all destroyed by the Edonians in 465. In 437 the Athenians were

iv. 102, v. 6.) It was one of the most important of the Athenian possessions, being advantageously situated for trade on a navigable river in the midst of a fertile country, and near the gold mines of M. Pangaeus. Hence the indignation of the Athenians when it fell into the hands of Brasidas (B.C. 424) and of Philip (358). Under the Romans it was a free city, and the capital of Macedonia prima: the Via Egnatia ran through it. The port of Amphipolis was Eion.

Amphis (Ἄμφις), an Athenian comic poet, of the middle comedy, contemporary with the philosopher Plato. We have the titles of 26 of his plays, and a few fragments of them (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec.).

Amphissa (Ἀμφισσα; Ἀμφισσεύς, Ἀμφισσαῖος; Salona), one of the chief towns of the Locri Ozolae on the borders of Phocis, 7 miles from Delphi, said to have been named after Amphissa, daughter of Macareus, and beloved by Apollo. In consequence of the Sacred War declared against Amphissa by the Amphietyons, the town was destroyed by Philip, B.C. 338 (Aesch. Ctes. p. 71; Strab. p. 419), but it was soon afterwards rebuilt, supplying 400 hoplites against Brennus B.C. 279 (Paus. x. 23, 1); was taken by the Romans B.C. 190 (Liv. xxxvii. 5). Under the empire it had freedom from tribute (Plin. iv. § 7).

Amphistratus (Ἀμφίστρατος) and his brother Creas, the charioteers of the Dioscuri, were said to have taken part in the expedition of Jason to Colchis, and to have occupied a part of that country which was called after them Heniochia, as heniochus (ἡνίοχος) signifies a charioteer (Strab. p. 496; Arist. Pol. viii. 4, 3).

Amphitritē (Ἀμφιτρίτη), a Nereid or an Oceanid, wife of Poseidon and goddess of the sea, especially of the Mediterranean. In the Odyssey Amphitrito is merely the name of the sea

Amphitrite holding a rudder.
(From a Bas-relief published by Winckelmann.)

(in the Iliad the word does not occur), and she first occurs as a goddess in Hesiod. She was carried off from Naxos by Poseidon, or, according to others, having fled to Atlas was tracked out by a dolphin, which Poseidon therefore placed in the stars. Later poets again use the word as equivalent to the sea in general. She became by Poseidon the mother of Triton, Rhode or Rhodos, and Benthescyma.

Amphitrōpē (Ἀμφιτρόπη; Ἀμφιτροπαίεύς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Antiochis, in the neighbourhood of the silver mines of Laurium.

Amphitryon or Amphitryō (Ἀμφιτρυών), son of Alcaeus, king of Tiryns, and Astydameia, or Laonome, or Lysidice. Alcaeus had a brother Electryon, who reigned at Mycenae. Between Electryon and Pterelaus, king of the Taphians, a furious war raged, in which Electryon lost all his children except Licymnius, and was robbed of his oxen. Amphitryon recovered the oxen, but on his return to Mycenae accidentally killed his uncle Electryon. He was now expelled from Mycenae, together with Alcmene the daughter of Electryon, by Sthenelus the brother of Electryon, and went to Thebes, where he was purified by Creon. In order to win the hand of Alcmene, Amphitryon prepared to avenge the death of Alcmene's brothers on the Taphians, and conquered them, after Comaetho, the daughter of Pterelaus, through her love for Amphitryon, cut off the one golden hair on her father's head which rendered him immortal. During the absence of Amphitryon from Thebes, Jupiter visited ALCMENE, who became by the god the mother of Heracles; the latter is called Amphitryoniades in allusion to his reputed father. Amphitryon fell in a war against Erginus, king of the Minyans (Paus. viii. 14, 15, 17, ix. 10; Apollod. ii. 4; Hes. Sc. 11; Pind. Nem. x. 13, Pyth. ix. 81). Euripides (H. F.) represents his death as caused by Heracles after the war with the Minyans. The comedy of Plautus, called Amphitruo, is a ludicrous representation of the visit of Zeus to Alcmene in the disguise of her lover Amphitryon.

Amphōtērus (Ἀμφότερος). [ACARNAN.]

Amphrysus (Ἀμφρυσός). 1. A small river in Thessaly which flowed into the Pagasaeon gulf, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus (pastor ab Amphryso, Verg. Georg.

iii. 2; cf. Strab. p. 433; Ap. Rh. i. 54; Ov. Met. i. 580).—2. See AMBRYSUS.

Ampsāga (Wad-el-Kabir, or Suffjmar), a river of N. Africa, which divided Numidia from Mauretania Sitifensis. It flows past the town of Cirta (Constantina).

Ampsancetus or Amsancetus Lacus (Lago d'Ansanti or Mufiti), a small lake in Samnium near Aeculanum, four miles from the modern Frigento. Sulphurous vapours arose from it. Near it was a chapel of the god Mephitis with a cavern from which mephitic vapours also came, and which was therefore regarded as an entrance to the lower world. (Verg. Aen. vii. 563; Plin. ii. § 208; Cic. Div. i. 36.)

Ampsvarii. [ANSIBARII.]

Ampyēs (Ἄμπυκος). 1. Son of Pelias, husband of Chloris, and father of the famous seer Mopsus, who is hence called Ampyēides. Pausanias (v. 17) calls him Ampyx.—2. Son of Iapetus, a bard and priest of Ceres, killed by Phineus at the marriage of Perseus (Ov. Met. v. 111).

Ampyx. [AMPYCUS.]

Amūlius. [ROMULUS.]

Amýclae. 1. (Ἀμύκλαι; Ἄμυκλαίεύς, Ἄμυκλαίος; Sklaovokhorī or Aia Kyriaki?), an ancient town of Laconia on the Eurotas, in a beautiful town country, 20 stadia SE. of Sparta (Polyb. v. 19; Liv. xxxiv. 28). It is mentioned in the Iliad (ii. 584), and is said to have been founded by the ancient Lacedaemonian king Amyclas, father of Hyacinthus, and to have been the abode of Tyndarus, and of Castor and Pollux, who are hence called Amyclaei Fratres (Paus. iii. 1; Stat. Theb. vii. 413). After the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the Achaeans maintained themselves in Amyclae for a long time; and it was only shortly before the first Messenian war that the town was taken and destroyed by the Lacedaemonians under Teleclus. The tale ran that the inhabitants had been so often alarmed by false reports of the approach of the enemy, that they passed a law that no one should speak of the enemy; and accordingly when the Lacedaemonians at last came, and no one dared to announce their approach, 'Amyclae perished through silence;' hence arose the proverb, Amyclis ipsis taciturnior (Paus. iii. 2; Strab. p. 364; Serv. ad Aen. x. 564). After its destruction by the Lacedaemonians Amyclae became a village, and was only memorable by the festival of the Hyacinthia (see Dict. of Ant. s.v.) celebrated at the place annually, and by the temple and colossal statue of Apollo, who was hence called Amyclacus.—2. (Amyclanus), an ancient town of Latium, E. of Terracina, on the Sinus Amyclanus, was, according to tradition, an Achaean colony from Laconia. In the time of Augustus the town had disappeared; the inhabitants were said to have deserted it on account of its being infested by serpents (Plin. iii. 9); but when Virgil (Aen. x. 564) speaks of tacitae Amyclae, he probably transfers to this town the epithet belonging to the Amyclae in Laconia [No. 1] (cf. Sil. viii. 528; Pervigil. Ven. 92). Near Amyclae was the Spelunca (Sperlonga), or natural grotto, a favourite retreat of the emperor Tiberius.

Amýclas. [AMYCLAE.]

Amyclides, a name of Hyacinthus, as the son of Amyclae.

Amýcus (Ἄμυκος), son of Poseidon and Bithynis, king of the Bebryces, was celebrated for his skill in boxing, and used to challenge strangers to box with him. When the Argonauts came to his dominions, Pollux accepted the challenge and killed him (Apollod. i. 9; Ap. Rh. ii.). On the Ficoroni Cistu he is represented as bound to a tree by Polydeuces. On his grave grew the 'laurus insana,' a branch of which caused strife (Plin. xvi. § 239).

Amydon (Ἀμυδών), a town in Macedonia on the river Axios (Il. ii. 849; Juv. iii. 69).

Amydonē (Ἀμυμώνη), one of the daughters of Danaus and Elephantis. When Danaus arrived in Argos, the country was suffering from a drought, and Danaus sent out Amydome to fetch water. She was attacked by a satyr, but was rescued from his violence by Poseidon, who appropriated her to himself, and then showed her the wells at Lerna. According to another account he bade her draw his trident from the rock, from which a threefold spring gushed forth, which was called after her the well and river of Amydome. Her son by Poseidon was called Nauplius (Apollod. ii. 1; Hyg. Fab. 169; Paus. ii. 37; Strab. p. 368; Eur. Phoen. 188).

Amynder (Ἀμύνανδρος), king of the Athamans in Epims, an ally of the Romans in their war with Philip of Macedonia, about B.C. 198, but an ally of Antiochus B.C. 189 (Pol. xvi. 27, xxii. 8; Liv. xxvii. 30, xxxii. 14, xxxv. 47, xxxviii. 1).

Amyntas (Ἀμύντας). 1. I. King of Macedonia, reigned from about B.C. 540 to 500, and was succeeded by his son Alexander I. He acknowledged himself to Megabyzus a vassal of Persia. He was in alliance with the Peisistratids, and offered Hippias a refuge (Hdt. viii. 139; Thuc. ii. 100; Paus. ix. 40).—2. II. King of Macedonia, son of Philip, the brother of Amyntas II., King of Macedonia, B.C. 398-369. Obv., head of king; rev., horse.

Perdiccas II., at first, like his father, prince of upper Macedonia (Thuc. ii. 95), obtained the throne of Macedonia B.C. 393 by the murder of the usurper Pausanias. Soon after his accession he was driven from Macedonia by the Illyrians, but was restored to his kingdom by the Thessalians. On his return he was engaged in war with the Olynthians, in which he was assisted by the Spartans, and by their aid Olynthus was reduced in 379. Amyntas united himself also with Jason of Pherae, and carefully cultivated the friendship of Athens. Amyntas died B.C. 370, and left by his wife Eurydice three sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and the famous Philip (Diod. xiv. 89 f., xv. 19, 60; Xen. Hell. v. 2).—3. Grandson of Amyntas II., was excluded by Philip from the succession on the death of his father Perdiccas III. in B.C. 360. He was put to death in the first year of the reign of Alexander the Great, 336, for a plot against the king's life (Just. xii. 6; Curt. vi. 9, 17).—4. A Macedonian officer in Alexander's army, son of Andromenes. He and his brothers were accused of being privy to the conspiracy of Philotas in 330, but were acquitted. Some little time after he was killed at the siege of a village (Arr. iii. p. 72 f.).—5. A Macedonian traitor, son of Antiochus, took refuge at the court of Darius, and became one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries. He was present at the battle of Issus (B.C. 333), and afterwards fled to Phoenicia, and having gathered ships went to Egypt, got possession of Pelusium, and was killed in battle against Mazaces, the Persian governor of Memphis (Arr. i. 24 f.; Curt. iii. 11, iv. 7; Plut. Alex.; Diod. xvii. 48).—6. A king of Galatia, supported Antony, and fought on his side against Augustus at the battle of Actium (B.C. 31). He fell in an expedition against the town of Homouada or Homona (Strab. p. 567).—7. A Greek writer of a work entitled Statismi (Σταθμοί), probably an account of the different halting-places of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition (Athen. ii. p. 67 &c.).

Amyntor (Ἀμύντωρ), son of Ormenus of Eleon in Thessaly, where Autolyclus broke into his house, and father of PHOENIX, whom he cursed on account of unlawful intercourse with his mistress. According to Apollodorus he was a king of Ormenium, and was slain by Heracles, to whom he refused a passage through his dominions, and the hand of his daughter ASTYDAMIA. (Il. ix. 434, x. 226; Apollod. ii. 7, iii. 13). According to Ovid (Met. xii. 364) he was king of the Dolopes.

Amyrtaeus (Ἀμυρταῖος), an Egyptian, assumed the title of king, and joined Inarus the Libyan in the revolt against the Persians in B.C. 460. They at first defeated the Persians [ACHAEMENES], but were subsequently totally defeated, 455. Amyrtaeus escaped, and maintained himself as king in the marshy districts of Lower Egypt, till about 414, when the Egyptians expelled the Persians, and Amyrtaeus reigned 6 years. (Hdt. ii. 140, iii. 15; Thuc. i. 110; Diod. xi. 74.)

Amyrus (Ἀμυρος), a river in Thessaly, with a town of the same name upon it, flowing into the lake Boebeis: the country around was called the Ἀμυρικὸν πεδῖον (Strab. 442; Polyh. v. 99).

Amythæon (Ἀμυθᾶων), son of Cretheus and Tyro, father of Bias and of the seer Melampus, who is hence called Amythæonius (Verg. Georg. iii. 550). He dwelt at Pylus in Messenia, and is mentioned among those to whom the restoration of the Olympian games was ascribed. (Paus. v. 8; Od. xi. 258.)

Anābon (Ἀνάβων), a district of the Persian province of Aria, S. of Aria Proper, containing 4 towns, which still exist, Phra (Ferrah), Bis (Beest or Bost), Gari (Ghore), Nii (Neh).

Anabūrā (Ἀνάβουρα) a town of Pisidia. It stood NW. of Antiocheia and SW. of the river Lalandus. Its name seems to have been changed to Neapolis between the times of Strabo and Pliny, or, rather, it was deserted when Neapolis was built near it. (Strab. p. 570; Liv. xxxviii. 15; Ramsay).

Anāces (Ἄνακες). [ANAX, No. 2.]

Anacharsis (Ἀνάχαρσις), a Scythian of princely rank, left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge, and came to Athens, about B.C. 594. He became acquainted with Solon, and by his talents and acute observations, and his simplicity of life, he excited general admiration. The fame of his wisdom was such, that he was even reckoned by some among the seven sages. He was killed by his brother Saulius on his return to his native country: according to Herodotus, because he was introducing the Greek worship of Cybele; according to Diogenes Laërtius, by accident. (Hdt. iv. 76; Diog. Laërt. i. 101; Plut. Sol. 5, Conviv. Sept. Sap.; Lucian, Scythia, Anacharsis; Athen. pp. 159, 428, 437, 613.) Cicero (Tusc. Disp. v. 32) quotes from one of his letters. Those which are ascribed to him are spurious (ed. Hercher, 1873, Epistologr. Graec.)

Anacrëon (Ἀνακρέων), a celebrated lyric poet, born at Teos, an Ionian city in Asia Minor. He removed from his native city, with the great body of its inhabitants, to Abdera, in Thrace, when Teos was taken by the Persians (about B.C. 540), but lived chiefly at Samos, under the patronage of Polyerates, in whose praise he wrote many songs. After the death of Polyerates (522), he went to Athens at the invitation of the tyrant Hipparchus, where he became acquainted with Simonides and other poets. He died at the age of 85, choked, as was said, by a grape-stone (Plin. vii. 5; Val. Max. ix. 12, 8), probably about 478: the place of his death is uncertain. The Athenians set up his statue in the Acropolis, as the type of age still constant to the pleasures of youth (Paus. i. 25). The universal tradition of antiquity represents Anacreon as a consummate voluptuary; and his poems prove the truth of the tradition. He sings of love and wine with hearty good will; and we see in him the luxury of the Ionian inflamed by the fervour of the poet. The tale that he loved Sappho is very improbable. (Hdt. iii. 121; Plat. Charm. p. 157; Hipparch. p. 228; Athen. p. 429, 599, 600; Strab. p. 638.) Of his poems only a few genuine fragments have come down to us; and these seem to show him as a poet light and graceful, but without force and passion. He probably followed the Lesbian poets as regards metre and style, but wrote in the Ionic dialect. The collection of love songs and drinking songs which bear his name are of various authorship and dates.—Editions: by Fischer, Lips. 1793; Bergk, Lips. 1878; Rose, 1876; Weise, Lips. 1878.

Anactōriūm (Ἀνακτόριον: Ἀνακτόριος), a town in Acarnania, built by the Corinthians, upon a promontory of the same name (near La Madonna) at the entrance of the Ambracian gulf. Its inhabitants were removed by Augustus after the battle of Actium (B.C. 31) to Nicopolis.

Coin of Anactorium in Acarnania.

Obv., head of Athene, with legend Ἀνακτοριέων; rev., Pegasus.

Anädÿömēnē. [APHRODITE.]

Anagnia (Anaguinus: Anagni), an ancient town of Latium, the chief town of the Hernici, and subsequently both a municipium (having first received the civitas sine suffragio as a punishment for disaffection) and a Roman colony. (Liv. ix. 43; Diod. xx. 80; Plin. iii. 63.) It lay in a very beautiful and fertile country on a hill, at the foot of which the Via Laviniana and Via Praenestina united (Compitum Anagninum). In the neighbourhood Cicero had an estate, Anagninum (Cic. pro Dom. 30).

Anagyriis (Ἀναγυροῦς, οἰντρος: Ἀναγυρσίος, Ἀναγυροντρόθεν: nr. Vari. Ru.), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis, S. of Athens, near the promontory Zoster (Strab. p. 398; Paus. i. 81).

Anaitica (Ἀναϊτικὴ), a district of Armenia, in which the goddess Anaitis was worshipped; also called Aciliscene.

Anaitis (Ἀναΐτις), an Asiatic divinity, whose name is also written Anaea, Aneitis, Tanaïs, or Nanaea. Her worship prevailed in Armenia, Cappadocia, Assyria, Persis, &c., and seems to have been a part of the worship, so common among the Asiatics, of the creative powers of nature, both male and female. The Greek writers sometimes identify Anaitis with Artomis, and sometimes with Aphroditē. (Strab. pp. 512, 559, 733, 738; Plut. Artax. 27, Lucull. 24; Paus. iii. 16; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 3; Clem. Alex. p. 43.)

Anamari or -res, a Gallic people in the plain of the Po, in whose land the Romans founded Placentia (Polyb. ii. 32). Possibly, however, we should here read the name as Ananes instead of making this people distinct from the following.

Ananes, a Gallic people, W. of the Trebia, between the Po and the Apennines (Polyb. ii. 17).

Ananius (Ἀνάσιος), a Greek iambic poet, contemporary with Hipponax, about B.C. 540. (Fragments in Bergk, Poetae Lyrici, ii. 1878.)

Anāphē (Ἀνάφη: Ἀναφαῖος: Anaphi, Nanfio), a small island in the S. of the Aegean sea, E. of Thera, with a temple of Apollo Aegletes, who was hence called Anaphēus (Strab. p. 484; Ov. Met. vii. 461).

Anaphlystus (Ἀναφλύστος: Ἀναφλύστιος: Anavyso), an Attic demus of the tribe Antiochis on the SW. coast of Attica, opposite the island Eleussa, called after Anaphlystus, son of Poseidon (Hdt. iv. 29; Strab. p. 398).

Anapius. [AMPHINOMUS.]

Anāpus (Ἀναπος). 1. A river in Acarnania, flowing into the Achelous (Thuc. ii. 82).—2. (Anapo), a river in Sicily, flowing into the sea S. of Syracuse through the marshes of Lysimelia (Thuc. vi. 96; Theocr. i. 68; Ov. Met. v. 416).

Anartes or -ti, a people of Dacia, N. of the Theiss (Caes. B. G. vi. 25).

Anas (Ἄνας: Guadiana), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rising in Celtiberia in the mountains near Laminium, forms the boundary between Lusitania and Baetica, and flows into the ocean by two mouths (now only one) (Strab. p. 139; Plin. iii. 1).

Anatolius. 1. Bishop of Laodicea, A.D. 270, an Alexandrian by birth, was the author of several mathematical and arithmetical works, of which some fragments have been preserved.—2. An eminent jurist, was a native of Berytus, and afterwards P. P. (praefectus praetorio) of Illyricum. He died A.D. 361. A work on agriculture, often cited in the Geoponica, and a treatise concerning Sympathies and Antipathies, are assigned by many to this Anatolius. The latter work, however, was probably written by Anatolius the philosopher, who was the master of Iamblichus, and to whom Porphyry addressed Homeric Questions.—3. Professor of law at Berytus, is mentioned by Justinian among those who were employed in compiling the Digest. He wrote notes on the Digest, and a very concise commentary on Justinian's Code. Both of these works are cited in the Basilica. He perished A.D. 557, in an earthquake at Constantinople, whither he had removed from Berytus.

Anaurus (Ἀναυρός), a river of Thessaly flowing into the Pagasaeon gulf, in which Jason lost a sandal (Ap. Rh. i. 8; Athen. p. 72).

Anāva (Ἀναβά), an ancient, but early decayed, city of Great Phrygia, on the salt lake of the same name, between Celaenae and Colossae (Hagee Ghioul) (Hdt. vii. 30). In Frederic Barbarossa's march (A.D. 1190) the country is described as near the sources of the Maeander 'per loca desertissima uhi lacus salinarum.' It is a mistake to identify it with Aescania.

Anax (Ἄναξ). 1. A giant, son of Uranus and Gaea, and father of Asterius (Paus. i. 35, vii. 2).—2. An epithet of protecting deities in the plural Ἄνακες, or Ἀνακτες, or Ἄνακες παῖδες, used to designate the Dioscuri especially, but also the Curetes or the Cabiri, and the Tritonides (Paus. ii. 22, 6, x. 38, 3; Cic. N. D. iii. 21, 53).

Anaxāgōras (Ἀναξαγόρας), a Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, was born at Clazomenae in Ionia, B.C. 500. He gave up his property to his relations, as he intended to devote his life to higher ends, and went to Athens at the age of 20; here he remained 30 years, and became the intimate friend and teacher of the most eminent men of the time, such as Pericles and Euripides. His doctrine gave offence to the religious feelings of the Athenians; and the enemies of Pericles availed themselves of this circumstance to accuse him of impiety, B.C. 450. It was only through the eloquence of Pericles that he was not put to death; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of 5 talents and to quit Athens. He retired to Lampsacus, where he died in 428 at the age of 72. Anaxagoras was dissatisfied with the systems of his predecessors, the Ionic philosophers, and struck into a new path. The Ionic philosophers had endeavoured to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things. Anaxagoras, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this cause he considered to be νοῦς—that is, mind, thought, or intelligence.

Anaxander (Ἀναξανδρος), king of Sparta, son of Eurycrates, fought in the second Messenian war, about B.C. 668 (Paus. iii. 14, 4, iv. 16, 2).

Anaxandrides (Ἀναξανδρίδης). 1. Son of Theopompus, king of Sparta (Hdt. viii. 131).—2. King of Sparta, son of Leon, reigned from about B.C. 560 to 520. Having a barren wife whom he would not divorce, the ephors made him take with her a second. By her he had Cleomenes; and after this by his first wife Dorieus, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus (Hdt. i. 65, v. 39; Paus. iii. 3).—3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, a native of Camirus in Rhodes, began to exhibit comedies in B.C. 376. Aristotle held him in high esteem (Rhet. iii. 10; Eth. Eud. vi. 10; Nicom. vii. 10); one of the best known fragments of his plays contrasts the religious observances of Greeks and Egyptians (Athen. p. 374). He wrote also dithyrambs, which have not survived (Meineke, Frag.).

Anaxarchus (Ἀναξαρχος), a philosopher of Abdera, of the school of Democritus (a pupil of Metrodorus), accompanied Alexander into Asia (B.C. 334), and gained his favour by flattery and wit. He was named ὁ εἰδαιμονικός, as being an optimist in temper. After the death of Alexander (323), Anaxarchus was thrown by shipwreck into the power of Nicocreon, king of Salamis in Cyprus, to whom he had given mortal offence, and who had him pounded to death in a stone mortar. (Cic. Tusc. ii. 22, 52, N. D. iii. 33, 82; Arr. iv. 10; Plut. Alex. 52.)

Anaxarēte (Ἀναξαρέτη), a maiden of Cyprus, remained unmoved by the love of Iphis, who at last, in despair, hanged himself at her door. She looked with indifference at the funeral of the youth, but Venus changed her into a stone statue, which was preserved in the temple of Venus Prospiciens (Ἄφροδ. παρακύπτουσα) at Salamis in Cyprus. Ant. Liberalis tells us the same story of a Greek Arsinoe beloved by a Phoenician youth. It may be connected with the approach of the Greek colonists to the worship of Astarte (Ov. Met. xiv. 698; Ant. Lib. 39).

Anaxībīa (Ἀναξιβία), daughter of Pleistheues, sister of Agamemnon, wife of Strophius, and mother of Pylades.

Anaxībīus (Ἀναξιβίος), the Spartan admiral stationed at Byzantium on the return of the Cyrean Greeks from Asia, B.C. 400. In 389 he succeeded Dercyllidas in the command in the Aegean, but fell in a battle against Iphicrates, near Antandrus, in 388 (Xeu. An. v. 1, vi. 1; Hell. iv. 8).

Anaxidāmus (Ἀναξίδαμος), king of Sparta, son of Zenxidamus, lived to the end of the second Messenian war, B.C. 668 (Paus. iii. 7).

Anaxilāus (Ἀναξίλαος) or Anaxīlas (Ἀναξίλας). 1. Tyrant of Rhegium, of Messenian origin, took possession of Zancle in Sicily about B.C. 494, peopled it with fresh inhabitants, and changed its name into Messene. He died in 476 (Hdt. vi. 22, vii. 165; Thuc. vi. 4).—2. Of Byzantium, surrendered Byzantium to the Athenians in B.C. 408.—3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, contemporary with Plato and Demosthenes. We have a few fragments, and the titles of 19 of his comedies. (Meineke).—4. A physician and Pythagorean philosopher, born at Larissa, was banished by Augustus from Italy, B.C. 23, on the charge of magic (Euseb. Chron. ad Olymp. 138).

Anaximander (Ἀναξίμανδρος), of Miletus, was born B.C. 610, and died 547 in his 64th year. He was one of the earliest philosophers of the Ionian school, and the immediate successor of Thales, its first founder. He first used the word ἀρχή to denote the origin of things, or rather the material out of which they were formed; he held that this ἀρχή was the infinite (τὸ ἄπειρον), everlasting, and diviue, though not attributing to it a spiritual or intelligent nature; and that it was the substance into which all things were resolved on their dissolution. He was a careful observer of nature, and was distinguished by his astronomical, mathematical, and geographical knowledge: he is said to have introduced the use of the gnomon into Greece.

Anaximēnes (Ἀναξιμένης). 1. Of Miletus, the third in the series of Ionian philosophers, flourished about B.C. 544; but as he was the teacher of Anaxagoras, B.C. 480, he must have lived to a great age. He considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the other elements of the universe were resolvable.—2. Of Lampsacus, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia (B.C. 334), and wrote a history of Philip of Macedonia; a history of Alexander the Great; and a history of Greece in 12 books, from the earliest mythical ages down to the death of Epaminondas. Of these a few fragments remain. He also enjoyed great reputation as a rhetorician, and is the author of a scientific treatise on rhetoric, the Ῥητορικὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον, usually printed in the works of Aristotle. He was an enemy of Theophrastus, and published under his name a work calumniating Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, which produced great exasperation against Theophrastus. (Paus. vi. 18, 3; Diod. xv. 76, 89.)

Anazarbus or -a (Ἀναζαρβός or -ά: Ἀναζαρβεύς, Anazarbēnus: Anasarba or Naversa, Ru.), a considerable city of Cilicia Campestris, on the left bank of the river Pyramus, at the foot of a mountain of the same name. Augustus conferred upon it the name of Caesarea (ad Anazarbum); and, on the division of Cilicia into the two provinces of Prima and Secunda, it was made the capital of the latter. It was almost destroyed by earthquakes in the reigns of Justinian and Justin.

Ancaeus (Ἀγκαῖος). 1. Son of the Arcadian Lycurgus and Creophile or Eurynome, and father of Agapenor. He was one of the Argonauts, and took part in the Calydonian hunt, in which he was killed by the boar (Ap. Rh. i. 164; Paus. viii. 4; Ov. Met. viii. 391).—2. Son of Poseidon and Astypalaea or Alta, king of the Leleges in Samos, husband of Samia, and father of Perilaus, Enodos, Samos, Alitherses, and Parthenope. His story shows points of resemblance to that of the son of Lycurgus, for he also is represented as one of the Argonauts; but they differ in that the son of Lycurgus is celebrated for strength; the son of Poseidon is noted for skilful seamanship: he became the helmsman of the ship Argo after the death of Tiphys (Ap. Rh. i. 188, ii. 867–900). A well-known proverb is said to have originated with this Ancaeus. He had been told by a seer that he would not live to taste the wine of his vineyard; and when he was afterwards on the point of drinking a cup of wine, the growth of his own vineyard, he laughed at the seer, who, however, answered, πολλὰ μετὰ τὴν πέλει κύλικος καὶ χεῖλος ἄκρου, 'There is a many a slip between the cup and the lip.' At the same instant Ancaeus was informed that a wild boar was near. He put down his cup, went out against the animal, and was killed by it (Ap. Rh. l.c.; Tzetzes and Lycophr. 488).

Ancalites, a people of Britain (Caes. B. G. v. 21). They are placed by some writers at Henley-on-Thames, on the Oxfordshire bank.

Q. Ancharius, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 59, took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of Caesar. He was praetor in 56, and succeeded L. Piso in the province of Macedonia. (Cic. pro Sest. 53, 113; in Pis. 36, 89; ad Fam. xiii. 40.)

Anchesmus (Ἀγχεσμός), a hill not far from Athens, with a temple of Zeus, who was hence called Anchesmius.

Anchiäle and -lus (Ἀγχιάλη). 1. (Akiälē), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, on the borders of Moesia (Strab. p. 329; Ov. Trist. i. 9, 36).—2. Also Anchialos, an ancient city of Cilicia, W. of the Cydnus near the coast, said to have been built by Sardanapalus (Strab. p. 672; Athen. p. 529; Arrian, ii. 5).

Anchises (Ἀγχίσις), son of Capys and Themis, the daughter of Ilus, king of Dardanus on Mount Ida. As descended by the royal line from Zeus, he is called ἄναξ ἀνδρῶν (see Il. v. 268; xx. 215–240). In beauty he equalled the immortal gods, and was beloved by Aphrodite, by whom he became the father of Aeneas, who is hence called Anchisiades (Hymn. ad Ven. 45 seq.; Hes. Theog. 1008). The goddess warned him never to betray the real mother of the child; but as on one occasion he boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by a flash of lightning, which according to some traditions killed, but according to others only blinded or lamed him. Virgil in his Aeneid makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Aeneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city. He further relates that Anchises died soon after the first arrival of Aeneas in Sicily, and was buried on mount Eryx. This tradition seems to have been believed in Sicily, for Anchises had a sanctuary at Egesta, and the funeral games celebrated in Sicily in his honour continued down to a late period. There is, however, the greatest difference of traditions as to his burial-place: it was in Ida, and honoured by herdsmen (Eustath. ad Il. xii. 98); in Pallene (Schol. ad Il. xiv. 459); in Arcadia, where Aeneas was supposed to have settled for a while on his way to Sicily, having landed on the Laconian coast (Paus. viii. 12, 8); in Epirus (Procop. Goth. iv. 22); in Sicily (Verg. Aen. v. 760; Hyg. Fab. 260); in Latium (see Serv. ad Aen. i. 570, iii. 711). This variation is accounted for by the variety of legends about the wanderings of Aeneas [see that article].

Anchisia (Ἀγχισία), a mountain in Arcadia, NW. of Mantinea, where Anchises is said to have been buried [see above].

Ancon (Λευκοσώρων Ἀγκών), a harbour and town at the mouth of the river Iris in Pontus.

Ancona or Ancon (Ἀγχών: Anconitanus: Ancona), a town in Picenum on the Adriatic sea, lying in a bend of the coast between two promontories, and hence called Ancon or an 'elbow.' It was built by the Syracusans, who settled there about b.c. 392, discontented with the rule of the elder Dionysius; and under the Romans, who made it a colony, it became one of the most important seaports of the Adriatic. It possessed an excellent harbour, completed by Trajan, and it carried on an active trade with the opposite coast of Illyricum. The town was celebrated for its temple of Venus and its purple dye: the surrounding country produced good wine and wheat (Strab. p. 241; Plin. iii. § 111; Caes. B. C. i. 11; Tac. Ann. iii. 9; Juv. iv. 40; Catull. 36, 13). The coin shows Aphrodite as tutelary deity.

Ancorarius Mons, a mountain in Mauretania Caesariensis, S. of Caesarea, abounding in citron trees, the wood of which was used by the Romans for furniture (Plin. xiii. § 95).

Ancōre. [NICAEA.]

Ancus Marcius, fourth legendary king of Rome, reigned 24 years, b.c. 640–616, and is said to have been the son of Numa's daughter. Like Numa he embodies the priestly or pontifical institutions of the regal period, but especially has assigned to him those religious ceremonies which belonged to war. He conquered the Latins, took many Latin towns, transported the inhabitants to Rome, and gave them the Aventine to dwell on: these conquered Latins formed the original Plebs. He also founded a colony at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; built a fortress on the Janiculum as a protection against Etruria, and united it with the city by a bridge across the Tiber; dug the ditch of the Quirites, which was a defence for the open ground between the Caelian and the Palatine; and built a prison. He was succeeded by Tarquinius Priscus. (Liv. i. 32; Dionys. iii. 36; Cic. de Rep. ii. 18.)

Ancyra (Ἀγκύρα: Ἀγκυρανός, Ancyranus). (Angora or Enguri), a city of Galatia in Asia Minor, in 39° 56' N. lat. It was an important junction of roads both pre-Roman and Roman, especially the roads from Byzantium and Chalcedon to Tavium and Armenia beyond the Halys, and the roads southwards to Cilicia and westwards to Sardis. In the time of Augustus, when Galatia became a Roman province, Ancyra was the capital: it was originally the chief city of a Gallic tribe named the Tectosages, who came from the S. of France. Under the Roman empire it had the name of Sebaste, which in Greek is equivalent to Augusta in Latin. Hence the inhabitants of the district of which it was metropolis were called Σεβαστηνοὶ Τεκτοσάγες, and Ancyra was called Σεβαστὴ Τεκτοσάγειον, to distinguish it from two other Sebastes of Galatia, Tavium and Pessinus. When Augustus recorded the chief events of his life on bronze tablets at Rome, the citizens of Ancyra had a copy made, which was cut on marble blocks and placed at Ancyra in a temple dedicated to Augustus and Rome. This inscription is called the Monumentum (or Marmor Ancyranum) (Mommsen, 1865; C. I. L. i.). It has erroneously been supposed that there was another Ancyra in Phrygia, for which Strab. pp. 567, 576, and Ptol. v. 2, 22 have been cited, but the fact is that both these writers sometimes (though not consistently) extend Phrygia so as to include part of Galatia.

Andania (Ἀνδάνια: Ἀνδανεύς, Ἀνδάνιος), a town in Messenia, between Megalopolis and Messene, the capital of the kings of the race of the Leleges, abandoned by its inhabitants in the second Messenian war, and from that time a mere village. Pausanias found only ruins. Oechalia is identified by Strabo with Andania, but by Pausanias with Carnasium, one mile distant, where mysteries were celebrated. (See OECHALIA; Paus. iv. 33, 6; Strab. pp. 339, 350; Liv. xxxvi. 31.)

Andécavi, Andégavi, Andes, a Gallic people N. of the Loire, with a town of the same name, also called Juliomagus, now Angers (Caes. B. G. ii. 35; Tac. Ann. iii. 40).

Andeira (τὰ Ἀνδεῖρα: Ἀνδεῖρηνός), a city of Mysia, celebrated for its temple of Cybele surnamed Ἀνδεῖρηνή (Plin. v. § 126).

Andematunnum. [LINGONES.]

Anderida, a Roman station in South Britain on the site of Pevensey in Sussex. The district Anderida (which is said to be named from a Celtic word andred, meaning uninhabited or 'forest' land) formed a wide tract of the Wcald of Kent and Sussex, extending into Hampshire.

Anderitum (Anterivux), a town of the Gabali in Aquitania (Caes. B. G. vii. 75).

Andes. 1. See ANDECAVI.—2. A pagus or township near Mantua, the birthplace of Virgil. Whether it was the name of a single vicus, or village, is not certain; but an old tradition (Dante, Purg. xviii. 83) identifies it with Pistola on the Mincio, about 3 miles below Mantua. Whether this is correct or not, it cannot have been many miles from Mantua, and it is hard to account for the 'xxx milia' in Probus, unless he meant to say 30 miles from Cremona.

Andocides (Ἀνδοκίδης). 1. Son of Leogoras, who fought against the Peisistratidae (Andoc. de Myst. § 106). He was one of the envoys for the truce with Sparta, B.C. 445, and held command with Glaucan at Coreyra B.C. 435 (Andoc. de Pace, § 6; Thuc. i. 51).—2. Grandson of the preceding, son of another Leogoras, was the second in date of the Ten Attic Orators. He was born about B.C. 440 (cf. Andoc. de Red. § 7; [Lys.] in Andoc. § 46). In 415 he was implicated in the charge of mutilating the Hermae (he does not seem to have been connected with the other charge of profaning the mysteries), and being denounced by Diocleides along with his father and other relations and supposed accomplices (42 in all) was imprisoned. To save these persons he revealed what he knew: viz. that certain persons previously named by Teucros, and four others, were guilty. He and his relations thus escaped; but as he was regarded as implicated in the impiety the promise of indemnity did not save him from ἀτιμία, which involved his banishment. The truth seems to have been that he admitted belonging to the club at which the mutilation had been proposed, and by the members of which it was carried out, but he himself was ill at the time (so he stated in the speech 15 years afterwards), and took no part in the act. In his exile he traded in timber and supplied the fleet at Samos with oars. Hence when he attempted to live at Athens in 411 he was denounced for supplying the democracy at Samos and driven from Athens. He then despatched corn from Cyprus to Athens, which facilitated his return to Athens in the following year, and it was at this time that he delivered the speech still extant, On his Return, in which he petitioned for permission to reside at Athens, but in vain. He was thus driven into exile a third time, and went to reside at Elis. In 403 he again returned to Athens upon the overthrow of the tyranny of the Thirty by Thrasybulus, and the proclamation of the general amnesty. He was now allowed to remain quietly at Athens for the next 4 years, but in 399 his enemies accused him of having profaned the mysteries; he defended himself in the oration still extant, On the Mysteries, and was acquitted. In 391 he was sent as ambassador to Sparta to conclude a peace, which on his return in 390 he defended unsuccessfully in the extant speech On the Peace with Lacedaemon. He seems to have died soon afterwards, perhaps in exile. Besides the three orations already mentioned there is a fourth against Alcibiades, said to have been delivered in 415, which is spurious. Andocides was not a trained rhetorician, and his speeches have not art or grace of style, and are lacking in skill of arrangement; on the other hand, he is unaffected and natural, and has passages of forcible and telling narrative (e.g. de Myst. § 43 f., 48 f.). It is to his credit that his advice to accept the peace with Lacedaemon was sound statesmanship, though rejected by his country-

Andraemon (Ἀνδραίμων). 1. Husband of Gorge, daughter of Oenens king of Calydon, in Aetolia, whom he succeeded, and father of Thoas, who is hence called Andraemonides (Il. ii. 638; Od. xiv. 499; Paus. x. 38, 5).—2. Son of Oxylus, and husband of Dryope, who was mother of Amphissus by Apollo (Ov. Met. ix. 363; Ant. Lib. 32).

Andriscus (Ἀνδρίσκος), a man of low origin, who pretended to be a natural son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, was seized by Demetrius, king of Syria, and sent to Rome. He escaped from Rome, assumed the name of Philip, and obtained possession of Macedonia, B.C. 149. He defeated the praetor Juventius, but was conquered by Caecilius Metellus, and taken to Rome to adorn the triumph of the latter, 148. (Vell. Pat. i. 11; Flor. ii. 14; Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, 31; Liv. Ep. 49, 50, 52.)

Andrôcles (Ἀνδροκλήης), an Athenian demagogue. He was an enemy of Alcibiades; and it was chiefly owing to his exertions that Alcibiades was banished. After this event, Andrôcles was for a time at the head of the democratical party; but in B.C. 411 he was put to death by the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred (Thuc. viii. 65; Aristoph. Vesp. 1187; Plut. Alc. 19; Andoc. de Myst. 27).

Androclus, the slave of a Roman consular, was sentenced to be exposed to the wild beasts in the circus; but a lion which was let loose upon him, instead of springing upon his victim, exhibited signs of recognition, and began licking him. Upon inquiry it appeared that Androclus had been compelled by the severity of his master, while in Africa, to run away from him. Having one day taken refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun, a lion entered, apparently in great pain, and seeing him, went up to him and held out his paw. Androclus found that a large thorn had pierced it, which he drew out, and the lion was soon able to use his paw again. They lived together for some time in the cave, the lion catering for his benefactor. But at last, tired of this savage life, Androclus left the cave, was apprehended by some soldiers, brought to Rome, and condemned to the wild beasts. He was pardoned, and presented with the lion, which he used to lead about the city. (Gell. v. 14; Sen. de Benef. ii. 19; Aelian. V. H. vii. 48.)

Andrôgêos (Ἀνδρόγεως), son of Minos and Pasiphaë, or Crete, conquered all his opponents in the games of the Panathenaea at Athens. This extraordinary good luck, however, became the cause of his destruction, though the mode of his death is related differently. According to some accounts Aegeus, fearing his strength, sent him to fight against the Marathonian bull, who killed him; according to others, he was assassinated by his defeated rivals on his road to Thebes, whither he was going to take part in a solemn contest (Apollod. iii. 1. 2, 15. 7; Paus. i. 27, 9). Propertius (ii. 1. 61) speaks of his being recalled to life by Aesculapius. A third account related that he was assassinated by Aegeus himself (Diod. iv. 60). Minos made war on the Athenians in consequence of the death of his son, and imposed upon them the tribute of seven youths and seven maidens from which they were delivered by THESEUS. At Phalerum there was an altar called 'the Altar of the Hero,' which Pansanias (i. 1) states to be really the altar of Androgeos. In the games of the Ceramicus for the son of Minos, he is known as Eurygyces (Hesych. s.v. ἐπ' Εὐρυγύη ἀγών: cf. Hes. fr. 106).

Andrômâche (Ἀνδρομάχη), a daughter of Eëtion, king of the Cilician Thebes, and one of the noblest female characters in the Iliad. Her father and her 7 brothers were slain by Achilles at the taking of Thebes, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Artemis (Il. vi. 414 fl.). She was married to Hector, by whom she had a son Scamandrius (Astyanax), and for whom she entertained the most tender love (cf. Il. xxii. 460, xxiv. 725). On the taking of Troy her son was hurled from the wall of the city, and she herself fell to the share of Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus), the son of Achilles, who took her to Epirus, and to whom she bore 3 sons, Molossus, Pielus, and Pergamus. She afterwards married Helenus, a brother of Hector, who ruled over Chaonia, a part of Epirus, and to whom she bore Cestrinus. (Verg. Aen. iii. 295; Paus. i. 11; Pind. Nem. iv. 82, vii. 50.) In Euripides, Androm., she lives until the death of Neoptolemus in Phthia. After the death of Helenus, she followed her son Pergamus to Asia, where an heroum was erected to her.

Andrômâchus (Ἀνδρόμαχος). 1. Ruler of Tauromenium in Sicily about B.C. 344, and father of the historian Timaeus (Plut. Tim. 10; Diod. xvi. 7, 68).—2. Of Crete, physician to the emperor Nero, A.D. 54–68; was the first person on whom the title of Archiatr was conferred, and was celebrated as the inventor of a famous compound medicine and antidote called Theriacâ Andromachî, which retains its place in some foreign Pharmacopoeias to the present day. Andrômachus has left the directions for making this mixture in a Greek elegiac poem, consisting of 174 lines, edited by Tidicaeus, Tiguri, 1607, and Leinker, Norimb. 1754; Kühn, 1826.

Andrômêda (Ἀνδρομέδη), daughter of the Ethiopian king Cepheus and Cassiopëa. [The story belongs also to Phoenicia and is localised at Joppa: see Strab. pp. 43, 759; Pans. iv. 35, 9; Plin. v. § 59.] Her mother boasted that the beauty of her daughter surpassed that of the Nereids, who prevailed on Poseidon to visit the country by an inundation and a sea-monster. The oracle of Ammon promised deliverance if Andromeda was given up to the monster; and Cepheus, obliged to yield to the wishes of his people, chained Andromeda to a rock. Here she was found and saved by Perseus, who slew the monster and obtained her as his wife. Andromeda had previously been promised to Phineus, and this gave rise to the famous fight of Phineus and Perseus at the wedding, in which the former and all his associates were slain (Ov. Met. v. 1 seq.). After her death, she was placed among the stars. (Apollod. ii. 4; Hyg. Fab. 64; Poet. Ast. ii. 10; Arat. Phaen. 198; Ov. Met. iv. 662.)

Andronicus (Ἀνδρόνικος). 1. Cyrrhestes, so called from his native place, Cyrrha, probably lived about B.C. 100, and built the octagonal tower at Athens, called 'the tower of the wuids' (Vitr. i. 6, 4; cf. Dict. of Ant. s.v. Horologium).—2. Livius Andronicus, the earliest Roman poet, was a Greek, probably a native of Tarentum. He was brought to Rome B.C. 275 and became the slave of M. Livius Salinator, by whom he was manumitted, and from whom he received the Roman name Livius. He obtained at Rome a perfect knowledge of the Latin language. He was employed by M. Livius to teach his sons (and perhaps other children), and for the benefit of his pupils translated the Odyssey into Saturnian verse (Cic. Brut. 18, 71; Gell. xviii. 9), of which some fragments remain (Wordsworth, Fr.). He also translated tragedies and a few comedies from the Greek, using in them some of the Greek metres, especially the trochaic. His first play was acted B.C. 240, and he himself was one of the actors (Liv. vii. 2). In B.C. 207 he was appointed by the Pontifex to write a poem on the victory at Sena (Liv. xxvii. 37). He cannot be called an original poet, but he gave the first impulse to Latin literature. From Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 69) we learn that his poems, probably the translation of the Odyssey in particular, long remained a school-book. (Fragments in Duntzer, 1835; Ribbeck, Scen. Rom. 1871; Wordsworth.)

—3. Of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher at Rome, about B.C. 58. He published a new edition of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which formerly belonged to the library of Apellicon, and which were brought to Rome by Sulla with the rest of Apellicon's library in B.C. 84. Tyrannio commenced this task, but apparently did not do much towards it (Strab. 665; Gell. xx. 5; ARISTOTELES). The arrangement which Andronicus made of Aristotle's writings seems to be the one which forms the basis of our present editions. He wrote many commentaries upon the works of Aristotle; but none is extant, for the paraphrase of the Nicomachean Ethics ascribed to him was not his work.

Andrôpôlis (Ἀνδρῶν πόλις: Chabur), a city of Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, was the capital of the Nomos Andropolites, and, under the Romans, the station of a legion.

Andros (Ἄνδρος: Ἄνδριος: Andro), the most northerly and one of the largest islands of the Cyclades, SE. of Euboea, 21 miles long and 8 broad, early attained importance, and colonised Acanthus and Stagira about B.C. 654 (Thuc. iv. 84, 88). It was taken by the Persians in their invasion of Greece, was afterwards subject to the Athenians, at a later time to the Macedonians, and at length to Attalus III., king of Pergamus, on whose death (B.C. 133) it passed with the rest of his dominions to the Romans (Hdt. viii. 111, 121; Liv. xxxi. 45). It was celebrated for its wine, whence the whole island was regarded as sacred to Dionysus (Dict. Ant. s.v. Theoxenia). Its chief town, also called Andros, contained a celebrated temple of Dionysus, and a harbour of the name of Ganreleon, and a fort Gaurion.

Andrôtion (Ἀνδροτίων). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, against whom the latter delivered an oration, which is still extant.—2. The author of an Atthis, or a work on the history of Attica (Paus. vi. 7, 2, x. 8, 1).

Anemôrêa, afterwards Anemôlêa (Ἀνεμώρεια, Ἀνεμώλεια), a town on a hill on the borders of Phocis and Delphi (Il. ii. 521; Strab. p. 423).

Anemûrium (Ἀνεμούριον: Aniamur), a town and promontory at the S. point of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus.

Angerôna or Angerônîa, a Roman goddess respecting whom we have different statements, some representing her as the goddess of silence, others as the goddess of anguish and fear—that is, the goddess who not only produces this state of mind, but also relieves men from it. Her statue stood in the temple of Volupia, with her mouth bound and sealed up. Hence an ancient surmise that she was a protectress of Rome, keeping in silence a secret name of the city (Plin. iii. § 65). A modern theory is that she was a goddess of the new year, her festival falling at the winter solstice (C. I. L. i. p. 409), and in this view her name is derived *ab angere*ndo, i.e. from the turning back of the sun. If so we can only suppose the attitude of silence to denote that none can reveal what the new year will bring. Her festival, called Angeronalia, Divalia, or feriae divae Angerona, was on Dec. 21. (Macrob. i. 10, 7; Varr. L. L. vi. 23; Plin. l. c.; Kal. Praenest.)

Angîtes (Ἀγγίτης: Anghista), a river in Macedonia, flowing into the Strymon (Hdt. vii. 113).

Angîtia or Anguitia, a goddess worshipped by the Marsians and Marrubians, who lived about the shores of the lake Fucinus. Originally an Italian deity, she was later made a sister of Medeia, or identified with Medeia herself (Verg. Aen. vii. 759; Serv. ad loc.; Sil. Ital. viii. 500; Plin. vii. 15, xxv. 10; Gell. xvi. 11.)

Angli or Anglii, a German people of the race of the Suevi, on the left bank of the Elbe, afterwards passed over with the Saxons into Britain, which was called after them England. [SAXONES.] (Tac. Germ. 40; Ptol. ii. 11.)

Angrivarîi, a German people dwelling on both sides of the Visurgis (Weser), separated from the Cberusci by an agger or mound of earth (Tac. Ann. ii. 19). They were generally on friendly terms with the Romans, but rebelled in A.D. 16, and were subdued. Towards the end of the first century they extended their territories southwards, and, in conjunction with the Chamavi, took possession of part of the territory of the Bructeri, S. and E. of the Lippe, the Angaria or Engern of the middle ages. (Tac. Germ. 34.)

Anicêtus, a freedman of Nero, and formerly his tutor, was employed by the emperor in the execution of many of his crimes; he was afterwards banished to Sardinia, where he died.

Anicius Gallus. [GALLUS.]

Anîgrus (Ἀνίγρος: Mavro-Potamo), a small river in the Triphylian Elis, the Minyeius (Μινυήσιος) of Homer (Il. xi. 721), rises in M. Lapi-thas, and flows into the Ionian sea near Samicum; its waters are sulphurous, and have a disagreeable smell, and its fish are not catable. This, according to the legend, was caused by the wounded Centaurs bathing in it to wash out the poison from the arrows of Heracles (Strab. pp. 344–347; Paus. v. 5; Ov. Met. xv. 281). Near Samicum was a cave sacred to the Nymphs Anigrîdes (Ἀνιγρίδες or Ἀνιγριάδες), where persons with cutaneous diseases were cured by the waters of the river.

Anio, anciently Anien (hence Gen. Anienis: Teverone or l'Aniene), in Greek Ἀνίων aud

'Avlŷs, a river, the most celebrated of the tributaries of the Tiber, rises in the mountains of the Hernici near Treba (Trevi), flows first NW. and then SW. through narrow mountain-valleys, receives the brook Digentia (Licenza) above Tibur, forms at Tibur beautiful waterfalls (hence praeceps Anio, Hor. Od. i. 7, 13; cf. Strab. p. 238; Stat. Silv. i. 3. 73), and flows, forming the boundary between Latium and the land of the Sabines, into the Tiber, 3 miles above Romo, where the town of Antemnae stood. The water of the Anio was conveyed to Rome by two aqueducts, the Anio vetus and Anio novus. (See Dict. of Ant. s.v. Aquaeductus.)

Anius ('Anios), son of Apollo (according to others, of Zarex, who afterwards married his mother), and priest of Apollo at Delos. His mother was Rhoio (= pomegranate), daughter of Staphylus (= grapes), and granddaughter of Dionysus. Staphylus, seeing his daughter with child, placed her in a chest and set her adrift. She came to land, as variously stated, in Delos or Euboea, and bore her son Anius. By Dryope he had three daughters, Oeno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Dionysus gave the power of producing at will any quantity of wine, corn, and oil—whence they were called Oenotrōpae. With these necessaries, being taken to Troy by Palamedes (or by Menelaus), they are said to have supplied the Greeks during the first 9 years of the Trojan war. According to Ovid they were changed into doves to escape from Agamemnon. Roman legends make them and their father entertain Aeneas at Delos. Anius represents the connexion which was imagined between Apollo and Dionysus, and the names of his kindred point the same way (Tzet. ad Lyc. 580; Diod. v. 62; Verg. Aen. iii. 80; Ov. Met. xiii. 632; Dionys. i. 59).

Anna, Anna Perenna. Anna was daughter of Belus and sister of Dido. After the death of the latter, she fled from Carthage to Italy, where she was kindly received by Aeneas. Here she excited the jealousy of Lavinia, and being warned in a dream by Dido, she fled and threw herself into the river Numicius. Henceforth she was worshipped as the nymph of that river under the name of ANNA PERENNA. [In a mine of Laberius the names are Anna Perenna, and in a satire of M. Varro Anna ac Peranna; Gell. xiii. 23.] There are various other stories respecting the origin of her worship. Ovid relates that she was considered by some as Luna, by others as Themis, by others as Io, daughter of Inachus, by others as the Anna of Bovillae, who supplied the plebs with food when they seceded to the Mons Sacer. Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of March, when plebeian men and women met in couples and feasted and drank, either under extemporised booths or in the open. According to Martial, there had once been a maiden sacrifice. A special place was at the first milestone on the Via Flaminia. The identification of this goddess with Anna, the sister of Dido, is undoubtedly of late origin. Some have regarded her merely as the goddess of flowing waters; others, in view of her legendary reference to Luna, and Io, and Themis, the mother of the Hours, treat her, with greater probability, as the goddess of the year, worshipped in the spring. But the opinion of Usener deserves consideration—that she represents the union of two goddesses (Anna ac Peranna), one the goddess of the year in its course, the other of the completed year; and the story of the wooing of Minerva through Anna by Mars is regarded as a corruption of the myth of Mars and Nerio (Ov. Fast. iii. 523–693; Mart. iv. 64, 16; Macrobi. Sat. i. 12, 6; C. I. L. i. p. 322).

Anna Comnēna, daughter of Alexis I. Comnenus (reigned A.D. 1081–1118), wrote the life of her father Alexis in 15 books, which is one of the most valuable histories of the Byzantine literature. — Editions. By Pousin, Paris, 1651; Schopen, Bonn, 1839; Reifferscheid, 1878.

Annālis, a cognomen of the Villia Gens, first acquired by L. Villius, tribune of the plebs, in B.C. 179, because he introduced a law fixing the year (annus) at which it was lawful for a person to be a candidate for the public offices.

M. Anneius, legate of M. Cicero during his government of Cilicia, B.C. 51 (Cic. Fam. xiii. 55, 57; xv. 4).

T. Annianus, a Roman poet, lived in the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote Fescennine verses, and also a poem (Faliscum) about country life at Falerii (Gell. vi. 7; Auson. Id. 13).

Annicēris ('Avvikepis). There were two Cyrenaic philosophers of this name: 1. A. the elder, ransomed Plato for 20 minae when he was sold as a slave by Dionysius about B.C. 388 (Diog. Laërt. ii. 86).—2. A. the younger, pupil of Antipater, and contemporary of Hegesias, about B.C. 320–280. He limited the doctrine of pleasure as the only principle so far that he allowed the wise to make sacrifices for friendship, gratitude, and patriotism.

Annius Cimber. [CIMBER.]

Annius Milo. [MILO.]

Anser, a poet of the Augustan age, a friend of the triumvir M. Antonius (Cic. Phil. xiii. 5, 11). As a writer of light and wanton verse he is called procax by Ovid (Trist. ii. 495). There does not seem much ground for the theory of Servius, Donatus, &c., that he is alluded to as anser in Verg. Ecl. ix. 36, and that he was a detractor of Virgil's fame; or for supposing that the line of Propert. iii. 32, 83, refers to him.

Ansibarīi or Ampsivarīi, a German people, originally dwelt S. of the Bructeri, between the sources of the Ems and the Weser; driven out of their country by the Chauci in the reign of Nero (A.D. 59), they asked the Romans for permission to settle in the Roman territory between the Rhine and the Yssel, but when their request was refused they wandered into the interior of the country to the Cherusci, and were at length extirpated, according to Tacitus. We find their name, however, among the Franks in the time of Julian. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55, 56; Amn. Marc. xx. 10.)

Antaeōpōlis ('Avtaīopolis; nr. Gau-el-Kebir), a city of Upper Egypt (the Thebaïs), on the E. side of the Nile, but at some distance from the river, was one of the chief seats of the worship of Osiris (Ptol. iv. 5, 71; Plin. v. 49).

Antaeus ('Avtaīos), son of Poseidon and Go, a mighty giant and wrestler in Libya. The strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him; the conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a house to Poseidon. He was vanquished by Heracles. According to some accounts he was invincible as long as he remained in contact with his mother earth; therefore Heracles lifted him and strangled him in the air. This seems to be a later addition, for in works of art the older examples show the ordinary wrestling (Antaeus vanquished by being thrown); the lifting, only in later monuments. The tomb of Antaeus (Antaei collis), which formed a moderate hill in the shape of a man stretched out at full length, was shown near the town of Tingis in Mauretania. (Pind. Isthm. iii. 70; Plat. Theaet. 169; Apollod. ii. 5, 11; Hyg. Fab. 31; Ov. Ibis, 393; Luc. Phars. iv. 590; Juv. iii. 89; Strab. p. 829.)

Antagōras (Ἀνταγόρας), of Rhodes, flourished about B.C. 270, a friend of Antigonos Gonatas, and a contemporary of Aratus. He wrote an epic poem entitled Thebais, and also epigrams, of which specimens are still extant (Anth. Pal.).

Antalcidas (Ἀνταλκίδας), a Spartan, son of Leon, is chiefly known by the treaty concluded with Persia in B.C. 387, usually called the peace of Antalcidas, since it was the fruit of his diplomacy. According to this treaty all the Greek cities in Asia Minor, together with Clazomenae and Cyprus, were to belong to the Persian king; the Athenians were allowed to retain only Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros, and all the other Greek cities were to be independent.

Antander (Ἀντάνδρος), brother of Agathocles, king of Syracuse, wrote the life of his brother.

Antandrus (Ἀντανδρος; Ἀντάνδριος; Antandro), a city of Great Mysia, on the Adramyttian Gulf, at the foot of Mount Ida; an Aeolian colony. Virgil represents Aeneas as touching here after leaving Troy. (Aen. iii. 106; Strab. p. 606; Thuc. viii. 108; Hdt. v. 26, vii. 42.)

Antarādas (Ἀντάραδος; Tortosa), a town on the N. border of Phoenicia, opposite the island of Aradus.

Antēa or Antia (Ἀντεία), daughter of the Lycian king Iobates, wife of Proetus of Argos. She is also called Stheneboea. Respecting her love for Bellerophon, see BELLEROPHONTES.

Antemnae (Antemnae, atis), an ancient Sabine town at the junction of the Anio and the Tiber, destroyed by the Romans in the earliest times (Varr. L. L. v. 28; Verg. Aen. vii. 681; Liv. i. 10; Dionys. ii. 32; Strab. p. 230).

Antenor (Ἀντήνωρ). 1. A Trojan, husband of Theano, was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy, and a companion of Priam; he received Menelaus and Ulysses into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors, and advised his fellow-citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus (Il. iii. 148, 262, vii. 347; cf. Plat. Symp. 221 c). In post-Homeric story he is a traitor to his country who concerted a plan of delivering the city, and even the palladium, into the hands of the Greeks. Hence on the capture of Troy he was spared by the Greeks (Dar. Phryg. 5; Dict. Cret. v. 1, 4, 8; Serv. ad Aen. i. 246, 651, ii. 15; Tzetz. Lyc. 339; Paus. x. 27). His history after this event is related differently. Some writers relate that he founded a new kingdom at Troy; according to others, he embarked with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya, and settled at Cyrene; while a third account states that he went with the Heneti to Thrace, and thence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of Patavium and several towns is ascribed to him. (Pind. Pyth. v. 83; Strab. pp. 212, 543, 552; Liv. i. 1; Serv. ad Aen. i. 1, ix. 264.)—2. Son of Euphranor, an Athenian sculptor, made the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which the Athenians set up in the Ceramīcus, B.C. 509. These statues were carried off to Susa by Xerxes, and their place was supplied by others made either by Callias or by Praxiteles. After the conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great sent the statues back to Athens, where they were again set up in the Ceramīcus.

Anteros. [EROS.]

Antevorta, also called Porrima or Prorsa, and Postvorta, are described either as the two sisters or as companions of the Roman goddess

Carmouta; but originally they were only two attributes of the one goddess Carmenta, the former describing her knowledge of the future, and the latter that of the past, analogous to the two-headed Janus (Ov. Fast. i. 633; Gell. xvi. 16; Macrobi. Sat. i. 7; INDIGITAMENTA).

Anthēdōn (Ἀνθηδών; Ἀνθηδώνιος; Lukisi?), a town of Boeotia with a harbour, on the coast of the Euboean sea, at the foot of M. Messapius, said to have derived its name from a nymph Anthedon, or from Anthedon, son of Glaucus, who was here changed into a god (Ov. Met. vii. 232, xiii. 905). The inhabitants lived chiefly by fishing. (Strab. pp. 460, 404, 446; Paus. ix. 22; Il. ii. 508.)

Anthēmius, emperor of the West, A.D. 467–472, was killed on the capture of Rome by Ricimer, who made Olybrius emperor.

Anthēmūs (Ἀνθεμούς, οὔντος; Ἀνθεμούσιος), a Macedonian town in Chalcidice (Hdt. v. 94; Thuc. ii. 99).

Anthēmūsia or Anthēmus (Ἀνθεμουσία), a city of Mesopotamia, SW. of Edessa, and a little E. of the Euphrates. The surrounding district was called by the same name, but was generally included under that of OSRHOENE.

Anthēne (Ἀνθηνη), a place in Cynuria, in the Peloponnesus (Thuc. v. 41; Paus. iii. 38).

Anthylla (Ἀνθύλλα), a considerable city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of the Cauopic branch of the Nile, below Naucratis, the revenues of which, under the Persians, were assigned to the wife of the satrap of Egypt, to provide her with shoes (Hdt. ii. 97; Athen. p. 33).

Antias, Q. Valerius, a Roman annalist, wrote, about B.C. 90, a history of Rome from the earliest times in more than 70 books (Gell. vi. 9, 17). He is mentioned by Dionysius among the well-known annalists (i. 7, ii. 13), but not by Cicero. Livy mentions him more than any other (35 times), and apparently without misgiving in the first decade (e.g. vii. 36, ix. 27, 37, 43); but having later the means of comparing him with more trustworthy authorities, such as Polybius, he stigmatises him as the most mendacious of the annalists (xxvi. 49, xxx. 19, xxxiii. 10, xxxviii. 23, xxxix. 43; cf. Gell. l.c.; Oros. v. 16). He seems to have been reckless in his invention of precise numbers, obviously exaggerated, and of circumstantial details.—Fragments by Krause 1833, Roth 1852, Wordsworth 1874.

Anticlēa (Ἀντίκλεια) daughter of Autolyceus, wife of Laertes, and mother of Odysseus, died of grief at the long absence of her son (Od. xi. 85, 152, xv. 356), or, according to Hyginus (Fab. 243), put an end to herself. A story is mentioned by Plutarch (Q. Gr. 43) and Hyginus (Fab. 201) that before marrying Laertes she lived on intimate terms with Sisyphus; whence Ulysses is called a son of Sisyphus (Soph. Aj. 190; Eur. Iph. Aul. 524, Cycl. 104; Ov. Met. xiii. 31).

Anticlidēs (Ἀντικλείδης), of Athens, lived after the time of Alexander the Great, and was the author of several works, the most important of which was entitled Nōsti (Νόστοι), containing an account of the return of the Greeks from their mythical expedition (Plut. Alex. 46; Athen. pp. 157, 384, 446).

Anticyra, more anciently Anticirra (Ἀντίκιρρα, or Ἀντίκυρα; Ἀντικυρεῖς, Ἀντικυραῖος). 1. (Aspra Spitiā), a town in Phocis, with a harbour, on a peninsula on the W. side of the Sinus Anticyranus, a bay of the Crissaean Gulf, called in ancient times Cyparissus. It continued to be a place of importance under the Romans (Strab. p. 418; Paus. x. 3, 36; Gell. xvii. 13; Liv. xxii. 18).—2. A town in Thessaly, on the Sporcheus, not far from its mouth (Hdt. vii. 198; Strab. pp. 418, 428, 484).—Both towns were celebrated for their hellebore, the chief remedy in antiquity for madness (and, according to Pliny, for epilepsy). It is not to be supposed from Horace A. P. 300 that there was a third place of the name: he means that even three, if they existed, would be too few (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 83, 166; Ov. Pont. iv. 3, 53; Pers. iv. 16; Juv. xiii. 97; Plut. de Coh. Ira. 13; Plin. xxv. § 47).

Antigēnes (Ἀντιγένης), a general of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained the satrapy of Susiana, and espoused the side of Eumenes. On the defeat of the latter in B.C. 316, Antigēnes fell into the hands of his enemy Antigonus, and was burnt alive by him (Plut. Alex. 80, Eum. 13; Diod. xix. 44).

Antigēnidas (Ἀντιγενηςίδας), a Theban, a celebrated flute-player, and a poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great.

Antigōnē (Ἀντιγόνη), daughter of Oedipus by his mother Jocaste, and sister of Ismene, and of Eteocles and Polynices. In the tragic story of Oedipus Antigone appears as a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Oedipus had blinded himself, and was obliged to quit Thebes, he was accompanied by Antigone, who remained with him till he died in Colonus, and then returned to Thebes. After her two brothers had killed each other in battle, and Creon, the king of Thebes, would not allow Polynices to be buried, Antigone alone defied the tyrant, and buried the body of her brother. Creon thereupon ordered her to be shut up in a subterranean cave, where she killed herself. Haemon, the son of Creon, who was in love with her, killed himself by her side. This is the story of Sophocles. In a lost Antigone of Euripides Creon is induced (by the intercession of Dionysus) to give her in marriage to Haemon, and she bears a son named Maeon. In Hyginus (Fab. 72) Antigone is delivered by Creon to Haemon to be put to death, but he marries her and lives with her in concealment in a shepherd's hut, where she bears a son. When this son is grown up he is recognised in Thebes by Creon as having the mark borne by all the dragon race. Hence he discovers that Antigone still lives, and rejects the intercession of Heracles. Haemon kills Antigone and then himself. The intercession of Heracles seems to be the subject of a vase-painting belonging to the fourth century B.C. (see Baumeister). Some have thought that Hyginus is giving the story of Euripides' play; but it does not seem to agree with the slight notices which we possess of that play, and probably reproduces the plot of a later drama. It should be observed that the stories followed by the tragedians seem to be of late, probably Attic, origin. Homer does not mention Antigone (though he names 'Maeon son of Haemon' in Il. iv. 394). Pindar speaks of burial given to all seven Argive armies (Ol. vi. 15; Nem. ix. 24; cf. Paus. ix. 18, 3) without exception. The first notice of burial refused is in Aesch. Th. 1017.

Antigōnēa and -ia (Ἀντιγόνηα, Ἀντιγοῖα). 1. (Tepecinā), a town in Epirus (Illyricum), at the junction of a tributary with the Aous, and near a narrow pass of the Acroceraunian mountains (Liv. xxxii. 5, xliii. 23).—2. A Macedonian town in Chalcidice.—3. See MANTINEA.—4. A town on the Orontes in Syria, founded by Antigonus as the capital of his empire B.C. 306, but most of its inhabitants were transferred by Seleucus to ANTIOCHIA, which was built in its neighbourhood (Strab. p. 750; Diod. xx. 47; Dio Cass. xl. 29; Liban. Antioch. p. 349).—5. A town in Bithynia, afterwards Nicaea.—6. A town in the Troas. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 2.]

Antigōnus (Ἀντιγόνος). 1. King of ASIA, surnamed the One-eyed (Lucian, Macrob. 11; Pol. v. 67), son of Philip of Elymiotis, and father of Demetrius Polioretēs by Stratonice. He was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and in the division of the empire after the death of the latter (B.C. 323), he received the provinces of the Greater Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia (Curt. x. 25, 2). On the death of the regent Antipater in 319, he aspired to the sovereignty of Asia. In 316 he defeated Eumenes and put him to death, after a struggle of nearly 3 years (Nep. Eum.; Plut. Eum.; Diod. xix. 43; EUMENES). From 315 to 311 he carried on war, with varying success, against Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus. By the peace made in 311, Antigonus was allowed to have the government of all Asia; but peace did not last more than a year. After the defeat of Ptolemy's fleet in 306, Antigonus assumed the title of king, and his example was followed by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus. In the same year Antigonus, hoping to crush Ptolemy, invaded Egypt, but was compelled to retreat. His son Demetrius Polioretēs carried on the war with success against Cassander in Greece, but he was compelled to return to Asia to the assistance of his father, against whom Cassander, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus had formed a fresh confederacy. Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated by Lysimachus at the decisive battle of Ipsus in Phrygia, in 301. Antigonus fell in the battle in the 81st year of his age (Diod. xx. 46–86; Plut. Demetr. 15–30; Just. xv. 2–4).—2. Gonatas, son of Demetrius Polioretēs, and grandson of the preceding. He assumed the title of king of Macedonia after his father's death in Asia, in B.C. 283, but he did not obtain possession of the throne till 277. He defeated an army of the Gauls (part of the reserves left by Brennus) B.C. 276 (Just. xxv. 2; cf. Diog. Laërt. ii. 140). He was driven out of his kingdom by Pyrrhus of Epirus in 273, but recovered it in the following year: he was again expelled by Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus, and again recovered his dominions. After a long war with Athens he besieged and took the city, and placed a Macedonian garrison in it, B.C. 263. He died in 239. He was succeeded by Demetrius II. His surname Gonatas is usually derived from Gonnos or Gonni in Thessaly; but some think that the name means having an iron plate protecting the knee. (Plut. Demetr. 51, Pyrrh. 26; Just. xxv. 1, xxv. 1–3; Polyb. xxii. 43 f., Lucian, Macrob. 11.)—3. Doson (so called because he was always about to give but never did), nephew of the preceding, son of Demetrius of Cyrene, and grandson of Demetrius Poliorcetes. On the death of Demetrius II. in B.C. 229, he was left guardian of his son Philip, but he married the widow of Demetrius, and became king of Macedonia himself. Aratus, by an unfortunate policy, called in the assistance of Antigonus against Sparta, and put him in possession of the Acrocorinthus. Antigonus defeated Cleomenes at Sellasia in 221, and took Sparta. On his return to Macedonia, he defeated the Illyrians, and died a few days afterwards, 220. (Polyb. ii. 45 f.; Just. xxviii. 3; Plut. Arat., Cleom.)—4. King of Judaea, son of Aristobulus II., was placed on the throne by the Parthians in B.C. 40, but was taken prisoner by Sosius, the lieutenant of Antony, and was put to death by the latter in 37 (Dio Cass. xlix. 22; Jos. B. J. i. 13).—5. Of Carystus, lived at Alexandria about B.C. 250, and wrote a work still extant, entitled Historiæ Mirabiles, which is only of value from its preserving extracts from other and better works.—Editions. By J. Beckmann, Lips. 1791; by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Bruns. 1839; Keller, 1377.

Antilibanus (Ἀντιλίβανος: Jebel-es-Sheikh or Anti-Lebanon), a mountain on the confines of Palestine, Phœnicia, and Syria, parallel to Libanus (Lebanon), which it exceeds in height. Its highest summit is M. Hermon (also Jebel-es-Sheikh). (Strab. p. 754; Ptol. v. 15.)

Antilochus (Ἀντίλοχος), son of Nestor and Anaxibia or Eurydice (Od. iii. 452), accompanied his father to Troy, and distinguished himself by his bravery. He was a favourite of Zeus and of Achilles (Il. xviii. 16, xxiii. 506, 607). He was slain before Troy by Memnon the Ethiopian; according to Pindar he had come to help his father, who was hard pressed by Memnon, and saved him at the cost of his own life (Od. iii. 111, iv. 188; Pind. Pyth. vi. 28; cf. Xen. Venat. i. 14), and was buried by the side of his friends Achilles and Patroclus (Od. xxiv. 72), and with them received honours of sacrifice in after times (Strab. p. 596). The grief of his father and of the whole army at his death is mentioned in Soph. Phil. 424; Hor. Od. ii. 9, 13; Q. Smyrn. iii. 516.

Antimachus (Ἀντίμαχος). 1. A Trojan, persuaded his countrymen not to surrender Helen to the Greeks. He had three sons, two of whom were put to death by Menelaus (Il. xi. 123, 128).—2. Of Claros or Colophon, a Greek epic and elegiac poet, was probably a native of Claros, but was called a Colophonian, because Claros belonged to Colophon (Clarius poeta, Ov. Trist. i. 6. 1). He flourished towards the end of the Peloponnesian war; his chief work was an epic poem of great length called Thebais (Θηβαίς). Antimachus was one of the fore-runners of the poets of the Alexandrine school, who wrote more for the learned than for the public at large. Though he seems to have been little regarded by writers nearer to his time, the Alexandrine grammarians assigned to him the second place among the epic poets, and the emperor Hadrian preferred his works even to those of Homer. (Dio Cass. lix. 4.) He also wrote a celebrated elegiac poem called Lyde—which was the name of his wife or mistress—as well as other works. There was likewise a tradition that he made a recension of the text of the Homeric poems, from which also he seems to have borrowed.—Fragments by Schellenberg, 1786; Bergk, 1866.

Antinöpolis (Ἀντινόου πόλις or Ἀντινόεια: Enseneh, Ru.), a splendid city, built by Hadrian, in memory of his favourite ANTINOUS, on the E.

bank of the Nile, upon the site of the ancient Besa, in Middle Egypt (Heptanomis). It was the capital of the Nomos Antinoïtes, and had an oracle of the goddess Besa. (Ptol. iv. 5, 61; Paus. viii. 9; Dio Cass. lix. 11.)

Antinöus (Ἀντίνοος). 1. Son of Eupithes of Ithaca, and one of the suitors of Penelope, was slain by Ulysses.—2. A youth of extraordinary beauty, born at Claudiopolis in Bithynia, was the favourite of the emperor Hadrian, and his companion in his journeys. He was drowned in the Nile, A.D. 122. This, as seems probable, was an act of suicide from melancholy; though some regarded it as caused by a superstition that the sacrifice of his life would avert evil from the emperor. The grief of the emperor knew no bounds. He enrolled Antinöus amongst the gods, caused a temple to be erected to him at Mantinæ, and founded the city of ANTINOOPOLIS in honour of him. Festivals in his honour were celebrated in Bithynia and at Athens, Argos, and Mantinea. A large number of works of art of all kinds were executed in his honour, and many of them are still extant. (Dio Cass. lix. 11; Spartian. Hadri. 14; Paus. viii. 9. 4.)

Antiochia and -cha (Ἀντιόχεια: Ἀντιοχείως and -cheios, fem. Ἀντιοχίς and -chissa, Antiochénus), the name of several cities of Asia, 16 of which are said to have been built by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his father Antiochus. 1. A. Epidaphnes, or ad Daphnem, or ad Orontem (Ἀ. ἐπὶ Δάφνη: so called from a neighbouring grove: Ἀ. ἐπὶ Ὀρόντη: Antakia, Ru.), the capital of the Greek kingdom of Syria, and long the chief city of Asia and perhaps of the world, stood on the left bank of the Orontes, about 20 miles (geog.) from the sea, in a beautiful valley, about 10 miles long and 5 or 6 broad, enclosed by the ranges of Amanus on the NW. and Casius on the SE. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, about B.C. 300, and peopled chiefly from the neighbouring city of ANTIGONIA. It flourished so rapidly as soon to need enlargement; and other additions were again made to it by Seleucus II. Callinicus (about B.C. 240), and Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (about B.C. 170). Hence it obtained the name of Tetrapolis (τετραπόλις, i.e. 4 cities). It had a considerable commerce, the Orontes being navigable up to the city, and the high road between Asia and Europe passing through it. Under the Romans

it was metropolis of the province and the residence of the proconsuls of Syria; it was favoured and visited by emperors; and was made a colonia with the Jus Italicum by Antoninus Pius. Though far inferior to Alexandria as a seat of learning, yet it derived some distinction in this respect from the teaching of Libanus and other sophists; and its eminence in art is attested by the beautiful gems and medals still found among its ruins. The annexed figure, representing the Genius of Antioch, was the work of Eutychides of Sicyon, a pupil of Lysippus. It represents Antioch as a female figure, seated on the rock Silpius and crowned with towers, with ears of corn in her hand, and with the river Orontes at her feet. This figure appears constantly on the later coins of Antioch.—Antioch was destroyed by the Persian king Chosroës (A.D. 540), but rebuilt by Justinian, who gave it the name of Thēūpolis (Θεοῦπόλις). The ancient walls, which still surround the insignificant modern town, are probably those built by Justinian. The name of Antiochia was also given to the surrounding district, i.e. the NW. part of Syria, which bordered upon Cilicia. (Strab. pp. 749-751; Tac. Hist. ii. 80; Procop. B. P. ii. 8; Liban. p. 321).—2. A. ad Maeandrum (Ἀ. πρὸς Μαίανδρῶ); nr. Yenishehr, Ru.), a city of Caria, on the Maeander, built by Antiochus I. Soter on the site of the old city of Pythopolis (Strab. p. 630).—3. A. Pisidiae or ad Pisidiam (Ἀ. Πισιδίας or πρὸς Πισιδίᾳ), a considerable city on the borders of Phrygia Parorcios and Pisidia; built by colonists from Magnesia; declared a free city by the Romans after their victory over Antiochus the Great (B.C. 189); made a colony under Augustus, and called Caesarea. It was celebrated for the worship and the great temple of Men Ascaenus (the Phrygian Moon-god), which the Romans suppressed. Its remains are still considerable, denoting a strong fortress of the Hellenistic type. It is thought that a semicircular rock-cutting marks the Phrygian temple. (Strab. p. 577).—4. A. Margiāna (Ἀ. Μαργιανή; Meru Shah-Jehan?), a city in the Persian province of Margiana, on the river Margus, founded by Alexander, and at first called Alexandria; destroyed by the barbarians, rebuilt by Antiochus I. Soter, and called Antiochia. It was beautifully situated, and was surrounded by a wall 70 stadia (about 8 miles) in circuit. Among the less important cities of the name were: (5.) A. ad Taurum in Commagene; this according to some is the modern Marash, which others with greater probability make the site of GERMANICIA; (6.) A. ad Cragum, and (7.) A. ad Pyramum, in Cilicia. The following Antiochs are better known by other names: A. ad Sarum [ADANA]; A. Characenes [CHARAX]; A. Callirhoe [EDESSE]; A. ad Hippum [GADARA]; A. Mygdoniae [NISIBIS]; in Cilicia [TARSUS]; in Caria or Lydia [TRALLES].

Antiochus (Ἀντίοχος). I. Kings of Syria.

1. Soter (reigned B.C. 280-261), was the son of Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Syrian kingdom of the Selencidae. He married his stepmother Stratonice, whom his father surrendered to him on the representation of the physician that it would restore him to health. He succeeded his father B.C. 280. He gained his surname from successful contest against the Gauls, but eventually fell in battle against them B.C. 261. (Just. xvii. 2; Plut. Demetr. 38, 39; Appian, Syr. 59-65).—2. Theos (B.C. 261-246), son and successor of No. 1. The Milesians gave him the surname of Theos, because he delivered them from their tyrant, Timarchus. He carried on war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, which was brought to a close by his putting away his wife Laodice, and marrying Bereuce, the daughter of Ptolemy. After the death of Ptolemy, he recalled Laodice, but, in revenge for the insult she had received, she caused Antiochus and Berenice to be murdered. During the reign of Antiochus, Arsaces founded the Parthian empire (250) and Theodotus established an independent kingdom at Bactria. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus. His younger son Antiochus Hierax also assumed the crown, and carried on war some years with his brother. [SELEUCUS II.] (Just. xxvii. 1; Val. Max. ix. 14; Athen. p. 45).—3. The Great (B.C. 223-187), second son of Seleucus Callinicus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, when he was only in his 15th year. After defeating (220) Molon, satrap of Media, and his brother Alexander, satrap of Persis, who had attempted to make themselves independent, he carried on war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, in order to obtain Coele-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, but was obliged to cede these provinces to Ptolemy, in consequence of his defeat at the battle of Raphia near Gaza, in 217. (Polyb. v. 82; Just. xxxi. 1.) He next marched against Achaenus, who had revolted in Asia Minor, and whom he put to death, when he fell into his hands in 214. [ACHAEUS.] Shortly after this he was engaged for 7 years (212-205) in an attempt to regain the E. provinces of Asia, which had revolted during the reign of Antiochus II.; but though he met with great success, he found it hopeless to effect the subjugation of the Parthian and Bactrian kingdoms, and accordingly concluded a peace with them. (Polyb. x. 27.) In 205 he renewed his war against Egypt with more success, and in 198 conquered Palestine and Coele-Syria, which he afterwards gave as a dowry with his daughter Cleopatra upon her marriage with Ptolemy Epiphanes. In 196 he crossed over into Europe, and took possession of the Thracian Chersonese. This brought him into contact with the Romans, who commanded him to restore the Chersonese to the Macedonian king; but he refused to comply with their demand; in which resolution he was strengthened by Hannibal, who arrived at his court in 195. Hannibal urged him to invade Italy without loss of time; but Antiochus did not follow his advice, and it was not till 192 that he crossed over into Greece, at the request of the Aetolian League, of which he was named general. (Polyb. xviii. 32, xx. i.; Liv. xxxiv. 60, xxxv. 45.) In 191 he was defeated by the Romans at Thermopylae, and compelled to return to Asia: his fleet was also vanquished in two engagements. In 190 he was again defeated Epimanes ('the madman') in parody of Epiphanes (Polyb. xxvi. 10).—5. Eupator (B.C. 164–162), son and successor of Epiphanes, was nine years old at his father's death, and reigned under the guardianship of Lysias. He was dethroned and put to death by Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had hitherto lived at Rome as a hostage. (Polyb. xxxi. 12; Just. xxxiv. 3.)—6. Theos or Dionysus Epiphanes, son of Alexander Balas. He was brought forward as a claimant to the crown in 144, against Demetrius Nicator by Tryphon, but he was murdered by the latter, who ascended the throne himself in 142 (Just

In order to raise the money to pay the Romans, he attacked a wealthy temple in Elymais, but was killed by the people of the place (187). He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopator. (Liv. xxxvii. 25–44; Polyb. xxi. 9–20; Just. xxxii. 2; Diod. xxix. 18.)—4. Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), son of Antiochus III., was given as a hostage to the Romans in 188, and was released from captivity in 175 through his brother Seleucus Philopator, whom he succeeded in the same year. He carried on war against Egypt from 171 to 168 with great success, in order to obtain Coele-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as a dowry with his sister, and he was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria in 168, when the Romans compelled him to retire. He endeavoured to root out the Jewish religion and to introduce the worship of the Greek divinities; but this attempt led to a rising of the Jewish people, under Mattathias and his heroic sons the Maccabees, which Antiochus was unable to put down. He died, B.C. 163, in the course of an unsuccessful campaign, at Tabae in Persia in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes. (Liv. xli.–xlv.; Polyb. xxvi.–xxxi.; Just. xxiv. 3; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5.) His subjects gave him the name of xxxvi. 1).—7. Sidetes (B.C. 137–128), so called from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, younger son of Demetrius Soter, dethroned Tryphon. He married Cleopatra, wife of his elder brother Demetrius Nicator, who was a prisoner with the Parthians. He carried on war against the Parthians, at first with success, but was afterwards defeated and slain in battle in 128. (Just. xxxviii. 10; Athen. 449, 540).—8. Grypus, or Hook-nosed (B.C. 125–96), second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. He was placed upon the throne in 125 by his mother Cleopatra, who put to death his eldest brother Seleucus, because she wished to have the power in her own hands. He poisoned his mother in 120, and subsequently carried on war for some years with his half-brother A. IX. Cyzicenus. At length, in 112, the two brothers agreed to share the kingdom between them, A. Cyzicenus having Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and A. Grypus the remainder of the provinces. Grypus was assassinated in 96. (Just. xxxix. 1–3; Liv. Ep. 60; Atheu. p. 540.)—9. Cyzicenus, from Cyzicus, where he was brought up, son of A. VII. Sidetes and Cleopatra, reigned over Coele-Syria and Phoenicia from 112 to 96, but fell in battle in 95 against Seleucus Epiphanes, son of A. VIII. Grypus (Appian, Syr. 69).—10. Eusebes, son of A. IX. Cyzicenus, defeated Seleucus Epiphanes, who had slain his father in battle, and maintained the throne against the brothers of Seleucus. He succeeded his father

Antiochus IX. in 95. (Appian, Syr. 69; Diod. xxxiv. 38.)—11. Epiphanes, son of A. VIII. Grypus and brother of Seleucus Epiphanes, carried on war against A. X. Eusebes, but was defeated by the latter, and drowned in the river Orontes (Appian, l.c.; Diod. l.c.).—12. Dionysus, brother of No. 11, held the crown for a short time, but fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabians. The Syrians, worn out with the civil broils of the Seleucidae, offered the kingdom to Tigranes, king of Armenia, who united Syria to his own dominions in 83, and held it till his defeat by the Romans in 69 (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15).—13. Asiaticus, son of A. X. Eusebes and Sclene (or Cleopatra) daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, became king of Syria on the defeat of Tigranes by Lucullus in 69; but he was deprived of it in 65 by Pompey, who reduced Syria to a Roman province. In this year the Seleucidae ceased to reign. (Appian, Syr. 49, 70; Cic. Verr. iv. 27, 61 ff.)

II. Kings of Commagene.

1. Son of Mithridates I. Callinicus, the stepson of Antiochus Epiphanes (above, No. 11). Made an alliance with the Romans, about B.C. 64. He assisted Pompey with troops in 49, had friendly communications with Cicero, then proconsul of Cilicia; was attacked by Antony in 38. He was succeeded by Mithridates II. about 31. (Dio Cass. xxxv. 2, xlix. 20; Appian, Mithr. 106; Cic. Fam. xv. 1, 2; Cass. B. C. iii. 5.)—2. Succeeded Mithridates II., and was put to death at Rome by Augustus in 29 (Dio Cass. lii. 43).—3. Succeeded No. 2, and died in A.D. 17. Upon his death, Commagene became a Roman province, and remained so till A.D. 38 (Tac. Ann. ii. 42, 56).—4. Surnamed EPIPHANES MAGNUS son of Antiochus III. received his paternal dominion from Caligula in A.D. 38. He was subsequently deposed by Caligula, but regained his kingdom on the accession of Claudius in 41. He was a faithful ally of the Romans, and assisted them in their wars against the Parthians under Nero, and against the Jews under Vespasian. At length in 72, he was accused of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, was deprived of his kingdom, and retired to Lacedaemon, where he passed the remainder of his life. His sons Epiphanes and Callinicus lived at Rome. (Dio Cass. lix. 8, lx. 8; Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, B. J. v. 11, vii. 7; Tac. Ann. xiii. 7.)

III. Literary.

1. Of Aegae in Cilicia, a sophist, or, as he himself pretended to be, a Cynic philosopher. He flourished about A.D. 200, during the reign of Severus and Caracalla. During the war of Caracalla against the Parthians, he deserted to the Parthians together with Tiridates. He was one of the most distinguished rhetoricians of his time, and also acquired some reputation as a writer.—2. Of Ascalon, the founder of the fifth Academy, was a friend of Lucullus and the teacher of Cicero during his studies at Athens (B.C. 79); but he had a school at Alexandria also, as well as in Syria, where he seems to have ended his life (B.C. 68). His principal teacher was Philo, who succeeded Plato, Arcesilas, and Carneades, as the founder of the fourth Academy. He is, however, better known as the adversary than the disciple of Philo; and Cicero mentions a treatise called Sosus, written by him against his master, in which he refutes the scepticism of the Academics (Acad. iv. 4, 11). He was in his own philosophy an Eclectic, seeking a middle course between Zeno, Aristotle, and Plato. He made truth rest upon authority whenever he could find points agreed upon by these philosophers, and laboured to show that they differed in expression rather than in essentials. (Cic. Acad. ii. 18, 43, &c.; de Fin. v. 25; Tusc. v. 8.)—3. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian, lived about B.C. 423, and wrote a history of Sicily in 9 books from the mythical Sicilian king Cocalus to his own date, to which it is not improbable that Thucydides was to some extent indebted in the beginning of book vi. He wrote also a history of the Greek colonies in Italy. (Diod. xii. 71; Dionys. i. 12; a few fragments in C. Müller's Frag. Hist. Graec.)

Antiōpē (Ἀντιόπη). 1. Daughter of Nycteus and Polyxo, or of the river god Asopus in Boeotia, became by Zeus the mother of Amphion and Zethus. Dionysus threw her into a state of madness on account of the vengeance which her sons had taken on Dirce. [AMPHION.] In this condition she wandered through Greece, until Phocus, the grandson of Sisyphus, cured and married her.—2. An Amazon, sister of Hippolyte, wife of Theseus, and mother of Hippolytus. [THESEUS.]

Antipater (Ἀντίπατρος). 1. The Macedonian, an officer greatly trusted by Philip and Alexander the Great, was left by the latter regent in Macedonia when he crossed over into Asia in B.C. 334. In this office he quelled the Thracians on one hand, and on the other suppressed the Spartan rising by a victory at Megalopolis (B.C. 330). In consequence of dissensions between Olympias and Antipater, the latter was summoned to Asia in 324, and Craterus appointed to the regency of Macedonia, but the death of Alexander in the following year prevented these arrangements from taking effect. Antipater now obtained Macedonia again, and in conjunction with Craterus, who was associated with him in the government, carried on war against the Greeks, who endeavoured to establish their independence. This war, usually called the Lamian war, from Lamia, where Antipater was besieged in 323, was terminated by Antipater's victory over the confederates at Crannon in 322. This was followed by the submission of Athens and the death of DEMOSTHENES. In 321 Antipater crossed over into Asia in order to oppose Perdiccas; but the murder of PERDICCAS in Egypt put an end to this war, and left Antipater supreme regent. Antipater died in 319, after appointing Pylsperchon regent, and his own son CASSANDER to a subordinate position. (Diod. xvii. xviii.; Just. xiii. 4-6.)—2. Grandson of the preceding, and second son of Cassander and Thessalonica. After the death of his elder brother Philip IV. (B.C. 295), great dissensions ensued between Antipater and his younger brother Alexander, for the kingdom of Macedonia. Antipater, believing that Alexander was favoured by his mother, put her to death. The younger brother upon this applied for aid at once to Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes. The remaining history is related differently: but so much is certain, that both Antipater and Alexander were subsequently put to death—Alexander by Demetrius and Antipater by Lysimachus (Just. xvi. 1, 2; Plut. Demetr.), and that Demetrius became king of Macedonia.—3. Father of Herod the Great, son of a noble Idumean of the same name, espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against his brother Aristobulus. He ingratiated himself with the Romans, and in B.C. 47 was appointed by Caesar procurator of Judaea, which appointment he held till his death in 43, when he was carried off by poison which Malichus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer to him. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 9; B. J. i. 10.)—

4. Eldest son of Herod the Great by his first wife, Doris, brought about the death of his two half-brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, in B.C. 6, but was himself condemned as guilty of a conspiracy against his father's life, and was executed five days before Herod's death. (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1; B. J. i. 28.)—5. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, the successor of Diogenes in the chair at Athens, and the teacher of Panaetius, about B.C. 144 (Cic. Off. iii. 12, 50; Div. i. 3, 6).

—6. Of Tyre, a Stoic philosopher, died shortly before B.C. 45, and wrote a work on Duties (de Officiis) (Cic. Off. ii. 24).—7. Of Cyrene, a pupil and follower of Aristippus (Diog. Laërt. ii. 96; Cic. Tusc. v. 38, 112).—8. Of Sidon, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B.C. 108–100, and lived to a great age.—9. Of Thessalonica, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the latter part of the reign of Augustus.

Antipater, L. Caelius, a Roman jurist and historian, and a contemporary of C. Gracchus (B.C. 123), and L. Crassus, the orator, wrote Annales, which were epitomised by Brutus, and which contained a valuable account of the second Punic war. He seems to have been honest and trustworthy, but too prone to rhetorical ornament. (Cic. Div. i. 24, 49, ad Att. xiii. 8; Liv. xxi. 46, xxvii. 27).

Antipatria (Ἀντιπάτρια: Berat?), a town in Illyricum on the borders of Macedonia, on the left bank of the Apsus (Liv. xxxi. 27).

Antiphānes (Ἀντιφάνης). 1. A comic poet, next to Alexis the most important, of the middle Attic comedy, born about B.C. 404, and died 330. He wrote 365, or at the least 260 plays (titles of 150 remain), which were distinguished by elegance of language. Probably many were recited, but not produced on the stage. (Fragments in Meineke.)—2. Of Berga in Thrace, a Greek writer on marvellous and incredible things (Strab. pp. 47, 102, 104; Polyb. xxxiii. 12).—3. An epigrammatic poet, several of whose epigrams are still extant in the Greek Anthology, lived about the reign of Augustus.

Antiphātes (Ἀντιφάτης), king of the mythical Laestrygonians in Sicily, represented as giants and cannibals. They destroyed 11 of the ships of Ulysses, who escaped with only one vessel (Od. x. 80; Ov. Met. x. 233; Juv. xiv. 20).

Antiphellus (Ἀντιφελλος: Antiphilo), a town on the coast of Lycia, between Patara and Aperlae, originally the port of PHELLUS (Strab. p. 666).

Antiphēmus (Ἀντιφήμος), the Rhodian, founder of Gela, in Sicily, B.C. 690.

Antiphilus (Ἀντιφίλος). 1. Of Byzantium, an epigrammatic poet, author of several excellent epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a contemporary of the emperor Nero.—2. Of Egypt, a distinguished painter, the rival of Apelles, painted for Philip and Alexander the Great (Quint. xii. 10; Plin. xxxv. § 114, 138).

Antiphon (Ἀντιφῶν). 1. The most ancient of the 10 orators in the Alexandrine canon, was a son of Sophilus the Sophist, and born at Rhamnus in Attica, in B.C. 480. He belonged to the oligarchical party at Athens, and took an active part in the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred (B.C. 411), after the overthrow of which he was brought to trial, condemned, and put to death. The oratorical powers of Antiphon are highly praised by the ancients. He introduced great improvements in public speaking, and was the first who laid down theoretical laws for practical eloquence; he opened a school in which he taught rhetoric, and the historian Thucydides is said to have been one of his pupils. The orations which he composed were written for others; and the only time that he spoke in public himself was when he was accused and condemned to death. This speech, which was considered in antiquity a masterpiece of eloquence, is now lost. (Thuc. viii. 68; Cic. Brut. 12.) We still possess 15 orations of Antiphon, 3 of which were written by him for others, and the remaining 12 as specimens for his school, or exercises on fictitious cases of trials for homicide. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators, and separately, edited by Baiter and Sauppe, Zürich, 1838; C. Muller, 1868.—2. A tragic poet, whom many writers confound with the Attic orator, lived at Syracuse, at the court of the elder Dionysius, by whom he was put to death (Arist. Rhet. ii. 6).—3. Of Athens, a sophist and an epic poet, wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams, referred to by Cicero and others. He is the same person as Antiphon an opponent of Socrates. (Xen. Mem. i. 6.)

Antiphus (Ἀντιφός). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, slain by Agamemnon (Il. iv. 489, xi. 101).—2. Son of Thessalus, and one of the Greek heroes at Troy (Il. ii. 676).

Antipolis (Ἀντιπολις: Antibes, pronounced by the inhabitants Antiboul), a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the coast, in the territory of the Deciates, a few miles W. of Nicaea, was founded by Massilia, and received Jus Latinum after B.C. 46; the muria, or salt pickle made of fish, prepared at this town, was very celebrated (Strab. pp. 180, 184; Tac. Hist. ii. 15; Mart. xiii. 103).

Antirrhium (Ἀντίρριον: Castello di Romelia), a promontory on the borders of Aetolia and Locris, opposite Rhium (Castello di Morea) in Achaia, with which it formed the narrow entrance of the Corinthian gulf: the straits are sometimes called the Little Dardanelles.

Antissa (Ἀντισσα: Ἀντισσαίος: Kalas Limneonas), a town in Lesbos with a harbour, on the W. coast between Methymna and the promontory Sigrium, was originally on a small island opposite Lesbos, which was afterwards united with Lesbos (Plin. ii. § 204; Ov. Met. xv. 287). It joined Mitylene in the revolt (Thuc. iii. 18, 28). It was destroyed by the Romans, B.C. 168, and its inhabitants removed to Methymna, because they had assisted Antiochus (Strab. p. 618; Liv. xlv. 31).

Antisthēnes (Ἀντισθένης). 1. An Athenian, founder of the sect of the Cynic philosophers. His mother was a Thracian. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (B.C. 426), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he never quitted, and at whose death he was present. He died at Athens, at the age of 70. Among his pupils were Crates of Thebes and Diogeus of Sinope. He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers; whence probably his followers were called Cynics (κυνικοί), though others derive their name from their dog-like neglect of all forms and usages of society. His writings have perished, except two declamations, named Ajax and Ulysses, about the arms of Achilles, the genuineness of which is disputed. He was an enemy to all speculation, and thus was opposed to Plato, whom he attacked furiously in one of his dialogues: in especial he denied ideas, and asserted that the individual alone existed. He paid little regard to art, learning, and scientific research. His philosophical system was confined almost entirely to ethics, and he taught that virtue is the sole thing necessary: and virtue consisted in complete independence of surroundings, in avoiding evil and having no needs. Hence it amounted to apathy. The later Cynics, such as Diogenes, sank to a lower depth both of ignorance and disregard of conventional morality. He showed his contempt of all the luxuries and outward comforts of life by his mean clothing and hard fare. From his school the Stoics subsequently sprang. In one of his works entitled Physicus, he contended for the Unity of the Deity (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 13, 32). Fragments edited by Winekelmann, 1842.—2. A Greek historian of Rhodes about B.C. 200 (Polyb. xvi. 14). Ed. by C. Müller in Frag. Hist. Graec.—3. A Spartan admiral mentioned in B.C. 412 and 399 (Thuc. viii. 39; Xen. Hell. iii. 2, 6).

Antistivs, P., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 88, a distinguished orator, supported the party of Sulla, and was put to death by order of young Marius in 82. His daughter Antistia was married to Pompeius Magnus (Cic. Brut. 63, 226, pro Rosc. Am. 32, 90; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Appian, B. C. i. 88). Others of this name are mentioned by Livy at various dates, of whose history nothing important is preserved.

Antistivs Labeo. [LABEO.]

Antistivs Vetus. [VETUS.]

Antitaurus (Ἀντίταυρος: Ali-Dagh), a chain of mountains, which strikes off NE. from the main chain of the Taurus on the S. border of Cappadocia, in the centre of which district it turns to the E. and runs parallel to the Taurus as far as the Euphrates. Its average height exceeds that of the Taurus; and one of its summits, Mouut Argaeus, near Mazaca, is the loftiest mountain of Asia Minor.

Antium (Antias: Torre or Porto d' Anzo), a very ancient town of Latium on a rocky promontory running out some distance into the Tyrrhenian sea. It was founded by Tyrrhenians and Pelasgians, and in earlier and even later times was noted for its piracy. Although united by Tarquinius Superbus to the Latin League, it generally sided with the Volscians against Rome (Liv. ii. 33, 63, 65; Dionys. iv. 49, vi. 92, ix. 58). It was taken by the Romans in B.C. 467, and was made a Latin colony (Liv. iii. 1; Dionys. ix. 59), but it revolted, was taken a second time by the Romans in B.C. 338, was deprived of all its ships—the beaks of which (rostra) served to ornament the platform of the speakers in the Roman forum—was forbidden to have any ships in future, and was made a Roman colony (Liv. vii. 27, viii. 12-14). But it gradually recovered its former importance, was allowed in course of time again to be used as a seaport, and in the latter times of the republic and under the empire, became a favourite residence of many of the Roman nobles and emperors. The emperor Nero was born here, and in the remains of his palace the celebrated Apollo Belvedere was found (Strab. p. 232; Cic. Att. ii. 1, 7, 11; Suet. Aug. 58, Ner. 6; Tac. Ann. xiv. 27, xv. 23). Antium possessed a celebrated temple of Fortune (O Diva, gratum quae regis Antium. Hor. Od. i. 35), of Aesculapius, and at the port of Ceno, a little to the

E. of Antium, a temple of Neptune, on which account the place is now called Nettuno.

Antiv Restio. [RESTIO.]

Antônia. 1. Major, elder daughter of M. Antonius and Octavia, wife of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and mother of Cn. Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero. Tacitus calls this Antonia the younger daughter. (Tac. Ann. iv. 44, xii. 64; Suet. Ner. 5; Plut. Ant. 87; cf. Dio Cass. li. 15).—2. Minor, younger sister of the preceding, wife of Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and mother of Germanicus, the father of the emperor Caligula, of Livia or Livilla, and of the emperor Claudius. She died A.D. 38, soon after the accession of her grandson Caligula. She was celebrated for her beauty and virtue (Plut. Ant. 87; Tac. Ann. xi. 3; Val. Max. iv. 3, 3).—3. Daughter of the emperor Claudius, married first to Pompeius Magnus, and afterwards to Faustus Sulla. Nero wished to marry her after the death of his wife Poppaea, A.D. 66; and on her refusal he caused her to be put to death on a charge of treason (Suet. Claud. 27, Ner. 35; Tac. Ann. xii. 2, xiii. 23, xv. 53; Dio Cass. lx. 5).

Antônia Turris, a castle on a rock at the NW. corner of the Temple at Jerusalem, which commanded both the temple and the city. It was at first called Baris: Herod the Great changed its name in honour of M. Antonius. It contained the residence of the Procurator Judaea.

Antônini Itineraria. There are two lists of stations on Roman roads and their distances bearing this name. The most probable account of them is that they are based on work done in the time of Antoninus Caracalla (A.D. 211-217) and that additions were made at various times to this groundwork. The recension which we now have belongs to the early part of the 4th century, for on the one hand it contains the town Diocletianopolis; on the other, distances are not reckoned from Constantinople.—Editions by Tobler, St. Gall, 1863; Parthey, 1848.

Antôninópolis (Ἀντωνινοπόλις: -της, ñnus), a city of Mesopotamia, between Edessa and Dara, aft. Maximianopolis, and aft. Constantia.

Antoninus, M. Aurelius. [M. AURELIUS.]

Antoninus Pius, Roman emperor, A.D. 138-161. His name in the early part of his life, at full length, was Titus Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Arrius Antoninus. These names probably imply inheritance from various relations. His father and grandfather, both of consular rank, both bore the names Aurelius Fulvius; his mother was an Arria, and he reckoned a Boionius also among his maternal ancestors. His paternal ancestors came from Nemausus (Nismes) in Gaul; but Antoninus himself was born near Lanuvium, September 19th, A.D. 86. From an early age he gave promise of his future worth. In 120 he was consul, and subsequently proconsul of the province of Asia: on his return to Rome he lived on terms of the greatest intimacy with Hadrian, who adopted him on February 25th, 138. Henceforward he bore the name of T. Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Caesar, and on the death of Hadrian, July 2nd, 138, he ascended the throne. The senate conferred upon him the title of Pius, or the dutifully affectionate, because he persuaded them to grant to his father Hadrian the apotheosis and the other honours usually paid to deceased emperors, which they had at first refused to bestow upon Hadrian. The reign of Antoninus is almost a blank in history—a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, violence, and crime. He was one of the best princes that ever mounted a throne, and all his thoughts and energies were dedicated to the happiness of his people. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, and various insurrections among the Germans, Dacians, Jews, Moors, Egyptians, and Britons, were easily quelled by his legates. The 'wall of Antonine' between the Clyde and the Forth was raised by the præfect Lollius Urbicus at this time. In all the relations of private life the character of Antoninus was without reproach. He was faithful to his wife Faustina, notwithstanding her profligate life, and after her death loaded her memory with honours. He died at Lorium, March 7th, 161, in his 75th year. He was succeeded by M.

Antoninus Pius, Roman Emperor, A.D. 138-161.
(The legend on the obverse, in full, is Antoninus Augustus Pius, Pater Patriae, Tribunitia Potestas, Consul III.)

Aurelius, whom he had adopted, when he himself was adopted by Hadrian, and to whom he gave his daughter FAUSTINA in marriage (Life in Scriptores Hist. August., usually attributed to Capitolinus, but by some assigned to Spartianus).

Antônînus Liberâlis, a Greek grammarian, probably lived in the reign of the Antonines, about A.D. 147, and wrote a work on Metamorphoses (Μεταμορφώσεων συναγωγή), in 41 chapters, which is extant, derived from ancient sources, and valuable for tracing variations of mythology.—Editions: by Verheyk, Lugd. Bat. 1774; by Koch, Lips. 1832; by Westermann, in his Paradozographi, Brunsv. 1839.

Antônîus. 1. M., the orator, born B.C. 143; quaestor in 113; praetor in 104, when he fought against the pirates in Cilicia; consul in 99; and censor in 97. He belonged to Sulla's party, and was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome in 87: his head was cut off and placed on the Rostra. Cicero mentions him and L. Crassus as the most distinguished orators of their age; and he is introduced as one of the speakers in Cicero's De Oratore.—2. M., surnamed CRETICUS, elder son of the orator, and father of the triumvir, was praetor in 75, and received the command of the fleet and all the coasts of the Mediterranean, in order to clear the sea of pirates; but he did not succeed in his object, and used his power to plunder the provinces. He died shortly afterwards in Crete, and was called Creticus in derision (Plut. Ant. 1; Diod. xl. 1).—3. C., younger son of the orator, and uncle of the triumvir, was expelled the senate in 70 for extortion; but afterwards was the colleague of Cicero in the praetorship (65) and consulship (63). He was one of Catiline's conspirators, but deserted the latter on Cicero's promising him the province of Macedonia. He had to lead an army against Catiline, but unwilling to fight against his former friend, he gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. At the conclusion of the war Antonius went into his province, which he plundered shamefully; and on his return to Rome in 59 was accused both of taking part in Catiline's conspiracy and of extortion in his province. He was defended by Cicero, but was condemned, and retired to the island of Cephallenia. He was subsequently recalled, probably by Caesar, and was in Rome at the beginning of 44 (Cic. Clu. 42, Cat. iii. 6, Cacl. 31, Flacc. 38; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 40, xxxviii. 10). He was surnamed Hybrida, possibly as being semiferus (Plin. viii. 213).—4. M., the Triumvir, was son of No. 2 and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Caesar, consul in 64, and was born about 83. His father died while he was still young, and he was brought up by Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators: whence he became a personal enemy of Cicero. Antony indulged in his earliest youth in every kind of dissipation, and his affairs soon became deeply involved. In 58 he went to Syria, where he served with distinction under A. Gabinius. He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (57, 56), and in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt in 55. In 54 he went to Caesar in Gaul, and by the influence of the latter was elected quaestor. As quaestor (52) he returned to Gaul, and served under Caesar for the next two years (52, 51). He returned to Rome in 50, and became one of the most active partisans of Caesar. He was tribune of the plebs in 49, and in January fled to Caesar's camp in Cisalpine Gaul (with another tribune, Q. Cassius Longinus), after putting a veto upon the decree of the senate which deprived Caesar of his command. He accompanied Caesar in his victorious march into Italy, and was left by Caesar in the command of Italy, while the latter carried on the war in Spain. In 48 Antony brought the troops left in Italy to join Caesar in Epirus, after several delays, for which he was rebuked, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, where he commanded the left wing; and in 47 he was again left in the command of Italy during Caesar's absence in Africa. In 44 he was consul with Caesar, when he offered him the kingly diadem at the festival of the Lupercalia. After Caesar's murder on the 15th of March, Antony endeavoured to succeed to his power. He therefore used every means to appear as his representative; as surviving consul he pronounced the speech over Caesar's body and read his will to the people; and he also obtained the papers and private property of Caesar. But he found a new and unexpected rival in young Octavianus, the adopted son and great-nephew of the dictator, who came from Apollonia to Rome, assumed the name of Caesar, and at first joined the senate in order to crush Antony. Towards the end of the year Antony proceeded to Cisalpine Gaul, which had been previously granted him by the senate; but Dec. Brutus refused to surrender the province to Antony and threw himself into Mutina, where he was besieged by Antony. The senate approved of the conduct of Brutus, declared Antony a public enemy, and entrusted the conduct of the war against him to Octavianus. Antony was defeated at the battle of Mutina, in April 43, and was obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consuls, however, had fallen, and the senate now began to show their jealousy of Octavianus. Meantime Antony was joined by Lepidus with a powerful army: Octavianus became reconciled to Antony; and it was agreed that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Octavianus, and Lepidus, under the title of Triumviri Reipublicae Constituendae, for the next 5 years. The mutual enemies of each were proscribed, and in the numerous executions that followed, Cicero, who had attacked Antony in the most unmeasured manner in his Philippic Orations, fell a victim to Antony. In 42 Antony and Octavianus crushed the republican party by the battle of Philippi, in which Brutus and Cassius fell. Antony then went to Asia, which he had received as his share of the Roman world. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra, and followed her to Egypt, a captive to her charms. In 41 Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and his brother L. Antonius, made war upon Octavianus in Italy. Antony prepared to support his relatives, but the war was brought to a close at the beginning of 40, before Antony could reach Italy. The opportune death of Fulvia facilitated the reconciliation of Antony and Octavianus, which was cemented by Antony marrying Octavia, the sister of Octavianus. Antony remained in Italy till 39, when the triumvirs concluded a peace gaged in war against Octavianus at the instigation of Fulvia, his brother's wife. He was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into the town of Perusia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year: hence the war is usually called that of Perusia. His life was spared, and he was afterwards appointed by Octavianus to the command of Iberia. His character is painted by Cicero in dark colours, perhaps with some exaggeration (Cic. Phil. iii. 12, v. 7, 11, xii. 8; Appian, B. C. v. 19-49).—7. M., called by the Greek writers Antyllus—which is probably only a corrupt form of Antonillus (young Antonius)—elder son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was executed by order of Octavianus, after the death of his father in 30 (Suet. Aug. 63; Plut. Ant. 81).—8. Julus, younger son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was brought up by his stepmother Octavia at Rome, and received great marks of favour from Augustus. Horace notices him as a poet (Od. iv. 2). He was consul in B.C. 10, but was put to death in 2, in consequence of his adulterous intercourse with Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Dio Cass. liv. 36, lv. 10; Tac. Ann. iv. 44; Vell. Pat. ii. 100).

with Sext. Pompey, and he afterwards went to his provinces in the East. In this year and the following Ventidius, the lieutenant of Antony, defeated the Parthians. In 37 Antony crossed over to Italy, when the triumvirate was renewed for 5 years. He then returned to the East, and shortly afterwards sent Octavia back to her brother, and surrendered himself entirely to the charms of Cleopatra. In 36 he invaded Parthia, but he lost a great number of his troops, and was obliged to retreat. He was more successful in his invasion of Armenia in 34, for he obtained possession of Artavasdes, the Armenian king, and carried him to Alexandria. Antony now laid aside entirely the character of a Roman citizen, and assumed the pomp and ceremony of an Eastern despot. His conduct, and the unbounded influence which Cleopatra had acquired over him, alienated many of his friends and supporters; and Octavianus thought that the time had now come for crushing his rival. The contest was decided by the memorable sea-fight off Actium, September 2nd, 31, in which Antony's fleet was completely defeated. Antony, accompanied by Cleopatra, fled to Alexandria, where he put an end to his own life in the following year (30), when Octavianus appeared before the city. (See Plut. Ant.; index to Cicero; Appian. B. C. iii., iv.; Dio Cass. xlv. ff.).—5. C., brother of the triumvir, was praetor in Macedonia in 44, fell into the hands of M. Brutus in 43, by whom he was put to death in 42, to revenge the murder of Cicero (Plut. Brut. 28; Dio Cass. xlvii. 23).—6. L., youngest brother of the triumvir, was consul in 41, when he triumphed for success over some Alpine tribes, and in the following winter en-

Antro (Ἀντρον: Fano), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Maliacus (Il. ii. 697; Strab. p. 435).
Antunnacum (Andernach), a town of the Ubii on the Rhine (Amm. Marc. xviii. 2).
Anūbis (Ἄνουβις), an Egyptian divinity (the Egyptian Anpu), the ruler of the dead. He watched over the rites of embalming, and conducted the dead in their course to the western realm of shades. In the Osiris myths he is subordinate to Osiris, and is represented as his son by Nephthys, and he is supposed, together with Horus, or Thoth, to weigh the actions of the dead in their judgment before Osiris, besides acting as their guide. Hence of course followed his identification with Hermes (Hermanubis). He was figured with the head of a jackal, because that animal, as haunting the graves, seemed the incarnation of the dead. The Romans imagined him with a dog's head (Plut. de Is.; Verg. Aen. viii. 698; Ov. Met. ix. 690; Prop. iii. 9. 41; Juv. xv. 8; Dionys. i. 18, 87; Strab. p. 805). His worship, with that of Isis and Serapis, was introduced both at Rome and in Greece, under the emperors.

Anubis. (Wilkinson's Egyptians.)

Anxur. [TARRACINA.]

Anxūrus, an Italian divinity, who was worshipped in a grove near Anxur (Tarracina) together with Feronia. He was regarded as a youthful Jupiter, and Feronia as Juno. On coins his name appears as Axur or Anxur.

Anysis (Ἄνυσις), according to Herodotus ii. 137, an ancient blind king of Egypt, in whose reign Egypt was invaded by the Ethiopians under their king Sahaco. He is supposed to come from a city Anysis, and to take refuge from the invaders in the marshes for 50 years, during which he increased his island by making mulefactors add earth to it by way of penalty. It is clear that Herodotus has misinterpreted his information, whether it was about the city or the man. He makes Anysis succeed Asykis (= Aseskaf or Shepseskaf), who reigned in the fourth dynasty, about B.C. 3600, nearly 3000 years before Sabaco.

Anÿtē (Ἀνÿτή), of Tegea, the authoress of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B.C. 700.—Edition. Kinkel, 1877.

Anÿtus (Ἄνυτος), a wealthy Athenian, son of Anthemion, the most influential and formidable of the accusers of Socrates, B.C. 399 (hence Socrates is called Anÿtē reus, Hor. Sat. ii. 4. 3). He was a leading man of the democratical party, and had taken an active part, along with Thrasybulus, in the overthrow of the 30 Tyrants. The Athenians, having repented of their condemnation of Socrates, sent Anÿtus into banishment to Heraclea in Pontus (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, 42).

Aōn (Ἄων), son of Poseidon, and an ancient Boeotian hero, from whom the Aones, an ancient race in Boeotia, were believed to have derived their name (Strab. pp. 401, 412; Paus. ix. 5). Aōnia was the name of the part of Boeotia, near Phocis, in which were Mount Helicon and the fountain Aganippe (Aoniae aquae, Ov. Fast. iii. 456). The Muses are also called Aonides, since they frequented Helicon and the fountain of Aganippe (Ov. Met. v. 333).

Aōnides. [AON.]

Aornus. 1. A rocky stronghold in the country between Cabul and the Indus, captured with difficulty by Alexander. It was said to rise to a height of more than 7,000 feet (Arrian, An. iv. 28; Curt. viii. 11; Strab. p. 688).—2. A lake in Thesprotian Epirus, where there was a κεκομαρτεῖον, or oracle of the dead, visited by Orpheus (Paus. ix. 30, 6). It is not clear whether this is another name for Lake Acherusia, or, rather, for the spot on its banks where the oracle stood, or whether it is a neighbouring lake (cf. Hdt. v. 92, 7; Diod. iv. 22; ACHERUSIA).

Aorsi (Ἀορσοί) or Adorsi, a powerful people of Asiatic Sarmatia, who appear to have had their original settlements on the N.E. of the Caspian, but are chiefly found between the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azof) and the Caspian, to the S.E. of the river Tanaïs (Don), whence they spread far into European Sarmatia. They carried on a considerable traffic in Babylonian merchandise, which they fetched on camels out of Media and Armenia (Strab. pp. 492, 506; Tac. Ann. xii. 15).

Aōus or Aeas (Ἄφος or Ἄϊας: Viosa, Viussa, or Voussa), the principal river of the Greek part of Illyricum, rises in M. Lacmon, the N. part of Pindus, and flows into the Ionian sea near Apollonia.

Apāmēa or -īa (Ἀπάμεια: Ἀπαμειεύς, Ἀπαμειεύς, -ēnus, -ensis), the name of several Asiatic cities, some of which were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his wife

Apama. 1. A. ad Orontem (Famieh), the capital of the Syrian province Apamene, and, under the Romans, of Syria Secunda, was built by Seleucus Nicator on the site of the older city of PELLA, in a very strong position on the river Orontes or Axius, the citadel being on the left (W.) bank of the river, and the city on the right. It was surrounded by rich pastures, in which Seleucus kept a splendid stud of horses and 500 elephants (Strab. p. 752). As Famieh it was occupied by Tancred in the Crusades.—2. In Osroēne in Mesopotamia (Balāsir), a town built by Seleucus Nicator on the E. bank of the Euphrates, opposite to ZEUGMA, with which it was connected by a bridge, commanded by a castle, called Seleucia.—3. A. Cibōtus or ad Maeandrum (Ἄ. ἡ Κιβωτός, or πρὸς Μαλαῖδρον), a great city of Phrygia, on the Maeander, close above its confluence with the Marsyas. It was built on a site easy of access, yet defensible, by Antiochus I. Soter, who named it in honour of his mother Apama, and peopled it with the inhabitants of the neighbouring Celaenae. It became one of the greatest cities of Asia west of the Euphrates, and under the Romans it was the seat of a Conventus Juridicus. Standing at a junction of several Roman roads, it had a great commerce, until the change of roads under the Byzantine system, after the end of the 4th century A.D., caused it to decline in prosperity. The great routes from Constantinople and Nicomedia did not pass through Apamea, and the older Roman routes had lost their importance. The surrounding country, watered by the Maeander and its tributaries, was called Apamēna Regio.—4. A. Myrlēon, in Bithynia. [MYRLEA.]

Apelles (Ἀπελλῆς), one of the most celebrated of Grecian painters, son of Pythras, was born, most probably, at Colophon in Ionia. He studied first at Ephesus under Ephorus; then at Sicyon under Pamphilus. Thence he went to Pella and became the court painter to Philip and Alexander from B.C. 336 onwards. When Alexander set out for Asia Apelles returned to Ephesus, and lived both there and at Rhodes, the home of Protogenes, his greatest contemporary. Being driven by a storm to Alexandria, after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy (B.C. 306), whose favour he had not gained while he was with Alexander, his rivals laid a plot to ruin him, which he defeated by an ingenious use of his skill in drawing. We are not told when or where he died. Throughout his life Apelles laboured to improve himself, especially in drawing, which he never spent a day without practising. Hence the proverb Nulla dies sine linea. This and other sayings attributed to him, whether genuine or not, indicate his fame as an authority. A list of his works is given by Pliny. They are for the most part single figures, or groups of a very few figures. Of his portraits the most celebrated was that of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt, painted for the temple of Artemis at Ephesus; but the most admired of all his pictures was the

'Venus Anadyomene' (ἡ ἀναδυομένη Ἀφροδίτη), or Aphrodite rising out of the sea, painted for a temple at Cos, and placed in the temple of Caesar at Rome by Augustus, who remitted a tribute of 100 talents to the Coans as equivalent value. There can be no doubt that Apelles stands at the head of painters of the Hellenistic period. His work was chiefly portraiture—it was said that Alexander would sit to no other painter—and therefore it is possible that earlier painters such as Polygnotus or Zeuxis may have surpassed him in composition; but Apelles was probably the greatest Greek painter in technique, and brought colouring to a perfection unequalled in Greek art. (Plin. xxxv. 79–100; Dict. Ant. s.v. Pictura.)

Apellicon (Ἀπελλικῶν), of Teos, a Peripatetic philosopher and great collector of books. His valuable library at Athens, containing the autographs of Aristotle's works (which Apellicon is said to have discovered hidden in a cellar: Strab. p. 609; Plut. Sull. 26), was carried to Rome by Sulla (b.c. 88): Apellicon had died just before.

Apenninus Mons (δ' Ἀπέννινος and τὸ Ἀπέννινον ὄρος, probably from the Celtic Pen 'a height'), the Apennines, a chain of mountains which runs throughout Italy from N. to S., and forms the backbone of the peninsula. It is a continuation of the Maritime Alps [ALPES], begins near Genua and ends at the Sicilian sea, and throughout its whole course sends off numerous branches in all directions. It rises to its greatest height in the country of the Sabines, where one of its points (now Monte Corno, or Gran Sasso d' Italia) is 9521 feet above the sea; and further S., at the boundaries of Samnium, Apulia, and Lucania, it divides into two main branches, one of which runs E. through Apulia and Calabria, and terminates at the Salentine promontory, and the other W. through Brutium, terminating apparently at Rhegium and the straits of Messina, but in reality continued throughout Sicily. The greater part of the Apennines is composed of limestone, abounding in numerous caverns and recesses, which in ancient as well as in more recent times were the resort of numerous robbers: the highest points of the mountains are covered with snow, even during most of the summer (nivuli vertice se attollens Apenninus, Verg. Aen. xii. 703). For a general description see Polyb. ii. 16, iii. 110; Strab. pp. 128, 211; for the storms of the Apennines, Liv. xxi. 58.

M. Aper, a Roman orator and a native of Gaul, rose by his eloquence to the rank of quaestor, tribune, and praetor, successively. He is one of the speakers in the Dialogue de Oratoribus attributed to Tacitus.

Aper, Arrius, praetorian prefect, and son-in-law of the emperor Numerian, whom he was said to have murdered: he was himself put to death by Diocletian on his accession in A.D. 284.

Aperantia, a town and district of Aetolia near the Achelous, inhabited by the Aperantii (Polyb. xxii. 8; Liv. xxxviii. 3).

Aperlae (Ἀπερλαι: on a coin the inscr. is Ἀπερλαειτῶν), a town in Lycia a few miles west of Simena. It formed with three others, Simena, Apollonia and Isinda, a single δήμος or district with a common βουλή (Waddington, 1292, 1296). In later times it was the seat of a bishopric including the above towns. The inscriptions show the true spelling in Plin. v. 100.

Aperōpia, a small island off the prom. Buporthmus in Argolis (Paus. ii. 34, 9; Plin. iv. 56).

Apēsas (Ἀπέσας: Phuka?), a mountain on the borders of Phliasia and Argolis, with a temple of Zeus, who was hence called Apesantius, and to whom Percus here first sacrificed.

Aphāca (τὰ Ἀφακα: Afta?), a town of Coele-Syria, between Heliopolis and Byblus, celebrated for the worship of Aphrodite Aphacitis.

Aphāreus (Ἀφαρεύς). 1. Son of the Messenian king Perieres, and founder of the town of Arene in Messenia, which he called after his wife. Lycus, son of Pandion, took refuge there and initiated Aphareus in the mysteries (Paus. iii. 1, iv. 2, 4.) He was buried at Sparta (Paus. iii. 11, 11; Theoc. xxii. 141). His two sons Idas and Lynceus, the Apharetidae (Apharētia proles, Ov. Met. viii. 304), are celebrated for their fight with the Dioscuri, which is described by Pindar (Nem. x. 111).—2. An Athenian orator and tragic poet, flourished b.c. 369–342. After the death of his father, his mother married the orator Isocrates, who adopted Aphareus as his son. He wrote 35 or 37 tragedies, and gained 4 prizes. (Plut. Vit. X. Or. 839.)

Aphētai (Ἀφῆται and Ἀφεταί: Ἀφεταῖος), a seaport and promontory of Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Maliacus, from which the ship Argo is said to have sailed (Hdt. vii. 193, 196, viii. 4; Strab. p. 436; Ap. Rh. i. 591).

Aphidas (Ἀφείδας), son of Arcas, obtained from his father Tegea and the surrounding territory. He had a son, Aleus.

Aphidna (Ἀφιδνα and Ἀφιδναί: Ἀφιδναῖος), an Attic demus not far from Decelea, originally belonged to the tribe Aeantis, afterwards to Leontis, and last to Hadrianis. It was one of the 12 towns and districts into which Cecrops is said to have divided Attica; in it Theseus concealed Helen, but her brothers Castor and Pollux took the place and rescued their sister. (Hdt. ix. 73; Plut. Thes. 32; Paus. i. 17, 6.)

Aphrōdisias (Ἀφροδισίας: Ἀφροδισιεύς: Aphrodisiensis), the name of several places famous for the worship of Aphrodite. 1 A. Cariae (Gheira, Ru.), on the site of an old town of the Leleges, named Ninōē: under the Romans a civitas foederata et libera, with immunity from taxation, and independence of local government secured by ancient treaty. It was the chief town of Caria under Diocletian. (Strab. p. 576; Plin. v. 109; Tac. Ann. iii. 62; C. I. G. 2737; C. I. L. iii. 449).—2. Veneris Oppidum, a town on the coast of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus (Liv. xxxiii. 20).—3. A town, harbour, and island, on the coast of Cyrenaica in N. Africa.—4. See GADES.

Aphrōditē (Ἀφροδίτη), the Greek goddess of beauty and love, and of fruitful increase, whether of animal or vegetable life, worshipped by the Romans as Venus. In the Iliad (though apparently in the later portions only) she is called the daughter of Zeus and Dione: another myth represented her as sprung from the foam of the sea [see URANUS]. She was wedded to Hephaestus. For the myths of her relations to others, and of her children, see ARES, DIONYSUS, HERMES, POSEIDON, EROS, ANCHISES, ADONIS, CINYRAS, BUTES. In the Homeric poems she took the side of the Trojans, interfering to protect Paris and Aeneas, and to save from defilement the body of Hector (Il. iii. 380, v. 311, xxiii. 185). [See also under PARIS and VENUS.]

Eastern Origin.—The myths of Aphrodite as presented in Greek literature result from a mixture of Greek and Oriental (chiefly Semitic) mythology. Many Eastern nations worshipped a deity who was at once the goddess of fruitfulness and generation and also of the moon or of the star Venus. Such was the Babylonish

Belit (the feminine of Baal), who appears in Herodotus i. 196, 199 as Mylitta; the Assyrian Ishtar (who was also to the Chaldeans the star Venus), the Phoenician Astarte or Ashtoreth, and the Syrian Atargates. This goddess, under her various names, was in each case the supreme deity of the female sex, whence probably it arose that she was regarded as the giver of all fruitful increase. But a leading idea in her worship was that (perhaps as being, so to speak, Queen of Heaven) she was the goddess of the moou (see Hdt. i. 105; Strab. p. 807; Lucian, de Dea Syr. 4, 32; Herodian, v. 6, 10), for which reason some prefer to derive her worship as the goddess of fruitfulness from the idea that the moon was connected with menstruation, and, moreover, was supposed to control the dew which gave fertility to plants. The latter idea is traced in the story of the dew sent by Aphrodite to her altar at Eryx (Ael. D. N. A. x. 50; cf. Tac. Hist. ii. 3; Pervig. Ven. ii. 15). This worship of natural increase was degraded in the East to rites such as those of Mylitta described by Herodotus, a degradation which pervaded generally the worship of Astarte, and was transferred to some Greek temples, such as those at Corinth and Eryx. The animals and plants sacred in the worship of the Oriental, as of the Greek, deity were symbolical of fertility—the ram, the goat, the deer, the partridge, the purple mussel and various fish, the myrtle and cyprus. Again, perhaps alike from the influence of the moon upon the sea, and also from the dependence of mariners upon the stars, arose the connexion of the Eastern deity with the sea; and the fact that the goddess Derceto (Atargates), worshipped at Hieropolis (Bambyce), at Ascalon, and at other places in Syria, was represented as a goddess of fish, may be explained as due either to this connexion with the sea or to the idea that fish represented abundance and fruitfulness. Another very noticeable characteristic is the descent of this deity into the underworld of the dead, an idea which may be connected with the waning of the moon, but more probably with the death of vegetation in winter. In the celebrated myth of Ishtar there are many points of resemblance to the story of Persephone. Lastly, it should be observed that Astarte was an armed goddess, in Phoenicia, at Babylou, and at Carthage sometimes represented with a spear and a bow. Whether we are to regard this idea as suggested by the moonbeams, or, more simply, as showing the power of the nature-goddess to punish those who neglect her, the same is traceable in the Greek Aphrodite.

Origin in Greece.—The above are the characteristics which the Greeks seem to have borrowed from Eastern religions and eugrafted on their own. In the Homeric age Aphrodite was accepted as a genuine Greek deity, yet traces of Eastern origin remained in the names Κύπρις, Παφία, Κυθήρεια in the Iliad, and Κυπρογενής in Hesiod. It is clear that under these names lies the truth that the Phoenicians established this worship, or a part of it, in the islands of Cyprus and Cythera, where they planted trading stations, especially for the trade in the purple mussel, and that it spread thence to Greece, as it also passed from Carthage to Eryx in Sicily. [It has, however, been observed that all the passages in the Iliad and Odyssey, where Aphrodite is represented either as a daughter of Zeus and Dione, or as named from Cyprus and Cythera, belong to the latest portions of those poems, and hence it is deduced that the oldest Homeric poems know nothing of the origin of the deity.] In Greek myths the connexion of the goddess with the moon, as a recognised attribute, disappears, because the Greeks already connected with the moon the names Hecate, Selene, and Artemis, and also because it was not her main characteristic; yet it survives in the terms Οὐρανία (see below), 'regina siderum,' and in the star Venus; it has, moreover, been pointed out that the Greek name Artemis has, possibly from this confusion, been given to the goddess of generation whom the old, non-Semitic, Babylonians worshipped as Nanai. If, however, the connexion with the moon has almost vanished, the main attribute of power over all fruitfulness and offspring, whether of the animal or of the vegetable world, belongs to Aphrodite through all Greek literature, and to Venus in Roman writers. It is only necessary to cite, among many passages, Hom. Il. v. 430, Hymn. ad Aphr. 3, 69; Hes. Th. 200; Eur. Hipp. 477; Lucret. i. 1; Hor. Od. i. 4; Pervigil. Ven.

Aphrodite and Eros. (Causel, Museum Romanum, vol. 1, tav. 40.)

Hence Aphrodite was attended by the Horae (Paus. v. 15, 3); hence she was the goddess of gardens (cf. Strab. p. 343), called ἱερόκηπος, worshipped in the 'gardens' at Athens, where stood the noted statue by Alcamenes (Paus. i. 19, 2; Plin. xxxvi. 16), and in the marsh or ἐν καλάμοις, as suggesting rich growth of vegetation (Athen. p. 572); hence also the animals sacred to Aphrodite were usually, as in the East above noticed, those which were regarded as specially prolific—the ram, the goat, the rabbit, the hare, the deer, the partridge, the sparrow: similarly the myrtle, the cypripis, and the pomegranate are stated by Pliny to produce fertility (xxii. 107, 160, xxiv. 14, xxviii. 102). [For the degradation—increased, no doubt, if not originated, by Eastern influence—of this form of worship to a patronage of Hetaerae and the services of the ιερόδουλοι (Venered) in certain temples, see Strab. pp. 272, 378, 745; Cic. Div. in Caec. 17, 55.]

Aphrodite issuing from the sea, and received by Eros. (From a silver relief. Gazette Arch. 1879.)

Her connexion with the sea is traced in Hes. Th. 188 in the story of her birth from the mutilation of Uranus (Hesiod making her drift to Cyprus eastward from Cythera instead of westward from Syria); so also in Plat. Crat. 406 c. It is also preserved in the epithets ἀναδυομένη, ἀφρογενής, θαλασσία, ποντία, πελαγία, εὐπλοία, γαληναία: in the special regard paid by mariners, and in the choice of the dolphin as sacred to her. Aphrodite, like her Eastern counterpart, is in some degree connected with the underworld: the traces of this appear in the statue at Delphi to an Ἀφροδ. ἐπιτυμβία (Plut. Q. R. 23); in the grave of Aphrodite-Ariadne at Naxos and at Amathus [ARIADNE], and in the myth of ADONIS. It is preferable to see in this the death of vegetation in winter rather than the phases of the moon. Lastly, for the armed Aphrodite who can revenge breaches of the laws of natural production (cf. Hom. Il. iii. 413) we have the epithet ἔγχειος (Hesych.), ἐνόπιος (C. I. G. 1444), and the armed statues at Cythera, Corinth, Epidaurus, and Sparta (Paus. ii. 5, 1, ii. 27, 4, iii. 15, 8, iii. 23, 1).

All the above characteristics seem to be borrowed from the East, though the theory cannot be positively rejected that many of them at least may have grown up in Greece itself as the genuine attributes of a goddess of natural powers, therefore called γενετολλίς and κουροτρόφος. At any rate it must be recognised that we can trace an earlier Greek goddess to whom such characteristics as were Oriental were transferred because she was through some likeness identified with the deity of Oriental religions. In the Aphrodite daughter of Zeus and Dione, as she appears to us in Homer and Sappho, we see a deity who was mainly a Greek conception. There was assuredly always a deity of love and birth for the Greeks, a power ruling over mortals and immortals alike, and therefore 'the oldest of the Fates' (Paus. i. 19, 2). The original of the daughter of Zeus and Dione (= Juno) may, as some think, have been Hebe, who remains as the goddess of Youth, while her chief powers have passed to Aphrodite. Again, in the stories of the marriage of Hephaestus with Aphrodite; and also with Charis—a legend probably starting from Lemnos—may lurk the truth that Aphrodite, as goddess of love and beauty, has taken the place of a Greek deity Charis.

It remains to notice the distinction in Greek literature and art between Ἀφροδίτη Οὐρανία and Ἀφροδίτη Πάνδημος. There can be little doubt that the familiar distinction in philosophers was a later conception. Originally Ἀφροδίτη Οὐρανία was the Queen of the Heavens, equivalent to that Eastern goddess who ruled the moon and stars, who guided the mariners, and who ruled the sea. She is represented in Greek art seated on a flying swan (also on a globe, or standing on a tortoise), sometimes with a star-spangled sky as background. A stèle found at Kertsch is dedicated to Ἀφροδίτη Οὐρανία, who rules the Bosphorus.' On the other hand, Ἀφροδίτη Πάνδημος (who is represented riding on a goat) was no less recognised as an honoured deity in the state cult, nor was her worship committed to priestesses of low repute; she is called σεμνή, and her priestess in one inscription is specially stated to be a married woman and not a courtesan. The probability is that she represents the original goddess of love worshipped in Greece, and that the statement of Pausanias that she was so called when the demes of Attica were united, should be accepted. It was a later idea of philosophers and moralists to give to οὐρανία the sense of ennobling, and to πάνδημος of debasing, love, and again to make the former the patroness of the lawfully married, the latter of courtesans (see Plat. Symp. 180, 181; Paus. vi. 25, 2, ix. 16, 2; Theocr. Epig. 13). In art the nude statues are the later development, the weaker types of ordinary feminine beauty being later than the stronger; the more archaic statues were fully clothed, the earliest of all probably ending in a quadrangular base, such as that at Delos, which Pausanias (ix. 40) calls the work of Daedalus. Of the numerous nude statues of Aphrodite, three of the most famous are here given. The first is an original statue found at Melos (Milo), and now in the Louvre at Paris, called the Venus of Milo. The second is a copy of the Aphrodite of Cnidus by Praxiteles, now at Munich. The third (Venus de' Medici) is evidently an imitation of the Cnidian Aphrodite: it was ascribed to Cleomenes until Michaelis showed that the inscription with that name is a very late addition. For the Roman goddess of love see VENUS.

Aphrodite of Melos. (Venus of Milo: Louvre in Paris.)

Aphroditōpōlis (Ἀφροδίτης πόλις), the name of several cities in Egypt. 1. In Lower Egypt: (1) In the Nomos Leontopolites, in the Delta, between Arthubis and Leontopolis (Strab. p. 802); (2) (Chybin-el-Koum) in the Nomos Prosopites, in the Delta, on a navigable branch of the Nile, between Naucratis and Sais; probably the same as Atarbechis, which is an Egyptian name of the same meaning as the Greek Aphroditopolis (Strab. p. 802).—2. In Middle Egypt, or Heptanomis, (Atfyh) a considerable city on the E. bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolites (Strab. p. 809).—3. In Upper Egypt, or the Thebaïs: (1) Veneris Oppidum (Tachta), a little way from the W. bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolis (Strab. p. 813; Plin. v. 61). (2) In the Nomos Hermonthites (Deir, NW. of Esneh), on the W. bank of the Nile (Plin. v. 60; Strab. p. 817).

Aphthōnius (Ἀφθώνιος), of Antioch, a Greek rhetorician, lived at the end of the 3rd century A.D. and wrote the introduction to the study of rhetoric, entitled Progymnasmata (προγυμνάσματα). It was constructed on the basis of the Progymnasmata of Hermogenes, and became so popular that it was used as the common school-book in this branch of education for several centuries.—In Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. i.; Spengel's Rhet. Graec. vol. ii. 1853. Aphthonius also wrote some Aesopic fables, which are extant.

Aphytis (Ἀφύτις: Athyto), a town in the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Jupiter Ammon (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. i. 64; Strab. p. 330; Paus. iii. 18).

Apia (Ἀπία, sc. γῆ), the Apian land, an ancient name of Peloponnesus, especially Argolis, said to have been so called from Apis, a mythical king of Argos. The name is probably from the root ap (whence aqua), and corresponds with the Slavonic Morca from more = mare. If originally applied to the Western plain of Argolis, 'Waterland' would be appropriate, and, as its application extended, the significance was lost (cf. APULLA). [PELOPONNESUS; APIS.]

Apicata, wife of Sejanus, was divorced by him, A. D. 23, and put an end to her own life on the execution of Sejanus in 31 (Tac. Ann. iv. 3, 11; Dio Cass. lviii. 11).

Apicius, the name of three notorious gluttons.—1. The first lived in the time of Sulla, and is said to have procured the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, B. C. 92.—2. The second and most renowned, M. Gabius Apicius, flourished under Tiberius. After squandering upwards of £800,000 upon his stomach he found that little more than 80,000 remained; upon which, despairing of being able to satisfy the cravings of hunger from such a pittance, he forthwith hanged himself. But he was not forgotten. Sundry cakes (Apicia) and sauces long kept alive his memory, and his name passed into a proverb in all matters connected with the pleasures of the table. (Tac. Ann. iv. 1; Dio Cass. lvii. 19; Athen. p. 7; Plin. viii. 209, ix. 66, xix. 137; Juv. iv. 23; Sen. de Vit. Beat. 11, 4.)

—3. A contemporary of Trajan, sent to this emperor, when he was in Parthia, fresh oysters, preserved by a skilful process of his own (Athen. p. 7).—The treatise we now possess, bearing the title CAELII APICII de Opsonis et Condimentis, sive de Re Culinaria, Libri decem, is a sort of Cook and Confectioner's Manual, containing a multitude of receipts for cookery. It was probably compiled in the 3rd century A.D. by some Caelius who entitled it Apicius to indicate its subject, and should perhaps correctly be called Caelii Apicius.—Edit. Schuch. Heidelberg. 1874.

Apidānus (Ἀπιδανός, Ion. Ἡπιδανός), a river in Thessaly, which flows into the Enipeus near Pharsalus.

Apiōlae, a town of Latium, destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 35; Dionys. iii. 49).

Apion (Ἀπίων), a Greek grammarian, and a native of Oasis in Egypt, studied at Alexandria, and taught rhetoric at Rome in the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius. In the reign of Caligula he left Rome, and in A. D. 38 he was sent by the inhabitants of Alexandria at the head of an embassy to Caligula to bring forward complaints against the Jews residing in their city. Apion was the author of many works, all of which are now lost. Of these the most celebrated were upon the Homeric poems. The extant glosses bearing his name are not genuine, but those which he did write were used by Apollonius the Sophist in his Homeric Lexicon. He also wrote a work on Egypt in 5 books, and a work against the Jews, to which Josephus replied in his treatise Against Apion.

Apion, Ptolemaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS APION.]

Apis (Ἄπης). 1. The Bull of Memphis, worshipped as a god among the Egyptians. This Apis was regarded as the incarnation of the supreme god Ptah, the god of the sun, and identified with Osiris, whence Apis is called by Greek writers an incarnation of Osiris (Strab. p. 807; Diod. i. 85; Plut. Is. 20, 29). The Egyptians held the new Apis to be born from a cow upon whom a spark from heaven fell at the death of the original Apis [see SERAPIS]. The symbol of Apis (Wilkinson's Egyptians).

Apis was a bull with the sun-disk between its horns, the regular Egyptian symbol for the sun. The worship was maintained of the living incarnate Apis (as well as of the dead Osiris-Apis, or Serapis) and the great temple for his honour was at Memphis. He was called Epaphus by the Greeks and regarded as the son of Isis (Hdt. ii. 153). There were certain signs by which he was recognised to be the god. It was requisite that he should be quite black, have a white square mark on the forehead, on his back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in his tail, and on his tongue a knot in the shape of a beetle. When all these signs were discovered, the animal was consecrated with great pomp, and was conveyed to Momphis. His birthday, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival; it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt (Hdt. iii. 28; Aelian, H. A. xi. 11). The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years (Athen. p. 168). If he had not died before the expiration of that period, he was killed and buried in a sacred well, the place of which was unknown except to the initiated. But if he died a natural death, he was buried publicly and solemnly; and as his birth filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning. (Plin. viii. 184; Plut. Is. 56.) This account of his being put to death is not borne out by the monumental representations of the Serapeum. Pliny (l.c.) tells the story that the refusal to take food from the hand of Germanicus was an omen of death.—2. Son of Phoroneus and Teledice or Laodice, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Argos and the Peloponnesus generally, which was called Apia after him. He ruled tyrannically and was slain by Thelxion and Telchin. From an confusion with the Egyptian Apis, he is further stated to have migrated to Egypt, founded Memphis, and to have been deified as Serapis (Apollod. ii. 1, 1; Euseb. Chron. 271).—3. Son of Telchin of Sicyon, also credited with giving the name Apia to Peloponnesus (Paus. ii. 5, 7).—4. Son of the Arcadian Jason, slain by Aetolus (Paus. v. 1, 6).—5. Son of Apollo, endowed with the arts of healing and prophecy, born at Naupactis, freed Argos from monsters. He also was said to have been the origin of the name Apia (Aesch. Suppl. 262). No doubt the converse was the truth and the name of the land was accounted for by the various local traditions.

Apis (Ἄπις), a city of Egypt, on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the border of the country towards Libya, about 10 stadia W. of Paraetonium; celebrated for the worship of the god Apis.

Apobathmi (Ἀπόβαθμοι), a place in Argolis on the sea not far from Tyrea, where Danaus is said to have landed (Pans. ii. 38, 4).

Apodōti and Apodeōtae (Ἀπόδωτοι and Ἀποδοτοί), a people in the SE. of Aetolia, between the Evenus and Hylaethns.

Apollināris, Sidōnius. [SIDONIUS.]

Apollinis Pr. (Ἀπόλλωνος ἄκρον; C. Zibeeb or C. Farina), a promontory of Zeugitana in N. Africa, forming the W. point of the Gulf of Carthage = the Pulchri Promont. Liv. xxix. 27.

Apollo (Ἀπόλλων), one of the great divinities of Greece. In literature he is the son of Zeus and Leto, born with his twin sister Artemis in Delos under Mount Cynthus, whither his mother had fled from the jealous anger of Hera. The three deities Zeus, Apollo and Athene were regarded as embodying in a special degree the divine powers, so that the solemn appeal in oath or prayer is Ζεῦ τε πάτερ καὶ Ἀθηναίη καὶ Ἀπόλλων (Il. ii. 371, &c.) In Homer, however, we find Apollo only as the god of prophecy and as the god who sends plagues. The manifold attributes which will be described were the result partly of development, but still more of the sweeping together of various local traditions and forms of worship into the religion of this deity, who became their representative. It is probably right to find the origin of most of these attributes in the nature-worship of the god of Light, and though in Homer the sun was a separate deity [HELIOS], Apollo becomes afterwards identified with the sun itself as well as with ideas belonging generally to light. The physical conception, however, was gradually lost (though revived sometimes in art), and Apollo's special provinces are prophecy, music, poetry and the preservation of the state from maladies. It is very doubtful if we should refer the epithets λύκειος, &c. to this original idea of light; but there is little doubt that the names φοῖβος and χρυσικόμος have this meaning. Hence Apollo is (1) the god of the year and its months, with epithets ἠρομέδων, ἄρκτης, νεομήνιος, ἑβδομαγέτης (cf. Hdt. vi. 57; Aesch. Th. 781): the new and full moon, the 7th and 20th of each month were sacred to him [cf. Dict. Ant. s. v. Daphnephoria]. He is the god who brings back sunshine and light in spring; according to Hes. Op. 526 the sun went to Ethiopia in winter (cf. Hdt. ii. 24). This return was celebrated at Delphi in the Theophania on the 7th of the month Bysios which began the Apollinean year (see Dict. Ant. s. v. Theophania.) It is now the general theory, and is very likely correct, that the victory of Apollo over dragons and serpents at Delphi and Delos (Hymn. ad Ap. 122, 178; Enr. I. T. 1250) symbolises the driving away of winter and darkness by the return of spring and light. In this view the dragon is darkness; the arrow which slew it is the ray of the sun (cf. Eur. H. F. 1090). It is possible also that the slaying of the giants Tityus and the Aloidae may refer to the same battle against winter. It may be observed, however, that these legends may also signify the prevalence of a new Greek religion over an older local worship. Apollo seems to have been once the rival of Aesclepius, to whom the serpent was sacred, and to have prevailed over him [ASCLEPIUS]: it is not improbable that at Delphi, at Delos, at Phlegyae and elsewhere, there was an old serpent-worship, possibly a relic of tribes to whom the serpent was a totem, which the Apollinean worship overthrew, and this would explain the expiation which Apollo had to make for the slaughter of the Python. Such an explanation would not exclude the probability that the dragon or serpent was regarded in the worship of Apollo as the symbol of darkness and winter, and that the armed dances at the Ephesian Ortygia and at Delos, like those of the Salii at Rome, represent an attempt of savage superstition to frighten away the powers of darkness (cf. Strab. p. 640; Dict. Ant. s. v. Salii). (2) As god of the sun and of the warmer part of the year Apollo was honoured partly, though not solely, in the character of a god of harvest in certain festivals belonging to the summer and early autumn (Dict. Ant. s. v. Carnea, Delia, Hyacinthia, Pyanepsia, Thargelia): hence also comes the epithet σιτάλακας (Paus. x. 15, 2). (3) The god who sends plagues (Il. i. 42; Paus. ix. 36, 3); and, by a common sequence, he was also the god of healing who averted plagues (Eur. Alc. 220). This connexion with sickness and death is no doubt owing to the observation that the heat of the sun favoured the spread of plagues, and that the sunstroke sometimes killed directly: for his healing character, besides the belief that the god who brought sickness could also remove it, his identification with the worship of Asclepius is also answerable. Here belong the epithets ὄλλιος, λοιμῖος, παιώνιος, ἀκείιος, παίων, ἀλεξιάκος (which was said to refer to his staying the plague of Athens, Paus. i. 3, 4), ἐπικούριος, ορίfer. Apollo's arrows slay men, as those of Artemis slay women (see the story of ΝΙΟΒΕ). (4) The god of oracles. The prophetic power of Apollo is by some supposed to express the idea that his light penetrated all darkness: if it belongs to him as sun-god it might better be regarded as a characteristic of the all-seeing sun ὅς πάντ' ἐφορᾷ καὶ πάντ' ἐπακούει. It is possible, however, that he became the deity of more oracular temples than any other god merely because he was eventually regarded as the vicegerent and mouthpiece of Zeus (cf. Aesch. Eum. 19; Il. i. 72) and thus absorbed many local oracles. The oracle of Zeus at Dodona was an earlier Greek oracle than that of Apollo at Delphi, of which the notice in Il. ix. 404 belongs to a late portion of the Iliad. It is said that Zeus and Apollo shared the oracle of Branchidae, which may account for his name Didymaeus there (Steph. s. v. Δίδυμα); or it may only express his twinship with Artemis. It is probable that Apollo occupied an oracular seat at Delphi once sacred to other deities in succession: to a nature-deity such as earth (Eum. 1); to Poseidon, whence the symbol of the dolphin and the names δελφίνιος, δελφείος βομός; and probably to Dionysus. (Hymn. ad Apoll. 319; Dict. Ant. s. v. Oraculum, where also an account of the numerous oracles of Apollo in Greece and Asia Minor will be found.) From oracular temples he has many surnames, such as Clarius, Lycius, Ismenius, Patareus. (5) The founder of States and the leader of colonies. This attribute is commonly derived from the fact that navigation began in spring and that colonies started then, led by the god of spring. It is better to assign a twofold reason: that Apollo's oracle sanctioned the enterprise of the colonists, and also that in most cases Apollo was the representative Hellenic god whose worship they carried with them. These functions are expressed in the epithets πατρώος, ἀρχηγέτης, &c. (see Thuc. vi. 3), in that of ἀγνιεύς, because he presided over the city, in traditions of States founded by his sons and grandsons, such as Ion, Dorus, Chæron, &c. (see also Paus. i. 42, 2; Callim. Hymn. ad Apoll. 55). (6) The god of expiation and purification: σώτηρ, καθάρσιος, ιατρόμαντις. This appears especially in the atoning rites at Delphi, and in the atonement at the Thargelia (see Dict. Ant. s. v.), and is dwelt upon in the Eumenides. This attribute may belong to him equally as the god of healing, as the god of oracles, and as the god of light. (7) Apollo as the god of prophecy and oracular wisdom (Od. viii. 488) was recognised also as the leader of the Muses, as the god of music and poetry (Il. i. 603; Pind. Nem. v. 23; Paus. v. 18. 4, x. 19. 4). (8) The ideal of manly youth and beauty (Od. viii. 86; Hes. Th. 347); hence a patron of athletes with the epithet δρομαῖος. (9) Some have connected with the preceding the attribute of ἀγρείς, ἀγρεύτης, &c., which he had as god of hunting (Soph. O. C. 1091; Paus. i. 41. 3); but it is more probable that this, as in the case of Artemis, arose from the fact that in various ancient local religions certain animals were sacred to him. On the whole it is most probable that in the consecration of the wolf to

Apollo, and in his names λύκειος, λυκηγενῆς we have, not the misinterpretation of a name meaning light, but the relic of an ancient totemistic religion in which a tribe whose totem was the wolf and whose animal worship was transferred to Apollo, at first imagined as the wolf-god and receiving special sacrifice of the sacred animal of the tribe, and then regarded as the wolf-slayer (λυκοκτόνος, Soph. El. 6, cf. Paus. x. 14, 7; Xen. Anab. ii. 2, 9). To this the story of the victory of the wolf (i.e. a wolf-tribe) over the bull at Argos [DANAUS], and the figure of a wolf on Argive coins (Paus. ii. 19, 3) seem to point; and to this belongs the name of the Lyceum at Athens. The shepherds, of whom in some districts he was a patron (cf. his service to Laomedon and Admetus), may have been glad to suppose him the slayer of the wolf rather than its protector. It is remarkable that Mars, between whom and Apollo a connexion has been traced, has the same sacred animal.—Other attributes. It is probably best to account in the same way for the story of the Teuissians that Apollo took the form of a dog, and also for the better known stories of Apollo Smintheus (i. e. the mouse-god), worshipped in several places under this title (Strab. pp. 486, 604, Ael. H. A. xiii. 5; cf. Il. i. 39), and represented by Scopas with a mouse at his foot. Some have supposed this to mean that as harvest-god he destroyed the mice to save the crops: it is more likely that the mouse was the sacred animal, and that the idea of its destruction by Apollo came later when the animal worship was transferred to him. The dolphin may have been sacred to him for a similar reason, or from an association of Poseidon with Delphi mentioned above: other reasons suggested are, that the dolphin symbolised his claim to spring, when navigation began, or that it was merely a misinterpretation of the local name Delphi. [For the laurel see ΔΑΦΝΕ.]—Worship of Apollo at Rome. This was introduced under Tarquinius Superbus, when the Sibylline books were brought to Rome. (Dionys. iv. 62; Dict. Ant. s. v. Libri Sibyllini). Hence he is called Cumæus Apollo: a temple was built to him B.C. 430 (Liv. iv. 25); the Lndi Apollinæres (Dict. Ant.) were celebrated from 212 B.C. onwards, and the worship of Apollo, the giver of victory at Actium, was especially favoured by Augustus, who was even said to be the son of Apollo (Suct. Aug. 94). As a Greek divinity he was honoured by the Lectisternium (Dict. Ant. s. v.). Apollo is in the more matured periods of Greek art generally represented as a handsome beardless youth. As god of music with the lyre he is always clothed, and wears the long tunic (χίτων ὀρθοστάδιος), as in the Vatican statue of Apollo Citharoedus (p. 90), a copy of the statue by Scopas placed by Augustus in the Palatine griffin [supposed to be derived from his connexion with Hyperborean lands], the wolf (Paus. x. 14), and the monse (as Apollo Smintheus), the laurel crown, the bow, the lyre, and the tripod. A favourite subject with vase-painters is the carrying off of the tripod by Heracles and its restoration to Apollo

(Paus. x. 13; HERACLES.)
Apollōcrātes (Ἀπολλοκράτης), elder son of Dionysius the Younger, was left by his father in command of the citadel of Syracuse, but was compelled by famine to surrender it to Dion, about B.C. 354 (Plut. Dionys. 37; Strab. p. 259.)
Apollōdōrus (Ἀπολλόδωρος).—1. Of Amphipolis, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, was intrusted in B.C. 331, together with Menes, with the administration of Babylon and of all the satrapies as far as Cilicia (Curt. v. 1; Diod. xvii. 54).—2. Tyrant of Cassandra (formerly Potidaea) in the peninsula of Pallene, obtained the supreme power in B.C. 379, and exercised it with the utmost cruelty. He was conquered and put to death by Antigonus Gonatas. (Polyb. vii. 7; Polyaen. vi. 7; Paus. iv. 5, 1.)—3. Of Carystus, a comic poet, probably lived B.C. 300–260, and was one of the most distinguished of the poets of the new Attic Comedy. It was from him that Terence took his Heccyra and Phormio.—4. Of Gela in Sicily, a comic poet and a contemporary of Menander, lived B.C. 340–290. He is frequently confounded with Apollodorus of Carystus. The fragments of both are edited by Meineke.—5. A Grammarian of Athens, son of Asclepiades, and pupil of Aristarchus and Parnatius, flourished about B.C. 140. He wrote a great number of works, which have perished, among them the Chronica, a history of the world from the fall of Troy to his own time, and a geographical treatise—both in trimeter iambics. His surviving work is the Bibliotheca, which consists of three books and is of considerable value. It contains a well-arranged account of the mythology and the heroic age of Greece: it begins with the origin of the gods, and goes down to the time of Theseus, when the work suddenly breaks off.—Editions. By Heyne, Göttingen, 1803, 2d ed.; by Clavier, Paris, 1805, with a French translation; by Westermann in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843; by Hercher, 1874. Its genuineness is, however, doubted by some writers (see Hercher, and C. Robert, Berlin, 1873).—6. Of Pergamus, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Apollonia in his advanced age, and had as a pupil the young Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus (Strab. p. 625; Suet. Aug. 89).—7. A painter of Athens, flourished about B.C. 408, with whom commenced a new period in the history of the art. He made a great advance in colouring, and invented aerial perspective, the treatment of different planes, and the right management of chiaroscuro (Plin. xxxv. 69; see further Dict. Ant. ii. 409). Hence he was the founder of the art of landscape painting.—8. An architect of Damascus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, by the latter of whom he was put to death. He built the forum and the column of Trajan.

Apollōnīa (Ἀπολλωνία; Ἀπολλωνιάτης). 1. (Pollina or Pollona), an important town in Illyria or new Epirus, not far from the mouth of the Aons, and 60 stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Corinthians and Corcyraeans, and was equally celebrated as a place of commerce and of learning; many distinguished Romans, among others the young Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus, pursued their studies here. Persons travelling from Italy to Greece and the E., usually landed either at Apollonia or Dyrrhachium; and the Via Egnatia, the great high road to the East, commenced at Apollonia or, according to others, at Dyrrhachium (Thuc. i. 26; Strab. pp. 316, 322; Paus. v. 21, 12). [EGNATIA VIA].—2. (Polina), a town in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, between Thessalonica and Amphipolis, and S. of the lake of Bolbe (Plin. iv. 38; Athen. p. 334).—3. (Sicoboli), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, with two harbours, a colony of Miletus, afterwards called Sozopolis, whence its modern name; it had a celebrated temple of Apollo, from which Lucullus carried away a colossus of this god, and erected it on the Capitol at Rome (Hdt. iv. 90; Strab. pp. 319, 541).—4. A castle or fortified town of the Locri Ozolae, near Naupactus.—5. A town in Sicily, on the N. Coast. It lay near Haluntium, a little way inland, and seems to have been a Sikel town whose name was changed when the neighbouring Greek colonists brought in the worship of Apollo. It is probably the modern Pollina. (Cic. Verr. iii. 43, v. 33; Diod. xiv. 72).—6. (Abullionto), a town in Bithynia on the lake Apolloniatas, through which the river Rhyndacus flows (Strab. p. 575).—7. A town on the borders of Mysia and Lydia, in the Caicus valley, between Pergamus and Sardis (Strab. p. 625).—8. A town in Palestina, between Caesarea and Joppa.—9. A town in Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, through which the Delas or Duras (Diala) flows.—10. (Marza Susa), a town in Cyrenaica and the harbour of Cyrene, one of the 5 towns of the Pentapolis in Libya: it was the birthplace of Eratosthenes.—11. A Lycian town on an island, probably the island Dolichiste.

Apollōnis (Palamut), a city in Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis. It was one of the 12 cities of Asia which were destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius (A.D. 17). (Strab. p. 625; Tac. Ann. ii. 47.) Its original name was Doidya: it was a colony of Macedonian soldiers under the Seleucids about 260 B.C.; and was refounded by Attalus II., who named it Apollonis after his mother, about 159 B.C.

Apollōnis (Ἀπολλώνιος). 1. Of Alabanda in Caria, a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes, about B.C. 120. He was a very distinguished teacher of rhetoric, and used to ridicule and despise philosophy. Scaevola was present at his lectures (Cic. de Orat. i. 17, 75). He was surnamed ὁ Μαλακός, and must be distinguished from the following.—2. Of Alabanda, surnamed Molo, likewise a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes, and also distinguished himself as a pleader in the courts of justice (Strab. p. 655). In B.C. 81, when Sulla was dictator, Apollonius came to Rome as ambassador of the Rhodians, on which occasion Cicero heard him; Cicero also received instruction from Apollonius at Rhodes a few years later (Cic. Brut. 89–91), and later still Caesar (Suet. Jul. 4).—3. Son of Archebulus, a grammarian of Alexandria, in the first century of the Christian aera, and a pupil of Didymus. He wrote a Homeric Lexicon, based on glossaries of Apion, which is still extant, and though much interpolated, is a work of great value.—Editions. By Villoison, Paris, 1773; by H. Tollius, Lugd. Bat. 1788; and by Bekker, Berlin, 1833.—4. Surnamed Dyscolus, 'the ill-tempered,' a grammarian at Alexandria, in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius (A.D. 117–161), taught at Rome as well as Alexandria. He and his son HERODIANUS are called by Priscian the greatest of all grammarians. Apollonius was the first who reduced grammar to anything like a system. Of his numerous works only 4 are extant. 1. Περὶ συντάξεως τοῦ λόγου μερῶν, 'de Constructione Orationis,' or 'de Ordinatione sive Constructione Dictionum,' in 4 books; edited by Fr. Sylburg, Frankf. 1590; by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1817; and by A. Buttmann, 1878. 2. Περὶ ἀπτανυμίας, 'de Proumine,' edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1814. 3. Περὶ συνδέσμων, 'de Conjunctionibus,' and 4. Περὶ ἐπιρρομάτων, 'de Adverbiis,' printed in Bekker's Anecd. ii. p. 477, &c. Among the works ascribed to Apollonius by Suidas there is one περὶ κατεφουσμένης ἰστορίας, on fictitious or forged histories: this has been erroneously supposed to be the same as the extant work Ἰστορίαι θαυμασῖαι, which purports to be written by an Apollonius (published by Westermann, Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839, and Keller, 1877); but it is now admitted that the latter work was written by an Apollonius who is otherwise unknown.—5. Pergaeus, from Perga in Pamphylia, one of the greatest mathematicians of antiquity, commonly called the 'Great Geometer,' was educated at Alexandria under the successors of Euclid, and flourished about B.C. 250–220. His most important work was a treatise on Conic Sections in 8 books, of which the first 4, with the commentary of Eutocius, are extant in Greek; and all but the eighth in Arabic. We have also introductory lemmata to all the 8, by Pappus. Edited by Halley, 'Apoll. Perg. Conic. lib. viii., &c.,' Oxon 1710, fol. The eighth book is a conjectural restoration founded on the introductory lemmata of Pappus.—6. Rhodium, a poet and grammarian, son of Silleus or Illeus and Rhode, born at Alexandria (according to Athen. p. 283, and Aelian, N. A. xv. 23, he was a citizen of Naucratis), wrote in the reigns of Ptolemy Philopator and Ptolemy Euphronus B.C. 222–181. In his youth he was instructed by Callimachus; but they afterwards became bitter enemies. Their tastes were entirely different; for Apollonius admired and imitated the simplicity of the ancient epic poets, and disliked and despised the artificial and learned poetry of Callimachus. When Apollonius read at Alexandria his poem on the Argonautic expedition (Argonautica), it did not meet with the approbation of the audience: he attributed its failure to the intrigues of Callimachus, and revenged himself by writing a bitter epigram on Callimachus which is still extant (Anth. Graec. xi. 275). Callimachus in return attacked Apollonius in his Ibis, which was imitated by Ovid in a poem of the same name. Apollonius now left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, where he taught rhetoric with so much success that the Rhodians honoured him with their franchise: hence he was called the 'Rhodian.' He afterwards returned to Alexandria, where he read a revised edition of his Argonautica with great applause. He succeeded Eratosthenes as chief librarian at Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Euphronus, about B.C. 194, and appears to have held this office till his death. The Argonautica, which consists of 4 books, and is still extant, gives a straightforward and simple description of the adventures of the Argonauts: it is a close imitation of the Homeric language and style, but exhibits marks of art and labour as of one who is a student only of the heroic age, and thus forms a contrast with the natural genius and flow of the Homeric poems. Still, although not an exception to the rule that the Alexandrian poetry was derivative and antiquarian, rather than original, Apollonius Rhodius has left us the best of the Alexandrian epics, presenting detached passages of vivid and telling description, which must rank high as poetry, when they are taken out of their somewhat dull and cold setting. Among the Romans the work was much read, and P. Terentius Varro Atacinus acquired great reputation by his translation of it. The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus is only a free imitation of it.—Editions. By Brunck, Argentorat. 1780; by G. Schaefer, Lips. 1810–13; by Wellauer, Lips. 1828; Merkel, 1854. Apollonius wrote several other works which are now lost.—7. Tyanensis or Tyanaeus, i. e. of Tyāna in Cappadocia, a Pythagorean philosopher, was born about 4 years before the Christian aera. At a period when there was a general belief in magical powers, it would appear that Apollonius obtained great influence by pretending to them; and we may believe that his Life by Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts, and absurd in its marvels. Apollonius, according to Philostratus, was of noble ancestry, and studied first under Euthydemus, of Tarsus; but, being disgusted at the luxury of the inhabitants, he retired to the temple of Asclepius at Aegae in Cilicia, guided, as was said, by some inspiration. Here he dwelt from the age of 16 to 20, regarded as having especial favour from the god, and, after a general study of Greek philosophy, adopting that of Pythagoras and living the ascetic life of a strict Pythagorean. He subsequently travelled throughout the East, visiting Nineveh, Babylon, and India. On his return to Asia Minor, we first hear of his pretensions to miraculous power, founded, as it would seem, on the possession of some divine knowledge derived from the East. From Ionia he crossed over into Greece, and from thence to Rome, where he arrived just after an edict against magicians had been issued by Nero. He accordingly remained only a short time at Rome, and next went to Spain and Africa; at Alexandria he was of assistance to Vespasian, who was preparing to seize the empire. The last journey of Apollonius was to Ethiopia, whence he returned to settle in the Ionian cities. On the accession of Domitian, Apollonius was accused of exciting an insurrection against the tyrant: he voluntarily surrendered himself and appeared at Rome before the emperor; but as his destruction seemed impending, he was smuggled out of Rome, or, as his admirers averred, escaped by the exertion of his supernatural powers. The last years of his life were spent at Ephesus, where he is said to have proclaimed the death of the tyrant Domitian at the instant it took place. It may be noted that Dio Cassius emphatically avows his belief in this story (lvii. ad fin.), though earlier in the same book (lvii. 18) he calls him an impostor, but does not seem to be aware that he is there speaking of the same Apollonius. Many of the wonders which Philostratus relates in connexion with Apollonius, curiously coincide with the Christian miracles. The proclamation of the birth of Apollonius to his mother by Proteus, and the incarnation of Proteus himself, the chorus of swans which sang for joy on the occasion, the casting out of devils, raising the dead, and healing the sick, the sudden disappearances and reappearances of Apollonius, his adventures in the cave of Trophonius, and the sacred voice which called him at his death, to which may be added his claim as a teacher having authority to reform the world—cannot fail to suggest the parallel passages in the Gospel history. We know, too, that Apollonius was one among many rivals set up by the Eclectics to our Saviour, an attempt renewed by the English freethinkers Blount and Lord Herbert. Still, it remains a doubtful question whether Philostratus was deliberately fabricating a parallel to please Julia Domna, who shared the eclecticism apparent in Alexander Severus when he placed busts of Christ and of Apollonius, of Orpheus and of Abraham in his Lararium, and who wished for some rival to set up against the exclusive Christian religion—whether in short he was, as Godet says, consciously opposing a Pythagorean Messiah to the Christian Messiah, or was merely (as seems more likely) a credulous romancer, weaving into his narrative besides what he derived from the earlier biographies of Apollonius by Maximus and Durius, stories also from Greek mythology and from the Gospels. For an estimate of the character of Apollonius we have no guide in the cursory allusions of Apuleius and Lucian, of whom the former seems to consider him as a magician, the latter as a teacher of imposture to Alexander. But we have some striking testimony to his personal virtue, and even to the purity of some of his tenets, in Christian writers—in Eusebius (iii. 5, iv. 12); in Origen, who had the biography of Moeragenes before him (contr. Cels. vi. 41), and in Sidonius Apollinarius (Ep. viii. 3). These passages have been recently discussed by Professor Dyer (Gods of Greece), and in a dissertation by Professor Gildersleeve. We are led to the conclusion that Apollonius was probably one of those enthusiasts of high aim and real virtue whose claim to divine power and inspiration was not wholly a conscious imposture, but was possibly in greater part a self-deception. His tenets were that the soul must be liberated from the fetters of the sensual body by purity of life and true worship of the highest god, by prayer and contemplation but not by sacrifices: that life must be purified by asceticism and devoted to the good of the world, and that the highest proficients in such virtues would have supernatural powers such as were ascribed alike to Pythagoras and to Apollonius himself.—8. Of Tyre, a Stoic philosopher, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Auletes, wrote a history of the Stoic philosophy from the time of Zeno (Strab. 757).—9. Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles (about 150 B.C.), were two brothers, and the sculptors of the group which is commonly known as the Farnese bull, representing the punishment of Dirce by Zethus and Amphion. [DIRCE.] It was taken from Rhodes to Rome by Asinius Pollio, and afterwards placed in the baths of Caracalla, where it was dug up in the sixteenth century, and deposited in the Farnese palace. It is now at Naples. These sculptors belong to the Hellenistic Asiatic schools. Their work is great in its rendering of anatomy, but departs from the repose of sculpture and prefers passion and emotion. Their style has many points of likeness to that of Agesander as seen in his Laocoon.—10. Apollonius, a sculptor of Athens in the 1st century B.C. His work is the famous Heracles-torso in the Vatican, belonging to what is now called the 'Attic Renaissance.'

Apollōphānes (Ἀπολλοφάνης), a poet of the old Attic Comedy, of whose comedies a few fragments are extant, lived about B.C. 400.

Apōno or Apōni Fons (Abano), warm medicinal springs, near Patavium, hence called Aque Patavinæ, were much frequented by the sick (Plin. ii. 227, xxxi. 61; Mart. vi. 42; Lucan, vii. 193; Claud. Id. 6).

Appia or Apia (Ἀππία, Ἀπία), a city of Plirgia Patatiana.

Appia Via, the most celebrated of the Roman roads (regina viarum, Stat. Silv. ii. 2, 12), was commenced by Ap. Claudius Caecus, when censor, B.C. 312, and was the great line of communication between Rome and southern Italy. It issued from the Porta Capena, and passing through Arieia, Tres Tabernæ, Appii Forum, Tarracina, Fundi, Formiæ, Minturnæ, Sinuessa, and Casilinum, terminated at Capua (181 Roman miles), but was eventually extended through Calatia and Caudium to Beneventum, and finally thence through Venusia, Tarentum, and Uria to Brundisium. The total distance by this route from Rome to Brundisium was 363 miles. A variation of the route from Beneventum by Cumsum and Barium to Brundisium was first regularly constructed and generally adopted under Trajan, with the name of Via Trajana, often called Via Appia. It was a route, however, sometimes used in earlier times (e.g. by Horace), instead of the regular road to Brundisium. In Horace's time also, travellers used the canal through the Pontine narshes from Forum Appii; but a road also ran by the side of the canal (cf. Strab. p. 233). The road from Capua by Nuceria to Rhegium, originally Via Popilia, is also sometimes called Via Appia.

Appiānus (Ἀππιανός), the Roman historian, was born at Alexandria, and lived at Rome during the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius. He wrote in Greek a Roman history (Ῥωμαϊκὰ, or Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία), in 24 books, arranged not synchronistically, but ethnographically—that is, he did not relate the history of the Roman empire in chronological order; but he gave a separate account of the affairs of each country, till it was finally incorporated in the Roman empire. The subjects of the different books were: 1. The kingly period. 2. Italy. 3. The Samnites. 4. The Gauls or Celts. 5. Sicily and the other islands. 6. Spain. 7. Hannibal's wars. 8. Libya, Carthage, and Numidia. 9. Macedonia. 10. Greece and the Greek states in Asia Minor. 11. Syria and Parthia. 12. The war with Mithridates. 13–21. The civil wars, in 9 books, from those of Marius and Sulla to the battle of Actium. 22. Ἐκατονοταετία, comprised the history of a hundred years, from the battle of Actium to the beginning of Vespasian's reign. 23. The wars with Illyria. 24. Those with Arabia. We possess only 11 of these complete; namely, the 6th, 7th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 23rd: there are fragments of several of the others. The Parthian history, which has come down to us as part of the 11th book, is not a work of Appian, but merely a compilation from Plutarch's Lives of Antony and Crassus. Appian's work is a compilation. His style is clear and simple; but he possesses few merits as an historian, and he frequently makes blunders. Thus, for instance, he places Saguntum on the N. of the Iberus, and states that it takes only half a day to sail from Spain to Britain. Nevertheless he is an indispensable authority for the period of the civil wars, and in other portions has preserved for us records of writers whose works have perished.—Editions. Schweighäuser, 1785; Bekker, 1852; Mendelssohn, 1879.

Appiās, a nymph of the Appian well, which was situated near the temple of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Julius Caesar. It was surrounded by statues of nymphs, called Appiades. (Ov. A. A. i. 82, 3; Plin. xxxvi. 33.)

Appii Forum. [FORUM APPII.]

Appuleius. [APULEIUS.]

Appülēius Saturninus. [SATURNINUS.]

Apriēs (Ἀπρίης, Ἀπρίας), a king of Egypt, the Pharaoh-Hophra of Scripture, succeeded his father Psammetichus II. and reigned b.c. 588–570. He increased the number of Greek mercenaries to 30,000, which roused the jealousy of the Egyptian soldiers, who mutinied on the occasion of an unsuccessful attempt against Cyrene. They chose Amasis, the king's brother-in-law, as their leader, and defeated Apriēs and his mercenaries. Amasis allowed him to reign six years jointly with himself, and then put him to death. (Hdt. ii. 151.)

Aprōnius. 1. Q., one of the worst instruments of Verres in oppressing the Sicilians.—2. L., served under Drusus (A. D. 14) and Germanicus (15) in Germany. In 20 he was proconsul of Africa, and praetor of Lower Germany, where he lost his life in a war against the Frisii. Apronius had two daughters: one of whom was married to Plautius Silvanus; the other to Lentulus Gaetulicus, consul in 26.

Apsilae (Ἀψίλαι,) a Scythian people in Colchis, N. of the river Phasis.

Apsines (Ἀψίνης), of Gadara in Phoenicia, a Greek sophist and rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Athens about A. D. 235. Two of his works are extant: Περὶ τῶν μερῶν τοῦ πολιτικοῦ λόγου τέχνη, which is much interpolated; and Περὶ τῶν ἐσχηματισμένων προβλημάτων, both of which are printed in Walz, Rhetor. Graec.

Apsus (Crevasta), a river in Illyria (Nova Epirus), flowing into the Ionian sea (Strab. p. 316; Caes. B. C. iii. 13, &c.; Appian, B. C. ii. 56).

Apsyrtus. [ΑΨΥΡΤΟΣ.]

Apta Julia (Ἀπτὴ), chief town of the Vulgientes in Gallia Narbonensis, and a Roman colony.

Aptēra (Ἀπτέρα: Ἀππεραῖος: Palaeokastron on the G. of Suda), a town on the W. coast of Crete, 80 stadia from Cydonia (Strab. p. 479).

Apuāni, a Ligurian people on the Macra, were subdued by the Romans after a long resistance and transplanted to Samnium, B. C. 180 (Liv. xxxix. 2, 20, 32, xl. 1, 38, 41).

Apülēius, of Madaura in Africa, was born about A. D. 114, of respectable parents. He received the first rudiments of education at Carthage, and afterwards studied the Platonic philosophy at Athens. He next travelled extensively, visiting Italy, Greece, and Asia, becoming initiated in most mysteries, and gathering information on magic and necromancy. At length he returned home, and spent about two years at Rome; but soon afterwards undertook a new journey to Alexandria. On his way thither he was taken ill at the town of Oea, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sicinius Pontianus, whose mother, a very rich widow of the name of Pudentilla, he married. Her relatives, being indignant that so much wealth should pass out of the family, accused Apuleius of gaining the affections of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. The cause was heard at Sabrata before Claudius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, A. D. 173, and the defence (Apologia) spoken by Apuleius is still extant. Of his subsequent career we know little, except that he lectured on rhetoric at Carthage, and declaimed in public with great applause. The most important of the extant works of Apuleius are: 1. Metamorphoseon seu de Asino Aureo Libri XI. This celebrated romance is imitated from the Λούκιος ἢ ὄνος of Lucian, but has much that is the fruit of Apuleius' own imagination or researches, notably the tale of Cupid and Psyche, and the stories of bandits, magicians, jugglers and priests. It is a satire in the guise of a fantastical autobiography of a supposed Lucius who is transformed by an enchantress, with whom he is in love, into an ass, in which shape he has opportunities for observing the follies of men, until he is restored to his natural form by the priests of Isis. It seems to have been intended as a satire upon the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain orders of priests, the frauds of juggling pretenders to supernatural powers, and the general profligacy of public morals. A vein of mysticism, however, runs through the work, and there are some who discover a more recondite meaning, and especially bishop Warburton, in his Divine Legation of Moses, who has at great length endeavoured to prove, that the Golden Ass was written with the view of recommending the Pagan religion in opposition to Christianity, and especially of inculcating the importance of initiation into the purer mysteries. The well-known and beautiful episode of Cupid and Psyche is introduced in the 4th, 5th, and 6th books. This, whatever opinion we may form of the principal narrative, is evidently an allegory, and is generally understood to shadow forth the progress of the soul to perfection. II. Floridorum Libri IV. An Anthology, containing select extracts from various orations and dissertations, collected probably by some admirer. III. De Deo Socratis Liber. IV. De Dogmate Platonis Libri tres. The first book contains some account of the speculative doctrines of Plato, the second of his morals, the third of his logic. V. De Mundo Liber. A translation of the work περὶ κόσμου, at one time ascribed to Aristotle. VI. Apologia sive de Magia Liber. The oration described above, delivered before Claudius Maximus.—The style of Apuleius is stilted and pretentious, and his writings are stated by Macrobius to have been of small account. His novel, however, is amusing, and in spite of its licentious tone, must be valued as instructive in several features of the period to which it belongs, as well as for the beauty of the allegory of Cupid and Psyche.—Editions. By Hildebrand, 1842; Oudendorp, 1823; ed. princeps, Rome, 1469; Metamorph. by Eyssenhardt, 1869; O. Jahu, 1856; cf. Friedländer, Sittengesch. vol. i.

Apūlia or Appulia (Ἀπουλία: Apūlus or Appūlus, Ἀπούλοι). The 'waterland' [root ap, agua, see APIA.] It is probable that the name first belonged, as Strabo says, to the plain just north of M. Garganus, which is extremely well watered. As the name was extended the meaning was lost, and Horace writes 'Siticulosae Apuliae,' and 'Daunus pauper aquae' (Epod. 3, 16; Od. iii. 30, 11), in reference to the plains of Northern Apulia, arid in summer. It included, in its widest signification, the whole of the SE. of Italy from the river Frento to the promontory Iapygium, and was bounded on the N. by the Frentani, on the E. by the Adriatic, on the S. by the Tarentine gulf, and on the W. by Samnium and Lucania, thus including the modern provinces of Bari, Otranto, and Capitanata, in the former kingdom of Naples. Apulia in its narrower sense was the country E. of Samnium on both sides of the Aufidus, the Daunia and Peucetia of the Greeks: the whole of the SE. part was called Calabria by the Romans. The Greeks gave the name of Daunia to the N. part of the country from the Frento to the Aufidus; of Peucetia to the country from the Aufidus to Tarentum and Brundisium, and of Iapygia or Messapia to the whole of the remaining S. part: though they sometimes included under Iapygia all Apulia in its widest meaning (Strab. pp. 277, 283, 285; Ptol. iii. 1, 15, 72.) The NW. of Apulia is a plain, but the S. part is traversed by the E. branch of the Apennines, and has only a small tract of land on the coast on each side of the mountains. The country was very fertile, especially in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, and afforded excellent pasturage; but the plain of Northern Apulia, rich in winter, became dry in summer, and the flocks were then driven to the upland valleys of Samnium and the Abruzzi. The population was of a mixed nature: in legend they are said to have settled in the country under the guidance of Iapex, Daunius, and Peucetius, three sons of an Illyrian king, Lyaon. But the Iapygian or Messapian race seems to have more affinity to Greeks than to the Italian stock. It may be conjectured that this part of Italy was peopled by Pelasgian tribes from Epirus and Greece. The Apulians joined the Samnites against the Romans, and became subject to the latter on the conquest of the Samnites.

Aquae, the name given by the Romans to many medicinal springs and bathing-places (Plin. xxxi. 1-61):—(1) AURELIAE or COLONIA AURELIA AQUENSIS (Baden-Baden). (2) APOLLINARES, in Etruria between Sabate and Tarquinii = 'Phocbi vada' (Mart. vi. 42, 7). (3) Bormonis, applied to springs at Bourbonne l'Archambault in Allier, and also to those at Bourbonne in Haute Marne. Bormonia was a Celtic deity of medicinal springs. (4) CUTILIAE, mineral springs in Samnium near the ancient town of Cutilia, which perished in early times, and E. of Reāte. There was a celebrated lake in its neighbourhood with a floating island, which was regarded as the umbilicus or centre of Italy. Vespasian died at this place. (Dionys. i. 15; Macrobius. Sat. i. 7; Sen. N. Q. iii. 25; Strab. p. 228; Suet. Vesp. 24.) (5) GRATIANAE, Aix in Savoy on the Lac de Bourget. (6) MATTIACAE or FONTES MATTIACI (Wiesbaden), in the laud of the Mattiaci in Germany. (7) NISINCI, Bourbon l'Anci in Saône-et-Loire. (8) PASSERIS, in Etruria between Volturni and Forum Cassi (Mart. vi. 42) now Bacucco, 5 miles N. of Viterbo. (9) PATAVINAE [APONI FONI]. (10) SEXTIAE (Aix), a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis, founded by Sextius Calvinus, B.C. 122; its mineral waters were long celebrated, but were thought to have lost much of their efficacy in the time of Augustus. Near this place Marins defeated the Teutoni, B.C. 102 (Strab. pp. 178, 180). It is 13 miles N. of Marseilles. (11) SOLIS (Bath) in Britain called Ἰδῆα θερμὰ in Ptol. ii. 3, 28. (12) STATIPELLAE (Acqui), a town of the Statielli in Liguria, celebrated for its warm baths (Strab. p. 217; Plin. xxxi. 4). (13) TARBELLAE, on the Aturns (Adour), now Dacs. (14) TAURI in Etruria, 3 miles N. of Cività Vecchia: now Bagni di Ferrata.

Aquae, in Africa. 1. (Meriga, Ru.), in the interior of Mauretania Caesariensis.—2. CALIDAE (Gurbos or Hammam l'Enf), on the gulf of Carthage.—3. REGIAE (Hammam Truzza), in the N. part of Byzacena.—4. TACAPITANAE (Hammam-el-Khabs), at the S. extremity of Byzacena, close to the large city of Tacape (Khabs).

Aquila. 1. Of Pontus, translated the Old Testament into Greek, in the reign of Hadrian, probably about A.D. 130. Only a few fragments remain, which have been published in the editions of the Hexapla of Origen.—2. Julius Aquila, a Roman jurist quoted in the Digest, lived under or shortly before the reign of Septimius Severus, A.D. 193-198.—3. L. Pontius Aquila, a friend of Cicero, and one of Caesar's murderers, was killed at the battle of Mutina, B.C. 43 (Appian, B. C. ii. 133; Dio Cass. xlv. 38, 40; Cic. Phil. xi. 6, xiii. 12; Fam. x. 33).—4. Aquila Romanus, a rhetorician, who probably lived in the third century after Christ, wrote a small work entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Eloentionis, which is usually printed with Rutilius Lupus.—Editions. By Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1768, reprinted with additional notes by Frotseher, Lips. 1831.

