Foundations of the two earlier temples and fragments of the columns of the second were discovered in 1870 by Mr. Wood beneath the great temple of the Alexandrine age. Of this the bases of the columns were excavated and fragments of sculpture. [For description see Dict. of Ant. art. Templum.] It stood nearly a mile outside the Coressian gate of the city. The temple was also celebrated as an asylum, till Augustus deprived it of that privilege. The other buildings at Ephesus of which there are ruins, are the agora, theatre, odeum, stadium, gymnasium, and baths, temples of Zeus Olympius and of Julius Caesar, and a large building near the inner harbour: the foundations of the walls may also be traced. With the rest of Ionia, Ephesus fell under the power successively of Croesus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. It was always very flourishing, and became even more so as the other Ionian cities decayed. It was greatly favoured by its Greek rulers, especially by Lysimachus, who, in honour of his second wife, gave it her name, Arsinoë, which, however, it did not long retain. Attalus II. Philadelphus constructed docks for it, and improved its harbours. Under the Romans it was the administrative capital of the province of Asia (though Pergamum was strictly the μητρόπολις), and by far the greatest city of Asia Minor. (Plin. v. 120; Cic. ad Fam. v. 20; Jos. Ant. xiv. 10, xvi. 6.) It is conspicuous in the early history of the Christian Church, both St. Paul and St. John having laboured in it, and addressed epistles to the church of Ephesus; and at one time its bishop possessed the rank and power of a patriarch over the churches in the province of Asia. Its position, and the excellence of its harbours, made it the chief emporium for the trade of all Asia west of the Taurus; and its downfall was mainly owing to the destruction of its harbours by the deposits of the Cayster.—Pliny (v. 115).

states that in the earliest times Ephosus was called by various names, Alope, Ortygia (which was the name of a sacred grove near it: Strab. p. 639; Tac. Ann. iii. 61), Morge, Smyrna, Tracheia, Haemonium, and Ptelea.

Ephialtes (Ἐφιάλης). 1. One of the Aloidae. [ALOEUS].—2. A Malian, who in B.C. 480, when LEONIDAS was defending the pass of Thermopylae, guided a body of Persians over the mountain path, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks.—3. The Athenian statesman, was a friend and partisan of Pericles, whom he assisted in carrying his political measures. He is mentioned in particular as chiefly instrumental in that abridgment of the power of the Areiopagus which inflicted such a blow on the oligarchical party. [Dict. of Ant. art. Areiopagus.] This measure was carried in the absence of Cimon, who, on his return, tried to rescind it; but, in his struggle with Ephialtes, he failed and was ostracised. The services of Ephialtes to the democratic cause excited the rancorous enmity of some of the oligarchs, and led to his assassination during the night, probably in 456. (Plut. Cim. 10-16; Aristot. Pol. ii. 9, 3, Ἄθ. πολ. 26.)

Ehippus (Ἐφίππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy.—2. Of Olynthus, a Greek historian of Alexander the Great.

Ephorus (Ἐφορος), of Cyrene in Aeolis, a celebrated Greek historian, was a contemporary of Philip and Alexander, and lived from about 400 to about 330 B.C. He studied rhetoric under Isocrates, of whose pupils he and Theopompus were considered the most distinguished. As he lacked, in the opinion of Isocrates, the energy required for political life, he was persuaded to turn instead to historical writing. Accordingly he wrote A History (Ἱστορία) in thirty books, which began with the return of the Heraclidae, and came down to the siege of Perinthus in 341. It treated of the history of the barbarians as well as of the Greeks, and was thus the first attempt at writing a universal history that was ever made in Greece. It embraced a period of 750 years, and each of the thirty books contained a compact portion of the history which formed a complete whole by itself. Ephorus did not live to complete the work, and it was finished by his son Demophilus. Dyllus began his history at the point at which the work of Ephorus left off. Ephorus also wrote a few other works of less importance, of which the titles only are preserved by the grammarians. Of the history likewise we have nothing but fragments. It was written in a clear and polished style, but was at the same time deficient in power and energy. Ephorus appears to have been faithful and impartial in the narration of events; but he did not always follow the best authorities (e.g. for the age of Pericles he followed the writings of the comic poets, without due allowance for caricature), and in the later part of his work he frequently differed from Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, on points on which they are entitled to credit. Diodorus Siculus made great use of the work of Ephorus; and he is commended by Polybius for his accounts of naval warfare, and by Strabo (Pol. xii. 25; Strab. p. 332). The fragments of his work have been published by Marx, Carlsruhe, 1815, and in Müller's Fragm. Historicor. Graec. Paris, 1841.

Ephyra (Ἐφύρα). 1. The ancient name of Corinth [CORINTHUS].—2. An ancient town of the Pelasgi near the river Selleis in Elis, afterwards called Boeoa (Il. ii. 659, xv. 531; Strab. p. 338).—3. A town in Thessaly, afterwards called CRANON.—4. A town in Epirus, afterwards called CICHYRUS.

Epicastē (Ἐπικάστη), commonly called JOCASTE.

Epicēphēsia (Ἐπικηφήσια: Ἐπικηφήσιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis.

Epicharmus (Ἐπίχαρμος), the chief comic poet among the Dorians, was born in the island of Cos, about B. C. 540. His father, Elothales, was a physician, of the race of the Asclepiads. At the age of three months, Epicharmus was carried to Megara, in Sicily; thence he removed to Syracuse, when Megara was destroyed by Gelo (484 or 483). Here he spent the remainder of his life, which was prolonged throughout the reign of Hiero, at whose court Epicharmus associated with the other great writers of the time, and among them with Aeschylus. He died at the age of 90 (450), or, according to Lucian, 97 (443). Epicharmus was a Pythagorean philosopher, and spent the earlier part of his life in the study of philosophy, both physical and metaphysical. He is said to have followed for some time his father's profession of medicine; and it appears that he did not begin writing comedies till his removal to Syracuse. Comedy had for some time existed at Megara in Sicily, which was a colony from Megara on the Isthmus, the latter of which towns disputed with the Athenians the invention of comedy. But the comedy at the Sicilian Megara before Epicharmus seems to have been merely rude farces. It was he, together with Phormis, who gave it a new form, and introduced a regular plot, but with no chorus. The number of his comedies is differently stated at 52 or at 35. There are still extant 35 titles. The majority of them are on mythological subjects—that is, travesties of the heroic myths; and these plays no doubt very much resembled the satyric dramas of the Athenians. But besides mythology, Epicharmus wrote on other subjects, political, or relating to manners and customs: such were probably The Boor (Ἀγροστίως) and The Megarian Woman. In Hebe's Wedding or The Muses Heracles displayed the powers of eating which the Attic poets afterwards signalled; and the Muses appeared in the garb of Syracusan fish-wives. The style of his plays appears to have been a curious mixture of the broad buffoonery which distinguished the old Megarian comedy and of the sententious wisdom of the Pythagorean philosopher. His language was remarkably elegant; he was celebrated for his choice of epithets: his plays abounded, as the extant fragments prove, with philosophical and moral maxims. He was imitated by Crates, and also (in aiming at rapid movement of the drama) by Plautus, as we learn from the line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1, 58),— Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi.

Plato places him at the head of comedians (Theaet. p. 152), in which criticism, however, he is probably thinking most of the philosophical element in his plays (cf. Diog. Laërt. iii. 10). Fragments in Meineke, Fr. Com. Graec.

Epiclemidii Locri. [LOCRI.]

Epicrātes (Ἐπικράτης). 1. An Athenian, took part in the overthrow of the Thirty; but afterwards, when sent on an embassy to the Persian king, he was accused of receiving money from Artaxerxes. He appears to have been acquitted this time; but he was tried on a later occasion, on another charge of corruption, and only escaped death by a voluntary exile. (Dem. F. L. p. 480, § 315; Athen. p. 251.) He was ridiculed by the comic poets for his large beard, and for this reason was called σακεσφόρος (Aristoph. Eccles. 68, and Schol.).—2. Of Ambracia, an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy.

Epictētus (Ἐπίκτητος), of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was a freedman of Epaphroditus, who was himself a freedman of Nero. [EPAPHRODITUS.] He lived and taught first at Rome, and, after the expulsion of the philosophers by Domitian, at Nicopolis in Epīrns. Although he was favoured by Hadrian, he does not appear to have returned to Rome; for the discourses which Arriau took down in writing were delivered by Epictetus when an old man at Nicopolis. Only a few circumstances of his life are recorded, such as his lameness, which is spoken of in different ways, his poverty, and his few wants. Epictetus did not leave any works behind him, and the short manual (Enchiridion) which bears his name was compiled from his discourses by his faithful pupil Arrian. Arrian also wrote the philosophical lectures of his master in eight books, from which, though four are lost, we are enabled to gain a complete idea of the way in which Epictetus conceived and taught the Stoic philosophy. [ARRIANUS.] He teaches that man should follow reason and his own conscience as his guide patiently and trustfully; and may feel independent of all external circumstances which are beyond his control and need not trouble him if he knows how to find freedom and happiness in his own mind. He believes in a Deity or Providence who chooses better for men than they could for themselves, and in a Guiding Spirit or conscience (perhaps here following Socrates) which aids men to judge rightly of appearances, and to understand what they can and ought to control and what is to be borne patiently as beyond their control: the great rule of life was 'endurance and abstinence' (ἀρέχου καὶ ἀπέχου).

Epictētus Phrygia. [PHRYGIA.]

Epicūrus (Ἐπίκουρος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, and the founder of a philosophical school called, after him, the Epicurean. He was a son of Neocles and Charestrata, and was born B.C. 342, in the Attic demos of Gargettus, and hence is sometimes called the Gargettiau. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 16.) At an early age he was taken to Samos by his father, who had a settlement there as an Athenian colonist (κληροῦχος). At 18 Epicurus came to Athens, and there probably studied under Xenocrates, who was then at the head of the Academy. After a short stay at Athens he went to Colophon, and subsequently resided at Mytilene and Lampsacus, in which places he was engaged for five years in teaching philosophy. In 306, when he had attained the age of 35, he again came to Athens, where he purchased for 80 minao a garden—the famous Κήποι Ἐπικούρου—in which he established his philosophical school. Here he spent the remainder of his life, surrounded by numerous friends and pupils. His mode of living was simple, temperate, and cheerful; and the aspersions of comic poets and of later philosophers, who were opposed to his philosophy and describe him as a person devoted to sensual pleasures, unjustly fix upon him the reproach which belonged to some of his followers at a later time. He took no part in public affairs. He died in 270, at the age of 72, after a long and painful illness, which he endured with truly philosophical patience and courage.—Epicurus is said to have written 300 volumes. Of these the most important was on On Nature (Περὶ Φύσεως), in 37 books. All his works are lost; but some fragments of the work on Nature were found among the rolls at Herculaneum, and were published by Orelli, Lips. 1818. In his philosophical system (see Diog. Laërt. book x.; Lucretius, iii. 3, &c.; Cic. de Fin. i. and ii., N. D. i.) Epicurus prided himself in being independent of all his predecessors; but he was in reality indebted both to Democritus and the Cyrenaics. His regard for science and physics was mainly on the ground that a true understanding of them might free mankind from the fear of the gods (religio) and of death. He regarded our senses as the guide to truth in theory and our sensations of pleasure and pain as the motives of choice in practical life. In his physics he followed Democritus in his atomic theory, except that he saw that atoms must fall with equal velocity, and therefore supposed some external force by which they were deflected from their perpendicular path, and hence, striking together, gave rise to a circular motion which created many different worlds. These worlds are separated by regions of space, which he called μετακόσμια (= intermundia); all of them are subject to decay. The soul of animals and of man consists of elements of fire and air, and also of a certain matter derived from their parents, whence comes their powers of perception. Men have also a rational part added to the irrational elements of the soul. At death the atoms of the soul are scattered; therefore we cannot exist after death, and need not fear it. Freedom of will he maintained absolutely. The gods, owing to the universality of the belief in them, he did not seek to eliminate from his scheme; but he makes them ideals of tranquil happiness: having fine bodies of light, they dwell in the intermundia, where there are no decaying bodies; and they are troubled by no cares for the worlds around them, but altogether out of their sphere. Hence it follows that the gods need not inspire men with any terrors. In his ethics he bids us seek for the absence of pain as the greatest good: this consists especially in repose of mind (ἀταραξία); and, since virtue tends to this repose, therefore virtue is essential for true happiness. He does not indeed forbid sensual pleasures, but he demands that man should be independent of them, and not their slave.

Epicūdes (Ἐπικύδης), a Syracusan by origin, but born and educated at Carthage. He served, together with his elder brother, Hippocrates, with much distinction in the army of Hannibal, both in Spain and Italy; and when, after the battle of Cannae (B.C. 216), Hieronymus of Syracuse sent to make overtures to Hannibal, that general selected the two brothers as his envoys to Syracuse. They soon induced the young king to desert the Roman alliance. Upon the murder of Hieronymus shortly after, they were the leaders of the Carthaginian party at Syracuse, and eventually became the masters of the city, which they defended against Marcellus. Epicycles fled to Agrigentum, when he saw that the fall of Syracuse was inevitable. (Liv. xxiv.

Epidamnus. [Dyrrhachium.]

Epidaurus (Ἐπίδωρος: Ἐπιδάουρος). 1. (Epidauria), a town in Argolis on the Saronic gulf, formed with its territory Epidauria (Ἐπιδάουρα), a district independent of Argos, and was not included in Argolis till the time of the Romans. It was originally inhabited by Ionians and Carians, whence it was called Épicarus, but it was subdued by the Dorians under Deiphontes, who thus became the ruling race. Epidaurus was the chief seat of the worship of Asclepius, and was to this circumstance indebted for its importance. The temple of this god, which was one of the most magnificent in Greece, was situated about five miles SW. of Epidaurus. The excavations, begun in 1881, have produced the most important results: the ground plan of the great temple itself has been ascertained; of the Tholos of Polycleetus within the precincts; of the temple of Artemis and the gymnasium: above all, inscriptions of the greatest value as throwing light on the worship of Asclepius have been found (see Ephem. Att. 1881, 1883, p. 197, 1885, 1; ASCLEPIUS). On the slopes of Cynostion above the temple is the theatre, which is of the fourth century B. C., and the best preserved example of a Greek theatre (see description and plan in Dict. of Ant. art. Theatrum).—2. Surnamed Limera (ἡ Λιμηρά: Monembasia or Old Malvasia), a town in Laconia, on the E. coast, said to have been founded by Epidaurus in Argolis (Strab. p. 368).

Epidelium (Ἐπιδήλιον), a town in Laconia on the E. coast, S. of Epidaurus Limera, with a temple of Apollo and an image of the god, which is said to have been thrown into the sea at Delos and to have come to land at this place.

Epigènes (Ἐπιγένης). 1. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, about B. C. 380.—2. Of Sicyon, said to have preceded Thespis, and to have been the most ancient writer of tragedy (Suid. s. v. Thespis).—3. Of Byzantium, a Greek astronomer, mentioned by Seneca (Q. N. vii. 30) and Pliny (vii. 193). He studied in Chaldea, but his date is uncertain.

Epigóni (Ἐπίγονοι), that is, 'the Descendants,' the name in ancient mythology of the sons of the seven heroes who perished before Thebes. [ADRASTUS.] Ten years after their death, the descendants of the seven heroes marched against Thebes to avenge their fathers. For the stories of the Epigoni, see ALCMAEON, AEGIALEUS, DIOMEDES, PROMACHUS, STHENELUS, THERSANDER, EURYALUS, and THEBAE.

Epimenides (Ἐπιμενίδης). 1. A celebrated poet and prophet of Crete, whose history is to a great extent mythical. He was reckoned among the Curetes, and is said to have been the son of a nymph. He was a native of Phaestus in Crete, and appears to have spent the greatest part of his life at Cnossus, whence he is sometimes called a Cnossian. There is a legend that when a boy, he was sent out by his father in search of a sheep, and that seeking shelter from the heat of the midday sun, he went into a cave, and there fell into a deep sleep, which lasted 57 years. On waking and returning home, he found to his great amazement that his younger brother had in the mean time grown an old man. He is further said to have attained the age of 154, 157, or even of 229 years. (Diog. Laërt. i. 109–115; Strab. p. 479; Paus. i. 14, 4.)—His visit to Athens, however, is an historical fact, and determines his date. The Athenians, who were visited by a plague in consequence of the crime of Cylon [CYLON], consulted the Delphic oracle about the means of their delivery. The god commanded them to get their city purified, and the Athenians invited Epimenides to come and undertake the purification. Epimenides accordingly came to Athens, B. C. 596, and performed the desired task by certain mysterious rites and sacrifices, in consequence of which the plague ceased. He refused the large sums of money offered him in gratitude by Athens, and accepted only a branch from the sacred olive of Athene. (Plut. Sol. 12; Aristot. Ἀθ. πολ. 1.)—Epimenides was reckoned by some among the seven wise men of Greece; but all that tradition has handed down about him suggests a different character from that of the others; he must rather be ranked in the class of priestly bards and sages, such as Abaris and Aristeas. Many works, both in prose and verse, were attributed to him by the ancients, and the Apostle Paul has preserved (Titus i. 12) a celebrated verse of his against the Cretans.

Epimætheus. [PROMETHEUS AND PANDORA.]

Epiphânes, a surname of Antiochus IV. and Antiochus XI., kings of Syria.

Epiphania or -ta (Ἐπιφάνεια). 1. In Syria (O. T. Hamath: Hamath), in the district of Cassiotis, on the left bank of the Orontes, an early colony of the Phoenicians; may be presumed, from its later name, to have been restored or improved by Antiochus Epiphanes.

—2. In Asia Minor (Urzin), on the SE. border of Cilicia, close to the Pylæ Amanides, was formerly called Oeniandus, and probably owed its new name to Antiochus Epiphanes. Pompey re-peopled this city with some of the pirates whom he had conquered. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 4; Plin. v. 93; Appian, Mithr. 96.)

Epiphanius (Ἐπιφάνιος), one of the Greek Fathers of the Church. [Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Epipólæ. [SYRACUSAE.]

Epirus (Ἠπειρος: Ἠπειρώτης, fem. Ἠπειρώτις: Albania), that is, 'the mainland,' a country in the NW. of Greece, so called to distinguish it from Corcyra and the other islands off the coast. Homer gives the name of Epirus to the whole of the W. coast of Greece, thus including Acarnania in it. Epirus was bounded by Illyria and Macedonia on the N., by Thessaly on the E., by Acarnania and the Ambracian gulf on the S., and by the Ionian sea on the W. The principal mountains were the Acroceraunii, forming the NW. boundary, and Pindus, forming the E. boundary; besides which there were the mountains Tomarus in the E., and Crania in the S. The chief rivers were the Celydnus, Thyamis, Acheron, and Arachthns.—The inhabitants of Epirus were numerous, but were not of pure Hellenic blood. The original population is spoken of as Pelasgic; and the ancient oracle of Dodona in the country was always regarded as of Pelasgic origin. These early inhabitants, were subsequently mingled with Illyrians, who at various times invaded Epirus and settled in the country. Epirus contained fourteen different tribes. Of these the most important were the CHAONES, THESPROTI and MOLOSSI, who gave their names to the three principal divisions of the country, CHAONIA, THESPROTIA, and MOLOSSIS. The different tribes were originally governed by their own princes. The Molossian princes, who traced their descent from Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus), son of Achilles, subsequently acquired the sovereignty over the whole country, and took the title of kings of Epirus. The first who bore this title was Alexander, who invaded Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Lucanians and Brutii, and perished at the battle of Pandosia, B.C. 326. The most celebrated of the later kings was PYRRHUS, who carried on war with the Romans. About B.C. 200 the Epirotes established a republic; and the Romans, after the conquest of Philip, 197, guaranteed its independence. But in consequence of the support which the Epirotes afforded to Antiochus and Perseus, Aemilius Paulus received orders from the senate to punish them with the utmost severity. He destroyed seventy of their towns, and sold 150,000 of the inhabitants for slaves. In the time of Augustus the country had not yet recovered from the effects of this devastation. Epirus at first formed part of the province of Achaia (Tac. Ann. ii. 37); but from the time of Hadrian (perhaps earlier) it formed an independent procuratorial province, separated from Achaia by the Achelous (C.I.L. iii. 536).

Epirus Nova. [ILLYRIUM.]

Epōna (probably from the Celtic epo, horse), a goddess worshipped at Rome, the protectress of horses and mules. It is probable that she was not, as some have thought, a genuine Italian deity, included in the Indigitamenta, but a somewhat late introduction from Gaul. Her name does not occur in Latin literature before Juvenal (viii. 157; cf. Plut. Parall. min. 29; Tert. Apol. 16; Apul. Met. iii. 27). Most of the inscriptions in her honour come from Gaul, Germany and Britain (C. I. L. iii. 788, 3420, 4776, vii. 747, 1114). Several representations of her have been found, generally seated, and laying her hands on the heads of animals.

Epōpeus (Ἐπώπεις). 1. Son of Poseidon and Canace, came from Thessaly to Sicily, of which place he became king. He carried away from Thebes the beautiful Antiopé, daughter of Nycteus, who therefore made war upon Epopeus. The two kings died of the wounds which they received in the war.—2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates who attempted to carry off Dionysus but were changed by the god into dolphins.

Eporēdia (Ivrea), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Duria, in the territory of the Salassi, colonised by the Romans, B.C. 100, on the command of the Sibylline books, to serve as a bulwark against the neighbouring Alpine tribes (Vell. Pat. i. 15; Strab. p. 205; Plin. iii. 123). It was important as commanding the approach to the Val d'Aosta and to the passes of the Great and Little St. Bernard. [ALPES.]

Eporēdōrix, a chieftain of the Aedui, was one of the commanders of the Aeduan cavalry sent to Caesar's aid against Vercingetorix, in B.C. 52; but he himself revolted soon afterwards and joined the enemy (Caes. B. G. vii. 38).

Epytus, a Trojan, father of Periphas, who was a companion of Iulus, and is called by the patronymic Epytides (Verg. Aen. ii. 340).

Equus Tūticus or Aequum Tūticum, a small town of the Hirpini in Samnium, twenty-one miles from Beneventum (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1). The Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 5, 37) supposes, but without sufficient reasons, that it is the town quod versu dicere non est.

Erae (Ἐραι: Sighajik?), a small but strong seaport town on the coast of Ionia, N. of Teos (Thuc. viii. 19; Strab. p. 664).

Erāna, a town of the Eleutherocilices in the district of M. Amanus, in the time of Cicero (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 4).

Erannobōas (Ἐρᾶνοβόας: Gunduk), a river of India, one of the chief tributaries of the Ganges, into which it fell at Palimbothra.

Erasinides (Ἐρασινίδης), one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Arginusae. He was among the six commanders who returned to Athens after the victory, and were put to death, B.C. 406.

Erasinus (Ἐρασίνοσ). 1. (Kephalari), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the lake Stymphalus, then disappears under the earth, rises again out of the mountain Chaon, and after receiving the river Phrixus, flows through the Lernaean marsh into the Argolic gulf (Strab. p. 275).—2. A small river near Brauron in Attica.

Erasistrātus (Ἐρασίστρατος), a celebrated physician and anatomist, was born at Iulis in the Island of Ceos. He was a pupil of Chryseippus of Cnidos, Metrodorus, and apparently Theophrastus. He flourished from B.C. 300 to 260. He lived for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, where he acquired great reputation by discovering that the illness of Antiochus, the king's eldest son, was owing to his love for his stepmother, Stratonice, the young and beautiful daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, whom Seleucus had lately married (Appian, Syr. 59-61; Plut. Demetr. 38). Erasistratus afterwards lived at Alexandria, which was at the time beginning to be a celebrated medical school. He gave up practice in his old age, that he might pursue his anatomical studies without interruption. He prosecuted his experiments in this branch of medical science with great success, and with so little scruple that he is said to have dissected criminals alive. He had numerous pupils and followers, and a medical school bearing his name continued to exist at Smyrna in Ionia about the beginning of the Christian era.

Erātidae (Ἐρατίδαι), an illustrious family of Ialysus in Rhodes, to which Damagetus and his son Diagoras belonged (Pind. Ol. vii. 20).

Erāto (Ἐρατώ). 1. Wife of Arcas, and mother of Elatus and Aphidas. [ARCAS.]—2. One of the Muses. [MUSAE.]

Eratosthēnes (Ἐρατοσθένης), of Cyrene, was born B.C. 276. He first studied in his native city and then at Athens. He was taught by Ariston of Chios, the philosopher; Lysanias of Cyrene, the grammarian; and Callimachus, the poet. He left Athens at the invitation of Ptolemy Energetes, who placed him over the library at Alexandria. Here he continued till the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes. He died at the age of 80, about B.C. 196, of voluntary starvation, having lost his sight, and being tired of life. He was a man of very extensive learning, and wrote on almost all the branches of knowledge then cultivated—astronomy, geometry, geography, philosophy, history, and grammar. He is supposed to have constructed the large armillae or fixed circular instruments which were long in use at Alexandria. His works have perished, with the exception of some fragments. His most celebrated work was a systematic treatise on geography, entitled Γεωγραφικά, in three books. The first book, which formed a sort of introduction, contained a critical review of the labours of his predecessors from the earliest to his own times, and investigations concerning the form and nature of the earth, which, according to him, was an immovable globe. The second book contained what is now called mathematical geography. He was the first person who attempted to measure the magnitude of the earth, in which attempt he brought forward and used the method which is employed to the present day. The third book contained political geography, and gave descriptions of the various countries, derived from the works of earlier travellers and geographers. In order to be able to determine the accurate site of each place, he drew a line parallel with the equator, running from the pillars of Hercules to the extreme east of Asia, and dividing the whole of the inhabited earth into two halves. Connected with this work was a new map of the earth, in which towns, mountains, rivers, lakes, and climates were marked according to his own improved measurements. This important work of Eratosthenes forms an epoch in the history of ancient geography. Strabo, as well as other writers, made great use of it. Eratosthenes also wrote two poems on astronomical subjects: one entitled 'Ερημῆς, or Καταστερισμοί, which treated of the constellations; and another entitled 'Ηριγόνη; but the poem Καταστερισμοί which is still extant under his name is not the work of Eratosthenes. He wrote several historical works, the most important of which was a chronological work entitled Χρονογραφία, and a grammatical work, On the Old Attic Comedy. The best collection of his fragments is by Bernhardt, Eratosthenica, Berol. 1822.

Erbessus (Ἐρβησσός), a town in Sicily, NE. of Agrigentum, near the sources of the Acragas, which must not be confounded with the town Herbessus near Syracuse (Pol. i. 18).

Ercta (Ἐρικτή, or Ἐρικταί), a fortress in Sicily, on a hill with a harbour, near Panormus. [HAMILCAR.]

Erēbus (Ἐρεβος), son of Chaos, begot Aether and Hemera (Day) by Nyx (Night), his sister. The name signifies darkness, and is therefore applied also to the dark and gloomy space under the earth, through which the shades pass into Hades (Hes. Th. 123).

Erechthēum (Ἐρέχθειον) stood on the site of the ancient temple, said to have been built by ERECTHEUS, which was burnt down by the Persians in B.C. 480. [For its position see plan of ACROPOLIS.] It was supposed to stand upon the spot where Athene and Poseidon strove for the possession of Athens, and (such at least has been the view commonly received) to contain the three shrines, of Athene Polias (the protectress of Athens), of Poseidon, and of Erechtheus. This is, however, now disputed, and it is maintained by archaeologists of great repute, that the old temple of Athene (Xen. Hell. i. 6; Strab. p. 396) discovered by Dr. Dörpfeld was really the shrine of Athene Polias, and that the eastern cella of the Erechtheum never was her shrine, though it contained her most ancient image. [For difficulties in this view see ACROPOLIS; PARTHENON.] The new Erechtheum was begun in the time of Pericles, but it was completed later, being still unfinished in 409 (C. I. A. i. 322, where it is called ὁ νεὸς ἐν ᾧ τὸ ἀρχαῖον ἄγαλμα). In its complete form it was a beautiful Ionic temple, 70 feet long (including the E. portico) and 32 broad. It had three divisions: the eastern portion of the cella contained the oldest image, or ξόανον, of Athene; the central and western parts were sacred to Poseidon and Erechtheus. The main entrance was probably the eastern portico. Pausanias (though the identification of the internal arrangements is only conjectural) entered by the southern porch (the beautiful Caryatid portico), and passed thence into the western hall, where, probably, stood the three altars of Poseidon and Erechtheus, of Bntes, and of Hephaestus; thence he passed into the west cella (the central of the three chambers), in which were the well of salt water, the marks of the trident, and probably the statue of Poseidon: returning to the west hall he went by the side passage and steps up into the eastern cella (usually taken to be the temple of Athene Polias), in which were the ancient wooden image (ξόανον) and the golden lamp of Callimachus. If this was the temple of Athene Polias, he found there also the wooden Hermes. By the side of the main, or eastern, portico there is flight of uncovered steps by which the northern porch (rather larger than the southern) could be approached. This porch gave access by its main door to the western hall, and probably by a side door westwards into the enclosure of the Pandroseum, where stood a small temple of Pandrosos: in this enclosure stood the sacred olive tree. It is by no means certain which part of the building was sacred to Cecrops and spoken of sometimes as the Cecropeion; but it may have been the southern or Caryatid porch. This porch had, instead of columns, six figures of maideus, one of which is now in the British Museum.

Erechtheus. [ERICHTHONIUS.]

Erēsus, or Eressus (Ἐρεσσός, Ἐρεσσός; Ἐπέσιος), a town on the W. coast of the island of Lesbos, the birthplace of Theophrastus and Phanias, and, according to some, of Sappho (Strab. p. 618; Thuc. iii. 25).

Eretria (Ἐρέτρια; Ἐπετριεύς; Aletria), an ancient and important town in Euboea, on the Euripus, with a celebrated harbour Porthmos (Porto Bufalo), was founded by the Athenians, but had a mixed population, among which was a considerable number of Dorians. Its commerce and navy raised it in early times to importance; it contended with Chalcis for the supremacy of Euboea (Thuc. i. 15); it ruled over several of the neighbouring islands, and planted colonies in Macedonia and Italy. It was destroyed by the Persians, B. C. 490, and most of its inhabitants were carried away into slavery (Hdt. vi. 125). Those who were left behind built, at a little distance from the old city, the town of New Eretria, which, however, never became a place of importance. (Strab. pp. 403, 448.)—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, near Pharsalus.

Eretum, a town of the Sabines, at the junction of the Viae Salaria and Nomentana, about eighteen miles from Rome (Verg. Aen. vii. 711; Liv. xxvi. 11).

Erginus (Ἐργίνος), son of Clymenus, king of Orchomenos. After Clymenus had been killed at Thebes, Erginus, who succeeded him, marched against Thebes and compelled the Thebans to pay him an annual tribute of 100 oxen, from which they were released by Heracles, who killed Erginus. (Pind. Ol. xiv. 2; Eur. H. F. 49; Paus. ix. 37, 38.)

Erichthonius (Ἐριχθόνιος), or Erechtheus (Ἐρεχθέυς). In the ancient myths these two names indicate the same person; but later writers mention two heroes, one of whom is usually called Erichthonius or Erechtheus I., and the other Erechtheus II. Homer knows only one Erechtheus, as an autochthon and king of Athens (Il. ii. 547; Od. vii. 81; Hdt. viii. 55); and the first writer who distinguishes them is Pindar (ap. Harpocr. s. v. ἀνδροχόους: cf. Plat. Crit. 110 A).—1. Erichthonius or Erechtheus I., son of Hephaestus and Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus; according to others, of Hephaestus and the Earth (Gaia). Athene received the child from Gaia, and entrusted him to Agraulos, Pandrosos, and Herse, concealed in a chest. They were forbidden to open the chest, but they disobeyed the command. Upon opening it they saw the child with a snake coiled round him, whereupon they were seized with madness, and threw themselves down the rock of the Acropolis, or, according to others, were killed by the snake. Erichthonius was brought up in the temple of Athene (in some stories, under the form of a snake); when he had grown up, he expelled Amphictyon (or, in other accounts, received the kingdom as a gift from Cecrops), and became king of Athens. His wife Pasithea bore him a son, Pandion. He is said to have instituted the festival of the Panathenaea, and to have built a temple of Athene on the Acropolis. He was further the first who used a chariot with four horses, for which reason he was placed among the stars as Auriga. He was buried in the temple of Athene and was worshipped as a god after his death. [ERECHEUM.] The myth probably grew up partly from the adoption of Athene as supreme goddess, when Erichthonius or Erechtheus, originally a local nature-god and = Poseidon, was to be represented as inferior to Athene, and yet connected with her worship; partly from the rites of the Arrhephoria. [Dict. of Ant. s. v.; and PANDROSOS.] The story is given especially in Eur. Ion, Paus. i. 18, and Apollod. iii. 14; but it was represented in works of art earlier than the time of Euripides: especially on an archaic terra-cotta at Berlin, where Athene receives the child from Gaia, while Cecrops, half man, half snake, stands by; and on a vase also at Berlin. The opening of the chest is shown on a later vase in the British Museum.—2. Erechtheus II. (or rather the Erechtheus of the stories which separate Erichthonius from Erechtheus), grandson of the former, son of Pandion by Zeuxippe, and brother of Butes, Procne, and Philomela. After his father's death, he succeeded him as king of Athens, and was regarded in later times as one of the Attic eponymi. He was married to Praxithea, by whom he became the father of Cecrops, Pandoros, Metion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. In the war between the Eleusinians and Athenians, Eumolpus, the son of Poseidon, was slain; whereupon Poseidon demanded the sacrifice of one of the daughters of Erechtheus. [See AGLAUROS.] When one was drawn by lot, her three sisters resolved to die with her; and Erechtheus was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning at the request of Poseidon. This story is first given by Euripides, especially in his Erechtheus (cf. Ion, 267, 1007; Paus. i. 5; Apollod. iii. 15).

Erichthonius, son of Dardanus and Batæa, husband of Astyoche or Callirrhoe, and father of Tros or Assaracus. He was the wealthiest of all mortals; in his fields grazed 3000 mares, which were so beautiful that Boreas fell in love with them. (Il. xx. 219; Ov. Fast. iv. 33.)

Ericinium, a town in Thessaly near Gomphi.

Eridanus (Ἐριδανός), a river god, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Zeuxippe. He is called the king of rivers, and on his banks amber was found. In Homer the name does not occur, and the first writer who mentions it is Hesiod (Th. 338). Herodotus has heard of a river in the north of this name where amber was found (iii. 115). In later times the Eridanus was supposed to be the same as the Padus, because amber was exported from its mouth, brought to that spot probably by traders from the Baltic. Hence the Electrides Insulae or 'Amber Islands' are placed at the mouth of the Po, and here Phaethon was supposed to have fallen when struck by the lightning of Zeus (Paus. i. 4, 1, v. 12, 7). It is not absolutely impossible that Hesiod may have heard of the river Po, though some maintain that this must be a more easterly river. Aeschylus seems to have placed the Eridanus in the west but to have confused it with the Rhone (Plin. xxxvii. 32). Euripides identifies it with the Po (Hipp. 732), and the Latin poets use Padus and Eridanus as synonymous (cf. Plin. iii. 117). [PADUS.]

Erigon (Ἐρίγων), a tributary of the Axios in Macedonia, the Agrianus of Herodotus. [AXIUS.]

Erigonê (Ἐριγόνη). 1. Daughter of Icarus, beloved by Bacchus. For the legend respecting her, see ICARIUS.—2. Daughter of Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, and mother of Penthilus by Orestes. One legend relates that Orestes wanted to kill her with her mother, but that Artemis removed her to Attica, and there made her her priestess. Others state that Erigone put an end to herself when she heard that Orestes was acquitted by the Areiopagus (Paus. ii. 18; Hyg. Fab. 122).

Erīnēus ('Ερινεύς or 'Ερινεὸν: 'Ερινεύς, 'Ερινεάτης). 1. A small but ancient town in Doris, belonging to the Tetrapolis (Thuc. i. 107). [Doris.]—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly.—3. A small river on the E. coast of Sicily (now the Miranda), between the Cacyparis and the Asinarus (Thuc. vii. 30).

Erinna ('Ηρίννα), a Greek poetess, said to have been born in Telos and to have been a contemporary and friend of Sappho (about B.C. 612), who died at the age of 19. On the other hand, Eusebius places her two centuries later. Her chief poem was entitled 'Ηλακάτη, the Distaff: it consisted of 300 lines, of which only four are extant. Three epigrams in the Anthology bear her name. We have nothing to explain the opinion of an ancient critic who compared her to Homer. The poem to Rome beginning χαίρε μοι Πάμνη, in Sapphic metre, which has sometimes been ascribed to Erinna, is by Melinnus, a poetess of Locri, in Italy, of the third century B.C.

Erinyes ('Ερινύς, 'Ερινῦς), also called Eumēnides (Εὐμενίδες), and by the Romans Furiae or Drae, the Avenging Deities, were conceived as the personification of curses pronounced upon a criminal. The name Erinyes is the more ancient one; the Greeks derived it from the Arcadian ἐρινύω, I am angry, so that the Erinyes were the angry goddesses (Paus. viii. 25, 4). Many modern writers take the name to be identical with an Indian goddess Saranyu. The name Eumenides, which signifies 'the kindly deities,' is a mere euphemism, because people dreaded to call these fearful goddesses by their real name (Soph. O. C. 128). It was said to have been first given them after the acquittal of Orestes by the Areiopagus, when the anger of the Erinyes had become soothed. But at Athens their proper title was Σεμναὶ θεαὶ—that is, the venerable goddesses of the earth and of the underworld. Sometimes in the singular Erinyes is spoken of in Homer and in later writers, but they are oftener a plurality of deities. Homer represents them as inhabitants of Erebus, where they remain quiet until some curse pronounced upon a criminal calls them into activity (Il. ix. 568; cf. Aesch. Eum. 72). They watch particularly over the family ties: the crime which they especially punish is failure in duty to parents. This is mentioned eight times in the Iliad and Odyssey, and in all cases except one (Il. ix. 454) Erinyes of the mother are spoken of (cf. Il. xxi. 412; Od. ii. 135). But Homer also makes them intervene sometimes to check those who in other ways overstep the limits of what is becoming or right (cf. Il. xix. 87, 418); and punish the perjured and those who spurn the beggar or the suppliant (Il. xix. 259; Od. xvii. 475). In punishing they took away from men all peace of mind, and led them into misery and misfortune. Hesiod says that they were the daughters of Ge, and sprung from the drops of blood that fell upon her from the body of Uranus; and this, it may be noted, was a case of violence done to a father (Hes. Th. 185). Aeschylus calls them the daughters of Night; and Sophocles of Darkness and Ge (Aesch. Eum. 321; Soph. O. C. 40, 106). Aeschylus describes them as divinities more ancient than the Olympian gods, dwelling in the deep darkness of Tartarus, dreaded by gods and men; with bodies all black, serpents twined in their hair, and blood dripping from their eyes. Euripides and other later poets describe them as winged (Eur. Or. 317; Verg. Aen. xii. 848). Euripides is the earliest Greek poet who gives their number as three (Or. 408; Tro. 457), though not consistently (I. T. 968). With later writers their names are Tisiphōne, Alecto, and Megaera (Verg. Aen. vi. 571, vii. 324, xii. 846; Apollod. i. 1, 4). In their worship at Athens, where they had a sanctuary and a cavern near the Areiopagus, in their worship at Colonos, in that at Sicyon, where a pregnant ewe was offered (Paus. ii. 11, 4), and still more in the Erinyes Thelpusa or Tilphossa, they appear as ancient deities of the powers of the earth, but especially as deities which in anger withheld the fruits of the earth and must by all means be propitiated. This explains the identification of Erinyes Thelpusa with Demeter (i.e. the enraged Demeter: Paus. viii. 25, 4; Schol. Soph. Ant. 126). The offerings to them at Athens were bloodless, cakes and milk and honey mixed with water (νηφάλια), since the drink offering had no wine. This, too, belonged to them as goddesses of the earth, who might give kindly gifts as well as punish. It is true that they are often described by poets in words which belong to lightning and fire, and this may be derived from the idea that Zeus punished often by the thunderbolt; but there is no sufficient ground for saying that the myth of the Erinyes was derived from a thunderstorm. So far from the snake necessarily implying lightning, as some modern writers argue, it is, rather, a symbol of the underworld: the scourge (which is also made to signify lightning) is a natural emblem of the avenger. Their torches have been pressed into the same theory; but may more reasonably be taken to show their power of lighting up the dark places of crime and detecting the guilty. Still less reasonable is it to insist that the obvious comparison of avengers to hounds (e.g. Aesch. Cho. 904) shows them to be cloud-deities. The idea of an avenging power is natural enough to man, and our evidence points rather to the original Erinyes being deities of the earth. In art they seem to have been at first represented as mild and venerable beings (Paus. i. 28, 6); and it is remarked that the Furies are not figured on the oldest vases. The type described above as given by Aeschylus does not seem to be older than his time, but prevailed afterwards. Their attributes, besides the snakes or snaky hair and wings, are the scourge, the torch, and the sickle, and they often appear in hunting garb. They gradually assumed the character of goddesses who punished men after death, and they seldom appeared upon earth.

Eriphus (Ἐριφος), an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy.

Eriphyle (Ἐριφύλη), daughter of Talauus and Lysimache, and wife of Amphiarauus, whom she betrayed for the sake of the necklace of Harmonia. For details see AMPHIARAUS, ALCMAEON, HARMONIA.

Eris (Ἐρις), the goddess of Discord. Homer describes her as the friend and sister of Ares, and as delighting with him in the tumult of war and the havoc and anguish of the battle-field. How far even in Homer she was allegorised is seen by the description 'who, at first small, rears her head until it touches the sky while she walks on the earth' (Il. iv. 440; cf. v. 518, xi. 3, xx. 48; Eur. Phoen. 798). According to Hesiod (Th. 225), she was a daughter of Night, and the poet describes her as the mother of a variety of allegorical beings, which are the causes or representatives of man's misfortunes. The story that Eris threw the golden apple marked 'For the Fairest' into the assembly of gods at the wedding of Peleus (angry, like the malignant fairy in a fairy tale, because she alone was not invited) does not appear earlier than the Alexandrian literature (Hyg. Fab. 92; Apul. Met. 10; Lucian, Symp. 35; Tzetz. Lyc. 93; Serv. ad Aen. i. 27; PARIS).—Virgil introduces Discordia as a being similar to the Homeric Eris; for Discordia in like manner appears in company with Mars, Bellona, and the Furies.

Eriza (τὰ Ἐριζα: Ἐριζήνος), a city of Caria, on the borders of Lycia and Phrygia, on the river Choüs (or rather Caüs). The surrounding district was called Asia Erizēna.

Eros (Ἔρως in older poets Ἔρως), in Latin Amor or Cupido, the god of Love. In order to understand the ancients properly, we must distinguish three gods of this name: (1) the Eros of the ancient cosmogonies; (2) the Eros of the philosophers and mysteries, who bears great resemblance to the first; and (3) the Eros whom we meet with in the epigrammatic and erotic poets. Homer does not mention Eros, and Hesiod, the earliest author who speaks of him, describes him as the cosmogonic Eros. First, says Hesiod, there was Chaos, then came Ge, Tartarus, and Eros, the fairest among the gods, who rules over the minds and the counsel of gods and men. By the philosophers and in the mysteries Eros was regarded as one of the fundamental causes in the formation of the world, inasmuch as he was the uniting power of love, which brought order and harmony among the conflicting elements of which Chaos consisted. The Orphic poets described him as a son of Cronus, or as the first of the gods who sprang from the world's egg; and thus in Plato's Symposium he is called the oldest of the gods (cf. Aristoph. Av. 694). Under this idea he was worshipped from very ancient times at Thespiae, being represented by a mass of stone of unknown antiquity (afterwards replaced by the famous statue of Praxiteles); a somewhat similar ancient worship of Eros existed at Parium, on the Hellespont. These two, both representing an old Thracian religion, were the only places where Eros was really worshipped as a god of the state (Paus. ix. 27). In other parts of Greece we find, as an observance of historical times, the statue of Eros, and sometimes his altar, placed in or near gymnasia. Here he symbolised the affection and regard between companions, which led to the nobler emulation in warlike prowess: hence the Spartans sacrificed to Eros before the combat (Athen. p. 561). The Eros of later poets, who gave rise to that notion of the god which is most familiar to us, is one of the youngest of all the gods. In Pindar and Aeschylus, however, he appears only as a personification of feeling, not as a real Being, and this is also the case on archaic vases.

Eros whetting his darts. (De la Chausse, Gemme Antique.)

As a personal deity he is prominent in Sophocles, and still more so in Euripides. The parentage of this Eros is very differently described. He is usually represented as a son of Aphrodite, but his father is either Ares, Zeus, or Hermes (Plut. Symp. p. 178; Cic. N. D. iii. 23). In this stage Eros has nothing to do with uniting the discordant elements of the universe, or with the higher sympathy or love which binds human kind together, but he is purely the god of sensual love, who bears sway over the inhabitants of Olympus as well as over men and all living creatures. His arms consist of arrows, which he carries in a golden quiver, and of torches which no one can touch with impunity. His arrows are of different power: some are golden, and kindle love in the heart they wound; others are blunt, and produce aversion and disaster (Eur. Iph. Aul. 548; Ov. Met. i. 468). Gentler attributes were flowers, as belonging to the god of spring, the time of love, and the lyre for love songs. In art he was at first generally represented as a beautiful boy approaching the age of a young man; and from an early period, though it is uncertain how early, with wings, which usually denote a δαίμων rather than a θεός. Phidias placed on the base of the statue of Zeus at Olympia Eros receiving Aphrodite the statues of Eros by Praxiteles at Thespiae and Parium were especially famous (Plin. xxxvi. 23), represented no doubt as a youth. Both as a boy and as a child he is often represented as holding or stringing his bow: specially famous instances are that in the Vatican and that at Berlin, perhaps after Lysippus (Paus. ix. 27, 3). In later Greek and Roman times it became common to represent a child Eros with a number of winged Erotes, like a fairy-tale scene, engaged in any sort of work, making wreaths or carpentering. On one gem he is whetting his arrows (cf. Hor. Od. ii. 8, 16). A beautiful mosaic from Pompeii represents him as a child riding on a lion, and with all the attributes of Dionysus, the cup, the ivy crown, the thyrsus, and the tragic and comic masks around. This partly symbolises a connexion between Eros and Dionysus, the gods of wine and love, for the lion belongs to Dionysus; but it can hardly be doubted that the power of Eros to tame and bridle wild beasts is also here shown (as in Eur. Hipp. 1277).—Antēros, which literally means return-love, is usually represented as the god who punishes those who did not return the love of others: thus he is the avenging Eros, or a deus ultor (Ov. Met. xiii. 750). But in some accounts he is described as a god opposed to Eros and struggling against him.—Respecting the connexion between Eros and Psyche, see PSYCHE.

Erotiānus (Ἐρωτιανός), a Greek grammarian or physician in the reign of Nero, wrote a work still extant, entitled τῶν παρ' Ἱπποκράτει Λέξεων Συναγωγή, Vocum, quae apud Hippocratem sunt, Collectio. Edited by Franz, Lips. 1780.

Erubrus (Ruber), a small tributary of the Moselle, near Trèves.

Erymanthus (Ἐρυμάνθος: Olenos). 1. A mountain, 7300 feet high, in Arcadia, on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis, celebrated in mythology as the haunt of the savage Erymanthian boar destroyed by Heracles (Od. vi. 104; Strab. pp. 343, 357). [HERACLES.]—The Arcadian nymph Callisto, who was changed into a she-bear, is called Erymanthis ursa, and her son Areas Erymanthidis ursae custos. [ARCTOS.]—2. A river in Arcadia, which rises in the above-mentioned mountain, and falls into the Alpheus.

Erymandrus or Etymandrus (Ἐρύμανθος, Ἐτύμανδρος Arrian: Helmund), a considerable river in the Persian province of Arachosia, rising in M. Paropamisus, and flowing SW. and W. into the lake called Aria (Zarah).

Erysichthon (Ἐρυσίχθων), that is, 'the Tearer up of the Earth.' 1. Son of Triopas, cut down trees in a grove sacred to Demeter, for which he was punished by the goddess with fearful hunger, as she rises from the sea (Paus. v. 11, 8). It is probable that the silver medallion in the Louvre [see woodcut under Aphrodite, p. 86] represents this piece of sculpture. In the following century so that after spending all his substance on food he made his daughter Mestra (apparently a later addition to the myth) support him by changing herself into various animals and working for him: even that did not suffice, and he devoured his own limbs (Hellan. ap. Athen. 416; Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 34; Ov. Met. viii. 738-878). Some have tried to explain Erysichthon as meaning mildew; a recent ingenious interpretation is that it shows the barrenness and famine which result from destroying forests. The story may at any rate have had to do with tree-worship before it was fitted on to Demeter.—2. Son of Cecrops and Agraulos, died in his father's lifetime on his return from Delos, from whence he brought to Athens the ancient image of Ilithyia (Paus. i. 18, 5).

Eros (as Dionysus) bridling the lion. (A mosaic, from Pompeii.)

Erythini (Ἐρυθῖνοι), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Cromna and Amastris (Il. ii. 855; Strab. p. 545). A range of cliffs near it was called by the same name.

Erythrae (Ἐρυθραί; Ἐρυθραῖος). 1. (Nr. Pigadia, Ru.), an ancient town in Boeotia, not far from Plataeae and Hysia, and celebrated as the mother city of Erythrae in Asia Minor (Hom. Il. ii. 499; Strab. p. 404).—2. A town of the Locri Ozolae, but belonging to the Aetolians, E. of Nanpactus (Liv. xxviii. 8).—3. (Ritri, Ru.), one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, stood at the bottom of a large bay, on the W. side of the peninsula which lies opposite to Chios. Tradition ascribed its foundation to a mixed colony of Cretans, Lycians, Carians, and Pamphylians, under Erythros the son of Rhadamanthus; and the leader of the Ionians, who afterwards took possession of it, was said far S. as it extended, and also eastwards to the shores of India, ἡ Ἐρυθρὴ θάλασσα, and also ἡ Νοτιῆ θάλασσα; though there are, again, some indications of a distinction between these two terms, the latter being applied to the whole expanse of ocean S. of the former; in one passage, however, they are most expressly identified (ii. 158). Afterwards, when the true form of these seas became better known, under the Ptolemies, their parts were distinguished by different names, the main body of the sea being called Indicus Oceanus, the Red Sea Arabicus Sinus, the Persian Gulf Persicus Sinus, and the name Erythraeum Mare being confined by some geographers to the gulf between the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb and the Indian Ocean, but far more generally used as identical with Arabicus Sinus, or the corresponding genuine Latin term, Mare Rubrum (Red Sea). Still, however, even long after the commencement of our era, the name Erythraeum Mare was sometimes used in its ancient sense, as in the Περίπλους τῆς Ἐρυθρᾶς θαλάσσης, ascribed to Arrian, but really the work of a later period, which is a description of the coast from Myos Hormos on the Red Sea to the shores of India. The origin of the name is doubtful: it is generally supposed that the sea was called 'Red' because of the coral banks which fringed it in its southern part.

Eryx (Ἐρυξ). 1. Also Eryxus Mons (S. Giuliano), a steep and isolated mountain in the NW. of Sicily, near Drepanum. On the summit of this mountain stood an ancient and celebrated temple of Aphrodite (Venus), said to have been built by Eryx, king of the Elymi, or, according to Virgil, by Aeneas, but more probably by the Phoenicians, who introduced the worship of Aphrodite into Sicily. [APHRODITE.] From this temple the goddess bore the surname Erycina, under which name her worship was introduced at Rome about the beginning of the second Punic war. At present there are on the summit of the mountain the remains of a castle, originally built by the Saracens.—2. The town of this name was on the W. slope of the mountain. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the time of Pyrrhus, was subsequently rebuilt, but was again destroyed by the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and its inhabitants removed to Drepanum. (Pol. i. 58; Diod. xxiv. 8.)

Esdraëla (Ἐσδραῆλα) and Esdraëlon or Esdrëlon, or -om (Ἐσδραῆλων or -όμ), the Greek names for the city and valley of Jezreel in Palestine.

Esquiliae. [ROMA.]

Essubii, a people in Gaul, W. of the Sequana, also written Essui and Sessuvii (Caes. B. G. ii. 34, iii. 7, v. 24). Their name seems to be preserved in Esimes, a little north of Alençon.

Estiōnes, a people in Rhaetia Secunda or Vindelicia, whose capital was Campodūnum (Kempten) on the Iller (Strab. p. 206).

Eteocles (Ἐτεοκλῆς). 1. Son of Andreus and Euipe, or of Cephisus; said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to the Charites at Orchomenos in Boeotia (Paus. ix. 34, 35).—2. A son of Oedipus and Jocaste (according to Paus. ix. 5, 5, born from a second marriage, with Eurygameia). After his father's flight from Thebes, he and his brother Polyneices undertook the government of Thebes by turns.

But, disputes having arisen between them, Polyneices fled to Adrastus, who then brought about the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. [ADRASTUS.] (Eur. Phoen. 69 ff.; Apollod. iii.

to have been Cnopus, the son of Codrus, after whom the city was also called Κνωπούπολις (Κνωπούπολις). (Strab. p. 633; Polyæn. viii. 43.) The little river Aleos (or rather Axus, as it appears on coins) flowed past the city, and the neighbouring seaport towns of Cyssus or CASYSTES and Phoenicus formed its harbours. Erythrae contained a temple of one of the Idaei Dactyli worshipped here under the name of Heracles Ipoctonos (Paus. ix. 27, 5; Strab. p. 613; HERACLES), and also one of Athene Polias. It was noted also as the dwelling of an inspired prophetess or Sibyl (Strab. p. 645; Tac. Ann. vi. 18); and on the coast near the city was a rock of trachyte called Nigrum Promontorium (ἄκρα μέλαινα), from which mill-stones were hewn.

Erythraeum Mare (ἡ Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, also rarely Ἐρυθραῖος πόντος), was the name applied originally to the whole expanse of sea between Arabia and Africa on the W., and India on the E., including its two great gulfs (the Red Sea and Persian Gulf). In this sense it is used by Herodotus, who also distinguishes the Red Sea by the name of Ἀράβιος κόλπος. [ARABICUS SINUS.] Supposing the shores of Africa and Arabia to trend more and more away from each other the further S. you go, he appears to have called the head of the sea between them ὁ Ἀράβιος κόλπος, and the rest of that sea, as

6; Stat. Theb. i. 137.) When many of the heroes had fallen, Eteocles and Polynices resolved upon deciding the contest by single combat, and both the brothers fell. Sophocles (perhaps to make Antigone's case stronger) throws the blame for this quarrel chiefly on Eteocles, whom he represents as the younger brother (O. C. 375, 1295). Euripides (Phoen. 71) following the commoner tradition makes Eteocles the elder. [ANTIGONE.]

Eteoclus (Ἐτέοκλος), a son of Iphis, was one of the seven heroes who went with Adrastus against Thebes. He had to make the attack upon the Neïtian gate, where he was opposed by Megareus (Aesch. Theb. 456).

Eteōnus (Ἐτεωνός), a town in Boeotia, belonging to the district Parasopia, mentioned by Homer, subsequently called Scarphe (Il. ii. 497; Strab. p. 408).

Etēsiae (Ἐτησαίαι, sc. ἄνεμοι), the Etesian Winds, derived from ἔτος, 'year,' signifying any periodical winds, but more particularly northerly winds, which blew in the Aegean for forty days from the rising of the dog star.

Etis or Etia (Ἐτις, Ἡτεια: Ἡτιος, Ἡτειός), a town in the S. of Laconia near Boeae, said to have been founded by Aeneas, and named after his daughter Etias. Its inhabitants were transplanted at an early time to Boeae, and the place disappeared. (Paus. iii. 22, 11.)

Etovissa, a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Etruria or Tuscā, called by the Greeks Tyrrhēnia or Tyrsēnia (Τυρρηνία, Τυρσηνία), a country in central Italy. The inhabitants were called by the Romans Etrusci or Tusci, by the Greeks Tyrrhēni or Tyrsēni (Τυρρηνοί, Τυρσηνοί), and by themselves Rasēna. Etruria was bounded on the N. and NW. by the Apennines and the river Macra, which divided it from Liguria, on the W. by the Tyrrhene sea or Mare Inferum, on the E. and S. by the river Tiber, which separated it from Umbria and Latium. It was intersected by numerous mountains, offshoots of the Apennines, consisting of long ranges of hills in the N., but in the S. lying in detached masses, and of smaller size. The land was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility, and yielded rich harvests of corn, wine, oil, and flax. The upper part of the country was the most healthy—namely, the part at the foot of the Apennines, near the sources of the Tiber and the Arnus, in the neighbourhood of Arretium, Cortona, and Perugia. The lower part of the country on the coast was marshy and unhealthy, like the Maremma at the present day.—The early history of the population of Etruria has given rise to much discussion in modern times. In their physical form, in their gloomy religion, in their customs, especially of burial, and in their language they were distinct alike from Greeks and Italians. It is admitted on all hands that the people known to the Romans under the name of Etruscans were not the original inhabitants of the country, but a mixed race. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Ligurians in the N. and Sicilians in the S., both of whom were subsequently expelled from the country by the Umbrians. So far most accounts agree; but from this point there is great difference of opinion. The ancients—except one writer, who believed them to be autochthonous (Dionys. i. 28)—generally stated that a colony of Lydians, led by Tyrsenus, son of the king of Lydia, settled in the country, to which they gave the name of their leader (Hdt. i. 94; Strab. p. 221; Plut. Rom. 2; Tac. Ann. iv. 55). It is difficult to believe that no ground for this persistent tradition existed except a fancied resemblance of their name to the Lydian Torrhebi. On the other hand, there is much force in the argument that their oldest and most important settlements were inland, and therefore that they probably arrived by land. It is thought that they came down from Rhaetia, where we are told that the Etruscan language was spoken in historical times (Liv. v. 34): hence they may have migrated into Lombardy and pushed on southwards. It is by no means impossible that this invading race of barbarous Rasena from the north found a people of mixed Greek and Lydian (Tyrrheno-Pelasgian) origin in possession of Etruria, won by them from the Umbrians, and that the Etruscan nation was formed by the union of the conquering Rasena with this more civilised race. If so, the Rasena were numerically strong enough to preserve their language, while the art and to some extent the religion of the Lydian and Greek element were adopted. A likeness has been traced between the character of the tombs in Etruria and in Lydia. The language of a people is the only means by which we can pronounce with certainty respecting their origin. On this point there is the greatest difference of opinion. The most notable views are those of Corssen who pronounces the language to be Italian (a view which Mommsen is on the whole disposed to adopt), and the totally opposite opinion, which is now favoured by Deecke, that it was Turanian or Finnish. If this latter opinion is correct, it would support the idea of an immigration from the north for the Rasena themselves. But it must be confessed that little has as yet been made of their inscriptions, which, indeed, for the most part consist of personal names. [It is possible that a book written on linen, which was found in a mummy case, and has just been recognised as Etruscan, may furnish the key; but as yet the meaning has not been ascertained.] But whatever may have been the origin of the Etruscans, we know that they were a very powerful nation when Rome was still in its infancy, and that they had at an early period extended their dominion over the greater part of Italy, from the Alps and the plains of Lombardy on the one hand, to Vesuvius and the Gulf of Sorrento on the other. These dominions may be divided into three great districts: Circumpadane Etruria in the N., Etruria Proper in the centre, and Campanian Etruria in the S. In each of these districts there were twelve principal cities or states, who formed a confederacy for mutual protection. Through the attacks of the Gauls in the N., and of the Sabines, Samnites, and Greeks in the S., the Etruscans became confined within the limits of Etruria Proper, and continued long to flourish in this country, after they had disappeared from the rest of Italy. Of the twelve cities which formed the confederacy in Etruria Proper no list is given by the ancients. They were most probably CORTONA, ARRETIVM, CLVSIVM, PERUSIA, VOLATERRAE, VETVLONIA, RUSSELLAE, VOLSINI, TARQUINI, VALERII, VOLCI, CAERE more anciently called Agylla. Of these, however, there is no certainty except as regards Volsinii, Tarquinii, Perugia, Vetulonia, and Volci. Each state was independent of all the others. The government was a close aristocracy, and was strictly confined to the Lucumoncs, who united in their own persons the ecclesiastical as well as the civil functions. The people were not only rigidly excluded from all share in the government, but appear to have been in a state of vassalage or serfdom. From the noble and priestly families of the Lucumones a supreme magistrate was chosen, who appears to have been sometimes elected for life, and to have borne the title of king; but his power was much fettered by the noble families. At a later time the kingly dignity was abolished, and the government was entrusted to a senate. A meeting of the confederacy of the twelve states was held annually in the spring, at the temple of Voltumna near Volsinii.—The Etruscans were a highly civilised people, and from them the Romans borrowed many of their religious and political institutions. The last three kings of Rome were undoubtedly Etruscans, and they left in the city enduring traces of Etruscan power and greatness. The Etruscans paid the greatest attention to religion; and their religious system was closely interwoven with all public and private affairs. The principal deities were divided into two classes. The highest class were the 'Shrouded Gods,' who did not reveal themselves to man, and to whom all the other gods were subject. The second class consisted of the twelve great gods, six male and six female, called by the Romans Dii Consentes. [CONSENTES.] They formed the council of Tina or Tinia, the Roman Jupiter, and the two other most powerful gods of the twelve were Cupra, corresponding to Juno, and Menrva or Menerva, corresponding to the Roman Minerva. Besides these two classes of gods, there was a great number of other gods, penates and lares, to whom worship was paid. The mode in which the gods were worshipped was prescribed in certain sacred books, said to have been written by TAGES. These books contained the 'Etrusca Disciplina,' and gave minute directions respecting the whole of the ceremonial worship. They were studied in the schools of the Lucumones, to which the Romans also were accustomed to send some of their noblest youths for instruction; since it was from the Etruscans that the Romans borrowed most of their arts of divination.—In architecture, the Etruscans were acquainted with the use of the arch at an early period, and they employed it in constructing the great cloacae at Rome. In sculpture and painting also they attained to great skill, but it was rather skilful imitation than an original school of art. In the Etruscan tombs some Greek and some Egyptian influence may be traced. The Etruscan bronze statues were famous ('Tyrrhena sigilla,' Hor. Ep. ii. 2, 180) and examples still remain, especially the She Wolf of the Capitol and the Orator of the Florence Gallery. The beautiful vases which have been discovered in such numbers in Etruscan tombs cannot be cited as proofs of the excellence of Etruscan workmanship, since it is now admitted by the most competent judges, that these vases were either made in Greece, or by Greek artists settled in Italy; and though the bronze mirrors are a special product of Etruria, the engravings on them are Greek in design and origin. The Etruscans were skilled also in terracotta ornamentation, sometimes in works of great size, e.g. the Sarcophagus in the British Museum.—Of the private life of the Etruscans we have a lively picture from the paintings discovered in their tombs; but into this subject our limits forbid us to enter.—In their earlier history they were allied with the Carthaginians, with whose aid they occupied and retained Corsica: and, as might be expected, they were at enmity with the Syracusans, who defeated them in 474 at Cyme, and who sought by incursions on the coasts of Etruria to repress the Tuscan pirates. Later the history of Etruria is a struggle against the rising power of Rome, to which it was finally compelled to yield. After the capture of Veii by the dictator Camillus, B. C. 396, the Romans obtained possession of the E. part of Etruria; and the Ciminian forest, instead of the Tiber, now became the boundary of the two people. The defeat of the Etruscans by Q. Fabius Maximus, in 310, was a great blow to their power. They still endeavoured to maintain their independence with the assistance of the Samnites and the Gauls; but after their decisive defeat by Cornelius Dolabella in 283, they became the subjects of Rome. In 91 they received the Roman franchise. The numerous military colonies established in Etruria by Sulla and Augustus destroyed to a great extent the national character of the people, and the country thus became in course of time completely Romanised.

Euboea (Ἐββοία: Eὔβοιεύς, Eὔβοεύς, fem. Eὔβοίς). 1. (Negropont), the largest island of the Aegean sea, lying along the coasts of Attica, Boeotia, and the S. part of Thessaly, from which countries it is separated by the Euboean sea, called the Euripus in its narrowest part. Euboea is about ninety miles in length; its extreme breadth is thirty miles, but in the narrowest part it is only four miles across. Throughout the length of the island runs a lofty range of mountains (a prolongation of Mt. Othrys), which rise in one part as high as 7266 feet above the sea. It has a dangerous rocky shore towards the Aegean, but good harbours, such as Chalcis and Eretria on its western coast. It contains nevertheless many fertile plains, and was celebrated in antiquity for the excellence of its pasturage and corn-fields. According to the ancients it was once united to Boeotia, from which it was separated by an earthquake (Plin. iv. 63; cf. Strab. p. 58). In Homer the inhabitants are called Abantes, and are represented as taking part in the expedition against Troy (Il. ii. 536; Strab. p. 445). In the N. of Euboea dwelt the Histiaei, from whom that part of the island was called Histiaea; below these were the Ellopii, who gave the name of Ellopia to the district, extending as far as Aegea and Cerinthus; and in the S. were the Dryopes. The centre of the island was inhabited chiefly by Ionians. At what time the Ionians came there it is impossible to say; but there was probably at an early date an amalgamation of these Greek immigrants with the Abantes, who were a Thracian people (Strab. l. c.; Hdt. i. 146). It was in this part of Euboea that the Athenians planted the colonies of CHALCIS and ERETRIA, which were the two most important cities in the island. After the Persian wars Euboea became subject to the Athenians, who attached much importance to its possession; and consequently Pericles made great exertions to subdue it when it revolted in B. C. 445. For its wars in 350 see CALLIAS. Under the Romans Euboea formed part of the province of Achaia.—Since Cumae in Italy was a colony from Chalcis in Euboea, the adjective Euboicus is used by the poets in reference to the former city. Thus Virgil (Aen. vi. 2) speaks of Euboicus Cumarum oris.—2. A town in the interior of Sicily, founded by Chalcis in Euboea, but destroyed at an early period.

Eubulides (Ἐββουλίδης). 1. Of Miletus, a philosopher of the Megaric school. He was a contemporary of Aristotle, against whom he wrote with great bitterness; and he is stated to have given Demosthenes instruction in dialectics. He is said to have invented the forms of several of the most celebrated false and captious syllogisms. (Diog. Laërt. i. 111.)—2. An Athenian sculptor of the second century B.C. son of Eucheir. Pausanias (i. 2, 5) mentions an Apollo by him in a precinct of Dionysus near the Dipylon Gate. Portions of a group by him were excavated in this neighbourhood in 1837, and a marble head of Athene by him was found in 1874. These fragments may all be parts of the votive offering mentioned by Pausanias, but this is a disputed question on which there is no sufficient evidence.

Eubulus (Εὐβουλος). 1. An Athenian, of the demus Anaphlystus, a distinguished orator and statesman, was one of the most formidable opponents of Demosthenes. It was with him that Aeschines served as secretary in the earlier part of his life.—2. An Athenian, son of Euphranor, of the Cettian demus, a distinguished poet of the Middle Comedy, flourished B.C. 376. He wrote 104 plays, of which there are extant more than fifty titles. His plays were chiefly on mythological subjects. Several of them contained parodies of passages from the tragic poets, and especially from Euripides (Meineke, Frag. Com. Gr.).

Euclides (Εὐκλείδης). 1. The celebrated mathematician, who has almost given his own name to the science of geometry in every country in which his writings are studied; but we know next to nothing of his private history. The place of his birth is uncertain. He lived at Alexandria in the time of the first Ptolemy, B.C. 323–283, and was the founder of the Alexandrian mathematical school. He was of the Platonic sect, and well read in its doctrines. It was his answer to Ptolemy, who asked if geometry could not be made easier, that there was no royal road. Of the numerous works attributed to Euclid the following are still extant:—1. Στοιχεῖα, the Elements, in 13 books, with a fourteenth and fifteenth added by HYPsicLES. 2. Δεδομένα, the Data, containing 100 propositions, with a preface by Marinus of Naples. 3. Κατατομή Κανόνος, the Division of the Scale. 4. A work on astronomy, called Φαινόμενα, the Appearances (of the heavens). Besides these, Εἰσαγωγή Ἀρμονική (an introduction to music), Ὀπτικά (on Optics) and Κατοπτρικά (on Catoptrics) have been attributed to him, but are probably by other writers. The only complete edition of all the reputed works of Euclid is that published at Oxford, 1703, folio, by David Gregory, with the title Εὐκλείδου τὰ σωζόμενα. The Elements and the Data were published in Greek, Latin, and French, in 3 vols. 4to, Paris, 1814–16–18, by Peyrard. The most convenient edition for scholars of the Greek text of the Elements is the one by August, Berol. 1826, 8vo.—2. Of Megara, was one of the chief of the disciples of Socrates, but before this, he had studied the doctrines, and especially the dialectics, of the Eleatics. Socrates on one occasion reproved him for his fondness for subtle and captious disputes. On the death of Socrates (B.C. 399), Euclides took refuge in Megara, and there established a school which distinguished itself chiefly by the cultivation of dialectics. The doctrines of the Eleatics [PARMENIDES] formed the basis of his philosophical system; but, while he held that the real existence or 'God' was one and unchangeable, he gives it various names, 'God,' 'Reason' &c., to explain how that which was one appeared to be many. With these he blended the ethical and dialectical principles of Socrates. He was the author of six dialogues, none of which, however, have come down to us. He has frequently been confounded with the mathematician of the same name. The school which he founded was called sometimes the Megaric, sometimes the Dialectic or Eristic. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 108; Cic. Acad. ii. 42, 129; Gell. vi. 10.)—3. The Archon Euclides was Arch. Eponymus in B.C. 403 (Ol. 94, 2), which is an important epoch both as marking the restored constitution after the fall of the Thirty, and also the adoption of the full Ionic alphabet of twenty-four letters instead of the old Attic alphabet. Thenceforth the laws and all state acts were to be written in the full Ionic alphabet. (Plut. Arist. 1; Arist. Ἀθ. πολ. 39.)

Eucratides (Εὐκρατίδης), king of Bactria, from about B.C. 181 to 161, was one of the most powerful of the Bactrian kings, and made great conquests in the N. of India.

Euctemon, the astronomer. [METON.]

Eudamidas (Εὐδαμίδας). I., King of Sparta, reigned from B.C. 330 to about 300. He was the younger son of Archidamus III., and succeeded his brother Agis III.—II., King of Sparta, was son of Archidamus IV., whom he succeeded, and father of Agis IV.

Eudemus (Εὐδήμος). 1. Of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, and one of the most important of Aristotle's disciples. He edited many of Aristotle's writings; and one of them even bears the name of Eudemus—namely, the Ἠθικὰ Εὐδήμεια, which work was in all probability a recension of Aristotle's lectures edited by Eudemus [see p. 118].—2. The physician of Livilla, the wife of Drusus Caesar, assisted her and Sejanus in poisoning her husband, A.D. 23.

Eudocia (Εὐδοκία). 1. Originally called Athenais, daughter of the sophist Leontius, was distinguished for her beauty and attainments. She married the emperor Theodosius II., A.D. 421; and on her marriage she embraced Christianity, and received at her baptism the name of Eudocia. She died at Jerusalem, A.D. 460. The theological cento formed from Homer is attributed to her (Teucher, Lips. 1793).—2. Of Macrembolis, wife of the emperors Constantine XI. Ducas and Romanus IV. Diogenes (A.D. 1059–1071), wrote a dictionary of history and mythology, which she called Ἰωνία, Violarium, or Bed of Violets. Printed for the first time by Villoison, in his Anecdota Graeca, Venice, 1781. Its sources are nearly the same as those used by Suidas.

Eudoses, a people in Germany near the Varini, probably in the modern Mecklenburg.

Eudoxus (Εὐδόξος). 1. Of Cnidus, son of Aeschines, a celebrated astronomer, geometer, physician, and legislator, lived about B.C. 366. He was a pupil of Archytas and Plato, and also went to Egypt, where he studied some time with the priests. He afterwards returned to Athens, but it would appear that he must have spent some time in his native place, for Strabo says that the observatory of Eudoxus at Cnidus was existing in his time. He died at the age of fifty-three. He is said to have been the first who taught in Greece the motions of the planets; and he is also stated to have made separate spheres for the stars, sun, moon, and planets. He wrote various works on astronomy and geometry, which are lost; but the substance of his Φαινόμενα is preserved by ARATUS, who turned into verse the prose work by Eudoxus with that title. (Strab. pp. 119, 806; Sen. Q. N. vii. 3.)—2. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was by birth a Sicilian and the son of Agathocles.—3. Of Cyzicus, a geographer, who went from his native place to Egypt, and was employed by Ptolemy Euergetes and his wife Cleopatra in voyages to India; but afterwards being robbed of all his property by Ptolemy Lathyrus, he sailed away down the Red Sea, and at last arrived at Gades. He afterwards made attempts to circumnavigate Africa in the opposite direction, but without success. He lived about B.C. 130. (Strab. p. 98.)

Eugamon (Εὐγάμων), one of the Cyclic poets, was a native of Cyrene, and lived about B.C. 568. His poem (Τηλεγονία) was a continuation of the Odyssey, and formed the conclusion of the epic cycle. It concluded with the death of Odysseus.

Eugānei, a people who formerly inhabited Venetia on the Adriatic sea, and were driven towards the Alps and the Lacus Benacus by the Heneti or Veneti (Liv. i. 1; Plin. iii. 130, 134). According to some traditions they founded Patavium, Verona and Altinum, in the neighbourhood of which were the Euganei Colles. They possessed numerous flocks of sheep, the wool of which was celebrated (Juv. viii. 15; Mart. xiv. 155).

Euhēmērus (Εὐήμερος), probably a native of Messene in Sicily, lived at the court of Cassander in Macedonia, about B.C. 316. Cassander furnished him with the means to undertake a voyage of discovery. He is said to have sailed down the Red Sea and round the southern coasts of Asia, until he came to an island called Panchaea. After his return he wrote a work entitled 'Ἐρὰ Ἀναγραφῆ, or a Sacred History, in nine books. He gave this title to his work because he pretended to have derived his information from Ἀναγραφαί, or inscriptions in temples, which he had discovered in his travels, especially in the island of Panchaea. Euhemerus had been trained in the school of the Cyrenaics, who were notorious for their scepticism in matters connected with the popular religion; and the object of his work was to exclude everything supernatural from the popular religion, and to dress up the myths as so many plain histories. In his work the several gods were represented as having originally been men who had distinguished themselves either as warriors, or benefactors of mankind, and who after their death were worshipped as gods by the grateful people. Zeus, for example, was a king of Crete, who had been a great conqueror; and Euhemerus asserted that he had seen in the temple of Zeus Triphylus a column with an inscription detailing all the exploits of the kings Uranus, Cronus, and Zeus (Plut. Is. et Os. 23; Euseb. Præp. Ev. ii. 2; Strab. pp. 47, 102, 104, 299). The book was written in an attractive style, and became very popular, and many of the subsequent historians, such as Diodorus, adopted his mode of dealing with myths. Ennius made a Latin translation of the work (Cic. N. D. i. 42, 119). This method of rationalising ancient myths (generally a false explanation) was followed in later times, and called Euhemerism.

Eulaeus (Εὐλαῖος: O. T. Ulai: Karoon), a river in Susiana, on the borders of Elymais, rises in Great Media, flows S. through Mesobateue, passing E. of Susa, and, after uniting with the Pasitigris and the Choaspes, falls into the head of the Persian Gulf.

Eumæus (Εὐμαῖος), the faithful swineherd of Odysseus, had been carried away from his father's house by a Phœnician slave, and Phœnician sailors, who sold him to Laërtes, the father of ODYSSEUS.

Eumēlus (Εὐμηλος). 1. Son of Admetus and Alcestis, went with eleven ships from Phœrae to Troy. He was distinguished for his excellent horses, which had once been under the care of Apollo. His wife was Iphithima, daughter of Icarus (Il. ii. 711, xxiii. 375, 536; Od. iv. 798; Strab. p. 436).—2. Of Corinth, one of the Bacchiadae, an ancient Epic poet, flourished about B.C. 760. His principal poem seems to have been his Corinthian History.

Eumēnes (Εὐμένης). 1. Of CARDIA, served as private secretary to Philip and Alexander, whom he accompanied throughout his expedition in Asia, and who treated him with marked confidence and distinction. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 323) Eumenes obtained the government of Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, which provinces had never yet been conquered by the Macedonians. Eumenes entered into a close alliance with Perdiccas, who subdued these provinces for him. When Perdiccas marched into Egypt against Ptolemy, he committed to Eumenes the conduct of the war against Antipater and Craterus in Asia Minor. Eumenes met with great success; he defeated Neoptolemus, who had revolted from Perdiccas; and subsequently he again defeated the combined armies of Craterus and Neoptolemus: Craterus himself fell, and Neoptolemus was slain by Eumenes with his own hand, after a deadly struggle in the presence of the two armies. Meantime the death of Perdiccas in Egypt changed the aspect of affairs. Antigonus now employed the whole force of the Macedonian army to crush Eumenes. The struggle was carried on for some years (320-316). It was conducted by Eumenes with consummate skill; and notwithstanding the numerical inferiority of his forces, he maintained his ground against his enemies, till he was surrendered by the Argyraspids to Antigonus, by whom he was put to death, 316. He was forty-five years old at the time of his death. Of his ability, both as a general and a statesman no doubt can be entertained; and it is probable that he would have attained a far more important position among the successors of Alexander, had it not been for the accidental disadvantage of his birth. But as a Greek of Cardia, and not a native Macedonian, he was constantly looked upon with dislike both by his opponents and companions in arms (Life by Plutarch and by Nepos; cf. Diod. xviii., xix.; Arrian, Anab. vii.).—2. I., King of PERGAMUM, reigned B.C. 263-241; and was the successor of his uncle, Philetæus. He obtained a victory near Sardis over Antiochus Soter, and thus established his dominion over the provinces in the neighbourhood of his capital (Strab. p. 624).—3. II., King of PERGAMUM, reigned B.C. 197-159; and was the son and successor of Attalus I. He inherited from his predecessor the friendship and alliance of the Romans, which he took the utmost pains to cultivate. He supported the Romans in their war against Antiochus; and after the conquest of the latter (190) he received from the senate Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygias, and Lycaonia, as well as Lysimachia, and the Thracian Chersonese. (Liv. xxxvii. 45-55; Pol. xxii. 1-27.) By this means he was at once raised from a state of comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a powerful monarchy. Subsequently he was involved in war with Pharnaces, king of Pontus, and Prusias, king of Bithynia, but both wars were brought to a close by the interposition of the Romans (Pol. xxv. 2). At a later period Eumenes was regarded with suspicion by the Roman senate, because he was suspected of having corresponded secretly with Perseus, king of Macedonia, during the war of the latter with the Romans (Pol. xxx. 17, xxxii. 5). For the splendour of his capital see PERGAMUM.

Eumēnia (Ἐυμένεια or Ἐδυμένα: Isheklî), a city of Great Phrygia, on the rivers Glaucus and Cludrus, N. of the Maeander, named by Attalus II. after his brother Eumenes II.

Eumenides. [ERINYES.]

Eumenius, a Roman rhetorician of Augustodunum (Autun) in Gaul, held a high office under Constantius Chlorus. He is the author of four orations in the 'Panegyrici Veteres.'

Eumolpus (Ἐυμόλπος), that is 'the good singer,' a Thracian bard, usually represented as a son of Poseidon and Chione, the daughter of Boreas. As soon as he was born, he was thrown into the sea by his mother, who was anxious to conceal her shame, but was preserved by his father Poseidon, who had him educated in Ethiopia by his daughter Benthescyma. When he had grown up, he married a daughter of Benthescyma; but as he made an attempt upon the chastity of his wife's sister, he was expelled together with his son Ismarus. They went to the Thracian king Tegyrus, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismarus; but as Eumolpus drew upon himself the suspicion of Tegyrus, he was again obliged to take to flight, and came to Eleusis in Attica, where he formed a friendship with the Eleusians. After the death of his son Ismarus, he returned to Thrace at the request of Tegyrus. The Eleusians, who were involved in a war with Athens, called Eumolpus to their assistance. Eumolpus came with a numerous band of Thracians, but he was slain by Erechtheus. Eumolpus was regarded as the founder of the Eleusinau mysteries, and as the first priest of Demeter and Dionysus. He was succeeded in the priestly office by his son Ceryx (who was, according to some accounts, the son of Hermes), and his family, the Eumolpidae, continued till the latest times the priests of Demeter at Eleusis. (Apolod. iii. 14, 4; Paus. i. 38, 2, ii. 14, 3; Hymn. ad Cer. 476.)—The legends connected Eumolpus with Hercules, whom he is said to have instructed in music, or initiated into the mysteries (Theocr. xix. 110, where he is called son of Philammon). Another story makes him son of Musaeus. It is probable that part of his story is due to the old worship of Poseidon in Attica, and part to the connexion of the Eumolpidae with the mysteries, for which reason Eumolpus is made the planter of trees and vines (Plin. vii. 199).

Euparius (Ἐυάριος), a Greek sophist, was born at Sardis A.D. 347, and lived and taught at Athens as late as the reign of Theodosius II. He wrote, 1. Lives of Sophists (Βίοι φιλοσόφων καὶ σοφιστῶν), still extant, which supply us with our only information respecting the Neoplatonism of that period. Edited by Boissonade, Amsterdam, 1822. 2. A continuation of the history of Dexippus (Μετὰ Δέξιππον χρονικὴ ἱστορία), in fourteen books, began with A.D. 270, and went down to 404, of which we have only extracts published along with Dexippus. [DEXIPPUS.]

Eunēus (Ἐυνῆος or Ἐβνεύς), a son of Jason and Hypsipyle in Lemnos, supplied the Greeks with wine during their war against Troy. He purchased Lycaon of Patroelus for a silver urn. (Il. vii. 468, xxiii. 747; HYPISPYLE.)

Eunōmia. [HORAE.]

Eunōmus (Ἐβνομός), king of Sparta, is described by some as the father of Lycurgus and Polydectes (Paus. iii. 7; Plut. Lyc. 2). Herodotus, on the contrary, places him in his list after Polydectes (viii. 131). In all probability, the name was invented with reference to the Lyncurgen Eβνομία, and Eunomus, if not wholly rejected, must be identified with Polydectes.

Eunus (Ἐβνός), a Sicilian slave, and a native of Apamea in Syria, was the leader of the Sicilian slaves in the Servile war. He attracted attention by pretending to the gift of prophecy, by appearing to breathe flames from his mouth, and other similar juggleries. He was proclaimed king, and soon collected formidable forces, with which he defeated several Roman armies. The insurrection now became so formidable that for three successive years (B.C. 134–132) three consuls were sent against the insurgents, and it was not till the third year (132) that the revolt was finally put down, by the consul Rnpilius. Eunus was taken prisoner, and died in prison at Morgantia. (Diod. Fr. 34; Liv. Ep. 56; Plut. Sull. 36.)

Eupālium (Ἐυπάλιον: Eυπαλιεύς), a town of the Locri Ozolae, subsequently included in Aetolia Epictetus (Strab. p. 427).

Eupātōr (Ἐυπάτωρ), a surname assumed by many of the kings in Asia. See ANTIOCHUS, MITHRIDATES.

Eupatoria. [MAGNOPOLIS.]

Eupatōrium (Ἐυπατόριον: Eupatoria), a town in the Chersonesus Taurica, founded by Mithridates Eupator (Strab. p. 312).

Euphāēs (Ἐυφάης), king of the Messenians, fell in battle against the Spartans in the first Messenian war. He was succeeded by ARISTODEMUS.

Euphēmus (Ἐυφῆμος), son of Poseidon by Europe, the daughter of Tityus, or by Meconice or Oris, a daughter of Orion or Eurotas (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 15). According to one account he was an inhabitant of Panopeus on the Cephissus in Phocis, and according to another of Hyria in Boeotia, and afterwards lived at Taenarus. He was married to Laonome, the sister of Hercules; he was one of the Calydonian hunters, and the helmsman of the vessel of the Argonauts, and, by a power which his father had granted to him, he could walk on the sea just as on firm ground. He is mentioned also as the ancestor of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. (Ap. Rh. i. 182; Pind. Pyth. iv. 1; Hdt. iv. 150.)

Euphorbus (Ἐυφορβός). 1. Son of Panthous, one of the bravest of the Trojans, was slain by Menelaus, who subsequently dedicated the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Hera, near Mycenae (Il. xvi. 806, xvii. 1; Paus. ii. 17, 3; Gell. iv. 11). Pythagoras asserted that he had once been the Trojan Euphorbus, and in proof of his assertion took down at first sight the shield of Euphorbus from the temple of Hera (κλῆρο Trojana refixo tempora testatus, Hor. Od. i. 28, 11).—2. Physician of Juba II., king of Mauretania, about the end of the first century B.C., and brother to Antonius Musa, the physician to Augustus.

Euphōrion (Ἐυφορίων). 1. Father of the poet Aeschylus.—2. Son of Aeschylus, who brought out four plays of his father, not produced on the stage in the lifetime of their author. Each won the first prize. He also wrote plays himself.—3. Of Chalcis in Euboea, an eminent grammarian and poet, son of Polymnotus, was born about B.C. 274. He became the librarian of Antiochus the Great, 221, and died in Syria, either at Apamea, or at Antioch. Of his works fragments are collected by Meineke, in Analecta Alexandrina, Berol. 1843.

Euphrānor (Εὐφράνωρ), a distinguished sculptor and painter, was a native of the Corinthian isthmus, but worked at Athens about B.C. 536. He was noted for power of expression. His most celebrated statues were the Apollo Patroos (Paus. i. 3, 3), and the Paris, which expressed alike the judge of the goddesses, the lover of Helen, and the slayer of Achilles. His best paintings were preserved in a porch in the Ceramicus at Athens. On the one side were the twelve gods; and on the opposite wall Theseus, with Democracy and Demos. (Plin. xxxiv. 77, xxxv. 128.)

Euphrātes (Εὐφράτης), an eminent Stoic philosopher, was a native of Tyre, or, according to others, of Byzantium. He was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny. In his old age he became tired of life, and obtained from Hadrian permission to put an end to himself by poison. (Plin. Ep. i. 10; Dio Cass. lxi. 8.)

Euphrātes (Εὐφράτης): O. T. Phrat: El-Frat), a great river of W. Asia, forming the boundary of Upper and Lower Asia, consists, in its upper course, of two branches, both of which rise in the mountains of Armenia. The N. branch (Kara-Su), which is the true Euphrates, rises in the mountain above Erzeroum (the M. Abus or Capotes of the ancients) and flows W. and SW. to a little above lat. 39° and E. of long. 39°, where it breaks through the chain of the Anti-Taurus, and, after receiving the S. branch (Mourad-Chai), or, as the ancients called it, the ARSANIAS, it breaks through the main chain of the Taurus between Meitene and Samosata, and then flows in a general S. direction, till it reaches lat. 36°, whence it flows in a general SE. direction, till it approaches the Tigris opposite to Seleucia, where the distance between the two rivers was reckoned at only 200 stadia. Then it flows through the plain of Babylonia, at first receding further from the Tigris, and afterwards approaching it again, till it joins it about 60 miles above the mouth of the Persian Gulf, having already had its waters much diminished by numerous canals, which irrigated the country in ancient times, but the neglect of which at present has converted much of the once fertile district watered by the Euphrates into a marshy desert. The whole length of the Euphrates is between 500 and 600 miles. In its upper course, before reaching the Taurus, its N. branch and a part of the united stream divided Armenia Major from Colchis and Armenia Minor, and its lower course divided Mesopotamia from Syria. Its chief tributary, besides the Arsanias, was the CHABORAS. [Hdt. i. 180; Strab. pp. 521, 739, 746.]

Euphron (Εὐφρων), an Athenian poet of the New Comedy, whose plays, however, partook largely of the character of the Middle Comedy.

[CHARIS.]

Eupōlis (Εὐπολις), son of Sosipolis, an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, and one of the three who are distinguished by Horace, in his well-known line, 'Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque poetae,' above all the others 'quorum prisca comoedia virorum est.' He was born about B.C. 446, and is said to have exhibited his first drama in his seventeenth year, 429, two years before Aristophanes. The date of his death is uncertain. The common story was that Alcibiades, when sailing to Sicily

(415), threw Eupolis into the sea, in revenge for an attack which he had made upon him in his Βάπται; but this cannot be true, as we know that Eupolis produced plays after the Sicilian expedition. He probably died in 411. The chief characteristic of the poetry of Eupolis seems to have been the liveliness of his fancy, and the power which he possessed of imparting its images to the audience. In elegance he is said to have even surpassed Aristophanes, while in bitter jesting and personal abuse he emulated Cratinus. Among the objects of his satire was Socrates, on whom he made a bitter, though less elaborate attack than that in the Clouds of Aristophanes. The dead were not exempt from his abuse, for there are still extant some lines of his in which Cimon is most unmercifully treated. A close relation subsisted between Eupolis and Aristophanes, not only as rivals, but as imitators of each other. Cratinus attacked Aristophanes for borrowing from Eupolis, and Eupolis in his Βάπται made the same charge, especially with reference to the Knights. The Scholiasts specify the last Parabasis of the Knights as borrowed from Eupolis. On the other hand, Aristophanes, in the second (or third) edition of the Clouds, retorts upon Eupolis the charge of imitating the Knights in his Maricas. The truth may be that Eupolis to some extent collaborated with Aristophanes in this play and considered that the obligation was not sufficiently acknowledged. (Meineke, Frag. Comv. Graec. 1847.)

Eupompus (Εὐπομπός), of Sicyon, a distinguished Greek painter, was the contemporary of Zeuxis, Parrhasius, and Timanthes, and the instructor of Pamphilus, the master of Apelles. The fame of Eupompus caused the Sicyonian school to take its place beside the Ionic and Attic (Plin. xxxv. 74).

Euripides (Εὐριπίδης). 1. The third great Attic tragedian, was the son of Mnesarchus and Clito, and is said to have been born at Salamis, B.C. 480, on the very day that the Greeks defeated the Persians off that island, whither his parents had fled from Athens on the invasion of Xerxes. Some writers relate that his parents were in mean circumstances, and his mother is represented by Aristophanes as a herb-seller (Ach. 454, Thesm. 387, Eq. 19, Ran. 339), but this is a tale unworthy of credit: it is contradicted by Philochorus; and we know, too, that the poet, when a boy, was cup-bearer to a chorus of noble Athenians at the Thargelian festival—an office for which nobility of blood was requisite—and that he was taught rhetoric by Prodicus, who was certainly not moderate in his terms for instruction, and who was in the habit of seeking his pupils among youths of high rank. It is said that the future distinction of Euripides was predicted by an oracle, promising that he should be crowned with 'sacred garlands,' in consequence of which his father had him trained to gymnastic exercises; and we learn that, while yet a boy, he won the prize at the Eleusian and Thesean contests, and offered himself, when seventeen years old, as a candidate at the Olympic games, but was not admitted because of some doubt about his age. But he soon abandoned gymnastic pursuits, and studied the art of painting, not, as we learn, without success. To philosophy and literature he devoted himself with much interest and energy, studying physics under Anaxagoras and rhetoric, as we have already seen, under Prodicus. He lived on intimate terms with Socrates, and traces of the teaching of Anaxagoras have been remarked in many passages of his plays. He is said to have written a tragedy at the age of eighteen; but the first play which was exhibited in his own name was the Peliades, when he was twenty-five years of age (u. c. 455). In 441 he gained for the first time the first prize, and he continued to exhibit plays until 408, the date of the Orestes. Soon after this he left Athens for the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, his reasons for which step can only be matter of conjecture. It was alleged that he was disgusted by the taunts of the comic poets about his unhappy domestic relations: for his first wife, Choerile, was divorced for infidelity, and the second, Melito, separated from him. But these are rather matters of ill-natured gossip, and it may be believed that other causes led him to accept an invitation from Archelaus, at whose court the highest honours awaited him. The attacks of Aristophanes and others had probably not been without their effect, and he must have been aware that his philosophical tenets were regarded with considerable suspicion. He died in Macedonia in 406, at the age of seventy-five. Little credit need be given to the story that he was torn in pieces by the king's dogs, which, according to some, were set upon him through envy by Arrhidaeus and Crateuas, two rival poets. The regret of Sophocles for his death is said to have been so great, that at the representation of his next play

he made his actors appear unowned. The accounts which we find in some writers of the profligacy of Euripides are mere idle scandal, and scarcely worthy of serious refutation. Nor does there appear to be any better foundation for that other charge which has been brought against him, of hatred to the female sex. He was a man of serious and austere temper: and it was in consequence of this that the charge probably originated. It is certain that the poet who drew such characters as Alcestis was not blind to the gentleness, the strong affection, the self-abandoning devotedness of women. With respect to the world and the Deity, he seems to have adopted the doctrines of Anaxagoras, not unmixcd apparently with pantheistic views. [ANAXAGORAS.] To class him with atheists, as some have done, is undoubtedly unjust. At the same time, it must be confessed that we look in vain in his plays for the unquestioning faith of Aeschylus; nor can we fail to admit that the pupil of Anaxagoras could not sympathise with the popular religious system around him. He frequently altered the traditional treatment of ancient legends. Thus, in the Orestes, Menelaus comes before us as a selfish coward, and Helen as a worthless wanton; in the Helena, the notion of Stesichorus is adopted, that the heroine was never carried to Troy at all, and that it was a mere εἰδωλον of her for which the Greeks and Trojans fought; Andromache, the widow of Hector and slave of Neoptolemus, seems almost to forget the past in her quarrel with Hermione and the perils of her present situation; tragedy is brought down into the sphere of every-day life; men are represented, according to the remark of Sophocles quoted with approval by Aristotle (Poet. 25), not as they ought to be, but as they are; under the names of the ancient heroes the characters of his own time are set before us; it is not Medea, or Iphigenia, or Alcestis that is speaking, but abstractedly a mother, a daughter, or a wife. All this, indeed, gave fuller scope, perhaps, for the exhibition of passion and for those scenes of tenderness and pathos in which Euripides especially excelled. Hence Aristotle (Poet. 13) calls Euripides 'the most tragic of poets,' because he neglected no means of appealing to the feelings of the audience—not even the misery of appearance, such as that of Telephus—and therefore most worked upon pity, which is the office of Tragedy. Hence, perhaps, also the preference given to his plays by the practical Socrates, who is said to have never entered the theatre unless when they were acted, as well as for the admiration felt for him by Menander and Philemon, and other poets of the New Comedy. The most serious defects in his tragedies, artistically speaking, are: his constant employment of the 'Deus ex machina'; the disconnexion of his choral odes from the subject of the play; his extremely awkward and formal character of his prologues; and the frequent introduction of frigid γῶμαι and of philosophical disquisitions, making Medea talk like a sophist, and Hecuba like a freethinker, and aiming rather at subtlety than simplicity. On the same principles on which he brought his subjects and characters to the level of common life, he adopted also in his style the every-day mode of speaking. But while, on the one hand, in many of his plays, the Electra, for instance, and the Andromache, he ranks far below his two predecessors and fails altogether in harmony of composition: in others, such as the Hippolytus, the Medea, the Iphigenia in Tauris, the Ion, and, perhaps above all, the Bacchae, he reaches a height of poetry equal to that of Sophocles.—According to some accounts, he wrote, in all, seventy-five plays; according to others, ninety-two. Of these, eighteen are extant, if we omit the Rhesus, which is probably spurious: of the 18 a list is subjoined, with their dates, ascertained or probable:—Alcestis, B. C. 438, brought out as the last of a tetralogy, and stood therefore in the place of a satyric drama, to which indeed it bears, in some parts, great similarity, particularly in the representation of Heracles in his cups. Medea, 431 (ed. by Porsou; Verrall). Hippolytus Coronifer, 428 (upon which Racine founded his Phèdre), gained the first prize (ed. Monk). Hecuba, exhibited before 423. Heracleidae, about 421. Supplices, about 421. Ion, of uncertain date. Hercules Furens, of uncertain date (ed. Hutchinson, 1878). Andromache, about 420. Troades, 415. Electra, about 415–413. Helena, 412. Iphigenia at Tauris, of uncertain date. Phcenissae, 411 (ed. Porson). Orestes, 408. Bacchae: this play was written for representation in Macedonia, and therefore at a very late period of the life of Euripides. It is notable not only as among the grandest of Attic tragedies but also as inspired by the actual scenes amid which it was composed, in the country where he might see the Maenads with brandished torches dashing down the mountain side. (Editions by Elmsley; by Sandys, 1874; by Tyrrell, 1871.) Iphigenia at Aulis: this play, together with the Bacchae and the Alcegaon, was brought out at Athens, after the poet's death, by the younger Euripides. Cyclops, of uncertain date: it is interesting as the only extant specimen of the Greek satyric drama. Besides the plays, there are extant five letters, purporting to have been written by Euripides, but they are spurious.—Editions of complete plays. In Dindorf's Poëtae Scenici; by Nauch, 1871; with notes by Paley, 1872.—2. The youngest of the three sons of the above. After the death of his father he brought out three of his plays at the great Dionysia, viz. the Alcmaeon (no longer extant), the Iphigenia at Aulis, and the Bacchae.

Euripus (Ἐϋρώπος), any part of the sea where the ebb and flow of the tide were remarkably violent, is the name especially of the narrow strait which separates Euboea from Boeotia. The extraordinary tides of the Euripus have been noticed by modern observers: the water sometimes runs as much as eight miles an hour. At Chalcis there was a bridge over the Euripus, uniting Euboea with the mainland. [CHALCIS.]

Eurōmus (Ἐϋρώμος: Jaklyis), a small town of Caria, at the foot of Mt. Grion (a ridge parallel to Mt. Latmus), in the conventus juridicus of Alabanda. It lay eight English miles NW. of Mylasa.

Eurōpa (Ἐϋρώπη), according to the Iliad (xiv. 321), a daughter of Phoenix, but according to the common tradition a daughter of the Phoenician king Agenor (Hdt. iv. 147; Eur. Phoen. 281; Diod. v. 78; Ov. Met. ii. 858). Her surpassing beauty charmed Zeus, who assumed the form of a bull and mingled with the herd as Europa and her maidens were sporting on the sea-shore. Encouraged by the tameuess of the animal, Europa ventured to mount his back; whereupon Zeus rushed into the sea, and swam with her in safety to Crete. (Hor. Od. iii. 27, 25; Apollod. iii. 1; Anth. Pal. i. 116; Ov. Met. ii. 850, Fast. v. 605.) Here she became by Zeus the mother of Minos, Rhadamanthus, and, in post-Homeric story, of Sarpēdon (Hdt. i. 173; Eur. Rhes. 29). She afterwards married Asterion, king of Crete, who brought up the children whom she had had by the king of the gods (Apollod. l. c.; Diod. iv. 60). After her death she was deified under the name Hellotis or Hellotia (cf. Athen. p. 678). Among various attempts to rationalise the myth was the explanation that Europa was carried away captive by a Cretan king in a ship which had a bull as figure-head. Modern writers, though without very sure grounds, have interpreted Europa to be a moon-goddess.

Eurōpa (Ἐϋρώπη), one of the three divisions of the ancient world. The name is not found in the Iliad and Odyssey, and first occurs in the Homeric Hymn to Apollo (251), but even there it does not indicate the continent, but simply the mainland of Hellas proper, in opposition to Peloponnesus and the neighbouring islands; and so perhaps Pind. Nem. iv. 70. Aeschylus (Prom. 735) and Herodotus (iv. 45) are the earliest writers who use it in the sense of one of the divisions of the world. The meaning of the name is doubtful. Some give it a Greek root, and make it signify either 'widely extended' (ἐϋρός...ὄπη) or 'dark'—i.e. western (cf. ἕρεβος); others obtain the latter meaning from a Semitic root. Most of the ancients supposed the name to be derived from Europa, the daughter of Agenor. The boundaries of Europe on the E. differed at various periods. In earlier times the river Phasis was usually supposed to be its boundary, and sometimes even the Araxes and the Caspian sea; but at a later period the river Tanais and the Palus Maeotis were usually regarded as the boundaries between Asia and Europe. The N. of Europe was little known to the ancients, but it was generally believed, at least in later times, that it was bounded on the N. by the Ocean.

Eurōpus (Ἐϋρώπος). 1. A town of Emathia, on the river Axius (Strab. p. 327).—2. (Yera-bolus, or Kulatel-Nejin?), a city in the district of Cyrhstice in Syria, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, a few miles S. of Zeugma.—3. Europus was the earlier name of Dura Nicanoris in Mesopotamia; and (4) it was also given by Seleucus Nicator to Rhagae in Media.—5. A river of Thessaly, also called Titaresius. [TITARESIUS.]

Eurōtas (Ἐϋρώτας: Iri), the chief river in Laconia, but not navigable, rises in Mt. Borēum in Arcadia (according to Pausanias and Strabo, from a common source with the ALPHEUS), then disappears under the earth, rises again near Sciritis, and flows southwards, passing Sparta on the E., through a narrow and fruitful valley, into the Laconian gulf (Paus. viii. 44; Strab. p. 343).

Eurýalos (Ἐϋρύαλος). 1. Son of Mecisteus, one of the Argonauts and of the Epigoni, accompanied Diomedes to Troy, where he slew several Trojans (Il. ii. 565, vi. 20; Apollod. i. 9, 16, iii. 7, 2).—2. Son of Odysseus and Evippe, slain by Telemachus, hero of a play of Sophocles (Eustath. p. 1796, 52).

Euryanassa. [PELOPS.]

Eurýbates (Ἐϋρυβάτης), called Eribotes by Latin writers, one of the Argonauts.

Eurýbātos (Ἐϋρύβατος), an Ephesian, whom Croesus sent with a large sum of money to the Peloponnesus to hire mercenaries for him in his war with Cyrus. He, however, betrayed the whole matter to Cyrus. In consequence of this treachery, his name passed into a proverb amongst the Greeks (Plat. Protag. p. 327, D).

Eurýbia (Ἐϋρυβία), daughter of Pontus and Go, mother by Crius of Astraeus, Pallas, and Perses.

Eurybiades. [THEMISTOCLES.]

Euryclea (Ἐϋρύκλεια). 1. Daughter of Ops, was purchased by Laërtes and brought up Telemachus. When Ulysses returned home, she recognised him by a scar, and afterwards faithfully assisted him against the suitors (Od. i. 429, xix. 401).—2. Mother of OEDIPUS.

Europa. Schlichtergroll, Stosch Collection.)

Eurýdiōē (Εὐρύδικη). 1. Wife of Orpheus. [ORPHEUS].—2. An Illyrian princess, wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of the famous Philip.—3. An Illyrian, wife of Philip of Macedon, and mother of Cynaë or Cyna.—4. Daughter of Amyntas, son of Perdiccas III., king of Macedonia, and Cynaë, daughter of Philip. After the death of her mother in Asia [CYNANE], Perdiccas gave her in marriage to the king Arrhidaeus. She was a woman of a masculine spirit, and entirely ruled her weak husband. On her return to Europe with her husband, she became involved in war with Polysperchon and Olympias, but she was defeated in battle, taken prisoner, and compelled by Olympias to put an end to her life, B.C. 317. (Diod. xviii. 39, xix. 11; Athen. p. 560).—5. Daughter of Antipater, and wife of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus. She was the mother of three sons, viz. Ptolemy Ceraunus, Meleager, and a third (whose name is not mentioned); and of two daughters, Ptolemaïs, afterwards married to Demetrius Poliorcetes, and Lysandra, the wife of Agathocles, son of Lysimachus (Plut. Demetr. 46).—6. An Athenian, of a family descended from the great Miltiades. She was first married to Ophellas, the conqueror of Cyrene, and after his death returned to Athens, where she married Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Eurýlōchus (Εὐρύλοχος). 1. Companion of Odysseus in his wanderings, was the only one that escaped from the house of Circe when his friends were metamorphosed into swine (Od. x. 203, xii. 339).—2. A Spartan commander, in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 426, defeated and slain by Demosthenes at Olpae (Thuc. iii. 100–109).

Eurýmēdon (Εὐρυμέδων). 1. One of the Cabiri, son of Hephaestus and Cabiro, and brother of Alcon.—2. An attendant of Nestor.—3. Son of Ptolemaeus, and charioteer of Agamemnon.—4. Son of Thucles, an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders in the expedition to Corcyra, B.C. 428, and also in the expedition to Sicily, 425. In 414, he was appointed, in conjunction with Demosthenes, to the command of the second Syracuse armament, and fell in the first of the two sea-fights in the harbour of Syracuse (Thuc. vii. 52).

Eurýmēdon (Εὐρυμέδων; Kapri-Su), a small river in Pamphylia, navigable as far up as the city of ASPENDUS, through which it flowed; celebrated for the victory which Cimon gained over the Persians on its banks, B.C. 469 (Thuc. i. 100; Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 30).

Eurýmēnae (Εὐρυμεναί), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, E. of Ossa.

Eurýnōmē (Εὐρυνόμη), daughter of Oceanus (Hes. Th. 358). When Hephaestus was expelled by Hera from Olympus, Eurynome and Thetis received him in the bosom of the sea (Il. xviii. 398). Before the time of Cronos and Rhea, Eurynome and Ophion had ruled in Olympus over the Titans. The worship of Eurynome was localised at Phigalea in Arcadia, where she was represented half woman and half fish, and was identified with Artemis (Paus. viii. 41): that is to say, the older worship of Eurynome in this place was at some time transferred to the religion of Artemis, prevailing at a later time.

Eurýphōn (Εὐρυφῶν), a celebrated physician of Cnidos in Caria, was a contemporary of Hippocrates, but older. He is quoted by Galen, who says that he was considered to be the author of the ancient medical work entitled Κνίδια Γνώμαι, and also that some persons attributed to him several works included in the Hippocratic Collection.

Eurýgon, otherwise called Eurýtion (Εὐρυπῶν, Εὐρυτίων), grandson of Procles, was the third king of that house at Sparta, and thenceforward gave it the name of Eurypontidae (Paus. iii. 7; Plut. Lyc. 2).

Eurýpylus (Εὐρύπυλος). 1. Son of Euaemon and Ops, appears in different traditions as king either of Ormenion, or Hyria, or Cyrene. In the Iliad he is represented as having come from Ormenion to Troy with forty ships (Il. ii. 734, v. 76, vi. 36, xi. 575; Ov. Met. xiii. 357). According to some traditions it was this Eurypylus who was worshipped as a hero at Patrae (Paus. vii. 19).—2. A son of Poseidon and Celaeno, who went to Libya, where he ruled in the country afterwards called Cyrene, and there became connected with the Argonauts. He married Sterope, the daughter of Helios, by whom he became the father of Lycaon and Lencippus (Pind. Pyth. iv. 33; Ap. Rh. iv. 1551).—3. Son of Poseidon and Astypalaea, king of Cos, was killed by Heracles, who on his return from Troy landed in Cos, and being taken for a pirate, was attacked by its inhabitants. According to another tradition Heracles attacked the island of Cos, in order to obtain possession of Chalciopé, the daughter of Eurypylus, whom he loved (Il. ii. 677; Pind. Nem. iv. 25; Hyg. Fab. 254).—4. Son of Telephus and Astyoche, king of Mysia or Cilicia, was induced by the presents which Priam sent to his mother or wife, to assist the Trojans against the Greeks. Eurypylus killed Machaon, but was himself slain by Neoptolemus. (Od. xi. 519; Q. Smyrn. vi. 408.)

Eurýsāces (Εὐρυσάκης), son of the Telamonian Ajax and Tecmessa, named after the 'broad shield' of his father (Soph. Aj. 575). An Athenian tradition related that Eurysaces and his brother Philaeus had given up to the Athenians the island of Salamis, which they had inherited from their grandfather, and that the two brothers received in return the Attic franchise. Eurysaces was honoured like his father, at Athens, with an altar. (Plut. Sol. 10.) Pausanias (i. 35) ascribes this gift to Philaeus the son of Eurysaces.

Eurýsthēnes (Εὐρυσθένης), and Procles (Προκλῆς), the twin sons of Aristodemus, were born, according to the common account before, but according to the genuine Spartan story after, their father's return to Peloponnesus and occupation of his allotment of Laconia. He died immediately after the birth of his children, and had not even time to decide which of the two should succeed him. The mother professed to be unable to name the elder, and the Lacedaemonians applied to Delphi, and were instructed to make them both kings, but give the greater honour to the elder. The difficulty thus remaining was at last removed at the suggestion of Panitos, a Messenian, by watching which of the children was first washed and fed by the mother; and the first rank was accordingly given to Eurysthenes and retained by his descendants. From these two brothers, the two royal families in Sparta were descended, and were called respectively the Eurysthenidae and Proclidae. The former were also called the Agidae from Agis, son of Eurysthenes; and the latter Eurypontidae from Eurýpon, grandson of Procles. (Hdt. vi. 51; Paus. iii. 16).

Eurystheus. [HERACLES.]

Eurýtus (Εὐρύτος). 1. Son of Melancus and Stratonicus, was king of Oechalia, probably the Thessalian town of this name. He was a skilful archer and married to Antioche, by whom he became the father of Iole, Iphitus, Molion or Deion, Clytius, and Toxeus. He was proud of his skill in using the bow, and is said to have instructed even Heracles in his art. He offered his daughter Iole as a prize to the man who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Heracles won the prize, but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give up Iole, because they feared lest Heracles should kill the children he might have by her. Heracles accordingly marched against Oechalia with an army, took the place and killed Eurytus and his sons. According to Homer, on the other hand, Eurytus was killed by Apollo, whom he presumed to rival in using the bow. (Od. viii. 224, xxi. 14; Soph. Trach. 354; Theocr. xxiv. 105; Ap. Rh. i. 88; Apollod. ii. 6.) He was worshipped as a hero in the mystic rites at Andania (Paus. iv. 2).—2. Son of Actor and Molione of Elis. [MOLIONES.]—3. Son of Hermes and Antianira, and brother of Echion, was one of the Argonauts (Paus. ii. 15).—4. A Pythagorean philosopher, a disciple of Philolaus (Diog. Laërt. iii. 6).

Eusēbios (Εὐσέβιος) was born in Palestine about A.D. 264, was made bishop of Caesarea 315, and died about 340. His works are valuable for general history, quite apart from their great importance in Church history. [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Eustathius (Εὐστάθιος). 1. Of Cappadocia, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, was a pupil of Iamblichus and Aedesius. In A.D. 358, he was sent by Constantius as ambassador to king Sapor, and remained in Persia, where he was treated with the greatest honour.—2. Or Eumathius, probably lived as late as the twelfth century of our era. He wrote a Greek romance in eleven books, still extant, containing an account of the loves of Hysminias and Hysmiae. The tale is wearisome and improbable. Edited by Gaulmin, Paris, 1617, and by Teucher, Lips. 1792.—3. Archbishop of Thessalonica, was a native of Constantinople, and lived during the latter half of the twelfth century. He was a man of great learning and wrote numerous works, the most important of which is his commentary on the Iliad and Odyssey (Παρεκβολαὶ εἰς τὴν Ὀμήρου Ἰλιάδα καὶ Ὀδυσσεΐαν), or rather his collection of extracts from earlier commentators on those two poems. This vast compilation was made from the numerous and extensive works of the Alexandrian grammarians and critics; and as nearly all the works from which Eustathius made his extracts are lost, his commentary is of great value. Editions: at Rome, 1542–1550, 4 vols. fol.; at Basle, 1559–60; at Leipzig, 1825–26, containing the commentary on the Odyssey, and at Leipzig, 1827–29, the commentary on the Iliad. There is also extant by Eustathius a commentary on Dionysius Periegetes, which is published with most editions of Dionysius.—4. Usually called Eustathius Romanus, a celebrated Graeco-Roman jurist from A.D. 960 to 1000.

Euterpe. [MUSAE.]

Euthydēmus (Εὐθύδημος). 1. A sophist, was born at Chios, and migrated with his brother Dionysodorus to Thurii in Italy. Being exiled thence, they came to Athens, where they resided many years. The pretensions of Euthydēmus and his brother are exposed by Plato in the dialogue which bears the name of the former.—2. King of Bactria, was a native of Magnesia. We know nothing of the circumstances attending his elevation to the sovereignty of Bactria. He extended his power over the neighbouring provinces, so as to become the founder of the greatness of the Bactrian monarchy. His dominions were invaded about B.C. 212, by Antiochus the Great, with whom he eventually concluded a treaty of peace. (Polyb. xi. 34; Strab. p. 515.) He had a son Demetrius and a grandson Euthydemus II.

Euthymus (Εὐθυμος), a hero of Locri in Italy, son of Astycles or of the river-god Caecinus. He was famous for his strength and skill in boxing, and delivered the town of Temesa from the evil spirit Πολίτες, to whom a fair maiden was sacrificed every year. Euthymus himself disappeared at an advanced age in the river Caecinus. (Paus. vi. 6, 2; Strab. p. 255.)

Eutrāpēlus, P. Volumniūs, a Roman knight, obtained the surname of Entrapelus (Εὐτράπελος), on account of his liveliness and wit. He was an intimate friend of Antony, and a companion of his pleasures and debauches. Cytheris, the mistress of Antony, was originally the freed-woman and mistress of Volumnius Entrapelus (whence we find her called Volumnia), and was surrendered to Antony by his friend. Entrapelus is mentioned by Horace (Epist. i. 18, 31).

Eutrēsii (Εὐτρήσιοι), the inhabitants of a district in Arcadia, N. of Megalopolis.

Eutrēsis (Εὐτρησις), a small town in Boeotia between Thespie and Plataeae, with a temple and oracle of Apollo, who hence had the surname Eutresites (Il. ii. 502; Strab. p. 411).

Eutrōpius. 1. A Roman historian, held the office of a secretary under Constantine the Great, was patronised by Julian, whom he accompanied in the Persian expedition, and was alive in the reign of Valentinian and Valens. He is the author of a brief compendium of Roman history in ten books, from the foundation of the city to the accession of Valens, A.D. 364, to whom it is inscribed. In drawing up this abridgment Eutropius appears to have consulted the best authorities, and to have executed his task in general with care. The style is in perfect good taste and keeping with the nature of the undertaking, being plain, precise, and simple. It was translated into Greek by Paeanius, and was used as the basis of his work by Paulus Diaconus. Editions are by Tzchucke, Lips. 1796; by Grosse, Hal. 1813, and by Droysen, Berl. 1878.—2. A eunuch, the favourite of Arcadius, became the virtual governor of the E. on the death of Rufinus, A.D. 395. He was consul in 399, but in that year was deprived of his power by the intrigues of the empress Eudoxia and Gainas, the Goth; he was first banished to Cyprus, was shortly afterwards recalled and put to death at Chalcedon. The poet Claudian wrote an invective against Eutropius.

Eutychnēs (Εὐτυχίδης), of Sicyon, a sculptor, and a pupil of Lysippus, flourished B.C. 300, was the author of a statue representing Antioch (Paus. vi. 2, 4), which is preserved by a copy now in the Vatican [see ANTIOCHIA.]

Euxinus Pontus. [PONTUS EUXINUS.]

Evadnē (Ἐβάδνη). 1. Daughter of Poseidon and Pitane, who was brought up by the Arcadian king Aepytns, and became by Apollo the mother of IANUS.—2. Daughter of Iphis (hence called Iphias), or Philax, and wife of Capaneus. For details see CAPANEUS.

Evagōras (Ἐυαγόρας), king of Salamis in Cyprus. He was sprung from a family which claimed descent from TEUCER, the reputed founder of Salamis; and his ancestors appear to have been during a long period the hereditary rulers of that city under the supremacy of Persia. They had, however, been expelled by a Phoenician exile, who obtained the sovereignty for himself, and transmitted it to his descendants. [CYPRUS.] Evagoras succeeded in recovering his hereditary kingdom, and putting the reigning tyrant to death, about B.C. 410. His rule was distinguished for its mildness and equity, and he greatly increased the power of Salamis, specially by the formation of a powerful fleet. He gave a friendly reception to Conon, when the latter took refuge at Salamis after the defeat of the Athenians at Aegospotami, 405; and it was at his intercession that the king of Persia allowed Conon the support of the Phoenician fleet at the time of the battle of Cnidus (394): hence he was a main cause of the Athenian success. In gratitude for these good offices, the Athenians placed his statue in the Ceramicus (Isocr. Evag. 51-68; Xen. Hell. ii. 1, 29; Paus. i. 3, 2). But his growing power excited the jealousy of the Persian court, and at length war was declared against him by Artaxerxes. Evagoras received the assistance of an Athenian fleet under Chabrias, and at first met with great success; but the fortune of war afterwards turned against him, and he was glad to conclude a peace with Persia, by which he resigned his conquests in Cyprus, but was allowed to retain possession of Salamis with the title of king. This war was brought to a close in 385. Evagoras was assassinated in 374, together with his eldest son Pnytagoras (Diod. xv. 2-9; Arist. Pol. v. 8, 10). There is extant an oration of Isocrates in praise of Evagoras, addressed to his son Nicocles, who succeeded him.

Evagrius (Ἐυάγριος), of Epiphania in Syria, born about A.D. 536; wrote An Ecclesiastical History, still extant. [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Evander (Ἐυάνδρος). 1. Son of Hermes by an Arcadian nymph, called Themis or Nicostрата, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtis (Dionys. i. 31; Liv. i. 5; Paus. viii. 43). About sixty years before the Trojan war, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Pallantium in Arcadia into Italy, and there to have built a town, Pallantium, on the Tiber, at the foot of the Palatine Hill, which town was subsequently incorporated with Rome. Evander taught his neighbours milder laws and the arts of peace and of social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been made acquainted by Hercules, and music; he was said also to have introduced among them the worship of the Lycaean Pan (= Luperus), of Demeter, Poseidon, and Heracles. (Liv. l.c.; Dionys. i. 33; Plut. Q. R. 56; Tac. Ann. xi. 14; Justin, xliii. 1, 6.) Virgil (Aen. viii. 51) represents Evander as still alive at the time when Aeneas arrived in Italy, and as forming an alliance with him against the Latins. Evander was worshipped at Pallantium in Arcadia as a hero. At Rome he had an altar at the foot of the Aventine. Most modern historians (see especially Schwegler) reject the idea of the Arcadian immigration altogether. The authorities for it are manifestly late, and the Arcadians are the most unlikely colonists. It is probable that the story grew out of the resemblance of the Lupercalia to the Arcadian festivals of Pan. It is suggested, with much probability, that in Evander himself (whose name, 'the kindly,' may have the same meaning) we have the native Italian deity Faunus transformed into an apparently historical person, who is said to have founded the ritual out of which his own story was developed. [FAUNUS.]—2. A Phocian, was the successor of Lacydes as the head of the Academic School at Athens, about B.C. 215.

Evēnus (Ἐβήνος). 1. Son of Ares and Demonice, and father of Marpessa. For details see MARPESSA.—2. Two elegiac poets of Paros. One of these poets, though it is uncertain whether the elder or the younger, was a contemporary of Socrates, whom he is said to have instructed in poetry; and Plato in several passages refers to Evēnus, somewhat ironically, as at once a sophist or philosopher and a poet. There are sixteen epigrams in the Greek Anthology bearing the name of Evēnus, but it is difficult to determine which of them should be assigned to the elder and which to the younger Evēnus. (Plat. Apol. p. 20, Phaedr. p. 60, Phaedr. p. 267.)

Evēnus (Ἐβήνος: Fidhari), formerly Lycormas, rises in Mt. Oeta, and flows through Aetolia into the sea, W. of Antirrhium (Strab. p. 451; Thuc. ii. 83; Ov. Met. ix. 104).

Evēnus (Ἐβήνος: Sandarli), a river of Mysia, rising in Mt. Temnus, flowing S. through Aeolis, and falling into the Sius Elaiticus near Pitane. The city of Adramyttium, which stood nearly due W. of its sources, was supplied with water from it by an aqueduct (Strab. p. 614).

Evergētes (Ἐυεργέτης), the 'Benefactor,' a title of honour frequently conferred by the Greek states upon those from whom they had received benefits. It was assumed by many of the Greek kings in Egypt and elsewhere. [PTOLEMAEUS.]

Evius. [DIONYSUS.]

Exādīus (Ἐξάδιος), one of the Lapithae, fought at the nuptials of Pirithoüs (Il. i. 204; Ov. Met. xii. 266).

Exsuperantiūs, Julius, a Roman historian, who lived probably about the fifth century of our era. He is the author of a short tract entitled De Marii, Lepidi, ac Sertorii bellis civilibus, which many suppose to have been abridged from the Historics of Sallust. It is appended to several editions of Sallust.

F.

Fābāris or Farfārus (Farfa), a small river in the Sabino territory between Reate and Cures (Verg. Aen. vii. 715; Ov. Met. xiv. 330).

Fābātus, L. Roscius, one of Caesar's lieutenants in the Gallic war, and praetor in B.C. 49, espoused Pompey's party. He was killed in the battle at Mutina, B.C. 43. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, 53, B. C. i. 8; Cic. ad Fam. x. 33.)

Fabātus, Calpurnius, a Roman knight, accused in A.D. 64; was grandfather of Calpurnia, wife of the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8; Plin. Ep. viii. 10.)

Faberius. 1. A debtor of M. Cicero (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21, 51).—2. One of the private secretaries of C. Julius Caesar.

Făbia, two daughters of M. Fabius Ambustus. The elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, a patrician, and one of the military tribunes B.C. 376, and the younger to the plebeian C. Licinius Stolo.

Făbia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, which traced its origin to Hercules and the Arcadian Evander. The Fabii occupy a prominent part in history soon after the commencement of the republic; and three brothers belonging to the gens are said to have been invested with seven successive consulships, from B.C. 485 to 479. The house derived its greatest lustre from the patriotic courage and tragic fate of the 306 Fabii in the battle on the Cremera, B.C. 477. [VIBULANUS.] The principal families of this gens bore the names of AMBUSTUS, BUTEO, DORSO, LABEO, MAXIMUS, PICTOR and VIBULANUS.

Făbiānus, Păpīrius, a Roman rhetorician and philosopher in the time of Tiberius and Caligula. He wrote works on philosophy and physics (Sen. Ep. 40, 100).

Făbratēria (Fabraternus: Falvaterra), a town in Latium on the right bank of the Tiber, originally Volscian, but colonised by the Romans (Strab. p. 237; Liv. viii. 19; Vell. Pat. i. 15).

Făbrīcīi belonged originally to the Hernican town of Aletrium, where some of this name lived as late as the time of Cicero. 1. C. Făbrīcius Luscīnus, was probably the first of his family who quitted Aletrium and settled at Rome. He was one of the most popular heroes in the Roman annals, and, like Cincinnatus and Curius, is the representative of the purity and honesty of the good old times. In his first consulship, B.C. 282, he defeated the Lucania, Brutia, and Samnites, gained a rich booty and brought into the treasury more than 400 talents (Liv. Ep. 12; Val. Max. i. 8, 6). Fabricius probably served as legate in the unfortunate campaign against Pyrrhus in 280; and at its close he was one of the Roman ambassadors sent to Pyrrhus at Tarentum to negotiate a ransom or exchange of prisoners. The conduct of Fabricius on this occasion formed one of the most celebrated stories in Roman annals. Pyrrhus used every effort to gain Fabricius; he offered him the most splendid presents and endeavoured to persuade him to enter into his service, but the sturdy Roman was proof against all his offers. On the renewal of the war in the following year (279), Fabricius again served as legate, and shared in the defeat at the battle of Asculum. In 278 Fabricius was consul a second time, and had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king was anxious for peace; and the generosity with which Fabricius sent back to Pyrrhus the traitor who had offered to poison him afforded an opportunity for opening negotiations, which resulted in the evacuation of Italy by Pyrrhus (Plut. Pyrrh. 18-24; Val. Max. ii. 7, 15; Gell. iii. 8). Fabricius then subdued the allies of the king in the S. of Italy (Eutrop. ii. 13). He was censor in 275, and distinguished himself by the severity with which he attempted to repress the growing taste for luxury. His censorship is particularly celebrated from his expelling from the senate P.

Cornelius Rufinus, on account of his possessing ten pounds' weight of silver plate. The love of luxury and the degeneracy of morals which had already begun brought out still more prominently the simplicity of life and the integrity of character which distinguished Fabricius as well as his contemporary Curius Dentatus: and ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which they lived on their hereditary farms, and how they refused the rich presents which the Samnite ambassadors offered them. Fabricius died as poor as he had lived; he left no dowry for his daughters, which the senate, however, furnished; and, in order to pay the greatest possible respect to his memory, the state interred him within the pomerium, although this was forbidden by the Twelve Tables (Cic. Tusc. iii. 23; Val. Max. iv. 4, 10; Gell. iv. 8; Plut. Sull. 1).—2. L. Făbrīcius, curator viarum in B.C. 62, built a new bridge of stone, which connected the city with the island in the Tiber, and which was, after him, called pons Făbrīcius. The name of its author is still seen on the remnants of the bridge, which now bears the name of Ponte Quattro Căpi, in allusion to a head of Janus which stood upon the parapet [Dict. of Ant. art. Pons].—3. Q. Făbrīcius, tribune of the plebs, 57, proposed as early as the month of January of that year, that Cicero should be recalled from exile; but this attempt was frustrated by P. Clodius by armed force (Cic. Sest. 35).

Fădus, Cuspīus, appointed by the emperor Claudius procurator of Judaea in A.D. 44. He was succeeded by Tiberius Alexander.

Făesŭlăe (Faesulanus: Fiesole), a very ancient and important city of the Etruscans, situated on a hill three miles N.E. of Florence (Sil. It. viii. 477; Pol. ii. 25). Sulla sent to it a military colony; and it was the head-quarters of Catiline's army (Cic. Muren. 24, Cat. iii. 6, 14; Sall. Cat. 24-32). The growing importance of Florentia lessened that of Faesulae, which, however, was a strong place in the Gothic wars (Procop. B. G. ii. 23-27). There are still to be seen the magnificent remains of the ancient walls and also a Roman theatre.

Fălacrine or Fălacrinum, a Sabine town at the foot of the Apennines on the Via Salaria between Asculum and Reate, the birthplace of the emperor Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 2).

Fălerīi or Fălērīum, a town in Etruria, situated on a steep and lofty height near Mt. Soracte, said to have been founded by Halesus, from Argos (Dionys. i. 21; Plin. iii. 51). Its inhabitants were called Făliscī, and were regarded by many as of the same race as the Aequi, whence we find them often called Aequi Făliscī. Fălerīi afterwards became one of the twelve Etruscan cities; but its inhabitants continued to differ from the rest of the Etruscans both in their language and customs even in the time of Augustus. After a long struggle with Rome, the Făliscans yielded to Camillus, B.C. 394 (Liv. v. 8-19). They subsequently joined their neighbours several times in warring against Rome, but were finally subdued. At the close of the first Punic war, 241, they again revolted. The Romans now destroyed Fălerīi and compelled the Făliscans to build a new town in the plain (Pol. i. 65; Eutr. ii. 28). The ruins of the new city are to be seen at Fălleri; while the remains of the more ancient one are at Civitată Castellana. The ancient town of Fălerīi was afterwards colonised by the Romans under the name of 'Colonia Etruscorum Făliscă,' or 'Colonia Juuonia Făliscorum,' but it never became again a place of importance. The ancient town was celebrated for its worship of Juno Curitis or Quiritis, and it was in honour of her that the Romans founded the colony. Minerva and Junus were also worshipped in the town.—Falorii had extensive linen manufactories, and its white cows were prized at Rome as victims for sacrifice (Ov. Am. iii. 13).

Falernus Ager, a district in the N. of Campania, extending from the Massic hills to the river Volturnus. It produced some of the finest wine in Italy, which was reckoned only second to the wine of Setia. Its choicest variety was called Faustianum. It became fit for drinking in ten years, and might be used when twenty years old (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Vinum).

Falesia Portus, a harbour in Etruria S. of Populonium, opposite the island Ilva.

Falisci. [FALERII.]

Faliscus. [GRATTIUS.]

Fannia. 1. A woman of Minturnae, who hospitably entertained Marius, when he came to Minturnae in his flight, B.C. 88, though he had formerly pronounced her guilty of adultery.—2. The second wife of Helvidius Priscus.

Fannius. 1. C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 187 (Liv. xxxviii. 60).—2. L., deserted from the Roman army in 84, with L. Magius, and went over to Mithridates, whom they persuaded to enter into negotiations with Sertorius in Spain. Fannius afterwards commanded a detachment of the army of Mithridates against Lucullus (Plut. Sert. 24).—3. C., consul B.C. 122, author of a speech against C. Gracchus, which is praised by Cicero (Brut. 26, 99).—4. C., son of a M. Fannius, was present at the taking of Carthage, and was an annalist of some repute (Cic. Brut. 27, 101; Plut. Ti. Gracch. 4).—5. C., one of the persons who signed the accusation brought against P. Clodius in 61 (App. B. C. v. 139). In 59 he was mentioned by L. Vettius as an accomplice in the alleged conspiracy against Pompey.—6. C., tribune of the plebs, 59, opposed the lex agraria of Caesar. He belonged to Pompey's party, and in 49 went as praetor to Sicily (Cic. Sest. 53).—7. A worthless poet, contemporary of Horace (Hor. Sat. i. 4, 21).—8. A contemporary of the younger Pliny, the author of a work, very popular at the time, on the deaths of persons executed or exiled by Nero (Plin. Ep. v. 5).

Fannius Caepio. [CAEPIO.]

Fannius Quadrātus. [QUADRATUS.]

Fannius Strabo. [STRABO.]

Fanum Fortunāe (Fano), an important town in Umbria at the mouth of the Metaurus, with a celebrated temple of Fortuna, whence the town derived its name. Augustus sent to it a colony of veterans, and it was then called 'Colonia Julia Fanestrus.' Here was a triumphal arch in honour of Augustus. (Caes. B. C. i. 11; Tac. Hist. iii. 50; Mel. ii. 4, 5.)

Farfārus. [FABARIS.]

Faula or Fauna. [BONA DEA.]

Faunus, son of Picus, grandson of Saturnus, and father of Latinus, was the third in the series of the kings of the Laurentes (Verg. Aen. vii. 45; Arnob. ii. 71). So far from being an ancient hero honoured as a god, as it was once held (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 275), he must rather be regarded as an old Italian nature-god, whom tradition changed into a pre-historic king. It is held with great probability that Mars, Silvanus and Faunus were kindred Italian deities with different provinces, that of Faunus being especially the rural community or pagus.

Hence his guardianship of country life and pursuits, and of herds (Ov. Fast. ii. 361; Hor. Od. i. 4, 12, i. 17, iii. 18, 12). It is probable, though not certain, that the name LUPERCUS, which belongs to him means 'the averter of the wolf' (from the flocks). The Lupercalia, in which Faunus was worshipped (Dict. of Antiq. s. v.) were therefore at once a purification by which evil influences were scourged away and an offering for the increase of the flocks. Faunus, like other deities of the earth, had also prophetic powers, conveyed sometimes by mysterious voices from hills or woods, sometimes by visions in sleep (Dionys. v. 16; Liv. ii. 7; Cic. Div. i. 101; Verg. Aen. vii. 82; Ov. Fast. iv. 649). The true Italian representation of Faunus was probably as a man of middle age, bearded, and with a 'Jupiter' type of head, wearing a goat-skin over the shoulders and bearing a staff or club in one hand and a horn in the other. The more familiar type is due to the Greek influence which identified Faunus with Pan, and imagined a plurality of Fauns, represented as Satyrs.

Fausta. 1. Cornēlia, daughter of the dictator Sulla, and twin sister of Faustus Sulla, was born about B.C. 88. She was first married to C. Memmius, and afterwards to Milo. She was infamous for her adulteries, and Villius was one of her paramours, whence Horace calls him 'Sullae gener' (Sat. i. 64).—2. Flavia Maximiana, daughter of Maximianus, and wife of Constantine the Great, to whom she bore Constantinus, Constantius, and Constans.

Faustina. 1. Annia Galeria, commonly distinguished as Faustina Senior, the wife of Antoninus Pius, died in the third year of his reign, A.D. 141. Notwithstanding the profligacy of her life, her husband loaded her with honours both before and after her decease. It was in honour of her that Antoninus established a hospital for the education and support of young females, who were called after her puellae alimentariae Faustinae. [ANTONINUS.]—2. Annia, or Faustina Junior, daughter of the elder Faustina, was married to M. AURELIUS in A.D. 145 or 146, and she died in a village on the skirts of Mount Taurus in 175, having accompanied the emperor to Syria. Her profligacy was so open and infamous, that the good nature or blindness of her husband, who cherished her fondly while alive, and loaded her with honours after her death, appears truly marvellous. [M. AURELIUS.]—3. Annia, grand-daughter or great-grand-daughter of M. Aurelius, the third of the numerous wives of ELAGABALUS.

Faustulus. [ROMULUS.]

Faventia (Faventinus: Faenza), a town in Gallia Cisalpina on the river Aneno and on the Via Aemilia, celebrated for its linen manufactures (Strab. p. 217; Plin. xix. 1).

Favōnii Portus (Porto Favone), a harbour on the coast of Corsica.

Favonius, the West wind. [ZEPHYRUS.]

M. Favōnius, an imitator of Cato Uticensis, whose character and conduct he copied so servilely as to receive the nickname of Cato's ape. He was a warm supporter of the party of the optimates, and opposed all the measures of the first triumvirate. On the breaking out of the Civil war in B.C. 49, he joined Pompey, notwithstanding his personal aversion to him, and opposed all proposals of reconciliation with Caesar. He served in the campaign against Caesar in Greece in 48, and after the defeat of his party at Pharsalus, he accompanied Pompey in his flight. Upon Pompey's death he returned to Italy, and was pardoned by Caesar. He took no part in the conspiracy against Caesar, but, after his murder, espoused the side of Brutus and Cassius. He was taken prisoner in the battle of Philippi in 42, and was put to death by Octavianus. (Plut. Cat. Min. 32–46, Pomp. 60; Suet. Aug. 13.)

Favorinus, a philosopher and sophist in the reign of Hadrian, was a native of Arles in Gaul. He resided at different periods of his life in Rome, Greece, and Asia Minor, and obtained high distinctions. He was intimate with Plutarch, who dedicated to him his treatise on the principle of cold, and with Herodes Atticus, to whom he bequeathed his library and house at Rome. He wrote several works on various subjects, but none of them are extant.

Febris, the goddess, or rather the averter, of fever. She had three sanctuaries at Rome, in which amulets were dedicated which people had worn during a fever (Cic. N. D. iii. 25, 63, Legg. ii. 11, 28; Plin. ii. 16). A dea Tertiana (i.e. goddess of tertian fevers or agues) is mentioned in an inscription (C. I. L. vii. 999).

Febrūus, an ancient Italian divinity, to whom the month of February was sacred, for in the latter half of that month general purifications and instructions were celebrated. The name is connected with februare (to purify), and februae (purifications). Febrnus was also regarded as a god of the lower world, and the festival of the dead (Feralia) was celebrated in February (Dict. of Ant. art. Februa).

Felicitas, the personification of happiness, to whom a temple was erected by Lucullus in B.C. 75; and a second was dedicated by M. Aemilius Lepidus (Plin. xxxv. 156, xxxvi. 39; Cic. Verr. iv. 2; cf. Strab. p. 381; Dio Cass. xlv. 5). Felicitas is frequently seen on Roman medals, in the form of a matron, with the staff of Mercury (caduceus) and a cornucopia.

Felix Antonius, procurator of Judaea, in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, was a brother of the freedman Pallas, and was himself a freedman of the emperor Claudius. Hence he is also called Claudius Felix. In his private and his public character alike Felix was unscrupulous and profligate. Having fallen in love with Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I., and wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, he induced her to leave her husband; and she was still living with him in 60, when St. Paul preached before him. His government, though cruel and oppressive, was strong: he suppressed all disturbances, and cleared the country of robbers. He was recalled in 62, and succeeded by Porcius Festus; and the Jews having lodged accusations against him at Rome, he was saved from punishment only by the influence of his brother Pallas with Nero (Tac. Ann. xii. 54, Hist. v. 9; Suet. Claud. 28; Jos. Ant. xx. 7).

Felix, M. Minucius, a Roman lawyer, who flourished about A.D. 239, wrote a dialogue entitled Octavius, which occupies a conspicuous place among the early Apologies for Christianity. Edited by Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1707; by Ernesti, ibid. 1773; by Muralto, Turic. 1836.

Felsina. [BONONIA.]

Feltria (Feltrius: Feltre), a town in Rhaetia, a little N. of the river Plavis.

Fenestella, a Roman historian, who lived in the time of Augustus, and died A.D. 21, in the seventieth year of his age (Sen. Ep. 108; Plin. viii. 19, ix. 65, xv. 1; Gell. xv. 28). His work, entitled Annales, extended to at least 22 books. The few fragments preserved relate to events subsequent to the Carthaginian wars; and we know that it embraced the greater part of Cicero's career. A treatise, De Sacerdotiis et Magistratibus Romanorum Libri II, ascribed to Fenestella, is a work of the 15th century, not apparently intended as a forgery, since the author (Ficocchi) speaks in one passage of Christian bishops.

Fenni, a savage people living by the chase, whom Tacitus (German. 46) reckons among the Germans. They appear to have dwelt in the further part of E. Prussia, and to have been the same as the modern Finns.

Ferentina, a goddess of the Latins, at whose sacred spring and grove the meetings of the Latin League were held (Liv. i. 50, 52, ii. 38, vii. 25; Dionys. iii. 34, 51). The situation is doubtful, but it was near Alba Longa—according to some, close to Marino; according to others, nearer Nemi.

Ferentinum (Ferentinas, Ferentiūus). 1. (Ferento), a town of Etruria, S. of Volsinii, the birthplace of the emperor Otho. It is called both a colonia and a municipium. There are still remains of its walls, of a theatre and of sepulchres at Ferento. (Strab. p. 226; Tac. Hist. ii. 50).—2. (Ferento), an ancient town of the Hernici in Latium, SW. of Anagnina, colonised by the Romans in the second Punic war. There are still remains of its ancient walls, polygonal, but patched with Roman masonry. (Strab. p. 237; Gell. x. 3; Liv. xxxiv. 42; Hor. Ep. i. 17, 8.)

Ferentum. [FORENTUM.]

Feretrius. [JUPITER.]

Ferōnia, a goddess of the central Italians, probably a goddess of the earth and its fruits, especially of corn. Her chief sanctuaries were at the foot of Mt. Soracte near Capena (Liv. xxii. 1, xxiv. 11); near Terracina (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 24; Verg. Aen. vii. 800; Plin. ii. 146), where remains of a temple at a spring, still called Ferronia, have been found. Her worship was carried by Latin colonists to other places (e.g. Aquileia, C. I. L. v. 412); and to Rome by the Sabines (Varr. L. L. v. 74). There her festival was held on November 14 (the seed-time).

Ferratus Mons (Jebel-Turjurah), one of the principal mountain-chains in the Lesser Atlas system, in N. Africa, on the borders of Mauretania Caesariensis and Mauretania Sitifensis.

Fescennium or Fescennia (Fescenninus), a town of the Falisci in Etruria, and consequently, like Falerii, of Pelasgic origin. [FALERII.] From this town the Romans are said to have derived the Fescennino songs. [Dict. of Antiq. s.v.] The site of the town may perhaps be placed at S. Silvestro.

Festus, Sext. Pompeius, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the second century of our era, since he is quoted by Julius Romanus (ap. Charis. ii. 220), who lived in the third century. His name is attached to a dictionary or glossary of Latin words and phrases, divided into 20 books, and commonly called Sexti Pompeii Festi de Verborum Significatione. It was abridged by Festus from the great work with the same title by M. Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian in the reign of Augustus. Festus made alterations and criticisms (of little value) of his own, and inserted numerous extracts from other writings of Verrius; but, unfortunately, altogether omitted those words which had fallen into disuse, intending to make these the subject of a separate volume. Towards the end of the eighth century, Paul, son of Warnefrid, better known as Paulus Diaconus, from having officiated as a deacon of the church at Aquileia, abridged the abridgment of Festus. The original work of Verrius Flaccus had perished with the exception of one or two inconsiderable fragments. Of the abstract by Festus one MS. only has come down to us, containing the second half only of the work (letters M-V), and that in an imperfect condition. The numerous blanks in this MS. have been ingeniously filled up by Scaliger and Ursinus, partly from conjecture and partly from the corresponding paragraphs of Paulus, whose performance appears in a complete form in many MSS. The best editions of Festus are by K. O. Müller, Lips. 1839 and 1880 (in which the text of Festus is placed face to face with the corresponding text of Paulus, so as to admit of easy comparison), and by E. Thewrewk, Pesth, 1889. The work is one of great value, containing a rich treasure of learning upon many points connected with antiquities, mythology, and grammar.

Festus, Porcius, before whom St Paul was brought, succeeded Antonius Felix as procurator of Judaea in A.D. 62, and died not long after.

Fibrēnus. [ARPINUM.]

Ficāna (Ficanensis), one of the Latin towns destroyed by Ancus Martius (Liv. i. 33).

Ficulēa (Ficuleas, -ātis, Ficolensis), a town of the Sabines, E. of Fidenæ, said to have been founded by the Aborigines, but early sunk into decay (Dionys. i. 13; Liv. i. 38).

Fidenæ, sometimes Fidena (Fidenas, -ātis; Castel Giubileo), an ancient town in the land of the Sabines, nearly five miles N.E. of Rome, situated on a steep hill, between the Tiber and the Anio. It is said to have been founded by Alba Longa, and also to have been conquered and colonised by Romulus; but the population appears to have been partly Etruscan, and it was probably colonised by the Etruscan Veii, with which city we find it in close alliance. (Verg. Aen. vi. 773; Dionys. ii. 53; Liv. i. 15, 27.) It frequently revolted and was frequently taken by the Romans. Its last revolt was in B.C. 438, and in the following year it was destroyed by the Romans. Subsequently the town was rebuilt; but it is spoken of as a poor place (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 35; Hor. Ep. i. 11, 7; Juv. x. 100). In the reign of Tiberius, in consequence of the fall of a temporary wooden theatre here, 20,000 or, according to some accounts, 50,000 persons lost their lives (Tac. Ann. iv. 62; Suet. Tib. 40).

Fidentia (Fidontinus; Borgo S. Donino), a town in Cisalpine Gaul on the Via Aemilia, between Parma and Placentia, memorable for the victory which Sulla's generals gained over Carbo, B.C. 82.

Fides, the personification of fidelity or faithfulness. Numa is said to have built a temple to Fides publica, on the Capitol, and another was built there in the consulship of M. Aemilius Scaurus, B.C. 115 (Plut. Num. 16; Cic. Off. iii. 104, N. D. ii. 61). She was represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive or laurel leaves, and carrying in her hand corn ears, or a basket with fruit. She is also symbolised on coins by joined hands, and by the caduceus.

Fidius. The name Dius Fidius betokened the Genius Jovis—that is, the God of Right and Faith upon earth, who guarded faith for men in their own families and communities, as Jupiter did for the gods. Dius Fidius was identical with the Sabine demigod Semo Sancus (Dionys. ii. 49; Ov. Fast. vi. 213; Fest. p. 238; Sil. It. viii. 422; cf. Varr. L.L. v. 66), and Semo Sancus again was identical with the Italian Hercules, who watched over the rights and the faith of the homestead and family (Prop. v. 9, 71; Varr. l.c.). Hence we find the names Semo Sancus Dius Fidius combined together (C. I. L. vi. 568), and hence also the oaths me Dius Fidius (juvet) and me Hercules juvet are equivalent. There was a temple of Dius Fidius on the Quirinal, and his festival was on June 5th (Ov. Fast. l.c.). The custom of swearing by him only under the open sky (Varr. L.L. v. 66) seems to betoken his connexion with Jupiter, the god of the sky, and some have explained the bronze orbs dedicated in the temple of Sancus (Liv. viii. 20) in the same way.

Figūlus, C. Marcus. 1. Consul B.C. 162, and again consul 156, when he carried on war with the Dalmatae in Illyricum.—2. Consul 64, supported Cicero in his consulship.

Figūlus, P. Nigidius, a Pythagorean philosopher of high reputation, who flourished about B.C. 60. Mathematical and physical investigations appear to have occupied a large share of his attention; and such was his fame as an astrologer, that it was generally believed, in later times at least, that he had predicted the future greatness of Octavianus on hearing the announcement of his birth. He, moreover, possessed considerable influence in political affairs: was one of the senators selected by Cicero to take down the depositions of the witnesses who gave evidence with regard to Catiline's conspiracy, B.C. 63; was praetor, 59; took an active part in the Civil war on the side of Pompey; was compelled in consequence by Caesar to live abroad, and died in exile, 44.

Fimbria, C. Flavius. 1. A homo novus, who rose to the highest honours through his own merits and talents. Cicero praises him both as a jurist and as an orator. He was consul B.C. 104, and was subsequently accused of extortion in his province, but was acquitted (Cic. Verr. v. 70, Brut. 34, Off. iii. 19).—2. Probably son of the preceding, was one of the most violent partisans of Marius and Cinna during the Civil war with Sulla. In B.C. 86 he was sent into Asia as legate of Valerius Flaccus, and took advantage of the unpopularity of his commander with the soldiers to excite a mutiny against him. Flaccus was killed at Chalcedon, and was succeeded in the command by Fimbria, who carried on the war with success against the generals of Mithridates. In 84 Sulla crossed over from Greece into Asia, and, after concluding peace with Mithridates, marched against Fimbria. The latter was deserted by his troops, and put an end to his life (Vell. Pat. ii. 24; Plut. Sull. 23).

Fines, the name of a great number of places, either on the borders of Roman provinces or of different tribes. These places are usually found only in the Itineraries, and are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated here.

Firmānus, Tarūtius, a mathematician and astrologer, contemporary with M. Varro and Cicero. At Varro's request Firmanus took the horoscope of Romulus, and from the circumstances of the life and death of the founder determined the era of Rome (Cic. Div. ii. 47, 98; Plut. Rom. 12).

Firmiānus Sympōsius, Caelius, of uncertain age and country, the reputed author of 100 inspid riddles, each comprised in three hexameter lines, collected, as we are told in the prologue, for the purpose of promoting the festivities of the Saturnalia. There is, however, some doubt whether they are not the work of Lactantius Firmianus, and entitled his 'Symposium.' [LACTANTIUS.] Printed in the Poët. Lat. Min. of Weisendorf, vol. vi.

Firmicus Maternus, the author of a work entitled Matheseos Libri VIII., which is a complete system of astrology, according to the discipline of the Egyptians and Babylonians. The writer lived in the time of Constantine the Great. In his views he is a Neo-Platonist and opposed to Christianity. The work is of interest as showing the importance attached to astrology.—Editions, Aldine 1499; K. Sittl, 1892.—2. About the same time another Firmicus Maternus wrote a work in favour of Christianity, entitled De Errore Profanarum Religionum ad Constantium et Constantem. Edited by F. Oehler, Lips. 1847.

Firmum (Firmānus: Fermo), a town in Picenum, three miles from the coast, and S. of the river Tinna, colonised by the Romans at the beginning of the first Punic war. On the coast was its strongly fortified harbour, Castellum Firmānum or Firmanorum (Porto di Fermo).

M. Firmus, a native of Seleucia, the friend and ally of Zenobia, seized upon Alexandria, and proclaimed himself emperor, but was defeated and slain by Aurelian, A.D. 273.

Flaccus, Calpurnius, a rhetorician, probably in the reign of Hadrian, excerpts of whose fifty-one declamations are edited with those of Quintilian by Burmann (Leid. 1620).

Flaccus, Fulvius. 1. M., consul with App. Claudius Caudex, B.C. 264, in which year the first Punic war broke out.—2. Q., son of No. 1, consul 237, fought against the Ligurians in Italy. In 224 he was consul a second time, and conquered the Gauls and Insubrians in the N. of Italy. In 215 he was praetor, after having been twice consul; and in the following year (214) he was re-elected praetor. In 213 he was consul for the third time, and carried on the war in Campania against the Carthaginians. He and his colleague, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, took Hanno's camp by storm, and then laid siege to Capua, which they took in the following year (212). In 209 he was consul for the fourth time, and continued the war against the Carthaginians in the S. of Italy. (Liv. xxvi. 8, xxvii. 15.)—3. Cn., brother of No. 2, was praetor 212, and had Apulia for his province: he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonea. In consequence of his cowardice in this battle he was accused before the people, and went into voluntary exile before the trial. (Liv. xxvi. 2.)—4. Q., son of No. 2, was praetor 112, and carried on war in Spain against the Celtiberians, whom he defeated in several battles. He was consul 179 with his brother, L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus, who had been adopted by Manlius Acidinus. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurians. In 174 he was censor with A. Postumius Albinus. Shortly afterwards he became deranged, and hanged himself in his bedchamber. (Liv. xl. 16, xlii. 28.)—5. M., nephew of No. 4, and a friend of the Gracchi, was consul 125, when he subdued the Transalpine Ligurians. He was one of the triumvirs for carrying into execution the agrarian law of Tib. Gracchus, and was slain together with C. Gracchus in 121 (Cic. Phil. iv. 4). He was a man of a bold and determined character, and was more ready to have recourse to violence and open force than C. Gracchus.—6. Q., praetor in Sardinia, 187, and consul 180.—7. Ser., consul 135, subdued the Vardaeans in Illyricum.

Flaccus, Granius, a contemporary of Julius Caesar, wrote a book, De Jure Papiriano, which was a collection of the laws of the ancient kings of Rome, made by Papirius. [PAPIRIUS.]

Flaccus, Horātius. [HORATIUS.]

Flaccus, Hordeōnius, consular legate of Upper Germany at Nero's death, A.D. 68. He was secretly attached to the cause of Vespasian, for which reason he made no effectual attempt to put down the insurrection of Civilis [CIVILIS]. His troops, who were in favour of Vitellius, compelled him to give up the command to VOCULA, and put him to death.

Flaccus, C. Norbānus, a general of Octavian and Antony in the campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. He was consul in 38. (Appian, B.C. iv. 87–106.)

Flaccus, Persius. [PERSIUS.]

Flaccus Sicūlus, an agrimensor by profession, probably lived about the reign of Nerva. He wrote a treatise De Conditionibus Agrorum, of which the beginning is preserved in the collection of Agrimensorēs. [FRONTINUS.]

Flaccus, Valērius. 1. L., curule aedile B.C. 201, praetor 200, and consul 195 with M. Porcius Cato. In his consulship, and in the following year, he carried on war, with great success, against the Gauls in the N. of Italy. In 184 he was the colleague of M. Cato in the censorship, and in the same year was made princeps senatus. He died 180. (Liv. xxxi. 4, xxxiv. 21, xxxix. 40.)—2. L., consul 131, with P. Licinius Crassus.—

3. L., consul 100 with C. Marius, when he took an active part in putting down the insurrection of Saturninus. In 97 he was censor with M. Antonius, the orator. In 86 he was chosen consul in place of Marius, who had died in his seventh consulship, and was sent by Cinna into Asia to oppose Sulla, and to bring the war against Mithridates to a close. The avarice and severity of Flaccus made him unpopular with the soldiers, who at length rose in mutiny at the instigation of Fimbria. Flaccus was then put to death by order of Fimbria. [FIMBRIA.]—4. L., the interrex, who proposed that Sulla should be made dictator, 82, and who was afterwards made by Sulla his magister equitum (Plut. Sull. 33).

—5. C., praetor 93, consul 93, and afterwards proconsul in Spain.—6. L., praetor 63, and afterwards propaetor in Asia, where he was succeeded by Q. Cicero. In 59 he was accused by D. Laelius of extortion in Asia; but, although undoubtedly guilty, he was defended by Cicero (in the oration pro Flacco, which is still extant) and Q. Hortensius, and was acquitted.—7. C., a poet, was a native of Padua, and lived in the time of Vespasian. He is the author of the Argonautica, an unfinished heroic poem in eight books, on the Argonautic expedition, in which he follows Apollonius Rhodius. The eighth book terminates abruptly, at the point where Medea is urging Jason to make her the companion of his homeward journey. Flaccus is only a second-rate poet. His diction is pure; his general style is free from affectation; his versification is polished and harmonious; his descriptions are lively and vigorous; but he displays no originality, nor any of the higher attributes of genius. Editions by Wagner, 1805; by Schenkl, 1871; by Böhrens, 1875.

Flaccus, Verrius, a freedman by birth, and a distinguished grammarian, in the reign of Augustus. He was renowned for his success as a teacher. His method was to employ competition, setting subjects upon which those of the same age might write, and giving a book as a prize for the winner. Augustus showed his approval by making him the tutor of his grandsons, Caius and Lucius Caesar, with a salary of about 1,000*l.* a year. He died at an advanced age, in the reign of Tiberius. (Suet. Gr. 17; Gell. iv. 5, xvii. 6.) He is frequently cited by Pliny the Elder. At the lower end of the marketplace at Praeneste was a statue of Verrius Flaccus, fronting the Hemicyclium, on the inner curve of which were set up marble tablets, inscribed with the Fasti Verriani. These Fasti were a calendar of the days and vacations of public business—dies fasti, nefasti, and interdicti—of religious festivals, triumphs, &c., especially including such as were peculiar to the family of the Caesars. They supplied Ovid with the framework of his Fasti, which, as far as can be judged from the extant remains of the Fasti Verriani, expresses the same views (C. I. L. i. pp. 295, 311). The fragments were discovered in 1770 in the ruins of a building about two miles from Praeneste. But the great work of Verrius was his lexicon, entitled De Verborum Significatione, which was abridged by Festus. [FESTUS.]

Flamininus, Quintius. 1. T., a distinguished general, was consul B.C. 198, and had the conduct of the war against Philip of Macedonia, which he brought to a close in 197, by the defeat of Philip, at the battle of Cynoscephalae in Thessaly; and peace was shortly afterwards concluded with Philip. Flamininus continued in Greece for the next three years, in order to settle the affairs of the country. At the celebration of the Isthmian games at Corinth in 196, he caused a herald to proclaim, in the name of the Roman senate, the freedom and independence of Greece. In 195 he made war against Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, who had refused to give up Argos to the Achaean League. Nabis was compelled to yield to the terms agreed upon; but otherwise Sparta was left independent in her Greek possessions; and at this period it may fairly be said that the Romans acted up to their proclamation of Greek liberty. The change in their policy did not come till after the wars with Antiochus. Flamininus in 194 returned to Rome, having won the affections of the Greeks by his prudent and conciliating conduct. In 192 he was again sent to Greece as ambassador, and remained there till 190, exercising a sort of protectorate over the country. In 183 he was sent as ambassador to Prusias of Bithynia, in order to demand the surrender of Hannibal. He died about 174. (Plut. Flamin.; Liv. xxxii.—xxxix.; Pol. xvii., xviii.)—2. L., brother of the preceding, was curule aedile 200, praetor 199, and afterwards served under his brother as legato in the war against Macedonia. He was consul in 192, and received Gaul as his province, where he behaved with the greatest barbarity. On one occasion he killed a chief of the Boii who had taken refuge in his camp, in order to afford amusement to a profligate favourite. For this and similar acts of cruelty he was expelled from the senate in 184, by M. Cato, who was then censor. He died in 170. (Liv. xxxix. 42; Cic. de Sen. 12, 42.)—3. T., consul 150, with M. Atilius Balbus.—4. T., consul 123, with Q. Metellus Balearicus. Cicero says that he spoke Latin with elegance, but that he was an illiterate man (Brut. 28, 74).

Flamininus. 1. C., was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 232, in which year, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the senate, he carried an agrarian law, ordaining that the Ager Gallicus Picenus, which had recently been conquered, should be distributed among the plebeians (Pol. ii. 21). In 227, in which year four praetors were appointed for the first time, he was one of them, and received Sicily for his province, where he earned the goodwill of the provincials by his integrity and justice. In 223 he was consul, and marched against the Insubrian Gauls. As the senate were anxious to deprive Flamininus of his office, they declared that the consular election was not valid on account of some fault in the auspices, and sent a letter to the consuls, with orders to return to Rome. But as all preparations had been made for a battle against the Insubrians, the letter was left unopened until the battle was gained. (Pol. ii. 32; Liv. xxi. 63, xxii. 6.) In 220 he was censor, and executed two great works, which bore his name, viz. the Circus Flaminius and the Via Flaminia. In 217 he was consul a second time, and marched against Hannibal, but was defeated by the latter at the fatal battle of the Trasimene lake, on the 23rd of June, in which he perished with the greater part of his army (Liv. xxii. 3; Pol. iii. 77).—2. C., son of No. 1, was quaestor of Scipio Africanus in Spain, 210; curule aedile 196, when he distributed among the people a large quantity of grain at a low price, which was furnished him by the Sicilians as a mark of gratitude towards his father and himself; was praetor 193, and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with success; and was consul 185, when he defeated the Ligurians (Liv. xxxix. 1).

Flanaticus or Flanonius Sinus (Gulf of Quarnaro), a bay of the Adriatic sea on the coast of Liburnia, named after the people Flanates and their town Flanōna (Fianona).

Flāvīa, a surname given to several towns in honour of the Flavian family.

Flāvīa gens, celebrated as the house to which the emperor Vespasian belonged. During the later period of the Roman empire, the name Flavius descended from one emperor to another, Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, being the first in the series.

Flāvīa Domitilla. [DOMITILLA.]

Flāvius, Cn, the son of a freedman, became secretary to App. Claudius Caecus, and, in consequence of this connexion, became curule aedile B.C. 303. He drew up and published a list of dies fasti and nefasti, and also an account of legal procedure (legis actiones), which previously had been kept secret as the exclusive patrimony of the pontiffs and the patricians. (Liv. ix. 46 Vul. Max. ii. 219 Cic. Mar. 11, 25.)

Flāvius Fimbrīa. [FIMBRIA.]

Flāvius Josēphus. [JOSEPHUS.]

Flāvius Vopiscus. [VOPISCUS.]

Flāvus, L. Caesētius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 44, was deposed from his office by C. Julius Caesar, because, in concert with C. Epidius Marullus, one of his colleagues in the tribunate, he had removed the crowns from the statues of the dictator, and imprisoned a person who had saluted Caesar as 'king' (Suet. Jul. 79).

Flāvus or Flāvius, Subrius, tribune in the Praetorian guards, was the most active agent in the conspiracy against Nero, A.D. 66, which, from its most distinguished member, was called Piso's conspiracy (Tac. Ann. xv. 49).

Flevum (Tac. Ann. iv. 72), a fortress in Germany at the mouth of the Amisia (Ems).

Flevum, Flevo. [RHENUS.]

Flōra, the Roman goddess of flowers and spring. The writers whose object was to bring the Roman religion into contempt relate that Flora was a courtesan, who had accumulated a large property, and bequeathed it to the Roman people, in return for which she was honoured with the annual festival of the Floralia (Lactant. de Fals. Rel. i. 20). But her worship was established at Rome in the very earliest times, for a temple is said to have been vowed to her by king Tatius, and Numa appointed a flamen to her (Varr. L. L. v. 32, 74, 158; Mart. v. 22). The resemblance between the names

Flora and Chloris led the later Romans to identify the two divinities. Her temple at Rome was situated near the Circus Maximus, and her festival was celebrated from the 28th of April till the 1st of May, with extravagant merriment and lasciviousness. (Dict. of Ant. art. Floralia.)

Flora. (From a Roman coin.)

Florentia (Florentinus). 1. (Firenze, Florence), a town in Etruria on the Arno, was a Roman colony, and was probably founded by the Romans during their wars with the Ligurians. In the time of Sulla it was a flourishing municipium, but its greatness as a city dates from the middle ages. (Flor. iii. 21, 27; Tac. Ann. i. 79; Ptol. iii. 1, 48).—2. (Fiorenzuola), a town in Cisalpine Gaul on the Aemilia Via, between Placentia and Parma.

Florentinus, a jurist, one of the council of the emperor Severus Alexander, wrote Institutiones in twelve books, which are quoted in the Corpus Juris.

Floriānus, M. Annius, the brother, by a different father, of the emperor Tacitus, upon whose decease he was proclaimed emperor at Rome, A.D. 276. He was murdered by his own troops at Tarsus, after a reign of about two months, while on his march against Probus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria.

Flōrus. I. L. Julius or Annaeus (the titles vary in the MSS.), a Roman historian, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote a summary of Roman history, divided into two books, extending from the foundation of the city to the establishment of the empire under Augustus, entitled Epitomae de T. Livio bellorum omnium annorum DCC libri duo. But, though it is drawn chiefly from Livy, the author does not strictly follow him. His work is of a rhetorical character, intended to glorify Rome. Editions by O. Jahn, 1852; C. Halm, 1854.—2. A rhetorician and poet under Hadrian, possibly, as some think, the same person as No. 1; or he may be identified with P. Annius Florus, who wrote a dialogue about Virgil's claim to be an orator or poet. (Included in the editions of No. 1.)

Flōrus, Gessius, a native of Clazomenae, succeeded Albinus as procurator of Judaea, A.D. 64–65. His cruel and oppressive government was the main cause of the rebellion of the Jews. (Tac. Hist. v. 10; Suet. Vesp. 4; Joseph. B. J. ii. 14.)

Flōrus, Julius, addressed by Horace in two epistles (i. 3, ii. 2), was attached to the suite of Claudius Tiberius Nero, when the latter was despatched by Augustus to place Tigranes upon the throne of Armenia. He was a writer of satires.

Foca or Phocas, a Latin grammarian, author of a dull, foolish Life of Virgil in hexameter verse, of which 119 lines remain. Printed in the Anthol. Lat. of Burnam and Wernsdorf.

Foeniculārius Campus, a plain covered with fennel, near Tarraco in Spain (Strab. p. 160; Cic. ad Att. xii. 16).

Fontēius, M., propraetor of Narbonnese Gaul, between B.C. 76–73, was accused of extortion in his province by M. Plaetorius in 69. He was defended by Cicero in an oration (pro M. Fonteio), part of which is extant.

Fontēius Cāpito. [CAPITO.]

Fontus or Fontānus, a Roman divinity, son of Janus, had an altar on the Janiculum, which derived its name from his father, and on which Numa was believed to be buried (Arnob. iii. 29). The name of this divinity is connected with fons, a fountain; and he was the personification of the flowing waters. On the 13th of October the Romans celebrated the festival of the fountains called Fontinalia, at which the fountains were adorned with garlands.

Fōrentum or Fērentum (Forentanus: Forenza), a town in Apulia, surrounded by fertile fields and in a low situation, according to Horace (arvum pingue humilis Forenti: Od. iii. 4, 16). Livy (ix. 20) describes it as a fortified place, which was taken by C. Junius Bubulcus, B.C. 317. The modern town lies on a hill. (Strab. p. 233; Plin. iii. 105.)

Formiae (Formianus: nr. Mola di Gaeta, Ru.), a town in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the innermost corner of the beautiful Sirus Caietanus (Gulf of Gaeta). It was a very ancient town, founded by the Pelasgic Tyrrhenians; and it appears to have been one of the head-quarters of the Tyrrhenian pirates, whence later poets supposed the city of Lamsus, inhabited by the Laestrygones, of which Homer speaks (Od. x. 81), to be the same as Formiae; and from this Lamsus the Roman Lamiae claimed to be descended. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 13; Hor. Od. iii. 17; Sil. It. vii. 410.) Formiae became a municipium without the suffragium [cf. CAERE] in 338 B.C., having sided with Rome in the Latin war (Liv. viii. 14; Vell. Pat. i. 14), and received the full franchise in 188 (Liv. xxxviii. 36). The beauty of the surrounding country induced many of the Roman nobles to build villas at this spot; of these the best known is the Formianum of Cicero, near which he was killed. The remains of Cicero's villa are still to be seen at the Villa Marsana near Castiglione. The hills of Formiae produced good wine (Hor. Od. i. 20).

Fornax, a Roman goddess, who presided over the oven for drying the corn, and whose festival was a thanksgiving for the good supply, and was also connected with the division of the Curiae (Ov. Fast. ii. 575; Dict. of Antiq. art. Fornacalia).

Fortūna (Τύχη), the goddess of fortune, was worshipped both in Greece and Italy. Hesiod describes her as a daughter of Oceanus; Pindar in one place calls her a daughter of Zeus the Liberator, and in another place one of the Moerae or Fates. But the worship of Τύχη as a personal deity was far less distinct in Greece than in Italy, where it was of ancient native origin. Praeneste and Antium were special seats of her worship, and may, perhaps, represent older forms of it than any other places. At Praeneste she was worshipped as Fortuna Primigenia, i.e. as the eldest child of the gods, daughter of Jupiter, whose power over the world dated from the very beginning. Her temple at Praeneste was also the seat of an oracle. At Antium (cf. Hor. Od. i. 35) the temple was also oracular, and it appears from coins and inscriptions that here two sister deities, Fortunae, were worshipped (cf. Mart. v. 1, 3; Suet. Cal. 57; Macrob. Sat. i. 23, 13), either because one presided over peace and the other over fortunes of war, or because one ruled on land and the other on the sea. At Rome her worship is said to have been introduced in the reigns of Ancus Martius and Servius Tullius, and the latter is said to have built two temples to her, the one in the Forum Boarium, and the other on the banks of the Tiber. (Ov. Fast. vi. 781, Val. Max. iii. 4, 3; Plut. de Fort. Rom. 10, Q.R. 74, 106.) She was often known as Fors Fortuna, which may, as some hold, be the names of originally distinct goddesses but as a double name signified Fortune in her aspect of uncertainty. As the state goddess she was spoken of as Fortuua Publica or Populi Romani, with other epithets describing her attributes, such as obsequens, felix, viscata

(i.e. ensnaring). But she was also regarded in much the same way as the Genius, and attached to special corporations, families, or individuals (cf. Plin. ii. 22). Thus we find Fortuna equestris, presiding over the Equites; virilis, addressed by women that they might please their husbands; muliebris, said to have originated when Coriolanus was persuaded by the women to spare Rome: a temple with this designation stood on the Via Latina, four miles from Rome (Val. Max. i. 8). A special significance attached to the title Fortuna Redux, or Fortuna Redux Augustorum, which was originally commemorative of the return of Augustus to Rome in B.C. 19, and afterwards denoted the protectress of the imperial house, especially on their campaigns or journeys.

These various functions are denoted by her emblems on coins or statuettes. Fortuna is represented holding a rudder (to show that she guided the destinies of men or states); a cornucopia to show that she gave wealth and prosperity, and with a ball or globe, denoting either the revolutions of chance, or the world itself as subject to chance. The former of these ideas is shown by the wheel which sometimes appears (Hor. Od. iii. 10, 10; Cic. Pis. 10, 22); and her mutability is sometimes shown also by wings (cf. Hor. Od. iii. 29, 53). In the imperial period new forms of worship came in, under the titles Fortuna-Isis and Fortuna-Panthea. Fortuna when identified with Isis was represented with the attributes of Isis, the lotus-flower, the horns, and erect feathers upon the head with the crescent and orb between, holding a sistrum (but also with the rudder and the cornucopia). Fortuna-Panthea expressed the idea that Fortuna included the attributes of other deities: she was represented like Fortuna-Isis, but with wings.

Fortunātæ or -orum Insulæ (αἱ τῶν μακδρων νῆσοι, i.e. the Islands of the Blessed). The early Greeks, as we learn from Homer, placed the Elysian fields, into which favoured heroes passed without dying, at the extremity of the earth, near the river Oceanus. In poems later than Homer, an island is clearly spoken of as their abode; and though its position was of course indefinite, both the poets and the geographers who followed them placed it beyond the Pillars of Hercules. Hence when, just after the time of the Marian civil wars, certain islands were discovered in the Ocean, off the W. coast of Africa, the name of Fortunatæ Insulæ was applied to them (Plut. Sert. 8; Plin. iv. 119). As to the names of the individual islands (Capraria, Canaria, Junonia, Nivaria, Ombrios, with some other variations in Plin. vi. 202), and the exact identification of them by their modern names, there are difficulties; but it may be safely said, generally, that the Fortunatæ Insulæ of Pliny, Ptolemy, and others, are the Canary Islands, and probably the Madeira group; the latter being perhaps those called by Pliny (after Juba) Purpurariæ. [ELYSIUM.]

Fortunatiānus, Atilius, a Latin grammarian, author of a treatise (Ars) upon prosody, and the metres of Horace. Ed. by Keil, Halle, 1835.

Fortunatiānus, Chirius, about 400 A.D., was the author of a compendium of technical rhetoric, in three books, under the title Curii (Chirii) Fortunatiani Consulti Artis Rhetoricæ Scholiceæ libri tres, which at one period was held in high esteem as a manual. Printed in C. Halm's Rhet. Lat. Min.

Fōrum. [ROMA.]

Fōrum, the name of several towns in various parts of the Roman empire, which were originally simply markets or places for the administration of justice. 1. Aliēni (Ferrara?), in Cisalpine Gaul.—2. Appii (nr. S. Donato, Ru.), in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the midst of the Pomptine marshes, 43 miles SE. of Rome, founded by the censor Appius Claudius when he made the Appia Via (Strab. p. 233; Suet. Tib. 2; Hor. Sat. i. 5, 3).—3. Amēlii or Ameilium (Montalto), in Etruria, on the Aurelia Via.—4. Cassii, in Etruria, on the Cassia Via, near Viterbo.—5. Clōdii (Oriuolo), in Etruria.—6. Cornēlii (Imola), in Gallia Cispadana, on the Aemilia Via, between Bononia and Faventia, a colony founded by Cornelius Sulla (Strab. p. 216).—7. Flaminii, in Umbria on the Flaminia

Via.—8. Fulvii, surnamed Valentinum (Valenza), in Liguria, on the Po, on the road from Dertona to Asta.—9. Gallorum (Castel Franco), in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Aemilia Via, between Mutina and Bononia, memorable for the two battles fought between Antonius and the consuls Pansa and Hirtius (Appian, B. C. iii. 66).

—10. Hadriani (Voorburg), in the island of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica, where several Roman remains have been found.—11. Julii or Julium (Forojuliensis: Fréjus), a Roman colony founded by Julius Caesar, B.C. 44, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the river Argenteus and on the coast, 600 stadia N.E. of Massilia. It possessed a good harbour, and was the usual station of a part of the Roman fleet. It was the birthplace of Agricola. At Fréjus are the remains of a Roman aqueduct, circus, arch, &c. (Strab. p. 184; Cic. Fam. x. 15; Tac. Ann. iv. 63, Hist. ii. 43).—12. Julii or Julium (Friaul), a fortified town and a Roman colony in the country of the Carni, N.E. of Aquileia: in the middle ages it became a place of importance.—13. Julium. See ILLITURGIS.—14. Livii (Forli), in Cisalpine Gaul, in the territory of the Boii, on the Aemilia Via, S.W. of Ravenna: here the Gothic king Athaulf married Galla Placidia.—15. Popilii (Forlimpopoli), in Gallia Cisalpina, E. of No. 14, and on the same road.—16. Popilii (Polla), in Lucania, E. of Paestum on the Tanager and on the Popilia Via. On the wall of an inn at Polla was discovered an inscription respecting the praetor Popilius.—17. Segusiānōrum (Feurs), in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Liger, and W. of Lugdunum, a town of the Segusiani and a Roman colony with the surname Julia Felix.—18. Semprōnii (Forosempronensis: Fossombrone), a municipium in Umbria, on the Flaminia Via.—19. Vocontii (Vidauban, E. of Canet), a town of the Salyes in Gallia Narbonensis.

Fosi, a people of Germany, the neighbours and allies of the Cherusci, in whose fate they shared. [CHERUSCI]. It is supposed that their name is retained in the river Fuse in Brunswick.

Fossa or Fossae, a canal. 1. Clōdia, a canal between the mouth of the Po and Altinum in the N. of Italy; there was a town of the same name upon it.—2. Cluilia or Cluiliae, a trench about five miles from Rome, said to have been the ditch with which the Alban king Cluilins protected his camp, when he marched against Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius.—3. Corbulōnis, a canal in the island of the Batavi, connecting the Maas and the Rhine, dug by command of Corbulo in the reign of Claudius (Tac. Ann. xi. 20; Dio Cass. lx. 30).

—4. Drusiānae or Drusinae, a canal which Drusus caused his soldiers to dig in B.C. 11, uniting the Rhine with the Yssel. It probably commenced near Arnheim on the Rhine and fell into the Yssel near Doesberg. (Tac. Ann. ii. 8).—5. Mariāna or Mariānae, a canal dug by command of Marius during his war with the Cimbri, in order to connect the Rhone with the Mediterranean, and thus make an easier passage for vessels into the Rhone, because the mouths of the river were frequently choked up with sand. The canal commenced near Arelate, but in consequence of the frequent changes in the course of the Rhone, it is impossible now to trace the course of the canal. (Plut. Mar. 15; Strab. p. 183).—6. Xerxis. See ATHOS.

Franci, i.e. 'the Free men,' a confederacy of German tribes, formed on the Lower Rhine in the place of the ancient league of the Cherusci, and consisting of the Sigumbri, the chief tribe, the Chamavi, Ampsivarii, Bructeri, Chatti, &c. They are first mentioned about A.D. 240 (Vopisc. Aurel. 7). After carrying on frequent wars with the Romans, they at length settled permanently in Gaul, of which they became the rulers under Clovis, A.D. 496.

Fregellae (Fregellāns: Ceprano), an ancient and important town of the Volsci commanding the passage of the Liris in Latium, conquered by the Romans, and colonised B.C. 328. It took part with the allies in the Social war and was destroyed by Opimius. (Strab. p. 237; Liv. viii. 22; Vell. Pat. ii. 6.)

Fregēnae, sometimes called Fregellae (Torre Maccarese), a town of Etruria on the coast between Alsium and the Tiber, on a low swampy shore, colonised by the Romans, probably in B.C. 245 (Strab. p. 226; Liv. xxxvi. 3).

Frentāni, a Samnite people, inhabiting a well watered territory on the coast of the Adriatic, from the river Sagrus on the N. (and subsequently almost as far N. as from the Aternus) to the river Frento on the S., from which they derived their name. They were bounded by the Marrucini on the N., by the Peligni and by Samnium on the W., and by Apulia on the S. They submitted to the Romans in B.C. 304 and concluded a peace with the republic (Liv. ix. 45).

Frento (Fortore), a river in Italy, forming the boundary between the Frentani and Apulia, rises in the Apennines and falls into the Adriatic sea.

Friiniātes, a people in Liguria, probably the same as the Briniates, who, after being subdued by the Romans, were transplanted to Samnium.

Frisiabōnes, a tribe of the Frisii, inhabiting the islands at the mouth of the Rhine.

Frisii, a people in the NW. of Germany, inhabited the coast from the E. mouth of the Rhine to the Amisia (Ems), and on the S. to the Bructeri, comprising Friesland, Gröningen, &c. Tacitus divided them into Majores and Minores, the former in the E., and the latter in the W. of the country. The Frisii were on friendly terms with the Romans from the first campaign of Drusus till A.D. 28, when the oppressions of the Roman officers drove them to revolt. In the fifth century they joined the Saxons and Angli in their invasion of Britain. (Tac. Germ. 34; Dio Cass. liv. 32; Procop. B. G. iv. 20.)

Frontinus, Sex. Julius, was praetor A.D. 70, and in 75 succeeded Cerealis as governor of Britain, where he distinguished himself by the conquest of the Silures, and maintained the Roman power unbroken until superseded by Agricola in 78. In 97 Frontinus was nominated curator aquarum. He died about 106. (Tac. Hist. iv. 39; Agr. 17; Plin. Ep. iv. 8, ix. 19.) He evidently possessed considerable knowledge both of engineering and of strategy. Two of his works are still extant:—1. Strategematicon Libri III, a sort of treatise on the art of war, developed in a collection of the sayings and doings of the most renowned leaders of antiquity, written as a supplement to a military work which is lost: a fourth book is different in plan and style and was added by an unknown writer. 2. De Aquaeductibus Urbis Romae Libri II, which forms a valuable contribution to the history of architecture (Dict. of Ant. art. Aqueductus). The best edition of the Strategematica is by Gundermann, Lips. 1888; of the De Aquaeductibus by Polenus, Patav. 1722, and by Bücheler, Lips. 1858. It is often published with Vitruvius.—In the collection of the Agrimensores or Rei Agrariæ Auctores (ed. Goesius, Amst. 1674; ed. Lachmann, Berlin, 1848) are preserved extracts from treatises ascribed to Frontinus on the art of measuring land and ascertaining boundaries. [Dict. of Ant. art. Groma.]

Fronto, M. Cornélius, was born at Cirta in Numidia, in the reign of Domitian, and came to Rome in the reign of Hadrian, where he attained great celebrity as a pleader and a teacher of rhetoric. He was entrusted with the education of the future emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus, who entertained, especially the former, the deepest affection for him, and rewarded him with wealth and honours. He was raised to the consulship in A.D. 143. So great was his fame as a speaker that a sect of rhetoricians arose who were denominated Frontoniani, professing to avoid the exaggeration of the Greek sophistical school, and bestowing especial care on the purity of their language and the simplicity of their style. But that Fronto's influence upon taste and education was not good is evident from the fact that he led the way in depreciating the authors of the Augustan age, that Græchus, Cato, Ennius, and Plautus took the place of Cicero, Virgil and Horace in schools and in public esteem (Dict. of Ant. art. Ludus Litterarius). Fronto lived till the reign of M. Aurelius. The latest of his epistles belongs to the year 166.—Up to a recent period no work of Fronto was known to be in existence, with the exception of a corrupt and worthless tract entitled De Differentiis Vocabulorum, and a few fragments preserved by the grammarians. But about the year 1814 Angelo Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the Ambrosian Library at Milan a considerable number of letters which had passed between Fronto, Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and various friends, together with some short essays. These were published by Mai at Milan in 1815, and in an improved form by Niebuhr, Buttman and Heindorf, Berlin, 1816. Subsequently Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the Vatican Library at Rome, upwards of 100 new letters; and he published these in Rome in 1823, together with those which had been previously discovered. It is clear from his works that his reputation as a great writer and orator was undeserved. As an author he is without genius, but vain and pretentious, with a mannerism arising from his effort to revert to an antique style. The value of his writings lies in their notice of contemporary men and manners. Ed. by S. Naber, Lips. 1867.

Fronto, Papirius, a jurist, who probably lived about the time of Antoninus Pius, or rather earlier.

Frusino (Frusinas, -ātis: Frosinone), a town of the Hernici in Latium, in the valley of the river Cosas, and subsequently a Roman colony. It was celebrated for its prodigies. (Strab. p. 237; Juv. iii. 224; Liv. xxvi. 9.)

Fucentis, Fucentia. [ALBA, No. 4.]

Fucinus Lacus (Lago di Celano or Capistrano), a large lake in the centre of Italy and in the country of the Marsi, about thirty miles in circumference, into which all the mountain streams of the Apennines flow. As the water of this lake had no visible outlet, and frequently inundated the surrounding country, the emperor Claudius constructed an emissarium or artificial channel for carrying off the waters of the lake into the river Liris. (Verg. Aen. vii. 759; Tac. Ann. xii. 57; Suet. Claud. 20; Plin. xxxvi.

124.) This emissarium is still nearly perfect: it is almost three miles in length. It appears that the actual drainage was relinquished soon after the death of Claudius, for it was reopened by Hadrian. (For a fuller description see Diet. of Ant. art. Emissarium.)

Fufius Calenus. [CALENUS.]

Fufius, the Etruscan name of DIONYSUS.

Fulgentius, Fabius Planciades, a Latin grammarian about A.D. 480 to 550. He was related to Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe, in Africa, A.D. 508, and probably belonged to the same country. He is the author of: 1. Mythologiarum Libri III ad Catum Presbyterum, a collection of mythological tales. His models are Apuleius and Martianus Capella. 2. Expositio Sermonum Antiquorum eum Testimoniis, a glossary of obsolete words and phrases; of very little value. 3. Liber de Expositione Virgilianae Continentiæ, an allegorical explanation of the Virgilian poems. 4. De Actatibus Mundi, a universal history, of little worth. Ed. by Van Staveren, Lug. Bat. 1742, and in Mythogr. Lat. by Bunte, Bremen, 1852.

Fulgīnia, Fulgīnium (Fulgias, -ātis: Foligno), a town in the interior of Umbria on the Via Flaminia, was a municipium.

Fulvia. 1. The mistress of Q. Curius, one of Catiline's conspirators, divulged the plot to Cicero. [CATILINA.]—2. A daughter of M. Fulvius Baubalio of Tusculum, thrice married, first to the notorious P. Clodius, by whom she had a daughter Clodia, afterwards the wife of Octavianus; secondly to C. Scribonius Curio, and thirdly to M. Antony, by whom she had two sons. She was a bold and ambitious woman. In the proscription of B.C. 43 she acted with the greatest arrogance and brutality: she gazed with delight upon the head of Cicero, the victim of her husband. Her turbulent and ambitious spirit excited a new war in Italy in 41. Jealous of the power of Octavianus, and anxious to withdraw Antony from the East, she induced L. Autouius, the brother of her husband, to take up arms against Octavianus. But Lucius was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into Perusia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year (40). Fulvia fled to Greece and died at Sicyon in the course of the same year (Vell. Pat. ii. 74).

Fulvia Gens, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious Roman gentes. It originally came from Tusculum. The principal families in the gens are those of CENTUMALUS, FLACCUS, NOBILIOR, and PAETINUS.

Fundānius. 1. C., father of Fundania, the wife of M. Terentius Varro, is one of the speakers in Varro's dialogue De Re Rustica.—2. M., defended by Cicero, B.C. 65; but the scanty fragments of Cicero's speech do not enable us to understand the nature of the charge.—3. A writer of comedies praised by Horace (Sat. i. 10, 41, 42).

Fundi (Fundanus: Fondi), an ancient town in Latium on the Appia Via, at the head of a narrow bay of the sea running a considerable way into the land, called the Lacus Fundanus. Fundi was a municipium sine suffragio [CÆRE] in B.C. 338, received the full franchise in 188, and was subsequently colonised by the veterans of Augustus. The surrounding country produced good wine. There are still remains at Fondi of the walls of the ancient town. (Liv. viii. 14, xxxviii. 36; Strab. p. 234; Hor. Sat. i. 5, 34; Mart. xiii. 113.)

Furcūlæ Caudinæ. [CARMUM.]

Fūria Gens, an ancient patrician gens, probably came from Tusculum. The most celebrated families of the gens bore the names of CAMILLUS, MEDULLINUS, PACILUS, and PHILUS. For others of less note see BIBACULUS, CRASSIPES, PURPUREO.

Fūriæ. [ERINYES.]

Furina, an Italian divinity, who had a sacred grove at Rome. Her worship seems to have become extinct at an early time. An annual festival (Furinalia or Furinales feriae) had been celebrated in honour of her on July 25, and a flamen (flamen Furinalis) conducted her worship. She had also a temple in the neighbourhood of Satricum. (Cic. N. D. iii. 46; ad Q. Fr. iii. 1; Varr. L. L. vi. 19.) She is connected by some writers with the Furies; but this seems only an attempt at etymology.

C. Furnius, a friend and correspondent of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 50; sided with Caesar in the Civil war; and after Caesar's death was a staunch adherent of Antony. After the battle of Actium, 31, he was reconciled to Augustus, through the mediation of his son, was appointed consul in 29, and was prefect of Hither Spain in 21. (Appian, B. C. v. 30, 137; Dio Cass. lii. 42; Cic. Fam. viii. 11.)

Fuscus. 1. Arellius, a rhetorician at Rome in the latter years of Augustus, instructed in rhetoric the poet Ovid. He declaimed more frequently in Greek than in Latin, and his style of declamation is described by Seneca as more brilliant than solid, antithetical rather than eloquent (Sen. Contr. ii. 1). His rival in teaching and declaiming was Porcius Latro. [LATRO].—2. Aristius, a friend of the poet Horace, who addressed to him an ode (Od. i. 22) and an epistle (Ep. i. 10), and who also introduces him elsewhere (Sat. i. 9, 61; 10, 88).—3. Cornélius, one of the most active adherents of Vespasian in his contest for the empire, A.D. 69. In the reign of Domitian he was sent against the Dacians, by whom he was defeated. (Juv. iv. 112; Tac. Hist. ii. 86, iii. 42, iv. 4.) Martial wrote an epitaph on Fuscus (Ep. vi. 76), in which he refers to the Dacia campaign.

G.

Gābæ (Γάβαι). 1. (Darabgherd?), a fortress and royal residence in the interior of Persis, SE. of Pasargadae, near the borders of Carmania (Strab. p. 728).—2. Or Gabaza, or Cazaba, a fortress in Sogdiana, on the confines of the Massagetæ (Arrian, iv. 17).

Gābāla (Γάβαλα), a seaport town of Syria Seleucis, S. of Laodicea; whence good storax was obtained (Plin. xii. 124).

Gābāli, a people in Gallia Aquitania, whose country possessed silver mines and good pasture. Their chief town was Anderitum (Astérieux). (Caes. B. G. vii. 75; Strab. p. 191.)

Gābiāna or -ēnē (Γαβιανή, Γαβιηνή), a fertile district in the Persian province of Susiana, W. of M. Zagros.

Gābii (Gabinus: nr. Castiglione, Ru.), a town in Latium, on the Lacus Gabinus (Lago di Gavi), between Rome and Praeneste, was in early times one of the most powerful Latin cities; a colony from Alba Longa; and the place, according to tradition, where Romulus was brought up (Plut. Rom. 6; Dionys. i. 84). It was taken by Tarquinius Superbus by stratagem (Liv. i. 53), and it was in ruins in the time of Augustus (Gabius desertior vicus, Hor. Ep. i. 11, 7). The cinctus Gabinus, a peculiar mode of wearing the toga at Rome, appears to have been derived from this town. Near Gabii are the immense stone quarries from which a part of Rome was built (cf. Tac. Ann. xv. 43).

A. Gabinius, dissipated his fortune in youth by his profligate mode of life. He was tribune of the plebs B.C. 66, when he proposed and carried a law conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates, with power to raise an army and a fleet of 500 ships, and to select his legati and quaestors, while he acted as supreme commander (practically a dictator) for three years over all the Mediterranean and over the coasts for fifty miles inland. He was praetor in 61, and consul in 58 with L. Piso. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. In 57 Gabinius went to Syria as proconsul. His first attention was directed to the affairs of Judea. He restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, of which he had been dispossessed by Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and he suppressed revolts of Jews, imposing heavy taxation. He next marched into Egypt, and restored Ptolemy Auletes to the throne. The restoration of Ptolemy had been forbidden by a decree of the senate, and by the Sibylline books; but Gabinius had been promised by the king a sum of 10,000 talents for this service, and set at nought both the senate and the Sibyl. His government of the province was marked by the most shameful venality and oppression. He returned to Rome in 54. He was accused of majestas or high treason, on account of his restoration of Ptolemy Auletes in defiance of the Sibyl and the authority of the senate. He was acquitted on this charge; but he was forthwith accused of extortion, specially on account of the receipt of 10,000 talents from Ptolemy. He was defended by Cicero, who had been persuaded by Pompey to undertake the defence. Gabinius was condemned on this charge, and went into exile. He was recalled by Caesar in 49, and in the following year (48) was sent into Illyricum by Caesar with some newly levied troops to reinforce Q. Cornificius. He died in Illyricum about the end of 48. (Cic. de Imp. Pomp.; Plut. Pomp. 25 ff.; Dio Cass. xxxix. 55-63; Bell. Alex. 44.)

Gādāra (Γάδαρα: Γαδαρῆνός: Um-Keis), a large fortified city of Palestine, one of the ten which formed the Decapolis in Peraea, stood a little S. of the Hieromax (Yarmuk), an eastern tributary of the Jordan. The surrounding district, SE. of the lake of Tiberias, was called Gadāris, and was very fertile. Augustus presented Gadara to king Herod, after whose death it was assigned to the province of Syria. It was made the seat of a Christian bishopric. There were celebrated baths in its neighbourhood, at Amathia. (Strab. p. 759; Jos. Ant. xii. 3.)

Gādes (τὰ Γάδερα: Γαδειρεῖς, Gaditānus: Cadiz), a very ancient town in Hispania Bactica, W. of the Pillars of Hercules, founded by the Phoenicians, and one of the chief seats of their commerce in the W. of Europe, was situated on a small island of the same name (I. de Leon), separated from the mainland by a narrow channel, which in its narrowest part was only the breadth of a stadium, and over which a bridge was built. Herodotus says (iv. 8) that the island of Erythia was close to Gadeira; whence most later writers supposed the island of Gades to be the same as the mythical island of Erythia, from which Heracles carried off the oxen of Geryon (Strab. pp. 148, 168; Diod. v. 20; Hes. Th. 287, 979). In Roman times a new town was built by Cornelius Balbus, a native of Gades, and the circumference of the old and new towns together was only 20 stadia. The town, however, included inhabitants on the mainland opposite the island, as well as those on a smaller island (S. Sebastian or Trocadero) in the immediate neighbourhood of the larger one. After the first Punic war Gades came into the hands of the Carthaginians, having previously been merely under their hegemony; and in the second Punic war it surrendered of its own accord to the Romans. Its inhabitants received the Roman franchise from Julius Caesar in B.C. 49 (Dio Cass. xli. 24). It became a municipium, and was called Augusta urbs Julia Gaditana.—Gades was from the earliest to the latest times an important commercial town. Its inhabitants were wealthy and luxurious, and their licentious dances were notorious at Rome (Juv. xi. 162). Gades possessed celebrated temples of Cronus and Heracles.—Gades gave its name to the Fretum Gaditanum, the straits at the entrance of the Mediterranean between Europe and Africa (Straits of Gibraltar).

Gaea or Ge (Γαῖα or Γῆ), the personification of the earth. Homer describes her as a divine being, to whom black sheep were sacrificed, and who was invoked by persons taking oaths; and he calls her the mother of Erechtheus and Tityus. But though she takes in Homer no prominent position, yet the inference is that he has merely put aside the myths about her, not that they are later than his period. Her importance before Homer's time is indicated by her position in the oaths and sacrifices beside Zeus and Helios (Il. iii. 103, xviii. 259). In Hesiod she is the first being that sprang from Chaos, and gave birth to Uranus and Poutus. By Uranus she became the mother of Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, Thetys, Cronos, the Cyclopes, Brontes, Steropes, Arges, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges. These children were hated by their father, and Ge therefore concealed them in the bosom of the earth; but she made a large iron sickle, gave it to her sons, and requested them to take vengeance upon their father. Cronos undertook the task, and mutilated Uranus. The drops of blood, which fell from him upon the earth (Ge), became the seeds of the Erinyes, the Gigantes, and the Melian nymphs. [For this myth see URANUS.] Subsequently Ge became, by Pontus, the mother of Nereus, Thaumás, Phorcys, Ceto, and Eurybia. As regards her functions: (1) Ge belonged to the deities of the nether world (θεοὶ χθόνιοι), and hence she is frequently mentioned where they are invoked (cf. Aesch. Pers. 220, 621). (2) The surnames and epithets given to her have more or less reference to her character as the all-producing and all-nourishing mother (παμμήτειρα, κουροτρόφος, ομπνιπάρης). (3) She had oracular power, which accordingly was shared by other deities connected with the earth and its fruits, or with the underworld (Aesch. Eum. 2; Eur. Iph. T. 1249; Paus. x. 5, 5; Dict. of Antiq. art. Oraculum). Her worship was noticeable especially at Athens under the name of Κουροτρόφος on the Arciopagus and possibly on the Acropolis, and at Olympia in the precinct of Zeus (Thuc. ii. 15; Paus. i. 18); but altars in her honour existed in many, probably in most, Greek cities. At Rome the earth was worshipped under the name of Tellus (which is only a variation of Terra). She was regarded by the Romans also as one of the gods of the nether world (Inferi), and is mentioned in connexion with Dis and the Manes. A temple was built to her by the consul P. Sempronius Sophus, in B.C. 304. Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of April, and was called Fordicidia or Hordicidia [see Dict. of Antiq. art. Fordicidia]. This sacrifice, consisting of cows, was offered up in the Capitol in the presence of the Vestals. In art Gaea is represented as a matrouly figure, often with a cornucopia or with fruits about her: in some reliefs with little children beside her: she either reclines on the ground, or is a half-figure emerging from beneath, as in the relief of Pergamum (Gigantomachia), and in the terracotta of the birth of Erichthonius.

Gæson, Gaesus, or Gessus (Γαῖσων), a river of Ionia in Asia Minor, falling into the Gulf of Maeander near the promontory of Mycale.

Gaetūlia (Γαιτουλία), the interior of N. Africa, S. of Mauretania, Numidia, and the region bordering on the Syrtis, reaching to the Atlantic Ocean on the W., and of very indefinite extent towards the E. and S. The people included under the name Gaetūli (Γαιτούλοι), in its widest sense, were the inhabitants of the region between the countries just mentioned and the Great Desert, and also in the Oases of the latter, and nearly as far S. as the river Niger. They were a nomad race, including several tribes, the chief of whom were the Antoteles and Pharusii on the W. coast, the Darae, or Gaetuli-Darae, in the steppes of the Great Atlas, and the Melanogaetuli, a black race resulting from the intermixture of the Gaetuli with their S. neighbours, the Nigritae. The pure Gaetulians were not an Aethiopic (i.e. negro), but a Libyan race, supposed to have been the ancestors of the Berbers (Strab. pp. 826–829; Plin. v. 9, 10).

Gaetulicus. [LENTULUS.]

Gaius. [ARCADIUS.]

Gāius or Caius. [CALIGULA.]

Gāius, a celebrated Roman jurist, wrote under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. His works were very numerous, and great use was made of them in the compilation of the Digest. One of his most celebrated works was an elementary treatise on Roman law, entitled Institutiones, in four books. This work was for a long time the ordinary text book used by those who were commencing the study of the Roman law; but it went out of use after the compilation of the Institutiones of Justinian, and was finally lost. It was again discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 in the library of the Chapter at Verona. The MS. containing Gaius was a palimpsest. The original writing of Gaius had on some pages been washed out, and on others scratched out, and the whole was rewritten with the Letters of St. Jerome. The task of deciphering the original MS. was a very difficult one, and some parts were completely destroyed. Ed. by Göschen in 1821; by Muirhead, 1880; by Krüger and Studemund, 1884.

Gagae (Γάγαι), a town on the coast of Lycia, E. of Myra, whence was obtained the mineral called Gagates lapis—that is, jet, or, as it is still called in German, gagat (Plin. xxxvi. 141).

Galaesus. [GALESUS.]

Galanthis. [GALINTHIAS.]

Gālātēa (Γαλάτεια), daughter of Nereus and Doris. For details, see ACIS.

Gālātīa (Γαλατία; Γαλάτης; in the E. part of Anadoli and the W. part of Rumili), a country of Asia Minor, composed of parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia, and bounded on the W., S., and SE. by those countries, and on the NE., N., and NW. by Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. It derived its name from its inhabitants, who were Gauls that had invaded and settled in Asia Minor at various periods during the third century B.C. First, a portion of the army which Brennus led against Greece separated from the main body and marched into Thrace, and, having pressed forward as far as the shores of the Propontis, some of them crossed the Hellespont on their own account, while others, who had reached Byzantium, were invited to pass the Bosphorus by Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, who required their aid against his brother Zipoetus (B.C. 279). (Liv. xxxviii. 16; Just. xxv. 2; Strab. p. 541.) They speedily overran all Asia Minor within the Taurus, and exacted tribute from its various princes, and served as mercenaries not only in the armies of these princes, but also of the kings of Syria and Egypt; and, according to one account, a body of them found their way to Babylon. During their ascendancy, other bodies of Gauls followed them into Asia. Their progress was at length checked by the arms of the kings of Pergamum: Eumenes fought against them with various fortune; but Attalus I. gained a complete victory over them (B.C. 230), and compelled them to settle down within the limits of the country thenceforth called Galatia, and also, on account of the mixture of Greeks with the Celtic inhabitants, which speedily took place, Graeco-Galatia and Gallograecia. The people of Galatia adopted to a great extent Greek habits and manners, but preserved their own language, which is spoken of as resembling that of the Treviri, and some features of their national religion, e.g. their assemblies in the sacred oak-grove. They retained also their political divisions and forms of government. They consisted of three great communities or cantons, the Tolistobogi, the Trocini, and the Tectosages, each subdivided into four parts, called by the Greeks τετραρχία. At the head of each of these twelve Tetrarchies was a chief, or Tetrarch, who appointed the chief magistrate (δικαστής), and the commander of the army (στρατοφύλαξ), and two lieutenant-generals (ὑποστρατοφύλακες). The twelve tetrarchs together had the general government of the country, but their power was checked by an assistant senate of 300, who met in a place called Dryaenetum, i.e. the oak-grove, and had jurisdiction in all capital cases (Strab. p. 566; Dict. of Ant. art. Pagus). This form of government had a natural tendency to monarchy, according as either of the twelve tetrarchs became more powerful than the rest, especially under the protection of the Romans, to whom Galatia became virtually subject as the result of the campaign which the consul Cn. Manlius undertook against the Gauls, to punish them for the assistance they had given to Antiochus the Great (B.C. 189). At length one of the tetrarchs, DEIOTARUS, was rewarded for his services to the Romans in the Mithridatic war, by the title of king, together with a grant of Pontus and Armenia Minor; but after the death of his successor, Amyntas, Galatia was made by Augustus a Roman province (B.C. 25). It was soon after enlarged by the addition of Paphlagonia. Under Constantine it was restricted to its old limits, and under Valens it was divided into two provinces, Galatia Prima and Galatia Secunda. The country was beautiful and fertile, being watered by the rivers Halys and Sangarius. Its only important cities were, in the SW. PESSINUS, the capital of the Tolistobogi; in the centre ANCYRA, the capital of the Tectosages; and in the NE. TAVIUM, the capital of the Trocini.—Cicero speaks of the Galatians as being among the best soldiers levied in Asia (ad Att. vi. 5). [For the history of their Christian churches see Dict. of the Bible.]

Galaxius (Γαλάξιος), a small river in Boeotia, on which stood a temple of Apollo Galaxios: it derived its name from its milky colour, which was owing to the chalky nature of the soil through which it flowed.

Galba, Sulpicius, a patrician name. 1. P., consul B.C. 211, defeated by Hannibal in his retreat from Rome in that year, a loss which was compensated by Capua falling into the hands of the Romans. Galba received Macedonia as his province, where he remained as proconsul till 204, and carried on the war against Philip. In 200, he was consul a second time, and again obtained Macedonia as his province; but he was unable to accomplish anything of importance against Philip, and was succeeded in the command in the following year by Villius Tappulus. He was one of the ten commissioners sent to Greece in 196, after the defeat of Philip by Flamininus, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Antiochus in 193. (Liv. xxv. 41, xxvii. 22-33, xxxv. 13-16; Polyb. ix. 6, xxiii. 8).—2. Ser., was praetor 151, and received Spain as his province. His name is infamous on account of his treacherous murder of the Lusitanians, with their wives and children, who had surrendered to him on the promise of receiving grants of land. Viriathus was one of the few Lusitanians who escaped from the bloody scene. [VIRIATHUS.] On his return to Rome in 149, he was brought to trial on account of the massacre of the Lusitanians. His conduct was denounced in the strongest terms by Cato, who was then eighty-five years old, but he was nevertheless acquitted. He was consul 144. Cicero praises his oratory in the highest terms. (Appian, Hisp. 58-60; Plut. Cat. Maj. 15; Nep. Cat. 3; Cic. de Or. i. 10, 40).—3. Ser., great-grandfather of the emperor Galba, served under Caesar in the Gallic war, and was praetor in 54. After Caesar's death he served against Antony in the war of Mutina.—4. C., father of the emperor Galba, was consul in A.D. 22.

Galba, Ser. Sulpicius, Roman emperor, from June, A.D. 68, to January, A.D. 69. He was born near Terracina, on the 24th of December, B.C. 3. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him that one day he would be at the head of the Roman world, from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents (Tac. Ann. vi. 20). From his parents he inherited great wealth. He was invested with the curule offices before the legitimate age. He was praetor A.D. 20, and consul 33. After his consulship he had the government of Gaul, 39, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him to seize the empire, but he preferred a private station. Claudius entrusted him, in 45, with the administration of Africa, which he governed with wisdom and integrity. In the reign of Nero he lived for several years in retirement, through fear of the tyrant's suspicion; but in 61 Nero gave him the government of Hispania Tarraconensis, where he remained for eight years. In 68 Vindex rebelled in Gaul. About the same time Galba was informed that Nero had sent secret orders for his assassination. He therefore resolved to follow the example of Vindex; but he did not assume the imperial title, and professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. Shortly afterwards Nero was murdered; and Galba proceeded to Rome, where he was acknowledged as emperor. But his severity and avarice made him unpopular, especially with the soldiers. His powers had also become enfeebled by age, and he was under the sway of favourites, who perpetrated many enormities in his name. Perceiving the weakness of his government, he adopted Piso Licinianus as his successor. But this only hastened his ruin. Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, formed a conspiracy among the soldiers, who mutinied six days after the adoption of Piso. Galba was murdered, and Otho was proclaimed emperor. (Life by Suet. and Plut.; Tac. Hist. i. 7-49; Dio Cass. lxxiii. 22 ff.)

Galēnus, Claudius, commonly called Galen, the celebrated physician, whose works have had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times. He was born at Pergamum in A.D. 130. His father, Nicon, who was an architect and geometrician, carefully superintended his education. In his seventeenth year (146), his father, who had hitherto destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and, in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of Medicine. He at first studied medicine in his native city. In his twentieth year (149), he lost his father, and about the same time he went to Smyrna for the purpose of studying under Pelops the physician, and Albinus the Platonic philosopher. He afterwards studied at Corinth and Alexandria. He returned to Pergamum in his twenty-ninth year (158), and was immediately appointed physician to the school of gladiators, an office which he filled with great success. In 164 he went to Rome for the first time. Here he stayed about four years, and gained great reputation from his skill in anatomy and medicine. He returned to Pergamum in 168, but had scarcely settled there, when he received a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia. From Aquileia Galen followed M. Aurelius to Rome in 170. When the emperor again set out, to conduct the war on the Danube, Galen with difficulty obtained permission to be left behind at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Aesculapius. Before leaving the city the emperor committed to the medical care of Galen his son Commodus, who was then nine years of age. Galen stayed at Rome some years, during which time he employed himself in lecturing, writing, and practising, with great success. He subsequently returned to Pergamum, but whether he again visited Rome is uncertain. He is said to have died in the year 200, at the age of seventy, in the reign of Septimius Severus; but it is not improbable that he lived some years longer. Galen wrote a great number of works on medical and philosophical subjects. The works still extant under his name consist of eighty-three treatises acknowledged to be genuine; nineteen whose genuineness has been doubted; forty-five undoubtedly spurious; nineteen fragments; and fifteen commentaries on different works of Hippocrates. Galen attached himself exclusively to none of the medical sects into which the profession was divided, but chose from the tenets of each what he believed to be good and true, and called those persons slaves who designated themselves as followers of Hippocrates, Praxagoras, or any other man. The best edition of his works is by Kühn, Lips. 1821-1833, 20 vols. 8vo.

Galepsus (Γαληψός: Γαλήψιος), a town in Macedonia, on the Toronaic gulf (Thuc. iv. 107).

Gālērīus Maximiānus. [MAXIMIANUS.]

Gālērīus Trachālus. [TRACHALUS.]

Gālēs or Galaesus (Galeso), a river in the S. of Italy, flows into the gulf of Tarentum (Liv. xxv. 11), through the meadows where the sheep fed whose wool was so celebrated in antiquity (dulce pellitis ovibus Galaesi flumen, Hor. Od. ii. 6, 10; cf. Mart. xii. 63, 3).

Gālēs (Γάλεος)—that is, 'the lizard'—son of Apollo and Themisto, the daughter of the Hyperborean king Zebus. In pursuance of an oracle of the Dodonean Zeus, Galeus emigrated to Sicily, where he built a sanctuary to his father Apollo. (Cic. Div. i. 20; Ael. V. H. xii. 46; Paus. vi. 2, 2.) The Galeotae, a family of Sicilian soothsayers, derived their origin from him. The principal seat of the Galeotae was the town of Hybla, which was hence called Galeotis or Galeatis. The lizard was a sacred animal of Apollo, and it is probable that the whole story denotes an early establishment of the worship of Apollo in Sicily.

Galgacus or Calgacus, the chief of the Caledonian tribes who fought with the Romans at the Mons Graupius (Tac. Agr. 29).

Galilaea (Γαλιλαία), the N.-most of the three divisions of Palestine W. of the Jordan. It lay between the Jordan and the Mediterranean on the E. and W., and the mountains of Hermou and Carmel on the N. and S. It was divided into Upper or N. Galilee, and Lower or S. Galilee. (Strab. p. 760.) It was very fertile and densely peopled; but its inhabitants were a mixed race of Jews, Syrians, Phoenicians, Greeks, and others, and were therefore despised by the Jews of Judaea. [PALAESTINA.]

Gālīnthias or Gālanthis (Ov. Met. ix. 306), daughter of Proetus of Thebes and a friend of Alcmena. When Alcmena was on the point of giving birth to Heracles, and the Moerae and Ilithyiae, at the request of Hera, were endeavouring to delay the birth, Galinthias suddenly rushed in with the false report that Alcmena had given birth to a son. The hostile goddesses were so surprised at this information that they withdrew their hands. Thus the charm was broken, and Alcmena was enabled to give birth to Heracles. The deluded goddesses avenged the deception practised upon them by metamorphosing Galinthias into a weasel or a cat (γαλή). Hecate, however, took pity upon her, and made her her attendant, and Heracles afterwards erected a sanctuary to her. At Thebes it was customary at the festival of Heracles first to offer sacrifices to Galinthias. (Ov. Met. ix. 284; Ant. Lib. 29.)

Galla. 1. Wife of Constantius, son of the emperor Constantius Chlorus. She was the mother of Gallus Caesar. [GALLUS.]—2. Daughter of the emperor Valentinian I., and second wife of Theodosius the Great.—3. GALLA PLACIDIA or simply PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius the Great by No. 2. She fell into the hands of Alaric, when he took Rome, A.D. 410; and Ataulphus, the Gothic king, married her in 414. After the death of Ataulphus she was restored to Honorius; and in 417 she was married to Constantius, to whom she bore the emperor Valentinian III. During the minority of the latter she governed the Western Empire. She died about 450.

Gallaecia, the country of the Gallaeci (Καλαϊκοί), in the N. of Spain, between the Astures and the Durius, was in earlier times included in Lusitania. Gallaecia was sometimes used in a wider sense to include the country of the Astures and the Cantabri. It produced tin (especially the country of the Artabri; cf. CASSITERIDES), gold, and a precious stone called gemma Gallaica. Its inhabitants were among the most uncivilised in Spain. They were defeated by D. Brutus, consul B.C. 138, who obtained in consequence the surname of Gallæcens. (Strab. pp. 147, 152, 155.)

Gallia (ἡ Κελτική, Γαλαρία), was used before the time of Julius Caesar to indicate all the land inhabited by the Galli or Celtae, and consequently included not only the later Gaul and the N. of Italy, but a part of Spain, the greater part of Germany, the British isles, and other countries. The early history of the Celtic race, and their various settlements in different parts of Europe, are related under CELTÆ.—1. Gallia, also called Gallia Transalpina (Varr. R. R. i. 7, 8), or Gallia Ulterior (ἡ ὑπερ-ἀλπιος or ὑπὲρ τῶν Ἀλπέων Κελτική, Strab. p. 176; Γαλάται Τρανσαλπίνοι, Polyb. ii. 15), to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina or the N. of Italy. Gallia Braccata and Gallia Comata are also used in contradistinction to Gallia Togata or the N. of Italy, but these names are not identical with the whole of Gallia Transalpina. Gallia Braccata was the part of the country first subdued by the Romans, the later Provincia, and was so called because the inhabitants wore braccae or trousers. Gallia Comata was the remainder of the country, excluding Gallia Braccata, and derived its name from the inhabitants wearing their hair long. The Romans were acquainted with only a small portion of Transalpine Gaul till the time of Caesar. In the time of Augustus it was bounded on the S. by the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean; on the E. by the river Varus and the Alps, which separated it from Italy, and by the river Rhine, which separated it from Germany; on the N. by the German Ocean and the English Channel; and on the W. by the Atlantic: thus including not only the whole of France and Belgium, but a part of Holland, a great part of Switzerland, and all the provinces of Germany W. of the Rhine. The greater part of this country is a plain, well watered by numerous rivers. The principal mountains were Mons CEBENNA or Gebenna in the S.; the range of Mons JURA in the E., separating the Sequani and the Helvetii; and Mons VOSEGUS or VOGESUS, a continuation of the Jura. The chief forest was the Silva ARDUENNA, extending from the Rhine and the Treviri as far as the Scheldt. The principal rivers were, in the E. and N., the RHENUS (Rhine), with its tributaries the MOSA (Maas) and MOSELLA (Moselle); the SCALDIS (Scheldt); the SEQUANA (Seine), with its tributary the MATRONA (Marne): in the centre the LIGERIS (Loire); in the W. the GARUMNA (Garonne); and in the S. the RHODANUS (Rhone). These river names dated from a time long before the Roman acquaintance with Gaul. The ARAR was so called by the Romans, instead of its original name Sauconna, which came again into use and still survives in the modern name Saône. The country was celebrated for its fertility in ancient times, and possessed a numerous and warlike population.—The Greeks, at a very early period, became acquainted with the S. coast of Gaul, where they founded, in B.C. 600, the important town of MASSILIA, which in its turn founded several colonies, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the neighbouring districts. The Romans did not attempt to make any conquests in Transalpine Gaul till they had finally conquered, not only Africa, but Greece and a great part of Western Asia. In B.C. 154 Q. Opimius went to aid the Massiliots and subdued their enemies the Ligures. In B.C. 125 the consul M. Fulvius Flaccus commenced the subjugation of the Salluvii in the S. of Gaul. In the next three years (124–122) the Salluvii were completely subdued by Sextius Calvinus, and Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix) was founded in their country, as a fortress (castellum or φρουρά, Strab. p. 180; Vell. Pat. i. 15; in Liv. Ep. 61 it is erroneously called a colony). In 121 the Allobroges were defeated by the proconsul Domitius Ahenobarbus; and in the same year Q. Fabius Maximus gained a great victory over the united forces of the Allobroges and Arverni, at the confluence of the Isara and the Rhone. The S. of Gaul was now made a Roman province (Caes. B. G. i. 45); and in 118 was founded the colony of Narbo Martius (Narbonne), which was the chief town of the province (Cic. Brut. 43, 160; Vell. Pat. i. 15). In Caesar's Commentaries the Roman province is called simply Provincia, in contradistinction to the rest of the country: hence comes the modern name of Provence. It was bounded on the E. by the Alps, on the N. by the bend of the Rhone from the Lake of Geneva to Vienne, on the W. by the Upper Garonne and the Cevennes, on the S. by the sea and the Eastern Pyrenees. The rest of the country was subdued by Caesar after a struggle of several years (58–50). At this time Gaul was divided into three parts, Aquitania, Celtica, and Belgica, according to the three different races by which it was inhabited. The Aquitani dwelt in the SW. between the Pyrenees and the Garumna; the Celtae, or Galli proper, in the centre and W., between the Garumna and the Sequana and the Matrona; and the Belgæ in the NE. between the two last mentioned rivers and the Rhine. The different tribes inhabiting Aquitania and Belgica are given elsewhere. [AQUITANIA; BELGÆ.] The most important tribes of the Celtae or Galli were: 1. Between the Sequana and the Liger: the Armoricæ civitates, under which name were included several tribes dwelling on the coast between the mouths of these two rivers [ARMORICA]; the AULERCI, dwelling more inland, the NAMNETES, ANDECAVI or ANDES, on the banks of the Liger; E. of them the CARNUTES; and on the Sequana, the PARISI, SENONES, and TRICASSES.—2. Between the Liger and the Garumna: on the coast the PICTONES and SANTONES; inland the TURONES, probably on both sides of the Liger, the BITURIGES CUBI, LEMOVICES, PETROCORII, and CADURCI; E. of these, in the mountains of Cebenna, the powerful ARVERNI (in the modern Auvergne); and S. of them the RUTENI.—3. On the Rhone and in the surrounding country: between the Rhone and the Pyrenees, the VOLCAE; between the Rhone and the Alps, the SALYES or SALLUVII; N. of them the CAVARES; between the Rhone, the Isara, and the Alps, the ALLOBROGES; and further N. the AEDUI, SEQUANI, and HELVETII, three of the most powerful people in all Gaul.—Augustus divided Gaul into four provinces. 1. Gallia Narbonensis, the same as the old Provincia, under a proconsul. 2. G. Aquitanica, which extended from the Pyrenees to the Liger. 3. G. Lugdunensis, the country between the Liger, the Sequana, and the Arar, so called from the colony of Lugdunum (Lyón), founded by Munatius Plancus. 4. G. Belgica, the country between the Sequana, the Arar, and the Rhine. These three last named, conquests of Julius Caesar, were (in distinction to G. Narbonensis) called Tres Galliae (Liv. Ep. 134; Plin. iv. 105); they were imperial provinces and each was administered by a legatus of the emperor. Shortly afterwards the portion of Belgica bordering on the Rhine, and inhabited by German tribes, was subdivided into two new provinces, called Germania Prima and Secunda, or Germania Superior and Inferior. [GERMANIA.] At a later time the provinces of Gaul were still further subdivided, till at length, under the emperor Gratian, they reached the number of seventeen. The difference of administration in the old province of G. Narbonensis, and in the 'three Gauls' was much greater than the superficial distinction of senatorial and imperial government. The southern province was completely Romanised, and Roman colonies took the place of old cantons. Important towns of a purely Roman character were thus established. Besides Narbo, these were especially Arelate (Arles), with commerce from the mouth of the Rhone; Forum Julii (Fréjus) the station of the fleet; Baeterrae (Béziers), Arausio (Orange), and Nemausus (Nismes): other burgess communities were added afterwards: hence the Latin language early took root and the distinction began, which still exists, between the countries of Langue d'oc and Langue d'oïl. On the other hand, in the three more northern provinces the Celtic cantonal organisation remained [Dict. of Ant. art. Pagus]; and therefore the old tribal influence lasted, and those districts became more slowly and less completely Romanised. The only town in these provinces which was founded as a colony in an early period of the conquest, and did not grow out of a canton, was Lugdunum, which eventually took the precedence of all Gallic towns until the end of the third century, when Treviri (Trêves) became the capital of Gaul. And the policy of Augustus allowed to the three provinces the right of assembling at Lugdunum a diet of representatives from sixty-four cantons, which not only consolidated the nation in religious matters but also had political functions for considering and presenting to Rome their complaints or desires. The rhetoricians and poets of Gaul, first in the towns of the old province and at Lugdunum, but afterwards in others also, occupy a distinguished place in the later history of Roman literature; and BURDIGALA, NARBO, LUGDUNUM, AUGUSTODUNUM, and other towns, possessed schools, in which literature and philosophy were cultivated with success. On the dissolution of the Roman empire, Gaul, like the other Roman provinces, was overrun by barbarians, and the greater part of it finally became subject to the Franks or Franks, under their king Clovis, A.D. 496.—2. Gallia Cisalpina, also called G. Citerior and G. Togata, a Roman province in the N. of Italy, was bounded on the W. by Liguria and Gallia Narbonensis (from which it was separated by the Alps), on the N. by Rhaetia and Noricum, on the E. by the Adriatic and Venotia (from which it was separated by the Athesis), and on the S. by Etruria and Umbria (from which it was separated by the river Rubico). It was divided by the Po into Gallia Transpadana, also called Italia Transpadana, in the N., and Gallia Cispadana in the S. The greater part of the country is a vast plain, drained by the PADUS (Po) and its affluents, and has always been one of the most fertile countries of Europe. It was originally inhabited by Ligurians, Umbrians, Etruscans, and other races; but its fertility attracted the Gauls, who at different periods crossed the Alps, and settled in the country, after expelling the original inhabitants. We have mention of five distinct immigrations of Gauls into the N. of Italy. The first was in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, and is said to have been led by Bellocus, who settled with his followers in the country of the Insubres, and built Milan. The second consisted of the Cenomani, who settled in the neighbourhood of Brixia and Verona. The third of the Salluvii, who pressed forward as far as the Ticinus. The fourth of the Boii and Lingones, who crossed the Po, and took possession of the country as far as the Apennines, driving out the Etruscans and Umbrians. The fifth immigration was the most important, consisting of the warlike race of the Senones, who invaded Italy in immense numbers, under the command of Brennus, and took Rome in B.C. 390. Part of them subsequently recrossed the Alps and returned home; but a great number of them remained in the N. of Italy, and were for more than a century a source of terror to the Romans. After the first Punic war the Romans resolved to make a vigorous effort to subdue their dangerous neighbours. In the course of four years (225–222) the whole country was conquered, and the Latin colonies Cremona and Placentia were founded in 218 to retain the hold upon it. The inhabitants, however, did not bear the yoke patiently, and it was not till after the final defeat of the Boii in 191 that the country became submissive to the Romans. Roman colonies, Bononia (189) and Parma and Mutina (183), were now founded, and other towns grew up with the prolongation of the Via Flaminia (under the name of Via Aemilia) to Placentia. By Sulla it was erected into a Roman province under a proconsul in B.C. 81. In 49 the civitas, which since the Social war had belonged to G. Cispadana, was extended to G. Transpadana. After 42, however, it reckoned as part of Italy, and Augustus constituted G. Cispadana the eighth, and G. Transpadana the eleventh, region.—The most important tribes were: in Gallia Transpadana, in the direction of W. to E., the TAURINI, SALASSI, LIBICI, INSUBRES, CENOMANI; in G. Cispadana, in the same direction, the BOII, LINGONES, SENONES. Gallienus, with his full name, P. LICINIUS VALERIANUS EGNATIUS GALLIENUS, Roman emperor, A.D. 260–268. He succeeded his father

Valerian, when the latter was taken prisoner by the Persians in 260; but he had previously reigned in conjunction with him from 253. Gallienus was indolent, profligate, and indifferent to the public welfare; and his reign was one of the most ignoble and disastrous in the history of Rome. The barbarians ravaged the fairest portion of the empire, and the inhabitants were swept away by one of the most frightful plagues recorded in history. This pestilence followed a long protracted famine. When it was at its greatest height, 5000 sick are said to have perished daily at Rome; and, after the scourge had passed away, it was found that the inhabitants of Alexandria were diminished by nearly two-thirds. The overthrow of the empire was averted mainly by able officers, who sprang up in every district, and asserted the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished as The Thirty Tyrants, in many cases protected the empire from external dangers by arresting the progress of the invaders, and restored order in the provinces which they governed. Gallienus was at length slain by his own soldiers in 268, while besieging Milan, in which the usurper Aureolus had taken refuge. (Trebell. Poll. Gallienus; Zos. i. 37 ff.)

