prominence. It is infinited in some quarters that local discontents have instigated many to join in this inantiesto, who have no wish to see auneanton consummated, but desire merely to alarm the British Government, and to intimidate it, if possible, into acquisecence with their demands. But the thing once started will be likely to get beyond the control of finesse, and such perty diplomacy. The tendency to wards annexation grows out of that natural instance which impels a people to demand a political existence of their own, when the colons is state no longer contributes to their growth and prospertity.