Aquilāria (Alhouareah), a town on the coast of Zeugitana in Africa, on the W. side of Hermaeum Fr. (C. Bon), the E. extremity of the Gulf of Carthage. It was a good landing-place in summer (Ctes. B. C. ii. 23).

Aquilēia (Aquileiensis: Aquileia or Aglar), a town in Gallia Transpadana at the very top of the Adriatic, between the rivers Sontius and Natiso, about 60 stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Romans in B.C. 182 as a bulwark against the N. barbarians, and is said to have derived its name from the favourable omen of an eagle (aquila) appearing to the colonists (Liv. xl. 84, xliii. 17; Vell. Pat. i. 15). As it was the key of Italy on the NE., it was made one of the strongest fortresses of the Romans (Amm. Marc. xxi. 12). From its position it became also a most flourishing place of commerce: the Via Aemilia was continued to this town, and from it all the roads to Rhaetia, Noricum, Pannonia, Istria, and Dalmatia branched off. Under Diocletian it was the chief city of Venetia and Histria. Ausonius (Ord. Nob. Urb. 6) reckons it as ninth of the cities of the Roman Empire in the 4th century, and in Italy inferior only to Rome, Milan, and Capua. It was taken and completely destroyed by Attila in A.D. 452; its inhabitants escaped to the Lagoons, where Venice was afterwards built.

Aquila Severa, Julia, a vestal virgin, whom Elagabalus married, after divorcing Paula (Dio Cass. lxxix. 9).

Aquilius or Aquilius. 1. M', consul B.C. 129, finished the war against Aristonicus, son of Eumenes of Pergamus. He laid down the road in the province of Asia from Ephesus to Apamea. On his return to Rome he was accused of maladministration in his province, but was acquitted by bribing the judges (Just. xxxvi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 4).—2. M', consul B.C. 101, conquered the slaves in Sicily, who had revolted under Athenion. In 93 he was accused of maladministration in Sicily, but was acquitted. In 88 he went into Asia as one of the consular legates in the Mithridatic war: he was defeated and handed over by the inhabitants of Mytilene to Mithridates, who put him to death by pouring molten gold down his throat (Appian, Mithrid. vii. 19, 21; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Cic. pro Leg. Man. 5; Athen. p. 213.)

Aquilius Gallus. [GALLUS.]

Aquilônia (Aquilônai), a town of Samnium, E. of Bovianum, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars (Liv. x. 38-43).

Aquinum (Aquinas: Aquino), a town of the Volscians, E. of the river Melpis, in a fertile country; a Roman municipium and afterwards a colony; the birth-place of Juvenal; celebrated for its purple dye (Strab. p. 237; Tac. Hist. i. 88, ii. 63; Hor. Ep. i. 10, 27; Juv. iii. 319; Cic. Phil. ii. 41, 106).

Aquitania. 1. The country of the Aquitani, extended from the Garumna (Garonne) to the Pyrenees, and from the ocean to Gallia Narbonensis; it was first conquered by Caesar's legates, and again upon a revolt of the inhabitants in the time of Augustus (Caes. B. G. i. 1, viii. 46; Appian, B. C. v. 92; Dio Cass. xlviii. 49; Suet. Aug. 21).—2. The Roman province of Aquitania, formed in the reign of Augustus, was of much wider extent, and was bounded on the N. by the Ligeris (Loire), on the W. by the ocean, on the S. by the Pyrenees, and on the E. by the Mons Cevenna, which separated it from Gallia Narbonensis (Strab. p. 177; Plin. iv. 108).—The Aquitani were one of the three races which inhabited Gaul; they were of Iberian or Spanish origin, and differed from the Gauls and Belgians in language, customs, and physical peculiarity (Dio Cass. l.c.; Strab. l.c.).

Ara Ubiorum, in the Civitas Ubiorum (= Cologne) was a sanctuary for the surrounding province, not merely for the Ubi, since one of the Cherusci is mentioned as priest (Tac. Ann. i. 37, 39, 45, 57; see COLONIA AGRIPPINA).

Arābia (ἡ Ἀραβία: Ἀραβί, pl. Ἀραβες, Ἀραβῶν, Arabs, Arābūs, pl. Arābēs, Arābī: Arabia), a country at the SW. extremity of Asia, forming a large peninsula, of a sort of hatchet shape, bounded on the W. by the ARABICUS SINUS (Red Sea), on the S. and SE. by the ERYTHRAEUM MARE (Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb and Indian Ocean) and on the NE. by the PERSICUS SINUS (Persian Gulf). On the N. or land side its boundaries were somewhat indefinite, but it seems to have included the whole of the desert country between Egypt and Syria, on the one side, and the banks of the Euphrates on the other; and it was often considered to extend even further on both sides, so as to include, on the E., the S. part of Mesopotamia along the left bank of the Euphrates, and, on the W., the part of Palestine E. of the Jordan, and the part of Egypt between the Red Sea and the E. margin of the Nile valley, which, even as a part of Egypt, was called Arabiae Nomos. In the stricter sense of the name, which confines it to the peninsula itself, Arabia may be considered as bounded on the N. by a line from the head of the Red Sea (at Suez) to the mouth of the Tigris (Shat-el-Arab) which just about coincides with the parallel of 30° N. lat. It was divided into 3 parts: (1) Arabia Petraea (ἡ πετραία Ἀραβία: NW. part of El-Hejaz), including the triangular piece of land between the two heads of the Red Sea (the peninsula of M. Sinai) and the country immediately to the N. and NE.; and called from its capital Petra, while the literal signification of the name 'Rocky Arabia' agrees also with the nature of the country; (2) Arabia Deserta (El-Jebel), including the great Syrian Desert and a portion of the interior of the Arabian peninsula; (3) Arabia Felix (El-Nejed, El-Hejaz, El-Yemen, El-Hadramaut, Oman and El-Hejer), consisted of the whole country not included in the other two divisions; the ignorance of the ancients respecting the interior of the peninsula leading them to accept the name Arabia Felix, although much of it consists of a sandy desert of steppes and table land, interspersed with Oases (Wadis), and fringed with mountains, between which and the sea, especially on the W. coast, lies a belt of low land (called Tehamah), intersected by numerous mountain torrents, which irrigate the strips of land on their banks, and produce that fertility with which the ancients credited the whole peninsula (Strab. p. 767; Diod. ii. 48; Mela, iii. 8; Plin. vi. 142 f.). [The name Felix or εὐδαίμων, or in Plin. v. 65 beata, is said to have arisen from the Semitic word Jaman meaning 'right side'—i.e. 'south'—being misinterpreted to mean 'lucky.'] The width of the Tehamah is, in some places on the W. coast, as much as from one to two days' journey, but on the other side it is very narrow, except at the E. end of the peninsula (about Muskat in Oman) where for a small space its width is again a day's journey.—The inhabitants of Arabia were of the Semitic race. The NW. district (Arabia Petraea) was inhabited by the various tribes which constantly appear in Jewish history: the Amalekites, Midianites, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites &c. The Greeks and Romans called the inhabitants by the name of NABATHAEI, whose capital was Petra (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 4; Ptol. v. 17). The people of Arabia Deserta were called Arabes Scenitao (Σκηνῖται), from their dwelling in tents, and Arabes Nomades (Νομάδες), from their modo of life, which was that of wandering herdsmen, who supported themselves partly by their cattle, and to a great extent also by the plunder of caravans, as their unchanged descendants, the Bedouins, still do. The people of the Tchamah were (and are) of the same race; but their position led them at an early period to cultivate both agriculture and commerce, and to build considerable cities. The chief tribes were known by the following names, beginning S. of the Nabathæi on the W. coast: the Thamydēni and Minaei (in the S. part of Hejaz) in the neighbourhood of Mac-oraba (Mecca); the Sabæi and Homeritæ in the SW. part of the peninsula (Yemen); on the SE. coast, the Chatramolitæ and Adramitæ (in El-Hadramaut, a country very little known, even to the present day); on the E. and NE. coast the Omaūtæ and Dara-chēni (in Oman, and El-Asha or El-Hejer).—From the earliest known period a considerable traffic was carried on by the people in the N. (especially the Nabathæi) by means of caravans, and by those on the S. and E. coast by sea, in the productions of their own country (chiefly gums, spices, and precious stones), and in those of India and Arabia. Besides this peaceful intercourse with the neighbouring countries, they seem to have made military expeditions at an early period, for there can be no doubt that the Hyksos or 'Shepherd-kings,' who for some time ruled over Lower Egypt, were Arabians. On the other hand, they have successfully resisted all attempts to subjugate them. The alleged conquests of some of the Assyrian kings could only have affected small portions of the country on the N. Of the Persian empire we are expressly told that they were independent. Alexander the Great died too soon even to attempt his contemplated scheme of circumnavigating the peninsula and subduing the inhabitants. The Greek kings of Syria made unsuccessful attacks upon the Nabathæi. Under Augustus, Aelius Gallus, assisted by the Nabathæi, made an expedition into Arabia Felix, but was compelled to retreat into Egypt to save his army from famine and the climate. Under Trajan, Arabia Petraea was conquered by A. Cornelius Palma (A.D. 107), and the country of the Nabathæi became a Roman province, to which in 295 Auranitis, Batanea, and Trachoutis were added (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 14; Amm. Marc. xiv. 8). In the 5th century there were two divisions of this province; the northern called Arabia with the chief city Bostra, the southern called Palaestina Tertia or Palaestina Salutaris of which Petra was the capital. Some partial and temporary footing was gained on the SW. coast by the Ethiopians; and both in this direction and from the N. Christianity was early introduced into the country, where it spread to a great extent, and continued to exist side by side with the old religion (which was Sabæism, or the worship of heavenly bodies), and with some admixture of Judaism, until the total revolution produced by the rise of Mohammedanism in 622.

Arābicus Sinus (ὁ Ἀραβικὸς κόλπος: Red Sea), a long narrow gulf between Africa and Arabia, connected on the S. with the Indian Ocean by the Angustiae Divae (Straits of Babel-Mandeb), and on the N. divided into two heads by the peninsula of Arabia Petraea (Penins. of Sinai), the E. of which was called Sinus Aelanites or Aelaniticus (Gulf of Akaba), and the W. Sinus Heroopolites or Heroopoliti- cus (Gulf of Suez), which must in Strabo's time have extended 40 miles north of its present limit, and included Lake Timsah. The upper part of the sea was known at a very early period; but it was not explored in its whole extent till the maritime expeditions of the Ptolemies. Respecting its other name see ERYTHRAEUM MARE.

Arābis (Ἀραβίς, also Ἀράβιος, Ἀρβίς, Ἀρταβίς, and Ἀρτάβιος: Poorally or Agbor), a river of Gedrosia, falling into the Indian Ocean 1000 stadia (100 geog. miles) W. of the mouth of the Indus, and dividing the Orītae on its W. from the Arabitæ or Arbies on its E., who had a city named Arbis on its E. bank (Strab. p. 720; Ptol. vi. 19).

Arabisca (Alanguer), a town of the Lusitani on the right bank of the Tagus.

Arachnaeum (Ἀραχναῖον), a mountain forming the boundary between Argolis and Corinthia (Paus. ii. 25, 10).

Arachnē, a Lydian maiden, daughter of Idmon of Colophon, a famous dyer in purple. Arachne excelled in the art of weaving, and, proud of her talent, ventured to challenge Athene to compete with her. The work of Athene showed the Olympian gods in all their dignity. Arachne produced a piece of cloth in which the amours of the gods were woven, and as Athene was indignant at the taunt, and jealous of the faultless work, she tore it to pieces. Arachne in despair hanged herself: the goddess loosened the rope and saved her life, but the rope was changed into a cobweb and Arachne herself into a spider (ἀράχνη), the animal most odious to Athene. (Ov. Met. vi. 1 seq.; Verg. Georg. iv. 246.) The myth seems to represent the rivalry between the Lydian and Greek arts of weaving. Nonnus (Dion. xviii. 215) makes her an Assyrian.

Arāchōsiā (Ἀραχωσία: Ἀραχωτοί or -ῶται: SE. part of Afghanistan and NE. part of Beloochistan), one of the extreme E. provinces of the Persian (and afterwards of the Parthian) empire, bounded on the E. by the Indus, on the N. by the Paropamisadae, on the W. by Drangiana, and on the S. by Gedrosia. It was a fertile country, watered by the river Arachotus (Ἀράχωτος), some distance from which stood a city of the same name, Arachotus, which was said to have been built by Semiramis, and which was the capital of the province until the foundation of ALEXANDRIA. The shortest road from Persia to India passed through Arachosia (Strab. p. 723; Arrian, An. vi. 17).

Arāchōtus. [ARACHOSIA.]

Arachthos or Arētho (Ἀραχθος or Ἀρέθων: Arta), a river of Epirus, rises in M. Laconia or the Tympean mountains, and flows into the Ambracian gulf, S. of Ambracia: it is deep and difficult to cross, and unavigable up to Ambracia (Strab. pp. 325, 327).

Aracynthos (Ἀράκυνθος: Zigos), a mountain on the SW. coast of Aetolia near Plenrou, sometimes placed in Acarnania (Strab. pp. 450, 460). Virgil and Propertius, however, place it between Attica and Boeotia, and hence mention it in connexion with Amphion, the Boeotian hero. (Propert. iii. 13, 41; Actaco [i.e. Attico] Aracyntho, Verg. Ecl. ii. 24.)

Arādus (Ἀραδος: Ἀράδιος, Arādus: in O. T. Arvad: Ruad), an island off the coast of Phoenicia, at the distance of 20 stadia (2 geog. miles), with a city which occupied the whole surface of the island, 7 stadia in circumference, which was said to have been founded by exiles from Sidon, and which was a very flourishing place under its own kings, under the Seleucidae, and under the Romans. It possessed a harbour on the mainland, called ANTARADUS (Strab. p. 753).

Aræ Philaenorum. [PHILAENORUM ARAE.]

Aræthyreä (Ἀραιθυρέα), daughter of Aras, an autochthon who was believed to have built Arantea, the most ancient town in Phliasia. After her death, her brother Aoris called the country of Phliasia Aræthyreä, in honour of his sister (Paus. ii. 12, 5; Hom. Il. ii. 571; Strab. p. 382).

Arāphēn (Ἀραφήν; Ἀραφήνιος, Ἀραφήνοθεν; Rafina), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Aegæis, on the E. of Attica, N. of the river Eriasinus, not far from its mouth.

Arar or Arāris (Σάβνη), a river of Gaul, rises in the Vosges, receives the Dubis (Doubs) from the E., after which it becomes navigable, and flows with a quiet stream into the Rhone at Lugdunum (Lyon). In the time of Ammiaus (A.D. 370) it was also called Sauconna, and in the middle ages Sangona, whence its modern name Sabne (Amm. Marc. xv. 11).

Ararōs (Ἀραρός), an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, son of Aristophanes, flourished B.C. 375. (Fragments in Meineke.)

Aras. [ARÆTHYREÄ.]

Araspes (Ἀράσπης), a Mede, and a friend of the elder Cyrus, is one of the characters in Xenophon's Cyropaedia. He contends with Cyrus that love has no power over him, but shortly afterwards refutes himself by falling in love with Panthea, whom Cyrus had committed to his charge. (Xen. Cyr. v. 1, vi. 1, 36; ABRADATAS.)

Arātus (Ἀρατος). 1. The celebrated general of the Achæans, son of Clinias, was born at Sicyon, B.C. 271. On the murder of his father by ABANTIDAS, Aratus, who was then a child, was conveyed to Argos, where he was brought up. When he had reached the age of 20 he gained possession of his native city, B.C. 251, deprived the usurper Nicoles of his power, and united Sicyon to the Achæan League, which gained in consequence a great accession of power. [ACHAEL.] In 245 he was elected general of the League, which office he frequently held in subsequent years. Through his influence a great number of the Greek cities joined the League; but he excelled more in negotiation than in war, and in his war with the Aetolians and Spartans he was often defeated. Indeed, it must be admitted that he showed positive cowardice in battle strangely contrasted with the boldness of his plans and policy. In 234, through the patriotism of Lydiadas, tyrant of Megalopolis, that city was joined to the Achæan League; but it must be observed, as detracting from the well-deserved fame of Aratus, that his jealousy of Lydiadas often interfered with the interests of the League. Thus he opposed the scheme of Lydiadas for union with Argos in 229, but when he himself became general he effected it. The death of Lydiadas also at Laodicea (226) and the consequent defeat by the Spartans were due to the want of courage which Aratus showed in the battle. A still greater calamity was his rejection of the proposal of Cleomenes to bring Sparta into the League, and his resolution to seek the friendship of Antigonus, and to surrender Acrocorinthus to a Macedonian garrison—certainly the greatest mistake of his life. To strengthen himself against Aetolia and Sparta he cultivated the friendship of Antigonus Doson, and of his successor Philip; but as Philip was evidently anxious to make himself master of all Greece, dissensions arose between him and Aratus, and the latter was eventually poisoned in 213 by the king's order. Divine honours were paid to him by his countrymen, and an annual festival (Ἀράτεια; see Dict. of Antiq.) established. Aratus wrote Commentaries, being a history of his own times down to B.C. 220, which are commended by Polybius (ii. 40). Aratus unquestionably deserves the credit of the development and early successes of the League, and his extraordinary personal ascendency, even after reverses, with the citizens of the League is a strong testimony to his political ability; but he ruined the chances of the Achæan League to become a lasting and independent bulwark of Greece when he rejected the union with Sparta and gave the key of the position to Macedonia (Plut. Arat. and Agis; Polyb. ii., iv., vii., viii.).—2. Of Soli, afterwards Pompeiopolis, in Cilicia, or (according to one authority) of Tarsus, flourished B.C. 270, and spent all the latter part of his life at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. He wrote two astronomical poems, entitled Phaenomena (Φαινόμενα), consisting of 732 verses, and Diosemeia (Διοσημεία), of 422. The design of the Phaenomena is to give an introduction to the knowledge of the constellations, with the rules for their risings and settings. The Diosemeia consists of prognostics of the weather from astronomical phaenomena, with an account of its effects upon animals. It appears to be an imitation of Hesiod, and to have been imitated by Virgil in some parts of the Georgics. The style of these two poems is distinguished by elegance and accuracy; but it wants originality and poetic elevation. That they became very popular both in the Grecian and the Roman world (cum sole et luna semper Aratus erit, Ov. Am. i. 15, 16) is proved by the number of commentaries and Latin translations. Parts of three poetical Latin translations are preserved: one written by Cicero when very young; one by Caesar Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus; and one by Festus Avenius.—Editions. By Voss, Heidelb. 1824, with a German poetical version; by Buttman, Berol. 1826; and by Bekker, Berol. 1828.

Arauris (Herault), erroneously Rauraris in Strabo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in M. Ceveuna, and flows into the Mediterranean (Strab. p. 182; Mel. ii. 5).

Arausio (Orange), a town of the Cavari or Cavares, and a Roman colony, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Arclate to Vienna: it still contains remains of an amphitheatre, circus, aqueduct, triumphal arch, &c. (Strab. p. 185; Mel. ii. 5; Plin. iii. 36).

Araxes (Ἀράξης), the name of several rivers.—1. In Armenia Major (Eraskh or Aras), rises in M. Aba or Abus (nr. Erzeroum), from the opposite side of which the Euphrates flows; and, after a great bend SE. and then NE., joins the Cyrus (Kour), which flows down from the Caucasus, and falls with it into the Caspian by two mouths, in about 39° 20' N. Lat. The lower part, past ARTAXATA, flows through a plain, which was called τὸ Ἀραξηνδὸν πεδῖον (Strab. p. 531; Ptol. v. 13). Herodotus, i. 202, iv. 40, is clearly speaking of this Araxes, which, he says, runs eastward from the country of the Matieni into the Caspian; but he seems to be misinformed about the position of the Massagetæ and to place them and other tribes too far west, or the Araxes and Caspian too far east. The upper branch or affluent of the Araxes is called Phasis (Xen. Anab. iv. 6, 4). [PHASIS.] The Araxes was proverbial for the force of its current; and hence Virgil (Aen. viii. 728) says pontem indignatus Araxes, with special reference to the failure of Alexander to throw a bridge over it (Arr. An. vii. 16, 3).—2. In Mesopotamia. [CHABORAS.]—3. In Persis (Bend-Emir), the river on which Persepolis stood, rises in the mountains E. of the head of the Persian Gulf, and flows SE. into a salt lake (Bakhtegan) not far below Persepolis.—4. The PENEUS, in Thessaly, was called Araxes (ἀράσσω) from the violence of its torrent (Strab. l. c.).

Araxus (Ἄραξος; C. Papa), a promontory of Achaia near the confines of Elis.

Arbaces (Ἀρβάκης), the founder of the Median empire, according to Ctesias (Diod. ii. 33), is said to have taken Nineveh in conjunction with Belesis, the Babylonian, and to have destroyed the Assyrian empire under the reign of Sardanapalus. Ctesias assigns 28 years to the reign of Arbaces, apparently about B.C. 870, and makes his dynasty consist of eight kings. This account differs from that of Herodotus, who makes DEIOCES the first king of Media, and assigns only four kings to his dynasty. There seems to be in Ctesias (who is frequently confuted by the inscriptions) a confused allusion to the overthrow of Sardanapalus by the Babylonians in alliance with Cyaxares (Kastarit), king of Media at a much later date. [CYAXARES.]

Arbela (τὰ Ἀρβηλα; Erville), a city of Adiabene in Assyria, between the rivers Lyeus and Caprus (the greater and lesser Zab); celebrated as the head-quarters of Darius Codomannus, before the last battle in which he was overthrown by Alexander (B.C. 331), which is hence frequently called the battle of Arbela, though it was really fought near GAUGAMELA, about 25 miles W. of Arbela. The district about Arbela was called Arbelitis (Ἀρβηλίτις). (Strab. p. 737; Diod. xvii. 53; Arr. An. iii. 8; Curt. iv. 9; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6.)

Arbis. [ARABIS.]

Arbucāla or Arbocāla (Alberca?), the chief town of the VACCÆI in Hispania Tarraconensis, north of the Tagus, in the modern province of Salamanca, taken by Hannibal after a long resistance (Liv. xxi. 5).

Arbuscūla, a celebrated female actor in pantomimes in the time of Cicero (Cic. Att. iv. 15; Hor. Sat. i. 10, 76).

Arca or -ae (Ἄρκα, or -ai; Tell-Arka), a very ancient city in the N. of Phoenicia, not far from the sea-coast, at the foot of M. Lebanon: a colony under the Romans, named Area Caesarea or Caesarea Libani: the birthplace of the emperor Alexander Severus, and famous for a temple of Astarte (Ptol. v. 15; Macrob. Sat. i. 21; Vit. Alex. Sev.).

Arcādīa (Ἀρκαδία; Ἄρκα, pl. Ἀρκαίδες), a country in the middle of Peloponnesus, was bounded on the E. by Argolis, on the N. by Achaia, on the W. by Elis, and on the S. by Messenia and Laconica. Next to Laconica it was the largest country in the Peloponnesus: its greatest length was about 50 miles, its breadth from 35 to 41 miles (Strab. pp. 335-337). It was surrounded on all sides by mountains, which likewise traversed it in every direction, and it may be regarded as the Switzerland of Greece. Its principal mountains were Cyllene and Erymanthus in the N., Artemisius in the E., and Parthenius, Maenalus, and Lycacus in the S. and SW. The Alpheius, the greatest river of Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia, and flows through a considerable part of the country, receiving numerous affluents. The N. and E. parts of the country were barren and unproductive; the W. and S. were more fertile, with numerous valleys where corn was grown. The Arcadians, said to be descended from the eponymous hero ARCAS, regarded themselves as the most ancient people in Greece: the Greek writers call them indigenous (ἀντόχθονες) and Pelasgians, and Pelasgus is the name given to their earliest king (Paus. viii. 1). They were said to have 'lived before the moon' (πρὸ σέληνοι), which is probably a corruption of a statement that they were in the Peloponnesus before the Syllani or Hellenes. Their claim to antiquity is just, since in the security of their mountains they withstood the Dorian conquest. In consequence of the physical peculiarity of the country, they were chiefly employed in hunting and the tending of cattle, whence their worship of Pan, who was especially the god of Arcadia, and of Artemis. They were a people simple in their habits and moderate in their desires: they were passionately fond of music, and cultivated it with great success (soli cantare periti Arcades, Verg. Ecl. x. 39), which circumstance was supposed to soften the natural roughness of their character. The Arcadians, thanks to their rugged country, experienced fewer changes than any other people in Greece. Like the other Greek peoples, they were originally governed by kings, but are said to have abolished monarchy towards the close of the second Messenian war, and to have stoned to death their last king, Aristocrates, because he betrayed his allies the Messenians. The different towns then became independent republics, of which the most important were MANTINEA, TEGEA, ORCHOMENUS, PSOPHIS, and PHENEOS, which lie in the secluded valleys of the north and east, protected by their mountains; to the west the valleys of the Alpheus and Ladou are more accessible, and here, accordingly, were cantons of hamlets rather than independent cities: in the upper valley of the Alpheus, the Maenaliens, and Eutresians; lower down, the Parrhasians, Cynurians, and Heraeans; in the valley of the Ladon the Azanes. The bond of union from early times was religious. Pan-arcadian festivals were held to Zeus at M. Lycaeus, to Athene Alea at Tegea, and to Artemis Hymnia at Orchomenus (Paus. viii. 2, 5, 53). Like the Swiss, the Arcadians frequently served as mercenaries, and in the Peloponnesian war they were found in the armies of both the Laedaemonians and Athenians. The Laedaemonians made many attempts to obtain possession of parts of Arcadia, but these attempts were finally frustrated by the battle of Leuctra (B.C. 371); and in order to resist all future aggressions on the part of Sparta, the Coin of Arcadia.

Obv., head of Zeus; rev., Pan, seated on a rock, holding a knotted shepherd's staff.

Arcadians, upon the advice of Epaminondas, and led by Lycomedes, built the city of MEGALOPOLIS, and instituted a general assembly of the whole nation, called the Myrii ('Μυριοί, Dict. of Antiq. s.v.). This Arcadian League did not last long. Mantinea and Tegea were at enmity already before the death of Epaminondas, and though the assembly of the Ten Thousand existed in the time of Demosthenes we have no trace of an Arcadian League after the end of the fourth cent. B.C. The Arcadian cities subsequently joined the Achæan League, and finally became subject to the Romans.

Arcadius, emperor of the East (A.D. 395–408), elder son of Theodosius I., was born in Spain, A.D. 383. On the death of Theodosius he became emperor of the East, while the West was given to his younger brother Honorius. Arcadius possessed neither physical nor intellectual vigour, and was entirely governed by unworthy favourites. At first he was ruled by Rufinus, the præfect of the East; and on the murder of the latter, soon after the accession of Arcadius, the government fell into the hands of the eunuch Eutropius. Eutropius was put to death in 399, and his power now devolved upon Gainas, the Goth; but upon his revolt and death in 401 Arcadius became entirely dependent upon his wife Eudoxia, and it was through her influence that St. Chrysostom was exiled in Arcadius, Roman Emperor, A.D. 395–408.

Obs., Dominus Noster Arcadius Pater Patriæ Augustus; rev., Concord. The letters CON signify the mint of Constantinople, and ob the purity of the metal (72 soldi to one pound of gold).

404. Arcadius died on May 1, 408, leaving the empire to his son Theodosius II., who was a minor. (Sozom. viii.; Socr. Hist. Eccl. vi.; Cedren. i.; Claudian.)

Arcanum. [ARPINUM.]

Arcas ('Αρκας), king and eponymous hero of the Arcadians, son of Zeus and Callisto, grandson of Lycaon and father of Aphidas, Elatus, and Azan. He taught his subjects the arts of baking and weaving. Arcas was the boy whose flesh his grandfather Lycaon placed before Zeus to try his divine character. Zeus upset the table (τράπεζα) which bore the dish, and destroyed the house of Lycaon by lightning, but restored Arcas to life. When Arcas had grown up, he built on the site of his father's house the town of Trapezus. Arcas in hunting followed his mother Callisto, who had the form of a she-bear, into the temple of Zeus Lycaeus, a profanation which by Arcadian law would have caused their death, but Zeus changed them into stars as Arctophylax and the Great Bear. The legends show traces of primitive totemism, and of human sacrifices. (Hyg. Astr. 2; Paus. viii. 4; Ov. Met. ii. 496, Fast. ii. 183.)

Arcesilāus or Arcesilas ('Αρκεσίλαος, 'Αρκεσίλας), a Greek philosopher (about B.C. 315–240), son of Seuthes or Scythes, was born at Pitane in Aolis. He studied at first in his native town under Autolycus, a mathematician, and afterwards went to Athens, where he became the disciple first of Theophrastus and next of Polemo and of Crantor. He succeeded Crates about B.C. in the chair of the Academy, and became the founder of the second or middle (μέση) Academy. He is said to have died in his 76th year from a fit of drunkenness (Diog. Laërt. iv. 30). His philosophy was of a sceptical character, though it did not go so far as that of the followers of Pyrrhon. He did not doubt the existence of truth in itself, only our capacities for obtaining it by the senses or by reason, and he combated most strongly the dogmatism of the Stoics, as regards Zeno's doctrine of the καταληπτική φαντασία (or impression producing conviction), holding that no impressions provided a testimony of their truth: hence the necessity of suspended judgment (ἐποχή), though action according to our reason was not precluded (Cic. de Orat. iii. 18, 67, Acad. ii. 24, 77).

Arcēsilāus ('Αρκεσίλαος). 1. Son of Lycus and Theobule, leader of the Boeotians in the Trojan war, slain by Hector.—2. The name of four kings of Cyrene. [BATTUS and BATTIADÆ.]

Arcēsius ('Αρκεσίσιος), son of Zeus and Euryodia, father of Laërtes, and grandfather of Ulysses. Hence both Laërtes and Ulysses are called Arcesiades ('Αρκεσιιάδης) (Od. xvi. 118; Ov. Met. xiii. 144). According to Eustathius (ad Hom. 1961), his mother was a she-bear, Cephalus having been told by an oracle that he should have a son by the first female being whom he met on his way home. The story doubtless arose from his name.

Archaeōpōlis ('Αρχαιοπόλις), the later capital of Colchis; near the river Phasis.

Archagathus, a Greek physician, the first who made medicine a profession at Rome. He came from the Peloponnese, and settled at Rome B.C. 219, where a shop was bought for him, and he received the Jus Quiritium. His practice was mainly surgical (Plin. xxix. 12).

Archandrōpōlis ('Αρχάνδρου πόλις), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Nile, between Canopus and Cercasorus.

Archēdēmus ('Αρχέδημος: Dor. 'Αρχέδαμος). 1. A popular leader at Athens, took the first step against the generals who had gained the battle of Arginusæ, B.C. 406. The comic poets called him 'blear-eyed' (γλάμων), and said that he was a foreigner, and had obtained the franchise by fraud. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1, Mem. ii. 9; Arist. Ran. 419, 588; Lys. c. Alc. § 25.)—2. An Aetolian (called Archidamnus by Livy), commanded the Aetolian troops which assisted the Romans in their war with Philip (B.C. 199–197). He afterwards took an active part against the Romans, and eventually joined Perseus, whom he accompanied in his flight after his defeat in 168.—3. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, mentioned by Cicero, Seneca, and other ancient writers.

Archēdīcus ('Αρχέδικος), an Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, supported Antipater and the Macedonian party.

Archēgētes ('Αρχηγέτης), a surname of Apollo.

Archēlāis ('Αρχελαίς). 1. In Cappadocia (Akserei), on the Cappadox, a tributary of the Halys, a city founded by Archelaus, the last king of Cappadocia, and made a Roman colony by the emperor Claudius.—2. A town of Palestine, near Jericho, founded by Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great.

Archēlāus ('Αρχελάος). 1. Son of HEROD the Great, was appointed by his father as his successor, and received from Augustus Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, with the title of ethnarch. In consequence of his tyrannical government, the Jews accused him before Augustus in the 10th year of his reign (A.D. 7): Augustus banished him to Vienna in Gaul, where he died.—

2. King of MACEDONIA (B.C. 413–399), an illegitimate son of Perdiccas II., obtained the throne by the murder of his half-brother. He improved the internal condition of his kingdom, and was a warm patron of art and literature. His palace was adorned with magnificent paintings by Zeuxis; and Euripides, Agathon, and other men of eminence, were among his guests. According to some accounts Archelaus was accidentally slain in a hunting party by his favourite, Craterus; but according to other accounts he was murdered by Craterus. (Diod. xiv. 37; Aristot. Pol. v. 10.)—3. A general of MITHRIDATES. In B.C. 87 he was sent into Greece by Mithridates with a large fleet and army; at first he met with considerable success, held most of northern Greece, and took Peiræus. After sustaining a siege, he withdrew to Boeotia, where he was twice defeated by Sulla in 86, near Chaeronea and Orehomenos. Thereupon he was commissioned by Mithridates to sue for peace, which he obtained; but subsequently being suspected of treachery by the king, he deserted to the Romans just before the commencement of the second Mithridatic war, B.C. 81. (Plut. Sull. 11–24; Appian, Mithr. 17–64; Vell. Pat. ii. 25.)—4. Son of the preceding, was raised by Pompey, in B.C. 63, to the dignity of priest of the goddess (Enyo or Bellona) at Comana in Pontus or Cappadocia. In 56 or 55 Archelaus became king in Egypt by marrying Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who, after the expulsion of her father, had obtained the sovereignty of Egypt. Archelaus, however, was king of Egypt only for 6 months, for Gabinus marched with an army into Egypt in order to restore Ptolemy Auletes, and in the battle which ensued Archelaus perished. (Bell. Alex. 66; Strab. pp. 558, 796; Dio Cass. xxxix. 58; Cic. pro Rab. Post. 8.)—5. Son of No. 4, and his successor in the office of high-priest of Comana, was deprived of his dignity by Julius Caesar in 47 (Cic. Fam. xv. 4; Bell. Alex. 66).—6. Son of No. 5, received from Antony, in B.C. 36, the kingdom of Cappadocia—a favour which he owed to the charms of his mother Glaphyra. After the battle of Actium Octavianus not only left Archelaus in the possession of his kingdom, but subsequently added to it a part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. But having incurred the enmity of Tiberius by the attention which he had paid to C. Caesar, he was summoned to Rome soon after the accession of Tiberius and accused of treason. His life was spared, but he was obliged to remain at Rome, where he died soon after, A.D. 17. Cappadocia was then made a Roman province. (Strab. pp. 540, 796; Dio Cass. li. 3; Tac. Ann. ii. 42; Suet. Tib. 37, Gal. 1.)—7. A philosopher, probably born at Athens, though others make him a native of Miletus, flourished about B.C. 450. The philosophical system of Archelaus is remarkable as forming a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece. As a pupil of Anaxagoras he belonged to the Ionian school, but he added to the physical system of his teacher some attempts at moral speculation. Against the statement that Socrates was taught by him (Diog. Laërt. ii. 19) it must be noted that Plato and Xenophon say nothing about it.—8. A Greek poet, in Egypt, lived under the Ptolemies, and wrote epigrams, some of which are still extant in the Greek Anthology.—9. A sculptor of Priene, son of Apollonius, made the marble bas-relief representing the Apotheosis of Homer, which formerly belonged to the Colonna family at Rome, and is now in the British Museum. This work, which probably belongs to the early part of the reign of Tiberius, is noticed as a mixture of styles. The upper part is composed more in the painter's manner than the sculptor's (as is sometimes found in the Alexandrian school); the lower part revives the older style of Greek votive tablets.

Archēmōrus (Ἀρχέμορος), or OPHELTES, son of the Nemean king Lycurgus and Eurydice. When the Seven heroes on their expedition against Thebes stopped at Nemea to obtain water, Hypsipyle, the nurse of the child Opheltes, while showing the way to the Seven, left the child alone. In the meantime, the child was killed by a serpent. The Seven gave him burial; but as Amphiarus saw in this accident an omen boding destruction to himself and his companions, they called the child Archemorus, that is, 'Forerunner of Death,' and instituted the Nemean games in honour of him. His death is frequently represented in works of art. (Pind. Nem. viii. 51, x. 28; Paus. ii. 15, viii. 48; Apollod. iii. 6; Stat. Theb. iv. 624.)

Archestrātus (Ἀρχέστρατος), of Gela or Syracuse, about B.C. 350, wrote a poem on the Art of Cookery, which was imitated or translated by Ennius in his Carmina Hedyppathetica or Hedyppathica (from ἡδυπάθεια).—Fragments by Ribbeck, Berlin, 1877.

Archias (Ἀρχίας). 1. An Heraclid of Corinth, left his country in consequence of the death of ACTÆON, and founded Syracuse, B.C. 734, by command of the Delphic oracle (Thuc. vi. 3; Paus. v. 7, 2; Strab. pp. 262, 269).—2. A Licinius Archias, a Greek poet, born at Antioch in Syria, about B.C. 120, very early obtained celebrity by his verses. In 102 he came to Rome, and was received in the most friendly way by many of the Roman nobles, especially by the Luculli, from whom he afterwards obtained the gentile name of Licinius. After a short stay at Rome he accompanied L. Lucullus, the elder, to Sicily, and followed him, in the banishment to which he was sentenced for his management of the slave war in that island, to Heraclea in Lucania, in which town Archias was enrolled as a citizen; and as this town was a state united with Rome by a foedus, he subsequently obtained the Roman franchise in accordance with the Lex Plautia Papiria passed in B.C. 89. At a later time he accompanied L. Lucullus the younger to the Mithridatic war. Soon after his return, a charge was brought against him in 61 of assuming the citizenship illegally, and the trial came on before Q. Cicero, who was praetor this year. He was defended by his friend M. Cicero in the extant speech Pro Archia, in which the orator, after briefly discussing the legal points of the case, rests the defence of his client upon his surpassing merits as a poet, which entitled him to the Roman citizenship. We may presume that Archias was acquitted, though we have no formal statement of the fact. Archias wrote a poem on the Cimbric war in honour of Marius; another on the Mithridatic war in honour of Lucullus; and at the time of his trial was engaged on a poem in honour of Cicero's consulship. No fragments of these works are extant; and it is doubtful whether the epigrams preserved under the name of Archias in the Greek Anthology were really written by him. (Cic. pro Arch., ad Att. i. 16; Quintil. x. 7, 19.)

Archidāmus (Ἀρχίδαμος), the name of 5 kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Anaxidamus, contemporary with the Tegeatan war, which followed soon after the second Messenian, B.C. 668 (Paus. iii. 7, 6).—2. Son of Zeuxidamus, succeeded his grandfather Leotyichides, and reigned B.C. 469–427. During his reign, B.C. 464, Sparta was made a heap of ruins by a tremendous earthquake; and for the next 10 years he was engaged in war against the revolted Helots and Messenians. Towards the end of his reign the Peloponnesian war broke out: he recommended his countrymen not rashly to embark in the war, and he appears to have taken a more correct view of the real strength of Athens than any other Spartan. After the war had been declared (B.C. 431) he invaded Attica, and held the supreme command of the Peloponnesian forces till his death in 429. (Hdt. vi. 71; Thuc. i.–iii.; Diod. xi. 63; Paus. iii. 7.)—3. Grandson of No. 2, and son of Agesilaus II., reigned B.C. 361–338. During the lifetime of his father he took an active part in resisting the Thebans and the various other enemies of Sparta, and in 367 he defeated the Arcadians and Argives in the ‘Tearless Battle,’ so called because he had won it without losing a man. In 362 he defended Sparta against Epaminondas. In the third Sacred war (B.C. 356–346) he assisted the Phocians. In 338 he went to Italy to aid the Tarantines against the Lucanians, and there fell in battle. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, vii. 1–5; Diod. xv., xvi.; Strab. p. 280.)—4. Grandson of No. 3, and son of Eudamidas I., was king in B.C. 296, when he was defeated by Demetrius Poliorcetes (Plut. Demetr. 35).—5. Son of Eudamidas II., and the brother of Agis IV. On the murder of Agis, in B.C. 240, Archidamus fled from Sparta, but afterwards obtained the throne by means of Aratus. He was, however, slain almost immediately after his return to Sparta. He was the last king of the Eurypontid race. (Plut. Cleom. 1, 5; Polyb. v. 37, viii. 1.)

Archigēnes (Ἀρχιγένης), an eminent Greek physician, born at Apamea in Syria, practised at Rome in the time of Trajan, A.D. 98–117. He published a treatise on the pulse, on which Galen wrote a Commentary. It seems to be founded on preconceived theory rather than practical observation. He was the most eminent physician of the sect of the Eclectici, and is mentioned by Juvenal as well as by other writers. Only a few fragments of his works remain. (Juv. vi. 236, xiii. 98, xiv. 252.)

Archilōchos (Ἀρχιλόχος), of Paros, was one of the earliest Ionian lyric poets, and the first Greek poet who composed Iambic verses according to fixed rules. He lived about B.C. 720–676. He was descended from a noble family, who held the priesthood in Paros. His grandfather was Tellis, his father Telesicles, and his mother a slave named Enipo. In the flower of his age (between B.C. 710 and 700), Archilochus went from Paros to Thasos with a colony, of which one account makes him the leader. The motive for this emigration can only be conjectured. It was most probably the result of a political change, to which cause was added, in the case of Archilochus, a sense of personal wrong. He had been a suitor to Neobule, one of the daughters of Lycambes, who first promised and afterwards refused to give his daughter to the poet. Enraged at this treatment, Archilochus attacked the whole family in an iambic poem, accusing Lycambes of perjury, and his daughters of the most abandoned lives. The verses were recited at the festival of Demeter, and produced such an effect that the daughters of Lycambes are said to have hanged themselves through shame (Hor. Epod. 6, 13). The bitterness which he expresses in his poems towards his native island seems to have arisen in part also from the low estimation in which he was held, as being the son of a slave. Neither was he more happy at Thasos. He draws the most melancholy picture of his adopted country, which he at length quitted in disgust.

While at Thasos, he incurred the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but, instead of being ashamed of the disaster, he recorded it in his verse: not, however, because he felt himself to be a coward, but because he felt that his courage had been proved beyond dispute, and he wished to express a cynical disapprobation of staying to be killed when there was nothing to be gained by it.

The feeling of Horace (if his case is real and not a mere copy of Archilochus) was different, since he never professed to be a warrior by nature. At length he returned to Paros, and in a war between the Parians and the people of Naxos, he fell by the hand of a Naxian named Calondas or Corax. The force and originality of Archilochus is vindicated by the Greek critics, who gave him a place in poetry beside Homer, Pindar, and Sophocles—perhaps as heading a fourth branch of poetry (Longin. xiii. 3; Vell. Pat. i. 5; Diog. Laërt. ix. 1; Cic. Orat. 1, 4). He shared with his contemporaries, Thaletas and Terpander, in the honour of establishing lyric poetry throughout Greece. The invention of the elegy is ascribed to him, as well as to Callinus; but it was on his satiric Iambic poetry that his fame was founded. His Iambics expressed the strongest feelings in the most unmeasured language. The licence of Ionian democracy and the bitterness of a disappointed man were united with the highest degree of poetical power to give them force and point. The emotion accounted most conspicuous in his verses was ‘rage’—‘Archilochum proprio rabies armavit iambo’ (Hor. Ar. Poët. 79).—The fragments of Archilochus are collected in Bergk’s Poet. Lyrici Graec. 1867, and by Liébel, Archilochi Reliquiae, Lips. 1812, 8vo.

Archimēdes (Ἀρχιμήδης), of Syracuse, the most famous of ancient mathematicians, was born B.C. 287. He was a friend, and according to Plutarch a kinsman, of Hiero, though his actual condition in life does not seem to have been elevated. In the early part of his life he travelled into Egypt, where he studied under Conon the Samian, a mathematician and astronomer. After visiting other countries, he returned to Syracuse (Diod. v. 37). Here he constructed for Hiero various engines of war, which, many years afterwards, were so far effectual in the defence of Syracuse against Marcellus as to convert the siege into a blockade, and delay the taking of the city for a considerable time (Plut. Marcell. 14–18; Polyb. viii. 5; Liv. xxiv. 34). The accounts of the performances of these engines are evidently exaggerated; and the story of the burning of the Roman ships by the reflected rays of the sun, though very current in later times, is probably a fiction: it is not recorded by Plutarch, Polybius, or Livy; the earliest writers who mention it are Galen (de Temp. iii. 2) and Lucian (Hipp. 2, 2). It is described more particularly by Tzetzes (Chil. ii. 103 f.). He superintended the building of a ship of extraordinary size for Hiero, of which a description is given in Athenæus (p. 206 D), where he is also said to have moved it to the sea by the help of a screw. He invented a machine called, from its form Coclea, and now known as the water-screw of Archimedes, for pumping the water out of the hold of this vessel (Vitr. x. 11; Dict. Ant. s.v. Coclea). Another celebrated proof of his genius was the construction of a sphere—a kind of orrery, representing the movements of the heavenly bodies (Cic. N. D. ii. 35, 88, Tusc. i. 25, 63; Ov. Fast. vi. 277; Claudian, Ep. 21). When Syracuse was taken (B.C. 212), Archimedes was killed by the Roman soldiers, being at the time intent upon a mathematical problem (Liv. xxv. 31; Plut. Marc. 19; Val. Max. viii. 7; Cic. de Fin. v. 19, 50). Upon his tomb was placed the figure of a sphere inscribed in a cylinder. When Cicero was quaestor in Sicily (75) he found this tomb near one of the gates of the city, almost hid amongst briars, and forgotten by the Syracusans (Cic. Tusc. v. 23, 64). The intellect of Archimedes was of the very highest order. He possessed, in a degree never exceeded, unless by Newton, the inventive genius which discovers new provinces of inquiry, and finds new points of view for old and familiar objects; the clearness of conception which is essential to the resolution of complex phenomena into their constituent elements; and the power and habit of intense and persevering thought, without which other intellectual gifts are comparatively fruitless. The following works of Archimedes have come down to us: 1. On Equiponderants and Centres of Gravity. 2. The Quadrature of the Parabola. 3. On the Sphere and Cylinder. 4. On Dimension of the Circle. 5. On Spirals. 6. On Conoids and Spheroids. 7. The Arenarius (ὁ ψαμμίτης), in which he calculates the sphere of the stars, and shows that it is possible to vote a number greater than that of the grains of sand which would fill it (64 figures in our notation is his estimate). His real point is to maintain that the power of notation is not limited, as his contemporaries thought. It is remarkable that he in some degree anticipated the invention of logarithms. 8. On Floating Bodies. 9. Lemma.—Editions. Of his works, by Torelli, Oxon. 1792; of the Spirals, by C. Scherling, Lübeck, 1865; of the Dimension of the Circle, by H. Menge, Coblenz, 1874. There is a French translation of his works, with notes, by F. Peyrard, Paris, 1808, and an English translation of the Arenarius by G. Anderson, London, 1784.

Archinus (Ἀρχίνος), one of the leading Athenians, who, with Thrasybulus and Anytus, overthrew the government of the Thirty, B.C. 403 (Dem. c. Tim. p. 742; Aeschin. c. Ctesiph. 61).

Archippus (Ἀρχίππος), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, about B.C. 415. In his play Ἰχθύς, he seems to have followed Magnes (as Aristophanes does in the Birds) in introducing animals, for he has a chorus of fishes.—Fragm. in Meineke.

Archytas (Ἀρχύτας). 1. Of Amphissa, a Greek epic poet, flourished about B.C. 300 (Athen. p. 82).—2. Of Tarentum, a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman, probably lived about B.C. 400, and onwards, so that he was contemporary with Plato, whose life he is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius (Tzetz. Chil. x. 359, xi. 362; cf. Plut. Dion. 18). He was 7 times the general of his city, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. Whether we are to believe that he was drowned while upon a voyage in the Adriatic, depends on the interpretation of Hor. Od. i. 28. It is generally supposed that, if the drowned body is not that of Archytas, his tomb was on the shore near the spot where the body lay; but we have no positive record of his death or the place of his burial. Our chief authority for the little known of his life is Diog. Laërt. viii. 79–83; cf. Cic. de Sen. 12, 39, Tusc. iv. 36, 78, de Rep. i. 38; Val. Max. iv. 1. As a philosopher, he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and through his genius and reputation raised the sect to something of its former influence in Magna Graecia, from which it finally declined as regards science soon after his death; and the Pythagorean mysteries alone maintained their position. Like the Pythagoreans in general, he paid much attention to mathematics. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanic, and constructed various machines and automata, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. He also applied mathematics with success to musical science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. His influence as a philosopher was so great, that Plato was undoubtedly indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed the idea of his categories, as well as some of his ethical principles, from Archytas. When Horace calls him mensorem arenae, he implies, rightly or wrongly, that Archytas had pursued the calculations of Archimedes in the ψαμμίτης.

Arconnēsus (Ἀρκόννησος: Ἀρκοννήσιος). 1. An island off the coast of Ionia, near Lebedus, also called Aspis (Strab. p. 643).—2. (Orak Ada), an island off the coast of Caria, opposite Halicarnassus, of which it formed the harbour (Strab. p. 656; Arrian. i. 23).

Arctīnus (Ἀρκτίνος), of Miletus, the most distinguished among the cyclic poets, probably lived about B.C. 776. Two epic poems were attributed to him. 1. The Aethiopsis, which was a kind of continuation of Homer's Iliad: its chief heroes were Memnon, king of the Ethiopians, and Achilles, who slew him, in vengeance for the slaughter of Antilochus. It narrates also the combat between the Greeks and Amazons, and the death of Penthesilea, and concludes with the death of Achilles, his funeral rites, and the contest for his arms. 2. The Sack of Ilium (Ἰλίου πέρις), which contained a description of the destruction of Troy, and the subsequent events until the departure of the Greeks, with which the story of the 2nd Aeneid mainly agrees. The substance of these two epics of Arctīnus are preserved by Proclus. Fragments in G. Kinkel, Epic. Graec. Fr. 1877; Köckly, Corp. Ep. Graec.

Arctophylax. [Arctos.]

Arctos (Ἄρκτος), 'the Bear,' two constellations near the N. Pole. 1. THE GREAT BEAR (Ἄρκτος μεγάλη: Ursa Major), also called the Waggon (ἄμαξα: plaustrum). The ancient Italian name of this constellation was Septem Triones, that is, the Seven Ploughing Oxen, also Septentrio, and with the epithet Major to distinguish it from the Septentrio Minor, or Lesser Bear: hence Virgil (Aen. iii. 356) speaks of geminosque Triones. The Great Bear was also called Helice (ἑλική) from its sweeping round in a curve.—2. THE LESSER or LITTLE BEAR (Ἄρκτος μικρά: Ursa Minor), likewise called the Waggon, was first added to the Greek catalogues by Thales, by whom it was probably imported from the East. It was also called Phœnice (Φωνίκη), from the circumstance that it was selected by the Phœnicians as the guide by which they shaped their course at sea, the Greek mariners with less judgment employing the Great Bear for the purpose; and Cynosura (Κυνόσουρα), dog's tail, from the resemblance of the constellation to the upturned curl of a dog's tail. The constellation before the Great Bear was called Boötes (Βοώτης), Arctophylax (Ἀρκτοφύλαξ), or Arcturus (Ἀρκτούρος from ὄρος, guard); the two latter names suppose the constellation to represent a man upon the watch, and denote simply the position of the figure in reference to the Great Bear, while Boötes, which is found in Homer, refers to the Waggon, the imaginary figure of Boötes being fancied to occupy the place of the driver of the team. At a later time Arctophylax became the general name of the constellation, and the word Arcturus was confined to the chief star in it. All these constellations are connected in mythology with the Arcadian nymph Callisto, the daughter of Lycæon, metamorphosed by Zeus upon the earth into a she-bear. [See ARCAS.] In the poets the epithets of these stars have constant reference to the family and country of Callisto: thus we find them called Lycæonis Arctos: Maenalia Arctos and Maenalia Ursa (from M. Maenalius in Arcadia): Erymanthis Ursa (from M. Erymanthus in Arcadia): Parrhasides stellæ (from the Arcadian town Parrhasia). Though most traditions identified Boötes with Arcas, others pronounced him to be Icarus or his daughter Erigone. Hence the Septentriones are called Boves Icarii. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Astronomia).

Ardalus, son of Hephaestus, built at Troëzen a temple to the Muses, where they were called locally Ἀρδαλλαι; said also to have invented the flute. (Paus. ii. 31, 4; Plut. de Mus. 5).

Arcturus. [ARCTOS.]

Ardæa (Ardeas, -ātis: Ardea). 1. The chief town of the Rutuli in Latium, a little to the left of the river Nimicus, 3 miles from the sea, was situated on a rock surrounded by marshes, in an unhealthy district (Strab. p. 231; Mart. iv. 80). It was one of the most ancient places in Italy, and was said to have been the capital of Turnus (Verg. Aen. vii. 410; Plin. iii. 56). It was one of the 30 cities of the Latin League, and was besieged by Tarquinius Spnperbus (Dionys. iv. 64, v. 61; Liv. i. 57). It was conquered and colonised by the Romans, B.C. 442, from which time its importance declined (Liv. iv. 11; Diod. xii. 34; cf. Liv. v. 44, xxvii. 9; Verg. Aen. vii. 413; Strab. p. 291; Juv. xii. 105). In its neighbourhood was the Latin Aphrodisium or temple of Venus, under the superintendence of Ardeates.—2. (Ardekân?), an important town in Persis, SW. of Persepolis.

Arduenna Silva, the Ardennes, a vast forest, in the NW. of Gaul, extended from the Rhine and the Treviri to the Nervii and Remi, and N. as far as the Scheldt: there are still considerable remains of this forest, though the greater part of it has disappeared (Caes. B. G. v. 3, vi. 29, 33). There was a Celtic goddess of this name, whose attributes seem to have been akin to those of Artemis (C. I. L. vi. 46).

Ardys (Ἀρδύς), son of Gyges, king of Lydia, reigned B.C. 678–629: he took Eriçne and made war against Miletus (Hdt. i. 15; Paus. iv. 24).

Arëâ or Arëtiâs (Ἄρεια or Ἄρητιὰς νῆσος, i.e. the island of Ares: Kerasunt Ada), also called Chalceritis, an island off the coast of Pontus, close to Pharnacæa, celebrated in the legend of the Argonauts (Ap. Rhod. ii. 384; Mel. ii. 7).

Arëithôus (Ἀρηίθοος), king of Arne in Boeotia, and husband of Philomedusa, is called in the Iliad (vii. 8) κορυήτης, because he fought with a club: he fell by the hand of the Arcadian Lycurgus (Il. vii. 132; Paus. viii. 11, 3).

Arelate, Arelas, or Arelâtum (Arelatenensis: Arles), a town in Gallia Narbonensis at the head of the delta of the Rhone on the left bank, and a Roman colony founded by the soldiers of the sixth legion, Colonia Arelate Sextanorum. It is first mentioned by Caesar, and under the emperors it became one of the most flourishing towns on this side of the Alps. Constantine the Great built an extensive suburb on the right bank, which he connected with the city by a bridge. The Roman remains at Arles attest the greatness of the ancient city: there are still to be seen an obelisk of granite, and the ruins of an aqueduct, theatre, amphitheatre, palace of Constantine, and a large Roman cemetery. (Strab. p. 181; Mel. ii. 5; Plin. iii. 36; Caes. B. G. i. 96, ii. 5; Auson. Urb. Nob. 8.)

Aremōrica. [ARMORICA.]

Arenacum (Arnheim or Aert?), a town of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica (Tac. Hist. v. 20).

Arëopāgus. [ATHENAE.]

Ares (Ἄρης), the Greek god of war, represented as the son of Zeus and Hera (Il. v. 890; Hes. Th. 922). Another tradition makes his birth a parallel to that of Athene: he is born from Hera alone, to whom a flower had been given by Flora (Ov. Fast. v. 229). But while Athene represents wisdom in war, Ares is described in Homer, who makes Eris his sister, as rejoicing in tumult and bloodshed, and a fickle partisan (ἄλλοπρόσαλλος, Il. v. 889): he helps the Trojans though he had promised aid to the Greeks (Il. v. 832, xxi. 412). His character is not congenial to the Greek mind, certainly not to the spirit of Homer, and for that reason, and probably also because in spite of the parentage given him he is still to some degree felt to be a foreign Thracian god, we find him represented in undignified positions in the Iliad, and often overborne by the more truly Greek deities. He is ignominiously driven from the field by Athene and Diomedes (Il. v. 776); again overcome by Athene (Il. xxi. 405), prevented by her from avenging his son Ascalaphus (Il. xv. 125), his son Cyrenus (Hes. Sc. 455): he was imprisoned for thirteen months by the Aloidae (Il. v. 385), and made a laughing-stock to the gods (Ov. viii. 266), when the partner of his disgrace was Aphrodite, herself in many aspects a deity of alien origin. He fights oftenest on foot, but sometimes in a chariot (Il. v. 356, xv. 119; Hes. Sc. 109, 191; Pind. Pyth. iv. 87). Quintus Smyrnaeus names his four horses Aithon, Phlogios, Konabos, Phobos; in Homer he has two, and Deimos and Phobos are his sons, not his horses. As god of battles he has the epithet or surname Ἐνδάλιος in Homer (Il. ii. 512, xiii. 518): the name was probably used as a battle-cry (cf. Xen. Anab. i. 8, 18), and in later writers given to a separate deity [ENYALIUS]. The love of Ares for Aphrodite is noticed in the Iliad, and in various traditions Eros and Anteros, Deimos and Phobos, and Priapus are their children. According to the Theban story he was the husband of Aphrodite, and father by her of Harmonia (Hes. Th. 937). In Homer Thrace is the home of Ares (Il. xiii. 301, Od. viii. 361; cf. Hdt. v. 7; Soph. Ant. 970, O. Il. 196); but the most ancient seat of his worship in Greece appears to have been Thebes (Aesch. Th. 135), Ares and Aphrodite.

(Osterley, Denkmäler.)

whence in the Iliad the walls of Thebes are called τείχος Ἄρειον (iv. 407), and he was the father of the dragon which Cadmus slew at the well of Ares (Paus. ix. 10, 5; CADMUS). At Athens his temple was on the western slope of Areiopagus and contained statues of Aphrodite, of Ares (by Alcámenes), of Athene, and Enyo (Paus. i. 8, 5). The Athenian story makes him marry the daughter of Erechtheus, and become the father of Alcippe; as slayer of Halirrhothius, who assailed Alcippe, he was tried before the council of gods in the Areiopagus. [HALIRRHOTHUS; Dict. Ant. s. v. Areiopagus.] It is clear that this story points to a period when his worship was introduced as that of a separate deity. [For the Amazons, daughters of Ares, and their attack on Athens, see AMAZONES.] As regards the origin of Ares, some, from a theory that a war-god is not a primitive idea, suppose him to have been a storm-god or a light-god; others with greater truth regard him as one of the χθόνιοι θεοί, working from the depths of the earth to produce on the one hand increase, on the other death and destruction: whence he became the god of war. It may be replied that it is difficult to conceive a primitive time to which war was not familiar, and it is vain to inquire what deity was appealed to by primitive warring tribes. There must have been different deities in different local religions whose worship was appropriated by Ares. The worship of Ἄρης ἀφνειός at Tyre and of Ἄρης γυναικοθόλος (Paus. viii. 44, 6; 48, 3) very likely points to an old nature-worship of a god of increase, as may also be suggested by his union with Aphrodite: on the other hand when we find Ἄρης ἱππιός honoured with Ἄθῆνη ἱππία at Olympia, and Ares receiving sacrifices of dogs at Therapnae, the inference is that he replaced for purposes of war a local animal-worship (Paus. iii. 20, 1; 14, 9; v. 15, 4). But that Ares mainly represents a worship of a god of the netherworld in various parts of Greece is highly probable. As regards the earliest site of this worship there is every probability that the idea of Ares which predominated in Greece was derived from Thrace, as is implied by Homer and Herodotus, and was adopted by Thebes and other states as a modification of their own worship. There may be fewer Thracian than Theban legends about Ares, but we know more about Thebes than Thrace. The Theban story seems to express the struggle between an ancient serpent-worship with which Ares had become identified, perhaps through Thracian influence, and a new civilisation, probably at the time when the worship of Dionysus began to prevail. In older art Ares is represented as a fully armed, bearded warrior: in the 5th century from Pheidias onwards the type is that of a handsome beardless youth, naked or nearly so, with a spear and sometimes a helmet: the bearded type reappears later.

Arestor (Ἀρέστωρ), father of Argus, the guardian of Io, who is therefore called Arestorides.

Aretaeus (Ἀρεταῖος), the Cappadocian, one of the most celebrated of the ancient Greek physicians, probably lived in the reign of Vespasian. He wrote in Ionic Greek a general treatise on diseases in 8 books, which is still extant. He is noticeable for accuracy of diagnosis, and for a departure from the method of Hippocrates when he considered that the symptoms required it, in which he is supported by modern experience.—The best edition is by C. G. Kühn, Lips. 1828.

Arētas (Ἀρέτας), the name of several kings of Arabia Petraea. 1. A contemporary of Pompey, invaded Judaea in B.C. 65, in order to place Hyrcanus on the throne, but was driven back by the Romans, who espoused the cause of Aristobulus. His dominions were subsequently invaded by Scourus, the lieutenant of Pompey. (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 15; Plut. Pomp. 39; Joseph Ant. xiv.)—2. The father-in-law of Herod Antipas, invaded Judaea, because Herod had dismissed the daughter of Aretas in consequence of his connexion with Herodias (Jos. Ant. xviii.). This Aretas seems to have been the prince who had possession of Damascus at the time of the conversion of the Apostle Paul, A.D. 31.

Arētē (Ἀρήτη). 1. Wife of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, received Ulysses with hospitality, and induced her people not to give up Medea to the emissaries of Aeetes (Od. vi. 305, vii. 66 ff.; Ap. Rh. iv. 1010; Apollod. i. 9, 25).—2. Daughter of the elder Dionysius and Aristomache, wife of Thearides, and after his death of her uncle Dion. After Dion had fled from Syracuse, Arete was compelled by her brother to marry Timocrates, one of his friends; but she was again received by Dion as his wife when he had obtained possession of Syracuse and expelled the younger Dionysius. After the assassination of Dion in 353, she was drowned by his enemies. (Plut. Dion.; Ael. V. H. xii. 47, where Arete and Aristomache are confused.)—3. Daughter of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, was instructed by him in the principles of his system, which she transmitted to her son the younger Aristippus (Diog. Laert. ii. 72).

Arēthūsa (Ἀρέθουσα), one of the Nereids, and the nymph of the famous fountain of Arcthusa in the island of Ortygia near Syracuse. For details, see ALPHEUS. Virgil (Ecolg. iv. 1, x. 1) reckons her among the Sicilian nymphs, and as the divinity who inspired pastoral poetry. The head of Arēthusa with her hair confined in a net and surrounded by fishes, occurs in the coins of Syracuse.—There were several other fountains in Greece which bore the name of Arēthusa, of which the most important was one in Ithaca, now Lebado, and another in Euboea near Chalcis (Strab. p. 58; Enr. Iph. Aul. 170).

Arēthūsa (Ἀρέθουσα: Er-Restun), a town and fortress on the Orontes, in Syria (Strab. p. 753; Appian, Syr. 57). For its history and government see EMESA.

Arētias. [AREA.]

Arētium. [ARRETIUM.]

Areus (Ἀρεύς), two kings of Sparta. 1. Succeeded his grandfather, Cleomenes II. (since his father Acrotatus had died before him), and reigned B.C. 309–265. He made several unsuccessful attempts to deliver Greece from the dominion of Antigonos Gonatas, and at length fell in battle against the Macedonians in 265, and was succeeded by his son Acrotatus (Justin. xxiv. 1; Plut. Pyrrh. 26–29; Paus. iii. 6; Diod. xx. 29).—2. Grandson of No. 1, reigned as a child for 8 years under the guardianship of his uncle Leonidas II., who succeeded him about B.C. 256 (Plut. Agis, 3).

Arēvācae or Arēvāci, the most powerful tribe of the Celtiberians in Spain, near the sources of the Tagus, derived their name from the river Areva (Arlanzo), a tributary of the Durius (Duero) (Strab. p. 162; Polyb. xxxv. 2; Appian, Hisp. 45; Plin. iii. 19, 27).

Argaeus (Ἀργαῖος). 1. King of Macedonia, son and successor of Perdiccas I., the founder of the dynasty.—2. A pretender to the Macedonian crown, dethroned Perdiccas II. and reigned 2 years (Diod. xiv. 92, xvi. 2).

Argaeus Mons (Ἀργαῖος: Erđjish), a lofty snow-capped mountain nearly in the centre of Cappadocia; an offset of the Anti-Taurus. At its foot stood the celebrated city of Mazaca or Caesarea (Strab. p. 588).

Arganthōnius (Ἀργανθώνιος), king of Tartessus in Spain, in the 6th century B.C., is said to have reigned 80 years, and to have lived 120 (Hdt. i. 163; Strab. p. 151; Lucian, Macrob. 10; Cic. de Sen. 19; Plin. vii. 154, who cites Anacreon as making him live 150 years).

Arganthōnius or Arganthus Mons (τὸ Ἀργανθώνιον ὄρος: Katırlı), a mountain in Bithynia, running out into the Propontis, forming the Prom. Posidium (C. Bouz), and separating the bays of Cios and Astacus (Strab. p. 564).

Argennum or Arginum (Ἀργεννον, Ἀργῖνον: C. Blanco), a promontory on the Ionian coast, opposite to Chios (Thuc. viii. 34).

Argentarius Mons. 1. Monte Argentaro, a promontory of Etruria, where it is said there are traces of ancient silver mines.—2. Part of M. Orospea in southern Spain, the source of the river Baetis (Strab. p. 148).

Argentēus, a small river in Gallia Narbonensis, which flows into the Mediterranean near Forum Julii (Cic. Fam. x. 34; Plin. iii. 35).

Argentorātum or -tus (Strasbourg), an important town on the Rhine in Gallia Belgica, the head-quarters of the 8th legion, and a Roman municipium. In its neighbourhood Julian gained a brilliant victory over the Alemanui, A.D. 357. It was subsequently called Strateburgum and Stratisburgum in the Notitia and Ravenna Geog. (Amm. Marc. xv. 11, xvi. 12; Zosim. iii. 3.)

Arges. [CYCLOPES.]

Argia (Ἀργεία), daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, and wife of Polynices (Apollod. i. 9; Diod. iv. 65).

Argia (Ἀργεία). [ARGOS.]

Argilētum, a district in Rome, which extended from the S. of the Quirinal to the Capitoline and the Forum. It was chiefly inhabited by mechanics and booksellers. The origin of the name is uncertain: the most obvious derivation is from argilla, 'potter's clay;' but the more common explanation in antiquity was Argi lectum, 'death of Argus,' from a hero Argus who was buried there. (Varro, L.L. iv. 32; Cic. Att. xii. 32; Verg. Aen. viii. 345; Mart. i. 4.)

Argilus (Ἀργίλος: Ἀργίλιος), a town in Bissaltia, the E. part of Mygdonia in Macedonia, between Amphipolis and Bromiscus, a colony of Andros (Thuc. iv. 103, v. 6).

Arginūsae (Ἀργινοῦσαι or Ἀργινοῦσσαί), 3 small islands off the coast of Aeolis, opposite Mytilene in Lesbos, celebrated for the naval victory of the Athenians over the Lacedaemonians under Callicratidas, B.C. 406 (Strab. p. 617; Xen. Hell. i. 6.)

Argiphontes (Ἀργειφόντης), 'the slayer of Argus,' a surname of HERMES.

Argippaei (Ἀργιππᾶιοι), a Scythian tribe in Sarmatia Asiatica, who appear, from the description of them by Herodotus (iv. 23), to have been of the Calmuck or Mongolian race.

Argissa. [ARGURA.]

Argithēa, the chief town of Athamania in Epirus.

Argiva, a surname of Hera or Juno.

Argivi. [ARGOS.]

Argo. [ARGONAUTAE.]

Argōlis. [ARGOS.]

Argōnautae (Ἀργοναῦται), the Argonauts, 'the sailors of the Argo,' were the heroes who sailed to Aea (afterwards called Colchis) for the purpose of fetching the golden fleece. The story of the Argonauts is variously related by the ancient writers, but the common tale ran as follows. In Iolcus in Thessaly reigned Pelias, who had deprived his half-brother Aeson of the sovereignty. In order to get rid of Jason the son of Aeson, PELLIAS persuaded Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was suspended on an oak-tree in the grove of Aros in Colchis, and was guarded day and night by a dragon. Jason willingly undertook the enterprise, and commanded Argus, the son of Phrixus, to build a ship with 50 oars; which was called Argo (Ἄργώ) after the name of the builder. Jason was accompanied by all the great heroes of the age, and their number is said to have been 50-60. (Pindar names only 11.) Among these were Heracles, Castor and Pollux, Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, the singer Orpheus, the seer Mopsus, Philammon, Tydeus, Theseus, Amphiarus, Peleus, Nestor, Admetus, &c. According to Hdt. iv. 179, Jason made a preliminary voyage round the Peloponnesus, wishing to get to Delphi by the Corinthian gulf, and was driven from Malea to Libya, where the Argo went ashore at Lake Tritonis and was helped off by a Triton. Their start from Iolcus for the real expedition is marked by the name Aphetae (Strab. p. 436; Hdt. vii. 193). After leaving Iolcus they first landed at Lemnos, and Phineus now advised them, before sailing through the Symplegades, to mark the flight of a dove, and to judge from its fate what they themselves would have to do. When they approached the Symplegades, they sent out a dove, which in its rapid flight between the rocks lost only the end of its tail. The Argonauts now, with the assistance of Hera, followed the example of the dove, sailed quickly between the rocks, and succeeded in passing without injury to their ship, with the exception of some ornaments at the stern. Henceforth the Symplegades stood immovable in the sea. On their arrival at the Mariandyni, the Argonauts were kindly received by their king, Lyeus. The seer Idmon and the helmsman Tiphis died here, and the place of the latter was supplied by Ancaeus. They now sailed along the coast until they arrived at the mouth of the river Phasis. The Colchian king Aëtes promised to give up the golden fleece, if Jason alone would yoke to a plough two fire-breathing oxen with brazen feet, and sow the teeth of the dragon which had not been used by Cadmus at Thebes, and which he had received from Athene.

where they united themselves with the women of the island, who had just before murdered their fathers and husbands. From Lemnos they sailed to the Doliones at Cyzicus, where king Cyzicus received them hospitably. They left the country during the night, and being thrown back on the coast by a contrary wind, they were taken for Pelasgians, the enemies of the Doliones, and a struggle ensued, in which Cyzicus was slain; but he was recognised by the Argonauts, who buried him and mourned over his fate. They next landed in Mysia, where they left behind Heracles and Polyphemus, who had gone into the country in search of Hylas, whom a nymph had carried off while he was fetching water for his companion. In the country of the Bebryces, king Amyeus challenged the Argonauts to fight with him; and when Pollux had conquered him, the Argonauts afterwards slew many of the Bebryces, and sailed to Sahyndessus in Thraee, where the seer Phineus was tormented by the Harpies. When the Argonauts consulted him about their voyage he promised his advice on condition of their delivering him from the Harpies. This was done by Zetes and Calais, two sons of Boreas;

The love of Medea furnished Jason with means to resist fire and steel, on condition of his taking her as his wife; and she taught him how he was to kill the warriors that were to spring up from the teeth of the dragon. While Jason was engaged upon his task, Aëtes formed plans for burning the ship Argo and for killing all the Greek heroes. But Medea's magic powers sent to sleep the dragon who guarded the golden fleece; and after Jason had taken possession of the treasure, he and his Argonauts, together with Medea and her young brother Absyrtus, embarked by night and sailed away. Aëtes pursued them, but before he overtook them, Medea murdered her brother, cut him into pieces, and threw his limbs overboard, that her father might be detained in his pursuit by collecting the limbs of his child. Aëtes at last returned home, but sent out a great number of Colchians, threatening them with the punishment intended for Medea if they returned without her. While the Colchians were dispersed in all directions, the Argonauts had already reached the mouth of the river Eridanus. But Zeus, angry at the murder of Absyrtus, raised a storm which cast the ship from its course. When driven on the Absyrtian islands, the ship began to speak, and declared that the anger of Zeus would not cease unless they sailed towards Ausonia and were purified by Circe. They now sailed along the coasts of the Ligyans and Celts, and through the sea of Sardinia, and continuing their course along the coast of Tyrreulia, they arrived in the island of Aenea, where Circe purified them. When they were passing by the Sirens, Orpheus sang to prevent the Argonauts being allured by them. Butes, however, swam to them, but Aphrodite carried him to Lilybaeum. Thetis and the Nereids conducted them through Scylla and Charybdis and between the whirling rocks (πέτραι πλαγκταί); and sailing by the Thrinacian island with its oxen of Helios, they came to the Phaeacian island of Corcyra, where they were received by Alcinous. In the meantime, some of the Colchians, not being able to discover the Argonauts, had settled at the foot of the Ceraunian mountains; others occupied the Ahsyrlian islands near the coast of Illyricum; and a third band overtook the Argonauts in the island of the Phaeacians. But as their hopes of recovering Medea were deceived by Arete, the queen of Alcinous, they settled in the island, and the Argonauts continued their voyage. During the night they were overtaken by a storm; but Apollo sent brilliant flashes of lightning which enabled them to discover a neighbouring island, which they called Anaphe. [According to one account, in the Pseudo-Orphens, the stranding of the ship in the Syrtis, and its reaching Lake Tritonis, comes in here on the return voyage.] Here they erected an altar to Apollo, and solemn rites were instituted, which continued to be observed down to very late times. Their attempt to land in Crete was prevented by Talus, who guarded the island, but was killed by the artifices of Medea. From Crete they sailed to Aegina, and from thence between Euboea and Locris to Iolcus. Respecting the events subsequent to their arrival in Iolcus, see AEsON, MEDEA, JASON, PELLAS. (Apoll. Rh. Argonautica; Apollod. i. 9, 16-26; Pind. Pyth. iv. 171; Valer. Flacc. Argon.) Strabo notices the local traditions in his account of each place at which the Argo is supposed to have touched. It is clear that the story was already a subject for poets at any rate in the later Homeric age; for the Argo is πάσι μέλουσα in Od. xii. 70; Jason is her captain, and she passes through rocks like the Symplegades. In the Iliad there are traces of a local tradition about Jason at Lemnos (Il. vii. 467, xxi. 40); but no apparent knowledge of the Argo or of Jason's voyages. The story of the Argonauts is by many writers construed as a sun myth, expressing either sunset and sunrise or a drawing of clouds by the sun in various directions at various times of the year. No doubt the idea of the golden fleece in an Eastern land may have been in some degree suggested by the sun's rays; but the main drift of the myth is to express the idea of the earliest sea voyage. In different places there were local traditions of the earliest seafarers, and these have become a more or less connected story attached to the name of Jason, who, with his band of heroes, sets out on a search which some modern writers have compared to the search after the Holy Grail. It is natural that the mythical king of the Eastern land should appear as the child of the sun. In ancient art the most famous representations (which have perished) were the sculptures of Lysippus (Plin. xxxiv. 79), the paintings of Micon in the temple of the Dioscuri at Athens (Paus. i. 18), those of Cydias (Plin. xxxv. 130), and those on the portico of Neptune (Juv. vi. 153; Mart. ii. 14). The Argonauts in Bithynia are shown on the Ficoroni Cista. One of the most remarkable of the vase-paintings on this subject is at Munich, showing Jason at the moment of taking the fleece from the custody of the dragon.

Argos (τὸ Ἄργος, -εος), is said by Strabo (p. 372) to have signified a plain in the language of the Macedonians and Thessalians, and it may therefore contain the same root as the Latin word ager. In Homer we find mention of the Pelasgic Argos (Il. ii. 681), that is, a town or district of Thessaly, and of the Achacan Argos (Il. ix. 141; Od. iii. 251), by which he means sometimes the whole Peloponnesus, sometimes Agamemnon's kingdom of Argos of which Mycenae was the capital, and sometimes the town of Argos. As Argos in Homeric times was the most important part of the Peloponnesus, and sometimes stood for the whole of it, so the Ἄργεῖοι often occur in Homer as a name of the whole body of the Greeks, in which sense the Roman poets also use Argivi.—1. Argos, a district of Peloponnesus, called Argolis (ἡ Ἀργολίς) by Herodotus (i. 82), but more frequently by other Greek writers either Argos, Argia (ἡ Ἀργεία), or Argolice (ἡ Ἀργολική). Under the Romans Argolis became the usual name of the country, while the word Argos or Argi was confined to the town. Argolis under the Romans signified the country bounded on the N. by the Corinthian territory, on the W. by Arcadia, on the S. by Laconia, and included towards the E. the whole Acte or peninsula between the Saronic and Argolic gulfs: but during the time of Grecian independence Argolis or Argos did not include the territories of Epidaurus, &c., on the E. and S.E. coasts of the Acte, but only the country lying round the Argolic gulf, bounded on the W. by the Arcadian mountains, and separated on the N. by a range of mountains from Corinth, Cleonae, and Phlius. Argolis, as understood by the Romans, was for the most part a mountainous and unproductive country; the whole eastern part is of a dry and thirsty soil, with few streams, the παυδῖψιον Ἄργος of Il. iv. 171. The only extensive plain adapted for agriculture was in the neighbourhood of the city of Argos: this was the κοῖλον Ἄργος (Soph. O. C. 378), and being well watered was famed as Ἄργος ἱππόβοτον (Il. ii. 287; Strab. p. 388). Its rivers were, however, small and often dry in summer: the most important was the Inachus. The country was divided into the districts of Argia or Argos proper, EPIDAURIA, TROEZENIA, and HERMIONIS. The original inhabitants of the country were, according to mythology, the Cynurii; but the main part of the population consisted of Pelasgi and Achaei, to whom Dorians were added after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. The fame of the cities of Argolis, and their prosperity in early days, were greatly due to the favourable position of the country for maritime intercourse in the more timid period of navigators, when the peculiar facility which vessels had for sailing through a chain of sheltering islands SE. to Crete, Cyprus, and Egypt, E. to Ephesus or Miletus, and N. by Euboea to Thessaly, &c., gave the settlements at Mycenae, Tiryns, or Argos a start in the commerce before the 6th century B.C.—2. Argos, or Argi, -orum, in the Latin writers, now Argo, the capital of Argolis, and, next to Sparta, the most important town in Peloponnesus, situated in a level plain a little to the W. of the Inachus. It had an ancient Pelasgic citadel, called Larissa, and another built subsequently on another height (duas arcas habent Argi, Liv. xxxiv. 25). It possessed numerous temples, and was particularly celebrated for the worship of Hera, whose great temple, Heracium, lay between Argos and Mycenae. The remains of the Cyclopean walls of Argos are still to be seen. It is the natural centre of the plain, and probably existed as early as any other Argolic city, though not at first the most powerful. The city is said to have been built by INACHUS or his son PHORONEUS, or grandson AROUS. The descendants of Inachus, who may be regarded as the Pelasgian kings, reigned over the country for 9 generations, but were at length deprived of the sovereignty by DANAUUS, who is said to have come from Egypt. This story, like the similarity of Io and Isis, points to an early connexion with Egypt, though how early is a doubtful question. [Sec AEGYPTUS.] The descendants of Danaus were in their time obliged to submit to the Achaean race of the Pelopidae. Under the rule of the Pelopidae Mycenae became the capital of the kingdom, and Argos was a dependent state. Thus Mycenae was the royal residence of Atreus and of his son Agamemnon; but under Orestes Argos was preferred. Upon the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, Argos fell to the share of Temenus, whose descendants ruled over the country; but the great bulk of the population continued to be Achaean, and the existence of a fourth tribe at Argos (the Hymethian) probably points to the inclusion of a part of the old inhabitants in the citizenship. With the Dorian conquest the supremacy of Mycenae in Argolis ceased, and Argos thenceforth became the leading city. All these events belong to mythology; and Argos first appears in history about B.C. 750, as the chief state of Peloponnesus, under its ruler PHIDON. The successors of Temenus appear as Cibus, Medon, Thestius, Merops, Aristodanidas, Eratus, Phidon (Paus. ii. 19). After the time of Phidon its power declined, being greatly weakened by its wars with Sparta. The two states long contended for the district of Cynuria, which lay between Argolis and Laconia, and which the Spartans at length obtained by the victory of their 300 champions, about B.C. 550. In B.C. 524 Cleomenes, the Spartan king, defeated the Argives with such loss near Tiryns, that Sparta was left without a rival in Peloponnesus. In the north also, after B.C. 600, the power of Periander of Corinth and Cleisthenes of Sicyon, exceeded that of Argos, nor did she regain her hegemony. In consequence of its weakness and of its jealousy of Sparta, Argos took no part in the Persian war. In order to strengthen itself, Argos attacked the neighbouring towns of Tiryns, Mycenae, &c., destroyed them, and transplanted their inhabitants to Argos. The introduction of so many new citizens was followed by the abolition of royalty and of Doric institutions, and by the establishment of a democracy, which continued to be the form of government till later times, when the city fell under the power of tyrants. In the Peloponnesian war Argos sided with Athens against Sparta. In B.C. 243 it joined the Achaean League, and on the conquest of the latter by the Romans, 146, it became a part of the Roman province of Achaia. At any early time Argos was distinguished by its cultivation of music and poetry [SACADAS; TELESILLA]; but at the time of the intellectual greatness of Athens, literature and science seem to have been entirely neglected at Argos. It produced some great sculptors, of whom AGELADAS and POLYCLETUS are the most celebrated. It must not be forgotten that Argolis, in its extended sense, was especially a land of great religious festivals: the Nemea at Cleonae, that of Apollo Lycaeus at Argos, the Heraca at the temple of Hera, near Mycenae, those of Asclepius at Epidaurus, the Cithonia of Demeter at Hermione. [See Dict. Ant. s.v.v.]

Argos Amphiloëchicum (Ἄργος τὸ Ἀμφιλοχικόν), the chief town of Amphiloëchia in Acarnania, situated on the Ambracian gulf, and founded by the Argive AMPHILCHUS (Thuc. ii. 68; Strab. p. 325).

Argos Hippium. [ARPI.]

Argōus Portus (Porto Ferrario), a town and harbour in the island of Ilva (Elba).

Argūra (Ἀργούρα), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, called Argissa by Homer (Il. ii. 738).

Argus (Ἄργος). 1. Son of Zeus and Niobe, 3rd king of Argos, from whom Argos derived its name (Apollod. ii. 1; Paus. ii. 16).—2. Surnamed Panoptes, 'the all-seeing,' because he had a hundred eyes, son of Agenor, Arestor, Inachus, or Argus. Hera appointed him guardian of the cow into which Io had been metamorphosed; but Hermes, at the command of Zeus, put Argus to death, either by stoning him, or by cutting off his head after sending him to sleep by the sweet notes of his flute. Hera transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favourite bird (Apollod. ii. 1; Ov. Met. i. 264; Aesch. Pr. 569; Mosch. ii. 58). Many have seen in the story a reference to the stary 'eyes' of the sky.—3. The builder of the Argo, son of Phrixus, Arestor, or Polybus, was sent by Aeetes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his inheritance in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, was found by Jasou in the island of Aretias, and carried back to Colchis. (Ap. Rh. ii. 1095; Apollod. ii. 9.)

Argūra (Ἀργυρᾶ), a town in Achaia near Patrae, with a fountain of the same name.

Argyripa. [ARPI.]

Aria (Ἀρεία, Ἀρία; Ἀρείος, Ἀρίος: the E. part of Khorassan, and the W. and NW. part of Afghanistan), the most important of the E. provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, was bounded on the E. by the Paropamisadae, on the N. by Margiana and Hyrcania, on the W. by Parthia, and on the S. by the great desert of Carmania. It was a vast plain, bordered on the N. and E. by mountains, and on the W. and S. by sandy deserts; and, though forming a part of the great sandy tableland, now called the Desert of Iran, it contained several very fertile oases, especially in its N. part, along the base of the Sarīphi (Kohistan and Hazarah) mountains, which was watered by the river Arius or -as (Herirood), on which stood the later capital Alexandria (Herat). The river is lost in the sand. The lower course of the great river ETYMANDRUS (Helmund) also belonged to Aria, and the lake into which it falls was called Aria Lacus (Zurrah). From Aria was derived the name under which all the E. provinces were included. [ARIANA.]

Aria Lacus. [ARIA.]

Xerxes, fell in the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480. (Hdt. vii. 97, viii. 89.)

Ariadnē (Ἀριάδνη), daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë or Creta, fell in love with Theseus, when he was sent by his father to couvey the tribute of the Athenians to Minotaurus, and gave him the clue of thread by means of which he found his way out of the Labyrinth, and which she herself had received from Hephaestus. Theseus in return promised to marry her, and she accordingly left Crete with him; but on their arrival in the island of Dia (Naxos), she was killed by Artemis. This is the Homeric account (Od. xi. 322); but the more common tradition, to mitigate the perfidy of Theseus, related that Theseus left Ariadne in Naxos alive, either because he was forced by Dionysus to leave her, or because he was ashamed to bring a foreign wife to Athens, or because he was carried away by a storm (Plut. Thes. 20; Diod. iv. 61; Paus. i. 20). Dionysus found her at Naxos, made her his wife, and placed among the stars the crown which he gave her at their marriage (Ov. Met. viii. 181, Fast. iii. 459; Hyg. Ast. 2, 5). There is no doubt that we have in Ariadne the story of various local nature-goddesses in the islands of Crete, Naxos and Delos, nearly akin to and in some aspects identified with Aphrodite; whence the story of the wooden statue of Aphrodite by Daedalus left at Delos by Ariadne (Paus. ix. 40, 3; Callim. Hymn. Del. 308): this was honoured with a Cretan labyrinth dance (Plut. l.c.). In Cyprus also there was the tomb of Ariadne in the grove sacred to Ariadne-Aphrodite. The twofold aspect in Naxos of Ariadne the mourner, deserted by Theseus, and Ariadæe the joyful bride of Dionysus, presents the idea of the earth abandoned by its flowers and fruits in winter, and renewing its gaiety in spring. The same was probably the meaning of the σύμμυξις τῷ Διονύσῳ καὶ ὁ γάμος in Aristot. Ἀθην. πολιτ. ch. 3. Similarly in Italy, Ariadne becomes Libera the bride of Liber.

Ariaeus (Ἀριάιος), or Aridæus (Ἀριδαῖος), the friend of Cyrus, commanded the left wing of the army at the battle of Cunaxa, B. C. 401 (Xen. An. i. 8; Diod. xiv. 22). After the death of Cyrus he first joined the Greeks, but afterwards obtained the pardon of Artaxerxes by abandoning them and aiding Tissaphernes to destroy the Greek generals (Xen. An. ii.; Plut. Artax. 18). We hear afterwards of his being employed to put Tissaphernes to death, and again of his revolting from Artaxerxes in 395 (Polyæn. viii. 16; Diod. xiv. 80; Xen. Hell. iv. 1, 27).

Ariamnes (Ἀριάμνης), the name of two kings of Cappadocia, one the father of Ariarathes I., and the other the son and successor of Ariarathes II.

Ariana (Ἀριανή: Iran), derived from ARIA, from the specific sense of which it must be carefully distinguished, was the general name of the E. provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, and included the portion of Asia bounded on the W. by an imaginary line drawn from the Caspian to the mouth of the Persian Gulf, on the S. by the Indian Ocean, on the E. by the Indus, and on the N. by the great chain of mountains called by the general name of the Indian Caucasus, embracing the provinces of Parthia, Aria, the Paropamisadae, Arachosia, Drangiana, Gedrosia, and Carmania (Khorasan, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Kirman). But the name was often extended to the country as far W. as the margin of the Tigris-valley, so as to include Media and Persia, and also to the provinces N. of the Indian Caucasus, namely Bactria and Sogdiana (Bokhara). The knowledge of the ancients respecting the greater part of this region was confined to what was picked up in the expeditions of Alexander and the wars of the Greek kings of Syria, and what was learned from merchant caravans. (Strab. pp. 688, 696, 720 ff.; Plin. vi. 93.)

Ariarathes (Ἀριαράθης), the name of several kings of Cappadocia.—1. Son of Ariamnes I., assisted Ochus in the recovery of Egypt, B.C. 350. Ariarathes was defeated by Perdiccas, and crucified, 322. Eumenes then obtained possession of Cappadocia (Diod. xviii. 16, xxxi. 3; Plut. Eum. 3).—2. Son of Holophernes, and nephew of Ariarathes I., recovered Cappadocia after the death of Eumenes, B.C. 315. He was succeeded by Ariamnes II. (Diod. xxxi. 28).—3. Son of Ariamnes II., and grandson of No. 2, married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria.—4. Son of No. 3, reigned B. C. 220–162. He married Antiochis, the daughter of Antiochus III., king of Syria, and assisted Antiochus in his war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus, Ariarathes sued for peace in 188, which he obtained on favourable terms. In 183–179, he assisted Eumenes in his war against Pharnaces. (Liv. xxxvii. 31, xxxviii. 38; Polyb. xxii. 24, xxxi. 12–14).—5. Son of No. 4, reigned B.C. 163–130. He was surnamed Philopator, and was distinguished by the excellence of his character and his cultivation of philosophy and the liberal arts, having been educated at Rome (Liv. xli. 19). He assisted the Romans in their war against Aristonicus of Pergamus, and fell in this war, 130 (Justin. xxxv. i.; Polyb. xxxii. 20, xxxiii. 12).—6. Son of No. 5, reigned B. C. 130–96. He married Laodice, sister of Mithridates VI., king of Pontus, and was put to death by Mithridates by means of Gordius. On his death the kingdom was seized by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who married Laodice, the widow of the late king. But Nicomedes was soon expelled by Mithridates, who placed upon the throne (Justin. xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 1).—7. Son of No. 6. He was, however, also murdered by Mithridates, in a short time, who now took possession of his kingdom. The Cappadocians rebelled against Mithridates, and placed upon the throne—8. Second son of No. 6; but he was speedily driven out of the kingdom by Mithridates, and shortly afterwards died. Both Mithridates and Nicomedes attempted to give a king to the Cappadocians; but the Romans allowed the people to choose whom they pleased, and their choice fell upon Ariobarzanes (Justin, l.c.; Strab. p. 540).—9. Son of Ariobarzanes II. went to Rome to seek Caesar's support B.C. 45; got the throne after Philippi, and reigned B.C. 42–36. He was deposed and put to death by Antony, who appointed Archelaus as his successor. (Appian, B. C. v. 7; Dio Cass. xlix. 32; Cic. Fam. xv. 2, Att. xiii. 2.)

Ariaspæ or Agriaspæ (Ἀριάσπαι, Ἀγριάσπαι), a people in the S. part of the Persian province of Drangiana, on the very borders of Gedrosia, with a capital city, Ariaspæ (Ἀριάσπην). In return for the services which they rendered to the army of Cyrus the Great, when he marched through the desert of Carmania, they were honoured with the name of Εὐεργέται, and were allowed by the Persians to retain their independence, which was confirmed to them by Alexander as the reward of similar services to himself. (Arrian, iii. 27, 37; Curt. vii. 3.)

ARICIA (Aricinus: Ariccia or Riccica), an ancient town of Latium at the foot of the Alban Mount, on the Appian Way, 16 miles from Rome. It was a member of the Latin confederacy, was subdued by the Romans, with the other Latin towns, in B.C. 338, and received the Roman franchise (Liv. viii. 14). In its neighbourhood was the celebrated grove and temple of Diana Aricina, on the borders of the Lacus Nemorensis (Nemi). [See DIANA, and Dict. Ant. s. v. Rex Nemorensis.]

ARICŌNIUM (Weston), in Herefordshire, between Blestum (Monmouth) and Glevum (Gloucester), on the road leading from Silchester to Caerleon.

ARIDAUS. [ARIAEUS: ARRHIDAUS.]

ARII. [ARIA.]

ARIMASPI (Ἀριμασπί), a people in the N. of Scythia, of whom a fabulous account is given by Herodotus (iv. 27). The germ of the fable is perhaps to be recognised in the fact that the Ural Mountains abound in gold.

ARIMAZES (Ἀριμάζης) or ARIOMAZES (Ἀριουμάζης), a chief in Sogdiana, whose fortress was taken by Alexander in B.C. 328. In it Alexander found Roxana (the daughter of the Bactrian chief, Oxyartes), whom he made his wife. Curtius states that Alexander crucified Arimazes; but this is not mentioned by Arrian or Polyæus. (Arrian, iv. 19; Curt. vii. 11; Polyæus, iv. 8.)

ARIMI (Ἀριμοί) and ARIMĀ (τὰ Ἄριμα sc. ὄρη), the names of a mythical people, district, and range of mountains in Asia Minor, which the old Greek poets made the scene of the punishment of the monster Typhoeus. Virgil (Aen. ix. 716) has misunderstood the εἰν Ἄριμοίς of Homer (Il. ii. 783), and made Typhoeus lie beneath Inarime, an island off the coast of Italy—namely, Pithecusa or Aenaria (Ischia).

ARIMINUM (Ariminensis: Rimini), a town in Umbria on the coast at the mouth of the little river Ariminus (Marocchia). It was originally inhabited by Umbrians and Pelasgians, was afterwards in the possession of the Senoues, and was colonised by the Romans in B.C. 268, as one of the 12 most recent Latin colonies which had commercium, but not civitas (Cic. pro Caec. 35, 102). It obtained the full franchise in 188, and is mentioned by Appian (B. C. iv. 3) as a flourishing city in 43 B.C. Augustus established a military colony there. It became in later times subject to the Exarchs of Ravenna. After leaving Cisalpine Gaul, it was the first town which a person arrived at in the N.E. of Italia proper. It was connected by the Via Flaminia with Rome, and by the Via Aemilia with Placentia (Strab. p. 217).

ARIOBARZANES (Ἀριοβαρζάνης). I. Kings or Satraps of Pontus.—1. Betrayed by his son Mithridates to the Persian king, about B.C. 400 (Xen. Cyr. viii. 8; Ar. Pol. v. 8).—2. Son of Mithridates I., reigned B.C. 363–337. He revolted from Artaxerxes in 362, and may be regarded as the founder of the kingdom of Pontus (Diod. xvi. 90).—3. Son of Mithridates III., reigned 266–240, and was succeeded by Mithridates IV.—II. Kings of Cappadocia.—1. Surnamed Philoromæus, reigned B.C. 93–63, and was elected king by the Cappadocians, under the direction of the Romans. He was several times expelled from his kingdom by Mithridates, was restored by Sulla in 92, expelled in 90, and fled to Rome, restored by Aquilius in 89, expelled the next year, but received his throne in 84 from Sulla, was expelled again by Mithridates in 66, and finally restored by Pompey in 63 (App. Mithr. 10, 57, 60; Plut. Sull. 22; Justin. xxxviii. 2).—2. Surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father in 63. The time of his death is not known; but it must have been before 51, in which year his son was reigning (Cic. Fam. xv. 2; de Prov. Cons. 4).—3. Surnamed Eusebes and Philoromæus, son of No. 2, whom he succeeded about 51. He assisted Pompey against Caesar in 48, but was nevertheless pardoned by Caesar, who even enlarged his territories. He was slain in 42 by Cassius, because he was plotting against him in Asia. (Cic. Fam. ii. 17, xv. 2; Diod. xlii. 45; Dio Cass. xlvii. 33; Caes. B. C. iii. 4.)

ARION (Ἀρίων). 1. Of Methymna in Lesbos, an ancient Greek bard and a celebrated player on the cithara. He lived about B.C. 625, and spent a great part of his life at the court of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. His great work was to develop the dithyramb or choral hymn to Dionysus. He first employed a trained chorus of 50 singers, with distinct parts for singing and action, ranged in a circle around the altar, and therefore called the cyclic chorus, whereas Doric choruses had been drawn up in a rectangular form. This was an important step towards the growth of Greek tragedy (see Dict. Ant. s.v. Tragedia). Of his life scarcely any thing is related beyond the beautiful story of his escape from the sailors with whom he sailed from Sicily to Corinth. On one occasion, thus runs the story, Arion went to Sicily to take part in some musical contest. He won the prize, and, laden with presents, he embarked in a Corinthian ship to return to his friend Periander. The rude sailors coveted his treasures, and meditated his murder. After trying in vain to save his life, he at length obtained permission once more to play on the cithara. In festal attire he placed himself in the prow of the ship and invoked the gods in inspired strains, and then threw himself into the sea. But many song-loving dolphins had assembled round the vessel, and one of them now took the bard on its back and carried him to Tænårns, from whence he returned to Corinth in safety, and related his adventure to Periander. Upon the arrival of the Corinthian vessel Periander inquired of the sailors after Arion, who replied that he had remained behind at Tarentum; but when Arion, at the bidding of Periander, came forward, the sailors owned their guilt, and were punished according to their desert. In the time of Herodotus and Pausanias there existed at Tænårus a brass monument, representing Arion riding on a dolphin. Arion and his cithara (lyre) were placed among the stars. (Hdt. i. 23; Aelian, N. A. xii. 45; Cic. Tusc. ii. 27, 67; Ov. Fast. ii. 83.) A fragment of a hymn to Poseidon, ascribed to Arion, is contained in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 566, &c.—2. A fabulous horse, of which Poseidon was the father. [POSEIDON.]

ARIOVISTUS, a German chief, who crossed the Rhine at the request of the Sequani, when they were hard pressed by the Aedui. He subdued the Aedui, but appropriated to himself part of the territory of the Sequani, and threatened to take still more. The Sequani now united with the Aedui in imploring the help of Caesar, who defeated Ariovistus about 50 miles from the Rhine, B.C. 58. Ariovistus escaped across the river in a small boat. (Caes. B. G. i. 31–53; Dio Cass. xxxviii. 31; Plut. Caes. 18.) That his fame lived in Gaul is seen from Tac. Hist. iv. 73.

Arisbe, a town of the Troad. It was a camp of Alexander, and was taken by the Gauls (Il. ii. 836; Arrian, i. 12; Polyb. v. 111).

Aristaenetus, a rhetorician of Nicaea, friend of Libanius, killed in an earthquake at Nicomedia A.D. 358 (Amm. Marc. xvii. 7). To him is wrongly ascribed a collection of erotic epistles, ed. Hercher, 1873.

Aristaeus (Ἀρισταίως), of Megalopolis, sometimes called Aristaenetus, was frequently strategus or general of the Achaean League from B.C. 198 to 185. He was the political opponent of Philopoemen, and a friend of the Romans. (Polyb. xvii. 1-13, xxiii. 7, xxxii. 19; Liv. xxxiv. 25.)

Aristaeus (Ἀρισταίος), an ancient divinity representing the giver of best gifts, worshipped in many parts of Greece, especially in Thessaly, Boeotia, Arcada, Ceos, Corcyra, and other islands of the Aegean and Adriatic. No doubt Thera was an ancient seat of this worship, and thence it passed to Cyrene. When the later Hellenic religion prevailed, Aristaeus was represented as the son of one of the deities, a mortal deified for his virtues. His origin is then variously related in local traditions. (Hes. Th. 975; Pind. Pyth. ix. 45; Diod. iv. 81; Ap. Rh. iii. 500; Verg. Georg. i. 14, iv. 283.) He is described either as a son of Uranus and Ge, or, according to a more general tradition, as the son of Apollo and Cyrene. His mother Cyrene had been carried off by Apollo from mount Pelion to Libya, where she gave birth to Aristaeus. Aristaeus subsequently went to Thebes in Boeotia; but after the unfortunate death of his son ACTAEON, he left Thebes and visited almost all the Greek colonies on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Finally he went to Thrace, and after dwelling for some time near mount Haemus, where he founded the town of Aristaeon, he disappeared. Aristaeus is one of the most beneficent divinities in ancient mythology: he was worshipped as the protector of flocks and shepherds, of vine and olive plantations; he taught men to keep bees, and averted from the fields the burning heat of the sun and other causes of destruction.

Aristagoras (Ἀρισταγόρας), of Miletus, brother-in-law of Histiaeus, was left by the latter during his stay at the Persian court, in charge of the government of Miletus. Having failed in an attempt upon Naxos (B.C. 501), which he had promised to subdue for the Persians, and fearing the consequences of his failure, he induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. He applied for assistance to the Spartans and Athenians: the former refused, but the latter sent him 20 ships and some troops. In 499 his army captured and burnt Sardis, but was finally chased back to the coast. The Athenians now departed; the Persians conquered most of the Ionian cities; and Aristagoras in despair fled to Thrace, where he was slain by the Edonians in 497 (Hdt. v. 30-51, 97-126; Thuc. iv. 102).

Aristander (Ἀρίστανδρος), the most celebrated soothsayer of Alexander the Great, wrote on prodigies (Arrian, iv. 4; Plin. xvii. 243).

Aristarchus (Ἀρίσταρχος). 1. An Athenian, one of the leaders in the revolution of the 'Four Hundred,' B.C. 411. He was afterwards put to death by the Athenians, not later than 406 (Thuc. viii. 90; Xen. Hell. i. 7, 28).—2. A Lacedaemonian, succeeded Cleander as harmost of Byzantium in 400, and in various ways ill treated the Cyrean Greeks, who had recently returned from Asia (Xen. An. vii. 2-6).—3. Of TEGEA, a tragic poet at Athens, contemporary with Euripides, flourished about B.C. 454, and wrote 70 tragedies (Nauck, Fr. Poet. Trag. 1856).—4. Of SAMOS, an eminent mathematician and astronomer at Alexandria, flourished between B.C. 280 and 264. He employed himself in the determination of some of the most important elements of astronomy; but none of his works remain, except a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon (περὶ μεγεθῶν καὶ ἀποστημάτων ἡλίου καὶ σελήνης). Edited by Wallis, Oxon. 1688, and reprinted in vol. iii. of his works; by Nizze, 1856.—5. Of SAMOTHRACE, the celebrated grammarian, flourished B.C. 156. He was educated in the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, at Alexandria, where he himself founded a grammatical and critical school. At an advanced age he left Alexandria, and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of 72, of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. Aristarchus was the greatest critic of antiquity. His labours were chiefly devoted to the Greek poets, but more especially to the Homeric poems, of which he published a recension, which has been the basis of the text from his time to the present day. The great object of his critical labours was to restore the genuine text of the Homeric poems, and to clear it of all later interpolations and corruptions. He marked those verses which he thought spurious with an obelos, and those which were repeated with an asterisk. He adopted the division (already made) of the Iliad and Odyssey into 24 books each. He did not confine himself to a recension of the text, but also explained and interpreted the poems: he opposed the allegorical interpretation which was then beginning to find favour, and which at a later time became very general. His grammatical principles were attacked by many of his contemporaries: the most eminent of his opponents was CRATES of Mallus. His criticisms are best preserved in the Venetian Scholia (ed. Bachmann, 1835). These Scholia include the Epitome, formed from the collection which Didymus and other Aristarcheans made from the writings of their master.

Aristeas (Ἀριστεάς), of Proconnesus, an epic poet of whose life we have only fabulous accounts. His date is quite uncertain: some place him in the time of Croesus and Cyrus; but other traditions make him earlier than Homer, or a contemporary and teacher of Homer. We only know that he was earlier than Herodotus. He seems to have been a mystic writer about the Hyperboreans, and was said to be a magician, whose soul could leave and re-enter its body according to its pleasure. He was connected with the worship of Apollo, which he was said to have introduced at Metapontum. He is said to have travelled through the countries N. and E. of the Euxine, and to have visited the Issedones, Arimaspaë, Cimmerii, Hyperborei, and other mythical nations, and after his return to have written an epic poem in 3 books, called The Arimaspaë (τὰ Ἀριμάσπεια). This work is frequently mentioned by the ancients, but it is impossible to say who was the real author of it. (Hdt. iv. 13, 36; Strab. pp. 6, 39; Tzetz. ii. 724; Paus. i. 24, 6, v. 7, 9; Gell. ix. 4.)

Aristeas, or Aristaeus, an officer of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247), the reputed author of a Greek work giving an account of the manner in which the translation of the Septuagint was executed, but which is generally admitted by the best critics to be spurious. Printed at Oxford, 1692, 8vo.

Aristides (Ἀριστίδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Lysimachus, surnamed the 'Just,' was of an ancient and noble family. He was the political disciple of Cleisthenes, and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. Aristides fought as the commander of his tribe at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490; and next year, 489, he was archon. In 483 he suffered ostracism, probably in consequence of the triumph of the maritime and democratic policy of his rival. From Hdt. viii. 79 he is generally supposed to have been still in exile in 480 at the battle of Salamis, where he did good service by dislodging the enemy, with a band raised and armed by himself, from the islet of Psyttaleia: but the words of Herodotus are not precise, and in Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 22 it is said that he was recalled before the battle: this agrees with Plutarch (Arist. 8). He was appointed general in the following year (479), and commanded the Athenians at the battle of Plataea. In 477, when the allies had become disgusted with the conduct of Pausanias and the Spartans, he and his colleague Cimon had the glory of obtaining for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy: and to Aristides was by general consent entrusted the task of drawing up its laws and fixing its assessments. He sketched out the changes which Ephialtes adopted in developing democracy by the overthrow of the Areiopagus (Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 41). This first tribute (φόρος) of 460 talents, paid into a common treasury at Delos, bore his name, and was regarded by the allies in after times as marking their Saturnian age. This is his last recorded act. He died after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely in 468. He died so poor that he did not leave enough to pay for his funeral: his daughters were portioned by the state, and his son Lysimachus received a grant of land and of money. (Plut. Arist.; Nep. Arist.; Hdt. vi. 110, viii. 89, ix. 18-70; Thuc. viii. 79.)—2. The author of a work entitled Milesiaca, which was probably a romance, having Miletus for its scene. It was written in prose, and was of a licentious character. It was translated into Latin by L. Cornelius Sisenna, a contemporary of Sulla, and it seems to have become popular with the Romans. Aristides is reckoned as the inventor of the Greek romance, and the title of his work gave rise to the term Milesian, as applied to works of fiction. He probably wrote at Miletus in the 1st or 2nd century B.C. (Ov. Trist. ii. 413, 443; Plut. Crass. 32.) Fragm. by C. Müller 1851.—3. OF THEBES, a celebrated Greek painter, flourished about B.C. 360-330. The point in which he most excelled was in depicting the feelings, expressions, and passions which may be observed in common life. His pictures were so much valued that long after his death Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered 600,000 sesterces for one of them. (Plin. xxxv. 98; Dict. Ant. s.v. Pictura.)—4. P. Aelius Aristides, surnamed THEODORUS, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, was born at Adriani in Mysia, in A.D. 117. He studied under Herodes Atticus at Athens, and subsequently travelled through Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The fame of his talents and acquisitions was so great that monuments were erected to his honour in several towns which he had honoured with his presence. Shortly before his return he was attacked by an illness which lasted for 13 years, but this did not prevent him from prosecuting his studies. He subsequently settled at Smyrna, and when this city was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 178, he used his influence with the emperor M. Aurelius to induce him to assist in rebuilding the town. The Smyrnaeans showed their gratitude to Aristides by offering him various honours and distinctions, most of which he refused: he accepted only the office of priest of Asclepius, which he held until his death, about A.D. 180. The works of Aristides which have come down to us, are 55 orations and declamations, and 2 treatises on rhetorical subjects of little value. His orations are much superior to those of the rhetoricians of his time, showing power both of thought and expression. The best edition of Aristides is by W. Dindorf, Lips. 1829.—5. Quintilianus Aristides, the author of a treatise in 3 books on music, probably lived in the 1st century after Christ. His work is perhaps the most valuable of all the ancient musical treatises; it is printed in the collection of Meibomius entitled Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652.

Aristion (Ἀριστίων), a philosopher either of the Epicurean or Peripatetic school, made himself tyrant of Athens through the influence of Mithridates. He held out against Sulla in B.C. 87; and when the city was taken by storm, he was put to death by Sulla's orders. (Athen. p. 211.)

Aristippus (Ἀρίστιππος). 1. Son of Aritades, and founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, was born at Cyrene, probably about 428 B.C. The fame of Socrates brought him to Athens, and he remained with him until a little before his execution, B.C. 399. He then lived as a teacher, receiving money from his pupils, in various places, first at Aegina, and afterwards at the court of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse; but he appears at last to have spent his old age at Cyrene, and there to have spent his old age. His philosophy rejected as useless discussions about mathematics and physical science: like Protagoras, he held that sensation consisted in motion, and he distinguished two kinds of motion, the rough (τραχεία) producing pain, and the smooth (λεία) producing pleasure, the absence of motion a neutral state. As we are concerned only with our own feelings, not with those of others, we should aim at gaining as much of the pleasurable and as little of the painful or neutral as possible. The nature of actions is indifferent, so long as the result produces a balance of pleasure. It is thus clear that Aristippus was a Hedonist, but it would be a mistake to suppose that he was himself an advocate of immorality, or even what we should call a mere sensualist, however much his theories tended to that end. He held that by nature the pleasant coincided with the good, and the unpleasant with the bad, thus being at liberty to condemn the vicious as ignorant of true pleasure; he taught that we should not seek pleasures purchased by greater pain, and that we should attain wisdom or insight to judge rightly of relative values. Further he required self-control, saying that there was no shame in indulgences, but it would be disgraceful if at any time he could not give them up. He was eminently gifted with εὐτραπέλια, the power of adapting himself to circumstances so as to extract the greatest possible enjoyment from them, while he secured his contentment by limiting his desires. This is expressed in the lines of Horace, 'mihi res non me rebus subjungere,' 'omnis Aristippum decuit color et status et res, tentantem majora, fere praesentibus aequum' (Ep. i. 1. 19; i. 17. 23). In his striving for φρόνησις and freedom of mind he witnesses to the teaching of Socrates, though in his philosophy of life he is as far as possible from the ethics of Socrates and from the Socratic view of real existence. Among the members of his school (some of whom, as might be expected, pushed their founder's view of pleasure to an extreme without his safeguards) were Antipater, Anniceris, Theodorus and Hegesias. His daughter Arete carried on his teaching, and imparted it to her son Aristippus the younger, thence called ὁ μητροδιδάκτος. (Xen. Mem. ii. 1; Plut. Dion. 19; Diog. Laërt. ii. 8, 56; Cic. Acad. ii. 42, 131, Fin. i. 7, 23, Tusc. ii. 6, 15.)—2. Two tyrants of Argos, in the time of Antigonus Gonatas. See ARISTOMACHUS, Nos. 3 and 4.

Aristo, T., a distinguished Roman jurist, lived under the emperor Trajan, and was a friend of the Younger Pliny. His works are occasionally mentioned in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from any of them in that compilation. He wrote notes on the Libri Posteriorum of Labeo, on Cassius, whose pupil he had been, and on Sabinus.

Aristo. [ARISTON.]

Aristobulus (Ἀριστόβουλος), princes of Judaea. 1. Eldest son of Joannes Hyrcanus, assumed the title of king of Judaea, on the death of his father in B.C. 107. He put to death his brother Antigonus, in order to secure his power, but died in the following year, 106. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 11, B. J. i. 2.)—2. Younger son of Alexander Jannaeus and Alexandra. After the death of his mother in B.C. 70, there was a civil war for some years between Aristobulus and his brother Hyrcanus, for the possession of the crown. At length, in B.C. 63, Aristobulus was deprived of the sovereignty by Pompey and carried away as a prisoner to Rome. In 57, he escaped from his confinement at Rome, with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judaea, renewed the war; but he was taken prisoner, and sent back to Rome by Gabinus. In 49, he was released by Julius Caesar, who sent him into Judaea, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 16, xiv. 1; B. J. i. 6; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 15, xli. 18.)—3. Grandson of No. 2, son of Alexander and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. He was made high-priest by Herod, when he was only 17 years old, but was afterwards drowned at Jericho, by order of Herod, B.C. 35. (Jos. Ant. xv. 2.)—4. Son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, was put to death in B.C. 6, with his brother Alexander, by order of their father, whose suspicions had been excited against them by their brother ANTIPATER. (Jos. Ant. xvi. 1.)—5. Surnamed 'the Younger,' son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with his two brothers, Agrippa I. and Herod the future king of Chalcis. He died, as he had lived, in a private station. (Jos. Ant. xviii. 5.)—6. Son of Herod king of Chalcis, grandson of No. 4, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In A.D. 55, Nero made him king of Armenia Minor, and in 61 added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia which had been given to Tigranes. He joined the Romans in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in 73. (Jos. Ant. xx. 8; Tac. Ann. xiii. 7, xiv. 26.)

Aristobulus. 1. Of Cassandrea, served under Alexander the Great in Asia, and wrote a history of Alexander, which was one of the chief sources used by Arrian in the composition of his work.—2. An Alexandrine Jew, and a Peripatetic philosopher, lived B.C. 170, under Ptolemy VI. Philometor.

Aristocles (Ἀριστοκλῆς). 1. Of Rhodes, a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, a contemporary of Strabo.—2. Of Pergamus, a sophist and rhetorician, and a pupil of Herodes Atticus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian.—3. Of Messene, a Peripatetic philosopher, probably lived about the beginning of the 3rd century after Christ. He wrote a work on philosophy, some fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius.—4. Sculptors. There were at least two sculptors of this name: 1. Aristocles of Sicyon, brother of Canachus, who is said to have founded a school of sculpture at Sicyon, with an hereditary reputation for 7 generations, five of which are named: Aristocles, Synnoön, Ptochichus, Sostratus, and Pantias. This Aristocles probably lived about B.C. 520, in the later archaic period.—2. Aristocles of Athens, who lived at the end of the same period, and of whose work a stele has been preserved. It is probable that the Aristocles of Cydonia mentioned by Paus. v. 25 as a very ancient sculptor is different from both of these and of an earlier date. Whether the Aristocles 'son and pupil of Cleoetas' (Paus. v. 24) is the same as No. 2 remains uncertain. The inscription on the stele seems to mean that the author of it was son of Aristion (cf. Paus. vi. 3, 9).

Aristocrates (Ἀριστοκράτης). 1. Last king of Arcadia, was the leader of the Arcadians in the second Messenian war, when they assisted the Messenians against the Spartans. Having been bribed by the Spartans, he betrayed the Messenians, and was in consequence stoned to death by the Arcadians, about B.C. 668, who now abolished the kingly office. (Strab. p. 362; Paus. iv. 17, viii. 5.)—2. An Athenian of wealth and influence, son of Scellias, was one of the Athenian generals at the battle of Arginusae, B.C. 406, and on his return to Athens was brought to trial and executed (Thuc. viii. 89; Xen. Hell. i. 5-7; Diod. xiii. 101; Plat. Gorg. 472).

Aristodēmus (Ἀριστόδημος). 1. A descendant of Heracles, son of Aristomachus, and father of Eurysthenes and Procles. According to some traditions Aristodēmus was killed at Naupactus by a flash of lightning, just as he was setting out on his expedition into Peloponnesus; but a Lacedaemonian tradition related that Aristodēmus himself came to Sparta, was the first king of his race, and died a natural death (Paus. ii. 18, iii. 1; Hdt. vi. 52.)—2. A Messenian, one of the chief heroes in the first Messenian war. As the Delphic oracle had declared that the preservation of the Messenian state demanded that a maiden of the house of the Aepytyds should be sacrificed, Aristodēmus offered his own daughter. In order to save her life, her lover declared that she was with child by him, but Aristodēmus, enraged at this assertion, murdered his daughter and opened her body to refute the calumny. Aristodēmus was afterwards elected king in place of Euphaes, who had fallen in battle against the Spartans, though the soothsayers objected that he was guilty of his daughter's blood. He continued the war against the Spartans till at length, finding further resistance hopeless, he put an end to his life on the tomb of his daughter, about B.C. 723. (Paus. iv. 9-13.)—3. Tyrant of Cumae in Campania, at whose court Tarquinius Superbus died, B.C. 496 (Liv. ii. 21.)—4. One of the 300 Spartans at Thermopylae (B.C. 480), was not present at the battle in which his comrades fell, either in consequence of sickness, or because he had been sent on an errand from the camp. The Spartans punished him with Atimia, or civil degradation. Stung with this treatment he met his death at Plataea in the following year (479), after performing the wildest feats of valour. (Hdt. vii. 229.)—5. A tragic actor of Athens in the time of Demosthenes, took a prominent part in the political affairs of his time, and advocated peace with Macedonia. He was employed by the Athenians in their negotiations with Philip, with whom he was a great favourite (Dem. de Cor. p. 232, § 21; F.L. p. 344, § 12).—6. Of Miletus, a friend and flatterer of Antigonus, king of Asia, who sent him into Greece in B.C. 315, in order to promote his interests there (Diod. xix. 57–66).—7. There were many literary persons of this name referred to by the ancient grammarians. Two were natives of Nysa in Caria, both grammarians, one a teacher of Pompey, and the other of Strabo. There was also an Aristodemus of Elis, and another of Thebes, who are quoted as writers.

Aristogiton (Ἀριστογείτων). 1. The conspirator against the sons of Pisistratus. See HARMODIUS.—2. An Athenian orator and adversary of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Deinarchus. He was often accused by Demosthenes and others, and defended himself in a number of orations which are lost. A speech of Deinarchus against Aristogiton is extant, and two which are attributed to Demosthenes, but are probably spurious.

Aristomachē (Ἀριστομάχη), daughter of Hipparinus of Syracuse, sister of Dion, and wife of the elder Dionysius, who married her and Doris of Locri on the same day. She afterwards perished with her daughter ARETE.

Aristomachus (Ἀριστόμαχος). 1. Son of Talaus and brother of Adrastus.—2. Son of Cleodemus or Cleodaeus, grandson of Hyllus, great-grandson of Heracles, and father of Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus. He fell in battle when he invaded Peloponnesus; but his three sons were more successful and conquered Peloponnesus. (Hdt. vi. 52; Paus. ii. 7. 6; Apollod. ii. 8).—3. Tyrant of Argos, under the patronage of Antigonus Gonatas, was assassinated and succeeded by Aristippus II. (Plut. Arat. 25).—4. Tyrant of Argos, succeeded Aristippus II.; he resigned his power upon the death of Demetrius in B.C. 229, and induced Argos to join the Achaean League. He afterwards deserted the Achaeans, and again assumed the tyranny of Argos; but the city having been taken by Antigonus Doson, Aristomachus fell into the hands of the Achaeans, and was by them put to death. It must be recollected in his favour that his preference of the Spartan leader to the Macedonian, whom Aratus called in, was the better policy. (Polyb. ii. 59; Plut. Arat. 25–44.)

Aristomēnes (Ἀριστομένης). 1. The Messenian, the hero of the second war with Sparta, belongs more to legend than to history. He was a native of Andania, and was sprung from the royal line of Aegyptus. Tired of the yoke of Sparta, he began the war in B.C. 685, thirty-nine years after the end of the first war. Soon after its commencement he so distinguished himself by his valour that he was offered the throne, but refused it, and received the office of supreme commander. After the defeat of the Messenians in the third year of the war, through the treachery of Aristocrates, the Arcadian leader, Aristomenes retreated to the mountain fortress of Ira, and there maintained the war for eleven years, constantly ravaging the land of Lacedaemonia. In one of his incursions, however, the Spartans overpowered him with superior numbers, and carrying him with fifty of his comrades to Sparta, cast them into the pit (καθάβας) where condemned criminals were thrown. The rest perished; not so Aristomenes, the favourite of the gods; for legends told how an eagle bore him up on its wings as he fell, and a fox guided him on the third day from the cavern. But having incurred the anger of the Twin Brothers, his country was destined to ruin. The city of Ira, which he had so long successfully defended, fell into the hands of the Spartans; Aristomenes, after performing prodigies of valour, was obliged to leave his country, which was again compelled to submit to the Spartans, B.C. 668. He afterwards settled at Ialysus in Rhodes, where he died. Damagetus, king of Ialysus, had been enjoined by the Delphic oracle 'to marry the daughter of the best of the Greeks,' and he therefore took to wife the daughter of Aristomenes, who accompanied him to Rhodes. The Rhodians honoured Aristomenes as a hero, and from him were descended the illustrious family of the Diagoridae. At Leuctra his apparition was seen aiding the Thebans against the Spartans. (Paus. iv. 14–24, 32; Polyb. iv. 32).—2. An Acarnanian, who governed Egypt with justice and wisdom during the minority of Ptolemy V. Epiphaues, but was put to death by Ptolemy in 192 (Polyb. xv. 31, xviii. 36).—3. A comic poet of Athens, flourished during the Peloponnesian war.

Ariston (Ἀρίστων). 1. Of Chios, a Stoic philosopher, and a disciple of Zeno, flourished about B.C. 260. Though he professed himself a Stoic, yet he differed from Zeno in several points: he more nearly approached to the Cynics; he despised all culture, the study of dialectics and physics, and valued ethical discussion alone, holding indifference to worldly goods to be the aim of philosophy.—2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Iulis in the island of Ceos, succeeded Lycon as head of the Peripatetic school, about B.C. 224. He wrote several philosophical works which are lost (Diog. Laërt. v. 70; Cic. de Fin. v. 5).—3. Of Alexandria, a Peripatetic philosopher and a contemporary of Strabo, wrote a work on the Nile (Strab. p. 690).

Aristonautae (Ἀριστοναῦται), a town in Achaia, the harbour of Pallene.

Aristonicus (Ἀριστόνικος). 1. A natural son of Eumenes II. of Pergamus. Upon the death of his brother Attalus III. B.C. 133, who left his kingdom to the Romans, Aristonicus laid claim to the crown. At first he met with considerable success. He defeated in 131 the consul P. Licinius Crassus; but in 130 he was defeated and taken prisoner by M. Perperna, was carried to Rome by M. Aquilius in 129, and was there put to death. (Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Flor. ii. 20; Strab. p. 646).—2. An Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Strabo, and the author of several works, most of which related to the Homeric poems (Strab. p. 38).

Aristonymus (Ἀριστόνυμος), a comic poet and contemporary of Aristophanes and Amipsias.

Aristophānes (Ἀριστοφάνης). 1. The celebrated comic poet of Athens, was born about B.C. 444; he belonged to the deme of Cydathæon. His father Philippus had possessions in Aegina, and may originally have come from that island, whence a question arose whether Aristophanes was a genuine Athenian citizen: his enemy Cleon brought against him more than one accusation to deprive him of his civic rights (ξενίας γραφάι), but without success. He had three sons, Philippus, Araros, and Nicostratus, but of his private history we know nothing. He probably died about B.C. 380. The comedies of Aristophanes are of the highest historical interest, containing as they do an admirable series of caricatures of the leading men of the day, and a contemporary commentary on the evils existing at Athens. Indeed, the caricature is the only feature in modern social life which at all resembles them. Aristophanes wrote because he was a genius and a poet; and it would be a mistake to suppose that he produced plays merely or primarily with a political purpose. At the same time he wrote with a patriotic feeling, and in many points with wisdom; though in many also he was above measure reactionary. He had the strongest affection for Athens, and longed to see her restored to the state in which she was flourishing in the previous generation, and almost in his own childhood, before Pericles became the head of the government, and when the age of Miltiades and Aristides had but just passed away. The first great evil of his own time against which he inveighs, is the Peloponnesian war, which he regards as the work of Pericles. To this fatal war, among a host of evils, he ascribes the influence of demagogues like Cleon at Athens. Another great object of his indignation was the recently adopted system of education which had been introduced by the Sophists, acting on the speculative and inquiring turn given to the Athenian mind by the Ionian and Eleatic philosophers, and the extraordinary intellectual development of the age following the Persian war. The new theories introduced by the Sophists threatened to overthrow the foundations of morality, by making persuasion and not truth the object of man in his intercourse with his fellows, and to substitute a universal scepticism for the religious creed of the people. The worst effects of such a system were seen in Alcibiades, who combined all the elements which Aristophanes most disliked, heading the war party in politics, and protecting the sophistical school in philosophy and also in literature. Of this latter school—the literary and poetical Sophists—Euripides was the chief, whose works are full of that μετρωποσοφία which contrasts so strongly with the moral dignity of Aeschylus and Sophocles; on account of which Aristophanes introduces him as soaring in the air to write his tragedies. Another feature of the times was the excessive love for litigation at Athens, the consequent importance of the dicasts, and disgraceful abuse of their power; all of which enormities, are made by Aristophanes objects of continual attack. But though he saw what were the evils of his time, he had not wisdom to find a remedy for them, except the hopeless and undesirable one of a movement backwards. His first comedy was the Δαιταλείς, or Banquetters, which in B.C. 427 gained the second prize: like the Clouds, it objected to the modern tendency of education to produce quibbles of rhetoric. In 428 his Babylonians was produced in the name of Callistratus (Acharn. 635). The title was applied to foreign slaves and the chorus consisted of slaves branded on the forehead with an owl, as the property of Athens. The play was directed against the arbitrary treatment of her allies by Athens; and as many of them were then present for the spring payment of tribute, the offence was greater, and Callistratus was indicted by Cleon (Acharn. 377). The following is a list of his extant comedies, with the year in which they were performed. In the first group, those before the Sicilian expedition may be reckoned, which used political satire with no restraint: viz. in 425, Acharnians. Produced in the name of Callistratus. First prize.—424. Ἴππείς, Knights or Horsemen. The first play produced in the name of Aristophanes himself. First prize; second, Cratinus.—423. Clouds. First prize, Cratinus; second, Amipsias.—422. Wasps. Second prize.—Clouds (second edition), failed in obtaining a prize. Some writers place this B.C. 411, and the whole subject is very uncertain.—419. Peace. Second prize; Eupolis first. In the second group there is less of political satire and less bitterness: viz. in 414, Birds. Second prize; Amipsias, first; Phrynichus, third.—411. Lysistrata.—Thesmophoriazusae. During the Oligarchy.—408. First Plutus.—405. Frogs. First prize; Phrynichus, second; Plato, third. Death of Sophocles.—392. Ecclesiazusae.—388. Second edition of the Plutus. In the Ecclesiazusae and the Plutus the personal satire has nearly disappeared, and there is more approach to the Middle Comedy: the Plutus may be regarded as the transition, which is also marked by the disappearance of the chorus, connected perhaps with the poverty of the time.—The last two comedies of Aristophanes were the Acolosicon and Cocalus, produced about B.C. 387 (date of the peace of Antalcidas) by Araros, one of his sons. They seem to have resembled the Middle Comedy, having no chorus or parabasis and more regular plots. Suidas tells us that Aristophanes was the author, in all, of 54 plays. As a poet Aristophanes possessed merits of the highest order. His works contain exquisite snatches of lyric poetry; and some of his choruses, particularly one in the Knights, in which the horses are represented as rowing triremes in an expedition against Corinth, are written with a spirit and humour unrivalled in Greek. They were in some points not very dissimilar to English ballads. He was a complete master of the Attic dialect, and in his hands the perfection of that glorious language is wonderfully shown. The burlesque element also is freely admitted: animals of every kind are pressed into his service; frogs chaunt choruses, a dog is tried for stealing a cheese, and an iambic verse is composed of the grunts of a pig.—Editions. In the Poetae Scenici of Dindorf, 1870; Bergk, 1872; Meiske, 1861; Holden, 1868: the Frogs and Wasps by Rogers, with a verse translation are to be recommended. For the whole the most useful assistance is Bekker's edition with notes variorum and Scholia.—2. Of Byzantium, son of Apelles, and one of the most eminent Greek grammarians at Alexandria. He was pupil of Zenodotus and Eratosthenes, and teacher of the celebrated Aristarchus. He was born about 260 B.C., lived in the reigns of Ptolemy II. and Ptolemy III., and had the supreme management of the library at Alexandria. Aristophanes was the first who introduced the use of accents in the Greek language. He devoted himself chiefly to the criticism and interpretation of the Greek poets, and more especially of Homer, of whose work he made a new and critical edition

(δύρθωσις). The philosophers Plato and Aristotle likewise engaged his attention, and of the former, as of several of the poets, he made new and critical editions. All we possess of his numerous works consists of fragments scattered through the Scholia on the poets, some Arguments to the plays of the tragic poets and of Aristophanes, and a part of his Λέξεις, which is printed in Boissonade's edition of Herodian's Partitiones, London, 1819, p. 283-289; Nauck, 1848.

Aristōphōn (Ἀριστόφων). 1. Of the demus of Azeuia in Attica, one of the most distinguished Athenian orators about the close of the Peloponnesian war. The number of laws which he proposed may be inferred from his own statement, as preserved by Aeschines, that he was accused 75 times of having made illegal proposals, but that he had always come off victorious. In B.C. 354 he accused Iphicrates and Timotheus, and in the same year he came forward in the assembly to defend the law of Leptines against Demosthenes. The latter treats him with great respect, and reckons him amongst the eloquent orators (Dem. Eubul. § 30; Athen. pp. 18, 38).—2. Of the demus of Colyttus, a contemporary of Demosthenes, and an orator of great distinction and influence. It was this Aristophon whom Aeschines served as a clerk, and in whose service he was trained for his public career. [AESCHINES].—3. A comic poet of the Middle Comedy.—4. A painter of some distinction, son and pupil of Aglaophon, and brother of Polygnotus.

Aristōtēles (Ἀριστοτέλης), the philosopher, was born at Stagira, a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, B.C. 384. His father, Nicomachus, was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with natural science: his mother, Phaestis (or Phaestias), was descended from a Chalcidian family. The studies and occupation of his father account for the early inclination manifested by Aristotle for the investigation of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout his whole life. He lost his father before he had attained his 17th year; and he was entrusted to the guardianship of one Proxenus of Atarneus in Mysia, who was settled in Stagira. In 367, he went to Athens to pursue his studies, and there became a pupil of Plato, who had just returned from Sicily, about 365. Plato soon distinguished him above all his other disciples. He named him the 'intellect of his school,' and his house, the house of the 'reader.' Aristotle lived at Athens for 20 years, till 347. During the whole of this period the good understanding which subsisted between teacher and scholar continued, with some trifling exceptions, undisturbed; for the stories of the disrespect and ingratitude of the latter towards the former are nothing but calumnies invented by his enemies. During the last 10 years of his first residence at Athens, Aristotle gave instruction in rhetoric, and distinguished himself by his opposition to Isocrates. It was at this time that he published his first rhetorical writings. Upon the death of Plato (347) Aristotle left Athens: perhaps he was offended by Plato having appointed Speusippus as his successor in the Academy. He first repaired to his friend Hermeias at Atarneus, where he married Pythias, the adoptive daughter of the prince. On the death of Hermeias, who was killed by the Persians (344), Aristotle fled from Atarneus to Mytilene. Two years afterwards (342) he accepted an invitation from Philip of Macedonia, to undertake the instruction of his son Alexander, then 13 years of age. Here Aristotle was treated with the most marked respect. His native city, Stagira, which had been destroyed by Philip, was rebuilt at his request, and Philip caused a gymnasium (called Nymphæum) to be built there in a pleasant grove expressly for Aristotle and his pupils. Several of the youths of the Macedonian nobles were educated by Aristotle along with Alexander. Aristotle spent 7 years in Macedonia; but Alexander enjoyed his instruction without interruption for only 4. Still with such a pupil even this short period was sufficient for a teacher like Aristotle to fulfil the highest purposes of education, and to create in his pupil that sense of the noble and great, which distinguishes Alexander from all those conquerors who have only swept like a hurricane through the world. On Alexander's accession to the throne in 335, Aristotle returned to Athens. Here he found his friend Xenocrates president of the Academy. He himself had the Lycæum, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lyceus, assigned to him by the state. He soon assembled round him a large number of distinguished scholars, to whom he delivered lectures on philosophy in the shady walks (περίπατοι) which surrounded the Lyceum, while walking up and down (περιπατών), and not sitting, which was the general practice of the philosophers. From one or other of these circumstances the name Peripatetic is derived, which was afterwards given to his school. According to an account preserved by Gellius (xx. 5) he gave two different courses of lectures every day. Those which he delivered in the morning (ἑσθινὸς περίπατος) to a narrower circle of chosen (esoteric) hearers, and which were called acroamatic or acroatic, embraced subjects connected with the more abstruse philosophy (theology), physics, and dialectics. Those which he delivered in the afternoon (δειλιὸς περίπατος) and intended for a more promiscuous circle (which accordingly he called exoteric), extended to rhetoric, sophistics, and politics. He appears to have taught not so much in the way of conversation, as in regular lectures. His school soon became the most celebrated at Athens, and he continued to preside over it for 13 years (335-323). During this time he also composed the greater part of his works. In these labours he was assisted by the truly kingly liberality of his former pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, but also caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for one of his most excellent works, the History of Animals. Meanwhile various causes contributed to throw a cloud over the latter years of the philosopher's life. In the first place, he felt deeply the death of his wife, Pythias, who left behind her a daughter of the same name: he lived subsequently with a friend of his wife's, the slave Herpyllis, who bore him a son, Nicomachus. Another trouble was the breach in his friendship with Alexander, caused by the affair of Callisthenes. [See ALEXANDER; CALLISTHENES.] The story that Aristotle had a share in poisoning the king is a fabrication of a later age; and moreover it is certain that Alexander died a natural death. After the death of Alexander (323) Aristotle was looked upon with suspicion at Athens as a friend of Macedonia; but as it was not easy to bring any political accusation against him, he was accused of impiety (ἀσεβείας) by the microphant Eurymodon. He withdrew from Athens before his trial, and escaped in the beginning of 322 to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died in the course of the same year, in the 63rd year of his age, of a chronic disease of the stomach. His body was transported to his native city Stagira, and his memory was honoured there, like that of a hero, by yearly festivals. He bequeathed to Theophrastus his well-stored library and the originals of his writings. Implicit reliance cannot be placed on the depreciatory picture of some later writers, that Aristotle was short and of slender make, with small eyes, and a lisp in his pronunciation, using L for R, and with a sort of sarcastic expression in his countenance (Diog. Laërt. v. 1; Ael. V.H. iii. 19; Anth. Pal. iii. 176). At any rate these carpings show that there was nothing to allege against the nobility of character which may be inferred from his writings. He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. He is described as having been of weak health, which, considering the astonishing extent of his studies, shows all the more the energy of his mind. The importance of Aristotle's work can hardly be over-estimated, though his place as the greatest of ancient philosophers was not fully recognised till the middle ages. Indeed, it would be difficult to name a writer in any age who to such a degree combined thoroughness and reality with comprehensiveness. For Aristotle dealt scientifically, so far as existing materials could go, with all branches of knowledge. He founded the science of reasoning, since called Logic, as opposed to the Dialectic or art of discussion instituted by Socrates and Plato. In theoretical physics he could not supply us with anything that makes for present knowledge, but he did supply the foundation upon which the greater part of the system of the Schoolmen, and the literature which grew out of it, was based. In mathematics he seems to have quitted the speculative methods of Plato and to have brought us nearer to the real discoveries of Archimedes. In natural history, investigating the whole of zoology, he arrived, as will be seen, at broad classifications entirely his own, but approved by modern science. The same force and clearness of reason, and the same comprehensive grasp of his subjects, mark his works on moral philosophy, on political history, and on literary criticism, and have left their impress in much of modern thought and method where the debt to Aristotle as the originator is often forgotten. A complete list of the works written by Aristotle is unattainable. It is remarkable that while we have two lists handed down, one said to be by the Alexandrian Hermippus (200 A.D.), the other by Ptolemaeus, a Peripatetic of the 2nd century A.D. (preserved by Arabian writers), the former, putting the total at 400 writings, does not mention important works of Aristotle which we now possess: it was probably a list of Aristotelian works at that time in the Alexandrian library. In the collection which we now have many, no doubt, are rightly noted by modern writers as spurious: it does not, however, follow that they present to us nothing of Aristotle; for, while in several that are rightly attributed to Aristotle there are insertions and alterations by later writers, on the other hand much that Aristotle did not write probably represents the notes of his teaching thrown into shape by his pupils and followers. The works by Aristotle, or bearing his name, may be divided into the following classes, according to the subjects of which they treat. I. DIALECTICS AND LOGIC.—The extant logical writings are comprehended as a whole under the title Organon ("ὄργανον, i.e. instrument of science). They are occupied with the investigation of the method by which man arrives at knowledge. An insight into the nature and formation of conclusions and of proof by means of conclusions, is the common aim and centre of all the separate 6 works composing the Organon: these separate works are, 1. Κατηγορίαι, Praedicamenta, in which Aristotle treats of the (10) comprehensive generic ideas, under which all the attributes of things may be subordinated as species: that is, in order to get an exhaustive definition of concepts they are made to fall under one or other of these classes or categories, of which the 4 most important determine the substance of anything (οὐσία or τί ἐστίν), the quantity (πόσον), the quality (ποιόν), the relation (πρὸς τί). 2. Περὶ ἑρμηνείας, De Interpretatione, concerning the expression of thought by means of speech. [This is by a later writer.] 3, 4. Ἀναλυτικὰ πρότερα and ἕστερα, Analytica, each in 2 books, on the theory of conclusions: so called from the resolution of the conclusion into its fundamental component parts. 5. Τοπικά, De Locis, in 8 books, of the general points of view (τόποι) from which conclusions may be drawn. 6. Περὶ σοφιστικῶν ἐλέγχων (the 9th of the Topica), concerning the fallacies which only apparently prove something. The term 'logic' was not applied to this science by Aristotle (who called it 'Analytic'), but by the Stoic school. The best edition of the Organon is by Waitz, Lips. 1846.—II. ΜΕΤΑΦΥΣΙΚΑ, or 'the first philosophy,' in 14 books (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικὰ), originally distinct treatises, independent of one another, which were put together as one work after Aristotle's death (Books ii. and xi. from ch. 8 are spurious). The title also is of late origin, and was given to the work from its being placed in the collection of Audronicus after (μετὰ) the Physics (τὰ φυσικὰ). The subject is the origin and nature of existence, or, more particularly, it treats of (a) the relation of the individual to the universal, (b) form to matter, (c) the moving to the moved. Whereas Plato allows only ideas (the universal) to have real existence, Aristotle denies the separate and independent existence of the Platonic ideas. His view is that the formless substance of matter (ἕλη) has merely the capacity for becoming something (δυνάμει ἐστίν), it attains reality (ἐνέργεια or ἐντελέχεια) when form (εἶδος) is communicated to it. From the relations of form and matter arises motion: the moving element is the form, which produces reality; the moved is the potential or material. The highest good being the final object is the ultimate source of movement and life in the world. [Separately edited by Bonitz and Schwegler.]—III. SCIENCE, including (a) Mathematics, on which we have two treatises not by Aristotle, but probably conveying his teaching: viz. Περὶ ἀτόμων γραμμῶν, i. e. concerning indivisible lines, and Μηχανικὰ προβλήματα, Mechanical Problems; (b) Physics, in which we have—(1) φυσικὴ ἀκρόασις (called also by others περὶ ἀρχῶν), in 8 books. In these Aristotle develops the general principles of natural science. (Cosmology.) (2) Concerning the Heaven (περὶ οὐρανοῦ), in 4 books. (3) On Production and Destruction (περὶ γενέσεως καὶ φθορᾶς, de Generatione et Corruptione), in 2 books, develop the general laws of production and destruction. (4) On Meteorology (μετεωρολογικά, de Meteoris), in 4 books. (5) On the Universe (περὶ κόσμου, de Mundo), a letter to Alexander, treats the subject of the last 2 works in a popular tone and a rhetorical style altogether foreign to Aristotle, and is certainly not his work. The theories of Aristotle about the nature of the world, where he was left to speculation unaided by experience, have a different value from his treatment of natural history. With the problems of creation he was not concerned, because he held matter and form to be eternal. His theories of the spherical earth in the centre, with concentric heavenly spheres around it, and the heaven of the fixed stars as the innermost, are of a purely literary value from their bearing on the Paradiso of Dante. (6) The History of Animals (περὶ ζῶων ἱστορία), in 9 books (the 10th being spurious), treats of all the peculiarities of this division of the natural kingdom, according to genera, classes, and species; especially giving all the characteristics of each animal according to its external and internal vital functions; according to the manner of its copulation, its mode of life, and its character. The best edition is by Schneider, Lips. 1811. The observations in this work are the triumph of ancient sagacity, and have been confirmed by the results of the most recent investigations. For instance, he divides the animal kingdom into the vertebrate and invertebrate; in the former he distinguishes mammals, birds, reptiles and fishes, and recognises that whales are mammals. (7) On the Parts of Animals (περὶ ζῶων μορίων), in 4 books, in which Aristotle, after describing the phenomena in each species, develops the causes of these phenomena by means of the idea to be formed of the purpose which is manifested in the formation of the animal. (8) On the Generation of Animals (περὶ ζῶων γενέσεως), in 5 books, treats of the generation of animals and the organs of generation. (9) De Incessu Animalium (περὶ ζῶων πορείας). [περὶ ζῶων κινήσεως is spurious.] (10) Three books on the Soul (περὶ ψυχῆς). Aristotle defines the soul to be that which gives real form to the bodily matter, and therefore movement and life. Man differs from other animals in having spirit (νοῦς) besides the animal soul. There are besides smaller treatises connected with this subject, on memory, sleep, dreams, &c. (11) In the 37 sections of Problems (προβλήματα) we have many remarks that are Aristotle's on various branches of knowledge, but buried in a mass of later additions. The treatises περὶ φυτῶν, περὶ χρωμάτων, περὶ ἀκουσῶν, περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμάτων, and the φυσιολογικά are spurious. Several anatomical works of Aristotle have been lost. He was the first person who in any especial manner advocated anatomical investigations, and showed the necessity of them for the study of the natural sciences. He frequently refers to investigations of his own on the subject.—IV. PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY OR POLITICS.—All that falls within the sphere of practical philosophy is comprehended in three principal works: the Ethics, the Politics, and the Oeconomics. (1) The Nicomachean Ethics (Ἠθικά Νικομάχεια), in 10 books. Aristotle here begins with the highest and most universal end of life, for the individual as well as for the community in the state. This is happiness (εὐδαιμονία); and its conditions are, on the one hand, perfect virtue exhibiting it-elf in the actor, and, on the other hand, corresponding bodily advantages and favourable external circumstances. Virtue is the readiness to act constantly and consciously according to the laws of the rational nature of man (ὀρθὸς λόγος). The nature of virtue shows itself in its appearing as the medium between two extremes. In accordance with this, the several virtues are characterised. Editions by Grant, 1874; Ramsauer, 1878; Bywater, 1890; Notes by Stewart, 1893; Book v. by H. Jackson, 1879.—(2) The Eudemean Ethics (Ἠθικά Εὐδήμεια), in 7 books, of which only books i. ii. iii. and vii. are preserved, while the remaining books iv. v. and vi. are a repetition of books v. vi. and vii. of the Nicomachean Ethics. This ethical work is a recension of Aristotle's lectures, edited by Eudemus.—(3) Ἠθικά Μέγαρα, in 2 books, a sketch compiled from the Nicomachean and Eudemean Ethics.—(4) Politics (Πολιτικά) in 8 books. The Ethics conduct us to the Politics. The connexion between the two works is so close, that in the Ethics by the word ὑπερον reference is made by Aristotle to the Politics, and in the latter by πρότερον to the Ethics. The Politics show how happiness is to be attained for the human community in the state; for the object of the state is not merely the external preservation of life, but 'happy life, as it is attained by means of virtue' (ἀρετή, perfect development of the whole man). Hence also ethics form the first and most general foundation of political life, because the state cannot attain its highest object if morality does not prevail among its citizens. The house, the family, is the element of the state. Accordingly Aristotle begins with the doctrine of domestic economy, then proceeds to a description of the different forms of government, after which he gives a delineation of the most important Hellenic constitutions, and then investigates which of the constitutions is the best (the ideal of the state)—an aristocracy in which the citizenship is enjoyed only by those whose position and education fits them to direct the state. Hence he desires a state education for the citizens. Manual labour is left to slaves and aliens; for he assumes slavery as a necessary condition. The doctrine concerning education, as most important in this best state, forms the conclusion. Editions by Congreve, 1874; Susenhihl, 1879; Newman, Oxford, 1887; transl. by Jowett; and by Welldon.—(6) It was known that Aristotle had written wholly or in part several πολίτεια, i. e. particular accounts of the constitutions of various states (more than 100 in number, as was said). Of these it was supposed that only fragments, collected by Neumann and by Rose, survived. But a papyrus was discovered in Egypt and was published in 1891 by the British Museum, containing the greater part of the Ἀθηναίων πολιτεία, a treatise of considerable historical value for the elucidation and confirmation of several points in the constitutional history of Athens down to the close of the 5th century B. C. How far, or in what sense, this is to be regarded as a genuine work of Aristotle is still a subject of discussion. There is internal evidence of its having been written before the date of Aristotle's death: if not by himself, at least from notes of his teaching. Editio princeps by Kenyon, 1891; also by Sandys, 1892.—(7) Oeconomics (οικονομικά), in 2 books, which are by a later writer.—V. WORKS OF ART. To these belong the Poetics and Rhetoric. (1) The Poetics (Περὶ ποιητικῆς). Aristotle penetrated deeper than any of the ancients into the essence of the Hellenic art. He is the father of the aesthetics of poetry, as he is the completer of Greek rhetoric as a science. He holds that 'Poetry is more serious and more profound than History, because it deals with universal truth, not with that which lies in details.' The greatest part of the treatise contains a theory of Tragedy, under which head he has left us criticisms on particular Greek plays: he defines Tragedy as the imitation of some action of proper magnitude in fitting language, not by narrative, but by action, so as to effect through pity and terror a purgation of the passions (κάθαρσις), i.e. so that the excitable passions are 'worked out' and the mind is left calm though elevated (κάθαρσις being a medical metaphor). He calls Euripides the 'most tragic' of the Tragedians. Epic poetry, as though superseded in value by Tragedy, he treats slightly, and says little of Lyric. [Editions and comments by Christ, 1878; Bernays, 1880; Braunscheid, 1882; Wharton, 1883; Prickard, 1891.]—(2) The Rhetoric (ῥέχνη ῥητορική), in 3 books; but the genuineness of the 3rd is doubtful. Rhetoric, as a science, according to Aristotle, stands side by side with Dialectics. That which makes a scientific treatment of rhetoric possible is the argumentation which awakens conviction; he therefore directs his chief attention to the theory of oratorical argumentation. The second division of the work treats of the production of that favourable disposition in the hearer in consequence of which the orator appears to him to be worthy of credit. The third part treats of oratorical expression and arrangement. Edition by Cope and Sandys, 1877; transl. by Welldon. [The ῥητορικὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον is spurious.]—VI. POETRY. Though several epigrams are falsely attributed to him, it is probable that the beautiful Scolion beginning Ἀρεὰ πολύμοχθε γένει βροστέω, in praise of Hermeias, is his work.—According to a story current in antiquity Aristotle bequeathed his library and MSS. to Theophrastus, his successor in the Academy. On the death of Theophrastus, the libraries and MSS. both of Aristotle and Theophrastus are said to have come into the hands of his relation and disciple, Neleus of Scepsis. This Neleus sold both libraries to Ptolemy II. king of Egypt, for the Alexandrian library; but he retained for himself, as an heirloom, the original MSS. of the works of these two philosophers. The descendants of Neleus, who were subjects of the king of Pergamus, knew of no other way of securing them from the search of the Attali, who wished to rival the Ptolemies in forming a large library, than concealing them in a cellar, where for a couple of centuries they were exposed to the ravages of damp and worms. It was not till the beginning of the century before the birth of Christ that a wealthy book-collector, the Athenian Apellicon of Teos, traced out these valuable relics, bought them from the ignorant heirs, and prepared from them a new edition of Aristotle's works. After the capture of Athens, Sulla conveyed Apollicon's library to Rome, B.C. 84. Tyrannion made copies of them, and Andronicus of Rhodes thence arranged an edition of Aristotle's works. [APELLICON.] From this story an error arose, which has been handed down from the age of Strabo to recent times. It was concluded from this account, that neither Aristotle nor Theophrastus had published their writings, with the exception of some exoteric works, which had no important bearing on their system; and that it was not till 200 years later that they were brought to light by the above-mentioned Apellicon, and published to the philosophical world. That, however, was by no means the case. Aristotle, indeed, did not prepare a complete edition, as we call it, of his writings. Nay, it is certain that death overtook him before he could finish some of his works and put the finishing hand to others. Nevertheless it cannot be denied that the Peripatetics in this interval of 200 years were acquainted with Aristotle's writings. It has, indeed, been surmised that the 146 works catalogued (as stated above) about 200 B.C. were the lost Dialogues of Aristotle's earlier and Platonic style, which would have explained Cicero's description of his language as having 'a golden flow.'—The complete edition of Aristotle's works by Bekker has Scholia and a Latin translation. This does not include the recently discovered treatise on the Constitution of Athens. This edition has been reprinted at Oxford in 11 vols. 8vo.; and by Tauchnitz, 1877: there is a convenient edition in one volume by Weise, 1843; for editions of separate treatises see above.

Aristoxénus (Ἀριστοξένος), of Tarentum, a Peripatetic philosopher and a musician, flourished about B.C. 318. He was a disciple of Aristotle, whom he appears to have rivalled in the variety of his studies. According to Suidas, he produced works to the number of 453 upon music, philosophy, history, in short every department of literature. We know nothing of his philosophical opinions, except that he held the soul to be a harmony of the body (Cic. Tusc. i. 10), a doctrine which had already been discussed by Plato in the Phaedo. Of his numerous works the only one extant is his Elements of Harmony (ἁρμονικὰ στοιχεῖα), in 3 books: edited by Meibomius, in the Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652.

Aristus (Ἀριστος). 1. Of Salamis in Cyprus, wrote a history of Alexander the Great (Arrian, vii. 19; Strab. p. 682).—2. An Academic philosopher, a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and teacher of M. Brutus (Cic. ad Att. v. 10; Plut. Brut. 2).

Arius, river. [ARIA.]

Ariüsia (ἡ Ἀριουσία χώρα), a district on the N. of Chios, where the best wine in the island was grown (Verg. Ecl. v. 71; Plin. xiv. 73).

Armenë (Ἀρμένη, or -ήνη: Akliman), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, where the 10,000 Greeks, during their retreat, rested 5 days, entertained by the people of Sinope, a little to the W. of which Armenë stood (Xen. An. vi. 1, 15; Strab. p. 545).

Armënia (Ἀρμενία: Ἀρμένιος, Armenius: Armenia), a country of Asia, lying between Asia Minor and the Caspian, is a lofty tableland, backed by the chain of the Caucasus, watered by the rivers Cyrus and Araxes, containing the sources also of the Tigris and of the Euphrates, the latter of which divides the country into 2 unequal parts, which were called Major and Minor. 1. Armenia Major or Propria (ἡ μεγάλη or ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη: Erzeroum, Kars, Van, and Erivan), was bounded on the NE. and N. by the Cyrus (Kur), which divided it from Albania and Iberia; on the NW. and W. by the Moschici mountains (the prolongation of the chain of the Anti-Taurus), and the Euphrates (Frat), which divided it from Colchis and Armenia Minor; and on the S. and SE. by the mountains called Masius, Niphates, and Gordiaei (the prolongation of the Taurus), and the lower course of the ARAXES, which divided it from Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Media: on the E. the country comes to a point at the confluence of the Cyrus and Araxes. It is intersected by chains of mountains, between which run the two great rivers ARAXES, flowing E. into the Caspian, and the Arsianias, or S. branch of the Euphrates (Murad), flowing W. into the main stream (Frat) just above M. Masius. The E. extremity of the chain of mountains which separates the basins of these two rivers, and which is an offshoot of the Anti-Taurus, forms the Ararat of Scripture. In the S. of the country is the great lake of Van, Thospitis Palus, enclosed by mountain chains which connect Ararat with the S. range of mountains.—2. Armenia Minor (Ἄ. μικρά or βραχυτέρα), was bounded on the E. by the Euphrates, which divided it from Armenia Major, on the N. and NW. by the mountains Scodises, Paryadres, and Anti-Taurus, dividing it from Pontus and Cappadocia, and on the S. by the Taurus dividing it from Commagene in N. Syria, so that it contained the country E. and S. of the city of Sivas (the ancient Cabira or Sebaste) as far as the Euphrates and the Taurus. The boundaries between Armenia Minor and Cappadocia varied at different times; and indeed the whole country up to the Euphrates is sometimes called Cappadocia, and, on the other hand, the whole of Asia Minor E. of the Halys seems at one time to have been included under the name of Armenia. It is described by Justin (xlii. 2) as the land 'from Cappadocia to the Caspian.' The people of Armenia claimed to be aboriginal. Herodotus connects them with the Phrygians; Strabo, with the Thessalians (Hdt. vii. 23; Strab. p. 530). They seem to have belonged to the same stem as the Medes. Their language, though possessing some remarkable peculiarities of its own, was nearly allied to the Indo-Germanic family; and their manners and religious ideas were similar to those of the Medes and Persians, but with a greater tendency to the personification of the powers of nature, as in the goddess Anaitis, whose worship was peculiar to Armenia. They had commercial dealings with Assyria and Phoenicia. The earliest Armenian traditions represent the country as governed by native kings, who had perpetually to maintain their independence against attacks from Assyria. They were said to have been conquered by Semiramis, but again threw off the yoke at the time of the Median and Babylonian revolt. Their relations to the Medes and Persians seem to have varied between successful resistance, unwilling subjection, and friendly alliance. A body of Armenians formed a part of the army which Xerxes led against Greece; and they assisted Darius Codomannus against Alexander, and in this war they lost their king, and became subject to the Macedonian empire (B.C. 328). After another interval of successful revolt (B.C. 317-274), they submitted to the Greek kings of Syria; but when Antiochus the Great was defeated by the Romans (B.C. 190), the country again regained its independence, and it was at this period that it was divided into the two kingdoms of Armenia Major and Minor, under two different dynasties, founded respectively by the nobles who headed the revolt, Artaxias and Zariadras. Ultimately, Armenia Minor was made a Roman province (but for no long time) by Trajan. M. Aurelius reduced it, but did not make it a province; but later two provinces were formed from Armenia Minor, and under Justinian four, the fourth comprising a part of Armenia Major.

Armēnius Mons (τὸ Ἀρμένιον ὄρος), a branch of the Anti-Taurus chain in Armenia Minor.

Arminius (the Latinised form of Hermann, 'the chieftain'), son of Sigimer, 'the conqueror,' and chief of the tribe of the Cherusci, who inhabited the country to the north of the Hartz mountains, now forming the S. of Hanover and Brunswick. He was born B.C. 18; and in his youth he led the warriors of his tribe as auxiliaries of the Roman legions in Germany, where he learnt the language and military discipline of Rome, and was admitted to the freedom of the city, and enrolled among the equites. In A.D. 9, Arminius, who was now 27 years old, and had succeeded his father as chief of his tribe, persuaded his countrymen to rise against the Romans, who were now masters of this part of Germany, which seemed destined to become, like Gaul, a Roman province. His attempt was crowned with success. Quintilius Varus, who was stationed in the country with three legions, was destroyed with almost all his troops [VARUS]; and the Romans had to relinquish all their possessions beyond the Rhine. In 14, Arminius had to defend his country against Germanicus. At first he was successful; the Romans were defeated, and Germanicus withdrew towards the Rhine, followed by Arminius. But having been compelled by his uncle, Inguiomer, against his own wishes, to attack the Romans in their entrenched camp, his army was routed, and the Romans made good their retreat to the Rhine. It was in the course of this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved with the infant boy to whom she soon after gave birth in her captivity, to adorn the triumph of Germanicus at Rome. In 16, Arminius was again called upon to resist Germanicus, in which campaign he rejected with scorn the entreaties of his brother to join the Romans; he was defeated, and his country was probably only saved from subjection by the jealousy of Tiberius, who recalled Germanicus in the following year. At length Arminius aimed at absolute power, and was in consequence put to death by his own relations in the 37th year of his age, A.D. 19. (Tac. Ann. i. 55-68, ii. 9, 16, 45, 88; Strab. p. 293; Suet. Aug. 23; Vell. Pat. ii. 118; Dio Cass. lvi. 18.)

Armorica or Aremorica, the name of the NW. coast of Gaul from the Ligeris (Loire) to the Sequana (Seine), derived from the Celtic ar, air, 'upon,' and uir, mór, 'the sea.' The Armoricae civitates are enumerated by Caesar (B. G. vii. 75).

Arna (Arnas, -ātis: Civittella d'Arno), a town in Umbria near Perugia.

Arnae (Ἄρναί), a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, S. of Aulon and Bromiscus.

Arnē (Ἄρνη). 1. A town in Boeotia mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 507), supposed by Pausanias to be the same as Chaeronēa, but placed by others near Acrephium on the E. of the lake Copais.—2. A town in the SW. of Thessaly, near the modern Mataranga (Thuc. ii. 12).

Arnissa (Ἀρνίσσα: Ostrova?), a town in Eordaea in Macedonia.

Arnōbius, a native of Africa, lived about A.D. 300, in the reign of Diocletian. He was at first a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa, but afterwards embraced Christianity; and to remove all doubts as to the reality of his conversion, he wrote, while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work against the Pagans, in 7 books (Libri septem adversus Gentes), which we still possess. It is chiefly valuable for the information which it gives about Greek and Roman customs and ritual.—Editions. By Orelli, Lips. 1816; by Reifferscheid, Vindob. 1875.

Arnōn (Ἄρνον: Wad-el-Mojib), a considerable river of E. Palestine, rising in the Arabian Desert, and flowing W. through a rocky valley into the Lacus Asphaltites (Dead Sea). The surrounding district was called Arnonas; and in it the Romans had a military station, called Castra Arnonensia.

Arnus (Arno), the chief river of Etruria, rises in the Apennines, flows by Pisae, and falls into the Tyrrhenian sea. It gave the name to the Tribus Arnensis, formed B.C. 387. (Strab. p. 222; Liv. xxii. 2; Tac. Ann. i. 79.)

Arōa (Ἀρόα or Ἀρόη), the ancient name of PATRAE.

Arōmatā (ῥά Ἀρώματα, Ἀρωμάτων ἄκρον: Cape Guardafui), the E.-most promontory of Africa, at the S. extremity of the Arabian Gulf: also the surrounding district was called Aromata or Aromatophora Regio, with a town Ἀρωμάτων ἐμπόριον: so named from the abundance of spices which the district produced.

Arpi (Arpānus: Arpi), an inland town in the Daunian Apulia, founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes, who called it Ἄργος Ἰππιον, from which its later name, Argyrippa or Argyrippa and Arpi are said to have arisen (Ille [Diomedes] urbem Argyrippam, patriae cognomine gentis, Verg. Aen. xi. 246). During the time of its independence it was a flourishing commercial town, using Salapia as its harbour. It was friendly to the Romans in the Samnite wars, but revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216; it was taken by the Romans in 313, deprived of its independence, and never recovered its former prosperity. (Strab. p. 283; Liv. xxii. 12, xxiv. 46.)

Arpinum (Arpīnas, -ātis: Arpino), a town of Latium on the small river Fibrenus (Fibreno), originally belonging to the Volscians and afterwards to the Samnites, from whom the Romans wrested it, was a Roman municipium, and received the ius suffragii, or right of voting in the Roman comitia, B.C. 188. (Strab. p. 220; Liv. xxxviii. 36.) It was the birthplace of Marius and Cicero, the latter of whom was born in his father's villa, situated on a small island formed by the river Fibrenus. Cicero's brother Quintus had an estate S. of Arpinum, called Arcanum. (Sall. Jug. 67; Cic. Legg. ii. 1, 3, ad Fam. xiii. 11.)

Arretium or Arētium (Arretinus: Arezzo), one of the most important of the twelve cities of Etruria, was situated in the N.E. of the country at the foot of the Apennines, and possessed a fertile territory near the sources of the Arnus and the Tiber, producing good wine and corn (Liv. ix. 37, x. 37; Strab. pp. 222, 226.) It was a Roman colony and municipium after the 2nd Punic war. It was particularly celebrated for its pottery, which was of red ware. The Cilnii, from whom Maecenas was descended, were a noble family of Arretium. The ruins of a city 2 or 3 miles to the S.E. of Arezzo on a height called Poggio di San Cornelio, or Castel Secco, are probably the remains of the ancient Arretium.

Arrhaphachitis (Ἀρραπαχίτις), a district of Assyria, between the rivers Lycus and Choatras.

Arrhibaeus (Ἀρριβαῖος), chieftain of the Macedonians of Lyncus, revolted against king Perdiccas in the Peloponnesian war. It was to reduce him that Perdiccas sent for Brasidas (B.C. 424), and against him took place the unsuccessful joint expedition, in which Perdiccas deserted Brasidas, and Brasidas effected his bold and skilful retreat. (Thuc. ii. 99, iv. 79, 83, 124; Strab. p. 326.)

Arrhidaeus (Ἀρριδαῖος) or Aridaeus (Ἀριδαῖος). 1. A half-brother of Alexander the Great, son of Philip and a female dancer, Philinna of Larissa, was of imbecile understanding. He was at Babylon at the time of Alexander's death, B.C. 323, and was elected king under the name of Philip. The young Alexander, the infant son of Roxana, was associated with him in the government. In 322 Arrhidaeus married Eurydice. On their return to Macedonia, Eurydice attempted to obtain the supreme power in opposition to Polysperchon; but Arrhidaeus and Eurydice were made prisoners, and put to death by order of Olympias, 317. (Plut. Alex. 77; Just. xiv. 5; Diod. xix. 52; Paus. viii. 7, 5.)—2. One of Alexander's generals, obtained the province of the Hellespontine Phrygia, at the division of the provinces which was made in 321, but was deprived of it by Antigonus in 319 (Just. xiii. 4; Diod. xviii. 51, 72).

Arria. 1. Wife of Caecina Paetus. When her husband was ordered by the emperor Claudius to put an end to his life, A.D. 42, and hesitated to do so, Arria stabbed herself, handed the dagger to her husband, and said, 'Paetus, it does not pain me.' (Plin. Ep. iii. 16; Dio Cass. lx. 16; Mart. i. 14.)—2. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of Thrasea (Tac. Ann. xvi. 34).

Arriānus (Ἀρριανός). 1. Of Nicomedia in Bithynia, born about A.D. 90, was a pupil and friend of Epictetus, and first attracted attention as a philosopher by publishing at Athens the lectures of his master. In 124 he gained the friendship of Hadrian during his stay in Greece, and received from the emperor the Roman citizenship; from this time he assumed the name of Flavius. In 136 he was appointed praefect of Cappadocia, which was invaded the year after by the Alani or Massagetae, whom he defeated. Under Antoninus Pius, in 146, Arrian was consul; and about 150 he withdrew from public life, and from this time lived in his native town of Nicomedia, as priest of Demeter and Persephone. He died at an advanced age in the reign of M. Aurelius. Arrian was one of the most active and best writers of his time. He was a close imitator of Xenophon, both in the subjects of his works and in the style in which they were written. He regarded his relation to Epictetus as similar to that of Xenophon to Socrates; and it was his endeavour to carry out that resemblance. With this view he published (1) the philosophical lectures of his master (Διατριβαὶ Ἐπικτήτου) in 8 books, the first four of which are still extant. Edited in Schweighauser's Epictetae Philosophiae Monumenta, vol. iii., and in Coraes' Πάρεργα Ἑλλην. Βιβλιοθ. vol. viii. (2) An abstract of the practical philosophy of Epictetus (Ἐγχειρίδιον Ἐπικτήτου), which is still extant. This celebrated work maintained its authority for many centuries, both with Christians and Pagans. The best editions are those of Schweighauser and Coraes, in the collections above referred to. He also published other works relating to Epictetus, which are now lost. His original works are (3) A treatise on the chase (Κυννηγητικός), which forms a kind of supplement to Xenophon's work on the same subject, and is printed in most editions of Xenophon's works. (4) The History of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander the Great (Ἀνάβασις Ἀλεξάνδρου) in 7 books, the most important of Arrian's works. This great work reminds the reader of Xenophon's Anabasis, not only by its title, but also by the ease and clearness of its style. It is also of great value for its historical accuracy, being based upon the most trustworthy histories written by the contemporaries of Alexander, especially those of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and of Aristobolus, the son of Aristobolus. (5) On India (Ἰνδική or τὰ Ἰνδικά), which may be regarded as a continuation of the Anabasis, at the end of which it is usually printed. This work is written in the Ionic dialect, probably in imitation of Ctesias of Cnidus, whose work on the same subject Arrian wished to supplant by a more trustworthy and correct account. The best editions of the Anabasis are by Sintenis, Berlin, 1867; Abicht, Leipzig, 1876: of the Indica by Schmieder, Halle, 1798. (6) A description of a voyage round the coasts of the Euxine (περίπλους πόντου Εὐξεινοῦ), which had been made by Arrian himself during his government of Cappadocia. This Periplus has come down to us together with a Periplus of the Erythraean, and a Periplus of the Euxine and the Palus Maeotis, both of which also bear the name of Arrian, but they belong to a later period. The best editions are in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i., and in Gail's and Müller's collections of the minor Geographers. (7) A work on Tactics (λόγος τακτικός or τέχνη τακτική), sometimes ascribed to him, is now generally held to be by Aelian.—2. A Roman juriconsult, probably lived under Trajan, and is perhaps the same person with the orator Arrianus who corresponded with the younger Pliny. He wrote a treatise de Interdictis, of which the second book is quoted in the Digest.

Arribas, Arrýbas, Arymbas, or Tharrytas (Ἀρρίβας, Ἀρρύβας, Ἀρύμβας, or Θαρρύτας), a descendant of Achilles, and one of the early kings of the Molossians in Epirus. He is said to have been educated at Athens, and on his return to his native country to have framed for the Molossians a code of laws and established a regular constitution. (Paus. i. 11; Plut. Pyrrh. 1.)

Q. Arríus. 1. Praetor, B.C. 72, defeated Crixus, the leader of the runaway slaves, but was afterwards conquered by Spartacus. In 71, Arrius was to have succeeded Verres as propraetor in Sicily, but died on his way to Sicily (Cic. Verr. ii. 15, iv. 20).—2. A son of the preceding, was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, B.C. 59. He was an intimate friend of Cicero (Cic. pro Mil. 17, ad Att. ii. 5, 7.)

Arríus Aper. [APER.]

L. Arruntius. 1. Proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, but escaped to Sext. Pompey in Sicily, and was restored to the state with Pompey. He subsequently commanded the left wing of the fleet of Octavianus at the battle of Actium, 31, and was consul in 22. (App. B. C. iv. 46; Plut. Ant. 66.)—2. Son of the preceding, consul A.D. 6. Augustus declared in his last illness, that Arruntius was not unworthy of the empire, and would have boldness enough to seize it, if an opportunity presented. This rendered him an object of suspicion to Tiberius. He was charged in A.D. 37, as an accomplice in the crimes of Albuicilla, and put an end to his own life. (Tac. Ann. i. 8, 13, 76, vi. 27, 47; Dio Cass. lviii. 27.)

Arsáces (Ἀρσάκης), the name of the founder of the Parthian empire, which was also borne by all his successors, who were hence called the Arsacidæ.—I. He was of obscure origin, of Scythian race, according to Strabo from the country of the Ochus. He and his brother Tiridates who had small satrapies in Bactria under Antiochus II., resenting the tyranny of Agathocles, slew him, and driving out the Syrians, established for Arsaces a small Parthian kingdom with the capital Hecatompylus, B.C. 256. (Arrian ap. Syncellus 284; Strab. p. 515; Appian, Syr. 65.) He induced the Parthians to revolt from the Syrian empire of the Seleucidae, and he became the first monarch of the Parthians. This event probably took place about B.C. 250, in the reign of Antiochus II.; but the history of the revolt, as well as of the events which immediately followed, is stated very differently by different historians. Arsaces reigned only two years, and was succeeded by his brother Tiridates.—II. = Tiridátes, reigned 37 years, B.C. 248–211, and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the successor of Antiochus II.—III. = Artabānus I., son of the preceding, was attacked by Antiochus III. (the Great), who, however, was unable to subdue his country, and at length recognised him as king, about 210 (Polyb. x. 27; Just. xli. 5).—IV. = Priapatius, son of the preceding, reigned 15 years and left three sons, Phraates, Mithridates, and Artabānus.—V. = Phraātes I., subdued the Mardi, and, though he had many sons, left the kingdom to his brother Mithridates.—VI. = Mithridátes I. son of Arsaces IV., greatly enlarged the Parthian empire by his conquests. He defeated Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, and took him prisoner in 138. Mithridates treated Demetrius with respect, and gave him his daughter Rhodogone in marriage. Mithridates died during the captivity of Demetrius, between 138 and 130 (Just. xli. 6; Strab. pp. 516, 524; Appian, Syr. 67).—VII. = Phraātes II., son of the preceding, carried on war against Antiochus VII. Sidetes, whom Phraates defeated and slew in battle, B.C. 128. Phraates himself was shortly after killed in battle by the Scythians, who had been invited by Antiochus to assist him against Phraates, but who did not arrive till after the fall of the former (Just. xxxviii. 10, xlii. 1).—VIII. = Artabānus II., youngest brother of Arsaces VI., and youngest son of Arsaces IV., fell in battle against the Thogarii or Tochari, apparently after a short reign.—IX. = Mithridátes II., son of the preceding, prosecuted many wars with success, and added many nations to the Parthian empire, whence he obtained the surname of Great. It was in his reign that the Romans first had any official communication with Parthia. Mithridates sent an ambassador to Sulla, who had come into Asia B.C. 92, and requested alliance with the Romans (Just. xlii. 2, 4; Plut. Sull. 5).—X. = (Mnascires ?) Nothing is known of the successor of Arsaces IX. Even his name is uncertain.—XI. = Sanatroces, reigned seven years, and died about B.C. 70.—XII. = Phraātes III., son of the preceding. He lived at the time of the war between the Romans and Mithridates of Pontus, by both of whom he was courted. He contracted an alliance with the Romans, but he took no part in the war. At a later period misunderstandings arose between Pompey and Phraates, but Pompey thought it more prudent to avoid a war with the Parthians, although Phraates had invaded Armenia, and Tigranes, the Armenian king, implored Pompey's assistance. Phraates was murdered soon afterwards by his two sons, Mithridates and Orodes (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 28, 34, xxxvii. 6, xxxix. 56; Appian, Syr. 104; Plut. Pomp. 33-39).—XIII. = Mithridates III., son of the preceding, succeeded his father during the Armenian war. On his return from Armenia, Mithridates was expelled from the throne, on account of his cruelty, and was succeeded by his brother Orodes. Mithridates afterwards made war upon his brother, but was taken prisoner and put to death

(Dio Cass. xxxix. 56; Appian, Syr. 51; Jos. B. J. i. 8).—XIV. = Orôdes I., brother of the preceding, was the Parthian king whose general Surenas defeated Crassus and the Romans, B.C. 53. [CRASSUS.] After the death of Crassus, Orodes gave the command of the army to his son Pacorus, who entered Syria in 51 with a small force, but was driven back by Cassius. In 50 Pacorus again crossed the Euphrates with a much larger army, and advanced as far as Antioch, but was defeated near Antigouëa by Cassius. The Parthians now remained quiet for some years. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates again, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus, the son of T. Labienus. They overran Syria and part of Asia Minor, but were defeated in 39 by Ventidius Bassus, one of Antony's legates: Labienus was slain in the fight, and the Parthians retired to their own dominions. In 38, Pacorus again invaded Syria, but was completely defeated and fell in the battle. This defeat was a severe blow to the aged king Orodes, who shortly afterwards surrendered the crown to his son, Phraates, during his lifetime (Dio Cass. xl. 28, xlviii. 24-41, xlix. 19, 23; Just. xlii. 4; Appian, B. C. v. 65; Plut. Ant. 33; Cic. Att. v. 18, Fam. xv. 1)

—XV. = Phraates IV., commenced his reign by murdering his father, his 30 brothers, and his own son, who was grown up, that there might be none of the royal family whom the Parthians could place upon the throne in his stead. In consequence of his cruelty many of the Parthian nobles fled to Antony (37), who invaded Parthia in 36, but was obliged to retreat after losing a great part of his army (Dio Cass. xlix. 23-31; Plut. Ant. 37-51; Strab. p. 523). A few years afterwards the cruelties of Phraates produced a rebellion against him; he was driven out of the country, and Tiridates proclaimed king in his stead. Phraates, however, was soon restored by the Scythians, and Tiridates fled to Augustus, carrying with him the youngest son of Phraates (Hor. Od. ii. 2, 17, cf. i. 26, 5, iii. 8, 19). Augustus restored his son to Phraates, on condition of his surrendering the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the war with Crassus and Antony (Dio Cass. li. 18, liii. 33, liv. 8; Just. xlii. 5; Suet. Aug. 21; Hor. Od. iv. 15, 6, Epist. i. 18). They were given up in 20; their restoration caused universal joy at Rome, and was celebrated not only by the poets, but by festivals and commemorative monuments. Phraates also sent to Augustus as hostages his four sons, with their wives and children, who were carried to Rome. In A.D. 2, Phraates was poisoned by his wife Thermusa, and her son Phraataces (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, 4).—XVI. = Phraataces, reigned only a short time, as he was expelled by his subjects on account of his crimes. The Parthian nobles then elected as king Orodes, who was of the family of the Arsacidae.—XVII. = Orôdes II., also reigned only a short time, as he was killed by the Parthians on account of his cruelty. Upon his death the Parthians applied to the Romans for Vonones, one of the sons of Phraates IV., who was accordingly granted to them (Tac. Ann. ii. 1-4).—XVIII. = Vonones I., son of Phraates IV., was also disliked by his subjects, who therefore invited Artabanus, king of Media, to take possession of the kingdom. Artabanus drove Vonones out of Parthia, who resided first in Armenia, next in Syria, and subsequently in Cilicia. He was put to death in A.D. 19, according to some accounts by order of Tiberius on account of his great wealth (Tac. Ann. ii. 1-4, 56, 68; Suet. Tib. 49).—XIX. = Artabanus III., obtained the Parthian kingdom soon after the expulsion of Vonones, about A.D. 16. Artabanus placed Arsaces, one of his sons, over Armenia, and assumed a hostile attitude towards the Romans. His subjects, whom he oppressed, despatched an embassy to Tiberius to beg him to send to Parthia Phraates, one of the sons of Phraates IV. Tiberius willingly complied with the request; but Phraates upon arriving in Syria was carried off by a disease, A.D. 35. As soon as Tiberius heard of his death, he set up Tiridates, another of the Arsacidae, as a claimant to the Parthian throne: Artabanus was obliged to leave his kingdom, and to fly for refuge to the Hyrcanians and Carmanians. Hereupon Vitellius, the governor of Syria, crossed the Euphrates, and placed Tiridates on the throne. Artabanus was, however, recalled next year (36) by his fickle subjects. He was once more expelled by his subjects, and once more restored (Tac. Ann. ii. 58, vi. 31-37, 41-44; Dio Cass. lviii. 26, lxxix. 27; Jos. Ant. xviii. 5). He died soon after his last restoration, leaving two sons, Bardanes and Gotarzes.—XX. = Gotarzes, succeeded his father, Artabanus III., but was defeated by his brother Bardanes and retired into Hyrcania.—XXI. = Bardanes, brother of the preceding, was put to death by his subjects in 47, whereupon Gotarzes again obtained the crown. But as he ruled with cruelty, the Parthians secretly begged the emperor Claudius to send them from Rome Meherdates, grandson of Phraates IV. Claudius complied with their request, and commanded the governor of Syria to assist Meherdates, but the latter was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes. (Tac. Ann. xi.

Coin of Phraataces.

This is a good specimen of the Parthian coins. Obv., head of king; rev., Parthian holding a bow, with the legend ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΝ ΑΡΣΑΚΩΝ ΕΥΕΡΤΕΤΟΥ ΔΙΚΑΙΟΥ ΕΠΙΘΑΝΟΥΣ ΦΙΛΑΞΑΝΝΟΣ [ΑΡΤΕ]ΜΙΣΙΟΥ. ΑΠΤ=811.

8-10, xii. 10-14. The account varies in Jos. Ant. xx. 3.—XXII. = Vonōnes II., succeeded Gotarzes about 50. His reign was short.—XXIII. = Vologēsēs I., son of Vonones II. or Artabanus III. Soon after his accession, he conquered Armenia, which he gave to his brother Tiridates. In 55 he gave up Armenia to the Romans, but in 58 he again placed his brother over Armenia and declared war against the Romans. This war terminated in favour of the Romans: the Parthians were repeatedly defeated by Domitius Corbulo, and Tiridates was driven out of Armenia. At length, in 62, peace was concluded between Vologesēs and the Romans on condition that Nero would surrender Armenia to Tiridates, provided the latter would come to Rome and receive it as a gift from the Roman emperor. Tiridates came to Rome in 63, where he was received with extraordinary splendour, and obtained from Nero the Armenian crown. Vologesēs afterwards maintained friendly relations with Vespasian, and seems to have lived till the reign of Domitian (Tac. Ann. xiii. 5-9, xiv. 23, xv. 1-18, 25-31; Dio Cass. lxii. 19-23, lxiii. 1-7, lxvi. 11).—XXIV. = Pacōrus, succeeded his father, Vologesēs I., and was a contemporary of Domitian and Trajan (Mart. ix. 39; Plin. Ep. x. 16).—XXV. = Chosrōēs or Osrōēs, succeeded his brother Pacorus during the reign of Trajan. His conquest of Armenia occasioned the invasion of Parthia by Trajan, who stripped it of many of its provinces, and made the Parthians for a time subject to Rome. [TRAJANUS.] Upon the death of Trajan in A.D. 117, the Parthians expelled Parthamaspatēs, whom Trajan had placed upon the throne, and recalled their former king, Chosroēs. Hadrian relinquished the conquests of Trajan, and made the Euphrates, as before, the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. Chosroēs died during the reign of Hadrian (Dio Cass. lxviii. 17-33).—XXVI. = Vologēsēs II., succeeded his father Chosroēs, and reigned from about 122 to 149 (Dio Cass. lxix. 15).—XXVII. = Vologēsēs III., began to reign in 149. He invaded Syria in 162, but the generals of the emperor Verus drove him back into his own dominions, invaded Mesopotamia and Assyria, and took Seleucia and Ctesiphon; and Vologesēs was obliged to purchase peace by ceding Mesopotamia to the Romans. From this time to the downfall of the Parthian empire, there is great confusion in the list of kings (Dio Cass. lxx. 2, lxxi. 2; Capitol. M. Ant. Phil. 8, 9; Ver. 6, 7; Eutrop. viii. 10).—XXVIII. = Vologēsēs IV., probably ascended the throne in the reign of Commodus. His dominions were invaded by Septimius Severus, who took Ctesiphon in 199. On the death of Vologesēs IV., at the beginning of the reign of Caracalla, Parthia was torn asunder by contests for the crown between the sons of Vologesēs (Dio Cass. lxxv. 9, lxxvii. 12; Herodian, iii. 1-10; Script. Aug. Sever. 15, 16).—XXIX. = Vologēsēs V., son of Vologesēs IV., was attacked by Caracalla in 215, and about the same time was dethroned by his brother Artabanus (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 19).—XXX. = Artabānus IV., the last king of Parthia. The war commenced by Caracalla against Vologesēs was continued against Artabanus; but Maerinus, the successor of Caracalla, concluded peace with the Parthians. In this war Artabanus had lost the best of his troops, and the Persians seized the opportunity of recovering their long-lost independence. They were led by Artaxerxes (Ardshir), the son of Sassan, and defeated the Parthians in three great battles, in the last of which Artabanus was taken prisoner and killed, A.D. 226 (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 1-27, lxxx. 3; Herodian, iv. 9-15; Capitol. Macrin. 8, 12; Syncell. p. 677). Thus ended the Parthian empire of the Arsacidae, after it had existed 476 years. The Parthians were now obliged to submit to Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the SASSANIDAE, which continued to reign till A.D. 651.

Arsācia (Ἀρσακία: Ru. SE. of Teheran), a great city of Media, S. of the Caspiae Portae, originally named Rhagae (Ραγαί); rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator, and called Europus (Εὐρωπός); again destroyed in the Parthian wars and rebuilt by Arsaces, who named it after himself (Strab. pp. 514, 524).

Arsacidae, the name of a dynasty of Parthian kings. [ARSACES.] It was also the name of a dynasty of Armenian kings, who reigned in Armenia from B.C. 149 to A.D. 428. This dynasty was founded by ARTAXIAS I., who was related to the Parthian Arsacidae.

Arsamōsāta (Ἀρσαμώσατα, also wrongly abbrev. Ἀρμώσατα: Shemshat), a town and strong fortress in Armenia Major, between the Euphrates and the sources of the Tigris, near the most frequented pass of the Taurus (Tac. Ann. xv. 10; Plin. vi. 26).

Arsanias, -ius, or -us (Ἀρσανίας, &c.), the name of two rivers of Great Armenia.—1. (Murad), the S. arm of the Euphrates. [ARMENIA].—2. (Arslan?), a small stream rising near the sources of the Tigris, and flowing W. into the Euphrates near Melitene.

Arsēnāria, or -enn- (Ἀρσηνάρια: Arzaw, Ru.), a town in Manretania Caesariensis, 3 miles (Rom.) from the sea: a Roman colony (Plin. v. 19).

Arsēnē. [ARZANENE.]

Arsēs, Narsēs, or Oarsēs (Ἀρσής, Νάρσης, or Ὀάρσης), youngest son of king Artaxerxes III. Oehus, was raised to the Persian throne by the eunuch Bagoas after he had poisoned Artaxerxes, B.C. 339, but he was murdered by Bagoas in the 3rd year of his reign, when he attempted to free himself from the bondage in which he was kept. After the death of Arsēs, Bagoas made Darius III. king (Diod. xvii. 5; Strab. p. 736; Arrian, An. ii. 14).

Arsiā (Arsa), a river in Istria, forming the boundary between Upper Italy and Illyricum, with a town of the same name upon it.

Arsiā Silva, a wood in Etruria celebrated for the battle between the Tarquins and the Romans (Liv. ii. 7).

Arsinōē (Ἀρσινόη). I. Mythological. 1. Daughter of Phegeus, and wife of Alemaeon. As she disapproved of the murder of Alemaeon, the sons of Phegeus put her into a chest and carried her to Agapenor at Tegea, where they accused her of having killed Alemaeon. [ALCMAEON; AGENOR].—2. Nurse of Orestes, saved the latter from the hands of Clytemnestra, and carried him to Strophius, father of Pylades (Pind. Pyth. xi. 18). Some accounts call her Laodamia.—3. Daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, became by Apollo mother of Eriopis and Aesculapius.—II. Historical. 1. Mother of Ptolemy I., was a concubine of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and married Lagus, while she was pregnant with Ptolemy.—2. Daughter of Ptolemy I. and Berenice, married Lysimachus, king of Thraee, in B.C. 300, receiving the cities of Heracles and Dimm as her appanage. After the death of Lysimachus in 281, she lived at Cassandrea in Macedonia.