Gallināria. 1. (Galinarā), an island off the coast of Liguria, celebrated for its number of hens; whence its name.—2. Silva, a forest of pine-trees near Cnmae in Campania (Cic. Fam. ix. 23; Juv. iii. 307; Strab. p. 243).

Gallio, Jūnius. 1. A Roman rhetorician, and a friend of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, whose son he adopted (Quint. iii. 1, 21; Tac. Dial. 26). He was put to death by Nero. In early life he had been a friend of Ovid (Ex Pont. iv. 11).—2. Son of the rhetorician M. Annaeus Seneca, and an elder brother of the philosopher Seneca, was adopted by No. 1. After his consulship he became, in A.D. 52, proconsul of Achaia. He is spoken of with great affection by Seneca and by Statius (who calls him dulcis); he survived Seneca, but put an end to his own life soon afterwards in 64. (Dio Cass. lx. 35, lxii. 25; Sen. Ep. 104; Stat. Silv. ii. 7, 32; Tac. Ann. xv. 73.)

Q. Gallius, was a candidate for the praetorship in B.C. 64, and was accused of ambitus or bribery by M. Calpurnius. He was defended on that occasion by Cicero in an oration of which a few fragments have come down to us. He was praetor urbanus B.C. 63, and presided at the trial of C. Cornelius. (Val. Max. viii. 10).—He left two sons, Q. Gallius, who was praetor in 43, and was put to death by the triumvirs; and M. Gallius, who is mentioned as one of Antony's partisans in 43 (Suet. Aug. 27).

Gallograecia. [GALATIA.]

Gallōnius, a public crier at Rome, probably contemporary with the younger Scipio, whose wealth and gluttony passed into the proverb 'to live like Gallonius' (Cic. De Fin. ii. 8, 24, pro Quint. 30, 94). He was satirised by Lucilius and by Horace (Sat. ii. 2, 46).

Gallus, Aelius. 1. A jurist, contemporary with Cicero and Varro, though probably rather older than either. He was the author of a treatise, De Verborum, quae ad Jus Civile pertinent, Significatione, which is frequently cited by the grammarians. (Gell. xvi. 5; Macrob. vi. 8, 16).—2. An intimate friend of the geographer Strabo, was prefect of Egypt in the reign of Augustus. In B.C. 24 he invaded Arabia, but was misled by a treacherous guide and wandered for nearly six months to a point from which he was able to return in sixty days. His army had suffered dreadfully from the heat and want of water, and he was obliged to retreat with great loss. (Strab. p. 780; Dio Cass. liii. 29; cf. Hor. Od. i. 29.)

Gallus, L. Anicius, praetor B.C. 168, conducted the war against Gentius, king of the Illyrians, whom he compelled to submit to the Romans (Liv. xlv. 30, xlv. 43).

Gallus, C. Aquilius, a distinguished Roman jurist, was a pupil of Q. Mucius Scaevola, and the instructor of Serv. Sulpicius. He was praetor along with Cicero, B.C. 66. He is often cited by jurists in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from his own works in the Digest. (Cic. pro Caec. 27, 77.)

Gallus Saloninus, L. Asinius. 1. Son of C. Asinius Pollio, was consul B.C. 8. He was hated by Tiberius, because he had married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius. In A.D. 30, Tiberius got the senate to sentence him to death, and kept him imprisoned for three years, on the most scanty supply of food. He died in prison of starvation, but whether his death was compulsory or voluntary is unknown. Gallus wrote a work, entitled De Comparatione Patris ac Ciceronis, which was unfavourable to the latter, and against which the emperor Claudius wrote his defence of Cicero. (Tac. Ann. vi. 29; Suet. Claud. 41; Gell. xvii. 1).—2. Son of the preceding, half-brother of Drusus, the son of Tiberius. He formed a conspiracy against Claudius and was exiled. (Suet. Claud. 13; Dio Cass. lx. 27.)

Gallus, L. Caninius, was tribune of the plebs, B.C. 56, when he supported Pompey. During the Civil war he appears to have remained neutral. He died in 44. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 13, xvi. 14; Dio Cass. xxxix. 16; Val. Max. iv. 2, 6.)

Gallus, Cestius, governor of Syria (legatus A.D. 64, 65), under whom the Jews broke out into the rebellion which ended in the destruction of their city and temple by Titus (Tac. Hist. v. 10).

Gallus, Constantius, son of Julius Constantinus and Galla, grandson of Constantius Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and elder brother, by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. In A.D. 351 he was named Caesar by Constantius II., and was left in the command of the East, where he conducted himself with the greatest haughtiness and cruelty. In 354 he went to the West to meet Constantius at Milan, but was arrested at Petovio in Paunonia, and sent to Pola in Istria, where he was put to death.

Gallus, C. Cornēlius, was born at Forum Julii (Frējus) in Gaul, of poor parents, about B.C. 66. He went to Italy at an early age, and began his career as a poet when he was about twenty. He had already attained considerable distinction at the time of Caesar's death, 44; and upon the arrival of Octavian in Italy after that event, Gallus joined his party, and soon acquired great influence with him. In 41 he was one of the triumviri appointed by Octavian to distribute lands in the N. of Italy among his veterans, and on that occasion he afforded protection to the inhabitants of Mantua and to Virgil. He afterwards accompanied Octavian to the battle of Actium, 31, and commanded a detachment of the army. After the battle, Gallus was sent with the army to Egypt, in pursuit of Antony; and when Egypt was made a Roman province, Octavian appointed Gallus the first prefect of the province. He remained in Egypt for nearly four years; but he incurred at length the enmity of Octavian, though the exact nature of his offence is uncertain. According to some accounts he spoke of the emperor in an offensive and insulting manner; he erected numerous statues of himself in Egypt, and had his own exploits inscribed on the pyramids. The senate deprived him of his estates, and sent him into exile; whereupon he put an end to his life, B.C. 26. (Dio Cass. li. 9, 17, 23; Suet. Aug. 66; Strab. p. 819; Eutrop. vii. 7.) The intimate friendship existing between Gallus and the most eminent men of the time, as Asinius Pollio, Virgil, Varus, and Ovid, and the high praise they bestow upon him, prove that he was a man of great intellectual powers and acquirements. Ovid (Trist. iv. 10, 5) assigns to him the first place among the Roman elegiac poets. We know that he wrote a collection of elegies in four books, the principal subject of which was his love of Lycoris, whose real name was Cytheris (cf. Ov. Trist. ii. 4, 45, Am. iii. 9, 63; Propert. iii. 34, 91; Verg. Ecl. ix. 10, x. 1). But all his productions have perished; for the four fragmentary poems attributed to Gallus (in Wernsdorf, Poët. Lat. Min.) are undoubtedly forgeries.

Gallus, M. Fadius, a friend of Cicero, wrote a panegyric on Cato Uticensis (Cic. ad Fam. xxiv. 2). Cicero speaks also of a Q. Fadius Gallus and a T. Fadius Gallus, the latter of whom was his quaestor in B.C. 63 (Cic. ad Q. F. i. 4, ad Att. iii. 23).

Gallus, Sulpicius, a distinguished orator and man of learning, was praetor B.C. 169, and consul 166, when he fought against the Ligurians. In 168 he served as tribune of the soldiers under Aemilius Paulus in Macedonia, and during this campaign predicted an eclipse of the moon. (Cic. Brut. 20, 78, de Off. i. 6, 19; Liv. xliii. 2, 16, xlv. 44.)

Gallus, Trebonianus, Roman emperor, A.D. 251-254. His full name was C. VIBIUS TREBONIANUS GALLUS. He served under Decius in the campaign against the Goths, 251, and he is said to have contributed by his treachery to the disastrous issue of the battle, which proved fatal to Decius and his son Herennius. Gallus was thereupon elected emperor, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of Decius, was nominated his colleague. He purchased a peace of the Goths by allowing them to retain their plunder, and promising them a fixed annual tribute. In 253 the Goths again invaded the Roman dominions, but they were driven back by Aemilianus, whose troops proclaimed him emperor in Moesia. Aemilianus thereupon marched into Italy; and Gallus was put to death by his own soldiers, together with his son Volusianus. The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonour. In addition to the misery produced by the invasions of the barbarians during this reign, a deadly pestilence broke out in 252, and continued its ravages over every part of the empire for fifteen years. (Zosim. i. 23-28; Zonar. xii. 20.)

Gallus. 1. A river in Bithynia, rising near Modra, on the borders of Phrygia, and falling into the Sangarius near Leucæ (Strab. p. 543). —2. A river in Galatia, which also fell into the Sangarius, near Pessinus. From it the priests of Cybele are said to have obtained their name of Galli (Ov. Fast. iv. 364).

Gamēlii (γαμήλιοι θεοί), that is, the divinities protecting and presiding over marriage. These divinities are usually regarded as the protectors of marriage. In Plutarch the names are Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Peitho, and Artemis (Q. R. 2); in Pollux, Hera, Artemis, and the Fates. At Troezen Athene Apaturia was thus regarded (Paus. ii. 53).

Gandārae (Γανδάραι), or Gandaridae, an Indian people tributary to the Persian king in the Paropamisus, on the NW. of the Punjab, between the rivers Indus and Suastus. Their country was called Gandaritis (Γανδαρίτις). (Hdt. iii. 91, vii. 66; Strab. pp. 697, 699.)

Gangārīdæ (Γαγγαρίδαι), an Indian people about the mouths of the Ganges.

Ganges (Γάγγης: Ganges or Ganga), the great river of India, which it divided into the two parts named by the ancients India intra Gangem (Hindustan) and India extra Gangem (Burmah, Cochin China, Siam, and the Malay Peninsula). It rises in the highest part of the Emodi Moutes (Himalaya), and flows in a general SE. direction till it falls by several mouths into the head of the Gangeticus Sinus (Bay of Bengal) (Strab. p. 719). Like the Nile, it overflows its banks periodically, and these inundations render its valley the most fertile part of India. The knowledge of the ancients respecting it was very imperfect, and they give very various accounts of its source, its size, and the number of its mouths. The breadth which Diodorus assigns to it in the lower part of its course, thirty-two stadia, or about three miles, is perfectly correct (Diod. xvii. 93). The following rivers are mentioned as its tributaries: Cainas, Jomanes or Diamunas, Sarabus, Condochates, Oedanes, Cosogus or Cossoanus, Erannoboas, Souus or Soas, Sitocestis, Solomatis, Sambus, Magon, Agoranis, Omalis, Commenases, Cacuthis, Andomatis, Amystis, Oxymagis, and Erthenysis (Arrian, Ind. 4).—The name Ganga (Γάγγη) is applied to a city in the interior of India, on the Ganges, where it makes its great bend to the E., perhaps Allahabad (Strab. l. c.).

Gangra (Γάγγρα: Kankari), afterwards called Germanicopolis, a city of Paphlagonia, near the confines of Galatia, was originally a fortress; in the time of king Deiotarus, a royal residence. In B.C. 7 it was added to Galatia. (Strab. p. 562.)

Ganos (Γάνος), a fortress in Thrace, on the Propontis (Xen. Anab. vii. 5, 81).

Ganymēdes (Γανυμήδης), son of Tros and Callirrhoe, and brother of Ilus and Assaracus, was the most beautiful of all mortals, and was carried off by the gods that he might fill the cup of Zeus, and live among the eternal gods (Il. v. 265, xx. 232; Apollod. iii. 12). This is the Homeric account; but other traditions give different details. Some call him son of Laomedon, others son of Ilus, and others again of Erichthonius or Assaracus. (Eur. Tro. 822; Tzetz. Lyc. 34; Hyg. Fab. 224, 271.) The manner also in which he was carried away from the earth is differently described; for while Homer mentions the gods in general, later writers state that he was carried off by the eagle of Zeus (Verg. Aen. v. 253; Hor. Od. iv. 4, 2; Apollod. l. c.); and this is developed into the account that Zeus himself in the form of an eagle was the robber (Ov. Met. x. 155; Noun. Dionys. xv. 280). There is, further, no agreement as to the place where the event occurred;

Ganymedes, from a copy of the group by Leochares. (Visconti, Mus. Pio Clem.) and some legends mentioned Crete (Plat. Legg. i. p. 636), though later writers usually represent him as carried off from Mount Ida (raptus ab Ida, Hor. Od. iii. 20, 15). The early legend simply states that Ganymedes was carried off that he might be the cup-bearer of Zeus, in which office he was conceived to have succeeded Hebe (Il. xx. 234; Pind. Ol. xi. 105); but later writers describe him as the beloved and favourite of Zeus, without allusion to his office. Zeus compensated the father for his loss by a pair of divine horses. Astronomers have placed Ganymedes among the stars under the name of Aquarius (Scriv. ad Aen. i. 28). The Romans called him by a corrupt form of his name, Catamitus. On vase paintings Zeus in his own shape is usually represented as pursuing Ganymedes, but in sculpture the eagle carrying off Ganymedes is a favourite subject (cf. Plin. xxxiv. 79); others represent Ganymedes in Phrygian cap fondling the eagle or giving him drink from a bowl.

Gārāma. [GARAMANTES.]

Gārāmantes (Γαρράμαντες), the S. most people known to the ancients in N. Africa, dwelt far S. of the Great Syrtis in the region called Phazania (Fezzan), where they had a capital city, Gārāma (Γάρραμα: Mourzouk, lat. 25° 53' N., long. 14° 10'

E.). They were mentioned by Herodotus as an unwarlike people; he places them nineteen days' journey from Aethiopia and the shores of the Indian Ocean, fifteen days' journey from Ammonium, and thirty days' journey from Egypt. The Romans obtained fresh knowledge of them by the expedition of Cornelius Balbus in B.C. 19. (Hdt. iv. 174, 188; Plin. v. 86; Verg. Aen. vi. 795.) In Tacitus they are mentioned as allies of Tacfarinas (Ann. iv. 23).

Gargānus Mons (Monte Gargano), a mountain and promontory in Apulia, on which were oak forests (Hor. Od. ii. 9, 7, Ep. ii. 1, 102).

Gargāra, -on, or -us (Γάργαρα, -ov, -os: Γαργαρεύς). 1. (Kaz-Dagh) the S. summit of M. Ida, in the Troad (Il. viii. 48; Strab. p. 583).—2. A city at the foot of M. Ida, on the shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, between Assus and Antandrus; said to have been founded originally on the summit of the mountain by the Leleges; afterwards colonised from Miletus; and removed to the lower site on account of the inclemency of its situation on the mountain. Its neighbourhood was rich in corn. (Strab. pp. 606, 618; Verg. Georg. i. 108.)

Gargettus (Γαργηττός: Γαργήτιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegaeis, on the NW. slope of Mt. Hymettus; the birthplace of the philosopher Epicurus.

Garītes, a people in Aquitania, neighbours of the Ausci, in the modern Comté de Gawe (Caes. B.G. iii. 27).

Garsāūria, or -ītis (Γαρσαούρια, or -ίτις), a praefectura in Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia and Tyanitis. Its chief town was called Γαρσάουρα. (Strab. p. 663.)

Garūli, a people of Liguria in the Apennines. Garumna (Garonne), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in the Pyrenees, flows NW. through Aquitania, and forms an estuary below Burdigala (Bordeaux) (Strab. p. 190; Tibull. i. 7, 11).

Garumni, a people in Aquitania on the Garumna.

Gathēae (Γαθήαι), a town in Arcadia on the Gatheātas, a river which flows into the Alphēus, WSW. of Megalopolis (Paus. viii. 34).

Gaugāmēla (τὰ Γαυγάμηλα: Karmelis), a village in the district of Aturia in Assyria, the scene of the last and decisive battle between Alexander and Darius Codomannus, B.C. 331, commonly called the battle of ARBELA.

Gaulanītis (Γαυλανίτις: Jaulan), a district in the N. of Palestine, on the E. side of the Lake of Tiberias, as far S. as the river Hieromax, named from the town of Golan (Γαύλανα).

Gaulos (Γαῦλος: Γαυλίτης: Gozo), an island and a municipium in the Sicilian sea near Melite (Malta) (Plin. iii. 92).

Gaurelēon, Gaurion. [ANDROS.]

Gaurus Mons, Gauranus or -nī M. (Monte Gaurō), a volcanic range of mountains in Campania, between Cumae and Neapolis, in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, noted for good wine, and memorable for the defeat of the Samnites by M. Valerius Corvus, B.C. 343 (Liv. vii. 32).

Gaza (Γάζα). 1. (Ghuzzeh), the last city on the SW. frontier of Palestine, and the key of the country on the side of Egypt, stood on an eminence about two miles from the sea, and was, from the very earliest times of which we have any record, strongly fortified. It was one of the five cities of the Philistines; and, though taken from them more than once by the Jews, was each time recovered. It was taken by Cyrus the Great, and remained in the hands of the Persians till the time of Alexander, who only gained possession of it after an obstinate defence of several months (Arrian, An. ii. 27; Polyb. xvi. 40). In B.C. 315, it fell into the power of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, as the result of his victory over Demetrius before the city, and was destroyed by him. But it again recovered, and was possessed alternately by the kings of Syria and Egypt, during their prolonged wars, and afterwards by the Asmonaeon princes of Judaea, one of whom, Alexander Jannaeus, again destroyed it, B.C. 96. It was rebuilt by Gabinius; given by Augustus to Herod the Great; and, after Herod's death, united to the Roman province of Syria (Jos. Ant. xv. 7, 8, xvii. 11, 4). In A.D. 65, it was again destroyed in an insurrection of its Jewish inhabitants; but it recovered once more, and remained a flourishing city till it fell into the hands of the Arabs in A.D. 634. It was made a Roman colony (Waddington, 1904), but at what period is uncertain. In addition to its importance as a military post, it possessed an extensive commerce, carried on through its port, Majuma, or CONSTANTIA.—2. (Ghaz), a city in the Persian province of Sogdiana, between Alexandria and Cyropolis; one of the seven cities which rebelled against Alexander in B.C. 328 (Arrian, An. iv. 2).

Gāzāca (Γάζακα: Tabreez), a city in the N. of Media Atropatene, equidistant from Artaxata and Ecbatana, was a summer residence of the kings of Media (Strab. p. 523).

Gazēlon (Γαζηλών: αλ. Γαδιλών), a town E. of the Halys, on the borders of Pontus and Paphlagonia, prob. Vezir Kurpreu. It was chief town of the district Gazelonitis (Strab. pp. 547, 553).

Gaziūra (Γαζιούρα), in Pontus Galaticus, on the river Iris, below Amasia, once the residence of the kings of Pontus (Strab. p. 547).

Gēbālēnē (Γεβαληνή), the district of Arabia Petraea around the city of PETRA.

Gebenna Mons. [CEBENNA.]

Gedrōsia (Γεδρωσία, and Γαδρωσία: SE. part of Beloochistan), the furthest province of the Persian empire on the SE., and a subdivision of ARIANA, was bounded on the W. by Carmania, on the N. by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the E. by the country about the lower course of the Indus, and on the S. by the Indian Ocean. It is formed by a succession of sandy steppes, rising from the sea-coast towards the table-land of Ariana, and produced little besides aromatic shrubs. The slip of land between the coast and the lowest mountain range is watered by several rivers; but even this district is for the most part only a series of salt marshes. Gedrosia is known in history chiefly through the distress from want of water suffered by the armies of Cyrus and of Alexander (Arrian, An. vi. 24). The inhabitants were divided by the Greek writers into two races, the Ichthyophagi on the sea coast, and the Gedrosi in the interior (Strab. pp. 720–723). The latter were a nomad people, whom even Alexander was only able to reduce to a temporary subjection. The whole country was divided into eight districts. Its chief cities were Rhambacia and Pura, or Parsis.

Geganīa Gens, traced its origin to the mythical Gyas, one of the companions of Aeneas. It was transplanted to Rome on the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled among the Roman patricians (Liv. i. 30). There appears to have been only one family in this gens, that of Macerinus, to which belonged consuls in the years 492, 432, B.C. (Liv. ii. 34, iv. 22).

Gēla (ἡ Γέλα, Ion. Γέλη: Γελῶς, Gelensis: nr. Terra Nuova, Ru.), a city on the S. coast of Sicily, on a small river (poetically exaggerated) of the same name (Fiume di Terra Nuova), founded by Rhodians from Lindos, and by Cretans, B.C. 690 (Hdt. vii. 153; Diod. viii. 25; Strab. p. 272). It was originally called Lindii (Thuc. vi. 4); and it is suggested with probability that Lindii was on the west side of the river, and that Gela was originally an outpost on the east bank. It soon obtained great power and wealth; and, in 582, it founded Agrigentum, which became more powerful than the mother city. Like the other cities of Sicily, it was subject to tyrants, of whom the most important were HIPPOCRATES, GELo, and HIERO. Gelo transported half of its inhabitants to Syracuse; the place gradually fell into decay, and in the time of Augustus was no longer inhabited. The poet Aeschylus died here.—N. of Gela were the celebrated Campi Gelōi, which produced rich crops of wheat (Verg. Aen. iii. 701).

Gelae. [CADUSII.]

Gelānor (Γελάνωρ), king of Argos, was expelled by DANAUS.

Geldūba (Gellep, below Cologne), a fortified place of the Ubii on the Rhine in Lower Germany (Tac. Hist. iv. 25; Plin. xix. 90).

Gellia Gens, plebeian, was of Samnite origin, and afterwards settled at Rome. There were two generals of this name in the Samnite wars: Gellius Statius in the second Samnite war, who was defeated and taken prisoner, B.C. 305, and Gellius Egnatius in the third Samnite war. [EGNATIUS.] The chief family of the Gellii at Rome bore the name of PUBLICOLA.

Gellias (Γελλίας), a citizen of Agrigentum in the fifth century B.C. celebrated for his wealth and his hospitality. When Agrigentum was taken by the Carthaginians in 406, he set fire to the temple of Athene and perished in the flames. (Diod. xiii. 83–90; Val. Max. iv. 8.)

Gellius. 1. Cn., a contemporary of the Gracchi, the author of a history of Rome from the earliest epoch down to B.C. 145 at least. The work is lost, but it is frequently quoted by later writers (Dionys. ii. 81; Macrob. i. 16, 21).

—2. Aulus, a Latin grammarian of good family, was probably a native of Rome. He studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calvisius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, and enjoyed also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto. While yet a youth he was appointed by the praetor to act as an umpire in civil causes. The precise dates of his birth and death are unknown; but he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius, A.D. 117–180. He wrote a work entitled Noctes Atticae, because it was composed in a country house near Athens, during the long nights of winter. It is of great value for its citations from books which have perished, and for its notices of persons and of manners and customs, being a sort of miscellany, containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, the whole thrown together into twenty books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. The eighth book is lost with the exception of the index. Ed. by Hertz, Berl. 1883 and 1886.

Gēlo (Γέλων). 1. Son of Dinomenes, tyrant of Gela, and afterwards of Syracuse, was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gela. He held the chief command of the cavalry in the service of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela; shortly after whose death he obtained the supreme power, B. C. 491. In 485 his aid was sought by the Gamori, or oligarchic party at Syracuse, who had been driven out by the populace. Gelo restored them, but used the opportunity to get possession of Syracuse. From this time he neglected Gela, and bent all his efforts to the aggrandisement of Syracuse, to which place he removed many of the inhabitants of other cities of Sicily, especially Camarina, Megara, and Hyblaëa. When the Greeks asked his aid against Xerxes, he offered them a force of 30,000 men on condition that he should command the allied army. This they refused, fearing perhaps that he might try to master Greece as he had mastered Syracuse (Hdt. vii. 171). It may have been the case that the negotiations fell through because of the need of troops in Sicily herself; for in 480 the Carthaginians invaded Sicily with an army amounting, it is said, to the number of 300,000 men. Gelo gained a brilliant victory over them at Himera on the same day as the battle of Salamis. Gelo died in 478 of a dropsy, after reigning seven years at Syracuse, and was succeeded by his brother, Hiero. His subjects showed their sense of the dangers from which he saved them. A splendid tomb was erected to him by the Syracusans at the public expense, and heroic honours were decreed to his memory. (Diod. xi. 20-38; Pind. Pyth. i. 75.)—2. Son of Hiero II., king of Syracuse, who died before his father. He received the title of king in the lifetime of his father.

Gēlōni (Γελωνοί), a Scythian people, who dwelt in Sarmatia Asiatica, to the E. of the river Tanais (Don). They were said to have been of Greek origin, and to have migrated from the shores of the Euxine; but they intermixed with the Scythians, and lost all traces of their Hellenic race. Their chief city was called Gelonus (Γελωνός). (Hdt. iv. 108; Verg. Georg. ii. 115; Hor. Od. ii. 9, 23.)

Geminus (Γεμίνος), an astronomer, was a native of Rhodes, and flourished about B. C. 77. He is the author of an extant work, entitled Εισαγωγή εις τὰ Φαινόμενα, which is a descriptive treatise on elementary astronomy, with a great deal of historical allusion. It is printed in the Uranologion of Petavius, Paris, 1630, and in Halma's edition of Ptolemy, Paris, 1819.

Gēminus, Servilius. 1. P., twice consul with C. Aurelius Cotta in the first Punic war—namely, in B. C. 252 and 248. In both years he carried on war against the Carthaginians (Zonar. viii. 14).—2. Cn., son of No. 1, was consul 217 with C. Flaminius, in the second Punic war, and ravaged the coast of Africa. He fell in the battle of Cannæ, 216 (Liv. xxii. 31-49).—3. M., also surnamed Pulex, consul 202 with Tib. Claudius Nero, obtained Etruria for his province (Liv. xxvi. 23).

Gemoniæ (scalæ) or Gemonii (gradus), a flight of steps cut out of the Aventine, down which the bodies of criminals strangled in the prison were dragged by hooks, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber (Juv. x. 66; Tac. Ann. iii. 14, Hist. iii. 74).

Genābum or Cenābum (Orleans), a town in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the N. bank of the Ligeris, was the chief town of the Carnutes; it was plundered and burnt by Caesar, but subsequently rebuilt. In later times it was called Civitas Aurelianorum or Aurelianensis Urbs, whence its modern name. (Caes. B. G. viii. 3.)

Genauui, a people in Vindelicia, the inhabitants of the Alpine valley now called Valle di Non, were subdued by Drusus (Hor. Od. iv. 14, 10; Strab. p. 206).

Genāva (Genavensis: Geneva), the last town of the Allobroges on the frontiers of the Helvetii, was situated on the S. bank of the Rhone, at the spot where the river flowed out of the Lacus Lemanus (Caes. B. G. i. 6). There was a bridge here over the Rhone.

Genēsius, Josēphus, lived about A. D. 940, and wrote in four books a history of the Byzantine emperors from A. D. 813 to 886. Edited by Lachmann, Bonn, 1834.

Genētes (ὁ Γενήτης), a rocky point on the Euxine, close to Pr. Iasonium, where there was a temple of Zeus Genētaeus (Strab. p. 548; Ap. Rh. ii. 378, 1009; Val. Flacc. v. 148).

Genetiva, a Roman colony founded in B. C. 44 according to the directions of Julius Caesar, at Urso in the Spanish province of Baetica, a little north of Munda. Its full title was Colonia Julia Geuetiva. In Pliny (iii. 12) the words 'Urso quæ Geuua urbanorum' are altered by some to 'Geuetiva urbanorum'; by others to 'Genetiva Ursonum.' The old name reappears in the modern town Ossuna. The importance of Geuetiva to historians is due to the fact that in 1870-1875 considerable fragments were found at Ossuna of the law for the regulation of the colony, which throw much light on Roman colonial administration. (C. I. L. ii. p. 191; Mommsen, Ephem. Epig. ii. p. 119.)

Genīta Mana (cf. Manes, Mauia), an ancient Italian deity who watched over both the birth and death of human beings. Her connexion with death and the underworld is indicated by the custom of sacrificing dogs to her. (Plut. Q. R. 52; Plin. xxix. 58).

Genitrix. [VENUS.]

Genius; in its earliest form a purely Italian conception, to which there was nothing exactly similar in the Greek religion. 1. The Genius (from gigno) was that Power which gave fruitfulness to each man or to the earth itself. For each woman the similar Power was called her Juno (Tibull. iv. 6; Petron. 25; Plin. ii. 16, 'Junoues Geniosque'). This idea of an influence for fruitfulness is expressed in the lectus genialis, which stood in the atrium of the married (Hor. Ep. i. 1, 87; Cic. Clu. 5, 14; Juv. x. 333). 2. The genius of each man came into being with him and was somewhat like a guardian spirit through his life (Hor. Ep. ii. 2, 187), sometimes with favourable fortune, sometimes with the reverse. Hence it is that Horace calls the genius 'albus et ater' and 'vultu mutabilis': it is a question whether moralis should be read for mortalis in that passage: the latter word would allude to the belief that the guardianship of the genius ended with the life of the man (cf. Macrob. Sat. i. 10); on the other hand moralis would in some ways agree better with the context which calls the genius 'naturae deus humanae' (cf. Serv. ad Georg. i. 302), and represents him as having to do with the character of the man; this again agrees with the frequent allusions to the genius as meaning the natural capacity for enjoyment or the reverse: 'genio indulgere,' 'genium defraudare' (Pers. v. 151; Plaut. Aul. 728, Pers. 263). 3. It is a natural sequence of this that the Genius was regarded as one of the Lares and was honoured under the title of 'genius domus.' 4. Further, the genius of each person expressed the Roman's belief in immortality, and, like the Dii Manes, was the soul or divine part of him which lasted after death, so that 'manibus et genio' is a phrase on monuments, and in the case of a married couple 'genio et junoni' (C.I.L. v. 246, viii. 3695). 5. When the tendency arose, perhaps from Greek influence, to make the nature of the gods more completely correspond with that of man, the Romans began to speak in a similar manner of the genius of gods, and we find 'genius Jovis,' &c., spoken of as an attribute of the deity, but not as in any way a separate personality. The earliest instance of this which has been cited is dated B. C. 58 (C.I.L. i. 603). 6. Genius loci. Divine protectors were imagined also as watching over and influencing each place as well as each person—an idea which can belong to the most primitive religion. Thus we have 'genius pagi,' 'vici,' 'horrorum,' &c. 7. Analogous to the genius loci is the genius civitatis. The Genius Romae, representing both the creation and the preservation of Rome was honoured as early as 218 B. C. (Liv. xxi. 62), and the same idea is extended to the provinces: e.g. 'Genius terrae Britannicae' (C.I.L. vii. 1113). 8. A later development was the worship of the Geniis of the Emperor, more akin in its nature to the Greek custom of paying divine honours to the hero after his death; but differing in so far that he received the worship in his lifetime (but cf. ἀνθρωποδαίμων, Eur. Rhés. 971). It was a method of introducing the deification of the emperor, resting perhaps on his claim to embody the Genius populi Romani. The Genius Augusti was associated with the worship of the Lares after the battle of Actium (Ov. Fast. v. 145; Dio Cass. li. 19), and thenceforward the imperial image found a place in the lararium and received honours at meal-times (cf. 'alteris te mensis adhibet deum . . . Laribus tunc miscet numen,' Hor. Od. iv. 5, 31). In art the genius loci was commonly represented by a snake, which points to the double connexion of the genius with the earth and its fruits and with the underworld of the dead (the snake being a symbol of the deities who were so connected). This explains some well-known passages, the 'geniunne loci famulume parentis' in Verg. Aen. v. 95, and the 'pinge dnos angues, sacer est locus' in Pers. i. 113. It is illustrated by a picture found at Herculaneum representing the genius of a spot on the hillside. The snake is the genius devouring the offerings laid upon his altar. The naked boy is perhaps marked out by the lotos on his forehead and the raising of his hand to his lips as Harpocrates: others see in him merely a boy who has made an offering. The genius of a person is represented by the idealised figure of the person himself with the toga drawn over his head as in the ritus Romanus and with a cornucopia in his hand. The Genius Augusti is thus represented in a statue in the Vatican. It was a mistaken idea that the winged figures [Eros] found in various sculptures and paintings represent Genii. There is no ground for the belief that the Geniis was so represented; but the idea may be partly due to the confusion of the Geniis with the Greek δαίμων, who was commonly represented by the Greek artists as winged.

Genseric, king of the Vandals, and the most terrible of all the barbarian invaders of the empire. In A. D. 429 he crossed over from Spain to Africa, and ravaged the country with frightful severity. Hippo was taken by him in 431, Carthage did not fall into his hands till 439. Having thus become master of the whole of the NW. of Africa, he attacked Italy itself. In 455 he took Rome and plundered it for fourteen days, and in the same year he destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. Twice the empire endeavoured to revenge itself, and twice it failed: the first was the attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (457), whose fleet was destroyed in the bay of Carthage. The second was the expedition sent by the Eastern emperor Leo (468), which was also baffled by the burning of the fleet off Bona. Genseric died in 477, at a great age. He was an Arian; and in the cruelties exercised under his orders against his Catholic subjects he exhibited the first instance of persecution carried on upon a large scale by one body of Christians against another.

Genius or Genthius (Γένθιος), son of Pleuratus, a king of the Illyrians. As early as B. C. 180, he had given offence to the Romans on account of the piracies of his subjects; and in 168 he entered into an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia. In the following year the praetor L. Anicius Gallus was sent against him. The war was finished within thirty days. Genthius was defeated in battle, and then surrendered himself to Anicius, who carried him to Rome to adorn his triumph. He was afterwards kept as a prisoner at Spolegium. (Liv. xlv. 30, xlv. 26; Plut. Aemil. 29.)

Genūa (Genuas, -atis, Genuensis: Genoa), an important commercial town in Liguria, situated at the extremity of the Ligurian gulf (Gulf of Genoa), was in the possession of the Romans at the beginning of the second Punic war, but towards the end of the war was held for some time by the Carthaginian Mago (Liv. xxi. 32, xxviii. 40; Strab. pp. 201, 216). It was a Roman municipium, but it did not become of political importance till the middle ages, when the name often appears as Janua.

Genūcia Gens, patrician, of which the principal families bore the names of AVENTINENSIS and AUGURINUS.

Genūsus (Iskumi), a river in Greek Illyria, N. of the Apsus (Cacs. B.C. iii. 75).

Gephyraei (Γεφυραῖοι) [HARMODIUS.]

Gēpidae, a Gothic people, who came from Scandinavia, and first settled in the country between the Oder and the Vistula, from which they expelled the Burgundiones. Subsequently they joined the hosts of Attila; and after his death they settled in Dacia, near the Danube. As they were dangerous neighbours, Justinian invoked the aid of the Langobardi or Lombards, who conquered the Gepidae and destroyed their kingdom (Procop. B.G. vi. 5).

Ger or Gir (Γεῖρ: Ghir or Mansolig), a river of Gaetulia in Africa, flowing SE. from the M. Atlas, till it is lost in the desert. It first became known to the Romans through the expedition of Suetonius Paulinus in the reign of Nero (Plin. v. 15).

Geraestus (Γεραῖστός: Γεραῖστῖος), a promontory and harbour at the S. extremity of Euboea, with a celebrated temple of Poseidon, in whose honour the festival of the Geraestia (Γεραῖστῖα) was here celebrated (Od. iii. 177; Hdt. viii. 7; Strab. p. 446).

Geranēa (ἡ Γεράνεα), a range of mountains, beginning at the SW. slope of Cithaeron, and running along the W. coast of Megaris, till it terminated in the promontory Olmiae in the Corinthian territory (Paus. i. 40, 1; Thuc. i. 105).

Gerēnia (Γερηνία), an ancient town in Messenia, the birthplace of Nestor, who is hence called Gerenian (Γερηνίος). It was on the western side of Messenia near the river Choerius, or possibly a little further N. and near Pherae: some writers place it at the modern Zarnata. Strabo says that the people of Elis asserted it to be a place called Gerenus in their own territory (Strab. pp. 340, 360; Paus. iii. 26, 8).

Gergis, or Gergitha, or -es, or -us (Γέργυς, Γέργυθα, or -es, or -us: Γεργυθῖος), a town in the Troad, N. of the Scamander, inhabited by Teucrians (Hdt. v. 122, vii. 43). Attalus removed the inhabitants to the sources of the Caiens, where mention is made of a place called Gergitha or Gergithion, in the territory of Cyme (Strab. p. 616).

Gergōvia, a fortified town of the Arverni in Gaul, situated on a hill, which is precipitous Plan of the Mountain of Gergovia and its environs.

1. Plateau of Gergovia; 2. R. Anzon; 3. La Roche and smaller Roman camp; 4. Large camp; 5. Puy de Jussat; 6. Romagnat; 7. R. Clémensat; 8. Mout Ronqun; 9. Hill of Risolles connected with plateau by ridge (Jugum).

or very difficult of approach on all sides except a portion of the SW., where the slope is gentler. It is about four miles S. of Clermont-Ferrand, close to the village of Romagnat, and between the streams Clémensat and Anzon, which flow eastward into the Allier. On the summit is a plateau about three-quarters of a mile long. It is remarkable as being the scene of Caesar's only Gallic repulse. His unsuccessful attack was delivered from the SW. corner, above the Anzon, where a cart-road now ascends to the plateau. (Caes. B. G. vii. 34.)

Germa (Γέρμα), the name of three cities in Asia Minor. 1. (Germastu, Ru.) in Mysia Minor, near Cyzicus.—2. (Yermatepe) in Mysia, between Pergamus and Thyatira.—3. (Yerma), in Galatia, between Pessinus and Ancyra; a colonia (Ptol. v. 4, 7).

Germania, was bounded by the Rhine on the W., by the Vistula and the Carpathian mountains on the E., by the Danube on the S., and by the German Ocean and the Baltic on the N. It thus included much more than modern Germany on the N. and E., but much less in the W. and S. Out of the country W. of the Rhine, originally reckoned in Gallia Belgica, were formed under the empire the separate provinces of Upper and Lower Germany [see below]; and it was in contradistinction to these provinces that Germania proper was also called Germania Magna or G. Transrhēnāna or G. Barbāra. It was not till Caesar's campaigns in Gaul (B.C. 58–50) that the Romans obtained any real knowledge of the country. The Roman writers represent Germany as a dismal land, covered for the most part with forests and swamps, producing little corn, and subject to intense frosts and almost eternal winter (Tac. Germ. 2; Sen. de Prov. 4). Although these accounts are probably exaggerated, yet there can be no doubt that the clearing of woods and draining of morasses have produced changes in the climate. Pliny, however, praises its pasturage (xvii. 26). The N. of Germany is a vast plain, but in the S. are many mountains, which were covered in antiquity with vast forests, and thus were called Silvae. Of these the most important was the HERCYNIA SILVA: the other mountain districts most noticed by Roman authors were the TAUNUS and ABNOBA, the source of the Danube.—The chief rivers were the RHENUS (Rhine), DANUBIUS (Danube), VISTULA, AMISIA (Ems), VISURGIS (Weser), ALBIS (Elbe), VIADUS (Oder).—The inhabitants were called GERMANI by the Romans. Tacitus says (Germ. 2) that Germani was the name of the Tungri, who were the first German people that crossed the Rhine. It would seem that this name properly belonged only to those tribes who were settled in Gaul; and as these were the first German tribes with which the Romans came into contact, they extended the name to the whole nation. The Germans themselves do not appear to have used any one name to indicate the whole nation; for there is no reason to believe, as some have done, that the name Teutones was the general name of the nation in the time of the Romans. The Germans regarded themselves as indigenons in the country; but there can be no doubt that they were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who, along with the Celts, migrated into Europe from the Caucasus and the countries around the Black and Caspian seas, at a period long anterior to historical records. They are described as a people of high stature and of great bodily strength, with fair complexions, blue eyes, and yellow or red hair. Notwithstanding the severity of their climate, they wore little clothing, and their children went entirely naked. They had scarcely any defensive armour; their chief offensive weapon was the framea, a long spear with a narrow iron point, which they either darted from a distance or pushed in close combat. Their houses were only low huts, made of rough timber, and thatched with straw. A number of those were of course often built near each other; but they could not be said to have any towns properly so called. Many of their tribes were nomad, and every year changed their place of abode. They were disinclined to husbandry, growing little corn, and supporting themselves mainly by the produce of their herds and by hunting. The men found their chief delight in the perils and excitement of war. In peace their chief amusements were gaming and excessive drinking. Their chief drink was beer; and their carouses frequently ended in bloodshed. The women were held in high honour. Their chastity was without reproach. They accompanied their husbands to battle, and cheered them on by their presence, and frequently by their example as well. Both sexes were equally distinguished for their unconquerable love of liberty; and the women frequently destroyed both themselves and their children, rather than fall into the power of their husbands' conquerors.—In each tribe we find the people divided into four classes: the nobles, the freemen, the freedmen or vassals, and the slaves. All questions relating to peace and war, and the general interests of the tribe, were decided in the popular assembly, in which each freeman had a right to take part. In these assemblies a king was elected from among the nobles; but his power was very limited, and he only acted as the supreme magistrate in time of peace; for when a war broke out, the people elected a distinguished warrior as their leader, upon whom the prerogatives of the king devolved.—The religion of the Germans is known to us only from the Greek and Roman writers, who have confused the subject by seeking to identify the gods of the Germans with their own divinities. We know that they worshipped the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars. According to the Roman account, they are also said to have paid especial honour to Mercury, who was probably the German Wodan or Odin. Their other chief divinities were Isis (probably Freia, the wife of Odin); Mars (Tyr or Zio, the German god of war); the mother of the gods, called Nerthus (less correctly Herthus or Hertha); and Jupiter (Thor, or the god of thunder). The worship of the gods was simple. They had both priests and priestesses to attend to their service; and some of the priestesses, such as Veleda among the Brueteri, were celebrated throughout Germany for their prophetic powers. (Tac. Germ.; Caes. B. G. iv. 1–3, vi. 21–28; Strab. vii. 1; Mel. iii. 2, 3.)—The Germans first appear in history in the campaigns of the Cimbri and Teutones (B.C. 113), the latter of whom were undoubtedly a Germanic people. [TEUTONES.] About fifty years afterwards Ariovistus, a German chief, crossed the Rhine, with a vast host of Germans, and subdued a great part of Gaul; but he was defeated by Caesar with great slaughter (58), and driven beyond the Rhine. Caesar twice crossed this river (55, 29), but made no permanent conquest on the E. bank. Several German tribes, the remnants of the armies of Ariovistus, were settled by Caesar's arrangement on the Gallic side of the Rhine; the Triboci in Alsace, the Nemetes at Spire, and the Vangiones at Worms. The Germans on this side of the Rhine were more friendly to Rome than to the Celts, and those who sought the alliance of Rome were desirous of passing the boundary. Cologne itself grew out of a settlement of the Ubii on the Roman bank, effected by Agrippa B.C. 38. Attempts to cross the Rhine made by the hostile Usipii and Tencteri in 16 led to the unfortunate expedition of Lollius. The campaign of Drusus followed (B.C. 12–9), in which the Romans acquired the coast from the mouth of the Rhine to the Weser, and then attempted the conquest of the interior. They occupied the whole country between the Rhine and Weser, and Drusus advanced as far as the Elbe. On his death (9), his brother Tiberius succeeded to the command; and under him the country between the Rhine and the Visurgis (Weser) was entirely subjugated, and for about twenty years reckoned as a Roman province. But in A.D. 9, the impolitic and tyrannical conduct of the Roman governor, Quintilius Varus, provoked a general insurrection of the various German tribes, headed by Arminius, the Cheruscan. Varus and his legions were defeated and destroyed, and the Romans lost all their conquests E. of the Rhine. [VARUS.] The defeat of Varus was avenged by the successful campaigns of Germanicus, who would probably have recovered the Roman dominions E. of the river; but the policy of the emperor was altered and he was recalled to Rome A.D. 16. [For details, see GERMANICUS.] From this time the Romans abandoned all further attempts to conquer Germany beyond the Rhine, except that they were enabled to obtain peaceable possession of a large portion of the SW. of Germany between the Rhine and the Danube, to which they gave the name of the AGRI DECUMATES. [See p. 37, b.] On the death of Nero, several of the tribes in W. Germany joined the Batavi in their insurrection against the Romans (A.D. 69–71). Domitian and Trajan had to repel the attacks of some German tribes: but in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Marcomani, joined by various other tribes, made a more formidable attack upon the Roman dominions, and threatened the empire with destruction. From this time the Romans were often called upon to defend the left bank of the Rhine against their dangerous neighbours, especially against the two powerful confederacies of the Alemanni and Franks [ALEMANNI; FRANGI]; and in the 4th and 5th centuries the Germans obtained possession of some of the fairest provinces of the empire.—In considering the administration of Germany it is necessary first to distinguish the provinces. Germania Superior and Germania Inferior—or, as they were afterwards called, Germania Prima and Secunda—from the indefinite Germania Magna beyond the Rhine which was not subjugated by the Romans, except during the twenty years between the campaign of Drusus in B.C. 12 and the defeat of Varus in A.D. 9. The original intention, no doubt, was to retain this as the province of Germania, and to leave the territory west of the Rhine in the Belgic province; but the necessity of keeping strong military posts of the legions who guarded the Rhine frontier after the withdrawal from Germania Magna, led to the creation of two separately administered provinces. Germania Superior extended from the Jura mountains northwards to a line a little beyond Coblentz; Mogontiacum (Mainz) was the capital and residence of the legatus; its western boundary included the districts of the Helvetii (Switzerland), the Sequani (Besançon), the Lingones (Langres), Rauraci (Basle), the Triboci (Alsace), the Nemetes (Spire), and the Vangiones (Worms). The districts of the Treveri (Trèves), and the Mediomatrici (Metz), reckoned in the Gallic provinces. To the E. Germaniæ Superior was at first limited by the Rhine, but in Domitian's reign it extended again beyond the Rhine, and in Hadrian's time the Limes, or fortified boundary marked its eastern limit, and was guarded by a chain of forts. It extended 228 miles, from Rheinbrohl to Lorch. It included the Taunus and Friedberg, then turned S. to the Main above Frankfurt; thence followed the Main to its bend at Miltenberg, thence to the Neckar at Wimpfen. From this point it continued up the Neckar to the neighbourhood of the Stuttgart, where it joined the Rhaetian Limes. The forts on this Germanic frontier were about nine miles apart, and, moreover, wherever the boundary was not a river, it was marked first by a palisade, and later by a wall and ditch with towers at intervals. Germania Inferior extended from Remagen northwards, the Rhine and the lower Ems forming the boundary of the province. Westward it extended to the Scheldt and the Sambre. Its capital and the residence of the legatus was Colonia Agrippinensis (Cologne). Under Diocletian, the two provinces were called Germania Prima and G. Secunda.

Germaniæ or Caesâræ Germaniæ (Γερμανικαία, Καισάρεια Γερμανική; Marash), a town in the Syrian province of Commagene, near the borders of Cappadocia.

Germanicopolis. 1. (Ermence), a town in the west of Cilicia on the road from Laranda to Auemurium.—2. [GANGRA.]

Germanicus Caesar son of Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir Antony, was born B.C. 15. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius in the lifetime of Augustus, and was raised at an early age to the honours of the state. He assisted Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A.D. 7-10), and also fought along with Tiberius against the Germans in the following year. In 12 he filled the consulship at Rome while Tiberius commanded alone on the Rhine (Dio Cass. lvi. 26); but in the next year (13) he was sole commander of the Rheinish army, and was holding this office when the alarming mutiny broke out among the troops in Germany and Illyricum, upon the death of Augustus (14). Germanicus was a favourite with the soldiers, and they offered to place him at the head of the empire: but he rejected their proposals, and exerted all his influence to quell the mutiny, and reconcile them to their new sovereign. After restoring order among the troops, he crossed the Rhine from Vetera, and laid waste the country of the Usipii and Bructeri about the Lippe. In the following year (15), he again crossed the Rhine and attacked the Marsi and Cherusci. He penetrated as far as the Saltus Teutoburgensis, N. of the Lippe, in which forest the army of Quintilius Varus had been destroyed by the Germans. Here his troops gathered up the bones of their ill-fated comrades, and paid the last honours to their memory. But meantime Arminius had collected a formidable army, with which he attacked the Romans: and it was not without considerable loss that Germanicus and Caecina each made good his retreat to the Rhine. It was in this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of Germanicus [ARMINIUS]. (Tac. Ann. i. 51-63.) Next year

(16) Germanicus placed his troops on board a fleet of 1,000 vessels, and sailed through the canal of his father, Drusus [see p. 304, b.], and the Zuyder Zee to the ocean, and from thence to the mouth of the Amisia (Ems), where he lauded his forces. After crossing the Ems and the Weser, he fought two battles with Arminius, in both of which the Germans were completely defeated. The complete success of this year was marred by the destruction of a great part of his fleet with part of his legions in the North Sea; but as a result of the campaign the Germans could no longer offer him any effectual resistance, and Germanicus considered that he needed only another year to reduce completely the whole country between the Rhine and the Elbe. Tiberius, however, thought otherwise. It has been said that he was jealous of the success of Germanicus: it is more likely that he began to consider the subjugation and retention of the country between the Rhine and the Elbe too great and hazardous a task, or too heavy a tax on his resources. However that may be, upon pretence of the dangerous state of affairs in the East, the emperor recalled Germanicus to Rome, which he entered in triumph on the 26th of May, 17. (Tac. Ann. ii. 6-41; Strab. p. 291). In the same year all the Eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus; but Tiberius placed Cn. Piso in command of Syria, with secret instructions to check and thwart Germanicus. Piso soon showed his hostility to Germanicus, and his wife Plancina, in like manner, did every thing in her power to annoy Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. In 18, Germanicus proceeded to Armenia, where he placed Zeno (who as king assumed the name of Artaxias) on the throne, and in the following year (19) he visited Egypt, and on his return he was seized with a dangerous illness, of which he died. He believed that he had been poisoned by Piso, and shortly before he died, he summoned his friends, and called upon them to avenge his murder. He was deeply and sincerely lamented by the Roman people; and Tiberius was obliged to sacrifice Piso to the public indignation. (Tac. Ann. ii. 43-iii. 4; Suet. Cal. 1; Dio Cass. lvii. 18.) [Piso.] By Agrippina he had nine children, of whom six survived him. Of these the most notorious were the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Germanicus was an author of some repute. He wrote several poetical works. We still possess the remains of his Latin translation of the Phaenomena of Aratus. (Suet. Cal. 3, Claud. 11; Plin. viii. 155; Ov. Pont. iv. 8, 67.) Ed. by Orelli at the end of his Phaedrus, Zurich, 1831; by Breysig, Berl. 1867.

Geronthrae (Γερώνθραι; Geraki), a town of Laconia SE. of Sparta. It was an old Achaean town whose inhabitants were dispossessed by the Dorian invaders. (Paus. iii. 22, 5.)

Gerra (Γέρρα: Djerra), one of the chief cities of Arabia, and a great emporium for the trade of Arabia and India, stood on the NE. coast of Arabia Felix, 200 stadia (20 geog. miles) from the shore of the Sinus Gerraeus or Gerunium (Gironc), a town of Apulia near Larinum (Liv. xxii. 18).

Gērýon or Gērýōnes (Γηρυόνης), son of Chrysaor and Callirrhōē, a monster with three heads, or, according to others, with three bodies united together, was a king in Spain, and possessed magnificent oxen, which Heracles carried away (Hes. Th. 287; Aesch. Ag. 870; Verg. Aen. vi. 289; Apollod. ii. 5, 10). For details see HERACLES.

Gesoriacum (Boulogne) a port of the Morini in Gallia Belgica, at which persons usually embarked to cross over to Britain: it was subsequently called Bononia, whence its modern name (Plin. iv. 102; Suet. Claud. 17; Mel. iii. 2; Ammian. xx. 9; Eutrop. ix. 21).

Gerraeus, a bay on the W. side of the Persian Gulf, 2,400 stadia (240 geog. miles = 4° of lat.) from the mouth of the Tigris. The city was five Roman miles in circuit. The inhabitants, called Gerraei (Γερραῖοι), were said to have been originally Chaldeans who were driven out of Babylon. (Strab. p. 766; Plin. vi. 147.)

Gerrhus (Γέρρος), a river of Scythia, flowing

212. For details see CARACALLA.

Gētae, a Thracian people, called Daci by the Romans. Herodotus and Thucydides place them S. of the Ister (Danube) near its mouths; but in the time of Alexander the Great they dwelt beyond this river and N. of the Triballi. They were driven by the Sarmatians further W. towards Germany. (Hdt. iv. 93;

through a country of the same name, was a branch of the Borysthenes, and flowed into the Hypacyris, dividing the country of the Nomad Scythians from that of the Royal Scythians (Hdt. v. 53; Ptol. iii. 5, 12).

Gerunda (Gerona), a town of the Ausetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Narbo in Gaul.

Thuc. ii. 96; Strab. p. 294.) For their later history see DACIA.

Gigantes (Γιγάντες), the giants. According to Homer, they were a gigantic and savage race of men, dwelling in the distant W. in the island of Trinacria, near the Cyclopes, and were destroyed on account of their impiety. (Od. vii. 59, 206, x. 120; cf. Paus. viii. 29, 2.)

Hesiod considers them divine beings, who sprang from the blood that fell from Uranus upon the earth, so that Ge (the earth) was their mother (Th. 185). Neither Homer nor Hesiod know anything about their contest with the gods. Later poets and mythographers frequently confound them with the Titans, and represent them as enemies of Zeus and the gods, whose abode on Olympus they attempt to take by storm. Their battle with the gods seems to be only an imitation of the revolt of the Titans against Uranus. Ge, it is said (Apollod. i. 6), indignant at the fate of her former children, the Titans, gave birth to the Gigantes, who were beings of a monstrous size, with fearful countenances and legs ending in serpents. They were born, according to some, in the Phlegraean plains in Sicily, Campania, or Arcadia, and, according to others, in the Thracian Pallene. In their native land they made an attack upon heaven, being armed with huge rocks and trunks of trees. The gods were told that they could not conquer the giants without the assistance of a mortal; whereupon they summoned Heracles to their form. The serpent-footed form scarcely appears in any vase painting, and was clearly not the oldest conception, though not an unlikely way of indicating an earth-born race.

Gigonus (Γίγωνος; Γιγώνιος), town and promontory of Macedonia on the Theraic gulf.

Gildo, or Gildon, a Moorish chieftain, governed Africa for some years as a subject of the Western empire; but in A.D. 397, he transferred his allegiance to the Eastern empire, and the emperor Arcadius accepted him as a subject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, sent an army against him. Gildo was defeated; and being taken prisoner, put an end to his own life (398). This war forms the subject of one of Claudian's poems (De Bello Gildonico; cf. Amm. Marc. xxix. 5; Oros. vii. 36; Zos. v. 11).

Gindarus (Γίνδαρος; Gindaries), a strong fortress in Cyrrhестe in Syria, N.E. of Antioch.

Girba, a city on the island of Meninx (Jerbah), at the S. extremity of the Lesser Syrtis; celebrated for its manufactures of purple.

Gisco or Gisgo (Γίσκων or Γέσκων). 1. Son of the Hamilcar who was defeated and killed in the battle of Himera, B.C. 480. In consequence of this calamity, Gisco was banished from Carthage. He died at Selinus in Sicily. (Diod. xiii. 43.—2. Son of Hanno, was in exile when the Carthaginians were defeated at the river Crimissus by Timoleon, 339. He was then recalled from exile, and sent to oppose Timoleon. (Diod. xvi. 81; Plut. Timol. 30–34.)—3. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybaeum, at the end of the first Punic war. After the conclusion of peace, 241, he was deputed by the government to treat with the mercenaries who had risen in revolt, but he was seized by them and put to death. (Pol. i. 66–80.)

Gitiadas (Γιτιάδας), a Lacedaemonian sculptor and poet, about 520 B.C. He made a bronze statue of the goddess for the temple of Athene Poliouchos at Sparta, and ornamented the interior of the building with works in bronze (i.e., probably, overlaid the walls with bronze plates sculptured in relief), from which it was called the Brazen House, and hence the goddess received the surname of Χαλκιοῦκος. He composed a hymn to the goddess, besides other poems (Paus. iii. 17, 2; 18, 8).

Glabrio, Acilius, a plebeian name. 1. C., quaestor B.C. 203, and tribune of the plebs 197. He acted as interpreter to the Athenian embassy in 155, when the three philosophers, Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus came as envoys to Rome (Gell. vii. 14; Plut. Cat. Maj. 22). He wrote in Greek a history of Rome from the earliest period to his own times. It was translated into Latin by one Claudius, and his version is cited by Livy, under the titles of Annales Acilianæ (xxv. 39) and Libri Acilianæ (xxxv. 14).—2. M., tribune of the plebs 201, praetor 196, and consul 191. In his consulship he defeated Antiochus at Thermopylae, and the Aetolians also (Liv. xxxvi. 2, 22).—3. M., married a daughter of M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul 115, whom Sulla, in 82, compelled him to divorce. Glabrio was praetor urbanus in 70, when he presided at the impeachment of Verres. He was consul in 67, and in the following year proconsul of Cilicia. He succeeded L. Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithridates, but remained inactive in Bithynia. He was superseded by Cn. Pompey (Cic. pro Leg. Man. 9, 17, 26; Plut. Pomp. 30).—4. M., son of No. 3, was born in the house of Cn. Pompey. B. C. 81, who married his mother after her compulsory divorce from the elder Glabrio. Aemilia died aid. The giants Alcyoneus, Enceladus and Porphyryon distinguished themselves above their brethren. Alcyoneus (whose story belonged to the Isthmus of Corinth) was slain by Heracles (Pind. Nem. iv. 27); Porphyryon was felled by the bolt of Zeus and slain by the arrows of Heracles; Enceladus was overthrown either by the lightning of Zeus or by the aegis of Athene, and buried under Sicily. The other giants, whose number is said to have been twenty-four, were then killed one after another by the gods and Heracles, and some of them were buried by their conquerors under (volcanic) islands. Thus Polybotes, pursued by Poseidon over the Aegaeon, was buried by him under a fragment snatched from Cos, which became the island of Nisyros. Among the others named are Mimas, Phrytos or Rhoctus, Ephialtes, and Pallas. (Pind. Nem. i. 67, Hor. Od. iii. 4, 42; Ov. Met. i. 151; Strab. pp. 245, 281, 330; Apollod. l. c.) It is worthy of remark, that most writers place the giants in volcanic districts; and it is probable that the story of their contest with the gods took its origin from volcanic convulsions. The Battle of the Giants was not only a frequent subject for vase paintings, but was a sculptured decoration of many temples (Paus. ii. 17, 3, viii. 19, 9; Diod. xiii. 82; Eur. Ion. 206). In the most famous of all, the reliefs from the great altar of Pergamum, some of the giants have serpent-foot and wings, others are of wholly human in giving birth to him. In the Civil war, Glabrio was one of Caesar's lieutenants; commanded the garrison of Oricum in Epirus in 48, and was stationed in Sicily in 46. He was twice defended on capital charges by Cicero, and acquitted. (Plut. Sull. 33, Pomp. 9; Caes. B. C. iii. 15; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 30-39.)

Glanis, more usually written CLANIS.

Glānum Livii (nr. St Remy, Ru.), a town of the Salves in Gallia Narbonensis (Plin. iii. 36).

Glaphŷra. [ARCHELAUS, No. 6.]

Glaucē (Γλαύκη). 1. One of the Nereides, the name Glaucō being only a personification of the colour of the sea (Il. xviii. 39; Hes. Th. 244).—2. Daughter of Creon of Corinth, also called Creusa. For details see CREON.

Glauciā, C. Servilius, praetor B. C. 100, the chief supporter of Saturninus, with whom he was put to death in this year. [SATURNINUS.]

Glauciās (Γλαυκίας). 1. King of the Taulantians, one of the Illyrian tribes, fought against Alexander the Great, B. C. 335. In 316 he afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander. In 307 he invaded Epirus, and placed Pyrrhus, then twelve years old, upon the throne (Plut. Pyrrh. 3; Diod. xix. 67).—2. A Greek physician, who probably lived in the third or second century B. C.—3. A sculptor of Aegium, who made the bronze chariot and statue of Gelo, to commemorate an Olympian victory B. C. 488 (Paus. vi. 9, 2). The name of Glaucias was found on a base at Olympia in the excavations of 1878.

Glaucōn (Γλαυκῶν). 1. Son of Critias, brother of Callaeschus, and father of Charmides and of Plato's mother, Perictiōne.—2. Brother of Plato; one of the speakers in the Republic.

Glaucus (Γλαυκός). 1. Grandson of Aeolus, son of Sisyphus and Merope, and father of Bellerophon (Il. vi. 154; Apollod. ii. 3; Paus. ii. 4, 3). He lived at Potniae, despised the power of Aphrodite, and did not allow his mares to breed, that they might be the stronger for the chariot race. This excited the anger of Aphrodite, who destroyed him. According to others he fed them with human flesh. According to some accounts his horses became frightened and threw him out of his chariot, as he was contending in the funeral games celebrated by Acastus in honour of his father, Pelias (Paus. vi. 20, 19; Ov. Ibis, 557; Hyg. Fab. 250, 273). According to others, his horses tore him to pieces, having drunk from the water of a sacred well in Boeotia, or eaten the herb Hippomanes, in consequence of which they were seized with madness (Paus. ix. 8, 1; Strab. p. 409; Verg. Georg. iii. 267; Plin. xxv. 94; cf. Eur. Phoen. 1124). Glaucus of Potniae (Γλαυκός Ποτνιαεύς) was the title of one of the lost tragedies of Aeschylus. It is probable that this Glaucus was a local sea-deity (like No. 5), upon whose worship these stories were engrafted. An indication of Poseidon having taken his place is afforded by the story which makes Bellerophon the son of Poseidon (Hyg. Fab. 191). That horses were sacrificed to him as to Poseidon is probable enough, and thence the story of his death might have arisen. The Euhemeristic interpretation was that he merely ruined himself by racing (Palaeph. περὶ ἀπίστ. 26).—2. Son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bellerophon, was a Lycian prince, and assisted Priam in the Trojan war. He was connected with Diomedes by ties of hospitality; and when they discovered this in the battle, they abstained from fighting, and exchanged arms with one another, the armour of Glaucus being golden, that of Diomedes bronze. Glaucus was slain by Ajax. (Il. vi. 119-236; Hyg. Fab. 112, 113; Dictys, ii. 35.)

The story gave rise to a proverb χρῦσεα χαλκείων (taken from Il. vi. 236), to express a bad exchange (cf. Gell. ii. 23).—3. Son of the Messenian king Aegyptus, whom he succeeded on the throne.—4. One of the sons of the Cretan king Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete.

When a boy, he fell into a cask full of honey, and was smothered. Minos searched for his son in vain, and was at length informed by Apollo or the Curetes that the person who should devise the most appropriate comparison of a cow which could assume three different colours, with any other object, would find the boy. The soothsayer Polyidus of Argos solved the problem by likening the cow to a mulberry, which is at first white, then red, and in the end black. By his prophetic powers he then discovered the boy. Minos now required Polyidus to restore his son to life; but as he could not accomplish this, Minos ordered him to be entombed alive with the body of Glaucus. When Polyidus was shut up in the vault, he saw a serpent approaching the dead body, and killed the reptile. Presently another serpent came, and placed a herb upon the dead serpent, which was thereby restored to life. Thereupon Polyidus covered the body of Glaucus with the same herb, and the boy at once rose into life again. (Hyg. Fab. 136; Apollod. iii. 1, 2; Tzetz. Lyc. 811; Claud. Bell. Get. 442.) Some modern authorities see in the myth the setting and rising of the morning star. It is a more probable conjecture that it may have something to do with the death and renewal of vegetation, originally expressed in the story of the death of the youthful Cretan deity, the search, and the restoration to life. Γλαυκός πίων μέλι ἀνέστη became a proverb for an unexpected recovery.

—5. Of Anthedon in Boeotia, a fisherman, who became immortal by eating a part of the divine herb which Cronos had sown (this part of his story bears some resemblance to No. 4). His parentage is differently stated: some called his father Copeus, others Polybus, the husband of Euboea, and others again Anthedon or Poseidon. He was further said to have been a clever diver, to have built the ship Argo, and to have accompanied the Argonauts as their steersman. In the sea-fight of Jason against the Tyrrhenians, Glaucus alone remained unhurt; he sank to the bottom of the sea, where he was visible to none save Jason. From this moment he became a sea-god, and was of service to the Argonauts. The story of his sinking or leaping into the sea was variously modified in the different traditions—from a frenzy on the discovery that he was immortal, or from love of the sea-deity Melicertes. There was a belief in Greece that once in every year Glaucus visited all the coasts and islands, accompanied by sea monsters, and gave his prophecies. Fishermen and sailors paid particular reverence to him, and watched his oracles, which were believed to be very trustworthy. He is said to have even instructed Apollo in the prophetic art. Some writers stated that he dwelt in Delos, where he prophesied in conjunction with the nymphs; but the place of his abode varied in different traditions. (Ov. Met. xiii. 904; Tzetz. Lyc. 753; Paus. ix. 22, 6; Verg. Georg. i. 437, Aen. iii. 420, v. 832, vi. 36; Serv. ad loc.; Strab. p. 405; Schol. ad Plat. Iep. p. 611; Athen. pp. 296, 297). The stories about his various loves were favourite subjects with the ancient poets. He is described as biformis, with the body of a man covered with seaweed and shells ending in the tail of a fish (Plat. Rep. p. 611; Vell. Pat. ii. 83; Stat. Theb. vii. 335). Aeschylus wrote a play Γλαῦκος Πόντιος about this Glaucus also. His reception by Poseidon and Amphitrite is a subject of vase paintings.—6. A Lacedaemonian, son of Epicydes. He was famed for his honesty, and therefore was asked by a Milesian to take care of his money: when the sous reclaimed it, he denied the possession, but asked the oracle at Delphi if he might persist in the denial. The god punished his falsehood, and his sin of tempting the deity, by the destruction of his family (Hdt. vi. 86; Paus. ii. 18, 2, viii. 7, 4; Juv. xiii. 199).—7. Of Chios, a sculptor and worker in metal, distinguished as the inventor of the art of soldering (κόλλησις), flourished B. C. 490. His most noted work was an iron base (ὑποκρητηρίδιον), which, with the silver bowl it supported, was presented to the temple at Delphi by Alyattes, king of Lydia (Hdt. i. 25; Paus. x. 16; Athen. p. 210).—8. A sculptor of Argos who in collaboration with Diouysius executed statues dedicated by Smicythus at Olympia (Paus. v. 26). His date was about 470 B. C.

Glaucus (Γλαῦκος). 1. A small river of Phrygia, falling into the Maeander near Eumenia.—2. A small river of Lycia, on the borders of Caria, flowing into the Sinus Glaucus (Gulf of Makri).—3. A river of Achaia.

Glaucus Sinus. [GLAUCUS.]

Glessāria (Ameland), an island off the coast of the Frisii, so called from 'glessum' or amber which was found there: its proper name was Austeravia (Plin. xxxvii. 42).

Glisas (Γλάσις; Γλασιάντιος), an ancient town in Bœotia, on Mt. Hypaton. It was in ruins in the time of Pausanias (Il. ii. 504; Paus. ix. 19, 2).

Glycas, Michael, a Byzantine historian, the author of a work entitled Annals (βίβλος χρονική), containing the history of the world from the creation to the death of Alexis I. Comnenus, A. D. 1118. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836; Migne, Paris, 1866.

Glycēra (Γλυκέρα), 'the sweet one,' a favourite name of hetairae. The most celebrated hetairae of this name are, 1. The daughter of Thalassis, and the mistress of Harpalus.—2. Of Sicyon, and the mistress of Pausias.—3. A favourite of Horace (Od. i. 19, 30, iii. 19, 29).

Glycērius, became emperor of the West A. D. 473, after the death of Olybrius, by the assistance of Gundobald the Burgundian. But the Byzantine court did not acknowledge Glycerius, and proclaimed Julius Nepos emperor, by whom Glycerius was dethroned (474), and compelled to become a priest. He was appointed bishop of Salona in Dalmatia.

Glycon (Γλύκων), a deity worshipped at Abonitichos under the form of a snake, and represented by the impostor Alexander as the incarnation of Asclepius (Lucian, Alex. 18). The name appears on coins and inscriptions.

Glycon (Γλύκων), an Athenian sculptor of the first century B. C., known to us by his magnificent colossal marble statue of Hercules, commonly called the 'Farnese Hercules.' It was found in the baths of Caracalla, and, after adorning the Farnese palace for some time, was removed to the royal museum at Naples. It represents the hero resting on his club. It is supposed (from a comparison with a fresco from Herculaneum) that he is looking down at the infant Telephus suckled by a deer. [See cut under HERACLES.]

Gnipho, M. Antōnius, a Roman rhetorician, was born B. C. 114, in Gaul, but studied at Alexandria. He afterwards established a school at Rome, which was attended by many distinguished men, and among others by Cicero, when he was praetor (Suet. Gramm. 7).

Gnōsus, Gnosus. [CNOSUS.]

Gōbrŷas (Γωβρύας), a noble Persian, one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian. He accompanied Darius into Scythia. He was doubly related to Darius by marriage: Darius married the daughter of Gobryas, and Gobryas married the sister of Darius. (Hdt. iii. 70–78; Val. Max. iii. 2.)

Golgi (Γολγοί; Golgios: Gorgus), a town in Cyprus, between Idalium and Tremithus, was a Sicyonian colony, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Paus. viii. 5; Theoc. xv. 100; Catull. 36, 15).

Gomphi (Γόμφοι; Gomphēus: Palaea Episcopē), a town in Hestiaeotis in Thessaly, was a strong fortress on the confines of Epirus, and commanded the chief pass between Thessaly and Epirus; it was taken and destroyed by Caesar (B. C. 48), but was afterwards rebuilt (Strab. p. 487; Caes. B. C. iii. 80).

Gonni, Gonnus (Γόννοι, Gónnos: Gónnios: Lycostomon), a strongly fortified town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, on the river Peneus and at the entrance of the vale of Tempe, was, from its position, of great military importance (Liv. xxxiii. 10, xlii. 54; Strab. p. 440); but it is not mentioned after the time of the wars between the Macedonians and Romans.

Gordianus, M. Antōnius, the name of three Roman emperors—father, son, and grandson. 1. Surnamed Africanus, son of Metius Marullus and Ulpia Gordiana, possessed a princely fortune, and was distinguished alike by moral and intellectual excellence. In his first consulship, A. D. 213, he was the colleague of Caracalla; in his second, of Alexander Severus; and soon afterwards was nominated proconsul of Africa. After he had governed Africa for several years with justice and integrity, a rebellion broke out in the province in consequence of the tyranny of the procurator of Maximinus. The ring-leaders of the conspiracy compelled Gordian, who was now in his 80th year, to assume the imperial title, A. D. 238. He entered on his new duties at Carthage in the month of February, associated his son with him in the empire, and despatched letters to Rome announcing his elevation. Gordianus and his son were at once proclaimed Augusti by the senate, and preparations were made in Italy to resist Maximinus. But meantime a certain Capellianus, procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the authority of the Gordiani and marched against them. The younger Gordianus was defeated by him, and slain in the battle; and his aged father thereupon put an end to his own life, after reigning less than two months.—2. Son of the preceding and of Fabia Orestilia, was born A. D. 192, was associated with his father in the purple, and fell in battle, as recorded above.

—3. Grandson of the elder Gordianns, either by a daughter or by the younger Gordianus. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor in July, A. D. 238, after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus, although he was a mere boy, probably not more than twelve years old. He reigned six years, from 238 to 244. In 241 he married the daughter of Mithrathes, and in the same year set out for the East to carry on the war against the Persians. With the assistance of Mithrathes, he defeated the Persians in 242. Mithrathes died in the following year; and Philipppus, whom Gordian had taken into his confidence, excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length rose in open mutiny, and assassinated Gordian in Mesopotamia, 244. He was succeeded by PHILIPPUS. (Lives of the three Gordians in Script. Hist. Aug., ascribed to Capitolinus; Herodian, vii. and viii.)

Gordium (Γόρδιον, Γορδίου Κώμη), the ancient capital of Phrygia, the royal residence of the kings of the dynasty of Gordius, and the scene of Alexander's celebrated exploit of 'cutting the Gordian knot.' [GORDIUS.] It was situated in the W. of that part of Phrygia which was afterwards called Galatia, N. of Pessinus, on the N. bank of the Sangarius. Some have identified it with Yurine, and believe that the later town of Eudoxias was on the site of Gordium. The town of Gordiurome (Γορδίου Κώμη) was further north in Bithynia and was called Julio-polis in the reign of Augustus.

Gordius (Γόρδιος), an ancient king of Phrygia, and father of Midas, was originally a peasant. Disturbances having broken out in Phrygia, an oracle declared that a waggon would bring them a king who should restore peace. When the people were deliberating, Gordius, with his wife and son, suddenly appeared in his waggon, and was acknowledged as king. He dedicated his waggon to Zeus, in the acropolis of Gordium. The pole was fastened to the yoke by a knot of hark; and an oracle declared that whosoever should untie the knot should reign over Asia. Alexander cut the knot with his sword, and applied the oracle to himself (Plut. Alex. 13; Curt. iii. 1, 15).

Gordiaticos (Γορδίου τείχος), town in Caria, near the borders of Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 13).

Gordyaei. [GORDYENE.]

Gordyēnē or Cordūēnē (Γορδωνή, Κορδωννή), a mountainous district in the S. of Armenia Major, between the Thospitis Palms (Lake Van) and the Tigris. After the Mithridatic war, it was assigned by Pompey to Tigranes, with whom its possession had been disputed by the Parthian king Phraates. Trojan added it to the Roman empire; and it formed afterwards a constant object of contention between the Romans and the Parthian and Persian kings, but was for the most part virtually independent. Its warlike inhabitants, called Γορδυναῖοι or Cordnēni, were no doubt the same people as the CARDUCHI of the earlier Greek geographers, and the Kurds of modern times (Strab. p. 747).

Gorgē (Γόργη), daughter of Oenens and Althea. She and her sister Delaaira alone retained their original forms, when their other sisters were metamorphosed by Artemis into birds (Ov. Met. xiii. 543; Hyg. Fab. 97).

Gorgias (Γοργίας). 1. Of Leontini, in Sicily, a celebrated rhetorician and orator, sophist and philosopher, was born about B. C. 480, and is said to have lived 105, or even 109 years. In B. C. 427 he was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Athens to ask for aid against Syracuse (Diod. xii. 53). He spent the remaining years of his vigorous old age in the towns of Greece Proper, especially at Athens and the Thessalian Larissa, enjoying honour everywhere as an orator and teacher of rhetoric. It is probable that he to some extent influenced Thucydides; and Alcibiades, Alcidas, Aeschines and Antisthenes are called either pupils or imitators of Gorgias, and his oratory must have had great influence upon the rhetorician Isocrates. The high estimation in which he was held at Athens appears from the way in which he is introduced in the dialogue of Plato which bears his name. The eloquence of Gorgias was florid and marked by antitheses, alliterations, the symmetry of its parts, and similar artifices; and his great fame is due to the fact that he first aimed at artistic prose, seeking to give it a rhythm. Two declamations have come down to us under the name of Gorgias, viz. the Apology of Palamedes, and the Encomium on Helena, the genuineness of which is doubtful. Besides his orations, which were mostly what the Greeks called Epidictic or speeches for display, such as his oration addressed to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, Gorgias also wrote loci communes, probably as rhetorical exercises; a work on dissimilar and homogeneous words, and another on rhetoric. The works of Gorgias did not even contain the elements of a scientific theory of oratory, any more than his oral instructions. He confines himself to teaching his pupils a variety of rhetorical artifices, and made them learn by heart certain formulas relative to them.—2. Of Athens, gave instruction in rhetoric to young M. Cicero, when he was at Athens (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 21). He wrote a rhetorical work, a Latin abridgment of which by Rutilius Lupus is still extant, under the title De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis (Quintil. ix. 2, 101).

Gorgo and Gorgōnes (Γοργά and Γόργωνες). Homer mentions only one Gorgo, who appears in the Odyssey (xi. 633) as one of the frightful phantoms in Hades: in the Iliad the Aegis of Athene contains the head of Gorgo, the terror of her enemies. It is represented also on the shield of Agamemnon (Il. v. 741, s. 36). Hesiod mentions three Gorgones, Stheno (the Strong), Euryale (the Far-springer), and Medūsa (the Ruler), daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whence they are sometimes called Phorcýdes. Hesiod placed them in the far W. in the Ocean, in the neighbourhood of Night and the Hesperides; but later traditions transferred them to Libya

(Hes. Th. 274; Hdt. ii. 91; Paus. ii. 21, 6). They were frightful beings; instead of hair, their heads were covered with hissing serpents; and they had wings, brazen claws, and enormous teeth (Hes. Scut. 233; Pind. Ol. xiii. 63, Pyth. x. 47; Aesch. Pr. 799; Eum. 46; Ov. Met. iv. 771). Medusa, who alone of the three was mortal, was, according to some legends, at first a beautiful maid (cf. Pind. Pyth. xii. 27), but her hair was changed into serpents by Athene, in consequence of her having become by Poseidon the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus, in one of Athene's temples. Her head now became so fearful that everyone who looked at it was changed into stone. For the manner of her death see PERSEUS. As she was already with child, from the drops of blood which fell from her severed head Pegasus was born. This blood had both a healing and a destructive power (Eur. Ion. 1003). The head was afterwards placed in the aegis of Athene. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Aegis.] The interpretations of the myth are manifold and doubtful. The idea of a power that turned into stone may easily originate from rocks which have a human or animal shape; but the rest of the myth is harder to explain. The old Euhemerists made her either a princess whose army fought with Perseus, or represented the Gorgons as a tribe of wild women with hairy bodies (Paus. ii. 21, 5; Plin. vi. 200). Some of the nature school have imagined her to represent the sun or the moon; but Roscher and other recent mythologists derive all her attributes from thunderstorms and thunderclouds, relying especially on the idea of flashing, γοργὸν ὄμμα (cf. Il. viii. 349), and upon the snaky hair representing forked lightning. It may perhaps be a question whether part of the story may not have grown out of the emblems upon ancient shields and out of Oriental masks, instead of the emblems and masks from the story. In art Gorgons were represented with wings when more than the mere mask was shown. In archaic art the head was hideous and monstrous, with great teeth and lolling tongue. It is so represented in an ancient coin of Eretria in Euboea [see cut above] and in a metope of the temple of Selinus, where Perseus is cutting off the head of Medusa. About the middle of the fifth century B.C. the type was more human, but still had the ugliness.

Gortýn, Gortýna (Γόρτυν, Γόρτυνα: Γορτύσιος). 1. (Nr. Hagios Dekha, Ru., six miles from the foot of Mt. Ida), one of the most ancient cities in Crete, on the river Lethaeus, ninety stadia from its harbour Lebēn, and 130 stadia from its other harbour Matalia (Il. ii. 646; Od. iii. 294; Strab. p. 478). It was the second city in Crete, being only inferior to Cnossus; and on the decline of the latter place under the Romans, it became the metropolis of the island.—2. Also Gortys (Nr. Atzikolo, Ru.), a town in Arcadia on the river Gortynius, a tributary of the Alpheus.

Gotarzes. [ARSACES XX. XXI.]

Gothi, Gothōnes, Guttōnes, a powerful German people, who played an important part in the overthrow of the Roman empire. From Plin. xxxvii. 35 it seems that they were mentioned by Pytheas. They originally dwelt on the Prussian coast of the Baltic at the mouth of the Vistula, where they are placed by Tacitus (Germ. 43); but they afterwards migrated S., and at the beginning of the third century, they appear on the coasts of the Black Sea, where Caracalla encountered them on his march to the East (Spartian, Carac. 10). In the reign of the emperor Philippus (A. D. 244–249), they obtained possession of a great part of the Roman province of Dacia; and in consequence of their settling in the countries formerly inhabited by the Getae and Scythians, they are frequently called both Getae and Scythians by later writers. From the time of Philippus the attacks of the Goths, who had united with the Carpi, against the Roman empire became more frequent and more destructive. In A. D. 272 the emperor Aurelian surrendered to them the whole of Dacia. It is about this time that we find them separated into two great divisions, the Ostrogoths or E. Goths, and the Visigoths or W. Goths. The Ostrogoths settled in Moesia and Pannonia, while the Visigoths remained N. of the Danube.—The Visigoths under their king Alaric invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). A few years afterwards they settled permanently in the SW. of Gaul, and established a kingdom of which Tolosa was the capital. From thence they invaded Spain, where they also founded a kingdom, which lasted for more than two centuries, till it was overthrown by the Arabs.—The Ostrogoths meantime had extended their dominions almost up to the gates of Constantinople; and the emperor Zeno was glad to get rid of them by giving them permission to invade and conquer Italy. Under their king Theodoric the Great they obtained possession of the whole of Italy (493). Theodoric took the title of king of Italy, and an Ostrogothic dynasty reigned in the country, till it was destroyed by Narses, the general of Justinian, A. D. 553.—The Ostrogoths embraced Christianity at an early period; and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the Bible into Gothic, about the middle of the fourth century.

Gothini or Cotini (Κότινοι, Dio Cass. lxxi. 12), a Celtic people in the SE. of Germany, subject to the Quadi (Tac. Germ. 43).

Gracchæus, M. Jūnius, assumed his cognomen on account of his friendship with C. Gracchus. He wrote a work, De Potestatibus, which gave an account of the Roman constitution and magistracies from the time of the kings. It was addressed to T. Pomponius Atticus, the father of Cicero's friend (Cic. Legg. iii. 20, 49; Plin. xxxiii. 36; Varr. L. L. vi. 33). This work, which appears to have been one of great value, is lost, but some parts of it are cited by Joannes Lydus (de Magistr. i. 24).

Gracchus, Semprōnius, plebeian.—1. Tib., a distinguished general in the second Punic war. In B.C. 216 he was magister equitum to the dictator, M. Junius Pera; in 215 consul for the first time; and in 213 consul for the second time. In 212 he fell in battle against Mago, at Campi Veteres, in Lucania (Liv. xxv. 15). His body was sent to Hannibal, who honoured it with a magnificent burial.—2. Tib., was tribune of the plebs in 187; and although personally hostile to P. Scipio Africanus, he defended him against the attacks of the other tribunes, for which he received the thanks of the aristocratical party. Soon after this occurrence Gracchus was rewarded with the hand of Cornelia, the youngest daughter of P. Scipio Africanus. In 181 he was praetor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with great success against the Celtiberians (Liv. xl. 48). After defeating them in battle, he gained their confidence by his justice and kindness. He returned to Rome in 178; and was consul in 177, when he was sent against the Sardinians, who had revolted. He reduced them to complete submission in 176, and returned to Rome in 175. He brought with him so large a number of captives, that they were sold for a mere trifle, which gave rise to the proverb Sardi venales (Liv. xli. 7; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 57). In 169 he was censor with C. Clandius Pulcher, and was consul a second time in 163. He had twelve children by Cornelia, all of whom died at an early age, except the two tribunes, Tiberius and Gaius, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to P. Scipio Africanus the younger. (Cic. Brut. 27, 104.)—3. Tib., elder son of No. 2, lost his father at an early age. He was educated together with his brother Gaius by his illustrious mother, Cornelia, who made it the object of her life to render her sons worthy of their father and of her own ancestors. She was assisted in the education of her children by eminent Greeks, who exercised great influence upon the minds of the two brothers, and among whom we have especial mention of Diophanos of Mytilone, Menelaus of Marathon, and Blossius of Cumæ. Tiberius was nine years older than his brother Gaius; and although they grew up under the same influence, and their characters resembled each other in the main outlines, yet they differed from each other in several important particulars. Tiberius was inferior to his brother in talent, but surpassed him in the amiable traits of his gentle nature: the simplicity of his demeanour, and his calm dignity, won for him the hearts of the people. His eloquence, too, formed a strong contrast with the passionate and impetuous harangues of Gaius; for it was temperate, graceful, persuasive, and, proceeding as it did from the fulness of his own heart, it found a ready entrance into the hearts of his hearers. Tiberius served in Africa under P. Scipio Africanus the younger (who had married his sister), and was present at the destruction of Carthage (146). In 137 he was quaestor, and in that capacity he accompanied the consul, Hostilius Mancinus, to Hispania Citerior, where he gained both the affection of the Roman soldiers and the esteem and confidence of the victorious enemy. The distressed condition of the Roman people had deeply excited the sympathies of Tiberius. As he travelled through Etruria on his journey to Spain, he observed with grief and indignation the deserted state of that fertile country; thousands of foreign slaves in chains were employed in cultivating the land and tending the flocks upon the immense estates of the wealthy, while the poorer classes of Roman citizens, who were thus thrown out of employment, had scarcely their daily bread or a clod of earth to call their own. He resolved to use every effort to remedy this state of things by endeavouring to create an industrious middle class of agriculturists, and to put a check upon the unbounded avarice of the ruling party, whose covetousness, combined with the disasters of the second Punic war, had completely destroyed the middle class of small landowners. With this view, he offered himself as a candidate for the tribuneship, and obtained it for the year 133. The agrarian law of Licinius, which enacted that no one should possess more than 500 jugera of public land, had never been repealed, but had for a long series of years been totally disregarded. The first measure, therefore, of Tiberius was to propose a bill to the people, renewing and enforcing the Licinian law, but with the modification, that besides the 500 jugera allowed by that law, anyone might possess 250 jugera of the public land for each of his sons. This clause, however, seems to have been limited to two: so that a father of two sons might occupy 1,000 jugera of public land. The surplus was to be taken from them and distributed in small farms of 30 jugera among the poorer citizens, with permanent leases at a moderate rent. The business of measuring and distributing the land was to be entrusted to triumvirs, who were to be elected annually. This measure encountered the most vehement opposition from the senate and the aristocracy, and they got one of the tribunes, M. Octavius, to put his intercessio or veto upon the bill. When neither persuasions nor threats would induce Octavius to withdraw his opposition, the people, upon the proposition of Tiberius (an unconstitutional measure), deposed Octavius from his office. The law was then passed, and the triumvirs appointed to carry it into execution were Tib. Gracchus, App. Claudius, his father-in-law, and his brother C. Gracchus, who was then little more than twenty years old, and was serving in the camp of P. Scipio at Numantia. About this time Attalus died, bequeathing his kingdom and his property to the Roman people. Gracchus thereupon proposed that this property should be distributed among the people, to enable the poor who were to receive lands to purchase the necessary implements, cattle, and the like. When the time came for the election of the tribunes for the following year, Tiberius again offered himself as a candidate. The senate declared that it was illegal for anyone to hold this office for two consecutive years; but Tiberius paid no attention to the objection. While the tribes were voting, a band of senators, headed by P. Scipio Nasica, rushed from the senate house into the forum and attacked the people. Tiberius was killed as he was attempting to escape. He was probably about thirty-five years of age at the time of his death. (Plut. Tib. Gracch.; Appian, B. C. i. 9-17; Vell. Pat. ii. 2; index to Cicero).—There can be no doubt that the motives of Tiberius were pure, and that he came forward from a genuine desire to remedy the abuses of the land occupation and to ameliorate the condition of the poorer citizens. Unfortunately he adopted a revolutionary method in illegally deposing his colleague, and by his subsequent methods for gaining the support of the populace against the senate gave some colour for the undoubtedly false accusation that he was seeking power for himself, which led some even of the more moderate men to approve of his death. [See also Dict. of Antiq. art. Agrariae Leges.]

 4. C., brother of No. 3, was in Spain at the time of his brother's murder, as has been already stated. He returned to Rome in the following year (182), but kept aloof from public affairs for some years. In 126 he was quaestor, and went to Sardinia, under the consul L. Aurelius Orestes, and there gained the approbation of his superiors and the attachment of the soldiers. The senate attempted to keep him in Sardinia, dreading his popularity in Rome: but after he had remained there two years, he left the province without leave, and returned to the city in 124. Urged on by the popular wish, and by the desire of avenging the cause of his murdered brother, he became a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs, and was elected for the year 123. His reforms were far more extensive than his brother's, in fact they amounted to revolution, and such was his influence with the people that he carried all he proposed; and the senate were deprived of some of their most important privileges. His first measure was to secure the right of being elected tribune for two or more years in succession. Having gained this point, he proceeded to win over the populace by enacting that all citizens who applied should receive at a low price five modii of corn—the beginning of the pernicious system of doles which more than anything else demoralised the proletariat of Rome. He then renewed his brother's agrarian law, and also established colonies at Tarentum and Capua. He next passed laws for the benefit of the military loaves, enacting that the soldiers should be equipped at the expense of the republic, and that no person under the age of seventeen should be drafted for the army. In order to weaken the power of the senate, and to set them at enmity with the monied commercial class, he enacted that the judges in the judicia publica, who had hitherto been elected from the senate, should in futuro be chosen from the equites, and that in every year, before the consuls were elected, the senate should determine the two provinces which the consuls should have. Moreover, by enacting that the taxes of Asia should be put up for auction at Rome, he threw both the farming of the taxes and the judicial trial for extortionate taxation into the hands of the equites. This plan, though it secured him support, was certain to cause corruption and extortion in the system of provincial tax-gathering.—Gaius was elected tribune again for the following year, 122. The senate, finding it impossible to resist the measures of Gaius, resolved if possible to destroy his influence with the people. For this purpose they persuaded M. Livius Drusus, one of the colleagues of Gaius, to propose measures still more popular than those of Gaius. The people allowed themselves to be duped by the agent of the senate, and the popularity of Gaius gradually waned. During his absence in Africa, whither he had gone as one of the triumvirs to establish a colony at Carthage, in accordance with one of his own laws, his party had been considerably weakened by the influence of Drusus and the aristocracy, and many of his friends had deserted his cause. He failed in obtaining the tribuneship for the following year (121); and when his year of office expired, his enemies began to repeal several of his enactments. Gaius appeared in the forum to oppose these proceedings. Antullius, one of the attendants of the consul Opimius, was slain by the friends of Gaius. Opimius gladly availed himself of this pretext to persuade the senate to confer upon him unlimited power to act as he thought best for the good of the republic. Fulvius Flaccus, and the other friends of Gaius, called upon him to repel force by force: but he refused to arm, and while his friends fought in his defence, he fled to the grove of the Furies, where he fell by the hand of his slave, whom he had commanded to put him to death. The bodies of the slain, whose number is said to have amounted to 3000, were thrown into the Tiber, their property was confiscated, and their houses demolished. All the other friends of Gracchus who fell into the hands of their enemies were thrown into prison and there strangled.—It is impossible to allow to C. Gracchus that freedom from personal motives—of ambition as well as of revenge—which ennobled his brother. That he also was in many points reforming abuses is undeniable; but his methods were revolutionary and violent, and were in some degree the cause of a century of wars which more judicious and gradual reform might possibly have avoided. Two of his measures, the gifts of corn, and the haits offered to the equites were calculated to work great evil in the state. In ability, however, he was his brother's superior, and his death by what was unjustifiable violence has transferred much of the blame to his opponents. (Plut. C. Gracch.; Appian, B. C. i. 21-26; index to Cicero.)

Grāvivus. [MARS.]

Graeae (Γραῖαι)—that is, 'the old women'—daughters of Phorecyas and Ceto, were three in number, Pephredo, Enyo, and Dino, and were also called Phorcjdes. They had grey hair from their birth; and had only one tooth and one eye in common, which they borrowed from each other when they wanted them. They protected their sisters, the Gorgons, and dwelt outside the light of sun and moon beyond Western Lihya. Aeschylus (who gives them the bodies of swans) makes them one of the stages in the wanderings of Io, and they appear in the the story of Perseus. [PERSEUS.] Roschor and other recent mythologists maintain that the story, like that of the Gorgons, arose from thunderclouds: a tooth is said to represent lightning in Aryan mythology, and the passing of the eye and the tooth to signify the lightning flashing from cloud to cloud. It must be confessed that this does not seem an obvious or natural idea to connect with a thunderstorm. It may perhaps be enough to regard them as personifying old ago. The conception is more like Norse than Greek mythology, and may possibly have been passed on to Greece from a northern people.

Graecia or Hellas (ἡ Ἑλλάς), a country in Europe, the inhabitants of which were called Graeci or Hellēnes (Ἑλληνες). Among the Greeks Hellas was used in general to signify the abode of the Hellenes, wherever they might happen to be settled. Thus the Greek colonies of Cyrene in Africa, of Syracuse in Sicily, of Tarentum in Italy, and of Smyrna in Asia, are said to be in Hellas; but before the western colonies were founded, Delos was about the centre of the Hellenic world. Latin geographers limited the name Hellas to Middle Greece, excluding the Peloponessus and all that lies north of the Malian Gulf. Eastern nations called the Hellenes generally 'Ionians'; western nations knew them as 'Greeks' (see below). In the most ancient times Hellas was a small district of Phthiotis in Thessaly, in which was situated a town of the same name (Il. ii. 683; Thuc. i. 3; Strab. 431). As the inhabitants of this district, the Hellenes, gradually spread over the surrounding country, their name was adopted by other tribes, who became assimilated in language, manners, and customs to the original Hellenes; till at length the whole of the N. of Greece from the Ceraunian and Cambunian mountains to the Corinthian isthmus was designated by the name of Hellas.* In later times even Macedonia, and the S. part of Illyria were sometimes reckoned part of Hellas. The Romans called the land of the Hellenes Graecia, whence we have derived the name of Greece. They probably gave this name to the country from their first becoming acquainted with the tribe of the Graeci, who were said to be descended from Graecus, a son of Thessalus, and who appear at an early period to have dwelt on the W. coast of Epirus (cf. Aristot. Meteor. i. 4).—Hellas, or Greece proper, including Peloponessus, lies between the 36th and 46th degrees of N. latitude, and between the 21st and 26th degrees of E. longitude. Its greatest length from Mt. Olympus to Cape Taenarus is about 250 English miles: its greatest breadth from the W. coast of Acarnania to Marathon in Attica is about 180 miles. Its area is somewhat less than that of Portugal; yet so deeply is the land indented by arms of the sea that Greece has as many miles of sea coast as Spain and Portugal together, and no spot even in Thessaly or Arcadia is more than forty miles from the sea. The rivers of Greece have the character of torrents, not one being navigable even for boats: few of them have any volume of water in the dry season of the year, the Achelous, which has the respectable course of 100 miles, the Pencus and Alpheus. The other rivers of Greece, however renowned, carry down little water in the summer, and many are at that time dried up altogether. On the N. it was separated by the Cambunian and Ceraunian mountains from Macedonia and Illyria; and on the other three sides it is bounded by the sea: namely, by the Ionian sea on the W., and by the Aegaeon on the E. and S. It is one of the most mountainous countries of Europe, and possesses few extensive plains (those of Thessaly and Boeotia alone are really large), and few continuous valleys. The inhabitants were thus separated from one another by barriers which it was not easy to surmount, and were naturally led to form separate political communities; while the numerous inlets of sea, mentioned above, led to maritime enterprise in most of these small states. Bonds of union for all were found in their national games, which wore the great festivals of their common religion, and in their common Amphictyonic council. At a later time the N. of Greece was generally divided into ten districts: EPIRUS, THESSALIA, ACARNANIA, AETOLIA, DORIS, LOCRIS, PHOCIS, BOEOTIA, ATTICA and MEGARIS. The S. of Greece or Peloponessus was usually divided into ten districts likewise: CORINTHIA, SICYONIA, PHLIASIA, ACHAIA, ELIS, MESSENA, LACONICA, CYNURIA, ARGOLIS and ARCADIA. An account of the geography, early inhabitants, and history of each of these districts is given in separate articles. Of the earliest inhabitants we know very little. The Carians and Leleges were both regarded as barbarous people, and may have been of altogether alien stock. On the other hand, the term 'Pelasgian' seems to have included every prehistoric people of the lands afterwards Hellenic, yet the Pelasgi may have been merely an earlier immigration of the same race. [CARES; LELEGES; PELASGI.] The numerous Phoenician trading ports gave at any rate a large Semitic element alike of blood and of civilisation. [CADMUS.] In Crete especially all those nationalities left their traces. To Homer the Greeks were Achaeans or Argives or Danaï; but the relationship of the Achaeans to the Pelasgi, or whether they were really distinct, remains an open question, as does also the origin of the dynasty which ruled in the Homeric Argos. [ACHAEI; PELOPS.]

* Epirus is, for the sake of convenience, usually included in Hellas by modern geographers, but was excluded by the Greeks themselves, as the Epirots were not regarded as genuine Hellenes.

Graecia Magna or G. Major (ἡ μεγάλη Ἑλλάς), a name given to the districts in the S. of Italy inhabited by the Greeks. This name was never used simply to indicate the S. of Italy; it was always confined to the Greek cities and their territories, and did not include the surrounding districts, inhabited by the Italian tribes. It appears to have been applied chiefly to the cities on the Tarentine gulf, Tarentum, Sybaris, Croton, Caulonia, Siris (Heraclea), Metapontum, Locri, and Rhegium; but it also included the Greek cities on the W. coast, such as Cumae and Neapolis. Strabo extends the appellation even to the Greek cities of Sicily. The name of the country before the Greek colonisation is said to have been OENOTRIA; the first writer who used the term ἡ μεγάλη Ἑλλάς was Polybius (ii. 39; cf. Strab. p. 253). Cicero speaks of Magna Graecia (de Or. iii. 34, &c.). 'Graecia Major' is also found in Livy and Ovid (Liv. xxxi. 7; Ov. Fast. iv. 64).

Graioceles (Caes. B. G. i. 10), a Gallic people of the Cottian Alps, occupying the country between the Ceutrones (who lived in Tarentaise, or upper valley of the Isara), and the Caturiges (who lived in the upper valley of the Durance). Most of them wore the Vocontii (who lived about Grenoble). It is therefore plain that the country of the Graiceli was the Maurienne, or valley of the Arc, on the French side of Mt. Cenis, which pass (or rather the little Mt. Cenis) was crossed by Cacus as the shortest way to Further Gaul. The name lingered in the corrupt form 'Garocelia' for the Maurienne and 'S. Joannes Garocellius' for St. Jean de Maurienne.

Grampus Mons. [GRAUPIUS.]

Granicus (Γράνικος: Koja-Chai), a river of Mysia Minor, rising in M. Cotylus, the N. summit of Ida, and falling into the Propontis (Sea of Marmara): memorable as the scene of the first of the three great victories by which Alexander the Great overthrew the Persian empire (B.C. 334), and, in a less degree, for a victory gained upon its banks by Lucullus over Mithridates, 73 (Il. xii. 21; Strab. p. 587; Arrian, An. 1, 13; Plut. Alex. 24, Lucull. 11).

Granis (Γράνις: Khishi), a river of Persis, with a royal palace on its banks. It fell into the Persian Gulf near Tacoe. (Arrian, Ind. 39).

Granius, Q., a clerk employed by the auctioneers at Rome to collect the money at sales, lived about B.C. 110. He was a friend of Lucilius, and was celebrated for his wit. (Cic. de Or. 60, 244, Brut. 43, 160, ad Att. vi. 3).

Granius Licinianus, a historian, probably of the 2nd century A.D. (Macrob. i. 16, 30; Solin. Polyb. ii. 12). Wrote a short history of the Roman republic in about forty books; parts of books 26, 28, and 36 are extant, relating to events 163-78 B.C. He pays minute attention to omens and prodigies. He alludes (p. 8) to the completion of the Olympieum at Athens: which makes his date at least as late as Hadrian's reign. Ed. by Perz, Lips. 1858.

Granua (Γρανώα: Graan), a river in the land of the Quadi and the SE. of Germany, and a tributary of the Danube, on the banks of which M. Aurelius wrote the 1st book of his Meditations (Antonin. Comment. i. 17).

Grätiae. [CHARITES.]

Grätianus, I. Emperor of the Western Empire, A.D. 367-383, son of Valentinian I., was raised by his father to the rank of Augustus in 367, when he was only eight years old. On the death of Valentinian in 375, Gratian did not succeed to the sole sovereignty; as Valentinian II., the half-brother of Augustus, was proclaimed Augustus by the troops. He was educated by Ausonius, whom he rewarded in 379 with the consulship. By the death of his uncle, Valens (378), the Eastern empire devolved upon him; but the danger to which the East was exposed from the Goths led Gratian to send for Theodosius, and appoint him emperor of the East (379). Gratian was fond of quiet and repose, and was greatly under the influence of ecclesiastics, especially of Ambrose of Milan. He became unpopular with the army. Maximus was declared emperor in Britain, and crossed over to Gaul, where, in the neighbourhood of Paris, he defeated Gratian, who was overtaken and slain in his flight after the battle. (Aurel. Vict. Epit. 45-48; Zos. vi. 12-36; Zonar. xiii.

17; Auson. Gratianum Actio.)—2. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain, and was murdered by his troops about four months afterwards (407) (Oros. vii. 40). He was succeeded by Constantine. [CONSTANTINUS, No. 3.]

Gratianópolis. [CULARO.]

Gratiarum Collis (Χαρίτων λόφος, Hdt. iv. 175: Hills of Tarhounah), a range of wooded hills running parallel to the coast of N. Africa between the Syrtes, and containing the source of the CINYPS and other small rivers.

Gratidiānus. [GRATIDIUS.]

Gratidius, I. M., of Arpinum, great-uncle of Cicero. He proposed a lex tabellaria for Arpinum in 115, and was opposed by Cicero's grandfather, who had married his sister, Gratidia. He was killed in the war of Antonius against the pirates, B.C. 103. (Cic. Legg. iii. 16, 36, Brut. 45, 163).—2. His son, M. Marius Gratidianus, was adopted by the brother of C. Marius, and was proscribed by Sulla and murdered by Catiline. He had been praetor in 86 and had won popular favour by an edict about the coinage. (Cic. Legg. l.c., Brut. l.c., de Off. iii. 16, 67; Plin. xxxiii. 132).—3. M., legate of Q. Cicero in Asia 61-59: perhaps a grandson of No. 1 (Cic. Flacc. 21, 49).

Gratius or Gratius (to whom the cognomen Faliscus is also given, but with no good authority), a contemporary of Ovid (Pont. iv. 16, 34), and the author of an uninteresting didactic poem on Hunting (Cynegetica). Edited in Poet. Lat. Min. by Bährens, Lips. 1879.

Grätus, Valérius, procurator of Judaea from A.D. 15 to 27, and the immediate predecessor of Pontius Pilate (Jos. Ant. xviii. 6).

Graupius Mons, in Caledonia (Grampian Hills). [There is no doubt that Graupius, not Grampius, is the form known to the Romans: though whether Grampian is a corruption of Graupius or preserves the true original name it is impossible to say.] This is a general term for the ranges separating the highlands of Perthshire from the lowlands, and extending to Aberdeenshire. Somewhere at the foot of the Grampians Agricola, having crossed the Forth, fought with Galgacus (Tac. Agr. 29). The site may possibly be, as some maintain, near Comrie in Perthshire, in the valley of the Earn. Here there are traces of a Roman camp at Dalginross, which claims to preserve the name of Galgacus.

Graviscae, an ancient city of Etruria, subject to Tarquinii, was colonised by the Romans B.C. 183, and received new colonists under Augustus. It was situated in the Maremma, and its air was unhealthy (intempestae Graviscae, Virg. Aen. x. 184); whence the ancients ridiculously derived its name from aër gravis. Its ruins are on the right bank of the river Marta, about two miles from the sea, where are the remains of a magnificent arch. (Liv. xl. 29; Vell. Pat. i. 15; Strab. p. 225).

Gregóras, Nicēphórus, a Byzantine historian, about A.D. 1295-1359. His work is in thirty-eight books, of which only twenty-four have been printed. It begins with the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, and goes down to 1359; the twenty-four printed books contain the period from 1204 to 1351. Edited by Schopen, Bonn, 1829.

Grégórius (Γρηγόριος). 1. Surnamed Nazianzēnus, and usually called Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople A.D. 380-390.—2. Nyssenus, bishop of Nyssa about 372-394.—3. Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neocaesarea about A.D. 240. [See Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Grudii, a people in Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii, N. of the Scheldt (Caes. B. G. v. 39).

Grumentum (Grumentinus: Saponara), a town in the interior of Lucania on the road from Beneventum to Heraclea, mentioned in the 2nd Punic war (Liv. xxiii. 37, xxvii. 41; Strab. p. 254).

Grumum (Grumo), a town of Apulia, fourteen miles SW. of Barium (Bari).

Gryllus (Γρύλλος), elder son of Xenophon, fell at the battle of Muntinea, B. C. 362, after he had, according to some accounts, given Epaminondas his mortal wound (Paus. viii. 9, 5, x. 8, 11).

Grÿnïa or -ium (Γρÿνεια, Γρÿνιον: Porto Glymi), a fortified city on the coast of the Sinus Elaïticus, in the S. of Mysia, between Elaea and Myrina, 70 stadia from the former and 40 from the latter; celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo, who is hence called Grynaeus Apollo (Virg. Aen. iv. 345). It possessed also a good harbour. Parmenion, the general of Alexander, destroyed the city (Hdt. i. 149; Strab. p. 622; Diod. xvii. 7).

Gryps or Gryphus (Γρύψ), a fabulous animal, dwelling in the Rhipaeon mountains, between the Hyperboreans and the one-eyed Arimaspians, and guarding the gold of the north. The Arimaspians mounted on horseback, and attempted to steal the gold, and hence arose the hostility between the horse and griffin. (Hdt. iii. 116, iv. 13, 27; Paus. i. 24, 6, viii. 2, 3; Ael. H. A. iv. 27; Plin. vii. 10.) Hesiod seems to have been the first Greek who mentions griffins (Schol. ad Aesch. Pr. 803), and next Aristaeas. The idea of the griffin came from the East: the figure is found in sculptures of Persia, Phoenicia, and Egypt, from which country it passed probably to Mycenae, where a griffin dagger has been found. It is a common figure on vases. The griffin was among the attributes of Apollo.

Gugerni or Guberni, a people of Germany, probably of the same race as the Sigambri, crossed the Rhine, and settled on its left bank, between the Ubii and Batavi (Tac. Hist. iv. 28, v. 16; Plin. iv. 106).

Gulussa, a Numidian, second son of Masinissa, and brother to Micipsa and Mastanabal. On the death of Masinissa, in B. C. 149, he succeeded along with his brothers to the dominions of their father. (Liv. xlii. 23; Pol. xxxix. 1; Sall. Jug. 5, 35.) He left a son, named MASSIVA.

Guntia (Gunzberg), a town in Vindelicia, between Campodunum and Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg).

Gûraeus (Γουραÿος, Γαρρολας), a river of India, flowing through the country of the Guraei (in the NW. of the Punjab) into the Cophen.

Gurulis (Cuglieri), a town in the west of Sardinia, a few miles inland (Ptol. iii. 3, 7).

Guttônes. [GOTH.]

Gÿarus or Gÿara (ή Γÿαρος, τὰ Γÿαρα: Γυαρÿÿς: Chiura or Jura), one of the Cyclades, a small island, twelve miles in circumference, SW. of Andrôs, poor and unproductive, and inhabited only by fishermen (Strab. p. 485; Plin. iv. 69, viii. 82). Under the emperors it was a place of banishment (Aude aliquid brevibus Gyarris et carcere dignum, Juv. i. 78).

Gÿês or Gyges (Γÿÿς, Γÿÿÿς), son of Uranus (Heaven) and Ge (Earth), a hundred-handed giant, who made war upon the gods (Ov. Fast. iv. 593; Hor. Od. ii. 17, 14; GIANTES).

Gÿgaeus Lacus (ή Γÿγαλή λίμνη: Lake of Marmora), a small lake in Lydia, between the rivers Hermus and Hyllus, N. of Sardis, the necropolis of which city was on its banks. It was afterwards called Coloë (Il. xx. 391; Hdt. i. 93; Strab. p. 626).

Gÿgês (Γÿÿÿς), the first king of Lydia of the dynasty of the Merminade, dethroned Candau-les, and succeeded to the kingdom, as related under CANDAULES. He reigned B. C. 716-678. He sent magnificent presents to Delphi, and carried on various wars with the cities of Asia Minor, such as Miletus, Smyrna, Colophon, and Magnesia. 'The riches of Gyges' became a proverb (Hdt. i. 7-14; Paus. iv. 21, 5).

Gÿlippus (Γÿλίππος), a Spartan, son of Cleandridas, was sent as the Spartan commander to Syracuse, to oppose the Athenians, B. C. 414. Under his command the Syracusans annihilated the great Athenian armament, and took Demosthenes and Nicias prisoners, 413. (Thuc. vi. 93-vii. 86, viii. 13.) In 404 he was commissioned by Lysander, after the capture of Athens, to carry home the treasure; but by opening the seams of the sacks underneath, he abstracted a considerable portion. The theft was discovered, and Gylippus went into exile. (Plut. Lys. 16, Nic. 28; Diod. xiii. 106; Athen. p. 234.)

Gymnêsïae. [BALEARES.]

Gymnosophistae (Γυμνοσοφισταί), a sect of Indian ascetic philosophers, who went about naked (Curt. viii. 9, 33; Plut. Alex. 64).

Gynaecôpôlis (Γυναϊκόπολις or Γυναϊκῶν πόλις), a city in the Delta of Egypt, on the W. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Momemphis.

Gyndes (Γÿνδÿς), a river of Assyria, rising in the country of the Matieni (in Kurdistan), and flowing into the Tigris, celebrated through the story that Cyrus the Great drew off its waters by 360 channels (Hdt. i. 189).

Gyrtôn, Gyrtôna (Γυρτῶν, Γυρτῶνη: Γυρτῶνιος: nr. Tatari, Ru.), an ancient town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, on the Peneus (Il. ii. 738; Thuc. ii. 22; Strab. p. 439).

Gÿthëum, Gythium (τὸ Γÿθειον, Γÿθειον: Γυθειῶτης: Palaeopolis, nr. Marathonisi), an ancient town on the coast of Laconia, founded by the Achaeans, lay near the head of the Laconian bay, SW. of the mouth of the river Eurotas. It served as the harbour of Sparta, and was important from a military point of view. In the Persian war the Lacedaemonian fleet was stationed at Gytheum, and the Athenians under Tolmides burnt the Lacedaemonian arsenal, B. C. 455 (Thuc. i. 102). After the battle of Leuctra (370) it was taken by Epaminondas (Xen. Hell. vi. 5, 32). In 195 it was taken by Flamininus, and made independent of Nabis, tyrant of Sparta; whereupon it joined the Achaean League (Liv. xxxiv. 29; Strab. p. 363; Paus. iii. 21, 8).

Gyzantes (Γÿζαντες), a people in the W. part of Libya (N. Africa), whose country was rich in honey and wax. Probably dwelt in Byzacium.

H.

Hādês or Plûto (Ἅιδης, Πλούτων, or poetically Ἄιδης, Ἄιδωνεύς, Πλουτεύς), the God of the Nether World. His name is from ἄ-ιδεÿν (the dark, unseen god): a less probable suggestion is 'the god of the earth or underworld' from ala. Hades was son of Cronus and Rhea, and brother of Zeus and Poseidon (Il. xv. 187). Hesiod (Th. 453) adds two other sisters, Hestia and Demeter. His wife was Persephônê or Proserpina, the daughter of Demeter, whom he carried off from the upper world, as is related elsewhere. [DEMETER; PERSEPHONE.] In the division of the world among the three brothers, Hades obtained the Nether World, the abode of the shades, over which he ruled. Hence he is called the infernal Zeus (Ζεὺς καταχθόνιος or χθόνιος), or the king of the shades (ἄναξ ἐνέρον). (Il. ix. 457, xv. 191; Aesch. Pr. 627; Paus. ii. 24, 4.) He possessed a helmet (like the 'cap of darkness' in Northern myths) which rendered the wearer invisible, and later traditions stated that this helmet was given him as a present by the Cyclopes after their delivery from Tartarus. Ancient story mentions both gods and men who were honoured by Hades with the temporary use of this helmet. (Il. v. 845; Hes. Scut. 22; Aristoph. Ach. 390; Apollod. i. 6, 2.) His character is described as fierce and inexorable, whence of all the gods he was most hated by mortals. He kept the gates of the lower world closed (and is therefore called Πυλάρτης), that no shades might be able to escape or return to the region of light (Il. viii. 367; Paus. v. 20¹).

the surnames which described him personally, or his realm, such as Πολυδέγμων, he was known as Clymenus 'the Illustrious' (perhaps to propitiate him) at Hermione (Paus. ii. 35, 5), and in the Eleusinian mysteries as Eubuleus, i.e. the god who counsels well for mankind in giving them rest from their labours (Cornut. N. D. 35). The name Pluto (Πλούτων) marks a new departure in his attributes. As Hades he was the severe and sterile god, giving no fruits and father of no children (that he was father of the Furies is a late tradition cf. Servius, ad Aen. i. 86). But, perhaps from the influence of the Eleusinian mysteries, the god of the underworld came to be regarded as the god of the earth and all that it gives (an old and primitive idea of course, but new as applied to Hades). Therefore wealth and fruits were given by him, and he was worshipped as Πλούτων (carefully to be distinguished from the personified riches Πλοῦτος, or Plutus). The name is first traceable in the Attic writers early in the fifth cent. B. C. and eventually prevailed, though not to the entire exclusion of the name Ἅιδης (cf. Plat. Crat. p. 403). In art the representations of Hades (not frequent) have the same character as those of Zeus, but are distinguished by the sterner countenance, the shaggy hair (sometimes with a wolfskin cap) and beard, and attributes such as the cock, the wolf, and the pomegranate, or Cerberus at his side. As Pluto or Ἅιδης-Πλούτων the god has a more gracious expression, and the attributes also vary: most frequently he has a cornucopia and carries a sceptre or a two-pronged fork, which some take for an agricultural implement, and others believe to be a late and spurious addition. The figures of Serapis or Zeus-Serapis have often been confused with those of Hades-Pluto, because Serapis is represented with a three-headed dog beside him. His distinguishing mark is the modius upon

Hades and Persephone seated on a throne and engaged apparently in earnest conversation. Above the god is the inscription ΕΙΤΑ, i.e. Hades, and above the goddess ΠΗΡΣΙΠΝΑΙ, i.e. Persephone. From an Etruscan tomb at Orvieto. (Dennis, Etruria, II. 58.)

When mortals invoked him, they struck the earth with their hands; the sacrifices which were offered to him and Persephone consisted of black sheep; and the person who offered the sacrifice had to turn away his face (Il. ix. 567; Od. x. 527). The ensign of his power was a staff, with which, like Hermes, he drove the shades into the lower world. There he sat upon a throne with his consort Persephone, as grim in appearance (in this period of the myth) as himself (Il. ix. 457; Pind. Ol. ix. 35). He appears seldom in story, since he rarely left his nether realm. The exceptions were, when he carried off Persephone, and when he went to Olympus to be cured by Paeon of the wound dealt to him by Heracles (Il. v. 395). Besides his head. [SERAPIS.]—The kingdom of Hades, i.e. the underworld. The Homeric Hades is a dark sunless abode within the earth, the entrance to which lies in a grove of black poplars beyond the stream of Ocean (Il. xx. 61; Od. x. 508). Here are the asphodel meadows, a dull and cheerless place (Od. xi. 489), even if Orion can still pursue his occupation of hunting (Od. xi. 539, 573, xxiv. 13). Beyond this was Erebus, the place of darkness and the abode of Hades and Persephone, to which Odysseus did not penetrate. There is a general idea of vastness and of gloom or twilight with unsubstantial inarticulate ghosts, who twitter like bats, flitting about among whom appear more distinctly the figures of the heroes. The dead in Od. xi. arc unsubstantial images of the living persons without flesh or bones or recollection; yet consciousness and memory can be recalled when they drink the blood. But even in Homer besides this unreal, impersonal existence there are traces of a belief in conscious life, as in the twenty-fourth book of the Odyssey. The descriptions of Minos, Orion and Heracles remaining their old life, and the punishment of Tantalus and Sisyphus would also imply a conscious life; but there are reasons for considering the whole passage in Od. xi. 565-627 a later introduction; and such probably is the 24th book also. In post-Homeric authors rocky hollows or caves are regarded as entrances to Hades: e.g. those at Colonus, the Italian Cumae, Hermione and Taenarus, and the approach is cut off by streams flowing underground [STYX, COCYTUS, ACHERON]; over these the buried dead are ferried by CHARON, and on the opposite shore CERBERUS keeps guard. The underworld is regarded now (which it probably was not to Homer) as a place where the life of the upper world and its amusements can be repeated. It is also a place of retribution [see TANTALUS, SISYPHUS, ION, DANAEDES]. The dead are judged, the Asiatics by Rhadamanthus, the Europeans by Aeacus, Minos being the referee for doubtful cases (Plat. Gorg. p. 524). Triptolemus also in the Eleusinian account acts as a judge. This difference of state led to the separation of Tartarus (in Homer only the prison of Titans) from the rest of Hades by the blazing Pyriphlegethon which flows between (cf. Plat. Rep. x. p. 616 A; Verg. Aen. vi. 548). In the asphodel meadows were those who deserved neither great bliss nor punishment: the places of reward were separate altogether. [ELYSIUM, FORTUNATORUM INSULAE.] In Virgil, however (Aen. vi.), Elysium is placed in Hades. Although a more hopeful conception of the future life was introduced with the Eleusinian religion and by the philosophers, and the underworld was not like that of Homer, to which Achilles would prefer the life of a serf, yet very few Greeks looked forward to it as a gain in comparison with life in the upper world. The Roman Orcus was in the main borrowed, through poets and works of art, from the Greek idea, but with certain survivals of Italian belief [see LARES, MANES, LEMURES].

The art representations of the underworld are frequent in vase paintings; the punishments of Sisyphus &c. date back as far as black-figure vases of the seventh century B. C. It is probable that such paintings, especially those of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi (Paus. x. 19), did not merely follow the popular idea but in some measure formed it.

Hadrānum. [ADRANUM.]

Hādria. [ADRIA.]

Hadiāni or Adriāni, near the river Rhynadacus, on the frontiers of Mysia and Bithynia.

Hadiāniōpōlis. 1. ('Αδριανόπολις: 'Αδριανοπολιτης: Adrianople), a town in Thrace, on the right bank of the Hebrus, in an extensive plain, founded by the emperor Hadrian. It was strongly fortified; possessed an extensive commerce; and in the middle ages was the most important town in the country after Constantinople. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11; Eutrop. vi. 8.)—

2. A town in Bithynia.—3. A town of Phrygia.

Hadiāniōthēra or -ae ('Αδριανουθήρα), a city in Mysia, on the road between Pergamus and Miletopolis, founded by the emperor Hadrian (Dio Cass. lxi. 10; Vit. Hadr. 20).

Hadiānius, P. Aelius, usually called Hadrian, Roman emperor, A.D. 117-138, was born at Rome, A.D. 76. His family belonged, like that of Trajan, to Italica, in Spain. He lost his father at the age of ten, and was brought up by his kinsman Ulpius Trajanus (afterwards emperor) and by Caelius Attianus. From an early age he studied with zeal the Greek language and literature. At the age of fifteen he went to Spain, where he entered upon his military career: and he subsequently served as military tribune in Lower Moesia. After the elevation of Trajan to the throne (98), he married Julia Sabina, a grand-daughter of Trajan's sister Marciana. This marriage was brought about through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan; and from this time Hadrian rose rapidly in the emperor's favour. He was raised successively to the quaestorship (101), praetorship (107), and consulship (109). He accompanied Trajan in most of his expeditions, and distinguished himself in the second war against the Dacians, 104-106; was made governor of Pannonia in 108; and subsequently fought under Trajan against the Parthians. When Trajan's serious illness obliged him to leave the East, he placed Hadrian at the head of the army. Trajan died at Cilicia on his journey to Rome (117). Before his death, as was alleged, probably influenced by Plotina, he appointed Hadrian as his successor. Hadrian was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria, and the senate ratified the election. Hadrian's first care was to make peace with the Parthians, which he obtained by relinquishing the conquests of Trajan east of the Euphrates. He returned to Rome in 118, but almost immediately afterwards set out for Moesia, in consequence of the invasion of this province by the Sarmatians. After making peace with the Sarmatians, and suppressing a formidable conspiracy which had been formed against his life by some of the most distinguished Roman nobles, all of whom he put to death, he returned to Rome in the course of the same year. He sought to obtain the goodwill of the senate by gladiatorial exhibitions and liberal largesses, and he also cancelled all arrears of taxes due to the state for the last fifteen years. The remainder of Hadrian's reign was disturbed by few wars. He spent the greater part of his reign in travelling through the various provinces of the empire, in order that he might inspect personally the state of affairs in the provinces, and apply the necessary remedies wherever mismanagement was discovered. He began these travels in 119, visiting first Gaul, Germany, and Britain, in the latter of which countries he caused a wall to be built from the Solway to the mouth of the river Tyne. [BRITANNIA.] He afterwards visited Spain, Africa, and the East, and took up his residence at Athens for three years (123-126). Athens was his favourite city, and he conferred upon its inhabitants many privileges. The most important war during his reign was that against the Jews, which broke out in 131. The Jews had revolted in consequence of the establishment of a colony under the name of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem, and of their having been forbidden to practise the rite of circumcision. The war was carried on by the Jews as a national struggle with the most desperate fury, and was not brought to an end till 136, after the country had been nearly reduced to a wilderness. During the last few years of Hadrian's life, his health failed. He became suspicious and cruel, and put to death several persons of distinction. As he had no children, he adopted L. Aelius Verus, and gave him the title of Caesar in 136. Verus died on the 1st of January, 138, whereupon Hadrian adopted Antoninus, afterwards surnamed Pius, and conferred upon him likewise the title of Caesar. In July in the same year, Hadrian himself died, in his 62nd year, and was succeeded by ANTONINUS.—The reign of Hadrian may be regarded as one of the happiest periods in Roman history. His policy was to preserve peace with foreign nations, and not to extend the boundaries of the empire, but to secure the old provinces, and promote their welfare. He paid particular attention to the administration of justice in the provinces as well as in Italy. His reign forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. It was at Hadrian's command that the jurist Salvius Julianus drew up the edictum perpetuum, which formed a fixed code of laws. Some of the laws promulgated by Hadrian are of a truly humane character, and aimed at improving the public morality of the time. The various cities which he visited received marks of his favour or liberality; in many places he built aqueducts, and in others harbours or other public buildings, either for use or ornament. But what has rendered his name more illustrious than anything else are the numerous and magnificent architectural works which he planned and commenced during his travels, especially at Athens, in the S. part of which he built an entirely new city, 'Novae Athenæ.' We cannot here enter into an account of the numerous buildings he erected; it is sufficient to direct attention to his villa at Tibur, which has been a real mine of treasures of art, and his mausoleum at Rome, which forms the groundwork of the present Castle of St. Angelo. Hadrian was a patron of learning and literature, as well as of the arts, and he cultivated the society of poets, scholars, rhetoricians, and philosophers. He founded at Rome a scientific institution under the name of Athenæum, which continued to flourish for a long time after him. He was himself an author, and wrote numerous works both in prose and in verse, all of which are lost, with the exception of a few epigrams in the Greek and Latin Anthologies, which lack evidence of their authorship. The well known address to his soul—

Animula vagula blandula,
Hospes comesque corporis,
Quae nunc abis in loca
Fulidula, rigida, nudula—
Nec ut soles dabis jocos?

is attributed to him by his biographer. (Life of Hadrian in Script. Hist. Aug.; Dio Cass. lxi.; Aurel. Vict. Ep. 14; Zonar. xi. 23.)

Hadriānus, the rhetorician. [ADRIANUS.]

Hadrūmētum or Adrūmētum (Ἄδρῦμη; Hannemim), a flourishing city founded by the Phoenicians in N. Africa, on the E. coast of Byzacena, of which district it was the capital under the Romans. It had not sided with Carthage and was left a free city after the third Punic war. Trajan made it a colony; and it was afterwards called Justinianopolis. (Strab. p. 884; Sall. Jug. 19; Plin. v. 25; Pol. xv. 5; Procop. B. V. i. 17, ii. 23.)

Haemon (Ἄιμων). 1. Son of Pelasgus and father of Thessalus, from whom the ancient name of Thessaly, Haemonia or Aemonia, was believed to be derived. The Roman poets frequently use the adjective Haemonius as equivalent to Thessalian. (Strab. p. 443; Dionys. i. 17; Plin. iv. 28.)—2. Son of Lyacon, and the reputed founder of Haemacia in Arcadia (Paus. vii. 44).—3. Son of Creon of Thebes, was destroyed, according to some accounts, by the sphinx (Apollod. iii. 5, 8). But, according to other traditions, he was in love with Antigone, and killed himself on hearing that she was condemned by his father to be entombed alive. [ANTIGONE.]

Haemōnia (Ἄιμωνία). [HAEMON, No. 1.]

Haemus (Ἄιμος), son of Boreas and Orithyia (wife of Rhodope), and father of Hebrus. As he and his wife presumed to assume the names of Zeus and Hera, both were metamorphosed into mountains. (Ov. Met. vi. 87.)

Haemus (ὁ Ἄϊμος, τὸ Ἄϊμον: Balkan), a lofty range of mountains, separating Thrace and Moesia, extended from M. Scomius, or, according to Herodotus, from M. Rhodope on the W. to the Black Sea on the E. The highest point of the range is about 8000 feet above the sea. There are several passes over them; but the one most used in antiquity was in the W. part of the range, called 'Succi' or 'Succorum angustiae,' also 'Porta Trajani' (Sulu Derbend), between Philippopolis and Serdica (Sophia). The later province of 'Haemimontus' in Thrace derived its name from this mountain. (Hdt. iv. 49; Strab. p. 313; Amm. Marc. xxi. 10, xxvii. 4.)

Hagno (Ἀγνώ), the nymph of a spring on Mt. Lycæus in Arcadia. The local legend makes this the birthplace of Zeus, who was brought up by the nymph. In times of drought the priest of Zeus Lycæus conjured rain by dipping an oak bough into the spring of Hagno. (Paus. viii. 31, 2; 32, 2; 47, 2.)

Hagnon (Ἀγνων), an Athenian who founded the colony of ἈΜΦΙΠΟΛΙΣ, B.C. 437 (Thuc. iv. 102; Diod. xii. 32).

Hagnūs (Ἀγνοῦς, -οὔντος: Ἀγνοῦσίος; near Markopulo), a demus in Attica, W. of Paeania, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Halae (Ἁλαί, Ἁλαί, Ἁλαί: Ἀλαιεύς). 1. H. Araphēnides (Ἀραφήνιδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, was situated on the E. coast of Attica, and served as the harbour of Brauron: it possessed a temple of Artemis (Strab. pp. 339, 446).—2. H. Aexōnides (Ἀἰξωνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, situated on the W. coast (Strab. p. 398).—3. A town, formerly of the Opuntii Locri, afterwards of Boeotia, situated on the Opuntian gulf (Strab. p. 405).

Hales (Ἁλῆς). 1. A river of Ionia in Asia Minor, near Colophon, celebrated for the coldness of its water (Liv. xxxvii. 36).—2. A river in the island of Cos.

Halēsa (Ἀλαῖσα: Halesinus: Torre di Pittineo), a town on the N. coast of Sicily, on the river Halēsus (Pittineo), was founded by the Greek mercenaries of Archonides, a chief of the Siculi, and was originally called Archonidion. It was in later times a municipium, exempt from taxes. (Strab. pp. 266, 272; Cic. Verr. iii. 73; Diod. xiv. 16.)

Halēsus, a chief of the Auruncans and Oscans, the son of a soothsayer, and an ally of Turnus, was slain by Evander. He came to Italy from Argos in Greece, whence he is called Agamemnonius, Atrides, or Argolicus. He is said to have founded the town of Falerii. (Ov. Am. iii. 13, 31; Fast. iv. 73; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 723; Plin. iii. 51.)

Halex. [ALEX.]

Haliacmon (Ἁλιάκμων: Vistritza), an important river in Macedonia, rises in the Tymphaean mountains, forms the boundary between Eoræa and Pieria, and falls into the Thermaic gulf in Bottiaeiis (Hdt. vii. 127; Strab. p. 330). Caesar (B. C. iii. 36) incorrectly makes it the boundary between Macedonia and Thessaly.

Haliartus (Ἁλιάρτος: Ἀλιάρτιος: Mazî), an ancient town in Boeotia on the S. of the lake Copais. It was destroyed by Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480), but was rebuilt, and appears as an important place in the Peloponnesian war. Under its walls Lysander lost his life (395). It was destroyed by the Romans (171), because it supported Perseus, king of Macedonia, and its territory was given to the Athenians. (Il. ii. 593; Hymn. in Apoll. 243; Strab. p. 411; Paus. ix. 32, 5.)

Haliās (Ἁλιάς: Ἀλιεύς), a district on the coast of Argolis between Asine and Hermione, so called because fishing was the chief occupation of its inhabitants. Their town was called Haliæ (Ἁλιαί) or Haliēs (Ἀλιεῖς) Strab. p. 373.)

Halicarnassus (Ἀλικαρνασσός, Ion. Ἀλικαρνησσός: Ἀλικαρνασσεύς, Halicarnassensis, Halicarnassius: Budrum, Ru.), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, stood in the SW. part of Caria, on the N. coast of the Sinus Ceramicus, opposite to the island of Cos. It was said to have been founded by Dorians from Troezen, and was at first called Zephyra. It was one of the six cities that originally formed the Dorian Hexapolis, but it was early excluded from the confederacy, as a punishment for the violation, by one of its citizens, of a law connected with the common worship of the Triopian Apollo. (Hdt. i. 144.) With the rest of the coast of Asia Minor, it fell under the dominion of the Persians, at an early period of whose rule Lygdamis made himself tyrant of the city, and founded a dynasty which lasted for some generations. His daughter Artemisia assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece [ARTEMISIA, No. 1]. Her grandson Lygdamis was overthrown by a revolution, in which Herodotus is said to have taken part [HERODOTUS]. In the Peloponnesian war, we find Halicarnassus, with the other Dorian cities of Caria, on the side of the Atheuian; but we do not know what was its form of government, until the re-establishment, by HECATOMNUS, of a dynasty ruling over all Caria, with its capital first at Mylasa, and afterwards at Halicarnassus, and virtually independent of Persia: before B.C. 380. It seems not unlikely that both this and the older dynasty of tyrants of Halicarnassus, were a race of native Carian princes, whose ascendancy at Halicarnassus may be accounted for by the prevalence of the Carian element in its population at an early period. Hecatomnus left three sons and two daughters, who all succeeded to his throne in the following order: Mausolus, Artemisia, Idrieus, Ada, Pixodarus, and Ada again. In B.C. 334, Alexander took the city, after an obstinate defence by the Persian general Memnon, and destroyed it (Arrian, An. i. 23). From this blow it never recovered, although it continued to be celebrated for the Mausoleum, a magnificent edifice which Artemisia II. built as a tomb for Mausolus, and which was adorned with the works of the most eminent Greek sculptors of the age. Fragments of these sculptures, which were discovered built into the walls of the citadel of Budrum, are now in the British Museum [Dict. of Antiq. art. Mausoleum]. With the rest of Caria, Halicarnassus was assigned by the Romans, after their victory over Antiochus the Great, to the government of Rhodes, and was afterwards united to the province of Asia. The city was very strongly fortified, and had a fine harbour, which was protected by the island of ARCONNESUS: its citadel was called Salmacis (Σαλμακίς) from the name of a spring which rose from the hill on which it stood. Halicarnassus was the birthplace of the historians HERODOTUS and DIONYSIUS. (Hdt. i. 144, iii. 14, vii. 99; Strab. pp. 653, 656; Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 1; Tac. Ann. iv. 55.)

Halicýae (Ἁλικύαι: Halicyensis), a town in the NW. of Sicily, between Entella and Lilybaeum, was long in the possession of the Carthaginians, and in Cicero's time was a municipium (Diod. xiv. 48; Cic. Verr. iii. 7, 40).

Halimūs (Ἀλιμοῦς, -οὔντος: Ἀλιμούσιος), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, on the W. coast, a little S. of Athens.

Halirrhōthius (Ἀλῤῥόθιος), son of Poseidon and Enryte, attempted to violate Alcippe, daughter of Ares and Agrauros, but was slain by Ares. Ares was brought to trial by Poseidon for this murder, on the hill at Athens, which was hence called Areiopagus, or the Hill of Ares. (Apollod. iii. 14, 2; Paus. i. 21, 7, 28, 5.) Another story makes Halirrhothius fall by his own axe when he was trying to cut the sacred olive of Athene (Serv. ad Georg. i. 18).

Haliūsa (Ἀλιούσα: ? Karavi), an island in the Argolic gulf (Paus. ii. 34, 8).

Halizōnes (Ἀλιζώνες, and -οί), a people of Bithynia, with a capital city Alybe (Ἀλύβη), mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans (Il. ii. 856, v. 39; Strab. pp. 549, 677).

Halmydessus. [SALMYDESSUS.]

Halmýris (Ἀλμυρίς, sc. λίμνη), a bay of the Black Sea formed by the S. mouth of the Danube, with a town of the same name (Plin. iv. 79).

Halōnēsus (Ἀλόνησος, Ἀλόνησος: Ἀλονήσιος, Ἀλονησίτης: Khiliodoromia), an island of the Aegaean sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and E. of Sciathos and Peparethos, with a town of the same name upon it. The possession of this island occasioned great disputes between Philip and the Athenians: there is a speech on this subject among the extant orations of Demosthenes, but it was probably written by Hegesippus, who was head of the embassy sent to demand restitution of the island. (Strab. p. 436; Ptol. iii. 13, 47; Dem. de Cor. p. 248, § 69; Aeschin. Otes. 80.)

Halōsydnē (Ἀλοσύδνη), 'the Sea-born,' a surname of Amphitrite and Thetis (Od. iv. 404; Il. xx. 207).

Haluntium. [ALUNTIIUM.]

Halus. [ALUS.]

Halýcus (Ἁλυκος: Platani), a river in the S. of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Heraclaea (Diod. xv. 17, xvi. 82).

Hálys (Ἁλυσ: Kizil-Irmak, i.e. the Red River), the greatest river of Asia Minor, rises in that part of the Anti-Taurus range called the Paryadres, on the borders of Armenia Minor and Pontus, and after flowing W. by S. through Cappadocia, turns to the N. and flows through Galatia to the borders of Paphlagonia, where it takes a NE. direction, dividing Paphlagonia from Pontus, and at last falls into the Euxine (Black Sea) between Sinope and Amisus. In early times it was a most important boundary, ethnographical as well as political. It divided the Indo-European races which peopled the W. part of Asia Minor from the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) races of the rest of SW. Asia; and it separated the Lydian empire from the Medo-Persian, until, by marching over it to meet Cyrus, Croesus began the contest which ended in the overthrow of the Lydian empire. (Hdt. i. 53, 72, 75; Strab. pp. 534, 544, 546.)

Hamadrýades. [NÝMPHAE.]

Hamæ, a town in Campania, between Capua and Cumae (Liv. xxiii. 35).

Hamaxítus (Ἀμαξιτός), a small town on the coast of the Troad, near the promontory Iectum; said to have been the first settlement of the Teucric immigrants from Croto. The surrounding district was called Ἀμαξιτία. Lysimachus removed the inhabitants to Alexandria Troas. Near Hamaxitus was a temple of Apollo Smintheus, regarding which Strabo tells a story that the colonists had been told to settle where their enemies issued from the earth, and that at this spot their leathern shields were devoured by an army of field mice (Strab. p. 604; cf. Ael. H. A. xii. 5). For the various explanations of Apollo Smintheus, see p. 89. Some support for the belief that the myth refers, not to a totem, but to a real plague of mice or voles may be derived from Aristot. H. A. vi. 37, p. 580 B.

Hamaxōbii (Ἀμαξόβιοι), a people in European Sarmatia, in the neighbourhood of the Palus Maeotis, were a nomad race, as their name signifies (Ptol. iii. 5, 19).

Hāmilcar (Ἀμίλκας). 1. Son of Hanno, or Mago, commander of the great Carthaginian expedition to Sicily, B.C. 480, which was defeated and almost destroyed by Gelo at Himera. [GELÓ.] Hamilcar fell in the battle (Hdt. vii. 156).—2. Surnamed Rhodanus, was sent by the Carthaginians to Alexander after the fall of Tyre, B.C. 332. On his return home he was put to death by the Carthaginians for having betrayed their interests (Justin. xxi. 6).—3. Carthaginian governor in Sicily at the time that Agathocles was rising into power. At first he supported the party at Syracuse which had driven Agathocles into exile, but he afterwards espoused the cause of Agathocles, who was thus enabled to make himself master of Syracuse, 317 (Justin. xxii. 2; Diod. xix. 5, 71).—4. Son of Gisco, succeeded the preceding as Carthaginian commander in Sicily, 311. He carried on war against Agathocles, whom he defeated with great slaughter, and then obtained possession of the greater part of Sicily; but he was taken prisoner while besieging Syracuse, and was put to death by Agathocles (Diod. xx. 29; Justin. xxii. 7).—5. A Carthaginian general in the first Punic war, must be carefully distinguished from the great Hamilcar Barca [No. 6]. In the third year of the war (262) he succeeded Hanno in the command in Sicily, and carried on the operations by land with success. He made himself master of Enna and Camarina, and fortified Drepanum. In 257 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet on the N. coast of Sicily, and fought a naval action with the Roman consul C. Atilius Regulus. In the following year (256), he and Hanno commanded the great Carthaginian fleet which was defeated by the two consuls M. Atilius Regulus and L. Marcius Vulso, off Ecuomus, on the S. coast of Sicily. He was afterwards one of the commanders of the land forces in Africa opposed to Regulus (Diod. xxiii. 9; Pol. i. 24–30).—6. Surnamed Barca, an epithet supposed to be related to the Hebrew Barak, and to signify 'lightning.' It was merely a personal appellation, and is not to be regarded as a family name, though from the great distinction that he obtained, we often find the name of Barcine applied either to his family or to his party in the state. He was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily, in the eighteenth year of the first Punic war, 247. At this time the Romans were masters of the whole of Sicily, with the exception of Drepanum and Lilybaeum, both of which were blockaded by them on the land side. Hamilcar established himself with his whole army on a mountain named Heretè (Monte Pellegrino), in the midst of the enemy's country, and in the immediate neighbourhood of Panormus, one of their most important cities. Here he succeeded in maintaining his ground, to the astonishment alike of friends and foes, for nearly three years. In 244 he abruptly quitted Heretè, and took up a still stronger position on Mt. Eryx, after seizing the town of that name. Here he also maintained himself in spite of all the efforts of the Romans to dislodge him. After the great naval defeat of the Carthaginians by Lutatius Catulus (241), Hamilcar, who was still at Eryx, was entrusted by the Carthaginian government with the conclusion of the peace with the Romans. (Pol. i. 56-66; Zonar. viii. 16; Nep. Hamilc. 1.)—On his return home, he had to carry on war in Africa with the Carthaginian mercenaries, whom he succeeded in subduing after an arduous struggle of three years (240-238) (Pol. i. 86-88). Hamilcar now formed the project of establishing in Spain a new empire, which should not only be a source of strength and wealth to Carthage, but should be the point from whence he might at a subsequent period renew hostilities against Rome. He crossed over into Spain soon after the termination of the war with the mercenaries; but we know nothing of his operations in the country, save that he obtained possession of a considerable portion of Spain, partly by force of arms, and partly by negotiation (App. Hispan. 4; Pol. iii. 9). After remaining in Spain nearly nine years, he fell in battle (228) against the Vettones (Nep. Hamilc. 3; Strab. p. 139; Liv. xxiv. 41). He was succeeded in the command by his son-in-law, Hasdrubal. Cato the elder bore testimony to his work in Spain when he exclaimed that there had been no king worthy to rank with Hamilcar. He left three sons, the celebrated Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Mago.—7. Son of Gisco, Carthaginian governor of Melite (Malta), which surrendered to the Romans, 218 (Liv. xxi. 51).—8. Son of Bomilcar, one of the generals in Spain, 215, with Hasdrubal and Mago, the two sons of Barca. The three generals were defeated by the two Scipios, while besieging Illiturgi. (Liv. xxii. 49).—9. A Carthaginian, who excited a general revolt of the Gauls in Upper Italy, about 200, and took the Roman colony of Placentia. On the defeat of the Gauls by the consul Cethegus in 197, he was taken prisoner. (Liv. xxiii. 33.)

Hannibal (Ἀννίβας). 1. Son of Gisco, and grandson of HAMILCAR [No. 1]. In 409 he was sent to Sicily, at the head of a Carthaginian army to assist the Segestans against the Selinuntines. He took Selinus, and subsequently Himera also. In 406 he again commanded a Carthaginian army in Sicily along with Himilco, but died of a pestilence while besieging Agrigentum. (Diod. xiii. 48-86; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 37.)

—2. Son of Gisco, was the Carthaginian commander at Agrigentum, when it was besieged by the Romans, 262. After standing a siege of seven months, he broke through the enemy's lines, leaving the town to its fate. After this he carried on the contest by sea, and for the next year or two ravaged the coast of Italy; but in 260 he was defeated by the consul Duilius. In 259 he was sent to the defence of Sardinia. Here he was again unfortunate, and was seized by his own mutinous troops, and put to death (Pol. i. 17-24; Zonar. viii. 10).—3. Son of Hamilcar (perhaps HAMILCAR, No. 5), succeeded in carrying succours of men and provisions to Lilybæum, when it was besieged by the Romans, 250 (Pol. i. 44).—4. A general in the war of the Carthaginians against the mercenaries (240-238), was taken prisoner by the insurgents, and crucified (Pol. i. 82).—5. Son of Hamilar Barca, and one of the most illustrious generals of antiquity, was born B. C. 247. He was only nine years old when his father took him with him into

Spain, and it was on this occasion that Hamilcar made him swear upon the altar eternal hostility to Rome. (Nep. Hann. 2; Pol. iii. 11; Liv. xxi. 1; Appian, Hispan. 9; Val. Max. ix. 3, 8.) Child as he then was, Hannibal never forgot his vow, and his whole life was one continual struggle against the power and domination of Rome. He was early trained in arms under the eye of his father, and was present with him in the battle in which Hamilcar perished (228). Though only eighteen years old at this time, he had already displayed so much courage and capacity for war, that he was entrusted by Hasdrubal (the son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar) with the chief command of most of the military enterprises planned by that general. He secured to himself the devoted attachment of the army under his command; and, accordingly, on the assassination of Hasdrubal (220), the soldiers unanimously proclaimed their youthful leader commander-in-chief, and the government at Carthage ratified the choice. Hannibal was at this time in the twenty-sixth year of his age. There can be no doubt that he already looked forward to the invasion and conquest of Italy as the goal of his ambition; but it was necessary for him first to complete the work which had been so ably begun by his two predecessors, and to establish the Carthaginian power as firmly as possible in Spain. In two campaigns he subdued all the country S. of the Iberus, with the exception of the wealthy town of Saguntum. In the spring of 219 he proceeded to lay siege to Saguntum, which he took after a desperate resistance, which lasted nearly eight months (Pol. iii. 17; Liv. xxi. 6). Saguntum lay S. of the Iberus, and was therefore not included under the protection of the treaty which had been made between Hasdrubal and the Romans; but as it had concluded an alliance with the Romans, the latter regarded its attack as a violation of the treaty between the two nations. On the fall of Saguntum, the Romans demanded the surrender of Hannibal; and when this demand was refused, war was declared, and thus began the long and arduous struggle called the second Punic war. In the spring of 218 Hannibal quitted his winter-quarters at New Carthage and began his march to Italy with 50,000 infantry and 9,000 cavalry. He crossed the Pyrenees, and marched along the S. coast of Gaul. The Romans sent the consul P. Scipio to oppose him in Gaul; but when Scipio arrived in Gaul, he found that Hannibal had already reached the Rhone, and that it was impossible to overtake him. After Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, he continued his march up the left bank of the river as far as its confluence with the Isère. Here he struck away to the right and began his passage across the Alps. He probably crossed the Alps either by the pass of Mont Genève or that of the Col de l'Argentière [see ALPES, p. 55].* His army suffered

* It is impossible here to give in detail the reasons for adopting this view. They are in the main those set forth by Mr. Freshfield (Alp. Journ. xi. 274, where, however, the Argentière is preferred), and followed by Arnold, Second Punic War, ed. 1886. It will suffice to state here (1) that the Little St. Bernard cannot be reconciled with Polybius: the W. side does not really agree with his narrative, and the long and broken valley of Aosta could not possibly be traversed in the two days and a half which he gives from the summit to the plains of the Po; (2) that the two passes mentioned above (which coincide for a great part of the route) suit the narrative of Polybius better than the Mont Cenis, and are the only passes that agree with the narrative both of Polybius and of Livy: and they much from the attacks of the Gaulish mountaineers and from the natural difficulties of the road, which were enhanced by the lateness of the season (the beginning of October, at which time the snows had already commenced in the Alps). (Pol. iii. 40-56; Liv. xxi. 21-37; Strab. p. 209; Varro, ap. Serv. ad Aen. x. 13.) So heavy were his losses, that when he at length emerged into the plains of the Po, he had with him no more than 20,000 foot and 6000 horse. Here he halted under the skirts of the Alps (ὅπ' αὐτὴν τὴν παράρειαν τῶν Ἀλπέων), and then proceeded to attack the Taurini, who dwelt near (πρὸς τῆ παραρεια), and, being at enmity with his friends the Insubres, who dwelt further down the Po, would not accept his overtures. He stormed their chief place (probably at, or near, Turin), and by that time found it necessary to meet the Roman legions. During Hannibal's march over the Alps, P. Scipio had sent on his own army into Spain, under the command of his brother Cneius, and had himself returned to Italy. He forthwith hastened into Cisalpine Gaul, took the command of the praetor's army, which he found there, and led it against Hannibal. In the first action, which took place near the Ticinus, the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies were alone engaged; the Romans were completely routed, and Scipio himself severely wounded. Scipio then crossed the Po and withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was soon after joined by the other consul, Ti. Sempronius Longus. Here a second and more decisive battle was fought. The Romans were completely defeated, with heavy loss, and the remains of their army took refuge within the walls of Placentia. This battle was fought towards the end of 218. Hannibal was now joined by all the Gaulish tribes, and he was able to take up his winter-quarters in security. Early in 217 he descended by the valley of the Macra into the marshes on the banks of the Arno. In struggling through these marshes great numbers of his horses and beasts of burden perished, and he himself lost the sight of one eye by a violent attack of ophthalmia. The consul Flaminius hastened to meet him, and a battle was fought on the lake Trasimenus, in which the Roman army was destroyed; thousands fell by the sword, among whom was the consul himself; thousands more perished in the lake, and no less than 15,000 prisoners fell into the hands of Hannibal. Hannibal now marched through the Apennines into Picenum, and thence into Apulia, where he spent a great part of the summer. The Romans had collected a fresh army, and placed it under the command of the dictator Fabius Maximus, who had prudently avoided a general action, and only attempted to harass and annoy the Carthaginian army. Meanwhile the Romans had made great preparations for the campaign of the following year (216). The two new consuls, L. Aemilius Paullus and C. Terentius Varro, marched into Apulia, at the head of an army of little less than 90,000 men. To this mighty host Hannibal gave battle are not contradicted by Varro. The Mont Genève seems somewhat preferable to the Argentière, which brings Hannibal too far S. of Turin and the Po. As far as the natural features of the four competing passes are concerned there is little to choose between them. Any attempt to make Polybius's distances correspond with measured miles will of course be rejected by all who understand the conditions of mountain routes. Polybius takes account of days, and allows an average distance for each march.

in the plains on the right bank of the Aufidus, just below the town of Cannae. The Roman army was again annihilated: between 40,000 and 50,000 men are said to have fallen in the field, among whom was the consul Aemilius Paulus, both the consuls of the preceding year, above eighty senators, and a multitude of the wealthy knights who composed the Roman cavalry. The other consul, Varro, escaped with a few horsemen to Venusia, and a small band of resolute men forced their way from the Roman camp to Canusium; all the rest were killed, dispersed, or taken prisoners. (Pol. iii. 60-117; Liv. xxi. 39-50; Appian, Annib. 5-25; Zonar. ix. 1.) This victory was followed by the revolt from Rome of most of the nations in the S. of Italy. Hannibal established his army in winter-quarters in Capua, which had espoused his side. Capua was celebrated for its wealth and luxury, and the enervating effect which these produced upon the army of Hannibal became a favourite theme of rhetorical exaggeration in later ages. The futility of such declamations is sufficiently shown by the simple fact that the superiority of that army in the field remained as decided as ever. Still it may be truly said that the winter spent at Capua, 216-215, was in great measure the turning point of Hannibal's fortune, and from this time the war assumed an altered character. The experiment of what he could effect with his single army had now been fully tried, and, notwithstanding all his victories, it had decidedly failed; for Rome was still unsubdued, and still provided with the means of maintaining a protracted contest. The Carthaginians were fatally hampered by their inability to take fortified towns. From this time the Romans in great measure changed their plan of operations, and, instead of opposing to Hannibal one great army in the field, they hemmed in his movements on all sides, and kept up an army in every province of Italy, to thwart the operations of his lieutenants, and check the rising disposition to revolt. It is impossible here to follow the complicated movements of the subsequent campaigns, during which Hannibal himself frequently traversed Italy in all directions. In 215 Hannibal entered into negotiations with Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hieronymus of Syracuse, and thus sowed the seeds of two fresh wars. From 214 to 212 the Romans were busily engaged with the siege of Syracuse, which was at length taken by Marcellus in the latter of these years. In 212 Hannibal obtained possession of Tarentum; but in the following year he lost the important city of Capua, which was recovered by the Romans after a long siege. In 209 the Romans also recovered Tarentum. Hannibal's forces gradually became more and more weakened; and his only object now was to maintain his ground in the S. until his brother Hasdrubal should appear in the N. of Italy, an event to which he had long looked forward with anxious expectation. In 207 Hasdrubal at length crossed the Alps, and descended into Italy; but he was defeated and slain on the Metaurus, near Sena Gallica. [HASDRUBAL, No. 3.] The defeat and death of Hasdrubal was decisive of the fate of the war in Italy. From this time Hannibal abandoned all thoughts of offensive operations, and collected together his forces within the peninsula of Bruttium. In the fastnesses of that wild and mountainous region he maintained his ground for nearly four years (207-203). He crossed over to Africa towards the end of 203 in order to oppose P. Scipio. In the following year (202) the decisive battle was fought near Zama. Hannibal was completely defeated with great loss. All hopes of resistance were now at an end, and he was one of the first to urge the necessity of an immediate peace. The treaty between Rome and Carthage was not finally concluded until the next year (201). (Pol. vii. 1-4, viii., ix., xi., xiv. 1-10, xv. 1-19; Liv. xxiii.-xxx.; Appian, Annib. 28 ff.) By this treaty Hannibal saw the object of his whole life frustrated, and Carthage effectually humbled before her imperious rival. But his enmity to Rome was unabated; and though now more than forty-five years old, he set himself to work to prepare the means for renewing the contest at no distant period. He introduced the most beneficial reforms into the state, and restored the ruined finances; but having provoked the enmity of a powerful party at Carthage, they denounced him to the Romans as urging on Antiochus III., king of Syria, to take up arms against Rome. Hannibal was obliged to flee from Carthage, and took refuge at the court of Antiochus, who was at this time (193) on the eve of war with Rome. Hannibal in vain urged the necessity of carrying the war at once into Italy, instead of awaiting the Romans in Greece. On the defeat of Antiochus (190), the surrender of Hannibal was one of the conditions of the peace granted to the king (Pol. xxi. 14, xxii. 26). Hannibal, however, foresaw his danger, and took refuge at the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. Here he found for some years a secure asylum; but the Romans could not be at ease so long as he lived; and T. Quintius Flamininus was at length despatched to the court of Prusias to demand the surrender of the fugitive. The Bithynian king was unable to resist; and Hannibal, perceiving that fighting was impossible, took poison, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, about the year 183. (Liv. xxxix. 51; Nep. Hann. 12; Justin. xxxii. 4, 8; Zonar. ix. 21).—Of Hannibal's abilities as a general it is unnecessary to speak: all the great masters of the art of war, from Scipio to the emperor Napoleon, have concurred in their homage to his genius. But in comparing Hannibal with any other of the great leaders of antiquity, we must ever bear in mind the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed. Feebly and grudgingly supported by the government at home, he stood alone, at the head of an army composed of mercenaries of many nations. Yet not only did he retain the attachment of these men, unshaken by any change of fortune, for a period of more than fifteen years, but he trained up army after army; and long after the veterans that had followed him over the Alps had dwindled to an inconsiderable remnant, his new levies were still as invincible as their predecessors.

Hannibālis Castra, a port of Bruttium in the gulf of Seyllacium: it was perhaps near the mouth of the river Coracc (Plin. iii. 95).

Hanniballianus. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora, and half-brother of Constantine the Great. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine. (Zonar. xii. 33; Zos. ii. 39.)—2. Son of the elder, brother of the younger, Delmatius, was also put to death on the death of Constantine (Anon. Marc. xiv. 1).

Hanno (Ἄννων), one of the most common names at Carthage. Only the most important persons of the name can be mentioned.—1. One of the Carthaginian generals who fought against Agathocles in Africa, b. c. 310 (Diod. xx. 10).

—2. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Messana, at the beginning of the first Punic war, 264. In consequence of his surrendering the citadel of this city to the Romans, he was crucified on his return home. (Pol. i. 11; Zonar. viii. 8.)—3. Son of Hannibal, was sent to Sicily by the Carthaginians with a large force after the surrender of Messana to the Romans by another Hanno, 264. He carried on the war against the Roman consul Ap. Claudius. In 262 he again commanded in Sicily, but failed in relieving Agrigentum, where Hannibal was besieged by the Romans. [HANNIBAL, No. 2.] In 256 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet, along with Hamilcar, at the great battle of Ecnomus. (Pol. i. 18-27.)—4. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet which was defeated by Lutatius Catulus off the Aegates, 241. On his return home, he was crucified. (Zonar. viii. 17.)—5. Surnamed the Great, apparently for his successes in Africa. We do not, however, know against what nations of Africa his arms were directed, nor what was the occasion of the war. He was one of the commanders in the war against the mercenaries in Africa after the end of the first Punic war (240-238). From this time forward he appears to have taken no active part in any of the foreign wars or enterprises of Carthage. But his influence in her councils at home was great; he was the leader of the aristocratic party, and, as such, the chief adversary of Hamilcar Barca and his family. On all occasions, from the landing of Barca in Spain till the return of Hannibal from Italy, a period of above thirty-five years, Hanno is represented as thwarting the measures of that able and powerful family, and taking the lead in opposition to the war with Rome, the great object to which all their efforts were directed. He survived the battle of Zama, 202. (Appian, Hisp. 4, Pun. 34, 39; Pol. i. 73-78; Liv. xxi. 3, 10, 11, xxiii. 12, 13; Zonar. viii. 22.)—6. A Carthaginian officer left in Spain by Hannibal when that general crossed the Pyrenees, 218. He was shortly afterwards defeated by Cn. Scipio, and taken prisoner (Pol. iii. 35, 76).—7. Son of Bomilear, one of the most distinguished of Hannibal's officers. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Cannae (216), and is frequently mentioned during the succeeding years of the war. In 203 he took the command of the Carthaginian forces in Africa, which he held till the arrival of Hannibal. (Pol. iii. 42, 114; Liv. xxv. 13.)—8. A Carthaginian general, who carried on the war in Sicily after the fall of Syracuse, 211. He left Sicily in the following year, when Agrigentum was betrayed to the Romans. (Liv. xxv. 40, xxvi. 40.)—9. The last commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Capua, when it was besieged by the Romans (212-211) (Liv. xxv. 15, xxvi. 12).—10. A Carthaginian navigator, under whose name we possess a Periplus (περίπλους), which was originally written in the Punic language, and afterwards translated into Greek. The author had held the office of suffes, or supreme magistrate at Carthage, and he is said by Pliuy to have undertaken the voyage when Carthage was in a most flourishing condition. Hence it had been conjectured that he was the same as the Hanno, the father or son of Hamilcar, who was killed at Himera, b. c. 480; but this is quite uncertain. In the Periplus itself Hanno says that he was sent out by his countrymen to undertake a voyage beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and to found Libyphoenician towns, and that he sailed with a body of colonists to the number of 30,000. On his return from his voyage, he dedicated an account of it, inscribed on a tablet, in the temple of Cronos. It is therefore presumed that our Periplus is a Greek version of that Punic tablet. Edited by Falconer, Lond. 1797, with an English translation; by K. Müller, 1855.

Harma (τὸ Ἄρμα; Ἀρμαρεῦς). 1. A small place in Boeotia near Tanagra, said to have been so called from the harma or chariot of Adrastus, which broke down here, or from the chariot of Amphiaraus, who was here swallowed up by the earth along with his chariot (Il. ii. 499; Strab. p. 404; Paus. ix. 19, 4).—2. A small place in Attica, near Phyle.

Harmātūs (Ἀρματοῦς), a city and promontory on the coast of Aeolis in Asia Minor, on the Sinus Elaïticus (Thuc. viii. 101).

Harmōdius and Aristogiton (Ἀρμόδιος, Ἀριστογείτων), Athenians, belonging to the ancient tribe of the Gephyraei, which according to some had come to Attica from Eretria, according to others from Boeotia, and of Phoenician descent (Hdt. v. 57; Strab. p. 404). They were the murderers of Hipparchus, brother of the tyrant Hippias, in B.C. 514. Aristogiton was strongly attached to the young and beautiful Harmodius. Hipparchus, as a disappointed rival, resolved to avenge the slight by putting upon him a public insult. Accordingly, he took care that the sister of Harmodius should be summoned to bear one of the sacred baskets in a religious procession, and when she presented herself for the purpose, he caused her to be dismissed as unworthy of the honour. This insult determined the two friends to slay both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias as well. They communicated their plot to a few friends: and selected for their enterprise the day of the festival of the great Panathenaea, the only day on which they could appear in arms without exciting suspicion. (Aristotle, Ἄθ. πολ. 18 denies that the people carried arms at the festival.) When the appointed time arrived the two chief conspirators observed one of their accomplices in conversation with Hippias. Believing, therefore, that they were betrayed, they slew Hipparchus. Harmodius was immediately cut down by the guards. Aristogiton at first escaped, but was afterwards taken, and was put to the torture; but he died without revealing any of the names of the conspirators. Four years after this Hippias was expelled, and thenceforth Harmodius and Aristogiton obtained among the Athenians of all succeeding generations the character of patriots, deliverers, and martyrs—names often abused indeed, but seldom more grossly than in the present case. Their deed of private vengeance formed a favourite subject of drinking songs. To be born of their blood was esteemed among the highest of honours, and their descendants enjoyed an immunity from public burdens, and entertainment in the Prytaneum. (Hdt. v. 55, vi. 109, 123; Thuc. i. 20, vi. 54; Plat. Symp. p. 182; Aristot. Pol. v. 10, Rhet. ii. 24, Ἄθ. πολ. 18, 58; Athen. p. 695; Aristoph. Ach. 942, Vesp. 1225; Isae. Dic. Her. § 47.) Their statues, made of bronze by Antenor, were set up in the Agora. When Xerxes took the city, he carried these statues away, and new ones, the work of Critias, were erected in 477. The original statues were afterwards sent back to Athens by Alexander the Great. It is a reasonable belief that the bronze statues at Naples are a copy of this group; for the attitudes are much the same as on a coin, a relief and a vaso of Athens which are presumed to have this common origin.

Harmōniā (Ἀρμονία), daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, or, according to others, of Zeus and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, in Samothrace. When Athene assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, Zeus gave him Harmonia for his wife, and all the gods of Olympus were present at the marriage. On the wedding-day Cadmus received a present of a necklace, which afterwards became fatal to all who possessed it. (Apollod. iii. 4, 2; Hes. Th. 934; Diod. iv. 48; Pind. Pyth. iii. 167.) Harmonia accompanied Cadmus when he was obliged to quit Thebes, and shared his fate. [CADMUS.] Polynices, who inherited the fatal necklace, gave it to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband, Amphiaraus, to undertake the expedition against Thebes. Through ALCMAEON, the son of Eriphyle, the necklace came into the hands of Arsinoë, next into those of the sons of Phegeus, Pronous and Agenor, and lastly into those of the sons of Alcmæon, Amphoterus and Acarnan, who dedicated it in the temple of Athene Pronoia at Delphi. (Apollod. iii. 7, 5; Athen. p. 282.)

Harpāgia, or -ium (Ἀρπαγεία, or -άγιον), a small town in Mysia, between Cyzicus and Priapus, the scene of the rape of Ganymedes, according to some legends (Strab. p. 587).

Harpāgus (Ἀρπαγός). 1. A noble Median, whose preservation of the infant Cyrus, with the events consequent upon it, are related under CYRUS. He became one of the generals of Cyrus, and conquered the Greek cities of Asia Minor. (Hdt. i. 162-177).—2. A Persian general, under Darius I., took Histiaeus prisoner (Hdt. i. 28).

Harpālus (Ἀρπαλος). 1. A Macedonian of noble birth, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia, as superintendent of the treasury. After the conquest of Darius, he was left by Alexander in charge of the royal treasury, and of the satrapy of Babylon. Here, during Alexander's absence in India, he gave himself up to luxury and squandered the treasures entrusted to him. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 19; Plut. Alex. 85; Diod. xvii. 108.) When he heard that Alexander was returning from India, he fled from Babylon with about 5000 talents and a body of 6000 mercenaries, and crossed over to Greece, B.C. 321. He took refuge at Athens, where he employed his treasures to gain over the orators and induce the people to support him against Alexander and his vicegerent, Antipater. Among those whom he thus corrupted are said to have been Demades, Charicles, the son-in-law of Phocion, and even Demosthenes himself. [DEMOSTHENES.] But he failed in his object, for, Antipater having demanded his surrender, it was resolved to place him in confinement until the Macedonians should send for him. He succeeded in making his escape from prison, and fled to Crete, where he was assassinated soon after his arrival by Thimbron, one of his own officers. (Plut. Dem. 25; Phoc. 21; Paus. ii. 33, 4).—2. A Greek astronomer, introduced some improvements into the cycle of CLEOSTRATUS. Harpalus lived before METON.

Harpālūcē (Ἀρπαλύκη). 1. Daughter of Harpalyceus, king in Thrace. As she lost her mother in infancy, she was brought up by her father with the milk of cows and mares, and was trained in all manly exercises. After the death of her father, she lived in the forests as a robber, being so swift in running that horses were unable to overtake her. At length she was caught in a snare by shepherds, who killed her. (Hyg. Fab. 193; Serv. ad Aen. i. 821.)

The story seems to be of Northern origin; and analogies are traced to the Corn-wolf and Wehr-wolf of popular legends in Germany and elsewhere.—2. Daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste, was seduced by her own father. To revenge herself she slew her younger brother, and served him up as food before her father. The gods changed her into a bird.

Harpāsa (Ἄρπασα: Arepas), a city of Caria, on the river HARPASUS.

Harpāsus (Ἄρπασος). 1. (Arpa-Su), a river of Caria, flowing N. into the Maeander, into which it falls opposite to Nysa.—2. (Harpa-Su), a river of Armenia Major, flowing S. into the Araxes. Xenophon, who crossed it with the 10,000 Greeks, states its width as 400 feet.

Harpīna or Harpinna (Ἄρπινα, Ἄρπινα), a town in Elis Pisatis, near Olympia, said to have been called after a daughter of Asopus (Strab. p. 356; Paus. vi. 20, 8).

Harpocrātes. [HORUS.]

Harpocrātīon, Vālērīus, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria, probably of 2nd cent. A.D., the author of an extant dictionary to the works of the ten Attic orators, entitled Περὶ τῶν λέξεων τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων, or Λεξικὸν τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων. It contains not only explanations of legal and political terms, but also accounts of persons and things mentioned in the Attic orators, and is a work of great value. Editions by Bekker, Berlin, 1833; Dindorf, Oxon. 1853.

Harpīaiæ (Ἄρπυιαι), the Harpies—that is, the Robbers or Spoilers—are in Homer nothing but personified storm winds, who are said to carry off anyone who had suddenly disappeared from the earth. Thus they carried off the daughters of king Pandareus, and gave them as servants to the Erinyes. (Od. i. 241, xiv. 371, xx. 66; Il. xvi. 149).—Hesiod describes them as daughters of Thaumias by the Oceanid Electra, fair-locked and winged maidens, who surpassed winds and birds in the rapidity of their flight. (Hes. Th. 265; Apollod. i. 2, 6; Hyg. Fab. 14.) In Val. Flacc. Arg. iv. 423 their father is Typhon. But even in Aeschylus they appear as ugly creatures with wings; and later writers represent them as most disgusting monsters, being birds with the heads of maidens, with long claws and with faces pale with hunger (Verg. Aen. iii. 209, vi. 289). They were sent by the gods to torment the blind Phineus, and whenever a meal was placed before him, they darted down from the air and carried it off. Phineus was delivered from them by Zetes and Calais, sons of Boreas, and two of the Argonauts. [See p. 106.] Hesiod mentions two Harpies, Ocypete and Aëlo: later writers, three; but their names are not the same in all accounts. Besides the two already mentioned, we find Nicthoë and Celaeno. Virgil places them in the islands called Strophades, in the Ionian sea (Aen. iii. 210), where they took up their abode after they had been driven away from Phineus.—In the famous Harpy monument from Xanthus, now in the British Museum, the Harpies are represented in the act of carrying off the daughters of Pandareus.

Harūdes, a people in the army of Ariovistus (B.C. 58), supposed to be the same as the Charūdes mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed by him in the Chersonesus Cimbrica (Caes. B. G. i. 31, 37, 51; Ptol. ii. 11, 12).

Hasdrūbal (Ἄσδρουβας), a Carthaginian name. 1. Son of Hanno, a Carthaginian general in the first Punic war. He was one of the two generals defeated by Regulus B.C. 256. In 254 he was sent into Sicily, with a large army, and remained in the island four years. In 250, he was totally defeated by Metellus, and was put to death on his return to Carthage. (Pol. i. 30-40; Zonar. viii. 14.)—2. A Carthaginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, on whose death in 229, he succeeded to the command in Spain. He ably carried out the plans of his father-in-law for extending the Carthaginian dominions in Spain, and entrusted the conduct of most of his military enterprises to the young Hannibal. He founded New Carthage, and concluded with the Romans the celebrated treaty which fixed the Iberus as the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman dominions. He was assassinated by a slave, whose master he had put to death (221), and was succeeded in the command by HANNIBAL (Pol. ii. 1, 13, 36; Appian, Hisp. 4-8).—3. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and brother of Hannibal, a man of great military ability and untiring energy. When Hannibal set out for Italy (218), Hasdrubal was left in the command of Spain, and there fought for some years against the two Scipios. His scheme of joining Hannibal directly after Caunae was frustrated by the victory of the two Scipios on the Ebro (Liv. xxiii. 26), and even after his reinforcement by Mago he was kept in check by the Roman successes; but at length in the autumn of 208 he crossed the Pyrenees, and in the following year the Alps by the pass of the Little Mt. Cenis (Varro, ap. Serv. ad Aen. x. 13; cf. p. 56), and marched into Italy, in order to assist Hannibal; but he was defeated on the Metaurus, by the consuls C. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator, his army was destroyed, and he himself fell in the battle. His head was cut off and thrown into Hannibal's camp. (Liv. xxvii. 1-51; Pol. x. 34-xi. 3.)—4. One of Hannibal's chief officers, commanded the left wing of the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cannae (216) (Pol. iii. 102).—5. Surnamed the Bald (Calvus), commander of the Carthaginian expedition to Sardinia in the second Punic war, 215. He was defeated by the Roman praetor, T. Manlius, taken prisoner, and carried to Rome. (Liv. xxiii. 32-41; Zonar. ix. 4.)—6. Son of Gisco, one of the Carthaginian generals in Spain during the second Punic war. He fought in Spain from 214 to 206. After he and Mago had been defeated by Scipio in the latter of these years, he crossed over to Africa, where he succeeded in obtaining the alliance of Syphax by giving him his daughter Sophonisba in marriage. In conjunction with Syphax, Hasdrubal carried on war against Masinissa, but he was defeated by Scipio, who landed in Africa in 204. He was condemned to death for his ill success by the Carthaginian government, but he still continued in arms against the Romans. On the arrival of Hannibal from Italy his sentence was reversed; but the popular feeling against him had not subsided, and in order to escape death from his enemies, he put an end to his life by poison. (Liv. xxviii. 1-18, xxx. 3-8; Pol. xi. 20; Appian, Pun. 10-38.)—7. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet in Africa in 203, must be distinguished from the preceding (Liv. xxx. 24; Appian, Pun. 34).—8. Surnamed the Kid (Haedus), one of the leaders of the party at Carthage favourable to peace towards the end of the second Punic war (Liv. xxx. 42).—9. General of the Carthaginians in the third Punic war. When the city was taken he surrendered to Scipio, who spared his life. After adorning Scipio's triumph, he spent the rest of his life in Italy. (Appian, Pun. 70-131; Pol. xxxix.; Zonar. ix. 29.)

Haterius, Q., a senator and rhetorician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius, died A.D. 26, in the 89th year of his age (Tac. Ann. ii. 33, iv. 61; Suet. Tib. 29).

Hēbē (Ἥβη), the goddess of youth, was a daughter of Zeus and Hera (Hes. Th. 922, 952). She filled the cups of the gods with nectar (Il. iv. 2; Athen. p. 425), and she was the attendant of Hera, whose horses she harnessed (Il. v. 722). She married Heracles after he was received among the gods, and bore to him two sons, Alexiars and Anticetus (Od. xi. 605; Hes. Th. 950; Pind. Nem. i. 71; Eur. Or. 1686; Propert. i. 13, 23; Mart. ix. 66, 13). At Phlius she was worshipped originally as Ganymeda (Paus. ii. 13, 3), and at Sicyon as Dia, i.e. the daughter of Zeus and Dione. There is some probability in the theory that Hebe was an older goddess of youth and growth and the spring of the year among the Greeks than Aphrodite, to whom subsequently some of her functions were transferred [see p. 86, a]. Hence she is naturally represented as in the train of Venus (Hor. Od. i. 30, 8). The Romans identified with her their goddess Juventas, who was probably an old Italian personification of youth &c., but received the Greek character and attributes, being honoured in the lectisternium (Liv. xxi. 62; cf. Cic. N. D. i. 40, 112; Ov. Fast. vi. 65). She was worshipped on the Capitol in the time of Tarquinius Superbus, and had a temple of her own in 191 B.C. (Liv. v. 54, xxxvi. 36; Dionys. iii. 69). The Latin poets, however, commonly retained the Greek name Hebe in relating her story. At Rome there were several temples of Juventas. She is even said to have had a chapel on the Capitol before the temple of Jupiter was built.

Hebromāgus. [EBUROMAGUS.]

Hebron (Ἐβρών, Χεβρών· Ἐβρώνιος: El-Khalil), a city in the S. of Judaea, and the first capital of the kingdom of David. It was burnt by the Romans (Jos. B. J. iv. 9, 9).

Hebrus (Ἑβρος: Maritza), the principal river in Thrace, rises in the mountains of Scymnus and Rhodope, flows first SE. and then SW., becomes navigable for smaller vessels at Philippopolis, and for larger ones at Hadriano-polis, and falls into the Aegean sea near Aenos, after forming by another branch an estuary called Stentoris Lacus.—The Hebrus was celebrated in Greek legends. On its banks Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Thracian women; and it is frequently mentioned in connexion with Dionysus. (Hdt. iv. 90, vii. 58; Thuc. ii. 96; Strab. pp. 322, 329, 590; Verg. Georg. iv. 524.)

Hēcaergē (Ἑκαέργη). 1. Daughter of Boreas, and one of the Hyperborean maidens who were believed to have introduced the worship of Artemis in Delos (Hdt. iv. 35; Paus. v. 7, 4).—2. A surname of Artemis, signifying the goddess who shoots from afar.

Hēcālē (Ἑκάλη), a poor old woman, who hospitably received Theseus when he had gone out for the purpose of killing the Marathonian bull. She vowed to offer to Zeus a sacrifice for the safe return of the hero; but as she died before his return, Theseus ordained that the inhabitants of the Attic tetrapolis should offer a sacrifice to her and Zeus Hecalus, or Hecaleius. (Plut. Thes. 14; Ov. Rem. Am. 747.)

Hecataeus (Ἑκαταῖος). 1. Of Miletus, one of the early Greek historians, or logographi (prose-narrators). He was the son of Hegesander, and belonged to an ancient and illustrious family. In B.C. 500 he endeavoured to dissuade his countrymen from revolting from the Persians; and when this advice was disregarded, he gave them some sensible counsel respecting the conduct of the war, which was also neglected. Before this, Hecataeus had visited Egypt and many other countries. He survived the Persian wars, and appears to have died about 476. (Hdt. ii. 143, v. 36, 124.)

He wrote two works:—1. Περίοδος γῆς, or Περίγησις, divided into two parts, one of which contained a description of Europe, and the other of Asia, Egypt, and Libya. Both parts were subdivided into smaller sections, which are sometimes quoted under their respective names, such as Hellespontus, &c.—2. Γεωλογίαι or Ἱστορίαι, in four books, contained an account of the poetical fables and traditions of the Greeks. His work on geography was the more important, as it embodied the results of his numerous travels. He also corrected and improved the map of the earth drawn up by ANAXIMANDER. Herodotus knew the works of Hecataeus, and sometimes controverts his opinions (ii. 143, vi. 137). The fragments of his works are collected by Klausen. Hecataei Milesii Fragmenta, Berlin, 1831, and by C. and Th. Müller, Frag. Hist. Graec. Paris, 1841.—2. Of Abdera, a couteurary of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy the son of Lagus, appears to have accompanied the former on his Asiatic expedition. He was a pupil of the Sceptic Pyrrho, and is himself called a philosopher, critic, and grammarian. In the reign of the first Ptolemy he travelled up the Nile as far as Thebes. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 61.) He was the author of several works, of which the most important were:—1. A History of Egypt.—2. A work on the Hyperboreans.—3. A History of the Jews, frequently referred to by Josephus and other ancient writers. This work was declared spurious by Origen: modern critics are divided in their opinions. (Fragm. by C. Müller, 1848).—3. Prince of Cardia in the reign of Alexander the Great, an adversary of Eumenes (Plut. Eum. 3).

Hēcātē (Ἑκάτη), a goddess represented in Greek literature and art as deity of the moon and of night, of childbirth, and of the underworld and magic. Her origin, whether Hellenic or not, is not clearly traced; and, further, she has been confused or interchanged in tradition with other deities. She is not mentioned in Homer: in Hesiod she is daughter of the Titan Perses and Asteria (Hes. Th. 409; cf. Hymn. v. 25; Apollod. i. 2, 4; Cic. N. D. iii. 18, 45;

Hecate. (Causel, Museum Romanum, vol. i. tav. 21.)

Ov. Met. vii. 74); but other accounts make her the daughter of Zeus (Ap. Rh. iii. 469, 1035). As goddess of the moon Hecate was called φωσφόρος (Eur. Hel. 569), was represented as bearing torches (Aristoph. Ran. 1362), and it is possible that the triple character and form belonging to her was derived from the three phases of the new, full, and waning moon: others (Serv. ad Ecl. viii. 75) assign as the cause her threefold aspect of birth-goddess (= Lucina), giver of strong life (= Diana), and goddess of death (Hecate). A third explanation is that she was worshipped in heaven (as the moon), on the earth (as Artemis), and in the underworld (as Hecate). Lastly, it is not impossible that the triple form was derived from her being placed at the fork of roads, looking each way [see below]. To Hecate, as to other moon-goddesses, belongs the guardianship of childbirth (Hes. Th. 450; Eur. Troad. 323): as moon-goddess also she had power over the sea and over fishermen (Hes. Th. 439, 443); and for the same reason (though this and the following characteristics do not appear in the earliest literature) she was the goddess of night and darkness, and hence of the underworld and of the dead (Ap. Rh. iii. 467; Verg. Aen. vi. 118, 247–257): hence again she was the deity of ghosts and nightly apparitions, and the patroness of all necromancy and magic (Eur. Hel. 569; Theoc. ii. 10–15; Ov. Her. xii. 168, Met. xiv. 44). From the similarity of her functions she was often confounded with Artemis (Aesch. Suppl. 676; Eur. Phoen. 110), and sometimes with Aphrodite. Her worship was especially noticeable in Asia Minor (particularly at Stratonicea and Lagina in Caria), in Thrace (Strab. p. 472; Paus. ii. 30; whence some imagine a Thracian origin), and at Argos (Paus. ii. 22, 7). At Aegina she had honour beyond other gods (Paus. ii. 30), and at Athens it was a custom to place Ἑκάτεια—that is, shrines with figures of the goddess—before the doors (Aristoph. Vesp. 804, Lys. 64, Ran. 366; Hesych. s.v.). The peculiar offerings made to her were sacrifices of puppies, especially black puppies (Paus. iii. 14, 9; Schol. ad Theoc. ii. 12), which probably denoted her connexion with the underworld. She was regarded as present particularly at forked roads (ἐν τριόδῳ, ἐνοδία: Soph. Fr. 480; Ov. Fast. i. 141), perhaps because of her triple form: but superstitions about cross roads are also common to many nations. Offerings were also set before her shrines at the doors and at the forked roads at each full moon, and were then eaten by the poor (Aristoph. Plut. 594; Dem. Con. p. 1269, § 39; Plut. Symp. vii. 6). In art she is represented with torches, as a moon-goddess; with keys, as portress of Hades (Verg. Aen. vi. 215). The oldest representations showed her with the natural female shape (Paus. ii. 30, 2): afterwards the triple form appeared most frequently, though not universally.

Hecatommus (Ἑκατόμμωσ), king or dynast of Caria, in the reign of Artaxerxes III. He left three sons, Maussolus, Idrieus, and Pixodarus, all of whom, in their turn, succeeded him in the sovereignty; and two daughters, Artemisia and Ada. (Diod. xv. 2; Strab. p. 659.)

Hecatompýlos (Ἑκατόμυλος, i.e. having 100 gates). 1. An epithet of Thebes in Egypt. [THEBAE.]—2. A city in the middle of Parthia, 1260 stadia or 133 Roman miles from the Caspiae Pylae; enlarged by Seleucus; and afterwards used by the Parthian kings as a royal residence (Strab. p. 514).

Hēcāton (Ἑκάτων), a Stoic philosopher, a native of Rhodes, studied under Panaetius, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost (Cic. de Off. iii. 15, 63; Diog. Laërt. vii. 87).

Hecatonnēsi (Ἑκατόνησοι: Mosko-nisi), a group of small islands, between Lesbos and the coast of Aeolis, on the S. side of the mouth of the Gulf of Adramyttium. The name, 100 islands, was indefinite; the real number was reckoned by some at 20, by others at 40. Strabo derives the name, not from ἑκατον, 100, but from ἑκατος, a surname of Apollo. (Diod. xiii. 77; Strab. p. 618.)

Hector (Ἑκτωρ), the chief hero of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks, was the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, the husband of Andromache, and father of Scamandrius (Il. ii. 817; Apollod. iii. 12, 5; Theoc. xv. 139). He fought with the bravest of the Greeks, and at length slew Patroclus, the friend of Achilles. The death of his friend roused Achilles to the fight. The other Trojans fled before him into the city. Hector alone remained without the walls, though his parents implored him to return; but when he saw Achilles, his heart failed him, and he took to flight. Thrice did he race round the city, pursued by the swift-footed Achilles, and then fell pierced by Achilles' spear. Achilles tied Hector's body to his chariot, and thns dragged him into the camp of the Greeks (Il. xxii. 182-330); but later traditions relate that he first dragged the body thrice around the walls of Ilium (Verg. Aen. i. 484). At the command of Zeus, Achilles surrendered the body to the prayers of Priam, who buried it at Troy with great pomp (Il. xxiv. 718 ff.). Hector is one of the noblest conceptions of the poet of the Iliad. He is the great bulwark of Troy, and even Achilles trembles when he approaches him. He has a presentiment of the fall of his country, but he perseveres in his heroic resistance, preferring death to slavery and disgrace. Besides these virtues of a warrior, he is distinguished also by his tender affection for his parents, his wife, and his son, and by a chivalrous compassion even for Helen. The lines which describe his parting with Andromache (Il. vi. 406), and the lament of Helen over his body (xxiv. 762) are among the most beautiful and pathetic in Homer.

Hecūba (Ἑκάβη), daughter of Dymas in Phrygia, or of Cissens, king of Thrace (Il. xvii. 718). Her mother was variously named, Teleclea, Evagore, Ennoe, Glaucippe, and Metope, which explains the conndrm of Tiberins, 'Quae mater Hecubae?' (Suct. Tib. 70). She was the wife of Priam, king of Troy, to whom she bore Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Cassandra, and many other children (Il. xxiv. 496; Theocr. xv. 139; Apollod. iii. 12, 5). The fifty children mentioned in Enr. Hec. 421, include her stepchildren. Her dream before the birth of Paris, that she had borne a firebrand, is noticed by many writers (Enr. Troad. 922; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 224; Verg. Aen. vii. 320, x. 704; Cic. Div. i. 21, 42). On the capture of Troy, she was carried away as a slave by the Greeks. According to the tragedy of Euripides which bears her name, she was carried by the Greeks to Chersonesus, and there saw her daughter Polyxena sacrificed. On the same day the waves of the sea washed on the coast the body of her last son, Polydorus, who had been murdered by Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whose care he had been entrusted by Priam. Hecuba thereupon killed the children of Polymestor, and put out the eyes of their father. (Enr. Hec.; Ov. Met. xiii. 431.) Agamemnon pardoned her the crime, and Polymestor prophesied that she should be metamorphosed into a she-dog, and should leap into the sea at a place called Cynossema. It was added that the inhabitants of Thrace endeavoured to stone her, but that she was metamorphosed into a dog, and in this form howled through the country for a long time. (Enr. Hec. 1259; Tzetz. Lyc. 1176; Cic. Tusc. iii. 26, 63; Ov. Met. l.c.; Strab. p. 595).—According to other accounts, she was given as a slave to Ulysses, and in despair leaped into the Hellespont; or, being anxious to die, she uttered such invectives against the Greeks, that the warriors put her to death, and called the place where she was buried Cynossema, with reference to her invectives. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 315; Dictys, v. 16.)

Hedyllus (Ἠδύλλος), son of Melicertus, was a native of Samos or of Athens, and an epigrammatic poet. Eleven of his epigrams are in the Greek Anthology. He was a contemporary and rival of Callimachus, and lived, therefore, about the middle of the 3rd century B. C. (Athen. pp. 297, 314.)

Hedyllus Mons (Ἠδύλειον), a range of mountains in Boeotia, W. of the Cephissus.

Hēgēmōn (Ἠγήμων), of Thasos, a poet of the Old Comedy at Athens, but more celebrated for his parodies, of which kind of poetry he was the inventor. He was nicknamed φακῆ, on account of his fondness for that kind of pulse. He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was a friend of Alcibiades; his parody of the Gigantomachia was the piece to which the Athenians were listening when the news was brought to them in the theatre of the destruction of the expedition to Sicily. (Aristot. Poët. 2; Athen. pp. 5, 108, 406, 695.)

Hēgēmōnē (Ἠγεμόνη), the leader or ruler, is the name of one of the Athenian Charites or Graces. It was also a surname of Artemis at Sparta and in Arcadia. (Pans. viii. 37, 47.)

Hegesander. 1. A companion of Xenophon in the retreat of the 10,000 (Xen. An. vi. 1).—2. A native of Delphi and writer of ὑπομήματα, often mentioned by Athenaeus. He probably lived in the 3rd century B. C. (Athen. p. 400.)

Hēgēsīanax (Ἠγησιάνης), an historian of Alexandria, is said to have been the real author of the work called Troica which went under the name of Cephalaon or Cephalaion (Athen. p. 293; Strab. p. 594). He appears to be the same as the Hegesianax sent by Antiochus the Great as one of his envoys to the Romans in B. C. 196 and 193 (Pol. xviii. 30, 33).

Hēgēsias (Ἠγησίας). 1. Of Magnesia, a rhetorician and historian, lived about B. C. 290, wrote the history of Alexander the Great. He was regarded by some as the founder of that degenerate style of composition which bore the name of the Asiatic. His own style was destitute of all vigor and dignity, and was marked chiefly by childish conceits and minute prettinesses. (Strab. p. 648; Cic. Orat. 67, 69; Gell. ix. 4).—2. Of Salamis, supposed by some to have been the author of the Cyprian poem which, on better authority, is ascribed to Stasinus (Athen. p. 682).—3. A Cyrenaic philosopher, who lived at Alexandria in the time of the Ptolemies, perhaps about B. C. 260. He wrote a work containing such gloomy descriptions of human misery, that it drove many persons to commit suicide; hence he was surnamed Peisithanatos (Πεισιθανάτος). He was, in consequence, forbidden to teach by Ptolemy. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 86; Cic. Tusc. i. 34, 83.)

Hēgēsias or Hēgias (Ἠγησίας, Ἠγίας), an Athenian sculptor early in the 5th century B. C. His chief works were the statues of Castor and Pollux, which were at Rome in Pliny's time. (Plin. xxxiv. 78; Pans. viii. 42, 10; Lucian, Rhet. Præc. 9.)

Hēgēsīnus (Ἠγησίνοῦς), of Pergamum, the successor of Evander and the immediate predecessor of Carneades in the chair of the Academy, flourished about B. C. 185 (Diog. Laërt. iv. 60; Cic. Ac. ii. 6, 16.)

Hēgēsippus (Ἠγησιππος). 1. An Athenian orator, and a supporter of Demosthenes. He was probably the author of the oration on Halonesus, which has come down to us under the name of Demosthenes. (Dem. F. L. p. 364, § 82, Phil. iii. p. 129, § 85; Hesyeh. and Phot. s.v.)—2. A poet of the New Comedy, about B. C. 300.—3. A Greek historian of Meceberna, wrote an account of the peninsula of Pallene (Dionys. i. 49).

Hēgēsīpyla (Ἠγησιπύλη), daughter of Olorus, king of Thrace, and wife of Miltiades (Hdt. vi. 39).

Hēgias. [HEGESIAS.]

Hēlēna ('Ελένη). In Homer Helen is described as daughter of Zeus, half-sister of Castor and Polydeuces, and mother of one child, Hermione (Il. iii. 237; Od. iv. 14, 227, 569, xi. 299), and of surpassing beauty. She was wife of Menelaus and was carried off to Troy by Paris [for details see PARIS], and thus became the cause of the Trojan war (Il. iii. 165; cf. Aesch. Ag. 607). In the last year of the war she is led by Iris to the walls, where she names to Priam the Greek leaders; the impression made by her beauty is particularly described (Il. iii. 156). In her lament over Hector she contrasts his chivalrous kindness towards her with the taunts of the other Trojans (Il. xxiv. 761). The common tradition was that, after the death of Paris, she married DEIPHOBUS; and this is perhaps alluded to in Od. iv. 275. Near the end of the siege she recognised Odysseus when he entered Troy in disguise, but shielded him because she wished to return to Greece (Od. iv. 244). After the fall of Troy she returned with Menelaus to Sparta, but not until they had wandered for eight years, part of which was spent in Egypt (Od. iii. 300, 312, iv. 125, 228).—In the post-Homeric stories there are many additions. Helen is by some accounts the daughter of Nemesis (probably as an allegory); and the egg from which she is born is merely entrusted to Leda. This version was as old as the Cyclic poets (Athen. p. 334; Apollod. iii. 10, 8). Euripides retains the account of the birth from Leda (Hel. 18). Again in some traditions Helen and the Dioscuri are born from one egg (Eur. Hel. 1644); in others there were two eggs ('gemiuo ovo,' Hor. A.P. 147), from one of which were born Helen and Polydeuces as immortals and children of Zeus and Leda, from the other Castor and Clytemnestra, as mortal children of Tyndareus and Leda (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 88; Hyg. Fab. 77, 80). In her childhood Helen was carried off to Athens by Theseus, and rescued by the Dioscuri [ΔΕΥΤΗΡΑ; ΔΙΟΣΚΟΥΡΟΙ; ΘΗΣΕΥΣ]. After this many princely suitors came to Sparta, and Tyndareus, by advice of Odysseus, gave her in marriage to Menelaus. The most important variation to the Trojan episode in her life was that she was taken to Egypt, and that her phantom went to Troy. This was said to have been adopted as a palinode or recantation by Stesichorus, who had spoken against the character of Helen and had been smitten with blindness (Plat. Phaedr. p. 243, Rep. p. 586; Hor. Epod. 17, 42; Paus. iii. 19, 13). According to this story (which was known to the Egyptian priests), Paris and Helen were driven by contrary winds to Egypt. Here Helen and the treasures taken from Sparta were detained by King Proteus, and Paris went on to Troy (Hdt. ii. 112-120). Euripides in his Helena makes Helen still more guiltless, for she is taken by Hermes first to an island off Attica, and thence to Egypt, while Paris carried off her phantom from Sparta as the cause of war. In either account it is only her phantom that is present in Troy and is brought thence by Menelaus after the fall of the city. When Menelaus recovered the true Helen from Egypt, the phantom disappeared. Helen received divine honours in her temple at Therapnae (cf. Od. iv. 560; Eur. Or. 929), where also her grave was shown (Hdt. vi. 61; Paus. iii. 15, 3; 19, 9). A Rhodian legend spoke of her going to Rhodes after the death of Menelaus, and being hanged on a tree there in revenge by Polyxo, and therefore called δενδρίτις (Paus. iii. 19, 10). This probably preserves some account of tree worship, which has been identified at some time with her name, and which appears also in the 'Ελένας φυτόν at Sparta (Theocr. xviii. 48). Another story which Pausanias hears from the people of Croton and of Himera is that Helen, after her death, became the wife of Achilles, in the island of Louce, in the Euxine (Paus. iii. 19, 11). In her divine character Helen, like the Dioscuri, caused the appearance of light (the St. Elmo's Fire) about a ship; but her single star was baneful, while the double star of her brothers brought safety (Plin. ii. 101). Euripides, on the contrary, describes her star as beneficial to sailors (Orest. 1629).

Hēlēna, Flāvīa Jūlia. 1. The mother of Constantine the Great. When her husband, Constantius, was raised to the dignity of Caesar by Diocletian, A. D. 292, he was compelled to repudiate his wife, to make way for Theodora, the stepchild of Maximianus Herculius. Subsequently, when her son succeeded to the purple, Helena was treated with marked distinction and received the title of Augusta. She died about 328. She was a Christian, and was said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre of our Lord, together with the wood of the true cross. [See Dict. of Christian Biography.—2. Daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married her cousin, Julian the Apostate, 355, and died 360 (Amm. Marc. xv. 8, xxi. 1).

Hēlēna ('Ελένη). 1. (Makronisi), a small and rocky island, between the S. of Attica and Ceos, formally called Cranaë (Strab. p. 399; Paus. i. 35, 1).—2. The later name of ILLIBERRIS in Gaul.

Hēlēnus ('Ελενος). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, was celebrated for his prophetic powers, and also fought against the Greeks in the Trojan war (Il. vi. 76, vii. 44, xiii. 94, xiii. 580). In Homer we have no further particulars about him; but in later traditions he is said to have deserted his countrymen and joined the Greeks. There are various accounts respecting this desertion of the Trojans. According to some he did it of his own accord; according to others, he was ensnared by Odysseus, who was anxious to obtain his prophecy respecting the fall of Troy. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 905; Soph. Phil. 605, 1398; Ov. Met. xiii. 99, 723.) Others, again, relate that, on the death of Paris, Helenus and Deiphobus contended for the possession of Helena, and that Helenus, being conquered, fled to Mt. Ida, where he was taken prisoner by the Greeks (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166). After the fall of Troy, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus. He foretold Pyrrhus the sufferings which awaited the Greeks who returned home by sea, and prevailed upon him to return by land to Epirus. After the death of Pyrrhus he received a portion of the country, and married Andromache, by whom he became the father of Cestrinus. When Aeneas in his wanderings arrived in Epirus, he was hospitably received by Helenus, who also foretold him the future events of his life. (Verg. Aen. iii. 245, 374; Ov. Met. xv. 438.)—2. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by Lanassa, daughter of Agathocles. He accompanied his father to Italy B. C. 280, and was with him when Pyrrhus perished at Argos, 272. He then fell into the hands of Antigonus Gonatas, who, however, sent him back in safety to Epirus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 33, 34.)

Hēliādae and Hēliādes (Ἠλιάδαι and Ἠλιάδες), the sons and daughters of Helios (the Sun) (Diod. v. 56; Pind. Ol. vii. 71). The name Hēliades is given especially to Phaëthusa, Lampetie and Phoebe, the daughters of Helios and the nymph Clymene, and the sisters of Phaëthon. They bewailed the death of their brother Phaëthon so bitterly on the banks of the Eridanus, that the gods in compassion changed them into poplar trees and their tears into amber. (Ov. Met. ii. 340; Ap. Rh. iv. 604; ERIDANUS.)

Hēlice (Ἠλίκη), daughter of Lycaon, was beloved by Zeus, but Hera, out of jealousy, metamorphosed her into a she-bear, whereupon Zeus placed her among the stars, under the name of the Great Bear.

Hēlice (Ἠλίκη; Ἠλικώνιος, Ἠλικεύς). 1. The ancient capital of Achaia, said to have been founded by Ion, possessed a celebrated temple of Poseidon, which was regarded as the great sanctuary of the Achaean race. Helice was swallowed up by an earthquake together with Bura, B.C. 373. The earth sank, and the place on which the cities stood was ever afterwards covered by the sea. (Il. ii. 575, viii. 203; Hdt. i. 145; Pans. vii. 1, 24; Diod. xv. 24; Strab. p. 384.)—2. An ancient town in Thessaly, disappeared in early times.

Hēlicon (Ἠλικών), son of Acesas, a celebrated artist. [ACESAS.]

Hēlicon (Ἠλικών; Hēlicon, Palaeo-Buni, Turk. Zagora), a celebrated range of mountains in Boeotia, between the lake Copais and the Corinthian gulf, was covered with snow the greater part of the year, and possessed many romantic ravines and lovely valleys. Helicon was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, the latter of whom are hence called Ἠλικώνιαι παρθένοι and Ἠλικωνιάδες νυμφαί by the Greek poets, and Heliconiades and Heliconides by the Roman poets. Here sprang the celebrated fountains of the Muses, AGANIPPE and HIPPOCRENE. At the fountain of Hippocrene was a grove sacred to the Muses, which was adorned with some of the finest works of art. (Strab. p. 409; Paus. ix. 25; Hes. Th. 1; Verg. Ecl. x. 12.)

Hēliōdōrus (Ἠλιόδωρος). 1. An Athenian, surnamed Periegetes (Περιηγητής), probably lived about B.C. 164, and wrote a description of the works of art in the Acropolis at Athens. This work was one of the authorities for Pliny's account of the Greek artists.—2. A rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, whom Horace mentions as the companion of his journey to Brundisium (Sat. i. 5, 2, 3).—3. A Stoic philosopher at Rome, who became a delator in the reign of Nero (Juv. Sat. i. 33).—4. A rhetorician, and private secretary to the emperor Hadrian.—5. Of Emesa in Syria, lived about the end of the fourth century of our era, and was bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. Before he was made bishop, he wrote a romance in ten books, entitled Aethiopica, because the scene of the beginning and the end of the story is laid in Aethiopia. This work has come down to us, and is far superior to the other Greek romances. It relates the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. Though deficient in those characteristics of modern fiction which appeal to the universal sympathies of our nature, the romance of Heliodorus is interesting on account of the rapid succession of strange and not altogether improbable adventures, the many and various characters introduced, and the beautiful scenes described. The language is simple and elegant. Editions are by Mitscherlich in his Scriptores Graeci Erotici, Argentorat. 1798, and by Bekker, Lips. 1855.—6. Of Larissa, the author of a short work on optics, still extant, chiefly taken from Euclid's Optics: edited by Matani, Pistor. 1758.

Heliogabalus. [ELAGABALUS.]

Hēliopōlis (Ἠλίον πόλις or Ἠλιούπολις, i.e. the City of the Sun). 1. (Heb. Baalath; Baalbek, Ru.), a celebrated city of Syria, a chief seat of the worship of Baal, whom the Greeks identified sometimes with Helios, sometimes with Zeus. It was situated in the middle of Coele-Syria, at the W. foot of Anti-Libanus, on a rising ground at the N.E. extremity of a large plain watered by the river Leontes (Nahr-el-Kasimiyeh), near whose sources Heliopolis was built: the sources of the Orontes are not far N. of the city. The situation of Heliopolis necessarily made it a place of great commercial importance, as it was on the direct road from Egypt and the Red Sea and also from Tyre to Syria, Asia Minor, and Europe; and hence, probably, the wealth of the city, to which its magnificent ruins of temples and other buildings still bear witness. It was made a Roman colony by the name of Colonia Julia Augusta Felix Heliopolitana, and colonised by veterans of the 5th and 8th legions, under Augustus (Strab. p. 753; Ptol. v. 15, 22). The worship of Jupiter Heliopolitanus was introduced into Italy, especially at Puteoli (C. I. L. x. 1578).—2. Matarieh, Ru. N.E. of Cairo), a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Heliopolites, stood on the E. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, a little below the apex of the Delta, and near the canal of Trajan, and was, in the earliest period of which we have any record, a chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the Sun. Its civil name was An, in Hebrew On; its sacred name Pe-Ra, i.e. the abode of the Sun. Here also was established the worship of Mnevis, a sacred bull similar to Apis. The priests of Heliopolis were renowned for their learning, and learned Greeks (Plato and Eudoxus are mentioned by Strabo) studied there up to the time when its fame was supplanted by that of Alexandria. It suffered much during the invasion of Cambyses; and by the time of Strabo it was entirely ruined. (Hdt. ii. 3, 7, 59; Strab. p. 805; Tac. Ann. vi. 28.)

Hēlios (Ἥλιος or Ἡέλιος), called Sol by the Romans, the god of the sun. He was the son of Hyperion and Thea, and a brother of Selene and Eos. (Od. xii. 176, 322; Hes. Th. 371.) From his father, he is frequently called Hyperionides, or Hyperion, a form of the patronymic. In the Homeric hymn on Helios, he is called a son of Hyperion and Euryphaëssa. Homer describes Helios as giving light both to gods and men: he rises in the E. from Oceanus, traverses the heaven, and descends in the evening into the darkness of the W. and Oceanus (Il. vii. 422; Od. iii. 1, xi. 16, xii. 380). Later poets have marvellously embellished this simple notion. They tell of a most magnificent palace of Helios in the E., containing a throne occupied by the god, and surrounded by personifications of the different divisions of time. They also assign him a second palace in the W., and describe his horses as feeding upon herbs growing in the Islands of the Blessed. (Ov. Met. ii. 1; Stat. Theb. iii. 407; Athen. p. 296.) The manner in which Hēlios during the night passes from the western into the eastern ocean is not mentioned either by Homer or by Hesiod, but later poets make him sail in a golden boat, the work of Hephaestus, round one-half of the earth, and thus arrive in the E. at the point from which he has to rise again (Athen. pp. 469, 470; Apollod. ii. 5, 10). Others represent him as making his nightly voyage while slumbering in a golden bed (Mimn. Fr. 12; Athen. p. 470). The horses and chariot with which Helios traverses the heavens are not mentioned in the Iliad and Odyssey, but first occur in the Aeëtes, Ciree and Pasiphaë, and by Clymene of Phaëthon. Temples of Helios probably existed in Greece at a very early time, since the vow to build a temple to Helios is regarded as natural in Od. xii. 346; and in later times we find his worship established in various places, and especially in the island of Rhodes—which, as specially belonging to him, held annual games (ἡλεία or ἄλεια) in his honour (Pind. Ol. vii. 70; Diod. v. 56)—and on the Aerocorinthus (Paus. ii. 1, 6; 5, 1). The sacrifices offered to him consisted of white rams, boars, bulls, goats, lambs, especially white horses, and honey.—There had been an early interchange in the attributes and provinces of Apollo and Helios, both as regards the gift of light and prophetic knowledge, but it was not until after the time of Euripides that Helios was identified with Apollo. The Roman poets, when speaking of the god of the sun (Sol), usually adopt the notions of the Greeks. The worship of Sol existed at Rome from an early period, Sol being an Italian deity whom the Romans afterwards identified with Helios. This deity was honoured as 'Sol indiges' by a festival on the Quirinal on August 8th. The Eastern sun-worship was widely spread in Italy after the 1st century A.D. [ELAGABALUS; MITHRAS.]

Helissōn (Ἑλισσών or Ἑλισσοῦς), a small town in Arcadia, on a river of same name, which falls into the Alphæus (Paus. viii. 3, 1).

Hellanicus (Ἑλληνικός). 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the most eminent of the Greek logographers, or early Greek historians, was in all probability born about B.C. 490, and died some time after the beginning of the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. i. 97). We have no particulars of his life, but we may presume that he visited many of the countries of whose history he gave an account. He wrote a great number of genealogical, chronological and historical works, which are cited under the titles of Troica, Aeolica, Persica, &c. One of his most noted works was entitled Ἱερέαι τῆς Ἥρας: it contained a chronological list of the priestesses of Hera at Argos, compiled from the records preserved in the temple of the goddess of this place. This work was one of the earliest attempts to regulate chronology, and was made use of by Thucydides, Timaeus and others. The fragments of Hellanicus are collected by Sturz, Hellatici Lesbii Fragmenta, Lips. 1826; and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1841.—2. A Greek grammarian, a disciple of Agathoeles, and apparently a contemporary of Aristarchus, wrote on the Homeric poems.

Hellas, Hellēnes. [GRAECIA.]

Hellē (Ἑλλη), daughter of Athamas and Nephele, and sister of Phrixus. When Phrixus was to be sacrificed [PHRIXUS], Nephele rescued her two children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes; but, between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea, which was thence called the Sea of Helle (Hellespontus). Her tomb was shown near Pactya, on the Hellespont. (Aesch. Pers. 70, 875; Hdt. vii.

Helios. (From the metope at Ilium: Schliemann, Troy and its Remains.)

Homeric hymn on Helios; and by later writers the four horses are named Pyrois, Eons, Aethon, and Phlegon, or Eous, Aethiops, Bronte and Sterope (Ov. Met. ii. 153; Hyg. Fab. 183).—Helios is described as the god who sees and hears everything, and was thus able to reveal to Hephaestus the faithlessness of Aphrodite, and to Demeter the abduction of her daughter (Od. viii. 271; Hymn. ad Cer. 75).—The island of Thrinacia (Sicily) was sacred to Helios, and there he had flocks of sheep and oxen, which were tended by his daughters Phaëthusa and Lampetie (Od. xii. 128). Later traditions ascribe to him flocks also in the island of Erythra; and it may be remarked in general, that sacred flocks, especially of oxen, occur in most places where the worship of Helios was established. By Perse he was the father of Hellēn (Ἑλληῆν), son of Dencalion and Pyrrha, or of Zeus and Dorippe, husband of Orseis, and father of Acolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. He was king of Phthia in Thessaly, and was succeeded by his son Aeolus. He is the mythical ancestor of all the Hellenes; from his two sons Aeolus and Dorus were descended the Aeolians and Dorians; and from his two grandsons Achaeus and Ion, the sons of Xuthus, the Achaeans and Ionians. (Hdt. i. 56; Thuc. i. 3; Strab. p. 383.)

Hellespontus (Ἑλλήσποντος: Straits of the Dardanelles, or of Gallipoli, Turk. Stambul Dengeiz), the long narrow strait connecting the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) with the Aegaeu sea, through which the waters of the Black sea discharge themselves into the Mediterranean in a constant current. The length of the strait is about fifty miles, and the width varies from six miles at the upper end to two at the lower, and in some places it is only one mile wide, or even less. The narrowest part is between the ancient cities of SESTUS and ABYDUS, where Xerxes made his bridge of boats, [XERXES] and where the legend related that Leander swam across to visit Hero. [LEANDER.] The name of the Hellespont (i.e. the Sea of Helle) was derived from the story of Helle's being drowned in it [HELLE]. The Hellespont was the boundary of Europe and Asia, dividing the Thracian Chersonese in the former from the Troad and the territories of Abydus and Lampsacus in the latter. The district just mentioned, on the S. side of the Hellespont, was also called Ἑλλήσποντος, its inhabitants Ἑλλησπόντιοι, and the cities on its coast Ἑλλησπόντιαι πόλεις. (Il. ii. 845; Od. xxiv. 82; Hdt. iv. 85; Strab. p. 591.)—2. Under Diocletian, Hellespontus was the name of a consular province, composed of the Troad and the N. part of Mysia, with Cyzicus for its capital.

Hellōpia. [ELLOPIA.]

Hellōtis (Ἑλλωτίς), a surname of Athene at Corinth (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 56), and also of Europa among the Cretans.

Helōrus or Helōrum (ἡ Ἑλωρος: Ἑλωρίτης), a town on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Syracuse, at the mouth of the river Helorus. There was a road from Helorus to Syracuse (ὁδὸς Ἑλωρίνη, Thuc. vi. 70, vii. 80).

Hēlos (τὸ Ἑλος: Ἑλεῖος, Ἑλεάτης). 1. A town in Laconia, on the coast, in a marshy situation, whence its name (ἔλος = marsh). The town was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. (Pol. v. 19; Paus. iii. 22, 3; Strab. p. 363.)—2. A town or district of Elis on the Alpheus (Il. ii. 594; Strab. p. 350).

Helvecōnae, a people in Germany, between the Viadus and the Vistula, S. of the Rngii, and N. of the Burgundiones, reckoned by Tacitus among the Ligii (Germ. 43).

Helvētīi, a brave and powerful Celtic people, who dwelt between M. Jurassus (Jura), the Lacus Lemannus (Lake of Geneva), the Rhone, and the Rhine as far as the Lacus Brigantinus (Lake of Constance). They were thus bounded by the Sequani on the W., by the Nantuates and Lepontii in Cisalpine Gaul on the S., by the Rhaeti on the E., and by the German nations on the N. beyond the Rhine. Their country, called Ager Helvetiorum (but never Helvetia), thus corresponded to the W. part of Switzerland.—The Helvetii are first mentioned in the war with the Cimabri. In B.C. 107 the Figurini defeated and killed the Roman consul L. Cassius Longinus, on the lake of Geneva, while another division of the Helvetii accompanied the Cimabri and Teutones in their invasion of Gaul. Subsequently the Helvetii invaded Italy along with the Cimabri; and they returned home in safety, after the defeat of the Cimabri by Marius and Catulus in 101. They had once possessed the country further to the east, including the district about the Neckar afterwards called AGRI DECUMATES. (This had gained the name of 'the Helvetian desert,' because it was for a long period wasted by the struggles for its possession between Helvetians and Germans.) From this country they were pressed by their foes westward, and accordingly about 60 B.C. they resolved, upon the advice of Orgetorix, one of their chiefs, to migrate from their country with their wives and children, and seek a new home in the more fertile plains of Gaul. In 58 they endeavoured to carry their plan into execution, but they were defeated by Caesar, and driven back into their own territories. At this time the Civitas Helvetiorum was, after the Celtic fashion, divided into four pagi or cantons [Dict. of Antiq. art. Pagus], comprising 400 vici and twelve oppida, which they burned when they started westward (Caes. B. G. 1, 5). After their enforced return they rebuilt several vici, of which the most notable were Lousona (Lausanne), Eburodunum (Yverdon), Minodunum (Moudon), Salodurum (Solothurn), Turicum (Zürich), Vitodurum (Winterthur), Aquae (Baden, near Zürich), Vindonissa (Windisch), with the chief town (Tac. Hist. i. 68) of all the civitas, AVENTICUM (Avanches), which Augustus made the residence of the tax collector for the Helvetian district. For military strength two Roman colonies were established, at Noviodunum (Nyon, on the lake of Geneva), which was called Colonia Julia Equestris, and Colonia Raurica (Augst, near Basle). The Helvetian civitas formed part of the province of Gallia Belgica until the reign of Tiberius. Like the rest of the 'Tres Galliae' it was, by Caesar's policy, allowed to retain something of their old cantonal administration, not merely in their religious gatherings, but with rights of meeting in their councils to present their grievances, and even with some military organisation, the native magistrates having power to call out a militia [GALLIA]. When the provinces of Upper and Lower Germany were, under Tiberius, detached from Gallia Belgica, the Helvetii formed part of Germania Superior [GERMANIA]. They were severely dealt with by the troops of Vitellius (A.D. 70); one of whose messengers they had arrested: many of their towns were burnt, and Aventicum narrowly escaped destruction. It was a mark of a further tendency to Romanise the district that Aventicum received Latin rights. When Gaul was subdivided into a greater number of provinces in the fourth century A.D., the country of the Helvetii formed, with that of the Sequani and the Rauraci, the province of Maxima Sequanorum, with the chief town Visontio (Besançon). The chief original authorities for the affairs of the Helvetii under the Romans may be found in the volume of inscriptions (C. I. Helvet.).

Helvia, mother of the philosopher SENECA.

Helvidius Priscus. [PRISCUS.]

Helvii, a people in Gaul, between the Rhone and Mt. Cebenna, which separated them from the Arverni, were for a long time subject to Massilia, but afterwards belonged to the province of Gallia Narbonensis. Their country produced good wine. (Caes. B. G. vii. 7, 78; Plin. xiv. 43.)

Helvius. 1. Blasio. [BLASIO.]—2. Cinna. [CINNA.]—3. Mancina. [MANCIA.]—4. Pertinax. [PERTINAX.]

Hēmērēsia (Ἡμερησία), the soothing goddess, a surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped at the fountain Lusi (Λουσοί), in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 18, 3).

Hemina, Cassius. [CASSIUS, No. 14.]

Hēnēti (Ἠνετοί), an ancient people in Paphlagonia, dwelling on the river Parthenius, fought on the side of Priam against the Greeks, but had disappeared before the historical times. They were regarded by many ancient writers as the ancestors of the Veneti in Italy. [VENETI.]

Hēniōchi (Ἠνιόχοι), a people in Colchis, N. of the Phasis, notorious as pirates (Strab. p. 496.)

Henna. [ENNA.]

Hephaestia (Ἡφαιστία). 1. (Ἡφαιστιεύς), a town in the NW. of the island of Lemnos.—2. (Ἡφαιστιδης, -τειδης), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Hephaestīades Insūlae. [ÆOLIAE.]

Hephaestion (Ἡφαιστίων). 1. Son of Amyntor, a Macedonian of Pella, celebrated as the friend of Alexander the Great, with whom he had been brought up. Alexander called Hephaestion his own private friend, but Craterus the friend of the king. Hephaestion accompanied Alexander to Asia, and was employed by the king in many important commands. He died at Ecbatana, after an illness of only seven days, B.C. 325. Alexander's grief for his loss was passionate and violent. A general mourning was ordered throughout the empire, and a funeral pile and monument erected to him at Babylon, at a cost, it is said, of 10,000 talents [authorities under ALEXANDER].—2. A Greek grammarian, who instructed the emperor Verus in Greek, and whose date is therefore about A.D. 150. He was perhaps the author of a Manual on Metres (Ἐργχειρίδιον περὶ μέτρων), which has come down to us under the name of Hephaestion. This work is a tolerably complete manual of Greek metres, and forms the basis of all our knowledge on that subject. Edited by Gaisford, Oxon. 1810, and by Westphal, 1866, in Scriptores Metrici Graeci.

Hēphaestus (Ἡφαιστος), called Vulcānus by the Romans, the god of fire. He was, according to Homer, the son of Zeus and Hera (Il. i. 572, xiv. 338; Od. viii. 312). Later traditions state that he had no father, and that Hera gave birth to him independent of Zeus, as she was jealous of Zeus having given birth to Athene independent of her (Hes. Th. 927; Apollod. i. 3, 5). He was born lame and weak, and was in consequence so much disliked by his mother, that she threw him down from Olympus. Thetis and Eurynome received him, and he dwelt with them for nine years in a grotto, beneath Oceanus, making for them beautiful works of art (Il. xviii. 394–409). He afterwards returned to Olympus, and he appears in Homer as the great artist of the gods of Olympus. As to this return a post-Homeric story tells us that out of revenge for his downfall he sent to his mother Hera a golden throne with invisible fetters. When she sat thereon she was fast bound, and, as the only means of her release, the gods wished to bring back Hephaestus. Ares tried his strength, but was repulsed; Dionysus succeeded by making him drunk. (Paus. i. 20, 3; Sappho, Fr. 66; Plat. Rep. p. 378.) This scene is depicted in vase paintings as early as the François Vase, i.e. in the sixth century B.C. In Homer there is no allusion to the revenge, and although he had been cruelly treated by his mother, he always showed her respect and kindness; and on one occasion took her part when she was quarrelling with Zeus, which so much enraged the father of the gods, that he seized Hephaestus by the leg, and hurled him down from heaven. Hephaestus was a whole day falling, but in the evening he alighted in the island of Lemnos, where he was kindly received by the Sintians (Il. i. 590; Apollod. i. 3, 5). He again returned to Olympus, where Hesiod describes his creation of Pandora (Th. 570; Op. 80). In Homer he is mocked by the gods for his ungainly walk (Il. xviii. 410), but he revenged himself upon Ares (Od. viii. 275). His lameness, which belongs to all traditions, is accounted for in mythology by one or other of his two falls from heaven. Some modern writers explain it as suggested by the flickering either of fire or of lightning; others, not without probability, believe the idea to have originated from the fact that blacksmiths were commonly lame men, because this trade was one for which a strong man who happened to be lame was as well suited as anyone else. The palace of Hephaestus in Olympus was imperishable, and shining like stars. It contained his workshop, with the anvil and twenty bellows, which worked spontaneously at his bidding (Il. xviii. 370). It was there that he made all his beautiful and marvellous works, both for gods and men. The ancient poets abound in descriptions of exquisite pieces of work which had been manufactured by the god. All the palaces in Olympus were his workmanship. He made the armour of Achilles; the fatal necklace of Harmonia; the fire-breathing bulls of Aëtes, king of Colchis, &c. In the Iliad the wife of Hephaestus is Charis, in Hesiod Aglaia, the youngest of the Charites; but in the Odyssey, as well as in later accounts, Aphrodite (who proved faithless to him, Od. viii. 295) appears as his wife. The union of Hephaestus with Charis probably signifies the grace of artistic work, though some prefer to connect it with a myth of spring-time; the marriage with Aphrodite would also bear either of these meanings, and moreover there is some ground for the supposition that Aphrodite in Greek mythology took to herself some of the attributes and functions of an older Greek deity Charis [see APHRODITE, p. 86]. Among the later myths connected with Hephaestus is that which makes him assist at the birth of Athene from the head of Zeus (the aid of Hephaestus is not mentioned in Hesiod, but appears in Pind. Ol. vii. 8; Apollod. i. 3, 6, and on vases); and also the story of the birth of Erichthonius, which is related by no writer earlier than Apollodorus (iii. 14, 6), and probably arose out of the desire to connect the earth-born king with Athene and Hephaestus, the patrons of art at Athens: for Hephaestus, like Athene, gave skill to mortal artists, and, conjointly with her, he was believed to have taught men the arts which embellish and adorn life. Hence at Athens they had temples and festivals in common. Hence also both were worshipped in the torch-races; and with them was associated in those festivals Prometheus [Dict. of Ant. art. Lampadedromia]. This latter fact is not hard to explain, for Prometheus was in many respects a counterpart of Hephaestus: both were connected with the gift of fire, though in myth the one appears as the fire-god, the other only as the purveyor of fire;

both were patrons of the arts, and in the story of Pandora were again brought into connexion. As to the origin of the Hephaestus myth, it has doubtless grown out of various natural aspects of fire: primarily perhaps, as many modern writers on mythology now hold, from lightning, the thunder being the hammering of the Olympian smithy; and it is likely enough that the lightning falling to earth suggested the falls of Hephaestus from heaven (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 414); but the observation of volcanoes also supplied parts of the myth. It seems now to be doubted whether Lemnos was really a volcanic island, and some physicists hold that the fire which the ancients saw issuing from it, and of course connected with Hephaestus, was gaseous and not volcanic. But in the sojourn with Thetis beneath the sea there is a clear indication of a myth from volcanoes, and it is questionable whether it is right to make his location in volcanoes merely a late development of the myth. At any rate, the active volcanoes of Sicily and the Lipari islands became fabled as his workshops in the fifth century B.C.; and in them he worked metals and forged thunderbolts with his attendant Cyclopes. (Aesch. Pr. 366; Callim. Hymn. ad Dian. 46; Verg. Aen. viii. 416; Strab. p. 275.)

Hephaestus. (From an altar in the Vatican.)

As regards his connexion in myth with Dionysus, it may be observed that all good wine countries have volcanic soil. During the best period of Grecian art, he was represented as a vigorous man with a beard, and is characterised by his hammer or some other instrument, his oval cap, and the chiton, which leaves the right shoulder and arm uncovered. One leg is sometimes shortened to denote his lameness. As regards the dwarfish figures mentioned in Hdt. iii. 97, as being at Memphis, it may be noted that they were really images of the Egyptian Ptah.—The Roman Vulcanus was an old Italian divinity. [VULCANUS.]

Heptānomis. [ÆGYPTUS.]