Her half-brother, Ptolemy Ceraunus, got possession of this town through promise of marriage, but drove out Arsinoë, and slew her two children. Afterwards, in 279, she married her own brother, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. Though Arsinoë bore Ptolemy no children, she was exceedingly beloved by him; he gave her name to several cities, called a district (νομός) of Egypt Arsinoïtes after her, and honoured her memory in various ways (Just. xxiv. 2; Plut. Demetr. 31; Paus. i. 7; Theocr. xv. 128;

Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy I., and wife of Ptolemy II. Rev., double cornucopia (Dict. Ant. s. v. Rhyton).

Athen. p. 497; Dict. Ant. s. v. Rhyton).—3. Daughter of Lysimachus, married Ptolemy II. Philadelphus soon after his accession, B.C. 285. In consequence of her plotting against her namesake [No. 2], when Ptolemy fell in love with her, she was banished to Coptos in Upper Egypt. She had by Ptolemy three children, Ptolemy III. Evergetes, Lysimachus, and Berenice (Polyb. xv. 25; Paus. l.c.). It is probable that she is the Arsinoë who afterwards married Magas, king of Cyrene (Just. xxvi. 3).—4. Also called Eurydice and Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy III. Evergetes, wife of her brother Ptolemy IV. Philopator, and mother of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes. She was killed by Philammon by order of her husband (Polyb. v. 83, xv. 25-33).—5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, escaped from Caesar, when he was besieging Alexandria in B.C. 47, and was recognised as queen by the Alexandrians. After the capture of Alexandria she was carried to Rome by Caesar, and led in triumph by him in 46. She was afterwards dismissed by Caesar, and returned to Alexandria; but her sister Cleopatra persuaded Antony to have her put to death, in 41 (Dio Cass. xlii. 39; Caes. B. C. iii. 112; B. Alex. 4, 33; Appian, B. C. v. 9).

ARSINOË (Ἀρσινόη: Ἀρσινόεις, or -οήτης), the name of several cities of the times of the Diadochi, each called after one or other of the persons in the preceding article.—1. In Aetolia. [CONOPA].—2. On the N. coast of Cyprus, on the site of the older city of Marium (Μάριον), which Ptolemy I. had destroyed (Strab. p. 683).—3. A port on the W. coast of Cyprus (Strab. ib.).—4. (Famagosta), on the SE. coast of Cyprus, between Salamis and Leucolla (Strab. p. 682).—5. In Cilicia, E. of Anemurium (Strab. p. 670).—6. (Ajeroud or Suez), in the Nomos Heroöpolites or W. branch of the Red Sea (Gulf of Suez). It was afterwards called Cleopatris.—7. (Medinet-el-Faioum, Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Arsinoïtes in the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt [ÆGYPTUS]; formerly called Crœodilopolis (Κροκοδείλων πόλις), and the district Nomos Crocodilopolites, from its being the chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the crocodile. This nomos also contained the Lake Moeris and the labyrinth (Strab. p. 809; Hdt. ii. 48; Plin. v. 61).—8. In Cyrenaica, also called TAUCHEIRA.—9. On the coast of the Troglodytae on the western coast of the Red Sea (Strab. p. 769). Its probable position is a little below the parallel of Thebes.—Some other cities called Arsinoë are better known by other names, such as EPHEBUS in Ionia and PATARA in Lycia.

ARSISSA or ARSESE (Ἀρσίσα: Argish), part of the lake Thospitis, in the S. of Armenia Major. [THOSPITIS.]

ARTABANUS (Ἀρτάβανος). 1. Son of Hystapes and brother of Darius, whom he tried to dissuade from the Scythian expedition, also mentioned in the reign of his nephew Xerxes, as a wise and frank counsellor (Hdt. iv. 83, vii. 10, 46-53).—2. A Hyrcanian, commander of the body-guard of Xerxes, assassinated this king in B.C. 465, with the view of setting himself upon the throne of Persia, but was shortly afterwards killed by Artaxerxes (Diod. xi. 69; Just. iii. 1).—3. I. II. III. IV., kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, III. VIII. XIX. XXX.]

ARTABAZUS (Ἀρτάβαζος). 1. A Mede, acts a prominent part in Xenophon's account of Cyrus the Elder (Xen. Cyrop. i. 4, &c.).—2. A distinguished Persian, a son of Pharnaces, commanded the Parthians and Choasmians, in the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, B.C. 480 (Hdt. vii. 66). He served under Mardonius in 479, and after the defeat of the Persians at Plataea, he fled with 40,000 men, and reached Asia in safety. Afterwards an intermediary between Xerxes and Pausanias (Hdt. ix. 41, 89; Diod. xi. 33-44; Thuc. i. 129).—3. A general of Artaxerxes I., fought against Inarus in Egypt, B.C. 462.—4. A Persian general, fought under Artaxerxes II. against Datames, satrap of Cappadocia, B.C. 362. Under Artaxerxes III., Artabazus, who was then satrap of W. Asia, revolted in B.C. 356, but was defeated and obliged to take refuge with Philip of Macedonia. He was afterwards pardoned by Artaxerxes, and returned to Persia; and he was one of the most faithful adherents of Darius III. Codomannus, who raised him to high honours. On the death of Darius (330) Artabazus received from Alexander the satrapy of Bactria. One of his daughters, Barsine, became by Alexander the mother of Heracles; a second, Artocama, married Ptolemy son of Lagus; and a third, Artonis, married Eumenes. (Diod. xvi. 22; Arrian, iii. 21; Strab. p. 578.)

ARTABRI, afterwards AROTRĒBAE, a Celtic people in the NW. of Spain, near the Promontory Nerium or Celticum, also called Artabrum after them (C. Finisterre). (Strab. pp. 137, 147.)

ARTACĒ (Ἀρτάκη: Artaki), a seaport town of the peninsula of Cyzicus, in the Propontis; also a mountain in the same peninsula. (Strab. pp. 576, 582.)

ARTACHAËES (Ἀρταχάης), a distinguished Persian in the army of Xerxes, died while Xerxes was at Athos. The mound which the king raised over him is still in existence. (Hdt. vii. 22, 117.)

ARTĀCŌĀNA (Ἀρτακόνα, or -κάννα: Sekhvan?) the ancient capital of ARIA, not far from the site of the later capital, ALEXANDRIA.

ARTAEI (Ἀρταίοι), was, according to Herodotus (vi. 61), the old native name of the Persians. It signifies noble, and appears, in the form Αρτα, as the first part of a large number of Persian proper names.

ARTĀNES (Ἀρτάνης). 1. A river in Thrace, falling into the Ister.—2. A river in Bithynia.

ARTAPHERNES (Ἀρταφέρνης). 1. Son of Hystapes and brother of Darius. He was satrap of Sardis at the time of the Ionian revolt, B.C. 500. See ARISTAGORAS.—2. Son of the former, commanded, along with Datis, the Persian army of Darius, which was defeated at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. Artaphernes commanded the Lydians and Mysians in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes in 480. (Hdt. vi. 94, 116; Aesch. Pers. 21.)—3. An ambassador from Artaxerxes to Sparta B.C. 425, intercepted by the Athenians (Thuc. iv. 50).

Artauunum (Salburg near Homburg?), a Roman fortress in Germany on M. Taunus, built by Drusus and restored by Germanicus (Dio Cass. liv. 33; Tac. Ann. i. 56). Others take it to be the modern Würtzburg.

Artavasdes or Artabazes (Ἀρταβάζης). 1. King of the Greater Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes. In the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, B.C. 54, Artavasdes was an ally of the Romans; but after the defeat of the latter, he concluded a peace with the Parthian king (Plut. Crass. 19–22). In 36 he joined Antony in his campaign against the Parthians, and persuaded him to invade Media, because he was at enmity with his namesake Artavasdes, king of Media; but he treacherously deserted Antony in the middle of the campaign. Antony accordingly invaded Armenia in 34, contrived to entice Artavasdes into his camp, where he was immediately seized, carried him to Alexandria, and led him in triumph. He remained in captivity till 30, when Cleopatra had him killed after the battle of Actium, and sent his head to his old enemy, Artavasdes of Media, in hopes of obtaining assistance from the latter (Dio Cass. xlix. 33–40; Vell. Pat. ii. 82; Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Plut. Ant. 37–50). This Artavasdes was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote tragedies, speeches, and historical works (Plut. Crass. 33).—2. King of Armenia, probably a grandson of No. 1, was placed upon the throne by Augustus, but was deposed by the Armenians (Tac. Ann. ii. 3, 4).—3. King of Media Atropatene, and an enemy of Artavasdes I., king of Armenia. Antony invaded his country in 36, at the instigation of the Armenian king, but he was obliged to retire with great loss. Artavasdes afterwards concluded a peace with Antony, and gave his daughter Iotape in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. With the Roman help he was successful; but when Antony recalled his troops, he was defeated by Artaxias. After Actium Octavianus restored to him his daughter Iotape. (Dio Cass. xlix. 25–41, li. 16; Plut. Ant. 38, 52.)

Artaxāta or -ae (τὰ Ἀρτάτα, or -Ἴατα; Ru. above Nakshivan), the later capital of Great Armenia, built by ARTAXIAS, under the advice of Hannibal, on a peninsula, surrounded by the river Araxes. After being burnt by the Romans under Corbulo (A.D. 58), it was restored by Tiridates, and called Neroniana. It was still standing in the fourth century. (Strab. p. 528; Dio Cass. lxiii. 7; Tac. Ann. vi. 39, xii. 50, xiii. 39.)

Artaxerxes or Artoxerxes (Ἀρταξέρξης or Ἀρτοξέρξης), the name of four Persian kings. 1. Surnamed Longimānus, from the circumstance of his right hand being longer than his left, reigned B.C. 465–425. He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I., had been murdered by Artabanus, and after he himself had put to death his brother Darius on the instigation of Artabanus. His reign was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps. The Egyptians also revolted in 460, under Inarus, who was supported by the Athenians. The first army which Artaxerxes sent under his brother Achaemenes was defeated and Achaemenes slain. The second army which he sent, under Artabazus and Megabyzus, was more successful. Inarus was defeated in 456 or 455, but Amyrtæus, another chief of the insurgents, maintained himself in the marshes of Lower Egypt. At a later period (449) the Athenians under Cimon sent assistance to Amyrtæus; and even after the death of Cimon, the Athenians gained two victories over the Persians, one by land and the other by sea, in the neighbourhood of Salamis in Cyprus. After this defeat Artaxerxes is said to have concluded peace with the Greeks on terms very advantageous to the latter. Artaxerxes was succeeded by his son Xerxes II.—2. Surnamed Mnēmon, from his good memory, succeeded his father, Darius II., and reigned B.C. 405–359. Cyrus, the younger brother of Artaxerxes, who was satrap of W. Asia, revolted against his brother, and, supported by Greek mercenaries, invaded Upper Asia. In the neighbourhood of Cunaxa, near Babylon, a battle was fought between the armies of the two brothers, in which Cyrus fell, B.C. 401 (Xen. Anab. i. 8–10. CYRUS). Tissaphernes was appointed satrap of W. Asia in the place of Cyrus, and was actively engaged in wars with the Greeks. [THIMBRON; DERCYLLIDAS; AGESILAUS.] Notwithstanding these perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself by the disunion among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented and kept up by Persian money. The peace of Antalcidas, B.C. 388, gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they had possessed before. [ANTALCIDAS.] But the empire was suffering from internal disturbances, and Artaxerxes had to carry on frequent wars with tributary princes and satraps, who endeavoured to make themselves independent. Thus he maintained a long struggle against Evagoras of Cyprus, from 385 to 376; he also had to carry on war against the Cardusians, on the shores of the Caspian Sea; and his attempts to recover Egypt were unsuccessful. Towards the end of his reign he put to death his eldest son Darius, who had formed a plot to assassinate him. His last days were still further embittered by the unnatural conduct of his son Ochus, who caused the destruction of two of his brothers, in order to secure the succession for himself (Plut. Artax.; Diod. xv. 9, 90–93; Just. x. 3). Artaxerxes was succeeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne under the name of Artaxerxes III.—3. Also called Ochus, reigned B.C. 359–338. In order to secure his throne, he began his reign with a merciless extirpation of the members of his family. He himself was a cowardly and reckless despot; and the great advantages which the Persian arms gained during his reign were owing only to his Greek generals and mercenaries. These advantages consisted in the conquest of the revolted satrap Artabazus [ARTABAZUS, No. 4], and in the reduction of Phœnicia, of several revolted towns in Cyprus, and of Egypt, 350. The reins of government were entirely in the hands of the eunuch Bagoas, and of Mentor the Rhodian. At last he was poisoned by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son, ARSES. (Diod. xvi. 40–52; xvii. 5).—4. The founder of the dynasty of the SASSANIDÆ.

Artaxias (Ἀρτάσις) or Artaxes (Ἀρτάξης), the name of kings of Armenia.—1. The founder of the Armenian kingdom, was one of the generals of Antiochus the Great, but revolted from him about B.C. 188, and became an independent sovereign. Hannibal took refuge at the court of Artaxias, and he superintended the building of ARTAXATA, the capital of Armenia. Artaxias was conquered and taken prisoner by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, about 165. (Strab. pp. 528-532; Plut. Lucull. 31; Appian, Syr. 45, 66; Polyb. xxvi. 6.)—2. Son of Artavasdes, was made king by the Armenians when his father was taken prisoner by Antony in 34. In 20 Augustus, at the request of the Armenians, sent Tiberius into Armenia, in order to depose Artaxias and place Tigranes on the throne, but Artaxias was put to death before Tiberius reached the country. Tiberius, however, took the credit to himself of a successful expedition: whence Horace (Epist. i. 12, 26) says, Claudi virtute Neronis Armeniam cecidit. (Dio Cass. xlix. 39-44, liv. 9; Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Suet. Tib. 9.)—3. Son of Polemon, king of Pontus, was proclaimed king of Armenia by Germanicus, in A.D. 18. He died about 35. His original name was Zenon, but Artaxias had become a general title of Armenian kings. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56, vi. 31.)

Artayctes (Ἀρταύκτης), Persian governor of Sestus on the Hellespont, when the town was taken by the Greeks in B.C. 478, met with an ignominious death on account of the sacrilegious acts which he had committed against the tomb of the hero Protesilaus. (Hdt. vii. 33, 78, ix. 116, 118-120; Paus. i. 4, 5.)

Artēmidōrus (Ἀρτεμίδωρος). 1. Surnamed Aristophanius, from his being a disciple of the celebrated grammarian Aristophanes, was himself a grammarian, and the author of several works now lost.—2. Of Cnidus, a friend of Julius Caesar, was a rhetorician, and taught the Greek language at Rome (Strab. p. 656; Plut. Caes. 65).—3. Daldianus; a native of Ephesus, but called Daldianus, from Daldis in Lydia, his mother's birthplace, to distinguish him from the geographer Artemidorus. He lived at Rome in the reigns of Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius (A.D. 138-180), and wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams (Ὀνειροκριτικά), in 5 books, which is still extant. The object of the work is to prove that the future is revealed to man in dreams, and to clear the science of interpreting them from the abuses with which the fashion of the time had surrounded it. The style is simple and good, and the book is valuable as giving an account of myth and ritual and of contemporary thought.

—Editions. By Reiff, Lips. 1805; by Hercher, Lips. 1864.—4. Of Ephesus, a Greek geographer, lived about B.C. 100. He made voyages round the coasts of the Mediterranean, in the Red Sea, and apparently even in the S. ocean. He also visited Iberia and Gaul. The work in which he gave the results of his investigations consisted of 11 books, of which Marcianus afterwards made an abridgment. The original work is lost; but we possess fragments of Marcianus' abridgment, which contain the periplus of the Pontus Euxinus, and accounts of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. These fragments are printed in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i.—5. The son-in-law of the Stoic Musonius Rufus, himself a friend of Pliny the Younger, and one of the philosophers expelled from Rome by Domitian, A.D. 93 (Plin. Ep. iii. 11).

Artēmis (Ἄρτεμις), as presented to us in literature, was the daughter of Zeus and Leto, twin sister of Apollo, born at Ortygia (Hymn. ad Apoll. 15), which is taken to be Delos or the small island of Rhenea, close to Delos. Hence for most Greeks Delos is their birthplace, but local traditions make this claim for other places named Ortygia, especially at Syracuse and Ephesus. [See ORTYGIA.] Already in Homeric times Artemis is a kind of female Apollo: that is, she as a female divinity represented the same idea that Apollo did as a male divinity. Apollo represented the beauty of youths, Artemis of maidens (Od. vi. 107, xx. 71); as Apollo was sung in the pæan, so we have Ἄρτεμις ἰμνία (Paus. viii. 5). As sister of Apollo, Artemis is, like her brother, armed with a bow, quiver, and arrows, and sends plagues and death among men and animals. Sudden deaths, but more especially those of women, are described as the effect of her arrows. (Il. xxi. 483.) These deaths are oftenest painless (Il. vi. 428; Od. xi. 172); but also as a punishment (Il. xxiv. 606; Od. v. 123; ΝΙΟΒΕ); she also heals (Il. v. 447). Delighting in wild beasts, like the Arcadian Artemis [see below], she was regarded as the huntress (Il. xxi. 511, xxiv. 606; Hymn. ad Dian. 10). Hence the Attic name for the month Elaphebolion (deer-shooting), which corresponds to that elsewhere called Artemisios. Although not a maiden-goddess in primitive religions, she has, as the daughter of Leto, before Homer's time come to be so regarded; and the epithets ἀγνή, παρθένος, ἀδμήτη refer to the belief then prevalent, that she was never conquered by love (cf. Eur. Hipp. 1301; Paus. vii. 19, 2). She was also, but in post-Homeric literature and art (not earlier than the 5th century B.C.), connected with the moon, as Apollo with the sun, taking the place of Selene (even sometimes in the story of Endymion), and so called σελασφόρος (Paus. i. 31), ἀμφίπορος (cf. Aesch. Fr. 164; Soph. O. R. 207), Ἄρτεμις Ἐκάτη and Ἄρτ. σεληναία (Aesch. Suppl. 676; Eur. Med. 396, Phoen. 176), and worshipped in torch-races. [BENDIS; HECATE.] It is plain that this worship of Artemis had developed from a union of various religious observances, and it is necessary to examine the different local traditions and rites which have combined to form the Artemis described above. From these traditions, especially from those of the Arcadian and Brauronia Artemis, it will appear that the deity who was in historic times worshipped in Greece as the daughter of Leto and sister of Apollo, and as the virgin goddess, was developed in most places from a nature-goddess, representing and fostering the streams which fertilise the earth, the trees which grow from it, the wild animals of the wooded hills and their increase; and hence also presiding over human birth and motherhood. But it is probable that we may go a step further back, and infer that this ancient worship itself sprang from something older—a worship of a goddess of increase and harvest under the form of the various animals which were each regarded either as the tutelary deity of tribes, or as the spirit of the corn or of the wood, to whom human sacrifice was offered. The deity, at first the animal itself, became in some rites the recipient of the animal sacrifice: in others, the protectress of the animal itself; and it is not unlikely that the choice of different animals in different localities depended on the animal totem of the tribe or family from which the ritual sprang. Recently a stone figure of a bear has been found in the Acropolis, which may possibly have been an offering to Artemis Brauronia.—

1. The Arcadian Artemis is a nature-deity of fountains, streams, and wooded hills: in this aspect a female Pan rather than a female Apollo. (For her connexion with streams see Paus. viii. 22, 5; ARETHUSA.) She is called δέσποινα λίμνης and ποταμία (Eur. Hipp. 230; Paus. v. 14, 4); she is worshipped on hills (Paus. iii. 20, 7, viii. 36, 5); she is also the goddess of vegetable fertility, of woods and trees; even her image is hung on trees (Paus. viii. 13, 2), thus indicating that her worship was formerly that of the tree itself. This will explain how she was identified with the goddess of the ancient rites at Aricia or Nemi. [See DIANA.] That she was thus at one time regarded in many places as a goddess of harvest appears in the Aetolian story, where Artemis resents not receiving harvest-offerings (Il. ix. 530; MELEAGER). It is easy enough to trace her special character as huntress of wild animals from this Arcadian idea of her dwelling in wooded hills. But from the Arcadian story of CALLISTO, who is sometimes Artemis herself, and yet was changed into a bear, it appears that a primitive worship of animals was transferred to this goddess, who thus became their patroness, and in a further development the huntress. Animals were sacrificed to her at the festival of Laphria, and figures of animals were carried in processions to do her honour

Artemis. (Louvre, in Paris.)

(Paus. vii. 18, 7; Theocr. ii. 67; Dict. Ant. s.v. Laphria). The more ancient totemistic religion leaves traces also in her epithet at Tegea, Κνακᾶτις (Paus. viii. 53, 5), signifying that the statue of the deity was clothed in the skin of the sacrificed animal [see below], the more recent development in her Aetolian epithet ἡμερᾶσι, which represents her as taming the sacred animals—wolves and deer—which are kept in the enclosure of her temple. (Strab. p. 215; Paus. viii. 18 gives a different tradition.)—2. Artemis Brauronia, Artemis Orthia, and Artemis Taurica. These rites in Attica show almost more clearly the absorption of an ancient savage religion into that of Artemis. The dance of girls in imitation of bears (ἀρκτεία), wearing formerly the bear-skin and afterwards the saffron robe instead (Aristoph. Lys. 646), was the remnant in civilised times of the local religion, in which the deity herself was a bear, and worshipped with human sacrifices: to which refers the story that they were instituted because a bear which tore a maiden to pieces had been killed. Tradition therefore connected it with the worship of Artemis Orthia at Linnaeum in

Laconia, at which the human sacrifices of older times were replaced by the blood of boys scourged at the altar (Paus. iii. 16, 7), and also with the savage rites of Artemis Tauropolos in the Tauric Chersonese [IPHIGENIA]. Legend clearly represents the rites in Greece as derived from those of the Chersonese, and so there is a dispute whether the wooden image at Brauron, or that at Linnaeum, or that at Laodicea, was the actual ξᾶνον brought by Iphigenia. This does not prove that the rites actually came from the Crimea, but merely that the Greeks found a resemblance between the relics of savage ritual which they still had and the savage ritual which existed later in the Crimea. [See also Dict. Ant. s.v. Brauronia.]—3. Artemis Tauropolos. Although the poets, from the similarity of the name, connect Artemis Tauropolos with the bloodthirsty goddess of Brauron and Tauri (I. T. 1424 ff.; Soph. Aj. 172), there is little real likeness. The chief sites of this religion were Samos and Icaria (Hdt. iii. 46; Strab. p. 639; Steph. Byz. s.v.); the name belongs to her also at Amphipolis (Diod. xviii. 4; Liv. xlv. 44), and in some towns of Asia Minor. The goddess was regarded as presiding over the herds and receiving bloodless offerings, and in coins as riding upon a bull. Similarly at Pherae, a country of horsemen, she presided over horses, and called ἵπποσῶα and εὐρίππα (Pind. Ol. iii. 27; Paus. viii. 14). In each case no doubt there had been the identification with the animal, and probably bloody sacrifices; but the idea of protectress of animals only remained.—4. Artemis Eileithyia, as the goddess presiding over childbirth. [LEITHYIA.] Artemis and Eileithyia were regarded as distinct deities in earlier poets, but are confused in the Tragedians (e.g. Eur. Hipp. 166), and the epithets ἔβλοχος, λοχία, λυσίζωνος are applied to her. There is no ground for attaching any such meaning to Homer Il. xxi. 481. Some have thought that this function was assigned to her as a moon-goddess connected with menstruation and with the fertilising dew; but it is much more probable that it was one of the attributes of the nature-goddess who favoured increase and presided over the young alike of animals and of human beings: whence she was called also κουροτρόφος &c.—5. Artemis of Ephesus shows all the characteristics of an Asiatic nature-goddess, whose worship the Ionians have found and have brought into their own religion. Her statue, of unknown antiquity, which was said to have fallen from heaven (διοπετές), was an uncouth and essentially un-Greek idol with many breasts, which symbolised the productive forces of nature, and differed as widely as possible from the Greek ideal of the goddess of maiden purity. Later tradition of course tried to account for her Ephesian worship as though she were the Artemis of Greek literature, and Tacitus records a local belief that her birthplace, the Ortygia of the legend, was at Ephesus, not at Delos (Ann. iii. 61). The Oriental character of her temple service, however, still remained in the service of eunuch priests called μεγάβυχοι (Strab. p. 641), combined with three grades of priestesses termed ἱέραι, παριέραι, and μελλιέραι; there were also temple slaves (ιερόδουλοι). The tumultuous procession of her idol, attended with riot and bloodshed, is described by Christian writers (Metaphr. Vita Timoth. 769; Act. Sanct. 556). The original deity of this religion, whether connected, as some think, with Comana or not, presents many points of resemblance with the Asiatic prototypes of Aphrodite, regarded not only as the goddess of fruitfulness, but also as a moon-goddess and as a goddess of the sea, protectress of sailors, and having fish among her sacred animals (Athen. p. 361; Plin. ii. 201; cf. Callim. Dian. 289); and she appears to have been for the more northern parts of Asia Minor what Ashtoreth and the equivalent deities were more to the south. [See APHRODITE.] The supposed connexion of Artemis with the Amazons points the same way. The reason for the Greek colonists identifying this Oriental deity with Artemis may have been either because both were regarded as goddesses of the moon, or from the Arcadian idea of a deity presiding over natural fruitfulness and birth, and caring for the young, as is symbolised by the animals upon the lower part of her image. It is remarkable that Pausanias mentions a worship of Artemis after the Ephesian fashion at Alea in Artemis (Diana) of Ephesus.

Arcadia, and that Pan is said to have been associated with her in the Asiatic temples. The Ephesian cult was carried by colonists to Marseilles and Spain (Strab. pp. 159, 179). Tacitus (Ann. iii. 62) mentions also the worship of an Artemis Persica at Hierocaesarea in Lydia, apparently akin to fire-worship; for, according to Pausanias (v. 27, 3), there was a Magian priest who used barbaric prayers and invocations, causing fire to blaze spontaneously on the altar. At Perga there was an oracle and temple of Artemis Pergaea, served by mendicant priests (Strab. p. 667; Cic. Verr. i. 20, 54; Suid. Phot. s.v. 'Αρτ. Περγ.). [For 'Αρτεμις 'Ισθώρα see BRITOMARTIS; for the Roman deity, DIANA.] In art the most familiar type is the ideal of staid maiden beauty, the dress a short chiton; she is represented as a huntress, with bow and quiver, holding a stag, as in the statue from Hadrian's Villa (the Versailles Diana), or driving a chariot drawn by deer. Another characteristic shows her as a light-goddess or moon-goddess, and one of those honoured by the torch-race. She bears a torch in her left hand, but is still distinguished by the quiver, though the dress is no longer that of the huntress. Her connexion with the moon is also represented by the attribute of a crescent, or by her appearance in a biga. As Artemis Tauropolos she is shown riding on a bull. The types of the Ephesian Artemis as shown on coins and statuettes have no doubt refined upon the original as regards the freedom of the arms and the character of the face, but still retain the multitude of breasts.

Artēmisium ('Αρτεμισιον), properly a temple of Artemis. 1. A tract of country on the N. coast of Euboea, opposite Magnesia, so called from the temple of Artemis belonging to the town of Hestiaea: off this coast the Greeks defeated the fleet of Xerxes, B.C. 480 (Hdt. vii. 185, viii. 8; Plut. Them. 7; Diod. xi. 12).—2. A promontory of Caria near the gulf Glaucus, so called from the temple of Artemis in its neighbourhood (Strab. p. 651) = Pedalium (Plin. v. 103).—3. A mountain ridge between Argolis and Arcadia (Paus. ii. 25, 3, viii. 5, 6).

Artēmita ('Αρτεμιτα). 1. (Shereban?) a city on the Sillas, in the district of Apolloniatis in Assyria (Strab. p. 519; Ptol. vi. 1).—2. A city of Great Armenia, S. of the lake Arsissa (Ptol. v. 13, 21). There is a village Artemid near Van.

Artēmōn ('Αρτεμων), a Lacedaemonian, built the military engines for Pericles in his war against Samos in B.C. 441 (Plut. Pericl. 27; Diod. xii. 28). Pliny (xxxiv. 56) mentions his statue by Polycleetus. Among the writers of this name are: 1. Artemon of Clazomenae (Ael. H. A. xii. 28).—2. Of Cassandrea, a grammarian (Atheu. p. 694).—3. Of Pergamus, who wrote a history of Sicily. (Frag. of all three in Frag. Hist. Graec. ed. C. Müller.)—4. Artemou of Magnesia, wrote a treatise on the virtues of women (Phot. Bibl. 103).

M. Artōrius, a physician at Rome, was the friend and physician of Augustus, whom he attended in his campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. He was drowned at sea shortly after the battle of Actium, 31 (Vell. Pat. ii. 70; Appian, B. C. iv. 110; Dio Cass. xlvii. 41; Suet. Aug. 91).

Arverni, a Gallic people in Aquitania in the country of the M. Cebenna, in the modern Auvergne. In early times they were the most powerful people in the S. of Gaul; they were defeated by Domitius Ahenobarbus and Fabius Maximus in B.C. 121, but still possessed considerable power in the time of Caesar (58). Their capital in Caesar's time was GERGOVIA, afterwards transferred to Nemosus, also named Augustonemetum or Arverni on the Eläver (Allier), with a citadel, called, at least in the middle ages, Clarus Mons, whence the name of the modern town, Clermont (Caes. B. G. i. 45, vii. 7 ff.; Strab. p. 191; VERCINGETORIX).

Arvina, a cognomen of the Cornelia gens, borne by several of the Corneli, of whom the most important was A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina, consul B.C. 343 and 322, and dictator 320. He commanded the Roman armies against the Samnites, whom he defeated in several battles (Liv. vii. 19–38).

Aruns, an Etruscan word, was regarded by the Romans as a proper name, but perhaps signified a younger son in general. 1. Younger brother of Lucumo, i.e. L. Tarquinius Priscus.—2. Younger brother of L. Tarquinius Superbus, was murdered by his wife.—3. Younger son of Tarquinius Superbus, fell in combat with Brutus.—4. Son of Persena, fell in battle before Aricia.—5. Of Clusium, invited the Gauls across the Alps (Liv. i. 34, 46, 56, ii. 14, v. 33).

Aruntius. [ARRUNTIUS.]

Arusianus, Messus or Messius, a Roman grammarian, lived about A.D. 395, and wrote a Latin phrase-book, entitled Quadruga, vel Exempla Elocutionum ex Virgilio, Sallustio, Terentio, et Cicerone per literas digesta. It is called Quadruga from its being composed from four authors, from whom he selects an example for each construction in his alphabetical list of substantives, adjectives, prepositions and verbs.—Edition. By Lindemann, in his Corpus Grammaticorum Latin. vol. i. p. 199.

Arxāta (Ἀρξάτα: Nakshivan), the capita of Great Armenia, before the building of Artaxata, lay lower down upon the Araxes, on the confines of Media (Strab. p. 529).

Aryandes (Ἀρυάνδης), a Persian, who was appointed by Cambyses governor of Egypt, but was put to death by Darius, because he coined silver money of the purest metal, in imitation of the gold money of that monarch (Hdt. iv. 165, 200).

Arycanda (Ἀρύκανδα), a small town of Lyeia, on the river Aryeandus, a tributary of the Limyrus (Stephan. s.v.; Plin. v. 100).

Arzānēne (Ἀρζαννή), a district of Armenia Major, bounded on the S. by the Tigris, on the W. by the Nymphius, and containing in it the lake Arsēne (Ἀρσηνή: Erzen). It formed part of GORDYENE.

Arzēn or -ēs, or Atranutzin (Ἀρζήν, Ἀρζες, Ἀτράνουσι: Erzeroum), a strong fortress in Great Armenia, near the sources of the Euphrates and the Araxes, founded in the 5th century.

Asaei (Ἀσαίοι), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, near the mouth of the Tanais (Don) (Ptol. v. 9).

Asander (Ἀσανδρος). 1. Son of Philotas, brother of Parmenion, and one of the generals of Alexander the Great; appointed governor of Lydia, B.C. 334; sent to bring reinforcements from Europe, 331. After the death of Alexander in 323 he obtained Caria for his satrapy, and took an active part in the wars which followed. He joined Ptolemy and Cassander in their league against Antigonus, but was defeated by Antigonus in 313 (Arrian, Anab. i. 18, iv. 7; Just. xiii. 4; Diod. xix. 62–75).—2. A general of Pharnaces II., king of Bosphorus. He put Pharnaces to death in 47, after the defeat of the latter by Julius Caesar, in hopes of obtaining the kingdom. But Caesar conferred the kingdom upon Mithridates of Pergamum, with whom Asander carried on war. Augustus afterwards confirmed Asander in the sovereignty (Dio Cass. xlii. 46, lv. 24; Appian, Bell. Mithr. 120; Bell. Alex. 78).

Asbystae (Ἀσβύσται), a Libyan people, in the N. of Cyrenaica. Their country was called Ἀσβυστία (Hdt. iv. 170; Ptol. iv. 4).

Asca (Ἄσκα), a city of Arabia Felix.

Ascalābus, son of Misme. When Demeter came to this part of Attica, Misme gave her a jar of water, which the goddess drained. Ascalabus mocked at her greediness, whereupon the goddess changed him to a lizard (Ov. Met. v. 446; Nicand. Ther. 484, and ap. Anton. Lib. 24). The same story is told of Abas, son of Metaneira. [ABAS, No. 1.]

Ascalāphus (Ἀσκάλαφος). 1. Son of Ares and Astyoche, led, with his brother Ialmenus, the Minyans of Orchomenos against Troy, and was slain by Deiphobus (Il. ii. 511, xiii. 518, xv. 110; Paus. ix. 37, 7).—2. Son of Acheron and Gorgyra or Orpline. When Persephone was in the lower world, and Pluto gave her permission to return to the upper, provided she had not eaten anything, Ascalaphus declared that she had eaten part of a pomegranate. Demeter punished him by burying him under a huge stone, and when this stone was subsequently removed by Heracles, Persephone changed him into an owl (ἄσκάλαφος), by sprinkling him with water from the river Phlegethon (Ov. Met. v. 539; Apollo. i. 5, 3).

Ascālon (Ἀσκάλων: Ἀσκαλωνεῖτης: Askalan), one of the chief cities of the Philistines, on the coast of Palestine, between Azotus and Gaza.

Ascānia (ἡ Ἀσκανία λίμνη). 1. (Lake of Iznik), in Bithynia, a great fresh-water lake, at the E. end of which stood the city of Nicaea (Iznik). The surrounding district was also called Aseania (Strab. p. 565).—2. (Lake of Buldur), a salt-water lake on the borders of Phrygia and Pisidia, the boundary between Pisidia and the Roman province of Asia (Strab. p. 565; Il. ii. 862).

Ascānius (Ἀσκάnios), son of Aeneas by Creusa. According to some traditions, Aescanius remained in Asia after the fall of Troy, and reigned either at Troy itself or at some other town in the neighbourhood. According to other accounts he accompanied his father to Italy. Other traditions again gave the name of Aescanius to the son of Aeneas and Lavinia. Livy states that on the death of his father Aescanius was too young to undertake the government, and that after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Lavinium in the hands of his mother, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. Some writers relate that Aescanius was also called Ilus or Julus. The gens Julia at Rome traced its origin from Julus or Aescanius. [For the variations of the story and for fuller details, see AENEAS.]

Asciburgiūm (Asburg near Mörs), an ancient place on the left bank of the Rhine, founded, according to fable, by Ulysses (Tac. Hist. iv. 33, Germ. 3).

Asclepīādae, the reputed descendants of Aesclepius. [ASCLEPIUS.]

Asclepīādes (Ἀσκληπιάδης). 1. A lyric poet of Samos early in the 2nd century B.C. who is said to have invented the metre called after him (Metrum Asclepiadæum). (Epigrams in Anth. Pal.)—2. There were a great many physicians who assumed this name as a sort of professional title, the most celebrated of whom was a native of Prusias, in Bithynia, who came to Rome in the middle of the first century B.C., where he acquired a great reputation (Plin. vii. 124, xxiii. 38, xxvi. 12). Nothing remains of his writings but a few fragments published by Gumpert, Asclepiades Bithyni Fragmenta, Vinar. 1794.

Asclepīōdōrus (Ἀσκληπιδῶρος). 1. A general of Alexander the Great, afterwards made satrap of Persia by Antigonus, B.C. 317 (Arrian. Anab. iv. 13; Diod. xix. 48).—2. An Athenian painter, a contemporary of Apelles (Plin. xxxv. 107).

Asclepīus (Ἀσκληπιός), called Aesculāpius by the Romans, the god of the medical art: at first in all probability the deity of a Thessalian oracle. The name is connected by some modern scholars with ἄσκάλαφος (which is taken to have meant a serpent as well as a lizard), by others with ἔλκω. In the Homeric poems he is not a deity, but simply the 'harmless physician' (ἰητὴρ ἀνύμων), whose sons, Machaon and Podalirius, were the physicians in the Greek army, and ruled over Tricca, Ithome, and Oechalia. The common story of later poets relates that he was the son of Apollo and Coronis, the daughter of Phlegyas, and that when Coronis was with child by Apollo, she became enamoured of Ischys, an Arcadian. Apollo, informed of this by a raven, which he had set to watch her, or, according to Pindar, by his own prophetic powers, sent his sister Artemis to kill Coronis. Artemis accordingly destroyed Coronis in her own house at Lacteria in Thessaly, on the shore of lake Baehia. According to Ovid (Met. ii. 605), it was Apollo himself who killed Coronis and Ischys. When the body of Coronis was to be burnt, either Apollo or Hermes saved the child Asclepius from the flames, and carried him to Chiron, who instructed the boy in the art of healing and in hunting. In this account the Hesiodic poem Eoecae and Pindar (Pyth. iii.) mainly agree, except that Pindar gives greater credit to Apollo than the earlier writer has given. The legend is continued by Pindar that he not only cured all the sick, but called the dead to life again. But while he was restoring Glaucus (or according to Verg. Aen. vii. 761, Hippolytus) to life, Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning, as he feared lest men might contrive to escape death altogether. He was married to Epione, and besides the two sons spoken of by Homer, we also find mention of the following children of his: Telcsporus, Ianiscus, Alexenor, Aratus, Hygieia, Aegle, Iaso, and Panacea, most of whom are only personifications of the powers ascribed to their father. The fact is that the traditions are modified according to the place to which they belong. Thessaly and then Boeotia appear to have been the earliest seats of his worship. Hence the descent of Asclepius from Phlegyas. But, as the worship passed into the Peloponnesus, we find Phlegyas a native of Epidaurus, with a daughter Aegle (or Coronis), who bears Asclepius, the god of healing, to Apollo, but without mention of any catastrophe. (Inscr. of a poem by Isyllus of Epidaurus, 'Εφημ. Ἀρχ. 1885.) Similarly we find an Arcadian story which makes him the son of Arsinoe and Arsippos, and a Messenian story which makes him the son of Arsinoe and Apollo (see Pausan. ii. 26; Cic. Nat. De. iii. 22, 57). O. Müller and later writers are probably right in the conclusion that Asclepius, the deity of the Phlegyae, was once the rival of Apollo, and that the idea of his sonship to Apollo was introduced to reconcile the two cults when the Apollo worship predominated. We may go a step further back and recognise in Asclepius the survivor of a serpent worship which preceded the Greek theology in that country, and was perhaps even then connected with an oracle. It is true that the poets from Homer onwards represent him as a hero who dies, and that in very late writers we find him among the Argonauts and in the Calydonian hunt; but the fact remains that in his temples he was worshipped as a god. Thracmer has noticed that out of 320 places where his cult was preserved, only four cities show traces of a hero-worship: from three of these we have the somewhat dubious mention of his tomb, the fourth is Athens, where ἡρώα are mentioned in the Asclepieion; but this may well refer to a hero-worship of some of the Asclepiadae. The chief temples of Asclepius were at Tricca, Tithorea, Athens, Pergamus, Colophon, and above all, Epidaurus, from which place the worship of Asclepius was introduced into Rome to avert a pestilence B.C. 293 (Liv. x. 47). In the recently discovered Mimes of Herodas (No. 4) there is a description of his temple, probably at Cos (cf. Strab. p. 657), and of the offerings made. The rites for these temples consisted in lustral bathings of the worshippers, and in offerings of sacrifices, more especially of cakes, and of libations: among the sacrifices is to be noticed that of a cock (Plat. Phaed. ad fin.; Herodas, 4, 13), the reason for which is uncertain: some have suggested that the cock is the herald of the dawn (of a new life): those who regard Asclepius as representing the winds cite Pausan. ii. 34, 2, where a cock is the sacrifice to avert wind hurtful to the vines. The essential part of his temple worship was the sleeping in the temple itself (incubatio: see Arist. Plut. 421 ff.), where an oracle through a dream revealed to the patient the method of cure. That such dream apparitions could easily be contrived by the priests is obvious, and there is no doubt that the remedies were such as the priests believed, rightly or wrongly, would be beneficial. The cure, real or supposed, was commemorated by an ex voto tablet. Hence these temples supplied the place of public hospitals (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Valetudinaria). The supposed descendants of the god were called the Asclepiadae, to whom Hippocrates belonged; in them was by inheritance the knowledge of medicine, and from them in great part, though not exclusively, were taken the priests of the ἀσκληπιεία. In art the god is represented (except in later Roman art) as a bearded man with a head something like that of Zeus; the distinctive attribute is a staff with a serpent twisted round it: he often stands by the Omphalos (as in the Florentine statue); with him we find, on coins and reliefs, his daughter Hygieia and the boy Telcsporus.

Q. Ascōnius Pedīanus, a Roman grammarian, born at Patavium (Padua), about B.C. 2, lost his sight in his 73rd year in the reign of Vespasian, and died in his 85th year in the reign of Domitian. His most important work was a Commentary on the speeches of Cicero, and we still possess fragments of his Commentaries on the Pro Cornelio, In Pisonem, Pro Milone, Pro Scauro and In Toga candida. They refer chiefly to points of history and antiquities, great pains being bestowed on the illustration of those constitutional forms of the senate, the popular assemblies, and the courts of justice, which were fast falling into oblivion under the empire. The notes on the Verrine orations, which bear the name of Asconius, are written in an unclassical style, and belong to a later period, probably the 4th century or later.—Edited in the 5th volume of Cicero's works by Orelli and Baier. There is a valuable essay on Asconius by Madvig, Hafniae, 1828.

Ascordus, a river in Macedonia, which rises in M. Olympus and flows between Agassa and Dium into the Thermaic gulf.

Ascra (Ἄσκρα: Ἄσκραϊος), a town in Boeotia on M. Helicon, where Hesiod resided, who had removed thither with his father from Cyme in Aeolis, and who is therefore called Ascraeus (Strab. pp. 409, 413; Hes. Op. 638).

Ascūlum. 1. Picēnum (Asculanus: Ascoli), the chief town of Picenum and a Roman municipium, was destroyed by the Romans in the Social War (B.C. 89), but was afterwards rebuilt (Strab. p. 241; Flor. i. 19; Caes. B. C. i. 15; Cic. pro Sull. 8).—2. Apūlum (Asculinus: Ascoli di Satriano), a town of Apulia in Daunia on the confines of Samnium, near which the Romans were defeated by Pyrrhus, B.C. 279 (Flor. i. 18; Plut. Pyrrh. 21; Zonar. viii. 5).

Ascūris (Ezero), a lake in M. Olympus in Perrhaebia in Thessaly, near Lapathus (Liv. xlv. 2).

Asdrūbal. [HASDRUBAL.]

Asēa (ἡ Ἀσέα), a town in Arcadia, not far from Megalopolis, (Strab. pp. 275, 343; Paus. viii. 27, 3).

Asellio, P. Semprōnius, tribune of the soldiers under P. Scipio Africanus at Numantia, B.C. 133, wrote a Roman history from the Punic wars inclusive to the times of the Gracchi (Gell. ii. 13, v. 18, xiii. 22).

Asellus, Tib. Claudius, a Roman eques, was deprived of his horse by Scipio Africanus Minor, when censor, B.C. 142, and in his tribuneship of the plebs in 139 accused Scipio Africanus before the people (Gell. ii. 20, iii. 4; Cic. de Orat. ii. 64, 66).

Asia (Ἀσία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Iapetus, and mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus (Hes. Th. 349; Apollod. i. 2). According to some traditions, the continent of Asia derived its name from her (Hdt. iv. 45).

Asiā (Ἀσία: Ἀσιεύς, -ιανός, ἰάτης, -ατικός: Asia), also in the poets Asis (Ἄσις), one of the three great divisions which the ancients made of the known world. It is doubtful whether the name is of Greek or Eastern origin; but, in either case, it seems to have been first used by the Greeks for the W. part of Asia Minor, especially the plains watered by the river Caÿster, where the Ionian colonists first settled; and, thence, as their geographical knowledge advanced, they extended it to the whole country E., N.E., and S.E. Apart from the use of Ἄσιος λειμών used of this plain (Hom. Il. ii. 461), the earliest writers who use the name are Pindar (who speaks of the land opposite Rhodes as a promontory of Asia, Ol. vii. 18), Aeschylus (who separates Europe and Asia by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, Pr. 730), and Hecataeus. The Greek legends respecting the Argonautic and the Trojan expeditions, and other mythical stories, on the one hand, and the allusions to commercial and other intercourse, with the people of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, on the other hand, indicate a certain degree of knowledge of the coast from the mouth of the Phasis, at the E. extremity of the Black Sea, to the mouth of the Nile. This knowledge was improved and increased by the colonisation of the W., N., and S. coasts of Asia Minor, and by the relations into which these Greek colonies were brought, first with the Lydian, and then with the Persian empires, so that, in the middle of the 5th century B.C., Herodotus was able to give a pretty complete description of the Persian empire, and some imperfect accounts of the parts beyond it; while some knowledge of S. Asia was obtained by way of Egypt; and its N. regions, with their wandering tribes, formed the subject of marvellous stories which the traveller heard from the Greek colonists on the N. shores of the Black Sea. The conquests of Alexander, besides the personal acquaintance which they enabled the Greeks to form with those provinces of the Persian empire hitherto only known to them by report, extended their knowledge over the regions watered by the Indus and its four great tributaries (the Punjab and Scinde); the lower course of the Indus and the shores between its mouth and the head of the Persian Gulf were explored by Nearchus; and some further knowledge was gained of the nomad tribes which roamed (as they still do) over the vast steppes of Central Asia by the attempt of Alexander to penetrate on the N.E. beyond the Jaxartes (Sihoun); while on all points, the Greeks were placed in advanced positions from which to acquire further information, especially at Alexandria, whither voyagers constantly brought accounts of the shores of Arabia and India, as far as the island of Taprobane, and even beyond this, to the Malay peninsula and the coasts of Cochin China. On the E. and N. the wars and commerce of the Greek kingdom of Syria carried Greek knowledge of Asia no further, except in the direction of India to a small extent, but of course more acquaintance was gained with the countries already subdued, until the conquest of the Parthians shut out the Greeks from the country E. of the Tigris-valley; a limit which the Romans, in their turn, were never able to pass. They pushed their arms, however, further N. than the Greeks had done, into the mountains of Armenia, and they gained information of a great caravan route between India and the shores of the Caspian, through Bactria, and of another commercial track leading over Central Asia to the distant regions of the Seres. This brief sketch will show that all the accurate knowledge of the Greeks and Romans respecting Asia was confined to the countries which slope down S. wards from the great mountain-chain formed by the Caucasus and its prolongation beyond the Caspian to the Himalayas: of the vast elevated steppes between these mountains and the central range of the Altai (from which the N. regions of Siberia again slope down to the Arctic Ocean) they only knew that they were inhabited by nomad tribes, except the country directly N. of Ariana, where the Persian empire had extended beyond the mountain-chain, and where the Greek kingdom of Bactria had been subsequently established.—The notions of the ancients respecting the size and form of Asia were such as might be inferred from what has been stated. Distances computed from the accounts of travellers are always exaggerated; and hence the S. part of the continent was supposed to extend much further to the E. than it really does (about 60° of long. too much, according to Ptolemy), while to the N. and NE. parts, which were quite unknown, much too small an extent was assigned. However, all the ancient geographers, except Pliny, agreed in considering it the largest of the three divisions of the world, and all believed it to be surrounded by the ocean, with the curious exception of Ptolemy, who recurred to the early notion, that the E. parts of Asia and the SE. parts of Africa were united by land which enclosed the Indian Ocean on the E. and S. (Plin. v. 47; Ptol. vii. 3). The different opinions about the boundaries of Asia on the side of Africa are mentioned under AFRICA: on the side of Europe the boundary was formed by the river Tanais (Don), the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azof), Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), Propontis (Sea of Marmora), and the Aegean (Archipelago).—The most general division of Asia was into two parts, which were different at different times, and known by different names. To the earliest Greek colonists the river Halys, the E. boundary of the Lydian kingdom, formed a natural division between Upper and Lower Asia (ἡ ἄνω Ἀ., or τὰ ἄνω Ἀσίας, and ἡ κάτω Ἀ., or τὰ κάτω τῆς Ἀσίας, or Ἀ. ἡ ἐντὸς Ἄλλυος ποταμοῦ); and afterwards the Euphrates was adopted as a more natural boundary. Another division was made by the Taurus into A. intra Taurum, i.e. the part of Asia N. and NW. of the Taurus, and A. extra Taurum, all the rest of the continent (Ἀ. ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου, Ἀ. ἐκτὸς τοῦ Ταύρου). The division ultimately adopted, but apparently not till the 4th century of our era (e.g. in Justin) was that of A. Major and A. Minor.—1. Asia Major (Ἀ. ἡ μεγάλη) was the part of the continent E. of the Tanais, the Euxine, an imaginary line drawn from the Euxine at Trapezus (Trebizond) to the Gulf of Issus, and the Mediterranean: thus it included the countries of Sarmatia Asiatica with all the Scythian tribes to the E., Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Armenia, Syria, Arabia, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persis, Ariana, Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, Sogdiana, India, the land of the Sinae and Serica; respecting which, see the several articles.—2. Asia Minor (Ἀσία ἡ μικρά: Anatolia), was the peninsula on the extreme W. of Asia, bounded by the Euxine, Aegean, and Mediterranean on the N., W., and S.; and on the E. by the mountains on the W. of the upper course of the Euphrates. It was for the most part a fertile country, intersected with mountains and rivers, abounding in minerals, possessing excellent harbours, and peopled, from the earliest known period, by a variety of tribes from Asia and from Europe. For particulars respecting the country, the reader is referred to the separate articles upon the parts into which it was divided by the later Greeks: namely, Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, on the W.; Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia, on the S.; Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, on the E.; and Phrygia, Pisidia, Galatia, and Cappadocia, in the centre; see also the articles TROAS, AEOLIA, IONIA, DORIA, LYCAONIA, PERGAMUM, HALYS, SANGARIUS, TAURUS, &c.—3. Asia Propria (Ἀ. ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη), or simply Asia, the Roman province, formed out of the kingdom of

Pergamum, which was bequeathed to the Romans by ATTALUS III. B.C. 133 (Liv. Ep. 58, 59; Plut. Ti. Gracch. 14; Justin, xxxvi. 4; Strab. p. 624; Plin. xxxiii. 148), and the Greek cities on the W. coast, and the adjacent islands. It included, as arranged by M'. Aquilius B.C. 129 (Strab. p. 646), the districts of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia; but it did not include Rhodes (cf. Cic. pro Flacc. 27, 65). The town and districts of Cibyra were included in Asia by Sulla; but in B.C. 50 the three districts of Cibyra, Apamea and Synnada were included in the province of Cilicia: after B.C. 49 they belonged to Asia (cf. Cic. Fam. xiii. 67). The eastern part of Phrygia Magna belonged to Galatia after 36 B.C. It was governed by a propraetor (sometimes, however, called proconsul); but after B.C. 27, when it was assigned to the senate, by a proconsul. Sulla for purposes of tribute divided it into 44 regions; but the distribution which prevailed was the grouping of several into Conventus, or dioceses, for judicial purposes, taking the name of the principal town. Under the empire seven cities of Asia stood forth as μητροπόλεις, Smyrna, Sardis, Synnada, Pergamum, Lampascus, Cyzicus, Ephesus, of which the last was distinguished as the chief of all by the title πρώτη. Under Diocletian Asia was divided into seven small provinces: 1. Asia proconsularis, chief town Ephesus; 2. Hellespontus, chief town Cyzicus; 3. Lydia, chief town Sardis; 4. Phrygia prima, or Pacatiana, chief town Laodicea; 5. Phrygia secunda, or salutaris, chief town Eucarpia; 6. Caria, chief town Aphrodisias; 7. Insularum provincia, chief town Rhodes. [For its fluctuations of freedom see RHODUS; for the religious organisation of Asia, see Dict. Ant. s. v. Asiarchae.]

Asinārus (Ἀσινάρος: Fiume di Noto or Freddo?), a river on the E. side of Sicily, on which the Athenians were defeated by the Syracusans, B.C. 413; the Syracusans celebrated here an annual festival called Asinaria (Thuc. vii. 84; Plat. Nic. 28).

Asinē (Ἀσίνη: Ἀσινάϊος). 1. A town in Laconica on the coast between Taenarum and Gythium (Strab. p. 363).—2. A town in Argolis, W. of Hermione, was built by the Dryopes, who were driven out of the town by the Argives after the first Messenian war, and built No. 3 (Il. ii. 560; Paus. ii. 36; Strab. p. 373).—3. (Saratza?), an important town in Messenia near the Promontory Acritas, on the Messenian gulf, which was hence also called the Asinaean gulf (Paus. iv. 34, 12).

Asinia Gens, plebeian, came from Teate, the chief town of the Marrucini; and the first person of the name mentioned is Herius Asinius, the leader of the Marrucini in the Marsic war, B.C. 90 (cf. Sil. Ital. xvii. 458). The Asinii are given under their surnames, GALLUS and POLLIO.

Asius (Ἄσιος). 1. Son of Hyrtacus of Arisbe, and father of Acamas and Phaenops, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Idomeneus (Il. xiii. 389, xvii. 582).—2. Son of Dymas and brother of Hecuba, whose form Apollo assumed when he roused Hector to fight against Patroclus (Il. xvi. 715).—3. Of Samos, one of the earliest Greek poets, lived probably about B.C. 700. He wrote epic and elegiac poems, which have perished with the exception of a few fragments. (Athen. 125, Paus. vii. 4, 2.) Fragm. in Poet. Lyr. Bergk.

Asmiraea, a district and city of Serica in the N. of Asia, near mountains called Asmiraei Montes, which are supposed to be the Altai range, and the city to be Khamil, in the centre of Chinese Tartary (Ptol. vi. 16; Amn. Marc. xxiii. 6).

Āsōpus (Ἄσωπος). 1. (Basilikos), a river in Peloponnesus rises near Phlius, and flows through the Sicyonian territory into the Corinthian gulf (Il. iv. 383; Strab. pp. 271, 382, 408, 409; Thuc. ii. 5).—2. (Asopo), a river in Boeotia, forms the N. boundary of the territory of Plataeae, flows through the S. of Boeotia, and falls into the Euboean sea near Delphinium in Attica. The battle of Plataeae was fought on the banks, B.C. 479 (Hdt. ix. 51).—3. A river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, rises in M. Oeta, and flows into the Malian gulf near Thermopylae (Strab. p. 382).—4. A river in Paros (Id. ib.)—5. A river in Phrygia, flows past Laodicæa into the Lycus.—6. A town in Laconia on the E. side of the Laconian gulf (Strab. p. 364; Paus. iii. 21, 22).

Āsōpus, the river god, is claimed both by the Boeotians and the Sicyonians as their indigenous deity with a somewhat similar genealogy (Paus. ii. 5, 2). Āsopus was the son of Poseidon and Pero (according to others of Oceanus and Tethys, of Poseidon and Kelusa, or Zeus and Eurynome). He married Metope, daughter of the river god Ladon, who bore besides Ismenus and Pelasgos, a great number of daughters. In the tablet dedicated at Olympia by Phlius, Nemea, Aegina, Corcyra, and Thebe are named (Paus. v. 22, 5). To these Apollodorus adds Salamis, Euboea, Cleone, Tanagra, Thespieae, Oenia, and Chalcis. A story (which clearly started in Sicyon) runs that Zeus carried off Aegina: Āsopus followed to Corinth, and, having created a spring in Acrocorinthus, where water had been scarce, he learned from Sisyphus the name of the robber. As he still persisted in the pursuit Zeus smote him with a thunderbolt, and from that time the river carries down charcoal in its bed (Apollod. iii. 12; Eur. I. A. 697; Anton. Lib. 38). Aegina was conveyed to the island which took her name, or, according to one story, was changed into an island. These many daughters seem to indicate partly the towns connected by religious rites or otherwise with the two chief rivers; partly places to which the name passed, whether as a local name for a stream, or as representing the worship of river-deities (cp. the name Arethusa). Other daughters of Āsopus are Antiope and Evadne. The name Āsōpis applies to the daughters, Āsōpiādes to Aencus, son of Zeus and Aegina.

Āspadāna (Ἀσπαδάνα: Ispahan?), a town of the district Paraetacene in Persis.

Āsparagiūm (Iscarpur), a town in the territory of Dyrhachium in Illyria (Caes. B. C. iii. 30, 76).

Āspasīa (Ἀσπασία). 1. The elder, of Miletus, daughter of Axiochus, the most celebrated of the Greek Hætaerae (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.), came to reside at Athens. Here she was visited by Athenians most distinguished for position and culture, offering what may be compared to a salon for witty and even learned conversation. Socrates is said to have been among those found there; but in especial she gained the affections of Pericles, who separated from his wife and took Āspasia to live with him, in as close a union as could be formed with a foreigner. There was no doubt much exaggeration as to the political influence which she exerted, and the stories of her inducing Pericles to make war on Samos for the sake of Miletus, and on Sparta because of Āspasia's quarrel with Megara (Plut. Pericl. 24; Aristoph. Ach. 497), may be dismissed as lampoons. The enemies of Pericles accused Āspasia of impiety (ἀσέβεια), and it required all the personal influence of Pericles, who defended her, and his most earnest entreaties, to procure her acquittal. On the death of Pericles (B.C. 429), Āspasia is said to have attached herself to one Lysicles, a dealer in cattle, and to have made him by her instructions a first-rate orator. The son of Pericles by Āspasia was legitimated by a special decree of the people, and took his father's name. Some of the sayings of Āspasia are collected in Mulierum Græc. Fragmenta, by Wolf, 1739. The bust here engraved was found at Civitā Vecchia: the genuineness of the inscription is, however, now disputed.—2. The younger, a Phocæan, daughter of Hermitimus, was the favourite concubine of Cyrus the Younger, who called her Āspasia after the mistress of Pericles, her previous name having been Miltō. After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (B.C. 401), she fell into the hands of Artaxerxes. When Darius, son of Artaxerxes, was appointed successor to the throne, he asked his father to surrender Āspasia to him. Artaxerxes gave her up; but he soon after took her away again, and made her a priestess of a temple at Eebatana, where strict celibacy was requisite. (Plut. Artax. 26–29; Just. x. 2.)

Āspasii. [ASPII.]

Āspasius (Ἀσπασίος). 1. A Peripatetic philosopher, lived about A.D. 80, and wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle. A portion of his commentaries on the Nicomachean Ethics is still preserved.—2. Of Byblus, a Greek sophist, lived about A.D. 180, and wrote commentaries on Demosthenes and Aeschines, of which a few extracts are preserved.

Āspendus (Ἀσπένδος: Ἀσπένδιος, Aspendus: Dashashkehr or Manavgat), a strong and flourishing city of Pamphylia, on the small navigable river Eurymedon, 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) from its mouth: said to have been a colony of the Argives (Strab. p. 667; Thuc. viii. 81; Polyb. v. 73).

Āsper, Aemiliūs, a Roman grammarian, of the age of Trajan, who wrote commentaries on Terence and Virgil, must be distinguished from a very inferior grammarian of the 6th century, usually called Āsper Junior, the author of a small work entitled Ars Grammatica, printed in the Grammat. Lat. Auctores, by Putschius, Hanov. 1605. For remains of Aemilius Āsper see Hagen, Philolog. xxv.

Āsphaltites Lacus or Mare Mortuum (Ἀσφαλτῖτις ἢ Σοδομίτις λίμνη ἢ ἡ θάλασσα ἡ νεκρά: Dead Sea), the great salt and bituminous lake in the SE. of Palestine, which receives the water of the Jordan. It has no visible outlet, and its surface is considerably below the level of the Mediterranean. (Diod. Sic. ii. 48.)

sadac, between the rivers Choes (Kama) and Indus, in the NE. of Afghanistan and the NW. of the Punjab (Arrian, An. iv. 23).

Aspis (Ἀσπίς). 1. Clypea (Klibiah), a city on a promontory of the same name, near the NE. point of the Carthaginian territory, founded by Agathocles, and taken in the first Punic War by the Romans, who called it Clypea, the translation of Ἀσπίς, a name said to be derived from the shield-like hill on which it stands (Strab. p. 834; Polyb. i. 29, 36).—2. (Marsa-Zajfran? Ru.), in the African Tripolitana, the best harbour on the coast of the great Syrtis (Strab. p. 836).—3. [ARCONNESUS.]

Asplēdon (Ἀσπληδών: Ἀσπληδώνιος), or Spledon, a town of the Minyae in Boeotia on the river Melas, near Orchomenus; built by the mythical Asplēdon, son of Poseidon and Mideā (Il. ii. 510; Strab. p. 416).

Assa (Ἄσσα: Ἀσσαῖος), a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Singitic gulf (Hdt. vii. 122).

Assacēni (Ἀσασακῆνοι), an Indian tribe, in the district of the Paropamisadae, between the rivers Cophen (Cabool) and Indus, in the NW. of the Punjab (Curt. viii. 10; Arr. An. iv. 25; Strab. p. 698).

Assārācus (Ἀσσάρακος), king of Troy, son of Tros, father of Capys, grandfather of Anchises, and great-grandfather of Aeneas. Hence the Romans, as descendants of Aeneas, are called domus Assaraci (Verg. Aen. i. 284). [Tros.]

Assēsus (Ἀσσησός), a town of Ionia near Miletus, with a temple of Athene surnamed Ἀσσησία (Hdt. i. 19).

Assōrus (Ἀσσωρός or Ἀσσώριον: Ἀσσωρίνος: Asāro), a small town in Sicily between Enna and Agrinum. It contained a temple of the local river god Chrysas, which Verres tried to plunder (Cic. Verr. iv. 44). It was a Sicel town, and a faithful ally of Dionysius in B. C. 396 (Diod. xiv. 58).

Assus (Ἄσσοσ: Ἀσσιος, Ἀσσεύς: Asso, Ru., near Berani), a flourishing city in the Troad, on the Adramyttian Gulf, opposite to Lesbos: afterwards called Apollonia: the birthplace of Cleanthes the Stoic (Strab. pp. 610, 735).

Assyria (Ἀσσυρία: Ἀσσύριος, Assyris: Kurdistan). [The name is said to be derived from an ancient capital, Assur='river-bank,' now Kaleh Sherghat, on the right bank of the Tigris: others derive the name of the town from the Assyrian god Asur.]—1. The country properly so called, in the narrowest sense, was a district of W. Asia, extending along the E. side of the Tigris, which divided it on the W. and NW. from Mesopotamia and Babylonia, and bounded on the N. and E. by M. Niphates and M. Zagrus, which separated it from Armenia Media, and on the SE. by Susiana. It was watered by several streams, flowing into the Tigris from the E.; two of which, the Lycus or Zabatus (Great Zab), and the Caprus or Zabus or Anzabas (Little Zab), divided the country into three parts: that between the Upper Tigris and the Lycus was called Aturia (a mere dialectic variety of Assyria), was probably the most ancient seat of the monarchy, and contained the capital, Nineveh or NINUS: that between the Lycus and the Caprus was called Adiabene: and the part SE. of the Caprus contained the districts of Apolloniatis and Sittacene. Another division into districts, given by Ptolemy, is the following: Arrhaphachitis, Calacine, Adiabene, Arbelitis, Apolloniatis, and Sittacene.—2. In a wider sense the name was applied to the whole country watered by the Euphrates and the Tigris, between the mountains of Armenia on the N., those of Kurdistan on the E., and the Arabian Desert on the W., so as to include, besides Assyria Proper, Mesopotamia and Babylonia (Strab. p. 736); nay, there is sometimes an apparent confusion between Assyria and Syria (Verg. Georg. ii. 465).—3. By a further extension the word is used to designate the Assyrian Empire in its widest sense. The early history of this great monarchy cannot be given here in any detail. It was far less ancient than the Babylonian monarchy. The Assyrian rulers were at first merely petty princes of Assur, subject to Babylon, among whom Sammas-Rimmon, who built the temple of Rimmon at Assur, is dated 1820 B.C. The first 'king' of Assyria seems to have been Belsumeli-capi, about 1700 B.C.; but it was not till the reign of Rimmon-nirari (the historical Ninus), about 1330 B.C., that the king of Assyria stood forth as completely independent, a rival and superior of the Babylonish king, and Nineveh became the capital. Babylon was captured by Tiglath-Adar, king of Assyria, in 1270, but regained its independence in the next reign, when the Assyrians were at war with the Hittite empire, which Tiglath-Pileser I. overthrew for a time in 1130. The empire of this king and his successors, though at some periods curtailed by Babylonian, Hittite, or Syrian enemies, included the countries just mentioned, with Media, Persia, and portions of the countries to the E. and NE., Armenia, Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, except the kingdom of Judah; and, beyond these limits, some of the Assyrian kings made incursions into Arabia and Egypt. The empire, however, dwindled in the eighth century B.C., several provinces revolted, and the dynasty fell about 750. Pul or Poros, who then seized the throne and called himself Tiglath Pileser II. founded the 'second' Assyrian empire and restored all its power, which was further extended by Shalmaneser IV., and Sargon, who made himself master of Syria and of Babylon (whose king he took captive) before his death in 705. His son, Sennacherib, failed in his attempt to conquer Egypt, and met with disaster in Judaea, 700 B.C. This so weakened the empire, that after the death of Assurbani-pal (SARDANAPALUS) the Medes revolted and formed a separate kingdom, and at last, in B.C. 606, the governor of Babylonia united with Cyaxares, the king of Media, to conquer Assyria, which was divided between them, Assyria Proper falling to the share of Media, and the rest of the empire to Babylon. The king (prob. Esarhaddon II.) perished, and Nineveh was rased to the ground. [Comp. BABYLON and MEDIA.]

Asta (Astensis). 1. (Asti in Piedmont), an inland town of Liguria on the Tanarus, a Roman colony (Plin. iii. 49).—2. (Mesa de Asta), a town in Hispania Baetica, near Gades, a Roman colony with the surname Regia (Strab. p. 140).

Astābōras (Ἀσταβόρας: Atbarah or Tacazza) and Astāpus (Ἀσταππος, Bahr-el-Azak or Blue Nile), two rivers of Aethiopia, having their sources in the highlands of Abyssinia, and uniting in about 17° N. Lat. to form the Nile. The land enclosed by them was the island of MEROË.

Astācus (Ἀστακος), father of Ismarus, Leades, Asphodians, and Melanippus (Hdt. v. 67; Aesch. Th. 407; Apollod. iii. 6).

Astācus (Ἀστακος: Ἀστακηνός). 1. (Dragomestre), a city of Acarnania, on the Acheloiis (Strab. p. 459).—2. A city of Bithynia, at the SE. corner of the Sinus Astacenus (Ἀστακηνός κόλπος), a bay of the Propontis, was a colony from Megara, but afterwards received fresh colonists from Athens, who called the place Olbia (Ὀλβία) (Strab. p. 563; Seyl. p. 35). It was destroyed by Lysimachus, but rebuilt on a neighbouring site, at the N.E. corner of the gulf, by Nicomedes I., who named his new city NICOMEDIA.

Astāpa (Ἐστέπα), a town in Hispania Baetica, burnt by the inhabitants when the Romans besieged it (Liv. xxviii. 22; Appian, Hisp. 33).

Astāpus. [ASTABORAS.]

Astartē. [APHRODITE and SYRIA DEA.]

Astēlēphus (Ἀστῆλέφος), a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine 4 miles N. of the Hippus.

Astēriā (Ἀστερία), daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phoebe, sister of Leto (Latona), wife of Perses, and mother of Hecate. In order to escape the embraces of Zeus, she is said to have taken the form of a quail (ortyx, ὄρνιξ), and to have thrown herself down from heaven into the sea, where she was metamorphosed into the island Asteria (the island which had fallen from heaven like a star), or Ortygia, afterwards called Delos. Cicero makes her the mother of the Tyrian Hæraeles. (Hes. Th. 409; Apollod. i. 2; Cic. N. D. iii. 16, 42.)

Astērion or Astērīus (Ἀστερίων or Ἀστερίος), 1. Son of Tentamus, and king of the Cretans, married Europa after she had been carried to Crete by Zeus, and brought up her three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthys, of whom Zeus was the father.—2. Son of Cometes, Pyrenus, or Priscus, by Antigone, daughter of Pheres, was one of the Argonauts (Ap. Rh. i. 35).

Astēris or Astēriā (Ἀστερίς, Ἀστερία), a small island between Ithaca and Cephallenia (Od. iv. 846; Strab. pp. 59, 456).

Astērīum (Ἀστερίον), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly (Il. ii. 735; Strab. p. 439).

Astērōpæus (Ἀστεροπαῖος), son of Pelegon, leader of the Pæonians, and an ally of the Trojans, was slain by Achilles (Il. xxi. 140–200).

Astigi, a town in Hispania Baetica on the river Singulis, a Roman colony with the surname Augusta Firma (Strab. p. 141).

Astræa (Ἀστραῖα), daughter of Zeus and Themis, or, according to others, of Astræus and Eos. During the golden age, this star-bright maiden lived on earth and among men, whom she blessed; but when that age had passed away, Astræa, who tarried longest among men, withdrew, and was placed among the stars, where she was called Παρθένος or Virgo. Her sister Aidās or Pudicitia, left the earth along with her (ad superos Astræa recessit, hac [Pudicitia] comite, Juv. vi. 19; cf. Ov. Met. i. 149; Hyg. Ast. ii. 25; Arat. Phaen. 96).

Astræus (Ἀστραῖος), a Titan, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Eos (Aurora), and father of the winds Zephyrus, Boreas, and Notus, Eosphorus (the morning star) and all the stars of heaven. Ovid (Met. xix. 545) calls the winds Astræi [adj.] fratres, the 'Astræan brothers.' (Hes. Th. 376.)

Astūra. 1. (La Stura), a river in Latium, rises in the Alban mountains, and flows between Antium and Circëii into the Tyrrhenian sea. At its mouth it formed a small island with a town upon it, also called Astura (Torre d' Astura): here Cicero had an estate. (Strab. p. 232; Cic. Att. xii. 19, 40, Fam. vi. 19.)—2. (Ezla), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the Durius.

Astūres, a people in the NW. of Spain, bounded on the E. by the Cantabri and Vaccaei.

on the W. by the Gallæci, on the N. by the Ocean, and on the S. by the Vettones, thus inhabiting the modern Asturias and the northern part of Leon and Valladolid. They contained 22 tribes and 240,000 freemen, and were divided into the Augustani and Transmontani, the former of whom dwelt S. of the mountains as far as the Durius, and the latter N. of the mountains down to the sea-coast. The country of the Astures was mountainous, rich in minerals and celebrated for its horses: the people themselves were rude and warlike. Their chief town was Asturica Augusta (Astorga). (Strab. pp. 153, 167; Plin. iii. 35.)

Astŷāges (Ἀστυάγης), son of Cyaxares, last king of Media, reigned B.C. 594–559. Alarmed by a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyses, a Persian of good family, by whose son Cyrus he was dethroned. [For details see CYRUS.]

Astŷānax (Ἀστυάναξ), son of Hector and Andromache: his proper name was Seaman-drius, but he was called Astyanax or 'lord of the city' by the Trojans, on account of the services of his father (Il. vi. 400; Plat. Cratyl. 392 B). After the taking of Troy the Greeks hurled him down from the walls, that he might not restore the kingdom of Troy. This is prophesied in Il. xxiv. 734, and related as performed either by resolution of the Greeks or as a private act of Neoptolemus in Eur. Tro. 720, Paus. x. 25, 4 (citing Lesehes), Eur. And. 10, Ov. Met. xiii. 415, Hyg. Fab. 109. Other traditions make him survive and found cities in the Troad (Strab. p. 607).

Astŷdāmas (Ἀστυδάμας). 1. A tragic poet, son of Morsinus, the great-nephew of Aeschylus [PHILOCLÉS], wrote 240 tragedies, and gained the prize 15 times. His first tragedy was acted B.C. 399.—2. Son of the above, and a tragic poet of considerable eminence, since it is recorded that a statue to him was decreed on account of his play Parthenopæus, and that he won the prize in two consecutive years.

Astŷdāmīa (Ἀστυδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Amyntor and mother of Tlepolemus by Hercules.—2. Wife of ACASTUS.

Astymedusa (Ἀστυμέδουσα), wife of Oedipus after the death of Jocasta.

Astŷnōmē (Ἀστυνόμη), daughter of Chryses, better known under her patronymic CHRYSEIS.

Astŷōchē or Astŷōchia (Ἀστυόχη or Ἀστυόχεια). 1. Daughter of Aetor, by whom Ares begot Ascalaphus and Iahnenus.—2. Daughter of Phylas, king of Ephrya in Thesprotia, became by Hercules the mother of Tlepolemus.

Astŷōchus (Ἀστυόχος), the Laedaemonian admiral in B.C. 412, commanded on the coast of Asia Minor, where he was bribed by the Persians to remain inactive.

Astŷpālæa (Ἀστυπάλαια: Ἀστυπαλαίεύς, Ἀστυπαλαίαιτης: Stampalia), one of the Sporades in the S. part of the Grecian archipelago (so called after the daughter of Phoenix), with a town of the same name, founded by the Megarians, which was under the Romans a libera civitas. (Astypalæia regna, i.e. Astypalæa, Ov. Met. vii. 461.) (Strab. p. 488; Plin. iv. 71.) An inscription of B.C. 105 mentions it as a civitas foederata (C. I. G. 2485). [See also CLEOMEDES.]

Astŷra (τὰ Ἀστυρα), a town of Mysia, NW. of Adramyttium, on a marsh connected with the sea, with a grove sacred to Artemis surnamed Ἀστυρινή or -νή (Strab. p. 613; Xen. Hell. iv. 1, 41).

Asychis (Ἀσυχίς), an ancient king of Egypt succeeded MYCERINUS (Hdt. ii. 136). He must therefore be the king Shepses-ka-f, the last of the Fourth Dynasty, whose date is placed by Brugsch at 3600 B.C.

Atābūlus, the name in Apulia of the parching SE. wind, the Sirocco, which is at present called Altino in Apulia.

Atabŷris or Atabŷrĭum (Ἀταβŷρίον), the highest mountain in Rhodes on the SW. of that island, on which was a celebrated temple of Zeus Atabyrius, said to have been founded by Althaemenes, the grandson of Minos. (Pind. Ol. vii. 87; Strab. p. 655; Diod. v. 59.)

Atāgis. [ATHESIS.]

Atalanta (Ἀταλάντη). 1. The Arcadian Atalanta, was the daughter of Iasus (Iasion or Iasius) and Clymene. Her father, who had wished for a son, was disappointed at her birth, and exposed her on the Parthenian (virgin) hill, where she was suckled by a she-bear, the symbol of Artemis. After she had grown up she lived in pure maidenhood, slew the centaurs who pursued her, and took part in the Calydonian hunt. Her father subsequently recognised her as his daughter; and when he desired her to marry, she required every suitor who wanted to win her, to contend with her first in the foot-race. If he conquered her, he was to be rewarded with her hand, if not, he was to be put to death. This she did because she was the most swift-footed of mortals, and because the Delphic oracle had cautioned her against marriage. She conquered many suitors, but was at length overcome by Milanion with the assistance of Aphrodite. The goddess had given him 3 golden apples, and during the race he dropped them one after the other: their beauty charmed Atalanta so much, that she could not abstain from gathering them, and Milanion thus gained the goal before her. She accordingly became his wife. [PARTHENOPAEUS.] They were subsequently both metamorphosed into lions, because they had profaned by their embraces the sacred grove of Zeus. (Callim. Dian. 216; Hyg. Fab. 99; Prop. i. 1. 10; Paus. iii. 24. 2; Apollod. iii. 9. 2.)—2. The Boeotian Atalanta. The same stories are related of her as of the Arcadian Atalanta, except that her parentage and the localities are described differently. Thus she is said to have been a daughter of Schoenus, and to have been married to Hippomenes. Her foot-race is transferred to the Boeotian Onchestus, and the sanctuary which the newly married couple profaned by their love, was a temple of Cybele, who metamorphosed them into lions, and yoked them to her chariot (Ov. Met. viii. 318, x. 565; Hyg. Fab. 185). It is clear that these are not to be regarded as distinct personages. Indeed, Atalanta herself, in whatever locality her story is placed, seems to be an expression in mortal form of Artemis the virgin huntress, round whom the local legends have gathered, and, as is often the case, the representative of the goddess becomes—not in this instance her child, but her foster-child, or the foster-child of her symbolical animal. [See ARTEMIS.] An attribute of Artemis, the goddess of springs, is seen in the story of her striking water from a rock (Paus. l. c.).

Atalantē (Ἀταλάντη: Ἀταλανταῖος). 1. A small island in the Euripus, on the coast of the Opuntian Locri, with a small town of the same name (Strab. pp. 61, 395; Thuc. ii. 32, iii. 89).—2. A town of Macedonia on the Axios, in the neighbourhood of Gortynia and Idomene (Thuc. ii. 100).

Atārantes (Ἀτάραντες), a people in the E. of Libya, described by Herodotus (iv. 184).

Atarbēchis. [APHRODITOPOLIS.]

Atarneus or Atarne (Ἀταρνεός: Dikelō), a city on M. Cane, on the coast of Mysia, opposite to Lesbos: a colony of the Chians: the residence of the tyrant Hermias, with whom Aristotle resided some time: destroyed before the time of Pliny (Hdt. i. 160; Strab. p. 670; Plin. v. 123).

Athaulphus, Athaulphus, Adaulphus (i.e. Athaulf, 'sworn helper,' the same name as that which appears in later history under the form of Adolf or Adolphus), brother of Alaric's wife. He assisted Alaric in his invasion of Italy, and on the death of that monarch in A.D. 410, he was elected king of the Visigoths. He then made a peace with the Romans, married Placidia, sister of Honorius, retired with his nation into the S. of Gaul, and finally withdrew into Spain, where he was murdered at Barcelona. (Jornand. de Reb. Get. 32.)

Atax (Aude), originally called Narbo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Pyrenees, and flows by Narbo Martius into the Lacus Rubresus or Rubrensis, which is connected with the sea (Plin. iii. 32). In Polyb. iii. 37, xxxiv. 10, the river itself is called Narbo. From this river the poet P. Terentius Varro obtained the surname Atacinus. [VARRO.]

Atē (Ἄτη), daughter of Eris or Zeus, was an ancient Greek divinity, who led both gods and men into rash and inconsiderate actions. She personifies the infatuation which comes upon the guilty and lures them to ruin, thus making sin work its own punishment. She once even induced Zeus, at the birth of Heracles, to take an oath by which Hera was afterwards enabled to give to Eurystheus the power which had been destined for Heracles. When Zeus discovered his rashness, he hurled Ate from Olympus and banished her for ever from the abodes of the gods. In the myth of Il. ix. 502 Ate speeds on her work of evil for man, while behind come the mediating Prayers (Ἄραια) who heal the mischief for those who regard them, but entreat Zeus to bring greater evil on the stubborn. In Il. xix. 85 Agamemnon says that the cause of his guilt is the infatuation which the fates brought on him, and that this Ate is a 'goddess born of Zeus who goes softly over men's heads,' i.e. takes men unawares, and leads them to ruin. In the tragic writers Ate appears in a different light: she avenges evil deeds and inflicts just punishments upon the offenders and their posterity, so that her character is almost the same as that of Nemesis and Erinnys; but still she has grown out of the idea that sin brings its punishment. She appears most prominent in the dramas of Aeschylus, and least in those of Euripides, with whom the idea of Dike (justice) is more fully developed.

Atēius, surnamed Prætextatus, and Philologus, a celebrated grammarian at Rome, about B.C. 40, and a friend of Sallust, for whom he drew up an Epitome (Breviarium) of Roman history. After the death of Sallust Ateius lived on intimate terms with Asinius Pollio, whom he assisted in his literary pursuits. (Sueton. Gramm. 10.)

Atēius Cāpĭto. [CAPITO.]

Atella (Atellānus; Aversa), a town in Campania between Capua and Neapolis, originally inhabited by the Oscans, afterwards a Roman municipium and a colony. It revolted to Hannibal (B.C. 216) after the battle of Cannæ, and the Romans in consequence transplanted its inhabitants to Calatia, and peopled the town with new citizens from Nuceria. Atella owes its celebrity to the Atellanæ Fabulæ or Oscan farces, which took their name from this town. (Dict. of Antiq. s.v. Satura.)

Aternum (Pescara), a town in central Italy on the Adriatic, at the mouth of the river Aternus (Pescara), was the common harbour of the Vestini, Marrucini, and Peligni (Strab. p. 241).

Aternus. [ATERNUM.]

Atestē (Atestinus: Este), a Roman colony in the country of the Veneti in Upper Italy (Mart. x. 93).

Athācus, a town in Lyncestis in Macedonia.

Athamānia (Ἀθαμανία: Ἀθαμάν, -ἄνος), a mountainous country in the S. of Epirus, on the W. side of Pindus, of which Argiṭhea was the chief town. The Athamānes were a Thessalian people, who had been driven out of Thessaly by the Lapithæ. They were governed by independent princes, the last of whom was AMYNANDER. (Strab. pp. 434, 449.)

Athāmas (Ἀθάμας), son of Aeolus and Enarete, and king of Orchomenus in Boeotia. At the command of Hera, Athamas married Nephele, by whom he became the father of PHRIXUS and Helle. But he was secretly in love with the mortal Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he begot Learchus and Melicertes; and Nephele, on discovering that Ino had a greater hold on his affections than herself, disappeared in anger. Having thus incurred the anger both of Hera and of Nephele, Athamas was seized with madness, and in this state killed his own son, Learchus: Ino threw herself with Melicertes into the sea, and both were changed into marine deities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palaemon. Athamas, as the murderer of his son, was obliged to flee from Boeotia, and settled in Thessaly.—Hence we have Athamantiādes, son of Athamas, i.e. Palaemon; and Athamantis, daughter of Athamas, i.e. Helle. [See PHRIXUS, INO, MELICERTES.]

Athanageria (Agramunt?), the chief town of the Ilergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Athanicus, king of the Visi-Goths during their stay in Dacia. In A.D. 367–369 he carried on war with the emperor Valens, with whom he finally concluded a peace. In 374 Athanicus was defeated by the Huns, and, after defending himself for some time in a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia, was compelled to fly in 380, and take refuge in the Roman territory. He died in 381. (Amm. Mar. xxvii. 5, xxx. 3; Sozom. vi. 37.)

Athanasius, archbishop of Alexandria A.D. 326. (See Dict. of Christian Biogr.)

Athēne (Ἀθηνᾶ or Ἀθηναία, whence Ἀθηνᾶ contracted in Attic into Ἀθηνᾶ, in Trag. Ἀθᾶνα; in older Ionic Ἀθήνη), one of the great deities of the Greek race, personifying to them the guiding influence of life, in wise counsel, in industry, and in strategy of war. The story of her birth, as given in Hesiod and in Hymn. ad Apoll., tells that Metis (= wise counsel) was the wife of Zeus, and being pregnant with Athene was, in the form of a fly which he had persuaded her to assume, swallowed by him, because he found that her child would be his superior in might (Hes. Th. 886). Athene was then born from the head of Zeus: springing forth, as Pindar tells, fully armed with a great shout (Ol. vii. 35). This has all the appearance of a very old tradition from primitive ancestors: but Homer, perhaps because he constantly discards the more grotesque myths which Hesiod retains, does not mention it, though his knowledge of it may perhaps be traced in Il. v. 875, and in the epithets ὄβριμοπάτρη and τριτογένεια. The story fixed on later Tritonis in Libya as the scene of her birth (cf. Apollod. i. 3, 6): and from Hdt. iv. 180 it may be surmised that some local sea or water deity, daughter of Poseidon, had become identified with Athene. Out of her other name Pallas (often a surname Παλλὰς Ἀθήνη), which some derive from her brandishing the spear, others interpret as = 'maiden,' probably arose a later story that she was the daughter of the giant Pallas (Tzet. ad Lyc. 355; Cic. N.D. iii. 23, 59). In Homer she appears as the champion of the Greeks, and in the Odyssey especially of the wise Odysseus (cf. Il. x. 244). She is already not only the goddess of wisdom (πολύβουλος), but also the goddess of war, yet always of war tempered by prudence (Il. i. 206); already the goddess of womanly industries (Il. v. 735, ix. 390), and of other arts (Od. vi. 233), whence came the later surname Ἐργάνη (Paus. i. 24); and already the protectress of Greek states (ἔρυσπιτολις, Il. vi. 305): whence she was afterwards Ἀθ. πολιὰς or πολιοῦχος. From this character as helper of industries she is regarded in later literature as the goddess of agriculture also, and so as the giver of the olive to Athens. The story ran that, in the reign of Cecrops, Poseidon and Athene contended for the control of Athens: the gods decreed that whichever produced the gift most useful to mortals should possess the city. Poseidon struck the ground with his trident, and a horse appeared: Athene made the olive spring up, and was adjudged the giver of the best gift and the protectress of Athens (Hdt. viii. 55; Apollod. iii. 14). A contest between two deities generally means that the new religion brought in by immigrants prevailed over some older cult. It is probable in this case that the worship of Poseidon had been established by the Pelasgic inhabitants of Attica, to whom the Lapithæ belonged, and that the Ionian immigrants made that of Athene take the chief place. Thenceforth she was entreated and thanked for the fruits of the land and other aid. Her connexion with the harvest appears in the story of ERICHTHEUS, and in the festivals of the Panathenæa, the Plynteria, the Procharisteria, the Oschophoria, the Arrhephoria, and the Scirophoria. [Dict. Ant. s.vv.]. As divine patroness of all arts, and not merely of weaving, she was at Athens the especial deity of the potters: this brought about a union of her worship with that of Hephaestus (as well as Promethens) in the torch-race [Dict. Ant. s.v. Lampadedromia], which accounts for the connexion of these two deities in myths. The Peplos in the Panathenæa shows her as the weavers' goddess. [For the special myths of her in connexion with weaving, see ARACHNE.] As goddess of war we find her in post-Homeric story celebrated in the battle of the giants and the Gorgon (Eur. Hec. 466, Ion. 987; Verg. Aen. iii. 578; Paus. viii. 47), whence her epithets γοργοφόνος, γίγαντολέτειρα. But she was also the goddess of military arts in general and so of martial music (Pind. Pyth. xii. 6; cf. Ἀθήνη Σάλπιγξ, Paus. ii. 21, 3), and of war-ships [ἄλκο]: both music and ship were represented in the Panathenæa (both attributes, however, might be derived from her care for art and for commerce). It is more doubtful whether we should regard, as some do, her epithets ἵππια, χαλιῆτις (cf. BELLEROPHON), δαμάσιππος, as goddess of horses and chariots with the idea of war-horses and war-chariots, or with an older religion in which the horse was a sacred animal to her as it was to Poseidon (Paus. i. 30, 4, ii. 4; Pind. Ol. xiii. 79; Soph. O. C. 1071). She was the inventress also, by some accounts, of the Pyrrhic dance (Plat. Legg. 796 B), and, as giver of victory in war, was worshipped in Ἄθῆνη Νίκη (Paus. i. 42, 4). She was in fact Νίκη ἄπτερος, the wingless Victory, to distinguish her from the conventional symbol of winged Victory. As protectress of cities she was called πολιούχος not only at Athens but in other states (Paus. i. 42, iii. 17): at Athens in this character she presided over the phratries or clans, and sacrifice was offered to her at the Apaturia. In many local legends of the Peloponnesus, connected apparently with the Dorian conquest, she appears as the friend and ally of Heracles (Paus. v. 17, 11, vi. 19, 12). The animals sacred to her were the owl, the serpent, and the cock: for the last Pausanias (vi. 26, 2) gives the rather doubtful reason that the cock is in truth very slight ground for the supposition that Athene was originally conceived as a goddess of the thunderstorm. Arguments for this origin from the thunderstorm, which are far from satisfactory, are found in the aegis, and even in Pindar's description of her birth. Others see in the Athene myth the clouds, and argue that her attribute of weaving was imagined from the fleecy clouds of heaven: others again upon the doubtful foundation of etymology base the conclusion that she was the goddess of dawn or of light. It is better not to regard Athene as a nature goddess at all, but simply as the divinity of wisdom, of arts and of industry: the ideal for the Greek race of the policy and skill which brought prosperity to the state and their protectress against barbarism: a deity who, far from resembling the nature deities, is always the inviolate maiden goddess. Besides the Athenian festivals mentioned above, the Argive ceremony deserves special notice, in which the archaic image of Athene was washed in the river Inachus, as a symbolical cleansing of the

was a pugnacious bird; the serpent was probably consecrated to her as representative of an old local religion connected with Erichthonius. As regards the owl, the most reasonable explanation is that at one time she was worshipped as the owl itself in the primitive days of animal worship, and that when Greek art and civilisation rejected monstrous forms of deities and chose the idealised human form, then the owl became merely her sacred bird or her symbol on coins. (Even Homer seems to preserve a trace of this primitive religion when he makes Athene assume the form of a bird: Il. vii. 59; Od. iii. 372, v. 353.) It is impossible to accept the idea that Homer when he called Athene γλαυκῶπις pictured her to himself as an owl-faced deity, but there is much probability that at one period she had that form: it is even possible that though Homer (cf. Paus. i. 14, 6) attached the sense of 'keen-eyed' to the word, he may be using an epithet which once meant owl-faced. This is more reasonable than to accept Roscher's view that the name was actually derived from the flashing of lightning; for there blood-stained goddess after her battle with the giants. (Callim. Lavacr. Pall.) She was worshipped also at Epidaurus in the temple of Asclepius as Athene Hygieia, in which character she had an altar at Athens. It is remarkable that the serpent and the cock were sacred to Asclepius as well as to Athene, but there is not sufficient clue to the origin of the consecration of these animals to warrant a conclusion that they belonged to her healing character especially. The temple of Athene Itouia, near Coronea, was famous for the meeting of the Boeotian congress. In archaic art Athene was represented (1) as a throned and unarmed deity, which may have been the form in the ξόανον of Athene Polias; (2) as a goddess armed with helmet, shield, and spear, which was the form of the Palladium. The armed type was adopted and idealised by Phidias in his famous statues, the colossal Athene Promachos on the Acropolis [ACROPOLIS] and that of Athene Parthenos, which we know from copies as wearing a high ornamented helmet, the aegis (a goat skin plated with scales, and having the Gorgon's head in the centre) on her breast, carrying the figure of victory in her right hand and resting her left on a shield. Often her helmet is the 'Coriuthian' visored helmet, plain, with openings for eyes and mouth: this helmet she wears on many coins, and in other representations, thrown back on the head: the Attic helmet which she wears on Athenian coins has a high φάλος [see coin on p. 144], but not so high as that of Athene Parthenos, a neck-piece fitting close to the neck, and a narrow guard for the face which can be moved up or down. Her face has a dignified type of beauty with somewhat compressed lips, a broad clear brow, and thoughtful eyes. The characteristic objects often added are the owl, the serpent, and the olive branch.

Athēnae ('Αθήναι, also 'Αθήνη in Homer: 'Αθηναῖος, Athēniensis: Athens), the capital of Attica, is situated about three miles from the sea coast, in the central plain of Attica, which is enclosed by mountains on every side except the south, where it is open to the sea. This plain is bounded and sheltered on the NW. by Mt. Parnes, on the NE. by Mt. Pentelicus, on the SE. by Mt. Hymettus, and on the W. by Mt. Aegaleos. In the southern part of the plain there rise several eminences. Of these the most prominent is a lofty insulated mountain, with a conical peaked summit, now called the Hill of St. George, which used to be identified by topographers with the ancient Anchesmus, but which is now admitted to be the more celebrated Lycabettus. This mountain, which was not included within the ancient walls, lies to the north-east of Athens, and forms the most striking feature in the environs of the city. It is to Athens, as a modern writer has aptly remarked, what Vesuvius is to Naples or Arthur's Seat to Edinburgh. The visitor to Athens is probably surprised when he sees Lycabettus that so little is said of it in Attic writers—in Plato, for instance, that it should only once be mentioned (Crit. p. 112), and then without much distinction. Strabo however, does mention it as being the characteristic height of Athens, as Taygetus was of Sparta, or Atabyris of Rhodes (p. 454). South-west of Lycabettus there are four hills of moderate height, all of which formed part of the city. Of these the nearest to Lycabettus, and at the distance of a mile from the latter, was the Acropolis, or citadel of Athens, a square craggy rock rising abruptly about 150 feet, with a flat summit of about 1000 feet long from east to west, by 500 feet broad from north to south. Immediately west of the Acropolis, is a second hill of irregular form, the Areiopagus. To the south-west there rises a third hill, the Pnyx, on which the assemblies of the citizens were held; and to the south of the latter is a fourth hill, known as the Museum. On the eastern and western sides of the city there run two small streams, both of which are nearly exhausted by the heats of summer and by the channels for artificial irrigation before they reach the sea. The stream on the east, called the Ilissus, was joined by the Eridanus close to the Lyceum outside the walls, and then flowed in a south-westerly direction through the southern quarter of the city. The stream on the west, named the Cephissus, runs due south at a distance of about a mile and a half from the walls. South of the city lay the Saronic gulf and the harbours of Athens. As in the case of most early towns in Greece, and indeed elsewhere, the first settlement was made on the most defensible eminence of the plain, and this was the Acropolis, which was at once a more convenient height and a more convenient shape than the peaked Lycabettus. [See ACROPOLIS.] This was the nucleus round which later Athens grouped itself when it had grown to be the head of a united Attica. [See under ATTICA, CECROPS, THESEUS.] The city was burnt by Xerxes in B.C. 480, but was soon rebuilt under the administration of Themistocles, and was adorned with public buildings by Cimon and especially by Pericles, in whose time (B.C. 460–429) it reached its greatest splendour. Its beauty was chiefly owing to its public buildings, for the private houses were mostly insignificant, and its streets badly laid out. Towards the end of the Peloponnesian war, it contained 10,000 houses (Xen. Mem. iii. 6, 14), which at the rate of 12 inhabitants to a house would give a population of 120,000, though some writers make the inhabitants as many as 180,000. Under the Romans Athens continued to be a great and flourishing city, and retained many privileges and immunities when S. Greece was formed into the Roman province of Achaia. It suffered greatly on its capture by Sulla, B.C. 86, and was deprived of many of its privileges. It was at that time, and also during the early centuries of the Christian era, one of the chief seats of learning, and the Romans were accustomed to send their sons to Athens, as to a University, for the completion of their education. Hadrian, who was very partial to Athens and frequently resided in the city (A.D. 122, 128), adorned it with many new buildings, and his example was followed by Herodes Atticus, who spent large sums of money upon beautifying the city in the reign of M. Aurelius.—Athens consisted of three distinct parts united with one line of fortifications. I. The ACROPOLIS ('Ακρόπολις) or POLIS (Πόλις), also called the Upper City (ἡ ἄνω πόλις), which is described in a separate article [ACROPOLIS]. II. The ASTY (τὸ Ἄστυ), also called the Lower City (ἡ κάτω πόλις) to distinguish it from the Acropolis, surrounded with walls by Themistocles. III. The three harbour-towns of Piræus, Munychia, and Phalærum, also surrounded with walls by Themistocles, and connected with the city by means of the long walls (τὰ μακρὰ τεῖχη), built under the administration of Pericles. The long walls consisted of the wall to Phalærum on the E., 35 stadia long (about 4 miles), and of the wall to Piræus on the W., 40 stadia long (about 4½ miles); between these two, at a short distance from the latter and parallel to it, another wall was erected, thus making two walls leading to the Piræus (sometimes called τὰ σκελη), with a narrow passage between them. There were therefore three long walls in all; but the name of Long Walls seems to have been confined to the two leading to the Piraeus, while the one leading to Phalerum was distinguished by the name of the Phalerian Wall (τὸ Φαληρικὸν τεῖχος). The entire circuit of the walls was 17½ stadia (nearly 22 miles), of which 43 stadia (nearly 5½ miles) belonged to the city, 75 stadia passed over the hill of the Museum including in after times the monument of Philopappus: they then continued a little to the north of the Illissus, including the Olympieum; on the E. they did not extend as far as the Lycæum.—Gates. On the W. side were:—(1) Dipylum (Δίπυλον, more anciently Θριασία or Κεραμικαί), the most frequented gate of the city, leading from the inner Ceramicus to the outer Cera-

(9½ miles) to the long walls, and 56½ (7 miles) to Piræus, Munychia, and Phalerum.—Topography of the Lower City—Walls. The line of the walls surrounding the whole city, which were built by Themistocles (Thuc. i. 90) can be traced with certainty (see map above), and a portion of them is especially noticeable near the Dipylon Gate. On the W. they passed over the hill of the Nymphs and included the Pnyx; on the S. they micus, and to the Academy. It consisted of two gates which with the walls joining them inclosed a rectangular space: hence the name 'double-gate': each gate had double doors with a centre pier: remains of the southern tower which defended the gate are traceable. The name of this gate has been the more celebrated from a find in this spot of a number of vases with geometric pattern which gave the designation 'Dipylon vase' to this class. [Dict. Ant. s. v. Vas.] This was the gate through which the procession to Eleusis passed: hence it is called by Plutarch Ἱεραὶ πύλαι. [It was long supposed that this Sacred Gate was a separate opening: but the opening so explained has been shown to be a watercourse through which the Eridanus flowed.] The name Thriasian was given because it led to the Eleusinian deme Thria. It is probable that the name Ἡραὶ πύλαι, the Gate of the Dead, belonged to this gate also because it led to the Cerameicus. (2) The Piræean Gate (ἡ Πειραιεὶς πύλη: *Plut. outer Cerameicus; the S. part of the inner Cerameicus contained the Agora (ἀγορά), or 'market-place.' The political Agora occupied the space immediately surrounding the Areiopagus and between the Areiopagus, Pnyx and Acropolis, and there also was the market-place of commerce; but as business increased, the market for buying and selling was pushed further out into the Cerameicus N. and NE. to the neighbourhood of the Stoa of Attalos and the Colonos Agoraios (the hill on which the temple falsely called Theseum stands; and in Roman times further East to the Stoa of Hadrian and gate of Athene Arehegetis. This gate of Athene Arehegetis was built from donations of Julius Caesar and Augustus, as an inscription on it records. It seems to mark the SE. entrance to the Agora of the Roman period: whether, as some have conjectured, it was designed to mark some special point in state processions, cannot be determined. The re-

Gate of Diochares (αἱ Διοχάρους πύλαι), leading to the Lyceum.—6. The Diomean Gate (ἡ Διομητῆς πύλη, Aleiphr. iii. 51, 4), leading to Cynosarges and the demus Diomea. On the NE. side: (7) The Acharnian Gate (αἱ Ἀχαρνικαὶ πύλαι), leading to the demus Acharnæa on the North.—8. The Knights' Gate (αἱ Ἴππιδῆς πύλαι, Aleiphr. iii. 51, 4) whose position is not known. Some take it to be an exit near the Olympieum leading to Sunium. There were other unnamed gates: e.g. one leading to the Stadium probably existed. It must be observed that near these gates (great double gates, and therefore usually, though not invariably, spoken of in the plural) there was a postern door (πυλῖς), for foot-passengers: e.g. near the Acharnian Gate (Plat. Lys. p. 203 A).—Chief Districts. The inner Cerameicus (Κεραμεικός), or 'Potters' Quarter,' in the W. of the city, extending N. as far as the gate Dipylon by which it was separated from the mains now extant, standing in the modern 'Poikile Street,' consist of four Doric columns with an architrave and a plain pediment. The demus Melite lay south of the inner Cerameicus, and W. of the Agora, reaching nearly as far as the Museum hill on the south and on the north to the Piræean gate and Colonos Agoraios (Dem. c. Con. p. 1258, § 7; Plut. Parm. 126). The position of the demus Scambonidae is disputed by recent writers. Some place it outside the city; others make it a city deme to the south-west of the Acropolis: the latter view is on the whole the best. The demi Collytus and Cydathenæum cannot be placed with certainty: probably the former lay in the northern part of the city, the latter south of the Acropolis. Coela, a district south of Collytus and the Museum, along the Ilissus, in which were the graves of Cimon and Thucydides. Limnae, a district E. of Melite and Collytus, between the Acropolis and the Ilissus. Diomea, a district in the E. of the city, near the gate of the same name and the Cynosarges. Agrae, a district S. of Diomea. — Hills. The Areiopagus (Ἀρείου πάγος or Ἀρείος πάγος), the 'Hill of Ares,' W. of the Acropolis (traditionally the hill from which the Amazons attacked the Acropolis: Aesch. Eum. 680), which gave its name to the celebrated council that held its sittings there (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), was accessible on the S. side by a flight of steps cut out of the rock. On its N. slope stood a temple of Ares: the chasm on the NE. side near the top is supposed to be the shrine of the Σεμναί (Eumenides) and lower down was the tomb of Oedipus. Traces of primitive houses, of an early date, like those on the Acropolis have been found on this hill. The Hill of the Nymphs, NW. of the Areiopagus, so called because an inscription notes it as sacred to the Nymphs: another has been found on it telling that part of the hill was a precinct of Zeus. The Pnyx (Πνύξ), a semicircular hill, SW. of the Areiopagus, where the assemblies of the people were held in earlier times, for afterwards the people usually met in the Theatre of Dionysus (Dict. Ant. s. v. Ecclesia). The platform for speakers, or bema, which was the basis or steps of an altar to Zeus is still visible with three rows of seats cut in the rock behind still standing, belong to the completed temple of Hadrian (130 A.D.) The well-preserved Doric temple on the rising ground of Colonus Agoraios, which used to be known as 'the temple of Theseus' (Theseum), is probably the temple of Hephaestus (Paus. i. 14, 6). The real temple of Theseus (of which no traces are discovered) stood near the temple of the Dioscuri, which was under the N. side of the Acropolis near the temenos of Agraulos. The Temple of Ares stood on the NW. slope of the Areiopagus. The Metroön (Μητροῶν), or temple of the mother of the gods (in which the state archives were kept) in the Agora on the NW. of the Areiopagus, near the Bouleuterion and Tholos. The temple of Demeter and Kore and that of Triptolemus in the same precinct (Eleusinion) just S. of the Areiopagus; of Artemis Eucleia SE. of the Pnyx; of Aphrodite Pandemos under the SW. of the Acropolis; of Apollo Patroös a little N. of the Metroön; of Dionysus just S. of the Theatre, and of Asclepius, whose site has been excavated (discovering among other remains the ancient well), under the Acropolis to the W. of the Theatre. The temple of Serapis, built after Ptolemy Philadelphus introduced that worship into Greece, seems to have stood NE. of the Acropolis and NW. of the Olympieum. (2) The

it. The Prytanes seated on these faced the people, who stood in a semicircular space (not originally a downward slope) between the bema and the Agora. The Musæum (or hill sacred to the Muses), S. of the Pnyx and the Areiopagus, on which was the monument of PHILOPAPPUS, and where the Macedonians built a fortress.— Streets. Of these we have little information. We read of the Piræean Street, which led from the Piræean gate to the Agora; of the Street of the Hermæ, which was probably an avenue at the N. side of the Agora formed by two lines of Hermæ running towards the Dipylon from the ends of the Stoa Poecilé and the Stoa Basileios respectively; of the Street of the Tripods, on the E. of the Acropolis. This street ran in a curve from the Prytaneum to the eastern entrance of the Theatre: it was bordered on each side by shrines surmounted by the gilt or bronze tripods dedicated by the tribe successful in the choregia. Of these the monument of Lysicrates remains, and the base of another has been discovered.— Public Buildings. (1) Temples. Of these the most important was the Olympiæum (Ὀλυμπίειον), or Temple of the Olympian Zeus, SE. of the Acropolis, near the Ilissus and the fountain Callirrhœ. This temple was begun by Peisistratus and left unfinished by his sons: was carried on further by Antiochus Epiphanes, who employed the architect Cosutius, working in the Corinthian style: of this work traces have been found sufficient to recover the plan of the half-finished temple of Antiochus. The magnificent remains, 15 Corinthian columns

Senate House (βουλευτήριον), next to the Metroön, NW. of the Areiopagus, and on the other side of this nearer the Areiopagus (3) the Tholos (θόλος), a round building with umbrella-shaped roof in which the Prytanes and certain other officials (ἀεῖται) dined in the period after Peisistratus, when the business quarter was shifted to the N. of the Areiopagus [see Dict. Ant. s. v. Prytaneum]. (4) The Prytaneum, in which were the state hearth and sacred fire, and where foreign princes and envoys and specially honoured citizens, and in old times the Prytanes, dined at the state expense [see Dict. Ant. s. v.]. The Prytaneum formerly stood to the SW. of the Acropolis, in what was probably the old Agora. Later, probably after the Roman conquest, the new Prytaneum was built on the NW. side of the Acropolis. In it were preserved Solon's tables of law. (5) Stoae or Halls, supported by pillars, and used as places of resort in the heat of the day, of which there were several in Athens. (Dict. of Ant. art. Porticus.) In the Agora there were three: the Stoa Basileios (στοὰ βασιλείου), the court of the King-Archon, on the W. side of the Agora under the E. slope of the Colonus Agoraios; the Stoa Poecilé (στοὰ ποικίλη), on the N. side of the Agora, so called because it was adorned with fresco painting of the battle of Marathon by Polygnotus; and the Stoa Eleutherius (στοὰ ἐλευθέρου), or Hall of Zeus Eleutherius on the S. side of the Stoa Basileios. The Stoa of Attalus, which has been wrongly called 'the Gymnasium of Ptolemy,' can be identified by an inscription of the epistyle. It was built by Attalos II., and stood, where its remains may now be seen, in the N. part of the Agora near the Stoa Poecile; the Stoa of the Giants, apparently so called from the statues which adorned it, of which there are some remains of different dates, stood about 90 yards to the West of the Stoa of Attalus; the Stoa of Eumenes under the S. rocks of the Acropolis running from the Theatre to the Odeum of Herodes. The so-called 'Stoa of Hadrian' was not strictly a Stoa, but formed part of the north front of the Gymnasium of Hadrian. The extant remains consist of a wall faced with a row of seven Corinthian columns. This formed the eastern portion of the north front. In the centre was originally a portico giving access to the interior, and to the west of that a wall faced with columns corresponding to what is now called Hadrian's Stoa. The excavations, carried as far as the modern 'Aeolus' Street, show that the gymnasium was of great size. Pausanias (i. 18, 9) says that it had 100 columns of African marble. (6) Theatres. The Theatre of Dionysus, on the SE. slope of the Acropolis, was the great theatre of the state (Dict. of Ant. s.v. Theatrum); besides this there were three Odēa (ὄδεια), for contests in vocal and instrumental music (Dict. of Ant. s.v.), an ancient one near the fountain Enneacronnos [see below], a second built by Pericles, close to the Theatre of Dionysus, on the SE. slope of the Acropolis, and a third built by Herodes Atticus, in honour of his wife Regilla, on the SW. slope of the Acropolis, of which there are still considerable remains. (7) Stadium (τὸ Στάδιον), S. of the Ilissus, in the district Agrae. Its site has been fixed by the excavations of 1870. It is said to date from the time of the orator Lycurgus, and to have been greatly improved and adorned with marble by Herodes. It is supposed to have had room for 40,000 spectators. Between the actual Stadium and the river remains of a portico are traced. (8) Monuments. The Monument of Andronicus Cyrrhestes, called the Tower of the Winds, an octagonal building N. of the Acropolis, still extant, was a horologium. (Dict. of Ant. art. Horologium.) In the interior of this octagonal tower was a water-clock, which is said to have been served with water from the Clepsydra well on the Acropolis. Part of a covered aqueduct is traceable. The Choragic Monument of Lysicrates, frequently but erroneously called the Lantern of Demosthenes, still extant, in the Street of the Tripods (see above). The Monument of Nicias (Choragus of boys in B.C. 320), of which the foundations are thought to be identified close to the Odeum of Herodes. Fragments of the façade were discovered built into the 'Beule' Gate. It is probable that this Choragic monument was pulled down to make room for the road when this odeum was built. The Monument of Thrasyllus, victor with a chorus of men in the same year (320), stood against a cave in the rock above the Theatre of Dionysus. It seems to have been nearly perfect up to the Turkish siege in 1826: there are still remains of pilasters and three inscriptions. The statues of the Eponymi (the heroes who gave their names to Attic tribes) stood in the Agora probably just to the E. of the Areiopagus and S. of the Tholos: those of Harmodius and Aristogeiton a little nearer to the Hill of the Nymphs.—Fountains. The wells of Asclepius, of the Eumenides on the Areiopagus and the Clepsydra on the Acropolis have been noticed above. Of still greater topographical and literary importance are the springs Callirrhoe and Enneacronnos about which there has been some confusion. The true account seems to be that Enneacronnos ('Nine Conduits') was between the Areiopagus and the Pnyx, near the SW. corner of the former, being the water supply of the ancient Agora: the traces of the conduit made by Peisistratus are found here. It once bore the common name for springs, Callirrhoe, and this has caused a confusion with the Athenian Callirrhoe oftenest mentioned (Thuc. ii. 15; Hdt. vi. 137; Plat. Phaedr. 229), which was near the banks of the Ilissus, between that stream and the Olympieum, the vaults of which temple are connected by a subterranean passage with the spring. This Callirrhoe still bears the same name. In Plato's day there was already a confusion between the two springs in connexion with the legend of Oreithyia.—Suburbs. The Outer Ceramicus (ὁ ἔξω καλούμενος), NW. of the city, was the finest suburb of Athens; originally the 'Potters' Quarter' had been one single district, but the wall of Themistocles cut off the Inner from the Outer Ceramicus at the Dipylon Gate; through this suburb passed the sacred road to Eleusis, and at the gate another road branched to the ACADEMIA which stood at the further end of the district, six stadia from the city. The Outer Ceramicus was used as a burial-place, and here those who had fallen in war had a public funeral and a monument (cf. Thuc. ii. 34; Aristoph. Av. 394; Dem. de Cor. § 297). A vast number of sculptured grave stones and inscriptions have been found here. Of these monuments the finest were just outside the Dipylon Gate, where they had been preserved by the débris of ruin and rubbish caused by Sulla's destruction of the neighbouring wall, under which they lay buried till 1863. Cynosarges (τὸ Κυνόσαργες), E. of the city, outside the gate Diomea, a gymnasium sacred to Heracles, where Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school, taught. Lyceum (τὸ Λύκειον), SE. of the Cynosarges, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lyceus, where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught. Others place the Lyceum a little to the North of the Cynosarges. No certain means of identification have yet been discovered. The Gardens (κῆποι) and temple of Aphrodite were close to the right bank of the Ilissus (on the opposite side to the Stadium), between the city wall and the river. Here was the famous statue of Aphrodite by Alcamenes.

Coin of Athens.

Athēnæum. 1. In Arcadia, near Megalopolis (Paus. viii. 44; Plut. Cleom. 4).—2. In Epirus, in the district of Athamania (Liv. xxviii. 1).

Athēnæus (Ἀθήναιος). 1. A learned Greek grammarian, of Naucratis in Egypt, lived about A.D. 230, first at Alexandria and afterwards at Rome. His extant work is entitled the Deipnosophistæ (Δειπνσοφισταί), i.e. the Banquet of the Learned, in 15 books, of which the first 2 books, and parts of the 3rd, 11th, and 15th, exist only in an Epitome. The work may be considered one of the earliest collections of what are called Ana, being an immense mass of anecdotes, extracts from the writings of poets, historians, dramatists, philosophers, orators, and physicians, of facts in natural history, criticisms, and discussions on almost every conceivable subject, especially on Gastronomy. Athenæus represents himself as describing to his friend Timocrates a full account of the conversation at a banquet at Rome, at which Galen, the physician, and Ulpian, the jurist, were among the guests.—Editions. By Casaubon, Genev. 1897; by Schweighäuser, Argentorati, 1801–1807; by W. Dindorf, Lips. 1827; by Meineke, Lips. 1867.—2. A contemporary of Archimedes, wrote a work on military engines (περὶ μηχανημάτων), addressed to Marcellus; edited by C. Wescher, 1867.—3. A celebrated physician, founder of the medical sect of the Pneumatici, born at Attalia in Cilicia, practised at Rome about A.D. 50 (ed. C. Kühn, 1867).

Athēnägōras (Ἀθηναγόρας), an Athenian philosopher, converted to Christianity in the second cent. A.D. [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Athēnāis (Ἀθηναίς). 1. Surnamed Philostorgus, wife of Ariobarzanes II., king of Cappadocia, and mother of Ariobarzanes III. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 4).—2. Daughter of Leontius, afterwards named EUDOCIA.

Athēnion (Ἀθηνίων), a Cilician, one of the commanders of the slaves in the second Servile War in Sicily, defeated L. Licinius Lucullus, but was at length conquered and killed B.C. 101 by the consul M. Aquilius (Flor. iii. 19).

Athēnōdōrus (Ἀθηνώδωρος). 1. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher surnamed Cordylion, was the keeper of the library at Pergamus, and afterwards removed to Rome, where he lived with M. Cato, at whose house he died (Strab. p. 674; Plut. Cat. Min. 10).—2. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, surnamed Cananites, from Caua in Cilicia, the birthplace of his father. He was a pupil of Posidonius at Rhodes, and taught at Apollonia in Epirus, where the young Octavius (subsequently the emperor Augustus) was one of his disciples. He accompanied the latter to Rome, and became one of his intimate friends. In his old age he returned to Tarsus, where he died at the age of eighty-two. He was the author of several works, which are not extant (Suet. Claud. 4; Strab. p. 674).—3. A sculptor, the son and pupil of Agesander of Rhodes, whom he assisted in executing the group of Laocoon. [AGESANDER.]

Athesis (Adige or Etsch), rises in the Rhaetian Alps, receives the Atâgis (Eisach), flows through Upper Italy, past Verona, and falls into the Adriatic by many mouths (Strab. p. 207).

Athmōne (Ἀθμονή, also Ἀθμονία and Ἀθμονον: Ἀθμονεύς, fem. Ἀθμονίς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Cecropis, afterwards to the tribe Attalis.

Athōs (Ἄθως, also Ἄθων: Ἀθωίτης: Haghion

Oros, Monte Santo, i.e. Holy Mountain), the mountainous peninsula, also called Acte, which projects from Chaldice in Macedonia. It is mentioned in Il. xiv. 229. At the extremity of the peninsula the mountain rises abruptly from the sea to a height of 6349 feet; there is no anchorage for ships at its base, and the voyage round it was so dreaded by mariners that Xerxes had a canal cut through the isthmus which connects the peninsula with the mainland, to afford a passage to his fleet (Hdt. vii. 23; Thuc. iv. 109; Diod. xi. 1; Mel. ii. 2, 10). The isthmus is about 1½ mile across; and there are distinct traces of the canal still to be seen; so that we must not imitate the scepticism of Juvenal (x. 174), who refused to believe that the canal was ever cut. The peninsula contained several flourishing cities in antiquity, and is now studded with numerous monasteries, cloisters, and chapels, whence it derives its modern name. In these monasteries some valuable MSS. of ancient authors have been discovered.

Athribis (Ἀθριβίς), a city in the Delta of Egypt; capital of the Nomos Athribites.

Atia, mother of AUGUSTUS.

Atilia or Atillia Gens, the principal members of which are given under their surnames CALPURNIUS, REGULUS, and SERRANUS.

Atilicinus, a Roman jurist of the first cent. A.D., is referred to in the Digest.

Atilius or Acilius. 1. L., one of the earliest of the Roman jurists who gave public instruction in law, probably lived about B.C. 100. In Pompon. Dig. i. 2, 2, 38, he appears as Atilius, but in Cic. de Senect. 2, 6 as Acilius. He wrote commentaries on the laws of the Twelve Tables.—2. M., one of the early Roman poets, wrote comedies imitated from the Greek (palviatae) about 200 B.C. (Cic. ad Att. xiv. 20). He is probably the translator of Soph. Electra (Cic. Fin. i. 2, 5).

Atina (Atīnas, -ātis: Atina), a town of the Volsci in Latium, afterwards a Roman colony (Verg. Aen. viii. 6, 30; Plin. xxii. 11).

Atintānes (Ἀτιντάνες), an Epirot people in Illyria, on the borders of Macedonia; their country, Atintania, was rekoned part of Macedonia (Thuc. ii. 80; Liv. xlv. 30).

Atius Varus. [VARUS.]

Atlanticum Mære. [OCEANUS.]

Atlantis (Ἀτλαντίς, sc. νῆσος), according to an ancient tradition, a great island W. of the Pillars of Hercules in the Ocean, opposite Mount Atlas: it possessed a numerous population, and was adorned with every beauty; its powerful princes invaded Africa and Europe, but were defeated by the Athenians and their allies; its inhabitants afterwards became wicked and impious, and the island was in consequence swallowed up in the ocean in a day and a night. This legend is given by Plato in the Timæus, and is said to have been related to Solon by the Egyptian priests. There was an old legend of a victory of Athens over the Atlantenes, which was worked on a peplos at the Panathenaea. (Schol. ad Plat. Rep. 327; Diod. iii. 53.) The Canary Islands, or the Azores, which perhaps were visited by the Phoenicians, may have given rise to the legend; but some modern writers regard it as indicative of a vague belief in antiquity in the existence of the W. hemisphere. (Plat. Tim. p. 24, Crit. pp. 108, 113.)

Atlas (Ἄτλας), son of Iapetus and Clymene, and brother of Prometheus and Epimetheus. He made war with the other Titans upon Zeus, and being conquered, was condemned to bear heaven on his head and hands, standing in the far west where day and night meet, at the apparent junction of sky and sea. (Hes. Th. 517, 746.) According to Homer (Od. i. 52, vii. 245), Atlas bears the long columns which keep asunder heaven and earth (or, as some interpret, he was merely in charge of the pillars which keep apart, or which support on both sides), and he seems to be imagined there as a giant standing on the floor of the sea; he is in that account the father of Calypso. It does not follow that Homer's idea of holding the pillars is necessarily older than the simpler idea of Hesiod, which makes Atlas himself the pillar; and no explanation of the myth is preferable to that which assumes it to have arisen from the idea that lofty mountains supported the heaven. Later traditions distort the original idea still more, by making Atlas a man who was metamorphosed into a mountain. Thus Ovid (Met. iv. 626 seq.) relates that Perseus came to Atlas and asked for shelter, which Calypso, Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. Atlas was represented as bearing a burden on his shoulders: in earlier times, before the idea of a sphere obtained, merely a rude mass of rock; later, a sphere with zodiacal signs.—Atlantides, a descendant of Atlas, especially Mercury, his grandson by Maia (comp. Mercuri facunde nepos Atlantis, Hor. Od. i. 10), and Hermaphroditus, son of Mercury.—Atlantias and Atlantis, a female descendant of Atlas, especially the Pleiades and Hyades.

Atlas Mons (Ἄτλας : Atlas), was the general name of the great mountain range which covers the surface of N. Africa between the Mediterranean and Great Desert (Sahara), on the N. and S., and the Atlantic and the Lesser Syrtis on the W. and E.; the mountain chains S.E. of the Lesser Syrtis, though connected with the Atlas, do not properly belong to it, and were called by other names (Hdt. iv. 184). The N. and S. ranges of this system were distinguished by the names of Atlas Minor and Atlas Major: and a distinction was made between the 3 regions into which they divided the country. [AFRICA.]

Atossa (Ἄτοσσα), daughter of Cyrus, and wife successively of her brother Cambyses, of Smerdis the Magian, and of Darius Hystaspis, over whom she possessed great influence. She bore Darius 4 sons, Xerxes, Masistes, Achæmenes, and Hystaspes. (Hdt. iii. 68, 133; Aesch. Pers.)

Atræ or Hatra (Ἄτρα, τὰ Ἄτρα : Ἄτρηνός, Atræ : Hatr, SW. of Mosul), a strongly fortified city on a high mountain in Mesopotamia, inhabited by people of the Arab race.

Atratinus, Sempronius. 1. A., consul B.C. 497 and 491.—2. L., consul 444 and censor 443.—3. C., consul 423, fought unsuccessfully against the Volscians, and was in consequence condemned to pay a heavy fine.—4. L., accused M. Caelius Rufus, whom Cicero defended, 57 (pro Cael. 1, 3, 7).

Atrax (Ἄτραξ), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, inhabited by the Perrhaebi, so called from the mythical Atrax, son of Penëus and Bura, and father of Hippodamia and Caenis (Liv. xxxii. 15).

Atrebates (Ἀτρέβατοι), a people in Gallia Belgica, in the modern Artois, a corruption of their name. In Caesar's time (B.C. 57) they numbered 15,000 warriors: their capital was NEMETOCENNA. Part of them crossed over to Britain, where they dwelt in the upper valley of the Thames. (Caes. B.G. ii. 4, 16, 23.)

Atreus (Ἀτρέυς), son of Pelops and Hippodamia, grandson of Tantalus, and brother of Thyestes and Nicippe. [PELOPS.] He was first married to Cleola, by whom he became the father of Plisthenes; then to Aërope, the widow of his son Plisthenes, who was the mother of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia, either by Plisthenes or by Atreus [AGAMEMNON]; and lastly to Pelopia, the daughter of his brother Thyestes. In Homer there is no hint of tragedy: Atreus dies, leaving the kingdom to Thyestes 'rich in flocks' (Il. ii. 105); but in the post-Homeric epics a story appears which was adopted by the Tragedians. The strife with Thyestes is first traceable to a golden lamb, which Hermes gave as the pledge of sovereignty to the possessor (cf. Aesch. Ag. 1585; Eur. Or. 938, El. 719). In consequence of the murder of their half-brother Chrysippus, Atreus and Thyestes were obliged to take to flight; they were hospitably received at Mycenæ (Thuc. i. 9); and, after the death of

was refused, whereupon Perseus, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into M. Atlas, on which rested heaven with all its stars. Others try to rationalise, and represent Atlas as a powerful king, who possessed great knowledge of the courses of the stars, and who was the first who taught men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as a merely figurative mode of speaking. (Diod. iii. 60, iv. 27; Paus. ix. 20.) At first, the story of Atlas referred to one mountain only, which was believed to exist on the extreme boundary of the earth; but, as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was transferred to other places, and thus we read of a Mauretanian, Italian, Arcadian, and even of a Caucasian, Atlas. The common opinion, however, was, that the heaven-bearing Atlas was in the NW. of Africa. [See below.] Atlas was the father of the Pleiades by Pleione or by Hesperis; of the Hyades and Hesperides by Aëthra; and of Oenomaus and Maia by Sterope. Dione and Eurystheus, Atreus became king of Mycenae. Thyestes seduced Aërope, the wife of Atreus, and was in consequence banished by his brother: from his place of exile he sent Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, whom he had brought up as his own child, in order to slay Atreus; but Plisthenes fell by the hands of Atreus, who did not know that he was his own son. In order to take revenge, Atreus, pretending to be reconciled to Thyestes, recalled him to Mycenae, killed his 2 sons, and placed their flesh before their father at a banquet, who unwittingly partook of the horrid meal. Thyestes fled with horror, and the gods cursed Atreus and his house. The kingdom of Atreus was now visited by famine, and the oracle advised Atreus to call back Thyestes. Atreus, vainly searching for him in the land of king Thesprotus, married as his third wife, Pelopia, the daughter of Thyestes, whom he believed to be a daughter of Thesprotus. Pelopia was at the time with child by her own father. This child, Aegisthus, afterwards slew Atreus because the latter had commanded him to slay his own father Thyestes. [ÆGISTHUS.]

Atria. [ADRIA.]

Atrides (Ἀτρείδης), a descendant of Atreus, especially Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Atropātēnē (Ἀτροπατηνή), or Media Atropatia the NW. part of Media, adjacent to Armenia, named after Atropātes, a native of the country, who, having been made its governor by Alexander, founded there a kingdom, which long remained independent alike of the Seleucidae, the Parthians, and the Romans, but was at last subdued by the Parthians (Strab. p. 523; Just. xiii. 4).

Atropātes (Ἀτροπάτης), a Persian satrap, fought at the battle of Gaugamela, B.C. 331, and after the death of Darius, was made satrap of Media by Alexander. His daughter was married to Perdiccas in 324; and he received from his father-in-law, after Alexander's death, the province of the Greater Media. (Diod. xviii. 3; Arrian, iv. 18.) [ATROPATENE.]

Atropos. [ΜΟΙΡΑ.]

Atta, T. Quintius, a poet of the national or Roman Comedy (togata), which represented Italian scenes, died B.C. 77. He is praised for his vivid delineation of character. Horace (Ep. ii. 1, 79) speaks of his plays as acted in his time.

Attaginus (Ἀτταγίνος), son of Phrynon, a Theban, betrayed Thebes to Xerxes, B.C. 480. After the battle of Plataeae (479) the other Greeks required Attaginus to be delivered up to them, but he made his escape. (Hdt. ix. 88; Paus. vii. 10.)

Attālia (Ἀττάλεια: Ἀτταλεῶτις or -ατής).—1. A city of Lydia, formerly called Agroira (Ἀγρόειρα), and refounded by one of the kings of Pergamus.—2. (Adalia), a city on the coast of Pamphylia, for which it was the port, near the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, founded by Attalus II. Philadelphus, and subdued by the Romans under P. Servilius Isauricus (Strab. p. 667).

Attālus (Ἀτταλος). 1. A Macedonian, uncle of Cleopatra, whom Philip married in B.C. 337. At the nuptials of his niece, Attalus offered an insult to Alexander, and, on the accession of the latter, was put to death by his order in Asia Minor, whither Philip had previously sent him to secure the Greek cities to his cause (Diod. xvii. 2).—2. Son of Andromenes the Stymphæan, and one of Alexander's officers; after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he served under Perdiccas, whose sister, Atalante, he had married; and after the death of Perdiccas (321), he joined Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas; but their united forces were defeated in Pisidia by Antigonus in 320.—3. Kings of Pergamus.—(I.) Nephew of PHILETAERUS, succeeded his cousin, Eumenes I., and reigned B.C. 241–197. He made head against the Gauls, and assumed the title of king after his success (Strab. p. 624; Liv. xxxviii. 16). He gained much of the territory of the Seleucidae. He took part with the Romans against Philip and the Achaeans. In 201 he fought with the Rhodians against Philip, whose attack on Pergamus he repelled. He died in 197, when he was joining the Romans against Philip.

Coin of Attalus I.

Obv., head of Philetaerus, the founder of the dynasty; rev., Athena, seated, crowning with wreath name of PHILETAERVS between bunch of grapes and A.

He was celebrated not only in war, but for his encouragement of literature and art. He founded the library of Pergamus: the Pergamene sculpture began with representations of his Gallic victories, one of which is the dying Gaul (the so-called Gladiator) of the Capitolino Museum.—(II.) Surnamed Philadelphus, 2nd son of Attalus I., succeeded his brother Eumenes II., and reigned 159–133. Like his father he was an ally of the Romans, and he also encouraged the arts and sciences.—(III.) Surnamed Philometor, son of Eumenes II. and Stratonice, succeeded his uncle Attalus II., and reigned 138–133. He is known to us chiefly for the extravagance of his conduct and the murder of his relations and friends. In his will he made the Romans his heirs; but his kingdom was claimed by Aristonicus. [ARISTONICUS.]—4. Roman emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by Alaric, but was deposed by the latter, after a reign of one year (A.D. 409, 410), on account of his acting without Alaric's advice.—5. A Stoic philosopher in the reign of Tiberius, was one of the teachers of Seneca, who speaks of him in the highest terms (Ep. 108).

Atthis or Attis (Ἄτθις or Ἄττις), daughter of Crauaus, from whom Attica was believed to have derived its name. The two birds into which Philomela and her sister Procne were metamorphosed were likewise called Attis. [PHILOMELA.]

Attica (ἡ Ἀττικὴ, sc. γῆ), a division of Greece, has the form of a triangle, two sides of which are washed by the Aegaean sea, while the third is separated from Boeotia on the N. by the mountains Cithaeron and Parnes. Megaris, which bounds it on the NW., was formerly a part of Attica. In ancient times it was called Acte and Actice (Ἀκτὴ and Ἀκτικὴ), or the 'coastland' [ACTE], from which the later form Attica is said to have been derived: but according to traditions it derived its name from Atthis, the daughter of the mythical king Crauaus. Attica is divided by many ancient writers into

3 districts. 1. The Highlands (ἡ διακρία, also ὄρεινὴ Ἀττικὴ), the NE. of the country, containing the range of Parnes and extending S. to the promontory Cynosura: the only level part of this district was the small plain of Marathon opening to the sea. 2. The Plain (ἡ πεδία, τὸ πῆδιον), the NW. of the country, included both the plain round Athens and the plain round Eleusis, and extended S. to the promontory Zoster. 3. The Sea-coast District (ἡ παραλία), the S. part of the country, terminating in the promontory Sunium. Besides these 3 divisions we also read of a 4th, The Midland District (μεσόγαια), still called Me-sogia, an undulating plain in the middle of the country, bounded by M. Pentelicus on the N., M. Hymettus on the W., and the sea on the E. The soil of Attica is not very fertile: the greater part of it is not adapted for growing corn; but it produces olives, figs, and grapes, especially the 2 former, in great perfection. The country is dry: the chief river is the Cephissus, which rises in Parnes and flows through the Atheian plain. The abundance of wild flowers in the country made the honey of M. Hymettus very celebrated in antiquity. Excellent marble was obtained from the quarries of Pentelicus, NE. of Athens, and a considerable supply of silver from the mines of Laurium near Sunium. The area of Attica, including the island of Salamis, which belonged to it, contained between 700 and 800 square miles; and its population in its flourishing period was probably about 500,000, of which nearly 4-5ths were slaves. Attica is said to have been originally divided into 12 independent states (traditionally by Cecrops), which Philochorus names as Cecropia (=Atheus), Eleusis, Epacria, Declea, Aphidnae, Thoricus, Brauron, Cythera, Sphettus, Cephisia, Phalerum, and the Tetropolis of N. Attica, formed by Marathon, Oenoe, Tricorythus, and Probalinthus, and occupied by settlers of Dorian origin. These 12 communities probably present the names of the most important places in early times, and are marked by various local sacred rites, which reappear in the mythology of literature. To Theseus is ascribed the union of Attica, which is thought to have been effected by an immigration of Ionian maritime people who combined with the old inhabitants of 'Cecropia' in uniting the other districts with Athens as the head. At some time, which seems to be the period of Ionian immigration, the people were divided (in Ionian fashion) into 4 tribes: Gelcontes, Hopletes, Argadeis, Aegico-reis, a distribution which tradition assigns to Ion; but there was also a triple division (Dorian fashion) into Eupatridae or nobles, Geomori or husbandmen, and Demiurgi or artisans: each of the 4 tribes seems to have had this threefold composition. Clisthenes (B.C. 510) abolished the old tribes and created 10 new ones, according to a geographical division: these tribes were subdivided into 174 demi, townships or communes. (For details, see Dict. of Ant. art. Tribus.)

Atticus Herodes, Tibérius Claudius, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, born about A.D. 104, at Marathou in Attica. He taught rhetoric both at Athens and at Rome, and his school was frequented by the most distinguished men of the age. The future emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus were among his pupils, and Antoninus Pius raised him to the consulship in 143. He possessed immense wealth, a great part of which he spent in embellishing Athens, where he built the Odeum (Dict. Ant. s.v. Theatrum), and a Stadium. [ATHENÆ.] He made gifts also of building and sculpture to Corinth, Olympia, and Delphi (Paus. i. 19, ii. 1, vi. 21, x. 32.) He had a friendship, sometimes interrupted, with Φρόντο. He died in 180. He wrote numerous works, none of which have come down to us, with the exception of an oration, entitled Περὶ πολιτείας, the genuineness of which, however, is very doubtful. It is printed in the collections of the Greek orators, and by Fiorillo, in Herodis Attici quæ supersunt, Lips. 1801.

Atticus, T. Pompōnius, a Roman eques, born at Rome, B.C. 109. His proper name after his adoption by Q. Caecilius, the brother of his mother, was Q. Caecilius Pomponianus Atticus. His surname, Atticus, was given him on account of his long residence in Athens and his intimate acquaintance with the Greek language and literature. He was educated along with L. Torquatus, the younger C. Marius, and M. Cicero. Soon after the breaking out of the civil war between Marius and Sulla, he resolved to take no part in the contest, and accordingly removed to Athens. During the remainder of his life, he kept aloof from all political affairs, and thus lived on the most intimate terms with the most distinguished men of all parties. He was equally the friend of Caesar and Pompey, of Brutus and Cassius, of Antony and Augustus; but his most intimate friend was Cicero, whose correspondence with him, beginning in 68 and continued down to Cicero's death, is one of the most valuable remains of antiquity. He returned to Rome in 65, when he came into possession of the inheritance from Caecilius. He purchased an estate at Buthrotum in Epirus, between which place, Athens and Rome, he divided the greater part of his time, engaged in literary pursuits and in commercial undertakings, by which he greatly increased his wealth. He died at Rome in 32, at the age of 77, of voluntary starvation, when he found that he was attacked by an incurable illness. His wife, Pilia, to whom he was married in 56, when he was 53 years of age, bore him only one child, a daughter, Pomponia or Caecilia, whom Cicero sometimes calls Attica and Atticula. She was married in the lifetime of her father to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. The sister of Atticus, Pomponia, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator. The life of Atticus by Cornelius Nepos is to be regarded rather as a panegyric upon an intimate friend, than strictly speaking a biography. In philosophy Atticus belonged to the Epicurean sect. He was thoroughly acquainted with the whole circle of Greek and Roman literature. So high an opinion was entertained of his taste and critical acumen, that many of his friends, especially Cicero, were accustomed to send him their works for revision and correction. None of his own writings have come down to us.

Attila (Ἀττίλας or Ἀττίλας, German Etzel, Hungarian Ethele), king of the Huns, attained in A.D. 434, with his brother Bleda (in German Blödel), to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China, and to the command of an army of at least 500,000 barbarians. He gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of 'the Scourge of God.' His career divides itself into two parts. The first (A.D. 445-450) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic and the negotiations with Theodosius II., which followed upon it. They were ended by a treaty which ceded to Attila a large territory S. of the Danube and an annual tribute. The second part of his career was the invasion of the Western empire (450-452). He crossed the Rhine at Strassburg, but was defeated at Châlons by Aëtius, and Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, in 451. He then crossed the Alps, and took Aquileia in 452, after a siege of 3 months, but he did not attack Rome, in consequence, it is said, of his interview with Pope Leo the Great. He recrossed the Alps towards the end of the year, and died in 453, on the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, Mycolth, by the bursting of a blood-vessel. In person Attila was, like the Mongolian race in general, a short thickset man, of stately gait, with a large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald with the exception of a few white hairs, his eyes small, but of great brilliancy and quickness. (Priscus, 83-76; Jornand. de Reb. Get. 32-50.)

Attilius. [ATTILIUS.]

Attis, Atys, or Attin (Ἄττις, or Ἄττις). 1. A Phrygian deity belonging to the myth of the Phrygian 'Great Mother' [CYBELE]. In the mystical Eastern story current at Pessinus Agdistis had been mutilated by the gods, and from the blood sprang an almond tree, whose fruit was gathered by Nana, the daughter of the river-god Sangarius. She bore a son, the beautiful Attis (who in Ovid's version is the son of Nana and a shepherd), who was reared by goats in the mountains. Agdistis, who in this story becomes identified with Cybele, fell in love with him [other versions represent a rivalry between two personages, Cybele and Agdistis], and when Attis wished to marry the daughter of the king of Pessinus (or the nymph Sagaritis), the goddess drove him mad, so that he mutilated himself beneath a pine tree, into which his spirit passed; at its foot violets sprang up from his blood (Paus. vii. 17; Diod. iii. 58; Arnob. adv. Gent. v. 5; Catull. 63; Ov. Fast. iv. 223). The fir tree wreathed with violets became a sacred emblem of Attis in the wild festivals of Cybele, whose priests, in memory of Attis, were eunuchs. Attis dead was mourned for two days, and then a feast of joy was celebrated for his recovery. [For the history of these ceremonies at Rome see Dict. Ant. s. v. Megalensia.] There is much resemblance in the character of this myth, though not in its details, to the Eastern myth of Adonis. It symbolises the growth of life in nature, especially of plant and tree life, its death and its resurrection, as well as the twofold character of natural production, the male and the female. [For some further mysteries connected with these rites see Dict. Ant. s. v. Taurobovium.]—2. Son of Manes, king of the Maeonians, from whose son Lydus, his son and successor, the Maeonians were afterwards called Lydians.—3. A Latin chief, son of Alba, and father of Capys, from whom the Atia gens derived its origin, and from whom Augustus was believed to be descended on his mother's side.—4. Son of Croesus, slain by ADRASTUS.

Attius. [ACCIIUS.]

Attius or Attus Navius. [NAVIUS.]

Attius Tullius. [TULLIUS.]

Atüría (Ἀτροπία). [ASSYRIA.]

Atürus (Adour), a river in Aquitania, rises in the Pyrenees and flows through the territory of the Tarbelli into the ocean.

Atymnius (Ἀτύμνιος or Ἀτυμνός), son of Zeus and Cassiopaëa, a beautiful boy, beloved by Sarpedon. Others call him son of Phoenix. He was worshipped especially at Gortyna. When Sarpedon quarrelled with Miuos he took Atymnius with him to Asia Minor, where he seems to be identified with MILETUS.

Aufidēna (Aufidēnas, -ātis: Alfidena), a town in Samnium on the river Sagrus.

Aufidius. 1. Cn., a learned historian, celebrated by Cicero (Tusc. v. 38; Fin. v. 19) for the equanimity with which he bore blindness, was quaestor B.C. 119, tribunus plebis 114, and finally praetor 103.—2. T., a jurist, quaestor B.C. 86, and afterwards propraetor in Asia.—

3. Bassus. [BASSUS].—4. Lurco. [LURCO].—5. Orestes. [ORESTES.]

Aufidus (Ofanto), the principal river of Apulia, rises in the Apennines, in the territory of the Hirpiui in Samnium, flows at first with a rapid current (hence violens and acer, Hor. Od. iii. 30, 10, Sat. i. 1, 58), and then more slowly (stagna Aufida, Sil. Ital. x. 171), into the Adriatic. Venusia, the birthplace of Horace, was on the Aufidus.

Augärus. [ABGARUS.]

Auge or Augia (Ἀύγη or Ἀυγεία), daughter of Aleus and Neaera, was a priestess of Athene, and mother by Heracles of TELEPHUS. She afterwards married Teuthras, king of the Mysians.

Augēas or Augias (Ἀυγέας or Ἀυγείας), son of Phorbas or Helios (the Sun), and king of the Epeans in Elis. He had a herd of 3000 oxen, whose stalls had not been cleansed for thirty years. It was one of the labours imposed upon Heracles by Eurystheus to cleanse these stalls in one day. As a reward the hero was to receive the tenth part of the oxen; but when he had accomplished his task by leading the rivers Alpheus and Peueus through the stables, Augēas refused to keep his promise. Heracles thereupon killed him and his sons, with the exception of Phyleus, who was placed on the throne of his father. (Paus. v. 1, 7; Theoc. 25; Diod. iv. 13; Apollod. ii. 5.) Another tradition represents Augēas as dying a natural death at an advanced age, and as receiving heroic honours from Oxylys (Paus. v. 3, 4).

Augila (τὰ Ἀύγίλα: Aujilah), an oasis in the Great Desert of Africa, about 3½° S. of Cyrene, and 10 days' journey W. of the Oasis of Ammon, abounding in date palms, to gather the fruit of which a tribe of the Nasamoues, called Augilae (Ἀυγίλαι), resorted to the Oasis, which at other times was uninhabited (Hdt. iv. 172).

Augurinus, Genucius. 1. T., consul B.C. 451, and a member of the first decemvirate in the same year.—2. M., his brother, consul 445.

Augurinus, Minucius. 1. M., consul B.C. 497 and 491. He took an active part in the defence of Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in 491, but was unable to obtain his acquittal.—2. L., consul 458, carried on war against the Aequians, and was surrounded by the enemy on Mt. Algidus, but was delivered by the dictator CINCINNATUS.—3. L., was appointed praefect of the corn-market (praefectus annonae) 439, as the people were suffering from grievous famine. The ferment occasioned by the assassination of Sp. Maelius in this year was appeased by Augurinus, who is said to have gone over to the plebs from the patricians, and to have been chosen by the tribunes one of their body. Augurinus lowered the price of corn in three market days, fixing as the maximum an as for a modius. The people in their gratitude presented him with an ox having its horns gilt, and erected a statue to his honour outside the Porta Trigemina. (Liv. iv. 12-16.)

Augusta, the name of several towns founded or colonised by Augustus. 1. A. Asturica. [ASTURES.]—2. A. Emerita (Merida), in Lusitania on the Anas (Guadiana), colonised by Augustus with the veterans (emeriti) of the fifth and tenth legions, was a place of considerable importance, and the capital of Lusitania (Strab. pp. 151, 156; Dio Cass. liii. 26; Aus. Ord. Nob. Urb. 8).—3. A. Firma. [ASTIGI.]—4. A. Praetoria (Aosta), a town of the Salassi in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Graian and Pennine Alps, colonised by Augustus with soldiers of the praetorian cohorts. The modern town still contains many Roman remains; the most important of which are the town gates and a triumphal arch. (Strab. p. 106; Dio Cass. liii. 25).—5. A. Rauracorum (Augst), the capital of the Rauraci, colonised by Munatius Plancus B.C. 44, was on the left of the Rhine near the modern Basle: the ruins of a Roman amphitheatre are still to be seen. Its first name was Colonia Raurica: the title Augusta was added under Augustus.—6. A. Suessorum (Soissons), the capital of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the Noviodunum of Caesar (B.G. ii. 12).—7. A. Taurinorum (Turin), more anciently called Taurasia, the capital of the Taurini on the Po, was an important town in the time of Hannibal, and was colonised by Augustus (Polyb. iii. 60; Tac. Hist. ii. 66). Its importance was greatly owing to the fact that it led to the passes of the Cottian Alps, the M. Genève, and the M. Ceuis. [ALPES.]—8. Trevirorum. [TREVIRI.]—9. Tricastinorum (Aouste), the capital of the Tricastini in Gallia Narbonensis.—10. A. Vindelicorum (Augsburg), capital of Vindelicia or Rhaetia Secunda on the Lisus (Lech), colonised by Drusus under Augustus, after the conquest of Rhaetia, B.C. 14.

Augustus, the first Roman emperor, was born on the 23rd of September, B. C. 63, and was the son of C. Octavius by Atia, a daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar. His original name was C. Octavius, and, after his adoption by his great-uncle, C. Julius Caesar Octavianus; the title Augustus was given him by the senate and the people in 27 as a mark of peculiar rank and claim to veneration. Octavius lost his father at 4 years of age, but his education was conducted with great care by his grandmother Julia, and by his mother and stepfather, L. Marcius Philippus, whom his mother married soon after his father's death. C. Julius Caesar, who had no male issue, also watched over his education with solicitude. In 45 he was sent by Caesar to Apollonia in Illyricum, where some legions were stationed, that he might acquire a more thorough practical training in military affairs, and at the same time prosecute his studies. He was at Apollonia when the news reached him of his uncle's murder at Rome in March 44, and he forthwith set out for Italy, accompanied by Agrippa and a few other friends. On landing near Brundisium at the beginning of April, he heard that Caesar had adopted him in his testament and made him his heir. On reaching Rome about the beginning of May, he demanded nothing but the private property which Caesar had left him, but declared that he was resolved to avenge the murder of his benefactor. Antony had spent a great part of the money left by Caesar in bribes to Dolabella and others; and Octavius gained popularity by paying all the legacies out of what remained to him. The state of parties at Rome was most perplexing; and one cannot but admire the extraordinary tact and prudence which Octavius displayed, and the skill with which a youth of barely 20 contrived to blind the most experienced statesmen in Rome, and eventually to carry all his designs into effect. He had to contend against the republican party as well as against Antony, who foresaw that Octavius would stand in the way of his views, and had therefore attempted, though without success, to prevent him from accepting the inheritance from his uncle. Octavius, therefore, resolved to crush Antony first as the more dangerous of his two enemies, and accordingly made overtures to the republican party. These were so well received, especially when 2 legions went over to him, that the senate conferred upon him the title of praetor, and sent him with the two consuls of the year, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius, to attack Antony, who was besieging D. Brutus in Mutina. Antony was defeated and obliged to fly across the Alps; and the death of the 2 consuls gave Octavius the command of all their troops. Cicero now showed his distrust of his motives: the senate became alarmed, and determined to prevent Octavius from acquiring further power. But he soon showed that he did not intend to become the senate's servant. Supported by his troops he marched upon Rome, from which Cicero had retired, and demanded the consulship, which the terrified senate was obliged to give him. He was elected to the office along with Q. Pedius, and the murderers of the dictator were outlawed. He was formally admitted into the patrician gens Julia, and henceforth known as Octavianus. He now marched into the N. of Italy, professedly against Antony, who had been joined by Lepidus and was descending from the Alps at the head of the combined 17 legions. Octavianus and Antony now became reconciled; and, at a meeting on an island on the river Rheus near Bononia (Bologna), it was agreed that the Western provinces should be divided between Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus, under the title of triumviri rei publicae constituendae, and that this arrangement should last for the next five years. Octavianus received Sicily, Sardinia, and Africa; Lepidus, Spain and Gallia Narbonensis; Antony, the rest of the two Gauls. Octavianus and Antony with 19 of the legions were to wrest the Eastern provinces from Brutus and Cassius. They published a proscriptio or list of all their enemies, whose lives were to be sacrificed and their property confiscated: upwards of 2000 equites and 300 senators were put to death, among whom was Cicero. Soon afterwards Octavianus and Antony crossed over to Greece, and defeated Brutus and Cassius at the battle of Philippi in 42, by which the hopes of the republican party were ruined. The triumvirs thereupon made a new division of the provinces. Lepidus obtained Africa, Octavianus the rest of the Western provinces, and Antony all the Eastern: Octavianus returned to Italy to reward his veterans with the lauds he had promised them. Here a new war awaited him (41), excited by Fulvia, the wife of Antony. She was supported by L. Antonius, the consul and brother of the triumvir, who threw himself into the fortified town of Perusia, which Octavianus succeeded in taking in 43. Antony now made preparations for war, but the opportune death of Fulvia led to a reconciliation between the triumvirs, who concluded a peace at Brundisium. A new division of the provinces was again made: Octavianus obtained all the parts of the empire W. of the town of Scodra in Illyricum, and Antony the E. provinces, while Italy was to belong to them in common: Lepidus retained Africa. It is probable that this reconciliation gave the theme for Virgil's Fourth Eclogue. Antony married Octavia, the sister of Octavianus, in order to cement their alliance. In 39 Octavianus concluded a peace with Sext. Pompeius, whose fleet gave him the command of the sea, and enabled him to prevent corn from reaching Rome. For a short time Pompeius, as a fourth ruler, received a share of provinces. But this peace was only transitory. As long as Pompeius was independent, Octavianus could not hope to obtain the dominion of the West, and he therefore eagerly availed himself of the pretext that Pompeius allowed piracy to go on in the Mediterranean, for the purpose of declaring war against him. In 36 the contest came to a final issue. The fleet of Octavianus, under the command of M. Agrippa, gained a decisive victory off the east coast of Sicily over that of Pompeius, who abandoned Sicily and fled to Asia. Lepidus, who had lauded in Sicily to support Octavianus, was impatient of the subordinate part which he had hitherto played, and claimed the island for himself; but he was easily subdued by Octavianus, stripped of his power, and sent to Rome, where he resided for the remainder of his life, being allowed to retain the dignity of Pontifex Maximus. In 35 and 34 Octavianus was engaged in war with the Illyrians and Dalmatians. Meantime, Antony had repudiated Octavia, and had alienated the minds of the Roman people by his arbitrary and arrogant proceedings in the East. This feeling was increased when Octavianus learnt from Plancus and published the will which Antony had prepared directing that his body should be placed, like that of an Egyptian king, in Cleopatra's mausoleum. Octavianus found that the Romans were quite prepared to desert his rival, and accordingly in 32 the senate declared war against Cleopatra, for Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. In the spring of 31 Octavianus passed over to Epirus, and in September in the same year his fleet gained a brilliant victory over Antony's near the promontory of Actium in Acarnania. The next eleven months he spent in founding the city of Nicopolis, in making settlements for his veterans, and in arranging the Eastern provinces. In the following year (30) Octavianus sailed to Egypt. Antony and Cleopatra, who had escaped in safety from Actium, put an end to their lives to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror. Octavianus returned to Rome in 29 and celebrated the 'triple triumph' (Verg. Aen. viii. 714) for victories in Dalmatia, at Actium, and in Egypt. He was now master of the Roman world with an authority which no party at Rome really wished that he should resign. The senatorial management was, as Julius Caesar well understood, worn out and no longer possible to renew: it was necessary that the executive power should be concentrated in one strong ruler, such as could be found in Octavianus alone, and also that this should be legally established: it was advisable, moreover, that it should outwardly agree with the old republican forms, so as to avoid as far as possible the appearance of breach of continuity and revolution. Accordingly in his 6th consulship, B. C. 28, he resigned by an edict to the senate and people the extraordinary power which he had wielded since he became triumvir in 43. Thus nominally the republic was restored on its old footing; but by a vote obtained from the senate and people he received all his old powers (theoretically for 10 years). His provincia with the consulare imperium gave him absolute control of the frontier provinces and the appointment of their governors, the command of all armies, the right of levying troops, and of making peace or war. This was strictly an enlarged proconsular power, but he held it until 23 with the consulship, and thus continued it, unlike any proconsul, in Rome, where he was rendered inviolable and secured from interference with his authority by the tribunicia potestas, which had already in 36 been granted him for life. Now also he received the cognomen of Augustus. In 23, when he gave up the consulship, the principate assumed the character, which it retained, with some changes in its development, till Diocletian. While he held the provincia above mentioned, since he no longer became consul and two other consuls were annually elected, it was now a proconsulare imperium: to compensate for this he received in 23 the maius imperium, which, if nominally on a level with that of the consuls, ranked over every other magistrate; in 22 the right of convening the senate and initiating business; in 19 the 12 fasces: finally to give a name to that power which made him superior to the consuls and their routine domestic duties, he relied on the perpetual tribunicia potestas, under cover of which he had supreme control over all departments. Though Augustus had nominally recognised the senate as the council of advisers to the executive magistrates, yet it did not really check absolutism: for (1) the most important provinces were altogether transferred from its control to that of the emperor, and the number of senatorial provinces was always decreasing; and (2) though the emperor sat in the senate as a senator, his opinion was really decisive. Augustus officially, he was called also Caesar from his adoption: the title Imperator which he shared with others so saluted did not distinguish the emperor till later times; but a common designation for Augustus and his successors in the first century A. D. was princeps, i.e. the foremost man of the state. Augustus had no regular cabinet ministers, but his trusted friends Agrippa, Maecenas, Corvinus and Pollio, especially the first two, served him as a privy council. The almost uninterrupted festivities, games, distributions of corn, and the like, made the people forget the substance of their republican freedom, and obey contentedly their new ruler. The wars of Augustus were not aggressive, but were chiefly undertaken to protect the frontiers of the Roman dominions. Most of them were carried on by his relations and friends, but he conducted some of them in person. Thus, in 27, he attacked the warlike Cantabri and Astures in Spain, whose subjugation, however, was not completed till 19 by Agrippa. In 21 Augustus travelled through Sicily and Greece, and spent the winter following at Samos. Next year (20) he went to Syria, where he received from Phraates, the Parthian monarch, the standards and prisoners which had been taken from Crassus and Antony. In 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; whereupon Augustus went himself to Gaul, and spent 4 years there, to regulate the government of that province, and to make the necessary preparations for defending it against the Germans. In 9 he again went to Gaul, where he received German ambassadors, who sued for peace; and from this time forward, he does not appear to have taken any active part in the wars that were carried on. Those in Germany were the most formidable, and a Roman army under Quintilius Varus was defeated and annihilated by Arminius. [VARUS.] Augustus died at Nola, on the 29th of August, A.D. 14, at the age of 76. Augustus was first married, though only nominally, to Clodia, a daughter of Clodius and Fulvia. His 2nd wife, Scribonia, bore him his only daughter, Julia. His 3rd wife was Livia Drusilla, the wife of Tiberius Nero. Augustus had at first fixed on M. Marcellus as his successor, the son of his sister Octavia, who was married to his daughter Julia. After his death Julia was married to Agrippa, and her 2 sons, Caius and Lucius Caesar, were now destined by Augustus as his successors. On the death of these 2 youths, Augustus was persuaded to adopt TIBERIUS, the son of Livia, and to make him his colleague and successor. Augustulus, Römulus, last Roman emperor of the West, was placed upon the throne by his father Orestes (A.D. 475), after the latter had deposed the emperor Julius Nepos. In 476 Orestes was defeated by Odoacer and put to death; Romulus Augustulus was allowed to live, but was deprived of the sovereignty.

Auleri, a powerful Gallic people dwelling between the Sequana (Seine) and the Liger (Loire), were divided into three great tribes. 1. A. Ebuovices, near the coast on the left bank of the Seine in the modern Normandy: the capital was Mediolanum, afterwards called Ebuovices (Evroux).—2. A. Cenomani, SW. of the preceding, near the Liger: their capital was Subdinnum (le Mans). At an early period some of the Cenomani crossed the Alps and settled in Upper Italy.—3. A. Brannovices, E. of the Cenomani near the Aedui, whose elicits they were. The Diabluntcs mentioned by Caesar are said by Ptolemy to have been likewise a branch of the Auleri (Caes. B. G. ii. 34, iii. 9, vii. 75).

Aulis (Ἀύλις), a harbour in Boeotia on the Euripus, where the Greek fleet is said to have assembled before sailing against Troy: it had a temple of Artemis (Strab. p. 403; Paus. ix. 19, 6).

Aulon (Ἀυλόν; Ἀυλωνίτης.) 1. A district and town on the borders of Elis and Messenia, with a temple of Aselepius, who hence had the surname Aulonius (Strab. p. 350; Paus. iv. 36).—2. A town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Strymonic gulf (Thuc. iv. 103).—3. (Melone), a hill and valley near Tarentum celebrated for its wine (amicus Aulon fertili Baccho, Hor. Od. ii. 6, 18; Mart. xiii. 125).

Auranitis (Ἀυρανίτις; Hauran), a district S. of Damascus and E. of Ituraea and Batanaca, on the E. side of the Jordan, belonging either to Palestine or to Arabia.

Aurëa Chersonësus (ἡ Χρυσῆ Χερσόνησος), the name given by the late geographers to the Malay Peninsula. They also mention an Aurea Regio beyond the Ganges, which is supposed to be the country round Ava.

Aurëlia, the wife of C. Julius Caesar, by whom she became the mother of C. Julius Caesar, the dictator, and of 2 daughters. She died in B.C. 54, while Caesar was in Gaul.

Aurëlia Gens, plebeian, of which the most important members are given under their family names, COTTA, ORESTES, and SCAURUS.

Aurëlia Orestilla, a beautiful but profligate woman, whom Catiline married. As Aurelia at first objected to marry him, because he had a grown-up son by a former marriage, Catiline is said to have killed his own offspring in order to remove this impediment to their union.

Aurëlia Via, the great coast road from Rome to Transalpine Gaul, at first extended to no further than Pisae, but was afterwards continued along the coast to Genua and Forum Julii in Gaul.

Aureliani. [GENABUM.]

Aurëlianus, Roman emperor, A.D. 270–275, was born about A.D. 212, at Sirmium in Pannonia. He entered the army as a common soldier, but was adopted by a senator, Ulpus Crinitus, and by his extraordinary bravery was raised to offices of trust and honour by Valerian and Claudius II. On the death of the latter, he was elected emperor by the legions on the Danube. His reign presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while their ancient lustre to the arms of Rome. He first defeated the Goths and Vandals, who had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. He next gained a great victory over the Alemanni and other German tribes; but they succeeded notwithstanding in crossing the Alps. Near Placentia they defeated the Romans, but were eventually overcome by Aurelian in two decisive engagements in Umbria. After crushing a formidable conspiracy at Rome, Aurelian next turned his arms against Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, whom he defeated, took prisoner, and carried with him to Rome. [ZENOBIA.] On his return to Italy he marched to Alexandria and put Firmus to death, who had assumed the title of emperor. He then proceeded to the West, where Gaul, Britain, and Spain were still in the hands of Tetricus, who had been declared emperor a short time before the death of Gallienus. Tetricus surrendered to Aurelian in a battle fought near Châlons. [TETRICUS.] The emperor now devoted his attention to domestic improvements and reforms. Many works of public utility were commenced: the most important of all was the erection of a new line of strongly fortified walls, embracing a much more ample circuit than the old ones, which had long since fallen into ruin; but this vast plan was not completed until the reign of Probus. After a short residence in the city, Aurelian visited the provinces on the Danube. He now entirely abandoned Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, and made the S. bank of the Danube, as in the time of Augustus, the boundary of the empire. A large force was now collected in Thrace in preparation for an expedition against the Persians; but while the emperor was on the march between Heraclea and Byzantium, he was killed by some of his officers. (Life in Script. August.; Zosim. i. 47; Eutrop. ix. 12.)

Aurélianus, Caelius, or Coelius, a celebrated Latin physician, a native of Numidia, probably lived in the 4th century. Of his writings we possess three books On Acute Diseases, 'Celerum Passionum' (or 'De Morbis Acutis,') and five books On Chronic Diseases, 'Tardarum Passionum' (or 'De Morbis Chronicis'). Edited by Amman, Amstel. 1709.

M. Aurélius Antoninus, Roman emperor, A.D. 161-180, commonly called 'the philosopher,' was born at Rome on April 20, A.D. 121. He was adopted by Antoninus Pius immediately after the latter had been himself adopted by Hadrian, and was educated by Fronto. He received the title of Caesar, and married Faustina, the daughter of Pius (138). On the death of the latter, in 161, he succeeded to the throne, but he admitted to an equal share of the sovereign power L. Ceionius Commodus, who had been adopted by Pius at the same time as Marcus himself. The two emperors henceforward bore respectively the names of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. Soon after their accession Verus was despatched to the East, and for 4 years (A.D. 162-165) carried on war with great success against Vologeses III., king of Parthia, over whom his lieutenants, especially Avidius Cassius, gained many victories. At the conclusion of the war both emperors triumphed, and assumed the titles of Armeniacus, Parthicus Maximus, and Medicus. Meanwhile Italy was threatened by the numerous tribes dwelling along the northern limits of the empire, from the sources of the Danube to the Illyrian border. Both emperors set out to encounter the foe; and the contest with the northern nations was continued with varying success during the whole life of M. Aurelius, whose head-quarters were generally fixed in Pannonia. After the death of Verus in 169, Aurelius presented the war against the Marcomanni with great success, and in consequence of his victories over them he assumed in 172 the title of Germanicus, which he also conferred upon his son Commodus. In 174 he gained a decisive victory over the Quadi, mainly through a violent storm, which threw the barbarians into confusion. This storm is said to have been owing to the prayers of a legion chiefly composed of Christians. It has given rise to a famous controversy among the historians of Christianity upon what is commonly termed the Miracle of the Thundering Legion. The Marcomanni and the other northern barbarians concluded a peace with Aurelius in 175, who forthwith set out for the East, where Avidius Cassius, urged on by Faustina, the unworthy wife of Aurelius, had risen in rebellion and proclaimed himself emperor. But before Aurelius reached the East, Cassius had been slain by his own officers. On his arrival in the East, Aurelius acted with the greatest clemency; none of the accomplices of Cassius were put to death, and to establish perfect confidence in all, he ordered the papers of Cassius to be destroyed without suffering them to be read. During this expedition, Faustina, who had accompanied her husband, died, according to some, by her own hands. Aurelius returned to Rome towards the end of 176; but in 178 he set out again for Germany, where the Marcomanni and their confederates had again renewed the war. He gained several victories over them, but died in the middle of the war on March 17, 180, in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirmium, in the 59th year of his age and 20th of his reign.—A notable feature in the character of M. Aurelius was his devotion to philosophy and literature. When only twelve years old he adopted the dress and practised the austerities of the Stoics, and he continued throughout his life a warm adherent and a bright ornament of the Stoic philosophy. We still possess a work by M. Aurelius, written in the Greek language, and entitled Tà eis éautov, or Meditations, in 12 books. It is a sort of common-place book, in which were registered from time to time the thoughts and feelings of the author upon moral and religious topics, without an attempt at order or arrangement. No remains of antiquity present a nobler view of philosophical heathenism. Editions of the Meditations by Gataker, Cantab. 1652; by Stich, Leips. 1882; translated by Long.—The chief and perhaps the only stain upon the memory of Aurelius is his persecution of the Christians: in 166 the martyrdom of Polycarp occurred, and in 177, that of Irenaeus. Aurelius was succeeded by his son Commodus. (Life in Script. August.; cf. also Dio Cass. lxxi.)

Ausōnius, Decimus Magnus, a Roman poet, born at Burdigāla (Bordeaux), about A.D. 310, taught grammar and rhetoric with such reputation at his native town, that he was appointed tutor of Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian (at which time probably he became a Christian), and was afterwards raised to the highest honours of the state. He was appointed by Gratian praefectus of Latium, of Libya, and of Gaul, and in 379 was elevated to the consulship. After the death of Gratian, in 383, he retired from public life, and ended his days in a country retreat near Bordeaux, perhaps about 390. A prose work, Gratiarum Actio, in ornate rhetorical style, addressed to Gratian, is extant. His poems or metrical works are—1. Epigrammatum Liber, a collection of 150 epigrams. 2. Ephemeris, containing an account of the business and proceedings of a day. 3. Parentalia, a series of short poems in memory of deceased friends and relations. 4. Professores, notices of the Professors of Bordeaux. 5. Epitaphia Heroum, epitaphs on the heroes who fell in the Trojan war and a few others. 6. A metrical catalogue of the first twelve Caesars. 7. Tetrasticha, on the Caesars, from Julius to Elagabalus. 8. Ordo nobilium Urbium, the praises of 17 illustrious cities. 9. Ludus Septem Sapientum, the doctrines of the 7 sages expounded by each in his own person. 10. Idyllia, a collection of 20 poems. 11. Eelogarium, short poems connected with the Calendar, &c. 12. Epistolae, 25 letters, some in verse and some in prose. 13. Gratiarum Actio pro Consulatu, in prose, addressed to Gratian. 14. Periochae, short arguments to each book of the Iliad and Odyssey. 15. Tres Praefatiuueulae. Of these works the Idyls have attracted most notice, and of them the most pleasing is the Mosella, or a description of the river Moselle, in a journey from Bingen on the Rhine up the Moselle to Trèves. Ausonius possesses skill in versification, but is destitute of all the higher attributes of a poet. His poems are, however, both interesting and valuable for their notice of persons and their pictures of certain features of life at that time. He retains his pagan phraseology, and to some extent at least his pagan ideas, speaking of the emperor as Deus, and apparently doubting immortality (Prof. Burd. i. 39, xxiii. 13).—The best editions of his com-

Autariātāe (Ἀυτάριαται), an Illyrian people in the Dalmatian mountains, extinct in Strabo's time.

Autesiodōrum, -ūrum (Auxerre), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Autēsion (Ἀυτεσίων), son of Tisamenus, father of Theras and Argia, left Thebes at the command of an oracle, and joined the Dorians in Peloponnesus (Hdt. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 15; Strab. p. 347).

Autochthōnes (αὐτόχθονες). [ABORIGINES.] Autōlōles, or -ae, a Gaetulian tribe on the W. coast of Africa, S. of the Atlas mountains.

Autōlyceus (Ἀυτόλυκος). 1. Son of Hermes and Chione, father of Anticlea, and thus maternal grandfather of Ulysses. He lived on Mount Parnassus, and was renowned for his cunning and robberies. He was able to defy detection by changing the colour and shape of the stolen property (Hes. Fr. 96; Ov. Met. xii. 314; Il. x. 260; Od. xix. 392). Ulysses, when staying with him on one occasion, was wounded by a boar on Parnassus, and it was by the scar of this wound that he was recognised by his aged nurse, when he returned from Troy.—2. A Thessalian, son of Deimachus, one of the Argonauts, and the founder of Sinope.—3. A mathematician of Pitane in Aeolis, lived about B.C. 340, and wrote 2 astronomical treatises, which are the most ancient existing specimens of the Greek mathematics. 1. On the Motion of the Sphere (περὶ κινουμένης σφαίρας). 2. On the Risings and Settings of the fixed Stars (περὶ ἐπιτολῶν καὶ δόσεων). Edited by Dasydipus in his Sphaericae Doctrinae Propositiones, Argent. 1572.

Autōmāla (τὰ Αὐτόμαλα), a fortified place on the Great Syrtis in N. Africa (Strab. p. 123).

Autōmēdon (Ἀυτομέδων). 1. Son of Diros, the charioteer and companion of Achilles, and, after the death of the latter, the companion of his son Pyrrhus (Il. xvi. 148). Hence Antomēdon is the name of any skilful charioteer. (Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 35; Juv. i. 61).—2. Of Cyzicus, a Greek poet, 12 of whose epigrams are in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Nerva.

Autōnōe (Ἀυτονόη), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, wife of Aristaeus, and mother of Actaeon. With her sister Agave, she tore PENTHEUS to pieces in Bacchic fury: her tomb was shown in Megara (Paus. x. 17).

Autricum. [CARNUTES.]

Autrigōnes, a people in Hispania Tarracensis between the ocean (Bay of Biscay) and the upper course of the Iberus: the chief town was FLAVIOBRIGA.

Autronius Paetus. [PAETUS.]

Auxēsia (Ἀἰξήσια), the goddess who grants growth and prosperity to the fields, honoured at Troezen and Epidaurus, was another name for Persephone. Damia, who was honoured along with Anxesia at Epidaurus and Troezen, was only another name for Demeter. They seem to have been local deities of Crete, who became identified with Demeter and Persephone, and were then said to have been Cretan maidens who migrated to Troezen. The festival of Lithobolia in their honour, explained by a tradition that they were stoned themselves, is perhaps a reminiscence of human sacrifice. (Paus. ii. 30, 31.)

Auximum (Auximas, -ātis: Osmio), an important town of Picenum, and a Roman colony.

Auxūme or Ax- (Ἀξούμη, or Ἀξώμη, and other forms: Ἀξουμίται or Ἀξωμίται, &c.: Azum, Ru., SW. of Adowa), the capital of a powerful kingdom in Ethiopia, to the SE. of Meroë, in Habesh or Abyssinia, which either first arose or first became known to the Greeks and Romans in the early part of the 2nd century of our aera. It grew upon the decline of the kingdom of Meroë, and extended beyond the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb into Arabia. Being a mountainous region, watered by the numerous upper streams of the Astaboras and Astapus, and intersected by the caravan routes from the interior of Africa to the Red Sea and the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, the country possessed great internal resources and a flourishing commerce.

Auzæa, or -ia, or Audia (Sur-Guzlan or Hamza, Ru.), a city in the interior of Mauretania Caesariensis; a Roman colony under M. Aurelius Antoninus.

Avälites (Ἀβαλίτης: Zeilah), an emporium in S. Aethiopia, on a bay of the Erythraean Sea, called Avälites Sinus (Ἄ. κόλπος) probably the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, or its innermost part, S. of the Straits. A people, Avalitæ, are also mentioned in these parts.

Avaricum. [BITURIGES.]

Avaris. [ABARIS.]

Avenio (Avignon), a town of the Cavares in Gallia Narbonensis on the left bank of the Rhone (Strab. p. 185).

Aventicum (Avenches), the chief town of the Helvetii, and subsequently a Roman colony with the name Pia Flavia Constans Emerita, of which ruins are still to be seen in the modern town (Tac. Hist. i. 68; Ammian. xv. 11; see also C. I. Helvet. 179, &c.).

Aventinensis, Genucius. 1. L., consul B.C. 365, and again 362, was killed in battle against the Hernicans in the latter of these years, and his army routed.—2. Cn., consul 363.

Aventinus. 1. Son of Hercules and the priestess Rhea (Verg. Aen. vii. 695).—2. King of Alba, son of Romulus Silvius, or of Allodius, buried on the Aventine, which was called after him (Liv. i. 3; Dionys. i. 71).

Aventinus Mons. [ROMA.]

Avernus Lacus (ἡ Ἄορνος λίμνη: Lago Averno), a lake close to the promontory which runs out into the sea between Cumæ and Puteoli. This lake fills the crater of an extinct volcano; it is circular, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ milc in circumference, is very deep, and was enclosed by steep lava rocks and a gloomy cypress forest. From its waters mephitic vapours arose, which are said to have killed the birds that attempted to fly over it, from which circumstance its Greek name was supposed to be derived (from a priv. and ὄρνις) (Lucret. vi. 738; Plin. iii. 61; Dio Cass. lviii. 27). The lake was celebrated in mythology as being the entrance to the underworld, and hence was sacred to Proserpine (Diod. iv. 22; Verg. Aen. vi. 126). Strabo cites Ephorus as saying that the Cimmerians, the people of dark dwellings, were connected once with this spot. The idea may have sprung from the name Chimerium belonging to a promontory in Thesprotia, near Acherusia and the other Aornus. There is much interchange of names in the stories belonging to these places. Near Avernus was the cave of the Cunæan Sibyl, through which Aeneas descended. Later writers placed the scene of the descent of Odysseus here also (Strab. p. 243); and there was an oracle by which the spirits of the dead were consulted (πεκυομαντεῖον), as at the similarly named Thesprotian lake [AORNUS]. Some such rites may have belonged to Hannibal's sacrificæ here (Liv. xxiv. 12). The god Avernus, whose statue sweated during the works of Agrippa and was propitiated by sacrifices (Serv. ad Georg. ii. 161), was a local Hades or Dis Pater. Some of the pagan rites lingered here in the time of Theodosius (C. I. L. x. 1, 3792), and a good deal of the superstition to the present day. Agrippa, in the time of Augustus, cut down the forest which surrounded the lake, and connected the latter with the Lucrine lake; he also caused a tunnel to be made from the lake to Cumæ, of which a considerable part remains and is known under the name of Grotta di Sibylla. The Lucrine lake was filled up by an eruption in 1530, so that Avernus is again a separate lake.

Aviānus, Flavius, the author of 42 Aesopic fables in Latin elegiac verse, which were much used as a school book. The date of Avianus is uncertain; he probably lived in the 4th century of the Christian aera.—Editions. By Cannegieter, Amstel. 1731; by Nodell, Amstel. 1787; and by Lachmann, Berol. 1845.

Aviēnus, Rufus Festus, a Latin poet towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian aera. His poems are chiefly descriptive, and are some of the best specimens of the poetry of that age. His works are:—1. Descriptio Orbis Terræ, also called Metaphrasis Periegeseos Dionysii, in 1394 hexameter lines, derived directly from the περήγησις of Dionysius, and containing a succinct account of the most remarkable objects in the physical and political geography of the known world.—2. Ora Maritima, a fragment in 703 Iambic trimeters, describing the shores of the Mediterranean from Marseilles to Cadiz.—3. Aratea Phaenomena, and Aratea Prognostica, both in hexameter verse, the first containing 1325, the second 552 lines, being a paraphrase of the two works of Aratus. The poems are edited by Wernsdorf, in his Poëtæ Latini Minores, vol. v. pt. 2, which, however, does not include the Aratea.

Aviōnes, a people in the N. of Germany on the W. coast of Cimbrica Chersonesus (Denmark).

Avitus, Alphius, a Latin poet under Augustus and Tiberius, the fragments of some of whose poems are preserved in the Anthologia Latina.

Avitus, Cluentius. [CLUENTIUS.]

Avitus, M. Maecilius, emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by the assistance of Theodoric II. king of the Visigoths in A.D. 455; but, after a year's reign, was deposed by Ricimer.

Avona or Aufona, the Gloucestershire Avon (Tac. Ann. xii. 31).

Axēnus. [EUXINUS PONTUS.]

Axia (Castel d'Asso), a fortress in the territory of Tarquinius in Etruria (Cic. pro Caec. 7).

Axion (Ἀξιῶν), son of Phegeus, brother of Temenus, along with whom he killed Alcmaeon.

Axiōthea (Ἀξιοθέα), a maiden of Phlius, who came to Athens, and putting on male attire, was for some time a hearer of Plato, and afterwards of Speusippus (Diog. Laërt. iii. 46).

Axius, Q., an intimate friend of Cicero and Varro, one of the speakers in the 3rd book of Varro's De Re Rustica.

Axius (Ἄξιος: Wardar or Vardhari), the chief river in Macedonia, rises in Mt. Scardus, receives many affluents, of which the most important is the Erigon, and flows SE. through Macedonia into the Thermaic gulf. As a river-god, Axius begot by Periboea a son Pelegon, the father of ASTEROPÆUS.

Axōna (Aisne), a river in Gallia Belgica, which falls into the Isara (Oise). (Caes. B.G. ii. 5; Auson. Id. x. 461.)

Axūme. [AUXUME.]

Axus. [OXUS.]

Azan (Ἀζάν), son of Arcas and the nymph Erato, brother of Aphīdas and Elatus. The part of Areadia which he received from his father was called Azania: it was on the borders of Elis. (Paus. viii. 4, 2, x. 9, 3.)

Azāni (Ἀζάνη: Tchardir Hisar), a town of Phrygia, on the river Rhyndacus, and 20 miles Ruins at Azani.

SW. of Cotyrium. The priestly dynasty of the temple (of Zeus) ruled the city, as in the case of Pessinus, Comana, &c. Euphorbus is mentioned as having instituted the rites—a sacrifice of the hedgehog and the fox. There are fine ruins of the temple, and remains of the theatre and stadium. (Strab. p. 575; Stephan. s.v.)

Azania or Barbaria (Ἀζάνια, Βαρβαρία: Ajan), the region on the E. coast of Africa, S. of Aromata Pr. (C. Guardafui), as far as Rhaphum Pr. (Ptol. iv. 7, 28).

Azēnia (Ἀζηνία: Ἀζηνιεύς), a demus in the SW. of Attica, near Suuium, belonging to the tribe Hippothooutis.

Azeus (Ἀζεύς), son of Clymenus of Orcho-menos, brother of Erginus, Stratius, Arrhon, and Pyleus, father of Aetor and grandfather of Astyoche (Il. ii. 512; Paus. ix. 37).

Aziris (Ἀζίρις). 1. A town of Armenia, west of the Euphrates (Ptol. v. 7, 2).—2. A district in the E. of Cyrenaica, where silphium was grown (Hdt. iv. 157).

Azōrus or Azōrīum (Ἀζώρος, Ἀζώριον: Ἀζωρίτης, Ἀζωπίδης, Ἀζωπέυς), a town in the N. of Thessaly, on the W. slope of Olympus, formed, with Doliche and Pythium, the Perrhaebian Tripolis (Liv. xlii. 53, xlii. 2).

Azōtus (Ἀζώτος: Ἀζώτιος: Ashdod or Ashdoud), a city of Palestine, near the sea-coast, 9 miles NE. of Asealon. It was one of the free cities of the Philistines, which were included within the portion of the tribe of Judah. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5; B. J. i. 7.)

Babba, in full Babba Julia Campestris, a Roman colony in Mauretania Tingitana founded by Augustus (Plin. v. 5).

Babrius (Βάβριος), whose full name seems to have been Valerius Babrius, by birth an Italian, lived at the court of Alexander Severus and versified in Greek eholiambs a collection of fables. They are probably adapted and paraphrased by him from an older prose collection of fables such as were ascribed to 'Aesop,' but were partly old apologues such as Aristophanes mentions [see Arsopus], of which we find examples even in Hesiod (Op. 203), partly exercises set by rhetors to their pupils. It is suggested that the foundation used by Babrius was a prose collection in ten books by Nicostratus, a contemporary of Hermogenes (Hermog. περὶ ἰδ. ii. 12, 3): many of his fables are merely old proverbs expanded. He wrote in Attic Greek with occasional Latinisms and other indications that Greek was to him an adopted language. The writings of Babrius were discovered on Mount Athos by a Greek named Minoides Menas in a codex containing 122 fables, of which the editio princeps was issued by Boissonade in 1844. A second MS. containing 21 more fables was found in the Vatican, and was first correctly published by Knoell in 1878. The best complete edition of Babrius is by Rutherford, 1883. Menas produced another set of 95 fables which were edited by Cornwell Lewis in 1859; but there is no doubt that they were forgeries.

Bābŷlon (Βαβυλών: Βαβυλώνιος, fem. Βαβυλωνίς: Babel in O.T.: Ru. at and around Hillah), one of the oldest and greatest cities of the ancient world, the capital of a great empire, was built on both banks of the river Euphrates, in about 32° 28' N. lat. It was of unknown antiquity, though its foundation (which is mythically ascribed to the god Belus=Marduk or Merodach) was probably after Egypt had a settled empire. According to an inscription of Nabopolassar (B.C. 554) now in the British Museum, the temple of the sun-god Samas was founded by Nasar-Sin, the son of Sargon, 3200 years earlier. This gives a date of about 3800 B.C. for Sargon the earliest king named. In several periods of her history Babylou fell under the dominion of the Assyrian monarchs [see ASSYRIA]; but Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylou, made an alliance with Pharaoh Necho and the Median king Cyaxares (Kastarit) and revolted from Assyria. The allies took Nineveh B.C. 609 [see SARDANAPALUS]. Nabopolassar was succeeded by his son Nebuchadnezzar, under whom (B.C. 604-562), the Babylonian empire reached its height, and extended from the Euphrates to Egypt, and from the mountains of Armenia to the deserts of Arabia. After his death it again declined, until the reign of Nabu-Nahid (=Nabonidus), who reigned from B.C. 556 with his son Belshazzar as commander of the army. In the 17th year of his reign (B.C. 539) Babylou was captured by Cyrus (the turning of the river is not mentioned in inscriptions), and Gobryas was made governor of Babylou. Nabonidus died in captivity the same year. [See CYRUS.] Babylou became one of the capitals of the Persian empire, the others being Susa and Ecbatana. Under his successors the city rapidly sank. Darius I. dismantled its fortifications, in consequence of a revolt of its inhabitants; Xerxes carried off the golden statue of Belus, and the temple in which it stood became a ruin. After the death of Alexander, Babylou became a part of the Syrian kingdom of Seleucus Nicator, who contributed to its decline by the foundation of SELEUCIA on the Tigris, which soon eclipsed it. At the commencement of our era, the greater part of the city was in ruins; and at the present day all its visible remains consist of mounds of earth, ruined masses of brick walls, and a few scattered fragments. Its very site has been turned into a dreary marsh by repeated inundations from the river.—The city of Babylou had reached the summit of its magnificence in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. The accounts of its dimensions vary somewhat. Herodotus makes the circuit of the walls 480 furlongs: in Ctesias, Clitarchus, Curtius and Strabo the estimate is about 100 furlongs less. The breadth of the walls was said to be 50 feet; the height, according to Herodotus and Ctesias was 200 cubits, according to Strabo 75 cubits. Probably the last estimate is right, and the higher number arose from stating 200 cubits instead of 200 hands. (Hdt. i. 178; Strab. p. 738.) The Euphrates, which divided the city into 2 equal parts, was embanked with walls of brick, the openings of which at the ends of the transverse streets were closed by gates of bronze. A bridge, built on piers of hewn stone, united the 2 quarters of the city; and at each end of it stood a royal palace. Of two other public buildings of the greatest celebrity, the one was the temple of Belus, rising to a great height, and consisting of 8 stories, gradually diminishing in width, and ascended by a flight of steps, which wound round the whole building on the outside; in the uppermost story was the golden statue of Belus, with a golden altar and other treasures. The 'hanging gardens' of Nebuchadnezzar were laid out upon terraces which were raised above one another on arches. The houses of the city were 3 or 4 stories in height, and the streets were straight, intersecting one another at right angles. The buildings were almost universally constructed of bricks, some burnt and some only sun-dried, cemented together with hot bitumen and in some cases with mortar.—The Babylonians were a people of Turanian or Ural-Altaic origin. The original name of their country (afterwards called Babylonia from its capital) was Kaldai, and its people were called Kaldai or Chaldaeans.—Their religion was Sabaeism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, not purely so, but symbolised in the forms of idols, besides whom they had other divinities, representing the powers of nature. The three chief deities were Anu, Ea, and Bel or Belus (= Zeus), whose feminine counterpart Belit or Beltis is the Mylitta of Herodotus (i. 199): the son of Ea, named Marduk or Merodach, was the mediator for men and the god of healing: Istar [see APHRODITE] was the daughter of the moon-god, and was the spirit of the planet Venus. Her husband was Tammuz. [See ADONIS.] The priests formed a caste, and cultivated science, especially astronomy; in which they knew the apparent motions of the sun, moon, and 5 of the planets, the calculation of eclipses of the moon, the division of the zodiac into 12 constellations, and of the year into 12 months, and the measurement of time by the sun-dial. They must also have had other instruments for measuring time, such as the water-clock, for instance; and it is highly probable that the definite methods of determining such quantities, which the Chaldaean astronomers invented, were the origin of the systems of weights and measures used by the Greeks and Romans. Their buildings prove their knowledge of mechanics; and their remains, slight as they are, show considerable progress in the fine arts.—The position of the city on the lower course of the Euphrates, by which it was connected with the Persian Gulf, and at the meeting of natural routes between E. Asia and India on the one side, and Europe, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, on the other, made it the seat of a flourishing commerce and of immense wealth and luxury.—The district around the city, bounded by the Tigris on the E., Mesopotamia on the N., the Arabian Desert on the W., and extending to the head of the Persian Gulf on the S., was known in later times by the name of Babylonia. [See above, and comp. CHALDAEA.] This district was a plain, subject to continual inundations from the Tigris and Euphrates, which were regulated by canals, the chief of which was the Naarmalcha, i.e. Royal River or Canal (ποταμὸς βασιλείος, διὰρρυξ βασιλική, flumen regium), which extended from the Tigris at Seleucia due W. to the Euphrates, and was navigable.

Bäbylon (Βαβυλών; nr. Fostat or Old Cairo), a fortress in Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, exactly opposite to the pyramids, and at the beginning of the canal which connected the Nile with the Red Sea. Its origin was ascribed by tradition to a body of Babylonian deserters. It first became an important place under the Romans. Augustus made it the station of one of the 3 Egyptian legions. (Strab. pp. 807, 812.)

Babylōnia. [BABYLON.]

Bacchae. [MAENADES; DIONYSUS.]

Bacchiadae (Βακχιάδαι), a Heraclid clan, derived their name from Bacchis, king of Corinth; for their history see CORINTHUS.

Bacchius (Βακχεῖος). 1. The author of a short musical treatise called ἑισαγωγὴ τέχνης μουσικῆς, printed by Meibomius, in the Antiquae Musicae Auctores Septem, Amst. 1652.—2. Of Miletus, the author of a work on agriculture, referred to by Pliny and Varro.

Bacchus. [DIONYSUS.]

Bacchylides (Βακχυλίδης), one of the lyric poets of Greece, born at Iulis in Ceos, and nephew as well as fellow-townsmen of Simonides. He flourished about B.C. 470, and lived a long time at the court of Hiero in Syracuse, together with Simonides and Pindar (Strab. p. 426; Aelian, V. H. iv. 15). He wrote in the Doric dialect Hymns, Paeanes, Dithyrambs, &c.; but all his poems have perished, with the exception of a few fragments, and two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. The fragments have been published by Neue, Bacchylidis Cei Fragmenta, Berol. 1823, and by Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci.

Bacēnis Silva, a forest which separated the Suevi from the Chatti, at the sources of the river Visurgis (Weser), probably = the Thuringian Forest (Caes. B. G. vi. 10).

Bacis (Βάκισ), the name of several prophets, of whom the most celebrated was the Boeotian seer, who delivered his oracles in hexameter verse at Heleon in Boeotia. In later times there existed a collection of his oracles, similar to the Sibylline books at Rome. (Hdt. viii. 20, 77, ix. 43; Plat. Theag. 124 D; Paus. iv. 27, 2, ix. 17, x. 12; Cic. Div. i. 18, 34.)

Bactra or Zariaspa (τὰ Βάκτρα, τὰ Ζαρίασπα and ἡ Ζαρίασπη: Balkh), the capital of BACTRIA, appears to have been founded by the early Persian kings, but not to have been a considerable city till the time of Alexander, who settled in it his Greek mercenaries and his disabled Macedonian soldiers. It stood at the N. foot of the M. Paropamisus (the Hindoo Koosh) on the river Bactrus (Adirsiah or Dehas) about 25 miles S. of its junction with the Oxus. It was the centre of a considerable traffic. The existing ruins, 20 miles in circuit, are all of the Mohammedan period. (Strab. p. 513; Curt. vii. 4–10.)

Bactria or iāna (Βακτριανή: Βάκτροι, -ιοι, -ιανοί: Bokhara), a province of the Persian empire, bounded on the S. by M. Paropamisus which separated it from Ariana, on the E. by the N. branch of the same range, which divided it from the Sacae, on the NE. by the Oxus, which separated it from Sogdiana, and on the W. by Margiuna. It was inhabited by a rude and warlike people, who were subdued by Cyrus or his next successors. It was included in the conquests of Alexander, and formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, until B.C. 255, when Theodotus, its governor, revolted from Antiochus II., and founded the Greek kingdom of Bactria, which lasted till B.C. 134 or 125, when it was overthrown by the Parthians, with whom, during its whole duration, its kings were sometimes at war, and sometimes in alliance against Syria. This Greek kingdom extended beyond the limits of the province of Bactria, and included at least a part of Sogdiana. Bactria was watered by the Oxus and its tributaries, and contained much fertile land; and much of the commerce between W. Asia and India passed through it. (Strab. p. 516; Hdt. iv. 204; Arrian, iii. 29.)

Baduhennae Lucus, a wood in W. Friesland. (Tac. Ann. iv. 73.)

Baebia Gens, plebeian, the most important members of which are given under their surnames, DIVES, SULCA, TAMPHILUS.

Baecula, a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, W. of Castulo, in the neighbourhood of silver mines (Polyb. x. 38; Liv. xxvii. 18). It may correspond to the modern Baylen.

Baeterrae (Beziers), also called Biterrensis urbs, a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the Obris, not far from Narbo, and a Roman colony: its neighbourhood produced good wine (Plin. iii. 36, xiv. 68).

Baetica. [HISPANIA.]

Baetis (Guadalquiviver), a river in S. Spain, formerly called Tartessus, and by the inhabitants Certis, rises in Hispania Tarraconensis in the territory of the Oretani, flows SW. through Baetica, to which it gives its name, past the cities of Corduba and Hispalis, and falls into the Atlantic Ocean, by two mouths, N. of Gades (Strab. p. 139).

Bagacum (Bavai), the chief town of the Nervii in Gallia Belgica: there are many Roman remains in the modern town.

Bagaudae, a Gallic people, who revolted under Diocletian, and were with difficulty subdued by Maximian, A.D. 286 (Eutrop. ix. 20).

Bagistanus Mons, and Bagistana (Behistan), a range of hills and a town in Media, SW. of Ecbatana (Diod. vi. 13, xvii. 110), celebrated for its rock sculptures and inscriptions.

Bagoas (Bayoas), a eunuch, highly trusted and favoured by Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), whom he poisoned, B.C. 338. He was put to death by Darius III. Codomannus, whom he had attempted likewise to poison, 336. The name Bagoas frequently occurs in Persian history, and is sometimes used by Latin writers as synonymous with a eunuch.

Bagradas (Βαγράδας: Mejerlah), a river of N. Africa, falling into the Gulf of Carthage near Utica (Caes. B. C. ii. 24; Liv. xxx. 10; Lucan, iv. 588). It is the same as the Macaras of Polyb. i. 75.

Baiæ (Baianus), a town in Campania, on a small bay W. of Naples, and opposite Puteoli, was situated in a beautiful country, which abounded in warm mineral springs. The baths of Baiæ were the most celebrated in Italy, and the town itself was the favourite watering-place of the Romans, who flocked thither in crowds for health and pleasure. Seneca calls it 'diversorium vitiorum.' The whole country was studded with the palaces of the Roman nobles and emperors, which covered the coast from Baiæ to Puteoli: many of these places were built out into the sea. (Hor. Od. ii. 18, 20, Ep. i. 15, 2; Tac. Ann. xii. 21, xiv. 9; Senec. Ep. 51; Plin. Nat. Hist. xxi. 4; Strab. p. 245.) Nero here matured his plot for the murder of Agrippina: Hadrian died here, and Alexander Severus built several villas (Tac. Ann. xiv. 4; Vit. Hadr. 25; Alex. Sev. 26). The site of ancient Baiæ is now for the most part covered by the sea.

Baiucasses, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, whose capital was Augustodurum (Bayeux).

Balbinus, D. Caelius, was elected emperor by the senate along with M. Clodius Pupienus Maximus, after the murder of the two Gordians in Africa, at the beginning of A.D. 238; but the new emperors were slain by the soldiers at Rome in June in the same year (Eutrop. ix. 2).

Balbus, M. Acilius, the name of two consuls, one in B.C. 150, and the other in 114.

Balbus, T. Ampius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, was a supporter of Pompey, whom he joined in the civil war B.C. 49. He was pardoned by Caesar through the intercession of Cicero (ad Fam. vi. 12; Suet. Jul. 77).

Balbus, M. Atius, married Julia, the sister of Julius Caesar, who bore him a daughter, Atia, the mother of Augustus Caesar. [ATIA.]

Balbus, L. Cornélius. 1. Of Gades, served under Q. Metellus and Pompey against Sertorius in Spain, and received from Pompey the Roman citizenship. He accompanied Pompey on his return to Rome, B.C. 71, and was for a long time one of his most intimate friends. At the same time he gained the friendship of Caesar, who placed great confidence in him. As the friend of Caesar and Pompey, he had numerous enemies, who accused him in 56 of having illegally assumed the Roman citizenship; he was defended by Cicero, whose speech has come down to us, and was acquitted. In the civil war (49) Balbus did not take any open part against Pompey; but he attached himself to Caesar, and, in conjunction with Oppius, had the entire management of Caesar's affairs at Rome. After the death of Caesar (44) he was equally successful in gaining the favour of Octavian, who raised him to the consulship in 40. Balbus wrote a diary (Ephemeris), which has not come down to us, of the most remarkable occurrences in Caesar's life (Suet. Jul. 81). He took care that Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic war should be continued; and we accordingly find the 8th book dedicated to him. His letters to Cicero are in Cic. ad Att. viii. 15, ix. 7, 13.—2. Nephew of the preceding, received the Roman franchise along with his uncle. He served under Caesar in the civil war; he was quaestor of Asinius Pollio in Further Spain in B.C. 43, and while there added to his native town Gades a suburb; many years afterwards he was proconsul of Africa, and triumphed over the Garamantes in 19. He built a magnificent theatre at Rome, which was dedicated in 13. (Vell. Pat. ii. 51; Cic. Att. viii. 9.)

Balbus, Lucilius. 1. L. σ jurist and brother of the following.—2. Q., a Stoic philosopher, and a pupil of Panaetius, is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his De Natura Deorum, iii. 40 (cf. Div. i. 5).

Balbus, Octāvius, a contemporary of Cicero, bore a high character as a iudex; he was put to death by the triumvirs, B.C. 43 (Cic. pro Clu. 38; Val. Max. v. 7, 3).

Balbus, Sp. Thorius, tribune of the plebs, about B.C. 111, proposed an agrarian law. See Dict. of Ant., art. Lex Thoria.

Baleāres (Βαλεαρίδες, Βαλιάριδες), also called Gymnēsīae (Γυμνησίαι) by the Greeks, two islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, distinguished by the epithets Major and Minor, whence their modern names Majorca and Minorca. They were early known to the Carthaginians, who established settlements there for the purposes of trade; they afterwards received colonies from Rhodes; and their population was at a later time of a very mixed kind. Their inhabitants, also called Baleares, were celebrated as slingers, and were employed as such in the armies of the Carthaginians and Romans. In consequence of their piracies they provoked the hostility of the Romans, and were finally subdued, B.C. 123, by Q. Metellus, who assumed accordingly the surname Balaericus. (Strab. pp. 167, 654; Polyb. i. 67, iii. 113; Diod. v. 16; Flor. iii. 8; Oros. i. 2, v. 13.)

Balista, prefect of the praetorians under Valerian, whom he accompanied to the East. After the defeat and capture of that emperor (A.D. 260), he rallied a body of Roman troops, and defeated the Persians in Cilicia. His subsequent career is obscure; he is mentioned as one of the Thirty Tyrants, and was probably put to death, about 264, by Odenathus. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr. 17.)

Bambalio, M. Fulvius, father of Fulvia, the wife of M. Antonius, the triumvir, received the nickname of Bambalio on account of a hesitancy in his speech (Cic. Phil. ii. 36, iii. 6).

Bambycē. [HIERAPOLIS.]

Bānāsa (Mamora? Ru.), a city of Mauretania Tingitana, on the river Subur (Sebou), near the W. coast: a colony under Augustus (Plin. v. 5).

Bandūsīae Fons, a fountain celebrated by Horace (Od. iii. 13). According to the scholiast Acron it was in the neighbourhood of Horace's Sabine farm; and the spring called Fontana degli Oratini, which gushes out under a small rock on the hill side between the two supposed sites of his farm, answers the description. In the 12th century a church was standing about six miles from Venusia in Apulia described in old documents as 'Eccles. SS. Gervasi et Protasi in Bandusino Fonte apud Venusiam,' whence some conclude that the spring mentioned by Horace was near his birthplace, not at his farm; but the expressions in the ode itself point inevitably to the conclusion that Horace speaks of a spring near his dwelling.

Bantia (Bantinus; Banzi or Vanzi), a town near Venusia, in a woody district (saltus Bantini, Hor. Od. iii. 4, 15), on the borders of Lucania and Apulia (Liv. xvii. 25; Plin. iii. 16).

Barbāna (Bojana), a river in Illyria, flows through the Palus Labeatis (Liv. xlv. 31).

Barbāria. [AZANIA.]

Barbātio, commander of the household troops under Gallus, whom he arrested by command of Constantius, A.D. 354. In 355 he was sent into Gaul to assist Julian against the Alemanni. He was put to death by Constantius in 359. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, xviii. 3.)

Barbātus, M. Horātius, consul B.C. 449 with Valerius Publicola after the overthrow of the decemvirs. [PUBLICOLA.]

Barbosthēnes, a mountain E. of Sparta.

Barbūla, Aemilius. 1. Q., consul B.C. 317, when he subdued Apulia, and consul again in 311, when he fought against the Etruscans.—2. L., consul in 281, carried on war against the Tarentines, Samnites, and Sallentines.—3. M. consul in 230, fought against the Ligurians.

Barca, the surname of HAMILCAR, the father of Hannibal, is probably the same as the Hebrew Barak, which signifies lightning. His family was distinguished as the 'Barcine family,' and the democratical party, which supported this family, as the 'Barcine party.'

Barca or -e (Βάρκη; Βαρκίτης, Βαρκαίος, Barcaeus). 1. (Merjeh, Ru.), the second city of Cyrenaica, in N. Africa, 100 stadia (10 geog. miles) from the sea, appears to have been at first a settlement of a Libyan tribe, the Barcaeii, but about B.C. 560 was colonised by the Greek seceders from Cyrene, and became so powerful as to make the W. part of Cyrenaica virtually independent of the mother city. In B.C. 510 it was taken by the Persians, who removed most of its inhabitants to Bactria, and under the Ptolemies its ruin was completed by the erection of its port into a new city, which was named PTOLEMAIS, and which took the place of Barca as one of the cities of the Cyrenaic Pentapolis. (Hdt. iv. 160, 164, 167, 171, 200; Strab. p. 897; Plin. v. 32; CYRENE.)—2. A town in Bactria peopled by the removed inhabitants of the Cyrenaic Barca.

Barcīno (Barcelona), a town of the Laeētani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, afterwards a Roman colony: the town was not large, but possessed an excellent harbour (Ptol. ii. 6; Oros. vii. 143).

Bardanes. [ARSACES XXI.]

Bardylis or Bardyllis (Βάρδυλις, Βάρδυλλισ), an Illyrian chieftain, carried on frequent wars with the Macedonians, but was at length defeated and slain in battle by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, B.C. 359 (Diod. xvi. 4; Cic. Off. ii. 11, 40).

Barēa Sorānus, consul suffectus in A.D. 52 under Claudius, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, was a man of justice and integrity. He was accused of treason in the reign of Nero, and also of employing his daughter Servilia to use magic, and was condemned to death together with her. The chief witness against him was P. Egnatius Celer, a Stoic philosopher, and the teacher of Soranus. (Juv. iii. 116; Dio Cass. lxii. 26; Tac. Ann. xvi. 30.)

Bargūsii, a people in the NE. of Spain, between the Pyrenees and the Iberus (Polyb. iii. 35.)

Bārium (Barinus; Barì), a town in Apulia, on the Adriatic, a municipium, and celebrated for its fisheries (Barium piscosum, Hor. Sat. i.

5, 97; Strab. p. 283). In the 10th century the Greek emperors made it the capital of Apulia.

Barsaentes (Βαρσαέντης) or Barzaentus (Βαρζαέντος), satrap of the Arachoti and Drangae, took part in the murder of Darius III., and fled to India, where he was seized by the inhabitants and delivered up to Alexander, who put him to death (Arrian, iii. 8, 21; Diod. xvii. 74).

Barsinē (Βαρσίνη). 1. Daughter of Artabazus, and wife of Memnon the Rhodian, subsequently married Alexander the Great, to whom she bore a son, Heracles. She and her son were put to death by Polysperchon in 309.—2. Also called Statira, elder daughter of Darius III., whom Alexander married at Susa. Shortly after Alexander's death she was murdered by Roxana.

Basānītis. [BATANAĒA.]

Basila (Basel or Bāle), a town on the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of which Valentinian built a fortress (Amm. Marc. xxx. 3). It became important after the ruin of Augusta Rauracorum.

Basilina, the mother of Julian the apostate, being the second wife of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great.

Basilus, commonly called Basil the Great, was born A.D. 329, at Caesarea. (See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.)

Bāsilus, L. Minucius, served under Caesar in Gaul, and commanded part of Caesar's fleet in the civil war. He was one of Caesar's assassins (B.C. 44), and in the following year was murdered by his own slaves. (Caes. B. G. vi. 29, vii. 92; Appian, B. C. iii. 96; Oros. vi. 18; Cic. Fam. vi. 15.)

Bassāreus. [DIONYSUS.]

Bassus, Aufidius, an orator and historian under Augustus and Tiberius, wrote an account of the Roman wars in Germany, and a work upon Roman history of a more general character, which was continued in 31 books by the elder Pliny (Quint. x. 1, 108; Plin. vi. 27).

Bassus, Q. Caecilius, a Roman eque, and an adherent of Pompey, fled to Tyre after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. Shortly afterwards he obtained possession of Tyre, and subsequently settled down in Apamea, where he maintained himself for 3 years (46–48). On the arrival of Cassius in Syria in 43, the troops of Bassus went over to Cassius. (Dio Cass. xvii. 26; Vell. Pat. ii. 69; Cic. Fam. xi. 1, xii. 11.)

Bassus, Caesius, a Roman lyric poet, and a friend of Persius, who addresses his 6th satire to him, was destroyed along with his villa in A.D. 79 by the eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii (Quint. x. 1, 96; Pers. vi. 1; Schol. ad loc.; Plin. Ep. vi. 16). He also wrote a poem on metres, of which it is thought fragments remain in a prose version (Gaisford, Script. Metr. 1837; Keil, 1874).

Bassus, Saleius, a Roman epic poet of considerable merit, contemporary with Vespasian (Tac. Dial. 5; Quint. x. 1, 90; Juv. vii. 80). The poem ad Pisonem (in Poët. Lat. Min.) has been ascribed to this Bassus, but probably erroneously: it seems to belong to the age of Claudius.

Bastarnae or Basternae, a warlike German people, who migrated to the country near the mouth of the Danube. They are first mentioned in the wars of Philip and Perseus against the Romans, and at a later period they frequently devastated Thrace, and were engaged in wars with the Roman governors of the province of Macedonia. In B.C. 30, they were defeated by M. Crassus, and driven across the Danube; and we find them, at a later time, partly settled between the Tyras (Dniester) and Borysthenes

(Dnieper), and partly at the mouth of the Danube, under the name of Peucini, from their inhabiting the island of Peuce, at the mouth of this river. (Strab. pp. 93, 118, 291, 294, 305; Liv. xl. 57; Tac. Ann. ii. 265, Germ. 46.)

Bastitani (also Bastetani, Bastuli), a people in Hispania Baetica on the coast (Strab. p. 139).

Bātānaea or Basanitis (Βαταναία, Βασανίτις): O. T. Bashan, Basan, a district of Palestine, E. of the Jordan, extending from the river Jabbok on the S. to Mt. Hermon, in the Antilibanus chain, on the N. [JUDAEA.]

Bātāvi or Bātāvi (Juv. viii. 51; Lucan, i. 431), a Celtic people who abandoned their homes in consequence of civil dissensions, before the time of Julius Caesar, and settled in the island formed by the Rhine, the Waal, and the Maas, which island was called after them Insula Batavorum. They were for a long time allies of the Romans in their wars against the Germans, and were of great service to the former by their excellent cavalry; but at length, exasperated by the oppressions of the Roman officers, they rose in revolt under Claudius Civilis, in A.D. 69, and were with great difficulty subdued. On their subjugation they were treated by the Romans with mildness, and were exempt from taxation. Their country, which also extended beyond the island S. of the Maas and Waal, was called, at a later time, Batavia. Their chief towns were Lugdunum (Leyden) and Batavodurum, between the Maas and the Waal. The Caninefates or Canninefates were a branch of the Batavi, and dwelt in the W. of the island. (Caes. B. G. iv. 10; Tac. Hist. iv. 12–37, v. 14, Germ. 29.)

Batavodūrum. [BATAVI.]

Bathycles (Βαθυκλῆς), a sculptor of Magnesia on the Maeander, constructed for the Lacedaemonians the colossal throne of the Amyclaeon Apollo, a sort of carved screen surrounding the statue and ornamented with mythological figures. He belongs to the early Ionian school soon after 600 B.C. (Paus. iii. 18, 6.)

Bāthyllus. 1. Of Samos, a beautiful youth beloved by Anacreon.—2. Of Alexandria, the freedman and favourite of Maecenas (Tac. Ann. i. 54), brought to perfection, together with Pylades of Cilicia, the imitative dance of the Pantomimus. Bathyllus excelled in comic, and Pylades in tragic personifications. (See Dict. Ant. s.v. Pantomimus.)

Batnae (Βάτναι; Βατναίος). 1. (Saruj), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, E. of the Euphrates, and SW. of Edessa, at about equal distances; founded by the Macedonians; celebrated for its annual fair of Indian and Syrian merchandise (Amm. Marc. xiv. 3).—2. (Dahab), a city in Syria, in the Beroëa and Hierapolis.

Bato (Βάτων). 1. The charioteer of Amphiarus, was swallowed up by the earth along with AMPHARAUS.—2. The name of 2 leaders of the Pannonians and Dalmatians in their insurrection in the reign of Augustus, A.D. 6. Tiberius finally subdued Dalmatia; Bato surrendered to him in 9 upon promise of pardon, and accompanied him to Italy. (Dio Cass. lv. 32, lvi. 11; Vell. Pat. ii. 110–115.)

Battīadae (Βαττιάδαι), kings of Cyrene during 3 generations. 1. Battus I., of Thera, led a colony to Africa at the command of the Delphic oracle, which he consulted about his stammering speech, and founded Cyrene about B.C. 631. He was the first king of Cyrene, his government was gentle and just, and after his death in 599 he was worshipped as a hero. (Hdt. iv. 157; Pind. Pyth. iv. 10, v. 89.) According to the Scholiast on Pindar, the founder was an Aristoteles, who was called Battus because that was the title of Libyan native kings.—2. Arcesilaus I., son of No. 1, reigned B. C. 599–583.—3. Battus II., surnamed 'the Happy,' son of No. 2, reigned B. C. 583–560? In his reign, Cyrene received a great number of colonists from various parts of Greece; and in consequence of the increased strength of his kingdom Battus was able to subdue the neighbouring Libyan tribes, and to defeat Apries, king of Egypt (570), who had espoused the cause of the Libyans (Hdt. iv. 150).—4. Arcesilaus II., son of No. 3, surnamed 'the Oppressive,' reigned about B. C. 560–550. In consequence of dissension between himself and his brothers, the latter withdrew from Cyrene, and founded Barca. He was strangled by his brother or friend, Learchus (Hdt. iv. 160).—5. Battus III., or 'the Lame,' son of No. 4, reigned about B. C. 550–530. In his time, Demonax, a Mantinean, gave a new constitution to the city, whereby the royal power was reduced within very narrow limits.—6. Arcesilaus III., son of No. 5, reigned about B. C. 530–514, was driven from Cyrene in an attempt to recover the ancient royal privileges, but recovered his kingdom with the aid of Samian auxiliaries. He endeavoured to strengthen himself by making submission to Cambyses in 525. He was, however, again obliged to leave Cyrene; he fled to Alazir, king of Barca, whose daughter he had married, and was there slain by the Barcaeans and some Cyrenaean exiles. (Hdt. iv. 162–167).—7. Battus IV., probably son of No. 6, of whose life we have no accounts.—8. Arcesilaus IV., probably son of No. 7, whose victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games, B. C. 466, is celebrated by Pindar in his 4th and 5th Pythian odes. At his death, about 450, a popular government was established.

Battiades. [CALLEMACHUS.]

Battus (Βάττος), a shepherd whom Hermes turned into a stone, because he broke a promise of silence regarding the cattle stolen by Hermes (Ov. Met. ii. 688; cf. Aut. Lib. 23).

Batulum, a town in Campania (Verg. Aen. vii. 739; Sil. viii. 566).

Baucis. [PHILEMON.]

Bauli (Bacolo), a collection of villas rather than a town, between Misenum and Baiæ in Campania.

Bävius and Maevius, two malevolent poets, who attacked the poetry of Virgil and Horace (Verg. Ecl. iii. 90; Hor. Epod. 10).

Bazira or Bezira (Βάζιρα; Βάζιροι; Bajour, NW. of Peshawur), a city in the Paropamisus, taken by Alexander on his march into India.

Bebrÿces (Βέβρυκες). 1. A mythical people in Bithynia, said to be of Thracian origin (Strab. p. 295) whose king, Amycus, slew Pollux [ARGONAUTÆ].—2. An ancient Iberian people on the coast of the Mediterranean, N. and S. of the Pyrenees: they possessed numerous herds of cattle (Sil. It. iii. 420; Zonar. viii. 21).

Bedriacum (Calvatone), also spelt Bebriacum and Betriacum, a small place in Cisalpine Gaul, between Cremona and Verona, celebrated for the defeat both of Otho and, a few months later, of the Vitellian troops, A. D. 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 43, iii. 15).

Begorritis Lacus (Ostrovo), a lake in Eordæa of Macedonia (Liv. xlii. 53).

Belbina (Βέλβινα; Βελβινίτης). 1. (St. George d'Arbori), an island in the Aegæan sea, off the S. coast of Attica (Hdt. viii. 125; Strab. p. 375).

—2. See BELEMINA.

Belemina (Βελμίνα), also called Belmina and Belbina, a town in the NW. of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia. The surrounding district was called Belminatis and Belbnatis. (Strab. p. 343; Paus. viii. 35.)

Belésis or Belësyes (Βέλεσις, Βέλεσυσ), a Chaldean priest at Babylon, who is said, in conjunction with Arbaces, the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. [ARBACES.] Belésis afterwards received the satrapy of Babylon from Arbaces. (Diod. ii. 24.)

Belgae, one of the three great people into which Caesar divides the population of Gaul. They were bounded on the N. by the Rhine, on the W. by the ocean, on the S. by the Sequana (Seine) and Matrona (Marne), and on the E. by the territory of the Treveri. They were of German origin, and had settled in the country, expelling or reducing to subjection the former inhabitants. They were the bravest of the inhabitants of Gaul, were subdued by Cæsar after a courageous resistance, and were the first Gallic people who threw off the Roman dominion. The Belgæ were subdivided into the tribes of the NERVII, BELLOVACI, REMI, SUSSIONES, MORINI, MENAPII, ADUATICI, and others; and the collective forces of the whole nation were more than a million. (Caes. B. G. i. 1, ii. 4, v. 24; Strab. p. 192.) There were also Belgæ in the south of Britain, whom Cæsar seems to place in Kent and Sussex; Ptolemy more inland, in parts of Wilts, Hants, and Somerset (Caes. B. G. v. 12; Ptol. ii. 3, 28). Ptolemy gives their real settlement, whereas Cæsar speaks of stray bodies of immigrants whom he came across.

Belgica. [GALLIA.]

Belgium, the name generally applied to the territory of the BELLOVACI, and of the tribes dependent upon the latter—namely, the Atrebatæ, Ambiani, Veliocassæ, Auleri, and Caleti. Belgium did not include the whole country inhabited by the Belgæ, for we find the Nervii, Remi, &c., expressly excluded from it. (Caes. B. G. v. 24.)

Belisarius, the greatest general of Justinian, was a native of Illyria and of mean extraction. In A. D. 534, he overthrew the Vandal kingdom in Africa, which had been established by Genseric about 100 years previously, and took prisoner the Vandal king, Gelimer, whom he led in triumph to Constantinople (Procop. Vand. i. 11, ii. 8). In 535–540, Belisarius carried on war against the Goths in Italy, and conquered Sicily, but he was recalled by the jealousy of Justinian. In 541–544 he again carried on war against the Goths in Italy, but was again recalled by Justinian, leaving his victories to be completed by his rival Narses in the complete overthrow of the Gothic kingdom, and the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna (Procop. Goth. i. 5, ii. 30; iii. 1–32, iv. 21). The last victory of Belisarius was gained in repelling an inroad of the Bulgarians, 559 (Theoph. 198). In 563 he was accused of a conspiracy against the life of Justinian; according to a popular tradition (which rests merely on the authority of Tzetzes in the 12th cent. and an anonymous writer of the 11th) he was deprived of his property, his eyes were put out, and he wandered as a beggar through Constantinople; but according to the more authentic account, he was merely imprisoned for a year in his own palace, and then restored to his honours (Theoph. 160, 198). He died in 565.—The story of his blindness and beggary—'date obolum Belisario'—though it should be rejected absolutely inasmuch as the silence of the earlier writers practically contradicts it, was revived by some modern writers and popularised by Marmontel; and it was even said that the statue in the Borghese collection, which Winckelmann showed to represent Augustus propitiating Nemesias, was Belisarius begging. As a military commander, and as the preserver of the empire against barbarian inroads, Belisarius ranks among the great men of antiquity: his private life was rendered unattractive by avarice and by his submission to his wife, the infamous Antonina.

Bellērōphon or Bellērōphontes (Βελλεροφών or Βελλεροφόντης), son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and Eurymede and grandson of Sisyphus (Il. vi. 155; Apollod. i. 9, 3); but according to Hyg. Fab. 191 he was son of Poseidon (cf. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 66). Some said that he was originally called Hipponous, and received the name Bellerophon from slaying the Corinthian Bellerus (probably a later addition to his story, manufactured to explain his name; Schol. ad Il. 6. 155, and Apollod. ii. 3). To be purified from the murder he fled to Proetus, whose wife, Antea, fell in love with the young hero; but as her offers were rejected by him, she accused him to her husband of having made attempts on her honour. Other accounts name the wife Sthenoboea. Her punishment is related in Apollod. ii. 3, 2, and was a subject for the Sthenoboea of Euripides. She is said to have mounted Pegasus and to have been thrown into the sea. Proetus, unwilling to kill Bellerophon with his own hands, sent him to his father-in-law, Iobates, king of Lycia, with a letter begging that the messenger should be killed the Chimaera with his arrows. Iobates, thus disappointed, sent Bellerophon against the Solymi and next against the Amazons. In these contests he was also victorious; and on his return to Lycia, being attacked by the bravest Lycians, whom Iobates had placed in ambush for the purpose, Bellerophon slew them all. Iobates, now seeing that it was hopeless to kill the hero, gave him his daughter (Philonoe, Anticlea, or Cassandra) in marriage, and made him his successor on the throne. Bellerophon became the father of Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodamia. At last Bellerophon drew upon himself the hatred of the gods, and, consumed by grief, wandered lonely through the Aleian field, avoiding the paths of men. This is all that Homer says respecting Bellerophon's later fate: some traditions related that he attempted to fly to heaven upon Pegasus, but that Zeus sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, which threw off the rider upon the earth, who became lame or blind in consequence. (Pind. Isth. vi. 44; Schol. ad Ol. xiii. 90; Hor. Od. iv. 11, 26.) Bellerophon was honoured as a god at Corinth (on whose coins and on those of her colonies Pegasus often appears), and also in Lycia (Paus. ii. 2, 24; Q. Smyrn. x. 162).—As regards the history and meaning of the story, it must be observed that the characteristic parts are the connexion with Pegasus and the fight with the Chimaera. The story of Proetus is one which is often related of others in much the same form. Homer tells nothing of Pegasus: it is not, however, necessary to suppose that the Pegasus story is everywhere post-Homeric. Homer may have adopted the Corinthian hero for his Lycian romance before the connexion with Pegasus was fully established: for it is clear that the local Corinthian myths combined the two at some time or other. In Bellerophon some see merely a sun-god akin to Perseus.

put to death. Iobates accordingly sent him to kill the monster Chimaera, thinking that he was sure to perish in the contest. After obtaining possession of the winged horse, PEGASUS, Bellerophon rose with him in the air, and Others lay stress on his descent from Glaucus, a sea-god, and Poseidon, combining this with the descent of Pegasus from Poseidon; the winged horse, they say, symbolises the clouds, and the fight with the Chimaera, a thunderstorm in which Bellerophon, the heavenly rider, destroys the evil elements of the storm. [See further under CHIMAERA and PEGASUS.] Though Bellerophon is sometimes represented as an armed warrior, he most commonly appears, when mounted on Pegasus, clad in chlamys and petasus, with a spear in his right hand.

Belli, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Bellōna (originally Duellona, Varr. L. L. v. 73), the Roman goddess of war, was probably a Sabine divinity = Nerio, the wife of Mars or the personification of his power. [See MARS.] She has all the attributes of ENYO in the literature influenced by Greek, following Mars with weapons, or described as armed with a bloody scourge. (Verg. Aen. viii. 703.) During the Samnite wars, in B.C. 296, App. Claudius Caecus vowed a temple to her, which was erected in the Campus Martius, outside the Pomerium, as a deity of trouble (Liv. x. 19; Ov. Fast. vi. 199). A further development came from Asia Minor after the Mithridatic wars and the attributes of the goddess of Comana (a moon-goddess and a war-goddess) were transferred to Bellona. Hence the fanatic character of the Bellonarii, her priests, who wounded themselves in the processions, attended with trumpets and cymbals (Plut. Sull. 9; Strab. p. 535; Tibull. i. 6, 43; Mart. xii. 57; Lucan, i. 565).

Bellovāci, the most powerful of the Belgae, dwelt in the modern Beauvais, between the Seine, Oise, Somme, and Bresle. In Caesar's time they could bring 100,000 men into the field, but they were subdued by Caesar with the other Belgae (Caes. B. G. ii. 4, 8, vii. 59).

Bēlon or Baelon (Βελών, Βαιλών, nr. Bolonia, Ru.), a seaport town in Hispania Baetica on a river of the same name (now Barbate), the usual place for crossing over to Tingis in Mauretania (Strab. p. 140).

Bēlus (Βήλος), son of Poseidon and Libya or Eurynome, twin-brother of Agenor, and father of Aegyptus and Danaus (Apollod. ii. 1, 4; Hdt. vii. 61; Paus. iv. 23; Aesch. Suppl. 318). He was properly the national deity of various Semitic nations, worshipped as Baal or Bel, and, while sometimes identified by the Greeks with Zeus, was also regarded as the ancestral hero of those nations from whom the legends about him were transplanted to Greece and there became mixed up with Greek myths.

Bēlus (Βήλος; Nahr Naman), a river of Phoenicia, rising at the foot of M. Carmel, and falling into the sea close to the S. of Ptolemais (Acre), celebrated for the tradition that its fine sand first led the Phoenicians to the invention of glass (Plin. v. 75).

Bēnacus Lacus (Lago di Garda), a lake in the N. of Italy (Gallia Transpadana), out of which the Mincius flows (Verg. Georg. ii. 160, Aen. x. 205; Plin. iii. 131).

Bendis (Βενδῖς, Βενδίδος), a Thracian goddess whose worship was at an early period introduced into Attica by Thracian metoeci (Plat. Rep. 327; Strab. p. 470; Hesych. s.v.). Livy (xxxviii. 41) mentions a temple in her honour near the Thracian Hebrus, B.C. 189. She was identified by the Greeks with Artemis and with Hecate for reasons which are easily understood if she was, as is stated, a goddess of the moon and also of hunting among the Thracians. The epithet of the Thracian Bendis was διλογχος (Cratin. ap. Hesych.), which, according to Hesychius, signifies either the huntress or the goddess who, like Hecate (Hes. Th. 413), reigns both in earth and in heaven. It is clear that Herodotus (v. 7) identifies her with Artemis. As a goddess of light she was honoured with a torch-race at the Bendideia in the Peiraeus, with the peculiarity, doubtless Thracian, that it was a mounted race. [Dict. Ant. s.v. Lampadedromia.]

Bēnēventum (Benevento), a town in Samnium on the Appia Via, at the junction of the two valleys through which the Sabatus and Calor flow, formerly called Maleventum or Μαλδέντων (probably from an original Maloeis). It was one of the most ancient towns in Italy, having been founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes. In the Samnite wars it was subdued by the Romans, who sent a colony thither in B.C. 268, and changed its name Maleventum into Beneventum (Liv. ix. 27; Fest. s.v. Beneventum). It was colonised a second time, by Augustus, and was hence called Colonia Julia Concordia Augusta Felix (Strab. p. 250; Orell. 907). The modern town has several Roman remains, among others a triumphal arch of Trajan.

Bērēcyntiā. [RHEA.]

Bērēniē (Βερενίκη), a Macedonic form of Pherenice (Φερενίκη), i.e. "Bringing Victory."

1. A daughter of Lagos, first the wife of an obscure Macedonian, and afterwards of Ptolemy I. Soter, who fell in love with her when she came to Egypt in attendance on his bride Eurydice, Antipater's daughter. She was celebrated for her beauty and virtue, and was the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. (Paus. i. 6; Plut. Pyrrh. 4; Just. xvi. 2; Theoc. xvii. 34).—2. Daughter of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, and wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who divorced Laodice in order to marry her, B.C. 249. On the death of Ptolemy, B.C. 247, Antiochus recalled Laodice, who notwithstanding caused him to be poisoned, and murdered Berenice and her son (Athen. p. 45; Just. xxvii. 1).—3. Daughter of Magas, king of Cyrene, and wife of Ptolemy III. Euergetes. She was put to death by her son Ptolemy IV. Philopator on his accession to the throne, 221. The famous hair of Berenice, which she dedicated for her husband's safe return from his Syrian expedition in the temple of Arsinoe at Zephyrium, was said to have become a constellation. It was celebrated by Callimachus in a poem, of which we have a translation by Catullus. (Just. xxvi. 3, xxx. 1; Polyb. v. 86, xv. 25).—4. Otherwise called Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, succeeded her father on the throne, B.C. 81, and married Ptolemy X. (Alexander II.), but was murdered by her husband nineteen days after her marriage (Paus. i. 9; Appian, B. C. i. 414).—5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, and eldest sister of the famous Cleopatra, was placed on the throne by the Alexandriues when they drove out her father,

B.C. 58. She next married Archelaus, but was put to death with her husband, when Gabinus restored Auletes, 55. (Dio Cass. xxxix. 12, 55-58; Plut. Ant. 3.)—6. Sister of Herod the Great, married Aristobulus, who was put to death, B.C. 6. She afterwards went to Rome, where she spent the remainder of her life. She was the mother of Agrippa I.—7. Daughter of Agrippa I., married her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Herod, A.D. 48, Berenice, then twenty years old, lived with her brother Agrippa II., not without suspicion of incestuous commerce with him. She gained the love of Titus, who was only withheld from making her his wife by fear of offending the Romans by such a step (Juv. vi. 158; Tac. Hist. ii. 2, 81; Dio Cass. lxxvi. 15, 18).

Bērēnīcē (Βερενίκη: Βερενικεύς), the name of several cities of the period of the Ptolemies. 1. Formerly Eziongeber (Ru. nr. Akabah), in Arabia, at the head of the Sius Aelanites, or E. branch of the Red Sea (Joseph. Ant. viii. 6.)—2. In Upper Egypt (for so it was considered, though it lay a little S. of the parallel of Syene), on the coast of the Red Sea, on a gulf called Sinus Immundus (ἀκάθαρτος κόλπος, now Foul Bay), where its ruins are still visible. It was named after the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, who built it, and made a road hence to Coptos, so that it became a chief emporium for the commerce of Egypt with Arabia and India. Under the Romans it was the residence of a praefectus. (Strab. pp. 770, 815.)—3. B. Panchrysos (B. πάγχρυσος or ἡ κατὰ Σάβας), on the Red Sea coast in Aethiopia, considerably S. of the above; so called from the neighbouring gold mines worked by the Egyptians. (Strab. p. 771; Plin. vi. 170.)—4. B. Epidires (B. ἐπὶ Δειρῆς), on the Prom. Dirra, on the W. side of the entrance to the Red Sea (Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb). (Strab. p. 769.)—5. (Ben Ghazi, Ru.), in Cyrenaica, formerly Hesperis (Ἑσπερίς), the fabled site of the Gardens of the Hesperides, a colony of Arcsilas IV. It took its later name from the wife of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, and was the westernmost of the five cities of the Lybian Pentapolis.

Bergistāni, a people in the NE. of Spain between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, whose capital was Bergium (Liv. xxxiv. 16, 21).

Bergōmum (Bergomas, -atis: Bergamo), a town of the Orobii in Gallia Cisalpina, between Comum and Brixia, afterwards a municipium.

Bermius Mons (τὸ Βέρμιον ὄρος: Verria), a mountain in Macedonia between the Haliacmon and Ludias (Hdt. viii. 138; Strab. p. 330; Bora, Liv. xlv. 29).

Berōē (Βερόη). 1. A Trojan woman, wife of Doryclus, whose form Iris assumed when she persuaded the women to set fire to the ships of Aeneas in Sicily (Verg. Aen. v. 620). 2. A Nereid (Verg. Georg. iv. 341).—3. Daughter of Adonis and Aphrodite.

Beroea (Βέροια, also Βέρροια, Βερόη: Βεροεύς, Βεροιαῖος). 1. (Verria), one of the most ancient towns of Macedonia, on one of the lower ranges of Mt. Bermius, and on the Astraeus, a tributary of the Haliacmon, SW. of Pella, and about twenty miles from the sea. It was attacked unsuccessfully by the Athenians, under Callias, who deviated from their line of march between Pydna and Potidaea (Thuc. i. 61).—2. (Beria), a town in the interior of Thrace, was under the later Roman empire, together with Philippopolis, one of the most important military posts (Amn. Marc. xxvii. 4, xxxi. 9).—3. (Aleppo or Haleb), a town in Syria, near Antioch, enlarged by Seleu-cus Nicator, who gave it the Macedonian name of Beroea (Strab. p. 751; Procop. B. P. ii. 7). It is called Helbon or Chelbon in Ezekiel (xxvii. 18), and Chalep in the Byzantine writers, a name still retained in the modern Haleb, for which Europeans have substituted Aleppo.

Bērōsus (Βηρωσός or Βηρωσσός), a priest of Belus at Babylon, lived in the reign of Antiochus II. (B.C. 261-246), and wrote in Greek a history of Babylonia in three books (called Βαβυλωνικά, and sometimes Χαλδαϊκά or Ἰστορίαι Χαλδαϊκά). It embraced the earliest traditions about the human race, a description of Babylonia and its population, and a chronological list of its kings down to the time of the great Cyrus. Berosus says that he derived the materials for his work from the archives in the temple of Belus. The work itself is lost, but considerable fragments of it are preserved in Josephus, Eusebius, Syncellus, and the Christian Fathers; and even these remnants are of great value.—Editions. By Richter, Lips. 1825, and in Didot's Fragmenta Historieorum Graecorum, vol. ii. Paris, 1848.

Bērytus (Βηρυτός: Βηρύτιος: Beirut, Ru.), one of the oldest seaports of Phoenicia, stood on a promontory near the mouth of the river Magoras (Nahr Beirut), half way between Byblus and Sidon. It was destroyed by the Syrian king Tryphon (B.C. 140), and restored by Agrippa under Augustus, who made it a colony. It afterwards became a celebrated seat of learning. (Strab. p. 756.)

Bēsa. [ANTINOÖPOLIS.]

Bessi, a fierce and powerful Thracian people, who dwelt along the whole of Mt. Haemus as far as the Euxine. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans (B.C. 168), the Bessi were attacked by them, and subdued. (Hdt. vii. 111; Strab. p. 318; Liv. xxxix. 53.)

Bessus (Βήσσος), satrap of Bactria under Darius III., seized Darius soon after the battle of Arbela, B.C. 331. Pursued by Alexander in the following year, Bessus put Darius to death, and fled to Bactria where he assumed the title of king. He was betrayed by two of his followers to Alexander, who put him to death. (Curt. v. 7, vii. 3, 10; Arrian, iii. 19, 28.)

Bestia, Calpurnius. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 121, and consul 111, when he carried on war against Jugurtha, but having received large bribes he concluded a peace with the Numidian king. On his return to Rome he was in consequence accused and condemned (Sall. Jug. 27, 40, 65; Cic. Brut. 34; Appian, B. C. i. 37).—2. L., one of the Catilinarian conspirators, B.C. 63, was at the time tribune plebis designatus, and not actually tribune as Sallust says. In 49 he was aedile, and in 57 was an unsuccessful candidate for the praetorship, notwithstanding his bribery, for which offence he was brought to trial in the following year and condemned, although defended by Cicero. (Sall. Cat. 17, 43; Appian, B. C. ii. 3.)

Betasii, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Tuugri and Nervii, in the neighbourhood of Beetz in Brabant (Tac. Hist. iv. 56, 66).

Beudos Vetus (Aghigi Kara), a town of Phrygia five miles from Synnada, between that town and Anabura, mentioned in the march of Manlius (Liv. xxxviii. 15). Its name Vetus probably is opposed to the newer Synnada.

Bezira. [BAZIRA.]

Biānor. 1. Also called Oenus or Aucus, son of Tiberis and Manto, is said to have built the town of Mantua, and to have called it after his mother (Serv. ad Aen. x. 198).—2. A Bithynian, the author of twenty-one epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Augustus and Tiberius.

Bias (Bías). 1. Son of Amythaon, and brother of the seer Melampus. He married Pero, daughter of Neleus, whom her father had refused to give to any one unless he brought him the oxen of Iphiclus. These Melampus obtained by his courage and skill, and so won the princess for his brother. Melampus also gained for Bias a third of the kingdom of Argos, in consequence of his curing the daughters of Proetus and the other Argive women of their madness. (Paus. iv. 36; Hdt. ix. 34; Od. xv. 225.)—2. Of Priene in Ionia, one of the Seven Sages of Greece, flourished about B.C. 550. He is the reputed author of φιλεῖν ὡς μισήσοντας (Arist. Rhet. ii. 13; cf. Soph. Aj. 680; Cic. de Am. 16, 59; Diog. Laërt. i. 84, 88). He also advised his countrymen, hard pressed by Cyrus, to abandon their city and settle in Sardinia.

Bibaculus, M. Furius, a Roman poet, born at Cremona, B.C. 103, wrote iambics, epigrams, and a poem on Caesar's Gaulish wars; the opening line in the latter poem is parodied by Horace. ('Furius hiberna cana nive conspuet Alpes'; Sat. ii. 5, 41). Bibaculus had written 'Jupiter' &c., in his poem, in which he praised Caesar, attacking him later in his career, probably because he aimed at the monarchy. It is probable that Bibaculus also wrote a poem entitled Aethiopsis, containing an account of the death of Memnon by Achilles, and that the turgidus Alpinus of Horace (Sat. i. 10, 36) is no other than Bibaculus, as Acro asserts. Porphyrio, however, says that this refers to a Cornelius Alpinus; so that the matter remains doubtful. He is mentioned also in Quint. x. 1, 96; Plin. praef. 24; and from Suet. Gramm. 4 it may be gathered that he lived to a great age, and may therefore have been living when Horace wrote his Satires. The attacks of Horace against Bibaculus may probably be owing to the fact that the poems of Bibaculus contained insults against the Caesars. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34.)

Bibracte (Autun), the chief town of the Aedui in Gallia Lugdunensis, afterwards Augustodunum (Caes. B. G. i. 23).

Bibrax (Bièvre), a town of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, not far from the Aisne.

Bibulus, Calpurnius. 1. M., curule aedile B.C. 65, praetor 62, and consul 59, in each of which years he had C. Julius Caesar as his colleague. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocratical party, but was unable in his consulship to resist the powerful combination of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Caesar's agrarian law, he withdrew from the popular assemblies altogether; whence it was said in joke, that it was the consulship of Julius and Caesar. (Suet. Jul. 9, 49; Cic. pro Dom. 15; ad Att. ii. 19, 20.) In 51 Bibulus was proconsul of Syria; and in the civil war he commanded Pompey's fleet in the Adriatic, but without success, for Caesar succeeded in crossing the Adriatic. Bibulus then kept the sea to prevent other forces of Caesar from following, and died near Corcyra B.C. 48, before the battle of Dyrrachium (Caes. B. C. iii. 5-18; Dio Cass. xli. 48). He married Porcia, the daughter of Cato Uticensis, by whom he had three sons, two of whom were murdered by the soldiers of Gabinius, in Egypt, 50.—2. L., son of No. 1, was a youth at his father's death, and was brought up by M. Brutus, who married his mother Porcia, and whose memoirs he wrote (Plut.

Brut. 13, 23). He fought with Brutus at the battle of Philippi in 42, but he was afterwards pardoned by Antony, whose legate he was in Syria. He died there B.C. 31, shortly before the battle of Actium. (Appian, B. C. iv. 38, 104, 136, v. 132.)

Bidis (Bidinus, Bidensis), a small town in Sicily, W. of Syracuse (Cic. Verr. ii. 22; Plin. iii. 91).

Biennus (Viano), a town of Crete, S. of Mt. Dicte and E. of Gortyna.

Bigerra (Becerra?), a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis (Liv. xxi. 41).

Bigerriónes or Bigerri, a people in Aquitania near the Pyrenees, whose name remains in Bigorre (Caes. B. G. iii. 27). Their capital was Turba, now Tarbes.

Bilbilis (Cerro de Bambola), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a municipium with the surname Augusta, on the river Salo, also called Bilbilis (Xalon), was the birthplace of the poet Martial, and was celebrated for its manufactories in iron and gold (Strab. p. 162; Plin. xxxiv. 144; Mart. i. 49, iv. 55, x. 103).

Billaeus (Βιλλαῖος: Filyias), a river of Bithynia, rising in the Hypii M., and falling into the Pontus Euxinus 20 stadia (2 geog. miles) E. of Tium. Some made it the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia, but it lies east of the strict Bithynian boundary.

Bingium (Bingen), a town on the Rhine in Gallia Belgica (Tac. Hist. iv. 70; Amm. Marc. xviii. 2).

Bion (Βίων). 1. Of Smyrna, a bucolic poet, about B.C. 280; he spent the last years of his life in Sicily, where he was poisoned. He was older than Moschus, who laments his untimely death, and calls himself the pupil of Bion (Mosch. Id. iii.). Bion is best known to us from his lament for Adonis. He is refined, and his versification fluent and elegant, but he is inferior to Theocritus in strength and depth of feeling.—Editions, including Moschus, by Jacobs, Gotha, 1795; Wakefield, London, 1795; Hartung, 1858; Ahrens, 1875.—2. Of Borysthenes, near the mouth of the Dnieper, flourished about B.C. 250. He was sold as a slave, when young, and received his liberty from his master, a rhetorician. He studied at Athens, and embraced the later Cyrenaic philosophy, as expounded by Theodoros. He lived a considerable time at the court of Antigonos Gonatas, king of Macedonia. Bion was noted for his sharp sayings, whence Horace speaks of persons delighting Bioneis sermonibus et sale nigro (Epist. ii. 2, 60; cf. Cic. Tusc. iii. 26; Athen. p. 591).

Birtha (Deir), on the Tigris, below Zenobia, was a fortress built by Alexander (Ptol. v. 18; Amm. Marc. xx. 7, 17).

Bisaltia (Βισαλτία: Βισάλτης), a district in Macedonia on the W. bank of the Strymon. The Bisaltae were Thracians, and at the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (B.C. 480) they were ruled by a Thracian prince, who was independent of Macedonia; but at the time of the Peloponnesian war they were subject to Macedonia (Hdt. vii. 115, viii. 116; Thuc. iv. 109).

Bisanthē (Βισάνθη: Βισανθηρός: Rodosto), subsequently Rhaedestum or Rhaedestus, a town in Thrace on the Propontis, with a good harbour, was founded by the Samians, and was in later times one of the great bulwarks of the neighbouring Byzantium (Hdt. vii. 137; Procop. de Aedif. iv. 9).

Bistōnes (Βίστονες), a Thracian people between Mt. Rhodope and the Aegean sea, on the lake Bistonis in the neighbourhood of Abdera, through whose land Xerxes marched on his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480).—From the worship of Dionysus in Thrace the Bacchic women are called Bistōnides. (Hdt. vii. 110; Strab. p. 331; Plin. iv. 42; Hor. Od. ii. 19, 20.)

Bithynia (Βιθυνία: Βιθυνός), a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the W. by Mysia and Mt. Olympus, on the N. by the Pontus Euxinus, on the E. by Paphlagonia, and on the S. by Phrygia Epictetus and Galatia, was possessed at an early period by Thracian tribes from the neighbourhood of the Strymon, called Thyni (Θυνοί) and Bithyni (Βιθυνοί), of whom the former dwelt on the coast, the latter in the interior. The earlier inhabitants, who had been subdued by the Thracian immigrants and had amalgamated with them, were the BEERYCES, CAUCONES, and MYGDONES, and in the NE. part of the district the MARIANDYNI (Hdt. i. 23, vii. 75; Strab. pp. 541, 563). The country was subdued by the Lydians, and afterwards became a part of the Persian empire under Cyrus, and was governed by the satraps of Phrygia. During the decline of the Persian empire, the N. part of the country became independent, under native princes, called ἑταρχοί, who resisted Alexander and his successors, and established a kingdom, which is usually considered to begin with Zipoetes (about B.C. 287) or his son Nicomedes I. (B.C. 278), and which lasted till the death of Nicomedes III. (B.C. 74), who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans (Appian, B. C. i. 111; Liv. Ep. 93). It was at first a separate province, but in 65 was combined with Pontus, forming one province which extended to the Halys, and included at first Amisus, being divided by Pompey into 11 districts (Plut. Pomp. 38; Liv. Ep. 102; Strab. p. 541). It was governed by a propraetor at first, by a proconsul after 27 (Dio Cass. liii. 13; Tac. Ann. i. 74, xvi. 18), with the designation Bithynia Pontus. It was taken back into the imperial jurisdiction by Trajan, who sent Pliny the Younger with the title legatus pro praetore. About A.D. 380 Theodosius divided the combined provinces into Bithynia and Pontica prima. Bithynia was a fertile country, intersected with wooded mountains, the highest of which was the Mysian Olympus, on its S. border. Its chief rivers were the SANGARIUS and the BILLEUS: its chief towns Nicomedia, Chalcedon, Heracleia, Prusa, Nicaea, and Dascylium.

Bithynium (Βιθύσιον: Bolī), aft. Claudiopolis, a city of Bithynia, the birthplace of Hadrian's favourite Antinoüs (Dio Cass. lxi. 11).

Biton (Βίτων), a mathematician, the author of an extant work on Military Machines (κατασκευαί πολεμικῶν ὀργάνων καὶ καταπελτικῶν), whose history is unknown. Edited in Wescher's Poliorctica, Paris, 1867.

Biton and Cleobis (Κλεόβις), sons of Cydippe, a priestess of Hera at Argos. They were celebrated for their affection to their mother, whose chariot they once dragged during a festival to the temple of Hera, a distance of 45 stadia. The priestess prayed to the goddess to grant them what was best for mortals; and during the night they both died while asleep in the temple. (Hdt. i. 31; Paus. ii. 20; Cic. Tusc. i. 47; Val. Max. v. 4.)

Bituitus, in inscriptions BETULTUS, king of the Arverni in Gaul, joined the Allobroges in their war against the Romans. Both the Arverni and the Allobroges were defeated, B.C. 121, at the confluence of the Rhone and the Isara, by Q. Fabius Maximus. Bituitus was subsequently taken prisoner and sent to Rome. (Liv. Ep. 61; Vell. Pat. ii. 10.)

Bituriges, a numerous and powerful Celtic people in Gallia Aquitania, had in early times the supremacy over the other Celts in Gaul (Liv. v. 34). They were divided into, 1. Bit. Cubi, separated from the Carnutes and Aedui by the Liger, and bounded on the S. by the Lemovices, in the country of the modern Bourges; their capital was AVARICUM. (Strab. p. 190; Cass. B. G. vii. 15.) 2. Bit. Vivisci or Ubisci on the Garumna: their capital was BURDIGALA.

Blaesus, C. Sempronius, consul with Cn. Servilius Caepio, B.C. 253, in the 1st Punic war. The two consuls sailed to the coast of Africa, and on their return were overtaken off Cape Palinurus by a tremendous storm, in which 150 ships perished (Polyb. i. 39).

Blaesus, Junius. 1. Governor of Pannonia at the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, when the formidable insurrection of the legions broke out in that province. He obtained the government of Africa in 21, where he gained a victory over Tacfarinas. On the fall of his uncle Sejanus in 31, he was deprived of the priestly offices which he held, and in 36 put an end to his own life, to avoid falling by the hand of the executioner. (Tac. Ann. i. 16, iii. 72, v. 7, vi. 40; Dio Cass. lviii. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 125.)—2. Son of the above, who died with his father.—3. Probably a grandson: governor of Gallia Lugdunensis A.D. 70; an adherent of Vitellius, but poisoned by him on a suspicion of his wealth and popularity (Tac. Hist. i. 59, ii. 59, iii. 38.)

Blanda. 1. (Blaños), a town of the Lacetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.—2. (St. Blasio), a town in Lucania.

Blandus, a town on the borders of Cappadocia and Pontus, on the road from Sebasteia to Melitena, 23 miles from the former.

Blaricum (Blerijk), a town of the Menapii on the Mosa or Maas.

Blascou (Brescou), a small island in the Gallicus Sinus, off the town of Agatha.

Blasio, M. Helvius, praetor B.C. 197, defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took Illiturgi (Liv. xxxii. 27).

Blaundus (Suleimanli), a town of Lydia (sometimes reckoned in Phrygia); it formed part of the conventus of Sardis. It stood on the river Hippourios between Tripolis and Trajanopolis. There are fine architectural remains. The supposed Blados of Mysia near Ancyra (Strab. p. 567) is probably a loose reference to this place.

Blavia (Blaye), a town of the Santones, in Gallia Aquitania, on the Garumna.

Blemyes (Βλέμυες, Βλέμυες), an Aethiopian people, on the borders of Upper Egypt, to which their predatory incursions were very troublesome in the times of the Roman emperors (Strab. p. 819; Vit. Aurclian. 33; Procop. B. Pers. i. 19).

Blera (Bleranus: Bicda), a town in Etruria, on the Via Clodia, between Forum Clodii and Tuscania: there are many remains of the ancient town and of Etruscan tombs at Bicda (Strab. p. 226).

Blosius or Blossius, the name of a noble family in Campania.—One of this family, C. Blosius of Cumae, was a philosopher, a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus, and a friend of Tib. Gracchus. After the death of Gracchus (B.C. 133) he fled to Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, and on the conquest of Aristonicus by the Romans, Blosius put an end to his own life for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans. (Cic. de Am. 11, 37; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 20.)

Boadicea, more correctly spelt Boudicca, queen of the Iceni in Britain, having been shamefully treated by the Romans, who violated her two daughters, incited an insurrection of the Britons against their oppressors during the absence of Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman governor, on an expedition to the island of Mona. She took the Roman colonies of Camulodunum, Londinium, and other places, and slew nearly 70,000 Romans and their allies. She was at length defeated by Suetonius Paulinus, and put an end to her own life, A.D. 61. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 31, Agr. 15; Dio Cass. lxi. 1-12.)

Boagrius (Βοάγριος), a river in Locris, also called Manes, flows past Thronium into the Sinus Maliacus.

Bocchus (Βόκχος). 1. King of Mauretania, and father-in-law of Jugurtha, with whom at first he made war against the Romans, but whom he afterwards delivered up to Sulla, the quaestor of Marius, B.C. 106 (Sall. Jug. 80-120; Plut. Mar. 8-32).—2. Son of the preceding, reigned along with his brother Bogudes over Mauretania. Bocchus and Bogudes assisted Caesar in his war against the Pompeians in Africa, B.C. 46; and in 45 Bogudes joined Caesar in his war in Spain. After the murder of Caesar, Bocchus sided with Octavianus, and Bogudes with Antony. When Bogudes was in Spain in 38, Bocchus usurped the sole government of Mauretania, in which he was confirmed by Octavianus. He died about 33, and his kingdom became a Roman province. Bogudes had previously betaken himself to Antony, and was killed on the capture of Methone by Agrippa in 31. (Appian, B. C. ii. 96, iv. 54; Dio Cass. xlviii. 45, xlix. 33.)

Bodencus or Bodincus. [PADUS.]

Bodotria or Boderia Aestuariū (Firth of Forth), an estuary on the E. coast of Scotland (Tac. Agr. 23).

Boeae (Boial: Βοιάρης: Vatka), a town in the S. of Laconia, near C. Malea (Strab. p. 364; Paus. i. 27, iii. 22).

Boebē (Βοιβη: Βοιβεύς), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, on the W. shore of the lake Boebēis (Karla), into which several rivers of Thessaly flow (Il. ii. 712; Hdt. vii. 129; Strab. pp. 430, 441).

Boēdrōmia (Βοηδρόμιος), 'the helper in distress,' a surname of Apollo at Atheus, because he had assisted the Athenians. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Boedromia.)

Boeōa. [EPHYRA.]

Boeōtia (Βοιωτία: Βοιωτός: part of Livadia), a district of Greece, bounded N. by Opuntian Locris, E. by the Euboean sea, S. by Attica, Megaris, and the Corinthian Gulf, and W. by Phocis. It is nearly surrounded by mountains: namely, Helicon and Parnassus on the W., Cithaeron and Parnes on the S., the Opuntian mountains on the N., and a range of mountains along the whole sea-coast on the E. The country contains several fertile plains, of which the two most important were the valley of the Asopus in the S., the inhabitants of which were called Parasopii, and the valley of the Cephissus in the N. (the upper part, however, belonged to Phocis), the inhabitants of which were called Epicephissii. In the former valley the chief towns were THEBAE, TANAGRA, THESPIAE, and PLATAEAE; in the latter the chief towns were ORCHOMENUS, CHAERONEA, CORONEA, LEBADEA, and HALIARTUS; the latter valley included the lake COPAIS. The surface of Boeotia is about 1080 square miles. The atmosphere was damp and thick, to which circumstance some of the ancients attributed the dullness of the Boeotian intellect, with which the Athenians frequently made merry, but the deficiency of the Boeotians in this respect was more probably owing, as has been well remarked, to the extraordinary fertility of their country, which probably depressed their intellectual and moral energies.—In the earliest legendary times Boeotia was inhabited by various tribes, the Aones (whence the country was called Aonia), Temmices, Hyantes, Leleges, &c. (Strab. p. 401; Paus. ix. 5). Orchomenus was inhabited by the powerful tribe of the Minyans, and Thebes by the Cadmeans, the reputed descendants of CADMUS. It is probable that the whole of Boeotia then formed two principalities, one subject to Orchomenus (the older city of the two), the other to Thebes. The Boeotians or Arnaeans who conquered both these cities were an Aeolian people, who originally occupied Arne in Thessaly, from which they were expelled by the Thessalians, according to Thuc. i. 12, about 60 years after the Trojan war. Boeotia was then divided into 14 independent states, which formed a league, with Thebes at its head. The chief magistrates of the confederacy were the Boeotarchs, elected annually, 2 by Thebes and 1 by each of the other states; but as the number of the states was different at different times, that of the Boeotarchs also varied. The government in most states was an aristocracy. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Boeotarches.)

Boëthius, or Boëtius, whose full name was ANICUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOËTHIUS, a Roman statesman and author, belonging to the family of the Anicii, was born at Rome between A.D. 470 and 475. He was famous for his general learning, and especially for his knowledge of Greek philosophy, which according to a common account (though of doubtful authority) he studied under Proclus at Athens. His wife was Rusticiana, the daughter of Symmachus. He was consul in 510, and was treated with great distinction by Theodoric the Great; but having incurred the suspicion of the latter, by advocating the cause of the Italians against the oppressions of the Goths, he was involved in the ruin of the Senator Albinus who was accused of a treasonable correspondence with Byzantium, and whom he defended, declaring that, if Albinus was guilty, he and the whole senate were guilty also. Upon this, being accused of upholding the senatorial authority against Theodoric, and of being privy to an address from the senate to the Emperor of the East (his signature to which he alleged to be a forgery), he was imprisoned in a castle near Pavia and was executed in 525. During his imprisonment he wrote his celebrated work De Consolatione Philosophiae, in 5 books, which is composed as a dialogue, and, like the Menippean satirae, alternately in prose and verse.

The diction is puro and elegant, and the sentiments are noble and exalted, showing that the author had a real belief in prayer and Providence, though he makes no reference to Christianity. Boëthius was the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece. He translated many of the works of the Greek philosophers, especially of Aristotle, and wrote commentaries upon them, several of which have come down to us. He also wrote a commentary, in 6 books, upon the Topica of Cicero, which is also extant. In the ignorance of Greek writers which prevailed from the 6th to the 14th century, Boëthius was looked upon as the head and type of all philosophers, as Augustin was of all theology and Virgil of all literature; but after the introduction of the works of Aristotle into Europe in the 13th century, Boëthius's fame gradually died away.—The best edition of his collected works was printed at Basel, 1570; the last edition of his De Consolatione is by Obbarius, Jenæ, 1843.

Boëthius (Βοηθός). 1. A Stoic philosopher of the 2nd century B.C., a pupil of Diogenes the Stoic (the Babylonian): he wrote several works, from one of which Cicero quotes (de Div. i. 8, ii. 21; Diog. Laërt. vii. 148).—2. A Peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Sidon in Phœnicia, a disciple of Andronicus of Rhodes, and an instructor of the philosopher Strabo. He therefore flourished about B.C. 30. He wrote several works, all of which are now lost (Strab. p. 757).—3. A sculptor and engraver of Chalcedon (according to the probable reading in Paus. v. 17, 4). His most famous work was a bronze of a boy strangling a goose, of which there is a marble copy in the Vatican (Plin. xxxiv. 84).

Bogudes. [Bocchus, No. 2.]

Boii, one of the most powerful of the Celtic people, said to have dwelt originally in Transalpine Gaul, but in what part of the country is uncertain. At an early time they migrated in two great swarms, one of which crossed the Alps and settled in the country between the Po and the Apennines; the other crossed the Rhine and settled in the part of Germany called Boihemum (Bohemia) after them, and between the Danube and the Tyrol (Polyb. ii. 17; Liv. v. 35). The Boii in Italy long carried on a fierce struggle with the Romans, co-operating with Hannibal in the second Punic war; but they were at length subdued by the consul P. Scipio in B.C. 191, and were subsequently incorporated in the province of Gallia Cisalpina (Polyb. ii. 20, iii. 40, 67; Liv. xxi. 25, xxxiii. 24, xxxii. 29, xxxiii. 46, xxxvi. 38). The Boii in Germauy maintained their power longer, but were at length subdued by the Marcomanni, and expelled from the country. We find 82,000 Boii taking part in the Helvetic migration; and after the defeat of the Helvetians (B.C. 58), Caesar allowed these Boii to dwell among the Aedui (Caes. B. G. i. 4, 28).

Boiorix, a chieftain of the Boii, fought against the Romans, B.C. 194 (Liv. xxxiv. 46).

Boium, a town of Doris (Thuc. i. 103; Strab. p. 427).

Bōla, Bōlae or Vōlae (Bōlānus), an ancient town of the Aequi, belonging to the Latin league, not mentioned in later times (Verg. Aen. vi. 776; Liv. iv. 49, vi. 2).

Bolānus, Vettius, governor of Britain in A.D. 69, is praised by Statius in the poem (Silv. 7. 2) addressed to Crispinus, the son of Bolanus (Tac. Ann. xv. 3, Hist. ii. 65, 97, Agr. 3, 16).

Bolbe (Βόλβη: Beshék), a lake in Macedonia, empties itself by a short river into the Strymonic gulf near Bromiscus and Aulon: the lake is now about twelve miles in length, and six or eight in breadth.—There was a town of the same name upon the lake (Thuc. i. 58, iv. 103; Aesch. Pers. 486).

Bolbitine (Βολβίτινη), a city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of a branch of the Nile (the W.-most but one), which was called the Bolbitine mouth (τὸ Βολβίτινον στόμα) (Diod. i. 33; NILUS).

Bōlinē (Βολίνη: Βολωνάιος), a town in Achaia, the inhabitants of which Augustus transplanted to PATRAE.

Bolissus (Βολισσός: Volissos), a town on the W. coast of Chios.

Bomilcar (Βομίλκας, Βοαμίλκας). 1. Commander, with Hanno, of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, B.C. 310. When Hanno had fallen, Bomilcar is said to have lost the battle purposely, with the object of making himself tyrant of Carthage. This he attempted again in 308, but failed and was crucified (Diod. xx. 10, 43; Just. xxii. 7).—2. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies sent to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, 216. He afterwards attempted to relieve Syracuse, when besieged by Marcellus, but was unable to accomplish anything (Liv. xxiii. 13, 41, xxiv. 36, xxv. 25).—3. A Numidian, deep in the confidence of Jugurtha. When Jugurtha was at Rome, 109, Bomilcar effected for him the assassination of Massiva. In 107 he plotted against Jugurtha (Sall. Jug. 35, 52, 61, 70).

Bōmīus Mons (Βώμιος and οἱ Βώμοι), the W. part of Mt. Oeta in Aetolia, inhabited by the Bomienses (Βωμείς) (Thuc. iii. 94; Strab. p. 451).

Bona Dea, a Roman goddess of the earth (Macrob. i. 12, 21) described as the female counterpart of Faunus, his daughter or, in other accounts, his wife, and was herself called Fauna, and identified also with Maia and Ops. She thus represented the fruitfulness of nature and blessed all the gifts of the earth. Hence we find in inscriptions the titles Bona Dea Agrestis Felix, Bona Dea Nutrix, Pagana (C. I. L. vi. 67-74). She was also the goddess of chastity, one of the deities specially worshipped by the Vestals. Her temple on the Aventine was built by the Vestal Claudia and restored by Livia (Ov. Fast. v. 155). The festival of the dedication of her temple was kept on the 1st of May. On the night between the 3rd and 4th of December (Plut. Cic. 19) the secret rites were celebrated in the house of the consul or praetor, as the sacrifices on that occasion were offered on behalf of the whole Roman people. The solemnities were conducted by the Vestals, and no male person was allowed to be in the house at one of the festivals. P. Clodius profaned the sacred ceremonies, by entering the house of Caesar in the disguise of a woman, B.C. '62. [See CLODIUS.] Offerings of first-fruits were made during May, and she was specially worshipped at the Vestalia on June 9th. The story of Hercules being denied entrance at her May festival, when he asked for a drink of water, is told in Propert. v. 9, Macrob. i. 12, 28. The animal sacrificed to her was a sucking pig, and in her temple were sacred serpents, the remnants of an ancient worship and perhaps regarded as showing her oracular power. (Hence came the story that Faunus was turned into a serpent.) The wine jar beside her statue shows her as patroness of vineyards.

Bonifacius, a Roman general, governor of Africa under Valentinian III. Believing that the empress Placidia meditated his destruction, he revolted against the emperor, and invited Genseric, king of the Vandals, to settle in Africa. In 430 he was reconciled to Placidia, and attempted to drive the Vandals out of Africa, but without success. He quitted Africa in 431, and in 432 he died of a wound received in combat with his rival Aëtius (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 3).

Bonna (Bonn), a town on the left bank of the Rhine in Lower Germany, and in the territory of the Ubii, was a strong fortress of the Romans and the regular quarters of a Roman legion. Here Drusus constructed a bridge across the Rhine (Flor. iv. 12).

Bononia (Bononiensis). 1. (Bologna), a town in Gallia Cispadana, originally called Felsina, was in ancient times an Etruscan city, and the capital of N. Etruria. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Boii, but it was colonised by the Romans on the conquest of the Boii, B.C. 191, and its name of Felsina was then changed into Bononia (Liv. xxxvii. 57). It was one of the 12 most recent Latin colonies [see ARMINUM] and then obtained the full franchise. It fell into decay in the civil wars, but it was enlarged and adorned by Augustus, 32.—2. (Boulogne) a town in the N. of Gaul. See GESORIACUM.—3. (Banostor?), a town of Pannonia on the Danube.

Bonōsus, a Spaniard by birth, served with distinction under Aurelian, and usurped the imperial title in Gaul in the reign of Probus. He was defeated and slain by Probus, A.D. 280.

Boōtes. [ARCTURUS.]

Borbetomagus (Worms), also called Vangiones, at a later time Wormatia, a town of the Vangiones on the left bank of the Rhine in Upper Germany.

Borēas (Borēas or Borās), the N. wind, or more strictly the wind from the NNE., was, in the Athenians by destroying the ships of the barbarians. According to a Homeric tradition (Il. xx. 223), Boreas begot 12 horses by the mares of Erichthonius, which is commonly explained as a figurative mode of expressing the extraordinary swiftness of those horses. Boreas was worshipped at Athens, where a festival, Boreasmi, was celebrated in his honour. [Dict. Ant. s.v.; see also CALAIS, ZETES.]

Borēum (Βόρειον). 1. (Malin Heađ), the N. promontory of Hibernia (Ireland) (Ptol. ii. 2).—2. (Ras Teyonas), a promontory on the W. coast of Cyrenaica, forming the E. headland of the Great Syrtis.—3. The N. extremity of the island of Taprobane (Ceylon) (Ptol. vii. 4).

Borēus Mons (Βόρειον ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia, on the borders of Laconia, containing the sources of the rivers Alpheus and Eurotas.

Borēus Portus (Βόρειος λιμήν), a harbour in the island of Tenedos, at the mouth of a river of the same name.

Borsippa (τὰ Βόρσιππα: Burs-Nimrud), a city of Babylonia, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, S. of Babylon, celebrated for its manufactures of linen, and as the chief residence of the Chaldaean astrologers. The Greeks held it sacred to Apollo and Artemis. (Strab. p. 738.)

Borysthēnes (Βορυσθένης: Dniéper), afterwards Danapris, a river of European Sarmatia, flows into the Euxine, but its sources were unknown to the ancients. Near its mouth and at its junction with the Hypanis, lay the town Borysthenes or Borysthenis (Kudak), also called Olbia, Olbiopolis, and Milicopolis, a colony of Miletus, and the most important Greek city on the N. of the Euxine. (Ethnic, Βορυσθενίτης, Ὀλβιοπολίτης.) (Hdt. iv. 17, 53; Strab. pp. 107, 289.)

Bosporus (Βόσπορος), the Ox-ford, the name of many straits among the Greeks, but especially applied to the 2 following.—1. The Thracian Bosporus (Channel of Constanti-nople), unites the Propontis or Sea of Marmora with the Euxine or Black Sea. According to the legend it was called Bosporus from Io, who crossed it in the form of a heifer. At the entrance of the Bosporus were the celebrated SYMPLEGADES. Darius constructed a bridge across the Bosporus, when he invaded Scythia. (Strab. p. 125; Hdt. iv. 85; Polyb. iv. 39.)—2. The Cimmerian Bosporus (Straits of Kaffa), unites the Palus Maeotis or Sea of Azof with the Euxine or Black Sea. It formed, with the Tanais (Don) the boundary between Asia and Europe, and it derived its name from the CIMMERII, who were supposed to have dwelt in the neighbourhood. On the European side of the Bosporus, the modern Crimea, the Milesians founded the town of Panticapaeum, also called Bosporus, and the inhabitants of Panticapaeum subsequently founded the town of Phanagoria on the Asiatic side of the straits. (Hdt. iv. 12, 100; Strab. pp. 307, 309, 494.) These cities, being favourably situated for commerce, soon became places of considerable importance; and a kingdom gradually arose, of which Panticapaeum was the capital, and which eventually included the whole of the Crimea. The first kings we read of were the Archaeanactidæ, who reigned 42 years, from B.C. 480 to 438. They were succeeded by Spartacus I. and his descendants. Several of these kings were in close alliance with the Athenians, who obtained annually a large supply of corn from the Bosporus. The last of these kings was Paerisades, who, being hard pressed by the Scythians, voluntarily ceded his dominions to Mithridates the Great.

mythology, a son of Astræus and Eos, and brother of Hesperus, Zephyrus, and Notus. He dwelt in a cave of mount Haemus in Thrace. He carried off Orithyia, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Attica, by whom he begot Zetes, Calais, and Cleopatra, wife of Phineus, who are therefore called Boreades. (Hdt. vii. 189; Apollod. iii. 15, 2.) Some have seen in this story the N. wind snatching away the more genial rain-cloud: others regard Orithyia as a Nereid who was later identified with an Attic princess, and think that the rape signifies the wind driving the waves, and that the horses of Boreas have the same connexion. In the Persian war, Boreas showed his friendly disposition towards

On the death of Mithridates, his son Pharnaces was allowed by Pompey to succeed to the dominion of Bosphorus; and we subsequently find a series of kings, who reigned in the country till king Rescuporis VIII. A.D. 336, but acknowledging the suzerainty of the Roman emperors, whose image appeared on their coins: as an instance of these rights being exercised, the Romans freed the town of Heraclea in the Chersonesus (Plin. iv. 85; cf. Procop. B. Goth. iv. 5). In this country, especially at Panticapæum (Kertch), there have been important discoveries of antiquities, described by Koehne, 1857, and in more recent numbers of the Petersburg Compte Rendu.

Bostar (Βόστωρ, Βόστωρος). 1. A Carthaginian general, who, with Hamilcar and Hasdrubal, the son of Hanno, fought against M. Attilus Regulus, in Africa, B.C. 256, but was defeated, taken prisoner, and sent to Rome, where he is said to have perished in consequence of the barbarous treatment which he received from the sons of Regulus (Polyb. i. 28; Eutrop. ii. 21).—2. A Carthaginian general, under Hasdrubal, in Spain, set at liberty the Spanish hostages kept at Saguntum (Liv. xxii. 22).

Bostra (τὰ Βόστρα: O. T. Bozrah: Βοστρηός and -αῖος: Busrah, Ru.), a city of Arabia, in an Oasis of the Syrian Desert, a little more than 1° S. of Damascus. It was enlarged and beautified by Trajan, who made it a colony. Under the later emperors the seat of an archbishopric.

Bottia, Bottiæ, Bottiæis (Βοττία, Βοττιαία, Βοττιαῖς: Βοττιαῖος), a district in Macedonia, on the right bank of the river Axios, extended in the time of Thucydides to Pieria on the W. It contained the towns of Pella and Ichnæ near the sea. The Bottiæi were a Thracian people, who, being driven out of the country by the Macedonians, settled in that part of the Macedonian Chaleidæ N. of Olynthus, which was called Bottice (Βοττικῆ). (Hdt. vii. 185, viii. 127; Arrian, i. 2, 5.)

Boudicca. [BOADICEA.]

Bovianum (Bovianus: Bojano), the chief town of the Pentri in annium, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was colonised by Augustus with veterans (Liv. ix. 31, x. 12; Plin. iii. 107; Sil. It. viii. 566). It is probable that the site of the ancient Samnite city Bovianum Vetus was about 20 miles to the N. of the Roman Bovianum, at the spot where Pietrabbondante now stands.

Bovillæ (Bovillensis), an ancient town in Latium at the foot of the Alban mountain, on the Appian Way about 12 miles from Rome. Near it Clodius was killed by Milo (B.C. 52); and here was the sacrum of the Julia gens. (Propert. iv. 1, 33; Ov. Fast. iii. 667; Mart. ii. 6, 15; Tac. Ann. ii. 41, Hist. iv. 2.)

Bracara Augusta (Braga), the chief town of the Callaici Bracarii in Hispania Tarraconensis: at Braga there are the ruins of an amphitheatre, aqueduct, and other buildings.

Brachmāna or -i (Βραχμᾶνες), is a name used by the ancient geographers, sometimes for a caste of priests in India (the Brahmins), sometimes, apparently, for all the people whose religion was Brahminism, and sometimes for a particular tribe (Strab. pp. 712-719; Arrian, Anab. vii. 3; Cic. Tusc. v. 25).

Brachōdes or Caput Vada (Βραχῶδης ἄκρα: Ras Kapoudiak), a promontory on the coast of Byzacona in N. Africa, forming the N. headland of the Lesser Syrtis.

Brachylles or Brachyllas (Βραχύλλης, Βραχύλλας), a Boeotian, supported the Macedonian interests in the reigns of Antigonos Doseon and Philip V., and was murdered in 196 at Thebes by the Roman party in that city (Polyb. xvii. 1, xx. 5; Liv. xxxiii. 27).

Branchidae (οἱ Βραγχίδαί: Teronda, Ru.), the priestly family who administered the oracle of Apollo Didymæus at Didyma (τὰ Διδύμα), a place on the sea-coast of Ionia, a little S. of Miletus. This oracle, which the Ionians held in the highest esteem, was said to have been founded by Branchus, son of Apollo or Smierus of Delphi, and a Milesian woman, and the Branchidae were his reputed descendants. They delivered up the treasures of the temple to Darius or Xerxes; and, when Xerxes returned from Greece, the Branchidae, fearing the revenge of the Greeks, begged him to remove them to a distant part of his empire. They were accordingly settled in Bactria or Sogdiana, where their descendants are said to have been punished by Alexander for the treason of their forefathers. The temple, called Didymæum, which was destroyed by Xerxes, was rebuilt, and its ruins contain some beautiful specimens of the Ionic order of architecture. (Hdt. i. 157, vi. 19; Strab. pp. 517, 634; Paus. vii. 2; Dict. of Antiq. s.v. Oraculum.)

Branchus (Βράγχος). [BRANCHIDÆ.]

Brannovices. [AULERCI.]

Brasidas (Βρασιδᾶς), son of Tellis, the most eminent Spartan in the first part of the Peloponnesian war. He distinguished himself first in the relief of Methone B.C. 431, and was soon after made ephor (Thuc. ii. 25, 93; Xen. Hell. ii. 3, 10): afterwards, at Sphacteria, he was wounded in the attempt to land, B.C. 425. In B.C. 424, at the head of a small force, he effected a dexterous march through the hostile country of Thessaly, and joined Perdicas of Macedonia, who had promised co-operation against the Athenians. By his military skill, and the confidence which his character inspired, he gained possession of many of the cities in Macedonia subject to Athens; his greatest acquisition was Amphipolis. In 422 he gained a brilliant victory over Cleon, who had been sent, with an Athenian force, to recover Amphipolis, but he was slain in the battle. He was buried within the city, and the inhabitants honoured him as a hero, by yearly sacrifices and games. (Thuc. iv. 78, 120, v. 6; Diod. xii. 72; Paus. iii. 14; Dict. of Ant. s.v. Brasideia.)

Brataspantium (Breteuil), a town of the Bellovac in Gallia Belgica (Caes. B. G. ii. 13).

Braurōn (Βραυρῶν: Βραυρῶνιος: Vraona or Vrana), a demus in Attica on the E. coast on the river Erasinus, with a celebrated temple of Artemis, who was hence called Brauronia, and in whose honour the festival Brauronia was celebrated in this place. [ARTEMIS.]

Bregetio (nr. Szöny, Ru., E. of Comorn), a Roman municipium in Lower Pannonia on the Danube, where Valentinian I. died (Amm. Marc. xxx. 5).

Brennus (=chief or petty prince). 1. The leader of the Senonian Gauls, who in B.C. 390 crossed the Apennines, defeated the Romans at the Allia, and took Rome. After besieging the Capitol for 6 months, he quitted the city upon receiving 1000 pounds of gold as a ransom for the Capitol, and returned home safe with his booty. (Polyb. ii. 18.) The version of this in popular legends was that Camillus and a Roman army appeared at the moment that the gold was being weighed, that Brennus was defeated by Camillus, and that he himself and his whole army were slain to a man (Liv. v.

33; Plut. Cam. 14; Just. vi. 6; Dionys. xiii. 7).

—2. The chief leader of the Gauls who invaded Macedonia and Greece, B.C. 280, 279. In 280 Ptolemy Ceraunus was defeated by the Gauls under Belgius and slain in battle; and Brennus in the following year penetrated into the S. of Greece, but he was defeated near Delphi by the Greeks, who hurled down rocks upon them in the midst of a violent storm, aided, as tradition asserted, by Apollo himself: most of his men were slain, and he himself put an end to his own life. (Paus. x. 19–22; Just. xxiv. 6–8.)

Breuci, a powerful people of Pannonia in the district between the Save and the Drave, took an active part in the insurrection of the Pannonians and Dalmatians against the Romans, A.D. 6 (Strab. p. 314; Dio Cass. lv. 29).

Breuni, or Breones, a Rhaetian people, dwelt in the Tyrol near the Brenner. They were among the tribes conquered in the reign of Augustus (Plin. iii. 136; Strab. p. 206; Hor. Od. iv. 14, 11).

Briāreus. [ÆGEON.]

Bricinnīae (Βρικιννίαι), a place in Sicily not far from Leontini.

Brigantes, the most powerful of the British tribes, inhabited the whole of the N. of the island from the Abus (Humber) to the Roman Wall, with the exception of the S.E. corner of Yorkshire, which was inhabited by the Parisii. The Brigantes consequently inhabited the greater part of Yorkshire, and the whole of Lancashire, Durham, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Their capital was EBORACUM. The Romans found them hard to subdue: they were reduced by Petilius Cerealis in the reign of Vespasian (Tac. Ann. xii. 32, Hist. iii. 45, Agr. 17), but not thoroughly conquered till Hadrian's reign.—There was also a tribe of Brigantes in the S. of Ireland, between the rivers Birgus (Barrow) and Dabrona (Blackwater), in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary (Ptol. ii. 2, 7).

Brigantii, a tribe in Vindelicia on the lake BRIGANTINUS, noted for their robberies; their chief town was Brigantium (Bregenz).

Brigantinus Lacus (Bodensee or Lake of Constance), also called Venetus and Acronius, through which the Rhine flows, was inhabited by the Helvetii on the S., by the Rhaetii on the S.E., and by the Vindelici on the N. Near an island on it, probably Reichenau, Tiberius defeated the Vindelici in a naval engagement. (Plin. ix. 63; Strab. pp. 192, 207, 292, 313; Mela, iii. 2; Amm. Marc. xv. 4).

Brigantium. 1. (Briançon), a town of the Segusiani in Gaul at the foot of the Cottian Alps and the pass of Mount Genève, which was probably the pass crossed by Hannibal. If so, the rock on which the present forts are placed is probably the λευκόπετρον of Polybius (iii. 53). At Brigantium the road branched, the older and easier following the valley of the Durance to Vapincum (Gap); the later road, certainly not followed by Hannibal, is the more direct route to the valley of the Isère, Grenoble and Vienna (Vienna), and was used by the Romans in and after the time of Caesar, but it involved crossing the Col de Lauteret, higher than the Genève itself, between Brigantium and the valley of the Isère (Strab. p. 179; Itin.).—2. (Corunna), a seaport town of the Lucenses in Gallaecia in Spain, with a lighthouse, which is still used for the same purpose, having been repaired in 1791, and which is now called La Torre de Hercules (Ptol. ii. 6, 4; Oros. ii. 2).—3. (Bregenz). [BRIGANTII.]

Brilessus (Βριλησσός), a mountain in Attica N.E. of Athens.

Brimo (Βριμό), 'the angry or the terrifying,' a surname of Hecate and Persephone.

Brianiātes, a people in Liguria S. of the Po, near the modern Brignolo (Liv. xii. 19).

Brisēis (Βρισηίς), daughter of Brises of Lyrnessus, fell into the hands of Achilles, but was seized by Agamemnon. Hence arose the feud between the two heroes. [ACHILLES.] Her proper name was Hippodamia (Schol. Il. i. 392).

Britannia (ἡ Βρεττανική or Βρετανική, ἡ Βρεττανία or Βρετανία: Βρεττανός, Βρετανός [also Πρετ-]: Britanni, Brittōnes), the island of England and Scotland, which was also called Albion (Ἄλβιον, Ἄλβιον, Insula Albionum). HIBERNIA or Ireland is usually spoken of as a separate island, but is sometimes included under the general name of the Insulae Britannicae (Βρετανικὰ νῆσοι), which also comprehended the smaller islands around the coast of Great Britain. The name Βέργιον (if that reading is correct) in the earliest Greek writer who mentions this country (Pytheas), was derived from Celtic mariuers, and probably represents Vergyn = Western. It was afterwards in the form Irne confined to Ireland. The name Britannia first occurs as the Βρεττανός in [Aristot.] περὶ κόσμου, written probably about 200 B.C., and next in Polybius, iii. 57. It represents the name used in the Gaelic language, Brython, of which the derivation is probably brith, 'painted,' from the custom which the inhabitants had of staining their bodies with a blue colour. The name Albion is by some supposed to describe the white cliffs of Dover: it more probably is an old Celtic word, Alba-inn (cf. Alpes), signifying 'mountainous': but the derivation and original use of the word are uncertain.—In history and nationality these islands had agreed with the neighbouring continent of Gaul. In pre-historic times the inhabitants were probably Iberian (a fact which Tacitus surmised when he noticed Iberian characteristics in the Silures, Agric. 11); but the Britons of whom we have earliest record were various branches of the Celtic race. Their manners and customs were in general the same as those of the Gauls; but, separated more than the Gauls from intercourse with civilised nations, they preserved the Celtic religion in a purer state than in Gaul, and hence Druidism, according to Caesar, was transplanted from Gaul to Britain. The Britons also retained many of the barbarous Celtic customs, which the more civilised Gauls had laid aside, although they had a coinage earlier than B.C. 100. They painted their bodies with a blue colour extracted from woad, in order to appear more terrible in battle, and Caesar even states that they had wives in common. The Belgae had crossed over from Gaul, and settled on the S. and E. coasts, driving the Britons into the interior of the island. It was not till a late period that the Greeks and Romans obtained any knowledge of Britain. There is great reason to doubt whether it is correct to state that the Phoenicians visited the Scilly islands and the coast of Cornwall for the purpose of obtaining tin. It is more likely that the Tin Islands were off the N. coast of Spain. [CASSITERIDES.] At the time when Caesar landed, the Cornish tin was brought by land to the coast of Kent and Hants, and thence by the trade route through Gaul. (Caes. B. G. v. 12; Diod. v. 22.) The first certain knowledge which the Greeks obtained of Britain was from the merchants of perhaps contained the earlier conquests of the Romans in the S. of the island, and the former the later conquests in the N., the territories of the Silures, Brigantes, &c. (Herodian, iii. 8, 2; cf. Dio Cass. lv. 23). Upon the new division of the provinces in the reign of Diocletian, Britain was governed by a Vicarius (who resided usually at Eboracum) subject to the Praefectus Praetorio of Gaul, and was divided into 4 provinces: Britannia Prima, probably the country S. of the Thames, and three others, of which the limits are uncertain, viz.: Britannia Secunda, Maxima Caesariensis, and Flavia Caesariensis. Besides these, there was also a fifth province, Valentia, which existed for a short time, including the conquests of Theodosius beyond the Roman wall.—The only colonies in Britain were Camulodunum (Colchester) in the east, sometimes called simply Colonia, and Glevum (Gloucester) in the west; Lindum (Lincoln) and Eboracum (York). Of these colonies the capital was at first Camulodunum, but afterwards Eboracum, while the other three retained comparatively little importance. The occupation being chiefly military, the most important towns were the three great fortresses, Eboracum, Deva (Chester), and Isca (Caerleon). Other considerable places were Verulamium (St. Albans), a municipium: Londinium, famous for its commerce, and Aquae Solis (Bath), as a watering-place. The following among the native towns also deserve notice: Viroconium (Wroxeter) and Calleva (Silchester), both famous, and especially the latter, for the excavations which afford a complete ground-plan of the Roman town; Venta Belgarum (Winchester), Regnum (Chichester), Durovernum (Canterbury). The harbours for crossing to Gaul were Rutupiae (Richborough), Portus Dubris (Dover), Portus Lemanae (Lympe). The chief minerals worked in Roman times consisted of lead in the Mendips and in Flint; iron in Sussex and Forest of Dean; copper in N. Wales, and tin in Cornwall; but there are no traces of Roman workings in the Cornish tin-mines before the fourth century A.D. Some little gold was also found in Wales.

Britannicus (Clandius Tiberius Britannicus Caesar), son of the emperor Claudius and Messalina, was born A.D. 42. He was brought up with Titus as companion, who afterwards put up a golden statue to him in memory of his youthful friendship (Suet. Tit. 2). He was treated more as a state prisoner, when Agrippina, the second wife of Claudius, induced the emperor to adopt her own son, and give him precedence over Britannicus. This son, the emperor Nero, ascended the throne in 54. When Agrippina found that her son revolted from her control, she induced Britannicus to lend his name to a movement against Nero, who caused him to be poisoned in 55. With him ended the Claudian line. (Tac. Ann. xii. 25, 41, xiii. 14; Suet. Ner. 33; Dio Cass. lx. 32.)

Britomartis (Βριτόμαρτις). The name is said to mean 'the sweet maiden' or the 'maiden who brings blessings' (Solin. 11.; Hesych.). She was a Cretan deity presiding over the natural gifts of the earth, the fruits of the soil as well as of hunting and fishing. From the last attribute she was known also as Dictynna, i.e. the goddess of the nets (δίκτυον). When the Doric colonists absorbed her worship into that of Artemis, whom she resembled, they transformed the native deity into a nymph favoured by Artemis, explaining the name Dictynna by the story that she was a Cretan nymph, daughter of Zeus and Carne, and beloved by Minos, who pursued her 9 months, till at length she leaped into the sea from a rock, was saved by falling into some nets spread out below, and was changed by Artemis to a goddess (Paus. ii. 30, 3; Strab. p. 479; Ant. Lib. 40; Callimach. Dian. 200; Eur. I.T. 126; Verg. Cir. 301). Some have fancied an allusion to the setting of the moon in this leap into the sea, and take her to have been a moon goddess under her other name Aphaea, which she bore specially at Aegina (Paus. l.c.). Her worship was carried not only to islands and coasts of the Aegean, but even to Marseilles (C. I. G. 6764); whence the story of her wanderings in Anton. Lib.

Brixellum (Brixellanus: Bregella or Brescella), a town on the Po in Gallia Cisalpina, where the emperor Otho put himself to death, A.D. 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 33, 35, 51).

Brixia (Brixianus: Brescia), a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the road from Comum to Aquileia, through which the river Mella flowed (flavus quam molli percurrit flumine Mella, Catull. lxxvii. 33). It was probably founded by the Etruscans, was afterwards a town of the Libui (a pagus or head of a community of villages), and then of the Cenomani, and finally became a Roman municipium, and, under Augustus, a colony (Strab. p. 213; Plin. iii. 138; Liv. v. 35, xxxii. 30; Orell. 66). It was sacked by Attila in 452, but recovered and flourished under the Lombards.

Brōmīus (Βρόμιος), a surname of DIONYSUS.

Brontes. [CYCLOPES.]

Bruchium. [ALEXANDRIA.]

Bructēri, a people of Germany, dwelt on each side of the Amisia (Ems) and extended S. as far as the Luppia (Lippe) (Strab. p. 290; Tac. Ann. xiii. 55). The Bructeri joined the Batavi in their revolt against the Romans in A.D. 69, and the prophetic virgin, VELEDA, who had so much influence among the German tribes, was a native of their country. A few years afterwards the Bructeri were almost annihilated by the Chamavi and Angrivarii. (Tac. Hist. iv. 61, Germ. 33; Plin. Ep. ii. 7.)

Brundūsium or Brundīsiūm (Βρουνθήσιον, Βρουνέσιον: Brundisium: Brindisi), a town in Plan of Brundisium.

A A. inner harbour; B. outer harbour; C. entrance which Cæsar tried to block; D. modern town of Brindisi; E. islets of Barra (S. Andrea).

Calabria, on a small bay of the Adriatic, forming an excellent harbour (mentioned in Herodotus iv. 99), to which the place owed its inportance. The outer harbour was sheltered by the islets of Barra, on which stood a lighthouse (Mel. ii. 7): from this a narrow channel led into the inner harbour, formed by two arms running inland. The APPIA VIA terminated at Brundisium, and it was the usual place of embarkation for Greece and the East. Hence it was the scene of numerous historical incidents, of which one of the most important was the attempt of Caesar to block up the entrance to the inner port, so as to prevent the departure of Pompey's fleet (Caes. B. C. i. 24-28). It was an ancient town of the Sallentines, and probably not of Greek origin, although its foundation is ascribed by some writers to the Cretans, and by others to Diomedes (Just. xii. 2; but cf. Strab. p. 282; Lucan, ii. 610). It was at first governed by kings of its own, but was conquered and colonised by the Romans, B.C. 245. The poet Pacuvius was born at this town, and Virgil died here on his return from Greece, B.C. 19.

Bruttium, Bruttius and Bruttiorum Ager (Bpérria: Bruttius), more usually called Bruttii after the inhabitants, the S. extremity of Italy, separated from Lucania by a line drawn from the mouth of the Lous to Thurii, and surrounded on the other 3 sides by the sea. It was the country called in ancient times Oenotria and Italia. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through it down to the Sicilian Straits; it contained excellent pasturage for cattle, and the valleys produced good corn, olives, and fruit.—The earliest inhabitants of the country were Oenotrians, a Pelasgian people from whom, with an admixture of Samnite invaders, came the Lucanians. Subsequently some Lucanians, who had revolted from their countrymen in Lucania, took possession of the mountainous district, and were hence called Bruttii or Brettii, which word is said to mean fugitives or rebels in the language of the Lucanians. This people, however, inhabited only the interior of the land; the coast was almost entirely in the possession of the Greek colonies. They rose to greater power about 356 B.C., and conquered the Greek cities of Hipponium, Terina, and Thurii (Diod. xvi. 15; Strab. p. 255). Hence they had a considerable admixture of Greek in race and language, and are called 'bilingues' by Ennius. They joined the Lucanians in repelling Alexander of Epirus, B.C. 326, and the Samnites against Rome (Liv. Ep. 12); and though reduced by the Romans after the defeat of Pyrrhus, they rose again and joined Hannibal after Cannae (Liv. xxii. 61). At the close of the 2nd Punic war, in which the Bruttii had been the allies of Hannibal, they lost their independence and were treated by the Romans with great severity. It is said by some that the Bruttiani or public slaves employed as lictors and servants of magistrates (Appian, Ann. 61; Strab. p. 251; Gell. x. 3) originated in this punishment: others think that the institution was probably older, and that the connexion with measures taken after the Punic war was a later invention (see Dict. Ant. s.v. Bruttiani). Under Diocletian, Bruttii and Lucania were joined as the 3rd region under the Vicarius Urbis, with a Corrector immediately in charge.

Brütus, Junius. 1. L., son of M. Junius and of Tarquinia, the sister of Tarquinius Superbus. His elder brother was murdered by Tarquinius, and Lucius escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy, whence he received the surname of Brutus. After Lucretia had stabbed herself, Brutus roused the Romans to expel the Tarquins; and upon the banishment of the latter he was elected first consul with Tarquinius Collatinus. He loved his country better than his children, and put to death his 2 sons, who had attempted to restore the Tarquins. He fell in battle the same year, fighting against Aruns, the son of Tarquinius. Brutus was the great hero in the legends about the expulsion of the Tarquins, but we have no means of determining what part of the account is historical. (Liv. i. 56-60, ii. 1; Dionys. iv. 67, v. 1; Macrob. ii. 16; Dio Cass. xlii. 45).—2. D., surnamed SCAEVA, magister equitum to the dictator Q. Publilius Philo, B.C. 339, and consul in 325, when he fought against the Vestini (Liv. viii. 12).—3. D., surnamed SCAEVA, consul 292, conquered the Faliscans (Liv. x. 43).—4. M., tribune of the plebs 195, praetor 191, when he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, one of the ambassadors sent into Asia 189, and consul 178, when he subdued the Istri. He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 171. (Liv. xxxiv. 1, xxxvii. 55, xli. 9, xlii. 5, xliii. 16).—5. P., tribune of the plebs 195, curule aedile 192, praetor 190, propraetor in Further Spain, 189 (Liv. xxxiv. 1, xxxvii. 50).—6. D., surnamed GALLAECUS (CALLAECUS) or CALLAICUS, consul 138, commanded in Further Spain, and conquered a great part of Lusitania. From his victory over the Gallaeci he obtained his surname. (Liv. Ep. 55; Appian, Hist. 71; Vell. Pat. ii. 5.) He was a patron of the poet L. Accius, and well versed in Greek and Roman literature (Cic. Brut. 28).—7. D., son of No. 6, consul 77, and husband of Sempronia, who carried on an intrigue with Catiline (Sall. Cat. 40).—8. D., adopted by A. Postumius Albinus, consul 99, and hence called Brutus Albinus. He served under Caesar in Gaul and in the civil war. He commanded Caesar's fleet at the siege of Massilia, 49, and was afterwards placed over Further Gaul. On his return to Rome Brutus was promised the praetorship and the government of Cisalpine Gaul for 44. Nevertheless, he joined the conspiracy against Caesar. After the death of the latter (44) he went into Cisalpine Gaul, which he refused to surrender to Antony, who had obtained this province from the people. Antony made war against him, and kept him besieged in Mutina, till the siege was raised in April 43 by the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and Octavianus. But Brutus only obtained a short respite. Antony was preparing to march against him from the N. with a large army, and Octavianus, who had deserted the senate, was marching against him from the S. His only resource was flight, but he was betrayed by Camillus, a Gaulish chief, and was put to death by Antony 43. (Caes. B. G. iii. 11, B. C. i. 36, 45; App. B. C. iii. 97; Dio Cass. xli. 53; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 5, 6, 13).—9. M., praetor 88, belonged to the party of Marins, and put an end to his own life in 82, that he might not fall into the hands of Pompey, who commanded Sulla's fleet.—10. L., also called DAMASIPPUS, praetor 82, when the younger Marius was blockaded at Praeneste, put to death at Rome by order of Marius several of the most eminent senators of the opposite party (Appian, B. C. i. 88).—11. M., married Servilia, the half-sister of Cato of Utica. He was tribune of the plebs, 83; and in 77 he espoused the cause of Lepidus, and was placed in command of the forces in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was slain by command of Pompey (Appian, B. C. ii. 111).—12. M., the so-called tyrannicide, son of No. 11 and Servilia, the half-sister of Cato Uticensis. He lost his father when he was only 8 years old, and was trained by his uncle Cato in the principles of the aristocratical party. He was adopted by his uncle, Q. Servilius Caepio, as his heir; hence he sometimes appears as Q. Caepio Brutus. Accordingly, on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Pompey, although he was the murderer of his father. After the battle of Pharsalia, 48, he was not only pardoned by Caesar, but received from him the greatest marks of confidence and favour. Caesar made him governor of Cisalpine Gaul in 46, and praetor in 44, and also promised him the government of Macedonia. But notwithstanding all the obligations he was under to Caesar, he was persuaded by Cassius to murder his benefactor under the delusive idea of again establishing the republic. [CAESAR.] After the murder of Caesar Brutus spent a short time in Italy, and then took possession of the province of Macedonia. He was joined by Cassius, who commanded in Syria, and their united forces were opposed to those of Octavian and Antony. Two battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Philippi (42), in the former of which Brutus was victorious though Cassius was defeated, but in the latter Brutus also was defeated and put an end to his own life.—Brutus's wife was PORCIA, the daughter of Cato.—Brutus was an ardent student of literature and philosophy, but he appears to have been deficient in judgment and original power. He wrote several works, all of which have perished. He was a literary friend of Cicero, who dedicated to him his Tusculanae Disputationes, De Finibus, and Orator, and who has given the name of Brutus to his dialogue on illustrious orators. (Plut. Brut; Dio Cass. xlv. 12–35; Appian, B. C. ii., iii., iv.)

Bryanium, a town of Paeonia in Macedonia (Liv. xxxi. 39; Strab. p. 327).

Bryaxis (Βρύαξις), an Athenian sculptor, about 350 B.C. He was employed, along with Scopas, Leochares, and Timotheus, for the sculptures which adorned the sides of the Mausoleum (see Dict. Antiq. s.v. Mausoleum).

Brygi or Bryges (Βρύγοι, Βρίγες), a barbarous people in the N. of Macedonia, probably of Illyrian or Thracian origin, who were still in Macedonia at the time of the Persian war. The Phrygians were believed by the ancients to have been a portion of this people, who emigrated to Asia in early times. [PHRYGIA.]

Bryseae (Βρύσσαι), a town of Laconia, SW. of Sparta (Il. ii. 583; Paus. iii. 20).

Bubassus (Βύβασσος), an ancient city of Caria, E. of Cnidus, which gave name to the bay (Bubassius Sinus) and the peninsula (ἡ Χερσονήσος ἢ Βύβασσῆ), on which it stood (Hdt. i. 174; Diod. v. 62; Plin. v. 104). Ovid speaks of Bübāsides nurus (Met. ix. 643).

Bubastis (Βούβαστις), the Egyptian goddess Bast, whose name has been confused with Pa-Bast, i.e. the house of Bast. The Greeks identified her with Artemis, since she was the goddess of the moon, and also of childbirth. The cat was sacred to her, and she was represented in the form of a cat, or of a female with the head of a cat. (Hdt. ii. 59, 137, 156; Ov. Met. v. 330.)

Bubastis or -us (Βούβαστις or -os: Βουβαστίτης: Tel Basta, Ru.), strictly 'the house of Bast' (see above), the Pibeseth of the Bible, was the capital of the Nomos Bubastites in Lower Egypt, stood on the E. bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, and was the chief seat of the worship of Bubastis, whose annual festival was kept here. It was the capital of the 22nd Dynasty, 966–766 B.C. Under the Persians the city was dismantled, and lost much of its importance. (Hdt. ii. 59, 137; Strab. p. 805.)

Bubona. [ΕΡΩΝΑ.]

Bubulcus, C. Junius (C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus), consul B.C. 317, a second time in 313, and a third time in 311; in the last of these years he carried on the war against the Samnites with great success. He was censor in 309, and dictator in 302, when he defeated the Aequians; in his dictatorship he dedicated the temple of Safety which he had vowed in his third consulship. The walls of this temple were adorned with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor. (Liv. ix. 38, x. 1; Val. Max. viii. 14; Plin. xxxv. 19.)

Bücēphāla or -ia (Βουκέφαλα or -άλεια: Jhelum), a city on the Hydaspes (Jhelum) in N. India (the Punjab), built by Alexander, after his battle with Porus, in memory of his favourite charger Bucephalus, whom he buried here. It stood at the place where Alexander crossed the river. (Arrian, Anab. v. 19; Curt. ix. 3, 23; Diod. xvii. 95.)

Bücēphālus (Βουκέφαλος), the celebrated horse of Alexander the Great, which Philip purchased for thirteen talents, and which no one was able to break in except the youthful Alexander. This horse carried Alexander through his Asiatic campaigns, and died in India B.C. 327. (Plut. Alex. 6, 61.)

Budalia, a town in Lower Pannonia near Sirmium, the birth-place of the emperor Decius.

Budini (Βουδινοί), a Scythian people, who dwelt N. of the Bastarnae in Sarmatia. Herodotus (iv. 108) calls the nation γλαυκόν τε καί πυρρόν, which some interpret 'with blue eyes and red hair,' and others 'painted blue and red.' The former view is the more likely, and they were probably a Slavonian race, dwelling about the Borysthenes (Dniéper).

Budōron (Βούδορον), a fortress in Salamis on a promontory of the same name opposite Megara.

Būlis (Βούλις) and Sperthias (Σπερθίης), two Spartans, voluntarily went to Xerxes and offered themselves for punishment to atone for the murder of the heralds whom Darius had sent to Sparta; but they were dismissed uninjured by the king (Hdt. vii. 134).

Būlis (Βούλις: Βούλιος), a town in Phocis on the Corinthian gulf, and on the borders of Boeotia (Paus. x. 37; Strab. pp. 409, 423).

Bullis (Bullinus, Bullio -onis, Bulliensis), a town of Illyria on the coast, S. of Apollonia (Strab. p. 316).

Bupālus and his brother Athēnis, sculptors of Chios, lived about B.C. 500, and are said to have made caricatures of the poet Hipponax, which the poet repeated by the bitterest satires (Plin. xxxvi. 11; Hor. Epod. vi. 14).

Buphras (Βουφράς), a mountain in Messenia near Pylus.

Buprāsium (Βουπράσιον: -σιεύς, -σίλων, -σίδης), an ancient town in Elis, mentioned in the Iliad, which had disappeared in the time of Strabo (Il. ii. 615; Strab. p. 340).

Būra (Βούρα: Βουραῖος, Βούριος), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, destroyed by an earthquake, together with Helice, but subsequently rebuilt (Hdt. i. 145; Strab. p. 386; Paus. vii. 25).

Burdīgāla (Βουρδίγαλα: Bordeaux), the capital of the Bituriges Vivisci in Aquitania, on the left bank of the Garumna (Garonne), was a place of great commercial importance, and at a later time one of the chief seats of literature and learning: under Diocletian the chief town of Aquitania Secunda. It was the birthplace of the poet Ausonius. (Strab. p. 190; Auson. Ord. Nob. Urb. 14; Amm. Marc. xv. 11.)

Burgundiones or Burgundii, a powerful nation of Germany, dwelt originally between the Viadus (Oder) and the Vistula, and were of the same race as the Vaudals or Goths. They pretended, indeed, to be descendants of the Romans, whom Drusus and Tiberius had left in Germany as garrisons, but this descent was evidently invented by them to obtain more easily from the Romans a settlement W. of the Rhine (Amm. Marc. xviii. 5). They were driven out of their original abodes between the Oder and the Vistula by the Gepidae, and the greater part of them migrated W. and settled in the country on the Main, where they carried on frequent wars with their neighbours the Alemanni. In the fifth century they settled W. of the Alps in Gaul, where they founded the powerful kingdom of Burgundy. Their chief towns were Geneva and Lyons. (Zosim. i. 27, 68; Oros. vii. 32.)

Burii, a people of Germany, dwelt near the sources of the Oder and Vistula, and sided with the Romans in the wars of Trajan against the Dacians, and of M. Aurelius against the Marcomanni (Tac. Germ. 43; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 8, lxxi. 18).

Burrus, Afranius, was appointed by Claudius praefectus praetorio, A.D. 52, and in conjunction with Seneca conducted the education of Nero. He opposed Nero's tyrannical acts, and was poisoned by command of the emperor, 63. (Tac. Ann. xii. xiii. xiv.; Dio Cass. lii. 13; Suet. Ner.)

Bursa. [PLANCUS.]

Bursao (Bursaoensis, Bursavoleusis), a town of the Autrigonae in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Busiris (Βούσιρις), king of Egypt, son of Poseidon and Lysiauaassa, is said to have sacrificed all foreigners that visited Egypt. Heracles, on his arrival in Egypt, was likewise seized and led to the altar, but he broke his chains, and slew Busiris. This myth seems to point out a time when the Egyptians were accustomed to offer human sacrifices to their deities. (Hdt. ii. 45; Pherecyd. fr. 33; Diod. iv. 27; Ov. Met. ix. 183; Verg. Georg. iii. 5.)

Busiris (Βούσιρις: Βουσιρίτης). 1. (Abousir, Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Busirites in Lower Egypt, stood just in the middle of the Delta, on the W. bank of the Nile, and had a great temple of Isis, the remains of which are still standing (Hdt. i. 59; Strab. p. 802).—2. (Abousir near Fizeh), a small town, a little NW. of Memphis.

Butēo, Fabius. 1. N., consul B.C. 247, in the first Punic war, was employed in the siege of Drepanum.—2. M., consul 245, also in the first Punic war. In 216 he was appointed dictator to fill up the vacancies in the senate occasioned by the battle of Cannae.—3. Q., praetor 181, with the province of Cisalpine Gaul. In 179 he was one of the triumvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of the Pisani. (Liv. xlv. 13.)

Būtes (Βούτης). 1. Son of Teleon, an Athenian. He was one of the Argonauts, and when the Argo passed the island of the Sirens swam ashore, but was saved by Aphrodite, by whom he became father of Eryx (Ap. Rh. iv. 914; Hyg. Fab. 260).—2. Sou of Pandion and Zeuxippe, brother of Erechtheus. He became priest of Poseidon Erechthonius; from him was named the deme Butadae in the tribe Aegaeis, and his descendants were the priestly family of the Eteobutadae. An altar to the hero Butes stood in the Erechtheum (Paus. i. 26. 5; cf. CETHONIA; ERECTHEUS), and the priestess of Atheno Polias was chosen from the family of the Eteobutadae.

Buthrōtum (Βουθρωτόν: Βουθρώτιος: Butrinto), a town of Epirus on a small peninsula, opposite Corcyra, a seaport and colonised by the Romans (Strab. p. 324; Verg. Aen. iii. 291).

Būtō (Βουτώ), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped principally in the town of Buto. She was the nurse of Horus and Bubastis, the children of Osiris and Isis, and she saved them from the persecutions of Typhon by concealing them in the floating island of Chemmis. The Greeks identified her with Leto, and represented her as the goddess of night. The shrew-mouse (μωγαλή) and the hawk were sacred to her. (Hdt. ii. 59, 67, 155.)

Būtō (Βουτώ, Βούτη, or Βούτος: Βουτοίτης: Baltim? Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Chemmites in Lower Egypt, stood near the Sebennytic branch of the Nile, on the Lake of Buto (Βουτική λίμνη, also Σεβεννυτική), and was celebrated for its oracle of the goddess Buto, in honour of whom a festival was held at the city.

Butuntum (Bitonto), a town of Apulia, 12 miles W. of Barium and 5 from the sea.

Buxentum (Buxentinus, Buxentius: Policastro), originally Pyxus (Πυξῶς), a town on the W. coast of Lucania and on the river Buxentius, was founded by Micythus, tyrant of Messana, B.C. 471, and was afterwards a Roman colony (Diod. xi. 59; Strab. p. 253).

Byblini Montes (τὰ Βύβλινα ὄρη), the mountains whence the Nile is said to flow in the mythical geography of Aeschylus (Prom. 811).

Byblis (Βυβλίς), daughter of Miletus, was in love with her brother Caunus, whom she pursued through various lands, till at length, worn out with sorrow, she was changed into a fountain (Ov. Met. ix. 450; Paus. vii. 5).

Byblus (Βύβλος: Jebeil), an ancient city on the coast of Phœnicia, between Berytus and Tripolis, a little N. of the river Adonis, the chief seat of the worship of Adonis. (Strab. p. 755.)

Bylazōra (Veles), a town in Paeonia, on the river Astycus (Pol. v. 97; Liv. xlv. 26).

Byrsa (Βύρσα), the citadel of CARTHAGO.

Byzacium or Byzacēna Regio (Βυζάκιον, Βυζακίς χώρα: S. part of Tunis), the S. portion of the Roman province of Africa. [AFRICA.]

Byzantini Scriptōres, the general name of the historians who have given an account of the Eastern or Byzantine empire from the time of Constantine the Great, A.D. 325, to the destruction of the empire, 1453. They all wrote in Greek, and may be divided into different classes. 1. The historians, whose collected works form an uninterrupted history of the Byzantine empire, and whose writings are therefore called Corpus Historiae Byzantinae. They are: (1) ZONARAS, who begins with the creation of the world, and brings is history down to 1188. (2) NICEPHORUS COMNENATUS, whose history extends from 1188 to 1206. (3) NICEPHORUS GREGORAS, whose history extends from 1204 to 1331. (4) LAONICUS HALCONDYLES, whose history extends from 297 to 1462: his work is continued by an anonymous writer to 1565.—2. The chronographers, who give a brief chronological summary of universal history from the creation of the world to their own times. These writers are very numerous: the most important of them are GEORGIUS SYNCHELLUS, THEOPHANES, NICEPHORUS, CEDRENIUS, SIMEON METAPHRASTES, MICHAEL GLYCAS, the authors of the Chronicon Paschale, &c.—3. The writers who have treated of separate portions of Byzantine history, such as ZOSIMUS, PROCOPIUS, AGATHIAS, ANNA COMNENA, CINNAMUS, LEO DIACONUS, &c.—4. The writers who have treated of the constitution, antiquities, &c., of the empire, such as JOANNES LYDUS, CONSTANTINUS VI. PORPHYROGENNETUS. A collection of the Byzantine writers was published at Paris by command of Louis XIV. in 36 vols. fol. 1645-1711. A reprint of this edition, with additions, was published at Venice in 28 vols. fol. 1727-1733. The Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, to include all the above, was commenced by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828, continued by Bekker, Dindorf, and others.

Byzantium (Βυζάντιον: Βυζάντιος, Byzantius: Constantinople), a town on the Thracian great importance to its security because they derived corn supplies from the shores of the Black Sea. Afterwards it became subject in succession to the Macedonians and the Romans. In the civil war between Pescennius Niger and Severus, it espoused the cause of the former: it was taken by Severus A.D. 196 after a siege of three years, and a considerable part of it was destroyed. A new city was built by its side (330) by Constantine, who made it the capital of the empire, and changed its name into Constantinopolis. The circumference of Byzantium was five miles; that of Constantinople about thirteen. In imitation of Rome it was divided into fourteen regions, the thirteenth being Galata, across the Golden Horn. It continued the capital of the Roman empire in the East until its capture by the Turks in 1453. An account of its history does not fall within the scope of this work.

C.

Cäbälia or -is (Καβαλία, Καβαλίς: Καβαλεύς, Καβάλιος), a small district of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, Caria, Lycia, and Pamphylia: the chief town was Cibyra (Hdt. iii. 90; Strab. p. 631; Plin. v. 27).

Cäbäsa or -us (Κάβασος: Καβασίτης), the chief city of the Nomos Cabasites, in Lower Egypt.

Walker & Bostall sc.

Plan of Byzantium and Constantinopolis.

Bosporus, founded by the Megarians, B.C. 658, is said to have derived its name from Byzas, the leader of the colony and the son of Poseidon. It was said that the oracle of Apollo told them to build their city opposite 'the city of the blind,' i.e. Chalcedon, whose founders had blindly neglected the better site of Byzantium (Hdt. iv. 144; Strab. p. 320; Tac. Ann. xii. 63; Diod. iv. 49). It was situated on two hills, was forty stadia in circumference, and its acropolis stood on the site of the present seraglio. Its favourable position, commanding as it did the entrance to the Euxine, soon rendered it a place of great commercial importance. It was taken by Pausanias after the battle of Plataea, B.C. 479; and it was alternately in the possession of the Athenians and Lacedaemonians during the Peloponnesian war. The Lacedaemonians were expelled from Byzantium by Thrasybulus in 390, and the city remained independent for some years. It was besieged by Philip in 340, and relieved by the Athenian fleet under Chares. The Athenians attached Cabello (Cavaillon), a town of Gaul on the Druentia between Vapincum (Gap) and Arles (Arles).

Cabillonum (Châlons-sur-Saône), a town of the Aedui on the Arar (Saône) in Gallia Lugdunensis, a place of some commercial activity when Caesar was in Gaul (B.C. 58) (Strab. p. 192; Caes. B. G. vii. 42; Amm. xv. 11).

Cabira (τὰ Κάβειρα: Niksor), a place in Pontus (Polemoniacus) on the borders of Armenia, a little NE. of Comana, and on the road from Amasen to Colonia; a frequent residence of Mithridates, who was defeated here by Lucullus, B.C. 71. Pompey made it a city, and named it Diospolis. Under Augustus it was called Sebaste (Strab. p. 557), afterwards Neocaesarea.

Cabiri (Κάβειροι), mystic divinities of the Pelasgi (Hdt. ii. 51); i.e. of some tribes of the Greek race dating from prehistoric times. They were chiefly worshipped in the islands of the North Aegean, in Lemnos and Imbros, and especially in Samothrace, but also on the coasts of Asia Minor, at Thebes, Andania, and even in parts of Western Europe (Strab. pp. 198, 472). They seem to have formed a group of four deities, a mother goddess, Axieros, from whom were born the god Axiocersos and the goddess Axiocersa, whose son Casmilos was the orderer of the universe. The Pelasgi are said to have offered tithes to them for fruitful harvests and escape from famine (Dionys. i. 23); and their mysteries as celebrated in Samothrace (into which Cicero may perhaps have been initiated: see N. D. i. 42, 119) revealed the manner of the creation of the world with which the Cabiri themselves were concerned. From similarity in their functions, as well as from some resemblance in their mysteries to the Elousinia, these deities have been identified with various Greek and Roman deities: Axieros with Demeter (but also with Aphrodite and with Juno), Axiocersos with Hades but also with Zeus, Apollo, and Dionysus), Axiocersa with Persephone (but also with Athene), Casmilos with Eros and with Hermes. In the 'Chablais' sculptures of the Vatican the figures of Apollo, Aphrodite, and Eros are represented at the base of the statues of Axiocersos, Aphrodite, and Eros respectively. A different view of the Cabiri is presented in the traditions which make them two youthful deities or ἄνακτες, compared to the Dioscuri and often so regarded. One of these was slain by the other, by which myth it is sought to explain the single Cabirus deity worshipped at Thessalonica. This myth (which recalls certain features in the myth of Dionysus Zagreus, of Adonis, and of Attis) is further varied by the representation of three youthful Cabiri, one of whom is slain by his two brothers and afterwards recalled to life. This murder and the resurrection are represented on Etruscan mirrors. With the Cabiric rites of Etruria the Romans seem to have connected alike the Penates and the Dioscuri.

Cabylē (Καβύλη), a town on the river Tonsus in Thrace (Strab. p. 330).

Cacus, son of Vulcan, was a huge giant, who inhabited a cave on Mt. Aventine, and plundered the surrounding country. When Hercules came to Italy with the oxen which he had taken from Geryon in Spain, Cacus stole part of the cattle while the hero slept; and, as he dragged the animals into his cave by their tails, it was impossible to discover their traces. But when the remaining oxen passed by the cave, those within began to bellow, and were thus discovered, whereupon Cacus was slain by Hercules. In honour of his victory, Hercules dedicated the ara maxima, which continued to exist ages afterwards in Rome. (Ov. Fast. i. 543; Verg. Aen. viii. 185; Liv. i. 7.)

Cacyparis (Κακύπαρις or Κακόπαρις: Cassibili), a river in Sicily, S. of Syracuse.

Cadēna (τὰ Κάδηναι), a city of Cappadocia, residence of king Archelaüs (Strab. p. 537).

Cadi (Κάδοι: Καδηνός: Gediz), a city of Phrygia Epictetus, on the borders of Lydia (Strab. p. 576; Prop. v. 6, 8).

Cadmea. [THEBAE.]

Cadmus (Κάδμος). 1. Son of Agenor, king of Phoenicia, and of Telephassa, and brother of Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus to Crete, Agenor sent Cadmus in search of his sister, enjoining him not to return without her. Unable to find her after journeying to Crete, Rhodes, Thasos, and Thera, where local traditions about him were preserved, Cadmus settled in Thrace; but having consulted the oracle at Delphi, he was commanded by the god to follow a cow of a certain kind, and to build a town on the spot where the cow should sink down with fatigue. Cadmus found the cow in Phoeis and followed her into Boeotia, where she sank down on the spot on which Cadmus built Cadmea, afterwards the citadel of Thebes. (Diod. v. 58; Apollod. ii. 1, 3; Hdt. ii. 44, iv. 147; Paus. iii. 1, ix. 12.) Intending to sacrifice the cow to Athene, he sent some persons to the neighbouring well of Arcs to fetch water. This well was guarded by a dragon, a son of Ares, who killed the men sent by Cadmus. Thereupon Cadmus slew the dragon, and, on the advice of Athene, sowed the teeth of the monster, out of which armed men grew up called Sparti or the Sown, who killed each other, with the exception of five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. (Eur. Phoen. 656; Pind. Pyth. iii. 167, Isthm. vi. 13; Ov. Mct. iii. 32.) Athene assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, and Zeus gave him Harmonia, the daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, for his wife. The marriage solemnity was honoured by the presence of all the Olympian gods in the Cadmea. Cadmus gave to Harmonia the famous poplus and necklace which he had received from Hephaestus or from Europa, and he became by her the father of Autonoe, Ino, Semele, Agave, and Polydorus. Subsequently Cadmus and Harmonia quitted Thebes, and went to the Enchelians; this people chose Cadmus as their king, and with his assistance they conquered the Illyrians. After this, Cadmus had another son, whom he called Illyrius (Hdt. v. 57, 61; Eur. Bacch. 1314; Apollod. iii. 5, 4; Paus. ix. 5; Strab. p. 326). In the end, Cadmus and Harmonia were changed into serpents, and were removed by Zeus to Elysium.—Cadmus is said to have introduced into Greece from Phoenicia or Egypt an alphabet of sixteen letters, and to have been the first who worked the mines of Mount Pangaeon in Thrace. The story of Cadmus seems to suggest the establishment of a Phoenician settlement in Greece, by means of which the alphabet, the art of mining, and civilization, came into the country. The name Cadmus is taken to represent a Phoenician word Cadmon, meaning 'the Oriental.' Some have preferred to connect the stories of Cadmus with the Cabiri, and to identify his name with Casmilos [CABIRI].—2. Of Miletus, a son of Pandion, the earliest Greek historian or logographer, lived about B.C. 540. He wrote a work on the foundation of Miletus and the earliest history of Ionia generally, in four books. (Strab. p. 18.) Fragments in Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.

Cadmus (Κάδμος). (Khonas Dagh), a mountain in Caria, on the borders of Phrygia. A river of the same name flowed into the Lycus (Strab. p. 578).

Cadurci, a people in Gallia Aquitania, in the country now called Querci (a corruption of Cadurci), were celebrated for their manufactures of linen, coverlets, &c. Their capital was Divona, afterwards Civitas Cadurcorum, now Cahors, where are the remains of a Roman amphitheatre and of an aqueduct. A part of the town still bears the name les Cadurcas (Caes. B.G. vii. 4, 64, 75).

Cadüsii (Καδούσιοι), or Gēlae (Γῆλαι), a powerful Scythian tribe in the mountains SW. of the Caspian, on the borders of Media Atropatene. Under the Medo-Persian empire they were troublesome neighbours, but the Syrian kings reduced them to tributary auxiliaries. (Strab. pp. 506, 525; Diod. xv. 18; Polyb. v. 79.)

Cadytis (Κάδυτις), according to Herodotus, a great city of the Syrians of Palestine, not much smaller than Sardis, was taken by Necho, king of Egypt, after his defeat of the 'Syrians' at Magdolum. Some have thought it to be the Greek form of a name Kadesh (i.e. the holy) given to Jerusalem; but Herodotus seems to reckon it among the seaports of Palestine; and it is more probable that the Cadytis of Herodotus = GAZA, of which name Klazita and Ghuzza are other forms (Hdt. ii. 159, iii. 5).

Caecilia. [TANAQUIL.]

Caecilia Metella. [METELLA.]

Caecilia Gens, plebeian, claimed descent from CAECULUS, the founder of Praeneste, or Caecus, the companion of Aeneas. Most of the Caecilii are mentioned under their cognomens, BASSUS, METELLUS, RUFUS: for others see below.

Caecilius. 1. Q., a wealthy Roman eques, who adopted his nephew Atticus in his will, and left him a fortune of ten millions of sesterces.—2. Caecilius Calactinus, a Greek rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, was a native of Cale Acte in Sicily (whence his name Calactinus). He wrote a great number of works on rhetoric, grammar, and historical subjects, which have perished.—3. Caecilius Statius, a Roman comic poet, the immediate predecessor of Terence, was by birth an Insubrian Gaul, and a native of Milan. Being a slave he bore the servile appellation of Statius, which was afterwards, probably when he received his freedom, converted into a sort of cognomen, and he became known as Caecilius Statius. He died B.C. 168. We have the titles of forty of his dramas, but only a few fragments of them are preserved. They belonged to the class of Palliatae, or adaptations of the works of Greek writers of the New Comedy. Caecilius ranked high as a writer of comedy with the Romans, and apparently as a critic, since Terence is said to have trusted to his verdict when he began to write (Suet. de Vir. Illust.; cf. Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 59; Gell. iv. 20; Cic. Brut. 74, 258). Cicero finds fault with his Latinity (ad Att. vii. 3, de Opt. Gen. Or. 1).

Caecina, the name of a family of the Etruscan city of Volaterrae, probably derived from the river Caecina, which flows by the town.—

1. A. Caecina, whose cause Cicero pleaded in an action to recover property from which he had been ejected, B.C. 69.—2. A. Caecina, son of the preceding, published a libellous work against Caesar, and was in consequence sent into exile after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. He afterwards joined the Pompeians in Africa, and upon the defeat of the latter in 46, he surrendered to Caesar, who spared his life. Cicero wrote several letters to Caecina, and speaks of him as a man of ability. Caecina was the author of a work on the Etrusca Disciplina. (Suet. Jul. 75; Sen. Q.N. ii. 39, 49, 56; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6, 9.)—3. A. Caecina Volaterranus assisted Octavianus in his negotiations with Antony B.C. 41, and was much valued by him (Appian, B. C. v. 60; Cic. ad Att. xvi. 8).—4. A. Caecina Severus, a distinguished general in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He was governor of Moesia in A.D. 6, when he fought against the two Batos in the neighbouring provinces of Dalmatia and Pannonia. [BATO.] In 15 he fought as the legate of Germanicus, against Arminius, and in consequence of his success received the insignia of a triumph. (Tac. Ann. i. 31, 63, iii. 33.)—5. Caecina Tuscus, son of Nero's nurse, appointed governor of Egypt by Nero, but banished for making use of the baths which had been erected in anticipation of the emperor's arrival in Egypt. He returned from banishment on the death of Nero, A.D. 68.—6. A. Caecina Alienus, was quaestor in Baetica in Spain at Nero's death, and was one of the foremost in joining the party of Galba. He was rewarded by Galba with the command of a legion in Upper Germany; but, being detected in embezzling some of the public money, the emperor ordered him to be prosecuted. Caecina, in revenge, joined Vitellius, and was sent by the latter into Italy with an army of 30,000 men towards the end of 68. After ravaging the country of the Helvetii, he crossed the Alps by the pass of the Great St. Bernard, and laid siege to Placentia, from which he was repulsed by the troops of Otho, who had succeeded Galba. Subsequently he was joined by Fabius Valens, another general of Vitellius, and their united forces gained a victory over Otho's army at Bedriacum. Vitellius having thus gained the throne, Caecina was made consul on the 1st of September, 69, and was shortly afterwards sent against Antonius Primus, the general of Vespasian. But he again proved a traitor, and espoused the cause of Vespasian. Some years afterwards (79), he conspired against Vespasian, and was slain by order of Titus. (Tac. Hist. i. 53, 61, iii. 13; Dio Cass. lxiv. 7, lxvi. 16; Suet. Tit. 6.)—7. Decius Albinus Caecina, a Roman satirist in the time of Arcadius and Honorius.

Caecinus (Κακίνος or Κακίνος), a river in Bruttium flowing into the Sinus Scyllacius by the town Caecinum (Thuc. iii. 103. Paus. vi. 6, 4).

Caecūbus Ager, a marshy district in Latium, bordering on the gulf of Amyclae close to Fundi, and including the marshy district which surrounded Tarracina, celebrated for its wine (Caecubum) in the age of Horace (Hor. Od. i. 20, ii. 14; cf. Strab. p. 234). In the time of Pliny (xiv. 61) the reputation of this wine was entirely gone. (See Dict. of Ant. s.v. Vinum.)

Caecūlus, an ancient Italian hero, son of Vulcan, is said to have founded PRAENESTE. In the region of Praeneste there were two brothers Depidii (some have read this into Indigites), living as herdsmen. As their sister sat by the fireside in their hut, a spark fell upon her lap, and she became the mother of Caeculus. The child grew up as a robber, and eventually collected a number of shepherds and founded Praeneste. When a proof of his divine origin was demanded, Vulcan sent a flame of fire. It is clearly a local Praenestine story based upon the custom of a state-hearth established at the foundation of cities, the fratres Depidii being probably regarded as the Lares of Praeneste; there are also points of resemblance to the stories of Romulus and Servius Tullius (Verg. Aen. vii. 679, x. 544; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 681).

Caes or Caelius Vibenna, the leader of an Etruscan army, is said to have come to Rome in the reign either of Romulus or of Tarquinius Priscus, and to have settled on the hill called after him the Caelian.

Caelia (Καίλια: Ceglie), a town in Apulia between Canusium and Barium on the road to Brundisium (Strab. p. 282).

Caelium (Ceglie), a town in Calabria about 25 miles west of Brundisium.

Caelius or Coelius. 1. Antipater. [ANTI-PATER.]—2. Aurelianus. [AURELIANUS.]—

3. Caldus. [CALDUS.]—4. Rufus. [RUFUS.]

Caelius or Coelius Mons. [ROMA.]

Caenae (Καίνα: Senn), a city of Mesopotamia, on the W. bank of the Tigris, opposite the mouth of the Lycus (Xcn. Anab. ii. 4, 28).

Caenē, Caenēpōlis, or Neapōlis (Καινὴ πόλις, Νεή πόλις: Kenēh), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, a little below Coptos and opposite to Tentyra (Hdt. ii. 91).

Caeneus (Καινεύς), one of the Lapithae, son of Elatus, was originally a maiden named Caenis, who was beloved by Poseidon, and was by this god changed into a man, and rendered invulnerable. As a man he took part in the Argonautic expedition and the Calydonian hunt. In the battle between the Lapithae and the Centaurs at the marriage of Pirithous, he was buried by the Centaurs under a mass of trees, as they were unable to kill him, but he was changed into a bird. In the lower world Caeneus recovered his female form. (Verg. Aen. vi. 448; Ov. Met. xii. 172, 459.)

Caeni or Caenīci, a Thracian people between the Black Sea and the Panyus.

Caenīna (Caeninensis), a town of the Sabines in Latium, whose king Acon carried on the first war against Rome (Liv. i. 10; Dionys. ii. 35).

Caenis. [CAENEUS.]

Caenys (Καινύς: Canitello), a promontory of Bruttium opposite Sicily.

Caepārius, M., of Tarracina, one of Catiline's conspirators: he escaped from the city, but was overtaken, and executed with the other conspirators B.C. 63 (Sall. Cat. 47, 55).

Caepio, Servilius. 1. Cn., consul B.C. 253, in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, C. Sempronius Blaesus, to the coast of Africa. —2. Cn., curule aedile 207, praetor 205, and consul 203, when he fought against Hannibal near Croton in the S. of Italy. He died in the pestilence in 174. (Liv. xli. 26.) —3. Cn., son of No. 2, curule aedile 179, praetor 174, with Spain as his province, and consul in 169. —4. Q., son of No. 3, consul 142, was adopted by Q. Fabius Maximus. [MAXIMUS.] —5. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 141, and censor 125. —6. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 140, carried on war against Viriathus in Lusitania, and induced two of the friends of Viriathus to murder the latter. —7. Q., son of No. 6, was consul 106, when he proposed a law for restoring the judicia to the senators, of which they had been deprived by the Sempronian law of C. Gracchus. He was afterwards sent into Gallia Narbonensis to oppose the Cimbri, and was in 105 defeated by the Cimbri, along with the consul Cn. Mallius or Manlius. 80,000 soldiers and 40,000 camp-followers are said to have perished. Shortly before this catastrophe he had sacked Tolosa, which had revolted to the Cimbri, and plundered a temple, for which his disaster was regarded as a punishment; and the proverb arose 'Aurum Tolosanum habet' (Strab. p. 188; Gell. iii. 9; Liv. Ep. 67; Val. Max. iv. 7). Caepio survived the battle, but ten years afterwards (95) he was brought to trial by the tribune C. Norbanus on account of his misconduct in this war. He was condemned and cast into prison, where according to one account he died, but it was more generally stated that he escaped from prison, and lived in exile at Smyrna. —8. Q., quaestor urbanus 100, opposed the lex frumentaria of Saturninus. In 91 he opposed the measures of Drusus, and accused two of the most distinguished senators, M. Scaurus and L. Philippus. He fell in battle in the Social War, 90. (Appian, B. C. i. 44.)

Caepio, Fannius, conspired with Murena against Augustus B.C. 22, and was put to death (Suct. Aug. 19, Tib. 8).

Caerē (Caerites, Caeretes, Caeretani; Cervetri), called by the Greeks Agylla (Ἀγυλλὰ: Agyllina urbs, Verg. Aen. vii. 652), a city in Etruria situated on a small river (Caeritis amnis), W. of Veii and 50 stadia from the coast. It was an ancient Pelasgic city, the capital of the cruel Mezentius, and was afterwards one of the twelve Etruscan cities, with a territory extending apparently as far as the Tiber. In early times Caere was closely allied with Rome; and when the latter city was taken by the Gauls, B.C. 390, Caere gave refuge to the Vestal virgins. In 353 Caere joined Tarquinius in making war against Rome, but was obliged to purchase a truce with Rome for 100 years by the forfeiture of half of its territory, and received only the civitas sine suffragio, i.e. an incomplete Roman citizenship, without the privilege of electing or being elected* (Gell. xvi. 13; Liv. vii. 70). From this time Caere gradually sank in importance, and was probably destroyed in the wars of Marius and Sulla. It was restored by Drusus, who made it a municipium; and it continued to exist till the 13th century, when part of the inhabitants removed to a site about three miles off, on which they bestowed the same name (now Ceri), while the old town was distinguished by the title of Vetus or Caere Vetere, corrupted into Cervetri, which is a small village with 100 or 200 inhabitants. Here have been discovered, within the last few years, the tombs of the ancient Caere, many of them in a state of complete preservation.—The country round Caere produced wine and a great quantity of corn, and in its neighbourhood were warm baths which were much frequented. Caere used as its seaport the town of Pyrgi.

Caerellia, a Roman lady frequently mentioned in the correspondence of Cicero as distinguished for her acquirements and her love of philosophy (ad Fam. xiii. 72; ad Att. xii. 51, xiii. 21, 22, xiv. 19, xv. 1, 26; cf. Dio Cass. xlvi. 18).

Caesar, the name of a patrician family of the Julia gens, which traced its origin to Iulus, the son of Aeneas. [JULIA GENS.] It may be connected with caesaries, and may have marked a personal peculiarity in the man who first adopted it. Pliny (vii. 47) derives it 'a caeso matris utero.' The name was assumed by Augustus as the adopted son of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, and was by Augustus handed down to his adopted son Tiberius. It continued to be used by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members either by adoption or female descent of Caesar's family. Though the family became extinct with Nero, succeeding emperors still retained the name not only for themselves (e.g. Emperor Caesar Domitianus Augustus), but also to mark the members of the reigning house; but when Hadrian adopted Aelius Verus, he allowed him to take the title of Caesar; and from this time, while the title of Augustus continued to be confined to the reigning prince, that of Caesar was granted also to the second person in the state, heir presumptive to the throne, but not to other members of the imperial family.

* The Caerites appear to have been the first body of Roman citizens who did not enjoy the suffrage. Thus, when a Roman citizen was struck out of his tribe by the Censors and made an arrianus, he was said to become one of the Caerites, since he had lost the suffrage: hence we find the expressions in tabulis Caeritum referre and arrianum facere used as synonymous.

Caesar, Julius. 1. Sex., praetor B.C. 208, with Sicily as his province (Liv. xxvii. 21).—2. Sex., curule aedile, 165, when the Hecyra of Terence was exhibited at the Megalesian games, and consul 157.—3. L., consul 90, fought against the Socii, and in the course of the same year proposed the Lex Julia de Civitate, which granted the citizenship to the Latins and the Socii who had remained faithful to Rome. Caesar was censor in 89; he belonged to the aristocratical party, and was put to death by Marius in 87. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 72; Cic. de Or. iii. 3, 9).—4. C., surnamed STRABO VOPISCUS, brother of No. 3, was curule aedile 90, was a candidate for the consulship in 88, and was slain along with his brother by Marius in 87. He was one of the chief orators and poets of his age, and is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue De Oratore. Wit was the chief characteristic of his oratory; but he was deficient in power and energy. The names of two of his tragedies are preserved, the Adrastus and Tecmessa (Val. Max. v. 3, 3).—5. L., son of No. 3, and uncle by his sister Julia of M. Antony the triumvir. He was consul 64, and belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party. He appears to have deserted this party afterwards; we find him in Gaul in 52 as one of the legates of C. Caesar, and he continued in Italy during the civil war (Caes. B. G. vii. 65, B. C. i. 8). After Caesar's death (44) he sided with the senate in opposition to his uncle Antony, and was in consequence proscribed by the latter in 43, but obtained his pardon through the influence of his sister Julia.—6. L., son of No. 5, usually distinguished from his father by the addition to his name of filius or adolescens. He joined Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war in 49, and was sent by Pompey to Caesar with proposals of peace. In the course of the same year, he crossed over to Africa, where the command of Clupea was entrusted to him. In 46 he served as proquaestor to Cato in Utica, and after the death of Cato he surrendered to the dictator Caesar, and was shortly afterwards put to death, but probably not by the dictator's orders (Dio Cass. xliii. 12; Suet. Jul. 75).—7. C., the father of the dictator, was praetor, but in what year is uncertain, and died suddenly at Pisae in 84 (Suet. Jul. 1).—8. Sex., brother of No. 7, consul 91.—9. C., the Dictator, son of No. 7 and of Aurelia, is usually considered to have been born in B.C. 100 (July 12th), since we are told by several writers that he had nearly completed his 56th year at the time of his murder, 15th of March, 44 (Suet. Jul. 88; Plut. Caes. 69; Appian, B. C. ii. 149; cf. Vell. ii. 41); but Mommsen gives strong reasons for fixing the year of his birth in B.C. 102, since otherwise Caesar would have filled all the curule offices two years before the legal period, and there is no mention that he did so. The numeral LII on the denarii struck at the beginning of the civil war will, according to this view, denote his age at the time. He was taught in his boyhood by a tutor of Gallic birth named M. Antonius Gniphio, whose school of rhetoric Cicero is said to have attended after he was fully grown up (Suet. de Gramm. 7). Caesar was closely connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julia with the great Marius; and in 83, though only 17 years of age, he married Cornelia, the daughter of L. Cinna, the chief leader of the Marian party. Sulla commanded him to put away his wife, but he refused to obey him, and was consequently proscribed. He concealed himself for some time in the country of the Sabines, till his friends obtained his pardon from Sulla, who is said to have observed, when they pleaded his youth, 'that that boy would some day or another be the ruin of the aristocracy, for that there were many Mariuses in him.' Seeing that he was not safe at Rome, he went to Asia, where he served his first campaign under M. Minncius Thermus. He was sent by Minucius to Nicomedes in Bithynia to fetch the fleet, and after his return, at the capture of Mytilene (80), was rewarded with a civic crown for saving the life of a fellow-soldier. On the death of Sulla in 78, he returned to Rome, and in the following year gained renown as an orator, though he was only 22 years of age, by his prosecution of Cn. Dolabella on account of extortion in his province of Macedonia. He did not, however, win his case in this trial, nor in a similar prosecution of C. Antonius; and to perfect himself in oratory, he resolved to study in Rhodes under Apollonius Molo, but on his voyage thither he was captured by pirates, and only obtained his liberty by a ransom of 50 talents. At Milctus he manned some vessels, overpowered the pirates, and conducted them as prisoners to Pergamus, where he crucified them, a punishment with which he had frequently threatened them in sport when he was their prisoner (Suet. Jul. 4; Plut. Caes. 2). He then repaired to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius, and shortly afterwards returned to Rome. He now devoted all his energies to acquire the favour of the people. He was regarded as the rising man in the democratic party; became quaestor in 68, and aedile in 65, when he spent enormous sums upon the public games and buildings. His liberality increased his favour with the people, but also caused him to contract large debts. He was said by many to have been concerned in Catiline's conspiracy in 63, and the correct conclusion from the evidence is probably that both Caesar and Crassus were privy to it, Caesar was deeply involved in debt, and moreover the democratic party was not unlikely to hope for the success of the anarchists as a counterpoise to the military power of Pompey. Both Crassus and Caesar had supported Catiline as candidate for the consulship: Suctonius directly implicates Caesar in the conspiracy, and Plutarch (Crass. 13; cf. Caes. 8) tells us that Cicero, in his later life, stated Caesar to have been guilty, though his name was suppressed when the senate received the information. As regards the account in Sallust, it must be recollected that he was strongly prejudiced in Caesar's favour. In the debate in the senate on the punishment of the conspirators, Caesar opposed their execution in an able speech, which made such an impression that their lives would have been spared but for the speech of Cato in reply. In the course of this year (63), Caesar was elected Pontifex Maximus, defeating the other candidates, Q. Catulus and Servilius Isauricus, who had both been consuls, and were two of the most illustrious men in the state. He had told his mother that if he did not succeed in this election he would leave Rome for ever. In 62 Caesar was praetor, and took an active part in supporting the tribune Metellus in opposition to his colleague Cato; in consequence of the tumults that ensued, the senate suspended both Caesar and Metellus from their offices, but were obliged to reinstate him in his dignity after a few days. In the following year (61) Caesar went as propractor into Further Spain, where he gained victories over the Lusitani.

tianians. On his return to Rome, he became a candidate for the consulship, and was elected notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the aristocracy, who succeeded, however, in carrying the election of Bibulus as his colleague, who was one of the warmest supporters of the aristocracy. After his election, but before he entered upon the consulship, he formed that coalition with Pompey and M. Crassus, usually known by the name of the first triumvirate. (It was, however, a secret combination, not an open assumption of power.) Pompey had become estranged from the aristocracy, since the senate had opposed the ratification of his acts in Asia and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. Crassus, in consequence of his immense wealth, was one of the most powerful men at Rome, but was a personal enemy of Pompey. They were reconciled by means of Caesar, and the three entered into an agreement for mutual support to aid each other in political measures and in obtaining commands and provinces. In 59 Caesar was consul, and being supported by Pompey and Crassus he was able to carry all his measures. Bibulus, from whom the senate had expected so much, could offer no effectual opposition, and, after making a vain attempt to resist Caesar, shut himself up in his own house, and did not appear again in public till the expiration of his consulship. Caesar's first measure was an agrarian law, by which the rich Campanian plain was divided among the poorer citizens. He next gained the favour of the equites by relieving them from one-third of the sum which they had agreed to pay for the farming of the taxes in Asia. He then obtained the confirmation of Pompey's acts. Having thus gratified the people, the equites, and Pompey, he was easily able to obtain for himself the provinces which he wished. By a vote of the people, proposed by the tribune Vatinius, the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum were granted to Caesar with three legions for five years; and the senate added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, with another legion, for five years also, as they saw that a bill would be proposed to the people for that purpose, if they did not grant the province themselves. Caesar foresaw that the struggle between the different parties at Rome must eventually be terminated by the sword, and he had therefore resolved to obtain an army, which he might attach to himself by victories and rewards. In the course of the same year Caesar united himself more closely to Pompey by giving him his daughter Julia in marriage. During the next nine years Caesar was occupied with the subjugation of Gaul. He conquered the whole of Transalpine Gaul, which had hitherto been independent of the Romans, with the exception of the SE. part called Provincia; he twice crossed the Rhine, and twice landed in Britain, which had been previously unknown to the Romans.—In his first campaign (58) Caesar conquered the Helvetii, who had emigrated from Switzerland with the intention of settling in Gaul. He next defeated Ariovistus, a German king, who had taken possession of part of the territories of the Aedui and Sequani, and pursued him as far as the Rhine. At the conclusion of the campaign Caesar went into Cisalpine Gaul to attend to the civil duties of his province and to keep up his communication with the various parties at Rome. During the whole of his campaigns in Gaul, he spent the greater part of the winter in Cisalpine Gaul.—In his second campaign (57)

Caesar carried on war with the Belgae, who dwelt in the NE. of Gaul between the Sequana (Seine) and the Rhine, and after a severe struggle completely subdued them.—Caesar's third campaign in Gaul (56) did not commence till late in the year. He was detained some months in the N. of Italy by the state of affairs at Rome. At Luca (Lucca) he had interviews with most of the leading men at Rome, among others with Pompey and Crassus, who visited him in April. He made arrangements with them for the continuance of their power; it was agreed between them that Crassus and Pompey should be the consuls for the following year, that Crassus should have the province of Syria, Pompey the two Spains, and that Caesar's government, which would expire at the end of 54, should be prolonged for five years after that date. Caesar's main object just now was to finish the work which he had begun in Gaul, and he probably always looked to his troops trained in that war as a support if needed against his rivals. After making these arrangements he crossed the Alps, and carried on war with the Veneti and the other states in the NW. of Gaul, who had submitted to Crassus, Caesar's legate, in the preceding year, but who had now risen in arms against the Romans. They were defeated and obliged to submit to Caesar, and during the same time Crassus conquered Aquitania. Thus, in three campaigns, Caesar subdued the whole of Gaul; but the people made several attempts to recover their independence; and it was not till their revolts had been again and again put down by Caesar, and the flower of the nation had perished in battle, that they learnt to submit to the Roman yoke.—In his fourth campaign (55) Caesar crossed the Rhine in order to strike terror into the Germans, but he only remained eighteen days on the further side of the river. It is impossible rightly to coudoue, as some historians have tried to do, his slaughter of the Usipetes and Tencteri in this campaign. Late in the summer he invaded Britain, but more with the view of obtaining some knowledge of the island from personal observation than with the intention of permanent conquest at present. The places of his departure and landing are still subjects of dispute. It is on the whole most probable that Portus Itius from which he sailed is Wissant, and that he landed at Romney. Another view makes him start from Boulogne and land at Pevensey. The tides could not have taken him, as was once thought, to Deal. The late period of the year compelled him to return to Gaul after remaining only a short time in the island. In this year, according to his arrangement with Pompey and Crassus, who were now consuls, his government of the Gauls and Illyricum was prolonged for five years, namely, from the 1st of January, 53, to the end of December, 49.—Caesar's fifth campaign (54) was chiefly occupied with his second invasion of Britain. He landed in Britain at the same place as in the former year, defeated the Britons in a series of engagements, and crossed the Tamesis (Thames). The Britons submitted, and promised to pay an annual tribute; but their subjection was only nominal, for Caesar left no garrisons or military establishments behind him, and Britain remained nearly 100 years longer independent of the Romans. During the winter one of the Roman legions, which had been stationed under the command of T. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, in the country of the Eburones, was cut to pieces by Ambiorix and the Eburones. Ambiorix then proceeded to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, who was stationed with a legion among the Nervii; but Cicero defuded himself with bravery, and was at length relieved by Caesar in person. In September of this year, Julia, Caesar's only daughter and Pompey's wife, died in childbirth.—In Caesar's sixth campaign (53) several of the Gallic nations revolted, but Caesar soon compelled them to return to obedience. The Treveri, who had revolted, had been supported by the Germans, and Caesar accordingly again crossed the Rhine, but made no permanent conquests on the further side of the river.—Caesar's seventh campaign (52) was the most arduous of all. Almost all the nations of Gaul rose simultaneously in revolt, and the supreme command was given to Vercingetorix, by far the ablest general that Caesar had yet encountered. Caesar, after taking Avaricum (Bourges), sustained his only reverse in Auvergne, where he failed to take Gergovia, and, after a repulse from its fortifications, was obliged to retreat; but he was successful in the famous siege of Alesia which ended in the defeat of the Gauls and the surrender of Vercingetorix. It is to be regretted that he did not spare the life of the Gallic prince; but it must be remembered that such clemency was contrary to Roman custom.—The eighth and ninth campaigns (51, 50) were employed in the final subjugation of Gaul, which had entirely submitted to Caesar by the middle of 50. Meanwhile, an estrangement had taken place between Caesar and Pompey. Caesar's brilliant victories had gained him fresh popularity and influence; and Pompey saw with ill-disguised mortification that he was becoming the second person in the state. He was thus led to join again the aristocratical party, by the assistance of which alone he could hope to retain his position as the chief man in the Roman state. The great object of this party was to deprive Caesar of his command, and to compel him to come to Rome as a private man to sue for the consulship. They would then have formally accused him, and as Pompey was in the neighbourhood of the city at the head of an army, the trial would have been a mockery, and his condemnation would have been certain. Caesar offered to resign his command if Pompey would do the same; but the senate would not listen to any compromise. Accordingly, on the 1st of January, 49, the senate passed a resolution that Caesar should disband his army by a certain day, and that if he did not do so, he should be regarded as an enemy of the state. Two of the tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, put their veto upon this resolution, but their opposition was set at nought, and they fled for refuge to Caesar's camp. Under the plea of protecting the tribunes, Caesar crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and marched towards Rome. Pompey, who had been entrusted by the senate with the conduct of the war, soon discovered how greatly he had overrated his own popularity and influence. His own troops deserted to his rival in crowds; town after town in Italy opened its gates to Caesar, whose march was like a triumphal progress. The only town which offered Caesar any resistance was Corfinium, into which L. Domitius Ahenobarbus had thrown himself with a strong force; but even this place was obliged to surrender at the end of a few days. Meanwhile, Pompey, with the magistrates and senators, had fled from Rome to Capua, and now, despairing of opposing Caesar in Italy, he marched from Capua to Brundisium, and on the 17th of March embarked for Greece. Caesar pursued Pompey to Brundisium, but he was unable to follow him to Greece for want of ships. He therefore marched back from Brundisium, and repaired to Rome, having thus in three months become master of the whole of Italy. After remaining a short time in Rome, he set out for Spain, where Pompey's legates, Afranius, Petreius, and Varro, commanded powerful armies. After defeating Afranius and Petreius, and receiving the submission of Varro, Caesar returned to Rome, where he had meantime been appointed dictator by the praetor M. Lepidus. He resigned the dictatorship at the end of eleven days, after holding the consular comitia, in which he himself and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus were elected consuls for the next year.—At the beginning of January, 48, Caesar crossed over to Greece, where Pompey had collected a formidable army. At first the campaign was in Pompey's favour; Caesar was repulsed before Dyrrhachium with considerable loss, and was obliged to retreat towards Thessaly. In this country on the plains of Pharsalus or Pharsalia, a decisive battle was fought between the two armies on the 9th of August, 48, in which Pompey was completely defeated. Pompey fled to Egypt, pursued by Caesar, but he was murdered before Caesar arrived in the country. [POMPEIUS.] His head was brought to Caesar, who turned away from the sight, shed tears at the untimely death of his rival, and put his murderers to death. When the news of the battle of Pharsalia reached Rome, various honours were conferred upon Caesar. He was appointed dictator for a whole year and consul for five years, and the tribunician power was conferred upon him for life. He declined the consulship, but entered upon the dictatorship in September in this year (48), and appointed M. Antony his master of the horse. On his arrival in Egypt, Caesar became involved in a war, which gave the remains of the Pompeian party time to rally. This war, usually called the Alexandrine war, arose from the determination of Caesar that Cleopatra, whose fascinations had won his heart, should reign in common with her brother Ptolemy; but this decision was opposed by the guardians of the young king, and the war which thus broke out was not brought to a close till the latter end of March, 47. It was soon after this, that Cleopatra had a son by Caesar. [CAESARION.] Caesar returned to Rome through Syria and Asia Minor, and on his march through Pontus attacked

Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the Great, who had assisted Pompey. He defeated Pharnaces near Zela with such ease, that he informed the senate of his victory by the words, Veni, vidi, vici. (Cf. Bell. Alex. 77.) He reached Rome in September (47), was appointed consul for the following year, and before the end of September set sail for Africa, where Scipio and Cato had collected a large army. The war was terminated by the defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus, on the 6th of April, 46. Cato, unable to defend Utica, put an end to his own life.—Caesar returned to Rome in the latter end of July. He was now the undisputed master of the Roman world, but he used his victory with the greatest moderation. Unlike other conquerors in civil wars, he freely forgave all who had borne arms against him, and declared that he would make no difference between Pompeians and Caesarians. His clemency was one of the brightest features of his character. At Rome all parties seemed to vie in paying him honour: the dictatorship was bestowed on him for ten years, and the censorship, under the new title of Praefectus Morum, for three years. He celebrated his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa by four magnificent triumphs. Caesar now proceeded to correct the various evils which had crept into the state, and to obtain the enactment of several laws suitable to the altered condition of the commonwealth. The most important of his measures this year (46) was the reformation of the calendar. As the Roman year was now three months in advance of the real time, Caesar added ninety days to this year, and thus made the whole year consist of 445 days; and he guarded against a repetition of similar errors for the future by adapting the year to the sun's course, adding ten days to the original 355 days of the year. had collected a new army in Spain. Caesar set out for Spain towards the end of the year, and brought the war to a close by the battle of Munda, on the 17th of March, 45, in which the enemy were only defeated after a most obstinate resistance. Cn. Pompey was killed shortly afterwards, but Sextus made good his escape. Caesar reached Rome in September, and entered the city in triumph. Fresh honours awaited him. His portrait was to be struck on coins; the month of Quintilis was to receive the name of Julius in his honour; he received the title of imperator for life; and the whole senate took an oath to watch over his safety. To reward his followers, Caesar increased the number of senators and of the public magistrates, so that there were to be sixteen praetors, forty quæstors, and six aediles. He began to revolve vast schemes for the benefit of the Roman world. Among his plans of internal improvement, he proposed to frame a digest of all the Roman laws, to establish public libraries, to drain the Pomptine marshes, to enlarge the harbour of Ostia, and to dig a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. To protect the boundaries of the Roman empire, he meditated expeditions against the Parthians and the barbarous tribes on the Danube, and had already begun to make preparations for his departure to the East. It is questionable whether he wished to assume the title of rex. Some have asserted that he intended to rule the Romans as Imperator, the non-Romans as Rex, but this story rests only on Plut. Cass. 60, 64, and Appian, B.C. ii. 110: it is not apparently credited by Suetonius or Dio Cassius, and Cicero speaks of it as a fiction (de Div. ii. 54, 110). It is not like Caesar's clear-sighted wisdom to have desired it. However that may be, Antony offered him the diadem in public on the festival of the Lupercalia (the 15th of February); the proposition was not favourably received by the people, and Caesar declined it.—But Caesar's power was not witnessed without envy. The Roman aristocracy, who had been so long accustomed to rule the Roman world, could ill brook a master, and resolved to remove him by assassination. The conspiracy against Caesar's life had been set afoot by Cassius, a personal enemy of Caesar's, and there were more than sixty persons privy to it. Many of these persons had been raised by Caesar to wealth and honour; and some of them, such as M. Brutus, lived with him on terms of the most intimate friendship. It has been the practice of rhetoricians to speak of the murder of Caesar as a glorious deed, and to represent Brutus and Cassius as patriots; but the mask ought to be stripped off these false patriots: their object in murdering Caesar was to gain power for themselves and their party. Caesar had many warnings of his approaching fate, but he disregarded them all, and fell by the daggers of his assassins on the Ides or 15th of March, 44. At an appointed signal the conspirators surrounded him; Casca dealt the first blow, and the others quickly drew their swords and attacked him; Caesar at first defended himself, but when he saw that Brutus, his friend and favourite, had also drawn his sword, he is said by some accounts to have exclaimed 'Et tu Brute!' or in Greek 'Καὶ σὺ τέκνον!' then to have pulled his toga over his face, and sunk pierced with wounds at the foot of Pompey's statue. Suetonius, however, who is the safest authority, expressly says that he uttered no word during the struggle, and that the exclamation attributed to him is an invention.—Julius Caesar was perhaps the greatest man of antiquity. He was gifted by nature with the most various talents, and was distinguished by the most extraordinary attainments in the most diversified pursuits. He was at one and the same time a general, a statesman, a lawgiver, a jurist, an orator, a poet, an historian, a philologist, a mathematician, and an architect. His main work as a statesman, to which all his efforts tended, was to reorganise the government of the state, which had been fitted for the control of Italy, but not for the rule of an empire. But he was not only a consummate statesman and general: during the whole of his busy life he found time for literary pursuits, and was the author of many works, the majority of which has been lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his Commentarii, which are his only works that have come down to us. They relate the history of the first seven years of the Gallic war in seven books, and the history of the Civil war down to the commencement of the Alexandrine in three books. Neither of these works completed the history of the Gallic and Civil wars. The history of the former was completed in an eighth book, which is usually ascribed to Hirtius, and the history of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars were written in three separate books, which are also ascribed to Hirtius, but their authorship is uncertain. It is not improbable that Hirtius wrote the Bellum Alexandrinum: the Bellum Africanum is attributed by some to Asinius Pollio, but without any strong reason. The lost works of Caesar are:—1. Anticato, in reply to Cicero's Cato, which Cicero wrote in praise of Cato after the death of the latter in 46. 2. De Analogia, or, as Cicero explains it, De Ratione Latine loquendi, dedicated to Cicero, contained investigations on the Latin language, and was written by Caesar while he was crossing the Alps. 3. Libri Auspiciozum, or Auguralia. 4. De Astris. 5. Apothegmata, or Dieta collectanea, a collection of good sayings. 6. Poemata. Two of these written in his youth, Laudes Herculis and a tragedy Oedipus, were suppressed by Augustus. Among the numerous editions of Caesar's Commentaries may be noticed those by Nipperdey, Leipz. 1872; Dübner, Paris, 1867; Lough, 1868; Kramer, 1877.

C. Julius Caesar, the Dictator. In this coin the natural baldness of his head is concealed by a crown of laurel. On the reverse the name of the quæstor L. Aem. Buca, who struck the coin, is surmounted by a palm as sign of victory, and a winged caduceus and joined hands as signs of peace.

way to Spain, A.D. 2, and C. Caesar in Lycia, A.D. 4, of a wound which he had received in Armenia.

Caesaraugusta (Zaragoza or Saragossa), more anciently Salduba, a town of the Edetani on the Iberus in Hispania Tarraconensis, was colonised by Augustus, B.C. 27, and was the seat of a Conventus Iuridicus, and a centre through which most of the great roads of Spain passed. It was the birthplace of the poet Prudentius.

Caesārēa (Καϊσάρεια: Καϊσαρεύς: Caesariensis), a name given to several cities of the Roman empire in honour of one or other of the Caesars.—1. C. ad Argaeum, formerly Mazāca, also Eusēbia (Κ. ἡ πρὸς τῷ Ἀργαίῳ, τὰ Μάζακα, Eusēbia: Kesariēh, Rn.), one of the oldest cities of Asia Minor, stood upon Mount Argaeus, about the centre of Cappadocia, in the district (praefectura) called Cilicia. It was the capital of Cuppadocia, and when that country was made a Roman province by Tiberius (A.D. 18), it received the name of Caesarea (Strab. p. 539; Eutrop. vii. 11; Plin. vi. 8).—2. C. Philippi or Panēas (Κ. ἡ Φιλίππου, N. T.; K. Πανεϊάς: Baniās), a city of Palestine, at the S. foot of M. Hermon, on the Jordan, just below its source [PANUM], built by Philip the tetrarch, B.C. 3; King Agrippa called it Neronias, but it soon lost this name.—3. C. Palaestinae, formerly Stratōnis Turris (Στρατώνιος πύργος: Kaisariyeh, Ru.), an important city of Palestine, on the sea-coast, just above the boundary line between Samaria and Galilee. It was surrounded with a wall and decorated with splendid buildings by Herod the Great (B.C. 13), who called it Caesarea, in honour of Augustus. He also made a splendid harbour for the city. Under the Romans it was the capital of Palestine and the residence of the procurator. Vespasian made it a colony, and Titus conferred additional favours upon it; hence it was called Colonia Flavia (Jos. Ant. xv. 10, B. J. i. 21; Tac. Hist. ii. 79).—4. C. Mauretaniae, formerly Iol (Ἰὼλ Καϊσάρεια: Zershell), a Phoenician city on the N. coast of Africa, with a harbour, the residence of King Juba, who named it Caesarea, in honour of Augustus. When Claudius erected Mauretania into a Roman province, he made Caesarea a colony, and the capital of the middle division of the province, which was thence called Mauretania Caesariensis (Strab. p. 831; Plin. v. 20).—5. C. ad Anazarbum. [ANAZARBUS.]

Caesarion, son of C. Julius Caesar and of Cleopatra, originally called Ptolemaeus as an Egyptian prince, was born B.C. 47. In 42 the triumvirs allowed him to receive the title of king of Egypt, and in 34 Antony conferred upon him the title of king of kings. After the death of his mother in 30 he was executed by order of Augustus (Suet. Jul. 52, Aug. 17; Pint. Caes. 49, Ant. 54, 81).

Caesarodūnum (Tours), chief town of the Thrones or Turōni, subsequently called Turoni, on the Liger (Loire), in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Caesaromāgus. 1. (Beauvais), chief town of the Bellovacii in Gallia Belgica.—2. (Chelmsford), a town of the Trinobantes in Britain.

Caesēna (Caesenas, -ātis: Cesena), a town in Gallia Cispadana on the Via Aemilia not far from the Rubico (Strab. p. 216; Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 27), used as a fortress by Justinian's generals (Procop. B. G. i. 1, ii. 11).

Caesennius Lento. [LENTO.]

Caesennius Paetus. [PAETUS.]

Caesētius Flavus. [FLAVUS.]

Caesia, a surname of Minerva, a translation of the Greek γλαυκῶπις.

Caesia Silva (Häserwald), a forest in Germany between the Lippe and the Yssel (Tac. Ann. i. 50).

Caesōnia, first the mistress and afterwards the wife of the emperor Caligula, was a woman of the greatest licentiousness, and was put to death by Caligula with her daughter, A.D. 41.

M. Caesōnius, a iudex at the trial of Oppianicus for the murder of Cluentius, B.C. 74, and aedile with Cicero in 69.

Cāicus (Καϊκός: Bakir), a river of Mysia, rising in M. Temnus and flowing past Pergamus into the Cumaean Gulf (Hes. Th. 343; Hdt. vi. 28; Strab. p. 615; Verg. Georg. iv. 370).

Caiēta (Caietānus: Gaeta), a town in Latium on the borders of Campania, 40 stadia S. of Formiae, situated on a promontory of the same name and on a bay of the sea called after it Sinus Caietanus. It possessed an excellent harbour (Cic. pro. Leg. Man. 12), and was said to have derived its name from Caieta, the nurse of Aeucas, who, according to some traditions, was buried at this place (Verg. Aen. vii. 1; Ov. Met. xiv. 441).

Cāius, the jurist. [CAIUS.]

Caius Caesar. [CALIGULA.]

Cālāber. [QUINTUS SMYRNAEUS.]

Calabria (Calabri), the peninsula in the SE. of Italy, extending from Tarentum to the Prom. Iapygium, formed part of APULIA.

Calacta (Καλή Ἀκτή: Καλακτίος: nr. Caronia), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, founded by Ducetius, a chief of the Sicels, about B.C. 447. Calacta was, as its name imports, originally the name of the coast. (Herod. vi. 22.)

Calactinus. [CAECILIUS CALACTINUS.]

Calagurris. 1. (Calagurritānus: Calahorra), a town of the Vascones and a Roman municipium in Hispania Tarraconensis near the Iberus, memorable for its adherence to Sertorius and for its siege by Pompey and his generals, B.C. 71. It was the birthplace of Quintilian. (Juv. xv. 93; Auson. de Prof. i. 7; Strab. p. 161; Val. Max. vii. 6).—2. A town of Aquitania (Cazères).

Cālāis, brother of Zetes. [ZETES.]

Cālāma. 1. (Gelma) a town in Numidia, between Cirta and Hippo Regius, on the E. bank of the Rubricatus (Seibous).—2. (Kalatal-Wad), a town in the W. of Mauretania Caesariensis, on the E. bank of the Malva, near its mouth.

Cālāmine, in Lydia, a lake with floating islands, sacred to the nymphs (Plin. ii. 209).

Calāmis (Κάλαμις), a famous sculptor of Athens about 470 B.C. He was the representative of the Ionic-Attic school in the first half of the 5th century, bringing to a high point of grace and delicacy the 'development from the stiff drapery and grimacing smile of the Ionic art to the graceful drapery and unconscious smile (σεμνὸν καὶ λεληθὸς μειδίαμα) noted by Lucian.' He was specially celebrated for his representation of female beauty, which still retained something of the austerity belonging to the more antique sculpture. Especially noticeable were the statues of Aphrodite on the Acropolis, and of the Sosandra (which some take to be the same statue). None of his work survives, but it is possible that the terracotta of Hermes Criophoros, now in the British Museum, is a copy from the statue by Calamis. He was famous also for repoussé work in silver. (Plin. xxxiv. 71; Cic. Brut. 18, 70; Lucian, Dial. Meretr. iii. 3; Paus. i. 23, 2; Dict. Antiq. art. Statuaria Ars.) Cālāmos (Κάλαμος: Kalmon), a town on the coast of Phoenicia, a little S. of Tripolis.

Calānos (Κάλανος), an Indian gymnosophist, followed Alexander the Great from India, and having been taken ill, burnt himself alive in the presence of the Macedonians, three months before the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), to whom he had predicted his approaching end (Strab. p. 715; Cic. Tusc. ii. 22, Div. i. 23).

Calasīriēs (Καλασίριες), one of the two divisions (the other being the Hermotybi) of the warrior-caste of Egypt. Their greatest strength was 250,000 men, and their chief abode in the W. part of the Delta. They formed the king's body guard.

Cālātia (Calatinus). 1. (Galazze), a town in Campania on the Appia Via between Capua and Beneventum, colonised by Julius Caesar with his veterans.—2. (Caiazzo), a town of Samnium, frequently confounded with No. 1.

Calatinus, A. Atilius, consul B.C. 258, in the first Punic war, carried on the war with success in Sicily. He was consul a second time, 254, when he took Panormus; and was dictator, 249, when he again carried on the war in Sicily, the first instance of a dictator commanding an army out of Italy. (Polyb. i. 24, 38; Liv. Ep. 19.)

Calaurēa-ia (Καλαύρεια, Καλαυρία: Καλαυρείτης: Poro), a small island in the Saronic gulf off the coast of Argolis and opposite Troezen, possessed a celebrated temple of Poseidon, which was regarded as an inviolable asylum. Hither Demosthenes fled to escape Antipater, and here he took poison, B.C. 322. This temple was originally the place of meeting of an Amphictyonia for the worship of Poseidon, in which Hermione, Epidaurus, Aegina, Athens, Orchomenus, Nauplia, and Prasiae joined. After the Dorian conquest Argos and Sparta took the places of Nauplia and Prasiae. (Strab. p. 374; Paus. ii. 33, 2; Plut. Dem. 29.)

Calāvīus, the name of a distinguished family at Capua, the most celebrated member of which was Pacuvius Calavius, who induced his fellow-citizens to espouse the cause of Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216. (Liv. xxiii. 2-9.)

Calbis (ὁ Κάλλβις), also Indus (Dalian), a considerable river of Caria, which rises in M. Cadmus, above Cibyra, and after receiving (according to Pliny, v. 103) sixty small rivers and 100 mountain torrents, falls into the sea W. of Caunus and opposite to Rhodes.

Calchas (Κάλχας), son of Thestor of Mycenae or Megara, the wisest soothsayer among the Greeks at Troy, foretold the length of the Trojan war, explained the cause of the pestilence which raged in the Greek army, and advised the Greeks to build the wooden horse. An oracle had declared that Calchas should die if he met with a soothsayer superior to himself; and this came to pass at Claros, near Colophon, for here Calchas met the soothsayer Mopsus, who predicted things which Calchas could not. Thereupon Calchas died of grief. After his death he had an oracle in Daunia. (Il. i. 68; ii. 300; Ov. Met. xii. 19.)

Caldus, C. Caelius. 1. Rose from obscurity by his oratory, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 107, when he proposed a lex tabellaria, and consul 94. In the civil war between Sulla and the party of Marius, he fought on the side of the latter, 83 (Cic. de Orat. i. 25).—2. Grandson of the preceding, was Cicero's quaestor in Cilicia, 50 (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 15).

Cale (Oporto), a port-town of the Callaeci in Hispania Tarraconensis at the mouth of the Durio. From Porto Cale the name of the country Portugal is supposed to have come.

Cāledōnia. [BRITANNIA.]

Calentum, a town probably of the Calenses Emanici in Hispania Baetica, celebrated for its manufacture of bricks so light as to swim upon water (Plin. xxxv. 171; Strab. p. 615; Vitruv. ii. 3).

Calenus, Q. Fufius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 61, when he succeeded in saving P. Clodius from condemnation for his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea (Cic. ad Att. i. 16). In 59 he was praetor, and from this time appears as an active partisan of Caesar. In 51 he was legate of Caesar in Gaul, and served under Caesar in the civil war (Caes. B. G. viii. 39). In 49 he joined Caesar at Brundisium and accompanied him to Spain, and in 48 he was sent by Caesar from Epirus to bring over the remainder of the troops from Italy, but most of his ships were taken by Bibulus. After the battle of Pharsalia (48) Calenus took many cities in Greece. In 47 he was made consul by Caesar. After Caesar's death (44) Calenus joined M. Antony, and subsequently had the command of Antony's legions in the N. of Italy. At the termination of the Perusian war (41) Calenus died, and Octavianus was thus enabled to obtain possession of his army. (Caes. B. C. i. 87, iii. 26, 55; Cic. Phil. viii. 4.)

Cales or -ex (Κάλης or -ης: Halabli), a river of Bithynia (Thuc. iv. 75).

Cāles (-is, usually Pl. Cales -ium: Calenus:

Calvi), chief town of Caleni, an Ausonian people in Campania, on the Via Latina, said to have been founded by Calais, son of Boreas, and therefore called Threicia by the poets. Calas was taken and colonised by the Romans, B.C. 335. It was celebrated for its excellent wine. (Strab. p. 237; Liv. viii. 16, xxii. 13; Tac. Ann. vi. 15; Hor. Od. i. 20, iv. 12; Juv. i. 69.)

Calètes or -i, a people in Belgic Gaul near the mouth of the Seine, whose name is preserved in Caux (Caes. B. G. ii. 4; Strab. p. 189); their capital was JULIOBONA.

Calëtor (Καλήτωρ), son of Clytius, slain at Troy by the Telamonian Ajax.

Calidius. 1. Q., tribune of the plebs B.C. 99, carried a law for the recall of Q. Metellus Numidicus from banishment. He was praetor 79, and had the government of one of the Spains, and on his return was accused by Q. Lollius, and condemned. (Cic. Planc. 28, Verr. i. 13, iii. 25.)—2. M., son of the preceding, distinguished as an orator. In 57 he was praetor, and supported the recall of Cicero from banishment. In 51 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, and on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Caesar, who placed him over Gallia Togata, where he died in 48. (Cic. Brut. 79, 274, ad Fam. viii. 4; Quint. x. 1, 23; Caes. B.C. i. 2.)

Caligūla, Roman emperor, A.D. 37-41, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A.D. 12, and was brought up among the legions in Germany. His real name was Gaius (Caius) Caesar, and he was always called Gaius by his contemporaries: Caligula was a surname given him by the soldiers from his wearing in his boyhood small caligae, or soldier's boots. Having escaped the fate of his mother and brother, he gained the favour of Tiberius, who raised him to offices of honour, and held out to him hopes of the succession. On the death of Tiberius (37), which was either caused or accelerated by him, he succeeded to the throne (Tac. Ann. vi. 45; Suet. Cal. 12, Tib. 73). He was saluted by the people with the greatest enthusiasm as the son of Germanicus. His first acts gave promise of a just and beneficent reign. He pardoned all the persons who had appeared as witnesses or accusers against his family; he laws. Towards foreign princes he behaved with great generosity. He restored Agrippa, the grandson of Herod, to his kingdom of Judaea, and Antiochus IV. to his kingdom of Commagene. But at the end of eight months the conduct of Caligula became suddenly changed. After a serious illness, which probably weakened his mental powers, he appears as a sanguinary and licentious madman. He put to death Tiberius, the grandson of his predecessor, compelled his grandmother Antonia and other members of his family to make away with themselves, often caused persons of both sexes and of all ages to be tortured to death for his amusement while taking his meals, and on one occasion, during the exhibition of the games in the Circus, he ordered a great number of the spectators to be seized, and to be thrown before the wild beasts. Such was his love of blood that he wished the Roman people had only one head, that he might cut it off with a blow. His obscenity was as great as his cruelty. He carried on an incestuous intercourse with his own sisters, and no Roman woman was safe from his attacks.

His marriages were disgracefully contracted and speedily dissolved; and the only woman who exercised a permanent influence over him was his last wife Caesonia. In his madness he considered himself a god; he even built a temple to himself as Jupiter Latiaris, and appointed priests to attend to his worship. He sometimes officiated as his own priest, making his horse Incitatus, which he afterwards raised to the consulship, his colleague. His monstrous extravagancies soon exhausted the coffers of the state. One instance may show the senseless way in which he spent his money. He constructed a bridge of boats between Baiae and Puteoli, a distance of about three miles, and after covering it with earth he built houses upon it. When it was finished, he gave a splendid banquet in the middle of the bridge, and concluded the entertainment by throwing numbers of the guests into the sea. To replenish the treasury he exhausted Italy and Rome by his extortions, and then marched into Gaul in 40, which he plundered in all directions. With his troops he advanced to the ocean, as if intending to cross over into Britain; he drew them up in battle array, and then gave them the signal—to collect shells, which he called the spoils of conquered Ocean. The Roman world at length grew tired of such a mad tyrant. Four months after his return to the city, on the 24th of January, 41, he was murdered by Cassius Chaerea, tribune of a praetorian cohort, Cornelius Sabinus, and others. His released all the state-prisoners of Tiberius; he restored to the magistrates full power of jurisdiction without appeal to his person, and promised the senate to govern according to the wife Caosonia and his daughter were likewise put to death. (Suet. Caligula; Tac. Ann. i. 41, vi. 20 ff; Dio Cass. lix.)

Calingae, a people of India, on the E. coast, below the mouths of the Ganges (Plin. vi. 64).

Calinipaxa, a city on the Ganges, N. of its confluence with the Jomanes (Jumna), said to have been the furthest point in India reached by Seleucus Nicator (Plin. vi. 63).

Callaici, Callaeci. [GALLAECI.]

Callatēbus (Καλλάτηβος), a city of Lydia between Colossae and Sardis, where the inhabitants made sugar out of wheat and the tamarisk (Hdt. vii. 31).

Callatis (Κάλλατις, Κάλατις; Καλατιανός; Mangalia), a town of Moesia, on the Black Sea, originally a colony of Milets, and afterwards of Heraclea (Strab. p. 319; Mel. ii. 2).

Calleva (Silchester), a town of Britain, 22 Roman miles from Venta Belgarum (Winchester). It is remarkable as the best preserved Roman town in the north of Europe.

Calliārus (Καλλιάρος), a town in Locris (Il. ii. 531; Strab. p. 426).

Callias and Hipponiēus (Καλλίας, Ἰππώνιος), a noble Athenian family, celebrated for their wealth. They enjoyed the hereditary dignity of torch-bearer at the Eleusinian mysteries, and claimed descent from Triptolemus.

1. Hipponicus, acquired a large fortune by fraudulently making use of the information he had received from Solon respecting the introduction of his σεισάχθεια, B.C. 594 (Plut. Sol. 15; cf. Arist. Ἄθ. πολ. 7).—2. Callias, son of Phaenippus, an opponent of Pisistratus, and a conqueror at the Olympic and Pythian games (Hdt. vi. 121).—3. Hipponicus, surnamed Ammon, son of No. 2.—4. Callias, son of No. 3, fought at the battle of Marathon, 490. He was afterwards ambassador from Athens to Artaxerxes, and according to some accounts negotiated a peace with Persia, 449, on terms most humiliating to the latter. On his return to Athens, he was accused of having taken bribes, and was condemned to a fine of 50 talents. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 428, § 311).—5. Hipponicus, son of No. 4, one of the Athenian generals in their incursion into the territory of Tanagra, 426, also commanded at the battle of Delium, 424, where he was killed (Thuc. iii. 91). It was his divorced wife, and not his widow, whom Pericles married. His daughter Hipparete was married to Alcibiades, with a dowry of 10 talents; another daughter was married to Theodorus, and became the mother of Isocrates the orator.—6. Callias, son of No. 5, by the lady who married Pericles, dissipated all his ancestral wealth on sophists, flatterers, and women. The scene of Xenophon's Banquet, and also that of Plato's Protagoras is laid at his house. He is said to have ultimately reduced himself to absolute beggary. In 400 he was engaged in the attempt to crush Andocides. In 392 he commanded the Athenian heavy-armed troops, when Iphicrates defeated the Spartans; and in 371 he was one of the envoys empowered to negotiate peace between Athens and Sparta, called 'the peace of Callias,' which was followed by the war between Sparta and Thebes (Xen. Hell. vi. 3, 4).

Callias. 1. A wealthy Athenian, who, on condition of marrying Cimon's sister, Elpinice, paid for him the fine of 50 talents which had been imposed on Miltiades. He appears to have been unconnected with the nobler family of Callias and Hipponicus.—2. Tyrant of Chalcis in Euboea, and the rival of Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria. He was defeated by the Athenians under Phocion, B.C. 350, and thereupon betook himself to the Macedonian court; but as he could not obtain aid from Philip, he formed an alliance with the Athenians, and by their means obtained the supremacy in the island. (Dem. de Cor. p. 252, § 101).—3. A poet of the Old Comedy, flourished B.C. 412; the names of 6 of his comedies are preserved (Fragments by Meineke).—4. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian, was a contemporary of Agathocles, and wrote a history of Sicily in 22 books, embracing the reign of Agathocles, B.C. 317–289. (Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.)

Callicrātes (Καλλικράτης). 1. An Achaean, exerted all his influence in favour of the Romans. On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, B.C. 168, Callicrates pointed out 1,000 Achaeans, as having favoured the cause of Perseus, who were taken to Rome; and among them was the historian Polybius. Callicrates died at Rhodes, 149.—2. One of the architects of the PARTHENON at Athens.

Callicratidas (Καλλικρατίδας), a Spartan, succeeded Lysander as admiral of the Lacedaemonian fleet, B.C. 406, took Methymna, and shut up Conon in Mytilene; but the Athenians sent out a fleet of 150 sail, and defeated Callicratidas off the Arginusae. Callicratidas fell in the battle. Callicratidas was a plain, blunt Spartan of the old school. Witness his answer, when asked what sort of men the Ionians were: 'Bad freemen, but excellent slaves.' (Xen. Hell. i. 6; Plut. Lys. 7.)

Callicula Mons, the ridge in Campania, which separates the plain called 'Ager Falernus' on the north of the Volturnus from the country about Allifae, and is continued in M. Tifata (Liv. xxii. 15, 16).

Callidromus or -um (Καλλιδρομος), part of the range of Mt. Oeta, near Thermopylae.

Callifae (Calvisi?), a town in Samnium, perhaps in the territory of Allifae (Liv. viii. 25).