Hēra (Ἥρα or Ἥρη), called Juno by the Romans. The Greek Hera was a daughter of Cronos and Rhea, and sister and wife of Zeus (Il. v. 721, xiv. 194, xvi. 432; Hes. Th. 454). According to Homer she was brought up by Oceanus and Tethys, and afterwards became the wife of Zeus without the knowledge of her parents (Il. xiv. 202, 296). This account is variously modified in other traditions. Being a daughter of Cronos, she, like his other children, was swallowed by her father, but afterwards released; and according to an Arcadian tradition she was brought up by Temenus, the son of Pelagus. The Argives, on the other hand, related that she had been brought up by Euboea, Prosymna, and Acraea, the three daughters of the river Asterion (Il. xiv. 346; Paus. ii. 17, 36, vii. 4, 7; Ap. Rh. i. 187; Strab. p. 417; Diod. v. 72). Several parts of Greece claimed the honour of being her birthplace, and more especially Argos and Samos, which were the principal seats of her worship. Several places in Greece also claimed to have been the scene of the marriage with Zeus, such as Euboea, Samos, Cnossus in Crete, and Mount Thornax, in the S. of Argolis. Her marriage, called the Sacred Marriage (ἱερὸς γάμος), was represented in many places where she was worshipped. At her nuptials all the gods honoured her with presents, and Ge presented to her a tree with golden apples, which was watched by the Hesperides, at the foot of the Hyperborean Atlas. (Paus. ii. 7, 1, viii. 22, 2; Apollod. i. 1, 5.)—In the Iliad Hera is treated by the Olympian gods with the same reverence as her husband. Zeus himself listens to her counsels, and communicates his secrets to her. She is, notwithstanding, far inferior to him in power, and must obey him unconditionally. She is not, like Zeus, the ruler of gods and men, but simply the wife of the supreme god. Yet she has a reflected greatness and power from Zeus. Iris is her messenger as well as servant of Zeus, and even Athene is sent by her to Achilles. She can set in motion the thunder, and the sun himself obeys her order to close the day. (Il. i. 55, ii. 156, xi. 45, xviii. 106, 240.) Her character, as described by Homer, is marked by jealousy and by a quarrelsome disposition. Hence arise frequent disputes between Hera and Zeus; and on one occasion Hera plotted with Poseidon and Athene to put Zeus into chains. Zeus, in such cases, not only threatens, but even strikes her. Once he hung her up in the clouds, with her hands chained, and with two anvils suspended from her feet; and on another occasion, when Hephaestus attempted to help her, Zeus hurled him down from Olympus.—By Zeus she was the mother of Ares, Hebe, and Hephaestus.—As Hera was the type of a married goddess among the Olympians, so she is the goddess of marriage and of the birth of children. [For the reason of this, see below.] Several epithets and surnames, such as Εἰλεῖθια, Γαμηλία, Ζυγία, Τελεία, &c., contain allusions to this character of the goddess, and the Ilithyiae are described as her daughters (Il. xi. 270).—Owing to the judgment of Paris [PARIS], she was hostile to the Trojans, and in the Trojan war she accordingly sided with the Greeks. She persecuted all the children of Zeus by mortal mothers, and hence appears as the enemy of Dionysus, Heracles, and others. In the Argonautic expedition she assisted Jason.

It is impossible here to enumerate all the events of mythical story in which Hera acts a part; and the reader must refer to the particular deities or heroes with whose story she is connected.—Hera was worshipped in many parts of Greece, but more especially at Argos (Il. v. 908; Hes. Th. 12), in the neighbourhood of which she had a splendid temple, on the road to Mycenae. Her great festival at Argos is described in the Dict. of Ant. art. Heræa. Next in importance may be regarded her worship at Samos (Hdt. iii. 60; Strab. p. 637) and at Sparta (Il. iv. 51; Paus. iii. 13, 8); but it was widely spread over all Greece and the islands and in the western colonies, especially at Croton. The ancients gave several interpretations respecting the real significance of Hera. By some she was regarded as the goddess of the earth, and the ἱερὸς γάμος was interpreted as the union of earth and heaven. By others she was made the goddess of the air or of the clouds. But probably the truest view is that she was originally a moon-goddess, as was also her Roman counterpart, Juno. Hence it was that in some places, as Naxos, she was identified with Dione, by which name that Power, who in the Homeric age was called Hera, seems to have been originally known. Her old position as moon-goddess explains her being worshipped at the new moon, her rank as queen of heaven and wife of Zeus, her attribute of βοῶπις, which, though not so used in Homer, probably points to an original representation with crescent horns; above all it supplies the reason for Hera being one of the deities (all in some way connected with the moon) who presided over childbirth (as did Juno in Italy). This was because the moon was regarded as influencing menstruation, and was therefore thought to be especially connected with the birth of children (Aristot. H. A. vii. 2, 1; Plut. Symp. iii. 10, 3; Varro, L. L. v. 59). That such was her function does not indeed appear in Homer, who does not represent her as intervening in childbirth, except adversely (Il. xix.

119, possibly a later addition to the Iliad); but it is indicated by her being called the mother of the Iliithyiaæ, as was stated above, and in some places she was herself worshipped as Ἥρα Εἰλεῖθνια (cf. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vi. 149). From this follows her position as the goddess of marriage [see above]. In the earliest art the representations of Hera, after the mere shapeless blocks of wood or stone (Paus. vii. 22, 4; Arnob. vi. 2), were wooden ξόανα, of which the earliest was said to be that of Tiryns (Paus. ii. 17, 5); later, but still archaic, representations showed her as the bride of Zeus, standing with a long veil, as may be seen on some Samian coins; in other archaic sculptures she was seated on a throne. In her idealised form, from the great statue of Polycleetus at Argos onwards (Paus. ii. 17, 4), the type of Hera's statues was probably such as later works have preserved to us, that of a majestic woman with a beautiful forehead and large widely-opened eyes (the Homeric βοῶπις). Her head is often adorned with a diadem (stephanos), sometimes with a calathus, or with a veil; in her hand she carries a sceptre, which is sometimes surmounted by the figure of a cuckoo (as in the statue of Polycleetus). Sometimes her sacred bird, the peacock, is painted by her side.

of Italy, congresses were held in this town under the presidency of the Tarentines. Pyrrhus here defeated the Romans under Laevinus, B.C. 280; and to gain over the Heracleots to their side the Romans granted them a treaty on favourable terms in 273 (Cic. pro Arch. 4, 6, pro Balb. 8, 21). H. Minōa (Μινῶα: nr. Torre di Cape Bianco, Ru.), on the S. coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the river Halycens, between Agrigentum and Selinus. According to tradition it was founded by Minos, when he pursued Daedalus to Sicily, and it may have been an ancient colony of the Cretans. We know, however, that it was afterwards colonised by the inhabitants of Selinus, and that its original name was Minōa, which it continued to bear till about B.C. 500, when the town was taken by the Lacedaemonians under Enryleon, who changed its name into that of Heraclea; but it continued to bear its ancient appellation as a surname to distinguish it from other places of the same name (Diod. iv. 23; Hdt. v. 46; Pol. i. 25; Liv. xxiv. 35). It fell at an early period into the hands of the Carthaginians, and remained in their power till the conquest of Sicily by the Romans, who planted a colony there (Cic. Verr. ii. 50, 125).—8. H. It was founded about B. C. 550, by colonists from Megara and from Tanagra in Boeotia (not, as Strabo says, from Miletus). (Paus. v. 26, 6; Just. xvi. 3; Strab. p. 546; Xen. An. vi. 2, 1.) After various political struggles, it settled down under a monarchical form of government. It reached the height of its prosperity in the reign of Darius Codomannus, when it had an extensive commerce, and a territory reaching from the Parthenius to the Sangarius. It began to decline in consequence of the rise of the kingdom of Bithynia and the foundation of Nicomedia, and the invasion of Asia Minor by the Gauls; and its ruin was completed in the Mithridatic war, when the city was taken and plundered, and partly destroyed, by the Romans under Cotta. It was the native city of HERACLES PONTICUS, and perhaps of the painter ZEUXIS.—2. H. ad Latmum (*Ἡ. Near it was a cave, with the tomb of Endymion (Paus. v. 1, 4; Strab. p. 635).—There was another city of the same name in Caria, one in Lydia, two in Syria, one in Media, and one in India, none of which require special notice.

Heracles (Ἡρακλῆς), in Latin writers Hercules, the most celebrated of all the heroes of antiquity. For, as the various local legends exemplifying heroic strength were by the Greek colonists adopted for their own Heracles, his name prevailed, not only in all the countries round the Mediterranean, but even in the most distant lands of the ancient world. The question of his origin will be more conveniently touched upon when the stories in Greek literature have been briefly told, in which a constant development from the accretion of local Greek myths, and still more from the influence of Phœnician and Egyptian religions, will be apparent. For while in the earliest traditions Heracles was probably a purely human hero, a conqueror of men and cities, he afterwards appears as the subduer of monstrous animals, and is connected in a variety of ways with astronomical phenomena. I. Greek Legends. According to Homer (though it may be observed that he is not named in what are regarded as the older portions of the Iliad), Heracles was the son of Zeus by Alcmena of Thebes in Boeotia. His stepfather was Amphitryon. (Il. v. 392, xiv. 250, 323, xviii. 118, xix. 98; Od. xi. 266, 620, xxi. 25; cf. Hes. Th. 526, 951, Sc. 35; Pind. Isthm. vii. 5; Apollod. ii. 4, 7.) Amphitryon was the son of Alcaeus, the son of Perseus; and Alcmena was a granddaughter of Perseus. Hence Heracles belonged to the family of Perseus. Zeus visited Alcmena in the form of Amphitryon, while the latter was absent warring against the Taphians; and he, pretending to be her husband, became by her the father of Heracles. [For details, see ALC-MENE; AMPHITRYON.] On the day on which Heracles was to be born, Zeus boasted of his becoming the father of a hero who was to rule over the race of Perseus. Hera prevailed upon him to swear that the descendant of Perseus born that day should be the ruler. Thereupon she hastened to Argos, and there caused the wife of Sthenelus to give birth to Eurystheus; whereas, by keeping away the Ilithyiae, she delayed the birth of Heracles, and thus robbed him of the empire which Zeus had destined for him. Zeus was enraged at the imposition practised upon him, but could not violate his oath. Alcmena brought into the world two boys, Heracles, the son of Zeus, and Iphicles, the son of Amphitryon, who was one night younger than Heracles. (Il. xix. 95–132; Hes. Sc. 1–56.) In Homer and Hesiod we are only told that he grew strong in body and mind, that confiding in his own powers he defied even the immortal gods, and wounded Hera and Ares, and that under the protection of Zeus and Athene he escaped the dangers which Hera prepared for him. To these simple accounts various particulars are added in later writers. As he lay in his cradle, Hera sent two serpents to destroy him, but the infant hero strangled them with his own hands (Pind. Nem. i. 33; Theocr. xxiv. 1; Apollod. ii. 4, 8). As he grew up, he was instructed by Amphitryon in driving a chariot, by Autolycus in wrestling, by Eurystus in archery, by Castor in fighting with heavy armour, and by Linus in singing and playing the lyre. Linus was killed by his pupil with the lyre, because he had censured him; and Amphitryon, to prevent similar occurrences, sent him to feed his cattle. (Theocr. xxiv. 103–114; Apollod. ii. 4, 9; Diod. iii. 66.) In this manner he spent his life till his 18th year. To this period belongs the beautiful allegory introduced by Prodicus as the ‘Choice of Heracles.’ Heracles, when he had reached the critical time of youth, went out into a solitary place and sat in doubt, which path of life he should follow. Here Virtue and Pleasure (whose name was also Vice) appeared to him in the guise of tall and beautiful women, but the one of modest beauty, the other of the reverse. Pleasure offered him a life of ease and enjoyment, Virtue a path of toil leading to glory; and he chose the toilsome path of virtue. (Xen. Mem. ii. 1, 21; Cic. de Off. i. 32, 118.) His first great adventure happened while he was still watching the oxen of his father. A huge lion, which haunted Mount Cithaeron, made great havoc among the flocks of Amphitryon and Thespius (or Thespius), king of Thespiæ (Apollod. ii. 4, 10; Diod. iv. 29; Athen. p. 556). Heracles slew the lion, and henceforth wore its skin as his ordinary garment, and its mouth and head as his helmet. Others related that the lion-skin of Heracles was taken from the Nemean lion. On his return to Thebes, he met the envoys of king Ergiulus of Orchomenos, who were going to fetch the annual tribute of 100 oxen which they had compelled the Thebans to pay. Heracles cut off the noses and ears of the envoys, and thus sent them back to Erginus. The latter thereupon marched against Thebes; but Heracles defeated and killed Erginus, and compelled the Orchomenians to pay double the tribute which they had formerly received from the Thebans (Eur. H. F. 220; Apollod. ii. 4, 11; Diod. iv. 10; Paus. ix. 37, 3). Creon rewarded Heracles with the hand of his daughter, Megara, by whom he became the father of several children. The gods made him presents of arms: Hermes gave him a sword, Apollo a bow and arrows, Hephaestus a golden coat of mail, and Athene a peplos. He cut for himself a club in the neighbourhood of Nemea—according to others, the club was of brass, and the gift of Hephaestus (Ap. Rh. i. 1196; Diod. iv. 14).—Soon afterwards Heracles was driven mad by Hera, and in this state he killed his own children by Megara and two of Iphicles. In his grief he sentenced himself to exile, and went to Thespis, who purified him (Apollod. ii. 4, 12, cf. Paus. ix. 11, 1). [The Attic legend, followed by Euripides in the Heracles Furens, places this madness later.] He then consulted the oracle of Delphi as to where he should settle. The Pythia first called him by the name of Heracles—for hitherto his name had been Alcides or Alcaeus (from his grandfather, Alceus or Alcaeus, the father of Amphitryon)—and ordered him to live at Tiryns, and to serve Eurystheus for the space of twelve years, after which he should become immortal. Heracles accordingly went to Tiryns, and executed the twelve labours which Eurystheus ordered him to perform.—The number twelve is not found in the older writers, and the complete cycle is made up by later additions. It is probably of Phoenician origin, and is borrowed from the twelve signs of the Zodiac in connexion with the worship of Melkart or of the sun-god Baal [see below]. In literature the whole twelve labours first appear in the Heraclea of Pisander, about 650 B.C., and are similarly given by Euripides (H. F. 347 ff.), but Sophocles (Trach. 1092 ff.) mentions only six. Ten appear on the so-called Theseum at Athens; twelve were shown on the temple of Zeus at Olympia (of which fragments have been discovered) and on the Heracleum at Thebes (Paus. v. 10, 9, ix. 11, 4). The only one find in Homer his expedition to Troy, to fetch the horses which Laomedon had refused him; and his war against the Pylians, when he destroyed the whole family of their king, Neleus, with the exception of Nestor (Il. v. 638; Od. xxi. 14). Hesiod mentions several of the feats of Heracles distinctly, but knows nothing of their number twelve. They are usually arranged in the following order.—1. The fight with the Nemean lion. The valley of Nemea, between Cleonae and Phlius, was inhabited by a monstrous lion, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna. Eurystheus ordered Heracles to bring him the skin of this monster. After using in vain his club and arrows against the lion, he strangled the animal with his own hands. (Hes. Th. 327; Theocr. xxv. 251; Diod. iv. 11.)—2. Fight against the Lernean hydra.

II. Heracles and Hydra. (From a marble at Naples.)

This monster, like the lion, was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna, and was brought up by Hera. It ravaged the country of Lerne near Argos, and dwelt in a swamp near the well of Amymone. It had nine heads, of which the middle one was immortal. Heracles struck off its heads with his club; but in the place of the head he cut off, two new ones grew forth each time. A gigantic crab also came to the assistance of the hydra, and wounded Heracles. However, with the assistance of his faithful servant Iolaus, he burned away the heads of the hydra, and buried the ninth or immortal of the twelve labours mentioned by Homer is his descent into the lower world to carry off Cerberus, but he speaks of them in the plural (Il. v. 395, viii. 366, xv. 639; Od. xi. 623). We also one under a huge rock. Having thus conquered the monster, he poisoned his arrows with its bile, whence the wounds inflicted by them became incurable. Eurystheus declared the victory unlawful, as Heracles had won it with the aid of Iolaus. (Hes. Th. 313; Eur. H. F. 419; Paus. ii. 36, 37; Apollod. ii. 5, 2; Diod. iv. 11; Verg. Aen. viii. 300; Ov. Met. ix. 70).—3. Capture of the Arcadian stag (or hind). This animal had golden antlers and brazen feet. It had been dedicated to Artemis by the nymph Taygete, because the goddess had saved her from the pursuit of Zeus. Heracles was ordered to bring the animal alive to Mycenae. He pursued it in vain for a whole year; at length he wounded it with an arrow, caught it, and carried it away on his shoulders. While in Arcadia, he was met by Artemis, who was angry with him for having outraged the animal sacred to her; but he succeeded in soothing her anger, and carried his prey to Mycenae. (Pind. Ol. iii. 27; Eur. H. F. 378; Diod. iv. 13; Ov. Met. ix. 188; Verg. Aen. vi. 803).—4. Destruction of the Erymanthian boar. This animal, which Heracles was ordered to bring alive to Eurystheus, had descended from Mount Erymanthus into Psophis. Heracles chased him through the deep snow, and having thus worn him out, he caught him in a net, and carried him to Mycenae. Other traditions place the hunt of the Erymanthian boar in Thessaly, and some even in Phrygia. When Heracles appeared carrying the huge beast on his shoulders, Eurystheus was seized with panic, and took refuge in a tub. (Eur. H. F. 368; Diod. iv. 12; Apollod. ii. 5, 4.) It must be observed that this and the subsequent labours of Heracles are connected with certain subordinate labours, called Parerga (Πάτερρα). The first of these parerga is the fight of Heracles with the Centaurs. In his pursuit of the boar he came to the centaur Pholus, who had received from Dionysus a cask of excellent wine. Heracles opened it, contrary to the wish of his host, and the delicious fragrance attracted the other centaurs, who besieged the grotto of Pholus. Heracles drove them away; they fled to the house of Chiron; and Heracles, eager in his pursuit, wounded Chiron, his old friend, with one of his poisoned arrows; in consequence of which Chiron died. [CHIRON.] Pholus likewise was wounded by one of the arrows, which by accident fell on his foot and killed him. This fight with the centaurs gave rise to the establishment of mysteries by which

Demeter intended to purify the hero from the blood he had shed against his own will. (Eur. H. F. 364; Paus. viii. 24, 2; Diod. iv. 14; Ov. Met. ix. 192).—5. Cleansing of the stables of Augeas. Eurystheus imposed upon Heracles the task of cleansing in one day the stalls of Augeas, king of Elis. Augeas had a herd of 3000 oxen, whose stalls had not been cleansed for thirty years. Heracles, without mentioning the command of Eurystheus, went to Augeas, and offered to cleanse his stalls in one day, if he would give him the tenth part of his cattle. Augeas agreed to the terms; and Heracles after taking Phyleus, the son of Augeas, as his witness, led the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stalls, which were thus cleansed in a single day. But Augeas, when he learned that Heracles had undertaken the work by the command of Eurystheus, refused to give him the reward. His son Phyleus then bore witness against his father, who exiled him from Elis. Eurystheus, however, declared the exploit null and void, because Heracles had stipulated with Augeas for a reward for performing it. (Theocr. xxv. 88; Apollod. ii. 5, 5; Athen. p. 412; Paus. v. 1, 7.) At a later time Heracles invaded Elis, and killed Augeas and his sons. After this he is said to have founded the Olympic games (Pind. Ol. xi. 27; Apollod. ii. 7, 2).—6. Destruction of the Stymphalian birds. These birds had been brought up by Ares. They had brazen claws, wings, and beaks, used their feathers as arrows, and ate human flesh. They dwelt on a lake near Stymphalus in Arcadia, from which Heracles was ordered by

VI. Heracles and the Stymphalian Birds. (From a gem at Florence.)

Eurystheus to expel them. When Heracles undertook the task, Athene provided him with a brazen rattle, by the noise of which he startled the birds; and, as they attempted to fly away, he killed some of them with his arrows. Others he only drove away; and they appeared again in the island of Aretias, where they were found by the Argonauts. (Paus. viii. 22, 4; Apollod. ii. 5, 6; Ap. Rh. ii. 1037).—7. Capture of the Cretan bull. According to some this was the bull which had carried Europa across the sea. According to others, the bull had been sent out of the sea by Poseidon, that Minos might offer it in sacrifice. But Minos was so charmed with the beauty of the animal, that he kept it, and sacrificed another in its stead. Poseidon punished Minos, by driving the bull mad, and causing it to commit great havoc in the island. Heracles was ordered by Eurystheus to catch the bull, and Minos willingly allowed him to do so. Heracles accomplished the task, and brought the animal home on his shoulders; but he then set it free again. The bull now roamed through Greece, and at last came to Marathon, where we meet it again in the stories of Theseus. (Apollod. ii. 5, 7; Paus. v. 10, 9;

VII. Heracles and Bull. (From a bas-relief in the Vatican.)

Diod. iv. 13.)—8. Capture of the mares of the Thracian Diomedes. This Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, fed his horses with human flesh. Eurystheus ordered Heracles to bring these animals to Mycenae. With a few companions, he seized the animals, and conducted them to the sea coast. But here he was overtaken by the Bistones. During the fight he entrusted the mares to his friend Abderus, who was devoured by them. Heracles defeated the Bistones, killed Diomedes, whose body he threw before the mares, built the town of Abdera in honour of his unfortunate friend, and then returned to Mycenae with the mares, which had become tame after eating the flesh of their master. The mares were afterwards set free, and were destroyed on Mt. Olympus by wild beasts. (Eur. Alc. 483, 493; H. F. 380; Diod. iv. 15; Apollod. ii. 5, 8.)—9. Seizure of the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, possessed a girdle, which she had received from Arcs. Admete, the daughter of Eurystheus, wished to obtain this girdle; and Heracles was therefore sent to fetch it. He was accompanied by a number of volunteers, and after various adventures in Europe and Asia, he at length reached the country of the Amazons. Hippolyte at first received him kindly, and promised him her girdle; but Hera having excited the Amazons against him, a contest ensued, in which Heracles killed their queen. He then took her girdle, and carried it with him. In this expedition Heracles killed the two sons of Boreas, Calais and Zetes; and he also begot three sons by Echidna, in the country of the Hyperboreans. On his way home he landed in Troas, where he rescued Hesione from the monster sent against her by Poseidon; in return for which service her father Laomedon promised him the horses he had received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. But, as Laomedon did not keep his word, Heracles on leaving threatened to make war against Troy. He landed in Thrace, where he slew Sarpedon, and at length returned through Macedonia to Peloponnesus. (Eur. H. F. 413, Ion, 1143; Apollod. ii. 5, 9; Diod. iv. 16; cf. Il. v. 649; Hdt. iv. 9.)—10. Capture of the oxen of Geryones in Erythia. Geryones, the monster with three bodies, lived in the fabulous island of Erythia, so called because it lay under the red rays of the setting sun in the W. This island was originally placed off the coast of Epirus, but was afterwards identified either with Gades or the Balearic islands, and was at all times believed to be in the distant W. The oxen of Geryones were guarded by the giant Eurytion and the two-headed dog Orthrus; and Heracles was commanded by Eurystheus to fetch them. After traversing various countries, he reached at length the frontiers of Libya and Europe, where he erected two pillars (Calpe and Abyla) on the two sides of the straits of Gibraltar, which were hence called the pillars of Heracles. Being annoyed by the heat of the sun, Heracles shot at Helios, who so much admired his boldness, that he presented him with a golden cup or boat, in which he sailed to Erythia. He there slew Eurytion and his dog, as well as Geryones, and sailed with his booty to Tartessus, where he returned the golden cup (boat) to Helios. On his way home he passed through Gaul, Italy, Illyricum and Thrace, and met with numerous adventures, which are variously embellished by the poets. Many attempts were made to deprive him of the oxen, but he at length brought them in safety to Eurystheus, who sacrificed them to Hera. (Hes. Th. 287; Pind. Nem. iii. 21; Hdt. iv. 8; Apollod. ii. 5, 10; Strab. p. 221; Diod. iv. 17.) These ten labours were performed by Heracles in the space of eight years and one month; but as Eurystheus declared two of them to have been performed unlawfully, he commanded him to accomplish two more.—11. Fetching the golden apples of the Hesperides. This was particularly difficult, since Heracles did not know where to find them. They were the apples which Hera had received at her wedding from Ge, and which she had entrusted to the keeping of the Hesperides and the dragon Ladon, on Mt. Atlas, in the country of the Hyperboreans. [For details see HESPERIDES.] After various adventures in Europe, Asia and Africa, in the course of which he delivered Prometheus, and slew Antaeus, Busiris and Emathion, Heracles at length arrived at Mt. Atlas. On the advice of Prometheus, he sent Atlas to fetch the apples, and in the meantime bore the weight of heaven for him. Atlas returned with the apples, but refused to take the burden of heaven on his shoulders again. Heracles, however, contrived by a stratagem to get the apples, and hastened away. On his return Eurystheus made him a present of the apples; but Heracles dedicated them to Athene, who restored them to their former place. In traditions Heracles killed the dragon Ladon, and gathered the apples himself. (Eur. H. F. 394; Apollod. ii. 5, 11; Diod. iv. 26; Ap. Rh. iv. 1396; Hyg. Fab. 31.)—12. Bringing Cerberus from the lower world. This was the most difficult of the twelve labours of Heracles. He descended into Hades, near Taenarum in Laconia, accompanied by Hermes and Athene. He delivered Theseus and Ascalaphus from their torments. He obtained permission from Pluto to carry Cerberus to the upper world, provided he could accomplish it without force of arms. Heracles succeeded in seizing the monster and carrying it to the upper world; and after he had shown it to Eurystheus, he carried it back again to the lower world. (Il. viii. 366; Od. xi. 623; Diod. iv. 25; Apollod. ii. 5, 12; Paus. ii. 31, 2.)—Besides these twelve labours (ἄθλοι), Heracles performed several other feats (ἄσπεργα) without being commanded by Eurystheus. Several of them were interwoven with the twelve labours and have been already described: those which had no connexion with the twelve labours are spoken of below. After Heracles had performed the twelve labours, he was released from the servitude of Eurystheus, and returned to Thebes. He there gave Megara in marriage to Iolaus; and he wished to gain in marriage for himself Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Oechalia. Eurytus promised his daughter to the man who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Heracles defeated them; but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give Iole to him, because he had murdered his own children. Soon afterwards the oxen of Eurytus were carried off, and it was suspected that Heracles was the offender. Iphitus again defended him, and requested his assistance in searching after the oxen. Heracles agreed; but when the two had arrived at Tiryns, Heracles, in a fit of madness, threw his friend down from the wall, and killed him. Deiphobus of Anycel purified him from this murder, but he was, nevertheless, attacked by a severe illness. Heracles then repaired to Delphi to obtain a remedy, but the Pythia refused to answer his questions. A struggle ensued between Heracles and Apollo, and the combatants were not separated till Zeus sent a flash of lightning between them. (Od. xxi. 22; Soph. Trach. 270; Paus. x. 13; Apollod. ii. 6, 1; Diod. iv. 31.) In this combat Heracles attempted to carry off the tripod: a story which indicates that Heracles at one time shared with Apollo the attribute of the tripod as well as that of the bow, though the tripod passed entirely to Apollo. It may also denote a displacement of the worship of Heracles at Delphi by Apollo, to which Pausanias seems to allude. It was a favourite subject in vase paintings from an early period. The oracle now declared that he would be restored to health if he would serve three years for wages, and surrender his earnings to Eurytus, as an atonement for the murder of Iphitus. Thereupon he became a servant to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and widow of Tmolus. Heracles is described as living effeminately during his residence with Omphale: he span wool, it is said, and sometimes put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion-skin. (Diod. iv. 31; Apollod. ii. 6, 3; Ov. Fast. ii. 305, Her. ix. 53.) According to other accounts he nevertheless performed several great feats during his time. He made prisoners of the Cercopes, who had robbed him [CERCOPES]; he undertook an expedition to Colchis, which brought him into connexion with the Argonauts; he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and met Theseus on his landing from Troezen on the Corinthian isthmus. An expedition to India, which was mentioned in some traditions, may likewise be inserted in this place. (Hdt. vii. 198; Ant. Lib. 26; Apollod. i. 9, 16; Arrian, Ind. 8, 9.)—When the time of his servitude had expired, he sailed against Troy, took the city, and killed Laomedon, its king. (Il. v. 641, xiv. 251, xx. 145; Eur. Troad. 802.) On his return from Troy, a storm drove him on the island of Cos, where he was attacked by the Moropes; but he defeated them and killed their king, Eurypylus. It was about this time that the gods sent for him in order to fight against the Giants. (Il. xiv. 255; Pind. Nem. iv. 40; Apollod. ii. 7, 1.) [GIGANTES.]—Soon after his return to Argos, he marched against Augeas, as has been related above. He then proceeded against Pylos, which he took, and killed Periclymenus, a son of Neleus. He next advanced against Lacedaemon, to punish the sons of Hippocoon, for having assisted Neleus and slain Oenon, the son of Licymnius. He took Lacedaemon, and assigned the government of it to Tyndareus. (Pans. iii. 15, 2; Diod. iv. 33.) On his return to Tegea, he became, by Auge, the father of Telephus [AUGE]; and he then proceeded to Calydon, where he obtained Deianira, the daughter of Oeneus, for his wife, after fighting with Achelous for her. [DEIANIRA: ACHELOUS.] After Heracles had been married to Deianira nearly three years, he accidentally killed, at a banquet in the house of Oeneus, the boy Eunomus. In accordance with the law Heracles went into exile, taking with him his wife Deianira. On their road they came to the river Evenus, across which the centaur Nessus carried travellers for a small sum of money. Heracles himself forded the river, but gave Deianira to Nessus to carry across. Nessus attempted to outrage her: Heracles heard her cries, and shot an arrow into the heart of Nessus. The dying centaur called out to Deianira to take his blood with her, as it was a sure means of preserving the love of her husband. (Soph. Trach. 555; Ov. Met. ix. 201.) He then conquered the Dryopes, and helped Aegimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithae. [AEGIMIUS.] After this he took up his abode at Trachis, whence he marched against Eurytus of Oechalia. He took Oechalia, killed Eurytus and his sons, and carried off his daughter Iole as a prisoner. On his return home he landed at Cenaeum, a promontory of Euboea, erected an altar to Zeus, and sent his companion, Lichas, to Trachis, in order to fetch him a white garment, which he intended to use during the sacrifice. Deianira, afraid lest Iole should supplant her in the affections of her husband, steeped the white garment in the blood of Nessus. This blood had been poisoned by the arrow with which Heracles had shot Nessus; and accordingly as soon as the garment became warm on the body of Heracles, the poison penetrated into all his limbs, and caused him the most excruciating agony. He seized Lichas by his feet, and threw him into the sea. He wrenched off the garment, but it stuck to his flesh, and with it he tore away whole pieces from his body. In this state he was conveyed to Trachis. Deianira, on seeing what she had unwittingly done, hanged herself. Heracles commanded Hyllus, his eldest son by Deianira, to marry Iole as soon as he should arrive at the age of manhood. He then ascended Mt. Oeta, raised a pile of wood, on which he placed himself, and ordered it to be set on fire. No one ventured to obey him, until at length Poes the shepherd was prevailed upon to comply with the desire of the suffering hero. (Hdt. vii. 198; Soph.

Trachiniae; Diod. iv. 38; Apollod. ii. 7, 7; Ov. Met. ix. 155.) When the pile was burning, a cloud came down from heaven, and amid peals of thunder carried him to Olympus, where he was honoured with immortality, became reconciled to Hera, and married her daughter Hebe, by whom he became the father of Alexiades and Anicetus. (Od. xi. 603; Hes. Th. 949; Pind. Nem. i. 70.)—Heracles, as a god, was introduced into Greece by the Phoenician traders and settlers, especially those at Thebes, Rhodes, and Thasos, and he represents partly the Babylonian sun-god Baal, who undergoes twelve labours as the sun passes through twelve signs of the zodiac; partly the city-god Melkart of the Phoenicians (cf. Hdt. ii. 43). The Greeks in adopting the Eastern deity, altered the mythology relating to him by transforming him into a national hero who delivers the country from many monsters and from all sorts of difficulties. The stories of the land in prehistoric times being cleared from wild beasts were attached to the name of Heracles, and the works of drainage and road-making, executed by some ancient and forgotten inhabitants (in many cases probably by the Phoenicians), were exaggerated into the miraculous deeds ascribed to him. The legends about him were constantly increasing, because in new lands reached by the Greeks some local hero or divinity who represented strength of body and mighty deeds was identified with Heracles, and his acts were added to the list. Moreover, the worship of the Phoenician Melkart had been carried by traders to many places in the West: from this cause also Heracles became the type of a mighty traveller. Especially his story became connected with deeds at Phoenician Gades (as in the tenth labour); and again, since he was worshipped in Lydia, it became necessary for him to serve the Lydian Omphale; he even took her garb, as some think, because an Oriental deity as a female counterpart of the male god existed there. A theory has recently been put forward which deserves consideration, that Omphale was really the local deity of the Malian district, and also that the myth of Heracles taking a woman's dress was derived from a ritual mentioned by Plutarch at Cos, in which the priest was dressed as a woman. It has been suggested again, that as the Heraeum at Argos was a refuge for slaves, the stories of servitude to Hera arose from that fact. Heracles took to himself also many other characteristics of local divinities. Among them, he was in some places regarded as the god of the gifts of the earth (which explains his being sometimes represented with a cornucopia); and perhaps from a kindred idea he appears as the god who finds and guards hot springs rising from the ground, being identified with local deities of springs. This is more probable than that it was, as some say, merely because athletes bathe frequently.—II. The Roman Hercules, though eventually identified with the Greek Heracles, and probably deriving his name from him, holds the place of a deity whose origin was distinctly Italian. This Italian deity among the Sabines was called Semo Sancus, and there is good reason for the belief that he was in reality the Genius Jovis: that is, he was the power who watched over men and gave them strength and victory, just as the Italian Juno watched over women [GENIUS]. Hence Hercules was the god who guarded the household (Hercules Domesticus) and also who guarded the state (H. Custos); the giver of victory (H. Victor and Invictus):

and especially he was the god who maintained righteous dealing and the sanctity of oaths; and therefore was the god by whom oaths were taken = Dius Fidius [FIDIUS]. Again from the relations of Hercules and Juno to men and women respectively, and from the fact that obligations and compacts were under the province of Hercules, both these deities had to do with the Roman rite of marriage, and the bridal dress was fastened by the nodus Herculeus or Herculeanus. [Dict. of Ant. art. Matrimonium.] When the Italian deity was identified with this Greek deity is not certain; but it is probable that the Hercules whom Romulus is said to have worshipped—i.e. the original Hercules at Rome—was the purely Italian deity, and that the Greek Heracles was not adopted at any rate before the Tarquinian epoch, though Livy (i. 7) assigned an earlier date. The reasons for the identification were probably that both were deities who gave strength, and both were connected with stories of combat against powers of evil or of darkness: and, moreover, the Genius Jovis or Dius Fidius came to be regarded as the son of Jupiter, and so was taken to be Hercules the son of Zeus. With regard to the name there is more doubt, but it seems on the whole probable that the name Hercules is an Italianised form of Heracles, and prevailed over the native name when the Greek legends and the Greek form of worship was established. Some, however, have held that the word is Latin and is connected with hercere or herciscere, denoting the god of enclosures or property: others connect it with Kerus = Genius; but though the latter would agree with the fact that Hercules = Genius, yet it is difficult to regard the similarity of the Greek and Roman names as a mere accident. The Greek form of worship was at any rate in use when the lectisternium was first introduced, b.c. 399 (Liv. v. 13), for Hercules was one of the six deities then honoured, and there is little doubt of the Greek origin of the rite [Dict. of Ant. art. Lectisternium]. All the Greek stories of Hercules were also incorporated with the legends of the native deity; and so in the myth of Cacus Hercules is represented as on his return from the expedition which Heracles made against Geryon (Verg. Aen. viii. 190; Ov. Fast. i. 543). Yet this is clearly added, and the story was of Italian origin in which the god bore the name Garanus (Verr. Flacc. ap. Serv. ad Aen. viii. 203). This name (which appears as Recaranus in Aurel. Vict. Orig. 8), whether it be, as some think, of Celtic origin, or, as is not improbable, connected with the word Kerus = Genius, was a local name for the Italian Hercules, and the native legend makes him a country god or deified herdsman, who smote Cacus the robber of oxen. Cacus is by many supposed to represent the evil powers of the underworld, against whom Heracles or Garanus contended. [CACUS.] The frequent mention of Hercules as the god of gain and the protector of treasures (Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 12; Pers. ii. 10), and his connexion on this account with Mercury in inscriptions, may be traced to his functions as god of the household store, mentioned above. It has often been supposed that the connexion with the Muses indicated by the title Hercules Musarum and Herc. Musagetes is not of Greek origin, but this is probably croneous, and it is likely that the attribute was borrowed from Heracles with the lyre, which is a favourite representation in Greek art, alluding probably to songs of victory belonging to a Ἡρακλῆς Καλλίνικος. Hercules was worshipped at Rome in the round temple of H. Victor in the Boarium and at the Ara Maxima near it, on which a title of the spoils taken in war was dedicated to him as god of victory. A peculiar point in the ritual of this temple was the exclusion of flies and dogs (Plin. xxxiv. 33; Solin. i. 10). Whether this 'taboo' has the same origin as the Arcadian deity Myiagrus and the Elean Myiacoeres, who delivered the people from plagues of flies (Paus. viii. 26, 7; Plin. x. 75), is not very certain. It is remarkable with regard to the position of Hercules as god of victory that the Salii at Tibur were priests in the temple of Hercules Victor. For the priests of Hercules at Rome, see PINARIA GENS.—In art Heracles is represented with a powerful frame and small head, having a club or a bow, and usually with a lion-skin, but it should be noted that this lion-skin does not appear on any representation earlier than the end of the sixth century b.c., which agrees with the theory that the epic of Pisander of Rhodes marks the time when there was a great development and increase in the myths of Heracles, partly from Phoenician and Egyptian influence. The lion-skin is sometimes drawn, like a cowl, over the head, especially on coins; but the favourite type of Heracles is that of a powerful bearded man, naked, but with the lion-skin hanging on his arm or worn like a chlamys. The beardless type is also common at various dates. The famous 'Farnese Hercules' by Glycon, showing Heracles leaning on his club and (probably) looking down at Telephus, is with good reason thought to preserve the attitude and characteristics which were adopted and popularised by Lysippus.

Hēracleūm (Ἡράκλειον), the name of several promontories and towns, of which none require special notice except: 1. A town in Macedonia at the mouth of the Apilas, near the frontiers of Thessaly.—2. The harbour of Cnossus in Crete.—3. A town on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, a little W. of Canopus; from which the Canopic mouth of the Nile was often called also the Heracleotic mouth.—4. A place near Gindarus in the Syrian province of Cyrrestice, where Ventidius, the legate of M. Antony, gained his great victory over the Parthians under Pacorus, in B.C. 38 (Strab. p. 751).

Hērachiānus (Ἡρακλειανός), one of the officers of Honorius, put Stilicho to death (A.D. 408), and received, as the reward, the government of Africa. In 413 he revolted against Honorius, and invaded Italy; but his enterprise failed, and on his return to Africa he was put to death at Carthage. (Zos. v. 37, vi. 7-11.)

Hēracleidae (Ἡρακλεῖδαι), the descendants of Heracles, who, in conjunction with the Dorians, conquered Peloponnesus. It had been the will of Zeus, so ran the legend, that Heracles should rule over the country of the Perseids, at Mycenae and Tiryns. But, through Hera's cunning, Eurystheus had been put into the place of Heracles, who had become the servant of the former. After the death of Heracles, his claims devolved upon his sons and descendants. At the time of his death, Hyllus, the eldest of his four sons by Deianira, was residing with his brothers at the court of Ceyx at Trachis. As Eurystheus demanded their surrender, and Ceyx was unable to protect them, they fled to various parts of Greece, until they were received as suppliants at Athens, at the altar of Eleos (Mercy). (Diod. iv. 57; Paus. i. 32, 5; Apollod. ii. 8, 1.) According to the Heraclidae of Euripides, the sons of Heracles were first staying at Argos, thence went to Trachis in Thessaly, and at length came to Athens. Demophon, the son of Theseus, received them, and they settled in the Attic tetrapolis. Eurystheus, to whom the Athenians refused to surrender the fugitives, now marched against the Athenians with a large army, but was defeated by the Athenians under Iolaus, Theseus, and Hyllus, and was slain with his sons. The battle itself was celebrated in Attic story as the battle of the Scironian rock, on the coast of the Saronic gulf, though Pindar places it in the neighbourhood of Thebes (Pyth. 187; cf. Hdt. ix. 137). After the battle, the Heracleidae entered Peloponnesus, and maintained themselves there for one year. This was their first invasion of Peloponnesus. But a plague, which spread over the whole peninsula, compelled them to return to Attica, where, for a time, they again settled in the Attic tetrapolis. From thence they proceeded to Aegimius, king of the Dorians, whom Heracles had assisted in his war against the Lapithae, and who had promised to preserve a third of his territory for the children of Heracles. [AEGIMIUS.] The Heracleidae were hospitably received by Aegimius, and Hyllus was adopted by the latter. After remaining in Doris three years, Hyllus, with a band of Dorians, undertook an expedition against Atreus, who had married a daughter of Eurystheus, and had become king of Mycenae and Tiryns. Hyllus marched across the Corinthian isthmus, and first met Echemus of Tegea, who fought for the Pelopidae, the principal opponents of the Heracleidae. Hyllus fell in single combat with Echemus, and, according to an agreement which had been made before the battle, the Heracleidae were not to make any further attempt upon Peloponnesus for the next fifty years. Thus ended their second invasion. They now retired to Tricorythus, where they were allowed by the Athenians to take up their abode. During the period which followed (ten years after the death of Hyllus), the Trojan war took place; and thirty years after the Trojan war Cleodaeus, son of Hyllus, again invaded Peloponnesus; which was the third invasion. About twenty years later Aristomachus, the son of Cleodaeus, undertook the fourth expedition; but both heroes fell. Not quite thirty years after Aristomachus (that is, about eighty years after the destruction of Troy), the Heracleidae prepared for their fifth and final attack. Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, the sons of Aristomachus, upon the advice of an oracle, built a fleet on the Corinthian gulf; but this fleet was destroyed, because Hippotes, one of the Heracleidae, had killed Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer; and Aristodemus was killed by a flash of lightning (Apollod. ii. 8, 2; Paus. iii. 1, 5). An oracle now ordered them to take a three-eyed man for their commander. He was found in the person of Oxylus, the son of Andraemon, an Aetolian, but descended from a family in Elis. The expedition now successfully sailed from Naupactus towards Rhium in Peloponnesus. Oxylus, keeping the invaders away from Elis, led them through Arcadia. (Paus. iv. 3, 4, viii. 5, 4.) The Heracleidae and Dorians conquered Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, who ruled over Argos, Mycenae, and Sparta. After this they became masters of the greater part of Peloponnesus, and then distributed by lot the newly acquired possessions. Temenus obtained Argos; Procles and Eurystheus, the twin sons of Aristodemus, Lacedaemon; and Cresphontes, Messenia.—Such are the traditions about the Heracleidae and their conquest of Peloponnesus. They are not purely mythical, but contain a genuine historical substance, notwithstanding the various contradictions in the accounts. They represent the conquest of the Achaean population by Dorian invaders, who had originally been pressed southwards by the Thesalians [DORIS], and then, finding their new settlements about the Spercheus too small, joined the Aetolians in invading the Peloponnesus. The Dorian account somewhat obscures the part in the conquest taken by the Aetolians, who obtained the land of the Epeans or Elis as their share; and it also compresses into one generation a conquest which was probably slow and gradual. The length of the period spent in the conquest may perhaps be indicated by the time allowed in the legend between the attempt of Hyllus and the successful invasion. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Perioeci.]

Hēracleides (Ἡρακλείδης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Lysimachus, one of the generals when Syracuse was attacked by the Athenians, B.C. 415 (Thuc. vi. 103).—2. A Syracusan, who held the chief command of the mercenary forces under the younger Dionysius. Being suspected by Dionysius, he fled from Syracuse, and afterwards took part with Dion in expelling Dionysius from Syracuse. After the expulsion of the tyrant, a powerful party at Syracuse looked up to Heracleides as their leader, in consequence of which Dion caused him to be assassinated, 354. (Plut. Dion. 35-53; Diod. xvi. 16-20).—3. Son of Agathocles, accompanied his father to Africa, where he was put to death by the soldiers when they were deserted by Agathocles, 307 (Diod. xx. 68).—4. Of Tarentum, one of the chief counsellors of Philip V. king of Macedonia (Pol. xiii. 4).—5. Of Byzantium, sent as ambassador by Antiochus the Great to the two Scipios, 190 (Pol. xxi. 10).—6. One of the three ambassadors sent by Antiochus Epiphanes to the Romans, 169. Heraclides was banished by Demetrius Soter, the successor of Antiochus (162), and in revenge gave his support to the imposture of Alexander Balas. (Pol. xxvii. 17, xxxiii. 14).—7. Surnamed PONTICUS, because he was born at Heraclæa in Pontus. He was a person of considerable wealth, and migrated to Athens, where he became a pupil of Plato. He studied also the Pythagorean system, and afterwards attended the instructions of Spensippus, and finally of Aristotle. He wrote a great number of works upon philosophy, mathematics, music, history, politics, grammar, and poetry; but of these works only fragments remain (Diog. Laërt. v. 86). There is a small work of Heraclides, entitled περὶ πολιτειῶν, edited by Köler, Halle, 1804, and by Coraes, in his edition of Aelian, Paris, 1805. Another extant work, Ἀλληγορίαι Ὀμηρικαί, which also bears the name of Heraclides, was certainly not written by this Heraclides.—8. A historian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (222–205), and wrote several works, quoted by the grammarians.—9. A physician of Tarentum, lived in the third or second century B.C., and wrote some works on Materia Medica, and a commentary on all the works in the Hippocratic Collection.—10. A physician of Erythrae in Ionia, was a pupil of Chrysermus, and a contemporary of Strabo in the first century B.C.

Heraclitus (Ἡράκλειτος.) 1. Of Ephesus, a philosopher generally considered as belonging to the Ionian school, though he differed from their principles in many respects. In his youth he travelled extensively, and after his return to Ephesus the chief magistracy was offered him, which, however, he transferred to his brother. He appears afterwards to have become a complete recluse, rejecting even the kindnesses offered by Darius, and at last retreating to the mountains, where he lived on pot-herbs; but, after some time, he was compelled by the sickness consequent on such meagre diet to return to Ephesus, where he died at the age of sixty. He flourished about B.C. 513.—Heraclitus wrote a work On Nature (περὶ φύσεως), which contained his philosophical views. From the obscurity of his style, he gained the title of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). (Cic. Fin. ii. 5, 15; Sen. Ep. xii. 7.) The leading ideas of the philosophy of Heraclitus were dualism and motion, while those of the Eleatics were unity and rest. Everything in his view was in a state of passage backwards and forwards between two conditions. Fire, which seemed to typify this constant motion, was in his philosophy the genesis of all things, kindling and extinguishing itself; and so far did he carry this that he regarded the sun as born anew and dying every day. The universal process of nature was a motion upwards and downwards. Fire through air and water passed down to earth, and by the opposite process earth passed upwards through water and air to fire. The death of each became the life of the other, and, as fire was the highest element, so the conception of its dry and clear nature entered into his moral system. The soul or mind of man was an emanation from the divine fire; and the clouded intellect of a drunkard was described by him as a 'wet soul.'

He said of vision that the eyes cannot see, but the mind sees through them, as through an open door. (Sext. adv. Math. vii. 130; cf. Lucret. iii. 359; Cic. Tusc. i. 20, 46.) The directing power of this order or process of nature was apparently a soul of the world, the essence of the fire, which passed through everything, and back to itself. From this passage backwards and forwards or upwards and downwards there results whatever harmony and order of nature there is, but it is a harmony arising from conflict, so that Heraclitus found fault with Homer for speaking of strife being banished from gods and men, objecting that then nature could not go on. To this theory refers the 'quid velit et possit rerum concordia discors' of Horace (Ep. i. 12, 19). The constant change and motion in the system, forcibly expressed by Heraclitus in the words that 'no man can twice enter the same river,' gained for Heraclitus and his school the name of οἱ ῥέοντες (Plat. Theaet. p. 181). Heraclitus was more fiercely and more unjustly attacked than any other philosopher by Lucretius, because the physics of the Stoics, to whom Lucretius was particularly opposed, were in part based on Heraclitean views (Lucr. i. 639). The tone of sadness in Heraclitus arising from his despair of absolute knowledge, and from a feeling of the changeable and fleeting character of human life, and also from the amount of evil in the world, gained for him the title of the 'weeping philosopher.' (Juv. x. 30; Sen. de Ir. ii. 2, 5; Anth. Pal. ii. 148; cf. DEMOCRITUS.) On the other hand, many of his utterances were cited with approval by early Christian writers, while other passages which seemed to regard the divine reason or λόγος were caught up by the Neo-Platonists. (Edition of the remains of Heraclitus by Bywater, Oxford, 1877.)

Heraea (Ἡραία: Ἡραϊεύς: nr. S. Joannes, Ru.), a town in Arcadia, on the right bank of the Alphæus, near the borders of Elis. Its territory was called Heraeātis (Ἡραϊάτις). It was closely connected with Sparta in the fourth century; but afterwards joined the Achaean League. (Paus. viii. 26, 1; Strab. p. 337; Xen. Hell. vi. 5, 22; Pol. ii. 54.)

Heraei Montes (τὰ Ἡραία ὄρη: Monti Sori), a range of mountains in Sicily, running from the centre of the island S.E., and ending in the promontory Pachynum (Diod. iv. 84).

Herbita (Ἑρβίτα: Ἑρβιταῖος, Herbitensis), a town in Sicily, N. of Agyrium, a powerful place under the tyrant Archonides, but afterwards declined (Diod. xii. 8; Cic. Verr. iii. 18, 32).

Herculaneum, a town in Samnium, conquered by the consul Carvilius, B.C. 293 (Liv. x. 45), must not be confounded with the more celebrated town of this name mentioned below.

Herculanum, Herculanium, Herculanium, Herculense Oppidum, Herculæa Urbs (Ἡράκλειον), an ancient city in Campania, near the coast, between Neapolis and Pompeii, was originally founded by the Oscans, was next in the possession of the Tyrrhenians, and subsequently was chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who appear to have settled in the place from other cities of Magna Graecia, and to have given it its name. (Dionys. i. 44; Strab. p. 247; Ov. Met. xv. 711.) It was taken by the Romans in the Social war (B.C. 89, 88), and was colonised by them (Vell. Pat. ii. 16). In A.D. 63 a great part of it was destroyed by an earthquake; and in 79 it was overwhelmed, along with Pompeii and Stabiae, by the great eruption of Mt. Vesuvius. It was buried under showers of ashes and streams of lava from 70 to 100 feet under the present surface of the ground. On its site stand the modern Portici and part of the villago of Resina: the Italian name of Ercolano does not indicate any modern place, but only the part of Herculaneum that has been disintegrated. The ancient city was accidentally discovered by the sinking of a well in 1720, since which time the excavations have been carried on at different periods; and many works of art have been discovered, which are deposited in the Royal Museum at Portici. It has been found necessary to fill up again the excavations which were made, in order to render Portici and Resina secure, and therefore very little of the ancient city is to be seen. The buildings that have been discovered are a theatre capable of accommodating about 10,000 spectators, the remains of two temples, a large building, commonly designated as a forum civile, 228 feet long and 132 broad, and some private houses, the walls of which were adorned with paintings, many of which, when discovered, were in a state of admirable preservation. There have been also found at Herculaneum many MSS., written on rolls of papyrus; but the difficulty of unrolling and deciphering them was very great; and the few which have been deciphered are of later Greek writers, among them some writings of Epicurus and Philodemus.

Hercūles, the hero. [HERACLES.]

Hercūles (Ἡρακλῆς), a son of Alexander the Great by Barsine, the widow of the Rhodian Memnon. In B. C. 310 he was brought forward by Polysperchon as a pretender to the Macedonian throne; but he was murdered by Polysperchon himself in the following year, when the latter became reconciled to Cassander. (Diod. x. 20, 28; Just. xv. 2.)

Hercūlis Columnae. [ABYLA; CALPE.]

Hercūlis Monoeci Portus. [MONOECUS.]

Hercūlis Portus. [COSA.]

Hercūlis Promontōrium (C. Spartivento), the most southerly point of Italy, in Bruttium.

Hercūlis Silva, a forest in Germany, sacred to Hercules, E. of the Visurgis.

Hercynia Silva, Hercynius Saltus, Hercynium Jugum, an extensive range of mountains in Germany, covered with forests, is described by Caesar (B. G. vi. 24) as nine days' journey in breadth, and more than sixty days' journey in length, extending E. from the territories of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, parallel to the Danube, to the frontiers of the Dacians. Under this general name Caesar appears to have included all the mountains and forests in the S. and centre of Germany, the Black Forest, Odenwald, Thüringer-Wald, the Harz, the Erzgebirge, the Riesengebirge, &c. As the Romans became better acquainted with Germany, the name was confined to narrower limits. Pliny and Tacitus use it to indicate the range of mountains between the Thüringer-Wald and the Carpathian mountains (Plin. iv. 97; Tac. Germ. 28, 30). The name is still preserved in the modern Harz and Erz.

Herdōnia (Herdoniensis: Ordona), a town in Apulia, was destroyed by Hannibal, who removed its inhabitants to Thurii and Metapontum; it was rebuilt by the Romans (Strab. p. 282; Liv. xxi. 21, xxvii. 1).

Herdōnius. 1. Turnus, of Aricia in Latium, endeavoured to rouse the Latins against Tarquinius Superbus, and was in consequence falsely accused by Tarquinius, and put to death (Liv. i. 50; Dionys. iv. 45).—2. Appius, a Sabine clioftain, who, in B. C. 460, with a band of outlaws and slaves, made himself master of the Capitol. On the fourth day from his entry the Capitol was retaken, and Herdonius was slain. (Liv. iii. 15–19; Dionys. x. 14.)

Herennia Gens, originally Samnite, and by the Samnite invasion established in Campania, became at a later period a plebeian house at Rome. The Herennii were a family of rank in Italy, and the hereditary patrons of the Marii. (Liv. ix. 3; Plut. Mar. 5.)

Herennius. 1. Modestinus. [MODESTINUS.]—2. Pontius. [PONTIUS.]—3. Senecio. [SENECIO.]

Hērillus (Ἡρίλλος), of Carthage, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple of Zenon of Citium. He did not, however, confine himself to the opinions of his master, but held some doctrines directly opposed to them. He held that the chief good consisted in knowledge (ἐπιστήμη), a notion often attacked by Cicero. (Cic. de Fin. ii. 11, 13, Tusc. v. 30; Diog. Laërt. vii. 165.)

Hermæum, or, in Latin, Mercurii Promontorium (Ἐρμαία ἄκρα). 1. (Cape Bon, Arab. Ras Addar), the headland which forms the E. extremity of the Sinus Carthaginiensis, and the extreme NE. point of the Carthaginian territory (aft. the province of Africa) opposite to Lilybaeum, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa (Strab. p. 832; Pol. i. 29; Liv. xxix. 27).—2. (Ras el Ashan), a promontory on the coast of the Greater Syrtis, 50 stadia W. of Leptis.—3. A headland of Lemnos (Aesch. Pr. 283; Soph. Phil. 1459).

Hermägōras (Ἐρμαγόρας). 1. Of Temnos, a distinguished Greek rhetorician of the time of Cicero. He belonged to the Rhodian school of oratory, but is known chiefly as a teacher of rhetoric. He devoted particular attention to what is called invention—that is, the province of rhetoric which is occupied with discovering facts and probabilities such as will support the case—and made a peculiar division of the parts of an oration which differed from that adopted by other rhetoricians. (Quintil. iii. 1, 16; 6, 60; Cic. de Invent. i. 11, 16).—2. Surnamed Carion, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a disciple of Theodorus of Gadara. (Quintil. iii. 1, 18.)

Hermanūbis. [ANUBIS.]

Hermaphrōditus (Ἐρμαφρόδιτος), son of Hermes and Aphrodite, and consequently great-grandson of Atlas, whence he is called Atlantides or Atlantius (Ov. Met. iv. 368). He had inherited the beauty of both his parents, and was brought up by the nymphs of Mount Ida. In his fifteenth year he went to Caria. In the neighbourhood of Halicarnassus he lay down by the fountain of Salmacis. The nymph of the fountain fell in love with him, and tried in vain to win his affections. Once when he was bathing in the fountain, she embraced him, and prayed to the gods that she might be united with him for ever. The gods granted the request, and the bodies of the youth and the nymph became united together, but retained the characteristics of each sex. Hermaphroditus, on becoming aware of the change, prayed that in futuro everyone who bathed in the well might be metamorphosed in the same manner (Ov. Met. iv. 285; cf. Diod. iv. 6). The myth represents an Oriental belief in masculine deities with a female counterpart (whence the bearded Aphrodite at Cyprus; Macrob. Sat. iii. 8).

Hermarchus (Ἐρμαρχος), of Mytilene, a rhetorician, became afterwards a disciple of Epicurus, who left to him his garden, and appointed him his successor in his school, about B. C. 270. (Diog. Laërt. x. 25.)

Hermes (Ἑρμῆς, Ἑρμῆας, Dor. Ἑρμᾶς), called Mercūrius by the Romans. The Greek Hermes was a son of Zeus and Maia, the daughter of Atlas, and born in a cave of Mt. Cyllene in Arcadia, whence he is called Atlantiades or Cylleniūs (Od. viii. 335, xiv. 435, xxiv. 1; Hes. Th. 938; Hymn. in Merc. 1 ff.; Ov. Met. i. 682, xiv. 291.) A few hours after his birth, he escaped from his cradle, went to Pieria, and carried off some of the oxen of Apollo (Hymn. 17). In the Iliad and Odyssey this tradition is not mentioned, though Hermes is characterised as a cunning thief and deceiver (Il. v. 390, xxiv. 24, 395, 444, 680). That he might not be discovered by the traces of his footsteps, he put on sandals, and drove the oxen to Pylos, where he killed two, and concealed the rest in a cave. Some travellers have fancied that they find the actual cave of the story in a stalactite cavern on the N.E. slope of the Acropolis of Pylos (Navarino), which in the time of Pausanias was called Nestor's cattle-shed (Paus. iv. 36, 2). The skins of the slaughtered animals were nailed to a rock; and part of their flesh was cooked and eaten, and the rest burnt (Hymn. l.c.; Ant. Lib. 23; Diod. i. 16). Thereupon he returned to Cyllene, where he found a tortoise at the entrance of his native cave. He took the animal's shell, drew strings across it, and thus invented the lyre, on which he immediately played.

Hermes making a Lyre. (Osterley, Denkm. alt. Kunst, vol. ii. tav. 29.)

Apollo, by his prophetic power, had meantime discovered the thief, and went to Cyllene to charge Hermes with the crime before his mother, Maia. She showed to the god the child in its cradle; but Apollo carried the boy before Zeus, and demanded back his oxen. Zeus commanded him to comply with the demand of Apollo, but Hermes denied that he had stolen the cattle. As, however, he saw that his assertions were not believed, he conducted Apollo to Pylos, and restored to him his oxen; but when Apollo heard the sounds of the lyre, he was so charmed that he allowed Hermes to keep the animals. Hermes now invented the syrinx, and after disclosing his inventions to Apollo, the two gods concluded an intimate friendship with each other. Apollo presented his young friend with his own golden shepherd's staff, and taught him the art of prophesying by means of dice. Zeus made him his own herald, and likewise the herald of the gods of the lower world (Hymn. 514; cf. Hor. Od. i. 10, 6).—The principal feature in the traditions about Hermes consists in his being the herald of the gods, and in this capacity he appears in the Homeric poems. As the herald of the gods, he is the god of eloquence, for the heralds are the public speakers in the assemblies and on other occasions. The gods especially employed him as messenger when eloquence was required to attain the desired object (Il. i. 333, iv. 193, xi. 684, xxiv. 390; Od. i. 38). As heralds and messengers are usually men of prudence and circumspection, Hermes was also the god of prudence and skill in all the relations of social intercourse (Il. xx. 35). These qualities were combined with similar ones, such as cunning, both in words and actions, and even fraud, perjury, and the inclination to steal; but acts of this kind were committed by Hermes always with a certain skill and gracefulness.—He was employed by the gods, and more especially by Zeus, on a variety of occasions which are recorded in ancient story. Thus he led Priam to Achilles to fetch the body of Hector (Il. xxiv. 182; Ov. Met. i. 670); tied Ixion to the wheel (Hyg. Fab. 62); conducted Hera, Aphrodite, and Athene to Paris (Paus. v. 19, 1); rescued Dionysus after his birth, from the flames, or received him from the hands of Zeus to carry him to Athamas (Apollod. iii. 4, 3; Ap. Rh. iv. 1137); and was ordered by Zeus to carry off Io, who was metamorphosed into a cow, and guarded by Argus, whom he slew. [ARGUS.] From this murder he is very commonly called Ἀργειφόντης. It is true that Homer, who uses the epithet, makes no mention of the story; but there is no difficulty in supposing that this local myth was known to him and had become widely enough spread to furnish a surname. Roscher, however, objecting to this view, believes that the epithet=ἀργήστης, and signifies the clearing or brightening effect of the wind, like the 'albus Notus' [see below]. His ministry to Zeus was not confined to the offices of herald and messenger, but he was also his charioteer and cup-bearer. As dreams are sent by Zeus, Hermes conducts them to man, and hence he is also described as the god who had it in his power to send refreshing sleep or to take it away. Another important function of Hermes was to conduct the shades of the dead from the upper into the lower world [see cut., p. 376] whence he is called ψυχοπομπός, νεκροπομπός, ψυχαγωγός, &c.—All these functions are held by several modern mythologists of great authority, especially by Roscher, to proceed from the original conception of the Wind transformed into a deity. It is argued that the wind is sent by Zeus, as Διὸς ὄστρος; that Hermes is the son of Zeus as god of heaven and Maia as goddess of rain-clouds; that he is born in the wind-cave of Cyllene; that his winged feet have this meaning: that he is god of theft, because winds, like the Harpies, snatch away; that especially in the theft of cattle he is the wind carrying off the clouds and hiding them behind the mountains; that he is god of fruitfulness in herds &c., because the wind is 'genitabilis'; the god of luck in allusion to the favourable (ὄστρος) breeze; the god of gymnasia because it is strong and swift; that he is conductor of souls because they are compared to breezes or air; and even that his discovery of the lyre and the pipe symbolises the whistling of the wind. There is force in a great deal of the argument; but it is not convincing. Others, again, with somewhat similar reasons make him the rain-god. It is simpler to understand as the original idea of Hermes the Power which brings good fortune to men whatever their line of life may be. He is to the Greeks the nearest equivalent (as regards his functions) to the Italian Genius; but, with this difference, that he is regarded as a distinct Olympian deity. His functions are manifold, because each different class of men had its own requirements for his help. Arcadia was perhaps the oldest seat of his worship in Greece; the most generally accepted place of his birth, and the country where the old ἀγάλματα τετράγωνα were seen by Pausanias (Hymn. in Merc. 2; Pind. Ol. vi. 80; Paus. viii. 17, 1). Since, therefore, Arcadia was pre-eminently the pastoral country, it is natural that the deity of good fortune should there be connected especially with the prosperity and increase of flocks and herds. Whether herdsmen were gaining wealth by breeding stock or by skilful 'cattle-lifting,' this deity would be regarded as their helper, and in myth as the hero of successful enterprise in the same line. The like characteristics would belong to the deity who brought good luck in any other occupations and industries; to all he was Ἑρμῆς Ἐριούσιος and δωτήρ ἐδάων; in commercial enterprise he was ἀγοραῖος, ἐμπολαῖος, παλιγκάπηλος, κερδῶνος, κερδέμπορος (Aristoph. Plut. 1155, &c.); and in general a lucky find was ascribed to his favour, and was called ἐρμαῖον or ἐρμαῖα δόσις (Aesch. Eum. 947), Ἑρμου κλήρος (Aristoph. Pax, 365, &c.). It is clear that from this general idea of success in skilful work of any sort may naturally proceed his aid in ready speech, his aid in inventions such as the lyre, the syrinx, writing, astronomy, and, and mathematics, which led to his identification with the Egyptian Thoth (Strab. p. 816; Cic. N. D. iii. 22, 56; Hor. Od. i. 10, 3; Ov. Fast. v. 668). Further, as god of good fortune in commerce he was the leader of travellers, and indeed of any expeditions, whether for war or peace, and on this account received sacrifices as ἡγήτωρ and ἡγεμόσιος. His position, which belongs to the oldest Greek literature and has to do with the greatest number of stories about him, as messenger of Zeus expresses simply the idea that wealth and good fortune are sent from Zeus (Od. vi. 188; cf. Hor. Od. i. 23, 27). This is well expressed in the Pompeian picture engraved below, where Hermes the messenger is starting forth with a bag of money in his hand. Hermes, then as the intermediary, becomes the envoy and κήρυξ of Zeus. His other ancient function, conducting the souls to Hades (Od. xxiv. 1, 9; Hymn. in Merc. 572, in Cer. 377; Hyg. Fab. 251; Hor. Od. i. 13, 17), whence he is called ψυχοπομπός, χθόνιος, &c., was probably attributed to him, because he watches over the fortunes of each mortal, like the Italian Genius, from his birth to the grave. As his image (ἐρμαῖον) stands before each citizen's door to guard and increase his wealth, so at his death Ἑρμῆς guides his soul to Hades. His office of presiding over the gymnasium was a later attribute; it signified that he was the god who gave good luck in contests and also that beauty of youthful form of which he was himself the ideal. Statues of Hermes consisting of a head placed on a quadrangular pillar, and set up before houses, temples, gymnasia, &c. are preserved in large numbers. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Hermæe.) As might be expected from the variety of his functions and the universal need of his help for all undertakings, he was worshipped in temples and shrines all over Greece and her colonies. Next to Arcadia those places most deserving mention were Athens—where the antiquity of his worship was attested by the ancient image in the temple of Athene Polias, and the Hermæe of primitive shape before the doors of houses (Paus. iv. 33, 4; Thuc. vi. 27)—and Tanagra, which claimed to be his birthplace (Paus. ix. 20, 3), and where also, as a proof of his worship in the character of protector of the flocks, he had a statue by Calamis as Κριοφόρος, bearing a ram upon his shoulders, and a festival at which the handsomest youth of the city went round the walls carrying in like manner a lamb on his shoulders. As tutelary god, too, of the same place he was called πρόμαχος (Paus. ix. 22, 2). His connexion with Elis is shown by the claim of the Elean Cyllene to be his birthplace, and also by his famous statue in the Heraeum at Olympia (Paus. v. 17, vi. 26). There was also a specially ancient seat of his worship, which Herodotus calls Pelasgian, in Sanothrace (Hdt. ii. 51). The fourth of the month (τετράς), traditionally his birthday, was sacred to him; the most ancient sacrifices mentioned belonged to him as god of flocks, the lamb and the kid (Od. xix. 397). In art the principal attributes of Hermes are: 1. A petasus, or hat with a broad brim, which signified the traveller. From the latter part of the fifth cent. B.C., but not in earlier art, this hat was sometimes, and in Roman art always, adorned with small-wings. 2. The staff (βάβδος or σκήπτρον), which he bore as a herald, and had received from Apollo. In late works of art the white ribbons which surrounded the herald's staff were changed into two serpents [Dict. of Ant. art. Caduceus]. 3. The sandals (πέδιλα). They were beautiful and golden, and carried the god across land and sea with the rapidity of wind; at the ankles of the god they were provided with wings, whence he is called πτηνοπέδιλος, or alipes. In the most primitive times he was represented by more or less rude blocks of stone or wood with the phallus and then by the Hermæ, i.e. heads of the god placed on a quadrangular base [Dict. of Ant. art. Hermæ]; such were the Hermæ of the Attic streets mentioned above, and they were probably to some extent copies of the ancient ξόανον in the temple of Athene Polias. On archaic vases he is easily distinguished, but he is a bearded man with none of the more youthful beauty of the familiar later types. This is first traceable in the work of the fifth century, and was, no doubt, a characteristic of the famous statue by Calamis representing Hermes Criophorus of Tanagra [see above]. A good idea of the attitude of this statue (which appears also on coins of Tanagra) may probably be gained from the terracotta figure in the British Museum, which is reasonably taken to be an imitation of the statue, but it is only a rude imitation. Of the youthful and idealised type handed down from Polyclethus and above all from Praxiteles, and adopted as the Hermes of later Greek and Roman art, there are numerous examples, copies or imitations of the great sculptors, and among them is probably to be reckoned the so-called Antinous in the Vatican. Most famous and most beautiful of all is the original statue of Praxiteles, Hermes with the child Dionysus [see under Praxiteles]. The Hermes of Lysippus, from which the bronze figure from Herculaneum here shown was probably copied, has a further development in slimmness and gracefulness of form.

Hermes Trismegistus (Ἑρμῆς Τρισμέγιστος), the reputed author of a variety of works, some of which are still extant. The Greek god Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thoth as early as the time of Plato. The Neo-Platonists regarded an Egyptian Hermes as the source of all knowledge and thought, or the λόγος embodied, and hence called him Trismegistus. A vast number of works on philosophy and religion, written by the Neo-Platonists, were ascribed to this Hermes; from whom it was pretended that Pythagoras and Plato had derived all their knowledge. Most of these works were probably written in the fourth century of our era. The most important of them is entitled Poemander (from ποιμήν, a shepherd, pastor), apparently in imitation of the Pastor of Hermas. This work is in the form of a dialogue. It treats of nature, the creation of the world, the deity, his nature and attributes, the human soul, knowledge, &c. (Ed. by Parthey, Berlin, 1854.)

Hermēsianax (Ἑρμησιάνναξ), of Colophon, a distinguished elegiac poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great. His chief work was an elegiac poem of love-stories in three books, addressed to his mistress, Leontium, whose name formed the title of the poem. The fragments are edited by Rigler and Axt, Colon. 1823, and by Bailey, Lond. 1839.

Hermias or Hermias (Ἑρμείας or Ἐρμίας).

1. Tyrant of Atarneus and Assos in Mysia, said to have been originally a slave, celebrated as the friend and patron of Aristotle. Aristotle remained with Hermias three years, from B.C. 347 to 344, in the latter of which years Hermias was seized by Mentor, the Greek general of the Persian king, and sent as a captive to the Persian court, where he was put to death. Aristotle married Pythias, the adopted daughter of Hermias, and celebrated the praises of his benefactor in an ode addressed to Virtue, which is still extant. (Strab. p. 610; Diog. Laërt. v. 3).—2. A Christian writer, who lived about A.D. 180, author of an extant work, entitled Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων, in which Greek philosophers are held up to ridicule. Edited with Tatianus by Worth, Oxon. 1700.

Hermīnia Gens, a patrician house at Rome, which appears in the first Etruscan war with the republic, B.C. 506, and vanishes from history in 448. T. Herminius was one of the three heroes who kept the Sublician bridge against the whole force of Porsena (Liv. ii. 10).

Hermīnius Mons (Sierra de la Estrella), the chief mountain in Lusitania, S. of the Durius, from 7000 to 8000 feet high, called in the middle ages Hermeno (Bell. Alex. 48).

Hermiōnē (Ἑρμιόνη), the daughter of Menelaus and Helena (Il. iii. 175; Od. iv. 4; Verg. Aen. iii. 328). She had been promised in marriage to Orestes before the Trojan war; but Menelaus after his return home married her to Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus). Thereupon Orestes claimed Hermione for himself, but Neoptolemus refused to give her up. Orestes, in revenge, incited the Delphians against him, and Neoptolemus was slain. Hermione afterwards married Orestes, whom she had always loved, and bore him a son Tisamenus. The history of Hermione is related with various modifications. According to some, Menelaus betrothed her at Troy to Neptolemus; but in the meantime her grandfather, Tyndareus, promised her to Orestes, and actually gave her in marriage to him. Neoptolemus, on his return, took possession of her by force, but was slain soon after either at Delphi or in his own home at Phthia. (Pind. Nem. vii. 43; Eur. And. 891; Hyg. Fab. 123.)

Hermiōnē (Ἑρμιόνη; Ἐρμιονεύς; Kastri), a town of Argolis, but originally independent of Argos, was situated on a promontory on the E. coast, and on a bay of the sea, which derived its name from the town (Hermionicus Sinus). Its territory was called Hermiōnis. It was originally inhabited by the Dryopos; and, in consequence of its isolated position, it became a flourishing city at an early period. It contained several temples, and among them a celebrated one of Demeter Chthonia. At a later time it joined the Aclmean League. (Il. ii. 560; Hdt. viii. 43; Strab. p. 373; Paus. ii. 35; Pol. ii. 44.)

Hermiones or Herminones (perhaps 'the warriors'), a name apparently given collectively to certain tribes in the interior of Germany, who were generally known as the Cherusci, &c. (Tac. Germ. 2; Mel. iii. 3).

Hermippus (Ἑρμιππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, vehemently attacked Pericles and Aspasia (Plut. Per. 32; Aristoph. Nub. 553). Fragments in Meincke, Fr. Com. Gr.—2. Of Smyrna, a distinguished philosopher, was a disciple of Callimachus of Alexandria, and flourished about B.C. 200. He wrote a biographical work (Βίαι), which is frequently referred to by later writers. (Müller, Fr. Hist. Gr.)—3. Of Berytus, a grammarian, under Trajan and Hadrian.

Hermisium, a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, on the Cimmerian Bosphorus.

Hermocrates (Ἑρμοκράτης), a Syracusan of rank, and an able statesman and orator, was chosen one of the Syracusan generals, B.C. 414, in order to oppose the Athenians (Thuc. iv. 58, 65; Pol. xii. 22). He afterwards served under Gylippus, when the latter took the command of the Syracusan forces; and after the destruction of the Athenian armament he attempted to save the lives of Nicias and Demosthenes (Thuc. vi. 72–vii. 73). He then employed all his influence to induce his countrymen to support with vigour the Lacedaemonians in the war in Greece itself. He was with two colleagues appointed to the command of a small fleet, which the Syracusans sent to the assistance of the Lacedaemonians. (Thuc. viii. 26.) But during his absence from home, he was banished by the Syracusans (410). Having obtained support from the Persian satrap Pharnabazus, he returned to Sicily, and endeavoured to effect his restoration to his native city by force of arms, but was slain in an attack which he made upon Syracuse in 408. (Xen. Hell. i. 1, 27; Diod. xiii. 63, 75.)

Hermödorus (Ἑρμόδωρος). 1. Of Ephesus, a person of distinction, was expelled by his fellow-citizens, and is said to have gone to Rome, and to have explained to the decemvirs the Greek laws, and thus assisted them in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables, B.C. 451 (Diog. Laërt. ix. 2; Cic. Tusc. v. 36, 105).—2. A disciple of Plato, whose works he is said to have circulated, especially in Sicily. He wrote a work on Plato.—3. Of Salamis, at the end of 2nd century B.C., the architect of the temple of Mars in the Flavianum Circus, and also of the navalia (Cic. de Or. i. 14, 62).

Hermogēnes (Ἑρμογένης). 1. A son of Hipponeus, and a brother of the wealthy Callias, is introduced by Plato as one of the speakers in his Cratylus, where he maintains that all the words of a language were formed by an agreement of men among themselves (Plat. Crat. p. 391, c; Xen. Mem. ii. 10, 3).—2. A celebrated Greek rhetorician, was a native of Tarsus, and lived in the reign of M. Aurelius, A.D. 161–180. He was appointed public teacher of rhetoric, and he began his career as a writer at the age of seventeen, but when he was twenty-five his mental powers gave way, and he never recovered their full use, although he lived to an advanced age. His works, five in number, which are still extant, were for a long time used in the rhetorical schools as manuals. They are: 1. Τέχνη ρητορική περὶ τῶν στάσεων. 2. Περὶ εὐρέσεως (De Inventione). 3. Περὶ ἰδεῶν (De Formis Oratoriis). 4. Περὶ μεθόδου δεινότητος (De apto et solerti genere dicendi Methodus). 5. Προγυμνάσματα. An abridgment of the latter work was made by Aphthonius, in consequence of which the original fell into oblivion. The works of Hermogenes are printed in Walz's Rhetor. Graec.—3. An architect of Alabanda, in Caria, who invented what was called the pseudodipterus—that is, a form of a temple, in which the single row of columns stood at the same distance from the wall of the cella as the outer row in a dipteral temple (Vitr. iii. 2, 6). The great temple in the agora of Selinus is an example of this form.

Hermogēnes, M. Tigellius, an enemy of Horace, who, however, admits his merits as a singer (Sat. i. 3, 129; cf. 9, 25; 10, 18, 80, 90). He must be distinguished from the Sardinian Tigellius (whose adopted son some suppose him to have been), who is mentioned both by Cicero and Horace (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 24, ad Att. xiii. 49, 51; Hor. Sat. i. 2, 3).

Hermogeniānus, the latest Roman jurist from whom there is an extract in the Digest, lived in the time of Constantine the Great.

Hermolāus (Ἑρμόλαος), a Macedonian youth, and a page of Alexander the Great. During a hunting party in Bactria, B.C. 327, he slew a wild boar, without waiting to allow Alexander the first blow, whereupon the king ordered him to be flogged. Incensed at this indignity, Hermolaus formed a conspiracy against the king's life; but the plot was discovered, and Hermolaus and his accomplices were stoned to death by the Macedonians. (Arrian, Anab. iv. 13; Curt. viii. 6; Plut. Alex. 55.)

Hermonassa. 1. A town of the Sindi at the entrance of the Cimmerian Bosphorus (Mel. i. 19, 5).—2. A town on the coast of Pontus, near Trapezus.

Hermonthis (Ἑρμωνθίς; Erment, Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Hermonthites, in Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, a little above Thebes (Strab. p. 817).

Hermōpōlis (Ἑρμόπολις, Ἑρμου πόλις). 1. Parva (ἡ μικρά; Damanthour), a city of Lower Egypt, the capital of the Nomos of Alexandria, stood upon the canal which connected the Canopic branch of the Nile with the Lake Mareotis (Strab. p. 802; Ptol. iv. 5, 46).—2. Magna (ἡ μεγάλη; nr. Eshmounein, Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Hermopolites, in the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and one of the oldest cities in the land, stood on the W. bank of the Nile, a little below the confines of Upper Egypt. At the boundary line itself was a military station, or custom house, called Ἑρμοπολιτικὴ φυλακὴ, for collecting a toll on goods entering the Heptanomis. Hermopolis was a chief seat of the worship of Thoth, the Egyptian Hermes. (Ptol. v. 9, 11; Strab. p. 813.)

Hermōtīmus (Ἑρμότιμος). 1. A mathematician of Colophon, was one of the immediate predecessors of Euclid, and the discoverer of several geometrical propositions.—2. Of Clazomeno, an early Greek philosopher of uncertain date, belonged to the Ionic school. Some traditions represent him as a mysterious person, gifted with supernatural power, by which his soul, apart from the body, wandered from place to place, bringing tidings of distant events in incredibly short spaces of time. At length his enemies burned his body, in the absence of the son, which put an end to his wanderings. (Plin. vii. 174; Lucian, Encom. Musc. 7; Arist. Metaph. i. 3.)

Hermundūri, one of the most powerful nations of Germany, belonged to the Suevic race, dwelt between the Main and the Danube, and were bounded by the Sudeti mountains in the N., the Agri Decunates of the Romans in the W. and S., the Narisci on the E., the Chernsci on the NE., and the Catti on the NW. They were for a long time the allies of the Romans; but along with the other German tribes they assisted the Marcomanni in the great war against the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius. After this time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people, but are included under the name of Suevoi. (Tac. Germ. 41, Ann. ii. 63, xii. 29.)

Hermus (τὸ Ἑρμος: Ἑρμειος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acanantis, on the road from Athens to Eleusis.

Hermus (Ἑρμος: Ghiediz-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises in Mt. Dindymene (Morad-Dagh) in Phrygia; flows through Lydia, watering the plain N. of Sardis, which was hence called Ἑρμου πεδῖον; passes by Magnesia and Temnus; and falls into the Gulf of Smyrna, between Smyrna and Phocæa. It formed the boundary between Aeolia and Ionia. Its tributaries were the Hyllus, Cogamus, Pactolus, and Phrygnus. (Strab. p. 554; Hdt. i. 80.)

Hernici, a people in Latium, belonged to the Sabine race, and are said to have derived their name from the Marsic (Sabine) word herna, 'rock' (Fest. s.v.). According to this etymology their name would signify 'mountaineers.' They inhabited the mountains of the Apennines between the lake Fucinus and the river Trerus, and were bounded on the N. by the Marsi and Aequi, and on the S. by the Volsci. Their chief town was ANAGNIA. They were a brave and warlike people, and long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans. The Romans formed a league with them on equal terms in the third consulship of Sp. Cassius, B.C. 486. They were finally subdued by the Romans, 306. (Verg. Aen. vii. 684; Liv. ii. 22, vi. 17, vii. 15.)

Hērō. [LEANDER.]

Heron (Ἡρων). 1. The Elder, a celebrated mathematician, was a native of Alexandria, and lived in the reigns of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Evergetes (B.C. 285-222). He is celebrated on account of his mechanical inventions, of which one of the best known is the common pneumatic experiment, called Heron's fountain, in which a jet of water is maintained by condensed air. We also find in his works a description of a steam engine, and of a double forcing pump used for a fire-engine. The following works of Heron are extant, though not in a perfect form:—1. Χειροβαλιστρας κατασκευὴ καὶ συμμετρία, De Constructione et Mensura Manubalistac. 2. Βελοποικὰ, on the manufacture of darts. 3. Πνευματικὰ, or Spiritualia, the most celebrated of his works. 4. Περὶ αὐτοματοποιητικῶν, De Automatorum Fabrica Libri duo. All these works are published in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693; the military treatises by Rüstow and Köchly, 1853.—2. The Younger, a mathematician, is supposed to have lived under Heraclius (A.D. 610-641). The extant works assigned to him are:—1. De Machinis bellicis. 2. Geodacsia, on practical geometry. 3. De Obsidione repellenda. Published in the Mathematici Veteres.

Herodas. [HERODAS.]

Hērōdes I. (Ἡρώδης), commonly called Herod. 1. Surnamed the Great, king of the Jews, was the second son of Antipater, and consequently of Idumæan origin. [ANTIPATER, No. 3.] When his father was appointed by Caesar procurator of Judæa, in B.C. 47, Herod, though only 25 years of age, obtained the government of Galilee. In 46 he obtained the government of Coele-Syria. After the death of Caesar (44), Herod first supported Cassius; but upon the arrival of Antony in Syria, in 41, he exerted himself to secure his favour, and completely succeeded in his object. In 40 he went to Rome, and obtained from Antony and Octavian a decree of the senate, constituting him king of Judæa. He supported Antony in the Civil war against Octavian; but after the battle of Actium (31) he was pardoned by Octavian. During the remainder of his reign he cultivated the friendship of Augustus and Agrippa, and enjoyed the favour of both. He possessed a jealous temper and ungovernable passions. He put to death his wife Mariamne, whom he suspected without cause of adultery, and with whom he was violently in love; and at a later period he also put to death his two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus. His government, though cruel and tyrannical, was vigorous; and he was both feared and respected by his subjects and the surrounding nations. Among other splendid public works, he partly rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and the city of Samaria, on which he bestowed the name of Sebaste; while he converted a small town on the sea-coast into a magnificent city, to which he gave the name of Caesarea. He died in the 37th year of his reign, and the 70th of his age, B.C. 4.*—2. Herodes Antipas, son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan, obtained the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peraea, on his father's death, while the kingdom of Judæa devolved on his elder brother Archelaus. He married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Herod Philip. He had been previously married to a daughter of the Arabian prince Aretas, who invaded the dominions of Antipas, and defeated the army which was opposed to him. In A.D. 38, through the intrigues of Herod Agrippa, who was high in the favour of the Roman emperor, Antipas was deprived of his dominions, and sent into exile at Lyons (39); he was subsequently removed to Spain, where he died.—3. Herodes Agrippa. [AGRIPPA.]—4. Brother of Herod Agrippa I., obtained the kingdom of Chalcis from Claudius at the request of Agrippa, 41. After the death of Agrippa (44), Claudius bestowed upon him the superintendence of the temple at Jerusalem, together with the right of appointing the high priests. He died in 48, when his kingdom was bestowed by Claudius upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa II. [For further account of the Herods, see Dictionary of the Bible, art. Herodes.]—5. Herodes Atticus, the rhetorician. [ATTICUS.]

Hērōdiānos (Ἡρωδιανός). 1. A historian, who wrote in Greek a history of the Roman empire in eight books, from the death of M. Aurelius to the beginning of the reign of Gordianus III. (A.D. 180-238). He himself informs us that the events of this period had occurred in his own lifetime; but beyond this we know nothing respecting his life. He appears to have had Thucydides before him as a model, both for style and for the general composition of his work, like him, introducing here and there speeches wholly or in part imaginary. In spite of occasional inaccuracies in chronology and geography, his narrative is in the main truthful and impartial. Edited by Irmisch, Lips. 1789-1805, 5 vols., and by Bekker, Lips. 1855.—2. Aelius Herodĭanus, one of the most celebrated grammarians of antiquity, was the son of Apollonius Dyscolus [APOLLONIUS, No. 4], and was born at Alexandria. From that place he removed to Rome, where he gained the favour of the emperor M. Aurelius, to whom he dedicated his work on prosody, syntax, and etymology. The estimation in which he was held by subsequent grammarians was very great. Priseian styles him maximus auctor artis grammaticae. Remains of his work are edited by Lentz, Lips. 1867.

* The death of Herod took place in the same year as the birth of Christ, but this is to be placed 4 years before the date in general use as the Christian era.

Hērōdĭcus (Ἡρόδικος). 1. Of Babylon, a grammarian, was one of the immediate successors of Crates of Mallus, and an opponent of followers of Aristarchus, against whom he wrote an epigram, which is in the Greek Anthology.—2. A celebrated physician of Selymbria in Thrace, lived in the 5th century B. C., and was one of the tutors of Hippocrates.

Hērōdōrus (Ἡρόδωρος), of Heraclea, in Pontus, about B. C. 510, wrote a work on Heracles (Plut. Thes. 26).

Hērōdōtus (Ἡρόδοτος). 1. A Greek historian, and the father of history, was born at Halicarnassus, a Doric colony in Caria. He belonged to a noble family at Halicarnassus. He was the son of Lyxes and Dryo; and the epic poet Panyasis was his uncle. Herodotus left his native city at an early age, in order to escape from the oppressive government of Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, who put to death Panyasis. He settled at Samos for some time, and there became acquainted with the Ionic dialect; but he spent many years in his travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, of which we shall speak presently. At a later time he returned to Halicarnassus, and took a prominent part in expelling Lygdamis from his native city. In the contentions which followed, Herodotus was exposed to the hostile attacks of one of the political parties, whereupon he again left Halicarnassus, and settled at Thurii, in Italy, where he died. Whether he accompanied the first colonists to Thurii in 443, or followed them a few years afterwards, is a disputed point; though it appears probable from a passage in his work that he was at Athens at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war (431). It is also disputed where Herodotus wrote his history. Lucian relates that Herodotus read his work to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, and it was received with such universal applause, that the nine books of the work were in consequence honoured with the names of the nine Muses. The same writer adds that the young Thucydides was present at this recitation and was moved to tears. But this story, which rests upon the authority of Lucian alone, must be rejected. If Thucydides was a boy of fifteen the recitation would have to be placed in B. C. 456, when Herodotus was barely thirty, and could not have completed his travels, far less have finished his history. Lucian, however, may be right in his statement that Herodotus recited parts of his history at various times at Olympia, Athens, Corinth, Argos, and Sparta. At Athens he is said to have been presented with ten talents from the public treasury. Whenever and wherever he wrote the bulk of his work, there is no doubt that he added and revised while he was at Thurii; and it appears that he was engaged upon it when he was seventy-seven years of age, since he mentions the revolt of the Medes against Darius Nothus, and the death of Amyrtacus, events which belong to the years 409 and 408. Though the work of Herodotus was probably not written till he was advanced in years, yet he was collecting materials for it during a great part of his life. It was apparently with this view that he undertook his extensive travels through Greece and foreign countries; and his work contains on almost every page the results of his personal observations and inquiries. There was scarcely a town of any importance in Greece Proper and on the coasts of Asia Minor with which he was not familiar; and at many places, such as Samos, Athens, Corinth, and Thebes, he seems to have stayed some time. The sites of the great battles between the Greeks and barbarians, as Marathon, Thermopylae, Salamis, and Plataeae, were well known to him; and Xerxes' line of march from the Hellespont to Athens he had probably himself explored. He also visited most of the Greek islands, not only in the Aegean, but even in the west of Greece, such as Zacynthus. In the North of Europe he visited Thrace and the Scythian tribes on the Black Sea. In Asia he travelled through Asia Minor and Syria, and visited the cities of Babylon, Ecbatana, and Susa. He spent some time in Egypt, and travelled as far south as Elephantine. He saw with his own eyes all the wonders of Egypt, and the accuracy of his observations and descriptions still excites the astonishment of travellers in that country. From Egypt he appears to have made excursions to the east into Arabia, and to the west into Libya, at least as far as Cyrene, which was well known to him.—The object of his work is to give an account of the struggles between the Greeks and Persians. He traces the enmity between Europe and Asia to the mythical times. He passes rapidly over the mythical ages to come to Croesus, king of Lydia, who was known to have committed acts of hostility against the Greeks. This induces him to give a full history of Croesus and of the kingdom of Lydia. The conquest of Lydia by the Persians under Cyrus then leads him to relate the rise of the Persian monarchy, and the subjugation of Asia Minor and Babylon. The nations which are mentioned in the course of his narrative are again discussed more or less minutely. The history of Cambyses and his expedition into Egypt induce him to enter into the details of Egyptian history. The expedition of Darius against the Scythians causes him to speak of Scythia and the North of Europe. In the meantime the revolt of the Ionians breaks out, which eventually brings the contest between Persia and Greece to an end. An account of this insurrection is followed by the history of the invasion of Greece by the Persians; and the history of the Persian war now runs in a regular channel until the taking of Sestos by the Greeks, B. C. 478, with which event his work concludes. It will be seen from the preceding sketch that the history is full of digressions and episodes; but those do not impair the unity of the work, for one thread, as it were, runs through the whole, and the episodes are only like branches of the same tree. The structure of the work thus bears a strong resemblance to a grand epic poem, describing the punishment which followed the pride of the Persian king and his rejection of good advice. The whole work is pervaded by a deep religious sentiment. Herodotus shows the most profound reverence for everything which he conceives as divine, and rarely ventures to express an opinion on what he considers a sacred or religious mystery.—In order to form a fair judgment of the historical value of the work of Herodotus, we must distinguish between those parts in which he speaks from his own observations and those in which he merely repeats what he was told by priests and others. In the latter case he was undoubtedly often deceived; but whenever he speaks from his own observations, he is a real model of truthfulness and accuracy; and the more the countries which he describes have been explored by modern travellers, the more firmly has his authority been established. Many things which used to be laughed at as impossible or paradoxical are found now to be strictly in accordance with truth. He writes in what it was called the λέξις εἰρομένη, or running style, from its absence of logical periods. The dialect in which he wrote is the Ionic, the dialect used by the earlier logographi, intermixed with Epic or poetical expressions, and sometimes even with Attic and Doric forms. The excellencies of his style consist in its transparent clearness and the lively flow of the narrative. He is rightly regarded as the earliest real historian, because he was the first who carefully collected materials, sifted as far as he was able their accuracy (for this is by no means neglected), and arranged them in a delightful form. His weakest point as a historian, in which Thucydides forms a complete contrast, was his tendency to overlook the real causes of events and to trace them to personal motives.—The best editions of Herodotus are by Schweighäuser, Argentor. 1806; by Gaisford, Oxon. 1824; by Bähr, Lips. 1830; by Blakesley, London, 1854; by Woods, London, 1873; and by Abicht, Leipsic, 1877.—2. A Greek physician, who practised at Rome with great reputation, about A. D. 100. He wrote some medical works, which are several times quoted by Galen.—3. Also a Greek physician, a native either of Tarsus or Philadelphia, taught Sextus Empiricus.

Herondas (Ἡρόνδας), a writer of mimes in the choliambic metre. The name is now commonly written Herodas; but there is no sufficient reason for departing from the spelling Ἡρόνδας in Athenæus p. 86; and it is more probable that Herondas (formed from Heron; cf. Epaminondas, &c.) should be corrupted into Herodas and Herodes, than that Herodes and Herodas should be changed into Herondas. The date of Herondas was probably the 3rd century B. C. If he was not, as seems likely, a native of Cos, he certainly lived there and belonged to that literary school of Cos which included Philetas and Theocritus. It has been suggested, rather fancifully, that he wrote after Catullus. If the very slight resemblances which have been traced are due to more than accident, Catullus is certainly the borrower. Herondas (as Crusius notices) places himself earlier than Callimachus when he speaks of himself (ix. 6) as the next writer of choliambics after Hipponax. If he had lived after Callimachus he could not have been ignorant of the choliambics of that poet. Till 1890 only a few fragments of Herondas, quoted by other writers, were known. The papyrus in the British Museum has given us seven of his mimes in a more or less complete form. They are written in the literary Ionic with some Doric of the writer's own country and considerable traces of Atticising by the copyists. The mimes give vivid scenes of ordinary life in dialogue, and were probably intended for acting. The scene of the second (perhaps of most) is laid in Cos. They have great value for the insight which they give into manners and customs. A likeness to the Adoniazusae of Theocritus is clearly seen in the sixth, but it is doubtful whether this is due to direct imitation or to the fact of both writers belonging to the same school. It may be added that the greater genius of Theocritus appears in this branch, the only one in which they can be compared. Editions by Kenyon (ed. princ.), 1890; by Rutherford, 1891.

Herōpōlis or Hero (Ἡρώων πόλις, Ἡρώ: O. T. Raamses or Rameses?), the capital of the Nomos Heroopolites or Arsinoites in Lower Egypt, stood on the border of the Desert east of the Delta, upon the west head of the Red Sea, which was called from it Sinus Heroopoliticus (κόλπος Ἡρώων, Ἡρωσπολίτης or -ιτικός) (Strab. pp. 759, 767; Jos. Ant. ii. 7, 5). Its site is NW. of Lake Timsah not far from Ismalia. In Strabo's time the Gulf of Suez extended forty miles N. of its present head.

Hērōphīlus (Ἡρόφιλος), one of the most celebrated physicians of antiquity, was born at Chalcedon in Bithynia, was a pupil of Praxagoras, and lived at Alexandria, under the first Ptolemy, who reigned B. C. 323–285. Here he soon acquired a great reputation, and was one of the founders of the medical school in that city. He seems to have given his chief attention to anatomy and physiology, which he studied not merely from the dissection of animals, but also from that of human bodies. He is even said to have carried his ardour in his anatomical pursuits so far as to dissect criminals alive. He was the author of several medical and anatomical works, of which nothing but the titles and a few fragments remain. These have been published by Marx, De Herophilii Vita, &c. Gotting. 1840.

Hērōstrātus (Ἡρόστρατος), an Ephesian, set fire to the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, on the same night that Alexander the Great was born, B. C. 356. He was put to the torture, and confessed that he had fired the temple to immortalise himself. The Ephesians passed a decree condemning his name to oblivion; but it has been, as might have been expected, handed down by history. (Strab. p. 640; Val. Max. viii. 14, 5; Gell. ii. 6.)

Hersē (Ἑρση), daughter of Cecrops and sister of Aglauros, was beloved by Hermes, by whom she became the mother of Cephalus. Respecting her story, see AGLAUROS. She was supposed to be honoured in the festival of the Arrephoria or Hersephoria (C. I. A. iii. 3, 8), in which maidens are thought to have carried dew-laden branches: others have suggested that the ἔρσαι were sucklings or young animals. In either case it is probable that fertility was symbolised, and that Hērse in the myth grew out of the ritual.

Hersilia, the wife of Romulus, was the only married woman carried off by the Romans in the rape of the Sabines. As Romulus after death became Quirinus, so Hērilia his wife became a goddess, Hora or Horta. (Plut. Rom. 14; Liv. i. 11; Ov. Met. xiv. 829.) Some writers, however, made Hērilia the wife of Hostus, grandfather of Tullus Hostilius (Dionys. iii. 1; Plut. Rom. 18; Macrobi. i. 6, 16).

Hērūli or Eruli, a powerful German race, are said by Jornandes to have come originally from Scandinavia, but they appear on the shores of the Black Sea in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 262), when in conjunction with the Goths, they invaded the Roman empire. They were conquered by the Ostrogoths, and afterwards formed part of the great army of Attila, with which he invaded Gaul and Italy. After the death of Attila (453) a portion of the Heruli united with other German tribes; and under the command of Odoacer, who is said to have been an Herulian, they destroyed the Western Empire, 476. Meantime the remainder of the nation formed a powerful kingdom on the banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which was eventually destroyed by the Longobardi or Lombards. Some of the Heruli were allowed by Anastasius to settle in Pannonia, and they served with distinction in the armies of Justinian. (Jornand. de Reb. Get. 12, 43-50; Vit. Gallien. 13; Procop. B. G. ii. 11-22, iv. 26-31.)

Hēsiodus (Ἡσίοδος), one of the earliest Greek poets, of whose personal history we possess little authentic information. He is frequently mentioned along with Homer; as Homer represents the Ionic school of poetry in Asia Minor, so Hesiod represents the Boeotian school of poetry, which spread over Phocis and Euboea. The only points of resemblance between the two schools consist in their Epic form and their dialect. In other respects they entirely differ. The Homeric school takes for its subjects the restless activity of the heroic age, while the Hesiodic turns its attention to the quiet pursuits of ordinary life, to the origin of the world, the gods and heroes. Hesiod lived about a century later than Homer, and is placed about B.C. 735. He must at any rate be distinctly earlier than the poets who wrote in the middle of the seventh century B.C. We learn from his own poem on Works and Days, that he was born in the village of Ascra in Boeotia, whither his father had emigrated from the Aeolian Cyme in Asia Minor. After the death of his father, he was involved in a dispute with his brother Perses about his small patrimony, which was decided in favour of his brother, who had bribed the judges. He then emigrated to Orchomenos, where he spent the remainder of his life. This is all that can be said with certainty about the life of Hesiod. Tradition speaks of his being murdered at Oenoe in Locris, and buried at Naupactus, from which place his bones were afterwards moved to Orchomenos. Many of the stories related about him refer to his school of poetry, and not to the poet personally. In this light we may regard the tradition, that Hesiod had a poetical contest with Homer, which is said to have taken place at Chalcis during the funeral solemnities of king Amphidamus, or, according to others, at Aulis or Delos. The story of this contest gave rise to a composition still extant under the title of Ἀγὼν Ὀμήρου καὶ Ἡσιόδου, the work of a grammarian who lived towards the end of the first century of our era, in which the two poets are represented as engaged in the contest, and answering one another.—The following are the works of Hesiod: 1. Ἔργα or Ἔργα καὶ ἡμέραι, Opera et Dies, Works and Days. It is written in the most homely style, with scarcely any poetical imagery or ornament, and must be looked upon as the most ancient specimen of didactic poetry. It follows the precept which he declares himself to have received from the Muses, 'to speak true things' (Th. 26). It is a realistic picture of the daily life and work in Boeotia, a picture, generally in gloomy colours, of the monotony of toil which the earth demands for its tillage, and the difficulty of getting justice in the world. The tendency to make might right he illustrates by the earliest fable in Greek literature, that of the Hawk and the Nightingale. The poet exhorts his brother to make gain by hard work instead of unjust dealing, and accordingly gives him rules for husbandry, its times and seasons, for navigation, and for domestic economy. Three episodes are included in it: viz. (1) the fable of Prometheus and Pandora (47-105); (2) on the ages of the world, which are designated by the names of metals (109-201); and (3) a description of winter (504-558). 2. Θεογονία, a Theogony, gives an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods, explaining the whole order of nature in a series of genealogies, for every part of physical as well as moral nature there appears personified in the character of a distinct being. The whole concludes with an account of some of the most illustrious heroes. Though he gives many details not found in Homer, and often different views, he is probably in most cases following legends and myths much older than Homer, and derived from ancient hymns and popular stories. [HOMERUS.] 3. Ἠοῖαι or ἠοῖαι μεγάλαι, also called Κατάλογοι γυναικῶν, Catalogue of Women. This work is lost. It contained accounts of the women who had been beloved by the gods, and had thus become the mothers of the heroes in the various parts of Greece, from whom the ruling families derived their origin, but fifty-six lines of it have been prefixed to the Ἀσπίς Ἡρακλέους, Shield of Hercules, which contains a description of the shield of Hercules, and is an imitation of the Homeric description of the shield of Achilles. It is not Hesiod's work, and belongs to a later period.—Editions of Hesiod by Paley, 1861; Köchly, Lips. 1870; Flach, Berl. 1873; Lange, Lips. 1890.

Hēsionē (Ἡσιόνη), daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, was chained by her father to a rock, in order to be devoured by a sea-monster, that he might thus appease the anger of Apollo and Poseidon. Hercules promised to save her, if Laomedon would give him the horses which he had received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. Hercules killed the monster, but Laomedon refused to keep his promise. Thereupon Hercules took Troy, killed Laomedon, and gave Hesionē to his friend and companion Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer. Her brother, Priam, sent Antenor to claim her back, and the refusal on the part of the Greeks is mentioned as one of the causes of the Trojan war. (Il. v. 649; Diod. iv. 42; Apollod. iii. 12, 7; Hyg. Fab. 89.)

Hesperia (Ἑσπερία), the Western land (from ἔσπερος, vesper), the name given by the Greek poets to Italy, because it lay W. of Greece. In imitation of them, the Roman poets gave the name of Hesperia to Spain, which they called ultima Hesperia (Hor. Od. i. 36, 4) to distinguish it from Italy, which they occasionally called Hesperia Magna (Verg. Aen. i. 569).

Hesperides (Ἑσπερίδες), the celebrated guardians of the golden apples which Ge (Earth) gave to Hera at her marriage with Zeus (Pherec. ap. Schol. ad Ap. Rh. iv. 1396; Athen. p. 83; Hyg. Astr. ii. 3). Their parentage is differently related. They are called the daughters either of Night or Erebus (Hes. Th. 215), or of Phoreys and Ceto, or of Atlas and Hesperis (whence their names Atlantides or Hesperides; Diod. v. 27), or of Zeus and Themis (Pherec. l.e.). Some traditions mentioned three Hesperides, viz. Aegle, Arethusa, and Hesperia; others four, Aegle, Crytheia, Hestia, and Arethusa; and others again seven. The poets describe them as possessing the power of sweet song (Eur. Hipp. 742). In the earliest legends, these nymphs are described as living on the river Oceanus, in the extreme West; but the later attempts to fix the geographical position of their gardens led poets and geographers to different parts of Libya, as the neighbourhood of Cyrene, Mount Atlas, or the islands on the W. coast of Libya (Hes. Th. 334, 518; Eur. Hipp. 742; Plin. vi. 201; Mel. iii. 10). Apollodorus is alone in placing them among the Hyperboreans (ii. 5, 11). They were assisted in watching the golden apples by the dragon Ladon. It was one of the labours of Heracles to obtain possession of these apples. (See p. 399.) The golden apples, which seem to have been connected with the rays of the sun and to have betokened love and fruitfulness, appear, not only in the stories of the marriage of Hera, but also in the marriage of Peleus and in the race of Atalanta (Verg. Æcl. vi. 61).

Hespēridum Insulæ. [HESPERIUM.]

Hespēris. [BERENICE, No. 5.]

Hespērĭum (Ἑσπέρĭον, Ἑσπέρου κέρασ: C. Verde or C. Roxo), a headland on the W. coast of Africa, was one of the furthest points to which the knowledge of the ancients extended along that coast. Near it was a bay called Sinus Hesperius; and a day's journey from it a group of islands called Hesperidum Insulæ, wrongly identified by some with the Fortunatæ Insulæ: they are either the Cape Verde islands, or, more probably, the Bissagos, at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Hespērus (Ἑσπερος), the evening star, is called by Hesiod (Th. 381, 987) a son of Astræus and Eos. He was also regarded as the same as the morning star, whence both Homer and Hesiod call him the bringer of light (ἔωσφόρος: Il. xxii. 318, xxiii. 226). A later account makes him a son of Atlas, who was fond of astronomy, and who disappeared, after ascending Mount Atlas to observe the stars (Diod. iii. 60, iv. 27; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 879.) Hesperus and Phosphorus among the Greeks, and Hesperus and Lucifer among the Romans, were from an early period recognised as names for the same star. (Hyg. Fab. 65, Astr. ii. 42; Cic. N. D. ii. 20; Plin. ii. 36). In art they appear as beautiful youths with torches.

Hestia (Ἑστία, Ion. Ἰστία), called Vesta by the Romans, the goddess of the hearth, or rather of the fire burning on the hearth, was a daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and, according to common tradition, was the first-born of Rhea, and consequently the first of the children swallowed by Cronus. She was a maiden divinity, and when Apollo and Poseidon sued for her hand, she swore by the head of Zeus to remain a virgin for ever. (Hes. Th. 454; Pind. Nem. ix. 1; Hymn. in Ven. 4, 22; Diod. v. 68.) It is not probable that Homer regarded her as a personal deity: in the Odyssey oaths are taken by the Ἰστία (xiv. 159, xvii. 156, xx. 231); but the words imply rather that she had no individual personality apart from the sacred fire. In post-Homeric religion she is regarded as one of the twelve Olympian deities. As the hearth was looked upon as the centre of domestic life, so Hestia was the goddess of domestic life and the giver of all domestic happiness: as such she was believed to dwell in the inner part of every house, and to have invented the art of building houses. In this respect she often appears together with Hermes, who was likewise a deus penetralis. Being the goddess of the sacred fire of the altar, Hestia had a share in the sacrifices offered to all the gods. Hence, when sacrifices were offered, she was invoked first, and the first part of the sacrifice was presented to her. (Hymn. 32, 5; Pind. Nem. xi. 5; Aristoph. Vesp. 842, and Schol.; Plat. Cratyl. p. 401; Paus. v. 14, 5.) The hearth itself was the sacred asylum where suppliants implored the protection of the inhabitants of the house (Thuc. i. 136). The idea of this sanctity is derived in all probability from the care with which all primitive nations found it necessary to preserve the fire of the community. Just as in an uncivilised tribe the fire was studiously kept up in the chief's dwelling, so the state-hearth with its perpetual fire was maintained, no longer, indeed, as a necessity, but as a traditional religious duty, in the prytaneum of most, probably of all, Greek states where the goddess had her especial sanctuary (θάλαμος), under the name of Prytanitis (Πρυτανίτις), with a statue and the sacred hearth. There, as at a private hearth, Hestia protected the suppliants. When a colony was sent out, the emigrants took the fire which was to burn on the hearth of their new home from that of the mother town. If ever the fire of her hearth became extinct, it was not allowed to be lighted again with ordinary fire, but, as in the primitive times, either by fire produced by friction, or by burning glasses drawing fire from the sun. [Dict. of Antiq. art. Prytaneum.] The mystical speculations of later times took their origin from the simple ideas of the ancients, and assumed a sacred hearth not only in the centre of the earth, but even in that of the universe, and confounded Hestia in various ways with other divinities, such as Cybele, Gaia, Demeter, Persephone, and Artemis. Pausanias mentions a temple of Hestia at Hermione (ii. 35, 1); but in general no separate temple was erected, since every prytaneum was a sanctuary of the goddess, and a portion of the sacrifices, to whatever divinity they were offered, belonged to her. The worship of the Roman Vesta is spoken of under VESTA. No description remains of the statue of Hestia in the Athenian Prytaneum (Paus. i. 18, 3); nor of that which Tiberius transferred from Paros to Rome (Dio Cass. iv. 9). The famous 'Giustiniani Hestia' in the Torlonia Museum is generally taken to represent Hestia, but there are no certain indications, and it might stand for other goddesses, such as Hera or Demeter. The left hand originally held a sceptre, or, perhaps, if it is Hestia, a torch.

Hestiaecōtis (Ἑστιαϊώτις). 1. The NW. part of Thessaly [THESSALIA].—2. Or Histiæa, a district in Eubœa. [EUBOEA.]

Hesychiŭs (Ἡσύχιος). 1. An Alexandrine grammarian, under whose name a large Greek dictionary has come down to us. Respecting his personal history nothing is known, but he probably lived about A.D. 380. The work is based, as the writer himself tells us, upon the lexicon of Diogenianus. Hesychius was probably a pagau: the Christian glosses and the references to Christian writers in the work are interpolations by a later hand. The work is one of great importance, not only on account of its explaining the words of the Greek language, but also from its containing much literary and archaeological information, derived from earlier grammarians and commentators, whose works are lost. The arrangement of the work, however, is very defective. Editions by Alberti, completed after Alberti's death by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1746-1766, 2 vols. fol.; and by Maur. Schmidt, Jen. 1868.—2. Of Miletus, surnamed Illustris, from some office which he held, lived about A.D. 540, and wrote an Onomasticon, published by Orelli, Lips. 1820.

Hiarbas. [HIEMPSAL.]

Hibernia, also called Ierne, Iverna or Juverna (Ἰέρνη, Ἰερνὴ νῆσος, Ἰουερνία), the island of Ireland, appears to have derived its name from the inhabitants of its S. coast, called Juverui (Ἰούερροι) by Ptolemy, but its original name was probably Bergion or Vergion. It was mentioned by Pytheas (Strab. p. 62) and by Aristotle (de Mund. 3), and is frequently spoken of by subsequent writers (Diod. v. 32; Strab. pp. 72, 115, 201; Caes. B. G. v. 13; Tac. Agr. 24; Plin. iv. 102; Avien. Or. Mar. 109); but the Romans never made any attempt to conquer the island, though they obtained some knowledge of it from the commercial intercourse which was carried on between it and Britain. Ptolemy, who must have derived his information from the statements of the British merchants who visited its coasts, gives a list of its promontories, rivers, tribes and towns: among them are Eblana and Nagmatae, which may survive in Dublin and Connaught.

Hicesia. [ÆEOLIAE INSULAE.]

Hicetas (Ἰκέτας or Ἰκέτης). 1. A Syracusan, contemporary with the younger Dionysius and Timoleon. He was at first a friend of Dion, after whose death (B.C. 353) his wife Arete, and his sister Aristomache placed themselves under the care of Hicetas; but he was persuaded notwithstanding to consent to their destruction. A few years later he became tyrant of Leontini. He carried on war against the younger Dionysius, whom he defeated, and had made himself master of the whole city, except the island citadel, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, 344. Hicetas then opposed Timoleon and called in the aid of the Carthaginians, but he was defeated and put to death by Timoleon, 339 or 338. (Plut. Dion. 58, Timol. 1-33; Diod. xvi. 65-82.)—2. Tyrant of Syracuse, during the interval between the reign of Agathocles and that of Pyrrhus. He defeated Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, and was himself defeated by the Carthaginians. After a reign of nine years (283-279), he was expelled from Syracuse. (Diod. xxii. 2.)—3. Of Syracuse, one of the earlier Pythagoreans (Cic. Acad. ii. 39).

Hiempsal. 1. Son of Micipsa, king of Numidia, and grandson of Masinissa, was murdered by Jugurtha, soon after the death of Micipsa, B.C. 118 (Sall. Jug. 5).—2. King of Numidia, grandson or great-grandson of Masinissa, and father of Juba, received the sovereignty of part of Numidia after the Jugurthine war. He was expelled from his kingdom by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the leader of the Marian party in Africa, who gave the throne to his supporter Hiarbas, but was restored by Pompey in 81, when Hiarbas was put to death. Hiempsal wrote some works in the Punic language, cited by Sallust. (Plut. Mar. 40, Pomp. 12; Sall. Jug. 17.)

Hiëra. 1. [ÆEOLIAE.]—2. [ÆGATES.]

Hiëräpölis (Ἱεράπολις). 1. A city of Great Phrygia, near the Macander, celebrated for its hot springs and its Plutonium (Strab. p. 629).—2. Formerly Bambÿce (Βαμβύκη: Bambuch, or Membij), a city in the NE. of Syria, one of the chief seats of the worship of Astarte (Lucian, de Dea Syr. 1).

Hiërapytna (Ἱεράπυτνα: Gerapetra), an ancient town on the SE. coast of Crete, traditionally founded by the Corybantes. It stood at the narrowest part of the island due S. of Minoa. (Strab. pp. 440, 472, 475, 479.)

Hiërocles (Ἱεροκλῆς). 1. A Greek rhetorician of Alabanda in Caria, lived about B.C. 100, and was distinguished, like his brother Meneclæus, by the Asiatic style of oratory (Cic. de Or. ii. 23; Strab. p. 661).—2. Governor of Bithynia, and afterwards of Alexandria, is said to have been one of the chief instigators of the persecution of the Christians under Diocletian.—3. A Neo-Platonist, who lived at Alexandria about the middle of the fifth century. He wrote, besides other works which have perished, a commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras, in which he endeavours to give an intelligible account of the philosophy of Pythagoras. Edited by Needham, Cambridge, 1709; and by Warren, Loudon, 1742. The extant work entitled Ἀσπεΐα, a collection of ludicrous tales, is erroneously ascribed to Hierocles the Neo-Platonist. The work is of no merit.—4. A Greek grammarian, the author of an extant work, entitled Συνέκδημος (that is, The Travelling Companion), intended as a handbook for travellers through the provinces of the Eastern empire. It was perhaps written at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. It contains a list of sixty-four eparchiae or provinces of the Eastern empire, and of 935 different towns, with brief descriptions. Edited by Wesseling, in Veterum Romanorum Itineraria, Amsterdam, 1735, and by Parthey, Berl. 1866.

Hiëro (Ἱέρων). 1. Tyrant of Syracuse (B.C. 478-467), was son of Dinomenes and brother of Gelo, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty. In the early part of his reign he became involved in a war with Theron of Agrigentum, who had espoused the cause of his brother Polyzelus, with whom he had quarrelled. But Hiero afterwards concluded a peace with Theron, and became reconciled to his brother Polyzelus. After the death of Theron, in 472, he carried on war against his son Thrasydæus, whom he defeated in a great battle, and expelled from Agrigentum. (Diod. xi. 38-49.) But by far the most important event of his reign was the great victory which he obtained over the Etruscan fleet near Cumæ (474), and which appears to have effectually broken the naval power of that nation (Pind. Pyth. i. 137; Diod. xi. 51). A bronze helmet from the spoils was dedicated at Olympia with an inscription commemorating the victory (C. I. G. 29). It is now in the British Museum. Hiero died at Catana in the twelfth year of his reign, 467. His government was much more despotic than that of his brother Gelo. He maintained a large guard of mercenary troops, and employed numerous spies and informers. He was, however, a liberal and enlightened patron of men of letters; and his court became the resort of the most distinguished poets and philosophers of the day. Aeschylus, Pindar, and Bacchylides took up their abode with him, and we find him associating in friendly intercourse with Xenophanes, Epicharmus, and Simonides. (Paus. i. 2, 3; Athen. pp. 121, 656; Ael. V. H. iv. 15.) His intimacy with the latter was particularly celebrated, and has been made by Xenophon the subject of an imaginary dialogue, entitled Ἱέρων. His love of magnificence was especially displayed in the great contests of the Grecian games, and his victories at Olympia and Delphi have been immortalised by Pindar.—2. King of Syracuse (b.c. 270–216), was the son of Hierocles, a noble Syracusan, descended from the great Gelo, but his mother was a female servant. When Pyrrhus left Sicily (275), Hiero, who had distinguished himself in the wars of that monarch, was declared general by the Syracusan army. He strengthened his power by marrying the daughter of Leptines, at that time the most influential citizen at Syracuse; and after his defeat of the Mamertines, he was saluted by his fellow-citizens with the title of king, 270. It was the great object of Hiero to expel the Mamertines from Sicily; and accordingly when the Romans, in 264, interposed in favour of that people, Hiero concluded an alliance with the Carthaginians, and in conjunction with them, carried on war against the Romans. But having been defeated by the Romans, he con-

Asia, and after the death of that monarch (b.c. 323) served under his countryman Eumenes. In the last battle between Eumenes and Antigonus (316) Hieronymus fell into the hands of Antigonus, to whose service he henceforth attached himself (Diod. xix. 44). After the death of Antigonus (301), Hieronymus continued to follow the fortunes of his son Demetrius, and was appointed by him governor of Boeotia, after his first conquest of Thebes, 292 (Plut. Demetr. 39). He continued unshaken in his attachment to Demetrius and to his son, Antigonus Gonatus, after him. He survived Pyrrhus, and died at the age of 104. Hieronymus wrote a history of the events from the death of Alexander to that of Pyrrhus, if not later. This work has not come down to us, but it is frequently cited by later writers as one of the chief authorities for the history of Alexander's successors. We are told by Pausanias that Hieronymus displayed partiality to Antigonus and Demetrius, and in consequence treated Pyrrhus and Lysimachus with great injustice. (Paus. i. 9, 13).—2. King of Syracuse, succeeded his grandfather Hiero II., b.c. 216, at fifteen years of age. He was persuaded by the Carthaginian party to renounce the alliance with the Romans, which his grandfather had maintained for so many years. He was assassinated after a short reign of only thirteen months.

cluded a peace with them in the following year (263), in virtue of which he obtained possession of the whole S.E. of Sicily, and the E. side of the island as far as Tauromenium. (Pol. i. 8–16; Zonar. viii. 9; Oros. iv. 7.) From this time till his death, a period of about half a century, Hiero continued the friend and ally of the Romans, a policy of which his subjects as well as himself reaped the benefits in the enjoyment of a state of uninterrupted tranquillity and prosperity (Pol. i. 18, 62). Even the heavy losses which the Romans sustained in the first three years of the second Punic war did not shake his fidelity; and after their great defeats, he sent them large supplies of corn and auxiliary troops (Liv. xxi. 49, xxii. 37, xxiii. 21). He died in 216 at the age of ninety-two (Lucian, Macrobi. 10; cf. Pol. vii. 8; Liv. xxiv. 4). His government was mild and equitable. His careful administration of finances is attested by the laws regulating the tithes of corn and other agricultural produce, which, under the name of Leges Hieronicae, were retained by the Romans when they reduced Sicily to a province (Cic. Verr. ii, 13, iii. 8, 51). He adorned the city of Syracuse with many public works. His power and magnificence were celebrated by Theocritus in his 16th Idyll. Hiero had only one son, Gelo, who died shortly before his father. He was succeeded by his grandson, Hieronymus.

(Pol. vii. 2–7; Liv. xxiv. 4).—3. Of Rhodes, was a disciple of Aristotle, and appears to have lived down to the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He held the highest good to consist in freedom from pain and trouble, and denied that pleasure was to be sought for its own sake. (Cic. Or. 56, 190, Acad. ii. 42, 129, Fin. ii. 6, 19; Diog. Laërt. iv. 41, 45).—4. Commonly known as Saint Jerome, one of the most celebrated of the Christian Fathers, was born at Stridon, a town upon the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, about A.D. 340. For an account of his life and writings see Dict. of Christian Biography.

Hiērōsōlyma. [JERUSALEM.]

Hilarius. 1. Bishop of Poitiers, A.D. 350.—2. Bishop of Arles, A.D. 429. [See Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Himera (Ἱμέρα). 1. (Fiume Salso), one of the principal rivers in the S. of Sicily, at one time the boundary between the territories of the Carthaginians and Syracusans, receives near Enna the water of a salt spring, and hence has salt water as far as its mouth (Diod. xix. 109; Pol. vii. 4).—2. A smaller river in the N. of Sicily, flows into the sea between the towns of Himera and Thermao (Pind. Pyth. i. 153; Plin. iii. 90).—3. A celebrated Greek city on the N. coast of Sicily, W. of the mouth of the river Himera [No. 2], was founded by the Chalcidians of Zancle, b.c. 648, and afterwards received Dorian settlers, so that the inhabitants spoke a mixed dialect, partly Ionic (Chalcidian) and partly Doric (Thuc. vi. 5; Strab. p. 272; Diod. xiii. 62). About 560 Himera, being threatened by its powerful neighbours, placed itself under the protection of Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in whose power it appears to have remained till his death. At a later time (500) we find Himera governed by a tyrant, Terillus, who was expelled by Theron of Agrigentum. Terillus thereupon applied for assistance to the Carthaginians, who, anxious to extend their influence in Sicily, sent a powerful army into Sicily under the command of Hamilcar. The Carthaginians were defeated with great slaughter at Himera by the united forces of Theron and Gelo of Syracuse on the same day as the battle of Salamis was fought, 480. (Pind. Pyth. i. 152; Hdt. vii. 166; Diod. xi. 20.) Himera was now governed by Thrasydaeus, the son of Theron, in the name of his father; but the inhabitants having attempted to revolt, Theron put to death or drove into exile a considerable part of the population, and re-peopled the city with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Dorian origin (Diod. xi. 48). After the death of Theron (472), Himera recovered its independence, and for the next sixty years was one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily. It assisted Syracuse against the Athenians in 415 (Thuc.

vi. 62). In 409 it was taken by Hannibal, the son of Gisco, who, to revenge the great defeat which the Carthaginians had suffered before this town, levelled it to the ground and destroyed almost all the inhabitants (Diod. xiii. 59; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 37). Himera was never rebuilt; but on the opposite bank of the river Himera, the Carthaginians founded a new town, which, from a warm medicinal spring in its neighbourhood, was called Thermae (Θέρμαι: Θερμίτης, Thermitanus: Termini). Here the remains of the unfortunate inhabitants of Himera were allowed to settle. The Romans, who highly prized the warm springs of Thermae, permitted the town to retain its own constitution; and Augustus made it a colony. (Cic. Verr. ii. 37, 46, 75.)—The poet Stesichorus was born at the ancient Himera, and the tyrant Agathocles at Thermae.

Himérius (Ἱμέριος), a Greek sophist, was born at Prusa in Bithynia, and studied at Athens. He was subsequently professor of rhetoric at Athens, where he gave instruction to Julian, afterwards emperor, and the Christian writers, Basil and Gregory Nazianzen. In 362 the emperor Julian invited him to his court at Antioch, and made him his secretary. He returned to Athens in 368, and there passed the remainder of his life. There were extant in the time of Photius seventy-one orations by Himerius; but of these only twenty-four have come down to us complete. Edited by Wernsdorf, Göttingen, 1790, and by Dübner, 1849.

Himilco (Ἱμίλκων). 1. A Carthaginian, who conducted a voyage of discovery from Gades towards the N., along the W. shores of Europe, at the same time that Hanno undertook his voyage to the S. along the coast of Africa. [Hanno, No. 10.] Himilco represented that his further progress was prevented by the stagnant nature of the sea, loaded with sea weed, and by the absence of wind. His voyage is said to have lasted four months, but it is impossible to judge how far it was extended. Perhaps it was intentionally wrapt in obscurity by the commercial jealousy of the Carthaginians. (Plin. ii. 169; Avien. Or. Mar. 117, 383, 412.)—2. Son of Hanno, commanded, together with Hannibal, son of Gisco [HANNIBAL, No. 1], a Carthaginian army in Sicily, and laid siege to Agrigentum, B.C. 406. Hannibal died before Agrigentum of a pestilence which broke out in the camp; and Himilco, now left sole general, succeeded in taking the place, after a siege of nearly eight months (Diod. xiii. 80–114.) At a later period he carried on war against Dionysius of Syracuse. In 395 he defeated Dionysius, and laid siege to Syracuse; but, while pressing the siege of the city, a pestilence carried off a great number of his men. In this weakened condition, Himilco was attacked and defeated by Dionysius, and was obliged to purchase his safety by an ignominious capitulation. Such was his grief and disappointment at this termination to the campaign, that, on his return to Carthage, he put an end to his life by voluntary abstinence. (Diod. xiv. 41–76; Just. xix. 2.)—3. The Carthaginian commander at Lilybaeum, which he defended with skill and bravery when it was attacked by the Romans, 250 (Pol. i. 41–53).—4. Commander of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily during a part of the second Punic war, 214–212 (Liv. xxiv. 27–39).—5. Surnamed Phamaeas, commander of the Carthaginian cavalry in the third Punic war. He deserted to the Romans, by whom he was liberally rewarded. (Appian, Pun. 97–109.)

Hippāna (τὰ Ἱππανα), a town in the N. of Sicily near Panormus (Pol. i. 24).

Hipparchia (Ἱππαρχία), wife of Crates the Cynic. [For details, see CRATES, No. 3.]

Hipparchus (Ἱππαρχος). 1. Son of Pisis-tratus. [PISISTRATIDÆ.]—2. A celebrated Greek astronomer, was a native of Nicaea in Bithynia, and flourished B.C. 162–145. He resided both at Rhodes and Alexandria. He was the true father of astronomy, but our knowledge of his greatness is derived from Ptolemy. He was the first who demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solution of problems of spherical astronomy. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator: that is, by latitudes and longitudes. The catalogue which Hipparchus constructed of the stars is preserved in the Almagest of Ptolemy. Hipparchus wrote numerous works, which are all lost with the exception of his commentary on the Phaenomena of Aratus. Ed. by Petavius, Paris, 1630.

Hipparinus (Ἰππαρίνος). 1. A Syracusan, father of Dion and Aristomache, supported the elder Dionysius, who married his daughter Aristomache (Ar. Pol. v. 6; Plut. Dion. 3).—2. Son of Dion, and grandson of the preceding, threw himself from the roof of a house, and was killed on the spot, when his father attempted, by restraint, to cure him of the dissolute habits which he had acquired while under the power of Dionysius (Plut. Dion. 55; Ael. V. H. iii. 4).—3. Son of the elder Dionysius by Aristomache, daughter of No. 1, succeeded Callippus in the tyranny of Syracuse, B. C. 352. He was assassinated, after reigning two years. (Diod. xvi. 36.)

Hippāris (Ἰππαρίς: Camarina), a river in the S. of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Camarina.

Hippāsus (Ἰππασός), of Metapontum or Croton, in Italy, one of the elder Pythagoreans, held the element of fire to be the cause of all things. In consequence of his making known the sphere, consisting of twelve pentagons, regarded by the Pythagoreans as a secret, he is said to have perished in the sea as an impious man. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 84; Iambli. Pyth. 18, 23.)

Hippias (Ἰππίας). 1. Son of Pisistratus. [PISISTRATIDÆ].—2. The Sophist, was a native of Elis, and the contemporary of Socrates. His fellow-citizens availed themselves of his abilities in political matters, and sent him on a diplomatic mission to Sparta. He travelled through Greece for the purpose of acquiring wealth and celebrity, by teaching and public speaking. His character as a sophist, his vanity and boastful arrogance, are described in the two dialogues of Plato, Hippias major and Hippias minor.

Hippo (Ἰππών), in Africa. 1. H. Regius (I. βασιλικός: nr. Bonah, Ru.), a city on the coast of Numidia, W. of the mouth of the Rühricus (Strab. p. 832; Sall. Jug. 19), celebrated as the bishopric of St. Augustine.—2. H. Diarrhytus or Zaritus (I. διάρρυτος: Bizerta), a city on the N. coast of the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), W. of Utica, at the mouth of the Sinus Hipponensis (Plin. v. 23).—3. A town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, S. of Toletum.

Hippocentauri. [CENTAURI.]

Hippocoon (Ἰπποκῶν), son of Oebalus and Batea. After his father's death, he expelled his brother, Tyndareus, in order to secure the kingdom; but Heracles led Tyndareus back, and slew Hippocoon and his sons (Apollod. iii. 10, 4; Paus. iii. 1, 4). Ovid (Met. viii. 314) mentions the sons among the Calydonian hunters.

Hippocrātes (Ἰπποκράτης). 1. Father of Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens (Hdt. i. 59, v. 65).—2. An Athenian, son of Megacles, was brother of Clisthenes, the legislator, and grandfather, through his daughter, Agariste, of the illustrious Pericles (Hdt. vi. 131).—3. An Athenian, son of Xanthippus and brother of Pericles. He had three sons, who, as well as their father, are alluded to by Aristophanes as men of a mean capacity and devoid of education (Ar. Nub. 1001, Therm. 273).—4. An Athenian, son of Aripbron, commanded the Athenians, B. C. 424, when he was defeated and slain by the Bocotians at the battle of Delium (Thuc. iv. 89-101; Diod. xii. 69).—5. A Lacedaemonian, served under Mindarus on the Asiatic coast in 410, and after the defeat of Mindarus at Cyzicus, became commander of the fleet. He was the author of the well-known laconic despatch, "Our ships (τὰ κἄλα) are lost; Mindarus is gone; the men are hungry; what to do we know not." (Xen. Hell. i. 1, 23).—6. A Sicilian, succeeded his brother Cleander as tyrant of Gela, 498. His reign was prosperous; and he extended his power over several other cities of Sicily. He died in 491, while besieging Hybla (Hdt. viii. 154).—7. A Sicilian, brother of EPICYDES.—8. The most celebrated physician of antiquity. He was born in the island of Cos about B. C. 460. He belonged to the family of the Asclepiadae, and was the son of Heraclides, who was also a physician. His mother's name was Phaenarete, who was said to be descended from Heracles. He was instructed in medical science by his father and by Herodicus, and he is said to have been also a pupil of Gorgias of Leontini. He wrote, taught, and practised his profession at home; travelled in different parts of the continent of Greece; and died at Larissa in Thessaly, about 357, at the age of 104. He had two sons, Thesalus and Dracon, and a son-in-law, Polybus, all of whom followed the same profession, and who are supposed to have been the authors of some of the works in the Hippocratic collection. These are the only certain facts which we know respecting the life of Hippocrates; but to these later writers have added a large collection of stories, many of which are clearly fabulous. Thus he is said to have stopped the plague at Athens by burning fires throughout the city, by suspending chaplets of flowers, and by the use of an antidote. It is also related that Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, invited Hippocrates to come to his assistance during a time of pestilence, but that Hippocrates refused his request, on the ground of his being the enemy of his country.—The writings which have come down to us under the name of Hippocrates were composed by several different persons, and are of very different merit. They are more than sixty in number, but of these only a few are certainly genuine. They are:—1. Προγνωστικόν, Praenotiones or Prognosticon. 2. Ἀφορισμοί, Aphorismi. 3. Ἐπιδημίων Βιβλία, De Morbis Popularibus (or Epidemiorum). 4. Περὶ Διαίτης Ὄξεων, De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis, or De Dieta Acutorum. 5. Περὶ Ἀέρων, ὕδατων, τόπων, De Aëre, Aquis, et Locis. 6. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κεφαλῇ Τρωμάτων, De Capitis Vulneribus. Some of the other works were perhaps written by Hippocrates; but the great majority of them were composed by his disciples and followers, many of whom bore the name of Hippocrates. The ancient physicians wrote numerous commentaries on the works in the Hippocratic collection. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries of Galen.—Hippocrates divided the causes of disease into two principal classes: the one comprehending the influence of seasons, climates, water, situation, &c., and the other the influence of food, exercise, &c. He considered that while heat and cold, moisture and dryness, succeeded one another throughout the year, the human body underwent certain analogous changes, which influenced the diseases of the period. He supposed that the four fluids or humours of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile) were the primary seat of disease; that health was the result of the due combination (or crasis) of these, and that, when this crasis was disturbed, disease was the consequence; that, in the course of a disorder that was proceeding favourably, these humours underwent a certain change in quality (or coction), which was the sign of returning health, as preparing the way for the expulsion of the morbid matter, or crisis; and that these crises had a tendency to occur at certain stated periods, which were hence called 'critical days.'—Hippocrates was evidently a person who not only had had great experience, but who also knew how to turn it to the best account; and the number of moral reflections and apophthegms that we meet with in his writings, some of which (as, for example, 'Life is short, and Art is long') have acquired a sort of proverbial notoriety, show him to have been a profound thinker. His works are written in the Ionic dialect, and the style is so concise as to be sometimes extremely obscure.—The best edition of his works is by Littré, Paris, 1839 seq., with a French translation.

Hippocrēnē (Ἱπποκρήνη, the 'Fountain of the Horse,' called by Persius Fons Caballinus), was a fountain in Mt. Helicon in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses, said to have been produced by the horse PEGASUS striking the ground with his feet.

Hippodāmīa (Ἱπποδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Oenomaus, king of Pisa in Elis. For details see OENOMAUS and PELOPS.—2. Wife of Pirithous, at whose nuptials took place the celebrated battle between the Centaurs and Lapithae. See PIRITHOUS.—3. See BRISEIS.

Hippodāmus (Ἱππόδαμος), a distinguished Greek architect, a native of Miletus, and the son of Euryphon or Eurycoön. His fame rests on his construction, not of single buildings, but of whole cities. His first great work was the town of Piraeus, which he built under the auspices of Pericles. When the Athenians founded their colony of Thurii (B. C. 443), Hippodamus went out with the colonists, and was the architect of the new city. Hence he is often called a Thurian. He afterwards built Rhodes, B. C. 407. (Ar. Pol. ii. 5; Strab. p. 654; Diod. xii. 10.)

Hippōlōchus (Ἱππόλοχος), son of Bellerophon and Philouōē or Anticlea, and father of GLAUCUS, the Lycian prince.

Hippolytē (Ἱππολύτη). 1. Daughter of Ares and Otrera, was queen of the Amazons, and sister of Antiope and Melanippe. She wore a girdle given to her by her father; and when Heracles came to fetch this girdle, she was slain by him. [See p. 398.] According to another tradition, Hippolyte, with an army of Amazons, marched into Attica, to take vengeance on Theseus for having carried off Antiope; but being conquered by Theseus, she fled to Megara, where she died of grief, and was buried (Paus. i. 41, 7; Plut. Thes. 27; Apollod. ii. 5, 9). In some accounts Hippolyte, and not Antiope, is said to have been married to Theseus (Schol. ad Eur. Hipp. 10; Athen. p. 557; Stat. Theb. xii. 534).—2. Or Astydamia, wife of Acastus, fell in love with Peleus. [See ACASTUS.]

Hippolytus (Ἱππόλυτος). 1. Son of Theseus by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons [see above], or her sister Antiope (Plut. Thes. 28; Isocr. Panath. 193; Diod. iv. 62; Paus. i. 2, 1). According to the Attic story, which through the genius of Euripides has prevailed over the older Troezenian account, Theseus afterwards married Phaedra, who fell in love with Hippolytus, led thereto by Aphrodite, who was indignant because Hippolytus preferred hunting to love. Phaedra, when her offers were rejected by her stepson, hanged herself, leaving a letter in which she accused him to his father of having accepted her dishonour. Theseus thereupon cursed his son, and begged his father (Aegeus or Poseidon) to destroy him. Accordingly, as Hippolytus was driving in his chariot along the sea-coast, Poseidon sent forth a bull from the water. The horses were frightened, upset the chariot, and dragged Hippolytus along the ground till he was dead. Troezen has a different local myth. Hippolytus has a temple and an image of great antiquity dedicated by Dionedes, who first sacrificed there. Every maiden before her marriage dedicates in this temple a lock of her hair. The story of his death is denied, but he was placed in the stars as the Charioteer. They showed also a myrtle in the neighbouring temple of Aphrodite connected with the story of the love of Phaedra, whose tomb is hard by; and a statue called Asclepius, which is said by the Troezenians to be really the image of Hippolytus. (Paus. ii. 32; cf. Diod. iv. 62; Eur. Hipp. 1424.) At Epidaurus there was a stele on which it was recorded that Hippolytus dedicated twenty horses to Asclepius, and also a tradition that he was restored to life by Asclepius, and went to Aricia in Italy, where he became king and made a grove for Artemis (Paus. ii. 27, 4). In this story the Latin poets make him take the name of Virbius and exclude horses from the grove (Verg. Aen. vii. 774; Ov. Met. xv. 544; Stat. Silv. iii. 1, 55; Ov. Past. iii. 266; cf. Hor. Od. iv. 7, 25, who follows Euripides and denies the restoration to life). There is no great probability in the theory now held by many that Hippolytus and Phaedra have to do with the sun and moon. It is better to regard Hippolytus as an ancient local deity of Troezen who has been altered into a hero. He was probably originally, as a god at once of purity and of hunting, the male counterpart of Artemis, and the story of his death is partly a reminiscence of a struggle between his worship and that of Poseidon, and partly derived from some ritual involving the dedication or sacrifice of horses. Again, there may be a question whether his name was derived from the story or the story, to some extent, from his name. How the story of Phaedra came in is not so clear, but it has been suggested with some probability that it arose from his reputation for continence and purity of life. The mingling of his worship with that of Asclepius transformed him into a mortal hero raised from death by Asclepius; and in Italy, because of his connexion with Artemis and with horses, he became identified with the Italian deity Virbius, a sort of Tree-spirit worshipped in conjunction with Diana at Aricia. [DIANA; VIRBIUS.]—2. Of Rome, a Christian writer at the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd centuries. [See Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Hippōmēdon (Ἱππομέδων), son of Aristomachus, or, according to Sophocles, of Talauus, was one of the Seven against Thebes, where he was slain during the siege by Hyperbius or Ismarus (Aesch. Sept. 490; Soph. O. C. 1318; Apollod. iii. 6, 3).

Hippōmēnes (Ἱππομένης). 1. Son of Megareus, and great-grandson of Poseidon, conquered Atalanta in the foot-race. For details see ATALANTA, No. 2.—2. A descendant of Codrus, the fourth of the decennial archons. Incensed at the barbarous punishment which he inflicted on his daughter, the Attic nobles deposed him, 722 B. C., and thenceforth the dignity no longer appertained exclusively to the descendants of Medon. (Heracl. Pol. i.; Damasc. p. 42.)

Hippon (Ἱππων), of Rhegium, a philosopher of uncertain date, belonging to the Ionian school. He was accused of Atheism, and so got the surname of the Melian, as agreeing in sentiment with Diagoras. He held water and fire to be the principles of all things, the latter springing from the former, and developing it self by generating the universe (Arist. Met. i. 3).

Hippōnax (Ἰππῶναξ), of Ephesus, son of Pytheus and Protis, was, after Archilochus and Simonides, the third of the Iambic poets of Greece. He flourished B.C. 546-520. He was distinguished for his love of liberty, and having been expelled from his native city by the tyrants, he took up his abode at Clazouenae, for which reason he is sometimes called a Clazomenian. In person, Hipponax was little, thin, and ugly, but very strong. The two brothers Bupalus and Athenis, who were sculptors of Chios, made statues of Hipponax, in which they caricatured his natural ugliness; and he in return directed all the power of his satirical poetry against them, and especially against Bupalus. The sculptors are said by some writers to have hanged themselves in despair. (Hor. Epod. vi. 14; Phn. xxxvi. 11; Strab. p. 642; Aelian, V. H. x. 6; Athen. p. 552.) Hipponax was celebrated in antiquity for the severity of his satires. He severely chastised the effeminate luxury of his Ionian brethren; he did not spare his own parents; and he ventured even to ridicule the gods.—In his satires he introduced a spondee or a trochee in the last foot, instead of an iambus. This change made the verse irregular in its rhythm, and gave it a sort of halting movement, whence it was called the Choliambus (χολιαμβος, lame iambic), or Iambus Scazon (σκάζων, limping). He also wrote a parody on the Iliad. Fragments edited by Welcker, Gotting. 1817, and by Bergk, in the Poetae Lyrici Graeci.

Hippōnicus. [CALLIAS AND HIPPONICUS.]

Hippōnium. [VIBO.]

Hippōnōus. [BELLEROPHON.]

Hippōtādes (Ἰπποτάδης), son of Hippotes: that is, Aeolus. [AEOLUS, No. 2.] Hence the Aeoliae Insulae are called Hippotadae regnum. (Ov. Met. xiv. 86.)

Hippōtes (Ἰπποτής). 1. Father of Aeolus. [AEOLUS, No. 2.]—2. Son of Phylas by a daughter of Iolaus, great-grandson of Heracles, and father of Aletes. When the Heraclidae invaded Peloponnesus, Hippotes killed the seer Carnus. The army in consequence began to suffer very severely, and Hippotes by the command of an oracle was banished for ten years. (Apollod. ii. 8, 3; Paus. iii. 18, 3; Diod. v. 9.)—3. Son of Creon king of Corinth. [JASON.]

Hippōthōon (Ἰπποθῶων), an Attic hero, son of Poseidon and Alope, the daughter of Cercyon. He had a heroum at Athens; and one of the Attic phylae, or tribes, was called after him Hippothoontis. (Paus. i. 5, 38, 39.)

Hippōthōus (Ἰπποθῆος). 1. Son of Cercyon, and father of Aepytus, succeeded Agapenor as king in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 5, 45).—2. Son of Lethus, grandson of Teutamus, and brother of Pylaeus, led a band of Pelasgians from Larissa to the assistance of the Trojans. He was slain by the Telamonian Ajax (Il. ii. 842, xvii. 288).

Hirpini, a Samnite people, whose name is said to come from the Sabine word hirpus, 'a wolf,' dwelt in the S. of Samnium, between Apulia, Lucania and Campania. Their chief town was AECULANUM. [SAMNITES.]

Hirtius, A., belonged to a plebeian family which came probably from Ferentinum in the territory of the Hernici. He was the personal and political friend of Caesar the dictator. In B.C. 58 he was Caesar's legatus in Gaul, and during the Civil war his name constantly appears in Cicero's correspondence. He was one of the ten praetors nominated by Caesar for 46, and during Caesar's absence in Africa he lived principally at his Tusculan estate, which was contiguous to Cicero's villa. Though politically opposed, they were on friendly terms, and Cicero gave Hirtius lessons in oratory. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 33, ix. 6, xvi. 18; Suet. Rhet. 1.) In 44 Hirtius received Belgic Gaul for his province, but he governed it by deputy, and attended Caesar at Romo, who nominated him and Vibius Pansa consuls for 43. After Caesar's assassination (44) Hirtius first joined Antony, but, being disgusted by the despotic arrogance of the latter, he retired to Puteoli, where he renewed his intercourse with Cicero. Later in the year he resided at his Tusculan villa, where he was attacked by a dangerous illness, from which he never perfectly recovered. On the 1st of January, 43, Hirtius and Pansa entered on their consulship, according to Caesar's arrangement. The two consuls were sent with Octavian against Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus at Mutina. Pansa was defeated by Antony, and died of a wound which he had received in the battle. Hirtius retrieved this disaster by defeating Antony, but he also fell on the 27th of April, in leading an assault on the besiegers' camp. (Appian, B. C. iii. 60-71; Dio Cass. xvi. 36-89; Ov. Trist. iv. 10, 6; Tibull. iii. 5, 18.) Octavian sent the bodies of the slain consuls to Rome, where they were received with extraordinary honours, and publicly buried in the Field of Mars (Vell. Pat. ii. 62). To Octavian their removal from the scene was so timely, that he was accused by many of murdering them (Dio Cass. xvi. 39; Suet. Aug. 11; Tac. Ann. i. 10). Hirtius wrote the 8th book of the Gallic War; and the authorship of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish was ascribed by some to Hirtius, by others to Oppius (Suet. Jul. 56). It is possible that Hirtius wrote the Alexandrian War; but the inferior style of the African and Spanish wars makes it tolerably certain that they were not his work, nor that of Oppius either. They seem also to be written by some one who took part in the campaigns, from which both Hirtius and Oppius were absent.

Hirtuleius, a distinguished officer of Sertorius in Spain. In B.C. 78 he was routed and slain near Italica in Baetica by Metellus (Appian, B. C. i. 100).

Hispalis, more rarely Hispal (Seville), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, founded by the Phoenicians, was situated on the left bank of the Baetis, and was in reality a seaport, for, although 500 stadia from the sea, the river is navigable for considerable vessels up to the town. Under the Romans Hispalis was the third town in the province, Corduba and Gades being the first two. It was patroised by Caesar, because Corduba had espoused the side of Pompey. He made it a Roman colony, under the name of Julia Romula or Romulensis, and a conventus juridicus or town of assize. Under the Goths and Vaudals Hispalis was the chief town in the S. of Spain and under the Arabs was the capital of a separate kingdom. (Strab. p. 141; Bell. Alex. 51; Dio Cass. xliii. 39.)

Hispania or Iberia (Ἰσπανία, Ἰβηρία: Hispanus, Ibērus: Spain), a peninsula in the SW. of Europe, is connected with the land only on the NE., where the Pyrenees form its boundary, and is surrounded on all other sides by the sea: on the E. and S. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by the Atlantic, and on the N. by the Cantabrian sea. Vague legends of Spain had reached the Greeks, doubtless through Phoenicians at an early period, even as early as Hesiod (who mentions Erythea: Th. 290), and the lyric poets of the 7th century B.C. (Strab. p. 148). Pindar mentions also the 'Pillars of Hercules' (Ἡρακλέος σταλαί: Ol. iii. 44, Isthm. iii. 30) as the limits of the world. The country generally was first mentioned by Hecataeus (about B.C. 500) under the name of Iberia; but this name originally indicated only the E. coast: the W. coast beyond the Pillars of Hercules was called Tartessus (Ταρτησσίς); and the interior of the country Celtica (ἡ Κελτική). Herodotus also speaks of Iberia, but his information does not extend much beyond the country about Gades (i. 163, iv. 8, 152). At a later time the Greeks applied the name of Iberia, which is usually derived from the river Iberus, to the whole country. Considerably greater knowledge of the coast, though probably not of the interior, was possessed by Eratosthenes and Pytheas (Strab. pp. 64, 92), of whose writings Avienus, many centuries later, made use for his Ora Maritima (in which he used also earlier writers, such as Hecataeus). But neither Greeks nor Romans had any accurate knowledge of the country before the second Punic war. The name Hispania, by which the Romans call the country, first occurs at the time of the Roman invasion. The origin of the name is quite uncertain, though some take it to be merely a corruption of the name Hesperia, or 'western land,' by which it was known to the Italians and Italian Greeks. It may be of a Basque or Iberian origin to which we have no clue.—Spain is a very mountainous country. The principal mountains are, in the NE. the Pyrenees [Pyrenaeus M.], and in the centre of the country the IDUBEDA, which runs parallel with the Pyrenees from the land of the Cantabri to the Mediterranean, and the OROSPEDA or ORTOSPEDA, which begins in the centre of the Idubeda, runs SW. throughout Spain, and terminates at Calpe. The rivers of Spain are numerous. The six most important are the IBERUS (Ebro), BAETIS (Guadalquivir), and ANAS (Guadiana), in the E. and S.; and the TAGUS, DURIUS (Douro), and MINIUS (Minho), in the W. Spain was considered by the ancients very fertile, but more especially the S. part of the country, Baetica and Lusitania, which were also praised for their climate. The central and N. parts of the country were less productive, and the climate in these districts was cold in winter. In the S. there were numerous flocks of sheep, the wool of which was celebrated in foreign countries. The Spanish horses and asses were also much valued in antiquity; and on the coast there was abundance of fish. The country produced a great quantity of corn, oil, wine, flax, figs, and other fruits. But the principal riches of the country consisted in mineral productions, of which the greatest quantity was found in Turdetania. Gold was found in abundance in various parts of the country; still more important were the silver mines, of which the most celebrated were near Carthago Nova, Ilipa, Sisapon, and Castulo. (Strab. p. 146; Plin. xxxiii. 66-160.) The precious stones, copper, lead, tin, and other metals, were also found in more or less abundance. [As to the probability that the Tin Islands were off the NW. coast of Spain, see CASSITERIDES INSULAE.] The most ancient inhabitants of Spain were the Iberi, who were a distinct people, though their name was loosely used by Greeks and Romans to designate all the mixed races of the peninsula. The Iberi dwelt on both sides of the Pyrenees, and were found in the S. of Gaul, as far as the Rhone. Of their origin and language no certain account can be given; but it is probable that the Basques of to-day are the remnants of this people, who once occupied the whole of Spain. They seem to have been akin to the Finnish, not to the Indo-Germanic stock. Celts afterwards crossed the Pyrenees, and became mingled with the Iberi, whence arose the mixed race of the Celtiberi, who dwelt chiefly in the high table-land in the centre of the country. [CELTIBERI.] But besides this mixed race of the Celtiberi, there were also several tribes, both of Iberians and Celts, who were never united with one another. The unmixed Iberians, from whom the Basques are descended, dwelt chiefly in the Pyrenees and on the coasts, and their most distinguished tribes were the ASTURES, CANTABRI, VACCAEI, &c. The unmixed Celts dwelt chiefly on the river Anas, and in the NW. corner of the country or Gallaecia. Besides these inhabitants, there were Phoenician and Carthaginian settlements on the coasts, of which the most important were GADES and CARTHAGO NOVA; there were likewise Greek colonies, such as EMPORIAE and SAGUNTUM; and lastly the conquest of the country by the Romans introduced many Romans, whose customs, civilisation, and language gradually spread over the whole peninsula, and effaced the national characteristics of the ancient population. The spread of the Latin language in Spain seems to have been facilitated by the schools established by Sertorius, in which both the languages and literatures of Greece and Rome were taught. Under the empire some of the most distinguished Latin writers were natives of Spain, such as the two Senecas, Lucan, Martial, Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Pomponius Mela, Prudentius, and others.—The ancient inhabitants of Spain were a proud, brave, and warlike race; easily excited and ready to take offence; inveterate robbers; moderate in the use of food and wine; fond of song and of the dance; lovers of their liberty, and ready at all times to sacrifice their lives rather than submit to a foreign master. The Cantabri and inhabitants of the mountains in the N. were the fiercest and most uncivilised of all the tribes; the Vaccaeii and the Turdetani were the most civilised; and the latter people were not only acquainted with the alphabet, but possessed a literature which contained records of their history, poems, and collections of laws composed in verse.—The history of Spain begins with the invasion of the country by the Carthaginians, B. C. 238; for up to that time hardly anything was known of Spain except the existence of two powerful commercial states in the W., TARTESSUS and GADES. After the first Punic war Hamilcar, the father of Hannibal, formed the plan of conquering Spain, in order to obtain for the Carthaginian possessions which might indemnify them for the loss of Sicily and Sardinia. Under his command (239-228), and that of his son-in-law and successor, Hasdrubal (228-220), the Carthaginians conquered the greater part of the SE. of the peninsula as far as the Iborus; and Hasdrubal founded the important city of Carthago Nova. The successes of the Carthaginians excited the jealousy of the Romans; and a treaty was made between the two nations about 228, by which the Carthaginians bound themselves not to cross the Iberus. (Pol. ii. 13.) The town of Saguntum, although on the W. side of the river, was under the protection of the Romans; and the capture of this town by Hannibal, in 219, was the immediate cause of the second Punic war. In the course of this war the Romans drove the Carthaginians out of the peninsula, and became masters of their possessions in the S. of the country. But many tribes in the centre of the country, which had been only nominally subject to Carthage, still retained their virtual independence; and the tribes in the N. and NW. of the country had been hitherto quite unknown both to the Carthaginians and to the Romans. There now arose a long and bloody struggle between the Romans and the various tribes in Spain, and it was nearly two centuries before the Romans succeeded in subduing entirely the whole of the peninsula. The Celtiberians were conquered by the elder Cato (195) and Tib. Gracchus, the father of the two tribunes (179). The Lusitanians, who long resisted the Romans under their brave leader Viriathus, were obliged to submit, about the year 137, to D. Brutus, who penetrated as far as Gallaecia; but it was not till Numantia was taken by Scipio Africanus the younger, in 133, that the Romans obtained the undisputed sovereignty over the various tribes in the centre of the country, and of the Lusitanians to the S. of the Tagus. A serious insurrection of the Celtiberians and Lusitanians was subdued by Didius and Crassus in 98-93. Julius Caesar, after his praetorship, subdued the Lusitanians N. of the Tagus (60). The Cantabri, Astures, and other tribes in the mountains of the N., were finally subjugated by Augustus and his generals. The whole peninsula was now subject to the Romans; and Augustus founded in it several colonies, and caused excellent roads to be made throughout the country. In Spain before the death of Augustus, there were nearly fifty communities with full citizenship, and about as many more with Latin rights; and within the same period in all the E. and S. of Spain Roman dress and manners prevailed. That Spain, except the N. and NW. was more completely Romanised in language and customs than any other province was due greatly to the influence of the numerous colonies and municipia, partly to its easy trade and commerce directly with Italy, and partly also that it did not preserve its old cantonal arrangement nor even its old religious meetings in the same way as did the Celts of Gaul. The towns of Corduba, Gades, Emerita, Bilbilis, Calagurris, and others fostered Latin literature and produced writers such as Quintilian, Martial, Seneca, Lucan, Mela, and Columella. The Romans had as early as the end of the second Punic war reckoned Spain as a province, and from the year 206 two proconsuls were chosen for the command (Appian, Hisp. 38): but the organisation of two provinces, separated from one another by the Iberus, and called Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior, the former being to the E., and the latter to the W. of the river, dates from 197, after which two praetors with proconsular power were annually appointed to administer them (Liv. xxviii. 2, xxxi. 27). The Saltus Castulonensis was regarded as the dividing line, and Carthago Nova became chief town of the Hither, Corduba of the Further, Spain. In consequence of there being two provinces, we frequently find the country called Hispaniae. Augustus made a new division of the country, and formed three provinces, Tarraconensis Baetica, and Lusitania, in B. C. 27 (App. Hisp. 102; Dio Cass. liii. 12; Strab. p. 166: the expression 'utraque Hispania' in Mon. Ancyr. refers to the distinction between imperial and senatorial Spain). The province Tarraconensis, which derived its name from Tarraco, the capital of the province, was far the largest of the three, and comprehended the whole of the N., W., and centre of the peninsula. The province Baetica, which derived its name from the river Baetis, was separated from Lusitania on the N. and W. by the river Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the E. by a line drawn from the river Anas to the promontory Charidemus in the Mediterranean. The province Lusitania, which corresponded very nearly in extent to the modern Portugal, was separated from Tarraconensis on the N. by the river Durius, from Baetica on the E. by the Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the E. by a line drawn from the Durius to the Anas, between the territories of the Vettones and Carpetani. Augustus made Baetica a senatorial province, but reserved the government of the two others for the Caesar; so that the former was governed by a proconsul appointed by the senate, and the latter by imperial legati. In Baetica, Corduba was the seat of government; in Tarraconensis Tarraco; and in Lusitania Augusta Emerita. The NW. or most turbulent part of Tarraconensis (which included Gallaecia, or Callaecia) was permanently occupied by three legions, two in Asturia with their headquarters between Lancia and Asturica, and one in Cantabria. On the reorganisation of the empire by Constantine, Spain, together with Gaul and Britain, was under the general administration of the Praefectus Praetorio Galliae, one of whose three vicarii had the government of Spain, and usually resided at Hispalis. At the same time the country was divided into seven provinces: Baetica, Lusitania, Gallaecia, Tarraconensis, Carthaginensis, Baleares, and Mauretania Tingitana in Africa (which was then reckoned part of Spain, and with its troops helped to protect the S. of Spain from the incursions of Moorish pirates). The capitals of these seven provinces were respectively Hispalis, Augusta Emerita, Bracara, Caesaraugusta, Carthago Nova, Palma, and Tingis. In A. D. 409 the Vandals and Suevi, together with other barbarians, invaded Spain, and obtained possession of the greater part of the country. In 414 the Visigoths, as allies of the Roman empire, attacked the Vandals, and in the course of four years (414-418) compelled a great part of the peninsula to submit again to the Romans. In 429 the Vandals left Spain, and crossed over into Africa under their king Genseric; after which time the Suevi established a powerful kingdom in the S. of the peninsula. Soon afterwards the Visigoths again invaded Spain, and after many years' struggle, succeeded in conquering the whole peninsula, which they kept for themselves, and continued the masters of the country for two centuries, till they were in their turn conquered by the Arabs, A. D. 712.

Hispellum (Hispellās, -ātis: Hispellensis: Spello), a town in Umbria, and a Roman colony, with the name of Colonia Julia Hispellum (Strab. p. 227; Plin. iii. 113).

Histiaea. [HESTIAEOTIS.]

Histiaeus (Ἰστιαῖος), tyrant of Miletus, was left with the other Ionians to guard the bridge of boats over the Danube, when Darius invaded Scythia (B. C. 513). He opposed the proposal of Miltiades, the Athenian, to destroy the bridge, and leave the Persians to their fate, and was in consequence rewarded by Darius with the rule of Mytilene, and with a district in Thrace, where he built a town called Myrcinus, apparently with a view of establishing an independent kingdom (Hdt. iv. 137-141, v. 11). This excited the suspicions of Darius, who invited Histiaeus to Susa, where he treated him kindly, but prohibited him from returning (Hdt. v. 23). Tired of the restraint in which he was kept, he induced his kinsman Aristagoras to persuade the Ionians to revolt, hoping that a revolution in Ionia might lead to his release. A curious story is told of his method of communicating: that he shaved the head of a trusty slave, tattooed on it his message, and sent him to Aristagoras when the hair had grown (Hdt. v. 35). His design succeeded. Darius allowed Histiaeus to depart (496) on his engaging to reduce Ionia. The revolt, however, was nearly put down when Histiaeus reached the coast. Here Histiaeus threw off the mask, and after raising a small fleet carried on war against the Persians for two years, and obtained possession of Chios. In 494 he made a descent upon the Ionian coast, but was defeated and taken prisoner by Harpagus. Artaphernes, the satrap of Ionia, caused him to be put to death by impalement, and sent his head to the king. (Hdt. v. 105-107; vi. 1-30.)

Histonium (Histonienis: Vasto d'Ammon), a town of the Frentani on the Adriatic coast (Plin. iii. 166).

Homeridae ('Ομηρίδαι), the name of a family or gens in Chios, which claimed descent from Homer (Strab. p. 645). Some modern writers have formed a theory that they were a hereditary guild of rhapsodists, and refer to Pindar, Nem. ii. 2. But there is no positive authority for the connexion of the Chian gens with any school of rhapsodists. The word 'Ομηρίδαι in Pindar and in Plato (Rep. p. 599, Ion. p. 530, Phaedr. p. 252) need not mean more than students of Homeric poetry, though it is by no means improbable that rhapsodists may have been so called.

Homeritae ('Ομηρίται), a people of Arabia Felix, who migrated from the interior to the S. part of the W. coast, and established themselves in the territory of the Sabaci (in El Yemen), where they founded a kingdom, which lasted more than five centuries, with an extensive commerce in frankincense (Plin. vi. 121; Ptol. vi. 7; Procop. B. P. i. 19).

Homerus ('Ομηρος). 1. The great epic poet of Greece. His poems formed the basis of Greek literature, and they were appealed to as the authority on morals and religion in a manner which justifies the assertion that they were the Bible of the Greek nation in pagan times. Every Greek who had received a liberal education was perfectly well acquainted with them from his childhood, and had learnt them by heart at school; but nobody could state anything certain about their author. His date and birthplace were equally matters of dispute. Seven cities claimed Homer as their countryman, Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenae.

The author of the Hymn to Apollo spoke of himself as a blind old man of Chios, and as this hymn was ascribed to Homer it was taken as an argument for the blindness and the Chian origin of Homer himself. The claim of Colophon rests on the Margites. The other cities are mentioned in epigrams of uncertain date; and tradition gives him a name Melesigenes, probably from Melos, a river of old Smyrna. The traditions of his date are no less divergent, varying between 1050 B.C., which seems to be the date assigned by Aristotle and Aristarchus, and 850, which is the date given by Herodotus (ii. 53). The earliest mention of Homer is about B.C. 700 by Callinus (as cited by Paus. ix. 9, 5), who ascribed to him the epic Thebais. Herodotus states that Clisthenes of Sicyon, about 580 B.C., was jealous of the fame which the Iliad gave to Argos (Hdt. v. 67). Homer is mentioned (with blame) by Xenophanes B.C. 510 (ap. Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 193): at about the same date Simonides of Cos (Fr. 85) makes the earliest quotation from the Iliad (vi. 148), and calls the author a Chian. The extant Lives of Homer (Westermann, Vitarum Script. Graec. Min.) are probably not earlier than the 2nd century A.D. They preserve, however, some local traditions and some epigrams on which the narratives seemed to be based. The common tradition related that he was the son of Maeon (hence called Maeonides), and that in his old age he was blind and poor. Homer was universally regarded by the ancients as the author of the two great poems of the Iliad and Odyssey. Other poems were also attributed to Homer the genuineness of which was at all times disputed; but the Iliad and Odyssey were ascribed to him by the concurrent voice of antiquity. It is true that a school of critics called οἱ Χωριζοῦρες (Separators), among whom were Xenou and Hellanicus, about the year 200 B.C., held that the Iliad and Odyssey were by different authors; but they were opposed by Aristarchus and others, and apparently the theory died out, for Seneca discredits it (de Brev. Vit. 13), and Suidas, about 1100 A.D., speaks of Homer as 'undisputed' author of both epics. Such continued to be the prevalent belief of modern times. The first note of dissent was the surmise of the Neapolitan Vico, A.D. 1730, that there were several authors of the Homeric poems, of whom the earliest wrote the Iliad in N. Greece, and the second wrote the Odyssey in SW. Greece. But this theory was not supported by argument, and the great change in opinion came in 1795, when F. A. Wolf wrote his famous Prolegomena, in which he endeavoured to show that the Iliad and Odyssey were not two complete poems, but small, separate, independent epic songs, celebrating single exploits of the heroes, and that these lays were for the first time written down and united, as the Iliad and Odyssey, by Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens, and were afterwards still further altered and brought into harmony by revisers (διασκευασταί) and critics. The arguments for this conclusion were chiefly the supposed impossibility of so long a poem as either of the epics being composed or handed down without writing, and the fact (as it was alleged) that writing was unknown to the Greeks in the tenth century B.C. In reply to this it is urged with much force that such feats of memory are not uncommon: e.g. the German poem Parzival, which was composed in the thirteenth century by an author unable to write, is longer than the Iliad; moreover Xenophon (Symp. 3, 5) speaks as though it was considered quite possible to commit the whole Iliad and Odyssey to memory. Add to which, though Greek inscriptions on stone do not take us back beyond the seventh century B.C., it is a disputed point whether writing on other materials may not have been much earlier among the Greeks, as it was certainly among the Phoenicians. As to the evidence of the collection by Pisistratus, it should not be forgotten that we have no authorities for this earlier than the first century B.C. (Cic. de Or. iii. 34, 137; Paus. vii. 26), and it is certainly strange that if the story is true it is not alluded to in Aristotle. It is a much more probable conception that the Iliad, so far from being a mere agglomeration of original short lays or ballads pieced together by comparatively insignificant men of the sixth century, was a great epic based, no doubt, upon popular legends and ballads, but still in its original form a complete poem. Hence it is now commonly held that the Iliad as we have it is greatly expanded from the epic of the original Homer by the insertion at various dates of episodes: which accounts for inconsistencies and discrepthe greatest authority, though more or less divergent opinions, especially from those of Mr. Jebb, Mr. Leaf, Mr. Monro and Mr. Lang. The great period of the Achæan power in Greece, and particularly at Mycenæ and the oldest pottery at Olympia, which is post-Dorian). It is a reasonable conclusion (though some dispute it) that the author of the primary Iliad was pre-Dorian: first because he shows no knowledge of the Dorian invasion nor of the Ionians in Asia (where Miletus is still held by barbarous Carians); and secondly, because the picture of civilisation in the Iliad is higher than anything which seems ancies. Homer, who came at the end rather than the beginning of a poetical period, wrote a primary 'Achilleid' or 'Wrath,' finished and perfect in itself, and the interpolations were due to the rhapsodists who recited it, the piecing together of interpolations and original to the school of followers called Homeridae who were established in Chios. This was the view to some extent put forward by Nitsch and developed with great force and acuteness of criticism by Grote. Since his time many other considerations have come in from researches into the history of language and of art. For those who assume the theory to be correct in its main outline, there are various points to be discussed: the date and country of the primary epic; whether the precise portions of the Iliad belonging to it were correctly assigned by Grote; the manner in which it was altered, translated, or redacted into its present shape and dialect. These again are opposed by the more conservative view which believes in a much greater unity of composition. It is only possible here to sketch some general conclusions which may be gathered from the works of those who have recently discussed the subject with to have followed that conquest until a considerable period had elapsed. The manner of life also and the geographical descriptions of the Iliad would better suit the age before than after the commercial activity of the Ionians was beginning. The primary Iliad is therefore ascribed to the eleventh century B.C., somewhat later than the remains found at Mycenæ, which most experts date about 1150 and consider to belong to a civilisation slightly less advanced than that of the poems. The Iliad itself is a court poem dealing with the greatness of princes, not, like the chief poem of Hesiod, with the condition of the common people, who, indeed, are disparaged and contemned. All this will convey the impression—not, of course, the certainty—that it was composed to be sung in the palaces of Achæan princes and wealthy Achæan nobles. There is probability in the view that it was composed originally in Thessaly, whose hero, Achilles, it specially glorifies; and this would help to account for the fact that the dress in the Iliad is quite different from the Oriental type belonging to Mycenæ, and for the mention of iron (which is totally absent in the remains from Mycenæ) as being to some extent used.

Homer's description of fortresses and houses would suggest some acquaintance with Mycenae; but possibly the poet describes the actual life of Thessaly rather than of Mycenae. This great epic of the Achaeans was then carried by the emigrants to Asia Minor; but it is conceived by those who maintain a greatly divided authorship that later bards introduced episodes to glorify the heroes of families by whom they were patronised, or sometimes to honour a deity at whose festival they were reciting. Yet each poet who expanded the primary Iliad by any such episode added it to the epic under the original name, and it becomes difficult, or rather impossible, to judge exactly where the junction was made. In Mr. Leaf's scheme the primary Iliad recounted the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles, and the promise of Zeus, in book i. and part of ii.; the consequent rout of the Greeks (xi.); the exploits and death of Patroclus (xvi.) and the death of Hector (xxii.), with certain large portions of the intermediate books, especially of xvii.-xxi., which formed the connecting links. If this structure of the primary Iliad is conjectural, the determination how and when the additions were made is even more so; but there is much ingenuity in the arguments for supposing a second and third stratum. The second consisted of episodes introduced to glorify old Achaean families, whose heroes had been unnoticed in the primary Iliad—the prowess of Menelaus (iii. and iv.), of Diomedes (v. and vi.), of Ajax (vii.), and of Idomeneus (xiii.). But, though later than the oldest part, they must from their nature have still been before the Dorian, and therefore little after the oldest—indeed it is not absolutely incompatible with the theory to imagine that they were a later addition by Homer himself, the author of the primary Iliad. These first two strata the Homeric school took with them across the sea to Asia Minor. The third stratum was probably added after the Dorian conquest, when there were no Achaean families to glorify; and such additions were made as the embassy to Achilles (ix.), which is therefore unknown to the Achilles of books xi. and xix.; the capture of the wall (xii.), which does not seem to have been built at all in the older books; the shield of Achilles (perhaps to glorify Hephaestus at some festival?); the funeral of Patroclus and the ransom of Hector; the catalogue of ships and book viii., which connects ix. It should be noticed that linguistically books ix., x., xxiii. and xxiv. are regarded as later than most of the Iliad, and in this respect as agreeing more nearly with the Odyssey. According to the view here given, the third stratum belongs to the period between 1000 and 800 B.C.—It will easily be seen by examination of the above scheme that many of the most famous and beautiful passages of the Iliad are thus attributed to interpolators; and, besides this objection from sentiment and taste, it must be confessed that there are grave difficulties in accounting for the acceptance of all these interpolations, and also in explaining why writers capable of such work did not, like the inferior authors of cyclic poems, write epics under their own name. Moreover, there are numerous lines in the 'Wrath' which allude to the supposed interpolations; and all these must be arbitrarily rejected. On the other hand, attempts which have been made to account for the alleged inconsistencies are not altogether unsuccessful. In point of fact the linguistic objections urged against some of the books are of small weight. In the ninth book they are slight and uncertain; and, as it is by no means necessary to hold that the expression in xi. 609 contradicts the embassy in book ix., we are probably not obliged to regard that magnificent book as no part of the original poem. In truth, the tenth book and the catalogue of ships in book ii. are the only portions which from considerations of language and of style may with tolerable certainty be set down as later additions; and their introduction can be imagined without grave difficulty. As regards the other, and more important, rejected portions, it is quite permissible to consider the question at least an open one. The question of the dialect is no less controverted. The view which has been put forward by the German philologist Dr. Fick, and which finds considerable support, is that, to account for the Aeolic forms in the older portions (which are retained when the metre makes the change impossible, but are altered elsewhere to Ionic) we must believe the epic to have existed first in an Aeolic dialect (= Achaean), in which form they were originally sung in the palaces of Achaean princes, and, having been brought to Asia Minor, were eventually converted into the Ionian dialect, the latest insertions being made in Ionic. One difficulty in this theory, especially if we take so late a date as was proposed (about 530) for the version, is that no early Greek writer knows anything of the Aeolian version—indeed, Simonides quotes in Ionic from vi. 148, which is not considered to be one of the later portions. In truth we are scarcely in a position to state what was Achaean or Aeolic, or the oldest form of Ionic, in the centuries 1000-600 B.C. The knowledge of this may come, but it is not yet clear enough for confident speaking. It is easier to imagine the poems—handed down as they were orally—gradually, without any single work of transcription, taking a form which we call old Ionic, but which may possibly be by no means the oldest Ionic; and in such a process naturally the archaic forms, whether Achaean, Aeolic or Ionic, which affected the metre, would be most readily preserved and would result in the apparently mixed dialect of Homer.—The historical bearing of the Iliad will be noticed under the article TROJA. It need only be said here that there is no reason to doubt that the conflict between the Achaeans and Trojans was a real event of the period when the Achaeans were powerful enough to collect their forces for a war on the other side of the Aegean. If those are right who see in the Egyptian inscriptions a proof that the Achaeans of Greece were allies of the Libyans against Egypt in the reign of Ramses III., the Achaeans were probably able to achieve this at any time between 1300 and 1100 B.C. But whenever the war took place it is clear that the epic was written at some distance of time, that the two nations were really distinct in dress, language and civilisation, and that, although the poet knew much of the topography from tradition, yet it was poeticised. Some authorities on archaeology, notably Professor Gardner, believe that the Iliad was composed long after the fall of the Achaean power from the mere traditions which the emigrants carried with them into Asia Minor; and it is possible that further discoveries may strengthen this position, though at present the strongest arguments lead the other way. But, more than this, the study of language and dialects is progressive, and its conclusions by no means final; and so is the study of ancient art, in which fresh discoveries by the spade are year by year being achieved. It is therefore both unwise and unprofitable to put forward dogmatically any reply to the question. It is possible, as was hinted above, that fuller knowledge of language and archaeology may even remove the most important obstacles to a belief in a much greater unity of the Iliad, and the opinion, which has quite recently been urged with considerable force by Mr. Lang, may be materially strengthened, that the Iliad was composed practically as a whole by its original author Homer. The explanation suggested by Mr. Jevons may be the true one, that it was for centuries recited in parts, suitable to the occasion, by the rhapsodists (i.e. the minstrels who recited at banquets and great religious festivals); and that this accounts for discrepancies and for many obviously late detached passages, inasmuch as a rhapsodist might often insert some lines of prelude to his extract, which might be handed on as an interpolation, or he might, with a similar result, introduce some lines in honour of a particular deity or locality, which, for reasons now impossible to trace, met with general acceptance.—The Odyssey is more generally acknowledged as a complete poem by one hand. It may possibly, though not certainly, be right to separate the episode of Telemachus (ii.-iv.); and there is good reason to think that the twenty-fourth book and the latter part of the eleventh are late additions. Moreover, being also handed down by oral recitation, there are interpolations here and there; but in the main it is probably composed by one author, and based upon legends and lays regarding the Return of Odysseus. That it is later than the main part of the Iliad is the opinion of most critics, and is probably right. Making all allowance for the fact that one poem describes war, the other, chiefly, domestic life, there remain differences of style and of language in its forms and its syntax, and of mythology which seem to imply a later date, and it is very likely correct to assign the composition of the Odyssey to a period early in the ninth century B.C. It must be admitted, however, that this view increases the difficulty of accounting for a complete poem by another poet of the greatest genius being ascribed to Homer. The only explanation that can be given (not a very satisfactory one) is that the influence of the Iliad and the Homeric school tended to include under that name this second great epic composed on the coast or islands of Ionia at the time when the Iliad itself received some large episodic additions, possibly by the author of the Odyssey.—The 'Homeric' Hymns were doubtless of still later date and of uncertain authorship, probably composed by rhapsodists of the Homeric school, who prefaced the recitation of their epic (such as a portion of the Iliad or Odyssey) by a hymn or address to the god of the festival or the locality. Of these the five longer are to the Delian and Pythian Apollo, to Hermes, Aphrodite and Demeter, and there are twenty-nine shorter. The dates of their composition probably range between 700 and 500 B.C. Many of them have great beauty and poetic merit, and they are of the greatest value also for the study of mythology. In myth they agree more with Hesiod than with Homer, though in all likelihood they follow traditions older than Homer. The truth probably is that Homer rejected parts of the ruder and more savage myth, which reappears in Hesiod; and this is one mark of a higher civilisation to some degree retrograding.—Two humorous poems were also included under the name of Homer: (1) the Margites or 'Booby,' of which few fragments remain: Aristotle believed it to be by Homer (which the Alexandrian critics altogether denied), and considered it the beginning of Comedy; (2) the Batrachomyomachia or 'Battle of Frogs and Mice,' a parody on Homer, by some ascribed to Pigres, brother of Artemisia; but probably two centuries later.—The most useful editions of the Iliad are by Monro, Oxford, 1878; Leaf, Camb. 1883; Ameis, Lips. 1878; others by Paley, Camb. 1878; La Roche, Lips. 1876; Heyne, 1834; transl. by Leaf, Camb. 1890: of the Odyssey by Merry, Oxf. 1871; Amies, Lips. 1877; Pierron, Paris, 1875: transl. by Butcher and Lang, 1879: of the Homeric Hymns by Baumeister, 1860 and 1877; by Pierron, 1875. The Batrachomyomachia is printed with the Hymns.—We must add a few words on the ancient editions of the Iliad and Odyssey. From the time of Pisistratus to the establishment of the Alexandrine school, we read of two new editions (διορθώσεις) of the text, one made by the poet Antimachus, and the other by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great used to carry about with him in a splendid case (μάθηξ) on all his expeditions. But it was not till the foundation of the Alexandrine school, that the Greeks possessed a really critical edition of Homer. Zenodotus was the first who directed his attention to the study and criticism of Homer. He was followed by Aristophanes and Aristarchus; and the edition of Homer by the latter has been the basis of the text to the present day. Aristarchus was the prince of grammarians, and did more for the text and interpretation of Homer than any other critic. He was opposed to Crates of Mallus, the founder of the Pergamene school of grammar. [ARISTARCHUS; CRATES.] In the time of Augustus the great compiler, Didymus, wrote comprehensive commentaries on Homer, copying mostly the works of preceding Alexandrine grammarians, which had swollen to an enormous extent. Under Tiberius, Apollonius Sophista lived, whose Lexicon Homericum is very valuable (ed. Bekker, 1833). The most valuable scholia on the Iliad are those which were published by Villoison from a MS. of the tenth century in the library of St. Mark at Venice, 1788, fol. These scholia were reprinted with additions, edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1825, 2 vols. 4to. The most valuable scholia to the Odyssey are those published by Buttmann, Berl. 1821. The extensive commentary of Eustathius contains much valuable information from sources which are now lost. [EUSTATHIUS, No. 3.]—2. A grammarian and tragic poet of Byzantium, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about B.C. 280), was the son of the grammarian Andromachus and the poetess Myro. He was one of the seven poets who formed the tragic Pleiad.

Hōmōlē (Ὠμόλη). 1. A lofty mountain in Thessaly, near Tempe, with a sanctuary of Pan.—2. Or Hōmōlīum (Ὠμόλιον; Ὠμολιεύς: Lamina), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of Mt. Ossa, near the Peneus.

Hōnor or Hōnos, the personification of honour at Rome. Marcellus had vowed a temple, which was to belong to Honos and Virtus in common; but as the pontiffs refused to consecrate one temple to two divinities, he built two temples, near Porta Capena, one of Honos—which was a restoration of an earlier temple dedicated by Fab. Max. Verrucosus after the Ligurian war (Cic. N. D. ii. 23, 61)—and the other of Virtus, close together, B.C. 205. (Liv. xxvii. 25, xxix. 11; Val. Max. i. 1, 8; Plut. Marc. 28.) This temple of Honos was the starting-point for the Transvectio Equitum. C. Marius also built a temple to Honos, after his victory over the Cimbri and Teutones. There was also an altar of Honos outside the Colline gate, which was more ancient than either of the temples. Honos is represented on coins as a male figure in armour, and standing on a globe, or with the cornucopia in his left and a spear in his right hand, and frequently combined on coins with a female figure of Virtus.

Honōria. [GRATA.]

Honōrius, Flāvius, Roman emperor of the West, A.D. 395–423, was the second son of Theodosius the Great, and was born 384. On the death of Theodosius, in 395, Honorius succeeded to the sovereignty of the West, which he had received from his father in the preceding year; while his elder brother Arcadius obtained possession of the East. During the minority of Honorius, the government was in the hands of life at Ravenna until his death, in 423. (Zos. v. 58; Oros. vii. 36–43; Procop. B. V. i. 1–3.)

Hōrae (Ἥραι), originally the goddesses of the order of nature and of the seasons, in especial the rain-giving goddesses, but in later times also the goddesses of order in general and of justice. In the Iliad we have clear evidence of the belief that they are the Olympian divinities of the weather: therefore they open or shut the doors of heaven, which are a cloud—that is, they give or withhold rain, the source of fruitful seasons; but this has been materialised into a door opening for the passage of the gods. (Il. v. 750, viii. 393; cf. Paus. v. 11, 7; Ov.

Hōrae (Seasons). (From a coin of Commodus.)

Fast. i. 125.) Hence they bring wealth or gifts generally (Il. xxi. 450). In the Odyssey, on the other hand, they are mentioned only with the more abstract, impersonal, idea of the changing seasons. As the weather is regulated according to the seasons, they are further described as the goddesses of the seasons. The course of the seasons is symbolically described as the dance of the Hōrae. Carpo and Auxo were worshipped from very early times. The Hōra of spring accompanied Persephone every year on her ascent from the lower world; and the able and energetic Stilicho, whose daughter Maria the young emperor married. Stilicho for a time defended Italy against the attacks of the Visigoths under Alaric (402, 403), and the ravages of other barbarians under Radagaisus; but after Honorius had put to death Stilicho, on a charge of treason (408), Alaric again invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). Honorius meantime lived an inglorious the expression of 'The chamber of the Hōrae opens' is equivalent to 'The spring is coming' (Pind. Fr. 45). The attributes of spring—flowers, fragrance, and graceful freshness—are accordingly transferred to the Hōrae. Thus they adorned Aphrodite as she rose from the sea, and made a garland of flowers for Pandora. Hence they bear a resemblance to and are scarcely distinguished from the Charites (cf.

Paus. ix. 35, 1). The Horæ were probably always three in number, and at Athens bore the names of Thallo, Carpo, and Auxo (though Pausanias takes the last to be only one of the Charites). It might be thought that this number meant the old Greek threefold division of the year, spring, summer, and winter; but this was not the original conception of the Horæ, and the number three probably belongs to them as a customary number for deities, as in the case of the Fates and the Graces. Even in early times ethical notions were attached to the Horæ; and the influence which these goddesses originally exercised on nature was subsequently transferred to human life in particular. Hesiod describes them as giving to a state good laws, justice, and peace; he calls them the daughters of Zeus and Themis, and gives them the significant names of Eunomia, Dike, and Irene (Th. 901; cf. Pind. Ol. iv. 1). It is probable that this idea arose from the conception of a regular and orderly arrangement of the times for rain and sunshine fixed by the gods: not, indeed, of the four seasons, for that distribution does not appear in art or literature before the fourth century B.C. (cf. Athen. p. 198), but of the right and just time for each event. As beings through whom came wealth to the earth they were naturally connected with the Fates, which in mythology is expressed by their being sisters of the Fates; and it is either for this reason that they sometimes appear as helpers at birth (Pind. Pyth. ix. 62) and marriage, or merely because they express timeliness and ripeness. At Athens and at Olympia they had altars; and it was customary to group them by the statues or thrones of Zeus, Hera, or Athene, and in conjunction with the Moiræ or Charites (Paus. v. 17, 1, vii. 5, 4). In works of art the Horæ were represented as blooming maidens, carrying the different products of the seasons.

Horâtia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome. Three brothers of this race fought with the Curiatii, three brothers from Alba, to determine whether Rome or Alba was to exercise the supremacy. The battle was long undecided. Two of the Horatii fell; but the three Curiatii, though alive, were severely wounded. Seeing this, the surviving Horatius, who was still unhurt, pretended to fly, and vanquished his wounded opponents by encountering them severally. He returned in triumph, bearing his threefold spoils. As he approached the Capeno gate his sister Horatia met him, and recognised on his shoulders the mantle of one of the Curiatii, her betrothed lover. Her grief drew on her the wrath of Horatius, who stabbed her, exclaiming 'So perish every Roman woman who bewails a foe!' For this murder he was adjudged by the duoviri to be scourged, and hanged on the accursed tree. Horatius appealed to his peers, the burghers, who acquitted Horatius, but prescribed a form of punishment. With veiled head, led by his father, Horatius passed under a yoke or gibbet—tigillum sororium, 'sister's gibbet.' (Liv. i. 26; cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Perduellionis Duoviri.)

Horâtius Cocles. [COCLÆS.]

Q. Horâtius Flaccus, the poet, was born December 8th, B.C. 65, at Venusia in Apulia (Od. iii. 21, 1, Eppod. xiii. 6; Ep. i. 20, 27). His father was a libertinus or freedman, who had probably been a public slave of Venusia, and adopted the name Horatius because that town was assigned to the Horatian tribe. He had received his manumission before the birth of the poet, who was of free birth, but who did not altogether escape the taint which adhered to persons even of remote servile origin (Sat. i. 6, 46). His father's occupation was that of collector (coactor) of the payments at sales by auction (Sat. i. 6, 86; Suet. Vit. Horat.). With the profits of his office he had purchased a small farm in the neighbourhood of Venusia, where Horace was born (Sat. ii. 1, 34). The father, either in his care for his only son, or discerning some sign in the boy of a literary taste (such as may perhaps be hinted at by the partly fanciful adventure in Od. iii. 4, 5), determined to devote his whole time and fortune to the education of the future poet. Though by no means rich, he declined to send the young Horace to the common school, kept in Venusia by one Flavius, to which the children of the provincial magnates resorted, and, probably about his twelfth year, carried him to Rome, to receive the usual education of a knight's or senator's son (Sat. i. 6, 71–82). The school selected was that of Orbilius, whom Horace mentions only as being a severe flogger (Ep. ii. 1, 71), but whom from other sources we know to have been also a teacher of great ability (Suet. Gr. 9; Macrob. Sat. ii. 6, 3). It is likely that to him in some degree Horace owed his clearness of style, and his inclination towards satire. Among his school books he mentions (without grateful recollection) Livius Andronicus (Ep. ii. 1, 70), probably his Latin translation of the Odyssey; and he was taught also something of the Iliad, probably in the original Greek (Ep. ii. 2, 41). Of his father's zealous care to preserve him from the dangers and temptations of the city he speaks with gratitude. In his eighteenth year Horace, following an ordinary course of the richer and better educated Romans of the day, proceeded to Athens, in order to continue his studies at that seat of learning (Ep. ii. 2, 43). He seems chiefly to have attached himself to the opinions which he heard in the Académus, though later in life he inclined to those of Epicurus. It has been remarked as an important result from his studying Greek literature at Athens instead of under Greek teachers at Rome, that he escaped the Alexandrian influence which considerably affected some other poets of his day. When Brutus came to Athens after the death of Caesar, Horace joined his army, and received at once the rank of a military tribune, and the command of a legion (Sat. i. 6, 48). It is possible that this curious selection of so young and inexperienced a man may have been due to a literary friendship between Horace and Brutus (cf. Ep. i. 20, 18), who first placed him on his staff and then gave him a command. The relations of Catullus with Memmius, and Florus with Tiberius are cited as parallel. He was present at the battle of Philippi, shared in the flight of his side, and adopts for his own case the words of Archilochus and Alcaeus who declare that they flung away their arms (Od. ii. 7, 9; Ep. ii. 2, 46–50). There is no reason to suppose that his courage was less than that of the rest of the fugitive army. He now resolved to devote himself to more peaceful pursuits, and having obtained his pardon, he ventured at once to return to Rome. He had lost all his hopes in life; his paternal estate had been swept away in the general forfeiture; but he was enabled to obtain sufficient money to purchase a clerkship in the quaestor's office; and on the profits of that place he managed to live with the utmost frugality (Ep. ii. 2, 50;

Suet. Vit.). In these circumstances poverty, as he himself tells us, stimulated him to write, as a means of gaining notice and patronage (Ep. ii. 2, 40, 51). In course of time some of his poems attracted the notice of Varius and Virgil, who introduced him to Maecenas (B.C. 39). Horace soon became the friend of Maecenas, and this friendship quickly ripened into intimacy (Sat. i. 6, 54). In a year or two after the commencement of their friendship (37), Horace accompanied his patron on that journey to Brundisium so brilliantly described in the fifth Satire of the first book. The influence of Maecenas gradually reconciled Horace to the imperial rule; and it is reasonable to believe that the difference of feeling in politics which is traceable between poems such as the 16th Epode, which despaired of Rome and advised emigration, and the Odes of the 3rd and 4th books, which lauded the rule of Augustus, was caused by this gradual change in his convictions, not by a mere desire to court the powerful. About the year 33 Maecenas bestowed upon the poet a Sabine farm, sufficient to maintain him in ease, comfort, and even in content (satis beatus unicus Sabinis), during the rest of his life. The situation of this Sabine farm was in the valley of Ustica, within view of the mountain Lucretilis, and near the Digentia, about fifteen miles from Tibur (Tivoli). Just after passing Vicovaro, the Varia which Horace mentions as a town near his farm (Ep. i. 14, 3), on the road from Tivoli to Subiaco, the valley is reached down which the Digentia flowed to join the Anio. This valley runs up due north to its head, which is formed by a semi-circle of hills rising to a height of 3000 or 4000 feet. It is possible, as some think, that the village of Cantalupo Bardello, high up on the E. slope, is the 'Mandela, rugosus frigore pagus' of Ep. i. 18, 105. There is a difference of opinion about the actual site of the villa. It has been common to place it on a plateau about a mile up the valley on the W. side, considerably above the village of Rocca Giovine, near which have been found the remains of the old temple of Vacuna (Ep. i. 10, 49) and an inscription. But this stands much too high above the stream to suit the description of his farm as having sunny meadows which must be guarded by embankments from the stream (Ep. i. 14, 29). It is probable that the true site is a spot higher up the same side of the valley, but near the river, where a small brook joins it which may be the water from Bandusia. There are the remains of a tessellated pavement, which, if of later date than Augustus, may mark additions to the old villa or one built on the same ground. The 'angulus iste' is then taken to be the nook at the upper end of the valley (see Epistles 14, 16, 18 of the first book, and cf. Od. i. 17, ii. 18, 14, iii. 1, 48). We trace in his writings the delight which this Sabine home and its country beauty gave to him, and the healthful effect of its quiet life, from which he was yet able to retain his hold on the society of Rome. He spent also much time at Tibur, and some at Praeneste and at Baiae. He continued to live on the most intimate terms with Maecenas; and this intimate friendship naturally introduced Horace to the notice of the other great men of his period. (For his chief friends see Sat. i. 10, 81-86.) At what time he first gained the favour of the emperor is not quite clear; but his conversion to approval of the policy of Augustus appears in odes written not long after Actium. After the death of

Virgil, in 19, Horace stood first of living poets, and was appointed by Augustus to compose the ode for the Secular games (Carmen saeculare) in 17. His relations with Augustus and the imperial family were certainly closer from this date onward, but it is an entire mistake to suppose that he was unfaithful to Maecenas, who was now out of favour. On the contrary, he refused the offered post of private secretary to Augustus in order not to be withdrawn from Maecenas; and of their undiminished friendship we have proof enough in such lines as Od. iv. 11 (which was written not earlier than B.C. 15), and in the last commendation addressed by Maecenas to Augustus: 'Horati Flacci ut mei esto memor' (Suet. Vit.). Horace died on November 17th, B.C. 8, aged nearly 57. His death was so sudden that he had not time to make his will; but he left the administration of his affairs to Augustus, whom he instituted as his heir. He was buried on the slope of the Esquiline Hill, close to his friend and patron, Maecenas, who had died before him in the same year.—Horace has described his own person. He was of short stature, with dark eyes and dark hair, but early tinged with grey. In his youth he was tolerably robust, but in more advanced life his health was not always good, and he seems to have inclined to be a valetudinarian. His habits, even after he became richer, were generally frugal and abstemious; though on occasions, both in youth and maturer age, he liked choice wine, and in the society of friends scrupled not to enjoy the luxuries of his time.—The philosophy of Horace was that of a man of the world. He playfully alludes to his Epicureanism, but it was practical rather than speculative Epicureanism. His calm judgment and self-command followed the precepts of Aristippus, and secured contentment by limiting his desires, so that although he studied how to enjoy life he was never a slave to his pleasures. His mind, indeed, was not in the least speculative. Common life wisdom was his study, and to this he brought a quickness of observation and a sterling common sense which have made his works the delight of practical men.—In literature Horace was many-sided. In his Satires and Epistles he is to be compared with brilliant prose-writers of essays on morals and manners, in the Epistles to Augustus and to Florus, and still more in the Ars Poëtica, he is a literary critic; in the Odes and Epodes he is a lyric poet; and each department has to be considered by itself. His earliest written work was probably in the direction of lampoons in which he imitated Hippouax and Archilochus, and it is possible that some of the Epodes, though published later, may date from this time. His first publication was the first book of Satires, which probably appeared about B.C. 35 (Sat. i. 10, 44 alludes to the Eclogues of Virgil, which appeared in 36). Some of the Satires, however, had been written much earlier: the 7th may date from his service with Brutus in 42, and it is not unlikely that the 2nd was written soon after his return to Rome, when he was more inclined to follow the style of Lucilius. The 2nd book of the Satires was written after he obtained his Sabine farm, and probably appeared in 30: the allusion to the Parthians prevents an earlier date. In the Satires there is none of the lofty moral indignation or vehemence of invective which characterises Juvenal. Horace followed the plan of Satura which belonged to Lucilius, making it a semi-dramatic conversation with the age on its manners and foibles; but he is much smoother and his wit more polished than that of Lucilius. As a moralist he points to the folly rather than the wickedness of vice: nothing can surpass the keenness of his observation, his ease of expression or his lucid common sense; so it is no wonder that his writings have become a storehouse of wise and witty sentences on the affairs of life: the line of Persius 'admissus circum praeordia ludit' expresses the truth that his light and playful touch of satire makes its way to the hearts of successive generations of readers. The dramatic element of the dialogue appears more in the second book of Satires than the first, and there is less reference to personal experiences. The Epodes appeared about the same time as the second book of Satires. Like the two books of Satires they embrace all the first period of his literary life, from the earlier and bitterer times down to the battle of Actium, when he was beginning to see the great ideal of strong and peaceful government, which he does not fully realise till the next period. Epod. 7 and 16 belong to the time soon after Philippi, and show that he then despaired of peace and security at Rome; but the 1st is written after his friendship with Maecenas has begun, and probably just before Actium, and the 9th is clearly after the victory. In the virulence of lampoon which marks some Epodes he is probably following Hipponax and Archilochus: in metre he often follows the long and short iambs used by Archilochus which (from the name ἔπαιός for the short line) have given the name to the book. It is in reference to this metre that he says 'Parios ego primus iampos ostendi Latio'; for Catullus had already used iambs. In the Epistles, which came after the first three books of Odes, Horace again appears as the moralist writing conversational essays, in a perfect form for their purpose, on manners and society, and points of literary criticism. They are written at a time when he surveyed Roman life from a higher and more secure position. It is probable that the first book of Epistles appeared about 20, and the second later than 19. In Ep. ii. 1, 247 there is an allusion to the Aeneid, which was not published till after Virgil's death. The date of Horace's chief work of literary criticism, the Ars Poëtica, is much disputed. In subject it hangs together rather with the 2nd book of the Epistles which is also the work of the critic rather than the moralist. According to Porphyry, in the criticism of the Greek drama he is following the Alexandrian critic, Neoptolemus. It has commonly, and partly on the authority of Porphyry, been considered his latest work, written between 12 and 8 B.C., nor have any strong arguments been adduced for a date much earlier than this. Tarpä, who is mentioned in v. 387 might still have been a recognised critic at the age of 75 (and in truth his age is only a matter of conjecture); and, as regards Virgil and Quintilius Varus (vv. 55 and 438) the language used by no means implies necessarily that Virgil was living, and rather implies that Varus was dead. On the whole, there is no evidence against its being posterior to the 2nd Epistle and the 4th book of Odes. The composition of the first three books of the Odes extends over a long period of years, perhaps from B.C. 31-23, certainly from 29. It is argued with much probability that Od. i. 2 and 14 refer to the civil troubles of B.C. 33, and i. 26 to B.C. 32. At any rate there is no doubt that i. 37 was written soon after Actium and ii. 2 refers to B.C. 30. All other historical allusions in these three books are included in the years which precede 23. On the other hand, Od. i. 12 cannot have been written after the death of Marcellus, B.C. 23. The conclusion therefore is, that these books were published together in 23. There was then an interval, perhaps of less literary stress in Horace's secured position, and maturer age, but occupied by his work at the Epistles. He was called upon, by a position analogous to that of Poet Laureate, to write the Carmen saeculare in 17, and then to continue his lyrical work mainly on great patriotic themes written by desire of Augustus. The dates in this book of the Odes range between iv. 6 of B.C. 17 and iv. 5 of B.C. 13. The book was probably published in 13, when Horace was 52 (cf. iv. 1, 6). The Odes give Horace his claim to the rank of a great lyrical poet both in lighter and in more serious vein. Of the charm of his writing, whether on Anacreontic themes or on those loftier subjects which the passage of the empire from perils to security called forth, there are hardly two opinions. It must be admitted that he has not the fire or inspiration of Catullus—the difference appears alike in his expressions of affection and in his invective—but for exquisite finish and for mastery of metre his lyrics are unsurpassed in Latin literature. It may be added that he is not easily compared with Catullus, because he reserves his deeper feeling for odes on matters of the state. It has been well said that 'Horace's tone in love-poems is rather that of persiflage than of ardent passion,' such as was that of Catullus. Those whom he professes to address are imaginary heroines, partly borrowed from Greek poets, partly from 'society' stories of the day. His personal feeling (though even there expressed in less burning words than Catullus uses) is more forcibly and sincerely shown in odes to his friends such as Virgil, Lamia, Fuscus, Septimius, and Maecenas, and, it may be added, in those which speak of his country home.—For the position which Horace took already in the first century A.D. as a classic both in literary circles and in schools references may be made to Juv. vii. 26; Pers. v. 45; Quintil. i. 12, 40, ii. 17, 17, ix. 3, 18; Auson. Id. iv. 55.—The most useful editions of Horace are by Wickham, 1875-1888; Palmer, 1885; Orelli, 1852, 1868, 1885; Keller and Holder, Lips. 1870; Dillenburger, Bonn, 1881.

Hordeonius Flaccus. [FLACCUS.]

Hormisdas. [SASSANIDAE.]

Horta or Hortanum (Hortanus: Orte), a town in Etruria, at the junction of the Nar and the Tiber, so called from the Etruscan goddess whose temple at Rome always remained open. Horta (or Hurta), a goddess apparently of good fortune (Plut. Q. R. 46).

Hortensius. 1. Q., the orator, was born in B.C. 114, eight years before Cicero. At the early age of nineteen he spoke with great applause in the forum, and at once rose to eminence as an advocate. He served two campaigns in the Social war (90, 89). In the Civil wars he joined Sulla, and was afterwards a constant supporter of the aristocratical party. His chief professional labours were in defending men of this party when accused of maladministration and extortion in their provinces, or of bribery and the like in canvassing for public honours. He had no rival in the forum, till he encountered Cicero, and he long exercised an undisputed sway over the courts of justice. In 81 he was quaestor; in 75 aedile; in 72 praetor; and in 69 consul with Q. Caecilius Metellus.—It was in the year before his consulship that the prosecution of Verres commenced. Hortensius was the advocate of Verres, and attempted to put off the trial till the next year, when he would be able to exercise all the consular authority in favour of his client. But Cicero, who accused Verres, baffled all the schemes of Hortensius, and this contest left Cicero in the first place as an advocate and orator. After his consulship, Hortensius took a leading part in supporting the optimates against the rising power of Pompey. He spoke against the Gabinian law, which invested Pompey with absolute power on the Mediterranean, in order to put down the pirates of Cilicia (67); and the Manilian, by which the conduct of the war against Mithridates was transferred from Lucullus to Pompey (66). Cicero in his consulship (63) deserted the popular party, with whom he had hitherto acted, and became one of the supporters of the optimates. Thus Hortensius no longer appears as his rival. We first find them pleading together for C. Rabirius, for L. Muraena, and for P. Sulla. After the coalition of Pompey with Caesar and Crassus in 60, Hortensius drew back from public life, and confined himself to his advocate's duties. He died in 50. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 6.) The style of Hortensius was florid; his memory so ready and retentive, that he is said to have been able to come out of a sale-room and repeat the auction-list backwards (Cic. Brut. 95, 96; Sen. Praef. in Contr. 1). He possessed immense wealth, and had several villas, the most splendid of which was the one near Laurentum. He was the first person at Rome who brought peacocks to table (Varr. R. R. iii. 13, 17; Plin. xiv. 96).—2. Q., surnamed Hortalus, son of the preceding, by Lutatia, the daughter of Catulus. In youth he lived a low and profligate life, and appears to have been at last cast off by his father. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he joined Caesar, and fought on his side in Italy and Greece (Plut. Cacs. 32; Suet. Jul. 31). In 44 he held the province of Macedonia, and Brutus was to succeed him. After Caesar's assassination, M. Antony gave the province to his brother Caius. Brutus, however, had already taken possession, with the assistance of Hortensius. When the proscription took place, Hortensius was in the list; and in revenge he ordered C. Antonius, who had been taken prisoner, to be put to death. After the battle of Philippj, he was executed on the grave of his victim.

Horus (Ἥρος), the Egyptian god of light, whose worship was also established in Greece, and afterwards as Harpocrates at Rome. He was the son of Osiris and Isis (but according to another view, of Re), and was regarded as waging war against the powers of darkness in the form of crocodiles and serpents. It is easy to see how this led to his identification with

Horus. (Wilkinson.)

Apollo (Hdt. ii. 144). As avenger of the death of his father Osiris he overcame the evil deity Typhon. Horus was in the prevailing myth regarded as the youthful sun, born afresh every morning, and in this guise was called Harpocrat, or 'the child-Horus,' which the Greeks represented by Harpocrates. The conventional statues of this child-Horus were represented in a sitting posture with his finger in his mouth, which was a symbol of childhood. From a misapprehension of this attitude in the Egyptian statues the Greeks and Romans regarded Harpocrates as the god of Silence (Ov. Met. ix. 691; Varr. L.L. v. 57; Plut. Is. 68). Under the empire his worship in this character came in with that of other Egyptian deities. In art he was represented most commonly as a naked boy with his finger on his lips and with a lotus flower on his head. His image was also placed as an amulet on signet rings (Plin. xxxiii. 41). But he was represented also on bronzes and reliefs as an armed and mounted warrior (but often with the head of a hawk) driving his spear through a crocodile or dragon. It is surmised, not without probability, that some part of the legends of St. George was drawn from these sculptures.

Hostilia (Ostiglia), a small town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Po, and on the road from Mutina to Verona; the birthplace of Cornelius Nepos.

Hostilius Mancinus. [MANCINUS.]

Hostilius Tullus. [TULLUS HOSTILIUS.]

Hostius, the author of a poem on the Istrian war, probably the war of 125 B.C., not that of 178, of which Ennius had already written. He is quoted by Macrobi. vi. 3, 5; Serv. ad Aen. xii. 121. He lived early in the 1st century B.C., and is probably the 'doctus avus' of Propert. iv. 20, 8 (Cynthia being really Hostia).

Hunneric, king of the Vandals in Africa, A.D. 477-484, was the son of Genserich, whom he succeeded. His reign was chiefly marked by his savage persecution of the Catholics.

Hunni (Ὠῖνοι), an Asiatic race, who dwelt for some centuries in the plains of Tartary, and were formidable to the Chinese empire long before they were known to the Romans. It was to repel the inroads of the Huns that the Chinese built their celebrated wall, 1500 miles in length. A portion of the nation afterwards migrated W., conquered the Alani, a warlike race between the Volga and the Tanais, and then crossed into Europe about A.D. 375. A curious story is told by Olympiodorus (Fr. 27) that Constantine, hearing of buried treasure in Thrace, had ordered it to be dug up. It consisted of three silver images which had been buried by the people of the country: one to keep out the Goths, the second the Huns, and the third the Sarmatians; and accordingly after their removal Thrace and Illyria were overrun by Goths, Huns and Sarmatians. The appearance of these new barbarians excited the greatest terror, both among the Romans and the Germans. They are described by Greek and Roman historians as having broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes deeply buried in their heads; and as savage in manners and habits. They destroyed the powerful monarchy of the Ostrogoths, who were obliged to retire before them, and were allowed by Valens to settle in Thrace, A.D. 376. The Huns now frequently ravaged the Roman dominions. They were joined by many other barbarian nations, and under their king Attila (A.D. 434-453), they devastated the fairest portions of the empire, both in the E. and the W. [ATTILA.] On the death of Attila, the various nations which composed his army, dispersed, and his sons were unable to resist the arms of the Ostrogoths. In a few years after the death of Attila, the empire of the Huns was completely destroyed. The remains of the nation became incorporated with other barbarians, and never appear again as a separate people. (Amm. Marc. xxxi.; Prisc. Attil.)

Hyacinthides (Ἑρακινθίδες), daughters of a Lacedaemonian named Hyacinthus, who is said to have gone to Athens and to have sacrificed them for the purpose of delivering the city from a famine and plague under which it was suffering during the war with Minos. They were named Ἀνθηΐς, Αἰγληΐς and Ἀνταία (Apollod. iii. 15, 5; Hyg. Fab. 238). Some traditions make them the daughters of Erechtheus, and relate that they received their name from the village of Hyacinthus, where they were sacrificed at the time when Athens was attacked by the Eleusinians and Thracians, or Thebans. (Suid. s.v. παρθέναι; [Demosth.] Epitaph. p. 1397). It is difficult when comparing the story of Hyacinthus at Amyclae to resist the conclusion that we may have here a reminiscence of an old sacrifice of maidens at Athens for a festival of a deity of the spring which was explained in this way when the worship of the deity akin to the Amyclaeon Hyacinthus had died out at Athens.

Hÿacinthus (Ἑράκυνθος), son of the Spartan king Amyclae and Diomede, or of Oebalus (Paus. iii. 1, 3; Apollod. iii. 10, 3; Ov. Met. x. 196; Hyg. Fab. 271; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 68). He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, and was beloved by Apollo, and as he was once playing at quoits with the god, the wind turned the quoit so that it struck the boy and slew him. Such was the original story at Amyclae (Apollod. i. 3, 3, iii. 10, 3; Eur. Hel. 1469; Paus. iii. 19, 5); but from the mention of the wind grew up a later story that Zephyrus also loved Hyacinthus and slew him from jealousy because Apollo was preferred (Palaeph. 47; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 14; Philostr. Imag. i. 24). A third story, apparently Orphic, makes Hyacinthus beloved by Thamyris. From the blood of Hyacinthus there sprang the flower of the same name, on the leaves of which appeared the exclamation of love AI, AI, or the letter Υ, being the initial of Ἑράκυνθος. [That the Greek hyacinth was not ours is clear enough: probably it was an iris: for a similar flower-legend, see AJAX.] Hyacinthus was worshipped at Amyclae as a hero, and a great festival, Hyacinthia, was celebrated in his honour. It was a festival older than the Dorians, and adopted by them. [For an account of the rites, see Dict. of Ant. art. Hyacinthia.] The myth seems to mean the effect of the hot summer sun in withering the spring flowers, the quoit being the sun's disk. It may be noticed that the Apollo of the original story cannot be the Dorian god, and the theory deserves consideration, that this Apollo and Hyacinthus are both sun-deities—Hyacinthus the younger or weaker sun of spring which fosters the spring vegetation (cf. the Egyptian child-Horus), and Apollo the strong summer sun. It is possible, again, that the story may have been developed when the religion of the Dorian Apollo overpowered that of an earlier Amyclaeon Hyacinthus, god of the sun in spring.

Hÿades (Ἑράδες)—that is, the Rainy—the name of nymphs, whose parentage, number and names are described in various ways by the ancients. Their parents were Atlas and Aethra, or Atlas and Pleione, or Hyas and Boeotia; others call their father Oceanus, Melisseus, Cadmilus, or Erechtheus. Their number differs in various legends; but their most common number is seven, as they appear in the constellation which bears their name, viz. Ambrosia, Eudora, Pedile, Coronis, Polyxo, Phyto, and Thyene or Dione (Ov. Fast. v. 166; Hyg. Fab. 182, 192; Ast. ii. 21). They were entrusted by Zeus with the care of his infant son Dionysus, and were afterwards placed by Zeus among the stars. The story which made them the daughters of Atlas relates that their number was twelve or fifteen, and that at first five of them were placed among the stars as Hyades, and the seven (or teu) others afterwards under the name of Pleiades, to reward them for the sisterly love they had evinced after the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed in Libya by a wild beast. Their name, Hyades, was derived by some from Hyes, a mystic surname of Dionysus (Suid. s.v.). The Romans, who derived it from ὕς, a pig, translated the name by Suculae (Cic. N. D. ii. 43, 111; Plin. ii. 106). The most natural derivation is from ἕειν, to rain, as the constellation of the Hyades, when rising simultaneously with the sun, announced rainy weather. (Il. xviii. 486, and Schol.; Verg. Aen. i. 743; Hor. Od. i. 3, 14.)

Hyampēa. [PARNASSUS.]

Hyampōlis (Ἰάμπολις: Ἰαμπολίτης), a town in Phocis, E of the Cephissus, near Cleonae, was founded by the Hyantes, when they were driven out of Boeotia by the Cadmeans; was destroyed by Xerxes; afterwards rebuilt; and again destroyed by Philip and the Amphictyons (Il. ii. 521; Paus. ix. 35, 5; Strab. p. 424). Cleonae, from its vicinity to Hyampolis, is called by Xenophon (Hell. vi. 4, § 27) Ἰαμπολιτῶν τὸ πρόαστειον.

Hyantes (Ἰάντες), the ancient inhabitants of Boeotia, from which country they were expelled by the Cadmeans. Part of the Hyantes emigrated to Phocis [HYAMPOLIS], and part to Aetolia. The poets use the adjective Hyantius as equivalent to Boeotian. (Strab. pp. 321, 401, 464; Ov. Met. iii. 147.)

Hŷas (Ἰας).—1. The name of the father and the brother of the HYADES.—2. (Sometimes confused with No. 1), the eponymous hero of the Boeotian Hyantes. He was married to Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 5, 1; Plin. iv. 26.)

Hybla (Ἰβλη: Ἰβλαῖος, Hyblensis), three towns in Sicily, named after a Sicilian goddess Hybla. 1. Major (ἡ μεῖζων or μεγίστη), on the S. slope of Mt. Aetna and on the river Symaethus, was originally a town of the Siculi. It was called Hybla Gereatis or Galeatis (Thuc. vi. 62; Paus. v. 23; Steph. Byz. s. v.). It is probably the Hybla famous for honey (Verg. Ecl. i. 37; Ov. Trist. v. 13, 22), though Strabo (p. 267) seems to make that a characteristic of Megara.—2.

Coin of Hybla Major (about 210 B. C.).

Obv., head of goddess Hybla, crowned with the modius; rev., Dionysus and panther, with legend YBAAS MEΓAΛAS.

Minor (ἡ μικρά), afterwards called Megara. [MEGARA].—3. Heraea, in the S. of the island, on the road from Syracuse to Agrigentum.—The above seems the true distinction between the first two towns, but it is not unquestioned, partly owing to the confused description in Pausanias and Stephanus.

Hybrēas (Ἰβρῆας), of Mylasa in Caria, a celebrated orator, contemporary with the triumvir Antonius (Strab. pp. 630, 659; Plut. Ant. 24).

Hyccāra (τὰ Ἰκκαρα: Ἰκκαρεῖς: Muro di Carini), a town of the Sicani on the N. coast of Sicily, W. of Pauormns, said to have derived its name from the sea fish ἰκκαί. It was taken by the Athenians, and plundered, and its inhabitants sold as slaves, B. C. 415. Among the captives was the beautiful Timandra, mistress of Alcibiades and mother of Lais. (Thuc. vi. 62; Diod. xiii. 6; Plut. Alc. 39; Paus. ii. 2, 5.)

Hydarnes (Ἰδάρνης), one of the seven Persians who conspired against the Magi in B. C. 521 (Hdt. iii. 70).

Hydaspes (Ἰδᾶσπης: Jelum), the northernmost of the five great tributaries of the Indus, which, with the Indus itself, water the great plain of N. India, now called the Punjab, i. e. five rivers. The Hydaspes falls into the Acesines (Chenab), which also receives, from the S., first the Hydraotes (Ravee), and then the Hyphasis (Beas, and lower down, Gharra), which has previously received, on the S. side, the Hesidrus or Zaradrus (Sutlej or Hesudru); and the Acesines itself falls into the Indus. These five rivers all rise on the SW. side of the Emodi M. (Himalaya), except the Sutlej, which, like the Indus, rises on the NE. side of the range. They became known to the Greeks by Alexander's campaign in India: his victory over Porus (B. C. 327) was gained on the left side of the Hydaspes, near, or perhaps upon, the scene of the battle of Chillianwallah; and the Hyphasis formed the limit of his progress. (Strab. p. 686; Plin. vi. 71; Arrian, An. v. 19; Curt. ix. 4.) The epithet 'fabulosus' which Horace applies to the Hydaspes (Od. i. 22, 7) refers to the marvellous stories current about it as the river of a practically unknown land; and the 'Medus Hydaspes' of Virgil (Georg. iv. 211) is merely an example of the vagueness with which the Roman writers, especially the poets, refer to the countries beyond the E. limit of the empire.

Hydra. [HERACLES, p. 396.]

Hydraōtes or Hyarōtis (Ἰδραώτης, Ἰάρωτις: Ravee), a river of India, falling into the Acesines. [HYDASPES.]

Hydrēa (Ἰδρέα: Ἰδρεάτης: Hydra), a small island in the gulf of Hermione off Argolis (Hdt. iii. 59; Paus. ii. 39, 4), of no importance in antiquity, but the inhabitants of which in modern times played a distinguished part in the war of Greek independence, and are some of the best sailors in Greece.

Hydruntum or Hydrūs (Ἰδρούς: Hydruntinus: Otranto), one of the most ancient towns of Calabria, situated on the SE. coast, with a good harbour, near a mountain Hydrus, in later times a municipium. Persons frequently crossed over to Epirus from this port. (Plin. iii. 100; Cic. ad Att. xv. 21, xvi. 6; Strab. p. 281.)

Hyettus (Ἰηττός: Ἰηττιος), a small town in Boeotia on the lake Copais, and near the frontiers of Locris (Pans. ix. 24, 3).

Hŷgiēa (Ἰγῖεία), also called Hŷgēa or Hygia, the goddess of health, and a daughter of Asclepius. [As his wife she only appears in very late Orphic hymns.] She was worshipped particularly at Athens, where representations in relief and votive tablets have been found in the Asclepieum, and not only as the daughter of Asclepius but as Athene Hygiea, to whom a statue and an altar were set up by Pericles [see p. 13, a.]. On this various theories have been mooted: (1) that her worship originated at Athens either as an offshoot from that of Athene or from a conception of the poets, (2) that it came to Athens with the worship of Asclepius from Epidaurus; (3) that she took the place of Alcippe, a nymph of the spring in the Asclepieum. These are matters of conjecture, and the question of origin may be settled some day by the discovery of inscriptions. It is true that no pre-Roman inscriptions about Hygiea have yet been found at Epidaurus; but Pausanias (ii. 11, 6) mentions a very old temple of Asclepius at Titane near Sicyon where Hygiea was worshipped equally with her father. It seems likely that her worship was united with that of Asclepius to express the abstract idea of his healing power as distinct from his old oracular character [ASCLEPIUS]. It is on the whole more likely to have originated in the Peloponnesus than at Athens; but the worship of Athenic Hygiea was merely the addition of the function of healing to the other qualities of Athenic the protectress, and was quite distinct from the worship of Hygiea the daughter of Asclepius. At Rome her proper name as introduced from Greece was Valetudo, but she was gradually identified with the genuine Italian deity Salus. In art Hygiea was represented as a maiden clad either in the Doric or Ionic chiton feeding a snake from a saucer. In the Vatican group she stands by the seated Asclepius with one hand on his shoulder; with the other she offers the saucer to the snake which is twined about her father's staff.

Hyginus. 1. C. Jūlius, a Roman grammarian, was a native of Spain, and lived at Rome in the time of Augustus, whose freedman he was, and who made him librarian of the Palatine library (Suet. Gr. 20). He wrote several works, all of which have perished, unless he is the author of the works described under No. 3.—2. Hyginus Gromaticus, so called from gruma, an instrument used by the Agrimensores. He lived in the time of Trajan, and wrote works on land-surveying. The work De Limitibus constituendis is by some attributed to him, by some to a later Hyginus. (Ed. by Hultsch, 1866; Lachmann, 1848.) The work on castrametation (De Munitionibus Castrorum) is assigned to him without due reason, and seems to be by a later writer. It is valuable for its subject. (Ed. by Domaszewski, Lips. 1887; Lange, Gott. 1848.)—3. Hyginus, the author of two extant works: 1. Fabularum Liber, a series of short mythological legends, with an introductory genealogy of divinities. 2. Poeticon Astronomicon Libri IV, which gives an account of the constellations and the myths about them. Both works, and especially the former, have considerable value for the study of Greek mythology, since the author has made use of many works, particularly of the Greek tragedians, which have been lost. It is a doubtful question whether the original author of these works was C. Julius Hyginus or not. It is the opinion of most critics that he was a writer of a later period, perhaps of the second cent. A. D. There is no doubt that the Latinity is of a later period, but the books which we have are only an abridgment of the original works, and the language may be much altered. The statement of Suetonius that Julius Hyginus was learned in Alexandrian literature would agree with the researches in these two works, and the fact of his being a friend of Ovid might account for certain resemblances in the statements of the Fabulae and the Metamorphoses. Both works of Hyginus are included in the Mythographi Latini of Muucker, Amst. 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lugd. Bat. 1742. They are edited by Bunte, Lips. 1857; and the Fab. separately by M. Schmidt, Jen. 1872.

Hylaea (Ἰλαίη), a district in Scythia, covered with wood, is the peninsula adjacent to Taurica on the NW., between the rivers Borysthènes and Hypacryris (Hdt. iv. 9, 18, 76).

Hylaeus (Ἰλαῖος)—that is, the Woodman—the name of an Arcadian centaur, who was slain by Atalante, when he pursued her. According to some legends, Hylaeus fell in the fight against the Lapithae, and others again said that he was one of the centaurs slain by Heracles. (Apollod. iii. 9, 2; Verg. Georg. ii. 457; Aen. viii. 294; Propert. i. 1, 18.)

Hylas (Ἰλας), in the Alexandrian poets, was the son of Theodamas, king of the Dryopes, by the nymph Menodice. He was beloved by Heracles, whom he accompanied in the expedition of the Argonauts. On the coast of Mysia, Hylas went on shore to draw water from a fountain; but his beauty excited the love of the Naiads, who drew him down into the water, and he was never seen again. Heracles endeavoured in vain to find him; and when he shouted out to the youth, the voice of Hylas was heard from the bottom of the well only like a faint echo, whence some say that he was actually metamorphosed into an echo (Verg. Ecl. vi. 43). Hence arose the proverb Ἰλαν κραυγᾶειν (Suid.) for 'wasted labour' (cf. Aristoph. Plut. 1127). While Heracles was engaged in seeking his favourite, the Argonauts sailed away, leaving him and his companion, Polyphemus, behind (Ap. Rh. i. 1207; Val. Flacc. iii. 481; Hyg. Fab. 14, 271; Theoc. xiii.; Propert. i. 20). The cry for Hylas was very much older than these stories of the Alexandrian poets. It is the 'Mysian cry' of Aesch. Pers. 1054. At what period Hylas and Heracles were connected in mythology it is impossible to say, but it is a reasonable suggestion that the myth of Hylas grow out of the ritual of a Mysian harvest festival in which the figure of a boy was cast into the stream or fountain with cries upon a harvest deity Hylas (cf. Strab. p. 564). Others imagine him to have been the deity of the spring called upon in summer to give more water.

Hylē (Ἰλη, also Ἰλα), a small town in Boeotia, on the lake Hylice, which was called after this town, and into which the Ismenus flows (Il. ii. 500, v. 708, vii. 221; Strab. p. 407).

Hylis, a river in Bruttium, separating the territories of Sybaris and Croton (Thuc. vii. 35).

Hylicē (ἡ Ἰλική λίμνη), a lake in Boeotia, S. of the lake Copais. [See HYLE.]

Hylicus (Ἰλικός, Ἰλλικός), a small river in Argolis, near Troezen.

Hyllus (Ἰλλός), son of Hercules by Deianira. For details see HERACLIDAE.

Hyllus (Ἰλλός: Kumtschai), a river of Lydia, falling into the Hermus on its N. side (Il. xx. 392; Hdt. i. 80; Strab. p. 626).

Hymēn or Hymēnaeus (Ἦμῆν or Ἦμέναιος), the god of marriage, was conceived as a handsome youth, and invoked in the hymeneal or bridal song (Sapph. Fr. 91, 107, 108; Eur. Troad. 310). The names originally designated the bridal song itself, which was subsequently personified, whence as a deity he becomes the son of deities connected with music, and also gathers to himself local stories of mortals arising from some marriage custom. He is described as the son of Apollo and a Muse, either Calliope, Urania, or Terpsichore. Others describe him only as the favourite of Apollo or Thamyris, and call him a son of Magnes and Calliope, or of Dionysus and Aphrodite. This last genealogy points to his being regarded as the god of fruitfulness (Pind. Fr. 139; Schol. ad Pind. iv. 313; Catull. 61, 2; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 127). The Attic legends described him as a youth of such delicate beauty, that he might be taken for a girl. He fell in love with a maiden, who refused to listen to him; but in the disguise of a girl he followed her to Eleusis to the festival of Demeter. The maidens, together with Hymenaeus, were carried off by robbers into a distant and desolate country. On their landing, the robbers lay down to sleep, and were killed by Hymenaeus, who now returned to Athens, requesting the citizens to give him his beloved in marriage, if he restored to them the maidens who had been carried off by the robbers. His request was granted, and his marriage was extremely happy. For this reason he was invoked in the hymeneal songs. According to others he was a youth who was killed by the fall of his house on his wedding-day, whence he was afterwards invoked in bridal songs, in order to be propitiated (Serv. ad Aen. i. 655, ad Ecl. viii. 30). Some related that at the wedding of Dionysus and Ariadne he sang the bridal hymn, but lost his voice. He is represented in works of art as a young man carrying a bridal torch. Most notable is a painting from Pompeii (Mus. Borb. xii. 17).

Hymettus (Ἕμηττός), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble and more especially for its honey (Hor. Od. ii. 18, 3, Sat. ii. 2, 15). It is about three miles S. of Athens, and forms the commencement of the range of mountains which runs S. through Attica [p. 148]. It is now called Telovuni or Hymettos: the part of the mountain near the promontory Zoster, which was called in ancient times Anhydrus (ὁ Ἄνυδρος, se. Ἕμηττός), or the Dry Hymettus, is now called Mavrovuni.

Hypacÿris, Hypacÿris, or Pacÿris (Κανίλ-σhak), a river in European Sarmatia, which flows through the country of the nomad Scythians, and falls into the Sinus Carcinites in the Euxine sea.

Hypaea. [STOICHADES.]

Ἕπαερα (Ἕπαερα: Dokōōi), a city of Lydia, on the S. slope of Mt. Tmolus, near the N. bank of the Caÿster (Strab. p. 627; Paus. v. 27, 5; Ov. Met. vi. 13).

Hypāna (Ἕπάνη: τὰ Ἕπανα: Ἕπανεύς), a town in Triphylian Elis, belonging to the Pentapolis (Strab. p. 343).

Hypānis. 1. (Bug), a river in European Sarmatia, rises, according to Herodotus, in a lake, flows parallel to the Borysthenes, has at first sweet, then bitter water, and falls into the Euxine sea W. of the Borysthenes (Hdt. ii. 102, iv. 17; Strab. p. 107; Ov. Pont. iv. 10, 47).—2. (Kuban), a river of the Sarmatian Caucasus, rising in the mountains of the Caucasus and flowing into the Palus Maeotis (Strab. p. 494).

Hypāta (τὰ Ἕπατα, ἢ Ἕπάτη: Ἕπαταῖος, Ἕπατεύς: Neopatra, Trk. Batrajik), a town of the Aenianes in Thessaly, S. of the Spercheus, belonged in later times to the Aetolian league (Pol. xx. 9, 11, xxi. 2, 3). The inhabitants of this town were notorious for magic (Lucian, Asin. 1, Apul. Met. i. 104).

Hypatia (Ἕπατία), daughter of Theon, by whom she was instructed in philosophy and mathematics. She lectured in the Neoplatonic school of Plotinus at Alexandria. She appears to have been modest as well as beautiful, but nevertheless to have been a victim to slander and falsehood. She was accused of influencing Orcstes, prefect of Alexandria, against Cyril; and (possibly at the instigation of the archbishop himself) a number of fanatical monks seized her in the street, and dragged her into one of the churches, where they tore her to pieces, A.D. 415.

Hypatōdōrus (Ἕπατόδωρος), a sculptor of Thebes, n.c. 372 (Paus. viii. 26, 5, x. 10, 3).

Hyperbōlus (Ἕπερβόλος), an Athenian demagogue in the Peloponnesian war, was of servile origin, and was frequently satirised by Aristophanes and the other comic poets (Aristoph. Ach. 846, Eq. 1301, Vesp. 1007). In order to get rid either of Nicias or Alcibiades, Hyperbolus called for the exercise of the ostracism. But the parties endangered combined to defeat him, and the vote of exile fell on Hyperbolus himself: an application of that dignified punishment by which it was thought to have been so debased that the use of it was never recurred to. Some years afterwards he was murdered by the oligarchs at Samos, B.C. 411. (Thuc. viii. 74, Plut. Arist. 7, Alc. 13).

Hyperbōrēi or -ēi (Ἕπερβόρῃοι, Ἕπερβόρῃοι), a fabulous people, the earliest mention of whom seems to have been in the sacred legends connected with the worship of Apollo, both at Delos and at Delphi. They are not mentioned by Homer, but it does not follow that the legend was post-Homeric. Herodotus (iv. 32) notices them as spoken of in the Epigoni and by Hesiod. In the earliest Greek conception of the Hyperboreans, as embodied by the poets, they were a blessed people, living in a land of perpetual sunshine, which produced abundant fruits, on which the people lived, abstaining from animal food. In innocence and peace, free from disease and toil and care, ignorant of violence and war, they spent a long and happy life, in the due and cheerful observance of the worship of Apollo, who visited their country soon after his birth, and spent a whole year among them, dancing and singing, before he returned to Delphi. The poets related further how the sun only rose once a year and set once a year, upon the Hyperboreans, whose year was thus divided, at the equinoxes, into a six months' day and a six months' night, and they were therefore said to sow in the morning, to reap at noon, to gather their fruits in the evening, and to store them up at night: how, too, their natural life lasted 1000 years, but if any of them was satiated with its unbroken enjoyment, he threw himself, crowned and anointed, from a sacred rock into the sea (Strab. p. 711; Plin. iv. 82). The Delian legends told of offerings sent to Apollo by the Hyperboreans, first by the hands of virgins named Arge and Opis (or Hecaërge), and then by Laodice and Hyperoche, escorted by five men called Perphereës; and lastly, as their messengers did not return, they sent the offerings packed in wheat-straw, and the sacred package was forwarded from people to people till it reached Delos. Pausanias cites the old Delian hymns ascribed to Olen as saying that a shrine made of wax and feathers was sent by Apollo to the Hyperboreans, apparently to Delphi (Paus. x. 5). Hence it would seem that they were originally regarded as Delphians, and the λευκὰ κόρῃα who were supposed to aid Delphi against the Gauls may have been the Hyperborean maidens Laodice and Hyperoche (Paus. i. 4, x. 23, 1; Cic. Div. i. 37, 81). The notion that they dwelt in the extreme north 'beyond the influence of the north wind,' may have arisen from the derivation of their name (now generally rejected) ἵπερ-βορέας. Herodotus says that Aristaeas placed them in a gold-producing country (Ural Mountains?) near the Arimaspi (Hdt. iv. 13); but the older legends seem to connect them with the lands of the sun in the south-west or south-east (Pind. Pyth. x. 30; Aesch. Pr. 805), and when Pindar speaks of the sources of the Ister as their dwelling (Ol. iii. 14, viii. 47; Isthm. v. 22), he probably meant to express the extreme west; but unquestionably they were eventually conceived as dwelling far in the north, and their name meant northerly, as when Virgil and Horace speak of the 'Hyperboreae oraë' and 'Hyperborei campi.' Some modern writers derive their name from ἵπερ-ὄρος = 'beyond the mountains': others connect the word with φέρα, as though for ἵπερφέρεται, so that the name meant 'the bringers of offerings to Apollo' in its original, and 'northern' only in its later, use.

Hyperbōrēi Montes was originally the mythical name of an imaginary range of mountains in the N. of the earth [HYPERBOREI], and was afterwards applied by the geographers to various chains, as, for example, the Caucasus, the Rhipaëi Montes, and others.

Hyperides (Ἑπερίδης or Ἑπερίδης), one of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Glaucippus, and belonged to the Attic demus of Collytus. He was a pupil of Isocrates, and a friend and fellow-pupil of Lycurgus. He is first mentioned B.C. 360, when he prosecuted Autocles for treason in a Thracian command. About B.C. 358 he and his son equipped two triremes at their own expense in order to serve against Euboea. From the peace of 346 till 324 he aided Demosthenes in the patriotic struggle against Macedon. After the death of Alexander (323) Hyperides took an active part in organising that confederacy of the Greeks against Antipater which produced the Lamian war. Upon the defeat of the confederates at the battle of Crannon in the following year (322), Hyperides fled to Aegina, where he was slain by the emissaries of Antipater. His oratory, holding a middle place between that of Lysias and Demosthenes, combined vigour with grace and wit, and is remarkable also for its pathetic passages. Longinus (de Sublim. 34) ranks him very high for all these qualities. Out of the 77 orations attributed to Hyperides, until the middle of this century none were known to be extant, but in 1847 and succeeding years the greater part of the speech For Euxenippus and of the Funeral Oration on those who fell in the Lamian war, and (in 1892) most of the speech Against Athenagoras, and parts of those Against Demosthenes and For Lycophron were recovered from papyri found in Egypt. Ed. C. Babington, 1853; Blass, Lips. 1869.

Hypëion (Ἑπερίων), a Titan, son of Uranus and Ge, and married to his sister Thia, or Euryphaessa, by whom he became the father of Helios, Selene, and Eos. [HELIOS.]

Hypermnestra (Ἑπερμνήστρα). 1. Daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, wife of Oicles, and mother of Amphiarus.—2. One of the daughters of Danaus and wife of Lynceus. [DANAUS; LYNCÆUS.]

Hypbasis or Hypasis or Hypānis (Ἑψασις, Ἑψασις, Ἑψασις; Becas, and Gharra), a river of India. [HYDASPES.]

Hypius (Ἑψίος), a river and mountain in Bithynia.

Hypsas (Ἑψας), two rivers on the S. coast of Sicily, one between Selinus and Thermae Selinuntiae (now Belicì) and the other near Agrigentum (now Fiume Drago).

Hypseus (Ἑψεύς), son of Penëus and Creusa, was king of the Lapithae, and father of Cyrene (Pind. Pyth. ix. 13; Paus. ix. 34, 5).

Hypsicles (Ἑψικλῆς), of Alexandria, a Greek mathematician, usually said to have lived about A.D. 160, but ought not to be placed earlier than A.D. 550. His only extant work is entitled Περὶ τῆς τῶν (ὠδίων ἀναφοράς, published with the Optics of Heliodorus at Paris, 1567. He is supposed to have added the 14th and 15th books to the Elements of Euclid.

Hypsipylë (Ἑψιπύλλη), daughter of Thoas, king of Lemnos. When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, because they had taken some female Thracian slaves to their beds, Hypsipyle saved her father. [THOAS.] She then became queen of Lemnos; and when the Argonauts landed there shortly afterwards, she bore twin sons to Jason, Euneus and Nembrophonus, also called Deiphilus or Thoas. [JASON.] The Lemnian women subsequently discovered that Thoas was alive, whereupon they compelled Hypsipyle to quit the island. On her flight she was taken prisoner by pirates and sold to the Neumean king Lycurgus, who intrusted to her care his son Archemorus or Opheltus. [ARCHEMORUS.]

Hypsüs (Ἑψύς, -οὔντος), a town in Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name.

Hyrcānia (Ἑρκανία: Ἑρκάνιος, Hyrcānus: Mazanderan), a province of the ancient Persian Empire, on the S. and SE. shores of the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains on the W., S., and E., from Media, Parthia, and Margiana. Its valleys were very fertile; and it flourished most under the Parthians, whose kings often resided in it during the summer. (Strab. p. 508.)

Hyrcānum or -ium Mare. [CASPIUM MARE.]

Hyrcānus (Ἑρκανός). 1. Joannes, prince and high-priest of the Jews, was the son and successor of Simon Maccabaeus. He succeeded to his father's power B.C. 135. He was at first engaged in war with Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who invaded Judaea, and laid siege to Jerusalem. In 133 he concluded a peace with Antiochus, on the condition of paying an annual tribute. In 109 Hyrcanus took Samaria, and razed it to the ground. He died in 106. Although he did not assume the title of king, he may be regarded as the founder of the monarchy of Judaea, which continued in his family till the accession of Herod. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 7-9).—2. High-priest and king of the Jews, was the eldest son of Alexander Jannaeus. On the death of Alexander (78) the royal authority devolved upon Alexandra, his wife, who appointed Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood; and upon her death in 69, Hyrcanus succeeded to the sovereignty, but was attacked by his younger brother, Aristobulus, in the following year (68), and, being driven from the throne, took refuge with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea. That monarch assembled an army, with which he invaded Judaea. Aristobulus, however, gained over by bribes and promises Pompey's lieutenant, M. Scaurus, who now ordered Aretas and Hyrcanus to withdraw from Judaea (64). The next year Pompey himself arrived in Syria: he reversed the decision of Scaurus, carried away Aristobulus as a prisoner to Rome, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, with the authority, though not the name, of royalty; but Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and subsequently Aristobulus himself, escaped from Rome, and excited revolts, which were only quelled by the assistance of the Romans. The real government was now in the hands of Antipater, the father of Herod, who aided Caesar during the Alexandrian war (47), and was made procurator of Judaea. Antipater was poisoned by the contrivance of Hyrcanus (43); but Herod succeeded to his father's power. The Parthians, on their invasion of Syria, carried away Hyrcanus as prisoner (40). He was treated with much liberality by the Parthian king, and allowed to live in freedom at Babylon. Here he remained for some years; but having at length received an invitation from Herod, who had meanwhile established himself on the throne of Judaea, he returned to Jerusalem. He was treated with respect by Herod till the battle of Actium; when Herod, fearing lest Augustus might place Hyrcanus on the throne, accused him of a treasonable correspondence with the king of Arabia, and put him to death (30). (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5-13, xv. 2, 6; Dio Cass. xlviii. 26.)

Hýriā (Ἕρῖα: Ἕρῖεύς, Ἕρῖάτης). 1. A town in Boeotia, near Tanagra, was in the earliest times a place of importance, but afterwards sank into insignificance (Strab. pp. 404, 408).—2. A town in Apulia. [URIA.]

Hýrieus (Ἕρῖεύς), son of Poseidon and Alcyone, king of Hyria in Boeotia, husband of Clonia, and father of Nycteus, Lycus, and Orion. Respecting his treasures see AGAMEDES.

Hyrminā (Ἕρμῖνη), a town in Elis, mentioned by Homer, but of which all trace had disappeared in the time of Strabo (Strab. p. 341). Near it was the promontory Hyrnina or Hormina (C. Chiarenza).

Hyrminē (Ἕρμῖνη), daughter of Neleus, or Nycteus, wife of Phorbas, and mother of Actor.

Hyrtaeus (Ἕρτακος). 1. A Trojan, to whom Priam gave his first wife Arisba, when he married Hecuba. Homer makes him the father of Asius, hence called Hyrtaeides (Il. ii. 837).—2. Father of Nisus (Verg. Aen. ix. 177).—3. Father of Hippocoon (Verg. Aen. v. 492).

Hysiaē (Ἕρσιαί). 1. (Ἕρσιάτης), a town in Argolis, S. of Argos, destroyed by the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. v. 83).—2. (Ἕρσιεύς), a town in Boeotia, E. of Plataeae, called by Herodotus (v. 74) a demus of Attica, but probably belonging to Plataeae.

Hystaspes (Ἕρσάσπης). 1. Son of Arsames, and father of Darius I., was a member of the Persian royal house of the Achaemenidae. He was satrap of Persis under Cambyses, and probably under Cyrus also. (Hdt. i. 209, iii. 70, iv. 83, vii. 224).—2. Son of Darius I. and Atossa (Hdt. vii. 64).

Iādēra or Iader (Iadertinus: Old Zara), a town on the coast of Illyricum, with a good harbour, and a Roman colony under the name of 'Colonia Claudia Augusta Felix' (Plin. iii. 140; C. I. L. iii. 2909).

Ialēmus (Ἰάλεμος), a similar personification to that of Linus, and hence called a son of Apollo and Calliope (and consequently brother of Hymenaeus and Orpheus). He was regarded as the inventor of the song Ialemus, which was a kind of dirge, and is only mentioned as sung on most melancholy occasions. (Pind. Fr.; Schol. ad Eur. Or. 1391, ad Suppl. 281, ad Rhes. 982). The dirges both of Linus and Ialemus seem to be the lamentation for death alike of vegetation and of early manhood, and the myths probably grew out of the rites which succeeded the harvest, when the plant life was dying away as winter drew near.

Ialmēnus (Ἰάλμενος), son of Ares and Astyoche, and brother of Aescalaphus, was a native of the Boeotian Orchomenos. He was one of the Argonauts and a suitor of Helena. After the destruction of Troy, he wandered about with the Orchomenians, and founded colonies in Colchis. (Il. ii. 512, Apollod. iii. 10, 8; Paus. ix. 37; Strab. p. 416.)

Iālysus (Ἰάλυσος: Philerimos), one of the three very ancient Dorian cities in the island of Rhodes, and one of the six original members of the Dorian Hexapolis [DORIS], stood on the NW. coast of the island, about sixty stadia SW. of Rhodes. It is said to have derived its name from the mythical Ialysus, son of Cerephus, and grandson of Helios. (Pind. Ol. vii. 74; Diod. v. 57; Strab. p. 654. For its pottery, see RHODUS.)

Iambē (Ἰάμβη), a Thracian woman, daughter of Pan and Echo, and a slave of Metanira. When Demeter, in search of her daughter, arrived in Attica, and visited the house of Metanira, Iambe cheered the mournful goddess by her jokes (Hymn. ad Dem. v. 195). The custom of jests and mockeries in the Eleusinian procession was said to commemorate this (Diod. v. 4; Apollod. i. 5, 1). There can be little doubt that the converse was the order of events, and that the story of Iambe grew out of the practise of jeering in the procession, which was called ιαμβίζειν.

Iamblichus (Ἰάμβλιχος). 1. A Syrian who lived in the time of the emperor Trajan, wrote a romance in the Greek language, entitled Babylonica. The work itself is lost, but an epitome of it is preserved by Photius.—2. A celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher, was born at Chalcis in Coele-Syria. He died in the reign of Constantine the Great, probably before A.D. 333. He was inferior in judgment and learning to the earlier Neo-Platonists, Plotinus and Porphyry; and he introduced into his system a great deal of Oriental mystery and magic, gaining for himself from his disciples the reputation of working miracles. Iamblichus wrote (among many other works which have perished) a treatise Περὶ Πυθαγοροῦ αἰρέσεως, on the philosophy of Pythagoras. It was intended as a preparation for the study of Plato, and consisted originally of ten books, of which four are extant. The first book contains an account of the life of Pythagoras, and though compiled without care, it is yet of value, as the other works from which it is taken are lost. Edited by Kuster, Amsterd. 1707, and by Kiessling, Lips. 1815: The Life of Pythagoras by Westermann, 1850. Two other works, Τὰ θεολογούμενα ἀριθμητικῆς, on mystic numbers (ed. by Ast, Lips. 1817), and Περὶ μυστηρίων, on the mysteries of Egyptian and Chaldaean theology (ed. by Parthey, Berl. 1857), are wrongly attributed to him.—3. A later philosopher of the same name, contemporary with the emperor Julian (Julian, Ep. 34, 40).

Iamidæe. [IAMUS.]

Iamnia (Ἰάμνεια, Ἰαμνία: Ἰαμνέτης: O. T. Jabueel, Jabneh: Ibneh or Gabneh), a considerable city of Palestine, between Diopolis and Azotus, near the coast, with a good harbour (Strab. p. 759).

Iamus (Ἰαμος), son of Apollo and Evadne, received the art of prophecy from his father, and was regarded as the ancestor of the famous family of seers, the Iamidæe at Olympia. The story says that, being deserted by his mother for a time, he was fed with honey by two snakes, and was called Iamus because he was found lying in a bed of violets. Apollo afterwards led him to Olympia and gave him prophetic power. (Pind. Ol. vi. 28-70; Paus. vi. 2, 3.)

Ianira (Ἰάνειρα), one of the Nereids.

Ianthē (Ἰάνθη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Persephone (Paus. iv. 30, 3; Hes. Th. 349).—2. Daughter of Telestes of Crete, beloved by Iphus.

Iāpētus (Ἰαπετός), one of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge, married Asia or Clymene, the daughter of his brother Oceanus, and became by her the father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menoetius (Hes. Th. 507). In Homer (Il. viii. 479) he is mentioned only as a Titan, imprisoned with Cronus in Tartarus. Being the father of Prometheus, he was grandfather of Deucalion, who was regarded by the Greeks as the progenitor of the human race, and Iapetus himself seems to have been looked upon as progenitor of the older race of mankind under Cronus. His descendants, Prometheus, Atlas, and others, are often designated by the patronymics Iapetidae (-es), Iapetionidae (-es), and the feminine Iapetionis.

Iapydes (Ἰάπυδες or Ἰάποδες), a warlike and barbarous people in the N. of Illyricum, between the rivers Arsia and Tedanius, were a mixed race, partly Illyrian and partly Celtic, who tattooed their bodies (Strab. pp. 313-315). They were subdued by Augustus. Their country was called Iapydia.

Iapygia (Ἰαπυγία: Ἰάπυγες), the name given by the Greeks to the S. of Apulia, from Tarentum and Brundisium to the Prom. Iapygium (C. Leuca); though it is sometimes applied to the whole of Apulia. [APULIA.] The name is derived from the mythical Iapyx.

Iapyx (Ἰάπυξ). 1. Son of Lycaou and brother of Daunius and Peucetius, who went as leaders of a colony to Italy (Ant. Lib. 31). According to others, he was a Cretan, and a brother of Icadus, or a son of Daedalus and a Cretan woman, from whom the Cretans who migrated to Italy derived the name of Iapyges (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 332).—2. The WNW. wind, blowing off the coast of Iapygia (Apulia), in the S. of Italy, and consequently favourable to persons crossing over to Greece. It was the same as the ἀργέστης of the Greeks.

Iarbas or Hiarbas, king of the Gaetulians, and son of Jupiter Ammon by a Libyan nymph, sued in vain for the hand of Dido in marriage (Verg. Aen. iv. 36, 196; Ov. Her. viii. 123; Juv. v. 45; Just. xviii. 6). For details see DRDO.

Iardānes (Ἰαρδάνης), a king of Lydia, and father of Omphale, who is hence called Iardānis (Apollod. ii. 6, 3).

Iardānes or Iardānus (Ἰαρδάνης, Ἰαρδανός). 1. (Jardān), a river in Elis (Strab. p. 342; Paus. v. 5, 9).—2. A river in the N. of Crete, which flowed near Cydonia (Paus. vi. 21, 6).

Iasion or Iāsīus (Ἰασίων, Ἰάσιος), in Homer (Od. v. 125) is mentioned as a mortal who won the love of Demeter in a thrice-ploughed field (τρίπολος). Homer alone adds that Zeus killed him with a thunderbolt. In Hesiod the scene of his union with Demeter is Crete, and the son born to them was Plutus (Th. 969). It would seem that the original Iasion was a local Pelasgic deity of Crete, and the myth signifies the adoption of agriculture by the people and the consequent wealth; in respect of which Demeter became the chief deity in their rites and Iasion subordinate (cf. Ov. Met. ix. 422, Am. iii. 10, 25; Apollod. iii. 12, 1). He is represented as being the son of Zeus and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, in a different legend, which connects him with Samothrace, in which island Demeter, having met him at the marriage of Harmonia, instructs him in the mysteries (Diod. v. 48). A third version gives an Italian origin to him and his brother, Dardanus, who are sons of Electra and Corythus, the founder of Cortona (Verg. Aen. iii. 167; Serv. ad loc.).

Iāsis, i.e. Atalante, the daughter of Iasius.

Iāso (Ἰασώ), i.e. Recovery, a daughter of Asclepius, or Amphiaraus, and sister of Hygiea, was worshipped as the goddess of recovery.

Iassius or Iassicus Sinus (Ἰασικὸς κόλπος: Gulf of Mandeliyeh), a large gulf on the W. coast of Caria, between the peninsulae of Miletus and Myndus; named after the city of Iassus, and called Bargyliticus Sinus (Βαργυλιητικὸς κόλπος) from another city, Bargylin.

Iassus or Iāsus (Ἰασσός, Ἰασός: Ἰασεύς: Asyn-Kalessi, Ru.), a city of Caria, on the Iassius Sinus, founded by Argives and colonised by Milesians (Thuc. viii. 28; Strab. p. 658).

Iasus (Ἰασός). 1. An Arcadian, son of Lycurgus and Cleophile or Eurynome, brother of Ancaeus, husband of Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, and father of Atalante (Apollod. iii. 9, 2). He is likewise called Iasius.—2. Father of Amphion, and king of the Minyans.

Iazyges (Ἰάζυγες), a powerful Sarmatian people, who originally dwelt on the coast of the Pontus Euxinus and the Palus Maeotis, but in the reign of Claudius settled near the Quadi in Dacia, in the country bounded by the Danube, the Theiss, and the Sarmatian mountains. They are called from this migration Iazyges Metanastae; but sometimes called Sarmatae Iazyges or simply Sarmatae. They were in alliance with the Quadi, with whom they frequently attacked the Roman dominions, especially Moesia and Pannonia. In the fifth century they were conquered by the Goths. (Strab. pp. 294, 306.)

Iberia (Ἰβηρία: S. part of Georgia), a country of Asia, in the centre of the isthmus between the Black and Caspian Seas, was surrounded on every side by mountains, through which there were only four passes. Sheltered by these mountains and watered by the Cyrus (Κούρ) and its upper tributaries, it was famed for fertility, and its inhabitants, Ibères (Ἰβήρες) or Ibēri, whom the ancients believed to be of the same family as the Assyrians and Medes, were an agricultural people, more civilised than their neighbours in Colchis and Albania. They were divided into four castes: (1) the nobles, from whom two kings were chosen; (2) the priests, who were also the magistrates; (3) the soldiers and husbandmen; (4) the slaves, who performed all public and mechanical work. The Romans first became acquainted with the country through the expedition of Pompey, in B.C. 65; and under Trajan it was subjected to Rome. In the fifth century it was conquered by the Persian king, Sapor. (Strab. pp. 499-501; Plin. vi. 29).—No connexion can be traced between the Iberians of Asia and those of Spain.

Iberia. [HISPANIA.]

Ibērus (Ἰβήρος or Ἰβήρ: Ebro), the principal river of the NE. of Spain, rises among the mountains of the Cantabri near Juliobriga, flows SE. through a great plain between the Pyrenees and the M. Idubeda, and falls into the Mediterranean, near Dertosa, after forming a Delta.

Ibycus (Ἰβύκος), a Greek lyric poet, was a native of Rhegium, and spent the best part of his life at Samos, at the court of Polycrates, about B.C. 540. It is related that travelling through a desert place near Corinth, he was murdered by robbers, but before he died he called upon a flock of cranes that happened to fly over him to avenge his death. Soon afterwards, when the people of Corinth were assembled in the theatre, the cranes appeared; and one of the murderers, who happened to be present, cried out involuntarily, 'Behold the avengers of Ibycus:' and thus were the authors of the crime detected. The phrase of αἱ Ἰβύκου γέραννοι passed into a proverb. (Suid. s.v.; Antip. Sid. Ep. 78; Plut. de Garrul. p. 610.) The poetry of Ibycus consisted partly of choral odes or hymns on epic subjects, partly of love songs, and partook largely of the impetuosity of his character (Cic. Tusc. iv. 33, 71). His remains are edited by Schneidewin, Götting. 1833, and in Bergk's Poët. Lyr.

ICARIA or ICARIUS (Ἰκαρία, Ἰκαρίος: Ἰκαριεύς), a mountain and a de.nus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis. See foll. art.

ICĀRIUS (Ἰκάριος), also called ICĀRUS or ICĀRION. 1. An Athenian, who lived in the reign of Pandion, and hospitably received Dionysus on his arrival in Attica. The god in return taught him the cultivation of the vine. Icarinus made a present of some wine to peasants, who became intoxicated by it, and thinking that they were poisoned by Icarus, slew him, and threw his body into a well, or buried it under a tree. His daughter, Erigone, after a long search, found his grave, to which she was conducted by his faithful dog Maera. From grief she hanged herself on the tree under which he was buried. [In Et. Mag. Aletis is said to be another name for Erigone, given to her because of her wanderings. It has been suggested that this was a corruption of ἀλείτης, and that the original was a propitiatory sacrifice of a maiden.] Zeus or Dionysus placed her and Icarus among the stars, making Erigone the Virgin, Icarinus Boötes or Arcturus, and Maera Procyon or the Little Dog. Hence the latter is called Icarius canis. The god then punished the ungrateful Athenians with madness, in which condition the Athenian maidens hanged themselves as Erigone had done. The Athenians propitiated Icarus and Erigone by the institution of the festival of the Aeora. For the origin and meaning of the myth see p. 296, a; and cf. Dict. of Ant. art. Aeora, Oscilla. The connexion of the dog with the story is probably that the burning up of the vines in the hot season of the dog-star was to be averted by the rites. (Apollod. iii. 14, 7; Paus. i. 2, 4; Hyg. Fab. 130, Ast. ii. 4, 5; Ov. Met. vi. 126, x 451.)—2. A Lacedaemouian, son of Perieres and Gophophōne, and brother of Tyndareus. Others called him grandson of Perieres, and son of Oebalus. When Icarus and Tyndareus were expelled from Lacedaemon by their half brother, Hippocoou, Icarus went to Acarnania, and there became the father of Penelope, and of several other children. He afterwards returned to Lacedaemon. Since there were many suitors for the hand of Penelope, he promised to give her to the hero who should conquer in a foot-race. Odysseus won the prize, and was betrothed to Penelope. Icarus tried to persuade his daughter to remain with him and not accompany Odysseus to Ithaca. Odysseus allowed her to do as she pleased, whereupon she covered her face with her veil to hide her blushes, and thus intimated that she would follow her husband. Icarus then desisted from further entreaties, and erected a statue of Modesty on the spot. (Paus. iii. 1, 4; Apollod. i. 9, 5, iii. 10, 3; Schol. ad Od. xv. 16.)

ICĀRUS (Ἰκάρος), son of Daedalus. [DAEDALUS.]

ICĀRUS or ICĀRĪA (Ἰκάρος, Ἰκαρία: Nikaria), an island of the Aegean sea, one of the Sporades, W. of Samos; called also Doliche (δολιχή, i.e. long island). Its common name, and that of the surrounding sea, Icarius Mare, were derived from the myth of Icarus. [DAEDALUS.] It was first colonised by the Milesians, but afterwards belonged to the Samians, who fed their herds on its rich pastures. (Strab. pp. 124, 766; Thuc. iii. 92; Hdt. vi. 95.)

ICĀIUS, a friend of Horace, who addressed to him an ode (Od. i. 29), and an epistle (Ep. i. 12). The ode was written in B.C. 25, when Iccius was preparing to join Aelius Gallus in his expedition to Arabia. The epistle was composed about ten years afterwards, when Iccius had become Vipsanius Agrippa's steward in Sicily. In both poems Horace reprehends the inordinate desire for wealth.

ICĒNI, called SIMĒNI (Σιμενοι) by Ptolemy, a numerous and powerful people in Britain, who dwelt N. of the Trinobantes, in the modern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Their revolt from the Romans, under their heroic queen Boudicca or BoudicĒa, is celebrated in history. [BOUDICCA; BRITANNIA.] Their chief town was Venta Icenorum (Caister), about three miles from Norwich.

ICHNAE (Ἰχναί: Ἰχναίος). 1. A town in Bottiaea in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Axios.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, celebrated for its worship of Themis, who was hence surnamed Ichnaea (Strab. p. 435).

ICHNAE or ISCHNAE (Ἰχναί, Ἰσχναί), a Greek city in the N. of Mesopotamia, founded by the Macedonians, was the scene of the first battle between Crassus and the Parthians, in which the former gained the victory. [CRASSUS.]

ICHTHŶOPĀGI (Ἰχθυοφάγοι, i.e. Fish-eaters), was a vague descriptive name given to various peoples on the coasts of Asia and Africa, of whom the ancients knew but little. Thus we find Ichthyophagi: (1) in the extreme SE. of Asia, in the country of the Sinae: (2) on the coast of GEDROSIA: (3) on the NE. coast of Arabia Felix: (4) in Africa, on the coast of the Red Sea, above Egypt: (5) on the W. coast of Africa.

ICILIUS. 1. Sp., was one of the three envoys sent by the plebeians, after their secession to the Sacred Mount, to treat with the senate, B.C. 494. He was thrice elected tribune of the plebs: namely, in 492, 481, and 471. (Liv. ii. 58; Dionys. vii. 26, ix. 43.)—2. L., a man of great energy and eloquence, was tribune of the plebs, 456, when he claimed for the tribunes the right of convoking the senate, and also carried the important law for the assignment of the Aventine (de Aventino publicando) to the plebs. In the following year (455), he was again elected tribune. He was one of the chief leaders in the outbreak against the decemvirs, 449. Virginius had been betrothed to him, and to revenge her death Icilius hurried to the army which was carrying on the war against the Sabines, and prevailed upon them to desert the government. (Liv. iii. 44.)

ICŌNIUM (Ἰκόνιον: Ἰκονιεύς: Koniyeh), the capital of Lycania, in Asia Minor (Xen. An. i. 2, 19; Strab. p. 568; Cic. Fam. iii. 8, 5), was, when visited by St. Paul, a flourishing city, with a mixed population of Jews and Greeks. It was made a colony by Claudius, and therefore sometimes bore the name of Claudia, and the inhabitants Κλαυδεικονιεύς: refounded by Hadrian, and therefore also called Col. Aelia Iconiensis; in the middle ages one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, and important in the history of the crusades.

ICTINUS (Ἰκτινος), a contemporary of Pericles, was the architect of two of the most celebrated of the Greek temples—namely, the great temple of Athene, on the acropolis of Athens, called the Parthenon, and the temple of Apollo Epicurius, near Phigalia in Arcadia. Callistrates was associated with Ictinus in building the Parthenon. Ictinus also built part of the Hall of Initiation at Eleusis. [ELEUSIS; PARTHENON; PHIGALIA.]

IDA (Ἴδη, Dor. Ἴδα). 1. (Ida, or Kas-Dagh), a mountain range of Mysia, in Asia Minor, which formed the S. boundary of the Troad; extending from Lectum Pr. in the SW. corner of the Troad, eastwards along the north side of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and further east in the centre of Mysia. Its highest summits were Cotylus on the north, and Gargara on the south: the latter is about 5000 feet high, and is often capped with snow. Lower down, the slopes of the mountain are well-wooded; and lower still, they form fertile fields and valleys. The sources of the Scamander and the Aesepus, besides other rivers and numerous brooks, are on Ida. The mountain is celebrated in mythology as the scene of the rape of Gany-mede, whom Ovid (Fast. ii. 145), calls Idaeus puer, and of the judgment of Paris, who is called Idaeus iudex by Ovid (Fast. vi. 44), and Idaeus pastor by Cicero (ad Att. i. 18). In Homer, too, its summit is the place from which the gods watch the battles in the plain of Troy (Il. viii. 47). Ida was also an ancient seat of the worship of Cybele, who obtained from it the name of Idaea Mater (Strab. p. 469).—2. (Psilorati), a mountain in the centre of Crete, belonging to the mountain range which runs through the whole length of the island. Mt. Ida is 7674 feet above the level of the sea. (Strab. pp. 472, 604.) It was connected with the worship of Zeus, said to have been brought up in a cave in this mountain. [ZEUS.]

Idaea Mater. [RHEA.]

Idaei Dactyli. [DACTYLI.]

Idálium (Ἰδαλίον), a town in Cyprus, sacred to Venus, who hence bore the surname Idalia.

Idas (Ἰδας), son of Aphareus and Arene, the daughter of Oebalus, brother of Lynceus, husband of Marpessa, and father of Cleopatra or Alcyone. From the name of their father, Idas and Lynceus are called Apharetidae and Apharidae. (Ap. Rh. i. 485; Pind. Nem. x. 121.) Apollo was in love with Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus, but Idas carried her off in a winged chariot which Poseidon had given him. Evenus could not overtake Idas, but Apollo found him in Messene, and took the maiden from him. The lovers fought for her possession, but Zeus separated them, and left the decision with Marpessa, who chose Idas from fear lest Apollo should desert her if she grew old. (Il. ix. 534; Apollod. i. 7, 8.) The Apharetidae also took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. But the most celebrated part of their story is their battle with the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, which is related elsewhere [p. 298].

Idistavisus Campus, a plain in Germany near the Weser, probably near the Porta Westphalica, between Rinteln and Hausberge, memorable for the victory of Germanicus over the Cherusci, A.D. 16 (Tac. Ann. ii. 16).

Idmon (Ἰδμων), son of Apollo and Asteria, or Cyrene, was a soothsayer, and accompanied the Argonauts, although he knew beforehand that death awaited him. He was killed in the country of the Mariandynians by a boar or a serpent; according to others, he died there of a disease. (Ap. Rh. i. 139, ii. 815; Hyg. Fab. 14.)

Idoméneus (Ἰδομενεύς). 1. Son of the Cretan Deucalion, and grandson of Minos and Pasiphae, was king of Crete. He is sometimes called Lyctius or Cnossius, from the Cretan towns of Lyctus and Cnossus. (Il. xiii. 307, 446; Verg. Aen. iii. 401; Diod. v. 79.) He was one of the suitors of Helen; and in conjunction with Meriones, the son of his half-brother Molus, he led the Cretans in eighty ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and distinguished himself especially in the battle near the ships. (Il. ii. 645, iii. 230, iv. 251, v. 43, vii. 165, xiii. 361, xvi. 345.) According to Homer, Idomeneus returned home in safety after the fall of Troy (Od. iii. 191). His tomb was preserved at Cnossus, where he was honoured in conjunction with Meriones (Diod. v. 79). Later traditions relate that once in a storm he vowed to sacrifice to Poseidon whatever he should first meet on his landing, if the god would grant him a safe return. This was his own son, whom he accordingly sacrificed. As Crete was thereupon visited by a plague, the Cretans expelled Idomeneus. He went to Italy, where he settled in Calabria, and built a temple to Athene. From thence he is said to have migrated again to Colophon, on the coast of Asia. (Verg. Aen. iii. 121, 400, 531; Serv. ad loc.; Strab. p. 480.)—2. Of Lampsacus, a friend and disciple of Epicurus, flourished about B.C. 310–270. He wrote philosophical and historical works, all of which are lost. (Diog. Laërt. x. 23; Strab. p. 589; Athen. p. 532.)

Idôthêa (Ἰδοθεα), daughter of Proteus, taught Menelaus how he might secure her father, and compel him to show how he might reach home (Od. iv.).

Idriëus or Hidriëus (Ἰδριεύς, Ἰδριεύς), king of Curia, second son of Hecatomnus, succeeded to the throne on the death of Artemisia in B.C. 351. He died in 344, leaving the kingdom to his sister ADA, whom he had married. (Diod. xvi. 42, 69; Strab. p. 656.)

Idubêda (Sierra de Oca and Lorenzo), a range of mountains in Spain, forms the S. boundary of the plain of the Ebro, and runs SE. to the Mediterranean.

Idūmaea (Ἰδουμαία), is the Greek form of the scriptural name Edom, but the terms are not precisely equivalent. In the O. T., and in the time before the Babylonish captivity of the Jews, Edom is the district of Mt. Seir—that is, the mountainous region extending N. and S. from the Dead Sea to the E. head of the Red Sea. The decline of the kingdom of Judaea enabled the Edomites to extend their power to the NW. as far as Hebron, while their original territory was taken possession of by the Nabathæan Arabs. Thus the Idumæa of the later Jewish, and of the Roman, history is the S. part of Judaea, and a small portion of the N. of Arabia Petraea, extending NW. and SE. from the Mediterranean to the W. side of Mt. Seir. [For the rise of the Idumæan dynasty in Judaea see ANTIPATER, HERODES.] The Roman poets use Idumæa and Judaea as equivalent terms (Verg. Georg. iii. 12; Mart. ii. 2, 5).

Idÿia (Ἰδÿία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of the Colchian king AETES.

Iernë. [HIBERNIA.]

Iêtae (Ἰεταί: Ἰετίνοι: Jato), a town in the interior of Sicily, on a mountain of the same name, S. of Hyccara.

Igilgili (Djidjeli), a town of Mauretania on the Sinus Numidicus, and a colony under Augustus (Plin. v. 21).

Igilium (Giglio), a small island off the Etruscan coast, opposite Cosa (Caes. B.C. i. 34).

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch in A.D. 69. [Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Igüvium (Iguvinus, Iguvinas, -ätis: Gubbio or Eugubio), an important town in Umbria, on the S. slope of the Apennines. On a mountain in the neighbourhood of this town was a celebrated temple of Jupiter, in the ruins of which were discovered, A.D. 1444, seven brazen tables, covered with Umbrian inscriptions, still preserved at Gubbio. These tables, called the Eugubian Tables, contain more than 1000 Umbrian words, and are of importance for a knowledge of the ancient languages of Italy. Editions by Huschke, 1859, and Breal, 1875.

Ilaira or Hilaira (Ἰλαίρα), daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, and sister of Phoebe. The two sisters are frequently mentioned by the poets under the name of Leucippidae. Both were carried off by the Dioscuri, and Ilaira became the wife of Castor. (Paus. ii. 22, 5, iii. 16, 1.)

Ileracones, Ilercaonenses, or Illurgavonenses, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis on the W. coast between the Ibērus and M. Idubēda. Their chief town was DERTOSA.

Ilerda (Lerida), a town of Illergētes in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a height above the river Sicoris (Segre), which was here crossed by a stone bridge. It was afterwards a Roman colony, but in the time of Ausonius had ceased to be a place of importance (Ep. xxv. 59.) Here Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, were defeated by Caesar (B.C. 49). (Caes. B. C. i. 41–45; Hor. Ep. i. 13, 20; Lucan, iv. 144.)

Ilergētes, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees.

Illa or Rhea Silvia. [ROMULUS.]

Ilīci or Illice (Elche), a town of the Contestani on the E. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Carthago Nova to Valentia, was a colonia immunis (Ptol. ii. 6, 62; Plin. iii. 19).

Ilienses, an ancient people in SARDINIA.

Iliōns (Ἰλιόνη), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Polymnestor or Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whom she bore a son, Deipylus. At the beginning of the Trojan war her brother Polydorus was intrusted to her care, and she brought him up as her own son. For details see POLYDORUS. Iliona was the name of one of the tragedies of Pacuvius. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 61.)

Iliōneus (Ἰλιονεύς), a son of Niobe, whom Apollo would have liked to save, because he was praying; but the arrow was no longer under the control of the god. [NIOBE.]

Ilipta (Pennaflor), a town in Hispania Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis (Strab. p. 141).

Iliissus (Ἰλισσός, more rarely Ελισσός), a small river in Attica, rises on the N. slope of Mt. Hymettus, flows on the E. and S. of Athens and joins the Cephissus. Except after heavy rain it is nearly dry, as its waters are drawn off to supply the city.

Ilithyia (Ἐλεῖθυια), also called Elithyia, Pethyia, or Eleutho, was the impersonation of the pain or (in the plural) of the pains of childbirth, and therefore, in the development of the myth, was worshipped independently as the goddess who came to the assistance of women in labour. When she was kindly disposed, she furthered the birth; but when she was angry, she protracted the labour. In Il. xix. 119, the Ἐλεῖθυια appear to have no personality, but in Il. xi. 271, they are called the daughters of Hera: in Hes. Th. 922, the daughters of Zeus and Hera (cf. Pind. Nem. vii. 2; Apollod. i. 3, 1). But as all moon-goddesses had influence over birth, so Ilithyia is found in one myth connected, and at times identified, with Hera, in another with Artemis. Thus she is not always spoken of as the daughter of Hera, but is worshipped as Hera-Ilithyia and as Artemis-Ilithyia (cf. Juno-Lucina). For the same reason she was in some places identified with Aphrodite, who in one of her aspects was a moon-goddess; and this explains the story (perhaps Lyeian) in Olen's Delian hymn that she was the mother of Eros (Paus. i. 18, 5, ix. 27, 2). According to the Cretan legend Ilithyia was believed to have been born in a cave in the territory of Cnossus. From thence her worship spread over Delos and Attica. (Od. xix. 188; Strab. p. 476; Diod. v. 92.) According to a Delian tradition Ilithyia was not born in Crete, but had come to Delos from the Hyperboreans, for the purpose of assisting Leto (Paus. i. 18, 5). Her connexion with the Fates (Pind. Ol. vi. 42, Nem. vii. 1) is due to the idea that the Fates also had control over the birth of a child [see also HORAE].

Ilium. [TROAS.]

Illibēris (Ἰλλίβερῖς). 1. (Tech), called Tichis or Techum by the Romans, a river in Gallia Narbonensis in the territory of the Sardones, rises in the Pyrenees and falls, after a short course, into the Mare Gallicum (Strab. p. 182).

—2. (Elne), a town of the Santones, on the above-mentioned river, at the foot of the Pyrenees, was originally a place of importance, but afterwards insignificant. It was restored by Constantine, who changed its name into Helēna, whence the modern Elne. (Liv. xxi. 24.)

Illiturgis or Illiturgi (Andujar), an important town of the Turduli in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a steep rock near the Baetis, and on the road from Corduba to Castulo; destroyed by Scipio B.C. 210, but rebuilt, and received the name of Forum Julium (Liv. xxviii. 19, xxxiv. 10; Plin. iii. 10).

Illyricum or Illyris, more rarely Illyria (τὸ Ἰλλυρικόν, Ἰλλυρίς, Ἰλλυρία), included, in its widest signification, all the land W. of Macedonia and E. of Italy and Rhaetia, extending S. as far as Epirus, and N. as far as the valleys of the Savus and Dravus, and the junction of these rivers with the Danube. The wide extent of country was inhabited by numerous Illyrian tribes, all of whom were more or less barbarous. They were probably of the same origin as the Thracians, but some Celts were mingled with them. The country was divided into two parts: 1. Illyris Barbara or Romana, the Roman province of Illyricum, extended along the Adriatic sea from Italy (Istria), from which it was separated by the Arsia, to the river Drilon, and was bounded on the E. by Macedonia and Moesia Superior, from which it was separated by the Drinus, and on the N. by Pamonia, from which it was separated by the Dravus. It thus comprehended a part of the modern Croatia, the whole of Dalmatia, almost the whole of Bosnia, and a part of Albania. It was divided in ancient times into three districts, according to the tribes by which it was inhabited:—Iapydia, the interior of the country on the N., from the Arsia to the Tedanius [IAPYDES]; Liburnia, along the coast from the Arsia to the Titius [LIBURNI]; and Dalmatia, S. of Liburnia, along the coast from the Titius to the Drilon. [DALMATIA.] The Liburnians submitted at an early time to the Romans; but it was not till after the conquest of the Dalmatians in the reign of Augustus, that the entire country was organised as a Roman province. From this time the Illyrians, and especially the Dalmatians, formed an important part of the Roman legions.—2. Illyris Graeca, or Illyria proper, also called Epirus Nova, extended from the Drilon along the Adriatic, to the Ceraunian mountains, which separated it from Epirus proper: it was bounded on the E. by Macedonia. It thus embraced the greater part of the modern Albania. It was a mountainous country, but possessed some fertile land on the coast. Its principal rivers were the Aous, APSUS, GENUSUS, and PANYASUS. In the interior was an important lake, the LYCHNITIS. On the coast there were the Greek colonies of Epidamnus, afterwards DYRRHACHIUM, and APOLLONIA. It was at these places that the celebrated Via Egnatia commenced, which ran through Macedonia to Byzantium. The country was inhabited by various tribes, ATINTANES, TAULANTI, PARTHINI, DASSARETAE, &c. In early times they were troublesome and dangerous neighbours to the Macedonian kings. They were subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who defeated and slew in battle their king Bardylis, B.C. 359. After the death of Alexander the Great, most of the Illyrian tribes recovered their independence. At a later time the injury which the Roman trade suffered from their piracies brought against them the arms of the republic. The forces of their queen Teuta were easily defeated by the Romans, and she was obliged to purchase peace by the surrender of part of her dominions and the payment of an annual tribute, 229. The second Illyrian war was finished by the Romans with the same ease. It was begun by Demetrius of Pharos, who was guardian of Pineus, the son of Agron, but he was conquered by the consul Aemilius Paulus, 219 (Pol. ii. 12, iii. 16-19). Pineus was succeeded by Pleuratus, who cultivated friendly relations with the Romans. His son Gentius formed an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia, against Rome; but he was conquered by the praetor L. Anicius, in the same year as Perseus, 168; whereupon Illyria, as well as Macedonia, became subject to Rome. (Liv. xlv. 26.)—In the new division of the empire under Constantine, Illyricum formed one of the great provinces of the empire. It was divided into Illyricum Occidentale, which included Illyricum proper, Pannonia, and Noricum, and Illyricum Orientale, which comprehended Dacia, Moesia, Macedonia, and Thrace.

Ilus (Ἴλος). 1. Son of Dardanus by Batea, the daughter of Tencer. Ius died without issue, and left his kingdom to his brother, Erichthonius (Apollod. iii. 12, 2).—2. Son of Tros and Callirhoë, grandson of Erichthonius, and great-grandson of Dardanus; whence he is called Dardanides (Il. xi. 372). He was the father of Laomedon and the grandfather of Priam. He was believed to be the founder of Troy (Il. xx. 232, 236), regarding which Apollodorus tells that, when he had won a wrestling prize at the court of the king of Phrygia, the king gave him a cow, and the oracle having declared that where the cow lay down the city should be built, the site of Troy was thus determined. When he asked for yet another sign, Zeus gave him the palladium, a statue of three cubits high, with its feet close together, holding a spear in its right hand, and a distaff in its left, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, the city should be safe. The tomb of Ius was shown in the neighbourhood of Troy (Il. x. 415, xxiv. 349; Theocr. xvi. 75).—3. Son of Mermerus, and grandson of Jason and Medea. He lived at Ephyra, between Elis and Olympia; and when Odysseus came to fetch the poison for his arrows, Ius refused it, from fear of the vengeance of the gods (Od. i. 259; Strab. p. 338).

Ilva. [ÆTHALIA.]

Ilvâtes, a people in Liguria, S. of the Po, in Montferrat (Liv. xxx. 10, xxxi. 29).

Imachâra (Imacharensis: Troina), a town in Sicily, in the Heraean mountains (Cic. Verr. iii. 18, 42).

Imâus (τὸ Ἰμαόν ὄρος), the name of a great mountain range of Asia, is one of those terms which the ancient geographers appear to have used indefinitely, for want of exact knowledge. In its most definite application, it appears to mean the W. part of the Himalaya, between the Paropamisus and the Emodi Montes; but when it is applied to some great chain, extending much further to the N. and dividing Scythia into two parts, Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum, it must be understood to mean either the Moussour or Altai mountains, or else some imaginary range. (Strab. pp. 129, 689; Ptol. vi. 14, 1.)

Imbrâsus (Ἰμβρασιός), a river in Samos, formerly called Parthenius, flowing into the sea not far from the city of Samos. The celebrated temple of Hera (Ἥραιον) stood near it, and it gave the epithet of Imbrasia both to Hera and to Artemis. (Strab. p. 637.)

Imbros (Ἰμβρος: Ἰμβριος: Embros or Imbrus), an island in the N. of the Aegæan sea, near the Thracian Chersonesus, about 18 miles SE. of Samothrace, and about 22 NE. of Lemnos. It is about 25 miles in circumference, and is hilly, but contains many fertile valleys. (Il. xiii. 33, xiv. 281, xxiv. 78; Plin. iv. 72.) Imbros, like Samothrace, was in ancient times one of the chief seats of the worship of the Cabiri. There was a town of the same name on the E. of the island, of which there are still some ruins.

Inâchis (Ἰναχίς), a surname of Io, the daughter of Inachus. The goddess Isis is also called Inachie, because she was identified with Io.—Inachides in the same way was used as a name of Epuphus, a grandson of Inachus, and also of Perseus, because he was born at Argos, the city of Inachus.

Inâchus (Ἰναχός), son of Oceanus and Tethys (Aesch. Pr. 636; Dionys. i. 25), and father of Phoroneus and Aegialeus, to whom others add Io, Argos Panoptes, and Pegeus or Pegeus (Apollod. ii. 1; Hyg. Fab. 143, 145; Ov. Met. i. 583; Serv. ad Georg. iii. 153). He was the first king and the most ancient hero of Argos, whence the country is frequently called the land of Inachus; and he is said to have given his name to the river Inachus (Paus. ii. 15, 4; Hor. Od. ii. 3, 2, iii. 19, 1). In the dispute for the possession of Argos between Poseidon and Hera, Inachus decided in favour of Hera, and Poseidon therefore caused the river Inachus to be dry except in the rainy season. In this story Inachus is the river-god and his son Phoroneus is the founder of Argos (Paus. ii. 15, 4). Another story makes him gather the inhabitants of Argos in their plain after the cessation of the great flood of Deucalion (Schol. ad Eur. Orest. 932).

Inâchus (Ἰναχός). 1. (Banitzza), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the mountain Lyrceus on the borders of Arcadia, flows in a south-easterly direction, receives near Argos the Charadus, and falls into the Sinus Argolicus S. of Argos (Strab. pp. 271, 387).—2. A river in Acarnania, which rises in Mt. Lacmon in the range of Pindus, and falls into the Achelous (Strab. p. 316).

Inârîmê. [ÆENARIA.]

Inâros (Ἰναρος, occasionally Ἰναπος), son of Psammitichus, a chief of some Libyan tribes to the W. of Egypt, commenced hostilities against the Persians, which ended in a revolt of the whole of Egypt, B. C. 461. In 460 Inaros called in the Athenians, who, with a fleet of 200 galleys, were then off Cyprus: the ships sailed up to Memphis, and, occupying two parts of the town, besieged the third. In the same year Inaros defeated the Persians in a great battle, in which Achaemenes, the brother of the king Artaxerxes, was slain. But a new army, under a new commander, Megabyzus, was more successful. The Egyptians and their allies were defeated; and Inaros was taken by treachery and crucified, 455. (Thuc. i. 104, 110; Hdt. iii. 12, 15.)

India (ἡ Ἰνδία: Ἰνδός, Indus), was a name used by the Greeks and Romans to describe the whole of the SE. part of Asia, to the E., S., and SE. of the great ranges of mountains now called the Suleiman and Himalaya Mountains, including the two peninsulas of Hindustan, and of Burmah, Cochin-China, Siam, and Malacca, and also the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There is evidence that commercial intercourse was carried on from a very early time between the W. coast of Hindustan and the W. parts of Asia, by the way of the Persian Gulf, the Euphrates, and across the Syrian Desert to Phoenicia, and also by way of the Red Sea and Idumaea, both to Egypt and to Phoenicia; and so on from Phoenicia to Asia Minor and Europe. The direct acquaintance of the western nations with India dates from the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, who added to the Persian empire a part of its NW. regions, perhaps only as far as the Indus, certainly not beyond the limits of the Punjab; and the slight knowledge of the country thus obtained by the Persians was conveyed to the Greeks through the inquiries of travellers, especially Herodotus, and afterwards by those Greeks who resided for some time in the Persian empire, such as CTESIUS, who wrote a special work on India (Ἰνδικά), of which fragments only remain. The expedition of ALEXANDER into India first brought the Greeks into actual contact with the country; but the conquests of Alexander only extended within Seinde, and the Punjab, as far as the river HYPHISIS, down which he sailed into the Indus, and down the Indus to the sea. The Greek king of Syria, Seleucus Nicator, crossed the Hyphasis, and made war with the Prsiai, a people dwelling on the banks of the upper Ganges, to whom he afterwards sent ambassadors, named Megasthenes and Daimachus, who lived for several years at Palibothra, the capital of the Prsiai, and had thus opportunity of obtaining much information respecting the parts of India about the Ganges. (Strab. pp. 70, 724; Athen. p. 67.) Megasthenes composed a work on India, which appears to have been the chief source of all the accurate information contained in the works of later writers. After the death of Seleucus Nicator, B. C. 281, the direct intercourse of the western nations with India, except in the way of commerce, ceased almost entirely. Meanwhile, the foundation of Alexandria had created an extensive commerce between India and the West, by way of the Indian Ocean, the Red Sea, and Egypt, which made the Greeks better acquainted with the W. coast of the peninsula, and extended their knowledge further into the eastern seas; but the information they thus obtained of the countries beyond Cape Comorin was extremely vague and scanty. Another channel of information, however, was opened, during this period, by the establishment of the Greek kingdom of Bactria, which included part of N. India. The later geographers made two great divisions of India, which are separated by the Ganges, and are called India intra Gangem (the peninsula of Hindustan), and India extra Gangem (the Burmese peninsula). They were acquainted with the division of the people of Hindustan into castes, of which they enumerate seven. (For this and other customs, see Strab. pp. 699-717; Arrian, Ind. 3-16.)

Indibilis and Mandonius, two brothers, and chiefs of the Spanish tribe of the Ibergetes during the second Punic war. For some years they were faithful allies of the Carthaginians; but in consequence of the generous treatment which the wife of Mandonius and the daughters of Indibilis received from P. Scipio, the two brothers deserted the Carthaginian cause, and joined Scipio in 209 with all the forces of their nation. (Pol. ix. 11, x. 18-40; Liv. xxvi. 49, xxvii. 17.) But in 206 the illness and reported death of Scipio gave them hopes of shaking off the yoke of Rome, and they excited a general revolt among their own subjects and among Celtiberian tribes. They were defeated by Scipio, and pardoned. (Pol. xi. 26-33; Liv. xxviii. 24-34.) But when Scipio left Spain in the next year (205), they again revolted. The Roman generals marched against them; Indibilis was slain in battle, and Mandonius was taken soon afterwards and put to death (Liv. xxix. 1; Appian, Hisp. 38).

Indicetae or Indigetes, a people in the NE. corner of Hispania Tarraconensis, close upon the Pyrenees. Their chief town was EMPORIUM.

Indicus Océanus. [ERYTHRAEUM MARE.]

Indigētes, Indigitamenta. In literature the Dii Indigetes appear to be the genuine deities of Italy who are regarded as the national defenders (Verg. Georg. i. 498; Ov. Met. xv. 861; Lucan, i. 556): they are the older dii patrii opposed to the dii novensiles or deities of foreign origin and later introduction (Liv. viii. 9). Thus Claudian (Bell. Gild. 128) distinguishes them from those gods 'quos Roma recepit, aut dedit ipsa'—that is, from those borrowed from abroad or lately created. Hence arose the practice of regarding the indigetes often as deified heroes of the country, who had once been kings (like Romulus-Quirinus) or warriors (Serv. ad Aen. xii. 794): thus Aeneas on being identified with a local deity of the river Numicus, known as Jupiter Indiges (Liv. i. 2; Verg. Aen. xii. 794), was called Aeneas Indiges; but the title must have been given him after the Greek influence had affected the Roman mythology. All these conceptions of the dii indigetes are connected with the common derivation from in or indu and gigno, which takes the word as = indigena (native to the country) and equivalent to θεός or ἦρως ἐγγήριος. But the original meaning is with more probability derived from indu-agere, and strictly meant those deities who had a special and limited part to play in the lives and actions of men: all those whose names, with the occasions for invoking them, were included in the priestly books called indigitamenta. (Some prefer to derive indigitamenta, and consequently also indiges, from a word indigere, connected with arare, meaning to invoke or pray to.) There is a difference of opinion as to precisely what Beings were included in these books. Varro (whose statements in the Antiquitates Rerum Divinarum are mainly preserved by Tertullian and Augustine) distinguished dii certi as those who had fixed limited functions for particular occasions, and dii incerti as deities of general power not thus limited or defined; and some have thought that the deities included in the indigitamenta were merely the dii certi. But it is clear that many of the greater deities with manifold functions were included in the list of dii certi so far as a particular function was in question—e.g. Juno Lucina as goddess of childbirth; and again some distinctly Greek deities were included, as Apollo Medicus or Aesculapius, in whom healing was the function defined; yet if these were true, indigetes, how could the idea have arisen that they were dii patrii as opposed to novensiles? Hence there is probability in the most recent view, that the dii indigetes were originally those deities of ancient Italy watching over various operations of life, whose actions are fixed and expressed for each one by their names—i.e. they were personifications of the action, occasion, or thing. Being thus deities 'quibus rerum exigurum singulis singula distribuuntur' (August. C. D. vi. 1), they were sometimes called 'dii minuti' (cf. Plant. Cist. ii. 1, 45). These deities expressed a superstition, which there is reason to believe is still more or less unconsciously retained, of attaching influence for luck to certain places, or even to certain articles of dress or equipment: with this difference, that it was a matter of religion in the Roman, and that each separate thing had its own personal deity to whom prayer for a prosperous action or use was made. A difference may be noticed between the Greek and Roman religions, that the Greek tended to centralisation, to gathering a number of attributes and functions originally belonging to separate or local deities, and ascribing them to a single greater deity, whereas the Romans (as far as they preserved their own ritual) retained the converse system of imagining a separate deity for each function. In this way 'nomina numinibus ex officiis constat imposita; ut ab occasione deus Occator dicitur, a sarritione Sarritor, a stercoreatione Sterculinius, a satioue Sator' (Varro, ap. Serv. ad Georg. i. 21). In matters referring to life a long line of deities is conceived for the needs of each stage from birth to death. Thus Parca (a pariundo) was the deity who made the birth propitious or otherwise, and the being born right and straight with no deformities depended on Antevorta and Porrina, Postvorta or Prosa (Varro, ap. Gell. xvi. 16, 4); another view took these as deities who regarded destiny with knowledge of future and of past (Ov. Fast. i. 633); Rumina watched the suckling of the child; Levana its uplifting or adoption by its father; Nundina its ninth or name-day; Alimona, Edusa, and Potina its nourishment; Abeona, Adeona, Iterduca its learning to walk and its guidance through life; Cuba and Cunina its cradling; Farinus the power of speech; Mutunus Tutunus the fruitful marriage; Picumnus and Pilumnus the protection of the marriage and of the new-born children; Viriplaca the agreement of husband and wife; Nenia the funeral rites. Again, all the actions and businesses of life had their abstract deities whose names it would be unlucky to neglect, such as Agonius, who presided over business actions; Aescolanus, Argentinus, and Arculus, who had to do with copper and silver money and the money-box; Vica Pota, the deity of success and victorious action, who had a sanctuary near the Velia (Liv. ii. 7; Plut. Publ. 10; Cic. Legg. ii. 11, 28). And for agriculture each operation had its divinity—e.g. Semonia and Segesta for sowing; Panda or Patella for opening the earth to the sprouting seed; Sterculinius for manuring; Messia for harvesting. Lastly, there were a few added within historical times for special occasions, as Aius Locutius, for the warning of invasion of the Gauls (Liv. v. 50; Gell. xvi. 17), and Rediculus, for turning Hannibal back from Rome in 211 B.C. (Plin. x. 122).

Indus or Sindus (Ἰνδός: Indus, Sind), a great river of India. The earliest mention in Greek literature is in Hecataeus (Fr. 114). Herodotus (iv. 44) has some knowledge of its character and of its position in the far East, which he derived from Scylax. It rises in the table land of Thibet, N. of the Himalaya mountains, flows nearly parallel to the great bend of that chain on its N. side, till it breaks through the chain a little E. of Attock, in the NW. corner of the Punjab, and then flows SW. through the great plain of the Punjab, into the Erythraean Mare (Indian Ocean), which it enters by several mouths—two according to the earlier Greek writers, six according to the later. (Arrian, An. v. 6, Ind. 2; Ptol. vii. 1, 28; Strab. p. 690.) Its chief tributaries are the Cophen (Cabul), which enters it from the NW. at Attock, and the Acesines on the E. side. [HYPHESIS.]

Indus (Ἰνδός: Dollomon-Chai), a river of Asia Minor, rising in the SW. of Phrygia, and flowing through the district of Cibyrtis and the SE. of Caria into the Mediterranean, opposite to Rhodes (Liv. xxxviii. 14; Plin. v. 103).

Indutiomārus, or Induciomārus, one of the chiefs of the Treviri in Gaul. As he was opposed to the Romans, Caesar induced the leading men of the nation to side with Cingetorix, the rival of Indutiomarus, B.C. 54. Indutiomarus took up arms against the Romans, but was defeated and slain by Labienuus. (Caes. B. G. v. 53–58.)

Infēri, the gods of the Nether World, in contradistinction from the Superi, or the gods of heaven. In Greek the Inferi are called οἱ χθόνιοι. [CHTHONIUS.] Among the dii inferi were reckoned those who were supposed to control the lower world, as Dis Pater, Proserpina, Libera; or were connected with the dead, as Mania, Larunda, Avia Larvarum; or with the earth and its fruits (of whom some were in other aspects Superi), as Tellus, Saturnus, Ceres. Hence the devotio or consecratio inferis (or Dis Manibus et Telluri, &c.) meant that the living persons so devoted were given over to the power of the gods of the underworld (cf. Liv. viii. 9; Macrob. Sat. iii. 9, 10). But the word Inferi is also frequently used to designate the dead, in contradistinction from those living upon the earth; so that apud inferos is equivalent to 'in Hades,' or 'in the lower world.' [See LARVAE, LEMURES, MANES, ORCUS, HADES, ELYSIUM.]

Infērum Mare, called also Tuscum or Tyrrenum, was the sea between the islands of Corsica and Sardinia and the west coast of Italy extending southwards to Sicily. It was so called in distinction to Saperum Mare—i.e. the Adriatic.

Ingaevōnes, a name which some authorities gave to the tribes on the sea-coast of Germany (Tac. Germ. 2).

Ingauni, a people in Liguria on the coast, whose chief town was ALBIUM INGAUNUM.

Ingenūus, one of the Thirty Tyrants, was governor of Pannonia when Valerian set out against the Persians, A.D. 258. He assumed the purple in his province, but was defeated and slain by Gallienus. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyr.; Zonar. xii. 24.)

Ino (Ἰνώ), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and wife of Athamas. For details see ATHAMAS.

Inōus, a name both of Melicertes and of Palaemon, because they were the sons of Ino.

Insubres, a Gallic people, who crossed the Alps and settled in Gallia Transpadana in the N. of Italy. Their chief town was MEDIOLANUM. Next to the Boii, they were the most powerful of the Gallic tribes in Cisalpine Gaul. They were conquered by the Romans, shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war, but friendly to Hannibal when he descended into Italy. (Pol. ii. 17; Liv. xxi. 25, 39, 45.)

Intaphernes (Ἰνταφέρνης), one of the seven conspirators against the Magi, B.C. 522. He was put to death by Darius. (Hdt. iii. 70-119.)

Intēmēlli, a people in Liguria in the coast, whose chief town was ALBIUM INTEMELIUM.

Interamna (Interannas), the name of several towns in Italy, so called from their lying between two streams. 1. (Terni), an ancient municipium in Umbria, situated on the Nar, and surrounded by a canal flowing into this river, whence its inhabitants were called Interannates Nartes. It was the birthplace of the historian Tacitus, as well as of the emperor of the same name. (Plin. iii. 114.)—2. A town in Latium on the Via Latina, and at the junction of the Casinus with the Liris, whence its inhabitants are called Interannates Lirinates. It was made a Roman colony, B.C. 312, but subsequently sank into insignificance. (Liv. ix. 28; Plin. iii. 64.)

Intercatia, a town of the VACCAEI in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Caesaraugusta.

Intercisa or Petra Pertusa, a post-station in Umbria, so called because the Via Flaminia was here cut through the rocks by order of Vespasian. An ancient inscription on the spot still commemorates this work. (Vict. Caes. 9; Procop. B. G. ii. 11.)

Internum Mare, the Mediterranean Sea, extended on the W. from the Straits of Hercules to the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor on the E. In the NE. it was usually supposed to terminate at the Hellespont. From the Straits of Hercules to the furthest shores of Syria it is 2000 miles in length; and, including the islands, it occupies an area of 734,000 square miles. (Strab. pp. 51-54.) It was called by the Romans Mare Internum or Intestinum; by the Greeks ἡ ἑσω θάλαττα or ἡ ἐντὸς θάλαττα, or, more fully, ἡ ἐντὸς Ἡρακλείων σπηλαίων θάλαττα: and from its washing the coasts both of Greeco and Italy, it was also called both by Greeks and Romans Our Sea (ἡ ἡμετέρα θάλαττα, ἡ καθ' ἡμᾶς θάλαττα, Mare Nostrum). (Mel. i. 1, 4; Plin. iii. 8; Sall. Jug. 17; Plat. Phaed. p. 109 B; Pol. iii. 39; Strab. p. 121; Arist. Met. ii. 1; Caes. B. G. v. 1.) The term Mare Mediterraneum is not used by the best classical writers, and occurs first in Solinus. The ebb and flow of the tide are perceptible in only a few parts of the Mediterranean, such as in the Syrtis on the coast of Africa, in the Adriatic, &c. The different parts of the Mediterranean are called by different names. See MARE TYRRHENUM or INFERUM, ADRIA or M. ADRIATICUM or M. SUPERUM, M. SICULUM, M. AEGAEUM, &c.

Intibili, a town of Hispania Baetica, near Illiturgis (Liv. xxiii. 49).

Inui Castrum, a city of Latium (Verg. Aen. vi. 776), on the coast between Antium and Janinium (Ov. Met. xv. 727; Sil. It. viii. 361).

Inuus, an old Italian deity of the increase in flocks and herds, in reality merely another name of Faunus or Lupercus (Liv. i. 5; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 775; Macrob. i. 22). He was specially worshipped in old times at Castrum Inui.

Inyēcum (Ἰνυκόν), a town in the S. of Sicily, near Selinus, on the Hypsas (Hdt. vi. 23; Paus. vi. 4, 6).

Io (Ἰώ), daughter of Inachus, the first king of Argos, or, according to others, of Iasus or Piren. Zeus loved Io, but on account of Hera's jealousy, he metamorphosed her into a white heifer (Apollod. ii. 1, 3; Hyg. Fab. 145). The goddess, who was aware of the change, obtained the heifer from Zeus, and placed her under the care of Argus Panoptes. According to the story which Aeschylus follows, it was Hera who changed Io into a cow; and this also was implied by the representation on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae (Aesch. Suppl. 299; Paus. iii. 18, 13). Zeus sent Hermes to slay Argus and deliver Io. [ARGUS.] It is a disputed point whether this act is signified by the epithet Ἀργεϊφόντης. [See HERMES, p. 405, b.] Hera then tormented Io with a gad-fly, and drove her in a state of frenzy from land to land over the whole earth, until at length she found rest on the banks of the Nile. Here she recovered her original form, and bore a son to Zeus, called Epaphus. [EPAPHUS.] The wanderings of Io were celebrated in antiquity, and were extended with the increase of geographical knowledge. (Aesch. Pr. 700-815; Suppl. 540-565; Eur. I. T. 394; cf. Athen. p. 619; Lucian, Deor. Dial. 3; Strab. p. 320.) The Bosphorus is said to have derived its name from her swimming across it (Aesch. Pr. 732; Appian, Bell. Mithr. 101). An early attempt to rationalise the story is given by Herodotus (i. 1): that Io was a princess of Argos who was carried off to Egypt by Phoenicians. It has been a common interpretation that this horned Io signifies the crescent moon and Argus the starry heaven. It is more likely that Io was originally Hera herself, or, rather, that she was a deity worshipped in certain places in the shape of a cow (whether by a totemistic custom or not), whose worship was superseded by that of Hera, and who accordingly was represented as a rival transformed by Hera. It is another question whether this cow-shaped deity was originally imagined from the Egyptian Isis, or whether a Greek Io was identified with Isis, and was therefore represented as having gone to Egypt. At any rate it is likely that her wanderings were in part suggested by the Egyptian goddess, though in part they arose from local myths and also from an attempt to explain certain local names. [See also ISIS.] In art representations three periods are distinguished: in the oldest she has the form of a cow (cf. Paus. i. 25; Verg. Aen. vii. 789). In the second period (possibly to suit the representation on the stage) she is a maiden with horns (Aesch. Pr. 588; cf. Hdt. ii. 41). The change appears on vases to begin after the Persian wars, and this form may have conduced to the identification with Isis. The third period in the decadence of art reverts to the cow-form.

Iōbātes, king of Lycia. [BELLEROPHON.]

Iol. [CAESAREA, No. 4.]

Iolaenses. [IOLAUS.]

Iōlāus (Ἰόλαος), son of Iphicles and Automedusa. Iphicles was the half-brother of Hercules, and Iolaus was the faithful companion and charioteer of the hero (Hes. Sc. 74; Apollod. ii. 4, 11; Paus. viii. 14, 6). He helped Hercules to slay the Lernaean Hydra. After Hercules had instituted the Olympic games, Iolaus won the victory with the horses of his master (Paus. v. 8, 1). Hercules sent him to Sardinia at the head of his sons whom he had by the daughters of Thespians. He introduced civilisation among the inhabitants of that island, and was worshipped by them; and his descendants were the Iolauenses (Ἰωλαεῖς). This story was probably an attempt to explain the name of the native tribe so called in Sardinia, whom Strabo, p. 225, states to have been a Tyrrhenian people. (Paus. x. 17, 5; Diod. iv. 30, v. 15; SARDINIA.) From Sardinia he went to Sicily, and then returned to Heracles shortly before the death of the latter. After the death of the hero, Iolans was the first who offered sacrifices to him as a demigod. There are two stories of his aid to the children of Heracles after the death of their father. One makes him do battle for them in his natural life, and kill Eurystheus in battle (Paus. i. 44, 13; Strab. p. 377); the other (a Theban story) makes him return from the grave for these exploits; and then, after his second death, he is buried in the grave of Amphitryon (Pind. Pyth. ix. 79). In Pausanias' account he dies in Sardinia, having apparently returned there after the victory over Eurystheus, and is buried there (Paus. ix. 23, 1).

Iolcus (Ἰωλκός, Ep. Ἰαωλκός, Dor. Ἰαλκός: Ἰώλκιος; Volo), an ancient town in Magnesia in Thessaly at the top of the Pugasæan gulf, seven stadia from the sea, at the foot of Mt. Pelion. It is said to have been founded by Cretheus, and to have been colonised by Minyans from Orchomenus. It was celebrated in mythology as the residence of Pelias and Jason, and as the place from which the Argonauts sailed in quest of the golden fleece. [ARGONAUTAE; JASON.] The Thessalians offered it to Hippias when he was driven out from Athens (Hdt. v. 94). Its inhabitants were removed to the neighbouring town of Demetrias, which was founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and the old town went to ruin. (Il. ii. 712; Od. xi. 256; Strab. pp. 414, 436, 438.)

Iōlê (Ἰόλη), daughter of Eurytus of Oechalia, was beloved by Heracles. For details see p. 400. After the death of Heracles, she married his son Hyllus.

Iollas or Iolâus (Ἰόλλας or Ἰόλαος). 1. Son of Antipater, and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He was cup-bearer to Alexander at the period of his last illness. Those writers who adopt the idea of the king having been poisoned, represent Iollas as the person who actually administered the fatal draught. This accusation was undoubtedly false, and was originated six years later by Olympias as a pretext for oppressing the adherents of Antipater. She then caused the grave of Iollas to be desecrated. (Plut. Alex. 77; Diod. ix. 11; Arrian, An. vii. 27; Curt. x. 10, 14; Just. xii. 14; Vitruv. viii. 3, 16).—2. Of Bithynia, a writer on Materia Medica, flourished in the third century B.C.

Ion (Ἴων). 1. The mythical ancestor of the Ionians, was the son of XUTHUS and CREUSA, the daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens (Hdt. vii. 94, viii. 44). When Xuthus had been driven from Athens he settled at Aegialus (the N. coast of Peloponnesus), and died there. One of his two sons, Achæus, took possession of the ancestral home in Thessaly, but Ion raised an army against Selinus, king of Aegialus. Selinus came to terms by giving him his daughter in marriage and making him his heir. When the Eleusinians and Eumolpus were at war with Athens the Athenians asked aid from Ion, and made him their general. He won the victory for them, died in Attica, and was buried at Potamus, near Prasinae (Paus. i. 31, 3; Strab. p. 383). The four Attic tribes were called after the four sons of Ion, Geleon, Aegicores, Argades and Hoples (Hdt. v. 66). In Strabo's account he eventually becomes king of Athens; but in Herodotus (viii. 44) he is only commander of their army. The Attic story, which through the Ion of Euripides has become the best known version, alters the genealogy in order to make Apollo Patrons the ancestor of the Ionians as well as their protector. Ion is therefore the son of Apollo, not of Xuthus. Apollo had visited Creusa in a cave below the Propylæa, at Athens, and when she gave birth to a son, she exposed him in the same cave. The god, however, had the child conveyed to Delphi, where he was educated by a priestess. Many years afterwards Xuthus and Creusa came to consult the oracle about the means of obtaining an heir. They received for answer that the first human being whom Xuthus met on leaving the temple should be his son. Xuthus met Ion, and acknowledged him as his son; but Creusa, imagining him to be a son of her husband by a former mistress, caused a poisoned cup to be presented to the youth. However, her object was discovered, for as Ion, before drinking, poured out a libation to the gods, a pigeon which drank of it died on the spot. Creusa thereupon fled to the altar of the god. Ion dragged her away, and was on the point of killing her, when a priestess interfered, explained the mystery, and showed that Ion was the son of Creusa. Mother and son thus became reconciled, but Xuthus was not let into the secret, and Ion was declared the heir of Xuthus and Creusa and the destined founder of the Ionic race. (Eur. Ion. This was probably the version followed also in the Creusa of Sophocles.)—2. A poet of Chios, was son of Orthomenes. He went to Athens when young, and there enjoyed the society of Aeschylus and Cimon. He began to produce tragedies on the Athenian stage in 452, and won the third prize in 428, when Euripides won the first and Iophon the second. He died before 418. (Aristoph. Pax, 835). The number of his tragedies is variously stated at twelve, thirty, and forty. We have the titles and a few fragments of eleven. Ion also wrote elegies, dithyrambs, and a history of Chios. (Strab. p. 645; Schol. ad Ar. Pax, 830; Plut. Cim. 5; Athen. pp. 3, 436.)—3. Of Ephesus, a rhapsodist in the time of Socrates, from whom one of Plato's dialogues is named.

Iōniā (Ἰωνία; Ἴωνες) and Iōnis (Rom. poet.), a district on the W. coast of Asia Minor, so called from the Ionian Greeks who colonised it at a time earlier than any distinct historical records. At a still earlier time the Ionian branch of the Hellenic race was in possession of Attica (and apparently of Eubœa). Some of the Ionians from Attica occupied the S. coast of the Corinthian gulf, but were afterwards driven back into Attica by the Achæans. The mythical account of 'the great Ionic migration' relates that in consequence of the disputes between the sons of Codrus, king of Athens, about the succession to his government, his younger sons, Neleus and Androclus, resolved to seek a new home beyond the Aegæan sea. Attica was at the time overpeopled, partly owing to the return of those whom the Achæans expelled from Achæa, and still more by the more recent expulsion of Ionians from Epidaurus, Troezen, and Phlius by the Dorian invaders. A large portion of this superfluous population went forth as Athenian colonists, under the leadership of Androclus and Neleus, joined by emigrants of other tribes, Cadmeans, Euboeans, Phocians, and Pylians, and settled on that part of the W. shores of Asia Minor which formed the coast of Lydia and part of Caria, and also in the adjacent islands of Chios and Samos, and in the Cyclades. (Hdt. i. 142-146; Paus. vii. 2; Strab. p. 632.) It may safely be assumed that this migration and conquest was not the result of a single expedition, but extended over several years, and probably more than one generation. It is likely that the migrating Ionians drove out the Carians from the Cyclades, before they went on to conquer the coast of Asia Minor. The great cities of Miletus and Ephesus were wrested by them from the Carians and the Leleges, and several towns were newly founded. The date of the migration, or successive migrations, cannot be accurately fixed. The movement probably took place soon after the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus, and may even have begun a little earlier. It may therefore be roughly dated at about 1000 B.C. The earliest authentic records show us the existence of twelve great cities on the above-named coast, all united into one confederacy. The district they possessed formed a narrow strip of coast, extending between, and somewhat beyond, the mouths of the rivers Maeander, on the S., and Hermus, on the N. The names of the twelve cities, going from S. to N., were MILETUS, MYUS, PRIENE, SAMOS (city and island), EPHEBUS, COLOPHON, LEBEDUS, TEOS, ERYTHRAE, CHIOS (city and island), CLAZOMENAE, and PHOCAEA; the first three on the coast of Caria, the rest on that of Lydia: the city of Smyrna, which lay within this district, but was of Aeolic origin, was afterwards (about B.C. 700) added to the Ionian confederacy. The common sanctuary of the league was the Panionium (πανιώνιον), a sanctuary of Poseidon Heliconius, on the N. side of the promontory of Mycale, opposite to Samos; and here was held the great national assembly (πανήγυρις) of the confederacy, called Panionia (πανιώνια: see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.). It is important to observe that the inhabitants of these cities were not exclusively of Ionian descent. The traditions of the original colonisation and the accounts of the historians agree in representing them as peopled by a great mixture, not only of Hellenic races, but also of these with the earlier inhabitants—such as Carians, Leleges, Lydians, Cretans, and Pelasgians—and with differences of dialect. The religious rites, also, which the Greeks of Ionia observed, in addition to their national worship of Poseidon, were borrowed in part from the native peoples; such were the worship of Apollo Didymaeus at Branchidae near Miletus, of Artemis at Ephesus, and of Apollo Clarius at Colophon. The central position of this district, its excellent harbours, and the fertility of its plains, watered by the Maeander, the Cayster, and the Hermus, combined with the energetic character of the Ionian race to confer prosperity upon these cities; and it was not long before they began to send forth colonies to many places on the shores of the Mediterranean and the Euxine, and even to Greece itself. During the rise of the Lydian empire, the cities of Ionia preserved their independence until the reign of Croesus, who subdued those on the mainland, but relinquished his design of attacking the islands. When Cyrus had overthrown Croesus, he sent his general Harpagus to complete the conquest of the Ionic Greeks, B.C. 545. Under the Persian rule, they retained their political organisation, subject to the government of the Persian satraps, and of tyrants who were set up in single cities, but they were required to render tribute and military service to the king. In B.C. 500 they revolted from Darius Hystaspis, under the leadership of HISTIAEUS, the former tyrant of Miletus, and his brother-in-law ARISTAGORAS, and supported by aid from the Athenians. The Ionian army advanced as far as Sardis, which they took and burnt, but they were driven back to the coast, and defeated near Ephesus B.C. 499. The reconquest of Ionia by the Persians was completed by the taking of Miletus, in 496, and the Ionians were compelled to furnish ships, and to serve as soldiers, in the two expeditions against Greece. After the defeat of Xerxes, the Greeks carried the war to the coasts of Asia, and effected the liberation of Ionia by the victories of Mycale (479), and of the Eurymedon (469). In 387 the peace of Antalcidas restored Ionia to Persia; and after the Macedonian conquest, it formed part, successively, of the kingdom of Pergamum, and of the Roman province of Asia. For the history of the several cities, see the respective articles. In no country inhabited by the Hellenic race, except at Athens, were the refinements of civilisation, the arts, and literature, more highly cultivated than in Ionia. The restless energy and free spirit of the Ionic race, the riches gained by commerce, and the neighbourhood of the great seats of Asiatic civilisation, combined to advance with rapidity the intellectual progress and the social development of its people; but while the leisure afforded by their wealth tended to produce among their schools of poets and of speculative philosophers, on the other hand the same growth of wealth combined with the more enervating climate, and perhaps also with the Oriental influences in their mixed blood and association, to make the Ionians of Asia Minor softer and more luxurious than their kinsfolk in Greece. Out of the long list of the authors and artists of Ionia, we may mention the poets Mimnermus of Colophon, and Anacreon of Teos; the philosophers Thales of Miletus, and Anaxagoras of Clazomenae; the early annalists, Cadmus, Dionysius, and Hecataeus, all of Miletus; and, in the fine arts, besides being the home of that exquisitely beautiful order of architecture, the Ionic, and possessing many of the most magnificent temples in the world, Ionia was the native country of that school of painting which included Zeuxis, Apelles, and Parrhasius. Its history under the Romans belongs to that of the province of ASIA.

Ionian Mare (Ἰόνιος πόντος, Ἰόνιον πέλαγος, Ἰονίη θάλαττα, Ἰόνιος πόντος), a part of the Mediterranean Sea between Italy and Greece, was S. of the Adriatic, and began on the W. at Hydruntum in Calabria, and on the E. at Orion in Epirus, or at the Ceraunian mountains. In more ancient times the Adriatic was called Ἰόνιος μυχὸς or Ἰόνιος κόλπος (Hdt. vi. 127, vii. 20; Thuc. i. 24). But in its wider signification it is found in Polybius and Strabo (Strab. pp. 123, 316; Pol. ii. 14). Its name, mythically derived by the ancients from the wanderings of Io (Aesch. Pr. 830), came from the Ionian colonies which settled in Cephallenia and other islands off the W. coasts of Greece.

Iophon (Ἰοφῶν), son of Sophocles, by Nicostrate, was a distinguished tragic poet. He brought out tragedies during the life of his father, and was still living in B.C. 405 (Ar. Ran. 73). He won the second prize in 429, and was suspected by some of having received assistance from his father. For the story of his undutiful charge against his father, see SOPHOCLES.

Iphicles, or Iphiclus (Ἰφικλῆς, Ἰφικλος or Ἰφικλεύς). 1. Son of Amphitryon and Alcmena, was one night younger than his half-brother Heracles. He was first married to Automedusa, the daughter of Alcaothous, by whom he became the father of Iolaus, and afterwards to the youngest daughter of Creon. He accompanied Heracles on several of his expeditions, and took part in the Calydonian hunt (Apollod. i. 8, 2; Diod. iv. 48). He fell in battle against the sons of Hippocoon, or, according to another account, was wounded in the battle against the Molionidae, and was carried to Pheneus, where he died (Apollod. ii. 7, 3).—2. Son of Thestius by Laophonte or Deidamia or Enrythemis or Leucippe. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts (Ap. Rh. i. 201).—3. Son of Phylacus, and grandson of Deion and Clymene, or son of Cephalus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. He was married to Diomedea or Astyoche, and was the father of Podarces and Protesilaus. He was one of the Argonauts, possessed large herds of oxen, which he gave to the seer Melampus, and was celebrated for his swiftness in running. (Il. ii. 705, xiii. 698; Paus. iv. 36, 2; Apollod. i. 9, 12.)

Iphicrātes (Ἰφικράτης), the Athenian general, was the son of a shoemaker. He distinguished himself at an early age by his gallantry in battle; and in B. C. 394, when he was only 25 years of age, he was appointed by the Athenians to the command of the forces which they sent to the aid of the Boeotians after the battle of Coronea. In 393 he commanded the Athenian forces at Corinth, and at the same time introduced an important improvement in military tactics—the formation of a body of targeteers (πελτασταί) possessing, to a certain extent, the advantages of heavy and light-armed forces. This he effected by substituting a small target for the heavy shield, adopting a longer sword and spear, and replacing the old coat of mail by a linen corslet. At the head of his targeteers he defeated and nearly destroyed a Spartan Mora in the following year (392), an exploit which was celebrated throughout Greece (Xen. Hell. iv. 5, 8; Diod. xiv. 91; Paus. iii. 10). In the same year he was succeeded in the command at Corinth by Chabrias. In 389 he was sent to the Hellespont to oppose Anaxibius, who was defeated by him and slain in the following year. In 377 Iphicrates was sent by the Athenians, with the command of a mercenary force, to assist Pharnabazus in reducing Egypt to subjection; but the expedition failed through a misunderstanding between Iphicrates and Pharnabazus. In 373 Iphicrates was sent to Coreyra, in conjunction with Callistratus and Chabrias, in the command of an Athenian force, and he remained in the Ionian sea till the peace of 371 put an end to hostilities. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2; Diod. xv. 41–xvi. 57.) About 367, he was sent against Amphipolis, and after three years, was superseded by Timotheus. Shortly afterwards, he assisted his father-in-law, Cotys, in his war against Athens for the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus. But his conduct in this matter was passed over by the Athenians. After the death of Chabrias (357), Iphicrates, Timotheus and Menesthenes were joined with Chares as commanders in the Social war, and were prosecuted by their unscrupulous colleague, because they had refused to risk an engagement in a storm. Iphicrates was acquitted. From the period of his trial he seems to have lived quietly at Athens. He died before 348. (Diod. xvi. 21; Nep. Iphicrates.) Iphicrates has been commended for his combined prudence and energy as a general. The worst words, he said, that a commander could utter were, 'I should not have expected it' (Plut. Apoph. Iph. 2; Polyaen. iii. 9). His services were highly valued by the Athenians, and were rewarded by them with almost unprecedented honours.

Iphigēnia (Ἰφιγένεια), according to the most common tradition, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, but according to Stesichorus and others (Paus. ii. 22, 7), a daughter of Theseus and Helena, and brought up by Clytaemnestra as a foster-child. In the earliest accounts of Agamemnon's daughters three are named: Iphianassa, Chrysothemis, and Laodice (Il. ix. 145, 287). The Cyclic poets (Cypr. 3) added Iphigenia as a fourth (Soph. El. 157), but eventually she takes the place of Iphianassa, as Electra has displaced Laodice; and the name Iphianassa is sometimes used as a synonym for Iphigenia (Lucret. i. 86). Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove of Artemis; or he had boasted that the goddess herself could not aim better; or he had vowed in the year in which Iphigenia was born to sacrifice the most beautiful production of that year, but had after-year. On the peace of Antalcidas, in 387, Iphicrates went to Thrace to assist Scuthes, king of the Odrysae, but he soon afterwards formed an alliance with Cotys, who gave him wards neglected to fulfil his vow. One of these circumstances is said to have been the cause of the calm which detained the Greek fleet in Aulis, when the Greeks wanted to sail against Troy. Tho seer Calchas declared that the sacrifice of Iphigenia was the only means of propitiating Artemis. Agamemnon was obliged to yield, and Iphigenia was brought to Chalcis under the pretext of being married to Achilles. When Iphigenia was on the point of being sacrificed, Artemis carried her in a cloud to the Tauric Chersonesus (tho Crimea), where she became the priestess of the goddess, and a stag was substituted for her by Artemis. (Cypria, ed. Kinkel, p. 19; Eur. I. A. 1540, I. T. 1 ff.; Aesch. Ag. 185; Pind. Pyth. xi. 23; Paus. ix. 19; Lucret. i. 85.) While Iphigenia was serving Artemis as priestess, her brother Orestes and his friend Pylades came to Tauri to carry off the image of the goddess at this place, which was believed to have fallen from heaven. As strangers they were to be sacrificed in the temple of Artemis; but Iphigenia recognised her brother, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess. (Eur. I. T.; Hyg. Fab. 120-122; Naev. Iphig.) The story which Sophocles follows in his Chryses (Hyg. Fab. 120) makes Iphigenia and Orestes reach Sminthus, where they are overtaken by Thoas, and when Chryses, son of Agamemnon and priest of Apollo, is about to surrender them, he discovers their parentage and joins Orestes in killing Thoas. The image of the Tauric Artemis was, according to the Spartan legend, taken to Sparta (Paus. iii. 16, 6); according to the Attic legend, it was placed in the temple of Artemis at Brauron on the east coast of Attica, where Iphigenia became the priestess (Eur. I. T. 1446; Strab. p. 399; Paus. i. 23, 9); according to the legend at Laodicea the original image was taken from Brauron by Xerxes, and placed at Laodicea. In other words there were wooden images of an Artemis worshipped in Tauric fashion at all these places, and each place claimed to possess the genuine image. [ARTEMIS, p. 128.] Pausanias apparently considered that at Sparta to be the most ancient, since he inclines to believe it to be the actual statue brought by Iphigenia. The stories of the death of Iphigenia vary in like manner: in one, she died at Megara, and was honoured there with a shrine (Paus. i. 43, 1); in another, she died in Attica and was there buried; according to some traditions Iphigenia never died, but was changed by Artemis into Hecate, or was endowed by the goddess with immortality and eternal youth, and under the name of Orilochia became the wife of Achilles in the island of Leuce (Ant. Lib. 27).—There can be little doubt that under these myths lies the fact that Iphigenia was Artemis herself: that is, Iphigenia represents an ancient local deity worshipped in each of these places, Sparta, Brauron, and Megara, with human sacrifices and rites akin to those of the Tauric Artemis, and when Artemis took her place, she was transformed into the priestess of Artemis, and her connexion with these various places was accounted for by the stories of the wanderings of Agamemnon's daughter [see p. 128]. The custom of dedicating to her the clothes of women who had died in childbirth (I. T. 1465) points to the same conclusion. She had originally been a goddess of childbirth, as Artemis was, perhaps as being, like Artemis also, a moon-goddess, or a goddess of natural fruitfulness.

Ip̄imēdia or Ip̄imēdē (Ἰφιμέδεια, Ἰφιμέδη), daughter of Triops, and wife of Aloeus. Being in love with Poseidon, she often walked on the seashore, and collected its waters in her lap, whence she became, by Poseidon, the mother of the Aloidæ, Otus and Ephialtes. While Iphimedia and her daughter, Paneratis, were celebrating the orgies of Dionysus on Mount Drius, they were carried off by Thracian pirates to Naxos or Strongylo; but they were delivered by the Aloidæ. (Od. xi. 305; Pind. Pyth. iv. 89; Apollod. i. 7, 4; Diod. v. 50.)

Iphis (Ἴφίς). 1. Son of Alector, and father of Eteoclus and Evadne, the wife of Capaneus, was king of Argos. He advised Polynices to give the celebrated necklace of Harmonia to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband Amphiarus to take part in the expedition against Thebes. He lost his two children, and therefore left his kingdom to Sthenelus, son of Capaneus (Paus. ii. 18, 4).—2. Son of Sthenelus, and brother of Eurystheus, was one of the Argonauts who fell in the battle with Aëtes.—3. A youth in love with Anaxarete. [ANAXARETE.]—4. Daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Phaestus in Crete. She was brought up as a boy, on the advice of Isis, because her father, before her birth, had ordered the child to be killed if it should be a girl. When Iphis had grown up, and was to be betrothed to Iantlie, she was metamorphosed by Isis into a youth (Ov. Met. ix. 666).

Iphitus (Ἴφίτος). 1. Son of Eurytus of Oechalia, one of the Argonauts, was afterwards killed by Heracles. (For details, see p. 399.)—2. Son of Naubolus, and father of Schedius, Epistrophus, and Eurynome, in Phocis, likewise one of the Argonauts (Il. ii. 518; Ap. Rh. i. 207; Apollod. i. 9, 16).—3. Son of Haemon, or Praxionides, or Iphitus, king of Elis, restored the Olympic games, and instituted the cessation of war during their celebration, B.C. 884 (Paus. v. 4, 5; 8, 5; 10, 10; 26, 2; viii. 26, 4; Plut. Lyc. 1).

Ipnus (Ἴπνος), a town of the Locri Ozolæ (Thuc. iii. 101).

Ipsus (Ἴψος), a small town in Great Phrygia, celebrated in history as the scene of the decisive battle which closed the great contest between the generals of Alexander for the succession to his empire, and in which Antigonus was defeated and slain, B. C. 301. [ANTIGONUS.] The site of Ipsus was on the slopes of the modern Sultan Dagh; the town of Julia, which took its place, was built a little below. It was on the main road from Iconium to the north and west, and was a little to the NE. of Synnada.

Ira (Ἴρα, Ἰρά). 1. A mountain fortress in Messenia, memorable as the place where Aristomenes defended himself for eleven years against the Spartans. Its capture by the Spartans in B. C. 668 put an end to the second Messenian war (Paus. iv. 17, 20; Strab. p. 360). It is usually identified with the hill of Hagios Athanasios near Kakaletri.—2. One of the seven cities which Agamemnon promised to Achilles (Il. ix. 150). It can hardly be the same as No. 1, since it is described as near the sea-coast of Messenia.

Irēnaeus, bishop of Lyons, 177 A. D. [Dict. of Christian Biography.]

Irēnē (Ἐιρήνη), called Pax by the Romans, the goddess of Peace, was, according to Hesiod, a daughter of Zeus and Themis, and one of the Horæ (Hes. Th. 902; Pind. Ol. xiii. 6; Diod. v. 72; Bacchyl. Fr. 13; HORÆ). After the battle of Eurymedou, and also after the victory of Timotheus over the Lacedæmonians, altars were erected to her at Athens at the public expense (Plut. Cim. 13; Isocr. περὶ ἀντιδ. 109; Nep. Timoth. 2). Her statue at Athens carrying in its arms Plutus, the god of wealth, was the work of Cephisodotus, and another stood near that of Hestia in the Prytaneum (Paus. i.

8, 3, ix. 16, 1). A copy of it (called wrongly Leucothea) is now at Munich [Cepusodorus]. At Rome, where Peace was also worshipped as a goddess, she had a magnificent temple, which was built by the emperor Vespasian. Pax is represented on coins as a young woman, holding in her left arm a cornucopia, and in her right hand an olive branch or the staff of Mercury. Sometimes she appears in the act of burning a pile of arms, or carrying corn-ears in her hand or upon her head.

Iris (Ἴρις), in mythology, is daughter of Thaumas (whence she is called Thaumantias) and of Electra, and sister of the Harpies (Hes. Th. 266, 780; Plat. Theaet. p. 155; Apolled. i. 2, 6; Verg. Aen. ix. 5). In the Iliad she appears as the messenger of the gods, especially of Zens and Hera (Il. ii. 787, xv. 144, xviii. 166, xxiv. 78, 95). In the Odyssey, Hermes is the messenger of the gods, and Iris is never mentioned. It should be observed that in Homer the word ἴρις is only twice used impersonally, either as the rainbow or merely as something curved (Il. xi. 26; xvii. 545). It seems probable that Iris was originally a goddess of rain, which was expressed in myth as the messenger sent by Zens to men, and then was the path of this messenger, or actually the personification of the rainbow, for this brilliant phenomenon in the skies, which vanishes as quickly as it appears, was regarded as the swift messenger of the gods. Virgil represents the bow as the road on which Iris travels, which therefore appears whenever the goddess wants it, and vanishes when it is no longer needed (Serv. ad Aen. v. 610). In the earlier poets, Iris appears as a virgin goddess; but in the later, she is the wife of Zephyrus, and the mother of Eros. Iris is represented in works of art dressed in a long and wide tunic, over which hangs a light upper garment, with wings attached to her shoulders, carrying the herald's staff in her left hand, and sometimes also holding a pitcher.

Iris (Ἴρις; Yeshil-Irmak), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises on the N. side of the Anti-Taurus, in the S. of Pontus, and flows past Comana Pontica, to Amasia and Eupatoria (Megalopolis), where it receives the Lycus, and then flows N. into the Sinus Amisenus. Xenophon states its breadth at three plethra. (Strab. p. 556; Xen. An. v. 6, 3.)

Irus (Ἴριος). 1. Son of Actor and father of Eurydamus and Eurytion. He purified Peleus, when the latter had murdered his brother; but during the chase of the Calydonian boar, Peleus unintentionally killed Eurytion, the son of Irus. Peleus endeavoured to soothe him by offering him his flocks; but Irus would not accept them, and, at the command of an oracle, Peleus allowed them to run wherever they pleased. A wolf devoured the sheep, but was thereupon changed into a stone, which was shown, in later times, on the frontier between Locris and Phocis. (Ant. Lib. 38; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175.)—2. The well-known beggar of Ithaca. His real name was Arnaeus, but he was called Irus, in allusion to IRIS, because he was the messenger of the suitors. He was slain by Odysseus. (Od. xviii. 5, 239.)

Is (Ἴς; Hit), a city in the S. of Mesopotamia, eight days' journey from Babylon, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, and upon a little river of the same name. In its neighbourhood were the springs of asphaltus, from which was obtained the bitumen that was used in the walls of Babylon (Hdt. i. 179).

Isaeus (Ἰσαῖος). 1. One of the ten Attic orators, was born at Chalcis, and came to Athens at an early age. He was instructed in oratory by Lysias and Isocrates. He was afterwards engaged in writing judicial orations for others, and established a rhetorical school at Athens, in which Demosthenes is said to have been his pupil. It is further said that Isaeus composed for Demosthenes the speeches against his guardians, or at least assisted him in the composition. We have no particulars of his life. He lived between B.C. 420 and 348. Isaeus is said to have written sixty-four orations, but of these only eleven are extant. They all relate to questions of inheritance, and afford considerable information respecting this branch of the Attic law. Isaeus was the first great master of forensic argument. His style is clear and concise, and at the same time vigorous and powerful, and is intermediate between what is called the plain style of Lysias and the full development of oratory in Demosthenes (Plut. Vit. X. Or. p. 839; Dionys. Isaeus). His orations are contained in the collections of the Greek Orators. [DEMOSTHENES.] Separate editions by Schömann, 1831; Scheibe, 1874.—2. A sophist, a native of Assyria, taught at Rome in the time of the younger Pliny (Plin. Ep. ii. 3; Juv. iii. 74; Philostr. Soph. i. 20).

Isägoras (Ἰσαγόρας), the leader of the oligarchical party at Athens, in opposition to Clisthenes, B.C. 510. He was expelled from Athens by the popular party, although supported by Cleomenes and the Spartans. (Hdt. v. 66-75; Paus. iii. 4; Arist. Ath. pol. 20; CLISTHENES.)

Isander (Ἰσανδρος), son of Bellerophon, killed by Ares in the fight with the Soiyini (Il. vi. 197; Strab. pp. 573, 630).

Isära (Isère), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, descends from the Col d'Iséran in the Graivau Alps, is approached by the route from the Little St. Bernard at Bourg S. Maurice a little above Axima (Aisne), passes Cularo (Grenoble) and joins the Rhone at Valentia (Valence), at which point Hannibal left the 'island' B.C. 218, and Fabius Aemilianus defeated the Allobroges and Arverni, B.C. 121. It was the river valley which Hannibal followed till he reached the junction with the Drac. (Pol. iii. 49; Liv. xxi. 31.)

Isauria (ἡ Ἰσαυρία, ἡ Ἰσαυρικὴ), a district of Asia Minor, on the N. side of the Taurus, between Pisidia and Cilicia, of which the ancients knew little beyond the fact that its inhabitants, the Isauri (Ἰσαυροί) were daring robbers, whose incursions received only a temporary check from the victory over them which gained for L. Servilius the surname of Isauricus (B.C. 75). Their chief city was called Isaura. (Strab. p. 568; Diod. xviii. 22; Dio Cass. xlv. 16.)

Isca. 1. (Exeter), the capital of the Damnonii or Dumnonii in the SW. of Britain.—2. (Caer Leon), at the mouth of the Usk, a town of the Silures in Britain, and the head-quarters of the Legio II. The word Leon is a corruption of the word Legio; Caer is the old Celtic name.

Ischys. [ASCLEPIUS.]

Isidōrus (Ἰσίδωρος). 1. Of Aegae, a Greek poet of uncertain date, five of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology.—2. Of Charax, a geographical writer, who probably lived under the early Roman emperors. His work, Ἐταθμοὶ Παρθικοί, is printed in the edition of the minor geographers, by Hudson, Oxon. 1703.—3. Of Gaza, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, the friend of Proclus and Marinus, whom he succeeded as chief of the school.—4. Bishop of Hispalis, (Seville) in Spain, from A.D. 600 to 636, one of the most learned men of his age. A great number of his works is still extant, but the most important of them is his Originum s. Etymologiarum Libri XX, an Encyclopaedia of Arts and Sciences, treating of all subjects in literature, science and religion, and, from its acquaintance with earlier writers, of great value for the study of Roman archaeology. His De Natura Rerum, on natural history, was also much used in the middle ages; it is edited by Becker, Berl. 1857; the Origines is edited by Otto in the Corpus Grammaticorum Veterum, Lindemann, Lips. 1833. A complete collection of the works was published by Arevali, Rom. 1797, and by Migne, Paris, 1850.—5. Of Miletus, the elder and younger, eminent architects in the reign of Justinian.

Isigōnus (Ἰσίγονος), a Greek writer, of uncertain date, but who lived before the time of Pliny, wrote a work entitled Ἄπιστα, a few fragments of which are extant. Published in Westermann's Paradoxographi, 1839.

Isionda or Isinda (Ἰσιόνδα: Ἰσιονδεύς, Isiondensis), a city of Pisidia in Asia Minor, on the road between Cihyra and Termessus, a little to the NW. of which it lies (Liv. xxxviii. 15). Its ruins are at Istanoz.

Isis (Ἰσίς), one of the great deities of the Egyptians in their later mythology, and especially important among the Oriental religions which spread over Greece and Italy after the age of Alexander. The worship of Isis did not belong to the earlier dynasties, but grew up out of myths. Isis was one of the local divinities, and when the custom arose of expressing deities in animal form, she was represented in the cow-shape (Hdt. ii. 41), which the agricultural people took as their typical representation of beneficence, whether it is to be understood, as some think, as signifying the productive powers of nature, or merely as the form in which they chose to worship a goddess of heaven. In the myths at any rate Isis is a goddess of the sky, and the daughter of the earth-god Queb and Nut, whom the Greeks identified with Cronos and Rhea, sister and wife of OSIRIS and mother of HORUS; sister also of Nephthys and of the evil power of darkness, Set (= Typhon). Much of the myth represents a struggle between light and darkness, civilisation and barbarism, which was partially caught up by the Greeks. When Osiris had been killed by Set, he was mourned over by Isis and her sister Nephthys in dirges, which are the Ἰσίδος μέλη of Plato (Legg. p. 657 B). The protection which Isis gave for a time to her brother Set against her son the avenging Horus, led to a quarrel, the head of Isis was cut off, but replaced by magic as a cow's head, which appears in Plut. Is. 19 as the Ἰσίδος ἀποκεφαλισμός, and also in his story of Hermes placing upon her a cow's head. The religion of Isis and Osiris increased in Egypt as the power of Thebes diminished, and the worship of Ammon took a less prominent place. Busiris was the centre of her worship. Isis came to be regarded as the great nature-goddess, the deity of motherhood and of all natural production, and as the goddess of magic, to which belonged the myths of her healing Osiris from his wounds. She was also, in relation to the mysteries of the death of Osiris, the goddess of the underworld. It is to these varying forms of her story that the bewildering identification of Isis with so many different Greek deities is due. The worship of Isis, especially after the age of Alexander, spread widely over Western Asia and Southern Europe, in Syria (where it had a footing earlier), Asia Minor, the islands of the Aegean, particularly

Isis suckling Horus. (Wilkinson.)

Cyprus and Rhodes, in Greece, particularly at Athens, Corinth, Cenchrææ, and Hermione (Paus. i. 41, ii. 2, 32, 34), in Sicily and Italy, where it was especially notable at Puteoli, and, as the remains have proved, at Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiae. At Rome it took a strong hold. At its first introduction after the second Punic war it was opposed on several occasions by the senate. In B.C. 50 Aemilius Paulus himself aided in the destruction of her shrines (Val. Max. i. 3, 4); but in 48 the triumvirs built the first temple for her public worship, probably in the Campus Martius (Dio Cass. xlvii. 15; cf. Lucan, viii. 831). Under the empire the religion spread wherever the Roman armies went, and abundant traces are found in Gaul, Germany, and Britain. To the better natures, by rules of abstinence and purification and by the glimpses which the mysteries seemed to give of a future world, it appeared to lead to higher things; the multitude was attracted by the processions of priests in linen robes with the sistrum in their hands, and by the novelty of the Oriental rites. Besides the mysteries there were the public festivals in November and March: the former being, like the Megalensia, a mixture of grief for the death of Osiris and joy at the restoration; the latter, called Isidis navigium, representing her as opening the season of navigation in her character of a goddess of the sea, when the procession of priests went down to the shore and launched their sacred ship (Apul. Met. xi. 6). From the various aspects of Isis as goddess of the sky, of fruitfulness, and of the underworld, there followed her identification with many different deities: with Selene, as though a moon-goddess, and with Io (Hdt. ii. 61; Ov. Met. ix. 687; Io). Frequently she was confused with Demeter, partly as goddess of the earth and its fruits, partly as celebrated in the mysteries; and hence she is represented with many attributes of Demeter, carrying a torch and ears of corn, or a cornucopia. Her connexion with the sea, as Ἴσις πελαγία (Paus. ii. 4, 6), was probably of a comparatively early date in Egypt, and was perhaps derived from the Phœnician Atergates [APHRODITE, p. 85, a.]; hence she is said to have invented sailing ships in order to seek Harpocrates, and the Romans painted votive pictures for her as their protectress from shipwreck (Hyg. Fab. 27; Tibull. i. 3, 27; Juv. xii. 28; Stat. Silv. iii. 2, 101). Both this attribute and her characteristic as nature-goddess may account for her frequent identification with Aphrodite, whose form she sometimes assumes in sculpture, but distinguished by the lotus flower on her head, with Harpocrates in the guise of Eros, marked by the position of his finger on his lips. As Queen of Heaven she is often represented in the form of Hera with the Juno head and dress and a diadem like Hera's (the 'regale decus' of Ov. Met. ix. 689), and even the peacock of Hera, but distinguished by the sistrum or the lotus. As goddess of magic healing she was adopted into the worship of Asclepius, and in the temple of imperial times at Epidaurus, Isis, Serapis and Horus were worshipped as Hygiea, Apollo and Asclepius (Paus. ii. 27, 6). This connexion was probably made closer by the fact that as goddess of the underworld the Egyptians made the snake an attribute of Isis, and this was confused with the snake of Asclepius. Isis-Hygiea appears often on amulets and in votive inscriptions. Lastly, as Fortuna-Isis she has the rudder, but the Egyptian head-dress. It was not unnatural that with all these varieties of worship she should, as a πολυώνυμος or universal deity, be worshipped also as Isis-Panthea (Apul. xi. 5, 22; cf. Fortuna-Panthea, p. 346). In all these confusions of form with true Greek deities her character as Isis is marked by the sistrum or by the characteristic head-dress, the lotus flower, the crescent horns, the moon-disc, and the upright feathers.

Ismārus (Ἴσμαρος; Ἴσμαρίος), a town in Thrace, near Maroneā, situated on a mountain of the same name, which produced excellent wine (Strab. p. 331; Verg. Æol. vi. 30, Georg. ii. 37). It is mentioned in the Odyssey as a town of the Cicones (ix. 40, 198). Near it was the lake Ismāris (Ἴσμαρίς). The poets use the adjective Ismarius as equivalent to Thracian. Ovid calls Tereus, king of Thrace, Ismarius tyrannus (Am. ii. 6, 7), and Polymnestor, king of Thrace, Ismarius rex (Met. xiii. 530).

Ismēnē (Ἰσμήνη). 1. Daughter of Asopos, wife of Argus, and mother of Iasus (Apollod. ii. 1, 3).—2. Daughter of Oedipus and Jocasta, and sister of ANTIGONE.

Ismēnus (Ἰσμήνος), a small river in Bœotia, which rises in Mount Cithaeron, flows through Thebes, and falls into the lake Hylica. The brook Dirce, celebrated in Theban story, flowed into the Ismenus. (Hdt. 1, 52; Paus. iv. 27, 6.) From this river Apollo was called Ismenius. His temple, the Ismenium, at which the festival of the Daphnephoria was celebrated, was situated outside the city. The river is said to have been originally called Ladon, and to have derived its subsequent name from Ismenus, a son of Asopos and Metope. (Apollod. iii. 12, 6; Diod. iv. 72.) According to other traditions, Ismenus was a son of Amphion and Niobe, who when struck by the arrow of Apollo leaped into a river near Thebes, which was hence called Ismenus (Paus. ix. 10, 5).

Isōcrātes (Ἰσοκράτης), one of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Theodorus, and was born at Athens B.C. 436. Theodorus was a man of wealth, and educated his son with the greatest care. Among his teachers were Tisias, Gorgias, Prodicus, and also Socrates. Since Isocrates was naturally timid, and of a weakly constitution, he did not come forward as a public speaker himself, but devoted himself to giving instruction in oratory, and writing orations for others. He first taught rhetoric in Chios, and afterwards at Athens. At the latter place he met with great success, and gradually acquired a large fortune by his profession. He had 100 pupils, every one of whom paid him 1000 drachmae. He also derived a large income from the orations which he wrote for others. Although Isocrates took no part in public affairs, he sought to influence public feeling by his orations, which (apart from the forensic speeches) were intended to be read, not to be spoken. He was an ardent lover of his country, and had brought himself to regard the leadership of some strong power as the only chance of union in Greece; hence, as Dante hoped in Henry VII. as the saviour of Italy, for much the same reason Isocrates turned to Philip of Macedon, whom he urged to put himself at the head of a full and united Greece, and to liberate the Greeks of Asia Minor from the Persian rule; and, accordingly, when the battle of Chaeronea had destroyed the last hopes of freedom, he put an end to his life, B.C. 338, at the age of 98.—The school of Isocrates exercised the greatest influence, not only upon the development of public oratory at Athens, but upon the style of writers in his own and in other countries. The language of Isocrates forms a great contrast with the natural simplicity of Lysias. Among his characteristics are the avoidance of declamatory language and the frequent use of figures; but the chief point to observe is that Isocrates more than any other Greek writer studied the rhythm of prose, careful in his choice of words, and aiming at smoothness in long and finished periods. Especially he avoided hiatus. The style of Cicero was in great measure modelled upon that of Isocrates; and, through Cicero, Isocrates has had much to do with the training of the greatest masters of English prose; notably with that of Milton. The carefully-rounded periods, and the frequent application of figurative expressions, are features which remind us of the sophists. The immense care he bestowed upon the composition of his orations may be inferred from the statement that he was engaged for ten years upon his Panegyric oration alone. There were in antiquity sixty orations which went under the name of Isocrates, but they were not all recognised as genuine. Only 21 have come down to us. Of these six were written for the courts; the others are chiefly political discourses, intended to be read by a large public. The most celebrated is his Panegyric oration, in which he shows what services Athens had rendered to Greece in every period of her history, and contends that she, and not Sparta, deserves the supremacy in Greece. The Areiopagiticus (355 B.C.) argues for a restoration of the influence of the Areiopagus. The orations are printed in the collections of the Greek orators. [DEMOSTHENES.] The text is separately edited by Blass, 1878; the Panegyricus by Sandys, 1868; the Panegyricus and Areiopagiticus by Rauchenstein, 1874; the Ad Philippum, by Benseler, 1854.

Issa (Ἴσσα), daughter of Macareus of Lesbos, and beloved by Apollo. The Lesbian town of Issa is said to have received its name from her. (Strab. p. 60; Ov. Met. vi. 124.)

Issa (Issacus; Lissa), a small island in the Adriatic sea, with a town of the same name, off the coast of Dalmatia, was colonised at an early period by the Greeks. It was inhabited by a hardy race of sailors, whose barks (lembi Issaci) were much prized. The Issaci placed themselves under the protection of the Romans when they were attacked by the Illyrian queen, Teuta, B.C. 229; and their town is spoken of as a place of importance in Caesar's time. (Ptol. ii. 16, 14; Strab. p. 315; Liv. xxxi. 45, xlv. 8.)

Issēdōnes (Ἴσσηδόνες), a Scythian tribe, in Scythia extra Imaum, the most remote people in Central Asia with whom the Greeks of the time of Herodotus had any intercourse. Their country was in Great Tartary, near the Massagetæ, whom they resembled in their manners. They are represented as extending as far as the borders of Serica. (Hdt. iv. 26; Mel. ii. 1, 13.)

Issicus Sinus (ὁ Ἴσσυκὸς κόλπος; Gulf of Iskenderoon), the deep gulf at the N.E. corner of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Syria, named after the town of Issus. The width is about eight miles. The coast is much altered since ancient times.

Issōria (Ἴσσωρία), a surname of Artemis, derived from Mt. Issorion, in Laconia, on which she had a sanctuary. [ARTEMIS.]

Issus (Ἴσσοῦς, also Ἴσσοί, Xen.: Ἴσσαιός), a city in the S.E. extremity of Cilicia, near the head of the Issicus Sinus, and at the N. foot of the pass of M. Amanus called the Syrian Gates; memorable for the great battle in which Alexander defeated Darius Codomannus (B.C. 333), which was fought in a narrow valley near the town. [ALEXANDER.] Its importance was much diminished by the foundation of Alexandria ad Issum, a little to the south. (Xen. An. i. 4, 4; Arrian, Anab. ii. 7; Strab. p. 676; Ptol. v. 8, 7.)

Ister. [DANUBIUS.]

Ister, a Greek historian, was at first a slave of Callimachus, and afterwards his friend, and consequently lived in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes (B.C. 247–222). He wrote a large number of works, the most important of which was an Atthis, or history of Attica. Fragments are published by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec.

Istria or Histria, a peninsula at the N. extremity of the Adriatic, between the Sinus Tergestinus on the W. and the Sinus Flanaticus on the E. It was separated from Venetia on the NW. by the river Timavus, and from Illyricum on the E. by the river Arsia. Its inhabitants, the Istri or Histri, were a warlike Illyrian race, who carried on several wars with the Romans, till their final subjugation by the consul C. Claudius Pulcher, B.C. 177. Their chief towns were TERGESTE and POLA. Istria was originally reckoned part of Illyricum, but from the time of Augustus it formed one of the divisions of Upper Italy. (Strab. pp. 57, 215. Liv. x. 2, xli. 1–13.)

Istrōpōlis, Istros or Istrīa (Ἰστρόπολις, Ἰστροπος, Ἰστρή, Hdt. ii. 33: Istere), a town in Lower Moesia, not far from the mouth of the Danube, and at a little distance from the coast, was a colony from Miletus.

Itālia (Ἰταλία), signified, from the time of Augustus, the country which we call Italy. It was bounded on the W. by the Mare Ligusticum and Mare Tyrrhenum, Tuscum or Inferum; on the S. by the Mare Siculum or Ausonium; on the E. by the Mare Adriaticum or Superum; and on the N. by the Alps, which sweep round it in a semicircle, the river Varus (Var, Varo) separating it on the NW. from Transalpine Gaul, and the river Arsia (Arsa) on the NE. from Illyricum. The name Italia, however, was originally used to indicate a much more limited extent of country. Till a comparatively late period, the mountain boundary of Italy was, not the Alps, but the Apennines; for the country on the east coast N. of Sena Gallica was not reckoned in Italy till the second century B.C., and the plain of the Po only in the first century B.C. In the earliest times the application of the name was much more restricted even than this, and applied only to the SW. point of the peninsula—the districts, that is, afterwards known as Bruttii and Lucania (Thuc. i. 12; Arist. Pol. iv. 10, 3 = p. 1329). Modern etymologists are in favour of the old derivation (Var. R.R. ii. 5; Gell. xi. 1; Serv. ad Aen. i. 533) of Italia from ἰταλός = vitulus. It seems to be confirmed by the inscription Vitelliu found on Oscan coins. It would imply that the Italians were first famed as herdsmen of cattle on the Lucanian plains. [ITALUS.] After the Romans had conquered Tarentum and the S. part of the peninsula, about B.C. 272, the name Italia signified the whole country subject to them, from the Sicilian straits as far N. as the Arnus on the W. coast, and Sena Gallica on the E.; for the river Aesis formed its northern boundary, and the district of Ariminum was still 'ager Gallicus' until the first century B.C., when the province of Gallia Cisalpina (as Julius Caesar received it in 59 B.C.) ended at the Rubico; and on the E. side the country N. of the Arnus was still called Liguria. Augustus was the first who extended the name of Italia, so as to comprehend the whole of the basin of the Po and the S. part of the Alps, from the Maritime Alps to Pola in Istria, both inclusive. In the later times of the empire, when Maximian had transferred the imperial residence to Milan, the name Italia was again used in a narrower compass. As it had originally signified only the S. of the country, so now it was restricted to the N., comprising the five provinces of Aemilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Venetia, and Istria. Though, however, the above limitations applied in regard to history and government, the name Italia was applied by Greek writers to the whole peninsula considerably earlier, and probably from the time when Cisalpine Gaul was brought under the Roman power, and accordingly Polybius so uses it in the second century B.C.—Besides Italia, the country was called by various other names, especially by the poets. These were Hesperia, a name which the Greeks gave to it because it lay to the W. of Greece, or Hesperia Magna, to distinguish it from Spain [HESPERIA]; Saturnia, because Saturn was said to have once reigned in Latium; and Ausonia, from the Ausonian race. The name Oenotria is probably merely 'the wine country,' and was applied to the southern part by early Greek voyagers. From this some have deduced that the vine was cultivated in Italy before the Greek colonies were founded there; but οἴνωτροπος strictly means a vine-prop, it may denote that the Greeks found here the vine grown on props instead of trailing. The Italian peninsula contained a great number of different races, who had migrated into the country at a very early period. In central and south Italy three primitive stocks may be distinguished: the Etruscan, which is described under ETRURIA, the Iapygian, and what is usually called the Italian stock. The Iapygian race occupied the SE. part, the country of the Messapians, Peucetians, and Daunians [see APULIA, p. 94]. The 'Italian' stock is divided into two main branches: (a) the Latin branch, and (b) the Umbro-Sabellian, to which, according to their dialects, the Umbri, Massi, Volsci, and Samnites (= Osci) are assigned. The history of the migrations and settlements of these branches, so far as it can be conjectured, seems to be as follows. Both together separated from a stock which included Greeks and Italians alike, and when they also separated it is probable that the Latin branch (who are the same as the Opici in Thuc. vi. 3; Ar. Pol. iv. 10) came southward first and occupied the richer country of Latium, Campania, and Lucania; possibly also the eastern part of Sicily [SICILIA]; the Ausones, or Aurunci, who settled in Campania were probably a Latin tribe, but they were early Hellenised by Greek immigrants and conquered by Samnites, and therefore disappeared from history, leaving the name Ausonia as a common poetical name for Italy [cf. CAMPANIA]. The Umbro-Sabellian branch seems to have followed afterwards along the mountain ridges, and settled in the more hilly districts; but this branch again divided, the Umbri taking to the E. side of the Apennines and being eventually, by the encroachments of the Etruscans, penned up in the narrow district called UMBRIA. On the other hand, the Sabellian tribes who split off moved further southward; the Sabines, nearer to the Latin settlements, and probably at that time differing but little in dialect, were early amalgamated with the Latins; the Samnites to the larger district further south [SAMNIUM], where they long remained independent, and spread into Campania; the smaller offshoots which followed occupied the districts between Umbria and Samnium [see MARSI; PICENTES; PAELIGNI]. In the above distribution the name 'Italian' has been taken for convenience to denote the common source of the Latin and Umbro-Sabellian stocks; but it must not be forgotten that, as was said before, the name Itali is only applied in the earliest literature to those who dwelt in the extreme SW., and was not used as a common national term until the combined allies called their temporary capital ITALICA, in the year 90 B.C. The inhabitants of the northern part of Italy are described separately under GALLIA CISALPINA, LIGURIA (possibly containing the remains of the most primitive race of the peninsula), and VENETIA. For the Greek colonisation of Southern Italy see p. 372. At the time of Augustus the following were the chief divisions of Italy, an account of which is also given in separate articles: I. Upper Italy, which extended from the Alps to the rivers Macra on the W. and Rubico on the E. It comprehended: 1. LIGURIA. 2. GALLIA CISALPINA. 3. VENETIA, including Carnia. 4. ISTRIA. II. Central Italy, sometimes called Italia Propria (a term not used by the ancients), to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina or Upper Italy, and Magna Graecia or Lower Italy, extended from the rivers Macra on the W. and Rubico on the E., to the rivers Silarus on the W. and Frento on the E. It comprehended: 1. ETRURIA. 2. UMBRIA. 3. PICENUM. 4. SAMNIUM, including the country of the Sabini, Vestini, Marrucini, Marsi, Paeligni, &c. 5. LATIUM. 6. CAMPANIA. III. Lower Italy or Magna Graecia [p. 372], included the remaining part of the peninsula S. of the rivers Silarus and Frento. It comprehended: 1. APULIA, including Calabria. 2. LUCANIA. 3. BRUTTIUM.—Augustus divided Italy into the following 11 Regiones: 1. Latium and Campania. 2. The land of the Hirpini, Apulia, and Calabria. 3. Lucania and Bruttium. 4. The land of the Frentani, Marrucini, Paeligni, Marsi, Vestini, and Sabini, together with Samnium. 5. Picenum. 6. Umbria and the district of Ariminum, in what was formerly called Gallia Cisalpina. 7. Etruria. 8. (called Aemilia, after the road of that name) Gallia Cispadana. 9. Liguria. 10. The E. part of Gallia Transpadana, Venetia, Carnia, and Istria. 11. The W. part of Gallia Transpadana. Rome herself stood apart as a 12th division. This distribution seems at first to have been mainly geographical for the convenience of census and for fiscal regulations. The regions were grouped in the time of Aurelius under juridici for the purposes of justice, but how many were thus combined is uncertain. Under Diocletian twelve provinces were formed, the last three being the three larger islands, Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily, each province under a praeses or a consularis, and so arranged that of the Augustan regions 1 to 7 were, together with the three islands, under the Vicarius Urbis; regions 8 to 11, together with Rhaetia and Alpes Cottiae, were under the Vicarius Italiae.—The leading features of the physical geography of Italy may be sketched as follows. The peninsula is formed by the chain of the Apennines breaking off from the Western Alps and taking a direction, first, mainly E., till it nears the Adriatic, and then mainly S. and SE. The first direction, extending across from Genoa almost to the Adriatic coast at Sena Gallica, formed a natural boundary between Gallia Cisalpina and the lands to the south. From that point the Apennines in their southward course form the backbone of Italy, but the range is at first much nearer to the Eastern side; and about half way down they broaden out into a mountainous district some 50 miles across, which formed the old settlements of the Sabellian tribes mentioned above. Some distance S. of this the great mass of Mte Matese, extending westwards, forms the hill country of Sannium; and from that point the chain, after throwing out a spur to the eastwards which terminates in M. Garganus, bends more and more to the western coast and runs down to the toe of Italy through Bruttium. It will at once be seen, as a result of this conformation, that in Central Italy the fertile and populous plains (Etruria, Latium, and Campania) lie entirely on the western side; while in the southern, but much smaller, portion they are almost entirely on the E. side (Apulia and most of Lucania). For the same reason the rivers on the Adriatic coast are short and unimportant torrents running straight down from the mountains, while those on the W. side have a winding and fertilising course over a large extent of country. Moreover, the action of these rivers, combined with the volcanic activity on that side at an early period, has produced a number of bays and excellent harbours, in strong contrast to the Adriatic coast-line, and affording an additional reason for the prosperity of the western states. The historical result cannot be better described than in the words of the great historian of Rome:—'While the Grecian peninsula turns towards the east, the Italian turns towards the west. As the coasts of Epirus and Acarmania had but a subordinate importance in the case of Hellas, so had the Apulian and Messapian coasts in that of Italy; and, while the regions on which the historical development of Greece has been mainly dependent—Attica and Macedonia—look to the east, Etruria, Latium, and Campania look to the west. In this way the two peninsulas, such close neighbours and almost sisters, stand, as it were, averted from each other.' Had it not been that Rome, owing to this cause, directed her first efforts westwards to Spain, and gathered strength there before she met the Macedonian power in Alexander's later successors, the history of the world might have been different; and the same cause at a later time tended to the complete separation between the eastern and western empires. Two other points may be noticed in which the differences in geography of Italy and Greece produce corresponding differences in their history—(1) that the Italian coast is, on the whole, even on the western side, very much less broken up by inlets of sea than the Grecian, and has few islands, and therefore her people were not so naturally a sea-going people, and her colonies were rather military stations than true colonies; (2) that the great backbone of the Apennines makes for the most part large divisions: Italy is not, like Greece, cut up into an infinite number of small valleys, and therefore had not the immense number of small states, each jealously preserving its own independence, and more easily protected from its neighbours.—More details respecting the physical features of the different parts of Italy are given in the articles on the provinces into which it is divided.

Itālica. 1. (Santiponce), a municipium in Hispania Baetica, on the W. bank of the Baetis, NW. of Hispalis, was founded by Scipio Africanus in the second Punic war, who settled here some of his veterans. It was the birth-place of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian (Strab. p. 141; Ptol. ii. 4, 13).—2. The name given to Corfinium by the Italiani Socii during their war with Rome. [CORFINIUM.]

Italicus, Silius. [SILIUS.]

Itālus, a mythical king who was said to have reigned over Sicels in the south of Italy (Thuc. vi. 2). Servius (who gives a number of etymologies for Italia) speaks of him as king of Sicily (ad Aen. i. 533). He reigned over the land to which he gave his name, between the gulfs Scyllacinus and Napetinus, and turned his people from herdsmen into agriculturists. (Antioch. Syr. ap. Dionys. i. 12, 35, 73; Arist. Pol. iv. 10, 3 = p. 1329.) This probably points to the adoption of vine-cultivation, which caused the Greeks to call his land sometimes Oenotria. His sons were Sicelus and Auson, and his wife was Leucania. (Dionys. i. 22; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 702; Plut. Rom. 2.) There seems to be truth in the connexion of races and countries to which these traditions point. [See ITALIA and SICILIA.]

Itānus (Ἰτανός), a town on the E. coast of Crete, near a promontory of the same name, founded by the Phoenicians (Ptol. iii. 17, 4).

Ithāca (Ἰθάκη: Ithakēios: Thiaki), a small island in the Ionian Sea, celebrated as the birth-place of Odysseus, lies off the coast of Epirus, and is separated from Cephalonia by a channel about three or four miles wide. The island is about twelve miles long, and four in its greatest breadth. It is divided into two parts, which are connected by a narrow isthmus, not more than half a mile across. In each of these parts there is a mountain-ridge of considerable height: the one in the N. called Neritum (Νήριτον, now Anoi), and the one in the S. Neiūm (Νήϊον, now Haghios Stephanos). The city of Ithaca, the residence of Odysseus, is considered by many to have been situated on a precipitous, conical hill, now called Aeto, or 'eagle's cliff,' occupying the whole breadth of the isthmus mentioned above. The acropolis, or castle of Odysseus, crowned the bleak summit of the mountain. Hence Cicero (de Orat. i. 44) describes it, in asperimis saxulis tanquam nidulus affixa. It is at the foot of Mt. Neiūm, and is hence described by Telemachus as 'Under-Neiūm' (Ἰθάκης ὑπονηϊόν, Od. iii. 81). Ancient, or Cyclopean, walls are in many places traceable. Others think that the above site is too far from the sea, and that a small place still called Polis marks the true site. This is near Stavros on the NW. of the island; it has an available harbour near, and there is the small island Daskalio about six miles from Polis which would answer to the island Asteris, where the suitors lay in wait for Telemachus between Ithaca and Cephalenia (Od. iv. 845). There seems no reason to doubt that the writer of the Odyssey had knowledge of the local features of the island, and inlets suiting the description of the harbour of Phorcys are pointed out both in the bay of Vathy and that of Dexia: there is a stalactite cave which claims to be the grotto of the nymphs, equidistant from both these bays (Od. xiii. 96).

Ithōmē (Ἰθώμη: Ἰθωμήτης, Ἰθωμαῖος). 1. A strong fortress in Messenia, situated on a mountain of the same name, 2630 feet high, which afterwards formed the citadel of the town of Messene. On the summit of the mountain stood the ancient temple of Zeus, who was hence surnamed Ithometas (Ἰθωμήτης, Dor. Ἰθωμάτας). Ithome was taken by the Spartans, B.C. 723, at the end of the last Messenian war, after an heroic defence by Aristodemus, and again in 455, at the end of the third Messenian war. There are remains of ancient walls which Itōnia, Itōnias, or Itōnis (Ἰτωνία, Ἰτωνιάς, or Ἰτωνίς), a surname of Athene, derived from the town of Iton, in the S. of Phthiotis in Thessaly. The goddess there had a celebrated sanctuary and festivals, and hence the battle-ery of the Thessalians was Ἀθηνᾶ Ἰτωνία (Paus. x. 1, 10; Strab. pp. 411, 435). She had also a temple between Pherae and Larissa (Paus. i. 13, 2). From Iton her worship spread into Bocotia and the country about Lake Copais, where the Pam-bocotia was celebrated, in the neighbourhood of a temple and grove of Athene, not far from Coronea (Paus. iii. 9, 13, ix. 34, 1). It is from this place that she is called by Catullus 'incola Itoi' (lxiv. 228; cf. Stat. Theb. ii. 721).

Itucci (Ἰτύκκη, App.), a town in Hispania Baetica, in the district of Hispalis, and a Roman colony called Virtus Julia (Plin. iii. 25).

Itūna (Solway Frith), an estuary in Britain, between England and Scotland.

Itūraea, Itūraea (Ἰτουραία: Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituræi, Ityraei: El-Jeidur), a district on the NE. borders of Palestine, bounded on the N. by the plain of Damascus, on the W. by the mountain-chain (Jebel-Heish) which forms the E. margin of the valley of the Jordan, on the SW. and S.

Ithome, from the Stadium of Messene.

may belong to the fortress built in the third Messenian war. (Thuc. i. 103; Paus. iii. 11, 8; iv. 9, 1; Strab. p. 361.)—2. A mountain fortress in Pelagiotis, in Thessaly, near Metropolis, also called Thome (Il. ii. 729; Strab. p. 437).

Itius Portus, a harbour of the Morini, on the N. coast of Gaul, from which Caesar set sail for Britain. The position of this harbour has been much disputed. It used to be identified with Gesoriacum, or Boulogne, but is now generally admitted to be the harbour of Wissant, about twelve miles W. of Calais, sheltered from the SW. gales by Itium Pr. (Cape Grisnez). The point in Britain to which the passage from Itius Portus led is more doubtful. The old idea that it was Deal has been abandoned as impossible since the set of the tides has been better understood. The most probable view is that the landing was at Romney, but Pevensey, which some prefer, is not impossible. (Caes. B. G. iv. 21, v. 2; Strab. p. 199.)

by Gaulanitis, and on the E. by Auranitis and Trachonitis. It occupied a part of the elevated plain into which Mt. Hermon sinks down on the SE., and was inhabited by an Arabian people of warlike and predatory habits. Pompey reduced them to order, and many of their warriors entered the Roman army, in which they became celebrated as archers (Verg. Georg. ii. 448; Lucan. vii. 230, 514). They were not, however, reduced to complete subjection to Rome until after the civil wars. Augustus gave Ituraea, which had been hitherto ruled by its native princes, to the family of Herod. It was governed by Herod Philip as tetrarch, and at his death, A.D. 34, it was united to the Roman province of Syria (Jos. Ant. xviii. 4, 6), from which it was again separated, and assigned to Soaemus, the prince of Emesa. In A.D. 50, it was finally reunited by Claudius to the Roman province of Syria (Tac. Ann. xii. 23).

Itys. [TEREUS.]

Iūlus, son of Acneus, usually called Ascanius (Verg. Aen. iv. 274; Ov. Her. vii. 75, 137; Sil. It. viii. 71), and founder of the Julian family (Verg. Aen. 1, 288, vi. 789; Ov. Past. iv. 39): but later traditions separated the two names, and related that Iulus was son of Ascanius, and was deprived of his inheritance by his half-uncle Silvius (Dionys. i. 70, 4; AENEAS, ASCANIUS, SILVIUS).

Ixion (Ἰξίων) (who is not mentioned in Homer or Hesiod), was the son of Phlegyas, or of Antion and Perimela, or of Pasion, or of Ares. According to the common tradition, his mother was Dia, a daughter of Deioneus. He was king of the Lapithae or Phlegyes, and the father of Pirithous. When Deioneus demanded of Ixion the bridal gifts he had promised, Ixion treacherously invited him to a banquet, and then contrived to make him fall into a pit filled with fire. As no one purified Ixion of this treacherous murder, Zeus took pity upon him, purified him, carried him to heaven, and caused him to sit down at his table. But Ixion was ungrateful to the father of the gods, and attempted to win the love of Hera. Zeus thereupon fashioned a cloud in the likeness of Hera, and by it Ixion became the father of a Centaur. [CENTAURI.] Ixion was fearfully punished for his impious ingratitude. His hands and feet were chained by Hermes to a wheel, which is said to have rolled perpetually in the air (which is the older version) or in the lower world. He is further said to have been scourged, and compelled to exclaim, 'Benefactors should be honoured.' (Pind. Pyth. ii. 21-89; Aesch. Eum. 440; Soph. Phil. 679; Ap. Rh. iii. 62; Tzetz. Chil. ix. 273; Diod. iv. 69; Schol. ad Eur. Phoen. 1185; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 6; Verg. Georg. iv. 484, Aen. vi. 601; Ov. Met. iv. 460.) Some modern writers explain Ixion as symbolising the whirlwind; others (which is the most general view), as the sun eternally moving with its fiery orb. It may be questioned whether it is not a myth borrowed from a ritual known to have been practised by people of central Europe as a sun-charm. It consisted in carrying a blazing wheel brandished or made to revolve in the air, about the fields which needed sunshine. That a figure, whether real or an imitation, was sometimes bound on it just as the Ἰνυξ was bound on the wheel in Theocr. Id. 2, is likely enough. If so, the myth grew up to explain the custom, and was borrowed from the more northern tribes by the Greeks, who fitted it into their own mythology.

Ixionides, i.e. Pirithous, the son of Ixion.—The Centaurs are also called Ixionidae.

Ixiūs (Ἰξίως), a surname of Apollo, derived from a district of the island of Rhodes which was called Ixiæ or Ixia (Steph. Byz. s.v.).

Iynx (Ἰνυξ), daughter of Peitho and Pan, or of Echo. She endeavoured to charm Zeus, or to make him fall in love with Io; but she was metamorphosed by Hera into the bird called Iynx. (Tzetz. ad Lye. 310; Ant. Lib. 9; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 214.) This bird was used as a love-charm, being tied to a wheel and made to revolve. It is probable that the charm (which was known to Pindar) is older than the story of Iynx (Pind. Pyth. iv. 214, Nem. iv. 35; Theocr. ii. 17; Xen. Mem. iii. 11, 17), and the story is merely a late explanation.

J.

Jaccetāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis between the Pyrenees and the Iberus, in the NE. corner of Spain, in whose country the wars between Sertorius and Pompey, and between Caesar and Petreus took place (Caes. B. C. i. 60; Strab. p. 161; Ptol. ii. 6, 72).

Jana, apparently an old Latin equivalent of Diana (Varro, R. R. i. 37, 3; Macrobi. i. 9, 8), though it is also possible that she may originally have been the feminine counterpart (according to a common custom of imagining pairs of divinities) to Janus (who had nothing to do with Diana), and was afterwards identified with that goddess.

Jānicūlum. [ROMA.]

Jānus, an ancient Latin deity, and apparently at one period the chief deity. Roman writers lay special stress upon the antiquity of his worship (Varro, ap. August. Civ. D. iv. 23; Juv. vi. 393, 'antiquissime divum'; cf. Herodian, i. 16; Procop. B. G. i. 25). Janus was the god of all beginnings both in public and in private life: of the birth of man and of the opening of the year, so that he presided over what was the first month of the year in later, and perhaps also in the earliest, times [see below]; he was the god, too, of the beginnings of enterprises alike of trade and of warfare, in which he secured a safe return of the outgoing host. On what principle all these functions belonged to him is a much disputed question. The theory till recently most in favour was that his name was connected with dies, that he was the sun-god, as Jana=Diana was the moon-goddess. The reasons for this on which Preller particularly relies were (1) the supposed etymology of Janus and Jana from dies; (2) the custom of placing his shrine east and west; (3) that if Janus is not the sun-god the Latins had none. To the first it may be replied that there is absolutely no connexion between the functions of Diana and Janus or their ritual, and that Diana has traditionally a later origin at Rome, of the time of Servius Tullius, whereas Janus stands out as pre-eminent in antiquity; to the second, that the orientation of the shrine is much more likely to be connected with omens, if a reason is to be assigned; and to the third that there is some reason to believe that to the early Latins Mars held that relation to the sun which was afterwards held by Apollo. Others have explained him as the god of the vault of heaven, and have sought an Etruscan origin connecting him with the Etruscan arch; but the evidence is against Janus being originally an Etruscan deity, and his connexion with the arch (which is not really like the vault of heaven), if he is connected, probably comes from the gateway. Janus has probably a much simpler origin. He belongs to the most primitive religion of the household, and just as Vesta was the old goddess of the hearth and its fire, so Janus was the god of the doorway (janua), who guarded and watched all that went out and came in (therefore looking both ways); who prospered the outgoings and kept off evil influence (as in the superstitions of many nations) from crossing the threshold; and who sanctioned the opening and shutting of the door (Ov. Fast. i. 125, 137; Cic. N.D. ii. 27, 67; Macrob. i. 9, 7). Hence his name of Patulcius (the Opener) and Clusius (the Closer). It was doubtless a later development of this idea which made him the door-keeper of heaven (Ov. Fast. i. 117, 125), and again the god who granted birth, or the opening of the womb, hence called 'Consivius,' and in the Salian hymn 'duonus cerus,' that is 'the good creator.' It was natural that, as the god of the goings out and the comings in, he should be the patron whose aid was sought in all beginnings and undertakings, and should be the 'matutinus pater' who started the daily work (Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 20). The prayer versified by Serenus (a poet of Hadrian's time) probably represents an ancient prayer, and is worth quoting as illustrating this passage of Horace, and as showing the real conception of Janus.

Jane pater, Jane tuens, dive biceps, biformis,
O cete rerum sator O pricipium decorum,
Stridula cui limina, cui cardines tumultus,
Cui reserata mugiant aurea claustra mundi,
Tibi vetus ara caluit aborigine sacello.

As the houses became grouped into a fortified town, so the public functions of Janus ensued. He was the god of the city gates as of the house door, and there is good reason for the belief that Portumnus (Verg. Aen. v. 241), who was similarly represented with keys, was merely Janus-Portumnus, the Janus who presided over the gates of the city (portae) and the havens or wharfs of the Tiber (portus), for which reason a ship appears on the Janus coins. For Janus presided over public as well as private outgoings in commerce; and the meaning of his being special god of the Janiculum (Verg. Aen. viii. 319; Ov. Fast. i. 245) is that it was the place of egress and ingress for trade with Etruria by land, and also the fortress guarding the ancient wharfs of the Tiber (cf. Liv. i. 33; Dionys. iii. 45); hence in some myths Tiberinus was son of Janus. Another of his public functions, following from his being the god of beginnings, was that of presiding over the year (Ov. Fast. i. 43; Mart. viii. 2, 1). His own month, January, was the first month of the year in the later Calendar, and it is possible that there may be truth in Ovid's assertion, that in the very oldest (i.e. before the Decemvirs) it was also the first [Dict. of Ant. art. Calendarium]. He also presided over the Calends of each month, whence he is called Junonius, because Juno as moon-goddess had to do with the mouths (Macrob. i. 9, 16). A remarkable confirmation of the view that Janus and Vesta were the two most ancient deities of the house may be found in the fact that these relations reappear in the public ritual. The Rex Sacrorum [Dict. of Ant. s.v.], who represented the oldest Roman religion, offered sacrifices at the Calends to Janus on the Capitol, while his wife sacrificed in the Regia, which represented the old state-hearth of the king's or chief's house: on Jan. 9 he offered a ram to Janus in the Regia. The special cake called janual or πόπανον was offered on the 1st of January at his shrines generally (Ov. Fast. i. 127; Lyd. Mens. iv. 2; Fest. p. 310). The public function of Janus which has been more celebrated than any other is his guardianship of the state in time of war, when the gates of his most ancient sanctuary at the N.E. end of the Forum (closed in time of peace) were left open. This sanctuary, as old as Numa's reign (Varro, L.L. v. 165; Liv. i. 19), was a square building open at both ends with a flat roof: in fact, rather a gate-house than a temple. The tradition which attempted to account for the custom of opening it in time of war related that in the Sabine war a stream of water gushed forth from this sanctuary and swept back the invaders (Ov. Fast. i. 269, Met. xiv. 786; Macrob. i. 9, 17). It has been suggested that the custom meant that the god, who in peace remained in his shrine, in war went out to battle (cf. Verg. Aen. i. 294; Ov. Fast. i. 281; Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 255); but Janus was not the god who went out to battle, and it is a far more likely explanation that, just as the old custom was not to close the door of the private house when the members of the family were out, so it was regarded as a bad omen to close what represented the gates of the state against the citizens who had gone out to war. It remained open to show that the god was ready to welcome them returning home safe and victorious. It was probably actually the Latin custom in old times that the army marched out through the eastern gate of Janus (which at Rome led from the Forum) and at the conclusion of the war quitted the gate-house of Janus by the western gate (Lyd. Mens. iv. 2; cf. Verg. Aen. vii. 611). The legend of the water gushing forth probably arose from the fact that Janus was the god who opened the springs of water, hence in mythology made the husband of Juturna the water-nymph and father of Fontus (Arnob. iii. 29). The building, in which the double statue of the god was placed, facing both ways, was spoken of as Janus, or often as Janus Quirinus (Suet. Aug. 22), where Quirinus seems to be an adjective and to give the meaning as 'Janus the god of the Roman citizens': possibly it was first used when the peoples on the Quirinal and the Palatine united, to show that the Janus of the latter people belonged also to the former: in Hor. Od. iv. 15, 9 the genitive 'Quirini' is similarly used, though some alter it to 'Quirinum'; other descriptions of the building are 'porta Janualis,' 'geminae portae belli,' 'πόλη ἐνωδῆτος, πόλη πολέμου' (Plut. Nun. 20). There were besides many arches of Janus (Ov. Fast. i. 257; Liv. xli. 27): the Janus Medius (Cic. Off. ii. 25, 90; Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 18) was probably an arch over the Vicus Tuscus, and therefore appropriately connected with business and trade, with books and money-changing (Hor. Ep. i. 20, 1), and there was at least one other in the Forum (cf. Hor. Ep. i. 1, 54). A temple of Janus stood also near the theatre of Marcellus, dedicated by C. Duilius (Tac. Ann. ii. 49). The Janus with four gates and a four-headed figure of the god (Janus Quadrifrons), said to be derived from Falerii (Serv. ad Verg. Aen. vii. 607), stood in the Forum Transitorium, which was connected with three other fora. In historical times Janus no longer held the supremacy among Roman deities, though he was still in old forms of prayer addressed first (Cic. N. D. ii. 27, 67). This was probably owing to the acceptance (as representing the great Roman deities) of the Greek gods, with whom Janus had no point of agreement. In art Janus is represented by two bearded faces (sometimes four), and, in full-length figures, holding a key and a staff.

Jāson (Ἰάσων). 1. The celebrated leader of the Argonauts, was a son of Aeson and Polymede or Alcimede, and belonged to the family of the Aeolidae, at Iolcus in Thessaly. Cretheus, who had founded Iolcus, was succeeded by his son Aeson; but the latter was deprived of the kingdom by his half-brother Pelias, who tried to kill the infant Jason. (In Od. xi. 256 Pelias is rightful king of Iolcus.) Jason was saved by his friends, and intrusted to the care of the centaur Chiron (Hes. Th. 995; Pind. Pyth. iv. 70-262). Pelias was now warned by an oracle to be on his guard against the one-sandaled man. When Jason had grown up, he came to claim the throne. As he entered the market-place, Pelias, perceiving he had only one sandal, asked him who he was; whereupon Jason declared his name, and demanded the kingdom (Phereyd. Fr. 60). Pelias consented to surrender it to him, but persuaded him to remove the curse which rested on the family of the Aeolidae, by fetching the golden fleece and soothing the spirit of Phrixus (Phereyd. Fr. 60). Another tradition related that when Pelias was sacrificing to Poseidon Jason came with the other citizens, but, on his journey to Iolcus, he had lost one of his sandals in crossing the river Anaurus. Pelias, remembering the oracle about the one-sandaled man, asked Jason what he would do if he were told by an oracle that he would be killed by one of his subjects? Jason, on the suggestion of Hera, answered, that he would send him to fetch the golden fleece. Pelias accordingly ordered Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was in the possession of king Aëtes in Colchis, and was guarded by a dragon. Jason set sail in the ship Argo, accompanied by the chief heroes of Greece.

He obtained the fleece with the assistance of Medea, whom he made his wife, and with whom he returned to Iolcus. [For a fuller account see ARGONAUTAE.] On his arrival at Iolcus, Jason, according to one account, found his aged father still alive, and succeeded him in the kingdom (Hes. Th. 997; Ov. Met. vii. 162), but according to the more common tradition (which was probably late, and accounted for the removal of Jason and Medea to Corinth), Aeson had been slain by Pelias, during the absence of Jason, who accordingly called upon Medea to take vengeance on Pelias. Medea thereupon persuaded the daughters of Pelias to cut their father to pieces and boil him, in order to restore him to youth and vigour, as she had before changed a ram into a lamb, by boiling the body in a cauldron. (Diod. iv. 50; Apollod. i. 9, 27.) But Pelias was never restored to life, and his son Acastus expelled Jason and Medea from Iolcus. They then went to Corinth, where Jason deserted Medea, in order to marry Glauce or Creusa, daughter of Creon, the king of the country. Medea in revenge sent Glauce a poisoned garment, which burnt her to death when she put it on. Creon likewise perished in the flames. Medea also killed her two children, Mermerus and Phereus, and then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. (Eur. Medea; Paus. ii. 3, 11; Diod. iv. 54.) Later writers represent Jason as becoming in the end reconciled to Medea, returning with her to Colchis, and there restoring Aëtes to his kingdom, of which he had been deprived (Tac. Ann. vi. 34; Just. xlii. 2). The death of Jason is related in different ways. According to some, he made away with himself from grief (Diod. iv. 55); according to others, he was crushed by the poop of the ship Argo, which fell upon him as he was lying near it. (Staphyl. Fr. 5; Schol. on the Argument of Eur. Med.)—2. Tyrant of Phæacæ and Tagus (or generalissimo) of Thessaly (Dict. of Antiq. art. Tagus), was probably the son of Lycophron, who established a tyranny on the ruins of aristocracy at Phæacæ.

He succeeded his father as tyrant of Pherac soon after B.C. 395, and in a few years extended his power over almost the whole of Thessaly. Pharsalus was the only city in Thessaly which maintained its independence, under the government of Polydamas; but even this place submitted to him in 375. In the following year (374) he was elected Tagus of Thessaly. His power was strengthened by the weakness of the other Greek states, and by the exhausting contest in which Thebes and Sparta were engaged. He had every prospect of becoming master of Greece, when, at the height of his power, he was assassinated, 370. Jason had all the qualifications of a great general and diplomatist: he was active, prudent, capable of enduring much fatigue, and skilful in concealing his own designs and penetrating those of his enemies. As a strong and capable ruler he won the admiration and friendship of Isocrates (Xen. Hell. vi. 1; Diod. xv. 57; Paus. vi. 17; Isocr. Epist. ad Jas. fil.).—3. Of Argos, a historian, under Hadrian, wrote a work on Greece in four books.

Javolenus Priscus, an eminent Roman jurist, was born about the commencement of the reign of Vespasian (A.D. 79), and was one of the council of Antonius Pius (Vit. Ant. 12; Plin. Ep. vi. 15). He was a pupil of Caelius Sabinus, and a leader of the Sabinian or Cassian school. [CAPITO.]

Jaxartes (Ἰαξάρτης: Syr, Syðeria, or Sy-houn), a great river of Central Asia, about which the ancient accounts are very different and confused. It rises in the Comedi Montes (Moussour), and flows NW. into the Sea of Aral: the ancients supposed it to fall into the N. side of the Caspian, not distinguishing between the two seas. It divided Scythia from Scythia. On its banks dwelt a Scythian tribe called Jaxartae. (Ptol. vi. 12, 1; Strab. pp. 507-517.)

Jericho or Hiërichus (Ἱεριχώ, Ἱεριχοῦς: Er-Riha? Ru.), a city of the Canaanites, in a plain on the W. side of the Jordan near its mouth, was destroyed by Joshua, rebuilt in the time of the Judges, and formed an important frontier fortress of Judaea. Under Gabinius, B.C. 57, Jericho was one of the five chief centres of administration for Judaea (Jos. Ant. xiv. 5, 4). It was again destroyed, by Titus, rebuilt under Hadrian, and finally destroyed during the crusades.

Jerome. [HIERONYMUS.]

Jërüsälëm or Hiërosölýmä (Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα: Ἱεροσόλυμης: Jerusalem), the capital of Palestine. It was the chief city of the Jebusites till B.C. 1050, when David took the city, and made it his capital. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 588. In B.C. 536, the Jewish exiles, having been permitted by Cyrus to return, rebuilt the city and temple. In B.C. 332, Jerusalem quietly submitted to Alexander (Jos. Ant. xi. 8). During the wars which followed his death, the city was taken by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus (B.C. 320), and remained subject to the Greek kings of Egypt till the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III. the Great, king of Syria, B.C. 198. Up to this time the Jews had been allowed freedom of their religion and local government; but the oppression of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes provoked a rebellion, which was at first put down when Antiochus took Jerusalem (B.C. 170); but in a new revolt under the Maccabees, the city was retaken in B.C. 163. [MACCABEÆ.] In B.C. 133, Jerusalem was taken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and its fortifications dismantled, but its government was left in the hands of the Maccabee John Hyrcanns, whose son, Aristobulus, assumed the title of king of Judaea, and Jerusalem continued to be the capital of the kingdom till B.C. 63, when it was taken by Pompey. (Strab. pp. 759-762; Tac. Hist. v. 9; Jos. Ant. xv. 11.) For the events which followed, see HYRCANUS, HERODES, and PALAESTINA. In A.D. 70, the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans was put down, and Jerusalem was taken by Titus, after a siege of several months, and razed to the ground (Jos. B. J. vii. 1, 2; Tac. Hist. v. 9-14). In consequence of a new revolt of the Jews, the emperor Hadrian resolved to destroy all vestiges of their national and religious peculiarities; and, as one means to this end, he established a new Roman colony, on the ground where Jerusalem had stood, by the name of Aelia Capitolina, and built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the Jewish temple, A.D. 135 (Dio Cass. lxi. 12; Enseb. H. E. iv. 6). [For a fuller account see Diet. of the Bible.]

Jocastë (Ἰοκάστη), called Epicaste in Homer, daughter of Menoeceus, and wife of the Theban king Laius, by whom she became the mother of Oedipus. She afterwards married Oedipus, not knowing that he was her son; and when she discovered the crime she had unwittingly committed, she put an end to her life. For details see OEDIPUS.

Joppë, Joppa (Ἰόππη: O. T. Japho: Jaffa), a very ancient maritime city of Palestine, and, before the building of Caesarea, the only seaport of the whole country, and therefore called by Strabo the port of Jerusalem, lay just S. of the boundary between Judaea and Samaria (Strab. p. 759).

Jordānes (Ἰορδάνης, Ἰόρδανος: Jordan, Esch Seheria), has its source at the S. foot of M. Hermou (the S. most part of Anti-Libanus), near Paneas (aft. Caesarea Philippi), whence it flows S. into the little lake Semechonitis, and thence into the Sea of Galilee (Lake of Tiberias), and thence by a winding course in a narrow valley, depressed below the level of the surrounding country, into the lake Asphaltites (Dead Sea).

Jordānes, or Jornandes, a historian in the time of Justinian, the 6th century of our era. He was a Goth by birth, and was secretary to the king of the Alani. The idea that he was a bishop probably arose from his being confused with a bishop of that name (perh. bishop of Ravenna) to whom a certain Honorius Scholasticus wrote a poem. The title Episcopus is not given to the historian in the best MSS., nor is there any ground for identifying him with Jordanes bishop of Croton about 537 A.D. As regards the name of the historian, he appears as Jordanes in the best, as Jornandes only in inferior MSS. He wrote two historical works in Latin. 1. De Getarum (Gothorum) Origine et Rebus Gestis (in short, Getica), containing the history of the Goths, from the earliest times down to their subjugation by Belisarius in 541. The work is abridged from the lost history of the Goths by Cassiodorus, to which Jordanes added various particulars; but it is written in semi-barbarous Latin, is compiled without judgment, and is characterised by partiality to the Goths, but gives valuable details. 2. De Summa Temporum vel Origine Actibusque Gentis Romanorum (in short, Romana), a short compendium of history from the creation down to the victory obtained by Narses, in 552, over king Theodotus. It is valuable for accounts of the barbarous nations of the North, and the countries which they inhabited. Both works edited by Th. Mommsen, Berl. 1882.

Josēphus, Flāvius, the Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, A.D. 37. On his mother's side he was descended from the Asmonæan princes, while from his father, Matthias, he inherited the priestly office. At the age of 26 he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judæa, had sent thither as prisoners. Here he gained the favour of Poppæa, and not only effected the release of his friends, but received presents from the empress. On his return to Jerusalem he found his countrymen bent on a revolt from Rome, from which he tried to dissuade them; but failing in this, he gave in to the popular feeling. He was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and defended Jotapata against Vespasian. When the place was taken, the life of Josephus was spared by Vespasian, whose favour he won by prophesying that the empire would fall to him and Titus in succession. Vespasian released him from captivity when he was proclaimed emperor, nearly three years afterwards (A.D. 70). Josephus was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards accompanied him to Rome. He took the name of Flavius from Vespasian, who gave him a house at Rome, where he dwelt till his death, about 98. His time at Rome appears to have been employed mainly in the composition of his works.—The works of Josephus are written in Greek. They are:—1. The History of the Jewish War (Περὶ τοῦ Ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου), in seven books, written in Syro-Chaldaic, and then translated by him into Greek. It begins with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in B.C. 170, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus's own time, and gives a detailed account of the war with Rome, especially valuable as a graphic account by an eye-witness. 2. The Jewish Antiquities (Ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία), in twenty books, completed about A.D. 93, and addressed to Epaphroditus. The title as well as the number of books may have been suggested by the Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. It gives an account of Jewish History from the creation of the world to A.D. 66. In this work Josephus seeks to accommodate the Jewish religion to heathen tastes and prejudices, but it has value for historical reference. 3. His own life, in one book. This is an appendage to the Archæologia, and is addressed to the same Epaphroditus. It was not written earlier than A.D. 97, since Agrippa II. is mentioned in it as no longer living. 4. Against Apion, in two books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as impugned the antiquity of the Jewish nation, on the ground of the silence of Greek writers respecting it. [APION.] The treatise exhibits extensive acquaintance with Greek literature and philosophy. 5. Εἰς Μακκαβαλοῦς ἢ περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, in one book. Its genuineness is doubtful. It is a declamatory account of the martyrdom of Eleazar (an aged priest), and of seven youths and their mother, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes. Editions by Havercamp, Amst. 1726; by Bekker, Lips. 1855.

Joviānus, Flāvius Claudius, was elected emperor by the soldiers, in June A. D. 363, after the death of Julian [JULIANUS], whom he had accompanied in his campaign against the Persians. In order to effect his retreat in safety, Jovian surrendered to the Persians the Roman conquests beyond the Tigris, and several for-resses in Mesopotamia. He died suddenly at a small town on the frontiers of Bithynia and Galatia, February 17th, 364, after a reign of little more than seven months. Jovian was a Christian; but he was tolerant. (Amm. Marc. xxv. 5-10.)

Jūba (Ἰόβας). 1. King of Numidia, was son of Hiempsal, who was re-established on the throne by Pompey. On the breaking out of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, he actively espoused the cause of the latter; and, accordingly, when Caesar sent Curio into Africa (B. C. 49), he supported the Pompeian general Attius Varus with a large body of troops. Curio was defeated by their united forces, and fell in the battle. (Caes. B. C. ii. 23-44; Appian, B. C. ii. 44-46; Lucan, iv. 581.) In 46 Juba fought along with Scipio against Caesar himself, and was present at the decisive battle of Thapsus. Not long after this defeat he put an end to his own life. (Bell. Afr. 25-94; Appian, B. C. ii. 95-100; Suet. Jul. 35.)—2. King of Mauretania, son of the preceding, was a uere child at his father's death (46), was carried a prisoner to Rome by Caesar, to grace his triumph. He was brought up in Italy, and became distinguished for learning. After the death of Antony (30), Augustus conferred upon Juba his paternal kingdom of Numidia, and at the same time gave him in marriage Cleopatra, otherwise called Selene, the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra (Dio Cass. li. 15). In 25 he received Mauretania, in exchange for Numidia, which was made a Roman province. He continued to reign in Mauretania till his death, which happened about A. D. 19. (Dio Cass. liii. 26, liv. 28; Strab. p. 828.) He wrote a great number of works in almost every branch of literature, especially on history; but only a few fragments survive (Athen. pp. 83, 98, 175, 229). He is cited by Pliny as an authority on natural history.

Jūdaea, Judæi. [PALÆSTINA.]

Jugurtha (Ἰουγούρθας or Ἰογούρθας), king of Numidia, was an illegitimate son of Mastanabal, and a grandson of Masinissa. He lost his father at an early age, but was adopted by his uncle Micipsa, who brought him up with his own sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself both by his abilities and his skill in all bodily exercises, and gained so much popularity with the Numidians that he began to excite the jealousy of Micipsa. In order to remove him to a distance, Micipsa sent him, in B. C. 134, to assist Scipio against Numantia. Here his courage and ability gained for him the favour of Scipio; and this circumstance determined Micipsa to adopt him as a useful supporter for his sons. Micipsa died in 118, leaving the kingdom to Jugurtha and his two sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal, in common. Jugurtha soon found an opportunity to assassinate Hiempsal at Thimida, and afterwards defeated Adherbal in battle. Adherbal fled to Rome to invoke the assistance of the senate; but Jugurtha, by a lavish distribution of bribes, obtained a decree of the senate that the kingdom of Numidia should be equally divided between the two competitors; but the commissioners entrusted with the execution of this decree were also bribed by Jugurtha, who thus succeeded in obtaining the W. division of the kingdom, adjacent to Mauretania, by far the larger and richer portion of the two (117). But this advantage was far from contenting him. Shortly afterwards he invaded the territories of Adherbal with a large army, and defeated him. Adherbal made his escape to the fortress of Cirta, where he was blockaded by Jugurtha. The Romans commanded Jugurtha to abstain from further hostilities; but he paid no attention to their commands, and at length gained possession of Cirta, and put Adherbal to death, 112. War was now declared against Jugurtha at Rome, and the consul, L. Calpurnius Bestia, was sent into Africa, 112-111. Jugurtha had recourse to his customary arts; and by means of large sums of money given to Bestia and M. Scourus, his principal lieutenant, he purchased from them a favourable peace. The conduct of Bestia excited the greatest indignation at Rome; and Jugurtha was summoned to the city under a safe conduct, the popular party hoping to be able to obtain a conviction by means of his evidence. The scheme, however, failed; since one of the tribunes who had been gained over by the friends of Bestia and Scourus forbade the king to give evidence. Soon afterwards Jugurtha contrived the assassination of Massiva, who claimed the throne of Numidia. [MASSIVA.] Jugurtha was ordered to quit Rome, and war was renewed; but the consul, Sp. Postumius Albinus, who arrived to conduct it (110), was able to effect nothing. When the consul went to Rome to hold the comitia, he left his brother Anlus in command of the army. Anlus was defeated by Jugurtha; great part of his army was cut to pieces, and the rest only escaped a similar fate by the ignominy of passing under the yoke. This disgrace roused the spirit of the Roman people; the treaty concluded by Anlus was annulled; and the consul Q. Caecilius Metellus was sent into Africa at the head of a new army (109) with Marius as one of his lieutenants. Metellus was an able general and an upright man, whom Jugurtha was unable to cope with in the field, or to seduce by bribes, and routed the troops of his enemy, though he could not secure his person. Metellus was succeeded in the command in 106 by Marius; but the cause of Jugurtha had meantime been espoused by his father-in-law, Bocchus, king of Mauretania, who had advanced to his support with a large army. The united forces of Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated, though not without difficulty, by Marius; and Bocchus purchased the forgiveness of the Romans by surrendering his son-in-law to Sulla, the quaestor of Marius (105). Jugurtha remained in captivity till the return of Marius to Rome, when, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror (Jan. 1, 104), he was thrown into the prison below the Capitol (Tullianum), which he called 'his bath of ice,' and there left to die of cold and hunger. (Sall. Jugurtha; Liv. Ep. lxii.-lxvii.; Plut. Mar. 7-10, Sull. 3, 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 11.)

Júlia. 1. Aunt of Caesar the dictator, and wife of C. Marius the elder. She died B. C. 68, and her nephew pronounced her funeral oration. (Plut. Mar. 6; Suet. Jul. 6.)—2. Mother of M. Antonius, the triumvir. In the proscription of the triumvirate (43) she saved the life of her brother, L. Caesar [CAESAR, No. 5].—3. Sister of Caesar the dictator, and wife of M. Atius Balbus, by whom she had Atia, the mother of Augustus [ATIA].—4. Daughter of Caesar the dictator, by Cornelia, and his only child in marriage, was married to Cn. Pompey in 59. She was a woman of beauty and virtue, and was tenderly attached to her husband, although twenty-three years older than herself. She died in childhood in 54. (Plut. Pomp. 48, 53; Vell. Pat. ii. 44, 47.)—5. Daughter of Augustus by Scribonia, and his only child, was born in 39.

She was educated with great strictness, but grew up one of the most profligate, as well as one of the most beautiful and brilliant, women of her age. She was thrice married: to M. Marcellus, her first cousin, in 25; after his death (23) without issue, to M. Agrippa, by whom she had three sons, C. and L. Caesar, and Agrippa Postumus, and two daughters, Julia and Agrippina; after Agrippa's death, in 12, to Tiberius Nero, the future emperor. In B. C. 2 Augustus at length became acquainted with the misconduct of his daughter, whose notorious adulteries had been one reason why her husband Tiberius had quitted Italy four years before. (Suet. Aug. 19, 63, 64; Vell. Pat. i. 100; Dio Cass. lv. 10; Macrob. i. 11, vi. 5.) She was banished to Pandataria, an island off the coast of Campania, and at the end of five years was removed to Rbégium, but never suffered to quit the bounds of the city. Some have thought that she was the 'Coriuna' celebrated by Ovid in poems written between B. C. 14 and 2; but this is not very probable. Augustus bequeathed her no legacy, and did not allow her ashes to repose in his mausoleum. Tiberius on his accession (A. D. 14) deprived her of almost all the necessaries of life; and she died in the same year (Suet. Tib. 50; Tac. Ann. i. 53).—6. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of L. Aemilius Paulus. She inherited her mother's licentiousness, and was banished by her grandfather, Augustus, to the little island Tremerus, on the coast of Apulia, A. D. 9, where she lived nearly twenty years. She died in 28. It was believed by many that an intrigue of Ovid's with this Julia was the cause of his banishment, A. D. 9. [OVIDIUS.] (Tac. Ann. iii. 24, iv. 71; Suet. Aug. 64, 101.)—7. Youngest child of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A. D. 18; was married to M. Vinicius in 33; and was banished in 37 by her brother Caligula. She was recalled by Claudius, but was afterwards put to death at Messalina's instigation. The charge brought against her was adultery, and Seneca, the philosopher, was banished to Corsica as the partner of her guilt (Dio Cass. lix. 3, 8).—8. Daughter of Drusus and Livia, the sister of Germanicus. She was married, A. D. 20, to her first cousin, Nero, son of Germanicus and Agrippina; and after Nero's death, to Rubellius Blandus, by whom she had a son, Rubellius Plautus. She, too, was put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina, 59. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43; Dio Cass. lx. 18.)—9. Daughter of Titus, the son of Vespasian, married Flavius Sabinus, a nephew of the emperor Vespasian. (Dio Cass. lxxvii. 3; Suet. Dom. 17, 22; Juv. ii. 32.)—10. Domna [DOMNA].—11. Drusilla [DRUSILLA].—12. Maesa [MAESA].

Júlia Gens, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome, was of Alban origin, and was removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius upon the destruction of Alba Longa. It claimed descent from the mythical Iulus, the son of Venus and Anchises. The most distinguished family in the gens is that of CAESAR. Under the empire there were a great number of persons of the name of Julius, the most important of whom are spoken of under their surnames.

Julianus Didius. [DIDIUS.]

Julianus, Flavius Claudius, whom Christian writers surnamed the Apostate, Roman emperor, A.D. 361–363. He was born at Constantinople, A.D. 331, and was the son of Julius Constantius by his second wife, Basilina, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. Julian and his elder brother, Gallus, were the only members of the imperial family whose lives were spared by the sons of Constantine the Great, on his death in 337. The two brothers were educated with care, and were brought up as Christians; but as they advanced to manhood, they were watched with jealousy and suspicion by the emperor Constantius. After the execution of Gallus in 354 [GALLUS], the life of Julian was in great peril; but he succeeded in pacifying the suspicions of the emperor, and was allowed to go to Athens in 355 to pursue his studies. Here he devoted himself with ardour to the study of Greek literature and philosophy. Among his fellow-students were Gregory of Nazianzus and Basil. Julian had already abandoned Christianity in his heart and returned to the pagan faith of his ancestors; but fear of Constantius prevented him from making an open declaration of his apostasy. In November, 355, he received from Constantius the title of Caesar, and was sent into Gaul to oppose the Germans, who had crossed the Rhine, and were ravaging the east of Gaul. During the next five years (356–360) Julian carried on war against the German confederacies of the Alemanni and Franks with great success, and gained many victories over them. His administration was distinguished by justice and wisdom; and he gained the goodwill of the provinces intrusted to his care. His growing popularity awakened the jealousy of Constantius, who commanded him to send some of his best troops to the East, to serve against the Persians. His soldiers refused to leave their favourite general, and proclaimed him emperor at Paris in 360. After fruitless negotiations between Julian and Constantius, both parties prepared for war. In 361 Julian marched along the valley of the Danube towards Constantinople; but Constantius, who had set out from Syria to oppose his rival, died on his march in Cilicia, and left Julian the undisputed master of the empire. On the 11th of December Julian entered Constantinople. He lost no time in publicly avowing himself a pagan, but he proclaimed a policy of religious toleration. He did not, however, act with absolute impartiality. He preferred pagans as his civil and military officers, and forbade the Christians to teach rhetoric and grammar in the schools. He allowed the Jews to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. In the following year (362) Julian went to Syria in order to make preparations for the war against the Persians. He spent the winter at Antioch, where he made the acquaintance of the orator Libanius; and in the spring of 363 he set out against the Persians. He crossed the Euphrates and the Tigris; and after burning his fleet on the Tigris, that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy, he boldly marched into the interior of the country in search of the Persian king. His army suffered from the heat, and from want of water and provisions; and he was at length compelled to retreat. The Persians now harassed his rear. Still the Romans remained victorious in many engagements; but in the last battle fought, on the 26th of June, Julian was mortally wounded, and died in the course of the day. Jovian was chosen emperor in his stead, on the field of battle. [JOVIANUS.] Julian was an extraordinary character. As a monarch, he was indefatigable in his attention to business, upright in his administration, and comprehensive in his views; as a man, he was virtuous, in the midst of a profligate age, and did not yield to the temptations of luxury. In consequence of his apostasy he has been calumniated by Christian writers; but for the same reason he has been unduly extolled by heathen authors. It may fairly be urged in his favour that he had become a Christian under compulsion, and that his whole family had been treacherously put to death by the professedly Christian sons of Constantine. The writings of Julian are conspicuous for cleverness and grace of style, and are an evidence of the remarkable activity of his mind. The following are his most important works:—(1) Letters, most of which were intended for public circulation, and are of importance for the history of the time. Edited by Heyler, Mainz, 1828, and Hercher, 1873.—(2) Orationes, on various subjects, as for instance, On the emperor Constantius, On the worship of the sun, On the mother of the gods (Cybele), On true and false Cynicism, &c.—(3) The Caesars, or the Banquet (Καίσαρες ἢ Συμπόσιον), modelled on Varro's Menippean Satires, is one of the most brilliant productions of ancient wit. Julian describes the Roman emperors approaching one after the other to sit round a table in the heavens; and as they come up, their faults, vices, and crimes, are censured with a sort of bitter mirth by old Silenus, whereupon each Caesar defends himself as well as he can. Edited by Heusinger, Gotha, 1736, and by Harless, Erlangen, 1785.—(4) Misopogon or the Enemy of the Beard (Μισοπόγων), a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of the inhabitants of Antioch, who had ridiculed Julian, when he resided in the city, on account of his austere virtues, and had laughed at his allowing his beard to grow in the ancient fashion.—(5) Against the Christians (Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν). This work is lost, but some extracts from it are given in Cyril's reply to it. The most convenient edition of the collected works of Julian is by F. C. Hertlein, Lips. 1875.

Julianus, Salvius, a Roman jurist under Hadrian and the Antonines. He was praefectus urbi, and twice consul, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. By the order of Hadrian, he drew up the edictum perpetuum, important in the history of Roman jurisprudence. His work consisted in collecting edicts of the praetors, in condensing the materials, and in omitting antiquated provisions.

Jūnia. 1. Half-sister of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, and wife of M. Lepidus, the triumvir (Vell. Pat. ii. 88).—2. Tertia, or Tertulla, own sister of the preceding, and the wife of C. Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers. She lived till A.D. 22. (Tac. Ann. iii. 76.)

Jūnia Gens, an ancient patrician house at Rome, to which belonged the celebrated M. Junius Brutus, who took an active part in expelling the Tarquins. But afterwards the gens appears as only plebeian. Under the republic the chief families were those of BRUTUS, BUBULCUS, GRACCHANUS, NORBANUS, PULLUS, SILANUS. The Junii who lived under the empire are likewise spoken of under their various surnames.

Jūno, an old Italian deity afterwards identified with the Greek Hera, who is accordingly always spoken of in Latin literature as Juno. For the mythology see HERA. The word Juno, like Jupiter and also Diovis, contains the root div, signifying a deity of the sky. Juno, therefore, was a moon-goddess, and as Jupiter is the king of heaven and of the gods, so Juno is the queen of heaven, or the female Jupiter. Hence as Juno Regina she had a cella adjoining the Capitoline temple of Jupiter (and a temple also under that name on the Aventine). She was worshipped at Rome from early times, and is reckoned by Varro with Jupiter and Minerva 'inter antiquissimos deos' (Tertull. ad Nat. ii. 12). Being, like Hera, a goddess of the moon, she had the same functions in the Roman mythology, as goddess of childbirth (Juno Lucina, Verg. Ecl. iv. 8; Hor. Epod. v. 5; Ter. Ad. iii. 4, 41), and as goddess of marriage, thence called Pronuba, Juga, Domiduca (Verg. Aen. iv. 166; Mart. Cap. ii. 149; Dict. of Ant. art. Matrimonium); and as she was the goddess of the month, the Calends were sacred to her. These attributes do not seem borrowed from Greek mythology, though of course the legends about her in literature were; the inference is rather that she represents a deity worshipped by the old stock of Greek and Italian races before they separated, and was handed down to the one as Hera, to the other as Juno. A more distinctly Roman attribute is that she was regarded as the guardian spirit of women from birth to death, just as the Genius was to men, and was spoken of as their juno [see p. 359, b]. As she was the model and pattern of dignified womanhood and matronly honour she was called Juno Moneta, the giver of good counsel, and a temple under this title was dedicated to her on the Capitol. The mint was attached to this temple from the time of Camillus (Liv. vii. 28; Ov. Fast. vi. 182), so that from her title comes our word money. She was known also as Juno Sospita (the saviour); a worship derived from Lanuvium and transferred to two of her temples at Rome (Liv. viii. 14, xxxii. 30), was celebrated on the Calends of February (Ov. Fast. ii. 55). The great festival, celebrated by all the women, in honour of Juno, was called Matronalia (Dict. of Ant. s.v.), and took place on the 1st of March. She was worshipped also by women as Juno Caprotina, apparently a goddess of fruitful marriage: the name may come from capra, a goat, but was explained by a traditional custom of sacrificing under a wild fig-tree (caprificus; Macrobi. i. 11, 36); and as Juno Quiritis, Curitis or Curritis, which is said to designate her being a war-goddess of the Sabines (armed with a spear), but may also be compared with Janus Quirinus (p. 458, a). The title Juno Caelestis refers to a worship of the Phoenician Astarte introduced from Carthage after the third Punic war. The animals sacred to Juno were: the peacock to Juno Regina of the Capitoline temple; the goose to Juno Moneta, whose temple was also on the Capitol (Liv. v. 47); the crow, which symbolised faithful marriage (Acl. H. A. iii. 9); and for Caprotina the goat, whence she is shown on some coins drawn in a carriage by goats. In Etruria she was worshipped under the name of Cupra. In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted. [HERA.]

Jūpiter or Juppiter, called Zeus by the Greeks. The Greek god (whose myths were transferred in literature to the Italian deity) is spoken of in a separate article [ZEUS]. Jupiter was originally an elemental divinity, and his name signifies the bright heaven, being originally Diovis-pater: Diovis, like Ζεύς, comes from the root div to shine. Another form of his name, Diespiter, connected similarly with the bright day, conveyed the same idea. The name was spelt indifferently Jupiter or Juppiter till the end of the republic, but under the empire nearly always Juppiter. The Etruscans called him Tinea, and in Oscan his name was Lucetius, i.e. god of light (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 567), a name in the hymns of the Salii (Macrobi. i. 15, 14). Being the lord of heaven, he was worshipped as the god of rain, storms, thunder, and lightning, whence he had the epithets of Pluvius, Fulgurator, Tonitrualis, Tonans, and Fulminator. The worship of Jupiter seems to have belonged, in some form or other, to all the nations of the Italian stock; but he was peculiarly the great deity of the Latin nation. All the Latin communities united in the sacrifice to Jupiter Latiaris in his sacred grove on the Alban Mount, probably from a date much earlier than the beginning of Rome [Dict. of Ant. art. Feriae Latinae]. There is no doubt that the later Romans worshipped Janus and Jupiter on their Palatine settlement, while the Sabine Titii worshipped Quirinus, Saucis and Sol on the Quirinal, but both may have united for the worship of the Capitoline Jupiter even before their amalgamation; and after it Jupiter at once took the supreme place as god and protector of the Roman people, the place of Janus being thenceforth quite subordinate and first only in formularies. Another very old seat of the worship of Jupiter was Lanuvium, in some ways a religious centre of the Latins; here, on the river Numicus, was a shrine of a deity called sometimes Jupiter Indiges, sometimes Aeneas Indiges. That Jupiter was the original god of the place cannot be doubted [see p. 442, b]. The earliest site of the old Roman worship seems to be the Fagatal, a sacred tree or grove of Jupiter (Varr. L. L. v. 49, 50, 152; Fest. p. 87), apparently some relic of primitive tree or grove worship, traceable in the 'quercus pastoribus sacra' (Liv. i. 10) and in the grove of Jupiter on the Alban Mount, and resembling the worship of Diana Nemorensis. Jupiter Elicius was invoked as the god who gave rain, and belonged to the religious processions in times of drought called Aquaclivium [Dict. of Ant. s.v.], when the sacred stone called the Lapis Manalis was carried to the Capitol. This was probably the true meaning of the title—to obtain water from Jupiter, the god of the sky—though legends connected it with drawing Jupiter from heaven to interpret omens of lightning (Liv. i. 20; Ov. Fast. iii. 285–348). As the god who fertilised the earth with his rain he was the nourishing god Jupiter Ruminus, and as Jupiter Silvanus and Jupiter Arborator he was identified with the rural gods. It is probable that the temple of Jupiter Feretrius on the Capitol was among the oldest, if not actually the oldest, in Rome (Liv. i. 10; Nep. Attic. 20); and there is little doubt that the name was derived from ferire to strike, and taught that Jupiter was the god of treaties and oaths, which were ratified by the killing of the victim. In the temple of Jupiter Feretrius were preserved the sceptre of the god and the stone (lapis, silex) which was brought in making treaties for the formal striking of the victim: the axe no doubt being afterwards used for the actual slaughter (Liv. i. 24, ix. 5, xxx. 43; Pol. iii. 25). Some have thought that it was a stone axe, still used as it had been before the days of iron axes, or because iron was unlucky; but the more probable view is that it was a fire-stone or flint (though it must be recollected that silex does not necessarily mean a flint), which had from primitive times been regarded as the symbol for the god of lightning, or else merely a rough stone like the earliest symbols of many deities in many nations. Hence the expression Jovem lapidem jurare (i.e. to swear by the stone which is Jupiter), for a peculiarly solemn oath (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 12; Gell. i. 21). Later a historical reason was found for the name from the custom of dedicating in this temple the spolia opima taken on the field of battle from the general of the enemy, as was done traditionally by Romulus and in later times by Cossus and Marcellus [Dict. of Ant. art. Spolia]. Accordingly in Jupiter Feretrius, Stator (stayer of flight), Victor, Invictus, the Romans recognised him as the giver of victory, hardly less than Mars the god of war himself. His chief temple at Rome was that of Jupiter Capitolinus. The two other deities of the Capitoline triad, Juno and Minerva, had cellae in this temple, and were admitted to the sacred feast called Epulum Jovis; but in the temple he reigned as Jupiter Optimus Maximus, the Head of the State and the giver of its power and wealth: in it were the earthenware image holding a thunderbolt, and the quadriga which belonged to him as the god of thunder. Here ended the triumphal processions, and the victorious general, offering white oxen—white as for the god of light, like the white lamb offered on the Ides (Ov. Fast. i. 56)—placed on the knees of the god his laurel wreath. That the general who could not obtain this triumph should triumph instead on the Alban Mount (Liv. xxxiii. 23) is another indication that this worship of Jupiter was only an offshoot of that of Jupiter Latiaris. The temple, which was the central point for the whole Roman people, was said to have been dedicated by Tarquinius (if so, probably on the site of an older sanctuary) and completed by his son (Cic. Rep. ii. 20, 36; Liv. i. 38, 55; Tac. Hist. iii. 72); its age was marked by a nail driven into the wall by the praetor on the Ides of each September (Liv. vii. 3); it was burnt in 83 and rebuilt by Sulla and completed by Catulus; in place of the ancient earthenware image a copy in gold and ivory of the Olympian Zeus was set up in it. The temple was twice burnt again, in A.D. 70 and 80, and a last restoration was made by Domitian. In each phase of its existence it was richly endowed by offerings from victorious generals, from wealthy citizens, and from foreign princes. In honour of the god both the Ludi Capitolini and the Ludi Romani were held

[see Dict. of Ant. s.vv.]. By the country people Jupiter was celebrated, as in the earliest times, as the deity who gave them their prosperity, and he therefore received sacrifices before harvest, and libations at the vintage [Dict. of Ant. art. Vinalia] in the character of Jupiter-Liber. It has been plausibly suggested that these vintage festivals of Jupiter-Liber date from the overthrow of the Etruscan power in Latium and Campania by an alliance of Latins with Greeks, from whom they learnt Greek viticulture, and that the story about Mezentius arose from this [MEZENTIUS]. By the country householder, too, Jupiter Dapalis was honoured as the giver of good (Cato, R.R. 132); and that in all Roman family life Jupiter Farreus had been a guardian of the marriage rites appears in the ceremony of marriage by confarreatio. The worship of Jupiter was carried wherever the Roman colonies established themselves, and there was naturally a tendency to identify with his worship that of kindred deities among conquered nations: hence the worship of Jupiter Penninus, who had a temple on the Great St. Bernard, replacing the sanctuary of a Celtic deity; hence also the more famous temples to Jupiter Dolichenus and Jupiter Heliopolitanus, who took the places of Eastern sun-gods at Doliche and Heliopolis.

Jura or Jurassus Mons (Jura), a range of mountains which run N. of the lake Lemanus as far as Augusta Rauracorum (August, near Basle), on the Rhine, forming the boundary between the Sequani and Helvetii (Caes. B.G. i. 2).

Justiniana. 1. Prima, a town in Illyria, near Tauresium, the birthplace of Justinian, was built by that emperor; it became the residence of the archbishop of Illyria, and, in the middle ages, of the Servian kings.—2. Secunda, also a town in Illyria, previously called Ulpiana, was enlarged and embellished by Justinian.

Justinianus, emperor of Constantinople, A.D. 527–563, and one of the greatest of the emperors. He was born near Tauresium in Illyria, A.D. 483; was adopted by his uncle, the emperor Justinus, in 520; succeeded his uncle in 527; married the beautiful but licentious actress, Theodora, who exercised great influence over him; and died in 565, leaving the crown to his nephew, Justin II. His foreign wars were glorious, and though he took no personal part, he deserves the credit of employing able generals and fostering the organisation of his armies. The empire of the Vandals in Africa was overthrown by Belisarius, and their king Gelimer led a prisoner to Constantinople; and the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italy was likewise destroyed, by the successive victories of Belisarius and Narses. [BELISARIUS; NARSSES.] So that Justinian reunited the dominions of the West and East, and his empire extended from the Atlantic to the Euphrates. Justinian adorned Constantinople with many magnificent buildings, among them the great church of S. Sophia; but the cost of their erection, as well as the expenses of his foreign wars, obliged him to impose heavy taxation. The greatest work, however, of Justinian is his legislation. He resolved to establish a perfect system of written laws for all his dominions; and, for this end, to make two great collections, one of the imperial constitutions, the other of all that was valuable in the works of jurists. His first work was the collection of the imperial constitutions. This he commenced in 528, in the second year of his reign. The task was entrusted to a commission of ten, who completed their labours in the following year (529); and their collection was declared to be law under the title of Justinianus Codex.—In 530 Tribonian, who had been one of the commission of ten employed in drawing up the Code, was authorised by the emperor to select fellow-labourers to assist him in the other division of the undertaking. Tribonian selected sixteen coadjutors; and this commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received from former emperors 'auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandarumque legum.' They were ordered to divide their materials into 50 Books, and to subdivide each Book into Titles (Tituli). Nothing that was valuable was to be excluded, nothing that was obsolete was to be admitted, and neither repetition nor inconsistency was to be allowed. This work was to bear the name Digesta or Pandectae. The work was completed, in accordance with the instructions that had been given, in the short space of three years; and on the 30th of Dec. 533, it received from the imperial sanction the authority of law. It comprehends upwards of 9000 extracts, in the selection of which the compilers made use of nearly 2000 different books, containing more than 3,000,000 lines.—The Code and the Digest contained a complete body of law; but as they were not adapted to elementary instruction, a commission was appointed, consisting of Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, to compose an institutional work, which should contain the elements of the law (legum incunabula), and should not be encumbered with useless matter. Accordingly they produced a treatise under the title of Institutiones, which was based on elementary works of a similar character, but chiefly on the Institutiones of GAIUS, and served as a manual or as an introduction to the Code and Digest. The Institutiones consisted of four books, and were published, with the imperial sanction, at the same time as the Digest.—After the publication of the Digest and the Institutiones, 50 Decisions and some new Constitutions also were promulgated by the emperor. This rendered a revision of the Code necessary; and accordingly a new Code was promulgated at Constantinople on the 16th of November, 534. The second edition (Codex Repetitae Praelectionis) is the Code that we now possess, in twelve books, each of which is divided into titles.—Justinian subsequently published various new Constitutions, to which he gave the name of Novellae Constitutiones. These Constitutions form a kind of supplement to the Code, and were published at various times from 535 to 565.—The four legislative works of Justinian, the Institutiones, Digesta or Pandectae, Codex, and Novellae, are included under the general name of Corpus Juris Civilis, and form the Roman law, as received in Europe.—Editions of the Corpus for general use are by Gothefredus and Van Leeuwen, Amst. 1663, 2 vols. fol.;

Justinus. 1. The historian, of uncertain date, but who probably lived in the time of the Antonines, is the author of an extant work entitled Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV. This work is taken from the Historiae Philippicae of Trogus Pompeius, who lived in the time of Augustus. The title Philippicae was given to it because its main object was to give the history of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but it was written in a digressive manner, so that it formed a kind of universal history from the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the conquest of the East by Rome. The original work of Trogus, which is lost, is thought by some to have been a translation of a Greek history of Timagenes, which was based on the Φιλιππικὰ of Theopompus, and on the works of Ephorus, Timaeus, Polybius, and others. The work of Justin is not so much an abridgment of that of Trogus, as a selection of such parts as seemed to him most worthy of being generally known. Ed. by F. Rühl, 1859; A. de Gutschmid, 1886.—2. Surnamed the Martyr, A.D. 103-165. [Dict. of Christ. Biogr.] Juthungi, a tribe of the Alemani, who dwelt on the N. side of the Danube between Vienna and Pesth (Ann. Marc. xvii. 6).

Juturna, whose name was transferred in the Aeneid to the sister of Turnus (Verg. Aen. xii. 139) was an Italian goddess of fountains, originally of a spring near Lavinium. A temple was dedicated to its nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius by Lutatius Catulus; and sacrifices were offered to her on the 11th of January (Ov. Fast. i. 463). A pond in the forum, between the temples of Castor and Vesta, was called Lacus Juturnae. Latin writers derived her name from juvare, because of the healing powers of her spring (Varr. L. L. v. 71; Serv. ad Aen. xii. 139), but in the oldest inscriptions it appears as Diuturna. She is said to have been beloved by Jupiter, who rewarded her with immortality and the rule over the waters (Verg. Aen. l. e.; Ov. Fast. ii. 583); but another tradition makes her the wife of Janus [see p. 457, b].

Juvavum or Jovavum (Salzburg), a town in Noricum, on the river Jovavus or Isonta (Salza). It was one of the towns of Noricum which were made municipia by Claudius (Plin. iii. 146, where some MSS. write Ivaus). It was destroyed by the Heruli in the fifth century, but was afterwards rebuilt.

Jūvĕnālis, Dĕcĭmus Jūniŭs, the great Roman satirist, whose writings date between 100 and 130 A. D. or a little later, but of whose life we have few authentic particulars. His ancient biographers (the date and authors of the 'Vitae' are quite unknown) relate that he was either the son or the adopted son of a rich freedman. He was born at Aquinum (according to a tradition which seems to be confirmed by Juv. iii. 319) at a date which cannot be exactly fixed. By xiii. 17 his birth is placed in the consulship of Fonteius, who may be the consul of 59 A. D. or 67. He is said to have occupied himself with rhetoric, though with no view of political life, until middle age; and his declamatory style gives probability to the statement. He began writing satires, moved thereto by indignation at the vices of the age (i. 22), not earlier than 100 A. D., for he mentions the exile of Marius Priscus, which took place in that year (i. 49). He lived frugally and simply (Sat. xi.), and possessed a country estate or farm near Tibur (xi. 65). He visited Egypt at some period of his life (xv. 45) and according to the inscription dedicated by him to Ceres Helvina at Aquinum (C. I. L. x. 5382; cf. Juv. iii. 320) was at one time tribune of a cohort, a duumvir of Aquinum and a flamen. The anonymous biographer explains his military life and his journey to Egypt by saying that in consequence of his attacks upon a favourite actor of the emperor he was, at the age of 80, removed from Rome by the appointment to a military command in Egypt. The age mentioned seems most improbable for any military office; but Sidonius appears to credit the story that he suffered some sort of exile for offence given to an actor (Sid. Apoll. viii. 270). Suidas also bears the same testimony. It is worthy of notice that one tradition makes Britain his place of exile, and that the cohort to which the above-mentioned inscription makes Juvenal belong was stationed in Britain in A. D. 105 and 124. Of the date or place of his death there is no trustworthy record. That it was later than 127 A. D. is clear from his mention of Aemilius Junius (xv. 27). Martial speaks of him in friendly terms (Mart. vii. 24, 91, xii. 18).—The extant works of Juvenal consist of sixteen satires: the last is incomplete and its genuineness has been doubted, but without good reason. Juvenal is accused by some critics of simulating a passion which he did not feel, but this charge is absolutely without evidence. He adopts a different plan from that of Horace, and, instead of dissuading by ridicule, he denounces vice in the most indignant terms; but whichever method may be the more efficient, there is no note of unreality in the disapprobation of either poet. The moral corruption of Juvenal's age was even greater than anything known to Horace, and there was superadded the tyranny of Domitian's reign. Each satire, in which he paints contemporary society, is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing, and sonorous, and the complete set are a vivid, and, so far as can be judged from other contemporary evidence, a true description of life at Rome in that period. The best annotated edition of Juvenal is by J. E. B. Mayor, London, 1881, 1886; also Pearson and Strong, Oxford, 1887, and text by Bücheler, Berl. 1886. Friedländer's Sittengeschichte Roms supplies one of the best commentaries for readers of Juvenal.

Juventas. [HEBE.]

Juventius. 1. Celsus. [CELSUS.]—2. Laterensis. [LATERENSIS.]—3. Thalna. [THALNA.]

L.

Labda (Λάβδα), daughter of the Bacchiad Amphion, and mother of Cypselus, by Ec tion. [CYPSELUS.]

Labdacidae. [LABDACUS.]

Labdacus (Λάβδακος), son of the Theban king Polydorus, by Nycteis, daughter of Nycteus. Labdacus lost his father at an early age, and was placed under the guardianship of Nycteus, and afterwards under that of Lycus, a brother of Nycteus. When Labdacus had grown up to manhood, Lycus surrendered the government to him; and on the death of Labdacus, which occurred soon after, Lycus undertook the guardianship of his son Laius, the father of Oedipus. (Paus. ix. 5, 2; Apollod. iii. 8, 5; Eur. H. F. 27.)—The name Labdacidae is given to the descendants of Labdacus. [OEDIPUS.]

Labdulum. [SYRACUSAE.]

Labeates, a warlike people in Dalmatia, whose chief town was Scodra, and in whose territory was the Labeatis Palus (Lake of Scutari), through which the river Barmana (Bogana) runs (Liv. xliii. 21).

Labeo, Antistius. 1. A Roman jurist, was one of the murderers of Julius Caesar, and put an end to his life after the battle of Philippi, B. C. 42 (Plut. Brut. 12).—2. Son of the preceding, and a still more eminent jurist (54 B. C.—17 A. D.). He adopted the republican opinions of his father, and was in consequence disliked by Augustus (Tac. Ann. iii. 75; Gell. xiii. 12). It is asserted by some that the Labeone insanior of Horace (Sat. i. 3. 30) was a stroke levelled against this Labeo, in order to please the emperor, but it could hardly refer to him, since that satire was written not later than 37 B. C. It might refer to his father. Labeo wrote a large number of works, which are cited in the Digest. He was the founder of one of the two great legal schools spoken of under CAPITO.

Labeo, Q. Fabius, quaestor urbanus B. C. 196; praetor 189, when he commanded the fleet in the war against Antiochus; and consul 183 (Liv. xxxvii. 47–60, xxxix. 45).

Laberius, Decimus, a Roman eques, and the first to give a literary character to mimes, was born about B. C. 107, and died in 43 at Puteoli, in Campania. At Caesar's triumphal games in October, 45, P. Syrus, a professional mimus, seems to have challenged all his craft to a trial of wit in extemporaneous farce, and Caesar compelled Laberius to appear on the stage. Laberius was 60 years old, and the profession of a mimus was infamous. In his fine prologue he complained of the indignity; and he availed himself of his various characters to point his wit at Caesar. In the person of a beaten Syrian slave he cried out, 'Marry! Quirites, but we lose our freedom,' and all eyes were turned upon the dictator; and in another mime he uttered the pregnant maxim, 'Needs must he fear, who makes all else adread.' Caesar awarded the prize to Syrus, and merely restored his knighthood (forfeited by the acting) with a money present to Laberius. The prologue of Laberius has been preserved by Macrobius (Sat. ii. 7); and if this may be taken as a specimen of his style, he ranks high in dramatic vigour. Laberius made great impression on his contemporaries, although he is depreciated by Horace (Sat. i. 10, 6; cf. Macrobi. l. c.; Gell. xvi. 7).

Labicum, Labici, Lavicum, Lavici (Labicianus: Colonna), an ancient town in Latium among the Alban hills, fifteen miles SE. of Rome, was an ally of the Aequi; and taken and was colonised by the Romans, B. C. 418 (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. iii. 25, iv. 15; Strab. pp. 230, 237). The road from Rome to Labicum (Via Labicana) started from the Esquiline gate.

Labienus. 1. T., tribune of the plebs B.C. 63. Under pretence of avenging his uncle's death, who had joined Saturninus (100), he accused Rabirius of treason. Rabirius was defended by Cicero. [RABIRIUS.] In his tribuneship Labienus was entirely devoted to Caesar's interests, and when Caesar went into Transalpine Gaul in 58, he took Labienus with him as his legatus. Labienus continued with Caesar during the greater part of his campaigns in Gaul, and was the ablest officer he had. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he deserted Caesar and joined Pompey. His defection caused the greatest joy among the Pompeian party; but he disappointed the expectations of his new friends, and never performed anything of importance. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 11, 12, 13, viii. 2.) He fought against his old commander at the battle of Pharsalia in Greece, 48, at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, 46, and at the battle of Munda in Spain, 45. He was slain in the last of these battles (Appian, B. C. ii. 105).—2. Q., son of the preceding, joined Brutus and Cassius after the murder of Caesar, and was sent by them into Parthia to seek aid from Orodes, the Parthian king. Before he could obtain an answer from Orodes, the news came of the battle of Philippi, 42. Two years afterwards he persuaded Orodes to entrust him with the command of a Parthian army; and Pacorus, the son of Orodes, was associated with him in the command. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates, and defeated Decidius Saxa, the lieutenant of Antony, obtained possession of Antioch and Apamea, and penetrated into Asia Minor. But in the following year, 39, P. Ventidius, the most able of Antony's legates, defeated the Parthians. Labienus fled in disguise into Cilicia, where he was apprehended, and put to death. (Dio Cass. xlviii. 24, 39; Appian, B. C. v. 65, 133; Flor. iv. 9; Plut. Ant. 30, 33).—3. T., an orator and historian in the reign of Augustus, either son or grandson of No. 1. He retained all the republican feelings of his family, and took every opportunity to attack Augustus and his friends. His enemies obtained a decree of the senate that all his writings should be burnt; whereupon he shut himself up in the tomb of his ancestors, and thus perished, about A. D. 12. (Sen. Contr. 10, praef. 4; Suet. Cal. 16.)

Labranda (τὰ Λάβρανδα: Λαβρανδεύς, Λαβρανδηνός, Labrandēnus), a town in Caria, 68 stadia N. of Mylasa, celebrated for its temple of Zeus Stratios or Labrandenus, on a hill near the city (Hdt. v. 119; Strab. p. 659).

Labro, a seaport of Etruria mentioned only in Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 5. It seems to be Liburnum (=Portus Pisanus), which was also Portus Heraculis Labronis, now Livorno [PISAE].

Labus or Labūtas (Λάβος or Λαβούτας: Sobad Koh, part of the Elburz), a mountain of Parthia, between the Coronus and the Sariphi Montes (Pol. x. 29).

Labynētus (Λαβύνητος), a name given by Herodotus to more than one of the Babylonian monarchs. The Labynetus mentioned in i. 74 as mediating a peace between Cyaxares and Alyattes, appears to be the same as Nabopolassar: the Labynetus mentioned in i. 77, 188, as a contemporary of Cyrus and Croesus seems to be Nabonidus, the grandson (not, as Hdt. says, the son) of the former [see p. 156, b].

Labyrinthus. [See Dict. of Antig. s. v.]

Lacedaemon (Λακεδαίμων), son of Zeus and Taygeto, was married to Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he became the father of Amyclas, Eurydice, and Asine. He was king of the country which he called after his own name, Lacedaemon, while he called the capital Sparta after the name of his wife. (Paus. iii. 1, 20; Apollod. iii. 10, 3.) [SPARTA.]

Lacedaemōnius (Λακεδαιμόνιος), son of Cimon, so named in honour of the Lacedaemonians (Plut. Cim. 16, Per. 29).

Lacēdas (Λακίδας), or Leocedes (Hdt. vi. 127), king of Argos, and father of Melas (Hdt. l. c.)

Lacetāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis at the foot of the Pyrenees (Plin. iii. 22; Liv. xxi. 23).

Lachārēs (Λαχάρης), an Athenian demagogue, made himself tyrant of Athens, B.C. 296, when the city was besieged by Demetrius. When Athens was on the point of falling into the hands of Demetrius, Lachares made his escape to Thebes with the treasures of which he had robbed even the temples at Athens, and according to Pausanias was murdered for the sake of his wealth. This must have been many years later if Polyaeus is right in making him play the traitor at Cassandra in 279. (Plut. Demetr. 33; Paus. i. 25, 7; Polyae. vi. 7, 2.)

Lāches (Λάχης), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, is first mentioned in B.C. 427 (Thuc. iii. 86). He was recalled in 426 and accused by Cleon of peculation (Thuc. iii. 115; Ar. Vesp. 240, 836; Dem. C. Timocr. p. 740, § 127). After Cleon's death he appears as commissioner for making the peace, commanded the troops sent to help Argos, and was slain at Mantinea (Thuc. v. 19, 61, 74). A dialogue of Plato bears his name.

Lacīa or Laciādae (Λακία, Λακιάδαι: Λακιάδης, Λακιδεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, W. of and near to Athens.

Lacīnium (Λακίνιον ἄκρον), a promontory on the E. coast of Bruttium, a few miles S. of Croton, and forming the W. boundary of the Tarentine gulf. It possessed a celebrated temple of Juno, who was worshipped here under the surname of Lacinia. The remains of this temple are still extant, and have given the modern name to the promontory, Capo delle Colonne or Capo di Nao (ναός). Hannibal dedicated in this temple a bilingual inscription (in Punic and Greek), which recorded the history of his campaigns, and of which Polybius made use in writing his history. (Strab. p. 261; Pol. iii. 33, 56; Liv. xxiv. 3, xxviii. 46.)

Lacippo (Alecippe), a town in Hispania Baetica not far from the sea, and W. of Malaca.

Lacmon or Lacmus (Λάκμων, Λάκμος), the north part of Mount Pindus, in which the river Aous rises (Hdt. ix. 92; Strab. p. 271).

Lacobrīga. 1. (Lobera), a town of the Vaccæi in the N. of Hispania Tarraconensis on the road from Asturica to Tarraco.—2. (Lagoa), a town on the SW. of Lusitania, E. of the Prom. Sacrum.

Lacōnica (Λακωνική), sometimes called Lacōnia by the Romans, a country of Peloponnesus, was bounded on the N. by Argolis and Arcadia, on the W. by Messenia, and on the E. and S. by the sea. The whole country of Laconica is bounded on the W. by the range of Mount Taygetus, which extends in an unbroken line, traversed only by difficult mountain roads, from the N. to its southern point at the promontory of Taenarum; on the N. it was separated from Arcadia by the mountainous district of Sciritis, and from Argolis by Mount Parthonus: it was cut through its whole length by Mount Paron, which ran down, though in a less unbroken line than Taygetus, to the Promontory of Malea, separating the plain of the Eurotas from CYNURIA. This latter district, forming the eastern coast of Laconica was only acquired by Sparta about 550 B.C., and in the earlier times the territory of Lacedaemon was the oblong valley district or plain between Taygetus and Parnes, through which the Eurotas flows into the Laconian gulf. This valley was called 'hollow Lacedaemon,' and described also as full of raviuos (κητώεσσα) where it is narrowed by spurs from the enclosing hills (Od. iv. 1; Strab. pp. 367, 368). It had rich corn-land and vines and mulberries, being fertile, especially on the slopes of the hills and in the widening plain below Sparta. On the other hand, the country on the E. of Paron was hilly and rough, with no agricultural value. There were valuable marble quarries near Tæuarus. Off the coast shell-fish were caught, which produced a purple dye inferior only to the Tyrian. Laconica is well described by Euripides in his Cresphontes (Fr. 12) as difficult of access to an enemy. On the N. the country could only be invaded by the valleys of the Eurotas and the Oenus; the range of Taygetus formed an almost insuperable barrier on the west, and the want of good harbours on the east coast protected it from invasion by sea on that side. GYTHEUM was the chief harbour of Laconica. The most ancient inhabitants of the country are said to have been Cynurians and Leleges. They were conquered and gradually absorbed by the Achacans, who were the inhabitants of the country in the heroic age. The Dorians afterwards invaded Peloponnesus and became the ruling race in Laconica. At first they settled in Sparta, nominally at peace with the old inhabitants of AMYCLÆ, PHARIS, GERONTHRÆ, LAS, and AEGYS, but gradually they acquired the mastery, and a part of the old people of the country who submitted on terms became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Perioeci (Περίοικοι), while others, called Helots, were reduced to serfdom. [Dict. of Antiq. art. Helotes; Perioeci.] The general name for the inhabitants is Lacōnes (Λάκωνες) or Lacedaemonii (Λακεδαιμόνιοι); but the Perioeci are frequently called Lacedaemonii, to distinguish them from the Spartans [SPARTA].

Lacōnicus Sinus (κόλπος Λακωνικός), a gulf in the S. of Peloponnesus, into which the Eurotas falls, beginning W. at the Prom. Taenarum and E. at the Prom. Malea.

Lactantius, a celebrated Christian writer about 250-330 A.D. [Dict. of Christ. Biogr.]

Lactarius Mons or Lactis Mons, a mountain in Campania, belonging to the Apennines, four miles E. of Stabiae, so called because the cows which grazed upon it produced excellent milk (Galien. Meth. Med. v. 12). Here Narses gained a victory over the Goths, A.D. 553 (Procop. B. G. iv. 35). The name is preserved in the town Lettere at its foot.

Lacýdes (Λακύδης), a native of Cyrene, succeeded Arcesilaus as president of the Academy at Athens. The place where his instructions were delivered was a garden, named the Lacydeum (Λακύδειον), provided for the purpose by his friend Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamum. This attention in the locality of the school seems to have contributed to the rise of the name of the New Academy. He died about 215. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 60; Cic. Ac. ii. 6, Tuse. v. 37.)

Ladē (Λάδη), an island off the west coast of Caria, opposite to Miletus and to the bay into which the Maeander falls. It was celebrated for the defeat of the Ionians by the Persians B.C. 494. (Hdt. vi. 8; Thuc. viii. 17; Strab. p. 635.)

Lādōn (Λάδων), the dragon which guarded the apples of the Hesperides, was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna, or of Ge, or of Phorcys and Ceto. Was slain by Heracles, and the representation of the battle was placed by Zeus among the stars. (Hes. Th. 333; Hyg. Ast. ii. 6.)

Lādōn (Λάδων). 1. A river in Arcadia, rising near Clitor, and falling into the Alphæus between Heraea and Phrixa. In mythology Ladon is husband of Symphalis, and father of Daphne and Metope. (Hes. Th. 344; Paus. viii. 20, 1.)—2. A river in Elis, rising on the frontiers of Achaia and falling into the Penæus.

Lacētāni (wrongly written Laletani), a people on the east coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the mouth of the river Rubricatus (Lobregat). Their chief town was BARCHINO. (Strab. p. 159; Ptol. ii. 6, 18; Plin. iii. 22.)

Laelaps. [CEPHALUS.]

Laeliānus, one of the thirty tyrants, emperor in Gaul after the death of POSTUMUS, A.D. 267, was slain by his own soldiers, who proclaimed VICTORINUS in his stead (Entrop. ix. 7).

Laelius. 1. C., was from early manhood the friend and companion of Scipio Africanus the elder, and fought under him in almost all his campaigns. He commanded the fleet in the capture of New Carthage, B.C. 210 (Pol. x. 3; Liv. xxvi. 42); commanded the left wing at the battle of Baecula (208); commanded the fleet in the defeat of Adherbal off Gades in 206 (Liv. xxviii. 30); took an active part in the African campaign 204-201; was praetor of Sicily 196; consul 190, and obtained the province of Cisalpine Gaul (Liv. xxxvii. 47).—2. C., surnamed Sapiens, son of the preceding. His intimacy with Scipio Africanus the younger was as remarkable as his father's friendship with the elder, and it obtained an imperishable monument in Cicero's treatise Laelius sive de Amicitia. He was born about 186, was tribune of the plebs 151; praetor 145; and consul 140. Though not devoid of military talents, as his campaign against the Lusitanian Viriathus proved (Cic. Brut. 21, 84, Off. ii. 11, 40), he was more of a statesman than a soldier, and more of a philosopher than a statesman. From Diogenes of Babylon, and afterwards from Panaetius, he imbibed the doctrines of the Stoic school (Cic. Fin. ii. 8, 24); his father's friend Polybius was his friend also; the wit and idiom of Terence were pointed and polished by his and Scipio's conversation; and the satirist Lucilius was his familiar companion. The political opinions of Laelius were different at different periods of his life. He endeavoured, probably during his tribunate, to procure a re-division of the public land, but he desisted from the attempt, and either for this forbearance, or more probably for his philosophical temperament, received the appellation of the Wise or the Prudent (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 20; Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 72). He afterwards became a strenuous supporter of the aristocratical party. Several of his orations were extant in the time of Cicero, but were characterised more by smoothness than by power.—Laelius is the principal interlocutor in Cicero's dialogue De Amicitia, and is one of the speakers in the De Senectute and in the De Republica. His two daughters were married, the one to Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, the other to C. Fannius Strabo. The opinion of his worth seems to have been universal, and it is one of Seneca's injunctions to his friend Lucilius 'to live like Laelius' (Sen. Ep. 104).

Laenas, Popilius. The Laenates were a family of the plebeian gens Popilia, for the most part unfavourably distinguished for their sternness, cruelty, and haughtiness of character. For the traditional origin of the surname see Cic. Brut. 14, 56. 1. M., four times consul, B.C. 359, 356, 350, 348. In his third consulship (350) he won a hard-fought battle against the Gauls, for which he celebrated a triumph—the first ever obtained by a plebeian. (Liv. vii. 23.)

—2. M., praetor 176, consul 172, and censor 159. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurian mountaineers; and when the remainder of the tribe surrendered to him, he sold them all as slaves. (Liv. xlii. 22.)—3. C., brother of No. 2, was consul 172. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, whom the senate wished to abstain from hostilities against Egypt. The king read the letter of the senate and promised to take it into consideration. Popilius straightway described with his cane a circle in the sand round the king, and ordered him not to stir out of it until he had given a decisive answer. This boldness so impressed Antiochus, that he yielded to the demand of Rome. (Liv. xlv. 12; Vell. Pat. i. 10; Cic. Phil. viii. 8, 23.)—4. M., son of No. 2, consul B.C. 139, in the next year defeated by the Numantines (Liv. Ep. 55).—5. P., consul 132, the year after the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was charged by the victorious aristocratical party with the prosecution of the accomplices of Gracchus; and in this task he showed all the hardheartedness of his family. He subsequently withdrew himself, by voluntary exile, from the vengeance of C. Gracchus, and did not return to Rome till after his death. (Cic. Lael. 11, 37, pro Dom. 31, 82; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.)

Laërtes (Λαέρτης), king of Ithaca, was son of Acrisius and Chulcomedusa, and husband of Anticlea, by whom he became the father of Odysseus and Ctímene. He took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was still alive when his son returned to Ithaca after the fall of Troy.

Laërtius, Diogenes. [DIOGENES.]

Laestrygones (Λαιστρυγόνες), a savage race of cannibals, whom Odysseus encountered in his wanderings (Od. x. 81). They were governed by ANTIPHATES and LAMUS. The Greeks placed them on the E. coast of the island in the plains of Leontini, which are therefore called Laestrygonii Campi. (Strab. pp. 20, 22; Plin. iii. 89.) The Romans, however, and more especially the Roman poets, who regarded the Prom. Circeium as the Homeric island of Circe, transplanted the Laestrygones to the S. coast of Latium in the neighbourhood of Formiae, which they supposed to have been built by Lamus, the king of this people. [FORMIAE.]

Laevi or Levi, a Ligurian people in Gallia Transpadana on the river Ticinus (Pol. ii. 17).

Laevinus, Valerius. 1. P., consul B.C. 280, had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king wrote to Laevinus, offering to arbitrate between Rome and Tarentum; but Laevinus bluntly bade him to return to Epirus. An Epirot spy having been taken in the Roman lines on the banks of the Siris, Laevinus showed him the legions under arms, and bade him tell his master, if he was curious about the Roman men and tactics, to come and see them. In the battle which followed, Laevinus was defeated. (Liv. Ep. 13; Plut. Pyrrh. 16; Dionys. xviii. 1.)

—2. M., praetor 215, crossed over to Greece and carried on war against Philip. He continued in the command in Greece till 211, when he was elected consul in his absence. In his consulship (210) he carried on the war in Sicily, and took Agrigentum. He continued as pro-consul in Sicily for several years, and in 208 made a descent upon the coast of Africa. He died 200, and his sons Publius and Marcus honoured his memory with funeral games and gladiatorial combats, exhibited during four successive days in the forum. (Liv. xxxi. 50.)—3. C., son of No. 2, was by the mother's side brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul 189. Laevinus was himself consul in 176, and carried on war against the Ligurians. (Pol. xvii. 12, 14; Liv. xlii. 6, xliii. 14.)

Lagoe or Lagbe (Λαγόη, Λάγβη), a city in Phrygia on the road from Cibyra to Termessus. (Liv. xxxviii. 15 writes Lagon for Lagoen.)

Lāgus (Λάγος), a Macedonian of obscure birth, was the father, or reputed father, of Ptolemy, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. He married Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon, who was said to have been pregnant at the time of their marriage, on which account the Macedonians generally looked upon Ptolemy as the son of Philip. (Paus. i. 6, 2; Curt. ix. 8.)

Lāis (Λαίς), the name of two celebrated Grecian Hetaerae, or courtesans. 1. The elder, a native probably of Corinth, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her age. She was notorious also for her avarice and caprice. (Athen. pp. 544, 585, 587.)—2. The younger, was the daughter of Timandra, and was probably born at Hyccara in Sicily. According to some accounts she was brought to Corinth when seven years old, having been taken prisoner in the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and bought by a Corinthian. She was a contemporary and rival of Phryne. She became enamoured of a Thessalian named Hippolochus, or Hippostratus, and accompanied him to Thessaly. Here, it is said, some Thessalian women, jealous of her beauty, enticed her into a temple of Aphrodite, and there stoned her to death. (Plut. Alc. 9; Paus. ii. 2, 5; Athen. p. 589.)

Laius (Λαῖος), son of Labdacus, lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Lycus. [LABDACUS.] When Lycus was slain by Amphion and Zethus, Laius took refuge with Pelops in Peloponnesus. After the death of Amphion and Zethus, Laius returned to Thebes, and ascended the throne of his father. He married Jocaste, and became by her the father of Oedipus, by whom he was slain. For details see OEDIPUS.

Lalandus, a district on the borders of Phrygia and Galatia, near Amorium, on the Lalandum Flumen, which flows from the S. into the Sangarius, a little S.E. of Pessinus. Recent discoveries of inscriptions have made it probable that this is the true reading for Alandrum Flumen in Liv. xxxviii. 18, and Mandri Fontes for Alandri Fontes in ch. 16.

Laletāni. [LAEETANI.]

Lamachus (Λάμαχος), an Athenian, son of Xenophanes, was the colleague of Alcibiades and Nicias in the great Sicilian expedition, B.C. 415. In the councils of the generals Lamachus's plan was the holdest—to endeavour to capture the city by an immediate attack while it was unprepared—and this might possibly have ended successfully, but Lamachus was overborne by his colleagues. He fell under the walls of Syracuse, in a sally of the besieged. He appears amongst the dramatis personae of Aristophanes as the brave and somewhat blustering soldier. Plutarch describes him as brave, but so poor that on every fresh appointment he had difficulty in procuring his outfit. (Thuc. vi. 8, 49, 101; Arist. Ach. 565, 960, 1070; Plut. Nic. 16, Alc. 18, 20.)

Lamētus (Lamato), a river in Bruttium, near Croton, which falls into the Lameticus Sinus. Upon it was the town Lamētini (S. Eufemia).

Lāmīa (Λαμία). 1. [EMPUSA.]—2. An Athenian courtesan, mistress of Demetrius Poliorcetes (Plut. Demetr. 16).

Lamia, Aelius. This family claimed a descent from the mythical hero, LAMUS. 1. L., a Roman eque, supported Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, B.C. 63, and was accordingly banished by the influence of the consuls Gabinius and Piso in 58. He was subsequently recalled from exile, and during the civil wars espoused Caesar's party. (Cic. pro Sest. 12, 29, ad Att. xiii. 45, ad Fam. xi. 16; Val. Max. i. 8.)—2. L., son of the preceding, and the friend of Horace, was consul A.D. 3. He was made praefectus urbi in 32, but he died in the following year. (Dio Cass. lviii. 19; Tac. Ann. vi. 27; Hor. Od. i. 26, iii. 17.)—3. L., was married to Domitia Longina, the daughter of Corbulo; but during the lifetime of Vespasian he was deprived of her by Domitian, who subsequently married her. Lamia was put to death by Domitian after his accession to the throne. (Dio Cass. lxxvi. 3; Suet. Dom. i. 10.)

Lāmīa (Λαμία: Λαμίας, Λαμιάτης: Zeitun or Zeituna), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, situated on the small river Achelous, and fifty stadia inland from the Maliac gulf, on which it possessed a harbour, called Phalara (Strab. pp. 433, 435). It has given its name to the war which was carried on by the confederate Greeks against Antipater after the death of Alexander, B.C. 323. The confederates under the command of Leosthenes, the Athenian, defeated Antipater, who took refuge in Lamia, where he was besieged for some months. Leosthenes was killed during the siege; and the confederates were obliged to raise it in the following year (322), in consequence of the approach of Leonnatus. The confederates under the command of Antiphilus defeated Leonnatus, who was slain in the action. Soon afterwards Antipater was joined by Craterus; and thus strengthened he gained a decisive victory over the confederates at the battle of Cranon, which put an end to the Lamian war. (Diod. xviii.; Pol. ix. 29.)

Laminium (Laminitānus), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, ninety-five miles SE. of Toletum (Ptol. ii. 6, 57).

Lampa or Lappa (Λάμπη, Λάππη: Λαμπαῖος, Λαμπεύς), near Argyropolis, a town in the N. of Crete, a little inland, S. of Hydramm (Strab. p. 475; Ptol. iii. 17, 10).

Lampēa (ἡ Λάμπεια) or Lampēus Mons, a part of the mountain range of ERYMANTHUS, on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis.

Lampētīē (Λαμπετή), daughter of Helios by the nymph Neaera. She and her sister Phaethusa tended the flocks of their father in Sicily. In some legends she appears as one of the sisters of Phaethon. [HELIOS.]

Lampon (Λάμπων), an Athenian, a celebrated soothsayer and interpreter of oracles. In conjunction with Xenocritus, he led the colony which founded Thurii in Italy, B.C. 443. (Diod. xii. 10; Aristoph. Av. 521, 988.)

Lamponia, or -ium (Λαμπόνεια, -ώνιον), a town of Mysia in the Troad, near the borders of Aeolia (Hdt. v. 26; Strab. p. 610).

Lampra, Lamprae, or Lamptrae (Λαμπρά, Λαμπρά, Λαμπτραί: Λαμπρεύς: Lamorica), a demus on the W. coast of Attica, near Astypalaea, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis.

Lampridius, Aelius. [SCRIPTORES HISTORIAE AUGUSTAE.]