Callimachus (Καλλίμαχος). 1. The Athenian polemarch, commanded the right wing at Marathon, where he was slain, after behaving with much gallantry, B.C. 490 (Hdt. vi. 109). This is the last recorded instance of the polemarch performing the military duties which his name implies. (Dict. Ant. s.v. Archon.)—2. A celebrated Alexandrine grammarian and poet, was a native of Cyrene in Africa, and a descendant of the Battiadae, whence he is sometimes called Battiades (Ov. Fast. ii. 367). He lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, and was chief librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, from about B.C. 260 until his death about 240. He compiled the Pivakes, which was a catalogue of the library in chronological order, with notes on the genuineness and contents of the books. Though, like all his prose work, this has perished, it formed a basis for later literary criticism. He founded a celebrated grammatical school at Alexandria, and among his pupils were Eratosthenes, Aristophanes of Byzantium, and Apollonius Rhodius. His enmity with his former pupil Apollonius Rhodius is related elsewhere. [APOLLONIUS, No. 6.] He is said to have written 800 works, in prose and in verse, on an infinite variety of subjects, but of these we possess only some of his poems, which are characterised rather by labour and learning than by real poetical genius. Hence Ovid (Am. i. 15, 14) says of Callimachus, Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet. He had great influence in spreading a love of science and learning, and left his impress on the Alexandrian school of poetry, which became learned and affected rather than spontaneous. The extant works of Callimachus are 6 Hymns in hexameter verse, 5 in the Ionic dialect, and 1, on the bath of Pallas, in the Doric dialect, and 72 Epigrams, which belong to the best specimens of this kind of poetry, and were incorporated in the Greek Anthology at an early time. We have only a few fragments of his elegies, which enjoyed great celebrity, and were imitated by the Roman poets, the most celebrated of whose imitations is the De Coma Berenices of Catullus. Of the lost poems of Callimachus the most important were, Αἴτια, Origins, in 4 books, on the origins of the various mythical stories, from which Ovid took the idea of his Fasti (the Ibis also was imitated from a poem of Callimachus attacking Apollonius), and an epic poem entitled Hecale, the name of an aged woman who received Theseus hospitably when he went out to fight against the Marathonian bull.—Editions. By Spanheim, Ultraj. 1697, re-edited by Ernesti, Lugd. Batav. 1761; by Blomfield, Lond. 1815; by Volzer, Lips. 1817; Meineke, 1861; Schneider, 1870.—3. A sculptor, probably of Athens, who lived about 420 B.C., and is said to have invented the Corinthian column. Among his works was the golden chandelier in the Erechtheum, with a bronze palm-tree above to draw off the smoke (Paus. i. 26, 7), and a statue of Hera at Plataea. He was so anxious to give his works the last touch of perfection that he lost the grand and sublime; whence Dionysius compares him to the orator Lysias, but in delicacy to Calamnis (Isocr. 3). Callimachus was never satisfied with himself, and therefore received the epithet κακιζόμενος, which Pliny interprets as calumniator sui (Plin. xxxiv. 92; Vitruv. iv. 1, 10).

Callimédon (Καλλίμεδων), surnamed ὁ Κάραβος, one of the orators at Athens in the Macedonian interest, and a friend of Phocion, condemned to death by the Athenians in his absence, B.C. 317 (Plut. Phoc. 27, 33; Dem. 27).

Callinicus Seleucus. [SELEUCUS.]

Callinus (Καλλίνος), of Ephesus, the earliest Greek elegiac poet, probably lived about B.C. 700. Only one of his elegies is extant, consisting of 21 vigorous lines, in which he exhorts his countrymen to courage. Printed in Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci.

Calliôpē. [MUSÆ.]

Calliôpē (Καλλιόπη), a considerable city in the W. of Parthia, founded, or else enlarged, by Seleucus Nicator (Appian. Syr. 57).

Calliphon (Καλλιφών), a Greek philosopher, and probably a disciple of Epicurus, is condemned by Cicero as making the chief good of man to consist in a union of virtue (honestas) and bodily pleasure (voluptas), (Cic. Fin. ii. 6, 11, v. 8, 25; Tusc. v. 30, 85; Off. iii. 33, 119).

Callipólis (Καλλιπόλις; Καλλιπολίτης). 1. (Gallipoli), a Greek town on a rocky peninsula on the Tarentine gulf in Calabria.—2. A town on the E. coast of Sicily not far from Aetna (Hdt. vii. 154; Strab. p. 272).—3. (Gallipoli), a town in the Thracian Chersonese opposite Lampsacus.—4. A town in Paonia between the Strymon and the Axios.—5. See CALLIUM.

Callipides (Καλλιπιδης), of Athens, a celebrated tragic actor, a contemporary of Alcibiades and Agesilaus.

Callippus (Κάλλιππος). 1. An Athenian, accompanied Dion to Syracuse. In B.C. 353 he murdered Dion, and usurped the government of Syracuse, but was expelled the city at the end of 13 months, and after wandering about Sicily with his mercenaries was at length put to death by his own friends.—2. An astronomer of Cyzicus, came to Athens, where he assisted Aristotle in rectifying and completing the discoveries of Eudoxus. Callippus invented the period or cycle of 76 years, estimated as = 27759 days, which more nearly approached correctness than the estimate of Meton. This was called after him the Callippic cycle, and commenced B.C. 330 (Diod. xii. 36).

Callirrhōē (Καλλιρρόη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus, wife of Chrysaor, and mother of Geryones and Echidna (Hes. Th. 981).—2. Daughter of Achelous and wife of Alcmaeon, induced her husband to procure her the peplus and necklace of Harmonia, by which she caused his death. [ALCMAEON].—3. Daughter of Scamander, wife of Tros, and mother of Ilus and Ganymedes.

Callirrhōē. [ATHENAE, p. 144 b.]

Callisthēnes (Καλλισθένης), of Olynthus, a relation and a pupil of Aristotle, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia. In his intercourse with Alexander he was arrogant and bold, and took every opportunity of exhibiting his independence. He expressed his indignation at Alexander's adoption of Oriental customs, and especially at the requirement of the ceremony of adoration. He thus rendered himself so obnoxious to the king, that he was accused of being privy to the plot of Hermolans to assassinate Alexander; and after being kept in chains for 7 months, was either put to death or died of disease (Curt. viii. 5; Arrian, iv. 14; Plut. Alex. 52; ALEXANDER). Callisthenes wrote an account of Alexander's expedition; a history of Greece, in 10 books, from the peace of Antalcidas to the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus (B.C. 387–357); and other works, all of which have perished, except fragments collected by Müller in Hist. Graec.

Callisto (Καλλιστώ), an Arcadian nymph, hence called Nonacrina virgo (Ov. Met. ii. 409) from Nonacris, a mountain in Arcadia, was daughter either of Lycaon or of Nycteus or of Ceteus, and a companion of Artemis in the chase. She was beloved by Zeus, who metamorphosed her into a she-bear that Hera might not become acquainted with the amour. But Hera learnt the truth, and caused Artemis to slay Callisto during the chase. Zeus placed Callisto among the stars under the name of Arctos, or the Bear. ARCAS was her son by Zeus. According to Ovid, Jupiter (Zeus) overcame the virtue of Callisto by assuming the form of Artemis; Juno (Hera) then metamorphosed Callisto into a bear; and when Arcas during the chase was on the point of killing his mother Jupiter placed both among the stars. (Apollod. iii. 8, 2; Paus. viii. 35, x. 31; Ov. Met. ii. 410; ARCTOS). In this story Artemis is interchanged with Callisto. There can be little doubt that originally Callisto was the bear-goddess who received a totemistic worship in Arcadia, and who was identified with Artemis, when the animal worship had left only survivals of names and rituals. Artemis having united the worship of Callisto with her own, Callisto became in legend the mere attendant of the goddess. [See ARTEMIS.]

Callistrátia (Καλλιστρατία), a town in Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Euxine.

Callistrátus (Καλλιστρατος). 1. An Athenian orator, son of Callicrates of Aphidna. His speech on the affair of Oropus, B.C. 366, is said to have excited the emulation of Demosthenes, and to have caused the latter to devote himself to oratory. After taking an active part in public affairs, generally in favour of Sparta, Callistratus was condemned to death by the Athenians in 361, and went into banishment to Methone in Macedonia. He ultimately returned to Athens, and was put to death. During his exile he is said to have founded the city of Datum, afterwards Philippi (Xen. Hell. vi. 2, 29; Lycurg. Leocr. 93).—2. A Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Aristophanes of Byzantium.—3. A Roman jurist, frequently cited in the Digest, wrote at least as late as the reign (A.D. 198–211) of Severus and Antoninus (i.e. Septimius Severus and Caracalla).

Callistus, C. Jūlius, a freedman of Caligula, possessed influence in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, and is the person to whom the physician Scribonius Largus dedicates his work.

Callium (Κάλλιον: Καλλιεύς), called Callipolis by Livy (xxxvi. 30), a town in Aetolia in the valley of the Spercheus, SW. of Hypata.

Callixenus (Καλλιξένος), the leader in the prosecution of the Athenian generals who had conquered at Arginusae, B.C. 406. Not long after the execution of the generals, the Athenians repented of their unjust sentence, and decreed the institution of criminal accusations against Callixenus, but he escaped from Athens. On the restoration of democracy, 403, Callixenus took advantage of the general amnesty, and returned to Athens, but no man would give him either water or light for his fire, and he perished miserably of hunger. (Xen. Hell. i. 7.)

Callon (Κάλλων). 1. A sculptor of Aegina, about 520 B.C., whose style is described as stiff and archaic (Quint. xii. 10; Paus. vii. 18, 6).—2. A sculptor of Elis, early in the 5th century B.C.; author of a Hermes and of a group of boy fluteplayers at Olympia (Paus. v. 25, 27).

Calor. 1. A river in Samnium, flows past Beneventum and falls into the Volturnus. Here Gracchus defeated Hanno B.C. 214 (Liv. xxiv. 14).—2. A river in Lucania, falls into the Silarus. These rivers keep their name Calore.

Calpē (Κάλπη: Gibraltar), a mountain in the S. of Spain on the Straits between the Atlantic and Mediterranean (Strab. p. 139). This and M. Abyla opposite to it on the African coast, were called the Columns of Hercules.

Calpe (Κάλπη: Kirpek), a river, promontory, and town on the coast of Bithynia (Strab. p. 543; Xen. Anab. vi. 4).

Calpurnia, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, consul B.C. 58, and last wife of the dictator Caesar, to whom she was married in 59. The reports respecting the conspiracy against Caesar's life filled Calpurnia with the liveliest apprehensions; she in vain entreated her husband not to leave home on the Ides of March, 44. [CAESAR.]

Calpurnia Gens, plebeian, pretended to be descended from Calpus, a son of Numa. It was divided into the families of BESTIA, BIBULUS, FLAMMA, and PISO.

T. Calpurnius Siculus, a poet of Nero's reign and imitator of Virgil. Of his writings we have 7 Eclogues and the Aetna (at one time attributed to Virgil). Four other Eclogues by a later writer (probably Nemesianus) have been attributed to Calpurnius. His versification is good and as an imitation (especially Ecl. ii.) not unsuccessful. In Ecl. i. and iv. he seems to praise Nero and to predict a wise rule.

Calva. [VENUS.]

Calventius, an Insubrian Gaul, of the town of Placentia, whose daughter married L. Piso, the father of L. Piso Caesoninus, consul B.C. 58. In his speech against the latter, Cicero upbraids him with the origin of his mother, calling him Caesoninus Semiplacentinus Calventius.

Calvīnus, Domitius. 1. Cn., curule aedile, B.C. 299, consul 283, and dictator and censor 280. In his consulship he, together with his colleague Dolabella, defeated the Gauls and Etruscans, and hence received the surname Maximus (Polyb. ii. 19).—2. Cn., tribune of the plebs, 59, when he supported Bibulus against Caesar, praetor 56, and consul 53, through the influence of Pompey. In the civil war he joined Caesar. In 49 he fought under Curio in Africa; and in 48 he fought under Caesar in Greece, and commanded the centre of Caesar's army at the battle of Pharsalia (Caes. B. C. ii. 42, iii. 78, 79). In 47 he had the command in Asia, and in 46 he fought in Africa against the Pompeian party. After Caesar's death (44) he fought under Octavian and Antony against the republicans. In 40 he was consul a second time, and in 39 went as proconsul to Spain.

Calvīnus, L. Sextius, consul B.C. 124, defeated the Salluvii and other people in Transalpine Gaul; in 123 founded the colony of Aquae Sextiae (Aix) (Liv. Ep. 61; Vell. Pat. i. 15).

Calvīnus, T. Veturius, twice consul, B.C. 334 and 321. In his second consulship he and his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus were defeated by the Sabines at Caudium. For details see ALBINUS, No. 3.

Calvisius Sabīnus. [SABINUS.]

Calvus, Licīnius. [LICINIUS.]

Calycadnus (Καλύκαδνος: Gök-su), a considerable river of Cilicia Tracheia, navigable as far up as Seleucia, where it is 180 feet wide. It rises in Isauria (Strab. p. 670). The promontory at its mouth is mentioned by Polybius (xxii. 26) and Livy (xxxviii. 38).

Calydnae (Καλύδναι νήσοι), a group of small islands off the coast of Troas, N. of Tenedos. The name Lagussae is also applied to the group, and Calydnae to the largest island, now Tauschan adalar, or 'hare island.'

Calydōn (Καλυδών: Καλυδώνιος: Kurtaga), an ancient town of Aetolia on the Evenus in the land of the Curetes, said to have been founded by Aetolus or his son Calydon. The surrounding country produced wine, oil, and corn. Homer calls it εραννή (Il. ix. 577, xiii. 217, xiv. 116; cf. Strab. pp. 450, 460). In the mountains in the neighbourhood took place the celebrated hunt of the Calydonian boar. [MELEAGER.] The inhabitants were removed by Augustus to NICOPOLIS.

Calymna (Κάλυμνα: Kalymnos), an island off the coast of Caria, between Leros and Cos, said to have been originally occupied by Carians and then colonised by Dorians under Heraclid leaders. In the Persian war it was subject to Artemisia (Hdt. vii. 99; Diod. v. 54; Ov. A. A. ii. 81).

Calymda (Κάλυνδα: Καλυνδεύς: Doloman), a city of Caria, E. of Caunus, and 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) from the sea. The Calyndians formed a part of the fleet of Xerxes: afterwards they were subject to the Caunians; and both cities were added by the Romans to the territory of Rhodes. (Hdt. viii. 87; Polyb. xxxi. 17; Strab. p. 561.)

Calyppo (Καλυψώ), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Nereus, or, according to Homer, of Atlas (Hes. Th. 359; Hom. Od. i. 50; Apollod. 1, 2; ATLAS), was a nymph inhabiting the island of Ogygia, on which Ulysses was shipwrecked. Calypso loved him, and promised him immortality if he would remain with her. Ulysses refused, and after she had detained him 7 years, the gods compelled her to allow him to continue his journey homewards. (Od. v. 28, vii. 259.)

Camarina (Καμάρινα: Καμαριναῖος: Camerina), a town on the S. coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the Hipparis, founded by Syracuse, B.C. 599. It attempted to throw off the yoke of Syracuse and was destroyed B.C. 552; recolonised in 495, and destroyed by Gelon ten years later; a third time colonised 461; suffered severely from the ravages of the Carthaginians Camarina in Sicily.

Obv., head of Heracles in lion's skin, and legend Καμαριναίων; rev., Athens in a chariot crowned by Victory.

under Himilco 405, and in the wars of Agathocles (Hdt. vii. 154; Thuc. vi. 5; Pind. Ol. v.; Diod. xiii. 108-114, xxiii. 1-9). In the 1st Punic war it was taken by the Romans, and most of the inhabitants sold as slaves (Polyb. i. 29; Strab. p. 272). Scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town remain. In the neighbourhood was a marsh, which the inhabitants drained contrary to the command of an oracle, and thus opened a way to their enemies to take the town: hence arose the proverb μη κλίει Καμαρίναν, νε μοεαει Καμαρινάμ (cf. Verg. Aen. iii. 700).

Cambodunum (Stact), a town in Britain between Eboracum (York) and Mancunium (Manchester).

Camboritum (prob. Cambridge or Granchester), a town in Britain on the road from Camulodunum (Colchester) to Lindum (Lincoln).

Cambūni Montes, the mountains which separate Macedonia and Thessaly.

Cambysēnē (Καμβουσηνή), a district of Armenia Major, on the borders of Iberia and Colchis.

Cambyses (Καμβύσης). 1. Father of Cyrus the Great.—2. Second king of Persia, succeeded his father Cyrus, and reigned B.C. 529-522. In 525 he conquered Egypt; but an army which he sent against the Anumouians perished in the sands, and the forces, which he led in person against the Aethiopians S. of Egypt, were compelled by failure of provisions to return. On his return to Memphis he treated the Egyptians with great cruelty; he insulted their religion, and slew their god Apis with his own hands. He also acted tyrannically towards his own family and the Persians in general. He caused his own brother Smerdis to be murdered; but a Magian personated the deceased prince, and set up a claim to the throne. [Smerdis.] Cambyses forthwith set out from Egypt against this pretender, but died in Syria, at a place named Ecbatana, of an accidental wound, 522. (Hdt. ii. 1, iii. 17, 30, 61.)

Cambyses (Καμβύσης: Iora), a river of Iberia and Albania (in the Caucasus) which, after uniting with the Alazon, falls into the Cyrus (Mel. iii. 5; Plin. vi. 15; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 3).

Camēnae, also called Casmenae, Carmenae. The name is connected with carmen, a 'prophesy.' The Camēnae were water nymphs at whose spring was an oracle, and they belonged to the religion of ancient Italy. Their sacred spring at Rome was near the Porta Capena, where, it was said, Numa had dedicated spring and grove (Liv. i. 21; Plut. Num. 18): the vicus Camenarum (C. I. L. vi. 975) was hence named. Yet their worship disappeared early, because in the 2nd century B.C. it was replaced by the Greek worship of the Muses, who were identified with them. Hence Juvenal (iii. 10) does not speak of it as an existing worship.

Camera, an ancient town of Latium, conquered by Tarquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 38, iii. 51; Dionys. v. 49).

Cāmērinum or Camarinum, more anciently Camers (Camertes: Camerino), a town in Umbria on the borders of Picenum, an ally of the Romans against the Etruscans, B.C. 308, also an ally of the Romans in the 2nd Punic war, appears as a place of importance in the war between Caesar and Pompey, subsequently a Roman colony (Liv. ix. 36, xxviii. 45; Caes. B. C. i. 15; Cic. ad Att. viii. 12).

Cāmērinus, the name of a patrician family of the Sulpicia gens, the members of which frequently held the consulship in the early times of the republic (B.C. 500, 490, 461, 393, 345; see Liv. ii. 19, iii. 10, 31, v. 8, vi. 5, 22, vii. 28). After B.C. 345 the Camerini disappear from history for 350 years, but they are mentioned again as one of the noblest Roman families in the early times of the empire. (Juv. vii. 90, viii. 38; Dio Cass. lxiii. 18.)

Camerinus, a Roman poet, contemporary with Ovid, wrote a poem on the capture of Troy by Hercules (Ov. Pont. iv. 16, 19), perhaps the Sulpicius Camerinus consul A.D. 9.

Camers, legendary founder of the old Latin town Amyclae: Virgil introduces him as an ally of Turnus (Verg. Aen. x. 562).

Cameses, a legendary Italian king, apparently brother of Janus. Part of Latium was once called Camesene after him (Plut. Q. R. 22).

Camicus (Καμικός: Καμίκιος), an ancient town of the Sicani, near AGRIGENTUM, to the NE. on the S. coast of Sicily on a river of the same name, said to have built by Daedalus for Cocalus the Sicilian king, who when Minos came in pursuit of Daedalus put him to death. To revenge the death of Minos the Cretans besieged Camicus in vain for 5 years. The story formed the plot of Sophocles's Καμίκιοι. (Hdt.

vii. 170; Diod. iv. 78; Ar. Pol. ii. 10; Strab. p. 273; Athen. pp. 86, 388.)

Cāmilla, daughter of king METABUS of the Volscian town of Privernum, was one of the swift-footed servants of Diana, accustomed to the chase and to war. She assisted Turnus against Aeneas, and after slaying numbers of the Trojans was at length killed by Aruns. (Verg. Aen. vii. 803, xi. 531-838.)

Cāmillus, Furius. 1. M., one of the great heroes of the Roman republic. He was censor B.C. 403, in which year Livy erroneously places his first consular tribunate. He was consular tribune for the first time in 401, and for the second time in 398. In 396 he was dictator, when he gained a glorious victory over the Faliscans and Fidenates, took Veii, and entered Rome in triumph, seated in a chariot drawn by white horses. In 394 he was consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. The story of the schoolmaster who attempted to betray the town of Falerii to Camillus, belongs to this campaign. In 391, Camillus was accused of having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii, and went voluntarily into exile at Ardea. Next year (390) the Gauls took Rome, and laid siege to Ardea. According to the mythical traditions (see below), the Romans in the Capitol recalled Camillus, having appointed him dictator in his absence. Camillus hastily collected an army, attacked the Gauls, and defeated them completely, having appeared on the scene just as the Romans were weighing out gold to their conquerors. [BRENNUS.] His fellow-citizens saluted him as the Second Romulus. In 389 Camillus was dictator a third time, and defeated the Volscians, Aequians, and other nations. In 386 he was consular tribune for the fourth, in 384 for the fifth, and in 381 for the sixth time. In 368 he was appointed dictator a fourth time to resist the rogations of C. Licinius Stolo. Next year, 367, he was dictator a fifth time, and though 80 years of age, he completely defeated the Gauls (Liv. v. 10-vi. 4; Plut. Camill.). He died of the pestilence, 365. These legends of Camillus are late inventions for the glorification of the house of the Furii, from whose archives they were adopted doubtless by Livy. We have the truer account in Polybius, that the Gauls on their own terms restored the town to the Romans, and retired unmolested with their gold and their plunder, having heard of an attack by the Veneti on their own country (Polyb. ii. 18).—2. Sp., son of No. 1, first praetor 367.—3. L., also son of No. 1, was dictator 350 in order to hold the comitia, and consul 349, when he defeated the Gauls (Liv. vii. 24).—4. L., son of No. 2, consul 338, when he took Tibur, and in conjunction with his colleague Maenius completed the subjugation of Latium, for which he was honoured with a triumph and an equestrian statue in the Forum. In 325 he was consul a second time. (Liv. viii. 16).—5. M., proconsul of Africa in the reign of Tiberius, defeated the Numidian Tacfarinas, A.D. 17 (Tac. Ann. ii. 52).—6. M., surnamed SCRIBONIANUS, consul A.D. 82, under Tiberius. At the beginning of the reign of Claudius he was legate of Dalmatia, where he revolted, but was conquered, 42, sent into exile, and died 53. (Tac. Ann. xii. 52.)

Camirus (Κάμειρος), on the W. coast of the island of Rhodes, founded by Camirus, son of Cercaphus and Cydippe, and the principal town in the island before the foundation of Rhodes.

It was the birthplace of the poet Pisander. (Il. ii. 656; Hdt. i. 144; Strab. p. 655.)

Camīsa (Κάμισσα), a fortress in Cappadocia, 23 ROMAN miles E. of Sebaste.

Camoenae. [CAMENAE.]

Campānia (Campanus: Terra di Lavoro), a district of Italy, the name of which is probably (like that of Capua) connected with campus 'a plain,' was bounded on the NW. by Latium, N. and E. by Sannium, SE. by Lucania, and S. and SW. by the Tyrrhenian sea. It was separated from Latium by the river Liris, and from Lucania at a later time by the river Silarus, though in the time of Augustus it did not extend further S. than the promontory of Minerva. In still earlier times the Ager Campanus included only the country round Capua. The country along the coast from the Liris to the Promontory of Minerva is a plain inclosed by the Apennines which sweeps round it in the form of a semicircle. Campania is a volcanic country, to which circumstance it was mainly indebted for its extraordinary fertility. It produced corn, wine, oil, and every kind of fruit in the greatest abundance, and in many parts crops could be gathered 3 times in the year. The fertility of the soil, the beauty of the scenery, and the softness of the climate, procured for Campania the epithet Felix, a name which it justly deserved (Strab. p. 242; Polyb. iii. 91; Cic. de Leg. Agr. i. 7). It was the favourite retreat in summer of the Roman nobles, whose villas studded a considerable part of its coast, especially in the neighbourhood of BAIAE. The principal river was the VULTURNUS: the minor rivers were the LIRIS, SAVO, CLANIUS, SEBETHUS, SARNUS, and SILARUS. The chief lakes were LUCRINUS, ACHERUSIA, AVERNUS, and LITERNA, most of them craters of extinct volcanoes.—The earliest inhabitants of the country were the AUSONES and OSCI or OPICI, whence the older Greek name for the country was Ὀπικὴ. They were subsequently conquered by the Etruscans, who became the masters of almost all the country, with a confederation of twelve cities, the chief of which was Capua or Voltturnum. In the time of the Romans we find 3 distinct peoples, besides the Greek population of CUMAE: 1. The Campani, properly so called, a mixed race, consisting of Etruscans and the original inhabitants of the country, dwelling along the coast from Sinuessa to Paestum. They were the ruling race: their history is given under CAPUA, their chief city. 2. SIDICINI, an Ausonian people, in the NW. of the country on the borders of Sannium. 3. PICENTINI in the SE. of the country.

Campê (Κάμπη), a monster which guarded the Cyclopes in Tartarus, was killed by Zeus when he wanted the assistance of the Cyclopes against the Titans.

Campi Lapidēi (πεδῖον λιθῶδες: la Crau), 'Plain of Stones' in the S. of Gaul, E. of the Rhone, near the Mediterranean, and on the road from Arles to Marseilles. These stones were probably deposited by the Rhone and the Druentia (Durance), when their course was different from what it is at present, and had formed a lake. This singular plain was known even to Aeschylus, who says that Zeus rained down these stones from heaven to assist Heracles in his fight with the Ligurians, after the hero had shot away all his arrows. A sweet herbage grows underneath and between the stones, and consequently in ancient as well as in modern times, flocks of sheep were pastured on this plain. (Strab. p. 182; Plin. ii. 34, xvi. 97.)

Campi Macri (Μακροὶ Κάμποι: Magreta), the 'Long Plains,' a tract of country between Parma and Modena, celebrated for the wool of its sheep (Colum. vii. 2, 3). There appears to have been a place of the same name, where annual meetings of the neighbouring people were held. (Strab. p. 216; Liv. xli. 18.)

Campi Raudii, a plain in the N. of Italy near Vercellae, where Marius and Catulus defeated the Cimbri, B.C. 101 (Plut. Mar. 26).

Campi Veteres, in Lucania, the scene of the death of Ti. Sempronius Gracchus B.C. 212 (Liv. xxv. 16). Some take its position to be marked by Vietri a little W. of Potenza.

Campus Martius. [ROMA.]

Camulodunum, or Camalodunum (Colchester), chief town of the Trinobantes in Britain, named from Camulus, the Celtic Mars. A Roman colony was established here in the reign of Claudius. It was sacked in the insurrection of Boudicca (Tac. Ann. xii. 32, xiv. 31); but afterwards became the civil capital of Roman Britain, while Eboracum was the military centre. Eventually, however, its importance diminished, as that of Eboracum increased.

Camūni (Καμουνοί), an Alpine tribe in the valley of the Ollius (Oglio) N. of L. Selinus (L. d' Iseo), now called Val Camonica (Strab. p. 206; Plin. iii. 134, 136).

Cānacē (Κανάκη), daughter of Aeolus and Enarete, had several children by Poseidon. She entertained an unnatural love for her brother, Macareus, and on this account was forced by her father to kill herself (Ov. Her. 11, Trist. ii. 384).

Cānāchus (Κάναχος). 1. A Sicyonian sculptor, belonged to the later archaic period about 520 B.C., and executed, among other works, a colossal statue of Apollo Phileus at Branchidae, which was carried to Ecbatana by Xerxes, 479. Cicero speaks of his works as 'rigidiora quam ut imitentur veritatem' (Brut. 18, 70; Paus. ii. 10, 4, ix. 10, 2).—2. Probably grandson of the former, from whom he is not distinguished by the ancients. He and Patrocles cast the statues of 2 Spartans, who had fought at Aegostrotamos, B.C. 405. (Paus. x. 9, 4.)

Canastrom or Canastreaum (Καναστρον, Καναστραίον, sc. ἀκρατήριον, ἡ Καναστραλή ἄκρη: C. Paliuri), the S.E. extremity of the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia.

Candacē (Κανδάκη), a queen of the Aethiopians of Meröë, invaded Egypt B.C. 22, but was driven back and defeated by Petronius, the Roman governor of Egypt. Her name seems to have been common to queens of Aethiopia. (Strab. p. 820; Plin. vi. 186.)

Candaules (Κανδαύλης), also called Myrsilus, last Heraclid king of Lydia. His wife compelled Gyges to put her husband to death, because he had exhibited to Gyges her unveiled charms. Gyges then married the queen and mounted the throne, B.C. 716. (Hdt. i. 8.)

Candāvia, Candāvii Montes, the mountains separating Illyricum from Macedonia, across which the Via Egnatia ran (Strab. p. 323; Caes. B. C. iii. 79).

Candidum Pr. (Ras-el-Abiad, Cap Bianco), N.W. of Hippo Zaritus on the N. coast of Zeugitana, in Africa, forms the W. headland of the Sinus Hipponensis (Mel. i. 7, 2).

Cane or Canae (Κάνη: Karadagh), a promontory and town in Aeolis between Atarneus and Pitane, opposite the S. extremity of Lesbos. (Strab. pp. 581, 584, 615; Hdt. vii. 42; Liv. xxxvi. 45.)

Canens, a nymph wedded to Picus. When Circe in jealousy changed Picus to a bird [PICUS], Canens after a vain search for her husband sank in the Tiber, whence her song was heard floating in the air. (Ov. Mct. xiv. 320.)

Canicūla. [CANIS.]

Canīdia, whose real name was Gratidia, was a Neapolitan courtesan beloved by Horace; but when she deserted him, he revenged himself by holding her up to contempt as an old sorceress (Epod. 5, 17, Sat. i. 8).

Canidius Crassus, P. [CRASSUS.]

Caninius Gallus. [GALLUS.]

Caninius Rebilus. [REBILUS.]

Cānis (Κών), the constellation of the Great Dog. The most important star in this constellation was specially named Canis or Canicula, and also Sirius. About B.C. 400 the heliacal rising of Sirius at Athens, corresponding with the entrance of the sun into the sign Leo, marked the hottest season of the year, and this observation being taken on trust by the Romans, without considering whether it suited their age and country, the Dies Canicularis became proverbial among them, as the Dog Days are among ourselves.—The constellation of the Little Dog was called Procyon (Προκύων), literally translated Ante canem, Antecanis, because in Greece this constellation rises heliacally before the Great Dog. When Boötes was regarded as Icarus [ARCTOS], Procyon became Maera, the dog of Icarus.

Cannae (Cannensis: Cannæ), a village in Apulia, N.E. of Canusium, situated in an extensive plain E. of the Aufidus and N. of the small river Vergellus, memorable for the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal, B.C. 216 (Liv. xxii. 46; Polyb. iii. 113; Appian, Hann. 20).

Cannefates. [ΒΑΤΑΥΙ.]

Canōbus or Canōpus (Κάνωβος or Κάνωπος) according to Grecian story, the helmsman of Menelaus, who on his return from Troy died in Egypt, and was buried on the site of Canobus, which derived its name from him (Strab. p. 801).

Cānōbus or Canōpus (Κάνωβος, Κάνωπος: Κανωβίτης: Ru. W. of Aboukir), an important city on the coast of Lower Egypt, near the W.-most mouth of the Nile, which was hence called the Canopic Mouth (τὸ Κανωβικὸν στόμα). It was 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) E. of Alexandria, and was (at least at one time) the capital of the Nomos Menelaïtes. It had a great temple of Serapis, and a considerable commerce; and its inhabitants were proverbial for their luxury (Κανωβισμός). After the establishment of Christianity, the city rapidly declined. (Hdt. ii. 15, 97, 113; Strab. pp. 666, 800; Aesch. Suppl. 112; Verg. Georg. iv. 287.)

Canoniūm, in Britain, 8 miles from Camulodunum (Colchester) on the road to Venta Icenorum (Norwich): probably about Kelvedon.

Cantābri, a people in the N. of Spain. The Romans originally gave this name to all the people on the N. coast of Spain; but when they became better acquainted with the country, the name was restricted to the people bounded on the E. by the Astures and on the W. by the Autrigones. The Cantabri were a fierce and warlike people, and were only subdued by Augustus after a struggle of several years (B.C. 25–19). (Strab. pp. 155, 164; Dio Cass. liii. 25, liv. 20; Hor. Od. ii. 6, iii. 8.)

Canthārus (Κάνθαρος), a sculptor of Sicyon, about B.C. 268 (Plin. xxxiv. 85).

Canthus (Κάνθος), an Argonaut, son of Canethus or of Abas of Euboea, was slain in Libya by Cephalion or Caphaurus.

Cantium (Cantii: Kent), a district of Britain, nearly the same as the modern Kent, but included LONDINIUM.

Canulēus, C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 445, proposed the law, establishing conubium, or the right of intermarriage, between the patricians and plebs. He also proposed that the people should have the right of choosing the consuls from either the patricians or the plebs; but this proposal was not carried, and it was resolved instead, that military tribunes, with consular power, should be elected from either order in place of the consuls. [Dict. Ant. s.v. Lex Canulcia.]

Canūsium (Canusinus: Canosa), a town in Apulia, on the Aufidus, and on the high road from Rome to Brundisium, founded, according to tradition, by Diomede (Strab. p. 284), whence the surrounding country was called Campus Diomedis. It was at all events a Greek colony, and both Greek and Oscan were spoken there in the time of Horace. (Canusini more bilinguis, Hor. Sat. i. 10, 30.) Canusium was a town of considerable importance, but suffered greatly, like most of the other towns in the S. of Italy, during the second Punic war. Here the remains of the Roman army took refuge after their defeat at Cannae, B.C. 216. It was celebrated for its mules and its woollen manufactures, but it had a deficient supply of water. (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 91.) There are still ruins of the ancient town near Canosa.

Canūtius, or Cannūtius. 1. P., a distinguished orator, frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius.—2. Ti., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 44, a violent opponent of Antony, and, after the establishment of the triumvirate, of Octavian also. He was taken prisoner at the capture of Perusia, and was put to death 40.

Capāneus (Καπαεύς), son of Hipponous and Astynome or Laodice, and father of Sthenelus, was one of the seven heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes. He was struck by Zeus with lightning, as he was scaling the walls of Thebes, because he had dared to defy the god. While his body was burning, his wife Evadne leaped into the flames and destroyed herself.

Capella, the star. [CAPRA.]

Capella, an elegiac poet of whom nothing remains; contemporary of Ovid (Pont. iv. 16, 36).

Capella, Martianus Mineus Felix, a native of Carthage, probably flourished towards the close of the fifth century of our era. He is the author of a work in nine books, composed in a medley of prose and various kinds of verse, after the fashion of the Satyra Menippea of Varro. It is a sort of encyclopaedia, and was much esteemed in the middle ages. The first two books, which are an introduction to the rest, consist of an allegory, entitled the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury, while in the remaining seven are expounded the principles of the seven liberal arts, Grammar, Dialectics, Rhetoric, Geometry, Arithmetic, Astronomy, and Music, including Poetry.—Editions. By Hugo Grotius, Lugd. Bat. 1599; by Kopp, Franf. 1836; Eysenhardt, Lips. 1886.

Capēna (Capenas, -atis: Civitulola, an uninhabited hill), an ancient Etruscan town founded by and dependent on Veii, submitted to the Romans B.C. 395, the year after the conquest of Veii, and subsequently became a Roman municipium (Liv. v. 8-24). In its territory was the celebrated grove and temple of Feronia on the small river Capenas. [FERONIA.]

Capēna Porta. [ROMA.]

Caper, Flavius, a Roman grammarian of uncertain date, whose works are quoted repeatedly by Priscian, and of whom we have two short treatises extant; printed by Putschius, Grammat. Latin. pp. 2239-2248, Hanov. 1605.

Capētus Silvius. [SILVIUS.]

Caphāreus (Καφάρεις: Capo d' Oro), a rocky and dangerous promontory on the SE. of Euboea, where the Greek fleet was wrecked on its return from Troy (Hdt. viii. 7; Strab. p. 368; Eur. Troad. 90; Verg. Aen. xi. 260; Ov. Met. xiv. 472, 481).

Caphyae (Καφύαι), a town in Arcadia, NW. of Orchomenus (Strab. p. 608; Paus. viii. 23).

Capito, C. Atēus. 1. Tribune of the plebs B.C. 55; opposed the triumvirs Pompeius and Crassus as regards their levies of troops and disposition of provinces (Plut. Crass. 19; Dio Cass. xxxix. 33; Cie. ad Att. iv. 13).—2. Son of No. 1, an eminent Roman jurist, was appointed Curator aquarum publicarum in A.D. 13, and held this office till his death, 22. He gained the favour of both Augustus and Tiberius by flattery and obsequiousness. (Suet. Gramm. 22; Dio Cass. lvii. 17; Tac. Ann. iii. 75.) He wrote numerous legal works, which are cited in the Digest and elsewhere. Capito and his contemporary Labeo were reckoned the highest legal authorities of their day, and were the founders of two legal schools, to which most of the great jurists belonged. The schools took their respective names from distinguished disciples of those jurists. The followers of Capito were called from MASURIUS SABINUS, Sabiniani; and afterwards from CASSIUS LONGINUS, Cassiani. The followers of Labeo took from Proculus the name Proculiani. [LABEO.]

Capito, C. Fontēus, a friend of M. Antony, accompanied Maecenas to Brundisium, B.C. 37, when the latter was sent to effect a reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 32). Capito remained with Antony, and went with him to the East.

Capitolinus, Jūlius, one of the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, lived in the reign of Diocletian (A.D. 284-305). The Lives of Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, Verus, Pertinax, Clodius Albinus, the two Maximians, three Gordians, Maximus and Balbinus, are attributed to him.

Capitolinus, Manlius. [MANLIUS.]

Capitolinus Mons. [ROMA.]

Capitolinus, Petillius, was, according to the Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 4, 94), entrusted with the care of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol (whence he was called Capitulinus), and was accused of having stolen the crown of Jupiter, but was acquitted by the judges in consequence of his being a friend of Augustus. The surname Capitulinus appears, however, to have been a regular family-name of the gens. The story, therefore, is doubtful, and it remains uncertain for what speculation he was tried.

Capitolinus, Quintius. [QUINTIUS.]

Capitolium. [ROMA.]

Cappādōcia (Καππαδοκία: Καππάδοξ, Cappadox), a district of Asia Minor, to which different boundaries were assigned at different times. Under the Persian empire it included the whole country inhabited by a people of mixed origin, the old Cimmerian stock being combined with a large immigration of Assyrian colonists, whence the inhabitants were called (from their complexion) White Syrians (Λευκόσσυροι), as well as Cappadoces, which appears to have been a word of Persian origin. Their country seems to have embraced the whole NE. part of Asia Minor E. of the Halys and N. of the Taurus. Under the later Persian kings the country was divided into two satrapies, which were named respectively from their proximity to the Euxine and to the Taurus, the N. part being called Cappadocia ad Pontum and then simply PONTUS, the S. part Cappadocia ad Taurum, and then simply Cappadocia: the former was also called Cappadocia Minor and the latter Cappadocia Major. In the time of Strabo Amisus (Samsun) was, as now, the seaport for Cappadocia; but in earlier times Sinope was the port for this district and for merchandise from Central Asia. The change seems to have come about the second century B.C. Under the Persian Empire, the whole country was governed by a line of hereditary satraps, who traced their descent from Anaphas, an Achaemenid, one of the seven chieftains that slew the pseudo-Smerdis, and who soon raised themselves to the position of tributary kings. After a temporary suspension of their power during the wars between the successors of Alexander, when Ariarathes I. was defeated and slain by Perdiccas (B. C. 322), the kings of S. Cappadocia (respecting the other part see PONTUS) recovered their independence under Ariarathes II., whose history and that of his successors will be found under ARIARATHES and ARIOBARZANES. In A. D. 17, Archelaüs, the last king, died at Rome, and Tiberius made Cappadocia a Roman province, governed by a procurator till the reign of Vespasian (Dio Cass. lvii. 17; Tac. Ann. xii. 45; C. I. L. ii. p. 1970.) Soon afterwards the districts of Cataonia and Melitene, which had before belonged to Cilicia, were added to Cappadocia, and the province then comprised the ten praefecturae (στρατηγίαι) of Melitene, Cataonia, Cilicia, Tyanitis, Garsauritis, Laviniasene, Sargarausene, Sararauene, Chamanene, and Morimene (Strab. p. 534). The W. frontier of the Roman province was formed by Lake Tatta and a line passing S. to the Taurus, so as just to include Cybistra: the Taurus formed the southern and the Euphrates the eastern boundary; on the NW. it just included Parnassus and Zama: the northerly frontier seems to have varied, extending at one time nearly as far as Sebastopolis and Zela, but in Strabo's time falling south of Sibora. Vespasian in A. D. 70 placed the province of Cappadocia under a consular legatus (Suet. Vesp. 8). About A. D. 78 it was united with the province Galatia; but Trajan reverted to the original division, and added Pontus Galaticus and Pemoniacus to Cappadocia. In the fourth century the province was divided into Cappadocia Prima and Secunda, and Justinian again divided Cappadocia Secunda into two parts, making Mocissus, which he named Justinianopolis, the capital of Cappadocia Tertia. Cappadocia was a rough and generally sterile mountain region; bordered by the chains of the PARYADRES on the N., the SCYDISSES on the E., and the TAURUS on the S., and intersected by that of the ANTI-TAURUS, on the side of whose central mountain, ARGAEUS, stood the capital Mazaca, aft. CAESAREA AD ARGAEUM. Its chief rivers were the HALYS and the MELAS. Its fine pastures supported good horses and mules.

Cappadox (Καππάδοξ: Delidjeirmak), a tributary of the Halys, rising in M. Lithrus, in the chain of Paryadres, and forming the NW. boundary of Cappadocia, on the side of Galatia.

Capra, or Capella (Αἴξ), the brightest star in the constellation of the Auriga, or Charioteer, is sometimes called Olenia Capella, because it rested on the shoulder (ἐπὶ τῆς ὐλένης) of the Auriga. This star was said to have been originally the nymph or goat who nursed the infant Zeus in Crete. [AMALTHEA.] Its heliacal rising took place soon before the winter solstice, and thus it was termed signum pluviale.

Capraria. 1. (Capraja), a small island off the coast of Etruria between Populonia and the N. extremity of Corsica, inhabited only by wild goats, whence its name: called by the Greeks Αἴγιλον.—2. (Cabrera), a small island off the S. of the Balearis Major (Majorca), dangerous to ships.—3. See AEGATES.—4. See FORTUNATAE INSULAE.

Caprasia, a town of Bruttium, 28 miles from Consentia: probably the modern Tarsia.

Caprae (Capri), a small island, 9 miles in circumference, off Campania, at the S. entrance of the gulf of Puteoli, and 2½ miles from the promontory of Minerva, from which the island had been separated by an earthquake. It is composed of calcareous rocks, which rise to two summits, the highest of which is between 1600 and 1700 feet above the sea. The scenery is beautiful, and the climate soft and genial. According to tradition, it was originally inhabited by the Teleboae, but afterwards belonged to the inhabitants of Neapolis, from whom Augustus either purchased it or obtained it in exchange for the island Pithecusa. Here Tiberius lived the last ten years of his reign, indulging in secret debauchery, and accessible only to his creatures. He erected many magnificent buildings on the island, the chief of which was the Villa Jovis, and the ruins of which are still to be seen. (Tac. Ann. iv. 67; Suet. Aug. 92, Tib. 40–65.)

Capria (Καπρία), a large salt lake in Pamphylia, between Perge and Aspendus.

Capricornus (Αιγόκερως), the Goat, a sign of the Zodiac, between the Archer and the Waterman, fought with Jupiter against the Titans.

Caprus (Κάπρος). 1. (Little Zab), a river of Assyria, rising in Mt. Zagros, and flowing SW. into the Tigris, opposite to Caenae (Strab. p. 733).—2. A little river of Phrygia, rising at the foot of M. Cadmus, and flowing N. into the Lycus.

Capsa (Capsetanus: Ghafsah), a strong city in the SW. of Byzacena in N. Africa, in a fertile oasis, surrounded by a sandy desert abounding in serpents. Its foundation was ascribed by tradition to the Libyan Hercules. In the war with Jugurtha it was destroyed by Marius; but it was afterwards rebuilt and made a colony (Strab. p. 831; Sall. Jug. 89).

Capua (Capuanus, Capuensis, but more commonly Campanus: Capua), originally called Vulturnum, the chief city of Campania after the fall of CUMAE, is said to have derived its name from Capys. Capua was either founded or colonised by the Etruscans, according to some 50 years before the foundation of Rome, and it became at an early period the most prosperous, wealthy, and luxurious city in the S. of Italy (Liv. iv. 37; Strab. p. 242; Vell. Pat. i. 7). In B.C. 420 it was conquered by the warlike Samnites; and the population, which had always been of a mixed nature, now consisted of Ausonians, Oscans, Etruscans, and Samnites. At a later time Capua, again attacked by the Samnites, placed itself under the protection of Rome, 343. It revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, 216, but was taken by the Romans in 211, was fearfully punished, and never recovered its former prosperity. It was now governed by a praefectus, who was sent annually to the city from Rome. It received a Roman colony by the lex agraria of Julius Caesar, 59, and under Nero a colony of veterans was settled there (Suet. Jul. 20; Tac. Ann. xiii.

31). It was subsequently destroyed by the barbarians who invaded Italy. The modern town of Capua is built about 3 miles from the ancient one, the site of which is indicated by the ruins of an amphitheatre.

Caput Vada Prom. [BRACHODES.]

Căpys (Kărys). 1. Son of Assaracus and Hieronemone, and father of Anchises.—2. A companion of Aeneas, from whom Capua was said to have been named (Verg. Aen. x. 145).

Căpys Silvius. [SILVIUS.]

Capŷtium or Capŷtium (Capizzi), called by Cicero (Verr. iii. 43) Capitina Civitas, a town in Sicily near Mt. Aetna (Ptol. iii. 4, 12).

Car (Kăp), son of Phoroneus, and king of Megara, from whom the acropolis of this town was called Caria.

Căracalla, emperor of Rome, A.D. 211–217, was son of Septimius Severus and his 2nd wife Julia Domna, and was born at Lyons, A.D. 188 (Herodian, iv. 1; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 2). He was originally called Bassianus after his maternal grandfather, but afterwards M. Aurelius Antoninus, which became his legal name, and appears on medals and inscriptions. Caracalla was a nickname derived from a long tunic worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favourite dress after he became emperor (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 3). In 198 Caracalla, when 10 years old, was declared Augustus, and in the same year accompanied his father, Severus, in the expedition against the Parthians. He returned with Severus to Rome in 202, and married Plautilla, daughter of Plautiausus, the praetorian praefect. In 208 he went with Severus to Britain; and on the death of the latter at York, 211, Caracalla and his brother Geta succeeded to the throne, according to their father's arrangements. Caracalla obtained the sole government by the murder of his brother, 212 (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 2; Herodian, iv. 8; Vita Carac. 6). The assassination of Geta was followed by the execution of many of the most distinguished men of the state, whom Caracalla suspected of favouring his brother's cause: the celebrated jurist Papinian was one of his victims. His cruelties and extravagancies knew no bounds; and after exhausting Italy by his extortions, he resolved to visit the different provinces of the empire, which became the scenes of fresh atrocities. In 214 he visited Gaul, Germany, Dacia, and Thrace; and, in consequence of a campaign against the Alemanni, he assumed the surname Alemannicus. In 215 he went to Syria and Egypt; his sojourn at Alexandria was marked by a general slaughter of the inhabitants, in order to avenge certain sarcastic pleasantries in which they had indulged against himself and his mother. In 216 he crossed the Euphrates, laid waste Mesopotamia, and returned to Edessa, where he wintered. Next year he again took the field, intending to cross the Tigris, but was murdered near Edessa by Macrinus, the praetorian praefect. Caracalla gave to all free inhabitants of the empire the name and privileges of Roman citizens. (Vita Sever.; Vita Carac.; Dio Cass. lxxvii.; Herodian, iv.)

Carălis or Carăles (Caralitānus: Cagliari), the chief town of Sardinia, with an excellent harbour, situated on the Sinus Caralitanus and on a promontory of the same name (Capo S. Elia). It was founded by the Carthaginians; under the Romans it was the residence of the praetor, and at a later period enjoyed the Roman franchise. (Paus. x. 17, 9; Liv. xxx. 39; Caes. B. C. i. 30; Strab. p. 224.)

Cărambis (Καράμβις ἄκρα: Kerempe), a promontory, with a city of the same name, on the coast of Paphlagonia, almost exactly opposite the Kriu Meteoron or S. promontory of the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea) (Strab. p. 545).

Carănus (Κάρανος). 1. Of Argos, a descendant of Heracles, and a brother of Phidon, is said to have settled at Edessa in Macedonia with an Argive colony about B.C. 750, and to have become the founder of the dynasty of Macedonian kings.—2. Son of Philip and half-brother of Alexander the Great.—3. A general of Alexander the Great.

Caratacus, or Caractăcus, king of the Silures in Britain, defended his country against the Romans, in the reign of Claudius. He was at length defeated by the Romans, and fled to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him to the Romans, who carried him to Rome, A.D. 51. When brought before Claudius, he addressed the emperor in so noble a manner that he pardoned him and his friends. (Tac. Ann. xii. 33; Hist. iii. 45.)

Carausius, born among the Menapii in Gaul, was entrusted by Maximian with the command of the fleet which was to protect the coasts of Gaul against the ravages of the Franks. But Maximian, having become dissatisfied with the conduct of Carausius in this command, and suspecting that he aimed at independent rule, gave orders for his execution. Carausius forthwith crossed over to Britain, where he assumed the title of Augustus, A.D. 287. After several ineffectual attempts to subdue him, Diocletian and Maximian acknowledged him as their colleague in the empire, and he continued to reign in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his chief officer, Allectus. (Eutrop. ix. 20–25; Aurel. Caes. 39.)

Carbo, Papirius. 1. C., a distinguished orator, and a man of great talents, but of no principle. He commenced public life as one of the 3 commissioners or triumvirs for carrying into effect the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus. His tribuneship of the plebs, B.C. 131, was characterised by the most vehement opposition to the aristocracy; and he was thought even to have murdered Scipio Africanus, the champion of the aristocratic party, 129. But after the death of C. Gracchus (121), he suddenly deserted the popular party, and in his consulship (120) actually undertook the defeuce of Opimius, who had murdered C. Gracchus. In 119 Carbo was accused by L. Licinius Crassus, who brought a charge against him, and as he foresaw his condemnation, he put an end to his life. Valerius Maximus is probably mistaken in saying that he went into exile. (Liv. Ep. 59, 61; Appian, B. C. 1, 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. de Or. ii. 25, ad Fam. ix. 21; Val. Max. iii. 7, 6.)—2. Cn., consul 113, was defeated by the Cimbri near Noreia, and being afterwards accused by M. Antonius, he put an end to his own life (Liv. Ep. 63).—3. C., with the surname Arvina, son of No. 1, was a supporter of the aristocracy. In his tribuneship (90), Carbo and his colleague, M. Plautius Silvanus, carried a law (Lex Papiria Plautia), giving the Roman franchise to the citizens of the federate towns. Carbo was murdered in 82, by the praetor Brutus Damasippus, at the command of the younger Marius. (Vell. Pat. ii. 26.) [BRUTUS, No. 10.]—4. Cn., son of No. 2, was one of the leaders of the Marian party. He was thrice consul—namely, in 85, 84, and 82. In 82 he carried on war against Sulla and his generals, but was at length obliged to abandon Italy: he fled to Sicily, where he was taken prisoner, and put to death by Pompey at Lilybaeum. (Plut. Pomp. 5; Appian, B. C. i, 67–96.)

Carcāso (Carcassone), a town of the Tectosages in Gallia Narbonensis, on the river Atax (Aude). P. Crassus drew troops from it in his Aquitanian campaign of b.c. 56 (Caes. B. G. iii. 20; Carcasum, Plin. iii. 36; Ptol. ii. 10).

Carcāthiōcerta (Καρκαθιόκερτα: Kartpurt or Diarbekr), the capital of the district of Sophene in Armenia Major (Strab. p. 527).

Carēinus (Καρκίνος). 1. A comic poet and a contemporary of Aristophanes (Nub. 1263, Pax, 794).—2. A tragic poet of Agrigentum, contemporary of Sophocles and father of Xenocles, who defeated Euripides in b.c. 415.—3. Son of Xenocles and grandson of No. 2, wrote tragedies, which are characterised as sententious, and careless in versification (Ar. Poët. 16, 17).

Cardāmylē (Καρδαμύλη: Καρδαμυλίτης). 1. A town in Messenia, one of the 7 towns promised by Agamemnon to Achilles (Il. ix. 150, 292). It stood on a rock 1 mile from the sea and 7 from Leuctra; by Augustus it was transferred from Messenia to Laconia (Strab. p. 360; Paus. iii. 26, 7). Ruins are seen NE. of the modern Skardamula.—2. An island near or perhaps a town in Chios.

Cardēa, a Roman divinity protecting the hinges of doors (cardo), was a nymph beloved by Janus. Ovid (Fast. vi. 101, seq.) confounds this goddess with CARNA.

Cardia (Καρδία: Καρδιανός: Bakla-burun), a town on the W. side of the Thracian Chersonese on the gulf of Melas, founded by Miletus and Clazomenae, and subsequently colonised by the Athenians under Miltiades (Hdt. vii. 58, ix. 115). It was destroyed by Lysimachus, who built the town of LYSIMACHIA in its immediate neighbourhood. Cardia was the birthplace of Eumenes and of the historian Hieronymus. (Paus. i. 9, 10; Strab. p. 331; Nep. Eum. 1.)

Cardiūchi (Καρδοῦχοι), a powerful and warlike people in the SE. of Great Armenia, on the NE. margin of the Tigris valley, probably the same as the Γορδωνάιοι and Γορδωνοί of the late geographers and the Kurds of modern times. They dwelt in the mountains which divided Assyria on the NE. from Armenia (Mts. of Kurdistan), and were never thoroughly subdued. (Strab. pp. 523, 734, 747; Xen. Anab. iv. 1; Diod. xiv. 27.)

Carēsus (Κάρησος), a town of the Troad, on a river of the same name: destroyed before the time of Strabo (Il. xii. 20; Strab. p. 602).

Cāria (Καρία: Kāp), a district of Asia Minor, in its SW. corner, bounded on the N. and NE. by the mountains Messogis and Cadmus, which divided it from Lydia and Phrygia, and adjacent to Phrygia and Lycia on the E. and SE. It is intersected by low mountain chains running out far into the sea in long promontories, the N.-most of which was called Mycale, ending in the point Trogillum (opposite to Samos), the next Posidium (on which stood Miletus and Branchidae), the next is the long tongue of land terminated by the two headlands of Zephyrium and Termerium (with Halicarnassus on its S. side), next the Cnidian Chersonesus, terminated by the cape Triopium and the city of Cnidus, then the Rhodian Chersonesus, the S. point of which was called Cynossema, opposite to Rhodes, and, lastly, Pedalium or Artemisium, forming the W. headland of the bay of Glaucus. The chief gulfs formed by these promontories were the Maeandrian, between Trogillum and Posidium; the Iassian, between Posidium and Zephyrium; and the Sinus Ceramicus, between Termerium and Triopium. The valleys between these mountain chains were well watered and fertile. The chief river was the Maeander, between the chains of Messogis and Latmus, to the S. of which the country was watered by its tributaries, the Marsyas, Harpasus, and Mosynus, besides some streams flowing W. and S. into the sea, the most considerable of which was the Calbis. (See the articles.) The chief products of the country were corn, wine, oil, and figs; for the last of which Caunus, on the S. coast, was very famous. An extensive commerce was carried on by the Greek colonies on the coast.—Even before the great colonisation of the coasts of Asia Minor, Dorian settlements existed on the Triopian and Cnidian promontories, and this part of Caria, with the adjacent islands, received at that time other Dorian colonies, and obtained the name of DORIS; while to the N. of the Iassian Gulf, the coast was occupied by Ionian colonies, and thus formed the S. part of IONIA. The inhabitants of the rest of the country were Carians (Kāpes), a race probably of Semitic origin, which appears, in the earliest times of which we know anything, to have occupied the greater part of the W. coast of Asia Minor and several islands of the Aegaeon, with Mylasa as their chief town, in conjunction with the Leleges, from whom the Carians are not easily distinguishable. [See under LELEGES.] The Carians, Lydians, and Mysians were connected by their common worship of Zeus Carios at Mylasa (Hdt. i. 171): the Carians had also a common sanctuary of Zeus Stratius at Labranda (Strab. p. 659; Hdt. v. 119). Their language was reckoned by the Greeks as a barbarian tongue (i.e. unintelligible), though it early received an intermixture of Greek (Il. ii. 865; cf. Strab. p. 661). The people were warlike and were employed as mercenaries, e.g. by Egyptian kings (Hdt. ii. 163, iii. 11). The Greeks are said to have borrowed from the Carians the fashions of handles for shields and devices on the shields, and of plumed helmets (Hdt. i. 171).—The country was governed by a race of native princes, who fixed their abode at Halicarnassus after its exclusion from the Dorian confederacy. [HALICARNASSUS.] These princes were subject allies of Lydia and Persia, and some of them rose to great distinction in war and peace. [See ARTEMISIA, MAUSOLUS, and ADA.] After the Macodonian conquest, the S. portion of the country became subject to Rhodes [RHODUS], and the N. part to the kings of PERGAMUS. Under the Romans, Caria formed a part of the province of ASIA. [See these articles.]

Carinae. [ROMA.]

Carinus, M. Aurelius, the elder of the 2 sons of Carus, was associated with his father in the government, A.D. 283, and remained in the W., while his father and brother Numerianus proceeded to the E. to carry on war against the Persians. On the death of his father, in the course of the same year, Carinus and Numerianus succeeded to the empire. In 284 Numerianus was slain, and Carinus marched into Moesia to oppose Diocletian, who had been proclaimed emperor. A decisive battle was fought near Margum, in which Carinus gained the victory, but, in the moment of triumph, he was slain by some of his own officers, 285. Carinus was one of the most profligate and cruel of the Roman emperors. (Vopisc. Carin.; Eutrop. ix. 18-20; Aurel. Caes. 39; Oros. vii. 25.)

Carmana (Κάρμανα: Kerman), the capital of Carmania Propria, 3° long. E. of Persepolis.

Carmania (Καρμανία: Kirman), a province of the ancient Persian empire, bounded on the W. by Persis, on the N. by Parthia, on the E. by Gedrosia, and on the S. by the Indian Ocean. It was divided into 2 parts, C. Propria and C. Deserta, the former of which was well watered by several small streams, and abounded in corn, wine, and cattle. The country also yielded gold, silver, copper, salt, and cinnabar. The people were akin to the Persians (Strab. p. 726; Arrian, Anab. vi. 28, Ind. 37).

Carmanor (Καρμάνωρ), a Cretan, purified Apollo and Artemis, after slaying the Python.

Carmelus, and -um (Κάρμηλος: Jebel-Elyas), a range of mountains in Palestine, branching off, on the N. border of Samaria, from the central chain (which extends S. and N. between the Jordan and the Mediterranean), and running N. and NW. through the SW. part of Galilee, till it terminates in the promontory of the same name (Cape Carmel), the height of which is 1200 feet above the Mediterranean (Strab. p. 758). Here was an oracle consulted by Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 5; cf. Tac. Hist. ii. 78).

Carmenta, Carmentis, according to the prevalent tradition, was an Arcadian nymph, mother of Evander, Hermes being the father. She accompanied her son in his migration to Italy 60 years before the Trojan war. She was famed for her prophetic power, and an altar was erected to her at the Porta Carmentalis (Verg. Aen. viii. 333; Ov. Fast. i. 461; Liv. i. 7; Dionys. i. 38; Plut. Q. R. 56). At her festival on January 11th two sister 'Carmentes,' known as Porrima or Prosa and Postverta, were worshipped with hor, as deities of child-birth: their names seem to imply her attributes as an oracular goddess who could declare alike the past events and the future. One peculiar feature of her ritual was the prohibition against bringing leather into her sanctuary (Ov. Fast. i. 629). She is said to have had a 2nd temple and 2nd festival on January 15th in accordance with the vow of Roman matrons when they secured their right of going in carriages. There is mention also of a flamen Carmentalis (Macrob. Sat. i. 16, 6; Plut. Rom. 21; Ov. Fast. 617; Cic. Brut. 59; Gell. xvi. 6, 4). Carmenta, whose name is no doubt connected with carmen, seems originally to have been an Italian deity of streams, of oracles and of help in child-birth, with whom tradition connected other legends making her the mother of the Arcadian Evander, or in other accounts giving as her original names Νικοστράτη and Θέμις, (Plut. Q. R. 56).

Carna, a Roman divinity, who was regarded as the protector of the physical well-being of man: at her festival on June 1st, offerings of the most nutritious food, especially of beans, were made and part was eaten by the worshippers: hence the name 'Kalendae fabariae' for the 1st of June. Her temple on the Caelian hill was founded by M. Junius Brutus in the first year of the republic (Macrob. Sat. i. 12, 31; C. I. L. i. p. 394; Tertull. ad Nat. ii. 9). Ovid confounds this goddess with CARDEA.

Carneades (Καρνεάδης), a celebrated philosopher, born at Cyrene about B.C. 213, was the founder of the Third or New Academy at Athens. In 155 he was sent to Rome, with Diogenes and Critolaus, by the Athenians, to deprecate the fine of 500 talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. At Rome he attracted great notice, and it was here that he first delivered his famous orations on Justice. The 1st oration was in commendation of the virtue, and the next day the 2nd answered all the arguments of the 1st, and showed that justice was not a virtue, but a matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. Thereupon Cato moved the senate to send the philosopher home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demoralising doctrines. Carneades died in 129, at the age of 85. He was a strenuous opponent of the Stoics, and brought Academic scepticism to its extreme point, maintaining that neither our senses nor our understanding supply us with a sure criterion of truth (Cic. de Or. ii. 37, 155, Tusc. iv. 3, 5; Gell. vi. 14; Diog. Laërt. iv. 62).

Carnæus (Καρνεῖος), a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped by the Dorians, is derived by some from Carnus, a son of Zeus and Leto, and by others from Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer. The latter was murdered by HIPPOTES, and it was to propitiate Apollo that the Dorians introduced his worship under the surname of Carneus. The festival of the Carnæa, in honour of Apollo, was one of the great national festivals of the Spartans. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.). [APOLLO.]

Carni, a Celtic people, dwelling N. of the Veneti in the Alpes Carnicae. [ALPES.]

Carnuntum (Καρνούδος, -ούντος: ruins between Deutsch-Altenburg and Petronell), an ancient Celtic town in Upper Pannonia on the Danube, E. of Vindobona (Vienna), and subsequently a Roman municipium or a colony. It was one of the chief fortresses of the Romans on the Danube, and was the residence of the emperor M. Aurelius during his wars with the Marcomanni and Quadi (Eutrop. viii. 18). It was the station of the Roman fleet on the Danube and the regular quarters of the 14th legion. It was destroyed by the Germans in the 4th century (Ammian. xxx. 5), but was rebuilt and was finally destroyed by the Hungarians in the middle ages.

Carnus. [CARNEUS.]

Carnātes or -i, a powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis between the Liger and Sequana; their capital was GENABUM.

Carpasia (Καρπασία: Karpassi), a town in the SE. of Cyprus (Strab. p. 682; Diod. xx. 48).

Carpātes, also called Alpes Bastarnicae (Carpathian Mountains), the mountains running through Dacia, a continuation of the Hercynia Silva. Strictly this name seems to have belonged to that part of the range, next to the Hercynia S., in which the Vistula has its source, and the part actually in Dacia should be termed only Alpes Bastarnicae (Ptol. iii. 5, 6-20).

Carpāthus (Κάρπαθος: Karpathos, or Scarpanto), an island between Crete and Rhodes, in the sea named after it; a Dorian country under the rule of Rhodes (Strab. p. 488; Diod. v. 24); chief towns, Posidium and Nisyros.

Carpētāni, a powerful people in Hispania Tarraconensis, with a fertile territory on the rivers Anas and Tagus, in the modern Castille and Estremadura: their capital was TOLETUM.

Carpi or Carpiāni, a German people between the Carpathian mountains and the Danube.

Carrae or Carrhae (Κάρραι: Haran or Charrau, SS.: Harran), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, not far from Edessa, where Crassus was defeated by the Parthians, B.C. 53 (Strab. p. 747; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 5, xl. 25).

Carrinas or Carinas. 1. C., one of the commanders of the Marian party, fought B.C. 83 against Pompey, and in 82 against Sulla and his generals. After the battle at the Colline gate at Rome, in which the Marian army was defeated, Carrinas took to flight, but was seized, and put to death (Entrop. v. 8; Appian, B. C. v. 92).—2. C., son of No. 1, sent by Caesar, in 45, into Spain against Sext. Pompeius. In 43 he was consul, and afterwards served as a general of Octavian against Sext. Pompeius in Sicily, in 36, and as proconsul in Gaul in 31 (Appian, B. C. v. 96-112; Dio Cass. li. 22).—3. Secundus, a rhetorician, expelled by Caligula from Rome, because he had declaimed against tyrants in his school (Tac. Ann. xiii. 10, xv. 45).

Carsēōli (Carseolānus: ruins at Civita, near Carsoli), a town of the Aequi in Latium, colonised by the Romans at an early period (Liv. x. 3, 13; Strab. p. 238; Ov. Fast. iv. 683).

Carsulāe (Carsulānus: Monte Castrilli), a town in Umbria, was originally of considerable importance, but afterwards declined (Strab. p. 227; Tac. Ann. iii. 60).

Carteia (also called Carthaea, Carpia, Carpesus: remains near Algeciras), more anciently Tartessus, a celebrated town and harbour in the S. of Spain, at the head of the gulf of which M. Calpe forms one side, founded by the Phoenicians, and colonised B.C. 171 by 4000 Roman soldiers, whose mothers were Spanish women (Liv. xliii. 3; cf. C. I. L. ii. p. 152). Some have thought that Calpe is the same as Carteia: it is more probable that there was a town of Calpe on the site of Gibraltar and that Carteia was distinct from it. (Strab. pp. 141, 145, 151; Mela, ii. 6, 8; Plin. iii. 17; Appian, Iber. 3).

Cartenna or Cartinna (Tennex), a colony on the coast of Mauretania Caesariensis, founded by Augustus (Plin. v. 20; Ptol. iv. 2, 4).

Carthaea (Καρθαία: Poles, Ru.), a town on the S. side of the island of Ceos.

Carthāgo, Magna Carthago (Καρθηδών: Karthydonos, Carthaginiensis, Poenus: Ru. near El-Marsa, NE. of Tunis), one of the most celebrated cities of the ancient world, stood in the recess of a large bay (Sinus Carthaginiensis) enclosed by the headlands Apollinis and Mercurii (C. Farina and C. Bon), in the middle and N.-most part of the N. coast of Africa, in lat. about 36° 55' N., and long. about 10° 20' E. The Tyrian colony of Carthage was founded, according to tradition, about 100 years before the building of Rome—that is, about B.C. 853.—but of its date it would not be safe to assert more than it was a later Phoenician settlement than Utica, of which it may have been first a dependency. The mythical account of its foundation is given under Dido. The part of the city first built was called, in the Phoenician language, Betzura or Bosra, i.e. a castle, which was corrupted by the Greeks into Byrsa, (Βύρσα), i.e. a hide, and hence probably arose the story of the way in which the natives were cheated out of the ground. As the city grew, the Byrsa formed the citadel. The coast of this part of Africa has been much altered by the deposits of the river Bagradas and the sand which is driven seawards by the NW. winds. Hence it must be understood that the identification of ancient sites at Carthage cannot be regarded as ascertained. In ancient times Carthage stood upon a peninsula surrounded by the sea on all sides except the W.; but now the whole space between the N. side of this peninsula and the S. side of the Apollinis Pr. (C. Farina) is filled up and converted into a marsh; Utica, which was on the sea-shore, being left some miles inland; and the course of the Bagradas itself being turned considerably N. of its original channel, so that, instead of flowing about half-way between Utica and Carthage, it now runs close to the ruins of Utica, and falls into the sea just under C. Farina. The NE. and SE. sides of the peninsula are still open to the sea, which has indeed rather encroached here, for ruins are found under water. The S. side of the peninsula was formed by an enclosed bay, the Lake or Bay of Tunis, connected with the sea only by a narrow opening (now called the Goletta, or, in Arabic, Haket-et-Wad, i.e. Throat of the River), which was once much deeper than it is now. The circuit of the old peninsula may be estimated at about 25 miles, and this space was occupied by the city itself, its gardens, suburbs, and cemeteries: the width of the isthmus is 3 miles. The N. and E. points of the peninsula are two headlands, Cape Ghammart and Cape Carthage: the space between them seems to have been occupied by suburbs and cemeteries: to the south of a line between the promontories came the city proper as well as part of the suburb Megara, and in the south portion of the city proper was the citadel, Byrsa itself. South again of the citadel were the two defensible harbours, of which we have an accurate description (taken no doubt from an older writer, possibly from Polybius) in Appian (Pun. 96). The outer harbour had an entrance from the sea 70 feet wide, closed by chains: this was used for merchantmen. The inner harbour, which communicated only with the outer, was for ships of war, and all round it, as well as round the island in the middle of it, were docks for 220 ships, with two Ionic columns in front of each dock, having the effect of colonnades: on the island were quarters for the admiral. There seems no adequate ground for doubting that the name Cothon (κώθων) was given to the inner harbour. Strabo (p. 832) refers it especially to the island in the inner harbour; but in its origin it was probably meant to signify the cup-shaped harbour dug out with the island left in the middle. According to Festus the name was sometimes given to harbours on the sea coast which had been 'artificially withdrawn inland,' i.e. hollowed out of the land (cf. 'portus effodiunt,' Verg. Aen. i. 427). It is generally considered that two pools on the shore S. of the citadel mark these two harbours: this is by no means impossible, but cannot be regarded as certain; it has recently been disputed (see Classical Review, v. 280). They were probably larger at one time than they are now. These two harbours were in times of peace supplemented to any extent for the great commerce of Carthage by the Lake of Tunis (see above). The Roman city, which was built after the destruction of the original Carthage, lay to the S. of it. The fortifications of the city consisted of a single wall on the side towards the sea, where the steep shore formed a natural defence, and a triple wall of great height, with battlements and towers, cutting off the peninsula from the mainland. On this side were barracks for 40,000 soldiers, and stables for 300 elephants and 4000 horses. The suburb called Megara—probably a corruption of Magal, which Virgil (Aen. i. 421, iv. 259) has Latinised into Magalia—also called Neapolis, containing many beautiful gardens and villas, lay to the N. of the city proper. The aqueduct which brought water to the city is still traceable to a great distance inland. The most remarkable buildings mentioned within the city were the temple of the god Esmun, whom the Greeks and Romans identified with Asclepius, and that of Apollo (Baal-Moloch or the Sun) in the market-place. The population of Carthage, at the time of the 3rd Punic war, is stated at 700,000 (Strab. p. 832; Appian, Pun. 95, 119; Polyb. i. 73; Liv. Ep. 51; Diod. xxxii.).—The constitution of Carthage was a municipal oligarchy, somewhat resembling that of Venice. The government was, by the original constitution, in the hands of the

Gerusia, or council of Ancients, formed of 28 members chosen (as it seems, annually) by the citizens: at their head were two chief magistrates, also elected annually, who were called 'kings' by Greek and Roman writers, but had little real power, and acted chiefly as supreme judges: their title Suffetes or Shofetes is the same as the Hebrew Shophetim, the 'Judges' in our translation of the Bible. A general in chief was appointed by the Gerusia and had a practical dictatorship during a campaign, but was called to account at the end of his office. The real power, however, at Carthage was in the hands of the council of 'The Hundred' (in number 104), who were called 'Judges,' and were an oligarchic institution of the aristocratic party about b.c. 450, originally intended to check the power of the Suffetes and any attempt at tyranny. As they held office for life, and could punish, even with death, the suffetes, gerusiasts, or generals at the expiration of their office, they became practically supreme, and their approval of measures was generally sought beforehand. This council of 'The Hundred' was first formed when the power of the house of Mago excited suspicion; and its efficacy was shown in the defeat of the attempts made by Hanno (b.c. 340) and Hamilcar (b.c. 306) to seize the supreme power. Its members were elected by the pentarchies, which appear to have been committees of five, who held office for life, and filled up vacancies in their number by co-option. Originally the general assembly of citizens decided on matters about which the gerusia and the suffetes disagreed; but when the power fell really into the hands of the Hundred, it is probable that the general assembly had no functions beyond the duty of electing the suffetes and the gerusiasts.—The general tone of social morality at Carthage appears to have been high, at least during its earlier history: there was a censorship of public morals, under the care of the gerusia; and all the magistrates were required, during their term of office, to abstain from wine: the magistrates were also unpaid. Their punishments were very severe, and the usual mode of inflicting death was by crucifixion.—The religion of Carthage was that of the mother country: Baal-Moloch, the Sun and Fire God, was appeased with cruel human sacrifices by fire, especially in time of reverses: the tutelary deity of Carthage was Melcarth ('the king of the city'), whom the Greeks called the Phœnician Heracles: they worshipped also Tanith or Astarte [see APHRODITE], and Esmun or Asclepius.—The chief occupations of the people were commerce and agriculture: in the former they rivalled the mother city, Tyre; and the latter they pursued with such success that the country around the city was one of the best cultivated districts in the ancient world, and a great work on agriculture, in 28 books, was composed by Mago, a suffete.—The revenues of the state were derived from the subject provinces; and its army was composed of mercenaries from the neighbouring country, among whom the Numidian cavalry were especially distinguished. It was in this mercenary army and the aversion of the citizens to military service, devoted as they were to commerce and wealth, that the eventual weakness of Carthage was found.—Of the History of Carthage a brief sketch will suffice; as the most important portions of it are related in the ordinary histories of Rome. The first colonists preserved the character of peaceful traders, and maintained friendly relations with the natives of the country, to whom they long continued to pay a rent or tribute for the ground on which the city was built. Gradually, however, as their commerce brought them power and wealth, they were enabled to reduce the natives of the district round the city, first to the condition of allies, and then to that of tributaries. Meanwhile they undertook military expeditions at sea, and possessed themselves, first of the small islands near their own coast, and afterwards of Malta, and the Lipari and Balearic islands; they also sent aid to Tyre, when it was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 600), and took part in wars between the Etruscans and the Phœcean colonies. On the coast of Africa they founded numerous colonies, from the Pillars of Hercules to the bottom of the Great Syrtis, where they met the Greek colonists of Cyrenaica: the people of these colonies became intermixed with the Libyans around them, forming a population who are called Libyo-Phœnicians. In connexion with their commercial enterprises, they no doubt sent forth various expeditions of maritime discovery; among which we have mention of two, which were undertaken during the long peace which followed the war with Gelon in B.C. 480, to explore the W. coasts of Europe and Africa respectively. The record of the latter expedition, under Hanno, is still preserved to us in a Greek translation [HANNO], from which we learn that it reached probably as far S. as 10° N. lat., if not further. The relations of the Carthaginians with the interior of N. Africa appear to have been very extensive, but the country actually subject to them, and which formed the true Carthaginian territory, was limited to the district contained between the river Tusca (Zain) on the W. and the lake and river Triton, at the bottom of the Lesser Syrtis, on the S., corresponding very nearly to the modern regency of Tunis; and even within this territory there were some ancient Phœnician colonies, which, though in alliance with Carthage, preserved their independent municipal government, such as Hippo Zaritus, Utica, Hadrumetum, and Leptis.—The first great development of the power of Carthage for foreign conquest was made by Mago (about B.C. 550–500), who is said to have first established a sound discipline in the armies of the republic, and to have freed the city from the tribute which it still paid to the Libyans. His sons, Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, reduced a part of the island of Sardinia, where the Carthaginians founded the colonies of Caralis and Sulci; and by this time the fame of Carthage had spread so far, that Darius is said to have sent to ask her aid against the Greeks, which, however, was refused. The Carthaginians, however, took advantage of the Persian war to attempt the conquest of Sicily, whither Hamilcar was sent with a great force, in B.C. 480, but his army was destroyed and himself killed in a great battle under the walls of Himera, in which the Sicilian Greeks were commanded by Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse, and which was said to have been fought on the same day as the battle of Salamis. It was, in fact, a concerted part of the great struggle between Grecian and Asiatic powers for the mastery of Southern Europe, to be fought out in the west, while the other attack was made from the east. It is impossible to overrate the importance of this and of other attempts of Carthage against Sicily and later against Italy. Their next attempt upon Sicily, in B.C. 410, led to a protracted war, which resulted in a treaty between the Syracusans, under Timoleon, and the Carthaginians, by which the latter were confirmed in the possession of the W. part of the island, as far as the river Halicus. From B.C. 310–307 there was another war between Syracuse and the Carthaginians, which was chiefly remarkable for the bold step taken by Agathocles, who invaded the Carthaginian territory in Africa, and thus, though unable to maintain himself there, set an example which was followed a century later by Scipio, with fatal results to Carthage. Passing over the wars with PYRRHUS and HERO, we come to the long struggle between Rome and Carthage, known as the Punic Wars, which are fully related in the Histories of Rome. [See also HAMILCAR.] The first lasted from B.C. 265–242, and resulted in the loss to Carthage of Sicily and the Lipari islands. It was followed by a fierce contest of some years between Carthage and her disbanded mercenaries, which is called the Libyan War, and which was terminated by Hamilcar Barca. After a hollow peace, during which the Romans openly violated the last treaty, and the Carthaginians conquered Spain as far as the Iberus (Ébro), the Second Punic War, the decisive contest between the two rival states, which were too powerful to co-exist, began with the siege of Saguntum (B.C. 218) and terminated (B.C. 201) with a peace by which Carthage was stripped of all her power. [HAN-NIBAL; SCIPIO.] Her destruction was now only a question of time, and, though she scrupulously observed the terms of the last peace for 50 years, in spite of every provocation from the Romans and their ally Masinissa, the king of Numidia, a pretext was at length found for a new war (B.C. 149), which lasted only 3 years, during which the Carthaginians, driven to despair by the terms proposed to them, sustained a siege so destructive that, out of 700,000 persons, who were living in the city at its commencement, only 50,000 surrendered to the Romans. The city was razed to the ground, and remained in ruins for 80 years. At the end of that time a colony was established on the old site by the Gracchi (Plut. C. Gracch. 8–14; Appian Pun. 136), which remained in a feeble condition till the times of Julius and Augustus, under whom a new city was built S. of the former, on the SE. side of the peninsula, with the name of Colonia Carthago. It soon grew so much as to cover a great part (if not the whole) of the site of the ancient Tyrian city: it became the first city of Africa, and occupied an important place in ecclesiastical as well as in civil history. It was taken by the Vandals in A.D. 439, retaken by Belisarius in A.D. 533, and destroyed by the Arab conquerors in A.D. 698.—Respecting the territory of Carthage under the Romans, see AFRICA, No. 2.

Carthāgo Nōva (Καρχηδὼν ἡ νέα: Carthagena), a town on the E. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal, B.C. 243, and subsequently conquered and colonised by the Romans, from which time its full name was Colonia Victrix Julia Nova Carthago. It is situated on a promontory running out into the sea, and possesses one of the finest harbours in the world: at the entrance of the harbour was a small island called Scombraria, from the great number of scombri or mackerel caught here, from which such famous pickle was made. In ancient times Carthago Nova was one of the most important cities in all Spain; its population was numerous, its trade flourishing, and its temples and other public buildings handsome and imposing. It was, together with Tarraco, the residence of the Roman governor of the province. In the time of Strabo it was still flourishing, but was almost destroyed by the Goths. Isidore, who was a native, speaks of its desolation, A.D. 595 (Orig. xv. 1). In the neighbourhood were silver mines; and the country produced a quantity of Spartum or broom, whence the town bore the surname Spartaria, and the country was called Campus Spartarius. (Strab. p. 158; Polyb. ii. 13; Liv. xxvi. 42; Plin. iii. 19.)

Carūra (τὰ Καρούρα: Sarikivi), a Phrygian city, in Caria, on the Maeander, celebrated for its hot springs (Strab. pp. 578, 663).

Cārus, M. Aurēlius, Roman emperor A.D. 282–283, probably born at Narbo in Gaul, was praefectus praetorio under Probus, and on the murder of the latter was elected emperor. After defeating the Sarmatians, Carus invaded the Persian dominions, took Selencia and Ctesiphon, and was preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris, when he was, according to some accounts, struck dead by lightning, towards the close of 283. Others infer that he was murdered by Aper. He was succeeded by his sons CARINUS and NUMERIANUS. Carus was a victorious general and able ruler. (Vopisc. Car. 5–8, Prob. 22; Oros. vii. 24.)

Carūsa (ἡ Καρούσα: Kerzeh), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, S. of Sinope (Plin. vi. 7).

Carventum, a town of the Volsci, to which the Carventana Arx mentioned by Livy belonged, a town of the Volsci between Signia and the sources of the Trerus (Liv. iv. 53, 55).

Carvilius Maximus. 1. Sp., twice consul, B.C. 293 and 273, both times with L. Papirius Cursor. In their first consulship they gained brilliant victories over the Samnites, and in their second they brought the Samnite war to a close (Liv. x. 9, 33, 46, Ep. 14).—2. Sp., son of the preceding, twice consul, 234, when he conquered the Sardinians and Corsicans, and 228, was alive at the battle of Cannae, 216, after which he proposed to fill up the vacancies in the senate from the Latins. This Carvilius was the first person at Rome who divorced his wife. (Liv. xxvi. 23; Dionys. ii. 25.)

Carŷae (Καρυαί: Karyāris, fem. Karyātis), a town in Laconia near the borders of Arcadia, originally belonged to the territory of Tegea in Arcadia. It revolted from Sparta in B.C. 371 after the battle of Leuctra, and was punished by Archidamus, who took the town and slaughtered the citizens (Xen. Hell. vi. 5, 24, vii. 1, 28). It possessed a temple of Artemis Caryatis, and an annual festival in honour of this goddess was celebrated here by the Lacedaemonian maidens (Paus. iii. 10, 9, iv. 16, 9). Respecting the female figures in architecture called Caryatides, see Dict. of Ant. s.v.

Caryanda (τὰ Καρύανδα: Karyandēus: Karakoyan), a city of Caria, on a little island, once probably united with the mainland, at the NW. extremity of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It once belonged to the Ionian League; and it was the birthplace of the geographer Scylax. (Strab. p. 658.)

Caryātis. [CARYAE.]

Carystius (Καρίστιος), a Greek grammarian of Pergamus, lived about B.C. 120, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

Carystus (Κάρυστος: Karŷstios: Karyst or Castel Rosso), a town on the S. coast of Euboea, at the foot of Mount Oche, founded by Dryopes; called, according to tradition, after Carystus, son of Chiron. Datis and Artaphernes landed here in 490. In the neighbourhood was excellent marble (Cipolino), which was exported in large quantities; and the mineral called Asbestos was also found here. (Il. ii. 539; Thuc. vii. 57; Hdt. vi. 99; Strab. p. 446.)

Casca, P. Servilius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 44, was one of the conspirators against Caesar, and aimed the first stroke at his assassination. He fought in the battle of Philippi (42), and died shortly afterwards.—C. Casca, the brother of the preceding, was also one of the conspirators against Caesar.

Cascellius, A., an eminent Roman jurist, contemporary with Caesar and Cicero, was a man of stern republican principles, and spoke freely against the proscriptions of the triumvirs. (Hor. A. P. 371; Plin. viii. 144.)

Casilinum (Casilinas, -ātis: Capua nuova), a town in Campania on the Vulturinus, and on the same site as the modern Capua, celebrated for its heroic defence against Hannibal B.C. 216. It received Roman colonists by the Lex Julia, but had greatly declined in the time of Pliny. (Liv. xxii. 15, xxiii. 17; Strab. p. 237.)

Casinum (Casinas, -ātis: S. Germano or Casino), a town in Latium on the river Casinus, and on the Via Latina near the borders of Campania; colonised by the Romans in the Samnite wars; subsequently a municipium; its citadel containing a temple of Apollo occupied the same site as the celebrated convent Monte Cassino: the ruins of an amphitheatre are found at S. Germano. Varro had a villa there. (Strab. p. 237; Liv. ix. 28; Varr. L. L. vii. 29, R. R. iii. 5.)

Casiōtis. [CASIUS.]

Cāsūs. 1. (Ras Kasaroun), a headland on the coast of Egypt, E. of Pelusium, separating Lake Serbonis from the sea, with a templo of Zeus-Ammon on its summit. Here also was the grave of Pompey. At the foot of the mountain, on the land side, on the high road from Egypt to Syria, stood the town of Casium (Katieh). The surrounding district was called Casiōtis (Strab. p. 758; Lucan, viii. 539).—2. (Jebel Akra), a mountain on the coast of Syria, S. of Antioch and the Orontes, 5318 feet above the level of the sea. The mountain was sacred to Zeus, and also to Tripolemus (Strab. p. 750; Ammian. xxii. 14, 8). In the life of Hadrian (14) it is said that he passed a night on the top in the vain hope of seeing day on one side and night on the other, according to a belief mentioned in Plin. v. 80. The name of Casiōtis was applied to the district on the coast S. of Casius, as far as the N. border of Phœnicia.

Casmēna, -ae (Κασμένη, Herod.: Κασμέναι, Thuc.: Spaccasorno), a town in Sicily, founded by Syracuse about B.C. 643. Here the Gamori, or oligarchical party expelled from Syracuse, found shelter (Hdt. vii. 155; Thuc. vi. 5). It was in the interior, but not far from the coast, and was one of the outposts of Syracuse to control the Sicels.

Caspēria or Caspērūla, a town of the Sabines, NW. of Cures, on the Himella (Aspra).

Caspiae Portae or Pylae (Κάσπαι πύλαι: Tengi Sirdara), the principal pass from Media into Parthia and Hyrcania, through the CASPII MONTES, was a deep ravine, made practicable by art, but still so narrow that there was only room for a single wagon to pass between the lofty overhanging walls of rock. The Persians erected iron gates across the narrowest part of the pass, and maintained a guard for its defence. This pass was near the ancient Rhagae or Arsacia. Alexander passed through it in pursuit of Darius (Arrian, Anab. iii. 19). The Caspian gates, being the most important pass from Western to Central Asia, were regarded by many of the ancients as a sort of central point, common to the boundaries between W. and E. Asia and N. and S. Asia; and distances were reckoned from them. (Strab. pp. 64, 514, 522.)

Caspii (Κάσπιοι), the name of certain Scythian tribes near the Caspian Sea, is used rather loosely by the ancient geographers. The Caspii of Strabo are on the W. side of the sea, and their country, Caspiāne, forms a part of Albania. Those of Herodotus and Ptolemy are in the E. of Media, on the borders of Parthia, in the neighbourhood of the CASPIAE PYLAE (Strab. p. 502; Hdt. iii. 29; Ptol. vi. 2, 5). Probably it would not be far wrong to apply the name generally to the people round the SW. and S. shores of the Caspian in and about the CASPII MONTES.

Caspii Montes (τὰ Κάσπια ὄρη: Elburz Mts.) or Caspus Mons, is a name applied generally to the whole range of mountains which surround the Caspian Sea, on the S. and SW., at the distance of from 15 to 30 miles from its shore, on the borders of Armonia, Media, Hyrcania, and Parthia; and more specifically to that part of this range S. of the Caspian, in which was the pass called CASPIAE PYLAE. The term was also loosely applied to other mountains near the Caspian, especially, by Strabo, to the E. part of the Caucasus, between Colchis and the Caspian.

Caspiri or Caspiraei (Κάσπειροι, Κασπिरαῖοι), a people of India, probably in Cashmir.

Caspium Mare (ἡ Κασπία θάλασσα, the Caspian Sea), also called Hyrcanium, Albanum, and Scythicum, all names derived from the people who lived on its shores, is a great salt-water lake in Asia, according to the ancient division of the continents, but now on the boundary between Europe and Asia. Its average width from E. to W. is about 210 miles, and its length from N. to S., in a straight line, is about 740 miles; but, as its N. part makes a great bend to the E., its true length, measured along a curve drawn through its middle, is about 900 miles; its area is about 180,000 square miles. The notions of the ancients about the Caspian varied very much; and it is curious that two of the erroneous opinions of the later Greek and Roman geographers—namely, that it was united both with the Sea of Aral and with the Arctic Ocean—expressed what, at some remote period, were probably real facts. Their other error, that its greatest length lay W. and E., very likely arose from its supposed union with the Sea of Aral. Another consequence of this error was the supposition that the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes flowed into the Caspian. That the former really did so at some time subsequent to the separation of the two lakes (supposing that they were once united) is pretty well established; but whether this has been the case within the historical period cannot be determined [Oxus]. The country between the two lakes has evidently been greatly changed, and the sand-hills which cover it have doubtless been accumulated by the force of the E. winds bringing down sand from the steppes of Tartary. Both lakes have their surface considerably below that of the Black Sea, the Caspian being nearly 350 feet, and the Aral about 200 feet, lower than the level of the Black Sea, and both are still sinking by evaporation. Moreover, the whole country between and around them for a considerable distance is a depression, surrounded by lofty mountains on every side, except where the valley of the Irish and Obi stretches away to the Arctic Ocean. Besides a number of smaller streams, two great rivers flow into the Caspian; the Rha (Volga) on the N., and the united Cyrus and Araxes (Kour) on the W.; but it loses more by evaporation than it receives from these rivers. (Strab. pp. 507, 519; Mel. iii. 5; Plin. vi. 36; Diod. xviii. 5; Arist. Meteor. i. 13, 29.)

Cassandane (Κασσανδάνη), wife of Cyrus the Great, and mother of Cambyses.

Cassander (Κάσσανδρος), son of Antipater. His father, on his death-bed (B.C. 321), appointed Polysperchon regent, and conferred upon Cassander only the secondary dignity of Chiliarch. Being dissatisfied with this arrangement, Cassander strengthened himself by an alliance with Ptolemy and Antigonus, and entered into war with Polysperchon. In 318 Cassander obtained possession of Athens and most of the cities in the S. of Greece. In 317 he was recalled to Macedonia to oppose Olympias. He kept her besieged in Pydna throughout the winter of 317, and on her surrender in the spring of the ensuing year, he put her to death. The way now seemed open to him to the throne of Macedon. He placed Roxana and her young son, Alexander Aegus, in custody at Amphipolis, not thinking it safe as yet to murder them; and he connected himself with the regal family by a marriage with Thessalonica, half-sister to Alexander the Great (Diod. xix. 49). In 315 Cassander joined Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysi-machus in their war against Antigonus, of whose power they had all become jealous. This war was upon the whole unfavourable to Cassander, who lost most of the cities in Greece. By the general peace of 311, it was provided that Cassander was to retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Aegus should be grown to manhood. Cassander thereupon put to death the young king and his mother Roxana (Diod. xix. 105, xx. 26). In 310 the war was renewed, and Heracles, the son of Alexander by Barsine, was brought forward by Polysperchon as a claimant to the Macedonian throne; but Cassander bribed Polysperchon to murder the young prince and his mother, 309. In 306 Cassander allowed himself to be called by the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy (Plut. Demetr. 18).

In the following years, Demetrius Poliorcetes, the son of Antigonus, carried on the war in Greece with great success against Cassander; but in 302 Demetrius was obliged to pass into Asia, to support his father; and next year, 301, the decisive battle of Ipsus was fought, in which Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated, and the former slain, and which gave to Cassander Macedonia and Greece. Cassander died of dropsy in 297, and was succeeded by his son Philip (Diod. xx. 112; Plut. Demetr. 31).

could understand the divine sounds of nature and the voices of birds. When she grew up her beauty won the love of Apollo, who conferred upon her the gift of prophecy, upon her promising to comply with his desires; but after she had become possessed of the prophetic art, she refused to fulfil her promise. Thereupon the god in anger ordained that no one should believe her prophecies. She predicted to the Trojans the ruin that threatened them, but no one believed her; she was looked upon as a madwoman, and, according to a late account, was shut up and guarded. On the capture of Troy she fled into the sanctuary of Athene, but was torn away from the statue of the goddess by Ajax, son of Oileus, and, according to some accounts, was even ravished by him in the sanctuary. On the division of the booty, Cassandra fell to the lot of Agamemnon, who took her with him to Mycenae. Here she was killed by Clytaemnestra. Cassandræa. [POTIDAEA.]

Cassia Gens. [CASSIUS.]

Cassiodorus, Magnus Aurélius, a distinguished statesman, and one of the few men of learning at the downfall of the Western Empire, was born about A.D. 468, at Seylacium in Brutium, of an ancient and wealthy Roman family. He enjoyed the full confidence of Theodoric the Great and his successors, and under a variety of different titles he conducted for a long series of years the government of the Ostrogothic kingdom. At the age of 70 he retired to the monastery of Viviers, which he had founded in his native province, and there passed the last 30 years of his life. His time was devoted to study and to the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the 7 liberal arts, and divinity; while his leisure hours were employed in the construction of philosophical toys, such as sun-dials, water-clocks, &c. Of his numerous writings the most important is his Variarum (Epistolarum) Libri XII, an assemblage of state papers drawn up by Cassiodorus in accordance with the instructions of Theodoric and his successors. The other works of Cassiodorus are of less value to us. The principal are: 1. Chronicon, a summary of Universal History giving a catalogue of Roman consuls; 2. De Orthographia Liber; 3. De Arte Grammatica ad Donati Mentem; 4. De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Litterarum, much read in the middle ages; 5. De Anima; 6. Libri XII de Rebus Gestis Gothorum, known to us only through the abridgment of Jornandes; 7. De Institutione Divinarum Litterarum, an introduction to the profitable study of the Scriptures. There are also several other ecclesiastical works of Cassiodorus extant.—The best edition of his collected works is by D. Garet, Rouen, 1679, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Venice, 1729.

Cassiopæa, Cassiépæa, or Cassiôpê (Κασσιόπεια, Κασσιώπεια, or Κασσιόπη), wife of

Cephens in Aethiopia, and mother of Andromeda, whose beauty she extolled above that of the Nereids. [ANDROMEDA.]

Cassiterides Insulae (Κασσιτερίδες νῆσοι), 'the Tin Islands,' from which the Phoenicians at an early period procured tin. Herodotus (iii. 125) has heard of their name, but doubts their real existence, apparently thinking that the Phoenicians merely concealed under this name the spot where the metal was found. It has been usual to identify them with the Scilly Islands, and to say that the Phoenicians there bought the tin which the Britons brought over from Cornwall, but there is no authority for any such idea, and it is from a common sense point of view highly improbable that the Phoenician ships should have halted at this inconvenient anchorage instead of going on to get the metal in the Cornish harbours. The 'Ictis' of Diodorus (v. 38) may be St. Michael's Mount, but certainly is not the Scilly Isles. Strabo seems to fix the Cassiterides Insulae as off the coast of the Artabri, at the extreme NW. of Spain, not far from Cape Finisterre. He says that they lie out to sea northwards, but it is inconceivable that he could have meant 500 miles away. He says that there are ten of these islands (pp. 120, 129, 147, 175). Pliny also places them off the north coast of Spain, and though he seems to distinguish them from the islands off the coast of the Artabri, it is not certain that he should be so read (iv. 119). On the whole, if these islands are to be fixed definitely anywhere, there is most authority for taking them to be small Spanish islands off the Galician coast. But it is probable that some ancient writers spoke of the British isles generally under this name.

Cassius, the name of one of the most distinguished of the Roman gentes, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian. 1. Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, thrice consul: first B.C. 502, when he conquered the Sabines; again, 498, when he made a league with the Latins; and, lastly, 486, when he made a league with the Hernicans, and carried his celebrated agrarian law, the first which was proposed at Rome. It was an attempt to take the control of the public lands from the senate and to provide for a more equitable and less selfish appropriation. His proposal was to have the public land measured; to lease a part for the benefit of the public treasury, and to assign a part to the plebeians; that the share of patricians in the public land should be strictly defined, and that the remainder should be divided among the plebeians. In the following year he was accused of aiming at regal power, and was put to death. The manner of his death is related differently, but it is most probable that he was accused before the comitia curiata by the quaestores parricidii, and was sentenced to death by his fellow patricians. His house was razed to the ground, and his property confiscated. His guilt is doubtful; he had made himself hateful to the patricians by his agrarian law, and it is most likely that the accusation was invented for the purpose of getting rid of a dangerous opponent. At his death his law fell into neglect, and it remained for others to bring in the required legislation. (See Diet. Ant. s.v. Agrariae Leges.) He left 3 sons; but as all the subsequent Cassii are plebeians, his sons were perhaps expelled from the patrician order, or may have voluntarily passed over to the plebeians, on account of the murder of their father.—2. C. Cass. Longinus, consul 171, obtained as his province Italy and Cisalpine

Gaul, and without the authority of the senate attempted to march into Macedonia through Illyricum, but was obliged to return to Italy. In 154 he was censor with M. Messala; and a theatre which these censors had built was pulled down by order of the senate, at the suggestion of P. Scipio Nasica, as injurious to public morals. (Liv. xliiii. 1, Ep. 48; Vell. Pat. i. 15.)—3. Q. Cass. Longinus, praetor urbanus B.C. 167, and consul 164, died in his consulship.—4. L. Cass. Longinus Ravilla, tribune of the plebs, 137, when he proposed a law for voting by ballot (tabellaria lex); consul 127, and censor 125. He was severe in his justice. (Cic. Legg. iii. 16, 35, Rosc. Am. 30, 86; cf. Val. Max. viii. 1, 7.)—5. L. Cass. Longinus, praetor 111, when he brought Jugurtha to Rome; consul 107, with C. Marius, and received as his province Narbonese Gaul, in order to oppose the Cimbri, but was defeated and killed by the Tigurini.—6. L. Cass. Longinus, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward many laws to diminish the power of the aristocracy.—7. C. Cass. Longinus Varus, consul 73, brought forward, with his colleague M. Terentius, a law (lex Terentia Cassia), by which corn was to be purchased and then sold in Rome at a small price. In 72 he was defeated by Spartacus near Mutina; in 66 he supported the Manilian law for giving the command of the Mithridatic war to Pompey; and in his old age was proscribed by the triumvirs and killed, 48. (Cic. Verr. v. 21, 52; Oros. v. 24; Appian, B. C. iv. 28.)—8. C. Cass. Longinus, the murderer of Julius Caesar. In 53 he was quaestor of Crassus in his campaign against the Parthians, in which he distinguished himself (Plut. Crass. 27; Dio Cass. xl. 28). After the death of Crassus, he collected the remains of the Roman army, and made preparations to defend Syria against the Parthians. In 52 he defeated the Parthians, who had crossed the Euphrates, and in 51 he again gained a still more important victory over them (Cic. Phil. xi. 14, 35). Soon afterwards he returned to Rome. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, joined the aristocratic party in the civil war, and fled with Pompey from Rome. In 48 he commanded the Pompeian fleet; after the battle of Pharsalia he went to the Hellespont, where he accidentally fell in with Caesar, and surrendered to him. He was not only pardoned by Caesar, but in 44 was made praetor, and the province of Syria was promised him for the next year (Dio Cass. xlii. 13; Cic. ad Fam. xv. 15; Plut. Caes. 62; Appian, B. C. ii. 111). But Cassius had never ceased to be Caesar's enemy; it was he who formed the conspiracy against the dictator's life, and gained over M. Brutus to the plot (Plut. Brut. 14; Cic. ad Att. xiv. 21). After the death of Caesar, on the 15th of March, 44 [CAESAR], Cassius remained in Italy for a few months, but in July he went to Syria, which he claimed as his province, although the senate had given it to Dolabella, and had conferred upon Cassius Cyrene in its stead. He defeated Dolabella, who put an end to his own life; and after plundering Syria and Asia most unmercifully, he crossed over to Greece with Brutus in 42, in order to oppose Octavian and Antony. At the battle of Philippi, Cassius was defeated by Antony, while Brutus, who commanded the other wing of the army, drove Octavian off the field; but Cassius, ignorant of the success of Brutus, commanded his freedman to put an end to his life. Brutus mourned over his companion, calling him the last of the Romans (Plut. Brut.

39; Dio Cass. xlvii. 42). Cassius was married to Junia Tertia or Tertulla, half-sister of M. Brutus. Cassius was well acquainted with Greek and Roman literature; he was a follower of the Epicurean philosophy; his abilities were considerable, but he was vain, proud, and revengeful.—9. C. Cass. Longinus, brother of No. 8, assisted M. Laterensis in accusing Cn. Plancius, who was defended by Cicero in 54. He joined Caesar at the commencement of the Civil war, and was one of Caesar's legates in Greece in 48. In 44 he was tribune of the plebs, but was not one of the conspirators against Caesar's life. He subsequently espoused the side of Octavian, in opposition to Antony; and on their reconciliation in 43, he fled to Asia: he was pardoned by Antony in 41.—10. Q. Cass. Longinus, the frater or first-cousin of No. 8. In 54 he went as the quaestor of Pompey into Spain, where he was universally hated on account of his rapacity and cruelty. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, and a warm supporter of Caesar, but was obliged to leave the city and take refuge in Caesar's camp. In the same year he accompanied Caesar to Spain, and after the defeat of Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, Caesar left him governor of Further Spain. His cruelty and oppressions excited an insurrection against him at Corduba, but this was quelled by Cassius. Subsequently 2 legions declared against him, and M. Marcellus, the quaestor, put himself at their head. He was saved from this danger by Lepidus, and left the province in 47, but his ship sank, and he was lost, at the mouth of the Iberus. (Dio Cass. xlii. 15; Bell. Alex. 48.)—11. L. Cass. Longinus, a competitor with Cicero for the consulship for 63; was one of Catiline's conspirators, and undertook to set the city on fire; he escaped the fate of his comrades by quitting Rome before their apprehension.—12. L. Cass. Longinus, consul A.D. 80, married to Drusilla, the daughter of Germanicus, with whom her brother Caligula afterwards lived. Cassius was proconsul in Asia A.D. 40, and was commanded by Caligula to be brought to Rome, because an oracle had warned the emperor to beware of a Cassius: the oracle was fulfilled in the murder of the emperor by Cassius Chaerea.—13. C. Cass. Longinus, the celebrated jurist, governor of Syria, A.D. 50, in the reign of Claudius. He was banished by Nero in A.D. 66, because he had, among his ancestral images, a statue of Cassius, the murderer of Caesar (Tac. Ann. xvi. 7; Suet. Ner. 37; Plin. Ep. vii. 24). He was recalled from banishment by Vespasian. Cassius wrote 10 books on the civil law (Libri Juris Civilis), and Commentaries on Vitellius and Urseus Ferox, which are quoted in the Digest. He was a follower of the school of Ateius Capito; and as he reduced the principles of Capito to a more scientific form, the adherents of this school received the name of Cassiani (Tac. Ann. xii. 12).—14. L. Cass. Hemina, a Roman annalist, lived about B.C. 140, and wrote a history of Rome from the earliest times to the end of the 3rd Punic war (Plin. xiii. 84, xxix. 6).—15. Cass. Parmensis, so called from Parma, his birth-place, was one of the murderers of Caesar, B.C. 43; took an active part in the war against the triumvirs; and, after the death of Brutus and Cassius, carried over the fleet which he commanded to Sicily, and joined Sex. Pompey; upon the defeat of Pompey, he surrendered himself to Antony, whose fortunes he followed until after the battle of Actium, when he went to Athens, and was there put to death by the command of Octavian, B.C. 30 (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 13; Appian, B. C. v. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 87). Cassius was a poet, and his productions were prized by Horace (Ep. i. 4, 3). He wrote 2 tragedies, entitled Thyestes and Brutus, epigrams, and other works (Quintil. v. 11, 24; Varr. L. L. vi. 7, vii. 72).—16. Cass. Etruscus, a poet censured by Horace (Sat. i. 10, 61), must not be confounded with No. 15.—17. Cass. Avidius an able general of M. Aurelius, was a native of Syria. In the Parthian war (A.D. 162–165), he commanded the Roman army as the general of Verus, and after defeating the Parthians, he took Seleucia and Ctesiphon. He was afterwards appointed governor of all the Eastern provinces, and discharged his trust for several years with fidelity; but in A.D. 175 he proclaimed himself emperor. He reigned only a few months, and was slain by his own officers, before M. Aurelius arrived in the East (Dio Cass. lxxi. 21 ff.; Capitol. Ver. 7; M. Aurel. 25).—18. Dionysius Cassius, of Utica, a Greek writer, lived about B.C. 40, and translated into Greek the work of the Carthaginian Mago on agriculture.—19. Cass. Felix, a Greek physician, probably lived under Augustus and Tiberius; wrote a small work entitled ἱατρικὰ Ἀπορία καὶ Προβλήματα Φυσικά, Quaestiones Medicae et Problemata Naturalia; printed in Ideler's Physici et Medici Graeci Minores, Berol. 1841.—20. Cass. Chaerea. [CHAEREA.]—21. Cass. Dion. [DION CASSIUS.]—22. Cass. Severus. [SEVERUS.]

Cassivelaunus, a British chief, ruled over the country N. of the Thames (Thames), and was entrusted by the Britons with the supreme command on Caesar's 2nd invasion of Britain, B.C. 54. He was defeated by Caesar, and was obliged to sue for peace, and give hostages. (Caes. B. G. v. 11–12; Dio Cass. xl. 3.)

Cassôpe (Κασσώπη), a town in Thesprotia near the coast (Strab. p. 324). At one time it ruled over neighbouring towns such as Pandosia and Elatea (Dem. de Halon. 33). Its ruins are near Lelovo.

Castâbala (τὰ Καστάβαλα). 1. A city of Cappadocia, near Τυαυα, celebrated for its temple of Artemis Perasia (Strab. p. 537; Plin. vi. 8).—2. A town in Cilicia Campestris, near Issus (Curt. iii. 7; Plin. v. 93).

Castâlia (Κασταλία), a celebrated fountain on Mt. Parnassus, sacred to Apollo and the Muses, who were hence called Castâlides; said to have derived its name from Castalia, daughter of Achelous, who threw herself into the fountain when pursued by Apollo. [DELPHI.]

Castôlus (Κάστωλος) a plain in which the troops of the Persian satrap over Lydia, Phrygia and Cappadocia were mustered. It is mentioned only in Xen. Anab. i. 1, 2 and Hell. i. 4, 3. We have no clue to its position except that Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v.) states it to have been in Lydia.

Castor, brother of Pollux. [DIOSCURI.]

Castor (Κάστωρ). 1. A Greek grammarian, surnamed Philoromacus, probably lived about B.C. 150, and wrote several books; a portion of his Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ is still extant and printed in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. iii. p. 712, seq.—2. Grandson of Deiotarus. [DEIOTARUS.]

Castrimoenium (Marino) a town in the Alban hills just N. of the Alban lake, a municipality under the Roman empire (Orell. 1393).

Castulo (Κασταλόν or Καστλόν: Cazlona), a town of the Oretani on the Baetis, and near the frontiers of Baetica, at the foot of a mountain which resembled Parnassus, was under the Romans an important place, a municipium with the Jus Latii, and included in the jurisdiction of Carthago Nova. In the mountains (Saltus Castulonensis) in the neighbourhood were silver and lead mines. The wife of Hannibal was a native of Castulo. (Strab. p. 142; Liv. xxiv. 41; Plin. iii. 17, 25; Sil. It. iii. 97.)

Casuentus (Basiento), a river in Lucania, flows into the sea near Metapontum.

Casus (Κάσος: Kasos) an island between Carpathus and Crete: remains are found of its ancient port (Il. ii. 676; Strab. p. 489).

Casytes (Κασύτης: Chismeh), on the coast of Ionia, the harbour of ERYTHRAE.

Catabathmus Magnus (Καταβαθμός: i.e. descensu; Marsa Sollern), a mountain and seaport, at the bottom of a deep bay on the N. coast of Africa, was generally considered the boundary between Egypt and Cyrenaica (Plin. v. 32, 38). Ptolemy distinguishes from this a place called Catabathmus Parvus, near the borders of Egypt, above Paraetonium. (Strab. p. 791).

Catacecaumene (ἡ Κατακεκαυμένη, 'the burnt country'), a volcanic region in the Maonian district of Lydia (Strab. p. 628).

Cātādūpa ο-ι (τὰ Καράδουπα, οἱ Καράδουποι), a name given to the cataracts of the Nile, and to the adjoining parts of Aethiopia. [N.L.S.]

Catalauni or Catelauni, a people in Gaul in the modern Champagne, mentioned only by later writers: their capital was Durocatalauni or Catalauni (Châlons-sur-Marne), in the neighbourhood of which Attila was defeated by Aëtius and Theodoric, A.D. 451.

Catamitus, the Roman name for Gauymedes, of which it is only a corrupt form.

Catāna or Catīna (Κατάνη: Katanaïos: Catania), an important town in Sicily on the E. coast at the foot of Mt. Aetna, founded B.C. 730 by Naxos, which was itself founded by the Chalcidians of Euboea. In B.C. 476 it was taken by Hiero I., who removed its inhabitants to Leontini, and settled 5000 Syracusans and 5000 Peloponnesians in the town, the name of which he changed into Aetna. Soon after the death of Hiero (467), the former inhabitants of Catana again obtained possession of the town, and called it by its original name, Catana.

Coin of Catana.

Subsequently Catana was conquered by Dionysius, was then governed by native tyrants, next became subject to Agathocles, and finally in the 1st Punic war fell under the dominion of Rome. It was colonised by Augustus with some veterans. Catana frequently suffered from earthquakes and eruptions of Mt. Aetna. It is now one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily. (Thuc. vi. 3; Strab. p. 268; Cic. Verr. iii. 83, 192; Liv. xxvii. 8; Dio Cass. liv. 7.) It has important remains of the Roman period.

Cātāōnla (Karaonla), a district in the SE. part of Cappadocia, to which it was first added under the Romans, with Melitene, which lies E.

of it. These two districts form a large and fertile plain, lying between the Anti-Taurus and the Taurus and Amaus, and watered by the river Pyramus. (Strab. p. 535.)

Catarrhaetes (Καταρράκτης). 1. (Duden-Sü); a river of Pamphylia, which descends from the mountains of Taurus, in a great broken waterfall (whence its name, fr. καταρρήγνυμι), and which, after flowing beneath the earth in two parts of its course, falls into the sea E. of Attalia (Strab. p. 667; Mel. i. 14).—2. The term is also applied to the cataracts of the Nile, which are distinguished as C. Major and C. Minor [N.L.S.].

Catelauni. [CATALAUNI.]

Cathaei (Καθαῖοι), a great and warlike people of India intra Gangem, upon whom Alexander made war (Arrian. Anab. v. 22). It is said that the name is not that of a tribe, but of a warrior caste of the Hindoos, the Kshatriyas.

Cātīlina, L. Sergius, the descendant of an ancient patrician family which had sunk into poverty. His youth and early manhood were stained by every vice and crime. He first appears in history as a zealous partisan of Sulla; and during the horrors of the proscription, he killed, with his own hand, his brother-in-law, Q. Caecilius, a quiet inoffensive man, and put to death by torture M. Marius Gratidianus, the kinsman and fellow-townsmen of Cicero. He was suspected of an intrigue with the vestal Fabia, sister of Terentia, and was said and believed to have made away with his first wife and afterwards with his son, in order that he might marry Aurelia Orestilla, who objected to the presence of a grown-up step-child; but notwithstanding this infamy he attained to the dignity of praetor in B.C. 68, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 66, in order to sue for the consulship. The election for 65 was carried by P. Autronius Paetus and P. Cornelius Sulla, both of whom were soon after convicted of bribery, and their places supplied by their competitors and accusers, L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus. Catiline had been prohibited by the senate from becoming a candidate, in consequence of a pending impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Clodius Pulcher, afterwards so celebrated as the enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Autronius and Catiline formed a project, along with Cn. Piso, to murder the new consuls when they entered upon their office upon the 1st of January. This design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, before the whole of the armed agents had assembled. He was acquitted in 65 on his trial for extortion, and began to organise a more extensive conspiracy, in order to overthrow the existing government. The time was propitious to his schemes. The younger nobility were thoroughly demoralised, with ruined fortunes; the Roman populace were restless and discontented, ready to follow at the bidding of any demagogue; while many of the veterans of Sulla, who had squandered their ill-gotten wealth, were now anxious for a renewal of those scenes of blood which they had found so profitable. Among such men Catiline soon obtained numerous supporters, and the difficult position of the democratic party, whose safety was threatened by the increased military power of Pompey, caused them to view with more or less favour the schemes of the anarchists: hence it was that (as seems probable) Catiline was secretly encouraged by Crassus and Caesar [see those articles]. These circumstances of the time, rather than their own capacity, explain the influence which Catiline and the other conspirators attained; for neither Catiline himself nor his associates were really brilliant or capable leaders. Had they been such, they would not have allowed their hand to be forced by Cicero, or permitted themselves, as in fact they did, to play the game of the senatorial party. The most distinguished men who joined him, and were present at a meeting of the conspirators which he called in June, 64, were P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura, who had been consul in B.C. 71, but having been passed over by the censors, had lost his seat in the senate, which he was now seeking to recover by standing a second time for the praetorship; C. Cornelius Cethegus, distinguished throughout by his headstrong impetuosity and sanguinary violence; P. Autronius, spoken of above; L. Cassius Longinus, at this time a competitor for the consulship; L. Vargunteius, who had been one of the colleagues of Cicero in the quaestorship, and had subsequently been condemned for bribery; L. Calpurnius Bestia, tribune elect; Publius and Servius Sulla, nephews of the dictator; M. Porcius Laeca, &c. The first object of Catiline was to obtain the consulship for himself and C. Antonius, whose co-operation he confidently anticipated. But in this object he was disappointed: Cicero and Antonius were elected consuls. This disappointment rendered him only more vigorous in the prosecution of his designs; more adherents were gained, and troops were levied in various parts of Italy, especially in the neighbourhood of Faesulae, under the superintendence of C. Manlius, one of the veteran centurions of Sulla. Meantime, Cicero, the consul, was unrelaxing in his efforts to preserve the state from the threatened danger. Through the agency of Fulvia, the mistress of Cnrius, one of the conspirators, he became acquainted with every circumstance as soon as it occurred, and was enabled to counteract all the machinations of Catiline. Cicero at the same time gained over his colleague Antonius, by promising him the province of Macedonia. At length Cicero openly accused Catiline, and the senate, now aware of the danger which threatened the state, passed the decree, 'that the consuls should take care that the republic received no harm,' in virtue of which the consuls were invested for the time being with absolute power, both civil and military. In the consular elections which followed soon afterwards, Catiline was again rejected. On the night of the 6th of November, B.C. 63, he met the ringleaders of the conspiracy at the dwelling of M. Porcius Laeca, and informed them that he had resolved to wait no longer, but at once to proceed to open action. Cicero, informed as usual of these proceedings, summoned the senate on the 8th of November, and there delivered the first of his celebrated orations against Catiline, in which he displayed a most intimate acquaintance with all the proceedings of the conspirators. Catiline, who was present, attempted to justify himself, but scarcely had he commenced when his words were drowned by the shouts of 'enemy' and 'parricide' which burst from the whole assembly. Finding that he could at present effect nothing at Rome, he quitted the city in the night (8th-9th November), and proceeded to the camp of Manlius, after leaving the chief control of affairs at Rome in the hands of Lentulus and Cethegus. On the 9th, when the flight of Catiline was known, Cicero delivered his second speech, addressed to the people in the forum, in which he justified his recent conduct. The senate declared Catiline and Manlius public enemies, and soon afterwards Cicero obtained legal evidence of the guilt of the conspirators within the city, through the ambassadors of the Allobroges. These men had been solicited by Lentulus to join the plot, and to induce their own countrymen to take part in the insurrection. They revealed what they had heard to Q. Fabius Sanga, the patron of their state, who in his turn acquainted Cicero. By the instructions of the latter, the ambassadors affected great zeal in the undertaking, and having obtained a written agreement, signed by Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius, they quitted Rome soon after midnight on the 3rd of December, but were arrested on the Milvian bridge, by Cicero's order. Cicero instantly summoned the leaders of the conspiracy to his presence, and conducted them to the senate, which was assembled in the temple of Concord (4th of December). He proved the guilt of the conspirators by the testimony of witnesses and by their own signatures. They were thereupon consigned to the charge of certain senators. Cicero then summoned the people, and delivered what is called his third oration against Catiline, in which he informed them of all that had taken place. On the following day, the nones (5th of December, the day so frequently referred to by Cicero in after times with pride, the senate was called together to deliberate respecting the punishment of the conspirators. After an animated debate, of which the leading arguments are expressed in the two celebrated orations assigned by Sallust to Caesar and to Cato, a decree was passed, that Lentulus and the conspirators should be put to death. The sentence was executed the same night in the prison. Cicero's speech in the debate in the senate is preserved in his fourth oration against Catiline. The consul Antonius was then sent against Catiline, and the decisive battle was fought early in 62. Antonius, however, unwilling to fight against his former associate, gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. Catiline fell in the engagement, after fighting with the most daring valour.—The history of Catiline's conspiracy has been written by Sallust: see also Dio Cass. xxxvi. 27, xxxvii. 10, 29-42; Liv. Ep. 101, 102; Plut. Cat. Min. 23, Cic. 10-22; Cic. in Catil., pro Sulla, ad Att. i. 19, ii. 1, xii. 21, xvi. 14.

Cātillus or Cātīlus (in Statius Cātillus), the founder of TIBUR. According to the prevalent tradition there were three brothers, Tiburtus, Coras, and Catillus (some make them sons of Catillus the son of Amphiarus), who migrated from Argos and founded Tibur, having driven away the Sicani from that territory; Virgil makes Catillus and Coras fight against Aeneas (Aen. vii. 670; Serv. ad loc.; Hor. Od. i. 18, 2; Sil. viii. 366; Stat. Silv. i. 3, 100; Solin. ii. 8).

Cātius, an Epicurean philosopher, a native of Gallia Transpadana (Insuber), composed a treatise in 4 books, de Rerum Natura et de Summo Bono; died B.C. 45 (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 16; Quint. x. 1, 124). This is not the Catus of Hor. Sat. ii. 4, of whom nothing is known.

Cātō, Dionysius, the author of a small work, entitled Disticha de Moribus ad Filium, consisting of a series of sententious moral precepts.

Nothing is known of the author or the time when he lived, but many writers place him under the Antonines. He was first quoted by Vindicianus in the reign of Valentinian. He was quoted also by Isidore, Alcuin, and Chaucer, and was made of more account by Erasmus than his writings seem to deserve. Editions by Arntzenius, Amsterdam, 1754; F. Hauthal, Berl. 1869.

Cāto, Porciūs. 1. M., frequently surnamed Censorius or Censor, also Cato Major, to distinguish him from his great-grandson Cato Uticensis [No. 8]. Cato was born at Tusculum B.C. 234, and was brought up at his father's farm, situated in the Sabine territory. In 217 he served his first campaign in his 17th year, and during the remaining years of the 2nd Punic war he greatly distinguished himself by his courage and military abilities. In the intervals of war, he returned to his Sabine farm, which he had inherited from his father, and there led the same frugal and simple life, which characterised him to his last days. Encouraged by L. Valerius Flaccus, a young nobleman in the neighbourhood, he went to Rome, and became a candidate for office. He obtained the quaestorship in 204, and served under the proconsul Scipio Africanus in Sicily and Africa. From this time we may date the enmity which Cato always displayed towards Scipio; their habits and views of life were entirely different; and Cato on his return to Rome denounced in the strongest terms the luxury and extravagance of his commander. On his voyage home he is said to have touched at Sardinia, and to have brought the poet Ennius from the island to Italy. In 199 he was aedile, and in 198 praetor; he obtained Sardinia as his province, which he governed with justice and economy, and a simplicity of life carried to excess, but intended doubtless as a rebuke to the luxury which was growing with conquest. He entered the towns of his province on foot, followed by a slave bearing the sacrificial ladle. In 195 he was consul with his old friend and patron L. Valerius Flaccus. He carried on war in Spain with the greatest success; he reduced an insurrection in Hisp. Citerior, winning a battle at Emporiae. It is to be regretted that he did not depart from the custom of his age and country in the cruelty with which the revolt was subdued. He received the honour of a triumph on his return to Rome in 194; but sold his horse before leaving Spain because he thought it wrong to expend public money on its transport. In 191 he served, under the consul M'. Acilius Glabrio, in the campaign against Antiochus in Greece, and the decisive victory at Thermopylae was mainly owing to Cato: in this also he followed the old customs, and rebuked the pride, which made it now unfashionable for a consular to serve as a subordinate. From this time Cato's military career, which had been a brilliant one, appears to have ceased. He now took an active part in civil affairs, and distinguished himself by his vehement opposition to the Roman nobles, who introduced into Rome Greek luxury and refinement. It was especially against the Scipios that his most violent attacks were directed and whom he pursued with the bitterest animosity. He obtained the condemnation of L. Scipio, the conqueror of Antiochus, and compelled his brother P. Scipio to quit Rome in order to avoid the same fate. [SCIPIO.] In 184 he was elected censor with L. Valerius Flaccus, having been rejected in his application for the office in 189. His censorship was a great epoch in his life.

He applied himself strenuously to the duties of his office, regardless of the enemies he was making; but all his efforts to stem the tide of luxury which was now setting in proved unavailing. He degraded men of high rank: in some cases justly (as Flamininus who had been guilty of gross and wanton cruelty: Liv. xxxix. 42); in some for trifling departure from his own code of simplicity and reserve. He placed heavy taxes on luxury and extravagance in slaves and in dress (Liv. xxxix. 44); while zealous in public works he diminished the contract prices for them. He showed his disapproval of the idlers of the day by proposing in jest that the marketplace should be paved with sharp-pointed stones, to make lounging as unpleasant as it was unprofitable. His strong national prejudices appear to have diminished in force as he grew older and wiser. He applied himself in old age to the study of Greek literature, with which in youth he had no acquaintance, although he was not ignorant of the Greek language. But his conduct continued to be guided often by narrow-minded prejudices against classes and nations, whose influence he deemed to be hostile to the simplicity of the old Roman character. He had an antipathy to physicians, because they were mostly Greeks, and therefore unfit to be trusted with Roman lives. When Athens sent Carneades, Diogeues, and Critolaus as ambassadors to Rome, he recommended the senate to send them from the city an account of the dangerous doctrines taught by Carneades. [CARNEADES.] It is noticeable that his influence procured the release of Polybius and his fellow-prisoners, many of whom were dying in prison, but his speech in the senate was characteristic: 'Have we nothing to do but to sit debating whether a parcel of Greeks are to die here or at home?' Cato retained his bodily and mental vigour in his old age. In the year before his death he was one of the chief instigators of the 3rd Punic war. He had been one of the Roman deputies sent to Africa to arbitrate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, and he was so struck with the flourishing condition of Carthage that on his return home he maintained that Rome would never be safe as long as Carthage was in existence. From this time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were Delenda est Carthago. Very shortly before his death, he made a powerful speech in accusing Galba on account of his cruelty and perfidy in Spain. He died in 149, at the age of 85. His Life has been written by Plutarch, Nepos, and Aurelius Victor; see also Liv. xxxiv., xxxvi., xxxix. 40.—Cato was not only a man of action. He was the first prose writer among the Romans of any value, and composed the first Roman history in the Latin tongue (Quint. xii. 11, 23), an important work entitled Origines, of which only fragments have been preserved. The 1st book contained the history of the Roman kings; the 2nd and 3rd treated of the origin of the Italian towns, and from these two books the whole work derived its title. The 4th book treated of the first Punic war, and the other books continued the narrative to the year of Cato's death. He wrote Præcepta ad Filium, conveying in the form of advice to his son his views on country life, sanitary rules, public speaking, &c., and rules for conduct in verso (Carmen de Moribus): he also left 150 speeches, which are highly praised by Cicero (Brut. 65). Of all his works his manual of agriculture alone has been preserved, and even this is only a later revision of the original work in a somewhat incomplete form. It is for the use of L. Manlius, who had an estate near Casinum. The systematic beginning on the subject of agriculture and country life is followed, as we now have it, by disconnected rules for housekeeping, sacrifices, forms of salo, receipts, &c. The style is less archaic, no doubt, than the original work. Edition in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae, Schneider, Lips. 1794; fragments of Origines by Roth 1852, Peter 1871; of other works by Wordsworth 1874.—2. M., son of No. 1, by his first wife Licinia, and thence called Licinianus, was distinguished as a jurist. In the war against Perseus, 168, he fought with great bravery under the consul Aemilius Paulus (Val. Max. iii. 12), whose daughter, Aemilia Tertia, he afterwards married. He died when praetor designatus, about 152.—3. M., son of No. 1, by his second wife Salonia, and thence called Salonianus, was born 154, when his father had completed his 80th year.—4. M., son of No. 2, consul 118, died in Africa in the same year.—5. C., also son of No. 2, consul 114, obtained Macedonia as his province, and fought unsuccessfully against the Scordisci. He was accused of extortion in Macedonia, and was sentenced to pay a fine. He afterwards went to Tarraco in Spain, and became a citizen of that town. (Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Cic. pro Balb. 11.)—6. M., son of No. 3, tribunus plebis, died when a candidate for the praetorship.—7. L., also son of No. 3, consul 89, was killed in the Social war.—8. M., son of No. 6 by Livia, great-grandson of Cato the Censor, and surnamed Uticensis from Utica, the place of his death, was born 95. In early childhood he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus, along with his sister Porcia and the children of his mother by her second husband, Q. Servilius Caepo. In early years he discovered a stern and unyielding character; he applied himself with great zeal to the study of oratory and philosophy, and became a devoted adherent of the Stoic school; and among the profligate nobles of the age he soon became conspicuous for his rigid morality. He served his first campaign as a volunteer, 72, in the servile war of Spartacus, and afterwards, about 67, as tribunus militum in Macedonia. In 65 he was quaestor, when he corrected numerous abuses which had crept into the administration of the treasury. In 63 he was tribune of the plebs, and supported Cicero in proposing that the Catilinarian conspirators should suffer death. [CATILINA.] He now became one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party, and opposed with the utmost vehemence the measures of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. In order to get rid of him, he was sent to Cyprus in 58 with the task of annexing the island to the Roman dominions. He returned in 56, and continued to oppose the triumvirs; but all his efforts were vain, and he was rejected when he became a candidate for the praetorship. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), he was entrusted, as propraetor, with the defence of Sicily; but, on the landing of Curio with an overwhelming force, he abandoned the island and joined Pompey in Greece. After Pompey's victory at Dyrrachium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and thus was not present at the battle of Pharsalia (48). After this battle, he set sail for Coryra, and thence crossed over to Africa, where he joined Metellus Scipio, after a terrible march across the desert. The army wished to be led by Cato; but he yielded the command to the consular Scipio. In opposition to the advice of Cato, Scipio fought with Caesar, and was utterly routed at Thapsus (April 6th, 46). All Africa now, with the exception of Utica, submitted to Caesar. Cato wanted the Romans in Utica to stand a siege; but when he saw that they were inclined to submit, he resolved to die rather than fall alive into the hands of the conqueror. Accordingly, after spending the greater part of the night in perusing Plato's Phaedo, he stabbed himself below the breast. In falling he overturned an abacus: his friends, hearing the noise, ran up, found him bathed in blood, and, while he was fainting, dressed his wound. When, however, he recovered feeling, he tore open the bandages, and expired, at the age of 49.—Cato soon became the subject of biography and panegyric: his life was written by Plutarch (Cato Min.); shortly after his death appeared Cicero's Cato, which provoked Caesar's Anticato. In Lucan the character of Cato is a personification of virtue. In modern times, the closing events of his life have been dramatised, especially in the famous Cato of Addison.—9. M., a son of No. 8, fell at the battle of Philippi, 42.

Cato, Valērius, a distinguished grammarian and poet, lost his property in his youth during the usurpation of Sulla, and taught for his living. He is the

Cato grammaticus Latina Siren,
Qui solus legit et facit poetas.

He wrote love elegies and mythological poems, of which nothing has been preserved. The Dirae and Lydia, printed in Virgil's Catalecta, were attributed to him, but it is generally considered that this is an error. (Suet. Gr. 11.)

Cattigara (ἡ Καττιγάρα), the easternmost town of ancient geography, a port S. of Thinae and near the mouth of the river Cottiaris (prob. Yang-tse-kiang). It may correspond with Hanchow. (Ptol. i. 11, 14, vii. 3, viii. 27, 14.)

Catti. [CHATTL.]

Catullus. 1. C. Valērius, one of the greatest Roman poets, born at Verona or in its immediate vicinity, B.C. 87. It is probably an error of Jerome when he says that Catullus died in his 30th year, and it seems impossible to believe that the later date of B.C. 84 which some fix as the year of his birth can be correct. His death should probably be placed in B.C. 54, since he mentions (113, 2) the 2nd consulship of Pompey, which was in 55, and no later event is alluded to in his poems. This date would still make him a young man at his death, and would agree with the 'juvenalia' of Ov. Am. iii. 9, 61. Catullus inherited considerable property from his father, but he squandered a great part of it. In order to better his fortunes, he went to Bithynia in the train of the propraetor Memmius B.C. 57, but it appears that the speculation was attended with little success (10, 6; 28, 7; 31, 5; 46, 1). On his return he visited the grave of his brother, who had died in the Troad—a loss which he deploras in the affecting elegy to Hortalus. For the rest of his life he continued to reside at Rowe or at his country-seats on the promontory of Sirmio and at Tibur. Among his friends were Nepos, Calvus, Cinna, Pollio, and Cicero, whom he addresses as the most eloquent of Romans (49, 1). His special enemy was Mamurra, whom he attacks under the name of Mentula when he wished not to offend Caesar. Caesar himself he had attacked, but not beyond the possibility of reconciliation (Suet. Jul. 73). The strongest personal feeling traceable in his poems, besides his love for his brother, was his passion for Clodia (if, as is probable, the Lesbia of his poems was Clodia, the beautiful and infamous sister of P. Clodius and wife of Metellus Celer), to whom he addressed his most ardent lyrics. It seems that he was disillusioned at last as to her character, but so far still under the spell that it made his life unhappy (76 and 91). The most perfect poems of Catullus are his lyrics, especially his ode to Lesbia, on Acme and Septimius, the poem to Lesbia, and the nuptial ode for Manlius Torquatus; but though he is less great in dactylic metres, there is much grandeur and beauty in his long hexameter poem on the nuptials of Peleus. In this poem, which, though original, is modelled on the Greek style, appears the influence of the Alexandrian school, and especially in the Coma Berenices, a translation or paraphrase of a poem of Callimachus. In consequence of the intimate acquaintance which Catullus displays with Greek literature and mythology, he was called doctus by Tibullus, Ovid, and others. The Attis in the galliambic metre is due to Greek study, but has all the fire and passion of the poet's own genius.—Editions. R. Ellis, Oxon. 1878; Schwabe, Berlin, 1886; Postgate, 1890; Munro's Criticisms, 1878.—2. A writer of mimes in the first century A.D. (Juv. xiii. 111; 'facundi scena Catulli,' Mart. v. 30). One of his mimes was called Laureolus, in which a robber was crucified on the stage (Tertull. Valentin. 14; Suet. Cal. 57; Joseph. Ant. xix. 1, 13; Mart. Spect. 7; Juv. viii. 187); another was Phasma, or the Ghost (Juv. viii. 186).—3. Catullus Messalinus, an informer in the reign of Domitian (Juv. iv. 115; Plin. Ep. iv. 22, 5; Tac. Agr. 45).

Cātulus, Lutātius. 1. C., consul B.C. 242, defeated as proconsul in the following year the Carthaginian fleet off the Aegates islands, and thus brought the first Punic war to a close, 241 (Polyb. i. 58-64; Liv. Ep. 19).—2. Q., consul 102 with C. Marius IV., and as proconsul next year gained along with Marius a decisive victory over the Cimbri near Vercellae (Vercelli), in the N. of Italy. Catulus claimed the entire honour of this victory, and asserted that Marius did not meet with the enemy till the day was decided; but at Rome the whole merit was given to Marius. The accounts of Plutarch, who attributes the victory mainly to Catulus, are taken from the annals of Sulla, naturally adverse to the fame of Marius: both Cicero and Juvenal speak of Marius as having the chief merit (Plut. Mar. 27; Cic. Tusc. v. 19, 56; Juv. viii. 253; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Appian, B. C. i. 74). Catulus belonged to the aristocratic party; he espoused the cause of Sulla, was included by Marius in the proscription of 87, and, as escape was impossible, put an end to his life by the vapours of a charcoal fire. Catulus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and famed for the grace and purity with which he spoke and wrote his own language. He was the author of several orations, of a historical work on his own consulship and the Cimbric war, and of poems; but all these have perished, with the exception of two epigrams (Cic. N. D. i. 28, 79; Gell. xix. 9).—3. Q., son of No. 2, a distinguished leader of the aristocracy, also won the respect and confidence of the people by his upright character and conduct. Being consul with M. Lepidus in 78, he resisted the efforts of his colleague to abrogate the acts of Sulla, and the following spring he defeated Lepidus in the battle of the Milvian bridge, and forced him to take refuge in Sardinia. He opposed the Gabinian and Manilian laws which conferred extraordinary powers upon Pompey (67 and 66). He was censor with Crassus in 65, and died in 60 (Plut. Crass. 13).

Caturíges, a Ligurian people in Gallia Narbonensis, whose territory extended from Vapincum (Gap) to the Cottian Alps; their chief towns were EBURDUNUM, and Caturigae or Catorimagus (Chorges) (Caes. B. G. i. 10; Plin. iii. 137; Strab. p. 204).

Cātus Deciānus, procurator of Britain in the reign of Nero, was by his extortion one of the chief causes of the revolt of the people under Boudicca or Boadicea, A.D. 62. He fled to Gaul (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32).

Catuvellauni or Catyeuclani, a British tribe in Rutland, Bedfordshire, Northampton, and Huntingdon (Ptol. iii. 3, 21; Dio C. ss. lx. 20).

Cauca (Coca), a town of the Vaccaeii in Hispania Tarraconensis; birthplace of the emperor Theodosius I. (Zosim. iv. 24).

Caucāsīae Pylae. [CAUCASUS.]

Caucāsus, Caucāsīi Montes (ὁ Καύκασος, τὰ Καυκάσιον ὄρος, τὰ Καυκάσια ὄρη; Caucasus). 1. A great chain of mountains extending WNW. and ESE. from the E. shore of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea) to the W. shore of the Caspian. Its length is about 700 miles; its greatest breadth 120, its least 60 or 70. Its greatest height exceeds that of the Alps, its loftiest summit (Mt. Elbruz, nearly in 43° N. lat. and 43° E. long.) being 18,000 feet above the sea, and therefore reckoning now as the highest European mountain, and to the E. of this there are several other summits above the line of perpetual snow, which, in the Caucasus, is from 10,000 to 11,000 feet above the sea. At both extremities the chain sinks. Two chief passes over the chain were known to the ancients: the one, between its E. extremity and the Caspian, near Derbent, was called Albanicæ Pylæ; the other, nearly in the centre of the range, was called Caucasias or Sarmaticæ Pylæ (Pass of Dariel). In ancient times, as is still the case, the Caucasus was inhabited by a great variety of tribes, speaking different languages (Strabo says, at least 70), but all belonging to that family of the human race which has peopled Europe and W. Asia, and which has obtained the name of Caucasian.—That the Greeks had some vague knowledge of the Caucasus in very early times, is proved by the myths respecting Prometheus and the Argonauts, from which it seems that the Caucasus was regarded as at the extremity of the earth, on the border of the river Oceanus. The account which Herodotus gives is good as far as it goes (i. 203); but it was not till the march of Pompey, in the Mithridatic War, extended to the banks of the Cyrus and Araxes and to the foot of the great chain, that means were obtained for that accurate description of the Caucasus which Strabo gives in his 11th book. Pompey in his pursuit of Mithridates penetrated into this country (Plut. Pomp. 34; Lucull. 14; Appian, Mithrid. 103). The country about the E. part of the Caucasus was called ALBANIA; the rest of the chain divided IBERIA and COLCHIS, on the S., from SARMATIA ASIATICA on the N.—2. Caucasus Indicus [PAROPAMISUS.]

Cauci. [CHAUCI.]

Caucōnes (Καυκωνες), the name of peoples both in Greece and Asia. In Greece they belonged mainly to Elis as aboriginal; i.e., they preceded any historical Greek immigration (Strab. pp.

342-353; Hdt. i. 147; Od. iii. 366). In Asia Homer joins them with Leleges and Pelasgi as allies of the Trojans (Il. x. 429, xx. 329). Strabo places them on the coast of Bithynia (pp. 345, 542). The Caucones in the NW. of Greece, in Elis and Achaia, were supposed by the ancient geographers to be an Arcadian people. The Caucones in the NW. of Asia Minor are mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans, and are placed in Bithynia and Paphlagonia by the geographers, who regarded them as Pelasgians, though some thought them Scythians.

Caudium (Montesarchio), a town in Samnium on the road from Capua to Beneventum (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 51; Strab. 249). In the neighbourhood were the celebrated Furculae Caudinae, or Caudine Forks, narrow passes in the mountains, where the Roman army surrendered to the Samnites, and was sent under the yoke, B.C. 321; it is probably the valley of Isclero.

Caulonia (Καυλωνία: Καυλωνιάτης), an Achaean town on the E. coast of Bruttium, NE. of Locri, originally called Aulon; founded first by the Achaeans of Aegium, afterwards of Croton; destroyed by Dionysius the elder, who removed its inhabitants to Syracuse and gave its territory to Locri (Paus. vi. 3, 12; Strab. p.

261; Diod. xiv. 106); afterwards rebuilt, but again destroyed in the war with Pyrrhus; rebuilt a third time and destroyed a third time in the second Punic war (Liv. xxvii. 12-16; Polyb. x. 1). It was celebrated for its worship of the Delphian Apollo.

Caurus. [BYBLIS.]

Caurus (ἡ Καῦρος: Καῦριος: ruins at Daliar), one of the chief cities of Caria, on its S. coast, a little E. of the mouth of the Calbis, in a very fertile but unhealthy situation. It had a citadel called Imbros, an enclosed harbour for ships of war, and safe roads for merchant vessels. It was founded by the Cretans: after B.C. 300 it was subject to the Rhodians. Its dried figs (Cauneae ficus) were celebrated. The painter Protogenes was born here (Strab. p. 652; Hdt. i. 172; Cic. ad. Q. Fr. i. 1; Plin. v. 103).

Caurus, the Argestes (Ἀργέστης) of the Greeks, the NW. wind, in Italy a stormy wind.

Cavari, a people on the E. bank of the Rhone, between the mouths of the Druentia and the Isara (Strab. p. 185).

Cavarinus, a Senonian, whom Caesar made king of his people, was expelled by his subjects and compelled to fly to Caesar, B.C. 54.

Caÿstrus (Καÿστρος, Ion. Καÿστρωσ: or Kuchuk-Meinder, i.e. Little Maeander), a river of Lydia and Ionia, rising in the E. part of Mount Tmolus), and flowing between the ranges of Tmolus and Messogis into the Aegean, a little NW. of Ephesus. To this day it abounds in swans, as it did in Homer's time. The valley of the Caÿstrus is called by Homer 'the Asian meadow,' and is probably the district to which the name of Asia was first applied. There was an inland town of the same name on its S. bank (Hom. Il. ii. 461; Strab. p. 627; Verg. Georg. i. 383, Aen. vii. 699).

Caÿstrou Pedion (Καÿστρου πεδῖον), a town of Phrygia (Xen. An. i. 2, 11). It is probably right to identify it as the town afterwards called Julia, near Ipsus and a little NE. of Synnada.

Ceba (Ceva), a town in the Ligurian Apennines, near the source of the Tanarus, famous for its cheeses (Plin. xi. 241).

Cebenna Mons (τὸ Κέμμενον ὄρος: Cévennes), mountains in the S. of Gaul, separating the Arverni from the Helvii: Caesar found them in the winter covered with snow 6 feet deep (Caes. B. G. vii. 8; Strab. p. 177).

Cēbēs (Κέβης), of Thebes, a disciple and friend of Socrates, was present at the death of his teacher. He wrote philosophical works, which have perished; for the treatise called Πίναξ, or Picture, ascribed to him is spurious. This work is an allegorical picture of human life, which is explained by an old man to a circle of youths.—Editions. By Schweighäuser, Argent. 1806, and by Coraes in his edition of Epictetus, Paris, 1826.

Cēbrēnē (Κεβρήνη), a city in the Troad, on M. Ida, fell into decay when Antigonos transplanted its inhabitants to Alexandria Troas. A little river, flowing past it, was called Cebren (Κεβρήν), and the district Cebrenia.

Cecropia. [CECROPS.]

Cecrops (Κέκρωψ), said to have been the first king of Attica (Apollod. iii. 14). He was married to Agraulos, daughter of Actaeus, by whom he had a son, Erysichthon, who succeeded him as king of Athens, and 3 daughters, Agraulos, Herse, and Pandrosos. [See these names.] In his reign Poseidon and Athene contended for the possession of Attica, but Cecrops decided in favour of the goddess (Hdt. viii. 55; Paus. i. 26, 6; ATHENE). Cecrops is said to have founded Athens, the citadel of which was called Cecropia after him, to have divided Attica into 12 communities, and to have introduced the first elements of civilised life. (Paus. ix. 33; Strab. p. 407.) He is sometimes called διφνής or geminus (Diod. i. 23; Ov. Met. ii. 555; cf. Aristoph. Vesp. 438), because the upper part of his body was represented as that of a man and the lower part as that of a serpent, by which was symbolised his origin as earth-born or autochthonous: he is thus represented on an Athenian terracotta (now at Berlin) when he is present at the birth of Erichthonius. Later Greek writers made Cecrops to be a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony of Egyptians into Attica (Diod. i. 29).

Cecryphalia (Κεκρυφάλεια: Angistri), a small island in the Saronic gulf, between Aegina and Epidaurus (Thuc. i. 105; Diod. xi. 78).

Cedrēae (Κεδρέαι or -εἶαι, Κεδρεάτης or -αῖος), a town of Caria, on the Ceramic Gulf.

Cedrēnus, Georgius, a Byzantine writer, author of a historical work, which begins with the creation of the world, and goes down to A.D. 1057. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1838-39.

Celaenae (Κελαναί, Κελαυνίτης: Dener), the greatest city of S. Phrygia, before the rise of its neighbour, Apamea Cibotus, reduced it to insignificance. It lay at the sources of the rivers Maeander and Marsyas. In the midst of it was a citadel built by Xerxes on a precipitous rock, at the foot of which, in the Agora of the city, the Marsyas took its rise, and near the river's source was a grotto celebrated by tradition as the scene of the punishment of Marsyas by Apollo. Outside of the city was a royal palace, with pleasure gardens and a great park (παράδεισος) full of game, which was generally the residence of a satrap. The Maeander took its rise in the very palace, and flowed through the park and the city, below which it received the Marsyas (Hdt. vii. 28; Xen. An. i. 2, 7; Liv. xxxviii. 13; Strab. p. 577).

Célaeno (Κελαϊνώ). 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, beloved by Poseidon.—2. One of the Harpies. [HARPIAE.]

Celēia (Cilli), an important town in the SE. of Noricum, and a Roman colony with the surname Claudia, was in the middle ages the capital of a Slavonic state called Zellia (Plin. iii. 146; C. I. L. iii. 5154).

Celēndēris (Κελένδερης; Khelindreh), a seaport town of Cilicia, said to have been founded by the Phoenicians, and afterwards colonised by the Samians. The acropolis was strongly placed on a rock (Tac. Ann. ii. 80; Mel. i. 13).

Celenna, a town of Campania (Verg. Aen. vii. 739).

Cēler, together with Severus, the architect of Nero's immense palace, the golden house. He and Severus projected and even began a canal from the lake Avernus to the Tiber. (Tac. Ann. xv. 42).

Cēler, P. Egnātius. [BAREA.]

Celetrum (Kastoria), a town in Macedonia on a peninsula of the Lacus Castoris (Liv. xxxi. 40).

Cēlēūs (Κηλεός), king of Eleusis, husband of Metanira, and father of Demophon and Triptolemus. He received Demeter with hospitality at Eleusis, when she was wandering in search of her daughter. The goddess, in return, wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and placed him in the fire in order to destroy his mortal parts; but Metanira screamed aloud at the sight, and Demophon was destroyed by the flames. Demeter then bestowed great favours upon Triptolemus. [TRIPTOLEMUS.] Celeus is described as the first priest and his daughters as the first priestesses of Demeter at Eleusis. [See further under DEMETER.]

Celsa (Velilla Ru., nr. Xelsa), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis on the Iberus, with a stone bridge over this river, a Roman colony called Victrix Julia Celsa (Strab. p. 161).

Celsus. 1. A military tribune in Africa who in the 12th year of Gallienus, A.D. 265, was proclaimed emperor by the proconsul of the province. He was slain on the 7th day of his usurpation (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr.).—2. An Epicurean philosopher, lived in the time of the Antonines, and was a friend of Lucian. He is supposed to be the same as the Celsus who wrote the work against Christianity called Λόγος ἀληθής, which acquired so much notoriety from the answer written to it by Origen.—

3. A. Cornelius Celsus, probably lived under the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He wrote several works, of which only one remains entire, his treatise De Medicina, 'On Medicine,' in 8 books. The first two books are principally occupied by the consideration of diet, and the general principles of therapeutics and pathology; the remaining books are devoted to the consideration of particular diseases and their treatment; the third and fourth to internal diseases; the fifth and sixth to external diseases, and to pharmaceutical preparations; and the last two to those diseases which more particularly belong to surgery.—Editions. By Milligan, Edinb.

1826; by Ritter and Albers, Colon. ad Rhen. 1835.—4. Julius Celsus, a scholar at Constantinople in the 7th century after Christ, made a recension of the text of Caesar's Commentaries. Many modern writers have attributed to him the Life of Caesar which was in reality written by Petrarch.—5. P. Juventius Celsus, two Roman jurists, father and son, both of whom are cited in the Digest. Very little is known of the elder Celsus. The younger Celsus, who was the more celebrated, lived under Nerva and Trajan, by whom he was highly favoured.

He wrote Digesta in 39 books, Epistolae, Quaestiones, and Institutiones in 7 books (Plin. Ep. vi. 5).—6. P. Marius Celsus, an able general first of Galba and afterwards of Otho. After the defeat of Otho's army at the battle of Bedriacum, Celsus was pardoned by Vitellius, and was allowed by him to enter on the consulship in July (A.D. 69).

Celsus Albinovanus. [ALBINOVANUS.]

Celtae, a powerful race, which occupied a great part of W. Europe. The Greek and Roman writers call them by three names, which are probably only variations of one name, namely Celtae (Κελταί, Κελτοί), Galatae (Γαλάται), and Galli. Their name was originally given to all the people of N. and W. Europe who were not Iberians, and it was not till the time of Caesar that the Romans perceived the distinction between the Celts and the Germans: the name of Celts then began to be confined to the people between the Pyrenees and the Rhine. The Celts belonged to the great Indo-Germanic race, as their language proves, and, at a period long antecedent to all historical records, settled in the W. of Europe. The most powerful part of the nation appears to have taken up their abode in the centre of the country called after them GALLIA, between the Garumna in the S. and the Sequana and Matrona in the N. From this country they spread over various parts of Europe, and they appear in early times as a migratory race, ready to abandon their homes, and settle in any district which their swords could win. Besides the Celts in Gallia, there were eight other different settlements of the nation, which may be distinguished by the following names:—1. Iberian Celts, who crossed the Pyrenees and settled in Spain [CELTIBERI]. 2. British Celts [BRITANNIA]. 3. Belgic Celts, the inhabitants of Gallia Belgica, at a later time much mingled with Germans. 4. Italian Celts, who crossed the Alps at different periods, and eventually occupied the greater part of the N. of Italy, which was called after them GALLIA CISALPINA. 5. Celts in the Alps and on the Danube, namely the Helvetii, Gothini, Osi, Vindelici, Raeti, Norici, and Carni. 6. Pyllyrian Celts, who, under the name of Scordisci, settled on Mt. Scordus. 7. Macedonian and Thracian Celts, who had remained behind in Macedonia, when the Celts invaded Greece, and who are rarely mentioned. 8. Asiatic Celts, the Tolistobogi, Trocmi, and Tectosages, who founded the kingdom of GALATIA.—Some ancient writers divided the Celts into two great races, one consisting of the Celts in the S. and centre of Gaul, in Spain, and in the N. of Italy, who were the proper Celts, and the other consisting of the Celtic tribes on the shores of the Ocean and in the E. as far as Scythia, who were called Gauls: to the latter race the Cimbri belonged, and they are considered by some to be identical with the Cimmerii of the Greeks.—The Celts in outward appearance were distinguished from Greeks and Romans by their slaggy hair and long moustaches, and are described by the ancient writers as men of large stature, of fair complexion, and with flaxen or red hair, 'procera corpora, flava caesaries, trucos oculi.' The Celtic element in France at the present time preserves the old Celtic characteristic of a quick and lively temper, but not those bodily characteristics which are nearer the German type than the French. They hold good more generally in the highlands of Scotland and in Wales. They were brave and warlike, impatient of control and prone to change. They fought with long swords; their first charge in battle was the most formidable, but if firmly resisted, they usually gave way. They were long the terror of the Romans; once they took Rome, and laid it in ashes (B.C. 390).—For details respecting their later history and political organisation, see GALLIA; GALATIA.

Celtibēri (Κελτιβήρες), a powerful people in Spain, consisting of Celts who crossed the Pyrenees at an early period and became mingled with the Iberians, the original inhabitants of the country. They dwelt chiefly in the central part of Spain, in the highlands which separate the Iberus from the rivers which flow towards the W., and in which the Tagus and the Durus rise. They were divided into various tribes, the AREVACAE, BERONES, and PELENDONES, which were the three most important, the LUSONES, BELLI, DITTANI, &c. Their chief towns were SEGOBRIGA, NUMANTIA, BILBILIS, &c. Their country called Celtiberia was mountainous and unproductive. They were a brave and warlike people, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They submitted to Scipio Africanus in the 2nd Punic war, but the oppressions of the Roman governors led them to rebel, and for many years they successfully defied the power of Rome. They were reduced to submission on the capture of Numantia by Scipio Africanus the younger (B.C. 134), but they again took up arms under Sertorius, and it was not till his death (72) that they began to adopt the Roman customs and language. (Diod. v. 33; Liv. xxv. 33; Polyb. xxxv. 1; Strab. p. 151.)

Celtici. 1. A Celtic people in Lusitania between the Tagus and Anas.—2. A Celtic people in Gallaecia near the promontory Nerium, which was called Celticum after them (C. Finisterre).

Cema, or Caenia, a mountain in the Maritime Alps, which Pliny (iii. 35) mentions as the source of the Varus (Var).

Cēmēnēlum (Cimella or Cimiez), a town in the Maritime Alps, two miles N. of Nice.

Cenaëum (Κηναῖον ἄκρον: Kanaia or Litar), the NW. promontory of Euboea, opposite Thermopylae, with a temple of Zeus Cenaëus (Strab. p. 444).

Cenchrēae (Κεγχρῆαι). 1. The E. harbour of Corinth on the Saronic gulf, important for the trade and commerce with the E.—2. A town in Argolis, S. of Argos, on the road to Tegea.

Cenomāni, a powerful Gallic people, originally a branch of the AULERCI, crossed the Alps at an early period, and settled in the N. of Italy in the country of Brixia, Verona, and Mantua, and extended N. as far as the confines of Rhaetia (Polyb. ii. 17; Liv. v. 35). They were at constant feud with the neighbouring tribes of the Insubres, Boii, &c., and hence usually assisted the Romans in their wars with these people. In the 2nd Punic war they sided with Rome, except during the Gallic revolt on Hasdrubal's approach. (Liv. xxi. 55, xxxi. 10; Strab. p. 216.)

Censorinus. 1. One of the 30 tyrants, assumed the purple at Bologna, A.D. 270, but was shortly afterwards put to death by his own soldiers (Treb. Trig. Tyr. 33).—2. Author of a treatise entitled de Die Natali, which treats of the generation of man, of his natal hour, of the influence of the stars and genii upon his career, and discusses the various methods employed for the division and calculation of time. The book is dedicated to Q. Cerebellius, and was composed A.D. 238. A fragment de Metris and lost tracts de Accentibus and de Geometria are ascribed to this Censorinus.—Editions. Otto Jahn, 1845; Hulstsch, 1867.

Censorinus, Marcius. 1. C., son of C. Marcius Rutilus, first plebeian dictator (B.C. 356), was originally called Rutilus, and was the first member of the family who had the surname Censorinus. He was consul in B.C. 310, and conducted the war in Samnium. He was censor 294, and a second time 265, the only instance in which a person held the office of censor twice (Liv. ix. 33, x. 47; Val. Max. iv. 1, 3).—2. L., consul 149, the first year of the third Punic war, conducted the war against Carthage with his colleague M'. Manilius.—3. C., one of the leaders of the Marian party, fought against Sulla in the battle near the Colline gate, was taken prisoner, and put to death by Sulla's order. Censorinus was one of the orators of his time, and versed in Greek literature (Appian, B. C. i. 71–93; Cic. Brut. 67, 90).—4. L., a partisan of M. Antony, praetor 43, and consul 39.—5. C., consul B.C. 8, died in Asia A.D. 2, while in attendance upon C. Caesar, the grandson of Augustus (Vell. Pat. ii. 102).

Centauri (Κένταυροι), a mythical race inhabiting the mountains of Thessaly, represented as in form half horses and half men. In Homer there is no certain allusion to their semi-equine form. In the Iliad they are called φήρες (= θήρες), possibly = 'wild men': in the Odyssey they bear the name Κένταυροι, and are spoken of as intemperate (Il. i. 268, ii. 743; Od. xxi. 295). We have various genealogies: (1) that they sprang from Centaurus, the offspring of Ixion and a cloud, who mingled with Magnesian mares (Pind. Pyth. ii. 80), or that they were born directly from Ixion and the cloud (Diod. iv. 69); (2) that they were born from Apollo and Hebe, a daughter of Peneus (Diod. l.c.). The most famous of the legends connected with them, and a favourite subject for sculpture, is the fight of the Centaurs and the Lapithae, which arose from an insult offered to Hippodamia by Eurytion, one of the Centaurs, inflamed by wine, at the marriage-feast of PEIRITHOUS: the Centaurs were driven away to Mt. Pindus. Theseus is brought into the story as aiding Peirithous in the battle (Pind. Fr. 143; Plut. Thes. 30; Diod. iv. 70; Ov. Met. xii. 210; Hor. Od. i. 18, 8). Similar stories of the unbridled passions of the Centaurs are given in the attack of Nessus upon Deianira, and the fight between Heracles and the Centaurs at the cave of PHOLUS (Pans. vii. 18; Soph. Trach. 55; Eur. Herc. Fur. 364; Apollod. ii. 5, 4). As regards the origin and significance of these myths, some adduce the story of Ixion to show that the idea of Centaurs arose from tracing a likeness to the Centaur shape in clouds; others rely on their supposed descent from Apollo to prove that they represented rays of the sun; others note their descent from a river god, and suggest that the Centaurs are the violent streams which rush from the mountains of Thessaly. It is indeed possible that a fancied likeness in cloud-shapes or torrents may have caused the various genealogies to be added to the traditions; but the origin of the myth was probably simpler, and started with those who first beheld an equestrian tribe from the North settling in Thessaly at a time when horses were not ridden in Greece, and imagined the horse and its rider to be one being. The name 'bull-spearers' or 'bull-goaders' (κεντεῖν: ταῦρος) suggests either the hunting of bulls by mounted Thessalians (Schol. ad Pind. l.c.), or the driving of bulls by mounted 'cowboys' (Serv. ad Georg. iii. 115). But whatever the origin of the myth, the Centaurs, like the Satyrs, represented unbridled animal passions, and the combats with Centaurs recorded the strife between civilisation and barbarism. CHIRON alone among them has been made an instance of learning and culture. In art of an archaic type they are represented with the fore part, including the legs, human, having the hind quarters of a horse attached: the more familiar type, from the sculptures of the Parthenon onwards, showed them as men from the head to the loins, while in the rest of the body, the four legs, and the tail, they are horses. The female Centaur is described by Lucian, Zeuxis, 3 (cf. Ov. Met. xii. 393), and appears in a Florentine cameo suckling an infant Centaur.

Centrites (Κεντρίτης: Bohtan-tschai), a small river of Armenia, which it divided from the land of the Carduchi, N. of Assyria. It rises in the mountains S. of the Arsissa Palus (L. Van), and flows into the Tigris. (Xen. Anab. iv. 3.)

Centumālus, Fulvius. 1. Cn., legate of the dictator M. Valerius Corvus B.C. 301; consul 298, when he gained a victory over the Samnites; and propraetor 295, when he defeated the Etruscans (Liv. x. 26).—2. Cn., consul 229, defeated the Illyrians subject to the queen Teuta (Polyb. ii. 5).—3. Cn., curulo aedile 214; praetor 213, with Suessula as his province; and consul 211; in the next year he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonia in Apulia, and was killed in the battle (Liv. xxiv. 43, 44, xxvii. 1).—4. M., praetor urbanus 192, superintended the preparations for the war against Antiochus the Great (Liv. xxxv. 20).

Centumcellae (Civitas Vecchia), a seaport town in Etruria, 47 miles from Rome, first became a place of importance under Trajan, who built a villa there and constructed an excellent harbour with a lighthouse at each end of the breakwater (Plin. Ep. vi. 31). It was destroyed by the Saracens in the 9th century, but was rebuilt on its ancient site, and was hence called Civitas Vecchia.

Centūripae (τὰ Κεντόριπα, αἱ Κεντούριπα: Κεντοριπίνος, in Thuc. οἱ Κεντόριπες, Centuripinus: Centorbi), an ancient town of the Siculi in Sicily, at the foot of Mt. Aetna, on the road from Catana to Panormus, and not far from the river Symaethus; in its neighbourhood a great quantity of corn was grown, and it became under the Romans one of the most flourishing cities in the island. (Thuc. vi. 96; Diod. xiv. 78; Strab. p. 272; Cic. Verr. ii. 67, 69, iii. 6, 45.)

Cēos (Κέως, Ion. Κέος: Κείος, Ion. Κήιος, Cēus: Zēa), an island in the Aegæan Sea, one of the Cyclades, between the Attic promontory Sunium and the island Cythnus, celebrated for its fertile soil and its genial climate. It was inhabited by Ionians, and originally contained 4 towns, Iūlis, Carthaea, Coressus, and Poëessa; but the two latter perished by an earthquake. SIMONIDES was a native of the island.

Cēphālē (Κεφαλή), an Attic demus, on the right bank of the Erasinus, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Cēphallēnia (Κεφαλληνία, Κεφαλονία: Κεφαλήνη, pl. Κεφαλλήνες: Cephalonia), called by Homer Same (Σάμη) or Samos (Σάμος) (Il. ii. 634; Od. iv. 671, ix. 24), the largest island in the Ionian sea, separated from Ithaca on the E. by a narrow channel, contains 348 square miles. It is said to have been originally inhabited by Taphians, and to have derived its name from the mythical CEPHALUS. Even in Homer its inhabitants are called Cephalenae, and are the subjects of Odysseus: but the name Cephallenia first occurs in Herodotus (Il. ii. 631; Od. xx. 210; Hdt. ix. 28). The island is very mountainous (παπαλοέσση); and the highest mountain, called Aenos, on which stood a temple of Zeus, rises more than 4000 feet above the sea. Cephallenia was a tetrapolis, containing the 4 towns, SAME, PALE, CRANII, and PRONI. It never attained political importance. In the Persian wars the inhabitants of Pale are alone mentioned. In the Peloponnesian war Cephallenia surrendered to the Athenians. Same ventured to oppose the Romans, but was taken by M. Fulvius, B.C. 189. (Strab. pp. 455, 461; Thuc. ii. 30; Liv. xxxvii. 13; Polyb. xxii. 13, 23.)

Cēphāloedium (Κεφαλοίδιον: Cephaloeditanus; Cefali or Cephalu), a Sicel town, which took a Greek name, on the N. coast of Sicily in the territory of Himera. (Diod. xiv. 56; Strab. p. 266.)

Cēphālus (Κέφαλος). 1. A young man of great beauty, beloved by Eos (Aurora) and carried off by her. He is generally explained as representing the morning star which disappears at the approach of dawn. One legend makes him the son of Hermes and Herse (dew): he dwells with Eos in the East, and their son is Tithonus (Apollod. iii. 14). In other accounts Tithonus is the husband of Eos; and the son of Eos and Cephalus is Phaethon (Hes. Th. 986; Pans. i. 3). The most famous and poetical story of Cephalus makes him the son of Deion and Diomedea, and husband of Procris or Procne, daughter of Erechtheus, whom he tenderly loved. He was beloved by Eos, but as he rejected her advances from love to his wife, she advised him to try the fidelity of Procris. The goddess then metamorphosed him into a stranger, and sent him with rich presents to his house. Procris was tempted by the brilliant presents to yield to the stranger, who then discovered himself to be her husband, whereupon she fled in shame to Crete. Artemis made her a present of a dog called Laelaps (λαΐλαψ, storm) and a spear which were never to miss their object, and then sent her back to Cephalus in disguise. In order to obtain this dog and spear, Cephalus promised his love: Procris then made herself known to him as his wife, and this led to a reconciliation between them. Procris, however, still feared the love of Eos, and therefore jealously watched Cephalus when he went out hunting. Once, having heard him call upon the breeze (aura), and taking this to imply a mistress named Aura, she watched him, hidden in a bush. Cephalus, thinking that some animal was stirring the leaves, killed her with the never-failing spear. (Ov. Met. vii. 660-865; Apollod. iii. 15; Hyg. Fab. 189.) He is said to have been banished for this homicide by the Areiopagus and to have gone to Thebes, where his dog became useful for hunting a destructive fox (Paus. ix. 19). Subsequently Cephalus fought with Amphitryon against the Teleboans, upon the conquest of whom he was rewarded with the island which he called after his own name Cephalonia (Strab. p. 456). Clearly a number of local traditions, Athenian, Cretan, Theban, and Cephalonian, have gathered round the name of Cephalus; some from legends of hunters and huntresses, the last from the similarity of name.

—2. A Syracusan, and father of the orator Lysias, came to Athens at the invitation of Pericles. He is one of the speakers in Plato's Republic.

—3. An eminent Athenian orator of the Collytean demus, flourished B.C. 402.

Cēpheus (Κηφεύς). 1. King of Ethiopia, son of Belus, husband of Cassiopeia, and father of Andromeda, was placed among the stars after his death (Hdt. vii. 61; Hor. Od. iii. 29; ANDROMEDA).—2. Son of Aleus and Neaera or Cleobule, one of the Argonauts. He was king of Tegea in Arcadia, and perished, with most of his sons, in an expedition against Heracles.

Cēphīsia or Cephissia (Κηφισία more correct than Κηφισσία: Κηφισιεύς: Κιβισία), one of the 12 Cecropian towns of Attica, and afterwards a demus belonging to the tribe Erechtheis, N.E. of Athens, on the W. slope of Mt. Pentelicus.

Cēphisōdōrus (Κηφισόδωρος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, about B.C. 402.—2. An Athenian orator, a disciple of Isocrates, wrote an apology for Isocrates against Aristotle, entitled αἱ πρὸς Ἀριστοτέλη ἀντιγραφαί: it is probable that it was this Cephisodorus who wrote a History of the Sacred War.

Cēphisōdōtus (Κηφισόδοτος). 1. An Athenian who led a fleet to Thrace in B.C. 359 with so little success that he was recalled and prosecuted: whether he was the same person as the orator Cephisodotus is disputed (Dem. c. Lept. p. 501, § 146; c. Aristocr. p. 670, § 153).—2. An Athenian sculptor, father of PRAXITELES. He belonged to that younger school of Attic artists who early in the 4th cent. B.C. were passing from the sterner majesty of Phidias to the idealised grace and beauty which were perfected by Praxiteles. The statue, now at Munich, of Eireno and the infant Plutus (called the Lencothica) is a copy of his work (Paus. ix. 16). It is interesting to trace a similar position of the infant Dionysus in the great statue of Praxiteles. (Plin. xxxiv. 74; Paus. vii. 80, 5.)—3. An Athenian sculptor, called the Younger, a son of the great Praxiteles, flourished 300 (Plin. xxxvi. 24).

Cēphisōphon (Κηφισοφῶν), a friend of Euripides, is said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them.

Cēphisus or Cephissus (Κηφισός, Κηφισσός). 1. The chief river in Phocis and Boeotia (now Mavronerī), rises near Liliaea in Phocis, flows through a fertile valley in Phocis and Boeotia, and falls into the lake Copais, which is hence called Cephissis in the Iliad (v. 709). [COPAIS.]—2. The largest river of the Athenian plain, rises in the W. slope of Mt. Pentelics, and flows past Athens on the W. into the Saronic gulf between Phalerum and Peiraeus.—3. Another river of Attica, rising in Mt. Icarus on the borders of Megaris, and flowing into the sea at Eleusis, now Sarantaporos.—4. A river of Argolis, tributary of the Inachus.

Cer (Κήρ, Κήρες). [MOIRAE.]

Ceramicus Sinus (Gulf of Givona), a bay in Caria between Halicarnassus and Cnidus: on the north side of this bay stood the town of Ceramus which gave the name (Strab. p. 656).—Ceramicus, a district of Athens. [ATHENAE.]

Ceramon Agora (Islam Keui), a town of Phrygia on the 'royal road' from Susa to Sardis. (Xen. Anab. i. 2, 10).

Cērāsus (Κερασούς: Κερασούντιος: nr. Kheresoun), a flourishing colony of Sinope, on the coast of Pontus, at the mouth of a river of the same name; chiefly celebrated as the place from which Europe obtained both the cherry and its name. Lucullus is said to have brought back plants of the cherry with him to Rome, but this refers probably only to some particular sorts, as the Romans seem to have had the tree much earlier.—Cerasus fell into decay after the foundation of Pharmacia (Kheresoun). (Xen. Anab. v. 3, 2; Plin. xv. 102.)

Cērāta (τὰ Κέρατα), the Horns, a mountain on the frontiers of Attica and Megaris.

Ceraunī Montes (Κεραύνια ὄρη: Khimara), a range of mountains extending from the frontier of Illyricum along the coast of Epirus, derived their name from the frequent thunderstorms which occurred among them. These mountains made the coast of Epirus dangerous (Hor. Od. i. 3, 20). They were also called Acroceraunia, though this name was properly applied to the promontory separating the Adriatic and Ionian seas. The inhabitants of these mountains were called Ceraunii (Caes. B.C. iii. 6).

Cerberus (Κέρβερος), the dog that guarded the entrance of Hades, is mentioned as early as the Homeric poems, but simply as 'the dog,' and without the name of Cerberus (Il. viii. 368, Od. xi. 623). Hesiod calls him a son of Typhon and Echidna, and represents him with 50 heads. Later writers describe him as a monster with only 3 heads, with the tail of a serpent and with serpents round his neck. Some poets again call him many-headed or hundred-headed. The den of Cerberus is placed on the further side of the Styx, at the spot where Charon landed the shades of the departed. [HADES.]

Cercasōrum or -us or -esūra (Κερκασῶρος πόλις, Hdt., Κερκέσουρα, Strab., El-Arkas), a city of Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, at the point where the river divided into its 3 principal branches, the E. or Pelusiac, the W. or Canopic, and the N. between them.

Cercētae or -ii (Κερκείται, the Circassians), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, beyond the Cimmerian Bosphorus, on the E. coast of the Palus Maeotis (Strab. p. 496; Plin. vi. 16).

Cerberus. (From a bronze statue.)

Cercetius, a mountain in Thessaly, part of the range of Pindus.

Cercina and Cercinītis (Κερκίνα, Κερκινίτις: Karkenah Is., Ramlah, and Gherba), 2 low islands off the N. coast of Africa, in the mouth of the Lesser Syrtis, united by a bridge, and possessing a fine harbour. Cercina was the larger, and had on it a town of the same name. (Strab. pp. 123, 831.)

Cercinē (Κερκίνη: Kara-dagh), a mountain in Macedonia, between the Axios and Strymon.

Cercinītis (Κερκινίτις), a lake in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Strymon, through which this river flows.

Cerciniūm, a town in Thessaly between Larissa and Pherae.

Cerco, Q. Lutātius, consul with A. Manlius Torquatus, B.C. 241, in conjunction with his colleague, subdued the Falisci or people of Falerii, who revolted from the Romans.

Cercopes (Κέρκωπες), droll and thievish gnomes, robbed Heracles in his sleep, but were taken prisoners by him, and either given to Omphale, or killed, or set free again. Some placed them at Thermopylae (Hdt. vii. 216); but the comic poem Cercopces, which bore the name of Homer, probably placed them at Oechalia in Euboea. Others transferred them to Lydia, or the islands called Pithecusae, which derived their name from the Cercopes who were changed into monkeys by Zeus for having deceived him. (Ov. Met. xiv. 90; Diod. iv. 81; Mela, ii. 7; Suid. s.v.)

Cercops (Κέρκωψ). 1. One of the oldest Orphic poets, also called a Pythagorean, was the author of an epic poem, 'on the descent of Orpheus to Hades' (Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 333; cf. Cic. N. D. i. 38.).—2. Of Miletus, the contemporary and rival of Hesiod, is said to have been the author of an epic poem called Aegimius, which is also ascribed to Hesiod (Diog. Laërt. ii. 46; Athen. p. 503).

Cercyon (Κερκίων), son of Poseidon or Hephaestus, a cruel tyrant at Eleusis, put to death his daughter ALOPE, and killed all strangers whom he overcame in wrestling; he was in the end conquered and slain by THESEUS.

Cerdylium (Κερδύλιον), a small town in Macedonia on the right bank of the Strymon, opposite AMPHIPOLIS.

Cērēālis, Pētilius, served under Vettius Bolanus, in Britain, A.D. 61; was one of the generals who supported the claim of Vespasian to the empire, 69; suppressed the revolt of Civilis on the Rhine, 70; and was governor of Britain, 71, when he conquered a great part of the Brigantes (Tac. Hist. v. 14, Agr. 8, 17).

Cereātae (Casamari), a town in Latium, in the territory of Arpinum, and the actual birth-place of Marius (Κιρραῖται, Plut. Mar. 3), who probably made it a municipium (Plin. iii. 63).

Cērēs. [DEMETER.]

Cerfenina, a town of the Marsi on the Via Valeria, at the pass leading to Corfinium.

Cerilli (Cirella Vecchia), a town in Bruttium on the coast, S. of the mouth of the Laus.

Cerinthus (Κήρινθος), a town on the E. coast of Euboea, on the river Budorus.

Cernē (Κέρνη: prob. Arguin), an island off the W. coast of Africa, to which the Phoenicians traded (Ptol. vi. 4; Scyl. Peripl. 53).

Cerretāni, an Iberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis, in the modern Cerdagna, in the Pyrenees, subsequently divided into two tribes, the Juliani and Augustani (Plin. iii. 23).

Cersobleptes (Κερσοβλέπτης), son of Cotys, king of Thrace, on whose death in B.C. 353 he inherited the kingdom in conjunction with Berisades and Amadocus. As an ally of the Athenians, Cersobleptes became involved in war with Philip, by whom he was defeated and reduced to the condition of a tributary, 343. (Dem. Phil. iii. 114; Diod. xvi. 70.)

Cersus (Κέρσος: Merkes), a river of Cilicia, flowing through the Pylae Syro-Ciliciae, into the E. side of the Gulf of Issus.

Certōnium (Κερτόνιον), a town in Mysia, mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. vii. 8, 8).

Cervidius Scaevola. [SCAEVOLA.]

Cerus, an old Latin name for the deity of creative power, is from the same root as creare and Ceres: hence in the hymns of the Salii 'Cerus manus,' or 'Cerus duonus' = creator bonus (Varr. L. L. vii. 26; C. I. L. i. 46).

Cerynīa (Κερυνία: Girne), a town of Cyprus on the north coast between Lapethus and Aphrodisium.

Ceryx (Κήρυξ), an Attic hero, son of Hermes and Aglauros, from whom the priestly family of the Ceryces at Athens derived their origin. According to the Eleusinian tradition, however, Ceryx, from whom they were descended, was a younger son of Eumolpus. It is probable that the Ceryces were an Athenian family which at some time took the place of an Eleusinian family of priests. [Dict. Ant. art. Eleusinia.]

Cestrinē (Κεστρίνη), a district of Epirus in the S. of Chaonia and N. of the Thyamis, said to have been formerly called Camnania, and to have derived its later name from Cestrinus, son of Helenus. (Thuc. i. 46; Paus. i. 11.)

Cestrus (Κέστρος: Ak-su), a considerable river of Pamphylia, flowing from the Taurus southwards into the Mediterranean. It was navigable in its lower course, at least as far as the city of Perge, which stood on its W. bank, 60 stadia above its mouth. (Strab. p. 667.)

Cetēi (Κήτειοι), mentioned in Od. xi. 521 as fighting on the Trojan side under Eurypylos, a prince from the southern part of Asia Minor. In this people (and in the legends of Memnon) we have probably the Homeric tradition of the Hittites (the Kheta of Egyptian monuments), who seem to have migrated from Armenia into the Semitic countries, and founded a great empire, extending from their two capitals, Kadesh on the Orontes and Carchemish (=Ninus Vetus) on the Euphrates, through a great part of Asia Minor as far as the Aegæan. The time of their greatest power was about the 14th century B.C., when they united the tribes of a great part of Asia Minor in their wars against Ramses II., which ended after the great battle of Kadesh in an alliance on no unequal terms with Egypt. The monuments between Smyrna and Ephesus, mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 106) as Egyptian, are really Hittite, and mark their conquests westward. Their empire gradually dwindled and ended with the fall of Carchemish B.C. 717. Their chief deity was the goddess Atargates [see APHRODITE], whose priestesses are held by some to be the origin of the myths of the Amazons. [AMAZONES; MEMNON.]

Cethëgus, Cornélius, an ancient patrician family. They seem to have kept up an old fashion of wearing the toga without a tunica beneath, the toga being folded round the body like a girdle as in the cinctus Gabinus [see Dict. Ant. art. Toga], to which Horace alludes in the words cinctuti Cethegi (Ars Poët. 50); and Lucan (ii. 543) describes the associate of Catiline thus, exsertique manus vesana Cethegi. 1. M., curule aedile and pontifex maximus B.C. 213; praetor 211, when he had the charge of Apulia, censor 209, and consul 204. In the next year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where he defeated Mago, brother of Hannibal. He died 196. His eloquence was rated very high, so that Ennius gave him the name of Suadæ medulla, and Horace twice refers to him as an ancient authority for the usage of Latin words. (Cic. de Sen. 14, 50; Hor. Epist. ii. 2, 116, Ars Poët. 50.)—2. C., commanded in Spain as proconsul 200 (Liv. xxxi. 49); was aedile 199; consul 197, when he defeated the Insubrians and Cenomanians in Cisalpine Gaul; and censor 194.—3. P., curule aedile 187, praetor 185, and consul 181. The grave of Numa was discovered in his consulship (Plut. Num. 22).—4. M., consul 160, when he drained a part of the Pomptine Marshes.—5. P., a friend of Marius, proscribed by Sulla, 88, but in 83 went over to Sulla, and was pardoned.—6. C., one of Catiline's crew, was a profligate from his early youth. When Catiline left Rome, 63, after Cicero's first speech, Cethegus stayed behind under the orders of Lentulus. His charge was to murder the leading senators; but the tardiness of Lentulus prevented anything being done. Cethegus was arrested and condemned to death with the other conspirators. (Sall. Cat. 46–55; Lucan, ii. 543.)

Cëtius (Κήτειος), a small river of Mysia, flowing from the N., and falling into the Caïcus close to Pergamum (Plin. v. 126).

Centrōnes or Centrōnes, a people in Gallia Belgica, dependents of the Nervii.

Cëyx (Κήϋξ), king of Trachys, husband of Alcyone. His death is differently related. [ALCYONE.] He was the father of Hippasus, who fell fighting as the ally of Heracles.

Chabōras (Χαβόρας: Khabur), a river of Mesopotamia which rises in Mt. Marius and flows S. into the Euphrates at Circesium (Ptol. v. 18; Procop. B. P. ii. 5). Its name varied (prob. in different parts of its course): it appears as Aborrhās in Strab. p. 747; Ammian. xiv. 3; and as Araxes in Xen. Anab. i. 4, 19.

Chabrias (Χαβρίας), a celebrated Athenian general. In B.C. 392 he succeeded Iphicrates in the command of the Athenian forces at Corinth.

In 388 he assisted Evagoras in Cyprus against the Persians. In 378 he was one of the commanders of the forces sent to the aid of Thebes against Agesilaus, when he adopted for the first time that manœuvre for which he became so celebrated,—ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. A statue was afterwards erected at Athens to Chabrias in this posture. In 376 he gained an important victory off Naxos over the Lacedæmonian fleet under the command of Pollis. In 361 he took the command of the naval force of Tachos, king of Egypt, who was in rebellion against Persia. In 358 he was sent as the Athenian commander in Thrace, but was compelled by Charidemus to make a peace unfavourable to Athens. On the breaking out of the Social war in 357, Chabrias commanded the Athenian fleet. At the siege of Chios he sailed into the harbour before the rest of the fleet, and, when his ship was disabled, he refused to save his life by abandoning it, and fell fighting. (Nep. Chabrias; Xen. Hell. v. 1–4; Diod. xv. 29–34, xvi. 7.)

Chærëa, C. Cassius, tribune of the praetorian cohorts, formed the conspiracy by which Caligula was slain, A.D. 41. Chæreia was put to death by Claudius upon his accession. (Suet. Cal. 56; Dio Cass. lix. 29; Tac. Ann. i. 32.)

Chærëmon (Χαιρήμων). 1. One of the most celebrated of the later tragic poets at Athens, about B.C. 380. He was one of the 'Αναγνωστικοί, or 'Reading Tragedians,' who in the decline of tragedy composed subtle and overstrained plays which were not acted but read before a select audience. Some of his plays were for acting. (Athen. p. 607.)—2. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, chief librarian of the Alexandrian library, was afterwards called to Rome, and became the preceptor of Nero. He wrote a history of Egypt, on Hieroglyphics, on Comets, and a grammatical work. Martial (xi. 56) wrote an epigram upon him.

Chærëphon (Χαιρέφών), a pupil of Socrates, was banished by the Thirty, and returned to Athens on the restoration of democracy, B.C. 403. He was dead when the trial of Socrates took place, 399. (Xen. Mem. i. 2, 48, ii. 3, 1.)

Chærōnëa (Χαιρώνεια: Chæroneüs: Capurna), the Homeric Arne according to Pausanias, a town in Boeotia on the Cephissus near the frontier of Phocis, a dependant of Orchomenus. It stood where the valley of the Cephissus narrows to two miles, and thus it commanded the approach from the north. It was memorable for the defeat of the Athenians and the Boeotians in B.C. 338 by Philip, king of Macedon, and for Sulla's victory over the army of Mithridates, 86. Chaeronea was the birthplace of Plutarch. Several remains of the ancient city have been discovered at Capurna: a theatre excavated in the rock, an aqueduct, and the marble lion (broken in pieces) which adorned the sepulchre of the Boeotians who fell at the battle of Chaeronea. (Thuc. iv. 76; Paus. ix. 41, 6; Strab. p. 414; Plut. Sull. 17.)

Chalæum (Χάλαιον: Χαλαίος), a port-town of the Locri Ozolæ on the Crissæan gulf, on the frontiers of Phocis (Thuc. iii. 101).

Chalâstra (Χαλάστρα), a town in Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouth of the river Axios (Hdt. vii. 123; Strab. p. 330).

Chalcë or -æ or -ia (Χάλκη, Χάλκαι, Χαλκία: Charki), an island of the Carpathian sea, near Rhodes, with a town of the same name, and temple of Apollo (Strab. p. 488; Thuc. viii. 41).

Chalcēdon (Χαλκηδών, more correctly, Καλχηδών; Χαλκηδόνιος: Chalkedon, Grk., Kadi-Kioi, Turk., Ru.), a Greek city of Bithynia, on the coast of the Propontis at the entrance of the Bosphorus, nearly opposite to Byzantium, was founded by a colony from Megara in B.C. 685. As occupying an inferior site to that of Byzantium it was spoken of by the oracle as 'the city of the blind' (Strab. p. 320; Tac. Ann. xii. 63). After a long period of independence it became subject to the kings of Bithynia, who in B.C. 506, who retired on the Persian invasion (Hdt. v. 77, vi. 100). Its flourishing condition at an early period is attested by the numerous colonies which it planted in various parts of the Mediterranean. It founded so many cities in the peninsula in Macedonia between the Strymonic and Thermaic gulfs, that the whole peninsula was called Chalcidice. In Italy it founded Cuma, and in Sicily Naxos. Chalcis was usually subject to Athens during the greatness of the latter city, and afterwards passed into the hands of the Macedonians, Antiochus, Mithridates, and the Romans. It was a place of great military importance, as it commanded the navigation between the N. and S. of Greece, and hence it was often taken and retaken by the different parties contending for the supremacy in Greece.—The orator Isaeus and the poet Lycophron were born at Chalcis, and Aristotle died here.

removed most of its inhabitants to the new city of Nicomedia (B.C. 140). The Romans restored its fortifications, and made it the chief city of the province of Bithynia, or Pontica Prima. It was entirely destroyed by the Turks.—The fourth oecumenical council of the Church met here A.D. 451. (Hom. Il. ii. 537; Strab. p. 320; Thuc. iv. 75; Xen. An. vii. 1, 20; Plut. Lucull. 8.)

Chalcidicē (Χαλκιδική), a peninsula in Macedonia between the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs, runs out into the sea like a 3-pronged fork,

—2. A town in Aetolia at the mouth of the Evenus, situated at the foot of the mountain Chalcis, and hence also called Hypochalcis (Hom. Il. ii. 640; Thuc. ii. 83; Strab. p. 451).—

3. (Kinnesrin, Ru.), a city of Syria, in a fruitful plain, near the termination of the river Chalus: the chief city of the district of Chalcidice, which lay to the E. of the Orontes.—4. A city of Syria on the Belus, in the plain of Marsyas.

Chalcōdon (Χαλκῶδων), king of the Abantes in Euboea, was said to be a son of Abas, the descendant of Erechtheus. He was father of Elphenor, who fought at Troy (Il. ii. 541, iv. 464). He was killed by Amphitryon, fighting against Thebes. His descendants were called the Chalcodontidae, and ruled over parts of Boeotia as well as of Euboea. (Eur. Ion. 59; Paus. viii. 15, 3, ix. 19, 3.)

Chaldaea (Χαλδαία: Χαλδαῖος), in the narrower sense, was a province of Babylonia, about the lower course of the Euphrates, the border of the Arabian Desert, and the head of the Persian Gulf. It was intersected by numerous canals, and was extremely fertile. In a wider sense, the term is applied to the whole of Babylonia, and even to the Babylonian empire, on account of the supremacy which the Chaldaeans acquired at Babylon. They seem to have been settled on the shores of the Persian Gulf when they are first heard of in the 9th cent. B.C. Under Merodach Baladan, about B.C. 700, they became masters of Babylonia and gave their name to the whole country. [BABYLON.]

Chalus (Χάλος: Koweik), a river of N. Syria, flowing S. past Beroea and Chalcis, and terminating in a marshy lake.