Lampsacus (Λάμψακος: Λαμψακηνός: Lapsaki, Ru.), an important city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Hellespont, possessed a good harbour. It stood on the site of a town called Pityusa or Pityeia, which existed before the colonisation by Ionians. (H. ii. 829; Strab. p. 589.) It was celebrated for its wine; and was one of the cities assigned by Xerxes to Themistocles for his maintenance (Thuc. i. 138; Plut. Them. 29). It was the chief seat of the worship of Priapus; and the birthplace of the historian Charon, the philosophers Adimantus and Metrodorus, and the rhetorician Anaximenes. Lampsacus was a colony of the

Obv., head of bearded Dionysus; rev., ΑΜΨΑΚΗΝΟΝ; Apollo with lyre; magistrate's name, ΣΩΡΑΤΟΥ ΤΟΥ ΞΕΝΟΦΑΝΟΥ.

Phocaeans: the name of the surrounding district, Bebr̄yēia, connects its old inhabitants with the Thracian BEBR̄YCES.

Lāmus (Λάμος), son of Poseidon, and king of the Laestrygones, was said to have founded Formiae, in Italy. [FORMIAE.]

Lamus (Λάμος: Lamas), a river of Cilicia, the boundary between Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris; with a town of the same name (Strab. p. 671).

Lancia (Lancenses). 1. (Sollaneo or Sollancia, near Leon), a town of the ASTURES in Hispania Tarraconensis, nine miles E. of Legio.—2. Surnamed Oppidana, a town of the VETTONES in Lusitania, not far from the sources of the river Munda.

Langobardi or Longobardi, corrupted into Lombards, a German tribe of the Suevic race. They dwelt originally on the left bank of the Elbe, near the river Saale; but they afterwards crossed the Elbe, and dwelt on the E. bank of the river, where they were for a time subject to Marobodunus in the reign of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 17, Germ. 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 106; Strab. p. 290.) Of their wanderings after this there is no record for four centuries; but, like most of the other German tribes, they migrated southwards, and in the second half of the fifth century appeared again on the N. bank of the Danube, in Upper Hungary. Here they defeated and almost annihilated the Heruli. In the middle of the sixth century they crossed the Danube, at the invitation of Justinian, and settled in Pannonia. Here, after thirty years' conflict, they destroyed the Gepidae. In A.D. 568, Alboin, their king, led his nation across the Julian Alps, and conquered the plains of N. Italy, which have thence received the name of Lombardy. Here he founded the kingdom of the Lombards, which existed for upwards of two centuries, till its overthrow by Charles the Great.—Paulus Diaconus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Langobardi from their long beards; others take it to mean 'having long battle-axes'; but modern philologists generally reject both these etymologies, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, Börde signifying a plain on the bank of a river.

Lanice (Λανίκη), nurse of Alexander the Great, and sister of Clitus (Arrian, iv. 9).

Lanuvium (Lānūvinus: Lavignu), an ancient city in Latium, situated on a hill of the Alban Mount, not far from the Appia Via, and subsequently a Roman municipium (Dionys. v. 61; Liv. viii. 14), yet its chief magistrate, as at Aricia, Tusculum, and other places, retained the old name of dictator (Cic. pro Mil. 10, 27). It possessed an ancient temple of Juno Sospita. [See p. 463, a.] Under the empire it obtained importance as the birthplace of Antoninus Pius.

Laōcōon (Λαοκόων), a Trojan, who plays a prominent part in the post-Homeric legends, was a son of Antenor or Acœtes, and a priest of the Thymbræan Apollo. He tried to dissuade his countrymen from drawing into the city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them when they pretended to sail away from Troy. But, as he was preparing to sacrifice a bull to Poseidon, suddenly two serpents were seen swimming towards the Trojan coast from

Laocöon. (From the group by Agesander and Athenodorus, now in the Vatican.)

Tenedos. They made for Laocöon, who, while all the people took to flight, remained with his two sons standing by the altar of the god. The serpents first coiled around the boys, and then around the father, and thus all three perished. The serpents then glided away to the acropolis of Troy, and disappeared behind the shield of Tritonis. The reason why Laocöon suffered this fearful death is differently stated. According to some, it was because he had run his lance into the side of the horse; according to others, because, contrary to the will of Apollo, he had married and begotten children; or, according to others again, because Poseidon, being hostile to the Trojans, wanted to show to the Trojans in the person of Laocöon what fate all of them deserved. (Verg. Æn. ii. 201; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 347; Hyg. Fab. 135; Quint. Smyrn. xii. 398.) Sophocles wrote a play on this subject, of which a few fragments remain—among them the line quoted in Aristoph. Ran. 665. His death also formed the subject of many ancient works of art; and a magnificent group, engraved above, representing the father and his sons entwined by the serpents, is preserved in the Vatican. [AGESANDER.]

Laōdāmas (Λαοδάμας). 1. Son of Alcinoüs, king of the Phæacians, and Arete (Od. vii. 170).—2. Son of Eteocles, and king of Thebes, in whose reign the Epigoni marched against Thebes. In the battle against the Epigoni, he slew their leader Aegialeus, but was himself slain by Alcmaeon. Others related that, after the battle was lost, Laodamas fled to the Encheleans in Illyricum. (Apollod. iii. 7, 3; Paus. ix. 5, 7; Hdt. v. 61.)

Laōdāmīa (Λαοδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Acastus, and wife of Protesilaus. When her husband was slain before Troy, she begged the gods to be allowed to converse with him for only three hours. The request was granted. Hermes led Protesilaus back to the upper world, and when Protesilaus died a second time, Laodamia died with him. (Ov. Her. xiii., Pont. iii. 1, 110; Lucian, Dial. Mort. xxiii. 1.) A later tradition states that, after the second death of Protesilaus, Laodamia made an image of her husband, to which she payed divine honours; but as her father Acastus interfered, and commanded her to burn the image, she herself leaped into the fire (Hyg. Fab. 103, 104).—2. Daughter of Bellerophon, became by Zeus the mother of Sarpedon, and was killed by Artemis (Il. vi. 197).

Laōdicē (Λαοδική). 1. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and wife of Helicaon. Some relate that she fell in love with Acamas, the son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes as ambassador to Troy, and that she became by Acamas the mother of Munitus. On the death of this son, she leaped down a precipice, or was swallowed up by the earth. (Il. iii. 123; Paus. x. 26; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 513, 547.)—2. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (Il. ix. 146), called Electra by the tragic poets. [ELECTRA.]

—3. Mother of Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy.—4. Wife of Antiochus II. Theos, king of Syria, and mother of Seleucus Callinicus. For details, see p. 76, b.—5. Wife of Seleucus Callinicus, and mother of Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great.—6. Wife of Antiochus the Great, was a daughter of Mithridates IV. king of Pontus, and granddaughter of No. 4.—7. Wife of Achæus, the cousin and adversary of Antiochus the Great, was a sister of No. 6.—8. Daughter of Antiochus the Great by his wife Laodice [No. 6]. She was married to her eldest brother Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime, 195.—9. Daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was married to Perseus, king of Macedonia.—10. Daughter of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, was married to the impostor Alexander Balas.—11. Wife and also sister of Mithridates Eupator (commonly called the Great), king of Pontus. During the absence of her husband, she was unfaithful to him, and on his return attempted his life by poison. Her designs were, however, betrayed to Mithridates, who put her to death (Justin, xxxvii. 3).—12. Another sister of Mithridates Eupator, married to Ariarathes VI., king of Cappadocia, after whose death she married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia.

Laōdīcēa (Λαοδικεία: Λαοδικεύς, Laodicensis, Laodicēnus), the name of six Greek cities in Asia, four of which (besides another now unknown) were founded by Solocus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his mother Laodice, and the other two by Antiochus II. and Antiochus I. or III. [See Nos. 1 and 5.]-1. L. ad Lycum (Λ. πρὸς τῷ Λύκῳ, Eski-Hissar, Ru.), a city of Asia Minor, stood on a ridge of hills near the S. bank of the river Lycus (Choruk-Su), a tributary of the Maeander, a little to the W. of Colossae, and to the S. of Hierapolis, on the borders of Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia, to each of which it is assigned by different writers; but after the definitive division of the provinces, it is reckoned as belonging to Great Phrygia, and under the later Roman emperors it was the capital of Phrygia Pacatiana. It was founded by Antiochus II. Theos, on the site of a previously existing town, and named in honour of his wife Laodice. It passed from the kings of Syria to those of Pergamum, and from them to the Romans, to whom Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom, and who included it in the province of Asia. At first it was comparatively an insignificant place, and it suffered much from the frequent earthquakes to which its site seems to be more exposed than that of any other city of Asia Minor, and also from the Mithridatic war (Appian, Bell. Mithr. 20). Under the later Roman republic and the early emperors, it rose to importance; and, though more than once almost destroyed by earthquakes, it was restored by the aid of the emperors and the munificence of its own citizens, and became, next to Apamea, the greatest city in Phrygia, and one of the most flourishing in Asia Minor. (Plin. v. 105; Strab. p. 578; Tac. Ann. xiv. 27.) The magnificent ruins of the city comprise an aqueduct, a gymnasium, several theatres, and an almost perfect stadium. This prosperity was owing in great measure to its situation on the traffic routes from Asia to the coasts. It stood at the junction of roads leading from Ephesus and from Smyrna through Cibyra to Attalea, and also by way of Apamea to Nicomedia in the north and Iconium or Ancyra in the east. It was enriched also by its trade in wool and manufacture of cloth (Strab. l.c.; Cic. ad Fam. ii. 17, iii. 5). [For its importance in the history of the Church, see Dict. of the Bible.]-2. L. Catacecaumene or Combusta (Λ. ἡ κατακεκαυμένη, i.e. the burnt: Ladik, Ru.), a city of Lycaonia, N. of Iconium, on the high road from the W. coast of Asia Minor to the Euphrates, and in the Byzantine period having direct communication with Dorylaeum and the north. Whether its name is due to its having been burnt and rebuilt is not recorded. It can have no connexion with the volcanic district called Κατακεκαυμένη, which is in quite another part of Asia Minor. [See p. 207.]-3. L. ad Mare (Λ. ἐπὶ τῇ θαλάττῃ: Ladikiyeh), a city on the coast of Syria, about fifty miles S. of Antioch, was built by Seleucus I. on the site of an earlier city, called Ramitha or Λευκὴ Ἀκτὴ. It had the best harbour in Syria, and was celebrated for its traffic in wine and fruit. In the civil contests during the later period of the Syrian kingdom, Laodicea obtained virtual independence, in which it was confirmed probably by Pompey, and certainly by Julius Caesar, who greatly favoured the city. In the civil wars, after Caesar's death, the Laodiceans were severely punished by Cassius for their adherence to Dolabella, and the city again suffered in the Parthian invasion of Syria, but was recompensed by Antony with exemption from taxation. Herod the Great built the Laodiceans an aqueduct, the ruins of which still exist. It is mentioned occasionally as an important city under the later Roman empire; and, after the conquest of Syria by the Arabs, it was one of those places on the coast which still remained in the hands of the Greek emperors, and with a Christian population. It was taken and destroyed by the Arabs in 1188. It is now a Turkish village, with considerable ruins of the ancient city. (Strab. pp. 751, 752.)-4. L. ad Libanum (Λ. Λιβανού, πρὸς Λιβανῷ), a city of Coele-Syria, at the N. entrance to the narrow valley (αὐλών), between Libanus and Antilibanus. During the possession of Coele-Syria by the Greek kings of Egypt, it was the border fortress of Syria, and the chief city of a district called Laodicene. (Strab. p. 755; Plin. v. 82.)-5. A city in the SE. of Media, near the boundary of Persis, founded either by Antiochus I. Soter or Antiochus II. the Great (Strab. p. 524; Plin. vi. 115.)-6. In Mesopotamia (Plin. vi. 117).

Laōdōcus (Λαοδόκος). 1. Son of Bias and Pero, took part in the expeditions of the Argonauts, and of the Seven against Thebes. (Ap. Rh. i. 119; Apollod. iii. 6, 4.)-2. Son of Antenor (Il. iv. 87).

Laōmēdon (Λαομέδων). 1. King of Troy, son of Ilus and Eurydice, and father of Priam, Hesionē, and other children (Il. xx. 236; Apollod. iii. 12, 3). Poseidon and Apollo, who had displeased Zeus, were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages. Accordingly, Poseidon built the walls of Troy, while Apollo tended the king's flocks on Mount Ida. When the two gods had done their work, Laomedon refused them the reward he had promised them, and expelled them from his dominions. (Il. xxi. 441-457; Hor. Od. iii. 3, 21.) Poseidon in wrath let loose the sea over the lands, and also sent a sea-monster to ravage the country. The Homeric account states that Heracles was induced to build a wall as a protection against the sea-monster by the promise mentioned below. This is expanded by a later tradition (Schol. ad loc.) into a story like that of Andromeda, that by command of an oracle the Trojans were obliged, from time to time, to sacrifice a maiden to the monster; and on one occasion it was decided by lot that Hesionē, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. But it happened that Heracles was just returning from his expedition against the Amazons, and he promised to save the maiden if Laomedon would give him the horses which Troas had once received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. (Il. v. 265.) Laomedon promised to give them, but again broke his word, when Heracles had killed the monster and saved Hesionē. Hereupon Heracles sailed with a squadron of six ships against Troy, killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Podarces (Priam), and gave Hesionē to Telamon. (Il. v. 640, xx. 145; Diod. v. 32, 49; Apollod. ii. 5, 6.) It will be seen that, excepting the episode of Hesionē, all the points in Laomedon's story appear in the Iliad. The account of the wall built by Heracles has all the appearance of a tradition derived from an ancient wall against encroachments of the sea. Priam, as the son of Laomedon, is called Laomedontiādes; and the Trojans, as the subjects of Laomedon, are called Laomedontiādae.-2. Of Mytilene, was one of Alexander's generals, and after the king's death (B.C. 323), obtained the government of Syria. He was afterwards defeated by Nicanor, the general of Ptolemy, and deprived of Syria. (Arrian, An. iii. 6; Diod. xviii. 39.)

Lapēthus or Lapathus (Λάπηθος, Λάπαθος: Λαπήθιος, Λαπηθεύς: Lapitho or Lapta), an important town on the N. coast of Cyprus, on a river of the same name, E. of the Prom. Crommyon (Strab. p. 682; Ptol. v. 14, 4; Plin. v. 130).

Laphria, a surname of Artemis. [See p. 128, a.]

Laphystius (Λαφύστιος), a mountain in Boeotia, between Coronea and Orchomenus, on which was a temple of Zeus Laphystius (Paus. i. 24, 2, ix. 34, 5).

Lapidēi Campi. [CAMPI LAPIDEI.]

Lapithae (Λαπίθαι), an ancient race, with a mythical ancestor Lapithes, son of Apollo (Diod. iv. 69), dwelling in Thessaly, in the lower valley of the Peneus, who are described as thac, some of whom were at one time or other driven southwards from Thessaly into Attica; and this may have been at the time of the Dorian movement towards the Peloponnesus. The part which the Lapithae had in forming the population of Attica is signified by the hero of Pirithous in Attica (Paus. i. 30, 4), and by his connexion in Attic legends with Theseus; and several Athenian families traced their descent from the Lapithae. The fight of the Lapithae and Centaurs was a favourite subject in art. Pausanias mentions a painting of it in the temple of Theseus at Athens, and a famous sculpture on the temple of Zeus at Olympia (Paus. i. 17, 2, v. 10, 8). [CENTAURI.]

Lar or Lars, was an Etruscan title or praenomen, borne, for instance, by Porsena and Tolumius. From the Etruscans it passed into some Roman families, whence we read of Lar Herminius, who was consul B.C. 448. This word signified lord, king, or hero in the Etruscan. (Liv. ii. 9, iii. 65, iv. 17.)

Lara. [LARUNDA.]

Laranda (τὰ Λάρανδα: Laranda or Caraman), a considerable town in the S. of Lycaonia, on the road from Iconium to Seleucia, at the N. foot of M. Taurus, in a fertile district; taken by storm by Perdiccas, but afterwards restored. It was used by the Isaurian robbers as one of their strongholds. (Strab. p. 569; Diod. xviii. 22; Amm. Marc. xiv. 2.)

Larentia. [ACCA LAURENTIA.]

Lares, Roman tutelary deities of the household and all that belonged to it, and also (as L. Compitales, L. Viales) of roads and crossways [see below]. Their original significance, however, is by no means certain. In Latin literature they are so closely connected with the Penates as to be almost equivalent to them; but there is little doubt that the two classes of deities were originally far more distinct than they appear to be in writers of Cicero's time and later. They have been often compared to the Greek ἑρῶες; but this again is with some reason regarded as part of a later tendency to accommodate Latin religion to certain ideas of Greek philosophy. It is commonly said that the name is the same as the Etruscan Larth or Lars, and that therefore Lares means 'lords'; but it is by no means certain that the word is of Etruscan origin at all. The oldest Latin form is Lases, under which title the Lares are invoked in the Arval hymns; and, though this word may some day be proved to be borrowed from the Etruscans, our present knowledge of the Etruscan language does not warrant more than conjecture. The Lares in old formulas appear to be the gods of country places with sacred groves (Cic. Legg. ii. 8, 19), whence it is deduced that the Lar was first the protector of the whole property, including the domus and familia of the Roman landowner, and thence, as Lar Familiaris, was particularly connected with the household. It is, however, more natural that the worship should extend from the household to the community than conversely. A somewhat different view of their origin traces being akin to the Pelasgians—i.e. they were prehistoric inhabitants of that district. In the Iliad they are mentioned only as a warlike race among the combatants defending the Greek wall, and one of their leaders is named Pirithous (Il. xii. 128, 181). In the Odyssey there is mention of their fight with the Centaurs, who had gone to the house of Pirithous, the king of the Lapithae (xxi. 295), and this became the most famous part of their legendary history. According to the full development of the story, the Lapithae were governed by Pirithous, who, being a son of Ixion, was a half-brother of the Centaurs. The Centaurs, therefore, demanded their share in their father's kingdom, and a war arose between them, which was at length terminated by a peace. But when Pirithous married Hippodamia, and invited the Centaurs to the marriage feast, the latter, fired by wine and urged on by Ares, attempted to carry off the bride and the other women. Thereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which the Centaurs were defeated by the Lapithae. (Strab. pp. 439-441; Diod. iv. 70; Ov. Met. xii. 210; Hor. Od. i. 18, 5.) It is probable that many of the details were found in the Cyclic poets, and that the story arose out of fights between the Lapithae and ruder mountain tribes, who appear as the Centaurs, and whom they drove back. A further Dorian tradition tells that Heracles helped the Dorians against the Lapithae, who were defeated. [AEGIMIUS.] The Attic legend makes Theseus help Pirithous and the Lapithae against the Centaurs. [THESEUS.] It is likely that the story of Heracles has to do with Dorian victories over the Lupi-them to a worship of ancestors, on the theory that the Lares were spirits of ancestral founders, who were in old times actually buried within the precincts of the house (Serv. ad Aen. vi. 152; cf. Cic. Legg. ii. 23, 58; Isid. Orig. xv. 11; August. C. D. ix. 11). Support may be found for this view in the traditions which make Lara or Larunda the mother of the Lares and also a deity of the underworld, and Mania mother alike of Lares and Manes [LARUNDA; MANIA]. On the other hand, the legend of the birth of Servius Tullius from the Lar Familiaris (Dionys. iv. 2; Plin. xxxvi. 204) does not agree with the theory that the Lar was the spirit of an ancestor, nor is there any proof of the antiquity of such a belief. Another view deserves consideration, and is perhaps right: that the Lar Familiaris was originally only another name for the Genius Domus [see GENIUS], and that the two Lares Compitales of the neighbourhood were afterwards united with him in the household worship. In pre-Ciceronian times the Lar Familiaris was spoken of in the singular, as the guardian of the house. He is introduced in the prologue of the Aulularia of Plautus in person, watching over the fortunes of the house, and acting in much the same way as a 'brownie' would act in northern legends (cf. Trinumm. 39). As he belonged to the house, his name was used for the house itself (Hor. Od. i. 12, 43; Sall. Cat. 21; Mart. xi. 82, 2; Stat. Silv. ii. 3, 16). In Cicero and afterwards the name appears in the plural (perhaps for the reason mentioned above), and often associated with the Dei Penates or gods of the household store (Cic. pro Dom. 41, 108; Rep. v. 5, 7), the ideas of Penates and Lares being apparently as closely connected as our 'hearth and home.' In the private worship of the household, images of the Lares were placed in a shrine (sacrarium or lararium), to which offerings were made at meal-time: the Lares were crowned and received special offerings on Kalends, Ides and Nones, or on the birthday of the master of the house [Dict. of Ant. art. Lararium]; their images were polished with wax and therefore 'residentes' (Hor. Epod. 2, 66; cf. Juv. xii. 87). The bride on her first entry, or a member of the family returning from abroad, paid honour to them. Besides this private worship the Lares Compitales or Viales, called collectively Lares Publici (Plin. xxi. 11), were honoured by the community. These deities were two in number, probably because one belonged to each intersecting road: in mythology, they were the twin sons of Mercury and Lara or Larunda. They were the protectors, not merely of the crossways, but of the neighbourhood generally. [For the offerings, see Dict. of Ant. art. Compitalia.] The same worship existed in old times at intersecting vici of Rome, where shrines of the Lares were placed; but Augustus gave it greater importance and associated his own Genius with the two Lares Compitales (Ov. Fast. v. 145; Hor. Od. v. 5, 39; GENIUS). The state had its Lares praestites, and protection was sought by travellers from Lares permarini, to whom a temple in the Campus Martius was dedicated, B.C. 179. A temple to the state Lares on the Via Sacra near the Palatine was dedicated by Augustus to replace an ancient altar (Ov. Fast. v. 129, vi. 791; Mon. Ancyr. iv. 7). In art, the Lares were represented by two figures with the toga girt up (incincti, succincti, Ov. Fast. ii. 634; Pers. v. 31), crowned with wreaths, bearing a drinking-horn or rhyton in their hands and sometimes a patera. Sometimes a dog is placed by them to represent watchfulness (Ov. Fast. v. 142). In a painting from Pompeii, Vesta stands between them, and the Genius is represented by a snake below.

Lares (Λάρης: Alaribus), a city of N. Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena), SW. of Zama; a place of some importance at the time of the war with Jugurtha (Sall. Jug. 90; Ptol. iv. 3, 28).

Largus, Scribonius. [SCRIBONIUS.]

Larinum (Larinas, -ātis: Larino), a town of the Frentani (whence the inhabitants are called Larinates cognomine Frentani; Plin. iii. 105), on the river Tiferinus, and near the borders of Apulia, subsequently a Roman municipium (Cic. pro Cluent. 4, 10), possessed a considerable territory extending down to the Adriatic sea. The speech of Cicero pro Cluentio enters largely into the local affairs of Larinum.

Larissa (Λάρισα), the name of several Pelasgian places, whence Larissa is called in mythology the daughter of Pelasgus (Paus. ii. 24, 1). I. In Europe. 1. (Larissa or Larza), an important town of Thessaly, in Pelasgiotis, situated on the Peneus, in an extensive plain. It was once the capital of the Pelasgi, and had a democratical constitution, and hence allied itself to Athens in the Peloponnesian war (Thuc. ii. 22; Ar. Pol. v. 6), but subsequently became subject to the Macedonians. It retained its importance under the Romans, and was the seat of the district council or diet which the Thessalians were allowed to retain for their local affairs. (Appian, B.C. ii. 88; Plut. Caes. 48; cf. Liv. xxxvii. 8, xlii. 38.) After the time of Constantine the Great it became the capital of the province of Thessaly.—2. Surnamed Cremaste (ἡ Κρεμαστή), another important town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, situated on a height, whence probably its name, and distant 20 stadia from the Maliae gulf (Strab. pp. 435, 440). II. In Asia. 1. An ancient city on the coast of the Troad, near Hamaxitus (Thuc. viii. 101; Strab. p. 620).—2. L. Phricōnis (Λ. ἡ Φρικωνίς, also αἱ Δήρισσαι), a city on the coast of Mysia, near Cyruce (hence called ἡ περὶ τὴν Κύρην), of Pelasgian origin, but colonised by the Aeolians, and made a member of the Aeolic confederacy. It is probably the Larissa mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 841; Strab. p. 621). It was also called the Egyptian Larissa (ἡ Αἰγυπτία), because Cyrus the Great settled in it a body of his Egyptian mercenary soldiers (Xen. Hell. iii. 1, 7).—3. L. Ephesia (Λ. ἡ Ἐφεσία), a city of Lydia, in the plain of the Cayster, on the N. side of M. Messogis, N.E. of Ephesus; with a temple of Apollo Larissaeus (Strab. pp. 440, 620).—4. In Assyria, an ancient city on the E. bank of the Tigris, some distance N. of the mouth of the river Zabatas or Lycus, described by Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4). It was deserted when Xenophon saw it; but its brick walls still stood, 25 feet thick, 100 feet high, and 2 parasangs (=60 stadia=6 geog. miles), in circuit. The site of Larissa is supposed to be that of the ruins near Nimroud, the same site as that of Nineveh.—5. In Syria, called by the Syrians Sizara (Σίζαρα: Kulat Seijar), a city in the district of Apamene, on the W. bank of the Orontes, about half-way between Apamea and Epiphania.

Larissus or Larisus (Λάρισσος, Λάρισος: Risso), a small river forming the boundary between Achaia and Elis, rises in Mt. Scollis, and flows into the Ionian sea.

Lārius Lacus (Lake of Como), a large lake in Gallia Transpadana, running from N. to S., through which the river Adda flows (Verg. Georg. ii. 159; Strab. p. 192). After extending about fifteen miles, it is divided into two branches, of which the one to the SW. is about eighteen miles in length, and the one to the SE. about twelve miles. At the extremity of the SW. branch is the town of Comum; and at the extremity of the SE. branch the river Adda issues out of the lake. The beauty of the scenery is praised by Pliny, who had more than one villa on its banks (Plin. Ep. ix. 7). One, which he named Comœdia, is placed by some at Bellagio, on the promontory which divides the two branches of the lake; and another, called Tragoedia, at Lenno, on the W. bank. The intermitting fountain of which Pliny gives an account (Ep. iv. 30) is still called Pliniana.

Lars Tolumnius. [TOLUINIUS.]

Lartia Gens, patrician, distinguished at the beginning of the republic through two of its members, T. Lartius, the first dictator, and Sp. Lartius, the companion of Horatius on the wooden bridge. The name soon after disappears entirely from the annals. The Lartii were probably of Etruscan origin, and their name connected with the Etruscan word Lar or Lars. [LAR.]

Larunda, Lāra, or Lala was regarded as mother of the Lares and = Mania: she was also in the old Roman religion a deity of the underworld and bore the names Muta or Tacita to signify the silence of the dead, just as the Manes are often called 'silent.' She was probably also a goddess of fountains and therefore called daughter of the river Almo. From this later Roman mythology, connecting the form Lala with the Greek λαλεῖν and endeavouring to account for the name 'Silent,' evolved the legend that she was a nymph who informed Juno of the connexion between Jupiter and Juturna; hence the attempt to derive her name from λαλεῖν. Jupiter deprived her of her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her into the lower world. On the way thither, Mercury fell in love with her, and she afterwards gave birth to two Lares. (Ov. Fast. ii. 599-616; Varro, L. L. ix. 61; Macrob. i. 7, 34; Lactant. i. 29, 35; MANIA.)

Larvae. [LEMURES.]

Larymna (Λάρυμνα), the name of two towns on the river Cephissus, on the borders of Boeotia and Locris, and distinguished as Upper and Lower Larymna. The latter was at the mouth of the river and the former inland.

Las (Λās: Ep. Λās: Passava), an ancient town of Laconia, on the E. side of the Laconian gulf, ten stadia from the sea, and S. of Gytheum. It is said to have been once destroyed by the Dioscuri, who hence received the surname of Laparsae, or the destroyers of Las. Under the Romans it was a place of no importance.

Lasaea (Λασαία), a town in the E. of Crete, not far from the Prom. Samonium, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (xxvii. 8).

Lasion (Λασίων: Λασιώνιος: Lala), a fortified town in Elis, on the frontiers of Arcadia, and not far from the confluence of the Erymanthus and the Alpheus. This town was a constant source of dispute between the Eleans and Arcadians. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2, 30, vii. 4, 13.)

Lasthēnes (Λασθένης). 1. An Olynthian, who, together with Eutycrates, betrayed his country to Philip of Macedonia, by whom he had been bribed, B.C. 347 (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 126, de Cor. p. 241; Diod. xvi. 53).—2. A Cretan, a principal leader in the war with the Romans. He was defeated and taken prisoner by Q. Metellus, 67 (Vell. Pat. ii. 34).

Lasus (Λάσος), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of Hermione, in Argolis. He is celebrated as the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and as the teacher of Pindar. He was contemporary with Simonides, like whom he lived at Athens, under the patronage of Hipparchus. It would appear that Lasus introduced a greater freedom, both of rhythm and of music, into the dithyrambic ode; that he gave it a more artificial and more mimetic character; and that the subjects of his poetry embraced a wider range than had been customary. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1410, Schol. ad loc.; Hdt. vii. 6; Suid. s. v.)

Latēra or Laterna Stagnum (Etang de Maquelonne et de Pérols), a lake formed by the river Ledus in the territory of Nemausus in Gallia Narbonensis, connected with the sea by a canal (Plin. ix. 29; Mel. ii. 5).

Laterensis, Juventius, was one of the accusers of Plancius, whom Cicero defended, B.C. 54. [PLANCIUS.] He was praetor in 51. He served as a legate in the army of M. Lepidus, and when the soldiers of Lepidus passed over to Antony, Laterensis put an end to his life. (Appian, B. C. iii. 84.)

Lāthon, Lēthon, Lēthes, Lēthaeus (Λάθων Doric, Λήθων, Ληθαῖος), a river of Cyrenaica in N. Africa, falling into a Lacus Hesperidum, near the city of Hesperis or Berenice, in the region which the early Greek navigators identified with the gardens of the Hesperides (Strab. pp. 647, 836; Ptol. iv. 4, 4; Plin. v. 31).

Lātiālis or Lātiāris. [JUPITER.]

Lātinus. 1. King of Latium, son of Faunus and the nymph Marica, brother of Lavinus, husband of Anata, and father of Lavinia, whom he gave in marriage to Aeneas. [LAVINIA.] This is the common tradition; but according to Hesiod he was a son of Odysseus and Circe, and brother of Agrus, king of the Tyrrhenians (Hes. Th. 1013); according to Hyginus he was a son of Telemachus and Circe (Hyg. Fab. 127); while others describe him as a son of Heracles, by a Hyperborean woman, who was afterwards married to Faunus, or as a son of Heracles by a daughter of Faunus (Dionys. i. 43). Latinus as the mythical founder of the Latins was identified with Jupiter Latiaris.—2. A celebrated player in mimes (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was a great favourite, and whom he served as a delator. He frequently acted as mimus with Thymeles as mima. (Suet. Dom. 15; Juv. i. 35; Mart. ii. 72, ix. 29.)

Lātium (ἡ Λατίνη), a country in Italy, inhabited by the Lātini. The old derivation proposed for the name, Latinus (Varro, L. L. v. 32), latere, because Saturn there hid himself (Verg. Aen. viii. 32; Ov. Fast. i. 238) may safely be rejected. It is probably connected with πλατύς (to which root belong lātus, side, and later, brick) and means the plain or flat country. This name belongs geographically to the more level country lying between the sea on the West and the offshoot of the Apennines called the Sabine hills on the East, and separated from the higher land of Etruria by the Tiber and limited to the South by the Volseian hills; and this was the extent of country occupied by the old Latins. But in historical times there are two further extensions. (1) The territory of Latium was subsequently extended southwards; and long before the conquest of the Latins by the Romans, it stretched from the Tiber on the N., to the Prom. Circeium and Anxur or Tarracina on the S. Even in the treaty of peace made between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509, we find Antium, Circeii, and Tarracina, mentioned as belonging to Latium. The name of Latium antiquum or vetus was given to the country from the Tiber to the Prom. Circeium (Plin. iii. 56; Strab. p. 228). (2) The Romans still further extended the territories of Latium, by the conquest of the Hernici, Aequi, Volsei, and Aurunci, as far as the Liris on the S., and even beyond this river to the town Sinuessa and to Mt. Massicus. This new accession of territory was called Latium novum or adjectum (Plin. iii. 59; Strab. pp. 231-237).—Latium, therefore, in its widest significance was bounded by Etruria on the N., from which it was separated by the Tiber; by Campania on the S., from which it was separated by the Liris; by the Tyrrhene sea on the W.; and by the Sabine and Samnite tribes on the E. The greater part of this country is an extensive plain of volcanic origin, out of which rise an isolated range of mountains known by the name of MONS ALBANUS, of which the Algidus and the Tuseulan hills are branches. Part of this plain, on the coast between Antium and Tarracina, which was at one time well cultivated, became a marsh in consequence of the rivers Nymphaeus, Ufens, and Amasenus finding no outlet for their waters [POMPTINAE PALUDES]; but the remainder of the country was celebrated for its fertility in antiquity.—The ancient Latius [for whose origin see p. 453], called Prisci Latini, to distinguish them from the later Latius, the subjects of Rome, formed a league or confederation, consisting of thirty cantons [Dict. of Ant. art. Pagus]. The town of Alba Longa, for which a Trojan origin was in later times invented, was the head of the league [ALBA LONGA]. That the Sabines, who eventually coalesced with the Latins to form the state of Rome, had in the first place occupied part of Latium by conquest, is a probable conclusion both from the Roman traditions of Titus Tatius and from many ancient Roman institutions, civil and religious, of a Sabine origin; and some have even suggested that the destruction of Alba Longa took place in this Sabine invasion. Again, there are traces of an Etruscan conquest of part of Latium in the name of Tusculum itself and in the stories of the Etruscan kings at Rome; and it is possible, as many have thought, that Etruscan occupation of towns in Latium coincided with the period assigned in the legends to the reigns of the Tarquins and Servius Tullius. The most probable view of the stages by which Rome extended her influence in Latium seems to be as follows. She first subdued the Latin states near the Tiber and Anio, Antemnae, Crustumarium, Ficulnea, Medullia, Caenina, Corniculum, Cameria, Collatia, and then proceeded to the conquest and destruction of her rival, Alba Longa, after which she was acknowledged as the head of the Latin League of thirty states. Fidenae was long disputed by the Romans and the Etruscans of Veii. The difference made in the position of the Latin towns was that whereas in old times Alba Longa was merely a chief city among others of equal rights, who probably combined to appoint a federal commander for their united contingents of troops, Rome stood on the footing of being equal to all the rest together. The Roman forces amounted to half the federal army, and she received half the land and spoil taken in war. Henceforth the Latin festival was converted into a Roman one, which is the signification of Livy's statement that Tarquin originated the Feriae Latinae (Liv. v. 17; Dict. of Ant. s. v.). The Latins asserted their independence, and commenced a struggle with Rome, which, though frequently suspended and apparently terminated by treaties, was as often renewed, and was not brought to a final close till B.C. 340, when the Latins were defeated by the Romans at the battle of Mt. Vesuvius. The Latin League was now dissolved, and the supremacy of Rome was completely established over all the Latin towns, but with special arrangements according to the will of the Romans as to what rights and what land each town should retain, or whether it should become merely a Roman municipium. In some the old Latin name of dictator was still retained (Cic. pro Mil. 10, 27). [For details see Dict. of Ant. art. Latinitas.]—The old Latin towns were built for the most part on isolated hills, the sides of which were made by art steep and almost inaccessible. They were surrounded by walls built of great polygonal stones, the remains of which excite our astonishment.

Latmīcus Sinus (ὁ Λατμικὸς κόλπος), a gulf on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, into which the river Maeander fell, named from M. Latmus, which overhangs it. Its width from Miletus, which stood on its S. side, to Pyrrha, was about thirty stadia (Strab. p. 635). Through the changes effected on this coast by the Maeander, the gulf is now an inland lake, called Akees-Chai or Ufa-Bassi.

Latmus (Λάτμος: Monte di Palatia), a mountain in Caria, extending in a SE. direction from the S. side of the Maeander to the NE. of Miletus and the Sinus Latmīcus. It was the mythological scene of the story of Selene and Endymion, who is hence called by the Roman poets 'Latmīus heros' and 'Latmīus venator'; he had a temple on the mountain, and a cavern in its side was shown as his grave. [ENDYMION.]

Latobīci, a Celtic people in the SW. of Pannonia on the river Savus, in the modern Carniola (Ptol. ii. 15, 2; Plin. iii. 148).

Latobrigi, a people in Gallia Belgica, mentioned, along with the Tulingi and Rauraei, as neighbours of the Helvetii. They dwelt between Bale and Berne. (Caes. B. G. i. 5, 29.)

Latōna. [LETO.]

Latōpōlis (Λατόπολις: Esneh, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, between Thebes and Apollonopolis, with a temple of the god Khnem. According to Strabo the inhabitants worshipped the Nile-fish called latus (Strab. pp. 812, 817).

Latro, M. Porcius, a Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, was a Spaniard by birth, and a friend and compatriot of the elder Seneca, by whom he is frequently mentioned. His school was much frequented at Rome, and he numbered among his pupils the poet Ovid. He died B. C. 4. (Sen. Controv. i. 13-24, ii. 10, 8.)

Laumellum (Lomello), a town of Gallia Transpadana between Vercellao and Ticinum (Ptol. iii. 1, 36).

Laureacum or Lauriacum (Loreh, near Enns), a strongly fortified town on the Danube in Noricum Ripense, the headquarters of the second legion, and the station of a Roman fleet (Amm. Marc. xxxi. 10).

Laurentia, Acca. [ACCA LAURENTIA.]

Laurentius Lydus. [LYDUS.]

Laurentum (Laurens, -ntis), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, situated between Ostia and Ardea, near the sea (Liv. i. 1; Dionys. i. 45; Strab. p. 229). It was supposed to have derived its name from groves of laurels, which (apparently like the eucalyptus) were found to counteract the unhealthiness of its marshes (Herodian, i. 12). According to Virgil, it was the residence of king Latinus and the capital of Latium; and it is certain that it was a place of importance in the time of the Roman kings, as it is mentioned in the treaty between Rome and Carthage in B. C. 509. The younger Pliny and the emperor Commodus had villas at Laurentum (Plin. Ep. ii. 17). It seems to have been, at any rate in winter, a healthy place, notwithstanding the marshes in the neighbourhood. These marshes supplied the tables of the Romans with excellent boars (Verg. Aen. x. 107, 709; Hor. Sat. ii. 4, 42; Mart. x. 37, 5).—In the time of the Antonines Laurentum was united with Lavinium, from which it was only six miles distant, so that the two formed only one town, which was called Laurolavinium, and its inhabitants were named Laurentes Lavinates. The site of Laurentum was probably at, or near, Torre di Paterno.

Lauretānus Portus, a harbour of Etruria, between Populonia and Cosa (Liv. xxx. 39).

Lauriācum. [LAUREACUM.]

Laurium (Λαύριον, Λαύρειον), in the S. of Attica, a little N. of the Prom. Sunium, included all the hilly metalliferous district S. of a line drawn from Thoricus to Anaphystus. It was celebrated for its silver mines, which in early times were so productive that every Athenian citizen received annually ten drachmae. On the advice of Themistocles, the Athenians applied this money to equip 200 triremes, shortly before the invasion of Xerxes. In the time of Xenophon the produce of the mines was 100 talents. They gradually became less and less productive, and in the time of Strabo they yielded nothing. (Hdt. vii. 144; Thuc. ii. 55; Xen. Mem. iii. 6, 12; Strab. p. 399; Diet. of Ant. art. Metalla.) At the present time the mines are worked for lead, and also within recent years it has been found possible to obtain silver by re-melting the imperfectly smelted scoriae thrown out by the old Greeks. It is curious that when these refuse heaps were removed, a flower sprang up unknown to modern botany, whose seeds must have lain dormant since the old mining works.

Lauron (Laurv, W. of Xucar in Valencia), a town in the E. of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sea and the river Suero, celebrated on account of its siege by Sertorius, and as the place where Cn. Pompey, the Younger, was put to death after the battle of Munda (Appian, B. C. i. 109; Plut. Sert. 18, Pomp. 18).

Lāus (Λᾶος : Λαῖνος), a Greek city in Lucania, situated near the mouth of the river Laus, which formed the boundary between Lucania and Brutium. It was founded by the Sybarites, after their own city had been taken by the inhabitants of Croton, B. C. 510, but it had disappeared in the time of Pliny. (Strab. p. 253; Plin. iii. 72.)—The gulf into which the river Laus flowed was also called the gulf of Laus.

Laus Pompeii (Lodi Vecchio), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, NW. of Placentia, and SE. of Mediolanum. It was founded by the Boii (Plin. iii. 124), and was probably made a municipium by Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompeius Magnus, and called by his name.

Lausus. 1. Son of Mezentius, king of the Etruscans, slain by Aeneas (Verg. Aen. vii. 649, x. 790).—2. Son of Numitor and brother of Ilia, killed by Amulius (Ov. Fast. iv. 55).

Lautulae, a village of the Volsci in Latium, in a narrow pass between Tarracina and Fundi (Liv. vii. 39).

Lāverna, the Roman goddess of thieves and impostors. A grove was sacred to her on the Via Salaria, and she had an altar near the Porta Lavernalis, which derived its name from her. (Varr. L. L. v. 163; Hor. Ep. i. 16, 60; Petron. 140; Arnob. iii. 26.)

Lavicum. [LABICUM.]

Lavinia, daughter of Latinus and Amata, betrothed to Turnus (TURNUS), but afterwards given in marriage to Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Aeneas Silvius (Liv. i. 1).

Lavinium (Lavinensis : Praticea), an ancient town of Latium, three miles from the sea and six miles E. of Laurentum, on the Via Appia, and near the river Numicus, which divided its territory from that of Ardea. It is said to have been founded by Aeneas, and to have been called Lavinium, in honour of his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus. (Liv. i. 1; Dionys. i. 45; Strab. p. 229). It was an old religious centre for the Latins, having a temple of Venus common to the nation and administered by priests from Ardea (Strab. p. 232), and it was the sanctuary of the Penates of the Latin people (Varro, L. L. v. 144). Lavinium was at a later time united with Laurentum. [LAURENTUM.]

Lazae or Lazi (Λάζαι, Λαζοί), a people of Colchis, S. of the Phasis (Ptol. v. 10, 5).

Leaena (Λέαυα), an Athenian hetaera, beloved by Aristogiton or Harmodius. On the murder of Hipparchus she was put to the torture; but she died under her sufferings without making any disclosure, and, if we may believe one account, she bit off her tongue, that no secret might be wrung from her. The Athenians honoured her memory, and in particular by a bronze statue of a lioness (Λέαυα) without a tongue, on the Acropolis between the Propylaea and the temenos of Artemis Brauronia. (Paus. i. 23, 2; Plut. de Garrul. 8; Polyæn. viii. 45.)

Leagrus (Λέαγρος), son of Glaucon, commanded the Athenians who made the first unsuccessful attempt to colonise Ennea Hodoi (Amphipolis), and fell at Drabescus (Hdt. ix. 75; Thuc. i. 100; Paus. i. 29, 4). His grandson is ridiculed in the lines of Plato quoted by Athen. p. 68.

Leander (Λεανδρος or Λέαυδρος), the famous youth of Abydos, who was in love with Hero, the priestess of Aphrodite in Sestus, and swam every night across the Hellespont to visit her, and returned before daybreak. Once during a stormy night he perished in the waves. Next morning his body was washed on the coast of Sestus. Hero threw herself into the sea. This story is the subject of the poem of Musaeus, entitled De Amore Herois et Leandri [MUSAEUS], and is also mentioned by Ovid (Her. xviii. 19), Virgil, (Georg. iii. 258), and Statius (Theb. vi. 535).

Learchus (Λέαρχος). 1. [ATHAMAS].—2. Of Rhegium, one of those Daedalian artists who stand on the confines of the mythical and historical periods. One account made him a pupil of Daedalus; another, of Dipoenus and Scyllis (Paus. iii. 17, 6).

Lēbādeā (Λεβάδεια: Livādhiā), a town in Boeotia, W. of the lake Copais, between Chaeironā and Mt. Helicon, at the foot of a rock from which the river Hercyna flows. In a cave of this rock, close to the town, was the celebrated oracle of Trophonius. (Hdt. i. 46, viii. 134; Strab. p. 418; Paus. ix. 39, 1.)

Lēbēdos (Λέβεδος: Λεβέδιος), one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy, in Asia Minor, stood on the coast of Lydia, between Colophon and Teos, ninety stadia E. of the promontory of Myonnens (Strab. pp. 633, 643). It was said to have been built at the time of the Ionian migration, on the site of an earlier Carian city; and it flourished, chiefly by commerce, until Lysimachus transplanted most of its inhabitants to Ephesus. In Horace's time it was a proverb for desolation. (Paus. i. 9, 8, vii. 3, 2; Hor. Ep. i. 11, 7.) Near it were mineral springs (Hdt. i. 142; Thuc. viii. 19), which exist near Ekklesia, but no traces remain of the city.

Lēbēn or Lēbēna (Λεβήν, Λεβήνα), a town on the S. coast of Crete, ninety stadia SE. of Gortyna, of which it was the harbour. It possessed a celebrated temple of Asclepius. (Strab. p. 478.)

Lechaeum (τὸ Λεχάϊον: Λεχάϊος), one of the two harbours of Corinth, with which it was connected by two long walls. It was twelve stadia from Corinth, and was situated on the Corinthian gulf. It had a temple of Poseidon, who was hence called Lechaeus. [CORINTHUS.]

Lectum (τὸ Λεκτόν: C. Baba or S. Maria), the SW. promontory of the Troad, is formed where the W. extremity of M. Ida juts out into the sea, opposite to the N. side of the island of Lesbos. It was the S. limit of the Troad; and, under the Byzantine emperors, the N. limit of the province of Asia. An altar was shown here in Strabo's time, said to have been erected by Agamemnon to the twelve chief gods of Greece. (Il. xiv. 294; Hdt. ix. 114; Strab. p. 605.)

Lēcŷthus (Λήκυθος), a town in the peninsula of Sithonia near Torone, taken by Brasidas (Thuc. iv. 115).

Lēda (Λήδα), daughter of Thestius, whence she is called Thestias, and wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta (Eur. I. A. 49; Paus. iii. 13, 8). According to the best known, but post-Homeric, legend, Zeus visited Leda in the form of a swan; and she brought forth two eggs, from the one of which issued Helen, and from the other Castor and Pollux. [For the various accounts of the birth of Helen and her brothers, see DIOSCURI; HELENA.] The origin of the myth is not easy to trace. There is no connexion in mythology between Zeus and the swan, which is the sacred bird of Apollo in the 'Hyperborean' story; the swan is also a symbol of Aphrodite as goddess of love. Perhaps the origin may be that the swan being a bird which breeds on the Eurotas, there was a local myth about it transferred to Zeus. Others imagine a totem of a swan tribe. That Leda represents a local deity is probable enough, but of what nature is as doubtful as the theory that she was the night and her daughter Helen the moon is unsatisfactory.

Lēdon (Λέδων), a town in Phocis, NW. of Tithorea; the birthplace of Philomelus, the commander of the Phocians in the Sacred war; it was destroyed in this war (Paus. x. 2, 3, 33).

Ledus or Ledum (Les or Lez, near Montpellier), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis (Plin. ix. 29; Avien. Or. Mar. 590; LATERA).

Lēgae (Λήγαι or Λήγες), a people on the S. shore of the Caspian sea. A branch of them was found by the Romans in the N. mountains of Albania, at the time of Pompey's expedition. (Strab. p. 503; Plut. Pomp. 35.)

Legio Septima Gemina (Leon), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, in the country of the Astures, originally the headquarters of the legion so called (Ptol. ii. 6, 30; Tac. Hist. ii. 67, 86, iii. 7).

Lēitus (Λήϊτος), son of Alcetor or Alcetryon, by Cleobule, father of Peneleos, one of the Argonauts, commanded the Bocoitians in the war against Troy (Il. ii. 494, xvii. 602; Paus. ix. 4, 3).

Lelantus Campus (τὸ Λήλαντον πεδῖον), a plain in Euboea, between Eretria and Chalcis, for the possession of which these two cities often contended. It contained warm springs and mines of iron and copper. (Strab. pp. 58, 447.)

Lēlēges (Λέλεγες), a race which in early times inhabited parts of Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands. The traditions about them vary greatly. In Homer they appear as an Asiatic race helping the Trojans (Il. x. 429, xx. 96): Herodotus connects them with the Carians, and places them in the islands, subject to Mimos (i. 171); Pausanias also connects them with the Carians, and places them in Pylus and Laconia (i. 39, 1, iii. 1, 1, iv. 1, 36, vii. 2, 7). Strabo, who cites Aristotle, distinguishes them from Pelasgians, and says that they existed in Asia connected with Carians, and also in Aearnania, Locris, Boeotia, Megaris, and Leucas (Strab. p. 321). The inference from these accounts is that the Leleges were a wandering, seafaring people of Carian rather than Greek origin. Their supposed settlement in many parts of Greece may be due to trading stations or to piratical enterprises. Some writers hold that they may have really been akin to the Greek races who have been mentioned, and not allied in origin to the Carians, who were not Greek. Their mythical ancestor was Lelex, king of Laconia. (Paus. iii. 1, 1.)

Lelex. [LELEGES.]

Lemannus or Lemānus Lacus (Lake of Geneva), a large lake formed by the river Rhodanus, was the boundary between the old Roman province in Gaul and the land of the Helvetii. Its greatest length is fifty-five miles, and its greatest breadth six miles. (Caes. B. G. i. 8; Mel. ii. 5; Strab. p. 271.)

Lemnos (Λήμνος: Lēmνιος, fem. Lēmνιάς: Stalimene, i.e. εἰς τὰν Λήμνον), one of the largest islands in the Aegean sea, was situated nearly midway between Mt. Athos and the Hellespont, and about twenty-two miles SW. of Imbros. Its area is about 147 square miles. In the earliest times it appears to have contained only one town, which bore the same name as the island (Il. xiv. 230); but at a later period we read of two towns, Myrina (Palaeo Castro) on the W. of the island, and Hephaestia or Hephaestias (nr. Rapanidi) on the NW., with a harbour. (Hdt. vi. 140; Ptol. iii. 13, 4; Plin. iv. 73.) Lemnos was sacred to Hephaestus, who is said to have fallen here, when Zeus hurled him down from Olympus. Hence the workshop of the god is sometimes placed in this island. [HEPHAESTUS, p. 393.] The legend has all the appearance of being derived from volcanic phenomena, and it was generally considered that Mosychlus in Lemnos was once a volcano; but this is denied by recent geologists, who assert that the fires spoken of as issuing from it (Antimach. ap. Schol. ad Nicandr. Ther. 472; Lycophr. 227; Hesych. s.v.) must have been gaseous.—The most ancient inhabitants of Lemnos, according to Homer, were the Thracian Sinties (Il. i. 594, Od. viii. 294; Strab. p. 331, 36). When the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, they are said to have found it inhabited only by women, who had murdered all their husbands, and had chosen as their queen Hypsipyle, the daughter of Thoas, the king of the island. [HYPISYPYLE.] Some of the Argonauts settled here, and became by the Lemnian women the fathers of the Minyae, the later inhabitants of the island. The Minyae are said to have been driven out of the island by the Pelasgians, who had been expelled from Attica. (Hdt. iv. 145, vi. 137; Ap. Rh. i. 608.) These Pelasgians are further said to have carried away from Attica some Athenian women; but as the children of these women despised their half-brothers, born of Pelasgian women, the Pelasgians murdered both them and their children. In consequence of this atrocity, and of the former murder of the Lemnian husbands by the wives, Lemnian deeds became a proverb in Greece for all atrocious acts. (Hdt. vi. 128; Aesch. Cho. 623; Eur. Hec. 887.) Lemnos was afterwards conquered by one of the generals of Darius; but Miltiades delivered it from the Persians, and made it subject to Athens, in whose power it remained for a long time. There was a labyrinth in Lemnos, built by Smilis and Theodoros about the time of the first Olympiad (Plin. xxxvi. 84). The principal production of the island was a red earth called terra Lemnia or sigillata, employed by the ancient physicians as a remedy for wounds and the bites of serpents, and still much valued for its supposed medicinal virtues.

Lemonia, one of the country tribes of Rome, named after a village Lemonium, situated on the Via Latina beyond the Porta Capena.

Lemovices, a people in Gallia Aquitania, between the Bituriges and Arverni, whose chief town was Augustoritum, subsequently called Lemovices, the modern Limoges (Cacs. B. G. vii. 4; Strab. p. 190).

Lemovii, a people of Germany, mentioned along with the Rugii, who inhabited the shores of the Baltic in the modern Pomerania (Tac. Germ. 43).

Lēmūres, spectres or spirits of the dead. The good spirits of the dead were called Dii Manes or Lares: the souls of the wicked or of those who for any reason could not rest were called Lemures or Larvae. They were said to wander about at night as spectres, and to torment and frighten the living, and to haunt houses with evil omen. (Ov. Fast. v. 419, 473; Hor. Ep. ii. 2, 209; Pers. v. 185; Apul. de Deo Socr. p. 237; Mart. Cap. ii. 162; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 63.) In order to propitiate them the Romans celebrated the festival of the Lemuralia or Lemuria with a curious and primitive method of laying or expelling the ghosts by walking barefoot and throwing black beans over the shoulder. [Dict. of Antiq. s.v.]

Lenaeus (Ληναῖος), a surname of DIONYSUS, from ληρός, the wine-press.

Lentia (Linz), a town in Noricum, on the Danube.

Lentienses, a tribe of the Alemanni, who lived on the N. shore of the Lacus Brigantinus (Lake of Constance), in the modern Linzgau.

Lento, Caesennius, one of Antony's seven agrarian commissioners (septemviratus) in B.C.

44, for apportioning the Campanian and Leontine lands, whence Cicero terms him divisor Italiae. (Phil. xi. 6, 13, xii. 9, 23).

Lentulus, Cornélius, one of the haughtiest patrician families at Rome; so that Cicero coins the words Appictus and Lentulitas to express the qualities of the aristocratic party (ad Fam. iii. 7).—1. L., consul B.C. 327; legate in the Caudine campaign, 321; and dictator 320, when he avenged the disgrace of the Furculae Caudinae. This was indeed disputed (Liv. ix. 15); but his descendants at least claimed the honour for him, by assuming the agnomen of Caudinus.—2. L., surnamed Caudinus, pontifex maximus, and consul 237, when he triumphed over the Ligurians. He died 213. (Eutrop. iii. 2).—3. P., surnamed Caudinus, served with P. Scipio in Spain, 210; praetor 204; one of the ten ambassadors sent to Philip of Macedon, 196. (Liv. xxxiii. 35).—4. P., praetor in Sicily 214, and continued in his province for the two following years. In 189 he was one of ten ambassadors sent into Asia after the submission of Antiochus. (Liv. xxiv. 9, xxxvii. 55).—5. Cn., quaestor 212; curule aedile 204; consul 201; and proconsul in Hither Spain 199 (Liv. xxxi. 50).—6. L., praetor in Sardinia 211; succeeded Scipio as proconsul in Spain, where he remained for eleven years, and on his return was only allowed an ovation, because he only held proconsular rank. He was consul 199, and the next year proconsul in Gaul. (Liv. xxxi. 49).—7. L., curule aedile 163; consul 156; censor 147 (Cic. Brut. 20).—8. P., curule aedile with Scipio Nasica 169; consul suffectus with C. Domitius 162, the election of the former consuls being declared informal. He became princeps senatus, and must have lived to a good old age, since he was wounded in the contest with C. Gracchus in 121. (Liv. xlv. 18; Cic. in Cat. iv. 6).—9. P., surnamed Sura, the man of chief note in Catiline's party. He was quaestor to Sulla in 81; before him and L. Triarius, Verres had to give an account of the monies he had received as quaestor in Cisalpine Gaul. He was soon after himself called to account for embezzlement of public money, but was acquitted. It is said that he got his cognomen of Sura from his conduct on this occasion; for when Sulla called him to account, he answered by scornfully putting out his leg, 'like boys,' says Plutarch, 'when they make a blunder in playing at ball' (Plut. Cic. 17). Other persons, however, had borne the name before (Liv. xxii. 31). In 75 he was praetor; and Hortensius, pleading before such a judge, had no difficulty in procuring the acquittal of Terentius Varro, when accused of extortion. In 71 he was consul. But in the next year he was ejected from the senate, with 63 others, for infamous life and manners. (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 17; Gell. v. 6.) It was this, probably, that led him to join Catiline and his crew. From his distinguished birth and high rank he calculated on becoming chief of the conspiracy. When Catiline quitted the city for Etruria, Lentulus was left as chief of the home conspirators, and his irresolution probably saved the city from being fired. For it was by his over-caution that the negotiation was entered into with the ambassadors of the Allobroges, who betrayed the conspirators. The well-known sequel will be found under the life of Catiline. Lentulus was deposed from the praetorship, and was strangled in the Capitoline prison on the 5th of December. (Sull. Cat. 32, 43, 55).—10. P., surnamed Spinther. He received this nickname from his resemblance to the actor Spinther. (Plin. vii. 54; Val. Max. ix. 14.) Caesar commonly calls him by this name (B.C. i. 15); not so Cicero; but there could be no offence in it, for he used it on his coins when he was propraetor in Spain; and his son bore it after him. He was curule aedile in 63, the year of Cicero's consulship, and was entrusted with the care of the apprehended conspirator, P. Sura [No. 9]. His games were long remembered for their splendour; but his toga, edged with Tyrian purple, gave offence. (Sall. Cat. 47; Cic. Off. ii. 16.) He was praetor in 60; and by Caesar's interest he obtained Hither Spain for his next year's province, where he remained into part of 58. In 57 he was consul, which dignity he also obtained by Caesar's support. In his consulship he moved for the immediate recall of Cicero, brought over his colleague Metellus Nepos to the same views; and his services were gratefully acknowledged by Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 22, Fam. i. 1-9.) He had thus, notwithstanding his obligations to Caesar, openly taken part with the aristocracy. He received Cilicia as his province, but he attempted in vain to obtain a decree of the senate charging him with the office of restoring Ptolemy Anletes, the exiled king of Egypt. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 1; Plut. Pomp. 49.) He remained as pro-consul in Cilicia from 56 till July, 53, and obtained a triumph, though not till 51. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he joined the Pompeian party. He fell into Caesar's hands at Corfinium, but was dismissed by him uninjured. He then joined Pompey in Greece; and after the battle of Pharsalia, he followed Pompey to Egypt, and got safe to Rhodes, at which point (unless Cic. ad Fam. ix. 18 records his death) he disappears from history (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 14; Caes. B.C. iii. 102).—11. P., surnamed Spinther, son of No. 10, elected into the college of aediles in 57 (Dio Cass. xxxix. 17): followed Pompey's fortunes with his father. He was pardoned by Caesar, and returned to Italy. In 45 he was divorced from his abandoned wife, Metella. (Comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 239.) After the murder of Caesar (44) he joined the conspirators. He served with Cassius against Rhodes; with Brutus in Lycia. (Plut. Caes. 67; App. B.C. iv. 72, 82; Cic. ad Att. xiii. 10.)—12. Cn., surnamed Clodianus, a Claudius adopted into the Lentulus family. He was consul in 72, with L. Gellius Publicola. In the war with Spartacus both he and his colleague were defeated—but after their consulship. With the same colleague he held the censorship in 70, and ejected 63 members from the senate for embezzlement and other offences, among whom were Lentulus Sura [No. 9] and C. Antonius, afterwards Cicero's colleague in the consulship, though many of them, being acquitted by the courts, were afterwards restored (Cic. pro Clu. 42, 120; Val. Max. v. 9). Lentulus supported the Manilian law, appointing Pompey to the command against Mithridates. As an orator, he concealed his want of talent by great skill and art, and by a good voice (Cic. Brut. 66, 235).—13. L., surnamed Crus, appeared in 61 as the chief accuser of P. Clodius, for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 58 he was praetor, and in 49 consul with C. Marcellus. He was raised to the consulship in consequence of his being a known enemy of Caesar. He did all he could to excite his wavering party to take arms and meet Caesar; he called Cicero cowardly; blamed him for seeking a triumph at such a time (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6, ad Att. xi.

6); urged war at any price, in the hope, says Caesar (B.C. i. 4), of retrieving his ruined fortune, and becoming another Sulla. It was mainly at Lentulus's instigation that early in the year the violent measures passed the senate which gave the tribunes a pretence for flying to Caesar at Ravenna (Plut. Caes. 33). He himself fled from the city at the approach of Caesar, and afterwards crossed over to Greece. After the battle of Pharsalia, he fled to Egypt, and arrived there the day after Pompey's murder. On landing he was apprehended by young Ptolemy's ministers, and put to death in prison. (Caes. B.C. iii. 104; Plut. Pomp. 80).—14. L., surnamed Niger, flamen of Mars. In 57 he was one of the priests to whom was referred the question whether the site of Cicero's house was consecrated ground. In 56 he was one of the judges in the case of P. Sextius, and he died in the same year, much praised by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 6).—15. L., son of the last, and also flamen of Mars. He defended M. Scaurus, in 54, when accused of extortion: he accused Gabinus of high treason, about the same time, but was suspected of collusion. In the Philippics he is mentioned as a friend of Antony's (Phil. iii. 10).—16. Cossus, surnamed Gaetulicus, consul B.C. 1, was sent into Africa in A.D. 6, where he defeated the Gaetuli; hence his surname. On the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, he accompanied Drusus, who was sent to quell the mutiny of the legions in Pannonia. He died 25, at a very great age, leaving behind him an honourable reputation. (Tac. Ann. i. 27, iii. 59, iv. 29, 44.)—17. Cn., surnamed Gaetulicus, son of the last, consul A.D. 26. He afterwards had the command of the legions of Upper Germany for ten years, and was very popular among the troops. In 39 he was put to death by order of Caligula, who feared his influence with the soldiers. (Suet. Galb. 6, Claud. 9; Dio Cass. lix. 22; Plin. Ep. v. 3; Mart. praef. ad Lib. i.) He was a historian and a poet: but we have only three lines of his poems extant, unless he is the author of nine epigrams in the Greek Anthology, inscribed with the name of Gaetulicus.

Lēo or Lēon (Λέων). 1. King of Sparta, about 600 B.C. (Hdt. i. 65).—2. Also called Leonides (Λεωνίδης), of Heraclea on the Pontus, disciple of Plato, was one of the conspirators who, with their leader, Chion, assassinated CLEARCHUS, tyrant of Heraclea, B.C. 353 (Just. xvi. 5).—3. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician and historical writer of the age of Philip and Alexander the Great. (Snid. s.v.)—4. Diaconus or the Deacon, a Byzantine historian of the 10th century. His history, in ten books, includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of the emperor Romanus II., A.D. 959, to the death of Joannes I. Zimisces, 975. His history, though faulty in style, is a valuable contemporary record. (Ed. by Hase, Paris, 1818; by Migne, 1863).—5. Grammaticians, one of the writers who continued the Byzantine history from the period when Theophanes leaves off. His work, entitled Chronographia, extends from the accession of Leo V. the Armenian, 813, to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, 944. (Edited with Theophanes by Combéfis, Paris, 1655).—6. Leo was also the name of six Byzantine emperors. Of these Leo VI., surnamed the Philosopher, who reigned 886-911, is celebrated in the history of the later Greek literature. He wrote especially a valuable treatise on Greek tactics (ed. by Meursius, 1612; transl. by Burscheid, 1781). He is also celebrated in the history of legislation. As the Latin language had long ceased to be the official language of the Eastern empire, Basil, the father of Leo, had formed and partly executed the plan of issuing an authorised Greek version of Justinian's legislation. This plan was carried out by Leo. The Greek version is known under the title of Βασιλικαὶ Διατάξεις, or shortly, Βασιλικαὶ (in Latin, Basilica), which means 'Imperial Constitutions' or 'Laws.' The publication of this authorised body of law in the Greek language led to the gradual disuse of the compilations of Justinian in the East. But the Roman law was thus more firmly established in Eastern Europe and Western Asia.

Leobōtes. [LABOTAS.]

Leōchāres (Λεωχάρης), an Athenian statuary and sculptor, was one of the great artists of the later Athenian school, at the head of which were Scopas and Praxiteles. He flourished B.C. 352–338. He was associated with Scopas, Bryaxis, and Timotheus in the sculptures of the Mausoleum. His most famous work seems to have been his statue of the rape of Ganyমেде (Plin. xxxiv. 79). The original work was in bronze. Of the extant copies in marble, the best is one, half the size of life, in the Vatican. [See cut on p. 357.]

Leocōrion (Λεωκόριον), a shrine in Athens, in the Ceramicus, erected in honour of the daughters of Leos. Hipparchus was murdered here. (Thuc. i. 20, vi. 57; Ael. V. H. xii. 28.)

Leōdāmas (Λεωδάμας), an Attic orator, educated in the school of Isocrates, and greatly praised by Aeschines (c. Ctes. § 138).

Leonica, a town of the Edetani in the W. of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Leōnidas (Λεωνίδας). 1. I., King of Sparta, B.C. 491–480, was one of the sons of Anaxandrides by his first wife, and, according to some accounts, was twin-brother to Cleombrotus. He succeeded his half-brother Cleomenes I., B.C. 491, his elder brother Dorieus also having previously died. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, 480, Leonidas was sent to make a stand against the enemy at the pass of Thermopylae. He took with him 300 Spartans—choosing those who had sons, so that their families did not risk extinction—about 2000 Helots, and he was joined on the way by 2000 Arcadians and 700 from Cerinth and other towns, and the same number from Thespieae, so that the whole force at his disposal was somewhat more than 5000, besides 400 Thebans whom he had compelled to join him as a sort of pledge from their city. The Persians in vain attempted to force their way through the pass of Thermopylae. They were driven back by Leonidas and his gallant band with immense slaughter. At length the Malian Ephialtes betrayed the mountain path of the Anopaea to the Persians, who were thus able to fall upon the rear of the Greeks. When it became known to Leonidas that the Persians were crossing the mountain, he dismissed all the other Greeks, except the Thesopian and Theban forces, declaring that he and the Spartans under his command must needs remain in the post they had been sent to guard. Then, before the body of Persians, who were crossing the mountain under Hydarnes, could arrive to attack him in the rear, he advanced from the narrow pass and charged the myriads of the enemy with his handful of troops, hopeless now of preserving their lives, and anxious only to sell them dearly. In the desperate battle which ensued, Leonidas himself fell soon. His body was rescued by the Greeks, after a violent struggle. On the hillock in the pass, where the remnant of the Greeks made their last stand, a lion of stone was set up in his honour. It was not a barren heroism, for the moral effect in discouragement to the Persians and encouragement to the Greeks was of great importance in the issue. (Hdt. vii. 175, 202–225; Paus. iii. 4, 14; Diod. xi. 4; Cic. Fin. ii. 19, 30, Tusc. i. 42, 49.)—2. II., King of Sparta, was son of the traitor Cleonymus. He acted as guardian to his infant relative, Areus II., on whose death he ascended the throne, about 256. Being opposed to the projected reforms of his contemporary Agis IV., he was deposed, and the throne was transferred to his son-in-law, Cleombrotus; but he was soon afterwards recalled, and caused Agis to be put to death, 240. He died about 236, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III. (Plut. Agis, 3–21; Cleom. 1–3).—3. A kinsman of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was entrusted with Alexander's education before he became the pupil of Aristotle. He trained the young prince in hardy and self-denying habits. There were two excellent cooks (said Alexander afterwards) with which Leonidas had furnished him—a night's march to season his breakfast, and a scanty breakfast to season his dinner (Plut. Alex. 22, 25).—4. Of Tarentum, the author of upwards of 100 epigrams in the Doric dialect. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager. They are chiefly inscriptions for dedicatory offerings and works of art. Leonidas probably lived in the time of Pyrrhus.—5. Of Alexandria, also an epigrammatic poet, under Nero and Vespasian. In the Greek Anthology, 43 epigrams of little merit are ascribed to him.

Leonnātus (Λεωννάτος), a Macedonian of a princely family in Pella, one of Alexander's most distinguished officers. He saved Alexander's life in India in the assault on the city of the Malli. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 303), he obtained the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia, and in the following year he crossed over into Europe, to assist Antipater against the Greeks; but he was defeated by the Athenians and their allies, and fell in battle. (Arrian, iv. 12, 21; Curt. viii. 14, x. 7, 9; Diod. xviii. 12–15.)

Leontes. [LITA.]

Leontiādes (Λεοντιάδης). 1. A Theban, commanded at Thermopylae the forces supplied by Thebes to the Grecian army, B.C. 480 (Hdt. vii. 205).—2. A Theban, assisted the Spartans in seizing the Cadmea, or citadel of Thebes, in 382. He was slain by Pelopidas in 379, when the Spartan exiles recovered possession of the Cadmea. (Xen. Hell. v. 2–4; Diod. xv. 25.)

Leontini (οἱ Λεοντῖνοι; Λεοντίνος; Leontini), a town in the E. of Sicily, about five miles from Coin of Leontini, of 5th cent. B.O.

Obv., ΛΕΟΝΤΙΝΩΝ (in archaic characters): head of Apollo. beneath, lion and laurel leaves; rev., chariot, the charioteer being crowned by Victory: beneath, a lion (the symbol of the city).

the sea, NW. of Syracuse, was situated upon the small river Lissus. It was built upon two hills, which were separated from one another by a valley, in which were the forum, the senate-house, and the other public buildings, while the temples and the private houses occupied the hills. The rich plains N. of the city, Leontini Campi, were some of the most fertile in Sicily, and produced abundant crops of most excellent wheat. Leontini was founded by Chalcidians from Naxos, B.C. 730, only six years after the foundation of Naxos itself (Thuc. iv. 3; Diod. xii. 53, xiv. 14). It never attained much political importance, in consequence of its proximity to Syracuse, to which it soon became subject, and whose fortunes it shared (Strab. p. 273). At a later time it joined the Carthaginians, and was taken and plundered by the Romans. Under the Romans it sank into insignificance (Liv. xxiv. 39; Cic. Verr. ii. 66). Gorgias was a native of Leontini.

Leontium (Λεόντιον), an Athenian hetæra, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus, wrote a treatise against Theophrastus. She had a daughter, Danaë, who was also a hetæra. (Cic. N. D. i. 33, 93; Diog. Laërt. xii. 4.)

Leontium (Λεόντιον), a town in Achaia, between Pharae and Aegium (Pol. ii. 41).

Leontópolis (Λεοντόπολις, Λεόντων πόλις). 1. A city in the Delta of Egypt, S. of Thmuïs, and NW. of Athribis, was the capital of the Nomos Leontopolites, and probably of late foundation, as no writer before Strabo mentions it (Strab. pp. 802, 812).—2. [NICEPHORIUM.]

Leoprepides. [SIMONIDES, 2.]

Leos (Λεός), one of the heroes eponymi of the Athenians, said to have been a son of Orpheus. The phyle or tribe of Leontis derived its name from him. According to the popular legend, once, when Athens was suffering from famine or plague, the Delphic oracle ordered that the daughters of Leos should be sacrificed, and the father complied with the command. The Athenians afterwards erected the Leocorium (from Λεός and κόραι) to them. Their names were Praxithea, Theope, and Eubule. (Paus. i. 5, 2, x. 10, 1; Plut. Thes. 13; Diod. xv. 17.)

Leosthenes (Λεωσθένης), an Athenian commander of the combined Greek army in the Lamian war. In the year after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he defeated Antipater near Thermopylae; Antipater thereupon threw himself into the small town of Lamia. Leosthenes pressed the siege with the utmost vigour, but was killed by a blow from a stone. His loss was mourned by the Athenians as a public calamity. He was honoured with a public burial in the Ceramicus, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Hyperides. (Diod. xvii. 111, xviii. 8-13; Paus. i. 29, 13.)

Leotychides (Λεωτυχίδης, Λευτυχίδης, Herod.). 1. King of Sparta, B.C. 491-469. He commanded the Greek fleet in 479, and defeated the Persians at the battle of Mycale. He was afterwards sent with an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the Persians; but in consequence of his accepting the bribes of the Aleuadæ, he was brought to trial on his return home, and went into exile to Tegea, 469, where he died. He was succeeded by his grandson, Archidamus II. (Hdt. vi. 65-72; Paus. iii. 4, 7).—2. Grandson of Archidamus II., and son of Agis II. There was, however, some suspicion that he was in reality the fruit of an intrigue of Alcibiades with Timæa, the queen of Agis; in consequence of which he was excluded from the throne, mainly through the influence of Lysander, and his uncle, Agesilaus II., was substituted in his room (Xen. Hell. iii. 3; Paus. iii. 8).

Lepidus Aemilius, the name of a distinguished patrician family. 1. M., aedile B.C. 192; prætor 191, with Sicily as his province; consul 187, when he defeated the Ligurians; pontifex maximus 180; censor 179 with M. Fulvius Nobilior; and consul a second time 175. He was six times chosen by the censors princeps senatus, and he died 152, full of years and honours. (Liv. xl. 42-46, Epit. 48.) Lepidus the triumvir is called by Cicero (Phil. xiii. 7) the pronepos of this Lepidus; but he would seem more probably to have been his abnepos, or great-great-grandson.—2. M., consul 137, carried on war in Spain against the Vaccaei, but unsuccessfully. Since he had attacked the Vaccaei in opposition to the express orders of the senate, he was deprived of his command, and condemned to pay a fine. He was a man of education and refined taste. Cicero, who had read his speeches, speaks of him as the greatest orator of his age (Brut. 25, 86, 97).—3. M., the father of the triumvir, was prætor in Sicily in 81, where he earned a character by his oppressions only second to that of Verres. In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla he belonged at first to the party of the latter, but he afterwards came forward as a leader of the popular party. In his consulship, 78, he attempted to rescind the laws of Sulla, who had lately died, but he was opposed by his colleague Catulus, who received the powerful support of Pompey. In the following year (77) Lepidus took up arms, and marched against Rome. He was defeated by Pompey and Catulus, under the walls of the city, in the Campus Martius, and was obliged to take to flight. Finding it impossible to hold his ground in Italy, Lepidus sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia; but, repulsed even in this island by the propraetor, he died shortly afterwards of chagrin and sorrow, which is said to have been increased by the discovery of his wife's infidelity. (Appian, B. C. i. 105, 107; Plut. Sull. 34, 38, Pomp. 15.)—4. Mam., surnamed Livianus, because he belonged originally to the Livia gens, consul 77, belonged to the aristocratical party, and was one of the influential persons who prevailed upon Sulla to spare the life of the young Julius Caesar (Suet. Jul. 1).—5. M., consul 66, with L. Volcatius Tullus, the same year in which Cicero was prætor. He belonged to the aristocratical party, but on the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he retired to his Formian villa to watch the progress of events. (Sall. Cat. 18; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 25.)—6. L. Aemilius Paulus, son of No. 3, and brother of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. His surname of Paulus was probably given him by his father, in honour of the great Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia. But since he belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Pauli, he is inserted in this place and not under PAULUS. Aemilius Paulus did not follow the example of his father, but began his public career by supporting the aristocratical party. His first act was the accusation of Catilino in 63. He was quaestor in Macedonia 59; aedile 55; prætor 53; and consul 50, along with M. Claudius Marcellus. Paulus was raised to the consulship, on account of his being an enemy of Caesar, but Caesar gained him over to his side by a bribe of 1500 talents, which he is said to have expended on a magnificent basilica which he had begun in his aedileship, and which his son completed. After the murder of Caesar (44), Paulus joined the senatorial party. He was one of the senators who declared M. Lepidus a public enemy, on account of his having joined Antony; and, accordingly, when the triumvirate was formed, his name was set down first in the proscription list by his own brother. The soldiers, however, who were appointed to kill him, allowed him to escape. He passed over to Brutus in Asia, and after the death of the latter repaired to Miletus. Here he remained, and refused to go to Rome, although he was pardoned by the triumvirs. (Appian, B. C. ii. 26, iv. 12, 37; Suet. Jul. 29; Plut. Caes. 29, Pomp. 58.)—7. M. Aemilius Lepidus, the Triumvir, brother of the last. On the breaking out of the Civil war (49), Lepidus, who was then praetor, joined Caesar's party; and as the consuls had fled with Pompey from Italy, Lepidus was the highest magistrate remaining in Italy. During Caesar's absence in Spain, Lepidus presided at the comitia in which the former was appointed dictator. In the following year (48) he received the province of Nearer Spain. On his return to Rome in 47, Caesar granted him a triumph, and made him his magister equitum; and in the next year (46), his colleague in the consulship. In 44 he received the government of Narbonese Gaul and Nearer Spain, but had not quitted the neighborhood of Rome at the time of the dictator's death. Having the command of an army near the city, he was able to render M. Antony efficient assistance; and the latter in consequence allowed Lepidus to be chosen pontifex maximus. Lepidus soon afterwards repaired to his provinces of Gaul and Spain. He remained neutral in the struggle between Antony and the senate; but he subsequently joined Antony, when the latter fled to him in Gaul after his defeat at Mutina. This was in the end of May, 43; and when the news reached Rome, the senate proclaimed Lepidus a public enemy. In the autumn Lepidus and Antony crossed the Alps at the head of a powerful army. Octavian (afterwards Augustus) joined them; and in the month of October the celebrated triumvirate was formed by which the Roman world was divided between Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus. [See p. 150, b.] In 42 Lepidus remained in Italy as consul, while the two other triumvirs prosecuted the war against Brutus and Cassius. In the fresh division of the provinces after the battle of Philippi, Lepidus received Africa, where he remained till 86. In this year Octavian summoned him to Sicily to assist him in the war against Sex. Pompey. Lepidus obeyed, but, tired of being treated as a subordinate, he resolved to make an effort to acquire Sicily for himself and to regain his lost power. He was easily subdued by Octavian, who spared his life, but deprived him of his triumvirate, his army, and his provinces, and commanded that he should live at Circeii, under strict surveillance. He allowed him, however, to retain his dignity of pontifex maximus. He died B.C. 13. Augustus succeeded him as pontifex maximus. Lepidus was fond of ease and repose, and it is not improbable that he possessed abilities capable of effecting much more than he ever did. (Appian, B. C. ii., iii., v.; Dio Cass. xli.-xlix.; Index to Cicero.)—8. Paulus Aemilius Lepidus, son of No. 6, with whom he is frequently confounded. His name is variously given by the ancient writers, but Paulus Aemilius Lepidus (in full Paul. Aem. L. f. M. n. Lepidus) seems to be the most correct form. He probably fled with his father to Brutus, but he afterwards made his peace with the triumvirs. He accompanied Octavian in his campaign against Sex. Pompey in Sicily in 86. In 84 he was consul suffectus. In 82 he was censor with L. Munatius Plancus, and died while holding this dignity. He completed the basilica begun by his father. He is best known from the beautiful poem of Propertius on the death of his wife, Cornelia, daughter of Cornelius Scipio and Scribonia (Appian, B. C. v. 2; Suet. Aug. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 95; Propert. v. 11).—9. M. Aemilius Lepidus, son of the triumvir [No. 7] and Junia, formed a conspiracy in 30, for the purpose of assassinating Octavian on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium. Maecenas, who had charge of the city, became acquainted with the plot, seized Lepidus, and sent him to Octavian in the East, who put him to death. His father was ignorant of the conspiracy, but his mother was privy to it. Lepidus was married twice: his first wife was Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his second Servilia, who put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals when the conspiracy of her husband was discovered. (Vell. Pat. ii. 88; Suet. Aug. 19.)—10. Q. Aemilius Lepidus, consul 21 with M. Lollius (Hor. Ep. i. 20, 28).—11. L. Aemilius Paulus, son of No. 8 and Cornelia, married Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus. [JULIA, No. 6.] Paulus is therefore called the progener of Augustus. He was consul A.D. 1 with C. Caesar, his wife's brother. He entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, of the particulars of which we are not informed (Suet. Jul. 19, 64).—12. M. Aemilius Lepidus, brother of the last, consul A.D. 6 with L. Arruntius. He lived on the most intimate terms with Augustus, who employed him in the war against the Dalmatians in A.D. 9. After the death of Augustus, he was also held in high esteem by Tiberius. (Dio Cass. lv. 25; Tac. Ann. i. 13, iv. 20.)—13. M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul with T. Statilius Taurus in A.D. 11, must be carefully distinguished from the last. In A.D. 21 he obtained the province of Asia. (Tac. Ann. iii. 22, 32).—14. Aemilius Lepidus, the son of 11 and Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus, and consequently the great-grandson of Augustus. He was one of the minions of the emperor Caligula. He married Drusilla, the favourite sister of the emperor; but he was notwithstanding put to death by Caligula, A.D. 39. (Suet. Cal. 24, 36.)

Lepontii, a people inhabiting both sides of the Alps, the valleys at the head of Lakes Maggiore and Como, and also those on the northern side of that part of the chain. Hence Pliny makes their southern branch neighbours of the Salassi, who lived about Ivrea, and placed their northern settlements about the sources of the Rhone (Plin. iii. 134); and Caesar (B. G. iv. 24) can correctly speak of their occupying the sources of the Rhine, since the western branch of the Rhine (the Vorder Rhein) rises scarcely 20 miles E. of the Rhone glacier, and it is by no means impossible that the settlements of the Lepontii may have extended far enough E. to include the sources of the Hinter Rhein also. It is probable that they were a Rhaetian tribe, part of which crossed the Alps, while part remained on the north side (Strab. pp. 204, 206). Their name is retained in the Val Leventina—that is, the upper valley of the Ticinus—and in the 'Lepontine Alps,' which are the part of the main chain lying between the passes of the Simplon and the Bernardino. The strange statement of Ptolemy (iii. 1, 38), that the Lepontii lived in the Cottian Alps, is perhaps explained by the fact that Osecla (Domo d'Ossola) was, as he states, one of their chief towns, and that he confused this place with Ocelum, which is in the Cottian district.

Lepræa (Λέπρεια), daughter of Pyrgæus, from whom the town of Lepreum in Elis was said to have derived its name. [LEPREUM.] Another tradition derived the name from Leprens, a son of Pyrgæus. He was a grandson of Poseidon, and, both in his strength and his powers of eating, a rival of Heracles, by whom he was conquered and slain. (Paus. v. 5, 4.)

Lepreum (Λέπρεον, Λέπρεος: Δεπρεάτης: Strovitzî), a town of Elis in Triphylia, situated 40 stadia from the sea, was said to have been founded in the time of Theseus by Minyans from Lemnos, who drove out the Caucones. After the Messenian wars it was subdued by the Eleans with the aid of Sparta; but it recovered its independence in the Peloponnesian war, and was assisted by the Spartans against Elis. (Hdt. iv. 148, ix. 28; Thuc. v. 81; Xen. Hell. iii. 2, 25; Strab. p. 345.) At the time of the Achaean League it was subject to Elis (Pol. iv. 77-80).

Q. Lepta, a native of Cales in Campania, and praefectus fabrum to Cicero in Cilicia B.C. 51. He joined the Pompeian party in the Civil war, and is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 7, v. 10, &c.)

Leptines (Λεπτινός). 1. A Syracusan, son of Hermocrates, and brother of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He commanded his brother's fleet in the war against the Carthaginians B.C. 397, but was defeated by Mago with great loss. In 390 he was sent by Dionysius with a fleet to the assistance of the Lucanians against the Italian Greeks. Some time afterwards he gave offence to the tyrant, and on this account was banished from Syracuse. He thereupon retired to Thurii, but was subsequently recalled by Dionysius, who gave him his daughter in marriage. In 363 he commanded the right wing of the Syracusan army in the battle against the Carthaginians near Cronium; in which he was killed. (Diod. xiv. 48-72, xv. 7, 17.)—2. A Syracusan, who joined with Calippus in expelling the garrison of the younger Dionysius from Rhegium, 351. Soon afterwards he assassinated Calippus, and then crossed over to Sicily, where he made himself tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum. He was expelled in common with the other tyrants by Timoleon; but his life was spared and he was sent into exile at Corinth, 342. (Diod. xvi. 45, 72; Plut. Timol. 24.)—3. An Athenian, known only as the proposer of a law taking away all special exemptions from the burden of public charges (ἀπέλεια τῶν λειτουργιῶν), against which the celebrated oration of Demosthenes is directed, usually known as the oration against Leptines. This speech was delivered 355; but the law must have been passed above a year before, as we are told that the lapse of more than that period had already exempted Leptines from all personal responsibility. Hence the efforts of Demosthenes were directed solely to the repeal of the law, not to the punishment of its proposer. His arguments were successful, and the law was repealed.—4. A Syrian Greek, who assassinated with his own hand, at Laodicea, Cn. Octavius, the chief of the Roman deputies, who had been sent into Syria, 162. Demetrius caused Leptines to be seized, and sent as a prisoner to Rome; but the senate refused to receive him, being desirous to reserve this cause of complaint. (Pol. xxxii. 4-7; Appian, Syr. 4-7.)

Leptis (Λεπτις). 1. Leptis Magna or Neapolis (ἡ Λεπτις μεγάλη, Νεάπολις: Lobda), a city on the coast of N. Africa, between the Syrtes, E.

of Abrotonum, and W. of the mouth of the little river Cinyps, was a Phoenician colony, with a flourishing commerce, though it possessed no harbour. With Abrotonum and Oea it formed the African Tripolis. The Romans made it a colony; it was the birthplace of the emperor Septimius Severus; and it continued to flourish till A.D. 366, when it was almost ruined by an attack from a Libyan tribe. Justinian did something towards its restoration; but the Arabian invasion completed its destruction. Its ruins are still considerable. (Sall. Jug. 19, 77-79; Strab. p. 835; Tac. Hist. iv. 50; Procop. de Aed. vi. 4.)—2. Leptis Minor or Parva (Λεπτις ἡ μικρά: Lamta, Ru.), usually called simply Leptis, a Phoenician colony on the coast of Byzacium, in N. Africa, between Hadrumetum and Thapsus; an important place under the Carthaginians and the Romans (Bell. Afr. 7; Caes. B. C. ii. 38; Sall. Jug. 19).

Lerina (St. Honorat), an island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, opposite Antipolis.

Lerna or Lernê (Λέρνη), a district in Argolis, not far from Argos, in which was a marsh and a small river of the same name. It was celebrated as the place where Heracles killed the Lernean Hydra. [See p. 396.]

Lero (St. Marguerite), a small island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis (Ptol. ii. 10, 21).

Léros (Λέρος: Λέριος), a small island, one of the Sporades, opposite to the mouth of the Sinus Iassius, on the coast of Caria. Its inhabitants, who came originally from Miletus, bore a bad character. (Strab. p. 487.) Besides a city of the same name, it had in it a temple of Artemis, where the transformation of the sisters of Meleager into guinea-fowls took place, in memory of which guinea-fowls were kept in the court of that temple (Ant. Lib. 2; Ov. Met. viii. 533; Athen. p. 655).

Lesbōnax (Λεσβῶναξ). 1. Son of Potamon of Mytilene, a philosopher and sophist, in the time of Augustus. He was the father of Polemon, the teacher and friend of the emperor Tiberius. Lesbōnax wrote several political orations, of which two have come down to us, one entitled Περὶ τοῦ πολέμου Κορινθίων, and the other Προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, both of which are not unsuccessful imitations of the Attic orators of the best times. They are printed in the collections of the Greek orators [DEMOSTHENES], and separately by Orelli, Lips. 1820.—2. A Greek grammarian, of uncertain age, but later than No. 1, the author of an extant work on grammatical figures (Περὶ σχημάτων), published by Valckenner in his edition of Ammonius.

Lesbos (Λέσβος: Λέσβιος, Lesbīus: Mytilene, Metelin), the largest, and by far the most important, of the islands of the Aegaean along the coast of Asia Minor, lay opposite to the Gulf of Adramyttium, off the coast of Mysia, the direction of its length being NW. and SE. It is intersected by lofty mountains, and indented with large bays, the chief of which, on the W. side, runs more than half way across the island. It had three chief headlands, Argemnum on the NE., Sigrium on the W., and Malea on the S. Its valleys were very fertile, especially in the N. part, near Methymna; and it produced corn, oil, and wine renowned for its excellence. It was called by various names, the chief of which were, Issa, Pelasgia, Mytanis, and Macaria (Strab. p. 60; Diod. iii. 55, v. 81): the late Greek writers called it Mytilene, from its chief city, and this name has been preserved to modern times. When Diodorus (v. 80) speaks of the earliest inhabitants as Pelasgians, he merely expresses the fact that they were people of whose coming no tradition survived. In the great Aeolic migration the island was colonised by the first detachment of Aeolians, who founded in it a Hexapolis, consisting of the six cities, Mytilene, Methymna, Eresus, Pyrrha, Antissa, and Arisbe, afterwards reduced to five through the destruction of Arisbe by the Methymnaeans. The Aeolians of Lesbos afterwards founded numerous settlements along the coast of the Troad and in the region of Mt. Ida, and at one time a great part of the Troad seems to have been subject to Lesbos. The chief facts in the history of the island are connected with its principal city, Mytilene, which was the scene of the struggles between the nobles and the commons. [ALCAEUS, PITTACUS.] At the time of the Peloponnesian war, Lesbos was subject to Athens. After various changes, it fell under the power of Mithridates, and passed from him to the Romans (Il. xxiv. 544; Od. iv. 342; Hdt. i. 151; Thuc. ii. 9; Strab. pp. 617-620). The island is most important in the early history of Greece, as the native region of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry. It was the birthplace of the musician and poet TERPANDER, of the lyric poets ALCAEUS, SAPPHO, and others, and of the dithyrambic poet ARION. Other forms of literature and philosophy early and long flourished in it: the sage and statesman PITTACUS, the historians HELLANICUS and Theophrastus, and the philosophers Theophrastus and Phanius, were all Lesbians.

Lesbōthēmis (Λεσβόθεμις), a sculptor of ancient date, and a native of Lesbos (Athen. pp. 182, 635).

Lesches or Lescheus (Λέσχης, Λέσχευς), one of the so-called Cyclic poets, son of Aeschylus, a native of Pyrrha, in the neighbourhood of Mytilene, and hence called a Mytilenean or a Lesbian (Paus. x. 25, 5). He flourished about B.C. 708, and was usually regarded as the author of the Little Iliad (Ἰλιάς ἡ ἐλάσσων or Ἰλιάς μικρά). Aristotle, however (Poët. 23), does not name its author; and the Lesbian Hellenicus, who would probably have claimed it for a countryman if he could, assigns it to the Spartau Cinaethou. The Little Iliad consisted of four books, and was intended as a supplement to the Homeric Iliad. It related the events after the death of Hector, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, and Odysseus, and the reception of the wooden horse within the walls of Troy. The actual capture of the city, called The Destruction of Troy (Ἰλίου πέρις), which formed the continuation of the story was by another author, Arctinus. Hence Aristotle, alluding to the want of unity, remarks that the Little Iliad furnished materials for eight tragedies, whilst only one could be based upon the Iliad or Odyssey of Homer.

Lethæus (Ληθαῖος). 1. A river of Ionia, in Asia Minor, flowing S. past Magnesia into the Mæander (Strab. p. 554).—2. A river in the S. of Crete, flowing past Gortyna.—3. [LATHON.]

Lêthē (Λήθη), the personification of oblivion, called by Hesiod a daughter of Eris (Th. 227), i.e. the forgetfulness of former kindnesses which ensues from a quarrel. A river in the lower world was likewise called Lethe. The souls of the departed drank of this river, and thus forgot all they had said or done in the upper world. [HADES.]

Lethe, a river in Spain. [See LIMAEA.]

Lêto (Λητώ), called Latōna by the Romans, is described by Hesiod as a daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phoebe, a sister of Asteria, and the mother of Apollo and Artemis by Zeus, before his marriage to Hera (Th. 405, 921; cf. Il. xiv. 327). In Homer, though nothing is said of the place or manner of the birth, she is spoken of as the mother by Zeus of Apollo and Artemis. She, like her children, sides with the Trojans; she and Artemis heal the wounded Aeneas in the temple of Apollo in Troy, which implies a tradition that the three deities were associated in a temple there, and also seems to ascribe to her a share in the healing powers of Apollo Paeonius. (Il. i. 36, v. 447, xx. 40, 72, xxi. 497; Od. xi. 318.) The stories of the offence given to her by Niobe and by Tityus are also alluded to, but both in what are considered later parts of the poems (Il. xxiv. 607; Od. xi. 580). Her fame and her story increased as the worship of Apollo grew in importance through the Hellenic nation. The wanderings of the patient and gentle goddess persecuted during her pregnancy by Hera, who seems already to be the wife of Zeus, and all the scenes and associations of the birth of the twin deities are dwelt upon by post-Homeric poets. All the world being afraid of receiving Leto on account of Hera, who had sent the serpent Python to follow her, she wandered about till she came to Delos, which was then a floating island, and bore the name of

Leto (Latona). (From a painted vase.)

Asteria or Ortygia. When Leto arrived there, Zeus fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place for his beloved, and here she gave birth to Apollo and Artemis. The bed of Leto was by the Iuopus, a small stream of Delos which Alexandrian traditions made an offshoot from the Nile passing under the sea (Strab. p. 271; Callim. Hymn. Del. 206), and near her sacred lake; it was shadowed by a palm tree (cf. Od. vi. 152) and a laurel which sprang up for her shelter, and all the land put forth flowers in joy at the birth (Hymn. ad Apoll. Del. 119; Hdt. ii. 170; Eur. Hec. 459, Ion. 918, I. T. 1100; Callim. Hymn. Del. 260). Some additions have grown partly out of the other name of the island, Ortygia (quail island); that Leto took the form of a quail in order to reach the island; or that her sister, Asteria, flying from the love of Zeus, was changed into a quail and then into the floating island which received Leto. Leto is most commonly taken to be the goddess of night (from λανθάνειν); hence she gives birth to light deities who come forth as it were from the womb of night, Apollo, Artemis (as moon-goddess), and Asteria, goddess of stars: with this view agree her epithets κτανόπεπλος (dark-robed), μελιχος (gentle), and the expression that she is 'kind to men and to the immortal gods' (Hes. Th 407).—From their mother Apollo is frequently called Letoïus or Latoïus, and Artemis (Diana) Lctoïa, Letoïs, Latoïs, or Latoë.

Leuca (τὰ Λευκά), a town at the extremity of the Iapygian promontory in Calabria, with a stinking fountain, under which the giants who were vanquished by Heracles are said to have been buried. The promontory is still called Capo di Leuca. (Strab. p. 281.)

Leucæ, Leuca (Λεύκαι, Λεύκη: Lefke), a small town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, near Phocæa, built by the Persian general Tachas in B. C. 352, and remarkable as the scene of the battle between the consul Licinius Crassus and Aristonicus, in 131 (Diod. xv. 18; Strab. p. 646).

Leucas or Leucadia (Λευκάς, Λευκαδία: Leucadios: Santa Maura), an island in the Ionian sea, off the W. coast of Acarnania, about twenty miles in length, and from five to eight miles in breadth. It has derived its name from the numerous calcareous hills which cover its surface. It was originally united to the mainland at its NE. extremity by a narrow isthmus. Homer speaks of it as a peninsula, with a town Nericus (Od. xxiv. 377). According to Strabo (p. 322) its first inhabitants were Teleboans and Leleges. Subsequently the Corinthians under Cypselus, between B. C. 665 and 625, founded a new town, called Leucas in the NE. of the country near the isthmus, in which they settled 1000 of their citizens, and to which they removed the inhabitants of Nericus, which lay a little to the W. of the new town. (Strab. l. c.; Thuc. i. 30.) The Corinthians also cut a canal through the isthmus and thus converted the peninsula into an island. This canal was afterwards filled up by deposits of sand; and in the Peloponnesian war it was no longer available for ships, which during that period were conveyed across the isthmus on more than one occasion (Thuc. iii. 81, iv. 8). The canal was opened again by the Romans (Liv. xxxiii. 17). At present the channel is dry in some parts, and has from three to four feet of water in others. The town of Leucas was a place of importance, and during the war between Philip and the Romans was at the head of the Acarnanian league, and the place where the meetings of the league were held. It was in consequence taken and plundered by the Romans, B. C. 197. The remains of this town are still to be seen. The other towns in the island were Hellomcnium (Ἑλλόμενον) on the SE. coast, and Phara (Φαρά), on the SW. coast.—At the S. extremity of the island, opposite Cephalonia, was the celebrated promontory, variously called Leucas, Leucatas, Leucates, or Leucate (C. Ducato), on which was a temple of Apollo, who hence had the surname of Leucadius (Verg. Aen. iii. 274; Propert. iii. 11, 69). At the annual festival of the god it was the custom to cast down a criminal from this promontory into the sea: to break his fall birds of all kinds were attached to him, and if he reached the sea uninjured, boats were ready to pick him up (Strab. p. 452; Ov. Her. xv. 167, Trist. v. 2, 77; Cic. Tusc. iv. 18, 41). This appears to have been an expiatory rite; and it gave rise to the well-known story that lovers leaped from this rock, in order to seek relief from the pangs of love. Thus Sappho is said to have leapt down from this rock, when in love with Phaon; but this well-known story does not stand the test of examination. [SAPPHO.]

Leucē (Λευκή), an island in the Euxine sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes, sacred to Achilles. [ACHILLEUS DIOMOS.]

Leuci, a people in the SE. of Gallia Belgica, S. of the Mediomatrici, between the Matrona and Mosella. Their chief town was Tullum (Toul). (Caes. B. G. i. 40; Strab. p. 193.)

Leuci Montes, called by the Romans Albi Montes, a range of mountains in the W. of Crete. [ALBI MONTES.]

Leucippē. [ALCATHOË.]

Leucippides (Λευκιππίδες), i. e. Phoebe and Hilaira, the daughters of Leucippus. They were priestesses of Athene and Artemis, and betrothed to Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus; but Castor and Pollux carried them off and married them. [DIOSCURI, p. 298, a.]

Leucippus (Λευκιππος). 1. Son of Oenomaus. For details, see DAPHNE.—2. Son of Perieres and Gorgophone, brother of Aphareus, and prince of the Messenians, was one of the Calydonian hunters. By his wife Philodice, he had two daughters, Phoebe and Hilaira, usually called LEUCIPPIDES. (Paus. iii. 26, 3; Ov. Met. viii. 306; Apollod. ii. 7, 8.)—3. A Grecian philosopher, the founder of the atomic theory of the ancient philosophy, which was more fully developed by Democritus. Where and when he was born we have no data for deciding. Miletus, Abdera, and Elis have been assigned as his birthplace; the first, apparently, for no other reason than that it was the birthplace of several natural philosophers; the second, because Democritus came from that town; the third, because he was looked upon as a disciple of the Eleatic school. The period when he lived is equally uncertain. He is called the teacher of Democritus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 30, 34.) For the doctrines ascribed to him, see DEMOCRITUS.

Leucon (Λεύκων). 1. Son of Poseidon or Athamas and Themisto, and father of Erythrus and Evippe (Apollod. i. 9, 2; Hyg. Fab. 157).—2. A powerful king of Bosphorus, who reigned B. C. 393–353. He was in close alliance with the Athenians, to whom he gave the right of shipping corn without export duty before any others were supplied, and as in years of scarcity this gave them the means of obtaining a plentiful supply unattainable by other nations, the Athenians in return admitted him and his sons to the citizenship of Athens, with immunity from all liabilities of a citizen (Dem. Lept. p. 466, §§ 30, 33; Strab. p. 310; Diod. xiv. 93, xvi. 91).—3. An Athenian poet, of the Old Comedy, a contemporary of Aristophanes (Suid. s. v.; Athen. p. 343).

Leucōnōē (Λευκονόη), daughter of Minyas, usually called Leucippe. [ALCATHOË.]

Leucopetra (Λευκόπετρα: C. dell' Armi), a promontory in the SW. of Bruttium, on the Sicilian straits, and a few miles S. of Rhegium, to whose territory it belonged (Strab. p. 259).

Leucophrys (Λευκόφρυς). 1. A city of Caria, in the plain of the Macander, close to a curious lake of warm water, and having a temple of Artemis Leucophryne (Xen. Hell. iv. 8; Strab. p. 647; Tac. Ann. iii. 62).—2. A name given to the island of TENEDOS, from its white cliffs.

Leucophryñē. [LEUCOPHRYS.]

Leucōsia or Leucasia (Piana), a small island in the S. of the gulf of Paestum, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the promontory Posidium, said to have been called after one of the Sirens (Strab. pp. 123, 252, 258).

Leucōsyri (Λευκόσυροι, i. e. White Syrians), was a name early applied by the Greeks to the inhabitants of Cappadocia, who were of the Syrian race, in contradistinction to the Syrian tribes of a darker colour beyond the Taurus (Hdt. i. 72, vii. 72; Strab. pp. 552, 737). Afterwards, when Cappadoce came to be the common name for the people of S. Cappadocia, the word Leucosyri was applied specifically to the people in the N. of the country (aft. Pontus) on the coast of the Euxine, between the rivers Halys and Iris: these are the White Syrians of Xenophon (Anab. v. 6).

Leucóthēa (Λευκοθέα), a sea goddess, was previously Ino, the wife of Athamas. She was also regarded as a goddess of the dawn, and was nurse of Dionysus. [ATHAMAS; MATURIA.]

Leucóthōē, daughter of the Babylonian king Orchamus and Eurynome, was beloved by Apollo. Her amour was betrayed by the jealous Clytia to her father, who buried her alive; whereupon Apollo metamorphosed her into an incense shrub. (Ov. Met. iv. 208.)

Leuctra (τὰ Λεύκτρα: Lefka or Lefkra), a small town in Boeotia, on the road from Plateaeae to Thespieae, memorable for the victory which Epaminondas and the Thebans here gained over Cleombrotus and the Spartans, B. C. 371 (Xen. Hell. vi. 4, 7; Diod. xv. 54; Paus. ix. 13, 3; Plut. Pelop. 20, 21).

Leuctrum (Λεύκτρον). 1. Or Leuctra (Leftra), a town in Messenia, on the E. side of the Messenian gulf, between Cardamyle and Thalama, on the small river Pamisus. The Spartans and Messenians disputed for the possession of it. (Strab. p. 360; Paus. iii. 21, 7.)—2. A town in Achaia, dependent on Rhyphae (Strab. p. 387).

Lexovii or Lexobii, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Ocean, W. of the mouth of the Sequana. Their capital was Noviomagus (Lisieux). (Caes. B. G. iii. 9, 11; Strab. p. 189.)

Liba (ἡ Λίβα), a city of Mesopotamia, between Nisibis and the Tigris (Pol. v. 51).

Libanius (Λιβάνιος), a distinguished Greek sophist and rhetorician, was born at Antioch, on the Orontes, about A. D. 314. He studied at Athens, and afterwards set up a school of rhetoric at Constantinople, which was attended by so large a number of pupils that it excited the jealousy of the other professors, who charged Libanius with being a magician, and obtained his expulsion from Constantinople about 346. He then went to Nicomedia, where he taught with equal success, but also drew upon himself an equal degree of malice from his opponents. After a stay of five years at Nicomedia, he was recalled to Constantinople. Eventually he took up his abode at Antioch, where he spent the remainder of his life. Here he received the greatest marks of favour from the emperor Julian, 362, and afterwards from Theodosius; but his enjoyment of life was disturbed by ill health, by misfortunes in his family, and more especially by the disputes in which he was incessantly involved, partly with rival sophists, and partly with the prefects. He was the teacher of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, with whom he always kept up a friendly connexion; for although a pagan and entirely devoted to the study of pagan literature, he made no difference between Christian and pagan pupils. The year of his death is uncertain, but from one of his epistles it is evident that he was alive in 391, and it is probable that he died a few years after, in the reign of Arcadius. The extant works of Libanius are: 1. Models for rhetorical exercises (Προγυμνασμάτων παραδείγματα). 2. Orations (Λόγοι), sixty-seven in number. 3. Declamations (Μελέται), i. e. orations on fictitious subjects, and descriptions of various kinds, fifty in number. 4. A Life of Demosthenes, and arguments to the speeches of the same orator. 5. Letters (Ἐπιστολαί), of which a very large number is still extant. Many of these letters are extremely interesting, being addressed to men such as the emperor Julian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and Chrysostom. The style of Libanius is superior to that of the other rhetoricians of the fourth century. He took the best orators of the classic age as his models, and we can often see in him the disciple and happy imitator of Demosthenes; but he is not free from affectation, and we rarely find in him that simplicity of style which constitutes the great charm of the best Attic orators. As far as the history of his age is concerned, some of his orations, and still more his epistles are of great value: such as the oration in which he relates the events of his own life; the eulogies on Constantius and Constans; the orations on Julian; several orations describing the condition of Antioch, and those which he wrote against his professional and political opponents. The best edition of the orations and declamations is by Reiske, Altenburg, 1791-97, 4 vols. 8vo, and the best edition of the epistles is by Wolf, Amsterdam, 1738, fol.

Libānus (ὁ Λίβανος, τὸ Λίβανον; Heb. Lebanon, i. e. the White Mountain: Jehel Libnan), a lofty and steep mountain range on the confines of Syria and Palestine, dividing Phoenice from Coele-Syria. It extends from above Sidon, about lat. 33½° N., in a direction NNE. as far as about lat. 34½°. Its highest summits are covered with perpetual snow (between Beirut and Tripoli it reaches a height of nearly 12,000 feet); its sides were in ancient times clothed with forests of cedars, of which only scattered trees now remain, and on its lower slopes grow vines, figs, mulberries, and other fruits: its wines were highly celebrated in ancient times. It is considerably lower than the opposite range of ANTILIBANUS. In the Scriptures the word Lebanon is used for both ranges, and for either of them; but in classical authors the names Libanus and Antilibanus are distinctive terms, being applied to the W. and E. ranges respectively. (Strab. pp. 742, 755; Ptol. v. 15.)

Libarna or Libarnum, a town of Liguria on the Via Aurelia, NW. of Genua (Plin. iii. 49).

Lībentina or Lūbentina, a surname of Venus by which she is described as the goddess of pleasure (Varro, L. L. v. 6; Cic. N. D. ii. 23).

Liber, or Liber Pater, a name frequently given by the Roman poets to the Greek Bacchus or Dionysus, who was accordingly regarded as identical with the Italian Liber. But the god Liber, and the goddess Libera were ancient Italian divinities, presiding over the cultivation of the vine and the fertility of the fields. It has been remarked before [p. 453, a] that there is a difference of opinion as to whether the cultivation of the vine existed in Italy before the beginning of Greek colonisation in the eighth century B. C., or was introduced by Greek settlers. There is not much evidence either way. The fact that libations of milk existed in an old ritual instead of wine may point to a time when the people of Italy were herdsmen and had no vines, but it does not tell us at what date this was so. Whatever the truth may be, it is probable that the ceremonies at Lavinium mentioned by Varro (ap. August. C. D. vii. 21) belonged to Liber as an ancient Latin deity of fruitfulness in trees and nature generally, and eventually of vines in particular. He was worshipped probably by libations (whether Curtius

On the death of Bibulus (48) he had the chief command of the Pompeian fleet. (Caes. B. C. iii. 15-24; Dio Cass. xli. 48.) In the civil wars which followed Caesar's death, he followed the fortunes of his son-in-law, Sex. Pompey. In 40, Octavia married his sister, Scribonia, and this marriage was followed by a peace between the triumvirs and Pompey (39). When the war was renewed in 36, Libo for a time continued with Pompey, but, seeing his cause hopeless, he deserted him in the following year. In 34, he was consul with M. Antony. (Appian, B. C. v. 52-73, 139; Dio Cass. xlix. 38.)

Libon (Λιβων), an Elean, the architect of the great temple of Zeus in the Altis at Olympia, about B.C. 450 (Paus. v. 10, 3).

Libui, Libici or Lebicii (Λεβέκιοι, Λιβικοί), a Gallic tribe in Gallia Transpadana who occupied the territory about the entrance to Val Sesia, and Val d' Aosta; their chief town was Vercellae (Pol. ii. 17; Ptol. iii. 1, 36; Liv. xxi. 33; Plin. iii. 123).

Liburnia, a district of Illyricum, along the coast of the Adriatic sea, was separated from Istria on the NW. by the river Arsia, and from Dalmatia on the S. by the river Titius, thus corresponding to the W. part of Croatia, and the N. part of the moderna Dalmatia. The country is mountainous and unproductive, and its inhabitants, the Liburni, supported themselves chiefly by commerce and navigation, and also by piracy. They were skilful sailors, and they appear to have been the first people who had the sway of the waters of the Adriatic. They took possession of most of the islands of this sea as far as Corezia, and had settlements even on the opposite coast of Italy. Their ships were remarkable for their swift sailing, and hence vessels built after the same model were called Liburnicae or Liburnae naves. (Liv. x. 2, xlii. 48; Caes. B. C. iii. 5; Hor. Epod. i. 1; Dict. of Ant. art. Navis) The Liburnians were the first Illyrian people who submitted to the Romans. Being hard pressed by the Iapydes on the N. and by the Dalmatians on the S., they sought the protection of Rome. Hence we find that many of their towns were immune, or exempt from taxes. The islands of the coast were reckoned a part of Liburnia and are known as Liburnides or Liburnicae Insulae. [ILLYRICUM.]

Libya (Λιβύη), daughter of Epaphus and Memphis, from whom Libya (Africa) is said to have derived its name. By Poseidon she became the mother of Agenor, Belus, and Lelex. (Paus. i. 44, 3; Apollod. ii. 1, 4.)

Libya (Λιβύη: Libyæ, Libyæ). 1. The Greek name for the continent of Africa in general. [AFRICA].—2. L. Interior (Λ. ἡ ἐντὸς), the whole interior of Africa, as distinguished from the well-known regions on the N. and NE. coasts.—3. Libya, specifically, or Libyæ Nomos (Λιβύης νομός), a district of N. Africa, between Egypt and Marmarica, so called because it once formed an Egyptian Nomos. It is sometimes called Libya Exterior. (Plin. v. 39, 50; AEGYPTUS; AFRICA.)

Libyci Montes (τὸ Λιβυκὸν ὄρος: Jebel Sel-selah), the range of mountains which form the W. margin of the valley of the Nile. [AEGYPTUS.]

Libycum Mare (τὸ Λιβυκὸν πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean between the island of Crete and the N. coast of Africa (Strab. pp. 122, 488).

Libyphoenices (Λιβυφοίνικες, Λιβοφοίνικες), a term applied to the people of those parts of N. Africa in which the Phoenicians had founded colonies, and especially to the inhabitants of the Phoenician cities on the coast of the Carthaginian territory: it is derived from the fact that these people were a mixed race of the Libyan natives and the Phoenician settlers (Liv. xx. 22; Diod. xx. 55).

Libyssa (Λιβύσσα: Herekeh?), a town of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, on the N. coast of the Sinus Astaccenus, W. of Nicomedia, celebrated as the place where the tomb of Hannibal was to be seen (Ptol. v. 1, 13; Plin. v. 148).

Licātes or Licātii, a people of Vindehicia on the E. bank of the river Licus or Licia (Leck), one of the fiercest of the Vindelician tribes (Strab. p. 206).

Lichādes (Λιχάδες: Ponticonesē), three small islands between Euboea and the coast of Locris, called Scarphia, Caresa, and Phocaria. [See LICHAS, No. 1.]

Lichas (Λίχας). 1. An attendant of Heracles, brought his master the poisoned garment which destroyed the hero. [See p. 400, a.] Heracles, in anguish and wrath, threw Lichas into the sea, and the Lichadian islands were believed to have derived their name from him. (Strab. pp. 426, 447; Ov. Met. ix. 155.)—2. A Spartan, son of Arcesilaus, was proxenus of Argos, and is frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war. He was famous throughout Greece for his hospitality, especially in his entertainment of strangers at the Gymnopaedia. (Thuc. v. 14, 22, 76, viii. 18; Xen. Mem. i. 2, 61.)

Licia or Licus. [LICATES.]

Licinia. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest, together with two other Vestals, Aemilia and Marcia, B.C. 114. L. Metellus, the pontifex maximus, condemned Aemilia, but acquitted Licinia and Marcia. The acquittal of the two last caused such dissatisfaction that the people appointed L. Cassius Longinus to investigate the matter; and he condemned both Licinia and Marcia (Macrob. i. 10).—2. Wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus, the celebrated tribune.—3. Daughter of Crassus the orator, and wife of the younger Marius.

Licinia Gens, a celebrated plebeian house, to which belonged C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, whose exertions threw open the consulship to the plebeians. Its most distinguished families at a later time were those of CRASSUS, LUCULLUS and MURENA. There were likewise numerous other surnames in the gens, which are also given in their proper places.

Licinius. 1. C. Licinius Calvus, surnamed Stolo, which he derived, it is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprang up from the roots of his vines (Varro, R. R. i. 2). He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a happy termination and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from B.C. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleague L. Sextius. The laws which he proposed were: (1) That in future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected, one of whom should always be a plebeian. (2) That no one should possess more than 500 jugera of the public land, or keep upon it more than 100 head of large and 500 of small cattle. (3) A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor. (4) That the Sibylline books should be entrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians. [Dict. of Ant. art. Leges Liciniae.] These rogations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sextus was the first plebeian who obtained the consulship, 366. Licinius himself was elected twice to the consulship, 364 and 361. Some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Laenas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. He was condemned and sentenced to pay a heavy fine. (Liv. vi. 35, 42, vii. 1, 9, 16; Val. Max. viii. 6, 3.)—2. C. Licinius Macer, an annalist and an orator, was a man of praetorian dignity, who, when impeached (86) of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial were completed. His Annales commenced with the very origin of the city, and extended to twenty-one books at least; but how far he brought down his history, is unknown. (Val. Max. ix. 12; Plut. Cic. 9; Cic. Brut. 82, 238, Legg. i. 7; Liv. iv. 7, vii. 9.)—3. C. Licinius Macer Calvus, son of the last, a distinguished orator and poet, was born in 82, and died about 47 or 46, in his 35th or 36th year. His most celebrated oration was delivered against Vatinius, who was defended by Cicero, when he was only 27 years of age. So powerful was the effect produced by this speech, that the accused started up in the midst of the pleading, and passionately exclaimed, 'Rogo vos, iudices, num, si iste disertus est, ideo me damnari oportet?' His poems were full of wit and grace, and possessed sufficient merit to be classed by the ancients with those of Catullus. His elegies, especially that on the untimely death of his mistress Quintilia, have been warmly extolled by Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid. Calvus was remarkable for the shortness of his stature, and hence the vehement action in which he indulged while pleading was in such ludicrous contrast with his insignificant person, that even his friend Catullus has not been able to resist a joke, and has presented him to us as the 'Salaputium disertum,' 'the eloquent Tom Thumb.' (Cic. Brut. 82, 279, 283; Quint. x. 1, 115; Catull. 96; Propert. ii. 19, 40; Ov. Am. iii. 9, 61.)

Licinius, Roman emperor A.D. 307–324, whose full name was PUBLIUS FLAVIUS GALERIUS VALERIUS LICINIANUS LICINIUS. He was a Dacian peasant by birth, and the early friend and companion in arms of the emperor Galerius, by whom he was raised to the rank of Augustus, and invested with the command of the Illyrian provinces at Carmentum, on the 11th of November, A.D. 307. Upon the death of Galerius in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with MAXIMINUS II., in virtue of which the Hellespont and the Bosphorus were to form the boundary of the two empires. In 313 he married at Milan, Constantia, the sister of Constantine, and in the same year set out to encounter Maximinus, who had invaded his dominions. Maximinus was defeated by Licinius near Heraclea, and died a few months afterwards at Tarsus. Licinius and Constantine were now the only emperors, and each was anxious to obtain the undivided sovereignty. Accordingly war broke out between them in 315. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia, and afterwards at Adrianople, and was compelled to purchase peace by ceding to Constantine Greece, Macedonia, and Illyricum. This peace lasted about nine years, at the end of which time hostilities were renewed. The great battle of Adrianople (July, 323), followed by the reduction of Byzantium, and a second great victory achieved near Chalcedon (September), placed Licinius at the mercy of Constantine, who, although he spared his life for the moment, soon found a convenient pretext for putting him to death, 324. (Vict. Caes. 40, 41; Zosim. ii. 7–28; Eutrop. x. 3.)

Licinus. 1. A Gaul by birth, was taken prisoner in war, and became a slave of Julius Caesar, whose confidence he gained so much as to be made his dispensator or steward. Caesar gave him his freedom. He also gained the favour of Augustus, who appointed him in B.C. 15 governor of his native country, Gaul. By the plunder of Gaul and by other means he acquired enormous wealth, and hence his name is frequently coupled with that of Crassus. He lived to see the reign of Tiberius. (Dio Cass. Liv. 21; Suet. Aug. 67; Juv. i. 109.) To this Licinus, and not, as the scholiast says, to the barber of Hor. A.P. 301, refers the couplet:

Marmoreo tumulo Licinus jacet, at Cato parvo, Pompeius nullo; quis putet esse deos?

and the answer, of later date:

Saxa premunt Licinum: levat altum fama Catonem, Pompeium tituli: credimus esse deos.

—2. Clōdīus Licīnus, a Roman annalist, who lived about the beginning of the first century B.C., wrote the history of Rome from its capture by the Gauls to his own time (Suet. Gr. 20; Liv. xxix. 22). This Clodius is frequently confounded with Q. Claudius Quadrigarius. [QUADRIGARIUS.]—3. L. Porcius Licinus, plebeian aedile, 210, and praetor 207, when he obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province (Liv. xxvi. 6, xxvii. 46).—4. L. Porcius Licinus, praetor 193, with Sardinia as his province, and consul 184, when he carried on war against the Ligurians (Liv. xl. 34).—5. Porcius Licinus, a Roman poet, who probably lived in the latter part of the second century B.C. (Gell. xix. 9).

Licymnia, spoken of by Horace (Od. ii. 12, 13 seq.), is said by old commentators to be meant for Terentia, the wife of Maecenas, but it is unlikely that he should have ventured so to write about her, and the name is probably imaginary.

Licymnius (Λικύμνιος). 1. Son of Electryon and the Phrygian slave Midea, and consequently half-brother of Alcmena. He was married to Perimede, by whom he became the father of Oeonus, Argeus, and Melas. He was a friend of Hercules, whose son Telepolemus slew him—according to some, unintentionally, and according to others, in a fit of anger. (Pind. Ol. vii. 23; Apollod. ii. 8, 2; Paus. ii. 22, 8, iii. 15, 4).—2. Of Chios, a dithyrambic poet, of uncertain date. Some writers place him before Simonides; but it is perhaps more likely that he belonged to the later Athenian dithyrambic school about the end of the fourth century B.C. (Ar. Rhet. iii. 12; Athen. pp. 564, 603).—3. Of Sicily, a rhetorician, pupil of Gorgias, and teacher of Polus (Plat. Phaedr. p. 267; Ar. Rhet. iii. 2, 13).

Ligarius, Q., was legate, in Africa, of C. Considius Longus, who left him in command of the province, B.C. 50. Next year (49) Ligarius resigned the government of the province into the hands of L. Attius Varus. Ligarius fought under Varus against Curio in 49, and against Caesar himself in 46. After the battle of Thapsus, Ligarius was taken prisoner at Adrumctum; his life was spared, but he was banished by Caesar. Meantime, a public accusation was brought against Ligarius by Q. Aelius Tubero. The case was pleaded before Caesar himself in the forum. Cicero defended Ligarius in a speech still extant, in which he maintains that Ligarius had as much claim to the mercy of Caesar as Tubero and Cicero himself. Ligarius was pardoned by Caesar, who was on the point of setting out for the Spanish war. Ligarius joined the conspirators who assassinated Caesar in 44. Ligarius and his two brothers perished in the proscription of the triumvirs in 43. (Cic. pro Lig., ad Fam. vi. 13, ad Att. xiii. 12, 19; App. B.C. ii. 113; Plut. Cic. 39, Brut. 11.)

Liger or Ligēris (Loire), one of the largest rivers in Gaul, rises in M. Cevenna, flows through the territories of the Arverni, Aedui, and Carnutes, and falls into the Atlantic between the territories of the Namnetes and Pictones (Caes. B.G. vii. 5; Strab. p. 189; Tibull. i. 7, 11; Lucan, i. 438).

Ligūria (ἡ Λιγυστική, ἡ Λιγυστινή), a district of Italy, was, in the time of Augustus, bounded on the W. by the river Varus, and the Maritime Alps, which separated it from Transalpine Gaul; on the S.E. by the river Macra, which separated it from Etruria; on the N. by the river Po, and on the S. by the Mare Ligusticum. The country is very mountainous and unproductive, as the Maritime Alps and the Apennines run through the greater part of it. The mountains run almost down to the coast, leaving only space sufficient for a road, which formed the highway from Italy to the S. of Gaul. The chief occupation of the inhabitants was the rearing and feeding of cattle. The numerous forests on the mountains produced excellent timber, which, with the other products of the country, was exported from Genoa, the principal town of the country. The inhabitants were called by the Greeks Ligyes (Λίγυες) and Ligystini (Λιγυστινοί) and by the Romans Ligures (sing. Ligus, more rarely Ligur). It is probable that the Ligurians, like the Iberians, were remains of a people who occupied great part of SW. Europe before the arrival of Aryan nations, and afterwards were gradually compressed into the strips of coastland in the S. of Gaul and N. of Italy. A part of the same race formed the native population of Corsica. The Greeks probably became acquainted with them first from the Samians and Phocaeans, who visited their coasts for the purposes of commerce; and so powerful were they considered at this time that Hecsiod names them, along with the Scythians and Ethiopians, as a great people (Hes. ap. Strab. p. 300). Tradition also related that Heracles fought with the Ligurians on the plain of stones near Massilia (Aesch. ap. Strab. p. 183); and even a writer so late as Eratosthenes gave the name of Ligystice to the whole of the W. peninsula of Europe (cf. Hdt. v. 9; Thuc. vi. 2; Strab. p. 203). So widely were they believed to be spread that the Ligyes in Germany and Asia were supposed to be a branch of the same people. The Ligurian tribes were divided by the Romans into Ligures Transalpini and Cisalpini. The tribes which inhabited the Maritime Alps were called in general Alpini, and also Capillati or Comati, from their custom of allowing their hair to grow long (Dio Cass. liv. 24; Lucan, i. 442). The tribes which inhabited the Apennines were called Montani. The names of the principal tribes were:—On the W. side of the Alps, the SALYES of SALLUVII, OXYBII, and DECIATES; on the E. side of the Alps, the INTEMELII, INGAUNI, and APUANI near the coast, the VAGIENNI, SALASSI, and TAURINI on the upper course of the Po, and the LAEVI and MARSCI N. of the Po.—The Ligurians were small of stature, but strong, active and brave. In early times they served as mercenaries in the armies of the Carthaginians, and subsequently they carried on a long and fierce struggle with the Romans. Their country was invaded for the first time by the Romans in B.C. 238; but it was not till after the termination of the second Punic war and the defeat of Philip and Antiochus that the Romans were able to devote their energies to the subjugation of Liguria. It was many years, however, before the whole country was finally subdued. Whole tribes, such as the Apuani, were transplanted to Samnium, and their place supplied by Roman colonists. The country was divided between the provinces of Gallia Narbonensis and Gallia Cisalpina; and in the time of Augustus and of the succeeding emperors, the tribes in the mountains were placed under the government of an imperial procurator, called Procurator or Praefectus Alpium Maritimarum. It formed the 9th region. Under Diocletian the 11th region (Transpadana) was included with the 9th under the single name Liguria, with Mediolanum (Milan) as its chief town.

Ligusticum Mare, the name originally of the whole sea S. of Gaul and of the NW. of Italy, but subsequently only the E. part of this sea, or the Gulf of Genoa, whence later writers speak only of a Sinus Ligusticus (Strab. p. 122).

Lilaea (Λίλαια: Λιλαεΐς), an ancient town in Phocis, near the sources of the Cephissus (Strab. p. 407; Paus. ix. 24, x. 33).

Lilybaeum (Λιλύβαιον: Marsala), a town in the W. of Sicily, with an excellent harbour, situated on a promontory of the same name (C. Boeo or di Marsala), opposite to the Prom.

Hermaeum or Mercurii (C. Bon) in Africa, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa. The town of Lilybaeum was founded by the Carthaginians about B.C. 397, and was made the principal Carthaginian fortress in Sicily. It was surrounded by massive walls and by a trench 60 feet wide and 40 feet deep. On the destruction of Selinus in 249, the inhabitants of the latter city were transplanted to Lilybaeum, which thus became still more powerful. Lilybaeum was besieged by the Romans in the first Punic war, but they were unable to take it; and they only obtained possession of it by the treaty of peace. Under the Romans Lilybaeum continued to be a place of importance. At Marsala, which occupies only the S. half of the ancient town, there are the ruins of a Roman aqueduct, and a few other ancient remains. (Pol. i. 42; Strab. pp. 122, 265; Diod. v. 2, xiii. 54.)

Limaea, Limia, Limius, Belion (Lima), a river in Gallaecia in Spain, between the Durus and the Minus, which flowed into the Atlantic Ocean. It was also called the river of Forgetfulness (ὁ τῆς Λήθης, Flumen Oblivionis); and it is said to have been so called, because the Turduli and the Celts on one occasion lost here their commander, and forgot the object of their expedition. This legend was so generally believed that it was with difficulty that Brutus Callaicus could induce his soldiers to cross the river when he invaded Gallacia, B.C. 136. On the banks of this river dwelt a small tribe called Limici. (Strab. p. 153; Plin. iv. 115; Sil. Ital. i. 235, xvi. 476; Plut. Q. R. 34.)

Limites Romāni, the name of a continuous series of fortifications, consisting of castles, walls, earthen ramparts, and the like, which the Romans erected along the Rhine and the Danube, to protect their possessions from the attacks of the Germans. [GERMANIA; RHAETIA.]

Limnae (Λίμναι, Λιμναῖος). 1. A town in Messenia, on the frontiers of Lacouia, with a temple of Artemis, who was hence surnamed Limnatis. This temple was common to the people of both countries; and the outrage which the Messenian youth committed against some Lacedaemonian maidens, who were sacrificing at this temple, was the occasion of the first Messenian war. Limnae was situated in the Ager Dentheliatis, which district was a subject of constant dispute between the Lacedaemonians and Messenians after the re-establishment of the Messenian independence by Epaninondas. (Strab. p. 257; Paus. iii. 2, 6, iv. 31, 3; Tac. Ann. iv. 43.)—2. A town in the Thracian Chersonesus on the Hellespont, founded by the Milesians.—3. See SPARTA.

Limnaea (Λιμναία: Λιμναῖος), a town in Acarnania, on the road from Argos Amphiloichicum to Stratos, and near the Ambracian gulf, on which it had a harbour (Thuc. ii. 80; Pol. v. 5).

Limonium. [PICTONES.]

Limyra (τὰ Λίμυρα: Ru. N. of Phineka?), a city in the SE. of Lycia, on the river LIMYRUS, twenty stadia from its mouth (Strab. p. 666; Ov. Met. ix. 646).

Limyrus (Λίμυρος: Phineka?), a river of Lycia, flowing into the bay W. of the Sacrum Promontorium (Phineka Bay): navigable as far up as LIMYRA. Recent travellers differ as to whether the present river Phineka is the Limyra or its tributary the Arycaudus. (Strab. p. 666; Plin. v. 100.)

Lindum (Lincoln), a town of the Coritani, in Britain, on the road from Londinium to Eboracum, and a Roman colony. The modern name Lincoln has been formed out of Lindum Colonia. (Ptol. ii. 3, 30.)

Lindus (Λίνδος: Λίνδιος: Lindo, Ru.), on the E. side of the island of Rhodes, was one of the most ancient Dorian colonies on the Asiatic coast. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 656), with its kindred cities, Ialysus and Camirus. These three cities, with Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the original Hexapolis, in the SW. corner of Asia Minor. Lindus stood upon a mountain in a district abounding in vines and figs, and had two celebrated temples, one of Athene surnamed Λυδία, and one of Heracles. It was the birthplace of Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, to whom is ascribed the 'swallow-song' which the boys of Lindus used to sing when they went round collecting gifts at the return of summer (Athen. p. 360). It retained much of its consequence even after the foundation of Rhodes. [RHODUS.] Inscriptions of importance have been found in its Acropolis. (Hdt. ii. 182; Diod. v. 58, xii. 75; Strab. p. 655.)

Lingōnes. 1. A powerful people in Transalpine Gaul, whose territory extended from the foot of Mt. Vogesus and the sources of the Matrona and Mosa, N. as far as the Treviri, and S. as far as the Sequani, from whom they were separated by the rivor Arar. The emperor Otho gave them the Roman franchise. Their chief town was Andematurinum, afterwards Lingones (Langres). (Caes. B. G. iv. 10; Pol. ii. 19, 9; Lucan, i. 395; Strab. p. 193, who, however, seems to be mistaken in placing the Mediomatrici, instead of the Leuci, next to the Lingones.)

—2. A branch of the above-mentioned people, who migrated into Cisalpine Gaul along with the Boii, and shared the fortunes of the latter. [BOII.] They dwelt E. of the Boii as far as the Adriatic sea in the neighbourhood of Ravenna. (Pol. ii. 17; Liv. v. 35.)

Linternum. [LITERNUM.]

Linus (Λίνος), is represented in mythology as a hero whose early death is lamented in a dirge, 'the song of Linus,' which was sung as a harvest song as early as the time of Homer (Il. xvii. 570). Although he was clearly originally a harvest deity, yet his connexion with the song gives him in mythology a musical parentage, and he is described in the Argive tradition as the son of Apollo by Calliope, or by Psamathe the daughter of the king of Argos. The Theban tradition makes him the son of Urania, and his father is Amphimarus, son of Poseidon, which points to an earlier or 'Pelagian' origin. (Paus. i. 43, 7, ii. 19, 7, ix. 29, 3.) Argive tradition related, that Linus was exposed by his mother after his birth, and was brought up by shepherds, but was afterwards torn to pieces by dogs. Psamathe's grief at the occurrence betrayed her misfortune to her father, who condemned her to death. Apollo, indignant at the father's cruelty, visited Argos with a plague; and, in obedience to an oracle, the Argives endeavoured to propitiate Psamathe and Linus by means of sacrifices. Matrons and virgins sang dirges which were called λίννοι, and the festival was called Arueis because Linus had grown up among lambs. According to the Boeotian tradition Linus was killed by Apollo, because he had ventured upon a musical contest with the god; and every year, before sacrifices were offered to the Muses, a funeral sacrifice was offered to him, and dirges (λίννοι) were sung in his honour. A somewhat similar, but later, tradition makes him teach Heracles, who struck him with a lyre when he was reproved, and killed him. (Theocr. xxiv. 103; Diod. iii. 67; Apollod. ii. 4, 9; Athen. p. 164.) His tomb was claimed by Argos and by Thebes, and likewise by Chalcis in Euboea. (Hes. ap. Clem. Alex. p. 330; Apollod. i. 3, 2; Paus. ii. 19, 7; Verg. Ecl. iv. 57.) In the myth of Linus, which in some respects resembles those of Hyacinthus, Adonis, and Glancus, the death of the vegetation under the hot summer sun seems to be symbolised. Linus as a god of vegetation became identified with the vegetation itself, and especially the corn, and it is likely enough that in the earliest rites there were sacrifices such as belonged to many primitive harvest superstitious; but the song only remained. Among shepherds he was in the same manner invoked to give increase of lambs.

Lipāra and Liparenses Insulae. [AEOLIAE.] Lipāris (Λίπαρις), a small river of Cilicia, flowing past Soloë (Plin. v. 93).

Liquentia (Livenza), a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy between Altinum and Concordia, which flowed into the Sinus Tergestinus (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 679).

Liris (Garigliano), more anciently called Clanis, or Glanis, one of the principal rivers in central Italy, rises in the Apennines W. of lake Fucinus, flows first through the territory of the Marsi in a SE.ly direction, then turns SW. near Sora, and at last flows SE. into the Sinus Caietanus near Minturnae, forming the boundary between Latium and Campania. Its stream, except where its course was winding and tranquil, was sluggish; whence the 'Liris quieta aqua' and the 'taciturnus amnis' (Hor. Od. i. 31, 8; cf. Sil. It. iv. 348).

Lissus (Λίσσος; Λίσσιος, Λίσσεύς). 1. (Alessio), a town in the S. of Dalmatia, at the mouth of the river Drilon, founded by Dionysius of Syracuse, B.C. 385. It was situated on a hill near the coast, and possessed a strongly fortified acropolis, called Acrolissus, which was considered impregnable. The town afterwards fell into the hands of the Illyrians, and was eventually colonised by the Romans. (Diod. xv. 13; Pol. ii. 12; Strab. p. 316; Caes. B.C. iii. 26.)—2. A small river in Thrace, W. of the Hebrus.

Lista (S. Anatolia), a town of the Sabines, S. of Rente, is said to have been the capital of the Aborigines, from which they were driven out by the Sabines (Dionys. i. 14).

Lita (Litani), a river of Syria which rises in Antilibanus, near Heliopolis (Baalbec), and flows into the sea a little N. of Tyre. It is sometimes wrongly called Leontes. (Ptol. v. 15.)

Litana Silva (Silva di Luge), a large forest on the Apennines in Cisalpine Gaul, SE. of Mutina, in which the Romans were defeated by the Gauls, B.C. 216 (Liv. xxiii. 24, xxxiv. 22).

Liternum or Linternum (Patria), a town on the coast of Campania, at the mouth of the river Clanius or Glanis, which in the lower part of its course takes the name of Liternus (Patria or Clanio), and which flows through a marsh to the N. of the town called Literna Palus. The town was made a Roman colony B.C. 194, and was recolonised by Augustus. It was to this place that the elder Scipio Africanus retired when the tribunes attempted to bring him to trial, and here he is said to have died. His tomb was shown at Liternum; but some maintained that he was buried in the family sepulchre near the Porta Capena at Rome. (Strab. p. 243; Liv. xxxii. 29, xxxviii. 52; Sen. Ep. 86; Val. Max. v. 3, 1.)

Lityerses (Λιτυέρσης), was said to have been the son of Midas who dwelt at Celaene in Phrygia, and compelled all strangers who came past his fields to work at his harvest, but if they failed to surpass him in his work he cut off their heads and hid their bodies in the sheaves, over which a harvest-song was sung. Heracles vanquished him in reaping and slew him, and his memory was preserved in a harvest-song called Lityerses. (Schol. ad Theocr. x. 41; Athen. pp. 615, 619; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1164; Pollux, iv. 54; Suid. s. v.; cf. LINUS.) The myth points to superstitions apparent in the folk-lore of many countries, of which some remnants still exist. Lityerses was, no doubt, originally a god of the corn to whom human sacrifice was made, possibly in some places the sacrifice of anyone who chanced to pass when the last sheaf was cut. This sacrifice, in a less savage generation, was replaced by a figure placed in the last sheaf, or by the last sheaf itself made up more or less in the shape of a human figure, such as still is the bundle of corn from the last sheaf called 'the maiden' in parts of Scotland. The old 'Lityerses' song remained, and the myth of his contests and his death was invented to account for this custom; for it must be recollected that the victim sacrificed to the harvest god, whether a human being or an animal or a dummy figure, would represent for the time being the corn-deity himself.

Livia. 1. Sister of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune, B.C. 91, was married first to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis, and subsequently to Q. Servilius Caepio, by whom she had a daughter, Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus, who killed Caesar.—2. Livia Drusilla, the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus [Drusus, No. 3], was married first to Tib. Claudius Nero: and afterwards to Augustus, who compelled her husband to divorce her, B.C. 38. She had already borne her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus was six months pregnant with another, who subsequently received the name of Drusus. She never had any children by Augustus, but she retained his affection till his death. It was generally believed that she caused C. Caesar and L. Caesar, the two grandsons of Livia.

Augustus, to be poisoned, in order to secure the succession of her own children, though no evidence against her was alleged except that their death was convenient for her schemes (Tac. Ann. i. 3, 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 101, 102; Dio Cass. lv. 11). If she was unscrupulous in the pursuit of her objects, she deserves credit for councils of clemency both to Augustus and Tiberius (Dio Cass. lvi. 47, lviii. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 130). On the accession of her son Tiberius to the throne, she at first attempted to obtain an equal share in the government; but this the jealous temper of Tiberius would not brook. He commanded her to retire altogether from public affairs, and soon displayed even hatred towards her. When she was on her death-bed he refused to visit her. She died in A.D. 29, at the age of 82 or 86. Tiberius took no part in the funeral rites, and forbade her consecration, which had been proposed by the senate, but was not carried out till the reign of Claudius. (Tac. Ann. v. 1, 2; Dio Cass. lx. 5; Suet. Tib.

50, 51.)—3. Or Livilla, the daughter of Drusus senior and Antonia, and the wife of Drusus junior, the son of the emperor Tiberius. She was seduced by Sojanus, who persuaded her to poison her husband, A.D. 23. Her guilt was not discovered till the fall of Sejanus, eight years afterwards, 31. (Suet. Claud. 1; Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 84, iv. 1, vi. 2.)—4. Julia Livilla, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. [JULIA, No. 7.]

Livia Gens, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious houses among the Roman nobility. The Livii obtained eight consulships, two censorships, three triumphs, a dictatorship, and a mastership of the horse. The most distinguished families are those of Drusus and SALINATOR.

Livius, T., the Roman historian, was born at Patavium (Padua), in the N. of Italy, B.C. 59. The greater part of his life appears to have been spent in Rome, but he returned to his native town before his death, which happened at the age of 76, in the fourth year of Tiberius, A.D. 17. (Mart. i. 61, 3; Plut. Caes. 47; Euseb. Chron. 1953, 2033; Sen. Ep. 100, 9; Quint. x. 1, 39.) His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus; he became a person of consideration at court, and by his advice Claudius, afterwards emperor, was induced in early life to attempt historical composition (Liv. iv. 29; Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Suet. Claud. 417). Eventually, his reputation rose so high and became so widely diffused, that a Spaniard travelled from Cadiz to Rome solely for the purpose of beholding him, and having gratified his curiosity in this one particular, immediately returned home (Plin. Ep. ii. 3). The great and only extant work of Livy is a History of Rome, termed by himself Annales (xliii. 13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, B.C. 9, comprised in 142 books. Of these 35 have descended to us; but of the whole, with the exception of two, we possess Epitomes, which must have been drawn up by one who was well acquainted with his subject. By some they have been ascribed to Livy himself, by others to Florus; but there is nothing in the language or context to warrant either of these conclusions; and external evidence is altogether wanting. From the circumstance that a short introduction or preface is found at the beginning of books i., xxi. and xxxi., and that each of these marks the commencement of an important epoch, the whole work has been divided into decades, containing ten books each. This arrangement was of a later date, and cannot be traced earlier than Victorianus. Livy himself speaks merely of books (x. 31, xxi. 1). The first decade (books i.—x.) is entire. It embraces the period from the foundation of the city to the year B.C. 294, when the subjugation of the Samnites may be said to have been completed. The second decade (books xi.—xx.) is altogether lost. It embraced the period from 294 to 219, comprising an account, among other matters, of the invasion of Pyrrhus and of the first Punic war. The third decade (books xxi.—xxx.) is entire. It embraces the period from 219 to 201, comprehending the whole of the second Punic war. The fourth decade (books xxxi.—xl.) is entire, and also one-half of the fifth (books xli.—xlv.). These 15 books embrace the period from 201 to 167, and develop the progress of the Roman arms in Cisalpine Gaul, in Macedonia, Greece, and Asia, ending with the triumph of Aemilius Paulus. Of the remaining books nothing remains except inconsiderable fragments, the most notable being a few chapters of the 91st book, concerning the fortunes of Sertorius. The composition of such a vast work necessarily occupied many years; and we find indications which throw some light upon the epochs when different sections were composed. Thus in book i. (c. 19) it is stated that the temple of Janus had been closed twice only since the reign of Numa, for the first time in the consulship of T. Manlius (B.C. 235), a few years after the termination of the first Punic war; for the second time by Augustus Caesar, after the battle of Actium, in 29. But we know that it was shut again by Augustus after the conquest of the Cantabrians, in 25; and hence it is evident that the first book must have been written between the years 29 and 25. Moreover, since the last book contained an account of the death of Drusus, it is evident that the task must have been spread over 17 years, and probably occupied a much longer time.—The style of Livy may be pronounced almost faultless. The narrative flows on in a calm but strong current; the diction displays richness without heaviness, and simplicity without tameness. There is, moreover, a distinctness of outline and a warmth of colouring in all his delineations, whether of living men in action, or of things inanimate, which never fail to call up the whole scene before our eyes. (For the verdict of antiquity see Sen. Suas. vi. 21; Tac. Agr. 10; Quint. x. 1, 101.)—In judging of the merits of Livy as a historian, we are bound to ascertain, if possible, the end which he proposed to himself. No one who reads Livy with attention can suppose that he ever conceived the project of drawing up a critical history of Rome. His aim was to offer to his countrymen a clear and pleasing narrative, which, while it gratified their vanity, should present what he honestly believed himself to be a true account, or, at least, not improbable. To effect this purpose he studied with care the writings of some of his more celebrated predecessors on Roman history. Where his authorities were in accordance with each other, he generally rested satisfied with this agreement; where their testimony was irreconcilable, he was content to point out their want of harmony, and occasionally to offer an opinion on their comparative credibility. But in no case did he ever dream of ascending to the fountain head. He never attempted to test the accuracy of his authorities by examining monuments of remote antiquity, of which not a few were accessible to every inhabitant of the metropolis. Thus, it is perfectly clear that he had never read the Leges Regiae, nor the Commentaries of Servius Tullius, nor even the Licinian Rogations; and that he had never consulted the vast collection of decrees of the senate, ordinances of the plebs, treaties, and other state papers, which were preserved in the city. Nay, more, he did not always consult even all the authors to whom he might have resorted with advantage, such as Fabius Pictor and Piso. And even those writers whose authority he followed he did not use in the most judicious manner. His chief authorities, where he had not Polybius as his guide, were Valerius Antias (whom he does not at first mistrust; see p. 73), Licinius Macer, Claudius Quadrigarius, Coelius Antipater (especially for the Hannibalian war), and Aelius Tubero; and in some cases his acceptance of conflicting accounts has led to inconsistencies. Other mistakes also have been noticed, arising from his never having acquired even the elements of the military art, of jurisprudence, or of political economy, and from imperfect knowledge of geography. But while we fully acknowledge these defects in Livy, we cannot admit that his general good faith has ever been impugned with any show of justice. We are assured (Tac. Ann. iv. 34) that he was fair and liberal upon matters of contemporary history; we know that he praised Cassius and Brutus, that his character of Cicero was a high eulogium, and that he spoke so warmly of the unsuccessful leader in the great Civil war, that he was sportively styled a Pompeian by Augustus. It is true that in recounting the domestic strife which agitated the republic for nearly two centuries, he represents the plebeians and their leaders in the most unfavourable light. But this arose, not from any wish to pervert the truth, but from ignorance of the exact relation of the contending parties. It is manifest that he never can separate in his own mind the spirited plebeians of the infant commonwealth from the base and veul rabble which thronged the forum in the days of Marius and Cicero; while in like manner he confounds those bold and honest tribunes who were the champions of liberty with such men as Saturninus or Sulpicius, Clodius or Vatinius. The modern tendency to treat Livy in Roman history which has passed beyond the legendary period as an authority who may be lightly set aside when he does not agree with an adopted theory cannot be too strongly condemned. A conspicuous instance of this—and there are others—is the hasty rejection of his account of Hannibal's descent into Italy, which more scientific investigation has shown to be in all probability correct [see p. 380, b].—There remains one topic to which we must advert. We are told by Quintilian (i. 5, § 56, viii. 1, § 3) that Asinius Pollio had remarked a certain Patavinity in Livy. Scholars have given themselves a vast deal of trouble to discover what this term may indicate, and various hypotheses have been propounded; but if there is any truth in the story, it is evident that Pollio must have intended to censure some provincial peculiarities of expression, which we, at all events, are in no position to detect. Editions of the text of Livy are by Madvig, 1866, 1876; H. J. Müller, 1881; with commentaries, by Drakenborch, 1746; Weissenborn, 1878.

Livius Andronicus. [ANDRONICUS.]

Lix, Lixa, Lixus (Λίξ, Λίξα, Λίξος: Al-Araish), a city on the W. coast of Mauretania Tingitana, in Africa, at the mouth of a river of the same name; it was a place of some commercial importance.

Locri, sometimes called Locrenses by the Romans, the inhabitants of Locris (ἡ Λοκρίς), were an ancient people in Greece, said to be descended from the Leleges, with which some Hellenic tribes were intermingled at a very early period. They were, however, in Homer's time regarded as Hellenes; and according to tradition even Deucalion, the founder of the Hellenic race, was said to have lived in Locris, in the town of Opus or Cynos. In historical times the Locrians were divided into two distinct tribes, differing from one another in customs, habits, and civilisation. Of these the Eastern Locrians, called Epicnemidii and Opuntii, who dwelt on the E. coast of Greece, opposite the island of Euboea, were the more ancient and more civilised; while the Western Locrians, called Ozolae, who dwelt on the Corinthian gulf, were a colony of the former, and were more barbarous. Homer mentions only the E. Locrians. (Il. ii. 527-535; Pind. Ol. ix.

63; Thuc. i. 5; Strab. pp. 322, 425.) At a later time there was no connexion between the Eastern and Western Locrians; and in the Peloponnesian war we find the former siding with the Spartans, and the latter with the Athenians.—1. Eastern Locris, extended from Thessaly and the pass of Thermopylae along the coast to the frontiers of Boeotia, and was bounded on the W. by the mountain range of Cnemis, Ptoum, and Messapium, which separated their country from Doris and Phocis. The inhabitants were called indifferently Locri Epicnemidii (Ἐπικνημιδιοί), from the fact of their dwelling by Mt. Cnemis, and Locri Opuntii from their chief town, OPUS. The latter name was most commonly used in historical times; the former is sometimes written Hypocnemidii (Ἵποκνημιδιοί). It has often, but erroneously, been supposed that the name Epicnemidii denoted those who dwelt in the N. of Locris, and the name Opuntii those who dwelt in the S. Locris was a fertile and cultivated strip of land. In 456 the Locrians became perforce allies of Athens, but followed the lead of Thebes in the Peloponnesian war, and again in the Theban wars with Sparta in 395 and 370. Ajax, son of Oileus, was the national hero of the Coin of Locri Opuntii.

Obv. head of Persephone; rev. OPONTIAN; Ajax, son of Oileus, as a warrior.

Opuntian Locrians [AJAX, 2].—2. Western Locris, or the country of the Locri Ozolae (Ὀζόλαι), was bounded on the N. by Doris, on the W. by Aetolia, on the E. by Phocis, and on the S. by the Corinthian gulf. The origin of the name of Ozolae is uncertain. The ancients derived it from ὄζειν 'to smell,' on account of the undressed skins worn by the inhabitants, or on account of the great quantity of asphalt that grew in their country, or from the stench arising from mineral springs, beneath which the centaur Nessus is said to have been buried (Paus. x. 38, 1; Strab. p. 427); or from ὄζοι, vine-branches. The country is mountainous, and for the most part unproductive. Mt. Corax from Aetolia, and Mt. Parnassus from Phocis, occupy the greater part of it. The Locri Ozolae resembled their neighbours, the Aetolians, both in their predatory habits and in their mode of warfare. They were divided into several tribes, and are described by Thucydides as a rude and barbarous people, even in the Peloponnesian war. From B.C. 315 they belonged to the Aetolian League. (Thuc. i. 5, iii. 94; Pol. xviii. 30.) Their chief town was AMPHISSA.

Locri Epizephyrii (Λοκροὶ Ἐπιζεφύριοι: Motta di Burzano), one of the most ancient Greek cities in Lower Italy, was situated in the SE. of Bruttium, N. of the promontory of Zephyrium, from which it was said to have derived its surname Epizephyrii, though others suppose this name given to the place simply because it lay to the W. of Grecco. It was founded by the Locrians from Greece, B.C. 633. Strabo expressly says that it was founded by the Ozolae, and not by the Opuntii, as most writers related: but his statement is not so probable as the common one. (Pind. Ol. x. 18, xi. 19; Strab. p. 259; Paus. iii. 19, 12; Pol. xii. 5-12; Verg. Aen. iii. 399). The inhabitants regarded themselves as descendants of Ajax Oilous; and as he resided at the town of Naryx among the Opuntii, the poets gave the name of Narycia to Locri (Ov. Met. xv. 705), and called the founders of the town the Narycii Locri (Verg. Aen. iii. 399). For the same reason the pitch of Bruttium is frequently called Narycia (Verg. Georg. ii. 438). Locri was celebrated for the excellence of its laws, which were drawn up by Zaleucus soon after the foundation of the city. [ZALEUCUS.] The town enjoyed great prosperity down to the time of the younger Dionysius, who resided here for some years after his expulsion from Syracuse, and committed the greatest atrocities against the inhabitants. It suffered much in the wars against Pyrrhus and in the second Punic war. The Romans allowed it to retain its freedom and its own constitution, which was democratical (see coin); but it gradually sank in importance, and is rarely mentioned in later times. Near the town was an ancient and wealthy temple of Proserpina.

Locusta, or, more correctly, Lucusta, a woman celebrated for her skill in concocting poisons. She was employed by Agrippina in poisoning Claudius, and by Nero for despatching Britannicus. She was rewarded by Nero with ample estates; but under the emperor Galba she was executed with other malefactors of Nero's reign. (Juv. i. 71; Tac. Ann. xii. 66, xiii. 15; Suet. Ner. 33; Dio Cass. ix. 34.)

Lollia Paulina, granddaughter of M. Lollius, mentioned below, and heiress of his immense wealth. She was married to C. Memmius Regulus; but the emperor Caligula sent for her, divorced her from her husband, and married her, but soon divorced her again. After Claudius had put to death his wife Messalina, Lollia was one of the candidates for the vacancy, but she was put to death by Agrippina. (Tac. Ann. xii. 1; Suet. Cal. 25, Claud. 26.)

Lollianus (Λολλιανός), Greek sophist in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, was a native of Ephesus, and taught at Athens.

Lollius. 1. M. Lollius Palicanus, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 71, and an active opponent of the aristocracy (Cic. Verr. i. 47, ii. 41).—2. M. Lollius, consul 21, and governor of Gaul in 16. He was defeated by some German tribes who had crossed the Rhine. Lollius was subsequently appointed by Augustus as tutor to his grandson, C. Caesar, whom he accompanied to the East, B.C. 2. Here he incurred the displeasure of C. Caesar, and is said in consequence to have put an end to his life by poison. (Tac. Ann. i. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 97, 102.) Horace addressed an Ode (iv. 9) to Lollius, and two Epistles (i. 2, i. 18) to the eldest son of Lollius.

Londinium, also called Oppidum Londinense, Lundinium, or Londinum (London), the capital of the Cantii in Britain, was situated on the S. bank of the Thames in the modern Southwark, though it afterwards spread over the other side of the river. It is not mentioned by Caesar, probably because his line of march led him in a different direction; and its name first occurs in the reign of Nero, when it is spoken of as a flourishing and populous town, frequented by Roman traders, and the chief emporium for commerce in Britain, although neither a Roman colony nor a municipium (Tac. Ann. xiv. 33). On the revolt of the Britons under Boudicca or Boadicca, A.D. 62, the Roman governor Suetonius Paulinus abandoned Londinium to the enemy, who massacred the inhabitants and plundered the town. From the effects of this devastation it gradually recovered, and the number of roads mentioned in the Itinerary as converging upon it mark it as an important place in the reign of Antoninus Pius, indeed as the second town of Britain in consideration. It was surrounded with a wall and ditch by Constantine the Great or Theodosius, the Roman governor of Britain; and about this time it was distinguished by the surname of Augusta (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 8, xxviii. 3). Londinium had now extended so much on the N. bank of the Thames, that it was called at this period a town of the Trinobantes, from which we may infer that the new quarter was both larger and more populous than the old part on the S. side of the river. The wall built by Constantine or Theodosius was on the N. side of the river, and is conjectured to have commenced at a fort near the present site of the Tower, and to have been continued along the Minories, to Cripplegate, Newgate, and Ludgate. London was the central point from which all the Roman roads in Britain diverged. It possessed a Milliarium Aureum [Dict. of Ant. s.v.], from which the miles on the roads were numbered. A fragment of this Milliarium is the celebrated 'London Stone.'

Longanus (St. Lucia), a river in the NE. of Sicily between Mylae and Tyndaris, on the banks of which Hiero gained a victory over the Mamertines (Pol. i. 9; Diod. xxii. 13).

Longinus, a distinguished Greek philosopher and grammarian of the third century of our era. He was called Cassius Longinus or Dionysius Cassius Longinus. The place of his birth is uncertain; he was brought up with care by his uncle Fronto, who taught rhetoric at Athens, whence it has been conjectured that he was a native of that city. He afterwards visited many countries, and became acquainted with all the illustrious philosophers of his age, such as Ammonius Saccas, Origen the disciple of Ammonius (not to be confounded with the Christian writer), Plotinus, and Amelius. He was a pupil of the two former, and was an adherent of the Platonic philosophy. On his return to Athens he opened a school, which was attended by numerous pupils, among whom the most celebrated was Porphyry. He seems to have taught philosophy and criticism, as well as rhetoric and grammar; and the extent of his information was so great that he was called 'a living library' and 'a walking museum.' After spending a considerable part of his life at Athens he went to the East, where he became acquainted with Zenobia, of Palmyra, who made him her teacher of Greek literature, and eventually her principal adviser. It was mainly through his advice that she threw off her allegiance to the Roman empire. On her capture by Aurelian in 273, Longinus was put to death by the emperor. Longinus was probably the greatest philosopher of his age, but it is doubtful whether any of his works, except a few fragments, survive. The treatise On the Sublime (Περὶ ὕψους), a great part of which is still extant, is ascribed to him; but most critics now believe it to be the work of an earlier writer (according to some, Dionysius of Halicarnassus). By whatever author, it is written in an excellent style, and is among the best pieces of literary criticism in Greek. Ed. by O. Jahn, 1867.

Longinus, Cassius. [CASSIUS.]

Longobardi. [LANGOBARDI.]

Longûla. 1. (Longulânus: Buon Riposo), a town of the Volsci in Latium, not far from Corioli, and belonging to the territory of Antium, but destroyed by the Romans at an early period (Liv. ii. 33).—2. A town in Samnium (Liv. ix. 39).

Longus (Δόγγος), a Greek sophist, earlier than the fourth or fifth century of our era, is the author of Ποιμενικά τὰ κατὰ Δάφνην καὶ Χλόην, or Pastoralia de Daphnide et Chloë. Ed. by Passow, Lips. 1811.

Lōpādūsa (Λοπαδοῦσα: Lampedusa), an island in the Mediterranean, between Melita (Malta) and Byzacium in Africa (Strab. p. 834).

Lorîum or Lorii, a small place in Etruria with an imperial villa, twelve miles NW. of Rome on the Via Aurelia, where Antouinus Pius was brought up, and where he died (Vit. Ant. P. 12).

Lōrŷma (τὰ Λόρῳμα: Aplotheki, Ru.), a city on the S. coast of Caria, close to the promontory of Cynossema (C. Aloupo), opposite to Ialysus in Rhodes, the space between the two being about the shortest distance between Rhodes and the coast of Caria (Thuc. viii. 43; Strab. p. 652; Liv. xlv. 10).

Lōtis, a nymph, who, to escape the embraces of Priapus, was metamorphosed into a tree called after her Lotus (Ov. Met. ix. 347).

Lōtōphāgi (Λωτοφάγοι, i.e. lotus-eaters). Homer, in the Odyssey, represents Odysseus as coming in his wanderings to a coast inhabited by a people who fed upon a fruit called lotus, the effect of which was that everyone who ate it lost all wish to return to his native country, but desired to remain there with the Lotophagi, and to eat the lotus (Od. ix. 94). Afterwards, in historical times, the Greeks found that the people on the N. coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, and especially about the Lesser Syrtis, used to a great extent, as an article of food, the fruit of a plant which they identified with the lotus of Homer, and they called these people Lotophagi (Hdt. iv. 177; Xen. Anab. iii. 2, 25; Plin. v. 4). To this day, the inhabitants of the same part of the coast of Tunis and Tripoli eat the fruit of the plant which is supposed to be the lotus of the ancients, and drink a wine made from its juice, as the ancient Lotophagi are also said to have done. This plant, the Zizyphus Lotus of the botanists (or jujube-tree), is a prickly branching shrub, with fruit of the size of a wild plum, of a saffron colour and a sweetish taste. The ancient geographers also place the Lotophagi in the large island of Meninx or Lotophagitis (Jerbah), adjacent to this coast. They carried on a commercial intercourse with Egypt and with the interior of Africa, by the very same caravan routes which are used to the present day. This lotus shrub must be carefully distinguished from the sacred Egyptian lotus flower, a water lily of the Nile, which appears both as a symbol of Egyptian deities and in works of art.

Loxias (Λοξίας), a surname of Apollo, probably derived from his ambiguous oracles (Λόξα), though some have referred it to λέγειν.

Loxo (Λοξώ), daughter of Boreas, one of the Hyperborean maidens who brought the worship of Artemis to Delos, whence the name is also used as a surname of Artemis herself.

Lua, also called Lua Mater or Lua Saturni, one of the early Italian divinities, and a goddess of the earth; she is, like Ops, connected with Saturn, as his wife or feminine counterpart. The arms taken from a defeated enemy were dedicated to her, and burnt as a sacrifice, with a view of averting calamity; with which rite may be compared the devotio of the hostile armies to Tellus (Liv. viii. 1, xlv. 33; Gell. xiii. 23).

Luca (Lucensis: Lucca), a Ligurian city in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Apennines and on the river Ausus, NE. of Pisae. It was included in Etruria by Augustus; but in the time of Julius Caesar it was the most southerly city in Liguria, and belonged to Cisalpine Gaul. It was made a Roman colony B.C. 177. It was the place where Caesar, Pompey and Crassus met B.C. 56. (Liv. xxi. 59; Vell. Pat. i. 15; Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 13; Suet. Jul. 24.) There are remains of a large amphitheatre; but its real importance dates from the middle ages.

Lūcānia (Lucānus), a district in Lower Italy was bounded on the N. by Campania and Samnium, on the E. by Apulia and the gulf of Tarentum, on the S. by Bruttium, and on the W. by the Tyrrhene sea. It was separated from Campania by the river Silarus, and from Bruttium by the river Laus, and it extended along the gulf of Tarentum from Thurii to Metapontum. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through the greater part of it; but towards the gulf of Tarentum there is an extensive and fertile plain. Lucania was celebrated for its excellent pastures (Hor. Ep. i. 28); and its oxen were the finest and largest in Italy. The swine also were good; and a peculiar kind of sausage was known at Rome under the name of Lucanica. The coast of Lucania was inhabited chiefly by Greeks whose cities were numerous and flourishing. The most important were METAPONTUM, HERACLEA, THURII, BUXENTUM, ELEA or VELIA, POSIDONIA or PAESTUM. The original inhabitants were called by the Greeks Oenotrians [see p. 453]. The Lucanians proper were Samnites, a brave and warlike race, who left their mother-country and settled both in Lucania and Bruttium in the fifth century B.C. They not only expelled or subdued the Oenotrians, but they gradually acquired possession of most of the Greek cities on the coast. (Strab. pp. 252-255; Diod. xiv. 91, 101, 102.) They are first mentioned in B.C. 396 as the allies of the elder Dionysius in his war against Thurii. They were on the side of Rome during most part of the Samnite wars, but, having been disappointed in not obtaining the possession of Greek cities in Lucania promised them by Rome, they joined Pyrrhus, and were subdued by the Romans after Pyrrhus had left Italy. Before the second Punic war their forces consisted of 30,000 foot and 3000 horse: but in the course of this war, in which they took the side of Hannibal, their country was repeatedly laid waste, and never recovered its former prosperity.

Lūcānus, M. Annaeus, usually called Lucan, a Roman poet, was born at Corduba in Spain, A.D. 39. His father was L. Annaeus Mella, a brother of M. Seneca, the philosopher. Lucan was carried to Rome at an early age, where his education was superintended by the most eminent preceptors of the day. His talents developed themselves at a very early age, and excited such general admiration as to awaken the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to brook competition, forbade him to recite in public. Stung to the quick by this prohibition, Lucan embarked in the famous conspiracy of Piso, was betrayed, and, by a promise of pardon, was induced to turn informer. He began by denouncing his own mother Acilia (or Atilia), and then revealed the rest of his accomplices without reserve. But he received a traitor's reward. After the more important victims had been despatched, the emperor issued the mandate for the death of Lucan, who, finding escape hopeless, caused his veins to be opened. When, from the rapid effusion of blood, he felt his extremities becoming chill, he began to repeat aloud some verses which he had once composed, descriptive of a wounded soldier perishing by a like death, and, with these lines upon his lips, expired, A.D. 65, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. (Life of Lucan by Suetonius, and [probably] by Vacca; cf. Quintil. x. 1, 90; Mart. xiv. 194; Serv. ad Aen. i. 382.)—Lucan wrote various poems, the titles of which are preserved, but the only extant production is a heroic poem, in ten books, entitled Pharsalia, in which the progress of the struggle between Caesar and Pompey is fully detailed, the events, commencing with the passage of the Rubicon, being arranged in regular chronological order. The tenth book is imperfect, and the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of the Alexandrian war, but we know not whether the conclusion has been lost, or whether the author ever completed his task. The whole of what we now possess was certainly not composed at the same time. In the earlier portions, written when he was still in favour with the emperor, we find liberal sentiments and the preference of Pompey to Caesar expressed in more moderate terms, accompanied by praise of Nero; but, as we proceed, the blessings of freedom are loudly proclaimed, and the invectives against tyranny and against Caesar are couched in bitter language, probably aimed at the emperor. The work contains great beauties and great defects. It is characterised by copious diction, lively imagination, and a bold and masculine tone of thought, with scattered lines or passages which rise to real magnificence; but it is at the same time disfigured by extravagance, far-fetched conceits, and unnatural similes. The best editions are by Weber, Lips. 1821–1831, and by Haskins, London, 1889.

Lūcānus, Ocellus. [OCELLUS.]

Luceius. 1. L., friend and neighbour of Cicero. His name frequently occurs at the commencement of Cicero's correspondence with Atticus, with whom Luceius had quarrelled (ad Att. i. 3, 5, 10, ii. 11, 14). Cicero attempted to reconcile his two friends. In B.C. 63 Luceius accused Catiline; and in 60 he became a candidate for the consulship, along with Julius Caesar, who agreed to support him; but he lost his election in consequence of the aristocracy bringing in Bibulus, as a counterpoise to Caesar's influence. Luceius seems now to have withdrawn from public life and to have devoted himself to literature. He was chiefly engaged in the composition of a history of Rome, from the Social war. In 55 he had nearly finished the history of the Social, and of the first Civil, war, when Cicero wrote to his friend, pressing him to devote a separate work to the period from Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero's recall from banishment (ad Fam. v. 12). Luceius promised compliance with his request, but he appears never to have written the work (ad Att. iv. 6). On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he espoused the side of Pompey. He was subsequently pardoned by Caesar and returned to Rome, where he continued to live on friendly terms with Cicero (ad Fam. v. 13).—2. C., surnamed Hirrus, of the Pupinian tribe, tribune of the plebs 53, proposed that Pompey should be created dictator. In 52 he was a candidate with Cicero for the augurship, and in the following year a candidate with M. Caelius for the aedileship, but he failed in both. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, he joined Pompey. He was sent by Pompey as ambassador to Orodes, king of Parthia, but he was thrown into prison by the Parthian king. He was pardoned by Caesar after the battle of Pharsalia, and returned to Rome. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 5, 11; Caes. B. C. i. 15, iii. 82; Dio Cass. xlii. 2.)

Lucentum (Alicante), a town of the Contestani, on the coast of Hispania Tarraconensis (Plin. iii. 19).

Luceria (Lucerinus: Lucera), sometimes called Nuceria, a town in Apulia on the borders of Samnium, SW. of Arpi, was situated on a steep hill, and possessed an ancient temple of Minerva (Strab. pp. 264, 284; Plin. iii. 16). In the war between Rome and Samnium, it was first taken by the Samnites (B.C. 321), and next by the Romans (319); but having revolted to the Samnites in 314, all the inhabitants were massacred by the Romans, and their place supplied by 2500 Roman colonists (Liv. ix. 26; Vell. Pat. i. 14; Diod. xix. 72). Having thus become a Roman colony, it continued faithful to Rome in the second Punic war (Pol. iii. 88, 100; Liv. xxii. 9, xxvii. 10). In the time of Augustus it had declined in prosperity; but was still of sufficient importance in the third century to be the residence of the praetor of Apulia.

Luciānus (Λουκιανός), usually called Lucian, a Greek writer, born at Samosata, the capital of Commagene, in Syria. The dates of his birth and death are uncertain; but it has been conjectured, with much probability, that he was born about A.D. 120, and he probably lived till towards the end of that century. We know that some of his more celebrated works were written in the reign of M. Aurelius. Lucian's parents were poor, and he was at first apprenticed to his maternal uncle, who was a statuarius. He afterwards became an advocate, and practised at Antioch. Being unsuccessful in this calling, he employed himself in writing speeches for others, instead of delivering them himself. But he did not remain long at Antioch; and at an early period of his life he set out upon his travels, and visited the greater part of Greece, Italy, and Gaul. In these journeys he acquired a good deal of money as well as fame by lectures on rhetoric delivered in various towns. On his return to his native country, probably about his fortieth year, he abandoned the rhetorical profession, the artifices of which, he tells us, were foreign to his temper. He still, however, occasionally travelled; for it appears that he was in Achaia and Ionia about the close of the Parthian war, 160-165; on which occasion, too, he seems to have visited Olympia and beheld the self-immolation of Peregrinus. About the year 170, or a little previously, he visited the false oracle of the impostor Alexander, in Paphlagonia. Late in life he obtained the office of procurator of part of Egypt, which office was probably bestowed on him by the emperor Commodus. The nature of Lucian's writings inevitably procured him many enemies, by whom he has been painted in very black colours. According to Suidas he was surnamed the Blasphemer, and was torn to pieces by dogs, as a punishment for his impiety; but on this account no reliance can be placed.—As many as eighty-two works have come down to us under the name of Lucian; but several of these are spurious. The most important of them are his Dialogues. They are of very various degrees of merit, and are treated in the greatest possible variety of style, from seriousness down to the broadest humour and buffoonery. Their subjects and tendency, too, vary considerably; for while some are employed in attacking the heathen philosophy and religion, others are mere pictures of manners without any polemic drift. Our limits only allow us to mention a few of the more important of these Dialogues:—The Dialogues of the Gods, twenty-six in number, consist of short dramatic narratives of some of the most popular incidents in the heathen mythology. The reader, however, is generally left to draw his own conclusions from the story, the author only taking care to put it in the most absurd point of view.—In the Jupiter Convicted a bolder style of attack is adopted; and the cynic proves to Jupiter's face that, everything being under the dominion of fate, he has no power whatever. As this dialogue shows Jupiter's want of power, so the Jupiter the Tragedian strikes at his very existence, and that of the other deities.—The Vitarum Auctio, or Sale of the Philosophers, is an attack upon the ancient philosophers. In this humorous piece the heads of the different sects are put up to sale, Hermes being the auctioneer.—The Fisherman is a sort of apology for the preceding piece, and may be reckoned among Lucian's best dialogues. The philosophers are represented as having obtained a day's life for the purpose of taking vengeance upon Lucian, who confesses that he has borrowed the chief beauties of his writings from them.—The Banquet, or the Lapithae, is one of Lucian's most humorous attacks on the philosophers. The scene is a wedding-feast, at which a representative of each of the principal philosophic sects is present. A discussion ensues, which sets all the philosophers by the ears, and ends in a pitched battle.—The Nigrinus is also an attack on philosophic pride; but its main scope is to satirise the Romans, whose pomp, vain-glory, and luxury are unfavourably contrasted with the simple habits of the Athenians.—The more miscellaneous class of Lucian's dialogues, in which the attacks upon mythology and philosophy are not direct but incidental, or which are mere pictures of manners, contains some of his best. At the head must be placed Timon, which may perhaps be regarded as Lucian's masterpicco.—The Dialogues of the Dead are perhaps the best known of all Lucian's works. The subject affords great scope for moral reflection, and for satire on the vanity of human pursuits. Wealth, power, beauty, strength, not forgetting the vain disputations of philosophy, afford the materials.—The Icaro-Menippus is in Lucian's best vein, and a masterpiece of Aristophanic humour. Menippus, disgusted with the disputes and pretensions of the philosophers, resolves on a visit to the stars, for the purpose of seeing how far their theories are correct. By the mechanical aid of a pair of wings he reaches the moon, and surveys thence the miserable passions and quarrels of men. Hence he proceeds to Olympus, and is introduced to the Thunderer himself. Here he is witness of the manner in which human prayers are received in heaven. They ascend by enormous vent-holes, and become audible when Jupiter removes the covers. Jupiter himself is represented as a partial judge, and as influenced by the largeness of the rewards promised to him. At the end he pronounces judgment against the philosophers, and threatens in four days to destroy them all.—Charon is a dialogue of a graver turn than the preceding. Charon visits the earth to see the course of life there, and what it is that always makes men weep when they enter his boat. Mercury acts as his cicerone.—Lucian's merits as a writer consist in his knowledge of human nature; his strong common sense; the fertility of his invention; the raciness of his humour, and the simplicity and Attic grace of his diction. There was abundance to justify his attacks in the systems against which they were directed. Yet he establishes nothing in their stead. His aim is only to pull down; to spread a universal scepticism. Editions of Lucian by Hemsterhuis and Reitz, Amst. 1743, 4 vols. 4to; by Lebman, Lips. 1821-1831, 9 vols. 8vo; text by Jacobitz, 1874; select dialogues by E. Abbott, 1877; Heitland, 1878; Jerram, 1879.

Lucifer. [HESPERUS.]

Lūcilius. L. C., was born at Suessa of the Aurunci, B.C. 148. He served in the cavalry under Scipio in the Numantine war; lived upon terms of the closest familiarity with Scipio and Laelius; and was either the maternal grand-uncle or, which is less probable, the maternal grandfather of Pompey the Great. He died at Naples, 103, in the 46th year of his age. Lucilius was the first to impress upon Roman satire its character of personal invective, following in this the Old Attic Comedy; but as this method of attack was not admitted upon the stage, the invective of Lucilius was literary, and not dramatic like that of Aristophanes. He gave to Roman satire that form which afterwards received full development in the hands of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. Horace, while he censures the harsh verbalisation and the slovenly haste with which Lucilius threw off his compositions, acknowledges with admiration the fierceness and boldness of his attacks upon the vices and follies of his contemporaries. (Hor. Sat. i. 4, 6, i. 10, i. ii. 1, 16, 62; Juv. i. 165; Pers. i. 114.) Cicero, Varro, and Quintilian differ from Horace in giving praise to the style as well as the matter of his writings (Cic. de Or. i. 16, 72; Quintil. x. 1, 93; Gell. vi. 14). The Satires of Lucilius were divided into thirty books. Upwards of 300 fragments from these have been preserved, but the greatest number consist of isolated couplets, or single lines. It is clear from these fragments that his reputation for caustic pleasantries was by no means unmerited, and that in coarseness and broad personalities he in no respect fell short of the licence of the Old Comedy, which would seem to have been, to a certain extent, his model. The fragments were published separately, by Franciscus Dousa, Lug. Bat. 4to, 1597; by L. Müller, Lips. 1872; by C. Lachmann, Berl. 1876.—2. Lucilius Junior, probably the author of an extant poem in 640 hexameters, entitled Aetna, which exhibits throughout great command of language, and contains not a few brilliant passages. Its object is to explain upon philosophical principles, after the fashion of Lucretius, the causes of the various volcanic phenomena. Lucilius Junior was the procurator of Sicily, and the friend to whom Seneca addresses his Epistles, his Natural Questions, and his tract On Providence, and whom he strongly urges to select this very subject of Aetna as a theme for his muse (Sen. N.Q. iii. 1, Ep. 26, 46, 59, 79). The Aetna was originally printed among Virgil's poems; it is included in Wernsdorf's Poet. Lat. Min. and is edited separately by Munro, 1867.

Lūcilla, Annia, daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born about A.D. 147. She was married to the emperor L. Verus, and after his death (169) to Claudius Pompeianus. In 183 she engaged in a plot against her brother Commodus, which having been detected, she was banished to Capreae, and there put to death. (Dio Cass. lxxi. 1, lxxii. 4.)

Lūcina, the goddess of light, or rather the goddess that brings to light, and hence the goddess that presides over the birth of children. Hence she was identified both with Juno and with Diana, and became a surname to both these goddesses. Lucina corresponded to the Greek goddess Ilithyia. [ARTEMIS, DIANA, JUNO, ILITHYIA.]

Lucrētia, the wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, whose rape by Sex. Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus and the establishment of the republic. [TARQUINIUS.]

Lucrētia Gens, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The surname of the patrician Lucretii was Tricipitinus, one of whom, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, the father of Lucretia, was elected consul, with L. Junius Brutus, on the establishment of the republic, B.C. 509. The plebeian families are known by the surnames of Gallus, Ofella, and Vespillo, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require notice.

Lucrētīlis, a pleasant mountain in the country of the Sabines (Hor. Od. i. 17, 1), overhanging Horace's villa, a part of the modern Monte Gennaro. [See p. 428, a.]

T. Lucrētius Cārus, the Roman poet, respecting whose personal history our information is both scanty and suspicious. Jerome, in his additions to the Eusebian Chronicle, fixes B.C. 95 or 99 as the date of his birth, adding that he was driven mad by a love potion, that during his lucid intervals he composed several works which were revised by Cicero, and that he perished by his own hand in his 44th year. Donatus, in his Life of Virgil, places the death of Lucretius in Virgil's 15th year, which would assign 99 for the year of his birth and 55 for that of his death. It is probable that both Donatus and Jerome copied their statements from the lost portion of Suetonius de Vir. Illustr.; if so, the authority is not so late as it would appear to be. The story of the madness, which is adopted by Tennyson, must thus have been current in the time of Suetonius, and may have some elements of truth in it, though the poem is not such as would be written after the mind began to fail. That Cicero edited the poem is nowhere else directly stated, but Munro has shown that there is some reason for believing it to be true. At any rate Cicero had already studied it within a few months of the death of Lucretius—that is, almost as soon as the book was published (ad Q. Fr. ii. 11). The writings of Lucretius are mentioned with praise also by Ovid (Am. i. 15, 23), by Statius (Silv. ii. 7, 76), and by Quintilian (x. 1, 87). Horace alludes to their influence (Sat. i. 5, 101), and that he was admired also by Virgil is clear from the numerous passages in which his diction is imitated.—The work which has immortalized the name of Lucretius is a philosophical didactic poem, composed in heroic hexameters, divided into six books, containing upwards of 7400 lines, addressed to C. Memmius Gemellus, who was praetor in 58, and is entitled De Rerum Natura. Lucretius showed his admiration for the teaching of Empedocles (i. 729), and, of his own countrymen, for Ennius (i. 117) and Cicero, whose Aratea he imitates in some passages; but his great master was Epicurus, for whom he expresses the most profound reverence (iii. 3–30). Epicurus maintained that the unhappiness and degradation of mankind arose in a great degree from the slavish dread which they entertained of the power of the gods, and from terror of their wrath; and the fundamental doctrine of his system was, that the gods, whose existence he did not deny, lived in the enjoyment of absolute peace, and totally indifferent to the world and its inhabitants. To prove this position he adopted the atomic theory of Leucippus, according to which the material universe was not created by the Supreme Being, but was formed by the union of elemental particles which had existed from all eternity, governed by certain simple laws. He further sought to show that all those striking phenomena which had been regarded by the vulgar as direct manifestations of divine power, were the natural results of ordinary processes. [EPICURUS.] To state clearly and develop fully the leading principle of this philosophy, in such a form as might render the study attractive to his countrymen, was the object of Lucretius, his work being simply an attempt to show that there is nothing in the history or actual condition of the world which does not admit of explanation without having recourse to the active interposition of divine beings. This creed is set forth by Lucretius to liberate men from fear of the gods and of death, and to give them peace of mind. Marvellous skill is displayed in the manner in which abstruse speculations and technicalities are luminously set forth in sonorous verse; and the severity of the subject is relieved from time to time by magnificent bursts of poetry, as fine as anything in the Latin language. Apart from the attractions of Lucretius as one of the greatest of Latin poets, it has interested modern science to trace out resemblances between the modern atomic theory and that which Lucretius expounds. Lucrinus Lacus, was properly the inner part of the Sinus Cumanus or Putcolanus, a bay on the coast of Campania, between the promontory Misenum and Puteoli, running a considerable way inland. But at a very early period the Lucrine lake was separated from the remainder of the bay by a dike eight stadia in length, which was probably formed originally by some volcanic change, and was subsequently rendered more complete by the work of man. (Diod. iv. 22; Strab. p. 245.) Being thus separated from the rest of the sea, it assumed the character of an inland lake, and is therefore called Lacus by the Romans. Its waters still remained salt, and were celebrated for their oyster beds (Hor. Epod. ii. 49, Sat. ii. 4, 32; Juv. iv. 141) Behind the Lucrine lake was another lake called Lacus AVERNUS. In the time of Augustus, Agrippa made a communication between the lake Avernus and the Lucrine lake, and also between the Lucrine lake and the Sinus Cumanus, thus forming out of the three the celebrated Julian Harbour (Dio Cass. xlviii. 50; Suet. Aug. 16; Vell. Pat. ii. 79; Verg. Georg. ii. 161). The Lucrine lake was filled up by a volcanic eruption in 1538, when a conical mountain rose in its place, called Monte Nuovo. The Avernus thus became again a separate lake, and there is no trace of the dike in the Gulf of Pozzuoli.

Lūcullus, Licinius, a celebrated plebeian family. 1. L., the grandfather of the conqueror of Mithridates, was consul B.C. 151, together with A. Postumius Albinus, and carried on war in Spain against the Vaccaei (Cic. Brut. 21, 81; Liv. Ep. 48).—2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor, 103, and carried on war unsuccessfully against the slaves in Sicily. On his return to Rome he was accused, condemned, and driven into exile. (Cic. Verr. iv. 66; Flor. iii. 19, 11).—3. L., son of the preceding, and celebrated as the conqueror of Mithridates. He was probably born about 110. He served with distinction in the Marsic or Social war, and accompanied Sulla as his quaestor into Greece and Asia, 88. When Sulla returned to Italy after the conclusion of peace with Mithridates in 84, Lucullus was left behind in Asia, where he remained till 80. In 79 he was curule aedile with his younger brother Marcus. So great was the favour at this time enjoyed by Lucullus with Sulla, that the dictator, on his death-bed, not only confided to him the charge of revising and correcting his Commentaries, but appointed him guardian of his son Faustus, to the exclusion of Pompey: a circumstance which is said to have first given rise to the enmity that ever after subsisted between the two. In 77 Lucullus was praetor, and at the expiration of this magistracy obtained the government of Africa, where he distinguished himself by the justice of his administration. In 74 he was consul with M. Aurelius Cotta. In this year the war with Mithridates was renewed, and Lucullus received the conduct of it. He carried on this war for eight years with great success. The details are given under MITHRIDATES, and it is only necessary to mention here the leading outlines. Lucullus defeated Mithridates with great slaughter, and drove him out of his hereditary dominions and compelled him to take refuge in Armenia with his son-in-law Tigranes (71). He afterwards invaded Armenia, defeated Tigranes, and took his capital Tigranocerta (69). In the next campaign (68) he again defeated the combined forces of Mithridates, and laid siege to Nisibis; but in the spring of the following year (67), a mutiny among his troops compelled him to raise the siege of Nisibis, and return to Pontus. Mithridates had already taken advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, and had defeated his lieutenants Fabius and Triarius in several successive actions. But Lucullus on his arrival was unable to effect anything against Mithridates, in consequence of the mutinous disposition of his troops. The adversaries of Lucullus availed themselves of so favourable an occasion, and a decree was passed to transfer to Aelius Glabrio, one of the consuls for the year, the province of Bithynia and the command against Mithridates. But Glabrio was wholly incompetent for the task assigned him: on arriving in Bithynia, he made no attempt to assume the command, but remained quiet within the confines of the Roman province. Mithridates meanwhile ably availed himself of this position of affairs, and Lucullus had the mortification of seeing Pontus and Cappadocia occupied by the enemy before his eyes, without being able to stir a step in their defence. But it was still more galling to his feelings when, in 66, he was called upon to resign the command to his old rival Pompey, who had been appointed by the Manilian law to supersede both him and Glabrio. Lucullus did not obtain his triumph till 63, in consequence of the opposition of his enemies. He was courted by the aristocratical party, who sought in Lucullus a rival and antagonist to Pompey; but he soon began to withdraw gradually from public affairs, and devote himself more and more to a life of indolence and luxury. He died in 57 or 56. Previous to his death he had fallen into a state of complete dotage, so that the management of his affairs was confided to his brother Marcus. The name of Lucullus is almost as celebrated for the luxury of his latter years as for his victories over Mithridates. He amassed vast treasures in Asia, and these supplied him the means, after his return to Rome, of gratifying his taste for luxury and magnificence. His gardens in the suburbs of the city were laid out in a style of extraordinary splendour; but still more remarkable were his villas at Tusculum and in the neighbourhood of Neapolis. In the construction of the latter, with its parks, fish-ponds, &c., he had laid out vast sums in cutting through hills and rocks, and throwing out advanced works into the sea. So gigantic, indeed, was the scale of these labours for objects apparently so insignificant, that Pompey called him, in derision, the Roman Xerxes. He is said to have spent nearly £2000 on a single dinner at Rome; and even during his campaigns the pleasures of the table had not been forgotten, for he was the first to introduce cherries into Italy, which he had brought with him from Cerasus in Pontus. Lucullus was a patron of literature, and inclined to literary pursuits. He collected a valuable library, which was opened to the use of the literary public; and here he himself used to associate with the Greek philosophers and literati, and would enter warmly into their discussions. Hence the picture drawn by Cicero at the beginning of the Academics was probably to a certain extent taken from the reality. His constant companion from the time of his quaestorship had been Antiochus of Ascalon, from whom he adopted the precepts of the Academic school of philosophy. His patronage of the poet Archias is well known. He composed a history of the Marsic war in Greek. (Life of Lucullus, by Plutarch; Dio Cass. xxxiv. xxxv.; Cic. Acad. i. 1, ii. 1).—4. L. or M., son of the preceding and of Servilia, half-sister of M. Cato, was a mere child at his father's death. His education was superintended by Cato and Cicero. After Caesar's death he joined the republican party, and fell at the battle of Philippi, 42. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 71).—5. M., brother of No. 3, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and consequently bore the names of M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLUS. He fought under Sulla in Italy, 82; was curule aedile with his brother, 79; praetor, 77; and consul, 73. After his consulship he obtained the province of Macedonia. He carried on war against the Dardanians and Bessi, and penetrated as far as the Danube. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph, 71. He was a strong supporter of the aristocratical party. He pronounced the funeral oration of his brother, but died before 49. (Plut. Sull. 27, Lucull. 43; Flor. iii. 4, 7; Cic. pro Dom. 52.)

Lugdunensis Gallia. [GALLIA.]

Lugdūnum (Lugdunensis). 1. (Lyon), the chief town of Gallia Lugdunensis, situated at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the Arar (Saône), and the Rhodanus (Rhone), is said to have been founded by some fugitives from the town of Vienna, further down the Rhone. In the year after Caesar's death (B.C. 43) Lugdunum was made a Roman colony by L. Munatius Plancus, and became under Augustus the capital of the province, and the residence of the Roman governor (Dio Cass. xlv. 50; Strab. p. 192). Being situated on two navigable rivers, and being connected with the other parts of Gaul by roads which met at this town as their central point, it soon became a wealthy and populous place, and is described by Strabo as the largest city in Gaul next to Narbo. It received many privileges from the emperor Claudius; but it was burnt down in the reign of Nero (Sen. Ep. 91; Tac. Ann. xvi. 13). It was, however, soon rebuilt, and continued to be a place of great importance till A.D. 197, when it was plundered and the greater part of it destroyed by the soldiers of Septimius Severus, after his victory over his rival Albinus in the neighbourhood of the town (Herodian, iii. 23). From this blow it never recovered during the Roman dominion, and was more and more thrown into the shade by Vienna. Lugdunum possessed a vast aqueduct, of which the remains may still be traced for miles, a mint, and an imperial palace, in which Claudius was born, and in which many of the other Roman emperors resided. At the tongue of land between the Rhone and the Arar stood an altar dedicated by Drusus to Rome and the genius of Augustus, A.D. 12. For this altar the cantons annually chose the 'priest of the three Gauls'; here the Celtic diet met [see p. 354, a]; and here Caligula instituted contests in rhetoric; prizes being given to the victors, and contumelious punishments inflicted on the vanquished (Juv. i. 44; Suet. Cal. 20; Dio Cass. lix. 22). Lugdunum is memorable in the history of the Christian Church as the seat of the bishopric of Irenaeus, and on account of the persecutions which the Christians endured here in the second and third centuries.—2. L. Batavōriam (Leyden), the chief town of the Batavi. [BATAVI].—3. L. Convenārūm (St. Bertrand de Comminges), the chief town of the Convenae in Aquitania. [CONVENAE.]

Lūna. [SELENE.]

Lūna (Lunensis: Luni), an Etruscan town, situated on the left bank of the Macra, about four miles from the coast, originally formed part of Liguria, but became the most northerly city of Etruria when Augustus extended the boundaries of the latter country as far as the Macra. The town itself was never a place of importance, but it possessed a large and commodious harbour at the mouth of the river, called Lunae Portus (Gulf of Spezzia). In

B.C. 177 Luna was made a Roman colony, and 2000 Roman citizens were settled there (Liv. xli. 13). In the Civil war between Caesar and Pompey it had sunk into utter decay, but was colonised a few years afterwards (Lucan, i. 586; Strab. p. 222). Luna was celebrated for its white marble, which now takes its name from the neighbouring town of Carrara. The quarries appear not to have been worked before the time of Julius Caesar; but this marble was much used for public buildings in the reign of Augustus. The wine and the cheeses of Luna also enjoyed a high reputation (Mart. xiii. 30).

Lūnae Montes (τὸ τῆς Σελήνης ὄρος), a range of mountains which some of the ancient geographers believed to exist in the interior of Africa, covered with perpetual snow, and containing the sources of the Nile (Ptol. iv. 8, 3, 6).

Luperca. [LUPERCUS.]

Lupercus was merely another name for the Italian rural deity FAUNUS, who was also called Inuus (i.e. the god who gives fruitfulness to the flocks). The title Lupercus has been explained by many writers as meaning 'the protector of the flocks from wolves' (lupus-arceo); but on the whole it is likely that a more recent interpretation is right which makes the word only an equivalent of lupus (cf. nov-erca); and that the name of 'wolves' was given to Faunus and to his priests owing to some primitive worship of the wolf as a wolf-god, whether that is to be regarded as a relic of totemism or not. These rites were celebrated in the cave of the Luperca under the Palatine, and with them were connected the stories of the nurse of Romulus and Remus, who is called sometimes ACCA LARENTIA, sometimes Lupa or Luperca (Arnob. iv. 3; Lactant. i. 20), and sometimes appears as an actual she-wolf. It is likely that these stories of the wolf-nurse are more recent than the rites and the priesthood, and grew out of them. [See Dict. of Ant. art. Lupercalia, Luperca.] For an account of the deity, see FAUNUS.

Lupia. [LUPPIA.]

Lupiae or Lupppiae, (Leuc), a town in Calabria, between Brundisium and Hydruntum (Strab. p. 282).

Lupodūnum (Ladenburg?), a town in Germany on the river Nicer (Neckar) (Auson. Mosel. 423).

Luppia or Lupia (Lippe), a navigable river in the NW. of Germany, which falls into the Rhine at Wesel in Westphalia, and on which the Romans built a fortress of the same name. The river Eliso (Alme) was a tributary of the Luppia, and at the confluence of these two rivers was the fortress of Aliso. (Vell. Pat. ii. 105; Tac. Ann. i. 60; Strab. p. 291.)

Lūpus, Rutiliūs. 1. P., consul, with L. Julius Caesar, in B.C. 90, was defeated by the Marsi, and slain in battle (App. B. C. i. 40, 48; Flor. iii. 18).—2. P., tribune of the plebs, 56, and a warm partisan of the aristocracy. He was praetor in 49, and was stationed at Terracina with three cohorts. He afterwards crossed over to Greece. (Caes. B. C. i. 24, iii. 55).—3. Probably in the reign of Tiberius, the author of a rhetorical treatise in two books, entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which appears to have been originally an abridgment of a work by Gorgias of Athens, one of the preceptors of young M. Cicero, but which has evidently undergone many changes (Quint. ix. 2, 102). Its chief value is derived from the numerous translations which it contains of striking passages from the works of Greek orators now lost.—Edited by Ruhken along with Aquila and Julius Ruffinianus, Lug. Bat. 1768, reprinted by Frotscher, Lips. 1831; by Draheim, Berl. 1874.

Lurco, M. Aufidius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 61, the author of a law on bribery (de Ambitu). He was the maternal grandfather of the empress Livia, wife of Augustus. He was the first person in Rome who fattened peacocks for sale (Plin. x. 45).

Luscinius, Fabricius. [FABRICIUS.]

Lusi (Λουσίολ) a town in the N. of Arcadia, had a temple of Artemis Lusia (Paus. viii. 18, 8; Pol. iv. 18).

Lusitania, Lusitani. [HISPANIA.]

Lusones, a tribe of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sources of the Tagus.

Lutatius Catulus. [CATULUS.]

Lutätius Cerco. [CERCO.]

Lutëtia, or, more commonly, Lutëtia Parisiorum (Paris), the capital of the Parisii in Gallia Lugdunensis, was situated on an island in the Sequana (Seine), and was connected with the banks of the river by two wooden bridges (Caes. B. G. vi. 3, vii. 58; Strah. p. 194). Under the emperors it became a place of importance, and the chief naval station on the Sequana. Here Julian was proclaimed emperor, A.D. 360 (Amm. Marc. xvii. 2, xx. 4).

Lycættus (Λυκαθηττός: Mt. St. George), a mountain in Attica, belonging to the range of Pentelicus, close to the walls of Athens on the NE. of the city, and on the left of the road leading to Marathon. [ATHENAE, p. 140.]

Lycæus (Λυκαῖος), or Lyceus, a lofty mountain in Arcadia, NW. of Megalopolis, from the summit of which a great part of the country could be seen. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Zeus, who was hence surnamed Lycæus (Paus. viii. 38). Here was a temple of Zeus; and here also was celebrated the festival of the Lycæa (Dict. of Ant. s. v.). Pan was likewise called Lycæus, because he was born and had a sanctuary on this mountain.

Lycambes. [ARCHILOCHUS.]

Lycæon (Λυκάων), king of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus by Meliboea or Cyllene. The traditions about Lycæon represent him in very different lights. Some describe him as the first civiliser of Arcadia, who built the town of Lycosura, and introduced the worship of Zeus Lycæus. But he is more usually represented as an impious king, with fifty sons as impious as himself. Zeus visited the earth in order to punish them. The god was recognised and worshipped by the Arcadian people. Lycæon resolved to murder him; and in order to try if he were really a god, served before him a dish of human flesh. Zeus pushed away the table, and the place where this happened was afterwards called Trapezus. Lycæon and all his sons, with the exception of the youngest (or eldest), Nyctimus, were killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, or according to others, were changed into wolves. (Paus. viii. 2; CALLISTO.) It is open to question whether in these stories we have reminiscences of ancient human sacrifices to the Pelasgian Zeus, or of a superstition akin to the northern wehr-wolf stories, or of pastoral rites of the Arcadians for protection against wolves, like the Roman Lupercalia: it is possible that all these origins may have a part in the myth: it is also possible that the name itself may originally have meant 'light,' in connexion with the Lycæan Zeus, and may have been falsely referred to wolves.—Callisto, the daughter of Lycæon, is said to have been changed into the constellation of the Bear, whence she is called by the poets Lycæonis Arctos, Lycæonia Arctos, or Lycæonia Virgo, or by her patronymic Lycæonis.

Lycæonia (Λυκαονία: Λυκάονες: part of Karaman), a district of Asia Minor, assigned, under the Persian empire, to the satrapy of Cappadocia, but considered by the Greek and Roman geographers the SE. part of Phrygia; bounded on the N. by Galatia, on the E. by Cappadocia, on the S. by Cilicia Aspera, on the SW. by Isauria (which was sometimes reckoned as a part of it) and by Phrygia Paroreios, and on the NW. by Great Phrygia. It was a long narrow strip of country, its length extending in the direction of NW. and SE.; Xenophon, who first mentions it, describes its width as extending E. of Iconium (its chief city) to the borders of Cappadocia, a distance of 30 parasangs, about 110 miles. It forms a table-land between the Taurus and the mountains of Phrygia, deficient in good water, but abounding in flocks of sheep. The people, who were perhaps akin to the Pisidians, spoke a language mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (xiv. 11) as a distinct dialect: they were warlike, and especially skilled in archery. After the overthrow of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, Lycæonia, which had belonged successively to Persia and to Syria, was partly assigned to Eumenes, and partly governed by native chieftains, the last of whom, Antipater, a contemporary of Cicero, was conquered by Amyntas, king of Galatia, at whose death, in B.C. 25, it passed, with Galatia, to the Romans (Dio Cass. liii. 26). In Trajan's reign it was united to the province of Cappadocia (Ptol. v. 6), its chief town being Iconium. In the fourth century A.D. it was a separate province.

Lychnitis. [LYCHNIDUS.]

Lychnidus, more rarely Lychnidium or Lychnis (Λύχνιδος, Λυχνίδιον, Λυχνίς: Λυχνίδιος; Achrita, Ochrida), a town of Illyricum, was the ancient capital of the Dessaretii, but was in the possession of the Romans as early as their war with king Gentius. It was situated in the interior of the country, on a height on the N. bank of the lake Lychnitis (Λυχνίτις, or ἡ Λυχνίδια λίμνη), from which the river Drilon rises. The town was strongly fortified, and contained many springs. (Liv. xxvii. 32, xliii. 9; Strah. p. 323.) In the middle ages it was the residence of the Bulgarian kings, and called Achris or Achrita, whence its modern name.

Lycia (Λυκία: Λύκιος, Lycius: Meis), a small, but most interesting, district on the S. side of Asia Minor, jutting out into the Mediterranean in a form approaching to a rough semicircle, adjacent to parts of Caria and Pamphylia on the W. and E., and on the N. to the district of Cibyratis in Phrygia, to which, under the Byzantine emperors, it was considered to belong. It was bounded on the NW. by the little river Glaucus and the gulf of the same name, on the NE. by the mountain called CLIMAX (the N. part of the same range as that called Solyma), and on the N. its natural boundary was the Taurus, but its limits in this direction were not strictly defined. The N. parts of Lycia and the district of Cibyratis form together a high table-land, which is supported on the N. by the Taurus; on the E. by the mountains called Solyma (Taktalu-Dagh), which run from N. to S. along the E. coast of Lycia, far out into the sea, forming the SE. promontory of Lycia, called Sacrum Pr.

(C. Khelidonia); the summit of this range is 7800 feet high, and is covered with snow: the SW. and S. sides of this table-land are formed by the range called Massicytus (Aktar Dagh), which runs SE. from the E. side of the upper course of the river Xanthus: its summits are about 4000 feet high; and its S. side descends towards the sea in a succession of terraces, terminated by bold cliffs. The mountain system of Lycia is completed by the Cragus, which fills up the space between the W. side of the Xanthus and the Gulf of Glaucus, and forms the SW. promontory of Lycia: its summits are nearly 6000 feet high. The chief rivers are the Xanthus (Echen-Chai), which has its sources in the table-land S. of the Taurus, and flows from N. to S. between the Cragus and Massicytus, and the Limyrus, which flows from N. to S. between the Massicytus and the Solyma mountains. The valleys of these and the smaller rivers, and the terraces above the sea in the S. of the country were fertile in corn, wine, oil, and fruits, and the mountain slopes were clothed with splendid cedars, firs, and plane-trees: saffron also was one chief product of the land. The general geographical structure of the peninsula of Lycia, as connected with the rest of Asia Minor, bears no little resemblance to that of the peninsula of Asia Minor itself, as connected with the rest of Asia. According to the tradition preserved by Herodotus, the most ancient name of the country was Milyas (ἡ Μιλιάς), and the earliest inhabitants (probably of the Syro-Arabian race) were called Milῆae, and afterwards Solými: subsequently the Termilae, from Crete, settled in the country: and lastly, the Athenian Lycus, the son of Pandion, fled from his brother Aegeus to Lycia, and gave his name to the country. (Hdt. i. 173.) Homer, who gives Lycia a prominent place in the Iliad, represents its chieftains, Glaucus and Sarpedon, as descended from the royal family of Argos (Aeolids): he does not mention the name of Milyas; and he speaks of the Solymi as a warlike race, inhabiting the mountains, against whom the Greek hero Bellerophon is sent to fight, by his relative the king of Lycia (Il. vi. 171-184, x. 430, xii. 312; Od. v. 282.) Besides the legend of Bellerophon and the Chimæra, Lycia is the scene of another popular Greek story, that of the Harpies and the daughters of Pandarus; and memorials of both are preserved on the Lycian monuments now in the British Museum. On the whole, it is clear that Lycia was colonised by an immigrant Hellenic race (probably from Crete), which drove the native Solymi into the mountains further inland, and that its historical inhabitants were Greeks, though with a mixture of native blood. The earlier names were preserved in the district in the N. of the country called Milyas, and in the mountains called Solyma. The Lycians always kept the reputation they have in Homer, as brave warriors. They and the Cilicians were the only people W. of the Halys whom Croesus did not conquer, and they were the last who resisted the Persians. [XANTHUS.] Under the Persian empire they must have been a powerful maritime people, as they furnished fifty ships to the fleet of Xerxes. After the Macedonian conquest, Lycia formed part of the Syrian kingdom, from which it was taken by the Romans after their victory over Antiochus III. the Great, and given to the Rhodians. It was soon restored to independence, and formed a flourishing federation of cities, each having its own republican form of government, and the whole presided over by a chief magistrate, called Λυκίάρχης. There was a federal council, composed of deputies from the twenty-three cities of the federation, in which the six chief cities, Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, and Tios, had three votes each, certain lesser cities two each, and the rest one each: this assembly determined matters relating to the general government of the country, and elected the Lyciarches, as well as the judges and the inferior magistrates. (Strab. pp. 664, 665.) Internal dissensions at length broke up this constitution, and the country was united by the emperor Claudius to the province of Pamphylia (Suet. Claud. 25; Dio Cass. ix. 17). It was separated from Pamphylia in 313 A.D., and governed by a praeses of its own. [See also XANTHUS.]

Lycius (Λύκιος). [APOLLO.]

Lycómēdes (Λυκομήδης). 1. A king of the Dolopians, in the island of Scyros, near Euboea. It was to his court that Achilles was sent disguised as a maiden by his mother Thetis, who was anxious to prevent his going to the Trojan war. Here Achilles became the father of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus by Deidamía, the daughter of Lycomedes. Lycomedes treacherously killed Theseus by thrusting him down a rock. [ACHILLES; THESEUS.]—2. An Arcadian general, a native of Mantinea and one of the chief founders of Megalopolis, B. C. 370. He afterwards showed jealousy of Thebes, and formed a separate alliance between Athens and Arcadia, in 366. He was murdered in the same year on his return from Athens, by some Arcadian exiles. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1, 23; Diod. xv. 59.)

Lycón (Λύκων). 1. An orator and demagogue at Athens, was one of the accusers of Socrates and prepared the case against him. When the Athenians repented of their condemnation of Socrates, they put Meletus to death and banished Anytus and Lycón. [SOCRATES.]—2. Of Troas, a Peripatetic philosopher, and the pupil of Straton, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school, B. C. 272. He held that post for more than forty-four years, and died at the age of 74. He enjoyed the patronage of Attalus and Eumenes. He wrote on the boundaries of good and evil (Cic. Fin. v. 5, 13).

Lycóphron (Λυκόφρων). 1. Younger son of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, by his wife Melissa. For details see PERIANDER.—2. A citizen of Phærae, where he put down the government of the nobles and established a tyranny about B. C. 405. He afterwards endeavoured to make himself master of the whole of Thessaly, and in 404 he defeated the Larissæans and others of the Thessalians, who opposed him. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, 4; Diod. xiv. 82.)—3. A son, apparently, of Jason, and one of the brothers of Thebe, wife of Alexander, the tyrant of Phærae, in whose murder he took part together with his sister and his two brothers, Tisiphonus and Pitholaus, 359. On Alexander's death the power appears to have been wielded mainly by Tisiphonus, though Lycophron had an important share in the government. Lycophron succeeded to the supreme power on the death of Tisiphonus, but in 352 he was obliged to surrender Phærae to Philip, and withdraw from Thessaly.—4. A grammarian and poet, was a native of Chalcis in Euboea, and lived at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philadelphus (B. C. 285-247), who entrusted to him the arrangement of the works of the comic poets in the Alexandrian library. Lycophron himself wrote a work on Comedy. Ovid (Ibis, 533) states that he was killed by an arrow.—

Lycophron wrote a number of tragedies; but the only one of his poems which has come down to us is the Cassandra or Alexandra. This is a long iambic monologue of 1474 verses, in which Cassandra is made to prophesy the fall of Troy, the adventures of the Grecian and Trojan heroes, with other mythological and historical events, going back as early as the fables of Io and Europa, and ending with Alexander the Great. The work has no pretensions to poetical merit. It is simply a cumbrous store of traditional learning. Its obscurity obtained for its author the name ὁ σκοτεινός. It is useful for mythological reference; but for this purpose the Scholium of Isaac and John Tzetzes are far more valuable than the poem itself. Editions by Potter, Oxon. 1697, fol.; Bachmann, Lips. 1828; Kinkel, 1880.

Lýcōpōlis (ἡ Λύκων πόλις: Siouf, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Ptolemais, said to have derived its name from the circumstance that an Aethiopian army was put to flight near it by a pack of wolves (Diod. ii. 88; Ael. H. A. x. 28).

Lycorēa (Λυκωρεία: Λυκωρεός, Λυκώριος, Λυκωρείτης), an ancient town at the foot of Mt. Lycorea (Liakura), which was the southern of the two peaks of Mt. Parnassus. [PARNASSUS.]

Lycōris. [CYTHERIS.]

Lycortas (Λυκόρτας), of Megalopolis was the father of Polybius, the historian, and the close friend of Philopoemen, whose policy he always supported. He is first mentioned in B.C. 189, as one of the ambassadors sent to Rome; and his name occurs for the last time in 168. (Justin. xxxii. 1.)

Lycosūra (Λυκόσουρα: Λυκοσουρεός: Paleokrambavos or Sidhirokastro near Stala), a town in the S. of Arcadia, and on the NW. slope of Mt. Lycaeus, and near the small river Plataniston, said by Pausanias to have been the most ancient town in Greece, and to have been founded by Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus (Paus. viii. 2, 4, 98).

Lycetus (Λύκτος: Λύκτιος), sometimes called Lyttus (Λύττος), a town in the E. of Crete, SE. of Cnossus, situated on a height of Mt. Argæus, eighty stadia from the coast. Its harbour was called Chersonesus. It is mentioned in the Diad. (ii. 64, xvii. 611). It was generally considered to be a Spartan colony, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their bravery (Arist. Pol. ii. 7). It was conquered and destroyed by the Cnossians, but it was afterwards rebuilt (Pol. iv. 53; Strab. p. 476).

Lycurgus (Λυκούργος). 1. Son of Dryas, and king of the Edones in Thrace. He is famous for his persecution of Dionysus and his worship in Thrace. Homer relates that, in order to escape from Lycurgus, Dionysus leaped into the sea, where he was kindly received by Thetis; and that Zeus thereupon blinded the impious king, who died soon afterwards, hated by the immortal gods (Il. vi. 130). This story has received many additions from later poets. Some relate that Dionysus, on his expeditions, came to the kingdom of Lycurgus, but was expelled by the impious king. Thereupon the god drove Lycurgus mad, in which condition he killed his son Dryas, and also hewed off one of his legs, supposing that he was cutting down vines. [DIONYSUS, pp. 293, 294.] The country now produced no fruit; and the oracle declaring that fertility should not be restored unless Lycurgus were killed, the Edonians carried him to Mount Pangæus, where he was imprisoned in a cave (Soph. Ant. 955; Apollod. iii. 5, 1). Afterwards he was torn to pieces by horses or by panthers (Hyg. Fab. 132).—2. King in Arcadia, son of Aleus and Neaera, brother of Cepheus and Auge, husband of Cleophile, Eurynome, or Antiope, and father of Ancaeus, Epochus, Amphidamas, and Iasus. Lycurgus killed Areithous, who used to fight with a club. Lycurgus bequeathed this club to his slave Ereuthalion, his sons having died before him (Il. vii. 142).—3. Son of Pronax and brother of Amphithea, the wife of Adrastus (Paus. iii. 18, 12). He took part in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and fought with Amphiaræus. He is mentioned among those whom Asclepius called to life again after their death.—4. King of Nemea, son of Pheres and Periclymene, brother of Admetus, husband of Eurydice or Amphithea, and father of Opheltes.

Lycurgus (Λυκούργος). 1. The Spartan legislator. Of his history we have no certain information; and there are such discrepancies respecting him in the ancient writers, that many modern critics have denied his real existence altogether. There is no warrant for any such denial, though it is probable that the appropriate name given to his father is altogether fictitious (Aristotle, indeed, in Pol. iv. 11 = p. 1296, seems to place Lycurgus among the middle-class citizens), and that some of the institutions ascribed to him belong to a later date. The more generally received account about him was as follows. Lycurgus was the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydectes. The latter succeeded his father as king of Sparta, and afterwards died, leaving his queen with child. The ambitious woman proposed to Lycurgus to destroy her offspring if he would share the throne with her. He seemingly consented; but when she had given birth to a son (Charilaus), he openly proclaimed him king; and as next of kin, acted as his guardian. But to avoid all suspicion of ambitious design, with which the opposite party charged him, Lycurgus left Sparta, and set out on his celebrated travels, which have been magnified to a fabulous extent. He is said to have visited Crete, and there to have studied the wise laws of Minos. Next he went to Ionia and Egypt, and is reported to have penetrated into Libya, Iberia, and even India. In Ionia he is said to have met either with Homer himself, or at least with the Homeric poems, which he introduced into the mother country. The return of Lycurgus to Sparta was hailed by all parties. Sparta was in a state of anarchy, and he was considered the man who alone could cure the diseases of the state. He undertook the task; yet before he set to work, he strengthened himself with the authority of the Delphic oracle, from which he is said to have obtained ordinances (rhetrae) on which he based his reforms, as follows: 'Found a temple to Zeus and Athene; arrange the tribes and Obes to the number of 30 [i.e. 10 Obes in each of the three tribes—probably an older institution]; appoint the Gerousia and Archagetæ (= kings). Convoke assemblies of the people between Babycæ and Cnacion, and there propose and enact laws by the will of the people.' The reform seems not to have been carried altogether peaceably. According to one legend Lycurgus lost an eye in a personal attack made upon him. The new division of the land among the citizens must have violated many existing interests. But all opposition was overborne, and the whole constitution, military and civil, was remodelled. After Lycurgus had obtained for his institutions an approving oracle of the national god of Delphi, he exacted a promise from the people not to make any alterations in his laws before his return. And now he left Sparta to finish his life in voluntary exile, in order that his countrymen might be bound by their oath to preserve his constitution inviolate for ever. Where and how he died nobody could tell. He vanished from the earth like a god, leaving no traces behind but his spirit; and he was honoured as a god at Sparta with a temple and yearly sacrifices down to the latest times. The date of Lycurgus is variously given, but it was probably a few years before 800 B.C. (Hdt. i. 65; Plut. Lycurgus; Strab. pp. 364, 482; Arist. Pol. v. 12 = p. 1316; [Xen.] Rep. Lac. x. 8; cf. Thuc. i. 18).—Lycurgus was regarded through all subsequent ages as the legislator of Sparta, and therefore almost all the Spartan institutions were ascribed to him as their author. We therefore propose to give here a sketch of the Spartan constitution, referring for details to the Dict. of Antiq.; though we must not imagine that this constitution was entirely the work of Lycurgus. The Spartan constitution was of a mixed nature: the monarchical principle was represented by the kings, the aristocracy by the senate, and the democratical element by the assembly of the people, and subsequently by their representatives, the ephors. The kings had originally to perform the common functions of the kings of the heroic age. They were high priests, judges, and leaders in war; but in all of these departments they were in course of time superseded more or less. As judges they retained only a particular branch of jurisdiction, that referring to the succession of property. As military commanders they were to some extent restricted and watched by commissioners sent by the senate; the functions of high priest were curtailed least, perhaps because least obnoxious. In compensation for the loss of power, the kings enjoyed great honours, both during their life and after their death. The senate or Gerousia consisted of 30 members, one from each Obes, all elected except the two kings, who were ex officio members, and represented each his own Obes. In their functions they replaced the old council of the nobles as a sort of privy council to the kings, but their power was greater, since the votes of the kings were of no greater weight than those of other senators; they had the right of originating and discussing all measures before they could be submitted to the decision of the popular assembly; they had, in conjunction (later) with the ephors, to watch over the due observance of the laws and institutions; and they were judges in all criminal cases, without being bound by any written code. For all this they were not responsible, holding their office for life.—But with all these powers, the elders formed no real aristocracy. They were not chosen either for property qualification or for noble birth. The senate was open to the poorest citizen, who during sixty years had been obedient to the laws and zealous in the performance of his duties.—The mass of the people—that is, the Spartans of pure Doric descent—formed the sovereign power of the state. The popular assembly consisted of every Spartan of thirty years of age, and of unblemished character; only those were excluded who had not the means of contributing their portion to the syssitia. They met at stated times, to decide on all important questions brought before them, after a previous discussion in the senate. They had no right of amendment, but only that of simple approval or rejection, which was given in the rudest form possible, by shouting. The popular assembly, however, had neither frequent nor very important occasions for directly exerting their sovereign power. Their chief activity consisted in delegating it; hence arose the importance of the ephors, who were the representatives of the popular element of the constitution. The five ephors answer in many points to the Roman tribunes of the people. Their appointment is included by Herodotus among the institutions of Lycurgus, but it is probable that Aristotle is right in dating these later, from the reign of Theopompus. [Dict. of Ant. art. Ephori.] Their appointment was perhaps a concession to the people, at first as overseers of the markets and as magistrates who might check illegal oppression by kings or great men. Subsequently they absorbed most of the power in the state. To Lycurgus was ascribed also a prohibition to use written laws or to have any coinage but iron: but these traditions must refer to later customs, since there were neither coins nor written laws in Greece as early as Lycurgus.—With reference to their subjects, the few Spartans formed a most decided aristocracy. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, part of the ancient inhabitants of the country, under name of the Perioici, were allowed indeed to retain their personal liberty, but lost all civil rights, and were obliged to pay to the state a rent for the land that was left them. But a great part of the old inhabitants were reduced to a state of perfect slavery, different from that of the slaves of Athens and Rome, and more similar to the villanage of the feudal ages. These were called HeLOTS. They were allotted, with patches of land, to individual members of the ruling class. They tilled the land, and paid a fixed rent to their masters, not, as the perioici, to the state. The Spartans formed, as it were, an army of invaders in an enemy's country. Their city was a camp, and every man a soldier. At Sparta, the citizen only existed for the state; he had no interest but the state's, and no property but what belonged to the state. It was a fundamental principle of the constitution that all citizens were entitled to the enjoyment of an equal portion of the common property. This was done in order to secure to the commonwealth a large number of citizens and soldiers free from labour for their sustenance, and able to devote their whole time to warlike exercises, in order thus to keep up the ascendancy of Sparta over her perioeci and helots. The Spartans were to be warriors and nothing but warriors. Therefore, not only all mechanical labour was thought to degrade them; not only was husbandry despised and neglected, and commerce prevented, or at least impeded, by prohibitive laws and by the use of iron money; but also the nobler arts and sciences were so effectually stifled that Sparta is a blank in the history of the arts and literature of Greece. The state took care of a Spartan from his cradle to his grave, and superintended his education in the minutest points. This was not confined to his youth, but extended throughout his whole life. The syssitia, or, as they were called at Sparta, pliditia, the common meals, may be regarded as an educational institution; for at these meals subjects of general interest were discussed and political questions debated. The youths and boys used to eat separately from the men, in their own divisions.—2. A Lacedaemonian, who, though not of the royal blood, was chosen king, in B.C. 220, together with Agesipolis III., after the death of Cleomenes. It was not long before he deposed his colleague and made himself sole sovereign, though under the control of the Ephori. He carried on war against Philip V. of Macedon, and the Achaeans. He died about 210, and Machanidas then made himself tyrant. (Pol. iv. 2, 35, v. 21, 91; Paus. iv. 29.)—3. An Attic orator, son of Lycophon, who belonged to the noble family of the Eteobutadae, was born at Athens, about B.C. 396. He was a disciple of Plato and Isocrates. In public life he was a warm supporter of the policy of Demosthenes, and was universally admitted to be one of the most virtuous citizens and upright statesmen of his age. He was Tamias or manager of the public revenue from 338 to 326, and discharged the duties of this office with such ability and integrity, that he raised the public revenue to the sum of 1200 talents. One of his laws enacted that bronze statues should be erected to Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and that copies of their tragedies should be preserved in the public archives. He died while holding the office of President of the Theatre of Dionysus, in 323. A fragment of an inscription containing an account of his administration of the finances is still extant. There were fifteen orations of Lycurgus extant in antiquity; but only one has come down to us entire, the oration against Leocrates, which was delivered in 332. Leocrates, who had fled from Athens after the battle of Chaeronea, was indicted for treason. The oration is printed in the various collections of the Attic orators. [DEMOSTHENES.]

Lycus (Λύκος). 1. Son of Poseidon and Celaeno, who was transferred by his father to the Islands of the Blessed (Apollod. iii. 10, 1). By Aleyone, the sister of Celaeno, Poseidon begot Hyrieus, the father of the following.—2. Son of Hyrieus and Clonia, and brother of Nycteus. Polydorus, king of Thebes, married the daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a son Labdacus; and on his death he left the government of Thebes and the guardianship of Labdacus to his father-in-law. Nycteus afterwards fell in battle against Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who had carried away his beautiful daughter Antiope. Lycus succeeded his brother in the government of Thebes, and in the guardianship of Labdacus. He surrendered the kingdom to Labdacus when the latter had grown up. On the death of Labdacus soon afterwards, Lycus again succeeded to the government of Thebes, and undertook the guardianship of Laius, the son of Labdacus (Paus. ii. 6, 2, ix. 5, 5). Lycus marched against Epopeus, whom he put to death (according to other accounts Epopeus fell in the war with Nycteus), and he carried away Antiope to Thebes. She was treated with the greatest cruelty by Dirce, the wife of Lycus; in revenge for which her sons by Zeus—Amphion and Zethus—afterwards put to death both Lycus and Dirce. [AMPHION.]—3. Son of No. 2, or, according to others, son of Poseidon, was also king of Thebes. In the absence of Heracles, Lycus attempted to kill his wife Megara and her children, but was afterwards put to death by Heracles (Eur. H. F. 31; Hyg. Fab. 32).—4. Son of Pandion, and brother of Aegeus, Nisus, and Pallas. He was expelled by Aegeus, and took refuge in the country of the Termilae, which was called Lycia after him. He was honoured at Athens as a hero, and Pausanias asserts that the Lyceum derived its name from him. (It is more probably connected with Apollo Lycæus.) He is said to have introduced the Eleusinian mysteries into Andania in Messenia. He is sometimes also described as an ancient prophet, and the family of the Lycomedæ, at Athens, traced their name and origin from him. (Hdt. i. 173, vii. 92; Paus. i. 19, 4, iv. 1, 2, 20, x. 12; Aristoph. Vesp. 408.)—5. Son of Dascylus, and king of the Mariandynians, who received Heracles and the Argonauts with hospitality (Ap. Rh. ii. 139).—6. Of Rhegium, the father, real or adoptive, of the poet Lycophon, was a historical writer in the time of Demetrius Phalereus.

Lycus (Λύκος), the name of several rivers which are said to be so called from the impetuosity of their current. 1. (Kılıç), a little river of Bithynia, falling into the sea S. of Heraclea Pontica (Xen. An. vi. 2, 3).—2. (Germeneh-Chai), a considerable river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the N. of Armenia Minor, and flowing W. into the Iris at Eupatoria (Strab. pp. 529, 547).—3. (Choruk-Su), a considerable river of Phrygia, flowing from E. to W. past Colossæ and Laodicea into the Maeander (Hdt. vii. 30; Strab. p. 578).—4. (Nahr-el-Kelb), a river of Phoenicia, falling into the sea N. of Berytus.—5. (Great Zab or Ulu-Su), a river of Assyria, rising in the mountains on the S. of Armenia, and flowing SW. into the Tigris, just below Larissa (Nimroud). The same as the Zabatus of Xenophon. (Curt. iv. 9; Xen. An. ii. 5, 1.)

Lydda (τὰ Λύδδα, ἡ Λύδδη; Lud), a town of Palestine, SE. of Joppa, and NW. of Jerusalem, at the junction of several roads which lead from the sea-coast, was destroyed by the Romans in the Jewish war, but soon after rebuilt, and called Diospolis (Jos. B. J. ii. 19, 3, iii. 4, 8).