Chälýbes (Χάλυβες), a people apparently of Scythian origin (later called Chaldaei), said to be descended from Chalybs son of Ares. They represent the earliest workers in iron of whom the Greeks had heard; they are generally represented as dwelling on the S. shore of the Black Sea, about Themiscyra and the Thermodon (and probably to a wider extent, for Herodotus clearly mentions them among the nations W. of the Halys), and occupying themselves in the working of iron. (Strab. p. 549, 551; Hdt. i. 28;

ending in 3 smaller peninsulas, PALLENE, SITHONIA, and ACTE or ATHOS. It derived its name from Chalcidian colonists. [CHALCIS, No. 1.]

Chalcidius, a Platonic philosopher who lived probably in the 5th century of the Christian era, translated into Latin the Timaeus of Plato, on which he likewise wrote a voluminous commentary. Edited by Meursius, Leyden, 1617, and by Fabricius, Hamburg, 1718.

Chalcioecus (Χαλκίοικος), 'the goddess of the brazen house,' a surname of Athene at Sparta, from the brazen temple there. [ATHENE.]

Chalciope (Χαλκίοπη). 1. Daughter of Eurypylus, king of Cos, mother of Thessalus by Heracles (Il. ii. 676; Apollod. ii. 7, 8).—2. Daughter of Aetes, and sister of Medea, married to Phrixus (Ap. Rh. ii. 1140; Apollod. i. 9).

Chalcis (Χαλκίς: Χαλκιδεύς, Chalcidensis). 1. (Egripo or Negroponte), the principal town of Euboea, situated on the narrowest part of the Euripus, and united, as early as B.C. 411, with the mainland by a bridge (Thuc. viii. 95; Diod. xv. 30). It was a very ancient town, originally inhabited by Abantes or Curetes, and colonised by Attic Ionians under Cothus. In the time of Hesiod (Op. 655) Chalcis was ruled by a king: in the next century by an oligarchy of the richer class called Hippobotae (Strab. p. 447; Hdt. v. 77). The Athenians plucked 4,000 clucrius here

Chálybon (Χαλυβών; O. T. Helbon), a city of N. Syria, afterwards ΒΕΡΟΕΑ.

Chamaelëon (Χαμαιλέον), a Peripatetic philosopher, or, rather, student of literature, of Heraclea on the Pontus, one of the disciples of Aristotle, wrote works on several ancient Greek poets, and on philosophical subjects.

Chamävi, a people in Germany, who were compelled by the Roman conquests to change their abodes several times. They first appear in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, but afterwards migrated E., defeated the Bructeri, and settled between the Weser and the Harz. At a later time they dwelt on the lower Rhine, and were auxiliaries of the Franks. (Strab. p. 291; Tac. Germ. 2, 33, Ann. xiii. 55; Ammian. xvii. 8.)

Chäones (Χάονες), one of the 3 peoples inhabiting EPIRUS, were at an earlier period in possession of the whole country, but subsequently dwelt along the coast from the river Thyamis northwards to the Acroceranian promontory, which district was therefore called Chaonia. By the poets Chaonius is used as equivalent to Epirot.

Chäos (Χάος), the vacant and infinite space which existed according to the ancient cosmogonies previous to the creation of the world, and out of which the gods, men, and all things arose. Chaos was the mother of Erebus and Nyx, from whom again were born Aether and Hemera (Hes. Th. 116 ff.). In the Orphic cosmogony Chaos and Aether are born from Chronos.

Charadra (Χαράδρα; Χαράδραϊός). 1. A town in Phocis on the river Charadrus, situated on an eminence not far from Lilaëa (Hdt. viii. 33; Paus. x. 3).—2. A town in Epirus, SW. of Ambracia.—3. A town in Messenia, built by Pelops.

Charadrus (Χάραδρος). 1. A small river in Phocis, a tributary of the Cephissus.—2. A small river in Argolis, a tributary of the Inachus.—3. A small river in Messenia, rises near Oechalia.

Charadrus (Χάραδρος, Khaladrän), a town in Cilicia on the coast road from Arsinoë to Selinus (Trajanopolis).

Charax (Χάραξ), of Pergamum, a historian of the 2nd cent. B.C., wrote a work in 40 books, called Ἑλληνικά, and another named Χρονικά. (In Müller, Fragm. Hist. Graec.)

Chärax (Χάραξ, i.e. a palisaded camp; Χαρκηνός), the name of several cities, which took their origin from military stations. The most remarkable of them stood at the mouth of the Tigris. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 4.] There were others in the Chersouesus Taurica, in N. Media, near Celaenae in Phrygia, in Corsica, and on the Great Syrtis in Africa.

Charaxus (Χάραξος) of Mytilene, son of Scamandronymus and brother of Sappho, fell in love with RHODOPIS.

Chärës (Χάρης). 1. An Athenian general, who for a long series of years contrived by profuse corruption to maintain his influence with the people, in spite of his very disreputable character. In B.C. 367 he was sent to the aid of the Phliasiens, who were hard pressed by the Arcadians and Argives, and he succeeded in relieving them (Xen. Hell. vii. 2, 18; Diod. xv. 75). In the Social war, after the death of Chabrias, 356, he had the command of the Athenian fleet along with Iphicrates and Timotheus. His colleagues having refused, in consequence of a storm, to risk an engagement, Chares accused them to the people, and they were recalled (Diod. xvi. 21; Nep. Tim. 4). Being now left in the sole command, and being in want of money, he entered into the service of Artabazus, the revolted satrap of Western Asia, but was recalled by the Athenians on the complaint of Artaxerxes III. In the Olynthian war, 349, he commanded the mercenaries sent from Athens to the aid of Olynthus. In 340 he commanded the force sent to aid Byzantium against Philip; but he effected nothing, and was accordingly superseded by Phocion. In 338 he was one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Chaeronea. When Alexander invaded Asia in 334, Chares was living at Sigeum; and in 333 he commanded for Darius at Mytilene. (Arrian, Anab. ii. 1, iii. 2).—2. Of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, wrote a history of Alexander in 10 books.—3. An artist of Lindus in Rbodes, the favourite pupil of Lysippus, flourished B.C. 290. He belonged to a period when it was sought to replace the old grandeur and simplicity by mere size and dramatic effect. His chief work was the statue of the Sun, which, under the name of 'The Colossus of Rbodes,' was celebrated as one of the 7 wonders of the world. Its height was upwards of 105 English feet (70 cubits), the fingers being larger than most statues (Plin. xxxiv. 41); it was 12 years in erecting, and cost 300 talents. It stood at the entrance of the harbour of Rhodes, but there is no truth in the tradition that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbour. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake 55 years after its erection, B.C. 224. (Cf. Strab. p. 652; Polyb. v. 88.) The fragments remained on the ground 900 years, till they were sold by the general of the caliph Othman IV. to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on 980 camels, A.D. 672.

Chäricleës (Χαρικλῆς). 1. An Athenian demagogue, son of Apollodorus, was one of the commissioners appointed to investigate the affair of the mutilation of the Hermae, B.C. 415; was one of the commanders of the Athenian fleet, 413; and one of the Thirty on the capture of Athens by Lysander, 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, 2).—2. An eminent physician at Rome, attended the emperor Tiberius.

Chäricleō (Χαρικλώ). 1. A nymph, daughter of Apollo, wife of the centaur Chiron, and mother of Carystus and Ocyroë (Pind. Pyth. iv. 103).—2. A nymph, wife of Eueres and mother of TEIRESIAS.

Chäridëmus (Χαριδήμος). 1. Of Oreus in Euboea, of mean origin, became the captain of a band of mercenaries, and served in this capacity under the Athenian generals Iphicrates and Timotheus. He next entered the service of the satrap Artabazus, who had revolted against Artaxerxes III., and subsequently of Cotys, king of Thrace, whose daughter he married. On the murder of Cotys, 360, Charidëmus adhered to the cause of his son Cersobleptes, and on behalf of the latter carried on the struggle with the Athenians for the possession of the Chersonesus. The Athenians, however, considered that they were in some way indebted to him for the surrender of the Chersonese, since they voted him a golden crown. In 349 he was appointed by the Athenians commander in the Olynthian war, but next year was superseded and replaced by Chares. (Dem. c. Aristocr.; Athen. p. 436).—2. An Athenian, one of the orators whose surrender was required by Alexander in B.C. 335, after the destruction of Thebes, fled to Asia, and took refuge with Darius, by whose orders he was put to death, 333, shortly before the battle of Issus (Plut. Phoc. 16; Curt. iii. 2).

Chārīlāus (Χαρίλαος), king of Sparta, son of Polydectes, is said to have received his name from the general joy excited by the justice of his uncle Lycurgus when he placed him, a newborn infant, on the royal seat, and bade the Spartans acknowledge him for their king. He carried on war against Argos and Tegea; he was taken prisoner by the Tegeans, but was dismissed without ransom on giving a promise (which he did not keep) that the Spartans should abstain in future from attacking Tegea. (Plut. Lyc. 5; Hdt. viii. 131; Paus. iii. 7.)

Chāris, Chārītēs (Χάρις, Χάριτες). Charis was the personification of Grace and Beauty. In the Iliad (xviii. 382; cf. Hes. Th. 945) she is described as the wife of Hephaestus, but in the Odyssey Aphrodite appears as the wife of Hephaestus, from which we may infer, not indeed the identity of Aphrodite and Charis, but a likeness of their attributes. The idea of personified grace and beauty was at an early period divided into a plurality of beings, and even in the Homeric poems the plural Charites occurs several times.—The Charites (called Gratiae by the Romans) are usually described as the daughters of Zeus, and as 3 in number, namely Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. (In Cic. N.D. iii. 17, 44, they are children of Erebus and Nox, which may perhaps, like the theory of their birth from Lethe, symbolise the perishable nature of gratitude). The names of the Charites sufficiently express their character. They were the goddesses who enhanced the enjoyments of life by refinement and gentleness. They are mostly described as in the service of other divinities, and they lend their grace and beauty to everything that delights and elevates in heaven, on earth, and in the under world. (Pind. Ol. xiv. 5; Theocr. xvi. 108.) The gentleness and gracefulness which they impart to man's ordinary pleasures are expressed by their moderating the exciting influence of wine (Hor. Od. iii. 19, 15; cf. Athen. p. 36), and by their accompanying Aphrodite as her tire-maidens (Il. v. 338; Od. viii. 362; Hes. Op. 72; Paus. vi. 24). Poetry, however, is the art which is especially favoured by them, and hence they are the friends of the Muses, with whom they live together in Olympus (Pind. Ol. xiv. 10). With Athene also as the goddess of all arts, with Hermes as the god of ready and winning speech, and with Peitho for the same reason, the Charites were often connected. The worship of the art the familiar representation of the Graces as three naked figures belongs to the Hellenistic period; in the earlier periods they were represented as fully clothed; it is probably right to recognise a transition period when they were represented in transparent chiton without a girdle ('solutis zonis,' Hor. Od. i. 30; 'soluta ac perlucida veste,' Sen. de Benef. i. 3), in statues of (probably) about B.C. 300–200, after which the naked type became more common.

Charisius. 1. Aurelius Arcadius, a Roman jurist, lived in the reign of Constantine the Great, and wrote 3 works, De Testibus, De Muncibus civilibus, and De Officio Praefecti praetorio, all of which are cited in the Digest.

—2. Flavius Sospäter, a Latin grammarian, A.D. 400, author of a treatise in 5 books, drawn up for the use of his son, entitled Institutiones Grammaticae, which has come down to us in a very imperfect state. The work is of importance because he quotes largely from earlier writers, and, besides his grammatical information, preserves facts of value in archaeology. Edited by Putschins in Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, Hanov. 1605, and by Lindemann, in Corpus Grammat. Latin. Veterum, Lips. 1840; Keil, Lips. 1857.

Chārītes. [CHARIS.]

Chariton (Χαρίτων), of Aphrodisias, a town of Caria, the author of a Greek romance, in 8 books, on the Loves of Chaereas and Callirrhoe. The names are probably feigned (from χάρις and Ἀφροδίτη), as the time and position of the author certainly are. He represents himself as the secretary of the orator Athenagoras, evidently referring to the Syracusan orator mentioned by Thucydides (vi. 35, 36) as the political opponent of Hermocrates. Nothing is known respecting the real life or the time of the author; but he probably did not live earlier than the 4th century after Christ. Edited by D'Orville, 3 vols. Amst. 1750, with a valuable commentary; reprinted with additional notes by Beck, Lips. 1783.

Charmandē (Χαρμάνδη; nr. Hitt), in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates (Xen. An. i. 5, 10).

Charmides (Χαρμίδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Glaucon, cousin to Critias, and uncle by the mother's side to Plato, who introduces him in the dialogue which bears his name as a very young man at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. In B.C. 404 he was one of the Ten, and was slain fighting against Thrasybulus at the Piraeus (Xen. Hell. ii. 4, Mem. iii. 7).—2. Called also Charmadas by Cicero, a friend of Philo of Larissa, in conjunction with whom he is said by some to have been the founder of a 4th Academy. He lived B.C. 100. Cicero praises

Charites. (From a coin of Germa.)

Charites from an early period was especially noticeable at Orchomenus, where they had a temple, and were regarded as the givers of increase (cf. Paus. ix. 35; Pind. xii. 26; Strab. p. 414), to whom probably corresponded the two Charites, Auxo and Hegemone worshipped at Athens (Paus. i. 32, ix. 35; Pollux, viii. 106). In his powers of memory and his eloquence (de Or. i. 11, 18; Tusc. i. 24, 59; Acad. i. 6, 16).

Charōn (Χάρων). 1. Son of Ercebos, conveyed in his boat the shades of the dead across the rivers of the lower world. For this service he was paid with an obolus or danaces: the coin was placed in the mouth of every corpse before its burial (Lucian, Mort. Dial. i. 3, xi. 4). It should be noticed that Charon is not mentioned in Homer, and appears first in the Minyas of the Theban epic cycle. He is represented as an ugly bearded man clothed in the exomis.—2. A distinguished Theban, concealed Pelopidas and his fellow conspirators in his house, when they returned to Thebes with the view of delivering it from the Spartans, B.C. 379.—3. A historian of Lampsacus, lived about 460 B.C., and wrote works on Aethiopia, Persia, Greece, &c., the fragments of which are collected by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec.

Charondas (Χαρώνδας), a lawgiver of Catana, who legislated for his own and the other cities of Chalcidian origin in Sicily and Italy. His date is uncertain. He is said by some to have been a disciple of Pythagoras; and he must have lived before the time of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, B.C. 494–476, for the Rhegians used the laws of Charondas till they were abolished by Anaxilaus. The latter fact sufficiently refutes the common account that Charondas drew up a code of laws for Thurii, since this city was not founded till 443. A tradition relates that Charondas one day forgot to lay aside his sword before he appeared in the assembly, thereby violating one of his own laws, and that on being reminded of this by a citizen, he exclaimed, 'By Zeus, I will establish it,' and immediately stabbed himself. The laws ascribed to him by Diodorus and Stobaeus cannot be regarded as genuine, and belong to a later date. (Plat. Rep. 600; Arist. Pol. ii. 12, 5, 7, iv. 11, 10; Diod. xii. 19, 35; Stob. xlv. 20.)

Chærops (Χάρωψ). 1. A chief among the Epirots, sided with the Romans in their war with Philip V., B.C. 198 (Polyb. xvii. 3).—2. A grandson of the above. He was educated at Rome, and after his return to his own country adhered to the Roman cause; but he is represented by Polybius as a monster of cruelty. He died at Brundisium, 157. (Polyb. xxx. 14, xxxii. 21.)

Charybdis. [SCYLLA.]

Chasūāri, a people of Germany, allies or dependents of the Cherusci, to the N. and NW. of whom they dwelt, on the W. bank of the Visurgis (Weser), and to the E. of the Bructeri (Tac. Germ. 34; Ptol. ii. 11, 22).

Chatti (sometimes written Catti), one of the most important German tribes who occupied a territory between the Rhine and the upper part of the Weser. As they remained more stationary than some other German tribes, they have left their name in this, their earliest settlement, in the name Hesse. The Adrana (Eder) flowed through their land, and Mattium (Maden) was their chief town. We hear of them as fighting against the Romans under Drusus, defeated, but never really subdued, and as engaged in hostilities with the Hermandures and Cherusci. (Tac. Ann. i. 55, xii. 27, Hist. iv. 37, Germ. 36; Dio Cass. liv. 33, lv. 1.)

Chattūārii, a Frisian people who dwelt S. of Flevo (Zuyder See) between the Anisia (Ems) and the Rhinc (Strab. p. 291).

Chauci or Cauci, a powerful people in the NE. of Germany between the Amisia (Ems) and the Albis (Elbe), divided by the Visurgis (Weser), which flowed through their territory, into Majores and Minores, the former W. and the latter E. of the river. They are described by Tacitus as the noblest and the justest of the German tribes, and skilful seamen. They formed an alliance with the Romans A.D. 5, and assisted them in their wars against the Cherusci; but this alliance did not last long. They were at war with the Romans in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, but were never subdued. They are mentioned for the last time in the 3rd century, when they devastated Gaul, and subsequently became merged in the general name of Saxons. (Tac. Germ. 35, Ann. ii. 8, xi. 18; Dio Cass. liv. 62, lx. 30; Lucan. i. 463.)

Chelidon. 1. Daughter of Pandareos, sister of Aedon, changed into a swallow [see AEDON].—2. The mistress of Verres (Cic. Verr.).

Chelidōnis (Χελιδόνις), wife of Cleonymus, to whom she proved unfaithful in consequence of a passion for Acrotatus, son of Aureus 1.

Chelidōniæ Insulae (Χελιδόνια νήσοι: Khelidoni), a group of 5 (Strabo mentions only 3) small islands, surrounded by dangerous shallows, off the promontory called Hiera or Chelidonia (Khelidoni) on the S. coast of Lycia.

Chelonātas (Χελωνάτας: C. Tornese), a promontory in Elis, opposite Zacynthus, the most westerly point of the Peloponnesus.

Chelōne (Χελώνη), a maiden who neglected the invitation to the wedding of Zeus and Hera, and was changed by Hermes into a tortoise.

Chemmis, aft. Panōpōlis (Χέμμις, Πανόπολις: Χεμμίτης: Ekhmim, Ru.), a great city of the Thebais, or Upper Egypt, on the E. bank of the Nile, celebrated for its manufactures of linen, its stone quarries, and its temples of Pan and Perseus. It was the birthplace of the poet Nonnus.

Chēnōboscīa (Χηνοβοσκία: Kasees-Said, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, opposite Diospolis Parva.

Cheops (Χεόψ), is the name by which Herodotus speaks of the Egyptian king Khufu, who belonged to the 4th dynasty and reigned about 3733 B.C. with Mcmphis as his capital. He is famous as the builder of the Great Pyramid. The later traditions followed by Herodotus (ii. 124–127) and Diodorus (i. 63), who calls him Chemmis, represent him as tyrannical and cruel to his subjects and impious towards the gods. The more trustworthy record of the rock tablets describes him as a brave and wise ruler, and a founder of temples. Rhampsinitus (Ramses III.), whom Herodotus places before Cheops, lived about 2500 years later.

Chephren (Χεφρήν) is the name by which the Greek writers (Hdt. ii. 127) designated Khaf-Ra, the son-in-law of Cheops (or Khufu). He was king of Egypt about 3666 B.C. (Tatf-Ra, who is not mentioned by Herodotus, came between Chufu and Khaf-Ra). He built the second pyramid. A statue of Chephren (or Khaf-Ra) has been discovered; a seated figure showing a high stage of art in its execution, with the name and title of the king on its base.

Chersiphron (Χερσίφρων) or Ctesiphon, an architect of Cnossus in Crete, in conjunction with his son Metagenes, built, or commenced building, the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus early in the 6th century B.C. (Strab. p. 640; Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 12; EPHEBUS.)

Chersonesus (Χερσόνησος, Att. Χερρόνησος), 'a land-island,' that is, 'a peninsula' (from χῆσος 'land' and νῆσος 'island'). 1. Ch. Thracia (Peninsula of the Dardanelles or of Gallipoli), usually called at Athens 'The Chersonesus' without any distinguishing epithet, the narrow strip of land, 420 stadia in length, running between the Hellespont and the Gulf of Melas, and connected with the Thracian mainland by an isthmus, which was fortified by a wall, 36 stadia across, near Cardia. The Chersonese was colonised by the Athenians under MILTIADES, the contemporary of Pisistratus (Hdt. vi. 36; Xen. Hell. iii. 2, 10). It fell under the Persian power during the war with Greece, was under Athenian or Spartan control till its occupation by the Macedonians and by the successors of Alexander. After the defeat of Antiochus the Romans added it to the province of Macedonia.—2. Taurica or Scythica (Crimea), the peninsula between the Pontus Euxinus, the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and the Pains Maeotis, united to the mainland by an isthmus 40 stadia in width. The ancients compared this peninsula with the Peloponnesus both in form and size. It produced a great quantity of corn, which was exported to Athens and other parts of Greece. The E. part of the peninsula was called Τρηχέη or the Rugged (Hdt. iv. 99). Respecting the Greek kingdom established in this country see BOSPORUS: for the worship of the Tauric goddess see ARTEMIS.—There was a town on the S. coast of this peninsula called Chersonesus, founded by the inhabitants of the Pontic Heraclaea, and situated on a small peninsula, called ἡ μικρά Χερ. to distinguish it from the larger, of which it formed a part.—3. Cimbria (Jutland). See CIMBRI.—4. (C. Chersonisi), a promontory in Argolis between Epidaurus and Troezen.—5. (Chersoneso), a town in Crete on the Prom. Zephyrium, the harbour of Lyctus in the interior.

Cherusci, the most celebrated of all the tribes of ancient Germany. The limits of their territory cannot be fixed with accuracy, since the ancients did not distinguish between the Cherusci proper and the nations belonging to the league of which the Cherusci were at the head. The Cherusci proper dwelt on both sides of the Visurgis (Weser), and their territories extended to the Harz and the Elbe. They were originally in alliance with the Romans, but they subsequently formed a powerful league of the German tribes for the purpose of expelling the Romans from the country, and under the chief ARMINIUS they destroyed the army of Varus and drove the Romans beyond the Rhine, A.D. 9. In consequence of internal dissensions among the German tribes the Cherusci soon lost their influence. Their neighbours the CATI succeeded to their power. (Caes. B. G. vi. 10; Tac. Germ. 36, Ann. xi. 16, 17.)

Chesius (Χήσιον), a promontory of Samos, with a temple of Artemis, who was worshipped here under the surname of Χησίας. Near it was a little river Chesius, flowing past a town of the same name.

Chilius. [THYLLUS.]

Chilon (Χείλων, Χίλων), of Lacedaemon, son of Damagetus, and one of the Seven Sages, B.C. 590. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games. The institution of the Ephorality is erroneously ascribed by some to Chilon. A shrine was erected to him at Sparta. (Hdt. i. 59; Diog. Laërt. i. 68; Pans. iii. 16, x. 24.)

Chimaera (Χίμαιρα), a fire-breathing monster, the fore part of whose body was that of a lion, the hind part that of a dragon, and the middle that of a goat (Hom. Il. vi. 179, xvi. 328). According to Hesiod (Th. 319), she was a daughter of Typhon and Echidna, and had 3 heads, one of each of the three animals before mentioned. She made great havoc in Lycia and the surrounding countries, and was at length killed by BELLEROPHON. Virgil places her together with other monsters at the entrance of Orcus. The origin of the notion of this fire-breathing monster must probably be sought for in the volcano of the name of Chimaera near Plaselis, in Lycia (Plin. ii. 236). Servius (ad Aen. vi. 238) speaks of a mountain in Lycia, which still in his time vomited flames from its summit, lions dwelt in the upper forests, goats in the pasture slopes, and serpents in the marshes at its foot.

and powerful maritime state, under a democratic form of government, till the great naval defeat of the Ionian Greeks by the Persians, B.C. 494, after which the Chians, who had taken part in the fight with 100 ships, were subjected to the Persians, and their island was laid waste and their young women carried off into slavery.

In the works of art discovered in Lycia, we find several representations of the Chimaera in the simple form of a species of lion still occurring in that country. [BELLEROPHON.]

Chimērion (Porto Hagianno), a promontory and harbour of Thesprotia in Epirus.

Chion (Xίων), of Heraclēa on the Pontus, a disciple of Plato, put to death Clearchus, the tyrant of his native town, and was in consequence killed, B.C. 353 (Justin. xvi. 5). There are extant 13 letters which are ascribed to Chion, but which are undoubtedly of later origin. Edited by Coberus, Lips. and Dresd. 1765, and by Orelli, in his edition of Memnon, Lips. 1816.

Chīōnē (Χιῶνη). 1. Daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, became by Poseidon the mother of Eumolpus¹ (Paus. i. 38; Apollod. iii. 15).—2. Daughter of Daedalion, beloved by Apollo and Hermes, bore twins, Autolycus and Philammon, the former a son of Hermes and the latter of Apollo. She was killed by Artemis for having compared her beauty to that of the goddess. (Ov. Met. xi. 266.)

Chīōnīdes (Χιωνιδης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, lived about B.C. 460, and was the first poet who gave the Athenian comedy that form which it retained down to the time of Aristophanes (a few frags. in Meineke).

Chios (Xios: Xios, Chius: Grk. Khio, Ital. Scio, Turk. Saki-Andassi, i.e. Mastic island), one of the largest and most famous islands of the Aegean, lay opposite to the peninsula of Clazomenae, on the coast of Ionia, and was reckoned at 900 stadia (90 geog. miles) in circuit. Its length from N. to S. is about 30 miles, its greatest breadth about 10, and the width of the strait, which divides it from the mainland, about 8. It is said to have borne, in the earliest times, the various names of Aethalia, Macris, and Pityusa, and to have been inhabited by Tyrrhenian Pelasgians and Leleges. It was colonised by the Ionians at the time of their great migration, and became an important member of the Ionian league; but its population was mixed. It remained an independent

The battle of Mycale, 479, freed Chios from the Persian yoke, and it became a member of the Athenian league, in which it was for a long time the closest and most favoured ally of Athens; but an unsuccessful attempt to revolt, in 412, led to its conquest and devastation. It recovered its independence, with Cos and Rhodes, in 358, and afterwards shared the fortunes of the other states of IONIA.—Chios is covered with rocky mountains, clothed with the richest vegetation. It was celebrated for its wine, which was among the best known to the ancients, its figs, gum-mastic, and other natural products, also for its marble and pottery, and for the beauty of its women, and the luxurious life of its inhabitants.—Of all the states which aspired to the honour of being the birthplace of Homer, Chios was generally considered by the ancients to have the best claim; and it numbered among its natives the tragedian Ion, the historian Theopompus, the sophist Theocritus, and other eminent men. Its chief city, Chios (Khio), stood on the E. side of the island, at the foot of its highest mountain, Pelinaeus; the other principal places in it were Posidium, Phanae, Notium, Elaeus, and Lenconium.

Chrisōphus (Χρυσόφωπος), a Lacedaemonian, was sent by the Spartans to aid Cyrus in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, B.C. 401. After the battle of Cunaxa and the arrest of the Greek generals, Chrisophus was appointed one of the new generals, and in conjunction with Xenophon had the chief conduct of the retreat.

Chiron (Χείρων), the wisest and justest of all the Centaurs, son of Cronos and Philyra (some accounts make him the son of Poseidon or of Ixion: Schol. ad Il. iv. 219; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. i. 554), and husband of Naïs or Chariclo, lived on Mt. Pelion (ib. xi. 832; Hes. Th. 1002; Pind. Pyth. iii. 5, ix. 30). He was instructed by Apollo and Artemis, and was renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and the art of prophecy (Il. xi. 831; Plin. vii. 196; Eur. I. A. 1064; Val. Flacc. Arg. i. 139; Xen. Cyneg. 1.) All the most distinguished heroes of Grecian story, as Peleus, Achilles, Diomedes, Jason, are described as the pupils of Chiron in these arts. His friendship with Peleus, who was his grandson, is particularly celebrated. Chiron saved him from the other Centaurs, who were on the point of killing him, and he also restored to him the sword which Acastus had concealed. Chiron further informed him in what manner he might gain possession of Thetis, who was destined to marry a mortal (Pind. Nem. iv. 60; Apollod. iii. 13, 5, iv. 13, 3). Heracles, too, was his friend; but one of the poisoned arrows of this hero was nevertheless the cause of his death. While fighting with the other Centaurs, one of the poisoned arrows of Heracles struck Chiron, who, although immortal, would not live any longer, and gave his immortality to Prometheus. According to others, Chiron, in looking at one of the arrows, dropped it on his foot, and wounded himself. Zeus placed Chiron among the stars. (Ov. Fast. v. 398; Plin. xxv. 66; Hyg. Ast. ii. 38; CENTAURI.)

Chitônê (Χιτώνη), a surname of Artemis, because she was represented with a short chiton (Callim. Hymn. 77; Athen. 629; ARTEMIS).

Chlôê (Χλόη), the Blooming, a surname of Demeter as the protectress of the green fields: hence Sophocles (Oed. Col. 1600) calls her μήτηρ ἐύχλοος (cf. Athen. p. 618).

Chlôris (Χλωρίς), 1. Daughter of the Theban Amphion and Niobe: she and her brother Amyclas were the only children of Niobe not killed by Apollo and Artemis (Paus. ii. 21, 10).—2. Daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, wife of Neleus, king of Pylos, and mother of Nestor.—3. Wife of Zephyrus, and goddess of flowers, identical with Flora (Ov. Fast. v. 195).

Chôarênê (Χοαρηνή), a fertile valley in the W. of Parthia, on the borders of Media, between two ranges of the Caspian M. (Strab. p. 514; Plin. vi. 44).

Chôaspes (Χοάσπης). 1. (Kerkha), a river of Susiana, falling into the Tigris, near its mouth. Its water was so pure that the Persian kings used to carry it with them when on foreign expeditions. Its Chaldaean name was Ulai; whence the river was called also Eulaeus. Susa stood upon its banks. (Hdt. i. 188; Strab. pp. 46, 728; Plin. vi. 130).—2. (Khonah) a river in the Paropamisus, falling into the Coplien (Cabul).

Choerâdes (Χοιράδες: SS. Pietro e Paolo), two small rocky islands off the coast of Italy, near Tarentum (Thuc. vii. 33).

Choerilus (Χοιρίλος or Χοίριλλος). 1. Of Athens, a tragic poet, contemporary with Thespis, Phrynichus, and Aeschylus, exhibited tragedies for 40 years, B.C. 528–483, and gained the prize 13 times.—2. Of Samos, the author of an epic poem on the Persian wars. He was born about 470, and died at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, consequently not later than 399, which was the last year of Archelaus.

—3. Of Iasos, a worthless epic poet in the train of Alexander the Great, is said to have received from Alexander a gold stater for every verse of his poem (Suid. s.v.; Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 232, Art. Poët. 357).

Chollidae (Χολλεῖδαι or Χολλίδαι: Χολλεῖδης, -ίδης), a demus in Attica of the tribe Leontis.

Chonîa (Χωνία), the name in early times of a district in the S. of Italy, inhabited by the Chones (Χῶνες), an Oenotrian people, who derived their name from the town of Chone (Χώνη). Chonia included the S.E. of Lucania and the whole of the E. of Bruttium as far as the promontory Zephyrium. (Ar. Pol. vii. 9; Strab. p. 255).

Chôrasmii (Χωράσμοι), a people of Sogdiana, who inhabited the banks and islands of the lower course of the Oxus, were a branch of the Sacae or Massagetae (Hdt. iii. 93; Strab. p. 513).

Chosroes. 1. King of Parthia. [ARSACES xxv.]—2. King of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

Chrysa or -e (Χρύσα, -η), a city on the coast of the Troad, near Thebes, with a temple of Apollo Smintheus; celebrated by Homer, but destroyed at an early period, and succeeded by another city of the same name, on a height further from the sea, near Hamaxitos. This second city fell into decay in consequence of the removal of its inhabitants to ALEXANDRIA TROAS. (Il. i. 37, 390; Strab. p. 604.)

Chrysantas (Χρυσάντας), described by Xenophon in the Cyropaedia as a Persian high in the favour of Cyrus, who rewarded him with the satrapy of Lydia and Ionia.

Chrysaôr (Χρυσάωρ). 1. Son of Poseidon and Medusa, husband of Callirrhoë, and father of Geryones and Echidna (Hes. Th. 278, 979; Diod. iv. 17; MEDUSA).—2. The deity with the golden sword, a surname of Apollo, Artemis, and Demeter.

Chrysas (Χρύσας: Dittaino), a small river in Sicily, an affluent of the Symaethus, worshipped as a god in Assorus, near which there was a Fanum Chrysaë (Cic. Verr. iv. 44).

Chryse (Χρύση), a Lemnian goddess, whose altar was guarded by the serpent which bit PHLOCTETES. It is possible, but by no means certain, that she should be identified with the Thracian Bendis.—2. A district [see INDIA; CHRYSÆ].

Chryseïs (Χρυσήϊς), daughter of Chryses, priest of Apollo at Chryse, was taken prisoner by Achilles at the capture of Lyrnessus or the Hypoplacian Thebe. In the distribution of the booty she was given to Agamemnon. Her father Chryses came to the camp of the Greeks to solicit her ransom, but was repulsed by Agamemnon. Thereupon Apollo sent a plague into the camp of the Greeks, and Agamemnon was obliged to restore her to her father to appease the anger of the god. Her proper name was Astynome. (Il. i. 366, 430.)

Chryseës. [CHRYSEIS.]

Chrysippus (Χρυσίππος). 1. Son of Pelops and Axioche, was hated by his stepmother Hippodamia, who induced her sons Atreus and Thyestes to kill him. According to another tradition Chrysippus was carried off from his father's house, or from the Nemean games, by Laius and killed himself, whereupon Pelops laid a curse upon the house of Laius. (Apollod. iii. 5, 5; Athen. p. 602; Schol. Eur. Phoen. 66; Schol. Eur. Or. 5; cf. Thuc. i. 9; Paus. vi. 20, 4).—2. A Stoic philosopher, son of Apollonius of Tarsus, born at Soli in Cilicia, B.C. 280. When young, he lost his paternal property, and went to Athens, where he became the disciple of the Stoic Cleanthes. Disliking the Academic scepticism, he became one of the most strenuous supporters of the principle that knowledge is attainable and may be established on certain foundations. Hence though not the founder of the Stoic school, he was the first person who based its doctrines on a plausible system of reasoning, so that it was said, 'If Chrysippus had not existed, the Porch could not have been.' He died 207, aged 73. He possessed great acuteness and sagacity, and left behind him an extraordinary number of writings, which have perished. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 7, 180; ZENO.)—3. Of Cnidos, a physician, sometimes confounded with the Stoic philosopher, but he lived about a century earlier. He was son of Erineus, and pupil of Eudoxus of Cnidos: his works, which are not extant, are quoted by Galen.

Chrysocēras. [BYZANTIUM.]

Chrysōgōnus, L. Cornelius, a favourite freedman of Sulla, and a man of profligate character, was the false accuser of Sex. Roscius, whom Cicero defended B.C. 80 (Cic. Rosc. Am.).

Chrysōpōlis (Χρυσόπολις: Scutari), on the Bosphorus, opposite to Byzantium, at the spot where the Bosphorus was generally crossed. It was originally the port of Chalcedon. (Polyb. iv. 44; Diod. xiii. 64; Plin. v. 150.)

Chrysorrhōas (Χρυσορροάς: Barrada), also called Bardines, a river of Coele-Syria, flowing from the E. side of Anti-Libanus, past Damascus, into a lake now called Bahr-el-Merj.

Chrysostōmus, Joannes, archbishop of Constantinople, one of the most celebrated of the Greek Fathers, born A.D. 347, died 407. [See Dict. of Christian Biog.]

Chrysothēmis (Χρυσόθεμις).—1. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (Il. ix. 145, 287; Soph. El. 157).—2. Son of Carmanor, the priest of Apollo at Tarrha in Crete. In the first musical contest at Delphi he won the prize by his hymn on the victory of Apollo over the Python (Paus. x. 7, 2).

Chthonia. [ERECHTHEUS.]

Chthōnius (Χθόνιος) and Chthōnia (Χθονία), epithets of the gods and goddesses of the earth and of the underworld, as opposed to the οὐράνιοι θεοί. The χθόνιοι θεοί as deities of the earth had control of all the fruits of the earth, and as deities of the underworld were connected with the death of men and animals as well as of vegetation. The name therefore belongs to Demeter, Persephone, Pluto (= Ζεὺς χθόνιος), to Hermes as conductor of the Shades, to Dionysus Zagreus and to the Erinyes; also to other deities who had taken to themselves attributes of gods of the underworld. The epithet is applied also differently to the Titans (as earth-born), to country nymphs and to the Erechtheidae (as indigenous).

Chytri (Χύτροι). 1. (Chytrī) a town in Cyprus on the road from Cerynia to Salamis.—2. Warm springs at Salamis.

Ciāca, a fortress of the Romans, on the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia.

Cibālae or Cibālis (Vinkovec), a town in Pannonia between the Dravus and Savus, near which Constantine gained a decisive victory over Licinius, A.D. 314: the birthplace of Valentinian and Gratian (Eutrop. x. 6; Ammian. xxx. 7.)

Cibōtus. [ALEXANDRIA, No. 1; APAMEA, No. 3.]

Cibyra (Κίβυρα: Κιβυράτης, Cibyrate). 1. Magna (ἡ μεγάλη: Khorzum), a great city of Phrygia Magna, in the fertile district of Milyas, on the borders of Caria, said to have been founded by the Lydians, but afterwards peopled by the Pisidians. In Strabo's time, four native dialects were spoken in it, besides Greek—namely, those of the Lydians, the Pisidians, the Milyae, and the Solymi. It was the head of a tetrapolis of which the other three cities were Bubon, Balbyra and Oenoanda, each of which had one vote, while Cibyra had two: its own government was a despotism under moderate princes: the city ruled over a large district called Cibyrātis (Κιβυράτης), and could send into the field an army of 30,000 men. In B.C. 88, it was added to the Roman empire, and was made the seat of a conventus juridicus, in which at a later time Laodicea was the chief city. After being nearly destroyed by an earthquake, it was restored by Tiberius, under the names of Caesarea and Civitas Cibyratica. The city was very celebrated for its manufactures, especially in iron. (Strab. p. 629; Liv. xxxviii. 14; Plin. v. 105.)—2. Parva (Κ. μικρά: Ibura), a city of Pamphylia, on the borders of Cilicia.

C. Cicērius, praetor in B.C. 173, conquered the Corsicans, but was refused a triumph. In 172 and 167 he was one of the ambassadors sent to the Illyrian king, Gentius; and in 168 he dedicated on the Alban mount a temple to Juno Moneta. (Liv. xlii. 7, 21, 26.)

Cicēro, Tullius. I. M., grandfather of the orator, lived at his native town Arpinum, which received the full Roman franchise in B.C. 188.—2. M., son of No. 1, also lived at Arpinum, and died 64.—3. L., brother of No. 2, was a friend of M. Antonius the orator.—4. L., son of No. 3, schoolfellow of the orator, died 68 (Cic. ad Att. i. 5).—5. M., the orator, eldest son of No. 2 and Helvia, was born on the 3rd of January, B.C. 106, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. He was educated along with his brother Quintus, and the two brothers displayed such aptitude for learning that his father removed with them to Rome, where they received instruction from the best teachers in the capital. One of their most celebrated teachers was the poet Archias of Antioch. After assuming the toga virilis (91) the young Marcus was placed under the care of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, from whom he learnt the principles of jurisprudence. In 89 he served his first and only campaign under Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Social war. During the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Cicero identified himself with neither party, but devoted his time to the study of law, philosophy, and rhetoric. He received instruction in philosophy from Phaedrus the Epicurean, Philo, the chief of the New Academy, and Diodotus the Stoic, and in rhetoric from Molo the Rhodian. Having carefully cultivated his powers, Cicero came forward as a pleader in the forum, as soon as tranquillity was restored by the final overthrow of the Marian party. His first extant speech was delivered in 81, when he was 25 years of age, on behalf of P. Quintius. Next year (80) he defended Sex. Roscius of America, charged with parricide by Chrysogonus, a favourite freedman of Sulla. This was his first public cause and was creditable to him, not merely for the merits of the speech and its successful result, but also for the boldness of the protest against injustice sheltered by the power of the dictator. (Cf. de Off. ii. 14, 51.) Shortly afterwards (79) Cicero went to Greece, ostensibly for the improvement of his health, which was very delicate, but perhaps because he dreaded the resentment of Sulla. He first went to Athens, where he remained six months, studying philosophy under Antiochus of Ascalon, and rhetoric under Demetrius Syrus; and here he made the acquaintance of Pomponius Atticus, who remained his firm friend to the close of his life. From Athens he passed over to Asia Minor, receiving instruction from the most celebrated rhetoricians in the Greek cities of Asia; and finally passed some time at Rhodes (78), where he once more placed himself under the care of Molo. After an absence of two years, Cicero returned to Rome (77), with his health firmly established and his oratorical powers greatly improved. He again came forward as an orator in the forum, and soon obtained the greatest distinction. His success in the forum paved for him the way to the high offices of state. In 75 he was quaestor in Sicily under Sex. Peducaeus, praetor of Lilybaeum, and discharged the duties of his office with an integrity and impartiality which secured for him the affections and confidence of the provincials, which they soon afterwards showed by selecting him to plead their cause against Verres. He returned to Rome in 74, and for the next four years was engaged in pleading causes. In 70 he distinguished himself by the impeachment of VERRES, and in 69 he was curule aedile. In 66 he was praetor, and while holding this office he defended Cluentius in the speech still extant [CLUENTIUS], and delivered his celebrated oration in favour of the Manilian law, which appointed Pompey to the command of the Mithridatic war. In 65 he defended with great eloquence and ability, as we are told, the tribune Cornelius, who was accused by the Optimates of treason (Quintil. iv. 3, 13, viii. 3, 3). In the following year he gained the great object of his ambition, and although a novus homo was elected consul with C. Antonius as a colleague. He entered upon the office on the 1st of January, 63. Hitherto Cicero had taken little part in the political struggles of his time. It is unjust, as some modern historians have done, to speak of him as a 'trimmer' (cf. ἐπιμηδότηρις, Dio Cass. xxxvi. 43), who had sought the favour of the popular party in order to gain power, and then deserted to the aristocracy. It is no proof whatever to point to his earlier speeches: for a young Roman the first step in political life was advocacy, and he accepted those briefs by which he was most likely to win fame for skill and eloquence, doing his best for his client, as an advocate now would do, whether he agreed with him or not. Hence we cannot take his advocacy of Roscius or Cornelius as evidence that he was 'coquetting with the democracy' at that time: nor can we fairly say that he changed his politics in order to secure the support of the nobles in the consular elections. His sentiments can best be traced through his private letters. Cicero desired to maintain a middle course between the extreme Sullan party on the one hand, and the extreme democrats on the other. To counterbalance the former he allied himself to the equestrian order and supported Pompey, whom he expected to be the champion of the republic on its old lines. But at the time when he stood for the consulship the danger from the revolutionary party made him approach the party of the nobles as the surest bulwark against revolution. What the aims of the revolutionary party were and how they were crushed by Cicero is related in the article CATILINA. For his prudence and energy in crushing the conspiracy Cicero received the highest honours; he was addressed as 'father of his country,' and thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods. Cicero's hope now seemed to be that Pompey, returning after the Mithridatic war, would lead a conservative party formed from the senate and the equestrian order; but this scheme proved abortive. Pompey was no political leader, the equestrian order quarrelled with the senate, and Caesar was able to bring about his coalition with Pompey and Crassus. Caesar was anxious to secure the adhesion of Cicero, and nothing can be wider from the truth than the idea of some modern writers that Caesar and his party wished to avenge the death of the Catilinarians. In fact, Cicero might have joined the coalition as a fourth member (Cic. de Prov. Cons. 17, 41; ad Att. ii. 3). His refusal to support the triumvirate lost him the protection which he might have had against those whom he had made his enemies by his action in the affair of Catiline or from other causes. He had mortally offended Clodius by bearing witness against him when the latter was accused of a violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Clodius vowed deadly vengeance against Cicero. To accomplish his purpose more securely, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family, and it is significant that this adoption took place immediately after a speech of Cicero's which appeared to reflect upon the triumvirs (Cic. pro Dom. 16, 41). Clodius was thus able to be elected tribune of the plebs, and as tribune (58) brought forward a bill, interdicting from fire and water (i.e. banishing) anyone who should be found to have put a Roman citizen to death untried. Caesar made another effort either to save Cicero from exile or to secure his acquiescence in the triumvirate—perhaps he had both motives—he offered to make him an agrarian commissioner or a legatus to himself in Gaul. Cicero refused both offers, and, despairing of offering any successful opposition to the measure of Clodius, voluntarily retired from Rome before it was put to the vote, and crossed over to Greece. He took up his residence at Thessalonica in Macedonia. Here he gave way to despair; and his letters during this period are filled with lamentations. Meanwhile his friends at Rome had not deserted him; and, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of Clodius, they obtained his recall from banishment in the course of next year. In August, 57, Cicero landed at Brundisium, and in September he was again at Rome. Taught by experience, Cicero would no longer join the senate in opposition to the triumvirs. The extent to which he had been broken in to support the triumvirate is shown by his speech against Caesar's recall from Gaul (de Prov. Cons.), and his speeches in defence of Gabinius and Vatinius. How galling this was to him appears from many expressions in his letters (e.g. ad Att. iv. 5, 6, 16, x. 8). In 52 he was compelled much against his will to go to the East as governor of Cilicia. Here he distinguished himself by his integrity, but at the same time it was an absurd vanity which led him to assume the title of imperator and to aspire to the honours of a triumph after subduing some robber tribes in his province. He returned to Italy towards the end of 50, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Rome on the 4th of January 49, just as the civil war between Caesar and Pompey broke out. After long hesitating which side to join, he finally determined to throw in his lot with Pompey, and crossed over to Greece in June. After the battle of Pharsalia (48), Cicero returned to Brundisium, where he lived in the greatest anxiety for many months. He was, however, not only pardoned by Caesar, but, when the latter landed at Brundisium in September, 47, he greeted Cicero with the greatest kindness and respect. Cicero was even able to exert influence with Caesar in favour of some of the Pompeian party, such as M. Marcellus and Q. Ligarius (ad Fam. iv. 4, vi. 7, 12; Plut. Cic. 39). But for the most part he retired from public affairs, and during the next three or four years composed the greater part of his philosophical and rhetorical works. The murder of Caesar on the 15th of March, 44, again brought Cicero into public life. He had begun to fear a coming despotism, and, though not privy to the plot, he certainly approved of the assassination (ad Att. xiv. 11; ad Fam. xi. 8). He put himself at the head of the republican party, and in his Philippic orations attacked M. Antony with unmeasured vehemence. But this proved his ruin. The deaths of Hirtius and Pansa put an end to Cicero's hopes that Octavian might be prevented from coming to terms with Antony; and on the formation of the triumvirate between Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus (27th of November, 43), Cicero's name was in the list of the proscribed. He was warned of his danger while at his Tusculan villa, and embarked at Antium, intending to escape by sea, but was driven by stress of weather to Circeii, from whence he coasted along to Formiæ, where he landed at his villa. From Formiæ his attendants carried him in a litter towards the shore, but were overtaken by the soldiers before they could reach the coast. They were ready to defend their master with their lives, but Cicero commanded them to desist, and stretching forward called upon his executioners to strike. They instantly cut off his head and hands, which were conveyed to Rome, and, by the orders of Antony, nailed to the Rostra. Cicero perished on the 7th of December, 43, and at the time of his death had nearly completed his 64th year.—By his first wife, Terentia, Cicero had two children, a daughter TULLIA, whose death, in 45, caused him the greatest sorrow, and a son Marcus. [No. 7.] His wife Terentia, to whom he had been united for 30 years, he divorced in 46, in consequence, it would appear, of some disputes connected with pecuniary transactions; and soon afterwards he married a young and wealthy maiden, PUBLILIA, his ward, but found little comfort in this new alliance, which was speedily dissolved.—Cicero was not a great nor a strong statesman, but rather an eloquent and adroit politician. As a statesman he showed more judgment and foresight as well as greater firmness in his suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy than at any other time. As a judge of character and of the times he failed: for while his desire to maintain the republic unchanged was sincere and creditable, he was utterly wrong in his idea that Pompey could succeed as champion of the conservative party. That he was forced into a policy of opportunism by the coalition of Pompey with Caesar does not merit all the condemnation which it has received. No opposition was possible; nor again can he rightly be charged with pusillanimity for acquiescing in Caesar's rule after the overthrow of Pompey. There was no lack of courage in his attitude after the death of Caesar. Still less need we question the sincerity of his purpose to support whatever person or policy was in his opinion most likely to preserve the republican constitution. Plutarch (Cic. 49) tells us that Augustus himself pronounced him to have been truly a lover of his country. But it is as an author that Cicero deserves the highest praise. In his works the Latin language attains its highest perfection. They may be divided as follows.—I. Rhetorical Works. 1. Rhetoricorum s. de Inventione Rhetorica Libri II. This appears to have been the earliest of Cicero's prose works.

Bust of Cicero. (From the bust in the possession of the Duke of Wellington.)

It was intended to exhibit in a systematic form all that was most valuable in the works of the Greek rhetoricians, but it was never completed.—2. De Partitione Oratoria Dialogus. A catechism of Rhetoric, according to the method of the middle Academy, by way of question and answer, drawn up by Cicero for the instruction of his son Marcus, written in 46. Editions by Piderit, Lips. 1866; Sauppe, Gött. 1877.—3. De Oratore ad Quintum Fratrem Libri III. A systematic work on the art of Oratory, written in 55 at the request of his brother Quintus. This is the most perfect of Cicero's rhetorical works. Editions: Ellendt, 1840; Piderit, Lips. 1886; Wilkins, Oxf. 1881-1892.—4. Brutus s. de Claris Oratoribus. It contains a critical history of Roman eloquence, from the earliest times down to Hortensius inclusive. Editions by Beck, Camb. U.S. 1853; Piderit, 1875.—5. Ad M. Brutum Orator, in which Cicero gives his views of a faultless orator: written 45. Edited by Sandys, 1835.—6. De Optimo Genere

Oratorum. An introduction to Cicero's translation of the orations of Aeschines and Demosthenes in the case of Ctesiphon: the translation itself has been lost.—7. Topica ad C. Trebatium. An abstract of the Topics of Aristotle, illustrated by examples derived chiefly from Roman law instead of from Greek philosophy: it was written in July 44.—Rhetoricorum ad C. Herennium Libri IV. is generally printed with Cicero's works, but was not by his hand.—II. Philosophical Works. I. POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.—1. De Republica Libri VI. A work on the best form of government and the duty of the citizen, in the form of a dialogue, founded on the Republic of Plato; written in 54. This work disappeared in the 10th or 11th century of our era with the exception of the episode of the Somnium Scipionis, which had been preserved by Macrobius; but in 1822, Angelo Mai found among the palimpsests in the Vatican a portion of the lost treasure. Thus the greater part of the 1st and 2nd books and a few fragments of the others were discovered. Editions by Mai, Rome, 1822, and by Creuzer and Moser, Frankf. 1826.—2. De Legibus Libri III. A dialogue, founded on the Laws of Plato; probably written 52. A portion of the three books is lost, and it originally consisted of a greater number. Edited by Moser and Creuzer, Frankf. 1824, and by Bake, Lugd. Bat. 1842.—II. PHILOSOPHY OF MORALS. 1. De Officiis Libri III. Written in 44 for the use of his son Marcus, at that time residing at Athens. The first two books were chiefly taken from Panaetius, and the third book was founded upon the work of the Stoic Hecato; but the illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature. Edited by Holden, Camb. 1884; Schiche, Prag. 1885.—2. Cato Major s. de Senectute, addressed to Atticus, and written at the beginning of 44: it points out how the burden of old age may be most easily supported. Editions, Shuckburgh, 1886; Howson, 1887; Reid, 1883.—3. Laelius s. de Amicitia, written after the preceding, to which it may be considered as forming a companion: also addressed to Atticus. Edit. Reid, 1883; Shuckburgh, 1885.—4. De Gloria Libri II, written in 44, is now lost, though Petrarch possessed a MS. of the work.—5. De Consolatione s. de Luctu minuendo, written in 15, soon after the death of his daughter Tullia, is also lost.—III. SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. 1. Academicorum Libri II, a treatise upon the Academic philosophy, written 45. Edited by Goerenz, Lips. 1810; Orelli, Turic. 1827; J. S. Reid, 1885.—2. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri V. Dedicated to M. Brutus, in which are discussed the opinions of the Epicureans, Stoics, and Peripatetics, on the Supreme Good—that is, the finis, or end, towards which all our thoughts and actions are or ought to be directed. Written in 45. Edited by Madvig, Copenhagen, 1839; J. S. Reid, 1890.—3. Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri V. This work, addressed to M. Brutus, is a series of discussions on various important points of practical philosophy supposed to have been held in the Tusculanum of Cicero. Written in 45–44. Edited by Kühner, Jenae, 1874; O. Heine, Leips. 1881.—4. Paradoxa, six favourite Paradoxes of the Stoics explained in familiar language, written early in 46.—5. Hortensius s. de Philosophia, a dialogue in praise of philosophy, of which fragments only are extant, written in 45.—6. Timaecus s. de Universo, a translation of Plato's Timaecus, of which we possess a fragment.—IV. THEOLOGY. 1. De Natura Deorum Libri III.

An account of the speculations of the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Academicians, on the existence, attributes, and providence of a Divine Being; dedicated to M. Brutus, and written early in 44. Edited by J. B. Mayor, 1885.—2. De Divinatione Libri II, a continuation of the preceding work. It presents the opinions of the different schools of philosophy upon the reality of the science of divination. Written in 44, after the death of Caesar. Edited by Creuzer, Kayser, and Moser, Frankf. 1828; Stamm, Rüssel, 1881.—3. De Fato Liber Singularis, only a fragment.—III. Orations. The following is a list of Cicero's extant speeches, with the date at which each was delivered. Some account of each oration is given separately with the biography of the person principally concerned. 1. Pro P. Quintio, B.C. 31 (Klotz, Leips. 1862).—2. Pro Sex. Roscio Amerino, 80 (Donkin, Lond. 1882; Landgraf, Erl. 1884).—3. Pro Q. Roscio Comoedo, 76 (Schmidt, 1839).—4. Pro M. Tullio, 71 (Richter, 1834).—5. In Q. Caecilium, 70 (C. Halm, Berl. 1882).—6. In Verrem Actio I., 5th August, 70.—7. In Verrem Actio II. Not delivered (Heitland, Camb. 1877; C. Halm, 1882).—8. Pro M. Fonteio, 69 (Schneider, Leips. 1876).—9. Pro A. Caecina, 69, probably (Klotz, Leips. 1866).—10. Pro Lege Manilia, 66, or De Imperio Pompei (A. S. Wilkins, 1885).—11. Pro A. Cluentio Avito, 66 (Ramsay, 1883).—12. Pro C. Cornelio, 55.—13. Oratio in Toga Candida, 64.—14. De Lege Agraria, 3 orations, 63 (Zumpt, Berl. 1861).—15. Pro C. Rabirio, 63 (Heitland, 1882).—16. In Catilinam, 4 orations, 63 (A. S. Wilkins, 1879).—17. Pro Murena, 63 (C. Halm, 1881).—18. Pro P. Cornelio Sulla, 62 (J. S. Reid, 1882).—19. Pro A. Licinio Archia, 61 (J. S. Reid, 1884).—20. Pro L. Valerio Flacco, 59 (Mesnil, Leips. 1883).—21. Post Reditum ad Quirites, 6th or 7th Sept. 57.—23. Pro Domo sua ad Pontifices, 29th Sept. 57.—24. De Haruspicio Responsis, 56. (The above four speeches ed. by H. Wagner, Leips. 1858).—25. Pro P. Sextio, 56 (H. A. Holden. 1883).—26. In Vatinius, 56 (C. Halm, 1846).—27. Pro M. Caelio Rufo, 56 (Orelli, 1832).—28. Pro L. Cornelio Balbo, 56 (J. S. Reid, 1879).—29. De Provinciis Consularibus, 56 (Tischer, Berl. 1861).—30. In L. Pisonem, 55.—31. Pro Cn. Plancio, 55 (H. A. Holden, 1881).—32. Pro C. Rabirio Postumo, 54.—33. Pro M. Aemilio Scauro, 54.—34. Pro T. Annio Milone, 52 (J. S. Purton, 1877; Bouterwek, 1887).—35. Pro M. Marcello, 47 (Richter, Leips. 1886).—36. Pro Q. Ligario, 46 (Richter, 1886).—37. Pro Rege Deiotaro, 45 (Richter, 1886).—38. Orationes Philippicae, 14 orations against M. Antonius, 44 and 43 (King, 1868; J. E. B. Mayor, 1878; A. Peskett, 1887).—IV. Epistles. Cicero during the most important period of his life maintained a close correspondence with Atticus and with a wide circle of literary and political friends and connexions. We now have upwards of 800 letters, undoubtedly genuine, extending over a space of twenty-six years, and commonly arranged in the following manner:—1. Epistolarum ad Familiares s. Epistolarum ad Diversos Libri XVI, a series of 426 letters, commencing with a letter to Pompey, written in 62, and terminating with a letter to Cassius, July 43. They are not placed in chronological order, but those addressed to the same individuals, with their replies, where these exist, are grouped together without reference to the date of the rest.—2. Epistolarum ad T. Pomponium Atticum Libri XVI, a series of 396 letters addressed to Atticus, of which eleven were written in 68, 67, 65, and 62, the remainder after the end of 62, and the last in Nov. 44. They are for the most part in chronological order, although dislocations occur.—3. Epistolarum ad Q. Fratrem Libri III, a series of twenty-nine letters addressed to his brother, the first written in 59, the last in 54.—4. We find in most editions Epistolarum ad Brutum Liber, eighteen letters, all written after the death of Caesar. To these are added eight more, first published by Cratander. The genuineness of these two books, though disputed, has been fairly established.—The best edition of Cicero's letters, arranged in chronological order, is by Tyrrell and Purser, 1879–1890.—Cicero also wrote a great number of other works on historical and miscellaneous subjects, all of which are lost. He composed several poems, most of them in his earlier years, but two at a later period, containing a history of his consulship, and an account of his exile and recall. A line in one of these poems contained the unlucky jingle so well known to us from Juvenal (x. 122), O fortunatam natam me consule Roman.—Editions of the collected works of Cicero by Orelli, Turin, 1826–1837, 9 vols.; by Baiter and Kayser, 11 vols., Leips. 1869; by Nobbe, 1 vol. Leips. 1869.—6. Q., brother of the orator, was born about 102, and was educated along with his brother. In 67 he was aedile, in 62 praetor, and for the next three years governed Asia as propraetor. He returned to Rome in 58, and warmly exerted himself to procure the recall of his brother from banishment. In 55 he went to Gaul as legatus to Caesar, whose approbation he gained by his military abilities and gallantry: he distinguished himself particularly by the resistance he offered to a vast host of Gauls, who had attacked his camp, when he was stationed for the winter with one legion in the country of the Nervii. In 51 he accompanied his brother as legate to Cilicia; and on the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he joined Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia, he was pardoned by Caesar. He was proscribed by the triumvirs, and was put to death in 43. Quintus wrote several works, which are all lost, with the exception of an address to his brother, entitled De Petitione Consulatus. Quintus was married to Pomponia, sister of Atticus; but, from incompatibility of temper, their union was an unhappy one.—7. M., only son of the orator and his wife Tereutia, was born 65. He accompanied his father to Cilicia, and served in Pompey's army in Greece, although he was then only 16 years of age. In 45 he was sent to Athens to pursue his studies, but there fell into irregular and extravagant habits. On the death of Caesar (44) he joined the republican party, served as military tribune under Brutus in Macedonia, and after the battle of Philippi (42) fled to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. When peace was concluded between the triumvirs and Pompey in 39, Cicero returned to Rome, was favourably received by Octavian, who at length accepted him as his colleague in the consulship (b. c. 30, from 13th Sept.). By a singular coincidence, the despatch announcing the capture of the fleet of Antony, which was immediately followed by his death, was addressed to the new consul in his official capacity, and thus, says Plutarch, 'the divine justice reserved the completion of Antony's punishment for the house of Cicero.'—8. Q., son of No. 6, and of Pomponia, sister of Atticus, was born 66 or 67, and perished with his father in the proscription, 43.

Cichyrus. [EPHYRA.]

Cicōnes (Κίκονες), a Thracian people on the coast, west of the Hebrus, near Mt. Ismarus (Il. ii. 846; Od. ix. 39; Hdt. vii. 59; Verg. Georg. iv. 520).

Cicynna (Κίκυννα: Κικυννεύς), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, and afterwards to the tribe Acamantis.

Cilicia (Κιλικία: Κίλιξ, fem. Κίλισσα), a district in the SE. of Asia Minor, bordering to the E. on Syria, to the N. on Cappadocia and Lycaonia, to the NW. and W. on Pisidia and Pamphylia. On all sides, except the W., it is enclosed by natural boundaries: namely, the Mediterranean on the S., M. Amanus on the E., and M. Taurus on the N. The W. part of Cilicia is intersected by the offshoots of the Taurus, while in its E. part the mountain chains enclose much larger tracts of level country: and hence arose the division of the country into C. Aspera (Κ. ἡ τραχεία, or τραχειώτις), and C. Campestris (Κ. ἡ πεδιάς); the latter was also called Cilicia Propria (ἡ ἰδία Κ.). It united for religious festivals in the Kouḗn Kιλικίας, which met at Tarsus under the presidency of a Κιλικάρχης. Numerous rivers, among which are the PYRAMUS, SARUS, CYDNUS, CALYCADNUS, and smaller mountain streams, descend from the Taurus. The E. division, through which most of the larger rivers flow, was extremely fertile, and the narrower valleys of Cilicia Aspera contained some rich tracts of land; the latter district was famed for its fine breed of horses. The inhabitants of the country seem to have been of a Semitic stock from Syria. [See below, CILIX.] The country remained independent till the time of the Persian Empire, under which it formed a satrapy, but appears to have been still governed by its native princes. Alexander subdued it on his march into Upper Asia; and, after the division of his empire, it formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae: its plains were settled by Greeks, and the old inhabitants were for the most part driven back into the mountains of C. Aspera, where they remained virtually independent, practising robbery by land and piracy by sea. In b. c. 102 the Romans sent a fleet under the praetor M. Antonius, who not only destroyed the fleet of the Cilician pirates, but occupied ports in Cilicia. The Roman province of Cilicia, therefore, really dates from that year, and we find actual mention of Governors of Cilicia, Sulla as praetor b. c. 92 (Appian, Mithr. 57, Aurel. Vict. 75), Oppius in b. c. 89, whom Livy calls proconsul (Ep. 78); Mithridates got possession of it for a time, but after the year 84 the province of Cilicia had its regular succession of proconsuls (cf. Cic. Verr. i. 16, 44). Down to the war against Tigranes the plains of Eastern Cilicia (C. Pedias or Campestris) belonged to the Syrian empire (Appian, Syr. 48). After the defeat of Tigranes, Pompey in b. c. 64 constituted as the complete province of Cilicia the following districts: Cilicia Campestris, Cilicia Aspera, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Isauria, Lycaonia, and the districts of Laodicea, Apamea and Synnada, and to these Cyprus was added in 58. The chief city of Cilicia Campestris was Tarsus, as caput Ciliciae (Cic. Fam. i. 7, 4), later called Metropolis: the chief town of Lycaonia was Ionium: the other centres, which each formed a conventus, were Laodicea and Lycum for the forum Cibyaticum (a group of 25 towns about Cibra); Pergé, for the forum Pamphylium; Philomelium for the forum Isauricum; Apamea, Synnada and Cyprus. This was broken up under Antony after Caesar's death, but Augustus reconstituted the province of Cilicia on a smaller scale, embracing only C. Campestris and Cyprus, while Lycaonia and Isauria were joined to Galatia, and C. Aspera was given to Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. In 22 B.C. Cyprus was separated, and Cilicia Campestris either then or in the reign of Tiberius was placed under the proconsul of Syria. Under Hadrian C. Campestris and Trachea became an imperial province under a legatus.

Ciliciae Pylae or Portae (αἱ Πύλαι τῆς Κιλικίας: Gulek-Boghaz), the chief pass between Cappadocia and Cilicia, through the Taurus, on the road from Tyana to Tarsus. This was the way by which Alexander entered Cilicia.

Cilicium Mare or Aulon Cilicium, the straits between Cilicia and Cyprus, as far as the Gulf of Issus.

Cilix (Κίλιξ), son of Agenor and Telephassa, was, with his brothers, Cadmus and Phoenix, sent out by their father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus. Cilix settled in the country called after him Cilicia.

Cilla (Κίλλα), a small town in the Troad, on the river Cilleus, at the foot of M. Cillaeus, in the range of Gargarus, with a temple of Apollo Cillaeus; its foundation was ascribed to Pelops (Il. i. 36; Hdt. i. 149; Strab. p. 619).

Cilnii, a powerful family in the Etruscan town of Arretium, were driven out of their native town in B.C. 301, but were restored by the Romans. The Cilnii were nobles or Lucumones in their state, and some of them in ancient times may have held even the kingly dignity. (Comp. Hor. Od. i. 1.) The name has been rendered chiefly memorable by C. Cilnius Maecenas. [MAECENAS.]

Kimber, C. Annii, had obtained the praetorship from Caesar, and was one of Antony's supporters, B.C. 43, on which account he is attacked by Cicero. He was charged with having killed his brother, whence Cicero calls him ironically Philadelphus. (Phil. xi. 6, 13, xiii. 12, 26.)

Kimber, L. Tillius (not Tullius), a friend of Caesar, who gave him the province of Bithynia, but subsequently one of Caesar's murderers, B.C. 44. On the fatal day, Kimber was foremost in the ranks, under pretence of presenting a petition to Caesar for his brother's recall from exile. After the assassination, Kimber went to his province and raised a fleet, with which he aided Cassius and Brutus.

Cimbri, a Celtic people, probably of the same race as the Cymry. [CELTAE.] They appear to have inhabited the peninsula which was called after them Chersonesus Cimbrica (Jutland), though the greatest uncertainty prevailed among the ancients respecting their original abode. The Cimbrians were probably a Celtic people with some Teutonic admixture. In conjunction with the Teutones, Ambrones, and Tigurini, they migrated S., with their wives and children, towards the close of the second century B.C.; and the whole host is said to have contained 300,000 fighting men. They defeated several Roman armies, and caused the greatest alarm at Rome. In B.C. 113 they defeated the consul Papirius Carbo, near Noreia, and then crossed over into Gaul, which they ravaged in all directions. In 109 they defeated the consul Junius Silanus, in 107 the consul Cassius Longinus, who fell in the battle, and in 105 they gained their most brilliant victory near the Rhone over the united armies of the consul Cn. Mallius and the proconsul Servilius Caepio. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri, fortunately for Rome marched into Spain, where they remained two or three years. The Romans meantime had been making preparations to resist their formidable foes, and had placed their troops under the command of Marius. The barbarians returned to Gaul in 102. In that year the Teutones were defeated and cut to pieces by Marius, near Aquae Sextiae (Aix) in Gaul; and next year (101) the Cimbri and their allies were likewise destroyed by Marius and Catulus, in the decisive battle of the Campi Raudii, near Verona, in the N. of Italy. In the time of Augustus, the Cimbri, who were then a people of no importance, sent an embassy to the emperor.

Ciminius or Ciminius Mons (Monte Cimino), a range of mountains in Etruria, reaching a height of 3000 feet, thickly covered with wood (Saltus Ciminius), near a crater lake of the same name, between Volsinii and Falerii (Liv. ix. 36).

Cimmērii (Κιμμέριοι), the name of a mythical and of a historical people. The mythical Cimmerii, mentioned by Homer, dwelt in the furthest W. on the ocean, enveloped in constant mists and darkness (Od. xi. 14). Later writers sought to localise them, and accordingly placed them either in Italy near the lake Avernus, or in Spain, or in the Tauric Chersonesus.—The historical Cimmerii dwelt on the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov), in the Tauric Chersonesus, and in Asiatic Sarmatia. Driven from their abodes by the Scythians, they passed into Asia Minor on the N.E., and penetrated W. as far as Aeolis and Ionia. They conquered and held for some time the Milesian colony of Sinope; in 696 B.C. they invaded Phrygia; took Sardis in 635; burnt the temple of Artemis at Ephesus; and destroyed Magnesia on the Maeander. They were defeated by Assurbanipal of Assyria, and by Gyges of Lydia, but held their ground, until they were expelled from Asia by Alyattes. (Hdt. i. 6, 15, 103, iv. 11; Strab. pp. 627, 633.)

Cimmērius Bospōrus. [BOSPORUS.]

Cimōlis (Κίμωνις: Cimoli or Argentiera), an island in the Aegaeen sea, one of the Cyclades, between Siphnos and Melos, celebrated for its fine white earth (ἡ Κίμωνια γῆ, Cimolia creta), used by fullers for cleaning cloths. (Strab. p. 484; Plin. xxxv. 198; cf. Ov. Met. viii. 463.)

Cimon (Κίμων). 1. Son of Stesagoras, and father of Miltiades, victor at Marathon, gained three Olympic victories with his four-horse chariot and after his third victory was secretly murdered by order of the sons of Pisistratus (Hdt. vi. 103).—2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of the great Miltiades and Hegesipyle, daughter of the Thracian prince Olorus, born B.C. 504. On the death of his father (B.C. 489), he was imprisoned because he was unable to pay his fine of 50 talents, which was eventually paid by Callias on his marriage with Elpinice, Cimon's half-sister. [ELPINICE.] Cimon first distinguished himself on the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (480), and after the battle of Plataea was brought forward by Aristides. He frequently commanded the Athenian fleet in the aggressive war against the Persians. His most brilliant success was in 466, when he defeated a large Persian fleet, and on the same day landed and routed their land forces also on the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia. The death of Aristides and the banishment of Themistocles left Cimon without a rival at Athens for some years. But his influence gradually declined as that of Pericles increased. In 461 Cimon marched at the head of some Athenian troops to the assistance of the Spartans, who were hard pressed by their revolted subjects. The Athenians were deeply mortified by the insulting manner in which their offers of assistance were declined, and were enraged with Cimon who had exposed them to this insult. His enemies in consequence succeeded in obtaining his ostracism this year. He was subsequently recalled, in what year is uncertain, and through his intervention a five years' truce was made between Athens and Sparta, 450. In 449 the war was renewed with Persia, Cimon received the command, and with 200 ships sailed to Cyprus; here, while besieging Citium, illness or the effects of a wound carried him off.—Cimon was of a cheerful convivial temper; frank and affable in his manners. Having obtained a great fortune by his share of the Persian spoils, he displayed unbounded liberality. His orchards and gardens were thrown open; his fellow demesmen were free daily to his table, and his public bounty verged on ostentation. [For his buildings at Athens see ATHENÆ.] (Plut. Cimon, Pericles; Tbu. i. 98, 112).—3. Of Cleonæ, a painter of great renown, flourished about B.C. 460, and appears to have been the first painter of perspective.

Cinādon (Κινάδων), formed a conspiracy against the Spartan peers (ἄμωιοι) in the first year of Agesilaus II. (B.C. 398–397). The plot was discovered, and Cinadon and the other conspirators were put to death. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3, 4.)

Cinaethon. [CYCLICI POETÆ.]

Cināra or Cinārus (Zinara), a small island in the Aegean sea, E. of Naxos, celebrated for its artichokes (κινάρα: Athen. p. 70).

Cincinnātus, L. Quintiūs, a favourite hero of the old Roman republic, and a model of old Roman frugality and integrity. He lived on his farm, cultivating the land with his own hand. In B.C. 460 he was appointed consul suffectus in the room of P. Valerius. In 458 he was called from the plough to the dictatorship, in order to deliver the Roman consul and army from the perilous position in which they had been placed by the Aequians. He saved the Roman army, defeated the enemy, and, after holding the dictatorship only 16 days, returned to his farm. In 439, at the age of 80, he was a second time appointed dictator, to oppose Sp. Maelius. (Liv. iii. 25; Dionys. x. 25; Flor. i. 11.) Several of the descendants of Cincinnatus held the consulship and consular tribunate, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Cinēius Alimentus. [ALIMENTUS.]

Cinēas (Κινέας), a Thessalian, the friend and minister of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He was the most eloquent man of his day, and reminded his hearers of Demosthenes, whom he heard speak in his youth. Pyrrhus prized his persuasive powers so highly, that 'the words of Cineas,' he was wont to say, 'had won him more cities than his own arms.' The most famous passage in his life is his embassy to Rome, with proposals for peace from Pyrrhus, after the battle of Heraclea (B.C. 280). Cineas spared no arts to gain favour. Thanks to his wonderful memory, on the day after his arrival he was able (we are told) to address all the senators and knights by name. The senate, however, rejected his proposals mainly through the dying eloquence of old App. Claudius Cæeus. The ambassador returned and told the king that there was no people like that people—their city was a temple, their senate an assembly of kings. Two years after (278), when Pyrrhus was about to cross over into Sicily, Cineas was again sent to negotiate peace. He appears to have died in Sicily shortly afterwards. (Plut. Pyrrh. 11–21; Just. xviii. 2; Eutrop. ii. 12.)

Cinēsius (Κινησιος), a dithyrambic poet of Athens, ridiculed by Aristophanes and other comic poets. But he had his revenge; for he succeeded in procuring the abolition of the Choragia, as far as regarded comedy, about B.C. 390.

Cinga (Cinca), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, falls with the Sicoris into the Iberus.

Cingētōrix, a Gaul, one of the first men among the Treviri, attached himself to the Romans, though son-in-law to Indutiomarus, the head of the independent party. When Indutiomarus had been put to death by Caesar, he became chief of his native city. (Caes. B.G. v. 3, vi. 8.)

Cingilia (perb. Cività Rītenga) a town of the Vestini (Liv. viii. 29).

Cingūlum (Cingulanus: Cingolo), a town in Picenum on a rock, rebuilt and fortified by Labienus, shortly before the breaking out of the Civil war, B.C. 49 (Caes. B. C. i. 15; Cic. ad Att. vii. 11; Sil. x. 84).

Cinna, Cornēlius. 1. L., the famous leader of the popular party during the absence of Sulla in the East (B.C. 87–84). In 87 Sulla allowed Cinna to be elected consul with Cn. Octavius, on condition of his taking an oath not to alter the constitution as then existing. But as soon as Sulla had left Italy, he began his endeavour to overpower the senate, and to recall Marius and his party. He was, however, defeated by his colleague Octavius in the forum, was obliged to fly the city, and was deposed by the senate from the consulate; but the troops at Nola acknowledged him as consul, and with the assistance of Marius, who came back to Italy, he collected a powerful army and laid siege to Rome. The capture of the city, and the massacre of Sulla's friends which followed, more properly belong to the life of MARIUS. For the next three years (86, 85, 84) Cinna was consul. In 84 Sulla prepared to return from Greece; and Cinna was slain by his own troops, when he ordered them to cross over from Italy to Greece, where he intended to encounter Sulla. (Plut. Mar.; Appian, B. C. i. 64–78; Vell. Pat. ii. 24).—2. L., son of No. 1., joined M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the constitution of Sulla (78); and on the defeat of Lepidus in Sardinia, he went with M. Perperna to join Sertorius in Spain. Caesar procured his recall from exile. He was made praetor by Caesar in 44; but was notwithstanding one of the enemies of the dictator. Though he would not join the conspirators, he approved of their act; and so great was the rage of the mob against him, that they nearly murdered him. See below, CINNA, HELVIUS. (Plut. Caes. 68; Suet. Jul. 5, 85.)

Cinna, C. Helvius, a poet of considerable renown, the friend of Catullus. In B.C. 44 he was tribune of the plebs, when he was murdered by the mob, who mistook him for his namesake Cornelius Cinna, though he was at the time walking in Caesar's funeral procession. His principal work was an epic poem entitled Smyrna, containing the story of Myrrha. (Verg. Ecl. ix. 35; Catull. 95, 1.)

Cinnāmus, Joannes (Ἰωάννης Κινναμος), one of the most distinguished Byzantine historians, lived under the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned A.D. 1143–1180), and wrote the history of this emperor and of his father Calo-Joannes, in 6 books, which have come down to us. Edited by Du Cange, Paris, 1670, fol., and by Meineke, Bonn, 1860, 8vo. [BYZANTINI SCRIPTORES.]

Cinyps or Cinȳphus (Κίνυψ, Κίνυφος: Kinifo), a small river on the N. coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, forming the E. boundary of the proper territory of the African Tripolis. The district about it was called by the same name, and was famous for its fine-haired goats. (Plin. v. 27; Verg. Georg. iii. 312; Mart. vii. 94.)

Cinȳras (Κινύρας), son of Apollo, king of Cyprus, and priest of the Paphian Aphrodite, which latter office remained hereditary in his family, the Cinyradae. He founded temples of Aphrodite both at Paphos and at Byblus in Syria. In Cyprus he was regarded as the inventor of useful arts, of mining, of brick-making and of the implements of the smithy (Plin. vii. 195). He was married to Metharne, the daughter of the Cyprian king Pygmalion, by whom he had several children, and among them was Adonis. According to some traditions, he unwittingly begot Adonis by his own daughter Smyrna, and killed himself on discovering the crime he had committed. According to other traditions, he had promised to assist Agamemnon with a certain number of ships, and gave him only small clay models of ships; but as he did not keep his word, he was cursed by Agamemnon, and perished like Marsyas, in a contest of music with Apollo. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 26; Il. xi. 20; Ov. Met. x. 310; Hyg. Fab. 58, 242; Tac. Hist. ii. 3.) His tomb was honoured with that of Aphrodite in Paphos (Clem. Alex. Protr. 3, Hom. v. 23).

Cipus or Cippus, Genūcius, a Roman praetor on whose head it is said that horns suddenly grew, as he was going out of the gates of the city, and, as the haruspices declared that if he returned to the city he would be king, he imposed voluntary exile upon himself (Ov. Met. xv. 565; Val. Max. v. 6; Plin. xi. 123).

Circē (Κίρκη), a mythical sorceress, daughter of Helios (the Sun) by the Oceanid Perse, and sister of Aeëtes, lived in the island of Aeaen, upon which Odysseus was cast. His companions, Circe offering the Cup. (Gell's Pompeiana, pl. 72.)

Circe and Odysseus, and his Companions. (From an ancient bas-relief.)

whom he sent to explore the land, tasted of the magic cup which Circe offered them, and were forthwith changed into swine, with the exception of Eurylochus, who brought the sad news to Odysseus. The latter, having received from Hermes the root moly, which fortified him against enchantment, drank the magic cup without injury, and then compelled Circe to restore his companions to their former shape. After this he tarried a whole year with her, and she became by him the mother of Agrius and Telegonus, the reputed founder of Tusculum. The Latin poets relate that she metamorphosed Scylla, and Picus king of the Ausonians. (Od. x.-xii; Hyg. Fab. 125; Hes. Th. 10, 11; Ov. Met. xiv. 9.)

Circēii (Circiensis: Circello, and the Ru. Città Vecchia), an ancient town of Latium on the promontory Circeium founded by Tarquinius Superbus, never became a place of importance, in consequence of its proximity to the unhealthy Pomptine marshes (Liv. i. 56; Diod. xiv. 102; Strab. p. 232). The oysters caught off Circēii were celebrated (Hor. Sat. ii. 4, 33; Juv. iv. 140). Some writers say that Circe resided on this promontory, and that hence it derived its name.

Circēsium (Κιρκήσιον: Kerkesia), a city of Mesopotamia, on the E. bank of the Euphrates, at the mouth of the Chaboras; the extreme border fortress of the Roman Empire. (Ammian. xiii. 6.)

Circus. [ROMA.]

Cirphis (Κίρφης), a mountain in Phocis, separated by the valley of the Pleistus from Parnassus (Strab. p. 418).

Cirra. [CRISSA.]

Cirta, aft. Constantina (Constantine, Ru.), a city of the Massylii in Numidia, 50 Roman miles from the sea; the capital of Syphax, and of Masinisa and his successors. Its position on a height, surrounded by the river Ampsagas, made it almost impregnable, as the Romans found in the Jugurthine, and the French in the Algerine, wars. It was restored by Constantine the Great, in honour of whom it received its later name. (Strab. p. 828; Polyb. xxxvii. 3.)

Cisseus (Κισσεύς), a king in Thrace, and father of Theane and of Hecuba, who is hence called Cissēis (Κισσηίς) (Il. xi. 223, vi. 297; Eur. Hec. 3).

Cissia (Κισσία), a fertile district of Susiana, on the Choaspes (Hdt. iii. 91; Strab. p. 723).

Cissus (Κισσός: Khortiazzi), a town in Macedonia on a mountain of the same name, S. of Thessalonica, to which place its inhabitants were transplanted by Cassander (Dionys. i. 49).

Cisthēnē (Κισθήνη). 1. A town on the coast of Mysia, on the promontory of Pyrrha, on the Gulf of Adramyttium (Strab. p. 606).—2. (Castel-Roffo), an island and town on the coast of Lycia.—3. In the mythical geography of Aeschylus (Prom. 799) the 'plains of Cisthene' are made the abode of the Gorgons.

Cithaeron (Κιθαρών; Cithaeron, and its highest summit Elatia), a lofty range of mountains, separated Boeotia from Mogaris and Attica. It was covered with wood, abounded in game, and was the scene of several celebrated legends in mythology. It was said to have derived its name from Cithaeron, a mythical king of Boeotia. Its highest summit was sacred to the Cithaeronian Zeus, and here was celebrated the festival called Daedala. (Paus. ix. 2, 4; Dict. of Ant. s. v.)

Citharista, a seaport town (Ceireste), and a promontory (C. d'Aigle) in Gallia Narbonensis, near Massilia.

Citium (Κίτιον: Kitiūs). 1. (Nr. Larneca, Ru.), one of the 9 chief towns of Cyprus, with a harbour and salt-works, 200 stadia from Salamis, near the mouth of the Tetius; here Cinon, the celebrated Athenian, died, and Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school was born. (Strab. p. 682; Thuc. i. 12; Plut. Cin. 18.)—2. A town in Macedonia, on a mountain Cĭŭs, NW. of Beroea.

Cĭus (Kĭos: Kĭos or Kĕĭos, Cĭanus: Ghio, or Kemlik), a city in Bithynia, on a bay of the Propontis called Cĭanus Sinus, was colonised by the Milesians, and became a place of com-moreial importance. It joined the Aetolian league, and was destroyed by Philip III., of Macedonia, but rebuilt by Prusias, king of Bithynia, from whom it was called Prusias. (Strab. p. 564; Hdt. v. 122; Polyb. xvi. 21.)

Civilis, Claudĭus, sometimes called Julius, the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, A.D. 69–70. He was of the Batavian royal race, and, like Hannibal and Sertorius, had lost an eye. His brother Julius Paulus was put to death on a false charge of treason by Fonteius Capito (A.D. 67 or 68), who sent Civilis in chains to Nero at Rome, where he was heard and acquitted by Galba. He was afterwards prefect of a cohort, but under Vitellius he became an object of suspicion to the army, and with difficulty escaped with his life. He vowed vengeance. His countrymen, who were shamefully treated by the officers of Vitellius, were easily induced to revolt, and they were joined by the Canninefates and Frisii. He took up arms under pretence of supporting the cause of Vespasian, and defeated in succession the generals of Vitellius in Gaul and Germany, but he continued in open revolt even after the death of Vitellius. In 70 Civilis gained fresh victories over the Romans, and took Castra Vetera (Tac. Hist. iv. 11, 33, 55, 62). At length he was defeated in the course of the year by Petilius Cerealis, who had been sent into Germany with an immense army (ib. v. 14). Tacitus describes the meeting between Civilis and the Roman general on a bridge over the Nabalua, broken in the middle; but at that point the fragment of the fifth book comes to an end; and we know no more of Civilis. It seems that, though the actual independence of the Batavi was not achieved, yet the terms granted were favourable, and they gained a remission of tribute (cf. Tac. German. 29).

Cizāra (Kĭζαρα), a fortress in the district of Phazemonitis in Pontus; a royal residence, but destroyed before Strabo's (p. 560) time.

Cladāus (Κλάδαος or Κλάδαος), a river in Elis, flows into the Alphēus at Olympia.

Clampetĭa, called by the Greeks Lampetĭa (Λαμπετĭα, Λαμπετĭα), a town of Bruttium, on the W. coast: in ruins in Pliny's time (iii. 72).

Clānis (Chĭana), a river of Etruria, rises S. of Arretium, forms two small lakes near Clusium, and flows into the Tiber E. of Vulsinii.

Clanĭus. [LITERNUS.]

Clarus (ἡ Κλάρος), a small town on the Ionian coast, near Colophon, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Apollo, surnamed Clarius (Paus. vii. 3; Strab. p. 642). Germanicus consulted this oracle (Tac. Ann. ii. 54).

Clarus, Sex, Ercĭus, a friend of the younger Pliny, fought under Trajan in the E., and took Seleucia, A.D. 115.—His son Sextus was a patron of literature, and was consul A.D. 146 (Plin. Ep. ii. 9; Gell. vi. 6).

Classicus, Julius, a Trevir, was prefect of an ala of the Treviri in the Roman army under Vitellius, A.D. 69, but afterwards joined Civilis in his rebellion against the Romans. [CIVILIS.]

Clastĭdĭum (Casteggio), a fortified town of the Ananes in Gallia Cispadana, not far from the Po, on the road from Dertoua to Placentia. It was the scene of the victory of Marcellus over the Insubrians in B.C. 222 (Polyb. ii. 34; Cic. Tusc. iv. 22; Strab. p. 217). It was betrayed to Hannibal by its commander (Liv. xxi. 48; Polyb. iii. 69).

Claterna, a fortified town in Gallia Cispadana, near Bonouia; its name is retained in the small river Quaderna (Strab. p. 216).

Claudĭa. 1. Quinta, a Roman matron, not a Vestal Virgin, as is frequently stated. When the vessel conveying the image of Cybele from Pessinus to Rome, had stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the Tiber, the soothsayers announced that only a chaste woman could move it. Claudia, who had been accused of incontinency, took hold of the rope, and the vessel forthwith followed her, B.C. 204. (Liv. xxix. 14; Ov. Fast. iv. 305; Suet. Tib. 2.)—2. Or Clodia, eldest of the three sisters of P. Clodius Pulcher, the enemy of Cicero, married Q. Marcius Rex (Plut. Cic. 29).—3. Or Clodia (probably the 'Lesbia' of CATULLUS), second sister of P. Clodius, married Q. Metellus Celer, but became infamous for her debaucheries, and was suspected of having poisoned her husband. Cicero in his letters calls her Βοδῶπις. (Cic. pro Cael. 14–20; ad Att. ii. 9.)—4. Or Clodia, youngest sister of P. Clodius, married L. Lucullus, to whom she proved unfaithful (Plut. Lucull. 21, 38).

Claudĭa Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Claudii were of Sabine origin and came to Rome in B.C. 504, when they were received among the patricians. [CLAUDIUS, No. 1.] They were noted for their pride and haughtiness, their disdain for the laws, and their hatred of the plebeians. They bore various surnames, which are given under CLAUDIUS, with the exception of those with the cognomen NERO, who are better known under the latter name.—The plebeian Claudii were divided into several families, of which the most celebrated was that of MARCELLUS.

Claudĭanus, Claudĭus, the last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. He was a native of Alexandria and removed to Rome, where we find him in A.D. 395. He enjoyed the patronage of the all-powerful Stilicho, by whom he was raised to offices of honour and emolument. A statue was erected to his honour in the Forum of Trajan by Arcadius and Honorius, the inscription on which was discovered at Rome in the 15th century (Mommson, I. R. N. 6794; C.I.G. iii. 6246). He also enjoyed the patronage of the empress Serena, through whose interposition he gained a wealthy wife. The last historical allusion in his writings belongs to 404; whence it is supposed that he may have been involved in the misfortunes of Stilicho, who was put to death 408. His extant works are:—1. The 3 panegyrics on the 3rd, 4th, and 6th consulships of Honorius. 2. A poem on the nuptials of Honorius and Maria. 3. Four short Fescennine lays on the same subject. 4. A panegyric on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius. 5. The praises of Stilicho, in 2 books, and a panegyric on his consulship, in 1 book. 6. The praises of Serena, the wife of Stilicho. 7. A panegyric on the consulship of Flavius Mallius Theodorus. 8. The Epithalamium of Palladius and Celerina. 9. An invective against Rufinus, in 2 books. 10. An invective against Eutropius, in 2 books. 11. De Bello Gildonio, the first book of an historical poem on the war in Africa against Gildo. 12. De Bello Getico, an historical poem on the successful campaign of Stilicho against Alaric and the Goths, concluding with the battle of Pollentia. 13. Raptus Proserpinae, 3 books of an unfinished epic on the rape of Proserpine. 14. Gigantomachia, a fragment extending to 128 lines only. 15. 5 short epistles. 16. Eidyllia, a collection of 7 poems chiefly on subjects connected with natural history. 17. Epigrammata, a collection of short occasional pieces.—Claudian was a Pagan, and the Christian hymns found among his poems in most editions are certainly spurious.—The poems of Claudian are distinguished by purity of language, and real poetical genius: his descriptions are often too grandiose, but many, such as the Rape of Proserpine, reach a high order of poetry. Editions by Burmann, Amst. 1760; Jeep, Lips. 1872.

Claudiōpōlis (Κλαυδιόπολις), the name of some cities called after the emperor Claudius, the chief of which were: 1. In Bithynia [BITHYNIUM]. 2. A town in Cappadocia, a little S. of Mytilene. 3. A town in Cilicia, near the Calycadnus.

Claudius, patrician. See CLAUDIA GENS.—1. App. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis, a Sabine of the town of Regillum or Regilli, who in his own country bore the name of Attus Clausus, being the advocate of peace with the Romans, when hostilities broke out between the two nations, withdrew with a large train of followers to Rome, B.C. 504. He was received into the ranks of the patricians, and lands beyond the Anio were assigned to his followers, who were formed into a new tribe called the Claudian. He exhibited the characteristics which marked his descendants, and showed the most bitter hatred towards the plebeians. He was consul 495, and his conduct towards the plebeians led to their secession to Mons Sacer 494. (Liv. ii. 16–29; Dionys. v. 40; Suet. Tib. 1.)—2. App. Cl. Sab. Regill., son of No. 1, consul 471, treated the soldiers whom he commanded with such severity that his troops deserted him. Next year he was impeached, but died or killed himself before the trial. (Liv. ii. 59, 61; Dionys. ix. 54.)—3. C. Cl. Sab. Regill., brother of No. 2, consul 460, when App. Herdonius seized the Capitol. Though a staunch supporter of the patricians, he warned the decemvir Appius against an immoderate use of his power. His remonstrances being of no avail, he withdrew to Regillum, but returned to defend Appius when impeached (Liv. iv. 6).—4. App. Cl. Crassus Regill. Sab., the decemvir, son of No. 2, was consul 451, and on the appointment of the decemvirs in that year, he became one of them, and was reappointed the following year. His real character now betrayed itself in the most tyrannous conduct towards the plebeians, till his attempt against Virginia led to the overthrow of the decemvirate. App. was impeached by Virginius, but did not live to abide his trial. He either killed himself, or was put to death in prison by order of the tribunes. (Liv. iii. 32–58; Dionys. xi. 3.)—5. App. Claudius Caecus, became blind before his old age. In his censorship (312), to which he was elected without having been consul previously, he built the Appian aqueduct, and commenced the Appian road, which was continued to Capua (Liv. ix. 29; Diod. xx. 36). He retained the censorship four years in opposition to the law which limited the length of the office to eighteen months. He was twice consul, in 307 and 296; and in the latter year he fought against the Samnites and Etruscans. In his old age, Appius by his eloquent speech induced the senate to reject the terms of peace which Cineas had proposed on behalf of Pyrrhus (Liv. x. 13; Plut. Pyrrh. 19; Cic. Brut. 14, 55; de Sen. 6.) Appius was the earliest Roman writer in prose and verse whose name has come down to us. He was the author of a poem known to Cicero through the Greeks, and he also wrote a legal treatise, De Usurpationibus (Cic. Tuse. iv. 2, 4). He left four sons and five daughters.—6. App. Cl. Caudex, brother of No. 5, derived his surname (= 'ship's timber') from his attention to naval affairs (Sen. de Brev. Vit. 13). He was consul 264, and conducted the war against the Carthaginians in Sicily (Polyb. i. 11).—7. P. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 5, consul 249, attacked the Carthaginian fleet in the harbour of Drepana, in defiance of the auguries, and was defeated, with the loss of almost all his forces. He was recalled and commanded to appoint a dictator, and thereupon named M. Claudius Glycias or Glicia, the son of a freedman, but the nomination was immediately superseded. He was impeached and condemned. (Liv. Ep. 19; Cic. Div. i. 16, 29, N.D. ii. 3; Gell. x. 2; Polyb. i. 52.)—8. C. Cl. Centho or Centio, son of No. 5, consul 240, and dictator 213.—9. Tib. Cl. Nero, son of No. 5. An account of his descendants is given under NERO.—10. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 7, aedile 217, fought at Cannae 216, and was praetor 215, when he was sent into Sicily. He was consul 212, and died 211 of a wound which he received in a battle with Hannibal before Capua. (Liv. xxv. 41.)—11. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 10, served in Greece for some years under Flamininus, Baebius, and Glabrio (197–191). He was praetor 187 and consul 185, when he gained some advantages over the Ingaunian Ligurians. He was sent as ambassador to Greece 184 and 176. (Liv. xxxix. 33.)—12. P. Cl. Pulcher, brother of No. 11, curule aedile 189, praetor 188, and consul 184.—13. C. Cl. Pulcher, brother of Nos. 11 and 12, praetor 180 and consul 177, when he defeated the Istrians and Ligurians. He was censor 160 with Ti. Sempronius Gracchus. He died 167. (Liv. xlv. 44.)—14. App. Cl. Cento, aedile 178 and praetor 175, when he fought with success against the Celtiberi in Spain. He afterwards served in Thessaly (173), Macedonia (172), and Illyricum (170).—15. App. Cl. Pulcher, son of No. 11, consul 143, defeated the Salassi, an Alpine tribe. On his return a triumph was refused him; and when, on his persistence, one of the tribunes attempted to drag him from his car, his daughter Claudia, one of the Vestal Virgins, walked by his side up to the Capitol. He was censor 136. He gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tib. Gracchus, and in 133 with Tib. and C. Gracchus was appointed triumvir for the division of the lands. He died shortly after Tib. Gracchus. (Cic. Cacl. 14, 34; Val. Max. v. 4, 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 2.)—16. C. Claudius Pulcher, curule aedile 99, praetor in Sicily 95, consul in 92 (Cic. pro Dom. 31, 83).—17. App. Cl. Pulcher, consul 79, and afterwards governor of Macedonia.—18. App. Cl. Pulcher, praetor 89, belonged to Sulla's party, and perished in the great battle before Rome 82 (Plat. Sull. 29).—19. App. Cl. Pulcher, eldest son of No. 18. In 70 he served in Asia under his brother-in-law, Lucullus; in 57 he was praetor, and though he did not openly oppose Cicero's recall from banishment, he tacitly abetted the proceedings of his brother Publius. In 56 he was propractor in Sardinia; and in 54 was consul with L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, when a reconciliation was brought about between him and Cicero, through the intervention of Pompey. In 53 he went as proconsul to Cilicia, which he governed with tyranny and rapacity. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1, ad Fam. xv. 4.) In 51 he was succeeded in the government by Cicero, whose appointment Appius received with displeasure. On his return to Rome he was impeached by Dolabella, but was acquitted. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 11.) In 50 he was censor with L. Piso, and expelled several of Caesar's friends from the senate. On the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he fled with Pompey from Italy, and died in Greece before the battle of Pharsalia. He was an augur, and wrote a work on the augural discipline, which he dedicated to Cicero. He was also distinguished for his legal and antiquarian knowledge. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4, 9, 11.)—20. C. Cl. Pulcher, second son of No. 18, was a legatus of Caesar, 58, praetor 56, and propractor in Asia 55. On his return he was accused of extortion by M. Servilius, who was bribed to drop the prosecution. He died shortly afterwards. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8.)—21. P. Cl. Pulcher, usually called Clodius and not Claudius, the youngest son of No. 18, the notorious enemy of Cicero, and one of the most profligate characters of a profligate age. In 70 he served under his brother-in-law, L. Lucullus in Asia; but, displeased at not being treated by Lucullus with the distinction he had expected, he encouraged the soldiers to mutiny. He then betook himself to his other brother-in-law, Q. Marcius Rex, proconsul in Cilicia, and was entrusted by him with the command of the fleet. He fell into the hands of the pirates, who, however, dismissed him without ransom, through fear of Pompey. He next went to Antioch, and joined the Syrians in making war on the Arabians. On his return to Rome in 65 he impeached Catiline for extortion in his government of Africa, but was bribed by Catiline to let him escape. In 64 he accompanied the propractor L. Murena to Gallia Transalpina, where he resorted to the most nefarious methods of procuring money. In 62 he profaned the mysteries of the Bona Dea, which were celebrated by the Roman matrons in the house of Caesar, who was then praetor, by entering the house disguised as a female musician, in order to meet Pompeia, Caesar's wife, with whom he had an intrigue. He was discovered, and next year, 61, when quaestor, was brought to trial, but obtained an acquittal by bribing the judges. He had attempted to prove an alibi, but Cicero's evidence showed that Clodius was with him in Rome only three hours before he pretended to have been at Interamna. Cicero attacked Clodius in the senate with great vehemence. In order to revenge himself upon Cicero, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family that he might obtain the formidable power of a tribune of the plebs. He was tribune 58, and, supported by the triumvirs Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus, drove Cicero into exile; but notwithstanding all his efforts he was unable to prevent the recall of Cicero in the following year. [CICERO.] In 56 Clodius was aedile and attempted to bring his enemy Milo to trial. Each had a large gang of gladiators in his pay, and frequent fights took place in the streets of Rome between the two parties. In 53, when Clodius was a candidate for the praetorship, and Milo for the consulship, the contests between them became more violent and desperate than ever. At length, on the 20th of January, 52, Clodius and Milo met, apparently by accident, on the Appian road near Bovillae. An affray ensued between their followers, in which Clodius was murdered. The mob was infuriated at the death of their favourite; and such tumults followed at the burial of Clodius, that Pompey was appointed sole consul in order to restore order to the state. For the proceedings which followed see MILO. The second wife of Clodius was the notorious FULVIA.—22. App. Cl. Pulcher, the elder son of No. 20, was one of the accusers of Milo on the death of P. Clodius, 52.—23. App. Cl. Pulcher, brother of No. 21, joined his brother in prosecuting Milo. As the two brothers both bore the praenomen Appius, it is probable that one of them was adopted by their uncle Appius. [No. 19.]—24. Sex. Clodius, probably a descendant of a freedman of the Claudia gens, was a man of low condition, and the chief instrument of P. Clodius in all his acts of violence. (Cic. pro Cael. 32.) On the death of the latter in 52, he urged on the people to revenge the death of his leader. For his acts of violence on this occasion, he was brought to trial, was condemned, and after remaining in exile eight years, was restored in 44 by M. Antonius. (Cic. ad Att. xiv. 13.)

Claudius I., Roman emperor A.D. 41–54. His full name was TIB. CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO GERMANICUS. He was the younger son of Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and of Antonia, and was born on August 1st, B.C. 10, at Lyons in Gaul. In youth he was weak and sickly, and was neglected and despised by his relatives. When he grew up he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits, but was not allowed to take any part in public affairs. (Suet. Claud. 2; Dio Cass. ix. 2.) He had reached the age of 50, when he was suddenly raised by the soldiers to the imperial throne after the murder of Caligula. He proclaimed an amnesty excepting the actual murderers of Caligula. Claudius was not cruel, but the weakness of his character made him the slave of his wives and freedmen, and thus led him to consent to acts of tyranny which he would never have committed of his own accord. He was married four times. At the time of his accession he was married to his third wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, who governed him for some years, together with the freedmen Narcissus, Pallas, and others. After the execution of Messalina, 48, a fate which she richly merited, Claudius was still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece Agrippina. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son, Nero, that she might secure the succession for the latter. Claudius soon after regretted this step, and was in consequence poisoned by Agrippina, 54.—Several public works of great utility were executed by Claudius. He built, for example, the famous Claudian aqueduct (Aqua Claudia), the port of Ostia, and the emissary by which the water of lake Fucinus was carried into the river Liris. In his reign the southern part of Britain was made a Roman province, and Claudius himself, though naturally timid, wished to make some show of military vigour, and went to Britain in 43, where he remained, however, only a short time, leaving the conduct of the war to his generals.—Claudius wrote several historical works, but without force or value, and among them were a history of Rome from the death of Julius Cæsar, in 43 volumes, and an Etruscan history written in Greek (Suet. Claud. 41). He also devised additions to the alphabet :

an inverted digamma for the consonant V; the left half of H for the sound of the Greek v, and an inverted sigma for ps. These (except the last) appear in some inscriptions of that reign, but soon fell into disuse.

Claudius II. (M. AURELIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed GOthicus), Roman emperor A.D. 268-270, was descended from an obscure family in Dardania or Illyria, and by his military talents rose to distinction under Decius, Valerian, and Gallienus. He succeeded to the empire on the death of Gallienus (268), and soon after his accession defeated the Alemanni in the N. of Italy. Next year he gained a great victory over an immense host of Goths near Naissus in Dardania, and received in consequence the surname Gothicus. He died at Sirmium in 270, and was succeeded by Aurelian. (Trebell. Poll. Claud.; Zosim. i. 40-43.)

Clazōmēnæ (αἱ Κλαζομενῆαι; Κλαζομένιος; Kelisman), an important city of Asia Minor, and a member of the Ionian Dodecapolis, lay on the N. coast of the Ionian peninsula, upon the gulf of Smyrna. The city was said to have been founded by the Colophonians under Paralus, on the site of the later town of Chytrium, but to have been removed further E., as a defence against the Persians, to a small island, which Alexander afterwards united to the mainland by a causeway. It was one of the weaker members of the Ionian league, and was chiefly peopled, not by Ionians, but by Cleonæans and Phliasians. Under the Romans it was a free city. It had a considerable commerce, and was celebrated for its temples of Apollo, Artemis, and Cybele, and still more as the birthplace of Anaxagoras. (Hdt. i. 142, ii. 178; Paus. vii. 3, 8; Strab. p. 644; Liv. xxxviii. 39.)

Cléander (Κλέανδρος). 1. Tyrant of Gela, reigned seven years, and was murdered B.C. 498. He was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, one of whose sons was also called Cleander. The latter was deposed by Gelon when he seized the government, 491. (Hdt. vii. 154).— 2. A Lacedæmonian, harmost at Byzantium 400, when the Cyrean Greeks returned from Asia (Xen. An. vi. vii).—3. One of Alexander's officers, was put to death by Alexander in Carmania, 325, in consequence of his oppressive government in Media. (Arr. An. vi. 27).— 4. A Phrygian slave, and subsequently the profligate favourite and minister of Commodus. In a tumult, occasioned by a scarcity of corn, he was killed by the mob. (Dio Cass. lxii. 12.)

Cléanthes (Κλέανθης). 1. A Stoic, born at Assos in Troas about B.C. 300. He entered life as a boxer, and had only four drachmas of his own when he began to study philosophy. He first placed himself under Crates, and then under Zeno, whose disciple he continued for nineteen years, with marvellous strength of purpose and endurance. Stories are told of his taking notes on bones and potsherds of Zeno's lectures, when he was too poor to buy tablets or paper. In order to support himself, he worked all night at drawing water for gardens; but as he spent the whole day in philosophical pursuits, and had no visible means of support, he was summoned before the Areiopagus to account for his way of living. The judges were so delighted by the evidence of industry which he produced, that they voted him ten minæ, though Zeno would not permit him to accept them. He was naturally slow, but his iron industry overcame all difficulties; and on the death of Zeno in 263, Cleanthes succeeded him in his school. He died about 220, at the age of 80, of voluntary starvation. He placed especial value on strength of will (τόνος, εὐτονία, ἰσχύς), making it the source of all virtues, which Zeno sought rather in φρόνησις, and Chrysippus in σοφία. A hymn of his to Zeus is still extant, and contains some striking sentiments. Edited by Sturz, 1785, and Mersdorf, Lips. 1835.—

2. A painter of Corinth, in the 6th cent. B.C. Though Pliny mentions him among the inventors of linear drawing, he seems to come after Ecphantus. Strabo mentions two paintings of his in the temple of Artemis. (Plin. xxxv. 15; Strab. p. 343; Athen. p. 346; Dict. Ant. s.v. Pictura.)

Cléarchus (Κλέαρχος). 1. A Spartan, distinguished himself in several important commands during the latter part of the Peloponnesian war, and at the close of it persuaded the Spartans to send him as harmost to Byzantium, to protect the Greeks in that quarter against the Thracians; But having been recalled by the Ephors, and refusing to obey their orders, he was condemned to death. He thereupon crossed over to Cyrus, collected for him a large force of Greek mercenaries, and marched with him into Upper Asia, 401, in order to dethrone Artaxerxes, being the only Greek who-was aware of the prince's real object. After the battle of Cunaxa and the death of Cyrus, Clearchus and the other Greek generals were made prisoners by the treachery of Tissaphernes, and were put to death (Xen. Anab. i. ii; Diod. xiv. 12, 22).—2. A citizen of Heraclea on the Euxine, obtained the tyranny of his native town, B.C. 365, by putting himself at the head of the popular party. He governed with cruelty, and was assassinated 353, after a reign of twelve years. He is said to have been a pupil both of Plato and Isocrates (Diod. xv. 81; Athen. p. 85).—3. Of Soli, one of Aristotle's pupils, author of a number of works, none of which are extant, on various subjects (Athen. pp. 4, 255, 399, 648, 697).—4. An Athenian poet of the New Comedy, whose time is unknown (Athen. p. 426).

Cleinius. [CLINIUS.]

Clēmens. 1. T. Flavius, consul A.D. 95, son of the brother of Vespasian, married Domitilla, the daughter of Vespasian, and was put to death by Domitian on a charge of 'atheism'—that is, Christianity (Suet. Dom. 15; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 14). [DOMITILLA].—2. Romānus, bishop of Rome at the end of the first century (Dict. of Christian Biog.).—3. Alexandrinus, a distinguished Christian writer, died about A.D. 220 (Dict. of Christian Biog.).

Cleobis. [BITON.]

Cleōbūlinē (Κλεοβουλίνη), or Cleōbūlē (Κλεοβούλη), daughter of Cleobulus of Lindus, celebrated for her composition of riddles; to her is ascribed a well-known one on the subject of the year:—'A father has twelve children, and each of these thirty daughters, on one side white, and on the other side black, and though immortal they all die.' (Diog. Laërt. i. 89.)

Cleobūlus (Κλεόβουλος), one of the Seven Sages, of Lindus in Rhodes, son of Evagoras, lived about B.C. 580. He wrote lyric poems, as well as riddles; he was said by some to have been the author of the riddle on the year, generally attributed to his daughter Cleobuline. He was greatly distinguished for strength and beauty of person. (Diog. Laërt. i. 89-93.)

Cleōchāres (Κλεοχάρης), a Greek orator of Myrlea in Bithynia, contemporary with the orator Demochares and the philosopher Arcesilas, towards the close of the 3rd century B.C. (Strab. p. 566).

Cleombrōtus (Κλεόμβροτος). 1. Son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, became regent after the battle of Thermopylae, B.C. 480, for Plistarchus, infant son of Leonidas, but died in the same year, and was succeeded in the regency by his son Pansanias (Hdt. v. 41, viii. 71, ix. 10).—2. I. King of Sparta, son of Pausanias, succeeded his brother Agesipolis I., and reigned B.C. 330-371. He commanded the Spartan troops several times against the Thebans, and fell fighting bravely at the battle of Leuctra (371) (Xen. Hell. v. 4, 15, vi. 1; Paus. ix. 13, 2).—3. II. King of Sparta, son-in-law of Leonidas II., in whose place he was made king by the party of Agis IV. about 243. On the return of Leonidas, Cleombrotus was deposed and banished to Tegea, about 240 (Plut. Agis, 11-17).—4. An Academic philosopher of Ambracia, said to have killed himself, after reading the Phaedo of Plato; not that he had any sufferings to escape from, but that he might exchange this life for a better. (Cic. Tusc. i. 34, 84; Lucian, Philop. 1.)

Cleomēdēs (Κλεομήδης). 1. Of the island Asypulæa, an athlete of gigantic strength, who is said, in his anger with the judges at the Olympic games, to have shaken down the pillars which supported a roof (Paus. vi. 9).—2. A Greek mathematician, probably lived in the 2nd and 3rd centuries of the Christian era; the author of a Greek treatise in two books on The Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies (Κυκλικής Θεωρίας Μετεώρων Βίβλια δύο), which is still extant. It is rather an exposition of the system of the universe than of the geometrical principles of astronomy. Edited by Balfour, Burdighal, 1605; by Bake, Lugd. Bat. 1820; and by Schmidt, Lips. 1832.

Cleomēnes (Κλεομένης). 1. King of Sparta, son of Anaxandrides, reigned B.C. 520-491. He was a man of an enterprising but wild character. His greatest exploit was his defeat of the Argives, in which 6000 Argive citizens fell; but the date of this event is doubtful. In 510 he commanded the forces by whose assistance Hippias was driven from Athens, and not long after he assisted Isagoras and the aristocratical party, against Clisthenes. He expelled 700 families opposed to Isagoras, and tried to abolish the senate; the populace rose, and Cleomenes and Isagoras were forced to take refuge in the acropolis, whence they were allowed to depart with their Spartan troops under a truce, but their Athenian adherents were put to death (Hdt. v. 64-91; Aristot. Ἀθ. πολ. 19, 20). ARISTAGORAS tried to bribe him to assist the Ionians, but failed, owing it was said to the rebuke of Gorgo, the little daughter of Cleomenes (Hdt. vii. 239). By bribing the priestess at Delphi, he effected the deposition of his colleague DEMARATUS, 491. Soon afterwards he was seized with madness and killed himself (Hdt. vi. 75).—2. King of Sparta, son of Cleombrotus I., reigned 370-309; but during this long period we have no information about him of any importance (Diod. xx. 29).—3. King of Sparta, son of Leonidas II., reigned 236-222. While still young, he married Agiatis, the widow of Agis IV.; and following the example of the latter, he endeavoured to restore the ancient Spartan constitution, and to regenerate the Spartan character. He was endowed with a noble mind, strengthened and purified by philosophy, and possessed great energy of purpose. He desired to unite Sparta to the Achaean League, but stipulated for the chief direction of the Peloponnesian states. It is probable that if Aratus had consented to this the Confederation would have been strong enough to resist Macedonia, but unfortunately he refused to admit the pretensions of Sparta; and a war between Sparta and the League followed, in which Cleomenes was successful. Having thus gained military renown, he felt himself sufficiently strong in the winter of 226-225 to put the Ephors to death and restore the ancient constitution. The Achaeans now called in the aid of Antigonus Dosis, king of Macedonia, and for the next three years Cleomenes carried on war against their united forces. He was at length completely defeated at the battle of Sellasia (222), and fled to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Ptolemy Evergetes, but on the death of that king he was imprisoned by his successor Philopator. He escaped from prison, and attempted to raise an insurrection, but finding no one join him, he killed himself, 210. (Polyb. ii. v.; Plut. Cleom., Arat.)

Cleomēnes. 1. A Greek of Naucratis in Egypt, appointed by Alexander the Great nomarch of the Arabian district (νόμος) of Egypt, and receiver of the tribute from the districts of Egypt, B.C. 331. His rapacity knew no bounds, and he collected immense wealth by his extortions. After Alexander's death, he was put to death by Ptolemy, who took possession of his treasures. (Arrian, iii. 5; Diod. xviii. 14.)—

2. A sculptor, the author of a group of Bacchantes (Plin. xxxvi. 33), possibly the same Cleomenes as the sculptor whose name appears on the so-called Germanicus, in the Louvre, which is a Roman of the early empire, represented as Hermes Logius. The famous statue called the Venus de' Medici, at Florence [p. 86], has commonly been attributed to Cleomenes, on the strength of an inscription on the base, which states it to be the work of 'Cleomenes, son of Apollodorus of Athens.' Michaelis, however (Arch. Ztg. 1880), argues that the inscription dates only from the seventeenth century, and his opinion is adopted by the best critics.

Cleōn (Κλέων), son of Cleonetus, was originally a tanner, and first came forward in public as an opponent of Pericles. On the death of this great man, B.C. 429, Cleon became the favourite of the people, and for about six years of the Peloponnesian war (428-422) was the head of the party opposed to peace. He is represented by Aristophanes as a demagogue of the lowest kind, mean, ignorant, cowardly, and venal; and this view of his character is confirmed by Thucydides. But much weight cannot be attached to the satire of the poet, who was not only on the aristocratic side in politics, but also had a quarrel with Cleon for the complaint laid against the Babylonians; and the usual impartiality of the historian may have been warped by the sentence of his banishment, if it be true, as has been conjectured with great probability, that it was through Cleon that Thucydides was sent into exile. But the facts which were beyond dispute seem to indicate violence in his political attacks, cruelty (in his speeches on the Mytilenaeans, Thuc. iii. 36), and a boastful self-confidence, which made him assume commands for which he was incompetent, as at Pylos and Amphipolis. It is impossible therefore, to regard him as a statesman of high character, though he had more merit probably than Thucydides and Aristophanes allow him. Cleon may be considered as the representative of the middle classes of Athens, and by his ready, though somewhat coarse, eloquence, gained great influence over them. In 427 he strongly advocated in the assembly that the Mytilenaeans should be put to death. In 424 he obtained his greatest glory by taking prisoners the Spartans in the island of Sphaeteria, and bringing them in safety to Athens. Puffed up by this success, he obtained the command of an Athenian army, to oppose Brasidas in Thrace; but he was defeated by Brasidas, under the walls of Amphipolis, and fell in the battle, 422 (Thuc. iv. 21-39, v. 2-10).—The chief attack of Aristophanes upon Cleon was in the Knights (424), in which Cleon figures as an actual dramatic persona, and, in default of an artificer bold enough to make the mask, was represented by the poet himself with his face smeared with wine lees.

Cleōnae (Κλεωναί: Κλεωναῖος). 1. An ancient town in Argolis, on the road from Corinth to Argos, on a river of the same name which flows into the Corinthian gulf, and at the foot of Mt. Apeas; said to have been built by Cleones, son of Pelops (Il. ii. 570; Strab. p. 377).—2. A town in the peninsula Athos in Chalcidice.—3. [HYAMPOLIS.]

Cleōnŷmus (Κλεώνυμος). 1. An Athenian, frequently attacked by Aristophanes as a pestilent demagogue (Ach. 88, Eq. 953, Vesp. 10, &c.).

—2. A Spartan, son of Sphodrias, much beloved by Archidamus, the son of Agesilaus: he fell at Leuctra, B. C. 371 (Plat. Ages. 25, 28; Xen. Hell. v. 4, 25).—3. Younger son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, was excluded from the throne on his father's death, 309, in consequence of his violent and tyrannical temper. In 308 he crossed over to Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Lucanians. He afterwards withdrew from Italy, and seized Coreyra; and in 272 he invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Sparta. (Diod. xx. 104; Liv. x. 2; Strab. p. 280; cf. ACROTATUS.)

Cleopatra (Κλεοπάτρα). 1. (Myth.) Daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Meleager, is said to have hanged herself after her husband's death, or to have died of grief. Her real name was Aleyone. [MELEAGER.]—2. (Hist.) Niece of Attalus, married Philip, B. C. 337, on whose murder she was put to death by OLYMPIAS.—3. Daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexander, king of Epirus, 336. It was at the celebration of her nuptials that Philip was murdered. Her husband died 326. After the death of her brother she was sought in marriage by several of his generals, and at length promised to marry Ptolemy; but having attempted to escape from Sardis, where she had been for years in a sort of honourable captivity, she was assassinated by Antigonus. (Diod. xviii. 23, xx. 37).—4. Daughter of Antiochus III. the Great, married Ptolemy V. Epiplanes, 193.—5. Daughter of Ptolemy V. Epiplanes and No. 4, married her brother Ptolemy VI. Philometor, and on his death, 146, her other brother Ptolemy VI. Physcon. She was soon afterwards divorced by Physcon, and fled into Syria.—6. Daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and of No. 5, married first Alexander Balas (150), the Syrian usurper, and on his death Demetrius Nicator. During the captivity of the latter in Parthia, jealous of the connexion which he there formed with Rhodogune, the Parthian princess, she married Antiochus VII. Sidetes, his brother, and also murdered Demetrius on his return. She likewise murdered Seleucus, her son by Nicator, who on his father's death assumed the government without her consent. Her other son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII. Grypus, succeeded to the throne (125) through her influence; and he compelled her to drink the poison which she had prepared for him also.

[ANTIOCHUS VIII.] She had a son by Sidetes, Antiochus IX., surnamed Cyziceus. (Just. xxxix. 1; Appian, Syr. 69.)—7. Another daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and No. 5, married her uncle Physcon, when he divorced her mother. On the death of Physcon she reigned in conjunction with her older son, Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and then in conjunction with her younger son, Alexander. She was put to death by the latter in 89.—8. Daughter of Ptolemy Physcon and No. 7, married first her brother Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and next Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus. She was put to death by Tryphaena, her own sister, wife of Antiochus Grypus.—9. Usually called Selene, another daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, married first her brother Lathyrus (on her sister No. 8 being divorced), secondly Antiochus XI. Epiphanes, and thirdly Antiochus X. Eusebes.—10. Daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, usually called Berenice. [BERENICE, No. 4.]—11. Eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, celebrated for her beauty and fascination, was 17 at the death of her father (51), who appointed her heir of his kingdom in conjunction with her younger brother, Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. She was expelled from the throne by Pothinus and Achilles, his guardians. She retreated into Syria, and there collected an army with which she was preparing to enter Egypt, when Caesar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey, 47 (Caes. B. C. iii. 103, 107). Her charms gained for her the support of Caesar, who replaced her on the throne in conjunction with her brother. This led to the Alexandrine war, in the course of which young Ptolemy perished (Bell. Alex. 31; Dio Cass. xlii. 43). Cleopatra thus obtained the undivided rule. She was, however, associated by Caesar with another brother of he died in her arms. She then tried to gain the love of Augustus, but her charms failed to soften his colder heart. Seeing that he determined to carry her captive to Rome, she put an end to her own life, either by the poison of an asp or by a poisoned comb, the former supposition being adopted by most writers. She died in the 39th year of her age (B. C. 30), and with her ended the dynasty of the Ptolemies in Egypt, which was now made a Roman province. (Plut. Ant. 29–85; Dio Cass. xlix.–li.)—12. Daughter of Antony and No. 11, born with her twin brother Alexander in 40, along with whom she was carried to Rome after the death of her parents. Augustus married her to Julia, king of Numidia. (Dio Cass. li. 15; Plut. Ant. 87.)—13. A daughter of Mithridates, married Tigranes, king of Armenia.

Cleopatris. [ARSINOË, No. 6.]

Cleophantus (Κλεόφαντος). 1. A Greek physician early in the third century B. C. He is mentioned for his use of wine as a remedy. (Plin. xx. 31.)—2. A physician of a much later date mentioned in the Cluentius of Cicero.

Clēōphon (Κλεοφῶν), an Athenian demagogue, of obscure, and, according to Aristophanes, of Thracian origin, vehemently opposed peace with Sparta in the latter end of the Peloponnesian war. During the siege of Athens by Lysander, B. C. 404, he was brought to trial by the aristocratic party, and was condemned and put to death. (Aristoph. Ran. 677; Xen. Hell. i. 7, 40.)

Cleostratus (Κλεόστρατος). 1. An astronomer of Tenedos, said to have introduced the division of the Zodiac into signs, probably lived between B. C. 548 and 432. (Plin. ii. 31.)—2. A youth of Thespieae who, when a dragon was devastating his country, armed himself in a coat of mail with spikes projecting from it, and offered himself to the dragon, whom he destroyed by the sacrifice of his own life. The name of 'Deliverer' (σαώτης) was, however, not to him, but to Zeus. (Paus. ix. 26, 7.)

Clevum, also Glevum and Glebon (Gloucester), a Roman colony in Britain.

Clides (αἱ Κλειδες: C. S. Andre), 'the Keys,' a promontory on the N. E. of Cyprus, with two islands of the same name lying off it.

Climax (Κλίμαξ: Ekdēr), the name applied to the W. termination of the Taurus range, which extends along the W. coast of the Pamphylian Gulf, N. of Phaselis in Lycia. Alexander made a road between it and the sea. It was in fact a name applied to a narrow pass over a ridge here and elsewhere.

Climberum. [AUSCI.]

Clinias (Κλεινίας). 1. Father of the famous Alcibiades, fought at Artemisium B. C. 480, in a ship built and manned at his own expense: he fell 447, at the battle of Coronea.—2. A younger brother of Alcibiades.—3. Father of Aratus of Sicyon, was murdered by Abantidas, who seized the tyranny, 264.—4. A Pythagorean philosopher, of Tarentum, a contemporary and friend of Plato.

Clio. [MUSAE.]

Clisthēnes (Κλεισθένης). 1. Tyrant of Sicyon. In B. C. 595, he aided the Amphictyons in the sacred war against Cirrha, which ended, after ten years, in the destruction of the guilty city. He was possessed by an anti-Dorian spirit, which led him to give contemptuous names to the Dorian tribes. The Hylleis, Dymanes, and Pamphyli he changed to Hyatae, Choircatae, Cleopatra (No. 11).

Obv., head of Cleopatra; rev., eagle—legend ΑΣΚΑΑ[ΝΙΤΩ]Ν. ΙΕΡΑΣ ΑΣΥΝΟΥ. In the field the monogram [Δ], and the date LNE= 55 B. C. (The head of Cleopatra also appears on a coin of M. Antonius figured on p. 82.)

the same name, and still quite a child, to whom she was also nominally married. She had a son by Caesar, called CAESARION, and she afterwards followed him to Rome, where she appears to have been at the time of his death, 44. She then returned to Egypt, and in 41 she met Antony in Cilicia. She was now in her 28th year, and in the perfection of matured beauty, which, in conjunction with her talents and eloquence, completely won the heart of Antony, who henceforth appears as her devoted lover and slave. He returned with her to Egypt, but was obliged to leave her for a short time, in order to marry Octavia, the sister of Augustus. But Octavia was never able to gain his affections; he soon deserted his wife and returned to Cleopatra, upon whom he conferred the most extravagant titles and honours. In the war between Augustus and Antony, Cleopatra accompanied her lover, and was present at the battle of Actium (31), in the midst of which she retreated with her fleet, and thus hastened the loss of the day. She fled to Alexandria, where she was joined by Antony. Seeing Antony's fortunes desperate, she entered into negotiations with Augustus, and promised to make away with Antony. She fled to a mausoleum she had built, and then caused a report of her death to be spread. Antony, resolving not to survive her, stabbed himself, and was drawn up into the mausoleum, where and Oneatae (Pigs and Asses). In the same feeling he made war on Argos, apparently with success, and suppressed the rhapsodists of Homer, because they told of the glories of the Argives. His death cannot be placed earlier than 532, in which year he won the victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games. (Hdt. v. 67; Thuc. i. 18.) His daughter Agarista was given in marriage to Megacles the Alcmaeonid. The famous anecdote of the marriage feast is told in Hdt. vi. 125.—2. An Athenian, son of Megacles and Agarista, and grandson of No. 1, appears as the head of the Alcmaeonid clan on the banishment of the Pisistratidae. He was opposed by Isagoras and the great body of the nobles, to whom the Solonian constitution gave all political power. Clisthenes, as Herodotus says, took the people into partnership, and in his reforms aimed at placing the constitution on a democratic basis; so that he was the real founder of Athenian democracy. Aristotle calls his reforms the fifth change of constitution in Athenian history: they consisted in (1) the abolition of the four ancient tribes and the establishment of ten tribes, with a further subdivision into demes, which became the local units in political arrangements. In all this he desired to get rid of old associations. From the number of ten tribes followed the number 500 for the Boule; (2) he introduced the law of ostracism as a machinery for getting rid of a violent party leader without civil war; (3) he re-established election by lot; (4) he so arranged the Heliæa as to give greater judicial power to all citizens (Dict. of Ant. art. Dicastes). Isagoras and his party called in the aid of the Spartans, but were defeated [see CLEOMENES], and Clisthenes, who had retired for a time, when the Spartans demanded the expulsion of the accursed Alcmaeonids, was recalled and made good his reforms, B. C. 508. Nothing certain is known of his after life. (Hdt. v. 63–73, vi. 131; Aristot. Ἀθ. πολ. 20, 21, 41; Dict. Ant. s. vv. Boule, Demos, Exsilium, Tribus).—3. An Athenian, whose foppery and effeminate profligacy brought him under the lash of Aristophanes (Nub. 354, Thesm. 574).

Clitarchus (Κλειταρχος). 1. Tyrant of Eretria in Euboea, was supported by Philip against the Athenians, but was expelled from Eretria by Phocion, B. C. 341 (Dem. Phil. iii. 125; Plut. Phoc. 13, Dem. 17).—2. Son of the historian Dinon, accompanied Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition, and wrote a history of it. This work was deficient in veracity and inflated in style, but appears nevertheless to have been much read, owing to the interest of his narrative. His work was largely used by Curtius and Diodorus. (Quintil. x. 1, 74; Cic. Brut. 11, 42, de Leg. i. 2; Plut. Them. 27.)

Cliternum or Cliternia (Cliterninus), a town of the Frentani, in the territory of Larinum.

Clitomachus (Κλειτόμαχος), a Carthaginian by birth, and called Hasdrubal in his own country, came to Athens in the fortieth year of his age, and there studied under Carneades, on whose death he became the head of the New Academy, B. C. 129. Of his works, which amounted to 400 books, only a few titles are preserved. His main object in writing them was to make known the philosophy of his master Carneades. When Carthage was taken in 146, he wrote a work to console his countrymen.

Clitor or Clitorium (Κλειτώρ; Κλειτόριος; near Clituras, Ru.), a town in the N. of Arcadia on a river of the same name, a tributary of the Aroanius: it was traditionally founded by AZAN, and was part of the Azanian district: it had temples of Demeter, Asclepins, and Eleithyia; and a temple of the Dioscri half a mile from the gates (Pans. viii. 4, 21). There was a fountain in the neighborhood, the waters of which are said to have given to persons who drank of them a dislike for wine (Ov. Met. xv. 322; Athen. p. 43). It joined the Achaean League and bravely repelled the Aetolians (Polyb. iv. 18).

Clitumnus (Clitumno), a small river in Umbria, springs from a beautiful rock in a grove of cypress-trees, where was a sanctuary of the god Clitumnus, and falls into the Tinea, a tributary of the Tiber. The valley of the Clitumnus was famed for a breed of white cattle. (Verg. Georg. ii. 146; Prop. ii. 19; Juv. xii. 13.)

Clitus (Κλείτος or Κλειτός). 1. Son of Bardylis, king of Illyria, defeated by Alexander the Great, B. C. 335.—2. A Macedonian, one of Alexander's generals and friends, surnamed the Black (Μέλας). He saved Alexander's life at the battle of Granicus, 334. In 328 he was slain by Alexander at a banquet, when both parties were heated with wine, and Clitus had provoked the king's resentment by a taunt. Alexander was inconsolable at his friend's death. [ALEXANDER.]—3. Another of Alexander's officers, surnamed the White (Λευκός) to distinguish him from the above (Arrian, Anab. vii. 12).—4. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lamian war, 323, and defeated the Athenian fleet. In 321, he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Lydia, from which he was expelled by Antigonus, 319. He afterwards commanded the fleet of Polysperchon, and was at first successful, but his ships were subsequently destroyed by Antigonus, and he was killed on shore, 318. (Diod. xviii. 15, 39, 52, 72.)

Clōacina or Cluacina, the 'Purifier' (from cloare or cluere, 'to wash' or 'purify'), a surname of VENUS.

Clōdīus. [CLAUDIUS.]

Clōdīus, Albinus. [ALBINUS.]

Clōdīus Macer. [MACER.]

Cloelia, a Roman virgin, one of the hostages given to Porsena, escaped from the Etruscan camp, and swam across the Tiber to Rome. She was sent back by the Romans to Porsena, who was so struck with her gallant deed, that he not only set her at liberty, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages. He also rewarded her with a horse adorned with splendid trappings, and the Romans with the statue of a woman on horseback, which was erected in the Sacred Way. (Liv. ii. 13; Dionys. v. 33; Verg. Aen. viii. 651.)

Cloelia or Cluilia Gens, of Alban origin, said to have been received among the patricians on the destruction of Alba. A few of its members with the surname Siculus obtained the consulship in the early years of the republic.

Clōnas (Κλωνάς), of Thebes, a poet, and one of the earliest musicians of Greece, probably lived about B. C. 620. In music he is noticeable for composing hymns for a flute accompaniment, instead of the usual accompaniment of the cithara. (Pans. x. 7, 3; TERPANDER.)

Clōnīus (Κλώνιος), leader of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, slain by Agenor (Il. ii. 495, xv. 340; Diod. iv. 67).

Clota Aestuārius (Frith of Clyde), on the W. coast of Scotland.

Clōthō. [MOIRAE.]

Clūentius Habitus, A., of Larinum, accused in B. C. 74 his stepfather, Statius Albius Oppianicus, of having attempted to procure his death by poison. Oppianicus was condemned, and it was generally believed that the judges had been bribed by Cluentius. In 66, Cluentius was himself accused by young Oppianicus, son of Staius Albius who had died in the interval, of three acts of poisoning. He was defended by Cicero in the brilliant oration still extant, and acquitted. Quintilian (ii. 17, 21) speaks of Cicero having boasted that he misled the judges.

Clūnīa (Ru. on a hill between Coruña del Conde and Pennalba de Castro), a town of the Arevacae in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

Clūpēa or Clūpēa. [ASPRS.]

Clūsium (Clusinus: Chiusi), one of the most powerful of the 12 Etruscan cities, situated on an eminence above the river Clanis, and SW. of the Lacus Clusinus (L. di Chiusi), (Strab. p. 226). It was more anciently called Camers or Camars, whence we may conclude that it was founded by the Umbrian race of the Camertes. It was the royal residence of Porsena, and at Poggio Gajella, three miles NNE. of Chiusi is a hill, in which can be traced the remains of the celebrated sepulchre of this king in the form of a labyrinth (Dict. of Ant. art. Labyrinthus). Subsequently Clusium was in alliance with the Romans, by whom it was regarded as a bulwark against the Gauls. Its siege by the Gauls, B.C. 391, led, as is well known, to the capture of Rome itself by the Gauls. Clusium probably became a Roman colony, since Pliny (iii. 52) speaks of Clusini Veteres et Novi. In its neighbourhood were cold baths (Hor. Ep. i. 15, 9).

Clūsium (Chiese), a river in Cisalpine Gaul, a tributary of the Ollius, and the boundary between the Ceuomani and Insubres (Pol. ii. 32).

Cluvius, a family of Campanian origin, of which the most important person was M. Cluvius Rufus, consul suffectus A.D. 45, and governor of Spain under Galba, 69, on whose death he espoused the cause of Vitellius. He was a historian, and wrote an account of the times of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. i. 8, ii. 65, iv. 43, Ann. xiii. 20, xiv. 2; Plin. Ep. ix. 19.) It is probable that his writings were a chief source of information for Tacitus, Plutarch and Suetonius as regards the above-mentioned reigns.

Clūmēnē (Κλυμένη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of Iapetus, to whom she bore Atlas, Prometheus, and others (Hes. Th. 351, 507; Verg. Georg. iv. 345).—2. Daughter of Iphis or Minyas, wife of Phylacus or Cephalus, to whom she bore Iphichlus and Alcimede. According to Hesiod and others she was the mother of Phaëton by Helios. (Paus. x. 29; Od. xi. 325; Apollod. iii. 9).—3. A companion of Helena, with whom she was carried off by Paris (Il. iii. 144).

Clytaemnestra (Κλυταιμνήστρα), daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, sister of Castor, and half-sister of Pollux and Helena. She was married to Agamemnon. During her husband's absence at Troy she lived in adultery with Aegisthus, and on Agamemnon's return to Mycenae she murdered him with the help of Aegisthus. [AGAMEMNON.] She was subsequently put to death by her son Orestes, who thus avenged the murder of his father. For details see ORESTES.

Cnēmis (Κνήμις; Spartia), a range of mountains on the frontiers of Phocis and Locris, from which the N. Locrians were called Epicnemidii. A branch of these mountains runs out into the sea, forming the promontory Cnēmīdes (Κνημίδες), with a town of the same name upon it, opposite the promontory Cenacum in Euboea. (Strab. pp. 416, 426.)

Cnēmus (Κνήμος), Spartan admiral in B.C. 430, when he made a descent upon Zacynthus. In the following year he operated without success against Phormio. (Thuc. ii. 66, 80.)

Cnīdus or Gnīdus (Κνίδος; Κνίδιος; Ru. at Cape Krio), a celebrated city of Asia Minor. on the promontory of Triopium on the coast of Caria, was a Lacedaemonian colony, and the chief city of the Dorian Hexapolis. It was built partly on the mainland and partly on an island joined to the coast by a causeway, and had two harbours. It had a considerable commerce; and it was resorted to by travellers from all parts of the civilised world, that they might see the statue of Aphrodite by Praxiteles, which stood in her temple here. The city possessed also temples of Apollo and Poseidon. The great naval defeat of Pisander by Conon (B.C. 394) took place off Cnidus. Pliny mentions it as a free city (v. 104). Among the celebrated natives of the city were Ctesias, Eudoxus, Sostratus, and Agatharchides. It is said to have been also called, at an early period, Triopia, from its founder Triopas, and, in later times, Stadia. (Strab. p. 656; Paus. v. 24, 7, viii. 30, x. 11.)

Cnōsus or Gnōsus, subsequently Cnossus or Gnossus (Κνωσός, Γνωσός, Κνωσσός, Γνωσσός; Κνώσιος, Κνώσσιος; Μακρο Τεϊκχο), an ancient town of Crete, and the capital of king Minos, was situated in a fertile country on the river Caeratus (which was originally the name of the town), at a short distance from the N. coast. It was at an early time colonised by Dorians, and from it Dorian institutions spread over the island. Its power was weakened by the growing importance of Gortyn and Cydonia; and these towns, when united, were more than a match for Cnosus.—Cnosus is frequently mentioned by the poets in consequence of its connexion with Minos, Ariadne, the Minotaur, and the Labyrinth; and the adjective Cnosius, Cnosius, or Gnosius is frequently used as equivalent to Cretan. The marriage of Zeus with Hera was celebrated as an annual festival, and Hera appears on the coins as a bride. (Od. xix. 178; Strab. p. 477; Polyb. iv. 53; Diod. i. 61.)

Cōbus or Cohibus (Κῶβος), a river of Asia, flowing from the Caucasus into the E. side of the Euxine.

Cōcālus (Κῶκαλος), king of Sicily, received Daedalus on his flight from Crete, and with the help of his daughters put Minos to death, when the latter came in pursuit of Daedalus (Diod. iv. 78, 80; Hyg. Fab. 44; Paus. vii. 4).

Cocceius Nervæ. [NERVA.]

Cōchē (Κωχή), a city on the Tigris, near Ctesiphon.

Cocinthum or Cocintum (Punta di Stilo), a promontory on the S.E. of Bruttium in Italy, with a town of the same name upon it. (Pol. ii. 14).

Cocles, Horātius—that is, Horatius the 'one-eyed'—a hero of the old Roman lays, is said to have defended the Sublician bridge along with Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius against the whole Etruscan army under Porsena, while the Romans broke down the bridge behind them. When the work was nearly finished, Horatius sent back his two companions. As soon as the bridge was quite destroyed, he plunged into the stream and swam across to the city in safety amid the arrows of the enemy. The state raised a statue to his honour, which was placed in the Comitium, and allowed him as much land as he could plough round in one day. Polybius relates that Horatius defended the bridge alone, and perished in the river. (Liv. ii. 10; Dionys. v. 24; Plut. Poplic. 16; Polyb. vi. 55; Gell. iv. 5.)

Cocossates, a people in Aquitania, mentioned with the Tarbelli (Cæs. B. G. iii. 27).

Cōcylīum (Κοκύλιον), an Aeolian city in Mysia, whose inhabitants (Κοκυλίται) are mentioned by Xenophon; but it was abandoned before Pliny's time (Xen. Hell. iii. 1, 16; Plin. v. 122).

Cōcýtus (Κωκυτός; Ψυφος), a river in Epirus, a tributary of the Acheron. Like the Acheron, the Cocytus was supposed to be connected with the lower world, and hence came to be described as a river in the lower world. [ACHERON; AVERNUS.]

Codānus Sinus, the SW. part of the Baltic, whence the Danish islands are called Codanonia (Mela, iii. 4).

Codomannus. [DARIUS.]

Codrus (Κόδρος). 1. Son of Melanthus, and last king of Athens. When the Dorians invaded Attica from Peloponnesus (about B.C. 1068 according to mythical chronology), an oracle declared that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. Codrus thereupon resolved to sacrifice himself for his country. He entered the camp of the enemy in disguise, began to quarrel with the soldiers, and was slain in the dispute. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they returned home. Tradition adds, that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and Medon, son of Codrus, was appointed archon for life instead. Pausanias (i. 19, 6) speaks of a spot on the banks of the Ilissus where Codrus was slain. An inscription has been found about the temenos of Codrus, showing that it was between the Dionysion and the city gate, S.E. of the Acropolis: it was also the temenos of Neleus (American Journ. Arch. 1887; cf. C.I.A. iii. 943).—2. A Roman poet (possibly a pseudonym), ridiculed by Virgil (Ecl. v. 11, vii. 22) Juvenal (i. 2) speaks of a Cordus or Codrus, as author of a tiresome Thebaid.

Coela (τὰ κοίλα τῆς Εὐβοίας), 'the Hollows of Euboea,' the W. coast of Euboea, between the promontories Caphareus and Chersonesus. very dangerous to ships: here a part of the Persian fleet was wrecked, B.C. 480 (Hdt. viii. 113; Strab. p. 445).

Coelē (Κοίλη), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Hippothontis, a little way beyond the Melitian gate at Athens: here Cimon and Thucydides were buried.

Coelēsȳria. [SYRIA.]

Cōelētae or Coelaetae, a people of Thrace, divided into Majores and Minores, in the district Coelctica, between the Hebrus and the gulf of Melas.

Coelius. [CAELIUS.]

Coelus (Κοιλὸς λιμῆν) or Coela (Κοίλα), a seaport town in the Thracian Chersonese, near Cynossema (Plin. v. 50; Mela, ii. 2, 7).

Coenus (Κοῖνος), son-in-law of Parmenion, one of the ablest generals of Alexander, died on the Hyphasis, B.C. 327 (Arriau, i. 6, iv. 16, vi. 2).

Coenȳra (Κοίνυρα; Kinyra!) a town in the island of Thasos, opposite Samothrace.

Cōēs (Κῶης), of Mytilene, dissuaded Darius Hystaspis, in his Scythian expedition, from breaking up his bridge of boats over the Danube. For this good counsel he was rewarded by Darius with the tyranny of Mytilene. On the breaking out of the Ionian revolt, B.C. 501, he was stoned to death by the Mytilenaeans. (Hdt. iv. 97, v. 11, 37.)

Colāpis (Κόλωψ in Dio Cass.: Kulpa), a river in Pannonia, flows into the Savus: on it dwelt the Colapiani (Strab. pp. 207, 214).

Colchis (Κολχίς: Κόλχος), a country of Asia, bounded on the W. by the Euxine, on the N. by the Caucasus, on the E. by Iberia; on the S. and SW. the boundaries were somewhat indefinite, and were often considered to extend as far as Trapezus (Trebizond). The land of Colchis (or Aea), and its river Phasis are famous in the Greek mythology. [ARGONAUTÆ.] The name of Colchis is first mentioned by Aeschylus and Pindar (Pind. Pyth. iv. 378, Aesch. Pr. 513), but it was probably known to the Greeks at least as early as the 7th century B.C. from its commerce with the Milesian settlements on the Euxine, especially in linen. It was a very fertile country, and yielded timber, pitch, hemp, flax, and wax, as articles of commerce; but it was most famous for its manufactures of linen, on account of which, and of certain physical resemblances, Herodotus supposed the Colchians to have been a colony from Egypt (Hdt. ii. 104; Strab. p. 498). The land was governed by its native princes, until Mithridates Eupator made it subject to the kingdom of Pontus. After the Mithridatic war, it was overrun by the Romans, but they did not subdue it till the time of Trajan. Under the later emperors the country was called Lazica, from the name of one of its principal tribes, the Lazi.

Cōlias (Κωλίας), a promontory on the W. coast of Attica, 20 stadia S. of Phalerum, with a temple of Aphrodite, where some of the Persian ships were cast after the battle of Salamis (Hdt. viii. 96).

Collātia (Collatinus). 1. (Castellaccio), a Sabine town in Latium, near the right bank of the Anio, taken by Tarquinius Priscus.—2. A town in Apulia, east of Teanum.

Collatinus, L. Tarquinius, son of Egerius, and nephew of Tarquinius Priscus, derived the surname Collatinus from the town Collatia, of which his father was governor. The outrage offered to his wife Lucretia by Sex. Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus. Collatinus and L. Junius Brutus were the first consuls; but as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatinus resigned his office and retired from Rome to Lavinium. (Liv. i. 38, 57, ii. 2; Dionys. iv. 64.)

Collina Porta. [ROMA.]

Collŷtus (Κολλυτός, also Κολυττός; Κολλυτεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, was within the walls of Athens, and formed one of the districts into which the city was divided. [ATHENÆ.] It was the demus of Plato and the residence of Timon the misanthrope.

Cöllōnæ (Κολλωναί), a small town in the Troad (Strab. p. 589; Thuc. i. 131; Plin. v. 122).

Cöllōnia Agrippina or Agrippinensis (Cologne on the Rhine), originally the chief town of the Ubii, and called Oppidum or Civitas Ubiorum, was a place of small importance till A.D. 51, when a Roman colony was planted in the town by the emperor Claudius, at the instigation of his wife Agrippina, who was born here, and from whom it derived its new name. Its inhabitants received the jus Italicum. It soon became a large and flourishing city, and was the capital of Lower Germany. (Tac. Ann. i. 36, xii. 27, Hist. iv. 28; Strab. p. 194; Ammian. xv. 11.) At Cologne there are still several Roman remains, an ancient gate, with the inscription C. C. A. A., i.e. Colonia Claudia Augusta Agrippinensis, and the foundations of the Roman walls.

Collōnia (Kara Hissar), a Byzantine fortress town in Pontus, between Cabira and Nicopolis.

Collōnia Equestris. [NOVIODUNUM.]

Collōnus (Κολλωνός; Κολωνεύς, -νίτης, -νιάτης), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, afterwards to the tribe Antiochis, ten stadia (or about 1½ mile) NNW. from the Dipylon gate of Athens, near the Academy, lying on and round a hill celebrated for a temple of Poseidon. This hill was called Colonus Hippius, as being sacred to Poseidon, and to distinguish it from the other Colonus Agoræus in Athens [see ATHENÆ]. The ecclesia summoned by Pisander met within the enclosure of the temenos of this temple on the hill Colonus (Thuc. viii. 67). There were at Colonus altars both of Poseidon Hippius and Athene Hippias, and shrines (ἱερά) of Oedipus, Adrastus, Theseus, and Pirithous; and also a grove of the Eumenides, probably on the NE. side of the hill. About ¼ of a mile NNE. of the hill there is another hillock, which was the hill of Demeter Eucliois (Soph. O. C. 1600); traces of old buildings are found there. It is conjectured that the ἱερά above mentioned and the grave of Oedipus lay between these mounds. The chasm, however, of the Καταρράκτης ὁδός no longer exists. Sophocles, who describes the scenery, was a native of the demus (cf. Paus. i. 39, 4).

Cöllōphōn (Κολλοφών; Ru., near Deirmendere), one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded by Mopsus, a grandson of Tiresias. It stood about 10 miles from the coast, near the river Halesus, which was famous for the coldness of its water, between Lebedus and Ephesus, 120 stadia (12 geog. miles) from the former and 70 stadia (7 g. m.) from the latter: its harbour was called Notium. It was one of the most powerful members of the Ionian confederacy, possessing a considerable fleet and excellent cavalry; but it suffered greatly in war, being taken at different times by the Lydians, the Persians, Lysimachus, and the Cilician pirates. The old Colophon was desolated by Lysimachus, B.C. 302 (Paus. vii. 3, 4). Thus in Roman times the real Colophon had lost its importance, and the name was transferred to Notium: hence Pliny (v. 116) speaks of Notium as having disappeared, because its name had passed out of use; hence also Mela (i. 17) mentions Colophon, and not Notium: the town which they knew as Colophon was really the old Notium. It was made a free city by the Romans after their war with Antiochus the Great. Besides claiming to be the birth-place of Homer, Colophon was the native city of Mimmermus, Hermesianax, and Nicauder (Paus. vii. 3, viii. 28; Hdt. i. 14; Liv. xxxviii. 39; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 4). It was also celebrated for the oracle of Apollo Clarius in its neighbourhood. [CLARUS.]

Cöllossæ (Κολοσσαί, aft. Κολάσσαι; Κολοσσηνός, Strab., Κολοσσαεύς, N. T.; Κηonos, Ru.), a city of Great Phrygia in the plain on the river Lycus, once of great importance (Strab. p. 576; Hdt. vii. 30; Xen. Anab. i. 2, 6), but so reduced by the rise of the neighbouring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis, that the later geographers do not even mention it, and it might have been forgotten but for its place in the early history of the Christian Church. A fortress called Chonæ (Χῶναι) was formed (probably by Justinian) on a precipitous hill 3 miles S. of Colossæ, the position of which was not defensible; and in the course of the 8th cent. B.C. altogether absorbed its population, so that its name passed away, and the village near its site bears the name Κηonos.

Colōtes (Κολώτης). 1. Of Lampsacus, a hearer of Epicurus, against whom Plutarch wrote two of his works.—2. A sculptor of Paros, flourished B.C. 444, and assisted Phidias in executing the colossus of Zeus at Olympia.

Cöllümella, L. Junius Moderātus, a native of Gades in Spain, and a contemporary of Seneca. We have no particulars of his life; it appears, from his own account, that at some period of his life he visited Syria and Cilicia; but Rome appears to have been his ordinary residence. He wrote a work upon agriculture (De Re Rustica), in twelve books, which is still extant. It treats not only of agriculture proper, but of the cultivation of the vine and the olive, of gardening, of rearing cattle, of bees, &c. The tenth book, which treats of gardening, is composed in dactylic hexameters of no poetical merit, and forms a sort of supplement to the Georgics. There is also extant a work De Arboribus, in one book. The style of Columella is easy and clear, but ornate. Edition by Schneider, in Scriptores Rei Rusticæ.

Columnæ Herculis. [ABYLA; CALPE.]

Colūthos (Κόλυθος), a Greek epic poet of Lycopolis in Egypt, lived at the beginning of the 6th century of our era, the author of a poem on 'The Rape of Helen' (Ἑλένης ἀρπαγή), of 392 hexameter lines. Edited by Bekker, Berl. 1816. and Schaefer, Lips. 1825.

Colyttus. [COLLYTUS.]

Comāma, a town of Pisidia, NW. of Termessus.

Comāna (Κόμανα). 1. C. Pontica (Gumnik, 7 miles NE. of Tokat, Ru.), a flourishing city of Poutus, upon the river Iris. Its commercial importance arose from the fact that it lay upon the trade route from Arneveia and Poutus to the port of Amisus: its religious importance arose from its temple of Artemis Taurica, the foundation of which tradition ascribed to Orestes. The high priests of this temple took rank next after the king, and their domain was increased by Pompey after the Mithridatic war, when he gave the high-priesthood to Archelaus and the district within a radius of 8 miles. Attached to the temple were numerous slaves (ιερόδουλοι), a mark of the Asiatic character of this Artemis. No pig was allowed to come near the temple or even into the city (Strab. pp. 547, 557-560, 796; ARTEMIS).—2. Cappadociae, or C. Chryse (Bostan), in Cataouia, was also celebrated for a temple of Artemis Taurica, the foundation of which was likewise ascribed by tradition to Orestes. Strabo, who had himself visited the place, describes the wonderful gorge at this point where the Pyramus breaks through the Taurus range. Comana lay in a glen a little off the main Roman road from Coccusus to Sebasteia. In the temple were 6,000 slaves, male and female, subject to the priest, who ranked next to the king of Cappadocia (Strab. pp. 535, 536; Bell. Alex. 66). [For the local goddess Ma, identified with Artemis, see ARTEMIS.]

Combrēa (Κώμβρεια), a town in the Macedonian district of Crossaea.

Cominium, a town in Samnium, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars (Liv. x. 44).

Commāgēne (Κομμαγηνή), the NE.-most district of Syria, was bounded on the E. and SE. by the Euphrates, on the N. and NW. by the Taurus, and on the S. by Cyrrhestice. It formed a part of the Greek kingdom of Syria, after the fall of which it maintained its independence under a race of kings of the family of the Seleucidae, whose names were Mithridates I. Callinicus (stepson of Antiochus VIII. Epiphanes of Syria), Antiochus, Mithridates II., who sided with Antony at Actium (Plut. Ant. 61), Mithridates III., Antiochus III., who reigned till A.D. 17, when Tiberius gave over Commagene to the province of Syria (Tac. Ann. ii. 42): it was restored in 38 to Antiochus IV., called Epiphanes Magnus, who reigned till A.D. 72, when Commagene, with Samosata (= Flavia) as its chief town, became part of the province governed by the legatus of Syria (Suet. Vesp. 8).

Comnius, king of the Atrabates, was advanced to that dignity by Caesar, who had great confidence in him. He was sent by Caesar to Britain to accompany the ambassadors of the British states on their return to their native country, but he was cast into chains by the Britons, and was not released till the Britons had been defeated by Caesar, and found it expedient to sue for peace. In B.C. 52 he joined the other Gauls in their great revolt against the Romans, and continued in arms even after the capture of Alesia. (Caes. B. G. iv. 21, vii. 76.)

Commōdus, L. Ceionius, was adopted by Hadrian, A.D. 136, when he took the name of L. AELIUS VERUS CAESAR. His health was weak; he died on the 1st of January, 188, and was interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian. His son L. Aurelius Verus was the colleague of Antoninus Pius in the empire. [VERUS.]

Commōdus, L. Aurēlius, Roman emperor, A.D. 180-192, son of M. Aurelius and the younger

Faustina, was born at Lanuvium, 161, and was then scarcely twenty when he succeeded to the empire. He was an unworthy son of a noble father. Notwithstanding the great care which his father had bestowed upon his education, he turned out one of the most sanguinary and licentious tyrants that ever disgraced a throne. It was after the suppression of the plot against his life, which had been organised by his sister Lucilla, 183, that he first gave uncontrolled sway to his ferocious temper. He resigned the government to various favourites who followed each other in rapid succession (Perennis, Cleander, Laetus, and Eclectus), and abandoned himself without interruption to the most shameless debauchery. But he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity, and sought to gain popular applause by fighting as a gladiator, and slew many thousands of wild beasts in the amphitheatre with bow and spear. In consequence of these exploits he assumed the name of Hercules, and demanded that he should be worshipped as that god, 191. In the following year his concubine Marcia found on his tablets, while he was asleep, that she was doomed to perish along with Laetus and Eclectus and other leading men in the state. She forthwith administered poison to him, but as its operation was slow, she caused him to be strangled by Narcissus, a celebrated athlete, Dec. 31, 192. (Script. Hist. Aug.)

Comnēna. [ANNA COMNENA.]

Complūtum, a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Segovia and Bilbilis.

Compsa (Compsānus: Conza), a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, near the sources of the Aufidus.

Compulteria (Sta Maria di Cuvultere), a town of Samnium on the Vulturinus, between Calatia and Allifae (Liv. xxiii. 39).

Cōmum (Comensis: Como), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, at the S. extremity of the W. branch of the Lacus Larius (L. di Como). It was originally a town of the Insubria Gauls, and was colonised by Pompeius Strabo, by Cornelius Scipio, and by Julius Caesar. Caesar settled there 6000 colonists, among whom were 500 distinguished Greek families; and this new population so greatly exceeded the number of the old inhabitants, that the town was called Novum Comum, a name, however, which it did not retain. Comum was celebrated for its iron manufactories: it was the birthplace of the younger Pliny. (Strab. p. 218; Plin. Ep. i. 3, iii. 6, iv. 13.)

Conāna (Κόνανα: Gönen), a town of Pisidia, on the N. frontier.

Concordia, a Roman goddess (= the Greek Ἄρμόνια), the personification of concord, had several temples at Rome. In the earliest times her functions and attributes belonged to Venus Cloacina, to whom a temple in the Comitium is said to have been built to sanctify the union between Romans and Sabines (Plin. xv. 119). But the worship, both public and private, of Concordia herself seems to reach back into legendary times. Temples were dedicated to her by Camillus, B.C. 367, on the reconciliation of plebeians and patricians (Plut. Cam. 42; Ov. Fast. i. 639); by Cn. Flavius near the Area Vulcani in 304, at the end of the second Samnite war (Liv. ix. 46); in 217, to fulfil a vow of Manlius for the cessation of a mutiny in his army (Liv. xxii. 33); by Opimius in 121, after the overthrow of C. Gracchus (Appian, B. C. i. 26). Under the empire the religion was even more marked, probably from a desire to popularise the idea of an acceptable rule established without violent revolution. Livia began a temple to Concord for which a festival was kept on June 11; this temple was consecrated to Concordia Augusta by Tiberius on Jan. 16, A.D. 10 (Suet. Tib. 20; C. I. L. i. 312; cf. Ov. Fast. i. 645). Offerings were frequently made to the goddess on birthdays of emperors or after dangers averted, such as the discovery of a conspiracy (cf. Tac. Ann. ii. 32; C. I. L. vi. 91). Medals were often struck to symbolise union, sometimes as unreal as that of Geta and Caracalla. Concordia is generally represented as a veiled matron, sometimes with a diadem, sometimes a laurel wreath, hearing a cornucopia, an olive branch, or a patera.

Condâte, the name of many Celtic towns, said to be equivalent in meaning to Confluentes, i.e. the union of two rivers: 1. Cosne on the Loire; 2. Condé on the Iton; 3. Rennes in the territory of the Redones; 4. Cognac on the Charente, in Aquitania; 5. Montereau on the Seine; 6. Seysse on the Rhone, below Bellegarde; 7. in Britain, Kinderton, between Chester and Manchester. Condatus Pagus was the old name of Lugdunum (Lyons).

Condŕŕsi, a German people in Gallia Belgica, the dependents of the Treviri, dwelt between the Eburones and the Treviri in the district of Condros on the Maas and Ourthe.

Confluentes (Coblentz), a town in Germany at the confluence of the Moselle and the Rhine.

Conisalus (Κονίσσαλος), a deity akin to ΠΡΙΑΠΥΣ, worshipped at Athens (Strab. p. 588; Aristoph. Lys. 983; Athen. p. 441).

Conôn (Κόνων). 1. A distinguished Athenian general, held several important commands in the latter part of the Peloponnesian war. After the defeat of the Athenians by Lysander at Aegospotami (B.C. 405), Conon, who was one of the generals, escaped with eight ships, and took refuge with Evagoras in Cyprus, where he remained for some years. He was subsequently appointed to the command of the Persian fleet along with Pharnabazus, and in this capacity was able to render the most effectual service to his native country. In 394 he gained a decisive victory over Pisander, the Spartan admiral, off Cnidus (Xen. Hell. iv. 3). After clearing the Aegean of the Spartans, he returned to Athens in 393, and commenced restoring the long walls and the fortifications of Piraeus. When the Spartans opened their negotiations with Tiribazus, the Persian satrap, Conon was sent by the Athenians to counteract the intrigues of Antalcidas, but was thrown into prison by Tiribazus (Xen. Hell. iv. 8). According to some accounts, he was sent into the interior of Asia, and there put to death. But according to the most probable account, he escaped to Cyprus, where he died (Lys. de Bon. Arist. 41-44; Nep. Con. 5; Isocr. Paneg. 41).—2. Son of Timotheus, grandson of the preceding, lived about 318.—3. Of Samos, a distinguished mathematician and astronomer, lived in the time of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Euergetes (B.C. 283-222), and was the friend of Archimedes, who praises him in the highest terms. None of his works are preserved. (Catull. 66, 7; Verg. Ecl. iii. 40; Sen. Q. N. vii. 3).—4. A grammarian of the age of Augustus, author of a work entitled Διηγήσεις, a collection of fifty narratives relating to the mythical and heroic period. An epitome of the work is preserved by Photius.

Κόνωνα (Κωνώπα: Κωνωπέυς, -πίτης, -παῖος :

Angelokastron), a village in Aetolia on the Achelous, enlarged by Arsinoë, wife of Ptolemy II., and called after her name.

Consentes Dii. A hierarchy of twelve gods is found among various nations of Italy. Those of the Sabines were named Volcanus, Voltumnus, Palatua, Furrina, Flora, Falacer, Pomona, Carmentis, Portunus; and it is said that Tatius raised altars to them (Serv. ad Georg. i. 21): Festus (p. 158) mentions twelve gods of the Samnites: the twelve gods of the Etruscans, whose names were concealed from man, six male and six female, formed the council of the supreme Jupiter and were called Di Consentes or Complices (Arnob. iii. 40; Sen. Q. N. ii. 41). At Rome there were also twelve Di Consentes, whose statues were placed in the forum, but they differed from the Etruscan in being spoken of by name and including the supreme deities in their number. They were Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Minerva, Mars, Venus, Apollo, Diana, Vulcanus, Vesta, Mercurius, Ceres. (Enn. ap. Apul. de Deo Socrat. ii. 6; Varr. R. R. i. 1, 4; C. I. L. vi. 102; cf. Liv. xxii. 10.) The name Consentes (cum-esse; cf. praesens) signified 'colleagues,' and the title was at a later time given to Mithras as being received into the circle of Roman deities (C. I. L. vi. 736).

Consentia (Consentinns: Cosenza), chief town of the Bruttii on the river Crathis: here Alaric died.

P. Consentius, a Roman grammarian, flourished in the 5th century A.D. and is the author of two extant grammatical works, one published in the collection of grammarians by Putschius, Hanov. 1605 (De Duabus Partibus Orationis, Nomine et Verbo), and the other by Buttmann, Berol. 1817.

C. Considius Longus, propraetor in Africa, left his province shortly before the breaking out of the civil war B.C. 49, entrusting the government to Q. Ligarius (Cic. pro Lig. 1). He returned to Africa soon afterwards, and held Adrumetum for the Pompeian party. After the defeat of the Pompeians at Thapsus, he attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was murdered by the Gaetulians (Bell. Afr. 93).

Constans, youngest of the three sons of Constantine the Great and Fausta, received after his father's death (A.D. 337) Illyricum, Italy, and Africa as his share of the empire. After successfully resisting his brother Constantine, who was slain in invading his territory (340), Constans became master of the whole West. His weak and profligate character rendered him an object of contempt, and he was slain in 350 by the soldiers of the usurper MAGNENTIUS. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 41; Zonar. xiii. 6.)

Constantia. 1. Daughter of Constantius Chlorus and half-sister of Constantine the Great, married to Licinius, the colleague of Constantine in the empire.—2. Daughter of Constantine II. and grand-daughter of Constantine the Great, married the emperor Gratian.

Constantia, the name of several cities, all of which are either of little consequence, or better known by other names. 1. In Cyprus, named after Constantius [SALAMIS]. 2. In Phoenicia, after the same [ANTARADUS]. 3. In Palestine, the port of GAZA, named after the sister of Constantine the Great, and also called Magiana. 4. In Mesopotamia. [ANTONINOPOLIS.] 5. It was also the name of a town in Rhactia, the modern Constanz on the lake of the same name.)

Constantina, daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married to Hanniballianus, and after his death to Gallus Caesar.

Constantina, the city. [CERTA.]
Constantinópolis. [BYZANTINIUM.]

Constantinus. 1. I., Surnamed 'the Great,' Roman emperor, A.D. 306-337, eldest son of the emperor Constantius Chlorus and Helena, was born A.D. 272, at Naissus (Nissa), a town in upper Moesia. He was early trained to arms, and served with great distinction under Galerius in the Persian war. Galerius became jealous of him and detained him for some time in the E.; but Constantine at last contrived to join his father in Gaul just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts, 306. His father died at York in the same year, and Constantine laid claim to a share of the empire. Galerius, who dreaded a struggle with the brave legions of the West, acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Caesar only. The commencement of Constantine's reign, however, is placed in this year, though he did not receive the title of Augustus till 308. Constantine took up his residence at Treviri (Trèves), where the remains of his palace are still extant. He governed with justice and firmness, beloved by his subjects, and feared by the neighbouring barbarians. It was not long, however, before he became involved in war with his rivals in the empire. In the same year that he had been acknowledged Caesar (306), Maxentius, the son of Maximian, had seized the imperial power at Rome. Constantine entered into a close alliance with Maxentius by marrying his sister Fausta. But in 310 Maximian formed a plot against Constantine, and was put to death by his son-in-law at Massilia. Maxentius resented the death of his father, and began to make preparations to attack Constantine in Gaul. Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy at the head of a large army. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at the village of Saxa Rubra near Rome, October 27th, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. It was in this campaign that Constantine is said to have been converted to Christianity. On his march from the North to Rome, either at Autun in Gaul, or near Andernach on the Rhine, or at Verona, he is said to have seen in the sky a luminous cross with the inscription ἐν τούτῳ νικᾷ, BY THIS CONQUER; and on the night before the last and decisive battle with Maxentius, a vision is said to have appeared to Constantine in his sleep, bidding him inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the sacred monogram of the name of Christ. The tale of the cross seems to have grown out of that of the vision, and even the latter is not entitled to credit. The story rests on the authority of Eusebius (Vit. Const. i. 28-30), who does not repeat it in his Hist. Eccles. It was Constantine's interest to gain the affections of his numerous Christian subjects in his struggle with his rivals; and it was probably only self-interest which led him at first to adopt Christianity. But whether sincere or not in his conversion, his conduct did little credit to the religion which he professed. His conversion was commemorated by the imperial standard of the Labarum, at the summit of which was the monogram of the name of Christ. Constantine, by his victory over Maxentius, became sole master of the West.

Meantime important events took place in the East. On the death of Galerius in 311, Licinius and Maximian had divided the East between them; but in 313 a war broke out between them, Maximian was defeated, and died at Tarsus. Thus there were only two emperors left, Licinius in the East and Constantine in the West; and between them war broke out in 314, although Licinius had married in the preceding year Constantia, the sister of Constantine. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia and afterwards at Adrianople. Peace was then concluded on condition that Licinius should resign to Constantine Illyricum, Macedonia, and Achaia, 314. This peace continued undisturbed for nine years, during which time Constantine was frequently engaged in war with the barbarians on the Danube and the Rhine. In these wars his son Crispus greatly distinguished himself. In 323 the war between Constantine and Licinius was renewed. Licinius was again defeated in two great battles, first near Adrianople, and again at Chalcedon. He surrendered himself to Constantine on condition of having his life spared, but he was shortly afterwards put to death at Thessalonica by order of Constantine. Constantine was now sole master of the empire. He resolved to remove the seat of empire to Byzantium, which he called after his own name Constantinople, or the City of Constantine. Among the evidences of his wisdom and capacity the choice of this site for his capital is not the least remarkable. The new city was solemnly dedicated in 330. Constantine reigned in peace for the remainder of his life. In 325 he supported the orthodox bishops at the great Christian council of Nicaea (Nice), which condemned the Arian doctrine by adopting the word ὁμοούσιον. In 324 he put to death his eldest son, Crispus, on a charge of treason, the truth of which, however, seems very doubtful. He died in May, 337, having been baptised shortly before his death by Eusebius. His three sons Constantine, Constantius and Constans succeeded him in the empire. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 40; Zos. ii.; Zonar. xiii.; Oros. vii.; Amm. Marc. xiv.; Euseb. Vita Constantini.)

 —2. II., Roman emperor, 337-340, eldest of the three sons of Constantine the Great, by Fausta, received Gaul, Britain, Spain, and part of Africa at his father's death. Dissatisfied with his share of the empire, he made war upon his younger brother Constans, who governed Italy, but was defeated and slain near Aquileia. (Zosim. vi.; Zonar.)—3. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, 407. He also obtained possession of Gaul and Spain, and took up his residence in the former country. He reigned four years, but was defeated in 411, by Constantius, the general of Honorius, was taken prisoner and carried to Ravenna, where he was put to death. (Zosim. vi.; Oros. vii. 40.)—4. Constantine is likewise the name of many of the later emperors of Constantinople. Of these Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, who reigned 911-959, was celebrated for his literary works, many of which have come down to us.

Constantius. 1. I., Surnamed Chlorus, 'the pale,' Roman emperor, A.D. 305-306, was the son of Eutropius, a noble Dardanian, and of Claudia, daughter of Crispus, brother of Claudius II. He was one of the two Caesars appointed by Maximian and Diocletian in 292, and received the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treviri (Trèves) as his residence. At the same time he married Theodora, the daughter of the wife of Maximian, divorcing for that purpose his wife Helena. As Caesar he rendered the empire important services. His first effort was to reunite Britain to the empire, which after the murder of Carausius was governed by Allectus. After a struggle of three years (293-296) with Allectus, Constantius, established his authority in Britain. He was equally successful against the Alemanni, whom he defeated with great loss. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, in 305, Constantius and Galerius became the Augusti. Constantius died 15 months afterwards (July, 306) at Eboracum (York) in Britain on an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantine, afterwards the Great, who succeeded him in his share of the government. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 39; Eutrop. ix. 14-23; Zosim. ii. 7.)—2. II., Roman emperor 337-361, third son of Constantine the Great by his second wife, Fausta. On the death of his father in 337, he received the East as his share of the empire, and became involved in war with the Persians, which was carried on during the greater part of his reign. This war prevented him from taking any part in the struggle between his brothers Constantine and Constans, which ended in the defeat and death of the former, and the accession of the latter to the sole empire of the West, 340. After the death of Constans in 350, Constantius marched into the West in order to oppose Magnentius and Vetranio, both of whom had assumed the purple. Vetranio submitted to Constantius, and Magnentius was finally crushed in 353. Thus the whole empire again became subject to one ruler. In 354 Constantius put to death his cousin Gallus, whom he had left in command of the East, while he marched against the usurpers in the West. In 355 Constantius made Julian, the brother of Gallus, Caesar, and sent him into Gaul to oppose the barbarians. In 360 Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the soldiers at Paris. Constantius prepared for war and set out for Europe, but died on his march in Cilicia, 361. He was succeeded by Julian. (Amm. Marc. xiv.-xxi.; Zosim. ii., iii.; Agath. iv.)—3. III., Emperor of the West (A.D. 421), a distinguished general of Honorius. He defeated the usurper Constantine in 411, and also fought successfully against the barbarians. He was rewarded for these services with the hand of Placidia, the sister of Honorius. In 421 he was declared Augustus by Honorius, but died in the 7th month of his reign. (Zosim. vi.; Oros. vii. 42.)

Consus, an ancient Italian divinity, who was wrongly identified with Neptunus Equester = Ποσειδων Ἴππιος (Liv. i. 9; Dionys. ii. 81; Plut. Q. R. 45; Strab. p. 230; cf. Auson. Ep. 69, 9). There can be little doubt that this idea came from the use of horses in his festival and that Consus was a primitive Italian deity connected with the earth and agriculture. He belonged to the circle of ancient deities, Saturn, Janus and Terminus, his festival was at the harvest season, and the practice of keeping his altar at the end of the Circus Maximus (Vurr. L. L. vi. 20; Tac. Ann. xii. 24), always covered with earth except during the days of his festival indicated the god of the Earth (Plut. Rom. 14; Tertull. de Spect. 5; Dict. Ant. s.v. Consualia). The Latin writers explained his name by regarding him as the god of good counsel, and said that he advised the rape of the Sabines (Ov. Fast. iii. 199; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 636). This shows the antiquity of the worship: as to the name, it is perhaps connected with consero, convivia, Consus being the god of seed-time and harvest.

Convēnae, a people in Aquitania near the Pyrenees and on both sides of the Garumna, a mixed race which had served under Sertorius, and were settled in Aquitania by Pompey. They possessed the Jus Latii. Their chief town was Lugdunum (St. Bertrand de Comminges), situated on a solitary rock: in its neighbourhood were celebrated warm baths, Aquae Convenarum (Bagnères). (Strab. p. 190.)

Cōpae (Κῶπαι: Κῶπαιεύς: nr. Topoglia), an ancient town in Boeotia on the N. side of the lake Copais, which derived its name from this place. It was originally situated on an island in the lake, subsequently connected with the mainland by a mole. (Thuc. iv. 93; Paus. ix. 24.)

Copāis (Κῶπαις λίμνη), a lake in Boeotia, and the largest lake in Greece, formed chiefly by the river Cephissus, the waters of which are emptied into the Euboean sea by several subterranean canals, called Katavothra by the modern Greeks. The lake was originally called Cephisus, under which name it occurs in Homer (Il. v. 709), and subsequently different parts of it were called after the towns situated on it, Haliartus, Orchomenus, Onchestus, Copae, &c.; but the name Copais became the most common, because near Cōpae the waters of the lake are the deepest and are never dried up. In the summer the greater part of the lake is dry, and becomes a green meadow, in which cattle are pastured. The eels of this lake were much prized in antiquity, and they retain their celebrity in modern times.

Cophen or Cophes (Κοφήν Arrian, Κόφης Strab.: Cabul), the only large tributary river which flows into the Indus from the W. It was the boundary between India and Ariana.

C. Copōniūs, praetor B.C. 49, fought on the side of Pompey; he was proscribed by the triumvirs in 43, but his wife obtained his pardon from Antony by the sacrifice of her honour (Appian, B. C. iii. 40).

Coprātes (Κοπράτης: Abzal), a river of Suisiana, flowing from the N. into the Pasitigris on its W. side (Strab. p. 729).

Copreus (Κοπρεύς), son of Pelops, who after murdering Iphitus, fled to Mycenae, where he was purified by Eurystheus (Il. xv. 639).

Coptos (Κοπτός: Koft. Ru.), a city of the Thebais or Upper Egypt, lay a little to the E. of the Nile, some distance below Thebes. Under the Ptolemies, it was the central point of the commerce with Arabia and India, by way of Berenice and Myos-Hormos. It was destroyed by Diocletian, but again became a considerable place. The neighbourhood was celebrated for its emeralds and other precious stones, and produced also a light wine.

Cora (Coranus: Cori), an ancient town in Latium in the Volscian mountains, SE. of Velitrae, said to have been founded by the Argive Corax. At Cori are remains of Cyclopiian walls and of a temple. (Verg. Aen. vi. 766; Liv. ii. 16; Dionys. v. 61; Propert. iv. 10, 26.)

Coracēsium (Κορακῆσιον: Alaya), a very strong city of Cilicia Aspera, on the borders of Pamphylia, standing upon a steep rock, and possessing a good harbour. It was the only place in Cilicia which opposed a successful resistance to Alexander: it became at last the headquarters of the Cilician pirates, and was taken by Pompey. (Strab. p. 668; Plut. Pomp. 28.)

Corassiae (Κορασῖαι), a group of small islands in the Icarian sea, SW. of Icaria. They must not be confounded, as they often are, with Corsæae or Corsiae (Κόρσαι or Κόρσιαι), off the Ionian coast and opposite the promontory Ampelos in Samos. (Strab. pp. 448, 636.)

Corax (Κόραξ), a Sicilian rhetorician, who by his oratorical powers became the leading man in Syracuse, after the expulsion of Thrasybulus, B.C. 467. He wrote the earliest work on the art of rhetoric, and his treatise (entitled Τέχνη) was celebrated in antiquity. (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 24; Cic. de Or. i. 20, 91, iii. 21, 81, Brut. 12, 45; Quintil. iii. 1.)

Corbio (Rocca Priore), an ancient city of Latium on the NE. side of the Alban hills, about 3 miles from Tusculum. It was first a Latin, then an Aequian city, and is said to have been destroyed by the Romans B.C. 457. (Dionys. v. 61, x. 24; Liv. ii. 39, iii. 28.)

Corbulo, Cn. Domitius, a distinguished general under Claudius and Nero. His sister Caesonia was married to the Emperor Caligula. In A.D. 47 he carried on war in Germany with success, but his fame rests chiefly upon his glorious campaigns against the Parthians in the reign of Nero, against Vologaes and Tiridates. Though beloved by the army, he continued faithful to Nero, but his only reward was death. Nero, who had become jealous of his fame and influence, invited him to Corinth. As soon as he landed at Cencreae, he was informed that orders had been issued for his death, whereupon he plunged his sword into his breast exclaiming, 'Well deserved!' It is probable that it is the same Domitius Corbulo of whom Tacitus speaks as praetor in A.D. 21 (cf. Dio Cass. lix. 15). (Tac. Ann. iii. 31, ix. 18, xiii. 6, 34, xiv. 22, xv. 1, 26; Dio Cass. lxii. 19, lxiii. 17.) Juvenal speaks of his great bodily size (iii. 251).

Corcyra (Κέρκυρα, later Κόρκυρα: Κερκυραῖος; Corfu, from the Byzantine Κορυφῶ), an island in the Ionian sea, off the coast of Epirus, about 38 miles in length, but of very unequal breadth. It is generally mountainous, but possesses many fertile valleys. Its two chief towns were Corcyra, the modern town of Corfu, in the middle of the E. coast, and Cassiope, N. of the former. The ancients universally regarded this island as the Homeric Scheria (Σχέρη), where the enterprising and sea-loving Phaeacians dwelt, governed by their king Alcinoüs (Od. v. 34; Thuc. i. 25). The island is said to have also borne the name of Drepane (Δρεπάνη) or the 'Sickle' in ancient times. About B.C. 700 it was colonised by the Corinthians under Chersicrates, one of the Bacchiadae, who drove out the Liburnians, who were then inhabiting the island. It soon became rich and powerful by its extensive commerce; it founded many colonies on the opposite coast, Epidamnus, Apollonia, Leucas, Anactorium; and it exercised such influence in the Ionian and Adriatic seas as to become a formidable rival to Corinth. Thus the two states early became involved in war, and about B.C. 664 a battle was fought between them, memorable as the most ancient sea-fight noticed by Greek historians. At a later period Corcyra by invoking the aid of Athens against the Corinthians became one of the proximate causes of the Peloponnesian war, 431. Shortly afterwards her power declined in consequence of civil dissensions, in which both the aristocratical and popular parties were guilty of the most horrible atrocities against each other (Thuc. iv. 46). It is mentioned as under the sway of Athens in 375 B.C. (Xen. Hell. v. 4, 64, vi. 2, 3). It fell later successively under the power of Agathocles, Pyrrhus, and the Illyrian Greek Teuta, from whose general Demetrius the Romans took it B.C. 229 (Pol. ii. 9, Appian, Ill. 8). It seems to have been administered by a non-senatorial praefectus, subject to the proconsul of Gallia Cisalpina at one time and of Macedonia at another (Pol. xxii. 15); in the time of Caesar to the former. Under the empire it was attached to the province called variously Illyricum and Dalmatia.

Corcyra Nigra (Curzola, in Slavonic Karkar) an island off the coast of Illyricum, surnamed the 'Black,' on account of its numerous forests, to distinguish it from the more celebrated Corcyra. It contained a Greek town of the same name founded by Cnidus. (Strab. pp. 124, 315.)

Corduba (Cordova), one of the largest cities in Spain, and the capital of Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis; made a Roman colony B.C. 152, and received the surname Patricia, because some Roman patricians settled there; taken by Caesar in 45 because it sided with the Pompeians; birthplace of the two Senecas and of Lucan. It was the residence of the proconsul of Baetica or Hisp. Ulterior (C. I. L. ii. p. 306; Plin. iii. 10; Strab. p. 141).

Corduēnē. [GORDIENE.]

Cordus, Cremutius, a Roman historian under Augustus and Tiberius, was accused in A.D. 25 of having praised Brutus and denominated Cassius 'the last of the Romans.' As the emperor had determined upon his death, he put an end to his own life by starvation. His works were condemned to be burnt, but some copies were preserved by his daughter Mareia and by his friends. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Suet. Tib. 61, Cal. 16; Sen. Suas. 7.)

Cōrē (Κόρη), the Maiden, a name by which Persephone is often called. [PERSEPHONE.]

Coressus (Κόρσος). 1. A lofty mountain in Ionia, 40 stadia from Ephesus, with a place of the same name at its foot.—2. A town of Cnos. Corfinium (Corfiniensis), chief town of the Peligni in Samnium, not far from the Aternus, strongly fortified, and memorable as the place which the Italians in the Social War destined to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome, on which account it was called Italica (Strab. p. 241; Vell. Pat. ii. 16). It was a strong fortrass in B.C. 49, surrendered after a week's siege to Caesar by Domitius (Caes. B. C. i. 15-23). Its site is occupied by the modern Pentima.

Cōrinna (Κόριννα), a Greek poetess, of Tanagra in Boeotia, sometimes called the Theban on account of her long residence in Thebes. She flourished about B.C. 490, and was a contemporary of Pindar, whom she is said to have instructed, and over whom she gained a victory at the public games at Thebes. Her poems were written in the Aeolic dialect. They were collected in five books, and were chiefly lyrical. Fragments in Bergk, Poët. Lyric.

Corinthiācus Isthmus (Ἰσθμὸς Κορίνθου), often called simply the Isthmus, lay between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, and connected the Peloponnesus with the mainland or Hellas proper. In its narrowest part it was 40 stadia or 5 Roman miles across: here was the temple of Poseidon; here the Isthmian games were celebrated; and here also was the Diolkos (Διόλκος), or roads by which ships were dragged across from the bay of Schoenus to the harbour of Lechaëum. Four unsuccessful attempts were made to dig a canal across the Isthmus—namely, by Demetrius Poliorcetes, Julius Caesar, Caligula, and Nero.

Corinthiācus Sinus (Κορινθιακὸς or Κορίνθιος κόλπος: G. of Lepanto), the gulf between the N. of Greece and Peloponnesus, begins, according to some, at the mouth of the Achelous in Aetolia and the promontory Araxus in Achaia, according to others, at the straits between Rhium and Antirrhium. In early times it was called the Crissaean Gulf (Κρυσσαῖος κόλπος), and its eastern part the Alcyonian Sea (ἡ Ἀλκυονίς θάλασσα).

Cōrinthus (Κόρινθος: Κορίνθιος), called in Homer Ephyra (Ἐφύρη, Il. vi. 152, 210), a city on the above-mentioned Isthmus. Its territory, called Corinthia (Κορινθία), embraced the of this mountain; and the walls, which included the Acrocorinthus, were 86 stadia in circumference. It had two harbours, CENCHRÆA on the E. or Saronic gulf, and LECHÆUM on the W. or Crissacan gulf. Its favourable position between two seas, the difficulty of carrying goods round Peloponnesus, and the facility with which they could be transported across the Isthmus, raised Corinth in very early times to great commercial prosperity, and made it the emporium of the trade between Europe and Asia. Its navy was numerous and powerful. At Corinth the first triremes were built, and the first sea-fight mentioned by Greek writers was between the Corinthians and the Corcyraeans. Its greatness at an early period is attested by numerous colonies, such as Ambracia, Corcyra, Apollonia, and Potidaea. It was adorned with magnificent buildings, and in no other city of Greece, except Athens, were the fine arts prosecuted with so much vigour and success. Its commerce brought great wealth to its inhabitants; but with their wealth, they became luxurious and licentious. Thus the worship of Aphrodite prevailed in this city, and in her temples a vast number of courtesans was maintained.—Corinth was originally inhabited by the Aeolic race. Here ruled the Aeolic Sisyphus and his descendants (Paus. ii. 3, 10). The legend that Medea ruled here before Sisyphus may, as some think, imply the worship of the Phœnician sun-god Moloch in this place. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the royal power passed into the hands of the Heraclid Alētes. The conquering Dorians became the ruling class, and the Aeolian inhabitants, forming five out of the eight tribes at Corinth, were subject to them. After Aletes and his descendants had reigned for five generations, royalty was abolished; and in its stead was established an oligarchical greater part of the Isthmus with the adjacent part of the Peloponnesus: it was bounded N. by Megaris and the Corinthian gulf, S. by Argolis, W. by Sicyonia and Phliasia, and E. by the Saronic gulf. In the N. and S. the country is mountainous, but in the centre it is a plain with a solitary and steep mountain rising from it, the Acrocorinthus (Ἀκροκόρινθος), 1,900 feet in height, which served as the citadel of Corinth. The city itself was built on the N. side form of government, confined to the powerful family of the Bacchiadae. This family was expelled B.C. 655 by CYPSELUS, who became tyrant and reigned thirty years. He was succeeded, 625, by his son, PERIANDER, who reigned forty years. On the death of the latter, 585, his nephew Psammetichus reigned for three years, and on his fall in 581, the government again became oligarchic, with a supreme council of eighty, of whom eight were prytanes. In the Peloponnesian war Coriuth was one of the bitterest enemies of Athens. In 346 Timophanes attempted to make himself master of the city, but he was slain by his brother Timoleon. It maintained its independence till the time of the Macedonian supremacy, when its citadel was garrisoned by Macedonian troops. This garrison was expelled by Aratus in 243, whereupon Corinth joined the Achaean League, to which it continued to belong, till it was taken and destroyed in 146 by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, who treated it in the most barbarous manner. Its inhabitants were sold as slaves; its works of art which were not destroyed by the Roman soldiery were conveyed to Rome; its buildings were razed to the ground; and thus was destroyed the lumen totius Graeciae, as Cicero calls the city. For a century it lay in ruins; only the buildings on the Acropolis and a few temples remained standing. In 46 it was rebuilt by Caesar, who peopled it with a colony of veterans and descendants of freedmen. It was now called Colonia Julia Corinthus and became the capital of the Roman province of ACHAEA.

Coriōlānus, the hero of one of the most beautiful of the early Roman legends. His original name was C. or Cn. Marcius, and he received the surname Coriolanus from the heroism he displayed at the capture of Corioli. [Scipio was apparently the first historical person who received a surname for a conquest.] His haughty bearing towards the commons excited their fear and dislike, and when he was a candidate for the consulship, they refused to elect him. After this, when there was a famine in the city, and a Greek prince sent corn from Sicily, Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile, B.C. 491. He now took refuge among the Volscians, and promised to assist them in war against the Romans. Attius Tullius, the king of the Volscians, appointed Coriolanus general of the Volscian army. Coriolanus took many towns, and advanced unresisted till he came to the fossa Cluilia, or Cluilian dyke, close to Rome, 439. Here he encamped, and the Romans in alarm sent to him embassy after embassy, consisting of the most distinguished men of the state. But he would listen to none of them. At length the noblest matrons of Rome, headed by Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, and Volumnia his wife, with his two little children, came to his tent. His mother's reproaches, and the tears of his wife and the other matrons, bent his purpose. He led back his army, and lived in exile among the Volscians till his death; though other traditions relate that he was killed by the Volscians on his return to their country. (Plut. Coriolanus; Liv. ii. 34-40; Dionys. vii. 20.)

Coriōli (Coriōlānus), a town in Latium, of which, according to the legend, the Volsci had gained possession. From its capture in B.C. 492, C. Marcius is said to have obtained the surname of Coriolanus. It was certainly a Latin town in 493. Before 443 it had been destroyed (Liv. iii. 71).

Cormāsa (Κόρμασα), an inland town of Pamphylia, or Pisidia, taken by the consul Maullius.

Cornēlia. 1. One of the noble women at Rome guilty of poisoning the leading men of the state, B.C. 331 (Liv. viii. 18).—2. Elder daughter of P. Scipio Africanus the elder, married to P. Scipio Nasica.—3. Younger sister of No. 2, married to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, censor 169, was by him the mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. She was virtuous and accomplished, and united in her person the sovereign virtues of the old Roman matron, with the superior knowledge and refinement which then began to prevail in the higher classes at Rome. She superintended with the greatest care the education of her sons, whom she survived. She was almost idolised by the people, who erected a statue to her, with the inscription CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI. (Plut. Ti. Gracch. 1, 8, C. Gracch. 4, 19; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.)—4. Daughter of L. Cinna, married to C. Caesar, afterwards dictator. She bore him his daughter Julia, and died in his quaestorship, 68.—5. Daughter of Metellus Scipio, married first to P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir, who perished in the expedition against the Parthians, 53. Next year she married Pompey the Great, by whom she was tenderly loved. She accompanied Pompey to Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him murdered. (Plut. Pomp. 55, 78; Appian, B. C. ii. 83; Lucan, iii. 23, viii. 40.) She afterwards returned to Rome, and received from Caesar the ashes of her husband, which she preserved on his Alban estate.

Cornēlia Orestilla. [ORESTILLA.]

Cornēlia Gens, the most distinguished of all the Roman gentes. All its great families belonged to the patrician order. The names of the patrician families are:—ARVINA, CETHEGUS, CINNA, COSSUS, DOLABELLA, LENTULUS, MALUGINENSIS, MAMMULA, MERULA, RUFINUS, SCIPIO, SISENNA, and SULLA. The names of the plebeian families are BALBUS and GALLUS, and we also find various cognomens, as CHRYSOGONUS, &c. given to freedmen of this gens.

Cornēlius Nepos. [NEPOS.]

Cornicūlum (Coruiculānus), a town in Latium, taken and destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus, and celebrated as the residence of the parents of Servius Tullius (Liv. i. 38).

Cornificius. 1. Q., a friend of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 69, and one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship in 64. When the Catilinarian conspirators were arrested, Cethegus was committed to his care. (Sall. Cat. 47; Cic. Att. i. 1.)—2. Q., son of No. 1. In the civil war (48) he was quaestor of Caesar, who sent him into Illyricum with the title of propraetor: he reduced this province to obedience. In 45 he was appointed by Caesar governor of Syria, and in 44 governor of the province of Old Africa, where he was at the time of Caesar's death. He maintained this province for the senate, but on the establishment of the triumvirate was defeated and slain in battle by T. Sextius (Bell. Alex. 42; Appian, B. C. iii. 85, iv. 53). Cornificius was well versed in literature. The authorship of the 'Rhetorica ad Herennium' (usually printed with Cicero's works) has been with some probability attributed to him (cf. Quintil. iii. 1, 21, v. 10, 2, ix. 2, 27, and ad Herenn. iv. 25, 48), but this is only a conjecture.—3. L., one of the generals of Octavianus in the war against Sex. Pompey, and consul 85.

Cornus, a town on the W. of Sardinia.

Cornūtus, L. Annaeus, a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was born at Leptis in Libya. He came to Rome, probably as a slave, and was emancipated by the Annaei. He was the teacher and friend of the poet Persius, who has dedicated his fifth satire to him, and who left him his library and money. He was banished by Nero, A.D. 68, for having too freely criticised the literary attempts of the emperor. He wrote a large number of works, of which the most important was on Aristotle's Categories. His only remaining work is a treatise on the Nature of the Gods (Osannus, Götting, 1844).

Coroebus (Κόροιβος). 1. A Phrygian, son of Mygdon, loved Cassandra, and for that reason fought on the side of the Trojans: he was slain by Neoptolemus or Diomedes (Verg. Aen. ii. 341; Paus. ix. 27).—2. An Elean, who gained the victory in the stadium at the Olympic games, B.C. 776: from this time the Olympiads begin to be reckoned (Strab. p. 355; Paus. i. 48).

Cōrōnē (Κορώνη: Κορωνεύς, -βαιεύς), a town in Messenia on the W. side of the Messenian gulf, founded B.C. 371 by the Messenians after their return to their native country, with the assistance of the Thebans: it possessed several public buildings, and in its neighbourhood was a celebrated temple of Apollo (Strab. p. 360; Paus. iv. 34).

Corōnēa (Κορώνεια: Κορωνάϊος, Κορώνειος, -νιος), 1. A town in Boeotia, SW. of the lake Copais, situate on a height between the rivers Phalarus and Curalius; a member of the Boeotian League; in its neighbourhood was the temple of Athene Itonica, where the festival of the Pamboeotia was celebrated. Near Coronea the Boeotians gained a memorable victory over the Athenians under Tolmides, B.C. 447; and here Agesilaus defeated the allied Greeks, 394. (Il. ii. 503; Thuc. i. 118; Xen. Hell. iv. 3; Strab. p. 411).—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly (Strab. p. 434).

Corōnis (Κορωνίς). 1. The mother of ASCLEPIUS.—2. Daughter of Phoroneus, king of Phocis, metamorphosed by Athene into a crow, when pursued by Poseidon.

Corsēae. [CORASSIAE.]

Corsīa (Κορσεία, also Κορσίαι), a town in Boeotia on the borders of Phocis.

Corsīca, called Cynus by the Greeks (Κύρνος, Κύρνιος, Κυρναίος, Corsus: Corsica), an island N. of Sardinia, spoken of by the ancients as one of the seven large islands in the Mediterranean. The ancients, however, exaggerate for the most part the size of the island; its greatest length is 116 miles, and its greatest breadth about 51. It is mountainous and was not much cultivated in antiquity. A range of mountains running from S. to N. separates it into two parts, of which the E. half was more cultivated, while the W. half was covered almost entirely with wood. Honey and wax were the principal productions of the island; but the honey had a bitter taste from the yew-trees with which the island abounded (Cyrneas taxos, Verg. Ecl. ix. 30). The inhabitants were a rude mountain race, addicted to robbery, and paying little attention to agriculture. Even in the time of the Roman empire their character had not much improved, as we see from the description of Seneca, who was banished to this island. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Iberians; but in early times Ligurians, Tyrrhenians, Carthaginians, and even Greeks [ALERIA], settled in the island. It was subject to the Carthaginians at the commencement of the first Punic war, but in B.C. 238 passed into the hands of the Romans, and subsequently formed a part of the Roman province of Sardinia. The Romans founded several colonies in the island, of which the most important were MARIANA and ALERIA (Plin. iii. 80).

Corsōtē (Κορσωτή: Ersey, Ru.), a city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the Mascas or Saocoras (Wady-el-Seba), which Xenophon found already deserted (Anab. i. 5, 4).

Cortōna (Cortonensis: Cortona), one of the twelve cities of Etruria, lay NW. of the Trasimene lake, and was one of the most ancient cities in Italy. It is said to have been originally called Corythus from its reputed founder Corythus, who is represented as the father of Dardanus (Verg. Aen. iii. 167, vii. 206; Sil. Ital. iv. 721). It is also called Croton, Cothornia, Cyrtonium, &c. (Dionys. i. 26). The Creston mentioned by Herodotus (i. 57) was probably Crestou in Thrace and not Cortona, as many modern writers have supposed. Crotona is said to have been originally founded by the Umbrians, then to have been conquered by the Pelasgians, and subsequently to have passed into the hands of the Etruscans, and was one of their twelve cities (Liv. ix. 37). It was afterwards colonised by the Romans, but under their dominion sank into insignificance. The remains of the Pelasgic walls of this city are some of the most remarkable in all Italy: there is one fragment 120 feet in length, composed of blocks of enormous magnitude.

Coruncānius, Ti., consul B.C. 280, with P. Valerius Laevinus, fought with success against the Etruscans and Pyrrhus. He was the first plebeian who was created pontifex maximus (Appian, Samn. 10, 3; Vell. Pat. ii. 128; Liv. Ep. 18). He was one of the most remarkable men of his age, possessed a profound knowledge of pontifical and civil law, and was the first person at Rome who gave regular instruction in law (Cic. N. D. ii. 66, 165, Brut. 14, 55).

Corvinus Messala. [MESSALA.]

Corvus, M. Valērius, one of the most illustrious men in the early history of Rome. He obtained the surname of Corvus, or 'Raven,' because, when serving as a military tribune under Camillus, B.C. 349, he accepted the challenge of a gigantic Gaul to single combat, and was assisted in the conflict by a raven which settled upon his helmet, and flew in the face of the barbarian. He was six times consul, B.C. 348, 346, 343, 335, 300, 299, and twice dictator, 342, 301, and by his military abilities rendered the most memorable services to his country. His most brilliant victories were gained in his third consulship, 343, when he defeated the Samnites at Mt. Gaurms and at Suessula; and in his other consulships he repeatedly defeated the Etruscans and other enemies of Rome. He reached the age of 100 years, and is frequently referred to as a memorable example of the favours of fortune. (Liv. vii. 26–42, x. 2–11; Appian, Samn. 1; Gell. ix. 11; Val. Max. viii. 15.)

Cōrybantes, priests of Cybele or Rhea in Phrygia, who celebrated her worship with enthusiastic dances, to the sound of the drum and the cymbal. They are often confounded with the Curetes and the Idaean Dactyli, the attendants of Zeus in Crete. [CURETES.] In origin they were said to have been deities or demigods; and according to some were children of Apollo (Strab. p. 466; Plut. de Fac. Lun. 30).

Cōrycia (Κωρυκία or Κωρυκίς), a nymph, who became by Apollo the mother of Lycorus or Lycoreus, and from whom the Corycian Cave in Mount Parnassus derived its name. The Muses are sometimes called by the poets Corycides Nymphae.

Cōryceus (Κώρυκος: Κωρύκιος, Corycius). 1. (Koraka), a high rocky hill on the coast of Ionia, forming the SW. promontory of the Erythraean peninsula (Thuc. viii. 14; Strab. p. 644).—2. A city of Pamphylia, near Phaselis and Mt. Olympus; colonised afresh by Attalus II. Philadelphus; taken, and probably destroyed, by P. Servilius Isauricus.—3. (Ru. opp. the island of Khorgos), a city in Cilicia Aspera, with a good harbour, between the mouths of the Lamus and the Calycadnus. Twenty stadia (2 geog. miles) from the city, was a grotto or glen in the mountains, called the Corycian Cave (Κωρύκιον ἄντρον) celebrated by the poets, and also famous for its saffron. At the distance of 100 stadia (10 geog. miles) from Coryceus, was a promontory of the same name (Strab. p. 670; cf. Pind. Pyth. i. 31; Aesch. Pr. 350; Verg. Georg. iv. 127).

Corydallus (Κορυδαλλός: Κορυδαλλεύς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, situate on the mountain of the same name, which divides the plain of Athens from that of Eleusis.

Coryphasium (Κορυφάσιον) a promontory in Messenia, enclosing the harbour of Pylos on the N., with a town of the same name upon it.

Cōrythus (Κόρυθος), an Italian hero, son of Jupiter, husband of Electra, and father of Iasius and Dardanus, is said to have founded Corythus (Cortona) (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 167).

Cōs, Cōds, Cōūs (Κῶς, Κῶος: Κῶος, Cōūs: Kos, Stanco), one of the islands called Sporades, lay off the coast of Caria, at the mouth of the Ceramic Gulf, opposite to Halicarnassus. In early times it was called Merōpis and Nymphaea. It was colonised by Aeolians, but became a member of the Dorian confederacy. Its chief city, Cos, stood on the NE. side of the island, in a beautiful situation, and had a good harbour. Near it stood the Asclepiæum, or temple of Asclepius, to whom the island was sacred, and from whom its chief family, the Asclepiadae, claimed their descent. The island was very fertile; its chief productions were wine, ointments, and the light transparent dresses called 'Coeae vestes.' It was the birthplace of the physician Hippocrates, who was an Asclepiad, of the poet Philetas, and of the painter Apelles, whose pictures of Antigonus and of Venus Anadyomene adorned the Asclepiæum. Theocritus and Herodas were both either born there or at any rate belonged to the school of poets connected with the island. Under the Romans, Cos was favoured by Claudius, who made it a free state, and by Antoninus Pius, who rebuilt the city of Cos after its destruction by an earthquake. (Tac. Ann. xii. 61; Paus. viii. 43.)

Cōsa or Cossa (Cossanus). 1. (Ansedonia), about five miles SE. of Orbetello, a city of Etruria near the sea, with a good harbour, called Herculis Portus, was a very ancient place; and after the fall of Faleri, one of the twelve Etruscan cities. It was colonised by the Romans B.C. 275, and received in 197 an addition of 1000 colonists. There are still extensive ruins of its walls and towers, built of polygonal masonry. (Verg. Aen. x. 167; Liv. Ep. 14, xxvii. 10).—2. A town in Lucania near Thurii (Caes. B. C. iii. 22).

Coscōnius. 1. C., praetor in the Social war, B.C. 89, defeated the Samnites.—2. C., praetor in the consulship of Cicero, 63; governed in the following year the province of Further Spain; was one of the twenty commissioners, in 59, to carry into execution the agrarian law of Julius Caesar, but died in this year (Cic. pro Sull. 14; Val. Max. viii. 1).—3. C., tribune of the plebs 59, aedile 57, and one of the judges at the trial of P. Sextius, 56.

Cosmas (Κοσμᾶς), commonly called INDICOPLEUSTES (Indian navigator), an Egyptian monk, flourished in the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 535. In early life he followed the employment of a merchant, and visited many foreign countries, of which he gave an account in his Τοπογραφία Χριστιανική, Topographia Christiana, in twelve books, of which the greater part is extant: it has value for its topography, and its notices of history and manners.

Cosrōes. 1. King of Parthia. [ARSACES XXV.].—2. King of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

Cossaea (Κοσσαία), a district in and about M. Zagros, on the NE. side of Susiana, and on the confines of Media and Persia, inhabited by a rude, warlike, predatory people, the Cossaei (Κοσσαῖοι), whom the Persian kings never subdued, but on the contrary, purchased their quiet by paying them tribute. Alexander conquered them (B.C. 325–24), and with difficulty kept them in subjection: after his death they soon regained their independence (Strab. p. 744; Diod. xvii. 111).

Cossus, Cornēlius, the name of several illustrious Romans in the early history of the republic. Of these the most celebrated was Ser. Cornelius Cossus, consul B.C. 428, who killed Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Veii, in single combat, and dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius—the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won (Liv. iv. 19, 30; Plut. Rom. 16, Marcell. 8; Propert. v. 10, 23).

Cossutius, a Roman architect, who rebuilt at the expense of Antiochus Epiphanes the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens, about B.C. 168 (Liv. xli. 20; Vitruv. Praef. vii.).

Cosyra (Pantelaria), also written Cossyra, Cosyrus, Cosura, Cossura, a small island in the Mediterranean near Malta (Strab. p. 123; Ov. Fast. iii. 567; Sil. Ital. xiv. 272).

Cōthon. [CARTHAGO.]

Cōtiso, a king of the Dacians, conquered in the reign of Augustus by Lentulus (Flor. iv. 12; Hor. Od. iii. 8, 18; Suet. Aug. 63).

Cotta, Aurēlius. 1. C., consul B.C. 252 and 248, in both of which years he fought in Sicily against the Carthaginians with success (Val. Max. ii. 7, 4).—2. C., consul 200, fought against the Boii and the other Gauls in the N. of Italy.—3. L., tribune of the plebs 154, and consul 144.—4. L., consul 119, opposed C. Marius, who was then tribune of the plebs.—5. C., was accused under the Lex Varia, 91, of supporting the claims of the Italian allies, and went into voluntary exile. He returned to Rome while Sulla was dictator, 82; and in 75 he was consul with L. Octavius. He obtained the government of Gaul, and died immediately after his return to Rome. He was one of the most distinguished orators of his time, and is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in the De Oratore and the De Natura Deorum, in the latter of which works he maintains the cause of the Academics.

—6. M., brother of No. 5, consul 74, with L. Licinius Lucullus, obtained Bithynia for his province, and was defeated by Mithridates near Chalcedon.—7. L., brother of Nos. 5 and 6, praetor 70, when he carried the celebrated law (Lex Aurelia judicaria) which entrusted the judicia to the senators, equites, and tribuni aerarii. He was consul 65 with L. Manlius Torquatus, after the consuls elect, P. Sulla and P. Antonius Paetus, had been condemned of ambitus. He supported Cicero during his consulship, and proposed his recall from exile. In the civil war he joined Caesar, whom he survived. (Suet. Jul. 79; Vell. Pat. ii. 32.)

Cotta, L. Aurunculēius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, perished along with Sabinus in the attack made upon them by Ambiorix, B.C. 54. [AMBIORIX.]

Cottius, son of Donnus, king of several Ligurian tribes in the Cottian Alps, which derived their name from him. [ALPES.] He submitted to Augustus, who granted him the sovereignty over twelve of these tribes, with the title of Praefectus. Cottius thereupon made roads over the Alps, and erected (B.C. 8) at Segusio (Susa), a triumphal arch in honour of Augustus, extant at the present day. His authority was transmitted to his son, upon whom Claudius conferred the title of king. On his death, his kingdom was made a Roman province by Nero. (Amm. Marc. xv. 10; Suet. Ner. 18.)

Cottus, a giant with 100 hands, son of Uranus and Gaea.

Cōtylus (Κότυλος), the highest peak of M. Ida in the Troad, containing the sources of the rivers Scamander, Granicus, and Aesepus.

Cōtýōra (Κοτύωρα), a colony of Sinope, in the territory of the Tibareni, on the coast of Pontus Polemoniacus, at the W. end of a bay of the same name, celebrated as the place where the 10,000 Greeks embarked for Sinope. The foundation of Pharnacia reduced it to insignificance (Xen. Anab. v. 5, 4; Strab. p. 548).

Cōtys or Cōtytto (Κότυς or Κοτυττά), a Thracian divinity whose festival, the Cotyttia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), resembled that of the Phrygian Cybele, and was celebrated with licentious revelry. In later times her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth. Those who celebrated her festival were called Baptae, from the purifications connected with the solemnity. Eupolis wrote a play of this name. (Strab. p. 470; Hor. Ep. xvii. 56; Juv. ii. 90.)

Cōtys (Κότυς). 1. King of Thrace, B.C. 382–358, was for a short time a friend of the Athenians, but carried on war with them towards the close of his reign. He was cruel and sanguinary, and was much addicted to gross luxury and drunkenness. He was murdered by two brothers whose father he had injured.—2. King of the Odrysae in Thrace, assisted Perseus against Rome, B.C. 168. His son was taken prisoner and carried to Rome, whereupon he sued for peace and was pardoned by the Romans.—3. A king of Thrace, who took part against Caesar with Pompey, 48.—4. King of Thrace, son of Rhoemetaces, in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He carried on war with his uncle Rhescuporis, by whom he was murdered, A.D. 19. Ovid, in his exile at Tomi, addressed an epistle to him (Ex Pont. ii. 9).

Crāgus (Κράγος), a mountain consisting of eight summits, being a continuation of Taurus to the W., and forming, at its extremity, the

SW. promontory of Lycia (Yedy-Booroon, i.e. Seven Capes). Some of its summits show traces of volcanic action, and the ancients had a tradition to the same effect. At its foot was a town of the same name, on the sea-shore, between Pydna and Patara. Parallel to it, N. of the river Glaucus, was the chain of Anticragus. The greatest height of Cragus exceeds 3000 feet. (Strab. p. 665; Hor. Od. i. 21.)

Cranaë (Κρανῆν), the island to which Paris first carried Helen from Peloponnesus (Il. iii. 445), is said by some to be an island off Gythium in Laconia, by others to be the island Helena off Attica, and by others again to be Cythera (Paus. iii. 22).

Cranaüs (Κραναός), king of Attica, the son-in-law and successor of Cecrops. He was deprived of his kingdom by his son-in-law Amphictyon.

Crani-, -ium (Κράνιοι, Κράνιον: Κράνιος: Κρανία, nr. Argostoli), a town of Cephalonia on the S. coast (Thuc. ii. 30; Strab. p. 455).

Crānōn or Crannōn (Κρανών, Κρανών: Κρανώνιος), in ancient times Ephyra, a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, not far from Larissa.

Crantor (Κράντωρ), of Soli in Cilicia, an Academic philosopher, studied at Athens under Xenocrates and Polemo, and flourished B.C. 300. He was the author of several works, all of which are lost, and was the first who wrote commentaries on Plato's works. Most of his writings related to moral subjects (Hor. Ep. i. 2. 4). One of his most celebrated works was On Grief, of which Cicero made great use in the third book of his Tusculan Disputations, and in the Consolatio which he composed on the death of his daughter, Tullia.

Crassipes, Furius, Cicero's son-in-law, the second husband of Tullia, whom he married B.C. 56, but from whom he was shortly afterwards divorced.

Crassus, Licinius. 1. P., praetor B.C. 176, and consul 171, when he carried on the war against Perseus.—2. C., brother of No. 1, praetor 172, and consul 163.—3. C., probably son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 145, was distinguished as a popular leader.—4. P., surnamed Dives or Rich, elected pontifex maximus 212, curule aedile 211, praetor 208, and consul 205 with Scipio Africanus, when he carried on war against Hannibal in the S. of Italy. He died 183. (Liv. xxix. 10, xxxix. 46.)—5. P., surnamed Dives Mucianus, son of P. Mucius Scaevola, was adopted by the son of No. 4. In 131 he was consul and pontifex maximus, and was the first priest of that rank who went beyond Italy. He carried on war against Aristonicus in Asia, but was defeated and slain. He was a good orator and jurist.—6. M., surnamed Agelastus, because he is said never to have laughed, was grandfather of Crassus the triumvir.—7. P., surnamed Dives, son of No. 6, and father of the triumvir. He was the proposer of the Lex Licinia, to prevent excessive expense in banquets, but in what year is uncertain. He was consul 97, and carried on war in Spain for some years. He was censor 89 with L. Julius Caesar. In the Civil war he took part with Sulla, and put an end to his own life when Marius and Cinna returned to Rome at the end of 87.—8. M., surnamed Dives, the triumvir, younger son of No. 7. His life was spared by Cinna, after the death of his father; but, fearing Cinna, he afterwards escaped to Spain, where he concealed himself for eight months. On the death of Cinna in 84, he collected some forces and crossed over into Africa, whence he passed into Italy in 83 and joined Sulla, on whose side he fought against the Marian party. On the defeat of the latter, he was rewarded by donations of confiscated property, and thus greatly increased his patrimony. His ruling passion was money, and he devoted all his energies to its accumulation. He was a keen and sagacious speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and, in order to increase their value, had them instructed in lucrative arts. He worked silver mines, cultivated farms, and built houses, which he let at high rents. In 71 he was appointed praetor in order to carry on the war against Spartacus and the gladiators; he defeated Spartacus, who was slain in the battle, and he was honoured with an ovation. In 70 Crassus was consul with Pompey; he entertained the populace at a banquet of 10,000 tables, and distributed corn enough to supply the family of every citizen for three months. He did not, however, co-operate cordially with Pompey, of whose superior influence he was jealous. He was afterwards reconciled to Pompey by Caesar's mediation, and thus was formed between them, in 60, the so-called triumvirate. In 55 Crassus was again consul with Pompey, and received the province of Syria, where he hoped both to increase his wealth and to acquire military glory by attacking the Parthians. He set out for his province before the expiration of his consulship, and continued his march notwithstanding the unfavourable omens which occurred to him at almost every step. After crossing the Euphrates in 54, he did not follow up the attack upon Parthia, but returned to Syria, where he passed the winter. In 53 he again crossed the Euphrates; he was misled by a crafty Arabian chieftain to march into the plains of Mesopotamia, where he was attacked by Surenas, the general of the Parthian king, Orodes. In the battle which followed, Crassus was defeated with immense slaughter, and retreated with the remainder of his troops to Carrhae (the Haran of Scripture). The mutinous threats of his troops compelled him to accept a perfidious invitation from Surenas, who offered a pacific interview, at which he was slain. His head was cut off and sent to Orodes, who caused melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying, 'Sate thyself now with that metal of which in life thou wert so greedy.' (Dio Cass. xl. 27.)—9. M., surnamed Dives, son of No. 8, served under Caesar in Gaul, and at the breaking out of the Civil war in 49 was praefect in Cisalpine Gaul.—10. P., younger son of No. 8, was Caesar's legate in Gaul from 58 to 55. In 54 he followed his father to Syria, and fell in the battle against the Parthians.—11. L., the celebrated orator. At the age of 21 (B.C. 119), he attracted great notice by his prosecution of C. Carbo. He was consul in 95 with Q. Scaevola, when he proposed a law to compel all who were not citizens to depart from Rome; the rigour of this law was one of the causes of the Social war. He was afterwards proconsul of Gaul. In 92 he was censor, when he caused the schools of the Latin rhetoricians to be closed. He died in 91, a few days after opposing in the senate with great eloquence the consul L. Philippus, an enemy of the aristocracy (Cic. de Or. iii. 1, 4). His house upon the Palatium was one of the most beautiful at Rome, and was adorned with costly works of art. As an orator he surpassed all his contemporaries (Vell. Pat. ii. 9). In the treatise De Oratore Cicero introduces him as one of the speakers, and he is understood to express Cicero's own sentiments.

Crastinus, one of Caesar's veterans, commenced the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48, and died fighting bravely in the foremost line (Cacs. B. C. iii. 91).

Cratærus (Κρατερός). 1. A distinguished general of Alexander the Great, on whose death (B.C. 323) he received in common with Antipater the government of Macedonia and Greece. He arrived in Greece in time to render effectual assistance to Antipater in the Lamian war. At the close of this war he married Phila, the daughter of Antipater. Soon after he accompanied Antipater in the war against the Aetolians, and in that against Perdiccas in Asia. He fell in a battle against Eumenes, in 321. (Diod. xviii. 16, xix. 59; Plut. Alex. 47; Nep. Eum. 4.)—2. Brother of Antigonus Gonatas, wrote on the history of Attica.—3. A Greek physician, who attended the family of Atticus, mentioned also by Horace (Sat. ii. 3, 161; Cic. Att. xii. 13, 14).

Crates (Κράτης) 1. An Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, began to flourish B.C. 449, and was one of the most celebrated of the comic poets. He excelled in mirth and fun (Aristoph. Eq. 536; Athen. p. 429); and is considered by Aristotle to be the first poet who wrote comedies with true dramatic action (Poët. 5).—2. Of Tralles, an orator or rhetorician of the school of Isocrates.—3. Of Thebes, a pupil of the Cynic DIOGENES, and one of the most distinguished of the Cynic philosophers, flourished about 320. Though heir to a large fortune, he renounced it all, and lived and died as a true Cynic, restricting himself to the most absolute necessities. He received the surname of the 'Door-opener,' because it was his practice to visit every house at Athens, and rebuke its inmates. He married Hipparchia, the daughter of a family of distinction, who shared his life of privation and mendicancy. He wrote several works, which are lost, for the epistles extant under his name are not genuine.—4. Of Athens, the pupil and friend of Polemo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy, about 270. He was the teacher of Arcesilaus, Theodorus, and Bion Borysthenites.—5. Of Mallus in Cilicia, a celebrated grammarian. He was brought up at Tarsus, whence he removed to Pergamos, where he founded the Pergamene school of grammar, in opposition to the Alexandrian. He wrote a commentary on the Homeric poems, in opposition to Aristarchus, and supported the system of anomaly (ἀνωμαλία) against that of analoggy (ἀναλογία). He also wrote commentaries on the other Greek poets, and works on other subjects, of which only fragments have come down to us. In 157 he was sent by Attalus as an ambassador to Rome, where he introduced for the first time the study of grammar.

Crāthis (Κράθις) 1. (Crata), a river in Achaia, rises in a mountain of the same name in Arcadia, receives the Styx flowing down from Nonacris, and falls into the sea near Aegae.—2. (Crati), a river in lower Italy, forming the boundary on the E. between Lucania and Bruttii, and falling into the sea near Sybaris. At its mouth was a celebrated temple of Minerva: its waters were fabled to dye the hair blond. (Eur. Troad. 228; Strab. p. 263; Ov. Met. xv. 315.)

Crātinus (Κρατίνος) 1. One of the most celebrated of the Athenian poets of the Old Comedy, was born B.C. 519, but did not begin to exhibit till 454, when he was 65 years of age. He exhibited twenty-one plays and gained nine victories. He was the poet of the Old Comedy. He gave it its peculiar character, and he did not, like Aristophanes, live to see its decline. Before his time the comic poets had aimed at little beyond exciting the laughter of their audience: he was the first who made comedy a terrible weapon of personal attack (on Pericles among others), and the comic poet a severe censor of public and private vice. He is frequently attacked by Aristophanes, who charges him with habitual intemperance, an accusation which was admitted by Cratinus himself, who treated the subject in a very amusing way in his Πυρρίνη. This play was acted in 423, when the poet was 96 years of age; it gained the prize over the Connus of Amipsias and the Clouds of Aristophanes. It was a practical reply to the passage in the Knights which speaks of Cratinus as worn out by age (Arist. Eg. 531). Cratinus died in the following year, at the age of 97.—2. The younger, an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, a contemporary of Plato the philosopher, flourished as late as 324.

Cratippus (Κράτιππος). 1. A Greek historian and contemporary of Thucydides, whose work he completed (Dionys. Jud. de Thuc. 16).—2. A philosopher of Mytilene, a contemporary of Pompey and Cicero, the latter of whom praises him highly. In philosophy he transferred himself from the school of the Sceptic Antiochus to the Peripatetics. He accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. He afterwards settled at Athens, where young M. Cicero was his pupil in 44. Through the influence of Cicero, Cratippus obtained from Caesar the Roman citizenship.

Cratos (Κράτος), the personification of strength, a son of Uranus and Ge.

Cratylus (Κράτυλος), a Greek philosopher, a pupil of Heraclitus, and one of Plato's teachers. Plato introduces him as one of the speakers in the dialogue which bears his name. Both Plato and Aristotle speak of Cratylus and the later Heracliteans as extravagant in their theories and of little authority.

Cremēra, a river in Etruria, falling into the Tiber a little above Rome: memorable for the death of the 300 Fabii (Liv. ii. 49; Ov. Fast. ii. 193).

Cremna (Κρήμνα: Gherme, Ru.), a fortified city of Pisidia, on a precipitous rock of M. Taurus, noted for repeated obstinate defences: a colony under Augustus (Strab. p. 569).

Cremni (Κρημνοί), an emporium of the free Scythians on the Palus Maeotis (Hdt. iv. 20, 110).

Crēmōna (Cremonensis: Cremona), a Roman colony in the N. of Italy, N. of the Po, and at no great distance from the confluence of the Addua and the Po, was founded together with Placentia B.C. 219 as a protection against the Gauls and Hannibal's invading army. It soon became a place of great importance and one of the most flourishing cities in the N. of Italy. Under the Lex Julia of B.C. 90 it received the civitas and was changed into a municipium. During the Civil war it espoused the side of Brutus, and Octavian confiscated much of its territory and assigned it to his veterans: Mantua suffered in the same way (Verg. Ecl. ix. 28). Later still, having espoused the cause of Vitellius, it was totally destroyed by the troops of Vespasian, A.D. 61 (Tac. Hist. iii. 24). It was rebuilt by Vespasian.

Crēmōnis Jugum. [ALPES.]

Crēmūtius Cordus. [CORDUS.]

Crēōn (Κρέων). 1. King of Corinth, son of Lycæthus, whose daughter, Glaucæ or Cræusa, married Jason. Medæa, thus forsaken, sent Glaucæ a garment which burnt her to death when she put it on; the palace took fire, and Creon perished in the flames. [MEDEA.]—2. Son of Menoecus, and brother of Jocaste, the wife of Laius. After the death of Laius, Creon governed Thebes for a short time, and then surrendered the kingdom to Oedipus, who had delivered the country from the Sphinx. [OEDIPUS.] When Eteocles and Polynices, the sons of Oedipus, fell in battle by each other's hands, Creon became king of Thebes. His cruelty in forbidding burial to the corpse of Polynices, and his sentencing Antigone to death for disobeying his orders, occasioned the death of his own son Haemon. For details see ANTIGONE.

Crēophylus (Κρεόφυλος), of Chios, one of the earliest epic poets, said to have been the friend or son-in-law of Homer. The epic poem Οίχαλία or Οίχαλίας ἄλωσις, ascribed to him, related the contest which Hercules, for the sake of Iole, undertook with Eurytus, and the capture of Oechalia.

Cresphontes (Κρησφόντης), a Heraclid, son of Aristomachus, and one of the conquerors of Peloponnesus, obtained Messenia for his share. During an insurrection of the Messenians, he and two of his sons were slain. A third son, Aegyptus, avenged his death. [ÆGYPYUS.]

Crestōnia (Κρηστωνία: ἡ Κρηστωνική), a district in Macedonia between the Axios and Strymon, near Mt. Cercine, inhabited by the Crestonæi (Κρηστωνᾶιοι), a Thracian people: their chief town was Creston or Crestōne (Κρήστων, Κρηστώνη), founded by the Pelasgians (Hdt. i. 57, vii. 127; Thuc. ii. 99, iv. 109). This town is erroneously supposed by some writers to be the same as Cortona in Italy.

Crēta (Κρήτη: Κρηταῖος: Candia), one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean sea, nearly equidistant from Europe, Asia, and Africa, but always reckoned as part of Europe. Its length from E. to W. is about 160 miles: its breadth is very unequal, being in the widest part about 35 miles, and in the narrowest only 6. A range of mountains runs through the whole length of the island from E. to W., sending forth spurs N. and S.: in the centre of the island rises Mt. Ida far above all the others. [IDA.] The rivers of Crete are numerous, but are little more than mountain-torrents, and are for the most part dry in summer. The country was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility and salubrity.—Crete was inhabited at an early period by a numerous and civilised population. Homer speaks of its hundred cities (Κρήτη ἑκατόμπολις, Il. ii. 649); and before the Trojan war mythology told of a king Minos, who resided at Cnossus, and ruled over the greater part of the island. The inhabitants were probably a Carian people with Phœnician colonies planted among them. The description of the inhabitants in Od. xix. 175 (after the Dorian conquest) gives us Achæans, Ἐτεόκρητες, Κύδωνες, Dorians and Pelasgians. It is probable that the Eteocretes were the Carian race, and the Cydones were Phœnician. Minos is said to have given laws to Crete, and to have been the first prince who had a navy, with which he suppressed piracy in the Ægean. After his descendants had governed the island for some generations, royalty was abolished, and the cities became independent republics, of which Cnossus and Gortyna were the most important, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the rest.

The ruling class were the Dorians, who settled in Crète about sixty years after the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, and reduced the former inhabitants to subjection. The social and political institutions of the island thus became Dorian, and many of the ancients supposed that the Spartan constitution was borrowed from Crète. The chief magistrates in the cities were the Cosmi, ten in number, chosen from certain families: there was also a Gerusia, or senate; and an Ecclesia or popular assembly, which, however, had very little power. (For details, see Dict. of Ant. art. Cosmi.) The Cretan system of the training of youths, and the common meals of citizens, resembled the Spartan (see Dict. of Ant. art. Syssitia). At a later time the power of the aristocracy was overthrown and a democratical form of government established. The ancient Dorian customs likewise disappeared, and the people became degenerate in their morals and character. The historian Polybius accuses them of numerous vices, and the Cretan poet Epimenides (who is quoted by St. Paul) wrote of Κρητες ἀει ψευσταί, κακά θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί.—The Cretans were celebrated as archers, and frequently served as mercenaries in the armies of other nations. The island was conquered by Q. Metellus, who received in consequence the surname Creticus (B.C. 68–66), and it became a Roman province. Crète and Cyrenaica subsequently formed one province. [CYRENAICA.]

Crèteus or Catreus (Κρητεύς), son of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crète, and father of ALTHEMENES.

Crêtheus (Κρηθεύς), son of Aeolus and Enarete, wife of Tyro, and father of Aeson, Pheres, Amythaon, and Hippolyte: he was the founder of Iolcus.

Crêtôpôlis (Κρητόπολις), a town in the district of Milyas, in Pisidia (Polyb. v. 72).

Crêusa (Κρέουσα). 1. A Naiad, daughter of Oceanus, became by Penens the mother of Hypseus and Stilbe.—2. Daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithea, wife of Xuthus, and mother of Achæus and Iou. She is said to have been beloved by Apollo, whence Ion is sometimes called her son by this god. [ION].—3. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Aeneas, and mother of Ascanius. She perished on the night of the capture of Troy, having been separated from her husband in the confusion. [AENEAS].

—4. Daughter of Creon, who fell a victim to the vengeance of Medea. [CREON, No. 1.]

Creusis or Creüsa (Κρέυσις, Κρέουσα: Κρευσιεύς), a town on the E. coast of Boeotia, the harbour of Thespiæ (Strab. p. 405; Liv. xxvi. 21).

Crimisa or Crimissa (Κρίμισα, Κρίμισσα: C. dell' Alice), a promontory on the E. coast of Bruttium, with a town of the same name upon it, said to have been founded by Philoctetes, a little S. of the river Crimisus (Strab. p. 254).

Crimisus or Crimissus (Κριμισός, Κριμισσός), a river in the W. of Sicily, falls into the Hypsa: on its banks TIMOLEON defeated the Carthaginians, B.C. 339.

Crinagôras (Κριναγόρας), of Mytilene, the author of fifty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Augustus.

Crispinus, a person ridiculed by Horace (Sat. i. 1. 120, i. 3. 129, ii. 7. 45), is said by the Scholiasts on those passages to have written bad verses on the Stoic philosophy, and to have been surnamed Aretalogus.

Crispus, Flavius Julius, eldest son of Constantine the Great, was appointed Caesar A.D.

317, and gained great distinction in a campaign against the Franks and in the war with Licinius. But having excited the jealousy of his step-mother Fausta, he was put to death by his father, 326 (Sozom. H. E. i. 5).

Crispus Passiënus, husband of Agrippina, and stepfather of the Emperor Nero, was distinguished as an orator (Quintil. x. 1, 24).

Crispus, Vibius, of Vercelli, a contemporary of Quintilian, and a distinguished orator (Tac. Hist. ii. 10; Quintil. x. 1, 119).

Crissa or Crisa (Κρίσσα, Κρίσα: Κρισσαίος), and Cirra (Κίρρα: Κιρραῖος), towns in Phocis, regarded by some ancient as well as by some modern writers as the same; but there can be no doubt that Crissa was a town inland SW. of Delphi and that Cirra was its port in the Crissæan gulf (Strab. p. 418; cf. Il. ii. 520; Hdt. viii. 32; Piud. Isthm. ii. 26). The inhabitants of these towns levied contributions upon the pilgrims frequenting the Delphic oracle, in consequence of which the Amphictyons declared war against them, B.C. 595, and eventually destroyed them. Their territory, the rich Crissæan plain, was declared sacred to the Delphic god, and was forbidden to be cultivated. The cultivation of this plain by the inhabitants of Amphissa led to the Sacred War, in which Philip was chosen general of the Amphictyons, 338. Crissa remained in ruins, but Cirra was afterwards rebuilt, and became the harbour of Delphi (Polyb. v. 27).

Critias (Κριτίας). 1. Son of Dropides, a contemporary and relation of Solon's.—2. Son of Callaeschrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the pupils of Socrates, by whose instructions he profited but little in a moral point of view. He was banished from Athens, and on his return became leader of the oligarchical party. He was one of the 30 tyrants established by the Spartans B.C. 404, and was conspicuous above all his colleagues for rapacity and cruelty. He was slain at the battle of Munychia in the same year, fighting against Thrasybulus and the exiles. He was a distinguished orator, and some of his speeches were extant in the time of Cicero (Cic. de Or. ii. 22, 93). He also wrote poems, dramas, and other works. Some fragments of his elegies are still extant, edited by Bach, Leips. 1827.

Critius (Κριτίας), a sculptor of the archaic school at Athens in the early part of the 5th century B.C. He seems to have been slightly later than Antenor, and possibly was his pupil. His great work was the group of Harmodius and Aristogiton which he executed in conjunction with Nesiotes to replace the group by Antenor which had been carried off to Persia (Paus. i. 8, 5). It is probable that the famous marble statues at Naples are copies of this work. [HARMODIUS.] Critius founded a school of sculpture at Athens which lasted four generations (Paus. vii. 3, 2).

Critôläus (Κριτόλαος). 1. Of Phaselis in Lycia, studied philosophy at Athens under Aristou of Ceos, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school. In B.C. 155 he was sent by the Athenians as ambassador to Rome with Carneades and Diogenes. [CARNEADES.] He lived upwards of 82 years. (Cic. de Or. i. 11, 45).—2. General of the Achæan League 147, distinguished by his bitter enmity to the Romans. He was defeated by Metellus, and was never heard of after the battle. (Polyb. xxxviii. 2, xl. 1; Liv. Ep. 52.)

Criton (Κριτων). 1. Of Athens, a friend and disciple of Socrates, whom he supported with his fortune. He had made every arrangement for the escape of Socrates from prison, and tried, in vain, to persuade him to fly, as we see from Plato's dialogue named after him. Criton wrote seventeen dialogues on philosophical subjects, which are lost.—2. A physician at Rome in the 1st or 2nd century after Christ, perhaps the person mentioned by Martial (Epigr. xi. 60, 6).

Criū-mētōpon (Κριού μετώπον), i.e. 'Ram's Front.' 1. A promontory at the S. of the Tauric Chersonesus.—2. A promontory at the SW. of Crete.

Crius (Κοῖος), one of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge (Hes. Th. 375).

Crocōdīlōpōlis (Κροκοδείλων πόλις). 1. (Em-beshunda?), a city of Upper Egypt, in the Nomos Aphroditopolites.—2. [ARSINOË, No. 7.]

Crocus, the beloved friend of Smilax, was changed by the gods into a saffron plant (Ov. Met. iv. 283; Serv. ad Georg. iv. 182).

Crocylēa (τὰ Κροκύλεια), by Homer (Il. ii. 633) spoken of as a place belonging to Ithaca, but by Strabo (pp. 376, 452) assigned to Leucas. It may be the small island now called Arkudhi, which lies between Leucas and Ithaca.

Croesus (Κροῖσος), last king of Lydia, son of Alyattes, reigned B.C. 560–546, but was probably associated in the kingdom during his father's life. The early part of his reign was most glorious. He subdued all the nations between the Aegean and the river Halys, and made the Greeks in Asia Minor tributary to him. When he had taken Ephesus, he aided the old temple of Artemis, then in course of building, by gifts of columns. One of these archaic columns, with part of the original inscription still legible, Βα[σιλεὺς] Κρ[οῖσος] ἀνέ[θηκεν], is now in the British Museum. The fame of his power and wealth drew to his court at Sardis all the wise men of Greece, and among them Solon, whose interview with the king was celebrated in antiquity. In reply to the question who was the happiest man he had ever seen, the sage taught the king that no man should be deemed happy till he had finished his life in a happy way. Alarmed at the growing power of the Persians, Croesus sent to consult the oracle of Apollo at Delphi whether he should march against the Persians. Upon the reply of the oracle that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, he collected a vast army and marched against Cyrus. Near Sinope an indecisive battle was fought between the two armies; whereupon he returned to Sardis, and disbanded his forces, commanding them to re-assemble in the following spring. But Cyrus appeared unexpectedly before Sardis; Croesus led out the forces still remaining with him, but was defeated, and the city was taken after a siege of fourteen days. Croesus, who was taken alive, was condemned to be burnt to death. As he stood before the pyre, the warning of Solon came to his mind, and he thrice uttered the name of Solon. Cyrus inquired who it was that he called on; and, upon hearing the story, repented of his purpose, and not only spared the life of Croesus, but made him his friend. Croesus survived Cyrus, and accompanied Cambyses in his expedition against Egypt. (Hdt. i. 26–94, 130, 155, 207, iii. 34, v. 36, vi. 37, 125, viii. 35; cf. Xen. Cyrop.)

Crommṓn or Cromyōn (Κρομμῶν, Κρομυῶν), a town in Megaris on the Saronic gulf, afterwards belonged to Corinth; celebrated on account of its wild sow, slain by Theseus (Strab. p. 380; Paus. ii. 1, 3; Thuc. iv. 45).

Cronius Mons (Κρόνιον ὄρος), a mountain in Elis near Olympia, with a temple of Cronus.

Cronus (Κρόνος), the youngest of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge, father by Rhea of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, Poseidon, and Zeus (Hes. Th. 137, 452; Apollod. i. 1, 3). At the instigation of his mother, Cronus unmaned his father for having thrown the Cyclopes, who were likewise his children by Ge, into Tartarus.

[URANUS.] Out of the blood thus shed sprang up the Erinnyes.

When the Cyclopes were delivered from Tartarus, the government of the world was taken from Uranus and given to Cronus, who in his turn lost it through Zeus, as was predicted to him by Ge and Uranus.

[ZEUS.] The Romans identified their Saturnus with Cronus.

[SATURNUS.] It is likely that Cronus was strictly (in one at least of his aspects) a harvest god, and therefore represented with a sickle. Some explain his being exiled by his children as the mythical representation of successive seasons of the year, and the swallowing of his children as Time swallowing days or months; others take this to be rather the sun swallowing the stars, which disappear at his rising; others think that it is a cannibal idea of Moloch borrowed from Phoenicia.

Cropia (Κρωπεία), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Leontis.

Crotōn or Crotōna (Κρότων: Κροτωνιάτης, Crotoniensis, Crotonensis, Crotoniata: Crotona), a Greek city on the E. coast of Bruttium, on the river Aesarus, and in a very healthy locality, was founded by the Achaeans under Myscellus of Aegae, assisted by the Spartans, B.C. 710 (Strab. p. 262; Dionys. ii. 59; Ov. Met. xv. 9). Its extensive commerce, the virtue of its inhabitants, and the excellence of its institutions, made it the most powerful and flourishing town in the S. of Italy. It owed much of its greatness to Pythagoras, who established his school here. Gymnasties were cultivated here in greater perfection than in any other Greek city; and one of its citizens, Milo, was the most celebrated athlete in Greece. It attained its greatest power by the destruction of Sybaris in 510; but it sustained a severe defeat from the Locrians on the river Sagras. [It is uncertain whether this defeat was before or after the destruction of Sybaris. Justin (xx. 2) places it before the arrival of Pythagoras, and therefore about 560 B.C.: Strabo speaks of it as marking the decline of the power of Croton, and therefore after B.C. 510.] It suffered greatly in the wars with Dionysius, Agathocles, and Pyrrhus; and in the second Punic war a considerable part of it had ceased to be inhabited.

Coins of Croton. (1) An early coin of 6th or 7th cent. B.C., having a tripod with the first three letters of the name (Koppa for K) on each side, that on the reverse being incuse or concave. (2) Of 4th cent. B.C. Obv., head of Hera; rev., Heracles seated.

It received a colony from the Romans in 195 (Liv. xxxiv. 45).

Crustumēria, -rīum, also Crustumium (Crnstuminus), a town of the Sabines, situated in the mountains near the sources of the Allia, was conquered both by Romulus and Tarquinius Priscus (Liv. i. 9, 38, ii. 64, iii. 42).

Crustumius (Conca), a river of Umbria flowing into the Adriatic between Ariminum and Pisaurum (Lucan, ii. 406).

Cteatus. [MOLIONES.]

Ctēsias (Κτήσιος), of Cnidus in Caria, a contemporary of Xenophon, was private physician of Artaxerxes Mnemon, whom he accompanied in his war against his brother Cyrus, B. C. 401. He lived seventeen years at the Persian court, and wrote in the Ionic dialect a great work on the history of Persia (Περσικά), in 23 books. The first six contained the history of the Assyrian monarchy down to the foundation of the kingdom of Persia. The next seven contained the history of Persia down to the end of the reign of Xerxes, and the remaining ten carried the history down to the time when Ctesias left Persia, i.e. to the year 398. All that is now extant is a meagre abridgment in Photius and a number of fragments preserved in Diodorus and other writers. The work of Ctesias was compiled from Oriental sources, and its statements are frequently at variance with those of Herodotus; but though ancient writers have therefore doubted his statements, it must be remarked that in following Persian authorities he may be giving the truer account. Ctesias also wrote a work on India (Ἰνδικά) in one book, of which we possess an abridgment in Photius. This work contains numerous fables, but it probably gives a faithful picture of India as it was conceived by the Persians. The abridgment which Photius made of the Persica and Indica of Ctesias has been printed separately by Liou, Göttingen, 1823, and by Bähr, Frankfurt, 1824.

Ctēsibius (Κτήσιβιος), celebrated for his mechanical inventions, lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, about B.C. 250. His father was a barber, but his own taste led him to devote himself to mechanics. He is said to have invented a clepsydra or water-clock, a hydraulic engine, and other machines, and to have been the first to discover the elastic force of air and apply it as a moving power. He was the teacher, and has been supposed to have been the father, of Hero Alexandrinus (cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Ctesibica Machina).

Ctēsiphōn (Κτησιφῶν), son of Leosthenes of Anaphlystus, was accused by Aeschines for having proposed the decree that Demosthenes should be honoured with the crown. [ÆSCHINES.]

Ctēsiphon (Κτησιφῶν: Κτησιφώντιος): Takti Kesra, (Ru.), a city of Assyria, on the E. bank of the Tigris, three Roman miles from Seleucia on the W. bank, first became an important place under the Parthians, whose kings used it for some time as a winter residence, and afterwards enlarged and fortified it, and made it the capital of their empire. It must have contained a large population, if Severus, as is said, carried off 100,000 prisoners. In the wars of the Romans with the Parthians and Persians, it was taken, first by Trajan (A.D. 115), and by several of the later emperors, but Julian did not venture to attack it, even after his victory over the Persians before the city. (Polyb. v. 45; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 6; Herodian, iii. 30; Dio Cass. lxxv. 9.) Its site is marked by the ruins at Takti Kesra, i.e. the arch of Chosroes.

Ctesippus (Κτήσιππος). 1. Two sons of Heracles, one by Deianira, and the other by Astydamia.—2. Son of Polytheres of Same, one of the sniters of Penelope, killed by Philoetius.

Cucusus or Cocussus (Goksun), a town of Cappadocia, at a junction of roads leading respectively from Comana to Commagene, and from Melitene to Tarsus. It was the place of banishment for Chrysostom A.D. 404.

Culāro, afterwards called Gratianōpōlis (Grenoble), in honour of the emperor Gratian, a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the Isara (Isère) (Cic. ad Fam. x. 23). It stood on the direct road from the pass of Mt. Genève to Vienne.

Cullēo or Culēo, Q. Terentius. 1. A senator of distinction, was taken prisoner in the second Punic war, and obtained his liberty at the conclusion of the war, B.C. 201. To show his gratitude to P. Scipio, he followed his triumphal car, wearing the pilæus or cap of liberty, like an emancipated slave. In 187 he was prætor peregrinus, and in this year condemned L. Scipio Asiaticus, on the charge of having misappropriated the money gained in the war with Antiochus (Liv. xxx. 43, xxxviii. 42, xlii. 35; Val. Max. v. 2, 5).—2. Tribune of the plebs, 58, exerted himself to obtain Cicero's recall from banishment. In the war which followed the death of Caesar (49), Cullēo was one of the legates of Lepidus (Appian, B. C. iii. 83).

Cūmæ (Κύμη: Κυμαῖος, Cumānus), a town in Campania, and the most ancient of the Greek colonies in Italy and Sicily, was founded by Cyme in Aeolis, in conjunction with Chalcis and Eretria in Euboea (Strab. p. 243; Liv. viii. 22; Verg. Aen. vi. 2; Vell. Pat. i. 4). Its foundation is placed in B.C. 1050, but the date must be regarded as uncertain, except so far that it was considerably older than any other Greek town in Italy. It was situated on a steep hill of Mt. Gaurus, a little N. of the promontory Misenum. It became in early times a great and flourishing city; its commerce was extensive; its territory included a great part of the rich Campanian plain; its population was at least 60,000; and its power is attested by its colonies in Italy and Sicily—Puteoli, Palæopolis, afterwards Neapolis, Zanele, afterwards Messina. But it had powerful enemies to encounter in the Etruscans and the Italian nations. It was also weakened by internal dissensions, and one of its citizens, Aristodemus, made himself tyrant of the place. Its power became so much reduced that it was only saved from the attacks of the Etruscans by the assistance of Hiero, who annihilated the Etruscan fleet, 474. It maintained its independence till 417, when it was taken by the Campanians and most of its inhabitants sold as slaves (Liv. iv. 44; Diod. xii. 76). From this time CAPUA became the chief city of Campania; and although Cumae was subsequently a Roman municipium and a colony, it continued to decline in importance. At last the Aeropolis was the only part of the town that remained, and this was eventually destroyed by Narses in his wars with the Goths.—Cumae was celebrated as the residence of the earliest Sibil, and as the place where Tarquinus Superbus died.—Its ruins are still to be seen between the Lago di Patria and Fusaro.

Cūnaxa (Κούναξα), a small town in Babylonia, on the Euphrates, famous for the battle fought here between the younger Cyrus and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, in which the former was killed, B.C. 401 (Xen. Anab. i. 8). Its position is uncertain. Plutarch (Artax. 8) places it 500 stadia (50 geog. miles) above Babylon; Xenophon, who does not mention it by name, makes the battle-field 360 stadia (36 geog. miles) from Babylon.

Cūpido. [EROS.]

Cupra (Cuprensis). 1. Maritima (Marano) at the mouth of the Monechia, a town in Picenum, with an ancient temple of Juno, founded by the Pelasgians and restored by Hadrian (Strab. p. 241; Plin. iii. 111.).—2. Montana, a town near No. 1, in the mountains.

Cūres (Gen. Curim), an ancient town of the Sabines, celebrated as the birthplace of T. Tatius and Numa Pompilius (Liv. i. 13; Dionys. ii. 36, 48; Verg. Aen. vi. 812; Ov. Fast. ii. 477). Its position is marked by ruins at the village of Arce, near the stream Correse.

Cūrētes (Κουρήτες), a mythical people, said to be the most ancient inhabitants of Acarnania they were the children of the rain (Met. iv. 282). They occur in Crete as the priests of Zeus, and are spoken of in connexion with the Corybantes and Idaeus Dactyli. The infant Zeus was entrusted to their care by Rhea; and by clashing their weapons in a warlike dance, they drowned the cries of the child, and prevented his father Cronus from ascertaining the place where he was concealed. The occurrence of their name in several places is perhaps due to the fact that the custom of scaring away evil powers by the clashing of arms occurred in religious rites of several different tribes. The same superstition appears also in the Salii at Rome, and in the Theophrasia at Delphi.

Curias. [CURIUM.]

Cūrīatīi, a celebrated Alban family. Three brothers of this family fought with three Roman brothers, the Horatii, and were conquered by them. Hence Alba became subject to Rome. (Liv. i. 24; Dionys. iii. 11.)

Curīātius Maternus. [MATERNUS.]

Cūrīo, C. Scribonius. 1. Praetor B.C. 121, was one of the most distinguished orators of his time.—2. Son of No. 1, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 90; afterwards served under Sulla in Greece; was praetor 82; consul 76; and after his consulship obtained the province of Macedonia, where he carried on war against the barbarians as far N. as the Danube. He was a personal enemy of Caesar, and supported P. Clodius when the latter was accused of violating the sacra of the Bona Dea. In 57 he was appointed pontifex maximus, and died 53. He had some reputation as an orator, and was a friend of Cicero.—3. Son of No. 2, also a friend of Cicero, was a most profligate character. He was married to Fulvia, afterwards the wife of Antony. He at first belonged to the Pompeian party, by whose influence he was made tribune of the plebs, 50; but he was bought over by Caesar, and employed his power as tribune against his former friends. On the breaking out of the Civil war (49), he was sent by Caesar to Sicily with the title of propraetor. He succeeded in driving Cato out of the island, and then crossed over to Africa, where he was defeated and slain by Juba and P. Attius Varus. (See index to Cicero.)

Curiosolītae, a Gallic people on the Ocean in Armorica near the Veneti, in Corseult, near St. Malo (Caes. B. G. ii. 34, iii. 7.)

Curium (Κούριον; Κουριεύς; nr. Piscopia, Rn.), a town on the S. coast of Cyprus, near the promontory Curias, W. of the mouth of the Lyens (Hdt. v. 113; Strab. p. 683).

Cūrīus Dentatus. [DENTATUS.]

Cūrīus, M', an intimate friend of Cicero and Atticus, lived for several years as a negotiator at Patrae in Peloponnesus. In his will he left his property to Atticus and Cicero. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 17, xvi. 4, 5, 6, 9, ad Att. vii. 2.)—2. Quaestor urbanus in B.C. 61, also a friend of Cicero, who had been quaestor to the father of this Curius (Cic. Post Red. in Sen. 8, 21, ad Fam. xiii. 49, ad Q. Fr. i. 4).

Cursor, L. Pāpīrius. 1. A distinguished Roman general in the second Samnite war, was five times consul (B.C. 333, 320, 319, 315, 313), and twice dictator (325, 309). He frequently defeated the Samnites, but his greatest victory over them was gained in his second dictatorship. Although a great and Actolia; the latter country was called Curētis from them (Il. ix. 549; Diod. v. 46; Strab. p. 463). Ovid speaks of a story that general, he was not popular with the soldiers, on account of his severity. (Liv. viii. and ix.; Aurel. Viet. de Vir. III. 31.)—2. Son of No. 1, was, like his father, a distinguished general. In both his consulships (293, 272) he gained great victories over the Samnites, and in the second he brought the third Samnite war to a close (Liv. x. 31-47).

Curtius, Mettus or Mettius, a distinguished Sabine, fought with the rest of his nation against Romulus. According to one tradition, the Lacus Curtius, which was part of the Roman forum, was called after him, because in the battle with the Romans he escaped with difficulty from a swamp, into which his horse had plunged. But the more usual tradition respecting the name of the Lacus Curtius related that in B.C. 362 the earth in the forum gave way, and a great chasm appeared, which the soothsayers declared could only be filled up by throwing into it Rome's greatest treasure; that thereupon M. Curtius, a noble youth, mounted his steed in full armour; and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen, leaped into the abyss, upon which the earth closed over him. The spot was supposed to be marked by a circular pavement in the Roman Forum. Varro gives a rationalistic explanation, that the spot was struck by lightning in B.C. 445, and was enclosed by Curtius, one of the consuls for that year. (Liv. i. 12, vii. 6; Dionys. ii. 42; Varr. L. L. v. 148.)

Curtius Montanus. [MONTANUS.]

Curtius Rufus, Q., the Roman historian of Alexander the Great, belonging to the first century of our era. Respecting his life nothing is known with certainty; but it is most probable that he wrote in the reign of Claudius, though some have given him an earlier date, and others a later. The work itself, entitled De Rebus Gestis Alexandri Magni, consisted of ten books, but the first two are lost, and the remaining eight are not without considerable gaps. It is written in a pleasing though somewhat declamatory style, apparently modelled on Livy. His principal source was Cleitarchus, whom he followed uncritically, and he frequently shows his ignorance of geography, chronology, and tactics. Editions by Vogel, Leips. 1885; Heitland, Camb. 1879.

Cutiliae Aquae. [AQUAE, No. 3.]

Cyānē (Κυάνη), a Sicilian nymph and playmate of Proserpine, changed into a fountain through grief at the loss of the goddess (Diod. v. 4; Ov. Met. v. 412). The stream from this fountain flows into the Anapus. The fountain itself is remarkable for its clear blue waters, whence, no doubt, its name. It is at the foot of the limestone hills, two miles W. of Syracuse.

Cyānēae Insulae (Κυανείαι νῆσοι or πέτραι, Urek-Jaki), two small rocky islands at the entrance of the Thracian Bosphorus into the Euxine, the Planctae (Πλάγκται) and Symplogades (Συμπληγάδες) of mythology, so called because they are said to have been once moveable and to have rushed together, and thus destroyed every ship that attempted to pass through them. After the ship Argo had passed through them in safety, they became stationary. [ARGONAUTAE.]

Cyaxares (Κυζάρης), king of Media B.C. 634-594, son of Phraortes, and grandson of Deioces. He was the most warlike of the Median kings, and introduced great military reforms. He defeated the Assyrians, who had slain his father in battle, and he laid siege to Ninus (Nineveh). But while he was before the city, he was defeated by the Scythians, who held the dominion of Upper Asia for twenty-eight years (634-607), but were at length driven out of Asia by Cyaxares. After the expulsion of the Scythians, Cyaxares again turned his arms against Assyria, and with the aid of the king of Babylon (probably the father of Nebuchadnezzar), he took and destroyed Ninus, in 606. He subsequently carried on war for five years against Alyattes, king of Lydia. [ALYATTES.] Cyaxares died in 594, and was succeeded by his son Astyages. (Hdt. i. 73, 103-106, iv. 11.)—Xenophon speaks of a Cyaxares II., king of Media, son of Astyages, respecting whom see CYRUS.

Cybele. [RHEA.]

Cybistra (τὰ Κύβιστρα), an ancient city of Asia Minor, several times mentioned by Cicero (ad Fam. xv. 2, 4, ad Att. v. 18, 20), who describes it as lying at the foot of Mt. Taurus, in the part of Cappadocia bordering on Cilicia. Strabo (p. 539), places it 300 stadia from Tyana. It is on the road from Tyana to Laranda. The site is marked by the modern Eregli, Cybistra being in Byzantine times distinguished as τὰ Ἡρακλέους or Cybistra-Heraclea, Heraclea being the fortress adjoining the ancient town.

Cyclades (Κυκλάδες), a group of islands in the Aegæan sea, so called because they lay in a circle (ἐν κύκλῳ) around Delos, the most important of them. According to Strabo (p. 485), they were twelve in number; but their number is increased by other writers. The most important of them were DELOS, CEOS, CYTHNOS, SERIPHOS, RHENIA, SIPHROS, CIMOLOS, NAXOS, PAROS, SYROS, MYCONOS, TENOS, ANDROS.

Cyclopes (Κύκλωπες)—that is, creatures with round or circular eyes—are described differently by different writers. Homer speaks of them as a gigantic and lawless race of shepherds in Sicily, who devoured human beings and cared nought for Zeus, but were skilled herdsmen (Od. i. 69, ix. 106). Thucydides so far adopts this as to make the Cyclopes and Laestrygones the oldest inhabitants of Sicily (Thuc. vi. 21). Each of them had only one eye, in the centre of his forehead: the chief among them was POLYPHEMUS. Hesiod has a different tradition (Th. 624; cf. Apollod. i. 4; Ap. Rh. i. 510): the Cyclopes were Titans, sons of Uranus and Ge, were three in number, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, and each of them had only one eye, on his forehead. They were thrown into Tartarus by Cronus, but were released by Zeus, whom they provided with thunderbolts and lightning, Pluto with a helmet, and Poseidon with a trident. They were afterwards killed by Apollo for having furnished Zeus with the thunderbolts to kill Asclepius. A later tradition regarded the Cyclopes as the assistants of Hephaestus. Volcanoes were the workshops of that god, and Mt. Aetna in Sicily and the neighbouring isles were considered as their abodes. As the assistants of Hephaestus they make the metal armour and ornaments for gods and heroes. Their number is no longer confined to three; and besides the names mentioned by Hesiod, we also find those of Pyracmon and Acamas. (Strab. p. 275; Callim. Dian. 47; Ap. Rh. iv. 761; Verg. Aen. viii. 416.) The name of Cyclopiæan walls was given to the walls built of great masses of unhewn stone, of which specimens are still to be seen at Mycenæ and other parts of Greece, and also in Italy. They were probably constructed by the prehistoric races who are included in the name 'Pelasgi'; and later generations, being struck by their grandeur, ascribed their building to a fabulous race of beings, who represented stories of primitive building and metallurgy. Some writers have derived their name from the Κύκλος of fortifications.

Cygnus (Κύκνος). 1. Son of Apollo by Hyrie, lived in the district between Plouron and Calydon, and was beloved by Phyllius; but as Phyllius refused him a bull, Cygnus leaped into a lake and was metamorphosed into a swan (Ov. Met. vii. 371; Ant. Lib. 12).—2. Son of Poseidon, was king of Colonao in Troas, and father of Tenes and Hemithea. His second wife Philonome fell in love with Tenes, her stepson, and as he refused her offers, she accused him to his father, who threw Tenes with Hemithea in a chest into the sea. Tenes escaped and became king of Tenedos. [TENES.] In the Trojan war both Cygnus and Tenes assisted the Trojans, but both were slain by Achilles. As Cygnus could not be wounded by iron, Achilles strangled him with the thong of his helmet, or killed him with a stone. When Achilles was going to strip Cygnus of his armour, the body disappeared, and was changed into a swan. (Paus. x. 14; Strab. p. 604; Verg. Aen. ii. 21; Ov. Met. xii. 144; Dict. Cret. ii. 13).—3. Son of Ares and Pelopia, slain by Heracles at Itone.—4. Son of Ares and Pyrene, likewise killed by Heracles.—5. Son of Sthenelus, king of the Ligurians, and a friend and relation of Phaethon. While he was lamenting the fate of Phaethon, he was metamorphosed by Apollo into a swan, and placed among the stars. (Ov. Met. ii. 366; Paus. i. 30, 3).

Cydias, a celebrated painter from the island Cythnus, B.C. 364, whose picture of the Argonauts was exhibited in a porticus by Agrippa at Rome (Dio Cass. liii. 27; Plin. xxxv. 130).

Cydippé. [ACONTIUS.]

Cydnus (Κύδνος: Tersoos-Chad), a river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in the Taurus, and flowing through the midst of the city of Tarsus. It was celebrated for the clearness and coldness of its water, which was esteemed useful in gout and nervous diseases, but by bathing in which Alexander nearly lost his life. At its mouth the river spread into a lagune, which formed the harbour of Tarsus, but which is now choked with sand. In the middle ages the river was called Hierax. (Strab. p. 672.)

Cydonia, more rarely Cydonis (Κυδωνία, Κυδωνίς: Kydoniátihs: Khania), one of the chief cities of Crete, the rival and opponent of CNOSSUS and GORTYNA, was situated on the NW. coast, and derived its name from the Cydonés (Κύδωνες), a Cretan race (probably of Phoenician origin, as the name of their river Iardanus may imply), placed by Homer in the W. part of the island (Od. iii. 292, xix. 176). At a later time a colony of Zacynthians settled in Cydonia; they were driven out by the Samians about B.C. 524; and the Samians were in their turn expelled by the Aeginetans (Strab. p. 476; Diod. v. 78; Thuc. ii. 35; Liv. xxxvii. 40). Cydonia was the place from which quinces (Cydonia mala) were first brought to Italy, and its inhabitants were some of the best Cretan archers (Cydonio arcu, Hor. Od. iv. 19, 17).

Cyllarus (Κύλλαρος), a beautiful centaur, killed at the wedding feast of Pirithous. (Ov. Met. xii. 393.) The horse of Castor was likewise called Cyllarus (Verg. Georg. iii. 90).

Cyllenē (Κυλλάγη). 1. (Zyria), the highest mountain in Peloponnesus on the frontiers of Arcadia and Achaia, sacred to Hermes (Mercury), who had a temple on the summit, was said to have been born there, and was hence called Cyllenius (Hymn. ad Merc. 2; Verg.

Aen. viii. 138; Paus. viii. 17).—2. A seaport town of Elis.

Cylon (Κύλων), an Athenian of noble family, married the daughter of Theagenes, tyrant of Megara, and gained an Olympic victory B.C. 640. Encouraged by the Delphic oracle, he seized the Acropolis, intending to make himself tyrant of Athens (Hdt. v. 71; Thuc. i. 126; Plut. Sol. 12; Paus. i. 28, 40). From Aristot. 'Aθ. πολ. 1. it is clear that the attempt of Cylon was before the legislation of Draco, and therefore an earlier date than is sometimes given should be assigned—probably before 630. Pressed by famine, Cylon and his adherents were driven to take refuge at the altar of Athene, whence they were induced to withdraw by the archon Megacles, the Alcmaeonid, on a promise that their lives should be spared. Their enemies put them to death as soon as they had them in their power.

Cýmē (Κύμη: Kymaios: Sandakli), the largest of the Aeolian cities of Asia Minor, stood upon the coast of Aeolis, on a bay named after it, Cumaeus (also Elaíticus) Sinus (ὁ Kymaios κόλπος: Gulf of Sandakli), and had a good harbour. It was founded by a colony of Locrians from Mt. Phricus, and hence it had the epithet Φρικωνίς (Strab. p. 621). It was the native place of Ephorus, and Hesiod's father emigrated from it to Boeotia (Hes. Op. 636). It was the mother city of Side in Pamphylia and Cumae in Campania.

Cyna. [CYNANE.]

Cynaegirus (Κυναιγείρος), brother of the poet Aeschylus, distinguished himself by his valour at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. According to Herodotus, when the Persians were endeavouring to escape by sea, Cynaegirus seized one of their ships to keep it back, but fell with his right hand cut off. In the later versions of the story Cynaegirus is made to perform still more heroic deeds (Hdt. vi. 114; Just. ii. 9; Val. Max. iii. 2, 22).

Cynaetha (Κύναιθα: Kynaiethés, -thaiés: Kalavryta), a town in the N. of Arcadia, whose inhabitants, unlike the other Arcadians, had a dislike to music, to which circumstance Polybius attributes their rude character (Strab. p. 371; Paus. vii. 24; Polyb. iv. 18).

Cynane, Cyna, or Cynna (Κυνάνη, Κύννα), half-sister to Alexander the Great, daughter of Philip by Audata, an Illyrian woman. She was married to her cousin Amyntas; and after the death of Alexander she crossed over to Asia, intending to marry her daughter Eurydice to Arrhidæus, who had been chosen king. Her project alarmed Perdicas, by whose order she was put to death. (Agr. Anab. i. 5; Diod. xix. 52.)

Cynēsii or Cynētes (Κυνήσιοι, Κύνητες), a people dwelling in the extreme W. beyond the Celts, apparently in Spain (Hdt. iv. 49).

Cynisca (Κυνίσκα), daughter of Archidamus II., king of Sparta, was the first woman who kept horses for the games, and who gained an Olympic victory (Hdt. vi. 71; Paus. iii. 8).

Cynópolis (Κυνός πόλις: Samallout), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on an island in the Nile; the chief seat of the worship of Anubis (Strab. p. 812). There was a city of the same name in the Delta (Strab. p. 802).

Cynos (Κύνος: Kynios. Kynaios), the chief seaport in the territory of the Locri Opuntii.

Cynosarges (τὸ Kynósarγες), a gymnasium, sacred to Heracles, outside Athens, E. of the city and before the gate Diomēa, for the use of those who were not of pure Athenian blood:

here taught Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school. [ATHENÆ.]

Cynoscéphalæ (Κυνὸς κεφαλαί), 'Dog's Heads.' 1. Two hills near Scotussa in Thessaly, where Flaminius gained his celebrated victory over Philip of Macedonia, B.C. 197 (Polyb. xviii. 3; Strab. p. 441; Liv. xxxiii. 6).—2. A hill between Thebes and Thespiæ in Bœotia.

Cynossēma (Κυνὸς σῆμα), 'Dog's Tomb,' a promontory in the Thracian Chersonesus near Madytus, so called because it was supposed to be the tomb of Hecuba, previously changed into a dog (Thuc. viii. 102; Strab. p. 595).

Cynosūra (Κυνόσουρα), an Idaean nymph, and one of the nurses of Zeus, who placed her among the stars. [ARCTOS.]

Cynosūra (Κυνόσουρα), 'Dog's Tail,' a promontory in Attica, S. of Marathon.

Cynthia and Cynthius (Κυνθία and Κύνθιος), surnames respectively of Artemis and Apollo, which they derived from Mt. Cynthus in the island of Delos, their birthplace.

Cynūria (Κυνουρία: Κυνούριος), a district on the frontiers of Argolis and Laconia, for the possession of which the Argives and Spartans carried on frequent wars, and which the Spartans at length obtained about B.C. 550. [ARGOS.] The inhabitants were Ionians.

Cyparissia (Κυπαρισσία). 1. A town in Messenia on the W. coast, S. of the river Cyparissus, and on a promontory and bay of the same name. Homer (Il. ii. 593) speaks of a town Cyparissēis (Κυπαρισσῆεις) subject to Nestor, which is probably the same as the preceding, though Strabo places it in Triphylia (Strab. p. 349).—2. A town in Laconia on a peninsula near the Asopus.

Cyparissus (Κυπάρισσος), son of Telephus, beloved by Apollo or Silvanus. Having inadvertently killed his favourite stag, he was seized with immoderate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress (Ov. Met. x. 120).

Cyparissus (Κυπάρισσος), a small town in Phocis on Parnassus near Delphi (Il. ii. 519; Strab. p. 423).

Cyphanta (τὰ Κύφαντα), a town on the E. coast of Laconia near Brasia (Paus. iii. 24).

Cypria, Cypris, surnames of Aphrodite, from the island of Cyprus.

Cypriānus, Bishop of Carthage, A.D. 248. [Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Cyprus (Κύπρος: Κύπριος: Cyprus, called by the Turks Kebris), a large island in the Mediterranean, S. of Cilicia and W. of Syria. It is called by various names in the poets, Cerastia or Cerastis, Macaria, Sphacia, Acamantis, Amathusia, and also Paphos. To Syrian nations it was known as Kittim. The island is of a triangular form: its length from E. to W. is about 140 miles; its greatest breadth, which is in the W. part, is about 50 miles from N. to S., but it gradually narrows towards the E. A range of mountains called Olympus by the ancients runs through the whole length of the island from E. to W., and rises in one part more than 7000 feet in height. The plains are chiefly in the S. of the island, and were celebrated in ancient as well as in modern times for their fertility. The largest plain, called the Salaminian plain, is in the E. part of the island near Salamis. The rivers are little more than mountain torrents, mostly dry in summer. Cyprus was in early times famed for its yield of copper, found especially in the mountainous country of Tamassus, Amathus, Soli and Curium. In Il. xi. 19 we hear of gifts of its metals sent by CINYRAS to Agamemnon. Cyprus was never entirely Greek: it was colonised by the Phœnicians at a very early period; Greek colonies were subsequently planted in the island, according to Herodotus (vii. 90), by emigrants from Athens, Salamis, Arcadia, and Cynthus; and accordingly we read of 9 independent Greek states, each governed by its own king, SALAMIS, CITIUM, AMATHUS, CURIUM, PAPHOS, MARIUM, SOLI, LAPETHUS, CERYNIA; but the island was, with few intervals, under the rule of Egypt, Assyria, or Persia. A mention of Cyprus being forced to pay tribute is found as early as the records of the wars of Tehutimes or Thothmes III., whose date was probably about 1600 B.C. According to Menander, as cited by Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, 3, Cyprus was subject to the Phœnicians in the time of Solomon (cf. Verg. Aen. i. 642), and their dominion left much of their religion and ritual in the island. [APHRODITE.] The Greek settlements mentioned above probably began after or towards the end of this period. The island fell under the Assyrian rule in the time of Sargon (708 B.C.): on the downfall of the Assyrian empire it probably enjoyed a period of independence in its various petty states, but was subdued by Amāsis, king of Egypt, about B.C. 540 (Hdt. ii. 182). Upon the downfall of the Egyptian monarchy, it became subject to the Persians; during the hegemony of Athens (478–449) Cyprus was free from Eastern rulers; but fell afterwards to a great extent under a Phœnician adventurer who got possession of Salamis and introduced as far as possible Phœnician influence (Hdt. iv. 162, v. 104; Isocr. Evag. 22). He was dethroned and slain in 411; and in the following year ELAGORAS of Salamis began to unite the whole island in one kingdom. He handed down the sovereignty to his son NICOCLES. It was subdued by the Persian king Ochus in 346; but, recovering some independence in the wars of Alexander, eventually fell to the share of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and was governed by them, sometimes united to Egypt, and sometimes by separate princes of the royal family. In 58 the Romans made Cyprus one of their provinces, and sent M. Cato to take possession of it. At first it was united to the province of Cilicia (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 48, ad Att. v. 21); then given by Antonius to Cleopatra (Dio Cass. xlix. 32; Strab. p. 685). After Actium it was first an imperial province with Cilicia; then (B.C. 22) separated and given to the senate, governed by a propraetor with title of proconsul (Dio Cass. liii. 12, liv. 4). Cyprus, since it fell under the English protectorate in recent years, has been already explored more systematically by competent antiquarians, whose excavations, especially at PAPHOS and SALAMIS, have thrown much light on the history and the art of the island. (See Hellenic Journal, vol. ix. sq.)

Cypsēla (τὰ Κύψελα: Κυψελίσιος, -ληνός). 1. A town in Arcadia on the frontiers of Laconia (Thuc. v. 33).—2. A town in Thrace on the Hebrus and the Egnatia Via (Strab. p. 322; Liv. xxxi. 16).

Cypselus (Κύψελος). 1. Father of Merope and grandfather of Aegyptus. [ÆGYPYTUS].—2. Of Corinth, son of Aëtion. The mother of Cypselus belonged to the house of the Bacchiadae—that is, to the Doric nobility of Corinth. According to tradition, she married Aëtion, because, being ugly, she met with no one among the Bacchiadae who would have her as his wife. As the oracle of Delphi had declared that her son would prove formidable to the ruling party at Corinth, the Bacchiadae attempted to murder the child. But his mother concealed him in a chest (κυσέλη), from which he derived his name, Cypselus. When he had grown up to manhood, he expelled the Bacchiadae, with the help of the people, and then established himself as tyrant. He reigned 30 years, B.C. 655–625, and was succeeded by his son Periander. The celebrated chest of Cypselus, made of cedar wood, ivory, and gold, and richly adorned with figures in relief, is described at length by Pausanias (v. 17, &c.).

Cyraunis (Κύραυσις), an island off the N. coast of Africa mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 95); probably the same as CERCINE.

Cyrenāica (ἡ Κυρηναία, ἡ Κυρηναῖη χώρα, Herod.: Dernar or Jebel-Akhdar, i.e. the Green Mountain, the NE. part of Tripoli), a district of N. Africa, between Marmarica on the E. and the Regio Syrtica on the W., was considered to extend in its widest limits from the Philae-norum Arce at the bottom of the Great Syrtis to the Chersonesus Magna or N. headland of the Gulf of Platea (G. of Bomba), or even to the Catathmus Magnus (Marsa Sollum); but the part actually possessed and cultivated by the Greek colonists can only be considered as beginning at the N. limit of the sandy shores of the Great Syrtis, at Boreum Pr. (Ras Teyonas, S. of Ben-Ghazi), between which and the Chersonesus Magna the country projects into the Mediterranean in the form of a segment of a circle, whose chord is above 150 miles long and its arc above 200. From its position, formation, climate, and soil, this region is perhaps one of the most delightful on the surface of the globe. Its surface is occupied by a moderately elevated table-land, whose edge runs parallel to the coast, to which it sinks down in a succession of terraces, clothed with verdure, intersected by mountain streams running through ravines filled with the richest vegetation, exposed to the cool sea-breezes from the N., and sheltered by the mass of the mountain from the sands and hot winds of the Sahara. These slopes produced the choicest fruits, vegetables, and flowers, and some very rare plants—above all, the silphium or laserpitium, an umbelliferous plant not exactly determined by modern botanists, which was valuable for its fruit, its stalk, its leaf, and its juice, and, as furnishing a great part of the wealth of Cyrene, is figured on its coins. (Hdt. iv. 190; Strab. p. 837; Theophr. H. P. vi. 3.) The various harvests, at the different elevations, lasted for eight months of the year. The country was, however, exposed to annual ravages by locusts. The belt of mountainous land extends inwards from the coast about 70 or 80 miles.—The first occupation of this country by the Greeks of which we have any clear account, was effected, according to Herodotus (iv. 154), by BATTUS, who led a colony from the island of Thera, and first established himself on the island of Platea at the E. extremity of the district, and afterwards built CYRENE (B.C. 631), where he founded a dynasty, which ruled over the country during eight reigns, though with comparatively little power over some of the other Greek cities. Battus is, however, merely the Libyan title of the kings of Cyrene; and the name of the founder seems to have been Aristoteles (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 10). The earliest cities founded were TEUCHIRA and HESPERIS, then BARCA, a colony from Cyrene; and these, with Cyrene itself and its port APOLLONIA, formed the original Libyan Pentapolis, though this name seems not to have come into general use till under the Ptolemies. The comparative independence of Barca, and the temporary conquest of the country by the Persians under Cambyses, diminished the power of the later kings of Cyrene, and at last the dynasty was overthrown and a republic established in the latter part of the 5th century, B.C. When Alexander invaded Egypt, the Cyrenaeans formed an alliance with him; but their country was made subject to Egypt by Ptolemy the son of Lagus. It appears to have flourished under the Ptolemies, who pursued their usual policy of raising new cities at the expense of the ancient ones, or restoring the latter under new names. Thus Hesperis became Berenice, Teuchira was called Arsinoë, Barca was entirely eclipsed by its port, which was raised into a city under the name of Ptolemais, and Cyrene suffered from the favours bestowed upon its port Apollonia. The country was now usually called Pentapolis, from the five cities of Cyrene, Apollouia, Ptolemais, Arsinoë, and Berenice. In B.C. 95, the last Egyptian governor, Apion, an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, made the country over to the Romans, who at first gave the cities their freedom. In B.C. 74 Cyrenaeica was formed into a province, at first under a quaestor pro praetore; we have no evidence of its junction with Crete before B.C. 27, when Octavian formed a senatorial province under a proconsul: the province was called indifferently Creta or Cyrenaeica, or both combined. Under Diocletian Cyrenaeica was separated from Crete, and made a distinct province, under the name of Libya Superior. As the Roman empire declined, the attacks of the native Libyan tribes became more frequent and formidable, and the sufferings caused by their inroads and by locusts, plague, and earthquakes, are most pathetically described by Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, in the 5th century. The country was afterwards overrun by the Persians, and soon afterwards it fell a final prey to the great Arabian invasion.

Cyrenē (Κυρήνη), daughter of Hypseus, mother of Aristaeus by Apollo, was carried by the god from Mt. Pelion to Libya, where the city of Cyrene derived its name from her (Pind. Pyth. ix. 5; Ap. Rh. i. 500; Diod. iv. 81).

Cyrenē (Κυρήνη; Κυρηναίος: Ghreneah, Ru.), the chief city of CYRENAICA in N. Africa, was founded by Battus (B.C. 631) over a fountain consecrated to Apollo, and called Cyrene (Κύρη: Ἀπόλλωνος κρήνη), which supplied the city with water, and then ran down to the sea through a beautiful ravine. The city stood 80 stadia (8 geog. miles) from the coast, on the edge of the upper of two terraces of table land, at the height of 1800 feet above the sea, in one of the finest situations in the world. The road which connected it with its harbour, Apollouia, still exists, and the ruins of Cyrene, though terribly defaced, are very extensive, comprising streets, aqueducts, temples, theatres, tombs, paintings, sculpture, and inscriptions. In the face of the terrace on which the city stands is a vast subterranean necropolis. For the history of the city and surrounding country, see CYRENALICA. Among its celebrated natives were the philosopher Aristippus, the poet Callinachus, and the Christian bishop and orator Synesius.

Cyreschata or Cyrópolis (Κυρέσχατα, Κύρα, Κύρου πόλις), a city of Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, the furthest of the colonies founded by Cyrus, and the extreme city of the Persian empire; destroyed, after many revolts, by Alexander. Its position is doubtful, but it was probably not far from Alexandreschata (Kokand). (Strab. p. 517; Arr. An. iv. 3.)

Cyrillus (Κύριλλος). 1. Bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 351–386.—2. Bishop of Alexandria, 412–444. [Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Cyrrhesticé (Κυρρηστική), the name given under the Seleucidae to a province of Syria, lying between Commagene on the N. and the plain of Antioch on the S., between Mt. Amanus on the W. and the Euphrates on the E. (Strab. p. 751). After the time of Constantine, it was united with Commagene into one province, under the name of Euphratesia.

Cyrrhus or Cyrus Κύρρος, Κύρος; Korus?), a city of Syria, founded under the Seleucidae, and called after the city of the same name in Macedonia; chiefly remarkable as the residence and see of Theodoret. Justinian rebuilt the walls, and erected an aqueduct. (Strab. p. 751; Procop. de Aed. ii. 11.)

Cyrrhus, a town in Macedonia, near Pella (Thuc. ii. 100).

Cyrus (Κύρος). 1. The Elder, the founder of the Persian empire. The history of his life was overlaid in ancient times with fables and romances, and is related differently by Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon. The account of Herodotus is as follows: Cyrus was the son of Cambyses, a noble Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of the Median king Astyages. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that his grandson should be master of Asia, Astyages sent for his daughter, when she was pregnant: and upon her giving birth to a child, he committed it to Harpagus, his confidential attendant, with orders to kill it. Harpagus gave it to a herdsman of Astyages, who was to expose it. But the wife of the herdsman having brought forth a still-born child, they substituted the latter for the child of Mandane, who was reared as the son of the herdsman. When he was ten years old, his true parentage was discovered by the following incident. In the sports of his village, the boys chose him for their king. One of the boys, the son of a noble Median named Artembares, disobeyed his commands, and Cyrus caused him to be severely scourged. Artembares complained to Astyages, who sent for Cyrus, in whose person and courage he discovered his daughter's son. The herdsman and Harpagus, being summoned before the king, told him the truth. Astyages forgave the herdsman, but revenged himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. As to his grandson, by the advice of the Magians, who assured him that his dreams were fulfilled by the boy's having been a king in sport, he sent him back to his parents in Persia. When Cyrus grew up, he conspired with Harpagus to dethrone his grandfather. He induced the Persians to revolt from the Median supremacy, and at their head marched against Astyages, whom he defeated and took prisoner, B.C. 559. The Medes accepted Cyrus for their king, and thus the supremacy which they had held passed to the Persians. It was probably at this time that Cyrus received that name, which is a Persian word (Kohr), signifying the Sun.—Cyrus now proceeded to conquer the other parts of Asia. In 546 he overthrew the Lydian monarchy, and took Croesus prisoner. [CROESUS.] The Greek cities in Asia Minor were subdued by his general Harpagus. He next turned his arms against the Assyrian empire, of which Babylon was then the capital. After defeating the Babylonians in battle, he laid siege to the city, and after a long time he took it by diverting the course of the Euphrates, which flowed through the midst of it, so that his soldiers entered Babylon by the bed of the river. This was in 538. Subsequently he crossed the Araxes, with the intention of subduing the Massagetæ, a Scythian people, but he was defeated and slain in battle. Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetæ, cut off his head, and threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. He was killed in 529. He was succeeded by his son CAMBYSES.—Ctesias, who as physician to Artaxerxes Memnon must undoubtedly have had access to Persian records, contradicts Herodotus on many points, especially as regards the early life of Cyrus. He says that Astyages was no blood relation to Cyrus, who raised troops against him, conquered him and drove him from Media, but afterwards treated him with honour, and married his daughter Amytis. He represents Cyrus as dying from a wound received in battle against the Derbices. Xenophon represents Cyrus as brought up at his grandfather's court, as serving in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages, of whom Herodotus and Ctesias know nothing; as making war upon Babylon simply as the general of Cyaxares; and at length dying quietly in his bed, after a sage and Socratic discourse to his children and friends. Xenophon's account is preserved in the Cyropaedia, in which he intends to draw a picture of what a wise and just prince ought to be. The work is justly termed a 'philosophical novel,' and must not be regarded as a genuine history.—In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured. His sepulchre at Pasargadae was visited by Alexander the Great (Arr. An. vi. 29).—2. The Younger, the second of the four sons of Darius Nothus, king of Persia, and of Parysatis, was appointed by his father commander of the maritime parts of Asia Minor, and satrap of Lydia, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, B.C. 407. He assisted Lysander and the Lacedaemonians with large sums of money in their war against the Athenians. Cyrus was of a daring and ambitious temper. On the death of his father and the accession of his elder brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, 404, Cyrus formed a plot against the life of Artaxerxes. His design was betrayed by Tissaphernes to the king, who condemned him to death; but, on the intercession of Parysatis, he spared his life and sent him back to his satrapy. Cyrus now gave himself up to the design of dethroning his brother. He collected a powerful native army, but he placed his chief reliance on a force of Greek mercenaries. He set out from Sardis in the spring of 401, and, having crossed the Euphrates at Thapsacus, marched down the river to the plain of Cunaxa, 500 stadia from Babylon. Here he found Artaxerxes prepared to meet him. Artaxerxes had from 400,000 to a million of men; Cyrus had about 100,000 Asiatics and 13,000 Greeks. The battle was at first altogether in favour of Cyrus. His Greek troops on the right routed the Asiatics who were opposed to them; and he himself pressed forward in the centre against his brother, and had even wounded him, when he was killed by one of the king's body-guard. Artaxerxes canted his head and right hand to be struck off, and sought to have it believed that Cyrus had fallen by his hand. The character of Cyrus is drawn by Xenophon in the brightest colours. It is enough to say that his ambition was gilded by all those brilliant qualities which win men's hearts. (Xen. Hell. i. 4, ii. 1, iii. 1; Anab. i.; Cyrop. viii. 8; Ctes. Pers. i. 44).—3. An architect at Rome, who died on the same day as Clodius, 52 (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 14).

Cyrus (Κύρος: Kour), one of the two great rivers of Armenia, rises in the Caucasus, flows through Iberia, and after forming the boundary between Albania and Armenia, unites with the Araxes, and falls into the W. side of the Caspian (Strab. pp. 491, 500).—There were small rivers of the same name in Media and Persis.

Cÿta or Cÿtaea (Κύτα, Κύταια: Kytaios, Kytaeus), a town in Colchis on the river Phasis, where Medea was said to have been born.

Cÿthëra (Κύθηρα: Kythios: Cerigo), a mountainous island off the SE. point of Laconia, with a town of the same name in the interior, the harbour of which was called Scandëa (Σκανδέα). It was colonised at an early time by the Phoenicians, who introduced the worship of Aphrodite into the island, for which it was celebrated. This goddess was hence called Cytheraea, Cytherëis; according to some traditions, it was in the neighbourhood of this island that she first rose from the foam of the sea. [APHRODITE.] The Argives subsequently took possession of Cythera, but were driven out of it by the Lacedaemonians, who added it to their dominions.

Cÿthëris, a celebrated courtesan, the mistress of Antony, and subsequently of the poet Gallus, who mentioned her under the name of Lycoris (Plut. Ant. 9; Cic. ad Att. x. 10, 16).

Cythërus (Κύθηρος: Kythios), one of the twelve ancient towns of Attica and subsequently a demus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis.

Cythus (Κύθος: Kythios: Thermia), an island in the Aegean sea, one of the Cyclades. It was colonised by the Dryopes (Hdt. viii. 46; Strab. p. 485). It had warm springs, whence its modern name.

Cythinium (Κυθινιον: Kythinias), one of the four cities in Doris, on Parnassus. It commanded the pass from the valley of Doris to the plain of Amphissa (Thuc. iii. 95, 101, 102; Strab. pp. 427, 475).

Cÿtôrus or -um (Κÿτωρος or -ον: Kydros), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Amastris and the promontory Carambis was a commercial settlement of the people of Sinope. It stood upon or near the mountain of the same name, which is mentioned by the Romans as abounding in box-trees (Il. ii. 853; Strab. p. 544; Verg. Georg. ii. 437; Catull. 4, 11).

Cÿzicus (Κÿζικος), son of Aeneas and Aenete, the daughter of Ensorus, or son of Eusorus, or son of Apollo by Stilbe. King of the Doliones at Cyzicus on the Propontis. [ARGONAUTAE.]

Cÿzicus (Κÿζικος: Kyzyknos: Bal Kiz or Chizico, Ru.), one of the most ancient and powerful of the Greek cities in Asia Minor.

Coin of Cyzicus.

Obv., head of Demeter, with legend ΣΤΕΙΡΑ: rev., lion's head and tunny-fish, with legend ΚΥΖΙ.

stood upon an island of the same name in the Propontis (Sea of Marmara). This island, the earlier name of which was Arctonnësus (Ἄρκτων νῆσος), lay close to the shore of Mysia, to which it was united by two bridges, and afterwards (under Alexander the Great) by a mole, which has accumulated to a considerable isthmus. The city of Cyzicus stood on the S. side of the island, at the N. end of the isthmus, on each side of which it had a port. Tradition ascribed the foundation of the city to the Doliones, a tribe of prehistoric Thessalians, who had been driven from their homes by the Aeolians. It was afterwards colonised by the Milesians, B.C. 675, as the emporium for their trade with the Black Sea (Strab. p. 635). The coinage of Cyzicus was famous, since it gained almost a monopoly of the coinage of electrum staters (permitted by Persian kings to a few cities) during the 5th and 4th cent. B.C. (Xen. An. vii. 3, 10; Dem. c. Phorm. p. 914, § 23). The tunny-fish is the mint mark of the city. It took no conspicuous place in history till about twenty-two years after the peace of Antalcidas, when it made itself independent of Persia. It preserved its freedom under Alexander and his successors, and was in alliance with the kings of Pergamus, and afterwards with the Romans. Its celebrated resistance against Mithridates, when he besieged it by sea and land (B.C. 75), was of great service to the Romans, and obtained for it the rank of a 'libera civitas,' which it lost in B.C. 20, recovered in 15, and again lost under Tiberius (Dio Cass. liv. 7, 23, 24; Tac. Ann. iv. 36). Under Constantine it became the chief city of the new province of Hellespontus. It was greatly injured by an earthquake in A.D. 443, and finally ruined by its conquest by the Arabians in 675.

Dāae. [DAAE.]

Dachinabādes (Δαχίναβάδης), a general name for the S. part of the Indian peninsula, derived from the Sanscrit dakshina, the S. wind, and connected with the modern name Deccan ([Scyl.] Peripl. Ind. p. 29).

Dācia (Dācus), as a Roman province, was bounded on the S. by the Danube, which separated it from Moesia, on the N. by the Carpathian mountains, on the W. by the river Tysia (Theiss), and on the E. by the river Hierasus (Pruth), thus comprehending the modern Transylvania, Wallachia, Moldavia, and part of Hungary. The Daci were of the same race and spoke the same language as the Getae, and are therefore usually said to be of Thracian origin. They were a brave and warlike people. In the reign of Augustus they crossed the Danube and plundered the allies of Rome, but were defeated and driven back into their own country by the generals of Augustus. [COTISO.] In the reign of Domitian they became so formidable under their king DECEBALUS, that the Romans were obliged to purchase a peace of them by the payment of tribute. Trajan delivered the empire from this disgrace; he crossed the Danube, and after a war of five years (A.D. 101-106), conquered the country, made it a Roman province, and colonised it with inhabitants from all parts of the empire (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 14; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 13). At first it was held as a single province under the emperor's legatus; then before the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. it was divided into Dacia superior and Dacia inferior, each under a legatus. M. Aurelius in 168 made three divisions: Dacia Porolissensis, with chief town Porolissum, Apulensis, with chief town Apulum, and Maluensis, from the colony of that name; but these three, though each had its own procurator, were united under a 'legatus Augusti pr. pr. trium Daciarum' or 'Daciae,' and had a single capital, Sarmizegetusa. At a later period Dacia was invaded by the Goths; and as Aurelian considered it more prudent to make the Danube the boundary of the empire, he resigned Dacia to the barbarians, removed the Roman inhabitants to Moesia, and gave the name of Dacia (Aureliani) to that part of the province along the Danube where they were settled.

Dactyli (Δακτύλοι), fabulous beings of superhuman size and strength, to whom the discovery of iron, the art of working it by means of fire, and also magical powers were ascribed. Their name Dactyls—that is, Fingers—is accounted for in various ways; by their number being five or ten, or by the fact of their serving Rhea just as the fingers serve the hand, or by the story of their having lived at the foot (ἐν δακτύλοις) of Mount Ida. Most authorities describe Mount Ida in Phrygia as the original seat of the Dactyls, whence they are usually called Idaean Dactyls. In Phrygia they were connected with the worship of Rhea. (Strab. p. 473; Diod. xvii. 7; Ap. Rh. i. 1128.) They are sometimes confounded or identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, Cabiri, and Telchines. This confusion with the Cabiri also accounts for Samothrace being in some accounts described as their residence. Here they are said to have taught Orpheus; for music, as well as magical incantation, is set down as their invention (Clem. Al. Strom. i. 132). Other accounts transfer them to Mount Ida in Crete, of which island they are said to have been the original inhabitants (Diod. v. 64; Plin. vii. 197; C. I. G. 2374). With this tradition, no doubt, is connected their confusion with the Curetes (Strab. p. 466; Pans. v. 7, 6). Their number appears to have been originally three: Celmis (the smelter), Damnameneus (the hammer), and Acmon (the anvil). Their number was afterwards increased to five, ten (five male and five female), fifty-two and 100.

Dadastāna (ἡ Δαδάστανα: Torbaleh or Kes-tabeg?), a fortress on the borders of Bithynia and Galatia, where the emperor Jovian died suddenly, A.D. 364 (Amm. Marc. xxv. 10).

Daedāla (τὰ Δαίδαλα), a city in Asia Minor, upon the Gulf of Glaucus, on the borders of Caria and Lycia. The same name was given to a mountain near the town (Strab. p. 664).

Daedālus (Δαίδαλος). 1. A mythical personage, under whose name the Greek writers

Daedalus and Icarus. (From a relief in the Villa Albani.)

personified the earliest development of the arts of sculpture and architecture, especially among the Athenians and Cretans. Accordingly, some traditions represent Daedalus as an Athenian, of the royal race of the Erechthidae (Diod. iv. 76). Other traditions make him a Cretan; and in accordance with this story Crete is regarded as the place where ξάνα or daedala were first made. He is said to have been the son of Metion, the son of Eupalamus, the son of Erechtheus. Others make him the son of Eupalamus, or of Palamaon. His mother is called Aleippe, or Iphinoë; or Phrasimede. He devoted himself to sculpture, and made great improvements in the art. He instructed his sister's son TALUS, who soon came to surpass him in skill and ingenuity, and Daedalus killed him through envy. Being condemned to death by the Areiopagus for this murder, he went to Crete, where the fame of his skill obtained for him the friendship of Minos. He made the well-known wooden cow for Pasiphaë; and when Pasiphaë gave birth to the Minotaur, Daedalus constructed the labyrinth, at Cnossus, in which the monster was kept. For his part in this affair, Daedalus was imprisoned by Minos; but Pasiphaë released him, and, as Minos had seized all the ships on the coast of Crete, Daedalus made wings for himself and his son Icarus, and fastened them on with wax. Daedalus himself flew safe over the Aegean, but, as Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax by which his wings were fastened on was melted, and he dropped down and was drowned in that part of the Aegean which was called after him the Icarian sea (Diod. iv. 77; Ov. Met. viii. 195). Daedalus fled to Sicily, where he was protected by Cocalus, the king of the Sicani. When Minos heard where Daedalus had taken refuge, he sailed with a great fleet to Sicily, where he was treacherously murdered by Cocalus or his daughters (Hyg. Fab. 39-44). According to some accounts Daedalus first alighted in his flight from Crete at Cumae in Italy, where he erected a temple to Apollo, in which he dedicated the wings with which he had fled from Crete (Verg. Aen. vi. 14; Sil. It. xii. 102). Several other works of art were attributed to Daedalus in Greece, Italy, Libya, the islands of the Mediterranean, and in Egypt (Diod. i. 97; Paus. ix. 40). They belong to the period when art began to be developed. The name of Daedala was given by the Greeks to the ancient wooden statues, ornamented with gilding and bright colours and real drapery, which were the earliest known forms of the images of the gods, after the mere blocks of wood or stone which were at first used for symbols of them. [Dict. of Ant. s. v.]—2. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze, son and disciple of Patrocles, flourished B.C. 400.

Daemon (Δαίμων). In general terms the δαίμονες may be described as beings intermediate between gods and men. In Homer the word δαίμων seems to express a divine agency (Il. iii. 420, xi. 192, xv. 418, 467; Od. x. 64, xviii. 146), and it will be observed that it is most often a baneful or thwarting influence. Though Homer also calls the gods δαίμονες (Il. i. 222), this distinction may be noted, that the word is an absolute synonym for θεός only when he uses the plural, speaking apparently of supernatural beings generally, whereas he does not in speaking of any one of the greater deities in person use the term δαίμων. Hesiod defines more clearly: the δαίμονες are 30,000 in number, and are the spirits of those who lived in the Golden Age: they walk abroad on the upper earth, shrouded in mist, watching over men, preserving justice and bestowing wealth in kingly fashion (Hes. Op. 121, 251). From this general conception many others branch off. (1) The δαίμων is the supernatural agency which regards each human being (an idea partly shadowed out in Homer), and so is his own fate or fortune, good or bad (Aesch. Sept. 812; Soph. Aj. 534; Eur. Suppl. 592; Pind. Pyth. v. 115). (2) The idea of individual guardian spirits attending each human being from his birth to his burial [cf. GENIUS] was a philosophical development from the above (Plat. Phaed. p. 107 D, Rep. x. p. 617 E); and from this again came the idea of the good and bad angel, or good and evil 'genius' (Plut. Brut. 36). (3) Δαίμονες πρόπολοι were ministers (or, as von Sybel calls them, 'subalterns') of the great deities. Such were the Corybantes of Cybele, Acratus the δαίμων of Dionysus (Paus. i. 2, 4), Eurynomus in Hades (answering more nearly to the modern idea of demon), Themis, Nemesis, Muses, Glaucus, &c. With these, as inferior deities, ranked the personifications of natural processes such as ἄπνος and θάνατος. (4) Like the diī Manes (and also the Genius), δαίμων meant also the spirit of the departed dead, and expressed the belief in immortality (Eur. Alc. 1003). This is frequent in sepulchral inscriptions. In art, though each particular δαίμων has its own attributes, it is a general characteristic of δαίμονες (as distinguished from θεοί), that they are represented with wings.

Dāhæ (Δάαι), a great Scythian people, who led a nomad life over a great extent of country on the E. of the Caspian, in Hyrcania (which still bears the name of Daghestan), on the banks of the Margus, the Oxus, and even the Jaxartes. Some of them served as cavalry and mounted archers in the armies of Darius Codomannus, Alexander and Antiochus, and they were also good foot-soldiers. (Strab. p. 511; Verg. Aen. viii. 728; Liv. xxxv. 48, xxxviii. 40.)

Daimāchus (Δαίμαχος), of Plataeae, was sent by Seleucus as ambassador to Sandrocottus, king of India, about B.C. 312, and wrote a work on India, which is lost (Strab. p. 70).

Dalmātia or Delmātia (Δαλματία: Δαλμάτης, more anciently Δαλματεύς, Dalmata), a part of the country along the E. coast of the Adriatic sea included under the general name of Illyricum, was separated from Liburnia on the N. by the Titius (Kerka), and from Greek Illyria on the S. by the Drilon (Drino), and extended inland to the Bebian mountains and the Drinus, thus nearly corresponding to the modern Dalmatia. The capital was Dalminium or Delminium, from which the country derived its name. The next most important town was SALONA, the residence of Diocletian. The Dalmatians were a brave and warlike people, and gave much trouble to the Romans. In B.C. 119 their country was overrun by L. Metellus, who assumed in consequence the surname Dalmaticus, but they continued independent of the Romans. In 39 they were defeated by Asinius Pollio, of whose Dalmaticus triumphus Horace speaks (Od. ii. 1, 16); but it was not till the year 23 that they were finally subdued, by Statilius Taurus. They took part in the great Pannonian revolt under their leader Bato, but after a three years' war were again reduced to subjection by Tiberius, A.D. 9. The province originally called Illyricum was after the time of Augustus usually known as Dalmatia (Dio Cass. xlix. 36; Tac. Ann. iv. 5). It comprised all the coast west of Macedonia from Lissus, and the river Drilon on the south to the river Arsia on the north, and was governed by a legatus Augusti pro praetore: after 300 A.D. by a praeses. [ILLYRICUM.]

Dalmatius. [DELMATIUS.]

Dalminium. [DALMATIA.]

Damagētus (Δαμάγγρος), king of Ialysus in Rhodes, married, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, the daughter of Aristomenes of Messene, and from this marriage sprang the family of the Diagoridae, who were celebrated for their victories at Olympia. [ARISTOMENES.]

Dāmālis or Bōus (Δάμαλις, ἡ Βοῦς), a small place in Bithynia, on the shore of the Thraean Bosphorus, N. of Chalcedon; celebrated by tradition as the landing-place of Io, the memory of whose passage was preserved by a bronze cow set up here by the Chalcedonians.

Damarātus. [DEMARATUS.]

Damascius (Δαμῆσκιος), the Syrian, of Damascus, whence he derived his name, the last of the renowned teachers of the Neo-Platonic philosophy at Athens, was born about A.D. 480. He first studied at Alexandria and afterwards at Athens, under Marinus and Zenodotus, whom he succeeded. When Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens in 529, Damascius emigrated to King Chosroës of Persia. He afterwards returned to the W., since Chosroës had stipulated in a treaty that the heathen adherents of the Platonic philosophy should be tolerated by the Byzantine emperor. The only work of Damascius which has been printed is entitled Doubts and Solutions of the first Principles, edited by Kopp, Francof. 1828, 8vo.

Damascus (Δαμασκός), son of Hermes and Halimede, who migrated from Arcadia and founded the Syrian city which bore his name. When Dionysus on his eastern travels came there, Damascus opposed the planting of the vine, and was flayed alive by the god (Steph. Byz. s.v.). The story seems to be partly etymological, partly a mythical account of resistance offered to the introduction of the Bacchanalian rites.

Damascus (ἡ Δαμασκός: Δαμασκηνός: Damashk, Damascus, Esh-Sham), one of the most ancient cities of the world, mentioned as existing in the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15), stood in the district afterwards called Coele-Syria, upon both banks of the river Chrysorhoas or Bardines (Burada), the waters of which, drawn off by canals and aqueducts, fertilised the plain around the city. This plain is open on the S. and E., and sheltered on the W. and N. by an offshoot of the Antilibanus; its fruits were celebrated in ancient, as in modern times; and altogether the situation of the city is one of the finest on the globe. For its earlier history see Dict. of the Bible. In the first century B.C. it was under a dynasty of Nabathæan kings who made Petraë their residence (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1, 5). This dynasty lasted from 95 B.C. to 106 A.D. with various degrees of independence. M. Aemilius Scaurus in 62 B.C. had a treaty with Aretas I. (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 15); but later there was more direct interference from the Romans (Strab. p. 779; Jos. Ant. xiv. 11). In A.D. 39, Damascus was ruled by an ἐθνάρχης of Aretas II. In 106, when Arabia Petraea became a Roman province, Damascus was united with the province of Syria. It flourished greatly under the emperors, and is called by Julian (Epist. 24) 'the Eye of all the East.' Diocletian established in it a great factory for arms; and hence the origin of the fame of Damascus blades. Its position on one of the high roads from Lower to Upper Asia gave it a considerable trade. The surrounding district was called Δαμασκηνή.

Damasippus, L. Junius Brutus. [BRUTUS No. 10.]

Damasippus, Licinius. 1. A Roman senator, fought on the side of the Pompeians in Africa, and perished B.C. 47 (Caes. B. C. ii. 44).—2. A contemporary of Cicero, who mentions him as a lover of statues, and speaks of purchasing a garden from Damasippus. He is probably the same person as the Damasippus ridiculed by Horace (Sat. ii. 3, 16, 64). It appears from Horace that Damasippus had become bankrupt, in consequence of which he intended to put an end to himself; but he was prevented by the Stoic Stertinus, and then turned Stoic himself, or at least affected to be one in outward appearance. The Damasippus mentioned by Juvenal (Sat. viii. 147, 151, 167) is a fictitious name, under which the satirist ridiculed some noble lover of horses.

Damastes (Δαμᾶστος), of Sigæum, a Greek historian, and a contemporary of Herodotus and Hellanicus of Lesbos; his works are lost (Strab. pp. 47, 583, 684).

Damia. [AUNESIA.]

Damnonii. 1. Or Dumnonii or Dumnunii, a powerful people in the SW. of Britain, inhabiting Cornwall, Devonshire, and the W. part of Somersetshire, from whom was called the promontory Damnonium, also Ocerinum (C. Lizard) in Cornwall.—2. Or Damni, a people in N. Britain, inhabiting parts of Perth, Argyle, Stirling, and Dumbarton-shires.

Damo (Δαμῶ), a daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, to whom Pythagoras entrusted his writings, and forbade her to give them to any one. This command she strictly observed, although she was in extreme poverty, and was often asked to sell them. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 42.)

Damocles (Δαμοκλῆς), a Syracusan, one of the companions and flatterers of the elder Dionysius. Damocles having extolled the great felicity of Dionysius on account of his wealth and power, the tyrant invited him to try what his happiness really was, and placed him at a magnificent banquet, in the midst of which Damocles saw a naked sword suspended over his head by a single horse-hair—a sight which quickly dispelled all his visions of happiness. (Cic. Tusc. v. 21, 61; cf. Hor. Od. iii. 1, 7.)

Damocritus, strategus of the Aetolians B.C. 200, opposed the Romans, but was defeated at Heracleia near Mt. Oeta by Flamininus in 191. He was taken to Rome, to adorn the triumph, but escaped from his prison, and being pursued killed himself. (Pol. xvii. 10, xxii. 14; Liv. xxxi. 32, xxxv. 12, xxxvi. 24, xxxvii. 46.)

Damōn (Δάμων). 1. Of Athens, a celebrated musician and sophist. He was a pupil of Lamprus and Agathocles, and the teacher of Pericles, with whom he lived on the most intimate terms. He is also said to have taught Socrates, but this statement is more doubtful. In his old age he was banished from Athens, probably on account of the part he had taken in politics. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 19.)—2. A Pythagorean and friend of Phintias (not Pythias). When the latter was condemned to die for a plot against Dionysius I. of Syracuse, he asked leave of the tyrant to depart for the purpose of arranging his domestic affairs, promising to find a friend who would be pledge for his appearance at the time appointed for his punishment. To the surprise of Dionysius, Damon unhesitatingly offered himself to be put to death instead of his friend, should he fail to return. Phintias arrived just in time to redeem Damou, and Dionysius was so struck with this instance of firm friendship on both sides, that he pardoned the criminal, and entreated to be admitted as a third into their bond of brotherhood. (Cic. Tusc. v. 22, 63, de Off. iii. 10, 45; Diod. x. 3; Val. Max. ix. 7.)

Damōxēnus (Δαμῶξενος), an Athenian poet of the New Comedy, and partly of the Middle.

Dana (Δάνα), in Cappadocia (Xen. Anab. i. 2, 20), the same as the later TYANA.

Dānāē (Δανᾶή), daughter of Acrisius, and mother of Perseus. For details, see ACRISIUS. An Italian legend related that Danaë came to Italy, built the town of Ardoa, and married Pilmnus, by whom she became mother of Daunus, ancestor of Turnus. (Verg. Aen. viii. 371; Plin. iii. 56.)

Danāi. [DANAUS.]

Dānāides (Δαναΐδες), the fifty daughters of Danaus. [DANAUS.]

Danāla (τὰ Δάναλα), a city in the territory of the Trocini, in the NE. of Galatia, notable in the history of the Mithridatic war as the place where Lucullus resigned the command to Pompey (Plut. Lucull. 36).

Danapris. [BORYSTHENES.]

Danastris. [TYRAS.]

Dānāus (Δαναός), son of Belus and twin-brother of Aegyptus. Belus had assigned Libya to Danaüs, but the latter, fearing his brother and his brother's sons, fled with his fifty daughters to Argos. Here he was elected king by the Argives in place of Gelanor, the reigning monarch. The story of the murder of the fifty sons of Aegyptus by the fifty daughters of Danaids. (From a relief in the Vatican.)

Danaüs (the Danaides) is given under AEGYPTUS. There was one exception to the murderous deed. The life of Lynceus was spared by his wife Hyperminestra; and according to the common tradition he afterwards avenged the death of his brothers by killing his father-in-law, Danaüs. According to the poets the Danaides were punished in Hades by being compelled everlastingly to pour water into a sieve or a jar with a hole in it (inane lymphæ dolium fundo pereuntis imo, Hor. Od. iii. 11, 26).—From Danaüs the Argives were called Danaï, which name, like that of the Argives, was often applied by the poets to the collective Greeks.

Danübīus (Danube, in Germ. Donau), also Danuvius on coins and inscriptions, called ISTER (Ἴστρος) by the Greeks, one of the chief rivers of Europe, rises in the Black Forest, and after flowing 1770 miles falls into the Black Sea. It is mentioned by Hesiod, but the Greeks knew very little about it. (Hes. Th. 338; Pind. Ol. iii. 25; Hdt. ii. 33.) According to Herodotus it rises at the city Pyrene among the Celts and flows through the whole of Europe. The Romans first obtained some accurate information concerning the river at the commencement of the empire. Tiberius in his campaign against the Vindelicians, visited the sources of the Danube, which, according to Tacitus, are in M. ABNOBA. The Danube formed the N. boundary of the empire with the exception of the time that DACIA was a Roman province. In the Roman period the upper part of the river from its source as far as Vienna was called Dannbins, while the lower part to its entrance in the Black Sea was named Ister.

Daorsi or Daorizi, a tribe in Dalmatia.

Daphnae Pēlūsīae (Δάφναι αἱ Πελοῦσῖαι; Safnais), a border fortress of Lower Egypt against Arabia and Syria, stood on the right hand of the Nile, 16 Roman miles SW. of Pelusium. Many Jews settled here after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

Daphnē (Δάφνη). 1. Daughter of the river-god Ladon in Arcadia, by Ge (the earth) (Paus. viii. 20, x. 7, 8), or of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly (Ov. Met. i. 452; Hyg. Fab. 203); a third account makes her the daughter of the Laconian Amyclas, which explains the allusion in Verg. Ecl. vi. 83 (Parthen. Erot. 15). She was extremely beautiful, and was loved by Apollo, who pursued her, and as she was on the point of being overtaken by him, she prayed for aid, and was metamorphosed into a laurel-tree (δάφνη), which became in consequence the favourite tree of Apollo: other stories make the Earth take her into her bosom, and send up a laurel in her stead (Tzetz. Lyc. 6). In the Peloponnesian legends she had been beloved also by Leucippus, son of Oenomaus, who in order to win her disguised himself as a maiden; but Apollo's jealousy caused his discovery and he was killed by the companions of Daphne (Paus. viii. 20; Parthen. l. c.). In these stories of Daphne probably the older religion is preserved which worshipped the laurel tree itself. When this became part of Apollo's worship and the laurel was regarded as sacred to him, the story of his love for Daphne and her transformation grew up.—2. Daughter of Tiresias, better known under the name of MANTO.

Daphnē (Δάφνη). 1. Beit-el-Moic, or Babylia (?), a beautiful spot, five miles S. of Antioch in Syria, to which it formed a sort of park or pleasure garden. Here was a grove of laurels and cypresses, 80 stadia in circuit, watered by fresh springs and consecrated by Selencus Nicator to Apollo, to whom also a magnificent temple was built by Antiochus Epiphanes, and adorned with a splendid statue of the god by Bryaxis. (Hence the legend of Daphne was transferred also to this spot: Auson. Clar. Urb. 2.) To this temple were attached periodical games and the privilege of asylum. Daphne was a royal residence of the Seleucidae and of the later Roman emperors, and a favourite resort of the people of Antioch, who, however, carried the pleasures they enjoyed here so far beyond the bounds of moderation, that the phrase Daphnici mores passed into a proverb. It was from this place that Antioch received its distinguishing name, Ἄ. ἐπὶ Δάφνης (Strab. p. 750; Amm. Marc. xix. 12; Polyæn. viii. 50).—2. A place in Upper Galilee on the lake Semchonitis.

Daphnis (Δάφνις), a Sicilian hero, to whom the invention of bucolic poetry is ascribed. He was the son of Hermes by a nymph (Ælian, V. H. x. 18). His mother placed him when an infant in a charming valley in a laurel grove, from which he received his name of Daphnis. He was brought up by nymphs; was taught by Pan to play on the flute; he became a shepherd, and tended his flocks on Mt. Aetna winter and summer (Theocr. i. 67, vii. 74, viii. 92; Parthen. Erot. 29). A Naiad fell in love with him, and made him swear that he would never love any other maiden, threatening him with blindness if he broke his oath. For a time the handsome shepherd resisted the numerous temptations to which he was exposed, but at last he forgot himself, having been made intoxicated by a princess. The Naiad accordingly punished him with blindness, or, as others relate, changed him into a stone. Previous to this time he had composed bucolic poetry, and with it delighted Artemis during the chase. After having become blind, he invoked his father to help him. The god accordingly raised him up to heaven, and caused a well to gush forth on the spot where this happened. The well bore the name of Daphnis, and at it the Sicilians offered an annual sacrifice. This account Aelian seems to have derived from Stesichorus, and some have conjectured that Stesichorus introduced the story in reference to his own blindness. In Theocritus there is a different story, with no allusion to blindness and another ending to his life. Daphnis in despair at unrequited love for Xenia drowns himself and is mourned by all nature. This unrequited love is explained as being the punishment sent by Aphrodite, either because Daphnis preferred music to love, or according to the other legend, because he had been faithless. From Athen. p. 415 comes another story, related in a Satyric drama of Sosithus, which represents Daphnis as seeking his love, named Piplea, and coming to Lityerses in Phrygia, who made all strangers vie with him in reaping his corn and then killed them when they were defeated. Heracles helps Daphnis, and Lityerses is killed. In this story Daphnis instead of being the deity or hero of herdsmen, is adopted into the myths of the corn-spirit and the harvest sacrifices.

Daphnūs (Δαφνούς, -οὔντος; Δαφνούσιος), a town of the Locri Opuntii, in earlier times belonging to Phocis (Strab. p. 416).

Darādax (Δαράδαξ; Abu-Ghalgal?), a river of Upper Syria, flowing into the Euphrates, 30 parasangs from the R. Chalos, and 15 from Thapsacus.

Daras, a town of Mesopotamia, about 12 miles from Nisibis: it was strongly fortified by the Greek emperors as a barrier against the Persians (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii. 13).

Dardāni (Δάρδανοι). 1. [DARDANIA].—2. A people in Upper Moesia, who also occupied part of Illyricum, and extended as far as the frontiers of Macedonia (Strab. p. 316).

Dardānia (Δαρδανία), a district of the Troad, lying along the Hellespont, SW. of Abydos, and adjacent on the land side to the territories of Ilium and Scepsis (Strab. pp. 592, 606). Its people, the Dardani (Δάρδανοι), were apparently akin to the Trojans, both having descended from the highlands of Asia Minor towards the coast. Probably the name Dardani originally included the Trojan branch as well, and had also been carried in a more distant migration of the same people in 'Pelagic' wanderings to Illyricum. Their name seems to be rightly traced on Egyptian records of about 1300 as allies of the Hittites who were defeated by Ramses II. In the Iliad they appear as fighting under command of Aeneas in defence of Troy (ii. 819, xv. 425); and their name in Latin poets is often interchanged with that of the Trojans.—2. The name Dardania belonged under the empire to southern DACIA, whose chief town was Serdica (Sophia).

Dardānus (Δάρδανος), son of Zeus and Electra. His native place in the various traditions is Samothrace, Crete, Troas, or Italy. Dardanus is the mythical ancestor of the Trojans, and through them of the Romans. From Samothrace he passed over to Asia, where he received a tract of land from king Teucer, on which he built the town of Dardania. He married Batea, daughter of Teucer, or Arisbe of Crete, by whom he became the father of Erichthouius. [Another tradition makes him marry Chryse, daughter of the Arcadian Pallas: see DELMAS.] His grandson was Tros, who removed to Troy the Palladium, which had belonged to his grandfather (Il. xx. 215; Strab. pp. 331, 50; Apollod. iii. 12; Diod. iv.

75, v. 48; Paus. vii. 19). According to the Italian traditions, Dardanus was the son of Corythus, an Etruscan prince of Corythos (Cortona), or of Zeus by the wife of Corythos; and, as in the Greek tradition, he afterwards emigrated to Phrygia (Verg. Aen. iii. 167, vii. 210; Serv. ad loc.).

Dardānus (ἡ Δάρδανος; Δαρδανεύς), also, -um and -ium, a Greek city in the Troad on the Hellespont, near the Prom. Dardanis or Dardanium and the mouth of the river Rhodius, 12 Roman miles from Ilium, and 9 (or 70 stadia) from Abydos. It was built by Aeolian colonists, at some distance from the site of the ancient city Dardania (Δαρδανῆ), which is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 216) as founded by Dardanus before the building of Ilium (cf. Strab. p. 592). The Romans, after the war with Antiochus the Great, made Dardanus and Ilium free cities, as an act of filial piety. The peace between Sulla and Mithridates was made here, B.C. 84 (Strab. p. 595; Plut. Sull. 24). From Dardanus arose the name of the Castles of the Dardanelles, after which the Hellespont is now called.

Dārēs (Δάρης), a priest of Hephaestus at Troy, mentioned in the Iliad (v. 9), to whom was ascribed in antiquity an Iliad, which was believed to be more ancient than the Homeric poems (Ael. V. H. xi. 2; Isid. i. 41). There is extant a Latin work in prose in 44 chapters, on the destruction of Troy, bearing the title Daretis Phrygii de Excidio Trojae Historia, and purporting to be a translation of the work of Dares by Cornelius Nepos. But the Latin work is evidently of much later origin: possibly of the fifth century A.D. (It must be earlier than the seventh century, since Isidore is acquainted with it.) It has little merit, but is important, because it was accepted as the translation from the writings of an eye-witness of the Trojan war (as it claimed to be), and became the chief source of Trojan romances in the Middle Ages. It is usually printed with Dictys Cretensis: the best edition is by Meister, Lips. 1873.

Darius (Δαρῖος). I., King of Persia, B.C. 521–485, was the son of Hystaspes, satrap of the province of Persis, and of the royal family of the Achaemenidae. He had served under Cambyses in Egypt, and with six other Persian chiefs slew the usurper Gomatas [SMERDIS], and possessed himself of the Persian throne. According to Herodotus (iii. 85), the seven chiefs agreed that the one of them whose horse neighed first at an appointed time and place, should become king; and as the horse of Darius neighed first, he was declared king. He married Atossa and Artystone, the two daughters of Cyrus, and Parmys, the daughter of Cyrus's son Smerdis, and Phaedine, the daughter of Otanes, one of the seven chiefs. He then began to set in order the affairs of his vast empire, which he divided into twenty satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persis proper was exempted from all taxes, except those which it had formerly been used to pay. It was in the reign of Darius that the consolidation of the empire was effected, for Cyrus and Cambyses had been engaged in continual wars.—A few years after his accession the Babylonians revolted, but after a siege of twenty months, Babylon was taken (as Herodotus relates, iii. 183) by a stratagem of Zopyrus in 516. The reduction of Babylon was followed by the invasion of Scythia (about 503). Darius crossed the Danube, and marched far into the interior of modern Russia; but after losing a large number of men by famine, and being unable to meet with the enemy, he was obliged to retreat (Hdt. iv. 1). On his return to Asia, he sent part of his forces, under Megabazus, to subdue Thrace and Macedonia, which thus became subject to the Persian empire. In the reign of Darius began the great war between the Persians and the Greeks. The details of this war belong to the biographies of other men. In 501 the Ionian Greeks revolted; they were assisted by the Athenians, who burnt Sardis, and thus provoked the hostility of Darius. [ARISTAGORAS; HISTIAEUS.] In 492 Mardonius was sent with a large army to invade Greece, but he lost a great part of his fleet off Mt. Athos, and the Thracians destroyed a vast number of his land forces. [MARDONIUS.] He was, in consequence, recalled, and Datis and Artaphernes appointed to the command of the invading army. They took Eretria in Euboea, and landed in Attica, but were defeated at Marathon by the Athenians under the command of Miltiades. [MILTIADES.] Darius now resolved to call out the whole force of his empire for the purpose of subduing Greece: but, after three years of preparation, his attention was called off by the rebellion of Egypt. He died in 485, leaving the execution of his plans to his son XERXES. Darius was great both as a conqueror and as an organiser. To him especially is due the centralisation of the Persian government at Susa with which the twenty satrapies were connected by roads and posts.—II., King of Persia, 424–405, named Ochus (Ὀχος) before his accession, and then surnamed Nothus (Νόθος), or the Bastard, from his being one of the bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. Darius obtained the crown by putting to death his brother SOGDIANUS, who had murdered Xerxes II. He married Parysatis, daughter of Xerxes I., by whom he had two sons, Artaxerxes II., who succeeded him, and Cyrus the younger. Darius was governed by eunuchs, and the weakness of his government was shown by repeated insurrectionary of his satraps. In 414 the Persians were expelled from Egypt by Amyrtæus, who reigned there six years, and at whose death (408) Darius was obliged to recognise his son Pausiris as his successor. (Ctes. Pers. 44–56; Diod. xii. 71, xiii. 36, 76. 108; Xen. Hell. i. 2, ii. 1.)—III., Last king of Persia, 336–331, named Codomannus before his accession, was the son of Arsmenes and Sisymbambis, and a descendant of Darius II. He was raised to the throne by Bagoas, after the murder of ARSES. The history of his overthrow by Alexander the Great, and of his death, is given in the life of ALEXANDER.

Dascon (Δάσκων; Δασκόνιος), a fortress near Syracuse, situated on a bay of the same name.

Dascylium (Δασκύλιον or -εῖον; Δασκυλίτης; Diaskili), a town of western Bithynia, on the Propontis, upon a small lake Dascylitis, between the sea and two larger lakes, Apolloniatis and Miletopolitis (Strab. p. 575; Hdt. iii. 120).

Dasæa (Δασέα, also Δασαί; Δασαίτης), a town in Arcadia near Megalopolis (Paus. viii. 3).

Dassarētii or Dassaritæe, Dassaritæe (Δασσαρήτιοι, Δασσαρίται), a people in Greek Illyria on the borders of Macedonia: their chief town was Lychnidus (Λύχνιδος), on a hill, on the N. side of the lake Lychnitis, which was so called after the town (Strab. p. 318).

Datames (Δατάμης), a distinguished Persian general, a Carian by birth, son of Camissares by a Scythian mother. He succeeded his father as satrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), but, in consequence of the machinations of his enemies at the Persian court, he threw off his allegiance to the king, and joined the other satraps who had revolted from Persia. He defeated the generals who were sent against him, but was assassinated by Mithridates, son of Ariobarzanes, about B.C. 362. Cornelius Nepos, who has written his life, calls him the bravest and most able of all barbarian generals, except Hamilcar and Hannibal. (Nep. Datames; Diod. xv. 91; Polyæn. vii. 21, 29.)

Datis (Δᾶτις), a Mede, commanded, along with Artaphernes, the Persian army of Darius which was defeated at Marathon, B.C. 490.

Datum or Datus (Δάτον, Δάτος; Δατηνός), a Thracian town on the Strymonic gulf, subject to Macedonia, with gold mines in Mt. Pangæus in the neighbourhood, whence came the proverb a 'Datum of good things' (Strab. pp. 331, 36).

Daulis or Daulia (Δαυλῖς, -ῖδος, Δαυλία; Δαυλιεύς, Δαύλιος), an ancient town in Phocis on the road from Chaeronea and Orchomenus to Delphi, situated on a lofty hill (Strab. p. 423; Paus. x. 4, 7); celebrated in mythology as the residence of the Thracian king TEREUS, and as the scene of the tragic story of PHILOMELA and PROCNE. Hence Daulias (Δαυλιεύς) is the surname both of Procne and Philomela.

Daunia. [APULIA.]

Daunus (Δᾶννος). 1. Son of Lycæon, and brother of Iapyx and Pencetius. The three brothers crossed over from Illyria, and settled in Apulia, which was divided into three parts, and named after them. The poets sometimes gave the name of Dannia to the whole of Apulia: Horace (Od. i. 23, 14) uses the adjective Dawnias (sc. terra). [APULIA.]—2. Son of Pilumnus and Danaë, wife of Venilia, and ancestor of Turnus.

Decébälus (Δεκέβαλος), a celebrated king of the Dacians during the reigns of Domitian and Trajan. For 4 years (A.D. 86–90) he carried on war against the Romans with such success, that Domitian was at length glad to conclude peace with him by the payment of an annual tribute. Trajan refused to continue this disgraceful payment, and renewed the war. He defeated the Dacians, and compelled Decebalus to sue for peace (101–103). But in 104 the war broke out again; Decebalus was again defeated, and put an end to his own life; and Dacia became a Roman province, 106. (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 6, lxxviii. 6; Eutrop. vii. 15; Oros. vii. 10.)

Décéléä or -ia (Δεκέλεια; Δεκελεύς; Tatoz), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoëntis, lay NW. of Athens, on the borders of Boeotia, near the sources of the Cephissus. In the nineteenth year of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 413), the Peloponnesians under Agis seized and fortified Decelea, and thereby annoyed the Athenians during the remainder of the war.

Decentius Magnus, brother or cousin of Magnentius, by whom he was created Caesar, A.D. 351. After the death of MAGNENTIUS, he put an end to his own life, 353.

Decetia (Desize), a city of the Aedui, in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island in the Liger (Loire).

Décîates, a Ligurian people on the coast and about the sources of the Druentia (Durance). Their chief city, Deciatum (Δεκιήτων), lay between Nicaea and Antipolis. (Pol. xxxiii. 7; Strab. p. 202.)

Decidius Saxa. [SAXA.]

P. Décîus Mûs (of a plebeian gens). 1. Consul B.C. 340 with T. Manlius Torquatus in the great Latin war. Each of the consuls had a vision in the night, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were devoted to death. The consuls thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waver should devote himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. Decius commanded the left wing, which began to give way, whereupon he devoted himself and the army of the enemy to destruction, according to the formula prescribed by the pontifex maximus, then rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans. (Liv. vii. 34, viii. 6; Cic. Div. i. 24, 51, Tusc. i. 37, 89).—2. Son of the preceding, four times consul, 312, 308, 297 and 295. In his fourth consulship he commanded the left wing at the battle of Sentinum, where he was opposed to the Gauls, and when his troops began to give way, he imitated the example of his father, devoted himself and the enemy to destruction, and fell as a sacrifice for his nation. (Liv. x. 7, 27).—3. Son of No. 2, consul 279, in the war against Pyrrhus. According to some he sacrificed himself in battle like his father and grandfather, but this is not true, for he survived the war with Pyrrhus. (Flor. i. 18, 21; Oros. iv. 5; Val. Max. ix. 1.)

Decius, Roman emperor, A.D. 249–251, whose full name was C. MESSIUS QUINTUS TRAJANUS DECIUS, was born at Bubalia in Pannonia. He was sent by the emperor Philippus in 249 to restore subordination in the army of Moesia, but the troops compelled him to accept the purple under threats of death. Decius still assured Philippus of his fidelity; but the latter, not trusting these professions, hastened to meet his rival in the field, was defeated near Verona, and slain. The short reign of Decius was chiefly occupied in warring against the Goths. He fell in battle against them, in the marshes near Forum Trebonii in Moesia, together with his son, in 251. In his reign the Christians were persecuted with great severity; but he was in the rest of his administration, and wholly in his military activity, deserving of admiration. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 28; Zos. i. 21.)

Decūmātes Agri. [AGRI DECUMATES.]

Deiānira (Δηϊάνειρα), daughter of Althaea by either Oeneus, or Dionysus, or Dexamenus, and sister of Meleager. Achelous and Heracles both loved Deiānira, and fought for the possession of her. Heracles was victorious, and she became his wife. She was the unwilling cause of her husband's death by presenting him with the poisoned robe which the centaur Nessus gave her. In despair she put an end to her own life. For details see HERACLES.

Deidamia (Δηϊδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Lycomedes in the island of Scyros. When Achilles was concealed there in maiden's attire, she became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. [ACHILLES].—2. Wife of Pirithous, commonly called HIPPODAMIA.—3. Sister of Pyrrhus, married Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Deimas (Δείμας), son of Dardanus and Chryse, who settled in Arcadia (Dionys. i. 61).

Deiōcēs (Δηϊόκης), first king of Media, after the Medes had thrown off the supremacy of the Assyrians, was the son of Phraortes, and reigned B.C. 709–656. He built the city of Ecbatana, which he made the royal residence. His administration of justice was severe, and he kept a body of spies and informers throughout the whole country. He was succeeded by his son, PHRAORTES. (Hdt. i. 95–102.)

Dēion (Δηϊών), son of Aeolus and Enarete, king in Phocis, husband of Diomedes, and father of Asteropeia, Aenetus, Actor, Phylacus, and Cephalus.

Dēiōnē (Δηϊώνη), mother of Miletus, who is hence called Deionides (Ov. Met. ix. 442).

Deiōtārus (Δηϊόταρος). 1. Tetrarch of Galatia, adhered firmly to the Romans in their wars in Asia against Mithridates, and was rewarded by the senate with the title of king, and the addition of Armenia Minor to his dominions (Cic. Deiot. v. 12; Bell. Alex. 68). In the Civil war he sided with Pompey, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48 (Cic. Deiot. v. 13; Caes. B. C. iii. 4). In 47 he applied to Domitius Calvinus, Caesar's legate in Asia, for aid against Pharnaces, who had taken possession of Armenia Minor. When Caesar, in the same year, came into Asia from Egypt, Deiotarus received him with submission, and endeavoured to excuse the aid he had given to Pompey. Caesar deprived him of part of his dominions, but allowed him to retain his regal title. Two years afterwards (45) his grandson Castor accused him of having formed a design against Caesar's life, when he received Caesar in Galatia. He was defended by Cicero before Caesar, in the house of the latter at Rome, in the speech (pro Rege Deiotaro) still extant (cf. Cic. ad Att. v. 17). The result of the trial is not known; but it seems likely that Cicero's advocacy so far prevailed on Caesar that the prosecution was dropped. After Caesar's death he obtained from Antony the restitution of his dominions by paying Fulvia a large sum of money. In 42, he joined the party of Brutus and Cassius, and died shortly afterwards at a great age. (Cic. Phil. ii. 37; Dio Cass. xlviii. 33).—2. Son and successor of the above. In the war between Antony and Octavian he took part with the former, but went over from him to the enemy in the battle of Actium, 31.

Deiphōbē (Δηϊφώβη), the Sibyl at Cumae, daughter of Glaucus. [SIBYLLA.]

Deiphōbus (Δηϊφόβος), a son of Priam and Hecuba, and next to Hector the bravest among the Trojans (Il. xii. 94, xiii. 410; Od. iv. 276). He always supported Paris in his refusal to deliver up Helen to the Trojans; and he married her after the death of Paris. Accordingly, on the fall of Troy, the vengeance of the Greeks was chiefly directed against him. His house was one of the first committed to the flames, and he was slain and fearfully mangled by Menelaus. In this dreadful condition he was found in the lower world by Aeneas, who erected a monument to him on Cape Rhoeteum. (Verg. Aen. vi. 493; cf. Od. viii. 417; Hyg. Fab. 110; Dict. Crct. i. 10; Eur. Troad. 960.)

Dēiphontes (Δηϊφόντης), son of Antimachus, and husband of Hynctho, the daughter of Tomenus the Heraclid, became king of Argos, after Temenus had been murdered by his own sons (Apollod. ii. 8). Pausanias (ii. 19) gives a different account.

Dēlium (Δήλιον: Dhilessi), a town on the coast of Boeotia, in the territory of Tanagra, near the Attic frontier, named after a temple of Apollo similar to that at Delos. The Athenians used it as a fortress in the early part of the Peloponnesian war, and in B.C. 424 they were defeated here by the Boeotians. (Thuc. iv. 90; Strab. p. 403.)

Dēlius and Dēlia (Δήλιος, Δηλία), surnames of Apollo and Artemis respectively, from the island of DELOS.

Dellius, Q., a Roman eques, who frequently changed sides in the civil wars. In B.C. 44 he joined Dolabella in Asia, afterwards went over to Cassius, and then united himself to M. Antony. He deserted to Octavian shortly before the battle of Actium, 31. He appears to have become a personal friend of Octavian and Maecenas, and is therefore addressed by Horace in one of his Odes (ii. 3). He wrote a history of Antony's war against the Parthians, in which he had himself fought. (Plut. Ant. 25; Dio Cass. xlix. 39, l. 13, 23; Strab. p. 523.)

Delmätius or Dalmätius. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife, Theodora. From his half-brother, Constantine the Great, he received the title of censor; he died before A.D. 335.—2. Son of the preceding, was created Caesar by Constantine the Great, 335; and, upon the division of the empire, received Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia, as his portion. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 41.)

Dēlos or Dēlus (ἡ Δήλος: Δήλιος: Delo, Deli, Dili, Sdilli, Ru.), the smallest of the islands called Cyclades, in the Aegæan Sea, lay in the strait between Rhenea and Myconus. It was also called in earlier times, Asteria, Ortygia, and Chlamydia. According to a legend, founded perhaps on some tradition of its late volcanic origin, it was called out of the deep by the trident of Poseidon, but was a floating island until Zeus fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place to Leto, for the birth of Apollo and Artemis. Apollo afterwards obtained possession of Delos, by giving Calauria to Poseidon in exchange for it; and it became the most holy seat of the worship of Apollo (Hymn. ad Del. 49; Callim. Del. 35; Pind. Fr. 64; Verg. Aen. iii. 75; Plin. iv. 66). Such is the mythical story; we learn from history that Delos was peopled by the Ionians, for whom it was the chief centre of political and religious union in the time of Homer: it was also the seat of an Amphictyony, comprising the surrounding islands. In the time of Pisistratus, Delos became subject to the Athenians; it was made the common treasury of the Greek confederacy for carrying on the war with Persia; but the transference of the treasury to Athens, and the altered character of the league, reduced the island to a condition of absolute political dependence upon Athens. It still possessed, however, a very extensive commerce, which was increased by the downfall of Corinth, when Delos became the chief emporium for the trade in slaves; and it was one of the principal seats of art in Greece, especially for works in bronze, of which metal one of the most esteemed mixtures was called the Delian. An especial sanctity was attached to Delos from its connexion with the worship of Apollo; and the peculiar character assigned to the island by the traditions of its origin was confirmed by the remarkable fact that, though of volcanic origin, and in the midst of islands very subject to earthquakes, Delos enjoyed an almost entire exemption from such visitations, so that its being shaken by an earthquake was esteemed a marked prodigy (Hdt. vi. 98; Thuc. ii. 8; Plin. l. c.). The city of Delos stood on the W. side of the island at the foot of Mt. Cynthus (whence the god's surname of Cynthus), near a little river called Inopus. It contained a temple of Leto, and the great temple of Apollo. The latter was built near the harbour, and possessed an oracle. Though enriched with offerings from all Greece, and defended by no fortifications, it was so protected from plunder by the sanctity of the place, that even the Persians, when sailing against Greece, not only passed it by uninjured, but sent rich presents to the god. With this temple were connected games, called Delia, which were celebrated every four years, and were said to have been founded by Theseus. A like origin is ascribed to the sacred embassy (θεωρία) which the Athenians sent to Delos every year. (Dict. of Ant. art. Delia; Theoris.) The temple and oracle were visited by pilgrims from every quarter, even from the regions of Scythia. The greatest importance was attached to the preservation of the sanctity of the island. It was twice purified by the Athenians: once under Pisistratus, when all tombs within sight of the temple were taken away; and again in B.C. 422, when all human and animal remains were removed entirely from the island, which was henceforth forbidden to be polluted by births or deaths, or by the presence of dogs: all persons about to die or to bring forth children were to be removed to the adjacent island of Rhenea. Delos continued in a flourishing condition, and under the rule of the Athenians, who were confirmed in the possession of it by the Romans, until the Mithridatic war, when Menophanes, one of the generals of Mithridates, inflicted upon it a devastation, from which it never again recovered.—In recent years (since 1873) important researches have been made in Delos by the French Archaeological School. The buildings on Mt. Cynthus, the theatre, the temple of Apollo, part of the Agora, and other buildings, have been excavated.

Delphi (οἱ Δελφοί: Δελφός: Kastri), a small town in Phocis, but one of the most celebrated in Greece, on account of its oracle of Apollo. It was 16 stadia in circumference, was situated on a steep declivity on the S. slope of Mt. PARNASSUS, and its site resembled the cavea of a great theatre. It was shut in on the N. by a barrier of rocky mountains, which were cleft in the centre into two great cliffs with peaked summits, between which, from the rocks called Phaedriadae, issued the waters of the Castalian spring. The rocks from which the spring generally given, from δελφύς, womb, is right, and that it was called Delphi because it stood in a deep ravine. Delphi was colonised at an early period by Doric settlers from the neighissues were called Hyampeia (now Flembuko), and from them, or from the neighbouring rock Nauplia, were hurled criminals (Hdt. viii. 39; Eur. Ion, 1266; Plut. de Ser. Num. Vind. 12). It was originally called Pytho (Πυθώ), by which name alone it is mentioned in Homer. The ancients derived the name of Delphi from an eponymous hero, Delphus, a descendant of Deucalion; it is probable that the derivation now senato consisting of a very few members. Delphi was regarded as the central point of the whole earth, and was hence called the 'navel of the earth.' It was said that two eagles sent forth by Jupiter, one from the E. and one from the W., met at Delphi.—Delphi was the principal seat of the worship of Apollo, whose name is most intimately associated with it; but Dionysus, too, was especially worshipped here, and many of the Delphic festivals were in his honour. [See APOLLO; DIONYSUS; PARNASSUS.] Besides the great temple of Apollo, it contained numerous sanctuaries, statues, and other works of art. The Pythian games were also celebrated here, and it was one of the two places of meeting of the Amphictyonic council. Pausanias, approaching by the road Schiste, passed four temples, of which the fourth was that of Athene Pronoia (cf. Dem. c. Aristog. i. p. 780, § 34), where sacrifices were offered before consulting the oracle; beyond this the sanctuary of Phylacus, a hero who had given supernatural aid against both Persians and Greeks; beyond this the Gymnasium, where now stands the monastery of Panaghia; thence to the temple of Apollo, on the way to which were passed the Stoa of the Athenians, and several treasuries, small buildings partly above and partly below the earth; to the right (North) of these was the senate-house. The temple of Apollo was situated at the NW. extremity of the town. The first stone temple was built by Trophonius and Agamedes; and when this was burnt down, B.C. 548, it was rebuilt by the Amphictyons with still greater splendour. The expense was defrayed by voluntary subscriptions, to which even Amasis, king of Egypt, contributed. The architect was Spintharus of Corinth; the Alcmaeonidae contracted to build it, and liberally substituted Parian marble for the front of the building, instead of the common stone which they had agreed to employ. The temple contained immense treasures; for not only were rich offerings presented to it by kings and private persons who had received favourable replies from the oracle, but many of the Greek states had in the temple separate thesauri, in which they deposited, for the sake of security, many of their valuable treasures. The wealth of the temple attracted Xerxes, who sent part of his army into Phocis to obtain possession of its treasures, but the Persians were driven back by the god himself, according to the account of the Delphians. The Phocians plundered the temple to support them in the war against Thebes and the other Greek states (357–346); and it was robbed at a later time by BRENNUS and by SULLA.—In the centre of the temple there was a small opening (χάσμα) in the ground, from which, from time to time, an intoxicating vapour arose, which was believed to come from the well of Cassotis. No traces of this chasm or of the mephitic exhalations are now anywhere observable. Over this chasm there stood a tripod, on which the priestess, called Pythia, took her seat whenever the oracle was to be consulted. The words which she uttered after exhaling the vapour were believed to contain the revelations of Apollo. They were carefully written down by the priests, and afterwards communicated in hexameter verse to the persons who had come to consult the oracle. Beyond the temple was the Lesche of the Cnidians, adorned with paintings by Polygnotus, between which and the temple was the fountain of Cassotis (cf. Eur. Ion., 112), and west of this the Theatre; outside the sacred peribolus of walls came the Stadium, and near it the fountain Delphusa, which chiefly supplied the town; below this, on the road to Crissa, was the suburb called Pylaea, where was the Synedriion for Amphictyonic meetings. (Paus. x. 8–30).—For details respecting the oracle and its influence in Greece, see Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum. The recent excavations of the French Archaeological School, besides providing a store of inscriptions of great historical value, have done much to ascertain the precise limits of the ancient city and its sanctuaries.

Delphinium (Δελφίνιον). 1. A temple of Apollo Delphinus at Athens, said to have been built by Aegceus, in which the Ephetae sat for trying cases of intentional but justifiable homicide. Delphus (Δελφός). 1. Son of Poseidon and Melanthe, to whom the foundation of Delphi was ascribed (Aesch. Eum. 16; Paus. x. 32).—2. Son of Apollo and Celaeno, who is also said to have founded Delphi (Paus. x. 6).

Delta. [ÆGYPTUS.]

Dēmādes (Δημάδης, a contraction of Δημέαδης), an Athenian orator, was of very low origin, but rose by his talents to a prominent position at Athens. He belonged to the Macedonian party, and was a bitter enemy of Demosthenes. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Chaeronea, B.C. 338, but was dismissed by Philip with distinguished marks of honour. After Philip's death he was the subservient supporter of Alexander, but notwithstanding frequently received bribes from the opposite party. He was put to death by Antipater in 318, because the latter had discovered a letter of Demades, urging the enemies of Antipater to attack him. Demades was a man without principle, and lived in a most profligate and dissolute manner. But he was a brilliant orator. He always spoke extempore, and with such irresistible force that he was a perfect match for Demosthenes himself. There is extant a large fragment of an oration bearing the name of Demades (περὶ δωδεκαετίας), in which he defends his conduct during the period of Alexander's reign. It is printed in the collections of the Attic orators, but its genuineness is doubtful. Cicero and Quintilian both state that Demades left no orations behind him. (Plut. Dem. 8, 10, 11, 23, 28; Diod. xvi. 87; Cic. Brut. 9, 36, Or. 26, 90; Quint. ii. 17.)

Dēmārātus (Δημάρτος, Dor. Δαμάρτος). 1. King of Sparta, reigned from about B.C. 510 to 491. He was at variance with his unscrupulous colleague Cleomenes, who at length accused him before the Ephors of being an illegitimate son of Ariston, and obtained his deposition by bribing the Delphic oracle, B.C. 491. Demaratus thereupon repaired to the Persian court, where he was kindly received by Darius. He accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, and recommended the king not to rely too confidently upon his countless hosts. His family continued long in Asia. (Hdt. v. 75, vi. 61–70, vii. 101, 234, viii. 65.)—2. A merchant-noble of Corinth, and one of the Bacchiadae. When the power of his clan had been overthrown by Cypselus, about B.C. 657, he fled from Corinth, and settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had two sons, Aruns and Lucumo, afterwards L. Tarquinius Priscus. (Liv. i. 34; Dionys. iii. 46; Strab. p. 219.)

Demætæ, a people of Britain, in the SW. of Wales; their chief towns were Mariduumm (Garmarthen) and Luentinum.

Dēmētār (Δημήτηρ), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was the goddess of the corn-bearing earth and of agriculture, and of settled family life. Formerly it was generally supposed that her name signified Mother-Earth (on the theory that δῆ or δᾶ=γη): but it is probably truer to connect the word with δηαί, the Cretan form of ξιαί, barley, so that her name is really "Corn-Mother." She was the deity of agricultural people, and therefore not one of the Olympian deities of Homer, where we hear very little of her, save that she is present among winnowers, beloved by Zeus, who slays in jealousy her mortal lover Iasion (Il. v. 500, xiv. 326; Od. v. 125). This is not because her worship in Greece was more recent than Homer—on the contrary, she was, as will be seen, a Pelasgian deity—but because the Homeric Achaeans were sea-men and warriors, not agriculturists, nor was Ithaca a corn-land. As might be expected, we find her fully recognised in Hesiod (Op. p. 465). Her myth is more

Demeter to return to Olympus. But she was deaf to all their entreaties, and refused to return to Olympus, and to restore fertility to the earth, till she had seen her daughter again. Zeus accordingly sent Hermes into Erebus to fetch back Persephone. Aïdoneus consented, but gave Persephone the seed of a pomegranate to eat. [ASCALAPHUS.] Hermes then took her to Eleusis to her mother, who received her with unbounded joy. Demeter now returned to Olympus with her daughter, but as the latter had eaten in the lower world, she was obliged to spend one third of the year with Aïdoneus, but was allowed to continue with her mother the remainder of the year. The earth now brought forth fruit again.—In the localities of the myth there are doubtless combined the versions current in many different lands. Some accounts represent as the scene of the rape of Persephone the plain of Nysa in Asia, others Colonus, or the Peloponnesian Hermione (Strab. p. 373) or Crete; the Latin poets generally Sicily, but Propertius speaks of Cyzicus (iii. 21). The Attic story which is adopted in the Homeric Hymn makes Demeter in her wanderings come to the Eleusinian well and sit wearied on the 'sorrowful stone' (ἀγέλαστος πέτρα). Here she is found by the daughters of Celeus, who bring her to their mother Metaneira. By her she is installed as nurse of the child Demophoön, whom she would fain have made immortal by a baptism of fire [see CELEUS]. But in the versions of her story which have the greatest importance the favoured son of Celeus (or Eleusis) is TRIPTOLEMUS, whom Demeter makes the teacher of agriculture to mankind, and who is associated with her in her mysteries as the deity or hero of Eleusis. In this myth, as preserved especially in the great festivals of the Eleusinia and the Thesmophoria, first the growth of the corn is shown. Persephone, who is carried off to the lower world, is the seed-corn, which remains concealed in the ground part of the year; Persephone, who returns to her mother, is the corn which rises from the ground and nourishes men and animals. Thus also in the Cretan myth Plutus (wealth) is the offspring of her union with Iasion: but there is probably the higher mystery, symbolised by the seed, of the burial of the body and its future life. How far this was so, as the mysteries were never divulged by any ancient writer, we must always lack full knowledge. But the cult of Demeter, however much developed by additions from Egyptian and from Orphic religions, was probably in its first origin merely such a worship of the Corn-mother or Corn-spirit as is found in the folk-lore of many, perhaps of most, countries. For the Greeks she was originally a Pelasgian deity, named Pelasgis, and foreign to the Dorian people (Hdt. ii. 171; Paus. ii. 22). In this earlier period she is connected with Poseidon rather than with Zeus: in the myth of the horse Arion born from Demeter and Poseidon, and still more clearly in the primitive worship of the 'Black Demeter' at Phigalia under the form of a goddess with a horse's head (Paus. viii. 42, 4), the ancient notion, not uncommon in folk-lore, of the Corn-spirit having the form of some animal is preserved. Among the most ancient seats of her worship in Greece may have been Thessaly, in the neighbourhood of Pherae, not far from which was Pylasus, the land of corn, and Antron and Anthela, sacred to her (Il. ii. 696; Strab. pp. 176, 420, 429, 435). Hence her rites came to Thebes, and there Dionysus completely developed in the beautiful Homeric Hymn to Demeter. She was the daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and sister of Zeus, by whom she became the mother of PERSEPHONE (Proserpina) or Cora: of this relationship Homer knows nothing. Zeus, without the knowledge of Demeter, had promised Persephone to Aïdoneus (Pluto); and while the unsuspecting maiden was gathering flowers, the earth suddenly opened and she was carried off by Aïdoneus. Her mother, who heard only the echo of her voice, immediately set out in search of her daughter. For nine days she wandered about without obtaining any tidings of her, but on the tenth she met Hecate, and from her—or, in another form of the story, from the all-seeing sun—she learnt the truth. Failing to obtain aid from Zeus, Demeter in her anger avoided Olympus, and dwelt upon earth at Eleusis. As the goddess still continued angry, and did not allow the earth to produce any fruits, Zeus first sent Iris and then all the gods to persuade became associated with her, as in the mysteries at Eleusis: from northern Greece they are said to have been brought to Attica by the Gephyraeans, which will account for her connexion with the Cabiri and with Cadmus. In the Peloponnesus her worship belongs least to the most Dorian state, Sparta, and chiefly to the most Pelasgic state, Arcadia, where her daughter is called Despoina, and Poseidon is the father (Paus. viii. 36, 37): it is particularly noted also at Andania. In the islands it is probably a Pelasgian relic, particularly in Crete, whence the Hymn makes her come to Attica. Her celebrated worship in Sicily is said to have been introduced by the colonists from Megara and from Corinth (Paus. i. 44; Plut. Timol. 8): but it is not unlikely that it was in some part much older; the primitive worship appears in the name Sito, under which she was sometimes known at Syracuse (Athen. pp. 109, 416). Among her most significant epithets should be noticed χθονία, because she was one of the old deities of the underworld, and because the seed came thence; Anesidora, because she 'sends up gifts from below,' and Thesmophoros, because she established civilisation and laws and settled family life. For her festivals see Dict. of Ant. arts. Eleusinia, Thesmophoria, Proerosia.—In works of art Demeter was represented sometimes in a sitting attitude, sometimes walking, and sometimes in a chariot drawn by horses or dragons, but always in full attire. She is most frequently grouped with Persephone (Cora), for the two are inseparably connected in Greek religion as τῶ θεῶ, and with the youthful Iacchus or with Triptolemus. A noble representation of her is the Cnidian Demeter (p. 277), now in the British Museum, a seated figure of the school of Praxiteles, which in its expression of dignified and resigned sorrow seems to show the goddess grieving for the loss of her daughter during the dead winter time. Around her head she wore a garland of corn-cars, or a simple riband, or sometimes the calathus, and in her hand she held a sceptre, corn-ears, or a poppy, or a torch and the mystic basket (cf. the description of the Thalyssia at Cos in Theoc. vii. 156), both of which belong to the Eleusinian rites of initiation. The Romans worshipped Demeter under the name of Ceres. This worship, essentially Greek in character and tradition, came to them from the Greek cities of Campania. The first temple of Ceres at Rome was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius Albinus, in B.C. 496, for the purpose of averting a famine with which Rome was threatened during a war with the Latins. The Romans instituted a festival with games in honour of her (Dict. of Ant. s.v. Cerealia). But the Greek goddess, thus introduced, probably took the place and name of an old Italian deity Ceres, a goddess of the earth and its fruits, 'a creando dicta.'

Dēmētrias (Δημητριάς; Δημητριάς). 1. A town in Magnesia in Thessaly, on the innermost recess of the Pagasaean bay, founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and peopled by the inhabitants of Iolcus and the surrounding towns: it soon became one of the most important towns in the N. of Greece, and is frequently mentioned in the wars between the Macedonians and Romans.—2. A town in Assyria, not far from Arbela.—3. An Athenian tribe, added to the ten old tribes, B.C. 307, and named in honour of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Dēmētrius (Δημήτριος). 1. A Greek of the island of Pharos in the Adriatic. He was a general of Teuta, the Illyrian queen, and treacherously surrendered Corcyra to the Romans, who rewarded him with a great part of the dominions of Teuta, 228 (Pol. ii. 11; Appian, Illyr. 8). Subsequently he ventured on many acts of piratical hostility against the Romans, thinking that they were too much occupied with the Gallic war and the impending danger of Hannibal's invasion to take notice of him. The Romans, however, immediately sent the consul L. Aemilius Paulus over to Illyria (219), who took Pharos itself, and obliged Demetrius to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. He died in an attack on Ithome. (Pol. iii. 16–19).—2. Younger son of Philip V., king of Macedonia, was sent as a hostage to Rome after the battle of Cynoscephalae (198). Five years afterwards he was restored to his father, who subsequently sent him as his ambassador to Rome. But having incurred the jealousy of his father and his brother, Perseus, by the favourable reception he had met with from the Romans, he was secretly put to death by his father's order. (Liv. xl. 20; Pol. xxiv. 7.)

I. Kings of Macedonia. 1. Surnamed Poliorcetes (Πολιορκητής), or the Besieger, son of Antigonus, king of Asia, and Stratonice. At an early age he gave proofs of distinguished bravery. He accompanied his father in his campaigns against Eumenes (B.C. 317, 316), and a few years afterwards was left by his father in the command of Syria, which he had to defend against Ptolemy. In 312 he was defeated by Ptolemy near Gaza, but soon after retrieved his disaster in part by defeating one of the generals of Ptolemy. In 311 a general peace was concluded among the successors of Alexander, but it was only of short duration. In 307 Demetrius was despatched by his father with a powerful fleet and army to wrest Greece from Cassander and Ptolemy. He met with great success. At Athens he was received with enthusiasm by the people as their liberator. Demetrius the Phalacraean, who had governed the city for Cassander, was expelled, and the fort at Munychia taken. Demetrius took up his abode for the winter at Athens, where divine honours were paid him under the title of 'the Preserver' (ὁ Σωτήρ). He was recalled from Athens by his father to take the command of the war in Cyprus against Ptolemy. Here also he was successful, and in a great naval battle he annihilated the fleet of Ptolemy (306). Next year (305) he laid siege to Rhodes, because the Rhodians had refused to support him against Ptolemy. It was in consequence of the gigantic machines which Demetrius constructed to assail the walls of Rhodes, that he received the surname of Poliorketes. But all his exertions were unavailing, and after the siege had lasted above a year, he at length concluded a treaty with the Rhodians (304).—Demetrius then crossed over to Greece, which had meanwhile been almost conquered by Cassander. He soon compelled Cassander to evacuate all Greece S. of Thermopylæ, and for the next two years continued to prosecute the war with success. But in 302 he was obliged to return to Asia in order to support his father Antigonus. In 301 their combined forces were totally defeated by those of Lysimachus and Seleucus in the battle of Ipsus, and Antigonus himself slain. Demetrius, to whose impetuosity the loss of the battle would seem to be in great measure owing, fled to Ephesus, and from thence set sail for Athens; but the Athenians declined to receive him into their city. The jealousies of his enemies soon changed the face of his affairs; and Ptolemy having entered into a closer union with Lysimachus, Seleucus married Stratonice, daughter of Demetrius. By this alliance Demetrius obtained possession of Cilicia, and he had never lost Cyprus, Tyre, and Sidon. In 297 he determined to make an effort to recover his dominions in Greece. He appeared with a fleet on the coast of Attica, but was at first unsuccessful. The death of Cassander, however, in the course of the same year gave a new turn to affairs. Demetrius made himself master of Aegina, Salamis, and finally of Athens, after a long blockade (295). In 294 he marched into Peloponnesus against the Spartans, and was on the point of taking their city when he was suddenly called away by the state of affairs in Macedonia. Here the dissensions between Antipater and Alexander, the two sons of Cassander, had led Alexander to call in foreign aid to his support; and he sent embassies at once to Demetrius and to Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus was the nearest at hand, and had already defeated Antipater and established Alexander on the throne, when Demetrius arrived with his army. He was received with apparent friendliness, but mutual jealousies quickly arose. Demetrius caused the young king to be assassinated at a banquet, and was thereupon acknowledged as king by the Macedonian army. Demetrius kept possession of Macedonia for seven years (294–287). His reign was a series of wars. In 292 he marched against the Thebans, who had risen against him, and took their city. In 291 he took advantage of the captivity of Lysimachus among the Getæ to invade Thrace; but he was recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Boeotia. He repulsed Pyrrhus, who had attempted by invading Thessaly to effect a diversion in favour of the Bœotians, and again took Thebes after a long siege (290). In 289 he carried on war against Pyrrhus and the Aetolians, but he concluded peace with Pyrrhus that he might march into Asia with the view of recovering his father's dominions. His adversaries forestalled him. In 287 Ptolemy sent a powerful fleet against Greece, while Pyrrhus (notwithstanding his recent treaty) on the one side and Lysimachus on the other simultaneously invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was deserted by his own troops, who proclaimed Pyrrhus king of Macedonia. He then crossed over to Asia, and after meeting with alternate success and misfortune, was at length obliged to surrender himself prisoner to Seleucus (286). That king kept him in confinement, but did not treat him with harshness. Demetrius died in the third year of his imprisonment and the fifty-sixth of his age (283). He was one of the most remarkable characters of his age: in restless activity of mind, fertility of resource, and daring promptitude in the execution of his schemes, he has perhaps never been surpassed. His besetting sin was his unbounded licentiousness. Besides Lamia and his other mistresses, he was regularly married to four wives, Phila, Eurydice, Deïdamia, and Ptolemais, by whom he left four sons. The eldest of these, Antigonus Gonatas, eventually succeeded him on the throne of Macedonia. (Plut. Demetrius; Diod. xix., xx.)—2. Son of Antigonus Gonatas, succeeded his father, and reigned B.C. 239–229. He carried on war against the Aetolians, and was opposed to the Achaean League. He was succeeded by Antigonus Dason. (Pol. ii. 44.)

II. Kings of Syria. 1. Soter (reigned B.C. 162–150), was the son of Seleucus IV. Philopator and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child, he had been sent to Rome by his father as a hostage, and remained there during the whole of the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. After the death of Antiochus, being now twenty-three years old, he demanded of the senate to be set at liberty; but as his request was refused by the senate, he fled secretly from Rome, by the advice of the historian Polybius, and went to Syria. The Syrians declared in his favour; and the young king Antiochus V. Eupator, with his tutor Lysias, was seized by his own guards and put to death.

By valuable presents Demetrius obtained from the Romans his recognition as king (Pol. xxxi. 23, xxxii. 4). He expelled the oppressive satrap Heracleides from Babylon; and thus gained the surname Soter from the Babylonians;

but he was not successful in his attempts against the Jews (Jos. Ant. xiii. 4). But having alienated his own subjects by his luxury and intemperance, they sided with an impostor of the name of Balas, who took the title of Alexander. By him Demetrius was defeated in battle and slain (Pol. xxxiii. 14). He left two sons, Demetrius Nicator and Antiochus Sidetes, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne.—2. Nicator (B.C. 146–142, and again 128–125), son of Demetrius Soter. He had been sent by his father for safety to Cnidus, when Alexander Balas invaded Syria; and after the death of his father he continued in exile for some years. With the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor he defeated Balas, and recovered his kingdom (whence came his surname); but, having like his father rendered himself odious to his subjects by his vices and cruelties, he was driven out of Syria by Tryphon, who set up Antiochus, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a pretender against him. Demetrius retired to Babylon, and from thence marched against the Parthians, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner, 138. He remained as a captive in Parthia ten years, but was kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithridates (Arsaces VI.), who gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Meanwhile, his brother, Antiochus VII. Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates, the successor of Mithridates, brought forward Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. In the same year Antiochus fell in battle, and Demetrius again obtained possession of the Syrian throne, 128. Having engaged in an expedition against Egypt, Ptolemy Physcon set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune in Parthia, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemais, and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated, 125. (Justin. xxxvi. 1, xxxviii. 9, xxxix. 1; Liv. Ep. 60.)—3. Eucærus, son of Antiochus VIII. Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius II. During the civil wars that followed the death of Antiochus Grypus (96), Demetrius and his brother Philip for a time held the whole of Syria. But war broke out between them; Demetrius was taken prisoner and sent to Parthia, where he remained in captivity till his death (Jos. Ant. xiii. 14).

III. Literary. 1. Of Adramyttium, surnamed Ixion, a Greek grammarian of the time of Augustus, lived partly at Pergamus and partly at Alexandria, and wrote commentaries on Homer and Hesiod and other works.—2. Magnes (that is, of Magnesia), a Greek grammarian, and a contemporary of Cicero and Atticus. He wrote a book on concord (περὶ δμωνίας), and another on poets and other authors who bore the same name (περὶ δμωνύμων ποιητῶν καὶ συγγραφέων).—3. Phalereus, so called from his birthplace, the Attic demos of Phalerus, where he was born about B.C. 345. His parents were poor, but by his talents and perseverance he rose to the highest honours at Athens, and became distinguished as an orator, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, in the school of Theophrastus. He began his public career about 325, and acquired great reputation by his eloquence. In 317 the government of Athens was entrusted to him by Cassander, and he discharged the duties of his office for ten years with such general satisfaction, that the Athenians conferred upon him the most extraordinary distinctions, and erected no less than 360 statues to his honour (Cic. Rep. ii. 1; Nep. Mill. 6). But during the latter period of his administration he seems to have become intoxicated with his good fortune, and he abandoned himself to dissipation. When Demetrius Poliorcetes approached Athens, in 307, Demetrius Phalereus was obliged to take to flight, and his enemies induced the Athenians to pass sentence of death upon him (Plut. Demetr. 8). He went to Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria, with whom he lived for many years on the best terms; and it was probably owing to the influence of Demetrius that the great Alexandrine library was formed. His successor, Ptolemy Philadelphus, was hostile towards Demetrius, because he had advised his father to appoint another of his sons as his successor. He banished Demetrius to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died from the bite of a snake (Diog. Laërt. v. 78).—Demetrius Phalereus was the last among the Attic orators worthy of the name; but even his orations bore evident marks of the decline of oratory, and were characterised rather by elegance than by force (Cic. Brut. 9, 38, Or. 27, 92; Quintil. x. 1, 80). His numerous writings, the greater part of which were probably composed in Egypt, embraced subjects of the most varied kinds; but none of them has come down to us, for the work on elocution (περὶ ἐρμηνείας), extant under his name, is probably the work of an Alexandrine sophist of the name of Demetrius.—4. Of Scæpsis, a Greek grammarian of the time of Aristarchus, wrote a learned commentary on the Catalogue in the second book of the Iliad.—5. Of Sunium, a Cynic philosopher, lived from the reign of Caligula to that of Domitian, and was banished from Rome in consequence of the freedom with which he rebuked the powerful (Tac. Ann. xvi. 34, Hist. iv. 40; Dio Cass. lxxvi. 13). He is praised by Seneca, and it seems likely that, while he inculcated the moral principles of the Stoics, he sought (as did many of the later philosophers of this school) to impress them on the attention of a corrupt age by Cynic eccentricities.

Dēmōcēdes (Δημοκῆδης), a celebrated physician of Crotona. He practised medicine successively at Aegina, Athens, and Samos. He was taken prisoner along with Polycrates, in B.C. 522, and was sent to Susa to the court of Darius. Here he acquired great reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen, Atossa. Notwithstanding his honours at the Persian court, he was always desirous of returning to his native country. In order to effect this, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured by means of Atossa that he should be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and ascertain in what parts it might be most successfully attacked. When they arrived at Tarentum, the king, Aristophilides, out of kindness to Democedes, seized the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician an opportunity of escaping to Crotona. Here he settled, and married the daughter of the famous wrestler, Milo, the Persians having followed him to Crotona, and in vain demanded that he should be restored (Hdt. iii. 131-137).

Demöchâres (Δημοχάρης), an Athenian, son of the sister of Demosthenes. He was probably trained by his uncle in oratory, and inherited his patriotic sentiments. After the restoration of the Athenian democracy in B.C. 307 by Demetrius Polioretetes, Demochares was at the head of the patriotic party and took an active part in public affairs for the next twenty or thirty years (Plut. Dem. 30). He left behind him several orations, and an extensive history of his own times. Fragments are preserved in Orat. Attici, and in Müller's Fr. Hist. Græc.

Dēmōcrâtes (Δημοκράτης), a Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known. the author of an extant collection of moral maxims, called the Golden Sentences (γνώμαι χρυσαί). They are printed with DEMOPHILUS.

Democritus (Δημόκριτος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born at Abdera in Thrace, about B.C. 460. (The date can only be inferred by the statement in Diog. Laërt. ix. 41, that he was still young when Anaxagoras was already old.) His father, Hegesistratus—or, as others called him, Damasippus or Athenocritus—was possessed of so largo a property, that he was able to entertain Xerxes on his march through Abdera. Democritus spent the inheritance, which his father left him, on travels into distant countries, which he undertook to satisfy his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and spent some time in Egypt. The many anecdotes preserved about Democritus show that he was a man of a most sterling and honourable character. His diligence was incredible: he lived exclusively for his studies, and his disinterestedness, modesty, and simplicity, are attested by many facts which are related of him. Notwithstanding the great property he had inherited from his father, he died in poverty, but highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens. He died in 361 at a very advanced age. There is a tradition that he deprived himself of his sight, that he might be less disturbed in his pursuits; but this tradition is one of the inventions of a later age, which was fond of piquant anecdotes. It is more probable that he may have lost his sight by too severe application to study. This loss, however, did not disturb the cheerful disposition of his mind, which prompted him to look, in all circumstances, at the cheerful side of things, which later writers took to mean that he only laughed at the follies of men (Juv. x. 28). His knowledge was extensive. It embraced not only the natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics, grammar, music, and philosophy, but various other useful arts. His works were composed in the Ionic dialect, though not without some admixture of the local peculiarities of Abdera. They are nevertheless much praised by Cicero on account of the liveliness of their style, and are in this respect compared even with the works of Plato. The fragments of them are collected by Mullach, Democriti Abderitæ Operum Fragmenta, Berlin, 1843. Leucippus appears to have had most influence upon the philosophical opinions of Democritus, and those two philosophers were the founders of the theory of atoms. In order to explain the creation of all existing things, Democritus maintained that there were in infinite space an infinite number of atoms or elementary particles, homogeneous in quality, but different in form, capable of no change, except of place. The difference of weight in two bodies of the same size is caused by there being more empty spaces in one than in the other. All creation or genesis results from the coming together or 'concourse' of atoms; all decay from the separation or resolution of atoms which had combined to form any body. Bodies act on each other by pressure and impact, or from a distance (as the magnet on iron or light upon the eye) by effluences. The properties of all things depend on the arrangement of atoms affecting form and size; the qualities which we ascribe to them only express the way in which they affect our senses. Atoms move downwards in space by their own gravity; but the larger and heavier fall more quickly (as he supposed), and strike against the lighter; hence there is a rebound and a whirling motion, from which result combinations of atoms so as to form innumerable worlds, of which this is one. He speaks of this as caused by τύχη in opposition to the νοῦς of Anaxagoras; but he does not mean that the result is a chance: on the contrary he regards all that is created as the necessary succession of cause and effect.

Demôdôcus (Δημόδοκος), the celebrated bard at the court of Alcinoüs who sang of the loves of Ares and Aphrodite, while Ulysses sat at the banquet of Alcinoüs (Od. viii. 62, xiii. 27). He was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclæe as playing for the dancers (Paus. iii. 18, 7).

Dēmônax (Δημόναξ), of Cyprus, a Cynic philosopher in the time of Hadrian. We owe our knowledge of his character to Lucian, who has painted it in the most glowing colours, representing him as almost perfectly wise and good. He was nearly 100 years old at the time of his death. (Lucian, Demonax.)

Dēmônēsi Insulæ (Δημόνησοι: Prinkipo or Princes' Islands), a group of islands in the Propontis (Sea of Marmara), belonging to Bithynia: of these the most important were Pityôdes and Chalceitis, also called Demonesus.

Dēmôphilus (Δημόφιλος). 1. Son of Ephorus, continued his father's history by adding to it the history of the Sacred War (Diod. xvi. 14).—2. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, from whose Ἄναγός Plautus took his Asinaria.—3. A Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known, wrote a work entitled βίον θερπεία, part of which is extant, in the form of a selection, entitled γνωμικὰ ὁμοιώματα. Best edition by Orelli, in his Opusc. Græc. Vet. Sentent. Lips. 1819.

Dēmôphôn or Dēmôphôdon (Δημοφών or Δημόφωδον). 1. Son of Celeus and Metanira, whom Demeter wished to make immortal. For details see CELEUS.—2. Son of Theseus and Phædra, accompanied the Greeks against Troy, and there procured the liberation of his grandmother Aethra, who lived with Helen as a slave. On his return from Troy, he gained the love of Phyllis, daughter of the Thracian king Sithon, and promised to marry her (Hyg. Fab. 59, 243; Ov. Her. 2, A. A. iii. 38; Plin. xvi. 108). Before the nuptials were celebrated, he went to Attica to settle his affairs, and as he tarried longer than Phyllis had expected, she thought that she was forgotten, and put an end to her life; but she was metamorphosed into a tree. Demophon became king of Athens. He marched out against Diomedes, who on his return from Troy had landed on the coast of Attica, and was ravaging it. He took the Palladium from Diomedes, but had the misfortune to kill an Athenian in the struggle (Paus. i. 28; Ant. Lib. 33). For this murder he was summoned before the court ἐπι Παλλαδίου—the first time that a man was tried by that court. The legend of the capture of the Palladium by Demophon seems to be an attempt to explain the name of the judicial court.

Demosthēnes (Δημοσθένης). 1. Son of Alcisthenes, a celebrated Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. In B.C. 426 he was sent with a fleet to ravage the coast of Peloponnesus; he afterwards landed at Naupactus, and made a descent into Aetolia; he was at first unsuccessful, and was obliged to retreat; but he subsequently gained a brilliant victory over the Ambraciots (Thuc. iii. 91; Diod. xii. 60). In 425, though not in office, he sailed with the Athenian fleet, and was allowed by the Athenian commanders to remain with five ships at Pylos, which he fortified in order to assail the Lacedaemonians in their own territories. He defended Pylos against all the attempts of the Lacedaemonians, till he was relieved by an Athenian fleet of forty ships. The Spartans, who in their siege of the place had occupied the neighbouring island of Sphacteria, were now cut off and blockaded. Later in the same year he rendered important assistance to Cleon, in making prisoners of the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria, though the whole glory of the success was given to Cleon (Thuc. iv. 2–40; Diod. xii. 61). In 413 he was sent with a large fleet to Sicily, to assist Nicias. Fortune was unfavourable to the Athenians. Demosthenes now counselled an immediate departure, but Nicias delayed returning till it was too late. The Athenian fleet was destroyed, and when Demosthenes and Nicias attempted to retreat by land, they were obliged to surrender to the enemy with all their forces. Both commanders were put to death by the Syracusans (Thuc. vii; Diod. xiii.).—2. The greatest of Athenian orators, was the son of Demosthenes, and was born in the Attic demos of Paeania, about B. C. 385. At seven years of age he lost his father, who left him and his younger sister to the care of three guardians, Aphobus and Demophon, two relations, and Therippides, an old friend. These guardians squandered the greater part of the property of Demosthenes, and neglected his education to a great extent. He nevertheless received instruction from the orator Isaeus; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether he was taught by Plato and Isocrates, as some of the ancients stated. At the age of eighteen Demosthenes called upon his guardians to render him an account of their administration of his property; but by intrigues they contrived to defer the business for two years. At length, in 361, Demosthenes accused Aphobus before the archon, and obtained a verdict in his favour. Aphobus was condemned to pay a fine of ten talents (Dem. c. Aphob. i. ii., c. Onet.; Plut. Dem. 4). Emboldened by this success, Demosthenes ventured to come forward as a speaker in the public assembly. His first effort was unsuccessful, and he is said to have been received with ridicule; but he was encouraged to persevere by the actor Satyrus, who gave him instruction in action and declamation. In becoming an orator, Demosthenes had to struggle against the greatest physical disadvantages. His voice was weak and his utterance defective; he could not pronounce the ρ, and constantly stammered, whence he derived the name of Βάραλος. It was only owing to the most unwearied exertions that he succeeded in overcoming the obstacles which nature had placed in his way. Thus it is said that he spoke with pebbles in his mouth, to cure himself of stammering; that he repeated verses of the poets as he ran up hill, to strengthen his voice; that he declaimed on the sea-shore to accustom himself to the noise and confusion of the popular assembly; that he lived for months in a cave under ground, engaged in constantly writing out the history of Thucydides, to form a standard for his own style. These tales are not worthy of much credit; but they nevertheless attest the common tradition of antiquity respecting the great efforts made by Demosthenes to attain to excellence as an orator.—It was about 355 that Demosthenes began to obtain reputation as a speaker in the public assembly. It was in this year that he delivered the oration against Leptines, and from this time we have a series of his speeches on public affairs. His eloquence soon gained him the favour of the people. The influence which he acquired he employed for the good of his country, and not for his own aggrandisement. He clearly saw that Philip had resolved to subjugate Greece, and he therefore devoted all his powers to resist the aggressions of the Macedonian monarch. For fourteen years he continued the struggle against Philip, and neither threats nor bribes could turn him from his purpose. It is true he failed; but the failure must not be considered his fault. The history of his struggle is best given in the life of Philip. [PHILIPPOS.] It is sufficient to relate here that it was brought to a close by the battle of Chaeronea (338), by which the independence of Greece was crushed. Demosthenes was present at the battle, and fled like thousands of others. His enemies reproached him with his flight, and upbraided him as the cause of the misfortunes of his country; but the Athenians judged better of his conduct, requested him to deliver the funeral oration upon those who had fallen at Chaeronea, and celebrated the funeral feast in his house. At this time many accusations were brought against him. Of these one of the most formidable was the accusation of Ctesiphon by Aeschines, which was in reality directed against Demosthenes himself. Aeschines accused Ctesiphon for proposing that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre. Aeschines maintained that the proposal was not only made in an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to such a distinction. The trial was delayed for reasons unknown to us till 330, when Demosthenes delivered his oration on the crown (περι στεφάνου). Aeschines was defeated and withdrew from Athens. [AESCHINES.]—Meanwhile important events had taken place in Greece. The death of Philip in 336 roused the hopes of the patriots, and Demosthenes, although he had lost his daughter only seven days before, was the first to proclaim the joyful tidings of the king's death, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against Macedonia. But Alexander's energy, and the frightful vengeance which he took upon Thebes, compelled Athens to submit and sue for peace. Alexander demanded the surrender of Demosthenes and the other leaders of the popular party, and with difficulty allowed them to remain at Athens. During the life of Alexander, Athens made no open attempt to throw off the Macedonian supremacy. In 325 Harpalus fled from Babylon with the treasure entrusted to his care by Alexander, and came to Athens, the protection of which he purchased by distributing his gold among the most influential demagogues. The reception of such an open rebel was viewed as an act of hostility towards Macedonia itself; and accordingly Antipater called upon the Bust of Demosthenes.

Athenians to deliver up the rebel and to try those who had accepted his bribes. Demosthenes was one of those who were suspected of having received money from Harpalus. His guilt is doubtful; but he was condemned and thrown into prison, from which, however, he escaped, apparently with the connivance of the Athenian magistrates. He now resided partly at Troezen and partly in Aegina, looking daily across the sea towards his beloved native land. But his exile did not last long. On the death of Alexander (323) the Greek states rose in arms against Macedonia. Demosthenes was recalled from exile; a trireme was sent to Aegina to fetch him, and his progress to the city was a glorious triumph. But in the following year (322) the confederate Greeks were defeated by Antipater at the battle of Crannon, and were obliged to sue for peace. Antipater demanded the surrender of Demosthenes, who thereupon fled to the island of Calauria, and took refuge in the temple of Poseidon. Here he was pursued by the emissaries of Antipater; he thereupon took poison, which he had for some time carried about his person, and died in the temple, 322. (Plut. Demosthenes and Phocion, Vit. X. Orat.; Liban. Vit. Demosth.; Lucian, Encom. Demosth.)—There existed thirty-five orations of Demosthenes in antiquity; but of these only sixty-one have come down to us, including the letter of Philip, which is strangely enough counted as an oration. Several of the orations, however, are spurious, or at least of very doubtful authenticity. Besides these orations, there are fifty-six Exordia to public orations, and six letters which bear the name of Demosthenes, but are probably spurious.—The orations may be divided into the following classes:

I. Political Speeches. These consist of eight speeches against Philip, and three others. 1. The First Philippic (351 B.C.): that troops should be sent to Thrace. 2-4. The three Olynthiac orations (349-8): that Olynthus should be aided and saved from destruction. These were before Philip got a footing in Greece itself by his admission to the Amphictyonic Council. 5. On the Peace (346): deprecating war with Philip till they could detach other Greek states from his interests. 6. The Second Philippic (344): against Philip's party. 7. On the Chersonese, which was menaced by Philip. 8. The Third Philippic: for energetic action in the Hellespont. Editions of Philippics and Olynthiacs by Heslop, 1871. [The oration on Halonnecus and the Fourth Philippic, and on the letter of Philip, are spurious.] 9. On the Navy boards (περὶ Συμμορίων), delivered in 354 B. C. 10. For Megalopolis, 352. 11. For the Rhodians, 351. The orations περὶ συντάξεως and περὶ τῶν πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον συνθηκῶν are spurious.

II. Speeches in public prosecutions. 1. against Androton (355). 2. Against Leptines (354); ed. Beatson. 4, 5. Timocrates and Aristocrates (352); 6. Meidias (349), which was never spoken; ed. Holmes. 7. On the Embassy, περὶ τῆς Παραπροσβέλας, de Falsa Legatione, on the dishonest conduct of Aeschines during his embassy to Philip: this is practically one of his speeches against Philip (343); ed. Shilleto. 8. On the Crown (330). This, the finest of all his speeches, is really the defence of all his political action against Philip; ed. Holmes.

III. Speeches in private law-suits. Of the thirty-two ascribed to him, only eleven are certainly genuine: viz. four against Aphobus and Onetor (ed. Penrose); those against Spudias, Callicles, Pantaenetus, Nausimachus, Boeotus (περὶ ὀνόματος) and Conon, and that For Phormio (ed. Sandys and Paley). Many authors, however, accept as genuine the Lacritus, Apaturius, Macariatus, Leochares, Stephanus I., Olympiodorus, Polycles, Callippus, Nicostratus, Dionysidorus, Eubulides. Editions of the complete orations by Dindorf, 1886; in Oratores Attici, by Bekker, 1828; Dobson, 1828; Baiter, 1850; C. Müller, 1868.

Denselētae or Denthelētae, a Thracian people on the Haemus, between the Strymon and Nessus.