Lýdia (Λυδία; Lydis, Lydus), a district of Asia Minor, in the middle of the W. side of the peninsula, between Mysia on the N. and Caria on the S., and between Phrygia on the E. and the Aegæan Sea on the W. The name had a widely-extended meaning when applied to the old Lydian kingdom; but of Lydia strictly so called the N. boundary, towards Mysia, was the range of mountains which form the N. margin of the valley of the Hermus, called Sardene, a SW. branch of the Phrygian Olympus: the E. boundary towards Phrygia was an imaginary line; and the S. boundary towards Caria was the river Maeander, or, according to some authorities, the range of mountains which, under the name of Messogis (Kastane Dagh) forms the N. margin of the valley of the Maeander, and is a

NW. prolongation of the Taurus. From the E. part of this range, in the SE. corner of Lydia, another branches off to the NW., and runs to the W. far out into the Aegean Sea, where it forms the peninsula opposite to the island of Chios. This chain, which is called Tmolus (Kisilja Musa Daghi), divides Lydia into two unequal valleys; of which the S. and smaller is watered by the river CAYSTER, and the N. forms the great plain of the HERMUS: these valleys are very beautiful and fertile, especially that of the Hermus. The E. part of Lydia, and the adjacent portion of Phrygia, about the upper course of the Hermus and its tributaries, is an elevated plain, showing traces of volcanic action, and hence called Catacecaumēne (κατακεκαυμένη). In early times the country had another name, Maeōnia (Μηωνία, Μαονία), by which alone it is known to Homer (Il. ii. 865, v. 43, x. 431); and this name was afterwards applied specifically to the E. and S. part of Lydia, and then, in contradistinction to it, the name Lydia was used for the NW. part (Strab. pp. 620, 625, 678, 680). It is a probable suggestion that the original Lydia of the lower Hermus was conquered by the Maeonians, a people of Phrygian origin, before the Homeric period, and that when Gyges established a national Lydian kingdom he restored the old name to the whole country. In the mythical legends the common name of the people and country, Lydi and Lydia, is derived from Lydus, the son of Atys, the first king. The Lydians appear to have been a race closely connected with the Carians and the Mysians, with whom they observed a common worship in the temple of Zeus Carius at Mylasa: they also practised the worship of Cybele, and other Phrygian customs. Some modern writers believe them to have been a people of Semitic origin, and find in this an explanation of the name, which is Oriental, and of some characteristics in their customs and religion. This would account for the tradition in Hdt. iii. 7 which derives one of the Lydian dynasties from Ninus. Amidst the uncertainties of the early legends, it is clear that Lydia was a very early seat of Asiatic civilisation, and that it exerted a very important influence on the Greeks. The Lydian monarchy, which was founded at Sardis, before the time of authentic history, grew up into an empire, under which the many different tribes of Asia Minor W. of the river Halys were for the first time united. Tradition mentioned three dynasties of kings: the Atyādae, which ended (according to the computations of chronologers) about B.C. 1221; the Heraclidae, which reigned 505 years, down to 716; and the Mermnādae, 160 years, down to 556. Only the last dynasty can be safely regarded as historical, and the fabulous element has a large place in the details of their history: their names and computed dates were:—(1) GYGES, B.C. 716–678; (2) ARDYS, 678–629; (3) SADYATTES, 629–617; (4) ALYATTES, 617–560; (5) CROESUS, 560 (or earlier)—546; under whose names an account is given of the rise of the Lydian empire in Asia Minor, and of its overthrow by the Persians under Cyrus. Under these kings the Lydians appear to have been a highly civilised, industrious, and wealthy people, practising agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and acquainted with various arts; and exercising, through their intercourse with the Greeks of Ionia, an important influence on the progress of Greek civilisation. Among the inventions, or improvements, which the Greeks are said to have derived from them, were the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics (Il. iv. 141; Claud. de Hapt. Pros. i. 270); various processes of metallurgy; the use of gold and silver money, which the Lydians are said first to have coined, the former from the gold found on Tmolus and from the golden sands of the Pactolus (Hdt. i. 94); and various metrical and musical improvements, especially the scale or mode of music called the Lydian, and the form of the lyre called the magadis. (Dict. of Antiq. art. Musica.) The Lydians had also public games similar to those of the Greeks. Their high civilisation, however, was combined with a lax morality, and, after the Persian conquest, when they were forbidden by Cyrus to carry arms, they sank gradually into a state of effeminate luxuriousness, and their very name and language had almost entirely disappeared by the commencement of our era. Under the Persians, Lydia and Mysia formed the second satrapy: after the Macedonian conquest, Lydia belonged to the kings of Syria, and (after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans) to those of Pergamum, and so passed, by the bequest of Attalus III., to the Romans, under whom it formed part of the province of Asia.—On the tradition that Etruria was colonised by the Lydians, see ETRURIA. Hence the Roman poets use Lydian as equivalent to Etruscan (Virg. Aen. ii. 781, ix. 11).

Lydiādes (Λυδιᾶδης), a citizen of Megalopolis, who, though of an obscure family raised himself to the sovereignty of his native city, about B.C. 244. In 234 he voluntarily abdicated the sovereignty, and permitted Megalopolis to join the Achaean League as a free state. He was one of the noblest characters in the later Greek history. He was elected several times general of the Achaean League, and became a formidable rival to Aratus. He fell in battle against Cleomenes, 226. (Pol. ii. 44, 51; Plut. Arat. 30, 35, 37, Cleom. 6; Paus. viii. 27.)

Lydias or Ludias (Λυδίας, Ion. Λυδῖης, Λουδίας: Karasmak or Mavronero), a river in Macedonia, rises in Eordaea, passes Edessa, and after flowing through the lake on which Pella is situated, falls into the Axios, a short distance from the Thermaic gulf. In the upper part of its course it is called the Eordaeian river (Ἐορδαϊκὸς ποταμὸς) by Arrian. (Eur. Baech. 565; Strab. p. 330.) Herodotus (vii. 127) by mistake makes the Lydians unite with the Haliacmon, the latter of which is W. of the former.

Lydus (Λύδωσ), son of Atys and Callithea, and brother of Tyrrhenus, the mythical ancestor of the Lydians (Hdt. i. 7; Dionys. i. 27).

Lydus, Joannes Laurentius, was born at Philadelphia, in Lydia (whence he is called Lydus or the Lydian), in A.D. 490. He held various public offices, and lived to an advanced age. He wrote: 1. Περὶ μνηῶν συγγραφή, De Mensibus Liber, of which there are two epitomae, or summaries, and a fragment extant. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν κ. τ. λ. De Magistratibus Republicae Romanae. 3. Περὶ διοσημειῶν, De Ostentis (ed. Wachsmuth, 1863). The work De Mensibus is a historical commentary on the Roman calendar, with an account of the various festivals, derived from a great number of authorities, most of which have perished. Of the two summaries of this curious work, the larger one is by an unknown hand, the shorter one by Maximus Planudes. The work De Magistratibus was thought to have perished, but was discovered by Villoison in the suburbs of Constantinople, in 1785. The best edition of the complete works is by Bekker, Bonn, 1837.

Lygdāmis (Λύγδαμῖς). 1. Of Naxos, a dis-tingnished leader of the popular party of the island in the struggle with the oligarchy. He conquered the latter, and obtained thereby the chief power in the state. He assisted Pisistratus in his third return to Athens; but during his absence his enemies seem to have got the upper hand again; for Pisistratus afterwards subdued the island, and made Lygdamis tyrant of it, about B.C. 540. In 532 he assisted Polycrates in obtaining the tyranny of Samos. (Hdt. i. 61, 64; Ar. Pol. v. 5; 'Ath. πολ. 15.)—2. Father of ARTEMISIA, queen of Halicarnassus, the contemporary of Xerxes.—3. Tyrant of Halicarnassus, the son of Pisindelis, and the grandson of Artemisia. Herodotus is said to have taken an active part in delivering his native city from the tyranny of this Lygdamis.

Lygii or Ligiï, an important people in Germany, between the Viadns (Oder) and the Vistula, in the modern Silesia and Posen, were bounded by the Burgundiones on the N., the Goths on the E., the Bastarnae and Osi on the W., and the Marsiugi, Silingae, and Semnones on the S. They were divided into several tribes, the chief of which were the Manimi, Duni, Elysi, Buri, Arii, Naharvali, and Helveconae. They first appear in history as members of the great Marcomannic league formed by Maroboduus in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. In the third century some of the Lygii migrated with the Burgundians westwards, and settled in the country bordering on the Rhine. (Tac. Germ. 43, Ann. xii. 29; Strab. p. 290; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 5.)

Lyncestis (Λυγκηστis), a district in the SW. of Macedonia, N. of the river Erigon, and upon the frontiers of Illyria. Its inhabitants, the Lyncestae, were Illyrians, and were originally an independent people, who were governed by their own princes, said to be descended from the family of the Bacchiadae. The Lyncestae appear to have become subject to Macedonia by a marriage between the royal families of the two countries. The ancient capital of the country was Lyncus (ἡ Λύγκος), though HERACLEA at a later time became the chief town in the district. (Thuc. ii. 99, iv. 83, 124; Strab. pp. 323, 326.) Ovid speaks of a river near Lyncus, the waters of which were said to be as intoxicating as wine (Ov. Met. xv. 329).

Lyncus (Λυγκεύς). 1. One of the 50 sons of Aegyptus, whose life was saved by his wife Hypermnestra, when all his other brothers were murdered by the daughters of Danaus on their wedding night. [AEGYPTUS.] A rite at Argos was derived from this story (or the story from the rite), a torch procession, said to commemorate the fact that Lyncus, when he had escaped safely to Lyrcæa, gave a signal to Hypermnestra of his arrival, by waving a torch (Paus. ii. 25, 4). Danaus kept Hypermnestra in strict confinement, but was afterwards prevailed upon to give her to Lyncus, who succeeded him on the throne of Argos. According to a different legend, Lyncus slew Danaus and all the sisters of Hypermnestra, in revenge for his brothers (Paus. ii. 16, 1; Apollod. ii. 1, 5; Ov. Her. 14). Lyncus was succeeded as king of Argos by his son ABAS.—2. Son of Aphareus and Arene, and brother of Idas, was one of the Argonauts, and famous for his keen sight. He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters, and was slain by Pollux. (Apollod. i. 8, 2; Ap. Rh. i. 151; Pind. Nem. x. 61; Hor. Sat. i. 2, 90; Ep. i. 1, 28; IDAS.)—3. Of Samos, the disciple of Theophrastus, and brother of the historian Duris, was a contem-

Lyncus, king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily, endeavoured to murder Triptolemus, who came to him with the gifts of Ceres, but metamorphosed by the goddess into a lynx (Ov. Met. v. 650; Serv. ad Aen. i. 327).

Lyrcæa or Lyrcæum (Λυρκελα, Λύρκειον), a small town in Argolis, situated on a mountain of the same name (Strab. p. 271; Paus. ii. 25, 4).

Lynnessus (Λυνησσός), a town in the interior of Mysia mentioned by Homer; destroyed before the time of Strabo (Il. ii. 690, xix. 60, xx. 92; Aesch. Pers. 324; Strab. p. 612).

Lysander (Λύσανδρος). 1. A Spartan, was of servile origin, or at least the offspring of a marriage between a freeman and a woman of inferior condition. (Ael. V.H. xii. 43; Athen. p. 271.) He obtained the citizenship, and became one of the most distinguished of the Spartan generals and diplomatists. In B.C. 407 he was appointed navarchus, and succeeded Cratesippidas in the command of the fleet off the coasts of Asia Minor. He fixed his headquarters at Ephesus, and soon obtained great influence, not only with the Greek cities, but also with Cyrus, who supplied him with large sums of money to pay his sailors. Next year, 406, he was succeeded by Callicratidas. In one year the reputation and influence of Lysander had become so great that Cyrus and the Spartan allies in Asia requested the Lacedaemonians to appoint Lysander again to the command of the fleet. The Lacedaemonian law, however, did not allow the office of navarchus to be held twice by the same person; and, accordingly, Aracus was sent out in 405, as the nominal commander-in-chief, while Lysander, virtually invested with the supreme direction of affairs, had the title of vice-admiral (ἐπιστολεύς). In this year he brought the Peloponnesian war to a conclusion, by the defeat and capture of the Athenian fleet off Aegospotami. Only eight Athenian ships made their escape, under the command of Conon. He afterwards sailed to Athens, and in the spring of 404 the city capitulated; the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus were destroyed, and an oligarchical form of government was established, known by the name of 'The Thirty.' Lysander was now by far the most powerful man in Greece, and he displayed more than the usual pride and haughtiness which distinguished the Spartan commanders in foreign countries. He was passionately fond of praise, and took care that his exploits should be celebrated by the most illustrious poets of his time. He always kept the poet Choerilus in his retinue; and his praises were also sung by Antilochus, Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heraclea. He was the first of the Greeks to whom Greek cities erected altars as to a god, offered sacrifices, and celebrated festivals. (Plut. Lys. 18; Paus. vi. 3, 14; Athen. p. 690.) His power and ambition caused the Spartan government uneasiness, and accordingly the Ephors recalled him from Asia Minor, to which he had again repaired, and for some years kept him without any public employment. On the death of Agis II. in 397, he secured the succession for Agesilaus, the brother of Agis, in opposition to Leotyichides, the reputed son of the latter. He did not receive from Agesilaus the gratitude he had expected. He was one of the members of the council, 30 in number, which was appointed to accompany the new king in his expedition into Asia in 396. Agosilaus purposely thwarted all his designs, and refused all the favours which he asked. On his return to Sparta, Lysander resolved to bring about the change he had long meditated in the Spartan constitution, by abolishing hereditary royalty, and making the throne elective. He is said to have attempted to obtain the sanction of the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Zeus Ammon, but without success. He does not seem to have ventured upon any overt act, and his enterprise was cut short by his death in the following year. On the breaking out of the Boeotian war in 395, Lysander was placed at the head of one army, and the king Pausanias at the head of another. Lysander marched against Haliartus, and perished in battle under the walls, 395. (Plut. Lysander; Xen. Hell. ii, iii.)—2. A Spartan ephor banished by the Lacedaemonians (Cic. Off. ii. 23, 80).

Lysandra (Λύσανδρα), daughter of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, the daughter of Autipater. She was married first to Alexander, the son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and after his death to Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus. After the murder of her second husband, B.C. 284 [AGATHOCLES, No. 3], she fled to Asia, and besought assistance from Seleucus. The latter in consequence marched against Lysimachus, who was defeated and slain in battle 281. (Paus. i. 9, 10; Plut. Demetr. 31.)

Lysanias (Λυσάνιος). 1. Tetrarch of Abilene, was put to death by Antony, to gratify Cleopatra, B.C. 36 (Dio Cass. xlix. 32).—2. Apparently a descendant of the last, tetrarch of Abilene at the time when Jesus Christ entered upon his ministry (Luke, iii. 1).

Lysias (Λυσίας), an Attic orator, was born at Athens about B.C. 459. (This is the date in Dionys. Lys. 12, and [Plut.] Vit. Lys.; but it is conjectural; and some writers put the birth of Lysias as late as 444.) He was the son of Cephalus, who was a native of Syracuse, and had taken up his abode at Athens, on the invitation of Pericles. At the age of 15, Lysias and his brothers joined the Athenians who went as colonists to Thurii in Italy, 444, or followed them later. He there completed his education under the instruction of two Syracusans, Tisias and Nicias. He afterwards enjoyed great esteem among the Thurians, and seems to have taken part in the administration of the city. After the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, he was expelled by the Spartan party from Thurii, as a partisan of the Athenians. He now returned to Athens, 412. During the rule of the Thirty (404) he was looked upon as an enemy of the government, his large property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison; but he escaped, and took refuge at Megara (cf. Lys. in Eratosth. § 16). He joined Thrasybulus and the exiles, and in order to render them effectual assistance he sacrificed all that remained of his fortune. He gave the patriots 2000 drachmas and 200 shields, and engaged a band of 300 mercenaries. Thrasybulus procured him the Athenian franchise, which he had not possessed hitherto, since he was the son of a foreigner: but he was afterwards deprived of this right because it had been conferred without a probouleuma. Henceforth he lived at Athens as an isoteles, occupying judicial office, as it appears, solely with writing judicial speeches for others, and died in 378, at the age of 80.—Lysias wrote a great number of orations; and among those which were current under his name the ancient critics reckoned 230 as genuine. Of these 34 only are extant; and of these three are only fragments: of the remaining 31 those c. Andoc., Alcib. 2, pro Polystr., pro Milite, and the Funeral Oration are probably spurious. Most of these orations were composed after his return from Thurii to Athens. The only one which he delivered himself is that against Eratosthenes, 403. The language of Lysias is perfectly pure, and may be regarded as one of the best specimens of the Attic idiom. All the ancient writers agreed that his orations were distinguished by grace and elegance, in what was called 'the plain style,' i.e. that which uses the language of ordinary life and avoids grandiloquence. Its style is clear and lucid; and his delineations of character striking and true to life. The orations of Lysias are contained in the collections of the Attic orators. [DEMOSTHENES.] Separate edition by Scheibe, 1886.

Lysicrates, CHORAGIC MONUMENT OF, vulgarly called the 'Lantern of Demosthenes,' was dedicated by Lysicrates in B.C. 335-34, as we learn from an inscription on the architrave, which records that 'Lysicrates, son of Lysitheides of Cicyna, was choragus, when the boys of Acamantis conquered, when Theon played the flute, when Lysias wrote the piece, and when Euaenetus was archon.' It was the practice of the victorious choragi to dedicate to Dionysus the tripods which they had gained in the contests in the theatre. Some of these tripods were placed upon small temples, which were erected either in the precincts of the theatre, or in a street which ran along the eastern side of the Acropolis, from the Prytaneum to the Lenaean, or sacred enclosure of Dionysus near the theatre, and which was hence called the 'Street of Tripods.' (Paus. i. 20, § 1.) Of these temples only two now remain: the monument of Thrasyllus, and the monument of Lysicrates, which stood in the street itself. It appears that this street was formed entirely by a series of such monuments, and that from the inscriptions engraved on the architraves the dramatic chronicles or didascaliae were mainly compiled. The monument of Lysicrates is of the Corinthian order. It is a small circular building on a square base, of white marble, and covered by a cupola, supported by six Corinthian columns. Its whole height was 34 feet, of which the square basis was 14 feet (not shown in the cut), the body of the building to the summit of the columns 12 feet, and the entablature, together with the cupola and apex, 8 feet. There was no access to the interior, which was only six feet in diameter. The frieze, of which there are casts in the British Museum, represents the destruction of the Tyrrhenian pirates by Dionysus and his attendants.

Lýsimáchia or -ēa (Λυσιμαχία, Λυσιμάχεια; Λυσιμαχεύς). 1. (Eksemil), an important town on the NE. of the gulf of Melas, and on the isthmus connecting the Thracian Chersonesus with the mainland, was founded B. C. 309 by Lysimachus, who removed to his new city the greater part of the inhabitants of the neighbouring town of Cardia (Strab. pp. 134, 331; Diod. x. 29; Pol. v. 34). It was subsequently destroyed by the Thracians, but was restored by Antiochus the Great (Liv. xxxiii. 38). Under the Romans it greatly declined; but Justinian built a strong fortress on the spot, which he called Hexamilium (Ἑξαμίλιον), doubtless from the width of the isthmus, under which name it is mentioned in the middle ages.—2. A town in the SW. of Aetolia, near Pleuron, situated on a lake of the same name, which was more anciently called Hydra (Strab. p. 460).

Lýsimáchos (Λυσίμαχος), king of Thrace, was a Macedonian by birth, and one of Alexander's generals, but of mean origin, his father Agathocles having been originally a Penest or serf in Sicily (Arrian, Anab. vi. 28). He was early distinguished for his undaunted courage, as well as for his great activity and strength of body. We are told by Q. Curtius that Lysimachus, when hunting in Syria, had killed a lion of immense size single-handed; and this circumstance is regarded by that writer as the origin of a fable gravely related by many authors, that on account of some offence, Lysimachus had been shut up by order of Alexander in the same den with a lion, but, though unarmed, had succeeded in destroying the animal, and was pardoned by the country of the Getae; but he was reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, and was ultimately compelled to surrender with his whole army. Dromichaetes, king of the Getae, treated him with the utmost generosity, and restored him to liberty. In 288 Lysimachus united with Ptolemy, Seleucus and Pyrrhus in a common league against Demetrius, who had for some years been in possession of Macedonia, and was now preparing to march into Asia. Next year, 287, Lysimachus and Pyrrhus invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was abandoned by his own troops, and was compelled to seek safety in flight. Pyrrhus for a time obtained possession of the Macedonian throne, but he was expelled by Lysimachus in 286. Lysimachus was now in possession of all the dominions in Europe that had formed part of the Macedonian monarchy, as well as of the greater part of Asia Minor. He remained in undisturbed possession of these vast dominions till shortly before his death. His downfall was occasioned by a dark domestic tragedy. His wife Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy Soter, had long hated her stepson Agathocles, and at length, by false accusations, induced Lysimachus to put his son to death (Just. xvii. 1). This bloody deed alienated the minds of his subjects, and many cities of Asia broke out into open revolt. Lysandra, the widow of Agathocles, fled with her children to the court of Seleucus, who forthwith invaded the dominions of Lysimachus. The two monarchs met in the plain of Corus (Corupedium), and Lysimachus fell in the battle that ensued, B. C. 281. (Paus. i. 10; Appian, Syr. 62.) He was in his eightieth year at the time of his death.—Lysimachus founded LYSIMACHIA, on the Hellespont, and also enlarged and rebuilt many other cities.

Lysimelia (ἡ Λυσιμέλεια λίμνη), a marsh near Syracuse in Sicily, probably the same as the marsh anciently called Syraco from which the town of Syracuse is said to have derived its name (Thuc. viii. 53; Theoc. xvi. 84; SYRACUSÆ.)

Lysinöe (Λυσινόη; Agelan?), a town in Pisidia, S. of the lake Ascania (Liv. xxxviii. 15).

Lysippus (Λύσιππος), of Sicyon, one of the greatest Greek sculptors, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Originally a simple workman in bronze (faber acerrimus), he rose to the eminence which he afterwards obtained by the direct study of nature (Plin. xxxiv. 61). He rejected many of the old conventional rules which the early artists followed. He followed the school of Polyclitus, but changed the canons of it in many points, especially in making the head smaller and the body more slender. He aimed at idealising human beauty rather than that the king in consideration of his courage (Curt. viii. 1, 15; Plut. Demetr. 27; Paus. i. 9, 5; Sen. de Ir. iii. 17). In the division of the provinces, after the death of Alexander (B. C. 323), Thrace and the neighbouring countries as far as the Danube were assigned to Lysimachus. For some years he was actively engaged in war with the warlike barbarians that bordered his province on the N. At length, in 315, he joined the league which Ptolemy, Seleucus and Cassander had formed against Antigonus; but he did not take any active part in the war for some time. In 306 he took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander. In 302 Lysimachus crossed over into Asia Minor to oppose Antigonus, while Seleucus also advanced against the latter from the East. In 301 Lysimachus and Seleucus effected a junction, and gained a decisive victory at Ipsus over Antigonus and his son Demetrius (Diod. xx. 106). Antigonus fell on the field, and Demetrius became a fugitive. The conquerors divided between them the dominions of the vanquished; and Lysimachus obtained for his share all that part of Asia Minor extending from the Hellespont and the Aegæan to the heart of Phrygia. In 291 Lysimachus crossed the Danube and penetrated into the heart of

at idealising human beauty rather than that of the gods, and at representing the grace and mobility of the male figure. He made statues of gods, it is true, and among them of Zeus; but even in this field of art his favourite subject was the human hero Heracles. The works of Lysippus are said to have amounted to the enormous number of 1500. They were almost all, if not all, in bronze; in consequence of which none of them are extant. He made statues of Alexander at all periods of life, and in many different positions, which exercised considerable influence on succeeding art. Alexander's edict is well known, that no one should paint him but Apelles, and no one make his statue but Lysippus. (Plin. vii. 125; Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 240; Cic. Fam. v. 12.)

Lýsis (Λύσις), an eminent Pythagorean philosopher, who, driven out of Italy in the persecution of his sect, betook himself to Thebes, and became the teacher of Epaminondas, by whom he was held in the highest esteem (Paus. ix. 13; Cic. de Or. iii. 34, 139, Off. i. 44, 155).

Lýsis, a river of Caria, only mentioned by Livy (xxxviii. 15).

Lysistrátus, of Sicily, the brother of Lysippus, was a sculptor, and devoted himself to the making of portraits. He was the first who took a cast of the human face in gypsum; and from this mould he produced copies by pouring into it melted wax (Plin. xxxv. 153).

Lystra (ἡ Λύστρα, τὰ Λύστρα: Khatyn-serai, Ru.), a city of Lycaonia, on the confines of Isauria (Act. Apost. xiv. 8, 21; Plin. v. 147).

M.

Măcae (Μάκαι). 1. A people on the E. coast of Arabia Felix, probably about Muscat (Ptol. vi. 7, 14).—2. An inland people of Lihya, in the Regio Syrtica—that is, the part of N. Africa between the Syrtes (Hdt. iv. 175).

Macalla, a town on the E. coast of Bruttium, which was said to possess the tomb and a sanctuary of Philoctetes (Lycophr. Alex. 927).

Măcăr or Măcăreus (Μάκαρ or Μακαρεύς). 1. Son of Helios (or Crinacus) and Rhodos, fled from Rhodes to Leshos after the murder of Tenages (Il. xxiv. 544; Diod. v. 56).—2. Son of Aeolus, who committed incest with his sister Canace. [CANACE].—3. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Mermerus or Mormorus (Hyt. Fab. 239).—4. Of Lesbos, father of ISSA, hence called Macareis (Diod. v. 81; Ov. Met. vi. 124).

Macăria (Μακαρία), daughter of Heracles and Deianira (Paus. i. 32; Eur. Heracle.).

Maccabaei (Μακκαβαῖοι), the descendants of the family of the heroic Judas Maccabi or Maccabaeus, who successfully resisted the tyranny of Antiochus in Judaea. [For their history see Dict. of the Bible.]

Măcêdônia (Μακεδονία: Μακεδόνες), a country in Europe, said to have derived its name from Macednus, or Macedon, a son of Zeus, and Thyia, a daughter of Deucalion (Apollod. iii. 8, 1). The name first occurs in Herodotus, but another form was Macêtia (Μακετία); and accordingly the Macedonians are sometimes called Maccetae (Hesych. s. v.; Sil. It. xiii. 878; Stat. Silv. iv. 6). The country is said to have been originally named Emathia. Herodotus understood by the name Macedonis only the country to the S. and W. of the river Lydias (Hdt. vii. 127); but the boundaries of the ancient Macedonian monarchy, before the time of Philip, the father of Alexander, were: on the S. Olympus and the Cambunian mountains, which separated it from Thessaly and Epirus; on the E. the river Strymon, which separated it from Thrace (Thuc. ii. 99); and on the N. and W. Illyria and Paconia, from which it was divided by no well defined limits. Macedonia was greatly enlarged by the conquests of Philip. He added to his kingdom Paconia on the N., so that the mountains Scordus and Oherlus now separated it from Moesia; a part of Thrace on the E. as far as the river Nestus, which Thracian district was usually called Macedonia adjecta; the peninsula Chalcidice on the S.; and on the W. a part of Illyria, as far as the lake Lychinitis. On the conquest of the country by the Romans, b.c. 168, Macedonia was divided into four districts, paying a land tax to Rome: they were quite independent of one another and had each a republican form of government and a general council:—(1) the country between the Strymon and the Nestus, with a part of Thrace E. of the Nestus, as far as the Hebrus, and also including the territory of Heraclea Sintica and Bisaltice, W. of the Strymon: the capital of this district was Amphipolis; (2) the country between the Strymon and the Axios, exclusive of those parts already named, but including Chalcidice: the capital Thessalonica; (3) the country between the Axios and Peneus: the capital Pella; (4) the mountainous country in the W.: the capital Pelagonia. (Liv. xlv. 17, 18, 30). After the conquest of the Achaeans, in 146, Macedonia was formed into a Roman province, and Thessaly and Illyria were incorporated with it; but at the same time the district E. of the Nestus was again assigned to Thrace. The Roman province of Macedonia accordingly extended at first as far S. as the province of Achaia, including in its limits Epirus; but under the empire its SE. limit was the Sinus Maliacus, and Epirus was detached from it. Thus it extended on the Aegaeon coast from the river Nestus to Oeta and the Sinus Maliacus and on the Adriatic coast from the river Drilon to the Aous (Ptol. iii. 17, 7.) It was originally governed by a proconsul; it was made by Tiberius one of the provinces of the Caesar; but it was restored to the senate by Claudius. Under Diocletian four provinces were carved out of Macedonia: (1) Thessaly; (2) Epirus Nova (the Illyrian coast); (3) Macedonia Prima; (4) Macedonia Secunda or Salutaris.—Macedonia may be described as a large plain, surrounded on three sides by lofty mountains. Through this plain, however, run many smaller ranges of mountains, between which are wide and fertile valleys, extending from the coast far into the interior. The chief mountains were SCORDUS, or SCARDUS, on the NW. frontier, towards Illyria and Dardania; further E. ORBELUS and SCOMIUS, which separated it from Moesia; and RHODOPE, which extended from Scomius in a SE. direction, forming the boundary between Macedonia and Thrace. On the S. frontier were the CAMBUNI MONTES and OLYMPUS. The chief rivers were in the direction of E. to W., the NESTUS, the STRYMON, the AXIUS, the largest of all, the LUDIAS or LYDIAS, and the HALIACMON.—The great bulk of the inhabitants of Macedonia consisted of Thracian and Illyrian tribes. At an early period some Greek tribes settled in the S. part of the country. They are said to have come from Argos, and to have been led by Gananus, Aëropus, and Perdicas, three descendants of Temenus, the Heraclid. Perdicas, the youngest of the brothers, was looked upon as the founder of the Macedonian monarchy (Hdt. viii. 138). A later tradition, however, regarded Caranus, who was also a Heraclid from Argos, as the founder of the monarchy. These Greek settlers intermarried with the original inhabitants of the country. The dialect which they spoke was akin to the Doric, but it contained many barbarous words and forms; and the Macedonians were accordingly never regarded by the other Greeks as genuine Hellenes. Moreover, it was only in the S. of Macedonia that the Greek language was spoken; in the N. and NW. of the country the Illyrian tribes continued to speak their own language and to preserve their ancient habits and customs.

Obv., head of Artemis in shield; rev., ΜΑΚΕΔΟΝΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΗΣ and club of Heracles, surrounded by oak-wreath. This is a coin of the first region, struck when the Roman senate gave the Macedonian regions the right of coining silver, in 158 B.C.

Very little is known of the history of Macedonia till the reign of Amyntas I., who was a contemporary of Darius Hystaspis; but from that time their history is more or less intimately connected with that of Greece, till at length Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, became the virtual master of the whole of Greece. The conquests of Alexander extended the Macedonian supremacy over a great part of Asia; and the Macedonian kings continued to exercise their sovereignty over Greece till the conquest of Perseus by the Romans, 168, brought the Macedonian monarchy to a close. The details of the Macedonian history are given in the lives of the separate kings.

Macella (Macellaro), a small fortified town in the W. of Sicily, about fifteen miles E. of Segesta (Pol. i. 24).

Macer, Aemilius. 1. A Roman poet, a native of Verona, died in Asia, B.C. 16. He wrote a poem or poems upon birds, snakes, and medicinal plants, in imitation, it would appear, of the Theriaca of Nicander (Serv. ad Æcl. v. 1; Quintil. x. 1, 87; Ov. Trist. iv. 10, 43). The work now extant entitled Aemilius Macer de Herbarum Virtutibus belongs to the middle ages.—2. We must carefully distinguish from Aemilius Macer of Verona a poet Macer who wrote on the Trojan war, and who must have been alive in A.D. 12, since he is addressed by Ovid in that year (ex Pont. ii. 10, 2).—3. A Roman jurist, who lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. He wrote several works, extracts from which are given in the Digest.

Macer, Clōdīus, was governor of Africa at Nero's death, A.D. 68, when he laid claim to the throne. He was murdered at the instigation of Galba by the procurator Trebonius Garucianus. (Tac. Hist. i. 7, iv. 49; Suet. Galb. 11.)

Macer, Licinīus. [LICINIUS.]

Macestus (Μάκιστος: Simaul-Su, and lower Susugherli), a considerable river of Mysia, rises in the NW. of Phrygia, and flows N. through Mysia into the Rhyndacus (Strab. p. 576). It is probably the same river which Polybius (v. 77) calls Megistus (Μέγιστος).

Machaerūs (Μαχαίρουσ: Μαχαίρηνς), a strong border fortress in the S. of Peraea, in Palestine, on the confines of the Nabathaei: a stronghold of the Sicarii in the Jewish war (Jos. Ant. xiii. 16, B. J. vii. 6).

Machanīdas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, succeeded Lycurgus about B.C. 210. Like his predecessor, he had no hereditary title to the crown, but ruled by the swords of his mercenaries alone. He was defeated and slain in battle by Philopoemen, the general of the Achaeans in 207. (Pol. xi. 11, xiii. 6; Plut. Philop. 10.)

Māchāon (Μαχάων), son of Asclepius [see p. 131], was married to Anticlea, the daughter of Diocles, by whom he became the father of Gorgasus, Nicomachus, Alexanor, Sphyrus, and Polemocrates. Together with his brother Podalirius he went to Troy with thirty ships, commanding the men who came from Tricca, Ithome, and Oechalia. In this war he acted as the surgeon of the Greeks, and also distinguished himself in battle. He was himself wounded by Paris, but was carried from the field by Nestor (Il. ii. 729, iv. 193, xi. 505, 512, 598). Later writers mention him as one of the Greek heroes who were concealed in the wooden horse (Verg. Aen. ii. 263) and he is said to have cured Philoctetes (Tzet. ad Lyc. 911; Propert. ii. 1, 59). He was killed by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, and received divine honours at Gerenia (Paus. iv. 3, 2).

Machlŷes (Μάχλυες), a people of Libya, near the Lotophagi, on the W. side of the lake Triton, in what was afterwards called Africa Propria (Hdt. iv. 179; Ptol. iv. 14, 11).

Machon (Μάχων), of Corinth or Sicyon, a comic poet, flourished at Alexandria, where he gave instructions respecting comedy to the grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium (Athen. pp. 241, 664).

Macistus or Macistum (Μάκιστος, Μάκιστον: Μάκιστιος), a town of Elis in Triphylia, NE. of Lepreum, originally called Platanistum (Πλατανιστοῦς), and founded by the Caucones (Hdt. iv. 148; Strab. pp. 343, 345).

Macorāba (Μακορίζα: Mecca), a city in the W. of Arabia Felix; probably a sacred city of the Arabs before the time of Mohammed.

Macra (Magra), a small river rising in the Apennines and flowing into the Ligurian sea near Luna, which, from the time of Augustus, formed the boundary between Liguria and Etruria (Strab. p. 222; Plin. iii. 48).

Macriānus, one of the Thirty Tyrants, a distinguished general, who accompanied Valerian in his expedition against the Persians, A.D. 260. On the capture of that monarch, Macrianus was proclaimed emperor, together with his two sons Macrianus and Quietus. He assigned the management of affairs in the East to Quietus, and set out with the younger Macrianus for Italy. They were encountered by Aureolus on the confines of Thrace and Ilyria, defeated and slain, 262. Quietus was shortly afterwards slain in the East by Odenathus (Treb. Trig. Tyr. 12).

Macri Campi. [CAMPI MACRI.]

Macrinus, M. Opilius Sevērus, Roman emperor, April, A.D. 217–June, 218. He was born at Caesarea in Mauretania, of humble parents, A.D. 164, and rose at length to be praefect of the praetorians under Caracalla. He accompanied Caracalla in his expedition against the Parthians, and was proclaimed emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he had caused to be assassinated. He conferred the title of Caesar upon his son Diadumenianus, and at the same time gained great popularity by repealing some obnoxious taxes. But in the course of the same year he was defeated with great loss by the Parthians, and was obliged to retire into Syria. While here his soldiers, with whom he had become unpopular by enforcing among them order and discipline, proclaimed Elagabalus as emperor. With the troops which remained faithful to him, Macrinus marched against the usurper, but was defeated, and fled in disguise. He was shortly afterwards seized in Chalcedon, and put to death, after a reign of 14 months. (Vit. Macrin.; Dio Cass. lxxxviii. 11-41.)

Macro, Naevius Sertorius, a favourite of the emperor Tiberius, was employed to arrest the powerful Sejanus in A.D. 31, after whose death he was praefect of the praetorians during the remainder of Tiberius's reign and the earlier part of Caligula's. Macro was as cruel as Sejanus. He laid informations; he presided at the rack; and he lent himself to the most savage caprices of Tiberius during the last and worst period of his government. During the lifetime of Tiberius he paid court to the young Caligula; and he promoted an intrigue between his wife Ennia and the young prince. It was rumoured that Macro shortened the last moments of Tiberius by stifling him with the bedding as he recovered unexpectedly from a swoon. But Caligula became jealous of Macro, and compelled him to kill himself with his wife and children, 38. (Tac. Ann. vi. 15, 29, 45-50; Suet. Tib. 73; Dio Cass. lviii. 9-23, lix. 1-10.)

Macrobii (Μακρόβιοι, i.e. Long-lived), an Aethiopian people in Africa, placed by Herodotus (iii. 17) on the shores of the S. Ocean, i.e. probably beyond the S. frontier of Egypt (cf. Plin. vi. 190; Mel. iii. 9).

Macrocéphali (Μακροκέφαλοι), i.e. 'the people with long heads,' a tribe in the Caucasus (Strab. pp. 43, 520; Plin. vi. 11).

Macrobiius, the grammarian, whose full name was Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius Macrobius. All we know about him is that he lived in the age of Honorius and Theodosius, that he was probably a Greek, and that he had a son named Eustathius. He states in the preface to his Saturnalia that Latin was to him a foreign tongue, and hence we may fairly conclude that he was a Greek by birth, more especially as we find numerous Greek idioms in his style. He may be the same as the Macrobius who in 399 was praefect of Spain, and in 422 was praef. sacri cubiculi. If so, he must have been converted to Christianity before he held the latter office and after he wrote his books, which are clearly the work of a pagan (Cod. Theodos. vi. 8, 1, xvi. 10, 15). His extant works are:—(1) Saturnaliorum Conviviorum Libri VII., consisting of a series of dissertations on history, mythology, criticism, and various points of antiquarian research, supposed to have been delivered during the holidays of the Saturnalia at the house of Vettius Praetextatus, who was invested with the highest offices of state under Valentinian and Valens. The form of the work is avowedly copied from the dialogues of Plato, especially the Banquet: in substance it bears a strong resemblance to the Noctes Atticae of A. Gellius. The first book treats of the festivals of Saturnus and Janus, of the Roman calendar, &c. The second book commences with a collection of bons mots, ascribed to the most celebrated wits of antiquity; to these are appended a series of essays on matters connected with the pleasures of the table. The four following books are devoted to criticisms on Virgil. The seventh book is of a more miscellaneous character than the preceding.—(2) Commentarius ex Cicerone in Somnium Scipionis, a tract much studied during the middle ages. The Dream of Scipio, contained in the sixth book of Cicero's De Republica, is taken as a text, which suggests a succession of discourses on the physical constitution of the universe, according to the views of the Neo-Platonists, together with notices of some of their peculiar tenets on mind as well as matter.—(3) De Differentiis et Societatibus Graeci Latiniq; Verbi, a treatise purely grammatical, of which only an abridgment is extant, compiled by a certain Joannes.—The best editions of the works of Macrobius are by Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1670; L. Janus, 1852; and Eyssenhardt, Lips. 1868.

Macrōnes (Μάκρωνες), a warlike Caucasian people on the NE. shore of the Pontus Euxinus (Hdt. ii. 104, vii. 78; Plin. vi. 11).

Macynia (Μακυνία; Μακυνεύς), a town in the S. of Aetolia, near the mountain Taphiassus, E. of Calydon and the Evenus (Strab. pp. 451, 460).

Madianitae (Μαδιανίται, Μαδιηναίοι, Μαδιηνοί; O. T. Midianim), a powerful nomad people in the S. of Arabia Petraea, about the head of the Red Sea (see Dict. of the Bible).

Madÿtus (Μάδυτος; Μαδύτιος; Maito), a seaport town on the Thracian Chersonesus (Strab. p. 331; Liv. xxxi. 16).

Maeander (Μαλανδρος; Mendereh or Meinder, or Boyuk-Mendereh, i.e. the Great Mendereh, in contradistinction to the Little Mendereh, the ancient Cayster), has its source in the mountain called Aulocrenas, above Celaenae, in the S. of Phrygia, close to the source of the Marsyas, which immediately joins it. [CELAENAE.] It flows in a general W. direction, with various changes of direction, but on the whole with a slight inclination to the S. After leaving Phrygia, it flows parallel to Mt. Messogis, on its S. side, forming the boundary between Lydia and Caria, and at last falls into the Icarian Sea between Myus and Priene. Its whole length is above 170 geographical miles. The Maeander is deep, but narrow, and very turbid; and therefore not navigable far up. Its upper course lies chiefly through elevated plains, and partly in a deep rocky valley: its lower course, for the last 110 miles, is through a beautiful wide plain, through which it flows in those numerous windings that have made its name a descriptive verb (to meander), and which it often inundates. The alteration made in the coast about its mouth by its alluvial deposit was observed by the ancients, and it has been continually going on. [See LATICUS SINUS and MILETUS.] The chief tributaries of the Maeander were, on the right or N. side, the Cludrus, Lethaeus, and Gaeson, and, on the left or S. side, the Obrimus, Lycus, Harpasus, and Marsyas. (Il. ii. 869; Hes. Th. 339; Hdt. vii. 26; Xen. An. i. 2, 7; Strab. p. 577; Ov. Met. viii. 162.)—As a god Maeander is described as the father of the nymph Cyane, who was the mother of Cauus. Hence the latter is called by Ovid (Met. ix. 573) Maecandrius juvenis.

Maecenas, C. Cilnius, was born some time between B.C. 73 and 63; and we learn from Horace (Od. iv. 11) that his birthday was the 13th of April. His family, though belonging wholly to the equestrian order, was of high antiquity and honour, and traced its descent from the Lucumones of Etruria. His paternal ancestors, the Cilnii, are mentioned by Livy (x. 3, 5) as having attained great power and wealth at Arretium about B.C. 301. The maternal branch of the family was also of Etruscan origin, and it was from them that the name of Maecenas was derived, it being customary among the Etruscans to assume the mother's as well as the father's name. It is in allusion to this circumstance that Horace (Sat. i. 6, 3) mentions both his avus maternus atque paternus as having been distinguished by commanding numerous legions; a passage, by the way, from which we are not to infer that the ancestors of Maecenas had ever led the Roman legions. Although it is unknown where Maecenas received his education, it must doubtless have been a careful one. We learn from Horace that he was versed both in Greek and Roman literature; and his taste for literary pursuits was shown, not only by his patronage of the most eminent poets of his time, but also by several performances of his own, both in verse and prose. It has been conjectured that he became acquainted with Augustus at Apollonia before the death of Julius Caesar; but he is mentioned for the first time in B.C. 40, and from this year his name constantly occurs as one of the chief friends and ministers of Augustus. Thus we find him employed in B.C. 37 in negotiating with Antony; and it was probably on this occasion that Horace accompanied him to Brundisium, a journey which he has described in the fifth Satire of the first book. During the war with Antony, which was brought to a close by the battle of Actium, Maecenas remained at Rome, being entrusted with the administration of the civil affairs of Italy. During this time he suppressed the conspiracy of the younger Lepidus. It is probable, therefore, that he was not present at the battle of Actium; but it seems that he had intended to go to the war, for it is better to refer Hor. Epod. i. to that battle than, as some critics do, to the Sicilian expedition against Sext. Pompeius. On the return of Augustus from Actium, Maecenas enjoyed a greater share of his favour than ever, and, in conjunction with Agrippa, had the management of all public affairs. It is related that Augustus at this time took counsel with Agrippa and Maecenas respecting the expediency of restoring the republic; that Agrippa advised him to pursue that course, but that Maecenas strongly urged him to establish the empire. For many years Maecenas was trusted and honoured by Augustus; but between B.C. 21 and 16 he seems to have lost the favour of the emperor, and after the latter year he retired entirely from public life. The cause of this estrangement is enveloped in doubt. Dio Cassius attributes it to an intrigue carried on by Augustus with Terentia, Maecenas's wife, but the authority of Suetonius is better, and we should probably accept his account of the matter, that Maecenas had revealed to his wife that the conspiracy of her brother Murena had been discovered, and thus the conspirators were warned. This was regarded as an indiscretion which forfeited confidence, and Maecenas was not made praefectus urbi when that office was constituted, in 16, though in previous years he had as minister of Augustus, done much that would have belonged to the post. (Suet. Aug. 66; Dio Cass. liv. 19.) Maecenas died B.C. 8, and was buried on the Esquiline. He left no children, and he bequeathed his property to Augustus, who had continued or renewed his friendship, though without official appointments.

—Maecenas had amassed an enormous fortune. He had purchased a tract of ground on the Esquiline hill, which had formerly served as a burial-place for the lower orders (Hor. Sat. i. 8, 7). Here he had planted a garden and built a house, remarkable for its loftiness, on account of a tower by which it was surmounted, and from the top of which Nero is said to have afterwards contemplated the burning of Rome. In this residence he seems to have passed the greater part of his time, and to have visited the country but seldom. His house was the rendezvous of all the wits of Rome; and whoever could contribute to the amusement of the company was always welcome to a seat at his table. But his really intimate friends consisted of the greatest geniuses and most learned men of Rome; and if it was from his universal inclination towards men of talent that he obtained the reputation of a literary patron, it was by his friendship for such poets as Virgil and Horace that he deserved it. Virgil was indebted to him for the recovery of his farm, which had been appropriated by the soldiery in the division of lands, in B.C. 41; and it was at the request of Maecenas that he undertook the Georgics, the most finished of all his poems. [VERGIlius.] To Horace he was a still greater benefactor. He presented him with the means of comfortable subsistence, a farm in the Sabine country. If the estate was but a moderate one, we learn from Horace himself that the bounty of Maecenas was regulated by his own contented views and not by his patron's want of generosity. [For the relation between Horace and Maecenas, see HORATIUS.]—Of Maecenas's own literary productions only a few fragments exist. From these, however, and from the notices which we find of his writings in ancient authors, we are led to think that we have not suffered any great loss by their destruction; for, although a good judge of literary merit in others, he does not appear to have been an author of much taste himself. In his way of life Maecenas was addicted to every species of luxury. We find several allusions in the ancient authors to the effeminacy of his dress. He was fond of theatrical entertainments, especially pantomimes, as may be inferred from his patronage of Bathyllus, the celebrated dancer, who was a freedman of his. That moderation of character which led him to be content with his equestrian rank, probably arose from his love of ease and luxury, or it might have been the result of more prudent and political views. As a politician, the principal trait in his character was fidelity to his master, and the main end of all his cares was the consolidation of the empire. But at the same time he recommended Augustus to put no check on the free expression of public opinion, and above all to avoid that cruelty which for so many years had stained the Roman annals with blood.

Maedi. [MAEDICA.]
Maecius Tarpa. [TARPA.]

Maedica (Μαιδική), the country of the Maedi, a powerful people in the W. of Thrace, on the W. bank of the Strymon, and the S. slope of Mt. Scomius. They frequently made inroads into the country of the Macedonians, till at length they were conquered by the latter, and their land incorporated with Macedonia. (Thuc. ii. 98; Strab. pp. 316, 331; Liv. xxvi. 25.)

Maelius, Sp., the richest of the plebeian knights, employed his fortune in buying up corn in Etruria in the great famine at Rome in B.C. 440. This corn he sold to the poor at a small price, or distributed it gratuitously. Such liberality gained him the favour of the plebeians, but at the same time exposed him to the hatred of the ruling class, particularly of the praefectus annonae, C. Minucius. Accordingly in the following year he was accused of having formed a conspiracy for the purpose of seizing the kingly power. Thereupon Cincinnatus was appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala, the master of the horse. Maelius was summoned to appear before the tribunal of the dictator; but as he refused to go, Ahala, with an armed band of patrician youths, rushed into the crowd, and slew him. His property was confiscated, and his house pulled down; its vacant site, which was called the Aequimaelium, continued to subsequent ages a memorial of his fate. Later ages fully believed the story of Maelius's conspiracy, and Cicero repeatedly praises the glorious deed of Ahala. But his guilt is very doubtful. Ahala was brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. (Liv. iv. 13; Cic. de Sen. 8, 28, de Rep. ii. 27; Flor. i. 26; Val. Max. vi. 3.)

Maenāca (Μαινάκη), a town of Hispania Baetica on the coast, the most westerly colony of the Phocaeans (Strab. p. 156).

Maenādes (Μαινάδες), a name of the Bacchantes, from μαίνομαι, 'to be mad,' because they were frenzied in the worship of Dionysus.

Maenade or Bacchantia, with snake-bound hair. (Thiersch. Ueber die hellenischen bemalten Vasen.)

Maenālus (τὸ Μαίναλον or Μαινάλιον ὄρος: Roionon), a mountain in Arcadia, which extended from Megalopolis to Tegea, was celebrated as the favourite haunt of the god Pan (Strab. p. 388; Paus. viii. 36, 7; Verg. Ecl. viii. 22). From this mountain the surrounding country was called Maenālia (Μαιναλία); and on the mountain was a town Maenalus (Thuc.

v. 64; Paus. iii. 11, 7). The mountain was so celebrated that the Roman poets frequently use the adjectives Maenalius and Maenalis as equivalent to Arcadian.

Maenius. 1. C., consul, B.C. 338, with L. Furius Camillus. The two consuls completed the subjugation of Latium; they were both rewarded with a triumph; and equestrian statues were erected to their honour in the forum (Liv. viii. 13). The statue of Maenius was placed upon a column, which is spoken of by later writers under the name of Columna Maenia, and which appears to have stood near the end of the forum, on the Capitoline. Maenius was dictator in 320, and censor in 318. In his censorship he allowed balconies to be added to the various buildings surrounding the forum, in order that the spectators might obtain more room for beholding the games which were exhibited in the forum; and these balconies were called after him Maeniana (Dict. of Antiq. s. v.).—2. The proposer of the law, about 286, which required the patres to give their sanction to the election of the magistrates before they had been elected, or, in other words, to confer, or agree to confer, the imperium on the person whom the comitia should elect (Cic. Brut. 14).—3. A contemporary of Lucilius, was a great spendthrift, who squandered all his property, and afterwards supported himself by playing the buffoon. He possessed a house in the forum, which Cato in his censorship (184) purchased of him, for the purpose of building the Basilica Porcia. (Hor. Sat. i. 1, 101, i. 3, 21, Epist. i. 15, 26.)

Maenōba (Μαινοβα), a town in the SE. of Hispania Baetica, near the coast, on a river of the same name (Mel. ii. 6, 7; Strab. p. 143).

Maeon (Μαίων), son of Haemon of Thebes. He and Lycophontes were the leaders of the band that lay in ambush against Tydeus, in the war of the Seven against Thebes. Maeon was the only one whose life was spared by Tydeus. Maeon in return buried Tydeus, when the latter was slain. (Il. iv. 394; Paus. ix. 18, 2.)

Maecōnia. [LYDIA.]

Maecōnides. [HOMERUS.]

Maecōtae. [MAEOTIS PALUS.]

Maecōtis Palus (ἡ Μαίωτις λίμνη: Sea of Azov), an inland sea on the borders of Europe and Asia, N. of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), with which it communicates by the BOSPORUS CIMMERIUS. Its form may be described roughly as a triangle, with its vertex at its NE. extremity, where it receives the waters of the great river Tanaïs (Don): it discharges its superfluous water by a constant current into the Euxine. The ancients had very vague notions of its true form and size; the earlier geographers thought that both it and the Caspian Sea were gulfs of the great N. Ocean (Hdt. iv. 86; Strab. pp. 125, 307, 493; Plin. iv. 24). The Scythian tribes on its banks were called by the collective name of Maecōtae or Maecōtici (Μαιώται, Μαιωτικοί). The sea had also the names of Cimmerium or Bosporicum Mare. Aeschylus (Prom. 731) applies the name of Maecōtic Strait to the Cimmerian Bosporus (ἀλλὰν Μαιωτικὸς).

Maera (Μαίρα). 1. The dog of Icarius, the father of Erigone. [ICARIUS, No. 1.]—2. Daughter of Proetus and Antea, a companion of Artemis, by whom she was killed, after she had become by Zeus the mother of Locrus (Od.

xi. 325).—3. Daughter of Atlas, was married to Tegeates, the son of Lycaon. Her tomb was shown both at Tegea and Mantinea in Arcadia (Paus. viii. 12, 4).

Maesa, Julia, sister-in-law of Septimius Severus, aunt of Caracalla, and grandmother of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and seems, after the elevation of Septimius Severus, the husband of her sister Julia Domna, to have lived at the imperial court until the death of Caracalla, and to have accumulated great wealth. She contrived and executed the plot which transferred the supreme power from Macrinus to her grandson Elagabalus. When she foresaw the downfall of the latter, she prevailed on him to adopt his cousin Alexander Severus. By Severus she was treated with the greatest respect; she enjoyed the title of Augusta during her life, and received divine honours after her death. [ELAGABALUS; SEVERUS.]

Maeson (Μαίρων), a comic actor, of Megara (whether the Sicilian or the Grecian Megara is disputed), from whom came the term σκάρμματα μαιρωνικά, for coarse jokes (Athen. p. 659). To him was attributed the proverb, Ἄντ' ἐνεργεσίης Ἀγαμέμνονα δῆσαν Ἀχαιοί.

Maeuius. [BAVIUS.]

Magäba, a mountain in Galatia, 10 Roman miles E. of Ancyra (Liv. xxxviii. 19).

Magas (Μάγας), king of Cyrene, was a stepson of Ptolemy Soter, being the son of Berenice by a former marriage. He was a Macedonian by birth; and he seems to have accompanied his mother to Egypt, where he soon rose to a high place in the favour of Ptolemy. In B.C. 308 he was appointed to the command of the expedition destined for the recovery of Cyrene after the death of Ophellas. The enterprise was successful, and Magas obtained the government of the province. At first he ruled it only as a dependency of Egypt, but after the death of Ptolemy Soter he not only assumed the character of an independent monarch, but even made war on the king of Egypt. He married Apama, daughter of Antiochus Soter by whom he had a daughter, Berenice, afterwards the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes. He died 258. (Paus. i. 7; Athen. p. 550; Justin. xxvi. 3.)

Magdölum (Μάγδαλον, Μάγδαλον): O. T. Migdol, a city of Lower Egypt, near the NE. frontier, about twelve miles SW. of Pelusium: where Pharaoh Necho defeated the Syrians, according to Herodotus (ii. 159).

Magetobria or Admagetobriga, a town on the W. frontiers of the Sequani, near which the Gauls were defeated by the Germans shortly before Caesar's arrival in Gaul (Caes. B. G. i. 31).

Magi (Μάγοι), the name of the order of priests and religious teachers among the Medes and Persians. There is strong evidence that a class similar to the Magi, and in some cases bearing the same name, existed among other Eastern nations, especially the Chaldeans of Babylon; nor is it at all probable that either the Magi or their religion were of strictly Median or Persian origin: but in classical literature they are presented to us almost exclusively in connexion with Medo-Persian history. Herodotus represents them as one of the six tribes into which the Median people were divided (Hdt. i. 101, 107, 140). Under the Median empire, before the supremacy passed to the Persians, they were so closely connected with the throne, and had so great an influence in the state, that they evidently retained their position after the revolution; and they had power enough to be almost successful in the attempt they made to overthrow the Persian dynasty after the death of Cambyses, by putting forward one of their own number as a pretender to the throne, alleging that he was Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, who had been put to death by his brother Cambyses (Hdt. iii. 67-68). It is clear that this was a plot to restore the Median supremacy. The defeat of this Magian conspiracy by Darius the son of Hystaspes and the other Persian nobles was followed by a general massacre of the Magi, which was celebrated by an annual festival (τὰ Μαγοφόνια), during which no Magian was permitted to appear in public. Still their position as the only ministers of religion remained unaltered. The breaking up of the Persian empire must have greatly altered their condition; but they continue to appear in history down to the time of the later Roman empire, and from them we get our word magic (ἡ μαγική, i.e. the art or science of the Magi).—The constitution or the reformation of the Magi as an order is ascribed by tradition to Zoroaster, as the Greeks and Romans called him. He is said to have restored the true knowledge of the supreme good principle (Ormuzd), and to have taught his worship to the Magi, whom he divided into three classes, learners, masters, and perfect scholars. [ZOROASTER.] They alone could teach the truths and perform the ceremonies of religion, foretell the future, interpret dreams and omens, and ascertain the will of Ormuzd by the arts of divination. They had three chief methods of divination: by calling up the dead, by cups or dishes, and by water. The forms of worship and divination were strictly defined, and were handed down among the Magi by tradition. Like all early priesthoods, they seem to have been the sole possessors of all the science of their age. To be instructed in their learning was esteemed the highest of privileges, and was permitted, with rare exceptions, to none but the princes of the royal family. Their learning became celebrated at an early period in Greece, by the name of μαγεία, and was made the subject of speculation by the philosophers, whose knowledge of it seems, however, to have been very limited; while their high pretensions, and the tricks by which their knowledge of science enabled them to impose upon the ignorant, soon attached to their name among the Greeks and Romans that bad meaning which is still connected with the words derived from it.

Magna Graecia. [GRAECIA.]

Magna Mater. [RHEA.]

Magnentius, Roman emperor in the West, A. D. 350-353, whose full name was FLAVIUS POPILIUS MAGNENTIUS. He was a German by birth, and after serving as a common soldier was eventually intrusted by Constans, the son of Constantine the Great, with the command of the Jovian and Herculan battalions who had replaced the ancient praetorian guards when the empire was remodelled by Diocletian. He availed himself of his position to organise a conspiracy against the weak and profligate Constans, who was put to death by his emissaries. Magnentius thereupon was acknowledged as emperor in all the Western provinces, except Illyria, where Vetranio had assumed the purple. Constantius hurried from the frontier of Persia to crush the usurpers. Vetranio submitted to Constantius at Sardica in December, 350. Magnentius was first defeated by Constantius at the sanguinary battle of Mursa on the Drave, in the autumn of 351, and was obliged to fly into Gaul. He was defeated a second time in the passes of the Cottian Alps, and put an end to his own life about the middle of August, 353. Magnentius was a man of commanding stature and great bodily strength; but not one spark of virtue relieved the blackness of his career as a sovereign. The power which he obtained by treachery and murder he maintained by extortion and cruelty. (Vict. Caes. 41, 42; Zosim. ii. 41-54.)

Magnēs (Μάγνης), one of the most important of the earlier Athenian comic poets of the Old Comedy, was a native of the demus of Icaria or Icarus, in Attica. He flourished B. C. 460, and onwards, and died at an advanced age, shortly before the representation of the Knights of Aristophanes—that is, in 423. (Aristoph. Equit. 524.) He is said to have won a prize for comedy eleven times. He was famed for his mimetic dances (which formed one of the stages in the growth of comedy): for these he used choruses representing animals (in one play, frogs); and in this found an imitator in Aristophanes.

Magnēsia (Μαγνησία: Μάγνης, pl. Μάγνητες). 1. The most easterly district of Thessaly, was a long narrow slip of country, extending from the Peneus on the N. to the Pagasaeon gulf on the S., and bounded on the W. by the great Thessalian plain. It was a mountainous country, as it comprehended the Mts. Ossa and Pelion. Its inhabitants, the Magnetes, are said to have founded the two cities in Asia mentioned below.—2. M. ad Sipylum (M. πρὸς Σιπύλῳ or ὑπὸ Σιπύλῳ: Manissa, Ru.), a city in the NW. of Lydia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of the NW. declivity of Mount Sipylus, and on the S. bank of the Hermus, is famous in history as the scene of the victory gained by the two Scipios over Antiochus the Great, which secured to the Romans the empire of the East, B. C. 190. After the Mithridatic war, the Romans made it a libera civitas. It suffered, with other cities of Asia Minor, from the great earthquake in the reign of Tiberius; but it was still a place of importance in the fifth century. (Strab. p. 622; Liv. xxxvii. 37; Tac. Ann. ii. 47.)—3. M. ad Maeandrum (M. ἡ πρὸς Μαιάνδρῳ, M. ἐπὶ Μαιάνδρῳ: Inek-bazar, Ru.), a city in the SW. of Lydia, in Asia Minor, was situated on the near the confluence of the rivers Lycus and Iris, begun by Mithridates Eupator and finished by Pompey (Strab. p. 556; Appian, Mithr. 73, 115).

Māgo (Μάγων). 1. A Carthaginian, said to have been the founder of the military power of Carthage, by introducing a regular discipline and organisation into her armies (Just. xviii. 7, xix. 1). He flourished from B. C. 550 to 500, and was probably the father of Hamilcar, who was slain in the battle against Gelo at Himera. [HAMILCAR, No. 1].—2. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet under Himilco in the war against Dionysius, 396. When Himilco returned to Africa after the disastrous termination of the expedition, Mago appears to have been invested with the chief command in Sicily. He carried on the war with Dionysius, but in 392 was compelled to conclude a treaty of peace, by which he abandoned his allies the Sicilians to the power of Dionysius. In 383 he again invaded Sicily, but was defeated by Dionysius and slain in the battle. (Diod. xiv. 59, 95, xv. 15.)—3. Commander of the Carthaginian army in Sicily in 344. He assisted Hicetas in the war against Timoleon; but, becoming apprehensive of treachery, he sailed away to Carthage. Here he put an end to his own life, to avoid a worse fate at the hands of his countrymen, who, nevertheless, crucified his lifeless body (Plut. Timol. 17-22).—4. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and youngest brother of the famous Hannibal. He accompanied Hannibal to Italy, and after the battle of Cannae (216) carried the news of this great victory to Carthage. (Pol. iii. 71, 79, 114; Liv. xxi. 54, xxii. 2, 46.) But, instead of returning to Italy, he was sent into Spain with a considerable force to the support of his other brother Hasdrubal, who was hard pressed by the two Scipios (215). He continued in this country for many years; and after his brother Hasdrubal quitted Spain in 208, in order to march to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy, the command in Spain devolved upon him and upon Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. After their decisive defeat by Scipio at Silpia in 206, Mago retired to Gades, and subsequently passed the winter in the lesser of the Balearic islands, where the memory of his sojourn is still preserved in the name of the celebrated harbour, Portus Magonis, or Port Mahon. (Liv. xxviii. 23-37; Appian, Hisp. 25-37.) Early in the ensuing summer (205) Mago landed in Liguria, where he surprised the town of Genoa. Here he maintained himself for two years, but in 203 he was defeated with great loss in Cisalpine Gaul, by Quintilius Varus, and was himself severely wounded. Shortly afterwards he embarked his troops in order to return to Africa, but he died of his wound before reaching Africa. (Liv. xxx. 18; App. Hisp. 37; Zonar. ix. 13.) Cornelius Nepos (Hann. 7, 8), in opposition to all other authorities, represents Mago as surviving the battle of Zama, and says that he perished in a shipwreck, or was assassinated by his slaves.—5. Surnamed the Samnite, was one of the chief officers of Hannibal in Italy, where he held for a considerable time the chief command in Bruttium (Liv. xxv. 15).—6. Commander of the garrison of New Carthage when that city was taken by Scipio Africanus, 209. Mago was sent a prisoner to Rome (Pol. x. 8-19; Liv. xxvi. 44-51).—7. A Carthaginian of uncertain date, who wrote a work upon agriculture in the Punic language, in twenty-eight books. So great was the reputation of this work even at Rome, that after the destruction of Carthage, the senate ordered that it should be translated into Latin river Lethæus, a N. tributary of the Maeander. It was destroyed by the Cimberians (probably about B. C. 700) and rebuilt by colonists from Miletus, so that it became an Ionian city by race as well as by position. It was one of the cities given to Themistocles by Artaxerxes. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis Leucophryene (see coin), one of the most beautiful in Asia Minor, the ruins of which exist. (Hdt. i. 161, iii. 122; Diod. xi. 57; Strab. pp. 636, 647.)

Coin of Magnesia ad Maeandrum (2nd cent. B.C.).

Obv., head of Artemis; rev., ΜΑΓΝΗΣΙΑΝΟΥ; Apollo beside tripod; below these, Maeander pattern, magistrate's name, ΕΥΦΡΟΝΟΣ ΜΑΓΝΗΣΙΑΝΟΥ; whole in oak-wreath.

Magnōpōlis (Μαγνόπολις), or Eupatoria Magnopolis, a city of Pontus, in Asia Minor, by competent persons, at the head of whom was D. Silanus. It was subsequently translated into Greek, with some abridgment and alteration, by Cassius Diouysius of Ūtica. Mago's precepts on agricultural matters are continually cited by the Roman writers on those subjects in terms of the highest commendation. (Varro, R. R. i. 1, 10; Plin. xviii. 22; Colum. R. R. i. 1, 13.)

Magōnis Portus. [MAGO, No. 4.]

Magontiācum. [MOOONTIACUM.]

Maharbal (Μαάρβας), son of Himilco, and one of the most distinguished officers of Hannibal in the second Punic war. He is first mentioned at the siege of Saguntum. After the battle of Cannae he urged Hannibal to push at once with his cavalry upon Rome itself; and on the refusal of his commander, he is said to have observed, that Hannibal knew how to gain victories, but not how to use them. (Liv. xxi. 12, 45, xxii. 13, 46, 51; Flor. ii. 6.)

Maia (Μαῖα or Μαῖάς). 1. Daughter of Atlas and Pleione, was the eldest of the Pleiades, and the most beautiful of the seven sisters. In a grotto of Mt. Cyllene in Arcadia she became by Zeus the mother of HERMES. Arcas, the son of Zeus by Callisto, was given to her to be reared. [PLEIADES].—2. With this deity was sometimes confused an old Italian goddess Maja (= Bona Dea, Ops or Fauna) worshipped at Rome. She is mentioned in connexion with Vulcan, and was regarded by some as the wife of that god, though it seems for no other reason but because a priest of Vulcan offered a sacrifice to her on the 1st of May. [BONA DEA.]

Mājōriānus, Jūlius Vālērius, Roman emperor in the West, A.D. 457–461, was raised to the empire by Ricimer. His reign was chiefly occupied in making preparations to invade the Vandals in Africa; but the immense fleet which he had collected for this purpose in the harbour of New Carthage in Spain was destroyed by the Vandals in 460. Thereupon he concluded a peace with Genseric. His activity and popularity excited the jealousy of Ricimer, who compelled him to abdicate and then put an end to his life (Procop. Vand. i. 7).

Maījūma. [CONSTANTIA, No. 3.]

Malāca (Μαλαγα), an important town on the coast of Hispania Baetica, and on a river of the same name (Guadalmedina), was founded by the Phoenicians, and has always been a flourishing place of commerce (Strab. pp. 156–163; Avien. Or. Mar. 426).

Malalas. [MALELAS.]

Malanga (Μαλάγγα), a city of India, probably the modern Madras (Ptol. vii. 1, 92).

Malchus (Μάλχος), of Philadelphia in Syria, a Byzantine historian and rhetorician, wrote a history of the empire from A.D. 474 to 480, of which we have extracts, published along with Dexippus by Bekker and Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829.

Malēa (Μαλέα ἕκτρα: C. Maria), the S. promontory of the island of Lesbos (Thuc. iii. 4; Xen. Hell. i. 6, 26; Strab. p. 617).

Malēa, (Μαλέα or Μαλέαι: C. St. Angelo or Malea), a promontory on the SE. of Laconia, separating the Argolic and Laconic gulfs; the passage round it was dreaded by sailors. Here was a temple of Apollo, who hence bore the surname Maleātes. (Hdt. i. 82; Strab. p. 368.)

Malēlas, or Malālās, Joannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Μαλέλα or Μαλάλα), a native of Antioch, and a Byzantine historian, lived shortly after Justinian the Great. The word Malalas signifies in Syriac an orator. He wrote a chronicle of universal history from the creation of the world to the reign of Justinian inclusive. Edited by Dindorf, Bonn, 1831.

Malēnē (Μαλήνη), a city of Mysia, only mentioned by Herodotus (vi. 22).

Maliācus Sinus (Μαλιακός κόλπος: Bay of Zeitun), a narrow bay in the S. of Thessaly, running W. from the NW. point of the island of Euboea. On one side of it is the pass of Thermopylae. It derived its name from the Malienses, who dwell on its shores. It is sometimes called the Lamiacus Sinus, from the town of Lamia in its neighbourhood. (Hdt. iv. 33; Thuc. iii. 96; Paus. i. 4, 3.)

Mālis (Μαλις γῆ, Ionic and Att. Μηλις γῆ: Μαλιεύς or Μηλιεύς, Maliensis), a district in the S. of Thessaly, on the shores of the Maliacus Sinus, and opposite the NW. point of the island of Euboea. It extended as far as the pass of Thermopylae. Its inhabitants, the Malians, were Dorians, and belonged to the Amphictyonic League (Hdt. vii. 198).

Malli (Μαλλοί), an Indian people on both sides of the HYDRACTES: their capital is supposed to have been on the site of the fortress of Mooltan (Arrian, An. vi. 7–14; Strab. p. 701).

Mallus (Μαλλός), a city of Cilicia, on a hill a little E. of the mouth of the river Pyramus, was said to have been founded at the time of the Trojan war by Mopsus and Amphilochochus. It had a port called Magarsa. (Strab. p. 675.)

Maluginensis, a celebrated patrician family of the Cornelia gens in the early ages of the republic, the members of which frequently held the consulship. It disappears from history before the time of the Samnite wars. They sometimes united the surnames of Cossus and Maluginensis.—1. Ser. Cornelius Cossus Maluginensis, consul B.C. 485, in which year Sp. Cassius was condemned (Liv. ii. 41).—2. His son, L. Cornelius Maluginensis, consul B.C. 459; fought against the Aequi and Volsci (Liv. iii. 22–24).—3. P. Cornelius Maluginensis, consular tribune in 397 and 390 (Liv. v. 16, 36).

Malva. [MULUCHA.]

Mamaea, Jūlia, a native of Emesa in Syria, was daughter of Julia Maesa, and mother of Alexander Severus. She was a woman of integrity and virtue, and brought up her son with the utmost care. She was put to death by the soldiers along with her son, A.D. 235. [ELAGABALUS; SEVERUS.]

Māmercus. 1. Son of king Numa, according to one tradition, and son of Mars and Silvia, according to another. [MARS].—2. Tyrant of Catania, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, B.C. 344. After his defeat by Timoleon he fled to Messana, and took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. But when Timoleon laid siege to Messana, Hippon took to flight, and Mamercus surrendered, stipulating only for a regular trial before the Syracusans. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly of the people there, he was condemned by acclamation, and executed like a common malefactor. (Plut. Timol. 13, 30, 34; Diod. xvi. 69, 82.)

Mamercus or Mamercinus, Aemilius, a distinguished patrician family which professed to derive its name from Mamercus in the reign of Numa. 1. L., thrice consul: namely, B.C. 484, 478, 473.—2. Tib., twice consul, 470 and 467.—3. Mam., thrice dictator, 437, 433, and 426. In his first dictatorship he carried on war against the Veientes and Fidenae. Lar Tolumnius, the king of Veii, is said to have been killed in single combat in this year by Cornelius Cossus. In his second dictatorship

Aemilius carried a law limiting to eighteen months the duration of the censorship, which had formerly lasted for five years. This measure was received with great approbation by the people; but the censors then in office were so enraged at it, that they removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an acrarian (Liv. iv. 17-34).—4. L., a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, was twice consul, 341 and 329, and once dictator, 335. In his second consulship he took Privernum, and hence received the surname of Privernas (Liv. viii. 1, 16, 20).

Mamers. [MARS.]

Mamertini. [MESSANA.]

Mamertium (Mamertini), a town in Bruttium, of uncertain site (Strab. p. 261).

Mamilia Gens, plebeian, was originally a distinguished family in Tusculum. They traced their name and origin to Mamilia, the daughter of Telegonus, the founder of Tusculum, and the son of Odysseus and the goddess Circe (Liv. i. 49; Dionys. iv. 45.) It was to a member of this family, Octavius Mamilius, that Tarquinius betrothed his daughter; and on his expulsion from Rome, he took refuge with his son-in-law, who, according to the tradition preserved by Livy, roused the Latin people against the infant republic, and perished in the great battle at the lake Regillus (Liv. ii. 15, 19). In B. C. 458, the Roman citizenship was given to L. Mamilius the dictator of Tusculum, because he had two years before marched to the assistance of the city when it was attacked by Herdonius (Liv. iii. 18, 29). The gens was divided into three families, Limetanus, Turrianus, and Vitulus, but none of them were of much importance. Among them was Q. Mamil. Vitulus, who took Agrigentum B. C. 262 (Pol. i. 17), and C. Mamil. Limetanus, tribune B. C. 110 (Sall. Jug. 40, 65).

Mammula, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens, which was never of much importance in the state.

Mamurius Veturius. [VETURIUS.]

Mamurra, a Roman eques, born at Formiae, was the commander of the engineers (praefectus fabrum) in Julius Caesar's army in Gaul. He amassed great riches, the greater part of which, however, he owed to Caesar's liberality. He was the first person at Rome who used columns of solid marble for his house, and covered the walls with layers of marble (Plin. xxxvi. 48). He was in bad repute for licentiousness, and was violently attacked by Catullus in his poems, who called him decoctor Formianus (xli. 4). Mamurra seems to have been alive in the time of Horace, who calls Formiae, in ridicule, Mamurrarum urbs (Sat. i. 5, 37), from which we may infer that his name had become a byword of contempt. (See pp. 210, 211; Cat. xxix. 15, lvii. 2; Suet. Jul. 73; Cic. Att. vii. 7, xiii. 52.)

Mana Genita. [GENITA MANA.]

Mancia, Helvius, a Roman orator, about B. C. 90, who was remarkably ugly, and whose name is recorded chiefly in consequence of a laugh being raised against him on account of his deformity by C. Julius Caesar Strabo, who was opposed to him on one occasion in some lawsuit (Cic. de Or. ii. 66, 266).

Mancinus, Hostilius. 1. A., was praetor urbanus B. C. 180, and consul 170, when he had the conduct of the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. He remained in Greece for part of the next year (169) as proconsul. (Liv. xliii. 4-17; Pol. xxviii. 3).—2. L., was legate of the consul L. Calpurnius Piso (148) in the siege of Carthage, in the third Punic war. He was consul 145. (App. Pun. 110; Liv. Ep. 51).—3. C., consul 137, had the conduct of the war against Numantia. He was defeated by the Numantines, and purchased the safety of the remainder of his army by making a peace with the Numantines. The senate refused to recognise it, and went through the hypocritical ceremony of delivering him over to the enemy, by means of the fetiales. This was done with the consent of Mancinus, but the enemy refused to accept him. On his return to Rome Mancinus took his seat in the senate, as heretofore, but was violently expelled from it by the tribune P. Rutilius, on the ground that he had lost his citizenship. As the enemy had not received him, it was a disputed question whether he was a citizen or not by the Jus Postliminii (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Postliminium), but the better opinion was that he had lost his civic rights, and they were accordingly restored to him by a lex. (Cic. de Or. i. 40, 141, Off. iii. 30, 109; Vell. Pat. ii. 1; App. Hisp. 79-83.)

Mandonius. [INDBILIS.]

Mandri Fontes, a town in Phrygia, a day's march NE. of Anabura. It is wrongly written Al-andri Fontes in some editions (Liv. xxxviii. 16).

Mandriupium, Mandropus, or Mandrupolis (Μανδρούπολις), a town in the S. of Phrygia, on the lake Caralitis.

Mandubii, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, in Burgundy, whose chief town was ALESIA.

Manduria (Μανδύριον in Plut.: Casal Nuovo), a town in Calabria, in the territory of the Salentines, on the road from Tarentum to Hydruntum, and near a small lake, which is said to have been always full to the edge, whatever water was added to or taken from it (Plin. ii. 226), a phenomenon which is still observed by the inhabitants. Here Archidamus III., king of Sparta, was defeated and slain in battle by the Messapians and Lucanians, B. C. 338 (Plut. Ages. 3; Paus. iii. 10, 5). It was taken by Fabius Maximus, B. C. 209, and never recovered its prosperity (Liv. xxvii. 15).

Manes (i. e. the 'good beings'), was the name given to the spirits of the dead (Fest. p. 146; Non. p. 66; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 268). They were regarded as disembodied and immortal, and were worshipped probably from the earliest times: hence they were spoken of as Dii Manes. They were represented as dwelling beneath the earth under the guardianship of Mania (who was also called Lara or Larunda), the mother of the Lares (Varro, L. L. ix. 61; Plin. xxxii. 2; LARUNDA). It was an ancient custom in all towns of Italy to dig a pit, called Mundus, like an inverted sky (cf. Ov. Fast. iv. 820; Plut. Rom. 10), which was supposed to represent the abode of the gods of the underworld, and especially of the Manes. Such a pit was on the Palatine hill at Rome, and was the Mundus of the old Palatine state (Fest. p. 258). The stone laid over this, and called lapis manalis, was regarded as the door of the underworld, through which the Dii Manes passed (Paul. p. 128). At the festivals of the gods of the underworld—that is, of Dis Pater, Ceres, and Proserpina, as well as of the Manes—this stone was removed: the ceremony was called 'Mundus patet,' and took place three times a year—on August 24, October 5, and November 8. As the Manes then came forth from the earth these days were unlucky for business and for marriage, and to propitiate the dead, offerings were made, called inferiae, especially at the parentalia in February (see Dict. of Ant. s.v.). The Manes were joined with the other powers of the underworld as the deities to whom the enemies' host was devoted to destruction by the ceremony of devotio (Liv. viii. 6, 9, 10, x. 28; Val. Max. i. 7, 3), which shows the existence of a very old superstition that the spirits of the dead could work death. [For the connexion of the Genius with the Dii Manes, see p. 360, a.]

Mānētho (Μανεθῶς or Μανεθῶν), an Egyptian, a native of Sobennytus, and priest of Heliopolis, who lived in the reign of the first Ptolemy (283–246 B. C.). He was the first Egyptian who gave in the Greek language an account of the religion and history of his country. He based his information upon the ancient works of the Egyptians themselves, and more especially upon their sacred books. The work in which he gave an account of the theology of the Egyptians and of the origin of the gods and the world bore the title of τῶν Φυσικῶν Ἐπιτομή. His historical work was entitled a History of Egypt. It was divided into three parts or books. The first contained the history of the country previous to the thirty dynasties, or what may be termed the mythology of Egypt, and also of the first dynasties. The second opened with the eleventh, twelfth, and concluded with the nineteenth dynasty. The third gave the history of the remaining eleven dynasties, and concluded with an account of Nectanebus, the last of the native Egyptian kings. This work of Manetho is lost; but large extracts, which provide a list of the dynasties, have been preserved by the ecclesiastical writers Georgius Syncellus and Eusebius. The original work contained an account of the kings arranged in order in thirty dynasties with a notice of the duration of each. In recent times the general correctness of Manetho's information has been proved by the deciphering of the hieroglyphics, and his list, though the names are sometimes corrupted, is a guide for assigning to the names of kings upon the monuments their true place in the dynasties, and a most important aid in computing the chronology. The fragments are collected by C. Müller, Frag. Hist.—There exists an astrological poem, entitled Ἀποτελεσματικά, in six books, which bears the name of Manetho; but it is spurious, and cannot have been written before the fifth century of our era. Edited by Axt and Rigler, Cologne, 1832; Köchly, 1858.

Mania. [MANES.]

Mānilius. 1. M., was consul B. C. 149, the first year of the third Punic war, and carried on war against Carthage. He was celebrated as a jurist, especially as framer of deeds of purchase (Cic. de Or. i. 58, 246; Varro, R. R. ii. 2, 5), and is one of the speakers in Cicero's De Republica (i. 12).—2. C., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 66, proposed the law granting to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates and Tigranes, and the government of the provinces of Asia, Cilicia, and Bithynia. This bill was warmly opposed by Q. Catulus, Q. Hortensius, and the leaders of the aristocratical party, but was supported by Cicero in an oration which has come down to us. At the end of his year Manilius was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned; but of what offence he was accused is uncertain. (Cic. pro Leg. Manil.; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 25; Vell. Pat. ii. 33; Appian, Mithr. 97; Plut. Pomp. 30.)—3. Manilius is the name generally given to the author of the Astronomica, a poem in five books written in the reign of Tiberius.

It has more to do with astrology than with astronomy, but is valuable for its learning and for the insight which it gives into the views entertained on that subject. The name of the author is only gathered from the later MSS., which vary between Manilius, Manlius, and Mallius. Editions by Bentley, 1739; Jacob, Berl. 1846.

Manlia Gens, an ancient and celebrated patrician gens at Rome. The chief families were those of ACIDINUS, TORQUATUS, and VULSO.

Manliāna (Μανλιᾶνα: Miliana, Ru.), a city of importance in Mauretania Caesariensis, where one of Pompey's sons died (Ptol. iv. 2, 25).

M. Manlius, consul B. C. 392, took refuge in the Capitol when Rome was taken by the Gauls, in 390. One night, when the Gauls endeavoured to ascend the Capitol, Manlius was roused from his sleep by the cackling of the geese in the temple of Juno; collecting hastily a body of men, he succeeded in driving back the enemy, who had just reached the summit of the hill. From this he is said to have received the surname of Capitolinus. In 385, he defended the cause of the plebeians, who were suffering from the harsh treatment of their patrician creditors. The patricians accused him of aspiring to royal power, and he was thrown into prison by the dictator Cornelius Cossus. The plebeians put on mourning for their champion, and were ready to take up arms in his behalf. The patricians in alarm liberated Manlius; but this act of concession only made him bolder, and he still championed the cause of the plebeians. In the following year the patricians charged him with high treason, and brought him before the people assembled in the Campus Martius; but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Poetelinian grove outside the Porta Nomentana. The patricians succeeded in procuring his condemnation, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian rock. Thenceforth, it was said, none of the Manlia gens bore the praenomen of Marcus. (Liv. v. 47, vi. 14; Cic. Rep. ii. 27, 49.)

L. Manlius, also called Mallius and Mauilius, probably belonged to the age of Sulla, and wrote on mythology after the manner of Euhemerus (Dionys. i. 19; Plin. x. 4; Varro, L. L. v. 31).

Mannus, a son of Tuisco, was regarded by the ancient Germans, along with his father, as the founder of their race. They ascribed to Mannus three sons, from whom the three tribes of the Ingaevones, Hermiones, and Istaevones, or Iscaevones, derived their names (Tac. Germ. 2).

Mantiāna Palus. [ARSISSA PALUS.]

Mantineā (Μαντινεία, in Hom. Μαντινείη: Μαντινεύς), one of the most ancient and important towns in Arcadia, situated on the small river Ophis, near the centre of the E. frontier of the country. It is celebrated in history for the great battle fought under its walls between the Spartans and Thebans, in which Epaminondas fell, B. C. 362. According to tradition, Mantinea (which is mentioned in Il. ii. 607) was founded by Mantineus, the son of Lyacon, but it was formed in reality out of the union of four or five hamlets. (Paus. viii. 8, 4; Xen. Hell. v. 2, 6; Strab. p. 337.) Till the foundation of Megalopolis, it was the largest city in Arcadia, and it long exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Arcadian towns; but after the battle of 418 (Thuc. v. 65, 81), the Mantineans renounced their claim to this supremacy. In 385 the Spartans under Agesipolis attacked the city, and destroyed it by turning the waters of the Ophis against its walls, which were built of bricks, and the inhabitants were dispersed in villages (Xen. Hell. v. 2, 6; Diod. xv. 5). After the battle of Leuctra the city recovered its independence, and the walls were rebuilt (Xen. Hell. vi. 5, 3). At a later period it joined the Achaean League, but notwithstanding formed a close connexion with its old enemy Sparta, in consequence of which it was severely punished by Aratus, who put to death its leading citizens and sold the rest of its inhabitants as slaves (Pol. ii. 57; Paus. viii. 8, 11). It never recovered the effects of this blow. Its name was now changed into Antigonĩa, in honour of Antigonus Doson, who had assisted Aratus in his campaign against the town. The emperor Hadrian restored to the place its ancient appellation, and rebuilt part of it in honour of his favourite Antinous, the Bithynian, who derived his family from Mantinea. The ruins belong to the buildings of the fourth century B.C. The plain, formerly well drained and fertile (Homer, Il. ii. 607, calls it ἐπαρευνή), is now swampy.

Mantius (Μάντιος), son of Melampus, and brother of Antiphates. [MELAMPUS.]

Manto (Μαντώ, -οῦς). 1. Daughter of the Theban soothsayer Tiresias, was herself prophetess of the Ismenian Apollo at Thebes. After the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni, she was sent to Delphi with other captives, as an offering to Apollo, and there became the prophetess of this god. Apollo afterwards sent her and her companions to Asia, where they founded the sanctuary of Apollo near the place where the town of Colophon was afterwards built. Rhaeus, a Cretan, who had settled there, married Manto, and became by her the father of Mopsus. According to Euripides, she had previously become the mother of Amphiloehus and Tisiphone, by Alcmaeon, the leader of the Epigoni. Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, i.e. the laurel virgin. (Apollod. iii. 7, 4; Paus. vii. 3, 1, ix. 33, 1; Strab. p. 443.)—2. Daughter of Heracles, was likewise a prophetess, and the person from whom the town of Mantua received its name (Verg. Aen. x. 199).

Mantua (Mantuānus: Mantua), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on an island in the river Mincius, was not a place of importance, but is celebrated because Virgil, who was born at the neighbouring village of Andes, regarded Mantua as his birthplace. It seems to have been on friendly terms with Rome in the second Punic war (Liv. xxiv. 10), and later became a municipium. After the death of Caesar, Octavian assigned some of the lands of Cremona to his soldiers, and, as these were not sufficient, took some of the Mantuan territory also, which was the occasion of Virgil's loss of property. It was originally an Etruscan city, and is said to have derived its name from Manto, the daughter of Heracles. (Verg. Aen. x. 200, Ecl. ix. 28, Georg. ii. 198; Strab. p. 213; Plin. iii. 130.)

Maracanda (τὰ Μαρακάνδα: Samarkand), the capital of the Persian province of Sogdiana, was seventy stadia in circuit. It was here that Alexander the Great killed his friend CLITUS. (Strab. p. 517; Arr. An. iii. 30.)

Maraphii (Μαράφιοι), one of the three noblest tribes of the Persians, standing, with the Maspii, next in honour to the Pasargadae (Hdt. i. 125).

Marathesium (Μαραθήσιον), a town on the coast of Ionia, between Ephesus and Neapolis; it belonged to the Samians, who exchanged it with the Ephesians for Neapolis, which lay nearer to their island. The modern Scala Nova marks the site of one of these towns, but it is doubtful which (Strab. p. 639).

Marathon (Μαραθών: Μαραθώνιος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Leontis, was situated near a bay on the E. coast of Attica, 22 miles from Athens by one road, and 26 miles by another. It originally belonged to the Attic tetrapolis, and is said to have derived its name from the hero Marathon. This hero, according to one account, was the son of Epopeus, king of Plan of the Plain of Marathon.

Sicyon, who having been expelled from Peloponnesus by the violence of his father, settled in Attica; while, according to another account, he was an Arcadian who took part in the expedition of the Tyndaridae against Attica, and devoted himself to death before the battle. (Paus. i. 32, 4, ii. 1, 1; Plut. Thes. 32.) It is mentioned as a notable place in Od. vii. 80. The site of the ancient town of Marathon was probably not at the modern village of Marathon, but at a place called Vrana, a little to the S. of Marathon. Marathon was situated in a plain, which extends along the seashore, about six miles in length, and from three miles to one mile and a half in breadth. It is surrounded on the other three sides by rocky hills and rugged mountains. Two marshes bound the extremity of the plain; the northern is more than a square mile in extent, but the southern is much smaller, and is almost dry at the conclusion of the great heats. Through the centre of the plain runs a small brook. In this plain was fought the celebrated battle between the Persians and Athenians, B.C. 490. The Persians were drawn up on the plain, and the Athenians on some portion of the high ground above the plain, their headquarters being in the enclosure of Heracles, which overlooked the enemies' position (Hdt. vi. 108; Paus. i. 32). The tumulus raised over the Athenians who fell in the battle is still to be seen.

Maráthus (Μάραθος), an important city on the coast of Phoenicia, opposite to Aradus and near Antaradus (Strab. p. 753); it was destroyed by the people of Aradus in the time of the Syrian king Alexander Balas, a little before B.C. 150 (Diod. Frag. xxxiii.).

Marcella. 1. Daughter of C. Marcellus and Octavia, the sister of Augustus. She was thrice married: first, to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who separated from her in B.C. 21, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus; secondly, to Julius Antonius, the son of the triumvir, by whom she had a son Lucius; thirdly, to Sext. Appuleius, consul A.D. 14, by whom she had a daughter, Appuleia Varilia (Plut. Ant. 87; Dio Cass. liii. 1, liv. 6; Suet. Aug. 63; Tac. Ann. ii. 50).—2. Wife of the poet Martial. [MARTIALIS.]

Marcellinus, the author of the Life of Thucydides. [THUCYDIDES.]

Marcellus, Claudius, an illustrious plebeian family. 1. M., celebrated as five times consul, and the conqueror of Syracuse. In his first consulship, B.C. 222, Marcellus and his colleague conquered the Insubrians in Cisalpine Gaul, and took their capital Mediolanum. Marcellus distinguished himself by slaying in battle with his own hand Britomartus or Viridomarus, the king of the enemy, whose spoils he afterwards dedicated as spolia opima in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. This was the third and last instance in Roman history in which such an offering was made (Pol. ii. 34; Plut. Marc. 6; Val. Max. ii. 3, 5; Propert. v. 10, 40).—In 216 Marcellus was appointed praetor, and rendered important service to the Roman cause in the S. of Italy after the disastrous battle of Cannae. He was mainly answerable for the important repulse of Hannibal from Nola, and for the successful resistance in Campania in the following years. He had been destined for a command in Sicily, but he remained in the S. of Italy, with the title of proconsul. In the course of the same year he was elected consul in the place of Postumius Albinus, who had been killed in Cisalpine Gaul; but as the senate declared that the omens were unfavourable, Marcellus resigned the consulship. In 214 Marcellus was consul a third time, and still continued in the S. of Italy, where he carried on the war with ability, but without decisive results. In the summer of this year he was sent into Sicily, since the party favourable to the Carthaginians had obtained the upper hand in many of the cities in the island. After taking Leontini, he proceeded to lay siege to Syracuse, both by sea and land. His attacks were vigorous and unremitting; but though he brought many powerful military engines against the walls, these were rendered wholly unavailing by the superior skill and science of Archimedes. Marcellus was at last compelled to turn the siege into a blockade. It was not till 212 that he obtained possession of the place. It was given up to plunder, and Archimedes was one of the inhabitants slain by the Roman soldiers. The booty found in the captured city was immense; and Marcellus also carried off many of the works of art with which the city had been adorned, to grace the temples at Rome. This was the first instance of a practice which afterwards became so general. In 210 he was consul a fourth time, and again had the conduct of the war against Hannibal. He fought a battle with the Carthaginian general near Numistro in Lucania, but without any decisive result. In 202 he retained the command of his army with the rank of proconsul. In 208 he was consul for the fifth time. He was slain in a cavalry reconnaissance near Venusia, at the age of 60, and was buried with due honours by order of Hannibal (Liv. xxvii. 28; Pol. x. 32; Val. Max. i. 6).—Marcellus appears to have been harsh, unyielding, and cruel; but he was a brave and experienced officer, and to him as much as to any other single commander was due the successful resistance which the Romans made to Hannibal after Cannae (Plut. Marcellus; Liv. xxii.—xxvii.).—2. M., son of the preceding, accompanied his father as military tribune, in 208, and was present with him at the time of his death. In 204 he was tribune of the people; in 200 curule aedile; in 198 praetor; and in 196 consul. In his consulship he carried on the war against the Insubrians and Boii in Cisalpine Gaul (Liv. xxxv. 5). He was censor in 189, and died 177 (Liv. xxxvii. 58, xli. 13).—3. M., consul 183, carried on the war against the Ligurians (Liv. xxxix. 54).—4. M., son of No. 2, was thrice consul, first in 166, when he gained a victory over the Alpine tribes of the Gauls; secondly, in 155, when he defeated the Ligurians; and thirdly, in 152, when he carried on the war against the Celtiberians in Spain. In 148 he was sent ambassador to Masinissa, king of Numidia, but was shipwrecked on the voyage, and perished. (Liv. xlv. 44, Ep. 48, 50; Pol. xxxv. 2; Strab. p. 141).—5. M., an intimate friend of Cicero, is first mentioned as curule aedile with P. Clodius in 56. He was consul in 51, and showed himself a bitter enemy to Caesar. Among other ways in which he displayed his enmity, he caused a citizen of Comum to be scourged, in order to show his contempt for the privileges lately bestowed by Caesar upon that colony (Cic. ad Att. v. 11; Suet. Jul. 28). But the animosity of Marcellus did not blind him to the imprudence of forcing on a war for which his party was unprepared; and at the beginning of 49 he in vain suggested the necessity of making levies of troops, before any open steps were taken against Caesar. His advice was overruled, and he was among the first to fly from Rome and Italy (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 13; Caes. B.C. i. 2). After the battle of Pharsalia (48) he withdrew to Mytilene, where he gave himself up to rhetoric and philosophy. At length, in 46, in a full assembly of the senate, C. Marcellus, the cousin of the exile, threw himself at Caesar's feet to implore the pardon of his kinsman, and his example was followed by the whole body of the assembly. Caesar yielded to this demonstration of opinion, and Marcellus was declared to be forgiven. Cicero thereupon returned thanks to Caesar, in the oration Pro Marcello, which has come down to us. Marcellus set out on his return; but he was murdered at the Piræus, by one of his own attendants, P. Magius Chilo (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 6; ad Att. xiii. 10-22).—6. C., brother of the preceding, was consul 49. He is constantly confounded with his cousin, C. Marcellus [No. 8], who was consul in 50. He accompanied his colleague, Lentulus, in his flight from Rome, and eventually crossed over to Greece. In the following year (48) he commanded part of Pompey's fleet; but this is the last we hear of him (Dio Cass. xli. 1-3; Caes. B.C. i. 1-5, 14, 25).—7. C., uncle of the two preceding, was praetor in 80, and afterwards succeeded M. Lepidus in the government of Sicily. His administration of the province is frequently praised by Cicero in his speeches against Verres, as affording the most striking contrast to that of the accused. Marcellus himself was present on that occasion, as one of the judges of Verres (Cic. Verr. ii. 3, 21).—8. C., son of the preceding, and first cousin of M. Marcellus [No. 5], whom he succeeded in the consulship, 50. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero from an early age, and attached himself to the party of Pompey, notwithstanding his connexion with Caesar by his marriage with Octavia. In his consulship he was the advocate of all the most violent measures against Caesar; but when the war actually broke out, he displayed the utmost timidity and helplessness. He could not make up his mind to join the Pompeian party in Greece; and after much hesitation he at length determined to remain in Italy. He readily obtained the forgiveness of Caesar, and thus was able to intercede with the dictator in favour of his cousin, M. Marcellus [No. 5]. He must have lived till near the close of 41, as his widow, Octavia, was pregnant by him when betrothed to Antony in the following year (Dio Cass. xlvi. 31).—9. M., son of the preceding and of Octavia, the daughter of C. Octavius and sister of Augustus, was born in 48. As early as 39 he was betrothed in marriage to the daughter of Sex. Pompey; but the marriage never took place, as Pompey's death, in 35, removed the occasion for it. In 27 he seems, with Tiberius, to have been one of the leaders of the boys in the 'Trojan' game, celebrated by order of Augustus, on which Virgil, as an eye-witness, probably founded his description. [Dict. of Ant. art. Trojan Ludus.] Augustus, who had probably destined the young Marcellus as his successor, adopted him as his son in 25, and at the same time gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. In 23 he was curule aedile, but in the autumn of the same year he was attacked by the disease of which he died shortly after at Baiae, notwithstanding all the skill and care of the celebrated physician Antonius Musa. He was in the twentieth year of his age, and was thought to have given so much promise of future excellence, that his death was mourned as a public calamity. Augustus himself pronounced the funeral oration over his remains, which were deposited in the mausoleum lately erected for the Julian family (Dio Cass. liii. 28, 31; Propert. iii. 18, 30). At a subsequent period (14) Augustus dedicated in his name the magnificent theatre near the Forum Olitorium, of which the remains are still visible. But the most durable monument to the memory of Marcellus is to be found in the well-known passage of Virgil (Aen. vi. 861-887), which must have been recited to Augustus and Octavia before the end of 22.—10. M., called by Cicero, for distinction's sake, the father of Aeserninus (Brut. 86), served under Marius in Gaul in 102, and as one of the lieutenants of L. Julius Caesar in the Marsic war, 90 (Cic. Brut. 36; App. B.C. i. 40).—11. M. Claudius Marcellus Aeserninus, son or grandson of No. 10, quaestor in Spain in 48, under Q. Cassius Longinus, took part in the mutiny of the soldiers against Cassius (Bell. Alex. 57-64; Dio Cass. xlii. 15).—12. P. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus, son of No. 10, must have been adopted by one of the Cornelii Lentuli. He was one of Pompey's lieutenants in the war against the pirates, b.c. 67 (App. Mithr. 95).—13. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus, son of the preceding, was praetor 59, after which he governed the province of Syria for nearly two years, and was consul 56, when he showed himself a friend of the aristocratical party, and opposed all the measures of the triumvirate (Dio Cass. xxxix. 16).

This coin, struck by P. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus [see below, No. 12], has on the obverse the head of Marcellus, the Conqueror of Syracuse. The reverse represents him carrying the spolia opima to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, with MARCELLVS COS. QVINQ.

Marcellus, Eprius, born of an obscure family at Capua, rose by his oratorical talents to distinction at Rome in the reigns of Claudius, Nero, and Vespasian. He was one of the principal delators under Nero, and accused many of the most distinguished men of his time (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23, xvi. 23, 26, 28, 33). He was brought to trial in the reign of Vespasian, but was acquitted, and enjoyed the patronage and favour of this emperor as well. In A.D. 69, however, he was convicted of having taken part in the conspiracy of Alienus Caecina, and therefore put an end to his own life (Dio Cass. lxvi. 16).

Marcellus, Nonius. [NONIUS MARCELLUS.]

Marcellus Sidētes, a native of Side, in Pamphylia, lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, A.D. 117-161. He wrote a long medical poem in Greek hexameter verse, consisting of 42 books, of which two fragments remain (ed. Lehrs, 1846).

Marcellus, Ulpius, a jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. He is often cited in the Digest.

Marcia. 1. Wife of M. Regulus (Sil. It. vi. 403, 576).—2. Wife of M. Cato Uticensis, daughter of L. Marcus Philippus, consul B.C. 56. It was about 56 that Cato is related to have ceded her to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the approbation of her father. She continued to live with Hortensius till the death of the latter, in 50, after which she returned to Cato (App. B.C. ii. 99; Plut. Cat. Min. 25; Lucan, ii. 329).—3. Wife of Fabius Maximus, the friend of Augustus, learnt from her husband the secret visit of the emperor to his grandson Agrippa, and informed Livia of it, in consequence of which she became the cause of her husband's death, A.D. 18 or 14 (Tac. Ann. i. 5; Ov. Fast. vi. 802).—4. Daughter of Cremutius Cordus. [CORDUS.]—5. The favourite concubine of Commodus, organised the plot by which the emperor perished. [COMMODUS.] She subsequently became the wife of Eclectus, his chamberlain, also a conspirator, and was eventually put to death by Julianus, along with Laetus, who also had been actively engaged in the plot.

Marcia gens, claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome. [ANCUS MARCIUS.] Hence one of its families subsequently assumed the name of Rex, and the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius were placed upon the coins of the Marcii. But notwithstanding these claims to such high antiquity, no patricians of this name, with the exception of Coriolanus, are mentioned in the early history of the republic [CORIOLANUS]; and it was not till after the enactment of the Licinian laws that any member of the gens obtained the consulship. The names of the most distinguished families are CENSORINUS, PHILIPPUS, REX, and RUTILUS.

Marciāna, the sister of Trajan, and mother of Matadia, who was the mother of Sabina, the wife of the emperor Hadrian.

Marciānopōlis (Μαρκιανούπολις; Devna), an important city in the interior of Moesia Inferior, W. of Odessus, founded by Trajan, and named after his sister Marciana. It was situated on the high road from Constantinople to the Danube (Amm. Marc. xxvii. 6, 12).

Marciānus. 1. Emperor of the East A.D. 450-457, was a native of Thrace or Illyricum, and served for many years as a common soldier in the imperial army. Of his early history we have only a few particulars; but he had attained such distinction at the death of Theodosius II. in 450, that the widow of the latter, the celebrated Pulcheria, offered her hand and the imperial title to Marcian, who thus became Emperor of the East. Marcian was a man of resolution, and when Attila sent to demand the tribute which the younger Theodosius had engaged to pay, the emperor replied, 'I have iron for Attila, but no gold.' Attila swore vengeance; but he first invaded the Western Empire, and his death, two years afterwards, saved the East. In 451 Marcian assembled the council of Chalcedon, in which the doctrines of the Eutychians were condemned. He died in 457, and was succeeded by Leo (Procop. Vand. i. 4; Priscus, pp. 39, 72).—2. Of Heraclea in Pontus, a Greek geographer, of uncertain date, but who perhaps lived in the 5th century of the Christian era. He wrote a work in prose, entitled A Periplus of the External Sea, both eastern and western, and of the largest Islands in it. The 'External Sea' he used in opposition to the Mediterranean. This work was in two books; of which the former, on the E. and S. seas, has come down to us entire; but of the latter, which treated of the W. and N. seas, we possess only the last three chapters on Africa, and a mutilated one on the distance between Rome and the principal cities in the world. In this work he chiefly follows Ptolemy. He also made an epitome of the Periplus of Artemiodorus of Ephesus [ARTEMIODORUS, No. 4], of which we possess the introduction, and the periplus of Pontus, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia. Marcianus likewise published an edition of Menippus with additions and corrections. [MENIPPUS.] The works of Marcianus are edited by Müller, in the Geographi Graeci Minores, and separately by Hoffmann, Marciani Periplus, &c., Lips. 1841.

Marciānus, Aelius, a Roman jurist, who lived under Caracalla and Alexander Severus. His works are frequently cited in the Digest.

Marciānus Capella. [CAPELLA.]

Marcus, an Italian seer, whose prophetic verses (Carmina Marciana) were first discovered by M. Atilius, the praetor, in B.C. 213. They were written in Latin, and two extracts from them are given by Livy, one containing a prophecy of the defeat of the Romans at Cannae, and the second, commanding the institution of the Ludi Apollinares. The Marcian prophecies were subsequently preserved in the Capitol with the Sibylline books. Some writers mention only one person of this name, but others speak of two brothers, the Marcii.

Marcus. [MARCIA GENS.]

Marcus Mons or Maecius (τὸ Μάρκιον ὄρος), the scene of the defeat of Volscians and Latins by Camillus, B.C. 389. Plutarch says that it is about 25 miles from Rome, and Livy (who calls it Maecius) places it near Lanuvium. Some writers make it the modern Colle di Due Torri. (Plut. Cam. 33; Liv. vi. 2.)

Marcodurum (Düren on the Roer), the scene of a victory of Civilis, some distance west of Cologne (Tac. Hist. iv. 28).

Marcomanni (that is, men of the mark or border) a powerful German people of the Suevic race, originally dwelt in the SW. of Germany, between the Rhine and the Danube, on the banks of the Main; but under the guidance of their chieftain Maroboduus, who had been brought up at the court of Augustus, they migrated into the land of the Boii, a Celtic race, who inhabited Bohemia and part of Bavaria. Here they settled after subduing the Boii, and founded a powerful kingdom, which extended S. as far as the Danube. [MAROBODUUS.] At a later time, the Marcomanni, in conjunction with the Quadi and other German tribes, carried on a long and bloody war with the emperor M. Aurelius, which lasted during the greater part of his reign, and was only brought to a conclusion by his son Commodus purchasing peace of the barbarians as soon as he ascended the throne, A.D. 180. (Tac. Germ. 42; Dio Cass. lxxvii. 7; Amm. Marc. xix. 6.)

Mardēnē or Mardÿēnē (Μαρδηνή, Μαρδυνηή), a district of Persis, extending N. from Taocene to the W. frontier and to the sea-coast. It seems to have taken its name from some branch of the great people called Mardi or Amardi, who are found in various parts of W. and central Asia; for example, in Armenia, Media, Margiana, and, under the same form of name as those in Persis, in Sogdiana. (Hdt. i. 125; Strab. p. 524; Ptol. vi. 4, 3.)

Mardi. [AMARDI, MARDENE.]

Mardōnius (Μαρδόνιος), a distinguished Persian, was the son of Gobryas, and the son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis. In B.C. 492 he was sent by Darius, with a large armament, to punish Eretria and Athens for the aid they had given to the Ionians. But his fleet was destroyed by a storm off Mt. Athos, and the greater part of his land forces was cut to pieces by the Brygians, a Thracian tribe. On the accession of Xerxes, Mardonius was one of the chief instigators of the expedition against Greece, with the government of which he hoped to be invested after its conquest; and he was appointed one of the generals of the land army. After the battle of Salamis (480), he became alarmed for the consequences of the advice he had given, and persuaded Xerxes to return home with the rest of the army, leaving 300,000 men under his command for the subjugation of Greece. He was defeated in the following year (479), near Plataeae, by the Greek forces under Pausanias, and was slain in the battle. (Hdt. vi. 43, 94, vii. 5, 9, 82, viii. 100-144, ix. 1-65.)

Mardus. [AMARDUS.]

Mardÿēne, Mardyēni. [MARDENE.]

Mārēa, -ēa, -iā (Μαρῆν, Μαρῆλα, Μαρῆα; Μαρῆώτης, Mareota; Mariūt, Ru.), a town of Lower Egypt, in the district of Mareotis, on the S. side of the lake Mareotis, at the mouth of a canal (Thuc. i. 104; Diod. ii. 681; Athen. pp.

25, 38). It was a frontier garrison under the Pharaohs on the side of Libya, but declined in importance afterwards.

Mārēōtis (Μαρεώτις; Mareoticus). Also called Μαρεώτης Νόμος, a district of Lower Egypt, on the extremo NW., on the borders of the Libyae Nomos; it produced good wine (Strab. p. 796; Colum. R. R. iii. 2; Verg. Georg. ii. 91; Hor. Od. i. 37, 14).

Mārēōtis or Marēa (or -ia) Lacus (ἡ Μαρεώτις, Μαρεία, Μαρία λίμνη; Birket-Mariūt, or El-Kreit), a considerable lake in the NW. of Lower Egypt, separated from the Mediterranean by the neck of land on which Alexandria stood, and supplied with water by the Canopic branch of the Nile, and by canals. It was less than 300 stadia (80 geog. miles) long, and more than 150 wide. It was surrounded with vines, palms, and papyrus. It served as the port of Alexandria for vessels navigating the Nile.

Māres (Μάρες), a people of Asia, on the N. coast of the Euxine, served in the army of Xerxes, equipped with helmets of wickerwork, leathern shields, and javelins (Hdt. iii. 94, vii. 79).

Maresa, Marescha (Μαρσά, Μαρισά, Μαρισσά, Μαρεσχά; proh. Ru. SSW. of Beit Jibrin), an ancient fortress of Palestine, in the S. of Judaea, of some importance in the history of the early kings of Judah and of the Maccabees. The Parthians had destroyed it before the time of Eusebius; and it is probable that its ruins contributed to the erection of the city of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), which was afterwards built on the site of the ancient Baetogabra, two Roman miles NW. of Maresa, [See Diet. of the Bible, art. Mareshah.]

Marescha. [MARESA.]

Margiāna (ἡ Μαργιανή; the S. part of Khiva, SW. part of Bokhara, and NE. part of Khorassan), a province of the ancient Persian empire, and afterwards of the Greco-Syrian, Parthian, and Persian kingdoms, in Central Asia, N. of the mountains called Sariphi (Ghoor), a part of the chain of the Indian Caucasus, which divided it from Aria; and bounded on the E. by Bactriana, on the NE. and N. by the river Oxus, which divided it from Sogdiana and Scythia, and on the W. by Hyrcania. It received its name from the river Margus (Murghab), which flows through it, from SE. to NW., and is lost in the sands of the Desert of Khiva. On this river, near its termination, stood the capital of the district, Antiochia Margiana (Merv). With the exception of the districts round this and the minor rivers, which produced excellent wine, the country was for the most part a sandy desert. Its chief inhabitants were the Derbices, Parni, Tapuri, and branches of the great tribes of the Massagetae, Dahae, and Mardi. The country became known to the Greeks by the expeditions of Alexander and Antiochus I., the first of whom founded, and the second rebuilt, Antiochia; and the Romans of the age of Augustus obtained further information about it from the returned captives who had been taken by the Parthians and had resided at Antiochia. (Strab. p. 516; Ptol. vi. 10; Plin. vi. 46.)

Margites. [HOMERUS, p. 425, b.]

Margum or Margus, a fortified place in Moesia Superior, W. of Viminacium, situated on the river Margus (Morava) at its confluence with the Danube. Here Diocletian gained a decisive victory over Carinus. The river Margus, which is one of the most important of the southern tributaries of the Danube, rises in Mt. Orbelus. (Eutrop. ix. 13, x. 20.)

Margus. [MARGIANA.]

Maria. [MAREA, MAREOTIS.]

Mariaba (Μαρίαβα; Mariab), the chief town of the Sabaci in SW. Arabia (Strab. pp. 768, 778). It is uncertain whether this is the same place as the Mariaba mentioned by Strabo p. 782 (where some read Marsiaba) as the furthest point reached by Aelius Gallus, and as belonging to the tribe Rhamunitae. On the whole, it is probable that they were identical, and that the Rhamunitae were merely a branch of the Sabaci. It is likely that the Mariba of Plin. vi. 160 is also the same place.

Mariamna (Μαριάμμη, -ιάμη, -ιάμνη), a city of Coele-Syria, some miles W. of Emesa, assigned by Alexander the Great to the territory of Aradus (Arrian, An. ii. 14, 18).

Mariamne. [HERODES.]

Mariamne Turris, a tower at Jerusalem, built by Herod the Great.

Mariāna, a Roman colony on the E. coast of Corsica founded by C. Marius (Plin. iii. 80; Mel. ii. 7, 19; Sen. Cons. ad Helv. 8), the ruins of which are extant under their ancient name at the mouth of the river Golo.

Mariāna Fossa. [FOSSA.]

Mariandyni (Μαριανδύνοι), an ancient people of Asia Minor, on the N. coast, E. of the river Sangarius, in the NE. part of Bithynia. With respect to their ethnical affinities, it seems doubtful whether they were connected with the Thracian tribes (the Thyni and Bithyni) on the W., or the Paphlagonians on the E.; but the latter appears the more probable. (Hdt. iii. 90, vii. 72; Strab. pp. 345, 542; Xen. An. 4, 4; Aesch. Pers. 938.)

Marianus Mons (Sierra Morena), a mountain in Hispania Baetica, properly only a western offshoot of the Orospeida. The eastern part of it was called Salus Castulonensis, and derived its name from the town of Castulo. (Ptol. ii. 4, 15; cf. Strab. p. 142.)

Mārica, a Latin nymph, the mother of Latinus by Faunus, was worshipped by the inhabitants of Minturnae in a grove on the river Liris. Hence the country round Minturnae is called by Horace (Od. iii. 17, 7) Maricae litora.

Marinus (Μαρίνος). 1. Of Tyre, a Greek geographer, who lived in the middle of the second century of the Christian era, and was the immediate predecessor of Ptolemy. Marinus was undoubtedly the founder of mathematical geography in antiquity; and Ptolemy based his work upon that of Marinus. [PTOLEMAEUS.] The chief merit of Marinus was, that he put an end to the uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed respecting the positions of places, by assigning to each its latitude and longitude.—2. Of Flavia Neapolis, in Palestine, a philosopher and rhetorician, the pupil and successor of Proclus, whose Life he wrote, a work still extant, edited by Boissonade, Lips. 1814.

Mārisus (Marosch), called Maris (Μάρσις) by Herodotus, a river of Dacia, which according to the ancient writers falls into the Danube, but in reality it falls into the Theiss, and, along with this river, into the Danube (Hdt. iv. 49; Strab. p. 304).

Maritima, a seaport town of the Avatici, and a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis (Mel. ii. 5; Ptol. ii. 18, 8).

Mārius. 1. C., who was seven times consul, was born in B.C. 157, near Arpinum, of an obscure family. His father's name was C. Marius, and his mother's Fulcinia; and his parents, as well as Marius himself, were clients of the noble plebeian house of the Herennii. So indigent, indeed, was the family, that young Marius is said to have worked as a common peasant for wages, before he entered the Roman army. (Comp. Juv. viii. 246; Plut. Mar. 3; Plin. xxxiii. 150.) He distinguished himself so much by his valour at the siege of Numantia in Spain (134), as to attract the notice of Scipio Africanus, who is said to have foretold his future greatness (Cic. pro Balb. 20, 47; Val. Max. ii. 2, 3). His name does not occur again for fifteen years; but in 119 he was elected tribune of the plebs, when he was 38 years of age. In this office he came forward as a popular leader, and proposed a law to give greater freedom to the people at the elections; and when the senate attempted to overawe him, he commanded one of his officers to carry the consul Metellus to prison. He now became a marked man, and the aristocracy opposed him with all their might. He lost his election to the aedileship, and with difficulty obtained the praetorship; but he acquired influence by his marriage with Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar, the father of the future ruler of Rome. In 109 Marius served in Africa as legate of the consul Q. Metellus in the war against Jugurtha, where he was soon regarded as the most distinguished officer in the army (Sall. Jug. 46 ff.). He also ingratiated himself with the soldiers, who praised him in their letters to their friends at Rome. His popularity became so great that he resolved to return to Rome, and become at once a candidate for the consulship; but it was with great difficulty that he obtained from Metellus permission to leave Africa. On his arrival at Rome he was elected consul with an enthusiasm which bore down all opposition before it; and he received from the people the province of Numidia, and the conduct of the war against Jugurtha (107). (Sall. Jug. 73.) On his return to Numidia he carried on the war with great vigour; and in the following year (106) Jugurtha was surrendered to him by the treachery of Bocchus, king of Mauretania. [JUGURTHA.] Marius sent his quaestor Sulla to receive the Numidian king from Bocchus (Sall. Jug. 103 ff.). This circumstance sowed the seeds of the personal hatred which afterwards existed between Marius and Sulla, since the enemies of Marius claimed for Sulla the merit of bringing the war to a close by obtaining possession of the person of Jugurtha. Meantime Italy was threatened by a vast horde of barbarians, who had migrated from the N. of Germany. The two leading nations of which they consisted were called Cimbri and Teutones, both probably of German race, though numbers of Celts had joined them, and Celtic leaders were prominent in their battles. Among these Celtic contingents were the Ambrones, and some of the Swiss tribes, such as the Tigurini. The whole host is said to have contained 300,000 fighting men, besides a much larger number of women and children. They had defeated one Roman army after another, and it appeared that nothing could check their progress. Everyone felt that Marius was the only man capable of saving the state, and he was accordingly elected consul a second time during his absence in Africa. Marius entered Rome in triumph on the 1st of January. Meantime the threatened danger was for a while averted. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri marched into Spain, which they ravaged for the next two or three years. But as the return of the barbarians was constantly expected, Marius was elected consul a third time in 103, and a fourth time in 102. In the latter of these years the Cimbri returned into Gaul. The barbarians now divided their forces. The Cimbri marched round the northern foot of the Alps, in order to enter Italy by the NE., crossing the Tyrolean Alps by the defiles of Tridentum (Trent). The Teutones and Ambrones, on the other hand, marched against Marius, who had taken up a position in a fortified camp on the Rhone. The decisive battle was fought near Aquae Sextiae (Aix). The carnage was dreadful. The whole nation was annihilated, for those who did not fall in the battle put an end to their own lives. The Cimbri, meantime, had forced their way into Italy. Marius was elected consul a fifth time (101), and joined the proconsul Catulus in the N. of Italy. The two generals gained a great victory over the enemy on a plain called the Campi Raudii, near Vercellae (Vercelli). The Cimbri met with the same fate as the Teutones; the whole nation was destroyed. Marius was received at Rome with unprecedented honours. He was hailed as the saviour of the state; his name was coupled with the gods in the libations and at banquets, and he received the title of third founder of Rome. The reform of Marius which had the most lasting effect was the reorganisation of the army. The richer classes now shrank from military service, and the middle class had almost disappeared. Accordingly Marius admitted all free-born citizens to the infantry, and abolished all old distinctions of rank. All recruits went through the same severe drill, like that of the gladiators, devised by P. Rutilius Rufus, so that the army was composed of professional soldiers, no longer a militia. The old distribution of maniples was replaced by making the cohort the unit. The cavalry was henceforth composed of foreign troops, Thracians, Africans and Gauls, and the light-armed troops were drawn from Liguria and the Balearic isles. Hence it is said with some truth that with Marius began the mercenary army. [For details see Dict. of Antiq. art. Exercitus.]—Hitherto the career of Marius had been a glorious one; but the remainder of his life is full of horrors, and brings out the worst features of his character. In order to secure the consulship a sixth time, he entered into close connexion with two of the worst demagogues that ever appeared at Rome, Saturninus and Glaucia. He gained his object, and was consul a sixth time in 100. In this year he drove into exile his old enemy Metellus; but shortly afterwards, when Saturninus and Glaucia took up arms against the state, Marius crushed the insurrection by command of the senate. [SATURNINUS.] For the next few years Marius took little part in public affairs. He possessed none of the qualifications which were necessary to maintain influence in the state during a time of peace, being an unlettered soldier, rude in manners, and arrogant in conduct. The general result of his policy showed his incapacity for politics. As the event proved, he had really acted so as to undermine what remained of the Gracchan constitution and to pave the way for a reaction towards oligarchy. The Social war again called him into active service (90). He served as legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus; and after the latter had fallen in battle, he defeated the Marsi in two successive engagements. Marius was now 67, and his body had grown stout and unwieldy; but he was still as greedy of honour and distinction as he had ever been. He had set his heart upon obtaining the command of the war against Mithridates, which the senate had bestowed upon the consul Sulla at the end of the Social war (88). In order to gain his object, Marius allied himself to the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, who brought forward a law for distributing the Italian allies, who had just obtained the Roman franchise, among all the Roman tribes. As those new citizens greatly exceeded the old citizens in number, they would of course be able to carry whatever they pleased in the comitia. The law was carried notwithstanding the violent opposition of the consuls, and the tribes, in which the new citizens now had the majority, appointed Marius to the command of the war against Mithridates. Sulla fled to his army, which was stationed at Nola; and when Marius sent thither two military tribunes to take the command of the troops, Sulla not only refused to surrender the command, but marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius was now obliged to take to flight. After wandering along the coast of Latium, he was at length taken prisoner in the marshes formed by the river Liris, near Minturnae. The magistrates of this place resolved to put him to death, in accordance with a command which Sulla had sent to all the towns in Italy. A Gallic or Cimbrian soldier undertook to carry their sentence into effect, and with a drawn sword entered the apartment where Marius was confined. The part of the room in which Marius lay was in the shade; and to the frightened barbarian the eyes of Marius seemed to dart out fire; and from the darkness a terrible voice exclaimed—'Man, durst thou murder C. Marius?' The barbarian immediately threw down his sword, and rushed out of the house. (Plut. Mar. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 19; Cic. Fin. ii. 32.) Straightway there was a revulsion of feeling among the inhabitants of Minturnae. They got ready a ship, and placed Marius on board. He reached Africa in safety, and landed at Carthage; but he had scarcely put his foot on shore before the Roman governor sent an officer to bid him leave the country. This last blow almost unmanned Marius: his only reply was—'Tell the praetor that you have seen C. Marius a fugitive sitting among the ruins of Carthage.' Soon afterwards Marius was joined by his son, and they took refuge in the island of Cercina. During this time a revolution had taken place at Rome, in consequence of which Marius was enabled to return to Italy. The consul Cinna (87), who belonged to the Marian party, had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, and had subsequently been deprived by the senate of the consulate. Cinna collected an army, and resolved to recover his honours by force of arms. As soon as Marius heard of these changes he left Africa, and joined Cinna in Italy. Marius and Cinna now laid siege to Rome. The failure of provisions compelled the senate to yield, and Marius and Cinna entered Rome as conquerors. The most frightful scenes followed. The guards of Marius stabbed everyone whom he did not salute, and the streets ran with the blood of the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. Among the victims of his vengeance were the great orator M. Antonius and his former colleague Q. Catulus. Without going through the form of an election, Marius and Cinna named themselves consuls for the following year (86). But he did not long enjoy the honour: he was now in his 71st year; his body was worn out by the fatigues and sufferings he had recently undergone, and on the 18th day of his consulship he died of an attack of pleurisy, after seven days' illness. (Plut. Marius; Sall. Jug. ll. c.; App. B. C. i. 29, 40, 55; Liv. Ep. 66-80.)—2. C., the son of the preceding, but only by adoption. He followed in the footsteps of his father, and was equally distinguished by merciless severity against his enemies. He was consul in 82, when he was 27 years of age. In this year he was defeated by Sulla near Sacriportus on the frontiers of Latium, whereupon he took refuge in the strongly fortified town of Praeneste. Here he was besieged for some time; but after Sulla's great victory at the Colline gate of Rome over Pontius Telesinus, Marius put an end to his own life, after making an unsuccessful attempt to escape. (Plut. Sull. 28-32; App. B. C. i. 87-94; Vell. Pat. ii. 26, 27.)—3. The false Marius. [AMATIUS.]—4. M., a friend and neighbour of Cicero, who addressed four letters to him (Fam. vii. 1-4).—5. M. Marius Gratiidianus. See GRATIDIUS, No. 2.—6. Marius Priscus, proconsul of Africa, was tried and condemned for extortion. The younger Pliny and the historian Tacitus prosecuted. (Plin. Ep. ii. 11; Juv. i. 49, viii. 120.)—7. M. Aurelius Marius, one of the Thirty Tyrants, was the fourth of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul, in defiance of Gallienus. He reigned only two or three days, but there are coins of his extant. (Treb. Poll. Trig. Tyr. vii.)—8. Marius Celsus. [CELSUS.]—9. Marius Maximus, a Roman historian, who lived about A.D. 165-230, and wrote a continuation of Suetonius' biographies of the emperors from Nerva to Elagabalus. His work has perished, but it was much used by the writers of the Historia Augusta, who often insert extracts from it. He is usually identified with a Marius Maximus who appears in inscriptions as holding high offices, a praetor and a praefectus urbi (C. I. L. 1450, 1452), and there is no reason against it.—10. Marius Victorinus. [VICTORINUS.]

Marmarica (ἡ Μαρμαρική; Μαρμαρῖται; E. part of Tripoli and NW. part of Egypt), a district of N. Africa, between Cyrenaica and Egypt, but by some ancient geographers reckoned as a part of Cyrenaica, and by others as a part of Egypt; while others, again, call only the W. part of it, from the borders of Cyrenaica to the Catabathmus Magnus, by the name of Marmarica, and the E. part, from the Catabathmus Magnus to the Sinus Plinthinetes, Libyae Nomos. Inland it extended as far as the Oasis of Ammon. It was, for the most part, a sandy desert, intersected with low ranges of hills.—Its inhabitants were called by the general name of Marmaridae. Their chief tribes were the Adyrmachidae and Giligammae, on the coast, and the Nasamonae and Augiliae in the interior. (Strab. pp. 131, 798.)

Marmarium (Μαρμαρίον; Μαρμαρίος; Marmari), a place on the SW. coast of Euboea, with a temple of Apollo Marmarium, and celebrated marble quarries, which belonged to CARYSTUS.

Märo, Vergilius. [VERGIILIUS.]

Maroboduus—the Latinised form of the German Marbod—king of the Marcomanni, was a Suevoian by birth, and was born about B.C. 18. He was sent in his boyhood with other hostages to Rome, where he attracted the notice of Augustus, and received a liberal education. After his return to his native country, he succeeded in establishing a powerful kingdom in central Germany, along the N. bank of the Danube, from Regensburg nearly to the borders of Hungary, which stretched far into the interior. His power excited the jealousy of Augustus, who had determined to send a formidable army to invade his dominions; but the revolt of the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A.D. 6) prevented the emperor from carrying his design into effect. Maroboduus eventually became an object of suspicion to the other German tribes, as a king who ruled too much after a Roman pattern; and was at length expelled from his dominions by Catualda, a chief of the Gothones, about A.D. 19. He took refuge in Italy, and Tiberius allowed him to pass the remainder of his life at Ravenna. He died in 85, at the age of 83 years. (Tac. Ann. ii. 44-46, 62; Vell. Pat. ii. 108; Strab. p. 290.)

Maron (Μάρων), son of Evanthes, and grandson of Dionysus and Ariadne, priest of Apollo at Maronea in Thrace. He appears in Homer as the hero of sweet wine, and gives to Odysseus the cask which he carries with him to the Cyclops (Od. ix. 197). In this Homeric story it seems that Dionysus is hardly yet recognised as a deity [see p. 293, b]. Thrace is the country from which wine comes to the Homeric heroes, and Ismarus was known to the Greeks as an early home of the vine. Hence Maron is a personification of the viticulture of Ismarus, and his father Evanthes is really the local Dionysus (cf. Eur. Cycl. 141); but in the Odyssey Maron is priest, not of Dionysus, but of Apollo. Other stories connect Maron with Oenopion (i.e. with Cretan viticulture), and he appears as = Silenus, or one of the companions of Dionysus. (Propert. ii. 32, 14; Athen. p. 33; Diod. i. 18; Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 99.)

Marōnēa (Μαρώνεια; Μαρωνίτης; Marogna), a town on the S. coast of Thrace, situated on Coin of Maronea in Thrace (early in 3rd cent. B.C.).

Obv., horse; MAPP; rev., vine of Dionysus and caduceus; ΕΠΙ ΙΚΕΙΩ (magistrate's name).

the N. bank of the lake Ismarus and on the river Sthenas, more anciently called Ortageura (Hdt. vii. 109; Diod. i. 20; Plin. iv. 42). It belonged originally to the Cicones, but afterwards received colonists from Chios. It was celebrated for its excellent wine, and it is possible that Maron and Maronea are merely other forms of the name Ismarus. [ISMARUS, MARON.]

Marpessa (Μάρπησσα), daughter of Evenus and Alcippe. For details see IDAS.

Marpessa (Μάρπησσα), a mountain in Paros, from which the celebrated Parian marble was obtained. Hence Virgil (Aen. vi. 471) speaks of Marpesia cautes. [PAROS.]

Marrucini, a brave and warlike people in Italy, of the Sabellian race, occupying a narrow slip of country along the right bank of the river Aternus, and bounded on the N. by the Vestini, on the W. by the Pacligni and Marsi, on the S. by the Frentani, and on the E. by the Adriatic sea. Their chief town was TEATE, and at the mouth of the Aternus they possessed, in common with the Vestini, the seaport ATERNUM. Along with the Marsi, Pacligni, and the other Sabellian tribes they fought against Rome; and together with them they submitted to the Romans in B.C. 304 (Liv. ix. 41; App. B.C. i. 39, 52; Strab. p. 241).

Marrūvium or Marūvium. 1. (S. Benedetto), the chief town of the Marsi (who are therefore called gens Maruvia, Virg. Aen. vii. 750), situated on the E. bank of the lake Fucinus, and on the road between Corfiuum and Alba Fucentia. Under the Romans it was a flourishing municipium. (Strab. p. 241; Plin. iii. 106.)—2. A town of the Aborigines in the country of the Sabines, not to be confounded with No. 1 (Dionys. i. 14).

Mars, though in Latin literature completely identified with ARES and invested with all the Greek myths belonging to that deity, was an ancient Italian god in no way connected with Ares, identified with him after the Greek mythology prevailed, merely because both had come to be regarded as peculiarly gods of war. The oldest form of his name seems to have been Maurus, of which Mavors and Mars were variations, and the name was also reduplicated into Marmar and Mamers and Mamurius. The god was addressed also as Marspiter or Maspiter (Mars-pater). Of all the theories of his original significance the most probable is that Mars was primarily the god of the year, and especially of the spring season of the year, representing the strength of nature in its productions and births. Hence some have connected his name with Mas (i.e. manly vigour), while several modern writers who regard him as the sun-god and equivalent to Apollo derive his name from the root mar (cf. μαρμαίρω), to shine. There are, no doubt, certain aspects of the worship of Mars which present resemblances to that of Apollo and make it likely that he was sometimes regarded in Italy as a light-giving god, perhaps as god of the sun, and therefore probably called Mars Lucetius in some inscriptions. Among the points in which the old mythology and ritual of Mars are compared with those of Apollo are the expulsion of winter and darkness by Mars in the spring by the clashing of the Salian shields [cf. p. 88, b], and in the curious rites of the Mamuralia or Equirria. But these resemblances may just as easily be traced to the conception of Mars as the god of the year, and particularly of the vigorous growth of the year in spring. Hence Mars was worshipped especially in his own month, March, the time of returning spring, in somewhat the same way as the return of Apollo was celebrated at Delphi, and Mamurius Vetus may well have symbolised the old season and the darkness of winter driven out by the new [Dict. of Ant. art. Equirria and Salis]. For the same reason Mars was honoured with offerings of firstfruits in spring, and on special occasions by the dedication of everything born in a particular spring—the Ver Sacrum of Umbro-Sabellian tribes, which is said to have caused various ancient migrations [Dict. of Ant. s.v. For the story of ANNA PERENNA, as indicating a connexion of Mars with the year, see p. 72]. It was natural that the aspect assumed by Mars and his worship should vary according to the character and requirements of the community. Among herdsmen he was—like other deities to some extent associated with him, such as Faunus or Lupercus—a god who averted evil from herds, and by agriculturists as one who helped their field labours; and in this character he was specially invoked in the old ritual of the Fratres Arvales [Dict. of Ant. s.v.], and the ploughing ox was sacred to him. But the warlike tribes, as the Umbro-Sabellian nations were extending their conquests over Italy, regarded him more as their protector in war and leader in battle. Hence he was Mars Gradivus: that is, Mars who strides forward to the fight=θούριος Ἄρης (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 35). To this (whether or not it was the original use) belonged the war-dances of the Salii and their clashing of shields [Dict. of Ant. s.v.]; and the horse, as the warlike animal (bellator equus) was sacrificed to him (cf. Ov. Fast. i. 698; Verg. Georg. iii. 83). Mars was particularly the Sabine god (as Mars-Quirinus), but he was also a Latin god, second only to Jupiter and (at one time) Janus. Hence in the combination of both races at Rome there was a twofold settlement of this deity, the Mars of the Palatine associated with Picus and Faunus and with the story of Romulus and Remus, and the Mars-Quirinus of the Quirinal; and, while Jupiter of the Capitol became the supreme god of the city, and the provinces of agriculture &c. passed to other deities, Mars became gradually more exclusively the god of war, and when Greek mythology predominated was recognised as equivalent to Ares in all respects, though in ritual his original characteristics were traceable. He had his feminine counterpart in NERIO, the Sabine goddess of strength (cf. Suet. Tib. 1; Gell. xiii. 23), and from the myth of his sacred marriage with her was regarded as one of the deities who presided over marriage. It was perhaps for this reason that he was associated, too, with Juno, who was also worshipped on March 1st [see p. 463]. The legend that Mars was born from Juno, through the operation of a flower (Ov. Fast. v. 253) is due to Greek mythology. The most characteristic sanctuaries of Mars were the shrine in the Regia [Dict. of Ant. s.v.], where the sacred spears were kept, the movement of which was an omen of the utmost gravity (Liv. xl. 19; Gell. iv. 6); the Temple of Mars at the Porta Capena, from which the procession of knights started on July 15th; and his altar in the Campus Martius, where sacrifice was offered at the Equirria. Some trace of his still older worship under the symbol of a tree is traceable in the sacred oak of Mars (Suet. Vesp. 5), and the sacred fig which gave him the name Mars Ficanus. Of all the animals sacred to him the wolf was most regarded: the wolf was a symbol of Rome; was connected with the myths of her founder; was an omen specially noticed in battle (Liv. x. 27, xxii. 1). Some have taken the wolf as signifying winter subdued by Mars, or have compared the connexion of Apollo with the wolf. It is more probable that it was the sacred animal of some of the tribes, particularly of the Hirpini (whose name was derived from herpus=lupus), and that its dedication to Mars is a survival of that superstition. [For the representations of Mars, see ARES.]

Marsi. 1. A brave and warlike people of the Sabellian race, dwelt in the centre of Italy, in the high land surrounded by the mountains of the Apennines, in which the lake Fucinus is situated. Along with their neighbours the Paeligni, Marrucini, &c., they concluded a peace with Rome, B.C. 304. (Pol. ii. 24, 12; Liv. ix. 45.) Their bravery was proverbial; they were the prime movers of the celebrated war waged against Rome by the Socii or Italian allies in order to obtain the Roman franchise, and known by the name of the Marsic or Social war. Their chief town was MARRUVIUM.—The Marsi appear to have been acquainted with the medicinal properties of several of the plants growing upon their mountains, and to have employed them as remedies against the bites of serpents, and in other cases (Verg. Aen. vii. 750; Hor. Epod. xvii. 29; Sil. It. viii. 495; Plin. xxi. 78; Gell. xvi. 11). Hence they were regarded as magicians, and were said to be descended from a son of Circe (Plin. vii. 15). Others again derived their origin from the Phrygian Marsyas, simply on account of the resemblance of the name (Plin. iii. 108).—2. A people in Germany, appear to have dwelt originally on both banks of the Ems, and to have been only a tribe of the Cherusci, although Tacitus makes them one of the most ancient peoples in Germany. They joined the Cherusci in the war against the Romans which terminated in the defeat of Varus, but were subsequently driven into the interior of the country by Germanic invasions. (Tac. Germ. 2, Ann. i. 50, 56.)

Marsigni, a people in the SE. of Germany, of Suevic extraction (Tac. Germ. 43).

Marsus, Domitius, a Roman poet of the Augustan age. He was living after the death of Virgil, but died before B. C. 8 (Ov. Pont. iv. 16, 3). He seems to have been a friend of Maecenas (Mart. viii. 56, 21), but is not mentioned by Horace, though some critics think that the awkward lines Hor. Od. iv. 4, 20–22, are introduced to ridicule the Amazonis of Marsus. He wrote poems of various kinds, but his epigrams were the most celebrated of his productions. Hence he is frequently mentioned by Martial, who speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration (Mart. iv. 29, v. 5, vii. 99). He wrote a beautiful epitaph on Tibullus, which has come down to us:

‘Te quoque Vergilio comitem non aequa, Tibulle,
Mors juvenem campos misit ad Elysios,
Ne foret aut elegis molles qui feret amores,
Aut caneret forti regia bella pedem.’

Marsyas (Μαρσύας). 1. A mythological personage, connected with the earliest period of Greek music. He is variously called the son of Hyagnis, or of Oeagrus, or of Olympus. Some make him a satyr, others a peasant. All agree in placing him in Phrygia. The following is the outline of his story:—Athena having, while playing the flute, seen the reflection of herself in water, and observed the distortion of her features, threw away the instrument in disgust. It was picked up by Marsyas, who no sooner began to blow through it than the flute, having once been inspired by the breath of a goddess, emitted of its own accord the most beautiful strains. Elated by his success, Marsyas was rash enough to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, the conditions of which were that the victor should do what he pleased with the vanquished. The Muses, or, according to others, the Nysaeans, were the umpires. Apollo played upon the cithara and Marsyas upon the flute; and it was not till the former added his voice to the music of his lyre that the contest was decided in his favour. As a just punishment for the presumption of Marsyas, Apollo bound him to a tree, and flayed him alive. His blood was the source of the river Marsyas, and Apollo hung up his skin in the cave out of which that river flows. His flutes (for, according to some, the instrument on which he played was the double flute) were carried by the river Marsyas into the Macander, and again emerging in the Asopus, were thrown on land by it in the Sicyonian territory, and were dedicated to Apollo in his temple at Sicyon. (Hdt. vii. 26; Xen. An. i. 2, 8; Diod. iii. 58; Paus. ii. 7, 9; Ov. Met. vi. 382, 400; Hyg. Fab. 167; Apollod. i. 4, 2.)

The fable evidently refers to the struggle between the citharoedic and auloedic styles of music, of which the former was connected with the worship of Apollo among the Dorians, and the latter with the rites of Cybele in Phrygia.

Marsyas. (From a statue at Florence. Osterley, Denk. der alt. Kunst, part 2, tav. 14.)

In the fora of ancient cities there was frequently placed a statue of Marsyas, which was probably intended to hold forth an example of the severe punishment of arrogant presumption. The statue of Marsyas in the forum of Rome is well known by the allusions of Horace (Sat. i. 6, 120), Juvenal (ix. 1, 2), and Martial (ii. 64, 7).—2. A Greek historian, was the son of Periander, a native of Pella in Macedonia, a contemporary of Alexander, with whom he is said to have been educated. His principal work was a history of Macedonia, in ten books, from the earliest times to the wars of Alexander. He also wrote other works, the titles of which are given by Suidas. (Diod. xx. 50; Suid. s. v.)—3. Of Philippi, commonly called the Younger, to distinguish him from the preceding, was also a Greek historian. The period at which he flourished is uncertain. (Athen. p. 467.)

Marsyas (Μαρσῖας). 1. A small and rapid river of Phrygia, a tributary of the Maeander, took its rise, according to Xenophon, in the palace of the Persian kings at Celaenae, beneath the Acropolis, and fell into the Maeander, outside of the city. Pliny, however, states that its source was in the valley called Aulocrene, about ten miles from Apamea Cibotus, which city was on or near the site of Celaenae. (Xen. An. i. 2, 8; Plin. v. 106; Hdt. vii. 28; Curt. iii. 1; Strab. p. 578.) Some modern travellers have identified it with the insignificant Lidja, but it is more probably the larger Hudaverdi. The explanation of Mr. Hogarth (Journ. Hell. Stud. 1888) is that the Maeander was the united river formed by the junction of the streams of the Marsyas, Orgas, and Obrimas rising from three separate springs about Apamea, and acquired its separate name after the point where the lowest springs, the Obrimas = Lidja (also called Θερά or 'hot springs') joined the other two.—2. (Chinar-Chai), a considerable river of Caria, having its source in the district called Idrias, flowing NW. and N. through the middle of Caria, past Stratonicea and Alabanda, and falling into the S. side of the Maeander, nearly opposite to Tralles (Hdt. v. 118).—3. In Syria, a small tributary of the Orontes, into which it falls on the E. side, near Apamea (Plin. v. 81).—4 (or Massyas). A name given to the extensive plain in Syria through which the upper course of the Orontes flows, lying between the ranges of Casius and Lebanon, and reaching from Apamea on the N. to Laodicea ad Libanum on the S. (Strab. pp. 753, 755).

Martiālis. 1. M. Valērius, the epigrammatic poet, was born at Bilbilis in Spain, in the third year of Claudius, A. D. 43. He came to Rome in the thirteenth year of Nero, 66; and after residing in the metropolis thirty-five years, he returned to the place of his birth, in the third year of Trajan, 100. It is likely enough that he left Rome because Trajan did not approve of the obscenity which marked many of his poems. At Bilbilis he possessed an estate given to him, perhaps in admiration for his genius, by a wealthy lady named Marcella (xii. 31), who was probably only a patroness, though some believe her to have been his second wife; that he was married to her cannot be inferred from the expressions either in this epigram or in xii. 21, though it is not contradicted by them. His first, and perhaps his only, wife was named Cleopatra (iv. 22: unless that be a fancy name). He lived certainly to 101, perhaps to 104, but not later (Plin. Ep. iii. 21). His fame was extended and his books were eagerly sought for, not only in the city, but also in Gaul, Germany, and Britain; he secured the patronage of the emperors Titus and Domitian, and received for himself, although apparently without family, the privileges accorded to those who were the fathers of three children (jus trium liberorum), together with the rank of tribunos and the rights of the equestrian order (ii. 92, iii. 95, v. 13). His circumstances appear to have been easy during his residence at Rome, for he had a house in the city and a suburban villa near Nomentum (iii. 4, vi. 43, xii. 57); yet he complains of poverty (i. 77, iii. 38), whence some have imagined, that this was his wife's property, that he was divorced from her, and that so he became poor; but of all this there is no definite proof.—The extant works of Martial consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata, upwards of 1500 in number, divided into fourteen books. Those which form the last two books, usually distinguished respectively as Xenia and Aphoreta, amounting to 350, consist of distichs, descriptive of a vast variety of small objects, chiefly articles of food or clothing, such as were usually sent as presents among friends during the Saturnalia, and on other festive occasions. In addition to the above, nearly all the printed copies include thirty-three epigrams, forming a book apart from the rest, which has been commonly known as Liber de Spectaculis, because the contents relate to the shows exhibited by Titus and Domitian, but there is no ancient authority for the title. These three collections were first published, and then Martial proceeded to collect and publish his other epigrams in books, sometimes singly and sometimes several at one time. The Liber de Spectaculis and the first nine books of the regular series involve a great number of historical allusions, extending from the games of Titus (80) down to the return of Domitian from the Sarmatian expedition, in January, 94. The tenth book was published twice: the first edition was given hastily to the world; the second, that which we now read (x. 2), celebrates the arrival of Trajan at Rome, after his accession to the throne (99). The eleventh book seems to have been written mostly under Domitian, and published under Nerva. After a silence of three years (xii. proem.), the twelfth book was despatched from Bilbilis to Rome (xii. 3, 18), and must therefore be assigned to 101.—It is well known that the word Epigram, which originally denoted simply an inscription, was in process of time applied to any brief metrical effusion, whatever the subject might be, or whatever the form under which it was presented. Martial, however, first placed the epigram upon the narrow basis which it now occupies, and from his time the term has been in a great measure restricted to devote a short poem, in which all the thoughts and expressions converge to one sharp point, which forms the termination of the piece. Martial's epigrams are distinguished by singular fertility of imagination, prodigious flow of wit, and delicate felicity of language; and from no source do we derive more copious information on the national customs and social habits of the Romans during the first century of the empire. But, however much we admire the genius of the author, we feel no respect for the character of the man. The servile adulation with which he loads Domitian proves that he was a courtier of the lowest class; and, however much we may be attracted by the brilliancy and grace of much of his poetry, it is impossible to condone the obscenity which is scattered broadcast over his writings, evidently with no idea of moral censure but rather from impurity of thought.—The best edition of Martial is by Friedländer (Lips. 1836), whose Sittengeschichte Roms provides also an excellent commentary on Martial and Juvenal; select epigrams by Paley and Stone, 1881; Stephenson, 1888; books i. and ii. by J. E. B. Mayor. —2. Gargilius, a contemporary of Alexander Severus, who is cited by Vopiscus (Prob. ii. 7). He wrote on husbandry and medicinal herbs, and on veterinary art, following Pliny in many points. The fourth book of the Medicina Plinii (i.e. extracts on medicines from Pliny) was made up of excerpts from Gargilius Martialis. Part of his work on gardens was found by A. Mai on a palimpsest in the Royal Library at Naples.

Martiniānus, was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, by Licinius, when he was making preparations for the last struggle against Constantine. After the defeat of Licinius, Martinianus was put to death by Constantine, A.D. 323. (Vict. de Caes. 41.)

Martius Campus. [ROMA.]

Martyrōpōlis, or Maipheraeta (Μαρτυρόπολις; Meia Farekin), a city of Sophene, in Armenia Major, on the river Nymphus, a tributary of the Tigris; under Justinian, a strong fortress, and the residence of the first Dux Armeniae (Procop. de Aed. iii. 2).

Marullus, C. Epidius, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 44, removed, in conjunction with his colleague L. Caesetius Flavius, the diadem which had been placed upon the statue of C. Julius Caesar, and attempted to bring to trial the persons who had saluted the dictator as king. Caesar, in consequence, deprived him of the tribunate, and expelled him from the senate. (Dio Cass. xlv. 9; Suet. Jul. 79; Vell. Pat. ii. 68; Cic. Phil. xiii. 15, 31.)

Marūvium. [MARRUVIUM.]

Marus (Mareh), a river flowing into the Danube near Carnuntum (Tac. Ann. ii. 63).

Mascas (Μάσκας, Μασκάς; Wady-el-Seba), an E. tributary of the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia, mentioned only by Xenophon (Anab. i. 5), who describes it as surrounding the city of Corsete, and as being 35 parasangs from the Chaboras.

Mases (Μάσης; Μασήτιος), a town on the S. coast of Argolis, the harbour of Heruione (Il. ii. 562; Strab. p. 376; Paus. ii. 36, 2).

Māsīnissa (Μασσανάσις), king of the Numidians, was the son of Gala, king of the Massylians, the easternmost of the two great tribes into which the Numidians were at that time divided; but he was brought up at Carthage, where he appears to have received an education superior to that usual among his countrymen. In B.C. 212 the Carthaginians persuaded Gala to declare war against Syphax, king of the neighbouring tribe of the Massaesylans, who had lately entered into an alliance with Rome. Masinissa was appointed by his father to command the invading force, with which he attacked and totally defeated Syphax. In the next year (211) Masinissa crossed over into Spain, and supported the Carthaginian generals there with a large body of Numidian horse. He fought on the side of the Carthaginians for some years; but after their great defeat by Scipio in 206, he secretly promised the latter to support the Romans as soon as they should send an army into Africa. (Liv. xxvii. 20, xxviii. 13, 16, 35; Pol. xi. 21; Appian, Hisp. 25, 27.) In his desertion of the Carthaginians he is said to have been also actuated by resentment against Hasdrubal, who had previously betrothed to him his beautiful daughter Sophonisba, but violated his engagement in order to bestow her hand upon Syphax, whose alliance the Carthaginians now preferred to that of Masinissa.—During the absence of Masinissa in Spain, his father Gala had died, and the throne had been seized by a usurper; but Masinissa on his return soon expelled the usurper and obtained possession of the kingdom (Liv. xxix. 29). He was now attacked by Syphax and the Carthaginians, who were anxious to crush him before he could receive assistance from Rome. He was repeatedly defeated by Syphax and his generals, and with difficulty escaped falling into the hands of his enemies. But the arrival of Scipio in Africa (204) soon changed the posture of affairs. Masinissa instantly joined the Roman general, and rendered the most important services to him during the remainder of the war. He took a prominent part in the defeat of the combined forces of Syphax and Hasdrubal, and in conjunction with Laelius was reduced Cirta, the capital of Syphax. Among the captives that fell into their hands on this occasion was Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax, and the same who had been formerly promised in marriage to Masinissa himself. The story of his hasty marriage with her, and its tragical termination, is related elsewhere. [SOPHONISBA.] In the decisive battle of Zama (202), Masinissa commanded the cavalry of the right wing, and contributed in no small degree to the successful result of the day. (Liv. xxx. 29–35; Pol. xv. 12.) On the conclusion of the final peace between Rome and Carthage, he was rewarded with the greater part of the territories which had belonged to Syphax, in addition to his hereditary dominions (Liv. xxx. 44; Pol. xv. 18). From this time till the commencement of the third Punic war there elapsed an interval of more than 50 years, during the whole of which period Masinissa continued to reign with undisputed authority over the countries thus subjected to his rule. At length, in 150, he declared open war against Carthage, and these hostilities led to the outbreak of the third Punic war. Masinissa died in the second year of the war, 148. On his death-bed he had sent for Scipio Africanus the younger, at that time serving in Africa as a military tribune, but he expired before his arrival, leaving it to the young officer to settle the affairs of his kingdom. He died at the advanced age of 90, having retained in an extraordinary degree his bodily strength and activity to the last, so that in the war against the Carthaginians, only two years before, he commanded his army in person. His character has been often assailed for his desertion of the Carthaginians, and it must be admitted that he was not a man of scrupulous faith. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that as a native prince he had reason to hate Carthaginian oppression, and that personally he had wrongs and want of faith on their part to resent. It is impossible to deny his claims to respect for the vigour and success of his rule and his unconquerable energy and fortitude. He was the father of a numerous family; but three only of his legitimate sons survived him, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa. Between these three the kingdom was portioned out by Scipio, according to the dying directions of the old king. (Pol. xxxvii. 3; App. Pun. 71, 106; Val. Max. viii. 13; Cic. de Sen. 10; Sall. Jug. 5.)

Masius Mons (τὸ Μάσιον ὄρος: Karajeh Daghi), a mountain chain in the N. of Mesopotamia, between the upper course of the Tigris and the Euphrates, running from the main chain of the Taurus SE. along the border of Mygdonia (Strab. p. 506).

Maso, C. Papirius, consul B.C. 231, carried on war against the Corsicans, whom he subdued; and from the booty obtained in this war he dedicated a temple to FONS. Maso was the maternal grandfather of Scipio Africanus the younger, his daughter Papiria marrying Aemilius Paulus. (Val. Max. iii. 6, 5.)

Massa, Baebius, or Bebius, was accused by Pliny the younger and Herennius Senecio of plundering the province of Baetica, of which he had been governor, A.D. 93. He was condemned, but escaped punishment by the favour of Domitian, and from this time he became one of the informers and favourites of the tyrant. (Tac. Hist. iv. 50, Agr. 45; Juv. i. 34; Mart. xii. 29.)

Massaesylis or -ii. [MAURETANIA: NUMIDIA.]

Massāga (τὰ Μάσσαγα), the capital city of the Indian people ASSACENI.

Massāgētae (Μασσαγέται), a wild and warlike people of Central Asia, in Scythia intra Imaium, N. of the Jaxartes (the Araxes of Herodotus) and the Sea of Aral, and on the peninsula between this lake and the Caspian. Their country corresponds to that of the Kirghiz Tartars in the N. of Independent Tartary. Some of the ancient geographers give them a greater extent towards the SE., and Herodotus appears to include under the name all the nomad tribes of Asia E. of the Caspian. They appear to have been of the Turkoman race; their manners and customs resembled those of the Scythians in general, except that they had a practice of killing and eating their aged people. (Hdt. i. 201-214; Strab. p. 512; Arrian, An. iv. 16.) Their chief appearance in ancient history is in connexion with the expedition undertaken against them by Cyrus the Great, in which Cyrus was defeated and slain. [CYRUS.]

Massāni (Μασσανοί), a people of India, on the lower Indus, near the Island of Pattalene (Diod. xv. 102).

Massicus Mons, a range of hills in the NW. of Campania near the frontiers of Latium, celebrated for its excellent wine, the produce of the vineyards on the southern slope of the mountain, which have a volcanic soil. The celebrated Falernian wine came from the eastern side of this mountain. (Verg. Georg. ii. 143, Aen. vii. 724; Hor. Od. i. 1, 19; Col. iii. 8.)

Massicytus or Massicytes (Μασσικύτης), one of the principal mountain chains of LYCIA.

Massilia (Μασσαλία: Μασσαλιώτης, Massiliensis: Marsailles), a Greek city in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the country of the Salyes. It was situated on a promontory, which was connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, and was washed on three sides by the sea. Its excellent harbour, called Lacydon (Mel. ii. 5), the old port, was formed by a small inlet of the sea, about half a mile long and a quarter of a mile broad. This harbour had only a narrow opening, and before it lay an island, where ships had good anchorage.

Massilia was founded by the Phocaeans of Asia Minor about B.C. 600, according to the traditions, by friendly agreement with the natives, and soon became a very flourishing city. (Athen. p. 576; Justin. xliii. 3.) It extended its dominion over the barbarous tribes in its neighbourhood, and planted several colonies on the coast of Gaul and Spain, such as ANTIPOLIS, NICAEA, and EMPORIUM. Its naval power and commercial greatness soon excited the jealousy of the Carthaginians, who made war upon the city, but the Massilians not only maintained their independence, but defeated the Carthaginians in a sea-fight (Thuc. i. 13; Paus. x. 8, 6). At an early period they cultivated the friendship of the Romans, to whom they always continued faithful allies. Accordingly when the SE. corner of Gaul was made a Roman province, the Romans allowed Massilia to retain its independence and its own constitution. (Liv. xxi. 20; Pol. iii. 95; Cic. pro Font. 1; Caes. B. C. i. 35.) This constitution was aristocratic. The city was governed by a senate of 600 persons called Timuchi. From these were selected 15 presidents, who formed a sort of committee for carrying on the ordinary business of the government, and three of these were intrusted with the executive power. (Strab. p. 179; Cic. de Rep. i. 27, 43.) The inhabitants retained the religious rites of their mother country, and they honoured especially the Ephesian Artemis, whose statue was said to have been brought from Ephesus together with the shoot of the first olive planted at Massilia. Massilia was for many centuries one of the most important commercial cities in the ancient world. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey (B.C. 49), it espoused the cause of the latter, but after a protracted siege, in which it lost its fleet, it was obliged to submit to Caesar. (Caes. B. C. i. 34-36, ii. 1-22; Dio Cass. xli. 25.) Its inhabitants had long paid attention to literature and philosophy; and under the early emperors it became one of the chief seats of learning, to which the sons of many illustrious Romans resorted to complete their studies, but it never regained its old importance under the Roman empire.—The modern Marseilles occupies the site of the ancient town, but contains no remains of ancient buildings.

Massīva. 1. A Numidian, grandson of Gah, king of the Massylians, and nephew of Masinissa, whom he accompanied into Spain (Liv. xxvii. 19).—2. Son of Gulussa, and grandson of Masinissa, was assassinated at Rome by order of Jugurtha, because he claimed the kingdom of Numidia (Sall. Jug. 35; Liv. Ep. 64).

Massūrius Sabinus. [SABINUS.]

Massyli or -ii. [MAURETANIA: NUMIDIA.]

Mastanābal or Manastābal, the youngest of the three legitimate sons of Masinissa, between whom Numidia was divided by Scipio after the death of the aged king (B.C. 148). He died before his brother Micipsa, and left two sons, Jugurtha and Gauda. (App. Pun. 106; Sall. Jug. 5, 65.)

Mastaura (τὰ Μάστουρα: Mastavro, Ru.), a city of Lydia on the borders of Caria, near Nysa (Strab. p. 650).

Mastiāni (Μαστιανοί), a people on the S. coast of Spain between Calpe and Nova Carthago (Pol. iii. 33).

Mastūsia. 1. The SW. point of the Thracian Chersouesus, opposite Sigeum.—2. A mountain of Lydia, on the S. slope of which Smyrna lay.

Maternus, Curiatius, a Roman rhetorician and tragic poet (Tac. Dial. 2, 5, 11).

Maternus Firmicus. [FIRMICUS.]

Mātho. 1. One of the leaders of the Carthaginian mercenaries in their war against Carthage, after the conclusion of the first Punic war, B.C. 241. He was eventually taken prisoner and put to death (Pol. i. 69-88).—2. A pompous, blustering advocate, ridiculed by Juvenal and Martial (Juv. i. 30; Mart. iv. 80, vii. 10).

Mātho, Pompōnius. 1. M', consul B.C. 233, carried on war against the Sardinians, whom he defeated. In 217 he was magister equitum; in 216 praetor; and in 215 propraetor in Cisalpine Gaul (Liv. xxii. 33, xxiv. 10).—2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 231, also carried on war against the Sardinians. He was likewise praetor in 217. He died in 204. (Liv. xxix. 38).—3. M., probably son of No. 2, aedile 206, and praetor 204, with Sicily as his province (Liv. xxxi. 12).

Matīāna (Ματιανή, Ματιανοί, -νή, -ηνοί, Hdt.), the SW.-most district of Media Atropatene, along the mountains separating Media from Assyria, of which the inhabitants were called Matiani. The great salt lake of Spaura (Ματιανή λίμνη: Lake of Urmī) was in this district. Their territory extended up into Armenia. (Hdt. iii. 94, v. 52; Strab. pp. 73, 509.)

Matinius, a Roman money-lender and banker (Cic. ad Att. v. 21; SCAPTIVS).

Matīnus, a mountain in Apulia, running into the sea, was one of the offshoots of Mons Garganus, and is frequently mentioned by Horace in consequence of his being a native of Apulia (Hor. Od. i. 28, 3, iv. 2, 27, Epod. 16, 28).

Matisco (Μάκον), a town of the Aedni in Gallia Lugdunensis on the Arar (Caes. B. G. vii. 90, viii. 4).

Matīus Calvēna, C., a Roman eques, and a friend of Caesar and Cicero. After Caesar's death he espoused the side of Octavianus, with whom he became very intimate. (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 27, 28, ad Att. ix. 11, xiv. 1, xvi. 11; Suet. Jul. 52; Tac. Ann. xii. 60.)

Matron (Μάρτων), of Pitana, a celebrated writer of parodies upon Homer, probably lived a little before the time of Philip of Macedon (Athen. pp. 5, 31, 699).

Matrōna (Marne), a river in Gaul, which formed the boundary between Gallia Lugdunensis and Belgica, and which falls into the Sequana, a little S. of Paris (Caes. B. G. i. 1).

Mattiāci, a people in Germauy, who dwelt on the E. bank of the Rhine, between the Main and the Lahn, and were a branch of the Chatti. They were subdued by the Romans, who, in the reign of Claudius, had fortresses and silvermines in their country. After the death of Nero they revolted against the Romans and took part with the Chatti and other German tribes in the siege of Moguntiacum. (Tac. Germ. 29, Ann. xi. 20, Hist. iv. 37.) From this time they disappear from history; and their country was subsequently inhabited by the Alemani. Their chief towns were Aquae Mattiacae (Wiesbaden), and Mattiacum (Marburg), which must not be confounded with Mattium, the capital of the Chatti. A sort of pomade called Mattiacae pilae was imported by the Romans from their country (Mart. xiv. 27; Dict. of Ant. art. Sapo).

Mattium (Maden), the chief town of the Chatti, situated on the Adrana (Eder), was destroyed by Germanicus (Tac. Ann. i. 56).

Matūta, commonly called Mater Matūta, was an old Italian goddess of the dawn, and her name is connected with mane, matutinus (Lucret. v. 656; Fest. p. 122). Like other goddesses of light, she was a goddess of child-birth and therefore invoked by women. Hence she was worshipped by married women at the Matralia on the 11th of June (Varro, L. L. v. 106; Ov. Fast. vi. 475). She was also worshipped as a goddess of the sea and of harbours, like Ino Leucothea, with whom she was identified. [Dict. of Ant. art. Matralia.] A temple was dedicated to Matuta at Rome in the Forum Boarium by king Servius, and was restored by the dictator Camillus, after the taking of Veii (Liv. v. 19, xxv. 7). Other noted seats of her worship were at Satricum in the Volscian territory, and at Pisaurum (Liv. vi. 33; C. I. L. i. 177).

Maurētānia or Mauritānia (ἡ Μαυρονσία: Μαυρόσιοι, Μαύροι, Maurusii, Mauri), the W.-most of the divisions of N. Africa, lay between the Atlantic on the W., the Mediterranean on the N., Numidia on the E., and Gaetulia on the S.; but the districts embraced under the names of Mauretania and Numidia respectively were of very different extent at different periods. The earliest known inhabitants of all N. Africa W. of the Syrtes were the Gaetulians, who were displaced and driven inland by peoples of Asiatic origin, who are found in the earliest historical accounts settled along the N. coast under various names; their chief tribes being the Mauri or Maurusii, W. of the river Malva or Malucha (Muluia or Mohalou); thence the Massaclyii, to (or nearly to) the river Ampsaga (Wady-el-Kebir), and the Massylii between the Ampsaga and the Tusca (Wady-Zain), the W. boundary of the Carthaginian territory. Of these people, the Mauri, who possessed a greater breadth of fertile country between the Atlas and the coasts, seem to have applied themselves more to the settled pursuits of agriculture than their kindred neighbours on the E., whose unsettled warlike habits were moreover confirmed by their greater exposure to the intrusions of the Phœnician settlers. Hence arose a difference, which the Greeks marked by applying the general name of Νομάδες to the tribes between the Malva and the Tusca; whence came the Roman names of Numidia for the district, and Numidae for its people. [NUMIDIA.] Thus Mauretania was at first only the country W. of the Malva, and corresponded to the later district of Mauretania Tingitana, and to the modern empire of Marocco, except that the latter extends further S.; the ancient boundary on the S. was the Atlas. The Romans first became acquainted with the country during the war with Jugurtha, B.C. 106; of their relations with it, till it became a Roman province, about 83, an account is given under Bocchus. During this period the kingdom of Mauretania had been increased by the addition of the W. part of Numidia, as far as Saldæ, which Julius Caesar bestowed on Bogud, as a reward for his services in the African war. A new arrangement was made about 25, when Augustus gave Mauretania to Juba II., in exchange for his paternal kingdom of Numidia. (Tac. Ann. iv. 23; Dio Cass. lix. 25; Suet. Cal. 26; Strab. pp. 828, 831, 840.) Upon the murder of Juba's son, Ptolemaeus, by Caligula (A.D. 40), Mauretania became finally a Roman province, and was formally constituted as such by Claudius, who added to it nearly half of what was still left of Numidia—namely, as far as the Ampsaga—and divided it into two parts, of which the W. was called Tingitana, from its capital Tingis (Tangier), and the E. Caesariensis from its capital Julia Caesarea (Zershell), the boundary between them being the river Malva, the old limit of the kingdom of Bocchus I. (Dio Cass. lx. 9; Plin. v. 2; Tac. Hist. i. 11.) The latter corresponded to the W. and central part of the modern regency (and now French colony) of Algiers. These 'Mauretaniae duae' were governed by an equestrian procurator. In the later division of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, the E. part of Caesariensis, from Saldæ to the Ampsaga, was erected into a new province, and called M. Sitifensis from the inland town of Sitif (Setif); at the same time the W. province, M. Tingitana, seems to have been placed under the same government as Spain, so that we still find mention of the 'Mauretaniae duae,' meaning now, however, Caesariensis and Sitifensis. From A.D. 429 to 534 Mauretania was in the hands of the Vandals, and in 650 and the following years it was conquered by the Arabs. Its chief physical features are described under AFRICA and ATLAS.

Mauri. [MAURETANIA.]

Mauriciānus, Junius, a Roman jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius (A.D. 138–161). His works are cited in the Digest.

Mauricus, Junius, an intimate friend of Pliny, was banished by Domitian, but recalled from exile by Nerva (Plin. Ep. iv. 22; Tac. Hist. iv. 40, Agr. 45).

Mauritania. [MAURETANIA.]

Maurus, Terentiānus. [TERENTIANUS.]

Maurusii. [MAURETANIA.]

Mausōlus or Maussōlus (Μαύσωλος or Μάυσωλος), king of Caria, was the eldest son of Hecatomnus, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty, B.C. 377. In 362 he took part in the general revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes Mnemon, and availed himself of that opportunity to extend his dominions. In 358 he joined with the Rhodians and others in the war waged by them against the Athenians, known by the name of the Social war. He died in 353, leaving no children, and was succeeded by his wife and sister Artemisia. The extravagant grief of the latter for his death, and the honours she paid to his memory—especially by the erection of the costly monument which was called from him the Mausoleum—are related elsewhere. [ARTEMISIA.] (For an account of the Mausoleum, see Dict. of Ant. s.v.)

Mavors. [MARS.]

Maxentius, Roman emperor A.D. 306–312, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maxentius. He was the son of Maximianus and Eutropia, and received in marriage the daughter of Galerius; but he was passed over in the division of the empire which followed the abdication of his father and Diocletian in A.D. 305. Maxentius, however, did not tamely acquiesce in this arrangement, and, being supported by the praetorian troops, who had been recently deprived of their exclusive privileges, he was proclaimed emperor at Rome in 306. He summoned his father, Maximianus, from his retirement in Lucania, who again assumed the purple. The military abilities of Maximianus were of great service to his son, who was of indolent and dissolute habits. Maximianus compelled the Caesar Severus, who had marched upon Rome, to retreat in haste to Ravenna, and soon afterwards treacherously put him to death (307). The emperor Galerius now marched in person against Rome, but Maximianus compelled him likewise to retreat. Soon afterwards Maxentius, having shaken off his father's control, crossed over to Africa, which he ravaged with fire and sword, because it had submitted to the independent authority of a certain Alexander. Upon his return to Rome Maxentius openly aspired to dominion over all the Western provinces, and declared war against Constantine, alleging, as a pretext, that the latter had put to death his father Maximianus. He began to make preparations to pass into Gaul; but Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at Saxa Rubra near Rome, October 27th, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. Maxentius is represented as a monster of rapacity, cruelty, and lust. (Zos. ii. 9–18; Zonar. xii. 33, xiii. 1.)

Maxilūa, a town in Hispania Baetica, where bricks were made so light as to swim upon water. See CALENTUM.

Maxima Caesariensis. [BRITANNIA.]

Maximianopolis (Μαξιμιανούπολις: O. T. Hadad Rimmon). 1. A city of Palestine, in the valley of Megiddo, a little to the SW. of Megiddo.—2. Also called Porsulæ, a town in Thrace on the Via Egnatia, NE. of Abdera (Procop. de Aed. iv. 11).

Maximiānus, I., Roman emperor, A.D. 286–305, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maximianus. He was born of humble parents in Pannonia, and had acquired such fame by his services in the army, that Diocletian selected this rough soldier for his colleague, and created him first Caesar (285), and then Augustus (286), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Herculius, while he himself assumed that of Jovius. The subsequent history of Maximian has been fully detailed in former articles. [DIOCLETIANUS; CONSTANTINUS I.; MAXENTIUS.] It is sufficient to relate hero that, after having been compelled to abdicate, at Milan (305), he was again invested with the imperial title by his son Maxentius, in the following year (306), to whom he rendered important services in the war with Severus and Galerius. Having been expelled from Rome shortly afterwards by his son, he took refuge in Gaul with Constantine, to whom he had given his daughter Fansta in marriage. Here he again attempted to resume the imperial throne, but was easily deposed by Constantine (308). Two years afterwards he endeavoured to induce his daughter Fansta to destroy her husband, and was in consequence compelled by Constantine to put an end to his own life (Zosim. ii. 7-11; Zonar. xii. 31-33).—II., Roman emperor, A.D. 305-311, usually called Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born near Sardica in Dacia, and was the son of a shepherd. He rose from the ranks to the highest commands in the army, and was appointed Caesar by Diocletian, along with Constantius Chlorus, in 292. At the same time he was adopted by Diocletian, whose daughter Valeria he received in marriage, and was entrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In 297 he undertook an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, in which he was unsuccessful, but in the following year (298) he defeated Narses with great slaughter, and compelled him to conclude a peace. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian (305), Galerius became Augustus or emperor. In 307 he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover Italy, which had owned the authority of the usurper Maxentius. [MAXENTIUS.] He died in 311. He was a cruel persecutor of the Christians; and it was at his instigation that Diocletian issued the ordinance (303) which for so many years deluged the world with innocent blood. (Zosim. ii. 8-11; Zonar. xii. 31-34; Euseb. H. E. x. 1-3.)

Maximinus. I., Roman emperor A.D. 235-238, whose full name was C. Julius Verus Maximinus, was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parentage. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus, by his gigantic stature and marvellous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He rose to the highest rank in the service; and on the murder of Alexander Severus by the troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Caesar on his son Maximus. During his reign he carried on war against the Germans with success; but his government was characterised by a degree of oppression and cruelty hitherto unexampled. The Roman world at length tired of this monster. The senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the two Gordians, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after their death the senate itself proclaimed Maximus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordians, he hastened from his winter-quarters at Sirmium. Having crossed the Alps, he laid siege to Aquileia, and was there slain by his own soldiers along with his son Maximus, in April. The most extraordinary tales are related of the physical powers of Maximinus, which are almost incredible. His height exceeded eight feet. The circumference of his thumb was equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. It is said that he was able single-handed to drag a loaded waggon, could with his fist knock out the teeth, and with a kick break the leg, of a horse (Script. Aug. Maximin. Duo; Herodian, vii. viii).—II., Roman emperor 305-314, originally called Daza, and subsequently Galerius Valerius Maximinus. He was the nephew of Galerius by a sister, and in early life was a shepherd in his native Illyria. Having entered the army, he rose to the highest rank in the service; and upon the abdication of Diocletian in 305, he was adopted by Galerius and received the title of Caesar. In 308 Galerius gave him the title of Augustus; and on the death of the latter in 311, Maximinus and Licinius divided the East between them. In 313 Maximinus attacked the dominions of Licinius, who had gone to Milan, to marry the sister of Constantine. He was, however, defeated by Licinius near Heraclea, and fled to Tarsus, where he soon after died. Maximinus surpassed all his contemporaries in the profligacy of his private life, in the general cruelty of his administration, and in the hatred with which he persecuted the Christians. (Zosim. ii. 8; Euseb. H. E. ix. 2.)

Maximus. 1. Of Ephesus or Smyrna, one of the teachers of the emperor Julian, to whom he was introduced by Aedesius. Maximus was a philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, and, like many others of that school, both believed in and practised magic. On the accession of Julian, Maximus was held in high honour at the court, and accompanied the emperor on his fatal expedition against the Persians, which he had prophesied would be successful. In 364 he was accused of having caused by sorcery the illness of the emperors Valens and Valentinian, and was thrown into prison, where he was exposed to cruel tortures. He owed his liberation to the philosopher Themistius. In 371 Maximus was accused of taking part in a conspiracy against Valens, and was put to death (Amm. Marc. xxix. 1).—2. Of Epirus, or perhaps of Byzantium, was also an instructor of the emperor Julian in philosophy and heathen theology. He wrote in Greek, De insolubilibus Oppositionibus, published by H. Stephans, Paris, 1554, appended to the edition of Dionysius Halicarnassus, as well as other works.

Maximus, Fabius. 1. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, was the son of M. Fabius Ambustus, consul B.C. 360. Fabius was master of the horse to the dictator L. Papirius Cursor in 325, whose anger he incurred by giving battle to the Samnites during the dictator's absence, and contrary to his orders. Victory availed Fabius nothing in exculpation. A hasty flight to Rome, where the senate, the people, and his aged father interceded for him with Papirius, barely rescued his life, but could not avert his degradation from office. (Liv. viii. 29-35; Val. Max. ii. 7.) In 322 Fabius obtained his first consulship. It was the second year of the second Samnite war, and Fabius was the most eminent of the Roman generals in that long and arduous struggle for the empire of Italy. In 315 he was dictator, and was completely defeated by the Samnites at Lautulae. In 310 he was consul for the second time, and carried on the war against the Etruscans. In 308 he was consul a third time, and is said to have defeated the Samnites and Umbrians. (Liv. ix. 22-42; Diod. xx. 27-44.) He was censor in 304, when he seems to have confined the libertini to the four city tribes, and to have increased the political importance of the equites (Liv. ix. 46). In 297 he was consul for the fifth time, and in 296 for the sixth time. In the latter year he commanded at the great battle of Sentinum, when the combined armies of the Samnites, Gauls, Etruscans, and Umbrians were defeated by the Romans. (Liv. x. 21-30.)

—2. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgus, or the Glutton, from the dissoluteness of his youth, son of the last. His mature manhood atoned for his early irregularities. (Juv. vi. 267; Macrob. ii. 9.) He was consul 292, and was completely defeated by the Pentrian Samnites. He escaped degradation from the consulate, only through his father's offer to serve as his lieutenant for the remainder of the war. In a second battle the consul retrieved his reputation, and was rewarded with a triumph, of which the most remarkable feature was old Fabius riding beside his son's chariot. (Plut. Fab. 24; Dionys. xvi. 15.) He was consul the second time 276. Shortly afterwards he went as legatus from the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. He was consul a third time, 265.—3. Q. Fabius Maximus, with the agnomen Verrucosus, from a wart on his upper lip, Ovicula, or the Lamb, from the mildness or apathy of his temper, and Cunctator, from his caution in war, was grandson of Fabius Gurgus (Plut. Fab. i.; Varr. R. R. ii. 1). He was consul for the first time 233, when Lignria was his province; censor 230; consul a second time 228; opposed the agrarian law of C. Flaminius 227; was dictator for holding the comitia in 221; and in 218 was legatus from the senate to Carthage, to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum. In 217, immediately after the defeat at Trasimenus, Fabius was appointed dictator. From this period, so long as the war with Hannibal was merely defensive, Fabius became the leading man at Rome. On taking the field he laid down a simple and immutable plan of action. He avoided all direct encounter with the enemy; moved his camp from highland to highland, where the Numidian horse and Spanish infantry could not follow him; watched Hannibal's movements with unrelaxing vigilance, and cut off his stragglers and foragers. The narratives of his enclosure of Hannibal in one of the upland valleys between Cales and the Vulturinus, and the Carthaginian's adroit escape by driving oxen with blazing faggots fixed to their horns up the hill-sides, are well-known. But at Rome and in his own camp the caution of Fabius was misinterpreted. It is probable, also, that a more forward strategy was now advisable to prevent Hannibal from carrying out his projects, though the tactics of Fabius were of the highest value in order to give the Romans time to regain some confidence after Trasimene. The expedient, however, which was adopted was absurd: the people divided the command between him and M. Minucius Rufus, his master of the horse. Minucius was speedily entrapped, and would have been destroyed by Hannibal had not Fabius generously hastened to his rescue. Fabius was consul for the third time in 215, and for the fourth time in 214. In 213 he served as legatus to his own son, Q. Fabius, consul in that year, and an anecdote is preserved which exemplifies the strictness of the Roman discipline. On entering the camp at Succsula, Fabius advanced on horseback to greet his son. He was passing the lictors when the consul sternly bade him dismount. 'My son,' exclaimed the elder Fabius, 'I wished to see whether you would remember that you were consul.' (Liv. xxiv. 44.) Fabius was consul for the fifth time in 209, in which year he retook Tarentum. In the closing years of the second Punic war Fabius appears to less advantage. The war had become aggressive (and rightly so) under a new race of generals. Fabius disapproved of the new tactics; he dreaded the political supremacy of Scipio, and was his uncompromising opponent in his scheme of invading Africa. He died in 203. (Life by Plutarch; Pol. iii. 87-106; Liv. xx.-xxx.; Appian, Annib. 11-16; Cic. de Sen. 4, 17.)—4. Q. Fabius Maximus, elder son of the preceding, was praetor 214 and consul 213. He was legatus to the consul M. Livius Salinator 207. He died soon after this period, and his funeral oration was pronounced by his father. (Cic. N. D. iii. 32.)—5. Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus, was by birth the eldest son of L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, and was adopted by No. 3. Fabius served under his father (Aemilius) in the Macedonian war, 168, and was despatched by him to Rome with the news of his victory at Pydna. (Pol. xxix. 6.) He was praetor in Sicily 149-148, and consul in 145. Spain was his province, where he encountered, and at length defeated, Viriathus. Fabius was the pupil and patron of the historian Polybius. (Pol. xviii., xxxii. 8-10; Liv. xlv. 35.)—6. Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus, son of the last. He was consul 121; and he derived his surname from the victory which he gained in this year over the Allobroges and their ally, Bituitus, king of the Arverni in Gaul. He was censor in 108. He was an orator and a man of letters. (Cic. pro Mur. 36, 75; Plin. vii. 166.)—7. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, was adopted from the gens Servilia by No. 5. He was uterine brother of Cn. Servilius Caepio, consul in 141. He himself was consul in 142, when he carried on war with Viriathus. (Appian, Hisp. 70.)

Maximus, Magnus Clemens, Roman emperor, A.D. 383-388, in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, was a native of Spain. He was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Britain in 383, and forthwith crossed over to Gaul to oppose Gratian, who was defeated by Maximus, and was shortly afterwards put to death. Theodosius found it expedient to recognise Maximus as emperor of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, in order to secure Valentinian in the possession of Italy. Maximus, however, aspired to the undivided empire of the West, and accordingly in 387 he invaded Italy at the head of a formidable army. Valentinian was unable to resist him, and fled to Theodosius in the East. Theodosius forthwith prepared to avenge his colleague. In 388 he forced his way through the Noric Alps, took Aquileia by storm and there put Maximus to death. Victor, the son of Maximus, was defeated and slain in Gaul by Arbogates, the general of Theodosius. (Zosim. iv. 35 ff.; Oros. vii. 34 ff.)

Maximus, Petronius, Roman emperor, A.D. 455, belonged to a noble Roman family, and enjoyed some of the highest offices of stato under Honorius and Valentinian III. In consequence of the violence offered to his wife by Valentinian, Maximus formed a conspiracy against this emperor, who was assassinated, and Maximus himself proclaimed emperor in his stead. His reign, however, lasted only two or three months. Having forced Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, to marry him, she resolved to avenge the death of her former husband, and accordingly Genseric was invited to invade Italy. When Genseric landed at the mouth of the Tiber, Maximus was slain by a band of Burgundian mercenaries, commanded by some old officers of Valentinian. (Procop. B. Vand. i. 4, 5; Sidon. Ep. i. 9, ii. 13.)

Maximus Planudes. [PLANUDES.]

Maximus Tyrius, a native of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and Platonic philosopher, lived during the reigns of the Antonines and of Commodus. Some writers suppose that he was one of the tutors of M. Aurelius; but it is more probable that he was a different person from Claudius Maximus, the Stoic, who was the tutor of this emperor. Maximus Tyrius appears to have spent the greater part of his life in Greece, but he visited Rome once or twice. There are extant forty-one Dissertations (Διαλέξεις or Δόγματα) of Maximus Tyrius on theological, ethical and other philosophical subjects, written in an easy and pleasing style, but not characterised by much depth of thought. The best edition is by Reiske, Lips. 1774-5, 2 vols.

Maximus, Valerius. [VALERIUS.]

Maxūla. [ADES.]

Maxyēs (Μάγυες), a people of N. Africa, on the coast of the Lesser Syrtis, on the W. bank of the river Triton, who claimed descent from the Trojans. They shaved the right side of the other writers, by Hecate, the daughter of Perses. (Hes. Th. 961; Apollod. i. 9, 23; Diod. iv. 45). She was celebrated for her skill in magic. The most important parts of her story are given under ABSYRTUS, ARGONAUTAE, and JASON. It is enough to state here that when Jason came to fetch the golden fleece, she fell in love with the hero, assisted him in accomplishing the object for which he had visited Colchis, and afterwards fled with him as his wife to Greece; that they were driven from Iolcus because she had deceived the daughters of Pelias into killing their father [see p. 458, b], and went to Corinth, where Medea, having been deserted by Jason for the youthful daughter of Creon, king of Corinth, took fearful vengeance upon her faithless spouse by murdering the two children whom she had by him, and by destroying his young wife by a poisoned garment; and that she then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. So far her story has been related in the articles mentioned above. Her flight from Corinth is represented in the annexed cut. The old man on the left is Creon; before him is his daughter Creusa falling to head, and painted their bodies with vermilion. (Hdt. iv. 191.)

Mazāca. [CAESAREA, No. 1.]

Mazara (Μαζάρα: Μαζαράιος: Mazzara), a town on the W. coast of Sicily, situated on a river of the same name, between Lilybaeum and Selinus, and founded by the latter city, was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war (Diod. xiii. 54, xxiii. 9).

Mazices (Μάζιγες), a people of N. Africa, in Mauretania Caesariensis, on the S. slope of M. Zalacus (Ptol. iv. 2, 19; Lucau, iv. 681). They, as well as the MAXYES, are thought to be the ancestors of the Amazirghs.

Mecyberna (Μηκυβερνα: Μηκυβερναῖος: Molivo), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic gulf, E. of Olynthus, of which it was the scaport. From this town part of the Toronaic gulf was subsequently called Sinus Mecybernaeus. (Hdt. vii. 122; Thuc. v. 39; Strab. p. 330.)

Mēdāba (Μήδαβα), a city of Peraea in Palestine.

Mēdaura, Ad Medēra, or Amedēra (Ηαῖδρα), a city of N. Africa, on the borders of Numidia and Byzacena, a Roman colony, and the birth-place of Appuleius. (Appul. Apol. p. 443; Ptol. iv. 3, 30; Procop. de Aed. vi. 6.)

Mēdēa (Μήδεια), daughter of Acētes, king of Colchis, by the Oceanid Idyia, or, according to the ground; then the children of Medea in front of a terminal head of Neptune; then Medea with sword in hand; and finally Medea making off in the serpent-car. At Athens she is said to have married King Aegeus, or to have been beloved by Sisyphus. Zeus himself is said to have sued for her, but in vain, because Medea dreaded the anger of Hera; and the latter rewarded her by promising immortality to her children. Her children are, according to some accounts, Mermerus, Pheres or Thessalus, Alcimenes, and Tisander; according to others, she had seven sons and seven daughters, while others mention only two children, Medus (some call him Polyxenus) and Eriopis, or one son, Argus. (Apollod. i. 9, 28; Diod. iv. 54.) Respecting her flight from Corinth, there are different traditions. In the Attic story, she fled to Athens and married Aegeus, but when it was discovered that she plotted to poison Theseus she escaped and went to Asia, the inhabitants of which were called after her Medes (Paus. ii. 3, 7; Plut. Thes. 12; Ov. Met. vii. 391). Others relate that she first fled from Corinth to Heracles at Thebes, who had promised her his assistance while yet in Colchis, in case of Jason being unfaithful to her. She cured Heracles, who was seized with madness; and as he could not afford her the assistance he had promised she went to Athens-

(Diod. iv. 54.) She is said to have given birth to her son Medus after her arrival in Asia, where she had married a king; whereas others state that her son Medus accompanied her from Athens to Colchis, where her son slew Perses, and restored her father Aëtes to his kingdom. The restoration of Aëtes, however, is attributed by some to Jason, who accompanied Medea to Colchis. (Diod. iv. 55; Tac. Ann. vi. 41; Hyg. Fab. 26; Just. xlii. 2.) Another legend makes her the wife of Achilles in Elysium (Schol. ad Eur. Med. 10, ad Ap. Rh. iv. 814).

Μεδῶν (Μεδῶν: Μεδῶνιος). 1. Or Medion (Katuna), a town in the interior of Acarnania, near the road which led from Limnaea to Stratos (Thuc. iii. 106; Pol. ii. 2, 3).—2. A town on the coast of Phocis near Anticyra, destroyed in the Sacred war, and never rebuilt (Paus. x. 3, 2).—3. A town in Boeotia, mentioned by Homer, situated at the foot of Mt. Phoenicus, near Onchestus and the lake Copais (Il. ii. 501; Strab. p. 410).—4. A town of the Labeates in Dalmatia, near Scodra (Liv. xlv. 23).

Μεδία (ἡ Μηδία: Μῆδος, Mēdus), an important country of W. Asia, occupying the extreme W. of the great table-land of Iran, and lying between Armenia on the N. and NW., Assyria and Susiana on the W. and SW., Persis on the S., the great desert of Aria on the E., and Parthia, Hyrcania, and the Caspian on the NE. Its boundaries were, on the N. the Araxes, on the W. and SW. the range of mountains called Zagros and Parachoatras (Mts. of Kurdistan and Lowristan), which divided it from the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the E. the Desert; and on the NE. the Caspii Montes (Elburz M.), the country between which and the Caspian, though reckoned as a part of Media, was possessed by the Gelae, Mardi, and other independent tribes. Media thus corresponded nearly to the modern province of Irak-Ajemi. It was for the most part a fertile country, producing wine, figs, oranges and citrons, and honey, and supporting an excellent breed of horses. It was well peopled, and was altogether one of the most important provinces of the ancient Persian empire. (Strab. pp. 522–526.) After the Macedonian conquest, it was divided into two parts, Great Media (ἡ μεγάλη Μηδία), and Atropatēne. [ΑΤΡΟΠΑΤΗΝΕ.] The earliest history of Media is involved in much obscurity. Herodotus and Ctesias (in Diodorus) give different chronologies for its early kings (Hdt. i. 95; Diod. ii. 24, 32). Ctesias makes ARBACES the founder of the monarchy, about B.C. 842, and reckons eight kings from him to the overthrow of the kingdom by Cyrus. Herodotus reckons only four kings of Media: namely, (1) DEIOCES, B.C. 710–657; (2) PHRAORTES, 657–635; (3) CYAXARES, 635–595; (4) ASTYAGES, 595–560. The last king was dethroned by a revolution which transferred the supremacy to the Persians, who had formerly been the subordinate people in the united Medo-Persian empire. [CYRUS.] The Medes made more than one attempt to regain their supremacy; the usurpation of the Magian Pseudo-Smerdis was no doubt such an attempt [MAGI]; and another occurred in the reign of Darius II., when the Medes revolted, but were soon subdued (B.C. 408). With the rest of the Persian empire, Media fell under the power of Alexander; it next formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, from whom it was conquered by the Parthians, in the second century B.C., from which time it belonged to the Parthian, and then to the later Persian empire. The people of Media were a branch of the Indo-Germanic family, and nearly allied to the Persians; their language was a dialect of the Zend, and their religion the Magian. According to Herodotus they were at first called Arii (Hdt. vii. 62). They were divided into six tribes, the Buzae, Parataceni, Struchates, Arizanti, Budii, and Magi. In the early period of their history, they were eminent warriors, especially as mounted archers (Xen. Anab. ii. 1, 7); but the long prevalence of peace, wealth and luxury reduced them to a by-word for effeminacy.—It is important to notice the use of the names Medus and Medi by the Roman poets, for the nations of Asia E. of the Tigris in general, and the Parthians in particular (Hor. Od. ii. 16, 6).

Mediæ Murus (τὸ Μηδίας καλούμενον τείχος), an artificial wall, which ran from the Euphrates to the Tigris, at the point where they approach nearest, a little above 33° N. lat. and divided Mesopotamia from Babylonia. It is described by Xenophon (Anab. ii. 4), as being twenty parasangs long, 100 feet high, and twenty thick, and was built of baked bricks, cemented with asphalt. Its erection was ascribed to Semiramis, and hence it was also called τὸ Σεμιράμιδος διατείχισμα. (Strab. pp. 80, 529.)

Mediōlānum (Mediolanensis), more frequently called by Greek writers Mediōlānium (Μεδιολάνιον), the names of several cities founded by the Celts. 1. (Milan), the capital of the Insubres in Gallia Transpadana, was situated in an extensive plain between the rivers Ticinus and Addua (Liv. v. 34; Strab. p. 213). It was taken by the Romans B.C. 222, and afterwards became a municipium (Pol. ii. 34; Eutrop. iii. 6; Oros. iv. 13; Tac. Hist. i. 70; Plin. iii. 138). It was a head-quarters of military government in North Italy from which the movements of the barbarians across the Alps could be watched, as appears even in the time of Augustus (Suet. Aug. 20). On the new division of the empire made by Diocletian, it became the residence of his colleague Maximianus, and continued to be the usual residence of the emperors of the West (Eutrop. ix. 27; Zos. ii. 10, 17), till the irruption of Attila—who took and plundered the town—induced them to transfer the seat of government to the more inaccessible town of Ravenna. Mediolanum was at this time one of the first cities of the empire; it possessed an imperial mint, and was the seat of an archbishopric. It is celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the see of St. Ambrose. On the fall of the Western empire, it became the residence of Theodoric the Great and the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and surpassed even Rome itself in populousness and prosperity. It received a fearful blow in A.D. 539, when, in consequence of having sided with Belisarius, it was taken by the Goths under Vitiges, a great part of it destroyed, and its inhabitants put to the sword (Procop. B.G. ii. 8, 21). It, however, gradually recovered from the effects of this blow, and was a place of importance under the Lombards.—2. (Saintes), a town of the Santones in Aquitania, NE. of the mouth of the Garumna; subsequently called Santones after the people, whence its modern name (Strab. p. 190; Amm. Marc. xv. 11).—3. (Château Meillan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Aquitania, NE. of the town last mentioned.—4. (Evreux), a town of the Auleri Ebuovices in the N. of Gallia Lugdunensis, S. of the Sequana, on the road from Rotomagus to Lutetia Parisiorum; subsequently called Civitas Ebroicorum, whence its modern name (Ptol. ii. 8, 11).—5. A town of the Segusiani in the S. of Gallia Lugdunensis.—6. A town in Gallia Belgica, on the road from Colonia Trajana to Colonia Agrippina.—7. (Malpas?), a town in Britain between Deva (Chester) and Uriconium (Wroxeter).

Mediomatrīci, a people in the SE. of Gallia Belgica on the Mosella, S. of the Treviri, originally extended to the Rhine, but in the time of Augustus they had been driven from this river by the Vangiones, Nemetes, and other German tribes. Their chief town was Divodūrum (Metz). (Caes. B.G. iv. 10; Strab. p. 193.)

Mediterrāneum Mare. [INTERNUM MARE.]

Meditrina, a Roman divinity of the art of healing, in whose honour the festival of the Meditrinalia was celebrated in the month of October (Dict. of Ant. art. Meditrinalia).

Medma, or Mesma (Μέδμα, Μέσμα), a Greek city of Southern Italy on the W. coast of Bruttii, founded by the Locrians (Strab. p. 256; Scyl. p. 4). Its name is probably preserved in the river Mesima.

Medōacus or Medūacus, a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, formed by the union of two rivers, the Medoacus Major (Brenta) and Medoacus Minor (Bacchiglione), which falls into the Adriatic sea near Edron, the harbour of Patavium (Liv. x. 2; Plin. iii. 121).

Medobriga (Marvao, on the frontiers of Portugal), a town in Lusitania, on the road from Emerita to Scalabis (Bell. Alex. 48; Plin. iv. 118).

Mēdōcus. [AMADOCUS.]

Mēdōn (Μέδων). 1. Son of Oileus, and brother of the lesser Ajax, fought against Troy, and was slain by Aeneas (Il. ii. 727, xiii. 693, xv. 332).—2. Son of Codrus. [CODRUS.]

Mēdūli, a people in Aquitania, S. of the mouth of the Garumna, in the modern Medoc. There were excellent oysters found on their shores (Auson. Epist. iv. v. vii).

Medulli, a people on the E. frontier of Gallia Narbonensis and in the Maritime Alps, in whose country the Druentia (Durance) and Duria (Dora Riparia) took their rise (Strab. p. 203).

Medullia (Medullinus: Sant' Angelo), a colony of Alba, in the land of the Sabines, situated between the Tiber and the Anio. Tarquinius Priscus incorporated their territory with the Rouan state (Liv. i. 33, 38; Dionys. ii. 36, vi. 34).

Medullinus, Furius, an ancient patrician family at Rome, the members of which held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic (Liv. ii. 39, 43, 54).

Medullus, a mountain in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Minius (Flor. iv. 12).

Mēdus, a son of Medea. [MEDEA.]

Mēdus (Μήδος), a small river of Persis, flowing from the confines of Media, and falling into the Araxes near Persepolis (Strab. p. 729).

Medūsa. [GORGONES.]

Megabāzus or Megabūzus (Μεγάβαζος, Μεγάβυζος). 1. One of the seven Persian nobles who conspired against the Magian Smerdis, B.C. 521. Darius left him with an army in Europe, when he recrossed the Hellespont, on his return from Scythia, 506. He subdued Perinthus and the other cities on the Hellespont and the coast of Thrace (Hdt. iii. 70, iv. 143, v. 1–16).—2. Son of Zopyrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the commanders in the army of Xerxes, 480. He afterwards commanded the army sent against the Athenians in Egypt, 468 (Hdt. vii. 82; Thuc. i. 109).

Megabocchus, C., was tried together with

T. Albius for extortion in Sardinia (Cic. Fragm. pro Scaur. ii. 40), apparently one of the Catilinarian conspirators (Cic. ad Att. ii. 7).

Megacles (Μεγακλής). 1. A name borne by several of the Alcmaeonidae. The most important of these was the Megacles who put to death Cylon and his adherents, after they had taken refuge at the altar of Athene, B.C. 612. [CYLON.]—2. A Syracusan, brother of Dion, and brother-in-law of the elder Dionysius. He accompanied Dion in his flight from Syracuse, 358, and afterwards returned with him to Sicily.

Mēgaera. [EUMENIDES.]

Mēgālia or Megāris, a small island in the Tyrrhene sea, opposite Neapolis (Plin. iii. 82).

Megalōpōlis (ἡ Μεγάλη πόλις, Μεγαλόπολις; Μεγαλοπολιτης). 1. (Sinano), the most recent, but the most important of the cities of Arcadia, was founded on the advice of Epaminondas, after the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371, and was formed out of the inhabitants of thirty-eight villages. It was situated in the district Maenalia, near the frontiers of Messenia, on the river Helisson, which flowed through the city, dividing it into two nearly equal parts. It stood on the site of the ancient town Orestion or Orestia; was fifty stadia (six miles) in circumference; and contained, when it was besieged by Polysperchon, about 15,000 men capable of bearing arms, which would give us a population of about 70,000 inhabitants. Megalopolis was for a time subject to the Macedonians; but soon after the death of Alexander the Great, it was governed by a series of native tyrants, the last of whom, Lydiades, voluntarily resigned the government, and united the city to the Achaean League, B.C. 234. It became in consequence opposed to Sparta, and was taken and plundered by Cleomenes, who killed or drove into banishment all its inhabitants, and destroyed a great part of the city, 222. After the battle of Sellasia in the following year, it was restored by Philopoemen, who again collected the inhabitants; but it never recovered its former prosperity. Philopoemen and the historian Polybius were natives of Megalopolis. The ruins of its theatre, once the largest in Greece, are important in archaeology, particularly as regards the disputed question of a raised stage. The excavations of 1890–91 by the British School of Athens have explored the theatre, and discovered the ground plan of the adjoining Thersilion or great assembly hall of the Arcadians, and of the Agora and temple of Zeus across the river.—2. A town in Caria. [APHRODISIAS.]—3. A town in Pontus. [SEBASTIA.]—4. A town in the N. of Africa, in Byzacena; it was taken and destroyed by Agathocles.

Meganira. [METANIRA.]

Megapenthes (Μεγαπένης). 1. Son of Proetus, father of Anaxagoras and Iphianira, and king of Argos. He exchanged his dominion for that of Perseus, so that the latter received Tiryns instead of Argos. (Paus. ii. 18, 4; Apollod. ii. 4).—2. Son of Menelaus by an Aetolian slave, Pieris or Teridaë. Menelaus brought about a marriage between Megapenthes and a daughter of Alector. According to a Rhodian tradition, Megapenthes expelled Helen from Argos, who thereupon fled to Polyxo at Rhodes. (Od. iv. 11; Paus. iii. 19, 2.)

Megāra, wife of Heracles. [See p. 396, a.]

Mēgāra (τὰ Μέγαρα, in Lat. Megara, -ae, and pl. Megara, -orum; Μεγαρεῖς, Megarensis). 1. (Megara), the capital of MEGARIS, was situated 8 stadia (1 mile) from the sea opposite the island Salamis, about 26 miles from Athens and 31 miles from Corinth. It consisted of three parts: (1) the ancient Pelasgian citadel, called Caria, said to have been built by Car, the son of Phoroneus, which was situated on a hill NW. of the later city. This citadel contained the ancient and celebrated Megaron (μέγαρον) or temple of Demeter, from which the town is supposed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 39, 5.) (2) The modern citadel, situated on a lower hill to the SW. of the preceding, and called Alcathoe, from its reputed founder Alcathous, son of Pelops (Paus. i. 42; Ov. Met. vii. 443, viii. 7). (3) The town properly so called, situated at the foot of the two citadels, said to have been founded by the Pelopidae under Alcathous, and subsequently enlarged by a Doric colony under Alethes and Athenenes at the time of Codrus. Its seaport was Nisaea (Νισαία), which was connected with Megara by two walls, eight stadia in length, built by the Athenians when they had possession of Megara, B.C. 461–445 (Thuc. i. 103); but as Pegae also belonged to the Megarians they, like the Corinthians, had ports on both seas, and a through traffic. Nisaea is said to have been built by Nisus, the son of Pandion; and the inhabitants of Megara are sometimes called Nisaeans Megarians (οἱ Νισαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) to distinguish them from the Hyblaeans Megarians (οἱ Ἵβλαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) in Sicily. In front of Nisaea lay the small island democratical form of government established (Plut. Q. Gr. 18). After the Persian wars, Megara was for some time at war with Corinth, and was thus led to form an alliance with Athens, and to receive an Athenian garrison into the city, 461; but the oligarchical party having got the upper hand the Athenians were expelled, 441. In the Peloponnesian war it suffered greatly, and in 424 was only saved from capture by the approach of Brasidas (Thuc. iii. 51, iv. 56, 109). Megara after this gradually declined in power, partly from these party quarrels, but also because she was a small state in comparison with her neighbours. The city was taken and its walls destroyed by Demetrius Poliorcetes; it was taken again by the Romans under Q. Metellus; and in the time of Augustus it had ceased to be a place of importance.—Megara is celebrated as the city of THEOGNIS, and, in the history of philosophy, as the seat of a philosophical school, usually called the Megarian, which was founded by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. [EUCLIDES, No. 2.]—2. A town in Sicily on the E. coast, N. of Syracuse, founded by Doriaus from Megara in Greece, B.C. 728, on the site of a small town Hybla, and hence called Megara Hyblaea, and its inhabitants Megarenses Hyblaei (Μεγαρεῖς Ἵβλαῖοι). From the time of Gelon it belonged to Syracuse.

Minoa. Nisaea.

Megara.

Minoa (Μίνωα), which added greatly to the security of the harbour.—In the most ancient times Megara and the surrounding country are said to have been inhabited by Leleges. It subsequently became annexed to Attica; and Megaris formed one of the four ancient divisions of Attica. (Strab. p. 392.) It was next conquered by the Dorians, and was for a time subject to Corinth (Hdt. v. 76); but it finally asserted its independence, and rapidly became a wealthy and powerful city (Paus. vi. 19, 13). To none of these events can any date be assigned with certainty. An inscription mentions the victory of Orsippus of Megara at Olympia in 720 B.C., the first athlete who ran entirely naked: it states also that he won back much territory (probably from Corinth) for his own city (C. I. G. 1050; cf. Paus. i. 44, 1). Its power at an early period is attested by the flourishing colonies which it founded, of which SELYMBRIA, CHALCEDON, and BYZANTIUM, and the Hyblaeans Megara in Sicily, were the most important. Its navy was a match for that of Athens, with which it contested the island of Salamis; and it was not till after a long struggle that the Athenians succeeded in obtaining possession of this island. The government was originally an aristocracy as in most of the Doric cities; but Theagenes, who put himself at the head of the popular party, obtained the supreme power about B.C. 620 (Arist. Pol. v. 5, 9=p. 1305). Theagenes was afterwards expelled; and a

(Hdt. vii. 156; Thuc. vi. 4; Strab. p. 269.) It was taken and plundered by the Romans in the second Punic war, and from that time sank into insignificance, but it is still mentioned by Cicero under the name of Megaris. [HYBLA.]

Megareus (Μεγαρεύς), son of Onchestus, also called a son of Poseidon and Oenope, of Hippomenes, of Apollo, or of Aegaeus. He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, king of Megara, and the father of Evippus, Timalcus, Hippomenes, and Evaechme. Megara is said to have derived its name from him. (Paus. i. 39; Ov. Met. x. 605.)

Megaris (ἡ Μεγαρίς or ἡ Μεγαρικὴ, sc. γῆ), a small district in Greece between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, originally reckoned part of Hellas proper, but subsequently included in the Peloponnesus. It was bounded on the N. by Boeotia, on the E. and NE. by Attica, and on the S. by the territory of Corinth. It contained about 143 square miles. The country was very mountainous; and its only plain was the one in which the city of Megara was situated, which was called τὸ Λευκὸν πεδῖον (Schol. ad Od. v. 333). It was separated from Boeotia by Mt. Cithaeron, and from Attica by the mountains called the Horns (τὰ κέρατα) on account of their two projecting summits (Strab. p. 395; Diod. xiii. 65). The Geranean mountains extended through the greater part of the country, and formed its S. boundary towards Corinth (Thuc. i. 105; Paus. i. 40, 7). There were two roads through these mountains from Corinth, one called the Scironian pass, which ran along the Saronic gulf, passed by Crommyon and Megara, and was the direct road from Corinth to Atheus (Strab. p. 391; Hdt. viii. 71; Paus. i. 44, 7; Eur. Hipp. 1208); the other ran along the Corinthian gulf, passed by Geranea and Pegae, and was the road from Corinth into Boeotia. The only town of importance in Megaris was its capital, Megara. [MEGARA.]

Megasthenes (Μεγασθένης), a Greek writer who was sent by Selucus Nicator as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, where he resided some time. He wrote a work on India, in four books, entitled Indica (τὰ Ἰνδικά), to which later Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of the country. (Strab. pp. 70, 702; Arrian, An. v. 6; Athen. p. 153.)

Megēs (Μέγης), son of Phyleus, and grandson of Augeas, was one of the suitors of Helen, and led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy (Il. ii. 625, v. 69, xv. 520; Paus. x. 25, 2).

Megiddo (Μαγεδδῶ, Μαγεδῶ: Lejjun?), a considerable city of Palestine, on the river Kishon, in a valley of the same name, which formed a part of the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelou, on the confines of Galilee and Samaria. It was probably the same place which was called Legio under the Romans. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Megistāni, a people of Armenia, in the district of Sophene, near the Euphrates.

Megiste (Μεγίστη), an island off Lycia, opposite Antiphellus (Strab. p. 666; Liv. xxxvii. 22).

Mēla, river. [MELLA.]

Mela, Fabius, a Roman jurist, often cited in the Digest; probably of the Augustan age.

Mela, Mella, M. Annaeus, the youngest son of M. Annaeus Seueca, the rhetorician, and brother of L. Seneca, the philosopher, and of Gallio. By his wife Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan. After Lucan's death, A.D. 65, Mela laid claim to his property; and as he was rich, he was accused of being privy to Piso's conspiracy, and anticipated a certain sentence by suicide. (Tac. Ann. xv. 48; Dio Cass. lxii. 25.)

Mela, Pomponius, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography, was a native of Spain, and probably flourished under the emperor Claudius (iii. 49). His work is entitled De Situ Orbis Libri III. It contains a brief description of the whole world as known to the Romans. The text is often corrupt, but the style is simple, and the Latinity is pure; and although everything is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures. Editions by Parthey, Berlin, 1867; Frick, Lips. 1880.

Melaena Acra (ἡ Μέλαινα ἄκρα). 1. (Kara Burnu, which means the same as the Greek name, i.e. the Black Cape), the NW. promontory of the great peninsula of Ionia: formed by Mt. Mimas; celebrated for the millstones hewn from it (Strab. p. 645).—2. (C. San Nicolo), the NW. promontory of the island of Chios.—3. (Tshilè) a promontory of Bithynia, a little E. of the Bosphorus, between the rivers Rhebas and Artanes; also called Καλίνακρον and Βιθυνίας ἄκρον (Ap. Rh. ii. 651).

Mēlaenæ (Μελαιναί: Μελαινεύς). 1. Or Melaenææ (Μελαιναί), a town in the W. of Arcadia on the Alpheus, NW. of Buphagium, and SE. of Heraea (Paus. viii. 26, 8).—2. A demus in Attica, on the frontiers of Boeotia, belonging to the tribe Antiochia.

Mēlambium (Μελάμβιον), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, belonging to the territory of Scotussa (Pol. xviii. 9).

Mēlampus (Μελάμπος). 1. Son of Amythaon by Idomene, or by Aglaia, or by Rhodope, and a brother of Bias (Apollod. i. 9, 1; Diod. iv. 68). He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal who was endowed with prophetic powers, as the person who first practised the medical art, and who established the worship of Dionysus in Greece (Hdt. ii. 49). He is said to have been married to Iphianassa, by whom he became the father of Mantius and Antiphates (Od. xv. 225; Diod. l.c.). Abas, Bias, Mauto, and Pronoe are also named by some writers as his children. Before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, but Melampus took care of the young ones and fed them carefully. One day, when he was asleep, they cleaned his ears with their tongues. On his waking he perceived, to his astonishment, that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this he acquired the power of prophesying from the victims that were offered to the gods; and, after having an interview with Apollo on the banks of the Alpheus, he became a most renowned soothsayer. During his residence at Pylos his brother Bias was one of the suitors for the hand of Pero, the daughter of Neleus. The latter promised his daughter to the man who should bring him the oxen of Iphiclus, which were guarded by a dog whom neither man nor animal could approach. Melampus undertook the task of procuring the oxen for his brother, although he knew that the thief would be caught and kept in imprisonment for a year, after which he was to come into possession of the oxen. Things turned out as he had said; Melampus was thrown into prison, and in his captivity he learned from the wood-worms that the building in which he was imprisoned would soon break down. He accordingly demanded to be let out, and as Phylacus and Iphiclus thus became acquainted with his prophetic powers, they asked him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no children, was to become a father. Melampus, on the suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to take the rust from a knife and drink it in water during ten days. (Paus. iv. 36, 2; Apollod. i. 9, 12.) This was done, and Iphiclus became the father of Podarces. Melampus now received the oxen as a reward for his good services, drove them to Pylos, and thus gained Pero for his brother. Afterwards Melampus obtained possession of a third of the kingdom of Argos in the following manner:—In the reign of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women of the kingdom were seized with madness, and roamed about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of their frenzy, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos. Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Proetus, and ruled over two-thirds of Argos. (Hdt. ix. 34; Apollod. ii. 2, 2; Strab. p. 346; Ov. Met. xv. 322; PROETUS).—2. The author of two little Greek works of no value, entitled Divinatio ex Palpatione and De Navis Olaccis in Corpore. He lived probably in the third century B.C. at Alexandria. Edited by Franz, in Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, Altenburg, 1780.

Melanchlaeni (Μελάγχλωνοι), a people in the N. of Sarmatia Asiatica, about the upper course of the river Tauais (Don), resembling the Scythians in manners, though of a different race. Their name was derived from their dark clothing. (Hdt. iv. 20, 100; Ptol. v. 9, 19.)

Mēlanippē (Μελανίππη), daughter of Chiron, also called Evippe. Being with child by Aeolus, she fled to mount Pelion; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Artemis granted her prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the stars. (Aristoph. Thesm. 512; Hyg. Fab. 86.) Another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Artemis, or for having divulged the counsels of the gods (Hyg. Astr. ii. 18). Her story was the subject of two tragedies by Euripides, Μελανίππη ἡ σοφὴ, and Μελανίππη ἡ δεσμώτις (see Fragm. of Euripides, ed. Dindorf). The former was imitated by Ennius, the latter by Accius. (Cic. Tusc. iii. 9, 20; Off. i. 31, 114; Juv. viii. 229; AEOULUS.) Melanippe seems sometimes to be confused with Arne, the mother of Aeolus and Boeotus by Poseidon.

Mēlanippides (Μελανιπίδης). 1. A dithyrambic poet of Melos, contemporary of Pindar (Suid. s.v.).—2. A later dithyrambic poet of the same place, who lived about B.C. 470–420. He is highly praised by Xenophon (Mem. i. 4, 3). He died at the court of Perdiccas. (Plut. Mus. p. 1141; Arist. Rhet. iii. 9; Athen. p. 616.) Fragm. in Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec.

Mēlanippus (Μελανίππος), son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes on the road to Chalcis. (Hdt. v. 67; Aesch. Sept. 409; Paus. ix. 18, 1.)

Melanopus (Μελάνωπος), son of Laches, went on an embassy to Mausolus, King of Caria, captured a vessel of Naucratis, and illegally retained the prize money. He had also been accused of embezzlement during an embassy to Egypt. (Dem. c. Timocr. pp. 703, 740, §§ 12, 127.)

Melanogaetūli. [GAETULIA.]

Mēlanthiūs (Μελάνθιος). 1. Also called Melantheus, son of Dolus, was a goat-herd of Odysseus, who sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was killed by Odysseus (Od. xvii. 212, xxii. 474).—2. An Athenian tragic poet, of whom little is known beyond the attacks made on him by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. The most important passage respecting him is in the Peace of Aristophanes (796, &c.). He was celebrated for his wit, of which several specimens are preserved by Plutarch (Symp. pp. 631, 633).—3. Or Melanthus, a Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B.C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus. He was one of the best colourists of all the Greek painters (Plin. xxxv. 50, 76).

Mēlanthiūs (Μελάνθιος, prob. Melet-Irma), a river of Pontus, in Asia Minor, E. of the Prom. Jasonium; the boundary between Pontus Polemoniacus and Pontus Cappadocius.

Mēlanthus or Mēlanthiūs (Μελανθος), one of the Nelidae, and king of Messenia, whence he was driven out by the Heraclidae, on their conquest of the Peloponnesus; and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Boeotians, Xanthus, the Boeotian king, challenged Thymoetes, king of Athens and the last of the Thesidae, to single combat. Thymoetes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. So ran the story, which strove afterwards to disguise the violent change of dynasty. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the Thesidae. According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropomus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son. (Hdt. i. 147, v. 65; Arist. Pol. v. 10; Paus. ii. 18, iv. 5, vii. 1.)

Mēlas (Μέλας), the name of several rivers whose waters were of a dark colour. 1. (Mauro Nero or Mauro Potamo), a small river in Boeotia, which rises seven stadia N. of Orchomenus, becomes navigable almost from its source, flows between Orchomenus and Aspledon, and loses the greater part of its waters in the marshes connected with lake Copais. A small portion of its waters fell in ancient times into the river Cephissus (Strab. p. 467).—2. A river of Thessaly in the district Malis, flows near Heraclea and Trachis, and falls into the Maliac gulf (Hdt. vii. 198; Strab. p. 428).—3. A river of Thessaly in Phthiotis, falls into the Apidanus (Lucan, iv. 374).—4. A river of Thrace, flows first SW., then NW., and falls N. of Cardia into the Melas Sinus (Hdt. vi. 41).—5. (Manavgat-Su), a navigable river, fifty stadia (five geog. miles) E. of Side, was the boundary between Pamphylia and Cilicia.—6. (Kara-Su, i.e. the Black River), in Cappadocia, rises in M. Argaeus, flows past Mazaca, and, after forming morasses, falls into the Halys, and not (as Strabo says) into the Euphrates. (Ptol. v. 6, 8; Strab. p. 538.)

Mēlas Sinus (Μέλας κόλπος: Gulf of Saros), a gulf between the coast of Thrace on the NW. and the Thracian Chersonesus on the SE., into which the river Melas flows.

Meldi or Meldae, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis upon the river Sequana (Seine), near Paris (Ptol. ii. 8, 15; Strab. p. 194; Plin. iv. 107). If the reading Meldi in Caesar, B. G. v. 5, is correct, it must be assumed that there was a people of the same name on the coast near Ictius Portus.

Mēlēāger (Μελέαγρος). 1. Son of Oeneus and Althaea, the daughter of Thestius, husband of Cleopatra, and father of Polydora. He was one of the most famous Aetolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin. He took part in the Argonautic expedition. At the time of his return home, the fields of Calydon were laid waste by a monstrous boar, which Artemis had sent against the country, because Oeneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to the goddess. No one dared encounter the terrible animal, till at length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, slew the animal; but the Calydonians and Curetes quarrelled about the head and hide, and at length waged open war against each other; and in this fight the brother of Althaea, a prince of the Curetes, was slain by Meleager. The warfare continued, and the Calydonians were always victorious so long as Meleager went out with them. But when his mother Althaea pronounced a curse upon him, Meleager stayed at home with his wife, Cleopatra. The Curetes now began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and that his father, his sisters, and his mother supplicated him. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife, Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but he never returned home, for the Erinnyes, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. Such is the more ancient form of the legend, as we find it in Homer (Il. ix. 527, seq.). In the later traditions Meleager collects the heroes from all parts of Greece to join him in the hunt. Among others was the fair maiden Atalanta; but the heroes refused to hunt with her, until Meleager, who was in love with her, overcame their opposition. Atalanta gave the animal the first wound, and it was at length slain by Meleager. He presented the hide to Atalanta, but the sons of Thestius took it from her, whereupon Meleager in a rage slew them. This, however, was the cause of his own death, which came to pass in the following way. When he was seven days old the Moerae appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood which was burning on the hearth should be consumed. Althaea, upon hearing this, extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died. Althaea, too late repenting of what she had done, put an end to her life; and Cleopatra died of grief. The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Artemis changed them into guinea-hens (μελεαγρίδες), which were transferred to the island of Leros. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deianira, through the mediation of Dionysus, were not metamorphosed. (Apollod. i. 8, 2; Diod. iv. 34; Hyg. Fab. 171; Anton. Lib. 2; Ov. Met. viii. 450, 531.) The story of the burning log is clearly not known to Homer, but is at least as old as Phrynichus (Paus. x. 31, 2). The metamorphosis of the Meleagrides was mentioned by Sophocles, who said that amber came from their tears (Plin. xxxvii. 41). Some later traditions make Ares the father of Meleager (Ov. l.c.; Hyg. l.c.). Meleager is represented in paintings and in sculpture (especially in the statues at Rome and Berlin) as a young man with a hunting spear and a dog by his side. A group by Scopas in the temple at Tegea is mentioned by Pausanias (viii. 45, 4). The boar-hunt is a favourite subject for sculptures in relief.—

Althaea and the Fates. (Zoege, Bassi rilievi, tav. 46.)

Meleager (Berlin).

2. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander the Great (B.C. 323) Meleager resisted the claims of Perdiccas to the regency, and was eventually associated with the latter in this office. Shortly afterwards, however, he was put to death by order of Perdiccas. (Arrian, An. i. 4, 20, iii. 11; Curt. x. 21-29.)—3. Son of Euerates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about B.C. 60. There are 131 of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology. An account is given under PLANUDES.

Mēlētus or Melitus (Μέλητος: Μέλιτος), an obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of the accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of the Pitthean demus. He is represented by Plato and Aristophanes and their scholiasts as a frigid and licentious poet, and a worthless and profligate man. In the accusation of Socrates it was Meletus who laid the indictment before the Archon Basileus; but in reality he was the most insignificant of the accusers; and according to one account he was bribed by Anytus and Lyeon to take part in the affair. Soon after the death of Socrates, the Athenians repented of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death. (Plat. Apol. pp. 25, 26; Athen. p. 551; Diod. xiv. 37; Diog. Laërt. ii. 43.)

and Aegialeus or Pegeus; and by Silenus the mother of the centaur Pholus; and by Poseidon of Amycus. She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Ismenius, and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Ismenium, the sanctuary of Apollo, near Thebes. (Paus. ix. 10, 26; Strab. p. 418; Apollod. ii. 5, 4). In the plural form, the Melivæ or Meliades (Μελίαι, Μελιάδες) are the nymphs who, along with the Gigantes and Erinnyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Uranus and were received by Gaea (Hes. Th. 187).

Meliboea (Μελίβοια: Μελιβοεύς). 1. A town on the coast of Thessaly in Magnesia, between Mt. Ossa and Mt. Pelion, is said to have been built by Magnes, and to have been named Meliboea in honour of his wife (Hdt. vii. 188; Strab. p. 443). It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 717) as belonging to the dominions of Philoctetes, who is hence called by Virgil (Aen. iii. 401) dux Meliboeus. It was celebrated for its purple dye (Lucret. ii. 499; Virg. Aen. v. 251).—2. A small island at the mouth of the river Orontes in Syria.

Meliceretes. [PALAEMON.]

Melinno (Μελίννω), a lyric poetess of Locri in S. Italy who wrote the ode to Rome beginning Χαίρε μοι Πόρω, which has been wrongly ascribed to Erinna. She lived in the third century B.C.

Melissus (Μέλισσος). 1. Of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithageneus, was, according to the common account, the commander of the fleet opposed to Pericles, B.C. 440 (Plut. Per. 26). He belonged to the Eleatic school, and was a pupil of Parmenides (Arist. de Xenoph. Gorg. et Meliss. 1).—2. A Latin grammarian and a comic poet, was a freedman of Maecenas, and was entrusted by Augustus with the arrangement of the library in the portico of Octavia (Suet. Gramm. 21).

Mēlita or Mēlite (Μελίτη: Μελιταῖος, Melitensis). 1. (Malta), an island in the Mediterranean sea, situated 58 miles from the nearest point of Sicily, and 179 miles from the nearest point of Africa. Its greatest length is $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and its greatest breadth $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The island was first colonised by the Phoenicians, who used it as a place of refuge for their ships, on account of its excellent harbours. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, but was taken possession of by the Romans in the second Punic war, and annexed to the province of Sicily (Liv. xxi. 51). The Romans, however, appear to have neglected the island, and it is mentioned by Cicero as a frequent resort of pirates (Cic. Verr. iv. 46). It contained a town of the same name founded by the Carthaginians, and two celebrated temples, one of Juno on a promontory near the town, and another of Heracles in the SE. of the island. The inhabitants manufactured fine cloth, which was in much request at Rome. They also exported a considerable quantity of honey; and from this island, according to some authorities, came the catuli Melitæi, the favourite lapdogs of the Roman ladies (Strab. p. 277; Athen. p. 518); Pliny, iii. 151, believes that they came from the Adriatic island.—2. (Meleda), a small island in the Adriatic sea off the coast of Illyria (Dalmatia), NW. of Epidaurus (Ptol. ii. 16, 14; Plin. iii. 141).—3. A demus in Attica, which also formed part of the city of Athens, was situated S. of the inner Ceramicus, and probably included the hill of the Museum. One of the gates of Athens was called the Melitian gate, because it led to this demus. [See p. 142].—4.

A lake in Aetolia near the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the territory of the town Oeniadae.

Melitaea, Melitæa or Melitia (Μελιταία, Μελίτεια, Μελιτία: Μελιταιεύς), a town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, on the N. slope of Mt. Othrys, and near the river Enipeus. It is said to have been called Pyrrha in more ancient times, and the tomb of Hellen, son of Deucalion, was in its market-place (Thuc. iv. 78; Strab. p. 432).

Mēlitē (Μελίτη), a nymph, one of the Nereids (Il. xviii. 42; Hcs. Th. 246).

Mēlitēnē (Μελιτηνή), a district of Eastern Cappadocia, celebrated for its fertility. The town Melitene (Malatia) stood near the Euphrates at the junction of roads leading from Pontus to Mesopotamia and from Cappadocia to Amida in Armenia (Strab. p. 537; Tac. Ann. xv. 26; Procop. de Aed. iii. 4). It was the station of the Twelfth Legion (Fulminata) after 70 A.D., and in the later division of provinces was the capital of Armenia Secunda. In A.D. 577 the Romans defeated Chosroes near it.

Mēlito (Μελίτων), bishop of Sardes in the reign of M. Aurelius. (Dict. of Christ. Biogr.)

Mella or Mela (Mella), a river in Gallia Transpadana, flowing by Brixia and falling into the Ollius (Catull. 77, 83; Verg. Georg. iv. 278).

Mellaria. 1. A town of the Bastuli in Hispania Baetica between Belon and Calpe, on the road from Gades to Malaca (Plut. Sertor. 12; Strab. p. 140; Ptol. ii. 4, 6; Plin. iii. 7).—2. A town in the same province, considerably N. of the former, on the road from Corduba to Emerita (Plin. iii. 14).

Melodūnum (Melun), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island of the Sequana (Seine), and on the road from Ageudicum to Lutetia Parisiorum (Caes. B. G. vii. 58).

Mēlos (Μήλος: Μήλιος: Milo), an island in the Aegean sea, and the most westerly of the group of the Cyclades, whence it was called Zephyria by Aristotle (Plin. iv. 70). It is about seventy miles N. of the coast of Crete, and sixty-five E. of the coast of Peloponnesus. Its length is about fourteen miles from E. to W., and its breadth about eight miles. It contains on the N. a deep bay, which forms an excellent harbour, and on which was situated a town, bearing the same name as the island. The island is of volcanic origin; it contains hot springs and mines of sulphur and alum (Athen. p. 43; Plin. xxxv. 174). Its soil is very fertile, and it produced in antiquity, as it does at present, abundance of corn, oil, wine, &c. It was first colonised by the Phoenicians, who are said to have called it Byblus or Byblis, after the Phoenician town Byblus. It was afterwards colonised by Lacedaemonians, or at least by Dorians; and consequently in the Peloponnesian war it embraced the side of Sparta. (Hdt. viii. 48; Thuc. v. 84-116; Diod. xii. 80; Strab. p. 484.) In B.C. 426 the Athenians made an unsuccessful attack upon the island; but in 416 they obtained possession of the town after a siege of several months, killed all the adult males, sold the women and children as slaves, and peopled the island by an Athenian colony.—Melos was the birthplace of Diagoras, the atheist, whence Aristophanes calls Socrates also the Melian (Nub. 830). The 'Venus of Milo,' now in the Louvre, was found here in 1820.

Melpōmēnē. [MUSAE.]

Memini, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the W. bank of the Durentia, whose chief town was Carpentoracte (Carpentras).

Memmia Gens, a plebeian gens at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B. C. 173. They pretended to be descended from the Trojan Mnesthus (Virg. Aen. v. 117).

Memmius. 1. C., tribuno of the plebs B. C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthino war. Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia and M. Aemilius Scaurus. Memmius was slain by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in 100 (Cic. Cat. iv. 2; Appian, B. C. i. 32; Sall. Jug. 27-34).—2. C. Memmius Gemellus, tribune of the plebs 66, curule aedile 60, and praetor 58. He belonged at that time to the Suetorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, opposed P. Clodius, and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Caesar. But before he competed for the consulship, 54, he had been reconciled to Caesar, who supported him with all his interest. Memmius, however, again offended Caesar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. He was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Caesar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son, C. Memmius. [No. 3.] He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence. Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to him. He was a man of profligate character, and wrote indecent poems (Plut. Lucull. 37; Cic. ad Att. i. 18, iv. 15-18, ad Fam. xiii. 1-3; Plin. Ep. v. 3; Ov. Trist. ii. 433; Gell. xix. 9).—3. C. Memmius, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs 54, when he prosecuted A. Gabinius for malversation in his province of Syria, and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia. Memmius was stepson of T. Annius Milo who married his mother, Fausta, after her divorce. He was consul suffectus 34 (Val. Max. viii. 1, 3; Dio Cass. xlix. 42; Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 2).—4. P. Memmius Regulus, consul suffectus A. D. 81, afterwards praefect of Macedonia and Achaia. He was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her. (Tac. Ann. xii. 23; Suet. Cal. 25; Dio Cass. lix. 12.)

Memnon (Μέμνων). 1. The beautiful son of Tithonus and Eos (Aurora), and brother of Emathion. He does not belong to the Iliad, but is mentioned in the Odyssey as the handsomest of mortals and as the slayer of Antilochus (Od. iv. 187, xi. 522). As son of the Dawn he comes in all variations of the myth from the land of the sun; but this is placed sometimes in the extreme south, sometimes in the east. Memnon is brought into the Trojan story by Arctinus in his Aethiopsis: he was a prince of the Ethiopians, who came to the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Tithonus and Priam were half-brothers, both being sons of Laomedon by different mothers. He came to the war in armour made for him by Hephaestus, and slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, but was himself slain by Achilles, after a long and fierce combat. While the two heroes were fighting, Zeus weighed their fates, and the scale containing Memnon's sank. (Quint. Smyrn. i.; Dict. Cret. iv. 2, 3; cf. Pind. Pyth. vi. 31, Ol. ii. 83, Nem. iii. 63, vi. 50.) Details have been added by a succession of poets. The mother of Memnon was inconsolable at his death. She wept for him every morning; and the dew-drops of the morning are the tears of Eos. To soothe the grief of his mother, Zeus caused a number of birds to issue out of the funeral pile on which the body of Memnon was burning, which, after flying thrice around the burning pile, divided into two separate companies, which fought so fiercely, that half of them fell down upon the ashes of the hero, and thus formed a funeral sacrifice for him. These birds were called Memnonides, and, according to a story current on the Hellespont, they visited every year the tomb of the hero. At the entreaties of Eos, Zeus conferred immortality upon Memnon (Ov. Met. xiii. 576-622; Serv. ad Aen. i. 493, 755; Paus. x. 31, 2).—The weighing of the fates, which recalls the Homeric weighing of the fates of Hector and Achilles (Il. xxii. 209), gave the name to the Ψυχοστασία of Aeschylus, in which the mothers of the two heroes stand on either side each entreating for her son (Plut. de Aud. Poët. 17; Pollux, iv. 130). There are besides various traditions belonging to different countries as to the country whence Memnon came, and the place and manner of his burial. Ctesias says that Memnon was sent by the king of Assyria to aid his feudatory Priam, while the Egyptians said that he had come directly from Egypt (Diod. ii. 22). The stories are harmonised in a later tradition which makes Memnon come from Ethiopia and Egypt to Susa (where he built the citadel called Memnonium) and thence to Troy (Paus. x. 31; cf. Hdt. v. 53, vii. 151). The body of Memnon was saved from dishonour and borne away for burial, like that of Sarpedon in Il. xvi. 667. In the play of Aeschylus Eos herself, by a mechanical contrivance, was shown bearing it away (Poll. iv. 130); in another account it is wafted to its grave near the Aesepus by the winds (Quint. Smyrn. ii. 549); in another, the Ethiopians themselves carry it home to Tithonus (Diod. ii. 22). Tombs of Memnon were shown in Egypt, on the banks of the Phrygian Aesepus, and at Paltus on the Syrian coast (Strab. pp. 587, 728). It must remain a matter of doubt how far the connexion of the myth with different places may have been due to accidental similarity of local names. At Susa, for instance, it is certain that the acropolis was called τὸ Μενώνιον, and it is possible that the story may have been subsequently attached to it. The most famous of all the traditions is that which represented a colossal statue near Thebes as the figure of Memnon the son of Eos. The statue is really that of Amenhotep III. (or Amenophis), who reigned in the eighteenth dynasty, about 1430 B. C. It was placed there beside another statue of Thi, the wife of Amenhotep, and a Mesopotamian princess, and was the work of a royal architect and minister, who bore the same name as his master; at some time or other it began to give forth a musical note when it was touched by the rising sun—explained by modern writers as due to 'the sudden change of temperature creating currents of air, which pressed through crevices of the stone and caused a melancholy singing note.' It may have been an attempt to account for it, and some likeness in the name, which attached the story of Memnon to his mother the Dawn to this statue: not, however, as it appears, at a very early date. The name τὸ Μενώνιον had been applied when Strabo visited the place and heard the musical note (not recorded before his time), though he does not definitely state the vocal statue to be Memnon's. A little later it is frequently alluded to as Memnon's statue (Plin. xxxvi. 68; Tac. Ann. ii. 61; Juv. xv. 5; Lucian, Tox. 27). Pausanias (i. 42) in describing it notices correctly that the Egyptians themselves called it the statue, not of Memnon, but of Phamenoph (i.e. Amnophis). On the statue were inscribed also verses by visitors, mostly of the first and second cent. A. D. (C. I. G. 4738). Herodotus (ii. 106) mentions with disapproval a conjecture that a monument between Smyrna and Ephesus (really Hittite: see p. 218, b) was a figure of Memnon. It may be noted as a curious coincidence that the recently discovered correspondence of Amenhotep III. and IV. shows that they were intimately connected by alliance and by marriage with kings of Babylon, Assyria, and Mesopotamia, and also with the prince of a country apparently near Paltus in Syria. In art the weighing of the fates of Memnon and Achilles is a favourite subject for vase paintings, as is also the bearing of the body of the dead Memnon: in some he is carried by Eos; in one, like Sarpedon, by Death and Sleep.

—2. A native of Rhodes, joined Artabazus, satrap of Lower Phrygia, who had married his sister, in his revolt against Darius Ochus. When fortune deserted the insurgents they fled to the court of Philip. Mentor, the brother of Memnon, being high in favour with Darius, interceded on behalf of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardoned and again received into favour. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great military skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the W. coast of Asia Minor (about B. C. 336). When Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon defended Halicarnassus against Alexander, until it was no longer possible to hold out. He then collected an army and a fleet, with the design of carrying the war into Greece, but died at Mytilene in 333, before he could carry his plan into execution. His death was an irreparable loss to the Persian cause; for several Greek states were prepared to join him, had he carried the war into Greece. (Arrian, An. i. 12–23, ii. 1; Diod. xvi. 34, 52, xvii. 18–21.)—3. A native of Heraclea Pontica, wrote a large work on the history of that city. Of how many books it consisted we do not know. Photius had read from the ninth to the sixteenth inclusive, of which portion he has made a tolerably copious abstract. The first eight books he had not read, and he speaks of other books after the sixteenth. The ninth book began with an account of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple of Plato and Isocrates, and the sixteenth book came down to the time of Julius Caesar, after the latter had obtained the supreme power. The work was probably written in the time of Augustus, and certainly not later than the time of Hadrian or the Antonines. The Excerpta of Photius are published separately, by Orelli, Lips. 1816.

Memnōnium. [MEMNON.]

Memphis (Μέμφις, Μένφ: O. T. Moph: Μεμφίτης, Memphites; in Egyptian Men-rufer, 'the good abode'; Menf and Metrahenny, Ru.), a great city of Egypt which stood on the left (W.) bank of the Nile, about ten miles above the pyramids of Jizeh, near the N. limit of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, a nome of which (Μεμφίτης) was named after the city. It was connected by canals with the lakes of Moeris and Mareotis. It was the chief seat of the worship of Ptah (whom the Greeks identified with Hephaestus). It was of unknown antiquity, its foundation being ascribed to Menes, and was the capital of the third, fifth, seventh and eighth dynasties. It ranked during the great period of Thebes as second only to that city, and after the downfall of Thebes remained the wealthiest and most important city of Egypt (though it was partially destroyed by Cambyzes in B. C. 524) until Alexandria superseded it. In the time of its splendour it is said to have been 150 stadia in circumference, and half a day's journey in every direction. Of the splendid buildings with which it was adorned, the chief were the palace of the Pharaohs; the temple-palace of the god-bull Apis; the temple of Serapis, with its avenue of sphinxes, now covered by the sand of the desert; and the temple of Ptah. (Hdt. ii. 99, 114, 136, 153, 154; Diod. i. 50; Strab. pp. 803–817.)

Menaenum or Menae (Menenius Cic., Menaeus Plin., but on coins Menaenus; Mineo), a town on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Hybla, the birthplace and residence of the Sicel chief Ducetius, who was long a formidable enemy of the Greek cities in Sicily. [DUCETIUS.] On his fall the town lost all its importance. (Diod. xi. 78, 88, 90; Cic. Verr. iii. 22, 42).

Mēnālippus. [MELANIPPUS.]

Mēnander (Μένανδρος), of Athens, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopithes and Hegesistrate, and flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. He was born B. C. 342. His father, Diopithes, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in the year of his son's birth. Alexis, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander, on the father's side; and we may naturally suppose that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus, of whom the former was his teacher and the latter his intimate friend. His taste and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus; and in an epigram he declared that 'as Themistocles rescued Greece from slavery, so Epicurus from unreason.' From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Characteres of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the comedies of Menander. Of the actual events of his life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his admirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria; but Menander seems to have declined the proffered honour. He died at Athens B. C. 291, at the age of fifty-two, and is said to have been drowned while swimming in the harbour of Piraeus. Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career was not eminently successful; for, though he composed upwards of 100 comedies, he only gained the prize eight times. His preference for vivid delineation of character instead of coarse jesting may have been the reason why he was not so great a favourite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover, to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once, when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, 'Pray, Philemon, do you not blush when you gain a victory over me?' The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch, and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. It is clear that in the New Comedy Menander had much more scope for an ingenious plot than was attainable in the older comedy: in the first place, because it was no longer a political pasquinade attacking known persons, under real or feigned names, but a picture of social life, in which the characters were typical, and whatever satire was used was directed at manners, not at persons; and secondly, the Chorus, which was an impediment to the plot, was abandoned. Menander seems to have been skilful in the invention and development of his story—usually an intrigue or love-story—clever in his character-drawing, polished and witty in his dialogue. His comedies were imitated by the Roman dramatists, by Plautus in the Bacchides, Stichus, and Poenulus, and still more by Terence, who was little more than a translator of Menander. But we cannot form from any one play of Terence a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, as the Roman poet frequently compressed two of Menander's plays into one by what was called Contaminatio. Of Menander's comedies only fragments are extant, edited by Meineke, in Fragm. Comic. Graec.

Menapii, a powerful people in the N. of Gallia Belgica, originally dwelt on both banks of the Rhine, but were afterwards driven out of their possessions on the right bank by the Uspetes and Tenchteri, and inhabited only the left bank near its mouth, and W. of the Mosa (Caes. B.G. ii. 4, iv. 4, 22, 38; Tac. Hist. iv. 28; Strab. pp. 194, 199). Their country was covered with forests and swamps. They had a fortress near the Mosa called Castellum Menapiorum (Cassel, a little N. of Hazebrouck).

Mēnas (Μηνᾶς), also called Mēnōdōrus (Μηνόδορος) by Appian, a freedman of Pompey the Great, was one of the principal commanders of the fleet of Sext. Pompey in his war against Octavian and Antony, B.C. 40. In 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavian and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, despatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however, was rejected by Pompey. (Dio Cass. xlvi. 30, 36-45; Appian, B. C. v. 56, 66, 70-73; Plut. Ant. 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 73, 77.) On the breaking out of the war again in 38, Menas deserted Pompey and went over to Octavian. In 36 he returned to his old master's service; but in the course of the same year he again played the deserter, and joined Octavian. In 35 he accompanied Octavian in the Pannonian campaign, and was slain at the siege of Siscia. (Dio Cass. xlvi. 54, xlix. 1, 37; App. B. C. v. 77-101; Suet. Aug. 74.) According to the old scholiasts, this Menas is the person so vehemently attacked by Horace in his fourth Epode. It is difficult to reconcile with this Horace's description of the person attacked in the Epode as 'tribunus militum.' There is less difficulty in accepting the tradition that the fickleness of Menas is alluded to in Od. iii. 3, 16.

Mēndē or Mendae (Μένδη: Μενδαῖος), a town on the W. coast of the Macedonian peninsula Pallene and on the Thermaic gulf, was a colony of the Eretrians, and was celebrated for its wine. It was for some time a place of considerable importance, but was ruined by the foundation of Cassandria. (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. iv. 123, 130; Paus. x. 5, 27; Liv. xxxi. 45.)

Mendes (Μένδης: Μενδήσιος: Ru. near Matarieh), a considerable city of the Delta of Egypt, on the S. side of the lake of Tanis (Menzaleh), and on the bank of one of the lesser arms of the Nile, named after it Μενδήσιον στόμα: the seat of the worship of the sacred ram Mendes, whose worship the Greeks connected with that of Pan. Mendes became the capital of the 29th and 30th dynasties. (Hdt. ii. 42, 46; Diod. i. 84; Strab. p. 802.)

Mēnēcles (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B.C. 94 (Cic. Brut. 95, 325, de Or. ii. 23; Strab. p. 661).—2. A historian of Barce mentioned by Athenaeus, p. 184.

Mēnēcrātes (Μενεκράτης). 1. A Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedonia, B.C. 359-336. He made himself ridiculous by calling himself 'Jupiter,' and assuming divine honours. There is a tale that he was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were sumptuously fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterwards perceiving the joke, and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust. (Athen. p. 289; Ael. V.H. xii. 51).—2. Tiberius Claudius Menecrates, a physician mentioned by Galen, composed more than 150 medical works, of which only a few fragments remain.

Mēnēdēmus (Μενέδημος), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Eretria, and though of noble birth was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker. According to one story he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to Megara, to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy; but it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato. According to another story, he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as millers, working during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day (Athen. p. 168). The two friends afterwards became disciples of Stilpo at Megara. From Megara they went to Elis, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phaedo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretrian. He did not, however, confine himself to philosophical pursuits, but took an active part in the political affairs of his native city, and came to be the leading man in the state. He went on various embassies to Lysimachus, Demetrius, and others; but being suspected of the treacherous intention of betraying Eretria into the power of Antigonus, he quitted his native city secretly, and took refuge with Antigonus in Asia. Here he starved himself to death in the 74th year of his age, probably about B.C. 277. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 125-144; Strab. p. 393.) Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, except that it closely resembled that of the Megarian school. [EUCLEIDES, No. 2.]

Mênêlâi, or -us, Portus (Μενελαῖος λιμνη, Μενελαος: Marsa-Toubrouk, or Ras-el-Milhr?), an ancient city on the coast of Marmarica, in N. Africa, founded, according to tradition, by Menelaus. It is remarkable as the place where Agesilaus died. (Hdt. ii. 119; Strab. pp. 40, 838; Nep. Ages. 8.)

Mênêlâium. [THERAPAE.]

Mênêlâus (Μενελαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλαος). 1. Son of Plisthenes or Atreus, and younger brother of Agamemnon. His early life is related under AGAMEMNON. He was king of Lacedaemon, and married to the beautiful Helen, by whom he became the father of Hermione. When Helen had been carried off by rived at Sparta on the very day on which Orestes was engaged in burying Clytaemnestra and Aegisthus (Od. iv. 365). Henceforward he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace and wealth, and his palace shone in its splendour like the sun or the moon. When Telemachus visited Sparta to inquire after his father, Menelaus was solemnising the marriage of his daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus, and of his son Megapenthes with a daughter of Alector (Od. iv. 1-80; Paus. iii. 14, 6). In the Homeric poems Menelaus is described as a man of an athletic figure; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proetus in the Odyssey (iv. 561), Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium: for Helen was the daughter and Menelaus the son-in-law of Zeus. Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where his tomb and that of Helen were shown. Respecting the tale that Helen never went to Troy, but was detained in Egypt, see HELENA. [For the conjectural history of the rule of the Pelopidae in the Peloponnesus see MYCENAE and TIRYNS; and for the Trojan war see TROJA.]—2. Son of Lagus, and brother of Ptolemy Soter, held possession of Cyprus for his brother, but was defeated and driven out of the island by Demetrius Poliorcetes, B.C. 306 (Diod. xx. 21-53; Plut. Demetr. 15-17).—3. A Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandria, the author of an extant treatise in three books, on the Sphere. He made astronomical observations at Rome in the first year of the emperor Trajan, A.D. 98.

Mênêlâus (Μενελαος), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Canopic branch of the Nile, named after the brother of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. It was made the capital of the district between the lakes of Moeris and Mareotis (νομὸς Μενελαίτης). (Strab. pp. 801, 803.)

Mênênius Lanâtus. 1. Agrippa, consul, B.C. 503, conquered the Sabines. It was owing to his mediation that the first great rupture between the patricians and plebeians, when the latter seceded to the Sacred Mount, was brought to a happy and peaceful termination in 493; and it was upon this occasion he is said to have related to the plebeians his well-known fable of the belly and the members (Liv. ii. 16, 32; Dionys. v. 44, 49).—2. T., consul 477, was defeated by the Etruscans. He had previously allowed the Fabii to be destroyed by the Etruscans, although he might have assisted them with his army. For this act of treachery he was brought to trial by the tribunes and condemned to pay a fine. He took his punishment so much to heart, that he shut himself up in the house and died of grief. (Liv. ii. 51; Dionys. ix. 18-27; Gell. xviii. 21.)

Mênes or Mêna (Μήνης), first king of Egypt, according to tradition. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephaestus (Ptah). Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a luxurious style of living. His date is placed at 4000-4500 B.C. (Hdt. ii. 4, 99; Diod. i. 43, 45, 89; Plut. Is. et Os. 8.)

Menesthêi Portus (Puerto de S. Maria), a harbour in Hispania Baetica, not far from Gades, with an oracle of Menestheus, who is said to have settled in Spain (Strab. p. 140).

Menelaus and Helen. (Millingen, Anc. Uned. Mon. pl. 32.)

Paris, Menelaus and Odysseus sailed to Troy in order to demand her restitution. Menelaus was hospitably treated by Antenor, but the journey was of no avail; and the Trojan Antimachus even advised his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Odysseus (Il. xi. 139). Thereupon Menelaus and his brother Agamemnon resolved to march against Troy with all the forces that Greece could muster. In the Trojan war Menelaus was under the special protection of Hera and Athene, and distinguished himself by his bravery in battle (Il. ii. 581, iv. 8, 129, v. 50, 576, xiii. 614). He killed many illustrious Trojans, and would have slain Paris also in single combat, had not the latter been carried off by Aphrodite in a cloud (Il. iii. and iv.). Menelaus was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse; and as soon as Troy was taken he and Odysseus hastened to the house of Deiphobus, who had married Helen after the death of Paris, and put him to death in a barbarous manner (Od. iv. 280, viii. 518; Verg. Aen. vi. 523). Menelaus is said to have been secretly introduced into the chamber of Deiphobus by Helen, who thus became reconciled to her former husband. He was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and Nestor; but he was eight years wandering about the shores of the Mediterranean and in Egypt, before he reached home (Od. iii. 276-312, iv. 125, 228; cf. Hdt. ii. 118, 116; Paus. x. 25 2 Strab. p. 801). He ar-

Mēnestheus (Μενεσθεύς). 1. Son of Peteos, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy. With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom, but to have been afterwards expelled by the Theseids and to have died in Spain. (Il. ii. 552, iv. 327; Paus. i. 17, 6, ii. 25, 6; Plut. Thes. 32; Strab. p. 140.)—2. Son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, CHARES, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted. (Nep. Iph. 3, Tim. 3; Diod. xvi. 21.)

Mēnix or Lotophagētis, aft. Girba (Μήνιγξ, Λωτοφαγίτις, Λωτοφάγων νήσος: Jerbah), a considerable island, close to the coast of Africa Propria, at the SE. extremity of the Lesser Syrtis, with two cities, Mēnix (Menax) on the NE., and Girba, or Gerra, on the SW. It was the birthplace of the emperors Vibius Gallus and Volusianus. (Strab. pp. 25, 123, 157, 334; Aurel. Vict. Ep. 31.)

Mēnippē (Μενίππη), daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. These two sisters put themselves to death in order to propitiate the two Erinyes who had visited Aonia with a plague. They were metamorphosed by Persephone and Hades into comets, and the Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomenos. (Ov. Met. xiii. 685; Ant. Lib. 25.)

Mēnippus (Μένιππος).—1. Usurped the rule of Oresus in Euboea, with the aid of Philip of Macedon (Dem. de Cor. pp. 248, 252; Diod. xvi. 74).—2. An officer of Philip V. of Macedon (Liv. xxvii. 32, xxviii. 5; Pol. x. 42).—3. An envoy from Antiochus to Rome; afterwards incited and aided the Aetolians in their war with Rome (Liv. xxxiv. 57, xxxv. 32, 50).—4. A Cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes, and flourished about B.C. 60. He amassed great wealth as a usurer, but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. We are told that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests; whence it would appear that he was one of those Cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian. His works are lost; but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Saturae Menippeae, written in imitation of Menippus. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 99, vi. 101.)

Mennis, a city of Adiabene, in Assyria, only mentioned by Curtius (v. 1).

Mēnōdōtus (Μηνόδοτος), a physician of Nicomedia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Antiochus of Laodicea, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the second century after Christ.

Mēnoceus (Μενοικεύς). 1. A Theban, grandson of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon (Eur. Phoen. 10; Apollod. ii. 4, 5).—2. Grandson of the former, and son of Creon. He put an end to his life because Tiresias had declared that his death would bring victory to his country, when the seven Argive heroes marched against Thebes. His tomb was at Thebes near the Neitian gate. (Eur. Phoen. 768, 930; Paus. ix. 25; Apollod. iii. 6, 7.)

Menoetius (Μενολτιος). 1. Son of Iapetus

and Clymene or Asia, and brother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimethens. He was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, in the battle with the Titans, and was hurled into Tartarus. (Hes. Th. 507; Apollod. i. 2, 3).—2. Son of Actor and Aegina, husband of Polymele or Sthenele, and father of Patroclus, who is hence called Menoetiades. Menoetius fled with the young Patroclus, who had slain the son of Amphidamas, to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there. (Il. xi. 770, xxiii. 85; Strab. p. 425.)

Mēnon (Μένων).—1. A noble of Pharsalus in Thessaly who aided the Athenians at Eion (Thuc. ii. 22, iv. 102; Dem. c. Arist. pp. 686, 687).—2. A Thessalian adventurer, was one of the generals of the Greek mercenaries in the army of Cyrus the Younger when the latter marched into Upper Asia against his brother Artaxerxes, B.C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he was apprehended along with the other Greek generals by Tissaphernes, and was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. His character is drawn in the blackest colours by Xenophon. He is the same as the Menon introduced in the dialogue of Plato which bears his name. (Xen. An. i. 1, 10, ii. 6, 21; Diod. xiv. 19, 27.)

Mens, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans, had a sanctuary on the Capitol.

Mentēsa (Mentesānus), surnamed Bastia, a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Castulo to Carthago Nova. (Liv. xxvi. 17; Ptol. ii. 6, 59.)

Mentor (Μέντωρ). 1. Son of Alcimus and faithful friend of Odysseus, frequently mentioned in the Odyssey (ii. 226, iii. 13, xxiv. 445).—2. A Greek of Rhodes, who, with his brother Memnon, rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabis, king of Egypt. He was sent to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, in his revolt against Darius Ochus; and when Tennes went over to the Persians, Mentor was taken into the service of Darius. He rose rapidly in the favour of Darius, and eventually received a satrapy, including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Darius enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. [MEMNON.] (Diod. xvi. 42-52; Arrian, An. vii. 419).—3. The most celebrated silver-chaser among the Greeks, who must have lived before B.C. 356, since some of his work perished with the temple of Ephesus in that year. His works were vases and cups, which were most highly prized by the Romans (Plin. vii. 127, xxxiii. 154; Propert. i. 14, 2; Mart. xi. 15, 5; Cic. Verr. iv. 18, 38; Juv. viii. 104.)

Menyllus (Μένυλλος) commanded at Mynychia for Antipater after the Lamian war (Diod. xviii. 18; Plut. Phoc. 28-31).

Mercūri Promontorium. [HERMAEUM.]

Mercūrius, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain, especially the tutelary god of the mercatores and their guild (collegium). The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merx and mercari. It is, however, doubtful whether he was a god of the original settlers at Rome of the Latin and Sabine stock. There is more reason to believe that his worship was introduced by the Etruscans, possibly first in consequence of the development of the corn trade with Etruria and with Sicily (Liv. ii. 34), and grew in importance under the Tarquins, as the commerce was extended not only to Magna Graecia but also to Carthage. The equivalent god of commerce among the Etruscans was called Turms (probably an Etruscan word, not a corruption of Hermes), and it is likely that the Romans adopted the worship of that deity, but substituted a name formed from their own language. The earliest temple to Mercury was built near the Circus Maximus, B.C. 493 (Liv. ii. 21, 27), where his festival was celebrated, together with that of Maia, on the Ides of May (Macrob. i. 12, 19). Besides this, numerous shrines of the god were set up in streets frequented by traders, and various names were applied to the statues in them: e.g. Mercurius Malevolus, M. Sobrius, M. Epulo (Fest. pp. 161, 296; C. I. L. vi. 522), some of which may refer to the character which the sculptor gave in each case to the statue. Hence one street was called Sobrius Vicus, which some have curiously explained as being named from the absence of wine-shops in the street, or because milk, and not wine, was offered (Fest. p. 297). The title Epulo designated Mercury as one of the deities honoured with banquets by the Epulones. Merchants also visited the well near the Porta Capena, to which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be absolved from guilt of lying, and make a large profit (Ov. Fast. v. 673). The name of Mercury's Well clung even in the middle ages to this spot, which is still traceable. The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes (as god of gain), and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former. The Fetiales, however, never recognised the identity, and instead of the caduceus used a sacred branch as the emblem of peace. [Dict. of Ant. art. Sagmina.] For the Greek myths transferred to Mercurius, and for representations of him in works of art, see HERMES.

Mercūrius Trismegistus. [HERMES TRISMEGISTUS.]

Mērīōnes (Μηρίωνης), a Cretan hero, son of Molus, who, conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in 80 ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and usually acted together with Idomeneus. Later traditions relate that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there; whereas according to others he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero, together with Idomeneus, at Cnossus. (Il. ii. 651, viii. 264, xvii. 669; Diod. iv. 79.)

Mermērus (Μέρμερος). 1. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Macareus or Mormorus, was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth (Apollod. i. 9, 28; Diod. iv. 54).—2. Son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medea (Od. i. 260).

Mermessus or Myrmessus (Μερμησσός, Μυρμησσός), also written Marmessus and Marpessus, a town of Mysia, in the territory of Lampascus, not far from Polichna; the native place of a sibyl (Paus. x. 12, 2; Suid. s.v.).

Merobaudes, Flavius, a general and a poet, whose merits are recorded in an inscription on the base of a statue dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome in the year 1812 or 1813. We learn from the inscription that the statue was erected in A.D. 435. He wrote a Laus Christi, and some historical poems, especially on Aëtius, of which fragments were discovered by Niebuhr upon a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, and were published by him at Bonn, 1823; also in Weber's Corp. Poët. Lat.

Mērōē (Μερόη: pts. of Nubia and Sennar), the island, so called, and almost an island in reality, formed by the rivers Astapus (Blue Nile) and Astaboras (Atbarah), and the portion of the Nile between their mouths, was a district of Ethiopia. Its capital, also called Meroë, stood near the N. point of the island, on the E. bank of the Nile, below the modern Shendy, where the plain, near the village of Assour, is covered with ruins of temples, pyramids, and other works, in a style closely resembling the Egyptian. Standing in a fertile district, rich in timber and minerals, at the foot of the highlands of Abyssinia, and at the junction of two great rivers, Meroë became at a very early period a chief emporium for the trade between Egypt, N. Africa, Ethiopia, Arabia, and India, and the capital of a powerful state. From Meroë, in the eighth century B. C., was founded the Ethiopian dynasty (the twenty-fifth), which reigned at Thebes [see p. 30, b]. The power at Meroë was generally in the hands of a ruling caste of priests, who chose a king from among themselves, and bound him to govern according to their laws; until king Ergamenes (about B.C. 300) threw off the yoke of the priests (whom he massacred) and converted his kingdom into an absolute monarchy.—For further details see AETHIOPIA, and AEGYPTUS.

Merom Lacus. [SEMECHONITIS.]

Mērōpē (Μερόπη). 1. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phaëthon (Ov. Met. ii. 340; Hyg. Fab. 154).—2. Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glaucus. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the seventh and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man (Apollod. i. 9, 3, iii. 10, 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 175).—3. Daughter of Cypselus, wife of Cresphontes, and mother of Aegyptus. For details, see AEGYPTUS.

Mērops (Μέροψ). 1. King of the island of Cos, husband of the nymph Etheamea, and father of Eumelus. His wife was killed by Artemis, because she had neglected to worship that goddess. Merops, in order to rejoin his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Hera changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars. (Eur. Hel. 384; Hyg. Astr. ii. 16; Ant. Lib. 15).—2. King of the Ethiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phaëthon (Strab. p. 33; Ov. Met. i. 763).—3. King of Rhyndacus, on the Hellespont, also called Macar or Macareus, was a celebrated soothsayer, and father of Chite, Arisbe, Amphius, and Adrastus (Il. ii. 831, xi. 329; Strab. p. 586).

Merūla, L. Cornēlius, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B.C. 87, was elected consul in his place. On the capture of Rome by Marius and Cinna at the close of the same year, Merula put an end to his own life. (App. B. C. i. 65-75; Tac. Ann. iii. 58; Plut. Mar. 41, 45.)

Mesambria (Μεσαμβρία: Bushehr), a peninsula on the coast of Persis, near the river Padargus, the present Abu-shir.

Meschēla (Μεσχέλα: prob. near Bonah), a large city on the coast of N. Africa, said to have been founded by Greeks returning from the Trojan war. It was taken by Eumachus, the lieutenant of Agathocles (Diod. xx. 57).

Mesembria (Μεσημβρία, Herod. Μεσαμβρία: Μεσημβριανός). 1. (Missivri or Messuri), a celebrated town of Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus, and at the foot of Mt. Haemus, founded by the inhabitants of Chalcedon and Byzantium in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and hence called a colony of Megara, since those towns were founded by the Megarians (Hdt. vi. 33; Strab. p. 319; Ptol. iii. 10, 8).—2. A town in Thrace, but of much less importance, on the coast of the Aegaean sea, and in the territory of the Cicones, near the mouth of the Lissus, and the most westerly of the Samothracian settlements on the mainland (Hdt. vii. 108).

Mēsēnē (Μεσηνή, i.e. Midland), a name given to that part of Babylonia which consisted of the great island formed by the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Royal Canal; containing the greater part of Babylonia (Strab. p. 84).

Mēsōa or Messōa. [SPARTA.]

Mēsōgis. [LYDIA, p. 507, b.]

Mēsōmēdes (Μεσομήδης), a lyric and epigrammatic poet under Hadrian and the Antonines, was a native of Crete, and a freedman of Hadrian, whose favourite Antinous he celebrated in a poem. A salary which he had received from Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus Pius. Three poems of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

Mēsōpōtāmia (Μεσοποταμία, ἡ Μέση τῶν ποταμῶν: O. T. Aram Naharaim, i.e. Syria between the Rivers: LXX Μεσοποταμία Συρίας: Al-Jesira, i.e. The Island), a district of W. Asia, named from its position between the Euphrates and the Tigris, of which rivers the former divided it from Syria and Arabia on the W., the latter from Assyria on the E.: on the N. it was separated from Armenia by a branch of the Taurus, called Masius, and on the S. from Babylonia by the Median Wall. The name was probably first used by the Greeks in the time of the Seleucidae (Arrian, vii. 7; Tac. Ann. vi. 43). In earlier times the country was reckoned a part, sometimes of Syria, and sometimes of Assyria. Nor in the division of the Persian empire was it recognised as a distinct country, but it belonged to the satrapy of Babylonia. Excepting the mountainous region on the N. and NE. formed by the chain of MASIUS, and its prolongation parallel to the Tigris, the country formed a vast plain, broken by few hills, well watered by rivers and cauals, and very fertile, except in the S. part, which was more like the Arabian Desert, on the opposite side of the Euphrates. Besides corn, and fruit, and spices (e.g. the amomum), it produced fine timber, and supported large herds of cattle; in the S., or desert part, there were numerous wild animals, such as wild asses, gazelles, ostriches, and lions. Its chief mineral products were naphtha and jet (Curt. v. 1, 12; Strab. xvi. 747). The N. part of Mesopotamia was divided into the districts of MYGDONIA and OSROËNE. It belonged successively to the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, Syro-Grecian, Parthian and later Persian empires, but at times formed part of the Roman empire. Trajan conquered it in 115, when he formed the three provinces called Armeuia, Assyria, and Mesopotamia; but Hadrian relinquished it. Aurelius reconquered it, and founded a colony at Singara; Sept. Severus founded others at Nisibis and Rhessaena. (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 22, lxxxv. 1, 3; Eutrop. viii. 6.) It was really of small value to Rome, and little else but a battlefield. Jovian finally gave it up to the Persians (Amm. Marc. xxv. 9).—In a wider sense the name is sometimes applied to the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

Mespīla (ἡ Μέσιλα: Ru. at Kouyounjik, opp. to Mosul, Layard), a city of Assyria, on the E. side of the Tigris, which Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4) mentions as having been formerly a great city, inhabited by Medes, but in his time fallen into decay. It had a wall six parasangs in circuit, composed of two parts: namely, a base fifty feet thick and fifty high, of polished stone full of shells (the limestone of the country), upon which was built a brick wall fifty feet thick and 100 high. It had served, according to tradition, as the refuge for the Median queen when the Persians overthrew the empire of the Medes, and it resisted all the efforts of the Persian king to take it, until a thunderstorm frightened the inhabitants into a surrender.

Messa (Μέσσα, Μέσση: Mezapo), a town and harbour in Laconia near C. Taenarum (Il. ii. 502; Paus. iii. 25, 9).

Messābātēnē or -icē (Μεσσαβατηνή, Μεσσαβατική: Μεσσαβάται), a small district on the SE. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the borders of Media, Persis, and Susiana, reckoned sometimes to Persis and sometimes to Susiana. The name is derived from the mountain passes in the district. (Strab. pp. 524, 744.)

Messālina. [MESSALLINA.]

Messalla, less correctly Messāla, the name of a distinguished family of the Valeria gens at Rome. They appear for the first time on the consular Fasti in B.C. 263, and for the last in A.D. 506.—1. M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messalla, was consul B.C. 263, and, in conjunction with his colleague M. Otacilius, carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians in Sicily. The two consuls concluded a peace with Hiero. In consequence of his relieving Messana he obtained the cognomen of Messalla. His triumph was distinguished by two remarkable monuments of his victory—by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian and Punic armies, which he placed in the Curia Hostilia, and by a sun-dial (Hologium), from the booty of Catania, which was set up on a column behind the rostra, in the forum. Messalla was censor in 252. (Pol. i. 16, 17; Liv. Ep. 16; Plin. vii. 214, xxxv. 22).—2. M. Valerius Messalla, consul 226 (Zonar. xviii. 19).—3. M. Valerius Messalla, praetor peregrinus 194, and consul 188, when he had the province of Liguria (Liv. xxxiv. 54, xxxviii. 42, xlii. 28).—4. M. Valerius Messalla, consul 161, and censor 154 (Val. Max. ii. 9, 9).—5. M. Valerius Messalla Niger, praetor 63; consul 51; and censor 55. He belonged to the aristocratic party. He married a sister of the orator Q. Hortensius. (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 46; Caes. B. G. i. 2; Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2).—6. M. Valerius Messalla, son of the preceding; consul 53; belonged, like his father, to the aristocratic party; but in consequence probably of his eumity to Pompey, he joined Caesar in the Civil war, and served under him in Africa. He was in high repute for his skill in augury, on which science he wrote. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18, ad Att. iv. 16; Dio Cass. xl. 17, 45; Bell. Afr. 28; Gell. xiii. 14).—7. M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, son of the preceding, was educated partly at Athens, where probably began his intimacy with Horace and L. Bibulus (Hor. Sat. i. 10, 81; App. B. C. iv. 38). After Caesar's death (44) he joined the republican party, and attached himself especially to Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Octavianus, he was accustomed to call 'my general' (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Dio Cass. xlvii. 24; Vell. Pat. ii. 71). Messalla was proscribed, but since his kinsmen proved his absence from Rome at the time of Caesar's assassination, the triumvirs erased his name from the list, and offered him security for his person and property. Messalla, however, rejected their offers, followed Cassius into Asia, and at Philippi, in the first day's battle, turned Octavianus's flank, stormed his camp, and narrowly missed taking him prisoner (Plut. Brut. 41). After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messalla, with a numerous body of fugitives, took refuge in the island of Thasos. His followers, though defeated, were not disorganised, and offered him the command. But he induced them to accept honourable terms from Antony, to whom he attached himself until Cleopatra's influence made his ruin certain and easy to be foreseen. Messalla then again changed his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily, 36; against the Salassians, a mountain tribe lying between the Graian and the Pennine Alps, 34; and at Actium, 31. (App. B. C. v. 102-113; Dio Cass. xlix. 38; Strab. p. 189.) A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for 31, and Messalla was appointed to the vacant place. He was proconsul of Aquitania in 28-27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitania, Messalla held a prefecture in Asia Minor. He was deputed by the senate, probably in 30, to greet Augustus with the title of 'Pater Patriae'; and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius (Aug. 58; cf. Ov. Fast. ii. 127, Trist. ii. 39; Dio Cass. lvi. 8, 41). During the disturbances at the comitia in 27, Augustus nominated Messalla to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days. Messalla soon afterwards withdrew from all public employments except his augurship, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. About two years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B.C. 3-A.D. 8, Messalla's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name (Tac. Dial. 17). His tomb was of remarkable splendour. Messalla was distinguished as much in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself a historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote commentaries on the civil wars after Caesar's death, and a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis. (Plut. Brut. 40, 41, 45, 53; Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Suet. Aug. 74; Plin. xxxiii. 50.) The treatise, however, De Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messalla's poems were of a satirical or even licentious character (Plin. Ep. v. 3). His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on construction and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters (Quint. i. 7, 37). His eloquence reflected the character of his age. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded (Quint. iv. 1, 8). He recommended and practised translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Phryne of Hypcrides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language (Quint. x. 5, 2). His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars, and the favour of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messalla one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. His friendship for Horace and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, the name of Messalla is continually introduced. (Hor. Od. iii. 21, Sat. i. 6, 42, A. P. 371; Tib. i. 7, iv. 1.) The dedication of the Ciris, a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of 'Plotius and Varius, of Maecenas and Octavius' (Hor. Sat. i. 10, 81), cannot well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont. iv. 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in eloquence.—8. M. Valerius Messalla Barbatus Appianus, was consul B.C. 12, and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the empress Messallina. (Dio Cass. liv. 28; Suet. Claud. 26.)—9. L. Valerius Messalla Volesus, consul A.D. 5, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate (Tac. Ann. iii. 68).—10. L. Vipstanus Messalla, legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A.D. 70, was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign (Plin. Ep. i. 5). He is one of Tacitus' authorities for the history of the civil wars after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus. (Tac. Hist. iii. 9, 18, iv. 42, Dial. 15-25.)

Messallina, or Messalina. 1. Statilia, granddaughter of T. Statilius Taurus, cos. A.D. 11, was the third wife of the emperor Nero, who married her in A.D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messallina (Tac. Ann. xv. 68; Suet. Ner. 35, Oth. 10).—2. Valeria, daughter of M. Valerius Messalla Barbatus and of Domitia Lepida, was the third wife of the emperor Claudius. She

rious; and the absence of virtue was not concealed by any sense of shame or regard for decorum. She was as cruel as she was profligate; and many members of the most illustrious families of Rome were sacrificed to her fears or her hatred. She long exercised an unbounded empire over her weak husband, who alone was ignorant of her infidelities. For some time she was supported in her career of crime by the freedmen of Claudius; but when Narcissus, the most powerful of the emperor's freedmen, perceived that he should probably fall a victim to Messallina's intrigues, he determined to get rid of her. The insane folly of Messallina furnished the means of her own destruction. Having conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius, she publicly married him with all the rites of a legal conubium during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, A.D. 48. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that Silius and Messallina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messallina's death-warrant. She was put to death by a tribune of the guards in the gardens of Lucullus. (Tac. Ann. xi. 26-38; Dio Cass. lx. 14-31; Suet. Claud. 17-39; Juv. vi. 115-135, x. 333, xiv. 331.)

Messāna (Μεσσήνη, Μεσάνα Dor.: Μεσάνιος: Messina), a celebrated town on the N.E. coast of Sicily, on the straits separating Italy from this island, which are here about four miles broad. It was originally a town of the Sicels, and was called Zancle (Ζάγκλη), or a sickle, on account of the shape of its harbour, which is formed by a singular curve of sandy shore. The first Greek colonists were, according to Thucydides, pirates from the Chalcidian town of Cumæ in Italy, who were joined by Chalcidians from Eubœa, and, according to Strabo, by Naxians; but these two accounts are not contradictory, for since Naxos in Sicily was also a colony from Chalcis, we may easily suppose that the Naxians joined the other Chalcidians in the foundation of the town (Thuc. vi. 4; Strab. p. 268; Paus. iv. 23, 7; Diod. iv. 85). Since the people of Zancle helped the Chalcidians to found Rhegium, in conjunction with Messenians expelled during the first Messenian war, Zancle itself must have been founded between 735 (the date of Naxos) and the end of the first Messenian war. [RHEGIUM.] Zancle soon became so powerful that it founded the town of Himera, about B.C. 648. After the capture of Miletus by the Persians, the inhabitants of Zancle invited the Ionians, who had been expelled from their native country, to settle on their 'beautiful coast' (καλή ακτή, Hdt. vi. 22); and a number of Samians and other Ionic Greeks accepted their offer. On landing in the S. of Italy, they were persuaded by Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, to take possession of Zancle during the absence of Scythes, the tyrant of the city, who was engaged in the siege of some other Sicilian town. But their treachery was soon punished; for Anaxilaus himself shortly afterwards drove the Samians out of Zancle, and made himself master of the town, the name of which he changed into Messana or Messene, both because he was himself a Messenian, and because he transferred to the place a body of Messenians from Rhegium. (Hdt. vi. 22, vii. 164; Thuc. l.c.; Strab. l.c.; Diod. xi. 48.) Anaxilaus died 476; and about ten years afterwards (466) his sons were driven out of Messana and Rhegium, and republican governments established in these cities. Messana now enjoyed great prosperity for several years, and in consequence of its excellent harbour and advantageous position, it became a place of great commercial importance. The Athenians failed in their attempt to seize it in 415 (Thuc. vi. 48, 74). But in 396 it was taken by the Carthaginians, who destroyed the town because they saw that they should be unable to maintain so distant a possession against the power of Dionysius of Syracuse (Diod. xiv. 56-58). Dionysius began to rebuild it in the same year, and besides collecting the remains of the former population, he added a number of Locrians, Messenians, and others, so that its inhabitants were of a very mixed kind. After the banishment of the younger Dionysius, Messana was for a short time free, but it fell into the power of Agathocles about 312 (Diod. xix. 65, 102). Among the mercenaries of this tyrant were a number of Mamertini, an Oscan people from Campania, who had been sent from home under the protection of the god Mamers or Mars to seek their fortune in other lands. These Mamertini were quartered in Messana; and after the death of Agathocles (282) they made themselves masters of the town, killed the male inhabitants, and took possession of their wives, their children, and their property. The town was now called Mamertina, and the inhabitants Mamertini; but its ancient name of Messana continued to be in more general use (Pol. i. 7; Diod. xxi. 18; Cic. Verr. ii. 5, 46, iii. 6). The new inhabitants could not lay aside their old predatory habits, and in consequence became involved in a war with Hiero of Syracuse, who defeated them in several battles, and would probably have conquered the town, had not the Carthaginians come in to the aid of the Mamertini, and, under the pretext of assisting them, taken possession of their citadel. The Mamertini had at the same time applied to the Romans for help, who gladly availed themselves of the opportunity to obtain a footing in Sicily. Thus Messana was the immediate cause of the first Punic war, 264. (Pol. i. 10; Diod. xxiii. 1; Liv. Ep. 16.) The Mamertini expelled the Carthaginian garrison, and received the Romans. Messana then passed under the Roman dominion, but nominally as a civitas foederata, retaining its own land and subject to tribute only in time of war (Cic. Verr. v. 22, 56; Plut. Pomp. 10). It was the headquarters of the fleet of Sextus Pompeius, and, probably on that account, lost its privileges, and simply received the Roman franchise as an oppidum civium Romanorum (Plin. iii. 88), but still continued a flourishing place, and as late as the Gothic wars was an important fortress (Ptol. iii. 8, 9; Procop. B.G. i. 8. iii. 39).

Messāpia (Μεσσηπία), the Greek name of CALABRIA.

Messāpium (τὸ Μεσάπιον ὄρος), a mountain in Bœotia on the E. coast, near the town Anthedon, from which Messapus is said to have sailed to the S. of Italy (Strab. p. 405).

Messāpus (Μέσσᾶπος), a Bœotian, from whom Messapia in the S. of Italy was believed to have derived its name (Strab. l.c.).

Messēnē (Μεσσηνή), daughter of Triopas, and wife of Polycaon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her, Messenia. She introduced there the worship of Zeus and the mysteries of the great goddess of Eleusis (Paus. iv. 1, 3, 27).

Messēnē (Μεσσηνή: Μεσσηνίος). 1. (Mavromati), the later capital of Messenia, was founded by Epaminondas B.C. 369, and completed and fortified within the space of eighty-five days. It was situated at the foot of the steep hill of Ithome, which was celebrated as a fortress in the history of the Messenian wars, and now formed the acropolis of the new city. (Paus. iv. 27; Diod. xv. 66.) Messene was one of the most strongly fortified cities of Greece. It was surrounded by massive walls built entirely of stone and flanked with numerous towers (Paus. iv. 31). There are still considerable remains of some of these towers, as well as the foundations of the walls, and of several public buildings. The northern gate of the city is extant, and opens into a circular court, 62 feet in diameter. The city was supplied with water from a fountain called Clepsydra, still a fine spring.—2. See MESSANA.

Messēniā (Μεσσηνία: Μεσσηνίος; in older writers Μεσσηνή: Od. xxi. 15; cf. Pind. Pyth. iv. 126), a country in Peloponnesus, bounded on the E. by Laconia, on the N. by Elis and Arcadia, and on the S. and W. by the sea. It was separated from Laconia by Mt. Taygetus; but part of the W. slope of Taygetus belonged to Laconia; and it is difficult to determine the exact boundaries between the two countries, as they were different at different periods. In the most ancient times the river Nedon formed the boundary between Messenia and Laconia towards the sea; but later the true frontier line was further SE., at a woody hollow called Choerius, twenty stadia S. of Abia (Paus. iv. 1), in the mountain district which Tacitus speaks of as Ager Dentheliatas (Ann. iv. 43). The river Neda formed the N. frontier between Messenia and Elis. The area of Messenia is about 1162 square miles. It was for the most part a mountainous country, and contained only two plains of any extent, in the N. the plain of Stenyclus, and in the S. a still larger plain, through which the Pamisus flowed, and which was called Macaria or the Blessed, on account of its great fertility (Strab. p. 361). There were, however, many smaller valleys among the mountains; and the country was much less rugged and far more productive than the neighbouring Laconia. Hence Messenia is described by Pausanias as the most fertile country in Peloponnesus; and it is praised by Euripides on account of its climate, which was neither too cold in winter nor too hot in summer (Eur. ap. Strab. p. 366). The most ancient inhabitants of Messenia were Leleges, intermingled with Argives. According to tradition Polycaon, the younger son of Lelex, married the Argive Messene, a daughter of Triopas, and named the country Messene in honour of his wife. This is the name by which it is called in Homer, who does not use the form Messenia. Five generations afterwards Aeolians settled in the country, under the guidance of Perieres, a son of Aeolus. His son Aphaeus gave a home to Neleus, who had been driven out of Thessaly, and who founded the town of Pylos, which became the capital of an independent sovereignty. For a long time there was properly no Messenian kingdom. The western part of the land belonged to the dominions of the Neleid princes of Pylos, of whom Nestor was the most celebrated, and the eastern to the Lacedaemonian monarchy. Thus it appears to have remained till the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, when Messenia fell to the share of Cresphontes, who destroyed the kingdom of Pylos, and united the whole country under his sway. The ruling class were Iow Dorians, and they continued to speak the purest Doric down to the latest times. The Spartans soon coveted the more fertile territory of their brother Dorians; and after many disputes between the two nations, and various inroads into each other's territories, open war at length broke out. This war, called the first Messenian war, lasted twenty years, B.C. 743-723; and notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the Messenian king, Aristodemus, the Messenians were obliged to submit to the Spartans after the capture of their fortress Ithome, and to become their subjects. [ARISTODEMUS.] After bearing the yoke thirty-eight years, the Messenians again took up arms under their heroic leader Aristomenes. [ARISTOMENES.] The second Messenian war lasted seventeen years, B.C. 685-668, and terminated with the conquest of Ira and the complete subjugation of the country. Most of the Messenians emigrated to foreign countries, and those who remained behind were reduced to the condition of Helots or serfs. In this state they remained till 464, when the Messenians and other Helots took advantage of the devastation occasioned by the great earthquake at Sparta to rise against their oppressors. This third Messenian war lasted ten years, 464-455, and ended by the Messenians surrendering Ithome to the Spartans on condition of their being allowed a free departure from Peloponnesus. They settled at Naupactus on the Corinthian gulf opposite Peloponnesus, which town the Athenians had lately taken from the Locri Ozolae, and gladly granted to such deadly enemies of Sparta. At the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war (404) the unfortunate Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus and take refuge in Italy, Sicily, and other countries; but when the supremacy of Sparta was overthrown by the battle of Leuctra, Epaminondas resolved to restore the independence of Messenia. He accordingly gathered together the Messenian exiles from the various lands in which they were scattered; and in the summer of 369 he founded the town of Messene at the foot of Mt. Ithome. [MESSENE.] Messenia was never again subdued by the Spartans, and it maintained its independence till the conquest of Greece by the Romans, 146, when it formed part of the province of ACHAIA.

Mestlêta or Mestchetha (Mitzkhetl) a city of Iberia, in Asia, on the river Cyrus.

Mestra (Μήστρα), daughter of Erysichthon, and granddaughter of Triopas, whence she is called Triopeis by Ovid. She was sold by her hungry father, that he might obtain the means of satisfying his hunger. In order to escape from slavery, she prayed to Poseidon, who loved her, and who conferred upon her the power of metamorphosing herself whenever she was sold. According to one tradition she became afterwards the wife of Antolycus (Ov. Met. viii. 738-878; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1393; Ant. Lib. 17, where the name is Hypermetra; cf. ERYSICHTHON).

Messogis [LYDIA, p. 507, b].

Metagonitis (Μεταγωνίτις: Μεταγωνίται, Metagonitai), a name applied to the N. coast of Mauretania Tingitana (Marocco), between the Fretum Gaditanum and the river Mulucha; derived probably from the Carthaginian colonies (μεταγώνια) settled along it (Ptol. iv. 2, 10; Pol. iii. 33). There was on this coast a promontory called Metagonium, the modern Ras-el-Harsbah (Strab. p. 827; Mel. i. 7, 1).

Metallinum or Metellinum (Metallinensis: Medellin), a Roman colony in Lusitania on the Anas, near Augusta Emerita (Plin. iv. 17).

Mêtânira (Μετάνειρα), wife of Celeus, and mother of Triptolemus, received Demeter on her arrival in Attica. Pausanias called her Meganaera. (Hymn. in Cer. 161; Apollod. i. 5, 1; Paus. i. 39, 1). For details see CELEUS.

Mêtaphrastes, Symëon (Συμεών ὁ Μεταφράστης), a Byzantine writer, lived in the ninth and tenth centuries, and held high offices at the Byzantine court. His surname Metaphrastes was given to him on account of his having composed a paraphrase of the Lives of the Saints. He wrote a Byzantine history, entitled Annales, beginning with the emperor Leo Armenus, A.D. 813, and finishing with Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 963. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

Metapontum, the Roman name for the Greek Metapontium (Μεταπόντιον: Μεταπόντιος, Metapontinus: Torre di Mare), a celebrated Greek city in the S. of Italy, on the Tarentine gulf, and on the E. coast of Lucania, is said to have been originally called Metabum (Μέταβον). It was an Achaean colony, under the command of a leader named Leucippus, but probably occupied the site of an older city (which would account for traditions of its early settlement by Pylians of the time of Nestor or by Phocians) which had been destroyed before the Achaeans of Sybaris and Crotona founded a new city there about 700 B.C. (Strab. pp. 222, 264; Diod. iv. 67.) Pythagoras transferred his school to Metapontum and died there. In 415 they allied themselves to the Athenians. (Thuc. vi. 44, vii. 33.) Its fertility was so great that the people of Metapontum dedicated a golden harvest at Delphi (Strab. p. 264). It fell into the hands of the Romans with the other Greek cities in the S. of Italy in the war against Pyrrhus; but it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae (Liv. xxii. 61). From the time of the second Punic war it disappears from history, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias (vi. 19, 11).

Mëtaurus. 1. (Metaro), a small river in Umbria, flowing into the Adriatic sea, but rendered memorable by the defeat and death of Hasdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, on its banks, B.C. 207. It rises in the group of Apennines called Monte Nerone, and flows forty-five miles into the sea, two miles S. of Fano. (Strab. p. 227; Sil. It. viii. 449; Hor. Od. iv. 4, 387).—2. (Marro), a river on the E. coast of Bruttium, at whose mouth was the town of Metaurum.

Metella, Caecilia. 1. Daughter of Met. Maccdonicus [No. 3], married Scipio Nasica (consul 111 B.C.). Her grandson was Metellus Scipio [No. 15] (Cic. Brut. 58, 212).—2. Daughter of Met. Balearicus [No. 5], married App. Claud. Puleher, and was mother of P. Clodius, Cicero's enemy [CLAUDIUS, No. 21].—3. Daughter of Met. Calvus [No. 4] and mother of Lucullus (Plut.

Tomb of Caecilia Metella, on the Appian Way. (See Metella, No. 6.)

Lucull. 1).—4. Daughter of Met. Dabuatius [No. 9], married first to Scaurus, secondly to Sulla, who avenged upon Athens an affront offered to her by the Athenians (Plut. Sull. 6, 18, 22, 35; Cic. Scaur. 45).—5. Daughter (probably) of Met. Nepos [No. 14], wife of P. Lentulus Spinther, the younger, from whom she was divorced in 45 (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 339; Cic. ad Att. xi. 15, 23. xii. 52, xiii. 7).—6. Daughter of Met. Creticus [No. 16], and wife of Crassus, the son of the triumvir, to whose memory the magnificent tomb on the Appian Way was raised.

Metellus, a distinguished plebeian family of the Caecilia gens at Rome. 1. L. Caecilius Metellus, consul B.C. 251, carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians. In the following year he gained a great victory at Panormus over Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The elephants which he took in this battle were exhibited in his triumph at Rome. (Pol. i. 39, 40; Plin. vii. 139). Metellus was consul a second time in 249, and was elected pontifex maximus in 248, and held this dignity for twenty-two years. He must therefore have died shortly before the beginning of the second Punic war. In 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence. (Ov. Fast. vi. 436; Dionys. ii. 66; Val. Max. i. 4, 4). He was dictator in 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia.—2. Q. Caecilius Metellus, son of the preceding, was plebeian aedile 209; curule aedile 208; served in the army of the consul Claudius Nero 207, and was one of the legates sent to Rome to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal; and was consul, with L. Veturius Philo, 206. In his consulship he and his colleague carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium, where he remained as proconsul during the following year. In 205 he was dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia. Metellus survived the second Punic war many years, and was employed in several public commissions. (Liv. xxviii. 9, xxxix. 24; Cic. Brut. 14, 57; Val. Max. vii. 2, 3).—3. Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, son of the last, was praetor 148, and carried on war in Macedonia against the usurper Andiscus, whom he defeated and took prisoner. He next turned his arms against the Achaeans, whom he defeated at the beginning of 146. On his return to Rome in 146 he triumphed, and received the surname of Macedonicus. Metellus was consul in 143, and received the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on the war with success for two years against the Celtiberi. He was succeeded by Q. Pompeius in 141. Metellus was censor 131. He died 115, full of years and honours. He is frequently quoted by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of human felicity. He had filled all the highest offices of the state with reputation and glory, and was carried to the funeral pile by four sons, three of whom had obtained the consulship in his lifetime, while the fourth was a candidate for the office at the time of his father's death. (Liv. Ep. 49, 50, 52, 53, 59; Vell. Pat. i. 11; Cic. Fin. v. 27, 82; Paus. vii. 13, 15).—4. L. Caecilius Metellus Calvus, brother of the last, consul 142 (Cic. ad Att. xii. 5; Val. Max. viii. 5).—5. Q. Caecilius Metellus Balearicus, eldest son of No. 3, was consul 123, when he subdued the inhabitants of the Balearic islands, and received in consequence the surname of Balearicus. He was censor 120. (Liv. Ep. 60; Diod. v. 17; Strab. p. 167).—6. L. Caecilius Metellus Diadematus, second son of No. 3, has been frequently confounded with Metellus Dalmaticus, consul 119 [No. 9]. Metellus Diadematus received the latter surname from his wearing for a long time a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. (Cic. post Red. ad Quirit. 3, 6; Plut. Cor. 11.) He was consul 117.—7. M. Caecilius Metellus, third son of No. 3, was consul 115, the year in which his father died. In 114 he was sent into Sardinia as proconsul, and suppressed an insurrection in the island, in consequence of which he obtained a triumph in 113, on the same day as his brother Caprarius. (Eutrop. iv. 25).—8. C. Caecilius Metellus Caprarius, fourth son of No. 3. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He was consul 113, and carried on war in Macedonia against the Thracians, whom he subdued. He obtained a triumph in consequence in the same year, and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor 102 with his cousin Metellus Numidicus. (Vell. Pat. ii. 8; Tac. Germ. 37).—9. L. Caecilius Metellus Dalmaticus, elder son of No. 4, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematus [No. 5], was consul 119, when he subdued the Dalmatians, and obtained in consequence the surname Dalmaticus. With the booty obtained in this war he repaired the temple of Castor and Pollux. He was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus in 115, and he was also pontifex maximus. (Cic. Clu. 42, 119.) He was alive in 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank who took up arms against Saturninus (Liv. Ep. 62; Appian, Illyr. 11; Plut. Pomp. 2).—10. Q. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus, younger son of No. 4, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratic party at Rome. He was consul 109, and carried on the war against Jugurtha in Numidia with great success. [JUGURTHA.] He remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul; but, as he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate, C. Marius, industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumours had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honour of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. [MARIUS.] On his return to Rome in 107 he was received with the greatest honour. He celebrated a splendid triumph, and received the surname of Numidicus. In 102 he was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. In 100 the tribune Saturninus and Marius resolved to ruin Metellus. Saturninus proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause that the senate should swear obedience to it within five days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled the senate and pay a heavy fine. Metellus refused to take the oath and was therefore expelled the senate; but Saturninus, not content with this, brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms in his defence; but Metellus quitted the city and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his misfortune with great calmness. He was, however, recalled to Rome in the following year (99), on the proposition of the tribune Q. Calpurnius. The orations of Metellus are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and they continued to be read with admiration in the time of Fronto. (Sall.

Jug. 43-88; Plut. Marius; Flor. iii. 16; Liv. Ep. 65, 69; App. B. C. i. 28-33; Cic. pro Balb. 5, 11.—11. Q. Caecilius Metellus Nepes, son of Balearicus [No. 5], and grandson of Macedonicus [No. 3], appears to have received the surname of Nepos because he was the eldest grandson of the latter. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in 99, and was consul in 98 with T. Didius. In this year the two consuls carried the Lex Caecilia Didia. (Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, ad Att. ii. 9.)—12. Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius, son of Numidicus [No. 10], received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment in 99. He was praetor 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marsic or Social war. He was still in arms in 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; but as he was unable to defend the city against Marius and Cinna he crossed over to Africa. After remaining in Africa three years he returned to Italy and joined Sulla, who also returned to Italy in 83. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals, and gained several important victories both in Umbria and in Cisalpine Gaul. In 80 Metellus was consul with Sulla himself, and in the following year (79) he went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next eight years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius that the senate sent Pompey to his assistance with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in 72. [SERTORIUS.] Metellus was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by Julius Caesar in 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding. (Sall. Jug. 64; Plut. Mar. 42, Sertor. 12-27; Vell. Pat. ii. 15, 28-30.)—13. Q. Caecilius Metellus Celer, elder son of Nepos [No. 11]. In 66 he served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia; and was praetor in 63, the year in which Cicero was consul (Cic. Sull. 23, 65). During his year of office he afforded warm and efficient support to the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Senonian districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. In 60, Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, and opposed all the efforts of his colleague to obtain the ratification of Pompey's acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers. He died in 59, and it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms, and who was a woman of the utmost profligacy. (Sall. Cat. 57; Dio Cass. xxxvii., xxxviii.; cf. Index to Cicero.)—14. Q. Caecilius Metellus Nepos, younger son of the elder Nepos [No. 11]. He served as legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates and in Asia from 67 to 64. He returned to Rome in 63 in order to become a candidate for the tribunate, that he might thereby favour the views of Pompey. His election was opposed by the aristocracy, but without success. His year of office was a stormy one. One of his first acts in entering upon his office on the 10th of December, 63, was a violent attack upon Cicero. He maintained that the man who had condemned Roman citizens without a hearing ought not to be heard himself, and accordingly prevented Cicero from addressing the people on the last day of his consulship, and only allowed him to take the usual oath, whereupon Cicero swore that he had saved the state. In the following year (62) Metellus brought forward a bill to summon Pompey, with his army, to Rome, in order to restore peace; but on the day on which the bill was to be read the two parties came to open blows, and Metellus was obliged to take to flight. He repaired to Pompey, with whom he returned to Rome in 61. He was praetor in 60, and consul in 57 with P. Leutulus Spithæus. Notwithstanding his previous enmity with Cicero, he did not oppose his recall from exile. In 56 Metellus administered the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on war against the Yaccæi. He died in 55. Metellus did not adhere strictly to the political principles of his family. He did not support the aristocracy, like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a leader of the democracy. He was, in fact, little more than a servant of Pompey, and, according to his bidding, at one time opposed and at another supported Cicero. [See Index to Cicero; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 38-51, xxxix. 1-7, 54.]—15. Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius Scipio, the adopted son of Metellus Pius [No. 12]. He was the son of P. Scipio Nasica, praetor 94, and grandson of Caecilia Metella, daughter of Macedonicus [No. 3]. Hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio, and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. (Cic. Brut. 58, 212; Dio Cass. xl. 51.) He was tribune of the plebs in 59, and was a candidate for the consulship along with Plautius Hypsæus and Milo in 53. He was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed to Milo; but in consequence of the disturbances in the city the comitia could not be held for the election of consuls. After the murder of Clodius at the beginning of 52 Pompey was elected sole consul. In the course of the same year Pompey married Coruella, the daughter of Scipio, and on the 1st of August he made his father-in-law his colleague in the consulship. Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Caesar and strengthen that of Pompey. He took an active part in all the proceedings which led to the breaking out of the Civil war in 49; and in the division of the provinces made among the Pompeian party he obtained Syria, to which he hastened without delay. After plundering the province in the most unmerciful manner, he crossed over into Greece in 48 to join Pompey. He commanded the centre of the Pompeian army at the battle of Pharsalia. After the loss of the battle he fled, first to Corcyra and then to Africa, where he received the chief command of the Pompeian troops. He was defeated by Caesar at the decisive battle of Thapsus in 46. He attempted to escape by sea, but his squadron having been overpowered by P. Sittius, he put an end to his own life. Metellus Scipio never exhibited any proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace. In public he showed himself cruel, vindictive, and oppressive; in private he was mean, avaricious, and licentious, even beyond most of his contemporaries. (Plut. Pomp. 55, Caes. 30, Cic. 15; App. B. C. ii. 60-100; Caes. B. C. i. 1-4, iii. 31, Bell. Afric. 79.)—16. Q. Caecilius Metellus Creticus, was consul 69, and carried on war against Crete, which he subdued in the course of three years. He returned to Rome in 66, but was unable to obtain a triumph, in consequence of the opposition of Pompey, to whom he had refused to surrender his command in Crete, which Pompey had claimed in virtue of the Gabinian law, which had given him the supreme command in the whole of the Mediterranean. Metellus, however, could not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly resolved to wait in the neighbourhood of the city till more favourable circumstances. He was still before the city in 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the slaves; and in the following year, 62, after the death of Catiline, he was at length permitted to make his triumphal entrance into Rome, and received the surname of Creticus. Metellus, as was to be expected, joined the aristocracy in their opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in preventing the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia. (Liv. Ep. 98-100; Flor. iii. 7, iv. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 34; Dio Cass. xxxvi. 1; Sall. Cat. 30.)—17. L. Caecilius Metellus, brother of the last, was praetor 71, and as proprætor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in 70. He defeated the pirates, and compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero; but he nevertheless attempted, in conjunction with his brothers, to shield Verres from justice. He was consul 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died at the beginning of the year. (Cic. Verr. iii. 53, 122, v. 21, 55; Dio Cass. xxxv. 4.)—18. M. Caecilius Metellus, brother of the two last, was praetor 69, in the same year that his eldest brother was consul. The lot gave him the presidency in the court de pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was very anxious that his trial should come on before Metellus. (Cic. Verr. i. 8, 9.)—19. L. Caecilius Metellus Creticus, was tribune of the plebs, 49, and a warm supporter of the aristocracy. He did not fly from Rome with Pompey and the rest of his party; and he attempted to prevent Caesar from taking possession of the sacred treasury, and only gave way upon being threatened with death. (Plut. Caes. 35, Pomp. 62; Caes. B. C. i. 33; Dio Cass. xli. 17; App. B. C. ii. 41; Lucan, iii. 114.)

Methana. [METHONE, No. 4.]

Methonē (Μεθώνη: Μεθωναίος). 1. Or Mothone (Μοθώνη: Μοθονι), a town at the SW. corner of Messenia, with an excellent harbour, protected from the sea by a reef of rocks, of which the largest was called Mothon. The ancients regarded Methone as the Pegasus of Homer (Il. ix. 294). After the conquest of Mes-senia, it became one of the Lacedaemonian harbours, and is mentioned as such in the Peloponnesian war. The emperor Trajan made it a free city. (Strab. p. 359; Paus. iv. 35.)—2. (Eleutherokhorōi), a Greek town in Macedonia on the Thermaic gulf, forty stadia NE. of Pydna, was founded by the Eretrians, and is celebrated from Philip having lost an eye at the siege of the place. After its capture by Philip it was destroyed, but was subsequently rebuilt, and is mentioned by Strabo as one of the towns of Macedonia. (Thuc. iv. 129, vi. 7; Strab. p. 330; Diod. xvi. 31.)—3. A town in Thessaly mentioned by Homer, which does not occur in historical times (Il. ii. 716). The ancients placed it in Magnesia.—4. Or Methana (Μέθανα: Methana or Mitone), an ancient town in Argolis, situated on a peninsula of the same name, opposite the island of Aegina. The peninsula runs a considerable way into the sea, and is connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, lying between Troezen and Epidaurus. The town lay at the foot of a mountain of volcanic origin. (The name appears as Μεθώνη in Thuc. iv. 45; but, according to Strabo, not in all MSS. In Strab. p. 374, and Paus. ii. 34, it is Μέθανα.)

Méthora (Μέθορα, Μόδουρα ή τῶν Θεῶν: Matra, the sacred city of Krishna), a city of India in the Ganges, on the river Jonanes (Jumna), was a great seat of the worship of the Indian god whom the Greeks identified with Heracles (Arrian, Ind. 8; Plin. vi. 69).

Methydrium, (Μεθύδριον: Μεθυδριεύς), a town in central Arcadia, 170 stadia N. of Megalopolis (Paus. viii. 35, 36; Thuc. v. 58).

Methymna (ή Μήθυμνα, Μέθυμνα, the former generally in the best writers; also on coins the Aeolic form Μάθυμνα: Μηθυμναίος, Μεθυμναίος: Molivo), the second city of LESBOS, stood at the north extremity of the island, and had a good harbour. It was the birthplace of the musician and dithyrambic poet Arion, and of the historian Coin of Methymna (4th cent. B.C.).

Obv., head of Athene; rev., ΜΑΘΥΜΝΑΙΩΝ; lyre inclosed in a square.

Hellanicus. The celebrated Lesbian wine came from its neighbourhood. In the Peloponnesian war it remained faithful to Athens, even during the great Lesbian revolt [MYTILENE]; afterwards it was sacked by the Spartans (B.C. 406) and never quite recovered its prosperity, though in the time of Diocletian it was reckoned among the chief towns of the Insularum Provincia. (Hdt. i. 151; Thuc. iii. 2, 18; Liv. xlv. 31; Hierocl. p. 686.)

Métion (Μητίων), son of Erechtheus and Praxithea, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionidae, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterwards expelled by the sons of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 15; Paus. i. 5, 3.)

Mētis (Μήτις), the personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the first wife of Zeus. Afraid lest she should give birth to a child wiser and more powerful than himself, Zeus devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Afterwards he gave birth to Atheno, who sprang from his head. [See p. 138, a.]

Mētius. [METTIUS.]

Mēton (Μέτων), an astronomer of Athens, who, in conjunction with Euctemon, introduced the cycle of nineteen years, by which he adjusted the course of the sun and moon, since he had observed that 235 lunar months correspond very nearly to nineteen solar years. The beginning of this cycle has been placed B.C. 432. [See further in Dict. of Ant. art. Calendarium.] We have no details of Meton's life, with the exception that his father's name was Pausanias, and that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment. (Ael. V. H. x. 7; Diod. xii. 36.)

Metrodōrus (Μητροδώρος). 1. Of Cos, son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyrsus. Like several of that family, he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus. He lived about B.C. 460. (Iambl. Vit. Pyth. 34.)—2. Of Lampsacus, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died 464. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 11.)—3. Of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios, lived about 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrines of the Sceptics in their fullest sense. He also studied, if he did not practise, medicine, on which he wrote much. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 58; Cic. Acad. ii. 23, 73.)—4. A native of Lampsacus or Athens, was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship. He died 277, in the fifty-third year of his age, seven years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body. He found fault with his brother Timocrates for not admitting that the appetite was the test and measure of everything that pertained to a happy life. He was the author of several works, quoted by the ancient writers. (Cic. Tusc. v. 37, 109, N. D. i. 40, 113, Fin. ii. 28, 92; Diog. Laërt. x. 22.)—5. Of Scepsis, a philosopher, who was raised to a position of great influence and trust by Mithridates Eupator, being appointed supreme judge without appeal even to the king. Subsequently he was led to desert his allegiance, when sent by Mithridates on an embassy to Tigranes, king of Armenia. Tigranes sent him back to Mithridates, but he died on the road. According to some accounts he was despatched by order of the king; according to others he died of disease. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have been particularly celebrated for his powers of memory. In consequence of his hostility to the Romans he was surnamed the Roman-hater. (Cic. de Or. ii. 88, 360; Strab. p. 609.)—6. Of Stratonice in Caria, was at first a disciple of the school of Epicurus, but afterwards attached himself to Carneades. He lived about 110. (Diog. Laërt. x. 9; Cic. Acad. ii. 6, 16.)

Mōtrōpōlis (Μητρόπολις). 1. The ancient capital of Phrygia, but in historical times an inconspicuous place. (Strab. pp. 576, 663; Athen. p. 574; Liv. xxxviii. 15.) It stood between Celaenae and Synnada and in the great road from Ephesus to the Cappadocian Caesarea. Its site is, according to Ramsay, half-way between the modern towns Tatarlı and Haiderlı.—2. In Lydia (Turbalı, Ru.), a city in the plain of the Cayster, between Ephesus and Smyrna, 120 stadia from the former and 200 from the latter (Strab. p. 632).—3. (Kastri), a town of Thessaly in Histiacotis, near the Peneus, and between Gomphi and Pharsalus, formed by the union of several small towns, to which Ithome also belonged (Strab. p. 438; Caes. B. C. iii. 81).—4. Another town of Thessaly, near Gyrtion (Liv. xxxvi. 10).—5. A town of Acarnania in the district Amphiloehia, between the Ambracian gulf and the river Achelous (Pol. iv. 64).

Mettius or Metius. 1. Curtius. [CURTIUS.]

—2. Fuffetius, dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fideneae and the Veientes. On the field of battle Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. On the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punishment of his treachery, was torn asunder by chariots driven in opposite directions. (Liv. i. 23-28; Dionys. iii. 5-30.)

Metūlum, the chief town of the Iapydes in Illyricum, was near the frontiers of Liburnia, and was situated on two peaks of a steep mountain. Augustus nearly lost his life in reducing this place, the inhabitants of which fought against him with the most desperate courage. (Strab. p. 207; Dio Cass. xlix. 35.)

Mevānia (Mevānas, -ātis: Beragna), an ancient city in the interior of Umbria on the river Tinea, was situated on the road from Rome to Ancona in a very fertile country, and was celebrated for its breed of beautiful white oxen. It was a strongly fortified place, though its walls were built only of brick. (Liv. ix. 41; Tac. Hist. iii. 55; Verg. Georg. ii. 146; Lucan, i. 473; Strab. p. 227; Plin. xxxv. 173.)

Mezentius (Μεζέντιος), king of the Tyrrhenians or Etruscans, at Caere or Agylla, was expelled by his subjects on account of his cruelty, and took refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutulians, whom he assisted in the war against Aeneas and the Trojans. Mezentius and his son Lausus were slain in battle by Aeneas. This is the account of Virgil (Verg. Aen. viii. 480, x. 639, 785, 800). Livy and Dionysius, however, say nothing about the expulsion of Mezentius from Caere, but represent him as an ally of Turnus, and relate that Aeneas disappeared during the battle against the Rutulians and Etruscans at Lannivium. Dionysius adds that Ascanius was besieged by Mezentius and Lausus; that he besieged in a sally by night slew Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who from henceforth continued to be their ally. (Liv. i. 2; Dionys. i. 64.) Another tradition states that Mezentius demanded from the Latins the produce of their vineyards, but they vowed the firstfruits to Jupiter and so won the victory (Plut. Q. R. 45; Ov. Fast. iv. 881; Macrob. iii. 5; see p. 464, b).

Micipsa (Μικίψας), king of Numidia, the eldest of the sons of Masinissa. After the death of the latter (B.C. 148) the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipsa and his two brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a manner that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipsa. It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. His rule was mild and equitable, and he encouraged literature and art. (Diod. xxxv. Sall. Jug. 5-11; Flor. iii. 2; Strab. p. 832.) He died in 118, leaving the kingdom to his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, and their adopted brother JUGURTHA.

Micon (Μίκων), of Athens, son of Phanochus, was a very distinguished painter and also a sculptor, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B.C. 460. Several of his pictures are mentioned by Pausanias as in the Stoa Poecile and the Temple of Theseus (i. 17, 18), and by Pliny (xxxv. 59). Among his statues Pausanias mentions Callias the pancratiast at Olympia (vi. 6, 1).

Midaëum (Μιδάειον), a city of Phrygia Epictetus, between Dorylaenm and Pessinus; the place where Sextus Pompeius was captured by the troops of Antony, B.C. 35 (Strab. p. 576; Dio Cass. xlix. 18).

Midas (Μίδας), son of Gordius and Cybele, is said to have been a wealthy but effeminate king of Phrygia, a pupil of Orpheus, and a promoter of the worship of Dionysus (Hdt. i. 14; Paus. i. 4, 5; Strab. p. 304). His wealth is alluded to in a story connected with his childhood, for it is said that while a child, ants carried grains of wheat into his mouth, to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals (Cic. Div. i. 96, 78; Ael. V.H. xii. 45). He is said to have built the town of Ancyra, and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov. Met. xi. 106). There are several stories connected with Midas, of which the following are the most celebrated. (1) Silenus, the companion and teacher of Dionysus, had gone astray in a state of intoxication, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound with wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterwards emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges. Midas received Silenus kindly; and, after treating him with hospitality, he led him back to Dionysus, who allowed Midas to ask a favour of him.

Midas in his folly desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold. The request was granted; but as even the food which he touched became gold, he implored the god to take his favour back. Dionysus accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Paeolus near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand. (Hyg. Fab. 191; Ov. Met. xi. 90; Verg. Ecl. vi. 13.)—(2) Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyrs, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes at the king's expense. Thereupon Midas mixed wine in a well; and when the Satyr had drunk of it, he fell asleep and was caught. (Paus. i. 4, 5; Athen. p. 45.) This well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2, § 13) places it in the neighbourhood of Thymbrium and Tyraenm, and Pausanias at Ancyra.—(3) Once when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Midas was chosen to decide between them. The king decided in favour of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man that, as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, 'King Midas has ass's ears.' He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was relieved. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret. (Hyg. Fab. 191; Ov. Met. xi. 146; Pers. i. 121; cf. Aristoph. Plut. 287.) Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox (Strab. p. 61).—The rock tomb of Midas, so called, is SW. of Pessinus between Orcistus and Conni, and is interesting as one of the earliest specimens of sculptured architecture, adorned with ornaments chiefly composed of squares.—It is probable that the stories of Midas grew out of his patronage of the worship of Dionysus as Sabazius. The musical contest, like that of MARSYAS, represents a rivalry between the flutes of the Phrygian orgies and the lyro of Apollo's worshippers; the story of the ass's ears may have arisen from Midas being shown in Satyric drama with pointed ears like a Satyr, by exaggeration compared to ass's ears, perhaps in allusion to the ass which appeared in processions, bearing Silenus.

Midēa or Midēā (Μίδεια, Μιδέα: Μιδεάτης), a town in Argolis, of uncertain site, destroyed by the Argives, is said to have been called Persepolis, because it had been fortified by Perseus.

Midianitae. [MADIANITAE.]

Midias (Μειδίας), an Athenian of wealth and influence, was a violent enemy of Demosthenes, the orator. In B.C. 354 Midias assaulted Demosthenes when he was discharging the duties of Choregus, during the celebration of the great Dionysia. Demosthenes brought an accusation against Midias; but the speech which he wrote for the occasion, and which is extant, was never delivered, since Demosthenes dropped the accusation, in consequence of his receiving the sum of thirty minae.

Mieza (Μίεζα: Μιεζεύς), a town of Macedonia in Emathia, S.W. of Pella, and not far from the frontiers of Thessaly (Ptol. iii. 13, 39).

Milānion (Μελανίων), husband of Atalanta. For details, see ATALANTA.

Milētōpōlis (Μιλητόπολις: Mihalich, or Hamamlî? Ru.), a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, at the confluence of the river Rhyn-dacus and Macesus, and somewhat E. of the lake which was named after it, Lacus Miletopolitis (Μιλητοπολιτίς λίμνη: Lake of Maniyas). This lake, also called Aphnitis, lies some miles W. of the larger lake of Artynia (Abullionte). (Strab. pp. 575, 681; Plin. v. 123, 142.)

Milētōpōlis. [BORYSTHENES.]

Milētus (Μίλητος), son of Apollo and Aria of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Asia, where he built the city of Miletus (Apollod. iii. 1, 2; Paus. vii. 2, 3). Ovid (Met. ix. 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Deïone, and hence Deïonides.

Milētus (Μίλητος, Dor. Μίλατος: Milēsius, and on inscriptions, Μελίσιος: Milēsius). 1. One of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, belonged territorially to Caria and politically to Ionia, being the S.-most of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. It is mentioned by Homer as a Carian city; and one of its early names, Lelegeis, is a sign that the Leleges also formed a part of its population. (Il. ii. 887; Hdt. i. 146; Strab. p. 664; Plin. v. 112.) Its first Greek colonists were said to have been Cretans who were expelled by Minos; the next were led to it by Neleus at the time of the so-called Ionic migration. Its name was probably transferred from the Cretan Miletus (No. 2), though traditionally taken from the leader of the colonists [see above]. It was in earlier times called Pityusa (Πιτυούσα), and Anactoria (Ἀνακτορία). The city stood upon the S. headland of the Sinus Latmicus, opposite to the mouth of the Maeander, and possessed four distinct harbours, protected by a group of islets, called Lado, Dromiscus, and Perne. The city wall enclosed two distinct towns, called the outer and inner; the latter, which was also called Old Miletus, stood upon an eminence overhanging the sea, and was of great strength. Its territory extended on both sides of the Maeander, as far apparently as the promontories of Mycale on the N. and Posidium on the S. It was rich in flocks; and the city was celebrated for its woollen fabrics, the Milesia vellera (Athen. pp. 23, 428, 691; Verg. Georg. iii. 306, iv. 335). At a very early period it became a great maritime state, extending its commerce throughout the Mediterranean, and even beyond the Pillars of Hercules, but more especially in the direction of the Euxine, along the shore of which the Milesians planted several important colonies, such as Cyzicus, Sinope, Abydos, Istropolis, Tomi, Olbia or Borysthenes, Apollonia, Odessus, and Panticapaeum. Naucratis in Egypt was also a colony of Miletus. It also occupies a high place in the early history of Greek literature as the birthplace of the philosophers Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, and of the historians Cadmus and Hecataeus. After the rise of the Lydian monarchy, Miletus, by its naval strength, resisted the attacks of Alyattes and Sadyattes for eleven years, but fell before Croesus, whose success may perhaps be ascribed to the intestine factions which for a long period weakened the city (Hdt. i. 17–20). With the rest of Ionia, it was conquered by Harpagus, the general of Cyrus, in B.C. 557 (Hdt. i. 141); and under the dominion of the Persians it still retained its prosperity till the great Ionian revolt, of which Miletus was the centre [ARISTAGORAS; HISTIAEUS], and after the suppression of which it was destroyed by the Persians (B.C. 494). (Hdt. vi. 6; Strab. p. 635.) After the battle of Mycale it recovered its liberty and eventually gained sufficient importance to offer (though in vain) resistance to Alexander the Great, which brought upon it a second ruin (Arrian, An. i. 18). Under the Roman empire it still appears as a place of some consequence, until its final destruction by the Turks. (Tac. Ann. iv. 63.)—Its ruins are difficult to discover, on account of the great change made in the coast and harbour by the river Maeander. [MAEANDER.] They are on the site of the village of Palatia, on the S. bank of the Mendereh.—2. Miletus in Crete, on the NE. coast, mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 647), but not standing in Strabo's time (Strab. p. 479).

Milichus (Μείλιχος), a small river in Achaia, which flows by the town of Patrae, and is said to have been originally called Amilichus (Ἀμείλιχος) on account of the human victims sacrificed on its banks to Artemis (Paus. vii. 19, 9).

Milo or Milon (Μίλων). 1. Of Crotona, son of Diotimus, an athlete, famous for his extraordinary bodily strength. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games, and as often at the Pythian; but having entered the lists at Olympia a seventh time, he was worsted by the superior agility of his adversary. By these successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even appointed to command the army which defeated the Sybarites, B.C. 511. Many stories are related by ancient writers of Milo's extraordinary feats of strength: such as his carrying a heifer of four years old on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, and afterwards eating the whole of it in a single day. The mode of his death is thus related: as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially split upon by woodcutters, and attempted to rend it further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was attacked and devoured by wolves. (Hdt. iii. 137; Diod. xii. 9; Paus. vi. 14; Athen. p. 412; Gell. xv. 16; Cic. de Sen. 10.)—2. A general in the service of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who sent him forward with a body of troops to garrison the citadel of Tarentum, previous to his own arrival in Italy. When Pyrrhus finally quitted that country and withdrew into Epirus, he still left Milo in charge of the citadel of Tarentum, together with his son Helenus. (Zonar. viii. 2; Just. xxv. 3.)—3. T. Annius Milo Papiniānus, was the son of C. Papius Celsus and Annia, and was adopted by his maternal grandfather, T. Annius Luscus. He was born at Lanuvium, of which place he was in B.C. 53 dictator or chief magistrate. Milo was a man of a daring and unscrupulous character; and as he was deeply in debt, he resolved to obtain a wealthy province. For this purpose he connected himself with the aristocracy. As tribune of the plebs, B.C. 57, he took an active part in obtaining Cicero's recall from exile, and from this time he carried on a fierce and memorable contest with P. Clodius. In 58 Milo was candidate for the consulship, and Clodius for the praetorship of the ensuing year. Milo supported the senate in opposition to the popular party, which favoured Pompey and Caesar, at present the joint rulers of the state; and since Pompey wished to become temporary dictator, for reasons at this time approved by Caesar, he hoped to make the affray on the Appian road a handle for getting rid of Milo. [POMPEIUS.] Each of the candidates kept a gang of gladiators, and there were frequent combats between the rival ruffians in the streets of Rome. At length, on the 20th of January, 52, Milo and Clodius met apparently by accident at Bovillae on the Appian road. An affray ensued between their followers, in which Clodius was slain. At Rome such tumults followed upon the burial of Clodius that Pompey was appointed, not indeed dictator, but sole consul to restore order to the state. Pompey immediately brought forward various laws in connexion with the late disturbances. As soon as these were passed Milo was formally accused. All Pompey's influence was directed against him; but Milo was not without hope, since the higher aristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the 4th of April, 52. He was impeached on three counts—de Vi, de Ambitu, or bribery, and de Sodalitiis or illegal interference with the freedom of elections. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed quaesitor by a special law of Pompey's, and all Rome and thousands of spectators from Italy thronged the forum and its avenues. But Milo's chances of acquittal were wholly marred by the virulence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the conductors of the defence. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and its encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated, and Milo was condemned. Had he even been acquitted on the first count, de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re-wrote and expanded the defence of Milo—the extant oration—and sent it to him at Marseilles. Milo remarked, 'I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavour of these Marseilles mullets.' Caesar refused to recall Milo from exile in 49, when he permitted many of the other exiles to return. In the following year (48) M. Caelius, the praetor, had, during Caesar's absence, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts, and needing desperate allies, invited Milo to Italy. At the head of a band of criminals and runaway slaves, Milo appeared in the S. of Italy, but was opposed by the praetor, Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii.—Milo, in 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Sallust, the historian, was scoundily scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her. (See Index to Cicero; Plutarch's Lives of Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar; Dio Cass. xxxix. 6–21; App. B. C. ii. 16–24, 48.)

Miltiādes (Μιλτιάδης). 1. Son of Cypselus, was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Pisistratus. The Doloncians, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Miltiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Pisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonesus, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampsacus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Croesus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honour, in which no Lampsacene was suffered to take part. (Hdt. vi. 34, 38, 103.)—2. Son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Pisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order to strengthen his position still more, he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. (Hdt. vi. 39.) He joined Darius Hystaspis on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube (Hdt. iv. 137). When the appointed time had expired, and Darius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Darius to his fate. Some time after the expedition of Darius an inroad of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired, the Doloncians brought him back. It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgian inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros, and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions; and it is probable that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Darius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus, when the Phocian fleet approached, after the subjugation of Ionia. Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son, Metiochus, fell into the hands of the Persians. At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. Miltiades by his arguments induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favour of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever memorable field of Marathon. [MARATHON.] After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavoured to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to entrust to him an armament of seventy ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg, while penetrating into a sacred enclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person, he was brought into court on a couch, his brother, Tisagoras, conducting his defence for him. He was condemned, but on the ground of his services to the state the penalty was commuted to a fine of 50 talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this, he was thrown into prison, where he died of his wound. The fine was paid by his son Cimon. (Hdt. vi. 132-136; Nep. Miltiades.)

Milvius Pons. [ROMA.]

Milyas (ἡ Μιλύς: Μιλύαι, Milyae), was originally the name of all Lycia (Hdt. i. 173); but it was afterwards applied to the high table-land in the N. of Lycia, between the Cadmus and the Taurus, and extending considerably into Pisidia. Its people seem to have been the descendants of the original inhabitants of Lycia (Hdt. vii. 77; Strab. pp. 570, 573, 667). After the defeat of Antiochus the Great, the Romans gave it to Eumenes, king of Pergamus (Liv. xxxviii. 39), eventually it became part of the province called Lycia-Pamphylia or Pamphylia.

Mimallōnes (Μιμάλλωνες), the Macedonian name of the Bacchantes, or, according to others, of Bacchic Amazons. Ovid (Ars Am. i. 541) uses the form Mimalionides.

Mimas (Μίμας), 1. A giant, said to have been killed by Ares, or by Zeus, with a flash of lightning. The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was supposed to rest upon his body. (Eur. Ion, 215; Hor. Od. iii. 4, 53; Sil. It. xii. 147; GIGANTES.)—2. Son of Amycus and Theano, companion of Aeneas (Verg. Aen. x. 702).—3. A mountain in the peninsula of Erythrae on the coast of Ionia, which terminates in the promontory Melaena. Its spurs run also S. and W. to the promontories of Coryceum and Argennum, but its name belongs to the N. part of the range. (Od. iii. 172; Thuc. viii. 34; Strab. pp. 613, 645; Ov. Met. ii. 222.)

Mimnermus (Μίμνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet, generally called a Colophonian, but properly a native of Smyrna, was descended from those Colophonians who reconquered Smyrna from the Aeolians. He flourished from about B.C. 634 to 600. (Strab. p. 643; Athen. pp. 470, 597.) He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living. Only a few fragments of Mimnermus have come down to us. They belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and are addressed to the flute-player of that name. The compositions of Mimnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike or national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for lamentation, but Mimnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic themes. A double motive for his strain of melancholy may be found in the condition of his country, at that time under Lydian dominion, and in his own disappointment in love. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the cares and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively dwelt upon by him, while love is held up as the only consolation that men possess. As an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor. Epist. ii. 2, 100.) The fragments are published separately by Bach, Lips. 1826.

Minaei (Μιναιοί), one of the chief peoples of Arabia, dwelt on the W. coast of Arabia Felix, and in the interior of the peninsula, and carried on a large trade in spices, incense, &c. (Strab. pp. 768, 776; Plin. xii. 54).

Minas Sabbatha (Μέγας Σαβάρθθ), a fort in Babylonia, built in the time of the later Roman empire, on the site of Seleucia, which the Romans had destroyed (Zos. iii. 23).

Mincius (Μίνκιος), a river in Gallia Transpadana, flows through the lake Benacus (Lago di Garda), and falls into the Po, a little below Mantua (Verg. Ecl. vii. 13, Georg. iii. 15, Aen. x. 286; Strab. p. 209; Liv. xxxii. 30).

Mindarus (Μίνδαρος), a Lacedaemonian, succeeded Astyocheus in the command of the Lacedaemonian fleet, B.C. 411. He was defeated and slain by the Athenians near Cyzicus in the following year. (Thuc. viii. 85, 104; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 16; cf. HIPPOCRATES, No. 5.)

Minerva, a Roman goddess, afterwards identified with Athene. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. [ATHENE.] Minerva was one of the great Roman divinities. Her name seems to be of the same root as memini, mentio, monco, comminiscor, μένος, &c.; and she is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventive power personified. Her name takes practically the same form in Etruscan, Menerfa or Menfra, but it would be difficult to reconcile a theory that the Romans borrowed both the name and the personality of the goddess from the Etruscans with the fact (as it appears) that Minerva was an ancient Italian deity worshipped from early times in Sabine and Latin communities, e.g. at Reate (Dionys. i. 14; Var. L.L. v. 74.) Accordingly, it is usually held that the worship of Minerva was established at Rome by the Latins and Sabines; and that Jupiter was the first, Juno the second, and Minerva the third in the number of the Capitoline divinities. Tarquin, the son of Demaratus, was believed to have united the three divinities in one common temple, and hence, when repasts were prepared for the gods, these three always went together. The Etruscans regarded her as a goddess of lightning, and this was the origin of her being said to wield the thunderbolts of her father, Jupiter. In the genuine Italian view she was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, and at her Roman festival she was particularly invoked by all who desired to distinguish themselves in any art or craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of teaching, medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, and the like. (Ov. Fast. iii. 809-834; August. C. D. vii. 16.) This character of the goddess may be perceived also from the proverbs 'to do a thing pingui Minerva,' i.e. to do a thing in an awkward or clumsy manner; and usus Minervam (docet), of a stupid person who presumed to set right an intelligent one (Cic. Ac. i. 5, 18). The same characteristic was supposed to lie at the root of the old custom of driving a nail (clavus annalis) on the Ides of September into that side of the temple of Jupiter on which stood the cella of Minerva: the purpose was to preserve a record of years, and Minerva was thus designated as goddess of memory (Liv. vii. 3). As the Greek influence was felt and a resemblance was traced between Minerva the maiden goddess of arts and the Greek Athene, the Romans began to regard her as also, like Athene, a goddess of war. Hence she was represented with a helmet, shield, and a coat of mail; and the booty made in war was frequently dedicated to her. (Liv. xlv. 33; Plin. vii. 97.) Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of musical instruments, especially wind instruments, as used in war, which were accordingly subjected to a sort of purification every year on the last day of the festival of Minerva (Ov. Fast. vi. 654; Varr. L. L. vi. 17). There is reason, however, to think that the goddess honoured in this tubilustrium was Nerio, associated with Mars. This festival lasted five days, from the 19th to the 23rd of March, and was called Quinquatrus, because it began on the fifth day after the Ides of the month. [Dict. of Ant. art. Quinquatrus.] Moreover, the schools, in honour of the goddess of learning, had a five days' holiday at the greater Quinquatrus in March, and at the end of the holidays the new boys brought their entrance fee, which was called Minerval. [Dict. of Ant. art. Ludus Litterarius.] The most ancient temple of Minerva at Rome was probably that on the Capitol; another existed on the Aventine; and she had a chapel at the foot of the Caelian hill, where she bore the name of Capta, a name which was borrowed from Euterii (cf. Ov. Fast. iii. 848), and can only signify 'The prisoner,' whatever its origin may be. As goddess of wisdom, and from a comparison with Ἀθηνᾶ Βουκάλια, Minerva was in later times regarded as watching over the Senate, and at Constantinople her statue stood before the Curia (Zos. v. 24). For the Greek myths and for representations in art, see ATHENE.

Minervae Castrum or Minervium (Castro), a hill on the coast of Calabria, where Aeneas is said to have landed (Strab. p. 281).

Minervae Promontorium (Punta della Campanella or della Minerva), a rocky promontory in Campania, running out a long way into the sea, six miles SE. of Surrentum, on whose summit was a temple of Minerva, which was said to have been built by Odysseus, and which was still standing in the time of Seneca. Here the Sirens are reported to have dwelt. The Greeks regarded it as the NW. boundary of Ocnotria. (Strab. p. 247; Plin. iii. 62.)

Minio (Mignone), a small river in Etruria, which rises near Satrium, and falls into the Tyrrhene sea between Graviscae and Centum Cellae (Verg. Aen. x. 185; Mel. ii. 4, 9).

Minius (Minho), a river in the NW. of Spain, rising in the Cantabrian mountains, also called Baenis, derived its name from the minium or vermilion carried down by its waters. (Strab. p. 153; Plin. iv. 112.)

Minōa (Μινώα). 1. A small island in the Saronic gulf, off the coast of Megaris, and opposite a promontory of the same name, was united to the mainland by a bridge, and formed, with the promontory, the harbour of Nisaea. [MEGARAE].—2. A town on the E. coast of Laconia, and on a promontory of the same name, NE. of Epidaurus Limeræ.—3. A town on the W. part of the N. coast of Crete, between the promontories Dracpanum and Psacum. (Ptol. iii. 17, 7).—4. A town on the E. part of the N. coast of Crete, belonging to the territory of Lyctus, and situated on the narrowest part of the island (Strab. p. 475; Ptol. iii. 17, 5).—5. A town in Sicily. See HERACLEA MINOIA.

Minos (Μίνως). 1. Son of Zeus and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthus, was the king and legislator of Crete, ruling especially at Cnossus, in friendly intercourse with Zeus. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne, and, according to Apollodorus, the brother of Sarpedon. (Il. xiii. 450; xiv. 322; Od. xi. 321, 567, xvii. 523, xix. 178; Hes. Th. 948; cf. Strab. p. 476.) Many other stories were added by later poets, or attached to his name from old local legends. He is described as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios, by whom he was the father of Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Androgeus, Acalles, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra. After the death of Asterius, king of Crete, who married Europa and adopted her children, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of which, he asserted that the gods always answered his prayers. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Poseidon, he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. (Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother, Sarpedon, and conquered.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Poseidon therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a passion for the animal. Daedalus enabled Pasiphaë to gratify her passion, and she became by the bull the mother of Minotaurus, a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with a bull's body and a human head. The monster was kept in the labyrinth at Cnossus, constructed by Daedalus. Daedalus fled from Crete to escape the wrath of Minos and took refuge in Sicily. Minos followed him to Sicily, and was there slain by Cocalus and his daughters. (Hdt. vii. 170; Diod. iv. 78; cf. Ar. Pol. ii. 10, 4; COCALUS).—In another story, Minos, in order to avenge the wrong done to his son Androgeus [ANDROGEUS] at Athens, made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians either every year or every nine years to send him as a tribute seven youths and seven maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. The monster was slain by Theseus. (Plut. Thes. 15-19; Diod. iv. 60; Paus. i. 17, 3; Ov. Ariadne, 104.)—Minos is further said to have divided Crete into three parts, and to have ruled nine years. The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos. He is said to have been instructed in the art of lawgiving by Zeus himself; and the Spartan Lycurgus was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Aegæan. In this connexion comes the story of his getting possession of Megara through the treachery of Scylla, daughter of king Nisus, who for love of Minos cut off the lock of her father's hair on which his power depended. [NISUS.]—The more philosophical historians accept the traditions of an ancient king Miuos of Crete, and regard him as a ruler of Crete considerably before the Dorian migration, and as the organiser of a powerful navy by means of which he put down piracy in the Aegæan, and extended his empire northwards along the coast of Greece and through the islands, from which he had driven out the Carians; and who even attempted to conquer Sicily (Thuc. i. 4, 8; Ar. Pol. ii. 10 = p. 1271, iv. 10 = p. 1329). It is not improbable that this account is mainly true, and that the legends of Cocalus conceal an old maritime invasion of Sicily by the Cretan king, and those of Nisus and of Androgeus a conquest which made Megara and Attica at one time tributary to Crete. Later writers, attempting to reconcile contradictions in the legends, altered the genealogy, and made a Minos I. son of Zeus and lawgiver, who married Itone, daughter of Lyctius, by whom he had a son Lycastus. Lycastus by Ida was father of Minos II., who married Pasiphaë, gathered a navy, and was connected with various legends mentioned above. (Diod. iv. 60; Apollod. ii. 1, 3.) Herodotus (vii. 169) recounts a tradition that Minos after his translation from the world visited the Cretans with famine and pestilence, because they had aided the Greeks against Troy.

Minōtaurus. [MINOS.]

Mintha (Μίνθη), a daughter of Coeytus, beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Demeter or Persephone into a plant called after her mintha, or mint. In the neighbourhood of Pylos there was a hill called Minthe, and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto, and a grove of Demeter. (Ov. Met. x. 729; Strab. p. 344.)

Minturnæ (Minturnensis: Trajetta), an important town in Latium, on the frontiers of Campania, was situated on the Appia Via, and on both banks of the Liris, and near the mouth of this river. It was an ancient town of the Ausones or Aurunci, but surrendered to the Romans of its own accord, and received a Roman colony B.C. 296. It was subsequently recolonised by Julius Caesar. (Liv. viii. 10, ix. 25, x. 21; Cic. ad Att. v. 1, xvi. 10.) In its neighbourhood was a grove sacred to the nymph Marica, and also extensive marshes (Paludes Minturnenses), formed by the overflowing of the river Liris, in which Marius was taken prisoner. [See p. 528, a.] The neighbourhood of Minturnæ produced good wine. There are the ruins of an amphitheatre and of an aqueduct at the modern Trajetta.

Minuciānus (Μινουκίανός). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (fl. A.D. 170), with whom he was at variance.—2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 260-263.) He was the author of several rhetorical works, and a portion of his Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ is extant, and is published in the ninth volume of Walz's Rhetores Graeci.

Minūcius Felix. [FELIX.]

Minūcius Rufus. 1. M., consul B.C. 221, when he carried on war against the Istrians. In 217 he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. The cautious policy of Fabius displeased Minucius; and accordingly, when Fabius was called away to Rome, Minucius disobeyed the positive commands of the dictator, and risked a battle with a portion of Hannibal's troops. He was fortunate enough to gain a victory; in consequence of which he became so popular at Rome, that a bill was passed, giving him equal military power with the dictator. The Roman army was now divided, and each portion encamped separately under its own general. Anxious for distinction, Minucius eagerly accepted a battle which was offered him by Hannibal, but was defeated, and his troops were only saved from total destruction by the timely arrival of Fabius, with all his forces. Thereupon Minucius generously acknowledged his error, gave up his separate command, and placed himself again under the authority of the dictator. He fell at the battle of Cannæ in the following year. (Liv. xxii. 8, 22-30; Pol. iii. 101; Plut. Fab. 4-11.)

—2. Q., plebeian aedile 201, praetor 200, and consul 127, when he carried on war against the Boii with success. In 189 he was one of the ten commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus the Great; and in 183 he was one of the three ambassadors sent into Gaul. (Liv. xxxii. 27, xxxvii. 55.)—3. M., praetor 197 (Liv. xxxii. 27, xxxiv. 53).—4. M., tribune of the plebs 121, brought forward a bill to repeal the laws of C. Gracchus (Flor. iii. 15). This Marcus Minucius and his brother Quintus are mentioned as arbiters between the inhabitants of Genua and the Viturii, in a very interesting inscription, which was discovered in the year 1506, about ten miles from the modern city of Genoa (C. I. L. i. 199).—5. Q., consul 110, obtained Macedonia as his province, carried on war with success against the barbarians in Thrace, and triumphed on his return to Rome.

He perpetuated the memory of his triumph by building the Porticus Minucia, near the Circus Flaminius. (Cic. Phil. ii. 34, 84.)—The Minucia Via, leading from Rome to Brundisium (Cic. Att. ix. 6; Hor. Ep. i. 18, 20), was made by Minucius Augurinus, consul B.C. 305.

Minucius Thermus. [THERMUS.]

Minyæe (Μινυαί), an ancient Greek race, who originally dwelt in Thessaly. Iolcos, in Thessaly, was one of their original seats. Their ancestral hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the N. of Boeotia, and there to have established the empire of the Minyæe, with the capital Orchomenos. [ORCHOMENOS.] When the Arnaeans were pressed southwards by the Thesprotians, they drove out the Minyæe from the south of Thessaly and from Boeotia. Some of the Minyæe colonised Lemnos and Imbros, some settled in Attica, and some in the valley of the Eurotas, where they seem to have been joined by some of their kinsmen who were in turn driven from Lemnos and Attica. They withstood the Dorians in Sparta for some time, but eventually migrated again, some to Triphylia in the west of Peloponnesus, and some to Melos and Thera. (Hdt. i. 146, iv. 145–148; Thuc. i. 12; Paus. ii. 29, iv. 27, vii. 9, ix. 36; Strab. p. 337.) The stories of the Argonauts (most of whom were traditionally sprung from this race), sailing to various lands, probably to some extent grew out of these migrations of the Minyæe. [See pp. 106, 107.]

Minyas (Μινύας), son of Chryses, and the ancestral hero of the races of the Minyæe. The accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenus or Eteocles, others of Poseidon, Aleus, Ares, Sisypus, or Halmus. He is further called the husband of Tritogenia, Clytadora, or Phanosyra. Orchomenus, Presbon, Athamas, Diocchondas, Eteoclymene, Periclymeue, Leucippe, Arsinoë, and Alcaithoë or Alcithoë, are mentioned as his children. His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 36, 38; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiv. 4, Pyth. iv. 69.) A daughter of Minyas was Minyôias (-âdis) or Minêis (-idis). (Ov. Met. iv. 32.)

Mirobriga. 1. A town of the Celtici in Lusitania, on the ocean (Ptol. ii. 5, 6).—2. A Roman municipium in the territory of the Turduli, in Hispania Baetica, on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta (Ptol. ii. 4, 13).

Misenum (Punta di Miseno), a promontory in Campania, S. of Cumæ, said to have derived its name from Misenus, the companion and trumpeter of Aeneas, who was drowned and buried here (Verg. Aen. vi. 163, 212; Propert. v. 18, 3). The bay formed by this promontory was converted by Augustus into an excellent harbour, and was made the principal station of the Roman fleet on the Tyrrhene sea. A town sprang up around the harbour, and here the admiral of the fleet usually resided. (Tac. Ann. iv. 5, xiv. 3, xv. 51, Hist. ii. 100; Suet. Aug. 49; Plin. Ep. vi. 16, 20). The inhabitants were called Misenates and Misenenses, but the name Misenates most frequently signifies the men of the fleet. The Roman nobles had previously built villas on the coast. Here was the villa of C. Marius, purchased by Lucullus, which afterwards passed into the hands of the emperor Tiberius, who died at this place. (Plut. Mar. 34; Tac. Ann. vi. 50; Suet. Tib. 72.)

Misitheus, the father-in-law of the emperor Gordian III, who married his daughter Sabinia Tranquillina in A.D. 241. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition against the Persians, whom he defeated; but in the course of this war he was cut off either by disease or by the treachery of his successor Philippus, 243 (Zos. i. 16).

Mithras (Μίθρας), the god of light and of the sun among the Persians (Strab. p. 732), whose worship was widely spread over Asia Minor, and took root in many Greek towns of Asia and the islands after the wars of Alexander. It was first introduced to the Romans through the wars of Pompey with the Cilician pirates (Plut. Pomp. 24). Its influence in Italy was continually increased by Roman legionaries returning from Eastern service during the first and second centuries of our era. The first shrine of Mithras in Italy of which record is preserved is that at Ostia dating from the reign of Antoninus Pius. In the time of Septim. Severus the worship of Mithras was added to the observances of the Domus Augusta (C. I. L. vi. 2271). Mithras was spoken of as Sol Invictus, a style which Aurelian, the son of a priestess of Mithras, sometimes adopted. Though Mithras was thus adopted as sun-god by the Romans towards the decline of paganism, his peculiar Oriental rites were retained. His sanctuary was a cave, real or artificial, explained as signifying that Mithras was born from a rock (Lyd. Mens. iii. 26); it is more likely that it symbolises the world of darkness against which the sun-god fights. A bull was sacrificed in these caves and the blood purified the worshippers (Dict. of Ant. art. Taurobolium), who passed through various grades of initiation as κόρακες, κρήφιοι, λέοντες and λέαναι (the lion seems to mean the sun), Ἡλιοδρομοι, and finally Patres or Ἄετοί. The initiated were regarded as purified from the earth by these rites and by the fastings and penances which they endured. The god is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and attire, and kneeling on a bull which is thrown on the ground, and whose throat he is cutting. Frequently (as in the complete relief from which the engraving is taken) the grotto in which the sacrifice is offered is shown.

Mithridates or Mithradates (Μιθριδάτης or Μιθραδάτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, probably connected with that of Mithras the god of light. I. I., king, or, more properly, satrap of Pontus, was son of Ariobarzanes I., and was succeeded by Ariobarzanes II., about B.C. 363. The kings of Pontus claimed to be lineally descended from one of the seven Persians who had conspired against the Magi, and who was subsequently established by Darius Hystaspis in the government of the countries bordering on the Euxine sea. (Xen. Cyr. viii. 8, 4; Diod. xv. 90, xix. 40; Pol. v. 43.)—2. II., king of Pontus (337–302), succeeded his father Ariobarzanes II., and was the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus. After the death of Alexander the Great, he was for a time subject to Antigonos; but during the war between the successors of Alexander, he succeeded in establishing his independence. He died at the age of 84. (Diod. xvi. 90, xx. 111; Appian, Mithr. 9, 112; Strab. p. 562.)—3. III., king of Pontus (302–266), son and successor of the preceding. He enlarged his paternal dominions by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III. (Diod. xx. 111.)—4. IV., king of Pontus (about 240–190), son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces I. (Pol. iv. 56, v. 43, 90.)—5. V., king of Pontus (about 156–120), surnamed Euergetes, son and successor of Pharnaces I. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made an alliance with the Romans, whom he said to have learnt the incredible number of twenty-two languages, and to have been able in the days of his greatest power to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect (Just. xxxvii. 2; Strab. p. 545; Plin. xxv. 5; Gell. xvii. 17). The first steps of his career were marked by blood. He is said to have murdered his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithridates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother (App. Mithr. 112; Memn. 30). In the early part of his reign he subdued the barbarian tribes between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia, and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus. He assisted Parisades, king of the Bosphorus, against the Sarmatians and Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to his kingdom. After the death of Parisades, the kingdom of Bosphorus itself was incorporated with his dominions. He was now in possession of such great power that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself. Many causes of disunion had already arisen between them, but Mithridates had hitherto submitted to the mandates of Rome. Even after expelling Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia, and Nicomedes from Bithynia in 90, he offered no resistance to the Romans when they restored these monarchs to their kingdom. But when Nicomedes, urged by the Roman legates, invaded the territories of Mithridates, the latter made preparations for immediate hostilities. His success was rapid and striking. In 88, he drove Ariobarzanes out of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes out of Bithynia, defeated the Roman generals who had supported the latter, made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, and at last of the Roman province of Asia. During the winter he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death, on the same day, all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, and 80,000 Romans and Italians are said to have perished in this fearful massacre. (App. Mithr. 22; Plut. Sull. 24; Cic. pro Flacc. 24; Liv. Ep. 78; Tac. Ann. iv. 14.) Meantime Sulla had received the command of the war against Mithridates, and crossed over into Greece in 87. Mithridates, however, had resolved not to await the Romans in Asia, but had already sent his general, Archelaus, into Greece, at the head of a powerful army. Atheus, Achaia, Boeotia and Laconia declared themselves his supporters. The war proved unfavourable to the king. Archelaus was twice defeated by Sulla with immense loss, near Chæronea and Orchomenos in Boeotia (86). About the same time Mithridates was himself defeated in Asia by Fimbria. [FIMBRIA.] These disasters led him to sue for peace, which Sulla was willing to grant, because he was anxious to return to Italy, which was entirely in the hands of his enemies. Mithridates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, to pay a sum of 3000 talents, and to surrender to the Romans a fleet of seventy ships. Thus ended the first Mithridatic war (84). (App. Mithr. 29–63; Plut. Sull. 11–25, Lucull. 4.)—Shortly afterwards Murena, who had been left in command of Asia by Sulla, invaded the dominions of Mithridates (83), under the flimsy pretext assisted in the third Punic war and in the war against Aristoniceus (131–129). He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants. (App. Mithr. 12, 56; Just. xxxviii. 5; Strab. p. 477.)—6. VI., king of Pontus (120–63), surnamed Eupator, also Dionysus, but more commonly the Great, was the son and successor of the preceding, and was only eleven years old at the period of his accession. We are told by Justiu that on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians, but that he succeeded in eluding their machinations, partly by a courage and address beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. For the same reasons he devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase. Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood, he not only had great skill in martial exercises and a frame inured to hardships, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory that he is that the king had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia. In the following year (82) Murena renewed his hostile incursions, but was defeated by Mithridates on the banks of the river Halys. But Murena received peremptory orders from Sulla to desist from hostilities, and peace was again restored. This is usually called the second Mithridatic war (App. Mithr. 64-67).—Mithridates, however, was well aware that the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities; and that the republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. No formal treaty was ever concluded between Mithridates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavoured to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. The death of Nicomedes III, king of Bithynia, at the beginning of 74, brought matters to a crisis. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province: but Mithridates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nysa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. He had employed the last few years in forming a powerful army, armed and disciplined in the Roman manner; and he now took the field with 120,000 foot soldiers, 16,000 horse, and a vast number of barbarian auxiliaries. This was the beginning of the third Mithridatic war. The two Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, were unable to oppose his first irruption. He traversed Bithynia without encountering any resistance; and when at length Cotta ventured to give him battle under the walls of Chalcedon, the consul was totally defeated both by sea and land. Mithridates then proceeded to lay siege to Cyzicus both by sea and land. Lucullus marched to the relief of the city, cut off the king's supplies, and eventually compelled him to raise the siege, early in 73. On his retreat Mithridates suffered great loss, and eventually took refuge in Pontus. Hither Lucullus followed him in the next year. The new army, which the king had collected, was entirely defeated by the Roman general; and Mithridates, despairing of opposing the further progress of Lucullus, took refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes, the king of Armenia. Tigranes at first showed no disposition to attempt the restoration of his father-in-law; but being offended at the haughty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithridates, the Armenian king not only refused this request, but determined to prepare for war with the Romans. Accordingly, in 69, Lucullus marched into Armenia, defeated Tigranes and Mithridates near Tigranocerta, and in the next year (68) again defeated the allied monarchs near Artaxata. The Roman general then turned aside into Mesopotamia, and laid siege to Nisibis. Here the Roman soldiers broke out into open mutiny, and demanded to be led home; and Lucullus was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Asia Minor. Meanwhile Mithridates had taken advantage of the absence of Lucullus to invade Pontus at the head of a large army. He defeated Fabius and Triarius, to whom the defence of Pontus had been committed; and when Lucullus returned to Pontus, he was unable to resume the offensive in consequence of the mutinous spirit of his own soldiers. Mithridates was thus able before the close of 67 to regain possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. (App. Mithr. 69-90; Plut. Lucull. 7-35; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 3.) In the following year (66) the conduct of the war was entrusted to Pompey. Hostilities were resumed with greater vigour than ever. Mithridates was obliged to retire before the Romans, but was surprised and defeated by Pompey; and as Tigranes now refused to admit him into his dominions, he resolved to plunge with his small army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Maeotis and the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared, it was successfully accomplished; and he at length established himself without opposition at Panticapaeum, the capital of Bosphorus. He had now nothing to fear from the pursuit of Pompey, who turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterwards against Syria. Unable to obtain peace from Pompey, unless he would come in person to make his submission, Mithridates conceived the daring project of marching round the N. and W. coasts of the Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getae, and having gathered round his standard all these barbarian nations, to penetrate into Italy itself. But meanwhile disaffection had made rapid progress among his followers. His son Pharnaces at length openly rebelled against him. He was joined both by the whole army and the citizens of Panticapaeum, who unanimously proclaimed him king; and Mithridates, who had taken refuge in a straggling tower, saw that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, which he constantly carried with him; but his constitution had been so long inured to antidotes, that it did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of his Gaulish mercenaries to despatch him with his sword. He died in 63. His body was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey at Amisus, as a token of his submission; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honours in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. He was 68 or 69 years old at the time of his death, and had reigned fifty-seven years, of which twenty-five had been occupied, with only a few brief intervals, in one continued struggle against the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the strongest testimony to his great abilities: Cicero calls him the greatest of all kings after Alexander, and in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other monarch whom the Roman arms had yet encountered. (App. Mithr. 97-111; Dio Cass. xxvii. 3-13; Plut. Pomp. 32-41; Cic. pro Muren. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 18.)—7. Kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, 6, 9, 13.]—8. Of Pergamum, son of Menodotus; but his mother having had an amour with Mithridates the Great, he was generally looked upon as in reality the son of that monarch. The king himself bestowed great care on his education; and he appears as early as 64 to have exercised the chief control over the affairs of his native city. At a subsequent period he served under Julius Caesar in the Alexandrian war (48); and after the defeat of Pharnaces in the following year (47), Caesar bestowed upon Mithridates the kingdom of the Bosphorus, and also the tetrarchy of the Galatians. But the kingdom of the Bosphorus still remained to be won, for Asander, who had revolted against Pharnaces, was in fact master of the whole country, and Mithridates having attempted to expel Asander, was defeated and slain. (Bell. Alex. 26-32, 78; Strab. p. 625; Dio Cass. xlii. 41-43.)

Mithridātis Rēgio (Μιθριδάτου χώρα), in Sarmatia Asiatica, on the W. side of the river Rha (Volga), so called because it was the place of refuge of the last Mithridates, in the reign of Claudius (Tac. Ann. xii. 15; Ptol. v. 9, 19).

Mitylēnē. [MYTILENE.]

Mnasēas (Μνασείας), of Patara in Lycia—not of Patrae in Achaia—was a pupil of Eratosthenes, and a grammarian of considerable celebrity. He wrote two works, one of a chorographical description, entitled Periplus (Περὶπλους), and the other a collection of oracles at Delphi. (Suid. s.v.; Athen. pp. 158, 296, 530.)

Mnasilōchos (Μνασίλοχος), an Acarnanian leader, sided with Antiochus in 191, and surrendered to the Romans after the battle of Magnesia (Liv. xxxvi. 11, xxxviii. 38; Pol. xxii. 26).

Mnasippus (Μνάσιππος), a Laecdaemonian in command of the fleet at Coreyra in 373, was slain in a battle (Xen. Hell. vi. 2.)

Mnēmē. [MUSAE.]

Mnemōsŷnē. [MUSAE.]

Mnesarchus (Μνήσαρχος). 1. [PYTHAGORAS.]—2. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panaetius, flourished about B.C. 110, and taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon. (Cic. Fin. i. 2, 6, Acad. ii. 22, 69.)

Mnesicles (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylaea of the Acropolis. [See pp. 11, 12; Dict. of Ant. art. Propylaea.]

Mnesimāchus (Μνησίμαχος), a poet of the Middle Comedy (Athen. pp. 301, 322, 329).

Mnesithēus (Μνησίθεος), a physician, was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the fourth century B.C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis. He is frequently mentioned by Galen and others.

Mnester (Μνήστηρ), a celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, was one of the lovers of Messallina, and was put to death on the ruin of the latter (Tac. Ann. ix. 4, 36; Suet. Cal. 36, 55, 57).

Mnestheus, a Trojan, who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and was the ancestral hero of the Memmii (Verg. Aen. v. 117).

Moābitis (Μωαβίτις, Μόβα: Μωαβίται, Moabitae: O. T. Moab, for both country and people), a district of Arabia Petraea, E. of the Dead Sea, from the river Arnon (Wady-el-Mojib, the boundary between Palestine and Arabia) on the N., to Zoar, near the S. end of the Dead Sea, on the S., between the Amorites on the N., the Midianites on the E., and the Edomites on the S.—that is, before the Israelitish conquest of Canaan. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Mōdestīnus, Herennius, a Roman jurist, and a pupil of Ulpian, flourished in the reigns of Alexander Severus, Maximinus and the Gordians, A.D. 222-244. Though Modestinus is the latest of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are 345 excerpts in the Digest from his writings.

Mōdestus, Jūlius, a grammarian who wrote early in the first century A.D. (Suet. Gr. 20; Gell. iii. 9, 1; Mart. x. 21, 1).

Mōdestus, a military writer, the author of a Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the emperor Tacitus, A.D. 275: brief, and presents no features of interest. Printed in all the collections of Scriptores de Re Militari.

Modicia (Monza), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on the river Lambrus, N. of Mediolanum (Milan), where Theodoric built a palace, and Theodolinda, queen of the Langobards, a splendid church, which still contains many of the gifts of this queen (Paul. Langob. iv. 22, 49).

Mōdin (Μοδῆν, -εἶν, or -εῖν), a village on a mountain N. of Lydda or Diospolis, on the extreme NW. of Judaea, celebrated as the native place of the Maccabci (Jos. Ant. xii. 8, 1).

Mōdra (τὰ Μόδρα: Mudurlu), a town of Bithynia near the source of the river Gallus (Strab. p. 543).

Moenus, Moenis, Maenus, or Menus (Main), a river in Germany, which rises in the Sudeti Montes, flows through the territory of the Hermunduri and the Agri Decumates of the Romans, and falls into the Rhine opposite Mogontiacum (Mainz) (Tac. Germ. 28; Mel. iii. 3, 3).

Moeis or Myris (Μοίρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some 900 years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B.C. 450. The Greek writers state of Moeris that he formed the lake known by his name, and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built two pyramids on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife. (Hdt. ii. 13, 101, 149; Diod. i. 52; Strab. pp. 789, 809.) The real author of these works was Amenemhat III., who lived about 2300 B.C. (1000 years earlier than the date given by Herodotus). He had the enormous basin formed in the Fayūm for the storage of water protected by dykes and communicating with the river by a canal with locks to regulate the flow. He also built the Labyrinth [Dict. of Ant. s.v.]. The Egyptian word meri means 'a basin,' and from this a confused account of a king of that name was adopted by the Greeks.

Moeis (Μοίρις), commonly called Moeis Atticista, a distinguished grammarian of the time of Hadrian, the author of a work still extant, entitled Λέξεις Ἀττικάι, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects; consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, illustrated by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Edited by Pierson, 1759; Bekker, 1833.

Moeis Lacus. [MOERIS.]

Moero (Μοιρά), or Myro (Μυρώ), a poetess of Byzantium, wife of Andromachus surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus, lived about B.C. 300. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems. (Suid. s.v.; Athen. p. 490.)

Moerocles (Μοιροκλῆς), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis, was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and like him an opponent of Philip and Alexander (Dem. F.L. p. 435; Arrian, An. i. 10, 7).

Moesia, called by the Greeks Mysia (Μυσία, also M. ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, to distinguish it from Mysia in Asia), a country of Europe, was bounded on the S. by Haemus, which separated it from Thrace, and by M. Orbelus and Scordus, which separated it from Macedonia, on the W. by M. Scordus and the rivers Drinus and Savus, which separated it from Illyricum and Pannonia, on the N. by the Danube, which separated it from Dacia, and on the E. by Pontus Euxinus, thus corresponding to the present Servia and Bulgaria (Dio Cass. li. 27; Ptol. iii. 9, 60). This country was subdued in the reign of Augustus, about 29 B.C. (Liv. Ep. 134, 135; Dio Cass. li. 25; Flor. ii. 26), but does not appear to have been formally constituted a Roman province till near the end of the reign, about A.D. 6 (Dio Cass. lv. 29; Ov. Trist. ii. 197). Tacitus (Ann. i. 80) mentions a legatus Moesiae A.D. 14. It was originally only one province, but in the reign of Domitian was formed into two provinces, called Moesia Superior and Moesia Inferior, the former being the western and the latter the eastern half of the country, and separated from each other by the river Cehrns or Ciahrus, a tributary of the Danube. When Aurelian surrendered Dacia to the barbarians, and removed the inhabitants of that province to the S. of the Danube, the middle part of Moesia was called Dacia Aureliani; and this new province was divided into Dacia Ripensis, the district along the Danube, and Dacia Inferior, the district S. of the latter as far as the frontiers of Macedonia. In the reign of Valens, some of the Goths crossed the Danube and settled in Moesia. These Goths are sometimes called Moeso-Goths, and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the Scriptures into Gothic about the middle of the fourth century. The original inhabitants of the country, called Moesi by the Romans, and Mysi (Μυσοί) by the Greeks, were a Thracian race, and were divided into several tribes, such as the TRIBALLI, PEUCINI, &c. (Strab. p. 295).

Mogontiâcum, Moguntiâcum or Magontiâcum (Mainz or Mayence), a town on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the river Moenns (Main), was situated in the territory of the Vangiones, and was subsequently the capital of the province of Germania Prima. It was a Roman municipium, and was founded, or at least enlarged and fortified, by Drusus. It was occupied by a strong Roman garrison, and continued to the downfall of the empire to be one of the chief fortresses on the Rhine. (Tac. Hist. iv. 15, 24; Amm. Marc. xv. 11.)

Moirae (Μοῖραι), called Parcae by the Romans, the Fates. Moira properly signifies 'a share,' and as a personification 'the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share.' Homer speaks of the Μοῖραι as personal deities once (Il. xxiv. 49), and again of a single Μοῖρα who spins the thread of life (Il. xxiv. 209): in the Odyssey (vii. 197) there is once mention of the spinning deities (Κλωθές) who are present at the time of birth. Αἴσα is mentioned there also, and it is possible that in this passage Αἴσα Διὸς may be regarded, like the Zeus Moiraγέτης at Delphi [see below], as the third in company with two Κλωθές. In Homer Moira is fate personified, which, at the birth of man, spins out the thread of his future life, follows his steps, and directs the consequences of his actions according to the counsel of the gods. But the personification of his Moira is not complete; for he mentions no particular appearance of the goddess, no attributes, and no parentage. His Moira is therefore quite synonymous with Aisa (Αἴσα).—In Hesiod the personification of the Moirae is more complete, but in speaking of the darker Titan dynasty he makes them daughters of Night and sisters of Khêpes and Death; whereas under the more orderly reign of Zeus they are daughters of Zenshimself and Themis (Hes. Th. 217, 904; cf. Apollod. i. 3, 1), and three in number, viz. Clotho, or the spinning fate; Lachêsis, or the one who assigns to man his fate; and Atrôpos, or the fate that cannot be avoided. Later writers give other genealogies: thus they are called children of Erebus and Night, of Cronos and Night, of Ge and Oceanus, or lastly of Ananke or Necessity (Cic. N.D. iii. 17; Tzet. ad Lyc. 406; Plat. Rep. p. 617). In Homer the conception of the supreme rule of the Fates is as uncertain as is their personality: in some passages all the gods, even Zeus, observe the decree of Fate (Il. xix. 87); in others the Fate is rather an attribute of Zeus signifying his predestined will (Il. xvii. 321), and it is even hinted that fate may be altered by Zens (Il. xvi. 435), and that things may possibly happen ὑπὲρ μοῖραν (Il. xx. 30, 336). But the conception which prevailed was of an unalterable decree. The fate assigned to every being by eternal laws takes its course without obstruction; and Zeus, as well as the other gods and men, must submit to them. (Aesch. Pr. 516, Eum. 335, 962; cf. Verg. Aen. v. 798, xii. 147; Ov. Met. xv. 781.) They assign to the Erinyes, who inflict the punishment for evil deeds, their proper functions; and with them they direct fate according to the laws of necessity, whence they are sometimes called the sisters of the Erinyes.—The Moirae, as the divinities of the duration of human life, which is determined by the two points of birth and of death, are conceived either as goddesses of birth or as goddesses of death, and hence their number was two, as at Delphi with Zeus as Μοιραγέτης (Pans. x. 24, 4); but even here the number of three deities is preserved, and the conception became universal of three sister Fates (as of three Honrs, three Graces, &c.). The distribution of the functions among them was not strictly observed, for we sometimes find all described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is moreover often mentioned alone as the representative of all. As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of the beginning of life, and prophesy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Ilithyia, with whom, and also with the Honrs, they appear as helpers at the birth of a child (Pind. Ol. vi. 42, Nem. vii. 1; Eur. I. T. 207, Bacch. 99; Paus. viii. 21, 2; see also HORAE and ILITHYIA). As goddesses of death, they appear also with the Keres and the Erinyes (Hes. Scut. 258; Paus.

ii. 11, 4). In some ancient works of art they appear, not with their several attributes, but as three crowned deities with sceptres in token of their sovereignty (as on the altar of the Twelve Gods, now in the Louvre); but usually in works of art they are represented with different attributes: Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate); Lachesis pointing with a staff to the globe; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or shears. The Parcae in Latin literature received all the mythology and attributes of the Greek Moirae. Originally Parca was especially the goddess of birth, her name being probably derived a pariundo (though some take it to be from plecto, as weaving the thread); but with her were associated the deities Nona and Decima presiding over different months of the birth, and subsequently the name Parcae was applied to the three Fates collectively, of whom Nona and Decima were charged with the birth, and the third, Morta, with death (Varro, ap. Gell. iii. 16). The abstract noun fatum meant the spoken word or decree of Heaven, equivalent to the αἶσα Διός (Serv. ad Aen. x. 628, xii. 808), but though the neuter form prevailed in literature, the popular and ceremonial language retained Fati and Fatae. Fata Scribunda was the goddess who watched over the birth (included among the Carmentes as being prophetic) and wrote down the destiny of the child.

Moliōne. [MOLIONES.]

Moliōnes or Moliōnidae (Μολίονες, Μολίονε, Μολιονίδα), that is, Eurytus and Cteatus, so called after their mother Molione. They are also called Actoridae or Actorione (Ἀκτορίωνε) after their reputed father Actor, the husband of Molione, though they were generally regarded as the sons of Poseidon. The Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition of the Epeans against Neleus and the Pylians (Il. xi. 709, 750, xxiii. 638; Ov. Met. viii. 308). They are represented as nephews of Augeas, king of the Epeans. When Heracles marched against Augeas, the latter entrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones; but as Heracles was taken ill, he concluded peace with Augeas, whereupon his army was attacked and defeated by the Molionidae. In order to take vengeance, he afterwards slew them near Cleonae, on the frontiers of Argolis, when they had been sent from Elis to sacrifice at the Isthmian games, on behalf of the town. (Pind. Ol. xi. 34; Paus. viii. 14, 6; Apollod. ii. 7, 2).—The Moliones are mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice; and Eurytus, of Thalpins by Theraphone. Their sons Amphimachus and Thalpius led the Epeans to Troy. (Paus. v. 3, 4.) Later traditions describe them as born out of an egg, and as having only one body, but two heads (Athen. ii. 58; Plnt. de Frat. Am. 1).

Molo, surname of Apollonius, the rhetorician of Rhodes. [APOLLONIUS, No. 2.]

Molon (Μόλων), satrap of Media under Antiochus the Great, against whom he revolted. He was defeated near Babylon B.C. 220, and put an end to his own life. (Pol. v. 40–54.)

Molochath. [MULUCHA.]

Molossi (Μολοσσοί), a people in Epirus, who inhabited a narrow slip of country, called after them Molossia (Μολοσσία) or Molossis, which extended from the Aous, along the W. bank of the Arachthos, as far as the Ambracian gulf. The Molossi were a Greek people, who claimed descent from Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus) and Andromache, and are said to have emigrated from Thessaly into Epirus, under the guidance of Pyrrhus (Plut. Pyrrh. 1; Just. xvii. 3). In their new abodes they intermingled with the original inhabitants of the land and with the neighbouring Illyrian tribes, in consequence of which they were regarded by the other Greeks as half barbarians. They were, however, by far the most powerful people in Epirus, and their kings gradually extended their dominion over the whole of the country. (Hdt. vi. 127; Thuc. ii. 80; Liv. viii. 21.) The first of their kings who took the title of king of Epirus was Alexander, who perished in Italy B.C. 326. [EPIRUS.] The ancient capital of the Molossi was PASSARON, but AMBRACIA afterwards became their chief town, and the residence of their kings. (Plnt. Pyrrh. 5; Liv. xlv. 26.) The Molossian hounds were celebrated in antiquity, and much prized for hunting (Verg. Georg. iii. 405; Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 114).

Molus (Μόλος), son of Deucalion and father of MERTONES (Il. x. 269, xiii. 279; Apollod. iii. 3, 1).

Molycrium (Μολύκρειον, also Μολύκρεια, Μολυκρία; Μολύκριος, Μολυκριεύς, Μολυκράϊος), a town in the most southerly part of Aetolia, at the entrance of the Corinthian gulf, gave the name of Rhium Molycrium (Ῥίον Μολύκρειον) to the neighbouring promontory of Antirrhium. It was founded by the Corinthians, but was afterwards taken possession of by the Aetolians. (Thuc. ii. 84; Strab. p. 336.)

Mōmemphis (Μώμεμφις; Panouf-Khet, or Manouf-el-Seffli, i.e. Lower Memphis), the capital of the Nomos Momemphites in Lower Egypt, stood on the E. side of the lake Mareotis (Strab. p. 803).

Mōmus (Μῶμος), the god of cruel mockery and censure, is not mentioned by Homer, but is called in Hesiod the son of Night. He is said to have found fault with the man formed by Hephaestus, because a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts. (Hes. Th. 214; Callim. Hymn. Apoll. 113; Lucian, Hermotim. 20.)

Mona. 1. (Anglesey) An island off the coast of the Ordovices in Britain, one of the chief seats of the Druids, was invaded by Suetonius Paulinus, A.D. 61, and conquered by Agricola, 78. (Tac. Agr. 15, 18, Ann. xiv. 29; Ptol. iii. 412; Dio Cass. lxxii. 7).—2. See MONAPIA.

Mōnaeses. 1. A Parthian general mentioned by Horace (Od. iii. 6, 9) is probably the same as Surenas, the general of Orodes, who defeated Crassus.—2. A Parthian noble, who deserted to Antony and urged him to invade Parthia, but soon afterwards returned to the Parthian king Phraates.—3. A general of the Parthian king Vologeses I., in the reign of Nero.

Monapia or Monarina (Isle of Man), an island between Britania and Hibernia (Plin. iv. 103). It is probable that Caesar means this island when he speaks of Mona as halfway between Britain and Iroland (B.G. v. 13).

Monda or Munda (Mondego), a river of Spain, flowing into the ocean between the Tagus and Duris (Plin. iv. 115; Mcl. iii. 1, 7).

Mōnēta. [JUNO.]

Monima (Μονίμη), a Greek woman, either of Stratonicea, in Ionia, or of Miletus, was the wife of Mithridates, but was put to death by order of this monarch, when he fled into Armenia, B.C. 72 (App. Mithr. 21, 27, 48; Plut. Lucull. 18).

Monoeeci Portus, also Herculis Monoeci Portus (Monaco), a port-town on the coast of Liguria, just within the province of Gallia Nar-bonensis (of which the boundary was the river Var), between Nicaea and Albium Intemelium, founded by the Massilians, was situated on a promontory (hence the ars Monoeci of Verg. Aen. vi. 801), and possessed a temple of Hercules Monoecus, from whom the place derived its name (Strab. p. 202; Amm. Marc. xv. 10, 9). The harbour, though small and exposed to the SE. wind (Lucan, i. 405), was of importance, as it was the only one on this part of the coast of Liguria (Tac. Hist. iii. 42; Val. Max. i. 6, 7). A little above Monoeci Portus Augustus marked the highest point of the difficult coast road which he had made there by a trophy (Tropaea Alpium; Plin. iii. 136; Ptol. iii. 1, 2) inscribed with the names of conquered Alpine tribes: hence the name of the modern Turbia.

Montanus, Curtius, was exiled by Nero, A.D. 67; but was soon afterwards recalled at his father's petition. On the accession of Vespasian, he vehemently attacked in the senate the notorious delator, Aquilinus Regulus. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28, 33, Hist. iv. 40-43.) If he is the same person as the Curtius Montanus satirised by Juvenal (iv. 107, 131, xi. 34), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation which, according to Tacitus, he enjoyed in youth; for Juvenal describes him as a corpulent epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a wind-bag (bucca). Hence some suggest that Juvenal alludes to a Junius Montanus, who appears in an inscription as consul suffectus in A.D. 81.

Montanus Julius, a writer of elegiac and epic poetry, contemporary with Ovid (Ov. Pont. iv. 16, 11; Sen. Contr. vii. 16, 27; Sen. Ep. 122).

Montanus, Votienus, of Narbo, an orator and declaimer in the reign of Tiberius, was named the 'Ovid' of the rhetorical schools. He was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands, A.D. 25. (Tac. Ann. iv. 42; Sen. Contr. vii. 20, ix. 28.)

Mopsia or Mopsopia, an ancient name of Pamphylia, derived from Mopsus, the mythical leader of certain Greeks supposed to have settled in Pamphylia, as also in Cilicia and Syria, after the Trojan war, whose name appears more than once in the geographical names in Cilicia. (See MOPSUCRENE, MOPSUESTIA.)

Mopsium (Μόψιον), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, on a hill of the same name between Tempe and Larissa (Strab. p. 441; Liv. xlii. 61).

Mopsucrēnē (Μόψου κρήνη or κρήνη, i.e. the Spring of Mopsus), a city of Cilicia Campestris, on the S. slope of the Taurus, and twelve Roman miles from Tarsus, the place where Constantine died, A.D. 364 (Ptol. v. 7, 7; Sozom. v. 1).

Mopsuestia (Μόψου ἑστία, Μοψουεστία, i.e. the Hearth of Mopsus, also Μόψου πόλις and Μόψος: Μοψέστης: Mampsista, in the middle ages: Messis), an important city of Cilicia Campestris, on both banks of the river Pyramus, twelve Roman miles from its mouth, on the road from Tarsus to Issus, in the beautiful plain called τὸ Ἀλφίον πεδίων, was a civitas libera under the Romans. The two parts of the city were connected by a handsome bridge built by Constantius over the Pyramus. (Strab. p. 676; Cic. ad Fam. iii. 8; Arrian, An. ii. 5.) In ecclesiastical history it is notable as the birth-place of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

Mopsus (Μόψος). 1. Son of Ampey or Ampycus by the nymph Chloris (Hes. Scut. 181). He was one of the Lapithae of Oechalia or Tithaeron (Thessaly), and took part in the combat at the wedding of Pirithous. He was one of the Calydonian hunters, and also one of the Argonauts, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He was afterwards worshipped as an oracular hero. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 336; Ap. Rh. i. 65; Pans. v. 17, 4; Strab. p. 443; Hyg. Fab. 14; Ov. Met. viii. 316, xii. 456.)—2. Son of Apollo and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, and also a celebrated seer. He contended in prophecy with Calchas at Colophon, and showed himself superior to the latter in prophetic power. [CALCHAS.] He founded Mallos in Cilicia, in conjunction with the seer Amphilochus. A dispute arose between the two seers respecting the possession of the town, and both fell in combat by each other's hand. Mopsus had an oracle at Mallos, which existed in the time of Strabo (Strab. p. 675; Plut. Def. Or. 45).

Morgantium, Morgantina, Murgantia, Morgentia (Μοργάντιον, Μοργαντινή: Μοργαντινός, Murgentinus), a town in Sicily founded by the Morgetes, after they had been driven out of Italy by the Oenotrians. According to Livy (xxiv. 27) this city was situated on the E. coast; but according to other writers it was situated in the interior of the island, SE. of Agrigium, and near the Symaethus. The neighbouring country produced good wine. (Strab. pp. 257, 270; Diod. xi. 78; Cic. Verr. iii. 18, 43.)

Morgētes (Μόργητες), an ancient people in the S. of Italy. According to Strabo they dwelt in the neighbourhood of Rhegium, but being driven out of Italy by the Oenotrians crossed over to Sicily and there founded the town of Morgantium. According to Antiochus, Morges was the successor of the Oenotrian king Italus, and hospitably received Siculus, who had been driven out of Latium by the Aborigines, in consequence of which the earlier Oenotrians were called Italietes, Morgetes and Siculi. (Strab. p. 257; Antioch. ap. Dionys. 1, 12.)

Morimēnē (Μοριμενή), the NW. district of Cappadocia, on the banks of the Halys, assigned under the Romans to Galatia. Its meadows were entirely devoted to the feeding of cattle. (Strab. pp. 534, 540.)

Mōrini, a people in Gallia Belgica, W. of the Nervii and Menapii, and the most northerly people in all Gaul, whence Virgil calls them extremi hominum (Aen. viii. 727). They dwelt on the coast, opposite Britain, and at the narrowest part of the channel between Gaul and Britain, which is hence sometimes called Fretum Morinorum or Morinum. They were a warlike people (Caes. B.G. iv. 21; Dio Cass. li. 21). Their chief town was GESORIACUM.

Morius (Μόριος), a small river in Boeotia, a S. tributary of the Cephissus, at the foot of Mt. Thurion near CHAERONEA.

Mormo (Μορμώ, also Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκείον), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten children (Aristoph. Ach. 582, Pax, 474; Theocr. xv. 40).

Morpheus (Μορφέυς), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper (Ov. Met. xi. 635).

Mors, called Thanātos (Θάνατος) by the Greeks, the god of death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians (Il. xiv. 291, xvi. 672). In Hesiod he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world (Hes. Th. 211, 756; cf. Verg. Aen. vi. 277). In the Alcestis of Euripides (75, 848), where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Hades in a dark robe (some propose μελάμπτερος for μελάμπεπλος, comparing Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 58), and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. Many of the later poets describe Death as a sad or terrific being; but the best artists of the Greeks, avoiding anything that might be displeasing, abandoned the idea suggested to them by the poets, and represented Death under a more peaceful aspect. On the chest of Cypselus, Night was represented with two boys, one black and the other white; and at Sparta there were statues of both Death and Sleep (Paus. iii. 18, v. 18). Both were usually represented as slumbering youths, or as winged deities (δαίμονες), and with torches turned upside down (cf. Verg. Aen. vi. 224).

Morsimus (Μόρσιμος), a tragic poet, son of Philocles and father of the elder Astydamos, ridiculed by Aristophanes (Ran. 181; Suid. s.v.).

Morÿchus (Μόρυχος), a tragic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes, noted for his gluttony (Aristoph. Ach. 887, Vesp. 504).

Mōsa (Maas or Meuse), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mt. Vogesus, in the territory of the Lingones, and falls into the Vahalis or W. branch of the Rhine (Caes. B.G. iv. 10; Ptol. ii. 9, 3).

Moscha (Μόσχα; Muscat), a seaport on the N.E. coast of Arabia Felix, SW. of Syagrus, the easternmost promontory of the peninsula (Ras el-Had); a chief emporium for the trade between India and Arabia (Ptol. vi. 7).

Moschi (Μόσχοι), a people of Asia, whose territory (ἡ Μοσχική), formed originally the S. part of Colchis, but at the time of Augustus was divided between Colchis, Iberia, and Armenia (Hdt. iii. 94, vii. 78; Strab. p. 497).

Moschici Montes, or -icus Mons (τὰ Μοσχικὰ ὄρη; Mesjidî), a range of mountains extending S. and SW. from the main chain of the Caucasus to that of the Anti-Taurus, and forming the boundary between Colchis and Iberia: named after the Moschi, who dwelt among them (Strab. pp. 61, 492, 548; Ptol. v. 6, 13).

Moschion (Μοσχίων), a Greek physician, the author of a short Greek treatise 'On Female Diseases,' is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ. The work is edited by Dewez, Vienn. 1793.

Moschus (Μόσχος), of Syracuse, a grammarian and bucolic poet, lived about B.C. 250, or a little later. He was a pupil of Bion. In genius he comes far behind Theocritus, whom he imitates. But his lament for Bion has great melody and pathos. His style labours under an excess of polish and ornament. For editions see Bion.

Mōsella (Mosel or Moselle), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mt. Vogesus, and falls into the Rhine at Confluentes (Coblentz). This river forms the subject of a descriptive poem by Ausonius (cf. Flor. iii. 10).

Mostēni (Μοσθηνοί, Μόστια, Μουστήνη, Μουστήνη), a city of Lydia, in the Hyrcanian plain, SE. of Thyatira, was one of the cities of Asia Minor destroyed by the great earthquake of A.D. 17. Its coins are numerous. (Tac. Ann. ii. 47; Ptol. v. 2, 16.)

Mosychlus. [LEMNOS.]

Mosynoeci (Μοσύνκοι, Μοσσύνκοι), or Mosyni or Mossyni (Μοσσυνοί, Μοσσυνοί), a people on the N. coast of Asia Minor, in Pontus, E. of the Chalybes and the city of Cerasus, celebrated for their warlike spirit and savage customs, which are described by Xenophon (Anab. iv. 4,

v. 4). Their name was derived from the conical wooden houses in which they dwelt. Their government was curious: a king chosen by them was strictly guarded in a house higher than the rest, and maintained at the public cost; but as soon as he displeased the commons, they literally stopped the supplies, and starved him to death. (Hdt. vii. 78; Strab. p. 549; Diod. xiv. 30.)

Mothōnē. [METHONE.]

Motica or Motyca (Μότικα; Mutyccensis; Modica), a town in the S. of Sicily, W. of the promontory Pachynus and near the sources of the river Motychanus (Fiume di Ragusa). Since both Cicero and Pliny call the inhabitants Mutyccenses, it is probable that Mutyca is the more correct form of the name. (Cic. Verr. iii. 43, 51; Plin. iii. 91; Ptol. iii. 4, 14.)

Motyā (Μοτῆ; Motvaïos), an ancient town in the NW. of Sicily, situated on a small island (S. Pantaleo) only six stadia from the coast, with which it was connected by a mole. It was founded by the Phoenicians in the territory of the Elymi. It possessed a good harbour, and was in early times one of the most flourishing cities of Sicily. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, was taken from them by Dionysius of Syracuse, and was finally captured by the Carthaginian general Himilco, who transplanted all its inhabitants to the town of Lilybaeum, which he had founded in its neighbourhood, B.C. 397. (Thuc. vi. 2; Diod. xiv. 47, 55.)

Motychānus. [MOTUCA.]

Mūcia, daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, consul B.C. 95, married Cn. Pompey, by whom she had two sons, Cneius and Sextus, and a daughter, Pompeia. She was divorced by Pompey in 62. She next married M. Aemilius Scaurus, a stepson of the dictator Sulla. In 39, Mucia went to Sicily to mediate between her son Sex. Pompey and Augustus. She was living at the time of the battle of Actium, 31. Augustus treated her with great respect. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 2; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 49, lvi. 38; Suet. Jul. 50.)

Mūciānus. 1. P. Licinius Crassus Dives Mucianus, was the son of P. Mucius Scaevola, and was adopted by P. Licinius Crassus Dives. He was consul B.C. 131, and carried on the war against Aristonicus in Asia, but was defeated and killed. He succeeded Scipio Nasica as pontifex maximus. He was distinguished both as an orator and a lawyer. (Gell. i. 13; Val. Max. viii. 7; Cic. de Or. i. 37, 216.)—2. Licinius Muciānus, three times consul, in A.D. 52, 70, and 75. On Nero's death in 68, Mucianus had the command of the province of Syria; and he rendered efficient aid to Vespasian when the latter resolved to seize the imperial throne. As soon as Vespasian was proclaimed emperor, Mucianus set out for Europe to oppose Vitellius: but the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus [PRIMUS], before Mucianus entered Italy. Antonius, however, had to surrender all power into the hands of Mucianus, upon the arrival of the latter at Rome. Mucianus was an orator and a historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus. He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he published in eleven books of Acta and three of Epistolae. The subject of his history is not mentioned; but it appears to have treated chiefly of the East. (Tac. Hist. i. 10, ii. 76, iii. 53, iv. 80; Suet. Vesp. 6, 13.) He is often cited by Pliny.

Mūcius Scaevōla. [SCAEVOLA.]

Mugilla (Mugillanus), a town in Latium from which a family of the Papirii probably derived their name Mugillanus (Dionys. viii. 36).

Mulciber. [VULCANUS.]

Mulūcha, Malva, or Molūchath (Μολοχάθ: Mulhwi), the largest river of Mauretania, rising in the Atlas, and flowing N. by E. into the Gulf of Melillah, successively the boundary between the Mauri and the Massaesylii, Mauretania and Numidia, Mauretania Tingitana and Mauretania Caesariensis. (Strab. pp. 827, 829; Ptol. iv. 1, 7.) [MAURETANIA.]

Mummius. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 187, and praetor 177 (Liv. xxxvii. 54, xli. 8).—2. L., surnamed ACHAICUS, son of the last, was praetor 154, when he carried on the war successfully in Further Spain, against the Lusitanians. He was consul in 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus, by the conquest of Greece, and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia. After defeating the army of the Achaean League at the Isthmus of Corinth, he entered Corinth without opposition. The city was burnt, rased, and abandoned to pillage: the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Dionysus by Aristides; and Mummius himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving, to the king of Pergamum, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy, to replace by equivalents any picture or statue lost or injured in the passage. (Pol. iii. 32, xl. 7–11; Vell. Pat. i. 13.) He remained in Greece during the greater part of 145 with the title of proconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. He triumphed in 145. He was censor in 142 with Scipio Africanus the younger. The political opinions of Mummius inclined to the popular side. (Cic. Mur. 14, Off. ii. 22; Paus. vii. 12.)—3. Sp., brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in 146–145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions Spurius was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which Horace afterwards cultivated so successfully. (Cic. de Rep. i. 12, ad Att. xiii. 6, de Amic. 19, 27.)

Munātius Plancus. [PLANCUS.]

Munda. 1. A Roman colony and an important town in Hispania Baetica, situated on a small river, and celebrated on account of two battles fought in its neighbourhood—the victory of Cn. Scipio over the Carthaginians in B.C. 216, and the important victory of Julius Caesar over the sons of Pompey in 45. The town had fallen into decay as early as the time of Pliny. The site of the ancient town is usually supposed to be the modern village of Monda, S.W. of Malaga; but Munda was more probably in the neighbourhood of Cordova, and there are ruins of ancient walls and towers between Martos, Alcantete, Espejo, and Baena, which are conjectured to be the remains of Munda. (Strab. p. 141; Plin. iii. 12; Liv. xxiv. 42; Dio Cass. xliii. 39).—2. A river. See MONDA.

Munychia (Μουνυχία), a hill in the peninsula of Piraeus, which formed the citadel of the ports of Athens. It was strongly fortified, and is frequently mentioned in Athenian history. At its foot lay the harbour of Munychia, one of the three harbours in the peninsula of Piraeus fortified by Themistocles. The names of these three harbours were Piraeus, Zea, and Munychia. [See map on p. 142.] The hill of Munychia contained several public buildings. Of these the most important were:—(1) a temple of Artemis Munychia, in which persons accused of crimes against the state took refuge; (2) the Bendideum, the sanctuary of the Thracian Artemis Bendis, in whose honour the festival of the Bendidea was celebrated; (3) the theatre on the NW. slope of the hill. (Strab. p. 395; Paus. i. 1, 4.)

Murcia, Murtea, Murtia. [VENUS.]

Murcus, L. Staius, was Caesar's legatus B.C. 48, and praetor 45. He went into Syria after his year of office expired; and after Caesar's death became an active supporter of the republican party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi, in 42, Murcus went over to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. Here he was assassinated by Pompey's order at the instigation of his freedman Menas, to whom Murcus had borne himself loftily. (Caes. B. C. iii. 15; App. B. C. iv. 58–86, 100–117, v. 15, 70; Dio Cass. xlviii. 19; Vell. Pat. ii. 77.)

Mūrēna, Liciniūs. The name Murena is said to have been given in consequence of P. Licinius, praetor in 104, having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them (Plin. ix. 170; Macrob. ii. 11).—1. P., a man of some literary knowledge, lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla, B.C. 82 (Cic. Brut. 67, 90).—2. L., brother of the preceding, served under Sulla in Greece, in the Mithridatic war. After Sulla had made peace with Mithridates (84), Murena was left as propraetor in Asia. Anxious for distinction, Murena sought a quarrel with Mithridates; and after carrying on the war for two years, was at length compelled by the strict orders of Sulla to stop hostilities. Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in 81. (App. Mithr. 64; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 3, 7).—3. L., son of the last, served under his father in the second Mithridatic war, and also under Lucullus in the third Mithridatic war. In 65 he was praetor, in 64 propraetor of Gallia Cisalpina, and in 63 was elected consul with D. Junius Silanus. Serv. Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instituted a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Serv. Sulpicius the younger. Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered in the latter part of November. The orator handled his subject skilfully, by making merry with the formulae and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which sect Cato had attached himself. Murena was acquitted, and was consul in the following year, 62. (Plut. Lucull. 16–19, Cat. Min. 21; Cic. pro Murena; ad Att. xii. 21, xiii. 6).—4. A. Terentius Varro Murena, probably the son of the preceding, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. This is the common and on the whole most probable account, inferred from the mention of him in Dio Cass. v. 3, Suet. Tib. 8, and Vell. Pat.

ii. 91. But there is no certain authority for his parentage, and there is some difference in the names given to him. Hence some believe that he was a real and not an adopted Varro. It is impossible to accept this view without rejecting the authority of Dio, who calls him Licinius Murena. If he was born a Licinius and adopted by Varro, he might be spoken of either as Licinius or as Terentius, and there is nothing impossible in his sister also taking the name Terentia. Again, there is no authority for supposing that a Varro would take the cognomen Murena. In the civil wars he is said to have lost his property (Schol. ad Hor. Od. ii. 2), and C. Procleius, a Roman eque, is said to have given him a share of his own property. This Procleius is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally, Procleius had more than one brother. The plural, however, may be merely generalising. Again, it is not necessary to suppose that he was a brother; for it was common enough among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patruelis and frater). That Procleius was brother (or cousin) of Murena, and also of Terentia the wife of Maecenas, is stated by Dio Cassius (liv. 3). It is a further question whence Murena obtained wealth enough to fit him for the position of augur (see Hor. Od. iii. 19), for which the portion likely to have come from Procleius would scarcely suffice; and it has been conjectured with much probability that the great Varro (M. Terentius the scholar and antiquarian) who died about 28 B.C., and was very wealthy, may have left his property, or much of it, to Murena. Horace mentions also a villa of Murena's at Formiae about 38 B.C. This, however, must have belonged to him before any bequest from Varro (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 38). It is probable, though not absolutely certain, that Murena was the Terentius Varro who subdued the Salassi in the Alps, and founded the town of Augusta (Aosta) in their territory (Dio Cass. liii. 25; Strab. p. 206), and was consul suffectus in 23 (C. I. L. p. 450). In 22 he was involved in the conspiracy of Fannius Caepio, and was condemned to death and executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Procleius and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Horace (Od. ii. 10) addresses Murena by the name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more cautious in his speech and conduct (cf. Sen. Ep. 19). His execution is mentioned by Dio Cass. liv. 3, Suet. Tib. 8, Tac. Ann. i. 10. (For the consequences to his brother-in-law, see MAECENAS.)

Murgantia. 1. See MORGANTIUM.—2. A town in Samnium, E. of Bovianum (Liv. x. 17).

Murgis, a town in Hispania Bactica, on the frontiers of Tarraconensis, and on the road from Acci to Malaga (Ptol. ii. 4, 11).

Mursa or Mursia (Esseck, capital of Slavonia), an important town in Pannonia Inferior, situated on the Dravus, not far from its junction with the Danube, was a Roman colony founded by the emperor Hadrian (hence Aelia Mursa), and was the residence of the governor of Lower Pannonia (Ptol. ii. 16, 8). Hero Magnentius was defeated by Constantius II., A.D. 351.

Mursella, or Mursa Minor, a town in Pannonia Inferior, only ten miles W. of the great Mursa.

Mus, Dēcius. [DECIVS.]

Musa, Antōnius, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era. He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to king Juba, and was himself the physician to the emperor Augustus. He had been originally a slave. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and treatment, B.C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money, and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honour near that of Aesculapius by public subscription. He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (Epist. i. 15, 3), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, 23. (Dio Cass. liii. 30; Suet. Aug. 59, 81; Plin. xix. 128, xxv. 77, xxx. 117.) He wrote several pharmaceutical works, which are frequently quoted by Galen, but of which nothing except a few fragments remain. There are, however, two short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are generally considered to be spurious.

Mūsa or Mūza (Μούσα, Μούζα: prob. Mou-shid, N. of Mokha), a port of Arabia Felix, on the W. coast, near the Straits of Babel-Mandeb (Ptol. vii. 15).

Mūsae (Μούσαι), the Muses, were, according to the earliest writers, the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally nymphs of wells and springs, which were regarded as sacred and inspiring, and were in the earliest times honoured with choruses and dances. (Thus one of the altars of the Muses at Athens was sacred to The Muses of the Ilissus.) Hence the nymphs themselves were supposed to be the sources of song and poetry. Such worship was common in Thracia and Boeotia, and it was especially important at the plenteous springs of Mt. Helicon, Aganippe and Hippocrene. They were thus brought into connexion with the great deities of that country, with Dionysus, and more especially with Apollo, who represented their characteristics as being the god at once of prophetic and of poetical inspiration. Hence he is the leader of the Muses (Μουσ-αγέρης: cf. Il. i. 603; Pind. Nem. v. 23; Paus. v. 18, 4; p. 89, b). They not only taught the poet his art (Hes. Th. 22), but, as gifted with oracular power, they came to be regarded as teaching arts and knowledge in general.—1. Genealogy of the Muses. The most common notion was that they were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and born in Picria, at the foot of Mt. Olympus (Il. ii.

only taught the poet his art (Hes. Th. 22), but, as gifted with oracular power, they came to be regarded as teaching arts and knowledge in general.—1. Genealogy of the Muses. The most common notion was that they were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and born in Picria, at the foot of Mt. Olympus (Il. ii.

491, Od. i. 10; Hes. Th. 52, 915; Apollod. i. 3, 1). There were other traditions of their being daughters of Uranus and Ge (in allusion to the origin of springs), or of Pierus, from their worship in Pieria and their names Picrides or in Hesiod, who states the names of all the nine, and these nine names became the usual ones. They are Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia or Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope. In some local tradi-

Pieriae nymphae (Cic. N.D. ii. 21, 54).—2. Number of the Muses. That there were nine Muses instead of the usual three (according to the number of Graces, Hours, &c.) was probably due to the form which the choruses took round tions the number three was asserted. Pausanias and Plutarch speak of three Muses at one time honoured on Helicon (where their names were said to be Melete, Mneme, and Aoide), at Delphi and at Sicyon (Paus. ix. 29; Plut.

5. Terpsichore, the Muse of the Choral Dance. (From the Apotheosis of Homer, in the British Museum.)

the sacred springs, in three rows of three maidens. In the Iliad the Muses are spoken of sometimes in the singular, sometimes in the plural, but without definite number. Nine Muses are first mentioned in Od. xxiv. 60, and Symp. ix. 14); and Cicero (l.c.) speaks of four Muses as belonging to one tradition; but there is no sufficient reason for regarding the number nine, which eventually prevailed, as a more recent tradition than the others.—3. Nature and Character of the Muses. In Homer's poems they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olympus. There they sing the festive songs at the repasts of the immortals. They bring before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate, and confer upon him the gift of song. (Il. i. 604, ii. 484, Od. i. 1, viii. 63; Hes. Th. 22.) There is no reason to doubt that the earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; though in later times the invocation of the Muses was conventional. There are traces of a contest between the Muses and other local myths; thus Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness (Il. ii. 594; Apollod. i. 3, 3); the Sirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings (Paus. ix. 34, 2). The nine daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were changed into birds. The earliest worship of the Muses is perhaps correctly assigned to Thrace and Pieria about Mt. Olympus, whence it was introduced into Boeotia (Strab. pp. 410, 471); and the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship in the North, were likewise transferred to the South. Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespie, at the foot of Mt. Helicon (Paus. xxix. 2). It is possible that in this story is concealed the fact that the Thracian worship of nine Muses superseded a Boccotian worship of three. Near

9. Calliope, the Muse of Epic Poetry. (From a statue in the Vatican.)

Mt. Helicon, Ephialetes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them. In the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on Mt. Libethrion, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. At Thespie they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on Mt. Helicon, called Musca (Paus. ix. 29, 1, xxxi. 3; Plut. Amat. p. 748; C.I.G. 1585). Mt. Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. At Athens there was an altar of the Muses in the Academy, besides that to the 'Muses of the Ilissus' near the river. At Sparta they had a temple at which sacrifices were offered before a war, because they inspired the martial music of the Spartans (Paus. iii. 17). At Troezen (where they were called Ardalides, from a mythical Ardalus who introduced their worship), they shared an altar with Hypnos, the god of sleep (Paus. ii. 31, 4). The sacrifices offered to the Muses consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey (Schol. ad Oed. Col. 100; Serv. ad Ecl. vii. 21). The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs.—

4. Representations of the Muses in works of art. In the most ancient works of art we find only three Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the nine sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes. (1) Clio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; (2) Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; (3) Thalia, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with a comic mask, a shepherd's staff, a wreath of ivy, and a tambourine; (4) Melpomene, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Heracles, a sword; her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; (5) Terpsichore, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; (6) Erato, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes also has the lyre; (7) Polymnia, or Polyhymnia, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any attribute, in a pensive attitude; (8) Urania, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; (9) Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper.—The Italian Camenae or Casmeneae were nymphs of springs and of prophecy, and were therefore identified with the Greek Muses. When the worship of the Muses superseded that of the native Camenae, all the Greek attributes and legends were adopted by Roman poets, who used the names Musae and Cameneae as synonyms. [CAMENAE.]

Musaeus (Mouσαῖος). 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Olen, Orpheus, and Parnaphus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially connected with the mystic rites of Demeter at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Heracles (Diod. iv. 25). He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumolpidae, being the son of Eumolpus and Selene (Philochorus, ap. Schol. ad Ar. Ran. 1065). In other variations of the myth he was less definitely called a Thracian. According to other legends he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. Some accounts gave him a wife, Deioce, and a son, Eumolpus (Suid. s.v.: Serv. ad Aen. vi. 667; Diod. l.c.). There was a tradition that the Museum in Piraeus bore that name from having been the place where Musaeus was buried (Paus. i. 25, 8). Among the numerous compositions attributed to him by the ancients the most celebrated were his Oracles. Onomacritus, in the time of the Pisistratidae, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Musaeus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making. (Hdt. vii. 6, viii. 96; Ar. Ran. 1031; Paus. i. 22, x. 9.)—2. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of the writer; but it is certain that the poem is a late production, perhaps not earlier than the fifth century of our era. Edited by Passow, Lips. 1810; and by Schaefer, Lips. 1825.

Mūsagētes. [APOLLO.]

C. Mūsōnius Rufus, a Stoic philosopher, was the son of a Roman eque, and was banished by Nero to the island of Gyarus, in A.D. 66, under the pretext of his having been privy to the conspiracy of Piso. He returned from exile on the accession of Galba, and seems to have been held in high estimation by Vespasian, as he was allowed to remain at Rome when the other philosophers were banished from the city. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71; Dio Cass. lxi. 57, lxvi. 13.)

Musti (Μούστη), a town in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), near the river Bagradas, on the road from Carthage to Sicca Veneria (Ptol. iv. 3, 33).

Muthul (Μελλεγ), a river of Numidia, the boundary between the kingdoms of Jugurtha and Adherbal. It joins the Bagradas. (Sall. Jug. 48.)

Mutilus, C. Papius, one of the principal Samnite generals in the Marsic war, B.C. 90–89 (App. B.C. i. 40–51).

Mutina (Mutinensis: Modena), an important town in Gallia Cispadana, on the high road from Mediolanum to the S. of Italy, was originally a Celtic town, and was the first place which the Romans took away from the Boii. It is mentioned at the beginning of the second Punic war (B.C. 218) as a fortified place inhabited by the Romani (Liv. xxi. 25, xxvii. 21; Pol. iii. 40); but it was not till 183 that it was made a Roman colony (Liv. xxxix. 55). Mutina is celebrated in the history of the Civil war after Caesar's death. Decimus Brutus was besieged here by M. Antonius from December, 44, to April, 43; and under its walls the battles were fought in which the consuls Hirtius and Pansa perished. Hence this war was called the Bellum Mutinense. (App. B.C. iii. 49–72; Suet. Aug. 9.) The best wool in all Italy came from the neighbourhood of Mutina (Strab. p. 218).

Mutunus Tutunus, an old Italian deity of fruitful marriage, worshipped by the symbol of the phallus, and compared by Roman writers with Priapus (Arnob. iv. 7; cf. INDIGETES, p. 443, a).

Mycālē (Μυκάλη: Samsun), a mountain in the S. of Ionia in Asia Minor, N. of the mouth of the Maeander. It forms the W. extremity of M. Messogis, and runs far out into the sea, opposite to Samos, forming a sharp promontory, which was called Mycale or Trogilium (Τρωγίλιον, Τρωγύλιον: C. S. Maria). This cape and the SE. promontory of Samos (Posidonium) overlap one another, and the two tongues of land are separated by a strait only seven stadia (little more than three-fourths of a mile) in width, which is renowned in Greek history as the scene of the victory gained over the Persian fleet by Leotychides and Xanthippus, B.C. 479. There seems to have been a city of the same name on or near the promontory. On the N.

side of the promontory, near Priene, was the great temple of Poseidon, which was the place of meeting for the Panionic festival and Amphictyony. (Il. ii. 869; Hdt. i. 148; Thuc. i. 14; Strab. p. 621; Paus. v. 7, 3.)

Mycalēssus (Μυκαλησσός: Μυκαλήσσιος), an ancient and important city in Boeotia, mentioned by Homer, was situated on the road from Aulis to Thebes. In B.C. 413 some Thracian mercenaries in the pay of Athens surprised and sacked the town, and butchered the inhabitants. From this blow it never recovered, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It possessed a celebrated temple of Demeter, who was hence surnamed Mycalessia. (Il. ii. 498; Hymn. Apoll. 224; Thuc. vii. 29; Strab. p. 404; Paus. ix. 19.) The ruins of the walls and towers and the position of the gateways are still traceable.

Mycēnae, sometimes Mycēnē (Μυκῆναι, Μυκῆνη: Μυκηναῖος: Karvata), an ancient town in Argolis, about six miles NE. of Argos, and nine and a quarter miles inland from Tiryns, was situated on a spur rising from the valley of the Cephissus, at the NE. corner of the plain (hence described in Odyssey iii. 263 as μυχῶ Ἀργεος). Traditionally it was founded by Perseus; its massive walls were regarded as the work of the Cyclopes (Strab. p. 377; Paus. ii. 15, 16; Ev. I.A. 1500); but there is little doubt that Mycenae was an offshoot from the older TIRYNS, which it eventually surpassed in importance. It was built in a secure position on the hillside commanding the passes through which several very ancient roads have been discovered leading to Corinth and the Corinthian gulf. It is therefore a reasonable conclusion that the princes of Tiryns [see PELOPS; TIRYNS] built Mycenae as an outpost to give them the trade routes to the Corinthian gulf, and that this practical command of the commerce from both seas caused it to outstrip Tiryns in prosperity and to become the chief city of the Pelopidæ; hence in the Homeric age and story it is regarded as the capital of Agamemnon and the first city in all Greece (Il. ii. 569, iv. 52, vii. 180, xi. 46). After the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, it ceased to be a place of importance, but is mentioned as sending a small contingent of troops to Thermopylae and to Plataeae (Hdt. vii. 202, ix. 28). At length, in 468, Argos, having recovered from her former defeats by Sparta, began to strengthen her dominion and attacked Mycenae, angry, as some relate, because the Mycenaeans had helped the Greek armies against Persia (Paus. ii. 16, 5). The massive walls resisted all attacks, but the inhabitants were at length compelled by famine to abandon their town. They effected their escape without a surrender, and took refuge, some at Cleonae, some in Achaia, and others in Macedonia. (Diod. xi. 65; Strab. p. 377; Paus. vii. 25, 3.) The chief known remains of the ancient city were until recent years part of the fortifications, especially the 'Lion Gate,' and some 'beehive' tombs, often called treasuries. The excavations carried out by Schliemann in 1876, and continued in later years, were of the utmost importance, not only for the history of Mycenae and of the Peloponnesus in pre-Dorian times, but also for the study of Greek archaeology, and for the light which is thrown on the Homeric poems. The walls of the citadel of Mycenae enclose a triangular space: the walls of the lower city start from the SW. side of the citadel. The oldest part of the walls is of Cyclopean masonry resembling that at Tiryns, and this occurs in the lower city also, though less thick. In the gates and towers part of the work is of more carefully hewn blocks, and in one part of the wall the masonry is polygonal [see Dict. of Ant. art. Murus]. The 'Lion' gate, which formed the chief entrance, was on the east side, and was so contrived that, as at Tiryns, the invader had to pass through a narrow exposed passage before he reached the actual gate. The (now headless) lions carved on the triangular slab above the lintel form, with the column between them, are a style of decoration exactly resembling sculptures which have been found in Phrygia. On the summit of the citadel further excavations by the Greek Archaeological Society, in 1886, revealed the palace of the kings, of which the ground-plan was like that of the palaces at Tiryns and Troy; and near it, and partly overlapping, a Doric temple of about the sixth or seventh century B.C. Of the 'beehive' tombs (like those at Menidi, Orchomenus, Pharis, and Volo) seven altogether have been found in the lower city, the largest being the falsely named 'Treasury of Atreus.' They consist of a long passage leading to a vaulted chamber or tholos, with a smaller square chamber adjoining [Dict. of Ant. art. Sepulcrum]. They seem in their form to copy primitive Phrygian huts, as described by Vitruvius; and this is another sign of connexion with Phrygia. Since these graves had been rifled, there was great importance in Schliemann's discovery of five graves within the citadel, not far from the Lion Gate, where a sixth has since been found. These are probably the six graves traditionally said to be the graves of Agamemnon and his companions and Atreus, though Pausanias seems to have thought that the tradition referred to the beehive tombs (Paus. ii. 10). There is good reason to think that, whether Agamemnon is buried there or not, there is a considerable interval of time between the earlier and later graves. The real importance, however, lies in the discovery of the rich store of gold and silver works of art and pottery which these graves contained, the product of a civilisation which extended probably from about 1500 to 1000 B.C. This 'Mycenae' art has been traced along the east coast of Greece from Amyclae to Thessaly, in the islands and part of the opposite Asiatic coast. It seems to point to an origin mainly Lydian and Phrygian, perhaps with some Carian admixture; it is apparently the art described in the Iliad, containing, among other things, examples of the intricate metal-work which appeared in the shield of Achilles. [For further account of the history of the pre-Dorian rulers at Mycenae see PELOPIDAE and TRYNS.]

Mycēnē (Μυκῆναι), daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of Mycenae was believed to have derived its name (Od. ii. 120; Paus. ii. 16, 3).

Mycerinus (Μυκερῖνος; the Egyptian Men-kau-Ra), son of Cheops (Chufu), king of Egypt, succeeded his uncle Chephren (Khuf-Ra) on the throne, in the fourth dynasty (Memphite), about 3600 B.C. According to Herodotus his conduct formed a strong contrast to that of his father and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daughter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Saïs in his time. We further hear that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of six years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, Mycerinus, indignant at this injustice, gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. (Hdt. ii. 129-134; Diod. i. 64; Athen. p. 438.) The pyramid of Mycerinus, or Men-kau-Ra, is in the SW. part of the plain of Gizeh. The coffin containing the body of the king is in the British Museum.

Mycōnus (Μύκωνος; Μυκόνιος; Mycono), a small island in the Aegean sea, one of the Cyclades, SE. of Tenos and E. of Delos, never attained any importance in history, but is celebrated in mythology as one of the places where the giants were defeated by Heracles. The island was poor and unproductive, and its inhabitants were rapacious, whence the proverb Μυκόνιος γέγων (Athen. p. 7; Suid. s.v.). It contained two towns, a promontory called Phorbia, and a mountain named Dimastus. The large number of bald persons in this island was considered worthy of record by several ancient writers (Strab. p. 487; Plin. xi. 130).

Mygdon (Μύγδων), son of Acmon, a Phrygian king, who fought with Otres and Priam against the Amazons, and from whom some of the Phrygians are said to have been called Mygdonians. He had a son Coroebus, hence called Mygdonides. (Il. iii. 186; Paus. x. 27.)

Mygdōnia (Μυγδονία; Μύγδορες). 1. A district in the E. of Macedonia, bordering on the Theraic gulf and the Chalcidic peninsula. Its people were of Thracian origin. (Hdt. vii. 123; Thuc. i. 58.)—2. A district in the N. of Asia Minor, between M. Olympus and the coast, in the E. of Phrygia and Mysia and the W. of Bithynia, named after the Thracian people. Mygdonces, who formed a settlement here, but were afterwards subdued by the Bithyni (Strab. pp. 295, 550, 575). Hence Mygdonius is used in the Latin poets for Phrygian (Hor. Od. ii. 12, 22).—3. The NE. district of Mesopotamia, between M. Masius and the Chaboras, which divided it from Osroëne. From its great fertility, it was also called Anthemusia (Ἀνθεμουσία). (Strab. p. 747; Pol. v. 31.)

Myia (Μυία), daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, and wife of Milon of Crotona (Suid. s.v.). A letter addressed to a certain Phyllis is extant under her name.

Mylae (Μυλαί; Μυλαῖος, Μυλαίτης). 1. (Me-lazzo), a town on the E. part of the N. coast of Sicily, situated on a promontory running out far into the sea, with a harbour and citadel. It was founded by Zancle (Messana), and continued subject to the latter city. (Strab. p. 272.) It was off Mylae that C. Duilius won his victory in 260, and Agrippa defeated the fleet of Sex. Pompeius, B.C. 36 (Pol. i. 23; App. B.C. v. 195).—2. A town of Thessaly in Magnesia, of uncertain site.

Myläsa or Mylassa (τὰ Μύλασα, Μύλασσα: Μυλασεύς: Melasso, Ru.), a very ancient inland city of Caria (Hdt. i. 171), lay eighty stadia from the coast at the Gulf of Iassus, in a fertile plain, on and at the foot of an isolated rock of white marble, which furnished the material for the temples and other public buildings of the city. Among them were two temples of Zeus, Zeus Osagos, and Zeus Labrandenus. (Strab. p. 658; Paus. viii. 10.) Under the Romans it was made a free city (Pol. xvi. 24; Liv. xxxviii. 39). In the civil wars, it was taken and partly destroyed by Labienus. Its remains are very extensive, and include the ruins of one of the temples of Zeus on the rock which formed the Acropolis.

Myndus (Μύνδος: Μύνδιος: proh. Port Gumnishlu, Ru.), a Dorian colony on the coast of Caria, in Asia Minor, founded by settlers from Troezen, probably on the site of an old town of the Leleges, which continued to exist under the name of Palaemyndus. Myndus stood at the W. end of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. (Paus. ii. 30; Strab. p. 658.)

Myōn or Myōniā (Μύων, Μυονία: Μυονεύς), a town of the Locri Ozolae, situated on a considerable height thirty stadia from Amphissa, and in one of the passes which lead from Aetolia into Phocis (Thuc. iii. 101; Paus. x. 38, 8).

Myonnēsus (Μυόννησος: C. Hypsilū) a promontory of Ionia, with a town and a little island of the same name, S. of Teos and W. of Lebedus, and forming the N. headland of the Gulf of Ephesus. Here the Romans, under the praetor L. Aemilius, gained a great naval victory over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190. (Thuc. iii. 42; Strab. p. 643; Liv. xxxviii. 27.)

Myos Hormos (ὁ Μυὸς ὄρμος, i.e. probably Muscle-port, rather than Mouse-port, for μῦς is also the Greek for muscle, and this shell-fish is very common on the W. coast of the Red Sea), aft. Veneris Portus (Ἀφροδίτης ὄρμος), an important seaport town of Upper Egypt, built by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus on a promontory of the same name, six or seven days' journey from Coptos. (Diod. iii. 39; Strab. pp. 760, 815; Ptol. iv. 5, 14.) Its position is occupied by the modern Abou-Shaar.

Myra or Myron (τὰ and ἡ Μύρα, ἡ Μύρων: Μυρεύς: Myra, Grk., Dembre, Turk., Ru.), one of the chief cities of Lycia, and, under the later Roman empire, the capital of the province, was built on a rock twenty stadia from the sea, and had a port called Andriaca (Ἀνδριακή) (Strab. p. 666). St. Paul touched here on his voyage to Rome (Acts, xxvii. 5, 6). There are still magnificent ruins of the city, in great part hewn out of the rock.

Myriandus (Μυριανδός), a Phoenician colony in Syria, on the E. side of the Gulf of Issus, a day's journey from the Cilician Gates (Xen. An. i. 4, 6; Arrian, An. ii. 6, 1). It probably stood a little S. of Alexandria, at a spot where there are ruins. Herodotus calls the Gulf of Issus ὁ Μυριανδικὸς κόλπος (iv. 38).

Myrina (ἡ Μύρινα, or Μύρινα, Μύρινα, Μυρίνη: Μυριναῖος). 1. (Sandarlık?), a very ancient and strongly fortified city on the W. coast of Mysia, founded, according to mythical tradition, by Myrinus or by the Amazon Myrina, and colonised by the Aeolians, of whose confederacy it formed a member (Hdt. i. 149; Strab. p. 505). Within its territory, at Gryneum, was an ancient oracle of Apollo. It was also called Smyrna, and, under the Roman empire, Sebastopolis: it was made by the Romans a civitas libera. It was destroyed by earthquakes under Tiberius and Trajan, but each time rebuilt. (Liv. xxxiii.

· Coin of Myrina (2nd cent. B.C.).

Obv., head of Apollo; rev., ΜΥΡΙΝΑΙΩΝ; Apollo with patera; before him omphalos and vase; laurel wreath surrounding.

80; Tac. Ann. ii. 47; Oros. vii. 12.) It was the birthplace of the epigrammatic poet Agathias. —2. [See LEMNOS.]

Myrlēa (Μύρλεια: Μυρλεᾶνός: Amaroli, Ru.), a little distance inland from Mudanieh), a city of Bithynia, not far from Prusa, founded by the Colophonians, and almost rebuilt by Prusias I., who called it Apamea after his wife. The Romans colonised it under Julius Caesar and Augustus. (Strab. pp. 563, 564; Plin. v. 149.)

Myrmēcides (Μυρμηκίδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Aetheus, is generally mentioned in connexion with Callicrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. [CALLICRATES.] His works in ivory were so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair. (Varro, L. L. ix. 62; Cic. Acad. ii. 38; Suid. s.v.)

Myrmēcium (Μυρμηκίον), a Milesian colony of the Chersonesus Taurica, situated on a promontory of the same name a little N. of Panticapaeum (Strab. p. 310; Ptol. iii. 6, 4).

Myrmidon (Μυρμιδών), son of Zeus and Eury-medusa, daughter of Clitus, whom Zeus deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Pisi-dice, by whom he became the father of Antiphylus and Actor. (Apollod. i. 7. 3; Ap. Rh. i. 56.)

Myrmidōnes (Μυρμιδόνες), an Achaean race in Phthiotis in Thessaly, whom Achilles ruled over and who accompanied this hero to Troy. They are said to have inhabited originally the island of Aegina, and to have emigrated with Peleus into Thessaly; but modern critics on the contrary suppose that a colony of them emigrated from Thessaly into Aegina. In Homer's time they are Thessalians. (Il. ii. 681, xvi. 65, xix. 278; Strab. pp. 375, 433.) The Myrmidones disappear from history at a later period. The ancients derived their name either from a mythical ancestor MYRMIDON, or from the ants (μύρμηκες) in Aegina, which were supposed to have been metamorphosed into men in the time of Aeacus. [AEACUS.]

Myrcinus (Μύρκινος), a town on the N. side of the Strymon, near Mt. Pangaeus, founded by HISTIAEUS (Hdt. v. 23, 97, 124; Thuc. iv. 102).

Myron (Μύρων). 1. Tyrant of Sicily, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Clisthenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in B.C. 648. (Hdt. vi. 126; Paus. vi. 19.)—2. One of the most celebrated of the Greek sculptors, was born at Eleutheræ, in Boeotia, about 480. He is also called an Athenian, because Eleutheræ had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polyctetus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. He flourished about 431, the time of the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art towards various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. In some matters of detail he is said to have retained some of the roughness, or rather conventionalism, of earlier art, from which Phidias freed himself (Plin. xxxiv. 58). His great works were nearly all in bronze. The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. Of his Discobolus (see Lucian, Philopseud. 18; Quintil. ii. 13, 8) there are marble copies in existence. Of these copies one is in the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburine villa, in 1791; another in the Massimi palace at Rome. The Cow of Myron was celebrated in many popular verses, and the Greek Anthology still contains no less than thirty-six epigrams upon it (cf. Auson. Epigr. 58). The Cow was represented as loving, and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero (Cic. Verr. iv. 60). In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace in the time of Procopius (B. G. iv. 21). Myron was the author of a group representing the scene between Marsyas and Athene when she cast away the flute (Plin. xxxiv. 57; perhaps alluded to, but differently described, by Paus. i. 24, 1). It is now believed by many critics that the statue of Marsyas in the Lateran Museum at Rome is a marble copy from this group, of which a relief on a marble vase in the museum at Athens is doubtless also a representation.—3. Of Priene, the author of an account of the first Messenian war, probably lived not earlier than the third century B.C. (Paus. iv. 6; Athen. pp. 657).

Myronides (Μυρωνίδης) a skilful and successful Athenian general. In B.C. 457 the Corinthians had invaded Megara in order to draw away the Athenian forces from the war with Aegina. The rest of the Athenian forces were in Egypt, but Myronides raised an army of boys and old men, defeated the Corinthians, and repulsed them from Megara. In 456 he defeated the Boeotians at Oenophyta, and gave Athens the supremacy over Phocis and most of the Boeotian towns. (Thuc. i. 105, 106, 108; iv. 95; Aristoph. Ecol. 303.)

Myrrha (Μύρρα) or Smyrna, daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonis. For details see ADONIS.

Myrrhinūs (Μυρρινοῦς: Μυρρινοῦσιος), a demus on the E. coast of Attica, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, a little S. of the promontory Cynosura. It is said to have been built by a hero Colaenus, and it contained a temple of Artemis Colaenis. (Paus. i. 31, 4.)

Myrsilus (Μύρσιλος). 1. [CANDAULES.]—2. A Greek historical writer of uncertain date, a native of Lesbos, from whom Dionysius of Halicarnassus borrowed a part of his account of the Pelasgians (Dionys. i. 23; Strab. pp. 60, 610).

Myrsinus. [MYRTUNTUM.]

Myrtilis, a town of the Turdetani on the Anas in Lusitania, possessing the Jus Latii.

Myrtilus (Μυρτίλος), son of Hermes by Cleobule, Clytia, Phaetusa, or Myrto. He was the charioteer of Oenomaus king of Elis, whom he betrayed when Pelops contended with his master in the chariot-race. He was afterwards thrown into the sea by Pelops near Geraestus in Euboea; and that part of the Aegæan is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan sea. [OENOMAUS; PELOPS.] At the moment he expired, he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was henceforward tormented by the Erinnyes. His father placed him among the stars as Auriga. (Soph. El. 509; Eur. Or. 993; Pans. ii. 18, v. 1, viii. 14; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 156; Hyg. Fab. 84, Astr. ii. 13.)

Myrtis (Μύρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anhedon, in Boeotia, said to have instructed Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Corinna. There were statues in her honour in various parts of Greece. (Anth. Pal. ix. 26; Suid. s.v. Μύρτιδος.)

Myrtōum Mare (τὸ Μυρτώων πέλαγος), the part of the Aegæan sea, S. of Euboea, Attica and Argolis, which derived its name from the small island Myrtus, though others suppose it to come from Myrtilus, whom Pelops threw into this sea. [MYRTILUS.]

Myrtuntium (Μυρτούντιον: Μυρτούσιος), called Myrsinus (Μύρσινος) in Homer, a town of the Epeans in Elis, on the road from Elis to Dyme (Il. ii. 616; Strab. p. 341).

Myrtus. [MYRTUM MARE.]

Mys (Μῦς), an artist who engraved the battle of the Lapithæ and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachos, in the Acropolis of Athens (Paus. i. 28, 2). He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers (Plin. xxxiii. 154; Mart. xiv. 95).

Myscelus (Μύσκελος, or Μύσκελλος), a native of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Metam. xv. 1), a Heraclid, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He founded Croton in Italy, B.C. 710, in accordance with the Delphic oracle. The oracle had commanded him to build a city where he should find rain with fine weather. For a long time he thought it impossible to fulfil the command of the oracle, till at length he found in Italy a beautiful woman in tears: whereupon he perceived that the oracle was accomplished, and founded Croton on the spot. According to Antiochus he had so much better an opinion of the site of Sybaris that he begged the oracle to let him be founder of that city, but was bidden to be content with the directions given to him (Antioch. ap. Strab. p. 262; Dionys. ii. 59; Suid. s. v.).

Mysi (Μυσοί), a people akin to the tribes of Thrace, regarding whom the early traditions varied: some accounts representing them as having migrated in early times, before the Trojan war, from Thrace into Asia Minor, while others speak of a reflex migration, of Mysians and Teucrians occupying Thrace and the dispossessed Thracians crossing to Asia. The original Mysians are said to have come from Lydia, and to have spoken a language half Lydian, half Phrygian (Xanth. ap. Strab. p. 572; Hdt. vii. 70-75). It is probable that the Mysians really were a Lydian race and closely connected with the Teuceri, and that, besides occupying the territory called Mysia, they sent a considerable horde across the Bosphorus to Thrace, which may have resulted in some tribes from Thrace crossing into parts of Asia [cf. BITHYNIA]. The name of the MOESI on the Danube, called also Μύσοι (II. xiii. 5), pointed to the connexion of Thracians with Mysians (Strab. p. 295). They are mentioned in the Iliad as allies of the Trojans (ii. 858, x. 430). The Mysians are described by ancient writers as a hardy warlike race, and are contrasted with the effeminate Lydians and Phrygians (ἄβροδίατοι Λυδοί, ἀκοντισταί Μυσοί, Aesch. Pers. 40, 52; cf. Xen. An. iii. 2, 23, Mem. iii. 5, 26). Hence it is likely that the well-known proverb Μυσῶν λεία = a helpless victim, or prey to the spoiler (Dem. de Cor. p. 248, § 72; Plut. Theæt. p. 209; Ar. Rhet. i. 12), was not, as is often said, derived from the character of the people, but rather from an old tradition that during the absence of Telephus and the Mysian warriors in the Trojan war their country was plundered by pirates (Harpocrat. s. v. Μυσῶν). But, if this was the origin of the proverb, it affixed a stigma on the Mysians, and Cicero (pro Flacc. 27, 65) cites it as a proof that the Mysians were regarded as contemptible.

Mysia (ἡ Μυσία, poet. Μυσις αἶα: Μυσός, Mysus and Mysius: Chan Karasi, the NW. district of Anadolı), a district of Asia Minor, called also the Asiatic Mysia (Μυσία ἡ Ἀσιακή), in contradistinction to Moesia on the banks of the Danube. Originally it meant of course the territory of the Mysi, but in the usual division of Asia Minor, as settled under Augustus, it occupied the whole of the NW. corner of the peninsula, between the Hellespont on the NW.; the Propontis on the N.; the river Rhyndacus and M. Olympus on the E., which divided it from Bithynia and Phrygia; M. Temnus, and an imaginary line drawn from Temnus to the S. side of the Elaïtic Gulf, on the S., where it bordered upon Lydia; and the Aegaean sea on the W. It was subdivided into five parts: (1) Mysia Minor (Μ. ἡ μικρά), along the N. coast. (2) Mysia Major (Μ. ἡ μεγάλη), the SE. inland region, with a small portion of the coast between the Troad and the Aeolic settlements about the Elaïtic Gulf. (3) Troas (ἡ Τρωάς), the NW. angle, between the Aegaean and Hellespont and the S. coast along the foot of Ida. (4) Aeolis or Aeolia (ἡ Αἰολίς or Αἰολία), the S. part of the W. coast, around the Elaïtic Gulf, where the chief cities of the Aeolian confederacy were planted; but applied in a wider sense to the W. coast in general; and (5) Teuthrania (ἡ Τευθρανία), the SW. angle, between Temnus and the borders of Lydia, where, in very early times, Teuthras was said to have established a Mysian kingdom, which was early subdued by the kings of Lydia; this part was also called Pergamene, from the celebrated city of PERGAMUM, which stood in it (Strab. pp. 564, 615). This account applies to the time of the early Roman empire; the extent of Mysia, and its subdivisions, varied greatly at other times. In the heroic ages we find the great Teucrican monarchy of Troy in the NW. of the country, and the Phrygians along the Hellespont. For the probable origin of the Mysians see MYSI. The Mysia of the legends respecting Telephus is the Teuthranian kingdom in the S., only with a wider extent than the later Teuthrania (Strab. p. 615). Under the Persian empire, the NW. portion, which was still occupied in part by Phrygians, but chiefly by Aeolian settlements, was called Phrygia Minor, and by the Greeks HELLESPOINTUS. Mysia was the region S. of the chain of Ida, and both formed, with Lydia, the second satrapy (Hdt. iii. 90). In the division of the empire of Alexander the Great, Mysia fell, with Thrace, to the share of Lysimachus, B.C. 311, after whose defeat and death, in 281, it became a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom, with the exception of the SW. portion, where Philetaerus founded the kingdom of PERGAMUM (280), to which kingdom the whole of Mysia was assigned, together with Lydia, Phrygia, Caria, Lycia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia, after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamum, Mysia fell to the Romans in 133, by the bequest of Attalus III., and formed part of the province of Asia (Cic. pro Flac. 27, 65). Under the later empire, Mysia formed a separate proconsular province, under the name of Hellespontus. The country was for the most part mountainous; its chief chains being those of IDA, OLYMPUS, and TEMNUS, which are terminal branches of the NW. part of the Taurus chain, and the union of which forms the elevated land of SE. Mysia. Their prolongations into the sea form several important bays and capes: namely, among the former, the great gulf of Adramyttium (Adramytti), which cuts off Lesbos from the continent, and the Sinus Elaïticus (G. of Chandeli); and, among the latter, Sigeum (C. Yenicheri) and Lectum (G. Baba), at the NW. and SW. extremities of the Troad, and Cane (C. Coloni) and Hydria (Fokia), the N. and S. headlands of the Elaïtic Gulf. Its rivers are numerous—some of them considerable, in proportion to the size of the country; and some of first-rate importance in history and poetry: the chief of them, beginning on the E., were RHYNDACUS and MACESTUS, TARSIVS, AESEPVS, GRANICUS, RHODIVS, SIMOIS and SCAMANDER, SATNOÏS, EVENUS, and CAÏCUS. The peoples of the country, besides the general appellations mentioned above, were known by the following distinctive names: the Olympiëni or Olympëni (Ὀλυμπηνοί, Ολυπηνοί), in the district of Olympëne at the foot of M. Olympus; next to them, on the S. and W., and occupying the greater part of Mysia Proper, the Abrettëni, who had a native divinity called by the Greeks Zeus Ἀβρεττηνός (Strab. p. 574); the Trimenthuritæ, the Pentademitæ, and the Mysomacedones, all in the region of M. Temnus.

Mysiüs (Bergama), a tributary of the river Caïcus in Mysia, or rather the upper part of the Caïcus itself (Strab. p. 616).

Myson (Μύσων), of Chenae, is enumerated by Plato as one of the seven sages, in place of Pericander (Protog. p. 343).

Mystia, a town in the SE. of Bruttium, a little above the Prom. Cocintum.

Mýtîlênê or Mitýlênê (Μυτιλήνη, Μιτυλήνη :

the former is the ancient form, and the one usually found on coins and inscriptions; the latter is sometimes found on inscriptions, and is the commoner form in MSS.: Μυτιληναίος, Mitylenaeus; Mytilene or Metelin, the chief city of LESBOS, stood on the E. side of the island opposite the coast of Asia, upon a promontory which was once an island, and both sides of which formed excellent harbours. It was colonised by the first detachment of immigrants in the Aeolian migration from Greece, traditionally under Penthius, son of Orestes; but they are said to have dispossessed people who are called Pelasgians (Strab. pp. 440, 582, 617). Important hints respecting its political history are furnished by the fragments of the poetry of Alcaeus, whence (and from other sources) it seems that, after the rule and overthrow of a series of tyrants, the city was nearly ruined by the bitter hatred and conflicts of the factions of the nobles and the people, till Pittacus was appointed to a sort of dictatorship, and the nobles were expelled. [ALCAEUS; PITTACUS.] Meanwhile, the city had grown to great importance as a naval power, and had founded colonies on the coasts of Mysia and Thraee.

Coin of Mytilene.

Obv., female head, hair in sphendone; rev., lyre with MYTL.

At the beginning of the seventh century B.C., the possession of one of these colonies, Sigeum at the mouth of the Hellespont, was disputed in war between the Mitylenaeans and Athenians, and assigned to the latter by the award of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Among the other colonies of Mytilene, were Achilleum, Assos, Antandrus, &c. Mytilene submitted to the Persians after the conquest of Ionia and Aeolis, and furnished contingents to the expeditions of Cambyses against Egypt and of Darius against Scythia (Hdt. iv. 97). It was active in the Ionian revolt, after the failure of which it again became subject to Persia, and took part in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. After the Persian war it formed an alliance with Athens, and remained one of the most important members of the Athenian confederacy, retaining its independence till the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 428, when it headed a revolt of the greater part of Lesbos, the progress and suppression of which forms one of the most interesting episodes in the history of the Peloponnesian war. (Thuc. iii. 1-30; Diod. xii. 55.) This event destroyed the power of Mytilene. Its subsequent fortunes cannot be related in detail here. It fell under the power of the Romans after the Mithridatic war. Respecting its important position in Greek literary history see LESBOS.

Myttistratum. [AMESTRATUS.]

Myūs (Μυούς: Μυοόσιος: Palatia, Ru.), the least city of the Ionian confederacy, stood in Caria, on the S. side of the Maeander, thirty stadia from its mouth, and very near Miletus. Its original site was probably at the mouth of the river; but its site gradually became an unhealthy marsh; and by the time of Augustus it was so deserted by its inhabitants that the few who remained were reckoned as citizens of Miletus. (Strab. pp. 632, 636.)

N.

Naarmalcha or Nahrmalcha (Νααρμάλλχας, Ναρμάλλχας, i.e. the King's Canal: ὁ βασιλείος ποταμός, ἡ βασιλικὴ διώρυξ, flumen regium: Nahr-al-Malk or Ne Gruel Melek), the greatest of the canals connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris, was situated near the N. limit of Babylonia, a little S. of the Median Wall, in lat. 33° 5' about. Its formation was ascribed to a governor named Gobares. It was repaired upon the building of Seleucia at its junction with the Tigris by Seleucus Nicator, and again under the Roman emperors Trajan, Severus, and Julian. (Hdt. i. 193; Strab. p. 747; Plin. vi. 120.)

Nabalía or Navalía (Yssel), a river flowing into L. Flevo (Zuyder Zee). The conference of Civilis and Cerealis took place on the bridge over it. (Tac. Hist. v. 26; Ptol. ii. 11, 28.)

Nabarzānes (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian, conspired along with Bessus against Darius, the last king of Persia. He was pardoned by Alexander.

Nābātaei, Nābāthae (Ναβαταῖοι, Ναβάται: O. T. Nebaioth), an Arabian people, descended from the eldest son of Ishmaël, had their original abodes in the NW. part of the Arabian peninsula, E. and SE. of the Moabites and Edomites, who dwelt on the E. of the Dead Sea and in the mountains reaching from it to the Persian Gulf. In the changes effected among the peoples of these regions by the Babylonian conquest of Judaea, the Nabathaeans extended W. into the Sinaïtic peninsula and the territory of the Edomites, while the latter took possession of the S. of Judaea [IDUMÆI]; and hence the Nabathaeans of Greek and Roman history occupied nearly the whole of Arabia Petraea, along the NE. coast of the Red Sea, on both sides of the Aelanitic Gulf, and in the Idumaeon mountains (M. of Seir), where they had their celebrated rock-hewn capital, PETRA. At first they were a roving pastoral people; but, as their position gave them the command of the trade between Arabia and the W., they prosecuted that trade with great energy, establishing regular caravans between Leuce Come, a port of the Red Sea, in the NW. part of Arabia, and the port of Rhinocolura (El-Arish) on the Mediterranean, upon the frontiers of Palestine and Egypt. (Strab. pp. 760-779.) Sustained by this traffic, a powerful monarchy grew up, which resisted all the attacks of the Greek kings of Syria, and which, sometimes at least, extended its power as far N. as Syria. [ARETAS.] Under Augustus the Nabathaeans are found, as nominal subjects of the Roman empire, assisting Aelius Gallus in his expedition into Arabia Felix, through which, and through the journey of Athenodorus to Petra, Strabo derived important information (Strab. p. 780). Under Trajan the Nabathaeans were conquered by A. Cornelius Palma, and Arabia Petraea became a Roman province, A.D. 105-107 (Dio Cass. lix. 2). In the fourth century it was considered a part of Palestine, and formed the diocese of a metropolitan, whose see was at Petra. The Mohamedan conquest finally overthrew the power of the Nabathaeans, and their very name disappeared.

Nabis (Νάβις), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedaemon on the death of Machanidas, B. C. 207. He carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent. All persons possessed of property were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times; it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded (Pol. xiii. 7). The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains. With these forces he was able to extend his sway over a considerable part of Peloponnesus; but his further progress was checked by Flaminius, who after a short campaign compelled him to sue for peace (195). (Pol. xx. 13; Liv. xxxiv. 33-43.) The tyrant, however, was allowed to retain the sovereignty of Sparta, and soon after the departure of Flaminius from Greece, he resumed hostilities. He was opposed by Philopoemen, the general of the Achaean League, and was soon afterwards assassinated by some Aetolians sent to his assistance (192). (Liv. xxxv. 12-35; Paus. viii. 50.)

Nabonassar (Naβovάσσapoc), king of Babylon, whose accession to the throne was fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations. This is called the Era of Nabonassar, and was dated on the 26th of February, B. C. 747.

Nabrissa or Nebrissa, surnamed Veneria, a town of the Tardetani in Hispania Baetica, near the mouth of the BÆTIS.

Nacolia (Naκóλεια, or -ia, or Naκώλεια: Sidi-ghasi), a town of Phrygia Epictetus, on the W. bank of the river Thymbrins, between Dorylaeum and Cotyaeum, was the place where the emperor Valens defeated his rival Procopius, A. D. 366 (Strab. p. 576; Amm. Marc. xxvi. 6.)

Naevius, Cn., an ancient Roman poet, of whose life few particulars have been recorded. He was probably a native of Campania, and was born somewhere between B. C. 274 and 264. He appears to have come to Rome early, and he produced his first play in 235. He was attached to the plebeian party, and, with the licence of the Old Attic Comedy, he made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. He attacked Scipio and the Metelli, but he was indicted by Q. Metellus and thrown into prison, to which circumstance Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii. 2, 56). Whilst in prison he composed two plays, the Hariolus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. (Gell. iii. 3; Ascon. in Cic. Verr. i. 29.) His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. He retired to Utica, and it was here, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war; and here it is certain that he died, either in 204 or 202 (Cic. Brut. 15, 60; Euseb. Chron.).—Naevius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. Of his epic poem on the first Punic war a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the Saturnian metre, and was of the nature of a versified chronicle (Cic. de Sen. 14, 40; Suet. Gramm. 2). The poem appears to have opened with the story of Aeneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Romo. It was important as leading the way to Roman epic poetry, and was used both by Ennius and Virgil [see p. 24, b]. His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies, most of which were freely adapted from the Greek; but his efforts to start a national drama on Italian subjects (praetextae) was more important. Among these plays were Clastidium (on the victory of Marcellus, B. C. 222) and Romulus. Even in the Augustan age Naevius was still a favourite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry; and the lines of Horace (Ep. ii. 1, 53) show that his works, if not so much read as formerly, were still fresh in the memories of men. His epitaph, preserved by Gellius, expresses his feeling for national, as opposed to Greek, literature:—

‘Mortales immortales flere si foret fas,
Flerent Divae Camenae Naevium poetam.
Itaque postquam est Orcino traditus thesauro
Obliti sunt Romani loquirit Latina lingua.’

Fragments in Klussman, Jena, 1843; Vahlen, Lips. 1854; Ribbeck, Rom. Trag. 44.

Naevius Sertorius Macro. [MACRO.]

Naharvāli, a tribe of the Lygii in Germany, probably dwelt on the banks of the Vistula. In their country was a grove sacred to the worship of two divinities called Ales, whom Tacitus compares with Castor and Pollux (Germ. 43).

Nahrmalcha. [NAARMALCHA.]

Nāiādes. [NYMPHAE.]

Naisus, Naissus, or Naesus (Naϊσός, Naϊσσός, Naϊσσος: Nisch), an important town of Upper Moesia, situated on an E. tributary of the Mar-gus, and celebrated as the birthplace of Constantine the Great. It was enlarged and beautified by Constantine, was destroyed by Attila, but was rebuilt and fortified by Justinian.

Namnētae or Namnētes, a people on the W. coast of Gallia, on the N. bank of the Liger, which separated them from Aquitania. Their chief town was Condivincum, afterwards Namnetes (Nantes). (Caes. B. G. iii. 9; Strab. p. 190.)

Namūsa, Aufidius, a Roman jurist, one of the numerous pupils of Serv. Sulpicius.

Nantuātae or Nantuātes, a people in the SE. of Gallia Belgica, who lived on the Rhone valley a little above the beginning of the Lake of Geneva, i.e. between Villeneuve and Martigny. An inscription places them at S. Maurice. (Caes. B. G. iii. 1; Strab. p. 204.) The reading in Caes. B. G. iv. 10, which gives their name, is faulty.

Napaeae. [NYMPHAE.]

Napāris (Jalomitza), a northern tributary of the Danube.

Napāta (Nάπατα: prob. El-Kab, Ru., at the great bend of the Nile to the SW., between the fourth and fifth cataracts), the capital of an Aethiopian kingdom N. of that of Meroë, was the southernmost point reached by Petronius, under Augustus (Strab. p. 820).

Napōca or Napūca (Napocensis or Napucensis; Clausenberg), a Roman colony in Dacia, on the high road between Patavissa and Optatiana (C. I. L. iii. 860, 865).

Nār (Nera), a river in central Italy, rises in M. Fiscellus, on the frontiers of Umbria and Picenum, flows in a south-westerly direction, forming the boundary between Umbria and the land of the Sabini, and after receiving the Velinus (Velino) and Tolenus (Turano), and passing by Interamna and Narnia, falls into the Tiber, not far from Oriculum (Strab. p. 227; Tac. Ann. i. 79). It was celebrated for its sulphureous waters and white colour (sulphurea Nār albus aqua, Virg. Aen. vii. 517).

Naraggāra (Ναράγα: Kassir Jebir, Ru.), one of the most important inland cities of Numidia, between Thagura and Sicca Venerca, was the scene of Scipio's interview with Hannibal before the battle of Zama (Liv. xxx. 29).

Narbo Martius, at a later time Narbōna (Narbonensis: Narbonne), a town in the south of Gaul and the capital of the Roman province of Gallia Narbonensis, was situated on the river Atax (Aude), also called Narbo, and at the head of the lake Rubresus or Rubrensis (also called Narbonitis), which was connected with the sea by a canal. By this means the town, which was twelve miles from the coast, became a seaport. It was made a Roman colony in the consulship of Q. Marcius Rex, B. C. 218, and was the first colony founded by the Romans in Gaul. The actual founder was L. Licinius Crassus. (Vell. Pat. i. 15; Cic. pro Font. 5, 13, Brut. 43, 160.) Julius Caesar also settled here the veterans of his tenth legion, whence it received the name of Colonia Decumanorum (Suet. Tib. 4). It was a handsome and populous town, the residence of the Roman governor of the province, and a place of great commercial importance. The tin from the N. of Spain and from Britain was brought overland to Narbo as well as to Massilia (Diod. v. 38).

Narbonensis Gallia. [GALLIA.]

Narcissus (Νάρκισσος). 1. A beautiful youth, son of the river god Cephissus and the nymph Liriope of Thespieæ. He was wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love; and the nymph Echo, who was enamoured of him, died of grief. [Echo.] One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to fall in love with his own image reflected in a fountain. But as he could not approach it, he gradually pined away, and was changed into the flower which bears his name. (Ov. Met. iii. 341-510.) This is the most poetical version of the story. Conon (Narrat. 24) makes Narcissus merely a hard-hearted lover who is driven by the gods to suicide, and from whose blood sprang up the flower. Pausanias (ix. 31), giving the more usual version, adds the rationalising account that Narcissus fell in love with his twin sister. It is easy to see how myths could arise in many countries of love inspired by a reflected image and of the reflected image (as in other popular superstitions) being the presage of death. The narcissus flower was probably connected with the myth of the youth who thus wasted away, because it was the symbol of early death as being the flower gathered by Persephone before she was carried off by Hades, and hence sacred to Demeter and Kore (Hymn. ad Cer. 15; Soph. O. C. 682; Paus. ix. 31, 6). Possibly also, as some have thought, a narcotic fragrance perceived in the flower contributed to form the idea.—2. A freedman and secretary of the emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He long connived at the irregularities of Messalina; but fearing that the empress meditated his death, he betrayed to Claudius her marriage with C. Silius, and obtained the order for her execution, A. D. 48. After the murder of Claudius, Narcissus was put to death by command of Agrippina, 54. He had amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, it is said, to 400,000,000 sesterces, equivalent to 3,125,000*l.* of our money. (Tac. Ann. xi. 30-65, xiii. 1; Dio Cass. lx. 15-34 Juv. xiv. 329.)—3. A celebrated athlete, who strangled the emperor Commodus, 192. He was afterwards exposed to the lions by the emperor Severus. (Dio Cass. lxxii. 22, lxxiii. 16.)

Narisci or Varisci, a small but brave people in the S. of Germany, of the Suevic race, dwelt W. of the Marcomanni and E. of the Hermunduri, and extended from the Sudeti Montes on the N. to the Danube on the S., thus inhabiting part of the Upper Palatinate and the Fichtelgebirge (Tac. Germ. 42; Dio Cass. lxxi. 21).

Narmalcha. [NAARMALCHA.]

Narniā (Narniensis: Narni), a town in Umbria, situated on a lofty hill, on the S. bank of the river Nar, originally called Nequinum, was made a Roman colony B. C. 299, when its name was changed into Narnia, after the river (Liv. x. 9; Plin. iii. 113). This town was strongly fortified by nature, being accessible only on the E. and W. sides. On the W. side it could only be approached by a very lofty bridge which Augustus built over the river. (Mart. vii. 93; Procop. B. G. i. 17.)

Naro, sometimes Nar (Narenta), a river in Dalmatia, which rises in M. Albius, and falls into the Adriatic sea (Ptol. ii. 16, 5).

Narōna, a Roman colony in Dalmatia, situated on the river Nar, on the road to Dyrrhachium (Cic. ad Fam. v. 9, 10; Ptol. ii. 17, 12, viii. 7, 8).

Narses, king of Persia. [SASSANIDÆ.]

Narses (Ναρσῆς), a celebrated general and statesman in the reign of Justinian, was a eunuch. He put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy by two brilliant campaigns, A. D. 552, 553, and annexed Italy again to the Byzantine empire. He was rewarded by Justinian with the government of the country, which he held for many years. He was deprived of this office by Justin, the successor of Justinian, whereupon he invited the Lombards to invade Italy. His invitation was eagerly accepted by their king Alboin; but it is said that Narses soon after repented of his conduct, and died of grief at Rome shortly after the Lombards had crossed the Alps (568). Narses was 95 years of age at the time of his death (Procop. B. G. ii. 13, iii. iv.).

Narthacium (Ναρθάκιον), a town in Thessaly, on M. Narthacius, SW. of Pharsalus (Xen. Hell. iv. 3; Ptol. iii. 13, 46).

Naryx, also Narÿcus or Narÿcium (Νάρÿξ, Νάρÿκος, Ναρÿκιον: Ναρÿκιος, Ναρÿκαῖος: Talanda or Talanti), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the Euboean sea, the reputed birthplace of Ajax, son of Oïleus, who is hence called Narycius heros (Strab. p. 425; Ov. Met. xiv. 468). Since Locri Epizephyrii in the S. of Italy claimed to be a colony from Naryx in Greece, the town of Locri is called Narycia by the poets, and the pitch of Bruttium Narycia (Verg. Aen. iii. 399, Georg. ii. 438; Plin. xiv. 127, 128).

Nāsāmōnes (Νασαμῶνες), a powerful but savage Libyan people, who dwelt originally on the shores of the Great Syrtis, but were driven inland by the Greek settlers of Cyrenaica, and afterwards by the Romans. An interesting account of their manners and customs, especially of their ancestor-worship, is given by Herodotus (iv. 172), who also tells (ii. 82) a curious story respecting an expedition beyond the Libyan Desert, undertaken by five Nasamonian youths who reached a large river, possibly the Niger, and a country of dwarfs. [NIGER.]

Nasica, Scipio. [SCIPIO.]

Nāsidiēnus, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Maecenas which Horace ridicules in the eighth Satire of his second book. It appears from v. 58, that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidienus.

Nāsidius, Q. or L., was sent by Pompey, in B.C. 49, with a fleet of sixteen ships to relieve Massilia, when it was besieged by D. Brutus (Caes. B. C. ii. 3-7). He was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. He served in Sicily under Sex. Pompey, whom he deserted in 35. He joined Antony, and commanded part of his fleet in the war with Octavian, 31 (App. B. C. v. 139; Dio Cass. l. 13).

Nāso, Ovidius. [OVIDIUS.]

Nasus or Nesus. [OENIADAE.]

Natiso (Natisone), a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, flowing by Aquileia, and falling into the Sinus Tergestinus (Strab. p. 214; Plin. iii. 126).

Natta or Nacca, 'a fuller,' the name of a family of the Pinaris gens (Cic. Div. i. 12, ii. 20).

Naurātes (Ναυκράτης), of Erythrae, a Greek rhetorician, and a pupil of Isocrates, is one of the orators who competed (B.C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus (Gell. x. 68).

Naurātis (Ναυκράτις: Ναυκρατίτης: Nebireh, Rn.), a city in the Delta of Egypt, in the Nomus of Saïs, near the W. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, which was hence called also Nauraticum Ostium (Hdt. ii. 97, 179; Ptol. iv. 5, 9; Plin. v. 61; Strab. pp. 801, 803, 808). Strabo probably meant (p. 803) that it lay on the E. side of the canal by which it was reached. It was a colony of the Milesians, and remained a pure Greek city, where Greeks were permitted to settle and trade. Nauratis was probably founded early in the seventh century B.C. From Herodotus it appears to have been in existence before the time of Amasis. Its importance was much lessened by the foundation of Alexandria, though Ptolemy Philadelphus added to its buildings and fortifications. Under the Roman empire it fell into decay, and was revived before the end of the third century. All its remains belong to an earlier date. It was the birthplace of Athenaeus and Julius Pollux.—The site of Nauratis was excavated by Mr. Petrie in 1886, 1888, with important results to archaeology and to the history of Greek life in Egypt. The temples of Apollo and of the Dioscuri were identified, but the most remarkable building was the Hellenion (cf. Hdt. ii. 178), which served alike as a fortified storehouse and factory and as a place of refuge for the Greeks in Egypt in times of danger. The enclosure measured 870 feet by 746, with walls 50 feet thick, and had within it two large buildings, one of them fitted to hold stores and serve as a keep or stronghold in extremity. A great number of Greek works in scarabs, in pottery, and in statuettes has been found in these excavations.

Naucydes (Ναυκύδης), an Argive sculptor, son of Mothon, and brother and teacher of Polyclethus II. of Argos, flourished B.C. 420 (Paus. ii. 22).

Naulochus (Ναυλόχος), that is, a place where ships can anchor. 1. A naval station on the E. part of the N. coast of Sicily between Mylae and the promontory Pelorus (Suet. Aug. 16; App. B. C. v. 116).—2. A small island off Crete, near the promontory Sammonium.—3. A naval station belonging to Mesembria in Thrace.

Naumachius (Ναυμάχιος), a bucolic poet, of uncertain date, some of whose verses are preserved by Stobaeus.

Naupactus (Ναύπακτος: Ναυπάκτιος: Le-panto), an ancient and strongly fortified town of the Locri Ozolae near the promontory Antirrhium, possessing the largest and best harbour on the whole of the N. coast of the Corinthian gulf. It is said to have derived its name from the Heraclidae having here built the fleet with which they crossed over to the Peloponnesus (Strab. p. 428; Paus. x. 38, 10). After the Persian wars it fell into the power of the Athenians, who settled here the Messenians who had been compelled to leave their country at the end of the third Messenian war, B.C. 455; and during the Peloponnesian war it was the headquarters of the Athenians in all their operations against the W. of Greece (Thuc. i. 103, ii. 83). At the end of the Peloponnesian war the Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus, which passed into the hands first of the Locrians and afterwards of the Achaeans. It was given by Philip with the greater part of the Locrian territory to Aetolia, but it was again assigned to Locris by the Romans. (Liv. xxxvi. 30; Ptol. iii. 15, 3.)

Nauplia (Ναυπλία: Ναυπλιεύς: Nauplia), the port of Argos, situated on the Saronic gulf, was never a place of importance in antiquity, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. The inhabitants had been expelled by the Argives as early as the second Messenian war on suspicion of favouring the Spartans, who in consequence settled them at Methoue in Messenia. (Paus. ii. 38, iv. 35; Strab. p. 368.) At the present day Nauplia is a flourishing seaport.

Nauplius (Ναύπλιος). 1. Of Argos, son of Poseidon and Amyone, a famous navigator, and the founder of the town of Nauplia (Paus. ii. 38, 2).—2. Son of Clytoneus, was one of the Argonauts and a descendant of the preceding (Ap. Rh. i. 134).—3. King of Euboea, and father of Palamedes, Oeax, and Nausimedon, by Clymene. Catrens had given his daughter Clymene and her sister Aërope to Nauplius, to be carried to a foreign land; but Nauplius married Clymene, and gave Aërope to Plisthenes, who became by her (according to some accounts) the father of Agamemnon and Menelans. His son Palamedes had been condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy; and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and as they approached the coast of Euboea he lighted torches on the dangerous promontory of Capharens. The sailors thus misguided suffered shipwreck and perished in the sea or by the sword of Nauplius. (Apollod.

ii. 1, 4; iii. 2, 2; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 384; Hyg. Fab. 116.)

Nauportus (Ober or Upper Laibach), an ancient and important commercial town of the Taurisci, situated on the river Nauportus (Laibach), a tributary of the Savus, in Pannonia Superior. The town fell into decay after the foundation of Aemona (Laibach), which was only fifteen miles from it. The name of Nauportus is said to have been derived from the Argonauts having sailed up the Danube and the Savus to this place and here built the town; and it is added that they afterwards carried their ships across the Alps to the Adriatic sea, where they again embarked. (Strab. pp. 207, 314; Tac. Ann. i. 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 110.)

Nausicāa (Ναυσικάα), daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, and Arete, who conducted Ulysses to the court of her father, when he was shipwrecked on the coast (Od. vi. 16).

Nausithōus (Ναυσιθόος), son of Alcinous and Periboea, the daughter of Eurymedon, was the father of Alcinous and Rhexenor, and king of the Phaeacians, whom he led from Hyperia in Thrinacia to the island of Scheria, to escape from the Cyclopes (Od. vi. 7, vii. 56, viii. 564).

Nautāca (Ναύτακα: Nakshab or Keshi), a city of Sogdiana, near the Oxus, towards the E. part of its course (Arrian, An. iii. 28).

Nautes. [NAUTIA GENS.]

Nautia Gens, an ancient patrician gens, claimed descent from Nautes, a companion of Aeneas, who brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. The Nautii, all of whom were surnamed Rutili, frequently held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic, but, like many of the other ancient gentes, they disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars. (Verg. Aen. v. 704; Dionys. vi. 4.)

Nāva (Nāhe), a W. tributary of the Rhine in Gaul, which falls into the Rhine at Bingen.

Navalia. [NABALLA.]

Navius, Attus, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navius, because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices. The tale then goes on to say that Tarquinius thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of could be done, and that when Navius, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. Navius immediately cut it. His statue was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. (Liv. i. 36; Dionys. iii. 70 Cic. Div. i. 17, N. D. ii. 3.)