Dentātus, M'. Curīus, a favourite hero of the Roman republic, was celebrated in later times as a noble specimen of old Roman frugality and virtue. He was of Sabine origin, and the first of his family who held any of the high offices of state (consequently a homo novus). He was consul B. C. 290 with P. Cornelius Rufinus. The two consuls defeated the Samnites, and brought the Samnite wars to a close. In the same year Dentatus also defeated the Sabines, who appear to have supported the Samnites. In 283 he fought as praetor against the Senones. In 275 he was consul a second time, and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum and in the Arusinian plain so completely that the king was obliged to quit Italy. The booty which he gained was immense, but he would keep nothing for himself. In 274 he was consul a third time, and conquered the Lucanians, Samnites, and Brutians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. Dentatus now retired to his small farm in the country of the Sabines, and cultivated the land with his own hands. Once the Samnites sent an embassy to him with costly presents; they found him sitting at the hearth and roasting turnips. He rejected their presents, telling them that he preferred ruling over those who possessed gold, to possessing it himself. He was censor in 272, and in that year executed public works of great importance. He commenced the aqueduct which carried the water from the river Anio into the city (Aniculus Vetus): and by a canal he carried off the water of the lake Velinus into the river Nar, in consequence of which the inhabitants of Reate gained a large quantity of excellent land. (Liv. Ep. 11-14; Pol. ii. 19; Val. Max. iv. 3, vi. 3; Cic. de Sen. 13, 16; Plut. Pyrrh. 20.)

Dēō (Δηῶ), another name for Demeter: hence her daughter Persephone is called by the patronymic Dēōis and Dēōine.

Derbē (Δέρβη: Δερβήτης, Δερβαῖος: Zosta), a town in Lycæonia, on the frontiers of Isauria. It is first mentioned as the residence of the tyrant Antipater of Derbe, a friend of Cicero, whom Amyntas put to death. The district about Cybistra and Derbe belonged to the province of Cappadocia, as constituted by Tiberius A.D. 17, was transferred to Lycaonia, probably by Claudius A.D. 41, and formed part of the united province of Cappadocia and Galatia under Vespasian. (Strab. p. 534; Ptol. v. 6.)

Derbiccae or Derbices, a Scythian people in Margiana, dwelling on the Oxus, near its entrance into the Caspian Sea. They worshipped the earth as a goddess, neither sacrificed nor ate any female animals, and killed and ate all their old men above 70 years of age. (Strab. p. 520; Ael. V. H. iv. 1.)

Derceto. [APHRODITE, p. 85; SEMIRAMIS.]

Dercyllidas (Δερκυλλίδης), a Spartan, succeeded Thimbron, B.C. 399, in the command of the army which was employed in the protection of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia. He carried on the war with success. Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus were at length glad to sue for peace. In 396 he was superseded by Agesilaus. (Xen. Hell. iii. 1, 2, iv. 8.)

Dertōna (Tortona), an important town in Liguria, and a Roman colony, formed by Augustus or recolonised by him, with the surname Julia, on the road from Genua to Placentia (Strab. p. 217; Plin. iii. 49; Vell. Pat. i. 15).

Dertōsa (Tortosa), a town of the Ilercavones on the Iberus in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony (Plin. iii. 23; Strab. p. 159).

Despoena (Δέσποινα), the mistress, a surname of several divinities, as Aphrodite, Demeter, and more especially Persephone, who was worshipped under this name in Arcadia.

Deucalion (Δευκαλίων). 1. Son of Prometheus and Clymene, king of Phthia, in Thessaly, the mythical progenitor of the Hellenic race, with whose name were associated the traditions of a great flood. When Zeus, after the treatment he had received from Lycaon, had resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha were, on account of their piety, the only mortals saved. On the advice of his father, Deucalion built a ship, in which he and his wife floated in safety during the nine days' flood, which destroyed all the other inhabitants of Hellas. At last the ship rested on Mount Parnassus in Phocis, or, according to other traditions, on Mount Othrys in Thessaly, on Mount Athos, or even on Aetna in Sicily. When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus the god of escape (Φύξις), and he and his wife then consulted the sanctuary of Themis as to how the race of man might be restored. The goddess bade them cover their heads and throw the bones of their mother behind them. After some doubts and scruples respecting the meaning of this command, they agreed in interpreting the bones of their mother to mean the stones of the earth. They accordingly threw stones behind them, and from those thrown by Deucalion there sprang up men, from those thrown by Pyrrha women. Deucalion then descended from Parnassus, and built his first abode, at Opus or at Cynus. Deucalion became by Pyrrha the father of Hellen, Amphictyon, Protogenia, and others. (Hes. Fragm. 135; Pind. Ol. ix. 64; Apollod. i. 7, 2, iii. 8, 2; Ov. Met. i. 260; Strab. p. 425.) A tradition of a great flood belongs to the folk-lore of most nations of the world; and this story is only one among many forms of it, which must have been brought by different tribes of the Hellenic stock to different countries. The oldest site of the Greek myth was perhaps Dodona (Aristot. Meteor. i. 14), whence it was generally transferred to Thessaly: but the name of the mountain on which the vessel of Deucalion first rested is variously given as Parnassus, Othrys, Athos and Aetna (Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 41; Hyg. Fab. 153).—2. Son of Minos and Pasiphaë, and father of Idomeneus was an Argonaut and one of the Calydonian hunters.

Deva. 1. (Chester), the principal town of the Cornavii in Britain, on the Setcia (Dee), and the head-quarters of the Legio XX. Victrix.—2. (Dee), an estuary in Scotland, on which stood the town Devana, near Aberdeen.

Dexamenus (Δεξιμένος), a Centaur who lived in Bura in Achaia. According to some, he was king of Olenus, and father of Deianira, who is usually represented as daughter of Oeneus.

Dexippus (Δέξιππος). 1. Called also Dioxippus, a physician of Cos, one of the pupils of Hippocrates, lived about B.C. 320, and attended the children of Hecatomnus, prince of Caria.—

2. P. Herennius, a Greek rhetorician and historian, was a native of Attica, and held the highest offices at Athens. He distinguished himself in fighting against the Goths, when they invaded Greece in A.D. 262 (Trebell. Pol. Gallien. 13.) He was the author of three historical works:—1. A history of Macedonia from the time of Alexander. 2. A chronological history from the mythical ages down to the accession of Claudius Gothicus, A.D. 268. 3. An account of the war of the Goths or Scythians, in which Dexippus himself had fought. The fragments of Dexippus, which are considerable, are published by Bekker and Niebuhr in the first volume of the Scriptores Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn, 1829, 8vo.—3. A disciple of the philosopher Iamblichus, lived about A.D. 350, and wrote a commentary on the Categories of Aristotle. Ed. by Spengel, Munich, 1859.

Dia (Δία), daughter of Deioneus and wife of Ixion. By Ixion, or, according to some, by Zeus, she became the mother of Pirithous.

Dia (Δία). 1. The ancient name of Naxos.—2. An island near Amorgos.—3. A small island off Crete, opposite the harbour of Cnossus.—4. An island in the Arabian gulf, on the W. coast of Arabia.

Diablintes. [AULERIC.]

Diacia (ἡ Διακρία), a mountainous district in the N.E. of Attica, including the plain of Marathon. [ATTICA.] The inhabitants of this district (Διακριεῖς, Διάκριοί), formed one of the three parties into which the inhabitants of Attica were divided in the time of Solon: they were the most democratical of the three parties.

Diadumenianus or Diadumenus, son of the emperor Macrinus, received the title of Caesar, when his father was elevated to the purple, A.D. 217, and was put to death in the following year about the same time with Macrinus (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 4–40; Lamprid. Diadum).

Diaeus (Δίαος), of Megalopolis, general of the Achaean League B.C. 149 and 147, took an active part in the war against the Romans. On the death of Critolaüs in 146, he succeeded to the command of the Achaeans, but was defeated by Mummius near Corinth, whereupon he put an end to his own life, after slaying his wife to prevent her falling into the enemy's power. (Polyb. xl. 2–9; Paus. vii. 12.)

Diagoras (Διαγόρας). 1. Son of Damagetus, of Ialysus in Rhodes, was very celebrated for his own victories and those of his sons and grandsons, in the Grecian games. His fame was celebrated by Pindar in the 7th Olympic ode. He was victor in boxing twice in the Olympian games, four times in the Isthmian, twice in the Nemean, and once at least in the Pythian. He had therefore the high honour of being a περιοδονκῆς—that is, one who had gained crowns at all the four great festivals. When an old man, he accompanied his sons, Acusilaüs and Damagetus, to Olympia. The young men, having both been victorious, carried their father through the assembly, while the spectators showered garlands upon him, and congratulated him as having reached the summit of human happiness. He gained his Olympic victory B.C. 464. (Paus. vi. 7.)—2. Surnamed the Atheist (ἄθεος), a Greek philosopher and poet, was the son of Teleclides, and was born in the island of Melos, one of the Cyclades. He was a disciple of Democritus of Abdera, and in his youth he acquired considerable reputation as a lyric poet. He was at Athens as early as B.C. 424, for Aristophanes in the Clouds (830), which was performed in that year, alludes to him as a well-known character. In consequence of his attacks upon the popular religion, and especially upon the Eleusinian mysteries, he was formally accused of impiety B.C. 411, and fearing the result of a trial, fled from Athens. He was condemned to death in his absence, and a reward set upon his head. He first went to Pallene, and afterwards to Corinth, where he died. One of the works of Diagoras was entitled φρόγιοι λόγοι, in which he probably attacked the Phrygian divinities. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 59; Cic. Tusc. i. 46, 111.)

Diana (the quantity of the first syllable is common, and no arguments of etymology can safely be based on it), an ancient Italian divinity, whom the Romans identified with the Greek Artemis. Her worship is said to have been introduced at Rome by Servius Tullius, who dedicated a temple to her on the Aventine; and she appears to have been originally worshipped only by the plebeians. At Rome Diana was the goddess of light and of the moon (for no valid objection has been made against her being the moon-goddess also), and her name contains the same root as the word dies, sub dio (cf. JANUS). The attributes of the Greek Artemis were afterwards ascribed to the Roman Diana. [See ARTEMIS.] Among the most noticeable sites of her worship as a genuine Italian deity were Mount Tifata, near Capena (Plut. Sull. 6; C.I.L. i. 569), and Aricia, where she was worshipped with harvest festivals as the deity who gave fruitfulness both in the vegetable world, and also apparently in the birth of children (Ov. Fast. iii. 266), and with a torch-light procession as being the goddess of light. It is not unlikely that the peculiar law by which the priest of her grove must have slain his predecessor was a relic of human sacrifice offered to her (see Dict. of Antiq. art. Rex Nemorensis). In tradition Diana Aricina is connected with Virgilius in a manner which some writers compare with the conjunction of Isis and Osiris. [See VIRBIUS.]

Dianium. 1. (Gianuti), a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea, opposite the gulf of Cosa.—2. (Denia), called Hemeroscopion (Ἡμεροσκοπίων) by Strabo, a town in Hispania Tarraconensis on a promontory of the same name (C. Martini) founded by the Massilians. Here stood a celebrated temple of Diana, from which the town derived its name; and here Sertorius kept most of his military stores.

Dicaea (Δίκαια), a town in Thrace, on the lake Bistonis (Hdt. vii. 109; Strab. p. 331).

Dicaearchia. [PUTEOLI.]

Dicaearchus (Δικαίραρχος), a celebrated Peripatetic philosopher, geographer, and historian, was born at Messana in Sicily, but passed the greater part of his life in Greece Proper, and especially in Peloponnesus. He was a disciple of Aristotle and a friend of Theophrastus. He wrote a vast number of works, of which only fragments are extant. His most important work was entitled βίος τῆς Ἑλλάδος: it contained an account of the geography, history, and moral and religious condition of Greece. Dicaearchus was in part the source of Cicero's De Republica. See Fuhr, Dicaearchi Messenii quae supersunt composita et illustrata, Darmstadt, 1841.

Dicē (Δίκη), the personification of justice, a daughter of Zeus and Themis, and the sister of Eunomia and Eirene (Hes. Th. 901; Pind. Ol. xiii. 6). She was considered as one of the Horae, and is frequently called the attendant or councillor (πάρεδρος or ζύνεδρος) of Zeus (Soph. O. C. 1381). In the tragedians she appears as a divinity who severely punishes all wrong, watches over the maintenance of justice, and pierces the hearts of the unjust with the sword (Aesch. Cho. 639). In this capacity she is closely connected with the Erinnyes, though her business is not only to punish injustice, but also to reward virtue (Aesch. Ag. 1432, Eum. 510; Soph. Aj. 1390; Eur. Med. 1389).

Dictaeus. [DICTE.]

Dictamnium (Δίκταμνον), a town on the N. coast of Crete with a sanctuary of Dictynna, whose name the town bore (Ptol. iii. 17, 8).

Dictē (Δίκη), a mountain in the E. of Crete, where Zeus is said to have been brought up. Hence he bore the surname Dictacus. The Roman poets employ the adjective Dictaeus as synonymous with Cretan (Strab. p. 578).

Dictynna. [BRITOMARTIS.]

Dictys Cretensis, the reputed author of an extant work in Latin on the Trojan war, divided into six books, and entitled Ephemeris Belli Trojani, professing to be a journal of the leading events of the war. In the preface to the work we are told that it was composed by Dictys of Cnossus, who accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and was inscribed in Phoenician characters on tablets of lime-wood or paper made from the bark. The work was buried in the same grave with the author, and remained undisturbed till the sepulchre was burst open by an earthquake in the reign of Nero, and the work was discovered in a tin case. It was carried to Rome by Eupraxia, whose slaves had discovered it, and it was translated into Greek by order of Nero. It is from this Greek version that the extant Latin work professes to have been translated by a Q. Septimius Romanus, apparently of the 4th century, since he addresses Aradius Rufinus, who was praefectus urbi A.D. 312. Although its alleged origin and discovery are quite unworthy of credit, it appears nevertheless to be a translation from a Greek work quoted by the Byzantine writers, especially by Malalas: it seems improbable that Malalas should have recourse to a Latin original; and the sources from which the work itself is drawn are Greek writers such as Apollodorus and Lycophron, whereas if the original author had been a Latin writer, he would have drawn from some at least of the Latin authorities. On the other hand, those who deny that a Greek original ever existed have in their favour the fact that in style it is not like a translation from Greek, and seems to be an imitation of Sallust. The work contains a history of the Trojan war, from the birth of Paris down to the death of Ulysses. The compiler not unfrequently differs widely from Homer, adding many particulars, and recording many events of which we find no trace elsewhere. All miraculous events and supernatural agency are entirely excluded. The compilations ascribed to Dictys and Dares [DARES], are of considerable importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountains from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the middle ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany.—Editions by Dederich, Bonn, 1835, and by F. Meister, Lips. 1872.

Didius. 1. T., praetor in Macedonia, B.C. 100, where he defeated the Scordiscans (Cic. in Pis. 25, 61), consul 98, and subsequently proconsul in Spain, where he defeated the Celtiberians. He fell in the Marsic war, 89 (Appian, B. C. i. 40).—2. C., a legate of Caesar, fell in battle in Spain fighting against the sons of Pompey, 46.—3. M. Didius Salvius Juliānus, bought the Roman empire of the praetorian guards, when they put up the empire for sale after the death of Pertinax, A.D. 193. Flavius Sulpicianus, praefect of the city, and Didius bid against each other, but it was knocked down to Didius, upon his promising a donative to each soldier of 25,000 sesterces. Didius, however, held the empire for only two months, from March 28th to June 1st, and was murdered by the soldiers when Severus was marching against the city. (Dio Cass. lxxiii. 11; Spartian. Did. Jul.)

Dido (Διδώ), also called Elissa, the reputed founder of Carthage. The name Dido was that of a Phoenician deity equivalent to Astarte, originally worshipped by the Tyrian colonists of Carthage, and then identified in legend with Elissa. She was thus represented as the daughter of the Tyrian king Mutto (= Belus or Agenor), and sister of Pygmalion, who succeeded to the crown after the death of his father. She was married to her uncle, Acerbas or Sichaeus, a priest of Hercules, and a man of immense wealth. He was murdered by Pygmalion, who coveted his treasures; but Dido secretly sailed from Tyre with the treasures, accompanied by some noble Tyrians, who were dissatisfied with Pygmalion's rule. She first went to Cyprus where she carried off eighty maidens to provide the emigrants with wives, and then crossed over to Africa. Here she purchased as much land as might be covered with the hide of a bull; but she ordered the hide to be cut up into the thinnest possible strips, and with them she surrounded a spot, on which she built a citadel called Byrsa (from βύρα, i.e. the hide of a bull). Around this fort the city of Carthage arose, and soon became a powerful and flourishing place. The neighbouring king Iarbas, jealous of the prosperity of the new city, demanded the hand of Dido in marriage, threatening Carthage with war in case of refusal. Dido had vowed eternal fidelity to her late husband; but seeing that the Carthaginians expected her to comply with the demands of Iarbas, she pretended to yield to their wishes, and under pretence of soothing the manes of Acerbas by expiatory sacrifices, she erected a funeral pile, on which she stabbed herself in presence of her people. After her death she was worshipped by the Carthaginians as a divinity.—Virgil has inserted in his Aeneid the legend of Dido with various modifications. According to the common chronology, there was an interval of more than 300 years between the capture of Troy (B.C. 1184) and the foundation of Carthage (B.C. 853); but Virgil nevertheless makes Dido a contemporary of Aeneas, with whom she falls in love on his arrival in Africa. When Aeneas hastened to seek the new home which the gods had promised him, Dido in despair destroyed herself on a funeral pile. The oldest authority for the legends of Dido seems to be Timaeus (Fragm. 23), who is followed by Naevius and Virgil. [See AENEAS.]

Didýma. [BRANCHIDAE.]

Didýmē. [AEOLIAE INSULAE.]

Didymus (Διδυμος), a celebrated Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus, was a follower of the school of Aristarchus, and received the surname χαλκέντερος, on account of his indefatigable and unwearied application to study. He is said to have written 4000 works, the most important of which were commentaries on Homer, including a revision of Aristarchus. He wrote commentaries also on Pindar, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and the Attic orators, and is a source of much of the information contained in later scholia and lexicons. Fragments edited by Schmidt, 1854.

Diespiter. [JUPITER.]

Digentia (Licenza), a small stream in Latium, beautifully cool and clear, which rises in Lucetilis, and flows into the Anio near Vicovaro. It flowed through the Sabine farm of Horace (Hor. Ep. i. 16, 12, i. 18, 104). [For discussion of the site of the villa, see HORATIUS.]

Dimallum, a town in Greek Illyria.

Dinarchus (Δειναρχος), the last and least important of the ten Attic orators, was born at Corinth about B.C. 361. He was brought up at Athens, and studied under Theophrastus. As he was a foreigner, he could not come forward himself as an orator, and was therefore obliged to content himself with writing orations for others. He imitated Demosthenes and Lysias, but in neither case successfully. He belonged to the friends of Phocion and the Macedonian party. When Demetrius Polioretces advanced against Athens in 307, Dinarchus fled to Chalcis in Euboea, and was not allowed till 292 to return to Athens, where he died at an advanced age. Only three of his speeches (against Demosthenes, Aristogeiton, and Philocles) have come down to us: they all refer to the question about HARPALUS. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators. (Dionys. Dinarch.; Plut. Vit. X. Orat.)

Dindýmēnē. [DINDYMUS.]

Dindýmus, or Dindýma, -ōrum (Διδυμος :

τὰ Δίνδυμα). 1. (Gunusu Daglı), a mountain in Phrygia on the frontiers of Galatia, near the town Pessinus, sacred to Cybele, the mother of the gods, who is hence called Dindymene (Strab. p. 567).—2. (Murad Daglı), a mountain in Phrygia, near the frontiers of Mysia, the source of the river Hermus, also sacred to Cybele (Hdt. i. 80; Strab. p. 626).—3. (Kapu Daglı), a mountain near Cyzicus. [RHEA.]

Dinocrates (Δεινοκράτης). 1. A distinguished Macedonian architect in the time of Alexander the Great. He was the architect of the new temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was built after the destruction of the former temple by Herostratus. He was employed by Alexander, whom he accompanied into Egypt, in the building of Alexandria. He formed a design for cutting Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander; but the king forbade the execution of the project (Vitruv. i. 1, 4; Strab. p. 640). The right hand of the figure was to have held a city, and in the left there would have been a basin, in which the water of all the mountain streams was to pour, and thence into the sea. There is a story of doubtful credit that he began the erection of a temple to Arsinoë, the wife of Ptolemy II., of which the roof was to be arched with loadstones, so that her statue made of iron might appear to float in the air, but died before completing the work (Plin. xxxiv. 148).—2. A Messenian who opposed the Achæan League, and, when Philopoemen was taken prisoner, was among those who caused him to be put to death. In the next year, when the Achæan general Lycostas occupied Messene, Dinocrates anticipated his sentence by suicide. (Pol. xxiv. 5, 12; Plut. Philop. 18–21.)

Dinômachus (Δεινόμαχος), a philosopher, who agreed with CALLIPHON in considering the chief good to consist in the union of virtue with bodily pleasure (Cic. Tusc. v. 30).

Dinômenes (Δεινομένης), a sculptor, whose statues of Io and Callisto stood in the Acropolis at Athens in the time of Pausanias: he flourished B.C. 400 (Paus. i. 25; Plin. xxxiv. 50). A base with the name of Dinomenes, found on the Acropolis, and assigned to the second cent. B.C., may be the work of a later sculptor of the same name.

Dinon (Δείνων, Δίνων), father of the historian Clitarchus, wrote himself a history of Persia.

Dio Cassius, the historian, was the son of a Roman senator, Cassius Apronianus, and was born A.D. 155, at Nicaea in Bithynia. He also bore the surname Cocceianus, which he derived from the orator Dio Chrysostomus Cocceianus, his maternal grandfather. He was educated with great care; he accompanied his father to Cilicia, of which he had the administration; and after his father's death, he went to Rome, about 180. He was straightway made a senator, and frequently pleaded in the courts of justice. He was aedile and quaestor under Commodus, and praetor under Septimius Severus, 194. He accompanied Caracalla on his journey to the East: he was appointed by Macrinus to the government of Pergamus and Smyrna, 218; was consul about 220; proconsul of Africa 224, under Alexander Severus, by whom he was sent as legate to Dalmatia in 226, and to Pannonia in 227. In the latter province he restored strict discipline among the troops; which excited the discontent of the praetorians at Rome, who demanded his life of Alexander Severus. But the emperor protected him and raised him to his second consulship 229. Dio, however, retired to Campania, and shortly afterwards obtained permission of the emperor to return to his native town Nicaea, where he passed the remainder of his life.—Dio wrote several historical works, but the most important was a History of Rome (Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία), in eighty books, from the landing of Aeneas in Italy to A.D. 229, the year in which Dio returned to Nicaea. Unfortunately, only a comparatively small portion of this has come down to us entire. Of the first 34 books we possess only fragments; but since Zonaras in his Annals chiefly followed Dio Cassius, we may regard the Annals of Zonaras as to some extent an epitome of Dio Cassius. Of the 35th book we possess a considerable fragment, and from the 36th book to the 54th the work is extant complete, and embraces the history from the wars of Lucullus and Cn. Pompey against Mithridates, down to the death of Agrippa, B.C. 10. Of the remaining books we have only the extracts made by Xiphilinus and others. Dio Cassius treated the history of the republic with brevity, but gave a more minute account of those events of which he had been himself an eye-witness. He consulted original authorities, and displayed great judgment and discrimination in the use of them. He had acquired a thorough knowledge of his subject, and his notions of the ancient Roman institutions were far more correct than those of some of his predecessors, such as Dionysius of Halicarnassus, but he was a strong imperialist, and depreciated whatever he thought tended to republicanism.—Editions by Reimarus, Hamb. 1750–52, 2 vols. fol.; Sturz, Lips. 1824, 9 vols. 8vo, and by Dindorf, Lips. 1855.

Dio Chrysostomus—that is, the golden-mouthed, a surname given to him on account of his eloquence. He also bore the surname Cocceianus, which he derived from the emperor Cocceius Nerva, with whom he was intimate. He was born at Prusa in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era. He travelled in different countries, and came to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, but having incurred the suspicions of Domitian, was obliged to leave the city. On the advice of the Delphic oracle, he put on a beggar's dress, and visited Thrace, Mysia, Scythia, and the country of the Getae. After the murder of Domitian, A.D. 96, Dio used his influence with the army stationed on the frontier in favour of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. Trajan also showed marked favour to Dio, who died at Rome about A.D. 117.—Dio Chrysostomus is the most eminent of the Greek rhetoricians and sophists in the time of the Roman empire. There are extant eighty of his orations; but they are more like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects than real orations, of which they have only the form. All these orations are written in pure Attic Greek, though overloaded with the rhetorical embellishments of the age.—Editions by Reiske, Lips. 1784, 2 vols.; by Emperius, Bruns. 1844; and by L. Dindorf, Lips. 1857.

Diocæsareâ (Διοκασάρεια: Sefurieh), more anciently Sepphõris (Σεπφώρις), in Galilee, was a small place until Herodes Antipas made it the capital of Galilee, under the name of Diocæsarea. It was destroyed in the fourth century by Gullus, on account of an insurrection which had broken out there. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5.)

Dioclea or Doclea (Δόκλεα), a place in Dalmatia, near Salona, the birthplace of Diocletian.

Diocles (Διοκλῆς). 1. A brave Athenian, who lived in exile at Megara. Once in a battle he protected with his shield a youth whom he loved, but he lost his own life in consequence. The Megarians rewarded him with the honours of a hero, and instituted the festival of the Dioclea, which they celebrated in the spring of every year.—2. A Syracusan, the leader of the popular party in opposition to Hermocrates. In B.C. 412 he was appointed with several others to draw up a new code of laws. This code which was almost exclusively the work of Diocles, became very celebrated, and was adopted by many other Sicilian cities.—3. Of Carystus in Euboea, a celebrated Greek physician, lived in the fourth century B.C. He wrote several medical works, of which only some fragments remain.

Diocletianópolis. [CELETRUM.]

Diocletianus, Valerius. Roman emperor, A.D. 284–305, was born near Salona in Dalmatia, in 245, of most obscure parentage. From his mother, Doctea, or Dioclea, who received her name from the village where she dwelt, he inherited the appellation of Docles or Diocles, which, after his assumption of the purple, was expanded into Diocletianus, and attached as a cognomen to the high patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army, he served with high reputation under Probus and Aurelian, followed Carus to the Persian war, and, after the fate of Numerianus became known at Chalcedon, was proclaimed emperor by the troops, 284. He slew with his own hands Arrius Aper, who was arraigned of the murder of Numerianus, in order, according to some authorities, that he might fulfil a prophecy delivered to him in early youth by a Gaulish Druidess, that he should mount a throne as soon as he had slain the wild-boar (Aper). Next year (285) Diocletian carried on war against Carinus, on whose death he became undisputed master of the empire. But as the attacks of the barbarians became daily more formidable, he resolved to associate with himself a colleague in the empire, and accordingly selected for that purpose Maximianus, who was invested with the title of Augustus in 286. Maximian had the care of the Western empire, and Diocletian that of the Eastern. But as the dangers which threatened the Roman dominions from the attacks of the Persians in the East, and the Germans and other barbarians in the West, became still more imminent, Diocletian made a still further division of the empire. In 292, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius were proclaimed Caesars, and the government of the Roman world was divided between the two Augusti and the two Caesars. Diocletian had the government of the East with Nicomedia as his residence; Constantius, Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treves as his residence; Galerius, Illyricum, and the whole line of the Danube, with Sirmium as his residence. The wars in the reign of Diocletian are related in the lives of his colleagues, since Diocletian rarely commanded the armies in person. It is sufficient to state here that Britain, which had maintained its independence for some years under CARAUSIUS and ALLECTUS, was restored to the empire (296); that the Persians were defeated and obliged to sue for peace (298); and that the Marcomanni and other barbarians in the N. were also driven back from the Roman dominions. Though in most acts of his life he has been praised for clemency and humanity, he ordered in 303, chiefly at the instigation of Gallienus, a fierce persecution of the Christians.

This was nearly the last act of his rule; for after an anxious reign of twenty-one years Diocletian longed for repose. Accordingly on the first of May, 305, he abdicated at Nicomedia, and compelled his reluctant colleague Maximian to do the same at Milan. Diocletian retired to his native Dalmatia, and passed the remaining eight years of his life in philosophic retirement near Salona (where he built the magnificent villa of which the remains form the town of Spalatro), devoted to rural pleasures and the cultivation of his garden. He died 313. His talents for organisation place him among the most remarkable of the emperors. He was not only the author of the division of the empire, but he entirely remodelled the arrangement of provinces, constituting twelve great διοικήσεις, each comprising several provinces, with a supreme officer called Vicarius to whom the praesides of the several provinces in the diocese were answerable. He reorganised also the administration of justice, and the system of taxation throughout the empire. (Aurel. Vict. Caes. 39; Eutrop. ix. 13 ff.; Zonar. xii. 31.) The Edict of Diocletian dated 303, fixing the price of provisions, &c., has great antiquarian value. It was inscribed on a temple at Stratonicea; portions also have been discovered at Diocletianus, Roman Emperor, A.D. 284–305.

Obv., DIOCLETIANVS AVG., head of Diocletian, laureate; rev., VIRTVS MILITVM C., soldiers sacrificing before camp.

Plataea and at Megalopolis in 1888, 1890 (C. I. L. iii. p. 801; Ephem. Ep. iv. 180).

Diódoros (Διδώρος). 1. Surnamed Cronus, of Iasus in Caria, lived at Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, who is said to have given him the surname of Cronus on account of his inability to solve at once some dialectic problem proposed by Stilpo, when the two philosophers were dining with the king. Diodorus is said to have taken that disgrace so much to heart that after his return from the repast, and writing a treatise on the problem, he died in despair. According to another account he derived his surname from his teacher Apollonius Cronus. He belonged to the Megaric school of philosophy, of which he was the head. He was celebrated for his great dialectic skill, for which he is called ὁ διαλεκτικός, or διαλεκτικώτατος. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 111; Strab. pp. 658, 838.)—2. Siculus, of Agrigium in Sicily, was a contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus. In order to collect materials for his history, he travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia, and lived a long time at Rome. He spent altogether thirty years upon his work. It was entitled Βιβλιοθήκη ιστορική, The Historical Library, and was a universal history, embracing the period from the earliest mythical ages down to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. It was divided into three great sections and into forty books. The first section, which consisted of the first six books, contained the history of the mythical times previous to the Trojan war. The second section, which consisted of eleven books, contained the history from the Trojan war down to the death of Alexander the Great.

The third section, which contained the remaining twenty-three books, treated of the history from the death of Alexander down to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. Of this work only the following portions are extant entire: the first five books, which contain the early history of the Eastern nations, the Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Greeks; and from book eleven to book twenty, containing the history from the second Persian war, B.C. 480, down to 302. Of the remaining portion there are extant a number of fragments and the Excerpta, which are preserved partly in Photius and partly in the Ecloge made at the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. The work of Diodorus is constructed upon the plan of annals, and the events of each year are placed one after the other without any internal connexion. In compiling his work Diodorus exercised no judgment or criticism. He simply collected what he found in his different authorities, and thus jumbled together history, mythus, and fiction: he frequently misunderstood authorities, and not seldom contradicts in one passage what he has stated in another. But nevertheless the compilation is of great importance to us, especially for the history of Sicily, on account of the great mass of materials which are there collected from a number of writers whose works have perished. The best editions are by Wesseling, Amster. 1746, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Bipont, 1793, &c., 11 vols. 8vo.; and by Dindorf, Lips. 1867, 5 vols. 8vo.—3. Of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, flourished 353.—4. Of Tyre, a Peripatetic philosopher, a disciple and follower of Critolaüs, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He flourished B.C. 110.

Diôdôtus (Διδότος), a Stoic philosopher and a teacher of Cicero, in whose house he lived for many years at Rome. In his later years, Diodotus became blind: he died in Cicero's house, B.C. 59, and left to his friend a property of about 100,000 sesterces. (Cic. Tusc. v. 39, 113; ad Att. ii. 20.)

Diôgênes (Διογένης). 1. Of Apollonia in Crete, an eminent natural philosopher, lived in the fifth century B.C., and was a pupil of Anaximenes. He wrote a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Περὶ φύσεως, On Nature, in which he treated of physical science. He made air the element of all things. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 57; Cic. N. D. i. 12, 29.)—2. The Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Selcucia in Babylonia, was educated at Athens under Chrysisippus, and succeeded Zeno of Tarsus as the head of the Stoic school at Athens. He was one of the three ambassadors sent by the Athenians to Rome in B.C. 155. [CARNEADES; CRITOLAUS.] He died at the age of 88.—3. The Cynic philosopher, was born at Sinope in Pontus, about B.C. 412. His father was a banker named Icesias or Ictas, who was convicted of some swindling transaction, in consequence of which Diogenes quitted Sinope and went to Athens (Diog. Laërt. vi. 2, 20). His youth is said to have been spent in dissolute extravagance; but at Athens his attention was arrested by the character of Antisthenes, who at first drove him away. Diogenes, however, could not be prevented from attending him even by blows, but told him that he would find no stick hard enough to keep him away. Antisthenes at last relented, and his pupil soon plunged into the most frantic excesses of austerity and moroseness. In summer he used to roll in hot sand, and in winter to embrace statues covered with snow; he wore coarse clothing, lived on the plainest food, slept in porticoes or in the street, and finally, according to the common story, took up his residence in a tub (a large earthenware jar) belonging to the Metroum, or temple of the Mother of the Gods. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 23; Juv. xiv. 308; Sen. Ep. 99; Lucian, Quom. Conscr. Hist. ii. p. 364.) The truth of this latter tale has, however, been disputed, since it is not mentioned by Plutarch, Cicero or Epictetus (ap. Arrian. iii. 24); and some have attempted to explain the story by imagining a clay-built cottage. But, whatever the truth of the story, it is repeated in works of art as well as in literature. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Dolium.] In spite of his strange eccentricities, Diogenes appears to have been much respected at Athens, and to have been privileged to rebuke anything of which he disapproved. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Ulysses, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves about the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practise it.—On a voyage to Aegina he was taken prisoner by pirates, and carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, 'How to command men.' He was purchased by Xenias of Corinth, over whom he acquired such influence, that he soon received from him his freedom, was entrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence at Corinth his celebrated interview with Alexander the Great is said to have taken place. The conversation between them began by the king's saying, 'I am Alexander the Great;' to which the philosopher replied, 'And I am Diogenes the Cynic.' Alexander then asked whether he could oblige him in any way, and received no answer except, 'Yes, you can stand out of the sunshine.' We are further told that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, 'If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes' (Plut. Alex. 14; Cic. Tusc. v. 32, 92). Diogenes died at Corinth at the age of nearly ninety, B.C. 323. [For the teaching of the Cynics, see ANTISTHENES.]

—4. Laërtius, of Laërte in Cilicia, of whose life we have no particulars, probably lived in the second century after Christ. He wrote the Lives of the Philosophers in ten books: the work is entitled περὶ βίων, δογμάτων, καὶ ἀποφθεγμάτων τῶν ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ εὐδοκησάντων. According to some allusions which occur in it, he wrote it for a lady of rank, who occupied herself with philosophy, and who, according to some, was Arria, the friend of Galen. In this work Diogenes divides the philosophy of the Greeks into the Ionic—which commences with Anaximander and ends with Clitomachus, Chryssippus, and Theophrastus—and the Italian, which was founded by Pythagoras, and ends with Epicurus. He reckons the Socratic school, with its various ramifications, as a part of the Ionic philosophy, of which he treats in the first seven books. The Eleatics, Heraclitus and the Sceptics are included in the Italian philosophy, which occupies the eighth and ninth books. Epicurus and his philosophy are treated of in the tenth book with particular minuteness, which has led some writers to the belief that Diogenes himself was an Epicurean. The work is of great value to us, as Diogenes made use of a great number of writers on the history of philosophy, whose works are now lost; but it is put together without plan, criticism, or connexion, and the author had evidently no conception of the real value and dignity of philosophy. The best editions are by Meibom, Amsterd. 1692, 2 vols. 4to., and Hübner, Lips. 2 vols. 8vo. 1828–1831; Tauchnitz, 1877.—5. Θενομᾶς, a tragic poet, who began to exhibit at Athens B.C. 404.

Diogeniānus (Διογενειανός), of Heraclēa on the Pontus, a distinguished grammarian in the reign of Hadrian, wrote a Greek Lexicon, from which the Lexicon of Hesychius seems to have been almost entirely taken. A portion of it is still extant, containing a collection of proverbs first printed by Schottus, with the proverbs of Zenobius and Suidas, Antv. 1612, 4to., and subsequently in other editions of the Paroemiographi Graeci.

Diomēa (τὰ Διόμεια: Διομειεύς, Διομείος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Aegeis, with a temple of Heracles; the Dioean gate in Athens led to this demus. [ATHENÆ.]

Diomedēae Insulæ, five small islands in the Adriatic sea, N. of the promontory Garganum in Apulia, named after Diomedes. [DIOMEDES.] The largest of these, called Diomedea Insula or Trimerus (Tremiti), was the place where Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, died.

Diomēdes (Διομήδης). 1. Son of Tydeus and Deïpyle, whence he is constantly called Tydides (Τυδείδης), succeeded Adrastus as king of Argos.—Homeric Story. Tydeus fell in the expedition against Thebes, while his son Diomedes was yet a boy; but Diomedes was afterwards one of the Epigoni who took Thebes. He went to Troy with eighty ships, and was, next to Achilles, the bravest hero in the Greek army. He enjoyed the especial protection of Athene; he fought against the most distinguished of the Trojans, such as Hector and Aencas, and even against the gods who espoused the cause of the Trojans. He thus wounded both Aphrodite and Ares (Il. v. 335, 440, 837). In Od. iii. 180, we are told that he reached Argos on his return from Troy in three days.—Later Stories. Diomedes and Ulysses carried off the palladium from the city of Troy, since it was believed that Troy could not be taken so long as the palladium was within its walls. Diomedes carried the palladium with him to Argos; but according to others it was taken from him by Demophon in Attica, where he landed one night on his return from Troy, without knowing where he was. [DEMOPHON.] Another tradition stated that Diomedes restored the palladium to Acneas. On his arrival in Argos Diomedes found his wife Aegialea living in adultery with Hippolytus, or, according to others, with Cometes or Cyllabarus. This misfortune befell him through the anger of Aphrodite, whom he had wounded before Troy. He therefore quitted Argos, either of his own accord, or expelled by the adulterers, and went to Actolia. He subsequently attempted to return to Argos, but on his way home a storm threw him on the coast of Daunia in Italy, where he was kindly received by Daunus, the king of the country. Diomedes assisted Daunus in his war against the Messapians, married Euppe, the daughter of Daunus, and settled in Daunia, where he died at an advanced age. He was buried in one of the islands off cape Garganum, which were called after him the Diomedean islands. His companions were inconsolable at his loss, and were metamorphosed into birds (Aves Diomedæae), which, mindful of their origin, used to fly joyfully towards the Greek ships, but to avoid those of the Romans. According to others Diomedes returned to Argos, or disappeared in one of the Diomedean islands, or in the country of the Heneti. A number of towns in the E. part of Italy, such as Beneventum, Argos Hippion (afterwards Argyripa or Arpi), Venusia, Canusium, Venafrum, Brundisium, &c., were believed to have been founded by Diomedes. A plain of Apulia, near Salapia and Canusium, was called Diomedēi Campi after him. He was worshipped as a divine being, especially in Italy, where statues of him existed at Argyripa, Metapontum, Thurii, and other places. (Verg. Aen. xi. 243; Ov. Met. xiv. 457; Ant. Lib. 37; Strab. pp. 215, 284.)—2. Son of Ares and Cyrene, king of the Bistones in Thrace, who dwelt near Abdera. He was killed by Heracles on account of his mares, which he fed with human flesh. (Apollod. ii. 5, 8, Hyg. Fab. 30; cf. Eur. Alc. 499, H. F. 380.) Some modern writers represent Diomedes as the Storm-king, and his horses as the strong winds of the Thracian coast.

Diomēdes, a Latin grammarian, probably lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ, and is the author of an extant work, De Oratione et Partibus Orationis et Vario Genere Metrorum libri III, printed in the Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, 4to, Hanov. 1605.

Diomēdon (Διομέδων), an Athenian commander during the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Arginusæ (B.C. 406), and was put to death with five of his colleagues on his return to Athens. (Thuc. viii. 19–34; Xen. Hell. i. 5.)

Dion (Δίων), a Syracusan, son of Hipparrinus, and a relation of Dionysius, born about 408 B.C. His sister Aristomache was the second wife of the elder Dionysius; and Dion himself was married to Arete, the daughter of Dionysius by Aristomache. Dion was treated by Dionysius with the greatest distinction, and was employed by him in many services of trust and confidence. Of this close connexion and favour with the tyrant he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth. He made no opposition to the succession of the younger Dionysius to his father's power, but he became an object of suspicion to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion appears to have been naturally a man of a proud and stern character; and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysius, he dreamed of making Syracuse a free city, of giving liberty to the Greek cities in Sicily, and of expelling the Carthaginians: he carried to excess the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undisguised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavoured to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse; but the philosopher, though received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysius; and the intrigues of the opposite party, headed by Philistus, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. Dion retired to Athens, where he lived in habitual intercourse with Plato and his disciples; but Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he had a third time visited Syracuse), and Dionysius having confiscated his property, and compelled his wife to marry another person, he determined on attempting the expulsion of the tyrant by force. In the year 357 he sailed from Zacynthus with only a small force and obtained possession of Syracuse, except Ortygia, without opposition during the absence of Dionysius in Italy. Dionysius returned shortly afterwards, and, aided by Philistus attempted to raise the blockade of Ortygia: a battle was fought in the Great Harbour, in which Philistus was defeated and put to death; and Dionysius found himself obliged to quit Syracuse and sail away to Italy. After his departure the Syracusans deposed Dion from his command, an ingratitude which embittered his mind, though he was soon afterwards recalled, and on the surrender of Ortygia found himself master of Syracuse. But he was unwilling to give the citizens the liberty which they expected, and his despotic conduct soon caused great discontent; the people complained with justice that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. He caused his chief opponent, Heraclides, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries. Callipus, an Athenian, who had accompanied him from Greece, formed a conspiracy against him, and caused him to be assassinated in his own house, 353. (Plut. Dion; Diod. xvi. 6-20; Nep. Dion.)

Dionaea. [DIONE.]

Dionē (Διώνη), in Homer, is the mother of Aphrodite by Zeus (Il. v. 312, 330, 370, 422): in Hesiod, she is the daughter of Oceanus (Th. 553); but in later mythologists, of Uranus and Ge or Aether and Terra (Apollod. i. 1, 3; Hyg. Fab. 1). In post-Homeric authors she is sometimes Aphrodite herself (Theoc. vii. 116; Ov. Fast. ii. 461, A. A. iii. 3). Euripides (Fr. 177) makes her = Semele, calling Dionysus her son. Dione was probably in the earliest Greek mythology the feminine of Zeus (whence her name), worshipped as a supreme goddess in conjunction with him at Dodona (Dem. Meid. p. 530, § 53); but afterwards, when the influence of Dodona was less predominant (before the Homeric period), she was displaced by Hera as the consort of Zeus, and in many of her attributes by the Cyprian Aphrodite, who thereupon becomes her daughter in mythology.

Dionysius (Διονύσιος). I. Historical.—1. The Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, son of Hermocrates, born B.C. 430. He was born in a private but not low station, and began life as a clerk in a public office. He was one of the partisans of Hermocrates, the leader of the aristocratical party, and was severely wounded in the attempt which Hermocrates made to effect by force his restoration from exile. He subsequently served in the great war against the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily under Hannibal, the son of Gisco, and successively reduced and destroyed Selinus, Himera, and Agrigentum. These disasters, and especially the failure of the Syracusan general, Daphnaeus, to relieve Agrigentum, had created a general spirit of discontent and alarm, of which Dionysius skilfully availed himself. He succeeded in procuring a decree for deposing the existing generals, and appointing others in their stead, among whom was Dionysius himself, B.C. 406. His efforts were from this time directed towards supplanting his new colleagues and obtaining the sole direction of affairs. These efforts were crowned with success. In the following year (405), the other generals were deposed, and Dionysius, though only twenty-five years of age, was appointed sole general, with full powers. From this period we may date the commencement of his reign, or tyranny, which continued without interruption for thirty-eight years. His first step was to procure the appointment of a body-guard, which he speedily increased to the number of 1000 men: at the same time he induced the Syracusans to double the pay of all the troops, and took every means to ingratiate himself with the mercenaries. By his marriage with the daughter of Hermocrates he secured to himself the support of all the remaining partisans of that leader. He converted the island of Ortygia into a strong fortress, in which he took up his own residence. After concluding a peace with Carthage, and putting down a formidable insurrection in Syracuse, he began to direct his arms against the other cities of Sicily. Naxos, Catania, and Leontini, successively fell into his power, either by force or treachery. For several years after this he made preparations for renewing the war with Carthage. In 397 he declared war against Carthage. At first he met with great success, but in 395 his fleet was totally defeated, and he was obliged to shut himself up within the walls of Syracuse, where he was besieged by the Carthaginians both by sea and land. A pestilence shortly after broke out in the Carthaginian camp, and greatly reduced the enemy; whereupon Dionysius suddenly attacked the enemy both by sea and land, defeated the army, and burnt great part of their fleet. The Carthaginians were now obliged to withdraw. In 393 they renewed the war with no better success, and in 392 they concluded a peace with Dionysius. This treaty left Dionysius at leisure to continue the ambitious projects in which he had previously engaged against the Greek cities in Italy. He formed an alliance with the Lucanians, and crossed over into Italy. He subdued Caulonia, Hipponium, and Rhegium, 387. He was in close alliance with the Locrians; and his powerful fleets gave him the command both of the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic seas. He was now at the summit of his greatness, and during the twenty years that elapsed from this period to his death, he possessed an amount of power and influence far exceeding those enjoyed by any other Greek before the time of Alexander. During this time he was twice engaged again in war with Carthage—namely, in 383, when a treaty was concluded, by which the river Ialycus was fixed as the boundary of the two powers; and again in 368, in the middle of which war Dionysius died at Syracuse, 367. His last illness is said to have been brought on by excessive feasting; but, according to some accounts, his death was hastened by his medical attendants, in order to secure the succession for his son. After the death of his first wife, Dionysius had married almost exactly at the same time—some said, even on the same day—Doris, a Loerian of distinguished birth, and Aristomache, a Syracusan, the daughter of his supporter Hipparinus, and the sister of Dion. By Doris he had three children, of whom the eldest was his successor, Dionysius. The character of Dionysius has been drawn in the blackest colours by many ancient writers; he appears indeed to have been taken as the type of a tyrant, in the worst sense. In his latter years he became extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have, however, an air of great exaggeration. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20.) Dionysius was fond of literature and the arts. He adorned Syracuse with splendid temples and other public edifices, so as to render it unquestionably the greatest of all Greek cities. He was himself a poet, and repeatedly contended for the prize of tragedy at Athens. Here he several times obtained the second and third prizes, and just before his death, bore away the first prize at the Lenaean, with a play called 'The Ransom of Hector.' He sought the society of men distinguished in literature and philosophy, entertaining the poet Philoxenus at his table, and inviting Plato to Syracuse, whom, however, he afterwards dismissed. [PLATO.] (Diod. xiii. xiv. xv.)

—2. The Younger, son of the preceding, succeeded his father as tyrant of Syracuse, B.C. 367. He was at this time under thirty years of age: he had been brought up at his father's court in idleness and luxury, and studiously precluded from taking any part in public affairs. The ascendancy which Dion, and through his means Plato, obtained for a time over his mind was undermined by flatterers and the companions of his pleasures. Yet his court was at this time a great place of resort for philosophers and men of letters: besides Plato, whom he induced by the most urgent entreaties to pay him a second visit, Aristippus of Cyrene, Eudoxus of Cnidus, Speusippus, and others, are stated to have spent some time with him at Syracuse; and he cultivated a friendly intercourse with Archytas and the Pythagoreans of Magna Graecia. Dion, who had been banished by Dionysius, returned to Sicily in 357, at the head of a small force, with the avowed object of dethroning Dionysius. The latter was absent from Syracuse at the time that Dion landed in Sicily; but he instantly returned to Syracuse, where the citadel still held out for him. [DION.] But finding it impossible to retain his power, he sailed away to Italy with his most valuable property, and thus lost the sovereignty after a reign of twelve years, 356. He now repaired to Locri, the native city of his mother, Doris, where he was received in the most friendly manner; but he made himself tyrant of the city, and is said to have treated the inhabitants with the utmost cruelty. After remaining at Locri ten years, he availed himself of the internal dissensions at Syracuse to recover possession of his power in that city, 346. The Loerians took advantage of his absence to revolt against him, and wreaked their vengeance in the most cruel manner on his wife and daughters. He continued to reign in Syracuse for the next three years, till TIMOLEON came to Sicily, to deliver the Greek cities of the island from the tyrants. As he was unable to resist Timoleon he surrendered the citadel into the hands of the latter, on condition of being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth, 343. Here he spent the remainder of his life in a private condition. According to some writers, he was reduced to support himself by keeping a school; others say, that he became one of the attendants on the rites of Cybele, a set of mendicant priests of the lowest class. (Diod. xvi.; Plut. Timol. 14; Athen. p. 541; Aelian, V. H. vi. 12; Cic. Tusc. iii. 12.)

—3. Tyrant of Heraclæa on the Euxine, son of Clearchus, succeeded his brother Timotheus in the tyranny about B.C. 338. He was said to have been the mildest and justest of all the tyrants that had ever lived. He married Amastris, niece of Darius. In 306 he assumed the title of king, and died shortly afterwards at the age of fifty-five. (Diod. xvi. 88, xx. 70.)

II. Literary. 1. Of Halicanassus, a celebrated rhetorician, came to Rome about B.C. 29, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the Latin language and literature. He lived at Rome on terms of friendship with many distinguished men, such as Q. Aelius Tubero, and the rhetorician Caecilius; and he remained in the city for twenty-two years, till his death, B.C. 7. His principal work, which he composed at Rome in the later period of his life, was a history of Rome in twenty-two books, entitled Ῥωμαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία. It contained the history of Rome from the mythical times down to B.C. 264, in which year the history of Polybius begins with the Punic wars. The first nine books alone are complete; of the tenth and eleventh we have the greater part; and of the remaining nine we possess nothing but fragments and extracts. Dionysius treated the early history of Rome with great minuteness. The eleven books extant do not carry the history beyond B.C. 441, so that the eleventh book breaks off very soon after the decemviral legislation. This peculiar minuteness in the early history, however, was in a great measure the consequence of the object he had proposed to himself, which, as he himself states, was to impress upon the Greeks a just appreciation of Rome's greatness. Dionysius had no clear notions about the early constitution of Rome, and was led astray by the nature of the institutions which he saw in his own day; and thus makes innumerable mistakes in treating of the history of the constitution. Nevertheless, he has preserved to us from ancient authorities much that is of the greatest value to the historian when other light fails altogether; and for the student of mythology his work is a storehouse of ancient traditions.—Dionysius also wrote various rhetorical and critical works, which abound with excellent remarks and criticisms on the works of the classical writers of Greece. They show that he was a greater critic than historian. The following are the extant works of this class: 1. Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ, addressed to one Echeerates, part of which is certainly spurious. 2. Περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων, treats of oratorical power, and on the combination of words according to the different styles of oratory. 3. Τῶν ἀρχαίων κρίσις, contains characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides; of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Philistus, Xenophon, and Theopompus; and, lastly, of some philosophers and orators. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ῥητόρων ἱπομνηματισμοί, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators, of which we now possess only the first three sections, on Lycias, Isocrates, and Isaeus. The other three sections treated of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Aeschines; but they are lost, with the exception of the first part of the fourth section, which treated of the oratorical power of Demosthenes. 5. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἀμμαῖον, a letter to his friend Ammaeus, in which he shows that most of the orations of Demosthenes had been delivered before Aristotle wrote his Rhetoric, and consequently that Demosthenes had derived no instruction from Aristotle. 6. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Γναῖον Πομπήτιον, was written by Dionysius with a view of justifying the unfavourable opinion which he had expressed upon Plato, and which Pompey had censured. 7. Περὶ τοῦ Θουκυδίδου χαρακτήρος καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν τοῦ συγγραφέως ἰδιωμάτων, was written by Dionysius at the request of his friend Tubero, for the purpose of explaining more minutely what he had written on Thucydides. As Dionysius in this work looks at the great historian from his rhetorical point of view, his judgment is often unjust and incorrect. 8. Περὶ τῶν τοῦ Θουκυδίδου ἰδιωμάτων, addressed to Ammaeus. 9. Δείναρχος, a very valuable treatise on the life and orations of Demarchus. The best editions of the complete works of Dionysius are by Sylburg, Frankf. 1586, two vols. fol., reprinted at Leipzig, 1691; by Reiske, Lips. 1774. The History is edited separately by Kiessling, Lips. 1870.—2. Surnamed Chalcus, because he advised the Athenians to coin brass money (Athen. p. 669); wrote rhetorical orations, which have perished, and elegies, which are quoted by Plut. Nic. 5; Arist. Rhet. iii. 2; Athen. pp. 668, 702.—3. Of Heraclaea, son of Theopantus, was a pupil of Zeno, and adopted the tenets of the Stoics. But in consequence of a most painful complaint, he abandoned the Stoic philosophy and joined the Eleatics, whose doctrine, that ἡδονή and the absence of pain was the highest good, had more charms for him than the austere ethics of the Stoa. This renunciation of his former creed drew upon him the nickname of μεταθέμενος, i.e. the renegade. He died in his eightieth year, of voluntary starvation. He wrote several works, all of which are lost. Cicero censures him for having mixed up verses with his prose, and for his want of elegance and refinement.—4. Of Magnesia, a distinguished rhetorician, taught in Asia between b.c. 79 and 77, when Cicero visited the East.—5. Of Miletus, one of the earliest Greek historians, or logographi, and a contemporary of Hecataeus, wrote a history of Persia (fragments by C. Müller, 1848).—6. Of Mytilene, surnamed Scytobrachion, taught at Alexandria in the first century b.c. He wrote a prose work on the Argonauts, which was consulted by Diodorus Siculus.—7. Surnamed Periégètes, from his being the author of a περήγησις τῆς γῆς, which is still extant; probably lived about A.D. 300. The work contains a description of the whole earth, derived in great measure from Eratosthenes, in hexameter verse, and is written in a terse and elegant style. It enjoyed great popularity in ancient times. Two translations or paraphrases of it were made by Romans, one by Rufus Festus Avienus [AVIENUS], and the other by the grammarian Priscian [PRISCIANUS]. The best edition of the original is by Bernhardt, Lips. 1828.—8. Of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy (fragments in Meineke).—9. Surnamed Thrax, from his father being a Thracian, was himself a native either of Alexandria or Byzantium. He is also called a Rhodian, because at one time he resided at Rhodes, and gave instructions there. He also taught at Rome, about b.c. 80. He was a very celebrated grammarian; but only one of his works has come down to us: a small treatise, entitled τέχνη γραμματική, which became the basis of all subsequent grammars, and was a standard book in grammar schools for many centuries. (Ed. Belker, in Anecdota Gr. 1816.)

III. Artists.—1. Of Argos, a statuary, flourished b.c. 476.—2. Of Colophon, a painter, contemporary with Polygnotus of Thasos, whose works he imitated in every respect except in grandeur. Aristotle (Poët. 2) says that Polygnotus painted the likenesses of men better than the originals, Pausan made them worse, and Dionysius just like them (ὁμοίους). It seems from this that the pictures of Dionysius were deficient in the ideal. (Cf. Aelian, V. H. iv. 3; Plut. Timol. 36.)

Dionysopolis (Διονύσου πόλις), a town in Phrygia, belonging to the conventus juridicus of Apamea, founded by Attalus and Eumenes.

Dionysus (Δίονυσος: Ἐπιε Δίονυσος), the god of wine (originally a nature-god of all trees and of fruitfulness in general). He is also called both by the Greeks and Romans Bacchus (Βάκχος), that is, the god who is worshipped with loud cries, which was originally a mere epithet or surname of Dionysus, and does not occur till after the time of Herodotus. His names Evius and Sabazius are derived from the cry εὐοὶ σαβοὶ uttered by his worshippers (Dem. de Cor. p. 313, § 260); Bassaræus from the long dress, called bassara, worn by his Bacchanals, and he is called Bromius as the god of revelry. Dionysus is a deity of whom small account is made in Homeric story. It does not appear that he was known to Homer as the wine-god: he is never so spoken of; and Maron who gives the wine in Od. ix. 193 is priest of Apollo. He is named also in Od. xxiv. 74, in xi. 328 (in connexion with Naxos), and in Il. xiv. 325 as born of Semele; but the only precise account of him is in Il. vi. 133, where the 'raving' Dionysus is represented as flying in terror from Lycurgus. The earliest mention of him as the giver of wine is in Hesiod (Op. 615). The history of Dionysus as generally represented in post-Homeric literature and art, but made up of various legends of different origins and dates [see below], is as follows. Dionysus was the son of Zeus and Semele the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes. It was generally believed that when Semele was pregnant, she was persuaded by Hera, who appeared to her in disguise, to request the father of the gods to appear to her in the same glory and majesty in which he was accustomed to approach his own wife Hera. Zeus unwillingly complied, and appeared to her in thunder and lightning. Semele was terrified and overpowered by the sight, and being seized by the flames, she gave premature birth to a child. Zeus saved the child from the flames, sewed him up in his thigh, and thus preserved him till he came to maturity. (Others say that Hermes saved him.) Various epithets which are given to the god refer to that occurrence, such as πυργενής, μηροραφής, μηροτραφής, and ιγνιγονα [for the probable origin of the myth see below]. After the birth of Dionysus, Zeus entrusted him to Hermes, or, according to others, to Persephone or Rhea, who took the child to Ino and Athamas at Orchomenos, and persuaded them to bring him up as a girl. Hera was now urged on by her jealousy to throw Iuo and Athamas into a state of madness. Zeus, in order to save his child, changed him into a ram, and carried him (or Hermes carried him) to the nymphs of Mt. Nysa, who brought him up in a cave, and were afterwards rewarded by Zeus, by being placed as Hyades among the stars. Mt. Nysa, from which the god was believed to have derived his name, was in Thrace; but mountains of the same name are found in different parts of the ancient world where he was worshipped, and where he was believed to have introduced the cultivation of the vine. When he had grown up, Hera drove him mad, in which state he wandered about through various parts of the earth. In especial he made a victorious progress in the East, teaching the inhabitants of the different countries of Asia the cultivation of the vine, and introducing among them the elements of civilisation. In Euripides (Bacch. 15) his progress Eastwards does not extend further than Bactria; but, after the conquests of Alexander, legends made Bacchus also reach and subjugate India. (Diod. ii. 38; Strab. p. 505; Verg. Aen. vi. 805.) Hence he is frequently represented in works of art as drawn by tigers in triumph.

tion here given follows the lines of the Hymn. The god is alone in the ship and the sailors are already dolphins below it. On the monument of Lyciscrates there is another version. Satyrs have come to aid the god (who sits in the centre with a lion beside him); and they are binding and slaying the pirates, and driving others into the sea as dolphins. After he had thus through vicissitudes of suffering and insult established his divine nature throughout the world, he took his mother out of Hades, called her Thyone, and rose with her into Olympus. (Pind. Ol. ii. 25; Pyth. iii. 98; Diod. iii. 62, iv. 25.) This myth of his descent to the underworld and his return with his mother was much regarded in the highest and purest form of the religion of Dionysus, as symbolising future life and a triumph over death. The story was localised especially at Argos, where there was an old tradition that Dionysus had descended to Hades by the unfathomable lake Alcyonia, at Lerna (according to some accounts, having been slain by Perseus), and regained the upper world with his mother at the same spot. Hence mystic rites were celebrated annually to recall him from the grave. In a beautiful Etruscan mirror the youthful Dionysus is shown rejoining his mother in the underworld, Apollo standing by.

Dionysus drawn by tigers. (Museum Capitolinum, vol. iv. tav. 63.)

The various stories of his inflicting punishment on those who rejected him denote no doubt the resistance which the spread of his worship encountered in various countries. [See DAMASCUS; LYCURGUS; PENTHEUS.] A legend (which may have grown out of a custom among sailors of wreathing their masts at certain times with vine-leaves and ivy and clusters of grapes in honour of vintage festivals) has been a favourite subject with poets and artists in illustration of the divine power of Dionysus. He hired a ship which belonged to Tyrrhonian pirates to take him from Icaria to Naxos; but the men, instead of landing at Naxos, steered towards Asia to sell him there as a slave. Thereupon the god changed the mast and oars into serpents, and himself into a lion; ivy grew around the vessel, and the sound of flutes was heard on every side; the sailors were seized with madness, leaped into the sea, and were metamorphosed into dolphins. (Hom. Hymn. vii; Ov. Met. iii. 582; Apollod. iii. 5; Hyg. Fab. 134.) The illustra-

Origin of the Worship of Dionysus.—Herodotus (ii. 52) speaks of Dionysus as a very late addition to the Hellenic gods, and such doubtless he was under the guise familiar in Greek literature; but among the deities who had been identified with him and absorbed into his worship, were old gods of the country whose local rites gave rise to many of the legends about Dionysus himself. He represents among other attributes a nature-god of fruitfulness, and reproduction of all trees and vegetation, and this from a period before the vine, afterwards his chief gift, had been introduced into Greece. The deity was a tree spirit, or a spirit of any other vegetable product of the earth, and either the tree itself or some animal regarded in any locality as the incarnation of the vegetation, became sacred and received sacrifices—in earlier times, even human sacrifices. It is thus not easy to say when the more savage part of the ritual of Dionysus was a remnant of primitive Greek worship, and when it was Thracian or Oriental. Of this early Greek deity into Greece—spread through Thessaly to Delphi. At Delphi the worship of Dionysus and his oracle there were older than that of Apollo. As deity of the vegetation of the earth, of its death and reproduction, Dionysus was one of the χθόνιοι θεοί, and possessed the oracular powers which were attributed from primitive of trees and vegetation incorporated into the worship of Dionysus, we have the survival in Διόνυσος δένδριτης, or ἐνδένδρος (Plut. Symp. v. 1), Δ. σικελτης (Athen. p. 78), Δ. ἄνθιος (Paus. i. 31, 2); and in archaic art the god is represented as a rude image, half tree and half human. The new religion of Dionysus, which absorbed these old beliefs and rites, and took their place alike in the higher mysteries and in peasant festivals, was derived in the first instance from the Thracians. Herodotus speaks of the three chief divinities of Thrace as Dionysus, Ares, and Artemis (= Bendis). The Thracians were notable for their strong belief in a future life and immortality. Herodotus (iv. 94) describes the fashion among the Getae of sending messages to their god by tossing one of their tribesmen upon spears, that so he might journey to the other world. This god, named Zalmaxis, seems to be the same as Sabazius (= Dionysus), who was worshipped both in Thrace and in Phrygia with orgiastic rites, partly Phrygian and influenced by the ritual of Cybele, and partly Thracian, since the two races were of the same origin and there was a near connexion in their sacred rites. In Thrace, as in Phrygia, was an early home of Dionysus; and it is probable that the orgiastic dances, with cymbals and drums, of Bacchant women, variously called Maenades, Thyiades, or Clodones, was originally an incantation to wake and recall the sleeping god of vegetation in the spring time, a custom traceable in many other nations. From Thrace the worship of Dionysus—perhaps simultaneously with the introduction of the vine, which seems to have come from Asia Minor through Thrace times to earth-spirits. There is a conflict of tradition as to the claims of Poseidon, Dionysus, and Ge-Themis, to be the predecessors of Apollo in this oracle; but there is in truth no reason why all three should not have been in their various periods so regarded. The position occupied by Dionysus after the worship of Apollo gained the supremacy rather seems to imply that he was the immediate predecessor, and that he retained much of his old power there by a sort of compromise (as indeed may be indicated by the account of the battle of Apollo with the Python and its results); for, though Apollo became the great Delphic god, sole possessor of the oracle, and reigning at Delphi for nine out of the twelve months, yet Dionysus held a place only second to him. It is probable that the orgiastic worship of Dionysus, with its midnight torch-revels on the mountains of Thrace, of Parnassus and of Cithaeron, was in Boeotia, as at Delphi, handed on from Thrace, though it is possible that it may have reached Thebes from the islands. By whichever route it arrived, it found at Thebes the local story of the birth of the earth-deity, who became thereafter identified with Dionysus. That it was not established without a struggle and a victory over an older cult is shown in the story of PENTHEUS. The theory of Bachofen is probably right as to the origin of the strange legend regarding the birth of Dionysus from the thigh of Zeus: that it is an expression in myth for the couvade among primitive tribes; i.e. the custom of asserting the paternity of the father by pretending that the birth-pangs affected him chiefly; so that in this Greek myth the struggle between the two systems of kindred and descent, the maternal and the paternal, may be traced. (Cf. Aesch. Eum. 183, 253; Dict. of Ant. art. Matrimonium.) More important still from its effect on literature as well as on religion is the introduction of this worship into Attica. The mention in legend of the northern demes Eleutherae and Icaria as the first seats of the cultivation of the vine and the worship of its god indicate that the introduction was from Boeotia. The myth (which is related under ICARUS) seems to have arisen in explanation of the rituals of the ascotiasmus, or peasant dance on the wine-skins, and the swinging images by which the god of trees was propitiated [cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Oscilla]. Dionysus so worshipped was especially the peasant god, and the simpler rites were preserved in the wine-feasts of the rural Dionysia. [Dict. of Ant. s.v.] The really important result was that from the custom of representing in sacred choruses the history of the god, as a benefactor of mankind who through insults and sufferings gained his victory over all Greek lands, the Attic Tragedy was developed as a national act of worship to the god [Dict. of Ant. art. Tragoedia]. The mysteries in the worship of Dionysus were partly due to the Orphic rites from Thracian and Phrygian cult, but were probably more directly derived from the Cretan worship of Dionysus-Zagreus. The mythical story tells that this deity was born from Zeus (in the form of a snake) and Persephone; that from the jealousy of Hera he was torn in pieces by the Titans, after he had in vain assumed many shapes, and lastly that of a bull, to escape them. His mangled body was buried at Delphi, but Athene gave the heart to Zeus, who swallowed it and brought forth the new Dionysus, named Iacchus, who was nursed by nymphs and satyrs, and swung in the winnowing basket as a cradle, the 'mystica vannus' of Iacchus. The story (nearly akin to the Egyptian myth of OSIRIS, whom the Greeks identified with Dionysus) is a myth in the first place of the death in winter and renewal in spring of the vegetation; and the swinging of the basket was the ritual by which in early times it was sought to rouse the plant-life from its sleep; and in the second place it expressed the belief in a death and a resurrection: for both these reasons Iacchus (or Dionysus) was associated with Demeter and Core (or Persephone) in the mysteries. The notoriety of the evils resulting from the worst festivals of Dionysus, and the evil repents of the Bacchanalia, have tended to obscure the purer and more elevating part of the religion, but it is important not to forget it. The rending of Dionysus-Zagreus cannot be dismissed as merely the crushing of the grape, like the John Barley-corn of English ballad: it is rather the tearing of the victims in savage sacrifices, possibly in totem sacrifices; and in such sacrifices the deity, or the sacred animal (at one time a human sacrifice), was often slain, and the eating of the slaughtered victim was supposed to give to the worshippers some of the strength and power of the deity. Out of some such ritual the story of the death of Zagreus probably arose. The rites spread westwards from Crete through the islands, and so reached Athens (Diod. v. 74). Hence perhaps the savage worship of Dionysus ἀμνηστής (cater of raw flesh) at Lesbos, Chios, and Tenedos, betokening human sacrifice to the god of vines in early times, though it may as probably have been derived from Thrace or Phrygia: for the frantic worship of the Thracian or the Boeotian thiasus had the same characteristics. At Naxos his rites were less barbarous, and that island, which claimed also to be the birthplace of the god, seems to have passed on some of the ritual, including the marriage of Dionysus, to Athens. [See ARIADNE.] Dionysus, or Bacchus, was introduced into the Roman worship through Magna Graecia and Etruria, and with all the worst features of the rites [Dict. of Ant. art. Bacchanalia], and the name and story of Bacchus took the place of the native Italian deity of the vintage. [See under LIBER.] The animals specially sacred to Dionysus and sacrificed to him were the bull and the goat. The bull held this place as signifying might and strength in generation (possibly also, as some think, a relic of totemism), and in some way identified with him, so that Dionysus is called βοῦκερας, or, 'aureo cornu decorus,' and appears on coins in the shape of a bull. The ram or the goat was sacrificed to him for the same reason, as signifying to the herdsmen fertility, though poets gave as a cause the story that the goat had eaten the vine. (Anth. Pal. ix. 75; Ov. Fast. i. 357; Verg. Georg. ii. 380.) The serpent was sacred to him as being one of the χθόνιοι θεοί, or gods of the earth and of the underworld. In primitive art Dionysus was worshipped under the rude emblem of the phallus, or as a figure partly tree partly man. In more advanced art he was represented as a bearded man, often of dignified appearance, fully clothed in the long tunic, and crowned with ivy or vine, often with the thyrsus in his hand; and this type reappears in late Hellenic and in Roman art. But the type which predominated from Praxiteles onwards, was that of a youth, or young man, a soft and almost feminine shape, with a languid expression, naked, or clad only with a fawn-skin, and crowned with ivy or vine leaves: common, too is the representation of the infant Bacchus

[See cut under PRAXITELES.] In many reliefs and pictures he has his attendant troops of satyrs and nymphs, and is sometimes drawn by tigers or panthers in allusion to his Indian conquests. In the scene engraved below, representing Dionysus as the guest of a mortal

Diophānes (Διοφάνης). 1. Of Mytilene, a distinguished Greek rhetorician, came to Rome, where he instructed Tib. Gracchus and became his intimate friend. After the murder of Gracchus, Diophanes was also put to death. (Cic. Brut. 27, 104; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 8, 20).—2. Of Nicaea, in Bithynia, in the first century B.C., abridged the agricultural work of Cassius Dionysius for king Deiotarus (Varr. R. R. i. 1, 10).

Diophantus (Διοφάντος). 1. An Attic orator and contemporary of Demosthenes, with whom he opposed the Macedonian party (Dem. F. L. p. 436, § 297). 2.—Of Alexandria, a Greek writer on Algebra. His period is unknown: but he probably ought not to be placed before the end of the fifth century of our era. He wrote Arithmetica, in thirteen books, of which only six are extant, and one book, De Multangulis Numeris, on polygonal numbers. These books contain a system of reasoning on numbers by the aid of general symbols, and with some use of symbols of operator; it treats of the solution of algebraic equations, determinate and indeterminate, simple, quadratic or cubic, with one unknown [see Dict. of Ant. art. Arithmetica]. Edition by Bachet, 1621; in German by Schulz, 1821.

Diopithes (Διοπιθης). 1. A half-fanatic, half-impostor, who made at Athens an apparently thriving trade of oracles: he was much satirised by the comic poets (*Aristoph. The latter sent a letter of remonstrance to Athens and Diopithes was arraigned by the Macedonian party, but was defended by Demosthenes in the oration, still extant, on the Chersonese, B. Dioscūri (Διόσκουροι: later Διόσκουροι)—that is, sons of Zeus—the well-known heroes, Castor (Κάστωρ) and Pollux or Polydeuces (Πολυδεύκης). The two brothers were sometimes called Castōres by the Romans.—According to Homer, they were the sons of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedaemon, and consequently brothers of Helen (Il. iii. 236; Od. xi. 298). Hence they are often called by the patronymic Tyndaridae. But in later tradition they are sons of Zeus (Hes. ap. Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 150; Hom. Hymn. 16; Pind. Pyth. xi. 94; Eur. Or. 1689; Theocr. xxii. 1): in Homer, too, Helen is the daughter of Zeus (Il. iii. 426). It is only in late tradition that they, like Helen, are born from an egg. Castor was famous for his skill in taming and managing horses, and Pollux for his skill in boxing. Both had disappeared from the earth before the Greeks went against Troy. Although they were buried, says Homer, yet they came to life every other day, and they enjoyed honours like those of the gods.—According to another story again, Pollux and Helen only were children of Zeus, and Castor was the son of Tyndareus. Hence Pollux was immortal, while Castor was subject to old age and death like every other mortal. (Apollod. iii. 10; Hyg. Fab. 77; cf. Pind. Nem. x. 80; Theocr. xxiv. 130.) They were born, according to different traditions, at different places, such as Amyclae, Mount Taygetus, or in a small island near Pephnos (Paus. iii. 26, 2).—The fabulous life of the Dioscuri is marked by three great events. 1. Their expedition against Athens. Theseus had carried off their sister Helen from Sparta, and kept her in confinement at Aphidnae, under the superintendence of his mother Aethra. While Theseus was absent from Attica, the Dioscuri marched into Attica, and ravaged the country round the city. Academus revealed to them that Helen was kept at Aphidnae: the Dioscuri took the place by assault, carried away their sister Helen, and made Aethra their prisoner. (Plut. Thes. 41; Apollod. l. c.; Paus. i. 41, 4; Hdt. ix. 73.) 2. Their part in the expedition of the Argonauts, as they had before taken part in the Calydonian hunt. During the voyage of the Argonauts, it once happened that when the heroes were detained by a vehement storm, and Orpheus prayed to the Samothracian gods, the storm suddenly subsided, and stars appeared on the heads of the Dioscuri. On their arrival in the country of the Bebryces, Pollux fought against Amycus, the gigantic son of Poseidon, and conquered him. During the Argonautic expedition they founded the town of Dioscurias. This myth indicates the connexion of the Dioscuri with Orphic tradition, and with the Cabiri, whose name is joined with theirs in some inscriptions, and who are similarly saviours from shipwreck. [CABIRI; Diet. of Ant. art. Cabiri.] 3. Their battle with the sons of Aphareus. Once the Dioscuri, in conjunction with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus, had carried away a herd of oxen from Arcadia. Idas appropriated the herd to himself, and drove it to his home in Messene. The Dioscuri then invaded Messene, drove away the cattle of which they had been deprived, and much more in addition. Hence arose a war between the Dioscuri and the sons of Aphareus, which was carried on in Messene or Laconia. Castor, the mortal, fell by the hands of Idas, but Pollux slew Lynceus, and Zeus killed Idas by a flash of lightning. Pollux then returned to his brother, whom he found breathing his last, and he prayed to Zeus to be permitted to die with him. Zeus gave him the option, either to live as his immortal son in Olympus, or to share his brother's fate and to live alternately one day under the earth, and the other in the heavenly abodes of the gods. (Pind. Nem. x. 60; Apollod. iii. 11; Tsetz. ad Lyc.) A variation of the story makes the quarrel arise about the daughters of Lycippus, Phoebe and Hilaira, whom the brothers had carried off. They were therefore attacked by Idas and Lynceus, to whom the maidens were betrothed. (Theocr. xxii. 137; Ov. Fast. v. 699.) According to yet another form of the story, Zeus rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini (Hyg. Poët. Astr. ii. 22). These heroic youths received divine honours. Laconia was apparently the earliest home of their worship: at Sparta, Amyclae, and Therapne they were specially honoured, with war-dances and games (Paus. iii. 13, 14, 19, iv. 27): but the Messenians also claimed them as gods of their country (Paus. iii. 26). From the Peloponnese their worship naturally spread to the Greek colonies in Sicily and Magna Graecia. Their principal characteristic was that of θεοὶ σωτῆρες—that is, mighty helpers of man—whence they were sometimes called ἀνακτες or ἀνακτες: and under this name especially (which belonged to the Cabiri) they were worshipped at Athens, where they had a temple called ἀνάκειον, on the northern slope of the Acropolis (Paus. i. 18; Dem. c. Steph. I. p. 1125, § 81). They were worshipped more especially as the protectors of travellers by sea, and their stars appeared above the ship as a sure sign of help (Callim. Lav. Pall. 24; Hor. Od. i. 3, 2; i. 12, 27): a myth which is with much probability derived from the phenomenon 'St. Elmo's Fire.' Twin deities and twin heroes are common in all mythology: it is possibly right to find, as some writers do, an origin for the Dioscuri in Indian religion. However that may be, they seem to have been twin gods of light, and therefore on white horses (Pind. Pyth. i. 126); but they were gods of the underworld as well as of the heaven, and presided over changes from darkness to light, and from death to life. Hence, perhaps, their general character of saviours invoked in battle and in shipwreck. They were also the deities especially invited as guests at the Theoxenia [Diet.

of Ant. s.v.]. On a vase from Camirus now in the British Museum, they are represented as coming to such a feast; and stories are told of punishments inflicted upon the inhospitable, and rewards for kindly reception (Hdt. vi. 127; Paus. iii. 16). The archaic symbols of the twin gods were two beams (δόκανα, Plut. de Am. Fr. i. p. 36), two amphorae, often entwined with snakes, or two stars; and on coins the stars often appear above the two horsemen. Their distinctive dress was the chlamys and the conical cap (πίλος) which, however, does not seem to have belonged to them earlier than the third century B. C., when it begins to appear on coins. On earlier representations they are bare-headed, or wear the petasus. This conical cap was Spartan (Thuc. iv. 3), but it does not appear why the Dioscuri received it so late, unless it be that it was transferred to them from the Cabiri. The explanation attempted was that it represented half an egg (Lucian, Dial. Dcor. 26). Respecting their festivals, see Dict. of Ant., arts. Anaceia, Dioscuria. Their usual representation in works of art is that of two youthful horsemen with the egg-shaped helmets or caps, crowned with stars, and with spears in their hands.—At Rome the worship of the Dioscuri was introduced at an early time. It had passed no doubt from Tarentum to other parts of Italy, notably to Etruria, where the Dioscuri are represented with the Cabiri on mirrors. Tusculum had become a special site of their worship: hence in the battle of Regillus the dictator, A. Postumius, following the custom of invoking the enemies' gods, during the battle vowed a temple to them. It was erected in the Forum, on the spot where they had been seen after the battle, opposite the temple of Vesta. It was consecrated on the 15th of July, the anniversary of the battle of Regillus. Similar aid had been given to the Locrians, at the battle of Sagra, and was afterwards given at the battle of Pydna, and again against the Cimbri (Cic. N. D. ii. 2, 6, iii. 5, 11; Plut. Mar. 26). The equites regarded the Dioscuri as their patrons. From the year B. C. 305, the equites went every year, on the 15th of July, at the transvectio equitum, in a magnificent procession on horseback, from the temple of Mars through the main streets of the city, across the Forum, and by the temple of Castor and Pollux. Diphilus (Δίφιλος), one of the principal Athenian comic poets of the New Comedy, a contemporary of Menander and Philemon, was a native of Sinope. He is said to have exhibited 100 plays. Though, in point of time, Diphilus belonged to the New Comedy, his poetry seems to have had more of the character of the Middle. This is shown, among other indications, by the frequency with which he chose mythological subjects for his plays, and by his bringing on the stage the poets Archilochus, Hipponax, and Sappho. The Roman comic poets borrowed largely from Diphilus. The Casina of Plautus is a translation of his Κληροῦμενοι. His Συναποθνήσκοντες was translated by Plautus in the lost play of the Commorientes, and was partly followed by Terence in his Adelphi. The Rudens of Plautus is also a translation of a play of Diphilus, but the title of the Greek play is not known. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Gr.)

Dipoenus and Scyllis (Δίποινος καὶ Σκύλλης), very ancient Greek sculptors, who are always mentioned together, flourished about B. C. 560. They were natives of Crete, whence they went to Sicily, which was for a long time the chief seat of Grecian art. Their disciples were Tectæus and Angelion, Learchus of Rhegium, Doryclidas and his brother Medon, Dontas, and Theocles, who were all four Lacedæmonians. Dipoenus and Scyllis are sometimes called sons of Daedalus, by which we are only to understand that they belonged to the archaic 'Daedalian' style of art. Divitiacus, an Aeduan noble and brother of Dumnorix, was a warm adherent of the Romans and of Caesar, who, in consideration of his entreaties, pardoned the treason of Dumnorix in B. C. 58. In the same year he took the most prominent part among the Gallic chiefs in requesting Caesar's aid against Ariovistus; he had Dōdōna (Δωδώνη), the most ancient oracle in Greece, was situated in Epirus, in the valley of the Tcharacovitza about eleven miles SW. of the town and lake of Janina (the ancient L. Pambotis). This site was established in 1876 by M. Carapanos, who excavated the foundations of the temple and its enclosure, and found numerous inscribed votive tablets. The place agrees with Hesiod's description of it as a land of cornfields and pastures (Hes. ap. Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 1167). The oracle was founded by the Pelasgians, and was dedicated to Zeus. The responses of the oracle were given from lofty oaks or beech trees, probably from a grove consisting of these trees. The will of the god was declared by the wind rustling through the trees; and in order to render the sounds more distinct, brazen vessels were suspended on the branches of the trees, which being set in motion by the wind came in contact with one another. These sounds were in early times interpreted by men, but afterwards, when the worship of Dione became connected with that of Zeus, by two or three aged women, who were called πλειάδες or πλειαι, because pigeons were said to have brought the command to found the oracle. There were, however, also priests, called Selli or Helli, who had the management of the temple. (Il. xvi. 233; Od. xiv. 327, xix. 296; Hdt. ii. 52; Dem. Meid. p. 531, § 53, F. L. p. 437, § 299; Strab. pp. 329, 402; Paus. x. 12, 5; Plat. Phaedr. p. 244 B.) The oracle of Dodona had less influence in historical times than in the heroic age. It was chiefly consulted by the neighbouring tribes, the Aetolians, Acarnanians, and Epirots, and by those who would not go to Delphi on account of its partiality for the Dorians. In B.C. 219, the temple was destroyed by the Aetolians, and the sacred oaks cut down. But the town continued to exist, and we hear of a bishop of Dodona in the council of Ephesus. [Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.] In Il. ii. 750 a Thessalian Dodona is mentioned.

Dolābella, Cornēlius. 1. P., consul B.C. 283, conquered the Senones (Eutrop. ii. 6; Appian, Gall. 11).—2. Cn., curule aedile 165, in which year he and his colleague, Sex. Julius Caesar, had the Heeyra of Terence performed at the festival of the Megalesia. In 159 he was consul (Liv. xl. 42, xli. 5).—3. Cn., a partisan of Sulla, by whom he was made consul, 81. He afterwards received Macedonia for his province. In 77 he was accused by the young Julius Caesar of having been guilty of extortion in his province, but he was acquitted. (Plut. Sull. 28; Appian, B. C. i. 100; Suet. Jul. 49, 55).—4. Cn., praetor urbanus 81, when the cause of P. Quintius was tried; Cicero charges him with having acted on that occasion unjustly. The year after he had Cilicia for his province; C. Malleolus was his quaestor, and the notorious Verres his legate. Dolabella not only tolerated the extortions and robberies committed by them, but shared in their booty. On his return to Rome, Dolabella was accused by M. Aemilius Scaurus of extortion in his province, and on that occasion Verres deserted his accomplice and furnished the accuser with all the necessary information. Dolabella was condemned, and went into exile. (Cic. pro Quint. 2, 8; in Verr. i. 4, 15, 17, 29).—5. P., the son-in-law of Cicero, whose daughter, Tullia, he married after divorcing his wife, Fabia, 51. He was one of the most profligate men of his age, and his conduct caused Cicero great uneasiness. On the breaking out of the Civil war he joined Caesar and fought on his side at the battle of Pharsalia (48), in Africa (46), and in Spain (45). Caesar raised him to the consulship in 44, notwithstanding the opposition of Antony. After the murder of Caesar, he forthwith joined the assassins of his benefactor; but when Antony gave him the province of Syria, with the command against the Parthians, all his republican enthusiasm disappeared at once. On his way to his province he plundered the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, and at Smyrna he murdered Trebouius, who had been appointed by the senate proconsul of Asia. When his proceedings became known at Rome, he was declared a public enemy; and Cassius, who had received Syria from the senate, marched against him. Dolabella threw himself into Laodicæa, which was besieged by Cassius, who at length succeeded in taking it. Dolabella, in order not to fall into the hands of his enemies, ordered one of his soldiers to kill him, 43. (Index to Cicero; Dio Cass. xli. 40, xlii. 29, xliii. 51, xlv. 22, xlvii. 29; Appian, B. C. iii. 3, 7–26.)

Dolichē (Δολιχῆ). 1. The ancient name of the island ICARUS.—2. A town in Thessaly on the W. slope of Olympus (Pol. xxviii. 11; Liv. xlii. 53).—3. A town in Commagene, between Zeugma and Germanicia, also called Dolichene, celebrated for the worship of Jupiter Dolichenus, which seems to have been brought to Rome by Syrian artisans in the second century A.D. (C.I.L. iii. 1201, ix. 948).—4. Or Dulichium. [ECHINADES.]

Dolichistē (Δολιχίστη: Kakava), an island off the coast of Lycia, opposite the promontory Chimaera (Ptol. v. 3).

Doliōnes (Δολιῶνες), a Pelasgic people in Mysia, who dwelt between the rivers Aesepus and Rhyndacus, near Cyzicus, which was called after them Doliōnis (Strab. p. 575).

Dōlōn (Δόλων), a Trojan, sent by night to spy the Grecian camp, was taken prisoner by Odysseus and Diomedes, compelled to give intelligence respecting the Trojans, and then slain by Diomedes. The tenth book of the Iliad was therefore called Δολώνεια or Δολωνοφορία.

Dolonci (Δολογκοι), a Thracian people in the Thracian Chersonesus.

Dolōpes (Δόλοπες), a powerful people in Thessaly, dwelt on the Enipeus, and fought before Troy (Hom. Il. ix. 484). At a later time they dwelt at the foot of Mt. Pindus; and their country, called Dolopia (Δολοπία), was reckoned part of Epirus. [THESSALIA.]

Domitia. 1. Sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus [AHENOBARBUS, No. 10], and consequently an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was the wife of Crispus Passienus, and was murdered in her old age by Nero, who wished to get possession of her property.—2. Lepida, sister of the preceding, wife of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, and mother of Messalina, was put to death by Claudius at the instigation of Agrippina.—3. Longina, daughter of Domitius Corbulo was first married to L. Lamia Aemilianus, and afterwards to the emperor Domitian. In consequence of her adulterous intercourse with Paris, an actor, Domitian repudiated her, but was afterwards reconciled to her. She was privy to Domitian's murder.

Domitia Gens, plebeian, was divided into the two illustrious families of AHENOBARBUS and CALVINUS.

Domitianus, or with his full name, T. Flavius Domitianus Augustus, Roman emperor A.D. 81-96, was the younger son of Vespasian and was born at Rome, A.D. 51. When Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the E. (69), Domitian, who was then at Rome, narrowly escaped being murdered by Vitellius, and concealed himself until the victory of his father's party was decided. After the fall of Vitellius, Domitian was proclaimed Caesar, and obtained the government of the city till the return of his father. In this short time he gave full proofs of his sanguinary and licentious temper. Vespasian entrusted Domitian with no public affairs, and during the ten years of his reign (69-79), he lived as a private person on an estate near the Alban Mount, surrounded by a number of courtesans, and devoting a great part of his time to the composition of poetry and the recitation of his productions. During the reign of his brother Titus (79-81), he was also not allowed to take any part in public affairs. On the death of Titus (81), which was in all probability the work of Domitian, he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. During the first few years of his reign he kept a strict superintendence over the governors of provinces, enacted several useful laws, endeavoured to correct the licentious conduct of the higher classes; and though he indulged his own passions, his government was much better than had been expected. But his conduct was soon changed for the worse. His wars were mostly unfortunate; and his want of success both wounded his vanity and excited his fears, and thus led him to delight in the misfortunes and sufferings of others. In 83 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which was attended with no result, though on his return to Rome in the following year, he celebrated a triumph, and assumed the name of Germanicus. In 85 Agricola, whose success and merits excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome. [AGRICOLA.] From 86 to 90 he had to carry on war with Decebalus and the Dacians, who defeated the Roman armies, and at length compelled Domitian to purchase peace on very humiliating terms. [DECEBALUS.] It was after the Dacian war especially that he gave full sway to his cruelty and tyranny. No man of distinction was safe unless he would degrade himself to flatter the tyrant. The silent fear which prevailed in Rome and Italy during the latter years of Domitian's reign are briefly but forcibly described by Tacitus in the introduction to his Life of Agricola, and his vices and tyranny are exposed in the strongest colours by the withering satire of Juvenal. All the philosophers who lived at Rome were expelled. Christian writers attribute to him a persecution of the Christians likewise, but there is some doubt upon the matter; and the belief seems to have arisen from the strictness with which he exacted the tribute from the Jews, and which may have caused much suffering to the Christians also. Many conspiracies had been formed against his life, and at length three officers of his court assisted by Domitia, the emperor's wife, had him murdered by Stephanus, a freedman, on the 18th of September, 96. (Tac. Hist. iii., iv., Agric. 39-45; Suet. Dom.; Dio Cass. lvi., lvii.; Juvenal.)

Domitilla, Flāvīa. 1. The first wife of Vespasian, and mother of Titus, Domitian, and Domitilla.—2. Daughter of Vespasian, married to her cousin Flavius Clemens, and condemned with him on a charge of 'atheism' and 'Judaizing'—that is, Christianity (Suet. Dom. 18; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 14). Her tomb exists in the catacombs at Rome—'Coemiterium Domitillae.' [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr. art Domitilla.]

Domitius Afer. [AFER.]

Domitius Corbulo. [CORBULO.]

Domitius Marsus. [MARSUS.]

Domitius Ulpianus. [ULPIANUS.]

Domna, Julia, of Emesa, was born of humble parents, and married the emperor Septimius Severus, when he was in a private station. She was beautiful and profligate, but at the same time gifted with strong powers of mind, and fond of literature and of the society of literary men. She had great influence over her husband, and after his death was entrusted by her son Caracalla with the administration of the most important affairs of state. After the murder of Caracalla, she was at first kindly treated by Macrinus; but having incurred the suspicions of Macrinus, and being commanded to quit Antioch, she put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation, A.D. 217. (Vit. Sept. Sever., Caracall., and Macrin.; Dio Cass. lxxiv. 3, lxxv. 15, lxxvii. 2-18, lxxviii. 23.)

Donatus, Aelius. 1. A celebrated grammarian, who taught at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, and was the preceptor of Saint Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin Grammar, which has formed the groundwork of most elementary treatises upon the same subject, from his own time to the present day. It has been usually published in the form of two separate tracts: 1. Ars s. Editio Prima, de literis, syllabis, pedibus, et tonis; 2. Editio Secunda, de octo partibus orationis; to which are commonly annexed De barbarismo, De solecismo, De ceteris vitiis; De metaplasmis; De schematibus; De tropis; but in the edition of Lindemann (in Corpus Gramm. Latin. Lips. 1831) these are all combined under one general title, Donati Ars Grammatica tribus libris comprehensa. We also possess introductions (enarrationes) and scholia, by Donatus, to five out of the six plays of Terence, those to the Heautontimorumenos having been lost. Ed. by Reifferscheid, 1860. Donatus was also the author of a commentary on the Georgics and Aeneid, often quoted by Servius, but with no approbation. The preface and introduction are extant (ed. E. Wölfflin). [The Life of Virgil prefixed to the commentary of Donatus was chiefly derived from Suetonius, De Vir. illustr., whose materials were furnished by Asconius, L. Varius, and Melissus. It is of great value, though it has many mediaeval interpolations.]—2. Tiberius Claudius Donatus, towards the end of the fourth century was the author of a commentary on the Aeneid which survives, but is of small value. Ed. by Reifferscheid, 1860.

Donūsa or Donūsia (Δονουσία: Δονούσιος: Stenosa), one of the smaller Sporades in the Aegæan sea, S. of Naxos, subject to the Rhodians in early times. It produced green marble, whence Virgil (Aen. iii. 125) calls the island viridis. Under the emperors it was used as a place of banishment (Tac. Ann. iv. 30).

Dōra, Dōrus, Dōrum (τὰ Δῶρα, Δῶρος: Δωρίτης), called Dor in the O. T., the most southerly town of Phoenicia on the coast, on a kind of peninsula at the foot of Mt. Carmel. Under the Selucidæ it was a strong fortress, and was included in Coele-Syria. It subsequently fell into decay, but was restored and again made a fortified place by the Roman general Gabinius. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 4, 4.)

Dōrieus (Δωριεύς). 1. Eldest son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, by his first wife, was, however, born after the son of the second marriage, Cleomenes, and therefore excluded from the immediate succession. [ANAXANDRIDES.] On the accession of Cleomenes to the throne, Dorieus left Sparta to establish for himself a kingdom elsewhere. He led his colony first to Libya; but, driven away thence, he passed over to Eryx in Sicily, where he fell in a battle with the Egætaeans and Carthaginians, about B.C. 508. (Hdt. v. 41-66; Diod. iv. 23; Paus. iii. 16, 4.)—2. Son of Diagoras of Rhodes [DIAGORAS], was celebrated for his victories in all the great Grecian games. He settled in Thurii, and from this place, after the defeat of the Athenians at Syracuse, he led thirty galleys to the aid of the Spartan cause in Greece, B.C. 412. He continued to take an active part in the war till 407, when he was captured by the Athenians; but the people, in admiration of his size and beauty, dismissed him without a ransom. He is said at a later time to have been put to death by the Spartans. (Thuc. viii. 35, 44; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 5.)

Dorimachus (Δορίμαχος), a native of Trichonium in Aetolia, led a band of freebooters to plunder Messenia in B.C. 221, and fought against that country during the two following years. In 220 he was chosen general of the Aetolians, and in an invasion of Epirus destroyed the temple of Dodona. In 211 he made a treaty with the Romans against Philip. (Pol. iv. 3-19, v. 1-17, ix. 42, xviii. 37; Liv. xxvi. 24.)

Dōris (Δωρίς). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, wife of her brother Nereus, and mother of the Nereides. The Latin poets sometimes use the name of this divinity for the sea itself. (Verg. Eclog. x. 5.)—2. One of the Nereides, daughter of the preceding.

Dōris (Δῶρις). 1. A small and mountainous country in Greece, formerly called Dryōpis (Δρυοπίς), was bounded by Thessaly on the N., by Aetolia on the W., by Loeris on the S., and by Phocis on the E. It contained four towns —Boum, Citinium, Erimeus, and Pindus—which formed the Dorian tetrapolis. These towns never attained any consequence, and in the time of the Romans were in ruins; but the country is of importance as the home of the Dorians (Δωριείς: Dores), one of the great Hellenic races, who claimed descent from the mythical Dorus. [Dorus.] The Dorians, however, had not always dwelt in this land. Herodotus relates (i. 56), that they first inhabited Phthiotis in the time of Deucalion; that next, under Dorus, they inhabited Histiaeotis at the foot of Ossa and Olympus; that, expelled from thence by the Cadmeans, they settled on Mt. Pindus; and that they subsequently took up their abode in Dryopis, afterwards called Doris. Their fifth and last migration was to Peloponnesus, which they conquered, according to tradition, eighty years after the Trojan war. It was related that Aegimius, the king of the Dorians, had been driven from his dominions by the Lapithæ, but was reinstated by Hercules; that the children of Hercules hence took refuge in this land when they had been expelled from Peloponnesus; and that it was to restore them to their rights that the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus. Accordingly, the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians is usually called the Return of the Heraclidæ, under which story probably lies the fact that the Dorians were aided by the Aetolians in the conquest of Peloponnesus. [See HERACLIDÆ.]

—The Dorians were divided into three tribes: the Hylleis (Υλλεῖς), Pamphyli (Πάμφυλοι), and Dymæus (Δυμᾶνες). The first derived their name traditionally from Hyllus, son of Hercules; the last two, from Pamphylius and Dymas, sons of Aeginius. It is probable that the name Pamphyli denoted a tribe made up of a number of scattered elements [Dict. of Ant. art. Tribus]. The Dorians were the ruling class throughout Peloponnesus; the old inhabitants were reduced to slavery, or became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Perioeci (Περιοικοί). [Dict. of Antiq. art. Perioeci.]

—2. A district in Asia Minor consisting of the Dorian settlements on the coast of Caria and the neighbouring islands. Six of these towns formed a league, called the Dorian hexapolis, consisting of Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus in the island of Rhodes, the island Cos, and Cnidus and Halicarnassus on the mainland. There were also other Dorian settlements in the neighbourhood, but they were never admitted to the league. The members of the hexapolis were accustomed to celebrate a festival with games on the Triopian promontory near Cnidus, in honour of the Triopian Apollo; the prizes in those games were brazen tripods, which the victors had to dedicate in the temple of Apollo; and Halicarnassus was struck out of the league, because one of her citizens carried the tripod to his house instead of leaving it in the temple. The hexapolis thus became a pentapolis. (Hdt. i. 144.)

Doriscus (Δορίσκος), a town in Thrace at the mouth of the Hebrus, in the midst of an extensive plain of the same name, where Xerxes reviewed his vast forces (Hdt. v. 98).

Dorso, C. Fabius, greatly distinguished himself when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls, B.C. 390. The Fabian gens was accustomed to celebrate a sacrifice at a fixed time on the Quirinal hill, and accordingly, at the appointed time, C. Dorso, who was then a young man, descended from the Capitol, carrying the sacred things in his hands, passed in safety through the enemy's posts, and, after performing the sacrifice, returned in safety to the Capitol. (Liv. v. 46, 52; Val. Max. i. 1, 11.)

Dōrus (Δῶρος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, is described either as a son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Xuthus and Aeolus, or as a son of Apollo and Phthia, and a brother of Laodocus and Polypoetes (Hdt. i. 56; Diod. iv. 37, 58; Apollod. i. 7).

Dorylaeum (Δορύλαιον: Δορυλαεύς: Eske-Shehr), a town in Phrygia Epictetus, on the river Thymbris, with warm baths which are used at the present day; important under the Romans as the place from which the roads diverged to Pessinus, Iconium, and Apamea (Strab. p. 576; Athen. p. 43).

Dosiādas (Δωσιάδας), of Rhodes, the author of two poems in the Greek Anthology, the verses of which are so arranged that each poem presents the profile of an altar.

Dositheus (Δωσίθεος), surnamed Magister, a Greek grammarian, taught at Rome about A.D. 207. He has left behind him a work entitled 'Ερμηνεύματα, of which the first and second books contain a Greek grammar written in Latin, and Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek glossaries. The third book, which is the most important, contains translations from Latin authors into Greek, and vice versa, and has been published by Böcking, Bonn, 1832.

Dossennus Fabius, or Dorsennus, an ancient Latin comic dramatist, censured by Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 173) on account of the exaggerated buffoonery of his characters. It appears that the name Dossennus (like that of Macchus) was appropriated to one of the standard characters in the Atellan farces. Hence some have supposed that Dossennus in Horace is not the name of a real person.

Dōtium (Δῶτιον: Δωπιεύς), a town and plain in Thessaly S. of Mt. Ossa, on the lake Bobeis (Strab. pp. 61, 442).

Drabescus (Δράβησκος, also Δράβισκος), a town in Edōnis in Macedonia, on the Strymon (Thuc. i. 103, iv. 102; Strab. p. 381).

Dracānon (Δράκανον), a town and promontory in the island Icaria.

Draco (Δράκων), the author of the first written code of laws at Athens, which were called θεσμολογία, as distinguished from the νόμοι of Solon—that is to say, he adopted the customary penalties which had usually been inflicted by archons, and stereotyped them by committing them to writing; hence the severity belonged to the times rather than to the man. In this code he affixed the penalty of death to almost all crimes—to petty thefts, for instance, as well as to sacrilege and murder—which gave occasion to the remark that his laws were written not in ink, but in blood (Demades ap. Plut. Sol. 17). We are told that he himself defended this extreme harshness by saying that small offences deserved death, and that he knew no severer punishment for great ones. His legislation is placed in B.C. 621. After the legislation of Solon (594), most of the laws of Draco fell into disuse; but some of them were still in force at the end of the Peloponnesian war, as for instance the law which permitted the injured husband to slay the adulterer, if taken in the act. (Paus. ix. 36, 4; Dem. c. Aristocr. p. 637, § 54.) In fact the laws of Draco on homicide generally seem to have been incorporated in the subsequent legislation (see Dict. of Ant. art. Phonos). But a much greater importance than that of a mere codifier of criminal law is assigned to Draco in Aristotle's recently discovered 'Αθηναίων πολιτεία, where we are told that Draco was a political reformer and the author of much of the constitution hitherto ascribed to Solon: especially that he created the senate of 400, established a property qualification, and gave a more definite shape to the Ecclesia. If this passage is both genuine and authentic there is some difficulty in reconciling it with Aristotle's statements in the Politics that Draco did not meddle with the constitution. It may be that the germs of these political institutions already existed and were more clearly defined by Draco. (Aristot. Pol. ii. 12, 13 = p. 1274; Rhet. ii. 25; 'Αθ. πολ. 4; Paus. ix. 36; Plut. Sol. 17; Gell. xi. 18.)

Dracontius, Blossius Aemilius, a Christian poet of Carthage: wrote in the fifth century A.D. (1) De Laudibus Dei in three books; (2) a collection of short mythological epics; (3) an elegiac poem called Satisfactio, an apology to the Vandal king Gunthamund (A.D. 484-496) for having praised one of his enemies. His verses are framed on classical models, but are often too rhetorical. It is thought that the Orestis tragoedia, written in similar style, is also the work of Dracontius. (This is edited by Mähly, Lips. 1866.) Ed. by Bülhrens, Poët. Lat. Man.; by Von Duhm, 1873.

Drangiana (Δραγγιανή: Sedjestân), a part of Ariana, was bounded by Gedrosia, Carmania, Arachosia, and Aria. It sometimes formed a separate satrapy, but was more usually united to the satrapies either of Arachosia or of Gedrosia, or of Aria. The chief product of the country was tin: the chief river was the Erymanthus or Erymandrus (Hilmend or Hindmend). In the N. of the country dwelt the Drangae (Δράγγαι), a warlike people, from whom the province derived its name: their capital was Prophthasia. The Zarangae, Sarangae, or Darundae, who are also mentioned as inhabitants of the country, are probably only other forms of the name Drangae. The Ariaspae inhabited the S. part. [ARIASPAE.]

Draudacum (Dardassio), a fortress of the Penestae in Greek Illyria (Liv. xliii. 19).

Drāvus (Drave), a tributary of the Danube, rises in the Noric Alps near Aguntum, flows through Noricum and Pannonia; and, after receiving the Murus (Muhr), falls into the Danube E. of Mursa (Esseck) (Strab. p. 314; Plin. iii. 139).

Drēcānum (Δρέκανον) a promontory on the W. side of the island Cos.

Drepānūs, Latinus Pacātus, a friend of Ausonius, and a correspondent of Symmachus, delivered a panegyric on the emperor Theodosius, A.D. 391, after the victory of the latter over Maximus. It is the eleventh in the collection of the Panegyrici Veteres.

Drēpānum (Δρέπανον: Δρεπανεύς), that is, a sickle. 1. Also Drepāna (τὰ Δρέπανα), more rarely Drēpāne (Trapani), a seaport town in the NW. corner of Sicily, so called because the land on which it was built was in the form of a sickle. It was founded by the Carthaginian Hamilcar, at the commencement of the first Punic war, and was one of the chief naval stations of the Carthaginians; it was the attempt of Hanno to effect its relief that brought on the battle of Aegates Insulae (Pol. i. 41-51; Liv. xxviii. 41). Under the Romans it was an important commercial town. It was here that Anchises died, according to Virgil. (Cic. Verr. iv. 17; Ptol. iii. 4; Verg. Aen. iii. 707, v. 24; Dionys. i. 52.)—2. A promontory in Achaia. [RHUM.]—3. The ancient name of CORCYRA.—4. Also Drēpāne, a town in Bithynia, on the Sinus Astacenus, the birthplace of Helona, mother of Constantine the Great, in whose honour it was called Helenopolis, and made an important place. In its neighbourhood were medicinal baths, which Constantine the Great frequently used in the latter part of his life.

DrepŒa (Δρέψα, also Ἀδράφα, Δάραφα, Δράφακα: Anderab or Inderab), a town in the N.E. of Bactriana, on the frontiers of Sogdiana.

Drilæ (Δρίλαι), a brave people in Pontus, near Trapezus (Xen. Anab. v. 2, 14).

Drilon, a river in Illyricum, flows into the Adriatic near Lissus (Strab. p. 316).

Dromichaetes (Δρομικαίτης), king of the Getæ, took Lysimachus prisoner. [LYSIMACHUS.]

Drōmos Achillēus. [ACHILLEUS DROMOS.]

Druentia (Durance), a large and rapid river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps, and flows into the Rhone near Avenio (Avignon).

Drūna (Drôme), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps at M. Genève, near Briançon, and flows into the Rhone S. of Valencia (Valence) (Liv. xxi. 31; Strab. p. 203; Sil. It. iii. 478).

Drusilla. 1. Livia, mother of the emperor Tiberius and wife of Augustus. [LIVIA.]—2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married first to L. Cassius Longinus, and afterwards to M. Aemilius Lepidus; but she lived in incestuous intercourse with her brother Caligula, whose passion for her exceeded all bounds. On her death, in A.D. 38, he commanded that she should be worshipped, by the name Panthea, with the same honours as Venus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 15; Suet. Cal. 24; Dio Cass. lix. 11.)—3. Daughter of Herodes Agrippa I., king of the Jews, married first Azizus, king of Emesa, whom she divorced, and secondly Felix, the procurator of Judea. She was present when St. Paul preached before Felix in A.D. 60 (Jos. Ant. xix. 7). Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) speaks of Drusilla the wife of Felix as being grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, probably daughter of Julia. Some reconcile this with Josephus by supposing two Drusillas wives of Felix (cf. Suet. Claud. 28).

Drūsus, the name of a distinguished family of the Livia gens. It is said that one of the Livii acquired the cognomen Drusus for himself and his descendants by having slain in close combat one Drausus, a Gallic chieftain (Suet. Tib. 3).—1. M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs with C. Gracchus, B.C. 122. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and after putting his veto upon the laws proposed by Gracchus, he brought forward almost the very same measures, in order to gain popularity for the optimates. He proposed to release from rent those who received land under the law of Gracchus; to declare their allotments inalienable, and to plant twelve colonies. These laws were passed, and the people did not reelect Gracchus as tribune. The success of his measures earned for him the designation patronus senatus. Drusus was consul 112, obtained Macedonia as his province, and conquered the Scordisci. (Appian, B. C. i. 23; Plut. C. Gracch. 8–11; Liv. Ep. 63.)—2. M. Livius Drusus, son of No. 1, an eloquent orator, and a man of great energy and ability. He was tribune of the plebs, 91, in the consulship of L. Marcius Philippus and Sex. Julius Cæsar. Although, like his father, he belonged to the aristocratical party, he meditated the most extensive and organic changes in the Roman state. To relieve the people and to reform the constitution he proposed to increase the largesses of corn, to reserve all the undistributed land in Italy and Sicily for colonies of citizens, to take away the office of jurymen from the equestrian order, and lastly he pledged himself to give the Roman franchise to the Italian allies. Neither the senate nor the equites were satisfied with the judicial reform, though he tried to content the latter by proposing that 300 equites should be added to the senate. The Roman populace also were opposed to the Roman franchise being given to the Latins and the Socii, which measure, though not yet formally proposed by Drusus, was known to be intended. The senate perceiving the dissatisfaction of all parties, voted that all the laws of Drusus, being carried against the auspices, were null and void from the beginning. Shortly after, as Drusus was entering the hall of his own house, he was stabbed, and died a few hours afterwards. The assassin was never discovered, and no attempts were made to discover him. Cæpio and Philippus were both suspected of having suborned the crime; but Cicero attributes it to Q. Varius. The death of Drusus destroyed the hopes of the Socii, and was thus immediately followed by the Social war, which his policy would have averted. (Appian, B. C. i. 35; Cic. de Or. i. 25; Liv. Ep. 71; Diod. xxxvii. 10.)—3. Livius Drusus Claudianus, father of Livia, who was the mother of the emperor Tiberius. He was one of the gens Claudia, and was adopted by a Livius Drusus. It was through this adoption that the Drusi became connected with the imperial family. The father of Livia, after the death of Cæsar, espoused the cause of Brutus and Cassius, and, after the battle of Philippi (42), being proscribed by the conquerors, he killed himself in his tent.—4. Claudius Drusus Nero, commonly called by the moderns Drusus Senior, to distinguish him from No. 5, was the son of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, and younger brother of the emperor Tiberius. He was born in the house of Augustus three months after the marriage of Livia and Augustus, 38. Drusus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. His manners were affable, and his conduct without reproach. He married Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his fidelity to his wife was a theme of admiration in a profligate age. He was greatly trusted by Augustus, who employed him in important offices. He carried on the war against the Germans, and penetrated far into the interior of the country. In 15, in conjunction with Tiberius, he defeated the Rhaeti and Vindelici (Dio Cass. liv. 19–22; Hor. Od. iv. 4). In 12 he drove the Sicambri and their allies out of Gaul, crossed the Rhine, then followed the course of the river down to the ocean, and subdued the Frisians. It was apparently during this campaign that Drusus dug a canal (Fossa Drusiana) from the Rhine near Arnheim to the Yssel, near Doesberg: and he made use of this canal to sail from the Rhine into the ocean (Tac. Ann. xiii. 55, Hist. v. 19). In his second campaign (11), Drusus subdued the Usipetes, invaded the country of the Sicambri, and passed on through the territory of the Cherusci as far as the Visurgis (Weser). On his return he was attacked by the united forces of the Germans, and defeated them with great slaughter.—In his third campaign (10), he conquered the Chatti and other German tribes, and then returned to Rome, where he was made consul for the following year.—In his fourth campaign (9), which he carried on as consul, he advanced as far as the Albis (Elbe), sweeping everything before him. It is said that he had resolved to cross the Elbe, but was deterred by the apparition of a woman of dimensions greater than human, who said to him in the Latin tongue, 'Whither goest thou, insatiable Drusus? The Fates forbid thee to advance. Away! The end of thy deeds and thy life is nigh' (Dio Cass. lv. 1; Suet. Claud. 1). On the return of the army to the Rhine, Drusus died in consequence of a fracture of his leg, which happened through a fall from his horse. Upon receiving tidings of the dangerous illness of Drusus, Tiberius immediately crossed the Alps, and after travelling with extraordinary speed arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. Tiberius brought the body to Italy: it was burnt in the field of Mars, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus. (Liv. Ep. 140; Val. Max. v. 5).—5. Drusus Caesar, commonly called by modern writers Drusus Junior, was the son of the emperor Tiberius by his first wife, Vipsania. He married Livia, the sister of Germanicus. After the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, he was sent into Pannonia to quell the mutiny of the legions. In 15 he was consul, and in 16 he was sent into Illyricum: he succeeded in fomenting dissension among the Germanic tribes, and destroyed the power of Maroboduus. In 21 he was consul a second time; and in 22 he received the tribunicia potestas, by which he was pointed out as the intended successor to the empire. But Sejanus, the favourite of Tiberius, aspired to the empire. He seduced Livia, the wife of Drusus, and persuaded her to become the murderer of her husband. A poison was administered to Drusus, which terminated his life by a lingering disease, that was supposed at the time to be the consequence of intemperance, A.D. 23. (Tac. Ann. iv. 3-11; Suet. Tib. 62).—6. Drusus, second son of Germanicus and Agrippina. After the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius [No. 5], Drusus and his elder brother Nero became the heirs to the imperial throne. Sejanus therefore resolved to get rid of them both. He first engaged Drusus in the plots against his elder brother, which ended in the banishment and death of that prince. [NERO.] The turn of Drusus came next. He was accused in 30, and condemned to death as an enemy of the state. Tiberius kept him imprisoned for three years, and then starved him to death, 33. (Tac. Ann. vi. 23; Suet. Tib. 54.)

Dryades. [NYPHÆ.]

Dryas (Δρύας), father of the Thracian king Lycurus, who is hence called Dryantides.

Drymaea or Drymus (Δρυμαία, Δρυμός: Δρυμείος: Βαβα?), a town in Phocis, a little S. of the Cephissus, was destroyed by Xerxes (Hdt. viii. 33; Paus. x. 3; Liv. xxviii. 7).

Drymus (Δρυμός). 1. See DRYMAEA.—2. In Attica, on the frontiers of Boeotia.

Drymussa (Δρυμούσσα: Δρυμουσσαίως), an island in the Hermæan gulf, off the coast of Ionia, opposite Clazomenæ.

Dryopë (Δρυόπη), daughter of king Dryops, and the playmate of the Hamadryades on Mt. Oeta. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to gain possession of her, metamorphosed himself into a tortoise. Dryope took the creature into her lap, whereupon the god changed himself into a serpent. The nymphs fled away in affright, and thus Apollo remained alone with Dryope. Soon after she married Andraemon, but became, by Apollo, the mother of AMPHISSUS. Dryope was afterwards carried off by the Hamadryades, and became a nymph. (Ant. Lib. 32; Ov. Met. ix. 331.)

Dryôpes (Δρυόπες), a Pelasgic people, descended from a mythical ancestor Dryops, dwelt first in Thessaly, from the Sperchëus to Parnassus, and afterwards in Doris, which was originally called from them Dryopis (Δρυοπίς). Driven out of Doris by the Dorians, they migrated to other countries, and settled at Hermione and Asine in Peloponnesus, at Styru and Carystus in Eubœa, and in the island of Cythnus, and in Ionia; part also were established in Epirus, near Ambracia, in which district the name Dryopis remained. (Hdt. viii. 43, 46, 73; Strab. p. 373; Paus. iv. 34, v. 1; Dicaearch. v. 30.)

Dryops (Δρύοψ), son of the river-god Sperchëus and the Danaid Polydora, or of Lycaon and Dia, the daughter of Lycaon, the mythical ancestor of the Dryopes (Paus. iv. 34).

Dryos Cephälæe (Δρύος Κεφαλαί), a narrow pass of Mt. Cithæron, between Athens and Plataeæ.

Dûbis (Doubs), a river in Gaul, rises in M. Jurassus (Jura), flows past Vesontio (Besançon), and falls into the Arar (Saône) near Cabillonum (Châlons) (Strab. p. 186; Ptol. ii. 10).

Dubris Portus (Dover), a seaport town of the Cantii, in Britain: here was a fortress erected by the Romans against the Saxon pirates.

Ducas, Michael, a Byzantine historian, held a high office under Constantine XIII., the last emperor of Constantinople. After the capture of Constantinople, A.D. 1453, he fled to Lesbos. His history extends from the death of John VI. Palaeologus, 1355, to the capture of Lesbos by the Turks, 1462. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonu, 1834.

Ducëtius (Δουκέτιος), a chief of the Sicels, the native tribes in the interior of Sicily, enlarged and fortified his native town Menaenum, and afterwards founded a new city, Palice, in the plain below, near the sanctuary of the Palici. He carried on a formidable war in the middle of the fifth century B.C. against the Greeks in the island; but having been at last defeated in a great battle by the Syracusans, he repaired to Syracuse as a suppliant, and placed himself at their mercy. The Syracusans spared his life, but sent him into an honourable exile at Corinth. He returned soon afterwards to Sicily, and founded the city of Calacte. He died about B.C. 440. (Diod. xi. 76-92, xii. 8, 29.)

Dullius. 1. M., tribune of the plebs B.C. 471. He was one of the chief leaders of the plebeians, and it was on his advice that the plebeians migrated from the Aventine to the Mons Sacer, just before the overthrow of the decemvirs. He was then elected tribune of the plebs a second time, 449. (Liv. ii. 58, 61, iii. 52-64; Diod. xi. 68; Dionys. xi. 46.)—2. K., one of the decemvirs, 450, on whose overthrow he went into voluntary exile (Liv. iii. 58.)—3. C., consul 260, with Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina, in the first Punic War. In this year the Romans built their first fleet, using for their model a Carthaginian vessel which had been thrown on the coast of Italy. The command of this fleet was given to Scipio, who was defeated by the Carthaginians off Lipara. Thereupon Duilius was entrusted with the command, and as he perceived the disadvantages under which the clumsy ships of the Romans were labouring, he devised the grappling irons by means of which the enemy's ships might be drawn towards his, and the sea-fight thus changed into a land-fight. By this means he gained a brilliant victory over the Carthaginian fleet near Mylae, and then prosecuted the war in Sicily with success, relieving Egesta, and taking Macella by assault. On his return to

Columna Rostrata of Duilius. (From a copy in Museum of the Capitol.)

Rome, Duilius celebrated a splendid triumph, for it was the first naval victory that the Romans had ever gained, and the memory of it was perpetuated by a column which was erected in the forum, and adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships (Columna Rostrata). This column was dug out of the ground in the 16th century, but the inscription upon it is not of the time of Duilius. It has affected archaism side by side with later forms, and must be assigned to the 1st century A.D. It is probable that the column had no inscription, or a very brief one, and that the extant words were placed on it when it was restored by Claudius (C. I. L. i. p. 40). Duilius was further rewarded for this victory by being permitted, whenever he returned home from a banquet at night, to be accompanied by a torch and a flute-player. (Pol. i. 22 ff.; Diod. xvii. 44; Front. Strateg. iii. 2; Sil. It. vi. 667; Cic. de Sencet. 13.)

Dulgibini, a people in Germany, dwelt SE of the Angrivarii, on the W. bank of the Weser.

Dulichium. [ECHINADES.]

Dumnōrix, a chieftain of the Aedui, conspired against the Romans, B.C. 58, but was pardoned by Caesar in consequence of the entreaties of his brother, Divitiacus. When Caesar was going to Britain in 54, he suspected Dumnorix too much to leave him behind in Gaul, and he insisted upon his accompanying him. Dumnorix fled from the Roman camp with the Aeduan cavalry, but was overtaken and slain. (Caes. B. G. i. 3-20, v. 6; Dio Cass. xxxviii. 31.)

Dunium. [DUROTIGES.]

Dūra (τὰ Δούρα: Δουρηνός). 1. A town in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, not far from Circesium, founded by the Macedonians, and hence surnamed Nicanoris; also called Eurōpus (Εὐρωπός) by the Greeks. In the time of Julian it was deserted (Zos. iii. 14).—2. (Dor), a town in Assyria, on the Tigris (Pol. v. 52).

Dūrānīus (Dordogne), a river in Aquitania, falling into the Garumna (Auson. Mosell. 464).

Dūria. 1. (Dora Baltea), a river which rises on the S. side of Mt. Blanc, with an affluent which rises in the Little St. Bernard, flows through the country of the Salassi, past Augusta Praetoria (Aosta), bringing gold dust with it, and falls into the Po (Strab. pp. 203, 205). Strabo is probably correct about the gold, since mines have been worked in recent times high above the glacier which forms the principal source of this river; but on p. 203, in speaking of its origin, he confounds it with the other river of the same name.—2. (Dora Susa) rises on the Italian side of Mt. Genève, flows past Segusio (Susa), and joins the Po at Augusta Taurinorum (Turin).

Dūrius (Δούριος, Δάριος: Duero, Douro), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rises among the Pelendones, at the foot of M. Idubeda near Numantia, and flows into the Atlantic; it was auriferous, and is navigable a long way from its mouth (Strab. p. 153).

Dūrnovāria, in Britain, probably Dorchester.

Durobrivae (Rochester), a town of the Cantii in Britain.

Durocasis (Dreux), a town of the Carnutes in Gallia Lugdunensis.

Durocatalauni. [CATALAUNI.]

Durocornovium, in Britain, probably Cirencester.

Durocortorum (Rheims), the capital of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, subsequently called Remi (Caes. B. G. vi. 44).

Duronā, a town in Samnium in Italy, W. of the Caudine passes (Liv. x. 39).

Durotriges, a people in Britain, in Dorsetshire and the west of Somersetshire.

Durovernum or Darvernum (Canterbury), a town of the Cantii in Britain, afterwards called Cantuarina.

Dyardanes or Ocdanes (Brahmaputra), a river in India, falls into the Gauges on the E. side (Curt. viii. 9, 9).

Dymas (Δύμας). 1. A Phrygian king in the district of the Sangarius, father of Asius and Hecuba (Il. xvi. 717; Ov. Met. xi. 761).—2. Son of Aegimius, from whom the Dymanes, one of the three tribes of the Dorians, were believed to have derived their name (Paus. vii. 17; DORIS).

Dymē or Dymae (Δύμη, Δύμαι: Δυμαῖος, Dymaens; nr. Karavostasi, Ru.), a town in the W. of Achaia, near the coast; one of the twelve Achaean towns (Hdt. i. 145; Pol. ii. 41); it founded, along with Patrae, the second Achaean League, and was at a later time colonised by the Romans, at first as a separate colony, but afterwards subordinate to Patrae (Plin. iv. 13; Strab. p. 665; Paus. vii. 17, 3).

Dyras (Δύρας), a small river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, falls into the Sinus Malinicus.

Dyrrhachium (Δυρράχιον: Δυρράχιος, Δυρραχηνός, Dyrrachinus: Durazzo), formerly called Epidamnus (Ἐπίδαμνος: Ἐπιδάμνιος), a town in Greek Illyria, on a peninsula in the Adriatic sea. It was founded by the Corcyraeans, and received the name Epidamnus (Thuc. i. 24). The disputes regarding it between Corinth and Corcyra were one of the causes of the Peloponnesian war. Pliny (iii. 145) says that the Romans changed the name as being ill-omened: but Dyrrhachium was probably an old name of the whole peninsula (Strab. p. 316). In 312 B.C. it fell into the hands of Glaucias, king of Illyria, and was seized by the Illyrian Monunius in B.C. 280, but not long afterwards put itself under the protection of Rome (Diod. xix. 70, 78;

Coin of Dyrrhachium.

Obv., cow suckling calf (as on coins of Corcyra); rev., ΔΥΡ (for Δυρράχιον), and the so-called 'Gardens of Alcinoüs.'

Liv. xxix. 12; Pol. ii. 11). Under the Romans it became an important place; it was the usual place of landing for persons who crossed over from Brundisium. Commerce and trade were carried on here with great activity, whence it is called Taberna Adriæ by Catullus (xxxvi. 15); and here commenced the great Egnatia Via, leading to the East. In the Civil war it was the head-quarters of Pompey, who kept all his military stores here. The Romans at first made it a free city (Appian, Illyr. 8; Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 1); and, when Augustus settled his veterans in Italy, Dyrrhachium was one of the towns in which he planted a colony of the dispossessed Italians (Dio Cass. li. 4). Under the later empire it became the capital of Epirus Nova. Destroyed by an earthquake A.D. 345.

Dysaules (Δυσάουλης), a deity or hero of Agriculture (his name having reference to the two ploughings of the year). In Orphic legends he is father of Triptolemus and Eubulus. [TRIPTOLEMUS.]

Dysörum (τὸ Δύσωρον), a mountain in Macedonia with gold mines, between Chalcidice and Odomantice (Hdt. v. 17).

Dyspontium (Δυσπόντιον: Δυσπόντιος: Pyrros), a town of Pisatis in Elis, N. of the Alpheus, was destroyed by the Eleans; whereupon its inhabitants removed to Epidamnus and Apollonia. (Strab. p. 357; Paus. vi. 22.)

E.

Ebōra. 1. Or Ebüra Cerealis, a small town in Hispania Baetica, perhaps in the neighbourhood of the modern Santa Cruz.—2. Surnamed Liberalitas Julia (Evora), a Roman municipium in Lusitania (Ptol. ii. 5, 8).—3. Or Ebüra (S. Lucar de Barrameda), a town in Hispania Baetica, near the mouth of the Bætis.

Eboracum or Eburacum (York), a town of the Brigantes in Britain, was made a Roman station by Agricola, and soon became the chief Roman settlement in the whole island. It was both a municipium and a colony. It was the head-quarters of the sixth legion, and the residence of the Roman emperors when they visited Britain. Here the emperors Septimius Severus and Constantius Chlorus died. Part of the ancient Roman walls still exist at York; and many Roman remains have been found in the modern city.

Eborolacum (Evreule on the river Sioule), a town in Aquitania.

Ebrodunum (Embrun), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, in the Cottian Alps (Strab. p. 179).

Ebüdæ or Hebüdæ (Hebrides), islands in the Western Ocean off Britain. They were five in number, according to Ptolemy, two called Ebudæ, Maleus, Epidium, and Ricina.

Eburomagus or Hebromagus (nr. Bram or Villerazons), a town in Gallia Narboneensis.

Eburōnes, a German people, who crossed the Rhine and settled in Gallia Belgica, between the Rhine and the Mosa (Maas) in a marshy and woody district. They were dependents (clientes) of the Treviri, and were in Caesar's time under the rule of Ambiorix and Cativolcus. Their insurrection against the Romans, B.C. 54, was severely punished by Caesar, and from this time they disappear from history. (Caes. B. G. ii. 4, vi. 34.)

Eburovices. [AULERCI.]

Ebüsus or Ebüsus (Iviza), the largest of the Pityusæ Insulæ, off the E. coast of Spain, reckoned by some writers among the Balears. It was celebrated for its excellent figs. Its capital, also called Ebusus, was a civitas foederata, possessed an excellent harbour, and carried on a considerable trade. (Strab. pp. 123, 159.)

Ecbātāna (τὰ Ἐκβάτανα, Ion. and Poët. Ἀγβάτανα: Hamadan), a great city, most pleasantly situated, near the foot of Mt. Oroutes, in the N. of Great Media, was the capital of the Median kingdom, and afterwards the summer residence of the Persian and Parthian kings. Herodotus ascribes its foundation to Deioeces, and Diodorus to Semiramis. It had a circuit of 240 stadia, and was surrounded by seven walls, each overtopping the one before it, and crowned with battlements of different colours: these walls no longer existed in the time of Polybius. The citadel, of great strength, was used as the royal treasury. Below it stood a magnificent palace, the tiles of which were silver, and the capitals, entablatures, and vainscotings, of silver and gold; treasures which the Scleucidae coined into money, to the amount of 4000 talents. The circuit of this palace was seven stadia. (Hdt. i. 98; Diod. ii. 13; Strab. pp. 522, 524.)

Ecetra (Ecetranus), an ancient town of the Volse, and, according to Dionysius, the capital of this people, was destroyed by the Romans at an early period (Liv. ii. 25, vi. 31).

Echedorus (Ἐχέδωρος, in Herod. Ἐχέδωρος), a small river in Macedonia, rises in Crestonia, flows through Mygdonia, and falls into the Thermaic gulf (Hdt. vii. 124).

Echēlidae (Ἐχελίδαί: Ἐχελίδης), an Attic demus E. of Munychia, called after a hero Echelus.

Echēmus (Ἐχεμος), son of Aëropus and grandson of Cepheus, succeeded Lycurgus as king of Arcadia. In his reign the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus, and Echēmus slew, in single combat, Ilyllus, the son of Heracles. In consequence of this battle, which was fought at the Isthmus, the Heraclidæ were obliged to promise not to repeat their attempt upon Peloponnesus for 50 years. (Hdt. ix. 26; Paus. viii. 5; Diod. iv. 58.)

Echestrātus (Ἐχέστρατος), king of Sparta, son of Agis I., and father of Labotas or Leobotes.

Echetia (Ἐχέτια), a town in Sicily, W. of Syracuse, in the mountains (Diod. xx. 32).

Echetus (Ἐχέτος), in the form of a countryman appeared in the battle of Marathon and slew many Persians with a ploughshare. An oracle directed the Athenians to honour him as a hero: represented in the Stoa Poecile. (Paus. i. 32, 4.)

Echētus (Ἐχέτος), a cruel king of Epirus. His daughter, Metope or Amphissa, who had yielded to her lover Aechmodicus, was blinded by her father, and Aechmodicus was cruelly mutilated. (Od. xviii. 85; Ap. Rhod. iv. 1091.)

Echidna (Ἐχιδνα), daughter of Tartarus and Ge, or of Chrysaor and Callirrhōē, or of Peiras and Styx (Paus. viii. 18). The upper part of her body was that of a beautiful maiden with black eyes, while the lower part was that of a serpent, of a vast size. She was a horrible and blood-thirsty monster. She became by Typhon the mother of the Chimæra, of the many-headed dog Orthus, of the hundred-headed dragon which guarded the apples of the Hesperides, of the Colchian dragon, of the Sphix, of Cerberus (hence called Lernaëus canis), of Scylla, of Gorgon, of the Lernaean Hydra (Echidna Lernaëa), of the eagle which consumed the liver of Prometheus, and of the Nemean lion. She was killed in her sleep by Argus Panoptes. (Hes. Th. 295, 306; Hyg. Fab. 151.) According to Herodotus she lived with Typhon in a cave in the country of the Arimi, but another tradition transported her to Scythia, where she became by Heracles the mother of Agathyrus, Gelonus, and Scythes. (Hdt. iv. 8-10.)

Echinādes (Ἐχινάδες or Ἐχίνας: Curzolari), small islands at the mouth of the Achelous, formed by the alluvial deposits of the river. The legend related that they were originally Nymphs, who dwelt on the mainland at the mouth of the Achelous, and that on one occasion having forgotten to present any offerings to the god Achelous, when they sacrificed to the other gods, the river-god, in wrath, tore them away from the mainland with the ground on which they were sacrificing, carried them out to sea, and formed them into islands.—The Echinades appear to have derived their name from their resemblance to the Echinus or sea-urchin.—The largest of these islands was named Dulichium (Δουλίχιον): at present united to the mainland. It is mentioned by Homer, and from it Meges, son of Phyleus, went to the Trojan war. (Il. ii. 625; Od. i. 246; Strab. p. 458.)

Echion (Ἐχίων). 1. One of the five surviving Sparti who had grown up from the dragons' teeth which Cadmus had sown. He married Agave, by whom he became the father of Pentheus: he assisted Cadmus in the building of Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 4; Ov. Met. iii. 126.)—

2. Son of Hermes, and Antianira, twin-brother of Erytus or Eurytus, with whom he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts (Pind. Pyth. iv. 179).

Echo (Ἠχώ), an Orade who, according to the legend related by Ovid, used to keep Juno engaged by incessantly talking to her, while Jupiter was sporting with the nymphs. Juno, however, found out the trick that was played upon her, and punished Echo by changing her into an oecho—that is, a being with no control over its tongue, which is neither able to speak before anybody else has spoken, nor to be silent when somebody else has spoken. Echo in this state fell desperately in love with Narcissus; but as her love was not returned, she pined away in grief, so that in the end there remained of her nothing but her voice. (Ov. Met. iii. 356-401.) In another story Echo was beloved by Pan, and, because she rejected his love, was torn in pieces by shepherds, but her voice still lived. In works of art she is sometimes represented with Pan.

Pan and the Nymph Echo. (From a lamp at Athens.)

Ephantiðes (Ἐκφαντίδης), one of the earliest poets of the Old Attic Comedy, flourished about B.C. 460. The meaning of the surname of Kanvías, which was given to him by his rivals, seems to imply a mixture of subtlety and obscurity. He ridiculed the rudeness of the old Megaric comedy, and was himself ridiculed on the same ground by Cratinus and Aristophanes. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 151.)

Edessa or Antiochia Callirrhōē (Ἐδεσσα, Ἀντιόχεια ἢ ἐπὶ Καλλιρρόῃ, or Ἄ. μισοβάρβαρος: O. T. Ur: Urfah), a very ancient city in the N. of Mesopotamia, the capital of Osroëne. It belonged to the province of Mesopotamia in the time of Trajan, and accordingly was afterwards sometimes under Roman, sometimes under Oriental, rule. [See MESOPOTAMIA.] It was made a Roman colony and a metropolis, probably by M. Aurelius, since it is so described on a coin of Commodus. It was the seat of a kingdom from B. C. 137 to A. D. 216, when the king was sometimes partially, sometimes wholly, a vassal of Rome. [ARBARUS.] It stood on the river Scirtus or Bardesanes, which often inundated and damaged the city. It was here that Caracalla was murdered. Having suffered by an earthquake in 525, the city was rebuilt by Justinian and named Justinopolis.—The Edessa of Strabo (p. 748: if the text is right) is a different place—namely, the city usually called Bambyce or Hierapolis.

Coin of Edessa in Mesopotamia.

Obv., Antoninus (Caracalla); rev., ΚΟΛ. Μ. ΕΔΕΣΣΑ, and the heads of two cities, eastern and western; below, small temple.

Edētāni or Sedētāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, E. of the Celtiberi. Their chief towns were VALENCIA, SAGUNTUM, CAESAR-AUGUSTA, and Edeta, also called Liria (Lyria). (Ptol. ii. 6; Liv. xxiv. 20; Sil. It. iii. 371.)

Edōni or Edōnes (Ἠδωνοί, Ἠδῶνες), a Thracian people, between the Nestus and the Strymon. They were celebrated for their orgiastic worship of Bacchus; whence Horace says (Od. ii. 7, 26), Non ego sanius bacchabor Edonis, and Edōnis in the Latin poets signifies a female Bacchant. The poets use Edoui as synonymous with Thracians. (Thuc. ii. 99; Hdt. v. 11; Aesch. Pers. 493; Soph. Ant. 955.)

Edētion (Ἠρῆτων), king of the Placian Thebē in Cilicia, and father of Andromache, the wife of Hector. He and his sons were slain by Achilles, when the latter took Thebes. (Il. vi. 415.)

Egelasta, a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Egēria, a goddess of fountains who, like the Camenae (also goddesses of fountains; see CAMENAE), possessed the gift of prophecy. Hence in Roman legends she was the adviser and the wife of Numa, who met her at the grove of the Camenae near the Porta Capena (Liv. i. 21; Plut. Num. 13; Juv. iii. 11). But she was specially worshipped in a sacred grove not only at Rome but also at Aricia; and her connexion with Diana Nemorensis is further shown by the fact that she was also appealed to as the goddess of childbirth. [For the characteristics of DIANA and ARTEMIS as goddesses of fountains and of childbirth, see those articles.] Hence in some versions of Numa's story he meets Egeria also at Aricia (Ov. Fast. iii. 275). Her connexion with the Camenae (as water nymphs) led to her being sometimes confounded with the Muses (Dionys. ii. 60), whose worship replaced that of the Camenae in Italy. [CAMENAE.]

Egesta. [SEGESTA.]

Egnātia (Torre d'Anazzo), a town in Apulia, on the coast, called Gnatia by Horace (Sat. i. 5, 97), who speaks of it as Lymphis (i.e. Nymphis) iratis exstructa, probably on account of its bad or deficient supply of water. It was celebrated for its miraculous stone or altar, which of itself set on fire frankincense and wood (Plin. ii. 240; Hor. Sat. i. 5, 98); a prodigy which afforded amusement to Horace and his friends, who looked upon it as a mere trick.—Egnatia owed its chief importance to being situated on the great high road from Rome to Brundisium (Strab. p. 282). This road reached the sea at Egnatia, and from this town to Brundisium it bore the name of the Via Egnatia. The continuation of this road on the other side of the Adriatic from Dyrrhachium to Byzantium also bore the name of the Via Egnatia. It was the great military road between Italy and the East. Commencing at Dyrrhachium, it passed by Lychnidus, Heraclēa, Lyncestis, Edessa, Thesalonica, Amphipolis, Philippi, and traversing the whole of Thrace, finally reached Byzantium.

Egnātii, a family of Samnite origin, some of whom settled at Teanum. 1. GELLIUS EGNATIUS, leader of the Samnites in the third Samnite war, fell in battle against the Romans, B.C. 295.—2. MARIUS EGNATIUS, one of the leaders of the Italian allies in the Social war, was killed in battle, 89.—3. M. EGNATIUS RUFUS, aedile 20 and praetor 19, was executed in the following year, in consequence of his having formed a conspiracy against the life of Augustus.—4. P. EGNATIUS CELER. [BAREA.]

Eidothea, Eileithyia, Eirene. [IDOTHEA, &c.]

Eion (Ἠῶν; Ἡῶνεῖς; Contessa or Rendina), a town in Thrace, at the mouth of the Strymon, 25 stadia from Amphipolis, of which it was the harbour. Brasidas, after obtaining possession of Amphipolis, attempted to seize Eion also, but was prevented by the arrival of Thecydides with an Athenian fleet, B. C. 424. (Thuc. iv. 102.)

Eiōnes (Ἠῴνες), a town in Argolis with a harbour, subject to Mycenae in the time of Homer, but not mentioned in later times (Il. ii. 561; Strab. p. 373).

Elaea (Ἐλαία; Kazlu), an ancient city on the coast of Aeolis in Asia Minor, said to have been founded by Mnestheus, stood twelve stadia S. of the mouth of the Caicus, and 120 stadia (or sixteen Roman miles) from Pergamum, to which city, in the time of the Pergamene kingdom, it served for a harbour (ἐπίγειον). It was destroyed by an earthquake in B. C. 90. The gulf on which it stood, which forms a part of the great Gulf of Adramyttium, was named after it Sinus Elaëticus (Ἐλαίτικὸς κόλπος, G. of Chandeli). (Strab. p. 615; Liv. xxxv. 13.)

Elaeüs (Ἐλαιούς, -οῦπος; Ἐλαιούσιος). 1. Or Elëüs (Ἐλεοῦς; Critia), a town on the SE. point of the Thracian Chersonese, with a harbour and a heroum of Protesheron (Strab. p. 593; Hdt. ix. 118; Paus. i. 34, 2).—2. (Mesolongiū), a town in Aetolia, S. of Pleuron (Pol. v. 65).—3. A town in Argolis.—4. A demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothontis.

Elagabalus, Roman emperor, A.D. 218–222, son of Julia Soemias and Varius Marcellus, was born at Emesa about 201, and was originally called VARIUS AVITUS BASSIANUS. While almost a child he became, along with his cousin Alexander Severus, priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phoenician Sun-god, to whose worship a temple was dedicated in his native city, and whose sacred image was a large black conical stone, the ancient fetish of the place. It was from this circumstance that Varius Avitus obtained the name Elagabalus, by which he is usually known. He owed his elevation to the purple to the intrigues of his grandmother Julia Maesa (sister of Julia Domna), who circulated the report that Elagabalus was the offspring of a secret commerce between Soemias and Caracalla, and induced the troops in Syria to salute him as their sovereign by the title of M. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, the 16th of May, 218. Macrinus forthwith marched against Elagabalus, but was defeated near Antioch, June 8th, and was shortly afterwards put to death. Elagabalus was now acknowledged as emperor by the senate, and, after remaining one year at Nicomedia, came in 219 to Rome, bringing the sacred stone and its attendant priests with him. The reign of this prince, who perished at the ago of 21, after having occupied the throne nearly four years, was characterised throughout by an accumulation of the most fantastic folly and superstition in the worship of the Sun-god, together with the grossest impurity of life. In 221 he adopted his cousin Alexander Severus, Elagabalus, Roman Emperor, A.D. 218-222.

and proclaimed him Caesar. Having become jealous of Alexander, he attempted to put him to death, but was himself slain along with his mother Soemias by the soldiers, with whom Alexander was a great favourite. (Lamprid. Elagab.; Herodian. iv. 12; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 31.)

Elāna. [ÆLANA.]

Elāra (Ἐλάρα), daughter of Orchomenus or Minyas, bore to Zeus the giant Tityus. Zeus, from fear of Hera, concealed her under the earth.

Elatēa (Ἐλάτεια: Ἐλατεῦς). 1. (Nr. Elephtha, Ru.), a town in Phocis, and the most important place in the country next to Delphi, was situated near the Cephissus in a fertile valley, which was an important pass from Thessaly to Boeotia (Strab. p. 424; Paus. x. 34). Elatea was thus frequently exposed to hostile attacks. The alarm caused at Athens when Philip seized this, the key of Southern Greece, is described by Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 284, § 169; cf. Diod. xvi. 84). It is said to have been founded by Elatus, son of Arcas.—2. A town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, near Gonni (Liv. xlii. 54).—3. Or Elatrēa, a town in Epirus, near the sources of the Cocytus (Liv. xxxiv. 25).

Elātus (Ἐλατος). 1. Son of Arcas and Leaira, king of Arcadia, husband of Laodice, and father of Stymphalus, Aepytus, Cyllen, and Pereus. He resided on Mount Cyllene, and went from thence to Phocis, where he founded the town of Elatea (Paus. viii. 4).—2. A prince of the Lapithæ at Larissa in Thessaly, husband of Hippæa, and father of Caenus and Polyphemus (Ov. Met. xii. 497).

Elāver (Allier), subsequently Elaris or Elauria, a river in Aquitania, a tributary of the Liger.

Elbo (Ἐλβώ), an island on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, in the midst of the marshes between the Phatnitic and the Tanitic mouths of the Nile, was the retreat of the blind Pharaoh Anysis from the Aethiopian Sabacon, and afterwards of Amyrtaeus from the Persians (Hdt. ii. 140; Thuc. i. 110). It was probably the island of Themnēsis, now called Tennis, in the lake Menzadeh.

Elēa. [VELIA.]

Electra (Ἠλέκτρα), i.e. the bright or brilliant one. 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Thaumias, and mother of Iris and the Harpies, Aëlo and Ocypete (Hes. Th. 266, 349; Nonn. Dion. 26, 360).—2. Daughter of Atlas and Pleiōne, one of the seven Pleiades, and by Zeus mother of Iasion and Dardanus. She is represented as living in Samothrace (Apollod. iii. 10; Apoll. Rhod. i. 916; Verg. Aen. viii. 135). According to an Italian tradition, she was the wife of the Italian king Corythus, by whom she had a son Iasion; whereas by Zeus she was the mother of Dardanus (Verg. Aen. iii. 167), and of Harmonia (Diod. iii. 48). It was through her means, according to another tradition, that the Palladium came to Troy; and when she saw the city of her son Dardanus perishing in flames, she tore out her hair for grief, and was placed among the stars as a comet. According to others, Electra and her six sisters were placed among the stars as the seven Pleiades, and lost their brilliancy on seeing the destruction of Ilium (Eur. Phoen. 1136; Serv. ad Georg. i. 138; Hyg. Fab. 192). The gate Electra at Thebes was called after her (Hellan. Fr. 129; Schol. ad Eur. Phoen.); for it seems to be a mistake of Paus. iv. 33 to call her sister of Cadmus, instead of mother-in-law.

—3. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, also called Laodice, sister of Iphigenia and Orestes. She does not appear in Homeric story, though she is said to be the same as the Laodice of Homer. The earliest distinct account of her comes from Stesichorus (Fr. 41). After the murder of her father by her mother, she saved the life of her young brother Orestes by sending him under the protection of a slave to king Strophius at Phanote in Phocis, who had the boy educated together with his own son Pylades. According to Sophocles, she lived an unhappy and menial life during her brother's absence: according to Euripides, she was married by the orders of Aegisthus to a peasant-farmer near Mycenæ. When Orestes had grown up to manhood, Electra excited him to avenge the death of Agamemnon, and assisted him in slaying their mother, Clytemnestra. [ORESTES.] After the death of the latter, Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades. The history and character of Electra form the subject of the Choëphori of Aeschylus, the Electra of Euripides, and the Electra of Sophocles.

Electrides Insulæ. [ERIDANUS.]

Electryōn (Ἠλεκτρυών), son of Perseus and Andromeda, king of Mycenæ, husband of Anaxo, and father of Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon. For details see AMPHITRYON.

Electryōnē (Ἠλεκτρυώνη). 1. Daughter of Helios and Rhodos, worshipped at Ialysos, probably a variation of the story of Electra No. 2 (Diod. v. 56).—2. A patronymic from Electryon, given to his daughter, Alcmene.

Elëon (Ἐλεών), a town in Boeotia, near Tanagra.

Elëos (Ἐλεος), the personification of pity or mercy, worshipped by the Athenians alone (Paus. i. 17).

Elëphantinē, or Elephantis (Ἐλεφαντίνη, Ἐλεφαντίς: Jezirah-el-Zahir, or Jezirah-el-Assouan), an island in the Nile, with a city of the same name, opposite to Syene, and 7 stadia below the Little Cataract, was the frontier station of Egypt towards Ethiopia (i.e. the southern limit of Upper Egypt), and was strongly garrisoned under the Persians and the Romans (Hdt. ii. 17, 30; Tac. Ann. ii. 61). The island was extremely fertile: it had also great quarries. Among the most remarkable objects in it were the temple of Cnuphis and a Nilotometer; and it is still celebrated for the ruins of its rock-hewn temples. The temple of Tehutmes III., of which considerable remains were drawn by artists in the beginning of this century, was destroyed by the Turkish governor of Assouan, and is now marked only by a heap of stones.

Elephantis, a Greek poetess under the early Roman emperors, wrote amatory works, molles Elephantidos libelli (Mart. xii. 43, 5; Suet. Tib. 43).

Elëphënor (Ἐλεφήνωρ), son of Chalcodon and of Inenarëte or Melanippe, and prince of the Abantes in Euboea, whom he led against Troy. He was one of the suitors of Heleu: killed before Troy by Agenor. (Il. ii. 540, iv. 463.)

Eleusis (Ἐλευσίς, later Ἐλευσίνη: Ἐλευσίνιος: Leosina or Lessina), a town and demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, was situated on the coast NW. of Athens, and about 12 miles from it. The town lay upon the slopes of a rocky hill which separates the Thriasian from the Parian plain. To the S. and E. of it is the Bay of Eleusis with Salamis in the background. The legendary history represents Eleusis as conquered by the Athenians under ERECHTHEUS, who was helped by EUMOLPUS (Paus. i. 38, 3). It seems to have been an independent state with its own worship of Demeter in the time when the Homeric Hymn to Demeter was written. After its union under the headship of Athens, it became merely one of the demes, but of importance far beyond all other towns of Attica except Athens herself, since it gave its name to the great festival and mysteries of the Eleusinia which were celebrated in honour of Demeter and Persephone. [For an account of the festival see Dict. of Antiq. art. Eleusinia.]—The site was partly excavated in 1817 by the London Dilettanti Society; the more complete excavations of 1887 by the Greek Archaeological Society have made clear much of the topography, and Dr. Dörpfeld has based upon them the plan which is given on p. 312.—Eleusis was approached from Athens by the sacred way, which passed out of the Dipylon Gate across the Cephissus, and then through a ravine in Mount Corydallus (the Pass of Daphne) to the sea shore, along which it continued to the town and the entrance of the sacred precincts. The great gate, or Propylæa, was built by Hadrian; just outside was a temple of Artemis; beyond it was the smaller gateway of Appius Claudius, occupying the site of the old gateway in the wall of fortification, which gave entrance to the actual sacred precincts of pre-Roman times. On the right or west was the small temple of Hades or Pluto; beyond it (probably) the two treasuries; to the west at the northern end of the raised terrace was a temple, perhaps the temple of Demeter: the temple immediately to the east of it may have been that of Persephone. The sacred way led past these buildings to the great Hall of Initiation or of the Mysteries (τελεστήριον), the remains of which belong to various dates. The original building was destroyed by the Persians, but the 25 square column-bases in the smaller hall are attributed to this oldest building, perhaps of the age of Pisistratus. In Cimon's time the building destroyed by Xerxes was replaced by a hall with the same frontage to the SE., but extending further back into the rock terrace; this is traceable by the 20 circular bases (the 21st in the north angle is not traceable). In the time of Pericles, Ictinus added another chamber to the Hall of Cimon on the SW., which is marked by the 6 large square bases, with two others dotted. The Porch of Philo was added at the expense of Demetrius Phalereus B.C. 310. Lastly, the Romans enlarged the whole by the building to which the 42 bases belong, forming a hall rather larger than the building completed by Ictinus; and about 170 feet by 169. There was an upper story to the hall of Ictinus entered from the terrace, and therefore more directly from what is taken to be the temple of Demeter. This upper hall gave more space for great meetings of the initiated, since it was undivided.

Eleuthërae (Ἐλευθεραί: Ἐλευθερεύς), a town in Attica on the frontiers of Boeotia, originally belonged to the Boeotian confederacy, and afterwards united itself to Attica.

Eleuthërius (Ἐλευθέριος), a surname of Zeus, as the Deliverer. (Dict. of Ant. art. Eleutheria.)

Eleutherna (Ἐλευθέρνα: Ἐλευθερναῖος), a town in the interior of Crete.

Eleuthërus (Ἐλευθέρος: Nahr-el-Kebir, i.e. Great River), a river forming the boundary between Syria and Phoenice, rose in Mount Bargylus, and fell into the sea between Antaratud and Tripolis.

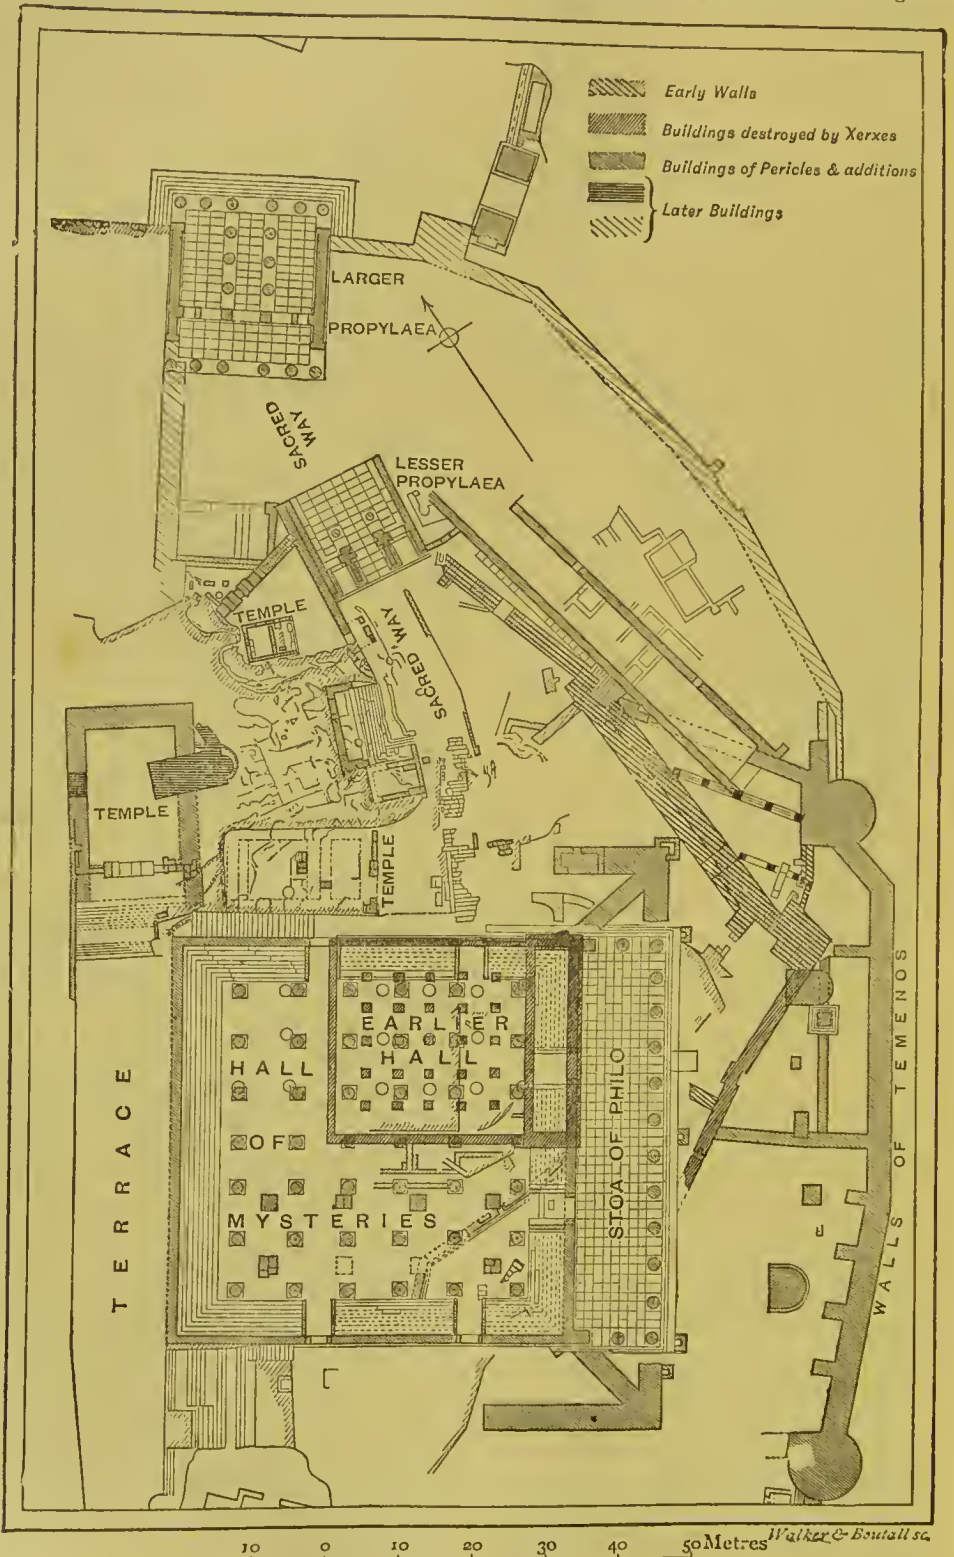

Elicius, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, where King Numa dedicated to Jupiter Elicius an altar on the Aventine. The origin of the name is referred to the Etruscans, who by certain prayers and sacrifices called forth (elicicbant or evocabant) lightning, or invited Jupiter to send lightning. The object of calling down lightning was to elicit prodigies (ad prodigia elicienda, Liv. i. 20).

Elimberrum. [AUSC.]

Elimëa, -ia, or Elimiôtis (Ἐλιμεία, Ἐλιμία, Ἐλιμιώτις), a district of Macedonia, on the frontiers of Epirus and Thessaly, originally belonged to Illyria, and was bounded by the Cambunian mountains on the S. and the Tymphaean mountains on the W. Its inhabitants, the Elimaie (Ἐλιμιώται), were Epirots.

Elis (Ἠλῖς, Dor. Ἠλῖς, Ἠλεῖα: Ἠλεῖος, Dor. Ἠλιος, whence Alii in Plautus), a country on the W. coast of Peloponnesus, bounded by Achaia on the N., Arcadia on the E., Messenia on the S., and the Ionian sea on the W. The country was fertile, watered by the ALPHEUS and its tributaries, and is said to have been the only country in Greece which produced flax. The PENEUS is the only other river in Elis of any importance. Elis was divided into three parts:—1. Elis Proper or Hollow Elis

(ἡ Κόλη Ηλῆς), the N. part, watered by the Peneus, of which the capital was also called Elis.—2. Pisātis (ἡ Πισάτις), the middle por-Minyae or Arcadians), of which PYLOS was the capital, lay between the Alpheus and the Neda. —In the heroic times we find the kingdom of tion, of which the capital was PISA.—3. Triphylia (ἡ Τριφυλία), the S. portion (i.e. the abode of three tribes, Epeans, Eleans, and Nestor and the Pelidae in the S. of Elis; while the N. of the country was inhabited by the Epeans (Ἐπειοί), with whom some Aetolian tribes were mingled. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Heraclidae, the Aetolian chief Oxylus received Elis as his share of the conquest; and it was the union of his Aetolian and Dorian followers with the Epeans, which formed the subsequent population of the country, under the general name of Eleans. Elis owed its importance in Greece to the worship of Zeus at Olympia near Pisa, in honour of whom a splendid festival was held every four years. [OLYMPIA.] In consequence of this festival being common to the whole of Greece, the country of Elis was declared sacred, and its inhabitants possessed priestly privileges. Being exempt from war and the dangers of invasion, the Eleans became prosperous and wealthy; their towns were unwall'd and their country was richly cultivated. The prosperity of their country was ruined by the Peloponnesian war; the Atheuians were the first to disregard the sanctity of the country; and from that time it frequently had to take part in the other contests of the Greeks. The women of Elis, like the Spartan women, enjoyed a greater freedom and exercised more influence than was customary elsewhere in Greece; but they were not allowed to be spectators at the Olympic games. The town of Elis was situated on the Penens, and was built at the time of the Persian war by the inhabitants of eight villages, who united together, and thus formed one town. It originally had no walls, being sacred like the rest of the country, but subsequently it was fortified. The inhabitants of Elis formed a close alliance with the Spartans, and by their means destroyed the rival city of Pisa, and became the ruling city of the country, B.C. 572. In the Peloponnesian war they quarrelled with the Spartans, because the latter had espoused the cause of Lepreum, which had revolted from Elis. The Eleans retaliated upon the Spartans by excluding them from the Olympic games in the year 420 (Thuc. v. 41). At the conclusion of the war they relinquished their supremacy over the Triphylian towns and never regained it. At a later time, when the Eleans became the firmest adherents in the Peloponnesus to the Aetolian League, the Triphylians joined the hostile (but more patriotic) Achaean League. The importance of Elis when it formed part of the Roman province of Achaia was preserved by the Olympic games, which lasted till the reign of Theodosius.

Plan of Elis. (After Dürpfeld.)

Eliso. [ALISO.]

Elissa. [DIDO.]

Ellōpia (Ἐλλοπία). 1. A district in the N. of Euboea, near the promontory Cenaeum, with a town of the same name; the whole island of Euboea is sometimes called Ellōpia. —2. An ancient name of the district about Dodona in Epirus.

Elōnē (Ἐλώνη), a town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, afterwards called Limone (Λειμώνη).

Elpēnor (Ἐλπῆνωρ), one of the companions of Odysseus who were metamorphosed by Circe into swine and afterwards back into men. Intoxicated with wine, Elpenor one day fell asleep on the roof of Circe's palace, and in his attempt to rise he fell down and broke his neck. When Odysseus was in the lower world, he met the shade of Elpenor, who implored him to burn his body, which Odysseus did on his return to the upper world. (Od. x. 550, xi. 57, xii. 10.)

Elpinicē (Ἐλπινίκη), daughter of Miltiades, and sister of Cimon, married Callias. [CALLIAS.]

Elusātes, a people in Aquitania, in the interior of the country. Their chief town was Elūsa. (Nr. Euse or Eause.) It was the birthplace of Rufinus, the minister of Arcadius (Claudius in Ruf. i. 137).

Elymaei, Elymi. [ELYMAIS.]

Elymāis, a district of Snsiana, extending from the river Enlaens on the W. to the Oroatis on the E., derived its name from the Elymaei or Elymi (Ἐλυμαῖοι, Ἐλυμοί) a warlike and predatory people, who are also found in the mountains of Great Media: in the Persian armies they served as archers. (Strab. p. 744; Liv. xxxvii. 40.) These Elymaei were probably among the most ancient inhabitants of the country N. of the head of the Persian Gulf: in the O. T. Snsiana is called Elam. Under the Parthian empire the kings of Elymais held the highest place among the satraps.

Elymi. [ELYMUS.]

Elymiōtis. [ELIMEA.]

Elymus (Ἐλυμος), a Trojan, natural son of Anchises and brother of Eryx. Previous to the emigration of Aeneas, Elymus and Aegestus had fled from Troy to Sicily, and had settled on the banks of the river Crimisus. When afterwards Aeneas also arrived there, he built for them the towns of Aegesta and Elyne. The Trojans who settled in that part of Sicily called themselves Elymi, after Elymus. (Dionys. i. 47, 52; Verg. Aen. v. 73.)

Elyrus (Ἐλυρος), a town in the W. of Crete, S. of Cydonia (Paus. x. 16, 3).

Elysiūm (Ἠλύσιον πεδῖον, later simply Ἠλύσιον), the Elysian fields. [HADES.] In Homer (Od. iv. 563) Elysiūm forms no part of the realms of the dead; he places it on the W. of the earth, near Ocean, and describes it as a happy land, where there is neither snow, nor cold, nor rain, and always fanned by the delightful breezes of Zephyrus. Hither favoured heroes, like Menelaus, pass without dying, and live happy under the rule of Rhadamanthns. Hesiod (Op. 167) places the heroes of the fourth age, such as those who fought at Thebes and Troy, in the Isles of the Blessed (μακάρων νῆσοι), which he describes as set apart along the circumference Ocean (cf. Hor. Epod. xvi. 63), where Cronus rules and the land is fruitful. Pindar distinguishes Elysiūm, or the place of rest, where the good live a tearless life, and the sun always shines, from the μακάρων νῆσοι to which, as an extreme reward, those come who have gone through a probation thrice in this world and thrice in Elysiūm. Here Cronus reigns and Rhadamanthns judges. In this happy spot he places Peleus and Cadmus and Achilles (Ol. ii. 61). In Fr. 95 he describes the former place or Elysiūm, and the life of those who dwell there in flowery meadows, delighting themselves with games and music, and never without the sun. From these legends was imagined the island of ATLANTIS. The Elysiūm of Virgil

(Aen. vi. 541) is placed in the Under-world. [See HADES.]

Emāthia (Ἠμαθία: Ἠμαθίους), a district of Macedonia, between the Haliacmon and the Axios, formerly part of Paconia, and the original seat of the Macedonian monarchy. (In Homer Il. xiv. 226 it lies between Pieria and Thrace.) The poets frequently give the name of Emathia to the whole of Macedonia, and sometimes even to the neighbouring Thessaly. Under the Romans it formed part of the third region of Macedonia.

Emāthides, the nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia (Ov. Met. v. 669).

Emāthion (Ἠμαθίων), son of Tithonus and Eos, brother of Memnon, was slain by Heracles (Hes. Th. 984).

Embōlima (Ἐμβόλιμα), a city of the Paropamisadae in N. India, near Aornos, sixteen days' march from the Indus (Curt. viii. 12).

Emerita. [AUGUSTA EMERITA.]

Emēsa or Emissa (Ἐμεσα, Ἐμισσα: Ἐμεσηνος: Hums or Homs), a city of Syria, on the E. bank of the Orontes, in the province of Apamene Libanesis, was in the first cent. B.C. the residence of independent Arabian princes. When Pompey was in Syria in B.C. 69 it was ruled by an Arabian prince Sampsiceramus, who held his power as tributary. His dynasty lasted under Iamblichus, another Sampsiceramus and Azizus and others till the reign of Domitian, when it formed part of the province of Syria. Under Caracalla it was made a colony with the Jns Italicum. It is a remarkable place in the history of the Roman empire, being the native city of Julia Domna, the wife of Septimius Severus; of Elagabalus, who exchanged the high-priesthood of the celebrated temple of the Sun in this city for the imperial purple, and of the emperor Alexander Severus; and also the scene of the decisive battle between Aurelian and Zenobia, A.D. 273. (Strab. p. 753; Herodian, v. 3; Dio Cass. liv. 8; Joseph. Ant. xix. 8; Cic. ad Att. ii. 16, ad Fam. xv. 1.)

Emmēnidae (Ἐμμενίδαι), a princely family at Agrigentum, who traced their origin to the mythical hero Polynices. Among its members we know Emmenides (from whom the family derived its name) the father of Aenesidamnus, whose sons Theron and Xenocrates are celebrated by Pindar as victors at the great games of Greece (Pind. Ol. ii. 48, iii. 38, Pyth. vi. 5).

Emōdī Montes, or -us, or -es, or -on (τὰ Ἠμωδὰ ὄρη, τὸ Ἠμωδὸν ὄρος, or δ' Ἠμωδός: Himalaya M.), a range of mountains N. of India, forming the prolongation eastwards of the Paropamisus.

Empēdocles (Ἐμπεδοκλῆς), of Agrigentum in Sicily, flourished about B.C. 490. Although he was descended from an ancient and wealthy family, he joined the revolution in which Thrasylus, the son and successor of Theron, was expelled. His zeal in the establishment of political equality is said to have been manifested by his magnanimous support of the poor, by his severity against the overbearing conduct of the aristocrats, and by his declining the sovereignty which was offered to him. His brilliant oratory, his penetrating knowledge of nature, and the reputation of his marvellous powers, which he had acquired by curing diseases, by his successful exertions in drying up marshy districts and in averting epidemics and obnoxious winds, spread a lustre around his name. He was called a magician (γόης), and he appears to have attributed to himself miraculous powers and a divine origin, though in natural science he was certainly no impostor. He travelled in Greece and Italy, and made some stay at Athens. His death happened about 430, apparently not in Sicily. Many legends grew up about it: one tradition represented him as having been removed from the earth, like a divine being; and another related that he threw himself into the flames of Mount Aetna, that by his sudden disappearance he might be believed to be a god; but it was added that the volcano threw up one of his sandals, and thus revealed the manner of his death (Diog. Laërt. viii. 57-74; Hor. A.P. 464). The rhetorician Gorgias was his disciple. The works of Empedocles were all in verse. Fragments remain of the Ἱατρικά, which assume the power to heal all diseases, even old age: of the Καθαρμοί, which teaches the purification from sin and evil, and of his greatest work, on natural science (Περὶ Φύσεως). He seems to have derived his mysticism from Pythagoras, and in natural science it is likely that Acron and Pausanias, great physicians of Sicily, were his first teachers. He held that there were four indestructible elements—earth, air, fire, and water (which he called Zeus, Hera, Aïdoneus, and Nestis). These elements combine to form the visible world, but they combine only by the operation of φίλα, or Love, which is therefore the creative power; and they can be dissolved by Hate. Our senses are acted upon by the particles thrown off by things around us. He held the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration of souls. Lucretius speaks of Empedocles with enthusiasm, and evidently makes him his model (i. 715 ff.).

Empōriæ or Emporium (Ἐμπορία, Ἐμπορεῖον, Ἐμπόριον: Ἐμπορίτης: Amprurias), a town of the Indigetes in Hispania Tarraconensis near the Pyrenees, was situated on the river Clodianus, which formed the harbour of the town. It was founded by the Phocæus from Massilia, and was divided into two parts, at one time separated from each other by a wall: the part near the coast being inhabited by the Greeks, and the part towards the interior by the Indigetes. It was subsequently colonised by Julius Caesar. Its harbour was much frequented: here Scipio Africanus first landed when he came to Spain in the second Punic war. (Strab. p. 159; Liv. xxi. 60.)

Empūlum (Amprigione), a small town in Latium, near Tibur (Liv. vii. 18).

Empūsa (Ἐμπούσα), a monstrous spectre, which was believed to devour human beings. It could assume different forms, and was sent by Hecate to frighten travellers. It was believed usually to appear with one leg of brass and the other of an ass, whence it was called ὄνοσκελὶς or ὄνοκόλλη. The Lamiae and Mormolyceia, who assumed the form of handsome women for the purpose of attracting young men, and then sucked their blood like vampires and ate their flesh, were reckoned among the Empusæ. (Aristoph. Ran. 294; Dem. de Cor. p. 270, § 130; Philostr. Apoll. Tyan. ii. 4, iv. 25.)

Enarēphorus (Ἐναρήφορος), son of Hippocōou, a passionate suitor of Helen, when she was yet quite young. Tyndareus, therefore, entrusted the maiden to the care of Theseus. Enarophorus had a herom at Sparta. (Plut. Thes. 31; Paus. iii. 15.)

Encēlādus (Ἐγκέλαδος), son of Tartarus and Co, and one of the hundred-armed giants who made war upon the gods. He was killed, according to some, by a flash of lightning, by

Zeus, who buried him under Mount Aetna; according to others, Athene killed him with her chariot, or threw upon him the island of Sicily. (Verg. Aen. iii. 578, iv. 179; Ov. Pont. ii. 2, 12; Paus. viii. 47; Eur. Cycl. 7.)

Enchêles (Ἐγκηλαίης, also Ἐγκηλαίαι, Ἐγκηλαίοι), an Illyrian tribe.

Endius (Ἐνδιός), a Spartan and a hereditary friend of Alcibiades, whose family name seems to have been adopted, for it was borne by the father of Endinus. He was an Ephor, and was ambassador from Sparta to Athens in 420 and 410. (Thuc. v. 44, viii. 6, 12; Diod. xiii. 52.)

Endoeus (Ἐνδοίος), an Athenian statuary, is called a disciple of Daedalus, whom he is said to have accompanied on his flight from Crete. These statements must be taken to express, not the time at which he lived, but the style of art which he practised. It is probable that he lived in the time of Pisistratus and his sons, about B.C. 560. (Paus. i. 26, vii. 5, viii. 46.)

Endymion (Ἐνδυμίων), a youth distinguished by his beauty, and renowned in ancient story for his perpetual sleep (cf. Plat. Phaedr. p. 72; Aristot. Eth. N. x. 8). One set of traditions about Endyuion refer us to Elis, and another to Caria, and others again are a combination of the two. According to one set of legends, he was a son of Aëthlius and Calyce, or of Zeus and Calyce, and succeeded Aëthlius in the kingdom of Elis (Paus. v. 8, 1), or led a band of Aeolians from Thessaly and took possession of Elis (Paus. v. 1, 2; Apollod. i. 7, 5). According to the Schol. on Ap. Rh. iv. 57, Hesiod and Pherycles also made him an Elean. His tomb was shown at Olympia (Paus. v. 1, 4). Others related that he had come from Elis to Mount Latmus in Caria, whence he is called the Latmian (Latmius). This version first appears in Sappho (Fr. 134); and this has been generally followed by poets of a later date (Theoc. xx. 37; Catull. lxvi. 5; Ov. A. iii. 83). Some stories tried to reconcile the two by making him migrate from Elis to Caria (Paus. v. 1, 5). The more poetical part of his story may belong specially to Caria, and may have been engrafted on other Endymions elsewhere; but it might be imagined whenever the moon was observed touching the rocks with light and sinking behind them. As he slept on Latmus, his beauty warmed the cold heart of Selene (the moon), who came down to him, kissed him, and lay by his side. His eternal sleep on Latmus is assigned to different causes: Selene had sent him to sleep, that she might be able to kiss him without his knowledge (Cic. Tusc. i. 38, 92); or he begged from Zeus eternal sleep with immortal youth (Apollod.). By Selene he had fifty daughters, according to the story of the Eleans, and this is explained as referring to the fifty moons of the Olympic cycle. The best representation of the story is a fine relief in the Capitoline Museum, where there is also a beautiful relief of the single sleeping figure with his dog beside him. In the first he is represented as a shepherd, in the second as a hunter.

Engyium (Ἐγγυιον, Ἐγγυίον; Ἐγγυῖνος, Enguinus; Gangi, or, according to others, Troina), a town in the interior of Sicily near the sources of the Monalus, originally a town of the Siculi, but said to have been colonised by the Cretans under Minos: it possessed a celebrated temple of the great mother of the gods, or, according to others, of Θεαὶ ματέρες, perhaps the nurses of Zeus (Diod. iv. 79, xvi. 72; Plut. Marc. 20; Cic. Verr. iii. 43, v. 72).

Enipeus (Ἐνίπευς). 1. (Tschamarly), a river in Thessaly, rises in Mt. Othrys, receives the Apidanus near Pharsalus, and flows into the Peneus. Poseidon assumed the form of the god of this river in order to obtain possession of Tyro, who was in love with Enipeus. She became by Poseidon the mother of Pelias and Nelcus. Ovid relates (Met. vi. 116) that Neptune (Poseidon) having assumed the form of Enipeus, became by Iphimedia the father of Otus and Ephialtes. —2. A small river in Pisatis (Elis) flows into the Alpheus near its mouth (Strab. p. 356). —3. (Mavrolongos), a small river in Macedonia, which rises in Olympus.

Enna or Henna (Ἐννα; Ἐνναῖος; Castro Giovanni), an ancient and strong town of the Siculi in Sicily, on the road from Catania to Agrigentum, on the summit of a rocky hill, and hence a natural fortress (Strab. p. 272; Liv. xxiv. 37), said to be the centre of the island (ἰμφολὸς Σικελίας) (Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 15; Cic. Verr. iv. 48). It was surrounded by fertile plains, which bore large crops of wheat; it was one of the chief seats of the worship of Demeter, and possessed a celebrated temple of this goddess. According to later tradition it was in a flowery meadow in the neighbourhood of Enna that Pluto carried off Persephone or Proserpine, and the cave was shown through which the god passed as he carried off his prize (Ov. Met. v. 385; Claud. de Rapt. Pros. ii.; Diod. v. 3). Its importance declined from the time of the second Punic war, when it was punished by the Romans, because it had attempted to revolt to the Carthaginians.

Ennius, Q., the Roman poet, was born at Rudiae, in Calabria, B.C. 239 (Gell. xvii. 21, 43; Cic. de Or. iii. 42, 168, Brut. 18, 72). He was a Greek by birth, but a subject of Rome, and served in the Roman armies. In 204 Cato, who was then quaestor, found Ennius in Sardinia, and brought him in his train to Rome. In 189 Ennius accompanied M. Fulvius Nobilior through the Aetolian campaign, and shared his triumph. Through the son of Nobilior, Ennius, when far advanced in life, obtained the rights of a Roman citizen. He dwelt in a humble house on the Aventine, and maintained himself by teaching Greek to the sons of the Roman nobles, and translating Greek plays for the stage. Ennius in truth, as a Greek by culture and partly by origin, gave to Roman poetry the form which it ultimately adopted. The epic of Naevius was in Saturnian metre. Ennius introduced the Greek hexameter and the Homeric treatment, and thus gave the lead which was followed by Virgil. Though Cato disapproved of this as unpatriotic, it cannot be doubted that his choice was right. He lived on terms of the closest intimacy with the elder Scipio Africanus. He died 169, at the age of seventy (Cic. de Sen. 5, 14). He was buried in the sepulchre of the Scipios, and his bust was allowed a place among the effigies of that noble house. Ennius was regarded by the Romans as the father of their poetry (alter Homerus, Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 50). Cicero calls him Summus poeta noster (pro Balb. 22, 51; cf. Lucr. i. 111), and Virgil was not ashamed to borrow many of his thoughts, and not a few of his expressions. All the works of Ennius are lost with the exception of a few fragments. His most important work was an epic poem, in dactylic hexameters, entitled Annatum Libri xviii., being a history of Rome from the arrival of Aeneas in Italy to his own times. No great space, however, was allotted to the earlier records: the stories of Aeneas and the royal period occupy the first three books; three are given to the conquest of Italy and Pyrrhus; and the contest with Hannibal, which was described with great minuteness, began with the seventh book, the first Punic war being passed over with a brief mention, as having been described already by Naevius. The Hannibalian war ended with the ninth book; and the remaining nine brought the history down to 181 B.C. or perhaps a few years later. His service to the drama was of less importance in literature: his translations were mostly from Euripides; he wrote also praetextae, or tragedies on Roman subjects, of which the Ambracia probably told of its capture by Fulvius Nobilior, which he himself had seen; he wrote also Comedies and was the first notable writer of Saturae. His adaptations of Epicharmus and Euhemerus were apparently on the rationalistic side, and no doubt offended those who upheld the old Roman religion. The fragments of Ennius are published by Vahlen, Lips. 1854; L. Müller, Petersb. 1885.

Enōpe (Ἐνόπη), a town in Messenia, mentioned by Homer (Il. i. 150), supposed by some to be the same as GERENA.

Entella (Ἐντελλα: Entellinus, Entellensis; Entella), an ancient town of the Sicani in the interior of the island on the W. side, said to have been founded by Entellus, one of the companions of the Trojan Aegestus (Verg. Aen. v. 387). It was subsequently seized and peopled by the Campanian mercenaries of Dionysius (Diod. xiv. 9).

Entoria, daughter of an Italian peasant who entertained Cronos (Saturn). Cronos taught the culture of the vine, and the peasants being intoxicated, thought themselves poisoned, and stoned the father of Entoria, whose sons by Cronos hanged themselves. Long afterwards, to avert a plague Lutatius Catulus built a temple of Saturn on the Tarpeian (Plut. Parall. 9; cf. ICARIUS).

Enyālius (Ἐνυάλιος), the Warlike, frequently occurs in the Iliad (never in the Odyssey) as an epithet of ARES. At a later time Enyalios and Ares were distinguished as two different gods of war; Enyalios was looked upon as a son of Ares and Enyo, or of Cronos and Rhea.

Enyō (Ἐνυώ), the goddess of war, who delights in bloodshed and the destruction of towns, and accompanies Ares in battles (Il. v. 333, 592). The goddess Ma or Anaitis at Comana was called Enyo by the Greeks (Strab. p. 535). Respecting the Roman goddess of war, see BELLONA.

Eordaea (Ἐορδαία, also Ἐορδαία), a district and town in the NW. of Macedonia, inhabited by the Eordi (Thuc. ii. 99).

Eōs (Ἠώς, Att. Ews), in Latin Aurōra, the goddess of the morning red, daughter of Hyperion and Thia or Euryphassa (Hes. Th. 271; Hymn. Hom. xxxi. 4); or of the giant Pallas (Ov. Met. ix. 421). In Od. xii. 4, the island of Aea is spoken of as her dwelling; and there seems there to be a confusion between the eastern and western islands of the same name [AEA]; it cannot be an allusion to the evening-red, since the 'rising of the sun' is also placed there. Eos dwelt in the east, and at the close of every night she rose from the couch of her spouse Tithonus, and on a chariot (sometimes a quadriga, but usually a biga) drawn by the swift horses Lampus and Phaëton she ascended to heaven from the river Oceanus, to announce the coming light of the sun to the gods as well as to mortals (Od. xxiii. 253). In the Homeric poems Eos only travels till the sun is completely risen, or according to Il. ix. 66, till towards midday; but in later poets the paths of Aurora and the sun are the same: so also we find Ἡμέρα and Ἠώς synonymous (Eur. Troad. 847), and Eos has come to be regarded as the goddess of the daylight. Goddess of all that was young and fresh, she is represented in myth as loving and carrying off youths of notable beauty; and this may also be significant of death in early youth, ὃν Θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νέος. [For the stories theron see CEPHALUS, ORION.] Memnon was her son by Tithonus. For these myths see MEMNON and TITHONUS.

Epāminōndas (Ἐπαμεινώνδας, Ἐπαμινώνδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Polymnis, was born and reared in poverty, though his blood was noble. His close and enduring friendship with Pelopidas is said to have originated in the campaign in which they served together on the Spartan side against Mantinea, where Pelopidas having fallen in a battle, apparently dead, Epaminondas protected his body at the imminent risk of his own life, B.C. 385. (Plut. Pelop. 4; Xen. Hell. v. 2; Diod. xv. 5.) Epaminondas had refused to take part in the conspiracy for the liberation of Thebes, because it involved assassination, but when the Spartans had been expelled from it, he took an active part in public affairs. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Lenetra, so fatal to the Lacedaemonians, in which the success of Thebes is said to have been owing mainly to his tactics. In 370 he was one of the generals in the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans; and before leaving Peloponnesus he restored the Messenians to their country and established a new city, named Messene. On their return home Epaminondas and Pelopidas were impeached by their enemies, on a capital charge of having retained their command beyond the legal term. The fact itself was true enough; but they were both honourably acquitted, Epaminondas having expressed his willingness to die if the Thebans would record that he had been put to death because he had humbled Sparta and taught his countrymen to face and to conquer their enemies. (Plut. Pelop. 25; Pans. ix. 14; Nep. Epam. 8.) In 369 he returned to the Peloponnesus and took possession of Sicyon, and by his presence in that district so occupied the Lacedaemonian forces that the inhabitants of the new cities Messene and Megalopolis could complete their fortifications. He was repulsed by Chabrias in an attack which he made on Corinth. In the following year we find him serving, but not as general, in the Theban army which was sent into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas from Alexander of Pherae, and which was saved from utter destruction only by the ability of Epaminondas. In 367 he was sent at the head of another force to release Pelopidas, and accomplished his object without even striking a blow, and by the mere prestige of his name (Diod. xv. 71-75). Later in 367 he invaded the Peloponnesus for the third time, and in 362 for the fourth time. In the latter year he gained a brilliant victory over the Lacedaemonians at Mantinea; but in the full career of victory he received a mortal wound. He was told that his death would follow directly on the javelin being extracted from the wound; and he would not allow this to be done till he had been assured that his shield was safe, and that the victory was with his countrymen. It was a disputed point by whose hand he fell: among others, the honour was assigned to Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. (Xen. Hell. vii. 5; Diocl. xv. 87; Paus. ix. 15; Nep. Epaminondas.)—Epaminondas was one of the greatest men of Greece. He raised Thebes to the supremacy of Greece, which she lost almost as soon as he died. He was not only a great general and tactician and a wise statesman, but alike in public and in private life he was distinguished by integrity and uprightness, and he carried into daily practice the lessons of philosophy, of which he was an ardent student. His patriotism was of the widest and most enlightened kind, studying the general interests of the Hellenic race as well as those of his own state.

Epaphrōdītus (Ἐπαφροδίτης). 1. A freedman and secretary of the emperor Nero. He assisted Nero in killing himself, and he was afterwards put to death by Demitian. The philosopher Epictetus was his freedman. (Tac. Ann. xv. 55; Suet. Ner. 49, Dom. 14.)—2. M. Mettius Epaphroditus, of Chaeronea, a Greek grammarian, the slave and afterwards the freedman of Modestus, the praefect of Egypt. He subsequently went to Rome, where he resided in the reign of Nero and down to the time of Nerva. He was the author of several grammatical works and commentaries.

Epāphus (Ἐπαφος), son of Zeus and Io, born on the river Nile, after the long wanderings of his mother. He was concealed by the Curetes, at the request of Hera, but was discovered by Io in Syria. He subsequently became king of Egypt, married Memphis, a daughter of Nilus, or, according to others, Cassiopea, and built the city of Memphis. He had a daughter Libya, from whom Libya (Africa) received its name. (Aesch. Pr. 846, Suppl. 536; Eur. Phoen. 678; Pind. Pyth. iv. 25; Hyg. Fab. 149.)

Ἐπεῖ. [ELIS.]

Epētium (Ἐπέτιον: nr. Stobrez, Ru.), a town of the Lissii in Dalmatia, with a good harbour.

Epēus (Ἐπειός). 1. Son of Endymion, king in Elis, from whom the Epei are said to have derived their name (Paus. v. 1).—2. Son of Panopeus, went with thirty ships from the Cyclades to Troy. He built the wooden horse with the assistance of Athene. (Il. xxiii. 665; Od. viii. 492; Paus. ii. 29; Verg. Aen. ii. 264.)

Ephēsus (Ἐφεσος: Ἐφέσιος: Ru. near Ayasoluk, i.e. Ἅγιος Θεόδογος, the title of St. John), the chief of the twelve Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded as a Greek city by Androclus, the son of Codrus, at the time of the great Ionian migration, and united with the old town of the Carians and Leleges. The Greek settlers adopted the worship of the Asiatic nature-goddess which already existed there, and gave her the name of ARTEMIS. It stood a little S. of the river Cayster, near its mouth, where a marshy plain, extending S. from the river, is bounded by two hills, Prion or Lepre on the E., and Coressus on the S. The city was built originally on Mt. Coressus, but, in the time of Croesus, the people transferred their habitations to the valley, whence Lysimachus, the general of Alexander, compelled them again to remove to M. Prion. On the N. side of the city was a lake, communicating with the Cayster, and forming the inner harbour, now a marsh; the outer harbour (πάρωρος) was formed by the mouth of the river. In the plain, E. of the lake, and N.E. of the city, beyond its walls, stood the celebrated temple of Artemis. The original temple is said to have been built by Theodorus of Samos about 630 B.C. Another was built in the latter half of the sixth century B.C., by an architect named Chersiphron. One of the sculptured columns of this temple dedicated by Croesus, and bearing part of his name inscribed on it, is now in the British Museum. This temple was burnt down by Herostatus in the night on which Alexander the Great was born (Oct. 13–14, B.C. 356). The temple which took its place, built by the joint efforts of all the Ionian states, was regarded as one of the wonders of the world (Plin. xxxvi. 179; Vitruv. x. 2, 11; vii. Praef. 12, ii. Praef. 1).