Naxos (Νάξος: Náxiος). 1. (Naxia), an island in the Aegean sea, and the largest of the Cyclades, is situated nearly half way between the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor. It is about eighteen miles in length and twelve in breadth. It was very fertile in antiquity, as it is in the present day, producing an abundance of corn, wine, oil, and fruit. It was especially celebrated for its wine, and hence plays a prominent part in the legends about Dionysus. Here the god is said to have found Ariadne after she had been deserted by Theseus. [DIONYSUS.] The marble of the island was also much prized, and was considered equal to the Parian.—Naxos is frequently called Dia (Δία) by the poets, which is said to have been the old name of the island (Ov. Met. iii. 690). It was likewise called Strongyle (Στρογγύλη) on account of its round shape, and Dionysias (Διονυσιάς) from its connexion with the worship of Dionysus (Diod. v. 50). It is said to have been originally inhabited by Thracians and then by Carians, and to have derived its name from a Carian chief, Naxos. In the historical age it was inhabited by Ionians who had emigrated from Athens (Hdt. viii. 46). Naxos was conquered by Pisistratus, who established Lygdamis as tyrant of the island about B. C. 540 (Hdt. i. 61, 64). The Persians in 501 attempted, at the suggestion of Aristagoras, to subdue Naxos; and upon the failure of their attempt, Aristagoras, fearing punishment, induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. In 490 the Persians, under Datis and Artaphernes, conquered Naxos, and reduced the inhabitants to slavery (Hdt. v. 30). The Naxians recovered their independence after the battle of Salamis (480). They were the first of the allied states whom the Athenians reduced to subjection (471), after which they are rarely mentioned in history (Thuc. i. 98, 137; Pans. i. 27, 6). The chief town of the island was also called Naxos; and we also have mention of the small towns of Tragaea and Lestadae.—2. A Greek city on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Mt. Taurus, was founded B. C. 785 by the Chalcidians of Euboea, and was the first Greek colony established in the island (Thuc. vi. 3; Strab. p. 267; Diod. xiv. 88). It grew so rapidly in power that in only five or six years after its foundation it sent colonies to Catania and Leontini. It was for a time subject to Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, and afterwards to Hiero of Syracuse (Hdt. vii. 154; Diod. xi. 49); but it soon recovered its independence, carried on a successful war against Messana, and was subsequently an ally of the Athenians against Syracuse. In 403 the town was taken by Dionysius of Syracuse and destroyed. Nearly fifty years afterwards (358) the remains of the Naxians scattered over Sicily were collected by Andromachus, and a new city was founded on Mt. Taurns, called TAUROMENIUM.

Naxuāna (Ναξουάνα: Nakshivan), a city of Armenia Major, on the Araxes (Ptol. v. 13, 12).

Nāzārēth, Nāzārā (Ναζαρέθ, or -έρ, or -d: Ναζαράϊος, Ναζωράϊος, Nazarēnus, Nazarēus: en-Nasirah), a city of Palestine, in Galilee, S. of Cana, on a hill N. of the plain of Esdraëlön. [See Dict. of Bible.]

Nazianzus (Ναζιανζός: Ναζιανζηνός: Nenizi), a city of Cappadocia, on the road from Archelaüs to Mazara, celebrated as the diocese of the Father of the Church, Gregory Nazianzen.

Neæra (Νέαира), the name of several nymphs and maidens mentioned by the poets.

Neæthus (Νέαθος: Nicto), a river in Brutium in the S. of Italy, falling into the Tarentine gulf a little N. of Croton. Here the captive Trojan women are said to have burned the ships of the Greeks. (Strab. p. 262.)

Nealces (Νεάλλης), a painter who flourished in the time of Aratus, B.C. 245 (Plut. Arat. 13; Plin. xxxv. 142).

Neandria (Νεάνδρεια: Νεανδρείς, pl.), a town of the Troad, on the Hellespont, probably an Aeolian colony. By the time of Augustus it had disappeared. (Strab. pp. 604, 606.)

Neanthes (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicum, lived about B.C. 241, was a disciple of the Milesian Philiscus, who had been a disciple of Isocrates. He was a voluminous writer, principally of history. (C. Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc.)

Neapōlis (Νεάπολις: Νεαπολίτης, Neapolitanus). I. In Europe. 1. (Napoli or Naples), a city in Campania in Italy, on the W. slope of Mt. Vesuvius and on the river Sebethus, was founded by the Chalcidians of Cumæ, on the site of an ancient place called Parthênōpē (Παρθενόπη), after the Siren of that name. Hence we find the town called Parthenope by Virgil and Ovid (Georg. iv. 564; Met. xv. 711). The year of the foundation of Neapolis is not recorded. It was called the 'New City,' according to Strabo, because it afterwards received additional Chalcidian and Athenian colonists (Strab. p. 246). It is likely that Palæopolis mentioned by Livy (viii. 22) was the old quarter, also called Parthenope, and the original settlement, and that was afterwards superseded in importance by the more recent settlement. It is conjectured with probability that the site of the first settlement, Palæopolis or Parthenope, was on the hill of Pausilypus (Posilippo). The new town was close to the river Sebethus, and occupied the site of the eastern part of Naples. In B.C. 327 the town was taken by the Samnites, and in 290 it passed into the hands of the Romans, who allowed it, however, to retain its Greek constitution. At a later period it became a municipium (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 30), and under the empire, before the time of Claudius, a colony (Petron. 44, 76). Under the Romans the two quarters of the city were united, and the name of Palæopolis disappeared. It continued to be a prosperous and flourishing place till the time of the empire; and its beautiful scenery, and the luxurious life of its Greek population, made it a favourite residence with many of the Romans. In the reign of Titus the city was destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by this emperor in the Roman style. The ancient city extended further E. than the modern city; but the modern city, on the other hand, extends further N. and W. than the ancient one, since the island of Megaris, on which the Castel del Ovo now stands, was situated in ancient times between the hill of Pausilypus and Neapolis. In the neighbourhood of Neapolis there were warm baths, the celebrated villa of Lucullus, and the Villa Pausilypi or Pausilypum, bequeathed by Vedius Pollio to Augustus, which has given its name to the celebrated grotto of Posilippo between Naples and Pozzuoli, at the entrance of which the tomb of Virgil is still shown. [PAUSILYPUS].—2. A part of Syracuse. [SYRACUSAE].—3. (Napoli), a town on the W. coast of the island of Sardinia, celebrated for its warm baths (Ptol. iii. 3, 7).—4. (Kavallo), a seaport town in Thrace, subsequently Macedonia Adjacta, on the Strymonic gulf, between the Strymon and Nessus (Strab. p. 330).—II. In Asia and Africa. 1. (Scala Nuova, or near it), a small Ionian city on the coast of Lydia, N. of Mycale and SW. of Ephesus. The Ephesians, to whom it at first belonged, exchanged it with the Samians for MARATHESUM.—2, 3. Two towns of Caria, the one near Harpasa, the other on the coast, perhaps the new town of Myndus.—4. (Tutinek ? Ru.), in Pisidia, S. of Antioch; afterwards reckoned to Galatia.—5. In Palestine, the Sychem or Sychar of Scripture (Συχέμ, Συχάρ, Σικίμα, Joseph.: Nablous), one of the most ancient cities of Samaria, stood in the narrow valley between Mts. Ebal and Gerizim, and was the religious capital of the Samaritans, whose temple was built upon Mt. Gerizim. This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 129. Its full name, under the Romans, was Flavia Neapolis. It was the birthplace of Justin Martyr.—6. A small town of Babylonia, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, opposite to the opening of the King's Canal.—7. In Egypt. [CAENE].—8. In N. Africa, on the W. coast of the Great Syrtis, by some identified with Leptis Magna, by others with the modern Tripoli.—9. (Nabal), a Phoenician colony, on the E. coast of Zeugitana, near the N. extremity of the great gulf which was called after it Sinus Neapolitanus (Gulf of Hammanet). Under the Romans it was a libera civitas, and, according to Ptolemy, a colony. (Ptol. iv. 3, 11.)

Nearchus (Νέαρχος), a distinguished friend and officer of Alexander, was a native of Crete, but settled at Amphipolis (Arrian, Ind. 18; Diod. xix. 19). He was banished by Philip for participating in the intrigues of Alexander. After the death of Philip he was recalled, and treated with the utmost distinction by Alexander. He accompanied the king to Asia; and in B.C. 325 he was entrusted by Alexander with the command of the fleet which he had caused to be constructed on the Hydaspes. Upon reaching the month of the Indus, Alexander sent round his ships by sea from thence to the Persian gulf, under the command of Nearchus, who set out on the 21st of September, 326, and arrived at Susa in safety in February, 325. (Arrian, Ind. 19–42, Anab. vii. 4, 5; Strab. pp. 721, 725; Plut. Alex. 68.) He was rewarded with a crown of gold for his distinguished services, and at the same time obtained in marriage a daughter of the Rhodian Mentor and of Barsine, to whom Alexander himself had been previously married. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander, he received the government of Lycia and Pamphylia, which he held as subordinate to Antigonus. (Just. xiii. 4; Diod. l. c.)—Nearchus left a history of the voyage, the substance of which has been preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his Indica.

Nebo, a mountain of Palestine, on the E. side of the Jordan, opposite to Jericho. [Diet. of the Bible.]

Nebrōdes Montes (Monte di Madonna), a chain of mountains in Sicily, running through the island, and a continuation of the Apennines (Strab. p. 274; Sil. It. xiv. 236).

Necessitas, called Anankē (Ἀνάγκη) by the Greeks, is not personified by Homer, but appears subsequently as a powerful goddess, whom not even the gods could resist (Plat. Symp. p. 195, Rep. x. p. 616). On the Acrocorinthus there was a temple of Ἀνάγκη and Βία, which no one could enter (Paus. ii. 4, 6). In Horace sæva Necessitas precedes Fortuna, carrying in her brazen hand nails with which she fixes the decrees of fate (Od. i. 35, 17, iii. 24, 5).

Necessitas. (Causesi, Museum Romanum, vol. i. tav. 28.)

Neco or Necho (Νεκός, Νέχως, Νεκαίς, Νεχάω, Νεχάω), the Egyptian Neku. 1. Son of Tefnekt, was defeated and imprisoned by Sardanapalus, but afterwards released and made king of Sais and Memphis. According to Hdt. ii. 152, he was put to death by Sabacon. He was grandfather of Psammetichus = Psamthek I. (Herodotus represents him as father of Psammetichus.)—2. Son of Psammetichus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B.C. 612. His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise. He began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian gulf, which had been projected before by Seti I. and Ramses II.; but he desisted from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. It started from the Pelusiac branch, a little north of Bubastis, and went towards the gulf of Suez. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phoenicians in his service, who set sail from the Arabian gulf and accomplished the voyage in somewhat more than two years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Magdulus (Megiddo) by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians and took Carchemish or Circesium, where he appears to have established a garrison. After the battle at Megiddo, he took the town of Cadytis, probably Jerusalem. In 606 Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, and would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. In 596 Necho died, and was succeeded by his son Psammis or Psammuthis = Psamthek II. (Hdt. ii. 158, iv. 42; Diod. i. 33; Strab. p. 804.)

Nectanābis, Nectanēbus, or Nectanēbes (Νεκτάναβις, Νεκτάνεβος, Νεκτανέβης = Nekht-Hor-Heb). 1. King of Egypt, the first of the three sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nepherites on the throne about B.C. 378, and in the following year successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Iphicrates, having won a victory near Mendes (Diod. xv. 41–43; Nep. Iph. 2). He died after a reign of fourteen years, and was succeeded by Tachos.—2. = Nekht-Neb-Ef. The nephew of Tachos, deprived the latter of the sovereignty in 361, with the assistance of Agesilaus. For some time he defeated all the attempts of Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) to recover Egypt, but he was at length defeated himself, and despairing of making any further resistance, he fled into Aethiopia, 350. Nectanabis was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt. (Plut. Ages. 37–40; Diod. xv. 92; Paus. iii. 10; Athen. pp. 150, 616.)

Nēda (Nēda: Buzi), a river in Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia in Mt. Cerausion, a branch of Mt. Lycaeus, and falls into the Ionian sea after forming the boundary between Arcadia and Messenia, and between Messenia and Elis (Strab. p. 344; Paus. iv. 20, 1).

Negra or Negrana (τὰ Νέγαρα: El-Nokra, N. of Mareb), a city of Arabia Felix, destroyed by Aelius Gallus (Strab. p. 781).

Nēleus (Νηλεύς). 1. Son of Tyro, the daughter of Salmones. Poseidon once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus (Od. xi. 234–255). To conceal her shame she exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learnt their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, excluding Aeson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. But Pelias soon afterwards expelled his brother, and thus became sole king. (Apollod. i. 9, 8; Diod. iv. 68.) Thereupon Neleus went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him, and of which he thus became king. Several towns of this name claimed the honour of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia; the first of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connexion with Neleus and Nestor [PYLOS, No. 1.] Neleus was married to Chloris, a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, according to Homer, and a Theban woman according to others. By her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Perielymenus, and Pero. He had in all twelve sons (Il. xi. 692; Od. l. c.). When Heracles had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to grant the request. In order to take vengeance, Heracles afterwards marched against Pylos, and slew all the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor: some later writers add that Neleus himself was also killed. (Il. xi. 690; Hyg. Fab. 10; Apollod. ii. 6, 2.) Neleus was now attacked, and his dominions plundered by Augeas, king of the Epeans: but the attacks of the latter were repelled by Nestor. The descendants of Neleus, the Nelidae, were eventually expelled from their kingdom by the Heracleidae, and migrated for the most part to Athens.—2. The younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favour of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Aepytus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who reinforced the inhabitants of Iasus, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians (Hdt. ix. 97; Paus. vii. 2, 1).—3. Of Scepsis, the son of Coriscus, was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library, and appointed him one of his executors. The history of the writings of Aristotle as connected with Neleus and his heirs is related on p. 119, a.

Nēlides, Nēlēiādes, and Nēlēius (Νηλείδης, Νηληιάδης, Νηληΐος), patronymics of Neleus, by which either Nestor, the son of Neleus, or Antilochus, his grandson, is designated.

Nemausus (Nemausensis: Nismes), one of the most important towns of Gallia Narboensis, was the capital of the Arecomici and a Roman colony. It was situated inland E. of the Rhone on the high road from Italy to Spain, and on the S. slope of M. Cevenna. (Strab. p. 186; Ptol. ii. 10, 10; Plin. iii. 87.) It was celebrated as the place from which the family of the Antonines came. Though rarely mentioned by ancient writers, the Roman remains at Nismes, which are some of the most perfect N. of the Alps, prove that the ancient Nemausus

Nēmēa (Νεμέα, Ion. Νεμῆν) a valley in Argolis between Cleonae and Phlius, celebrated in mythical story as the place where Heracles slew the Nemean lion. [See p. 396.] In this valley there was a temple of Zeus Nemēus surrounded by a sacred grove, in which the Nemean games were celebrated every other year. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Nemea.)

Nemesiānus, M. Aurelius Olympius, a Roman poet, probably a native of Africa, flourished at the court of the emperor Carus (A.D. 283), carried off the prize in all the poetical contests of the day, and was judged second to the youthful prince Numerianus alone, who contended with him (Vopisc. Car. 11, 2). Nemesianus was the author of poems upon fishing, hunting, and aquatics; all of which have perished, with the exception of a fragment of the Cynegetica (extending to 325 hexameter lines), which, in so far as neatness and purity of expression are concerned, in some degree justifies the admiration of his contemporaries. Edited, with the poem of Grattius, by Stern, 1832, and in Bahrens, Poët. Lat. Min. 1879.

Nēmēsis (Νέμεσις), a Greek goddess, is most commonly described as a daughter of Night, though some call her a daughter of Erebus or of Oceanus (Hes. Th. 223). She is a personification of the moral reverence for law, of the natural fear of committing a culpable action, and hence of conscience (Il. xiii. 121). In later writers, as Herodotus and Pindar, Nemesis measures out happiness and unhappiness to mortals; and he who is blessed with too many or too frequent gifts of fortune, is visited by her with losses and sufferings, in order that he may become humble. This notion arose from a belief that the gods were envious of excessive human happiness. (Hdt. i. 34; iii. 40; Pind. Ol. viii. 86, x. 44.)

Nemesis and Elpis. (From the Chigi Vase.)

Nemesis was thus a check upon extravagant favours conferred upon man by Tyche or Fortune; and from this idea lastly arose that of her being an avenging and punishing fate, who, like Justice (Dike) and the Erinnyes, sooner or later overtakes the reckless sinner. She is frequently mentioned under the surnames Adrastia [ADRASTIA, No. 2] and Rhamnusia or Rhamnusia, the latter of which she derived from the town of Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated sanctuary. For the tradition that Zeus begot by Nemesis at Rhamnus an egg from which Helena and the Dioscuri sprang see p. 388, a.

Nēmēsīus (Νεμεσιος), the author of a Greek treatise On the Nature of Man, bishop of Emesa, in Syria, probably lived at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century after Christ. Edited by Matthaei, Halae, 1802.

Nenia (less correctly Naenia), i.e. a dirge or lamentation, chaunted at funerals, was personified at Rome and worshipped as a goddess. She had a chapel outside the walls of the city, near the Porta Viminalis. [INDIGETES, p. 443, b.]

Nēobūlē. [ARCHILOCHUS.]

Neōcaesariē (Νεοκαισαρεία: Neokaisareús, Neocaesariensis: Niksar), the capital, under the Roman empire, of Pontus Polemoniacus, in Asia Minor, stood on the river Lycus, sixty-three Roman miles E. of Amasia (Plin. vi. 8).

Nēōn (Νέων: Neónios, Neonaios: Velitza), an ancient town in Phocis at the E. foot of Mt. Tithorea, a branch of Mt. Parnassus, was eighty stadia from Delphi across the mountains. Neon was destroyed by the Persians under Xerxes, but was subsequently rebuilt and named Tithōrēa (Τιθορέα: Tithoreús) after the mountain on which it was situated. (Hdt. viii. 33; Strab. p. 439.) It was destroyed in the Sacred war, and was rebuilt, but remained an unimportant though fortified place (Paus. x. 2, 4).

Neontichos (Νέον τεῖχος, i.e. New Wall). 1. (Ainadsjik), one of the twelve cities of Aeolis, on the coast of Mysia, in Asia Minor, stood on the N. side of the Hormus, on the slope of M. Sardene, 30 stadia from Larissa (Hdt. i. 149; Strab. p. 621).—2. A fort on the coast of Thrace, near the Chersonesus (Xen. An. vii. 5, 8).

Neoptólēmus (Νεοπτόλεμος). 1. Also called

Pyrrhus, son of Achilles and Deidamīa, the daughter of Lycomedes (Od. xi. 491; Apollod. iii. 13, 8); according to some he was a son of Achilles and Iphigenia, and after the sacrifice of his mother was carried by his father to the island of Seyros (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 133). The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lycomedes because he had fair (πυρρός) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha (Paus. x. 26; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 469). He was called Neoptolemus—that is, young or late warrior—either because he had fought in early youth or because he had come late to Troy. From his father he is sometimes called Achillides, and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelides and Aeacides. Neoptolemus was brought up in Seyros in the palace of Lycomedes, and was fetched from thence by Ulysses to join the Greeks in the war against Troy, because it had been prophesied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philoctetes were necessary for the capture of Troy (Soph. Phil. 115). At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself worthy of his great father. He was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse (Od. xi. 508–521). At the capture of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Zeus, and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father (Eur. Hee. 523; Verg. Aen. ii. 527). When the Trojan captives were distributed among the conquerors, Andromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus, and Amphialus (Paus. i. 11, 1). Respecting his return from Troy and the subsequent events of his life the traditions differ. It is related that Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned by Helenus of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. According to Homer, Neoptolemus lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, and here he married Hermione, whom her father Menelaus sent to him from Sparta (Od. iv. 5). According to others, Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Orestes (Paus. iii. 25, 26). Most writers relate that he abandoned his native kingdom of Phthia, and settled in Epirus, where he became the ancestor of the Molossian kings (Paus. i. 11; Verg. Aen. iii. 333; cf. Pind. Nem. iv. 51). Shortly after his marriage with Hermione, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, where he was murdered; but the reason of his visiting Delphi as well as the person by whom he was slain are differently related. Some say he went to plunder the temple of Apollo; others, to present part of the Trojan booty as an offering to the god; and others again, to consult the god about the means of obtaining children by Hermione. Some relate that he was slain at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione; and others, by the priest of the temple, or by Machaoreus, the son of Daetas. His body was buried at Delphi; and he was worshipped there as a hero (Paus. x. 24, 5).—2. I., King of Epirus, was son of Alcetas I., and father of Alexander I., and of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Neoptolemus reigned in conjunction with his brother Arymbas or Arybas till his death, about B.C. 360 (Paus. i. 11).—3. II., King of Epirus, son of Alexander I., and grandson of the preceding. At his father's death in 326, he was probably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favour of Aeacides. It was not till 302 that the Epirots, taking advantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Aeacides, rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of six years, but was obliged to share the throne with Pyrrhus in 296. He was shortly afterwards assassinated by Pyrrhus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4, 5.)—4. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, after whose death he obtained the government of Armenia. In 321 he revolted from Perdicas, and joined Craterus, but he was defeated by Eumenes, and was slain in battle by the hands of the latter. (Arrian, An. ii. 27; Plut. Eum. 4-7.)—5. A general of Mithridates (App. Mithr. 17).

Nēpete, Nepe, or Nepet (Nepesinus: Nepē), an ancient town of Etruria, but not one of the twelve cities, was situated near the Saltus Ciminius and was regarded as one of the keys and gates of Etruria (claustra portaeque Etruriae, Liv. vi. 9). It appears as an ally of the Romans at an early period, soon after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, and was subsequently made a Roman colony (Liv. vi. 21; Vell. Pat. i. 14). There are still remains at Nepi of the walls of the ancient city.

Nēphēlē (Νεφέλη), wife of Athamas and mother of Phrixus and Helle. Hence Helle is called Nepheleis by Ovid. For details see ATHAMAS.

Nēphēlis (Νεφελῖς), a small town and promontory on the coast of Cilicia Aspera, between Anemurium and Antiochia (Ptol. v. 8, 1).

Nēphēris (Νέφερις), a fortified town in the immediate neighbourhood of Carthage, on a rock near the coast (Strab. p. 834).

Nēpos, Cornēlius, the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighbouring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars with regard to his personal history have been transmitted to us. He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost, except a portion of No. 7. (1) Chronica, an Epitome of Universal History, probably in three books, to which Catullus appears to allude in dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos (Catull. i. 5; Gell. xvii. 21). From the mention in Catullus they seem to have been published not later than 63 B. C., before Varro and Atticus wrote Epitomes of the same kind. (2) Exemplorum Libri, probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings. (3) De Viris Illustribus, perhaps the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title. (4) Vita Ciceronis. (5) Epistolae ad Ciceronem. (6) Vita Catonis, a larger work alluded to in Nep. Cat. 3, 5. (7) His greatest work, De Viris Illustribus, in at least sixteen books (Charis. G. L. i. 141; cf. Gell. xi. 8), in which Lives of Romans and foreigners were placed side by side. Of this work the part entitled Vitae Excellentium Imperatorum survives, and also the Lives of Atticus and Cato the Censor, which belonged to the section including historians. The Vitae Excellentium Imperatorum has erroneously been regarded as spurious because the heading in the MSS. seems to name Aemilius Probus as the author. The mistake arose from a dedicatory epigram written by Probus to Theodosius, and inserted for some reason after the Life of Hannibal. Hence the copyists of the MS. derived their incorrect heading. As regards the objection that the Latinity is marked by colloquial idioms unsuited to a learned contemporary of Cicero, and that the whole style is inferior, it has been well remarked that the style of the Bell. Africanum and Hispaniense and even of Varro differs quite as much from that of Cicero and Caesar. Nepos is clear and fair in his narration, but often inaccurate in history. Best edition by Nipperdey (revised by Lupus, Berl. 1879); others by Macmichael. Lond. 1873; Lindsay, New York, 1889.

Nēpos, Jūlius, last emperor but one of the West, A.D. 474-475, was raised to the throne by Leo, the emperor of the East. Nepos deposed Glycerius, who was regarded at Constantinople as a usurper [GLYCERIUS]; but he was in his turn deposed in the next year by Orestes, who proclaimed his son Romulus. Nepos fled into Dalmatia, where he was killed in 480.

Nepotiānus, Flavius Popilius, son of Eutropia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great, was proclaimed emperor at Rome in A.D. 350, but was slain by Marcellinus, the general of MAGNENTIUS, after a reign of twenty-eight days.

Neptūnus, called Poseidon by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. [POSEIDON.] Neptunus was the chief sea-divinity of the Romans. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, they had little conception of the phenomena of the sea and few myths about it. Hence nearly all the Italian mythology connected with water refers to deities of rivers and springs. Some writers even think that Neptunus was originally a god of rain, but this theory rests on the uncertain etymology from νέφος. The name in Etruscan is Nethuns and the Romans may possibly have borrowed his worship from Etruria. That the Etruscans regarded him as a sea-god is clear from the fact that they describe Poseidon by the name of Nethuns. To Romans he was at any rate a god of the sea before the introduction of the worship of Poseidon (under the name of Neptunus in the first lectisternium, B. C. 399 (Liv. v. 13)). In Roman mythology, too, his wife's name was Salacia, the goddess of the salt sea (Varro, L. L. v. 72; Serv. ad Aen. i. 144; cf. Cic. Tim. fr. 11). Neptunus with all the other history and attributes of the Greek Poseidon received also the patronage of horses and equestrian exercises and an altar in the Circus Flaminius. His festival was on the 23rd of July. His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa. At his festival the people formed tents (umbræ) of the branches of trees, in which they enjoyed themselves in feasting and drinking (Dict. of Ant. art. Neptunalia). When a Roman commander set sail with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea. In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former.

Neratius Priscus, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. His works are cited in the Digest.

Nērēis or Nērēis (Νηρεΐς, in Hom. Νηρηΐς), in Verg. Ecl. vii. 37, Nerine, a sea-nymph, and used especially in the plural, Nereides (Νηρεΐδες, Νηρηΐδες), to indicate the fifty daughters of Nereus and Doris. The Nereides were the sea-nymphs of the Mediterranean (= νύμφαι ἁλιαί, Soph. Phil. 1470), in contradistinction to the Naiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean. Their names are not the same in all writers (Il. xviii. 39-43;

Hes. Th. 240-263; Verg. Aen. v. 825; cf. Pind. Isthm. vi. 6; Ov. Met. ii. 10; Apollod. i. 2, 7). One of the most celebrated was Thetis, the mother of Achilles. They are described as lovely divinities (Hes. Th. 240), imagined probably from the play of the waves chasing each other, and as dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts (Ap. Rh. iv. 859, 930; Apollod. i. 9, 25). They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in seaport towns (Paus. ii. 1, 7; iii. 26, 5). They are frequently represented in works of art: in the older black-figured vases as maidens fully clothed; so also on the sculptures of the 'Nereid-monument' from Xanthus, now in the British Museum, in which the drapery seems intended to suggest a rapid, flowing movement; but most examples of fully-developed art show the Nereids as youthful, beautiful, and naked maidens; and they are often grouped with Tritons, or riding on sea-monsters, as in the work of Scopas (Plin. xxxvi. 26). But there was a different conception among the Romans, of maidens with fishes' tails, like mermaids, and sometimes with scales over all the body (Plin. ix. 9; cf. Hor. A. P. 5).

Nērēius, a name given by the poets to a descendant of Nereus.

Nerētum or Neritum (Nerētinus: Narbo), a town of the Salentini in Calabria.

Nēreus (Nηρεύς), son of Pontus and Gaea, and husband of Doris, by whom he became the father of the fifty Nereides. He is described as the wise and unerring old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he dwelt (Il. xviii. 141; Od. xxiv. 58; Hes. Th. 233). He was believed to have, like other deities of the sea, the power of prophesying the future and of appearing to mortals in different shapes. Heracles accordingly obtains his counsel as to what route will bring him to the Hesperides; but he had first to subdue him in wrestling (Apollod. ii. 5, 11). The same account is given of Proteus in the story of Odysseus, and of Glauco in that of the Argonauts. So also Horace makes him prophesy to Paris (Od. i. 15). Virgil (Aen. ii. 418) mentions the trident as his attribute, and the epithets given him by the poets refer to his old age, his kindness, and his trustworthy knowledge of the future. In works of art, Nereus, like other sea-gods, is represented with pointed sea-weeds taking the place of hair in the eye-brows, the chin, and the breast. His body less frequently has partly the form of a fish; or it ends in the coils of a serpent, as in the annexed cut.

Nerius, Cn., accused P. Sestius of bribery, B. C. 56 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, 5).

Nēro, Clāudius. Nero is said to have signified 'brave' in the Sabine tongue (Suet. Tib. 1; Gell. xiii. 22). 1. Tib., one of the four sons of App. Claudius Caecus, censor B. C. 312, from whom all the Claudii Neronēs were descended (Suet. Ner. 3).—2. C., a celebrated general in the second Punic war. He was praetor 212, and was sent into Spain to oppose Hasdrubal, who eluded his attack, and he was succeeded by Scipio Africanus (Liv. xxvi. 17; Appian, Hisp. 17). Nero commanded one of the three armies which drew together round Capua in 212; he was legatus under Marcellus in 209 (Liv. xxvii. 14). In 207 he was consul with M. Livius Salinator, and marched into the S. of Italy against Hannibal, with whom he fought an indecisive battle at Grumentum, and then followed Hannibal into Apulia, and encamped opposite to him at Canusium. Having heard of Hasdrubal's arrival, he secretly broke up his camp, marched into the N. of Italy, effected a junction with his colleague M. Livius in Picenum, and proceeded to crush Hasdrubal before his brother Hannibal could come to his assistance. Hasdrubal was defeated and slain on the river Metaurus (Liv. xxvii. 41-61; App. Annib. 52). This great battle, which probably saved Rome, gave a lustro to the name of Nero, and con-secreted it among the recollections of the Romans.

Nero was censor, 204, with M. Livius.—3. Tib., praetor, 204, with Sardinia for his province; and consul, 202, when he obtained Africa as his province, but his fleet suffered so much at sea that he was unable to join Scipio in Africa (Liv. xxx. 39).—4. Tib., served under Pompey in the war against the pirates, B. C. 67. He is probably the Tib. Nero who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down (Sall. Cat. 50; App. B. C. ii. 5).—5. Tib., father of the emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of the last. He served as quaestor under Caesar (48) in the Alexandrine war (Dio Cass. xlii. 40). He sided with L. Antonius in the war of Perusia (41); and when this town surrendered, he passed over to Sex. Pompey in Sicily, and subsequently to M. Antony in Achaea (ib. xlvi. 15). On a reconciliation being effected between Antony and Octavian at the close of the year (40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livia, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavian, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then six months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero died shortly after, and left Octavian the guardian of his two sons. (Tac. Ann. i. 10, v. 1; Dio Cass. xlviii. 44.)

Nĕro. 1. Roman emperor, A.D. 54-68, was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Caesar and of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. On the death of Claudius (54), Agrippina secured the succession for her son, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. His mother wished to govern in the name of her son, and her ambition was the cause of Nero's first crime. Jealousy thus arose between Nero and his mother, which soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place; whereupon Nero caused Britannicus to be poisoned, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present (55). During the early part of Nero's reign, the government of Rome was in the hands of Seneca and of Burrhus, the praefect of the praetorians, who opposed the ambitious designs of Agrippina, and exercised a better influence on the young emperor (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12; Suet. Ner. 10). But he soon indulged his licentious inclinations without restraint. He neglected his wife for the beautiful but dissolute Poppaea Sabina, the wife of Otho. This abandoned woman aspired to become the emperor's wife; but since she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, she used all her arts to urge Nero to put his mother to death. Accordingly in 59 Agrippina was assassinated by Nero's order, with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 7.) Though Nero had no longer anyone to oppose him, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre (Suet. Ner. 34). He attempted to drown his reflections in fresh riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. He did not, however, immediately marry Poppaea, being probably restrained by fear of Burrhus and

Seneca. But the death of Burrhus in 62, and the retirement of Seneca from public affairs, which immediately followed, left Nero more at liberty. Accordingly he divorced his wife Octavia, and in eighteen days married Poppaea. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he falsely charged her with adultery, and banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 64.)—In 64 the great fire at Rome happened. Its origin is uncertain, for it is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, as some ancient writers assert (Dio Cass. lxii. 17, 18; Suet. Ner. 38). Tacitus (Ann. xv. 38) does not support the accusation of Nero. Out of the fourteen regiones into which Rome was divided, three were totally destroyed, and in seven others only a few half-burned houses remained. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets. He found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius (A.D. 50), and was called Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus. Nero was born at Antium, on the 15th of December, A.D. 37. Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero, being then sixteen years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messallina (53). Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond golden palace, on a scale of magnitudo and splendour which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself 120 feet high. The odium of the conflagration which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death.—The tyranny of Nero at last (65) led to the organisation of a formidable conspiracy against him, usually called Piso's conspiracy, from the name of one of the principal accomplices. The plot was discovered, and many distinguished persons were put to death, among whom were Piso himself, the poet Lucan, and the philosopher Seneca, though the latter appears to have taken no part in the plot. (Tac. Ann. xv. 72.) In the same year, Poppaea died of a kick which her brutal husband gave her in a fit of passion when she was with child. Nero now married Statilia Messalina. The history of the remainder of Nero's reign is a catalogue of his crimes. Virtue in any form was the object of his fear; and almost every month was marked by the execution or banishment of some distinguished man. Among his other victims were Thrasea Paetus and Barea Soranus, both men of high rank, but of spotless integrity. (Ib. xvi. 21.) In 67 Nero paid a visit to Greece, and took part in the contests of both the Olympic and Pythian games. He began a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth, but the works were afterwards suspended by his own orders (Dio Cass. lxxiii. 6-17.) While in Greece he sent orders to put to death his faithful general Domitius Corbulo, which the old soldier anticipated by stabbing himself. The Roman world had long been tired of its oppressor; and the storm at length broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor, raised the standard of revolt. His example was followed by Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis. Galba was proclaimed emperor by his troops, but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Soon after these news reached Rome, Nymphidius Sabinus, who was praefectus praetorio along with Tigellinus, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about four miles from Rome, which belonged to his freedman Phaon. Here he gave himself a mortal wound, when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion on entering attempted to stop the flow of blood, but Nero only said, 'It is too late. Is this your fidelity?' and almost at the same moment expired (Suet. Ner. 49).—Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and by consequence he became cruel when he anticipated danger; and, like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of another. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same situation, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his thirty-first year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for eighteen years and eight months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Caesar.—The most important external events in the reign of Nero were the conquest of Armenia by Domitius Corbulo [CORBULO], and the insurrection of the Britons, which was quelled by Suetonius Paulinus. [PAULINUS].—2. Eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, fell a victim to the ambition of Sejanus, who resolved to get rid of the sons of Germanicus in order to obtain the imperial throne for himself. Drusus, the brother of Nero, was persuaded to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of his elder brother would secure him the succession to the throne. There was no difficulty in exciting the jealousy of Tiberius; and accordingly in A.D. 29, Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and was there either starved to death or perished by his own hands. (Tac. Ann. iii. 29, iv. 8, 59-67, v. 3; Dio Cass. lviii. 8.)

Nerva, Cocceius. 1. M., consul B.C. 36, brought about the reconciliation between M. He was consul in A.D. 22. In 33 he resolutely starved himself to death, notwithstanding the entreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was (Tac. Ann. iv. 58, vi. 26; Dio Cass. lviii. 21). He was a celebrated jurist and is often mentioned in the Digest. He was notable also as having charge of public works under Tiberius, and especially of aqueducts (Frontin. Aquaed. 2). He was the originator of the tunnel (Grotta di Posilipo) on the road leading from Naples to Baiæ [PAUSILYPUS].—3. M., the son of the last, and probably father of the emperor, was also a celebrated jurist, and is often cited in the Digest under the name of Nerva Filius.—4. M., Roman emperor, A.D. 96-98, was born at Narnia, in Umbria, A.D. 32. He was consul with Vespasian, 71, and with Domitian, 90. On the assassination of Domitian, in September, 96, Nerva, who had probably been privy to the conspiracy, was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquility to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who had been accused of treason, and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. The informers were suppressed by penalties, and some were put to death. At the commencement of his reign, Nerva swore that he would put no senator to death; and he kept his word, even when a conspiracy had been formed against his life by Calpurnius Crassus. Though Nerva was virtuous and humane, he did not possess much energy and vigour, and his feebleness was shown by a mutiny of the Praetorian soldiers.

The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor at first refused, but he was obliged to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers. Nerva felt his weakness, and showed his noble character and his good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigour and ability to direct public affairs. Headed out as his son and successor, without any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpian Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany. Nerva died suddenly on January 27, A.D. 98, at the age of sixty-five years. (Dio Cass. lxxviii.)

Nervii, a powerful and warlike people in Gallia Belgica, whose territory extended from the river Sabis (Sambre) to the Ocean, and part of which was covered by the wood Ardenna. They were divided into several smaller tribes, the Centrones, Grndii, Levaci, Pleumoxii and Geiduni. In B.C. 58 they were defeated by Caesar with such slaughter that out of 60,000 men capable of bearing arms only 500 were left. (Caes. B.G. ii. 15, v. 38, vi. 2.)

Nesactium, a town in Istria on the Arsia, taken by the Romans B.C. 177 (Liv. xli. 11).

Nesis (Nisita), a small island off the coast of Campania between Puteoli and Neapolis, and opposite Mount Pansilypus. It was a favourite residence of some of the Roman nobles (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 1-4; Stat. Silv. iii. 1, 148).

Nessōnis (Nessōnis), a lake in Thessaly, a little S. of the river Peneus, and N.E. of Larissa, is in summer merely a swamp, but in winter is not only full of water, but even overflows its banks. Nessōnis and the neighbouring lake Boebeis were regarded by the ancients as remains of the vast lake, which was supposed to have covered the whole of Thessaly, till an outlet was made for its waters through the rocks of Tempe (Strab. p. 430).

Nessus (Néssos), a centaur, who carried Deianira across the river Evenus, but, attempting to run away with her, was shot by Heracles with a poisoned arrow, which afterwards became the cause of his own death. See p. 400, a.

Nestor (Néstap), king of Pylos, son of Neleus and Chloris, husband of Eurydice and father of Pisidice, Polycaeste, Perseus, Stratins, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes (Od. iii. 413, 452, 464, xi. 285; Apollod. i. 9, 9). Some relate that, after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius, and the mother of Pylades (Paus. ii. 29, 4). When Heracles invaded the country of Neleus, and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, either because he was absent from Pylos, or because he had taken no part in carrying off from Heracles the oxen of Geryones (Il. xi. 692; Apollod. ii. 7, 8; Paus. iii. 26, 6). In his youth and early manhood, Nestor was a distinguished warrior. He defeated both the Arcadians and Eleans. He took part in the fight of the Lapithae against the Centaurs, and he is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts (Il. i. 260, iv. 319, vii. 133, xi. 706, xxiii. 630; Ov. Met. viii. 613; Val. Flacc. i. 380). Although far advanced in age, he sailed with the other Greek heroes against Troy. Having ruled over three generations of men, his advice and authority were deemed equal to those of the immortal gods, and he was renowned for his wisdom, his justice, and his knowledge of war (Il. i. 273, ii. 370, xi. 627). After the fall of Troy he returned home, and arrived safely in Pylos, where Zeus granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by brave sons (Od. iii. 165, iv. 209). Various towns in Peloponnesus, of the name of Pylos, laid claim to being the city of Nestor. On this point see NELEUS.

Nestōrides (Νεστορίδης), i.e. a son of Nestor, as Antilochus and Pisistratus.

Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 428. [See Dict. of Christian Biog.]

Nestus, sometimes Nessus (Νέστος: Mesta by the Greeks, Karasu by the Turks), a river in Thrace, which rises in Mount Rhodope, flows SE., and falls into the Aegaeon sea W. of Abdera and opposite the island of Thasos. The Nestus formed the E. boundary of Macedonia from the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. (Hes. Th. 341; Thuc. ii. 69; Strab. p. 331.)

Nesus. [OENLADAE.]

Nētum (Netinus: Noto Antiquo near Noto), a town in Sicily, SW. of Syracuse, and a dependency of the latter. In Cicero's time it was a foederata civitas, and afterwards held Latin rights (Cic. Verr. iv. 26, v. 22; Ptol. iii. 4, 13).

Neuri (Νεῦροι, Neupol), a people of Sarmatia Europaea, whom Herodotus describes as not of Scythian race, though they followed Scythian customs. Having been driven out from their earlier abodes by a plague of serpents, they settled to the NW. of the sources of the Tyras (Druiester). They were skilful in enchantments. (Hdt. iv. 17, 51, 100, 125; Mel. ii. 1, 7.)

Nicaea (Νικαία: Νικαίεως, Νικαέως, Nicaeensis, Nicensis). 1. (Iznik, Ru.), one of the most celebrated cities of Asia, stood on the E. side of the lake Ascania (Iznik) in Bithynia (Strab. p. 565). Its site appears to have been occupied in very ancient times by a town called Attaea, and afterwards by a settlement of the Bottiaeans, called Ancore or Helicore, which was destroyed by the Mysians (Steph. B. s.v.). Not long after the death of Alexander the Great, Antigonos built on the same spot a city which he named after himself, Antigonica; but Lysimachus soon after changed the name into Nicaea, in honour of his wife. Under the kings of Bithynia it was often the royal residence, and it long disputed with Nicomedia the rank of capital of Bithynia. The Roman emperors bestowed upon it numerous honours and benefits, which are recorded on its coins. Its position, at the junction of several of the chief roads leading through Asia Minor to Constantinople, made it the centre of a large traffic. It is famous in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the great Oecumenical Council which Constantine convoked in A.D. 325. In the very year of the great Council, Nicaea was overthrown by an earthquake, but it was restored by the emperor Valens in 368. Under the later emperors of the East, Nicaea long served as the bulwark of Constantinople against the Arabs and Turks: it was taken by the Seljuks in 1078, and became the capital of the Sultan Soliman; it was retaken by the First Crusaders in 1097. After the taking of Constantinople by the Venetians and the Franks, and the foundation of the Latin empire there in 1204, the Greek emperor Theodorus Lascaris made Nicaea the capital of a separate kingdom, in which his followers maintained themselves with various success against the Latins of Constantinople on the one side, and the Seljuks of Iconium on the other, and in 1261 regained Constantinople. At length, in 1330, Nicaea was finally taken by Orchan, the son of the founder of the Ottoman empire, Othman. Iznik, the modern Nicaea, is a poor village of about 100 houses; but the double walls of the ancient city still remain almost complete, exhibiting four large and two small gates. There are also the remains of the two moles which formed the harbour on the lake, of an aqueduct, of the theatre, and of the gymnasium.—2. A city of India, on the river Hydaspes (Jelum) built by Alexander to commemorate his victory over Porus (Arrian, v. 19; Strab. p. 698).—3. A fortress of the Epicnemidian Locrians on the sea, near the pass of Thermopylae, which it commanded. From its important position, it is often mentioned in the wars of Greece with Macedonia and with the Romans. In the former, its betrayal to Philip by the Thracian dynast Phalaecus led to the Sacred War, B.C. 346; and after various changes, it is found, at the time of the wars with Rome, in the hands of the Aetolians. (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 153; Diod. xvi. 59; Strab. p. 426; Pol. x. 42; Liv. xxviii. 5).—4. In Illyria. [NICIA.] 5. Nizza, Nice, a city on the coast of Liguria, a little E. of the river Var; a colony of Massilia, and subject to that city; hence it was considered as belonging to Gaul, though it was just beyond the frontier (Strab. pp. 180, 184; Pol. xxxiii. 4; Ammian. xv. 11).

Nicander (Νικάνδρος). 1. King of Sparta, son of Charilaus, and father of Theopompus, reigned about B.C. 809-770. (Paus. iii. 7, 4).—2. An Aetolian who sought for his countrymen the alliance of Philip of Macedon and Antiochus. He was General of the Aetolian League in 190 B.C., and went afterwards as ambassador to Rome. (Liv. xxxv. 12, xxxvi. 29, xxxviii. 4; Pol. xx. 10, xxii. 13).—3. A Greek poet, grammarian, and physician, was a native of Claros near Colophon in Ionia, whence he is frequently called a Colophonian.

He succeeded his father as one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius (Nicand. Alexiph. v. 11). He appears to have lived about B.C. 185-135. Of the numerous works of Nicander only two poems are extant: one entitled Theriaca (Θηριακά), which consists of nearly 1000 hexameter lines, and treats of venomous animals and the wounds inflicted by them; and another entitled Alexipharmaca (Ἀλεξιφάρμακα), which consists of more than 600 hexameter lines, and treats of poisons and their antidotes. Among the ancients his authority, in all matters relating to toxicology seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny, Galen, and other ancient writers. Among his lost works was the Ἐρροπούμενα, which was one of Ovid's sources for his Metamorphoses. His style is harsh and obscure; and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, and are only consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities. Editions by Schneider, who published the Alexipharmaca in 1792, Halae, and the Theriaca in 1816, Lips., revised by Keil, 1856.

Nicanor (Νικάνωρ). 1. Son of Parmenion, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander, died during the king's advance into Bactria, B.C. 330 (Arr. An. i. 4, 14, iii. 21-25; Diod. xvii. 57).—2. A Macedonian officer, who, in the division of the provinces after the death of Perdiccas (321), obtained the government of Cappadocia. He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, who made him governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, which he continued to hold until 312, when he was deprived of them by Seleucus. (Diod. xviii. 39, xix. 92, 100.)—3. A Macedonian officer under Cassander, by whom he was secretly despatched, immediately on the death of Antipater, 319, to take the command of the Macedonian garrison at Munychia. Nicanor arrived at Athens before the news of Antipater's death, and thus obtained possession of the fortress. Soon afterwards he surprised the Piraeus also, and placed both fortresses in the hands of Cassander in 318. Nicanor was afterwards despatched by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he gained a victory over the admiral of Polysperchon. On his return to Athens he incurred the suspicion of Cassander, and was put to death. (Diod. xviii. 64-75; Plut. Phoc. 33.)

Nicarchus (Νικάρχος), the author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology, appears to have lived at Rome near the beginning of the second century of the Christian era.

Nicator, Seleucus. [SELEUCUS.]

Nicē (Νίκη), Victory. [NIKE.]

Nicēphōrium (Νικηφόριον). 1. (Rakkah), a fortified town of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the river Bilecha (el Belikh), and due S. of Edessa, built by order of Alexander, and probably completed under Seleucus. It is doubtless the same place as the Callinicus or Callinicum (Καλλινίκος or -ον), the fortifications of which were repaired by Justinian. Its name was again changed to Leontópolis, when it was adorned with fresh buildings by the Emperor Leo. (Strab. p. 747; Ptol. vii. 1, 12; Procop. Aed. ii. 7).—2. A fortress on the Propontis, belonging to the territory of Pergamum.

Nicēphōrius (Νικηφόριος), a river of Armenia Major, on which Tigranes built his residence TGRANOCERTA. It was a tributary of the Upper Tigris; probably the CENTRITES, or a small tributary of it. (Tac. Ann. xv. 4.)

tory, was born in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and died about 1350. Edited by Ducaeus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. fol.—2. Gregoras. [GREGORAS.]—3. Patriarcha, originally the notary or chief secretary of state to the emperor Constantine V., was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 806. He was deposed in 815, and died in 828. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the most important is entitled Breviarium Historicum, a Byzantine history, extending from 602 to 770. Edited by Gedner, 1832.

Nicer (Neckar), a river in Germany falling into the Rhine at the modern Mannheim (Amm. Marc. xviii. 2; Auson. Mosell. 423).

Niceratus (Νικηρατος). 1. Father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general.—2. Son of Nicias, put to death by the Thirty Tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation.—3. A Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia.

Nicetas (Νικήτας). 1. Acominatus, also called Choniatas, because he was a native of Chonae, formerly Colossae, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, lived in the latter half of the 12th, and the former half of the 13th centuries. He was present at the capture of the city by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a faithful description. He escaped to Nicaea, where he died about 1216. The history of Nicetas consists of ten distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are twenty-one, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 to 1206. Editions by Bekker, Bonn, 1835; by Migne, Paris, 1865.—2. Eugenianus, lived probably towards the end of the 12th century, and wrote The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles, which is the worst of the Greek romances that have come down to us. Published for the first time by Boissouade, Paris, 1819.

Nicias (Νικίας). 1. A celebrated Athenian general during the Peloponnesian war, was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited a large fortune. His property was valued at 100 talents. (Xen. Mem. ii. 5, 2; Lys. Arist. Bon. 47; Athen. p. 272.) From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he naturally belonged to the party of the aristocracy. He was several times associated with Pericles as strategus; and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, his honesty and uprightness of character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect by all classes of the citizens. He was a man of strong religious feeling, and Aristophanes ridicules him in the Equites for his timidity and superstition (Eq. 28, 80, 112, 358). His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career; and his military operations were almost always successful (Thuc. iii. 51, 91, iv. 42, 130). He frequently commended the Athenian armies during the earlier years of the Peloponnesian war. After the death of Cleon (B.C. 422) he exerted all his influence to bring about a peace, which was concluded in the following year (421), (Thuc. v. 15–24). For the next few years Nicias used all his efforts to induce the Athenians to preserve the peace, and was constantly opposed by Alcibiades, who had now become the leader of the popular party. In 415, the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, and appointed Nicias, Alcibiades and Lamachus to the command. Nicias disapproved of the expedition altogether, and did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. But his representations produced no effect; and he set sail for Sicily with his colleagues. Alcibiades was soon afterwards recalled [ALCIBIADES]; and the sole command was thus virtually left in the hands of Nicias. His early operations were attended with success. He defeated the Syracusans in the autumn, and employed the winter in securing the co-operation of several of the Greek cities, and of the Sicel tribes in the island. In the spring of next year he renewed his attacks, seized Epipolae, and commenced the circumvallation of Syracuse. About this time Lamachus was slain, in a skirmish under the walls. All the attempts of the Syracusans to stop the circumvallation failed. The works were nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus, the Spartan, arrived in Sicily. [GYLIPPUS.] The tide of success now turned; and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for reinforcements, and requested at the same time that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his feeble health rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted reinforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon; but they would not allow Nicias to resign his command. Demosthenes, upon his arrival in Sicily (413), made a vigorous effort to recover Epipolae, which the Athenians had lost. He was nearly successful, but was finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now deemed any further attempts against the city hopeless, and therefore proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home; but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party amongst the Syracusans themselves were likely in no long time to facilitate the reduction of the city. But meantime fresh succours arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that everything should be in readiness for departure, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The soothsayers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resolutely determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and in a decisive naval battle defeated the Athenians. They were now masters of the harbour, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. The Athenians were again decisively defeated; and having thus lost their fleet, they were obliged to retreat by land. They were pursued by the enemy, and were finally compelled to surrender. Both Nicias and Demosthenes were put to death by the Syracusans. (Thuc. vi. vii.; Plut. Nicias; Diod. xii. 83 ff.)—2. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who offered to the Roman consul to poison the king, for a certain reward. Fabricius not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery. He is sometimes, but erroneously, called Cineas. (Gell. iii. 8; Zonar. ii. 48.)—3. A Coan grammarian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate (Cic. ad Att. vii. 3; Suet. Gramm. 14).—4. A celebrated Athenian painter, flourished about B.C. 320. He was the most distinguished disciple of Euphranor. His works seem to have been all painted in encaustic. One of his greatest paintings was a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer. He refused to sell this picture to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was 60 talents. (Plin. xxxv. 130–133; Dict. of Ant. art. Pictura.)

Nicochāres (Νικοχάρης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, was contemporary with Aristophanes (Suid. s.v.).

Nicōcles (Νικοκλής). 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, son of Evagoras, whom he succeeded B.C. 374. Isocrates addressed him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, for which Nicocles rewarded the orator with the magnificent present of twenty talents. Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles. He is said to have perished by a violent death, but neither the period nor circumstances of this event are recorded. (Isocr. Evagoras; Diod. xv. 47.)—2. Prince or ruler of Paphos, in Cyprus, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first one of those who took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus; but having subsequently entered into secret negotiations with Antigonus, he was compelled by Ptolemy to put an end to his own life, 310. (Diod. xix. 59, xx. 21.)—3. Tyrant of Sicily, was deposed by Aratus, after a reign of only four months, 251 (Plut. Arat. 3; Paus. ii. 8, 9).

Nicocrēon (Νικοκρέων), king of Salamis in Cyprus, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. After the death of Alexander he took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and was entrusted by Ptolemy with the chief command over the whole island. Nicocreon is said to have ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to death in a stone mortar, in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered the king, when he visited Alexander at Tyre. (Diod. xix. 59–79; Cic. Tusc. ii. 22, 52; Diog. Laërt. ix. 59.)

Nicolāus Chalcocondyles. [CHALCOCONDYLES.]

Nicolāus Damascēnus, a Greek historian, and an intimate friend both of Herod the Great and of Augustus. He was, as his name indicates, a native of Damascus, and a son of Antipater and Stratonice. He received an excellent education, and he carried on his philosophical studies in common with Herod, at whose court he resided. In B.C. 18 he accompanied Herod on a visit to Augustus at Rome; on which occasion Augustus made Nicolaus a present of the finest fruit of the palm-tree, which the emperor called Nicolai—a name by which it continued to be known down to the Middle Ages. Nicolaus rose so high in the favour of Augustus, that he was on more than one occasion of great service to Herod, when the emperor was incensed against the latter. (Plut. Symp. viii. 4; Athen. p. 652; Suid. s.v.) Nicolaus wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were: (1) A Life of himself, of which a considerable portion is still extant. (2) A universal history, which consisted of 144 books, of which we have only a few fragments. (3) A Life of Augustus, from which we have some extracts made by command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He also wrote commentaries on Aristotle, and other philosophical works, and was the author of several tragedies and comedies: Stobaeus has preserved a fragment of one of his comedies, extending to forty-four lines. Edition of his fragments by Orelli, Lips. 1804; Dindorf, Hist. Gr. 1870.

Nicomachus (Νικόμαχος). 1. A γραμματεὺς at Athens employed to transcribe the laws of Solon, with which he tampered for his own gain by bribes. He was in exile during the rule of the Thirty, after which he returned, and was prosecuted for misconduct in his transcription of the laws. (Lys. c. Nicom.; Xen. Hell. i. 7, 35.)—2. Father of Aristotle. [See p. 116, a.]—3. Son of Aristotle by the slave Herpyllis. He was himself a philosopher, and wrote some philosophical works. A portion of Aristotle's writings bears the name of Nicomachean Ethics [p. 118].—4. Called Gerassenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a Life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasylus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music; and two of his works on these subjects are still extant. The work on arithmetic is edited by Nobbe, Lips. 1828; Hoche, 1863. The work on music was printed by Meursius in his collection, Lugd. Bat. 1616, and in the collection of Meibomius, Amst. 1652.—5. Of Thebes, a celebrated painter, was the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristides. He flourished B.C. 360, and onwards. He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes. He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes and Apelles, a perfect method had been attained. (Cic. Brut. 18, 70; Plin. xxxv. 108.)

Nicomēdes (Νικομήδης). 1. I., king of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipoetes, whom he succeeded B.C. 278. With the assistance of the Gauls, whom he invited into Asia, he defeated and put to death his brother Zipoetes, who had for some time held the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. The rest of his reign appears to have been undisturbed, and under his sway Bithynia rose to a high degree of power and prosperity. He founded the city of Nicomedia, which he made the capital of his kingdom. The length of his reign is uncertain, but he probably died about 250. (Liv. xxxviii. 16; Mem. 16–22.) He was succeeded by his son ZELAS.—2. II., surnamed EPIPHANES, king of Bithynia, reigned B.C. 149–91. He was the son and successor of Prusias II., and fourth in descent from the preceding. He was brought up at Rome, where he succeeded in gaining the favour of the senate (Liv. xlv. 44). Prusias, in consequence, became jealous of his son, and sent secret instructions for his assassination. The plot was revealed to Nicomedes, who thereupon returned to Asia, and declared open war against his father. Prusias was deserted by his subjects, and was put to death by order of his son, 149. (App. Mithr. 4-7; Just. xxxiv. 4; Strab. p. 624.) Of the long and tranquil reign of Nicomedes few events have been transmitted to us. He courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, 131. He subsequently obtained possession of Paphlagonia, and attempted to gain Cappadocia, by marrying Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI. He was, however, expelled from Cappadocia by Mithridates; and he was also forced by the Romans to abandon Paphlagonia, when they deprived Mithridates of Cappadocia (Just. xxxviii. 1). —3. III., surnamed PHILOPATOR, king of Bithynia (91-74), son and successor of Nicomedes II. Immediately after his accession, he was expelled by Mithridates, who set up against him his brother Socrates; but he was restored by the Romans in the following year (90). At the instigation of the Romans, Nicomedes now proceeded to attack the dominions of Mithridates, who expelled him a second time from his kingdom (88). This was the immediate occasion of the first Mithridatic kingdom of Bithynia, and it soon became one of the most splendid cities of the then known world. Under the Romans it was a colony, and a favourite residence of several of the later emperors, especially of Diocletian and Constantine the Great. Though repeatedly injured by earthquakes, it was always restored by the munificence of the emperors. (Strab. p. 563; Paus. v. 12, 5; Vict. Caes. 39; Amm. Marc. xxii. 9, 12.) Like its neighbour and rival, NICAEA, it occupies an important place in the wars against the Turks; it is also memorable in history as the scene of Hannibal's death. It was the birthplace of Arrian.

Nicon (Νίκων), a Tarentine, who put Tarentum in the hands of Hannibal, in B.C. 212, was killed when the Romans recovered the city, 209 (Liv. xxv. 8, xxvi. 39, xxvii. 16; Pol. viii. 26).

Nicōnia or Nicōnia, a town in Scythia on the Tyras (Dniester), (Strab. p. 306).

Nicōphon and Nicōphron (Νικοφῶν, Νικόφρων), an Athenian comic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes (Suid. s.v.; Athen. p. 126).

Nicōpolis (Νικόπολις: Νικοπολίτης, Nicopolitānus). 1. (Paleopnyssa, Ru.), a city at the SW. extremity of Epirus, on the point of land which forms the N. side of the entrance to the Gulf of Ambracia, opposite to Actium. It was built by Augustus in memory of the battle of Actium, and was peopled from Ambracia, Anactorium, and other neighbouring cities, and war; at the conclusion of which (84) Nicomedes was again reinstated in his kingdom. He reigned nearly ten years after this second restoration. Caesar, as a young man, was sent to his court by M. Minucius Thermus, B.C. 81. (Plut. Caes. i.; Suet. Jul. 2, 49; p. 181, b.) He died at the beginning of 74, and, having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people (App. Mithr. 7-19; Plut. Sull. 22, 24; Entrop. vi. 6).

brated city of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, built by king Nicomedes I. (B.C. 264), at the NE. corner of the Sinus Astacenus (Gulf of Izmid: comp. ASTACUS). It was the chief residence of the also from Aetolia. Augustus also built a temple of Apollo on a neighbouring hill, and founded games in honour of the god, which were held every fifth year. [See map, p. 14.] The city was received into the Amphictyonic League in place of the Dolopes. It is spoken of both as a libera civitas and as a colony. (Dio Cass. li. 12; Suet. Aug. 12, 18; Strab. p. 324; Paus. v. 23, vi. 18, x. 38; Tac. Ann. v. 10.) It had a considerable commerce and extensive fisheries. It was made the capital of Epirus by Constantine, and its buildings were restored both by Julian and by Justinian.—2. (Nicopolis), a city of Moesia Inferior, on the Danube, built by Trajan in memory of a victory over the Dacians, and celebrated as the scene of the great defeat of the Hungarians and Franks by the sultan Bajazet, on Sept. 28, 1396 (Amm. Marc. xxxi. 5).—3. (Enderetz), a city of Armenia Minor, on or near the Lycus, and not far from the sources of the Halys, founded by Pompey on the spot where he gained his first victory over Mithridates: a flourishing place in the time of Augustus: restored by Justinian (Strab. p. 555, App. Mithr. 101, 105; Bell. Alex. 36).—4. A city in the NE. corner of Cilicia, near the junction of the Taurus and Amanus.—5. (Kars, Kiussera, or Caesar's Castle, Ru.), a city of Lower Egypt, about two or three miles E. of Alexandria, on the canal between Alexandria and Canopus, was built by Augustus in memory of the last victory over Antonius. Here also, as at Nicopolis opposite to Actium, Augustus founded a temple of Apollo, with games every fifth year. It seems to have become a mere suburb of Alexandria. (Strab. p. 795; Dio Cass. li. 11.)—6. (Neurekup), a town in Thrace, at the mouth of the Nestus.

Nicostratus (Νικόστρατος), the youngest of the three sons of Aristophanes, was himself a comic poet. His plays belonged both to the Middle and the New Comedy. (Athen. pp. 108, 118, 230, 597.)

Nigeir, Nigir, or Nigris (Νίγειρ, Νίγυρ, a compounded form of the word Geir or Gir, which seems to be a native African term for a river in general), changed, by a confusion which was the more easily made on account of the colour of the people of the region, into the Latin word Niger, a great river, vaguely conceived by Greek and Roman geographers in the interior of Western Ethiopia from reports of river basins in that direction. They refer chiefly to the rivers called Joli-ba, Quorra, and Niger, though nothing can have been known of its actual course as far as the Atlantic. As early as the time of Herodotus, we find a statement concerning a river of the interior of Libya which seems identical with the Nigeir or Quorra [NASAMONES.] Herodotus, like his informants, inferred from the course of the river, and from the crocodiles in it, that it was the Nile; but it can hardly be any river but the Quorra. The opinion that the Niger was a W. branch of the Nile prevailed very generally in ancient times; but by no means universally. Pliny gives the same account in a very confused manner, and makes the Nigris (as he calls it) the boundary between N. Africa and Aethiopia. This confusion probably arose from the name being used of more than one of the larger rivers flowing S. from the Atlas [cf. GER]. Pliny, however, makes it join the Nile (v. 30, viii. 77). Ptolemy makes the Nigeir rise not far from its real source (allowing for the imperfect observations on which his numerical latitudes and longitudes are founded) and adds, what modern discoveries render a very remarkable statement, that a branch of the Nigeir communicates with the lake Libya (Λιβυή), which he places in the position of lake Tchad. The Tchadda, therefore, represents the branch of the Nigeir spoken of by Ptolemy, whose informants, however, inverted the direction of its stream. It is further remarkable that Ptolemy places on the Nigeir a city named Thamondocana in the exact position of Timbuctoo, and that the length of the river computed from his position agrees very nearly with its real length. (Ptol. iv. 6, 14; cf. Strab. p. 826; Mel. iii. 19, 9.) The error of connecting the Niger and the Nile revived after the time of Ptolemy.

Niger, C. Pescennius, was governor of Syria in the reign of Commodus, on whose death he was saluted emperor by the legions in the East, A.D. 193. But in the following year he was defeated and put to death by Septimius Severus. (Dio Cass. lxxii. 8, lxxiii. 13, lxxiv. 6; Spart. Pescenn. Nigr.)

Nigira (Νίγειρα, Ptol.), a city on the N. of the river Nigeir, and the capital of the NIGRITÆ.

Nigir. [NIGEIR.]

Nigritæ or -ætēs (Νιγρίται, Νιγρίται Αιδίονες, Νίγηρες), according to the meaning of the native word, was 'the river-people.' They dwelt in the basin of the upper Niger. (Strab. pp. 131, 826; Ptol. iv. 6, 16.)

Nigritis Lacus (Νιγρίτις λίμνη), a lake in the interior of Africa, out of which Ptolemy represents the river Nigir as flowing. The lake Debu, S. of Timbuctoo, though not actually the source of the Niger, is probably the lake referred to. (Ptol. iv. 6, 27.)

Nikē (Νίκη), called Victōriā by the Romans, the goddess of victory, is described as a daughter of the giant Pallas and Styx, and as a sister of Zeus (zeal), Cratos (strength), and Bia (force). (Hes. Th. 382.) It is probable that in earlier mythology she was rather an attribute of one or other of the greater deities than a separate personality: especially an attribute of Athena at Athens. In the development of the myth comes the story that when Zeus began the fight against the Titans, and called upon the gods for assistance, Nike and her two sisters were the first who came forward, and Zeus, as a reward for their zeal, caused them ever after to live with him in Olympus (Hes. l.c.; Apollod. i. 2, 2). She is often represented in ancient works of art, especially with other divinities, such as Zeus and Athene, and with conquering heroes, whose horses she guides. She is shown as a winged figure and often carries a palm or a wreath. Sometimes she is raising or decorating a trophy. A favourite attitude in the Roman period showed Nike holding a shield on which she is inscribing a record of victory. When she is represented as an attribute of a great deity, Zeus or Athene, she is a small winged figure supported in the hand of the god. On Greek vases it is common to denote the successful issue of any sort of contest by a winged figure of Victory hovering above. Among the famous statues of Nike were that of Paeonius at Olympia mentioned by Paus. v. 10, 26—and the greater part of the figure is still extant there; the statue from Samothrace, now in the Louvre, if the restoration (partly based on a coin of Demetrius) is right, formerly blowing a trumpet held in the right hand. For Athene-Niko see p. 139, a, and for her temple at Athens (Nike-Apteros) see p. 13, a. At Rome there was an ancient worship of Victoria (apparently equivalent to that of the Sabine goddess VACUNA) on the Palatine (Liv. xxix. 14; Dionys. i. 32). Moreover as one of the Indigetēs, Vica-Pota (=Victoria) was worshipped [p. 443, a]. Another temple of Victory was dedicated in the Samnite wars, B.C. 294 (Liv. x. 38). The great statue of Nike by Paeonius at Olympia has been in part recovered. [PAEONIUS.] A famous statue of Victory was set up by Augustus in the Curia Julia (Suet. Aug. 100; Dio Cass. li. 22). The figures of Victory repre-

Nike, Victory. (From an ancient gem.)

Nilūpōlis or Nilus (Νείλου πόλις, Νείλος), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, in the Nomos Heracleopolites, was built on an island in the Nile, 20 geographical miles NE. of Heracleopolis. There was a temple here in which, as throughout Egypt, the river Nile was worshipped as a god. (Ptol. v. 5, 57.)

Nilus (Νείλος: Nile), the great river of Egypt. The origin of the word is probably the Semitic Nahar or Nahal, meaning river. In Homer the river is called Αἴγυπτος (Od. iii. 300, iv. 477); but the name Νείλος occurs in Hesiod (Th. 338), and Hecataeus (Fr. 279). This river, one of the most important in the world, flows through a channel which forms a sort of cleft extending N. and S. through the high rocky and sandy land of NE. Africa. After leaving the great lakes, the discovery of which belongs to recent years, the Nile has a course in the general direction of NNE. as far as Khartum, when this main branch, which is called the Bahr-el-Abiad, i.e. White River, receives another large river, the Bahr-el-Azrek, i.e. Blue River, the sources of which are in the highlands of Abyssinia: this is the middle branch of the Nile system, the ASTAPUS of the ancients. The third, or E. branch, called Tacazze, the ASTABORAS of the ancients, rises also in the highlands of Abyssinia in about 11° 40' N. lat., and 39° 40' E. long., and joins the Nile (i.e. the main stream formed by the union of the Abiad and the Azrek), in 17° 45' N. lat., and about 34° 5' E. long.: the point of junction was the apex of the island of MEROE. Here the united river is about two miles broad. Hence it flows through Nubia, in a magnificent rocky valley, falling over six cataracts, the N.-most of which, called the First Cataract (i.e. to a person going up the river), is and has always been the S. boundary of Egypt. Of its course from this point to its junction with the Mediterranean a sufficient general description has been given under ÆGYPTUS (p. 21). The branches into which it parted at the S. point of the Delta were, in ancient times, three in number, and these again parted into seven (whence the epithets ἐπτάπορος, Mosch. ii. 51; septemplex, Ov. Met. v. 187; septemgeninus, Catull. xi. 7), of which, Herodotus tells us, five were natural and two artificial. These seven mouths were nearly all named from cities which stood upon them: they were called, proceeding from E. to W., the Pelusiatic, the Tanitic or Saitic, the Mendesiatic, the Phatnitic or Pathmetic or Bucolic, the Sebennytic, the Bolbitic or Bolbitine, and the Canobic or Canopic. (Hdt. ii. 17; Scylax, p. 43; Strab. p. 801; Diod. i. 33; Ptol. iv. 5, 10; Plin. v. 64; Mel. i. 9, 9.) Through the alterations caused by the alluvial deposits of the river, they have now all shifted their positions, or dwindled into little channels, except two, and these are much diminished, namely, the Damiat mouth on the E. and the Rosetta mouth on the W. Of the canals connected with the Nile in the Delta, the most celebrated were the Canobic, which connected the Canobic mouth with the lake Mareotis and with Alexandria, and that of Ptolemy (afterwards called that of Trajan) which connected the Nile at the beginning of the Delta with the bay of Heroöpolis at the head of the Red Sea: the formation of the latter is ascribed to king Necho, and its repair and improvement successively to Darius the son of Hystapes, Ptolemy Philadelphus and Trajan. [See p. 21, b.] That the Delta (and indeed the whole alluvial soil of Egypt) has been created by the Nile cannot be doubted; but the present small rate of deposit proves that the formation must have been made long before the historical period. From the dark alluvial soil came the native name of Egypt, Chemi or Kamit, 'the black land': whence, perhaps, the erroneous notion that the name Νείλος meant 'black.' The periodical rise of the river has been spoken of under ÆGYPTUS. It has been ascertained from the ancient records on the rocks of Semneh of the inundations that in the 12th dynasty (2300 B.C.), the rise of the Nile was twenty-seven feet above its highest point in our own time, and its average rise twelve feet above the present average. The difference seems to have been caused by the giving way of the rocks at Silsilis, and the result was to deprive the plains of Ethiopia above that point of much of their fertility. It was in the same dynasty that the great works for water-storage were carried out in the Fayum. [See MOERIS LACUS.] The ancient theories concerning this periodic rise, caused by tropical rains in the interior, may be found in Hdt. ii. 19-26 (cf. Plin. v. 58). It was not an uncommon error in later Greek and Roman geographers to describe the Nile as having its sources somewhere in Western Africa (Plin. v. 51, viii. 77; Dio Cass. lxxv. 13; Solin. 35). But it was well known that the sources of the Nile were a problem as insoluble as they have remained till quite recent years (Hor. Od. iv. 14, 45). Greek writers noted that the Egyptians deified the Nile, and took the utmost care to preserve its water from pollution (Hdt. ii. 101; Diod. i. 6-26). The famous statue (now in the Vatican) of the Nile as a river-god is a reclining figure of majestic appearance, pillowed on a sphynx, and holding a cornucopia; sixteen children, representing branches and affluents, play around; the sacred crocodile and the ichneumon are below. It is a design of the Hellenistic period.

NINUS, or NINUS, the reputed founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh. An account is given under SEMIRAMIS. (Cf. ASSYRIA.)

Ninus or Nīnus, Nīnīvē (Hdt. i. 193, ii. 150, Nīnos; Assyri. Nīnua; O. T. Nineveh; LXX Nīveūh, Nīveul; Tac. Ann. xii. 13, Nīnus; Ptol. viii. 21 Nīnos ἡ καὶ Nīveul; Amn. Marc. xviii. 7, Nīnive; Lucan, iii. 215, Nīnauis), the capital of the Assyrian monarchy, stood on the E. side of the Tigris, at the upper part of its course, in the district of Aturia. For the early history of the monarchy see ASSYRIA. Nineveh became the capital of the Assyrian kings in the reign of Rimmon-mirari (known to the Greeks as Ninus) about 1330 B.C., replacing the older capital Assur on the Zab (which was called Kalakh in Hebrew and Larissa in Xenophon, and is now marked by the ruins of Nimrud). Nineveh is said by Strabo to have been larger than Babylon, and Diodorus (who incorrectly places it on the Euphrates), describes it as an oblong quadrangle of 150 stadia by 90, making the circuit of the walls 480 stadia (more than 55 statute miles); if so, the city was twice as large as London together with its suburbs. (Strab. p. 737; Diod. ii. 3, 7.) But the statements of Diodorus on this subject cannot have much weight. A more correct estimation gives about eight and a half miles for its circumference exclusive of suburbs. The walls of Nineveh are described as 100 feet high, and thick enough to allow three chariots to pass each other on them: with 1500 towers, 200 feet in height. The city is said to have been entirely destroyed by fire when it was taken by the Medes and Babylonians, about B.C. 606. In the time of Xenophon in an almost unknown character, called, from its shape, cuneiform or arrow-headed. Since the year 1843 those shapeless mounds have been shown to contain the remains of great palaces, on the walls of which the scenes of Assyrian life and the records of Assyrian conquests are sculptured; while the efforts which had long been made to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions found in Persia and Babylonia, as well as Assyria, have been crowned with remarkable success and have given the means of ascertaining the early history and the religion of Assyria. The excavations conducted by Sir H. Layard and M. Botta in 1843, 1845, brought to light the sculptured remains of immense palaces, not only at the traditional site of Nineveh—namely, Kouyunjik and Nebbi-Yunus, opposite to Mosul, and at Khorsabad, about ten miles to the NNE.—but also in a mound, 18 miles lower down the river, in the tongue of land between the Tigris and the Great Zab, which still bears the name of Nimrud [see above.] These excavations have been pursued at various times since, especially in 1876. Many pieces of sculpture obtained from the ruins may be seen in the British Museum.

Nīōbē (Nīōβη). 1. Daughter of Tantalus by the Pleiad Taygete or the Hyad Dione (Ov. Met. vi. 174; Hyg. Fab. 9). She was the sister of Pelops, and the wife of Amphion, king of the ruins, then completely desolate, were called Mespila. Xenophon (An. iii. 4, 10) describes the walls as of brick, built on a foundation of λίθος κογχυλιάτης (apparently indusial limestone). He gives the circuit as six parasangs (about 20 miles), which probably included the ruined villages in the suburbs. The site is mentioned by Arrian (Ind. 42), and Nineveh is classed among old ruined cities by Pausanias (viii. 33, 2). A Roman colony, however, was established on or near its site, and called Ninus or Nīniva Claudiopolis (see Tac. Ann. xii. 13; Amn. Marc. xviii. 7; and coins of Trajan, Maximinus, Severus, and Gordian). Of all the great cities of the world none was thought to have been more utterly lost than the capital of Assyria. Tradition pointed out a few shapeless mounds opposite Mosul on the Upper Tigris, as all that remained of Nineveh; and a few fragments of masonry were occasionally dug up there and elsewhere in Assyria, bearing inscrip-

Thebes, by whom she became the mother of six sons and six daughters. Being proud of the number of her children, she deemed herself superior to Leto, who had given birth to only two children. Apollo and Artemis, indignant at such presumption, slew all her children with their arrows. For nine days their bodies lay in their blood without anyone burying them, for Zeus had changed the people into stones; but on the tenth day the gods themselves buried them. Niobe herself, who had gone to Mount Sipylus, was changed into stone, and still periodically wept for her children in streams which trickled down the rock. (Il. xxiv. 602-617; cf. Apollod. iii. 5, 6; Soph. Ant. 824; Paus. viii. 2, 7; Ov. Met. vi. 155-342.) This is the Homeric story, which later writers have greatly modified and enlarged. The number and names of the children of Niobe vary very much in the different accounts; for while Homer states that their number was 12, Hesiod and others mentioned 20, Alcman only 6, Sappho 18, and Herodotus 4; but the most commonly received number in later times appears to have been 14—namely, 7 sons and 7 daughters (Apollod., Ov., ll. cc.; Ael. V. H. xii. 36; Gell. xx. 6; Schol. ad Eur. Phoen. 156; Eustath. Hom. p. 1367; Hyg. Fab. 11; Tzet. ad Lyc. 520). According to Homer all the children of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis; but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterwards called Chloris (Apollod. l.c.; Paus. ii. 21, 9, v. 16, 3). The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. This is owing to the fact that the story also belonged to Thebes, where

Amphion reigned, and the tombs of Niobe's children were shown at Thebes (Paus. ix. 16, 17). Others make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, to her father Tantalus on Mount Sipylus, where Zeus, at her own request, changed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. The idea of the slaughter of the children by Apollo is probably a poetical myth of streams flowing down a rock-face from the melted snow in spring and dried up by the heat of the summer sun; but the localisation at Mount Sipylus has a more definite cause. Here were rock sculptures with the figures of the goddess Cybele, which the author of the description in the Iliad must have seen himself. Pausanias (i. 21, 5) says that he saw it; but of course in his time, as in the time of the Iliad, it was connected with the legend of Niobe. It is likely that this was one of the two sculptured figures (probably Hittite) mentioned by Herodotus ii. 106, of which the other was the so-called Sesostris [see p. 216, a]. He cannot have visited them himself, since he places them together, whereas one is on the road from Phocaea to Sardis, the other on the road from Ephesus to Sardis.—The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists. It was carved in relief on the throne of Zeus at Olympia; but the most famous representation was a work of which a copy is still extant: the group of Niobe and her children, which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome (Plin. xxxvi. 28). There was a dispute even in Pliny's time whether the author of the original was Scopas or Praxiteles, which is continued at the present day. Most authorities believe that Scopas was the sculptor of the original, but some have traced a resemblance in type to that of the Hermes of Praxiteles. The copy of this group (which possibly follows a detailed description in the lost Niobe of Sophocles) is now at Florence, and consists of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and thirteen statues of her sons and daughters, besides a figure usually called the pedagogue of the children. The central figures of this group are given on p. 604.

Niphates (δ Νιφάρης, i.e. Snow-mountain: Balan), a mountain chain of Armenia, forming an E. prolongation of the Taurus from where it is crossed by the Euphrates towards the Lake of Van, before reaching which it turns to the S., and approaches the Tigris below Tigraucerta; thus surrounding on the N. and E. the basin of the highest course of the Tigris (which is enclosed on the S. and SW. by Mount Masius), and dividing it from the valley of the Arsarius (Murad) or S. branch of the Euphrates. The continuation of Mount Niphates to the SE. along the E. margin of the Tigris valley is formed by the mountains of the Carduchi (Mountains of Kurdistan). (Strab. pp. 522, 529; Ptol. v. 13, 4; Verg. Georg. iii. 30; Hor. Od. ii. 9, 20.) Some Roman poets mistook it for a river (Lucan, iii. 245; Juv. vi. 409; Sil. xiii. 765). The geographers give no countenance for the idea that there was a river of the same name, and perhaps the error may have grown out of a misunderstanding of the passages in Virgil and Horace, which might easily be supposed to refer to a river.

Nireus (Nιρεός), son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus). Later writers relate that he was slain by Eurypylos or Aeneas. (Il. ii. 671; Diod. v. 53; Dict. Cret. iv. 17; Hyg. Fab. 113, 276.)

Nisaea. [MEGARA.]

Nisaea, Nisaei, Nisaeus Campus (Νισαία, Νισαῖοι, τὸ Νισαίων πεδῖον). These names are found in the Greek and Roman writers used for various places on the S. and SE. of the Caspian: thus one writer mentions a city Nisaea in Margiana, and another a people Nisaei in the N. of Aria; but most apply the term Nisaeau Plain to a plain in the N. of Great Media, near Rhagae, the pasture-ground of a great number of horses of the finest breed, which supplied the studs of the king and nobles of Persia. It seems not unlikely that this breed of horses was called Nisaeau from their original home in Margiana (a district famous for its horses) and that the Nisaeau plain received its name from the horses kept in it. (Strab. pp. 529, 536; Suid. s.v.)

Nisibis (Νισίβις: Νισιβηνός). 1. Also Antiochia Mygdoniae (O.T. Aram Zoba? Ru. nr. Nisibin), a celebrated city of Mesopotamia, and the capital of the district of Mygdonia, stood on the river Mygdonius (Nahr-al-Hualé) thirty-seven Roman miles SW. of Tigraucerta, in a very fertile district. It was the centre of a considerable trade, a metropolis of the province of Mesopotamia after the time of Alex. Severus, and was of great importance as a military post. In the successive wars between the Romans and Tigranes, the Parthians, and the Persians, it was several times taken and retaken, until at last it fell into the hands of the Persians in the reign of Jovian. (Strab. pp. 522, 747; Plut. Lucull. 32; Dio Cass. lxxviii. 23, lxxv. 2; Amm. Marc. xxv. 9.)—2. A city of Aria, at the foot of Mount Paropamisus (Ptol. v. 18, 11).

Nisus (Nĩsoos) 1. King of Megara, was son of Pandion and Pyliia, brother of Aegeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. When Megara was besieged by Minos, Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended. Nisus thereupon died, and Minos obtained possession of the city. Minos, however, was so horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter, that he ordered Scylla to be fastened to the poop of his ship, and afterwards drowned her in the Saronic gulf. (Apollod. iii. 15, 5-8; Paus. ii. 34, 7; Schol. ad Eur. Hippol. 1090.) According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust; Scylla leapt into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into a sea-eagle (haliaeetus), pounced down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris (Ov. Met. viii. 6-151; Verg. Georg. i. 404; Hyg. Fab. 198).—Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, is sometimes confounded by the poets with Scylla the daughter of Phorcus (Verg. Ecl. vi. 74). Hence the latter is sometimes erroneously called Niseia virgo, and Nisēis. [SCYLLA.]—Nisaea, the port town of Megara, is supposed to have derived its name from Nisus, and the promontory of Scyllaeum from his daughter. The Megarian tradition (Paus. i. 89, 6) records a dispute for the sovereignty of Megara between Nisus and Sciron, decided by Aeneas, the arbitrator, in favour of Nisus, who was to be king while Sciron was to be general. In this tradition Nisus had a daughter Iphinoe, whose husband, Megareus, succeeded Nisus in the kingdom; nothing is known in this Megarian account of the war with Minos. The story of Scylla and her treachery appears, therefore, to be mainly of Athenian origin, with an end very common in Attic stories (especially in those which refer to the children of Pandion), the metamorphosis of the chief actors into birds.—2. Son of Hyrtacus, and a friend of Euryalus. The two friends accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and perished in a night attack against the Rutulian camp. (Verg. Aen. ix. 176 ff.)

Nisyros (Nĩsoypos; Nikero), a small island in the Carpathian Sea, a little distance off the promontory of Caria called Triopiium, of a round form, eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) in circuit, and composed of lofty rocks, the highest being 2271 feet high. Its volcanic nature gave rise to the fable respecting its origin, that Poseidon tore it off the neighbouring island of Cos to hurl it upon the giant Polybotes [p. 365, a]. It was celebrated for its warm springs, wine, and mill-stones. Its capital, of the same name, stood on the NW. of the island, where considerable ruins of its Acropolis remain. (Strab. pp. 488, 650.) Its first inhabitants are said to have been Carians; but already in the heroic age it had received a Dorian population, like other islands near it, with which it is mentioned by Homer as sending troops to the Greeks. It received other Dorian settlements in the historical age (Il. ii. 676; Diod. v. 54; Hdt. vii. 99). At the time of the Persian war, it belonged to the Carian queen Artemisia; it next became a tributary ally of Athens; though transferred to the Spartan alliance by the issue of the Peloponnesian war, it was recovered for Athens by the victory at Cnidus, B.C. 394 (Diod. xiv. 84). After the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, it was assigned to Rhodes; and, with the rest of the Rhodian republic, was united to the Roman empire about B.C. 70.

Nitiobriges, a Celtic people in Gallia Aquitania between the Garumna and the Liger, whose fighting force consisted of 5000 men (Caes. B.G. vii. 46; Strab. p. 190; Ptol. ii. 7, 4). Their chief town was AGINNUM (Agen).

Nitocris (Nĩτωκρις). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 185-189), who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. It is supposed that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned B.C. 604-562 [BABYLON].—2. or Nit-aquest, a queen of Egypt, was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, Men-kara, of the sixth dynasty, whom the Egyptians had killed, about 3060 B.C. The story in Herodotus is that in order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother, she built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet she let in upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe, and drowned them all, and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes (Hdt. ii. 100). Manetho describes her as the most beautiful woman in Egypt and the builder of the third pyramid, by which we are to understand that she finished the third pyramid, which had been begun by Men-kara, or MYCERINUS, 600 years before. This agrees with the fact that the pyramid, which contains two sarcophagus chambers, has been enlarged since its first building. Nitocris was the last sovereign of the sixth dynasty, and her reign corresponds with a period of confusion which might be explained by the circumstances in her story.

Nitriæ, Nitriariæ (Nĩτρίαι, Nĩτρία, Nĩτρίαται; Wadi-en-Natron), the celebrated natron lakes in Lower Egypt, which lay in a valley on the SW. margin of the Delta, and gave to the surrounding district the name of the Νομὸς Νιτρίωτις or Νιτρίωτης, and to the inhabitants, whose chief occupation was the extraction of the natron from the lakes, the names of Νιτρίωται (Plin. xxxi. 111; Strab. p. 803; Ptol. iv. 5, 25). This district was (according to Strabo) the chief seat of the worship of Scapis, and the only place in Egypt where sheep were sacrificed.

Nixi Dii, were (probably erroneously) supposed to be gods who, in conjunction with Lucina, aided in childbirth (Ov. Met. ix. 294; Fest. p. 174). Festus says that there were three statues in the Capitol before the cella of Minerva in a kneeling attitude which were said to have been brought by Acilius from Syria, and to represent deities aiding in childbirth. It is altogether contrary to ordinary mythology that male deities should preside over childbirth, and it is supposed that these statues were really only kneeling figures supporting a slab

(as telamones) which had formed part of the spoils in the Syrian war and the significance of which had been misinterpreted.

Nōbillor, Fulvius. The Fulvii were a plebeian family with the name Paetinus, and the name of Nobilior was first assumed for distinction by No. 1.—1. Ser., consul B.C. 255, with M. Aemilius Paulus, about the middle of the first Punic war. The two consuls were sent to Africa, to bring off the survivors of the army of Regulus. On their way to Africa they gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians; but on their return to Italy, they were wrecked off the coast of Sicily, and most of their ships were destroyed. (Pol. i. 36; Eutrop. ii. 22.)—2. M., grandson of the preceding, curule aedile 195; praetor 193, when he defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took the town of Toletum (Liv. xxxv. 7, 22, xxxvi. 21, 39); and consul 189, when he received the conduct of the war against the Aetolians. He took the town of Ambracia, and compelled the Aetolians to sue for peace (Pol. xxii. 8–15; Liv. xxxviii. 3–35, xxxix. 22). On his return to Rome in 187, he celebrated a most splendid triumph. In 179 he was censor with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus. Fulvius Nobilior had a taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign; and he belonged to that party among the Roman nobles who were introducing into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement (Cic. Tusc. 1, 2, de Orat. iii. 63). He was therefore attacked by Cato the censor, who made merry with his name, calling him mobilior instead of nobilior. Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as a proof that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts; and he adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Aetolia (Cic. pro Arch. 11, 27; Plin. xxxv. 66; Macrob. i. 12).—3. M., son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 171; curule aedile 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed; and consul 159 (Liv. xlii. 32).—4. Q., also son of No. 2, consul 153, when he had the conduct of the war against the Celtiberi in Spain, by whom he was defeated. He was censor in 136. He inherited his father's love for literature; he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony. (App. Hisp. 45–47; Pol. xxxv. 4; Cic. Brut. 20, 99.)

Nōla (Nolānus; Nola), one of the most ancient towns in Campania, twenty-one Roman miles SE. of Capua, on the road from that place to Nuceria. Its origin is doubtful. Hecataeus calls it an Ausonian city (Steph. Byz. s.v.), which merely means that he considered it very ancient. It seems to have received a colony from Cumae, since it is called Chalcidian (Just. xx. 1, Sil. It. xii. 161). Other writers asserted an Etruscan origin (Vell. Pat. i. 7). It is quite possible that there was an old Italian city on that spot; occupied by Etruscan invaders and subsequently colonised from Cumae, if the statement of Justin and Silius is to be accepted. In B.C. 327 Nola was sufficiently powerful to send 2000 soldiers to the assistance of Neapolis. In 313 the town was taken by the Romans (Liv. viii. 23, ix. 28). It retained the Oscan language (in which its name was Nuvia) till after the Punic wars, though on coins the Greek lettering appears earlier. It remained faithful to the Romans even after the battle of Cannae, when the other Campanian towns revolted to Hannibal; and it was allowed in consequence to retain its own constitution as an ally of the Romans (Liv. xxiii. 14–46). In the Social war it fell into the hands of the confederates, and was taken by Sulla (Liv. Ep. 99), and probably received a military colony. It was again colonised by Augustus, and also by Vespasian. The emperor Augustus died at Nola (Plin. iii. 63; Suet. Aug. 98; Tac. Ann. i. 5). It was still a wealthy city after Alaric invaded Italy (Aug. C. D. i. 10), but was destroyed by Genseric, A.D. 455. In the neighbourhood of the town some of the most beautiful Campanian vases have been found in modern times. According to an ecclesiastical tradition, church bells were invented at Nola, and were hence called Campanae.

Nomentānus, mentioned by Horace, as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. The Scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus (Hor. Sat. i. 1, 102, ii. 8, 23, 25, 60).

Nōmentum (Nomentanus; Mentana), originally a Latin town founded by Alba, but subsequently a Sabine town, fourteen (Roman) miles from Rome, from which the Via Nomentana (more anciently Via Ficulensis) and the Porta Nomentana at Rome derived their name. The neighbourhood of the town was celebrated for its wine. (Verg. Aen. vi. 773; Liv. i. 38, iv. 22, viii. 14; Dionys. ii. 53, v. 61; Mart. x. 48.)

Nōmia (τὰ Νόμια), a mountain in Arcadia on the frontiers of Laconia, is said to have derived its name from a nymph Nomia.

Nōmius (Νόμιος), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Hermes, and Aristaeus.

Nōnācris (Νόνακρῖς: Νωνακριάτης, Νωνακρῖεύς), a town in the N. of Arcadia, NW. of Phe-neus, was surrounded by lofty mountains, in which the river Styx took its origin. The town is said to have derived its name from Nonacris, the wife of Lycaon. (Hdt. vi. 74; Paus. viii. 17, 6.) From this town Hermes is called Nonacriates, Evander Nonacrius, Atalanta Nonacria, and Callisto Nonacrina virgo, as Arcadian (Ov. Met. ii. 409, viii. 426, Fast. v. 97).

Nōnius Marcellus, a Latin grammarian, a native of Thubursicum Numidarum in Africa (see subscriptions of his work, and C. I. L. viii. 4878). He cannot be the Marcellus of Auson. Prof. Burd. 19. He probably lived early in the fourth century A.D., since in one MS. there is a note of a commentary on his work by a certain Julius Tryphonianus, A.D. 402. His work entitled De Compendiosa Doctrina is in twenty books, of which the sixteenth is lost. It is intended as a book of reference to explain difficulties of words which occur in Latin authors, playing the parts both of a glossary and a manual of antiquities. His citations from books which have perished, especially those of early writers, make his work extremely valuable, us giving a clue in many cases alike to the language and subject matter.

Nōnius Sufēnas. [SUFENAS.]

Nonnus (Νόννος). 1. A Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and lived in the fifth century of the Christian era. Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he became a Christian. He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Dionysiaca or Bassarica (Διονυσιακά or Βασσαρικά), and which consists of forty-eight books. The work is not without poetic spirit, though somewhat turgid in style. It supplies information on the growth and development of the myths of Dionysus. Edited by Graefe, Lips. 1826, and by A. Köchly, Lips. 1858. Nonnus also made a paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John in hexameter verse, which is likewise extant. Edited by Heinsius, Lugd. Bat. 1627.—2. Theophanes Nonnus, a Greek medical writer who lived in the tenth century after Christ. The work is entitled a 'Compendium of the whole Medical Art,' and is compiled from previous writers. Edited by Bernard, Gothae et Amstel. 1794, 1795, 2 vols.

Nōra (τὰ Νῶρα: Νωρανός, Noreusis). 1. (Pula), one of the oldest cities of Sardinia, founded by Iberian settlers under Norax (Paus. x. 17, 5), stood on a promontory now called C. di Pula, twenty miles S. of Cagliari (Cic. Scour. 1, 2; Ptol. iii. 313).—2. A mountain fortress of Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia, on the N. side of the Taurus, noted for the siege sustained in it by Eumenes against Antigonus. Some modern travellers place it at Zengibar Kalesi, others on the N. side of Hassan Dagh. In the time of Strabo, who calls it Νηροασσός, it was the treasury of Sisinas, a pretender to the throne of Cappadocia (Strab. p. 537; Plut. Eum. 10).

Norba (Norbanensis, Norbanus). 1. (Norma), a strongly fortified town in Latium on the slope of the Volscian mountains midway between Cora and Setia, originally belonged to the Latin and subsequently to the Volscian League (Dionys. v. 61, vii. 13). As early as B.C. 492 the Romans founded a colony at Norba. In the Punic wars it was faithful to Rome. It espoused the cause of Marius in the Civil war, and was destroyed by fire by its own inhabitants, when it was taken by one of Sulla's generals. (Liv. ii. 34, xvii. 10; App. B. C. i. 94.) There are still remains of polygonal walls, and a subterranean passage at Norma.—2. Surnamed Caesareā or Caesariana (Cacere), a Roman colony in Lusitania on the left bank of the Tagus, NW. of Augusta Emerita. The bridge built by order of Trajan over the Tagus at this place is still extant. It is 600 feet long by twenty-eight wide, and contains six arches. (Ptol. ii. 5, 8; Plin. iv. 117.)—3. (Conversano), in Apulia, between Barium and Taroutum.

Norbānus, C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 95, when he accused Q. Servilius Caepio of majestas, but was himself accused of the same crime in the following year, on account of disturbances which took place at the trial of Caepio (Cic. de Or. ii. 48, 199, 200). In 90 or 89, Norbanus was praetor in Sicily during the Marsic war; and in the civil wars he espoused the Marian party. He was consul in 83, when he was defeated by Sulla near Capua. In the following year, 82, he joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. Norbanus escaped from Italy, and fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life, when his person was demanded by Sulla. (App. B. C. i. 82-91; Vell. Pat. ii. 25; Plut. Sull. 27.)

Norbānus Flaccus. [FLACCUS.]

Norēia (Νωρῆια: Neumarkt in Styria), the ancient capital of the Taurisci or Norici in Noricum, from which the whole country probably derived its name. It was situated in the centre of Noricum, a little S. of the river Noarus, and on the road from Virunum to Ovilava. It is celebrated as the place where Carbo was defeated by the Cimbri, B.C. 113. It was besieged by the Boii in the time of Julius Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 5; Strab. p. 214.)

Noricum (i.e. Noricum Regnum), a Roman province S. of the Danube, was bounded on the N. by the Danube, on the W. by Raetia and Vindelicia, on the E. by Pannonia, and on the S. by Pannonia and Italy. It was separated from Raetia and Vindelicia by the river Aenus (Inn), from Pannonia and the E. by M. Cetus, and from Pannonia and Italy on the S. by the river Savus, and the Alpes Carnicae. It thus corresponds to the greater part of Styria and Carinthia, and a part of Austria, Bavaria, and Salzburg. Noricum was a mountainous country, for it was not only surrounded on the S. and E. by mountains, but a continuation of the Raetian Alps, sometimes called ALPES NORICAE (in the neighbourhood of Salzburg), ran right through the province. In those mountains a large quantity of excellent iron was found; and the Noric swords were celebrated in antiquity. Gold also is said to have been found in the mountains in ancient times. (Hor. Od. i. 16, 9, Epod. xvii. 71; Mart. iv. 55; Ov. Met. xiv. 711; Strab. pp. 208, 214.) The dominant race in the country were Celts, divided into several tribes, of which the Taurisci, also called Norici, after their capital Noreia, were the most important. The bulk of the population was Illyrian, subordinate to the Celtic tribes; the whole country was styled a kingdom, and the name Noricum Regnum was retained after its conquest by the Romans (C. I. L. iii. 4828). They were conquered by the Romans B.C. 16 (Dio Cass. liv. 20), after the subjugation of Raetia by Tiberius and Drusus, and their country was formed into a Roman province. In the later division of the Roman empire into smaller provinces, Noricum was formed into two provinces, N. Ripense, along the bank of the Danube, and N. Mediterraneum, separated from the former by the mountains which divide Austria and Styria: they both belonged to the diocese of Illyricum and the prefecture of Italy. The Roman colonies and chief towns were Virunum and Ovilava: other important places were Celeia, Jovavum and Lauriacum.

Nortia or Nurtia, an Etruscan divinity of Fortune, worshipped at Volsinii, where a nail was driven every year into the wall of her temple, for the purpose of marking the number of years (Liv. vii. 3; Juv. x. 74).

Nossis, a Greek poetess, of Loeri in Italy. lived about B.C. 310, and is the author of twelve epigrams in the Greek Anthology.

Nōtus. [VENTI.]

Novaria (Novarensis: Novara), a town in Gallia Transpadana, situated on a river of the same name (Gogna), subsequently a Roman municipium (Ptol. iii. 1, 3; Tac. Hist. i. 70).

Novensiles or Novensides Dii. [INDIGETES, p. 442.]

Novesium (Neuss), a fortified town of the Ubii on the Rhine, and on the road leading from Colonia Agrippina (Cologne) to Castra Vetera (Xanten). The fortifications were restored by Julian, in A.D. 359. (Amm. Marc. xxvii.)

Noviodūnum, a name given to many Celtic places from their being situated on a hill (dun). 1. (Nouan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Gallia Aquitania, E. of their capital, Avaricum. (Caes. B. G. vii. 12.)—2. (Nevers), a town of the Aedui in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the road from Augustodunum to Lutetia, and at the confluence of the Nivernis and the Liger, whence it was subsequently called Nevirnum, and thus acquired its modern name (Caes. B. G. vii. 55).

—3. A town of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the same as Augusta Suessomun. [Augusta, No. 6.]—4. (Nion), a town of the Helvetii in Gallia Belgica, on the N. bank of the Lacus Lemanus, was made a Roman colony by Julius Caesar, B.C. 45, under the name of Colonia Equestris [p. 391, b.]—5. (Isaczi), a fortress in Moesia Inferior on the Danube, near which Valens built his bridge of boats across the Danube in his campaign against the Goths.

Noviomagus. 1. (Castelnaud de Médoc), a town of the Bituriges Visicvi in Gallia Aquitania, NW. of Burdigala (Ptol. ii. 7, 8).—2. (Lisieux), a town of the ΛΕΧΟΝΙΙ (Ptol. ii. 8, 2).—3. (Spires), the capital of the Nemetes. [NEMETES.]—4. (Neumagen), a town of the Treviri in Gallia Belgica on the Mosella.—5. (Nimwegen), a town of the Batavi.

Nōvius, Q., a writer of Atellane plays, a contemporary of the dictator Sulla (Macrob. i. 10; Gell. xv. 13).

Novum Comum. [COMUM.]

Nox. [NYX.]

Nūba Palus (Νοῦβα λίμνη), a lake in Central Africa, receiving the great river Gir, according to Ptolemy (iv. 6, 14).

Nūbae, Nubaei (Νοῦβαι, Νουβαῖοι), an African people, situated on the W. side of the Nile, S. of Meroë—that is, in the N. central part of Nubia; the Nubae were governed by princes of their own, independent of Meroë. By the reign of Diocletian they had advanced northwards as far as the frontier of Egypt. (Strab. pp. 786, 819; Ptol. iv. 7, 30.)

Nūcēria (Nucerinus). 1. (Nocera), surnamed Alfaterna, probably from an Oscan tribe of which Nuceria was the chief town, a town in Campania on the Sarnus (Sarno), and on the Via Appia, SE. of Nola, and nine (Roman Bruttium, whose coins have a Greek inscription. Its site is fixed by the modern Nocera.

Nuithones, a people of Germany, dwelling on the right bank of the Albis (Elbe), SW. of the Saxones, and N. of the Langobardi, in the modern Mecklenburg (Tac. Germ. 40.)

Nūma, Marcius. 1. A friend of Numa Pompilius, whom he is said to have accompanied to Rome, where Numa made him the first Pontifex Maximus. Marcius aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius. (Plut. Num. 5; Liv. i. 20.) His name combines the two names of Numa and Ancus Marcius, and belongs to the traditions of the origin of the Roman religious rites.—2. Son of the preceding, is said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius praefectus urbi. (Plut. Num. 21, Coriol. 1; Tac. Ann. vi. 17.)

Nūma, Pompilius, the second king of Rome, who belongs to legend, and not to history. He was a native of Cures in the Sabine country, and was elected king one year after the death of Romulus, when the people became tired of the interregnum of the senate. He was renowned for his wisdom and his piety; and it was generally believed that he had derived his knowledge from Pythagoras. His reign was long and peaceful, and he devoted his chief care to the establishment of religion among his rude subjects. He was instructed by the Camena Egeria, who visited him in a grove near Rome. [EGERIA.] He was revered by the Romans as the author of their whole religious worship. It was he who first appointed the pontiffs, the augurs, the flamens, the virgins of Vesta, and the Salii. He founded the temple of Janus, which remained always shut during his reign. The length of his reign is stated differently. Livy makes it forty-three years; Polybius and Cicero, thirty-nine years. The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident, 500 years afterwards, in B.C. 181. They were carried to the city-praetor Petilius, and were found to consist of twelve or seven books in Latin on religious ordinances, and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy; the latter were burnt on the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. (Plut. Numa; Liv. i. 18-21; Cic. de Rep. ii. 13-15; Dionys. ii. 58; Val. Max. i. 1, 12.) The story of the discovery of these books is evidently false; and the books which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion. The story of the reign of Numa himself arose from the desire to ascribe the foundation of the Roman religion to a sacerdotal monarch, and Ancus was introduced to supply the military events belonging to the same period and to make Numa, the religious founder, an entirely peaceful king.

Nūmāna (Umana), a town in Picenum, on the road leading from Ancona to Aternum, founded by the Siculi, and subsequently a municipium (Ptol. iii. 1, 21; Sil. It. viii. 431).

Nūmantia (Numantinus; Guarray), the capital of the Pelendones, in Hispania Tarracensis, and the most important town in all Celtiberia, was situated near the sources of the miles from the coast, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was again taken by Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, when it was burnt to the ground (Diod. xix. 65; Strab. p. 247; Liv. xxiii. 15, xxvii. 3). It was subsequently rebuilt, and both Augustus and Nero planted here colonies of veterans (Tac. Ann. xiii. 31).—2. Surnamed Camellaria (Nocera), a town in the interior of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia (Strab. p. 227).—3. (Luzzara), a small town in Gallia Cispadana on the Po, NE. of Brixellum (Ptol. iii. 1, 46).—4. A town of Durius, on a small tributary of this river, and on the road leading from Asturica to Caesaraugusta (Plin. iii. 26; Strab. p. 162). It was strongly fortified by nature, being built on a steep and precipitous, though not lofty, hill, and accessible by only one path, which was defended by ditches and palisades. It was twenty-four stadia in circumference, but was not surrounded by regular walls, which the natural strength of its position rendered unnecessary. It was long the head-quarters of the Celtiberians in their wars with the Romans; and its protracted siege and final destruction by Scipio Africanus the younger (B.C. 133) is one of the most memorable events in the early history of Spain. (App. Hisp. 48-98; Eutrop. iv. 17; cf. Cic. Off. i. 11.)

Numēnius (Νουμήνιος), of Apamea in Syria, a Pythagoreo-Platonic philosopher, about 150 A.D., who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. His object was to trace the doctrines of Plato up to Pythagoras, and at the same time to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi, and Egyptians. Considerable fragments of his works have been preserved by Eusebius, in his Praeparatio Evangelica.

Numerianus, M. Aurélius, the younger of the two sons of the emperor Carus, who accompanied his father in the expedition against the Persians, A. D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the same year, Numerianus was acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The army, alarmed by the fate of Carus, who was struck dead by lightning, compelled Numerianus to retreat towards Europe. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for eight months, he was supposed to be confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes; but the suspicions of the soldiers having become excited, they forced their way into the imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince (Vopis. Numer.; Eutrop. ix. 12; Zonar. xii. 30). Arrius Aper, praefect of the praetorians, and father-in-law of the deceased, was arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcodon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor. [DIOCLETIANUS.]

Nūmicus or Nūmicus (Rio Torto), a small river in Latium flowing into the Tyrrhene sea between Lavinium and Ardea. It was connected in legends with the deaths both of Aeneas and of Anna, and with the worship of Jupiter Indiges [see pp. 25, a; 72, a; 442, b].

Numīdia (Νουμιδία, ἢ Νομαδία and Νομαδική: Νομάς, Numīda, pl. Νομάδες or Νομάδες Ἀλβες, Numīdae: Algier), a country of N. Africa, which, in its original extent, was divided from Mauretania on the W. by the river Malva or Moluchath (Wed Muhuya), and on the E. from the territory of Carthage (aft. the Roman province of Africa) by the river Tusca; its N. boundary was the Mediterranean, and on the S. it extended indefinitely towards the chain of the Great Atlas and the country of the Gaetuli (App. Pun. 106; Sall. Jug. 19, 92). Intersected by the chain of the Lesser Atlas, and watered by the streams running down from it, it abounded in fine pastures, which were early taken possession of by wandering tribes of Asiatic origin, who from their occupation as herdsmen were called by the Greeks, here as elsewhere, Νομάδες, and this name was perpetuated in that of the country. A sufficient account of these tribes, and of their connexion with their neighbours on the W., is given under MAURETANIA. The fertility of the country, inviting to agriculture, gradually gave a somewhat more settled character to the people; and at their first appearance in Roman history we find their two great tribes, the Massylians and the Massacsylians, forming two monarchies, which were united into one under Masinissa, B. C. 201. (For the historical details, see MASINISSA). On Masinissa's death in 148, his kingdom was divided, by his dying directions, between his three sons, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa; but it was soon reunited under MICIPSA, in consequence of the death of both his brothers. His death, in 118, was speedily followed by the usurpation of Jugurtha, an account of which and of the ensuing war with the Romans is given under JUGURTHA. On the defeat of Jugurtha in 106, the country became virtually subject to the Romans, but they permitted the family of Masinissa to govern it with the royal title (see HIEMPSAL, No. 2; JUBA, No. 1), until B. C. 46, when Juba, who had espoused the cause of Pompey in the civil wars, was defeated and dethroned by Julius Caesar, and Numidia was made a Roman province. (Bell. Afr. 97; Dio Cass. xliii. 9; App. B. C. ii. 100.) In B. C. 30 Augustus restored Juba II. to his father's kingdom of Numidia; but in B. C. 25 he exchanged it for Mauretania, and Numidia was then contracted so as to retain only that part of the ancient Numidia which lay to the E. of the river Ampsaga and to extend as far as the borders of Cyrenaica. (Plin. v. 22; Ptol. iv. 2, 1; Strab. p. 340.) It was again diminished by near a half, under Claudius (see MAURETANIA); and henceforth, until the Arab conquest, the senatorial province of Numidia denotes the district between the river Ampsaga on the W. and the Tusca on the E.: its capital was Cirta (Constantineh). [AFRICA, p. 32, a.] The country, in its later restricted limits, is often distinguished by the name of New Numidia or Numidia Proper. The Numidians furnished the best light cavalry to the armies, first of Carthage, and afterwards of Rome.

Numīdicus Sinus (Νουμιδικὸς κόλπος: Bay of Storah), the great gulf E. of Pr. Tretum (Seven Capes), on the N. of Numidia.

Numistro (Numistriānus), a town in Lucania near Apulia (Liv. xxvii. 2; Ptol. iii. 1, 74).

Nūmitor. [ROMULUS.]

Nursia (Nursinus: Norcia), a town in the N. of the land of the Sabines, situated near the sources of the Nar and amidst the Apennines, whence it is called by Virgil (Aen. vii. 716) frigida Nursia (cf. Sil. It. viii. 417). It was the birthplace of Sertorius and of the mother of Vespasian (Suet. Vesp. 1; Plut. Sert. 2).

Nyctēis (Νυκτῆης), that is, Antiope, daughter of Nycteus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. [ANTIOPE; NYCTEUS.]

Nycteus (Νυκτεύς), son of Hyricus by the nymph Clonia, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he became the father of Antiope; though, according to some, Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus (Or. xi. 259; Apollod. iii. 10, 1; Ant. Lib. 25). Antiope was carried off by Epopeus, king of Sicyon; whereupon Nycteus, who governed Thebes, as the guardian of Labdacus, invaded Sicyon with a Theban army. Nycteus was defeated, and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, before his death, he appointed his brother Lycus guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time required him to take vengeance on Epopeus. (Paus. ii. 6, 2; Hyg. Fab. 7; Lycus.)

Nyctimēnē, daughter of Epopeus, king of Lesbos, or, according to some, of Nycteus. Pursued and dishonoured by her father, she concealed herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Athene into an owl. (Ov. Met. ii. 590; Hyg. Fab. 204.)

Nymphæ (Νύμφαι). The worship of the Nymphs was handed down among the most primitive beliefs of the Greeks and Romans, and is illustrated by similar superstitions in almost every nation. The early Greeks and Romans, like other nations in an early stage of civilisation, saw in all the phenomena of ordinary nature some manifestation of the deity: springs, rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, all seemed to them fraught with life; and all were only the visible embodiments of so many divine agents. Over these salutary and beneficent powers of nature watched so many divinities. But the conception of the nymphs (though, as divine, they are often called θεαί: Il. xxiv. 616) differed from that of the great 'Nature' deities in being strictly localised: each spring had its own nymph, or company of nymphs, who could give or refuse the fertilising steam—who might irrigate the land or destroy it by a flood. This belief clearly belongs to an earlier stage than the conception of deities with wide provinces and varied functions, but it was firmly rooted in local traditions, and lasted on beside the later mythology, or in some cases was absorbed into it, so that the newer great deity assumed the character of the nymph of the spot, who thereupon was represented in myth as a friend or attendant of the goddess by whom she was superseded. Homer speaks of them as deities admitted to Olympus (Il. xx. 8), but it is only on a special occasion when every divine being is called to the council. In the Odyssey (vi. 123, ix. 154, xii. 218, xiii. 356, xvii. 240) they are the deities of special hills or fountains, honoured in their own abode; and so Hesiod expresses the old belief in nymphs as guarding the powers of nature when he calls them the children of the earth (Th. 130, 187). When in Homer they are called 'children of Zeus' (κούραι Διός: Il. vi. 420, Od. xiii. 356), it is clear that nothing more definite is meant than that they partook of the divine nature. Already in Homer Artemis (who has to do with woods and streams, having herself, as the Arcadian Artemis, been partly developed from Arcadian stories of nymphs) is the deity who is specially attended by nymphs, now her subordinates, or companions in the dance (Od. vi. 105), just as at a later time Dionysus as god of trees has his attendant nymphs. While it is true that every hill and every tree might have its nymph as well as every spring, yet the water nymphs were those who were most regarded, and who had more distinctive personality, inasmuch as the scarcity or abundance of water was more important than anything else in nature to the herdsmen and agriculturists. Nymphs may, however, be classed under various heads, according to the different parts of nature of which they are the representatives. 1. Nymphs of the watery element. To these belong first the nymphs of the ocean, Oceanides (Ὠκεανίδαι, Ὠκεανίδες, νύμφαι ἄλιαι), who were regarded as the daughters of Oceanus (Hes. Th. 346, 364; Aesch. Pr. 136; Soph. Phil. 1470); and next the nymphs of the Mediterranean or inner sea. [NEREIDES.] The rivers were represented by the Potameides (Ποταμίδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers, as Acheloides, Anigrades, Ismenides, Amnisiades, Pactolides (Ap. Rh. 1219; Verg. Aen. viii. 70;

Ov. Met. vi. 16; Paus. i. 31, v. 5). The nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or springs, were also designated by the general name Naiades (Νηίδες), though they had, in addition, specific names (Κρηναῖαι, Πηγαῖαι, Ἐλειονόμοι, Λιμνατίδες, or Λιμνάδες). (Od. xvii. 240; Theocr. v. 17.) Even the rivers of the lower regions were described as having their nymphs; hence we read of Nymphæ infernae paludis and Avernales (Ov. Met. v. 240, Fast. ii. 610). Many of these nymphs presided over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those who drank of them. The nymphs themselves were therefore thought to be endowed with prophetic power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. [CAMENAE.] There was a belief among Greeks and Romans (analogous to much that appears in popular stories everywhere about water-fairies) that the mortal who saw the nymph was bereft of his senses: hence the expression νυμφόληπτος = frenzied, and in Latin lymphatus or lymphaticus, the names Lymphæ and Nymphæ being originally the same and used interchangeably (Hor. Sat. i. 5, 97; Varr. L. L. vii. 87; C. I. L. v. 3106).—2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, called Oreades (Ὄρειάδες, Ὄροδεμνιάδες), but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited (e.g. Κιθαιρωνίδες, Πηλιάδες, Κορύκλαι). (Od. ix. 154; Theocr. vii. 137; Verg. Aen. i. 168, 500; Paus. ix. 3, x. 32; Ap. Rh. i. 550).—3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed sometimes to appear to and frighten solitary travellers. They are designated by the names Ἄλσηίδες, Ἰγληρωοί, Αἰλωνιάδες, and Ναπαῖαι.—4. Nymphs of trees, were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Dryades and Hamadryades (Δρυάδες, Ἄμαδρυάδες or Ἄδρυάδες), from δρῦς (cf. Μέλιαι, Hes. Th. 187). All these nymphs had their special haunts and abodes in watery glades, in groves, in caves and grottoes. Here sacrifices were offered of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. (Od. xvii. 240; Theocr. v. 12, 53, 139, 140; Serv. ad Georg. iv. 380, ad Ecl. v. 74.) From these local nymphs of springs and woods was developed another class with more definite history and personality, such as Circe and Calypso, who were divine in nature but differed from goddesses in being localised in some particular place on the earth: a similar development was the conception of the nymph who presided over a particular town, e.g. Cyrene. It may be observed that the νύμφη is sometimes called θεός, though the θεός is never called νύμφη. Nymphs were in archaic art represented (as were all goddesses) fully clothed; but as art progressed it was customary to show them less and less clothed and at last wholly naked. They appear as companions or attendants of country deities, such as Pan; often also with Hermes, as a favourite deity of herdsmen; or with Artemis, the goddess of woods and hills; or in their prophetic character with Apollo.

Nymphæum (Νυμφαῖον, i.e. Nymphs' abode). 1. A mountain by the river Aous, near Apollonia, in Illyricum.—2. A port and promontory on the coast of Illyricum, three Roman miles from Lissus (Cacs. B. C. iii. 26).—3. (C. Ghiorgi), the SW. promontory of Acte or Athos, in Chalcidice.—4. A seaport town of the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea) on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, 25 stadia (2½ geographical miles) from Panticapæum (Strab. p. 309; App.

Mithr. 106; Ptol. iii. 6, 3).—5. A place on the coast of Bithynia, thirty stadia (three geographical miles) W. of the mouth of the river Oxines.—6. A place in Cilicia, between Celen-deris and Soloi.

Nymphæus (Νύμφαιος). 1. (Ninfa or Ninpa), a small river of Latium, falling into the sea above Astura; of some note as contributing to the formation of the Pomptine marshes (Plin. iii. 57). It now no longer reaches the sea, but falls into a little lake, called Lago di Monaci.—2. Also called Nymphius (Basilinfa), a small river of Sophene in Armenia, a tributary of the upper Tigris, flowing from N. to S. past Martyropolis, in the valley between M. Niphates and M. Masius (Amm. Marc. xviii. 9; Procop. B. P. i. 8, 21).

Nymphidius Sabinus, commander of the praetorian troops, together with Tigellinus, attempted, on the death of Nero, A.D. 68, to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba (Tac. Ann. xv. 72, Hist. i. 5, 25, 37; Plut. Galb. 8-15).

Nymphis (Νύμφις), son of Xenagoras, a native of the Pontic Heraclea, lived about B.C. 250, and wrote a work on Alexander and his successors, in twenty-four books, and a history of Heraclea in thirteen books (Suid. s. v.).

Nymphodorus (Νυμφόδωρος). 1. A native of Abdera and brother-in-law of Sitalces, king of Thrace: the Athenians made him their pro-xenus in 481, and he negotiated a reconciliation between them and Perdiccas (Hdt. vii. 137; Thuc. i. 29).—2. A Greek historian of Amphipolis, of uncertain date, the author of a work on the Laws or Customs of Asia (Νόμματα Ἀσίας).—3. Of Syracuse, likewise a historian, lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He wrote a Periplus of Asia, and a work on Sicily (Athen. pp. 19, 265).

Nysa (Νύσσα), was the name of the mountain on which Dionysus was supposed to have been nursed by the nymphs [see p. 294, a]. Hence the name was applied to several hills or towns where early culture of the vine gave rise to local traditions of the childhood of the wine-god; or, conversely, the stories may have become attached to places which bore the same name as a Mount Nysa connected with the worship of Dionysus. It is, however, noticeable that most of the places of this name are supposed to have been early homes of the vine. Among the places so named whose position can be fairly determined are the following:—1. (Sultan-Hisar), a town in Caria, on the southern slope of Mount Messogis (which was famed for wine), on a small stream which falls into the Maeander from the north (Strab. p. 650). It was said to have been formerly called Athymbra and to have taken its name from Nysa one of the wives of Antiochus (Steph. Byz. s. v. Αντιόχεια); but that may be only a later attempt to account for the name.—2. A mountain and town in Thrace, which is the Nysa connected with Dionysus in the Iliad (vi. 133; cf. Plin. iv. 36; see p. 295, a).—3. A village on the slopes of Helicon, in Bocotia (Strab. p. 405).—4. A mountain and town in India, connected in myth with the journeys of Dionysus (p. 294), and in reality with the earliest culture of the vine (Arr. An. v. 1, 2, vi. 2, 3; Strab. p. 687).—5. A town in Aethiopia near Meroë. The Homeric hymn xxxiv. speaks of Dionysus as being reared on a mountain in the uttermost parts of Phoenicia (i. e. far south), near the river Aegyptus. Herodotus, following the same tradition, speaks of Dionysus being carried to Nysa, beyond Egypt, in the cinnamon country (prob. Somaliland), and there, he says, were festivals of Dionysus (Hdt. iii. 97, 111).

Nysaeus, Nysius, Nyseus, or Nysigēna, a surname of Dionysus, derived from Nysa, a mountain or city (see above) where the god was said to have been brought up by nymphs.

Nyseides or Nysiades, the nymphs of Nysa, who are said to have reared Dionysus, and whose names are Cisseis, Nysa, Erato, Eriphia, Bromia, and Polyhymno (Ov. Met. iii. 314, Fast. iii. 769; Apollod. iii. 4, 3).

Nysa (Νύσσα), a city of Cappadocia, on the W. side of the Hylus, not far from the river, on the road from Parnassus to Mazara. It was the bishopric of Gregory of Nysa. (Ptol. v. 7, 8.)

Nyx (Νύξ), called Nox by the Romans, was a partial personification of Night, in which much of the abstract idea still remained and the allegory was to a great extent recognised as such. Homer calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Zeus himself stood in awe of her (Il. xiv. 259). In the ancient cosmogonies Night is one of the very first created beings, for she is described as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus, by whom she became the mother of Aether and Hemera. She is further said to have given birth, without a husband, to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Ozizys, the Hesperides, Moerae, Nemesis, and similar beings (Hes. Th. 123, 211, 748; cf. Aesch. Eum. 321). In the later poets Night is sometimes described as a winged goddess, and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment and accompanied by the stars in her course.

O.

Oānus (Ὠάνος: Frascolari), a river on the S. coast of Sicily, near Camarina (Pind. Ol. v. 25).

Oārus (Ὠάρος), a considerable river mentioned by Herodotus as rising in the country of the Thyssagetæ, and falling into the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov) E. of the Tanaïs (Don) (Hdt. iv. 123). As there is no river which very well answers this description, Herodotus probably refers to one of the E. tributaries of the Don, such as the Sal or the Manythæ.

Oāsis (Ὠάσις, Aḡāsis, and in later writers Ὠάσις) is the Greek form of an Egyptian word Uah, an inhabited place, which was used to denote an island in the sea of sand of the great Libyan Desert: the word has been adopted into our language. The Oases are depressions in the great table-land of Libya, preserved from the inroad of the shifting sands by steep hills of limestone round them, and watered by springs, which make them fertile and habitable. With the substitution of these springs for the Nile, they closely resemble that greater depression in the Libyan table-land, the valley of Egypt. The chief specific applications of the word by the ancient writers are to the two Oases on the W. of Egypt, which were taken possession of by the Egyptians at an early period.—1. Oasis Minor, the Lesser or Second Oasis (Ὠάσις Μικρά, or ἡ δευτέρα: Uah el-Bahariye), lay W. of Oxyrynchus, and a good day's journey from the SW. end of the lake Moeris. It was reckoned as belonging to the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt; and formed a separate Nomos. (Ptol. iv. 5, 37; Strab. p. 814).—2. Oasis Major, the Greater, Upper, or First Oasis (Ὠ. μεγάλη, ἡ πρώτη, ἡ ἄνω Ὠ., and, in Herodotus, πόλις Ὠάσις and νῆσος Μακάρων, Uah el-Dakhel), is described by Strabo as seven days' journey W. of Abydos, which applies to its N. end, as it extends over more than $1\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ of latitude. It belonged to Upper Egypt, and, like the other, formed a distinct nome: these two nomes are mentioned together as 'Duo Oasisae' (αἱ δύο Ὀασιῶται) (Hdt. iii. 26, iv. 152; Strab. l. c.; Plin. v. 50). When the ancient writers use the word Oasis alone, the Greater Oasis must generally be understood. This Oasis contains considerable ruins of the ancient Egyptian and Roman periods. It is about level with the valley of the Nile; the Lesser is about 200 feet higher than the Nile, in nearly the same latitude.—3. A still more celebrated Oasis than either of these was that called Ammon, Hammon, Ammonium, Hammônis Oraculum, from its being a chief seat of the worship and oracle of the god AMMON. It was called by the Arabs in the middle ages Santariyah, and now Siwah. It is about six miles long, and three wide: its chief town, Siwah, is in $29^{\circ} 12'$ N. lat., and $26^{\circ} 17'$ E. long.: its distance from Cairo is twelve days, and from the N. coast about 160 statute miles: the ancients reckoned it twelve days from Memphis, and five days from Paraetonium on the N. coast. It was inhabited by various Libyan tribes, but the ruling people were a race kindred to the Aethiopians above Egypt, who, at a period of unknown antiquity, had introduced, probably from Merôë, the worship of Ammon: the government was monarchical. The Ammonians do not appear to have been subject to the old Egyptian monarchy. Cambyses, after conquering Egypt in B.C. 525, sent an army against them, which was overwhelmed by the sands of the Desert. In B.C. 331, Alexander the Great visited the oracle, which hailed him as the son of Zeus Ammon (Arrian. An. iii. 4; Curt. iv. 33). The oracle was also visited by Cato of Utica. Under the Ptolemies and the Romans, it was subject to Egypt, and formed part of the Nomos Libya. The most remarkable objects in the Oasis, besides the temple of Ammon, were the palace of the ancient kings, abundant springs of salt water (as well as fresh) from which salt was made, and a well, called Fons Solis, the water of which was cold at noon, and warm in the morning and evening. Ruins of the temple of Ammon are still standing at Siwah.

Oaxes. [OAXUS.]

Oaxus (Ὀάξος: Ὀάξιος), called Axus (Ἄξος) by Herodotus, a town in the interior of Crete on the river Oaxes (which flows into the sea in the centre of the N. coast of Crete) and near Eleutherna, is said to have derived its name from Oaxes or Oaxus, who was, according to some accounts, a son of Acacallis, the daughter of Minos, and, according to others, a son of Apollo by Anchiale (Hdt. iv. 154; Verg. Ecl. i. 66; Serv. ad loc.).

Obila (Avila), a town of the Vettones in Hispania Tarraconensis (Ptol. ii. 5, 9).

Oblivionis Flumen. [LIMÆA.]

Obrimas (Koja-Chai or Sandukli Chai), an E. tributary of the Maeander, in Phrygia (Liv. xxxviii. 15; Plin. v. 106).

Obringa (Ὀβρίγγα), a W. tributary of the Rhine, forming, according to Ptol. ii. 10, 17, the boundary between Germania Superior and Inferior. It is probably the small river Ahr, which joins the Rhine near Remagen, between Bonn and Andernach.

Obsæquens, Jūlius, the name prefixed to a fragment entitled De Prodigis or Prodigiorum

Libellus, containing a record of the phenomena classed by the Romans under the general designation of Prodigia or Ostenta. The series extends in chronological order from the consulship of Scipio and Laelius, B.C. 190, to the consulship of Fabius and Aelius, B.C. 11. The materials are derived from an abridgment of Livy, whose very words are frequently employed. With regard to the compiler we know nothing. He probably wrote in the fourth century A.D.—Editions by Scheffer, Amst. 1679, and by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat. 1720.

Obucōla, Obucūla, or Obulcūla (Monclova), a town in Hispania Baetica, on the road from Hispalis to Eimerita and Corduba (Ptol. ii. 4, 4; Plin. iii. 12).

Obulco (Porcuna), surnamed Pontificense, a Roman municipium in Hispania Baetica (Strab. pp. 141, 160; Ptol. ii. 4, 11).

Ocalēa (Ὀκαλέα, Ὀκαλέη, also Ἰκαλεία, Ἰκαλείαι: Ἰκαλεύς), a town in Boeotia, between Haliartus and Alalcomenae, situated on a river of the same name falling into the lake Copais, at the foot of the mountain Tilphusion (Il. ii. 501; Hymn. Apoll. 242; Strab. p. 410).

Oceānides. [NYMPHÆA.]

Oceānus (Ὠκεανός), in the oldest Greek poets is the god of the water which was believed to surround the whole earth, and which was supposed to be the source of all the rivers and other waters of the world. In the Homeric mythology Ocean is the father of all things, even of the gods (θεῶν γένεσις), and not only the source from which heaven and earth alike arose, and from which all streams were still derived, but also the bounding limit of everything (Il. xiv. 200, 246, 302; cf. Aristot. Met. A. p. 983), and he has his feminine counterpart, Tethys, who is the mother of all things. In Hesiod he is not, as in Homer, the primary source, but is the son of Heaven and Earth, the husband of Tethys, and the father of all the river-gods and water-nymphs of the whole earth (Th. 133, 337). Another difference in Hesiod is that, instead of all streams coming from Oceanus, and none flowing in, the Styx pours one-tenth of her water into the underworld, but nine-tenths into the ocean; yet Styx also is pictured as originally deriving her water from Ocean, since she is the chief of the daughters of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Th. 361, 789). As to the physical idea attached by the early Greeks to the word, it seems that they regarded the earth as a flat circle, which was encompassed by a river perpetually flowing round it, and this river was Oceanus. Out of and into this river the sun and the stars were supposed to rise and set; and on its banks were the abodes of the dead (Od. x. 508). The conception of Ocean as a stream appears in poetry long after Homer; but Herodotus rejects the idea (ii. 28, iv. 8). From this notion it naturally resulted that, as geographical knowledge advanced, the name was applied to the great outer waters of the earth, in contradistinction to the inner seas, and especially to the Atlantic, or the sea without the Pillars of Hercules (ἡ ἔξω θαλάττα, Mare Exterior) as distinguished from the Mediterranean, or the sea within that limit (ἡ ἐντὸς θαλάττα, Mare Internum); and thus the Atlantic is often simply called Oceanus. The epithet Atlantic (ἡ Ἀτλαντικὴ θάλασσα, Herod., δ' Ἀ. πόντος, Eurip.; Atlanticum Mare) was applied to it from the mythical position of ATLAS being on its shores. The other great waters which were denoted by the same term are described under their specific names.

tribunate of the plebs, 133, when he opposed his tribunitian veto to the passing of the agrarian law. He was in consequence deposed from his office by Tib. Gracchus. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 10.)—6. Cn., a supporter of the aristocratical party, was consul 87 with L. Cornelius Cinna. After Sulla's departure from Italy in order to carry on the war against Mithridates, a vehement contest arose between the two consuls, which ended in the expulsion of Cinna from the city, and his being deprived of the consulship. Cinna soon afterwards returned at the head of a powerful army, accompanied by Marius. Rome was compelled to surrender, and Octavius was one of the first victims in the massacres that followed. His head was cut off and suspended on the rostra. (App. B. C. i. 64–71; Cic. Cat. iii. 10, N. D. ii. 5.)—7. L., son of No. 6, consul 75, died in 74, as proconsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the command of the province by L. Lucullus (Plut. Lucull. 6).—8. Cn., son of No. 7, consul 76.—9. M., son of No. 8, was curule aedile 50, along with M. Caelius. On the breaking out of the Civil war in 49, Octavius espoused the aristocratical party, and served as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. After the battle of Pharsalia, Octavius sailed to Illyricum; but having been driven out of this country (47) by Caesar's legates, he fled to Africa. He was present at the battle of Actium (31), when he commanded part of Antony's fleet. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5; Dio Cass. xlii. 11; Plut. Ant. 65.)—10. C., younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor of Augustus, remained a simple Roman eques, without attempting to rise any higher in the state (Suet. Aug. 2).—11. C., son of No. 10, and great-grandfather of Augustus, lived in the time of the second Punic war, in which he served as tribune of the soldiers. He was present at the battle of Cannae (216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement. (Frontin. Strat. iv. 5, 7; Suet. Aug. 2).—12. C., son of No. 11, and grandfather of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitrae, without aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state (Suet. Aug. 2, 4, 6).—13. C., son of No. 12, and father of Augustus, was praetor 61, and in the following year succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, which he administered with equal integrity and energy. He returned to Italy in 59, and died the following year at Nola, in Campania, in the same room in which Augustus afterwards breathed his last. By his second wife Atia, Octavius had a daughter and a son, the latter of whom was subsequently the emperor Augustus. [AUGUSTUS.]—14. Octāvius Balbus. [BALBUS.]

Octodūrus (Octodurensis: Martigny), a town of the Veragri in the country of the Helvetii, is situated at the point where the valley of the Drance joins the upper Rhone valley. Caesar put Galba there B. C. 56 to keep open for the traders the pass of the Great St. Bernard, the approach to which by the valley of the Drance is completely commanded by Martigny. Galba was attacked by the natives and forced to retreat. (Caes. B. G. iii. 1.) The ancient town, like the modern one, was divided by the Drance into two parts. The inhabitants had the Jus Latii (Plin. iii. 135). Under Diocletian conjointly with Moutiers it was the chief town of the division of the diocese Galliarum which was called Alpes Graiae et Poeninae and was the residence of a praeses.

Octogēsa, a town of the Ibergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Iherus, probably S. of the Sicoris (Caes. B. C. i. 61).

Octolōphus. 1. A town of Lyncestis in Macedonia (Liv. xxxi. 36).—2. A town in Perrhaebia (Liv. xlv. 3).

Ocŷpētē. [HARPYIAE.]

Ocŷrhōē (Ὠκυρόη). 1. One of the daughters of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. Daughter of the centaur Chiron, possessed the gift of prophecy, and is said to have been changed into a mare.

Odenāthus, the ruler of Palmyra, checked the victorious career of the Persians after the defeat and capture of Valerian, A. D. 260, and drove Sapor out of Syria (Procop. Pers. ii. 5). In return for these services, Gallienus bestowed upon Odenathus the title of Augustus. He was soon afterwards murdered, not without the consent, it is said, of his wife Zenobia, 266. He was succeeded by ZENOBIÆ.

Odessus (Ὀδησσός: Ὀδησσίτης, Ὀδησσεύς): (Varna), also called Odysseus and Odissus at a later time, a Greek town in Thracia (in the later Moesia Inferior) on the Pontus Euxinus nearly due E. of Marcianopolis, was founded by the Milesians in the territory of the Crobyzi in the reign of Astyages, king of Media (B. C. 594–559). The town had a good harbour, and carried on an extensive commerce. (Strab. p. 319; Diod. xix. 73; Ov. Trist. i. 9, 37; C. I. L. iii. 762.)

Odoācer, usually called king of the Heruli, was the leader of the barbarians who overthrew the Western empire A. D. 476. He took the title of king of Italy, and reigned till his power was overthrown by Theodoric, king of the Goths. Odoacer was defeated in three decisive battles by Theodoric (489–490), and took refuge in Ravenna, where he was besieged for three years. He capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterwards murdered by his rival (Procop. B. G. i. 1, ii. 6; Jordan. Reb. Goth. pp. 128–141).

Odomantīcē (Ὀδομαντική), a district in the NE. of Macedonia between the Strymon and the Nestus, inhabited by the Thracian tribe of the Odomanti or Odomantes (Hdt. vii. 112; Thuc. ii. 101).

Odrysae (Ὀδρύσαι), the most powerful people in Thrace, dwelt, according to Herodotus, on both sides of the river Artiscus, a tributary of the Hebrus, but also spread further W. over the whole plain of the Hebrus. Soon after the Persian wars Teres, king of the Odrysae, obtained the sovereignty over several of the other Thracian tribes, and extended his dominions as far as the Black Sea. He was succeeded by his son, Sitalces, who became the master of almost the whole of Thrace. His empire comprised all the territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon; and it is described by Thucydides as the greatest of all the kingdoms between the Ionian gulf and the Euxine, both in revenue and opulence (Hdt. iv. 92; Thuc. ii. 96; Strab. p. 331, 38). Sitacles assisted the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war against Perdiccas, king of Macedonia. [SITALCES.] He died B. C. 424, and was succeeded by his nephew Seuthes I. On the death of the latter, about the end of the Peloponnesian war, the power of the Odrysae declined. For the subsequent history of the Odrysae see THRACIA.

Odyssea (Ὀδύσσεια), a town of Hispania Baetica, N. of Abdera amidst the mountains of Turdetania, with a temple of Athene, said to have been built by Odysseus (Strab. pp. 149, 157).

Odysseus (Ὀδυσσεύς), called in Latin Ulixes (less correctly written Ulysses, though that is the form which has prevailed in modern times), one of the principal Greek heroes in the Trojan war. According to the Homeric account, he was a son of Laërtes and Anticlêa, the daughter of Autolycus, and was married to Penelope, the daughter of Icarus, by whom he became the father of Telemachus (Il. iii. 201; Od. i. 329, xi. 85, xvi. 118). But according to a later tradition he was a son of Sisyphus and Anticlêa, who, being with child by Sisyphus, was married to Laërtes, and thus gave birth to him either after her arrival in Ithaca or on her way thither (Soph. Phil. 417, Aj. 190; Ov. Met. xiii. 32; Plut. Q. Gr. 43). Hesiod (Th. 1013, 1014) makes him by Circe father of Agrius, Latinus and (if 1014 is genuine) of Telegonus. Later traditions state that besides Telemachus, Odysseus became by Penelope the father of Arceus and Ptoiporthus; and by Circe the father of Agrius, Latinus, Telegonus, and Cassiphone; by Calypso of Nausithous and Nausinous or Anson, Telegonus, and Teledamus; and lastly, by Eviippe of Leontophron, Doryclus or Euryalus. (Paus. viii. 12, 3; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Schol. ad Lycophr. 795; Parthen. Erot. 3.) The name Odysseus = the angry (ὀδύσσομαι): in Od. xix. 407 it is said that his grandfather Autolycus gave the name because he himself was often at enmity with his fellow-men: in Od. i. 60 there seems to be connexion traced between his name and the anger of the gods which made him a wanderer. His wrath against the suitors is a reason not unfitly suggested. The story ran as follows. As a young man, Odysseus went to see his grandfather Autolycus near Mt. Parnassus. There, in the chase, he was wounded by a boar in the knee, by the scar of which he was subsequently recognised by Euryclia (Od. xix. 413 ff.). Even at that age he was distinguished for courage, for knowledge of navigation, for eloquence and for skill as a negotiator; and, on one occasion, when the Messenians had carried off some sheep from Ithaca, Laërtes sent him to Messene to demand reparation. He there met with Iphitus, who was seeking the horses stolen from him, and who gave him the famous bow of Eurytus. This bow Odysseus used only in Ithaca, regarding it as too great a treasure to be employed in the field, and it was so strong that none of the suitors was able to handle it (Od. xxi. 14 ff.). According to some accounts he went to Sparta as one of the suitors for Helen; and he is said to have advised Tyndareus to make the suitors swear that they would defend the chosen bridegroom against anyone who should insult him on Helen's account. Tyndareus, to show him his gratitude, persuaded his brother Icarus to give Penelope in marriage to Odysseus; or, according to others, Odysseus gained her by conquering his competitors in the foot-race (Apollod. iii. 10, 9; Paus. 12, 2). Homer, however, mentions nothing of all this, and states that Agamemnon, who visited Odysseus in Ithaca, prevailed upon him only with great difficulty to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy (Od. xxiv. 16). Other traditions relate that he was visited by Menelaus and Agamemnon, and that Palamedes more especially induced him to join the Greeks. When Palamedes came to Ithaca, Odysseus pretended to be mad: he yoked an ass and an ox to a plough, and began to sow salt. Palamedes, to try him, placed the infant Telemachus before the plough, whereupon the father could not continue to play his part. He stopped the plough, and was obliged to fulfil the promise he had made when he was one of the suitors of Helen. This occurrence is said to have been the cause of his hatred of Palamedes. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 818; Hyg. Fab. 95; cf. Aesch. Ag. 841.) Being now himself pledged to the undertaking, he contrived to discover Achilles, who was concealed among the daughters of king Lycomedes. [ACHILLES.] Before, however, the Greeks sailed from home, Odysseus in conjunction with Menelaus went to Troy for the purpose of inducing the Trojans to restore Heleu and her treasures (Il. iii. 206; MENELAUS). When the Greeks were assembled at Aulis, Odysseus joined them with twelve ships and men from Cephallene, Ithaca, Neriton, Crocylia, Zacynthus, Samos, and the coast of Epirus (Il. ii. 303, 631). He it was who (according to post-Homeric tradition) persuaded Clytaemnestra to send Iphigenia to Aulis (Dict. Cret. i. 20; cf. Enr. I.A. 100). During the siege of Troy he distinguished himself as a valiant and undaunted warrior, but more particularly as a prudent and eloquent negotiator (Il. ii. 139, iii. 202, iv. 494, vii. 163, ix. 169, 225, x. 231-563, xiv. 82, xix. 155; Od. xiii. 295). After the death of Achilles, Odysseus contended for his armour with the Telamonian Ajax, and gained the prize (Philostr. Her. x. 12; Od. iv. 280, viii. 494). This story, which supplies the theme of the Ajax of Sophocles, appears first in Od. xi. 545; cf. Ov. Met. xiii. 1. The statement in the Odyssey that the Trojans adjudged the arms is explained by the Aethiopsis of Aretinus, where it is said that the captives were asked who had injured Troy most, and answered, Odysseus. In the Lesser Iliad the judgment is given without design by two Trojan women conversing. He is said by some to have devised the stratagem of the wooden horse, and he was one of the heroes concealed within it. He is also said to have taken part in carrying off the palladium. (Verg. Aen. ii. 164; Quint. Smyrn. x. 354.) But the most celebrated part of his story consists of his adventures after the destruction of Troy, which form the subject of the Homeric poem called after him, the Odyssey. After the capture of Troy he set out on his voyage home, but was overtaken by a storm and thrown upon the coast of Ismarus, a town of the Cicones, in Thrace, N. of the island of Lemnos. He plundered the town, but several of his men were cut off by the Cicones. Thence he was driven by an N. wind towards Malea and to the Loto-phagi on the coast of Libya. Some of his companions were so much delighted with the taste of the lotus that they wanted to remain in the country, but Odysseus compelled them to embark again, and continued his voyage. In one day he reached the goat-island, situated N. of the country of the Lotophagi. He there left behind eleven ships, and with one he sailed to the neighbouring island of the Cyclopes (the western coast of Sicily), where with twelve companions he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon and Thoosa. This giant devoured one after another six of the companions, and kept the unfortunate Odysseus and the six others as prisoners in his

the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave. In this way he reached his ship. The Cyclops implored his father, Poseidon, to avenge him, and henceforth the god of the sea pursued the wandering king with implacable enmity. (Od. i. 68, ix. 527.) Others represent the death of Palamedes as the cause of Poseidon's anger. [PALAMEDES.] Odysseus next arrived at the island of Aeolus; and the god on his departure gave him a bag of winds, which were to carry him home; but the companions of Odysseus opened the bag, and the winds escaped, whereupon the ships were driven back to the island of Aeolus, who indignantly refused all further assistance. After a voyage of six days, Odysseus arrived at Telepylos, the city of Lamus, in which Antiphates ruled over the LAESTRYGONES, a cannibal race. He escaped from them with only one ship; and his fate now carried him to a western island, Aeaëa, the land of the sorceress Circe. Part of his people were sent to explore the island, but they were changed by Circe into swine. Eurylochus alone escaped, and brought the sad news to Odysseus, who was taught by Hermes how to resist the magic powers of Circe. He succeeded in liberating his companions, who were changed back again into men. When at length Odysseus begged for leave to depart, Circe desired him to descend into Hades and to consult the seer Tiresias. He now sailed W. across the river Oceanus, and having landed on the other side in the country of the Cimmerians, where Helios does not shine, he entered Hades, and asked Tiresias how he should reach his native land. Tiresias told him of the danger and difficulties arising from the anger of Poseidon, but gave him hope that all would yet turn out well, if he and his companions would leave the herds of Helios in Thrinacia unharmed. Odysseus now returned to Aeaëa, where Circe treated them kindly, told them of the dangers that yet awaited them, and of the means of escaping. The wind which she sent with them carried them to the island of the Sirens, somewhere near the W. coast of Italy. The Sirens sat on the shore, and with their sweet voices attracted all that passed by, and then destroyed them. Odysseus, to escape this danger, filled the ears of his companions with wax, and had himself fastened to the mast of his ship, until he was out of reach of the Sirens' song. His ship next sailed between Scylla and Charybdis, two rocks between Thrinacia and Italy. As the ship passed between them, Scylla, the monster inhabiting the rock of the same name, carried off and devoured six of the crew. From thence he came to Thrinacia, the island of Helios, who there kept his sacred herds of oxen. Mindful of the advice of Tiresias and Circe, Odysseus wanted to sail past, but his companions urged him to land. He made them swear not to touch any of the cattle; but as they were detained in the island by storms, and were hungry, they killed the finest of the oxen while Odysseus was asleep. After some days the storm abated, and they sailed away, but soon another storm came on, and their ship was destroyed by a thunderbolt. All were drowned with the exception of Odysseus, who saved himself by means of the mast and planks, and after ten days reached the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso. She received him with kindness, and wished to marry him, promising immortality cave. Odysseus contrived to make the monster drunk with wine, and then with a burning pole deprived him of his one eye. He now succeeded in making his escape with his friends, by concealing himself and them under the bodies of Odysseus, who saved himself by means of the mast and planks, and after ten days reached the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso. She received him with kindness, and wished to marry him, promising immortality and eternal youth, if he would consent, and forget Ithaca. But his love of home was too strong. Athene, who had always protected him, induced Zeus to promise that her favourite hero, notwithstanding the anger of Poseidon, should one day return to his native island, and take vengeance on the suitors of Penelope. Hermes carried to Calypso the command of Zeus to dismiss Odysseus. The nymph obeyed, and taught him how to build a raft [Dict. of Ant. art. Ratis], on which, after remaining eight years with her, he left the island. In eighteen days he came in sight of Scheria, the island of the Phaeacians, when Poseidon sent a storm which cast him off the raft. By the assistance of Leucothea and Athene he reached Scheria by swimming. Here he slept on the shore, until he was awoke by the voices of maidens. He found Nausicaa, the daughter of king Alcinoüs, who conducted the hero to her father's court. He was there honoured with feasts, and the minstrel Demodocus sang of the fall of Troy, which moved Odysseus to tears, and, being asked why he seek news of his father. Odysseus made himself known to him, and with him planned revenge. Still disguised as a beggar, he accompanied Telemachus and Eumæus to the palace, where his dog Argus alone recognised him. The plan of revenge was now carried into effect. Penelope was persuaded to promise her hand to him who should conquer the others in shooting with the bow of Odysseus. As none of the suitors was able to bend this bow, Odysseus himself took it up and then began to attack the suitors. He was supported by Athene and his son, and all fell by his hands. He now made himself known to Penelope, and went to see his aged father. In the meantime the report of the death of the suitors was spread abroad, and their relatives rose in arms against their slayer; but Athene, who assumed the appearance of Mentor, brought about a reconciliation between the people and the king.—It has already been remarked that in the Homeric poems Odysseus is represented as a prudent, cunning, inventive, and eloquent man, but at the same time as a brave, bold, and persevering warrior, whose courage no misfortune or calamity could subdue; but later poets describe him as deceitful, intriguing, and without personal courage (Soph. Aj. 80; Verg. Aen. ii. 164; Ov. Met. xiii. 6 ff.). Of the close of his life the Homeric poems give no information, except the prophecy of Tiresias, who promised him a happy old age, in which a painless death should come upon him 'from the sea.' (Od. xi. 135); but later writers give us different accounts. Telegonus, the son of Odysseus by Circe, was sent out by his mother to wept, he related his whole history. At length he was sent home in a ship. One night as he had fallen asleep in his ship, it reached the coast of Ithaca; the Phaeacians who had accompanied him carried him on shore, and left him. He had now been away from Ithaca for twenty years. During his absence his father Laërtes, bowed down by grief and old age, had withdrawn into the country; his mother, Anticlea, had died of sorrow; his son, Telemachus, had grown up to manhood, and his wife, Penelope, had rejected all the offers that had been made to her by the importunate suitors from the neighbouring islands. For the last few years more than a hundred nobles of Ithaca, Same, Dulichium, and Zacynthus had been suing for the hand of Penelope, and in their visits to her house had treated all that it contained as if it had been their own. That Odysseus might be able to take vengeance upon them, it was necessary that he should not be recognised. Athene accordingly disguised him as a beggar. He was kindly received by Eumæus, the swineherd, a faithful servant of his house. Meanwhile his son, Telemachus, returned from Sparta and Pylos, whither he had gone to seek his father. A storm cast him upon Ithaca, which he began to plunder in order to obtain provisions. Odysseus and Telemachus attacked him, but he slew Odysseus, and his body was afterwards carried to Aeaëa. The $\xi\xi$ $\alpha\lambda\delta\iota$ s of the prophecy was thus interpreted to mean the arrival of Telegonus by sea, or the slaying of Odysseus by a weapon made from a fish. It is probable that in the original it only meant 'away from the sea,' i.e. his wanderings being over. At the entreaty of the remorseful son, Circe made Telemachus and Penelope immortal. Telegonus was married to Penelope and Telemachus to Circe (see the argument, in Proclus, of the lost Telegonia by Eugamon; cf. Dict. Cret. vi. 15; Hyg. Fab. 127; Hor. Od. iii. 29, 8). A Thesprotian legend made Odysseus, before these events, go away to Thesprotia, to fight for that nation against the Brygians, and marry Callinice, their queen; some time after which he returned to Ithaca and met his death there.—In works of art Odysseus is commonly represented as wearing a conical cap ($\pi\iota\lambda\delta\iota\omicron\nu$, pileus), such as belonged to artisans (hence to Hephaestus and Daedalus) and to sailors (hence to Odysseus and Charon). [See cut on p. 617.] It is asserted by Pliny (xxxv. 108) that Nicomachus, the painter of the fourth century B.C., was the first who gave Odysseus this distinguishing mark.

Oea (Ἐώα, Ptol.: Oecesis: Tripoli? Ru.), a city on the N. coast of Africa, in the Regio Syrtica (i.e. between the Syrtes), was one of the three cities of the African Tripolis, and, under the Romans, a colony by the name of Aelia Augusta Felix. It had a mixed population of Libyans and Sicilians. (Tac. Hist. iv. 50; Ptol. iv. 3, 12; Amm. Marc. xxviii. 6.)

Oea (Ὀΐα), a town in the island of AEGINA, twenty stadia from the capital.

Oeagrus, or Oeäger (Ὀΐαγρος), king of Thrace, was the father, by the Muse Calliope, of Orpheus and Liuus (Apollod. i. 3, 2; Ov. Ib. 484). Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Oeagrides, in the sense of the Muses. The adjective Oeagrius is used by the poets as equivalent to Thesalian, Oeagrius Haemus, Oeagrius Hebrus.

Oeanthē or Oeanthia (Οΐάνθη, Οΐάνθεια: Οΐανθεύς: Galaxidhi), a town of the Locri Ozolae near the entrance of the Crissaean gulf (Thuc. iii. 101; Pol. iv. 57; Paus. x. 38, 9).

Oeäso or Oeasso (Oyarzun), a town of the Vascones on the N. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the river Magrada (Strab. p. 161).

Oeax (Ὀΐαξ), son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Palamedes and Nausimedon (Eur. Or. 432; Apollod. ii. 1; PALAMEDES).

Oebälus (Ὀΐβαλος). 1. Son of Cynortas, husband of Gorgophone, and father of Tyndareus, Pirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterwards honoured with an heroum. According to some he was son of Perieres and grandsou of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Batea, by whom he had several children (Paus. iii. 1, 5, ii. 2, 3, iv. 2, 3; Apollod. ii. 10, 4). The patronymic Oebalides is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartans generally, as Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux, &c. The feminine patronymic Oebalis and the adjective Oebalius are applied in the same way. Hence Helen is called by the poets Oebalis, and Oebalia pellex; the city of Tarentum is termed Oebalia arx, because it was founded by the Lacedaemonians; and since the Sabines were, according to one tradition, a Lacedaemonian colony, we find the Sabine king Titus Tatius named Oebalius Titus, and the Sabine women Oebalides matres. (Ov. Fast. i. 260, iii. 230.)—2. Son of Telon by a nymph of the stream Sebethus, near Naples, ruled in Campania.

Oechälia (Ὀΐχαλία: Οΐχαλιεύς, Οΐχαλιώτης). 1. A town in Thessaly on the Peneus near Tricca (Il. ii. 596, 730; Paus. iv. 2, 3, iv. 33, 4).—2. A town in Thessaly, belonging to the territory of Trachis (Strab. p. 339).—3. A town in Messenia on the frontier of Arcadia, identified by Pausanias with Carnasinum, by Strabo with Andania (Strab. pp. 339, 350, 360, 448; Paus. iv. 2, 33).—4. A town of Euboea, in the district Eretria (Soph. Trach. 74; Paus. l.c.).—The ancients were divided in opinion which of these places was the residence of Eurytus, whom Hercules slew. The original legend probably belonged to the Thessalian Oechalia, and was thence transferred to the other towns [HERACLES, p. 399, b].

Oedïpus (Ὀΐδίπους), son of Laius and Iocasta (in the Od. Epicaste) of Thebes. There is an allusion to Oedipus king of Thebes in the Iliad, but he is described as dying a violent death and being buried at Thebes (Il. xxiii. 659). The outlines of his story as it afterwards prevailed, are known to the writer of the Odyssey, where there is mention of Epicaste wedding her son and hanging herself when the truth was known (Od. xi. 271), but as the banishment of Oedipus from Thebes is not suggested there is nothing in the Odyssey contradictory of the slight notice in the Iliad. The attack of Polyuces upon Thebes is mentioned in Il. iv. 378. In Hesiod there is no reference to the story except the mention of the Sphinx as the bane of Thebes (Th. 328), and of the war of the heroes against the city who fell 'fighting for the flocks of Oedipus' (Op. 162). The story was more fully developed in later epics, the Oedipodeia, the Cypria and the Thebaid; but in the first of the three (as cited by Paus. ix. 5, 11), the four children of Oedipus are not born from Iocasta, but by a second wife, Eurygameia. The Attic tragedians seem first to have introduced the birth of Antigone, Ismene and their two brothers from Iocasta to increase the tragic horror. Oedipus is mentioned by Pindar to exemplify an instance of reverse of fortune (Ol. ii. 35; cf. Pyth. iv. 263). The story of Oedipus as it comes to us from the tragedians is as follows. Laius, son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Iocasta, a daughter of Menoeceus and sister of Creon. An oracle had informed Laius that he was destined to perish by the hands of his own son. Accordingly, when Iocasta gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and exposed the child on Mount Cithaerou. There he was found by a shepherd of king Polybus of Corinth, and was called from his swollen feet Oedipus. He was carried to the palace, and the king and his wife Merope (or Periboea) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Oedipus was taunted by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he proceeded to Delphi to consult the oracle. The oracle replied that he was destined to slay his father and commit incest with his mother. Thinking that Polybus was his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Daulis he met his real father, Laius. Polyphontes, the charioteer of Laius, bade Oedipus make way for them; whereupon a scuffle ensued in which Oedipus slew both Lains and his charioteer. In the meantime the Sphinx had appeared in the neighbourhood of Thebes. Seated on a rock, she put a riddle to every Theban that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. This calamity induced the Thebans to proclaim that whoever should deliver the country of the Sphinx, should be made king, and should receive Iocasta as his wife. Oedipus came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she gave the riddle as follows: 'A being with four feet has two feet and three feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest.' Oedipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, who in infancy crawls upon all fours, in manhood stands erect upon two feet, and in old age supports his tottering legs with a staff. The Sphinx, enraged at the solution of the riddle, thereupon threw herself down from the rock. Oedipus now obtained the kingdom of Thebes, and married his mother, by whom he became the father of Eteocles, Polynices, Antigono, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague. The oracle ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Oedipus accordingly pronounced a solemn curse upon the unknown murderer, and declared him an exile; but when he endeavoured to discover him, he was told by the seer Tiresias that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother. Iocasta now hanged herself, and Oedipus put out his own eyes (Soph. Oedipus Tyrannus; Apollod. iii. 5, 8). An interval of several years is supposed to elapse between the events of the Oed. Tyr. and those of the Oed. Coloneus. From the allusions to what happened in this interval it appears that Oedipus lived on at Thebes, blind but not altogether unhappy, with Creon as regent. Then after long years the popular feeling began to regard his presence as a pollution. Oedipus was banished: his sons did not interfere to save him, but his daughters voluntarily went into exile with him: Antigone led him to Athens, and Ismene followed. Meantime an oracle came from Delphi that the safety of Thebes depended on Oedipus remaining there and being buried there at his death; the two sons no longer acquiesced in the rule of Creon and disputed the throne; the citizens supported Eteocles, and Polynices was exiled. Creon attempted to take Oedipus by force back to Thebes, but Theseus gave his protection and to Theseus only the secret of his death and burial was known (Soph. Oed. Coloneus). The grave of Oedipus was in the precinct of the Eumenides on the SE. slope of the Areiopagus (Paus. i. 28, 7; Val. Max. v. 3); but there was also a chapel (ἡρώων) of Oedipus at Colonus (Paus. i. 30, 4). Pausanias prefers to accept the Homeric account of Oedipus as dying at Thebes, and imagines that his bones were removed to Athens. The Boeotian story makes Oedipus die at Thebes, but the Thebans refused him burial. His body was carried to Ceos in Boeotia, thence to the precincts of a sanctuary of Demeter at Eteonus, where the oracle declared that it might remain, and his tomb there was called the Oedipodeum (Schol. ad O. C. 91). Aristides (p. 284) speaks of his being buried, as a blessing to Attica, at Colonus. The story of Oedipus forms the subject of three celebrated plays of Sophocles, and was also taken by Aeschylus for the subject of a trilogy, of which the Septem c. Th. only remains. Seneca wrote a tragedy, the Oedipus, in which he follows Sophocles closely. The chief difference is that Oedipus goes into voluntary exile after he has blinded himself. Corneille, Dryden and Voltaire wrote plays on the same subject.

Oedanes. [DYARDANES.]

Oeneōn (Οἰνεών: Οἰνεαίως), a seaport town of the Locri Ozolae (Thuc. iii. 95).

Oeneus (Οἰνεύς), son of Portheus, husband of Althaea, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia (Il. v. 813, ix. 548, xiv. 115). This is Homer's account; but according to later authorities he was the son of Porthaon and Euryte, and the father of Toxeus, whom he killed; also of Thyreus (Phereus), Clymenus, Periphas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorge, Eurymede, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianira. His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus according to some accounts, though according to others Tydeus was his son by his own daughter, Gorge. (Apollod. i. 7, 10, i. 8, 4; Diod. iv. 35; Ap. Rh. 192; Hyg. Fab. 14.) He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius, who imprisoned and ill used him. He was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Oeneus himself or to his son-in-law Andraemon, as Oeneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons, who lay in ambush, slew the old man, near the altar of Telephus in Arcadia. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Oenoe after him. According to others Oeneus lived to extreme old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death (Apollod. i. 8, 5; Ant. Lib. 37; Diod. iv. 65). Homer knows nothing of all this; he merely relates that Oeneus once neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, in consequence of which she sent a monstrous boar into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager. Bellerophon was hospitably entertained by Oeneus, and received from him a costly girdle as a present (Il. vi. 216, ix. 532).

Oeniadae (Οἰνιάδαι: Trigardon or Tri-khar-do), an ancient town of Acarnania, situated on the Achelous near its mouth, and surrounded by marshes caused by the overflowing of the river, which thus protected it from hostile attacks (Thuc. ii. 102). Unlike the other cities of Acarnania, Oeniadae espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. At the time of Alexander the Great, the town was taken by the Aetolians, who expelled the inhabitants; but the Aetolians were expelled in their turn by Philip V., king of Macedonia, who surrounded the place with strong fortifications. The Romans restored the towns to the Acarnanians. The fortress Nesus or Nasus belonging to Oeniadae was situated on a small lake near it. (Diod. xviii. 8; Pol. iv. 65; Liv. xxxviii. 11; Paus. iv. 25; Strab. p. 459.)

Coin of Oeniadae.

Obv., head of Zeus; rev., OINIADAI; head of river-god Achelous, partly human, partly bull.

Oenides, a patronymic from Oeneus given to Meleager, his son, and Diomedes, his grandson.

Oenoanda or Oeneanda, a town of Asia Minor, in the district of Cabalia, subject to Cibra (Strab. p. 681; Liv. xxxviii. 37).

Oenobaras (Οἰνοβάρας), a tributary of the Orontes, flowing through the plain of Antioch, in Syria (Strab. p. 751).

Oenōe (Οἰνών: Οἰνωαῖος). 1. A demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothontis, near Eleutherac on the frontiers of Boeotia, frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war (Hdt. v. 74; Thuc. ii. 18).—2. A demus of Attica, near Marathon, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, and also to the Tetrapolis.—3. A fortress of the Corinthians, on the Corinthian gulf, between the promontory Oluiae and the frontier of Megaris.—4. A town in Argolis, W. of Argos, on the road to Mantinea. A battle was fought here in 388 B.C., in which the Argives and Athenians defeated the Lacedaemonians (Paus. i. 15, 1, ii. 15, 2, x. 10, 4).—5. A town in Elis, near the mouth of the Sellcis.—6. A town in the island Icarus or Icaria.

Oenōmāus (Οἰνώμαος). 1. King of Pisa in Elis, was son of Ares and Harpinna, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodamia (Apollod. iii. 10, 1; Paus. v. 10, 2, vi. 21, 6). An oracle had declared that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; and as his horses were swifter than those of any other mortal, he declared that all who came forward as suitors for Hippodamia's hand should contend with him in the chariot-race, that whoever conquered should receive her, and that whoever was conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon, on the Corinthian isthmus. The suitor started with Hippodamia in a chariot, and Oenomaus then hastened with his swift horses after the lovers. He had overtaken and slain many a suitor, whom Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, to take out the linch-pins from the wheels of his master's chariot, and he received from Poseidon a golden chariot and swift horses. In the race which followed, the chariot of Oenomaus broke down, and he fell out and was killed. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodamia and the kingdom of Pisa. (Soph. El. 504; Paus. vi. 21; Diod. iv. 73; Hyg. l. c.; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. i. 752; ad Pind. Ol. i. 114; Ov. lb. 365.) There are some variations in this story, such as, that Oenomaus was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers (Tzet. ad Lyc. 156; Hyg. Fab. 253). Myrtilus also is said to have loved Hippodamia, and as she favoured the suit of Pelops, she persuaded Myrtilus to take the linch-pins out of the wheels of her father's chariot. As Oenomaus was breathing his last he pronounced a curse upon Myrtilus. This curse had its desired effect, for as Pelops refused to give to Myrtilus the reward he had promised, or as Myrtilus had attempted to dishonour Hippodamia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Geraestus. Myrtilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon Pelops, which was the cause of all the calamities that afterwards befell his house. [PELOPS.] The tomb of Oenomaus was shown on the river Cladeus in Elis. His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing (Paus. v. 20, 3, vi. 21, 3).—

2. Of Gadara, a Cynic philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian, or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. He wrote a work to expose the oracles. Considerable fragments are preserved by Eusebius (Praep. Ev. v. 18, vi. 7).—3. A tragic poet. [DIOGENES, No. 5.]

Oenonē (Οἰνώνη), daughter of the river-god Cebron, and wife of Paris, before he carried off Helen. [PARIS.]

Oenone or Oenopiā, the ancient name of AEGINA.

Oenophŷta (τὰ Οἰνόφυτα: Inia), a town in Boeotia, on the left bank of the Asopus, and on the road from Tanagra to Oropus, memorable for the victory gained by the Athenians over the Boeotians, B.C. 456 (Thuc. i. 108, iv. 95).

Oenōpides (Οἰνόπιδης) of Chios, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, perhaps a contemporary of Anaxagoras. Oenopides derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. He obtained from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed. The length of the solar year was fixed by Oenopidos at 365 days and somewhat less than nine hours. He is said to have discovered the 12th and 23rd propositions of the 1st book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus. (Diod. i. 98; Ael. V. H. x. 7; Censorin. 19.)

Oenōpion (Οἰνοπίων), son of Dionysus and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalus, Euanthes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Meropo, Aerope or Haero. Some writers call Oenopion a son of Rhadamanthus by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus. From Crete he migrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamanthus had assigned to him as his habitation. (Paus. vii. 4, 6; Diod. v. 79; Schol. ad Ap. Rh. iii. 996.) When he was king of Chios, the giant Orion sued for the hand of his daughter Merope. As Oenopion refused, Orion violated Merope, whereupon Oenopion put out his eyes, and expelled him from the island. Orion went to Lemnos; he was afterwards cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crote. (Apollod. i. 4, 3; Hyg. Astr. ii. 34; ORION.)

Oenōtri, Oenōtriā. [ITALIA.]

Oenōtrides, two islands in the Tyrrhene sea, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the town of Elea or Velia (Strab. p. 252; Plin. iii. 85).

Oenōtrōpae. [ANIUS.]

Oenōtrus (Οἰνώτροπος), youngest son of Lycaon, according to tradition, emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and gave the name of Oenotria to the district in which he settled (Paus. viii. 3, 5; Verg. Aen. i. 532, iii. 165, vii. 85; Strab. p. 253). [For the probable origin of the name Oenotria, see p. 453, a.]

Oenūs (Οἰνούς: Kelesina), a river in Laconia, flowing into the Eurotas, N. of Sparta. There was a town of the same name upon this river, celebrated for its wine. (Pol. ii. 65; Liv. xxxiv. 28; Athen. p. 31.)

Oenussae (Οἰνούσσαι, Οἰνούσσαι). 1. A group of islands lying off the S. point of Messonia, opposite to the port of Phoenicus: the two largest of them are now called Sapienza and Cabrera (Plin. iv. 55).—2. (Spalmadori or Egonuses), a group of five islands between Chios and the coast of Asia Minor (Hdt. i. 165; Thuc. viii. 24).

Oeōnus (Οἰωνός), son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, first victor at Olympia, in the foot-race, was killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Heracles, whose kinsman he was. He was honoured with a monument near the temple of Heracles. (Pind. Ol. xi. 66; Apollod. ii. 7, 3; Paus. iii. 15.)

Oēroē (Ἠερόη), a stream which flows into the Corinthian gulf at Crensis. It rises in Cithaeron, and passes near Plataeae. (Paus. ix. 4, 3.)

Oescus (Isker or Esker) called Oescius (Ὠσκιός) by Thucydides, and Seius (Σκιός) by Herodotus, a river in Moesia, which rises in Mt. Scomius according to Thucydides, but in reality on the W. slope of Mt. Haemus, and flows into the Danube near a town of the same name (Oreszovitz). (Hdt. iv. 49; Thuc. ii. 96.)

Oesŷma (Οἰσŷμη: Oisomaïos) called Aesŷma (Αἰσŷμη) by Homer (Il. viii. 304), a town in Thrace between the Strymon and the Nostus, a colony of the Thasians (Thuc. iv. 107).

Oeta (Ὀἶτη, τὰ Οἰταίων ὄρη: Katavoithra), a rugged pile of mountains in the S. of Thessaly, an eastern branch of Mt. Pindus, extended S. of Mt. Othrys along the S. bank of the Sporchius to the Maliae gulf at Thormopylae, thus forming the N. barrier of Grecco. Strabo and Livy give the name of Callidromus to the eastern part of Oeta, an appellation which does not occur in Herodotus and the earlier writers. Respecting the pass of Mt. Oeta, see THERMO-

PYLAE. Oeta was celebrated in mythology as the mountain on which Heracles was burnt [p. 400]. From this mountain the S. of Thessaly towards Phocis was called Oetaea (Οἰταία) and its inhabitants Oetaei (Οἰταῖοι). (Hdt. vii. 217; Thuc. iii. 92; Strab. p. 428; Liv. xxxvi. 15.)

Oetylus (Οἰτύλος: Οἰτύλιος: Vitylo), also called Tylus (Τύλος), an ancient town in Laconia, on the Messenian gulf, S. of Thalama, called after an Argive hero of this name (Il. ii. 585; Strab. p. 360; Paus. iii. 21, 7).

Ofella, a man of sound sense and of a straightforward character, whom Horace contrasts with the Stoic quacks of his time (Sat. ii. 2, 3).

Ofella, Q. Lucrētius, originally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla, who appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Praeneste, b.c. 82. Ofella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quaestor or praetor, thus acting in defiance of one of Sulla's laws. He was in consequence put to death by Sulla's orders. (Dio Cass. xxxiv. 134; App. B.C. i. 88, 101; Plut. Sull. 29, 33; Vell. Pat. ii. 27.)

Ofilus, a distinguished Roman jurist, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and a friend of Cicero and Caesar (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 37, ad Fam. vii. 21). His works are often cited in the Digest.

Oglasa (Monte Cristo), a small island off the coast of Etruria (Plin. iii. 80).

Ogulnii, Q. and Cn., two brothers, tribunes of the plebs, b.c. 300, carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from four to eight, and that of the augurs from four to nine, and which enacted that four of the pontiffs and five of the augurs should be taken from the plebs (Liv. x. 6-9). Q. Ogulnius was sent to Epidaurus b.c. 293 to bring Asclepius to Rome [p. 121, b].

Ogýgia (Ὠγγυία), the mythical island of Calypso, is placed by Homer in the navel or central point of the sea, far away from all lands. Later writers placed it in the Ionian sea, near the promontory of Lacinium, in Bruttium, or in the island of Gozo. (Od. i. 50, v. 55, 268, xii. 448; Strab. pp. 44, 299; Plin. iii. 96.)

Ogýgus or Ogýges (Ὠγύγης), sometimes called a Boeotian autochthon, and sometimes son of Boeotus, and king of the Hectenes, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. (Paus. ix. 5, 1; Ap. Rh. iii. 1177; Serv. ad Ecl. vi. 41.) The name of Ogyges is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica an Ogygian flood, borrowed, apparently, from Thessalian tradition, is likewise mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis and as the father of Daira, the daughter of Oceanus. In the Boeotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenia, Thelxinoea, and Aulis. (Paus. i. 38, 7, ix. 33, 4; Strab. p. 384.) Bacchus is called Ogygius deus, because he was born at Thebes.

Ogýris (Ὠγγυρίς), an island of the Erythraean Sea (Indian Ocean), off the coast of Carmania, at a distance of 2000 stadia, noted as the alleged burial-place of the ancient king Erythras (Strab. p. 766; Mel. iii. 8, 6).

Oicles or Oicleus (Ὀϊκλῆς, Ὀϊκλεύς), son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus and father of Amphiarus, of Argos. He is also called a son of Amphiarus or a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Oicles accompanied Heracles on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. According to other traditions he returned home from the expedition, and dwelt in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcmaeon, and where his tomb was shown. (Od. xv. 241; Diod. iv. 32; Apollod. ii. 6, 4; Paus. viii. 36, 4.)

Oileus (Ὀϊλεύς), son of Hodoedocus and Laonome, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Oilides, Oiliades, and Ajax Oilei. Oileus was the father of Medon by Rheue, and is mentioned among the Argonauts. (Il. ii. 527, xiii. 697, 712; Ap. Rh. i. 74.)

Olba or Olbē (Ὀλβη: Uzendjaburdj), an ancient inland city of Cilicia, in the mountains above Soloi, and between the rivers Lamus and Calycadnus. Its foundation was ascribed to Ajax the son of Teucer, whose descendants, the priests of the ancient temple of Zeus, once ruled over all Cilicia Aspera (Strab. p. 672). In later times it belonged to Isauria, and was the see of a bishop, and its name appears as Oropi.

Olbāsa (Ὀλβασα), a city in Pisidia, on the road from Seleucia to Laranda, N. of Lagoe and NW. of Isionda (Ptol. v. 5, 8).

Olbē. [OLBA.]

Olbia (Ὀλβία). 1. (Eoubes, near Hyères), a colony of Massilia, on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, on a hill called Olbianus, E. of Telo Martius (Toulon). (Strab. pp. 180, 184.)—2. (Terra Nova) a very ancient city, near the N. end of the E. side of the island of Sardinia, with the only good harbour on this coast, and therefore the usual landing-place for persons coming from Rome. A mythical tradition ascribes its foundation to the Thespiades. (Paus. x. 17, 5; Diod. iv. 29; Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, 6; Claud. B. Gild. 519.)—3. In Bithynia [ASTACUS.] The Gulf of Astacus was also called from it Sinus Olbianns.—4. A fortress on the frontier of Pamphylia, on the coast, west of ATTALIA.—5. [BORYSTHENES.]

Olcādes, an ancient people in Hispania Tarraconensis, N. of Carthago Nova, near the sources of the Anas, in a part of the country afterwards inhabited by the Oretani. Hannibal transplanted some of the Olcades to Africa. Their chief town was Althaea. (Pol. iii. 14; Liv. xxi. 5.)

Olciniūm (Olciniātae: Duleigno), an ancient town on the coast of Illyria, SW. of Scodra, belonging to the territory of Gentius (Ptol. ii. 17, 5; Liv. xlv. 26).

Oleārus. [OLIARUS.]

Oleastrum. 1. A town of the Cosetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Dertosa to Tarraco, probably the place from which the plumbum Oleastrense derived its name (Plin. xxxiv. 164; Itin.)—2. A town in Hispania Baetica, near Gades (Plin. iii. 15).

Olen (Ὀλήν), a mythical personage, said to be a Lycian, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hexameter verse. He is closely connected with the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one legend, he was made the prophet, and the hymns sung at Delos from time immemorial were ascribed to him. His connexion with Apollo is also marked by his being called Hyperborean. [See p. 434, b.] Of the hymns which went under his name Pausanias mentions those to Here, to Achaëa, and to Ithylia; the last was in celebration of the birth of Apollo and Artemis. (Hdt. iv. 35; Paus. i. 18, 5, ii. 13, 3, v. 7, 8, ix. 27, 2, x. 7, 8; Callim. Del. 304.)

Olēnus (Ὀλένος: Ὀλένιος). 1. An ancient town in Aetolia, near New Pleuron, and at the foot of Mt. Aracynthus, is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed by the Aetolians at an early period. (Il. ii. 638; Strab. pp. 451, 460.)—2. A town in Achaia, between Patrae and Dyme, refused to join the Achaean League on its restoration, in B.C. 280. In the time of Strabo the town was deserted. (Strab. pp. 384, 386, 388; Paus. vii. 18, 22.)

Olēnus (Ὀλένος), son of Hephaestus and father of the nymphs Aege and Helice, who brought up Zeus. Aege being really identical with Amalthea, the epithet Olenia Capella is given to the goat AMALTHEA. (Hyg. Astr. 13.)

Olgassys (Ὀλαγασσός: Al-Gez Dagh), a lofty, steep, and rugged mountain chain of Asia Minor, extending nearly W. and E. through the E. of Bithynia, and the centre of Paphlagonia to the river Halys, nearly parallel to the chain of Olympus, of which it may be considered as a branch. Numerous temples were built upon it by the Paphlagonians. (Strab. p. 562.)

Oliāros or Oleārus (Ὀλλίαιρος, Ὀλέαιρος: Ὀλλιάριος: Antiparos), a small island in the Aegean sea, one of the Cyclades, W. of Paros, colonised by the Phoenicians, is celebrated in modern times for its stalactite grotto, which is not mentioned by ancient writers (Strab. p. 485; Verg. Aen. iii. 126).

Oligyrtus (Ὀλιγυρτός), a fortress in the NE. of Arcadia on a mountain of the same name (Pol. iv. 11, 70).

Olisipo (Lisbon), a town in Lusitania, on the right bank of the Tagus near its mouth, and a Roman municipium with the surname Felicitas Julia. It was celebrated for its swift horses. (Plin. iv. 113, viii. 166; Varr. R. R. ii. 1, 19; Col. vi. 27.) Its name is sometimes written Ulyssippo (Mel. iii. 1, 6), because it was supposed to be the town which Ulysses founded in Spain; but the town to which this legend referred was in the mountains of Turdetania. [ODYSSEEA.]

Olizōn (Ὀλιζών), a town of Thessaly, on the Pagasaeon gulf (Il. ii. 717; Strab. p. 436).

Ollius (Oglia), a river in Gallia Transpadana, falls into the Po (Plin. iii. 118).

Olmīae (Ὀλμιαί), a promontory in the territory of Corinth, which separated the Corinthian and Aelcyonian gulfs (Strab. p. 380).

Oloossōn (Ὀλοοσσών: Ὀλοοσσόνιος: Elassona), a town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, in the district of Hestiaeotis. Homer (Il. ii. 739) calls it 'white,' an epithet which it obtained, according to Strabo, from the whiteness of its soil. (Strab. p. 440; Procop. Aed. iv. 14.)

Olophernes (Ὀλοφέρνης), sometimes called Hölophernes. 1. Son of Ariamnes and father of Ariarathes I., king of Cappadocia.—2. Supposititious son of Ariarathes IV., got possession of the kingdom of Cappadocia for a time in B.C. 157, and ruled oppressively (Ptol. xxxii. 20; App. Syr. 47; Diod. Ecl. 3).

Olorus (Ὀλορος). 1. King of Thrace, whose daughter married MILTIADES.—2. Apparently grandson of the above, and father of Thucydides (Thuc. iv. 104).

Olophyxus (Ὀλόφυξος: Ὀλοφύξιος), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula of Mt. Athos (Thuc. iv. 109; Hdt. vii. 22; Strab. p. 331).

Olpae or Olpe (Ὀλπαι, Ὀλπή: Ὀλπαῖος). 1. (Arapi), a town of the Amphiloehi in Acarnania, on the Ambracian gulf, NW. of Argos Amphlilochicum (Thuc. i. 107–113).—2. A town of the Locri Ozolae (Thuc. iii. 101).

Olūrus (Ὀλουρος: Ὀλοούριος). 1. A town in Achaia, near Pellene, on the Sicyonian frontier (Xen. Hell. vii. 4, 17).—2. Also Oluris (Ὀλουρίς), called Dorium (Δόριον) by Homer, a town in Messenia (Il. ii. 594; Strab. p. 350).

Olūs (Ὀλοός: Ὀλοούντιος), a town and harbour on the E. coast of Crete, near the promontory of Zephyrium (Paus. ix. 40, 3; Ptol. iii. 17, 5).

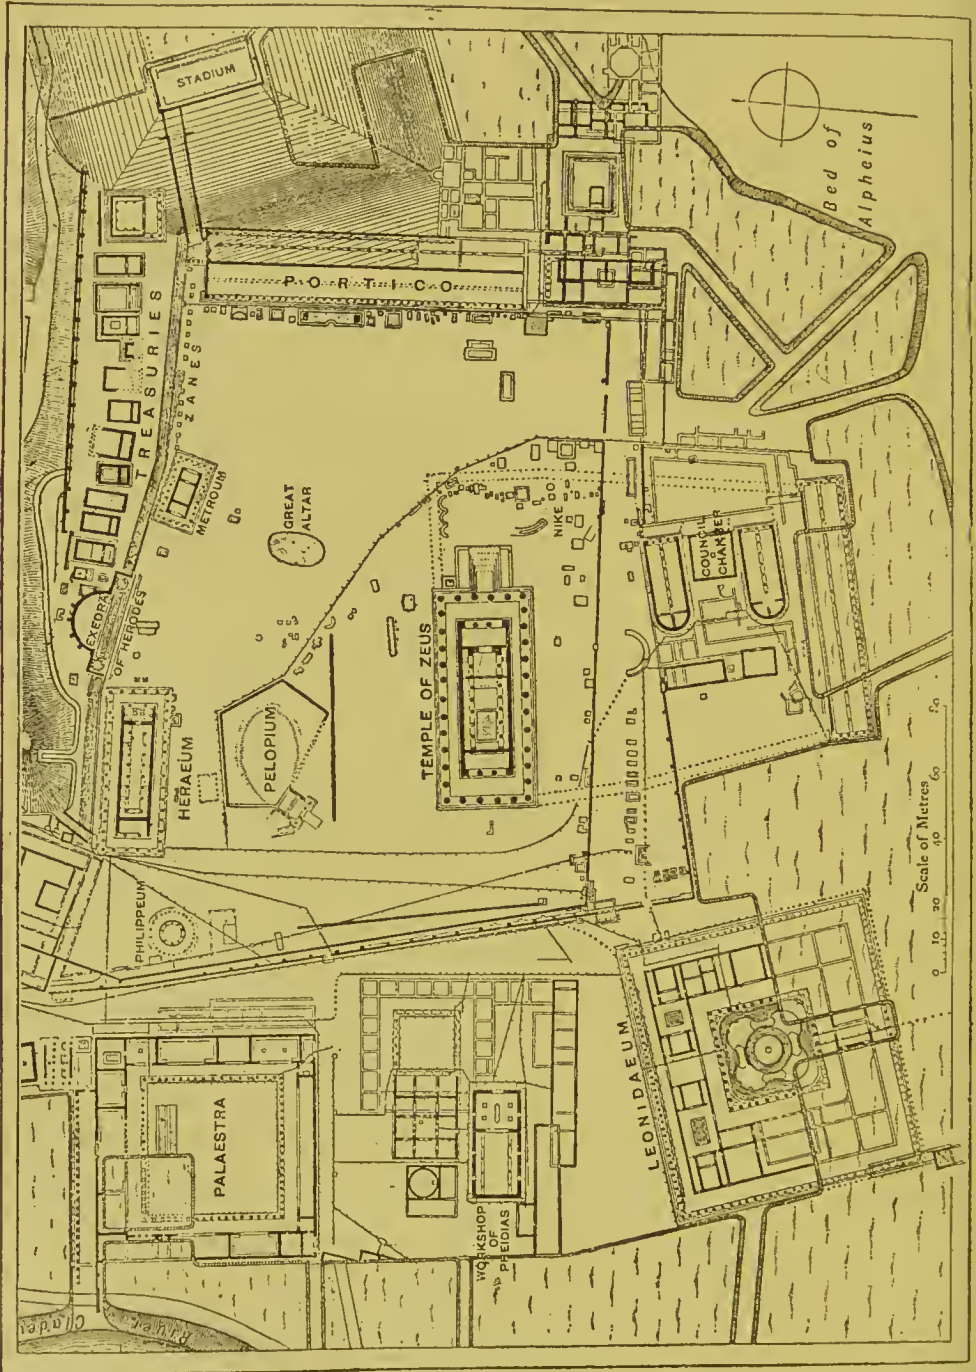

Olybrius, Anicius, Roman emperor A.D. 472, was raised to this dignity by Ricimer, who deposed Anthemius. He died in the course of the same year, after a reign of 3 months and 13 days. His successor was GLYCERUS.

Olympēnē, and Olympēni, or Olympiēni (Ὀλυμπηνή, Ὀλυμπηνοί, Ὀλυμπιηνοί), the names of the district about the Mysian Olympus, and of its inhabitants (Strab. pp. 571, 576).

Olympia (Ὀλυμπία) the name of a small plain in Elis, in which the Olympic games were celebrated. It was surrounded on the N. and NE. by the hill Cronus or Cronius, on the S. by the river Alpheus, and on the W. by the river Cladēus. In this plain was the sacred precinct of Zeus, called Altis (Ἄλτις, an old Elean form of ἔλσος), originally, no doubt, as its name signified, a sacred grove. This great enclosure, surrounded by a wall, was 750 feet long by 550 broad, stretching on the north up to the base of the hill Cronus, and situated at the angle formed by the confluence of the rivers Alpheus and Cladeus, 300 stadia distant from the town of Pisa. The Altis with its temples and statues and the public buildings in the immediate neighbourhood formed what was called Olympia; but there was no town of this name. Since the beginning of the German excavations in 1875, it has become possible to trace the ground plans of nearly all the buildings as they were described by Pausanias (book vi.); and this alone, apart from the sculptures which have been recovered, has made the undertaking one of the highest interest and the results of the greatest archaeological value. Nearly the central point of the enclosure of the Altis was the great altar of Zeus, a large elliptical base of undressed stone, above which are layers of ashes of the victims. To the SW. of the altar is the great temple of Zeus, the plan of which is perfectly established by the excavations. The foundations are complete, and many of the columns, overthrown by earthquakes, lie beside their bases. The temple was begun by the architect Libon of Elis in the sixth century B.C., and completed in the middle of the fifth century. It is a Doric peripteros (i.e. having a single row of columns both at the sides and ends), with six columns at each end ('hexastyle') and thirteen at the sides. So much of the sculptures of the pediments and metopes has been discovered that they can be fairly reconstructed. The S. pediment, ascribed by Pausanias to Paeonius, represents the chariot race between Pelops and Oenomaus; the W. pediment, ascribed to Alcamenes, represents the fight of Centaurs and Lapithae. The labours of Heracles form the subject of the metopes. In the temple stood originally the great statue of the Olympian Zeus in gold and ivory by Phidias. Prominent among the statues in front of the temple through which the processions passed to reach the temple itself, and of which in many cases the inscribed verses remain, were the Eretrian bull by Phileasias to the NE., and the great statue of Nike by Paeonius to the SE. This famous statue which towered above those who approached the templo has been in part recovered. [PAEONIUS]. To the N. of the temple of Zeus was the sanctuary of Pelops, a grove with a terraced wall and a chapel within it, of which some remains of masonry survive. NW. of the Pelopion is the circular Philippeum, built by Philip of Macedon after the battle of Chaeronea; maintained such to the end; others were restored in stone. The statue of Zeus by Phidias, the chief glory of the great temple, has perished, but the chief ornament of the Heraeum, the Hermes by Praxiteles, was found in situ, and is now in the museum of Olympia [PRAXITELES]. The Prytaneum, altered at various periods, and immediately N. of the Pelopion is the Heraeum or temple of Hera. This seems to be the most ancient temple at Olympia. Its plan is like that of the temple of Zeus, though it is much smaller as well as older. It has, however, sixteen columns at the sides. The columns were originally wooden; some re-stood NW. of the Heraeum; the plan can be partially reconstructed from the scanty remains. In it the Olympian victors were entertained. Very little remains of the Metroon or temple of the Mother of the Gods, to the E. of the Heraeum; still further east are yet the bases of the statues of Zeus (called Zanes) erected from the proceeds of fines for breaches of rules; and N. of these is the long line of Treasuries, twelve in number, belonging to various Greek states, built like miniature temples, in which were stored offerings of the different states and equipment for the games. The eastern front of the Altis was the great entrance Portico called the 'Echo Colonnade,' affording shelter to the spectators, built in the Macedonian period on the site of an older portico: the foundations of both can be distinguished. The sanctuary of Hippodamia seems to have stood in the SE. corner of the Altis. To the S. of the Altis is the Bouleuterium or senate-house, in which were the altars and statues of Zens Horkios, before which the combatants took a solemn oath that they would observe the rules of the games. The oldest part of the Bouleuterium is an oblong hall of the sixth century with an apse to the west: a corresponding hall was built later parallel with it, and the two were afterwards connected by a square building. Later still and of the Roman period is the portico which fronts them. The other important buildings outside the Altis are the great Palaestra on the west (of which the ground plan is traceable) adjoining the Gymnasium, where those who aspired to contend went through a month's training beforehand. To the south another gymnasium has been discovered. Outside the NE. corner of the Altis was the Stadium, communicating with it by a covered way [Dict. of Art. art. Stadium]. To the SE. of this was the Hippodrome. Outside the SW. corner are the remains of the building erected by Leonidas of Elis in the fourth century B.C., and enlarged in the Roman period. Near this the foundations of the heroum of Iamhus have been found and the altar used in divination by the Iamidae. The Byzantine church, of which the remains are between the Leonideum and the Palaestra, was built over or adjoining older buildings which were possibly priests' houses. [For an account of the Olympic games, see Dict. of Antig. art. Olympia, Hippodromus, Pancratium, Pentathlon.]

Olympias (Ὀλυμπιάς), wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epirus. She was married to Philip B.C. 359. (Just. vi. 6, 10; Plut. Alex. 2; Diod. xix. 51.) The numerous amours of Philip, and the passionate and jealous character of Olympias occasioned frequent disputes between them; and when Philip married Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (337), Olympias withdrew from Macedonia, and took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epirus. It was generally believed that she lent her support to the assassination of Philip, 336; but it is hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. (Just. ix. 5, 7; Plut. Alex. 9, 19; Athen. p. 557.) After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed great influence through the affection of Alexander. On the death of the latter (323), she withdrew from Macedonia, where her enemy Antipater had the undisputed control of affairs, and took refuge in Epirus. Here she continued to live, as it were, in exile, until the death of Antipater (319) presented a new opening to her ambition. She gave her support to the new regent, Polysperchon, in opposition to Cassander, who had formed an alliance with Eurydice the wife of Philip Arrhidaeus, the nominal king of Macedonia. (Diod. xviii. 49-65.) In 317 Olympias, resolving to obtain the supreme power in Macedonia, invaded that country, along with Polysperchon, defeated Eurydico in battle, and put both her and her husband to death. Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of 100 of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles. Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnesus, hastened to turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias on his approach threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she was closely blockaded by Cassander throughout the winter. At length in the spring of 316, she was compelled to surrender to Cassander, who caused her to be put to death. (Diod. xix. 11-51; Just. xiv. 5, 6; Paus. ix. 7, 2.) Olympias was not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that disgrace her name.

Olympieum. [ATHENÆ, p. 143.]

Olympiódorus (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. A native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He wrote a work in twenty-two books (entitled Ἱστορικὸν Λόγος), which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A. D. 407 to October A. D. 425. Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. [EUNAPIUS.] The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius. After the death of Honorius, Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on Providence and Fate [HIEROCLES].—2. A Peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, where PROCLUS was one of his pupils.—3. The last philosopher of celebrity in the Neoplatonic school of Alexandria. He lived in the first half of the sixth century after Christ, in the reign of the emperor Justinian. His Life of Plato and commentaries on several of Plato's dialogues are still extant.—4. An Aristotelian philosopher, the author of a commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristotle, which is still extant, lived at Alexandria, in the latter half of the sixth century after Christ. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is inferior, he endeavours to reconcile Plato and Aristotle.—5. An Athenian general, who opposed Cassander's attempts upon Athens, B.C. 298. In 288 he expelled the Macedonian troops of Demetrius from Athens. (Paus. i. 25, 2, i. 29, 13, x. 18, 7, x. 34, 3.)

Olympius (Ὀλύμπιος), the Olympian, occurs as a surname of Zeus, and in general of all the gods who lived in Olympus, in contradistinction to the gods of the lower world.

Olympius Nemesiānus. [NEMESIANUS.]

Olympus (Ὀλύμπος), the name of two Greek musicians, of whom one is mythical, and the other historical.—1. The elder Olympus belongs to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phrygian fluteplayers—Hyagnis, Marsyas, Olympus—to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, under whose names we have the mythical representation of the rivalry between the Phrygian auletic music, used in the worship of Cybele, and the Greek citharoedic music. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and to have lived before the Trojan war. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art as a boy, sometimes instructed by Marsyas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate. (Apollod. i. 4, 2; Hyg. Fab. 165, 273; Ov. Met. vi. 393; Snid. s. v.)—2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. He flourished about B. C. 660-620. Though a Phrygian, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians, for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his artistic activity; and he may be considered as having naturalised in Greece the music of the flute, previously almost peculiar to Phrygia. (Plut. de Mus. pp. 1133-1140.)

Olympus (Ὀλυμπος). 1. (Grk. Ἐλυμπο, Turk. Semavat-Evi, i. o. Abode of the Celestials). The E. part of the great chain of mountains which extends W. and E. from the Acroceraunian promontory on the Adriatic to the Thermaic Gulf, and which formed the N. boundary of ancient Greece proper. In a wide sense, the name is sometimes applied to all that part of this chain which lies E. of the central range of Pindus, and which is usually called the Cambunian mountains; but strictly speaking Mount Olympus is the extreme E. part of the chain, which, striking off from the Cambunian mountains to the SE., skirts the S. end of the slip of coast called Pieria, and forms at its termination the N. wall of the vale of TEMPE. Its shape is that of a blunt cone, with its outline picturesquely broken by minor summits; its height is about 9700 feet, and its chief summit is covered with perpetual snow. From its position as the boundary between Thessaly and Macedonia, it is sometimes reckoned in the former, sometimes in the latter (Hdt. vii. 128; Strab. p. 329).—In the Greek mythology, Olympus was the chief seat of the third dynasty of gods, of which Zeus was the head. It was a really local conception with the early poets, to be understood literally, that the gods dwelt on Olympus. Even the fable of the giants scaling heaven must be understood in this sense; not that they placed Pelion and Ossa upon the top of Olympus to reach the still higher heaven, but that they piled Pelion on the top of Ossa, and both on the lower slopes of Olympus, to scale the summit of Olympus itself, the abode of the gods. Homer describes the gods as having their several palaces on Olympus (Il. xi. 76; cf. Hes. Th. 62); on the summit is the council-chamber, where they meet in solemn conclave (Il. viii. 3); the Muses entertain them with the lyre and song. They are shut in from the view of men upon the earth by a wall of clouds, the gates of which are kept by the Hours (Il. v. 749, viii. 393). In the Odyssey it is described as a peaceful abode unshaken by storms (Od. vi. 42). The same conceptions are found in Hesiod, and to a great extent in the later poets; with whom, however, even as early as the lyric poets and the tragedians, the idea becomes less material, and the real abode of the gods is gradually transferred from the summit of Olympus to the vault of heaven (i. e. the sky) itself. Since locally the same idea attached to certain other high mountains, the same name was given to them. Thus LYCAEUS in Arcadia was sometimes called Olympus (Paus. viii. 38, 2), and especially this was the case with 2. The Mysian Olympus (Ὀλυμπος ὁ Μύσιος; Keshish Dagħ, Ala Dagħ, Ishik Dagħ, and Kush Dagħ), a chain of lofty mountains in the NW. of Asia Minor, forming, with Ida, the W. part of the northernmost line of the mountain system of that peninsula. It extends from W. to E. through the NE. of Mysia and the SW. of Bithynia, and thence, inclining a little northwards, it first passes through the centre of Bithynia, then forms the boundary between Bithynia and Galatia, and then extends through the S. of Paphlagonia to the river Halys. Beyond the Halys, the mountains in the N. of Pontus form a continuation of the chain. (Strab. p. 574; Hdt. i. 36, vii. 74).—3. (Yanar Dagħ), a volcano on the E. coast of Lycia, above the city of Phocnicus (Yanar). The names of the mountain and of the city are often interchanged. [PHOENICUS].—There were two mountains of the same name in Cyprus, and one in Lesbos.

Olynthus (Ὀλυνθος; Ὀλύνθιος; Aio Mamas), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic gulf, and a little distance from the coast, between the peninsulas of Pallene and Sithonia (Strab. p. 330; Mel. ii. 2, 9). It was the most important of the Greek cities on the coast of Macedonia, though we have no record of its foundation. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Thracian Bottiaei, when they were expelled from their own country by the Macedonians (Hdt. vii. 122; Strab. p. 447). It was taken by Artabazus, one of the generals of Xerxes, who peopled it with Chalcidians from Torone; but it owed its greatness to Perdiccas, who persuaded the inhabitants of many of the smaller towns in Chalcidice to abandon their own abodes and settle in Olynthus (Thuc. i. 58, 65, ii. 79). This happened about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and from this time Olynthus appears as a prosperous and flourishing town, with a population of 5000 inhabitants capable of bearing arms. It became the head of a confederacy of all the Greek towns in this part of Macedonia, and it long maintained its independence against the attacks of the Athenians, Spartans and Macedonians; but in B. C. 379 it was compelled to submit to Sparta, after carrying on war with this state for four years. When the supremacy of Sparta was destroyed by the Thebans, Olynthus recovered its independence, and even received an accession of power from Philip, who was anxious to make Olynthus a counterpoise to the influence of Athens in the N. of the Aegaeon. With this view Philip gave Olynthus the territory of Potidaea, after he had wrested this town from the Athenians in 356. But when he had sufficiently consolidated his power to be able to set at defiance both Olynthus and Athens, he threw off the mask, and laid siege to the former city. The Olynthians earnestly besought Athens for assistance, and were warmly supported by Demosthenes in his Olynthiac orations; but as the Athenians did not render the city any effectual assistance, it was taken and destroyed by Philip, and all its inhabitants sold as slaves (347). [PHILIPPUS.] Olynthus was never restored, and the remnants of its inhabitants were at a later time transferred by Cassander to Cassandrea. At the time of its prosperity Olynthus used the town of MECYBERNA as its seaport.

Omāna or Omānum (Ὀμᾶνα, Ὀμᾶνον). 1. A celebrated port on the NE. coast of Arabia Felix, a little above the easternmost point of the peninsula, Pr. Syagros (Ras el Had), on a large gulf of the same name. The people of this part of Arabia were called Omanitae (Ὀμᾶνῖται), or Omani, and the name is still preserved in that of the district, Oman. (Ptol. vi. 15).—2. (Prob. Sehaina), a seaport town in the E. of Carmania; the chief emporium for the trade between India, Persia, and Arabia (Plin. vi. 149).

Omanitae and Omānum. [OMANA.]
Ombi (Ὀμβοῖ; Ὀμβίται; Koim Embou, i. e. Hill of Ombon, Ru.), the last great city of Upper Egypt, except Syene, from which it was distant about thirty miles, stood on the E.

bank of the Nile, in the Ombites Nomos, and was celebrated as one of the chief seats of the worship of the crocodile (the crocodile-headed god Sebek). Juvenal's 15th Satire mentions a religious fight between the people of Ombi and those of Tentyra, during a festival at Ombi (Juv. xv. 35; Ptol. iv. 5, 73; Ael. H. A. x. 21).

Omphālē (Ὀμφάλη), daughter of the Lydian king Iardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Heracles, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was afflicted with a serious disease, and was informed by the oracle that he could only be cured by serving some one for wages for the space of three years, Hermes sold Heracles to Omphale. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and, to please her, he is said to have spun wool and put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. She bore Heracles several children. (Diod. iv. 31; Apollod. ii. 6, 3; Ov. Fast. ii. 305, Her. ix. 53.) For possible explanations of this myth, see p. 400, b.

Omphaliūm (Ὀμφάλιον: Ὀμφαλίτης), a town in Crete in the neighbourhood of Cnossus (Diod. v. 70).

On. [HELIOPOLIS.]

Onātas (Ὀνάτας), of Aegina, a famous sculptor of the later and best period of Aeginetan art, which still preserved somewhat of the archaic stiffness or rigidity as compared with the Attic style of Phidias which succeeded it. The work of Onatas was in the earlier part of the fifth century B.C. His great statues were the 'Black Demeter' at Phigalia in bronze, a female figure in black drapery with a horse's head (Paus. viii. 42, 1), and a bronze Apollo at Pergamum (Paus. viii. 42, 7), and two groups of statues, described by Pausanias, at Olympia, which are held by modern critics to resemble in subject and arrangement the pediments of Aegina now at Munich: viz. the group of heroes at Troy casting lots for the fight with Hector, and the group of Tarentine warriors round the body of Opis the Peucetian king (Paus. v. 27, 8).

Oncae (Ὀγκαί), a village in Boeotia near Thebes, from which one of the gates of Thebes derived its name (Ὀγκαίαι), and which contained a sanctuary of Athene.

Oncēum (Ὀγκείον) a town in Arcadia on the river Ladon with a temple of Demeter Erinny's (Paus. viii. 25, 4).

Onchesmus or Onchismus (Ὀρχησμος, Ὀρχισμος: Orchido), a seaport town of Epirus in Chaonia, opposite the W. extremity of Corcyra. The ancients derived its name from Anchises, whence it is named by Dionysius the 'Harbour of Anchises' (Ἀρχίσου λιμνῆν). From this place Cicero calls the wind blowing from Epirus towards Italy Onchesmites. (Strab. p. 324; Cic. ad Att. vii. 2.)

Onchestus (Ὀρχηστός: Ὀρχήστιος). 1. An ancient town of Boeotia, said to have been founded by Onchestus, son of Poseidon, was situated a little S. of the lake Copais near Haliartus. It contained a celebrated temple and grove of Poseidon, and was the place of meeting of the Boeotian Amphictyony. The ruins of this town are still to be seen on the SW. slope of the mountain Faga. (Pl. ii. 506; Pind. Isthm. i. 44; Strab. p. 412; Paus. ix. 26, 5).—2. A river in Thessaly which rises in the neighbourhood of Eretria, and flows by Cynoscephalae, and falls into the lake Boebéis (Pol. xviii. 3; Liv. xxxii. 6).

Onesicritus (Ὀνησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalaea, and by others of Aegina. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 75; Arrian, Ind. 18.) When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus chief pilot of the fleet, a post which he held during the descent of the Indus and throughout the voyage to the Persian gulf, which was conducted under the command of Nearchus (Arrian, An. vi. 2, 6, vii. 5, 9; Plut. Alex. 66). Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative (Strab. pp. 70, 698).

Onings or Oringis. [ORINGIS.]

Onīros (Ὀνειρος), the Dream-God, was a personification of dreams. According to the Odyssey, Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the W. Oceanus, and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn (Od. xix. 562, xxiv. 12). Hesiod calls dreams the children of Night, Sleep and Death being their brothers (Th. 12). Similarly in Eur. Hec. 71 (rightly punctuated), the 'mother of dusky-winged dreams' is Night, not Earth. Dreams were controlled by Hermes, since they were in some sense messages. Ovid calls them children of Sleep, and names three, who pervade the earth and appear in various forms to sleepers (Met. xi. 633): Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetor, and Phantasus. [For dream-oracles see Dict. of Ant. art. Oraculum.]

Onōba, surnamed Aestuāriā (Huelva), a seaport town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, between the mouths of the Baetis and Anas, on an estuary formed by the river Luxia. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct at Huelva. (Strab. p. 143; Ptol. ii. 4, 5.)

Onochōnus (Ὀνόχωνος: Sophaditikos), a river of Thessaly which joins the Apidanus from the W. (Hdt. vii. 129).

Onomacritus (Ὀνομάκριτος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry.

He lived about B.C. 520-485. He enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus, until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Musaeus, for which Hipparchus banished him. He seems to have gone into Persia, where the Pisistratids, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favour, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient oracles which seemed to favour the attempt. (Hdt. vii. 6.) It appears that Onomacritus had made a collection and arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musaeus, and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus (Paus. i. 22, viii. 31, 37, ix. 35). Tzetzes speaks of him as one of those who arranged the books of Homer under Pisistratus, and thus he has been set down by Wolf and others as one of the 'Diasceuaetae' of Homer.

Onomarchus (Ὀνόμαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, succeeded his brother Philomelus in this command, B.C. 353. In the following year he was defeated in Thessaly by Philip, and perished in attempting to reach by swimming the Athenian ships, which were lying off the shore, B.C. 352. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified, as a punishment for his sacrilege in the Sacred war. (Diod. xvi. 31-61; Paus. x. 2, 5; Just. viii. 1.)

Onosander (Ὀνόσανδρος), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics (entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος), which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book. He lived about A.D. 50. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Edited by Schwebel, Nürnberg, 1761; and by Köchly, Lips. 1860.

Onu-gnathus (Ὀνου γνάθος; Ἐλαφονήσι), an island and a promontory on the S. coast of Laconia (Strab. p. 363; Paus. iii. 22, 23).

Onūphis (Ὀνούφης), the capital of the Nomos Onophites in the Delta of Egypt (Hdt. ii. 166).

Ophēlion (Ὀφελίων), an Athenian comic poet, of the Middle Comedy, B.C. 380 (Athen. pp. 43, 66, 67, 106).

Ophellas (Ὀφέλλας), of Pella in Macedonia, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy. In B.C. 322, he conquered Cyrene, of which city he held the government on behalf of Ptolemy for some years. But soon after 313 he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy, and continued to govern Cyrene as an independent state for nearly five years. In 308 he formed an alliance with Agathocles, and marched against Carthage; but he was treacherously attacked by Agathocles near this city, and was slain. (Diod. xx. 40-42; Just. xxii. 7; Suid. s. v.)

Opheltes (Ὀφέλτης). 1. Also called Archemorus. [ARCHEMORUS.]—2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins [p. 294].

Ophion (Ὀφίων). 1. One of the oldest of the Titans, was married to Eurynome, with whom he ruled over Olympus, but being conquered by Cronos and Rhea, he and Eurynome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus (Ap. Rh. i. 503; Tzet. ad Lyc. 1191).—2. Father of the centaur Amycus, who is hence called Ophionodes (Ov. Met. xii. 245).

Ophionenses or Ophionenses (Ὀφιονεῖς, Ὀφιεῖς), a people of Aetolia (Strab. pp. 451, 465).

Ophir. [See Dict. of the Bible.]

Ophis (Ὀφίς), a river in Arcadia, which flowed by Mantinea (Paus. viii. 8, 4).

Ophiūsa or Ophiussa (Ὀφιδέσσα, Ὀφιοῦσσα, Ὀφιοῦσα, i.e. abounding in snakes). 1. [PITYUSAE.]—2. Or Ophiussa (perhaps Palanea), a town of European Scythia, on the left bank of the Tyras (Dniester). (Strab. p. 306.)—3. A little island near Crete.—4. (Afsia or Rabbi), a small island in the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), NW. of Cyzicus and SW. of Proconnesus.—5. [RHODUS.]—6. [TENOS.]

Ophryniūm (Ὀφρυνεῖον: prob. Ἰρεν-Κεῖν), a small town of the Troad, near the lake of Pteleos, between Dardanus and Rhoeteum, with a grove consecrated to Hector (Hdt. vii. 43; Strab. p. 595; Xen. An. vii. 8, 5).

Opici. [OSCI.]

Opilius Macrinus. [MACRINUS.]

Opilius, Aurelius, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and finally, grammar. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus (B.C. 92), whom he accompanied to Smyrna. He composed several learned works, one of which, named Musae, is referred to by A. Gellius. (Suet. Gramm. 6; Gell. i. 25.)

Opimius. 1. Q., consul B.C. 154, when he subdued some of the Ligurian tribes N. of the Alps, who had attacked Massilia. He was notorious in his youth for his riotous living, and was described by Lucilius as 'formosus et famosus.' (Pol. xxxiii. 5-8; Cic. de Or. ii. 68, 277; Non. s.v. Fama).—2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor 125, in which year he took Fregellae, which had revolted against the Romans. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was a violent opponent of C. Gracchus. He was consul in 121, and took the leading part in the proceedings which ended in the murder of Gracchus. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than 3000 persons. For details see p. 371, b. In the following year (120), he was accused of having put Roman citizens to death without trial; but he was defended by the consul C. Papirius Carbo, and was acquitted. (Liv. Ep. 61; Cic. de Or. ii. 25, 106.) In 112 he was at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and was bribed by Jugurtha to assign to him the better part of the country. Three years after, he was condemned under the law of the tribune C. Mamilius Limetanus, by which an inquiry was made into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. (Sall. Jug. 16, 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.) Opimius went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct towards C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius. The year in which Opimius was consul (121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum. (Cic. Brut. 83, 287.)

Opis (Ὀπίς), an important commercial city of Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, at the confluence of the Physcus (Odorneh) with the Tigris; not mentioned after the Christian era (Hdt. i. 189; Xen. An. vii. 7; Strab. pp. 80, 529).

Opitergium (Opiterginus: Oderzo), a Roman colony in Venetia in the N. of Italy, on the river Liqueutia, and on the high road from Aquileia to Verona. In the Marcomannic war it was destroyed by the Quadi, but it was rebuilt, and afterwards belonged to the Exarchate. From it the neighbouring mountains were called Montes Opitergini. (Strab. p. 214; Lucan, iv. 462; Tac. Hist. iii. 6; Ann. Marc. xxix. 6.)

Oppianus (Ὀππιανός), the name of the authors of two Greek hexameter poems still extant, one on fishing, entitled Halicutica (Ἀλιευτικά), and the other on hunting, entitled Cynegetica (Κυνηγητικά). Modern critics have shown that these two poems were written by two different persons of this name. 1. The author of the Halicutica was born either at Corycus or at Anazarba, in Cilicia, and flourished about A.D. 180. The poem consists of about 3500 hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing.—2. The author of the Cynegetica was a native of Apamea or Pella, in Syria, and flourished a little later than the other Oppianus, about A.D. 206. His poem, which is addressed to the emperor Caracalla, consists of about 2100 hexameter lines, divided into four books. Editions of the two poems by Schneider, Lips. 1813, and by F. Lehrs, 1846. There is also a prose paraphrase by Entechnius of a poem on fowling (Ἰξευτικά) attributed to Oppianus, but the authorship of the original is doubtful.

Oppius. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B. C. 213, carried a law, under pressure of the second Punic war, to curtail the expenses and luxuries of Roman women. This law was repealed in 195, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato (Liv. xxxiv. 1–8; Val. Max. ix. 1, 3; Tac. Ann. iii. 33).—2. Q., a Roman general in the Mithridatic war, B. C. 88, fell into the hands of Mithridates, but was subsequently surrendered by the latter to Sulla (Liv. Ep. 78; App. Mithr. 17, 20, 112).—3. P., quaestor to M. Aurelius Cotta in Bithynia, B. C. 74, was accused of misappropriation of supplies and also of drawing his sword upon his commander; he was tried in 69 and defended by Cicero in a speech of which only a few fragments remain (Dio Cass. xxxvi. 23; Quintil. v. 13, 17).—4. C., an intimate friend of C. Julius Caesar, whose private affairs he managed in conjunction with Cornelius Balbus (Cic. ad Att. ix. 7, 13, xi. 17, xii. 19, ad Fam. ii. 16). Oppius wrote a Life of Caesar (Plut. Pomp. 10; Suet. Jul. 53), and of Scipio Africanus the elder (Gell. vi. 1, 2). Some believed Oppius to have been the author of the continuation of Caesar's Commentaries (the Bell. Alex., Afr. and Hisp.). This is untenable as regards the two last and improbable as regards the first. The style of the African and Spanish Wars is too poor to be the work of a man with the reputation of Oppius, and it is clear that the author was present in both wars, whereas Oppius at that time was at Rome. There is thought to be some indication in Bell. Alex. (3, 1; 19, 6) that the author was present (which was not the case with either Hirtius or Oppius), but the evidence here is not conclusive [cf. HIRTIIUS].

Ops, a Roman goddess of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, and copia. She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and the protectress of everything connected with agriculture. (Varro, L. L. vi. 22; Macrobi. i. 10, 18.) As goddess of the earth and its fruits, Ops was also a goddess of the underworld, which is indicated by the ancient custom that her worshippers paid their vows crouching down and touching the earth (Macrobi. i. 10, 12, iii. 9, 12), which was the attitude of the Greeks in invoking Hades and Persephone (Il. ix. 564). In the three days' summer festival held by the Fratres Arvales, Ops was worshipped with offerings of first-fruits and sacrifices under the name of Dea Dia (who is identified with Ops). [For the ritual see Dict. of Ant. art. Fratres Arvales.] As goddess of seed-time she was called Ops Consiva, whence her August festivals are called Opiconsivia. Her worship was intimately connected with that of Saturnus, and it is probable that the festival of the Opalia in the Forum on December 17, during the period of the Saturnalia, were held in the temple of Saturn. The temple of Ops was on the Capitol (Liv. xxxix. 22; Plin. vi. 174; C. I. L. vi. 507). Here was the treasury of which Cicero speaks (Phil. ii. 37, 93). There was also a sacrum of Ops in the Regia, which contained sacred vessels of the most ancient form [Dict. of Ant. art. Praefericulum]. Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus, for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; but she had likewise a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the Vicus Jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, she had an altar in common with Ceres.

Opus (Ὀπούς, cont. of Ὀπέσις: Ὀπούντιος). 1. (Talanda or Talanti?), the capital of the Opuntian Locrians, was situated, according to Strabo (p. 425), fifteen stadia (two miles) from the sea, and sixty stadia from its harbour Cynos; but, according to Livy (xxviii. 6), it was only one mile from the coast. It was the birthplace of Patroclus (Il. xviii. 326). The bay of the Euboean sea near this town was called Opuntius Sinus. [LOCRI].—2. A small town in Elis.

Ora. 1. (Ὀρα) a city of Carmania, near the borders of Gedrosia (Ptol. vi. 8, 14).—2. (Ὀρα) a city in the N.W. of India, near the sources of the Indus (Arrian, An. iv. 27).

Orae. [ORITAE.]

Orbēlus (Ὀρβηλος), a mountain in the NE. of Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace, extends from Mt. Rhodope along the Strymon to Mt. Pangaeus (Hdt. v. 16; Strab. p. 329).

Orbilius Pupillus, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagosus from the severe floggings which his pupils received from him. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 71). He was a native of Beneventum, and after serving as an apparitor of the magistrates, and also as a soldier in the army, settled at Rome in the fiftieth year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B. C. 63. He lived nearly 100 years, but had lost his memory long before his death. (Suet. Gramm. 9.)

Orbōna, an ancient Italian goddess who by slaying children rendered parents childless. She was invoked (to avert her wrath) in the INDIGITAMENTA. (Tertull. ad Nat. ii. 15; Arnob. iv. 7.) Her sauctuary is mentioned by Cic. N. D. iii. 25, 63 (cf. Plin. ii. 16) as on the Via Sacra.

Orcādes Insulae (Orkney and Shetland Isles), a group of several small islands off the N. coast of Britain, with which the Romans first became acquainted when Agricola sailed round the N. of Britain (Tac. Agr. 10; Ptol. ii. 3, 31).

Orchōmēnus (Ὀρχόμενος: Ὀρχομένιος). 1.

(Scripu), an ancient, wealthy, and powerful city of Boeotia, the capital of the Minyean empire in the prehistorical ages of Greece, and hence called by Homer the Minyean Orchomenos (Ὀρχ. Μινυαίος, Il. ii. 511). It was situated NW. of the lake Copais, on the river Cephissus, and was built on the slope of a hill on the summit of which stood the acropolis. It is said to have been originally called Andrēis (Ἀνδρῆϊς), from Andreus, the son of Pouos, who emigrated from the Peneus in Thessaly; to have been afterwards called Phlegya (Φλεγυά), from Phlegyas, a son of Ares and Chryse; and to have finally obtained its later name from Orchomenus, son of Zeus or Eteocles and the Danaid Hesione, and father of Minyas (Paus. ix. 34–36). This Orchomenus was regarded as the real founder of the Minyean empire, which before the time of the Trojan war extended over the whole of the W. of Boeotia. Orchomenus, the ruling town of all this district, is described as one of the wealthiest cities in Greece (Il. ix. 381). According to the legends of Thebes it was Heracles who freed that city from its subjection to Orchomenus (Paus. ix. 37, 2; Strab. p. 414; Diod. iv. 18). After the Trojan war the power of the Minyae was overthrown by immigrants from Thessaly, and Orchomenus became merely a member of the Boeotian League, subordinate in power to Thebes. [ΒΟΕΩΤΙΑ.] Orchomenus continued to exist as an independent town till B. C. 367, when it was taken and destroyed by the Thebans, and its inhabitants murdered or sold as slaves (Diod. xv. 79; Paus. ix. 15, 3). In order to weaken Thebes, it was rebuilt at the instigation of the Athenians, but was soon destroyed again by the Thebans, and, although it was again restored by Philip in 338, it never recovered its former prosperity, and in the time of Strabo was in ruins. The most celebrated building in Orchomenus was the so-called treasury of Minyas, which, like the similar monuments at Mycenae, was really a tomb of the ancient princes. It was completely excavated and explored by Schliemann in 1880. It had a passage, or dromos, leading to the vaulted or beehive chamber and another spare room, remarkable for its beautifully-decorated ceiling. The decorations, as well as the general form of the tombs, show the connexion of the Orchomenus of that date as regards art and civilisation with Mycenae [see p. 580, a]. Orchomenus possessed a very ancient temple of the Charites or Graces; and here was celebrated in the most ancient times a musical festival which was frequented by poets and singers from all parts of the Hellenic world (Pind. Pyth. xii. 45; Theocr. xvi. 104). There was a temple of Heracles seven stadia N. of the town, near the sources of the river Melas. Orchomenus is memorable on account of the victory which Sulla gained in its neighbourhood over Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, B. C. 85.—2. (Kalpakī), an ancient town of Arcadia, mentioned by Homer with the epithet πολύμηλος, to distinguish it from the Minyean Orchomenus (Il. ii. 605; cf. Ov. Met. vi. 413), is said to have been founded by Orchomenus, son of Lycaon (Paus. viii. 3, 3). It was situated on a hill NW. of Mantinea, and its territory included the towns of Methydrium, Theisoa, Teuthis, and the Tripolis. In the Poloponnesian war Orchomenus sided with Sparta, and was taken by the Athenians (Thuc. v. 61). After the battle of Leuctra the Orchomenians did not join the Arcadian confederacy, in consequence of its hatred against Mantinea. In the contests between the Achaeans and Aetolians, it was taken successively by Cleomenes and Antigonus Dosis; but it eventually became a member of the Achaean League. (Pol. ii. 46, 54, iv. 6; Liv. xxxii. 5.)

Orcus. [HÆDES.]

Ordessus (Ὀρδησσός), a tributary of the Ister (Danube) in Scythia, but cannot be identified with any modern river (Hdt. iv. 48).

Ordovices, a people of Britain, opposite the island Mona (Anglesey), occupying the N. portion of Wales (Tac. Ann. xii. 33, Agr. 18).

Orēades. [ΝΥΜΦΗΛΕ.]

Orestae (Ὀρέσται), a people in the N. of Epirus on the borders of Macedonia, inhabiting the district named after them, Orestis or Orestias. They were originally independent, but were afterwards subject to the Macedonian monarchs. They were declared free by the Romans in their war with Philip. According to the legend, they derived their name from Orestes, who is said to have fled into this country after murdering his mother, and to have there founded the town of Argos Oresticum. (Thuc. ii. 80; Strab. pp. 326, 434; Pol. xviii. 30.)

Orestes (Ὀρέστης). 1. Son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia). The Homeric account only tells us that in the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father (Od. iii. 306; cf. i. 30, 293, iv. 546). From Od. xi. 542 it appears that Orestes was not in Mycenae at the time of his father's murder. To this story much is added by later writers. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended to despatch Orestes also, but that by means of Electra he was secretly carried to Strophius, king in Phocis, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse, who allowed Aegisthus to kill her own child, supposing it to be Orestes (Pind. Pyth. xi. 25; Aesch. Cho. 732). In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up with the king's son Pylades, with whom he formed that close and intimate friendship which has become proverbial. Being frequently reminded by messengers from Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret to Argos. Here he pretended to be a messenger of Strophius who had come to announce the death of Orestes and brought the ashes of the deceased (Soph. El. 11, 35, 296, 531, 1346; Eur. El. 1245, Orest. 162, 804). In Homer it is not said that Orestes slew Clytaemnestra as well as Aegisthus, and the inference from the unequal praise of his action in the Odyssey is that he did not kill his mother; but in the tragedians, after visiting his father's tomb, and sacrificing upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, and soon afterwards slew both Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra in the palace. Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized with madness. He now fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinyes of his mother. At length by Apollo's advice, he took refuge with Athene at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areopagus to decide his fate. The Erinyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Athene (Aesch. Eumenides). According to another modification of the legend, Orestes asked Apollo how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and to fetch from that country the image of Artemis, which was believed to have fallen there from heaven, and to carry it to Athens (Eur. Iph. Taur. 79, 968; cf. Paus. iii. 16, 6). Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king. On their arrival they were seized by the natives, in order to be sacrificed to Artemis, according to the custom of the country. But Iphigenia, the priestess of Artemis, was the sister of Orestes, and, after recognising each other, all three escaped with the statue of the goddess. After his return to Peloponnesus Orestes took possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus. When Cylarabes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes also became king of Argos. The Lacedaemonians likewise made him their king of their own accord, because they preferred him, the grandson of Tyn-dareus, to Nicostratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him (Paus. ii. 18, 5, iii. 1, 4; cf. Pind. Pyth. xi. 24). He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Tisamenus. The story of his marriage with Hermione, who had previously been married to Neoptolemus, is related elsewhere. [HERMIONE; NEOPTOLEMUS.] He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadia (Schol. ad Eur. Orest. 1640), and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterwards carried from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried. His bones are said to have been found at a later time in a war between the Lacedaemonians and Tegeatans, and to have been conveyed to Sparta (Hdt. i. 67; Paus. iii. 11, 8, viii. 54, 3). According to the Arcadian story Orestes had dwelt during his time of madness in Arcadia having gone there from Mycenae in obedience to an oracle (Paus. viii. 5, 4). To this there is a further addition that in his frenzy he gnawed off one of his fingers, a story which seems to have originated in the name of a tomb near Megalopolis called Δακτύλου μνήμα (Paus. viii. 34, 2).—2. Regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 475-476. He was born in Pannonia, and served for some years under Attila; after whose death he rose to eminence at the Roman court. Having been entrusted with the command of an army by Julius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and placed his own son Romulus Augustulus on the throne; but in the following year he was defeated by Odoacer and put to death. [ODOACER.]—3. L. Aurelius Orestes, consul B. C. 126, received Sardinia as his province, where he remained upwards of three years. C. Gracchus was quaestor to Orestes in Sardinia (Plut. C. Gracch. 1, 2).—4. Cn. Aufidius Orestes, consul B. C. 71, originally belonged to the Aurelia gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian. (Cic. Off. ii. 17; Eutrop. vi. 8).

Orestēum, Oresthēum, or Oresthasium (Ὀρέστειον, Ὀρέσθειον, Ὀρεσθάσιον), a town in the S. of Arcadia in the district Maenuliu, near Megalopolis (Thuc. v. 64; Paus. viii. 44, 2).
